Preface

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA, as its name implies, proposes to give its readers full and authoritative information on the entire cycle of Catholic interests, action and doctrine. What the Church teaches and has taught; what she has done and is still doing for the highest welfare of mankind; her methods, past and present; her struggles, her triumphs, and the achievements of her members, not only for her own immediate benefit, but for the broadening and deepening of all true science, literature and art—all come within the scope of THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA. It differs from the general encyclopedia in omitting facts and information which have no relation to the Church. On the other hand, it is not exclusively a church encyclopedia, nor is it limited to the ecclesiastical sciences and the doings of churchmen. It records all that Catholics have done, not only in behalf of charity and morals, but also for the intellectual and artistic development of mankind. It chronicles what Catholic artists, educators, poets, scientists and men of action have achieved in their several provinces. In this respect it differs from most other Catholic encyclopedias. The Editors are fully aware that there is no specifically Catholic science, that mathematics, chemistry, physiology and other branches of human knowledge are neither Catholic, Jewish, nor Protestant; but when it is commonly asserted that Catholic principles are an obstacle to scientific research, it seems not only proper but needful to register what and how much Catholics have contributed to every department of knowledge.

No one who is interested in human history, past and present, can ignore the Catholic Church, either as an institution which has been the central figure in the civilized world for nearly two thousand years, decisively affecting its destinies, religious, literary, scientific, social and political, or as an existing power whose influence and activity extend to every part of the globe. In the past century the Church has grown both extensively and intensively among English-speaking peoples. Their living interests demand that they should have the means of informing themselves about this vast institution, which, whether they are Catholics or not, affects their fortunes and their destiny. As for Catholics, their duty as members of the Church impels them to learn more and more fully its principles; while among Protestants the desire for a more intimate and accurate knowledge of things Catholic increases in proportion to the growth of the Church in numbers and in importance. The Catholic clergy are naturally expected to direct inquirers to sources of the needed information; yet they find only too often that the proper answers to the questions proposed are not to be met with in English literature. Even the writings of the best mentioned authors are at times disfigured by serious errors on Catholic subjects, which are for the most part due, not to ill-will, but to lack of knowledge. It would be fatuous to hope to call into immediate existence a Catholic English literature adequate to supply this knowledge and correct errors. The ENCYCLOPEDIA, therefore, is the most convenient means of doing both, enabling, as it does, the foremost Catholic scholars in every part of the world to contribute articles in the condensed form that appeals to the man of action, and with the accuracy that satisfies the scholar.

Designed to present its readers with the full body of Catholic teaching, the ENCYCLOPEDIA contains not only precise statements of what the Church has defined, but also an impartial record of different views of acknowledged authority on all disputed questions. In all things the object of the ENCYCLOPEDIA is to give the whole truth without prejudice, national, political or factional. In the determination of the truth the most recent and acknowledged scientific methods are employed, and the results of the latest research in theology, philosophy, history, apologetics, archaeology, and other sciences are given careful consideration.

The work is entirely new, and not merely a translation or a compilation from other encyclopedic sources. The Editors have insisted that the articles should contain the latest and most accurate information to be obtained from the standard works on each subject. Contributors have been chosen for their special knowledge and skill in presenting the subject, and they assume the responsibility for what they have written. Representing as they do Catholic scholarship in every part of the world, they give the work an international character.

The ENCYCLOPEDIA bears the imprimatur of the Most Reverend Archbishop under whose jurisdiction it is published. In constituting the Editors the ecclesiastical censors, he has given them a singular proof of his confidence and of his desire to facilitate the publication of the work which he has promoted most effectively by his influence and kindly co-operation.

The Editors take occasion on the appearance of this first volume to express their gratitude to all who have taken part with them in this enterprise; in particular to the hierarchy for their cordial endorsement; to Catholic publishers and to the editors of the Catholic press for their frequent courtesies; to the contributors for their ready co-operation; to the original subscribers for their generous support; to the directors of the Company organized specially to produce the work, and to many non-Catholics for their kindly encouragement.
To the Knights of Columbus and Their Friends

In taking under our auspices a special edition of The Catholic Encyclopedia, we are actuated by the motive which originally inspired the production of this work.

From the start, as the Preface to Volume I declares, it was determined that this encyclopedia should not be exclusively a Church publication, containing only matters of special interest to the clergy. It is intended for the layman as well as for the priest; and, consequently, it contains all that he needs to know, treated from his point of view.

The Editor-in-Chief and the Managing Editor are laymen, as were fully 500 of the contributors, and 150 editorial assistants. With them the clerical editors and contributors have co-operated in full appreciation of the importance of producing a work which in content and style would satisfy the scholar in his study and yet interest the man in the street.

For this Encyclopedia is designed to be the starting-point of a movement among Catholics, a great educational movement in every Catholic home in the land, the source of a literature that will once more as in the days before the Reformation employ the English tongue in the cause of Catholic truth. It is verily an educational and literary crusade, and as such it must appeal strongly to every member of an Order whose members, in the words of Archbishop Ireland, "aim to be the trusted auxiliaries of the Church, her organized chivalry, ever first and foremost when her call is heard, or her banner leads".

We have but lately completed our achievement of providing for the Catholic University of America the half million dollar scholarship foundation which is to enable Catholic young men from every part of the land to take advantage of the educational facilities of that great institution.

Here is an offer which brings all the advantages that The Catholic University can at present afford and more right into our own homes. The Catholic Encyclopedia is a veritable Catholic Home University. It has been truly styled "a university in print". Few, if any, of our membership, are in a position to take advantage of the Catholic University foundation; scarcely one is unable to avail himself of an offer, which brings to every Catholic home the best the University can give.

As if divining that the Knights of Columbus would take on themselves the task of giving the widest possible circulation to The Catholic Encyclopedia, His Grace, Archbishop Ireland, discoursing on "The Typical Catholic Layman of America", before the Supreme Council of the Order lately assembled in St. Paul, recommended the work in the following eloquent terms:

"An intelligent laity is the prime need of the Church to-day, in America. The battle is opened. It is a flood of contradiction, of misrepresentation, of calumnies. History is perverted; Catholic discipline is travestied. When the Church, as seen daily, cannot with safety be assailed, the appeal is to centuries of long ago, more unfamiliar to the reader—to remote lands whence no contradiction may come. The remedy is intelligence of all important matters concerning the Church at home and abroad, intelligence that Catholics be guarded from poisonous inoculation, and be, at the same time, in a position to influence public opinion in favor of truth and justice. The most ready arm is the press: hence the duty of the hour is to give generous support to the Catholic newspaper, to read it, to distribute it, supplementing it, as occasion permits, with magazine and book. One book, the summary of thousands, I especially recommend, The Catholic Encyclopedia".

TABLES OF ABBREVIATIONS.

tr. translation or translated. By itself it means “English translation”, or “translated into English by”. Where a translation is into any other language, the language is stated.

tr., tract. tractate.
v. see (Lat. vide).
Ven. Venerable.

II.—ABBREVIATIONS OF TITLES.

Acta SS. Acta Sanctorum (Bollandists).
Hast., Dict. of the Bible Hastings (ed.), A Dictionary of the Bible.
Kirchenlex. Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlexicon.
P. G. Migne (ed.), Patres Graeci.
Vig., Dict. de la Bible Vigouroux (ed.), Dictionnaire de la Bible.

Note I.—Large Roman numerals standing alone indicate volumes. Small Roman numerals standing alone indicate chapters. Arabic numerals standing alone indicate pages. In other cases the divisions are explicitly stated. Thus “Rashdall, Universities of Europe, I, ix” refers the reader to the ninth chapter of the first volume of that work; “I, p. ix” would indicate the ninth page of the preface of the same volume.

Note II.—Where St. Thomas (Aquinas) is cited without the name of any particular work the reference is always to “Summa Theologica” (not to “Summa Philosophiae”). The divisions of the “Summa Theol.” are indicated by a system which may best be understood by the following example: “I-II, Q. vi, a. 7, ad 2 um” refers the reader to the seventh article of the sixt question in the first part of the second part, in the response to the second objection.

Note III.—The abbreviations employed for the various books of the Bible are obvious. Ecclesiasticus is indicated by Eccles., to distinguish it from Ecclesiastes (Eccles.). It should also be noted that I and II Kings in D. V. correspond to I and II Samuel in A. V.; and I and II Par. to I and II Chronicles. Where, in the spelling of a proper name, there is a marked difference between the D. V. and the A. V., the form found in the latter is added, in parenthesis.

Aachen, in French, AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, the name by which the city is generally known; in Latin, Aquae Grani, later Aquae Gratinum, is the capital of a presidency in Rheinish Prussia, and lies in a valley basin, surrounded by wooded heights, on the Wurm, a tributary of the Roer, on its way to the Meuse. Population, 1 December, 1905, 151,922 (including the Parish of Forst); Catholics, 139,485; Protestants, 10,552; Israelites, 1,658; other denominations, 227. The city owes its origin to its salubrious springs, which were already known in the time of the Romans. There appears to have been a royal court in Aachen under the Merovingsians, but it rose to greater importance under Charlemagne, who chose it as his favourite place of residence, adorned it with a noble imperial palace and chapel, and gave orders that he should be buried there.

The precious relics obtained by Charlemagne and Otho III for the imperial chapel were the objects of great pilgrimages in the Middle Ages (the so-called "Shrine-pilgrimages") which drew countless swarms of pilgrims from Germany, Austria, Hungary, England, Sweden, and other countries. From the middle of the fourteenth century onwards, however, it became customary to expose the four great relics only once in every seven years, a custom which still holds, the last exposition having taken place in 1902. These pilgrimages, the coronations of the German emperors, thirty-seven of whom were crowned there between 813 and 1531, the flourishing industries, and the privileges conferred by the various emperors, combined to make Aachen one of the first cities of the Empire.

The decay of Aachen dates from the religious strife of the German Reformation. Albrecht von Münster first preached Protestantism there in the year 1524, but was afterwards forbidden to preach the new views, and executed on account of two murders committed during his stay in the cities of Maastricht and Wesel. A new Protestant community was soon, however, formed in Aachen, which gradually attained such strength as to provoke a rising in 1581, force the election of a Protestant burgomaster, and defy the Emperor for several years. The Ban of the Empire was, therefore, pronounced against the city in 1597 and put in force by the Duke of Julich, the Catholic overlord of the city. The Catholics were restored to their rights, and the Jesuits invited to Aachen, in 1600. In 1611, however, the Protestants rose afresh, plundered the Jesuit college, drove out the Catholic officials in 1612, and opened their gates to troops from Brabant. The Ban of the Empire was then laid on the city, and executed by the Spanish general, Spinola. The Protestant ringleaders were tried or exiled, and many other Protestants banished. These troubles, together with a great fire which destroyed 4,000 houses, put an end to the prosperity of the city.

Two treaties of peace were concluded at Aachen during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. By the first, dated 2 May, 1668, Louis XIV was compelled, by the Triple Alliance between England, the Netherlands, and Sweden, to abandon the war against the Spanish Netherlands, to restore the Franche Comté, which he had conquered, and to content himself with Flanders and Lorraine. The second treaty, dated 18 October, 1748, put an end to the War of the Austrian Succession. In 1793 and 1794, Aachen was occupied by the French, incorporated with the French Republic in 1798 and 1802, and made the capital of the Department of the Roer. By the terms of the French Concordat of 1801 Aachen was made a bishopric subject to the Archbishop of Mechlin, and composed of 79 first class, and 754 second class, parishes. The first and only bishop was Marcus Antonius Berdoulet (b. 13 September, 1740, at Rougemont, in Alsace; d. 13 August, 1809), who, for the most part, left the government of his diocese to his vicar-general, Martin Wilhelm Fonck (b. 28 October, 1752, at Goch; d. 26 June, 1830, as Provost of Cologne Cathedral). After the death of Bishop Berdoulet, the diocese was governed by Le Camus, Vicar-General of Meaux; at his decease, in 1814, by the two vicars-general, Fonck and Klinkenberg. The Bull of Pius VII, "De Salute Animarum," dated 16 July, 1821, which regulated church matters in Prussia anew, did away with the bishopric of Aachen, and transferred most of its territory to the archdiocese of Cologne; a collegiate chapter, consisting of a provost and six canons, taking the place of the bishopric in 1825. In 1815 Aachen became Prussian territory. The Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle sat there from 30 September to 11 November, 1818, and was attended by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, and by plenipotentiaries from France and England, to determine the relations between France and the Powers. France obtained a reduction of the war indemnity and the early departure of the army of occupation, and joined the Holy Alliance; the other four Powers guaranteed the throne of France to the Bourbons, against any revolution that might occur. Aachen, under Prussian government, has since attained to fresh prosperity, chiefly through the development of the coal mines in the neighbourhood, which facilitated several extensive industries (such as the manufacture of linen, needles, machinery, glass, woolen, and half-woollen stuffs, etc.), but also in consequence of the large number of visitors to its hot springs.

Ecclesiastically, Aachen constitutes a deanery of the archdiocese of Cologne. It has a collegiate chapter, already mentioned, with a provost, six regular, and four honorary, canons; 12 Catholic parishes, 46 Catholic churches and chapels; in 1906, there were 87 secular, and 24 regular, clergy, besides 9 priests from other dioceses. The minster ranks first among the church buildings; it consists of three distinct parts: the octagon, the choir, and the crown, or ring, of chapels, the octagon forming the central portion. This last is the most important monument of Carolingian architecture; it was built between 796 and 804, in the reign of Charlemagne, by Master Odo of Metz, and modelled after the Italian circular church of San Vitale at Ravenna. It was consecrated by Pope Leo III. It is an eight-sided, domed building, 54 feet in diameter, with a sixteen-sided circumference of 120 feet, and a height of 124 feet. The interior of the dome is adorned with mosaics on a gold ground, executed by Salvati of Venice, in 1582, representing Our Lord surrounded by the four and twenty Ancients of the Apocalypse. The main building was decorated with marble and mosaics in 1902, after the designs of H. Schaper. Over the spot supposed to be the site of Charlemagne's grave hangs an enormous corona of lamps, the gift of the Emperor Frederick I, Barbarossa; in the choir of the octagon, the so-called upper minster, stands Charlemagne's throne, made of great slabs of white marble, where, after the coronation, the German emperors received the homage of their nobles. The rich upper choir, built in Gothic style, joins on to the eastern side of the octagon; it was begun in the second half of the fourteenth century, and dedicated in 1414. The thirteen windows, each 100 feet high, have been filled with new coloured glass; on the pillars between them stand fourteen statues (the Mother of God, the Twelve Apostles, and Charlemagne), dating from the fifteenth century. Among the treasures of the choir should be mentioned the famous Gospel-pulpit, enriched with gold plates, the gift of the Emperor Henry II, the throne canopy of the fifteenth century, the new Gothic high altar of 1876, and the memorial stone which marks the spot where the Emperor Otto III formerly lay. The lower portions of the bell-tower, to the west of the octagon, belong to the Carolingian period; the Gothic superstructure dates from 1884. Of the chapels which surround the whole building, the so-called Hungarian chapel contains the minster treasury, which includes a large number of vessels, and vestments, the most important being those known as the four "Great Relics," namely, the cloak of the Blessed Virgin, the swaddling-clothes of the Infant Jesus, the loin-cloth worn by Our Lord on the Cross, and the cloth on which lay the head of St. John the Baptist after his beheading. They are exposed every seven years, and dedicated by thousands of pilgrims (101,000 in 1876 and 158,965 in 1881). Among the other Catholic churches of Aachen, the following may be mentioned: the Church of Our Lady, a Gothic church in brick, built by Friederich Statz in 1589; the Church of St. Foilan, the oldest parish church in the city, which, in its present form, was erected by the Franks in the ninth century and was renovated between 1883 and 1888; and the Romanesque Church of St. James, built between 1077 and 1888. The most important secular building is the Rathaus, built between 1333 and 1350, on the site of, and out of the ruins of, Charlemagne's imperial palace, and completely renovated between 1882 and 1893. The façade is adorned with the statues of fifty-four German emperors, the great hall (Kaisersaal) with eight frescoes from designs by Alfred Rethel.

In Aachen there are foundations established by the Franciscans, Capuchins, and Redemptorists. The Alexians have a great institution, a hospital for insane men and epileptics. The Franciscan Brothers conduct an apprentices' home and an asylum for boys. A number of female orders also have establishments. The Sisters of St. Charles Borromeo have charge of an eye-hospital, a city asylum for orphans and the aged, with a wing for insane women, and Our Lady's Hospital, a working-women's home, and a protectory for girls. The Christensians have but one house, which is devoted to the care of the sick. The Sisters of St. Elizabeth have five: a mother-house, a city hospital of St. Vincent, a city home for the sick, an asylum for the aged poor under the patronage of St. Joseph, and a city hospital of Our Lady of Help. The Franciscan Sisters have six institutions: a mother-house, a refuge for working-women, an asylum for homeless girls, a home for servant-girls out of employment and domestics no longer able to work, a hospital of St. Mary, and a sanatorium. The Sisters of the Good Shepherd have one house. The Sisters of the Poor Child Jesus conduct two: a school for neglected girls, with a manual-training school and kindergarten attached, and a hospital and sanatorium for members of the Society, with a boarding house, eight shelters, etc. The Carmelites have one institution, and the Ursulines one, a higher boarding school for girls. The Sisters of St. Vincent have a crèche and two kindergartens, besides six Catholic orphanages. Among the religious and social unions should be mentioned eight congregations and two unions for boys, one for women's union, one for men's union with a home of its own, two tradesmen's unions, one union of female shop-employees, the Catholic Protective Union for girls, women, and children, one vestment society, and one Cecilian society. There are two Catholic daily papers published in Aachen.

COUNCILS OF AACHEN.—A number of important councils were held here in the early Middle Ages. In the mixed council of 789, Charlemagne proclaimed an important capitulary of eighty-one chapters, largely a repetition of earlier ecclesiastical legislation, that was accepted by the clergy and acquired canonical authority. At the general council of 816, Felix, Bishop of Urgel, in Spain, avowed himself overrule by Alcuin and withdrew his heretical theory of Adoptionism. In the synods of 816, 817, 818, and 819, clerical and monastic discipline was the chief issue, and the famous "Regula Aquensis" was made obliby this fresh assurance of Yahweh's help. Moses and Aaron again appeared before the King at Tanis (Ps. lviii, 12), there to break the stubbornness of Pharao's will by working the wonders known as the ten plagues. In these, according to the sacred narrative, the part taken by Aaron was most prominent. Of the ten plagues, the first three and the sixth were procured at his command; both he and his brother were each time summoned before the King; both likewise received from God the last instructions for the departure of the people; to both was, in later times, attributed Israel's deliverance from the land of bondage; both finally repeatedly became the target for the complaints and reproaches of the impatient and inconsistent Israelites.

When the Hebrews reached the desert of Sin, tired by their long march, fearful at the thought of the coming scarcity of food, and perhaps weakened already by privations, they began to regret the abundance of the days of their sojourn in Egypt, and murmured against Moses and Aaron. But the two leaders were soon sent by God to appease their murmuring by the promise of a double sign of the providence and care of God for His people. Quails came up that same evening, and the next morning the manna, the new heavenly bread with which God would so feed His people in the land of Canaan, was the first time round the camp. Aaron was commanded to keep a gomer of manna and put it in the tabernacle in memory of this wonderful event. This is the first circumstance in which we hear of Aaron in reference to the tabernacle and the sacred functions (Ex. xxvi). At Raphidim, the third station after the desert of Sin, Israel met the Amalecites and fought against them. While the men chosen by Moses battled in the plain, Aaron and Hur were with Moses on the top of a neighbouring hill, whither the latter had betaken himself to pray, and when he “lifted up his hands, Israel overcame: but if he let them down a little, Amalec overcame. And Moses’ hands were heavy: so they took a stone, and put under him and he sat on it: and Aaron and Hur stayed up his hands on both sides” until Amalec was put to flight (Ex. xvii).

In the valley of Mount Sinai the Hebrews received the Ten Commandments; then Aaron and a great number of the ancients of Israel, went upon the mountain, to be favoured by a vision of the Almighty, “and they saw the God of Israel: and under his feet as it were a work of sapphire stone, and as the heaven, when clear.” Thereupon Moses, having entrusted the charge of settling the difficulties which might arise, went up to the top of the mountain.

His long delay finally excited in the minds of the Israelites the fear that he had perished. They gathered around Aaron and requested him to make them a visible God that might go before them. Aaron said: “Take the golden earrings from the ears of your wives, and your sons and daughters, and bring them to me.” When he had received them, he made of them a molten calf before which he built up an altar, and the children of Israel were convoked to celebrate their new god. What was Aaron’s intention in setting up the golden calf? Whether he and the people meant a formal idolatry, or rather wished to raise up a visible image of Yahweh their deliverer, has been the subject of many discussions; the texts, however, seem to favour the latter opinion (cf. Ex. xxxii, 4). Be this as it may, Moses, at Yahweh’s command, rebuked both Moses and Aaron, whose interference proved disastrous to the Israelites (Ex. v). These latter, overburdened with the hard work to which they were subjected, bitterly murmured against their leaders. Moses in turn complained before God, who replied by confirming his mission and that of his brother. Encouraged...
"has this people done to thee, that thou shouldest bring upon them a most heinous sin?" (Ex., xxxii, 21). To this so well deserved reproach, Aaron made only an embarrassed answer, and he would undoubtedly have undergone the chastisement for his crime with the three thousand men (so with the best textual authority, although the Vulgate reads three and sixty thousand) that received Aaron at Moses' command (Ex., xxxii, 28), had not the latter prayed for him and allayed God's wrath (Deut., ix, 20).

In spite of the sin, God did not alter the choice he had made of Aaron (Hebr., v, 4) to be Israel's first High Priest. Upon the morning that the people consecrated him, according to the ritual given in Ex., xxxix, for his sublime functions; in like manner Nadab, Abiu, Eleazar, and Ithamar, Aaron's sons, he devoted to the divine service. What the high priesthood was, and by what rites it was conferred, we shall see later. The very day of Aaron's consecration, God, by an awful example, indicated with what perfection sacred functions ought to be performed. At the incense-offering, Nadab and Abiu put strange fire into the censers and offered it up before the Lord; whereupon a flame, coming out from the censers with swift and piercing tumult, devoured them. They were taken away from before the sanctuary, vested with their priestly garments, and cast forth out of the camp. Aaron, whose heart had been filled with awe and sorrow at this dreadful scene, neglected also an important ceremony; but his excuse fully satisfied Moses and very likely God Himself, for no further chastisement punished his forgetfulness (Lev., x; Num., iii, 4; xxxvi, 61).

In Lev., xvi, we see him perform the rites of the Day of Atonement; in like manner, to him were transmitted the precepts concerning the sacrifices and sacrificers (Lev., xvi, xxii, xxi). A few months later, Moses is represented as standing after Mount Sinai, Aaron fell into a new fault. He and Mary "spoke against Moses, because of his wife the Ethiopian. And they said: Hath the Lord spoken by Moses only?" (Num., xii). From the entire passage, especially from the fact that Mary alone was punished, it has been surmised that Aaron's sin was possibly a mere approval of his sister's remarks; perhaps also he imagined that his elevation to the high priesthood should have freed him from all dependence upon his brother. However the case may be, both were summoned by God from the oracle, and both were rebuked. Mary, besides, was covered with leprosy; but Aaron, in the name of both, made amends to Moses, who in turn besought God to heal Mary. Moses' dignity had been, to a certain extent, disowned by Aaron. The latter's prerogatives likewise extended to the sons of the sons of Ruben; they roused even the envy of the other Levites. The opponents, about two hundred and fifty in number, found their leaders in Core, a cousin of Moses and of Aaron, Dathan, Abiron, and Hur, of the tribe of Ruben. The terrible punishment of the rebels and of their chiefs, which had at first filled the multitude with awe, soon roused their anger and stirred up a spirit of revolt against Moses and Aaron, who sought refuge in the tabernacle. As soon as they entered it "the glory of the Lord appeared. And the Lord said to Moses: Get you out from the midst of this multitude, this moment will I destroy them" (Num., xxxii, 42-43). And indeed a burning fire raged among the people and killed many of them. Then again, Aaron, at Moses' order, holding his censer in his hand, stood between the dead and the living to pray for the people, and the plague ceased. The authority of the Supreme Pontiff, strongly confirmed before the people, very probably remained thenceforth undisputed. God, nevertheless, wished to give a fresh testimony of His favour. He commanded Moses to take and lay up in the tabernacle the rods of the princes of the Twelve Tribes, with the name of every man written upon his rod. The rod of Levi's tribe should bear Aaron's name: "whomsoever of these I shall choose," the Lord had said, "his rod shall blossom." The following day, when Moses returned to the tabernacle, the rod of Aaron ... was budded: and that the buds swelling it had bloomed blossoms, which, spreading, the leaves were formed into almonds." All the Israelites, seeing this, understood that Yahweh's choice was upon Aaron, whose rod was brought back into the tabernacle the morrow. Moses then announced to the people, that for the next thirty-seven years of Aaron's life, the Bible gives no detail; its narrative is concerned only with the first three and the last years of the wandering life of the Hebrews in the desert; but from the events above described, we may conclude that the life of the new pontiff was passed unmolested in the performance of his sacerdotal functions.

In the first month of the thirty-ninth year after the Exodus, the Hebrews camped at Cades, where Mary, Aaron's sister, died and was buried. There the people were in want of water and soon murmured against Moses and Aaron. Then God spoke: "Take the rod, and assemble the people together, thou and Aaron thy brother, and speak to the rock before them, and it shall yield waters." (Num., xx, 8). Moses obeyed and struck the rock twice with the rod, so that there came forth water in great abundance. We learn from Ps. cv, 33, that Moses in this circumstance was inconsiderate in his words, perhaps when he expressed a doubt as to whether he and Aaron could bring forth water out of the rock. Anyway God showed himself greatly displeased at the two brothers and declared that they would not bring the people into the Land of Promise. This curse, possibly for ages, made Moses feel the full import of his fall from grace in Aaron's case. When the Hebrews reached Mount Hor, on the borders of Edom, God announced to Moses that his brother's last day had come, and commanded him to bring him up on the mountain. In sight of all the people, Moses went up with Aaron and Eleazar. Then he stripped Aaron of all the priestly garments wherewith he vested Eleazar and Aaron died. Moses then came down with Eleazar, and all the multitude mourned for Aaron thirty days. Musulmans honour on Djebel Nabi-Haroun a monument they call Aaron's tomb; the authenticity of this sepulchre, however, is not admitted by all. By his marriage with Elizabeth, Nahason's sister, four sons were born to Aaron. The first two, Nadab and Abiu, died without leaving posterity; but the descendants of the two others, Eleazar and Ithamar, became very numerous. None of them, however, honoured Aaron's blood as much as John the Baptist, who, besides being the Precursor of the Messiah, was proclaimed by the Word made Flesh "the greatest among them that are born of women" (Matt., xi, 11).

(b) Independent Standpoint.—Aaron's history takes on an entirely different aspect when the various sources of the Pentateuch are distinguished and dated after the manner commonly adopted by independent critics. As a rule it may be stated that originally the early Judaean narrative (J) did not mention Aaron; if his name now appears here and there in the parts attributed to that source, it is most likely owing to an addition by a later redactor. There are two documents, probably anonymous, of Aaron. In the old prophetic traditions circulating among the Ephraimites (E) Aaron figured as a brother and helper of Moses. He moves in the shadow of the latter, in a secondary position, as, for instance, during the battle against Amalec; with Hur, he held up his brother's hands until the enemy was utterly defeated. To Aaron, in some passages, the supreme authority seems to have been entrusted, in the absence of the great leader, as when the latter was up on Mount Sinai; but his administration proved weak, since he so unfortunately yielded to the idolatrous tendencies of the people. According to the document in question, Aaron is neither the pontiff nor the minister of prayer. It is Moses who rehearses the Law; he alone sends the Israelites (has the task of) the advancement and growth of the Law and the Ephod; he alone is allowed to enter the Holy of Holies, there to offer incense (Lev., xxiii, 27) once a year on the great Day of Atonement. In virtue of his spiritual dignity as the head of the priesthood, he is likewise the supreme judge and head of the people (Num., xxxiv, 17); he is the anointed mediator between the whole nation and God; for this cause he bears the names of the Twelve Tribes written on his breast and shoulders; his trespasses involve the whole people in guilt, and are atoned for as those of the whole people, while the princes, when their sin offerings are compared with his, appear as mere private persons (Lev., iv, 3, 13, 22; ix, 7, xvi, 6). His death makes an epoch; it is when the High Priest, not the King, dies, that the fugitive slayer obtains his amnesty (Num., xxxv, 28). At his investiture he receives the chirim as a king and is called accordingly the anointed priest; he is equipped with a diadem and a coat of purple, signs of the writer of the Priestly narrative; critics charge him with caste prejudices and an unconcealed desire of extolling whatever has reference to the sacerdotal order and functions, which too often drove him to exaggerations, upon which history can hardly rely, and even to forgeries.

II. Priesthood.—Whatever opinion they adopt with regard to the historical value of all the traditions concerning Aaron's life, all scholars, whether Catholics or independent critics, admit that in Aaron's High Priesthood the sacred writer intended to describe a model to the prototype, so to say, of the Jewish High Priest. God, on Mount Sinai, instituting a worship, did also institute an order of priests. According to the patriarchal customs, the first born son in every family used to perform the functions connected with God's worship. It might have been expected, certainly, that Rachel's family and the one of Aaron would have been counted by God for the ministry of the new altar. According to the biblical narrative, it was Aaron, however, who was the object of Yahweh's choice. To what jealousies this gave rise later, has been indicated above. The office of the Aaronites was at first merely to take care of the lamp that should ever burn before the veil of the tabernacle (Ex., xxvii, 21). A more formal calling soon followed (xxviii, 1). Aaron and his sons, distinguished from the common people by their sacred functions, were likewise to receive holy vestments suitable to their office. When the moment had come, when the tabernacle, and all its furnishings, and whatever was required for Yahweh's worship were ready, Moses, priest and mediator (Gal., iii, 19), offered the different sacrifices and performed the many ceremonies of the consecration of the new priests, according to the divine instructions (Ex., xxix), and repeated these rites for seven days, during which Aaron and his sons were entirely separated from the rest of the people. When, on the eighth day, the High Priest had inaugurated his office of sacrificer by killing the victims, he blessed the people, very likely according to the prescriptions of Num., vi, 24-26, and, with Aaron into the tabernacle, and possession thereof. As they "came forth and blessed the people. And the glory of the Lord appeared to all the multitude: And behold a fire, coming forth from the Lord, devoured the holocaust, and the fat that was upon the altar: when which the multitude saw, they praised the Lord, falling on their faces" (Lev., ix, 25, 24). So was the institution of the Aaronic priesthood inaugurated and solemnly ratified by God.

According to Wellhausen's just remarks, Aaron's position in the Law with regard to the rest of the priestly order is not merely superior, but unique. His sons and the Levites act under his superintendence (Num., iii, 4); he alone is the one fully qualified (Num., iii, 3) to enter the Holy of Holies, and (with the Ephod; he alone is allowed to enter the Holy of Holies, there to offer incense (Lev., xxiii, 27) once a year on the great Day of Atonement. In virtue of his spiritual dignity as the head of the priesthood, he is likewise the supreme judge and head of the people (Num., xxxiv, 17); he is the anointed mediator between the whole nation and God; for this cause he bears the names of the Twelve Tribes written on his breast and shoulders; his trespasses involve the whole people in guilt, and are atoned for as those of the whole people, while the princes, when their sin offerings are compared with his, appear as mere private persons (Lev., iv, 3, 13, 22; ix, 7, xvi, 6). Aaron and his sons, distinguished from the common people by their sacred functions, were likewise to receive holy vestments suitable to their office. When the moment had come, when the tabernacle, and all its furnishings, and whatever was required for Yahweh's worship were ready, Moses, priest and mediator (Gal., iii, 19), offered the different sacrifices and performed the many ceremonies of the consecration of the new priests, according to the divine instructions (Ex., xxix), and repeated these rites for seven days, during which Aaron and his sons were entirely separated from the rest of the people. When, on the eighth day, the High Priest had inaugurated his office of sacrificer by killing the victims, he blessed the people, very likely according to the prescriptions of Num., vi, 24-26, and, with Aaron into the tabernacle, and possession thereof. As they "came forth and blessed the people. And the glory of the Lord appeared to all the multitude: And behold a fire, coming forth from the Lord, devoured the holocaust, and the fat that was upon the altar: when which the multitude saw, they praised the Lord, falling on their faces" (Lev., ix, 25, 24). So was the institution of the

Aaronic priesthood inaugurated and solemnly ratified by God.

According to Wellhausen's just remarks, Aaron's position in the Law with regard to the rest of the priestly order is not merely superior, but unique. His sons and the Levites act under his superintendence (Num., iii, 4); he alone is the one fully qualified (Num., iii, 3) to enter the Holy of Holies, and (with the Ephod; he alone is allowed to enter the Holy of Holies, there to offer incense (Lev., xxiii, 27) once a year on the great Day of Atonement. In virtue of his spiritual dignity as the head of the priesthood, he is likewise the supreme judge and head of the people (Num., xxxiv, 17); he is the anointed mediator between the whole nation and God; for this cause he bears the names of the Twelve Tribes written on his breast and shoulders; his trespasses involve the whole people in guilt, and are atoned for as those of the whole people, while the princes, when their sin offerings are compared with his, appear as mere private persons (Lev., iv, 3, 13, 22; ix, 7, xvi, 6). His death makes an epoch; it is when the High Priest, not the King, dies, that the fugitive slayer obtains his amnesty (Num., xxxv, 28). At his investiture he receives the chirim as a king and is called accordingly the anointed priest; he is equipped with a diadem and a coat of purple, signs of the writer of the Priestly narrative; critics charge him with caste prejudices and an unconcealed desire of extolling whatever has reference to the sacerdotal order and functions, which too often drove him to exaggerations, upon which history can hardly rely, and even to forgeries.

II. Priesthood.—Whatever opinion they adopt with regard to the historical value of all the traditions concerning Aaron's life, all scholars, whether Catholics or independent critics, admit that in Aaron's High Priesthood the sacred writer intended to describe a model to the prototype, so to say, of the Jewish High Priest. God, on Mount Sinai, instituting a worship, did also institute an order of priests. According to the patriarchal customs, the first born son in every family used to perform the functions connected with God's worship. It might have been expected, certainly, that Rachel's family and the one of Aaron would have been counted by God for the ministry of the new altar. According to the biblical narrative, it was Aaron, however, who was the object of Yahweh's choice. To what jealousies this gave rise later, has been indicated above. The office of the Aaronites was at first merely to take care of the lamp that should ever burn before the veil of the tabernacle (Ex., xxvii, 21). A more formal calling soon followed (xxviii, 1). Aaron and his sons, distinguished from the common people by their sacred functions, were likewise to receive holy vestments suitable to their office. When the moment had come, when the tabernacle, and all its furnishings, and whatever was required for Yahweh's worship were ready, Moses, priest and mediator (Gal., iii, 19), offered the different sacrifices and performed the many ceremonies of the consecration of the new priests, according to the divine instructions (Ex., xxix), and repeated these rites for seven days, during which Aaron and his sons were entirely separated from the rest of the people. When, on the eighth day, the High Priest had inaugurated his office of sacrificer by killing the victims, he blessed the people, very likely according to the prescriptions of Num., vi, 24-26, and, with Aaron into the tabernacle, and possession thereof. As they "came forth and blessed the people. And the glory of the Lord appeared to all the multitude: And behold a fire, coming forth from the Lord, devoured the holocaust, and the fat that was upon the altar: when which the multitude saw, they praised the Lord, falling on their faces" (Lev., ix, 25, 24). So was the institution of the Abaddon, a Hebrew word signifying (1) ruin, destruction (Job, xxxi, 12); (2) place of destruction; the Abyss, realm of the dead (Job, xxvi, 6; Prov., xv, 11); (3) it occurs personified (Apost., ix, 11) as Abaddón, and is rendered in Greek by Hades, identifying the angel as Hades, the minister of death and author of havoc on earth. The Vulgate renders the Greek Ἀπολύτων by the Latin Extirminatus (that is, "Destroyer"). The identity of Abaddon with Asmodeus, the demon of impurity, has been asserted, but not proved. In Job, xxxvi, 6, and Prov., xvi, 11, the word occurs in conjunction with Sheol.

Abandonment (more properly, Self-Abandonment,) a term used by writers of ascetical and mystical books to signify the first stage of the union of the soul with God by conforming to His Will. It is described as the first step in the unitive or perfect way of approaching God by contemplation, of which it is the prelude. It implies the passive purification through which one passes by accepting trials and sufferings permitted by God to turn souls to Him. It implies also the desolation which comes upon the soul by reason of what it prizes inordinate, presents in creatures, the surrender of natural consolations in order to seek God, and the loss for a time of the consciousness of strong and ardent impulses of the virtues of Faith, Hope, and Charity; and finally aridity or a lack of fervent devotion in prayer and in other spiritual actions. According to some, it is equivalent to the "obscure night," described by St. John of the Cross, or the darkness of the soul in a state of purgation, without light, amid many uncertainties, risks, and dangers. It is also misused to express a quietistic condition of soul, which excludes no effort, but only desires, and disposes one to accept evil with the fatalistic motive that it cannot be helped. (See Self-Abandonment.)

ABARCA, Pedro, theologian, b. in Aragon in 1619; d. 1 October, 1693, at Palencia. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1641, and passed almost all his religious life as professor of scholastic, moral, and controversial theology, chiefly in the University of Salamanca. Though not mentioned by Hurter in the "Nomenclator," he has left many theological works, among which are five volumes in quarto on the Incarnation and Sacraments; one in quarto on Grace, and several minor treatises on moral and dogmatic subjects. He wrote also extensively on points of history, viz.: "The Historical Annals of the Kings of Aragon," "The First Kings of Pamplona," and has left many manuscripts and one work, which he withheld, about the Church of del Pilar.

ABARIM (Hebr. מִּבְרָי מַר hâbbârîm, hârî hâḇârîm; Sept. τὸ ἄμπρι ἤ Αβάρια, τοῦ ἀμπρί τοῦ Ἰσραήλ, Abaram, mountain Abarim, mountains of Abarim, a mountain range across Jordan, extending from Mount Nebo in the north, perhaps to the Arabian desert in the south. The Vulgate (Deut., xxxii, 49) gives its etymological meaning as "passages." Its northern part was called Phasga, (Phasga), and the highest peak of Phasga was Mount Nebo (Deut., iii, 27; xxxiv, 1; xxxii, 49; Num., xxxii, 14; xvii, 12; xxi, 20, thirty, 47). Balaam blessed Israel the second time from the top of Mount Phasga (Num., xxxii, 14); from here Moses saw the Land of Promise, and here Jeremiah hid the ark (II Mach., ii, 4, 5). (See Nebo, Phasga.)

Abba is the Aramaic word for "father." The word occurs three times in the New Testament (Mark, xiv., 36; Rom., viii., 15; Gal., iv., 6). In each case it has its translation subjoined to it, reading ἀββᾶς ἀ πατὴρ in the Greek text; abba, pater in the Latin Vulgate, and "Abba, Father" in the English version. St. Paul used maybe of the double expression in imitation of the common usage in their turn, used it in imitation of the prayer of Christ. Opinions differ as to the reason for the double expression in our Lord's prayer: (1) Jesus himself used it; (2) St. Peter added the Greek translation in his preaching, retaining the Aramaic direct address; (3) The Evangelist added the Greek translation; (4) St. Mark conformed to an existing Christian custom of praying, by way of υπερετάντος πατρός.

ABBADIE, Antoin d', astronome, geodésie, géographe, physicien, numismatiste, philologue, b. 1810; d. March 20, 1897. While still a young man, he conceived the project of exploring Africa. Having prepared himself by six years' study, he spent ten years exploring Ethiopia, and achieved scientific results of the greatest value. D'Abbadie was a fervent Catholic, and during his explorations in Ethiopia made every effort to plant there the Catholic faith.

It was at his suggestion and that of his brother Arnauld, companion and colabourer of Antoine, that Gregory XVI sent missionaries to carry on the work. He published in the "Revue des Questions Scientifiques," the organ of the society, a work on the abolition of African slavery. He gave his estate, called Abbadias, in southern France, to the Academy of Sciences of Paris, to carry on research. His will provided, furthermore, for the establishment of an observatory at Abbadias, where a catalogue of 500,000 stars must be made, the work to be confided to religious and to be completed before 1950. His principal writings are: "Catalogue raisonné de manuscrits éthiopiens" (Paris, 1859); "Résumé géodésique des positions déterminées en Éthiopie" (Paris, 1879); "Géodésie d'Éthiopie ou triangulation d'une partie de la haute Éthiopie" (4 vols., Paris, 1860-73); "Observations relatives à la physique du globe, faites au Brésil et en Éthiopie" (Paris, 1873); "Dictionnaire de la langue Amariânà"—II. Abbade, Arnauld Michel d', geographe, younger brother of preceding, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 1815; d. 8 November, 1895. In 1837 he accompanied his brother's expedition to Abyssinia, where he soon acquired considerable influence, and never failed to employ it in the interest of the Catholic missions. His most important work is "Douce ans dans la haute Éthiopie" (Paris, 1885).

Abban, name of several Irish Saints. St. Abban of Magheranoidhe (Muravee or Murvnein), nephew of St. Ibar, the apostle of Wexford (a predecessor and contemporary of St. Patrick), flourished 570-620. He was the son of Cormac, King of Leinster, and he founded numerous churches in the district of Ui Cennselaigh, almost contemporary with the present County Wexford and Diocese of Ferns. His principal monastery was at Magheranoidhe, subsequently known as "Abbanstown," to-day, Adamstown; but he also founded an abbey at Rosmiec-treoin, or New Ross, which afterwards became famous as a scholastic establishment. He died 16 March, 620. His namesake, St. ABARON or NEW ROSS, also known as St. Evin, Abham, or Evin, but whose name has been locally corrupted as "Stephen," "Neville," and "Nevin," was his contemporary. Some writers have confounded him with St. Evin of Monasteravey, County Kildare. Even Colgan (followed by Luttrell) is on the wrong foot in identifying Rosglas (Monasteravey) with Ros-mic-treoir (New Ross). St. Evin of Rosglas, author of the "Trípartite Life of St. Patrick," died 22 December, at his own foundation, afterwards called Monaster Evin (County Kildare), whereas St. Abban, or Evin, of Ros-mic-treoir, died at Ros Ó Tuairche, County Galway, in the third century, of native name. St. ABRAHAM the HERMIT, of Abingdon (England), was certainly an Irishman, and is commemorated on 13 May, though the year of his death is not definitely known. He was undoubtedly pre-Patrician.

Abbé, a French word meaning primarily and strictly an abbot or superior of a monastery of men. It came eventually to be applied, in France, to every man who wears the dress of a secular ecclesiastic (Laic), whether member of a confraternity, a tradition subscribed by the superior of many religious houses to St. Martin of Tours. Cassian, the great organizer of monachism in Gaul, founded a famous convent at Marseilles, at the beginning of the fifth century, and from this convent, at a later period, St. Cessarius (d. 542) called his sister Cessaria, and placed her over a religious house which he was then founding at Arles. St. Benedict is also said to have founded a community of virgins consecrated to God, and to have placed it under the direction of his sister St. Scholastica, but whether or not the great Patriarch established a nunnery, it is certain that in a very early time he was looked upon as a guide and father to the many convents already existing. His rule was almost universally adopted by them, and with it the title Abbess came into general use to designate the superior of a convent of nuns. Before this time the titles Mater Monasterii, Mater Monachorum, and Proposita were more common. The name Abbess appears for the first time in a sepulchral inscription of the year 514, found in 1901 on the site of an ancient convent of virgines sacrae which stood in Rome near the Basilica of St. Agnes extra Muros. The inscription commemorates the Abbess Serena who presided over this convent up to the age of eighty-five years; "Hic requiescit in pace, Serena Abbatisa S. V. quae vixit annos P. M. LXXXV."

Mode of Election.—The office of an Abbess is elective, the choice being by the secret suffrages of the sisters. By the common law of the Church, all the nuns of a community, whether of the (Boiré and free from censures, are entitled to vote; but by particular law some constitutions extend the right of an active voice only to those who have been professed for a certain number of years. Lay sisters are excluded by the constitutions of most orders, and accordingly, in their work of teaching and charity, vote their privilege is to be respected. In non-exempt monasteries the election is presided over by the ordinary of the diocese or his vicar; in exempt houses, under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See, the Bishop likewise presides, but only as the delegate of the Pope. In those under the jurisdiction of a regular prelate the nuns are obliged to inform the diocesan of the day and time of election, so that, if he wish, he or his representative may be present. The Bishop and the regular prelate preside jointly, but in no instance have they a vote, not even a casting vote. And the Council of Trent prescribes, further, that "who presides at the election, whether it be the bishop or other superior, shall not enter the enclosure of the monastery, but shall listen to or receive the vote of each at the grill."

Abbess, the female superior in spirituals and temporals of a community of twelve or more nuns. With a few necessary exceptions, the position of an Abbess in her convent corresponds generally with that of an Abbot in his monastery. The title was originally the distinctive appellation of Benedictine superiors, but in the course of time it came to be applied also to the conventual superiors in other orders, especially to the abbesses of the Second Order of St. Clare (Order of St. Clare) and to those of certain colleges of canonesses.

Historical Origin.—Monastic communities for women had sprung up in the East at a very early period. After their introduction into Europe, towards the close of the fourth century, they began to flourish also in the West, particularly in the second quarter of the fifth century. The establishment of many religious houses to St. Martin of Tours. Abbess, the female superior in spirituals and temporals of a community of twelve or more nuns. With checking the vote. In case no candidate should receive the required number of votes, the Bishop or the regular prelate orders a new election, and for the time appoints a superior. If the community again fails to agree upon any candidate, the Bishop or other superior designate the one whom he judges to be the most worthy, and depute her as Abbess. The newly appointed Abbess enters upon the duties of her office immediately after confirmation, which is obtained for non-exempt convents from the diocesan, and for exempt houses either from the regular prelate, if they be under his jurisdiction, or from the Bishop of the see, to whom he is directed. Abbatiss._— Cf. Taunton, _The Law of the Church._

ELIGIBILITY.—Touching the age at which a nun becomes eligible for the office, the discipline of the Church has varied at different times. Pope Leo I prescribed forty years. St. Gregory the Great insisted that the Abbesses chosen by the communities should be at least sixty—women to whom years had given dignity, discretion, and the power to withstand temptation. He very strongly prohibited the appointment of young women as Abbesses (Ep. iv, ch. 35). Popes Innocent IV and Boniface VIII, on the other hand, were both imports to thirty years. According to the present legislation, which is that of the Council of Trent, no nun “can be elected as Abbess unless she has completed the fortieth year of her age, and the eighth year of her religious profession. But should no one be found in any convent with these qualifications, one may be elected out of another convent of the same order. But if the superior who presides over the election shall deem even this an inconvenience, there may be chosen, with the consent of the Bishop or other superior, one from amongst those in the same convent who are beyond their thirtieth year, and have since their profession spent at least the sixty years of an upright manner. ... In other particulars, the constitution of each order or convent shall be observed.” (Conc. Trid., Sess. xxv, De regular. et monial., Cap. vii.) By various decisions of the Sacred Congregation of the Council and of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, it is forbidden, without a dispensation from the Holy See, to elect a nun of illegitimate birth; one not of virginal integrity of body; or one who has had to undergo a public penance (unless it were only salutary); a widow; a blind or deaf nun; or one of three sisters alive at the same convent; or another nun was permitted to vote for herself. (Ferraria, Prompta Bibliotheca; Abbatiss._—Taunton, op. cit.) Abbesses are generally elected for life. In Italy, however, and the adjacent islands, by the Bull of Gregory XIII, “Exposit debitum” (1 January, 1583), they are elected for the years only, and must vacate the office for a period of three years, during which time they cannot act even as vicars.

RITE OF BENEDICATION.—Abbesses elected for life can be solemnly blessed according to the rite prescribed in the Pontificale Romanum. This benediction (also called ordination or consecration), must be sought, under pain of deprivation, within a year of their election, from the Bishop of the diocese. The ceremony, which takes place during the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, can be performed on any day of the week. No mention is made in the Pontificale of a conferring of the staff, customary in many places at the consecration of an Abbess, prescribed in many monastic rituals, and as a rule the Abbess, like the Abbot, bears the crosier as a symbol of her office and of her rank; she also has a right to the ring. The induction of an Abbess into office early assumed a liturgical character. St. Radegundis, in her letters, speaks of Agnes, the Abbess of Sainte-Croix, before entering on her charge, received the solemn Rite of Benediction from St. Germain, the Bishop of Paris. Since the time of St. Gregory the Great, the blessing was reserved to the bishop of the diocese. At present some Abbesses are privileged to receive it from certain regular prelates.

AUTHORITY OF ABBESS.—An Abbess can exercise supreme domestic authority (potestas dominativa) over her monastery and all its dependencies, but as a female, she is debarréd from exercising any power of spiritual jurisdiction, such as belongs to an abbot. She is empowered therefore to administer the temporal possessions of the convent; to issue commands to her nuns; to punish them for breach of holy obedience; thus binding them in conscience, provided the obedience she demands be in accordance with the rule and statutes of the order; and to prescribe and ordain whatever may be necessary for the maintenance of discipline in the house, or conducive to the proper observance of the rule, and the preservation of peace and order in the community. She can also irritate directly, the vows of her professed sisters, and indirectly, those of the novices, but she cannot commute those vows, nor dispense from them. Neither can she dispense her subjects from any regular and ecclesiastical penalties, with the consent of the regular prelate, though she can, in a particular instance, declare that a certain precept ceases to bind. She cannot publicly bless her nuns, as a priest or a prelate blesses, but she can bless them in the way that a mother blesses her children. She is not permitted to preach, though she may, in chapter, exhort her nuns by conferences. An Abbess has, moreover, a certain power of coercion, which authorizes her to impose punishments of a lighter nature, in harmony with the provisions of the rule, but in no instance has she a right to inflict the graver ecclesiastical penalties, Blasphemy, heresy, sodomy, and fornication, all of which can be punished only by the Pope. The Abbesses and other superiors are absolutely inhibited “from endeavouring, directly or indirectly, by command, counsel, fear, threats, or blandishments, to induce their subjects to make to them the secret manifestations of conscience in whatsoever manner or under what name soever.” The same decree declares that permission or prohibition as to Holy Communion “belongs solely to the ordinary or extraordinary confessor, the superiors having no right whatever to interfere in the matter, save only the case in which any one of their subjects had given a similar refusal to the same confessor.” No nun is permitted to refuse to profess, or to have been guilty of some grievous public fault, and this only until the guilty one had once more received the Sacrament of Penance.” With regard to the administration of monastic property it must be noted that in affairs of greater moment an Abbess is always more or less dependent on the Ordinary, if subject to him, or on the regular prelate if her abbey is exempt. By the Constitution “Inscrutabilii,” 5 February, 1622, of Gregory XV, all Abbesses, exempt as well as non-exempt, are furthermore obliged to present an annual statement of their temporalities to those who are invested with the power of judging thereof. In medieval times the Abbesses of the larger and more important houses were not uncommonly women of great power and distinction, whose authority and influence rivalled, at times, that of the most venerated bishops and abbots. In Saxon England they had often the retitle and state of princessesses, especially when the Abbess was a member of a royal blood. They treated with kings, bishops, and the greatest lords on terms of perfect equality; ... they were present at all great religious and national solemnities, at the dedication of churches, and even, like the queens, took part in the deliberations of the national assemblies, and attested the signatures of the acts therein granted.” (Montalembert, “The Monks of the West,” Bk. XV.) They appeared also at Church councils in the midst of the bishops and abbots and priests, as did the Abbess Hilda at the Synod of Whitby in 664, and the Abbess Elfreda, who succeeded her, at that of the River Nith in 705. Five Abbesses were present at the Council of Becanfield in 694, where they signed the decrees before the prebendaries. At a later time the Abbess "took tithes from churches impropricated to her house, painted the sacristy walls of the priory, gave liberally to the parish churches, and had all the privileges of a landlord over the temporal estates attached to her abbey. The Abbess of Shaftesbury, for instance, at one time, found seven knights' fees for the king's service and held her own manor courts. Wilton, Barking, and Nunnamister, as well as Shaftesbury, held of the great estate the advowson, and by right of this tenure had, for a period, the privilege of being summoned to Parliament." (Gasquet, "English Monastic Life," 39.) In Germany the Abbesses of Quedlinburg, Gandersheim, Lindau, Buchau, Obermünster, etc., all ranked among the independent princes of the Empire, and as such sat and voted in the Diet as members of the Rhenish bench of bishops. They lived in princely state with a court of their own, ruled their extensive conventual estates like temporal lords, and recognized no ecclesiastical superior except the Pope. After the Reformation, although some convents continued to enjoy the same imperial privileges up to comparatively recent times. In France, Italy, and Spain, the female superiors of the great monastic houses were likewise very powerful. But the external splendour and glory of medieval days have now departed from all.

Confession to the Abbess.—Abbesses have no spiritual jurisdiction, and can exercise no authority that is in any way connected with the power of the keys or of orders. During the Middle Ages, however, attempts were not infrequently made to usurp this spiritual power of the priesthood, and we read of Abbesses who, besides being guilty of many minor encroachments on the functions of the sacerdotal office, seemed to interfere even in the administration of the sacrament of penance and confessed their nuns. Thus, in the Capitularies of Charlemagne, mention is made of certain Abbesses, who, contrary to the canon law, pronounced excommunication for the sins of their nuns, and even subjected them to temporal penalties. The question of the jurisdiction enjoyed by the Abbess was at this time examined by the Cistercian Abbess of Conversano in Italy. Among the many privileges enjoyed by this Abbess may be specially mentioned, that of appointing her own vicar-general through whom she governed her abbatical territory; that of selecting and approving the canons and the canons of the church; that of hearing clerics to have the cure of souls in the church under her jurisdiction. Every newly appointed Abbess of Conversano was likewise entitled to receive the public "homage" of her clergy,—the ceremony of which was sufficiently elaborate. On the appointed day, the clergy, in a body, repaired to the abbey; at the head of them went the Abbess, attended by her chaplains with the crozier, sat enthroned under a canopy, and as each member of the clergy passed before her, he made his obeisance, and kissed her hand. The clergy, however, wished to do away with the distasteful practice, and, in 1709, appealed to Rome; the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars thereupon modified some of the ceremonial details, but recognized the right of the Abbess to the homage. Finally, in 1750, the practice was wholly abolished, and the Abbess deprived of all her power of jurisdiction. (Cf. "Analecta Juris Pontificii," XCVII, col. 723; and Bizzarrini, "Istituzioni," 222.) Among other Abbesses said to have exercised like powers of jurisdiction, for a period at least, may be mentioned the Abbess of Fontevraud in France, and of Quedlinburg in Germany. (Ferraris, "Biblioth. Prompta; Abbatissae.""

Protestant Abbesses of Germany.—In some parts of Germany, notably in Hanover, Württemberg, Brunswick, and Schleswig-Holstein, a number of Protestant educational establishments, and certain Lutheran sisterhoods are directed by superiors who style themselves Abbesses even to the present day. All these establishments were, at one time, Catholic convents and monasteries, and the "Abbeses" now presiding over them, are the Frobenian successors of a former line of Catholic Abbesses. The transformation into Protestant community houses and seminaries was effected, of course, during the religious revolution of the sixteenth century, when the nuns who remained loyal to the Catholic faith were driven from the cloister, and Lutheran sisterhoods were founded in their stead. In many religious communities, Protestantism was forcibly imposed on the members, while in some few, particularly in North Germany, it was voluntarily embraced. But in all these houses, where the ancient monastic offices were continued, the titles of the officials were likewise retained. And thus there have been, since the sixteenth century, both Catholic and Protestant Abbesses in Germany. The abbey of Queclinburg was one of the first to embrace the Reformation. Its last Catholic Abbess, Magdaleina, Princess of Anhalt, died in 1514. As early as 1539, the Abbess Anna Maria had been elected to the office when she was scarcely thirteen years of age, introduced Lutheranism in all the houses under her jurisdiction. The choir service in the abbey church was abandoned, and the Catholic religion wholly abrogated. The monastic offices were reduced to four, but the ancient official titles retained. Thereafter the institution continued as a Lutheran sisterhood till the secularization of the abbey in 1803. The last two Abbesses were the Princess Anna Amelia (d. 1787), sister of Frederick the Great, and the Princess Sophia Albertina (d. 1792), daughter of King Adolphus of Sweden. In 1542, under the Abbess Clara of the house of Brunswick, the Schmalkaldic League forcibly imposed Protestantism on the members of the ancient and venerable Benedictine Abbey of Gandersheim; but though the Lutherans intruders were driven out again in 1547 by Clara's husband, Duke Francis the Younger, a loyal Catholic, Lutheranism was permanently introduced, a few years later, by Julius, Duke of Brunswick. Margaret, the last Catholic Abbess, died in 1559, and after that period Lutheran Abbesses were appointed to the foundation. These continued to enjoy the rights of the prior institute till 1812, when Gandersheim was incorporated with Brunswick. Among the houses of minor importance still in existence, the Abbey of Drübeck may be specially noticed. At one time a Catholic convent, it fell into Protestant hands during the Reformation. In 1637, the Elector Frederick William I of Brandenburg granted the revenues of the house to the Counts of Stolberg, stipulating, however, that women of noble birth and professing the Evangelical faith, should always find a home in the convent, be adequately provided for, and live there under the government of an Abbess. The wish of the Elector is apparently still respected.

SIECULAR ABBEYS IN AUSTRIA.—In the Habsburgs of Prague, there is a noted Catholic Imperial Institute, whose directress always bears the title Abbess. The institute, now the most exclusive and the best endowed of its kind in Austria, was founded by the Empress Maria Theresa for impoverished noblewomen of ancient lineage. The Abbess is always an Austrian Archduchess, and must be at least eighteen years of age before she can assume the duties of her office. Her insignia are a pectoral cross, the ring, the staff, and a princely coronet. It was formerly an exclusive privilege of this Abbess to crown the Queen of Bohemia—a ceremony last performed in 1808, for the Empress Maria Louise. Candidates for admission to the Institute must be twenty-nine years of age, of irreproachable morals, and able to trace back their noble ancestry, paternal and maternal, for eight generations. They make no vows, but live in community and are obliged to assist twice a day at divine services. They are, every instance of time is kept, and must go to confession and receive Holy Communion four times a year on appointed days. They are all Hofkäthchen.

NUMBER AND DISTRIBUTION, BY COUNTRIES, OF ABBESSES.—The Abbesses of the Black Benedictines number at present 172. Of these there are 71 in Spain; 15 in Portugal; 12 in France (before the Associations Law), 4 in England, 3 in Belgium, 2 in Germany, and 2 in Switzerland. The Cistercians of allObservances have a total of 77 Abbesses. Of these 74 belong to the Cistercians of the Common Observation, who have most of their houses in Spain and in Italy. The Cistercians of the Strict Observance have 2 Abbesses in France and 1 in Germany. There are no Abbesses in the United States. In England the following houses are Abbesses: St. Mary's Abbey, Stanbrook, Worcestershire; St. Mary's Abbey, East Bergholt, Suffolk; St. Mary's Abbey, Mill Hill, London; St. Scholastica's Abbey, Teignmouth, Devon; St. Bridget's Abbey of Lyon, Chudleigh, Devon (Brightling); St. Clare's Abbey, Darlington, Durham (Poor Clares). In Ireland: Convent of Poor Clares, Ballyjamesduff, Co. Cavan; Sion Hall, Longford; Congregation, The Kingdom of Heaven, in 6 vols. (New York, 1890), Bk. XV; Gaudet, English Monastic Life (London, 1904); viii: Taunton, The English Monks and Monks of St. Benedict, ii: The Rule of St. Benedict and the Law of the Church (St. Louis, 1900); Ekenstein, Woman under Monasticism (London, 1895); Ferraris, Promotio Fidei et Consecratio (Rome, 1885); S. C. Episc. et Reg. (Rome, 1885); Petra, Comment. ad Conc. Apostolicas (Romae, 1798); Fontana, Dona Ecclesiastica Maines (Mainz, 1787); Fagnoni, Jus Canon., s. Comment. in Decret. (Colonge, 1704); Taberni, De juris et de lege ecclesiastica abbot, praelato, obboe, ammoni, (Colonge, 1681); Laubin, De interventione, des sacramentum, des abbesses, des administrion de la peine, (Paris, 1897); Magnill, Lehrbuch des katholischen Kirchenrechts (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1904).

THOMAS OESTREICH.

Abbey.—A monastery canonically erected and autonomous, with a community of not fewer than twelve religious; monks under the government of an abbot; nuns under that of an abbess. An autonomous priory is ruled by a superior who bears the title of a prior instead of a prior or abbess. The distinction was unknown in the first centuries of monastic history. Such were the twelve great cathedral priories of England, immediately governed by a prior, the diocesan being considered the abbot. Other priories were founded as cells, or offshoots from the great abbeys, and remained dependent on the parent house, by whose abbot the prior was appointed, and was removable at will. Originally the term monastery designated, both in the East and in the West, the dwelling either of a solitary or of a community; while cenobium, congregatio, fraternitas, confraternitas, etc., were applied only to the houses of communities. Monasteries took their names either from their locality, their founders, or from some monk whose life had shed lustre upon them; and, later, from some saint whose relics were there preserved, or who was locally an object of special veneration. The monies of the houses as may be gathered from the "Peregrinatio Etheriae," also selected for their monasteries sites famous for their connection with some biblical event or personage. The first mons generally settled in solitary places, away from the haunts of men, though sometimes they were to be found also in cities like Alexandria, Rome, Cartagene, and Hippo. Monasteries, founded in country places, not infrequently gathered round them settlements which, particularly in England and Germany, in the course of time developed into great centres of population and industry. Many important towns owe their origin to this cause; but the tendency never showed itself in Africa and the East. Though the sites selected were often beautiful, many settlements, especially in Egypt, were of set purpose made amid sand and desert. Nor was this form of austerity confined to them. In the Middle Ages, the more dismal and savage did the site appear to be, the more did it appeal to the rigid mood of the Cistercian. Still, the preference, at least with the majority of the monks of the West, was for fertile lands, suitable for cultivation and agriculture.

The formation of communities dates from pre-Christian times, as witness the Essenes; but the earliest Christian monastic foundations of which we have definite knowledge were simply groups of huts without any orderly arrangement, erected about the abode of some solitary famous for holiness and asceticism, around whom had gathered a knot of disciples anxious to learn his doctrine and to imitate his way of life. Communities that had outgrown the accommodation afforded by their monasteries founded branch houses, and thus propagated themselves like the swarming of a bee-hive. Bishops founded many monasteries, while others owed their existence to the piety of princes and nobles, who also generously endowed them. The Council of Chalcedon (451) forbade the foundation of any monastery without the permission of the local bishop, thus obviating the difficulties likely to arise from irresponsible action. This became the universal law, and it also safeguarded these institutions against disbandment or ruin, since they enjoyed a certain sacredness of character in popular estimation. Double monasteries were those in which dwelt communities both of men and women at one and the same time, under the government of a common superior, either an abbot or an abbess. The Emperor Justinian suppressed them in the East on account of the abuses which this arrangement might lead to; but the custom long prevailed in England, France, and Spain, where strict rules, keeping the sexes entirely separate at all times, minimized the danger of scandals. Examples of these double monasteries in England were the houses of the Order of St. Gilbert of Sempringham; and, in France, Faremoutiers, Chelles, Remiremont, etc.

In the beginning, solitaries attached no importance whatever to the form or design of their dwellings. They made use of anything that Nature afforded, or their circumstances suggested. In the East, especially in Egypt, abandoned tombs and burial caves; in the West, caves and rude huts constructed of branches of trees, mud, or sun-dried bricks, and furnished with the barest necessities, sheltered many an early solitary. When the number of such solitaries in a certain locality grew, and huts increased in proportion, gradually they came to subject themselves to a common superior and to follow a common rule of life; but they had no common buildings except a church to which they all repaired for the Sunday services. At Tabennisi on the Nile, in Upper Egypt, however, St. Pachomius laid the foundations of the cenobitical life, arranging everything in an organized manner. He built several monasteries, each containing about 1,600 separate cells laid out in lines, as in an encampment, where the monks slept and performed some of their manual tasks; but there were large halls for their common needs, as the church, refectory, kitchen, even an infirmary and a guest-house. An enclosure protecting all these buildings gave the settlement the appearance of a walled village; but every part was of the utmost simplicity, without any pretense to architectural style. It was the model of a laura, a monastery, inaugurated by St. Pachomius, who finally established the southern Punic, and received the name of laura, that is “lances” or “alleys.” In addition to these congregations of solitaries, all living in huts apart, there were cenobia, monasteries wherein the inmates lived a common life, none of them being permitted to retire to the cells of a laura before they had thereto undergone a lengthy period of training. In time this form of common life superseded that of the older laura.

Monasticism in the West owes its development to St. Benedict (490-543). His Rule spread rapidly, and the number of monasteries founded in England, France, Spain, and Italy between 523 and 1300 was very great. More than 15,000 Abbeys, following the Benedictine Rule, had been established before the Council of Constance in 1415. No special plan was adopted or followed in the building of the first cenobia, or monasteries as we understand the term today. Monks simply copied the buildings familiar to them, the Roman house or villa, whose plan, throughout the extent of the Roman Empire, was practically uniform. The founders of monasteries had often merely to install a community in an already existing villa. When they had to build, the natural instinct was to copy old models. If they fixed upon a site with existing buildings in good repair, they simply adapted them to their requirements, as St. Benedict did at Monte Cassino, not disdaining to turn to Christian uses what had before served for the worship of idols. The spread of the monastic life gradually effected great changes in the model of the Roman villa. The various vocations followed by the monks required suitable buildings, which were at first erected not upon any preliminary plan, but just as the need for them arose. These requirements, however, being practically the same in every country, resulted in practically similar arrangements everywhere.

The monastic lawgivers of the East have left no written record of the principal parts of their monasteries. St. Benedict, however, mentions the chief component parts with great exactness, in his Rule, as the oratory, dormitory, refectory, kitchen, workshops, cellars for stores, infirmary, novitiate, guest-house, and, by inference, the conference-room or chapter-house. These, therefore, find a place in all Benedictine abbey, which all followed one common plan, occasionally modified to suit local conditions. The chief buildings were ranged around a quadrangle. Taking the normal English arrangement, it will be found that the church was centrally placed on the northern side, its high and massive walls affording the monks a good shelter from the rough north winds. The buildings of the choir, presbytery, and retrochapel extending more of the east, gave some protection from the biting east wind. Canterbury and Chester, however, were exceptions, their churches being placed in the being in fear also they were frequently found in warm and sunny climates, with the obvious purpose of obtaining some shelter from the heat of the sun. The choir was ordinarily entered, in the normally planned English monasteries, by a door at the junction of the northern and eastern cloisters. The door at the western end of the north cloister being reserved for the more solemn processions. Although in the course of time there came into existence private rooms (chequer, or scaccarium) wherein the officials transacted their business, and later still private cells are to be met with, the cloisters were, in the main, the dwelling-place of the entire community, and here the common life was lived. The northern cloister, looking south, was the warmest of the four divisions. Here was the prior’s seat, next the door of the church; then those of the rest, more or less in order. The abbot’s place was at the north-eastern corner. The novice-master with his novices and the southern division of the cloister, while the junior monks were opposite in the western limb. The cold, sunless, southern walk was not used; but out of it opened the refectory, with the lavatory close at hand. In Cistercian houses it stood at right angles to this cloister. Near the refectory was the conventional kitchen with its various offices. The chapter-house opened out of the eastern cloister, as near the church as possible. The position of the dormitory was not so fixed. Normally, it communicated with the southern transept, hence it was over the east cloister; occasionally it stood at right angles to it, as at Winchester, or on the western side, as at Durham. There were large halls that had been to the east of the dormitory, but no fixed position was assigned to it. The guest-house was situated where it would be least likely to interfere with the privacy of the monastery. In later days, when books had multiplied, a special building for the library was added, and the building was connected to the cloister. To these may be added the calefactorium, the parlour, or locutorium, the almonry, and the offices of the obedientiaries; but these additional buildings fitted into the general plan where they best might, and their disposition differed somewhat in the various monasteries. The English Cistercian houses, of which there are so many extensive and beautiful remains, were mainly arranged after the plan of Citeaux, in Burgundy, the mother-house, with slight local variations.

The Cistercian monastery differed considerably in its arrangements from those of other orders. The monks were practically hermits, and each occupied a small detached cottage, containing three rooms, which they left only to attend the services of the church, and on certain days when the community met together in the refectory. These cottages opened out of three sides of a quadrangular cloister, and on the fourth side were the churches, refectories, and other public offices. Both laura and cenobia were surrounded by walls which protected the inmates either from the intrusion of seculars or from the violence of marauders. No monk might go beyond this enclosure without permission. The monks of the earlier period considered this separation from the outer world as a matter of prime importance. Women were never permitted to enter the precincts of monasteries for men; even access to the church was oftentimes denied them, or, if accorded admission, as at Durham, they were relegated to a strictly limited space, farthest removed from the monks’ quarters. Even greater strictness was observed in safeguarding the enclosure of nunns. The danger of attack from Saracen hordes necessitated, in the case of Eastern monasteries, the erection of lofty walls, with only one entrance placed many feet above the ground, reached by a stairway or drawbridge that could be raised for defence. The monks of the West, not being so menaced, often did not possess elaborate safeguards, and therefore contented themselves with ordinary enclosure walls. A religious of mature age and character was selected for the responsible office of porter, and to act as the channel of communication between the inmates and the outside world. His charge always ended at the end of the week, so that he might be at hand to fulfill his duties of receiving the poor and of announcing the arrival of guests. In the Egyptian monasteries the guest-house, situated near the entrance gateway, was placed under the charge of the porter, who was assisted by the novices. St. Benedict so arranged that it should be a building distinct from the monastery itself, although within the enclosure. It had its own kitchen, served by two of the brethren appointed for that purpose annually; a refectory where the abbot took his meals with distinguished guests, and, when he thought fit, invited some of the seniors to join him there; an apartment for the solemn reception of guests, in which the ceremony of washing their feet, as prescribed by the Rule, was performed by the abbot and his community; and a dormitory suitably furnished. Thus the guests received every attention due to them by the laws of charity and hospitality, and the community, while gaining the merit of dispensing these in a large-hearted way, through the appointed officials, suffered no disturbance of their own peace and quiet. It was usual for the buildings dedicated to hospitality to be divided into four groups: one for the reception of guests of distinction, another for poor travellers and pilgrims, a third for merchants arriving on business with the cellarer, and the last for monk-visitors.

In the early days, monastic communities always and everywhere extended a generous hospitality to all comers as an important way of fulfilling their social duties; hence monasteries lying on or near the main highways enjoyed particular consideration and esteem. Where guests were frequent and numerous, they were usually provided for them on a commensurate scale. And as it was necessary for great personages to travel accompanied by a crowd of retainers, vast stables and other outbuildings were added to these monastic hotels. Later, xenochoia, or infirmaries, were attached to these guest-houses, where sick pilgrims could receive medical treatment. St. Benedict ordained that the monastic oratory should be what its name implied, a place exclusively reserved for public and private prayer. In the beginning it was a mere chapel, only large enough to hold the religious, since externs were not admitted. The size of these oratories was gradually enlarged to meet the requirements of the liturgy. There was also usually an oratory, outside the monastic enclosure, to which women were admitted.

The refectory was the common hall where the monks assembled for their meals. Strict silence was observed there, but during the meals one of the brethren went to the refectory. The refectory was originally built on the plan of the ancient Roman triclinium, terminating in an apse. The tables were ranged along three sides of the room near the walls, leaving the interior space for the movements of the servers. Near the door of the refectory was invariably to be found the lavatory, where the monks washed their hands before and after meals. The kitchen was, for convenience, always situated near the refectory. In the larger monasteries separate kitchens were provided for the community (where the brethren performed the duties in weekly turns), the abbot, the sick, and the guests. The day closed with the ceremony of the lamp burned in it throughout the night. The monks slept clothed, so as to be ready, as St. Benedict says, to rise without delay for the night Office. The normal arrangement, where the numbers permitted it, was for all to sleep in one dormitory, hence these were often very large; sometimes more than one was required. The practice, however, gradually came in of dividing the large dormitory into numerous small cubicles, one being allotted to each monk. The latrines were separated from the main buildings by a passage, and were always planned with the greatest regard to health and cleanliness, as of running water being utilized wherever possible.

Although St. Benedict makes no specific mention of a chapter-house, nevertheless he does order his monks to “come together presently after supper to read the ‘Collations.’” No chapter-house appears on the plan of the great Swiss monastery of St. Gall, dating back to the ninth century; in the early days, therefore, the monks must have served for the meetings of the community, either for instruction or to discuss the affairs of the monastery. But convenience soon suggested a special place for these purposes, and there is mention of chapter-rooms in the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (817). The chapter-room was always on the cloister level, to which it was open. The cloisters, though covered, were generally open to the weather, and were an adaptation of the old Roman atrium. Besides providing a means of communication between the various parts of the monastery, they were both the dwelling-place and the workshop of the monks, and thus the word cloister became a synonym for the monastic life. How the monks managed to live in these open galleries during the winter months, in cold climates, is a mystery; a room, called a “caelestary,” heated by flues, or in which a fire was kept up, where the monks might retire occasionally to warm themselves, was provided in English monasteries. On the Continent, to save space, each novitiate in regard to the novices differed somewhat from that prevailing in England. Not being as yet incorporated into the community, they were not permitted to dwell in the interior of the monastery. They had their places in the choir during the Divine Office, but they slept in the cloister. A novice was a novice-master, instructed them in the principles of the religious life, and “tried their spirits if they be of God,” as St. Benedict’s Rule prescribed. This period of probation lasted a whole year. Abroad, the building set apart for the novices was provided with its own dormitory, kitchen, refectory, workroom, and occasionally even its own cloisters; it was, in fact, a miniature monastery within a larger one.

The infirmary was a special building apart from the accommodation of the sick and infirm brethren, who there received the particular care and attention they needed, at the hands of those appointed to the duty. A herbal garden provided many of the remedies. When death had brought its reward, the monks were laid to rest in a cemetery within the monastic precincts. The honour of burial amongst the religious, a privilege highly esteemed, was also extended to rich benefactors, royal personages, and distinguished benefactors.

No monastery was complete without its cellars for the storing of provisions. There were, in addition, the granaries, barns, etc., all under the care of the cellarer, as also such buildings and outbuildings as were used for agricultural purposes. Gardens and orchards provided such vegetables and fruit as were cultivated in the Middle Ages. The work of the fields did not, however, occupy all the time of the monks. Besides cultivating the arts, and transcribing manuscripts, they plied many trades, such as tailoring, shoe-making, carpentering, etc., while the monks for the continent the practice. Most monasteries had a mill for grinding their corn. It will thus be seen that an Abbey, especially if it maintained a large community, was like a little city, self-contained and self-sufficing, as St. Benedict wished it to be, to obviate as far as possible any necessity for the monks to leave the enclosure. The enormous development of the monastic life brought in its train a similar development in the accommodation suitable for it. The monastic buildings, at first so primitive, grew in time till they presented a very imposing appearance; and the arts were requisitioned and ancient models of architecture copied, adapted, and modified. The Basilean plan, peculiar to Italy, was, naturally, that first adopted. Its churches consisted of a nave and aisles, lights...
by clerestory windows, and terminating in a semi-circular sanctuary or apse. As time went on, the round arch, typical of Romanesque and Romanesque-architecture, gradually gave place to the pointed arch, peculiar to the new Gothic style, which is de-named as “perfected Romanesque.” In England a tendency developed of making the sanctuary rectangular instead of apsidal. The Normans adopted this arrangement; and in their church-planning the English often a type of chancel and transept took the place of the Romanesque and continental apse, and the Basilica plan was abandoned for that of the Gothic, of a crossing or transept, separating nave from chancel, the latter being extended to make room for the choir. The final evolution of the style planning in England is due largely to the Cistercians, characteristic of whose Abbeys was extreme sim-plcity and the absence of needless ornament; their renunciation of the world was evidenced in all that met the eye. Pinnacles, turrets, traceried windows, and stained glass were, in their early days at least, proscribed. And during the twelfth century Cistercian influence predominated throughout Western Europe. The Cistercian churches of this period, Fountains, Kirkstall, Jervaulx, Netley, and Tintern, have rectangular chancels. These and other twelfth century churches belong to what is known as the Transitional or Pointed Norman style. Then followed the late thirteenth century, characterized by renewed English, as seen at Norwich and Worcester, or rebuilt Westminster, culminating in the splendours of the Perpendicular, or Tudor, style, of which Henry VII’s Chapel, at Westminster, is so superb an example.

Few English Abbeys of note, however, were of homogeneous architecture; in fact, the mixture of styles, though sometimes almost bewildering, adds to what is left of these stately piles a greater picturesqueness ever pleasing to archæologist and artist.

The routine of a monastery could be maintained and supervised only by the delegation of some of the abbé’s authority to various officials, who thus shared with him the burden of rule and administration, and the transaction of business—considerable and ever increasing in volume, where a large and important monastery was concerned. The rule was exercised in subordination to the abbot, the superior, or prior, over the administration, by officials termed obedientiaries, who possessed extensive powers in their own spheres. Their number varied in different houses; but the following were the ordinary officials, together with their duties, most commonly named in old Customs: The cantor, or precentor, regulated the choir, and supplied the poor with the use of the books, and vesture, preserved by the burgomaster or successor or sub-cantor. He trained the novices to rend the traditional chant properly. In some places he acted as master to the boys of the clausal school. He was the librarian and archivist, and in this capacity, had charge of the precious tomes and manuscripts preserved in a special armoire or book-cupboard, and had to provide the choir-books and those for reading in the refectory. He prepared and sent round the briefs, or mortuary-rolls, announcing the death of any of the brethren to other monasteries. He was also one of the three official custodians of the convent seal, holding one of the keys of the chest where it was kept. To the sacrist and his assistants was committed the care of the church fabric, together with its sacred plate and vestments. He had to see to the cleaning and lighting of the church, its decking for great festivals, and the vestments used by the sacred ministers. The secretares, or under his care, conducted and maintained the lighting of the entire monastery; and thus he superintended the candle-making, and bought the necessary stores of wax, tallow, and cotton for wicks.
He slept in the church, and took his meals near at hand, so that day and night the church was never left without a guardian. His chief assistants were the sub-sacrist, or sacrist, who was in charge of the vestments, the linen, and the hangings of the church, and was responsible for their being kept in repair, or replaced when worn out; and the treasurer, who was in special charge of the shrine, reliquaries, sacred vessels, and other plate.
The cellarer was the purveyor of all food-stuffs and and drink for the use of the community. This entirely filled frequent absences, and hence the Abbot was obliged to assist much of the ordinary choir duties. He had charge of the hired servants, whom he alone could engage, dismiss, or punish. He superintended the serving up of the meals. To his office belonged the supplying of fuel, carriage of goods, repairs of the house, etc.
He was also in charge of the granary or storehouse;
the granarian, or keeper of the grain, who saw to the grinding and quality of the flour. The refectarius had charge of the refectory, or “fratry,” keeping it clean, supplied with cloths, napkins, jugs, and dishes, and superintended the laying of the tables. To him, too, was assigned the care of the lavatory, and the providing it with towels and, if necessary, hot water.
The office of kitchener was that of great responsibility, for to him fell the portioning out of the food, and it was only great experience which could preserve the happy mean between waste and niggardliness.
He had under him an empor, or buyer, experienced in market dealing. He also kept a detailed account of his expenditures and of the stores, presenting his books weekly to the abbot for examination. He presided over the entire kitchen department, seeing particularly that all the utensils were kept scrupulously clean. The discharge of his duty entailed frequent exemption from choir. The weekly servers helped in the kitchen, under the kitchener’s orders, and waited at table during the meals. They concluded their week’s work on Saturday evenings by washing the feet of the brethren. The infirmarius had to tend the sick with affectionate sympathy; and, as far might be necessary, was excused from regular duties. If a priest, he said Mass for the sick; if not, he got a priest to do so. He always slept in the infirmary, even when there were no sick there, so as to be found on the spot in case of emergency. The curious practice of blood-letting, looked on as so sal-utory in ancient ages, was carried out by the infirmarius. The chief duty of the almoner was to exchange the alms of the monastery, in food and clothing, to the poor, with kindness and discretion; and, while ministering to their bodily wants, he was not to forget those of their soul also. He superintended the daily ministration or washing of the feet of the brethren. The officium, or work of his duties was to take charge of any school, other than the clausal school, connected with the mona-stry. To him also fell the task of seeing to the circulation of the mortuary-rolls.

In medieval days the hospitality extended to travelers by the monasteries was of such constant occurrence that the guest-master required a full measure of tact, prudence, and discretion, as well as affability, since the reputation of the house was in his keeping. His first duty was to see that the house was always ready for the reception of visitors, whom he was to receive, as enjoined by the Rule, as he would Christ Himself, and during their stay to supply their wants, entertain them, conduct them to the church service, and generally to hold himself at their disposal. The chief duties of the clausallain of a monastery were concerned with the wardrobe of the brethren, repairing or renewing their clothing, and guarding and seeing to the vestments.
The officium, or work of his duties was to take charge for distribution to the poor by the almoner. He had also to superintend the laundry. As it belonged to him to provide cloth and other material for the washing, he had to attend the neighbouring fairs to purchase his stock. On him, too, devolved the task of making preparation for the baths, feet-washing, and shaving of the brethren.

The novice-master was of course one of the most important officials in the monasteries. In every chapter in the refectory, in the cloister, in the dormitory, he kept a watchful control over the novices, and spent the day teaching them and exercising them in the rules and traditional practices of the religious life, encouraging and helping those who showed real signs of a monastic vocation. The weekly officials in charge of the refectory already reserved the right to change the novice. The reader who was to make careful preparation so as to avoid mistakes. Also, the antiphoner whose duty it was to read the invitatory at Matins, intone the first antiphon of the Psalms, the versicles and responsories, after the lessons, and the capitulum, or little chapter, etc. The hebdomadarian, or priest for the week, had to commence all the various canonical Hours, give all the blessings that might be required, and sing the High Mass each day.

The greater Abbeys in England were represented through their superior in Parliament, in Convocation, and in Synod. These superiors were regularly included in the Commissions of Peace, and in all things acted as, and were considered the equals of, their great feudal neighbours. The abbots bestowed on the poor by the monasteries, together with those furnished by law, by the parish priests, served to supply the needs of the poor, to release prisoners, and to more recent needs of the poor. The lot of the poor was lightened, and they knew that they could turn to help and sympathy to the religious houses. Poverty as witnessed in these days was impossible in the Middle Ages, because the monks, spread all over the country, acted as mediators of charity and gave property and directed it, if lavishly, yet with discretion. The relations between the monks and their tenants were uniformly kindly; the smaller cottagers were treated with much consideration, and if it became necessary to inflict fines, justice was tempered with mercy. The monastic manors were worked somewhat on the principles of a co-operative farm. If we may form a judgment on the whole of England from the "Durham Halmote Rolls," the conditions of village life left little to desire. Provisions for watching over the public health were enforced, a guard kept over water supplies, and then in regard to granges and wells, and the cleansing of ponds and mills. A common mill ground the tenants' corn, and their bread was baked in a common oven. The relation of the monks to their peasant-tenants was rather that of rent-chargers than of absolute owners. Abbo Rinnus, (the crooked), a French Benedictine monk of St.-Germain-de-Prés in Paris, sometimes called Abbé Parisiensis. He was born about the middle of the ninth century, was present at the siege of Paris (841), and wrote a description of it in Latin verse, with an account of subsequent events to 896, "De belli Parisiace urbis." He also left some sermons for the instruction of clerics in Paris and Poitiers (P. L., CXII). His death took place after 921.

Abbon (or Abbo), Saint, b. near Orléans c. 945; d. at Fleury, 13 November, 1004, a monk of the Benedictine monastery of Fleury sur Loire (Fleuriet), conspicuous both for learning and sanctity, and one of the great lights of the Church in the stormy times of Hugh Capet of France and of the three Otton of Germany. He devoted himself to philosophy, mathematics, and astronomy. In early life he was called to England to direct the school of the newly founded monastery of Ramsey, in the county of Huntingdon, after which he returned to Fleury. On the death of the Abbé Otfold, Abbon was elected to succeed him, but one of the monks who had secured the support of the King and his son Robert, the Bishop of Orléans, contested the choice, and the matter assumed national importance in the political forces it brought into play. It was finally settled by the famous Gerbert (later Pope Sylvester II) in favour of Abbon. He was present at the Synod of St. Basuls (St. Basile), near Reims, at which Archbishop Arnulf was tried for treason and deposed, to make way for Gerbert. When the news came about the marriage of Robert the Pious and Bertha, Abbon was commissioned to arrange it with the Pope. On the way to Rome he met Pope Gregory V, who was a fugitive from the city from which the Antipope Joan XVII had expelled him. Between the Pontiff and the Abbé the greatest esteem and affection existed. The royal petition for a dispensation was rejected. Abbon succeeded in bringing about the restoration of Arnulf to the see of Reims. His influence contributed largely to calm the excitement about the fear of the end of the world which is said to have been general in Europe in 1000. His glorious life had a sad ending. In 1004 he attempted to restore discipline in the monastery of La Roële, in Gascony, by transferring some of the monks of Fleury into that community. But the trouble increased; fighting began between the two parties, and when St. Abbé endeavoured to separate them, he was pierced in the throat with a weapon that sealed the wound and reached his cell, where he died in the arms of his faithful disciple Aimoin, who had left an account of his labours and virtues. The miracle wrought at his tomb soon caused him to be regarded in the Church of Gaul as a saint and martyr. His feast is kept on 13 October.

Abbot, a title given to the superior of a community of twelve or more monks. The name is derived from abba, the Syriac form of the Hebrew word ab, and means "father." In primitive Christianity, and in Egypt, it was first employed as a title of honour and respect, and was given to any monk of venerable age or of eminent sanctity. The title did not originally imply the exercise of any authority over a religious community. From the East the word passed over to the West, and here it was soon revived and was applied to denote the superior of an abbey or a monastery. In this article we shall treat: I. Historical Origin; II. Nature of the Office; III. Kinds of Abbots; IV. Mode of Election; V. Beneficent of the Abbot; VI. Authority VII. Rights and Privileges; VIII. Assistance at Councils.

I. Historical Origin. Monastic communities were first organized in Egypt at the beginning of the fourth century. St. Anthony introduced one form of community life—the eremitical—when, about the year A.D. 305, he undertook the direction of the monastic life. The results of his hermitages, which he had gathered about him in the Thebaid; a second—the cenobitical, or conventual, type of monachism, was instituted by St. Pachomius, who, about the same time, founded his first cenobium, or conventual monastery, at Tabennae in the far south of Egypt, with systems and constitutions which were soon firmly established in Palestine, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Asia Minor. By the middle of the fourth century monachism had also made its appearance in Europe, and here, at the beginning of the sixth century, St. Benedict of Nursia gave it the definite form and constitution which ultimately assured its triumph in the West. Every monastery in it and every cenobium naturally had its superior. The title given him varied. In the East he was usually styled the elder, the senior, or also father of the monastery. In Asia Minor and among the Greeks generally he was called archimandrite (ἀρχιμανδρίτης), a chief, and μαθητής, a fold, monastery) or regimenes. Originally there seems to have been no appreciable difference in the signification of these two words, but after the period of Justinian the title archimandrite was jealously reserved for the superiors of the older or of the more important monasteries. The name, however, was permanently retained, and are to this day the titles given to monastic superiors in the Eastern Church. Cassian, who at the beginning of the fifth century had transplanted Egyptian monachism to Gaul, was addressed as Abbas, Pater, and Dominus; he himself termed the superior of the monastery Protopost. The word protopost, in the signification of a monastic ruler, appears also in Roman Africa and elsewhere in the West, but towards the close of the fifth century it had been almost entirely supplanted by the term abbasis. St. Benedict, in his Rule, written about 529, assigned a subordinate position in the community to the protopostus, and restricted the use of the title abbasis to the superior of the monastery. Through the Rule of the great Patriarch of Western Monachism the application of the title abbasis was definitely fixed, and its use made general in the West.

NATURE OF THE OFFICE.—St. Benedict's conception of a monastic community was distinctly that of a spiritual family. Every individual monk was to be a son of that family, the Abbess its father, and the monastery its permanent home. Upon the Abbess therefore, as upon the father of a family, devolves the government and direction of those who are committed to his care, and a paternal solicitude should characterize his rule. St. Benedict says that "an abbess who is worthy to have the charge of a monastery ought always to remember by what title he is called," and that "in the monastery he is considered to represent the person of Christ, seeing that he has taken his name from Him" (Liber Regularum, vii, 3). The monastic system established by St. Benedict was based entirely upon the supremacy of the abbess. Though the Rule gives directions as to an abbess's government, and furnishes him with principles upon which to act, and binds him to carry out certain prescriptions as to consultation with others in difficult matters etc., the superior is held to obey without question or hesitation the decision of the superior. It is of course needless to say that this obedience did not extend to the commission of evil, even were any such command ever imposed (Casquet, "English Monastic Life," London, 1894, p. 106). The obligation regarded as obedience paid to God Himself, and all the respect and reverence with which he is treated by the brethren of his house is paid him "for Christ's love, because as abbess—father—he is the representative of Christ in the midst of the brethren." The whole government of a religious house depends upon the Abbess. She is the true head of every thing; yet, as the Rule says, nothing is to be taught, commanded, or ordered beyond the precepts of the Lord. All the officials who are to assist him in the government of the house, are appointed by him and have their authority from him. He may dismiss them at his discretion. The Abbess, by virtue of his office, administers the general possessions of the community, exercises a general supervision for the maintenance of monastic discipline, provides for the keeping of the Rule, punishes and, if need be, excommunicates the refractory, presides in choir during the recitation of the Office, and at Divine Services and he is not to be moved from his office, uniting in his person the threefold office of father, teacher, and ruler, it is the duty of the Abbess to see "that all things are administered wisely in the House of God."

III. KINDS OF ABBOTS.—An Abbot canonically elected and confirmed, and exercising the duties of his office, is by the law of the Church styled a Regular Abbot. Regular ABBOTS are prelates in the full sense of the word, and their dignity is of three grades. An Abbess who presides only over such persons, ecclesiastical and lay, as are attached to his monastery, belongs to the middle grade (prelatus gregis nullius diaecesis) and his exemption is termed active (exemptio activa). And when an Abbot has jurisdiction over the clergy and laity of a district or territory (comprising one or several cities and places) which forms no part whatever of any diocese, his abbey is styled nullius diaecesis (of no diocese) and, excepting a few rights only, for the exercise of which the ordo episcopalis is required, his authority is in all things equal to that of a bishop. This is the third and highest grade of the dignity. There are no abbesses were nullius in the United States or England. Among abbesses of this class in other countries may be mentioned: in Italy, the abbey of Monte Cassino, founded by St. Benedict himself about 529; the abbey of Subiaco, of which the titular is always a cardinal; the abbey of St. Paul extra Murus (Rome); that of Monte Vergine near Avellino, founded by St. William of Vercelli in 1124; and the abbey of the Most Holy Trinity at Casamari, dating back to 1014; in Switzerland, the abbey of Einsiedeln, founded about 934; in Hungary (Austria), the archabbey of St. Martin's, (Martinsberg), established A.D. 1001 by St. Stephen, King of Hungary; and in West Australia the abbey of New Norcia. The term exempt is, strictly speaking, not applied to an Abbess nullius, because his jurisdiction is entirely extra-territorial. Within the limits of his territory such an Abbot has, with few exceptions, the rights and privileges of a bishop (See § 27), but his title or degree of their exemption, are under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See. Within the limits of his territory such an Abbot has, with few exceptions, the rights and privileges of a bishop (See § 27), but his title or degree of their exemption, are under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See. The term exempt is, strictly speaking, not applied to an Abbess nullius, because his jurisdiction is entirely extra-territorial. Within the limits of his territory such an Abbot has, with few exceptions, the rights and privileges of a bishop (See § 27), but
I. e. a federation of houses to promote the general interest of the order, the presiding Abbot is styled the "Abbot President," or the "Abbot General." Thus, the Cassinese Congregation of the Primitive Observance has at its head an Abbot General; the English Congregation, the American-Cassinese (not the American-Swiss), have each an Abbot President. The authority of the Abbot President is defined in the statutes or constitution of each congregation. In the recent confederation of the Benedictine Order all the Black Monks of St. Benedict were united under the presidency of an "Abbot Primate" (Abbas Primate, Juxta XII, "Summum semper," 12 July, 1893); but the unification, fraternal in its nature, brought no modification to the abbatial dignity, and the various congregations preserved their autonomy intact.

The powers of the Abbot Primate are specified, and his position defined, in a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars dated 16 September, 1893. The primacy is at the service of the Abbey and International Benedictine College of St. Anselm, Rome, temporal interests of the Primate, who takes precedence of all other Abbots, is empowered to pronounce on all doubtful matters of discipline, to settle difficulties arising between monasteries, to hold a canonical visitation, if necessary, in any congregation of the order, and to exercise a general supervision for the regular observance of monastic discipline. Of late, however, certain branches of the Benedictine Order seem to have lost the spirit of autonomy to some extent. The Reformed Cistercians of La Trappe, for instance, are by a Decree of Pope Leo XIII, 8 May, 1892, placed under the authority of an Abbot-General. The Abbot-General has full authority to pass decision upon all current affairs and difficulties. On account of the antiquity or the pre-eminence of the abbey over which they preside, the honorary title of Archabbat is bestowed upon the superiors of certain monasteries. Monte Cassino, "the Cradle of Western Monachism," St. Martin's in Hungary, St. Martin's of Beuron, in Germany, and St. Vincent's, Pennsylvania, the first Benedictine foundation in America, are presided over by Archabbbots.

A further variety of Abbots-Regular are the "Titular Abbots." A Titular Abbot holds the title of an abbey which has been either destroyed or suppressed, but he exercises none of the functions of an Abbot, and has as acta no subjects belonging to the abbey whence he derives his title. The law of the Church recognizes also "Secular Abbots," i.e. clerics who, though not professed members of any monastic order, nevertheless possess an abbacy as an ecclesiastical benefice, with the title and some of the honours of the office. These benefices belonged originally to monastic houses, but on the suppression of the abbey the benefice and the title were transferred to other churches. There are various classes of Secular Abbots; some have both jurisdiction and the right to use the pontifical insignia; others have only the abbatial dignity without either jurisdiction or the right to pontificates; while yet another class holds the privilege of precedence in choir and in assemblies, by reason of some suppressed or destroyed conventual church now become the cathedral. In the early Middle Ages the title Abbot was borne not only by the superiors of religious houses, but also by a number of persons of secular order, who had no connection whatever with the monastic system. St. Gregory of Tours, for instance, employed it in his day to designate the principal of a body of secular clergy attached to certain churches; and later, under the Merovingians and Carolingians, it was applied to the chaplain of the royal household, Abbas Patavinus, and to the military chaplain of the king, Abbas Castrensis. From the time of Charles Martel onward to the eleventh century it came to be adopted even by laymen, the Abbacomites, or Abates Militae, mostly nobles dependent on the court, or old officers, to whom the sovereign would award a portion of the revenues of some monastery as a reward for military service. "Commandatory Abbots" (secular ecclesiastics who held an abbacy not in titulo, but in commendam) had their origin in the system of commendation prevalent during the eighth and succeeding centuries. They were in the first instance merely temporary trustees of the monastery, to administer the estates of an abbey during a vacancy; but in the course of time they retained the office for life, and claimed a portion of the revenues for their maintenance. The practice of nominating Commandatory Abbots eventually led to serious abuses; it was greatly checked by the Council of Trent, and has in modern times entirely disappeared from the Church.

IV. Mode of Election.—In the early days of monastic institutions the founder of a religious house was usually its first superior; in every other instance the Abbot was appointed or elected. Some Abbots indeed selected their own successors, but the cases were exceptional. In many places, when a vacancy occurred, the bishop of the diocese would choose a superior from among the monks of the convent, but it appears that from the very beginning the appointment of an Abbot rested generally with the monks themselves. St. Benedict prescribed that the Abbot should be chosen "by the general consent of the whole community, or of a small part of the community, provided its choice were made with greater wisdom and discretion." The bishop of the diocese, the Abbots and Christian men of the neighbourhood were called upon to oppose the election of an unworthy man. Every religious house professing his Rule adopted the method prescribed by the great monastic legislator, and in the course of time the right of the monks to elect their own Abbot came to be generally recognized, particularly so when it had been explicitly confirmed by the authority of the Church (see Thomassin, Metus et Nova Eccles. Disciplina, Pt. I, III, c. xxxii, no. 6). But during the Middle Ages, when monasteries had grown wealthy and powerful, kings and princes gradually encroached on the rights of the monks, until in most countries the sovereign had wholly usurped the power of nominating abbots about his greater houses in his realm. This interference of the court in the affairs of the cloister was in the process of time the source of many evils and the occasion of grave disorders, while in its effect on monastic discipline it was uniformly disastrous. The rights of the cloister were first restored by the Council of Trent. According to the present legislation, the Abbot is elected for life by the secret suffrages of the community's professed members in sacris. To be eligible he must have all the qualifications required by the canons of the Church. It is furthermore necessary that he should be a priest, a professed member of the order, of legitimate birth, and at least twenty years of age. The election, to be valid, must be held in the manner prescribed by the common law of the Church (cf. "Quia propter.—De elect.,” I, 6; and Conc. Trid., sess. XXV, c. vi, De reg.), and as determined in the statutes or constitutions of each congregation. In the English and American congregations the Abbot of a monastery is elected for life by a two-thirds vote of the professed members in sacris of the chapter. The Abbots themselves elect the abbot president. Exempt abbey under the immediate jurisdiction of the Pope must, within the space of a month, apply to the Holy See for a confirmation of the election; non-exempt houses, within three months, to the bishop of the diocese. The confirmation confers upon the Abbot-elect the ius sine re, and having obtained it he enters at once upon the duties and privileges of his office. A canonical perpetuity attaches to the abbatial dignity; semel abbas, semper abbas; and even after a resignation the dignity and the title are annexed to the successive abbots in the United States and in England enjoy exemption; for America, the newly-elected Abbots are confirmed directly by the Pope; in England, however, according to the recent Constitution, "Diu quidem est" (1899), they are confirmed by the Abbot President in the name of the Holy See.

V. BENEDICTIO DE AMBULATOR.—After his ecclesiastical confirmation, the newly elected Abbot is solemnly blessed according to the rite prescribed in the "Pontificale Romanum" (De benedictione Abbatis). By the Constitution of Benedict XIII, "Commissi Nobis," 6 May, 1725, all Regular Abbots elected for life are now obliged to receive this blessing (or, at least, to thrice formally request it) within the space of a year, from the bishop of the diocese; if they fail to have the ceremony performed within the required time, they incur ipso jure a suspension from the position for the period of one year. Should the petition be refused for the third time, either by the diocesan or the metropolitan, an Abbot is free to receive benediction from any bishop in communion with Rome. The Constitution at the same time expressly declares that the Abbot-elect may licitly and validly perform all the duties of his office during the interval preceding his solemn benediction. Moreover, however, the legislation enforced by Benedict XIII does not affect those Abbots who are privileged to receive the blessing from their regular superiors, nor those who by their election and confirmation are ipso facto regarded as blessed by the Pope. The blessing is not in se essential for the exercise of an Abbot's order and office; it confers no additional jurisdiction, and imparts no sacramental grace or character. An Abbot nullius may call upon any bishop in union with the Holy See to bestow the abbatial blessing. By the recent Constitution of Leo XIII, "Diu quidem est," 1899, the Abbots of the Congregation of St. Michael (Thomassin, P. I, I, iii, passim.) From this time forward the power and influence of Abbots steadily increased in Church and State, until towards the close of the Middle Ages their position was everywhere regarded as one of the highest distinction. In Germany eleven Abbots held rank as princes of the Empire, and with all the privileges which took part in the deliberation of the Diete. The Abbots of Fulda exercised even sovereign power over ten square miles round the abbey. In the Parliament of England "abbots formed the bulk of the spiritual peerage. The position held by them throughout every part of the country gave yet a further weight to their great position as notables and local magnates. As such they went pari passu with baron or earl of the noblest lineage. On the blazoned Roll of the Lords, the Lord Richard Whiting and the Lord Hugh Farrington (Abbots of Glastonbury and of Reading) went hand in hand with a Howard and a Talbot [Gasquet, Henry VIII and the English Monast. (London, 1888), I, 25]. In France, Spain, Italy, and Hungary their power and influence was equally great and continued so generously to the time of the Council of Trent.

VII. RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES.—All regular Abbots have the right to give the tonsure and to confer minor orders on the professed members of their house. As early as 787 the Second Council of Nicaea permitted Abbots (provided they were priests, and had at least twelve monks in a prioritate) to give the tonsure and to advance their monks to the order of lector (Thomassin, P., I, c., I, iii, c, xvii, no. 3). The privilege granted by this Council was gradually extended until it embraced all the minor orders, and in the course of time Abbots were authorised to confer them on their regular but also on their secular subjects [Wernz, Jus Decretalium (Rome, 1899) ii, 47, note]. The Council of Trent, however, decreed that "it shall not henceforth be lawful for abbots, . . . however exempted, . . . to confer the tonsure and minor orders on any person, whether regular subject or lay, except abbots grant letters dimissary to any secular clerics to be ordained by others" [Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid. (ed. Richter et Schulte), p. 197]. From this decree of the Council it is quite clear that Abbots still have the right to confer the tonsure and minor orders, but it is equally clear that they may confer them lawfully only on their regular subjects. Novices, therefore, oblates, regulars of another order or congregation, and seculars cannot be advanced by the Abbot. Even the Abbots styled vere nullius, who exercise an episcopal jurisdiction in their territory, may not without a special privilege give minor orders to their secular subjects [Santi, Prefect. Jur. Can. (New York, 1898), I, 125 sq., and Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid. (ed. Richter et Schulte), 197 sq., where also the decisions of the Sacred Cong. of the Council on this subject may be found]. On the question of the validity of orders conferred by an Abbot who granted the faculties extended by the Holy See, canonists disagree. Some pronounce such orders absolutely invalid, others maintain that they are illicitly conferred but nevertheless valid. The opinion of the latter seems to be sustained by various decisions of the Sacred Cong. of the Council (Santi, op. cit., p. 128). [cf. also Benedicto, De Hab. Benedicti et Benedictinae Congregationis a S. C. R. (13 June, 1902), p. 312, and the decisions of the abbots of the English Congregation to pontificia]. According to this decree the English abbots can celebrate pontifically not only in their own abbatial churches, but also without the leave of the diocesan bishop in all other churches served by their monks with cure of souls. They can also give leave to other abbots of their Congregation to pontificate in their churches. They can use the prelatal dress, i.e. rochet, mozzetta and manteletta outside their own churches" [Taunton, The Law of the Church (London, 1906), p. 3]. The Abbots of the American-Cassinese and of the American-Swiss Congregations have the same privileges.

VIII. ASSISTANCE AT COUNCILS.—Ecclesiastical councils were attended by Abbots at a very early period. Thus, in 448, twenty-three archimandrites or Abbots assisted at that held by Flavian, the Patriarch of Constantinople, and with thirty bishops signed the condemnation of Eutyches. In France, under the Merovingian kings, they frequently appeared at ecclesiastical synods as the delegates of bishops, while in Saxon England and in Spain the presence of monastic superiors at the councils of the Church was nothing uncommon. Their attendance... did not, however, become a general practice in the West until after the Eighth Council of Toledo (653), where ten Abbots had been present, and had subscribed to the decrees by virtue of their pastoral charge. From the eighth century onward Abbots had the voice also in the censuses in the Church. It must be remarked that in later centuries Abbots were invited to assist at such councils and were permitted to give a decisive vote, mainly because they, too, like the bishops, exercised a power of jurisdiction in the Church of God. In this conjunction Pope Benedict XIV says: "Item sciendum est etiam in ecclesiis que in omnibus episcopi habeant vocem definitivam, hoc fuit quia habeant administracionem populi. . . . Postea addivit fuere Abbates eadem de causâ, et quia habeant administracionem subjectorum" (De Syn. dioec., XIII, c. ii, no. 5). A newly appointed Abbot, before he receives the solemn benediction at the hands of the bishop, takes an oath that he will discharge faithfully all the duties of his office, specifying among others that of attending councils: "Vocatus ad synodum, veniam, nisi preponderius fuerat canonica praedipitio (Pontif. Rom. De Benedictioes Abo)."

The practice of the Church in the formation of the Canons Regular, must be guided by the regulations of the sacred canons. According to the present practice of the Church all Abbots nullius diaecesis, or with quasi-episcopal jurisdiction, have a right to assist at eccumenical councils. They have, moreover, the right of a special form of presentation or subjection to the decrees. The Abbot-President of congregations and the Abbots-general of an entire order are also present and cast a decisive vote, though only by virtue of privilege. Other classes of Abbots were not admitted to the Vatican Council in 1870. In provincial synods and in plenary or national councils the Abbots nullius diaecesis have de jure a decisive vote, and sign the decrees after the bishops. Attendance at these synods is for them not merely a right, but also an obligation. By the terms of the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV, De ref., c. ii) they are obliged, "like the bishops who are not subject to any archbishop, to make choice of some neighbouring metropolitan, at whose synods they shall be bound to appear," and they are further directed "to observe and to cause to be observed whatsoever shall be therein ordained." Though other Abbots must not be called de jure to provincial or to national councils, it is yet the custom, in most communities, to call also the mitred Abbots who have actual jurisdiction over their monasteries. Thus, at the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866) both the Abbot of the Cistercians and the Abbot-President of the American-Cassinese Benedicines were present, and signed the decrees. At the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884) six mitred Abbots assisted, two of whom, the Abbot-President of the American-Cassinese and of the American-Swiss Congregations of Benedichices, exercised the right of a decisive vote, while the other four had only a consultative voice, and subscribed to the decrees merely as assenting, not as defining. And this is still the practice of the Church generally. Exempt Abbots have no obligation to attend diocesan synods.

IX. DISTRIBUTION OF ABBOTS.—The Black Monks of St. Benedict have at present seven Abbots nullius diaecesis, located as follows:—Italy, 4; Switzerland, 1; Hungary, 1; and West Austria, 1. —St. Abbots exercise a specific jurisdiction over their monasteries:—Austria, 19; United States, 14; France, 9 (before the Law of Associations); Italy, 9; Germany, 7; England, 6; Hungary, 5; Switzerland, 4; Brazil, S. A. 3; Holland, 3; Spain, 3; Belgium, 2; Scotland, 1; West Australia, 1. They have also nine titular, and seven commendatory Abbots.

The Cistercian Abbots of the Three Observances number fifty-seven. Of these the Cistercians of the Common and of the Lesser Observance have nineteen:—Italy, 3; Belgium, 2; Austro-Hungarian Province, 3; and the Swiss-German Congregation, 3. The Congregation of Sénanque, to which the three Abbots of the Lesser Observance belong, is very dispersed by the membership. The Cistercians of the Strict Observance (Trappists) have thirty-eight:—France, 18 (not expelled); Belgium, 4; Italy, 3; United States, Austria, and Ireland, two each; Canada, China, England, Germany, Holland, and Spain, one each. The Cistercians have also two Vice-Presidents.

In Italy, the Camaldolese, Vallombrosans, Silvestrines, and Olivetans, all branches of the Benedictine Order, have each a small number of Abbots. Monte Oliveto Maggiore belonging to the Olivetans, is an abbey nullius diaecesis. Some few houses of the various Congregations of Canons Regular, of the Antonians, of the Armenian Benedictines, and of the Basilians, are also under the direction of Abbots. Mitred Abbots in the United States are the Abbots of St. Vincent's Arch-Abbey, Beatty, Pa.; St. John's Abbey, Collegeville, Minn.; St. Benedict's Abbey, Atchison, Kans.; St. Mary's Abbey, Belmont, N. C.; St. Benedict's Abbey, St. Bernard, Ala.; St. Procopius's Abbey, Chicago, Ill.; St. Leo's Abbey, St. Leo, Fla.; St. Meinrad's Abbey, St. Meinrad, Ind.; Immoculate Conception Abbey, Conception, Mo.; New Subiaco Abbey, Spierville, N. Y.; St. Joseph's Abbey, Covington, La.; St. Mary's Abbey, Richardson, N. Dak.; St. Benedict's Abbey, Mount Angel, Ore.; Gethsemani Abbey, Ky.; New Mellery Abbey, near Dubuque, Iowa; and the Sacred Heart Abbey, Oklahome.

Mitrated Abbots in England are the Titular Abbot of Reading, the Abbey of St. Gregory's Abbey, Downside, Bath; St. Lawrence's Abbey, Ampleforth, York; St. Edmund's Abbey of Douay, Woolhampton, Reading; St. Augustine's Abbey, Ramsgate; St. Thomas's Abbey, Erdington, Birmingham; Buckfast Abbey, Buckfastleigh, Devon; St. Michael's Abbey, Farmborough (Benedictines of Solesmes); Abbey of St. Pierre, Appuldurcombe, Isle of Wight (Benedictines of Solesmes); St. Bernard's Abbey, Covent, near Leicester (Cistercian); The Canons Regular of the Lateran, Spettisbury, Dorsetshire.

In Scotland: St. Benedict's Abbey, Fort Augustus, Loch Ness.

In Ireland: Mt. Mellery Abbey, Cappoquin; Mt. St. Joseph's Abbey, Roscrea, Tipperary.

In West Australia: Holy Trinity Abbey, New Norcia (nullius diaecesis).

In Canada: Abbey of Notre Dame du Lac, Lac des Deux Montagnes.

ABBOT

Henry, layman, martyred at York, 4 July, 1697, pronounced Venerable in 1886. His acts are thus related by Challoner: "A certain Protestant minister, for some misdemeanour put into York Castle, to resist occasion to the favour of his strangers, insinuated himself into the good opinion of the Catholic prisoners, by pretending a deep sense of repentance, and a great desire of embracing the Catholic truth... So they directed him, after he was enlarged, to Mr. Henry Abbot, a zealous convert who lived in Holden in the same county, to procure a permission of his for an abbey, which was granted him, to Carlton to the house of Esequir Stapleton, but did not succeed in finding a priest. Soon after, the traitor having got enough to put them all in danger of the law, accused them to the magistrates... They confessed that they had explained to him the Catholic Faith, and upon this they were all found guilty and sentenced to die." The others, Errington, Knight, and Gibson, were executed on 29 No-

Abbreviation, Methods of.—The use of abbreviations is due, in part, to exigencies arising from the nature of the materials employed in the making of records, whether stone, marble, bronze, or parchment. Lapidaries, engravers, and copystes are under the same necessity of making the most of the space at their disposal. Such abbreviations, indeed, are seldom met with at the beginning of the Christian era; material of all kinds was plentiful, and there was, consequently, no need to be sparing in the use of it. By the third or fourth century, however, it had grown to be scarce and costly, and it became the artist's aim to inscribe long texts on surfaces of somewhat scanty proportions. We shall not pause here to discuss the use of abbreviations in ordinary writing. The Romans possessed an alphabet, known by the name of Nota Tironiana, which served the same pur-

\[\text{AVG for Augustus, AVGG for Augusti duo. Stone-cutters, however, soon began to take liberties with this rule, and, instead of putting OSSS for Consulibus duabus, invented the form, COSSS. Still, when there was no occasion to three or four people, this doubling of the last consonant gave way, in abbreviations, to the simple sign of the plural. A horizontal line over a letter or set of letters was also much used, and was destined, indeed, to become almost universal in the Middle Ages. There is never any difficulty in settling the date of monuments where one finds a sign of abbreviations. The single line is used in the plural, or one curved at each end and rising in the middle only came into use at a comparatively late period.

\[\text{Certain marks of Abbreviation have had so widespread a use as to merit special note. The ancient liturgical manuscripts which contain recensions of the MSS., and are known as Sacramentaries, all have the letters \(VD\) at the beginning of the Preface, set side by side and joined by a transverse bar. Milabon interprets this monogram as being that of the formula, \(Vere dignum et justum est, æquum et salutare\)

\[\text{In a large number of manuscripts these letters, \(VD\), have fired the imagination of illuminators and copystes. It is, however, impossible to enter into a general description of the subject. Under a growth of arabesques, of foliage, of fancies of all kinds, the outline of the two letters is sometimes hard to distinguish. The symbol encroaches more and more, and grows from a mere initial into an ornamental page. The essential type varies little, though variants of some importance are met with. It was inevitable that medieval writers should build a whole system of mysticism and allegory on the \(VD\) of the Preface. John Beleth, rector of the theological school at Paris, devised an interpretation which found acceptance. The \(D\), he wrote, a letter completely closed, signifies the Godhead, which has neither beginning nor end; the half-open \(V\) means the Manhood of Christ, which had a beginning, but has no end; the \(B\) which intersects the upright lines of the \(V\) and forms a cross, teaches us that the cross makes us fit for the life of God. Fancies of the same kind are to be found in the \(D\) of New Testament, and in Durandus of Mende. Various manuscripts contain hundreds of variable prefaces; the initial letters, however, are not drawn on a uniform pattern, and the chief attempts at ornamentation are invariable confined to the Prefatio Communis immediately preceding the Canon of the Mass. The first two letters of the Canon, \(TE\), have also been made the theme of various decorations, though less curious and less varied than those above referred to.

A word may be said concerning the abbreviation \(D.O.M.\), sometimes seen over the doors of our churches, and which is more common than not. Contrary, however, has never been a Christian symbol. The formula, in full, is \(Deo Optimo Maximo\) and referred originally to Jupiter. The abbreviation, IVH, IHS, is found on a great number of different objects: ancient gems, coins, epigraphs, dedications, and diplomas. The symbol, IHS was destined to endure for many ages. It is one of the most common signs of St. Bernardine of Sienna that it has come into such wide-spread use. It is impossible, with the information available, to say whether it is of Greek or Latin origin. Lastly, the abbreviation, \(XMT\), meaning \(X ero\ Ma\rho\\nuo\ \eta\rho\\nuo\), is often found on monuments of eastern origin.

Abbreviations, Ecclesiastical.—The words most commonly abbreviated at all times are proper names, titles (official or customary), of persons or corporations, and words of frequent occurrence. A good list of those used in Roman Republican and in Imperial Roman coins may be seen in Egbert’s “Latin Inscriptions” (New York, 1896), 417–459. The Jewish scribes and Talmudic scholars also had frequent recourse to Abbreviations.

Between the seventh and ninth centuries the ancient Roman system of Abbreviations gave way to a more difficult one that gradually grew up in the monastic houses and in the chanceries of the new Teutonic kingdoms. Merovingian, Lombard, and Anglo-Saxon scripts offer each their own Abbreviations, not to speak of the unique scotica manus or libri scotti scripti (Irish hand, or books written in the medieval Irish hand). Eventually such productive centres of technical manuscripts as the Papal Chancery, the theological schools of Paris and Oxford, and the civil-law school of Bologna set the standards of Abbreviations for all Europe. The medieval manuscripts abound in Abbreviations, owing in part to the abandonment of the uncial, quaternial, and the almost universal use of the cursive, hand. The medieval writer inherited a few from Christian antiquity; others he invented or adapted, in order to save time and parchment. They are found especially in manuscripts of scholastic theology and canon law, annals and chronicles, the Roman law, and in administrative documents, civil and ecclesiastical (charters, privileges, bulls, rescripts). They multiplied with time, and were never so numerous as on the eve of the discovery of printing; many of the early printed books offer this peculiarity, together with other characteristics of the manuscript page. The development of printing brought about the abandonment of many Abbreviations, while it suggested and introduced new ones—a process also favoured by the growth of ecclesiastical legislation, the creation of new offices, etc. There was less medieval abbreviation in the text of books much used in private devotion, e.g. missals, antiphonaries, breviaries; in one way or another the needs of students seem to have been the chief cause of the majority of medieval Abbreviations. The means of abbreviation were usually full points or dots (mostly in Roman antiquity), the semicolon (eventually conventionalized lines horizontal, perpendicular, oblong, wavy curves, and commas). Vowel-sounds were frequently written not after, but over, the consonants. Certain letters, like p and q, that occur with extreme frequency, e.g. in prepositions and terminations, became the source of many peculiar abbreviations; similarly, frequently recurring words like et (and), est (is).

Habit and convenience are to-day the principal motives for using abbreviations. Most of those in actual use fall under one or other of the following heads: I. Administrative; II. Liturgical; III. Scholastic; IV. Chronological.

I. The first class of Abbreviations includes those used in the composition of Pontifical documents. They were once very numerous, and lists of them may be seen in the works quoted below (e.g. Quantin, Prou). It may be well to state at once that since 29 December, 1878, by order of Leo XIII, the great parchment books (Litterae Apostolicae) are no longer written in the old Gothic hand known as bollatico; all Abbreviations, with the exception of a few obvious ones, like S.R.E., were abolished by the same authority (Acta S. Sedis, XI, 465–467). In the transaction of ordinary business the Roman Congregations are wont to use certain brief and pithy formulas (e.g. Negative = “No”; Negative et amplius = “No with emphasis”). They are not, correctly speaking, Abbreviations. For a list of these see Canon Law. This class includes also the abbreviations for the names of most sees. The full Latin titles of all existing (Latin) dioceses may be seen in the Roman annual, “Gerarchia Cattolica;” a complete list of the Latin names of all known dioceses (extant or extinct) is found in the large folio work of the Comité de la Congrégation, “Histoire de chronologie, d’histoire et de géographie” (Paris, 1884). For the same purpose the reader may also consult the episcopal catalogues of the Benedictine Gams, “Series Episcoporum Ecclesiae Catholicæ” (Ratisbon, 1873–96), and the Franciscan Conrad Eubel, “Hierarchia Catholica Medii Ævi” (Münster, 1898–1902).

Under this general heading may be included all abbreviated forms of addresses in ordinary intercourse, whether of individuals or of members of religious orders, congregations, institutes, to which may be added the forms of addresses usual for members of Catholic lay societies, the papal orders of merit. (See Catholic Societies, Orders of Merit.)

The Abbreviations of the titles of Roman Congregations, and of the individual canonical ecclesiastical authorities, belong also to this class. II. A second class of Abbreviations includes those used in the description of liturgical directions for their performance, e.g. the Holy Mass, the Divine Office (Breviary), the ecclesiastical devotions, etc. In the following list the Breviary Abbreviations are marked: Br. Here may also be classed the abbreviated forms for the name of God, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost; also the names of the Blessed Virgin, the saints, etc.; likewise Abbreviations used in the administration of the Sacraments, mortuary epitaphs, etc. (to which class belong the numerous Catacomb inscriptions); finally some miscellaneous Abbreviations like those used in the publication of documents concerning beatification and canonization. III. In the third class belong scholastic Abbreviations, used to designate honorific titles acquired in the schools, to avoid the repetition of lengthy titles of books and reviews, or to facilitate reference to ecclesiastical and civil legislation. IV. In the fourth class of Abbreviations belong all such as are used to describe the elements of the year, civil or ecclesiastical.

Abbreviators (abbreviare = “shorten”, “curtail”) those who make an abridgment or abstract of a long writing or discourse. This is accomplished by contracting the parts, i.e. the words and sentences; an abbreviated form of writing common among the Romans. Abbreviators were of two kinds, (a) the use of a single letter for a single word, (b) the use of a sign, note, or mark for a word or phrase. The Emperor Justinian forbade the use of abbreviations in the compilation of the Digest, and afterwards extended his prohibition to all other writing. This prohibition was not universally obeyed. The abbreviators found it to their own convenience and interest to use the abbreviated form, and especially was this the case at Rome. The early Christians practised the abbreviated mode, no doubt as an easy and safe way of communicating, and safeguarding their secrets from enemies and false brethren.

ECCLESIASTICAL ABBREVIATORS.—In course of time the Apostolic Chancery adopted this mode of writing as the curial style, still further abridging by omitting the diptongous sounds and many of the long lines and marks of punctuation. The ecclesiastical Abbreviators are officials of the Holy See, inasmuch as they are among the principal officials of the Apostolic Chancery, which is one of the oldest and most important offices in the Roman Curia. The scope of their labours, as well as their personnel, has varied with the times. Up to the twelfth or thirteenth century, the duty of the Apostolic, or Roman, Chancery was to prepare and expedite the pontifical letters and write for collation of church dignities and other matters of grave importance which were discussed and decided in Consistory. About the thirteenth or fourteenth century, the popes, while they lived at Avignon in France, began to reserve the collation of a great many benefices, so that all the benefices, especially the greater ones, were to be conferred through the Roman Curia (Leges, Praelectiones Jur. Can., I, ii, 257). As a consequence, the labour was immensely augmented, and the number of Abbreviators necessarily increased. To regulate the proper expedition of these reserved benefices, Pope John XXII instituted the rules of chancery to determine the competency and mode of procedure of the Chancery. Afterwards the establishment of the Dataria and Legislation of 1438 enlightened the work of the Chancery and led to a reduction in the number of Abbreviators. According to Ciampini (Lib. de Abbreviatorum de parvo majore etc., cap. i) the institution of abbreviators was very ancient, succeeding after the persecutions to the notaries who recorded the acts of the martyrs. Other authors reject this early institution and ascribe it to Pope John XXIII (1316). It is certain that he uses the name Abbreviators, but speaks as if they had existed before his time, and had, by overtaxation for their labour, caused much complaint and protest. He (Extravag. Joan. tit. xiii, Cum ad Sacrosanctum Romanum Eclecticum) says that the abbreviators know how much they may charge for their labour, fixes a certain tax for an abstract or abridgment of twenty-five words, or their equivalent, 150 letters, forbids them to charge more, even though the abstract goes over twenty-five words but less than fifty words, enacts that the basis of the tax is the labour employed in writing, expediting, etc., the Bulls, and by no means the emoluments accruing to the recipient of the favour or benefice conferred by the Bull, and declares that whoever shall charge more than the tax fixed by him shall be suspended for six months from office, and upon a second violation of the law, shall be deprived of it altogether, and if the delinquent be an abbreviator, he shall be excommunicated. Should a large letter have to be rewritten, owing to the inexact copy of the abbre-vistor, the abbreviator and not the receiver of the Bull must pay the extra charge for the extra labour to the apostolic writer. Whatever may be the date of the institution of the office of abbreviator, it is certain that it became of greater importance and more highly privileged upon its erection into a college of prelates. Pope Martin V (Constit. 3 'In Aedificiis') made the legal abbreviation, examination and approbation and also the tax they should demand for their labour and the punishment for overcharge. He also assigned to them certain emoluments. The Abbreviators of the lower, or lesser, were to be promoted to the higher, or greater, by the college of prelates. They lived in the city with other offices, i.e. they can hold two benefices or offices at one and the same time, some conferred by the Cardinal Vice-Chancellor, others by the Holy Father.

Erection of the Office into a College of Prelates.—In the pontificate of Pius II, their number, which had been fixed at twenty-four, had grown to such an extent as to diminish considerably the individual remuneration, and, as a consequence, able and competent men no longer sought the office; and hence the old style of writing and expediting the Bulls was no longer used, to the great injury of justice and partiality for the leaders. To remedy this evil and to restore the old established chancery style, the Pope selected out of the great number of the then living Abbreviators seventy, and formed them into a college of prelates, and decreed that their office should be perpetual, that certain emoluments should be attached to it, and granted certain privileges to the possessors of the same. He ordained further that some should be called "Abbreviators of the Upper Bar" (de Parco Majori), the others of the Lower Bar (de Parco Minor); that the former should sit upon a slightly raised portion of the chamber, separated from the rest of the hall or chamber by lattice work, assist the Cardinal Vice-Chancellor, subscribe the letters and have the principal part in examining, revising, and expediting the apostolic letters to be issued with the leaden seal; that the latter, however, should sit among the apostolic writers upon benches in the lowest place of the chamber, and their duty was to carry the signed schedules or supplications to the prelates of the upper bar. Then one of the prelates of the upper bar made an abstract, and another prelate of the same bar revised it. Prelates of the upper bar formed a quaest tribunal, in which as a college they had full powers of the curia, the form and quality of the letters, of the clauses and decrees to be adjoined to the apostolic letters, and sometimes about the payment of the emoluments and other contingencies. Their opinion about questions concerning chancery business was held in the highest estimation by all the Roman tribunals. Paul II suppressed this college; but Sixtus IV (Constitutio 16, "Divina") restored it. He appointed seventy-two abbreviators, of whom twelve were of the upper, or greater, and twenty-two of the lower, or lesser, presidency (Parco), and thirty-eight examiners on first appearance of letters. They were required to be in attendance on certain days under penalty of fine, and sign letters and diplomas. Campianni mentions a decree of the Vice-Chancellor by which absentees were mulcted in the loss of their share of the emoluments of the following chancery session. The same Pope also granted many privileges to the members of the greater presidency. Pius VII suppressed many of the chancery offices, and so the Tribunal of Correctors and the Abbreviators of the lower presidency disappeared. Of the Tribunal of Correctors, a substitute-corrector alone remains. Bouix (Curia Romana, edit. 1899) chronicles the suppression of the lower presidency and puts the number of Abbreviators at that date at eleven. The present college consists of seventeen prelates, six substitutes, and one sub-substitute, all of whom, except the prelates, may be clerics or laymen. Although the duty of Abbreviators was originally to make abstracts and abridgements of the apostolic letters, diplomas, etc., it was afterwards extended to the actual examination and approbation, and also the tax they should demand for their labour and the punishment for overcharge. He also assigned to them certain emoluments. The Abbreviators of the lower, or lesser, were to be promoted to the higher, or greater, by the college of prelates. Their living in the city with other offices, i.e. they can hold two benefices or offices at one and the same time, some conferred by the Cardinal Vice-Chancellor, others by the Holy Father.

Titles and Privileges.—Many great privileges were conferred upon Abbreviators in the past. By decree of Leo X they were created nobles, Counts Palatine, familiars and members of the papal household, so that they might enjoy all the privileges of domestic prelates and of prelates in actual attendance on the Pope, as regards plurality of benefices as well as expectations. They and their clerics and their properties were exempt from all jurisdiction except the immediate jurisdiction of the Pope, and they were not subject to the judgments of the Auditor of Chancery and the Cardinal Vicar. He also empowered them to confer (to-day within strict limitations) the degree of Doctor, with all university privileges, create notaries (now abrogated), legitimize children so as to make them eligible to receive benefices vacated by their fathers (now revoked), also to enoble three persons and to make Knights of the Order of St. Sylvester, and to direct and foreclose their estates and to wear the insignia of nobility. Pope Gregory XVI rescinded this privilege and reserved to the Pope the right of creation of such knights (Acta Pont. Greg. XVI, Vol. III, 178-179-180). Pope Paul V, who in early manhood was a member of the college (Bull. Pauli V), made a separation of the Prelates of Abbreviators of Favour, and after three years of service, Referendaries likewise of Justice, enjoying the privileges of Referendaries and permitting one to assist in the signatures before the Pope, giving all a right to a portion in the papal palace and exempting them from the registration of favours as requested by Pius IV (Const., 98) with regard to matters pertaining to the Apostolic Chamber. They follow immediately after the twelve voting members of the Signature in capella. Abbreviators of the greater presidency are permitted to wear the purple cassock and cope, as also rochet in capella. Abbreviators of the lower presidency and of all other offices were simple clerics, and according to permission granted by Sixtus IV (loc. cit.) might be even married men. These offices becoming vacant by death of the Abbreviator, no matter where the death take place, are reserved in Curia. Prelates could resign their office in favour of others. No reason for the exception of the Abbreviators of the greater presidency and of those of the other chancery offices from the Regent down were occasions of venality, which many of the popes, especially Benedict XIV and Pius VII, laboured most strenuously to abolish. Leo XIII (Motu Proprio, 4 July, 1898) most solemnly decreed the abolition of all venality in the transfer or collation of the said office. As domestic prelates, prelates of the Roman Court, they have personal pre-eminence in every diocese of the world. They are addressed as "Reverendissimus", "Right Reverend", and "Monsignor". As prelates, and therefore possessing the legal dower, they are competent to receive and execute papal commands. Benedict XIV (Const. 3, "Maximo") granted prelates of the greater pre-eminence the privilege of wearing a hat with purple band, which righ they hold even after they have ceased to be abbreviators.

Abdera. The titular see in the province of Rhodope on the southern coast of Thrace, now called Bouloustra. It was founded about 656 B.C.

Abdias (A MINOR PROPHET).—This name is the Greek form of the Hebrew 'Ovbd'ha/lyach, which means "the servant [or worshipsmouth] of Yahweh". The fourth and shortest of the minor prophetic books of the Old Testament (it contains only twenty-one verses) is ascribed to Abdias. In the title of the book it is usually regarded as a prophecy, however, it is thought that it should be treated as an apocalyptic, for, on the one hand, Holy Writ often designates a true prophet under the apocalyptic name of "the servant of Yahweh", and on the other, nowhere gives any distinct information concerning the writer of the work ascribed to Abdias. It is true that in the absence of such authentic information Jewish and Christian traditions have been freely circulated to supply its place; but it remains none the less a fact that "nothing is known of Abdias; his family, station in life, place of birth, manner of death, are equally unknown to us" (Abbe Trochon, Les petits prophetes, 195). The only thing that may be inferred from the work concerning its author is that he belonged to the Kingdom of Judah.

The short prophecy of Abdias deals almost exclusively with the fate of Edom as it is stated in its opening words. God has summoned the nations against him. After this study of the features of a story of a people, he would be utterly destroyed, not simply spoiled as by thieves (1-6). Her former friends and allies have turned against her (7), and her wisdom shall fail her in this extremity (8, 9). She is justly punished for her unbrotherly conduct towards Judah when foreigners sacked Jerusalem and cast lots over it (10, 11). She is hidden behind a veil from her unworthy conduct (12-14). The "day of Yahweh" is near upon "all the nations", in whose ruin Edom shall share under the united efforts of "the house of Jacob" and "the house of Joseph" (16-18). As for Israel, her borders will be enlarged in every direction; "Saviours" shall appear on Mount Sion, to judge the Mount of Esau, and the rule of Yahweh shall be established (19-21).

DATE OF THE PROPHETHY OF ABDIAS.—Besides the shortness of the book of Abdias and its lack of a detailed title such as is usually prefixed to the prophecies of the Old Testament, there are various reasons, literary and exegetical, which prevent scholars from agreeing upon the date of its composition. Many among them (Keil, Orelli, Vigouroux, Trochon, Lesestre, etc.) assign its composition to about the reign of Joram (nineth century B.C.). Their main ground for this position is derived from Abdias's reference (11-14) to a capture by the Moabites, which they identify with the sacking of the Holy City by the Philistines and the Arabsians under Joram (II Paralip., xxi, 16, 17). The only other seizure of Jerusalem to which Abdias (11-14) could be understood to refer would be that which occurred during the lifetime of the prophet Jeremiah and was brought about by Nabuchodonosor. But such reference to this latter capture of the Jewish capital is ruled out, we are told, by the fact that Jeremiah's description of this event (Jer., xlix, 7-22) is so worded as to betray its dependence on Abdias (11-14) as on an earlier writing. It is ruled out also by Abdias's silence concerning the destruction of the city or of the Temple, which was brought about by Nabuchodonosor, and which, as far as we know, did not occur in the time of King Joram. A second argument for this early date of the prophecy is drawn from a comparison of its text with that of Amos and Joel. The resemblance is intimate and, when closely examined, shows, it is claimed, that Abdias was anterior to both Joel and Amos. In fact, in Joel, ii, 32 (Heb., iii, 5) "as the Lord hath said" introduces a quotation from Abdias (17). Hence it is inferred that the prophecy of Abdias originated between the reign of Joram and the time of Amos, that is, in the ninth or tenth century B.C. The inference is said also to be confirmed by the purity of style of Abdias's prophecy. Other scholars, among whom may be mentioned Meyrick, Jahn, Ackerman, Allioli, etc., refer the composition of the book to the time of the Babylonian Captivity, some even to the time of King Joram. They think that the terms of Abdias (11-14) can be adequately understood only of the capture of Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor; only that event could have been spoken of as the day "when strangers carried away his [Juda's] army captive, and foreigners entered into his gates, and cast lots upon Judah"; as "the day of his [Juda's] leaving his country, . . . . the day of their [the children of Juda's] destruction"; "the day of their ruin"; etc. They also admit that Abdias (20) contains an implicit reference to the writer as one of the captives in Babylon. Others again, ascribe the present book of Abdias to a still later date. They agree with the defenders of the second opinion in interpreting Abdias (11-14) as referring to the capture of Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor, but differ from them in holding that (20) does not really prove that the author of the book lived during the Babylonian exile. They claim that its composition (15-21), with its most important features (reference to the day of the Lord as being at hand upon all nations, to a restoration of all Israel, to the wonderful extent of territory and position in command which await the Jews in God's kingdom), connects necessarily the prophecy of Abdias with other works in Jewish literature [Joel, Daniel, Zacharias (x-xiv)], which, as they think, belong to a date long after the return from Babylon. These, then, are the three leading forms of opinion which prevail at the present day regarding the date of composition of the book of Abdias, none of which conflicts with the prophetic import of the work concerning the ultimate rest of the land of Israel at a later date, and concerning the Messianic times.

FRANCIS E. GIGOT.

Abdias of Babylon, an apocryphal writer, said to have been one of the seventy-two Disciples of Christ, and first Bishop of Babylon, consecrated by Sts. Simon and Jude. Very little is known about him. And the main reason for mentioning him is a work in ten books called "Historia Certaminis Apostolorum", which is imputed to him. It tells of the labours and deaths of the Apostles. This compilation purports—to have been translated from Hebrew into Greek by Eutropius, a disciple of Abdias, and, in the third century, from Greek into Latin by Julius Africanus, the friend of Origen. But it is really a Latin work, for it is cited, with the Vulgate of St. Jerome, the “Ecclesiastical History of Rufinus and his History of the "Reformation" of Clement. The interest of the work is due to what the author claims to have drawn from the ancient “Acta” of the Apostles, and to many ancient legends which have thus been brought down to us. The text of the pseudo-Abdias may be found in Fabricius, “Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti” (Hamburg, 1700), 400 ff., and also in two forms and in parenthesis in many books printed in the “Acta Sanctorum.” According to J. A. Lipsius, the work was compiled during the latter half of the sixth century, in some Frankish monastery, for the purpose of satisfying the natural curiosity of Western Christians. At the same time he used much older pseudo-Apostolic materials that he abridged or excerpted to suit his purpose, and often revised or expurgated in the sense of Catholic teaching, for not a few of the writings that he used were originally Gnostic compositions, and abandoned in speeches and prayers destined to spread the Gospel.

Abdication, ecclesiastically considered, is the resignation of a benefice or clerical dignity. Every such honour or emolument, from the papal throne to the humblest chantry, may be resigned by the incumbent. The general ecclesiastical law concerning such abdications (exclusive of a papal resignation) is that the benefice must be resigned into the hands of the proper ecclesiastical superior. Moreover, the resignation must be prompted by a just cause, be voluntary and free from contracts involving simony. Resignations, however, may be made with accompanying stipulations, such as that the resigned benefice be bestowed upon a designated person, or that the abdicating cleric be provided with another office. It is also required that the one who resigns his benefice, if in sacred orders, should have other certain means of support commensurate with his dignity. Resignations may be not only express but also tacit. The latter is presumed to have taken place when a cleric abdicates an ecclesiastical dignity, such as solemn profession in a religious order, enrolment in the army, contracting marriage, and the like. No resignation takes effect until it is accepted by the proper authority. Hence, those who hold office from a bishop must resign into his hands and obtain his acquiescence. Bishops, in like manner, must resign into the hands of the Pope. Vicars-general cannot accept resignations unless they receive powers ad hoc from the bishop. When a bishop abdicates his see, he may renounce both the episcopal benefice and dignity or only the benefice. If he resigns both he cannot in future perform any episcopal functions, even with the consent of the ordinary of the diocese where he resides. If he resign, however, only the benefice, and not the dignity, he still remains capable of performing such episcopal functions as other bishops may request him of. Of course, in the former case, if an abdicated bishop should nevertheless, at dates, such action would be valid, as his episcopal character is indelible, but it would be entirely illicit and entail grave consequences both for ordainer and ordained. A bishop’s Abdication of his see goes into effect as soon as the Pope has accepted it in a papal consistory. The bishopric then becomes vacant, but the actions of the prelate retain their validity until he receives official notice of the acceptance of his resignation.

Like every other ecclesiastical dignity, the papal throne may also be resigned. The reasons which make it lawful for a bishop to abdicate his see, such as the necessity of a particular church, or the salvation of his own soul, apply in a stronger manner to the one who governs the universal church. It is true that the Roman Pontiff has no superior on earth into whose hands he can resign his dignity, yet he himself by the papal power can dissolve the spiritual marriage between himself and the Roman Church. A papal abdication may be illicit, but it is unquestionably valid, since there is no one who can prohibit it ecclesiastically and it contravenes no divine law. The papacy does not, like the episcopacy, imprint an indelible character on the soul, and hence by his voluntary Abdication the Pope is entirely stripped of all jurisdiction, just as by his voluntary acceptance of the election to the primacy he acquired it. All doubt as to the legitimacy of papal abdications and all disputes among canonists were put an end to by the decree of Pope Boniface VIII which was received into the “Liberius Juris Canonici” (Canon 82, Gelasius, 6, 6). The Pontiff says: “Our predecessor, Pope Celestine V, whilst he governed the Church, constituted and decreed that the Roman Pontiff can freely resign. Therefore lest it happen that this statute should in the course of time fall into oblivion, or that doubt should lead to further disputes, We have determined with the counsel of our brethren that it be placed among other constitutions for a perpetual memory of the same.” Ferraris declares that the Pope should make his abdication into the hands of the College of Cardinals, as to that body alone pertains the election of his successor. For whilst it is true that the Cardinals did not bestow the papal jurisdiction upon him, yet they designated him as the successor of Peter, and they must be absolutely certain that he has renounced the dignity before they can validly proceed to the election of another pontiff. Church history furnishes a number of examples of papal abdications. Leaving aside the obscure case of Pope Marcellinus (296–308) adduced by Pezzani, and the still more doubtful resignation of Pope Liberius (352–366) which some historians have postulated in order to solve the perplexing position of Pope Felix II, we may proceed to uncontested cases. Pope Benedict XI, for instance (1303–1304), who had long caused scandal to the Church by his disorderly life, freely renounced the pontificate and took the habit of a monk. He repented of his abdication and seized the papal throne again for a short time after the death of Pope Clement II, but he finally died in a private station. His immediate successor, Pope Gregory VI (1344–45) furnishes another example of papal Abdication. It was Gregory who had persuaded Benedict IX to resign the Chair of Peter, and to do so he had bestowed valuable possessions upon him. After Gregory had himself become Pope, this transaction was looked on by many as simonia; and although Gregory’s intentions seem to have been of the best, yet it was deemed better that he too should abdicate the papal dignity, and he did so voluntarily.

The classic example of the resignation of a Pope is that of St. Celestine V (1294). Before his election to the pontificate, he had received a simple benediction and had been promised an archiepiscopal dignity; but after his exalted position. After five months of pontificate, he issued a solemn decree in which he declared that it was permissible for the Pope to abdicate, and then made an equally solemn renunciation of the papacy into the hands of the cardinals. He lived two years after his abdication, in the practice of virtues which afterwards procured his canonization. Owing to the troubles which evill-minded persons caused his successor, Boniface VIII, by their theories about the impossibility of a valid Abduction of the papal throne, Boniface issued the above-cited decree to put the matter at rest for all time. In the later instance of papal resignation is that of Pope Gregory XII (1406–1415). It is the time of the Great Schism of the West, when two pretenders to the Chair of Peter disputed Gregory's right, and rent the faithful into three so-called "obediences". To put an end to the strife, the legitimate Pope Gregory renounced the pontificate at the Council General of Constance in 1414, it is well known that Pope Pius V (1800–1823), before setting out for Paris to crown Napoleon in 1804, had signed an abduction of the papal throne to take effect in case he were imprisoned in France (De Monton). Finally, a valid Abduction of the Pope must be a free act, hence, in such resignation of the papacy, the will of the person concerned must be clearly expressed. The act of the pontiff or the pope, on the other hand, has been defined as "obedience", which is a term used in the Eucharistic prayer of the Church to denote the submission of the faithful to the authority of the Pope. Abdon and Sennen, Saints (variously written in early calendars and martyrologies Abdo, Abdu, Abduus, Sennus, Zennzen), Persian martyrs under Decius, about A.D. 250, and commemorated 30 July. The veneration paid them dates from as early as the third century, though their Acts, written for the most part prior to the ninth century, contain several fictitious statements about the cause and occasion of their coming to Rome and the nature of their torments. It is related in these Acts that their bodies were buried by a subdeacon, Quirinus, and transferred in the reign of Constantine to the Fontana cemetery near the road to Portus, not far from Rome. A fresco found on the sarcophagus supposed to contain their remains represents them receiving crowns from Christ. According to Martigny, this fresco dates from the seventh century. Several cities, notably Florence and Soissons, claim possession of their relics, but the Bollandists say that they rest in Rome.

Abduction. — Abduction may be considered as a public crime and a matrimonial diriment impediment. Viewed as a crime, it is a carrying off by force, physical or moral, of any virtuous woman, or even man, from a free and safe place to another place morally different and neither free nor safe from the abductor's power, with intent to marry her or to gratify lust. Abduction considered as a matrimonial impediment is a violent taking away of any woman whatsoever, chaste or unchaste, from a place free and safe to a morally different place, and there detaining her in the power of her abductor until he has coerced her into consenting to marry him. Abduction as a crime is of wider scope than is the impediment, inasmuch as the former includes man-captors and intent to gratify lust, both of which are excluded from the impediment. On the other hand, the impediment is of greater import than the crime in as far as it includes all women, chaste as well as unchaste, while the crime excludes the corrupt. This difference arises from the fact that the State aims to suppress the public crime as a menace to the safety of the commonwealth, while the Church cares, directly and immediately, for the freedom and the dignity of the Sacrament of Marriage. Abduction is often divided into Abduction by Violence (Raptus Violentia) and Abduction by Seduction, or Elopement (Raptus Seductiorum). The former is when (a) a woman evidently reluctant, and not consenting either to the flight or to the marriage, is forcibly transferred with a matrimonial intent from a secure and free place to a morally different place, by the abductor's influence by force, physical or moral, i.e., threats, great fear, or fraud equivalent to force, as it is a well-known axiom that "it is equal to be compelled to do a thing as to know that it is possible to be compelled to do it"; (b) a woman enticed by fair words and fraud and lured away from a one man for another reason than marriage from one place to another where she detains her by force or fraud equivalent to force, in order to coerce her into a marriage to which she objects; (c) a woman who, although she had already consented to a future marriage by act of betrothal, yet strenuously objects to abduction, is carried off violently by her betrothed or his agents from a free and safe place to another morally different and there detained until she consents to marry him. Some deny, however, that the raptor in this case is guilty of abduction, saying that the lady was in truth a raptus and has a right to his hermaphroditism. Elopement, in other words, is the right to compel her to fulfill her engagement by public authority, not, however, by private authority. His carrying off of the woman against her will is the exercise of private authority, and therefore violence to her rights. Abduction by Seduction (Raptus Seductionum), or Elopement, is the taking away from one place to another, by a man, of (1) a woman of age or under age who consents to both the flight and the marriage without consent of her parents or guardians; or (2) a woman who, although she refuses at first, finally, induced thereto by caresses, flattery, or any allurement, not however equivalent to force, physical or moral, consents to both flight and marriage without knowledge or consent of her parents or guardians. Abduction by seduction, as defined, is held by Roman law to be abduction by violence, inasmuch as violence can be offered to the woman and her parents simultaneously, or to the woman alone, or to the parents and guardians alone; and in the elopement, while no violence is done to the woman, violence is done to the parents or guardians. On the contrary, the Church does not consider violence done to parents, but the violence done only to the parties matrimonially interested. Hence, elopement, or abduction by seduction, does not induce an impediment diriment. Pope Pius VII, in his letter to Napoleon I (26 June, 1805), pronounced this kind of abduction no abduction in the Tridentine sense. The Church considers it, indeed, a wrong against parental authority, but not a wrong to the abducted woman.

The old Roman law (Jus Vetus), mindful of the actual or imaginary "Rape of the Sabines", dealt leniently with woman-stealers. If the woman was willing, her marriage with her abductor was allowed and solemnized by the licit leading her by the hand to the home of the raptor. Constantine the Great, to protect female virtue and safeguard the State, forbade (A. D. 320) such marriages. The law was neither universally received nor observed. The Emperor Justinian (A. D. 523, 533, and 548) forbade these marriages and fixed the punishment, for the principal and his accomplices in the crime, at death and confiscation of the property. Legal right to change the crime was given to parents or guardians; to put to instant death the abductor caught in the act of Abduction. Appeal by the victim in behalf of her abductor, on the plea that she gave consent, was denied. The law awarded the confiscated property to the woman, if she had not consented to the abduction; to her parents, if they were ignorant of, or adverse to, it, and their daughter consented to the abduction; but if the woman and her parents consented to the carrying off, then all the property lapsed to the State, and the parents were banished (Codex Inst., IX, Tit. xii.; Auth. Collat., IX, Tit. 2; Novell. 143; Auth. Novell. 150). The Byzantine Emperor, Leo VI (886–912), called the Philosopher, approved (Constit. XXXV) the former laws in all particulars, with the exception that if swords or other deadly weapons were carried by the abductor and his accomplices during the abduction a much severer punishment was inflicted than if they were not carried. The Old Spanish law condemned to death the abductor who also ravished the woman, but the abductor who did not ravish was let off with a money fine to be equally shared by the abducted and the State. If the woman had consented to the abduction, the whole fine reverted to the State. Athenian law commanded the abductor to marry the abducted, if she so willed, unless the woman or her parents or guardians had already received money instead. The earlier Byzantine law enjoined, but the later law forbade, the marriage. Among the Germanic nations the crime of abduction was also considered a pernicious one to the parties, or guardians. The Church did not accept the Roman law which declared all the marriages of the abductor with the abducted, without exception, entirely and perpetually null and void. She held as valid all marriages in which there was present true and real consent and no force or duress (St. Basil (2 Canon. Epist. to St. Amphilochius, xxii, xxx, fixed date, an. 375, Post-Nicene Fathers, 2d series, VIII, Scribner's ed.,) the Church issued no canons on abduction prior to his time. Such a crime was, doubtless, extremely rare among the early Christians. In the fourth century, as men grew more audacious, this became more frequent and perilous. A breach of this bond was no longer so readily forgiven. To check this, the Church in several particular councils, besides the punishment of service, confiscation of goods, and public penance, decreed sentence of excommunication (to be judicially pronounced) against laics, and deposition from ecclesiastical rank against clerics, who had violently carried off, or helped to carry off, women. Pope Gelasius (496) permitted the marriage of the abductor with his captive if she was willing, and they had been betrothed, or had mutually discussed their future marriage prior to the abduction. Antecedent to the ninetieth day, however, the celebration of abduction (raptus) as a matrimonial impediment, either diriment or impediment. In the Western Church, at least from the ninth century, the marriage of the captor with his captive, or any other woman, was perpetually prohibited. This was not, however, the universal church discipline, but rather the discipline peculiar to those nations among whom the absence of strict laws made abductions more numerous. The bishops of the Frankish nation felt the necessity of severe legislation to meet the evil, and therefore, in many particular Councils, e.g. Aix-la-Chapelle (817), Meaux (940), etc., issued stringent canons which continued to be the chief law of the Franks until it was abolished by Innocent III. Furthermore, the impediment was impertinent, not diriment (according to the most common opinion). Marriages celebrated in opposition to the prohibition were held to be valid, although illicit. The Council of Meaux (817) forbade the use of force even to carry off the rapist but permitted his marriage with any other woman after he had performed the prescribed public penance. Gratian ("Decretum Caus.", XXXVI, quest. ii, ad finem) inaugurated a milder discipline. He, relying upon the (supposed) authority of Jerome, taught that an abductor ought to be allowed to marry the abducted provided she was willing to have him for a husband.

After the publication of his decree in the twelfth century, this milder discipline was generally observed and met with the approval of many popes. Finally, Innocent III ("Decret. Greg.", lib. V, tit. xxvii, cap. vii, De Raptoribus") decreed for the universal Church (especially among the particular councils) that such marriages might take place as often as a prior reluctance and dissent on the part of the woman should change to willingness and consent to the marriage, and this (according to the common interpretation) even if the woman was in the power of the abductor at the time of the abduction. This decree practically did away with the impediment of abduction, which was merged into the impediment of vis et metus. The Innocentian law continued to be the ecclesiastical discipline up to the sixteenth century. The Council of Trent introduced an entirely new discipline. To guard the liberty and dignity of marriage, to show its detestation of a horrible crime dangerous alike to the purity of morals and the peace and security of society, and to bar the criminal from gaining the result intended by his crime, the Fathers decreed: Between the abductor and abducted there can be no marriage, either in the State, or in the Church, if the raptor; but if the abducted, having been separated from the abductor, and having been placed in a safe and free place, consents to have him for a husband, let her marry him; yet, notwithstanding, the abductor with all his advisers, accomplices and agents; are by the Church forever enraged and declared forever infamous, incapable of acquiring dignities, and, if they be clerics, deposed from their ecclesiastical rank. Furthermore, the abductor is bound, whether he marries the abducted or not, to dower her with a decent dowry at the discretion of the judge" (Concil. Trid., SSess. XXIV, vi, "De Reforma Matrimonii"). The marriage is therefore considered to be perfect, requiring no promulgation in individual parishes. Such also is the law in the Oriental Churches (Synod. Mont. Liban., 1736, Collect. Lactens., II, 167; Synod. Scarljen. Syror., 1888). The difference between this law and that of the Decretals (Innocent III) is evident. According to the Decretals, the woman's consent, given even while she was in the raptor's power, was deemed sufficient. The Council of Trent does not consider such consent of any avail, and requires consent given after the woman has been entirely separated from the control of the raptor and is dwelling in a place safe from his influence, before she desire to have him, the marriage may be celebrated, the priest having first obtained permission from the bishop (according to some) whose duty it is to testify to the cession of the impediment and that the dowry prescribed by the Council has been made over and is subject to the sole use and discretion of the abducted. The general law of the Church does not require the aforesaid bishop's permission, but individual bishops can and do make laws to that effect. The Council of Trent by this law safeguarded the freedom of marriage (1) on the part of the man, by allowing him to marry the abducted woman, and (2) on the part of the woman, by protecting her from being coerced while in the abductor's power into a marriage against her free will and consent. This impediment of abduction (raptus) is one entirely distinct from that of vis et metus. The latter entirely looks to the freedom of consent; the form, truth, to the freedom to be able to make the consent must be elicited. Of ecclesiastical origin, this impediment is temporary and public, and does not bind two unbaptized persons unless the civil law of their country invalidates such marriages. It does, however, govern the marriage of an unbaptized abductor with a Catholic abducted woman, and vice versa.

Amidst the conflicting opinions of canonists and moralists as to whether abduction by seduction, abduction of a betrothed, abduction of a minor against the will of her parents, or the abduction of a man by a woman, induces the impediment or not, it is necessary to remember that this impediment is of Tridentine origin, and therefore the Council of Trent is the only judge of the matter. It is clear that the Roman or any other civil law or any prior ecclesiastical law had nothing to say in the matter; that the question under investigation was the impediment, not the crime, of abduction; and that in rebus odiis, which this is, the words of the Council of Trent are to be strictly and literally interpreted. Four elements are essential in an abduction in order to induce thereby the Tridentine diriment impediment, to wit: (1) a woman; (2) change of locality; (3) violence; (4) matrimonial intent.

(1) Any woman, whether moral or immoral, maid or widow, betrothed or not, even a public woman, may be the object of a violent Abduction inducing the Tridentine impediment and punishment. Lessius, Avancini, and others hold that a man is not guilty of abduction who carries off his betrothed. The Council of Trent makes no exception, hence we should not. The abduction of a man by a woman is not recognized in the Tridentine law. The contrary opinion (De Justis and other earlier authors) is at variance with the language of the Council, which always speaks of the rapto, but nowhere of the raptrix. A woman can be guilty of the crime of rapto; but the question here is not about crime, but about the Tridentine impediment. She may be an agent or accomplice of the abductor and, as such, incur the penalties decreed by the Council; but it does not admit her as raptrix.

(2) Change of Locality.—Two places are necessary to an abduction—one, the place from which, the other, to which, the reluctant woman is violently taken, and in which she is also violently detained. These two places must be morally (some say physically, some virtually) different—the one, from which may be her own or her parents' home, where she is a free agent; the other, to which, must be subject to the power or influence of the abductor, where, though she is free in very many of her actions, she is not perfectly free in all. It is not necessary that the place to which the house of the abductor; it suffices if it be under his control or influence. Two rooms or two stories in a small dwelling, the home of one family; a street and an adjoining house; a public highway and a nearby field, would not affect a necessary change of locality. Removal, though violent, from room to room as above, would not induce the impediment under consideration, though some hold the contrary opinion. In case of a large castle, or mansion, or tenement-house, where many families dwell, the violent transference of a reluctant woman from a part where her family dwells to another remote part where a different family lives would constitute sufficient change of locality. If a woman is violently seized, v. g. in a room, and is violently kept there without change to another room, or if she without any assault on the part of the man, goes to a place and is there violently detained with matrimonial intent, she does not suffer abduction in the Tridentine sense. It is a mere sequestration, or detention. Some jurists, however, think otherwise, claiming virtual change from the place to which (to that of subjuction) to be sufficient to induce the Council's impediment. Physical transference from one place to another, however, is absolutely necessary to constitute rapto; virtual transference does not suffice. Should a woman be forcibly removed from a place to which she went willingly, to another where she is detained against her will with matrimonial intent, it is abduction.

(3) Violence.—Abduction always presumes that the abducted dissentes, and that her unwillingness is overcome either by physical force, i. e. laying hands upon her, or moral force, i. e. threats, great fear, and fraud equivalent to force. Mere opportunities, far words, sweet phrases, gifts, and promises are not sufficient to constitute the moral force requisite for abduction. It is not enough that she be procured himself, or by himself, or through his agents and accomplices, uses this force, moral or physical. Women, as the agents of the principal, may exercise it, and not infrequently do so.

(4) Matrimonial Intent.—The intention or motive of the criminal must be strictly and literally considered. To induce the impediment the intent must be to marry the abducted woman. Were the motive other than marriage, e. g. vengeance, pecuniary gain, or gratification of lust, there would be no abduction, no impediment, no penalties (S. Cong. Conc., 23 Jan., 1585). It is evident also from the custom of the Roman Curia, which, in all dispensations given or faculties granted to ordinaries to dispense in cases of affinity, consanguinity, etc., prefixes "provided that the woman was not abducted on account of this (marriage)." This impediment exists only between the abducted and abductor who, of and by himself, or on the consent of other persons, carried her off without intent to marry her. No impediment arises between the abducted and the agent or abettors of the abductor. She could validly, therefore, marry one of the agents or accomplices while still under the control of the abductor. When the intention is doubtful, judgment is arrived at from consideration of the circumstances. Thus, if a man violently carries off his betrothed or a woman with whom he has had conversations looking to future marriage, it is presumed that his intention was marriage. If doubts still remain, the law presumes the motive to be matrimonial. Whether it is abundantly evident that the initial motive of the abduction was lust, it is not abduction, but sequestration, or detention, although afterwards, during the captivity, the captor promise marriage in order to attain his lustful object. The contrary opinion, held by Rosset (De Matrimonio, II, 1554), Krimer, and others, is at variance with the principle of law, that in crimes the beginning, and not what happens accidentally is what the law considers. Were the intent twofold, v. g. lust and marriage, then the carrying off is abduction and induces the impediment. The abduction must be proved, not presumed. The mere word of the abduced woman, even if it should be against the oath of the so-called abductor and the absence of all rumour, does not establish the fact. The existence of the abduction once admitted, the burden of proof rests upon the abductor. He must conclusively prove that the abducted willingly consented to both abduction and marriage. If she admits consent to the flight, he must still prove conclusively that she gave willing consent also to the marriage; otherwise the impediment holds and the penalties are incurred. Should he claim (in order to exclude impediment) that his motive in the beginning of the transaction was not marriage, but other, and that he abandoned the marriage intent to the part of the man, goes to a place and is there violently detained with matrimonial intent, she does not suffer abduction in the Tridentine sense. It is a mere sequestration, or detention. Some jurists, however, think otherwise, claiming virtual change from the place to which (to that of subjuction) to be sufficient to induce the Council's impediment. Physical transference from one place to another, however, is absolutely necessary to constitute rapto; virtual transference does not suffice. Should a woman be forcibly removed from a place to which she went willingly, to another where she is detained against her will with matrimonial intent, it is abduction. The abductor is also bound, whether the woman marries him or not, to dower her with a decent dowry at the discretion of the bishop. The priest who celebrates the marriage while the woman is under restraint does not incur the excommunication nor any other penalty, unless he has advised the abductor that he would aid him in his abduction by his presence and ministry. The agents and the like, in an abduction of a woman validly and freely betrothed, but unwilling to be carried off, do not incur excommunication and other Tridentine punishments (S. C. Prot. Fiz. 1784). The vindictive punishments are incurred, at least in the ecclesiastical court, by a declaratory sentence. The abducted woman, not the abductor, has the right to challenge the validity of her marriage celebrated while under control of the abductor. No particular timetables by law, but this is under the right of dispensation, unless prevented by reasonable cause, present her plea as soon as possible after her entire separation from the control of the abductor.

Dispensation.—The Church as a rule does not dispense with this impediment. It even refuses to grant other dispensations, v. g. affinity, if the woman was abducted; indeed any dispensation granted, in which mention of the abduction has been omitted, is held as invalid. There are some cases in which the Church has dispensed when it was abundantly evident that the consent of the woman was really free, although dispensation prevented her entire separation from the control of the abductor. The last Instruction of the Congregation of the Inquisition (15 February, 1901, in the “Analecta Ecclesiastica,” Rome, 1901, 98) to the bishops of Albania (where abduction is of very frequent occurrence) refused a general dispensation of the law for their country, adding that the frequency mentioned, far from being a reason for relaxing, was rather a reason for insisting on the Tridentine law; yet, where it was abundantly evident that the consent of the woman under restraint was truly a free consent, and that there were reasons sufficient for the dispensation, recourse should have had to Rome in each single case. Further, in the extraordinary faculties given to bishops (20 February, 1888) for dispensing in public impedi-ments persons in danger of death, the impediment of raptus is not excluded. The civil codes of to-day, as a rule, do not recognize abduction as an impediment diriment to civil marriage, but consider it as a species of vi et matut. The codes of Austria and Spain, however, still hold it as an impediment, and among the jurists of Austria there is an earnest endeavour to make it an impediment absolute and perpetual, so that the abducted woman, if still under control of her abductor, may not marry even a third party.

The present abecedary, complete or partial lists of letters of the alphabet, chiefly Greek and Latin, inscribed on ancient monuments, Pagan and Christian. At, or near, the beginning of the Christian era, the Latin alphabet had already undergone its principal changes, and had become a fixed and definite system. The Greek alphabet, moreover, with certain slight modifications, had been inscribed in Latin. Towards the eighth century of Rome, the letters assumed their artistic forms and lost their older, narrower ones. Nor have the three letters added by the Emperor Claudius ever been found in use in Christian inscriptions. The letters themselves, therefore, were not employed for monumental inscriptions, so completely from the cursive, as to make it wholly impossible to mistake the one for the other. The uncial, occurring very rarely on sculptured monuments, and reserved for writing, did not make its appearance before the fourth century. The number of Christian objects bearing the abecedary, with the exception of two vases found at Carthage, is extremely limited. On the other hand, those of heathen origin are more plentiful, and include certain tablets used by stone-cutters' apprentices while learning their trade. Stones have also been found in the catacombs, bearing the symbols A, B, C, etc., to form a kind of monogram, or combinations which have puzzled the sagacity of scholars. One such, found in the cemetery of St. Alexander, in the Via Nomentana, is inscribed as follows:—

This represents, in all probability, a schoolboy's task, which may be compared with a denarius of L. Cassius Cecinianus, whereon the inscription runs thus:

It is to St. Jerome that we owe an explanation of this curious trifle. He tells us that, in order to train the memory of young children, they were made to learn the alphabet in a double form, joining A to X, and so on with the other letters. A stone found at Rome in 1877, and dating from the sixth or seventh century, seems to have been used in a school, as a model for learning the alphabet, and points, incidentally, to the long continuance of old methods of teaching. Abecedarians, a sect of Anabaptists who affected an absolute disdain for all human knowledge, con- tending that God would enlighten His elect interi- orly and give them knowledge of necessary truths by visions and ecstasies. They rejected every other means of instruction, and pretended that to be saved one must even be ignorant of the first letters of the alphabet; whence their name, A-B-Carians. They also considered the study of the letter as a species of idolatry, and regarded learned men who did any preaching as falsifiers of God's word.

At Wittenberg, in 1522, Nicholas Storch (Pergius) and the Illuminati of Zwickau began to preach this doctrine, mixing it up with other errors. Carl- stadt allowed himself to be drawn away by these singular views, and to put them thoroughly into practice he abandoned his title of Doctor and became a street porter. He preached the new doctrine for some time to the people and to the students of Wittenberg. (See Anabaptists.)

Abel (Heb., 5271, Vanity, "probably so called from the shortness of his life"—Gesenius; Gr., "Abló, whence Eng. form") was the second son of Adam. Vigu- roux and Hummelauer contend that the Assyris apulu or abù, const. Abel, i.e. "son," is the same word, not a case of orthographic coincidence, especially as Hebrew and Assyrian are related to tongues. Son, with Josephus (Ant., I, ii), it think it means "Sorrow" as if written 5278 i.e. "Lamentation." Cheyne holds that "a right view of the story favours the meaning shepherd, or more generally herdman"; Assyri- thu (Ency. Bib., s. v.) "ram, camel, ass, or wild sheep."

Cain, the first-born, was a farmer. Abel owned the flocks that lived upon the soil. The two were, therefore, doubly brothers, by birth and by calling. Abel is not mentioned in the Old Testament except in Genesis. Augustine makes him a type of a regenerate, and Cain of the natural man: "Cain founded a city on earth; but Abel as a stranger and pilgrim looked forward to the city of the saints which is in heaven" (De Civ. Dei, XV, i). The descendants of Cain were wicked, but, as nothing is said about those of Abel, it is supposed that he had none; or at least that no son was at the burial of Seth, "whom God has given me for Abel," as Eve expressed it (Gen., iv, 25). The Abelians, or Abiletes, a sect in northern Africa mentioned by St. Augustine (de Haer., lxxxvii), pretended that they imitated Abel by marrying, yet condemned the use of marriage. They adopted children who also married and lived in the same manner as their foster-parents. The biblical account of the sacrifices of the brothers and of the murder of Abel states that Cain offered of "the fruits of the earth," Abel of "the firstlings of his flock, and of their fat." Cain's offerings are not qualified. Abel's show that he gave with generosity and love, and therefore found favour with God. Josephus says (Ant., I, ii), "God was more delighted with the latter (Abel's) oblation, when He was honoured with what grew naturally of its own accord, than He was with what was the invention of a covetous man, and obtained by the forcing of the ground." St. John 3:16, 18, 20, etc.: "God rejected Cain's sacrifice and accepted that of Abel: "his own works were wicked; and his brother's just." (I John, iii, 12). God said later, "I will not receive a gift of your hand." (Mal., iii, 10). The love of the heart must sanctify the lifting of the hands. Cain offered in Deo aliquid sumum, sub autem serpemum (de Civ. Dei, XV, vii), but God says to all what St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "I seek not the things that are yours, but you." (II Cor., xii, 14).

In Hebrew, Christian, and Arabic traditions and legends it is said that God showed His acceptance of Abel's sacrifice by sending fire to consume it, as in III Kings, xxviii, 38. Cain thereupon resolved to kill his brother, thinking the latter would supplant him as Jacob did Esau later; or because he thought the seed of Abel would have the honour of crushing the serpent's head (Gen., iii, 15.—Hummelauer, Ours. Conn. de Jérusalem, p. 409, xxxvii, no. 316). Following Jewish tradition, makes the plain of Damascus the scene of the murder, and interprets the name of the city sanguinem bibens (blood-drinking), as if from προμακαίρῳ. A traveller quoted with approval by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould (Legends of the Middle Ages) gives the legend that the scene of the murder was halfway from Hebron; but there is no such local tradition in the neighbourhood of Hebron. The Damascus referred to is certainly the Syrian city. The Koran (Sura v, 30) agrees with the Bible in the main facts about the sacrifices and murder, but adds the legend that God sent a raven which, seeing the earth shrouded in Cain's blood, hurried to bury his brother. According to Jewish tradition, Adam and Eve were taught by the raven how to bury their son, and God rewarded the raven by granting three things: (1) his young were to be inviolable, (2) abundance of food, (3) his prayer for rain should be granted (Pirké Rab. Eliezer, xxvi). In the New Testament Abel is often mentioned. His pastoral life, his sacrifice, his holiness, his tragic death made him a striking type of Our Divine Saviour. His just works are referred to in I John, iii, 12; he is canonized by Christ Himself (Matt., xxiii, 34, 35) as the first of the long line of prophets martyred for justice' sake. He prophesied not by word, but by his sacrifice, of which he knew by revelation the typical meaning (Vigouroux); and also by his death (De Civ. Dei, XV, xviii). In Heb., xxii, 24, his death is mentioned, and the contrast between his blood and that of Christ is shown. The latter calls not for vengeance, but for mercy and pardon. Abel, though dead, speaks (Heb., xi, 4): "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, although God testifying of him, that he was withdrawn from Him, to be found in the way of righteousness." Abel's name is placed at the head of the list of saints invoked to aid the dying. The views of radical higher criticism may be summed up in the words of Cheyne: "The story of Cain and Abel is an early Israelitish legend retained by Jews as having a profitable tendency" (Encyc. bib., s. v.). The conservative interpretation of the narrative differs from that of the radical school of critics, because it accepts the story as history or at least as having a basis of history, while they regard it as only one of the legends of Genesis.

Abel (Abell), Thomas, Blessed. See Thomas Abel.
instruction as a wandering scholar at the schools of the most renowned teachers of those days. Among these teachers was Roscelin the Nominalist, at whose school at Lozemenach, near Vannes, Abelard certainly took some time before he proceeded to Paris. Although the University of Paris did not exist as a corporate institution until more than half a century after Abelard's death, there flourished at Paris in his time the Cathedral School, the School of St. Geneviève, and that of St. Germain des Prés, the forerunners of the university schools of the following century. Abelard, in his capacity as the most important of these, and thither the young Abelard directed his steps in order to study dialectic under the renowned master (scholasticus) William of Champeaux. Soon, however, the youth from the province, for whom the prestige of a great name was far from awe-inspiring, not only ventured to object to the teaching of the Parisian master, but attempted to set up as a rival teacher. Finding that this was not an easy matter in Paris, he established his school first at Melun and later at Corbeil. This was, probably, in the year 1101. The next couple of years Abelard spent in his native place as "architus de Sancto Fructu". The reason of this enforced retreat from the dialectical fray was failing health. On returning to Paris, he became once more a pupil of William of Champeaux for the purpose of studying rhetoric. When William retired to the monastery of St. Victor, Abelard, who meantime had resumed his teaching at Melun, hastened to Paris to secure the chair of the Cathedral School. Having failed in this, he set up his school in Mt. St. Geneviève (1108). There and at the Cathedral School, in which in 1113 he finally succeeded in obtaining a chair, he enjoyed the greatest renown as a teacher of rhetoric and dialectic. Before taking up the duty of teaching theology at the Cathedral School, he went to León where he presented himself to the venerable Anselm of León as a student of theology. Soon, however, his petulant restiveness under restraint once more asserted itself, and he was not content until he had as completely discomfited the teacher of theology at León as he had successfully harassed the teacher of rhetoric and dialectic at Paris. Taking Abelard's own account of the incident, it is impossible not to blame him for the temerity which made him such enemies as Alberic and Lotulph, pupils of Anselm, who, later on, at the instance of Anselm, accepted the doctrine of the 'Paræcletus' pursued by Abelard at León were what we would nowadays call the study of exegesis.

There can be no doubt that Abelard's career as a teacher at Paris, from 1108 to 1118, was an exceptionally brilliant one. In his "Story of My Calamities" (Historia Calamitatum) he tells us how pupils flocked to him from every country in Europe, a statement which is more than corroborated by the authority of his contemporaries. He was, in fact, the idol of Paris; eloquent, vivacious, handsome, possessed of an unusually rich voice, full of captivating power, he was, as he tells us, the whole world at his feet. That Abelard was unduly conscious of these advantages is admitted by his most ardent admirers; indeed, in the "Story of My Calamities," he confesses that at that period of his life he was filled with vanity and pride. To these faults he attributes his downfall, which was as complete as it was sudden. It was that period of his meteoric career. He tells us in graphic language the tale which has become part of the classic literature of the love-theme, how he fell in love with Heloise, niece of Canon Fulbert; he spares us none of the details of the story, recounts all the circumstances of his misfortune, the burning of the Canon, the flight of Heloise to Pallet, where their son, whom he named Astrolabius, was born, the secret wedding, the retirement of Heloise to the nunnery of Argenteuil, and his abandonment of his academic career. He was at the time a cleric in minor orders, and had naturally looked forward to a distinguished career as a ecclesiastical teacher. After his downfall, he retired to the Abbey of St. Denis, and, Heloise having taken the veil at Argenteuil, he assumed the habit of a Benedictine monk at the royal Abbey of St. Denis. He who had considered himself "the only surviving philosopher in the whole world" was willing to hide himself definitively, as he thought, in monastic solitude. But whatever dreams he may have had of final peace in his monastic retreat were soon shattered. He quarrelled with the monks of St. Denis, the occasion being his irreverent criticism of the legend of their patron saint, and was sent to a branch institution, a priory or cella, where, once more, he was soon attracted unfavourable attention by the spirit of the teaching which he gave in philosophy and theology. "More subtle and more learned than ever", as a contemporary (Otto of Freising) describes him, he took up the former quarrel with Anselm's pupils. Through the influence, he contended, especially on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, when he was summoned to appear before a council at Soissons, in 1121, presided over by the papal legate, Kuno, Bishop of Freneste. While it is not easy to determine exactly what took place at the Council, it is clear that there was no formal condemnation of Abelard's doctrines, but that he was nevertheless condemned to recite the Athanasian Creed, and to burn his book on the Trinity. Besides, he was sentenced to imprisonment in the Abbey of St. Ménard, at the instance apparently, of the monks of St. Denis, whose enmity, especially that of their Abbot Adam, was unrelenting. In his despair, he fled to a desert place in the neighbourhood of Troyes. Thither pupils soon began to flock, huts and tents for their reception were built, and an oratory erected, under the title "The Paræcletus", and there his former success as a teacher was renewed.

After the death of Adam, Abbot of St. Denis, his successor, Suger, abdolated Abelard from censure, and thus restored him to his rank as a monk. The Abbey of St. Gildas de Rhuys, near Vannes, on the coast of Brittany, having lost its Abbot in 1125, elected Abelard to fill his place. At the same time, the community of Argenteuil was dispersed, and Heloise gladly accepted the chance of the seclusion in which she became Abbess. As Abbot of St. Gildas, Abelard had, according to his own account, a very troublesome time. The monks, considering him too strict, endeavoured in various ways to rid themselves of his rule, and even attempted to poison him. They finally drove him from the monastery. Retaining the title of Abbot, he resided for some time in the neighbourhood of Nantes and later (probably in 1136) resumed his career as teacher at Paris and revived, to some extent, the renown of the days when, twenty years earlier, he gathered "all Europe" to hear his lectures, he postponed. At this time were Arnold of Brescia and John of Salisbury. Now begins the last act in the tragedy of Abelard's life, in which St. Bernard plays a conspicuous part. The monk of Clairvaux, the most powerful man in the Church in those days, was alarmed at the heterodoxy of Abelard's teaching; and questioned the Trinitarian doctrine contained in it. There were admonitions on the one side and defiance on the other; St. Bernard, having first warned Abelard in private, proceeded to denounce him to the bishops of France; Abelard, underestimating the ability and influence of his adversary, requested a meeting, or trial, of bishops. But all the arguments he could suggest were brushed aside with contempt. According to the report of a council held at Sens (the metropolitan see to which Paris was then suffragan) in 1141. On the eve of the council a meeting of bishops was held at which Bernard was present, but not Abelard, and in a number of propositions selected from Abelard's writings, and condemned. When, on the following morning, these propositions were read in solemn council, Abelard, informed, so it seems, of the proceedings of the evening before, refused to defend himself, declaring that he appealed to Rome. Accordingly, the propositions were condemned, but Abelard was allowed his freedom. St. Bernard now wrote to the members of the Roman Curia, with the result that Abelard had proceeded only as far as Cluny on his way to Rome when the decree of Innocent II confirming the sentence of the Council of Sens reached him. The Venerable Peter of Cluny now took up his case, obtained from Rome a mitigation of the sentence, reconciled him with St. Bernard, and gave him honourable and friendly hospitality at Cluny. There Abelard spent the last years of his life, and there at last he found the peace which he had elsewhere sought in vain. He dinned the habit of the monks of Cluny and became a member in the school of the monastery. He died at Châlons-sur-Saône in 1142, and was buried at the Paraclete. In 1817 his remains and those of Heloïse were transferred to the cemetery of Père la Chaise, in Paris, where they now rest. For our knowledge of the life of Abelard we rely chiefly on the "Story of Abelard," a autobiography written and letter to a friend, and evidently intended for publication. To this may be added the letters of Abelard and Heloïse, which were also intended for circulation among Abelard's friends. The "Story" was written about the year 1130, and the letters during the following five or six years. In both the personal element must, of course, be taken into account. Besides these we have very scanty matter; a letter from Roscelin to Abelard, a letter of Fulco of Deuil, the chronicle of Otto of Freising, the letters of St. Bernard, and a few allusions in the writings of John of Salisbury.

Abelard's philosophical works are "Dialectica," a logical treatise consisting of four books (of which the first is missing); "Liber Divisionum et Definitionum" (edited by Cousin as a fifth book of the "Dialectica"); Glosses on Porphyry, Boëtius, and the Aristotelian "Categories"; "Glossae in Porphyrium" (hitherto unpublished except in a French facsimile); "De Generibus et Speciebus," ascribed to Abelard by Cousin; a moral treatise "Scito Teipum, seu Ethica," first published by Pxn in "Thes. Anec. Novissi." All of these, with the exception of the "Glossulae" and the "Ethica", are to be found in Cousin's "Ouvrages inédits d'Abelard" (Paris, 1836). Abelard's theological works (published by Cousin, "Petri Abelardi Opera," in 2 vols., Paris, 1849-59, also by Migne, "Patr. Lat.," CLXXVIII) include "Sic et Non," consisting of scriptural and patristic passages arranged for and against various philosophical opinions, without any attempt to decide whether the dogmatic opinion expressed is correct or orthodox; "Tractatus de Unitate et Trinitate Divinæ," which was condemned at the Council of Sens (discovered and edited by Stölzel, Freiburg, 1891); "Theologia Christianæ," a second and enlarged edition of the "Tractatus" (first published by Durand and Martène, "Cod. Juv.," Inst., 1771); "Institutiones," consisting of the treatises of his pupils (more correctly, "Theologia"), of which the first part was published by Duchesne in 1816; "Dialogus inter Philosophum, Judæum, et Christianum"; "Sententiae Petri Abelardi," otherwise called "Epitome Theologicæ Christianæ," which is seemingly a compilation of Abelard's pupils (first published by Baur, "Abelard, Berlin, 1835"); a variety of exegetical works, hymns, sequences, etc. In philosophy Abelard deserves consideration primarily as a dialectician. For him, as for all the scholastic philosophers before the thirteenth century, philosophical inquiry meant almost exclusively the discussion and elucidation of the problems set up by the logicians and the commentators of Aristotle and the commentators thereon, chiefly the commentators of Porphyry and Boëtius. Perhaps his most important contribution to philosophy and theology is the method which he developed in his "Sic et Non" (Yeas and Nay), a method germinally contained in the "Dialectica," and afterwards brought to more definite form by Alexander of Hales and St. Thomas Aquinas. It consisted in placing before the student the reasons pro and con, on the principle that truth is to be attained only by a dialectical discussion of apparently contradictory arguments and authorities. In the problem of Universals, which occupied so much of the attention of dialecticians in those days, Abelard took a position of uncompromising hostility to the crude nominalism of Roscelin on the one side, and to the exaggerated realism of William of Champeaux on the other. What, precisely, was his own doctrine on this question is uncertain, but he became a nominalist in the school of the monastery. He died at Châlons-sur-Saône in 1142, and was buried at the Paraclete. In 1817 his remains and those of Heloïse were transferred to the cemetery of Père la Chaise, in Paris, where they now rest. For our knowledge of the life of Abelard we rely chiefly on the "Story of Abelard," a autobiography written and letter to a friend, and evidently intended for publication. His influence on the philosophers and theologians of the thirteenth century was, however, very great. It was exercised chiefly through Peter Lombard, his pupil, and other framers of the "Sentences." Indeed, while one must be careful to discount the exaggerated encomiums of Compayré, Cousin, and others, to represent Abelard as the first modern, the founder of the University of Paris, etc., one is justified in regarding him, in spite of his faults of character and mistakes of judgment, as an important contributor to scholastic method, an enlightened opponent of obscurantism, and a continuator of that real learning which occurred in the Carolingian age, and of which whatever there is of science, literature, and speculation in the early Middle Ages is the historical development.

Abelly, Louis, 1603-91, was Vicar-General of Bayonne, a parish priest in Paris, and subsequently Bishop of Rodez in 1664, but in 1666 abdicated and returned to St. Vincent de Paul in the service of St. Lazare, Paris. His ascetical works reveal his deep and sincere piety. He was a bitter foe of the Jansenists, chiefly of St. Cyran, against whom he directed his "Life of St. Vincent de Paul," a work which Hurter describes as "full of unctuous. His "Medulla Theologica" were through many editions and is characterized by its "solidity, directness, and usefulness." According to St. Alphonse, Abelly is "a classic in probabilism." His "Défense de la hiérarchie de l'Eglise" was directed against an anonymous Gallican writer. He wrote also two Enchiri- dions, one for bishops, another for priests; a treatise entitled "De l'obéissance et soumission due aux Papes"; and another called "Traité des Hérésies." Replying to a Jansenist work known as "Monita Salutaris," he published his "Sentiments des SS. Pères, touchant les éléances et les prérogatives de la T. S. Vierge." Hurter, Nomenclator, VII, 586.

Abenakis.—A confederation of Algonquin tribes, comprising the Penobscots, Passamaquoddiés, Nor- risions, and others, formerly occupying the north of Maine, and southern New Brunswick. Their territory adjoined that of the Micmacs on the northeast, and that of the Penobscots on the southwest. Their speech is a dialect of the Micmac language of the North American Indians. They took sides with the French and maintained an increasing hostility against encroachments of the English. When their principal town, Norridgewock, was taken, and their missionary, Rasé, was killed (1724), the greater part of them removed to St. Francis, in the Province of Quebec, Canada, whither other refugees from the New England tribes had preceded them. Those who remained continued the battle against the English, by which a small part of their former possession was allowed to remain to them. They are now represented by the Amaucamies on the Saint John River, New Brunswick, and Quebec (820); the Passamaquoidies, on the Bay of that name, in Maine (300); the Penobscots, at Oldtown, Maine (400), and the Abnakis at St. Francis and Becancourt, Quebec (430). There are a dozen variations of the name Abenakis, such as Abenaquois, Aba- kvis, Quebanakionek, Wabanesies, etc. They are described in the "Jesuit Relations" as cannibals, and as docile, ingenious, temperate in the use of liquor, and not profane. Their language has been preserved in the monumental Dictionary of Sebastian Rasle. After the unsuccessful attempt of de la Saussaye, in 1613, to plant a colony at Mount Desert, where the Jesuit Fathers Baird, Massie, and Quentin proposed to evangelize the Indians, the Capuchins and Recollects, aided by secular priests from the Seminary of Quebec, un-undertook the work, but met with indifferent success. The Jesuit Drullettes was sent to them in 1646, but remained only a short time. Subse- quently other missionaries like Bigot, Thury, and de la Chasse laboured among them, but three years after the murder of Father Rasle, that is to say in 1727, when Fathers Syvesme and Lauverjat withdrew, there was no resident pastor in Maine, though the Indians were visited by priests from time to time. They remained unalterably attached to the Faith, and during the Revolution, when Washington sent to ask them to join with the colonies against England, they asserted on condition that a Catholic priest should be sent to them. Some of the chaplains of the French fleet communicated with them, promising to comply with their request, but beyond that nothing was done. At the present time there are Indian missions for the remnants of the tribe at Calais, Eastport, and Old Town.

Aben-Ezra (or Ibn 'Ezra), Abraham-Ben-Meir, a celebrated Spanish Rabbi, b. at Toledo in 1092; d. on his journey from Rome, or Rodez, to his native land, 23 January, 1167. He excelled in philosophy, astronomy, medicine, poetry, linguistics, and exegesis. He was called the Wise, the Great, the Admirable Doctor. Having to leave his native city on account of the vexations inflicted on the Jews, he travelled through a great part of Europe, through Egypt and Palestine. Rome, London, Narbonne, Mantua, Ve- rona, and Rodez are some of the places he visited. His chief work is his commentary on the Sacred Books, which is nearly complete, the Books of Par- alapomenon being the only ones missing. His commentary on the Pentateuch appeared in several re- visions. In his commentary Aben-Ezra adheres to the literal sense of the Sacred Books, avoiding Rab- binic allegories and Cabbalistic extravagances, though he remains faithful to the Jewish traditions. This does not prevent him from exercising an independent criticism, which, according to some writers, even borders on rationalism. But in his other works he follows the Cabbalistic views. Abercius. Inscription OP.—A Greek hagiographical text, which has, however, undergone alterations, and a Greek inscription of the second century have made known certain Abercius, Bishop of Hieropolis, in Phrygia, who, about the middle of the century in question, left his episcopal city and visited Rome. On his way home he travelled through Syria and Mesopotamia, and was received with great honours in various places. He died shortly after his return to Hieropolis, but not before he had composed his own epitaph, conveying a most vivid impression of all he had admired during his stay in Rome. This epitaph may well have inspired the "Life" of Abercius such as it has come down to us, since all its details may be explained by the hints contained in the inscription, or else belong to the common foundation of all legends of saints. The "Life", as a matter of fact, includes a transcription of the epitaph. Tillemon was greatly struck by the ideas therein expressed, and Pitra endeavoured to prove its authenticity and its important bearing on Christian symbolism. Renan regarded both the "Life" and inscription as fanciful compositions, but in 1882 an English traveller, W. Ramsay, discovered at Kelendres, near Synnoda, in Phrygia Salutaris (Asia Minor), a Christian stele (inscribed slab) bearing the date of the year 300 of the Phrygian era
(s. d. 214). The inscription in question recalled the memory of a certain Alexander, son of Anthony, De Rossi and Duchesne at once recognized in it phrases similar to those in the epitaph of Abercius.
On comparison it was found that the inscription in memory of Alexander corresponded, almost word for word, with the first and last verses of the epitaph of the Bishop of Hieropolis Abercius as the missing.
Mr. Ramsay, on a second visit to the site of Hieropolis, in 1883, discovered two new fragments covered with inscriptions, built into the masonry of the public baths. These fragments, which are now in the Vatican Christian Museum, filled out the middle part of the stele, connected with the epitaph of Abercius. It now became possible, with the help of the text preserved in the "Life", to restore the original text of the epitaph with practical certainty.
Certain lacuna, letters effaced or cut off by breaks in the stone, have been the subject of profound discussions, resulting in a text which may henceforth be looked on as settled, and which may be useful to give here. The capital letters at the beginning and end of the inscription represent the parts found on the inscription of Alexander, the son of Anthony, those of the middle part are the remaining fragments of the epitaph of Abercius, while the small letters give the reading according to the manuscripts of the "Life":

"ΚΛΕΟΣ ΠΟΙΜΩΝΟ ΠΟΛΕΩΤΗΣ ΤΗΣ ΔΩΡΟΥ ΕΠΙΟΠΗΛΑ
ΤΟΥ ΝΑΟΥ ΕΝ ΧΙΩ ΚΑΙΡΩ
ΘΕΟΣ ΣΟΜΑΤΟΣ ΕΝ ΘΕΟΙΣ ΘΕΩΝ

in one quarter or another; the following conclusions are indisputably historical. The epitaph of Abercice is generally, and with good reason, regarded as older than that of Alexander, the son of Anthony, i. e. prior to the year of Our Lord 216. The subject of it may be identified with a writer named Abercius Marcel- lus, author of a work against the Montanists, some fragments of which have been preserved by Euse- bius. As the treatise in question was written about the year 193, the epitaph may be assigned to the last years of the second, or to the beginning of the third century. The writer was bishop of a little town, the name of which is wrongly given in the "Life"" of his, as belonging to Hierapolis in Phrygia, while it belongs to Hierapolis in Phrygia. Salutarius, and not to Hierapolis in Phrygia Pacatien. The proof of this fact given by Duceene is all that could be wished for.

The text of the inscription itself is of the greatest possible importance in connection with the symbol- ism of the early Church. The poem of sixteen verses which forms the epitaph shows plainly that the language used is one not understood by all; "Let the brother who shall understand this pray for Abercius." The bishop's journey to Rome is merely mentioned, but on his way home he gives us glimpses of his transactions with the Roman emperors along the Syrian coast and, possibly, came to An- tiocch, thence to Nisibis, after having traversed the whole of Syria, while his return to Hierapolis may have been by way of Edessa. The allusion to St. Paul the Apostle, which a gap in the text renders indecipherable, may originally have told how the traveller followed on his way back to his country the stages of St. Paul's third missionary journey, namely: Issus, Tarsus, Derbe, Iconium, Antioch in Pisidia, and Apamea Cibotus, which would bring him into the heart of Phrygia.

The inscription bears witness of no slight value to the history of the Church of Rome in the second century. A mere glance at the text allows us to note: (1) The evidence of baptism which marks the Christian people with its dazzling seal; (2) The spread of Christianity, whose members Abercius meets with everywhere; (3) The receiving of Jesus Christ, the Son of God and of Mary, in the Eucharist, (4) under the species of Bread and Wine.

The liturgical cultus of Abercius presents no point of special interest; his name appears for the first time in the Greek menologies and synaxaries of the tenth century, but is not found in the Martyrology of the eleventh century.

Abercomby, John. d. 1561. During the Scottish Reformation we know that the Catholic clergy were treated with great violence, but particulars of their fate occurred to find. Bernard, a diligent writer of the next century, whose accuracy, however, cannot always be trusted, in his "Historia Gentis Scotorum" (Edinburgh, 1829), 28, names Abercomby as having lost his life from such vio- lence. He adds that he thinks the sufferer was a Benedictine, and that he had written in behalf of the Faith. John Hungerford Follen.

Propaganda, until 1695, the Catholic Church in Scotland was governed by prelates apostolic. Then followed vicars-apostolic until 4 March, 1878, when Leo XIII., in the first year of his pontificate, restored the hierarchy of Scotland by the Bull "Ex superno Apostolatus apice", and Vicar-Apostolic John MacDowall was consecrated, and to the restored See of Aberdeen as its first bishop.

The Bull made Aberdeen one of the four suffragan sees of the Archbishops of St. Andrews and Edinburgh, and defined as its territory "the counties of Aberdeen, Kincardine, Banff, Elgin or Moray, Nairn, Ross (except the Lewis in the Hebrides), Cromarty, Sutherland, Caithness, the Orkney and Shetland Islands, and that portion of Inverness which lies to the north of a straight line drawn from the most northerly point of Loch Luing to the eastern boundary of the said county of Inverness, where the counties of Aberdeen and Banff join." In 1806, out of a population of over 500,000 there were nearly 4,000 Catholics; 48 secular priests; 24 regulars; 57 churches, chapels, and stations; 1 college; 1 industrial school for girls; 1 orphanage for boys; 1 orphanage for girls. There are also Benedictine nuns, Poor Sisters of Nazareth, Franciscan Sisters, Religious of the Sacred Heart, and Sisters of Mercy; there have been four Bishops of Aberdeen since the restoration, the present incumbent, the Rt. Rev. John Chisholm, having been consecrated 24 February, 1899. There is a Benedictine Abbey at Fort Augustus, at which the restored hierarchy met in a Provincial Council, August, 1856, under the presidency of the Archbishops of St. Andrews, three hundred and twenty-six years after the downfall of the Faith in Scotland. The Provincial Council of 1 March, 1559, at Edinburgh, under Archbishop Hamilton, was the last council before this, and that had adjourned after appointing Septuagesima Sunday of 1560, for the next meeting of the synod. Fort Augustus was raised to the rank of an abbey, immediately subject to the Holy See, by a brief of Leo XIII., 12 December, 1882. The munificence of Lord Lovat and other liberal benefactors called it into being.

ABERDEEN, THE UNIVERSITY OF.—The founder of this, one of the three universities established in Scotland in Catholic times, was William Elphinstone, who became Bishop of Aberdeen in 1494 (1495, according to our modern way of reckoning). Bishop Elphinstone had been a professor at Paris and at Orleans for nine years, and it was on the University of Paris, both as to form and organization, and also in its wide scope for general mental training, that the new establishment was modelled by its founder. In 1497 Elphinstone procured a royal charter assigning to academic purposes certain ecclesiastical revenues and conceeding to the new university all the privileges enjoyed by the universities of Paris, St. Andrews, and Glasgow. Hector Boece, professor of philosophy at Paris, was appointed first principal of the institution which was established in what is now known as Old Aberdeen, near the ancient Cathedral of St. Machar. In 1583, George Keith, fifth Earl Marshal of Scotland, founded a second university (hence called Marischal College) in the new town of Aberdeen, and granted to it the buildings of the dispossessed Black (Dominican), Grey (Franciscan), and White (Carmelite) Friars as endowment. The two universities were united for a time (from 1640 until after the Restoration), and many schemes for their permanent reunion were promulgated in the eighteenth century; but it was not until 1859 that their union was finally effectuated, after much local opposition. New professorships and lectureships were established, and at Marischal College, now the seat of the faculties of science, law, and medicine, a scheme of building extension on a great scale is at present (1905) being carried out. The number of students is about 700, and the number of professors 24.

He became professor in the Obergymnasmum at Eningen, in 1845; director of the Wilhelmsstift, in 1848; professor of moral theology and New Testament exegesis in the University at Tübingen, in 1850, a position he retained till the day of his death. He had a considerable number of pupils in both branches, but he was especially devoted to Scriptural studies. He emphasized the activity of the human bears of revelation, without changing it into a purely natural process. The results of his investigations were published in a series of articles contributed to the "Tübingen theological Quarterly", 1851-72, and to the "Bonner theolog. Lit.-Blatt". The main thoughts of these articles were collected and published under the title, "Introduction to the New Testament", by Dr. Paul Schanz (Freiburg, 1897). Aberle's view that the Gospels and the Book of Acts are apolgetical writings, meeting certain needs of the Apostolic times, cannot be sustained. He took an active part in the struggle for ecclesiastical liberty in Württemberg, and his strong newspaper articles forced the State to arrange Church matters on a tolerable basis.

ABGAR, THE LEGEND OF.—The historical Eusebius records (H. E., i, xii) a tradition, which he himself firmly believes, concerning a correspondence that took place between Our Lord and the local potentate at Edessa. Three documents relate to this correspondence: (1) the letter of Abgar to Our Lord; (2) Our Lord's answer; (3) a picture of Our Lord painted from life. The legend enjoyed great popularity, both in the East and in the West, during the Middle Ages: Our Lord's letter was copied on parchment, marble, and metal, and used as a talisman or an amulet. In the age of Eusebius the original letters, written in Syriac, were thought to be kept in the archives of Edessa. At the present day we possess not only a Syriac text, but an Armenian translation as well, two independent Greek versions, shorter than the Syriac, and several inscriptions on stone, all of which are discussed in two articles in the "Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie", cols. 88 sq. and 1807 sq. The only two works to be consulted in regard to this literary problem are the "Ecclesiastical History" of Eusebius, and the "Teaching of Addai," which professes to belong to the Apostolic age. The legend, according to these two works, runs as follows: A king of Edessa, suffering from a sickness, has heard the fame of the power and miracles of Jesus and writes to Him, praying Him to come and heal him. Jesus declines, but promises to send a messenger, endowed with His power, namely Thaddæus (or Addai), one of the seventy-two Disciples. The letters of Our Lord and of the King of Edessa vary in the version given in Eusebius and in that of the "Teaching of Addal." That which follows is taken from the "Teaching of Addal," as being less accessible than the History of Eusebius.

"Abgar Ouchama to Jesus, the Good Physician Who has appeared in the country of Jerusalem, greeting:

"I have heard of Thee, and of Thy healings; namely that Thou dost not use medicines or roots, but by Thy word openest (the eyes) of the blind, makes the lame to walk, cleansest the lepers, makest the deaf to hear; how by Thee were Thou healed (Thou healest) sick spirits and those who are tormented with lunatic demons, and how, again, Thou raisest the dead to life. And, learning the wonders that Thou dost, it was borne in upon me that (of two things, one): either Thou art God, who hast come down from heaven, or else Thou art the Son of God, who bringest all these things to pass. Wherefore I write to Thee, and pray that Thou wilt come to me, who adore Thee, and heal all the ill that I suffer, according to the faith I have in Thee. I also learn that the Jews murmur against Thee, and people have said that they shall stone and destroy Thee. I possess but one small city, but it is beautiful, and large enough for us two to live in peace."

When Jesus had received the letter, in the house of the high priest of the Jews, He said to Hannan, his secretary, "Go thou and say to thy lord, who hath sent thee to Me: 'Happy art thou who hast believed in Me, not having seen Me, for it is written of Me that those who shall see Me shall not believe in Me, and that those who shall not see Me shall believe in Me. As to that which thou hast written, that I should come to thee, (behold) all that for which I was sent here below is finished, and I ascend again to My Father who sent Me, and when I shall have ascended to Him I will send thee one of My disciples, who shall heal all thy sufferings, and shall give (thee) health again, and shall convert all who are with thee unto life eternal. And thy city shall be blessed forever, and the enemy shall never overcome it.'" According to Eusebius, it was not Hannan who wrote the answer, but Our Lord Himself.

A curious legendary growth has sprung up from this imaginary occurrence. The nature of Abgar's vision is nowhere clearly defined, but it is certainly true that various writers' imaginations, some holding that it was gout, others leprosy; the former saying that it had lasted seven years, the latter discovering that the sufferer had contracted his disease during a stay in Persia. Other chroniclers, again, maintain that the letter was written on parchment, though some favour papyrus. The crucial passage in Our Lord's letter, however, is that which promises the city of Edessa victory over all enemies. It gave the little town a popularity which vanished on the day that it fell into the hands of conquerors. It was a rude shock to the people, who believed the legend; they were more ready to attribute the fall of the city to God's anger against the inhabitants than to admit the failure of a safeguard which was no less trusted to at that time than in the past.

The fact related in the correspondence has long since ceased to be of any historical value. The text is preserved in two places from that of the Gospel, which of itself is sufficient to disprove the authenticity of the letter. Moreover, the quotations are made not from the Gospels proper, but from the famous concordance of Tatian, compiled in the second century, and known as the "Diatessaron", thus bringing the date of the legend as approximately the middle of the third century. In addition, however, to the importance which it attained in the apocryphal cycle, the correspondence of King Abgar also gained a place in liturgy. The decree, "De libris non recipiendis", of the pseudo-Gelasius, places the letter among the apocrypha, which may, possibly, be an allusion to its having been interpolated among the officially sanctioned lectionaries of the Syrian liturgies. Commemoration of the correspondence of Abgar during Lent. The Celtic liturgy appears to have attached importance to the legend; the "Liber Hymnorum", a manuscript preserved at Trinity College, Dublin (E. 4, 2), gives two collects on the lines of the letter to Abgar. But it is by any means impossible that this letter, followed by various prayers, may have formed a minor liturgical office in certain churches.

The account given by Addat contains a detail which may here be briefly referred to. Hannan, who wrote at Our Lord's dictation, was archivist at Edessa and painter to King Abgar. He had been charged to paint a portrait of Our Lord, a task which he carried out, bringing back with him to Edessa a picture which became an object of general veneration, but which, after a while, was said to have been painted by Our Lord Himself. Like the letter, the portrait was destined to be the nucleus of a legendary cycle, the "Holy Face of Edessa" being chiefly famous in the Byzantine world. A bare indication, however, of this fact must suffice here, since the legend of the Edessa portrait forms part of the extremely difficult and obscure subject of the iconography of Christ, and of the picture of miracle of an origin called "achetropoeion" ("made without hands").

Together with the high priest Sadaoe, he assisted at the transportation of the ark to Jerusalem (I Par., xvii., 11, 12), and tried to follow David in his flight (II K., xv., 24), but instead aided him by counsel (II K., xy., 29-36; xvii., 15 sqq.; xix., 11; I Par., xxvii., 34). He favoured Adonias (II K., iv., 19, 22), and was banished, and was succeeded by Sadaoe (II K., ii., 22-27), thus completing the ruin of the house of Ithamar (I K., ii., 30-36; iii., 10-14). Abingdon, The Abbey of, in the County of Berkshire, England, was founded A. D. 675, by Cyssa, Viceroy of Cinwina, King of the West Saxons, or by his nephew Haene, in honour of the Virgin Mary, for twelve Benedictine monks. Endowed by successive West Saxon kings, it grew in importance and wealth until its destruction by the Danes in the reign of King Alfred, and the suppression of its estates by Alfred because the monks had not made him a sufficient requital for vanquishing their enemies. There is a collection of 136 charters granted to this Abbey by various Saxon Kings (Cottonian MSS. apud Dugdale). Among its abbots were St. Ethelwo, afterwards Bishop of Winchester (854), and Richard de Hendred, for whose appointment the King's consent was obtained in 1262. It is recorded of him that he wore both mitre and pontificals on the Feast of Holy Trinity in 1268. Hence Willis supposes that he was the first abbot to possess the privilege. He was present at the Council of Lyons in 1272. The last Abbot of Abingdon was Thomas Pentecost (c. 1250–1282), who was among the first to acknowledge the Royal Supremacy. With the rest of his community he signed the surrender of his monastery in 1538, receiving the manor of Cumor for life or until he had prepayment to the extent of £223 per annum. The revenues of the Abbey (26 Hen. VII) were valued at £1876, 10s. 9d.

For six years he was imprisoned in the Tower, being accused, with his brother Edward, of having taken part in the plot of Babington to effect the escape of Mary Queen of Scots. On his release he retired to Hinlip Castle in Lancaster, where he gave asylum to the Jesuit Fathers, Henry Garnett and Oldcorne, accused of complicity in the Gunpowder Plot. For this he was condemned to death, but through the intervention of his son-in-law, Lord Montague, the sentence was commuted to banishment. His "History of Edward Dryden" was published after his death and also an English translation of "Gildas" (London, 1638). Abipones, Missions Among the.—This Indian tribe, linguistically of Guaycuru stock, formerly roaming on the east side of the Paraná river, was finally concentrated between the River Bermejo on the north, the River Salado on the south, and the Paraná on the east, on the soil of the present Argentine Republic. Their customs appear to have been the same as those of South-American tribes in general: clanship, an elaborate animism, or fetishism, complete sway of the medicine-men over private and tribal matters; chiefs eligible, or imposed through the impress creation by casual achievements combined with will of the Abipons. Their weapons were lances, bows, and arrows, though the lance was preferred. They had most of the customs of the Guaycurus, including the couvade. In 1641 the Abipones had already obtained the horse from the Spanish settlers. At that time they were, according to tradition, still north of the Rio Bermejo, whence it is likely they were driven south by the Tobas, a warlike tribe of their own linguistic stock. Their horses, thriving on the grassy plains, soon made the Abipones very dangerous to Spanish colonization by means of raids on the settlements, by which they increased their own stock of horses and cattle. In the first half of the eighteenth century, the Jesuits undertook the task of taming these unruly centaurs of the "Gran Chaco".

With great difficulty Fathers Casado, Sanchez, and especially Father Martin Dobrizhoffer, who was for eighteen years a missionary in Paraguay, succeeded in forming several settlements of Christianized Abipones on the Paraná, and maintained in spite of the turbulent spirit of the neophytes, which caused incessant trouble with Spanish settlers and, above all, in spite of the murderous onslaughts made by the Tobas and Moobobis, strong and warlike tribes, upon the missions, when these should intrude upon the pastures of the Jesuit from Paraguay in 1768 and 1769 was the deathknell for the Abipones. The Tobas and Moobobis destroyed them in the course of less than half a century. It is to the work of Father Martin Dobrizhoffer, S.J., that we owe most of our knowledge of the Abipones.

Abjuration, a denial, disavowal, or renunciation under oath. In common ecclesiastical language this term is restricted to the renunciation of heresy made by the penitent heretic on the occasion of his reconciliation with the Church. The Church has always demanded such renunciation, accomplished by an appropriate penance. In some cases the abjuration was the only ceremony required; in others abjuration was followed by the imposition of hands, or byunction, or both by the laying on of hands and byunction. St. Gregory the Great (a. d. 590–604) in a letter (Epist. xi. Ep. lxvii. 1) to P. L. of S. Maria in LXXVII. Col. 1204–08; Decret. Gratiani, Pars III, Dist. iv. c. xlix) to Quiricus and the Bishops of Iberia, concerning the reconcililation of Nestorians, set forth the practice of the ancient Church in this matter. According to this testimony of St. Gregory, in cases where the heretical baptism was invalid, as with the Paulinists, Montanists, or Catharyans (Conc. Nicen., can. xiii, P. L., II, 666; Decret. Gratiani, Pars II, Causa I, Q. i, c. xiiii), Eunomians (Anomoeans), and others, the rule was that the penitent should be baptized (cum ad sanctum Ecclesiam venient, baptizetur) by three bishops, who, according to the baptismal rite, were considered valid, and the converts were admitted into the Church either by anointing with chrism, or by the imposition of hands, or by a profession of faith (aut unctione chrismatis, aut impositione manus, aut professione fidei ad sinum matriis Ecclesiae revocantur).

Applying this rule, St. Gregory declares that Arians were received into the Church in the West by the imposition of hands, in the East by unction (Arianos per impositionem manus Occidens, per unctionem vero sancti chrismatis ... Orisini, reformat), while the Monophysites, who separated from the Church in the fifth and sixth centuries, were treated with less severity, being admitted, with some others, upon a mere profession of the orthodox faith [sold verb confessionis recipit (Ecclesia)]. St. Gregory's statement applies to the Roman Church and to Italy (Siricius, Epist., i, c. i; Epist., iv, c. viii; Innoc. I, Epist. ii, c. viii; Epist. xxii, c. iv), but not to the whole Western Church. In these colonies, the rite of unction was also in use (Second Conc. of Arles, can. xvii; Conc. of Orange, a. d. 529, can. ii; Conc. of Epidauros, can. xvi; Greg. of Tours, Historia, lib. II, c. xiii; lib. IV, cc. xxvii, xxviii; lib. V, c. xxxix; lib. IX, c. xvi).

To the Eastern Church, St. Gregory's phrase entirely agrees with the rule laid down in the seventh canon of Constantinople, which, though not emanating from the Ecumenical Council of 381, bears witness notwithstanding to the practice of the Church of Constantinople in the fifth century [Duchesne, Christian Worship (London, 1904), 339, 340]. This canon, which was inserted in the Trullan or Quinisext Synod (canon xcv), and thus found a place in Byzantine canon law, distinguishes between scribes whose baptism, but not confirmation, was accepted and those whose baptism and confirmation were valid. With the Apostles, consequently, the Macedonians, Novatians (Conc. Nicene, I, can. ix; Nicene, II, can. ii), Sabelians, Apollinarists, and others, who were to be received by the anointing with chrism on the forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, and ears. Some identify this ceremony of the laying on of hands with the rite used by said sect, and not merely an imposition of hands unto penance. A similar discussion prevails in regard to the anointing with chrism.

I. Imposition of Hands.—The imposition of hands, as a sign that due penance had been done, and in token of reconciliation (Pope Vigilius, P. L., CXX, 1076), was prescribed first for those who had been baptized in the Church and who had later fallen into heresy. St. Cyprian in a letter to Quintus (epist. lxvi, in P. L., IV, 408-411) is witness of this practice, as is also St. Augustine (De baptismo contra Donatistas, lib. III, c. xi, in P. L., XLI, 208). This rite was also consecrated by Pope Sixtus III in the year 432. Thus the Church has not only been baptized in heresy. Regarding Pope Eusebius (A. D. 309 or 310) we read in the Liber Pontificalis (edit. Duchesne, I, 167): “Hic hereticos inventit in Urbe Romana, quos ad manum impositionis [sic] reconciliavit.” The same work (I, 216) declares of Pope Siricius (A. D. 384-399): “Hic constituit hereticorum sub manum impositionis reconciliati, presente cuncta ecclesii.” (This latter was doubtless copied from the first chapter of the decretales of Pope Siricius, writing to Himerius, Bishop of Tarsagena in Spain (P. L., XIII, 1133, 1134; Duchesne, Liber Pontif., I, 192, 193).) Pope St. Stephen declares this rite to be sufficient (see St. Cyprian, Epist. lxxiv, in P. L., IV, 412, 413; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., VII, iii, in P. G., XX, 641). The first Council of Arles (A. D. 314), can. viii [Labbe, Concilia (Paris, 1861), I, 1428, 1429; P. L., CXX, 370] inculcates the same law. (See also Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., c. ii; Proc. clxxvi, c. ii; Epist. clxxvii, Inquis. 18; P. L., IV.)

II. Unction.—The unction alone or together with the imposition of hands was also in vogue. The Council of Laodicea (A. D. 373) in canon vii (Labbe, Concilia, I, 1497) confirms this usage in the abjuration of Novatians, Photiniates, and Quattordecimians. The Council of Tyre (A. D. 431) in canon xvii (Labbe, IV, 1013) extends the discipline to adherents of Bonosius, adversaries of the virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Bonosianos...cum chrismate et manu impositione in Ecclesia recipi sufficient). The Council of Ephesus (A. D. 431) in canon xvi (Labbe, IV, 178), allows the same rite (Presbyter, clxvii, c. ii; Laus, 86; Butler, in Dict. of Christ. Antiq., London, 1881; Martene et Durand, De antiquis Ecclesiis Ritus, II, lib. CXI, c. vii; Ferrabino, Prompta Bibliotheca, 12 vol.)

Abner, a son of Ner, a cousin of Saul, and commander-in-chief of Saul’s army (I K. xiv, 50; xvii, 55; xxvi, 7, 14). After Saul with three of his sons had fallen at Mount Gilboa, Abner made Ishobeth, the fourth son of Saul, king over the whole land of Israel excepting Judah, which adhered to David. For seven years and a half Abner fought for the throne of Ishobeth. After his defeat near Gabaon, he was hostilely pursued by Asaël, brother of Joab, who was David’s commander-in-chief, and in self-defence he reluctantly slew his enemy (II K. ii, 12 sq.). This embittered the hostility between the two factions, since Joab considered himself the avenger of his brother Asaël. Abner now married Repha, a concubine of Saul, and thus incurred the suspicion of aspiring to the throne. Ishobeth demonstrated with the warrior, and the latter became so angry that he made advances to David. David at first restored to him his wife Michol, daughter of Saul, who had been given to Phaltiel. Abner complied with this condition, and came to a full understanding with David.

After his departure Joab, David’s commander-in-chief, sent for him, and killed him at the city gate. David bewailed Abner, made Joab walk in mourning, Abomination of Desolation. The.—The importance of this Scriptural expression is chiefly derived from the fact that in St. Matthew, xxiv, 15, and St. Mark, xii, 14, the appearance of “the abomination of desolation standing in the Holy Place” (Matt.), or where “it ought not” (Mark), is given by Our Lord to His disciples as the signal for their flight from Judea, at the time of the approaching ruin of Jerusalem (Mark, xx, 20). The expression was not sufficiently developed to convey to the originally Hebrew of the book of Daniel; for our first Evangelist distinctly says that “the abomination of desolation” he has in view “was spoken of by Daniel the prophet,” and further, the expression he makes use of, in common with St. Mark, is simply the Greek phrase whereby the Septuagint translators rendered literally the Hebrew words shaghqoc, shâdmém found in Daniel, xii; ix, 27; xi, 31. Unfortunately, despite all their efforts to explain these Hebrew Biblical set phrases, many scholars still at variance anent their precise meaning. While most commentators regard the first “shaghqoc,” usually rendered by “abomination,” as designating anything (statue, altar, etc.) that pertains to idolatrous worship, others take it to be a contemptuous designation of a heathen god or idol. Again, while most commentators consider the second “shâmâmâ” by the abstract word “desolation,” others treat it as a concrete form referring to a person, “a ravager,” or even as a participial noun meaning “that maketh desolate.” The most recent interpretation which has been suggested of these Hebrew words is to the following effect: The phrase “the abomination of desolation” may be rendered by the Hebrew expression b’dil shâmâdyim (Baal of heaven), a title found in Phoenician and Aramaic inscriptions, and the Semitic equivalent of the Greek Zeus, Jupiter, but modified in Daniel through Jewish aversion for the name of a Pagan deity. While thus disagreeing as to the precise sense of the Hebrew phrase usually rendered by “the abomination of desolation,” Christian scholars are practically at one with regard to its general meaning. They commonly admit, and indeed rightly, that the Hebrew expression must needs be understood of some idolatrous emblem, the setting up of which would entail the ultimate desolation of the Temple of Jerusalem (I Mach., i, 57; iv, 38). And with this general meaning in view, they proceed to determine the historical event between Our Lord’s prediction and the ruin of the Temple (A. D. 70), which should be regarded as “the abomination of desolation” spoken of in St. Matthew, xxiv, 15, and St. Mark, xii, 14. But here they are again divided. Many scholars have thought, and still think, that the introduction of the Roman standards into the Holy Land, and more particularly into the Holy City, shortly before the destruction of the Temple, is the event foretold by Our Lord to His disciples as the signal for their flight from Jerusalem. But it is true that the standards were worshipped by the Roman soldiers and abhorred by the Jews as the emblem of Roman idolatry. Yet they can hardly be considered as “the abomination of desolation” referred to in St. Matthew, xxiv, 15. The Evangelist says that “the abomination of desolation” stands in the original tongue whereby is naturally meant the Temple (see also Daniel, ix, 27, where the Vulgate reads: “there shall be in the Temple the abomination of the desolation”). And the Roman standards were actually introduced into the Temple only after it had been entered by Titus a little too late to serve as a warning for the Christians of Judea. Other scholars are of the mind that the desecration of the Temple by the Zealots who seized it and made it their stronghold shortly before Jerusalem was invested by Titus, is the event foretold by Our Lord. But this view is commonly rejected for the simple reason that “the abomination of desolation” spoken of by Daniel and referred to in St. Matthew’s Gospels, while certainly something connected with idolatrous worship, otherwise interprets Our Lord’s warning to His disciples in the light of the history of Caligula’s attempt to have his own statue set up and worshipped in the Temple of Jerusalem. The following are the principal facts of that history. About A. D. 40, Caligula issued a peremptory decree ordering the erection and worship of his statue in the Temple of God. He also appointed Petronius to the government of Syria, bidding him carry out that decree even at the cost of a war against the rebellious Jews. Whereupon the Jews in tens of thousands protested to the governor that they were willing to be slaughtered rather than to be condemned to witness that idolatrous profanation of their holy Temple. Soon afterwards Petronius asked Caligula to revoke his order, and Agrippa I, who then lived at Rome, prevailed upon the Emperor not to enforce his decree. It seems, however, that these measures were still at variance with Our Lord’s prediction, and that but for his untimely death (A. D. 41) he would have had his statue set up in Jerusalem (E. Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ, I Div., II, 99-105; tr.). In view of these facts it is affirmed by many scholars that early Christians could easily regard the forthcoming creation of Caligula’s statue in the Temple as the act of idolatrous Abomination which, according to the prophet Daniel, ix, 27, portended the ruin of the House of God, and therefore see in it the actual sign given by Christ for their flight from Judea. This last interpretation of the phrase “the abomination of desolation” serves the more particularly the rigorists. Yet it seems preferable to the others that have been set forth by commentators at large.

F. E. GIGOT.

Abortion (from the Latin word abortir, “to perish”) may be briefly defined as “the loss of a fetal life.” In it the fetus dies while yet within the generative organs of the mother, or it is ejected or extricated from the mother, before that viable life is sufficiently developed to continue its life by itself. The term abortion is also applied, though less properly, to cases in which the child is become viable, but does not survive parturition. In this article we shall take the word in its widest meaning, and treat of abortion as occurring at any time between conception and safe delivery. The word miscarriage is taken in the same wide sense. Yet medical writers often use these words in special meanings, restricting abortion to the time when the embryo has not yet assumed specific features, that is, in the human embryo, before the third month of gestation; miscarriage occurs later, but before it is tried to be realised as a living child before the completed term of nine months is styled premature birth. Viability may exist in the seventh month of gestation, but it cannot safely be presumed before the eighth month. If the child survives its premature birth, there is no abortion; for this word always denotes the loss of fetal life. It was long debated among the learned at what period of gestation the human embryo begins to be animated by the rational, spiritual soul, which elevates man above all other species of the animal creation, and survives the body to live forever. The keenest mind among the ancient philosophers, Aristotle, had conjectured that the fetus was not endowed as a conception with a principle of only vegetative life, which was exchanged after a few days for an animal soul, and was not succeeded by a rational soul till later. They were thought to be good for males, and the eighteenth for a female, child. The author of his great name and the want of definite knowledge to the contrary caused this theory to be generally accepted up to recent times. Yet, as early as the fourth century of the Christian era, St. Gregory of Nyssa has advanced the view which modern science has confirmed almost to a certainty, namely, that the same life principle quickens the organism from the first moment of its individual existence until its death (Eschbach, Disp. Phys., Disp., iii). Now it is at the very time of conception, or fecundation, that the embryo begins to live a distinct, independent and separate life. The life destructed by the organ when it has been built up, but the vital principle builds up the organism of its own body. In virtue of the one eternal act of the Will of the Creator, who is of course ever present at every portion of His creation, the soul of every new human being begins to exist when the cell which generation has provided is ready to receive it as its principle of life. In the normal course of nature the living embryo carries on its work of self-evolution within the maternal womb, deriving its nourishment from the placenta through the vital cord, till, on reaching maturity, it is prepared for the continuance of the individual existence as a separate self of its own. This is a vital proof that the vital principle constitutes the separate life. Abortion is a fatal termination of this process. It may result from various causes, which may be classed under two heads, accidental and intentional.

Accidental causes may be of many different kinds. Sometimes the embryo, instead of developing in the uterus, remains in one of the ovaries, or gets lodged in one of the Fallopian tubes, or is precipitated into the abdomen, resulting, in any of these cases, in an ectopic, or extra-uterine gestation. This almost invariably brings on the death of the fetus, and is besides often fraught with serious danger to the mother. Even if an ectopic child should live to maturity, it cannot be born by the natural channel; but, once it has become viable, it may be saved by a surgical operation. Most commonly the embryo develops in the uterus; but there, too, it is exposed to a great variety of dangers, especially during the first months of life. Mortality here may arise from the action of various diseases or from the mother to contract diseases fatal to her offspring. Heredity, malformation, syphilis, advanced age, excessive weakness, effects of former sicknesses, etc., may be causes of danger; even the climate may exercise an unfavorable influence. More immediate causes of abortion may be found in cruel treatment of the mother by her husband, or in starvation, or any kind of hardship. Her own indiscretion is often to blame; as when she undertakes excessive labours, lifts heavy weights, jumps or dances, uses intoxicating drinks too freely, or indulges in violent fits of anger, or of any other passion; also when in wagons too rough, or travels by railways which are rudely built or unskillfully managed, or works vigorously treading the pedals of a sewing machine. Intense grief or sudden joy, anything in fact that causes a severe shock to the bodily frame or the nervous system of the mother, may be fatal to the child in her womb. On the part of the father, syphilis, alcoholism, old age, and physical weakness may act unfavourably on the offspring at any time of its existence. The frequency of accidental abortions is no doubt very great; it must differ considerably according to the hardiness or weakness of various races of men, and many other circumstances, but the proportion between successful and unsuccessful conceptions is beyond the calculation of the learned.

Intentional abortions are distinguished by medical writers into two classes. When they are brought about for social reasons, physicians style them criminal; and they rightly condemn them under any circumstances whatever. They are, in fact, an abomination in the sight of God and an affront to the doctors and midwives concerned in them. They usually strive to prevent such crimes by all the means in their power. “Often, very often,” says Dr. Hodge, of the University of Pennsylvania, “must all the eloquence and all the authority of the practitioners be employed; and often, as it were, grasp the conscience of his weak and erring patient, and let her know, in language not to be misunderstood, that she is responsible to the Creator for the life of the being within her” (Wharton and Stille’s Med. Jurispr., Vol. on Abortion, 11). The name of obstetrical abortion is given by physicians to those cases in which the life of the child is destroyed before the time when it might be considered legitimate. Whether this practice is ever morally lawful we shall consider below. Of late years the leaders of the medical profession have employed commendable industry in lessening the frequency of its performance. Aside from moral considerations, they count it a gross blunder against the science of obstetrics to sacrifice the life of the child unless it be the only means to save the mother’s life. Their efforts have met with gratifying success. The most enlightened among them never perform or permit abortion in any case whatever. At the sixty-first Annual Meeting of the British Medical Association (1889), which counts about fifteen thousand practitioners, Dr. James Murphy said in his presidential address before the section of Obstetric Medicine and Gynecology: “It is not for me to decide whether the modern Cesanarean section, Porro’s operation, symphysiotomy, ischiopubolotomy, or other operation is the safest or most suitable; nor yet is there sufficient material for this question to be decided. But when such splendid and successful results have been achieved by Porro, Leopold, Saenger, and by our own Murdock Cameron, I say it deliberately, and with whatever authority I possess, and I urge it with all the force I can muster, that we are not now justified in destroying a living child” (Brit. Med. Journ., 26 August, 1893). While the medical profession is thus striving, for scientific reasons, to diminish the practice of abortion, it is evident that the determination of what is right or wrong in human life belongs to the supreme power of the Creator, teaching of religious authority. Both of these declare the Divine law, “Thou shalt not kill”. The embryonic child, as seen above, has a human soul; and therefore is a man from the time of its conception; therefore it has an equal right to its life with its mother; therefore neither the mother, nor medical practitioner, nor any human being whatever can lawfully take that life away. The State cannot give such right to the physician; for it has not itself the right to put an innocent person to death. No matter how desirable it might seem to be at times to save the life of the mother, common sense teaches, and common sense is, as a maxim, that evil can never be done that good may come of it”; or, which is the same thing, that “a good end cannot justify a bad means”. Now it is an evil means to destroy the life of an innocent child. The plea cannot be made that the child is an unjust aggressor. It is simply where nature and its own parents have put it. Therefore, Natural Law forbids any attempt at destroying fetal life.

The teachings of the Catholic Church admit of no doubt on the subject. Such moral questions, when they are submitted, are decided by the Tribunal of the Holy Office. Now this authority decreed, 28 August 1584, and again in 1869, that abortion cannot be safely taught in Catholic schools that it is lawful to perform ... any surgical operation which is directly destructive of the life of the fetus or the mother”. Abortion was condemned by name, 24 July, 1895, in answer to the question whether, when the mother is in immediate danger of death, and there is no other hope of saving her life, a physician can with a safe conscience cause abortion, not by destroying the child in the womb (which was explicitly condemned in the former decree), but by giving it a chance to be born alive, though not being yet viable, it would soon expire. The answer was that it was impossible. After the previous deci-disions had been given, some moralists thought they saw reasons to doubt whether an exception might not be allowed in the case of ectopic gestations. Therefore the question was submitted: "Is it ever allowed to extract from the body of the mother ectopic or conjoined by the sixth or seven weeks after conception?" The answer given, 20 March, 1902, was: "No; according to the decree of 4 May, 1898; according to which, as far as possible, earnest and opportune provision is made to be made to safeguard the life of the child and of the mother. As to the time, the questioner remembers that no acceleration of birth is licit unless it be done at a danger of life, and in ways in which, according to the usual course of things, the life of the mother and the child be provided for." Ethics, then, and the Church agrees in teaching that no action is lawful which directly destroys fetal life. It is also clear that extracting the fetus before it is able (i.e., the sixth week) is restituting fetal life as directly as it would be killing a grown man directly to plunge him into a medium in which he cannot live, and hold him there till he expires. But if medical treatment or surgical operation, necessary to save a mother's life, is applied to her organism (though the child's death would, or at least might, follow as a regretted but unavoidable consequence), it should not be maintained that the fetal life is thereby directly attacked. Moralists agree that we are not always prohibited from doing what is lawful in itself, though evil consequences may follow which we do not desire. The good effects of our acts are then directly intended, and the regretted evil consequences are reluctantly permitted to follow because we cannot avoid them. The evil thus permitted is said to be indirectly intended. It is not imputed to us, provided four conditions are verified, namely: (a) That we do not wish the evil effects, but make all efforts to avoid them; (b) That the immediate effect be good in itself; (c) That the evil is not made a means to obtain the good effect; (d) That this would be to do evil that good might come of it—a procedure never allowed; (d) That the good effect be as important as the evil effect. All four conditions must be verified. The contrary holds on a woman with child. The death of the child is not intended, and every reasonable precaution is taken to save its life; the immediate effect intended, the mother's life, is good; no harm is done to the child in order to save the mother; the saving of the mother's life is in itself as good as the saving of the child's life. Of course provision must be made for the child's spiritual as well as for its physical life, and if by the treatment or operation in question the child were to be deprived of Baptism, which it could receive if the operation were not performed, then the evil would be greater than the good consequences of the operation. In this case the operation could not lawfully be performed. Whenever it is possible to baptize an embryonic child before it expires, Christian charity requires that it be done, either before or after delivery; and it may be done by any one, even though he be not a Christian. Hence the omission of criminal abortions antecedent to the period of decadent morality in classic Greece. The crime seems not to have prevailed in the time of Moses, either among the Jews or among the surrounding nations; else that great legislator would certainly have spoken in condemnation of it. No mention of it occurs in the long enumeration of sins laid as the charge of the Catholic Church. In fact reference is made in the books attributed to Hippocrates, who required physicians to bind themselves by oath not to give to women drinks fatal to the child in the womb. At that period voluptuousness had corrupted the morals of the Greeks, and Aesop was teaching ways of procuring abortion. In later times the laws became still more depraved, and bolder in such practices; for Ovid wrote concerning the upper classes of his countrymen: "Nunc uterum vitati quis vult formosa videri, Raraque, in hoc sevo, est qui velit esse paren." Three centuries later we meet with the first record of a State statute by the sixth of the second century B.C., by which the penalty for such was death. Exile was decreed against mothers guilty of it; while those who administered the potion to procure it were, if nobles, sent to certain islands, if plebeians, condemned to work in the metal mines. Still the Romans in their legislation appear to have aimed at punishing the wrong done by abortion to the father or the mother, rather than the wrong done to the unborn child (Döllinger, "Heathenism and Judaism"). The early Christians are the first on record as having pronounced abortion to be the murder of human beings; for their public apologists, Athenagoras, Tertullian, and Minutius Felix (Eschbach, "Disp. Phys.", vi. 19, No. 45, iii. 14), in response to pagan slanderers, said that it is as shameful to destroy man in the womb as slain, and its flesh eaten, by the guests at the Agape, appealed to their laws as forbidding, all manner of murder, even that of children in the womb. The Fathers of the Church unanimously maintained the same doctrine. In the fourth century the Council of Eliphas decreed that Holy Communion should be refused all the rest of her life, even on her deathbed, to an adulteress who had procured the abortion of her child. The Sixth Ecumenical Council determined, for the whole Church, that anyone who procured abortion should bear all the punishments inflicted on murderers. In all these teachings and enactments no distinction is made between the earlier and the later stages of gestation. For, though the opinion of Aristotle, or similar speculations, regarding the time when the rational soul is infused into the embryo, were practically accepted for many centuries, still it was always held by the Church that he who had it was a man; and as a man he was responsible for destroying a human life. The great prevalence of criminal abortion ceased wherever Christianity became established. It was a crime of comparatively rare occurrence in the Middle Ages. Like its companion crime, divorce, it did not again become a danger to society until the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and in places influenced by Catholic principles, what medical writers call "obstetric" abortion, as distinct from "criminal" (though both are indefensible on moral grounds), has always been a common practice. It was usually performed by means of craniotomy, or the crushing of the child's head to save the mother's life. Hippocrates, Celsus, Avicenna, and the Arabian school generally invented a number of vulnerating instruments to enter and crush the child's cranium. In more recent times, with the advance of the obstetric science, more conservative measures have gradually prevailed. By use of the forceps, by skill acquired in version, by procuring premature labour, and especially by asepsis in the Cesarean section and other equivalent operations, medical science has found much improved means of saving both the child and its mother. Of late years such progress has been made in this matter, that craniotomy is now an out-of-date and almost obsolete practice. But abortion proper, before the fetus is viable, is still often employed, especially in ectopic gestation; and there are many men and women who may be called professional abortionists. In former times civil laws against all kinds of abortion were very severe among Christian nations. Among the Visigoths, the penalty was death, or privation of sight, for the mother who allowed it and for the father who consented to it, and death for the abortionist. In Spain, the woman guilty of it was buried alive. An edict of the French King Henry II, in 1555, renewed by Louis XIV in 1708, inflicted capital punishment for adultery and abortion combined. To-day the French law is much less severe. It punishes the abortionist with imprisonment, and physicians, surgeons, and pharmacists, who prescribe or advise, with the penalty of forced labour. For England, Blackstone stated the law as follows: "Life is the immediate gift of God, a right inherent by nature in every individual; and it begins, in contemplation of law, as soon as an infant is able to stir in its mother's womb. For if a woman is quick with child, and by a potion, or otherwise, killet h in her womb, or if any one beat her, whereby the child dieth, and she is delivered of a dead child; this, though not murder, was by the ancient law homicide or manslaughter. But the modern law does not look upon this offence in so atrocious a light, but merely as a misdeed of the same kind as if a miscarriage and premature delivery. Abortion may be due to pathological changes in the ovum, the uterus, or its adnexa—one or both; or to the physical or nervous condition of the woman; to diseases either inherited or acquired (syphilis, tuberculosis, rheumatism); to any infectious, contagious, or inflammatory disease; to shock, injury, or accident. It may be knowingly, willingly, and criminally by the pregnant person herself, or by someone else, with the aid of drugs, or instruments, or both.

Naturally, therefore, the physical effects of abortion will depend in direct ratio on the causation thereof, and the comparative malignity or benignity of such causation. In any case, abortion is fraught with serious consequences, direct and indirect; and is a sad miscarriage of nature’s plan, greatly to be deplored, and earnestly, stranuously, and conscientiously to be avoided. Of course, when brought about with criminal intent, abortion is nothing less than murder in the first degree; and if the law of the land does not discover and punish the criminal, the higher law of the God of Nature, and of Nature’s inexorable reprimands for interference with, or destruction of her beneficent designs, will sooner or later come into play. When abortion is due to pathological causes it is usually preceded by the death of the fetus; so that the causes of abortion are really the causes producing the death of the fetus. The causes may be grouped as follows: direct violence (blows, falls, kicks, etc.); diseases of the fetal appendages (cord, amnion, chorion, placenta); hemorrhage and other diseases of the decidua before the complete formation of the placenta; febrile affections, excessive anaemia, starvation, corpulency, atrophy or hypertrophy of the uterine mucous membrane, hyperemia of the gravid uterus, excessive heat or cold, diseases of the heart, liver, or lungs, and, lastly, any other cause whatever which in one way or another produces miscarriages, uterine anti-displacements, and the like. The abortion may be complete or partial. If complete, the danger is principally from shock and hemorrhage; if incomplete and any débris remains, there is danger of septicaemia, uremia, endometritis, perimetritis, diseases of the tubes, ovaries, bladder, cervix uteri, vaginal canal, and rectum; together with catarrhal discharges from one or more of these parts, displacements, impoverished blood supply, various neuroses, and usually a tardy and expensive convalescence.

The retention of the dead fetus is not always so dangerous. Even if decomposition or putrefaction occur, Nature frequently—possibly more often than we are willing to give her credit for—eliminates the contre la fréquente communion et publié sous le nom du sieur Arnauld" (Paris, 1644). The following year he published a rejoinder to the reply to this. Arnauld affected great contempt for him, and declared that his works were composed by "all contemptible persons". Raconis also wrote against the heresy of "two heads of the Church [Sts. Peter and Paul]," formulated by Martin de Barros. The bishop's "Primauté et Souveraineté singulière de saint Pierre" (1645) roused the wrath of his opponents.

Towards the close of 1645, the report was circulated in Paris that he had written to the bishops in France, and the dangerous teachings in the "Fréquente Communion," and telling the Pope that some French bishops tolerated and approved of these impieties. The Bishop of Grasse informed a general assembly of the clergy of this fact. This aroused their anxiety, all the more since some of them had recommended Arnauld's work. They entered a complaint with the Nuncio, and then compelled Raconis to say whether he had written the letter or not. Although he denied having done so, they drew up a common protestation against the accusations of those who said they were the objects and sent it to Innocent X.

Abrasbanel (Abravanel, Abarbanel), Don Isaac, Jewish statesman, apologist and exegete, b. in Lisbon, 1437; d. in Venice, 1508. Born into an Italian family, he was carefully instructed in the Talmudic and Rabbinic literatures, and mastered the various branches of secular learning. His keen intellect and, above all, a great business ability drew to him the attention of Alfonso V of Portugal, who made him his treasurer, a position that he held until 1481. The favour shown by a Catholic prince to a Jew shocked the public opinion of those times, and under John II Abarbanel was accused of conspiring with the Duke of Braganza, and barely saved his life by fleeing to Castile, 1485. Soon afterwards he entered the service of Ferdinand and Isabella, 1494-92. After the fall of Granada, he shared the fate of his race, and was banished from Spain in 1492. He repaired to Naples and, owing to various vicissitudes, went successively to Messina, Corfu, Monopoli, and finally to Venice. Most of Abarbanel's works date from the last years of his life, when he shared the fortunes of his misfortunes, he found more leisure for collecting and ordering his thoughts. Abarbanel knew Plato and Aristotle, and is often ranked among the Jewish philosophers. His philosophy, however, was intended by him simply as a means of defending his religious convictions. He can hardly be said to have written any work profoundly philosophical; with the possible exception of a juvenile treatise on the form of the natural elements; his views in this respect must be gathered from his various theological and exegetical treatises. As a theologian and apologist, Abarbanel shows himself a champion of the most refined Jewish orthodoxy, and does not hesitate to oppose even Maimonides when the latter seems to depart from the traditional belief. In the field of Biblical exegesis, Abarbanel has the merit of having anticipated much of what has been advanced as new by modern investigators, and of having considered systematically not only the letter of the sacred text, which is the persons of its authors, their historical and geographical surroundings. Each commentary is furnished with a preface in which these preliminary questions are treated. His familiarity with Christian authors, his acquaintance with court life and customs, a keen sense of his misfortunes, joined with a very extensive knowledge of the history of his age, made him eminently suitable for the task of a Biblical "interpreter."

We have from him a commentary on Deuteronomy;
on the first four books of the Pentateuch; on the earlier and on the later Prophets. They have been warmly lauded both by Jews and by Christians, have passed through several editions, and many of them have been, in whole or in part, translated into Latin. Of his other works we may mention "The Crown of the Ancients," "The Pinacle of Faith," "The Sources of Salvation," in the form of a commentary on Daniel, "The Salvation of His Anointed," "The Herald of Salvation," in which are collected and explained all the Messianic texts. His works, the titles of which are here rendered in English, were written in a style refined, but occasionally diffuse modern Hebrew.

ABRAHAM.—The original form of the name, Abram, is apparently the Assyrian Ab-ramu. It is doubtful if the usual meaning attached to that word, "lofty father," is in the Hebrew. The personal name, Abram, in Genesis, xvii, 5, is popular word play, and the real meaning is unknown. The Assyriologist, Hommel, suggests that in the Minnean dialect it is written for long a. Perhaps here we may have the real derivation of the word, and Abraham may be only a dialectical form of Abram. The story of Abraham is contained in the Book of Genesis, xi, 26; xxv, 18. We shall first give a brief outline of the Patriarch's life, as told in that portion of Genesis, then we shall in succession discuss the subject of Abraham from the view-points of the Old Testament, New Testament, and archaeology.

Abram, Abraham, Nahor, and Sara. Abram married Sara. Thare took Abram and his wife, Sara, and Lot, the son of Aran, who was dead, and leaving Ur of the Chaldees, came to Haran and dwelt there till he died. Then, at the call of God, Abram, with his wife, Sara, and Lot, and the rest of his belongings went into the Land of Chanaan, amongst other places to Sichem and Bethel, where he built altars to the Lord. A famine breaking out in Chanaan, Abram journeyed southward to Egypt, and when he had entered the land, fearing that he would be killed on account of his wife, Sara, he bade her say she was his sister. Abraham has his second child by Sarah to the Pharaoh, and he took her into his harem, and honoured Abram on account of her. Later, however, finding out that she was Abram's wife, he sent her away unharmcd, and, upbraiding Abram for what he had done, he dismissed him from Egypt. From Egypt Abram came with Lot towards Bethel, and there, finding that their herds and flocks had grown to be very large, he proposed that they should separate and go their own ways. So Lot chose the country about the Jordan, whilst Abram dwelt in Chanaan, and came and dwelt in the vale of Mambre in Hebron. Nahor, according to a novel of the book of Genesis and Comorrha and other kings from Chedirshashaon, King of Elam, after they had served him twelve years, he in the fourteenth year made war upon them with his allies, Thadai king of nations, Amsraphel King of Senaar, and Arioosh King of Pontus. The King of Elam was victorious, and had already reached Dan, when a battle took place between Dan and Beth-sorah, where was overthrown by Abram. With 318 men the patriarch surprised, attacks, and defeats him; he takes Lot and the spoil, and returns to triumph. On his way home, he is met by Melchisedech, king of Salem, who brings forth bread and wine, and blesses him. Abram gives him the tenth, he has, but for himself he reserves nothing. God promises Abram that his seed shall be as the stars of heaven, and he shall possess the land of Chanaan. But Abram does not see how this is to be, for he has already grown old. Then the promise is guaranteed by a sacrifice between God and Abram and by a vision and a supernatural intervention in the night. Sarai, who was far advanced in years and had given up the idea of bearing children, persuaded Abram to take to himself her hand-maid, Agar. He does so, and Agar bearing with child despises the barren Sarai. For this Sarai afflicts her so that she flies into the desert, but is persuaded to return by an angel who comforts her with the promise of the son she is about to bear. She returns and brings forth Ismael. Thirteen years later God appears to Abram and promises him a son by Sarai, and that his posterity will be a great nation. As a sign, he changes Abram's name to Abraham, Sarai's to Sarah, and ordains the rite of circumcision. One day later, as Abraham is sitting by his tent, in the vale of Mambre, Jehovah with two angels appears to him in human form. He shows them hospitality. Then again the promise of a son named Isaac is renewed to Abraham. The aged Sara hears incredulously and laughs. Abraham is then told of the impending destruction of Sodom. He prays to Jehovah that he may obtain from Jehovah the promise that he will not destroy them if he finds ten just men therein. Then follows a description of the destruction of the two cities and the escape of Lot. Next morning Abraham, looking from his tent towards Sodom, sees the smoke of its destruction ascending to heaven. After this, Abraham moves south to Gerar, and again fearing for his life says of his wife, "she is my sister." The king of Gerar, Abimelech, sends and takes her, but learning in a dream that she is Abraham's wife, he restores her to him untouched, and rebukes him for giving him gifts. In her old age an old son, Isaac, to Abraham, and he is circumcised on the eighth day. Whilst he is still young, Sara is jealous, seeing Ismael playing with the child Isaac, so she procures that Agar and her son shall be cast out. Then Agar would have allowed Ismael to perish in the wilderness, had not an angel encouraged her by telling her of the boy's future. Abraham is next related to have had a dispute with Abimelech over a well at Bersabee, which ends in a covenant being made between them. It was after this that the great trial of the faith of Abraham takes place. God commands him to sacrifice his only son Isaac. When Isaac was bound and laid on the altar, Jehovah appeared to him and said, "Abraham, Abraham!" and commanding Abraham to lift up his hand, to strike the altar, he, the angel of Jehovah, took him by the right hand and said, "Lift not your hand against the lad, nor do anything to him; for now I know that you fear God, because you have not withheld your son, even your only son, from Me.

VIEW-POINT OF OLD TESTAMENT.—Abraham may be looked upon as the starting-point or source of Old Testament religion. So that from the days of Abraham men were wont to speak of God as the God of Abraham, whilst we do not find Abraham referring in the same way to God before him, and the bombast of the future, but Abraham's servant speaking of "the God of my father Abraham" (Gen. xxiv, 12). Jehovah, in an appanage to Isaac, speaks of himself as the God of Abraham (Gen. xxvi, 24), and to Jacob he is "the God of my father Abraham" (Gen. xxxi, 42). So, too, showing that the religion of Israel does not begin with Moses, God says to Moses: "I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham" etc. (Ex. iii, 6). The same expression is used in the Psalms (xvi, 10) and is common in the Old Testament. Abraham is thus selected as the first beginning or source of the religion of the children of Israel, and his connection with Jehovah, because of his faith, trust, and obedience to and in Jehovah and because of Jehovah's promises to him and to his seed. So, in Genesis, xv, 6, it is said: "Abraham believed God, and it was reputed to him unto justice." This trust in God, shown by him, will he left Isaac and journeyed with his family into the unknown country of Chanaan. It was shown principally when he was willing to sacrifice his only son Isaac, in obedience to a command from God. It was on that occasion that God said: "Because thou hast spared my son, thou hast done no thing contrary to my command." (Gen., xxii, 16, 17). It is to this and other promises made so often by God to Israel that the writers of the Old Testament refer over and over again in confirmation of their privileges as the chosen people. These promises, which are recorded to have been made no less than eight times, are that God will give the land of Chanaan and be with his seed (Gen., xvi, 7); that his seed shall increase and multiply as the stars of heaven; that he himself shall be blessed and that in him "all the kindred of the earth shall be blessed" (xxii, 3). Accordingly the traditional view of the life of Abraham, as recorded in Genesis, is that it is his life in the strict sense of the term. Von Hummelauer, S.J., in his commentary on Genesis in the "Cursus Scripturae Sacrae" (30), in answer to the question from what author the section on Abraham first proceeded, replies, from Abraham as the first source. Indeed he even says that it is all in one style, as a proof of its origin, and that the passage, xxv, 5-11, concerning the goods, death, and burial of Abraham comes from Isaac. It must, however, be added that it is doubtful if Father von Hummelauer still adheres to these views, written before 1895, since he has much modified his position in the volume on Deuteronomy.

Quite a different view on the section of Genesis treating of Abraham, and indeed of the whole of Genesis, is taken by modern critical scholars. They almost unanimously hold that the narrative of the patriarch's life is composed practically in its entirety of three writings or writers called respectively the Jahvist, the Elohist, and the Priestly. The Priestly source is attested by the close noted by the letters J, E, and P. J and E consisted of collections of stories relating to the patriarch, some of older, some of later, origin. Perhaps the stories of J show a greater antiquity than those of E. Still the two authors are very much alike, and it is not always easy to distinguish one from the other in the combined narrative of J and E. From what we can observe, neither the Jahvist nor the Elohist was a personal author. Both are rather schools, and represent the collections of many years. Both collections were closed before the time of the prophets; J some time in the eighth century b. c., and E, according to the learned of the eighth century, the former probably in the South Kingdom, the latter in the North. Then towards the end of the kingdom, perhaps owing to the inconvenience of having two rival accounts of the stories of the patriarchs etc. going about, a redactor RJE (?) combined the two collections in one, keeping as much as possible of his sources, making as few changes as possible so as to fit them into one another, and perhaps mostly following J in the account of Abraham. Then in the fifth century a writer who evidently belonged to the sacerdotal caste wrote down again an account of the patriarchs. This is the Priestly one of the two, and the point of view. He attached great importance to clearness and exactness; his accounts of things are often cast into the shape of formulas (cf. Genesis, i); he is very particular about genealogies, also as to chronological notes. The vividness and colour of the older patriarchal narratives, J and E, are wanting in the later one, which in the main is as formal as a legal document. It has dignity and even grandeur, as is the case in the first chapter of Genesis. Finally, the moral to be drawn from the various events narrated is more clearly set forth in this third writing, and, according to the critics, the moral standpoint is that of the fifth century B. C. Lastly, after the book of Genesis, this last history, P, was worked up into one with the already combined narrative J.E. by a second redactor R.JEP, the result being the present history of Abraham, and indeed the present book of Genesis; though in all probability insertions were made at even a later date.

VIEW-POINT OF NEW TESTAMENT. — The generation of Jesus Christ is traced back to Abraham by St. Matthew, and though in Our Lord's genealogy, according to St. Luke, he is shown to be descended according to the flesh not only from Abraham but also from Adam, still St. Luke shows his appreciation of the importance of the Jews in the history of mankind, in attributing all the blessings of God on Israel to the promises made to Abraham. He does in the Magnificat, iii, 55, and in the Benedictus, iii, 73. Moreover, as the New Testament traces the descent of Jesus Christ from Abraham, so does it do of all the apostles; though St. Paul at the beginning of his epistle to the Romans accompanied with a note of warning, lest the Jews should imagine that they are entitled to place confidence in the fact of their carnal descent from Abraham, without anything further. Thus (Luke, iii, 8) John the Baptist says: "Do not begin to say: We have Abraham for our father, for I say to you God is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham." In Luke, xix, 9, our Saviour calls the sinner Zacchaeus a son of Abraham, as he likewise calls a woman who had heamed a daughter of Abraham (Luke, xiii, 18); but in these and many similar cases, is it not merely another way of calling them Jews or Israelites, just as at times he refers to the Psalms under the general name of David, without implying that David wrote all the Psalms, and as he calls the Pentateuch the Books of Moses, without pretending to settle the question of the authorship of that work? It is not carnal descent from Abraham to which impotence is attributed to the Jews; rather is it the virtues attributed to Abraham in Genesis. Thus in John, viii, the Jews, to whom Our Lord was speaking, boast (33): "We are the seed of Abraham," and Jesus replies (39): "If ye be the children of Abraham, do the works of Abraham." St. Paul, too, shows that he is a son of Abraham and glories in that fact, as in II Cor., xi, 22, when he exclaims: "They are the seed of Abraham, so am I." And again (Rom., xi, 1): "I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham," and he addresses the Jews of Antioch in Pisidia (Acts, xiii, 29) as "sons of the race of Abraham." But, following the teaching of Jesus Christ, St. Paul does not attach too much importance to carnal descent from Abraham; for he says (Gal., iii, 29): "If you be Christ's, then you are the seed of Abraham," and again (Rom., ix, 6): "All are not Israelites who are of Israel; neither are all they who are the seed of Abraham, children." So, too, we can observe in all the New Testament the importance attached to the promises made to Abraham. In the Acts of the Apostles, iii, 25, St. Peter reminds the Jews of the promise, "in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." So does St. Stephen in his speech before the Council (Acts, vii), and St. Paul in the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb., xi, 10), to show the faith of the ancient patriarchs less highly thought of by the New Testament writers. The passage of Genesis which was most prominently before them.
was xv, 6: "Abraham believed God, and it was repeted to him unto justice." In Romans, iv, St. Paul argues strongly for the supremacy of faith, which he sees justified in Abraham; "if Abraham were justi-ﬁed by works, he hath whereof to glory, but not before God." The same idea is inculcated in the Epistle to the Galatians, iii, where the question is discussed: "Did you receive the spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" St. Paul decides it is by faith, and says: "Therefore they that are of faith shall be justiﬁed with faithul Abraham". It is clear that this language, taken by itself, and apart from the absolute necessity of good works upheld by St. Paul, is liable to mislead and actually has misled many in the history of the Church.
Hence, in order to appreciate to the full the authodrives justiﬁed by St. Paul by St. James. In ii, 17–22, of the Catholic Epistle we read:
"So faith also, if it have not works, is dead in itself. But some man will say: Thou hast faith, and I have works; shew me thy faith without works; and I will shew thee by works my faith. Thou believeth that there is one God. Thou dost well; the devile also believe, and tremble. But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead? Was not Abraham our father justiﬁed by works, and by works faith was made perfect?"

In the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebreans we are led into a long and discussion concerning the eternal priesthood of Jesus Christ. He recalls the words of the 109th psalm more than once, in which it is said: "Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech." He recalls the fact that Melchisedech is etymologically the king of justice and also king of peace, and moreover that he was not only king, but also priest of the Most High God. Then, calling to mind that there is no account of his father, mother, or genealogy, nor any record of his birth, he likens him to Christ, king and priest;
no Levite nor according to the order of Aaron, but a priest forever according to the order of Melchis-dech.

In the Light of Prophan History.—One is inclined to ask, when considering the light which prophane history may shed on the life of Abraham: Is not the life of the patriarch incredible? That question may be, and is, answered in different ways, according to the point of view of the questioner. Should it not be without interest to quote the answer of Professor Driver, an able and representative exponent of moderate critical views: "Do the patriarchal narratives contain intrinsic historical impro-abilities? Or, in other words, is there anything intrinsically improbable in the lives of the several patriarchs, and the vicissitudes through which they severally pass? In considering this question a distinction must be drawn between the different sources of which these narratives are composed. Though particular details in them may be improbable, and though the representation may in parts be coloured by legend, and in other parts, by traditions, in which they were written, it cannot be said that the biographies of the ﬁrst three patriarchs, as told in J and E, are, generally speaking, historically impro-able; the movements and general lives of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are, taken on the whole, credible (Genesis, p. xlv). Such is the moderate view; the advanced attitude is somewhat different. "The view taken by the patient reconstructive criticism of our day is that, not only religiously, but even, in a qualified sense, historically also, the narratives of Abraham have a claim on our attention" (Cheyne, Encyc.
Bibh, 285). Commons now to look at the light thrown by prophane history upon the stories of Abramam's life as given in Genesis, we have, ﬁrst of all, the narratives of ancient historians, as Nicholas of Damascus, Herodotus, Hecateus, and the like. Nicholas of Damascus tells how Abraham, when he left Chaldea, lived for some years in Damascus. In fact in Josephus he is said to have been the fourth king of that country. But then there is no practical doubt that this story is based on the words of Genesis, xiv, 15, in which the town of Damascus is mentioned. As to the great man whom Josephus mentions as spoken of by Berosus, there is nothing to show that that great man was Abraham. In the "Preparation of Eusebius" there are extracts recorded from numerous ancient writers, but no historical value can be attached to them. In fact, as far as ancient historians are concerned, we may say that all we know about Abraham is contained in the book of Genesis.

The much more important and interesting question is the amount of value to be attached to the recent archaeological discoveries of Biblical and other explorers in the East. Archaeologists like Hommel, and more especially Sayce, are disposed to attach very great signiﬁcance to them. They say, in fact, that these discoveries throw a serious element of doubt over many of the conclusions of the histocritics. On the other hand, critics, both advanced as Cheyne and moderate as Driver, do not hold the deductions drawn by these archaeologists from the evidence of the monuments in very high esteem, but regard them as exaggerations. To put the matter more precisely, we have to follow the author Professor Sayce, to enable the reader to see for himself what he thinks (Early Hist. of the Hebrews, 8):
"Cuneiform tablets have been found relating to Chedorlaomor and the other kings of the East mentioned in the 14th chapter of Genesis, while in the Tel-el-Amarna correspondence the king of Jerusalem declares that he had been raised to the throne by the 'arm' of his God, and was therefore, like Melchisedech, a priest-king. But Chedorlaomor and Melchisedech had long ago been banished to mythology, and criticism could not admit that archaeological discovery had restored them to actual history. Writers, accordingly, in complaisant ignorance of the cunei-form texts, told the Assyriologists that their translations and interpretations were alike erroneous."

That passage will make it clear how much the critics and archaeologists are at variance. But no one can deny that Assyriology has thrown some light on the kings of Abraham mentioned in Genesis; indeed, the name of Abraham was known in those ancient times;
for amongst other Canaanitish or Amorite names found in deeds of sale of that period are those of Abi-ramu, or Abram, Jacob-el (Yaqub-il), and Joseph-el (Yasub-il). So, too, of the fourteenth chapter of Genesis, which relates the war of Chedorlaomor and his allies in Palestine, it is not so long ago that the advanced critics relegated it to the region of fable, under the conviction that Babylonians and Elamites at that early date in Palestine and the surrounding country was a gross anachronism. But now Professor Pincher has deciphered certain inscriptions relating to Babylonians of the four kings, Amraphel King of Senaar, Arioch King of Pontus, Chedorlaomor King of the Elamites, and Thadai King of nations, are identified with Ham-murabi King of Babylon, Eri-aku, Kudur-laggha-mar, and Tuduchus, son of Gazer, and which tells of a campaign of these monarchs in Palestine. So that no one can any longer assert that the war spoken of in Genesis, xiv, can only be a late reﬂection of the wars of Sennacherib and others in the times of the kings. From the Tel-el-Amarna tablets we know that Babylonian inﬂuence was predominant in Palestine in those days. Moreover, we have telltale the cuneiform inscriptions upon the incident of Melchisedech. In Genesis, xiv, 18, it is said: "Melchisedech, the King of Salem, bringing forth bread and wine, for he was the priest of the Most High God, blessed him." Amongst the Tel-el-Amarna letters is one from Ebed-Tob, King of Jerusalem (the city is assuredly the city of Salem, and it is symbolized as Salem). He is priest appointed by Salem, the god of Peace, and is hence both king and priest. In the same manner Melchisedech is priest and king, and naturally comes to greet Abraham returning in peace; and hence, too, Abraham offers to him as to a prince the fruits of the spoils. Or in other words it must be stated that Professor Driver will not admit Sayce's deductions from the inscriptions as to Ebed-Tob, and will not recognize any analogy between Salem and the Most High God.

Taking archeology as a whole, it cannot be doubted that no definite results have been attained as to Abraham. We have come to believe the stories of Samson and Jacob, and have believed in the pilgrimages to Egypt, but no one has attempted to identify them. In setting forth the critical view on the subject, I must not be taken as giving my own views also.

Hermann Gunkel, in the Introduction to his Commentary on Genesis (3) writes: "There is no denying that there are legends in the Old Testament; consider for instance the stories of Samson and Jonah. According to these the matter of belief or scepticism, but merely a matter of obtaining better knowledge, to examine whether the narratives of Genesis are history or legend." And again: "In a people with such a highly developed poetical faculty as Israel there must have been a place for saga too. The senseless confusion of 'legend' with 'lying' has caused good people to hesitate to concede that there are legends in the Old Testament. But legends are not lies; on the contrary, they are a particular form of poetry." These passages give a very good idea of the present position of the Higher Criticism relative to the history of Genesis, and to Abraham in particular.

The first principle enunciated by the critics is that the accounts of the primitive ages and of the patriarchal times originated amongst people who did not practise the art of writing. Amongst all peoples, they say, poetry and saga were the first beginning of history in Crete, Rome, and Israel. These legends were circulated, and handed down by oral tradition, and contained, no doubt, a kernel of truth. Very often, where individual names are used these names in reality refer not to individuals but to tribes, as in Genesis, x, and the names of the twelve patriarchs, whose migrations are those of the tribes thus represented. It is not of course to be supposed that these legends are no older than the collections J, E, and P, in which they occur. They were in circulation ages before, and for long periods of time, those of earlier origin being shorter, those of later origin longer, often rather romances than legends, as that of Joseph. Nor were they all of Israelitic origin; some were Babylonian, some Egyptian. As to how the legends arose, this came about, they say, in many ways. At times the cause was etymological, to explain the meaning of a name, as when it is said that Isaac received his name because his mother laughed (p79); sometimes they were etymological, to explain the villainy in the adversity, or prosperity, of a certain tribe; sometimes historical; sometimes ceremonial, as the account explaining the covenant of circumcision; sometimes geological, as the explanation of the appearance of the Dead Sea and its surroundings. Ethnological legends of this kind form one class of those to be found in the lives of the patriarchs and elsewhere in Genesis. But there are others besides which do not concern us here.

When we try to discover the age of the formation of the patriarchal legends, we are confronted with a question of great complexity. For it is not merely a question of the age of the stories, absolutely, but also of the amalgamation of these into more complex legends. Criticism teaches us that that period would have ended about the year 1200 B.C. Then would have followed the period of remodelling the legends, so that by 900 B.C. they would have assumed substantially the form they now have. But with regard to the age of that date, whilst, when they came to the form to which they had received, they were modified in many ways so as to bring them into conformity with the moral standard of the day; still not so completely that the older and less conventional ideas of a more primitive age did not from time to time show through them. At this time, too, many collections of the ancient legends appear to have been made, much in the same way as St. Luke tells us in the beginning of his Gospel that many had written accounts of Our Saviour's life on their own authority.

Amongst other collections were those of J in the South and E in the North. Whether these two survived, and were supplemented towards the end of the captivity by the collection of P, which originated amidst priestly surroundings and was written from the ceremonial standpoint. Those that hold these views maintain that it is the fusion of these three collections of legends which has led to confusion in some incidents in the life of Abraham; as for instance in the case of Sarai in Egypt, where her age seems inconsistent with her adventure with the Pharaoh. Hermann Gunkel writes (148): "It is not strange that the chronology of P displays everywhere the most absurd oddities when injected into the old legends; as a result, Sarah is still at sixty-five a beautiful woman, whom the Egyptians seek to capture, and Ishmael is carried on his mother's shoulders after he is a youth of sixteen."

The collection of P was intended to take the place of the old combined collection of J and E. But the results of this revision of the story of Abraham in particular were much higher than the expectations of those who undertook the work.

The ground-work of the whole, especially in chronology. It is that combined narrative which we now possess.

Abraham (in Liturgy).—While of peculiar interest to the liturgiologist (especially in the classification of the liturgies of the East and of the West, as noted below under Missal), the inclusion of noted names of the Old Testament in the liturgies of Christian Churches must be a subject of sufficiently general interest to warrant some brief notice here. Of all the names thus used, a special prominence accrues to those of Abel, Melchisedech, Abraham, through their association with the idea of sacrifice and their employment in this connection in the most solemn part of the Canon of the Mass in the Roman rite. The inclusion in the Litany for the Dying (Roman Rite) of only two (Abel and Abraham) out of all the great names of the Old Testament gives these two especial prominence in the eyes of the faithful; but of these two, again, the name of Abraham occurs so often and in such a variety of connections, as to make his position in the liturgy one of very decided pre-eminence. Of first interes will be the present use of the word Abraham in the Roman liturgy:

I. MARTYROLOGY (9th October): "Ecce omnis mortis S. Abraham et Patriarch et omnium creditum Patriae" (The name day, the memory of S. Abraham, Patriarch and Father of all believers).

II. RITUAL (a) In the Ordo commendationis animae (Recommendation of a soul departing), the brief litany includes but two names from the Old Testament, that of the Baptist belonging to the New Testament:

Pray for him.

Holy Mary,
John ye holy Angels and Archangels,
Holy Abel,
All ye choirs of the just,
Holy Abraham,
St. John Baptist,
St. Joseph,

In the Libera (Deliver, etc.), which follows shortly after, many names of the Old Testament are mentioned, including Abraham, but omitting Abel: "Deliver, etc. as thou didst deliver Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees." (b) Benedictus peregrinus (Blessing of pilgrims etc.). The second prayer reads:

"O God, who didst guide Abraham safely through all the ways of his journey from Ur of the Chaldeans.

III. EXPERIMENT. (a) On Septuagesima Sunday the lesson from Scripture begins with the first verse of Genesis, and the formal narrative of Abraham begins with Quinquagesima Sunday, the lessons ending on Shrove Tuesday with the sacrifice of Melchisedech.

(b) The antiphon to the Magnificat on Passion Sunday is, "Abraham your father rejoiced..." (John, viii, 56). Again, the first antiphon of the second nocturn of the Common of Apostles reads:

"The princes of the people are gathered together with the God of Abraham." The occurrence of the name in the last verse of the Magnificat itself: "As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham and his seed forever", and in the Benedictus (sixth verse): "The oath which he swore to Abraham our father..." make the name of daily occurrence in the Divine Office, as these two Canticles are sung daily—the former at Vespers, the latter at Lauds. In the Psaltery, also, recited during every week, the name occurs in Ps., xlv, 16; cv, 9, 42. See also the hymn: Quicumque Christum quaeritis (Vespers of Transfiguration D. N. J. C. and various Lessons in the Nocturns, e.g. Feria 3a infra Heb. vi p. Pent., Feria 3a infra oct. Corp. Christi, 2d nocturn).

IV. MISAL. (a) The third of the twelve lessons called "Prophecies" read on Holy Saturday between the lighting of the Paschal Candle and the Blessing of the Font deals wholly with the sacrifice of Isaac imposed upon Abraham. The lesson (Gen., xxii, 1-19) is, like the others, not only read quietly by the priest at the altar, but also chanted in a loud voice similarly by a cleric. The dramatic incidents thus rehearsed must have interested the catechumens deeply, as is evidenced by the reproduction of the incidents on the walls of catacombs and on sarcophagi. The lesson is followed by a prayer:

"O God, the supreme Father of the faithful, who throughout the world did multiply the children of promise... and by the pascal mystery doest make Abraham thy servant the father of all nations..." (b) Again, in the prayer after the fourth lesson: "O God, grant that the fulness of the whole world may pass over to the children of Abraham..." (c) The Epistle of the thirteenth Sunday after Pentecost: "To Abraham were the promises made... But God gave it to Abraham by promise..." (Gal., iii, 18-22). (d) Offertory of the Mass for the Dead: "O Lord... may the holy standard-bearer Michael introduce them to the holy light which Thou didst promise of old to Abraham..." (e) In the Nuptial Mass, the blessing reads: "May the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac..." The God of Jacob..." (f) Of course, interest than anything thus far cited is the prayer in the Canon of the Mass, when the priest extends his hands over the Consecrated Species: "Upon which do Thou vouchsafe... and accept them,..." (g) Here the Canon insists on the idea of sacrifice, a fact common to Western liturgies, while those of the East, except the Maronite, omit in their epicleses all reference to the typic sacrifices of the Old Testament, and appear concerned with impressing the faithful with the idea rather of sacrifice and communion. This is esteemed a fact of capital importance towards a classification of the liturgies.

V. PONTIFICAL.—In one of the Prefaces of the Consecration of an altar we read: "May it have as much grace with Thee as that which Abraham, the father of faith, built when about to sacrifice his son as a type of our redemption."

Abraham, the father of faith, and Abraham, the father of the promise of the Messiah, is the ideal theme of the chancel ornaments of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

Abraham,THE BOSOM OF.—In Holy Writ, the expression "the Bosom of Abraham" is found only in two verses of St. Luke's Gospel (xvi, 22, 23). It occurs in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, the imagery of which is plainly drawn from the popular representations of the unseen world of the dead which were current in Our Lord's time. According to the Jewish conceptions of that day, the souls of the dead were gathered into a general tarrying-place, the Sheol of the Old Testament literature, and the Hades of the New Testament writings (cf. Luke, xvi, 19-31). In the Gr. xvi, 23). In the post-Apocalyptic, however, existed among them, according to their deeds during their mortal life. In the unseen world of the dead the souls of the righteous occupied an abode or compartment of their own which was distinctly separated by a wall or a chasm from the abode or compartment to which the souls of the wicked were consigned. The latter was a place of torments usually spoken of as Gehenna (cf. Matt., v, 29, 30; xviii, 9; Mark, ix, 42 sqq. in the Latin Vulgate); the other, a place of bliss and security known under the names of "Paradise" (cf. Luke, xxiii, 43) and "the Bosom of Abraham" (Luke, xvi, 22, 23). And it is in harmony with these Jewish ideas that the Psalmist pictured the terrible fate of the selfish Rich Man, and on the contrary, the glorious reward of the patient Lazarus. In the next life Dives found himself in Gehenna, condemned to the most excruciating torments, whereas Lazarus was carried by the angels into "the Bosom of Abraham," where the righteous dead shared in the repose and felicity of Abraham, "the father of the faithful." But while commentators generally agree upon the meaning of the figurative expression "the Bosom of Abraham," as designating the blissful abode of the righteous souls after death, they are at variance with regard to the manner in which the phrase is interpreted. Up to the time of Maldonatus (d. 1583), its origin was traced back to the universal custom of parents to take up into their arms, or place upon their knees, their children when they are fatigued, or return home, and to make them rest by their side during the night (cf. Matt. xi, 19; Luke, xi, 7 seq.), thus causing them to enjoy rest and security in the bosom of a loving parent. After the same manner was Abraham supposed to act towards his children after the fatigues and troubles of the present life; hence the metaphorical expression "to be in Abraham's Bosom" as meaning to be in repose and happiness with him. But according to Maldonatus (In Lucam, xvi, 22), whose theory has since been accepted by many scholars, the metaphor "to be in Abraham's Bosom" is derived from the custom of reclining on couches at table which prevailed among the Jews long before the time of Christ. As at a feast each guest leaned on his left elbow so as to leave his right arm at liberty, and as two or more lay on the same couch, the head of one man was near the breast of the man who lay behind, and he was therefore said "to lie in the bosom of the other. It was also considered by the Jews of old a mark of special honour and favour for one to be allowed to lie in the bosom of the master of the feast (cf. John, xii, 23). And it is by this illustration that they pictured the next world. They conceived of the reward of the righteous dead as a sharing in a banquet given by Abraham, "the father of the faithful" (cf. Matt., vii, 11 seq.), and of the highest form of that reward as lying in "Abraham's Bosom." Since the coming of Our Lord "the Bosom of Abraham" gradually ceased to designate a place of imperfect happiness, and it has become synonymous with Heaven itself. In their writings the Fathers of the Church apply that expression to the blissful abode of the righteous dead before they were admitted to the Beatific Vision after the death of the Saviour, sometimes Heaven, into which the just of the New Law are immediately introduced upon their demise. When in her liturgy the Church solemnly prays that the angels may carry the soul of one of her departed children to "the bosom of Abraham," she employs the expression to designate Heaven and its endless bliss in company with the faithful of both Testaments, and in particular with Abraham, the father of them all. This passage of the expression "the Bosom of Abraham" from an imperfect and limited sense to one higher and fuller is a most natural one, and is in full harmony with the general character of the New Testament dispensation as a complement and fulfilment of the Old Testament revelation.

Abraham a Sancta Clara. a Discalced Augustinian Friar, and author of popular literature, of devotion, b. at Messkirch, Baden, 1644; d. 1 December, 1709. The eighth of nine children born to Matthew Megérin, or Megerle, a well-to-do serf who kept a tavern in Kreenheinichten, he received in baptism the name John Ulrich. At the age of six he attended the village school in his native place, and about three years later he began his Latin studies in Messkirch. During the years 1656-58, he passed successively through the three classes of the Jesuit untermgymnasium in Ingolstadt. At his father's death, which occurred about this time, the boy was adopted by his uncle, Abraham von Mejerlin, canon of Altötting, who removed him to the Benedictine abbey in Salzburg. In the fall of 1662, at the age of 18, John joined the Discalced Augustinians at Vienna, choosing the name Abraham—doubtless out of respect to his uncle—with the addition of Sancta Clara. He made his novitiate and completed his theological studies at Mariabrunn, not far from Vienna. On his ordination in Vienna (1666) he was sent, after a brief preparation, as preacher to the shrines of Tassa, near Augsburg, but after about three years he was recalled to Vienna, a centre of greater activity. On 28 April, 1677, he was appointed imperial court preacher by Leopold I, and while holding this office experienced the terrors of the year of the plague, 1679. After a rest of five months as chaplain to the Landmarschall of Lower Austria, he once more ascended the pulpit. For the year 1680 he is recorded as being prior of the convenant at Vienna, while two years later we find him chaplain to the monastic church of his order in Graz, where he remained three years as Sunday preacher, and later as prior. It was in this capacity that he went to Rome in 1687. In 1690 he is mentioned once more by the house chronicle of the Vienna monastery as court preacher, and the following year as having the rank of provincial. In this capacity he undertook his second journey to Rome (1692), where he took part in the general chapter of his order. Upon his return he took up his customary duties, besides filling the office of definito. He eventually became the definito provincialis. The manifold sustained exertion, however, had gradually undermined his strength, still further impaired by years of suffering from gout, and finally resulted in his death. Abraham had at his command an amazingly large amount of information which, with an abundant wit in keeping with the taste of his time, made him an effective preacher. His peculiar talent lay in his faculty for presenting religious truths, even the most bitter, with such graphic charm that every listener, both high and low, found pleasure in his discourse, even though certain of his contemporaries expressed themselves with great virulence against "the buffoon, the newsmonger, and the harlequin of the pulpit." Even in his character of author, he stands as it were in the pulpit, and speaks to his readers by means of his pen. His works are numerous. His first occasion for literary work was furnished by the plague, on which he wrote three treatises: "Merk's, Wir! or a detailed description of destructive diseases (Vienna, 1680), shows how de plagues neither priests, nor women, nor learned men, nor married people, nor soldiers. The second tract, "Lösch Wien" (Vienna, 1680), which is less powerful, exhorts the survivors of the plague to extinguish with their good works the torments of Purgatory for those who had fallen victims. "Die grosse Totenbruderschaft" (1861) enumerates the people of prominence who died in 1679–80, in order to illustrate forcibly, and almost rudely, the reflection "that after death the prince royal is as frightfully noisome as the newborn child of the peasant". Similar per base on a critical event of history was the little book entitled "Auf, auf, ihr Christen" (Vienna, 1863), a stirring exhortation to Christians in arms against the Turk. This has become chiefly celebrated as the original of the sermon in the "Wallenstein's Lager" of Schiller. A collection of sermons which had actually been published in Salzburg in 1689 under the title of "Reim dich, oder ich li's dich". In the following year a little pilgrimage book was printed for the monastery of Taxa entitled "Gaik, Gaik, Gaik, a Ga einer wunderseltsaemen Hennen". This grotesque title arose from the story of the origin of the monastery, according to which a picture of the Blessed Virgin was seen imprinted on a hen's egg. Abraham's masterpiece, the fruit of ten years' labour, is "Judas der Erzschelm" ("Judas, der archknave", Salzburg, 1688–95). This treatise of the apocryphal life of the traitor Judas, and is varied with many miracles. While still at work upon his extensive book, he published a compendium of Catholic moral teaching, "Grammatica religiosa" (Salzburg, 1691), consisting of fifty-five lessons, and expressing the themes of thirty-three sermons. This appeared in a German translation (Cologne, 1699). The first religious works of the celebrated barefoot preacher are for the most part a confused mixture of verses, reflections, and sermons. Thus: Ettwa für alle (Something for All Persons; Würzburg, 1699); Sterben und Erben (Death and Inheritance; Amsterdam, 1702); Neu eröffnete Welt-Gal- len, mit ehrwürdiger Обu, welt-gal- len (A New-Galloway; Nürnberg, 1703); Heiligen Gemischte-Histionen (A Sancto-Mix-Mash; Würzburg, 1704); Huy! und Pfuy der Welt (Hoy! And Pie for the World; Würzburg, 1707). All these treatises showed the influence of Sebastian Brant's Narrenschiff (Ship of Fools), which was even more apparent in the two following works: Centifolium stultorum in Quarto (A Hundred excellent fools in Quarto; Vienna, 1706), and Wunder- würdiger Traum von einem grossen Navrennest (Wonderful Dream of a Great Nest of Fools, Salzburg, 1710; also printed during the lifetime of Abraham). A year after his death there appeared Geistliche Passionen, a Saint Haberdasher's Book of the Wohl angefüllter Weinkeller (A Well-filled Wine-cell; Würzburg); and Besonders meublirt und gezierte Toten-Kapelle (A Strangely Furnished and Adorned Mortuary Chapel; Nürnberg). Five quarto volumes of his literary remains were published posthumously: Abrahamisches Beschmeckens (Abra- ham's Honour Feasts; Vienna, Brünn, 1717); Abra- hamische Lauberhütt (Abraham's Leaf-clad Arbor; Vienna and Nürnberg, 1721–23); Abrahamisches Gebah dih wohl (Abraham's Farewell; Nürnberg, 1729). A collective edition of his works appeared (Fassau, 1835–48) in nineteen octavo volumes. Schiller, so widely influenced by this interesting judgment on the literary monk in a letter to Gőthe: "This Father Abraham is a man of wonderful originality, whom we must respect, and it would be an interesting, though not at all an easy, task to approach or persuade him in mad wit and cleverness. Moreover Schiller was greatly influenced by Abraham; even more were Jean Paul Richter and other lesser minds. Even to the most recent times Abraham's influence is chiefly noticeable in the literature of the pulpit, though but little to its advantage. To honour the memory of Abraham the city of Vienna has begun a new edition of his works.

Abraham Eccelesiani, a learned Maronite, b. in Hekel, or Ecchel (hence his surname), a village on Mount Lebanon, in 1600; d. 1664 in Rome. He studied at the Maronite College in Rome, published Syriac grammar (1639), and taught Syriac and Arabic at the College of the Propaganda. In 1650 he began to teach the same languages in the Royal College, Paris, and to assist in editing Le Jay's "Polyglot Bible", working with Gabriel Sionita on the Syriac and Arabic texts and their Latin translation. He contributed III Mach. in Arabic, and Rith in Syriac and Arabic, with a Latin translation. Abraham and Gabriel soon quarrelled, and the former wrote three letters explaining this difference, and defending his work against its depreciators, especially Valerian Flavigny. In 1642 he resumed his teaching in Rome, but returned to Paris in 1645; after eight years he again went to Rome, where he remained until his death. Among his many works we may mention: a "Synopsis of Arab Philosophy" (Paris, 1641); some disciplinary canons of the Council of Nice, according to Eastern attribution, though unknown to the Latin and Greek churches (Paris, 1641); "Abr Ecceleselians et Leon. Allatti Concordantia Nationum Christianarum Orientalium in Fidei Catho- licæ Dogmate" (Mainz, 1655): "De Origne nominis Pape, necon de illius Proprietate in Romano Ponti- ficie, adeoque de ejus Primatu contra Ioannem Sedle- num Angulum" (Rome, 1660); "Epistola ad J. Mory- mont de varia Graecorum et Orientalium ritibus; "Chronicon Orientale nunc primum Latinate donata, cui Accessit Supplementum Historiae orientalia" (Paris, 1653); "Catalogus librorum Chaldaorum tam Eccl. quam profanor. Auctore Hebd-Jesu Latinitate Donatus et Notis Illustratus" (Rome, 1653); a "Life of St. Anthony," a Latin translation of Abulpharag's "Praeparatione Apollonii Conic Sections, 5, 6, and 7."

Abrahmites.—(1) Syrian heretics of the ninth century. They were called Brachinii by the Arabs, from the name of their head, Ibrahim, or Abraham of Antioch. They denied the Divinity of Christ, and were looked on by some as allied to the Paulicians. (2) A sect of Bohemian Deists. They claimed that they held what had been Abraham's religion before his circumcision. They believed in one God, but rejected the Trinity, original sin, and the perpetuity of the Law; held that nothing of the Bible save only the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer. On their refusal to adopt some one of the religions tolerated in Bohemia, Joseph II banished them to Transylvania in 1783. Some became converted later on to the Catholic Faith. There are still found in Bohemia certain religious belief suggests that of the Abrahmites.—(3) Martyrs in the time of the Byzantine Emperor Theophilos, when a persecution of Catholics took place on account of the revival of the heresy of the Iconoclasts. At this time there was a monastery of monks in Constantinople called St. Abraham's. When the Emperor called on them to pronounce the idol of holy images they defended the practice with the different degrees of life and intelligence which they perceived in external nature. All natural growth, forces, and phenomena are thus typified. The outline here furnished needs only to be extended indefinitely in order to take in quite easily the countless generations of Gnosticism. The whole moral and physical world, analyzed and classified with an inconceivable minuteness, will find place in it. Then, also, will issue the bewildering catalogues of Gnostic personalities. The chief difficulty, however, arises from the nomenclature of Gnosticism, and here the "Sepher Raziël" supplies a first and valuable hint. "To succeed in the operations of divination," it says, "it is necessary to pronounce the mystic names of the planets or of the earth." In fact, stones of Gnostic origin often show designs made up out of the initial letters of the planets. Another parallel is still more suggestive. The Jews, as is well known, would never pronounce the Ineffable Name, Jehovah, but substituted either another name or a paraphrase; a rule which applied, not only to the Ineffable Name and its derivatives, but to others as well, ending, in order to evade the difficulty which arose, in a series of fantastic sounds which at first seem simply the name of a hopeless confusion. It became necessary to resort to permutations, to the use of other letters, to numerical and formal equivalents. The result was an outlandish vocabulary, only partially accounted for, yet one which nevertheless reveals in Gnosticism the existence of something more than mere incoherence. Very many secrets of Gnosticism remain unexplained, but it may be hoped that they will not always be shrouded in mystery.

Abasalom (Abhshlthm in Hebr.; Abasalom, Apsalamos in Gr.), the name of several distinguished persons mentioned in the Old Testament (Kings, Par., Mach.), interpreted "The Father of Peace".

1. Abasalom, Son of David. — He is third in the order mentioned by the chronicler (II Kings, iii, 2, 3) of the sons born at Hebron during the first turbulent years of David's reign over Judah, when Ishboeth, son of Saul, still claimed by right of inheritance to rule over Israel. His mother was Maacha, daughter of Tholomai, King of Gessur. The sacred writer who sketches for us the career of Absalom (II Kings, xiii-xviii) lays stress upon the faultless beauty of the youth's appearance, and mentions in particular the luxurious wealth of his hair, which, when shorn, weighed over ten ounces. The significance of this latter note becomes apparent when we remember the important part which the culture of the hair played in the devotions of the Eastern people (note even at this day the ceremonial prayers of the Dervishes). As shaving the head was a sign of mourning, so offering a comely growth of hair to the priest of Sihon of the Amorites was symbolic of the annual offering of the first fruits in the sanctuary. Probably the chronicler had also in mind that it was this gift of nature which became the occasion of Absalom's fatal death. To a pleasing exterior the youth Absalom joined a temperament which, whilst fond of display, was nevertheless reserved, bold, and thoughtful. These qualifications were calculated to nourish a natural desire to be one day the representative of that magnificent power created by his father, from the prospective enjoyment of which his minority of birth alone seemed to debar him. Despite his ambition, there appears to have been amongst his younger contemporaries, an ambience which inspires noble impulses where these do not clash with the more inviting prospects of self-interest. Under such circumstances it is not strange that Absalom, idolized by those around him, whilst his natural sense of gratitude and filial duty became gradually dulled, was led to cultivate that species of egotism which grows cruel in proportion as it counts upon the blind affection of its friends.

There were other causes which alienated Absalom from his father. David's eldest son, Amnon, born of a Jezebelite mother, and prospective heir to the throne by reason of his seniority, had conceived a violent passion for Thamar, Absalom's beautiful sister. Unable to control his affection, yet prevented from gaining access to her by the conventions of the royal court, which separated the King's wives and kept Thamar in her mother's household, Amnon, on the advice of his cousin Jonadab, feigned illness, and upon being visited by the King, his father, requests that Thamar be permitted to nurse him. It was thus that Amnon found opportunity to wrong the innocence of his stepsister. Having injured the object of his passion, he forthwith begins to hate her, and sends from him the nurse, who, remaining as a constant reminder of his wrongdoing. Thamar, departing in the bitterness of her sorrow, is met by Absalom, who forces from her the secret of Amnon's violence to her. David is informed, but, apparently unwilling to let the disgrace of his prospective heir become public, fails to punish the crime. This gives Absalom the pretext for avenging his sister's wrong, for which now not only Amnon, the heir to the throne, but also David appears responsible to him. He takes Thamar into his house and quietly but determinedly lays his plan. The sacred writer states that Absalom never spoke to Amnon, neither good words nor evil, but he hated him with a hatred unto death.

For two years Absalom thus carried his resentment in silence, when at length he found occasion to act openly. From the days of the patriarchs it had been customary among the shepherd princes of Israel to hold a great festival, giving the annual sheep-shearing. The first clip of the flocks was ordained for the priests (Deut., xviii, 4), and the sacredness of the feast made it difficult for any member of the tribal family to absent himself. The sacred writer does not state that there was in the mind of David a secret disposition that Absalom meditated mischief, but to one whose insight into past and future events was so clear as that of the Royal Seer, it might easily have occurred that there had been in the days of his forefather, Jacob, another Thamar (Gen., xxxviii, 6) who figured at a sheep-shearing, and who found means of avenging a similar wrong against herself, though in a less bloody way than that contemplated by Absalom upon the present occasion. Although David excuses himself from attending the great sheep-shearing, he eventually yields to Absalom's entreaty to send Amnon there to represent him. The festive reunion of the royal household takes place at Baalhazor, in a valley open on all sides, near Sichem, near Ephraim. When the banquet is at its height, and Amnon has fairly given himself over to the pleasures of wine, he is suddenly overpowered by the trusted servants of Absalom, and slain. The rest of the company flee. Absalom himself escapes the inevitable anger of his father by seeking refuge in the home of his maternal grandfather at Gessur. Here he hopes to remain until, the grief of his father having died out, he might be forgiven and recalled to the royal court. But David does not relent so quickly. After three years of banishment, Absalom, through the intervention of Joab, David's nephew and trusted general, is at last permitted to return to the city, with the honour which inspires noble impulses where these do not clash with the more inviting prospects of self-interest. Under such circumstances it is not strange that Absalom, idolized by those around him, whilst his natural sense of gratitude and filial duty became gradually dulled, was led to cultivate that species of egotism which grows cruel in proportion as it counts upon the blind affection of its friends.

Restored to his former princely dignity and the apparent confidence of his father, Absalom now enters upon that course of secret plotting to which his ambition and his opportunity seemed to urge him, and which has stamped his name as a synonym of unnatural revolt. By ingratiating himself in the good will of the people, and at the same time fostering discontent with the conditions of his father's reign, he succeeds in preparing the minds of the disaffected for a general uprising. After four years [the Septuagint has "forty," which is evidently a corruption of the Greek rendering, as approximated from the Arabic and Syriac versions] of energetic secret activity, Absalom asks leave of the King to repair to Hebron, that he might fulfil a self-imposed vow made while in captivity at Gessur. Preparations had already been consummated for a simultaneous uprising of the secret adherents of Absalom in different parts of the country, and emissaries were ready to proclaim the new king. Achitophel, one of David's eldest counsellors, had joined the conspirators, and by his design a strong current was being directed against David. When, amid the sound of trumpets and the shouts of the throngs, the proclamation of the new king reaches David, he quickly assembles his trusted followers and flies towards Mount Olivet, hoping to cross the Jordan in time to escape the ambitious fury of his son. On the way he meets his faithful officer Chusai, whom he advises to join Absalom. "You will be of no use to me if you go to him," he says, "for an Absalom is a traitor, and giving the annual sheep-shearing. The first clip of the flocks was ordained for the priests (Deut., xviii, 4), and the sacredness of the feast made it difficult for any member of the tribal family to absent himself. The sacred writer states that Absalom never spoke to Amnon, neither good words nor evil, but he hated him with a hatred unto death.

Absolute, a term employed in modern philosophy with various meanings, but applied generally speaking to the Supreme Being. It signifies (1) that which is complete and perfect; (2) that which exists by its own nature and is consequently independent of everything else; (3) that which is related to no other being; (4) the sum of all being, actual and potential (Hegel). In the first and the second sense, one speaks of the Absolute, if one limits the sphere of which Christian philosophy may readily accept. Though the term was not current in the Middle Ages, equivalent expressions were used by the Scholastic writers in speaking, e.g., of God as Pure Actuality (Actus Purus), as uncaused Being, or as containing nothing extraneous. Aquinas, in particular, emphasizes the absoluteness of God by showing that He cannot be classed under any genus or species, and that His essence is identical with His existence. Aquinas also anticipates the difficulties which arise from the use of the term Absolute in the sense of unrelated being, and which are brought out quite clearly in modern discussions, notably in that between Mill, as critic of Sir William Hamilton's philosophy, and Mansel as its defender. It was urged that the Absolute could not consistently be thought of or spoken of as First Cause, for the reason that causation implies relation, and the Absolute is outside of all relation; it cannot, therefore, be conceived as producing effects. St. Thomas, however, offers a solution. He holds that God and created things are related, but that the relation is real in the effects only. It implies no condition or modification of the Divine Being; it is in its application to things a mere conceptus formae. This does not oblige us to conceive God as one term of a relation, but not to infer that the relation affects Him as it affects the created thing which is the other term. This distinction, moreover, is based on experience. The process of knowledge involves a relation between the known object and the knowing subject, but the character of the relation is not the same in both terms. In the mind it is real because perception and thought imply the exercise of mental faculties, and consequently a modification of the mind itself. No such modification, however, reaches the object; this is the same whether we perceive it or not. Thus it is just here that a difficulty arises. It is claimed that the Absolute can neither be known nor conceived. "To think is to condition": and as the Absolute is by its very nature unconditioned, no effort of thought can reach it. To say that God is the Absolute is equivalent to saying that He is unknowable. This view, expressed by Hamilton and Mansel, and endorsed by Spencer in his "First Principles," affords an apparently strong support to Agnosticism, while it assails both the reasonableness and the possibility of religion. It is only a partial reply to state that God, though incomprehensible, is nevertheless real, because the manner and capacity of our intelligence. The Agnostic contends that God, precisely because He is the Absolute, is beyond the range of any knowledge.
whatever on our part. Agnosticism, in other words, insists that we must believe in the existence of an absolute and infinite Being and at the same time warns us that we can have no idea of that Being. Our belief must express itself in terms that are meaningless, since this concept is altogether a term out of which all significance has evaporated; or (and this seems a wiser course) one may retrace the genesis of the term and hold fast to the items of knowledge, however imperfect and however in need of criticism, which that genesis involves. In proving the existence of God as Hegel conceives the Absolute Being, we take as our starting-point facts that are knowable and known. So far as, in reasoning upon these facts, we are led beyond them to the concept of an Absolute, some remnant of the knowability which facts present must be found in that which is the ultimate explanation of the facts. If, as Spencer affirms, "every one of the arguments by which the relativity of our knowledge is demonstrated distinctly postulates the positive existence of something beyond the relative", it follows that by getting clearly before our thought the meaning of those arguments and their force for distinctly postulating in some one of the things whose existence is thus established. Spencer, indeed, does not realize the full import of the words "positive existence", "ultimate reality", and "incomprehensible power", which he uses so freely. Otherwise he could not consistently declare that the Being to which those concepts apply is knowable. It is in fact remarkable that so much knowledge of the Absolute is displayed in the attempt to prove that the Absolute cannot be known. Careful analysis of a concept like that of First Cause certainly shows that it contains a wealth of meaning which forbids its identification with the Unknowable, even supposing that the existence of the Unknowable be logically demonstrated. Such an analysis is furnished by St. Thomas and by other representatives of Christian philosophy. The method which St. Thomas formulated, and which his successors adopted, keeps steadily in view the requirements of critical thinking, and especially the danger of applying the forms of our human knowledge, without due refinement, to the Divine Being. The warning against our anthropomorphic tendency was clearly given before the Absolute had taken its actual place in philosophic speculation, or had yielded that place to God's creative action. While the popular words of the text are not necessary, especially in the interest of religion, nothing can be gained by the attempt to form a concept of God which offers a mere negation to thought and to worship. It is of course equally futile to propose an unknowable Absolute as the basis of reconciliation between religion and science. The failure of Spencer's philosophy in this respect is the more distressing, because, while it allows full scope to science in investigating the manifestations of the Absolute, it sets aside the claim of religion to learn anything of the power which is thus manifested. Absolution (Ab = from; solvere = to free), is the remission of sin, or of the punishment due to sin, granted by the Church. (For remission of punishment due to sin see GENUITY, EXCOMMUNICATION, INDULGENCE.) Absolution proper is that act of the priest whereby, in the Sacrament of Penance, he frees man from sin. It presupposes on the part of the penitent, contrition, confession, and promise at least of satisfaction; on the part of the minister, valid reception of the Order of Priesthood and jurisdiction, imparted by competent authority, over the person receiving the sacrament. That there is in the Church power to absolve sins committed after baptism the Council of Trent thus declares: "But the Lord then principally instituted the Sacrament of Penance, when, being raised from the dead, He breathed upon His disciples and said to the Holy Ghost. Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them, and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained.' By which action so signal, and words so clear the consent of all the Fathers has ever understood that the power of forgiving and retaining sins was communicated to the Apostles, and to their lawful successors for the reconciling of the faithful who have fallen after baptism" (Sess. XIV, i). Nor is there lacking in divine revelation proof of such power; the classical texts are those found in Matthew, xvi, 19; xvii, 18, and in John, xx, 21-23. To Peter are given the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Sin is by the Church, not to enter into the kingdom, and over sin Peter is supreme. To Peter and to all the Apostles is given the power to bind and to loose, and this again implies supreme power both legislative and judicial: power to forgive sins, power to free from sin's penalties. This interpretation becomes particularly remarkable in fact from the way in which the phrase to bind and to loose was in common use. (Lightfoot, Horæ Hebraæ; Buxtorf, Lexicon Chaldæ; Knabenbauer, Commentary on Matthew, II, 66; particularly Maas, St. Matthew, 163, 184.) The granting of the power of absolution is put in St. John's Gospel: "He breathed upon them and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose sins ye shall forgive they are forgiven them; and whose sins ye shall retain, they are retained.' " (xx, 22, 23). It was foolish to assert that the power here granted by Christ was simply a power to announce the Gospel (Council of Trent, Sess. XIX, Can. iii), and quite as unwise to contend that here is contained no power other than the power to remit sin in the Sacrament of Baptism (Ibid., Sess. XIV); for the very context is against such an interpretation, and the text of the passage forbids it, while the power to retain sins becomes simply incomprehensible when applied to baptism alone, and not to an action involving discretionary judgment. But it is one thing to assert that the power of absolution was granted to the Church, and another to say that a full realization of the grant was in the consciousness of the Church from the beginning. Baptism was the first, the great sacrament, the sacrament of initiation into the kingdom of Christ. Through baptism was obtained not only plenary pardon for sin, but also for temporal punishment due to sin. Man once born anew, the Christian ideal forbade the thought of returning to the Abode of Sin. Consequently, early Christian discipline was loath to grant even once a restoration to grace through the ministry of reconciliation vested in the Church. This severity was in keeping with St. Paul's declaration in his Epistle to the Hebrews: "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, have tasted also the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, have moreover tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the word of God to come and are fallen away, to be renewed again to penance" etc. (vi, 4-6). The persistence of this Christian ideal is very clear in the "Pastor" of Hermas, where the reader contemplates against a rigid school, a case at least one opportunity for penance must be given by the Church (III Sim., viii, 11). He grants only one such case, but this is sufficient to establish a belief in the power of the Church to forgive sins committed after baptism. St. Ignatius in the first days of the second century seemingly asserts the power to forgive sins when he declares in his letter to the Philadelphians that the bishop presides over penance. This is also what Collected Statements as is evident from passages found in Aphrastes and Ephrem, and St. John Chrysostom voices this same Syrian tradition when he writes “De Sacerdotio” (Migne P. G., LXVII, 643), that “Christ has given to his priests a power he would not grant to the angels, for he clearly states that they would perish.” (De potestatibus dei et hominum, LXVII, 643, c.) and further down he adds, “The Father hath given all judgment into the hands of his Son, and the Son in turn has granted this power to his priests.”

Clement of Alexandria, who perhaps received his inspiration from the “Pastor” of Hermas, tells the story of the young bardit whom St. John went after and brought back to God, and in the story he speaks of the Angel of Penance, οὐκ ἔγγελος τῆς μετανοίας, meaning the bishop or priest who presided over the public penance. Following Clement in the Catechetical school of Alexandria was Origen (230). In one homily on the second verse of the Our Father Prayer, “Forgive us our trespasses,” he alludes to the practice of penance in the Church, recalling the text of John, xx, 21. He asserts that this text is proof of the power to pardon sin conferred by Christ upon His Apostles and upon their successors. True it is that in writing of the extent of the power conferred, he makes exception for the sins of idolatry and adultery, which he terms irremissible, although Dionysius of Corinth (170) years before held that no sin was excepted from the power of the keys granted by Christ to His Church (Eusebius, Hist. Ecc., iv, xvii). In the Alexandrian Church, we have also the testimony of Athanasius, who in a fragment against the Novatians pointedly asserts: “He who confesses his sins, receives from the priest pardon for his fault, in virtue of the grace of Christ (just as he who is baptized).” Asia Minor is at an early date witness of this power to absolve. St. Firminus in a letter to St. Cyprian says that the power to forgive sins was given to the Apostles and to their successors (Epp. Cyp., LXVII), and this tradition is more clearly expressed both in Basil and Gregory Nazianzen (P. G., XXXI, 1284; XXXVI, 356, 357). The Roman tradition is clear in the “Declamation of the Bishops of Rome in the Third Century” where the power of absolution committed after baptism is defended (Sim., vii, 6, 5; ibid., ix, 19). This same tradition is manifest in the Canons of Hippolytus, wherein the prelate consecrating a bishop is directed to pray: “Grant him, O Lord, the power to forgive sins” (xxii). This is still more clearly expressed in the “Constitutiones Apostolicae” (P. G., I, 1073): “Grant him, O Lord Almighty, by Thy Christ the fulness of Thy spirit, that he may have the power to pardon sin, in accordance with Thy command, that he may loose every bond which binds the sinner, by reason of that power which Thou hast granted Thy Apostles.” (See also Duchesne, “Christian Worship,” 143, 440.) True, this power seems to Hermas to be strangely limited, while Origen, Tertullian, and the followers of Novatian principles were unwilling to grant that the Church had a right to absolve from such sins as apostasy, murder, and adultery. However, Calixtus says in an apocryphal letter that if all the world were to fall into sin and to be lost to the Apostles by Christ when He said, “Whatevery you bind upon earth, shall be bound in heaven” (P. L., XXXVII, 609, 610). The theologians of the medieval period, from Alcuin to St. Bernard, insist that the right to absolve from sin was given to the bishops and priests who succeeded to the apostolic office (Alcuin, P. L., Cl. 652–656; Benedict Levi, P. L., C. 357; Jonas of Orleans, P. L., CVI, 152; Pseudo-Egbert, P. L., LXXXIX, 415; Haymo of Halberstadt, P. L., CXVIII, 762 seqq.). Following the theologians, the canonists, such as Regino of Prud, Burchard of Worms, Ivo of Chartres, furnish us with the definition of the Canons of the Council of Toulouse (909), which states expressly that penance through the ministry of Christ’s priests is “fruitful unto the remission of sins.” This epoch closes with St. Bernard, who takes Peter Abelard to task for asserting that Christ gave the power to forgive sins only to His disciples, and consequently that the successors of the Apostles do not enjoy the same privileges (P. L., CLXXXII, 1054). But while Bernard insists that the power of the keys given to the Apostles is lodged in the bishop and in the priests, he with equal stress insists that such power be not exercised unless the penitent make a full confession of wrong committed (ibid., 938). When the great scholastic epoch began, the doctrine which obtained was a power to absolve sins and this power distinctly recognized, in virtue of the power granted by Christ to His Apostles. The need of the doctrine of the promise of better life were necessary, and also a declaration of sin made to him to whom Christ had appointed judge.

SCOLASTIC AGE.—At the beginning of the scholastic age, special stress is laid upon the power of contrition to secure pardon. St. Anselm of Canterbury, in a commentary upon Luke xvii, 14, likens this power to that possessed of old by the Jewish priest in the case of leprosy (P. L., CLVIII, 662; ibid., 361–430). At first sight, the doctrine of St. Anselm seemed to annul the power to absolve which antiquity had granted to the priesthood, and to reduce the office of reconciliation to a mere declaration that sin had been forgiven. Hugo of St. Victor (1097–1141) took ground against Anselm, not because Anselm insisted on contrition, but because he seemingly left no place for the power of the keys. But how admit the one and not the other? Hugo was still influenced by the earlier theories on the obligation of penance, and by the penalty of future damnation”; the grace of God frees man from the darkness brought on by sin, while the absolution of the priest delivers him from the penalty which sin imposes—“The malice of sin is best described as obduracy of heart, which is a principle, as it were, that later, in confession, the sin itself, i.e. the penalty of damnation, be remitted.” There is some obscurity in the text, but Hugo seems inclined to hold that the priest absolves from the punishment due to sin, rather than from sin itself. The Master of the Sentences, Peter Lombard, took issue with Hugo, and assorted in clear terms that charity not only blotted out the stain of sin, but also freed the sinner from punishment due to sin. Not understanding, however, that penance as a sacrament is a moral unit, Peter Lombard in turn used language which is far from exact. He seems to hold that contrition takes away sin and its consequences, and when established concerning the power granted to the priest, he seems to recur to the opinion of Anselm that it is declarative. “They remit or retain sins when they judge and declare them remitted or retained by God” (P. L., CCXII, 888). He also grants to the priest certain power in reference to the punishment, as Richard of St. Victor, though he speaks of the opinion of Peter Lombard as frivolous, in reality differs but little from the Master of the Sentences. Peter’s opinion indeed exercised great influence over the minds both of his contemporaries and of the following generation. With William of Auvergne (who taught up to 1229, when he became Archbishop of Paris) comes the distinction between contrition and attrition in the Sacrament of Penance. Contrition takes away all stain of guilt, while attrition prepares the way for the real remission of sin in the sacrament. Theologians had recognized the distinction between contrition and attrition even before the time of St. Peter Albin, and, but for the authority of St. Albert, the master of Aquinas, advanced much beyond the teaching of Peter Lombard. Both seemingly insisted on real contrition before absolution, and both also held that such contrition in reality took away mortal sin. They did not, however, deny the office of the minister, for they both held that contrition being the condition of the absolution [Alb. Mag., IV Sent., Dist. xvi–xvii (Paris, 1894), XXXIX, 559, 660, 666, 670, 700]. St. Bonaventure (IV, Dist. xvii) also admits the distinction between contrition and attrition; he asserts the power of contrition to take away all sin, even without the priest’s absolution, confession being necessary only when possible. As regards the priest’s power to pardon sin, he not only admits it, not only asserts that absolution forgives sin and its eternal consequences, but calls it the forma sacramenti. He even goes so far as to say that attrition is sufficient for pardon if absolution is not obtained [Alb. Mag., IV Sent., Dist. xvii]. When questioned as to the manner in which absolution produces its sacramental effect, he distinguishes between two forms of absolution employed by the priest: the one deprecatory, “Miscreatur tui” etc., and the other indicative, “Ego te absolve.” In the former the priest intercedes for the sinner, and this intercession changes his attrition into real contrition and secures pardon for sin committed. In the latter, which is indicative and personal, the priest exercises the power of the keys, but remits only a temporal punishment due still on account of sin. This latter was but a new way of putting the theory of Peter Lombard (Dist. xvii). St. Thomas Aquinas treats this subject in his Commentary on the Master of the Sentences (IV, Dist. xvii, xviii, xix; Summa Theologica III, Q. xxxiv–xxxv; Supplement, Q. lx–lxx; Opuscula, De Forma Absolutionis). Taking the many distinctions which Peter Lombard made with this partial truth, he fused them into a united whole. In the commentary on the “Libri Sententiarii” he shows clearly that the ministry of the priest is directly instrumental in the forgiveness of sin; for “if the keys had not been ordained for the remission of sin, but for the sake of release from the penalty of a pretended obligation of the elder scholastics), there would be need of the intention to obtain the effect of the keys for the remission of sin” and in the same place he clearly states: “Hence if before absolution one had not been perfectly disposed to receive grace, one would receive it in sacramental contrition and absolution, if no obstacle be put in the way” (Dist. xvii, 2, l, art. 3, Quastiuinula iv). He sees clearly that God alone can pardon sin, but God uses the instrumentality of absolution which, with confession, contrition, and satisfaction, concurs in obtaining forgiveness, in blotting out the stain, in opening the kingdom of heaven, by cancelling the sentence of eternal punishment. This doctrine is expressed again with equal clearness in the “Summa” and in the “Supplement.” In the “Summa”, Q. lxxiv, art. 3, he states that the absolution of the priest is the forma sacramenti, and consequently confession, contrition, and satisfaction must necessarily “to sin absolution” when asked whether perfect contrition secured pardon for sin even outside the Sacrament of Penance, St. Thomas answers in the affirmative; but then contrition is no longer an integral part of the sacrament; it secures pardon because forgiveness comes from perfect charity, independently of the instrumentality of the sacramental rite (Supplement,
Q. v. a. 1). Duns Scotus not only grants the power of absolution in the forgiveness of sin, but goes a step farther and asserts that the sacrament consists principally in the absolution of the priest, because confession, contrition, and satisfaction are not integral parts or units in the sacrament, but only necessary conditions upon the reception of grace and forgiveness. "There is no similarity, therefore, between the priest of the Law in regard to leprosy and the priest of the Gospel in regard to sin", and he adds that the priest of the New Law, "exercet actum qui est signum prognosticum, efficaciam munificents accipiens, etc. (Batiffol, Cit. VIII, 549, 849, in D. XIX; ibid., 420, 421). Some think this opinion of Scotus more in conformity with the Council of Trent, which calls contrition, confession, and satisfaction, not "the matter", but quasi materia, "as if the matter", of the sacrament; others doubt whether the Council thus meant to class contrition, confession, and satisfaction as mere necessary dispositions. This doctrine, as taught by St. Thomas and Scotus, finds its echo in the Council of Florence, in the decree of Eugene IV, as it does in the Council of Trent, which defines (Sess. XIV, chap. iii), "That the form of the Sacrament of Penance, wherein its force principally consists, is found in the priest: 'I absolve thee' etc., but the act of the penitent himself are quasi materia of this Sacrament."

MINISTER.—In the closing years of the first century, Ignatius of Antioch asserts that Penance is in the hands of the bishop; soon the same power is recognized in the priests, and in St. Cyprian, the deacon on extraordinary occasions performed the office of reconciliation (Batiffol, Thol. pos., 145 sqq.). The deacon's power is recognized later on in Alcuin, in a council held at York, 1194, and in the Council of London, 1200 (cap. iii).

TIME.—The ceremonial rite connected with the sacrament of reconciliation has also varied with the changing discipline of the Church. The earliest tradition hints at a public penance—vide tradition supra—but very soon there appears the Presbyter Penti- lentarius; certainly as early as 309 Pope Marcel- lus divided Rome into twenty-five districts propter baptismum et pentialitam, and Innocent I (418) mentions the 'priest whose office it was to judge anent sin, to receive the confession of the penitent, to watch over his satisfaction, and to present him for reconciliation at the proper time'. The case of Nectarios who abolished the Presbyter Penti- lentarius is classical (361-68). This reconciliation generally took place on Holy Thursday, and the bishop presided. Surely absolution was pronounced on Maundy Thursday. This all the sacramentaries attest (Duchesne, Christian Worship, 439, 440); but the practice of public penance has given rise to the important and difficult question, whether or not the absolution granted at the public function of Holy Thursday was really the sacramental absolution. Theologians have questioned this, many preferring to believe that the sacramental absolution was really imparted by the Presbyter Pentai- lentarius at the early stage of public penance, even before the satisfaction was complete. They allege as their reasons the long delay which otherwise would have been necessary and the fact that the bishop absolved on Holy Thursday, while the confession had been heard previously by the Presbyter Pentai- lentarius (Palmieri, De penit. App. II, nn. 8, 9). But there are many others who think the traditional truth concerning the Penti- lentarius is not absolutely necessary, unless it is admitted that, ordinarily speaking, sacramental absolution was given only after the completion of the penance imposed and in the public session of Holy Thursday. What was done, they ask, before the institution of the Presbyter Pentai- lentarius, or where there was no such functionary? And they answer the objections brought forward above by saying that there is no evidence in early history that a first absolution was imparted by the priests who determined the necessity of undergoing public satisfaction, nor are we permitted a priori to judge of ancient ways in the light of our modern practice (Boudinon, Hist. d'histoire sur l'objection de la patiente d'absolution, 29, 329, 330, etc.; Batiffol, Thol. pos., Les origines de la patiente, IV, 145 sqq.). Moreover, there is full evidence of a reconciliation on Holy Thursday; there are canons as late as the sixth century forbidding priests to reconcile penitentes, incoenulo epis- copis (Batiffol, ibid., 439). In the ninth century there is clear testimony that absolution was not given until after the imposed penance had been completed (Benedict Levita, P. L., XCVII, 715; Rabanus Maurus, P. L., CVII, 342; Harduin, Councils, V, 342); and when absolution was granted before Holy Thursday it was after the fashion of an exception (Pseudo Alcuin, Cl, 1192). "Denique admonemundi sunt ut ad oeam Domini reo- desant ad reconciliemini: si vero interest causa itineris . . . reconciliect eum statim" etc. This exception gradually became the rule, especially after the Scholastics of the Middle Age period began to distinguish clearly the different parts which make up the Sacrament of Penance.

FORM.—It is the teaching of the Council of Trent that the form of the Sacrament of Penance, wherein its force principally consists, is placed in these words of the minister, 'I absolve thee'; to which words certain prayers are, according to the rubrics of Holy Church, laudably added (Sess. XIV, iii). That the public penance was concluded with some sort of prayer for pardon, is the doctrine of antiquity, particularly as contained in the earliest sacramentaries (Duchesne, Christian Worship, 440, 441). Leo the Great (450) does not hesitate to assert that pardon could not be impossible without the prayer: "indulgientia nisi supplicatio sacerdotum neque obtinienti". In the early Church these forms certainly varied (Duchesne, loc. cit.). Surely all the sacramentaries assert that the form was deprecated, and it is only in the eleventh century that we find a tendency to pass to indicative and personal formularies (Duchesne, loc. cit.). Some of the forms used at the transition period are interesting: "May God absolve thee from all thy sins, and through the penance imposed mayst thou be absolved by the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost, by the Angels, by the Saints, and by me, a wretched sinner" (Garofali, Ordo ad abs., 153). The form in the sacramentary is in the indicative and personal form, often preceded by the suppliant prayer, "Miserereatur tui" etc. These forms, while much the same in substance, vary in wording not a little (Vacant, Diet. de théol., 187). It was not until the scholastic doctrine of "mater and form" in the sacraments reached its full development that the formula of absolution became fixed as we have it at present. The form in use in the Roman Church to-day has not changed since long before the Council of Florence. It is divided into four parts as follows:—

(1) Deprecatory prayer: "May the Almighty God have mercy on you, and forgive your sins, bring you to life everlasting. Amen." Then, lifting his right hand towards the penitent, the priest continues: "May the Almighty and Merciful God grant you pardon, absolution, and remission of your sins".

(2) "May Our Lord Jesus Christ absolve you, and by his authority more safely than any human being, give you absolution" (excommunication) [suspension, in the case of a cleric only] and interdict as far as I can and you may need.

(3) "I absolve you from your sins in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." (While repeating the names of the Trinity, the priest makes the sign of the cross over the penitent.) (4) "May the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ, the merite of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of all the Saints, what good you have done or what evil you have suffered be to you for the remission of your offenses, and a reward of everlasting life. Amen." In the decree "Pro Armeniis", 1439, Eugenius IV teaches that the "form" of the Sacrament is really in those words of the priest: "Ego absolve te a peccatis tuis in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti." and theologians teach that absolution would be valid should the priest use, "Absolvo te," "Absoluo te a peccatis," or words of judgment and a sentent (Suarez, Disp., XIX, i, n. 24; Lugo, Disp., XIII, i, n. 17, 18; Leibniz, De Penit., 9th ed., 199).

In the Oriental churches the present forms are decretary, though they by no means exclude the idea of a judicial pronouncement on the part of the minister. Such are the forms of absolution among (a) Greeks, (b) Russians, (c) Syrians, (d) Armenians, (e) Copts. Is the indicative form necessary? Many learned Catholics seem to hold that the indicative form as used at present in the Roman Church is necessary for the validity of the Sacrament of Penance and that the form has been blessed by the Church. Filippus (De Sac. Penit., n. 430), declares that no matter what may be the verdict from the point of view of history, it is of faith since the Council of Trent that the indicative form is essential. St. Thomas and Suarez also declare that the indicative form is necessary. Others equally learned, and perhaps better versed in historical and ecclesiastical matters, think that the Divine institution the deprecatory form must not be excluded, and that the Council of Trent in its decree did not intend to make final pronouncement in the premises. They point out with Morinus (De Penit., Lib. VIII) that up to the twelfth century the deprecatory form was employed both in the East and in the West: that it is still in use among the Greeks and among Orientals generally. In the light, therefore, of history and of theological opinion it is perfectly safe to conclude that the deprecatory form is certainly not invalid, if it exclude not the idea of judicial pronouncement (Palmieri, Parergon, 127; Huter, de Penit.; Duchesne, loc. cit.; Soto, Vasquez, Estius, et al.). Theologians, however, have questioned whether or not the deprecatory form would be valid to-day in the Latin Church, and they point out that Clement VIII and Benedict XIV have prescribed that Greek priests should use the indicative form in the exercise of the faculties of the Church, and that the Church must also keep in mind the dispositions of the penitent. If the (a) the penitent is well-disposed, he must absolve; (b) if the penitent lack the requisite dispositions, he must endeavour to create the proper frame of mind for him, and if he cannot and may not absolve one indispersed; (c) when dispositions remain doubtful, he employs the privilege given above in conditional absolution. When the minister sees fit to grant absolution, then he pronounces the words of the form (supra) over the penitent. It is commonly taught that the penitent must be physically present; consequently, absolution by telephone has been declared null and void, and when the ministers are absent he must also keep in mind the dispositions of the penitent.

ABSOlUTION OUTSIDE THE LATIN CHURCH.—(I) In the Greek Church. The belief of the ancient Greek Church has been set forth above. That the Greeks have always believed in the power of the Church to forgive sin, that they believe it at present, is clear from the form of absolution in vogue among all branches of the Church; also from the decrees of synods which since the Reformation have again and again expressed this belief (Alzog on Cyril Lucaris, III, 465; Synod of Constantinople, 1658; Synod of Jassey 1642; Synod of Jerusalem, 1672). In the Synod of Jerusalem the Church reiterates its belief in Cajast, a century later, calls Gerson's position mere superstition. But Gerson's position gradually obtained, and in our day all theologians grant that under certain circumstances such absolution is not only valid but also legitimate (Lehmkuhl-Gury, De penit., absol. sub conditions); valid, because judicial pronouncements are often rendered under certain conditions, and the Sacrament of Penance is essentially a judicial act (Council of Trent, Sess. XIV); also, because God absolves in heaven when certain conditions are fulfilled here below. The fulfilment may escape man's judgement, but God no man may deceive. This very doubt makes conditional absolution possible. Conditions are either (a) present, (b) past, or (c) future. Following a general law, whensoever the condition leaves in suspense the effect intended by the Sacrament, the Sacrament itself is null and void. If the condition does not suspend the sacramental efficacy, the Sacrament may be valid. As a consequence, all future conditions render absolution invalid: "I absolve you if you die to-day." This is not true of conditions past or present, and absolution given, for example, on condition that the priest has been beaten, or that he is still alive and certain not to die. The same is true of conditions not clear, but at the same time dispositions necessary for the valid reception of the Sacrament are in doubt, then it would be a mercy to impart absolution even if under condition.
ABSOPTION

Seven Sacraments, among them Penance, which the Lord established when He said: "Whose sins you absolve, they are absolved from them, and whose you shall retain, they are retained." The formule of absolution are generally deprecatory, and if now and then the indicative form appears, it may be traced to Latin sources.

(II) Russian Church. The belief of the Greek Church is generally also that of the Russian. Russian theologians all hold that the Church possesses the power to forgive sins, where there is true repentance and sincere confession. The form in use is a present: "My child, N. N., my Lord and God Christ Jesus by the mercy of His love absolve thee from thy sins; and I, His unworthy priest, in the authority committed to me, absolve thee and declare thee absolved of thy sins in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen."

(III) Armenians. Denzinger, in his "Ritus Orientalium" (1869), gives us a full translation of the penitential ritual used by the Armenians. The present version is from the ninth century. The form of absolution is declarative, though it is preceded by a prayer for mercy and for pardon. It is as follows: "May the merciful Lord have pity on thee and forgive thee thy faults; in virtue of my priestly power, by the authority committed to me, I absolve thee in these words, 'Whosoever, ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven,' I absolve thee from thy sins, I absolve thee from thy thoughts, from thy words, from thy deeds, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and I restore thee to the Sacrament of the Holy Church. May all thy good works be for thee an increase of merit, may they be for the glory of life everlasting, Amen."

(V) Copts. Dr. Hyvernat asserts that the liturgical books of the Copts have no penitential formule, nor is this surprising, for they inscribe in the ritual only those things not found in other rituals. Father du Bernat, writing to Père Fleurian (Lettres édifiantes), says, in reference to the Sacrament of Penance among the Copts, that the Copts believe themselves bound to a full confession of their sins. This finished, the priest recites over them the prayer said at the beginning of the Mass, the prayer asking penances from the sinner; he also added the so-called "Benediction," which Father Bernat considers is like the prayer said in the Latin Church after absolution has been imparted. Dr. Hyvernat, however, asserts that Father Bernat is mistaken when he likens the Benediction to our "Passio Domini," for it is like the Latin prayer only inasmuch as it is recited after absolution.

(V) Jacobites. (For the earliest tradition in the Syrian Church see above, Absolution in Patriotic age.) The Syrians who are united with the Roman See now use the declarative form in imparting absolution. This formuila is, however, of recent date. The Jacobite Church does not only hold to the priest who has held the power to absolve from sin, but its ritual is expressive of this same power. Denzinger (Ritus Orientalium) has preserved for us a twelfth-century document which gives in full the order of absolution.

(VI) Nestorians. The Nestorians have at all times believed in the power to absolve in the Sacrament of Penance, and in the Eucharistic celebration at Mass (Eucharistia and their Rituals), also Denzinger, have the fullest information on this point. It is noticeable that their formula of absolution is deprecatory, not indicative.

(II) Protestants. The earliest Reformers attacked virulently the penitential practice of the Curiat, particularly the confession of sins to a priest. Their opinions expressed in their theological works do not differ as markedly from the old position as one might suppose. The Lutheran tenet of justification by faith alone would make all absolution merely declarative, and reduce the pardon granted by the Church to the merest annulling of the sentence of the Gospel, especially of remission of sins through Christ. Zwingli held that God alone pardoned sin, and he saw nothing but idolatry in the practice of hoping for pardon from a mere creature. If confession had aught of good it was merely as direction. Calvin denied all idea of sacrament. Luther first, and there was quibble; but he held that the pardon expressed by the minister of the Church gave to the penitent a greater guarantee of forgiveness. The Confession styled "Helveticus" contents itself with denying the necessity of confession to a priest, but holds that the power granted by Christ to absolve is simply the power to preach the Gospel to the people. The Church of England, like the Remonstrants, hold to the remission of sins: "Rite itaque et efficaciter ministri absolvunt durn evangelium Christi et hae remissionem peccatorum predictam."
of the priest's fingers at the end of Mass. In these cases the use of wine is an ecclesiastical law from whose observance the Church has power to dispense. A decree of Pope Pius IX, 1865, grants a dispensation in this sense to missionaries in China, on account of the scarcity of wine; various similar rulings are to be found in the collection of the decrees of the Congregation of Rites. Abstention from the use of wine has, occasionally, been declared obligatory by heretics. It was one of the tenets of monotheism in the second century, and the founder of the sect known as the Encratites, forbade the use of wine, and his adherents refused to make use of it even in the Sacrament of the Altar; in its place they used water. These heretics, mentioned by St. Irenæus (Adv. Haer., I, xxx), are known as Hydroperastas, Aquaristis, and Encratites. The great Manichean heresy followed a few years later. These heretics, in their turn, professed the greatest possible aversion to wine, as one of the sources of sin. St. Augustine, in his book against heresies, ch. xlv, says of them, "Vimum non bibunt, dicentes esse filium principatus, quem non deus fecerat; "They say it is the gall of the princes of darkness." They made use of water in celebrating Mass. At the beginning of the Reform, one of the grievances alleged against the Church was that she did not allow the faithful to communicate under both kinds. "We excuse the Church", so runs the Augustinian Confession, "which through the ignorance of only receiving under one kind, not being able to have both; but we do not excuse the authors of this injustice, who maintain that it was right to forbid the administering of the complete Sacrament." How, then, were those to be admitted to the Lord's Table, who were unable to communicate under the species of wine? A decree of the Synod of Poitiers, in 1560, reads: "The Bread of the Lord's Supper shall be administered to those who cannot drink the wine, on condition that they shall declare that they do not abstain out of contempt." Other Protestant synods also lay down the rule that persons unable to take wine shall be admitted to the Lord's Table on condition that they shall at least touch with their lips the cup which holds the species of wine. Jure ux, on the other hand, starting from the principle that Christ has founded the essence of the Eucharist on the two species, held that an absolution to receive the bread only was not sufficient, because the Eucharist consists of two parts, and he receives only one. A great controversy ensued among the Protestants themselves on this point. Bossuet held that communion under both kinds could not be of divine obligation, since many would thereby be deprived of the Sacrament owing to a natural weakness.

Abstinence.—Inasmuch as abstinence signifies abstaining from food, the Bible narrative points to the first instance wherein such a course of conduct was imposed by law (Gen., ii, 16, 17). The obvious purpose of this mandate was to lead the moral head of the race to recognize the dependence of creature upon Creator. The hour which witnessed the transgression of this law marked an increase in the debt which the creature owed the Creator. Adam's disobedience rendered all mankind criminal, and liable to the necessity of appeasing God's justice. To meet this new exigency nature dictated the law of limitation determined the ways and means whereby this natural obligation would best be concretized. The chief results of this determination are positive statutes concerning fasting and abstinence. Laws relating to fasting are principally intended to define what it pertains to the religious obligations of the days of fasting, while those regulating abstinence, what refers to the quality of viands. In some instances both obligations coincide; thus, the Fridays of Lent are days of fasting and abstinence. In other instances the law of abstinence alone binds the faithful; thus ordinary Fridays are simplified forms of abstinence. The purpose of this article is to trace the history of ecclesiastical legislation regarding the law of abstinence, as well as to examine the motives which underlie this legislation.

The Bible: Abstinence in the Old Testament.—Fasting implying abstinence was ordained by law for the Day of Atonement (Levit., xvi, 29 sq.). The ceremony incident to this feast was observed by the Jews on the fifth day before the feast of Tabernacles. From evening of the ninth until evening of the tenth day labour and eating were strictly prohibited. Besides this passage the sacred narrative contains many others which show how adversity led the Jews to assume the burden of fasting and abstinence in a spirit of penance (Judges, xx, 28; Judith, vi, 20; Joel, i, 14; ii, 15). Moreover, the Jews abstained on the ninth day of the fourth month, because on that day Nabuchodonosor captured Jerusalem (Jerem., lii, 8); on the tenth day of the fifth month, because on that day God's smiting instrument, Nebuchadnezzar, was buried (Jerem., lii, 12 sq.); on the third day of the seventh month, because on that day God's smiting instrument, Nebuchadnezzar, was buried (Jerem., xli, 2); and on the tenth day of the tenth month, because on that day the Chaldees commenced the siege of Jerusalem (IV Kings, xxvy, 1 sq.).

In addition to those indications concerning the seasons of abstinence amongst the Jews, the sacred text contains passages regarding the ways and means whereby the law of abstinence assumed more definite shape amongst them. After the deluge God said to Noe: "Everything that moveth upon the earth..." (Gen., vii, 19). The prohibition of eating flesh was also extensively observed by the Jews (Levit., vii, 26 sq.; xvii, 14 sq.; Deut., xii, 15, 16). A prohibition whereby corn, oil, wine, and the first-born of herds and cattle are forbidden in towns is set forth in Deut., xii, 17. Priests were forbidden to drink any intoxicant lest they die (Levit., x, 9). The eleventh chapter of Leviticus contains a detailed enumeration of the various beasts, birds, and fish that fall under the ban. Such were reputed unclean. Abstinence from things legally unclean was intended to train the Israelites in the pursuit of spiritual cleanliness.

The Old Testament furnishes several instances of celebrated personages who devoted themselves to this chasteisment of the flesh. David kept fast on account of the child born of the wife of Urias (II Kings, xii, 16); Esther humbled her body with fasts (Esth., xiv, 2); Judith fasted all the days of her life (Jud., viii, 6); Daniel ate neither bread nor flesh till the days of his three companions of fire were fulfilled. The books of Judith, Machabees and all the people craved mercy in tears and fasting (II Mach., xiii, 12). Moreover, Esdras commanded a fast by the river Ahava (I Esd., vii, 21). The King of Ninevah proclaimed a fast in Ninevah whereby neither man nor beasts should eat anything, whether food or meat (Neh., x, 3). Jeremiah (Exod., xxv, 26) and Elias (III Kings, xix, 8) spent forty days in abstinence and fasting. Finally, the Pharisee in the Temple declared that he fasted “Twice in a week” (Luke, xvii, 12). Appropos of this passage Duchesne says that Monday and Thursday were the days which were fasted among the pious Jews (“Christian Worship”, London, 1903, 225).

The New Testament.—In the first portion of his Gospel St. Matthew relates how Christ passed forty days in the desert, during which time neither food nor drink passed his lips. No doubt this penance of his was not on a compulsory, but at least exemplary. True, Christ did not explicitly define the days nor the weeks wherein his followers would be obliged to fast and abstain. At the same time his example, coupled with his reply to the disciples of the Baptist, is an evidence that the future would find his followers subjected to regulations whereby these would be clearly and explicitly defined. No longer would the Magi of the desert wander about from day to day or from week to week. The only piece of clearly defined legislation concerning abstinence embodied in the New Testament was framed by the Council of Jerusalem, prescribing “abstinence from things sacrificed to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled” (Acts, xv, 29). Nevertheless the Acts of the Apostles give evidence of a tendency on the part of the Church, as an organized body, to prepare the way for important abstinence and fasting (Acts, xiii, 3; xiv, 22). In fine, St. Paul sets forth the necessity of abstinence when he says that “everyone shall fast, and pray, and give alms” (I Thess. iv, 25); and “let us exhibit ourselves as the ministers of Christ in labours, watchings, and fastings” (II Cor., vi, 5), which he had often practised (II Cor., xi, 27).

The Latin Church: Subjects Under, and Material Element of, the Law.—Throughout the Latin Church the law of abstinence prohibits all responsible subjects from indulging in meat diet on duly appointed days. Meat diet comprises the flesh, blood, or marrow of such animals and birds as constitute flesh meat according to the appreciation of intelligent and law-abiding Christians. For this reason the use of fish, vegetables, molluscs, crabs, turtles, frogs, and such-like cold-blooded creatures is at variance with the law of abstinence. Ambigines are relegated to the category whereunto they bear most striking resemblance. This classification can scarcely preclude all doubt regarding viscidious and by the law abstinence. Usage, together with the practice of intelligent and conscientious Christians, generally holds a key for the solution of mooted points in such matters, otherwise the decision rests with ecclesiastical authority. Furthermore, on many fasting days during the year the law of abstinence bars the use of such viands as bear some identity of origin with flesh meat. For this reason eggs, milk, butter, cheese, and lard are interdicted (St. Thomas, Summa, II—II, Q. cvii, art. ult., ad 3). The Church enjoins the ways and means whereby her subjects must satisfy the obligation of doing penance inculcated by natural law. Many of the Fathers allude to the understanding of ecclesiastical authority in reference to the obligation of abstinence. The disciplinary canons of various councils bear witness to the actual exercise of authority in the same direction. Texts of theology and catechisms of Christian doctrine indicate that the obligation of abstaining forms an element in one of the most important of the judgments of the moral law, for sin is an item of primary import in the moral order. Naturally enough, abstinence contributes no small share towards the realization of this end. As a consequence, the law of abstinence embodies a serious obligation whose transgression, objectively considered, involves and is most often the cause of an unanimous verdict of theologians, the constant practice of the faithful, and the mind of the Church place this point beyond cavil. They who would gain minimize the character of this obligation so as to relegate all transgressions, save such as originate in contempt, to the category of venial sin are in a minority. Again, V. ap. Buaceroni, Enchiridion Morale, 145 (Rome, [1905]). In fine, the Trullan synod (can. 58, ap. Hefele, “History of the Councils of the Church”, V, 231, Edin- burgh, 1896) inflicts deposition on clerics and excommunication on laymen who violate this law. Besides, the claim that the grievousness is committed as often as flesh meat is consumed in any quantity on abstinence days (Sporer, Theologia Moralis super Decalogum, I, De observ. jejunii, § 2, assert. II), because the law is negative, and binds semper et pro semper. In other words, the prohibition of the Church in this matter is absolute. At all events, the benefit of the doubt may be so small that the law suffers no substantial violation. From an objective standpoint such transgressions carry the guilt of venial sin. Moralsists are by no means unanimous in deciding where the material elements of such minor disorders pass into a material disorder of major importance. Some think that an ounce of flesh meat suffices to constitute a serious breach of this law, whereas others claim that nothing short of two ounces involves infringement of this obligation. Ordinarily, the actual observance of the law is confined to such circumstances as carry more or less important burdens. This being the case, the infirm, mendicants, labourers, and such as find difficulty in procuring fish diet are not bound to observe the law as long as such conditions prevail.

Days of Abstinence. (1) Friday.—From the dawn of Christianity, Friday has been signalised as an abstinence day, in order to do homage to the memory of Christ suffering and dying on that day of the week. The “Teaching of the Apostles” (vii), Clement of Alexandria (Strum, vi, 75), and Tertullian (De jejun., xiv) make explicit mention of this practice. Pope Nicholas I (858–867) declares that abstinence from flesh meat is enjoined on Fridays. There is every reason to conjecture that Innocent III (1198-1216) had the existence of this law in mind when he said that this obligation is suppressed as often as Christmas Day falls on Friday (De observ. jejunii, ult. cap. ap. Layman, Theologia Moralis, I, 147). The custom of abstaining on Saturday originated in the Roman Church is a striking evidence of the early institution of Friday as an abstinence day.

(2) Saturday.—As early as the time of Tertullian, some churches occasionally prolonged the Friday abstinence and fast so as to embrace Saturday. Tertullian (De jejunio, xiv) calls this practice conjugate jejunium—an expression subsequently superseded by superponere jejunium. Such prolongations were quite common at the end of the third century. The Council of Elvira (can. xxvi, ap. Hefele, op. cit., I, 147) enjoins the observance of one such fast and abstinence every day except on August 31 and July and August. At the same time the fathers of Elvira abrogated the “superposition” which had up to that time been obligatory on all Saturdays (Duchesne, op. cit., 231). Moreover, Gregory VII (1073–85) speaks in no uncertain terms of the obligation to abstain on Saturdays, when he declares that all Christians are bound to abstain from flesh meat on Saturday as often as no major solemnity (e.g. Christmas) occurs on Saturday, or no infirmity serves to cancel the obligation (cap. Quia dies, d. 5, de consecrat., ap. Joannes, Asor. Inst. Moral. I, Bk. VII, c. xii). Various authors have assigned different causes for the extension of the obligation so as to bind the faithful to abstain not only on Fridays, but also on Saturdays. Some hold that this practice was inaugurated to commemorate the burial of Christ Jesus; others that it was instituted to imitate the Apostles and Disciples of Christ, who, together with the Holy Women, mourned the death of St. Christ even on the seventh day; while others claim that it owes its origin to the conduct of St. Peter, who passed Saturday in prayer, fast and fasting, to prepare himself for the Day of the Resurrection (Acts vii. 54 sq.; cf. Migne, P. L. XLIx, coll. 147, 148). Though the Roman Pontiffs have constantly refused to abrogate the law of abstaining on Saturday, special indulgences dispensing with the obligation have been granted to the faithful in many parts of the world. The special point of duration, as well as in regard of penitential practices, Lent has been the subject of many vicissitudes. In the days of St. Irenaeus (177-202) the season of penance preceding Easter was of rather short duration. Some fasted and therefore abstained from flesh meat etc. for one day, others for two days, and others again for a greater number of days. No distinct traces of the quadragesimal observance are discernible until the fourth century. The decrees of the Council of Nicaea in 325 (can. v, ap. Hefele, op. cit., i, 387) contain the earliest mention of Lent. Thenceforward ecclesiastical history contains numerous allusions to those four days. Furthermore, the length of the quadragesimal season indicates that it was then usually considered a time of preparation for baptism, or for the abolition of penitents, or a season of retreat and reflection for the faithful and for the clergy in the world. True, fasting and abstinence formed part of the duties characterizing this season, but there was little or no uniformity in the manner of observance. On the contrary, different countries adopted a different régime. At Rome it was customary to spend but three weeks, immediately before Easter, in abstinence, fasting, and praying (Socrates, H. E., V, 22). Many attempts were made to include Holy Week in the Lenten season. The attempt succeeded at Rome, so that thenceforward the Lenten season consisted of six weeks. During these six weeks Sundays were the only days not reached by the law of fasting, but the obligation to abstain was not withdrawn from Sundays. As a consequence, the Lenten season numbered no more than thirty-six days. Hence St. Ambrose (Serm. xxxiv, de Quadrages.) notes that the beginning of Lent and the first Sunday of Lent were simultaneous prior to the reign of Gregory I. In the seventh century four days were added. Some claim that this change was the work of Gregory III, others that of Pepin (Layman, loc. cit.). Duchesne (op. cit., 244) says that it is impossible to tell who added four days to the thirty-six previously comprised in the Lenten season. It is likely, at all events, that the change was made so as to have forty days in which to commemorate Christ's forty days in the desert. Be this as it may, the Church has never deviated from the ordinance of the seventh century whereby the Lenten season comprises forty days over and above Sundays.

(4) Ember Days.—The beginning of the four seasons of the year is marked by Ember Week, during which Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday are days of fasting and abstinence. Ember Week occurs after the first Sunday of Lent, after Pentecost, after the feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, and after the third Sunday in Advent. According to some writers the Ember Days in December were introduced by the Apostles as a preparation for the ordinations which were to be consecrated in the Naumus (Layman, loc. cit.). The scriptural basis for this practice is to be found in Acts, xiii, 2 sq. The summer Ember Days were observed during the octave of Pentecost (St. Leo I, Sermo ii, de Pentecost.), and the autumn Ember Days in September (Idem, Sermo viii, De junio septimis mens.). In the False Decretals (c. 840-50) Pope Callistus (217-222) is made to add a fourth week. We decree, he says, that the fast which you have learned to keep three times yearly, shall henceforward be made four times a year (Epist., Decr. lxxxvi, cap. i; Migne, P. G., X, 121). St. Jerome, in his commentary on the eighth chapter of Zachary, believes that the Ember Days were introduced after the exhortation of the Jews, who fasted and abstained four times during the year, as noted in the preceding paragraph. St. Leo I (Sermo viii, De jej. septim. mensis) considers that the purpose of penance during Ember Week is to urge the faithful to special efforts in the cause of continence. The twelfth point of duration, as well as in regard of penitential practices, Lent has been the subject of many vicissitudes. In the days of St. Irenaeus (177-202) the season of penance preceding Easter was of rather short duration. Some fasted and therefore abstained from flesh meat etc. for one day, others for two days, and others again for a greater number of days. No distinct traces of the quadragesimal observance are discernible until the fourth century. The decrees of the Council of Nicaea in 325 (can. v, ap. Hefele, op. cit., i, 387) contain the earliest mention of Lent. Thenceforward ecclesiastical history contains numerous allusions to those four days. Furthermore, the length of the quadragesimal season indicates that it was then usually considered a time of preparation for baptism, or for the abolition of penitents, or a season of retreat and recollection for people living in the world. True, fasting and abstinence formed part of the duties characterizing this season, but there was little or no uniformity in the manner of observance. On the contrary, different countries adopted a different régime. At Rome it was customary to spend but three weeks, immediately before Easter, in abstinence, fasting, and praying (Socrates, H. E., V, 22). Many attempts were made to include Holy Week in the Lenten season. The attempt succeeded at Rome, so that thenceforward the Lenten season consisted of six weeks. During these six weeks Sundays were the only days not reached by the law of fasting, but the obligation to abstain was not withdrawn from Sundays. As a consequence, the Lenten season numbered no more than thirty-six days. Hence St. Ambrose (Serm. xxxiv, de Quadrages.) notes that the beginning of Lent and the first Sunday of Lent were simultaneous prior to the reign of Gregory I. In the seventh century four days were added. Some claim that this change was the work of Gregory III, others that of Pepin (Layman, loc. cit.). Duchesne (op. cit., 244) says that it is impossible to tell who added four days to the thirty-six previously comprised in the Lenten season. It is likely, at all events, that the change was made so as to have forty days in which to commemorate Christ's forty days in the desert. Be this as it may, the Church has never deviated from the ordinance of the seventh century whereby the Lenten season comprises forty days over and above Sundays.

(5) Advent.—Radulphus de Rivo (Kalendarium eccles. seu de observatione canonum, Prop. xvi) and Innocent III (De observ. jej., cap. i) testify that the Roman Church appointed a period of fasting and abstinence as a preparation for the solemnization of Christmas. Traces of this custom are still to be found in the Roman Breviary indicating the recitation of a prayer during Advent just as on days of fasting and abstinence. Radulphus de Rivo (loc. cit.) remarks that the Roman Church appointed the first Sunday after St. Katharine's feast as the beginning of Advent.

Vigilantem.—Former times the clergy assembled in church, on the eves of great festivals, and chanted the divine office. In like manner the laity also repaired to their churches and passed the time in watching and praying. Hence the term vigil. Innocent III (op. cit., i) mentions the vigils of Christmas, the Assumption, and the Apostles (23 June). It is likely that the obligation of abstaining on the vigils of Pentecost, St. John Baptist, St. Lawrence, and All Saints was introduced by custom (cf. Asor., op. cit., VII, xiii), for, according to Duchesne (op. cit., 257), the element of antiquity is not the fasting, but the vigil. Formerly, the obligation of abstaining on vigils was succeeded by the obligation of fasting on the vigil. Sunday. This practice is still in vogue.

(7) Rogation Days.—These days occur on the Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and the Ascension Day. Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, introduced them (some time before 474) by custom. The custom of reciting the Litanies on these days. He also prescribed fasting and abstinence thereon. This practice was extended to the whole of Frankish Gaul in 511 by the first Council of Orleans (can. xxvii). About the beginning of the ninth century Leo III introduced the Rogation Days into Rome (Duchesne, op. cit., 289). An attempt similar to Gregory's characterizes the feast of St. Mark, and dates from about the year 589 (Duchesne, op. cit., 288).

APPLICATION OF THE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES.

—Diversity in customs, in climate, and in prices of food have gradually paved the way for modifications of the law of abstention. The United States is a restless nation, and the laws of the United States are a restless people. The use of meat on such days is not restricted to the principal religious foods. The practice is for such as are exempt from fasting by reason of illness, health, age, or laborious occupations. Eggs, milk, butter, and cheese, formerly prohibited, are now permitted without restriction as far as the laws of the week are concerned. The use of lard or dripping in preparing fish and vegetables at all meals and at all hours of the day is permitted. The law was adopted 3 August, 1887. It is never lawful to take fish with flesh, at the same meal, during Lent, Sundays included (Benedict XIV, Litt. ad Archiep. Compostel., 10 June, 1745, ap. Bucceroni, Enchiridion Morale, 147). At other times this is not prohibited (Bucceroni, ib.). On Wednesdays and Fridays, as well as on the second and last Sundays of Lent, flesh meat is not permitted. Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays during Ember Week are still days of abstinence and fasting. The vigils of Christmas, Pentecost, Assumption, and All Saints are also days of abstinence and fasting. In virtue of faculties granted by the Holy See, workmen, and their families, may use fish one day on all abstinence days throughout the year except Fridays, Ash Wednesday, Holy Saturday, and the vigil of Christmas. This indulg was issued for ten years, 15 March, 1895, and renewed for another decade on 25 February, 1905. (See “Exposition of Christian Doctrine”, Philadelphia, 1899, II, 628, 529.)

In Great Britain and Ireland, Fridays during the year, Wednesdays during Advent, weekdays during Lent, Ember Days, the vigils of Christmas, Pentecost, the Assumption, All Saints, Sts. Peter and Paul, and St. Andrew (in Scotland only) are days of abstinence. Meat is allowed by indul by the principal meal on all days during Lent except Wednesdays, Fridays, Holy Thursday, and the second and last Saturdays. Eggs are allowed at the principal meal during Lent except on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday, but Lard and all fats and oils, and cheese are allowed at the principal meal, and at the collation during Lent, except on Ash Wednesday, and Good Friday. Lard and dippings are allowed at the chief meal and at the collation, except on Good Friday. Suet is prohibited whenever meat is not allowed. Fish and flesh are never allowed at the same meal on any fast day during the year (Catholic Directory, London, 1906). In Australia, Fridays during the year, Wednesdays and Saturdays during Lent, Holy Thursday and Wednesdays during Advent, Ember Days, the vigils of Christmas, Pentecost, the Assumption, Sts. Peter and Paul, and All Saints are days of abstinence. The abstinence incident to the feasts of Sts. Peter and Paul and the Assumption is transferred to the eve of the solemnity. The eating of butter, eggs, and eggs are allowed during Lent even at the collation; and dippings as in the United States. (See “Expos. of Christian Doctrine”, Philadelphia, 1899, II, 528, 529.)

THE GREEK CHURCH.—In the Greek Church the law of abstinence is designated by the term orthodoxy in contradistinction to xenophagy, signifying the law of fasting. In its strictest sense xenophagy bars all viands except bread, salt, water, fruits, and vegetables (St. Epiphanius, Expositio Fidei, xxii.; Migne, P. G., XLII, col. 828; Apost. Const., V, xvii., ap. Migne, P. G., I, col. 889). On days of abstinence meat, fish, eggs, milk, cheese, oil, and wine are rigorously interdicted. This traditional custom of rigorous abstinence still binds the Greeks on all Wednesdays and Fridays, on all days of their Major Lent, including Saturdays and Sundays, except Palm Sunday, on which day oil, wine, and fish are allowed, and on the vigils of Christmas and Epiphany. Xenophagy, milk, and cheese are allowed only on these days. Another less severe form of abstinence, still common among the Greeks, prohibits the use of meat, eggs, milk, and sometimes fish on certain occasions. According to their present regime, the Greeks observe this mitigated form of abstinence during their Lent of the Apostles (i.e. from Monday after the feast of All Saints, celebrate on the first Sunday after Pentecost, until 29 June); during Mary’s Lent (1–14 August); during Christmas Lent, or Advent (also called St. Philip’s Lent, 15 November to 24 December); 29 August (commemoration of the Beheading of St. John Baptist), and on 14 September (feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross). The canonical regulations determining obligatory abstinence have suffered no substantial alteration during the lapse of centuries. In its general outlines this legislation is the same for the Greek Church Uniat and non-Uniat. The Uniat Greek Church is not permitted to make any innovation without explicit authorization from the Holy See (Benedict XIV, Decret. Demandatam, § vi, in his Bullarium, I, 128, Venice ed., 1778). Though usage and dispensations have led the way to certain modifications, the canons covering this matter remain unchanged. Custom has made the use of wine and oil legitimate on xenophagy days. In many places fish is likewise allowed, except during the first and last week of their Major Lent. Goar (Euchologion, Venice, 1730, 175) says that the Greeks of his day were allowed by an unwritten law to eat fish, eggs, smails, and such-like viands on xenophagy days.

Innovations in the duration of the Greek penitential season have originated in usage. Thus arose their practice of spending the week preceding their Major Lent in minor abstinence, as a prelude to the more rigorous observance of the Lenten season (Nilles, Kalendariat, II, 36; Innsbruck, 1885; Vacant, Diet, 30, thol. cath., I, 264). This custom lapsed into desuetude, but the decree of the Synod of Zamoec, 1720 (tit. xvi, Collect. Lacinisi, II), show that the Ruthenians had again adopted it. The Melchites have reduced their xenophagy during Christmas Lent to fifteen days. The same tendency to minimize the duration of the Lenten season is found somewhere in the Ruthenians (Synod of Zamosc, loc. cit.). The Apostles’ Lent counts no more than twelve days for the Melchites. Goar says that their Christmas Lent is reduced to seven days. Other alterations in these seasons have been made at various times in different places. The Greeks enjoy some relaxation of this obligation on a certain number of days during the year. Accordingly, when feasts solemnized in the Greek Church fall on ordinary Wednesdays and Fridays, or on days during their various Lenten seasons (Wednesdays and Fridays excepted), a complete or partial suspension of the xenophagy obtains. In such a case the period of abstaining from flesh is withdrawn on Wednesdays and Fridays between Christmas and 4 January; whenever Epiphany falls on Wednesday or Friday; Wednesday and Friday during the week preceding the feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross; during the octave of Easter and Pentecost. Some of the Greeks, especially the Melchites, hold that xenophagy does not bind from Easter to Pentecost [cf. Pilgrimage of Euthenia (Peregrinatio Sylviae) ap. Duchesne, op. cit. 569]. In their partial suspension of the xenophagy the Greeks maintain the obligation of abstaining from flesh meat, but they countenance the use of such other viands as are ordinarily prohibited when the law is in full force. This mitigation finds application as often as the following festivals fall on Wednesdays or Fridays not included in their Lenten seasons, or any day (Wednesdays and Fridays excepted) during their Lenten seasons: 1 November, Feast of St. Philip; 12 November, Presentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary; 7 January, Commemoration of St. John Baptist; 2 February, Presentation of Christ in the Temple; 25 March, Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary; 29 June, The Apostles; 6 August, Transfiguration; 15 August, Assumption; and Palm Sunday. St. Basil’s rule is followed by all monks and nuns in the Greek Church.
Xerophagy is their general rule for penitential practices. The law of abstinence from meat admits no relaxation. The greater solemnities entitle them to use fish, eggs, milk, oil, and wine. Feasts of minor solemnity, falling on days other than Wednesday or Friday, admit fish, eggs, milk, oil, and wine, other than wine only. Finally the use of oil and wine is allowed. The obligation of xerophagy on Wednesdays and Fridays dates its origin to apostolic tradition (cf. Teaching of the Apostles, vii, 1; Clement of Alexandria, Strom. VI, lxxv; Tertullian, De jejunio, xiv). The xerophagy of minor solemnity is the cause of much contention. The strongest reason to think that the question was mooted in the second century, when the EASTER controversy waxed strong. Writings of the fourth century afford frequent references to this season. According to the Pilgrimage of Etherius (Duchesne, op. cit., 555), the end of the fourth century witnessed Jerusalem devoting forty days (a period of eight weeks) to fasting and abstinence. The season comprised eight weeks because Orientals keep both Saturday (sacred to the Virgin Mary) and Sunday as days of rejoice, and not of penance. There are several noteworthy evidences of those forty days thus appointed by the Greeks for xerophagy. One of these is the annual Prophyletic, no. 4, and Catech., iv, 3, ap. Migne, P. G., XXXIII, 341, 347; Eusebius, De solemnitate Paschali, no. 4, Migne, P. G., XXXIV, 697; Apostolic Canons, can. lxvii, ap. Hefele, loc. cit., 1, 485. The canons of Greek councils show no traces of legislation regarding their Christmas Lent etc., prior to the eighth century. No doubt the practice of keeping xerophagy during these seasons originated in monasteries and thence passed to the laity. In the beginning of the ninth century St. Nicæphorus, Patriarch of Constantinople, states that all are obliged to fast on xerophagy during the Lenten season (Fitra, Juris Ecclesiæ Graeci Historia et Monumenta, Rome, 1868, II, 327). It is scarcely necessary to note here that the Greek Church has legislated nearly half the year into days of fasting or abstinence or both. Nevertheless, many Oriental writers protest against a lessening of this number. In point of fact, however, many Greeks claim that many days of this kind scarcely win proper recognition from the faithful.

THE RUSSIAN CHURCH.—The legislation of the Russian Church relating to abstinence consists of an elaborate programme specifying days of penance with the prohibitions of meats. To the latter are added rules indicating several festivals wherein the rigour of the law is tempered to a greater or lesser degree according to the grade of solemnity characterizing the fast. Good Friday is signalized by their most severe form of exterior penance, namely complete abstinence. During their Major Lent cold, dried fare is prescribed for Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, as well as for the first three days of Holy Week. On Saturdays and Sundays during this period fish is prohibited, and crustaceans are allowed. On Wednesdays and Fridays throughout the year, as well as on the vigil of Christmas, baked fare and fruits are permitted. Oil and wine are allowed on Holy Saturday, on Thursday of the Major Canon (Thursday of the fifth week in Lent), and on Good Friday, whenever the Annunciation coincides therewith. Fish is interdicted, but fish eggs are permitted on the Saturday preceding Palm Sunday, and on Thursday of Holy Saturday and on Holy Thursday. During their Christmas Lent, Mary's Lent, and the Apostles' Lent meat is prohibited, but wine and oil are allowed on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays. The same regulation applies to 14 September, 29 August, and 5 January. During Mary's Lent milk diet is interdicted; fish diet is permitted on Saturdays and Sundays. During the other two minor Lents the same injunction holds on Tuesdays, Thursdays, Saturdays, and Sundays. The same regulation binds on Palm Sunday, as well as on Wednesdays and Fridays of Paschal Tide. Finally, the feasts of the Transfiguration, Mary's Nativity, Annunciation, Feculation, Presentation, and Assumption of the Virgin, of the Baptism, Sts. Peter and Paul, and the Commemoration of St. John the Baptist, 7 January, occurring during Lent, or on Wednesday or Friday, are marked by this same degree of abstinence. Meat diet is under the ban, except during the whole of carnival week. Russian monasteries are enjoined to fulfill a part of the programme during the whole year. The Russian Church suspends the obligation of abstinence during Christmastide (25 December to 6 January, minus the vigil of Epiphany), during Eastern tide, and during the octave of Pentecost.

SYRIAN CHURCH.—All branches of the Syrian Church abstain on Wednesdays and Fridays and during Lent, in keeping with the Apostolic Canons (can. lxvii, Hefele, loc. cit.). The Council of Laodicea (can. I), recognized by all Syrians, enjoins xerophagy for Lent (Hefele, op. cit., II, 320). Nevertheless, changes and abuses have been gradually introduced into various parts of the Syrian Church. JACOBITES.—(a) Among the laity all adults are obliged to abstain on all Wednesdays and Fridays. On those days eggs, milk, and cheese are interdicted. During Lent their rigorous regime excludes the use of eggs, milk, butter, cheese, fish, and wine. The Apostles' Lent is observed from Pentecost to 29 June. Abstinence is then recommended, not imposed. Mary's Lent lasts fifteen days. The Christmas Lent is kept by monks forty days longer than by laics. During these periods a less rigorous regime is in vogue. Finally, their ninnivic, or rogation, abstinence seasons for the period days. (b) Following the example of James of Edessa, the ascetics monks and nuns observe alternately seven weeks of fasting and abstinence, with seven other weeks wherein such obligations apply on Wednesdays and Fridays only. Some eat no meat during the entire year. (c) Sozomen (Hist. Ecl. VI, Migne, P. G., LXVII, col. 393) speaks of Syrian authorities who live on herbs without eating even so much as bread, or drinking wine. Rabulas, Bishop of Edessa (d. 435), and the Council of Seleucia-Ctesiphon (420) (Hefele, op. cit., II, 449 sq.) forbade monks and nuns to eat meat.

Nestorian.—As a general rule, the laity follow the same regime as the Jacobites. With them Lent begins on Quinquagesima Sunday. Contrary to their ancient discipline, they abstain on Saturdays and Sundays. They observe the same minor penitential seasons as the Jacobites. Their ninnivic, or rogation, season is kept on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of the third week before Lent. The canonical regulations for monks and nuns prescribe fasting and abstinence as observed in other branches of the Syrian Church. Nevertheless, at various periods, innovations and relaxations have found their way into Nestorian communities of men and women (Vacant, op. cit., I).

MARONITE.—Lent for the laity commences on Monday of Quinquagesima week and continues until Holy Saturday. Saturdays and Sundays (Holy Saturday excepted), together with obligatory feasts occurring during Lent, are not fast days, but even meat and oil are allowed. Their Christmas Lent begins on 5 December and ends on 24 December. Mary's Lent begins on 1 August and ends on 14 August; 6 August is not included therein. The Apostles' Lent begins 15 June and ends 28 June, although 24 June is not therein included. Meat, eggs, and milk diet are interdicted on all Wednesdays and Fridays except such as occur during Christmastide, Eastertide, or the octave of Pentecost. This mitigation takes place during the week preceding their Major Lent and on the feast of the epiphany, Sts. Peter and Paul. Their legislation for monks and nuns is simple and austere. They are forbidden to eat flesh meat under penalty of grievous sin, unless a physician should order it for them in case of illness. When obliged to make long journeys, they must have recourse to the bishop or their own local superior for the right to eat meat during the journey (Vacant, op. cit., I, 269).

Armenians.—Vartan, whom the Armenians regard as the leading exponent of their ecclesiastical traditions, held that they were bound not only to abide by the legislation framed in the Council of Jerusalem, but also to adhere to the Mosaic regulations guarding unclean animals (Vacant, op. cit., I, 269). The Council of Florence condemned this rigorism and decided that the decrees enacted in the Council of Jerusalem concerning this matter, as well as the Mosaic regulations regarding unclean animals, have no longer the binding force of law. The Armenians recognize the sixty-eighth canon of the Apostles, which prescribes abstinence on Wednesdays and Fridays, and on all days of Major Lent. They observe the law of abstinence on all Wednesdays and Fridays, except during the octave of Epiphany and during Eastertide, i.e., from Easter Sunday to Ascension Day. Their Major Lent begins on Monday of Quinquagesima week and terminates on Holy Saturday. From Ash Wednesday until Easter Day they keep xerophagy except on Saturdays and Sundays, when milk diet is allowed. Besides, they devote the week preceding the feast of the Transfiguration, the Assumption, the Holy Cross, and St. Gregory to abstinence and fasting. They are likewise obliged to abstain for one week during Advent, one week preceding the feast of St. James, and another immediately before the Epiphany. The Armenian monks and nuns never eat meat. What remains of the law of abstinence is quite rigorous. They may eat fish whenever the laity are allowed to eat meat.

Copts.—Lay people are obliged to abstain from flesh meat, eggs, and milk diet during all the penitential seasons. Such as Major Lent, Mary's Lent, Christmas Lent, and the Apostles' Lent. They are bound by the law of abstinence on all Wednesdays and Fridays, except during the interval between Easter and Pentecost, and whenever Christmas or Epiphany falls on Wednesday or Friday. The law of abstinence extends to Saturdays and Sundays during the penitential seasons. During Major Lent and Holy Week fish and prohibited food are forbidden. At the same time its use is lawful. Some time has elapsed since the rigour peculiar to seasons of penance in the Orient was mitigated amongst the Copts. It was then restricted to the observance of abstinence during all seasons except Major Lent. Nevertheless, a goodly number of Copts observe Major Lent with pristine rigour. While residing in their monasteries, the Coptic monks and nuns are bound to abstain from meat, eggs, and milk diet throughout the year. Whenever they dwell outside the monastery they may conform to the regulations binding the laity.

MOTIVES OF ECCLESIASTICAL LAWS PERTAINING TO ABSTINENCE.—According to the vagaries of the Manicheans, Montanists, and Encratites, flesh meat is intrinsically evil and merits the most rigorous kind of prohibition. Keenly sensitive of the heterodoxy, the Church of Christ has not based her ordinance alternating abstinence and feasting on a warranted assumption. As the exponent of revelation, the Church knows and teaches that every creature in the visible universe is equally a work of the divine wisdom, power, and goodness, which defy all limitations. This is why the first pages of the inspired text indicate that God made all the things that He had made and they were very good (Gen., i, 31). St. Paul is, if anything, still more explicit in condemning the folly of these sectaries, though they originated after his day. "Now, the Spirit manifestly says that in the last times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to spirits of error, and doctrines of devils. They shall abstain from meats which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving by the faithful and by them that know the truth. For, every creature is good, and nothing to be rejected that is received with thanksgiving" (I Tim., iv, 1, 2, 3). Neither is the Church, in her legislation on abstinence, animated by any such gross superstition as influences the adherents of Brahmanism or Buddhism. Moved by their theories regarding the transmigration of souls, they are logically induced to abstain from eating the flesh of animals lest they should unconsciously consume their parents or friends. In consequence they prohibit those notions, as milk, cheese, butter, eggs, and oil are under the ban. Nevertheless, with time there become visible traces of innovation in this discipline. At present the Armenians observe the law of abstinence on Wednesdays and Fridays, except during the octave of Epiphany and during Eastertide, i.e., from Easter Sunday to Ascension Day. ABSTINENCE

At the same time it is well to bear in mind that in the beginning of the present era the Apostles were called upon to deal amicably with those who based their conservatism on the traditions of two thousand years to the Mosaic legislation.

Daily experience testifies that the phenomena circumscribing the evolution of life in the material world are rooted in laws involving a process of transition from death unto life. "The struggle for existence and the survival of the fittest" is simply the development of the presence of a law governing the animal kingdom. This law, so widespread in the material order, has been embodied in that economy wherein they who would imitate Christ must deny themselves, take up the cross, and follow Him. Hence, in moulding her penitential discipline, the Church is inspired by the maxims and example of her Divine Founder. As a consequence, she is not the author of arbitrary measures in this matter; she simply frames her laws of abstinence to meet the exigencies of fallen nature. Darkness in the understanding, weakness in the will, and turbulence in the passions must ever remain to reveal the ravages of the fallen world. Therefore, the world is destined to satisfy the legitimate cravings of human nature, and enable man to develop his being according to the dictates of reason, still they give unquestionable evidence of a vicious propensity to invade the domain of reason and usurp her sovereignty. In other words, the insurrection of the passions, and to subordinate their movements to the ends of reason, man is obliged to labour unceasingly; else he is sure to become the slave of unbridled passion.

This is what St. Paul means when he says: "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh" (Gal. v. 17). The substance of certain viands, especially meat, renders inestimable service to man in his efforts to gain and retain the desired supremacy. This is what St. Jerome means when, quoting Terence, he says: Sine Cerere et Baccho, friget Venus (Cont. Jov. II, 6), or, to use the words of St. Thomas (II 11, quest. cxvii, art. 1), "the ardour of lust is dampened by abstinence from food and drink." Besides, abstinence exercises a salutary influence in leading man to suprasensible pursuits. For, according to St. Augustine (De oratione et jejunio, sermo cxxxi, de temp.), abstinence purifies the soul, elevates the mind, subordinates the flesh, begets a humble, and contrite heart, diminishes the cloud of concupiscence, quenches the fire of lust, and enkindles the true light of chastity. This is summarized in the official message of the Church found in the Mass-preface used during Lent: Who by bodily fasting suppressest vice, ennoblest the mind, grantest virtue and rewardeth. It is no exaggeration, therefore, to maintain that Christians must find in abstinence an efficacious means to repair the losses of the spirit and augment its gains. Inspired by such motives, the Church wisely prohibits the use of flesh meat at duly appointed times. Seemingly harsh, the law of abstinence is the last analysis, the first attempt to medically and spiritually well being. The mechanism of the body stamps man as an omnivorous animal. Hence, all nations have adopted a mixed diet. Nay more, a priori and a posteriori reasons prove that the occasional interruption of meat diet conduces to bodily and spiritual health. In case of less rugged constitutions, the Church demands the regular observance of her legislation with the mildness of her dispensations.

Finally, the experience of nineteen centuries proves that transgression of this law neither promotes health nor prolongs life. Hence, consummate wisdom and prudence, seeking to safeguard the welfare of soul and body, inspire the Church to her laws pertaining to abstinence. (See Advent; Lent.)

ABSTINENCE, PHYSICAL EFFECTS OF.—The effects on the human system of abstinence from flesh meats divide themselves naturally and logically into two parts: (1) Effects due to total abstinence (in other words vegetarianism); (2) Effects due to partial or periodic abstinence, such as is enjoined by the Catholic Church. These abstinences comprise the fasts observed of Fridays, the fasts before feasts, the forty days of Lent, and the ember-days. It is the partial, or Roman Catholic, phase of the subject with which we have to deal.

Physiologically, man is an omnivorous animal, as evidenced by the structure and consequent nomenclature of the teeth; and a mixed diet, into which meat or flesh food largely enters, would seem to be the natural requirement for such a complex physiomechanical entity. Additional corroboration of this view is afforded by researches of physiological chemistry, and the discovery of elements produced at various points along the digestive tract. For instance, the function it is to peptonize milk-foods, emulsify fats and oils, destroy the insulation of muscular fibre, and prepare the nucleines for absorption and nutrition. Granting, therefore, that flesh food in some form is necessary for the human race as a whole, what are the physical effects of partial Abstinence therefrom? These effects are as numerous and divergent as the causes. We have first, the family history of the individual (diseases or tendencies inherited or acquired); second, age; third, personal history of the individual (diseases or tendencies inherited or acquired), natural or artificial infantile feeding; fourth, education and environment; fifth, climatic conditions; sixth, occupation and its effects on the physical and mental state of the individual; seventh, status praesens, and last—but really the most important of all—that indefinable but very tangible element which we may call for the individual, the collective, the group as well as the observed. Additional facts to be remembered are: (a) That women bear Abstinence better than men, because, as a rule, the former have greater development of fatty and less development of muscular tissue; (b) that mature age bears deprivation of customary food better than youth or old age; (c) that a very damp atmosphere, extremes of heat and cold, unhygienic surroundings (tenements, prisons, workhouses, etc.), insufficient, improper, and unwholesome food, the state of pregnancy, alcoholism, and the premature physical and mental decadence, due to the stress and strain to which life is subject, add to the already great number of factors which are all to be considered as important matters for investigation in any case that has to do with the question of Abstinence.

The Church has so wisely, and with a foreknowledge of scientific investigation and present proof so accurate as to be almost supernatural, taken all the above-mentioned conditions into consideration, in framing her laws regarding Abstinence, that there is not the slightest danger of any physical ill accruing to those to whom these laws apply. On the contrary, it is abundantly demonstrated by the highest scientific authority that temporary Abstinence from solid food in whole or in part, in a great proportion of waste material, and consequently, increased wear and tear on the organs of excretion,

Abstraction (Lat. abs, from; tradhere, to draw) is a process (or a faculty) by which the mind selects for consideration one of the attributes of something to the exclusion of the rest. With some writers, including the Scholastics, the attributes selected for attention are said to be abstracted; with others, as Kant and Hamilton, the term is applied to the exclusion of the attributes which are ignored; the process, however, is the same in both cases. The abstracting things are given various attributes; and the process of abstraction begins with sensation, as sight perceives certain qualities; taste, others; etc. From the dawn of intelligence the activity progresses rapidly, as all of our generalizations depend upon the abstraction from different objects of some phase, or phases, as a keynote of knowledge. A very important step is taken when the mind reaches the stage where it can handle its abstractions, such as extension, motion, species, being, cause, as a basis for science and philosophy, in which, to a certain extent at least, the abstracted concepts are manipulated like the symbols in algebra, without immediate reference to the concrete. This is not without its dangers of fallacy, but human knowledge would not progress far without it. It is, therefore, evident that methods of leading the mind from the concrete to the abstract, as well as the development of a power of handling abstract ideas, are matters of great importance in civil and individual liberty and morality. The dictative question raised by some as the result of the late Russo-Japanese War means nothing as a basis of comparison. It is a well-known fact that battles have been fought, and lost, and won, alike by men suffering from too much, too little, or no food at all. Wars and their eventualities depend, not so much on foods as on civil, religious, and politico-economic conditions. The medical and scientific world of to-day seems to be well satisfied in (1) That while man, by structure and development, is omnivorous, there is too much animal food consumed by the average individual, particularly the young centers of population. (2) That owing to this large consumption of food, which has an amount of waste out of proportion to its nutritive value, the vital organs are overlaid in their excretory functions, and that consequently, human life and usefulness is very frequently curtailed. (3) That foods overlapping of animal food in general way— as yet undefined— closely associated with the rapid increase of parasitic diseases like cancer. (4) That over-feeding— particularly with strong, meaty foods— together with lack of proper muscular exercise have much to do with the question of so-called “race-suicide.” This last suggestion arises from the well-known analogy between the reproductive processes in human and brute animals. Too much and too rich food combined with physical inactivity has a tendency to replace (by a process of degeneration) the muscular fibres of the reproductive organs by fat cells, and hence render such organs either sterile or incapable of carrying a pregnancy to term.

Abtain. (or Abthane), an English or Lowland Scotc form of the middle-Latin word abbatia (Gaelic, abhdainne), meaning abbacy. The exact sense of the word being lost, it was presumed to denote some ancient dignity, the holder of which was called abbanus or abhane. Dr. W. F. Skene (Historians of Scotland, IV; Fordun, II, 413) holds that the correct meaning, i.e. the special charge of various attributes; and the process of abstraction begins with sensation, as sight perceives certain qualities; taste, others; etc. From the dawn of intelligence the activity progresses rapidly, as all of our generalizations depend upon the abstraction from different objects of some phase, or phases, as a keynote of knowledge. A very important step is taken when the mind reaches the stage where it can handle its abstractions, such as extension, motion, species, being, cause, as a basis for science and philosophy, in which, to a certain extent at least, the abstracted concepts are manipulated like the symbols in algebra, without immediate reference to the concrete. This is not without its dangers of fallacy, but human knowledge would not progress far without it. It is, therefore, evident that methods of leading the mind from the concrete to the abstract, as well as the development of a power of handling abstract ideas, are matters of great importance in civil and individual liberty and morality. With this account of the place of abstraction in the process of knowledge, most philosophers—and all who base knowledge on experience—are in substantial agreement. But they differ widely concerning the nature and validity of abstract concepts themselves. A widely prevalent view, best represented by the Associationist school, is that general ideas are formed by the blending or fusing of individual impressions. The most eminent Scholastics, however, following Aristotle, ascribe to the mind in its higher aspect a power (called the Active Intellect) which abstracts from the representations of things or qualities the typical, ideal, essential elements, leaving behind those that are material and particular. The concepts thus formed may be very limited in content, and they vary in number and definiteness with the knowledge of particulars; but the activity of the faculty is always spontaneous and immediate; it is never a process of blending the particular representations into a composite idea, much less a mere grouping of similar things or attributes under a common name. The concept thus obtained represents an element that is universally realized in all members of the class, but it is recognized formally as a universal only by means of further observation and comparison. The arguments for the existence of such a faculty are not drawn from a study of its actual operation, which eludes our powers of introspection, but from an analysis of its results. Its defenders rely mainly on the fact that we possess knowledge of universals, and hence render such organs either sterile or incapable of carrying a pregnancy to term.

mountain chain of the Mounth and the Firth of Forth. Dr. Skene recommends the use of the word abhany or abhanny. Many of these abhains passed into the hands of laymen, and were transmitted from father to son. They paid certain ecclesiastical tributes, and seem to have closely resembled the termon lands of the early Irish Church.

ABUQUARA

Thomas Walsh.

Abucaire was a bishop of Caria in Syria; d. probably, in the 7th or 8th century. In his anti-heretical dialogues (P. G., XCIVI, 1466–1690) he claimed frequently to reproduce the identical words of the great Eastern theologian, St. John of Damascus, whose disciple he was. St. John addressed to him three famous discourses in defence of the sacred images. There are attempts to identify him with a Bishop Theodore of Caria who attended the Eighth Ecumenical Council of Constantinople (869).

Abydus (Abydos), a titular see of Troas in Asia Minor, suffragan of Cyzicus in the Hellespontic province. It was situated at the narrowest point of the Hellespont, and was famous as the legendary spot where Leander swam over to Sestus to visit his mistress, Hero. Here, too, Xerxes built the famous bridge of boats (480 B.C.) on which he crossed with his troops to a promontory on the opposite European shore.

Abyss (Abyssos), is primarily and classically an adjective, meaning deep, very deep (Wisd., x, 19; Job, xxxvi, 16). Elsewhere in the Bible, and once in Diog. Laert., it is a substantive. Some thirty times in the LXX, it is the equivalent of the Hebrew tehom, Assyrian taintu, and once each of the Hebrew meqalath, “sea-deep,” qalat, “deep flood,” and rácháb, “spacious place.” Hence the meanings: (1) primeval waters; (2) the waters beneath the earth; (3) the upper seas and rivers; (4) the abode of the dead; limbo; (5) the abode of the evil spirits, hell. The last two meanings are the only ones found in the New Testament.

Abyssinia.—Geography.— Abyssinia, extending from the sixth to the fifteenth degree of north latitude, and situated to the south of Nubia, is, by reason of its peculiar contour, unique among the countries of the African continent. It has been compared to a vast fortress, towering above the plains of eastern Africa. It is, in fact, a huge, granitic, basaltic mass, forming a great mountainous oval, with its main ridge towards the east. A chain runs for over 650 miles north and south; seen from the shores of the Red Sea, it looks like a vast wall, some 8,000 feet high near Kases, opposite Massowah; over 10,000 at Mount Suwara; 12,000 at the plateau of Angola, and more than 10,000 in Slioa. The Abyssinian chain, however, is mountainous only on the eastern side. On the other, it consists of plateaux of varying altitudes, broken up by mountains shattered by volcanic forces, the summits of which are over 6,500 feet high in Tigre, and from 13,000 to 16,000 in Simien. A comparative depression, that of Lake Tana, hollows out the high lands to the southwest. The lake itself is at an elevation of some five thousand feet, and the neighbouring plateaux, from that height to six thousand. The volcanic mass of Gojam, on the south, attains a height of more than 13,000 feet, while the peaks of Kalat rise to an altitude of some 12,000 feet. The remarkable elevation of Abyssinia gives it a peculiar climate, and savants have classified its defence into three chief zones. That of the low valleys, or kollas, is a district having the Soudanese climate, hot and humid; and a heavy summer rainfall. The soil is sandy, dry, and stony; the crops, maize, sugar cane, and cotton. Various kinds of acacia and mimosa form the sole vegetation of these arid, unhealthy regions, whose rushing torrents of the rainy season are but stony beds during the dry. The rocks and caverns are the haunts of lions and leopards; the trees swarm with monkeys. The scattered inhabitants of these burning plains are small, withered, nervous, irritable, and quarrelsome, devoid of the dignity which marks those who live in the high lands. The middle zone, or Voïna-dega, with an elevation of from 6,000 to 8,000 feet, is by far the largest part of Abyssinia, with an equable heat little greater than that of the Mediterranean. Thus Gondar (6,000 feet) has a mean annual temperature of 19° C. (66.2 Fahr.), with 16° C. (60.8 Fahr.) as the minimum of the coldest month. This is a temperature slightly higher than that of Southern Spain, Italy, and Greece, but as, in Abyssinia, the summer is the rainy season, the heat is by no means so unbearable as the summer months of the South of Europe. The lands of this region form a series of vast plateaux, covered with rich pastureage, the grazing ground of great herds of sheep and cattle. The air is pure and dry, the temperature moderate, water plentiful and of good quality; vines, olives, lemons, and pomegranates thrive there. Nearly the whole population of Abyssinia lives in this region. Here, too, are the cities, which are seldom found elsewhere, as the natural divisions of the country are such as keep the inhabitants in a state of patriarchal feudalism. The climate is very healthy, and sickness very infrequent. The cold zone, or dega, at an altitude of more than 8,000 feet, is marked by a variable temperature, and by chilly nights. The British army at a height of 10,400 feet met with four degrees of frost on 28

March. On the heights are found the rhododendrons, mosses, and lichens of the Alps.

ETHNOLOGY.—Few eastern or African nations exhibit such various aspects as the aborigines. Descendants of Cush are locally known as Agas, or “Free-men”, and still form the basis of the Abyssinian nation. On the west, they have intermarried with the ancient Berbers, while to the black, they must not be confused with the Niger, Congo, and Zambezi tribes. On the east, Semitic peoples, Arabs and Hiyaarites, having crossed the Red Sea in the fourth century n. c., conquered the whole eastern coast of Africa, and settled chiefly in the province called, after them, Amhara. The invasion of the Gun immediately followed, and in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries spread through all this region, and especially towards the south. These invasions and minglings of races in all ages have resulted in such diversity of type that the neighbouring Arab tribes never speak of the country but as Habesh (from which the name “Abyssinia” is derived), which means “a crowd” or “heap of sweepings”. Abyssinia answers to the Upper, or Eastern, Ethiopia of the ancients, and comprises the four provinces: Tigré, Amhara, Goggiam, and Shoar, four small kingdoms, entrusted to as many Ras, or Negus, whence the title, negus-an-numqen (King of Kings), the Emperor of Abyssinia. The whole empire contains some 4,000,000 inhabitants. According to the vague traditional legend of the “Glorious memories of the Empire,” or Kebré-nigrieth, the dynasty of the Ethiopian kings goes back to King Solomon and Makeddis, Queen of Sheba; and by it, the worship of the true God and the Mosaic Law were brought to Ethiopia. Whatever truth may be in this legend, it is certain that ancient Ethiopia was evangelized in Apostolic times by the eunuch of Queen Candace, baptized by Philip the Deacon, but was not wholly converted to the Faith until the year 341, when St. Frumentius (Keddwos Faranamot), who was tutor to the emperor’s two sons, won his pupils to Christianity. It was they who made both the capital and the empire Christian. Nor could St. Athanasius, Patriarch of Alexandria, find one whom he thought better fitted to rule this infant Church than its first apostle, Frumentius.

CHRISTIANITY.—The whole great Ethiopian empire did not, however, become Christian at that period; since, at the very gates of Gondar, the aboriginal tribes of the Kaman are pagans to-day, as they have been for fourteen centuries. Moreover, even the converted provinces retain, despite their Christian faith and morality, many remnants of their Judaic atavism. Even in the nineteenth century, idolatrous superstitions, fetishism, serpent-worship, and the cult of various jinns, Jewish practices, rest on the Sabbath, and the custom of worshipping children to the keeping of certain religious observances till the age of puberty are still active almost everywhere. In the sixteenth century, King Gheleadois found them so deeply rooted in the national habits that he tried to justify these in the eyes of the Church as purely civil customs in no way contrary to the laws of Christianity. So long as Christian Abyssinia could remain in touch with the Catholic Patriarch of Alexandria, it was preserved from the taint of Arianism, victorious almost everywhere else, as well as from the errors of Macedonian and Nestorius. In the seventh century, however, the Caliph Omar, after his conquest of Egypt, came to an understanding with the Jacobite Patriarch Benjamin, whereby the negus was promised toleration on that condition. Still, the Ethiopian Church, even after the ruin of the Alexandrian Church and of the Byzantine Empire in Egypt, resisted more or less successfully for nearly three centuries the heresies which infested all the other churches of the East. Moreover, during the times of schism, and of Byzantine or of Mussulman persecution, it became the refuge of the proscibed Catholics. Many monuments of the tenth and eleventh centuries, due to Egyptian refugees, bear witness to this fact by their Latin character, and it is also borne out by the manuscripts of the Soudan.

MODERN MISSIONS.—Communication between Rome and Abyssinia became more difficult, and from the end of the eleventh to the beginning of the thirteenth century one could see no bond existing between Abyssinia and the centre of Catholicism. The Sovereign Pontiffs, nevertheless, have bestowed a constant solicitude on Christianity of the Christians of Abyssinia, and the first missionaries sent to their aid were the Dominicans, whose success, however, roused the fanaticism of the Monophysites against them, and caused their martyrdom. For more than a hundred years silence enfolded the ruins of this Church. At a later period, the fame of the Crusades having spread, pilgrim monks, on their return from Jerusalem, wakened once more, by what they told in the Ethiopian court, the wish to be reunited to the Church. The Acts of the Council of Florence tell of the embassy sent by the emperor Zera-Jacob with the object of obtaining this result (1432). The negus was brought by the pope on his home journey, the messengers, while passing through Egypt, were given up to the schismatic Copts and to the Caliph, and put to death before they could bring the good news to their native land. More than a hundred years later, in 1557, the Jesuit Father Oriolo penetrated into Ethiopia. One of his successors, Father Pafes, succeeded in converting the Emperor Soinios himself. On 11 December, 1624, the Church of Abyssinia, abjuring the heresy of Eutyches and the schism of Dioscorus, was reunited to the true Church, a union which, unfortunately, proved to be only temporary. In 1632, the Negus Basiliades mounted the throne. Addicted as he was to polygamy and to every vice, he showed himself the relentless enemy of Catholicism and of its moral law. The Jesuits were handed over to the axe of the executioner, and Abyssinia remained closed to the missionaries until 1702. In that year three Franciscans got as far as Gondar, where they converted several princes. The Negus wrote with his own hand to Clement XI, professing his submission to His Holiness. Once more the hope proved futile. A palace revolution overthrew the Negus, and heresy again assumed the reins of power. From then until the middle of the nineteenth century, the Church of Abyssinia lay on the Church of Abyssinia. In 1846, the Holy See divided Ethiopia into two Apostolic vicariates: that of Abyssinia, entrusted to the Lazarists, and that of Galla, given to the Capuchins. In the former, the labours and success of M. de Jacobus awakened the jealousy of the schismatic clergy. An ex-Umir of Cairo, who had become Abouna of Ethiopia, and a man of low birth named Kassa, who had been anointed Negus under the name of Theodoros, joined forces to persecute the Catholics, drive out the missionaries, and put them to death. The Negus Johannes IV, who succeeded Theodoros, followed in his predecessor’s footsteps. His reign of twenty years was a time of trouble and suffering for the Catholics of Abyssinia. At last, however, Menelik, the King of Shoar, who became Negus and was crowned in March, 1889, restored tranquillity to the missions. Under his rule Catholic priests rest assured of justice, and protection throughout the whole of Ethiopia.

CHURCH CONSTITUTION.—Abyssinia is a province of the Patriarchate of Alexandria, the Church of Abyssinia being daughter of the Egyptian Church, and there is nothing to show that the daughter ever really tried to withdraw herself from the maternal jurisdiction. To-day the Abyssinians are governed as they were in the time of St. Athanasius, by a special delegate, who is practically the vicar of the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria, and is locally known as Abouna, or Abou-Salama, "Father of Peace." He has the sole right, throughout Ethiopia, and in perpetuity, of anointing the Negus "King of Kings"; of consecrating bishops, of ordaining priests and deacons, of blessing altar-stones, of superintending theological instruction, and of settling, as a last court of appeal, disputed or difficult questions of dogma, morals, and discipline. The law of Ethiopia demands that the Abouna shall always be a foreigner, an Egyptian, whom the Negus obtains, or rather buys, from the Khedive and the Coptic Patriarch of Cairo, the alleged successor of St. Mark in the See of Alexandria. Immediately after obtaining his episcopal consecration and his primatial jurisdiction, the Abouna sets out for Ethiopia, with no hope of return; but lands and large revenues ensure him a comfortable existence there. The Ithaguet, or Ethiopian Archbishop, is the second religious personage in Abyssinia. The Ethiopian primate is forbidden by the Patriarch of Alexandria to consecrate more than seven bishops, but there are a considerable number of secular and religious clergy, recruited with little discretion, and deplorably ignorant. The Ethiopian Church has, in addition to the priests and monks, an intermediate class, the Defaras, or literati, whose duty it is to preserve, interpret, and apply the written law, a vast collection of the ordinances of the Lower Empire, modified and altered by the Copts in order to ensure the supremacy of the See of Alexandria over the whole of Ethiopia. The liturgical language is the Geez, a mixture of Greek and Arabic.

Since the settlement of the Italians at Massowah and on the shores of the Red Sea, where they have founded the colony of Erythrea, Abyssinia has been divided into three missionary divisions. The Vicariate of Abyssinia, entrusted to the Lazarists, and comprising Tigré, Amhara, and Gondar, contained, in 1904, 4,000 Catholics, two churches, two chapels, six Lazarist priests, and four native secular priests, with more than sixty seminarians studying Geez at Alitena. The Prefecture of Erythrea, in the charge of Italian Capuchins, comprises the entire colony of that name, and contains 14,000 Catholics, thirty-three churches, and fifty-one priests, nine of whom are Capuchins. The Vicariate of the Gallas, in the kingdom of Shoa and among several tribes independent of the Negus, contains 18,000 Catholics and twenty churches. It is administered by twenty Capuchins, French for the most part, and eight secular priests. There are in Abyssinia 200,000 Mussulmans, with much influence in the country, and filling the most important positions at court; 100,000 Fugana, r0r 50,000 Jews. The only Protestants who have succeeded in gaining a foothold in Abyssinia during the nineteenth century are the missionaries of the Swedish National Society, who, however, may only labour in Erythrea, where they have two principal centres, at Moncullo, near Massowah, and at Geleb, as well as certain stations in Cunana land and in the province of Hamasaen. Their statistics give them 380 church members. The Catholic apostolate in Abyssinia must always exercise a courageious and an unfailing mildness. The missionaries will have to contend for many years against the Eutychian fanaticism of the monks, and the quarrelsome nature of the inhabitants. Moreover, the frequent political revolutions of the past give little hope of steady peace and security.

POLITICAL REVOLUTIONS. Wars. — The Gallas, or Oromo, race in the South has been the terror of Abyssinia ever since the sixteenth century. The importation of European rifles, as well as the dissensions among the Gallas tribes, gave an opportunity (1870) to Menelik, King of Shoa, to undertake the conquest of all the colonies of the Oromo nation as far as Lake Victoria-Nyanza and Uganda. This conquest was not achieved until more than thirty years after the time it was undertaken.

In 1846, Gregory XVI appointed as vicar apostolic to the Gallas mission. His successor William Massala, an Italian Capuchin, formerly tutor to King Humbert. The new prelate belonged to the Order of St. Francis, which was the only one that succeeded (1636-1752) in introducing Catholic priests into Abyssinia. The few apostles who braved the Schismatic, however, were all martyred. The first Franciscan missionaries were beheaded at Suakin, and Blessed Agathange of Vendôme and Cassianus of Nantes were ignominiously hanged (1638). More than a century later (1752), three others were stoned to death in a public square of Gondar. From this time, Abyssinia, as if barred from the rest of the world by a wall of iron, was an impenetrable region for the Church, and it was almost a century later that Mgr. Massala landed at Massowah to undertake to reanimate the old faith of the Ethiopians. In the disguise of a merchant, under the constant espionage of the mercenaries of the Abouna-Salama and Theodoros, now welcomed by certain chiefs, again attacked by a fresh band, and condemned to death, he always contrived to escape. He left Abyssinia to go to France and England, where he conferred with Napoleon III and Queen Victoria. Having received from them important help for his work, he returned to his mission, in September, 1853. On his return, he revised a Gallal dictionary, translated the Bible, converted the Bible, translated the Bible. After a fruitful apostolic mission of thirty-five years among the Gallas tribes, Mgr. Massala was created a Cardinal by Leo XIII, and died in 1889, leaving 10,000 Christians in the country.

The British Consul, Walter Plowden, a hardy adventurer, frequently gave the Negus Theodoros such timely assistance as led to his success in several wars. Plowden was assassinated, however, and his successor, Captain Charles Duncan Cameron, failed to establish a good understanding with the African emperor. Suspected of having had an understanding with the Mussulmans of Egypt, who had just defeated Thedorae at Gedarek in the Sudan, he was imprisoned (July, 1863) with some German missionaries accused of having spoken ill of the Negus. After various mishaps, he passed through Theodores war, which was put up by brutally consigning the British Consul and the members of his suite, together with some other Europeans, tied together in pairs, to the fortress of Magdala, which he had chosen as his capital. On hearing of this outrageous infringement of international law, the patience of the British gave way, and on the 20th of July (1867) an expedition, under the able leadership of Sir Robert Napier, who had already made a name by his victories in India, was placed in command of the troops assigned to this expedition. Colonel Merewether, whose activity in this campaign did much to win for him the rank of general, having previously reconnoitred the ground, suggested that the landing be made at Adulis in Annessley Bay. The British army comprised 16,000 combatants, an equal number of servants, forty-five elephants, and a great many pack mules. Napier, on landing in Abyssinia (3 January, 1868), issued a proclamation to the Ethiopians to the effect that the sole object of the invasion was to deliver the captives, and that he had nothing but friendly feelings except for those who should set out to interfere with his progress. With this, the army boldly began its march through the steep defiles of the great African citadel. After marching about fifty-three miles, the vanguard reached the plateau of Sennaé, where they found a delightful climate, a temperature of 30° to 43° Fahr., and a most fertile country. Word reached them here that several Ras and governors of provinces, discontented with the suspicious Theodores, stood ready to replenish their commissary and to supply them with horses. Napier made this plateau his base of operations. He was obliged to cover his line of march by three entrenched camps, the first at Sennaé, the second at Addizera, and the third at Antolo. At last, on 10 April, the troops reached the slopes of Silasssa without having encountered a single hostile soldier, when suddenly a cannon was fired on the heights, and 6,000 Abyssinians hurled themselves down upon the 16,000 British. The Snider rifles, however, which the British used for the first time in this engagement, quickly brought the assailants to a halt, and disabled the greater number. By 13 April, the British were beneath the walls of Magdala, which surrendered on the second days. Soon Theodores saw the British soldiers entering the city, feeling himself abandoned by all, and conquered, he put a pistol to his mouth and killed himself. The victorious army then released the prisoners, whom they had hardly hoped to find alive. On 17 April, Napier, henceforth Lord Napier of Magdala, ordered the inhabitants to evacuate the city, after which the walls were demolished, and the public buildings given to the flames. It was necessary to hasten the return of the troops to the sea, as the rains had already made the passage difficult. The troops embarked as they arrived at the Red Sea, on deck from the heights of Silasssa.

This prompt and lucky campaign of the English was to inspire the Italians twenty-eight years later to make a like bold attempt. Their ambitious designs, however, roused the whole country against them, and the bloody battle of Adoa (March, 1896) in which almost 20,000 were killed, put an end to their dreams. By 1868, Mr. Reid, first secretary of the British Legation at Cairo, was entrusted with a mission to the Negus. A treaty was signed 14 May, and Menelik proclaimed the Mahdists enemies of his empire. He also asked for the adjustment of the frontiers between Harrar and Somaliland. Later, a plan for a treaty between England and Abyssinia was concluded which guaranteed the independence of Ethiopia and assured to the three Powers bordering on the kingdom their respective rights and interests.

The Abyssinian Church.—The chief distinction between the Abyssinian Church and the Catholic Church is the erroneous doctrine that there is but one divine nature in Christ, one divine nature and the human nature being in some manner unified by a species of fusion. It was in Mary's womb according to some, or at the baptism of Christ according to others, that the Holy Ghost effected this union. Then, assuming that the two natures in Christ, human and divine, form but one, Mary is the mother of the divine as well as of the human nature of her Son, and becomes by that very fact almost equal to God the Father. To these, so to speak, original errors of the Monophysites the Ethiopian Church added some of its own: e.g. the belief that the faith of parents suffices to save their children who die unbaptized; the wholesale repudiation of all Councils and Councils held since the Council of Ephesus, and the belief in traducianism as an explanation of the soul's origin. Moreover, they still retain in full force various practices of the primitive Church which have long since fallen into desuetude elsewhere; e.g. abstinence from the flesh and blood of animals which have been strangled; Baptism by immersion; the custom of administering Communion to little children under the species of wine; resting from work on the Sabbath, and the celebration of the Agape. It may be added that no church has kept to this very day a more visible imprint of the Jewish religion. Children of both sexes are circumcised by women two weeks after birth. They are then baptized, girls on the eightieth and boys on the fortieth day. As in Judea, they distinguish by the term "Nazarenes" children dedicated by their parents to the observance of certain practices or prohibitions, such as eating drinking hydromel and shaving the head. The canon of Scripture admitted by the Ethiopians comprises, besides the books accepted by Catholics, certain apocryphal works, such as the "Book of Enoch", the "Ascension of Isaiah", etc. The oldest translation of the Bible into Ethiopian dates from the fourth century, having been made by Mr. Reid, first secretary of the British Legation at Cairo. Gheeze, Pell, Platt, and Dillmann have edited some of the manuscripts in London and Leipzig, but the majority still remain untouched, in convents of Abyssinian monks. The present clergy are buried in a state of deplorable ignorance. Little is required of secular priests beyond the ability to read and to recite the Nicene Creed, and a knowledge of the most necessary liturgical rites.
The monks in their numerous convents receive an education somewhat more complete, and occasionally there are found among them men versed in sacred hermeneutics, who can recite by heart the entire Bible.

Acacia (in Hebrew shiftah, plural shiftim; Theod. ακαθ; Vulgate, spina, thorn). The Hebrew shiftah is probably a contraction of Shârah, and thus identical with the Egyptian isment, the Coptic sceptum, thorn; the Arabic sarm. Hence the Greek name ακάκα, thorn, the Latin, acanthus for the Egyptian acacia. Acacia wood is designated δυσορ δυσορ, “incorruptible wood”, in the Septuagint, and lignum setum, “setim-wood” in the Vulgate. The Biblical Acacia belongs to the genus Mimus, and is no doubt identical with the Acacia seyal (Del.) or the Acacia tortilis (Hoyne), both of which are dried or formed into small roots or stumps. They grow in the desert, or torrent valleys, of Sinai. The wood is light, hard, and durable, and grows almost as black as ebony with age. The ark of the covenant, the table of the loaves of proposition, the altar of holocausts, the altar of incense, the wooden parts of the tabernacle, were made of setim-wood (Ex. xxv. 5). Acacians, THE, known also as the HOMOEANS, an Arian sect which first emerged into distinctness as an ecclesiastical party some time before the concordation of the joint Synods of Arimnion (Rimini) and Seleucia in 359. The sect owed its name as well as its political importance to Acacius, Bishop of Cesarea, the rep. A'xaxar, whose theory of adherence to scriptural phraseology it adopted and endeavoured to summarize in its various catch words: διωκετος, διωκετος και κατα παρακληση, κ. τ. λ.

In order to understand the theological significance of Acacianism as a critical episode, if only an episode, in the history of the church in the way in which the development of Arianism, it is needful to recall that the great definition of the Homoouios, promulgated at Nicaea in 325, so far from putting an end to further discussion, became rather the occasion for keener debate and for still more distressing confusion of statement in the formulation of theories on the relationship of Our Lord to His Father, in so far as that relationship constituted a distinct tenet of orthodox belief. Events which had already begun to ripen towards a fresh crisis shortly after the advent of Constantius to sole power, on the death of his brother Constans in the year 350. The new Augustus was a man of vacillating character with an unfortunate susceptibility to flattery and a turn for theological debate (Amianus, XXI, 6) that soon made him a mere puppet in the hands of the Eusebian faction. Roughly speaking, there were at this period but three parties in the Church: the Orthodox or Nicaean, party, which sought to hold the ground, the Party of Athanasius, which his supporters and who insisted on making his cause their own; the Eusebian or Court party and their wretched Semi-Arian followers; and, last of all, and not least logical in their demands, the Anomoean party which owed its origin to Aetius. In the summer of 357, Ursacius and Valens, the satute, but not always consistent advocates of this latter group of disidents in the West, through the influence which they were enabled to bring to bear upon the Emperor by means of his second wife, Aurelia Eusebia (Panegyr. Jul. Orat., iii; Ambianus, XX, vi, 4), succeeded in bringing about a conference of bishops at Sirmium.

In the Latin creed put forth at this meeting there was inserted a statement of views drawn up by Potamius of Lisbon and the venerable Hosius of Cordova, which, under the name of the Sirmian Manifesto, as it afterwards came to be known, roused the whole of the Western Church and threw the tempers of the East into disorder. In this statement the assembled bishops, while condemning in “One God, the Father Almighty, and in His only-begotten Son, Our Lord Jesus Christ, generated from Him before the ages,” recommended the disuse of the terms οὐσία (essence or substance), ὑοσία (identical in essence, or substance), and ὕοσία (similar in essence, or substance), “by which the minds of many are perturbed”; and they held that there “ought to be no mention of any of them at all, nor any exposition of them in the Church, and for this reason and for this consideration that there is nothing written about them in divine Scripture and that they are above men’s knowledge and understanding” (Athanasius, Historia Arianistarum, xxviii; Soz., ii, xxx; Hil., De Syn., xi). The effect of these propositions upon conservative opinion was like that of the proverbial spark in a barrel of gunpowder. As we look back from the standpoint of modern Catholicism upon the circumstances of this publication, it is impossible not to see that they occasioned the crisis upon which the whole subsequent history of Arianism turned. In spite of the scriptural disclaimer against the employment of inscrutable terms, nearly all parties instinctively perceived that the Manifesto was nothing but a plainly Anomoean document.

The situation was assuredly rich in possibilities. Men began to group themselves along new lines. In the East, the Anomoeans turned almost as a matter of course to Acacius of Cesarea, whose influence was growing stronger at court and who was felt to be a shrewd and not too scrupulous temporizer. In the West, bishops like Ursacius and Valens began to carry on a like policy; and every-where it was felt that the time called once more for concerted action on the part of the Church. This was precisely what the party in favour with the Emperor Constantius were eager to bring about; but the Occasion of the Nicaean Synod was not expected. A single council might not be easily controlled; but two separate synods, sitting, one in the East and the other in the West, could be kept better in hand. After a number of preliminary conferences accompanying an inevitable campaign of pamphleteering in which Hilary of Poitiers and part,plished the bishops of the Western portion of the Empire met at Arimnion towards the end of May, and those of the East at Seleucia in the month of September. 359. The theological complexion of both Synods was identical, at least in this, that the party of compromise, represented at Seleucia by Acacius and at Arimnion by Ursacius and Valens, was politically, though not numerically, in the ascendant and could exercise a subtle influence which depended almost as much on the argumentative ability of their leaders as on their curial prestige. In both councils, as the result of dastardly intrigue and an unscrupulous use of intimidation, the Father, whom the Anomoeans had with the name of Acacius ultimately prevailed.

The Homoouios, for which so much had been endured by saintly champions of orthodoxy for over half a century, was given up and the Son was declared to be merely similar to—no longer identical in essence with—the Father. St. Jerome’s characterisation of the issue still affords the best commentary, not only on what had come to pass, but on the means employed to obtain it. The whole world groaned in wonderment to find itself Arian—"ingenius locus orbis et ecclesiae Arianus." It was Acacius with his followers who had skillfully managed the whole proceeding from the outset. By coming forward as advocates of temporizing methods they had inspired the Eusebian or Semi-Arian party with the idea of throwing over Aetius and his Anomoeans. They thus found themselves thrust into a position of importance to which neither their numbers nor their theological acumen entitled them. As they had proved themselves in practice all through the course of the unlooked-for movement that brought them to the front, so were they now; in theory, the exponents of the Via Media of their day. They separated themselves from the orthodox by the rejection of the word ἴδωριστος; from the Semi-Arians by their surrender of the ἴδωρισις; and from the Aetians by their insistence upon the term ἱστοισ. They retained their influence as a distinct party just so long as their spokesman and leader Acacius enjoyed the favour of Constantinople. Under Julian the Apostate, Aetius, who had been exiled as the result of the proceedings at Seleucia, was allowed to regain his influence. The Acacians seized the occasion to make common cause with his ideas, but the alliance was only political; they threw him over once more at the Synod of Antioch under Jovian in the Semi-Arian Synod of Lampceus condemned Acacius. He was deposed from his see; and with that event the history of the party to which he had given his name practically came to an end.

Acacius was always an avowed rigorist in conduct and enjoyed great repute for piety. Sozomen (VII, xxviii) tells us that he was "rigid in observing all the regulations of the ascetic life" and that when raised to the episcopate his life was lived practically and exactly "as under the ascetic rule." Theophylact, in his admiration for his many episcopal qualities, calls him "an athlete of virtue" (V, iv). Early in the episcopate of St. John Chrysostom, in the year 398, Acacius came to Constantinople, where he was treated with less distinction than he had apparently looked for. Whatever may have been the nature of the slight put upon him, he seems to have felt it keenly; for Palladius, St. John's biographer, records a most unepiscopal saying of the injured prelate to the effect that he would one day give his brother of Constantinople a taste of his own hospitality—"εἰς ἀξία ἄξιων ἱκανον" (Pallad., Vita Chrys., VI, viii, in P. G., XLVII, 22-29). It is certain, at any rate, that from this time forth, Acacius showed himself indefatigable in working for the great orator-bishop's removal and was not the least active of those who took part in the disgraceful "Synod of the Oak" in the year 403. Indeed, he was one of the notorious "seven" whom the emperor exiled. On the death of Constantine in 378, he gave public recognition to the great services of Acacius and ordained him to the See of Beroea. We next hear of Acacius in Rome, apparently as a deputy on the part of Meletius and the Fathers of the Antiochen Synod, when the questions connected with the heresy of Apollinaris came up for discussion before Pope Damasus. While fulfilling this difficult embassy he attended the meeting of the prelates summoned to decide upon the errors of Apollinaris, and subscribed the profession of faith in the "Two Natures." It was thus largely due to his efforts that the various schismatical movements at Antioch were brought to a close. Let us not find him at Constantinople whither he had gone to take part in the second General Council convened in 381. to re-emphasize the Nicene definitions and to put down the errors of the Macedonians or Pneumatomachians. Miltiades of Antioch died in the same year and Acacius, unfortunately, took part in the illegitimate consecration of Flavian. For this unconscionably schismatical proceeding—schiastical in the sense that it was an explicit violation of the agreement entered into between Paulinus and Meletius and tended unthankfully to keep the Eustathian party in power—Acacius fell under the displeasure of Pope Damasus, who held some of his opinion among his supporters. This Roman excommunication lasted some ten or eleven years until the Council of Capua admitted him to unity in 391 or 392 (Labe, Conc., II, 1072). In 398 Acacius, who was now in his seventy-sixth year, was charged once more with a delicate mission to the Roman Church. Having been conducted by the Arian Alexius, it was Acacius and his followers who had skilfully managed the whole proceeding from the outset. By coming forward as advocates of temporizing methods they had inspired the Eusebian or Semi-Arian party with the idea of throwing over Aetius and his Anomoeans. They thus found themselves thrust into a position of importance to which neither their numbers nor their theological acumen entitled them. As they had proved themselves in practice all through the course of the unlooked-for movement that brought them to the front, so were they now; in theory, the exponents of the Via Media of their day. They separated themselves from the orthodox by the rejection of the word ἴδωριστος; from the Semi-Arians by their surrender of the ἴδωρισις; and from the Aetians by their insistence upon the term ἱστοισ. They retained their influence as a distinct party just so long as their spokesman and leader Acacius enjoyed the favour of Constantinople. Under Julian the Apostate, Aetius, who had been exiled as the result of the proceedings at Seleucia, was allowed to regain his influence. The Acacians seized the occasion to make common cause with his ideas, but the alliance was only political; they threw him over once more at the Synod of Antioch under Jovian in the Semi-Arian Synod of Lampceus condemned Acacius. He was deposed from his see; and with that event the history of the party to which he had given his name practically came to an end.
to write his "History of Heresies" (Hier., i, 2, in P. G., XLI, 176). He died at the extraordinary age of one hundred and ten years.

Acacius, Bishop of Cesarea in Palestine, disciple and biographer of Eusebius, the historian, whose successor in the See of Cesarea he became in 340. Nothing is known of the date or country of his birth, but he was probably a Syrian; and throughout his life bore the nickname of μούσελάθρας (one-eyed); no doubt from a personal defect (S. Hier. Viri III., XCIII), but possibly with a maliciously figurative reference, also, to his general shiftness of conduct and his rare skill in ambiguous statement. He was a prelate of great learning, a patron of studies (S. Hier., Epist. ad. Marcellum, 141), and was the author of a treatise on Ecclesiastics. He also wrote six books of miscellaneous (συμμετα τοιχία) or essays on various subjects which have come down to us only in fragments. The students may consult these fragments: Socrates (in his Historia Ecclesiastica, c. 336, and lxi, 254 sqq. [ed. Harless]). He is remembered chiefly for his bitter opposition to St. Cyril of Jerusalem and for the part he was afterwards enabled to play in the more acute stages of the Arian controversy. There is a significant passage in the famous twenty-first oration of St. Gregory Nazianzen, in which that champion of orthodoxy speaks of "the tongue of the Arians" (Orat., xxi, 21) in dubiously complimentary terms.

If, as seems probable, it is Acacius who is there referred to, it can only be said that the story of his career fully justifies the implication so darkly made. He was an apostate, and as such is described by Newman (Arians 4th Cent., 4th ed., 274) as "practised in the gymnastics of the Aristotelian school"; and his readiness in debate and genius for intrigue, joined to the prestige he already possessed as the friend and successor of the great Church-historian of Cesarea, naturally singled him out as the likeliest spokesman and guiding spirit of the Court faction, even before their first great leader, Eusebius of Nicomedia, had passed away. He was one of the notorious "ninety" who signed the ambiguous creed at Antioch, in the presence of Constantius in 341 (Sozomen, in the order of the Golden Basiliac). For his part in this transaction and for his open advocacy of a policy of reticence towards the Nicanian formula, we find his name mentioned in the list of those who were deposed by the Council of Sardica in 347 (Athenagoras, Hist. Art., XVII; Epist. ad. Egypt., VII). Refusing to acquiesce in the sentence passed upon him, he withdrew with the other bishops of the Court faction to Philippopolis, where he in turn helped to secure a sentence of excommunication and deposition against his judges and also against Pope Julius, the patron and defender of St. Athanasius, and against Hosius of Cordova (Soc. II, xvi; Soc. III, xiv; Theod. II, xxvi; Labbe, Conc., II, 625-629). These penalties which were inflicted on him at the hands of the orthodox did nothing, of course, to diminish his prestige. If we may trust the testimony of St. Jerome, his credit with Constantius was so great that Eusebius almost came to grief when he was deposed and driven into exile, in 355 or 357, Acacius was able to secure the intrusion of Felix the Anti- pope in his place.

The year 355 marks the culmination of his acrimonious and undignified quarrel with Cyril of Jerusalem. The misunderstanding, which dated back to a period not long after Cyril's installation, had arisen ostensibly over a question of canonical precedence, but was most probably rooted in the chagrin that Acacius characteristically felt at being unable to sway Cyril's policy entirely to his own liking. Charges and counter-charges of heresy followed for some years, until Acacius managed to secure the deposition of Cyril through the efforts of some of the Apostolic bishops, whom he had induced to examine a wholly ridiculous charge of contumacy. Cyril went into exile, but was restored to his church within two years by a decision of the famous Council of Seleucia. But the extraordinary credit enjoyed by Acacius with the weak-minded Emperor Constantius, is evidence of his power. This act of ordinary justice, and, in 360, Cyril was condemned once more—this time through the influence which Acacius was able to exercise at the Synod of Constantinople. Cyril was forced to yield. He left his see and remained in exile until the accession of Julian, in 361. The fact, however, that Acacius received a temporary check in the reinstatement of Cyril, at the hands of the Synod of Seleucia, must not blind the reader to the real weight of his influence either in the Council itself or in the ecclesiastical politics of the time. He was among the foremost of the Arianizing prelates who succeeded in carrying on in the name of the Emperor the work of disunifying the Synod to solve the problems created by the Sirian manifest. In this sense he may be charged with the bulk of the mischief created by the definitions of Ariminum and Seleucia. The turbulent and unscrupulous faction which rallied to the support of his ideas in both gatherings was entirely his creation and rightly bore his name—πτερ ό τις Ἀκαίεω.

The detailed account of his activities at Seleucia belongs rather to the history of that gathering than to the present sketch of his life; but some notice of his mode of procedure will not be out of place here. The number of bishops present has been variously estimated as somewhere between sixty and one hundred and sixty (Gwatkin, Studies in Arianism, v, note G, where the original authorities are ably discussed). The Semi-Arians were in a large majority; and Acacius had a well-disciplined following, which, with the Anomoeans whom he had won to his side, by holding out hopes of a compromise, amounted to some forty in all. The first critical stage of events was soon marked by the re-adoption of the Semi-Arian Creed of Antioch, known popularly as the "Creed of the Encenia," or "Creed of the Dedication" (δ ξ η τον Ενκενια), which was not only distinct from the orthodox creed, but had an entirely different character about it being that it was Anti-Nicene in scope and had been framed by men who had deliberately confirmed the deposition of St. Athanasius. The next stage of events was more significant still; for it gave Acacius and his followers the opportunity to reveal their strength. Silvanus of Tarsus proposed to confirm the famous Lucianic Creed, when Acacius and his party arose and left the assembly, by way of protest. In spite of this move the Creed was signed the next morning with closed doors; a proceeding which Acacius promptly characterized as a "deed of darkness". On Wednesday Basil of Ancyra and Macedonius of Constantinople arrived with Hilary of Poitiers, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Eustathius. Cyril was already under censorship; and Acacius refused to bring his followers back to the synod until he and some other accused bishops who were present had withdrawn. After a stormy debate on the plan to convene the Cones, or representative of Constantius at the deliberation, rose and read a copy of a new Creed which Acacius had put into his hands. While not expressly repudiating the Lucianic formulas, it nevertheless objected to the terms ἐκκλησία and ἔκκλησία as being alike unscriptural. This led to a very heated discussion, and on Thursday Acacius found himself...
bluntly attacked by Eleusius, the ex-soldier and Semi-Arian Bishop of Cyriacus.

On this Acacius refused once more to take part in any further deliberations and Leonaes joined with him, on the plea, as he averred, that the Emperor had not sent him to preside over a council of bishops who could not agree among themselves. The majority thereupon convened without them and deposed Acacius and some fifteen other prelates. That act led to a new crisis. It was not without the formal manner of deposition against him, but set out immediately, with eight others, for Constantinople. On arriving there he discovered that his object had already been secured by the advent of a number of disaffected deputies from Ariminum. The famous conference of Niketas (Arianopole) had taken place without the supposed safe-guard of the σφαῖρα, had been adopted. This led to a fresh synod held at the suggestion of Constantius in the imperial city itself. It meant the complete triumph of the indefatigable Acacius. Homoean ideas were established at Constantinople; and, although their influence never lasted very long in the West, they enjoyed a fluctuating but disquieting supremacy in the East for nearly twenty years longer. Acacius returned to his see in 361 and spent the next two years of his life in filling the vacant sees of Palestine with men who were thought to sympathize with his polity. With characteristic adroitness he consented to a complete change of front and made a public profession of adherence to the Nicene formularies on the accession of Jovian in 363. When the Arian Valens was proclaimed Augustus in 364, however, Acacius once more reconsidered his views and took sides with Eudoxius; but his versatility this time served him to little purpose. When the Macedonian bishops met at Lampacus, the sentence previously passed against him was confirmed and he is heard of no more in authentic history. Barounos gives the date of his death as 368.

ACACIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE; SCHismatic; d. 489. When Acacius first appears in authentic history it is as the διοικητής, or dignitary entrusted with the care of the orphans, in the Church of Alexandria. He thus occupied a post that conferred upon its possessor high rank as well as curial influence; and, if we may borrow a hint as to his real character from the phrases in which Suidas has attempted to describe his undoubtedly striking personality, he early made the most of his opportunities. He seems to have affected an engaging magnificence of manner; was open-handed, suave, yet noble, in demeanour; courteously in speech, and fond of a certain ecclesiastical display. On the death of the Patriarch Gennadius, in 471, he was chosen to succeed him, and for the first five or six years of his episcopate his life was uneventful enough. But the change when Basilius allowed himself to be won over to Eutychian teaching by Timotheus Ælorus, the Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria, who chanced at that time to be a guest in the imperial capital. Timotheus, who had been recalled from exile only a short time previously, was bent on creating an effective opposition to the deposed Basilius. And he succeeded so well at court that Basilius was induced to put forth an encyclical or imperial proclamation (Ἐπιστολή) in which the teaching of the Council was rejected. Acacius himself seems to have hesitated at first about adding his name to the list of the Asiatic bishops who had already signed the encyclical; but, warned by a letter from Pope Simplicius, he had learned of his questionable attitude from the ever-vigilant monastic party, he reconsidered his position and threw himself violently into the debate. This sudden change of front redeemed him in popular estimation, and he won the regard of the orthodox, particularly among the monastic communities throughout the East, by his now ostentatious concern for sound doctrine. The fame of his awakened zeal even travelled to the West, and Pope Simplicius wrote him a letter of commendation. The chief circumstance to which he owed this sudden wave of popular support was perhaps his adroit and successful effort to bring it about that he succeeded in putting himself at the head of the particular movement of which Daniel the Stylite was both the corypheus and the true inspirer. The agitation was, of course, a spontaneous one on the part of its monastic promoters and of the populace at large, who sincerely detested Eutychian theories of the Incarnation but were uncertain whether Acacius, either in orthodox opposition now, or in unorthodox efforts at compromise later on, was anything preferable than a politician seeking to compass his own personal ends. Of theological principles he seems never to have had a consistent grasp. He had the soul of a gamer, and he played only for influence. Basilius was beaten. He withdrew his offensive encyclical by a counter-proclamation, but his surrender did not save him. His rival Zeno, who had been a fugitive up to the time of the Acacian opposition, drew near the capital. Basilius, desolate as he was, sought sanctuary in the cathedral church and was given up to his enemies, tradition says, by the time-serving Patriarch. For a brief space there was complete accord between Acacius, the Roman Pontiff, and the dominant party of Zeno, on the necessity for taking stringent methods to enforce the authority of the Fathers of Chalcedon; but trouble broke out once more when the Monophysite party of Alexandria attempted to force the notorious Peter Mongius into that see against the more orthodox claims of John Talaia in the year 482. This time events took on a more critical aspect, for they gave Acacius the opportunity he seemed to have been waiting for all along of exalting the authority of his see and claiming for it a primacy of honour and jurisdiction over the entire East, which would emancipate the bishops of the capital not only from all responsibility to the sees of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, but to the Roman Pontiff as well. Acacius, however, had already fully ingratiated himself with Zeno, induced that emperor to take sides with Mongius. Pope Simplicius made a vehement but ineffectual protest, and Acacius replied by coming forward as the apostle of re-union for all the East. It was a specious and far-reaching scheme, but it laid bare eventually the ambitions of the Patriarch of Constantinople, which Acacius revealed and revealed him, to use Cardinal Hergenröther's illuminating phrase, as “the forerunner of Photius”.

The first effective measure which Acacius adopted in his new rôle was to draw up a document, or series of articles, which constituted at once both a creed and an instrument for assuming by the see of Alexandria to students of theological history as the Henoticom, was originally directed to the irreconcilable factions in Egypt. It was a plea for re-union on a basis of reticence and compromise. And under this aspect it suggests a significant comparison with another and better known set of “articles” composed nearly a thousand centuries later and which, like the Henoticom, was originally directed to the irreconcilable factions in Egypt. while the anathemas of Cyril were accepted. The teaching of Chalcedon was not so much repudiated as mitigated. Chalcedon described by Cyril as the “only-begotten Son of God . . . one and not two” (“οὐδεξος τον μονογενη τον δυο ημεν και εις δυο . . . έκ το δυο,” v. t. ι. λ.), and there was no explicit reference to the two Natures. Mongus naturally accepted this accommodatingly vague teaching. Talaia refused to subscribe to it and set out for Rome, where his cause was taken up with great vigour by Pope Simplicius. The controversy dragged on under Felix II (or III) who sent two legatine bishops, Vitalis and Misenus, to Constantinople, to summon Acacius before the Roman See for trial. Never was the masterfulness of Acacius so striking and the acquiescence he inspired so shaming over this luckless pair of bishops. He induced them to communicate publicly with him and sent them back stultified to Rome, where they were promptly condemned by an indignant synod which reviewed their conduct. Acacius was branded by Pope Felix as one who had sinned against the Holy Ghost and apostolic authority (“hae ergo cum his . . . portionem S. Spiritus iudicio et apostolice autoritate damnatus”); and he was declared to be perpetually excommunicated—“nuncupamque anathematis vincula crudenus.” Another envoy, inappropriately named Talaia, came to carry this double excommunication to Acacius in person; and he, too, like his hapless predecessors, fell under the strange charm of the courtly prelate, who enticed him from his allegiance. Acacius refused to accept the documents brought by Talaia and showed his sense of the authority of the Roman See, and of the synod which had condemned him, by reasigning the name of Pope Felix from the diptychs. Talaia equivalently gave up the fight by consenting to become Bishop of Nola, and Acacius began by a brutal policy of violence and persecution, directed chiefly against his old opponent the monks, to work with Zeno for the general adoption of the Henoticism throughout the East. He thus managed to secure a political semblance of the prize for which he had worked from the beginning. He was practically the first prelate throughout Eastern Christendom until his death in 499. His schism outlived him some thirty years, and was ended only by the return of the Emperor Justinian over Pope Hormisdas (519).

Acacius, Saint, Bishop of Melitene in the third century. The Greeks venerate him on different days, but especially on 31 March. He lived in the time of the persecution of Decius, and although it is certain that he was cited before the tribunal of Marcin to give an account of his faith, it is not sure that he died for it. He was indeed condemned to death, but the Emperor released him from prison after he had undergone considerable suffering. He was famous both for the splendour of his doctrinal teaching and the miracles he wrought. There was a younger Acacius, who was also Bishop of Melitene, and who was conspicuous in the Council of Ephesus, but it is not certain that he is to be ranked among the saints.

Academies. Roman.—The Italian Renaissance at its apogee [from the close of the Western Schism (1418) to the middle of the sixteenth century] found two intellectual centres, Florence and Rome. Scientific, literary, and artistic culture attained in them a development as intense as it was multifar, and the earlier Roman and Florentine academies were typical examples of such activity. To call the attention to the Roman academies, beginning with a general survey of them, and adding historical and bibliographical notes concerning the more important of these associations of learned men, for the Italian “Academies” were that and not institutes of instruction. The Academies are not to be found in Rome any institutions that could be called scientific or literary academies. As a rule, there was slight inclination for such institutions. The Academy of Charlemagne and the Floral Academy at Toulouse were princely courts at which literary meetings were held. A special reason why literature did not get a stronger footing at Rome was the frequent constant politico-religious disturbances of the Middle Ages. Owing to the oppression of the papacy under the Hohenstaufen emperors, to the struggles for ecclesiastical liberty begun by Gregory VII, to the epic conflict between Guelph and Ghibelline, to the intrusion of a French domination which gave birth to papal Avignon and the Western Schism, medieval Rome was certainly no place for learned academies. But when papal unity was restored, and the popes returned to Rome, the Renaissance was at its height, and the city welcomed and encouraged every kind of intellectual culture. At this time the modest beginnings of the history of the Roman academies. At Rome and Florence, the academies reproduced to a considerable extent the traditions of the Academy of Plato; i.e. they were centres for the cultivation of philosophy in that larger sense dear to Greek and Roman antiquity, according to which it meant the broadest kind of culture. From the earliest days of the Renaissance the Church was the highest type of such an academy and the most prolific source of culture. The neo-Platonic movement was an extremely powerful factor in the Renaissance, implying as it did, a return to classical thought, and a reaction against the decadent (Aristotelian) Scholasticism of the age. At the head of this movement in the above named “capital of thought” were two Greeks, Gemistus Pletton at Florence, and Cardinal Bessarion (d. 1472) at Rome. About 1450 the house of the latter was the centre of a flourishing Academy of Platonic philosophy and of a varied intellectual culture. His valour, his library (which he built at the expense of Venice) was at the disposal of the academicians, among whom were the most intellectual Italians and foreigners resident in Rome. This Platonic propaganda (directed vigorously against the “peripatetic” restoration and the anti-Platonic attacks of the neo-Aristotelian school) had an echo in a small Latin folio of Bessarion, “Against the Calumniators of Plato” (Rome, 1469). Bessarion, in the latter years of his life, retired from Rome to Ravenna, but he left behind him ardent adherents of the classic philosophy. Unfortunately, in Rome the Renaissance never got on more modern than pagan character and fell into the hands of humanists without faith and without morals. This imparted to the academy movement a tendency to pagan humanism, one evidence of which is found in the celebrated Roman Academy of Pomponio Leto.

Giulio, the natural son of a nobleman of the Sforza family, born in Genoa in 1425, and known by his academic name of “Pomponius Letus,” came to Rome, where he devoted his energies to the enthusiastic study of classical antiquity, and attracted a great number of disciples and admirers. He was a worshipper not merely of the literary and artistic form, but also of the ideal and spirit of the elder poets, and therefore a champion of Christianity and an enemy of the Church. The initial step of his programme was the foundation of the Roman Academy in which every member assumed a classical name. Its principal members were humanists, and nearly all of them were known for their irreligious and epicurean lives, e.g. Bartolomeo Platina and Filippo Buonaccorsi. Moreover, in their sadness, these neo-Pagans compromised themselves politically, at a time when Rome was being transformed by the Roman barons and the neighbouring princes. Paul II (1464–71) caused Pomponio and the leaders of the Academy to be arrested on charges of irreligion, immorality, and conspiracy against the Pope. The prisoners begged so earnestly for mercy, and wrote so many protestations, that they were pardoned. The Academy, however, collapsed (Pistor, History of the Popes, II, ii. 2). The sixteenth century saw at Rome a great increase of literary and aesthetic academies, more or less inspired by the Renaissance, all of which assumed, as was the fashion, odd and fantastic names. We learn from various sources the names of many such institutes; as a rule, they soon perished and left no trace. At the beginning of the sixteenth century came the "Accademia degli Intronati", for the encouragement of theatrical representations. There were also the Academy of the "Vignaiuoli", or "Vineyard Societies" (1540), the "Accademia di san Vito" (1538), founded by Claudio Tolomei under the patronage of Cardinal Ipolito de' Medici. These were followed by a new Academy in the "Ori" or "Oriente" gardens. There were also the Academies of the "Intrepidi" (1560), the "Animosi" (1576), and the "Assisi" (1570). The "Accademia dei Ricoverati" of the Marchesa Isabella Aldobrandini Pallavicino. Towards the middle of the sixteenth century there were also the Academy of the "Notte Vaticana", or "Vatican Nights", founded by St. Charles Borromeo; an "Accademia di Diritto civile e canonico", and another of the university scholars and students of philosophy (Academia Etchashnaia). In the seventeenth century we meet with similar academies, the "Umoristi" (1611), the "Fantastici" (1625), and the "ordinati", founded by Cardinal Dati and Giulio Strozzi. About 1700 were founded the academies of the "Insecondi", the "Occhiali", the "Deboi", the "Aborigini", the "Immobili", the "Accademia Esquilina", and others. As a rule these academies, all very much alike, were merely circles of friends or clients gathered around a learned man or wealthy patron, and were dedicated to literary pastimes rather than methodical study. They fitted in, nevertheless, with the general situation and were in fact a prolongation of the literary and scientific activities of antiquities a number of scholarly persons, and with them founded (17 August, 1603) the "Accademia dei Lincei", so called because they took for their emblem the lynx, as denoting the keenness of their study of nature. According to the usage of the time, the Academy, though dedicated to physical, mathematical, and philosophical studies, made way also for literary pursuits. This intellectual circle was worthy of high praise, for it promoted the physical-mathematical studies, then little cultivated, and offset the prevalent tendency to purely literary studies. In the end it devoted itself particularly to antiquities, and in 1621 the Academy became the chief academic centre in Italy. It was not until 1657 that its Tuscan rival arose in the dual "Accademia del Cimento". The Cesi library, to which was added that of Virgilio Cesarini, became a powerful aid to scientific labours. Several of the academicians, during the lifetime and under the patronage of Cesi, prepared for publication the great unedited work of Francesco Hernandez on the natural history of Mexico (Rome, 1651). An abridgment of it in ten books by Nardo Antonio Rocchi was never published. They contributed also to the issue of the posthumous botanical work of the prince "Thale Flora". The first philosophical institute to which the foundation of the Academy, were Fabio Colonna, the author of "Fitobasano" (a history of rare plants), and of other scientific works, and Francesco Stelluti, procurator-general of the Academy in 1612, author of the treatise on "Legno Fossile Minerals" (Rome, 1615), and also a great literary and efficacious patron of the Academy gained great renown through its famous Italian members, such as Galileo Galilei, and through such foreign members as Johann Faber of Bamberg, Marcus Velser of Augsburg, and many others. After the death of Prince Cesi, the Academy met in the house of its new and distinguished president, Cassiano dal Pozzo. But notwithstanding all his efforts the association began to decline, inasmuch that after the above-mentioned publication of the works of Hernandez in 1651, the "Academia dei Lincei" fell into disuse. Its fame, its honor, its name perished, and when at the beginning of his pontificate Pius IX sought to provide an academic centre for physico-mathematical studies, he resuscitated Cesi's society, and on 3 July, 1847, founded the "Pontificia Accademia dei Nuovi Lincei", inaugurating it personally in the following November, and endowing it with an annual income from the pontifical treasury. Its members were divided into four classes, honorary, ordinary, corresponding, and associate; the last were young men who, on the completion of their studies, showed special aptitude for physico-mathematical sciences. The Academy was directed by a president, a secretary, an assistant-secretary, a librarian-archivist, and an astronomer. Its headquarters were in the Campidoglio. Its "Proceedings" from 1847 to 1870 fill twenty-three volumes. In 1870 some of the members withdrew from the Academy, which insisted on retaining its papal character. Desirous at the same time of a change of venue, they assumed the new name of the "Regia Accademia dei Lincei". It was approved and subsidized by the Italian government in 1875, and began its career with an enlarged programme of studies, divided into two classes, the first of which includes physical, mathematical, and natural sciences, and the second those of a moral, historical, and philological character. It publishes annually its "Proceedings", and is located in the Corsini Palace, whose library, at the disposal of the Academy, is very rich in manuscripts, printed works, and periodicals. It numbers to-day about two hundred members, besides correspondents and many foreigners. Its members have published important works on the exact sciences, also in the province of philology. Among the latter are the Oriental texts and dissertations of Professor Ignazio Guidi, many of which are of great value for the ecclesiastical sciences. Since 1870 the "Pontificia Accademia dei Nuovi Lincei" has continued its labours and the publication of its annual "Proceedings" bearing upon the physico-mathematical sciences. It has quarters in the palace of the Cancelleria Apostolica, and has a cardinal-patron. On the original "Academia dei Lincei" see the work of its historian (Giovanni B. della Rovere, II fittobasano, Florence, 1744). The "Statuto" or constitution of the "Lincei" was published in Latin at Rome in 1824. For other information on the two academies, pontifical and royal, see their "Proceedings".

PONTIFICIA ACCADEMIA DEGLI ARCADII (1690).—The origins of this famous literary academy were not different from those of similar societies of the same period. A number of literary dilettanti, accustomed to those occasional meetings in villas and gardens that were so pronounced a feature of social life throughout Italy, assembled towards the end of the eighteenth century, and under the name of Arete Melio, enabled the society to secure (1773) on the Gianicolo a site known as the "Bosco Parrasio". There they held their meetings on fine summer days, meeting for their winter seances at the "Teatro degli Arcadi", in the Salviati Palace. The "Arcadia" or "Pontificia Accademia degli Arcadi" was first called the "Arcadisci", and the "Statuto" (constitution) was drawn up. Owing to an exaggerated admiration of antiquity, ever the organic defect of this academy, this constitution (the work of Gravina) was modelled upon the ancient Roman laws of the "Twelve Tables", and was engraved on marble. Unfortunately, different—were no different from the fact that the pontifical, Clement XIII, one among those petty enmities injurious to the society. Nevertheless, "Arcadia" retained its vig-our. Soon all the principal cities of Italy had imitated it, and this confirms our previous statement that, apart from its "pastorellerie," or affected sylvan note, the Arcadian movement marked a positive advance in the reformation of literature. Noblemen, ecclesiastics, and laymen, men famous in every walk of life, held membership in it as an honour; very soon there were a thousand (18,000), but the number multiplied with its undoing. Not a few of them were henceforth mediocre or even dull, and in this way an institution called into being for the improvement of letters became itself a menace thereto. The arrogant rococo style in art and letters had, indeed, merited the attack on it by the most ardent of the Arcadian movement; but the reason the latter received, directly and indirectly, a large measure of endorsement. But "Arcadianism," with its own exaggerations and one-sidedness, soon developed into a genuine peril for literature and art. It even reflected on the public intelligence, since the mob of "Arcadia," while pretending to simplicity and naturalness, frequently hid a great poverty of thought beneath a superficial literary air. Its principal members, moreover, often sounded the depths of bad taste. Among these may be specified one Bettinelli, notorious for his disparagement of Dante. The violence of the anti-Arcadian reaction was owing to the Storia della Poesia (1802), a reorganized La Botte, and the fact that, consciously or not, this reaction gave vent to the new spirit now dominant on the eve of the French Revolution. Arcadianism fell, the last and unsuccessful tentative, literary and artistic, of the ancient regime. This explains why, in certain quarters, since the Revolution, the Arcadia, both as an academy and as a symbol, has been the object of much contempt, exaggerated at the best when it is not absolutely unjust. Nevertheless, when the first onslaught of the Revolution had lapsed, "Arcadia" strove to renew itself in accord with the spirit of the times, without sacrificing its traditional system of sylvan associations and pastoral names. The academy no longer represented a literary school, but merely a general tendency towards the classic style. Dante came to be greatly honoured by its members, and even to this day its conferences on the great poet are extremely interesting. Furthermore, the academic field was no longer the discussion of sylvan associations, but the discussion of all branches of study, in consequence of which history, archaeology, etc. attracted, and continue to attract, assiduous students. The new Arcadian re-

These meetings soon took on the character of an Academy. In 1707 it was united to the Accademia Accademica. Clement XII gave it formal recognition in 1718 and assigned it a hall in the Sapienza (University of Rome), thereby making it a source of encouragement for young students of theology. The academy disposed of a fund of eighteen thousand (18,000) lire, of which twenty-five thousand lire was for prizes for the most proficient students of theology. Among the patrons were several cardinals, and the professors in the theological faculty in the University acted as censors. The successors of Clement XII continued to encourage the academy. In 1720 the academy was competing for the first time, and its membership twenty indigent secular priests should receive for six years from the papal treasury an annual allowance of fifty scudi and, other things being equal, should have the preference in competitive examinations. It is on these lines, substantially, that its work is carried on at present. The Academy is located in the Roman Seminary.

Pontificia Accademia Liturgica.—This academy was the one result of the notable movement in liturgical studies which owed so much to the great theologian and liturgist, Benedict XIV (1740–58). Disbanded in the time of the Revolution, the Academy of the Lazari was revived by Pius VII (1840), and received a cardinal-protector. It continues its work under the direction of the Lazari, and holds frequent conferences in which liturgical and cognate subjects are treated from the historical and the practical point of view. It is located in the Lazari house, and its proceedings are, since 1886, published in the Lazari monthly known as "Ephemerides Liturgicae" (Liturgical Diary).

Pontificia Accademia di Religione Cattolica.—The urgent need of organizing Catholic apologists with a view to the anti-Christian polemics of the "Encyclopédie" and the Revolution gave rise to this academy. The Roman priest Giovanni Fortunato Zamboni founded it in 1801, with the avowed aim of defending the dogmatic and moral teaching of the Church. It was formally recognized by Pius VII, and succeeding popes have continued to give it their support. It holds monthly meetings for the discussion of documents written in dogmatic and moral theology, in philosophy, history, etc. Its conferences are generally published in some periodical, and a special edition is printed for the Academy. A number of these dissertations have been printed, and form a collection of several volumes entitled "Rapporti de' seminaristi alla Pontificia Accademia Romana di Religione Cattolica." It has also for honorary censors a number of cardinals. The president of the Academy is also a cardinal. It includes promoters, censors, resident members, and corresponding members. It awards an annual prize for the members most assiduous at the meetings, and is located in the palace of the Cancelleria Apostolica.

Pontificia Accademia Tiberina.—In 1809 the well-known archeologist, A. Nibby, founded the short-lived "Accademia Elenica." In 1813 many of its members withdrew to found the "Accademia Tiberina." One of the members, A. Coppi, drew up its first rules, according to which the Academy was to devote itself to the study of Latin and Italian literature, hold a weekly meeting, and a public session monthly. Great scientific or literary events were to be signalled by extraordinary meetings. It was also agreed that it should follow the history of Rome from Odoacer to Clement XIV, as well as the literary history from the time of that pontiff. The historiographer of the Academy was to edit its history and to collect the biographies of famous men, Romans or residents in Rome, who had died since the foundation of the "Tiberina." For this latter purpose there was established a special "Necrologio Tiberiano". The Academy began in 1816 the annual coinage of commemorative medals. When Leo XII ordered (1825) that all the scientific associations in Rome should be approved by the Sacred Congregation of Studies and given official recognition; its field was enlarged, so as to include research in art, commerce, and especially in agriculture. Pius VII had done much for the promotion of agriculture in the States of the Church, and Leo XII was desirous of continuing the good work. From 1831 to 1833, a year of grave disorders and political plottings, the Academy was closed, but it was soon reopened by the same pontiff, who desired the "Tiberina" to devote itself to general culture, science, and letters, Roman history and archeology, and to agriculture. The meetings were to be monthly, and it was to print annual reports, or Rendiconti. The Academy was thus enabled to establish important relations with foreign scientists. Its members, resident, corresponding, and honorary, were 2,000. The "Tiberina" is at present somewhat decadent; its proceedings are no longer printed. Its last protector was Pius IX; the revival of archeology towards the close of the seventeenth century, especially after the famous work of Antonio Bosio on the Catacombs had drawn the attention of archeologists to a world forgotten until then. This revival culminated in an academical organization, in the time of Benedict XIV, under whose learned patronage was formed an association of Roman archiepiscopii, and within which this association kept up its activity until the beginning of the nineteenth century, when the renaissance of classical art due, in Italy, to Canova gave a fresh impetus to the study of antiquity. In 1816 Pius VII, on the recommendation of Cardinal Consalvi, and of Canova himself, gave official recognition to the "Accademia Romana di Archeologia" already established under the Napoleonic regime. The Academy became a most important international centre of archeological study, the more so as there had not yet been established at Rome the various national institutes for history and archeology. Among the literary and foreign astronomers and learned men who frequented the Academy could then boast may be named Niebuhr, Akerblad, Thorwaldsen, and nibby. Popes and sovereigns wished to be inscribed among its members, or to testify in some way to the esteem in which they held it. Among these were Frederick William IV of Prussia, Charles Albert of Sardinia, and others. Among its distinguished Italian members were Canova, Fea, Piali, and Canina. Prizes were established for the best essays on Roman antiquity, many of which were awarded to learned foreigners (Rupert, Hersen, etc.). Among the merits of the Academy we may reckon its defence of the rights of art and history in the city of Rome, where, side by side with princely patronage, survived from the old Roman law a certain absolutism of private-property rights which often caused or perpetuated serious damages to the monuments, or inconvenience in their study. Thus, after a long controversy, the Academy, under the influence of the Pantheon, the Academy succeeded in obtaining from Pius IX a decree for the demolition of the houses on the left side of the Rotonda (Pantheon), and also protested efficaciously against the digging of new holes in the walls of this famous document in stone. Similarly, the Academy prevented certain profanations projected by bureaucratic or by unscrupulous engineers. When, in 1833, an attempt was made to remove the tomb of Raphael, the earnest protest of the Academy was heeded by Gregory XVI as the expression of a competent judgment. Through one of its members, Giovanni Azzurri, it advocated the restoration of the Tabularium on the Capitoline Hill. Through another member, Pietro Visconti, it succeeded in abolishing the purely commercial administration of the excavations at Ostia, and placed them on a scientific basis. For this purpose it obtained from Pius IX a decree ordaining that all excavations should be kept under close guard and be made accessible to students. In 1824, Campanari, a member of the Academy, proposed the establishment of an Etruscan Museum. The Academy furthered this excellent idea until it was finally realized in the Vatican by Gregory XVI. In 1856, Altibrandi advocated the use of epigraphical monuments in the study of law, and so anticipated the establishment of chairs for this special purpose in many European universities. By these and many other useful services the Academy won in a special degree the good will of the popes. Pius VIII gave it the title of "Pontificia Accademia". On the death of the last pontiff at Genoa the last study at the Palace of the Girona. Gregory XVI and Pius IX took the Academy under their special protection, particularly when its guiding spirit was the immortal Giambattista De Rossi. Leo XIII awarded a gold medal for the best dissertation presented at the annual competition of the Academy, on which occasion there are always offered two subjects, one in classical and the other in Christian archeology, either of which the competitors are free to choose. The seal of the Academy represents the ruins of a classical temple, with the motto: In apricum proferet (It will bring to light). The last revision of its constitution and by-laws was published in 1891. In 1891 a new publication of the "Disseratione Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia" which reached in 1896 its sixteenth volume. The Cardinal Carambello is its protector. It has a steady membership of one hundred, thirty of whom are ordinary members; the others are honorary, corresponding, and associate, members. The Academy met at first in Campidoglio; under Gregory XVI, at the University. At present its meetings are held in the palace of the Cancelleria Apostolica. See "Leggi della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia" (Rome, 1894); "Omaggio al II Congresso Internazionale di Archeologia Cristiana in Roma" (Rome, 1900); "Bulletin di Archeologia Cristiana" of Giovanni Battista De Rossi (to the end of 1894) passim; "Il Nuovo Bollettino di Archeologia Cristiana" (Rome, 1894-1906). ACCADEMIA Filarmonica.—It was founded in 1821 for the study and practice of music. It has 200 members, and is located at 225, Piazza San Marcello.

PONTIFICIA ACCADEMIA DELLA IMMACOLATA CONCEZIONE.—This academy was founded in 1835 by young students of Sant' Apollinare (Roman Seminary) and of the Gregorian University. Among its founders was Mo. A. Pappagallo. It deserves special mention. Its purpose was the encouragement of serious study among the youth of Rome. Hence, two-thirds of the members must be young students. Its title was assumed at a later date. It was approved in 1847 by the Sacred Congregation of Studies. The work is divided into five sections: philosophy, theology, science, belles-lettres, ethics, economics. Its meetings are held weekly, and in 1873 it began to publish bi-monthly reports of its proceedings under the title "Memorie per gli Atti della Pont. Accademia della Immacolata Concezione". Twenty-one numbers were issued. Since 1875 the Academy has published many of the lectures read before its members. The most flourishing period of this academy was from 1873 to 1882. Among its most illustrious deceased members may be mentioned Father Secchi, S.J., Monsignor Balan, and Michele Stefano De Rossi. The Academy, now in its decline, is attached to the Church of the Santi Apostoli.

REGIA ACCADEMIA MEDICA.—It was founded in 1875 for the study of medical and cognate sciences, has fifty ordinary members, and is located in the University.

PONTIFICIA ACCADEMIA DEI CONFERENZE STORICO-GIURIDICHE.—This academy was founded in 1878 to encourage among Catholics the study of history, archaeology, and juridical science. From 1880 it began to publish a quarterly entitled “Studi e Documenti di Storia e di Diritto,” highly esteemed for its learned articles and for its publication of important documents with apposite commentaries. After an existence of twenty-five years this review ceased to appear at the end of 1905. The president of the Academy is a cardinal, and its meetings are held in the Roman Seminary.

PONTIFICIA ACCADEMIA ROMANA DI SAN TOMMASO DI AQUINO.—When Leo XIII at the beginning of this pontificate undertook the restoration of scholastic philosophy and theology, this academy was founded (1871) to give a diffusion of Thomistic doctrine. Its president is a cardinal, and its meetings are held in the Seminary.

ACADEMIC SCHOOLS OF ROME.—The following is a brief account of the several academic schools mentioned above. One is ecclesiastical, the others are devoted to the fine arts. Some are Roman, and others are foreign.

PONTIFICIA ACCADEMIA DEI NOBILI ECCLESIASTICI.—It was founded in 1701 by Clement XI, to prepare for the diplomatic service of the Holy See a body of men trained in the juridical sciences and in other requisite branches of learning. At the time, European diplomacy was usually confined to the nobility; hence the Academy was instituted and maintained for noble ecclesiastics. However, later, it opened its doors more freely to the sons of families in some way distinguished and in comfortable circumstances. Occasionally this academy languished, especially in the first half of the nineteenth century, but since then it has recovered and steadily improved. Of late it has become a school of higher ecclesiastical education, with an eye to a diplomatic career for its students. This, however, does not imply that all its students, or even a majority of them, are destined for that career; indeed, the school tends constantly to set aside its earlier limitation. The academic course includes ecclesiastical diplomacy, political economy, diplomatic forms (stile diplomatico), the principal foreign languages, and, in addition, a practical course (after the manner of apprenticeship) at the bureaus of various congregations for such students as wish to prepare themselves for an office in any of these bodies. As a rule, Romans are not admitted to this academy, it having been expressly designed for those who, not being Romans, would have no other opportunity to acquire such a peculiar education and training. Its students pay a monthly fee. It has a cardinal-protector and a Roman prelate for president (rector). It owns and occupies its own palace (70, Piazza della Minerva).

The Roman Academies in the service of the fine arts are the following: REGIA ACCADEMIA ROMANA DI SAN LUCA (Accademia delle Belle Arti). This academy was the evolution of the corporation of artist-painters, reformed under Sixtus V (1577) by Federigo Zuccari and Girolamo Muziano. It took then the title of academy, and had for its purpose the teaching of the fine arts, the reward of artistic merit, and the preservation and illustration of the historic and artistic monuments of Rome. In respect of all these it enjoyed papal approval and encouragement. It rendered great services and counted among its members illustrious masters and pupils. In 1870 it passed under the control of the new government, and is now under the patronage of the King. It possesses a gallery of paintings, an excellent library, open to the public (44, Via Bonella).

REGIA ACCADEMIA DI SANTA CECILIA (Accademia di Musica). Pierluigi da Palestrina and G. M. Nanini founded in 1570 a school of music that was later (1593) canonically erected into a confraternity, or “Regia Accademia di Musica.” Innocent X encouraged this association as an ideal instrument for the dissemination of good taste and the promotion of musical science. Urban VIII decreed that no musical works should be published without the permission of the censors of this congregation, and that no school of music or of singing should be opened in any church without the written permission of its deputies. This very rigorous ordinance provoked numerous complaints from interested parties, and its restrictions were soon much neglected. In 1684 Innocent XI conceded to the congregation the right to admit even foreign members, and in 1774 they became members of the Roman pontifical archcongregation. The political troubles of the period, the congregation was suspended from 1799 to 1803, and again from 1809 to 1822. Among its members have been illustrious musicians. We may mention, besides the above-named founders, Carissimi; Frescobaldi, the organist; Giuseppe Tartini, violinist and author of a new system of harmony; the brothers Fede, celebrated singers; and Muzio Clementi, pianist. From 1688 John Sgambati and Ettore Finelli taught gratuitously in this academy. Since 1870 the congregation of St. Cecilia has been transformed into a Royal Academy. In 1876 the “Liceo di Musica” was added to it, with a substantial appropriation from the funds of the province and city of Rome. In 1874 the statutes of this school were remodelled. It is greatly esteemed and is much frequented (18, Via dei Greci).

ACCADEMIA DI RAFFAELLE SANZIO.—This is a school of modern found based on a daily evening course for the study of art (504, Corso Umberto I).

There are several foreign academies of a scholastic kind. The American Academy, founded in 1896, is located in the Villa del’ Aurora (42, Via Lombardi). The Académie Francaise de France was founded by Louis XIV in 1666. This illustrious school has given many of the arts to France (la “Roman Academy” is very celebrated. It owns and occupies its own palace, the Villa Medici on the Pincio. The English Academy was founded in 1821, and possesses a notable library (53, Via Margutta). The Accademia di Spagna was founded in 1861 (32, Piazza San Pietro in Montorio). Finally, it should be noted that, as formerly, there are now in Rome various associations which are true academies and may be classed as such, though they do not bear that name.

SOCIETÀ DI CONFERENZE DI SACRA ARCHEOLOGIA (founded in 1875 by Giambattista De Rossi). Its name is well merited inasmuch as it does the active contributions of its members. In each conference are announced or illustrated new discoveries, and important studies are presented. The meetings are held monthly, from November to March, and are open to the public. This excellent association has from the first given the study of Roman archaeology, especially the study of the Roman catacombs. Its proceedings are published annually in the “Nuovo Bulletinino di Sacra Archeologia.” Its sessions are held in the palace of the Cancelleria Apostolica.

CIRCOLO GIURIDICO DI ROMA.—It was founded in 1899, and offers a meeting-ground for students and professors of legal and sociological lore, and sciences, through lectures, discussions, etc. Attached to it is the "Istituto di Diritto Romano" founded in 1887 for the promotion of the study of Roman law (307, Corso Umberto 1).

The British and American Archeological Society was founded in 1865 to promote among English-speaking people, through discussions and lectures (for which latter it possesses a convenient library), a broader and more general culture in all that pertains to Rome (72, Via San Nicola da Tolentino).

The general bibliography of the Roman Academies is very deficient, as is that of the greater part of the individual Academies, and the best guides and monographs of the following works may be consulted: JARKINS, Specimen historiae Academiae Romanae (Leipzig, 1776); GIUSTI, Storia dell'Accademia dei Lincei in Annali Universali di Statistiche (Milan, 1841). In several of the principal French and Italian encyclopedias there are noteworthy articles on the Arcadia, the Lincei, the Académie de France, etc.

Academy, The French.—The French Academy was founded by Cardinal de Richelieu in 1635. For several years a number of Academicians, such as Godeau, de Combeaud, Girly, Chaplain, Habert, de Serizay, and the Abbé Cerisy de Malleville, had met once a week at Conrart's house for the purpose of discussing literary subjects. Through the Abbé de Boisrobert the existence of this society became known to the pope of the time, who received the idea of making it a national institution. In 1635 the French Academy was formally established by royal letters-patent. The number of its members was fixed at forty, and statutes were drawn up which have suffered scarcely any change since that time. At the French Academy, as in all other Academies, the director, to preside at its meetings; a chancellor, to have the custody of its archives and the seal; a perpetual secretary, to prepare its work and keep its records. The perpetual secretary was appointed by lot for life with a salary of 6,000 francs a year. The director and the chancellor were at first appointed by lot for two months only. At present they are elected by vote for the term of three months. They are simply primi inter pares, and receive, like all the other members, an annual salary of 1,500 francs. The manner of electing members has been changed several times since 1635. At present, when an Academician dies, the other Academicians draw a number from a bag, and the one who draws the number of the deceased is elected to fill the vacancy. The new member is elected by the majority of the entire body. About a year later his public reception takes place. In the early years of the Academy all its members were Catholics. Among the distinguished men who held seats in it are the following: Corneille, Racine, Boileau, La Bruyère, d'Aguессeaux, Bossuet, Fénelon, Fléchier, Mabillon, Lamoignon, Séguier, Fleury, Delille, Chateaubriand, Lamartine, de Barante, de Tocqueville, Berryer, Lacordaire, Dupanloup, de Falloux, Gratry, Montalembert, Ampère, Pasteur, de Bornier, Cardinal Ferraud, all of them faithful sons of the Church. Among other Catholic members of the French Academy we should mention: Brunetièr, Coppée, de Mün, Lamy, Mézières, Du Drocq, Frédéric Bazin, Comte d'Haussonville, and Thureau-Dangin. The entire number of members of the French Academy from 1634 to 1906 has been 505. Of these, fourteen were cardinals, nine archbishops, and twenty-five bishops or clergy. The reigning families: Comte de Clermont, Lucien Bona- parte, and Duc d'Uxame: one member. A. Thiers, was President of the French Republic; fifteen were prime ministers; forty-nine, ministers; thirty-six, ambassadors; twenty, dukes and peers; six, grandees of Spain; thirty-nine, knights of the orders of the King, of the Holy Ghost, or of St. Louis; eleven, Knights of the Golden Fleece; and thirty, grand-cors of the Legion of Honour. Twenty-four members were elected to the French Academy before they were twenty-three years of age; twenty-three were at least seventy years of age before their reception took place; fifteen died before their forty-five; eighteen were about ninety years old when they died and two lived to be almost centenarians.

The Dictionary.—The object for which the Academy was founded, as set forth in its statutes, was the purification of the French language. To attain this end it proposed to compile a dictionary, a treatise on rhetoric, and a treatise on poetics. Only the dictionary has been carried out. From 1699 to 1787 seven editions of this work were published. The office of the Academy is not to create but to register words approved by the authority of the best writers and by good society. The dictionary is prepared by six members named for life, who are assisted by the perpetual secretary. Each word is submitted by the chairman of this committee to the Academy for approval. Besides this dictionary, the French Academy, at the suggestion of Voltaire, in 1776, began an "Historical Dictionary of the French Language," which has never been completed. Beyond the letter A. This undertaking was abandoned some twenty years ago. Every year the Academy awards a number of prizes. Previous to 1780 only two prizes were distributed. Since that period legacies and donations have provided an annual sum of more than 200,000 francs for the "Prix de Vertu," and the literary prizes. Some prizes for prose and poetry are given after competition. The "Prix Monthyon" (for literature, 19,000 francs), the "Prix Théraouanne" (for historical works, 4,000 francs), the "Prix Marcellin Guérin" (for literary works, 5,000 francs), and the "Prix Gobert" (for French history, 10,000 francs), are the most important. The "Prix de Vertu," of which the first was established by M. de Monthyon in 1784, are given to poor persons who have accomplished some remarkable act of charity or courage. Many of these have gone to missionaries and sisters belonging to various religious orders.

History.—At first the Academicians held their sessions at the house of Conrart, then at that of Séguier, after whose death Louis XIV placed a large room at their disposal, with ample provision for clerks, copyists, and servants. In 1783 the Convention suppressed the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, the Academy of Sciences, the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and the Academy of Architecture. They were re-established in 1785, under the name of a National Institute, composed of three sections: the first comprising the sciences of physics and mathematics; the second, the moral and political sciences; the third, literature and the fine arts. From that period dates the uniform which is still worn by the members of the Institute at public ceremonials and other solemn functions. It consists of a long coat, the collar and the lapels of which are embroidered in green, a crossed hat trimmed with black feathers, and adorned with a tricoloured cockade, and dress sword with a hilt of mother-of-pearl and gold. Bona- parte, after his election as First Consul, gave a new organization to the Institute, which henceforth was to be composed of four sections, the first being a section of sciences, corresponding to the former Academy of Science; the second, a section of History and Literature, corresponding to the former French Academy; the third, that of History and Ancient Literature, corresponding to the Academy of Inscriptions; and the fourth, that of Fine Arts, corresponding to the former Academy of Fine Arts. In 1806 Napoleon I granted to the Institute the College of the Four Nations. Here the Academy holds its sessions, and here are its offices and library. This building received the name of Palace of the Institute. Louis XVIII officially re-established the name of Academy. Louis Philippe added a fifth section to the Institute under the name of Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. Since then no modifications have been made in the organization of the Institute. It therefore includes at present: (1) The French Academy; (2) The Academy of Fine Arts; (3) The Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres; (4) The Academy of Sciences; (5) The Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. What has been the influence of the French Academy? Some critics have reproached it with a tendency to hamper and crush originality. But it is the general opinion of scholars that it has corrected the judgment, put an end to the taste, and formed the language of French writers. Matthew Arnold, in his essay on "The Literary Influence of the Academies", praised it as a high court of letters and a rallying point for educated opinion. To it he ascribed the most striking characteristics of the French language, its purity, delicacy, and flexibility.

Academy of Fine Arts.—The Academy of Fine Arts replaced, in 1793, the Academy of Painting and Sculpture founded by Louis XIV in 1648, and the Academy of Architecture founded in 1675. It was reorganized 23 January, 1803, and again 21 March, 1818. It is now composed of forty members: fourteen painters, eight sculptors, eight architects, four engravers, and six musical composers. There are besides, ten honorary members, forty corresponding members, and ten honorary corresponding members. From among the members are chosen the Directors of the "École des Beaux Arts"; and of the Villa Medici, the Art Academy of France at Rome, founded by Colbert in 1660, for young painters, sculptors, architects, and musicians who, having been chosen by competition, are sent to Italy for four years to complete their studies at the expense of the Government.

Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres.—In 1663, at the suggestion of Colbert, Louis XIV appointed a committee of four members of the French Academy charged with the duty of furnishing legends and inscriptions for medals. This was the origin of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, founded in 1701. It was composed of ten honorary members, ten pensionnaires, and ten pupils. The Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres deals with the history, geography, and antiquities of France, with Oriental, Greek, and Latin antiquities, the history of science among the ancients, and comparative philology.

Academy of Sciences.—The Academy of Sciences was founded in 1666, at the suggestion of Colbert. At first it dealt only with geometry, astronomy, mechanics, anatomy, chemistry, and botany. At present it numbers sixty-six members, divided into eleven sections of six members each: geometry, mechanics, physics, astronomy, geography and navigation, chemistry, mineralogy, botany, agriculture, anatomy and zoology, medicine and surgery. There are, besides, two perpetual secretaries, ten honorary members, eight foreign members, eight foreign associates, and one hundred French and foreign corresponding members.

Academy of Moral and Political Sciences.—The Academy of Moral and Political Sciences was founded in 1795. Suppressed by Napoleon in 1803, it was re-established by Louis Philippe in 1832. It was then composed of thirty members divided into five sections: philosophy; morals; legislation, public law, and jurisprudence; political economy; general and philosophic history. Another section was added in 1855: politics, administration, and finances. In 1872 the number of the members was fixed at forty, besides ten honorary members, six associates, and from thirty to forty corresponding members. Every year on 25 October, the five sections of the Institute hold a general public session, when prizes are awarded by the several Academies are distributed. In 1877, the Duc d'Aumale left to the Institute of France by his will the château of Chantilly with its art collections.

JEAN LE BARS.

Acadia.—The precise location and extent of Acadia was a subject of constant dispute and consequent warfare between the French and English colonists of America for more than one hundred and fifty years. When Henry IV of France granted to the Sieur de Monts the territory of "La Cadie", as it was called, it was "to cultivate, to cause to be peopled, and to search for gold and silver mines from the 46th to the 40th degree N. lat." The Marquise de Guercheville, who purchased the claim from de Monts, fancied she owned from Florida to the St. Lawrence. Subsequently it was claimed by the Province of Nova Scotia, and now is usually regarded as the small district on the south shore of the Bay of Fundy from Annapolis to the Basin of Minas. De Monts received his concession 8 November, 1603. Claims had previously been laid to the territory by Cartier's nephews, and de la Roche, Chauvin, and Chastelain had made settlements there; but it had all resulted in nothing. De Monts was a Calvinist, but Henry enjoined on him to teach Catholicity to the tribe of Micmacs who inhabited those regions. With de Monts, on his journey out, were Champlain, who was averse to the settlement, as being too near the English; and also Pontgravé, the Baron of Poutrincourt. After wandering about the coast of Maine, and attempting a settlement on an island which they called Sainte Croix, they entered the harbour to which Champlain gave the name of Port Royal, now Annapolis. De Monts' charter was reissued the same year; and as the French, he made over Port Royal and surroundings to Poutrincourt. The colony had great difficulty to maintain itself. Mme. de Guercheville attempted the work, but, disgusted with her ill-success, ordered La Saussaye, whom she sent over, to go somewhere else. Touching at Port Royal, he found its number of colonists had diminished, taking with him two Jesuit priests, Biard and Massé, who were there, he with some new settlers established the colony of St. Sauveur at what is now Bar Harbor in Maine. Hardly was the work begun when the notorious pirate Argyl of Virginia descended upon it and carried off the priests and some others, intending to hang them in Virginia, bidding the rest to withdraw, as they were in what he declared to be English territory. Returning with three vessels he utterly destroyed the colony, and then sailing across to Port Royal destroyed it also. This was in 1613. Haliburton attributed the 'Indians' to the 'Indians' of the reign of Charles I, but the testimony of Champlain to the contrary refutes this accusation. Poutrincourt returned to France and died in battle. His son, commonly known as Biencourt, remained with some associates, among whom was Charles de la Tour, subsequently famous in Acadian history, and lived with the Indians as coureurs de bois, waiting for better times.

As it was now considered by the English to be their territory beyond dispute, a grant of it was made in 1627 to Sir William Alexander, who, though he never established a colony there, gave the colony the name, which it still retains, of Nova Scotia. Sir William also received other grants of the most extravagant extent elsewhere. Meantime, de la Tour's father, Claude, who had left Acadia and turned traitor to his country, came over in a vessel furnished by England, having promised the government to induce his son to yield up the entire territory. Thus the son repudiated the father. The next year the de la Tours were Huguenots, though the younger is said to have later on become a Catholic. In virtue of the treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye, Acadia became French territory again in 1632, and Isaac de Razilly was sent over as Governor. Associated with him were his kinsman, Charnisay, young de la Tour, and Louis de Camillo, commanding the nearby islands. On the death of Razilly in 1636, these three lieutenants began a fierce war for possession of the land, and later on a fourth claimant, in the person of Le Borgne, appeared, with the pretence that the territory of Charnisay had been mortgaged to him how the struggle was fought chiefly between de la Tour and Charnisay, both of whom treacherously appealed to the Puritans of Boston for assistance. This shameful strife ended in the English again entering into possession. Oliver Cromwell then ruled England, and de la Tour crossed the ocean and obtained a commission from the Protector to govern the colony, one of the stipulations being that no Catholics should be allowed to settle there. With him were associated two Englishmen, Crown and Temple. In 1667 it was again restored to France by the treaty of Breda, and Grandfontaine, the new Governor, reported that there were only 409 souls in the entire settlement. It increased very little, and in and around Port Royal; but it is probable that many had married Indians and were coureurs de bois.

In 1687 the population had grown to 800. The census of 1714 gave 2,100; of 1737, 7,598; of 1747, about 12,500. After eighty years it had grown to 18,000, though there was little or no immigration. From 1671 the inhabitants began to attach themselves to the soil; agriculture was an almost universal occupation, and where the population was remote from Port Royal and unmolested it developed into a peaceful, prosperous, and moral people. But from the time of the treaty of Breda till 1712, Port Royal was then and had been besieged by the English, and it was taken and sacked by Admiral Phips, Governor de Menneval and his garrison being carried off as prisoners to Boston; but as Phips was preoccupied with his projected expedition to Quebec, he took no steps to secure the fort and it soon fell into the hands of the French. This whole period of the eighteenth century took up the history of the French as it had been devastated. Finally a supreme effort was made todialogue the French. Four expeditions were sent against Port Royal by the English, under Church, March, Wainwright, and Nicholson. On the French side were Subercase and de Saint-Castin. Nicholson finally entered Port Royal, 12 October, 1710, after a siege of nineteen days. Since then it is known as Annapolis. Finally, by the treaty of Utrecht, 13 April, 1713, all Acadia was ceded to England. The French inhabitants then determined to leave the country, and their kindred at Cape Breton and in Newfound-land to emigrate in their direction. This the English Governor opposed, although Queen Anne had commanded him to let them withdraw; but, as she died shortly afterwards, Nicholson had his way, and the Acadians took the oath of allegiance to King George, with the clause, however, that they should not be bound to take arms against the French or their Indian allies. In 1720, General Philibens, then Governor, ordered them to take the oath without reserve, or to withdraw inside of four months; whereupon they prepared to emigrate with their property, but were again prevented. Now began the plot to deport them. The purpose was not to permit them to go to Canada or elsewhere among the French, but to colonize them among the English, "in order to make them true Englishmen", and get them to change their faith, as is evident from a letter of Crags, the Secretary of State, to the Governor. The deportation was thus slowly settled for years. Both sides were involved in the place till long years afterwards. During forty years they refused to be cajoled or threatened into taking the complete oath of allegiance. They admitted only an oath of fealty, and were known as "the French Neutrals". So loyal were they that, when in 1742 the French under DuPrév adventurer Cadia, they gave it no assistance, and were marching, without taking action for four successive years, even when the French troops under de Ramey were at the walls of Annapolis, all of which is proved by State documents. In 1745-46 Governor Shirley did his utmost to make them apostatize, and proposed "to drive all Roman priests out of the Province and introduce English schools and French Protestant ministers". In 1749 an oath without restriction was exacted by Cornwallis, but refused by the whole population, and in 1750 they asked again to quit the country. Finally, when the French made their last stand at Port Beauséjour, north of the Bay of Fundy, the Acadians gave them no assistance, except 300 who were forced under threat of death. Beauséjour surrendered 16 June, 1755. After the fall of Beauséjour, which was due to the treachery of its French occupants, began the famous deportation of these peaceful peasants, who for forty years had been faithful to the English crown and subject to the jurisdiction of the most peaceful "Evangeline". They were torn from their homes, in what Bancroft calls "the appalling cold of December", and rudely thrust without money or provisions into the holds of ships; parents separated from their children, husbands from their wives, and cast everywhere along the coast from Massachusetts to Georgia, some wandering over to their compatriots in Louisiana, some to Guianas and the West Indies, and others reaching France. As to the number of victims, some writers put it as low as 8,000, others, who are very reliable, rating it at 18,000. The mortality attending this act of cruelty was very great, particularly among the children. All the farm carts and houses were commandeered over to the English colonists who took their place. After a while many of the Acadians wandered back to their old homes, and finally came in such numbers that on 10 September, 1855, they celebrated in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Cape Breton, and Prince Edward Island, the anniversary of the suspension. According to Richard in his "Acadia" (II, 342), there are no fewer than 270,000 descendants of the Acadians living to-day; 130,000 in the Maritime Provinces, 100,000 in French Canada, and 40,000 in Louisiana.

Acanthus, a titular see of Macedonia, on the Strymonic Gulf, now known as Erisco. Its inhabitants were praised by Xerxes for their zeal in his campaign. (VII, 85.) There were still extant earlier in the nineteenth century the ruins of a large curving mole built far into the sea.

Acanthus.—A plant, indigenous to middle Europe, the leaf of which has served in all ages as an ornament, or for ornamentation. There are two varieties, one wild and thorny, and one with soft branches without spines. The acanthus appears for the first time in literature in ancient Greece. It was chosen for decorative purposes because of the beauty of its leaves, as well as for its abundance on Greek soil. At first it was taken directly from nature. Greek sculpture rendered it with truthful expression, whether of the soft or the spiky variety, showing the character, texture, and model of the leaf. During the fifth century B.C. the acanthus ornament took an important place, especially in architecture, and the acanthus was the principal ornament of the Corinthian capital. From the conquest of Alexander in the East can be traced the transformation of the acanthus that is found in later Eastern art.

Acathius (Gr., ἀκαθίος; Lat. privative, καθίῳ, "sit"); i.e. not sitting; standing.—The title of a certain hymn (καθίος ὁμος) or, better, an Office in the Greek Liturgy, in honour of the Mother of God. The title is one of eminence; since, while in other similar hymns the people are permitted to sit during part of the time, this hymn is partly read, partly sung, all standing (or, perhaps, standing all night). The word is employed sometimes to indicate the day on which the hymn is said (i.e. the Saturday of the fifth week of Lent), or on that day it must be said by clergy and laity alike, "none ceasing from the divine praises," as the long historical Lesson of the Office remarks. It is proper to note in this connection that, while the whole Office is to be said on this day, portions of it are distributed over the first four Sundays. When this is done, it is divided into four parts or stations, between which various Psalms and Canticles may be sung sitting. Francis Junius wrongly interpreted Acathius as one who neither sits nor rests, but journeys with child; as for instance when the Blessed Virgin was brought by Joseph to Bethlehem. Greuter [Commentarius in Codex. Europ. (Bonn, 1839), 321] easily refutes the interpretation by citing from the Lesson in the Triodion. The origin of the feast is assigned by the Lesson to the year 626, when Constantinople, in the reign of Heraclius, was attacked by the Persians and Sclavians but saved through the intervention of the Mother of God. A sudden hurricane dispersed the fleet of the enemy and settled the waves near the great church of the Deipara (Mother of God) at Blachernae, a quarter of Constantinople near the Golden Horn. The people spent the whole night, says the Lesson, thanking her for the unexpected deliverance. "From that time, therefore, the day is commemorated in memory of this great miracle desired this day to be a feast in honour of the Mother of God ... and called it Acathistus" (Lesson). This origin is disputed by Sophocles (Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Periods, s. v.) on the ground that the hymn could not have been composed in one day, while on the other hand its twenty-four stanzas contain no allusion to such an event and therefore could scarcely have been originally composed to commemorate it. Perhaps the corronym, which might seem to be allusive, was originally composed for the celebration on the night of the victory. However the feast had originated, the Lesson commemorates two other victories: one at Lepanto, the other at Issia, and Constantine Pogonatus, similarly ascribed to the intervention of the Deipara.

No certain ascription of its authorship can be made. It has been attributed to Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople, whose pious activities the Lesson commemorates in great detail. Quevrais (P. G. XCII, 1333 sqq.) assigns it to Georgios Fisides, deacon, archivist, and sacristan of Saint-Sophia, whose poems find an echo both in style and in theme in the Acathistus; the elegance, antithetic and balanced style, the vividity of the narrative, the flowers of poetic imagery being all very suggestive of his work. His position as sacristan would naturally suggest such a tribute to Our Lady, as the hymn only gives more elaborately the sentiments condensed into two epigrams of Fisides found in her church at Blachernae. Quevrais also argues that several phrases of and references to be found in the poetry of Fisides. Leclercq (in Cabrol, "Diction. archéol. chrét. et de liturgie," s. v. "Acatistus") finds nothing absolutely demonstrative in such a comparison and offers a suggestion which may possibly help to a solution of the problem. In addition to several Latin versions, it has been translated into Italian, Russian, Arabic, German, and Russian. Its very great length precludes anything more than the briefest summary here. It is prefaced by a troparion, followed by a kontakion (a short hymnodal summary of the character of the feast), which is repeated at intervals throughout the hymn. As this kontakion is the only part of the hymn which may clearly refer to the victory commemorated, and may have been the only original text (with repetitions interspersed with psalms, hymns, etc., already well known to the populace) composed for the night-celebration, it is translated here:—

"To thee, O Mother of God, unconquered Empress, do I, thy City freed from evils, offer thanks for the victories achieved; but do thou, by thy invincible power, deliver me from every kind of danger; that I may cry to thee, Hail, maiden Spouse!"

The Hymn proper comprises twenty-four oikoi (Greek word for a stanza), which, when the verse interprets as referring to various churches or temples; but the Triodion itself indicates its meaning in the rubric, "The first six oikoi are read, and we stand during their reading" —oikoi thus clearly referring to a division of the hymn) or stanzas (which may fairly translate the word—stanzas, like oikos, having an architectural value). These oikos are alternately longer and shorter, and their initial letters form a Greek abecedary. The last (a shorter) one, beginning with the letter omega, reads:

"O Mother, worthy of all hymn-tributes, who didst bring forth the Word, Most Holy of all the holy, accept the present offering, deliver all from every evil, and save from future suffering all who cry to thee. Amen."

This Alleluia follows each one of the shorter stanzas. The longer ones begin with a sentence of about the same length, which skillfully leads up to a series of salutations beginning with "Hail!". All of these longer stanzas, except the first (which has fourteen) comprise thirteen such sentences, including the last, which, as a sort of refrain, is always "Hail, maiden spouse!" The first stanza narrates the mission of Gabriel to Mary; and his astonishment at the condescension of the Almighty is so great that he bursts forth into:

Hail, through whom joy shall shine forth!
Hail, through whom evil shall end!
Hail, restorer of fallen Adam!
Hail, redemption of Eve's tears!

—etc. The second stanza gives the questioning of Mary; the third continues it and gives the answer of Gabriel; the fourth narrates the Incarnation; the fifth, the visit to Elizabeth, with a series of "Hails" prettily conceived as being translations into words of the joyful leaping of the Baptist; the sixth, Joseph's trouble of mind; the seventh, the coming of the shepherds, who begin their "Hail" very appropriately:

Hail, Mother of the Lamb and of the Shepherd!
Hail, Sheeplefold of rational sheep!

In the ninth stanza the Magi, star-led, cry out in joy:

Hail, Mother of the unwessting Star!
Hail, Splendour of the mystic Day!

In the tenth the Magi return home to announce Alleluia; the eleventh has appropriate allusions to the Flight into Egypt:

Hail, Sea that didst overwhelm the wise Pharaoh!
Hail, Rock that gavest life to the thirsty!

—with other references to the cloud, the pillar of fire, the manna, etc. The twelfth and thirteenth deal with Simeon: the fourteenth and twenty-second are more general in character; the twentieth and perhaps consciously borrows imagery from the Blackaman Church of the Dei para and perhaps also alludes distantly to the victory (or to the three victories) commemorated in the Lesson:

Hail, Tabernacle of God and the Word!
Hail, unshaken Tower of the Church!
Hail, inexpuugnable Wall!
Hail, through whom trophies are lifted up!
Hail, at whose name demons fall down!
Hail, healing of my body!
Hail, safety of my soul!

P. O. XCI, has the works of Pindar and the Acathistus with much comment; Sophocles, Greek Lexicon, etc., has an interesting note; Leclercq, in Dict. d'archit. chrét. et de St., gives an extensive bibliography.

ACCA, SAINT, Bishop of Hexham, and patron of learning (c. 660-742). Acca was a Northumbrian by birth and began life in the household of a certain Foes, who afterwards became Bishop of York. After a few years, however, Acca attached himself to St. Wilfrid and remained his devoted disciple and companion in all his troubles. He may have joined Wilfrid as early as 678, and he certainly was with him at the time of his second journey to Rome in 692. On their return to England, when Wilfrid was reinstated at Hexham, he made Acca Abbot of St. Andrew's monastery there; and after Wilfrid's death (709) Acca succeeded him as bishop. The work of completing and adorning the churches left unfinished by St. Wilfrid was energetically carried on by his successor. In ruling the diocese and in conducting the services of the Church, Acca was equally zealous. He brought to the North a famous cantor named Maban, who had learned in Kent the Roman traditions of psalmody handed down from St. Gregory the Great through St. Augustine. He was famed also for his theological learning, and for his encouragement of students by every means in his power. It was at Acca's suggestion that Eddius undertook the Life of St. Wilfrid, and above all, it was to the same kind of friend and patron that Bede dedicated several of his most important works, especially those dealing with Holy Scripture. For some unexplained reason Acca was driven from his diocese in 732. He is believed to have retired to Withern in Galloway, but he returned to Hexham before his death in 742, when he was at once revered as a Saint. Two crosses of exquisite workmanship, one of which is still preserved in a fragmentary state, were erected at the head and foot of his grave. When the body of the Saint was translated, the vestments were found entire, and accounts of his miracles were drawn up by St. Ælred and by Simeon of Durham. Of any true liturgical cultus there is little trace, but his feast is said to have been kept on 20 October. There is also mention of 19 February, which may have been the date of some translation of his relics.

The only writing of Acca's which we possess is a letter addressed to St. Bede and printed in his works. This document, together with other letters, has also been printed in Raine's Priory of Hexham (London, 1864), Surtees Society, 1864. Our knowledge of Acca's life is derived primarily from Bede, Eddius, Simon of Durham, Richard of Durham, and Ælred. Adequate accounts may also be found in Stenton's English Menology (London, 1892), and Dict. of Nat. Biog., Dict. of Christ. Biog. For some archaeological sidelights, cf. Browne (Anglican bishop), Theodore and Wilfrith (London, 1897).

ACCARON (Ekrón), the most northern of the five principal Philistine cities (Jos. xiii. 3; xv. 11, 46). We do not know whether it was founded by the Philistines or the Hebrews. It was first given to the tribe of Juda independent of, the acceptance of the faithful. If bishops or other prelates should enact a law contrary to the canons, there is the remedy of an appeal to the highest authority of the Church for its annulment. Wyclif attacked this authority when he preached, in the name of the Council of Constance and Martin V, that "no one was a temporal prince, or prelate, or bishop, who was in mortal sin". Huss (ibid., Prop. 30) declared that "ecclesiastical obedience was an invention of the priests of the Church, and outside the authority of Scripture". Luther, in the proposition condemned (1521) by the University of Paris, taught that "neither pope nor bishop nor any one among men has the right to impose on a Christian a single syllable without his full acceptance; anything otherwise done is in the spirit of tyranny." The Jansenists favoured the theory that the authority of the bishops and Pope was representative of the will of the whole body of the Church; hence Clement XI, in 1713, condemned the 90th proposition of Quesnel: "The Church has the power to excommunicate, to be used by the chief pastor, with the (at least presumed) consent of the whole body. Against a natural or divine law, no custom or usage can declare an act of obligation. From a merely ecclesiastical law either custom or desuetude may withdraw the obligation, wherever they may properly imply the assent of the law-making power in the Church". (See Law, Custom.)

Acceptance, those Jansenists who accepted without any reserve or mental restriction the Bull "Unigenitus", issued in 1713 against the Jansenist ReClocks as set forth in the "Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament" of the Oratorian, Pasquier Quesnel. As is well known, the error of Jansenius gave rise to two conflicts in the Church: the first, early in the second half of the seventeenth century, centred about his book "Augustinus", and ceased with the Pox Clementina, also called the paix fourrée or "False Peace" (1669); the second, which began with the eighteenth century, was waged around the above-mentioned work of Quesnel. The peace too hastily granted by Clement IX was favourable to Jansenism. The doctrine took deep root in the French Parlements and affected several royal orders, Benedictines, Chartreux, the Classical Doctrine, Genevivans, and especially Oratorians. Attention was called to the spread of the heresy by the success of the "Réflexions morales". This work, published as a small volume in 1671 with the approval of Vialart, Bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, had been steadily enlarged in succeeding editions until, in 1693, it numbered four compact volumes bearing always the approbation of Vialart, who died in 1680. De Nourilles, the new Bishop of Châlons, sanctioned the work in 1695, but the following year, as Archbishop of Paris, he condemned it. The edition of 1699 was published without the chapter-analyzed without approval, which he commanded for it, and without the approval of the diocesan bishop. The following year (2 July, 1700) the anonymous work "Problème ecclésiastique, etc." and the controversies to which it gave rise, again drew attention to the peril of Jansenism. At the Synod of the French Clergy in the same year, Bossuet brought about the condemnation of four Jansenist propositions and of 127 others of lax morality. After the death of Bossuet (1704), Fénelon led the contest against Jansenism and especially against the distinction between "fact" and "right" (faute et droit). Finally, at the request of Louis XIV, and following the example of his predecessors, Clement XI condemned in the Bull “Vineam Dominii!” (1705) the Jansenist excommunication known as siletum obsequiosum, or respectful silence, and proscribed (1708) the Réflexions morales. Shortly afterwards the King caused the Jansenist establishment of Port-Royal to be demolished (1710). However, he had not yet been overthrown. Louis XIV then urged the Pope (November, 1711) to publish another Bull, and promised to have it accepted with due respect by the French bishops. On this assurance Clement XI established a special congregation to draw up a new constitution, the result of eighteen months of careful study, the famous Bull “Unigenitus”, destined soon to provoke an outburst of wrath on the part of the Jansenists, was promulgated in Rome (8 September, 1713). In it the Pope condemned 101 propositions from Quenel’s book as “false, misleading, scandalous, suspected and savouring of heresy, bordering on heresy, frequently condemned; what is more, as being heretical and reviving various propositions of Jansenius, in the very sense for which they were first proscribed”. Noailles at first submitted, but later, in an assembly of the French bishops, who met at the instance of Fénélon in the archbishop’s palace in Paris, recalled his submission and with eight of his colleagues ranged himself among the appellants. The forty others voted to accept. The Parliament of Paris registered the Bull (15 February, 1714), and the Sorbonne did the same, albeit under pressure of royal authority. The French Episcopal, with the exception of twenty hesitating or stubborn members, submitted forthwith. To make an end of the matter, Louis XIV, at Fénélon’s suggestion, conceived the idea of holding a national council as a means of restoring unity; but his death prevented this and deferred the hour of final pacification.

The Regent, Philip of Orleans, a man without religious or moral convictions, a “vicious braggart”, as Louis XIV styled him, attempted to hold the balance between the two parties. The Jansenists profited by his neutrality. Noailles was put at the head of a “conseil de conscience pour les affaires ecclésiastiques”, and four doctors of the Sorbonne who had been exiled because of their violent opposition to the Bull were recalled. The Sorbonne, which had accepted the Bull “Unigenitus” by a mere majority, now cancelled its acceptance (1716). The Pope through a Brief punished the Sorbonne by suspending it for all its persons. The Parliament of Paris sided with the Faculty and suppressed the Brief, while the Sorbonne itself contested the right of the Sovereign Pontiff to withdraw lawfully granted privileges. The following year four bishops, Soanen of Senes, Colbert of Montpellier, de la Broue of Mirepoix, and de Lange of Boulogne, appealed from the Bull “Unigenitus” to a future general council.

Their example was followed by sixteen bishops, ninety-seven doctors of the Sorbonne, a number of curés of Paris, Oratorians, Genevieveans, Benedictines of Saint-Maur, Dominicans, members of female religious orders, andpreset its operation of an animosity even extended to the provinces, all but not to the universities, all of which, with the exception of Nantes and Reims, supported the Papal Bull. Of the 100,000 priests then in France, hardly 3,000 were among the appellants, and 700 of these were in Paris. The great majority voted for acceptance and compliance side by side with the Sorbonne.

The appellants had only 20 bishops. Clement XI knew that he must act vigorously. He had used every means of persuasion and had written to the Archbishop of Paris beseeching him to set the example of submission. He even consented to a delay. But the Jansenists won the upper hand and it was only as late as July 1714 that the Pope published the Bull “Pastoralis Officium” (28 August, 1718), in which he pronounced excommunication upon all who opposed the Bull “Unigenitus”. The same year, 2 October, Noailles and his party appealed from this second Bull, and the Université of Paris, headed by the famous Rollin, endorsed the appeal. The Regent thought it time to intervene. He was indifferent to the question of doctrine, but was sufficiently strong to see that censorious people like the appellants were no less dangerous to the State than to the Church. Moreover, his old teacher, the Abbé Dubois, now his Prime Minister, with an eye perhaps to the cardinal’s in-law, was in favour of peace. He was to be composed a “Corps de Doctrine” (1720) explaining the Bull “Unigenitus”, and about one hundred prelates gave their adhesion to it. Noailles then accepted the Bull (19 November, 1720), “following the explanations which have been approved of by a great number of French bishops”. This ambiguous and uncertain submission did not satisfy Clement XI; he died, however, without having obtained anything more definite.

Louis XV and his aged minister, the Cardinal de Fleury, opposed the sect with vigour. Authorised by them, De Tencin, Archbishop of Embrun, convoked a provincial council (1727) to examine Soanen, the aged Bishop of Senes, who in a pastoral instruction had gone to extremes. The Marquis de Thélème, a student in this council, notably De Belunce, famous for the zeal he displayed during the plague of Marseilles. Although supported by twelve bishops and sixty advocates, Soanen was suspended and sent to the monastery of Chaise-Dieu where he died, insubordinate, at the age of ninety-three. After numerous evasions, ending in submission, Noailles died in 1729. The only appellants left were the Bishops Colbert of Montpellier, Caylus of Auxerre, and Bossuet of Troyes, a nephew of the great Bishop of Meaux. At the same time 700 doctors of the Sorbonne, of whom thirty-nine were bishops, ratified the earlier (1714) acceptance of the Bull “Unigenitus”. It was a triumph for the acceptants, that is to say, for the authority of the Pope and of the Church.

Accession (from Lat. accedere, to go to; hence, to be added to) is a method of acquiring ownership of a thing arising from the fact that it is in some way added to, or is the fruit of something already belonging to oneself. This may happen in three ways: (1) naturally; (2) artificially; (3) from the combined operation of nature and industry. (1) Natural.—The offspring of a female animal is the property of the owner, even though it be the result of intercourse with a male belonging to someone else. The axiom applies in the case that perturbs sectum tenerrum. The Louisianans in 1800 bought land, but no one was able to identify the source of slaves born during the temporary use or hiring of their mothers, belonged not to the hirer but to the permanent owner. But the offspring of a slave born during a tenancy for life belonged to the tenant for life. In the same manner, if the tenant had encroached upon land that was not his, this was an addition to one’s land made by the action of water, as by the current of a river. If this increase is gradual and imperceptible, the augmentation belongs to the owner of the land. If it has been sufficiently large, and its quantity, by the common law, it belongs to the State. (2) Artifices.—This sort occurs (a) by specification, when one's labour or artistic talent is employed upon materials owned by another, so that a new substance or thing is produced. Where this is done in good faith, the product belongs to the artist or labourer with the obligation on his part to indemnify the owner of the materials. (b) By adjunction, when one's labour and material have been so united with the property of another that they cannot be separated. The result then belongs to him who has contributed the more important component. (c) By blending, when material of equal value and containing the same owners, are mixed together. The thing or its price is then to be divided according to natural equity between the original possessors, if the mixture has been made in good faith; otherwise the weight of law is thrown in their favour whose right has been violated. (d) By accession in the sense of Accidens is the building of a house on another's ground, or the planting of trees or sowing of vegetables in another's field. The house, trees, etc., belong to the master of the soil after making suitable compensation to the builder, planter, etc. Bouvier, Law Dictionary; Babington, Theol. Morals. JOSÉPH F. DELANY.

Accessus, a term applied to the voting in conclave for the election of a pope, by which a cardinal changes his vote and "accedens" to some other candidate. When the votes of the cardinals have been counted after the first round and the two-thirds majority has fallen to none of those voted for, at the following vote opportunity is granted for a cardinal to change his vote, by writing, Accedens Domino (changing some one of those who have been voted for, but not the cardinal for whom he has already voted. If he should not wish to change his vote, the cardinal can vote Nominis, i.e. for no one. If these supplementary votes of accession, added to those a candidate has received, equal two-thirds of the total vote, then there is an election. If the ballots are burned, and the usual ballots take place the next day. (See Conclave.) Lucius Lector, Le Conclave, origine, histoire, etc. (Paris, 1894); Laurentius, Ind. Jur. Eccl. Accidio, name of three cardinals belonging to an illustrious Florentine family of this name.—Accidio, noted for his learning, eloquence, and integrity, b. 1349; d. at Pisa, 31 May, 1408. He was made Archbishop of Florence in 1383, and Cardinal in 1385, by Pope Urban VI. He resisted all endeavors that were made to bring him over to the Antipope, Clement VII, and defended the regularity of the election of Urban VI. After this Pope's death, half the votes in the succeeding conclave were for Accidio; but to end the schism, he directed the election towards Boniface IX. The new Pope made him Cardinal-Bishop of Ostia, and sent him to Germany, Slavonia, and Bulgaria to settle difficulties there. He afterwards became Governor of Naples, and guardian of the young King Ladislaus, whom he brought to Naples, and some time later accompanied on his march into Hungary. On his return he reconciled the Pope with the Orsini, and reformed the Benedictine monastery of St. Paul in Rome. He died on his way to Pisa, and was buried in Florence, at the Certosa, a monastic foundation of his family.—Niccolò, b. at Florence, 1630; d. in Rome, 23 February, 1719, as Cardinal-Bishop of Ostia, in his eighty-ninth year.—Filippo, b. in Rome, 12 March, 1700. He was nuncio in Portugal, but was exiled with military force by Pombal (August, 1760) because of his interference in behalf of the Jesuits. Clement XIII made him Cardinal in 1769, he died in Ancona, as Bishop of that see, 4 July, 1766 (Duhr, Pombal, 1891, '21 sqq.'). JOHN J. A. BECKET.

Accident [Lat. accidere, to happen]—what happens to be in a subject; any contingent, or non-essential attribute.

I.—The obvious division of things into the stable and the unstable, the more or less independently subsistent and the dependent, or essentially inherent, appears beset with obscurity and difficulty as soon as it is brought under reflective consideration. In the endeavours to solve the problem, philosophers have followed two extreme tendencies. Some have denied the objectiveity of the substantial or nomencl element, and attributed it wholly or in part to the mind; others have made the phenomenal or accidental element subjective, and accorded objectivity to substance alone. These two extreme tendencies are represented among the ancient Greek materialists and atomists on the one hand and the Elastic pantheists on the other. Aristotle and his medieval followers steer a middle course. They hold to the objectivity both of substance and of accident, though they recognize the subjective factor in the mode of perception. They use the term accident to designate any contingent (i.e. non-essential) relation between an attribute and its subject. As such it is a merely logical denomination, one of the five "predicables" or universals, modes of systematic classification—genus, difference, species, property, accident. In this sense it is called predicable, as distinguished from predicamental, accident, the latter term standing for a real objective form or status of things, and denoting a being whose essential nature it is to inhere in another as in a subject. Accident thus implies inexistence in substance—i.e., not as the contained in the container, not as part in the whole, not as being in time or place, not as effect in cause, not as the known in the knower; but as an inherent entity or mode in a subject which it determines. Accidents modify or denominate their subject in various ways, and to these correspond the nine "Categories": (1) quantity, in virtue whereof material substance has interior, exterior, parts, elements, qualities, duration, etc.; (2) quality, which modifies substance immediately and intrinsically, either statically or dynamically, and includes such inherent of substance as habit, faculty, sense-stimuli, and figure or shape; (3) relation, the bearing of one substance on another (quality, quantity, relation). These three, in turn, may receive extrinsic accidents, to distinguish them from the remaining six groups—action, passion, location, duration, position, habitum—which, as their names sufficiently suggest, are simply extrinsic denominations accruing to a substance because of its bearings on some other substance. Quantity and quality, and, in a restricted sense, relation are said to be absolute accidents, because they are held to superadd some special form of being to the substance wherein they reside. For this reason a real, and not a merely conceptual, distinction between them and their subject is maintained. Arguments for the physical reality of this distinction are drawn from: (a) internal-consciousness attesting that the permanent, substantial self is subject to constantly-shifting accidental states; and (b) external experience, which witnesses to a like permanence of things beneath the incessantly varying phenomena of nature. The supernatural order furnishes another element in the theology of the infused virtues which are habits supervening on, and hence really distinct from, the substance of the natural mind.

II.—With the reaction against scholasticism, led by Descartes, a new theory of the accident in ACCLAIMED, or rather the two extreme views of the Greeks referred to above are revived. Descartes, making quantity the very essence of matter, and thought the essence of spirit, denies all real distinction between substance and accident. While teaching in diversity in substance, as independent being, gave occasion to Spinoza’s monism, and accidents became still more deeply buried in substance. On the other hand, substance seems to last to disappear with Locke, the world is resolved into a congeries of qualities—qualitative properties (e.g., sensibility properties). The primary qualities, however, still retain a foundation in the objective order, but with Berkeley they become entirely subjectified; only the soul is allowed a substantial element as the support of psychical accidents. This element is likewise dissolved in the philosophy of Hume and the Associationists. Kant considered accidents to be simply subjective categories of sense and intellect, forms according to which the mind apprehends and judges of things—which things are, and must remain, unknowable. Spencer retains Kant’s unknowable non-numen but admits phenomena to be its objective aspects and modifications.

III.—Several other classifications of accidents are found in the pertinent treatises. It should be noted that while accidents by iteration modify substance, they are witnesses to its nature, being the medium whereby the mind, through a process of abstraction and generalization, builds up its analytical concepts of the constitution of substances. From this point of view, material accidents are classed as (a) proper sensibles—the excitants of the individual senses, colour for sight, sound for hearing, etc.—and (b) common sensibles—extension and its modes, size, distance, etc.—which stimulate two or more senses, especially touch and sight with these stimuli, and concomitantly with their perception, the underlying subject is apperceived. Substance in its concrete existence, not in its abstract essence, is said to be an accidental object of sense.

IV.—The modern views of accident, so far as they accord to it any objectivity, are based on the physical theory that all, at least material, phenomena (light, colour, heat, sound, etc.) are simply varying forms of motion. In part, the kinetic element in such phenomena was known to Aristotle and the Scholastics (cf. St. Thomas, “De Animis”: III, Lec. ii); but it is only in recent times that physical experience has thrown light on the nature of material phenomena as conditioned by degrees of motion. While all Neo-Scholastic philosophers maintain that motion alone will not explain the objectivity of extension, some (e.g. Guterlet) admit that it accounts for the sensible qualities (colour, sound, etc.). Haan (Philos. Nat.) draws the theory of motion from an extreme idealism, but holds that the theory of the real, formal objectivity of those qualities affords a more satisfactory explanation of sense-perception. The majority of Neo-Scholastic writers favour this latter view. (Pesch, Phil. Nat.)

V.—The teaching of Catholic philosophy on the distinct reality of certain absolute, not purely modal, accidents was occasioned by the doctrine of the Real Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Eucharist, though the arguments for the theory are deduced from natural experience. The same doctrine not only questions the fusion with the substance of such accidents may not be separable from substance. Reason alone offers no positive arguments for such separability. The most it can do is to show that separability involves no inherent contradiction, and hence no absolute impossibility; the Omnipotence that endows substance with the power of supporting accidents can, it is claimed, supply some other means of support. Nor would the accidents thus separated, and supernaturally supported, lose their character as accidents, since they would still retain their essential property, i.e. natural exigence of inclusion. Of course the intrinsic possibility of such separation depends solely on the superadditive indifference of God, and may it extend to all classes of accidents. Thus, e.g., it is absolutely impossible for vital faculties, or acts, to exist outside their natural subjects, or principles. Theorists who, like the Cartesianists, deny the objective, distinct entity of all accidents have been obliged to reconcile this with their belief in the Real Presence by maintaining that the species, or accidents, of bread and wine do not really remain in the Eucharist, but that after Consecration God produces on our senses the impressions corresponding to the natural phenomena. This theory obviously demands a seemingly unnecessary multiplication of miracles and has at present few if any serious advocates. (See Eucharist.)

ACCLAIMATIONS. See Eucharist.

ACCLAMATION (Lat. ad, to, clamare, to cry out). In CIVIC LIFE.—The word acclamation (in the plural, acclamations) was used in the classical Latin at Republican Rome as a general term for any manifestation of popular feeling expressed by a shout. At weddings, funerals, triumphs, etc., these acclamations were generally limited to certain stereotyped forms. For example, when the bride was being conducted to her husband’s house the spectators cried: Io Hymen, Hymenas, or Palæae, or Talasseo. As a triumph there was a general shout of Io Triumph. An orator who gained the approbation of his hearers was interrupted with cries of belle et festiva, bene et praecare, non potest melius, and the like, where we should say “Hear, hear!” Under the Empire these acclamations took a remarkable development, more particularly in the circus and in the theatre. At the entrance of the enthroned emperor the audience rose and greeted him with shouts, which in the time of Nero were reduced to certain prescribed forms and were sung in rhythm. Moreover, like the guns of a royal salute, these cries were also prolonged and repeated for a definite and carefully regulated number of syllables. The same method was adopted in the senate, and under the later Antonines it would seem that such collective expressions of feeling as would nowadays be incorporated in an address of congratulation or a vote of censure, then took the form of acclamations which must have been carefully drafted beforehand, and were apparently shouted in chorus by the whole assembly. A long specimen of denunciatory acclamations which indeed might better be called imprecations, chanted in the Senate after the assassination of the Emperor Commodus (192), is preserved by Lampadius. The original occupies several pages; a few clauses may suffice here: “On every side are statues of the Emperor and the Senate; on every side statues of the par- club; on every side statues of the emperor and the senate. Let the slayer of his fellow-citizens be dragged in the dust; let the statues of the senator be dragged at the market’s gate.”

More to our present purpose, however, are the favourable acclamations of the Senate, such as those recorded by Lampadius at the election of Alexander Severus: “Alexander Augustus, may the gods keep thee. For thy modesty; for thy prudence; for thy guilelessness; for thy chastity. From this we understand what sort of a ruler thou wilt be. For this we welcome thee. Thou wilt make it appear that the senate chooses its rulers well. Thou wilt prove that the senate's judgment is sound. Alexander Augustus, may the gods keep thee. Let Alexander Augustus dedicate the temples of the Antonines. Our Caesar, our Augustus, our Emperor, may the Gods keep thee. Mayest thou live, mayest thou thrive, mayest thou rule for many years. It is only from an examination of the highest examples that one can arrive at an understanding of the influence which this institution of acclamations shouted in unison was likely to exercise upon the early developments of the Christian liturgy. The general resemblance with certain primitive forms of litany or extes and rhythmical singing is evident, but the situation is obscure and we may content ourselves primarily here with the acclamations, more properly so called, which had and still have a recognized place in the ceremonial of consecration of popes, emperors, kings, bishops, etc., and those also which are recorded in the acts of certain early councils.

Liturgical Acclamations. — It seems highly probable that the practices observed in the election of the Pagan emperors were the prototype of most of the liturgical acclamations now known to us. In the long account given by Vopiscus of the election of the Emperor Tacitus (258) we are told of the acclamations at the first declaration of the candidature in the senate on the score of his advanced age, "these were the acclamations of the senators, 'Trajan, too, ascended to the Empire as an old man!' (ten times); 'and Hadrian ascended to the Empire in his old age' (ten times); . . . 'Do you give orders, let the soldiers fight!' (thirty times); 'Severus said: It is the head that reigns not the feet' (thirty times); 'It is your mind, not your body, we are electing' (twenty times); 'Tacitus Augustus, may the Gods keep you.'" Then Tacitus was taken out to the Campus Martius to be presented to the soldiers and the people. "Whereupon the people acclaimed: 'Most happily may the gods keep thee, Tacitus, and the rest which it is customary to say.'" The slender records which we possess of the ceremonial in other cases of the election of an emperor make it clear that these popular acclamations were never discontinued even after the coronation assumed an ecclesiastical character. Leo, Leo, Pope, was carried out in church. Thus the official rituals we possess, one of which dates back to the close of the eighth century, explain how when the crown has been imposed "the people shout, 'Holy, holy, holy,' and 'Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace', thrice. And if there is a prince to be crowned as consort of the Empire, the Patriarch takes the second crown and hands it to the Emperor, and he imposes it, and the two choirs shout 'Worthy.'" After this followed the imperial acta (ἀκτέλεγέν is the technical term in Greek for the shouting of these acclamations) or laudes, as they were called in the West. A sort of litany was chanted or recited, which was chanted by heralds, while the people repeated each verse once or thrice after the leaders. In this we find such passages as,

- "Many, many, many,
- R. 'Many years, for many years,
- Long years to you, N. and N., autocrats of the Roman,
- R. 'Many years to you,
- Long years to you, Servants of the Lord,
- R. Many years to you," etc.

Almost contemporary with these are the acclamations found in our English Ægbert Pontifical (probably from the 6th century) at the election of bishops. Each other English MSS. has preserved to us the earliest detailed account of a coronation in the West. The text is a little uncertain, but probably should read as follows:

"Then let the whole people say three times along with the bishops and the priests: 'May our King, N., live for ever!' (Vivit et Rex N. in saeculum aeternum.) And the Pope shall be confirmed upon the three crowns of his kingdom with the blessing of all the people while the great Lords kiss him, saying: 'For ever. Amen, amen, amen.'" There is also in the Ægbertine ritual a sort of litany closely resembling the imperial acclamations just referred to, and this may be compared with the elaborations set of laudes, technically so called, which belong to the time of Charlemagne and have been printed by Duchesne in his edition of the "Liber Pontificalis," II, 37. In these imperial laudes the words Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat (Christ conquers, Christ reigns, Christ commands) are always repeated, and it should be added that these acclamations or some similar feature have been retained to this day in the Eastern coronation rituals and in a few of Western origin, amongst others in that of England. Thus for the coronation of King Edward VII in 1902 the official ceremonial gave the following direction: "When the Homage is ended, the drums beat and the trumpets sound, and all the people shout, crying out: 'God save King Edward!' 'Long live King Edward!' 'May the King live for ever!'

For Popes and Bishops. — It was natural that the practice of acclamation should not be confined to the popular acclamation of the Papal election. Just as we read of the king "wearing his crown" upon great feasts in certain favoured cities, a ceremony which seems to have amounted to a sort of secondary coronation, so the elaborate laudes in honour of the emperor were often repeated on festivals, especially at the papal Mass. But more than this the practice of acclaiming the emperor at his election was also extended to the Pope and in some cases to simple bishops. In the case of the Pope our testimonies are not very ancient, but the "Liber Pontificalis" in the eighth century frequently alludes to the practice, associating the words acclamations and laudes in many combinations; while at a somewhat later date we have the explicit testimony of the "Ordines Romani." In the case of the coronation of Leo (probably the fourth pope of that name), we learn that the leaders of the people from each district acclaimed him with the words: "The Pope, let him have power to sit in his see for many years." At the present day after the Gloria and the Collect of the Mass of the Coronation, the senior Cardinal Deacon, standing before the Pope enthroned, chants the words, "Exaudite, Christe, (Hear, O Christ); to which all present reply "Long life to our Lord Jesus who has been appointed Supreme Pontiff and Universal Pope." This is repeated three times with some other invocations, and it then expands into a short litany in which the repetition of each title is answered by the prayer tu illum adjuva (Do thou help him). This last feature closely reproduces the laudes of the Middle Ages. Such acclamations seem to have been familiar from very early times at the election of bishops, though it would probably be going much too far to represent them as regularly forming part of the ritual. The classical instance is that recorded by St. Augustine, who proposed Heracleus to the people of Hippo as successor. Thereupon he says, "The people shouted: 'Thanks be to God, Praised be Christ.' This was said twenty-three times. 'Hear, O Christ; long live Augustine,' sixteen times. 'Thee for our Father, Thee for our Bishop,' twenty times. 'Well deserving, truly worthy, five times; and again St. August, Epist. 27, 709 (A. D. 494) says, '96 times. In this, however, there was clearly nothing liturgical, though that character may perhaps be better recognized in the cry of, "He is worthy, he is worthy; for many years”, etc., which the people in certain ancient rituals were directed to make when the bishop-elect was presented to them before his consecration.

COUNCILS.—Other acclamations meet us in the acts of some of the early councils. They seem in most cases to have taken the form of compliments to the emperors, and may often perhaps be no more significant than the “amen” to the prayer and royal family at a modern banquet. But we read of other cries for instance, that at the first session of the Council of Chalcedon (October 451) the Fathers shouted, regarding Dioscorus: “The scoffer always runs away. Christ has deposed Dioscorus. Christ has deposed the murderer.” Or again, according to the same council; or again, “God has avenged His Martyrs.” Upon the other meanings which have been attached to the word acclamation—some of them rather strained—it does not seem necessary to speak at length. (1) The applause of the congregation which often in ancient times interrupted the sermons of favoured preachers. (2) The prayers and good wishes found upon sepulchral monuments, etc., to which the name acclamations is sometimes given. (3) The brief liturgical formule, such as Dominus vobiscum, Kyrie Eleison, Deo gratias, etc. (4) For election by acclamation, See election, CONCLAVE, and ACCLAMATION IN PAPAL ELECTIONS.

HERBERT THURSTON.

ACCLAMATION, IN PAPAL ELECTIONS, one of the forms of papal election. The method of electing the Roman Pontiff is contained in the constitutions of Gregory XV, xi. “Eterni Patris Filius” and “Decet Romanum Pontificem”, constitutions. “Venerabiliter Pontificem”, is confirmatory of the preceding. According to these documents, three methods of election alone are valid; namely, by scrutiny, by compromise, and by acclamation, or quasi-inspiration. This last form of election consists in all the cardinals present unanimously proclaiming one of the candidates Supreme Pontiff, without the formality of casting votes. As this must be done without previous consultation or negotiation it is looked on as proceeding from the Holy Ghost and hence is also designated “quasi-inspiration”. An example of this mode of election in more recent times is found in the election of Pius IX (1870-76), formerly Cardinal Altiere, whose election is said to have been determined by the sudden cry of the people outside the conclave, “Altiere Papa”, which was confirmed by the cardinals (Keller). Innocent XI (1678-89) is another example. The cardinals surrounded him in the chapel of the Sistine, and in spite of all previous resistance to one of them kissed his hand, proclaiming him Pope (De Montor).

ACCOMMODATION

ACCOMMODATION.—We shall consider (1) what is meant by biblical accommodation; (2) its use in Sacred Scripture; (3) the rules which ought to regulate its use.—(1) What is Biblical Accommodation? By accommodation is understood the accommodation of words or sentences from one text to another to signify ideas different from those expressed by the sacred author. Thus, if a sinner excuses his fault by saying, “The serpent deceived me”, he applies the scriptural words of Eve (Gen., iii, 13) to express an idea which the sentence does not convey in its original sense. Similarly, a blind poet might use the words of Tob., v, 12, “What manner of joy shall be to me, who sit in darkness, and see not the light of heaven”. Here, again, the words would have a meaning which they do not bear in Sacred Scripture. This accommodation is sometimes incorrectly styled “accommode” or “accommodation”. Since the use of one text to signify an idea from another text, the name is aptly given Scriptural. From this definition it is clear that it is not a sense of Scripture at all. The possibility of such accommodation may perhaps arise, first, from some similarity between the ideas in the sacred text and the subject to which the passage is accommodated; secondly, from the fact that the words of Scripture may be understood in two different senses. The first is called extensive accommodation. Examples of this are found in the Church’s offices, both in the Breviary and the Missal, when the praises bestowed by the Holy Ghost on Noe, Isaac, and Moses are applied to other saints. Thus the words of Exod., xi, 1: “Have you made these people rather music or word” are sometimes applied to College presidents assuming the burden of their office; we need not say that the words of Sacred Scripture have quite a different meaning. The second species of accommodation, called allusive, is oftener a mere play on words and at times seems due to a misunderstanding of the original meaning. The Vulgate text, Mirabilis Deus in sanctis suis (Ps., lxxvi, 36) means, in the mouth of the Psalmist, that God is wonderful in His sanctuary (sanctum, -orum). The Latin words may also be translated “God is wonderful in his saints” (sancti, -orum), and they are employed in this sense in the Missal. As this second signification was not intended by the inspired writer, the English rendering of the text in the Douay version is a mistranslation.—(2) The Use of Accommodation in the Bible. It is generally held by Catholic authors that certain passages from the Old Testament have again in the New Testament with a change of meaning. In the Epistle to the Hebrews (xiii, 5) the words spoken to Josue, “I will not leave thee, nor forsake thee” (Jos., i, 5), are applied to all Christians. Other examples of accommodation are the use of Exod., xvi, 18 in II Cor., viii, 15; Zach., iv, 14; Apoc., xi, 4; Rom., ix, 1 in Matt., vii, 2; 3; Mich., vi, 3. Evidently, the new meaning attached to the words is also inspired. Rationalistic writers have maintained that similar accommodations are to be found in every case where the Evangelists quote the prophecies of the Old Testament. Some few Catholic writers have been willing to explain away a few passages, but the words in which the Evangelists assert that events or Our Lord’s life took place “in order that” the prophecies might be fulfilled are incompatible with the theory that they wished to ensure only a resemblance between the event and the prophet’s words. It is probable that no prophecy is used in the Gospels merely by accommodation.—(3) Rules for Accommodation. The use of accommodation in the Liturgy and by the Fathers of the Church is sufficient to show that it is legitimate. Hence texts have been, and are frequently, accommodated by preachers and ascetical authors. Many of the sermons of St. Bernard contain picturesque phrases and owe much of their peculiar union to his happy use of the sacred words. Latin writers and preachers have not been so reverent and careful in their accommodation, and this was one of the abuses condemned by the Council of Trent when it forbade the wresting of Scripture to profane uses (Sess. IV, Decret. "De editione et usu Sacrorum Librorum"). Interpreters are wont to give the following rules for guidance in the accommodation of Scripture: (a) Accommodeated texts should never be used as arguments drawn from revelation; for the words are not employed in the sense, either literal or typical, intended by the Holy Ghost. Violations of this rule are not rare, either in sermons or in pious literature. (b) Accommodation should not be far-fetched. Allusive accommodations in many cases are mere distortions of the sacred text. (c) Accommodations should be reverent. Holy words, should be treated with reverence for the sake of the defamation, not to excite laughter, much less to cloak errors.

JAMES CORBET.

ACOMPlice, a term generally employed to designate a partner in some form of evil-doing. An accomplice who co-operates in some kind of the wrongful activity of another who is accounted the principal. From the view-point of the moral theologian not every such species of association is straightway to be adjudged unlawful. It is necessary to distinguish first of all between formal and material co-operation. To formaly co-operate in the sin of another is to be associated with him in the performance of a bad deed in so far forth as it is bad, that is, to share in the perverse frame of mind of that other. On the contrary, to materially co-operate in another's crime is to participate in the action so far as its physical entity is concerned, but not in so far as it is motivated by the malice of the principal in the case. For example, to persuade another to absent himself without reason from Mass on Sunday would be an instance of formal co-operation. To sell a person in an ordinary business transaction a reveller who he presently uses to kill himself is a case of material co-operation. Then it must be borne in mind that the co-operation may be described as proximate or remote in proportion to the closeness of relation between the action of the principal and that of his helper. The teaching with regard to this subject-matter is very plain, and may be thus viewed: Formal co-operation is not lawful, since it presupposes a manifestly sinful attitude on the part of the will of the accomplice. Material complicity is held to be justified when it is brought about by an action which is in itself either morally good or at any rate indifferent, and when there is a sufficient reason for permitting on the part of another for the sin which is a consequence of the action. The reason for this assertion is patent; for the action of the accomplice is assumed to be unexceptionable, his intention is already presupposed to be proper, and he cannot be burdened with the sin of the principal agent, since there is supposed to be a commensurately worthy reason for not preventing it. Practically, however, it is often difficult to apply these principles, because it is hard to determine whether the co-operation is formal or only material, and also whether the reason alleged for a case of material co-operation bears due proportion to the gravity of the sin committed by the principal, and the intimacy of the association. It is especially the last-named factor which is a fruitful source of perplexity. In general, however, the following considerations will be of value in discerning whether in an instance of material co-operation the reason avowed is valid or not. The necessity for a more and more powerful reason is accentuated in proportion as there is (1) a greater likelihood that the sin would not be committed without the act of material co-operation; (2) a closer relationship between the two; and (3) a greater heinousness in the sin, especially in regard to harm done either to the common weal or some unfrocked third party. It will be observed that when damage has been done to a third person, the question is raised not only of the lawfulness of the co-operation, but also of restitution to be made for the violation of a strict right. Whether in that case the accomplice has shared in the perpetration of the injustice physically or morally (i.e. by giving a command, etc.) whether positively or negatively (i.e. by failing to prevent it) the obligation of restitution is determined in accordance with the following principle. All are bound to reparo who in any way are accounted to be the actual efficient causes of the injury wrought, or who, being obliged by contract, express or implied, to prevent it, have not done so. There are circumstances in which fellowship in the working of damage to another makes the accomplice liable to restitution in solidum; that is, he is then responsible for the entire loss in so far as his partners have failed to make good for their share. Finally, mention must be made of the Constitution "Sacramentum Punitentie", governing a particular case of complicity. It provides that a priest who has been the accomplice of any person in a sin against the Sixth Commandment is rendered incapable of absolving validly that person from that sin, except in danger of death, and then only if there be no other priest obtainable.

ACCURSIUS, FRANCESCO (lt. Accorso), (1) a celebrated Italian jurisconsult of the Middle Ages, b. at Florence, 1182; d. at Bologna, 1260. After applying himself to various studies until he was twenty-eight, or according to other statements, thirty-seven years old, he took up the law and became one of its most distinguished exponents. He taught at Bologna, and then devoted himself to compiling a glossary or commentary on the whole body of law, which took precedence of any work then extant. Accorso, or Accursius, as he is called in the classics, but he was called "the Idol of the Jurisconsults". (2) FRANCESCO, son of the preceding, and also a lawyer, b. at Bologna, 1225; d. 1293. The two are often confounded. Francesco was more distinguished for his tact than for his wisdom. Edward I of England, returning from the Holy Land, brought him with him to England. He returned to Bologna in 1282, and practised law there until his death. His two sons, Cervottus and Guglielmo, and a daughter studied law with him and also practised in Bologna. Dante places Francesco Accursius in Hell (Inf. xxiv, 119). The tomb of his father and himself in Bologna bears the inscription: "Sepulcrum Accursii, glossatoris legum, et Francisci, ejus filli."

ACEPHALI, a term applied to the Eutychians who withdrew from Peter Mongus, the Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria, in 482. With the apparent purpose of bringing the orthodox and heretics into uniform, Peter Mongus and Accesius, a Constantinopolitan, elaborated and hiptroduced in which system they condemned expressly Nestorius and Eutyches, but at the same time affected to pass over the decisions of the Council of Chalcedon and rejected them hypocritically. This ambiguous formula, though approved by the Emperor Zeno and imposed by him in his edict of union, or Henoticon, could only satisfy the indifferent. The condemnation of Eutyches irritated the rigid Monophysites; the equivocal attitude taken towards the Council of Chalcedon appeared to them insufficient, and many of them, especially the monks, deserted Peter Mousgos, preferring to be without a head rather than follow their rivals and their common master with him. Later, they joined the partisans of the Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch, Severus. The Deacon Liberatus (Breviary, P. L., LVIII, 988) supposes the name Achephali (Headless) to have been given to those of the John of Ephesus who followed neither Cyril of Alexandria nor his opponents in P. Acerra (Acheronta). The Archdiocese of, in the provinces of Lecce and Potenza, Italy, has been united since 1293 with the Diocese of Matera. It lays claim to a very early, even Apostolic, origin. Acerra was certainly an episcopal see in the course of the 4th century; in 499 we meet with the name of its first known bishop, Justus, in the Acts of the Roman Synod of that year. The town is situated on an elevated ridge of the Apennines whence the eye dominates both the Adriatic and the Mediterranean; it was known in antiquity as "Umbria Achebra" (Hor. Odes, iii, 14). The cathedral is one of the oldest and most beautiful in Italy, and has lately become quite famous for a bust long supposed to be that of St. Canus or Canius (Ascarios) patron of the city, but now judged to be a portrait bust of Julian the Apostate, though others maintain that it is a bust of the Emperor Frederick II, after the manner of the sculptors of the Antonine age. Acerra was in early times a populous and important town, and a bulwark of the territory of Lucania and Apulia. In the Gothic and Lombard period it fell into decay, but was restored by Grimaldo, Duke of Benevento (867-899). An Archbishop of Acerra (Giralduie) appears in 1063 in an act of donation of Robert Guiscard to the monastery of the Holy Trinity in Venosa. For a few years after 968 Acerra was forced to adopt the Greek Rite in consequence of a tyrannical order of the Byzantine Emperor Nicephorus Phocas (963-969), whereby it was made one of five suffragans of Otranto, and compelled to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Constantinople (Moroni, Dizionario, L, 63). Pope Urban VI (1378-94, Bartolomeo Prignano) was once Archbishop of Acerra. Matera is said to have been created a see by the Greeks. Its cathedral dates from the year 1000, and is likewise a richly ornamented specimen of contemporary ecclesiastical architecture in Southern Italy. The Archdiocese of Acerra contains 22 parishes, 308 secular priests, and a few priests of religious orders. The population number 147,990. The present bishop is Monsignor Raffaele Rossa, successor (1899) of Monsignor Diomede Falconio, now Apostolic Delegate to the United States.

Achab ("Ahôbbh, "Ahebbh, in Jer., xxix, 22, "Ehebbh, "Ahebbh), son of Amri and King of Israel, 916-897 B.C., according to II K., xvi, 20, but 876-854 according to I K. The original return of the Israelites to their land (I K., xxi, 30) may have been changed. The King was married to Jezabel, a Sidonian princess, and was misled by her into idolatry (II K., xvi, 31 sqq.), the persecution of the prophets (II K., xviii, 13 sqq.), and a most grievous injustice against Na- both (III K., xxii). He was twice victorious in his wars against Syria (III K., xx, 13-28), and made an alliance with the Syrian King Benadad in spite of prophetic warning (III K., xx, 33). In the sixth year of Salmanassar II the allies were overcome by the Assyrians near Haran, and their country was occupied by Achab. He now allied himself with Josaphat, King of Juda, and they began war against Syria in order to conquer Ramoth Galsad (III K., xxii, 3 sqq.). The false prophets foretold victory, while Michaeas predicted defeat. The battle was begun in spite of this warning, and an arrow hit Achab between the lungs and the Breast (III K., xxii, 34). He died in the evening, and when his chariot was washed in the pool of Samaria, the dogs licked up his blood (III K., xxii, 38).

ACHAIA (Eugaeia), the name, before the Roman conquest in 146 B.C., of a strip of land between the gulf of Corinth in the north and Elise and Arcadia in the south, embracing twelve cities leagued together. The Achaean League was prominent in the struggle of the Greeks against Rome, and was probably due to this fact that the name was afterwards extended to the whole country south of Macedonia and Illyricum, corresponding approximately to modern Greece. During the Roman period Achaia was usually governed as a senatorial province. The Governor was an ex-Prætor of Rome, and bore the title of Proconsul. Corinth was the capital. When St. Paul came into Achaia (Acts, xviii), Gallio, a brother of Seneca, was proconsul. His refusal to interfere in the religious affairs of the Jews and the toleration of his administration favoured the spread of Christianity. In Corinth the Apostle founded a flourishing church. In his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, he salutes Christians "in all Achaia" (i, 1) and commends their charity (ix, 2).

Achaz (Ahaz, "Ahôzi"), King of Juda, placed variously, 741-726 B.C., 744-728, 748-727, 724-709, 734-728. It seems to be certain that the Thelghathphalasar's first expedition against Damascus mentioned in the life of Acha in 733 B.C., and the second in 731 B.C., may have been a visit to his idolatry (IV K., xvi, 3, Par., xxviii, 2-4). Achaz was consequently exiled by Ramzin of Syria, and then by Phacee, King of Israel (II Par., xxviii, 5; IV K., xvi, 6). Now, Rasin and Phacee made an alliance in order to dethrone the house of David in Juda, and to make the son of Tabeel king (Is., vii, 2-9). The prophet Isaiah offers to Achaz God's aid with the promise of safety in case of belief, but with the threat of punishment in case of unbelief (Is., vii, 12-21). Achaz is unbelieving, seeks help from Thelghathphalasar, offering at the same time rich presents from the temple treasury (IV K., xvi, 7, 8). The king of the Assyrians takes Damascus, afflicts Israel (IV K., xvi, 29, xvi, 9), but produces Judea to the menace of burning them (IV K., xvi, 17, II Par., xxviii, 20). Achaz was not improved by this affliction, but he introduced into the temple an altar modelled after that at Damascus (IV K., Acheyr, Lucas b', a French Benedictine (Maurist), b. 1609 at Saint Quentin in Picardy; d. in the monastery of St. Germain des Prés at Paris, 29 April, 1685. He was a profound student of medieval historical and theological materials, mostly in original manuscripts, to the collection, elucidation, and printing of which he devoted his whole life. He entered the Order of St. Benedict at an early age, was professed at the Abbey of the Blessed Trinity, Vendôme, 4 October, 1632, but his health soon obliged him to remove to Paris. He became a member (1637) of the monastery of St. Germain des Prés, and in his long sojourn of nearly fifty years scarcely ever quitted its walls. As librarian of the monastery he was soon acquainted with its rich treasures of medieval history and theology, and by a continuous correspondence with other monasteries, he made himself a bibliographical authority of the first rank, especially in all that pertained to the unedited or forgotten writings of medieval scholars. His first important work was an edition (Paris, 1645) of the "Epistle of Barnabas", which Greek text had been prepared for the press before his death, by the Huguenot Mairand. D'Achery's "Assemblion vulgo spiritualium opusculorum Indiculus" (Paris, 1645) served as a guide to his confère, Claude Chantelou, in the preparation of the five volumes of his "Biblorheca Patrum ascetica" (Paris, 1661). In 1648 he published all the works of Blessed Lanfran of Canterbury (II. 186, 9); he published, and edited for the first time the works of Abbot Guitert of Nogent (Paris, 1661) with an appendix of minor writings of an ecclesiastical character. In 1656 he edited the "Regula Solitaria" of the ninth-century priest Grimlaus (Grimlaic), a spiritual guide for hermits. His principal work, however, is the famous "Spicilegium, sive Collectio veterum aliquot scriptorum qui in Galliae bibliothecis, maxime Benedictinorum, latuerunt" (Paris, 1655-77), continued by Baluze and Martène, to whom we owe an enlarged and improved edition (Paris, 1723). D'Achery collected the historical materials for the edition of the Ordinis S. Benedicti, but Mabillon added so much to it in the way of prefaces, notes, and "excursses" that it is justly accounted as his work. D'Achery was the soul of the noble Maurist movement, and a type of the medieval Benedictine, humble and self-sacrificing, virtuous and learned. Despite continued illness he was foremost in all the labours of the French Benedictines of St. Maur, and was the master of many of the most illustrious among them, e.g. Mabillon. His valuable correspondence is preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris.

Acheyr, Lucas. (1) Father of Achinoam, wife of Saul (I K. xiv. 50). (2) Son of Sodo, the priest.

Achimma. — (1) Father of Achinoam, wife of Saul (I K. xiv. 50). (2) Son of Sado, the priest. He was a swiftfooted messenger in the service of David during the rebellion of Absalom. He brought from Jerusalem news of the enemy's movements, and, after the battle in which Absalom was slain, he was the first to reach the King with the news of victory. He is "a good man" according to "David" (II K. xv, 35, 36; xvii. 17 sq.; xviii. 19 sq.). This Achimma is perhaps the same as one of Solomon's prefects, the governor of Nephtali, and son-in-law of the King (III K. iv, 15).

Achimelech. — (1) The priest of Nob who extended hospitality to David during his flight from the court of Saul. For this he was put to death, together with all the priests of Nob except Abiathar, his son, who escaped and joined David (I K., xxv, 3). (2) A Hethite, companion of the outlawed David (I K., xxvi, 6). (3) There is an Achimelech spoken of (II K., viii, 17, and I Par., xviii, 16; xxiv, 3, 6, 31), as a "son of Abiathar" and an associate of Sado in the priesthood. As this position is usually attributed to "Abiathar, son of Sado", it is thought that the reading "Achimelech, son of Abiathar" is due to an accidental transposition of the text of Kings, and that this transposition has affected the text of Paralipomenon. (4) Name given to Achis, King of Geth, in the title of Ps. xxxiii. Some texts have Abimelech.

Achitophel was an able and honoured counsellor of David, who joined the rebellion of Absalom. The King was much affected by this desertion. Hearing that the man on whose word he had been wont to rely as "on an oracle of God" was giving his advice to the enemy, he prayed the Lord "to infatuate the counsel of Achitophel". Some have seen in Ps. liv, 19-20, a reflection of David on this faithless friend. It was on the advice of Achitophel that Absalom took possession of his father's harem, thus cutting off all hope of reconciliation. Understanding the need of energetic measures, he urged that 12,000 men be sent from Jerusalem in pursuit of the King. He offered to lead them himself. Chusai, a friend of David, defeated his purpose: the King upon proudly withdrew to his town of Gilo, put his house in order, and strangled himself. (See II Kings, xv, 12; xvii, 23; I Par., xxvii, 33.) It would seem from a conjunction of II Kings, xxiii, 34, and xvi, 3, that Achitophel was the grandfather of Urias the Hittite, and it has been suggested that the rejection of his conduct towards David, that he had kept a secret grudge against the King for the way he had treated Bethsabee, and. her first husband, the unfortunate Urias, this, or some motive of ambition, would be in keeping with the haughty character of Achitophel. Dryden has used this name in the title of his famous satire against the Protestant Party, "Absalom and Achitophel".

Achonry (Gaelic, Achadh-Chonnaire, Connary's Field), the Diocese of, in Ireland, suffragan to the Archdiocese of Tuam. The village of Achonry occupies a very picturesque situation in the south of the County Sligo. Here St. Finian, who died in 552, established a church and monastery on some land given him by the prince of the Connacht Chonaire. Over this he placed Nathi O'Hara, who had been his pupil in the famous school of Cionad and is always spoken of in the annals of Cionad under the name of the Priest Nathi. In a short time the monastery and its head acquired a remarkable reputation, and a diocese was formed (c. 560) of which Nathi is reputed to have been the first bishop, though he may have been only the abbot-superior, according to the Irish system of ecclesiastical organization from the sixth to the twelfth century, which permitted in monastic government such peculiar subordination. He is the patron of the diocese, and his feast is celebrated on 9 August. His successors made use of his monastery-church as their cathedral, and traces of it may still be seen. The diocese was formerly called Leyney from one of its largest and most important baronies, or perhaps because it was co-extensive with what is still known as the barony of Leyney. Additions were made to it at different periods until its boundaries were finally fixed in the twelfth century. It now includes the considerable part of Mayo, and the greater part of Sligo. At the important Synod of Kells, held in March, 1152, presided over by Cardinal Paparo, and attended by the Bishop of Lismore, then Apostolic Delegate, by twenty other bishops, and by many inferior clergy, the Diocese of Achonry was represented by its bishop, Melgran O'Ruadhain. Its diocesan limits were then fixed, and it was made suffragan to Tuam. From that date the catalogue of its bishops is less fragmentary. Of the three Irish bishops who were members of the Council of Trent, one was Eugene O'Hart, Bishop of Achonry. He was the rectively called by Dr. O'Hart, 103, except for a brief interval of four years (1641-45), there was no bishop until 1707, and the diocese was governed by vicars-apostolic. Achonry is one of the most Catholic dioceses in the world. The total population, according to the latest census (1901) is 82,795, of which 2,242 are non-Catholics, so that 97.3 per cent of the whole are Catholics. The bishopric of Achonry is important: it has twenty-six parishes, twenty of which have parish priests with full canonical rights; the remaining two are mensal parishes of the bishop. There are 51 priests in the diocese, and though at one period of its history Achonry was studded with religious houses, it has at the present time no regular clergy. There are 7 congregations of religious sisters: 3 of the Irish Sisters of Charity, 2 of the Sisters of Mercy, 1 of the Sisters of St. Louis, and 1 of the Marist Sisters. The Christian Brothers have a house in Ballaghadereen and the Marist Brothers one in Swineford. Full provision is made for the education of the young. In addition to the four primary schools there are day schools under the nuns and brothers and 201 schools under lay teachers. There is besides a boarding-school for young ladies conducted by the Sisters of St. Louis. There are also under the charge of the nuns 2 industrial and 7 technical schools. Since the accession of Dr. Nicholas in 1818, the bishop resides in Ballaghadereen. The cathedral, a very fine Gothic building, erected at great expense by Dr. Durcan, has been completed by the present bishop, Dr. Lyster, by the addition of a magnificent tower and spire. Within the last fifty years many new churches, some very beautiful, have been built, old churches restored, hospitals provided for the clergy, convents established, and schools provided.

Once foretells the time when this gloomy, ill-omened valley will be for an "opening of hope" to the returning exiles of Israel (Is., xi, 15); another prophet pictures it, in the same glorious future, transformed into a "place for the herd's to lie down in" (Is., lxv, 10). It was on the north boundary of Juda, leading past Jericho to the Jordan (Jos., xv, 7). It is commonly identified with the modern Wady el-Kelt and is usually written Akor.

ACHRIDA. A titular see in Upper Albania, the famous metropolis and capital of the medieval kingdom of Bulgaria, now the little village of Ochoria, on the banks of the M. Achrida, whose blue and exceedingly transparent waters in remote antiquity gave to the lake its Greek name. The city was known in antiquity as Lychnidus and was so called occasionally in the Middle Ages. In the conflict of the Illyrian tribes with Rome it served as a frontier outpost and was later one of the principal points on the great Roman highway known as the Via Egnatiana. Its first known bishop was Zosimus (c. 344). In the sixth century it was destroyed by an earthquake (Procop., Hist. Arcana, xv), but was rebuilt by Justinian (527-565), who was born in the vicinity, and is said to have been named in his honor. Justinia was one of the most important of the several new cities that bore his name. Ducehene, however, says that this honour belongs to Scupi (Uskub), another frontier town of Illyria (Les églises séparées, Paris, 1896, 240). The new city was made the capital of the prefecture, or department, of Illyria, and for the sake of political convenience it was made also the ecclesiastical capital of the Illyrian or Southern Dalmatian parts of the empire (Southern Hungary, Bosnia, Servia, Transylvania, Rumania). Justinian was unable to obtain immediately for this step a satisfactory approbation from Pope Agapetus or Pope Silvester. The Emperor, being a usurper of ecclesiastical authority, was a detriment to the ancient rights of Thessalonica as representative of the Apostolic See in the Illyrian regions. Nevertheless, the new diocese claimed, and obtained in fact, the privileges of autocephalia, or independence, and through its long and chequered history retained, or struggled to retain, this character. Pope Vigilius, under pressure from Justinian, recognized the exercise of patriarchal rights by the Metropolitan of Justiniana Prima within the broad limits of its civil territory, but Gregory the Great treated him as no less subject than other Illyrian bishops to the Apostolic See (Bull. c. 53, 233-237). The succession of the Avars and Slavs in the seventh century brought about the ruin of this ancient Illyrian centre of religion and civilization, and for two centuries its metropolitan character was in abeyance. But after the conversion of the new Bulgarian masters of Illyria (864) the see rose again to great prominence, this time under the name of Achrida (Adria). Though Greek missionaries were the first to preach the Christian Faith in this region, the first archbishop was sent by Rome. It was thence also that the Bulgarians drew their first official instruction and counsel in matters of Christian faith and discipline, a monastic influence which is recognized by "Rex Bertuli, Consula Bulgorum" of Nicholas I (886-887), one of the most influential of medieval canonical documents (Mansi, xv, 401; Hufele, Concilior., iv, 346 sq.). However, the Bulgarian King (Car) Bogaris was soon won over by Greek influence. In the Eighth General Council of Constantinople (869) Bulgaria was incorporated with the Byzantine patriarchate, and in 870 the Latin missionaries were expelled. Henceforth Greek metropolitan presides in Achrida; it was made the political capital of the Bulgarian kingdom and profited by the tenth-century conquests of its warlike rulers so that it became the metropolitan of several Greek dioceses.
in the newly conquered territories in Macedonia, Thessaly, and Thrace. Bulgaria fell unavoidably within the range of the Photian schism, and so, from the end of the ninth century, the diocese of Achrida was lost to Western and papal influence. The overlord of the independent Bulgarian kingdom in the early part of the eleventh century by Basil the Macedonian brought Achrida into closer touch with Constantinople. At a later date some of the great Byzantine families (e.g. the Ducas and the Comneni) claimed descent from the Kings, or Cars, of Bulgaria. In 1033 the metropolitan Leo of Achrida signed with Michael Cerularius the latter's circular letter to John of Trani (Apulia in Italy) against the Latin Church. Theophylactus of Achrida (1078) was one of the most famous of the medieval Greek exegetes; in his correspondence (Ep., 27) he maintains the traditional independence of the Diocese of Achrida. The Bishop of Constantinople, he says, has no right of ordination in Bulgaria, whose bishop is independent. In reality Achrida was during this period seldom in communion with either Constantinople or Rome. Towards the latter see, however, its sentiments were less than friendly, for in the fourteenth century we find the metropolitan Anthimus of Achrida writing against the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son (see TRINITY). Latin missionaries, however, appear in Achrida in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, mostly Franciscan monks, to whom the preservation of the Roman obedience in these regions is largely owing (see ALBANIA). The Latin bishops of Achrida in the seventeenth century are probably, like those of our own time, titular bishops. The ecclesiastical independence of Achrida seeming in modern times to leave an opening for Roman Catholic influence in Bulgaria, Armenius, the Orthodox Patriarch of Constantinople, had it finally abolished in 1767 by an order of Sultan Mustapha. At the height of its authority, Achrida could count as subject to its authority ten metropolitan and six episcopal dioceses.

PINTA, ST. ACKERMANN, IN THE CATHEDRAL OF MÜNSTER

ACHTERFELDT, JOHANN HEINRICH, theologian, b. at Wesel, 17 June, 1788; d. at Bonn, 11 May, 1877. He was appointed professor of theology at Bonn in 1826 and in 1832 he founded with his colleague, J. W. J. Braun (d. 1863), the "Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Katholische Theologie" (1832–52), the chief purpose of which was to defend the teaching of Hermes (q. v.). He also published under the title "Christkatholische Dogmatik" (Münster, 1834–36) the theological writings which Hermes (d. 1831) had left in MSS. This publication was followed by sharp controversy, and eventually by the condemnation of the works of Hermes, which Pope Gregory XVI placed upon the Index, 26 September, 1835. In 1843, Achterfeldt incurred suspension from his professorial chair rather than sign the declaration of faith required by the Coadjutor Archbishop of Giesel of Cologne. Though Hermeneutism lost ground and finally disappeared during the revolution of 1848, Achterfeldt clung to his views. However, he was reinstalled as professor, and in 1873, having made his submission to ecclesiastical authority, he was freed from suspension.

ACKERMANN, THEOBOROUGH WILLIAM, a German sculptor, was born in 1799, at Münster in Westphalia, of poor parents. After working on a farm he became a cabinet-maker. His carving was so clever and graceful that it attracted attention, and procured him the good will of some art patrons, who sent him to Berlin (1831), where he studied under the direction of Rauch, Tieck, and Schadow, then the foremost sculptors of Germany. Ackermann, however, being of a profoundly religious character, was drawn irresistibly to Rome, where he arrived in 1839 and remained till the end of his life. The first prominent product of his Roman studies was a Pietà which was secured for the Cathedral of Münster and which has often been copied. In 1858 the same cathedral acquired a group of seven life-size figures representing the descent from the Cross, which is regarded as one of its chief art treasures. His last great work, finished when the artist had passed his seventieth year, was a Gothic altar with three reliefs representing scenes from the life of Our Saviour. This was set up in the cathedral at Prague in the year 1873. He died at Rome in 1884. Ackermann's art is characterized by deep religious feeling and great imaginative power, though, on account of his having taken to an artistic career when somewhat advanced in life, he did not attain the technical mastery which he might otherwise have acquired.

HERTKENS, Wilhelm Ackermann (Trier, 1895).

ACIDALIUS, VALENS (German, Haveventhal), philosopher, Latin poet, and convert to the Catholic Church, b. 1567 at Wittstock in the Mark of Brandenburg; d. 25 May, 1595, at Neisse. After his education at the universities of Rostock, Greifswald, and Helmstedt, he began the study of medicine, but later devoted most of his time to the Latin classics, spending three years in the universities of Padua.
and Bologna and travelling through the chief Italian cities. After taking his degree of Doctor of Medicine at Padua, Adelphius devoted himself entirely to Latin literature. Returning to Germany in 1572, he resided in the city of Magdeburg. He was a convert to the Catholic faith, and, about the same time, Rector of the Breisgau Gymnasium. He died a few weeks later of yellow fever.

Adelphius's name appears in the works of Johann Matthäus Wacke von Wackenfels, also a convert, and chancellor to the Bishop of Breisgau, Andreas von Jerin.

Each little Hour is followed by a supplementary hour, called a Martyria. Prime begins with the recitation of three psalms followed by a doxology, two stichoi, a doxology, a troparium in honour of the Theotokos (the Birthgiver of God, i.e. the Blessed Virgin), the trisagion, several variable troparia, the doxology and dismissal, while its supplementary Hour is composed of a troparium, doxology, troparium of the Theotokos, Kyrie Eleison repeated forty times, a prayer, and a doxology. Terce, Sext, and None each contain the invitatoy verses, three psalms, a doxology, two stichoi, a doxology, the troparium of the Theotokos, the trisagion, doxology, another troparium of the Blessed Virgin, and the Kyrie Eleison repeated forty times. The Great Hours have the invitatoy verses, three psalms, a doxology, troparium, doxology, troparium of the Theotokos, Kyrie Eleison repeated forty times, and a proper prayer.

Before or after None, an office called Tà τέμπερ is recited, which consists ordinarily of the invitatoy verses, Psalms xii and cxl, and a troparium, but in the seasons of fasting this Office is regulated by different rubrics. The last part of the Office is called the Apodeipnon and corresponds to the Roman Compline. The greater Apodeipnon is said during Lent, the little Apodeipnon during the rest of the year. The latter is composed of the first twelve verses of the trisagion, the Lord's Prayer, the Kyrie Eleison repeated twelve times, and invitatoy verses, and Psalms i, lxix, and cxii, which are followed by the greater doxology, the Creed, the trisagion, the Lord's Prayer, the troparium proper to the feast, the Kyrie Eleison repeated forty times, several invocations, and the long prayers of dismissal.

Acolyte (Gr. ἀκολυτής; Lat. sequens, comes, a follower, an attendant).—An acolyte is a cleric promoted to the fourth and highest minor order in the Latin Church, ranking next to a subdeacon. The chief offices of an acolyte are to light the candles on the altar, to carry them in procession, and during the Solemn Mass to prepare the water for the sacrifice of the Mass; and to assist the sacred ministers at the Mass, and other public services of the Church. In the ordinance of an acolyte the bishop presents him with a candle, extinguished, and an empty cincture, using appropriate words expressive of these duties, and the candidate is designated an acolyte and perform the duties of such. The duties of the acolyte in Catholic liturgical services are fully described in the manuals of liturgy, e.g. Pio Martiniuc, "Manuale Sacrarum Ceremoniarum" (Rome, 1890), VI, 625; and De Herdt, "Sacre Liturgiae Praxis" (Louvain, 1889), II, 28-39.

It is just possible that the obscure passage in the life of Victor I (189-199), erroneously attributed by Ferraria (I, 101) to Pius I (140-155), concerning sequentes may really mean acolytes (Duchesne, Lib. Pont., I, 137; cf. I, 161). Be this as may be, the first authentic document extant in which mention is made of acolytes is a letter (Eus. Hist. Eccl., VI, xliii), written in 251, by Pope Cornelius to Fabius, Bishop of Antioch, and in which we possess a definite enumeration of the Roman clergy. There existed at that time in Rome forty-six priests, seven deacons, seven sub-deacons, forty-two acolytes, and fifty-two readers. Lectures and lessons are not to exceed three, and note that two hundred and fifty years later the "Constitutum Silvestri," a document of about 501 (Mansi, "Coll. Conc.," II, 626; cf. "Lib. Pont.," ed. Duchesne, Intro., 138), gives forty-five acolytes as the number in Rome. Pope Fabian (236-250)
the immediate predecessor of Cornelius, had divided Rome into seven ecclesiastical districts or regions, setting a deacon over each one. A redistribution of the clergy of the city followed according to the seven districts. The Roman archdeacons were subject to the deacon of the region, or, in case of his absence or death, to the archdeacon. In each region there was a deacon, a subdeacon, and, according to the notation above, probably six acolytes. Ancient ecclesiastical monuments and documents held that the subdeacon was a sort of head-acolyte or arch-acolyte, holding the same relation to the acolytes as the archdeacon to deacons, with this difference, however, that there was only one archdeacon, while there was a deacon for each region. As late as the first half of the tenth century we meet with the term archdeacon, in Luitprand of Cremona ("Antapodosis", VI, 6; Muratori, "SS. Rer. Ital.", II, 1, 473), where it stands for a "dignity" (q. v.) in the metropolitan church of Capua. We may therefore regard the ministration of the subdeacon and acolyte as a development of that of the deacon. Moreover, these three clerics did not differ from one another in this, that they are all attached to the service of the altar, while the others are not.

The letters of St. Cyprian (7, 28, 34, 52, 59, 78, 79) give ample proof of the fact that at Carthage also, in the middle of the third century, acolytes existed. Eusebius of Caesarea (Eccl. Hist. XV, 435) mentions acolytes present at the Council of Nice (325), not as designated for the service of the altar, but as persons attached to the retinue of bishops. The "Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua", often referred to as the decrees of the so-called Fourth Synod of Carthage (306), but really belonging to the end of the fifth, or the early part of the sixth century (Du Chesne, "Christian Worship", 332, 350), prove that this order was then known in the ecclesiastical province of Arles in Gaul, where these decrees were enacted. It would seem, however, that all the churches in the West, and more especially the smaller churches, did not have acolytes. We might conclude that at Reims, in the fifth century, there were no acolytes, if we could attach credence to the will of Bishop Bennadius, predecessor of St. Remigius (q. v.). He gives all the categories of clerics except this one (Fid.Ord., Hist. Rem. Eccl., I, 149). In the codex of Gaul mention is made, as far as is known, of only one acolyte, viz., at Lyons in 517 (La Blant, "Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule", I, 36), and, in general, very few epigrams of acolytes are found in the first five centuries. In the Irish Collection of Canons (Collectio Canonum Hibernensia, ed. Wesselschelen, Giessen, 1874, 32) the arch-acolyte is not mentioned among the seven ecclesiastical degrees, but placed with the psalmist and cantor outside the ordinary hierarchy.

In the sixth century the duties of acolytes are specified, as they are by a canonical writer of the 7th century, John the Deacon, to Senarius (P. L., LXIX, 404). Specific information concerning the place and duties of acolytes in the Roman Church between the fifth and ninth centuries is drawn from a series of ancient directions known as the "Ordines Romani" (q. v.—Du Chesne, op. cit., 148 and passim). According to them there were three grades of acolytes; (1) those of the palace (palatini), who served the Pope (or bishop) in his palace, and in the Lateran Basilica; (2) those of the regions (regiones), who served deacons in their duties in the different parts of the city; (3) those of the station (stationarii), who served in church; these last were not a distinct body, but belonged to the regional acolytes. Regional acolytes were also termed titular (titulares) from the church to which they were attached (Mabillon, De Comm. in Ord. Rom., IV, 20; for an old epigraph in Areflius, 156, see Ferraria, I, 100; Magani, "Antica Lit. Rom.", Milan, 1899, III, 61—see also Rome, City of). Acolytes of the palace were destined in a particular manner to the service of the Pope, assisting him not only in church but also in his palace, at the papal court, in distributing alms, carrying pontifical documents and notices, and performing other duties of like character. These offices, however, acolytes shared with readers and subdeacons, or arch-acolytes. At Rome they carried not only the eulogia (q. v.), or blessed bread, when occasion required, but also the Blessed Eucharist from the Pope's Mass to that of the priests whose duty it was to celebrate in the churches (tituli). This is evident from the letter of Innocent I (401-417) to Decentius, Bishop of Gubbio, in Italy (P. L., XX, 556). They also carried the sacred species to the presbytery, especially to those who were incarcerated in prison (see TARSICUS). This office of carrying the Blessed Eucharist, St. Justin, who suffered martyrdom about 165 or 166, had previously assigned to deacons (Apol., I, 67), which would indicate that at that time acolytes did not exist.

We learn still further from the letter of Pope Liberius that when the Pope was to pontificate in a designated district all the acolytes of that region went to the Lateran Palace to receive and accompany him. In the sixth or seventh century, perhaps a little earlier, the chief acolyte of the station church, carrying the sacred chrisom covered with a veil, and, directing the procession, preceded on foot the horse on which the Pope rode. The other acolytes followed, carrying the Gospel-book, burses, and other vessels used in the holy sacrifice. They accompanied the Pope to the secretarium or sacristy (see BASILICA). One of them solemnly placed the book of Gospels upon the altar. They carried seven lighted candles before the pontiff entering the sanctuary. With lighted candles, two acolytes accompanied the deacon to the ambo (q. v.) for the singing of the Gospel. After the Gospel, another acolyte received the book, which, placed in a case and sealed, was later returned to the deacon by the head acolyte. An acolyte carried to the deacon the wax candle, the alabaster, the gospels, the sacred vessels, and the holy plate. At the altar, the acolytes were assigned their stations, and the acolyte held the paten, covered with a veil, from the beginning to the middle of the canon. In due time acolytes bore, in linen bags, or burses suspended from their necks, the albula, or consecrated loaves from the altar to the bishops and priests in the sanctuary, that they might break the sacred species (see FRAGMENT PANIS). It will be seen from these, and other duties devolving upon acolytes, that they were in a large measure responsible for the successful conducting of pontifical and stationer ceremonies. This was particularly true during the foundation of the Schola Cantorum (q. v.) at Rome, of which there is clear evidence from the seventh century onward. Being then the only ones in minor orders engaged in active ministry, acolytes acquired a much greater importance than they had hitherto enjoyed. Cardinal Bessarion (who had not at that time any standing in their titular churches. During Lent, and at the solemnization of baptism, acolytes fulfilled all the functions which hitherto had devolved upon the exorcists, just as the subdeacon had absorbed those of the lector or reader. Alexander VII (1655-67) restored the mediaeval number of acolytes described above and substituted in their place (26 October 1655) the twelve voting prelates of the Signature of
As evidence of their origin these prelates still retain, at papal functions, many of the offices or duties described above.

According to the ancient discipline of the Roman Church the order of acolyte was conferred as the candidate approached adolescence, about the age of twenty, as the decree of Pope Siricius (385) to Himerius, bishop of Tripoli, in Spain, witnesses (P. L., XIII, 1142). Five years were to elapse before an acolyte could receive subdeaconship. Pope Zosimus reduced (418) this term to four years. The Council of Trent leaves to the judgment of bishops to determine what space should elapse between the conferring of the acolythate and the subdeaconate. It is also interesting to note, with Dr. Probst (Kirchenlex., I, 385), that the Council's desire (See XXIII, c. 17, de ref.) concerning the performance of ministerial services exclusively by minor-ordered clerics was never fulfilled. In ancient ecclesiastical Rome there was no solemn ordination of acolytes. At communion-time in ordinary Mass, even when it was not stational, the candidate approached the Pope, or in his absence, one of the bishops of the pontifical court. At an earlier moment of the Mass, he had been vested with the stole and the chasuble. Holding in his arms a linen bag (pulvinus eugus et purpuracens) as a symbol of the highest function of these clerics, that of carrying, as stated above, the consecrated hosts he prostrated himself while the Pontiff pronounced over him a simple blessing (Mabillon, op. cit., II, 85, ed. Paris, 1724). It may be well to mention here the two prayers of the ancient Roman Mass, known as the "Sacramentary Gregorianum" (Mabillon, Lit. Rom. Vetus, II, 407), said by the Pontiff over the acolyte, and the first of which is identical with that of the actual Roman Pontifical "Domine, sancte Pater, eternus Deus, qui ad Moyse et Aaron locutus es, etc.

According to the aforementioned "Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua," which give us the ritual usage of the most important churches in Gaul about the year 500, the candidate for acolyte was first instructed by the bishop in the duties of his office, and then a censuestick, with a candle extinguished, was placed in his hand by the archdeacon; and he was to see that the lights of the church would be in his care; moreover, an empty cresset was given him, symbolic of his office of presenting wine and water at the altar for the holy sacrifice. A short blessing followed. (See Minor Orders; Fractio Panis; Eucharist; Mass.)

Acosta, Josè de, the son of well-to-do and respected parents, b. at Medina del Campo in Spain, 1540; d. at Salamanca, 15 February, 1600. He became a novice in the Society of Jesus at the age of thirteen at the place of his birth. Four of his brothers successively joined the same order. Before leaving Spain he was lecturer in theology at Ocaña, and in April, 1569, was sent to Lima, Peru, where the Jesuits had been established in 1567 by the Viceroy Lasso de la Vega. Acosta again occupied the chair of theology. His fame as an orator had preceded him. In 1571 he went to Cuzco as visitor of the college of the Jesuits then recently founded. Returning to Lima three years later, to again fill the chair of theology, he was elected provincial in 1576. He founded a number of colleges, among them those of Arequipa, Potesi, Chucuito, Panama, and La Paz, but met with considerable opposition from the viceroy, Francisco de Toledo. His official duties obliged him to investigate personally a very extensive range of territory, so that he acquired a practical knowledge of the vast province and its aboriginal inhabitants. At the provincial council of 1582, at Lima, Acosta played a very important part. Called to Spain by the king in 1585, he was detained three years in Mexico, where he dedicated himself to studies of the country and people. Returning to Europe, he filled the chair of theology at the Roman college in 1594, as well as other important positions. At the time of his death he was rector of the college at Salamanca.

Few members of the Society of Jesus in the sixteenth century have been so uniformly eulogized as Father Acosta. Independently of his private industry, his learning, and his erudite and pervading his works attracted the widest attention in learned circles. Translations of his works exist in many languages of Europe, while the naturalists of the eighteenth century praise his knowledge of the flora of western South America. Aside from his publications of the proceedings of the provincial council of 1567 and 1593, and several works of exclusively theological import, Acosta is best known as a writer through the "De Natura Novi Orbis," "De promulgatione Evangelii apud barbaros, sive De procurandâ Indorum salute," and, above all, the "Historia natural y moral de las Indias." The first was published at Seville in 1591, the second at Seville, 1590, and was soon after its publication translated into various languages. It is chiefly the "Historia natural y moral" that has established the reputation of Acosta. In a form more concise than that employed by his predecessors, Gomara and Oviedo, he treats the natural and philosophical history of the New World from the Norse point of view. Much of what he says is of necessity erroneous, because it is influenced by the standard of knowledge of his time; but his criticisms are remarkable, while always dignified. He reflects the scientific errors of the period in which he lived, but with hints at a more advanced understanding. As far as the work of the Church among the Indians is concerned, the "De procurandâ Indorurn salute" is perhaps more valuable than the later "Historia," because it shows the standpoint from which efforts at civilizing the aborigines should be undertaken. That standpoint indicates no common perception of the true nature of the Indian, and of the methods of approach for his own benefit.

Among earlier sources, Father Eusebius Hieronymus, Amor, Occident et Orient, in the Acta de Compania de Jesús (1639), deserves mention, as well as Nicolás Antonio, Biblioteca, Verhulstius and the Bibliography of the Jesuits in Spanish-American literature, generally mention Acosta. Acuapendente, a diocese in Italy under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See, comprising seven towns of the Province of Rome. Acuapendente was under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Orvieto until 1649. That year, in consequence of a conspiracy of the people of Greccio led by Bishop Castro, the Bishop of Castro was assassinated. In punishment of this crime, Innocent X ordered Castro to be destroyed, and raised Acuapendente to the dignity of an episcopal city (Bull, 13 September, 1649). Its bishop, however, retains the appellation "papal Canton." The first inhabitants were found in the Herculaneum (il gerolosilomano) Pompeio Miguescu of Offida, who had been Archbishop of Ragusa. He took possession 10 January, 1650. This diocese contains 13 parishes; 80 churches, chapels, and oratories; 47 secular clergy; 35 seminarians; 15 regular priests; 49 religious (women); 50 confraternities. Population, 19,550.

Acquaviva, Claudio, fifth General of the Society of Jesus, b. October, 1543; d. 31 January, 1615. He was the son of Prince Giovanni Antonio Acquaviva, Duke of Atri, in the Abruzzi, and, at twenty-five, when high in favour at the papal court, where he was Chamberlain, renounced his brilliant worldly prospects for the Society. After being Provincial both of Naples and Rome, he was elected General of the Society, 19 February, 1681. He was the youngest who ever occupied that post. His election coincided with the first accusation of ambition ever made against a great official of the Order. Manareus had been named Vicar by Father Mercurian, and it was alleged that he aspired to the generalship. His warm defender was Acquaviva, but, to dispel the faintest suspicion, Manareus renounced his right to be elected. Acquaviva was chosen by a strong majority. His subsequent career justified the wisdom of the choice, which was very much doubted at the time he was elected. During his generalship the persecution in England, whither he had once asked to go as a missionary, was raging; the Huguenots in France were at their height; Christianity was being crushed in Japan; the Society was expelled from Venice, and was oppressed elsewhere; a schism within the Society was imminent; the Pope, the Inquisition, and Philip II were hostile. Acquaviva was denounced to the Pope, even by men like Toletus (q. v.), yet, such was his prudence, his skill, his courage, and his success, that he is regarded as the greatest administrator, after St. Ignatius, the Society ever had. Even those who were jealous of him admitted his merit, when, to satisfy them, the fifth and sixth Congregations ordered an investigation to be made of his method of government. The greatest difficulty he had to face was the schism organized in Spain by Vasques (q. v.). The King and Pope had been won over by the dissidents. Open demands of quasi-independence for Spain had been made in the Congregations of the Society. No Jesuit was allowed to leave Spain without royal permission. Episcopate visits of the houses had been asked for and granted. But finally, through the mediation of the English Jesuit, Robert Vansor (q. v.), who was highly esteemed by Philip II, Acquaviva was persuaded of the impolicy of the measure, while Acquaviva convinced the Pope that the schism would be disastrous for the Church. Deprived of these supports the rebellion collapsed. Simultaneously, the Inquisition was doing its best to destroy the Society. It listened to defamatory accusations, threw the Provincial of Castile into prison, demanded the surrender of the Constitutions for examination, until Acquaviva succeeded in inducing the Pope to call the case to his own tribunal, and revoke the powers which had been given to the Inquisition, or which it claimed. Finally, Philip II, who was always unfriendly to the Society, determined to change it completely. The Emperor Ferdinand implored him not to act; the College of Cardinals resisted; but the Pope was obstinate. The bull was prepared, and Acquaviva himself was compelled to send in a personal request to have even its name dissolved. He was then addressed by the sovereigns of the four parts of the world—a coincidence which gave rise to accusations against the Society. His successor, Gregory XIV, hastened to renew all the former privileges of the Order and to confirm its previous approbations.

During Acquaviva’s administration the protracted controversy on Grace (see Grace, Controversies on), between the Dominicans and the Jesuits, took place, and was carried on with some interruptions for nearly nine years, without either party drawing any decision from the Church, the contestants being ultimately ordered to discontinue the discussion. It was Acquaviva who ordered the scheme of Jesus and St. Ignatius the "Ratio Studiorum" (q. 6) to be drawn up, which, with some modifications, has been followed to the present day. Six of the most learned and experienced scholars of the Society were summoned to Rome, who laid out the entire plan of studies, beginning with theology, philosophy, and their ignate branches, and going down to the smallest details of grammar. When finished, it was sent to the different Provinces for suggestions, but was not imposed until 1592, and then with the proviso that the Society would determine what change was to be made, which was done in the General Congregation of 1593.

The period of his Generalship was the most notable in the history of the Society for the men it produced, and the work it accomplished. The names of Suarez, Toletus, Bellarmine, Maldonatus, Clavius, Lessius, Ripalda, Rici, Parsons, Southwell, Campion, Aloysius Gonzaga, and a host of others are identified with it. Theological missions to France, Russia, Poland, Constantinople, and Japan were entrusted to men like Possevin, and Bellarmine, and Vallignani; houses were multiplied all over the world with an astonishing rapidity; the colleges were educating some of the most brilliant statesmen, princes, and prelates; in the Far East, the Jesuits were organized; the heroic work of the missions of Canada was begun; South America was being traversed in all directions; China had been penetrated, and the Jesuits were the Emperor's official astronomers; martyrs in great numbers were sacrificing their lives in England, America, India, Japan, and elsewhere; and the great struggle organized by Canisius and Nadal to check the Reformation in Germany had been brought to a successful conclusion. The guiding spirit of all these great achievements, and many more besides, was Claudius Acquaviva. He died at the age of seventy-one, 31 January, 1615. Jouvenay says the longer he lived the more glorious the Society became; and Cordubius speaks of his election as an inspiration. Besides the "Ratio Studiorum," of which he is substantially the author, as it was under his initiative and supervision that the plan was conceived and carried out, we have also the "Directorium Exercitionis Spiritualis," the "Regula," the "Breviarium," the "Reges," the "Lexicens," the "Canons," the "Constitutiones," the "Acta," the "Archives," the "Lettres," the "Memorials," and many other documents and letters, relating chiefly to matters of government, are still extant.

Acqui, a diocese suffragan of Turin, Italy, which contains ninety-three towns in the Province of Alexandri, twenty-three in the Province of Genoa, and one in the Province of Cuneo. The first indubitable Bishop of Acqui is Dittarius. A tablet found in 1753 in the church of St. Peter, says that the bishop, died on the 28th of June, 488, in the Consulate of Dinamis and Syphidius. Popular tradition gives Deusdedit, Andreas Severus Maximus, and, earliest of all, Majorinus, as bishops prior to him. Calculating the time that these bishops, Roman certainly in name, governed this see, Majorinus probably lived either at the end of the fourth, or in the beginning of the fifth, century. It is very probable that the diocese of Acqui was erected at the end of the fourth century, about the same time, it would appear, as the dioceses of Novara, Turin, Ivrea, Aosta and perhaps, Asti and Alb. Presupposing the fact that the erection of dioceses in the provinces of the Roman Empire, after Constantine, was not done without previous consent between the Church and the emperors, it is safe to say that the most propitious time for such organization in Northern Italy was the seven years of the reign of Honorius (395-402), when a complete reorganization of the Provinces of Northern Italy and Southern Gaul was effected. Other arguments could be advanced to confirm the existence and episcopate of St. Majorinus. The name was very common in the third, fourth, and fifth centuries. St. Augustine (De Haer., I, 69) speaks of two bishops of this name; two others appear as signers of the Letters of the Synod of Carthage to Pope Innocent I (forest 401-417) against Pelagius. 161 St. August. Aug., II, 90, 91. Also, Eusebius in his "Hist. Eccl." says that in 392 the saint from time immemorial by the church in Acqui, shown by his statues and relics. This veneration, however, has ceased since a decree of the Congregation of Rites (8 April, 1628) prohibited the veneration of saints whose sanctity had not been confirmed by the Holy See. The diocese of Acqui, St. Guido (1034-70) is worthy of note. He was of the Counts of Acquasana under whose government the cathedral was erected, and is the patron saint of Acqui. The bishopric contains 122 parishes; 456 churches, chapels, and oratories; 317 convents, 1600 priests, 1,500 religious; 20 lay-brothers; 75 religious (women); 60 confraternities; 3 boys' schools (168 pupils); 4 girls' schools (231 pupils). Acro (Saint-Jean-d’Acre), in Heb. "Achz". Sept. "Achz", in the Books of Mach. Drenalus in Greek writers "Arx," in Latin writers "Arce," in Assyrian inscriptions Ak-ku-u, in modern Arabic "Acz". It is a Syrian seaport on the Mediterranean, in a plain with Mount Carmel on the south, and the mountains of Galilee on the east. Though choked with the waste of the heathen world, and the Syrian coast. The city was built by the Canaanites, and given to the tribe of Aser (Judges, i, 31), but not conquered (Jos. xix, 24-31). It is mentioned in Mich., i, 10. It was taken by Sennacherib the Assyrian (704-680 B.C.), passed into the power of Tyre, of the Seleucid kings of Syria, and the Romans. In the time of the Macedonians, the time to the sanctuary in Jerusalem by gift of Demetrius Soter (I Mach., x, 12, xii.). The Emperor Claudius granted Roman municipal rights to the town; hence it received the name "Colonial Claudii Cesaris." St. Paul visited its early Christian communities (Actus, xxiii. 25). Though Napoleon could not conquer it in 1799, it was taken by the Viceroy of Egypt in 1832, but reconquered by the Sultan in 1840. Till about 1400 it was the see of a Latin bishop; it has also been the residence of a few Jacobite bishops, and has now a Melchite bishop who is subject to the Patriarch of Antioch.

Colgan was an Irishman, of the Mac Colgan sept, in the county Derry, 1692. He entered the Irish House of Franciscans, at Louvain, in 1612, and was ordained a priest in 1618. Aided by de la Hulard, M., Father Stephen White, S.J., and Brother Michael O'Clery, O.F.M., Colgan sedulously collected enormous material for the Lives of the Irish Saints, and at length, after thirty years of sifting and digesting his materials, put to press his "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," a portion of the expense of which was defrayed by Archbishop O'Reilly of Armagh. The first volume, covering the lives of Irish saints for the months of January, February, and March, was intended to be the third volume of the "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Ireland," but only one volume was printed at Louvain in 1645. To students of Irish ecclesiastical history Colgan's noble volume is simply invaluable.

Acta Triadis Thaumaturge (The Acts of a Wonder-working Triad), or the lives of St. Patrick, St. Brigid, and St. Columba, was published in Dublin in 1647, by John Colgan, O.F.M. mainly at the expense of Thomas Fleming, Archbishop of Dublin. The full title runs as follows: "Triadis Thaumaturge, seu divorum Patricii, Columbe, et Brigidae, trium vetereis et majoris Scotiae, seu Hiberniae, Sanctorum insulae, communium patronorum acta, a variis, isque historicis acta, accedunt acta accuratae, ac studio R.P.F. Theologia Lectoris Jubilati, ex varia bibliothecis collecta, scholos et commentarioris illustrata, et pluribus apud philosophos habita commentariis tomos secundus sacrarum ejusdem insulae antiquitatum, nunc primum in lucem prodiens". Want of funds alone prevented the publication of all the priceless material which Colgan had transcribed and prepared for press, and from the catalogue of the manuscripts found in his cell after his death, it is evident that the great Irish historiographer had given a detailed account of the labours of Irish missionaries in England, Scotland, Belgium, Alsace, Lorraine, Burgundy, Germany, and Italy. A small remnant of these unpublished volumes is now in the Franciscan Library, Merchants' Quay, Dublin. In 1652 Colgan begged his superiors to relieve him of the duties of guardian and professor, and he died at St. Anthony's, Louvain, 15 January, 1658, aged 66.

Act of Settlement (Irish).—In 1662 an act was passed by the Irish Parliament, the privileges of which were restored on the return of Charles II., entitled "an act for the better execution of his majesty's gracious declaration for the Settlement of his Kingdom of Ireland, and the satisfaction of the several interests of adventurers, soldiers, and other his subjects there". To understand the provisions of this complicated Act, and the Act of Explanation of it (1664), it is necessary to recall that during the time of Cromwell English adventurers, as they were styled, advanced money for the war, and the soldiers engaged in it had large sums due to them for arrears of pay. To meet these demands, extort Papacy, and establish a Protestant interest in Ireland, almost all the land in Munster, Leinster, and Ulster was confiscated under the Cromwellian Settlement. The confiscations were arranged under different categories in such a way that scarcely any even Old Protestant, could escape. All persons who had taken part in the rebellion, before 10 November, 1642, or who had assisted the rebels in any way before that date, and also about 100 named persons, including Ormond, Bishop Bramhall, and a great part of the aristocracy of Ireland, were condemned to death, and their estates declared forfeit. All other landowners who had at any period borne arms against the Parliament, either for the rebels or for the King, were deprived of their estates, but were promised land of a third of the value in Connaught. Catholics who during the whole of the war had never borne arms against the Parliament, who had shown "constant good affection" towards it, were to be deprived of their estates, but were to receive two-thirds of their value in Connaught. Such a confiscation was practically universal (Lecky, I, 106). The Puritan made no distinction between the rebel and the royalist, and did not, of course, consider himself bound by the Articles of Peace (17 January, 1649). By these Charles I., through Ormond, had engaged that, with the exception of murderers etc., all Catholics who submitted to the articles should "be restored to their respective possessions and hereditaments", and that all treason etc., committed since the beginning of the rebellion, should be extinguished by an "Act of Oblivion" (Articles of Peace, 1649, § 4). And Charles II., in a letter from Jersey, dated 2 February, 1649-50, to Ormond, ratifies and confirms this Peace (Carte, III, 524-590, ed. 1851). Many of the Catholic proprietors had never taken arms against the King, and the rest who had done so, were allowed the same leniency as Puritans. In 1662 the English Legislature endeavored to extirpate the Catholic religion in Ireland, with few exceptions submitted under the Articles of Peace, and supported his cause to the end. All these had a clear title to restoration, but the adventurers and soldiers were in the actual possession of the lands, and were allowed the rents and profits of their elections, though they had no legal status, their titles resting on an act of Cromwell's London Parliament, and an entry and ouster of the old proprietors under it. The Catholics who were legally the true freeholders had, of course, no votes. When the new Parliament met, the Puritan adventurers and soldiers had an enormous majority, while the Catholics were almost unrepresented in the House of Commons (1662). The King had previously issued a Declaration, in November, 1660, which was made the basis of the Act of Settlement. The Irish Parliament, under Poyning's Act, could not entertain a Bill that had not previously been sanctioned by the Privy Council in England. He confirmed to the adventurers all the lands possessed by them on 7 May, 1659, allotted to them under the Cromwellian settlement. He did the same as regards the soldiers with a few exceptions. Protestants, however, whose estates had been given to adventurers, were to be at once restored, unless they had been in rebellion before the cessation (truce) of 1643, or had taken out orders for lands in Connaught or Clare, and the adventurers or soldiers displaced were to be repreised, i.e. get other lands instead. The Catholics were divided into "innocent" and "nocent". No one was to be considered "innocent" (1) who, before the cessation of 15 September, 1643, was of the rebels' party, or who enjoyed his estate in the rebels' quarters, except in Cork and Youghal, where the inhabitants were driven into them by force; or (2) who had entered into the Roman Catholic Confederacy before the Peace of 1648; or (3) who had at any time adhered to the nuncio's party; or (4) who had inherited his property from anyone who had been guilty of those crimes; or (5) who had sat in any of the confederate assemblies or councils, or acted on any commissions or powers derived from them. Those so established as "innocents", if they had taken lands in Connaught were to be restored to their estates by 2 May, 1661, but if they had sold their lands they were to indemnify the purchaser, and the adventurers and soldiers dispossessed were to be at once repressed.

The "nocent" Catholics who had been in the rebellion, but who had submitted and constantly adhered to the Peace of 1648, if they had taken lands in Connaught, were to be bound by that arrangement, and not restored to their former estates. If they had served under his Majesty abroad, and not taken lands in Connaught or Clare, they were to be restored after reparation made to the adventurers and soldiers. If all this was to be accomplished, "there must" said Ormond, "be new discoveries of a new Ireland, for the old will not serve to satisfy these engagements. It remains, then, to determine which party must suffer in the default of means to satisfy all. The result was not doubtful. The Protestant interest was resisted, and Charles II., moved to use force, if necessary, to defend their possessions. The Catholics were poor, broken, and friendless. "All the other competing interests in Ireland were united in their implacable malice to the Irish and in their desire that they might gain nothing by the King's return." The fate of the Protestants, the vast majority of whom were accessory, before or after the fact, to the execution of his father. He declared that he was for the establishment of an English interest in Ireland. All attempts to carry out his father's and his own engagements were abandoned. A commission was appointed consisting of thirty-six persons, all Protestants, and they proceeded to appoint from amongst their body a court of claims to hear cases and decide whether the titles of the Roman Catholics should be restored to their former estates. About 600 claims were heard, and in the great majority of cases the claimants proved "innocency." A loud outcry arose from the Puritan and Protestant interest. The matterings of an intended Insurrection were heard, and peace and prosperity in the Commonwealth knew no bounds. A formidable plot was discovered. A small outbreak took place (Lord E. Fitzmaurice, "Life of Petty," p. 131). A new Bill of Settlement, or, as it was called, of Explanation, was then approved in England, and brought in and passed in Ireland (1665). It provided that the adventurers and soldiers should give up one-third of their grants under the Cromwellian settlement, to be applied for the purpose of increasing the fund for reprints. Protestant adventurers and soldiers serving before 1649, and Protestant purchasers in Connaught or Clare before 1663, removable from restorable lands, were to have the lands restored, two-thirds equivalent in other lands. Protestant purchasers from transplanted persons in Connaught or Clare before 1 September, 1663, were confirmed in two-thirds of their purchase. Every clause in this and the preceding act was to be construed most liberally and beneficially for the protecting and settling the estates and persons of Protestants, whom the Act was principally intended to settle and secure (§ 73). The clause in the first act, empowering the King to restore innocent Catholics to their houses within Corporations, was repealed (§ 221). The Anglican Church regained its estates, including its large revenue of tithes, and its hierarchy was re-established in its former position. Finally (and this is the most important and iniquitous provision in the Act) it was declared "that no person who by the qualifications of the former Act hath not been adjudged innocent, shall at any time hereafter be regarded as innocent, so as to oblige the sovereign or his government," etc. This excluded the whole body of the 4,000 innocent claimants, except the 600 already disposed of "without a trial from the inheritance of their fathers, an act of the grossest and most cruel injustices (Lecky, I, 115). After these acts the Act was passed, and the Pope (as Pope, not as Gregory) complained to the King of "the injury against the people of Ireland," etc., but the Pope had no right to complain. After the conference Cardinal Acton, by request of the Pope, wrote out a minute account of it; but he never permitted it to be seen. The King of Naples urged him earnestly to become Archbishop of Naples, but he inexcusably refused. His charities were unbounded. He once wrote from Naples that he actually tasted the distress which he sought to solace. He may be said to have departed this life in all the wealth of a willing poverty.

Acton, CHARLES JANUARIUS, an English cardinal, b. at Naples, 6 March, 1803; d. at Naples, 23 June, 1847. He was the second son of Sir John Francis Acton, Bart. The family, a cadet branch of the Actons of Aldenham Hall, near Bridgnorth, in Shropshire, had settled in Naples some time before his birth. His father was engaged in the Neapolitan trade when he succeeded to the family estate and title through the death of his cousin, Sir Richard Acton, Bart. The Cardinal's education was English, as he and his elder brother were sent to England on their father's death in 1811, to a school near London kept by the Abbé Quéqué. They were then sent to Westminster School, with the understanding that their religion was not to be interfered with. Yet they not only were sent to this Protestant school, but they had a Protestant clergyman as tutor. In 1819 they went to Magdalen College, Cambridge, where they finished their education and were given strange schooling for a future cardinal, Charles went to Rome when he was twenty, and entered the Academia Ecclesiastica, where ecclesiastics intending to be candidates for public offices receive a special training. An essay of his attracted the attention of the Secretary of state, and placed him in the Congregation. At this time he was made Cardinal of the Papal States; he was also made a chamberlain and attached to the Paris Nunciature, where he had the best opportunity to become acquainted with diplomacy. Pius VIII re-called him and named him vice-legate, granting him choice of any of the four legations over which cardinals presided. He chose Bologna, as affording most opportunity for improvement. He left there at the close of Pius VIII's brief pontificate, and went to England, in 1829, to marry his sister to Sir Richard Throckmorton. Gregory XVI made him assistant judge in the Civil Court of Rome. In 1837 he was made Auditor to the Apostolic Chamber, the highest Roman dignity after that of a cardinal. At this time Acton was the first time it was even offered to a foreigner. Acton declined it, but was commanded to retain it. He was proclaimed Cardinal-Priest, with the title of Santa Maria della Pace, in 1842; having been created nearly three years previously. His strength, never very great, began to decline, and a severe attack of gout made him seek rest and recuperation, first at Palermo and then at Naples. But without avail, for he died in the latter city. His sterling worth was little known through his modesty and humility. In his youth his musical talent and genial wit supplied him much innocent gaiety, but the pressure of serious responsibilities and the adoption of a spiritual life somewhat subdued his exercise.

His judgment and legal ability were such that advocates of the first rank said that could they know his view of a case they could tell how it would be decided. When he communicated anything in writing to the Pope, he was so dexterous and precise that he always asked the Pope to read it more than once. He was selected as interpreter in the interview which the Pope had with the Czar of Russia. The Cardinal never said anything about this except that when he had interpreted the Pope's first sentence the Czar said: "It will be more feasible to me, if you would kindly interpret, also." After the conference Cardinal Acton, by request of the Pope, wrote out a minute account of it; but he never permitted it to be seen. The King of Naples urged him earnestly to become Archbishop of Naples, but he inexcusably refused. His charities were unbounded. He once wrote from Naples that he actually tasted the distress which he sought to solace. He may be said to have departed this life in all the wealth of a willing poverty.

Acton, JOHN, an English canonist, after 1329 canon of Lincoln; d. 1350. His name is spelled variously, Achedune, de Athona, Aton, Eaton; Maitland and Stubbs write Ayton. He was a pupil of John Stratford (afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury), and is declared by Maitland (p. 98) to be "one of the three four Emanonians" that after the earliest years of the thirteenth century wrote books that met with any success." He is best known as a glossator of the legatine "Constitutions" of Cardinals Otto and Ottobone, papal legates to England in the thirteenth century, and contemporary lawyers must have found his notes both full and learned, for many manuscript copies of them are said by Maitland to be still extant at Oxford. The first printed edition was that of Wynkyn de Worde, in his edition of William Lyndewode's "Provinciale" (1496) and partly translated in Johnson's "Collection of Ecclesiastical Laws" (London, 1720: cf. the English translation of Otho's "Ecclesiastical Laws", by J. W. White, 1844). The printed copies must be received with caution, for there remain at least two books that were not written until after the death of Acton. His canonical doctrine lends no support to the thesis of a medieval Anglican independence of the papal decretal legislation. "I have been unable," says Dr. F. W. Maitland in the work quoted below (p. 8), "to find any passage in which either John of Aytton or Lyndwood denies, disputes, or debates the binding force of any decretal!" (cf. ib., pp. 11-14). Of Acton the same writer says (pp. 7, 8) that he was "a little too human to be strictly scientific. His gloss often becomes a growl against the bad world in which he lives, the greedy prelates, the hypocritical friars, the rapacious officials."

Acton, John Emerich Edward Dalberg, Baron Acton, Professor of Modern History at Cambridge, 1856-1902, b. at Naples, 10 January, 1834, where his grandfather, Richard Acton, had held a diplomatic appointment; d. at Tegernsee, Bavaria, 19 June, 1902. His mother was the heiress of a distinguished Bavarian family, the Dalbergs. The Actons, though of an old English Catholic stock, had long been naturalized in Naples, where Lord Acton's grandfather had been prime minister. The future historian was thus in an extraordinary degree cosmopolitan, and much of his exceptional mastery of historical literature may be ascribed to the fact that the principal languages of Europe were as familiar to him as his native tongue. In 1843 the boy was sent to Oscott College, Birmingham, where Doctor, afterwards Cardinal, Nicholas Wiseman was then president. After five years spent at Oscott, Acton completed his education at Munich, as the pupil of the celebrated historian Dollinger. With Dollinger he visited France, and both there and in Germany lived on terms of intimacy with the most eminent historians, and in particular with the rambler Droysen. Returning to England, however, in 1859, to settle upon the family estate of Aldenham in Shropshire, he entered Parliament as member for an Irish constituency, and retained his seat for six years, voting with the Liberals, but taking little part in the debates. In the meantime he devoted himself to literary work, and upon Newman's retirement, in 1859, succeeded him in the editorship of a Catholic periodical called "The Rambler", which, after 1862, was transformed into a quarterly under the title of "The Home and Foreign Review". The ultra liberal tone of this journal gave offence to ecclesiastical authorities, and Acton was eventually judged it necessary to discontinue its publication, in April, 1864, when he wrote, concerning certain tenets of his which had been disapproved of, that "the principles had not ceased to be true, nor the authority which censured them to be legitimate, because the two were in contradiction." The public controversy on "Sylven's Acton" and "Pius IX's Acton" tended to alienate Acton still further from Ultra- montane counsels. He had in the meantime become very intimate with Mr. Gladstone, by whom he was recommended for a peerage in 1869, and at the time of the Vatican Council Lord Acton went to Rome with the object of opposing resistance to the proposed definition of papal infallibility. The decree, when it came, seems to have had the effect of permanently embittering Acton's feelings towards Roman authority, but he did not, like his friend Dollinger, formally sever his connection with the Church. Indeed in his later years at Cambridge he regularly attended Mass, and he received the last sacraments, at Tegernsee, on his death-bed. The Cambridge Professorship of Modern History was offered to him by Lord Rosebery in 1895, and, besides the lectures which he delivered there, he conceived and partly organised the "Cambridge Modern History", the first volume of which was only to see the light after his death. Lord Acton never produced anything which deserves to be called a book, but he wrote a good many reviews and occasionally an article or a lecture. As an historian he was probably more remarkable for knowledge of detail than for judgment or intuition. The "Letters of Quirinus," published in the "Allgemeine Zeitung" at the time of the Vatican Council, and attributed to Lord Acton, as well as other letters addressed to the "Times", in November, 1874, show a mind much warped against the Roman system. The "Letters to Mrs. Drew" (Mr. Gladstone's daughter), which were printed by Mr. Herbert Paul in 1903, are brilliant but often bitter. A pleasant impression is given by another collection of Lord Acton's private letters (published 1906) under the editorship of Abbot Gasquet. Some of Acton's best work was contributed to the English Historical Review". His articles on "Germans Schools of History", in the first volume, and on "Doctrines of Historical Work", in the fifth, deserve particular mention.

An excellent bibliography of Lord Acton's literary work has been compiled for the Royal Historical Society by Dr. W. A. Shaw (London, 1903). For biographical details see GASQUET, Lord Acton and his Circle, and HERBERT PAUL'S Memoir just mentioned; also Eng. Hist. Rev., Oct., 1902, and Edinburgh Rev., Oct., 1903. The rashness of Lord Acton's historical verdicts has been discussed by the present writer in the London Tablet, 15 July, 1902. A collective edition of Acton's lectures and articles is in preparation.

Acton, John Francis Edward, sixth Baronet of the name, son of a Shropshire physician, b. at Besançon, 3 June, 1736; d. at Palermo, 12 August, 1811. He entered the military service of the Duke of Tuscany, and distinguished himself in the Algerian War in 1775, when he rescued 4,000 Spaniards from the Corsairs. Since 1779 he was engaged in the reorganization of the Neapolitan navy. He became a favourite of Queen Caroline and was made successively minister of the marine, of finance, and prime minister of the kingdom to which he rendered notable services. When the Parthenopean Republic was established by the French at Naples in 1798, Acton fled. After the restoration of the Bourbons he was temporarily reinstated, but was removed in 1806, and retired to Palermo.

Acts, Canonical.—According to the old Roman jurisprudence, acts are the registers (acta) in which were recorded the official documents, the decisions and sentences of the judges. Acts designate in law whatever serves to prove or justify a thing. Records, decrees, reports, certificates, etc. are called acts. Canonical acts are their own acts in connection with ecclesiastical procedure. Acts may be public or private, civil or ecclesiastical.

Public acts are those certified by a public notary or other person holding a public office or position. These acts may be judicial, or a part of court procedure, or non-judicial, to ensure justice, the acts should be judicial; extra-judicial acts are not contentious but voluntary.
Both civil and canon law recognize as public acts those that occur before witnesses; if these acknowledge them before the court, otherwise they are private. Public acts include any action taken by the judge, the authorities he may quote, the proceedings in the court, documents drawn from the public archives. An original document of a community, bishop, or public officer, with the official stamp or copy of it, sent by these persons with due authentication, is a public act. Public acts are determinative against anyone, though at times they may not impose personal obligation on those not participating in them. In old public acts, the presumption is in favour of their being rightly done; to upset their validity, proof is produced that they were not executed with due formalities. Ecclesiastically, an exception is made for alienation of Church property, where, for the validity of a deed, a further requisite may be exacted, such as a clear proof of the authorization of a bishop, or the consent of the chapter. For these presumptions does not suffice.

Private acts are those of one or more individuals; they tell against those who executed them, not against absent parties not participating in them. While public acts have force from the day of their date, private acts whose deed is not authenticated have force only from the day of their public registry. When authenticated, fraud alone can upset them. If the authenticating official overstepped his competence, the act would only be a private act, but yet of private value, unless the law requires for its validity the authentication of an official. Thus, a deed transferring real estate, even signed by the parties, becomes valid for public purposes when authenticated by the official designated by law, though the private agreement may be a basis for redress.

It is not easy to draw precise limits between civil and ecclesiastical acts. While civil acts are mainly of the laity, about secular things, and ecclesiastical acts mainly of ecclesiastics, in connection with spiritual things, yet both easily overlap each other. Acts are civil or ecclesiastical by their relations with the State or the Church, by their emanation from either of them, or being solicited by the one or the other, or by affecting the dealings of persons with each other. The same individuals are subject to both authorities. Thus ecclesiastics do not cease to be citizens, and all Christian citizens are subject to the authority of the Church as well as of the State. Many things, even linked with spiritual affairs, do not lose their natural character of temporalities. Many acts passing between ecclesiastics are purely civil. An ecclesiastic, though a minister of the Church, is also a citizen; his actions as a citizen are purely civil; those emanating from him as a clergyman are ecclesiastical. If the acts are such as could be properly performed by a layman, they would belong to the civil order; if their performance required the clerical state, they are ecclesiastical. Yet a layman's spiritual duties and exercises are ecclesiastical, coming under the authority of the Church; an ecclesiastical's money matters come under the authority of the State as far as those of other citizens. This is the basis of the distinction between the civil and ecclesiastical forum. The Church by divine right has inalienable control of strictly spiritual things; the State of strictly temporal things. By the goodwill of peoples and governments the Church obtained many privileges for its forum, respecting the ecclesiastical, and the laity in matters connected with spiritual things. In other matters assigned to her by Divine Law she cannot yield her authority, though for peace' sake she may tolerate aggressions upon it. She may yield (and in concordat and in other ways does yield) those privileges which had for centuries been a part of her forum.

Acts also designate certain general formalities for the validity of documents, often called requisites, such as the date, the signature, the qualifications of persons, the accurate names of witnesses, and other similar conditions which may be demanded by law or ecclesiastic law or by a copy of a country. Acts of a council are the definitions of faith, decrees, canons, and official declarations of the council, whose sphere of action is more or less extended according as it is ecumenical, national, provincial, etc.—Acts of the Martyrs are the documents, narrations, and testimonies of the arrest, torture, and Martyrdom; acts of the Synods of the Christians who sealed their faith by the shedding of their blood in the times of persecution. The documents of the Congregation of Rites connected with the beatification and canonization of saints are designated as Acts of the Saints. This is also the title given by the Bollandists to their monumental account of the lives of the saints (Acts Sanctorum). Acts-Capitular are the official discussions of the assembled members of the chapter, the name given to the canons of the cathedral who form a corporation established to aid the bishop in the government of the diocese, and to supply his place when the see is vacant.

Acts, Human.—Acts are termed human when they are proper to man as man; when, on the contrary, they are elicted by man, but not proper to him as a rational agent, they are called acts of man.

Nature.—St. Thomas and the scholastics in general regard only the free and deliberate acts of the will as human. Their view is grounded on psychological analysis. A free act is voluntary, that is, it proceeds from the will with the apprehension of the end sought, or, in other words, is put forth by the will. This act is presented to the will by the understanding. Free acts, moreover, proceed from the will's own determination, without necessity, intrinsic or extrinsic. For they are those acts which the will can elicit or abstain from eliciting, even though all the requisites of volition are present. They, consequently, are acts to which the will is determinative neither by its own natural dispositions and habits, but to which it determines itself. The will alone is capable of self-determination or freedom; the other faculties, as the understanding, the senses, the power of motion, are not free; but some of their acts are controlled by the will and so far share its freedom indirectly. The active indeterminateness of the will, its mastery over its own actions, is consequent upon the deliberation of reason. For the intellect discerns in a given object both perfection and imperfection, both good and evil, and therefore presents it to the will as desirable in one respect and undesirable in another. When a will is proposed, the will, on account of its unlimited scope, may love or hate, embrace or reject it. The resultant state of the will is indifference, in which it has the power to determine itself to either alternative. Hence, whenever there is deliberation in the understanding, there is freedom in the will, and the consequent act is free; vice versa, whenever an act proceeds from the will without deliberation, it is not free, but necessary. Wherefore, as deliberate and free actions, so indeliberate and necessary actions are identical. The free act of the will thus analyzed is... evidently the act proper to man as a rational agent. For it is man who is its determining cause; whereas his necessary actions are unavoidably determined by his nature and the state of the former, while the latter are not under his dominion and cannot be withheld by him. These, therefore, are properly styled acts of man, because elicited, but not determined, by him. The human act admits of increment and decrement. Its voluntariness can be diminished or increased. Ignorance, as it renders a man incapable of knowing what is unknown cannot be willed; passions intensify the inclination of the will, and thus increase voluntariness, but lessen deliberation and consequently also freedom.

Properties.—Human acts are imputable to man so as to involve his responsibility, for the very reason that he puts them forth deliberatively and with self-determination. They are, moreover, not subject to physical laws which necessitate the agent, but to a law which lays the will under obligation without interfering with his freedom of choice. Besides, they are moral. For a moral act is one that is freely elicited, with the knowledge of its conformity or disconformity to the law of God, and comes with an obligation to conform or to conform to the duties of the will.

Nous, according to the law of action, they are worthy of praise or blame, so man, who elicits them, is regarded as virtuous or wicked, innocent or guilty, deserving of reward or punishment. Upon the freedom of the human act, therefore, rests imputability and moral responsibility, man's moral character, his ability to pursue his ultimate and not of necessity and compulsion, but of his own will and choice; in a word, his entire dignity and pre-eminence in this visible universe.

Recent Views.—Recent philosophic speculation discards free will conceived as capability of self-determination. The main reason advanced against it is its apparent incompatibility with the law of causation. Instead of indeterminism, determinism is now most widely accepted. According to the latter, every act of the will is of necessity determined by the character of the agent and the motives which render the action desirable. Character, consisting of individual dispositions and habits, is either inherent freedom, acquired by the anticipation of the action; or arise from the pleasurable or unpleasurable action and its object, or from the external environment. Many determinists drop freedom, imputability, and responsibility, as inconsistent with their theory. To them, therefore, the human act cannot be anything else than the voluntary act. But there are other determinists who still admit the freedom of will. In their opinion a free act is that which "flows from the universe of the character of the agent." And as "character is the constitution of the whole," they define freedom as "the control proceeding from the self." The act, not determined as a whole. We find freedom thus defined as a state in which man wills only in conformity with his true, unchanged, and untrammeled personality. In like manner Kant, though in his "Critique of Pure Reason" he advocates determinism, nevertheless in his "Fundamental Metaphysics of Maxims" states that the freedom of the will is independent of external causes. Freedom, the will, maintains, is a causality proper to rational beings, and freedom is its endowment enabling it to act without being determined from without, just as natural necessity is the need proper to irrational creatures of being determined to action by external influence. He says, however, in explanation, that the will must act according to unchangeable laws, as else it would be an absurdity. Free acts thus characterized are termed human by these determinists, because they proceed from man's reason and personality. But purely they are not human in the scholastic acceptance, nor in the full and proper sense. They are such, because they are not under the dominion of man. True freedom, which makes man master of his actions, must be conceived as immunity from all necessitation to act. So it was understood by the scholastics. They defined it as immunity from both extrinsic and intrinsic necessity. Determinists accordingly to them it involves immunity from extrinsic, but not from intrinsic, necessitation. Human acts, therefore, as also imputability and responsibility, are not the same thing in the old and in the new schools.

So it comes to pass, that, while nowadays in ethics and law the very same scientific terms are employed as in former ages, they no longer have the same meaning as in the past nor the same in Catholic as in non-Catholic literature.

Acts, Indifferent.—A human act may be considered in the abstract (in specie) or in the concrete (in individuo). Taken in the former sense it is clear the character of a human act will be that of the object only, and as this may be of a kind that is neither conformable to a moral norm nor contrary to it, we may have an act that can be said to be neither good nor bad, but indifferent. But can this character of indifference be predicated of the act we are discussing, considered not as an abstraction of the mind, but in the concrete, as it is exercised by the individual in particular circumstances, and for a certain end? To this question St. Bonaventure (in 2, dist. 41, a. 1, q. 3, where, however, it will be observed, the Seraphic Doctor speaks directly of merit only) answers in the affirmative, and with him Scotus (in 2, dist. 40—41, et quand. 18), and all the Scotist school. So also Sporer (Theol. Moral., I, III, § v); Elbel (Theol. Moral., tom. i, n. 80); Vasques (in 1—2, disp. 52); Arriaga (De Act. Hum., disp. 21); and in our own day Archbishop Walah (De Act. Hum., n. 885 sq.). St. Thomas (in 2, dist. 40, a. 5; De Malo, q. 4, a. 4 et 5; I—2, q. 15, a. 9, and his commentators) in his opposition to the above, too, Summa Theol. (De Bon. et Mal., disp. ix); Billuart (disp. IV, a. 5 et 6); St. Alphonsus (L. 2, n. XLIIV); Bouquillon (Theol. Moral. Fund., n. 371); Lehmkohl (Theol. Moral., L, I, tract. I, III); and Nolden (Sum. Theol. Moral., I, 85 sq.).

It must be noted that the Thomists, no less than the Scotists, recognize as morally indifferent acts done without deliberation, such, for instance, as the stroking of one's beard or the rubbing of one's hands together, as these ordinarily take place. Admittedly indifferent, too, will those acts be in which there is but a physical deliberation, as it is called, such as is real for white, was, for instance, to have thought or write, without any thought of the moral order. The question here is of those acts only that are performed with aversion to a moral rule. Again, most of the Thomists will allow that an act would be indifferent in the case where an agent would judge it to be neither good nor bad after he has formed his will, considered the act, the ends of Scotists, to which, it must be conceded, a solid probability is attached. Finally, it must be remarked that no controversy is raised regarding the indifferency of acts with reference to supernatural merit. The doctrine that all the works of infants are evil has been formally condemned. Yet clearly, while the deeds of the wills such grace may be morally good, and thus in the supernatural order escape all
Both the Thomists and Scotists will declare that, to be morally good, an act must be in conformity with the exigencies and dignity of our rational nature. But what is to be understood as conformable to the exigencies and dignity of our rational nature? According to the Scotists, the deliberate act of a rational being, to be morally good, must be referred to a positively good end. Hence those acts in which the agent advertes to no end, and which have for their object nor contrary to the natural end of human nature, nor yet contrary to it, such as eating, drinking, taking recreation, and the like, cannot be accounted morally good. Since, however, these discover no deviation from the moral norm, they cannot be characterized as evil, and so therefore, it is said, must be considered as indifferent. According to the opinion of St. Thomas, which is the more common one among theologians, it is not necessary, in order to be morally good, that an act should be referred to a positively good end. It is enough that the end is seen to be not evil, and that in the performance of the act the bounds set by right reason are not transgressed. On the matter of eating, drinking, taking recreation, and the like, in the abstract, they are neither conformable nor contrary to our rational nature, in the concrete, by reason of the circumstance of their being done in the manner and the measure prescribed by reason, become fully in accord with the rational norm, and hence morally good. It will be observed from the foregoing that the Thomists hold as morally good the acts which the Scotists maintain to be only morally indifferent. According to a third class of theologians, a deliberate act which is not referred to a positively good end must be reputed as morally evil. Hence, if we stand here in accord with the doctrine of St. Thomas, and as indifferent to the mind of Scotus, must, according to these theologians, be deemed nothing else than bad. Wrongly styled Thomists, the advocates of this opinion are one with the Angelic Doctor only in declaring that there are no indifferent deliberate acts. They differ from him radically in their unwarrantable rigour, and their teaching is condemned by the sense and practice of even the most delicately conscientious persons.

Acts of the Apostles.—Name.—In the accepted order of the books of the New Testament the fifth book is called The Acts of the Apostles (Gr. Ἀποστόλων). Some have thought that the title of the book was affixed by the author himself. This is the opinion of Cornely in his "Introduction to the Books of the New Testament" (second edition, page 315). It seems far more probable, however, that the name was subsequently attached to the book, just as the headings of the several Gospels were affixed by the editors of the works. In fact, the Apostles, does not precisely convey the idea of the contents of the book; and such a title would scarcely be given to the work by the author himself.

Content.—The book does not contain the Acts of all the Apostles, neither does it contain all the acts of the Apostles. It contains, with a brief outline of the forty days succeeding the Resurrection of Christ, during which He appeared to the Apostles, "speaking the things concerning the Kingdom of God". The promise of the Holy Ghost and the Ascension of Christ are then briefly recorded. St. Peter advises that a successor be chosen in the place of Judas Iscariot. Matthias is chosen by lot. On the Ascension the Holy Ghost descends on the Apostles, and confers on them the gift of tongues. To the wondering witnesses St. Peter explains the great miracle, proving that it is the power of Jesus Christ that is operating. By that great discourse many were converted to the religion of Christ and were baptized, and a day was set apart by them in that day about three thousand souls. This was the beginning of the Judeo-Christian Church. "And the Lord added to them day by day those that were being saved." Peter and John heal a man, lame from his mother's womb, at the door of the Temple which is called Beautiful. The pretended wonder was treated with wonder and amazement at the miracle and run together unto Peter and John in the porch that was called Solomon's. Peter again preaches Jesus Christ, asserting that by faith in the name of Jesus the lame man had been made strong. "And many of them that heard the word believed", and the number of the men came to be about five thousand. But now "the priests, and the prefect of the Temple and the Sadducees came upon them, being sorely troubled because they taught the people, and proclaimed in Jesus the resurrection from the dead. And they laid hands on them, and put them in prison unto the morrow." On the morrow they were summoned before rulers, elders, and scribes, among whom were present Annas, the High-Priest, Caiaphas, and as many as were of the kindred of the High-Priest. And when they had set Peter and John in the midst they inquired: 'By what power, or in what name have ye done this?' Then Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost, answering gave utterance one of the most sublime professions of the Christian faith ever made by man: "Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, in this name doth this man stand here before you whole. He [Jesus] is the stone which was set at naught by you the builders, which was made the head of the corner (Isaias, xxviii, 16; Matt., xxxi, 42). And in no other is there salvation: For neither is there any other name under Heaven, that is given among men, wherein we must be saved." The members of the council were brought face to face with the most positive evidence of the truth of the Christian religion. They command the two Apostles to go aside out of the council, and then they confer among themselves, saying: "What shall we do with these men? For that indeed notable miracle hath been wrought, which we cannot deny it". Here is one of the splendid instances of that great cumulus of evidence upon which the certitude of the Christian Faith rests. A bitterly hostile council of the chief Jews of Jerusalem is obliged to declare that a notable miracle had been wrought, which it cannot deny, and which is manifest to all that dwell in Jerusalem.

With dreadfull daceful the council attempts to stran for the great movement of Christianity. They threaten the Apostles, and charge them not to speak at all or teach in the name of Jesus; Peter and John dismiss the charge upon the name, real or pretended, the council judge whether it be right to hearken unto the council rather than unto God. The members of the council could not inflict punishment upon the two Apostles, on account of the people, who glorified God on account of the great miracle. Peter and John, being freed from custody, return to the other Apostles. They all give glory to God and show unto God how to speak the word of God. After the prayer the place shakes, and they are filled with the Holy Ghost.

The fervour of the Christians at that epoch was very great. They were of one heart and soul; they had all things in common. As many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them and delivered the price to the Apostles, and this money was distributed as anyone had needed. But a certain Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession and kept back part of the price, the wife being accessory to the deed. St. Peter is inspired by the Holy Ghost to know the deception, and rebukes Ananias at once to the Holy Ghost. At the rebuke the man falls dead. Sapphira, coming up afterwards, and knowing nothing of the death of her husband, is interrogated by St. Peter regarding the transaction. She also keeps back a part of the price, and lyingly asserts that the full price has been brought to the Apostles. St. Peter rebukes her, and also Sapphira in her words. The multitude saw in the death of Ananias and Sapphira God's punishment, and great fear came upon all. This miracle of God's punishment of sin also confirmed the faith of those that believed, and drew disciples to them. At this stage of the life of the Church miracles were necessary to attest the truth of her teaching, and the power of miracles was abundantly bestowed upon the Apostles. These miracles are not reviewed in detail in Acts, but it is stated: "And by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people" (Acts, v. 12). Multitudes both of men and women were added to the Church, and the people of Jerusalem carried out the sick and laid them on beds and couches in the streets that the shadow of St. Peter might fall on them. They brought the sick from the cities round about Jerusalem, and every one was healed.

The sect of the Sadducees was among the Jews at this epoch were the Sadducees. They were especially opposed to the Christian religion on account of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. The cardinal truth of the Apostles' teaching was: Life Everlasting through Jesus, Who was crucified for our sins, and Who is risen from the dead. The High-Priest Ananias was opposed to the Sadducees, and his son Ananias, who afterwards became High-Priest, was a Sadducee (Josephus, Antiq., XX, viii). These sects were made with Annas and Caiaphas common cause against the Apostles of Christ, and cast them again into prison. The Acts leaves us in no doubt as to the motive that inspired the High-Priest and the sectaries: "They were filled with jealousy".

The religious leaders of the Old Law saw their influence with the people waning before the power which worked in the Apostles of Christ. An angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought the Apostles out, and bade them go and preach in the Temple. The council of the Jews, not Peter and John in the prison, and learning of their miraculous deliverance, are much perplexed. On information that they are teaching in the Temple, they send and take them, but without violence, fearing the people. It is evident throughout that the common people are disposed to follow the Apostles; the opposition comes from the priests and the classes, most of the latter being Sadducees. The council accuses the Apostles that, contrary to its former injunction not to teach in Christ's name, they had filled Jerusalem with Christ's teaching. Peter asserts that they filled them with God's grace more than men. He then boldly reiterates the doctrine of the Redemption and of the Resurrection. The council is minded to kill the Apostles. At this point Gamaliel, a Pharisee, a doctor of the Jewish law, held in honour of all the people, arises in the council in defence of the Apostles. He cites precedents that if the things are done by God, it will be overthrown; and if it be of God, it will be impossible to overthrow it. Gamaliel's counsel prevails, and the council calls the Apostles, beats them, and lets them go, charging them not to speak in the name of Jesus. But the Apostles depart, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer dishonour for the name. And every day, in the Temple and privately, they ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus the Christ.

A murmuring having arisen of the Grecian Jews, that their widows were neglected in the daily ministration of the Grecian Jews, then they should forsake the word of God and serve tables, appoint seven deacons to minister. Chief among the deacons was Stephen, a man full of the Holy Spirit. He wrought great signs and wonders among the people. The anti-Christian Jews endeavour to resist him, but are not able to withstand the wisdom and the spirit by which he is moved. They bring false witnesses to testify that he has spoken against Moses and the Temple. Stephen is seized and brought into the council. False witnesses testify that they have heard Stephen say that "this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered to us". All who sat in the council saw Stephen's face, as it had been the face of an angel. He makes a defence, in which he reviews the chief events in the first covenant, and its relation to the New Law. They rush upon Stephen, drag him out of the city, and stone him to death. And he kneels down and prays: "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge!" The Grecian Jews of Jerusalem, being at Jerusalem, and on the way converts and he2ceeseed of Candace, Queen of Ethiopia. Philip is thence transported by Divine power to Azotus, and preaches to all the coast cities until he comes to Cesarea.

Saul, breathing threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, sets out for Damascus to apprehend any Christians whom he may find there. As he draws near to Damascus, the Lord Jesus speaks to him out of the heavens and converts him. St. Paul is baptized by Ananias at Damascus, and straightway for some days abides there, preaching in the synagogues that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. He withdraws to Arabia, again to Damascus; and after three years he goes up to Jerusalem. At Jerusalem Paul is at first distrusted by the disciples of Jesus; but after Barnabas narrates to them Paul's marvellous conversion, they receive Paul, and he preaches boldly in the name of Jesus, disputing especially against the Grecian Jews. They plot to kill him; but the Christians bring Paul down to Cesarea, and send him forth to Tarsus, his native city.

At this epoch Acts describes the Church in Judea, Samaria, and Galilee as "at peace, being built up, and walking in the fear of the Lord, and by the strength of the Holy Ghost it was multiplied". Peter now goes throughout all parts comforting the faithful. At Lydda he heals the palsied Eneas; and at Joppa he raises the pious widow Tabitha (Greek, Dorea) from the dead. These miracles still more confirm the faith in Jesus Christ. At Joppa Peter has the great vision of the sheet let down from Heaven containing all flesh, and says to Peter: "Seeketh he to eat;" he, being in a trance, is commanded to kill and eat. Peter refuses, on the ground that he cannot eat that which is common and unclean. Whereupon it is made known to him from God, that God has cleansed what was before to the Jew unclean. This great vision, repeated three times, was the manifestation of the will of Heaven that the ritual law of the Jews... should cease; and that henceforth salvation should be offered without distinction to Jew and Gentile. The meaning of the vision is unfolded to Peter, when he is commanded by an angel to go to Cæsarea, to the Gentile centurion Cornelius, whose messengers were even then come to fetch him. He goes, and heheal Cornelius also the centurion’s own vision. He preaches to him and to all assembled; the Holy Ghost descends upon them, and Peter commands that they be baptized. Returning to Jerusalem, the Jews contend with Peter that he has gone in to men uncircumcised, and eaten with them. He expounds to them his vision at Joppa, and also his vision to Cornelius, wherein the Gentiles were commanded by an angel to send and fetch Peter from Joppa, that he might receive from Peter the Gospel. The Jews acquiesce, glorifying God, and declaring that “unto the Gentiles also hath God granted repentance unto life”.

Those who had been scattered abroad from Jerusalem at the time of Stephen’s martyrdom had travelled as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching Christ; but they preached to none save the Jews. The calling of the Gentiles was not yet understood by them. But now some converts from Cyprus and Cyrene come up to Antioch, and preach there to the Gentiles. At Antioch is first the word preached by Barnabas, a “good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith” to them. He takes Paul from Tarsus, and they both dwell at Antioch a whole year, and teach many people. The disciples of Christ are called Christians first at Antioch.

The rest of Acts narrates the persecution of the Christians by Herod Agrippa; the mission of Paul and Barnabas from Antioch by the Holy Ghost, to preach to the Gentile nations; the labours of Paul and Barnabas in Cyprus and in Asia Minor, their return to Antioch; the disaffection of the members of the Church concerning circumcision; the journey of Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem, the decision of the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem, the separation of Paul from Barnabas, in whose stead he takes Silas, or Silvanus; Paul’s visit to his Asiatic Churches, his foundation of the Church at Philippi; Paul’s sufferings for Jesus Christ; Paul’s visit to Athens, his foundation of the churches of Corinth and of Ephesus; Paul’s return to Jerusalem, his persecution by the Jews; Paul’s imprisonment at Cæsarea; Paul’s appeal to Cæsar, his voyage to Rome; the shipwreck; Paul’s arrival at Rome, and the manner of his life there. We see how clearly a more perfected form of the Christian religion, which we shall call “The Beginnings of the Christian Religion”. It is an artistic whole, the fullest history which we possess of the manner in which the Church developed.

The Origin of the Church.—In Acts we see the fulfilment of Christ’s promises. In Acts, 1: 8, Jesus had declared that the Apostles should receive power when the Holy Ghost should come upon them, and should be His witnesses both in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. In John, xiv, 12, Jesus had declared: “He that believeth in me, the works that I do shall he do. Because I go to the Father”. In these passages is found the key-note of the origin of the Church. The Church developed according to the plan conceived by Christ. There is, assuredly, in the narration evidence of the working out of a great plan; for the passage that the writer records, the working out of the great design of Christ, conceived in infinite wisdom, and executed by omnipotent power. There is throughout a well-defined, systematic order of narration, an exactness and fullness of detail. After the calling of the first twelve Apostles, there is no event in the history of the Church so important as Paul’s conversion and commission to teach in Christ’s name.

Up to Paul’s conversion, the inspired historian of the Acts has given us a condensed statement of the growth of the Church among the Jews. Peter and John are prominent in the work. But the great change is now also the Church’s own vision. Peter preaches to a Gentile, and the Gentile is converted; all flesh is to see the salvation of God; and St. Paul is to be the great instrument in preaching Christ to the Gentiles. In the development of the Christian Church Paul wrought more than all the other Apostles; and therefore in Acts St. Paul stands forth as the prominent agent of the great work of the Church through the world. His appointment as the Apostle of the Gentiles does not prevent him from preaching to the Jews; but his richest fruits are gathered from the Gentiles. He fills procuratorial Asia, Macedonia, Greece, and Rome with the Gospel of Christ; and the greater part of Acts is devoted exclusively to recording his work.

Division of Book.—In the Acts there are no divisions of the narration contemplated by the author. It is open to us to divide the work as we deem fit. The nature of the history therein recorded easily suggests a greater division of Acts into two equal parts. 1. The beginnings of the Christian religion among the Jews (i—ix); 2. The beginning and propagation of the Christian religion among the Gentiles (x—xxviii). St. Peter plays the chief rôle in the first part; St. Paul, in the second part.

Context.—The Acts of the Apostles must not be believed to be an isolated writing, but rather an integral part in a well-ordered series. Acts presupposes its readers to know the Gospels; it continues the Gospel narrative. The Four Evangelists close with the account of the Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus Christ. St. Mark is the only one who essays to give any of the subsequent history, and he condenses his account into one brief sentence: “And they went forth and preached everywhere: the Lord working with them, and confirming the word by the signs that followed” (Mark, xvi, 20). Now the Acts of the Apostles takes up the narrative here and records succinctly the mighty events which were wrought by the Holy Ghost through chosen instrument agents. It is a condensed record of the fulfilment of the promises of Jesus Christ. The Evangelists record Christ’s promises which He made to the disciples, regarding the establishment of the Church and its mission (Matt., xvi, 15—20); the gift of the Holy Ghost (Luke, x, 41); the title of the man whom God shall call the Gentiles (Acts, xv, 20—22); the calling of the Gentiles (Matt., xxviii, 18—20; Luke, xxiv, 46, 47). Acts records the fulfilment. The history begins at Jerusalem and ends at Rome. With divine simplicity Acts shows us the growth of the religion of Christ among the nations. The message of Jew and Gentile is abolished by the revelation to St. Peter; Paul is called to devote himself specially to the Gentile ministry; the Holy Ghost works signs in confirmation of the doctrine of Christ; men suffer and die, but the Church grows; and thus the whole world sees the Salvation of God. Nowhere in Holy Writ is the action of the Holy Ghost in the Church so forcibly set forth as in the Acts. He fills the Apostles with knowledge and power on Pentecost; they speak as the Holy Ghost gave them to speak; the Holy Ghost bids Philip the deacon go to the eunuch of Candace; the same Spirit catches up Philip, after the baptism of the eunuch, and brings him to Aenon; the Holy Ghost tells Peter to go to Cornelius; when Peter preaches to Cornelius and his family the Holy Ghost falls on them all; the Holy Ghost directly commands that Paul and Barnabas be set apart for the Gentile ministry; the Holy Ghost forbids Paul and Silas to preach in Asia; constantly, by the laying on of the Apostles' hands, the Holy Ghost comes upon the faithful; Paul is directed by the Holy Ghost in everything; the Holy Ghost foretells to him that bonds and afflictions await him in every city; when Agabus prophesies Paul's martyrdom, he says: "Thus saith the Holy Ghost: 'So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind thee, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles'". Acts declares that on the Gentiles the grace of the Holy Ghost is poured out; in the splendid description of St. Stephen's martyrdom he is declared full of the Holy Ghost; when Peter makes his defence before rulers, elders, and scribes, he is filled with the Holy Ghost; when the apostles parted from the Holy Ghost; Philip is chosen as a deacon because he is full of faith and the Holy Ghost; when Ananias is sent to Paul at Damascus he declares that he is sent that Paul may receive his sight and be filled with the Holy Ghost; Jesus Christ is declared to be anointed with the Holy Ghost; Barnabas is declared to be full of the Holy Ghost; the men of Samaria receive the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the hands of Peter and John. This history shows the real nature of the Christian religion; its members are baptized in the Holy Ghost, and are upheld by His power. In the Acts, in the Apostles and in the Epistles, the Holy Spirit is in teaching, of grace, and of the power that resists the gates of Hell is the Holy Ghost. By the power of the Holy Spirit the Apostles established the Church in the great centres of the world: Jerusalem, Antioch, Cyprus, Antioch of Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus, and Rome. From these centres the message went to the surrounding lands. We see in the Acts the realization of Christ's promises just before His Ascension: "But ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." In the New Testament Acts forms a necessary connecting link between the Gospels and the Epistles of St. Paul. It gives the necessary information concerning the conversion of St. Paul and his apostolate, and also concerning the formation of the great Churches to which St. Paul wrote his Epistles.

AUTHENTICITY—The authenticity of the Acts of the Apostles is proved by intrinsic evidence; it is attested by the concordant voice of tradition. The unity of style of Acts and its artistic completeness compel us to receive the book as the work of one author. Such an effect could never arise from the piecemeal compilation of writings from many hands. The writer writes as an eyewitness and companion of Paul. The passages xvi, 10–17; xx, 5–15; xxi, 1–18; xxvii, 1; xxviii, 16 are called the We passages. In these the writer uniformly employs the first person plural, closely identifying himself with St. Paul. This excludes the theory that Acts is the work of a redactor. As Renan has well said, such use of the pronoun is incompatible with any theory of redaction. We know from many proofs that Luke was the companion and fellow-labourer of Paul. Writing to the Colossians, in his salutation Paul associates with himself, "Luke, the beloved physician" (iv, 14). In II Timothy iv, 11 Paul дизайн: "Only Luke is with me". To Philemon (24) Paul calls Luke his fellow-worker. Now in this article, we may suppose the Lucan authorship of the third Gospel as proved. The writer of Acts in his opening sentence implicitly declares himself to be the author of the Gospel. He mentions his former work and in substance makes known his intention of continuing the history which, in his former treatise, he had brought up to the day when the Lord Jesus was received up. There is an identity of style between Acts and the third Gospel. An examination of the original Greek texts of the third Gospel and of the Acts reveals that there is in them a remarkable identity of manner of thinking and of writing. There is in both the same tender regard for the Gentiles, the same respect for the Roman Empire, the same treatment of the Jewish question, the same conviction that the Gospel is for all men. In forms of expression the third Gospel and the Acts reveal an identity of authorship. Many of the expressions usual in both works occur but rarely in the rest of the New Testament; other expressions are found nowhere else save in the third Gospel and in the Acts. If one will compare the two Gospels, he will find that the Lucan authorship of the Acts is assumed that both works are of the same author: Luke, i, 1—Acts, xv, 24–25; Luke, xv, 13—Acts, i, 5, xxvii, 14, xix, 11; Luke, i, 20, 80—Acts, i, 2, 22, ii, 29, vii, 45; Luke, iv, 34—Acts, ii, 27, iv, 27, 30; Luke, xxiii, 5—Acts, x, 37; Luke, i, 9—Acts, i, 17; Luke, xii, 56, xxi, 33—Acts, xvii, 26. The last-cited parallel expression, τι προσωποῦ τῆς γῆς, is employed only in the third Gospel and in Acts. The evidence of the Lucan authorship of Acts is cumulative. The intrinsic evidence is corroborated by the testimonies of many witnesses. It must be granted that the latter are few, but faint allusions to the Acts of the Apostles are occasionally made in the New Testament. The Fourth Gospel of that age wrote but little; and the injury of time has robbed us of much of what was written. The Gospels were more prominent in the teachings of that day and they consequently have a more abundant witness. The canon of Muratori contains the canon of Scriptures of the Church of Rome in the second century. Of Acts it declares: "But the Acts of all the Apostles are written in one book, which for the excellent Theophilus Luke wrote, because he was an eye-witness of all". In "The Doctrine of Addai", which contains the ancient tradition of the Church of Edessa, the Acts of the Apostles are declared to be a part of the Holy Scriptures (Doctrine of Addai, ed. Phillips, 1876, 46). The twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth chapters of St. Irenæus's third book "Against Heresies" are based upon the Acts of the Apostles. Irenæus convincingly defends the Lucan authorship of the third Gospel and Acts. But if this third Gospel was inseparable from Paul, and was his fellow-labourer in the Gospel, he himself clearly evinces, not as a matter of boasting, but as bound to do so, by the truth itself. . . . And all the remaining facts of his courses with Paul, he recounts. . . . As he says that the different works of the Apostle were fully noted them down in writing, so that he cannot be convicted of falsehood or boastingfulness, etc." Irenæus unites in himself the witness of the Christian Church of the East and the West of the second century. He continues unchanged the teaching of the Apostolic Fathers. In his treatise "On Pasting" Tertullian accepts Acts as Holy Scripture, and calls them the "Commentary of Luke". In his treatise "On Prescription against Heretics", xxii, Tertullian is strong in asserting the canonicity of Acts: "And assuredly, God fulfilled his promise, since it is proved in the Acts of the Apostles that the Holy Ghost did come down upon them when seventy-two. . . . That Scripture can neither belong to the Holy Ghost, seeing that they cannot acknowledge that the Holy Ghost has been sent as yet to the disciples, nor can they presume to be a church themselves, who positively have no means of proving when, and with what infant-nurse, this Church was established. . . . Again, in chapter xxiii of the same treatise, he issues a challenge to those who reject Acts: "I may say here to those who reject the Acts of the Apostles: It is first necessary that you show us who this Paul was; both what he was before he became an Apostle and how he became an Apostle" etc. Clement of Alexandria is a clear witness. In "Stromata," v. 11, he declares: "Most instructively, therefore, says Paul in the Acts of the Apostles: 'The God that made the world, and all things in it, being the Lord of Heaven and of earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands;' etc. (Acts, xvii, 24, 25). Again, in another discourse, he says: 'An apostle of the Acts, who was contemporary with the Apostles, relates that Paul said: 'Men of Athens, I perceive that in all things, ye are greatly superstitious.'" In Hom., xiii, on Genesis, ii, Origen asserts the Lucan authorship of Acts as a truth that all the world accepted. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., III, xxxv) places Acts among the works of Lucian. Origen has doubted. The authenticity of Acts is so well proved that even the sceptical Renan was forced to declare: "A thing beyond all doubt is that the Acts have the same author as the third Gospel, and are a continuation of the same. One finds no necessity to prove this fact, which has never seriously been denied. The prefaces of the two writings, the dedication of both the one and the other to Theophilus, the perfect resemblance of ideas and manner of expression furnish a convincing demonstration of the fact." (Les Apôtres, Introd., p. x). Again he says: "The third Gospel and the Acts have a narrow connection with both, and even with art, written by the same hand, and with a definite plan. The two works taken together form a whole, having the same style, presenting the same characteristic expressions, and citing the Scripture in the same manner" (ibid., p. xi).

Objections Against the Authenticity. — Nevertheless this well-proved truth has been contradicted. Baur, Schwanbeck, De Wette, Davidsen, Mayerhoff, Schleiermacher, Bleek, Krenkel, and others have opposed the authenticity of the Acts. An objection is drawn from the discrepancy between Acts ix, 19—25 and Gal., i, 17, 18. In the Epistle to the Galatians, i, 17, 18, St. Paul declares that, immediately after his conversion, he went away into Arabia, and again returned to Damascus. "Then after three years, I went up to Jerusalem to visit Cephas." In Acts no mention is made of St. Paul's journey into Arabia; and the journey to Jerusalem is placed immediately after the notice of Paul's preaching in the synagogues.

Hilgenfeld, Wendt, Welzäcker, Weiss, and others allege here a contradiction between the writer of the Acts and St. Paul. Their charge is vain. There is here verified what is the usual fact when two inspired writers narrate synchronous events. No writer of either Testament had in mind to write a connected history. Out of the acts and deeds they grouped together those things which they deemed best for their scope. They always concur on the great lines of the doctrines and the main facts; they differ in that one omits certain things which another relates. The writers of the New Testament wrote with the conviction that the world had already received the message by oral communication. Not all could have a manuscript of the written word, but all heard the voice of those who preached Christ. The intense activity of the first teachers of the New Law made it a living reality in every land. The few writings which were produced were considered as of the greater economy of preaching. Hence we find notable omissions in all the writers of the New Testament; and every writer has some things proper to himself. In the present instance the writer of Acts has omitted St. Paul's journey into Arabia and sojourn there. The evidence of the omission is in the text itself. In Acts, ix, 19, the writer speaks of St. Paul's sojourn in Damascus as covering a period of "certain days." This is the indefinite description of a relatively short space of time. In Acts, ix, 23, he connects the next event narrated with the foregoing by declaring that it came to pass "after many days were fulfilled." It is evident that some series of events must have had place between the "certain days" of the nineteenth verse, and the "many days" of the twenty-third verse; these events are Paul's journey into Arabia, his sojourn there, and his return to Damascus. Another objection is urged. The Acts are compared with Acts, xvii, 14, 15, and xviii, 5. In Acts, xvii, 14, 15, Paul leaves Timothy and Silas at Berea, with a commandment to come to him at Athens. In Acts, xvii, 5, Timothy and Silas come out of Macedonia to Paul at Corinth. But in I Thess., iii, 1, 2, Timothy is sent by Paul out of Athens to Thessalonica, and no mention is made of the need to appeal to the principle that when a writer omits one or more members in a series of events he does not thereby contravene another writer who may narrate the thing omitted. Timothy and Silas came down from Berea to Paul at Athens. In his seal for the Macedonian churches, Paul sent Timothy back from Athens to Thessalonica, and Silas to some other part of Macedonia. When they return out of Macedonia they come to Paul at Corinth. Acts has omitted their coming to Athens and their return to Macedonia. In Acts many things are condensed. Thus Paul may have been Galatian minister of Paul, which must have lasted considerable time, Acts devotes the one sentence: "They passed through the region of Phrygia and Galatia" (Acts, xvi, 6). The fourth journey of Paul to Jerusalem is described in one verse (Acts, xvi, 22). The objection is urged that, from Acts, xvi, 12, it is evident that the author of the Acts was with Paul in the foundation of the Church at Philippi. Therefore, they say that, since Luke was at Rome with Paul when he wrote thence to the Philippians, had Luke been the author of Acts, Paul would have associated Luke with himself in his salutation to the Philippians in the letter which he wrote them. On the contrary, we find in it no mention of Luke; but Timothy is associated with Paul in the salutation. This is a mere negative argument, and of no avail. The apostolic men of that day neither sought nor gave vain personal recognition in their work. St. Paul wrote to the Romans without ever mentioning St. Peter. There was no such principle of place or time among those men. It may have been that, though Luke was with St. Paul at Philippi, Timothy was the better known to that Church. Again, at the moment of St. Paul's writing Luke may have been absent from Paul.

The rationalists allege that there is an error in the discourse of Gamaliel (Acts, v, 36). Gamaliel refers to the insurrection of Theodas as a thing that had happened before the days of the Apostles, whereas Josephus (Antiq., XX, v, 1) places the rebellion of Theodas under Fadus, fourteen years after the date of the speech of Gamaliel. Here, as elsewhere, the adversaries of Holy Scriptures presuppose every writer who disagrees with the Holy Scriptures to be right. Every one who has examined Josephus must be struck by his carelessness and inaccuracy. He wrote mainly from memory, and often contradicts himself. In the present instance some suppose that he has confused Theodas and Theodorus, that of a certain Mathias, of whom he speaks in Antiq., XVII, vi, 4 Theodas is a contraction of Theodorus, and is identical in significance with the Hebrew name Mathias, both names signifying, "Gift of God." This is the opinion of Corluy in Vigouroux, Acts, i, 15. But the evidence of the inscription of which he speaks was not actuated by holy motives. He speaks of him as a seditious man, who misled his followers, "giving himself out to be somebody." But Josephus describes Mathias as a most eloquent interpreter of the Jewish law, a man beloved by the people, whose lectures those who were studious of virtue frequented. Moreover, he incited the young men to pull down the golden eagle which the impostors set upon the Temple. Certainly such an act was pleasing to God, not the act of an imposter. The argument of Gamaliel is based on the fact that Theodos claimed to be something which he was not. The character of Theodas as given by Josephus, XX, v, 1, accords with the implied character of the Theodas of Acts. Were it not for the discrepancy of dates, the two testimonies would be in perfect accord. It seems far more probable, therefore, that both writers speak of the same man, and that Josephus has erroneously placed his epoch about thirty years too late. Of course it is possible that there may have been two Theodases of similar character: one of the days of Herod the Great, whom Josephus does not name, but who is mentioned by Gamaliel; and one in the days of Cuspius Fadus the procurator of Judea, whose insurrection Josephus records. There must have been many of such character in the days of Herod the Great, for Herod, speaking of that epoch, declared that "at this time there were ten thousand other disorders in Judea which were like tumults." (Antiq., XVII, x, 4).

It is urged that the three accounts of the conversion of St. Paul (Acts, ix, 7; xxii, 9; xxvi, 14) do not agree. In Acts, ix, 7, the author declares that "the men that were with him heard the voice, but beholding no man." In xxii, 9, Paul declares: "And they that were with me beheld indeed the light; but they heard not the voice of Him that spake to me." In xxvi, 14, Paul declares that they all fell to the earth, which seems to contradict the first statement, that they "stood speechless." This is purely a question of circumstantial detail, of very minor moment. There are many solutions of this difficulty. Supported by many precedents, we may hold that in the several narrations of the same event inspiration does not compel an absolute agreement in mere extrinsic details which in nowise affects the substance of the narration. In all the Bible, where the same event is several times narrated by the same writer, or narrated by several writers, there is some slight divergence, as it is natural there should be with those who spoke and wrote from memory. Divine inspiration is the substance alone of God's Word. For those who insist that divine inspiration extends also to these minor details there are valid solutions. Pape and others give to the εἴπεται τῆς φωνῆς the sense of an emphatic εἶπεν, and thus "it could be rendered: "The men that journeyed with him became speechless," thus agreeing with xxvi, 14. Moreover, the three accounts can be placed in agreement by supposing that the several accounts contemplate the event at different moments of its course. All saw a great light; all heard a sound from Heaven. They fell on their faces in fear; and then, arising, stood still and speechless, while Paul conversed with Jesus, who spoke to him alone. In Acts, ix, 7, the marginal reading of the Revised Edition of Oxford should be accepted: "hearing the sound." The Greek is τὰς φωνάς τῆς φωνῆς. When the writer speaks of the articulate voice of Christ, which Paul alone heard, he employs the phrase, φωναῖς φωνής. This phrase, φωναῖς φωνής, by the Semitic propinquity of sound construction, may signify the inarticulate sound of the voice which all heard and the articulate voice which Paul alone heard.

It is urged that Acts, xvi, 6 and xviii, 23 represent Paul as merely passing through Galatia, whereas the Epistle to the Galatians gives evidence of Paul's long sojourn in Galatia. Cornell and answer this difficulty by supposing that St. Paul employs the term Galatia in the administrative sense, as a province, which comprised Galatia proper, Lycaonia, Pisidia, Isauria, and a great part of Phrygia; whereas St. Luke employs the term to denote Galatia proper. Dr. Blass gives the following explanation: St. Luke in Acts often severely condenses his narrative. He devotes but one verse (xvii, 22) to Paul's fourth journey to Jerusalem; he condenses his narrative of St. Paul's two years of imprisonment at Cesarea into a few lines. Thus he may also have judged, good for his scope to pass over in one sentence those very memorable events.

DATE OF COMPOSITION.—As regards the date of the Book of Acts, we may at most assign a probable date for the completion of the book. It is recognized by all that Acts ends abruptly. The author devotes but two verses to the two years which Paul spent at Rome. These two years we in sense uneventful Paul dwelt peaceably at Rome, and preached the kingdom of God to all who went in unto him. It seems probable that during this peaceful epoch St. Luke composed the Book of Acts, and terminated it abruptly at the end of the two years, as some understanding of it cast him out into other events. The date of the completion of Acts is therefore dependent on the date of St. Paul's Roman captivity. Writers are quite concordant in placing the date of Paul's coming to Rome in the year 62; hence the year 64 is the most probable date for the Acts.

TEXTS OF THE ACTS.—In the Greek-Latin codices D and E of Acts, we find a text widely differing from that of the other codices, and from the received text. By Sandy and Headlam (Romans, p. xxi) this is called the d text; by Blass (Acta Apostolorum, p. 24) it is called the β text. The famous Latin Codex now called the Codex Vaticanus is called the c text, and also in the main represents this text. Dr. Bornemann (Acta Apost.) endeavoured to prove that the aforesaid text was Luke's original, but his theory has not been received. Dr. Blass (Acta Apost., p. vii) endeavours to prove that Luke wrote first a rough draft of Acts, and that this is preserved in D and E. Luke revised this rough draft, and sent it to Theophilius; and this revised copy he supposes to be the original of our received text. Belsel, Nestle, Zeeckler, and others have adopted his theory. The theory is, however, rejected by the greater number. It seems far more probable that D and E contain a fragment of the manuscript from which D and E was added, paraphrased, and changed things in the text, according to that tendency which prevailed up to the second half of the second century of our era.
Actes which grants a privilege or a dispensation affects others only by preventing them from benefiting the recipients. Secular decrees concerning a judicial sentence has not the force of a universal law, unless the same decision has been given repeatedly in similar cases, because such decisions rendered by courts that are supreme form a judicial custom, to which inferior judges must conform (227). D. de lege (1972), 40; 1982. Decrees are unequivocal; reasons explaining them are divided as to the limits of the binding force. Most authors distinguish between comprehensive and extensive interpretations. The latter are held to bind only persons to whom they are directed, unless promulgated to the Universal Church. Being extensive, they enforce a prescription included in the law and are equivalent to a new law; the former are held to bind all without need of promulgation, because the sense explained in a comprehensive interpretation being already included in the law, such decrees are new laws and do not need further promulgation. Many canonists follow an opposite view; without distinguishing between comprehensive and extensive interpretations, they maintain that any decree interpreting a law in itself obscure and doubtful binds only those to whom it is directed, unless promulgated to the Universal Church. They base their theory on the fact that, when a law is in itself doubtful and obscure, an authentic interpretation, i.e., a declaration obliging people to put that law into practice in a certain definite sense, is equivalent to a new law; hence the necessity of its promulgation. These authors, however, admit that no promulgation is necessary, either when the same declaration has been repeatedly given, so as to have established what is termed the Stylus Curiae (a custom similar to that mentioned above in connection with the authority of judicial sentences), or when the declaration in question, though given only once, has been universally accepted, so as to have become the common practice of the Church.

III. Use.—Their use is determined by their special character and value, according as they are sentences, or declarations and so forth. Moreover, besides settling the cases for which they are issued, they are often useful for professional and moral theology in discussing disputed questions, as for judges in the prudent administration of justice; on the other hand, all, especially clerics, may find, even in those that are not universal, safe directions in matters of religion and morality. This directive effect is all the more reasonable as these acts come from men of learning and experience, well qualified for their offices, who devote the most careful study to each case, according to its relative importance. Decisions of lesser moment are given by the cardinal who is at the head of the Congregation, in a meeting (Congresso) composed of the same cardinal, the secretary, and some officers of the Congregation. More important matters are decided on by the general Congregation. Before the Congregation meets to take action in affairs of very great importance, each cardinal has been fully informed of the question to be treated, by means of a paper in which the matter is thoroughly discussed, and all the facts and arguments presented, with reasons for both sides. The cardinals then discuss the matter in their meeting, and the decision is reached by voting. These decisions are brought to the Pope for his consideration or approbation in all cases in which custom or law prescribes such procedure. Ordinarily this approval is not necessary, as a question of such a character is not a "pontifical act"; they become such only by the special confirmation, termed by canonists in forma specifica, which is seldom given. Finally, the act is drawn up in due form, and, having been sealed and signed by the Cardinal Prefect of the Congregation and the Secretary, is dispatched to its destination.

IV. MANNER OF PRESERVATION.—All pending affairs are entered under progressive numbers, in the register called Protocolla, with a short indication of their nature and a notice whether suitable and the bibliographic indexes render easy the work of looking up details. All the documents relating to each case, from the first, containing the petition addressed to the Congregation, to the official copy of the final act, and forming what is technically called the postazione, are kept together, separate from all other documents, and preserved in the archives of the Congregation, either permanently or for a definite period of time (ordinarily, ten years), when the documents are removed to the Vatican archives. This latter practice prevails in the Congregations of the Council, of Bishops and Regulars, and of Rites.

V. ACCESSIBILITY.—The archives of the Congregations are not opened to the public. If one wishes to study the documents, he should ask permission from the authorities of the Congregations. Ordinarily it is sufficient to ask it of the secretary; in the Congregations of Propaganda and of the Index, the petition will be addressed to the Cardinal Prefect, and in the Congregation of the Holy Office, to the Congregation itself; finally, in the Congregations of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, the matter has to be referred to the Pope. When there are sufficient reasons, which should be more or less grave according to the quality of the matter, the petitioner either will be allowed to inspect the original documents or will be supplied with authentic copies.

VI. COLLECTIONS.—Many of the acts are accessible in the various collections, which several of the Congregations have permitted to be published. Some of these collections are also authentic, inasmuch as their genuineness and authenticity are vouched for by the authorities of the Congregations. Moreover, the editors of periodicals on ecclesiastical subjects have been allowed for several years back to publish in their magazines the acts of the Congregations, and one of these periodicals, "Acta Sanctorum Sedis," has received the privilege of being declared "authentic and proper for publishing the acts of the Acta Sanctorum," (S. C. De Prop. Fid., 23 May, 1904). The following is a list of the chief collections:

Collected Acts of Pope Pius V (Rome, 1893); Thesaurus Resolutionum S. Congr. Concilii (Rome, 1718); Zamboni, Collectio Declarationum S. Congr. Concilii (Rome, 1735); Pallottino, Collectio Declaratio et Resolutionum S. Congr. Concilii (Rome, 1868–93); Lingren et Reuss, Causa Selecta, in S. C. Concilii Proposito (New York, 1871); Bizzarri, Collectanea S. Congr. Episcoporum et Regularium (Rome, 1885); Decreto authenticae C. Sacrorum Rituum (Rome, 1885–1901); Decreto authenticae S. Congr. Indulgentiarum Sacrisse Religiosi Propositae (New York, 1883); Schneider, Rescripta authenticae S. C. Indulgentiarum Sacrisse Religiosi Propositae (Ratisbon, 1885); Ricci, Synopsis Declaratorum et Resolutionum S. Congr. Immunitatis (Turin, 1719). Among the Catholic periodicals that publish regularly, with more or less completeness, the acts of the Congregations are the following (the date after the title indicates the first year of publication):

Archiv für Kathol. Kirchenrecht (1857); Anzeeta Juris Pontificii (Rome, 1855), since 1893, Anzeeta Ecclesiastica; Le Canoniote Contemporain (Paris, 1893); American Ecclesiastical Review (New York, 1875), Ecclesiastical Record (Dublin, 1854); Nouvelle Revue Théologique (Tourin, 1869); Acta Sanctorum Sedis (Rome, 1865); Monitore Ecclesiastico (Rome, 1876).

Actus et Potentia, a technical expression in scholastic phraseology.

"The terms actus and potentia were used by the scholastics to translate Aristotle's τό τι είναι or έν είναι, and δύναται. There is no simple word in English that would be an exact rendering of either. Act, action, actuality, perfection, determination express the various meanings of actus; potency, potentiality, power, capacity, those of potentia. In general, potentia means an aptitude to change, to act, to be acted upon, to be determined; actus means the fulfilment of such a capacity. So, potentia always refers to something future, which at present exists only as a germ to be evolved; actus denotes the corresponding complete reality. In a word, potentia is the determinable being, and actus, the determined being. The term actus, therefore, has a much greater extension than act or operation. Every operation is an actus, because it is the complement of a power; but all other perfections and determinations, whatever be their nature, are also actus. On the other hand, the being in potentia is not to be identified with the possible being. The latter belongs to the logical order; it is a notion whose elements involve no contradiction. The former belongs to the real order; it exists in a subject which, though undefined, is capable of determination. Potentia is more than a mere statement of futurity, which has reference to the only; it implies a real determination in the future. It would also be a mistake to identify the scholastic actus and potentia with the actual and potential energy of physics. These terms apply only to material substances, and are exclusively dynamic; they signify the capacity for doing work, or the actual performing of work. The scholastic terms apply to all, even spiritual beings, and refer to any reality which they possess or can acquire. The Aristotelian "energy" (actus) as such, i.e., considered as actuality, can never be potential, these two terms being opposed to each other. Actuality and potentiality are mutually exclusive, since one means the presence, the other the absence, of the same determination. Yet, in all beings except God (see Actus Purus) there is a combination of actuality and potentiality; they possess some determinations and are capable of acquiring others. Moreover, the same reality may be considered as actuality or potentiality, according as we take a prospective or a prospective view of the same human, skill and science are actualities if we compare them to human nature, which they presuppose. But if we compare them to the actions themselves, or to the actual recall of acquired knowledge to consciousness, they are powers, or potentia. If we keep the same point of view, it is impossible for the same thing to be at the same time in actus and in potentia with regard to the same determination.

Aristotle and St. Thomas explain this theory by many illustrations, one of which will suffice. The statue exists potentially in the block of marble, because marble has an aptitude to receive the shape of a statue. This aptitude is something real in the marble, since other substances are not capable of it. It is a receptive potentiality. With regard to the same statue, the sculptor has the power, by his action, to carve the marble into the form of a statue. His is an active power, a real skill or ability which is lacking in many other persons. In order to have the actual statue (actus), it is necessary for the sculptor to use his real skill (potentia) on a substance which is not yet a statue, but which has a real aptitude (potentia) to become one. I can form no idea either of the marble’s potentiality or of the sculptor’s skill unless I first know what is meant by an actual statue. In the same manner, the man born blind is unable to understand what is meant by the faculty of vision. In general, potentia has no meaning, and cannot be defined except through the corresponding actus.

II.—The distinction between potentia and actus is at the basis of, and pervades, the whole scholastic system of philosophy and theology. Whatever is determined by a cause is considered a potentiality with regard to the actual determination. Genus and species, subject and predicate, quantity and shape, child and adult, matter and form of the sacraments, etc., are examples of potentiality and actuality. Here we must confine ourselves to the fundamental applications in metaphysics and in psychology. (1) In metaphysics the distinction runs through the ten Aristotelian categories. All being, whether a substance or accident (q. v.), is either in actus or in potentia. The essence of creatures is a potentiality with regard to their existence. Material substances are composed of primary matter and substantial form (see MATTER AND FORM), matter being a pure potentiality, i.e., wholly undetermined, and form being the first determination given to matter. Efficient causality is also an application of potentiality and actuality; the cause, when at rest, remains able to act. Change is a transition from the state of potentiality to that of actuality. Generation, corruption, and evolution suppose a capacity which becomes fulfilled. (2) In psychology special emphasis is laid on the reality of the potentia, or faculties (q. v.), and their distinction both from the soul and from their operations. External senses are determined by external stimulus (see Sensation), which gives them the determination necessary to the act of perception. The internal senses (sensus communis, phantasía, memoria, imaginativa) depend on external sensations for their exercise. Memory and imagination preserve in potentia traces of past impressions, and when the proper conditions are fulfilled, they become actualities. We have not innate ideas, but in the beginning human intelligence is simply a power to acquire ideas. By its operation, the active power of the intellect (intellectus agens) forms the species intelligibis or the determination necessary to the intelligence (intellectus positus). This potentiality is then actualized by some good which one strives to acquire. In rational psychology man is conceived as one substantial being, composed of body and soul, or matter and form, united as potentia and actus.

There is a tendency to-day in nearly all the sciences towards “actuality” theories. But, if analyzed carefully, such theories will necessarily yield potential elements. In all things we find capacities for further development and evolution, forces and aptitudes which come to be utilized little by little. In scholas-

Actus primus, a technical expression used in scholastic philosophy. Actus means determination, complement, perfection. In every being there are many actualities, and these are subordinated. Thus existence supposes essence; power supposes existence; action supposes faculty. The first actuality (actus primus) begins a series; it supposes no other actuality preceding it. According to the same series, for a further complement, namely, the second actuality (actus secundus). But as the same reality may be called “actuality” when viewed in the light of what precedes, and “potentiality” when viewed in the light of what follows (see ACTUS ET POTENTIA), the meaning of the term first actuality may vary according to the view one takes, and the part where the series is made to begin. Primary matter (see MATTER AND FORM) is a pure potentiality, and the substantial form is its first determination, its first actuality. The complete substance constituted by these two principles receives further determinations, of which are, in that respect, second actualities. All these may also be conceived as first actualities. Thus the extensive quantity of a substance is a first actuality when compared to the shape. Power is a first actuality when compared to action. And this is the most frequent application of the terms actus primus and actus secundus. The former is the faculty; the latter, the exercise, or function. To see in actus primo simply means to have the sense of vision; to see in actus secundo is to actually perform acts of vision. The modern distinction of potential and kinetic energy might serve as another illustration: the loaded gun, or the engine with steam up, represent first actualities; the burst of the mark, the engine flying over the rails, represent second actualities.

Actus Purus, a term employed in scholastic philosophy to express the absolute perfection of God. In all finite beings we find actuality and potentiality, perfection and imperfection. Primary matter, which is the basis of material substance, is a pure potentiality. Moreover, change necessarily supposes a potential element, for it is a transition from a state of potentiality to a state of actuality; and material things undergo manifold changes in substance, quantity, quality, place, activity, etc. Angels, since they are pure spirits, are subject to none of the changes that depend on the material principle. Nonetheless, the idea of perfection and potentiality. Their existence is contingent. Their actions are successive, and are distinct from the faculty of acting. The fact that all things have in themselves some potentiality warrants the conclusion that there must exist a being, God, from whom potentiality is wholly excluded, and who, therefore, is simply actuality and absence of potentiality. It is true that in the same being the state of potentiality precedes that of actuality; before being realized, a perfection must be capable of realization. But, absolutely speaking, actuality precedes potentiality. For in order to change, a thing must be acted upon, or actualized; change and potentiality presuppose, therefore, a being which is in act. This actuality, if mixed with potentiality, supposes another actuality or being so in the universe or nature.

Thus the existence of movement (in scholastic terminology, motus, any change) points to the existence of a prime and immobile motor. Causality leads to the conception of God as the unproduced cause. Contingent beings require a necessary being. The limited perfection of creatures postulates the unlimited perfection of the creator. The direction of various activities towards the realization of an order in the universe manifests a plan and a divine intelligence. When we endeavour to account ultimately for the series of phenomena in the world, it is necessary to place at the beginning of the series—if the series be conceived as finite in duration—or above the series—if it be conceived as eternal—a pure actuality without which no explanation is possible. Thus, at one extreme of reality we find primary matter, a pure potentiality, without any specific perfection, and having, on this account, a certain infinity (of indetermination). It needs to be, but has no substantive form, but includes, of itself, demand any one form rather than another. At the other extreme is God, pure actuality, wholly determined by the very fact that He is infinite in His perfection. Between these extremes are the realities of the world, with various degrees of potentiality and actuality.

So that God is not a becoming, as in some pantheistic systems, nor a being whose infinite potentiality is gradually unfolded or evolved. But He possesses at once all perfections. He is simultaneously all that He can be, infinitely real and infinitely perfect. What we conceive as His attributes or His perfections are really identical with His essence, and His essence includes essentially His existence. For all intelligences except His own, God is incomprehensible and indefinable. The nearest approach we can make to a definition is to call Him the Actus Purus. It is the name God gives to Himself: "I am who am", i.e., I am the fulness of being and of perfection.

Adalard, Saint, born c. 751; d. 2 January, 827. Bernard, son of Charles Martel and half-brother of Pepin, was his father, and Charlemagne his cousin. He received a good education in the Palace School at the Court of Charlemagne, and while very young was made Count of the Palace. At the age of thirty he was received into the Order at Corbie in Picardy. In order to be more secluded, he went to Monte Cassino, but was ordered by Charle.- dame to return to Corbie, where he was elected abbot. At the same time Charlemagne made him prime minister to his son Pepin, King of Italy. When, in 814, Bernard, son of Pepin, aspiring after the imperial crown, Louis le Debonnaire suspected Adalard of being in sympathy with Bernard and banished him to Hermoutier, the modern Noirmoutier, on the island of the same name. After a few years Louis the Debonnaire, who had misjudged, had his mistake and made Adalard one of his chief advisers. In 822 Adalard and his brother Wala founded the monastery of (New) Corvey in Westphalia. Adalard is honoured as patron of many churches and towns in France and along the lower Rhine.

Adalbert, Archbishop of Hamburg-Bremen, b. about 1000; d. 1072 at Goslar; son of Count Friedrich von Goseck, and Agnes of the lineages of the Weimar Counts. He became successively canon in Halberstadt; subdeacon to the Archbishop of Hamburg (1032); Provost of the Halberstadt Cathedral; and Archbishop of Hamburg (1043 or 1045) by royal appointment, and so on. Most of the Scandinavian Peninsula and a great part of the Wend lands, in addition to the territory north of the Elbe. He is probably the Adalbert mentioned as the Chancellor for Italy under Henry III in 1045. At the very outset of his episcopal career he took up the old feud of Hamborn with the Billings, in which he had the co-operation of Henry III. Having accompanied the Emperor on a campaign against the Liutzi (1045), he also journeyed with him to Rome (1046). Upon the settlement of the papal schism Henry wished to make Adalbert Pope, but he refused, and presented his friend Sudiger (Clement III) as a candidate. He co-operated in the Church, and three new bishops were erected, all subject to Hamburg. Adalbert then conceived the idea of a great northern patriarchate, with its seat at Hamburg, but was constantly foiled. The Kings of Norway and Sweden began to send their bishops to England for consecration, and Sven Estrithson, King of Denmark, appealed to Henry and Pope Leo IX for an archbishop of his own, which would mean a loss to Hamburg of lands just yielding fruits after two hundred years of evangelization. The assent of Adalbert was necessary for such a decision, which he promised, on condition that his dream of a northern patriarchate be realized. The whole discussion was cut short by the death of both Pope (1054) and Emperor (1056).

During the regency of Empress Agnes, Adalbert lost his hold on the court, and the young Emperor, Henry IV, fell under the influence of Anno, Archbishop of Cologne. Despite the ancient feud between Hamburg and Cologne, Adalbert gained control of Henry's education, eventually superseding Anno in his confidence and esteem. In extenuation of Adalbert's eagerness to obtain privileges for his archdiocese it must be recalled that he had sacrificed much in the royal service, and that his influence was ever for the more open and straightforward course of action, in contradistinction to that of the opposition party. His flattery and indulgence of Henry, however, were baneful in their effects. Forced to retire from court in 1096, by the jealousy of the nobles, he was again admitted to Henry's councils in 1098. His ascendency was ordained finally with his death (1072). Archbishop Adalbert is characterized by Adam of Bremen as minax vultu et habitu verborumque altitudine suspectus audientibus. Generous, prudent, and zealous as he was, his character was marred by indomitable pride, which has caused him to be depicted in the blackest colours.
ADALBERT

Adalbert, Saint, apostle of the Slavs, probably native of Lorraine, d. 981. He was a German monk who was consecrated bishop and sent to establish Christianity in Russia in 961. His mission was the result of a request of the princess Olga who, having been won to the Faith, asked for someone to evangelize her people, besought the German Emperor Otho, who sent Adalbert, and a number of priests to begin the work. Russia was then in a state of barbarism, and the missionaries were attacked on the way, some of the priests being killed, Adalbert barely escaping with his life. Returning to Germany, he was made Archbishop of Magdeburg in Alsace, and in the following year became Bishop of the new see of Magdeburg, which was erected for the purpose of dealing especially with the Slavs. Magdeburg became one of the great bishoprics of the country, the chief one in the North, and flourishing with Constantinople. The advantage was taken of the character of Pope Paschal II, formerly Abbot of Cluny, who was a saintly man, but no diplomat. A disagreement arising regarding the treaty, Henry subjected the Pope to a harsh imprisonment of two months. Fearing schism, the Pope finally granted Henry the privilege of conferring the ring and staff on bishops, providing they were elected by papal consent, and soon after he crowned Henry in St. Peter's at Rome (1111). Henry, according to compact, named Adalbert Archbishop of Mainz in reward for his part in the shameful intrigue against the Supreme Pontiff. From the day when, as Archbishop elect, he received the insignia of his office, Adalbert became a changed man. Whether this marvellous change was due to a realization of his sacred duties or to an awakening to the sacrilegious injustice of Henry's conduct at Rome, we cannot say. At any rate the ex-chancellor, lately so blindly zealous for the Emperor in right or wrong, became henceforth a brave and loyal defender of the Church and the Pope. In 1112 Henry V was excommunicated, and Adalbert fearlessly promulgated the sentence, whereupon the enraged Emperor cast him into a dungeon. After three years of cruel imprisonment had reduced him to a mere skeleton, the people of Mainz, rising in a body, forced Henry to release him. The episcopal consecration, delayed by his confinement, was then received at the hands of Otto, Bishop of Bamberg (1115). Later, when, under Pope Calixtus II, Adalbert was made a legate, Henry seized some pretext for attacking Mainz, whereupon Adalbert aroused the Saxons to arms and had them march against the two armies met, but arbitration prevented a battle. As a result, the Council of Worms (1122) was finally held, bringing to a close the long strife regarding Investitures. In 1125 Henry V was on his death-bed, and being without male issue sent the imperial insignia to his daughter of the family of Henry I of Lorraine. The politic Adalbert, ever on the alert to ward off any danger of a schism, induced Matilda to return the insignia, and called an assembly of princes, who chose as Henry's successor Lothair II the Saxon, afterwards crowned Emperor in Rome by Pope Innocent II (1135). Thus the Empire passed from the house of Franconia to that of Saxony, which had so long proved itself loyal to the cause of Rome. Adalbert died in 1137, having atoned for his early injustice by long years of faithful and efficient service in all that touched the interests of truth and the welfare of the Church.

ADALBERT DISCOUNUS, SAINT. See Ethelbert.

AD APOSTOLICE DIGNITATIS APICEM.—Apostolic letter issued against Emperor Frederick II by Pope Innocent IV (1243-54), during the Council of Lyons, 17 July, 1245, the third year of his pontificate. The letter sets forth that Innocent, desiring to have peace restored to those parts which were then distracted by dissensions, sent for that purpose three legates to Frederick as the chief author of those dissensions, to appoint out the wrongs that he would do his own part to restore it. Frederick agreed to terms of peace, which he swore to observe, but which he at once violated. The letter then sets forth the crimes of which Frederick was guilty. It accuses him of perjury; of contempt for the spiritual authority of the Roman Pontiff, by dishonoring the excommunica- tion pronounced on him and by compelling others to do so; of invading pontifical territory; of having broken the terms of peace made with Pope Gregory, and which he swore to keep; of oppressing the Church in Sicily; of having taken, persecuted, and done to death bishops and others who were sent by the Emperor to council, a council which he himself had asked to be convoked; of having incurred suspicion of heresy, and of having papal excommunication with contempt; of having compared with the Saracens and other enemies of Christianity; of being guilty of the death of the King of Barabara, and of giving away a daughter in marriage to a schismatic; of not paying tribute for Sicily, which is the patrimony of St. Peter. For these and for other crimes, Innocent IV, by this apostolic letter, declares Frederick unworthy to rule, and his subjects freed from their duty of obedience to him as sovereign. Bullar. Rom. (ed. Turin, 1858), III, 510-516; MANNI, Coll. Conc., XXIII, 613-616; Hefele, Concilienchronologie, V, 1125; BOEHMNER, Hist. univ. de l'Italie, IX, 14-15.

Ad Limina Apostolorum, an ecclesiastical term meaning a pilgrimage to the sepulchres of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome, i.e. to the Basilica of the Prince of the Apostles and to the Basilica of St. Paul "outside the walls".

Ad Sanctam Beati Petri Sedem.—This letter was issued by Alexander VII, and is dated at Rome, 16 October, 1656, the second year of his pontificate. It is a confirmation of the Constitution of Innocent X, which defined five propositions taken from the work entitled "Augustinus" of Cornelius Jansenius (q. v.), Bishop of Ypres. The letter opens with an explanation of the reason for its publication. It observes that, although what has already been defined in the Apostolic Constitutions needs no confirmation by any future decisions, yet if one doubts upon these propositions or to neutralize their force by false interpretations, the apostolic authority must not defer using a prompt remedy against the spread of the evil. The letter then refers to the decision of Innocent X, and quotes the words of its title in order to show that it was a decision for all the faithful. But as a controversy had arisen, especially in France, on five propositions taken from the "Augustinus", several French bishops submitted them to Alexander VII for a clear, definite decision. The letter thus enumerates these five propositions: (1) There are some divine precepts which are impossible of observance by just men willing and trying to observe them according to their present strength; the grace also is wanting to them, by which these precepts are possible. (2) In the state of fallen nature interior grace is not resisted. (3) For merit and demerit, in the state of fallen nature, libertas a necessitate (the liberty of the choice) is not necessary (it is necessary). Libertas a coactione (freedom from external compulsion) is enough. (4) The Semipelagians admitted the necessity of interior preventing grace (praeventis gratis interioris) for each and every act, even for the beginning of faith (initium fidei); and in that they were heretical, inasmuch as they held that grace to be such as the human will could resist or obey. (5) It is Semipelagian to say that Christ died, or shed His blood for all men. The letter then goes on to declare that, those five propositions having been submitted to due examination, each has been found to be heretical. The letter repeats each proposition singly, and formally condemns it. It next declares that the decision binds all the faithful, and enjoins on all bishops to enforce it, and adds, "We are not to be understood, however, by making this declaration and definition on those five propositions, as at all approving other opinions, and as having been attained in the above-named work of Cornelius Jansenius." Moreover, since some still insisted that those propositions were not to be found in the "Augustinus", or were not meant by the author in the sense in which they were condemned, the letter furthermore declares that they are contained in other writings of the above-named work. Ad Universalis Ecclesiae, a papal constitution dealing with the conditions for admission to religious orders of men and of women, and the discipline prescribed. It was issued by Pius IX, 7 February, 1862. This Pope had issued from time to time various decrees: e.g. "Romani Pontifices" (25 January, 1848), "Regulati Discipline" (for Italy and adjacent isles, 25 January, 1848), and "Neminem Latet" (19 March, 1856). These three decrees formed the basis of the constitution. "Ad Universalis Ecclesiae". It marks a distinct departure from the Tridentine law, both as to the necessary age and other requirements for admission of men to solemn vows in orders, congregations, and institutes, old and new, in which solemn vows are prescribed. The implication of the Constitution is that admission to solemn vows, once and forever, of doubts which had arisen and been presented to the Holy See about the validity of solemn vows made without due observance of the decree, "Neminem Latet", i.e. without the three years' profession of simple vows. It gives the reason of the "Neminem Latet" regulation, which was to safeguard the religious orders, congregations, and institutes from losing their genuine spirit and former excellence by hastily and imprudently admitting youths having no true vocation or of whose lives, morals, bodily and mental endowments, no proper investigation had been made and no testi- monial to the aforesaid had been given. The Pope, or received from, the bishop of their native place, or of the places where they had sojourned for the year immediately preceding their admission to the house of postulants. This the "Neminem Latet" accomplished by decreeing that novices after the completion of their probation and novitiate and, if clerics, of the sixteenth year of their age (prescribed by the Council of Trent), or of a more advanced age, if the rule of their order approved by the Holy See required it, if lay brothers, the age fixed by Pope Clement VIII (in Suprema), should make profession of simple vows for the term of three full years; and after the completion of said term, to be computed from day of profession to the last hour of the third year, if found worthy, they were to be admitted to solemn profession, unless their superiors, for just and reasonable cause, postponed the solemn profession; such postponement being prohibited beyond the twenty-fifth year of age, except in orders for which a longer term of simple profession was conceded by special indulg of the Holy See. The Pope says that, nevertheless, novices had been admitted to solemn profession without the three years' simple vows, thereby giving great cause to doubt concerning the validity of said solemn profession; and a decision upon that matter was requested from the Holy See. As the "Neminem Latet" said not a word about the nullity of solemn profession made in opposition to its regulation, the solemn profession made without the prescribed three years of simple vows was valid, though illicit. This was decided later (S. Cong. on Nulli Secanti, 16 August, 1863).

"We, therefore," declares Pius IX in this constitution, "in a matter of such great importance, desiring to remove all occasion of future doubt, of Our own motion and certain knowledge, and in the plentitude of Our Apostolic power as regards the religious communities and their orders, congregations, or institution in which solemn vows are made, do determine and decree to be null and void and of no value the profession of solemn vows, knowingly, or ignorantly, in any manner, colour or pretext, made by novices or lay brothers, although they had completed the Tridentine probation and novice, but who have had the profession of simple vows and remained in that profession for the entire three years, even though the superiors, or they, or both respectively, had the in-

ADAM

In the Old Testament the word is used both as a common and a proper noun, and in the former acceptance it has different meanings. Thus in Genesis ii, 5, it is employed to signify the human man or woman; rarely, as in Gen., ii, 22, it signifies man as opposed to woman, and, finally, it sometimes stands for mankind collectively, as in Gen., i, 26.

The use of the term, as a proper as well as a common noun, is common to both the sources designated in critical circles as P and E, and the narrative of the Creation (P) the word is used with reference to the production of mankind in both sexes, but in Gen., v, 1-4, which belongs to the same source, it is also taken as a proper name. In like manner the second account of the creation (J) speaks of "the man" (ha-adam), but later on (Gen., iv, 25) the same document employs the word as a proper name without the article.

ADAM IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—Practically all the Old Testament information concerning Adam and the beginnings of the human race is contained in the opening chapters of Genesis. To what extent these chapters should be considered as strictly historical is a much disputed question, the discussion of which does not come within the scope of the present article. Attention, however, must be called to the fact that the story of the Creation is told twice, viz. in the first chapter and in the second, and that while there is a substantial agreement between the two accounts as to the main facts, nevertheless there is considerable divergence as regards the setting of the narrative and the details. It has been the custom of writers who were loath to recognize the presence of independent sources or documents in the Pentateuch to explain the fact of this twofold narrative by saying that the sacred writer, having set forth in an abstract manner in the first chapter the successive phases of the Creation, returns to the same topic in the second chapter in order to add some further special details with regard to the origin of man. It must be granted, however, that very few scholars of the present day, even among Catholics, are satisfied with this explanation, and that among critics of every school there is a strong preponderance of opinion to the effect that we are here in presence of a phenomenon common enough in Oriental historical compositions, viz. the combination or juxtaposition of two or more independent documents more or less closely welded together by the historian, whose passion to dignify a human being is essentially a compiler. (See Guidi, "L'Historiographie chez les Sémites" in the "Revue biblique", October, 1906.) The reasons on which this view is based, as well as the arguments of those who oppose it, may be found in Dr. Gigot's "Special Introduction to the Study of the Old Testament" Pt. 1. Suffice it to mention here that a similar repetition of the principal events narrated is plainly discernible throughout all the historic portions of the Pentateuch, and even of the later books, such as Samuel and Kings, and that the inference drawn from this constant phenomenon is confirmed not only by the difference of style and view-point characteristic of Genesis ii, 5, but also by the divergences and antinomies which they generally exhibit. Be that as it may, it will be pertinent to the purpose of the present article to examine the main features of the twofold Creation narrative with special reference to the origin of man.

I. Chapter I, in which Elohim is represented as creating different categories of beings on successive days. Thus the vegetable kingdom is produced on the third day, and, having set the sun and moon in the firmament of heaven on the fourth, God on the fifth day creates the living things of the water and the fowls of the air which receive a special blessing, with the exclamation, "Let them multiply..." On the sixth day Elohim creates, first, all the living creatures and beasts of the earth; then, in the words of the sacred narrative, "he said: Let us make man to our image and likeness: and let him have dominion over the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the air, and the beasts, and the whole earth, and every creeping creature that moveth upon the earth. And God created man to his own image: to the image of God he created him: male and female he created them." Then follows the blessing accompanied by the command to increase and fill the earth, and finally the vegetable kingdom is assigned to them for food. Considered independently, this account of the Creation is a prologue or proem, as it were, and at the same time the meaning of the word adam, "man," here employed was understood by the writer as designating an individual or the species. Certain indications would seem to favour the latter, e.g. the context, since the creations previously recorded refer doubtless to the production not of an individual or of a pair, but of vast numbers of individuals pertaining to the various species, and the same in case of man might further be inferred from the expression, "male and female he created them." However, another passage (Gen., vi, 1-3), which belongs to the same source as this first narrative and in part repeats it, supplements the information contained in the latter and affords a key to its interpretation. In this passage which contains the last reference of the so-called priestly document to Adam, we read that God "created them male and female; and called their name adam, in the day when they were created." And the writer continues: "And Adam lived an hundred thirty years, and begat a son in his own image and likeness, and called his name Seth. And the days of Adam, after he begot Seth, were eight hundred years, and he begot sons and daughters. And all the time that Adam lived came to nine hundred and thirty years, and he died." Here evidently the adam or man of the Creation narrative is identified with a particular individual, and consequently the plural forms which might otherwise cause doubt are to be understood with reference to the first pair of human beings.

In Genesis, ii, 4b–25 we have what is apparently a new and independent narrative of the Creation, not a mere amplification of the account already given. The writer indeed, without seeming to presuppose anything previously recorded, goes back to the time when there was yet no rain, no plant or beast of the field; and, while the earth is still a barren, lifeless waste, man is formed from the dust by Yahweh, who breathes into him by breath of life. How far these terms are to be interpreted literally or figuratively, and whether the Creation of the first man was direct or indirect, see Genesis, Creation, Man. Thus the creation of man, instead of occupying the last place, as it does in the scaling ascendency of the first account, is placed before the creation of the plants and animals, and these are represented as having been produced subsequently in order to satisfy man's needs. Man is not commissioned to dominate the whole earth, as in the first narrative, but is set to take care of the Garden of Eden with permission to eat of its fruit, except that of the knowledge of good and evil. The formation of woman Eve as a helpmeet for man is represented as an afterthought on the part of Yahweh in recognition of man's inability to find suitable companionship in the brute creation. In the preceding account, after each progressive step "God saw that it was good," but here, as it were, that it is not good for man to be alone, and he proceeds to supply the deficiency by fashioning the woman Eve from the rib of the man while he is in a deep sleep. According to the same narrative, they live in childlike innocence until Eve is tempted by the serpent and they partake of the forbidden fruit. They thereby become conscious of sin, incur the displeasure of Yahweh, and lest they should eat of the tree of life and become immortal, they are expelled from the garden of Eden. Henceforth their lot is to be one of pain and hardship, and man is condemned to the toilsome task of winning his daily sustenance out of the sweat of his brow. The land which on his ascent had been cursed with barrenness. The same document gives us a few details connected with our first parents after the Fall, viz: the birth of Cain and Abel, the fratricide, and the birth of Seth. The other narrative, which seems to know nothing of Cain or Abel, mentions Seth (Chap. v, 3) as if he were the last of the prehuman race or the first man on this planet. Thus in both accounts man is clearly distinguished from, and made dependent upon, God the Creator; yet he is directly connected with Him through the creative act, to the exclusion of all intermediary beings or demi-gods such as are found in the various heathen mythologies. Thus man becomes one of the chosen vessels of the perfection of God's creation is manifest in the first narrative, in that he is created in the image of God, to which corresponds in the other account the equally significant figure of man receiving his life from the breath of Yahweh. That man on the other hand has something in common with the animals is implied in the one case in his creation on the same day, and in the other by his attempt, though ineffectual, to find among them a suitable companion. He is the lord and the crown of creation, as is clearly expressed in the first account, where the creation of man is the climax of God's successive works, and where his supremacy is explicitly stated, but the same is implied no less clearly in the second narrative. Such indeed may be the significance of placing man's creation before that of the animals and plants, but, however that may be, the animals and plants are plainly created for his utility and benefit. Woman is introduced quite suddenly, and subjected to his mastery in the form in which he created her, in the form in which he created her, and the formation of a single woman for a single man implies the doctrine of monogamy. Moreover, man was created innocent and good; sin came to him from without, and it was quickly followed by a severe punishment affecting not only the guilty pair, but their descendants and other beings as well. (Cf. Bennett in Hastings, Dict. of the Bible, s. v.) The two accounts, therefore, are practically at one with regard to didactic purpose and illustration, and it is doubtful to this feature that we should attach their chief significance. It is hardly necessary to remark in passing that the fact of its framing legal and ethical truths here set forth place the biblical narrative immeasurably above the extravagant Creation stories current among the pagan nations of antiquity, though some of these, particularly the Babylonian, bear a more or less striking resemblance to it in form. In the light of this, and the influence of Yahweh pietistic faith, there is no question of the strict historical character of the narrative, as regards the framework and details, becomes of relatively slight importance, especially when we recall that in history as conceived by the other biblical authors, as well as by Semitic writers generally, the presentation and arrangement of the narrative is habitually made subordinate to the exigencies of a didactic preoccupation.
As regards extra-biblical sources which throw light upon the Old Testament narrative, it is well known that the Hebrew account of the Creation finds a parallel in the Babylonian tradition as revealed by the cuneiform writings. It is beyond the scope of the present article to discuss the relations of historical dependence generally admitted to exist between the two traditions. With regard to the origin of man, that though the fragment of the "Creation Epic", which is supposed to contain it, has not been found, there are nevertheless good independent grounds for assuming that it belonged originally to the tradition embodied in the poem, and that it must have occupied a place in the latter just after the fragment giving the account of the plants and the animals, as in the first chapter of Genesis. Among the reasons for this assumption are: (a) the Divine admonitions addressed to men after their creation, towards the end of the poem; (b) the account of Berosus, who mentions the creation of man by one of the gods, who mixed with clay the blood which flowed from the severed head of Tiamat; (c) a non-Semitic (or pre-Semitic) account translated by Pinches from a bilingual text, and in which Mar-duk is said to have made mankind, with the cooperation of the goddess Aruru. (Cf. "Encyclopaedia", "Creation", also Davis, "Genesis and Semitic Tradition", pp. 36-47.) As regards the creation of Eve, no parallel has so far been discovered among the fragmentary records of the Babylonian creation story. That the account, as it stands in Genesis, is not to be taken literally as descriptive of historic fact was the opinion of Origen, of Cajetan, and it is now maintained by such scholars as Hobberg (Die Genesis, Freiburg, 1899, p. 36) and von Hummelauer (Comm. in Genesis, pp. 149 sqq.). These and other writers see in this narrative the record of a vision symbolic of the future and analogous to the one vouchsafed to Abraham (Gen., xv, 12 sqq.), and to St. Peter in Joppa (Acts, x, 10 sqq.). (See Gigot, Special Introduction to the Study of the Old Testament, Pt. I, p. 165, sqq.)

References to Adam as an individual in the later Old Testament books are very few, and they add nothing to the information contained in Genesis. This is well-known at the part of the genealogies at the beginning of 1 Paralipomenon: it is mentioned likewise in Tobias, viii, 8; Osee, vi, 7; Eccles., xxxv, 24, etc. The Hebrew word adam occurs in various other passages, but in the sense of man or mankind. The mention of Adam in Zacharias, xiii, 6, according to the Douay version, in the Vulgate, is due to a mistranslation of the original.

ADAM IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—In the New Testament references to Adam as an historical personage occur only in a few passages. Thus in the third chapter of St. Luke's Gospel the genealogy of the Savior is traced back to "Adam who was of God". This prolongation of the earthly lineage of Jesus beyond Abraham, who forms the starting point in St. Matthew, is doubtless due to the more universal spirit and sympathy characteristic of our third Evangelist, who writes not so much from the viewpoint of Jewish prophecy and expectation as for the instruction of the Gentile converts to Christianity. Another mention of the historic father of the race is found in the Epistle of Jude (verse 14), where a quotation is inserted from the apocryphal Book of Enoch, which, rather strange to say, is attributed to the antediluvian patriarch of that name, the ancestor of "all mankind", by our source-producer, may be more properly references to Adam are found in the Epistles of St. Paul. Thus in 1 Tim., ii, 11-14, the Apostle, after laying down certain practical rules referring to the conduct of women, particularly as regards public worship, and inculcating the duty of subordination to the other sex, makes use of an argument the weight of which rests more upon the logical methods current at the time than upon its intrinsic value as appreciated by the modern mind: "For Adam was first formed; then Eve. And Adam was not seduced; but the woman being seduced, was in the transgression. A similar line of argument is pursued in 1 Cor., xi, 8, 9. Moreover, the doctrine formulated by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans, v, 12-21, and in I Cor., xv, 22-45. In the latter passage Jesus Christ is called by analogy and contrast the new or "last Adam". This is understood in the sense that as the original Adam was the head of all mankind, the father of all according to the flesh, so also Jesus Christ was constituted chief and head of the spiritual family of the elect, and potentially of all mankind, since all are invited to partake of His salvation. Thus the first Adam is a type of the second, but while the former transmits to his progeny a legacy of death, the latter, on the contrary, becomes the vivifying principle of restored righteousness. Christ is the "last Adam" inasmuch as "there is no other name under heaven given to men whereby we must be saved" (Acts, iv, 12); no other chief or father of the race is to be expected. Both the first and the second Adam occupy the position of head of the race towards the race, whereas the first through his disobedience vitiated, as it were, in himself the stirs of the entire race, and left to his posterity an inheritance of death, sin, and misery, the other through his obedience merits for all those who become members a new life of holiness and an everlasting reward. It may be said that the contrast thus formulated expresses a fundamental tenet of the Christian religion and embodies in a nutshell the entire doctrine of the economy of salvation. It is principally on these and passages of similar import (e. g. Matt., xviii, 11) that is based the fundamental doctrine that our first parents were raised by the Creator to a state of supernatural righteousness, the restoration of which was the object of the Incarnation. It need hardly be said that the fact of this elevation could not be so clearly inferred from the Old Testament account taken independently.

ADAM IN JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN TRADITION.—It is a well-known fact that the pious and puerile, are chiefly imaginary, or at best based on a fanciful understanding of some slight detail of the sacred narrative. Needless to say that they do not embody any real historic information, and their chief utility is to afford an example of the pious popular credulity of the times as well as of the slight value to be attached to the so-called Jewish traditions when they are invoked as an argument in critical discussion. Many rabbinical legends concerning our first parents are found in the Talmud, and many others were contained in the apocryphal Book of Adam now lost, but of which extracts have come down to us in other works of a similar character (see MAN). The most important of these legends, which it is not the scope of the present work to reproduce, may be more properly referred to as "Jewish Encyclopedi". I, art. “Ninth hour: Service of the angels who stand before the throne of God.

“Tenth hour: Adoration of men. The gate of heaven opens that the prayer of all that lives may enter in; they prostrate themselves, and then withdraw. At this hour all that man asks of God is granted him, when the Seraphim beat their wings on the cockcrow. This is shown by their frequent allusions to him. His place in the liturgy is, however, by no means a prominent one. His name occurs in the calendar, and in one hymn of the Eastern Church, nor does he fare much better in the Western. The sections which refer to him are the first prophecy of Holy Saturday and the readings of the Book of Genesis at Septuagesima time.

In literature, on the other hand, he is more generously treated, and has become the hero of several books, such as: “The Book of the Penance or Combat of Adam” (Migne, “Dictionnaire des apocryphes”, vol. II); “The Struggle of Adam and Eve which they underwent after being driven out of the Garden, and during their stay in the cave of treasures, by the command of The Lord their Creator”; (Migne, op. cit.). The “Codex Nazaraeus” (ibid.); the “Testament of Adam”; the “Apologetics of Adam”; the “Book of the Daughters of Adam”; the “Penitence of Adam”, etc. also show to what an extent the memory of the first man was made use of in literature.

The “Testament of Adam”, now consisting of merely a few fragments, is of great interest. Its precise place in the history of literature can only be determined after a study of the connexion which exists between it and writings of the same or of an earlier period. The liturgical fragments which have to do with the division of the hours of the day and night make it possible to perceive in what way Persian ideas influenced Gnosticism. Passages may be found in the “Apostolical Constitutions” of the Copts which seem to bear some relation to the ideas contained in the liturgical fragments. The following is a translation of one of them:—

“First fragment. Night hours.

“First hour: This is the hour in which the demon adores, and all the reptiles that are in the sea.

“Second hour: This is the hour in which the fish adore, and all the reptiles that are in the sea.

“Third hour: Adoration of the lower abysses, and of the light that is in the abysses, and of the lower light, which man cannot đạtn.

“Fourth hour: Trisagion of the Seraphim. ‘Before my sin’ saith Adam ‘I heard at this hour, O my son, the noise of their wings in Paradise; for the Seraphim had gone on beating their wings, making a harmonious sound, in the temple set apart for their worship. But after my sin, and the transgression of God’s order, I ceased to hear and see them, even as was just.

“Fifth hour: Adoration of the waters that are above the heavens. ‘At this hour, O my son Seth, we heard, I and the angels, the noise of the great waves, lifting their voice to give glory to God, because of the hidden sign of God which moves them.

“Sixth hour: A gathering of clouds, and great religious awe, which veils the middle of the night.

“Seventh hour: Rest of the powers, and of all natures, while the waters sleep; and at this hour, if they take water, let them be holy, take holy oil therewith, and sign with this oil those who suffer, and do not sleep; they shall be healed.

“Eighth hour: Thanks given to God for the growth of plants and seeds, when the dew of heaven falls upon them.

There is a long and important article on the “Liber Adami” by Sylvestro de Sacy in the “Journal des Savants” for 1819–20. The book condemns continence, and prescribes marriage; allows the eating of the flesh of animals, fish, and birds. The liturgical ritual provided for prayer three times a day: after sunrise, at the seventh hour, and at sunset. The Nazarenes are bound to almsgiving and to preaching, must baptize their children in the Jordan, and choose the first day of the week for the ceremony.

Adam, the Books of—The Book of Adam or “Contradiction of Adam and Eve,” is a romance made up of Oriental fairy tales. It was first translated from the Ethiopic version into German by Dillmann, “Das christliche Adambuch” (Gottingen, 1853), and into English by Malan, “The Book of Adam and Eve” (London, 1882). The “Pénitence d’Adam” or “Testament d’Adam”, is composed of some Syriac fragments translated by Renan (Journal asiatique, 1828, II, pp. 427–469). “The Book of Adam and Eve” has been published in Latin by W. Meyer in the “Treatises of the Royal Bavarian Academy of Sciences”, XIV, 3 (Munich, 1879). To these are added “The Books of the Daughters of Adam”, mentioned in the catalogue of Pope Saint Gelasius IV, 496–496, who identifies it with the “Book of Jubilees” or “Little Genesis”, and also the “Testament of Our First Parents”, cited by Anastasius the Sinaite, LXXXIX, col. 967.

GEORGE J. REID.

Adam of Bremen, a German historian and geographer of the eleventh century. The dates of his birth and death are unknown. He wrote the “Gesta Hammaburgensis Ecclesie Pontificum”, a history of the See of Hamburg and of the Christian missions in the North from A.D. 788 to 1077. It is the chief source of our knowledge concerning the history and ethnography of the Northern regions before the thirteenth century. Little is known of the author’s life; he himself gives us very scanty information. In the preface to his history he merely signs himself by his initial letter. A manuscript of Adam of Bremen, the 24th year of that prelate’s reign. From a passage in the epilogue it would seem that he was at that time still a young man. He was made a canon of the cathedral and mastry schola- rum, “director of schools”. As such, his name is
As for the style in which the work is written, it cannot receive unqualified praise. It is closely modelled on Sallust, whole phrases and sentences from that author being often incorporated in Adam's work. Besides being obscure and difficult, his Latin shows a number of Germanisms, and is not free from positive grammatical errors. Of the manuscripts of the "Gesta" none are older than the thirteenth century, excepting one at Leyden, which, however, is very fragmentary. The best manuscript is at Vienna. The first edition was brought out by Andreas Severinus Velleius (Vedel), at Copenhagen, in 1579. Two subsequent editions were published at Hamburg, in 1586 and 1609 respectively, by Erhard Ländenburg in the second of which the text was revised for the Würtzburg Church; a fourth edition by Joachim Johannes Maderus appeared at Helmstadt in 1670; it is based on the preceding one. The best edition is that of Lappenberg in Pertz "Monum. Germ. Hist. Scriptores" (1846) VII, 287–289, reprinted in P. L., CXLVI, and re-edited by Waits in "Script. rer. Germ." (Hanover, 1876). The best translation is that of J. C. M. Lautrant in "Geschichts-schreiber der deutschen Vorzeit" (Berlin, 1850 ed. by Wattenbach; 2d edition, revised by Wattenbach, Berlin, 1893). ADAM OF FULDA. b. about 1450, d. after 1537, one of the most learned musicians of his age. He was a monk of Franconia, deriving his name from the capital city of that country. At that time the counterpuntal music, of which Josquin was such a brilliant star, flourished above all in the Netherlands. Adam of Fulda, himself a disciple of the Dutch teachers, ultimately became their rival. He is best known for a famous treatise on music, written in 1490, and printed by Gerbert von Hornan, in his "Scriptores eccles. de Mus. Sacra", III. This treatise is divided into forty-five chapters, some of which treat of the conformation and the principles of musical sound, of tone, of keys, of measured and figured music, of tone relations, intervals, consonances, etc. A list of his compositions may be found in the "Quellen-Lexikon". As he called himself musicus dualis, he was probably in the service of some prince, possibly the Bishop of Würzburg.

ADAM OF MURIMUTH, an English chronicler of about the middle of the fourteenth century. He was a canon of St. Paul's, London, and took an active part in the affairs of Church and State during the reigns of Edward II and Edward III. His history of his own times is entitled "Chronicon, sive res gestae sui temporis quibus ipse interfectus, res Romanas Gallica Anglicanis intermixens, 1302–1343" (Cottonian Library MSS.). "Adam of Murimuth continues to be a principal witness for events up to the year 1346, after which the narrative is carried on by his unknown continuator to the year 1380. His statements are for the most part made on good authority, or as the result of personal observation, and the impression we derive is that of one who was an honest and veracious chronicler, although possessed of no descriptive literary power" (Gardiner and Mullinger, "English History for Students" (New York, 1881), 2841.

signed to an official document dated 11 June, 1060. Shortly after his arrival at Bremen he made a journey to the Danish King Svend Estridson (1047–76), who enjoyed a great reputation for his knowledge of the history and geography of the Northern lands. Possibly this meeting took place in Seeland; we have no evidence if Adam ever visited the North in person, as received by the King, or obtained from him much valuable information for the historical work which he intended to write, and which he began after the death of Archbishop Adalbert. The preface is dedicated to Adalbert's successor, Liemar (1072–1101). The work itself, at least in part, was finished before the death of King Svend, and in the record which he made of this king as still living. We do not know how long Adam retained his office. The Church record gives 12 October as the day of his death, but does not mention the year. According to tradition, he lies buried in the convent of Ramesloh, in a grove which he himself had donated to the cloister.

His work is divided into four books, the first three being mainly historical, while the last is purely geographical. The first book gives an account of the Bremen Church, of its first bishops, and of the propagation of Christianity in the North. The second deals with this nation, and also largely with German affairs between 940 and 1045. It relates the wars carried on by the Germans against the Slavs and Scandinavians. The third book is devoted to the deeds of Archbishop Adalbert. The fourth book is a geographical appendix entitled "Descrip[to insularum Aquilonis]", and describes the Northern lands and the islands in the Northern seas, many of which had but recently been explored. It contains the earliest mention of America found in any geographical work. The passage is as follows (IV, 38): "Furthermore he [King Svend] mentioned still another island found by many in that ocean. This island is called Winland, because grape-vines grow there wild, yielding the finest wine. And that crops grow there in plenty without having been sown, I know, not from fabulous report, but through the definite information of the Danes." Adam bases his knowledge partly on written sources, partly on oral communication. He has set down bits of the records and manuscripts in the archives of his church, as well as of the official documents of popes and kings. He also knew the work of preceding chroniclers, such as Einhard and Gregory of Tours. Besides this, he was well versed in the writings of ancient Roman authors. He cites Cicero, Palladius, Lactantius, Juvenal, and others. Coero, Sallust, Orosius, Solinus, and Martianus Capella. He also quotes from the Venerable Bede and the Latin Fathers, Ambrose, Jerome, Gregory the Great. But his most valuable information was obtained orally from persons who had actually visited the lands which he describes. The most notable of these witnesses is the Danish King Svend Estridson, "who remembered all the deeds of the barbarians as if they had been written down" (II, 41). Adam's journey to this king, undertaken for the express purpose of obtaining information, has been mentioned. He also learned much from Archbishop Adalbert himself, who showed great interest in the Northern missions and was well informed about the lands where they were located. Much information was imparted to him also by the traders and missionaries who were continually passing through Bremen, the great centre for all travel to and from the North. He is assured, in repeat observation, that he has taken great pains to make his account both truthful and accurate. "If I have not been able to write well", so he says in his epilogue, "I have at any rate written truthfully, using as authorities those who are best informed about the subject."
Adam of Persigne, a French Cistercian, Abbot of the monastery of Persigne in the Diocese of Mans, b. about the middle of the twelfth century. He is thought to have been first a canon regular, later a Benedictine of Marmoutier and then a Cistercian. About the year 1180 he became Abbot of Persigne, whither his reputation for holiness and wisdom drew the great personages of his time to seek his counsel. He held on a conference with the celebrated mystic, Joachim of Flora in Calabria, Italy, on the subject of the latter's revelations, and sided Foulques de Neuilly in preaching the Fourth Crusade. His letters and sermons were published at Rome in 1662 under the title “Adami Abbatis Persenise Ordinis Cisterciensis Maritae.”

Adam of Saint Victor, a prominent and prolific writer of Latin hymns, b. in the latter part of the twelfth century, probably at Paris; d. in the Abbey of Saint Victor then in the suburbs of Paris but included in it subsequently through the city’s growth, some time between 1172 and 1192. By those more nearly his contemporaries he is styled “Brito” or “Breton.” He was educated in Paris, and entered the Abbey of Saint Victor when quite young, he was presumably French. He lived in the abbey, which was somewhat of a theological centre, until his death. Adam of Saint Victor is the most illustrious exponent of the revival of liturgical poetry which the twelfth century afforded. Archbishop Trench characterizes him as “the foremost among the sacred Latin poets of the Middle Ages.” Of his hymns and sequences some thirty-seven were published in the “Elucidatorium Ecclesiasticum” of Chicocheveus, a Catholic theologian of the sixteenth century. Nearly all of the remaining seventy were preserved in the Abbey of Saint Victor up to the time of its dissolution in the Revolution. They were then transferred to the Bibliothèque Nationale, where they were discovered by Léon Gautier, who edited the first complete edition of them (Paris, 1865). Besides these poems numerous prose works are attributed to Adam of Saint Victor, viz., “Summa Britonii, seu de difficilioribus verbis in Biblia contentis” a dictionary of all the difficult words in the Bible for the use of novices and beginners in the study of the Scriptures; and a sequel to this, “Expositio super omnes proleg.” an historical commentary on the prolegomena of St. Jerome. Fabisius, Pit, and others deny his authorship of these prose works, saying they were written by Guillaume le Breton. Levesque advances some plausible reasons for believing them the work of Adam, while Abbé Lejay declares emphatically that none of the prose works ascribed to him can be regarded with any likelihood as his. Some of his best hymns are “Laudes crucis attolamus,” “Verbi vere substantivi,” and “Stola regni lauraeatus.”

JOHN J. A’ BECKET.

Adam of Usk, an English priest, canonist, and chronicler, b. at Usk, in Monmouthshire, between 1308 and 1318. His death is spoken of as occurring at Oxford, where he obtained his doctorate and became extraordinarius in canon law. He practised in the archiepiscopal court of Canterbury, 1390–97, and in 1399 accompanied the Archbishop and Bolingbroke’s army on the march to Chester. After Richard’s surrender Adam was rewarded with the living of Kemsing and Seal in Kent, and later with a prebend in the church of Bangor. However, he forfeited the King’s favour by the boldness of his criticisms, and was banished to Rome in 1402, where in 1404 and later he was successively nominated to the sees of Hereford and St. David’s, but was unable to obtain possession of either. He left a chronicle of English history from 1377 to 1404, edited by Edward Maunde Thompson for the Royal Society of Literature, as “Chronicon Adam de Usk” (London, 1876).

Adam, John, a distinguished preacher and a strenuous opponent of Calvinists and Jansenists, b. at Limoges in 1608; d. at Bordeaux, 12 May, 1684. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1622. He wrote “The Triumph of the Blessed Eucharist,” “A Week’s Controversy on the Sacrament of the Altar,” “Calvin Defeated by Himself”; “The Tomb of Jansenism; “An Abrigdement of the Life of St. Francis Borgia”; Lenten sermons; some books of devotion; and translations of hymns. His views on St. Augustine brought him into collision with Cardi- nal Joly, and a controversy with Jolain who attacked Father Adam in his “Vindiciae Augustinianiae.” A part of his work assailed is called “the errors, calumnies, and scandalous invective which the Jesuit Father Adam has uttered in a sermon on the second Thursday of Lent, in the Church of St. Paul.”

Adam, Nicholas, linguist and writer, b. in Paris, 1716; d. 1792. He achieved distinction by a peculiar grammar of which he was the author. It bore the title: “La vraie manière d’apprendre une langue quelconque, vivante ou morte, par le moyen de la langue française.” It consisted of five grammars: French, Latin, Italian, German, and English. He published another book which he called “Les quatre chapes”—on reason, self-love, love of our fellow-country, and love of virtue. His books in good and bad Latin, and good and bad French. He has also left many translations of classic works, among them, Pope’s “Essay on Man,” Johnson’s “Rasselas,” Addison’s “Cato,” Young’s “Night Thoughts,” etc. He was a favourite of Choiseul, who sent him as French ambassador to Venice. It is said that he knew all the languages of Europe and possessed a rare gift of communicating his knowledge to others. For many years he had been professor of eloquence at the College of Lisieux.

Adam Scotus (or The Premonstratensian), a theologian and Church historian of the latter part of the twelfth century. He was born either in Scotland or England, and joined the newly-founded order of Saint Norbert. It is also believed that he became Abbot and Bishop of Candida Casa, or Whithorn in Scotland, and died after 1180. His works consist of “Consenones” (P. L., CXCVIII, 91–440); “Libere Ordine, Habitut et Professione Canonici’orum Ordinis Premonstratensis” (Ibid., CXCVIII, 819–910), a work which is said to be the first commentary on the Rule of St. Augustin; “De Tripartito Tabernaculo” (CXC VIII, 609–792); “De Tripli Genere Contemplationis” (CXC VIII, 791–842); “Soliloquiorum de Instruonae animae libri duo” (CXC VIII, 841–872). Adamites, an obscure sect, dating perhaps from the second century, which professors to have regained Adam's primitve innocence. St. Epiphanius and St. Augustine mention the Adamites by name, and describe their practices. They called their church Paradise; they condemned marriage as foreign to Eden, and they stripped themselves naked while engaged in common worship. They could not have been numerous. Various accounts are given of their origin. Some have thought they have been an ophsalt of the Carpocratian Gnostics, who professed a sensual mysticism and a complete emancipation from the moral law. Theodore (Haer. Fab., I, 6) held this view of them, and identified them with the licentious sects whose practices are described by Clement of Alexandria. Others, on the contrary, consider them to have been misguided ascetics, who strove to extinguish carnal desires by a return to simpler manners, and by the abolition of marriage. Practices similar to those just described appeared in Europe several times in later ages. In the thirteenth century they were revived in the Netherlands by the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit, and, in a grosser form, in the fourteenth by the Beghards (q. v.) in Germany. Everywhere they met with firm opposition. The Beghards became the Picards of Bohemia, who took possession of an island in the river Nezarks, and gave themselves a government. Zaloy, a Hussite leader, nearly exterminated the sect in 1421 (cf. Höfler, "Geschichtsquellen Böhmens", I, 414, 431). A brief revival of these doctrines took place in Bohemia after 1751, owing to the edict of toleration issued by Joseph II; these communist Neo-Adamites were suppressed by force in 1849.

FRANCIS P. HAYVE.

Adaman (or Euan), SAINT, Abbot of Iona, b. at Dublin, in County Down, Ireland, c. 624; d. at the Abbey of Iona, in 704. He was educated by the Columban monks of his native place, subsequently becoming a novice at Iona in 650. In 679 he succeeded to the abbacy of Iona, which position he held up to his death. He was also president-general of all the Columban houses in Ireland. During his rule he founded the monastery of Antioch via Hispania in Ireland, of which is memorable for his success in introducing the Roman Psalms observance. On his third visit (697) he assisted at the Synod of Tara, when the Cain Adammain, or Canon of Adamann (ed. Kun Meyer, London, 1905) was adjoined. which freed women and children from the evils inseparable from war, forbidding them to be killed or made captive in times of strife. It is not improbable, as stated in the "Life of St. Gerald" (d. Bishop of Mayo, 752), that Adamnan ruled the abbey of Mayo from 697 until 23 Sept., 704, but in Ireland his memory is inseparably connected with Raphoe, of which he is patron. From a literary point of view Adamnan takes the very highest place as the biographer of St. Columba (Columcille), and as the author of a treatise "De Locis Sanctis". Pinkerton describes his "Vita Columbe" as the most complete piece of biography that all Europe can boast of, not only in the early a period but in the Middle Ages. It was printed by Colgan (from a copy supplied by Father Stephen White, S.J.), and by the Bollandists, but it was left for a nineteenth-century Irish scholar (Dr. Reeves, Protestant Bishop of Down, Conn, and Dromore) to issue, in 1837, the admirable of all existing editions. St. Bede highly praises the tract "De Locis Sanctis", the autograph copy of which was presented by St. Adamnan to King Aedfrid of Northumbria, who had studied in Ireland. The "Four Masters" tells us that he was "tearful, penitent, fond of prayer, diligent and ascetic, and learned in the clear understanding of the Holy Scriptures of God." His feast is celebrated 23 September.

Adams, James, professor of humanities at St. Omers, b. in England in 1737; d. at Dublin, 6 December, 1802. He became a Jesuit at Watten, 7 September, 1756, and worked on the mission in England. He wrote a translation from the French of "Early Rules for Taking a Likeness", by Bono- maci; and was honoured with the thanks of the Royal Society of London, for a treatise on "English Pronunciation, with appendices on various dialects, and an analytical discussion and vindication of Scotch". He composed also a volume of Roman History, and projected a book on a "Tour through the Hebrides" which was never printed.

Adams, John, VENERABLE, priest, martyred at Tyburn, 8 October, 1588. He had been a Protestant minister, but being converted, went to Reims in 1579 where he was ordained priest. He returned to England in March, 1581. Father William War- ford, who knew him personally, described him as a man of "about forty years of age, of average height, with a dark beard, a sprightly look and black eyes. He was a very good controversialist, straightforward, very pious, and pre-eminently a man of hard work. He laboured very strenuously at Winchester and in Hampshire, where he helped many, especially of the poorer classes." Imprisoned in 1584, he was banished with seventy-two other priests in 1585; but having returned was again arrested, and executed, with two others, Ven. John Lowe and Ven. Robert Dibdale.

PATRICK RYAN.

Adana, a diocese of Armenian rite in Asia Minor (Asiatic Turkey). This ancient Phrygian colony of "willows" is situated about nineteen miles from the sea, on the right bank of the Sarus, or Seyhoun, in the heart of Cilicia Campestris. It was once a part of the kingdom of the Seleucide, and after the passing of Antiochus Euphanes it took (171 B. c.) the name of Antioch. It was occupied by Arabs from Emperor Hadrian (117-138) the title of Hadi- riana and from Emperor Maximus that of Maxi- miana. It has some political importance as capital of the vilayet or district. Adana appears in the fourth century as a see subject to the metropolitan of Tarsus and the patriarch of Antioch. In the Middle Ages the Greek hierarchy disappeared, and is now represented in Cilicia by only one prelate who styles himself Metropolitan of Tarsos and Adana, and resides in the latter town. Most of his diocesan singers are foreigners, and come from Cappadocia or the Archipelago. They are much attached to the language of the country, and desire to be under the patriarchate of Constantinople and not of Antioch. They even live in open strife with the latter, since the election (1899) of an Arabic-speaking prelate. In medieval times Adana, deprived of a Greek bishop, had an Armenian one, subject to the Catholicos for the see of Echmiadzin. The first of this line known to history is a certain Stephen, who distinguished himself in 1307 and 1316. Under him a great national Armenian council (the last of its kind), attended by the patriarch and the king, the clergy and the nobility, was held at Adana (1316). Thirty years earlier, in 1286, another Armenian council met for forty days in Adana for the purpose of electing the Catholicos Constantine and to dispose of several other questions. To-day the Armenians of Adana are divided into Gregorians, Catholics, and Protestants. For the Gregorians it is the centre of one of the fourteen or fifteen districts governed by the Catholicos. To him in person the bishops of Adana are responsible. For the Catholics there is an episcopal see at Adana. As regards Protestants, Adana is a mission station of the Central Turkey Mission of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (about 1,000 members). The Reformed Presbyterian Church (U. S. A.) holds it as a mission station attended from Tarsus. There are, moreover, at Adana some Maronite and Syrian merchants and some Europeans employed in various capacities. The total population amounts to about 45,000 inhabitants during the two or three months when the decortications and the curing of the cotton workers are in progress. During the rest of the year the population does not exceed 30,000 inhabitants, viz.: 14,000 Mussulmans, 12,575 Armenians, 3,425 Greeks, and a few others. There are in the town 18 mosques, 37 medresas, and 8 tekkes, 2 Armenian churches, 1 Latin church, 1 Greek church, and 1 Protestant church; 33 Turkish schools of which 28 are elementary schools and one is secondary, 2 Greek schools, 1 Armenian school, 1 Protestant school, and 2 French educational establishments—one for boys directed by the Jesuit Fathers, the other for girls, under the Sisters of St. Joseph of Lyons. The latter includes a day-school and a boarding-school.

Adar.—(1) A frontier town in the South of Chanaan (Num., xxxiv, 4; Jos., xv, 3). It has not been identified. (2) King of Edom, Gen., xxxvi, 39, called Adad (R. V., Hadad), 1 Par., i, 50. (3) The twelfth month of the Jewish year, corresponding approximately to the latter half of February and the first half of March. (4) A Chaldean god. The name is found in the compound word Adrammelech (Adad is King) in IV K., xxvii, 31.

Adda, Ferdinando d', Cardinal and Papal Legate, b. at Milan, 1649; d. at Rome, 1719. He was made Cardinal-Priest in 1690, and in 1715 Cardinal-Bishop of Albano. He was also Prefect of the Congregation of Rites. As Papal Nuncio in London during the reign of James II (1685-88) he was charged by Innocent XII with the delicate task of inducing the English Kings to rescind with Louis XIV (then quite iminical to the Holy See) in favour of the oppressed Protestants of France.

Adda, one of the three original disciples of Manes (q. v.), who according to the Acts of Archelaus introduced the heretical teachings of Manes into Scythia and later went on a similar mission to the East, being also commissioned to collect Christian books. He is called Baddas by Cyril of Jerusalem. Photius refers to a work of his (Biblioth. Cod. 85) entitled "Modion" (Mark, iv, 21) which was refuted by the Synod of Trier. A work against Moses and the Prophets by Addas and Adimantus is also mentioned.

Addas and Mari, Liturgy of. This is an Oriental liturgy, sometimes assigned to the Maronite group because it is written in the Syriac tongue; sometimes to the Persian group because it was used in Mesopotamia and Persia. It is known as the normal liturgy of the Nestorians, but probably it had been in use before the rise of the Nestorian heresy. According to tradition, it was composed by Addes and Mari, who evangelized Edessa, Seleucia-Ctesiphon and the surrounding country. This tradition is based on the narrative contained in the "Doctrine of Addai," a work generally ascribed to the second half of the third century. The account states that King Abgar the Black, having heard of the wonderworks of Christ, sent Addeus (in Syriac, Addai), one of the seventy-two disciples, was sent by St. Thomas to Edessa to cure the king. Addes and his disciple Mari are said to have converted the king and people of Edessa, to have organized the Christian Church there, and to have composed the liturgy which bears their names. There seem to be no documents earlier than the "Doctrine of Addai" to confirm this tradition. Although good historical evidence concerning the beginning of the Monophysite Church of Edessa is wanting, it is quite certain that Christianity was introduced there at a very early date, since towards the end of the second century the king was a Christian, and a bishop (Palouth) of the see was consecrated by Serapion of Antioch (190-205). It was only natural that the Edessans should regard Addes and Mari as the authors of their liturgy, since they already regarded these men as the founders of their Church. The Nestorians attribute the final redaction of the text of the Liturgy of Addas and Mari to their patriarch Jesuayb III, who lived about the turn of the 7th and 8th century. After the condemnation of Nestorianism, the Nestorians retreated into the Persian kingdom, and penetrated even into India and China, founding churches and introducing their liturgy wherever the Syriac language was used. At the present time this liturgy is used chiefly by the Nestorians, who reside for the most part in Kurdistan. It is also used by the Chaldaean Uniates of the same region, but their liturgy has, of course, been purged of all traces of Nestorian tenets. Finally, it is in use among the Chaldaean Uniates of Malabar, but it was very much altered by the Synod of Diamper held in 1599.

Exposition of Prayer. The Liturgy may be divided conveniently into two parts: the Mass of the catechumens, extending as far as the offertory, when the catechumens were dismissed, and the Mass of the faithful, embracing all from the offertory to the end. Or again, it may be divided into the preparation for the sacrifice, as far as the preparation, and the anaphora or formula for consecration corresponding to the Roman canon. "The order of the Liturgy of the Apostles, composed by Mar Addai and Mar Mari, the blessed Apostles" begins with the sign of the cross, after which the verse "Glory to God in the highest" etc. (Luke, ii, 14), the Lord's Prayer, and a prayer for the priest on Sundays and feasts of Our Lord, or a doxology of praise to the Trinity on saints’ days and ferias are read. Psalms are then said, together with the anthem of the sanctuary (variable for Sundays and feasts or Saints’ days) and a prayer of praise and adoration.

The deacon then invites the people “to lift up their voices and glorify the living God,” and they respond by reciting the Triduum. Then the priest says a prayer, likely a blessing or the reading of a passage. Ordinarily two lessons from the Old Testament are read, but during Easter, a verse from the Acts of the Apostles is substituted for the second Old Testament lesson. After an anthem and a prayer the deacon reads the third lesson (the Exhortation), which is taken from the Epistles of St. Paul. The priest prepares for the Gospel by reciting the appropriate prayers and blessing the incense, and after the alleluia is sung he reads the Gospel. This is followed by its proper anthem, the diaconal litany, and a short prayer recited by the priest, after which the deacons invoke the people “to bow their heads for the imposition of hands and receive the blessing” which the priest invokes upon them. The Mass of the catechumens is thus concluded, so the deacons admonish those who have not received baptism to depart, and the Mass of the faithful begins. The priest offers the bread and wine, reciting the prescribed prayers, covers the chalice and paten with a veil, goes down from the altar and begins the anthem of the mysteries. The recital of the Creed at this point is a late addition to the liturgy.

Having entered within the altar, the priest makes the prescribed inclinations to the altar, washes his hands and begins the preparatory prayers for the anaphora. He recites an invitation to prayer corresponding to the Roman Orationes, and then beseeches the Lord not to regard his sins nor those of the people, but in all mercy to account him worthy to celebrate the mysteries of the Body and Blood of Christ and worthy praise and worship the Lord, after which he crosses himself and the people answer “Amen.” At this point on Sundays and feasts of Our Lord the deacon seems to have read the diptychs, called by the Nestorians the “Book of the Living and the Dead.” The kiss of peace is then given, and a prayer to the departed persons in the church.

The anaphora proper begins with the preface. The deacon now invites the people to pray, and the priest recites a secret prayer, lifts the veil from the offerings, blesses the incense, and prays that “the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all now and ever world without end,” and signs the mysteries, and the people answer “Amen.”

The priest then begins the preface with the words: “Lift up your minds.” The preface is followed by the Sanctus and the anamnesis (commemoration of Christ). In present usage the words of institution are here inserted, although they were not included in the connection with the context. He pronounces a short doxology, and signs the mysteries, and the people answer “Amen.”

After the deacon says “Pray in your minds. Peace be with you,” the priest recites quietly the great intercession or oration. The epihotis, or invocation of the Holy Ghost, follows as a foil to the intercession. The priest then says a prayer for peace and one of thanksgiving, and incenses himself and the oblations, reciting the appropriate prayers in the meantime. While the deacon recites a hymn referring to the Eucharist, the priest, taking the Host in his left hand, asks a blessing upon the power of this bread which came down from Heaven (i.e., the Chaldean Union liturgies the words of institution are placed after the first part of this prayer), breaks the Host into two parts, one of which he places on the paten, while with the other he signs the chalice, and after dipping it into the chalice signs the other half of the Host, reciting meanwhile the preparatory prayers for the Host. Together he says a prayer referring to the ceremonies just completed, cleaves with his thumb the Host where it was dipped in the chalice, signs his forehead with his thumb, and recites a prayer of prayer to Christ and to the Trinity. After kissing the altar, he invokes a blessing upon all—“The grace of Our Lord” etc., as quoted above.

While the priest breaks the Host, the deacon invites the people to consider the meaning of these holy mysteries and to have the proper dispositions for receiving them; to forgive the transgressions of others, and then to beseech the Lord to forgive their own offenses. The priest, continuing this idea, introduces the Lord’s Prayer (which all recite) and says a prayer that expands the last two petitions. After a short doxology the priest gives the Chalice to the deacon, blesses the people, and then both distribute Communion. A special anthem is said during this distribution. The priest suggests that the people have received Communion to give thanks, and the priest recites aloud a prayer of thanksgiving and one of petition. Mass is concluded with a blessing pronounced by the priest over the people. The chief characteristic in this, as in the other Nestorian liturgies, is the position of the general intercession or oration. It occurs not after the anamnesis, but in the Syrian liturgies, but immediately before it. It seems to be a continuation of the anaphora. Of minor differences, it might be noted that the Nestorians use one large veil to cover pater and chalice; they use incense at the preface; and they have two fractions of the Host, with each recalling the passion of Christ, the other necessary for the distribution of Communion.

Addis, WILLIAM E. See Dictionaries, CATHOLIC.

Addresses, ECCLESIASTICAL.—It is from Italy that we derive rules as to what is fitting and customary in the matter of ecclesiastical correspondence. These rules the different Catholic nations have adopted with greater or lesser modifications, according to local conditions, resulting in differences which will be here dealt with.

Preliminaries.—Before describing how an address should be written, or how a letter to an ecclesiastical personage should be begun and ended it may be well to say that the paper must always be white, no other colour being allowed. The size and form of stationery considered appropriate is that known in Italy as palombo; it is used by the Roman Congregations, and is so called because it has the watermark of a dove (It., palombo). In other countries the paper used for protocols or ministerial correspondence may be employed, but it should be handmade, as both stronger and more suitable. The ink must always be black; coloured inks are forbidden, first, because they are contrary to traditional usage, and next because they are liable to change, having, for the most part, a basis of aniline or of animal oil; moreover, these inks on being exposed to the light lose colour rapidly and soon make the letter impossible to read. The letter must be written in your Fathers’ writing and not, as business letters are now sometimes written, first on the right hand sheet and then on the left, in inverse order to that of the leaves of a book. This is expressly laid down in an instruction issued by Propaganda when Monsignor Ciasca was secretary, and rests on the necessity of providing for the due order of the archives and for facility of classification. Lastly, it is better not to write on the back of the sheet, as the ink may soak through the paper and make the document less easy to read; in any case, it is a rule of politeness to facilitate the reading of a letter in every possible way. The custom of the use of red wax in a letter was completely done away with; at the present day it is. Many decrees of the Congregation of Rites are written in this way; the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars allow it in the case of documents addressed to them, and other ecclesiastical courts have followed their example. This is used to the Sovereign Pontiff personally must still be written by hand. If the letter be sealed, red wax must be used, any other colour, or even black, being forbidden; but the use of wafers, made to look like seals of red wax, which are gummed on to the envelope, is now tolerated. Moreover, according to the practice of the ecclesiastical chanceries, the seal used should be smaller in proportion to the dignity of the person addressed. In practice, however, it is not easy to follow this rule, since it is not everyone who possesses seals of different sizes.

FORMS OF ADDRESS IN VARIOUS COUNTRIES.—ITALY.

To the Sovereign Pontiff is addressed at the commencement of a letter as “Most Holy Father” (Beatissimo Padre); in the body of the letter as “His Holiness” (Sua o Vostra Santità). It is customary to speak to him always in the third person, and the letter ends with: “Prostrate at the feet of Your Holiness, I have the honour to profuse myself, with the most profound respect, Your Holiness’s most humble servant.” If, instead of a letter, a petition is sent to the Sovereign Pontiff, to be examined by him or by one of the Roman Congregations, it should begin: “Most Holy Father, Prostrate at the feet of Your Holiness, the undersigned N., of the process of N., has the honour to set forth as follows.” and the statement of the request ends with the words: “And may God . . .” (meaning, “May God enrich Your Holiness with His gifts”). If written in Italian the petition ends with the formula, Che della grazia . . ., the beginning of a phrase implying that the favours asked are gratefully received.

After folding the petition lengthways to the paper, the petitioner should write at the top, “To His Holiness, Pope N. . . .”; in the middle, “for the petitioner” (per l'infrascritto oratore), and at the bottom, to the right, “Letter of the undersigned N.” in the act of the address, and all with the transaction of that particular business at the Roman court. In writing to an Italian cardinal, the letter should begin with the words, “Most Reverend Eminence” (Eminenza Rev.ma); if he should be of a princely family, “Most Illustrious and Reverend Eminence”. In the body of the letter itself he should always be addressed in the third person, and as “Your Eminence”, or “His Eminence”, and the letter should end: “Embracing the purple of His Most Reverend Eminence, I am His Eminence’s very humble and obedient servant.” This is an adaptation of the more complicated Italian formula, “Prostrato al bacio della sacra porpora, ho l’onore di confermarmi dell’ Eminentia Vostra Rev’ma dev’amo ed oss’amo servo”. The Cardinal’s address, as written on the envelope, must be repeated at the left-hand lower corner of the first page of the letter, and this must be done in all letters of this kind, being intended to show that there has been no mistake in the address, the letter addressed to the Bishop’s title. The words, “Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Lord”.

The title “Excellency” (Eccellenza), a decree of the Congregatio Ceremonialis, 3 June, 1838, assigns this title to patriarchs, instead of “His Beatitude”, wrongly assumed by them. Traditional usage, in fact, reserves this title to the Sovereign Pontiff, one of the most ancient instances being met with in a letter from St. Jerome to Pope St. Damasus (d. 384), by which practice all reverend persons were addressed. A cardinal’s title is “His Excellency” (Signor Prete), and it is most appropriate to one whose name is to be inscribed in the acts of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. If the writer be a reverend servant, the title of “Most Reverend” (Signor Prete di Corte) is most appropriate, and if the writer be a reverend servant of his, “His Most Reverend Servant” (Signor Prete a Corte, o Signor Prete di Corte). In the case of a reverend servant of the Pope’s, “His Most Reverend Servant in the Holy See” (Signor Prete a Corte, o Signor Prete di Corte). It is at the present day, in the case of all reverend persons, universally used.

Various formulas of respect still occasionally used by Italian politeness may be noted, such as: "All’Ill. [P.D.], Coltoissimo [Colmo] ed Osservississimo [Ossmo], Signor", titles without equivalent in French or English, now very rarely given, even in Rome, and which belong rather to the archaology of ecclesiastical civility.

FRANCE.—The epistolary style of France is more simple. A cardinal should be addressed as "EminencePrefabriónica" (Most Reverend Eminence); not as "Monseigneur le Cardinal", the title "Monseigneur" being below the cardinalatial dignity. Only the kings of France said "Monseigneur le Cardinal", the formula which the Pope uses when speaking to the Pope, is "Votre Seigneurie". The title of "Your Eminence" should never presume to use this form of address, and will evade the difficulty by writing, "Eminence Prefabriónica" at the beginning of a letter, in the body of the letter "Your Eminence" or "His Eminence"; at the end, "I have the honour to be, with profound respect, Your Most Reverend Eminence's very humble and very obedient servant". J'ai l'honneur d'être, avec un profond respect, de Votre Eminence Rêvé, le très humble et très obéissant serviteur. Bishops in France have the title of "Grandeur"; the envelope would, accordingly, be addressed: "A sa Grandeur, Monseigneur N., évêque de ..." and the letter as "Votre Seigneurie". Prelates, vicars-general, and chamberlains should be called "Monseigneur" and, both in the letter itself and at the end, "Votre Seigneurie" ("Your Lordship"), religious, "Reverend Father" or "Very Reverend Father", as the case may be; the words "Paternité" and "Révérence" being but seldom used in France. Benedictines have the title "Dom", so that a religious of that order would be addressed as "The Rev. Father, Dom N. . . .", an abbot as "The Right Rev. [Revme] Father, Dom N., Abbot of — . . .". There are, finally, the titles "Monseigneur le Chanoine" and "Monseigneur le Curé", the latter being used for all parish priests.

SPAIN.—The forms used in Spain are as follows: "Emmo. y Revmo. Sr. Cardenal, Dr. D. N." [Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord Cardinal Doctor (if he have that title) Don N.]. The letter should end with "Your Eminence, etc." the titles "S. M. E. y C." are also used, but are not so familiar as those above. I profess myself, with the deepest respect . . .

The same formula is used in the case of archbishops and bishops, only that the word "Eminence" takes the place of "Emmo. y Revmo." Vicars-general have the title of "Most Illustrious", shortened into "Muy Ilustre", which is also given to canons of the cathedral chapter, and to the canons of the cathedral church. In the letter itself, "Your Lordship" should be used, which is abbreviated into "V. S." (Vuesta Señoría), nor must the academic titles of doctor or licentiate, belonging to the person addressed, be omitted, but they must precede the name, thus: "Sr. Doctor o Licenciado Señor Ll. M. D."

In the case of regulars the rule to be followed is that which has been indicated for Italy. All simple priests have the title of "Don".

GERMANY.—In writing to a cardinal one should address him as "Der hochwürdigsten Herrn Kardinal N." ("To His Eminence the most worthy Lord Cardinal"—Herr, of which Herrn is the accusative, meaning "Lord" or "Master"). In the body of the letter the cardinal should be addressed as "Eminence", and the ending should be "Your Eminence's most humble servant" ("Euer Eminenz's sehr lieben und gehorsamen Gehilfen"). Bishops are addressed by the title of "His Episcopal Grace" (Bischöfliche Gnaden), and his letter should be addressed, "An seine bischöflichen Gnaden den hochwürdigsten Herrn" ("To His Episcopal Grace the most worthy Lord"); in the case of an archbishop, "Erzbischoflichen" (archiepiscopal) is used instead of "Bischöflichen"; in that of a prince bishop, "Fürstbischoflichen". There are several sees in Germany and in Austria whose titulare have the rank of prince-bishops; such are Breslau, Gratz, Gurk, Lavant, Salzburg, and Trent. The letter should end: "Your Episcopal [or Archiepiscopal] Grace's most humble servant". It should be noted that the title of "Eccellenze" belongs only to those to whom it has been granted by the Government, so that it is well to ascertain whether the prelate addressed has obtained it. A prelate di mantelletta should be addressed as "hochwürdigester Herr Pralat" (Most Reverend Lord Prelate). In Germany the title of "Eccellenze" is equivalent to that of the Monsignore given to chamberlains and Papal chaplains; it has, therefore, become customary to address them as "Monsignore" or, if more respect is to be shown them, "An seine Hochwürden, Monsignore" (His High Worthiness, Monsignore). "Hochwürden" is also commonly used in the case of parish priests, the superlative, "hochwürdigster", being applied to canons and great diocesan dignitaries. Letters so addressed should end, "Your High Worthiness's [Euer Hochwürden] very humble servant".

ENGLISH-SPEAKING COUNTRIES.—"The Catholic Directory" (London, 1906) gives the following brief directions for forms of address, which, with the slight exceptions noted, may be safely taken as representing the best custom of the United States, the British Isles, Canada, Australia, and the British colonies in general:

"CARDINALS. His Eminence Cardinal . . . If he is also an Archbishop: His Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of . . .; or His Eminence Cardinal . . ., Archbishop of . . .; [to begin a letter] My Lord Cardinal, or My Lord; Your Eminence.

"ARCHBISHOPS. His Grace the Archbishop of . . .; or The Most Reverend the Archbishop of . . .; My Lord Archbishop, or My Lord; Your Grace.

"BISHOPS. The Lord Bishop of . . .; or The Right Reverend the Bishop of . . .; or His Lordship the Bishop of . . .; My Lord Bishop, or My Lord; Your Lordship. In Ireland, Bishops are usually addressed as The Most Reverend. [In the United States, M. R. is usually given to Bishops.] An Archbishop or Bishop of a Titular See may be addressed, 1. by his title alone, as other Archbishops and Bishops; or 2. by his Christian name and surname, followed by the title of his See, or of any office, such as Vicar Apostolic; and 3. by his personal name, followed by the title of his See, or of any office, such as the Rev. A. B., Archbishop (or Bishop, or Vicar Apostolic) of . . .; or by his surname only, preceded by Archbishop or Bishop, as The Most Rev. A. B. (or the Right Rev. Bishop of . . .). The addi- tion of D.D., or the prefixing of Doctor or Dr., to the names of Catholic Archbishops or Bishops, is not necessary, nor is the use of the prefix Sir, in the United States.

[It is, however, the usual custom in the United States.] When an Archbishop or Bishop is mentioned by his surname, it is better to say Archbishop (or Bishop) . . . than to say Dr. . . .; for the latter title is common to Doctors of all kinds, and does not of itself indicate any sacred dignity.

"VICARS-GENERAL, Provosts, Canons.—1. The Very Rev. A. B. (or, if he is such, Provost, or Canon . . .), V. G.; or The Very Reverend the Vicar-General. 2. The Very Rev. Provost . . . (surname). 3. The Very Rev. Canon . . . (surname); or (Christian name and surname) The Very Rev. A. Canon B. A. B. (for a variety of Domestic Prelates are addressed in English-speaking countries according to rules laid down above under ITALY).—Mitred Abbots. The Right Rev. Abbot . . . (surname). Right Rev. Father.—Provincials. The Very Rev. Father . . .
AELIADE (surname); or the Very Rev. Father Provincial.
Very Rev. Father.—Some others (heads of colleges, etc.) are, at least by courtesy, addressed Reverend; but no general rule can be given.—The title of Father is very commonly given to Secular Priests, as well as to Priests of Religious Orders and Congregations.

Even, however, with these explanations, which might have been developed at greater length, some difficulty may occasionally occur, in which case it is better to make a free use of titles of respect, rather than to run the risk of not using enough, and of thus falling short of what is due and fitting.

Adelaide, the Archdiocese of, has its centre in Adelaide, capital of South Australia. It comprises all the territory of South Australia south of the counties of Victoria and Burra to North-west Bend. The Bishop's House is situated beyond the confines of the county of Flinders. The city of Adelaide forms the boundary of the Archdiocese, with the adjacent islands. Area, 40,320 square miles. South Australia was founded by a chartered company in 1836. It was intended to be a free territory, i.e. non-conforming English Protestant colony. By the treaty and parliaments, were to be excluded. A few Catholics were, however, among the first immigrants. Dr. Ullathorne (Sydney) visited Adelaide in June, 1840. Governor Gawler roughly refused the Government school (commonly used for religious services) "either to the Popish priest to go through his Mass or to the ignorant Catholics to be present at it". A store was left by a generous Protestant, and there the first Mass was celebrated for a congregation of about fifty. The first resident priest was the Rev. William Benson (1844). Adelaide (hitherto part of the Diocese of Sydney) was created an episcopal see in 1843. Its first Bishop was the Right Rev. Francis Murphy, the first prelate consecrated in Australasia. At the census of 1844 there were in South Australia only 1,055 Catholics in a total white population of 17,306. Bishop Murphy had then only one priest, one deacon, and his only church, a small weather-board store which was rented. Three years of hard poverty, broken by a convert's gifts, were followed by four years (1847–51) of State aid for churches and ministers of religion (withdrawn by the first elective parliament in 1852) and by capitation grants to denominational schools (1847–51). The wild exodus to the goldfields of Victoria in 1851 almost emptied Adelaide of its adult male inhabitants. Some of the clergy had to seek missions elsewhere, and the Bishop and the two who remained had, until timely aid from the goldfields arrived, to exist on a total income of 6s. 6d. per week, in a diocese with a debt of £4,000. Four years followed. The Passionists were introduced in 1846; Jesuits, 1848; Sisters of Mercy, 1857; Sisterhood of St. Joseph founded 1867; secular public instruction established 1878; Adelaide created an archdiocesan, and part of its territory formed into the Diocese of Port Augusta, 1887. The Bishop and archbishops of Adelaide have been: Bishops Francis Murphy (1844–58); Patrick B. Geoghegan, O.S.F. (1858–64); Lawrence B. Shiell, O.S.F. (1866–72); Archbishops Christopher A. Reynolds (1873–93); and John O'Reilly, transferred from Port Augusta (1895). Archibishop O'Reilly, who relished his former diocesan debt, kept a fund for aiding, and paying a like service for that of Adelaide. Two gifted scientists of the Archdiocese were Father Hinterlacker, S.J., a skilled naturalist, and Father Julian Tenison Woods, a prolific writer on Australian geology. Statistics (April, 1906). Parochial districts, 27; churches, 73; secular priests, 34; regular priests—11 Jesuit Fathers (14 lay brothers), 4 Dominicans, 5 Passionist Fathers (1 lay brother), 4 Carmelites; Christian and Marist Brothers, 45; nuns (302)—127 Sisters of St. Joseph of the BVM, 61 Sisters of Mercy, 5 Good Samaritans, 4 Loreto; colleges, 2; boarding schools (girls), 8; superior day schools, 16; primary schools, 35; charitable institutions, 9; children in Catholic schools, 4,306; Catholic population (estimate, 1905), 40,400—about one-seventh of total population.

Adelaide, Saint, Abbes, b. in the tenth century; d. at Cologne, 5 February, 1015. She was daughter of Megingoz, Count of Guelders, and when still very young entered the convent of St. Ursula in Cologne, where the Rule of St. Jerome was followed. When her parents founded the convent of Villich, opposite the city of Bonn, on the Rhine, Adelaide became Abbes of this new convent and introduced the Rule of St. Benedict, which appeared stricter to her than that of St. Jerome. The fame of her sanctity and of her gift of working miracles soon attracted the attention of St. Herbert, Archbishop of Cologne, who desired her as abbess of his monastery. Mary's convent at Cologne, to succeed her sister Thalia, who had died. Only a year before the death of Emperor Otto III did Adelaide accept this new dignity. While Abbess of St. Mary's at Cologne, she continued to be Abbess of Villich. She died at her convent in Cologne in the year 1015, but was buried at Villich, where her feast is solemnly celebrated on 5 February, the day of her death.

Adelaide (Adelajdia), Saint, b. 931; d. 16 December, 999, one of the conspicuous characters in the struggle of Otho the Great to obtain the imperial crown from the Roman Pontiffs. She was the daughter of Rudolph, II, King of Burgundy, who was at war with Hugh of Provence for the crown of Italy. The rivals concluded a peace in 933, by which it was stipulated that Adelaide should marry Hugh's son Lothaire. The marriage took place, however, only fourteen years later; Adelaide's mother meantime married Hugh. By this time Berengarius, the Parma, a powerful ecclesiastic, had taken the scene, claiming the Kingdom of Italy for himself. He forced Hugh to abdicate in favour of Lothaire, and is supposed to have afterwards put Lothaire to death by poison. He then proposed to unite Adelaide in marriage with his son, Adalbert. Refusing the offer of Otho, Adelaide was kept in almost solitary captivity, in the Castle of Garda, on the lake of that name. From it she was rescued by a priest named Martin, who dug a subterranean passage, by which she escaped, and remained concealed in the woods, her rescuer supporting her meantime, by the fish he caught in the lake. Soon, however, the noise of Canossa redoubled, and Berengarius, obtaining the news of the rescue, arrived and carried her off to his castle. While this was going on the Italian nobles, weary of Berengarius, had invited Otho to invade Italy. He met with little resistance, and betook himself to Canoessa where he met Adelaide, and married her on Christmas day, 951, at Pavia. This marriage gave Otho no new rights over Italy, but the enthusiasm of the people for Adelaide, whose career had been so romantic, appealed to them and made Otho's work of subjugating the peninsula easy. In Germany she was the idol of her subjects, while her husband lived. During the reign of her son Otho II, her troubles began, chiefly owing to the jealousy of her daughter-in-law, Theophano, and possibly also because of her excessive liberality in her works of charity. It resulted in her withdrawing from fixing her residence at Pavia, but a reconciliation was effected by the Abbot of Cluny, St. Mayeul. The same troubles broke out when her grandson came to the throne, the jealous daughter-in-law being yet unreconciled, and Adelaide was again forced into seclusion. But Theophano dying suddenly, Adelaide was recalled to assume the burden of a Regency. Her administration was characterized by the greatest wisdom. She took no revenge upon her enemies; her court was like a religious house; she multiplied monasteries and churches in the various provinces, and was incessant in her efforts to convert the pagans of the North. In the last year of her reign she undertook a journey to Burgundy to reconcile her nephew Rudolph with his subjects, but died on the way at Seltz, in Alsace. She is not mentioned in the Roman martyrology, but her name appears in several calendars of Germany, and her relics are enshrined in Hanover. St. Odilo of Cluny wrote her life.

Adelham (or Adland), John Placid, a Protestant minister, b. in Wiltshire, who became a Catholic and joined the Benedictines. He was professed at St. Edmund's monastery, at Pavia, in 1562. He was elected Prior of St. Lawrence's monastery, at Dieulouard from 1659 to 1661, and was then sent to England and stationed at Somerset House from 1661 to 1675. Banished that year, he returned to England again and became a victim of the "Popish Plot" of Titus Oates. He was tried and condemned to death merely as a priest, 17 January, 1679. He was then reprieved, and was detained in Newgate Prison, where he died between the years 1681 and 1685.

Adelmann, Bishop of Brescia in the eleventh century. Of unknown parentage and nationality, he was educated at the famous school of Chartres, in France, founded by Fulbert, and was considered one of his favourite scholars. Among his fellow students was Berengarius, to whom, at a later period, he addressed two letters. The second (incomplete) letter (P. L., CXIII, 1289) is a valuable dogmatic exposition of the teaching of the Church on the Blessed Virgin (Epistle Eucharistiae). It is the basis of the Benedictine editors of the "Histoire littérale de la France" call it "one of the finest literary documents of the period". It breathes a tender affection for Berengarius, the friend of the writer's youth. Calvin called him "barbarus, imperitus, et sophista". Adelmann seems to have become Bishop of Brescia in 1056, and to have been an active share in the church-reform movement of the period, especially against the clerical abuses of simony and concubinage.

Adeophagi (adippau =secretly, and f?g?w =I eat), a sect mentioned by the anonymous author known as Prudentianus (P.L., LIII, 612). They pretended that a Christian ought to conceal himself from other men to take his nourishment, imagining that thus he imitated the Prophets, and basing their view on certain passages of Scripture. The author of Prudentianus said this of their error, but Philostorgius intimates that they also rejected the divinity of the Holy Ghost. They seem to have flourished in the latter part of the fourth century.

Adon (ADANE), VICARIATE APOTOLIC OF.-It comprises all Arabia, and is properly known as the Vicariate Apostolic of Arabia and Aden. The present incumbent is the Rt. Rev. Bernardine Thomas Clark. It includes also the islands that depend geographically on Arabia, notably Perim and So-cotra. From 1839 to 1851, it was part of the Vicariate Apostolic of Egypt, when it was united to the African Vicariate of the Gallas of Abyssinia, under the Capuchins. In 1854 a secular priest, Father Sturia, became vicar apostolic. Later the mission was given back to the Capuchins, under the Vicariate Apostolic of Bombay. In 1859 it became an independent mission, and in 1875 it was again united to the African Vicariate. It made an independent Vicariate Apostolic again in 1886, and committed to the care of the Capuchins. The population of Aden, now a strongly fortified place, is about 40,000, Arabs, Somalis, Jews, and Indians, besides the British garrison and officials. The large and important harbour furnishes one of the principal coaling-stations of the British Empire. Being a free port, it has become the chief trading-centre for all the neighbours countries. The Portuguese established 1839, and the site is almost the most southerly on the Arabian coast, "being a peninsula of an irregular oval form, of about fifteen miles in circumference, connected with the mainland by a narrow, sandy isthmus". There are in this Vicariate Apostolic 11 missionary priests; 6 churches and chapels; 6 stations; 2 religious orders of men, and 1 of women; 4 orphanages and 6 elementary schools. The Catholic population is about 1,500.

Adoeudatus, son of St. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, b. 372; d. 388. St. Augustine was not converted to the Faith until he was thirty-two years of age. At seventeen he contracted an illicit relation with a young woman and Adeodatus was born of this union. Augustine, in his delight, named him "Adoeudatus" i.e. the "gift of God". When Augustine went to Rome and, later, to Milan, this young woman and the child went with him, and she and Augustine continued their guilty relations. The young Adeodatus was the pride and hope of his parents, and possessed of an extraordinary mental endowment. Brought up by this natural enthralment, Augustine would not bring himself to break from it; and as the sinful union was an obstacle to his receiving the gift of faith, St. Monica, his mother, desired him to marry the mother of his child, feeling that then his mind would be enlightened by grace. Just as the name of this mother of Adeodatus has never been told, so also there has never been given the reason why she and Augustine did not marry at this juncture, though there was evidently some strong if not insurmountable one. Finally they separated. "She was stronger than I", wrote St. Augustine, "and made her sacrifice with a courage and a generosity which was not strong enough to imitate". She returned to Carthage, whence she had come, and the grace which had led her to sacrifice the object of her affection further impelled her to bury herself in a monastery, where she might alone for the sin which had been the price so long paid for it. She left the brilliant young boy, Adeodatus, answering: "See the wonderful intelligence of his son, Augustin felt a sort of awe. "The grandeur of his mind filled me with a kind of terror," he says himself (De beata vitâ, c. vi). Augustin received baptism at the age of thirty-two from the hands of St. Ambrose, the intimate friend of St. Monica and himself. To augment his joy, Adeodatus, Augustine's lifelong associate, and a number of his closest friends, all became Christians on the same occasion and received baptism together. Monica, Augustine, Adeodatus, who was now fifteen, and a son of Grace, if indeed "the child of my sin", as Augustine had styled him in the bitterness of self-reproach and contrition, together with the loyal Alypius, dwelt together in a villa at Cassicum, near Milan. The many conversations and investigations into holy questions and truths made it a Christian Academy, of more exalted philosophy than Plato's. Adeodatus had further care in many of his learned discussions. He appears as interlocutor in his father's treatise "De beata vitâ" (queer ille minimus omnium, that boy, the youngest of them all), and contributed largely to the treatise "De Magistro", written two years later. He appears to have died soon after, in his sixteenth year. (See Augustine, St.).

Adae Fideles.—A hymn used at Benediction at Christmastide in France and England since the close of the eighteenth century. It was sung at the Portuguese Legation in London as early as 1797. The most popular musical setting was ascribed by Vincent Novello, organist, there, to John Reading, who was organist at Winchester Cathedral from 1675-81, and later at Winchester College. The hymn itself has been attributed to St. Bonaventure, but is not found among his works. It is probably of French or German authorship. It invites all the faithful to come to Bethlehem to worship the newborn Saviour.

Adoration (Lat. adjure, to swear; to affirm by oath), an urgent demand upon another to do something, or to desist from doing something, which demand is rendered more solemn and more irresistible by coupling with it the name of God or of some sacred person or thing. Such, too, was the primitive use of the word. In its theological acceptance, however, adoration never carries with it the idea of an oath, or the calling upon God to witness to the truth of what is asserted. Adoration is rather an earnest appeal, or a most stringent command requiring another to act, or not to act, under pain of divine visitation or the rupture of the sacred ties of reverence and love. Thus, when Christ was silent in the house of Jairus, answering: "See" the wonderful intelligence of his son, Augustin felt a sort of awe. "The grandeur of his mind filled me with a kind of terror," he says himself (De beata vitâ, c. vi). come from Solomon, "attempted to invoke over them that had evil spirits, the name of the Lord Jesus, saying: 'I conjure you by Jesus, whom Paul preaches,'" they were leaped upon and overcome by those possessed, in such sort that they found it convenient "to flee out of that house, naked and wounded." In adorning the demon one may bid him depart in the name of Jesus in such a manner that his voice and piety may suggest; or he may drive him forth by the formal and fixed prayers of the Church. The first manner, which is free to all Christians, is called private adjuration. The second, which is reserved to the ministers of the Church alone, is called solemn. Solemn adjuration or exorcism are the affairs of the Church and the latter corresponds to the Greek ἐξορκίζω. It properly means an expelling of the evil one. In the Roman Ritual there are many forms of solemn adjuration. These are to be found, notably, in the ceremony of baptism. One is pronounced over the water, another over the salt, while many are pronounced over the child. Manifold and solemn as are the adjurations pronounced over the catechumen in baptism, those uttered over the possessed are more numerous and, if possible, more solemn. This ceremony, with its rubrics, takes up thirty pages of the Roman Ritual. It is, however, but rarely used, and never with the permission of the bishop as it is similar to there is no room for no deft of deception and hallucination when it is question of dealing with the unseem powers. Administrator.—The term Administrator in its general sense signifies a person who administers some common affairs, for a longer or shorter period, not in his own name or in his own capacity, but in that of another, by special jurisdiction attached to a certain office, but in the name and by the authority of a superior officer by whom he is delegated. In this sense vicars-, and prefects- apostolic, vicars-capitular and even vicars-general are sometimes classed as administrators. In the stricter sense, however, this term is applied by modern writers to a person, usually a cleric and hardly a layman, to whom the provision administration of certain ecclesiastical affairs is entrusted by special papal or episcopal appointment. Although in itself delegated, the power of an administrator may be quasi-ordinary with the right of subdelegation. It usually depends on the special tenor of his commission. His jurisdiction may extend to temporalities only, or to spiritual matters exclusively, or it may comprise both. There are three kinds of administrators who deserve special mention: (1) Administrators of dioceses; (2) Administrators of parishes; (3) Administrators of ecclesiastical institutions.

1. Administrators of dioceses. Inasmuch as these administrators are appointed only by the Apostolic See, the title of Administrator Apostolic applies principally to clergymen, bishops, or priests, who are appointed directly by the Holy See, with episcopal jurisdiction to administer the affairs, temporal or spiritual, or both, of a diocese. Their power is very nearly the same as that of vicars-, and prefects- apostolic. A provisor is in fact simply an administrator apostolic. Unless it be otherwise stated in the brief of appointment, the administrator apostolic has full episcopal jurisdiction, although in his exercise he is bound by the same laws as he is when he himself is bishop. Thus, for instance, in the United States the administrator of the diocese is bound to take the advice or to get the consent of the diocesan consultors, in the same manner as the bishop (III Pl. C. Balt., n. 22). For the event of his death, the administrator apostolic may designate in advance his own successor. His support must come from the diocese which he administers, unless otherwise provided for. While the jurisdiction of the administrator apostolic is similar to that of the bishop, yet his honorary rights are greatly limited. Even if he has episcopal orders, he cannot use the throne, nor the seventh candle, nor the episcopal zucchetto, nor the ring of the bishop, nor the crozier. His name is not mentioned in the canon, nor is the anniversary of his consecration commemorated. Administrators apostolic may be appointed in two cases: (a) Sede implevit; that is, when the bishop of the diocese is unable any longer to administer. Other reasons for administering, i.e. through infirmity, insanity, imprisonment, banishment, or because of excommunication or suspension. In this case the jurisdiction of the administrator, though he were a simple priest, is the same as that of the bishop, who can no longer interfere in the affairs of the diocese. On the death of the bishop the administrator remains in office until recalled by Rome, or until the new bishop takes charge of the diocese; (b) Sede vacante, when a diocese which has no cathedral chapter becomes vacant by the resignation, or the removal, or the death of its bishop. Where there is a cathedral chapter it will in those cases elect a vicar-capitular to administer the diocese. Otherwise an administrator must be chosen or appointed who will provisionally administer the diocese until confirmed by the Holy See. In missionary countries the bishop or vicar-apostolic may himself designate the future administrator of the diocese or vicariate. If he neglects to do so, after his death an administrator is appointed by the nearest bishop or vicar-apostolic, or, in the United States, by the metropolitan and in his absence by the senior bishop of the province. In China and East India, if no provision for a provisor is made by the vicar-apostolic, the priest longest in the mission becomes administrator of the apostolic vicariate. In case of doubt or other difficulties, the decision rests with the nearest vicar-apostolic. When a diocese becomes vacant by the resignation of the bishop, he may be appointed by Rome administrator of the same diocese until his successor take possession of it. When a diocese is divided, the bishop may become administrator of the new diocese, if the administrator to the new diocese, become administrator of the old one, until a bishop is appointed for the vacant see.

(2) Administrators of parishes—sometimes called parish vicars, curates, or coadjutors. They may be appointed for the same reasons as an administrator apostolic, namely, for the temporal lifetime of the rector or pastor who has become unfit for the administration of the parish, or during his absence for a longer period. Such an administrator is usually appointed by the bishop of the diocese, with full jurisdiction over parish affairs and with a sufficient revenue for his support, which according to circumstances may be derived from the parish, or from the pastor, or from both. His office and jurisdiction cease either by recall or by appointment of a new pastor. In the United States, when an irremovable rector of a parish makes an appeal against his removal by the bishop, the bishop must appoint an administrator apostolic who until the appeal is decided by the higher authority (III Pl. C. Balt., n. 286). Among these parish administrators may be classed the so-called perpetual or permanent curates of parishes which are under the jurisdiction of some convent or monastery, and of which the rector or curate is appointed not by the bishop of the diocese but by the superior of such convent. The case is far more frequent in Europe than in America. The charge of the parish is considered to be with the monastery, and the curate is merely the administrator of the parish for the convent.
authority of the parish priest is circumscribed by the general authority of the bishop and by special enactments which prevent him from taking any important step without the express written permission of the ordinary.

In many places laymen are called to part in the care of church property, sometimes in recognition of particular acts of generosity, more often because their co-operation with the parish priest will be beneficial on account of their experience in temporal matters. Although the origin of the modern fabrica, or board of laymen, is lost in the fourteenth and by others in the sixteenth century, the intervention of laymen really goes back to very early times, since we find it referred to in councils of the seventh century. Lay administrators remain completely subject to the bishop in the same manner as the parish priest. The difficulties caused by the legal pretensions of trustees in the United States during the early part of the last century evoked from the Holy See a reiteration of the doctrine of the Church regarding diocesan and parish administration, notably in a brief of Gregory XVI (12 August, 1841) wherein the Pope declared anew that the right of intervene by means of his primary of laymen belongs by the constitutional law of the Church exclusively to the hierarchy, yet she often allows laymen to take part in the administration of her temporalities.

Administrator (of Ecclesiastical Property), one charged with the care of church property. Supreme administrative authority in regard to all ecclesiastical temporalities resides in the Sovereign Pontiff, in virtue of his primary of jurisdiction. The pope's power in this connection is solely administrative, as he cannot be said properly to be the owner of goods belonging either to the universal Church or to particular churches. Pontifical administrative authority is exercised principally through the Propaganda, the Fabrica of St. Peter, the Camera Apostolica, the Cardinal Camerlengo, and finds frequent recognition and expression in the decrees of councils held throughout the world. In each diocese the administration of property belongs primarily to the bishop, subject to the superior authority of the Holy See. From the very beginning of the Church, the episcopate has been a part of the episcopal office (can. 37, Can. Apost., Lib. II, cap. XXV, XXVII, XXXV, Const. Apos.). On him all inferior administrators depend, unless they have secured an exemption by law, as in the case of religious orders. Therefore, if an arrangement exists by which the administration of certain diocesan or parish property is entrusted to some members of the clergy or to laymen, the discipline of the Church, nevertheless, maintains the bishop in supreme control with the right to direct and modify, if need be, the action taken by subordinate administrators. One of the important duties of the administrator is the management of the moneys and goods belonging to his church. The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, Tit. IX, Cap. iii, gives detailed regulations concerning the manner in which a rector is to acquire himself of this obligation. Among other things, it is required that he shall keep an accurate record of receipts and expenditures, that he shall prepare an inventory containing a list of all things belonging to the church, of its income and financial obligations; that one copy of this inventory shall be deposited in the archives of the parish and another in the diocesan archives; that every year necessary changes shall be made in this inventory and signed to the chancellor. The Administrations, Canonical, a preliminary means used by the Church towards a suspected person, as a preventive of harm or a remedy of evil. In the Instruction emanating from the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars to the bishops of Italy, and giving them the privilege to use a summary procedure in trials of the clergy for criminal or disciplinary transgressions, Article IV decrees: "Among the preservative measures are chiefly to be reckoned the spiritual admonition, administrations, according to the rubric VI: "The canonical admonitions may be made in a paternal and private manner (even by letter or by an intermediary person), or in legal form, but always in such a way that proof of their having been made shall remain on record." These admonitions are to be founded upon a suspicion of guilt excited by public rumours, and after an investigation to be made by one having due authority, with the result of establishing a reasonable basis for the suspicion. Upon slandering foundation the superior should not even admonish, unless the suspected person has given on previous occasions serious motive for fault-finding. Admonitions may be either personal or legal (ecclesiastical). If the means are such as to produce a serious likelihood, or half-proof, they will suffice for a paternal admonition, which is administered after the following manner: The prelate either personally or through a confidential delegate informs the suspected person of what is known about him, without mentioning the source of information, and without threat, but urges amendment. If the party suspected can at once show that there is no basis for suspicion, nothing further is to be done in the matter. If his denial does not banish the doubts about him, the prelate should try by persuasion, exhortation, and beseechings to induce him to avoid whatever may be a near occasion of wrong, and to repair the harm or scandal given. If this is not effective, the prelate may begin the judicial procedure. If the proofs at hand are inadequate, this is not advisable; he should rather be content with watchfulness, and with using negative powers, such as withholding special office, where no slur could be manifest on the suspect's reputation, by withholding those before held. If the suspect does not answer to the summons, the prelate's suspicion reasonably increases, and he should then depute a reliable person to seek an interview with him, and to report to him the result. If he should refuse to deal with the delegate, the latter in the name of the delegating prelate should through another or by letter send a second and a third peremptory call, and give proof of the further refusal, with evidence that the summons has been received; now the suspect is presumed guilty. Thus the case is referred for the present to the abbot, or legal admonition. The assumed half-proof is strengthened, first, by the contumacy of the suspect; secondly, by his confession of the charge in question. An accusation issuing from a reliable person, as also a prevalent evil reputation, may supply for the defect of proof needed for indictment. For the paternal admonition it is enough that this evil reputation should be spread among less responsible persons, but for the legal admonition the evil reputation should emanate from serious and reliable persons. The legal admonition is to a great extent akin to the summons to judgment. It is always desirable for the first step of the Church, the prelate, to see that the prelate should arrange the matter quietly and amicably. Hence he should, by letter or through a delegate whose authority is made known, summon the suspect, informing him that a serious charge has been made against him. The summons, if not responded to, should be made a second and a third time. If contumacious, the suspect gives ample ground for an indictment. If there be any urgency in the case, one peremptory summons, declaring it to take the place of the three, will suffice. The prelate may still feel that he has not enough evidence to purge himself of the suspicion or accusation by his oath and the attestation of two or more reliable persons that they are persuaded of his innocence and that they trust his word. If he cannot find such vouchers for his innocence, and yet there be no strictly legal proof of his guilt (though the evidence is strong), he may follow the legal admonition by a special precept or command, according to the character of the suspected delinquency. The infringement of this precept will entail the right to inflict the penalty which should be mentioned at the time the command is given. This must be done by the prelate or his delegate in a formal legal way before two witnesses and the notary of his curia, be signed by them, and by the suspect if he so desires. The paternal admonition is to be kept secret; the legal admonition is a recognized part of the "acts" for future procedure.

Admont, a Benedictine abbey in Styria, Austria-Hungary, on the river Enns, about fifty miles south of Linz. St. Hemma, Countess of Freiessach and Zelteschach, is regarded as its foundress, for upon her death the convent at Gurk was founded for the building of a monastery near the salt works of Hall. The foundation, however, was not begun until 1072, more than a quarter of a century after the Saint's death, and two years later the abbey church was consecrated by Gebhard von Helfenstein, Archbishop of Salzburg, in honour of St. Blasius. This prelate also brought twelve Benedictines from Salzburg as a nucleus for the new community. During the first century of its existence, Admont rose into prominence particularly under the Abbots Wolfgold and Gottfried of Venningen; the former founded a school for the education of girls of noble families, while under the latter, in 1313, Abbots of thirteen other monasteries were elected by the chosen abbots of other monasteries. A period of decline followed after the middle of the thirteenth century, when war and rapine did much injury. A new era opened under Abbot Henry VII (1275-97), and the work of restoration was completed by Engelbert (1297-1321). The abbey suffered again in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries from the inroads of the Turks and the prevailing social disturbances, and the Reformation made itself felt within the cloister. The Abbot Valentine was even forced to resign on account of his leaning towards the new doctrines. With the return of more peaceful times, the educational work of the abbey extended and a faculty of philosophy and theology was added to the gymnasium, of which the cloister school had been the germ. The gymnasium, however, was afterwards transferred to Leoben and later to Judenburg, when it became independent of Admont. In 1565 the abbey and church were burnt, but yet the great work was not in fact ended. The first abbots was Isingrin. Not a few of his successors were men of great learning and zeal, and under their guidance Admont became an important factor in the history of Styria. The second abbots, Engelbert, introduced the reform of Cluny. Engelbert was the author of a number of important theological. Albert von Muchar, who taught at the University of Graz, and is known for his historical works, may also be mentioned.

Ado of Vienne, SAINT, born about 800, in the diocese of Sens; d. 16 December, 875. He was brought up at the Benedictine Abbey of Ferrières, and had as one of his masters the Abbot Lupus Servatus, one of the most celebrated humanists of those times. By his brilliant talents and assiduous application Ado gained the esteem of his masters and schoolmates, while his ready obedience, deep humility, and sincere piety foreshadowed his future holiness. Though urged on all sides to enter upon a career in the secular world, to which (as he said) his talent and his intellectual abilities entitled him, he consecrated himself entirely to God by taking the Benedictine habit at Ferrières. When Markward, a monk of Ferrières, became Abbot of Prüm near Trier, he applied to Ado to teach the sacred sciences there. His request was granted. Soon, however, certain envious monks of Prüm conceived an implacable hatred against Ado, and upon the death of Markward, turned him out of their monastery. With the permission of his abbot, Ado now made a pilgrimage to Rome, where he remained for a few years. He then went to Ravenna, where he discovered an old Roman martyrology which served as the basis for his own renowned martyrology published in 858, which is generally known as the "Martyrology of Ado". At Lyons he was received with open arms by the Archbishop, St. Remigius, who, with the consent of the Archbishop of Paris, appointed him Bishop, and established the see of Lyons. Besides the "Martyrology" mentioned above Ado wrote a chronicle from the beginning of the world to A.D. 874. "Chronicon de VI etatibus mundi", and the lives of St. Desiderius and St. Theoderius. Ado's name is in the Roman martyrology and at Viterbo, where it is celebrated on 16 December, the day of his death.

Adonai (אֲדוֹנָ֑י), lord, ruler, is a name bestowed upon God in the Old Testament. It is retained in the Vulgate and its dependent versions, Exod., vi, 3; Judith, xvi, 16. No other name applied to God is more definite and more easily understood than this. Etymologically it is the plural of Adon, with the suffix of the possessive pronoun, first person, singular number. This plural has been subjected to various explanations. It may be looked upon as a plural absolute, but it would indicate the presence of divine sway and point to God as the Lord of lords. This explanation has the endorsement of Hebrew grammarians, who distinguish a plurale virium, or virtutum. Others prefer to designate this form as plurale excellentis, magnitudinis, or plurale majestatis. A form of politeness, such as the German Sie für du, or French vous für tu is certainly not warranted by Hebrew usage. The possessive pronoun has no more significance in this word than it has in Rabbi (my master), Monsieur, or Madonna. Adonai is also the perpetual substitute for the ineffable Name Yahweh, in which it lends its vowel signs. Whenever, therefore, the word Yahweh occurs in the text, the Jew will read Adonai.

Adonias, Hebrew: 'Adoniyyah', 'Adoniyahu, Yahweh is Lord; Septuagint: 'Adonias'. I. Adonias, the fourth son of King David, was born in Hebron during his father's sojourn in that city (II Kings, i, 5; 1 Paralip., iii, 1, 2). Nothing is known of his mother, Haggith, except her name. Nothing is known, likewise, of Adonias himself until the last days of his father's reign, when he apparently appears as a competitor for the throne. He was then thirty-five years old, and of comely appearance (III Kings, i, 6). Since the death of Absalom he ranked next in succession to the throne in the order of birth, and as the prospect of his father's death was now growing near, he not unnaturally cherished the hope of securing the throne. His younger son of David, Solomon, however, stood in the way of his ambition. The aged monarch had determined to appoint as his successor this son of Bethsheba, in preference to Adonias, and the latter was well aware of the fact. Yet, relying on his father's past indulgence, and still more on his present weakness, he set out to fly the throne. Solomon, without, however, arousing any serious opposition. At first he simply set up a quasi-royal state, with chariots, horses, and fifty running footmen. As this open profession of his ambition did not meet with a rebuke from the too indulgent King, he proceeded a step farther. He now strove to win to his cause the heads of the military and the religious forces of the nation, and was again successful in his attempt. Joab, David's oldest and bravest general, and Abiathar, the ablest and most influential high-priest in David's reign, agreed to side with him. It was only then that, surrounded by a powerful army, he ventured to take the last step towards the throne. He boldly invited to a great banquet in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem all his adherents and all his brothers, except of course Solomon, to have himself proclaimed king. The sacrificial feast took place near the fountain Rohi, southeast of the Holy City, and nothing seemed to pressage full success. It is plain, however, that Adonias had misconceived the public feeling and over-estimated the strength of his position. He had formidable opponents in the prophet Nathan, the high priest Sadoc, and Banaias, the valiant head of the veteran body-guard; and in going away from Jerusalem he had left himself subject to their united influences. Quick to seize the opportunity, Nathan prevailed upon Bethsheba to remind David of his promise to nominate Solomon as his successor, and to acquaint him with Adonias's latest proceedings. During her interview with the aged ruler Nathan himself entered, confirmed Bethsheba's report, and obtained for her David's solemn reassertion that Solomon should be king. Acting with a surprising vigour, David summoned at once to his presence Sadoc, Nathan, and Banaias, and bade them take Solomon upon the royal mule to Gihon (probably "the pool of Gihon"), and there to anoint and proclaim the son of Bethsheba as his successor. His orders were promptly complied with; the anointed Solomon returned to Jerusalem amidst the enthusiastic cheers of the people, and took solemn possession of the throne.

Meanwhile, Adonias' banquet had quietly proceeded to its end, and his guests were about to proclaim him king, when a blare of trumpets sounded in their ears, causing Joab to wonder what it might mean. Suddenly, Jonathan, Abiathar's son, entered and gave a detailed account of all that had been done in Gihon and in the Holy City. Whereupon he and the conspirators took to flight. To secure immunity, Adonias fled to the altar of holocausts, raised by his father on Mount Moria, and clung to its horns, acknowledging Solomon's royal dignity, and begging for the new king's oath that his life should be spared. Solomon simply pledged his word that Adonias should suffer no hurt, provided that he should henceforth render him homage. Adonias was indeed a magnanimous promise on the part of Solomon, for in the East Adonias's attempt to seize the throne was punishable with death. Thus conditionally pardoned, Adonias left the altar, did obeisance to the new monarch, and withdrew safely home (III Kings, i, 5-8).

It might be naturally expected that after this Adoption.

Adoption, Canonical.—In a legal sense, adoption is an act by which a person, with the co-operation of the public authority, selects for his child one who does not belong to him. Adoption was the name given to the adoption of one already of full age (sui juris); datio in adoptionem, when one was given in adoption by one having control or power over him. The adoption was full (plena) if the adopting father was a relative in an ascending scale (collaterally, one degree) of the adoptee, or if there was no such natural tie. Perfect adoption placed the adopted under the control of the adopter, whose name was taken, and the adopted was made necessary heir. The adoption was less perfect which constituted the adopted necessary heir, in case the adopter should die without a will. The rule was that a man, not a woman, could adopt; that the adopter should be at least 18 years older than the adopted; that the adopter should be of full age, and older than 25 years. In Athens the power of adoption was allowed to all citizens of sound mind. Adoption was very frequent among the Greeks and Romans, and the custom was very strong. The Church made its own the Roman law of adoption, with its legal consequences. Pope Nicholas I (858–867) spoke of this law as venerable, when inculting its observance upon the Bulgarians. Hence adoption, under the title cognatio legata, or "legal kinship," by recognition by the Church as a diriment impediment of marriage. This legal relationship sprang from its resemblance to the natural relationship (and made a bar to marriage): 1st civil paternity between the adopter and the adopted, and the latter's legitimate natural children, even after the dissolution of the adoption; 2nd civil brotherhood between the adopted and the legitimate natural children of the adopter, until the adoption was dissolved, or the natural children were placed under their own control (sui juris); 3rd affinity arising from the tie of adoption between the adopted and the adopter's wife, and between the adopter and the adopted's wife. This was not removed by the dissolution of the adoption. The Church recognized in the intimacy consequent upon these legal relations ample grounds for placing a bar on the hope of marriage, out of respect for public propriety, and to safeguard the morals of those brought into such close relations. The Code of Justinian modified the older Roman law by determining that the relations created from the natural parentage were not lost by adoption by a stranger. This gave rise to another distinction between perfect and imperfect adoption. But as the modification of Justinian made no change in the customary intimacy brought about by the adoption, so the Church at no time expressly recognized any distinction between the perfect and less perfect adoption as a bar to marriage. There arose, however, among canonists a controversy on this subject, some contending that only the perfect adoption was a diriment impediment to marriage. Benedict XIV (1740–1758) and Pius VI (1775–1823) held sway, and hence flows the consequent doubt, at times, whether this diriment impediment of legal relationship still exists in the eyes of the Church. Wherever the substantial elements of the Roman law are retained in the new codes, the Church recognizes this relationship as a diriment impediment in accord with the principles of the Code of Justinian and Canon Law. This is thoroughly recognized by the Congregation of the Holy Office in its positive decision with regard to the Code of the Neapolitan Kingdom (28 February, 1853). In Great Britain and the United States legal adoption, in the sense of the Roman law, is not recognized. Adoption is regulated in the United States by State statutes; generally it is accomplished by mutual obligations assumed in the manner prescribed by law. It is the custom in Texas, for example, to have the certificate of adoption issued by the proper public officers, as in New Jersey. In such cases the relation of parent and child is established; but the main purpose is to entitle the adopted to the rights and privileges of a legal heir. Adoption, or contract by private authority, or under private arrangements, is not recognized in the Church of England for a legal relationship. The Congregation of the Holy Office (16 April, 1761) had occasion to make this declaration with regard to it, as customary among the Bulgarians. Hence, generally in the United States adoption is not a diriment impediment to marriage, nor in the eyes of the Church in any way preventive of it. A different view is taken by the Roman Congregations of the Holy Office and of the Sacred Penitentiary of adoption as recognized in other countries which have retained the substantial elements of the Roman law establishing this relationship. The French Code (art. 383) decides that the adoption with which this relation with the child is made preserves all his rights, but it enforces the prohibitions of marriage as in the Roman law. Hence the Congregation of the Penitentiary decided (17 May, 1825) that if the adoption took place in accordance with the French law, it involved the canonical diriment impediment of marriage. In Germany, by the new law taking effect in 1900, there is prescribed the procedure by which adoption is effected, and by which the adopted passes into the family of the adopter, losing the rights coming from his natural family. In Germany, however, many subtle distinctions have been engrained upon this adoption. The restrictions of the relationship by the German law are not, however, accepted by the Church. When adoption is in accord with the substantial elements of the Roman law, as in the case of the German code, in the eyes of the Church it carries with it all the restrictions in the matter of marriage accepted by the Church. When the Roman law is in force, the wife of the adopter is not united by affinity to the adopted, nor the adopter to the adopter's wife. But the Church still recognizes this affinity to hold even in Germany. The Austrian Code has almost the same prescriptions as the German. When there is a reasonable doubt or difference of opinion among canonists on the relationship, the safe rule is to ask for a dispensation. In the Province of Quebec, a few years ago, an attempt was made to introduce into the Civil Code the almost identical principles of the Napoleonic Code for adoption, but the proposal was rejected by the Chamber. The Church authorities in Canada do not recognize that any impediment to marriage arises from whatever private arrangements of adoption may be there recognized.

R. L. BURSELL.

Adoption, Supernatural.—(Lat. adoptare, to choose.) Adoption is the gratuitous taking of a stranger as one's own child and heir. According as the adopter is man or god, the adoption is styled human or divine, natural or supernatural. In the present instance there is question only of the divine, that adoption of man by God in virtue of which we become His sons and heirs. Is this adoption only a figurative way of speaking? Is there substantial authority to vouch for its reality? What idea are we to form of its nature and constituents? A careful consideration of the presentation of Holy Scripture, of the teachings of Christian tradition, and of the theories set forth by theologians relative to our humanized sonship, will lead to an answer.

The Old Testament, which St. Paul aptly compares to the state of childhood and bondage, contains no text that would point conclusively to our adoption. There were indeed saints in the days of the Old Law, and if there were saints there were also adopted children of God, declaring the effects of the same habitual grace. But as the Old Law did not possess the virtue of giving that grace, neither did it contain a clear intimation of supernatural adoption. Such sayings as those of Exodus (iv, 22), "Israel is my son, my firstborn," and Rom. (ix, 4), "Israelites to whom belongs the adoption as of children," are not to be applied to any individual soul, for they were spoken of God's chosen people taken collectively. It is in the New Testament, which marks the fullness of time and the advent of the Redeemer, that we must search for the revelation of that new sonship (I Cor. [iii], 1). "Son of God" is an expression of no infrequent use in the Synoptic Gospels, and as therein employed, the words apply both to Jesus and to ourselves. But whether, in the case of Jesus, this phrase points to Messiaship only, or would also include the idea of his divine filiation, is a matter of little consequence in our particular case. Surely in our case it cannot of itself afford us a sufficiently stable foundation on which to establish a valid claim to adopted sonship. A matter of fact, when St. Matthew (v, 9, 45) speaks of the "children of God," he means the peacemakers, and when he speaks of "children of your Father who is in Heaven," he means those who pay hatred with love, thereby implying throughout nothing more than a broad resemblance to, and moral union with God. The charter of our adoption is properly recorded by St. Paul (Rom., viii; Eph., i; Gal., iv); St. John (prologue and I Epist., i, iii); St. Peter (I Epist., i, 18, 19); St. John (2, 9); St. James (i, 21, 22); according to these several passages we are begotten, born of God. He is our Father, but in such wise that we may call ourselves, and truly are, His children, the members of His family, brothers of Jesus Christ with whom we partake of the Divine Nature and claim a share in the heavenly heritage. This divine filiation, together with all that flow from it, takes its source in God's own will and graceful condescension. When St. Paul, using a technical term borrowed from the Greeks, calls it adoption, we must interpret the word in a merely analogical sense. In general, the correct interpretation of the Scriptural concept of our adoption must follow the golden mean and locate itself midway between the Divine Sonship of Jesus on the one hand, and human adoption on the other—immeasurably below the former and above the latter. Human adoption may modify the social standing, but adds nothing to the intrinsic worth of an adopted child. Divine adoption, on the contrary, works inward, penetrating to the very essence of our life, renovating, enriching, transforming it into the likeness of Jesus, "the first-born among many brethren". Of course it cannot be more than a likeness, an image of the Divine Original mirrored in our imperfect selves. There will ever be between our adoption and the filiation of Jesus which separates created grace from hypothetical union. And yet, that intimate and mysterious communion with Christ, and through Him with God, is the glory of our adopted sonship: "And the glory which thou hast given me, I have given to them—
I in them and thou in me” (John, xvii, 22, 23). The oft-repeated emphasis which Holy Writ lays on our adoption, as the Angel of the Lord speaks, “I fashion thy bones, and beget thee, that dogmas in the early Church, Baptism, the laver of regeneration, became the occasion of a spontaneous expression of faith in our adopted sonship. The newly baptized were called infants, irrespective of age. They assumed names which suggested the idea of adoption, such as Adeptus, Regeneratus, Hæres, Deiphamus. The dogmas, and the liturgical prayers for neophytes, some of which have survived even to our own day (e.g. the collect for Holy Saturday and the preface for Pentecost), the officiating prelate made it a sacred duty to re-minde them of this grace of adoption, and to call them, in memory thereof, “Pater Noster”, those blessings and graces of adoption, which had not yet been so favoured. (See Baptism.) The Fathers dwell on this privilege which they are pleased to style deification. St. Irenæus (Adv. Hæreses, iii, 17-19); St. Athanasius (Cont. Arianois, ii, 59); St. Cyril of Alexandria (Comment. on St. John, i, 13, 14); St. John Chrysostom (Homilies on St. Matthew, ii, 2); St. Augustine (Tract 11 and 12 on St. John); St. Peter Chrysologus (Sermon 72 on the Lord’s Prayer)—all seem willing to spend their eloquence on the sublimity of our adoption. For them it was an uncontradicted primum principle, an ever ready source of instruction for the faithful, as well as an earnest of future glories. Thus, they daily, as Macedonians, and Nestorians. The Son is truly God, else how could He deify us? The Holy Ghost is truly God, else how could His indwelling sanctify us? The incarnation of the Logos is real, else how could our deification be real? Be the value of such arguments what it may, the fact that their having been used, and this to good effect, bears witness to the popularity and common acceptance of the dogma in those days. Some writers, like Scheeben, go further still and look in the patristic writings for set theories regarding the constituent factor of our adoption. They claim that, while the Fathers of the East account for our supernatural sonship by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, the Fathers of the West maintain that sanctifying grace is the real factor. Such a view is premature. True it is that St. Cyril lays special stress on the presence of the Holy Spirit in the soul of the just man, whereas St. Augustine is more partial to truth, but it is equally true that he speaks exclusively, much less pretends to lay down the causa formalis of adoption as we understand it to-day. In spite of all the catechetical and polemic uses to which the Fathers put this dogma, they left it in no clearer light than did their predecessors, the inspired authors of the divine patristic sayings, like those of Holy Scripture, afford precious data for the framing of a theory, but that theory itself is the work of later ages.

What is the essential factor or formal cause of our supernatural adoption? This question was never seriously mooted previous to the scholastic period. The doctrine of adoption, so widely and so greatly influenced by the then current theories on grace. Peter the Lombard, who identifies grace and charity with the Holy Ghost, was naturally brought to explain our adoption by the sole presence of the Spirit in the soul of the just, to the exclusion of any created and inherent God-given likeness. St. Thomas, St. Scotus, though reluctantly admitting a created entity, nevertheless failed to see in it a valid factor of our divine adoption, and consequently had recourse to a divine positive enactment decreeing and receiving us as children of God and heirs of the Kingdom. Apart from these, a vast majority of the Schoolmen were, as a rule, grave, and pre-eminently St. Thomas, pointed to the habitual grace (an expression coined by Alexander) as the essential factor of our adopted sonship. For them the same inherent quality which gives new life and birth to the soul gives it also a new filiation. Says S. Augustin (De Civ. Dei, xvi, 1, 6), "The creature is assimilated to the Word of God in His Unity with the Father; and this is done by grace and charity, . . . Such a likeness perfects the idea of adoption, for to the like is due the same eternal heritage." (See Grace.) This last view received the seal of the Council of Trent (sess. vi, e. vii, can. 11). The doctrine of the Council first identifies the question of justification: To become just and to be heir according to the hope of life everlasting is one and the same thing. It then proceeds to give the real essence of justification: Its sole formal cause is the justice of God, not that whereby He Himself is just, but that whereby He makes us just. Those who insisted on the former theory, especially the heralds of the Reformation, repeatedly characterizes the grace of justification and adoption as "no mere extrinsic attribute or favour, but a gift inherent in our hearts." This teaching was still more forcibly emphasized in the Catechism of the Council of Trent (De Bapt., No. 50), and by the condemnation by Pius V of the forty-second proposition of Baius, the contradictory of which reads: "Justice is a grace infused into the soul whereby man is adopted into divine sonship." It would seem that the thoroughness with which the Council of Trent treated this doctrine should have precluded even the possibility of further discussion. However, this did not come about. There was strife with Leonard Lesius (Lesius), 1623; Denys Petavius (Petravious), 1652; and Matthias Scheeben, 1888. Ac-

According to their views, it could very well be that the unica causa formalis of the Council of Trent is not the complete cause of our adoption, and it is for this reason that they would make the indwelling of the Holy Ghost at least a partial constituent of divine sonship. Here we need waste no words in consideration of the singular idea of making the indwelling of the Holy Ghost an act proper to, and not merely an appropriation of, the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity. (See Appropriation.) As to the main point at issue, if we carefully weigh the posthumous explanations given by Lessius; if we recall the fact that Petavius spoke of the matter under consideration rather en passant; and if we notice the care Scheeben takes to assert that grace is the essential factor of our adoption, the presence of the Holy Ghost being only that of the premunire and complement of the same, there will be little room for alarm as to the orthodoxy of these distinguished writers. The innovation, however, was not happy. It did not blend with the obvious teaching of the Council of Trent. It ignored the terse interpretation given on the Constitution. The difficulty of using our term adiri served only to complicate and obscure that simple and direct traditional theory, accounting for our regeneration and adoption by the selfsame factor. Still it had the advantage of throwing a stronger light upon the connotations of sanctifying grace, and of setting off in purer relief the relations of the sanctified person to the Blessed Trinity: with the Father, the Author and Giver of grace; with the Incarnate Son, the meritorious Cause and Exemplar of our adoption; and especially with the Holy Ghost, the Bond of our union with God, and the infallible Pledge of our inheritance. It also includes the somewhat forgotten ethical lessons of our communion with the Triune God, and especially with the Holy Ghost, lessons so much insisted upon in ancient patristic literature and the inspired writings. "The Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity, the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost", says St. Augustine (Tract 76; In Joanne), "come to us, and call us. They come with Their help, if we go to submission. They come with light, if we go to learn; They come to replenish, if we go to be filled, that our vision of Them be not from without but from within, and that Their indwelling in us be not fleeing but eternal." And St. Paul (I Cor., iii, 16, 17), "Know you not that you are the temple of God and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? But if any man violate the temple of God, him shall God destroy. For the temple of God is holy, which you are." From what has been said, it is manifest that our supernatural adoption is not a necessary property of sanctifying grace. The prismatic concept of sanctifying grace is a new God-given and God-like life super-added to our natural life. By that very life we are born to God even as the child to its parent, and thus we acquire a new filiation. This filiation is called adoption. In the first place, the filiation of the one natural filiation which belongs to Jesus; second, to emphasize the fact that we have it only through the free choice and merciful condemnation of God. Again, as from our natural filiation many social relations crop up between us and the rest of the world, so our divine life and adoption establish manifold relations between the regenerate and adopted soul on the one hand, and the Triune God on the other. It was not without reason that Scripture and the Eastern Church singled out the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity as the special term of these higher relations. Adoption is the work of the Father. "Who reconciles, save the Council of Frankfort, if not a union of love?" It is, therefore, meet that it should be traced to, and terminate in, the intimate presence of the Spirit of Love.

Adoptionism, in a broad sense, a christological theory according to which Christ, as man, is the adoptive; the persons varies with the successive stages and exponents of the theory. Roughly, we have (1) the adoptionism of Elipandus and Felix in the eighth century; (2) the Neo-Adoptionism of Abelard in the twelfth century; (3) the qualified Adoptionism of some theologians from the fourteenth century onward.

1. Adoptionism of Elipandus and Felix in the Eighth Century. This, the original form of Adoptionism, asserts a double sonship in Christ: one by generation and nature, and the other by adoption and grace. Christ as God is indeed the Son of God by generation and nature, but Christ as man is Son of God only by adoption and grace. Hence "The Man Christ" is the adoptive and not the natural Son of God. Such is the theory held towards the end of the eighth century by Elipandus, Archbishop of Toledo, then under the Mohammedan rule, and by Felix, Bishop of Urgel, then under the Frankish dominion. The origin of his Hispanoic error, as it was called, is obscure. Nestorianism had been a decided Eastern heresy and we are surprised to find an offshoot of it in the most western part of the Western Church, and this so long after the parent heresy had found a grave in its native land. It is, however, noted that Adoptionists, who held this view, were particularly those, who, being part of Spain where Islamism dominated, and where a Nestorian colony had for years been found refuge. The combined influence of Islamism and Nestorianism had, no doubt, blunted the aged Elipandus's Catholic sense. Then came a certain Migetius, preaching a loose doctrine, and holding, among other errors, that the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity did not exist before the Incarnation. The better to confute this error, Elipandus drew a hard and fast line between Jesus as God and Jesus as Man, the former being the natural, and the latter merely the adoptive Son of God. This reassertion of Nestorianism raised a storm of protest from Catholics, headed by Beatus, Abbot of Liébana, and Peter Chrysologus. It was to maintain his position that Elipandus deftly enlisted the co-operation of Felix of Urgel, known for his learning and versatile mind. Felix entered the contest thoughtlessly. Once in the heat of it, he proved a strong ally for Elipandus, and even became one of the minor apologists of the movement the Harenia Feliciana. While Elipandus put an indomitable will at the service of Adoptionism, Felix gave it the support of his science and also Punic faith. From Scripture he quoted innumerable texts. In the patristic literature and Mazarabic Liturgy he found such expressions as adoptio, homo adoptivus, ubi habet, supposedly applied to the Incarnation and Jesus Christ. Nor did he neglect the aid of dialectics, remarking with subtility that the epithet, "Natural Son of God," could not be predicated of "The Man Jesus," who was begotten by temporal generation; who was inferior to the Father; who was reared not especially, but to the whole Trinity, the relation in question remaining unaltered if the Father or the Holy Ghost had been incarnate instead of the Son. Elipandus's obstinacy and Felix's versatility were but the partial cause of the temporary success of Adoptionism. If that offering of Nestorianism held sway in Spain for wellnigh two decades and even made an inroad into southern France, the true cause is to be found in Islamic ritual, which practically taught the control of Rome over the greater part of Spain; and in the over-conciliatory attitude of Charlemagne, who, in spirit of his whole souled loyalty to the Roman Faith, could ill afford to alienate politically provinces so dearly bought. Of the two heresiarchs, Elipandus died in his error. Felix, after many insincere recantations, was placed under the surveillance of Leidrad of Lyons and gave all the signs of a genuine conversion. His death came even before he had time to repudiate his errors. Agobert, Leidrad's successor, had not found among his papers a definite retraction of all former retraction. Adoptionism did not long oust its authors. What Charlemagne could not do by diplomacy and synods (Narbonne, 788; Ratibon, 792; Tours, 794; Aix-la-Chapelle, 794), was accomplished by enlisting the services of missionaries like St. Benedict of Aniane, who, reported as early as 800 the conversion of 20,000 clerics and laymen; and savants like Alcuin, whose treatise "Adv. Elipandum Toletanum" and "Contra Felicem Urgelenses" will ever be a credit to Christian learning.

The official condemnation of Adoptionism is to be found (1) in Pope Hadrian's two letters, one to the bishops of Spain, 785, and the other to Charlemagne, 794; (2) in the decrees of the Council of Frankfort (794), summoned by Charlemagne, it is true, but in full apostolic power and presided over by the legates of Rome, therefore popularly designated according to an expression of contemporary chroniclers. In those documents the natural divine filiation of Jesus even as man is strongly asserted, and His adoptive filiation, at least in so far as it excludes the natural, is rejected as heretical. Some writers, however, tried to buttress the position of Adoptionism all stain of the Nestorian heresy. These writers do not seem to have caught the meaning of the Church's definition. Since sonship is an attribute of the person and not of the nature, to posit two sons is to posit two persons in Christ, the very error of Nestorianism. Alcuin exactly renders the mind of the Church when he says, "As the Nestorian impiety divide Christ into two sons, so your unlearned temerity divided Him into two sons, one natural and one adoptive" (Contr. Felicem, I. P. L. Cl., Col. 136). With regard to the arguments adduced by Felix in support of his theory, it may be briefly remarked that (1) such a doctrine was in John, xvii, 18, that had already been explained at the time of the Arian controversy, and (2) such others as Rom., viii, 29, refer to our adoption, not to that of Jesus; Christ is nowhere in the Bible called the adopted Son of God; nay more, Holy Scripture attributes to "The Man Christ" all the privileges which belong to the Eternal Son (cf. John, i, 18; iii, 16; Rom., viii, 29). The expression, adoptare, adoptio, used by some Fathers, has for its object the sacred Humanity, not the person of Christ; the human nature, not Christ, is said to be adopted or assumed by the Word. The concrete expression of the Monarabic Missal, Homo adoptatus, or of some Greek Fathers, ος οὖν δείκτης, either does not apply to Christ or is an instance of the not infrequent use in early days of the concrete for the abstract.

(3) The dialectical arguments of Felix seem to have a meaning the moment it is clearly understood that, as St. Thomas says, "Filiation propria, saepe e humanitate". Christ, Son of God, by His eternal filiation is Son of God, even after the Word has assumed and substantially united to Himself the sacred Humanity; Incarnation detracts no more from the eternal sonship than it does from the external personality of the Word.

(See NEORATIONALISM.)

II. Neo-Adoptionism of Abelard in the Twelfth Century. The Spanish heresy left few traces in the Middle Ages. It is doubtful whether the Christological errors of Abelard can be traced to it. They rather seem to be the logical consequence of a wrong construction put upon the hypostatical union. Abelard began to question the truth of such expressions as "Christ is God"; "Christ is man". Back of what might seem a mere logomachy there is really, in Abelard's mind, a fundamental error. He understood the hypostatical union as a fusion of two natures, the divine and the human. And lest this fusion, in confusion, he made the sacred Humanity the external basis and adventitious investment of the Word only, and thus denied the substantial reality of "The Man Christ"—"Christ is the Word, the substance bedicit; sed dici potest aliquix modi." It is self-evident that in such a theory the Man Christ could not be called the true Son of God, Was He the adoptive Son of God? Personally, Abelard repudiated all kinship with the Adoptionists, just as they deprecated the very idea of their affiliation to the Nestorian heresy. But after Abelard's theory spread beyond France, into Italy, Germany and even the Orient, the disciples were less cautious than the master. They defended at Rome the following proposition—"Christ, as man, is the natural man and the adoptive Son of God"; and Flohn, in Germany, carried this erroneous tenet to its extreme consequences, denying to Christ as man the right to adoration. Abelard's neo-Adoptionism was condemned, at least in its fundamental principles, by the Council of Constance, 1415, and it was forbidden under pain of anathema that anyone in the future dare assert that Christ as man is not a substantial reality (non esse aliquid) because as He is truly God, so He is verily man." The refutation of this new form of Adoptionism, as it rests altogether on the interpretation of the hypostatical union, will be found in the exegesis of that word. (See HYPOSTATIC UNION.)

III. Qualified Adoptionism of Later Theologians. The formulas "natural Son of God", "adopted Son of God" were again subjected to a close analysis by such theologians as Duns Scotus (1300); Durandus a Mortino (1320); Vasques (1604); Suarez (1617). They all admitted the doctrine of Pore and confessed that Jesus as man was the natural and not merely the adoptive Son of God. But besides that natural sonship resting upon the hypostatical union, they thought there was room for a second filiation, resting on grace, the grace of union (gratia unici). They differ agree, however, in qualifying that second filiation. Some called it " adopting", because of its analogy with our supernatural adoption. Others, fearing lest the implication of the word adoption might make Jesus a stranger to, and alien from God, preferred to call it natural. None of these theories is limited, because this runs counter to a defined dogma; yet, since sonship is anagogic, it is danger of multiplying the persons by multiplying the filiations in Christ. A second natural filiation is not intelligible. A second adoptive filiation does not sufficiently eschew the connotation of adoption as defined by the Council of Frankfurt. We call upon to give him who is an adoptee. The common mistake of these novel theories, a mistake already made by the old Adoptionists and by Abelard, lies in the supposition that the grace in union in Christ, not being less fruitful than habitual grace in man, should have a similar effect, viz., filiation. If it were fruitful it is not, and yet it cannot have the same effect in Him as in us, because as he said: "Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten Thee" (Hebr., i, 5); and to us, "You were afar off" (Eph., ii, 13).

Adoptionists. See ADOPTIONISM.

Adoration, in the strict sense, an act of religion offered to God in acknowledgment of His supreme perfection and dominion, and of the creature's dependence upon Him; in a looser sense, the reverence shown to any person or object possessing, inherently or by association, a sacred character or a high degree of moral excellence. The adoration of creature, looking up to God, whom reason and revelation show to be infinitely perfect cannot, in right and justice maintain an attitude of indifference. That perfection which is infinite in itself, and the source and fulfillment of all the good that we possess or shall possess, we must worship, acknowledge, and adore, according to its supremacy. This worship called forth by God, and given exclusively to Him as God, is designated by the Greek name latreia (latria, latria), for which the best translation that our language affords is the word Adoration. Adoration differs from other acts of worship, such as supplication, confession of sin, etc., inasmuch as it formally consists in self-abasement before the Infinite, and in devout recognition of His transcendent excellence. An admirable example of adoration is given in the Apocalypse, vii, 11, 12: "And all the angels stood round about the throne, and about the ancients, and about the living creatures, and adored the throne upon their faces, and adored God, saying: Amen. Benediction and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, honour, and power, and strength to our God, forever and ever, Amen." The revealed precept to adore God was spoken to Moses upon Sinai and reaffirmed in the words of Christ: "The Lord thy God shalt thou serve" (Matt., iv, 10).

The primary and fundamental element in adoration is an interior act of mind and will; the mind perceiving that God’s perfection is infinite, the will bidding us to extol and worship this perfection. We feel ourselves drawn toward it. "In spirit and in truth" it is evident that any outward show of divine worship would be mere pantomime and falsehood. But equally evident is it that the adoration felt within will seek outward expression. Human nature demands physical utterance of its adoration and emotional manifestation, and it is to this instinct for self-expression that our whole apparatus of speech and gesture is due. To suppress this instinct in religion would be as unreasonable as to repress it in any other province of our experience. Moreover, it would do religion grievous harm to check its tendency to outward manifestation, since the external expression reacts upon the interior sentiment, quickening, strengthening, and sustaining it. As St. Thomas teaches, "it is consonant for us to pass from the physical signs to the spiritual basis upon which they rest" (Summa II-II, Q. xlviii, art. 2). It is to be expected, therefore, that men should have employed conventional actions as expressing adoration of the Supreme Being. Of these actions, one has pre-eminently and exclusively signified adoration, and that is sacrifice. Other acts have been widely used for the same purpose; but most of them—sacrifice always excepted—have not been exclusively reserved for Divine worship; they have also been employed to manifest friendship, or reverence for high persons. Thus Abram "fell flat on his face" before the Lord (Gen., xvii, 3). This was clearly an act of adoration in its highest sense; yet that it could have other meanings, we know from, e.g., I Kings, xx, 41, which says that David adored "falling on his face to the ground" before Jonathan, who had come to warn him of Saul’s hatred. In like manner, Gen., xxxiii, 3, narrates that Jacob, on meeting his brother Esau, "bowed down with his face to the ground seven times." We read of other forms of adoration among the Hebrews, such as taking off the shoes (Exod., iii, 5), bowing (Gen. xxv, 26), and we are told that the contrite publican stood when he prayed, and that St. Paul knelt when he worshipped with the elders of Ephesus. Among the early Christians it was common to adore God, standing with outstretched arms, and facing the east. Finally, we ought perhaps to mention the act of pagan adoration which seems to contain the etymological explanation of our word adoration. The word adoratio very probably originated from the phrase (manum) ad os (mittere), which designated the act of kissing the hand to the statue of the god one wished to honour. Concerning the verbal meaning of the prayer of praise—explanation is not necessary. The connection between our inner feelings and their articulate utterance is obvious. Thus far we have spoken of the worship given directly to God as the infinitely perfect Being. It is clear that adoration in this sense can be offered to no finite object. Still, the physical realization of worship God’s perfection in itself will move us also to venerate the traces and bestowals of that perfection as it appears conspicuously in saintly men and women. Even to inanimate objects, which for one reason or other strikingly recall the excellence, majesty, love, or wisdom of the Infinite, we naturally feel a sense of reverence. The goodness which these creatures possess by participation or association is a reflection of God’s goodness; by honouring them in the proper way we offer tribute to the Giver of all good. He is the ultimate end of our worship in such cases, as He is the source of the derived perfection which called forth. But, as we have already said, over the immediate object of our veneration is a creature of this sort, the mode of worship which we exhibit toward it is fundamentally different from the worship which belongs to God alone. Latria, as we have already said, is the name of this latter worship; and for the second-class, invoked by saints or angels, we use the term duilia. The Blessed Virgin, as manifesting in a sublimer manner than any other creature the goodness of God, deserves from us a higher recognition and deeper veneration than any other of the saints; and this peculiar cultus, due to her because of her unique position in the Divinized economy, is termed latria, that is duilia in an eminent degree. It is unfortunate that neither our own language nor the Latin possesses, in all this terminology, the precision of the Greek. The word latria is never applied in any other sense than that of the incommunicable adoration which is due to God alone. But in English the words adoration and worship are still sometimes used, and in the past were commonly so used, to mean also inferior species of religious veneration, and even to express admiration or affection for persons living upon earth. So David adored Jonathan. In like manner Mephibothes fell on his face and worshiped David (I Kings, ix, 6). Tennyson says that End, in her true heart, adored the queen. Those who perforce adopted these modes of expression understood perfectly well what was meant by them, and were in no danger of thereby encroaching upon the rights of the Divinity. It is hardly needful to remark that Catholics too, even the most unlearned, are in no peril of confounding the adoration due to God with the religious honour given to any finite creature, even when the word worship, owing to the poverty of our language, is applied to both. The Seventh General Council, in 787, puts the matter in a few words, when it says that “true latria is to be given to God alone” and the Council of Trent (Sess. XXV) makes clear the difference between invocation of saints and idolatry.

A few words may be added in conclusion on the offences which conflict with the adoration of God. They may be summed up under three categories, that is to say: worship offered to the true God, but in a false, unworthy, and scandalous manner; and blasphemy. The first class comprises sins of idolatry. The second class embraces sins of superstition. These may take manifold forms, to be treated under separate titles. Suffice it to say that vain observances which neglect the essential thing in the worship of God, and make much of purely accidental or trivial features, or which bring it into contempt through fantastic and puerile excesses, are emphatically reprobated in Catholic theology. Honouring, or pretending to honour, God by means of numbers or magical means, as though adoration consisted chiefly in the number or the physical utterance of the phrases, belongs to Jewish Cabala or pagan mythology, not to the true worship of the Most High. Adoration. Perpetual, a term broadly used to designate the practically uninterrupted adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. The term is used in a truly literal sense, i.e., to indicate that the adoration is physically perpetual; and, more frequently, in a moral sense, when it is interrupted only for a short time, or for imperative reasons, or through uncon-Adorations were usually for some special reason: e.g. for the cure of a sick person; or, on the eve of an execution, in the hope that the condemned would die in the Church of the Oratorio dei Bianchi del corpo di Gesù Cristo," a Benedictine reform, united to Citeaux in 1393, and approved later as a separate community, devoted themselves to the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. Philip II of Spain founded in the Escorial the Vigil of the Blessed Sacrament, religious in character, and remaining constantly night and day, before the Blessed Sacrament. But, practically, the devotion of the Forty Hours, begun in 1534, and officially established in 1592, developed the really general Perpetual Adoration, spreading as it did from the adoration in one or more churches in Rome, until it gradually extended throughout the world, so that it may be truly said that during every hour of the year the Blessed Sacrament, solemnly exposed, is adored by multitudes of the faithful. In 1641 Baron de Renty, famous for devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, founded in St. Paul's parish, in Paris, an association of men and women, obligatory in Paris. St. Ignatius in "The Spiritual Exercises," when directing attention to the abiding presence of God with His creatures as a motive for awakening love, says not a word of the Blessed Sacrament (Thurston, Preface to "Coram Sanctissimo," 8 sqq.); (2) because of the practice of even the present day Greek Church which, although believing explicitly in transubstantiation, has never considered Our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament "our companion, and refuge as well as our food" (Thurston, ib.). The slowness with which the Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament came into vogue, and the slow development of the custom of paying Visits to the Blessed Sacrament [Father Bridgett asserting that he had not come across one clear example in England of a visit to the Blessed Sacrament in pre-Reformation times (Thurston, ib.)], render it increasingly difficult to make out a case for any adoration, perpetual or temporary, at the Mass or the Office. (Corblet, Histoire, II, 1, xvii, 1), as these various forms of devotion are closely linked together. Most liturgists rightly attribute the Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament and its special adoration to the establishment of the Feast of Corpus Christi (q. v.). But it is worthy of note that the first recorded instance of Perpetual Adoration antedates Corpus Christi, and occurred at Avignon. On 14 September, 1226, in compliance with the wish of Louis VII, who had just been victorious over the Albigensians, the Blessed Sacrament, veiled, was exposed in the Chapel of the Holy Cross, as an act of thanksgiving. So during the Feast of the Holy Name of Jesus, by Pierre de Corbie, judged it expedient to continue the adoration by night, as well as by day, a proposal that was subsequently ratified by the approval of the Holy See. This really Perpetual Adoration, interrupted in 1792, was resumed in 1829, through the efforts of the Archbishop of Lugo (Annales du Saint-Sacrement, III, 90). It is said that there has been a Perpetual Adoration in the Cathedral of Lugo, Spain, for more than a thousand years in expiatio... of the Priscillian heresy. (Cardinal Vaughan refers to this in an official letter to the Cardinal Primate of Spain, 1895.) in Mexico, in Brazil, and other South American countries, in the United States, and Canada, and even in Oceania. The Nocturnal Adoration is carried on in many parishes and cities in all countries.

The first confraternity for the Nocturnal Adoration called "Pia Unione di Adoratori del SS. Sacramento" was founded in Rome, in 1810. In Paris, before the passage of the Associations Law, the Nocturnal Adoration was practiced in upwards of one hundred places, and the number of its practitioners was more than twenty-five hundred men. The Nocturnal Adoration, at Rome, founded in 1851, and erected into an archconfraternity in 1858, practically completes the chain of associations that render perpetual, in a strict sense, the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. It would be impossible to give here an adequate notice of the enormous number of Eucharistic associations, lay and clerical, formed for the work of the Perpetual Adoration. It is noteworthy that the two associations mentioned by Bérenger (II, 104-110) unite the work of providing poor churches with ornaments, eucharistic vessels, vestments, etc., for the Adoration and visiting the communities and associations mentioned above, we shall here enumerate only the most important societies whose object is the Perpetual Adoration. A comparatively exhaustive list will be found in Corblot (op. cit., II, 444 sqq.).

(1) The Societé des Pèlerins founded in 1594, has as one of its objects to honour the hidden life of Christ, by the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. (2) In 1668 the privilege of Perpetual Adoration was granted by Pope Pius IX to the Sisters of the Second Order of St. Dominic in the monastery of Quellins, near Lyons, France. This order was founded by St. Dominique himself in 1206, the constitutions being based on the Rule of St. Augustine. The privilege of Perpetual Adoration was extended to the few monasteries, such as those of Newark, New Jersey, and Hunt's Point, New York City, which were founded from Quellins, but not to the other convents of the order. (3) In 1647 the Bernardines of Port Royal were associated to the Institute of the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, and joined to their original name that of Daughters of the Blessed Sacrament. (4) Anne of Austria, through Méchtilde, a Franciscan, the first community of Beneditines of the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, in 1654, an institute widely spread throughout continental Europe. The members take a solemn vow of Perpetual Adoration. During the conventual Mass one of the community kneels in the middle of the choir, having a rope around her neck, and holding a lighted torch, as a preparation to the Blessed Eucharist so frequently insulted. Their password is "Pray for the Blessed Sacrament of the Altar". It is their salutation in their letters and visits, at the beginning of their office, the first word pronounced on waking, the last word of their writing. (5) TheIGN. Norbert, founded in 1767 at Coire (Switzerland), perpetually adore the Blessed Sacrament, singing German hymns. (6) The Perpetual Adorers of the Blessed Sacrament (women), commonly known as Sacramentiens, were founded at Rome, by a Franciscan sister, and were approved by Pius VII in 1807. During their nocturnal adoration the Blessed Sacrament remains in the tabernacle. (7) The Sisters of the Perpetual Adoration at Quimper were founded in 1835. In addition to the Perpetual Adoration, they train young girls to become domestics, or teach them a trade. (8) A Congregation of Religious of the Perpetual Adoration was founded in 1845 at Einsiedeln, Switzerland. The sisters wear a small ostensorium on the breast, to indicate their special function of perpetual adorers. (9) The Congregation of Ladies of the Adoration of Reparation, founded after the Revolution of 1848, have three classes of members, whose common duty is the Perpetual Adoration; (10) The Congregation of the Sisters of the Perpetual Adoration and of the Poor Churches, founded originally in Belgium, has houses all over the world. By a special decree of the Congregation of Indulgences the seat of this archconfraternity was transferred to Rome in 1879, where it absorbed the society of the same name already existing there. Its work, however, is strictly a Perpetual Adoration. (11) The Society of the Most Blessed Sacrament, founded in 1857 by Père Eymard, is perhaps the best known of all. The members are divided into three classes: (a) the religious contemplatives consecrated to the perpetual adoration; (b) the religious, both contemplative and active, who are engaged in the sacred ministry; (c) a Third Order, priests or laics, who follow only a part of the Rule. This society maintains a Eucharistic monthly called "Le Très Saint Sacrement"; the American edition is called "The Sentinel of the Blessed Sacrament". It has an auxiliary society of female religious, and has houses all over the world. Its houses in Montreal, Canada, and in New York City are well known. (12) The Eucharistic League of Priests through its monthly "Emmanuel", practically maintains the Perpetual Adoration among its pious members. It would be impossible to enumerate the many others belonging to these different associations. Bérenger ("Les Indulgences," II, 107 sqq.) gives a list of those granted to the Archconfraternity of the Perpetual Adoration, which will indicate the rich endowment made by the Holy See to these Eucharistic works.

ADORO JE DE VOTE (I adore Thee devoutly), a hymn sometimes styled Rhythmus, or Oratio, S.
ADRIA

Thoma (sc. Aquinatia) written c. 1260 (?), which forms no part of the Office or Mass of the Blessed Sacrament, although found in the Roman Missal (In gratiarum actione post missam) with 100 days indulgence for priests (subsequently extended to all the faithful by decree of the S. C. Indulgent., 17 June, 1878). It is also found printed in some of the hymn-books. It has received sixteen translations into English verse. The Latin text, with English translation, may be found in the Baltimore "Manual of Prayers" (659, 660). Either one of two refrains is inserted after each quatrains (a variation of one of which is in "The Manual"), but originally the hymn lacked the refrain.

Adria, an Italian bishopric, suffragan to Venice, which comprises 55 towns in the Province of Rovigo, and a part of one town in the Province of Padua. Tradition dates the preaching of the Gospel in Adria from the days of St. Apollinaris, who had been consecrated bishop by St. Peter. The figure of this Bishop of Ravenna has a singular importance in the hagiographical legends of the northeast of Italy. Ravenna has shown that even if it were divided from Romagna, and the territory around Venice were Christianized and had bishops (the two facts are concomitant) before Piedmont, for example, still their conversion does not go back beyond the end of the second century. (See Zattoni, "Il valore storico della Passione di S. Apollinare e la forza dell' episcopato a Ravenna e in Romagna", in the "Rivista storico-critica delle scienze teologiche", 1, 10, and II, 3.) The first bishop of Adria of whose name we are positive is Gallonistus, who was present at a synod in Rome (649) under Martin I (Mansi, XII). Venancius Bede, in his "MartYROLOGY", mentions a St. Colanus, Bishop of Adria, but we know nothing about him. Amongst the bishops of Adria is the Blessed Aldobrandinus of Este (1248-1352). This diocese contains 80 parishes; 300 churches, chapels, and oratories; 250 secular priests; 72 seminarians; 12 regular priests; 9 lay-brothers; 90 confessories; 8 schools (97 pupils); 6 girls' schools (99 pupils). Population, 190,400.

Adrian I, Pope, from about 1 February, 772, till 25 December, 795; date of birth uncertain; d. 25 December, 795. His pontificate of twenty-three years, ten months, and twenty-four days was unequaled in length by that of any successor of St. Peter until a thousand years later, when Pius VI, deposed and imprisoned by the same Frankish arms which had enthroned the first Pope-King, had reigned only six months longer. At a critical period in the history of the Papacy, Adrian possessed all the qualities essential in the founder of a new dynasty. He was a Roman of noble extraction and majestic stature. By a life of singular piety, he Seconda clusus extraordinis in sanctissimo, and by valuable services rendered during the pontificate of Paul I and Stephen III, he had so gained the esteem of his unruly countrymen that the powerful chamberlain, Paul Afarta, who represented in Rome the interests of Desiderius, the Lombard king, was powerless to resist the unanimous voice of the clergy and people demanding for Adrian the papal chair. The new pontiff's temporal policy was, from the first, sharply defined and tenaciously adhered to; the keynote was a steadfast resistance to Lombard aggression. He received from prison or recalled from exile the numerous victims of the Frankish persecutions; in prayer and penance discovered that Afarta had caused Sergius, a high official of the imperial court, to be assassinated in prison, ordered his arrest in Rimini, just as Afarta was returning from an embassy to Desiderius with the avowed intention of bringing the Pope to the Lombard court, "were it in chains. The time seemed propitious for subjecting all Italy to the Lombard yoke, but less able antagonists than Adrian and Charles (to be mentioned in later ages as Charlemagne), most probably the ambition of Desiderius would have been gratified. There seemed little prospect of Frankish intervention. The Lombards held the passes of the Alps, and Charles was engaged by the difficulties of the Saxon war; moreover, the presence in Pavia of Gerberga and her two sons, the widow and orphans of Carman, whose territories, on his brother's death, Charles had annexed, seemed to offer an excellent opportunity of stirring up discord among the Franks, if only the Pope could be persuaded, or coerced, to renounce the claim to their father's throne. Instead of complying, Adrian valiantly determined upon resistance. He strengthened the fortifications of Rome, called to the aid of the militia the inhabitants of the surrounding territory, and, as the Lombard host advanced, ravaging and plundering, summoned Charles to hasten to the defence of their common interests. An opportune hul in the Saxo war left the great commander free to act. Unable to bring the deceitful Lombard to terms by peaceful overtures, he scaled the Alps in the autumn of 773, seized Verona, where Gerberga and her sons had sought refuge, and besieged Desiderius in his capital. The following spring, leaving his army to prosecute the siege of Pavia, he proceeded with a strong detachment to Rome, in order to celebrate the festival of Easter at the tomb of the Apostles. Arriving on Holy Saturday, he was received by Adrian and the Romans with the utmost solemnity. The relics that had been devoted to religious rites; the following Wednesday to affairs of state. The enduring outcome of their momentous meeting was the famous "Donation of Charlemagne", for eleven centuries the Magna Charta of the temporal power of the Popes. (See Charlemagne.)

We may well doubt whether the great King of the Franks would have suffered the difficulties of the Pope to interfere with his more immediate cares, were it not for his extreme personal veneration of Adrian, whom in life and death he never ceased to proclaim his father and best friend. It was probably the sight degree owing to Adrian's political sagacity, vigilance, and activity, that the temporal power of the Papacy did not remain a fiction of the imagination.

His merits were equally great in the more spiritual concerns of the Church. In co-operation with the orthodox Empress Irene, he laboured to repair the damages wrought by the Iconoclasts. In the year 787 he presided, through his legates, over the Seventh General Council, held at Nicea, in which the Catholic doctrine regarding the use and veneration of images was definitely expounded. The importance of the temporary opposition to the decrees of the Council throughout the West, caused mainly by Arianism, as suggested by various motives, has been greatly exaggerated in modern times. The controversy elicited a strong refutation of the so-called "Libri Carolini" from Pope Adrian and occasioned no diminution of friendship between him and Charles. He opposed most vigorously, by synods and writings, the nascent heresy of Adrianism, and, according to the essay, Christological errors originated by the West. The "Liber Pontifici calis" enlarges upon his merits in embellishing the city of Rome, upon which he is said to have expended fabulous sums. He died universally regretted, and was buried in St. Peter's. His episcopal successor, chosen by that great man, was St. Stephen (795), who was consecrated as pope at Charlemagne, preserved by the latter in his "Codex Carolinus". Estimates of Adrian's work and character by modern historians differ with the varying views of writers regarding the temporal sovereignty of the popes, of which Adrian I must be considered the real founder.

JAMES F. LOUGHLIN.

ADRIAN II, POPE (867–872).—After the death of St. Nicholas I, the Roman clergy and people elected, much against his will, the venerable Cardinal Adrian, universally beloved for his charity and amiability, descended from a Roman family which had already given two pontiffs to the Church, Stephen III and Sergius II. Adrian was now seventy-five years old, and twice before had refused the dignity. He had been married before taking orders, and his old age was saddened by a domestic tragedy. As pope, he followed closely in the footsteps of his energetic predecessor. He strove to maintain peace among the greedy and incompetent descendants of Charlema gne. In an interview at Monte Cassino he ad dressed ten of these prelates and censured the papal prince of Lorraine, after exiling from him a public oath that he had held no intercourse with his con cubine since the pope's prohibition, that he would take back his lawful wife Theutberga, and abide by the final decision of the Roman See. He upheld with vigour against Hincmar of Reims the unlimited right of bishops to appoint to the Sovereign Pontiff. At the Eighth General Council, which he convoked at Constantinople in 869, and presided over through ten legates, he effected the deposition of Photius and the restoration of unity between the East and the West. He was unsuccessful in retaining the Eastern Church. Though western bishops appealed by the pope to the See of Rome, the Patriarch of Constantinople, a course which was destined to bring upon it ruin and stagnation. Adrian saved the western Slavs from a similar fate by seconding the efforts of the saintly brothers, Cyril and Methodius. Of enduring influence, for good or evil, was the endorsement he gave to their rendering of the liturgy in the Slavonic tongue. Adrian died towards the close of the year 872.

ADRIAN III, SAINT, POPE, of Roman extraction, was elected in the beginning of the year 884, and died near Modena in the summer of the following year, while on his way to the diet summoned by Charles the Fat to determine the succession to the East Roman Empire. He was buried in the monastery of Nonantula, where his memory has ever since been held in local veneration. By decree of Pope Leo XIII the clergy of Rome and Modena celebrate his Mass and office ritu duplìci on 7 September.

ADRIAN IV, POPE, b. 1100 (?); d. 1 September, 1159. Very little is known about the birthplace, parentage, or boyhood of Adrian. Yet, as usual in such cases, very various, and sometimes very circumstantial, accounts have reached us about him. Our only reliable information we owe to two writers, Cardinal Boso and John of Salisbury. The former wrote a life of Adrian, which is included in the collection of Nicolas Rosselli, made Cardinal of Aragon in 1156 during the pontificate of Adrian. His life, published by Muratori (SS. Rer. Ital. III, I, 441–446) and reprinted in Migne (P. L., CLXXXVIII, 1351–60), also edited by Watterich (Vite Pontificum, II, 323–374), and now to be read in Duchesne's edition of the Liber Pontificialis (II, 388–397; cf. proleg. to Vol. IV, XVI–XLV), Boso's history, which was created cardinal-deacon of the title of S. Cosmas and Damian, was chamberlain to Adrian and in constant and familiar attendance upon him from the commencement of his apostolate. [Giacconius says that Boso was the nephew of Adrian, but Watterich observes (op. cit. prolegomena) that he finds no proof of this.] Boso tells us that Adrian was born in England or near the burg of St. Albans, and that he left his country and his relations in his boyhood to complete his studies, and went to Ales in France. During the vacation he visited the monastery of St. Rufus near Avignon, where he took the tonsure and habit of the Augustinian Canons. At this time he was elected abbot and, going to Rome on important business connected with the monastery, was retained there by Pope Eugenius III, and made a cardinal and Bishop of Albano (1146). Matthew Paris agrees in some measure with this, for he tells us that on Adrian's applying to the abbot of St. Ab bans to be received as a monk, the abbot, after examining him, found him deficient and said to him kindly: "Have patience, my son, and stay at school yet a while till you are better fitted for the position you desire." He states further that he was "a native of some hamlet under the abbey, perhaps Lang ey," and I may add that it is now so named. We are informed that he was born at Abbot's Langley in Hertford shire, about the year 1100; that his father was Rob ert Brekespear, a man of humble means, though of a decent stock; and that Adrian went abroad as a poor wandering scholar, like John of Salisbury and many others at that time. However, William of Newburgh, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, an Austin canon and a historian of high repute (1136–987), gives a very different account, which he probably had from the neighbouring Cistercian houses of Ripon and Byland. Subsequently, it was stated by Dugaldus, "was succeeded by Nicolas, Bishop of Albano, who, changing his name with his fortune, called himself Adrian. Of this man it may be well to relate how he was raised as it were from the dust to sit in the midst of princes and to occupy the throne of sovereignty. He was born at Rome, his father was a clerk of slender means who, abandoning his youthful son, became a monk at St. Albans. As the boy grew up, seeing that through want he could not afford the time to go to school, he attended the monastery for a daily pittance. His father was ashamed of this, taunted him with bitter words for his idleness, and, highly indignant, drove him away disconsolately. The boy, left to himself, and compelled to do something by hard necessity, ingenuously aspired either to dig or beg, crossed over to France." He then states that after Adrian was elected Abbot of St. Rufus the canons repented of their course and would it. This was one of the last times the Pope on occasions, bringing divers charges against him (II, vi). This narrative is not only contrary to Boso's but to what Adrian himself told John of Salisbury. "The office of Pope, he assured me, was a thorny one, beset on all sides with sharp pricks. He wished indeed that he had never left England, his native land, or at least had lived his life quietly in the cloister of St. Rufus rather than have entered on such difficult paths, but he dared not refuse, since it was the Lord's bidding" (Poly Craticus, Bk. IV, xxviii). How could he have looked back with regret to quiet and happy days if he had endured the scorns and want and the continous insolubility at St. Rufus? In 1152 Adrian was sent on a delicate and important mission to Scandinavia, as papal legate, in which he acquitted himself to the satisfaction of everybody. He established an independent archiepiscopal see for Norway at Trondheim, which he selected chiefly in honour of St. Olaf, whom relics were imported in its church. He reformed the abuses that had crept into the usages of the clergy, and even aided in bettering the civil institutions of the country. Snorri relates that no foreigner ever came to Norway who gained so much public honour and deference among the people as Nicolas. He lived there ten years, and in the year from establishing an archiepiscopal see in Sweden by the rivalry between Sweden and Gothland, the one party claiming the honour for Upsala, the other for Skara. But he reformed abuses there also, and established the contribution known as Peter's-pence. On his return to Rome he was hailed as the Apostle of the North, and, the death of Anastasius IV occurring at that time (2 December, 1154), he was on the following day unanimously elected the successor of St. Peter; but the office was not a bed of roses. King William of Sicily was in open hostility, and the professed friendship of his uncle, Henry the Lion (q.v.), was but phagory; the barons in the Campagna fought with each other and with the Pope, and, issuing from their castles, raidied the country in every direction, and even robbed the pilgrims on their way to the tombs of the Apostles. The turbulent and fierce populace of Rome was in open revolt over the leadership of Arnold of Brescia. Cardinal Gerardus was mortally wounded in broad daylight, as he was walking along the Via Sacra. Adrian, a determined man, at once laid the city under an interdict and retired to Viterbo. He forbade the observance of any sacred service until the Wednesday of Holy Week. "Then were the senators impelled by the voice of the clergy and laity alike to prostrate themselves before His Holiness." Submission was made, and the ban removed. The Pope returned to Rome, and Arnold escaped and was taken under the protection of some of the bandit barons of the northern Campagna. He set up a rival government, and subsequently was put to death. Meanwhile Barbarossa was advancing through Lombardy and after receiving the Iron Crown at Pavia had approached the confines of the papal territory, intending to receive the imperial crown in Rome at the hands of the Pope. After some negotiations a meeting was held at S. Paolo in Piazza di S. Marco, north of Rome, on the 9th of June, 1155, between Frederick of Hohenstaufen, then the most powerful ruler in Europe, and the humble canon of St. Rufus, now the most powerful spiritual ruler in the world. As the Pope approached, the Emperor advanced to meet him, but did not hold the Pope's stirrup, which was part of the customary ceremony of homage. The Pope said nothing then, but dismounted, and the Emperor led him to a chair and kissed his slipper. Custom required that the Pope should then give the kiss of peace. He refused to do so, and told Frederick that until full homage had been paid he would not leave the emperor's presence. Frederick made no further advances, however, and the Pope submitted. Frederick had to submit, and on the 11th of June another meeting was arranged at Nepi, when Frederick advanced on foot and held the Pope's stirrup, and the incident was closed. Frederick was afterwards duly crowned at St. Peter's, and took the solemn oaths prescribed by ancient custom. During the ceremonies a guard of imperial troops had been placed on or near the bridge of St. Angelo to protect that suburb, then known as the Ona, the bridge was stormed by the republican troops from the city proper, and a fierce battle ensued between the imperial army and the Romans, which lasted for three days; the hot suns of the Latin capital were far on into the evening. Finally the Romans were routed. Over 200 fell as prisoners into Frederick's hands, including most of the leaders, and more than 1,000 were killed or drowned in the Tiber. The citizens, however, held the city and refused to give the Emperor provisions; the latter, now that he was crowned, made no serious effort either to help the Pope against the Normans or to reduce the city to subjection. Malaria appeared among his troops. "He was obliged to turn", says Gregorovius, in his History of the City of Rome", "and, not without some painful self-reproach, to abandon the Pope to his fate." He had not prevented the three days and nights, marching north by way of Farfa, reduced to ashes on his route the ancient and celebrated city of Spoleto. William I succeeded his father on the throne of Sicily in February, 1154. Adrian refused to recognize him as king, and addressed him merely as Domino (Lord). Hostilities followed. The Sicilians laid siege to Benevento without result, and afterwards ravaged the southern Campagna and retired. Adrian excommunicated William. After the departure of Frederick, Adrian collected his vassals and mercenaries and marched south to Benevento, a papal possession, where he remained until June, 1156. It was during this time that the Greek Emperor, Manuel, intended for his ally the Pope. He also took captive many wealthy Greeks, whom he sent to Palermo, some for ransom, but the greater number to be sold into slavery. This practically determined the issue of the war. Peace was made in June, 1156, and a treaty concluded. The Pope agreed to invest William with the crowns of Sicily and Apulia, the territories and states of Naples, Salerno, and Amalfi, the March of Ancona, and all the other cities which the King then possessed. William on his part took the crown and became King of Sicily and of Naples, as Pope, and promised to pay a yearly tribute, and to defend the papal possessions (Watterich, op. cit., II, 352). After this, the Pope went to Viterbo, where he came to an agreement with the Romans, and in the beginning of 1157 returned to the City. The Emperor deeply resented the act of the Pope in investiture, and with the territory which he claimed as part of his dominions, and for this and other causes a conflict broke out between them. (See ALEXANDER III, FREDERICK I, INVESTITURES.)

Adrian died at Anagni, in open strife with the Emperor, and in league with the Lombards against him. Alexander III carried out the intentions of Adrian, and shortly afterwards excommunicated the Emperor.

The Donation of Ireland.—It was during the Pope's stay at Beneventum (1156), as we have stated, that John of Salisbury visited him. "I recollect," he writes, "a journey I once made into Apulia for this purpose, visiting his Holiness, Pope Adrian IV. I stayed with him for a little over three months."

(Polycolycus, VI, 24; P. L. CXCI, 623.) In another work, the "Metalogicus," this writer says: "At my solicitation [ad preces meas] he gave and granted Hibernia to Henry II, the illustrious King of England, to hold by hereditary right as his letter [written in Latin is] testamentary for this day and all future times of ancient right, according to the Donation of Constantine, are said to belong to the Roman Church, which he founded. He sent also by me a ring of gold, with the best of emeralds set therein, wherein with the investiture might be made for his governorship of Ireland, and that such investiture was ordered to be and is still in the public treasury of the King." It will be observed that he says, "at my solicitation," and not at the request of Henry, and that he went "for the purpose of visiting" (causa visitandae), not on an official mission. The suggestion that because he was born in England Adrian made Ireland over to the Angvin monarch, who was no relation of his, does not merit serious attention. The "Metalogicus" was written in the autumn of 1159 or early in 1160, and the passage quoted occurs in the last chapter (IV, xili; P. L. vol. cit., col. 945). It is found in all manuscripts of the work, one of which was written probably before 1173. This clearly, and Nobody questions the truthfulness of John of Salisbury, and the only objection raised to the statement is that it may be an interpolation. If it is not an interpolation, it constitutes a complete proof of the Donation, the investiture by the ring being legally sufficient, and in fact the mode used in the case of the Isle of Man, as Boichorst points out. Adrian's Letter, however, creates a difficulty. His Bull, usually called "Laudabiliter," does not purport to confer Hibernia "by hereditary right," but the letter referred to was not "Laudabiliter," but a formal letter of investiture, such as was used in the case of Robert Guiscard ("I give and grant to Duke Robert, with the land of..." etc., ("Ego Gregorius Papa investi te, Roberto Dux, de terr, etc., etc."") Mansi, Coll. Conc., XX, 313). The question of the genuineness of the passage in the "Metalogicus," impugned by Cardinal Moran, W. B. Morris, and others, must be kept separate from the question of the genuineness of "Laudabiliter," and it is mainly by mixing both together that the passage in the "Metalogicus" is assailed as a forgery. Boichorst (Mittheilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung IV, supplementary vol., 1893, p. 101) regards the Donation as a forgery, while rejecting "Laudabiliter," as a forgery. Liebermann (Die historische Zeitschrift für Geschichte und Geschichtswissenschaft, 1892, I, 58) holds the same view. Thatcher, in "Studies Concerning Adrian IV; I. The Offer of Ireland to Henry II," printed in the fourth volume of the Decennial Publications for the University of Chicago (Series I, Chicago, 1900), reproduces the same argument. Meighan held John of Salisbury to be unanswerable (Tarleton, p. 180). The overwhelming weight of authority is therefore in favour of the genuineness of the passage in "Metalogicus." The Bull "Laudabiliter" stands on a different footing. Opinions have hitherto been sharply divided as to its genuineness, as will be seen by a reference to the works of those who hold that these opinions have been formed without a knowledge of the text of the "Laudabiliter" in the Book of Leinster, except in the case of Boichorst, who refers to it casually in a note which has been recently published for the first time by the writer (New Ireland Review March, 1906; cf. his History of Ireland, xxvi, Dublin, 1906). To the text of the Bull are prefixed the following headings: "Ali men of the faith of the world, how beautiful [so far Gaelic] when over the cold sea in ships Zephyrus wafts glad tidings! [Latin]—A Bull granted to the King of the English on the collar, i.e., the grant, of Hibernia, in which nothing is derogation from the rights of the Irish, as appears by the words of the text. This was almost certainly written, and probably by his old tutor Aedh McErimthain, during the lifetime of Diarmaid MacMuichada, who was banished in 1157, and died in 1171. The text of the Bull was therefore no medieval scholastic piece. For all that, the documents in the "Metalogicus" to be correct, the texts relating to the Donation of Adrian may be conjecturally arranged as follows: (1) The Letter of Investiture referred to by John of Salisbury, 1156; (2) "Laudabiliter," prepared probably in 1156, and issued in 1159 (?); (3) A Confirmation of the Letter of Investiture by Alexander III in 1159 (?); (4) Three Letters of Alexander III, 20 September, 1172, in substance a confirmation of "Laudabiliter." The Bull was not sent forward in 1156 because the offer of Adrian was not then acted on, though the investiture was accepted. Robert of Torrigny (d. 1186 or 1184) tells us that at a Council held at Winchester, 29 September, 1156, the question of subduing Ireland and giving it to William, Henry's brother, was considered; "but because it was not pleasing to the Emperor, Henry's brother, the expedition was put off to another time" (intermissa est ad tempus illa expeditio, nisi breui ante Before the year 1156), and the investiture and supports the genuineness of the passage in the "Metalogicus." Henry, then twenty-two, had his hands full of domestic troubles with the refractory barons in England, with the Welsh, and with the discordant elements in his French dominions, and could not undertake a great military operation like the invasion of Ireland. And not having done so in the lifetime of Adrian, he would certainly require a confirmation of the Donation by Alexander before leading an army into a territory the overlordship of which belonged to the latter. The Letter of Confirmation is found only in Giraldus Cambrensis, first produced in "De Expugnatione Hiberniae" (Hist. Gild., ii, 315), and again in the "De Instructio Principis" (II, c. xiii, in Rolls Series VIII, 197), where the text states that the genuineness of the confirmation was denied by some. This, however, may be a later interpolation, as some maintain. The three letters of 20 September, 1172, do not contain any direct confirmation of the Donation of Adrian. They are addressed to Henry II, the bishops, and the kings and chieftains of Ireland respectively. The letter addressed to Henry congratulates him on his success, and exhorts him to protect and extend the rights of the Church, and to offer the first fruits of his victory to God. The letter to the bishops states that there is no grant of Ireland contained in the letter, nor any confirmation of a previous grant, but how could we expect a second confirmation if Adrian’s grant had been destroyed? According to the context shows was “Laudabiliter.” On 30 May, 1318, the Pope wrote from Avignon a letter of paternal advice to Edward II, urging him to redress the grievances of the Irish, and enclosed O’Neill’s letters and “a copy of the grant which Pope Adrian is said to have made to Henry II.” Edward II did not deny that he held under that grant. By an Act of the Irish Parliament (Parliament Roll, 7th Edward IV, Ann. 1467), after reciting that “as our Holy Father Adrian, Pope of Rome, was possessed of all sovereignty of Ireland in his demesne as of fee in the right of his Church of Rome, and with the intent that vice should be subdued and the said land bequeathed to the King of England ... by which grant the said subjects of Ireland owe their allegiance to the King of England as their sovereign Lord,” it was enacted “that all archbishops and bishops shall excommuni-cate all disobedient Irish subjects, and if they neglect to do so they shall forfeit £100.” In 1555, a consistorial decree followed by a Bull, Paul IV, on the humble supplication of Philip and Mary, erected into a kingdom the Island of Hibernia, of which,
from the time that the kings of England obtained the dominion of it through the Apostolic See, they had merely called themselves Lords (Domes), without prejudice to the rights of the Roman Church and of any other person claiming to have right in it or to it.
[Bull. Rom. (ed. Turin) VI, 489, 490.] In 1570
the Irish had offered or were about to offer the kings-ship of Ireland to Philip of Spain. The Archbishop of Cashel acted as their envoy. The project was countermanded by Pope Pius V, who wrote to the Archbishop of Cashel (9 June, 1570): “His Holiness was astonished that anything of the kind should be attempted without his authority since it was easy to remember that the kingdom of Ireland belonged to the dominion of the Church, without the consent of it, and could not therefore,
unless by the Pope, be subjected to any new ruler.
And the Pope, that the right of the Church may be preserved as it should be, says he will not give the letters you ask for the King of Spain. But if the King of Spain himself were to ask for the fee of that Kingdom in my opinion the Pope would not refuse”.
(See also C. H. Moreton, Church and State in Ireland, 1060-1782, pp. 130-131.) Admitting that there is not in my judgment any controverted matter in history about which the evidence preponder-ates in favour of one view so decisively as about the Donation of Adrian.

The principal authorities for the life of Adrian are collected in WATTESCH’s Vita Pontificum Romanorum (sec. IX-XIII)
adjecta suis casuque et omnibus et documentis gravibus (Leipzig, 1605). I. He gives the Life of Adrian by Bonrond and extracts from the annals of William of Newburgh, William of Tyre, Rimondal of Salerno, Otto of Freising, Reginald of Prüm, and Godefridus of Cologne, as well as letters (II, 323). There is also a valuable chapter (v) of Protestant, I, (XXXI). To Wattesch’s may be added John of Salernite, Adolphus of Prüm, and the Papal letters.

As to the genuineness of Laudabiliter, the literature is very voluminous. The following are some of the chief: John Lydgate: Historie of the bryne Eoroes (1602), Stephen White (d. before 1660),

ADRIAN, Roman Emperor. See Hadrian; Roman Empire.

ADRIAN of Canterbury, Saint, an African by birth, d. 710. He became Abbot of Nerida, a Benedictine monastery near Naples, when he was very young. Pope Vitalian intended to appoint him Archbishop of Canterbury to succeed St. Deusdedit, who had died in 664, but Adrian considered himself unworthy of so great a dignity, and begged the Pope to appoint Theodore, a Greek monk, in his place. The Pope yielded, on condition that Adrian should accompany Theodore to England and be his adviser in the administration of the Diocese of Canterbury. They left Rome in 679, but Adrian was detained in France by Ebriox, the Mayor of the Palace, who suspected that he had a secret mission from the Eastern Emperor, Constant II, to the English kings. After two years Ebriox found that his suspicion had been groundless and allowed Adrian to proceed to England. Immediately upon his arrival in England, Archbishop Theodore appointed him Abbot of St. Peter in Canterbury, a monastery which had been founded by St. Augustine, the apostle of England, and became afterwards known as St. Austin’s. Adrian accompanied Theodore on his apostolic visitations of England, and by his prudent advice and co-operation assisted greatly in the great work of unifying the customs and practices of the Anglo-Saxon Church with those of the Church of Rome. Adrian was well versed in all the branches of ecclesiastical and profane learning. Under his direction the School of Canterbury became the centre of English learning. He established numerous other schools in various parts of England. In these schools of Adrian were educated many of the saints, scholars, and missionaries, who during the next century rekindled the waning light of faith and learning in France and Germany. After spending thirty-nine years in England Adrian died in the year 710 and was buried at Canterbury. His feast is celebrated 9 January, the day of his death.

MICHAEL OTT.

ADRIAN of Castello, also called DE CORNETO, from his birthplace in Tuscany, an Italian prelate of the 12th century and man of learning, b. about 1460; d. about 1521. In 1488 he was sent by Innocent VIII as nuncio to Scotland, but was recalled when the news of the death of James III reached Rome. However, Adrian had arrived in England and gained the favour of Henry VII, who appointed him as his agent at Rome. In 1489 he returned to England as collector of Peter’s-pence, and in 1492 obtained the prebend of Ealdland in St. Paul’s Cathedral, and the rectory of St. Dunstan-in-the-East. On the death of Innocent VIII, he returned to Rome, where he acted as secretary in the Papal treasury and also as ambassador of Henry VII. In 1502 he was promoted to the Bishopric of Hereford. In 1503 Alexander VI raised him to the cardinalate with the title of St. Chrysogonus. After the death of Alexander VI, Adrian’s influence in Rome declined. In 1504 he was translated to the Bishopric of Bath and Wells, but never occupied the see. In 1509, fearing the displeasure of Julius II, he left Rome for Venice, and there he remained until the death of Julius and the election of Leo X, when he returned to Rome (1511). He was again, in 1517, implicated in a charge of conspiring with Cardinal Petrucci to poison the Pope, and confessed to having been privy to the affair. He was forgiven by Leo, but found it safer to escape.

there are only a very few United Bulgarians, with an episcopal church of St. Elias, and the churches of St. Demetrius and Ste. Cyril and Methodius. The last is served by the Resurrectionists, who have also a college of 90 pupils. In the suburb of Kara-Aghatch, the Assumptionists have a parish and a seminary with 50 pupils. Besides the United Bulgarians, the above statistics include the Greek Catholic missions of Malgarra and Daoudiili, with 4 priests and 200 faithful, because from the civil point of view they belong to the Bulgarian Vicariate. He was ordained in 1566, and was Director of the Convent of St. Barbara in Delft till expelled by the storm of the Reformation. His works are: "Vita Jesu Christi" (Antwerp, 1578); "Thesaurus Sanctae Bibliorum Historiarum" (Cologne, 1590). This last work gives a description of Palestine, of the antiquities of Jerusalem, and a chronology from Adam till the death of John the Apostle, A. d. 109.

Adso, Abbot of the Cluniac monastery of Moutier-en-Der, d. 992, on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; one of the foremost writers of the tenth century. Born of rich and noble parents, he was educated at the abbey of Luxeuil, was called to Toul as chancellor of the clergy, and made Abbot of Moutier-en-Der in 960. He was the friend of Gerbert, afterwards Silvester II, of Abbo of Fleury, and other famous men of his time. His writings include hymns, lives of saints, among them a life of St. Mansuetus, Bishop of Toul (485–500), a medical rendering of the second book of the "Dialogues" of Gregory the Great, and a tractate "De Antichristo" in the form of a letter to Queen Gerberga, wife of Louis IV (d'Outremere). This latter work has been attributed to Rabanus Maurus, Alcuin, and even to St. Augustine, and is regarded by Dolinger as one of the important writings of the medieval conception of Antichrist. It is printed among the works of Alcuin (P. L., Cl., 1289–93). The other writings of Adso are also found in Migne (P. L., CXXXVII, 589–603).

Adurte, Diego Francisco, missionary and historian, b. 1566, at Saragossa, in Spain; d. at Nueva Segovia, in the Philippines, about 1635. He was educated at the University of Alcala and entered the Dominican Order. In 1594, with other members of that Order, he sailed for the Philippines, landing at Manila in 1595. As a missionary he was conspicuous even among the heroic apostles of that period. He first devoted himself to the difficult task of catechizing the Chinese residents in the Philippines, and met with unusual success. Shortly after, he was selected as one of two Dominicans to accompany a military expedition in aid of the native ruler of Cambay. After an eventful journey of more than a year they landed in Siam, only to find that the aid arrived too late, and that they were in danger from the treachery of the natives. They then entered Cochinchina for the purpose of converting the heathen, but were obliged to retire before the ferocity of the natives. Several such journeys by sea and land, some extending over many months and even years, during which he suffered hunger and thirst and equatorial heats, fell to his lot during the labori-

s us years of his middle and later life. Yet no obsta cles could cause him to waver in the work of spreading the Light of faith as preacher, or otherwise.
Cochin Ch现代物流 returned to Manilla, and went thence to Spain (1603) in the interests of the missions. After two years spent in recruiting suitable missionaries, he sailed for the Philippines in 1605. He had already (1595) been made prior of the Dominican convent and rector of the College of San Tomás. In 1608, he was called again to Spain to act as Procurator in the interests of his order, and he began here his famous history of the Dominican Province of the Philippines, one of the most important sources of early Spanish history in the islands. It throws much light on the relations of Church and State in the Philippines. The civil rulers of the island, often unscrupulous and envious, on enslaving and demoralizing the natives, had put these relations in a false light. The work of Fra Diego exhibits truthfully the constant checks which the religious orders put upon the rapacity of the Spanish seekers of wealth. His principal works are "Relación de muchos cristianos que han sido capturados en el Japón desde el año 1616 hasta el de 1628" (Manilla, 1632, 1640); "Relación de algunas entradas que han hecho los religiosos de la orden de Predicadores de la provincia de Santo Rosario" (Manilla, 1638); "Historia de la provincia del Santísimo Rosario de Filipinas, Japón y Chyna" (Manilla, 1640); and Saragossa, "Relación de los gloriosos martírios de seis religiosos de San Domingo de la provincia del Santo Rosario" (Manilla, 1634; Valladolid, 1637), a rare and curious work.

it was taken by Joshua (Jos. xxi. 15; xv. 35), was fortified by Roboam (II Par., xi, 7), mentioned by the prophet Michaes Adulteration of Food (Lat. adulterare, to pollute, to adulterate). This act is defined as the addition of any non-condimental substance to a food, such substance not constituting a portion of the food.

Even this carefully-worded definition is not perfect. Some kinds of salt provisions have so much salt added, and some are impure, that the food is made inedible, rendering the food edible, yet this does not constitute adulteration. Adulteration of food has long been practised. It is mentioned in the case of bread by Pliny, who also says that difficulty was experienced in Rome in procuring pure wines.
Athenians had its public inspected, and sold and France early passed laws to guard against the adulteration of bread, and as far back as the days of Edward the Confessor public punishment was provided for the brewers of bad ale. The legal status of adulteration is largely a matter of statute, varying with each governmental body which attacks the subject. Food is deemed adulterated when it is added to it a substance which deprecitates or injures it; if cheaper or inferior substances are substituted wholly or in part for it; if any val-able or necessary constituent has been wholly or in part abstracted; if it is an imitation; if it is coloured or otherwise treated to make it appear to be a better article; or if it contains any added substance injurious to health.

These are examples of statutory provisions. Poli-citical considerations, such as the desire to protect the food-producers of a country, may affect legislation.
Thus adulteration may be so defined as to include foreign products, which otherwise might be treated as indigenous. Food-preservatives are the best examples of this. Salt, essential in the preparation of meat, is followed in the extensive use, which often constitutes adulteration.
Salt is the classic preservative, but is also a condition, and is seldom classed as an adulterant. Salicylic, benzoic, and borac acids, and their sodium salts, formaldehyde, ammonium fluoride, sulphurous acid, and its salts are well known preservatives. Many of these appear to be innocuous, but there is danger that the continued use of food preserved by their agency may be injurious. Extensive experiments on this subject have been performed by the United States Bureau of Chemistry and by the German Imperial Board of Health, among others.
Some preservatives have been conclusively shown to be injurious when used for long periods, although their occasional use may be attended with no bad effect.
Boric acid is pretty definitely condemned, after experiments on living subjects. Salicylic, sulphurous, and benzoic acids are indicated as injurious. The major fact in modern preservation is that the preservatives are very strong. The principal point is that while the amount of preservative in a sample of food might be innocuous, the constant absorption of a preserving chemical by the system may have bad effects. Preservatives are mostly sold for household use, as for the preparation of 'cold process' preserves. If really made without heat, the tendency is, on the housekeeper's part, to use a proportion of the chemical larger than that employed by the manufacturer, thus increasing any bad effect attributable to them. Colouring matters are much used. Coal-tar colours are employed a great deal, and have received legal recognition in Europe. In the United States the tendency is rather towards vegetable colours. Pickles and canned vegetables are sometimes coloured green with copper manganese; sugar is more yellow by anatase; tur-mersed is used in mustard and some cereal preparations. Apples are the basis for many jellies, which are coloured so as to equalise the appearance. In instance of the use of colouring matter fraudulently, to imitate a more expensive article. But in confectionery dangerous colours, such as chrome yellow, Prussian blue, copper and arsenic-compounds are employed. Yellow and orange-coloured candy is to our taste expected. Fruit syrups, e.g. orange nail, are often artificially coloured. Covered pears are especially to be suspected; often the fact that they are coloured is stated on the label. Artificial flavouring-compounds are employed in the conco-cation of fruit syrups, especially those used for soda water. The latter are often altogether artificial. Using this claim to be real, vinegar, or ethyl alcohol and ethyl acetates; banana essence (a mixture of amyl acetate and ethyl butyrate), and others. Milk is adulterated with water, and indirectly by removing the cream. It is also a favourite subject for pre-servatives. The latter are condemned partly be cause the render the beverage less nutritious, for milk ordinarily exacts a high degree of purity in its surroundings. The addition of water may inroduce disease germs. Cream is adulterated with gelatine, and formaldehyde is employed as a preservative for it. Butter is adulterated to an enormous extent with oleomargarine, a product of beef fat. It is a lawful and popular practice to introduce many enactments that its presence in butter be dicated on the package. Egg is another adulterant of butter. Cheese is made from skim-milk some times, and cotton-seed oil and other cheap fats are substituted for the cream. There are two principal sugar substitutes. One is glucose, with which sugar products are adulterated. It has less than two-thirds the sweetening power of sugar. The other is saccharine. This is the sweetest substance known; it is 300° of the pure sugar, and is regarded as practically harmless. Sugar itself is generally pure. Meat is not much adulterated. It is generally only open to adulteration with preservatives, and cold storage causes these to be little used. It is sometimes dusted over with a preservative which is then baked on, and known as "dust essence". The root of chicory is a common adulterant, and even this has been supplemented by other and cheaper substances such as peas, beans, wheat, ground up after roasting. Attempts have been made to produce a counterfeit of the berry, an imitation being moulded out of some paste, but this has made no inroads. If coffee is bought unground, it will generally be pure, although the country of its origin may not be truthfully stated. Tea is generally pure, except that it may be of much lower grade than stated. Spent leaves are sometimes used, and the appearance is sometimes improved by "facing". This is the agitation with soot or powdered Prussian blue, etc.

Adultery.—It is the purpose of this article to consider adultery with reference only to morality. The study of it, as more particularly affecting the bond of marriage, will be found under the head of INVOCATION. The discussion of adultery may be ordered under the following heads: I. NATURE OF ADULTERY; II. ITS GUILT; and III. OBLIGATIONS EN- TAILED UPON THE OFFENDERS.

1. NATURE OF ADULTERY.—Adultery is defined as carnal connexion between a married person and one unmarried, or between a married person and the spouse of another. It is seen to differ from fornication in that it supposes the marriage of one or both of the agents. Nor is it necessary that this marriage be already consummated; it need only be what theologians call matrimonium radum. Sexual commerce with one who is not married, is in general held, constitute adultery. Again, adultery as the definition declares, is committed in carnal intercourse. Nevertheless immodest actions indulged in between a married person and another not the lawful spouse, while not of the same degree of guilt, are of the same character of malice as adultery (Sanchez, De Mat., L. IX. Disp. XLVI. n. 17). It must be added, however, that St. Alphonsus Liguori, with most theologians, declares that even between lawful man and wife adultery is committed when their intercourse takes the form of sodomy (S. Liguori, L. III. n. 440).

Among savages the act of adultery is rigorously condemned and punished. But it is condemned and punished only as a violation of the husband's rights. Among such peoples the wife is commonly reckoned as the property of her spouse, and adultery, therefore, is identified with theft. But it is theft of the most aggravated kind, which is punished even if it is a soplation more highly appraised than other chattels. So it is that in some parts of Africa the seder is punished with the loss of one or both hands, as one who has perpetrated a robbery upon the husband (Reade, Savage Africa, p. 61). But it is not the seducer alone that suffers. Dire penalties are visited upon the offending wife by her wronged spouse. In many instances she is made to endure such a bodily mutilation as will, in the mind of the aggrieved husband, prevent her being thereafter a temptation to other men (Schoolcraft, Historical and Statistical Information Respecting the History, Condition and Prospects of the Indians of the United States, I. 236; V. 683, 684, 686; also H. H. Bancroft, The Native Races of the Pacific States of North America, I. 514). If, however, the wronged husband could visit swift and terrible retribution upon the adulterous wife, the latter was allowed no cause against the unhappy husband; and legal discrimination found in the practices of savage peoples is moreover set forth in nearly all ancient codes of law. The Laws of Manu are striking on this point. In ancient India, "though destitute of virtue or seeking pleasure elsewhere, or devoid of good qualities, yet his husband must instantly leave her and be married to another wife, and if she comes to him, he must absolutely avoid her, or else he shall be guilty of a sin against the gods, and is wont to be reviled by other men; if a wife, proud of the greatness of her relatives or [her own] excellence, violates the duty which she owes to her lord, the king shall cause her to be devoured by dogs in a place frequented by many" (Laws of Manu, V. 154; VIII. 371).

In the Greco-Roman world we find stringent laws against adultery, yet almost throughout they discriminate against the wife. The ancient idea that the wife was the property of the husband is still operative. The lording of wives practised among some savages was, as Plutarch tells us, encouraged also by Lyceurgus, who, according to Demetrius, was already himself the husband of others, and gave his motive other than that which actuated the savages (Plutarch, Lyceurgus, XXIX). The recognized license of the Greek husband may be seen in the following passage of the Oration against Neera, the author of which is uncertain, though it has been attributed to Demosthenes: "We keep mistresses for our pleasures, concubines for constant attendance, and wives to bear us legitimate children, and to be our faithful housekeepers." Yet, because of the wrong done to the husband only, the Athenian lawgiver, Solon, allowed any man to kill an adulterer whom he had taken in the act (Plutarch, Solon).

In the early Roman Law the jux tori belonged to the husband. There was, therefore, no such thing as the crime of adultery on the part of a husband towards his wife. Moreover, this crime was not committed unless one of the parties was a married woman (Dig., XLVIII, ad leg. Jul.). That the real husband often benefited by this immunity is well known. Thus we are told by the historian Spartianus that Verus, the colleague of Marcus Aurelius, did not hesitate to declare to his reproaching wife: "Uxor enim dignatis nominem est, non voluptatis" (Verus, V.). Later on in Roman history, as the late William E. H. Lecky has shown, the idea that the husband owed a fideli-

ity like that demanded of the wife must have gained ground at least in theory. This Lecky gathers from the legal maxim of Ulpian: "It seems most unfair for a man to require from a wife the chastity he does not himself practice" (Cod. Just., Digest, XLVIII, 5-13; Lecky, History of Eueropean Morals, II, 313).

n the Mosaic Law, as in the old Roman Law, adultery meant only the carnal intercourse of a wife with a man who was not her lawful husband. The intercourse of a married man with a single woman was not accounted adultery, but fornication. The penal statute on the subject, in Lev., xx, 10, makes this a capital offense. If any man covet the wife of another and defile his neighbour's wife let them be put to death both the adulterer and the adulteress." (See also Deut., xxii, 22.) This was quite in keeping with the prevailing practice of polygamy among the Israelites.

In the Christian law this discrimination against the wife is emphatically repudiated. In the law of Jesus Christ regarding marriage the unfaithful husband loses his ancient immunity (Matt., xix, 3-13).

The obligation of mutual fidelity, incumbent upon husband as well as wife, is moreover implied in the mtimization in the laws of Christian states. Dif-amolized the ineffable and lasting union of the Heavenly

Bridegroom and His unsporting Bride, the Church,

St. Paul insists with emphasis upon the duty of equal mutual fidelity in both the marital partners (1 Cor., VII, 4); and several of the Fathers of the Church,

as Tertullian (De Monogamia, cix), Lactantius

(Divin. Inst., LXVI, c. xxiii), St. Gregory Nazianzen

(Oratio, xxxi), and St. Augustine (De Bono Conjugatr, n. 4), have given clear expression to the same idea. But the notion that obligations of fidelity rested upon the husband the same as upon the wife is one that has not always found practical expression in the laws of Christian states. Despite the protests of Mr. Gladstone, the English Parliament passed, in 1857, a law by which a husband

may obtain absolute divorce on account of simple adultery in his wife, while the latter can be freed from her adulterous husband only when his infidelity has been attended with such cruelty "as would have driven a mensula to toro". The same discrimination against the wife is found in some of our early

New England colonies. Thus, in Massachusetts the adultery of the husband, unlike that of the wife, was not sufficient ground for divorce.

And the same most likely was the case in Plymouth Plantation and that against Christian states.

But at present, in our States there is not this discrimination, but divorce, when granted on the ground of adultery, is obtainable by the wife just as by the husband.

II. GUILT OF ADULTERY.—We have referred to the severe punishment meted out to the adulterous woman and her seducer among savages. It is clear, however, that the severity of these penalties did not find their sanction in anything like an adequate idea of the guilt of this crime. In contrast with such rigour is the lofty benignity of Jesus Christ towards the one guilty of adultery (John, viii, 3, 4), a contrast as much as between the Christian doctrine regarding the malice of this sin and the idea of its guilt which prevailed before the Christian era. In the early discipline of the Church we see reflected a sense of the enormity of adultery, though it must be admitted that the severity of this legislation, such as that, for instance, which we find in canons 8 and 47 of the Council of Elvira (c. 300), must be largely accounted for by the general harshness of the times. Considering now the act in itself, adultery, forbidden by the sixth commandment, has in it a twofold malice. In common with fornication it violates chastity, and it is, besides, a sin against justice. Drawing a distinction between these two elements of malice, certain casuists, early in the seventeenth decent, declared that intercourse with a married woman, when her husband gave his consent, constituted not the sin of adultery, but of fornication. It would, therefore, they contended, be sufficient for this consent, having committed this act, to accuse himself of the latter sin only in confession, in the instance of the Archbishop of Mechlin, the Academy of Louvain, in the year 1653, censured as false and erroneous the proposition: "Copula cum conjugata consentiente marito non est adulterium, adeoque sufficit in confessione dicere se esse fornicatum." But in the same penitent he counsels this scruple to be overcome in the case of his neighbour, who himself has intercourse with his wife of this essential characterization. Again, the right of the husband over his wife is qualified by the good of human generation. This good regards not only the birth, but the nourishment and education, of offspring, and the purpose of which is to ensure the legal connection between the parents. Such consent, therefore, as subversive of the good of human generation, becomes juridically void. It cannot, therefore, be added as a ground for the doctrine set forth in the condemned proposition above mentioned. For the legal axiom that an injury is not done to one who knows and wills it (scienti et volenti non fit injuria) finds no place when the consent is thus vitiating.

But it may be asserted that the consent of the husband lessens the enormity of adultery to the extent that whereas, ordinarily, there is a double malice—that against the good of human generation and that against the private rights of the husband, with the consent of the latter there is only the first-named malice; hence, one having had carnal intercourse with another's wife, her husband consenting, should in confession declare the circumstance of this permission that he may not accuse himself of that of which he is not guilty. In answer to this, it must be shown that the injury offered to the husband in adultery is done him not as a private individual but as a member of a marital society, upon whom it is incumbent to consult the good of the prospective child.

As such, his consent does not avail to take away the malice of which it is question. Whence it follows that the question of matrimonial consent is a fact in his consent in the case we have supposed (Viva, Dammato Thees, 318). And here it may be observed that the consenting husband may be understood to have renounced his right to any restriction.

The question has been discussed, whether in adultery committed with a Christian, as distinct from that committed with a Pagan, there would be a special malice against the sacrament constituting a sin against religion. Though some theologians have held that such would be the case, it should be said, with Viva, that the fact that the penitent, having committed this act, had the consent of a Christian, would create no gravitating circumstance only, which would not call for specification in confession.

It need hardly be said that when the parties to adultery are both married the sin is more grievous than when one of them is single. Nor is it sufficient for the married party to confess, as with Viva, that she was also married to declare in confession the fact simply of having committed adultery. The circumstance that both parties to the sin were married is one that must be made known. Again the adulterer in his confession must specify whether, as married,

he violated his own marriage pledge or, as single,
he brought about the violation of the marriage pledge of another. Finally, it is to be observed that in case only one of the parties to adultery is married, a clear distinction is made when the married person is the woman than when she is the unmarried agent. For in the former instance the due process of generation is not infrequently interfered with, to the injury of the lawful husband; moreover, uncertainty of parentage may result, and even a false heir may be imposed upon the family. Such a distinction appears obvious, therefore, calls for specification in the confessional.

III. Obligations Entailed upon the Offenders.—As we have seen, the sin of adultery implies an act of injustice. This is committed against the lawful spouse of the adulterer or adulteress. By the adultery of a wife, besides the injury done the husband by her infidelity, a spurious child may be born which he may think himself bound to sustain, and which may perhaps become his heir. For the injury suffered in the unfaithfulness of his wife restitution must be made to the husband, should he become separated from the wife. Nor is the obligation of this restitution ordinarily discharged by an award of money. A more commensurate reparation, when possible, is to be offered. Whenever it is certain that the offspring is illegitimate, and that the adulterer has employed violence to make the woman sin, he is bound to refund the expenses incurred by the husband, which are significant on the life of the child, and to make restitution for any inheritance which this child may receive. In case he did not employ violence, there being on his part but a simple concurrence, then, according to the more probable opinion of theologians, the adulterer and adulteress are equally bound to the restitution just described. Even when one has moved the other to sin both are bound to restitution, though most theologians say that the obligation is more immediately pressing upon the one who induced the other to sin. When it is not sure that the offspring is illegitimate the common opinion of theologians is that the sinful parties are not bound to restitution. As for the adulterous mother, in case she cannot secretly undo the injustice resulting from the presence of her illegitimate child, she is not obliged to reveal her sin either to her husband or to her spurious offspring, unless the evil which the good name of the mother might sustaine through which she is separated from her failure to make such a revelation. Again, in case there would not be the danger of infancy, she would be held to reveal her sin when she could reasonably hope that such a manifestation would be productive of good results. This kind of issue, however, would be necessarily rare.

Advent (Lat. ad-venitio, to come to), according to present usage, is a period beginning with the Sunday nearest to the feast of St. Andrew the Apostle (30 November) and embracing four Sundays. The first Sunday may be as early as 27 November, and the last as late as 10 December, or at least a week before Christmas. Advent begins as early as 3 December, giving the season only twenty-one days. With Advent the ecclesiastical year begins in the Western churches. During this time the faithful are admonished to prepare themselves worthily to celebrate the anniversary of the Lord's coming into the world as the incarnate God of love, the Annunciation, and of the Redeemer coming in Holy Communion and through grace, and thereby to make themselves ready for His final coming as judge, at death and at the end of the world.

Symbolism.—To attain this object the Church has arranged the Liturgy for this season. In the official prayer, the Breviary, she calls upon her ministers, in the Invitatory for Matins, to adore “the Lord the King that is to come,” “the Lord already near,” “Him Whose glory will be seen on the morrow.” As Lessons for the first Nocturn she prescribes chapters from the prophet Isaiah, who is speaking in scathing terms of the house of Israel, the chosen children who had forsaken and forgotten their Father; who tells of the Man of Sorrows stricken for the sins of His people; who describes accurately the passion and death of the coming Saviour and His final glory; who announces the gathering of the Gentiles to the holy Hill. In the second Nocturn the Lessons on three Sundays are taken from the eighth homily of Pope St. Leo (440-461) on fasting and almsgiving as a preparation for the advent of the Lord, and on one Sunday (the second) from St. Jerome’s commentary on Isa. 1, which text he interprets of the Blessed Virgin Mary as “the root out of the root of Jesse.” In the hymns of the season we find praise for the coming of Christ, the Creator of the universe, as Redeemer, combined with prayer to the coming judge of the world to protect us from the enemy. Similar ideas are expressed in the antiphons of the Psalter as in the Gospel lessons on the days of the Nativity. In them, the Church calls on the Divine Wisdom to teach us the way of prudence; on the Key of David to free us from bondage; on the Rising Sun to illuminate us sitting in darkness and the shadow of death, etc. In the Masses the intention of the Church is shown in the choice of the Epistles and Gospels. In the Epistle she exhorts the faithful that, since the Redeemer is nearer, they should cast aside the works of darkness and put on the armour of light; should walk honestly, as in the day, and put on the Lord Jesus Christ; she shows that the nations are called to praise the name of the Lord; she asks them to rejoice in the nearness of the Lord, so that the peace of God, which surpasses all understanding, may keep their hearts and minds in Christ Jesus; she admonishes them not to pass judgment, for the Lord, when He comes, will manifest the secrets hidden in hearts. In the Gospels the Church speaks of the Saviour coming in the midst of the Jews, and through, Whom the prophecies are being fulfilled; of the Eternal walking in the midst of the Jews; of the voice in the desert, “Prepare ye the way of the Lord.” The Church in her Liturgy takes us in spirit back to the time before the incarnation of the Son of God, as though it were really yet to take place. Cardinal Wiseman says: “We are not dryly exorted to profit by that blessed event, but we are daily made to sigh with the Fathers of old, ‘Send down the dew, ye heavens, from above, and let the clouds rain the Just One: let the earth be opened, and bud forth the Redeemer. The Comforter on three of the four Sundays of the season begin with the words, ‘Lord, raise up thy power and come’—as though we feared our iniquities would prevent His being born.”

Duration and Ritual.—On every day of Advent the Office of the Mass of the Sunday or Feria must be recited at least once, or at least a week before Christmas. For Advent as a whole no matter what grade of feast occurs. In the Divine Office the Te Deum, the joyful hymn of praise and thanksgiving, is omitted; in the Mass the Gloria in excelsis is not said. The Alleluia, however, is retained. During this time the solemnization of matrimony (Nuptial Mass and Benediction) cannot take place; place; place; place; place, which parish rights in the Epiphany inclusively. The celebrant and sacred ministers use violet vestments. The deacon and subdeacon at Mass, in place of the dalmatics commonly used, wear folded chasubles. The subdeacon remains in the rear, facing the people. The deacon exchanges his for another, or for a wider stole, worn over the left shoulder during the time between the singing of the Gospel and the Communion. An exception is made for the third Sunday (Gaudete Sunday), on which the vestments may be more plumed or richer violets; the sacred ministers may on this Sunday wear dalmatics, which may also be used on the Vigil of the Nativity, even if it be the fourth Sunday of Advent. Pope Innocent III (1198–1216) states that black was the colour to be used during Advent, but violet had already come into use for this season at the end of the thirteenth century. It is interesting that there was a law that pictures should be covered during Advent. Flowers and relics of Saints are not to be placed on the altars during the Office and Masses of this time, except on the third Sunday; and the same prohibition and exception exist in regard to the use of the organ. The popular idea that the four weeks of Advent symbolize the four thousand years of darkness in which the world was enveloped before the coming of Christ finds no confirmation in the Liturgy.

Historical Origin.—It cannot be determined with a degree of certainty, from the Christian era, when the celebration of Advent was first introduced into the Church. The preparation for the feast of the Nativity of Our Lord was not held before the feast itself existed, and of this we find no evidence before the end of the fourth century, when, according to Duchesne [Christian Worship (London, 1904), 260], it was celebrated throughout the whole Church, some on 25 December, by others on 6 January. Of such a preparation we read in the Acts of a synod held at Saragossa in 380, whose fourth canon prescribes that from the seventeenth of December to the feast of the Epiphany no one should be permitted to absent himself from church. We have two homilies of St. Maximus, Bishop of Turin (415–466), entitled “In Adventu Domini”, but he makes no reference to a special time. The title may be the addition of a copyist. There are some homilies extant, most likely of St. Cæsarius, Bishop of Arles (502–542), in which we find mention of a preparation before the birthday of Christ; still, there is no mention of any general law on the matter seems then to have been in existence. A synod held (581) at Mâcon, in Gaul, by its ninth canon orders that from the eleventh of November to the Nativity the Sacrifice be offered according to the Lenten rite on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of the week. The Gelasian Sacramentary notes five Sundays for the season; these five were reduced to four by Pope St. Gregory VII (1073–85). The collection of homilies of St. Gregory the Great (590–604) begins with a sermon for the second Sunday of Advent. In 650 Advent was celebrated in Spain, with five Sundays. Several synods had added laws about fasting to be observed during this time, some beginning with the eleventh of November, others the fifteenth, and others as early as the autumnal equinox. Other synods forbade the celebration of matrimony. In the Greek Church we find no documents for the observance of Advent earlier than the eighth century. The rich man (d. 826), who speaks of the feasts and fasts commonly celebrated by the Greeks, makes no mention of this season. In the eighth century we find it observed not as a liturgical celebration, but as a time of fast and abstinence, from 15 November to the Nativity, which, according to Gour, extended to seven days. But a council of the Germanic Empire (717) ordered the fast according to the old rule from the fifteenth of November. This is the rule with at least some of the Greeks. Similarly, the Ambrosian and the Mozarabic rites have no special liturgy for Advent, but only the fast.

I. Evangelical Adventists.—A group of American Protestant sects which hold in common a belief in the near return of Christ in person, and differ from one another mainly in their understanding of several doctrines related to this common belief. There are the so-called “Seventh Day Adventists” and the branch entitled “The Church of God”, congregational in government. The sects of Adventists are the outcome of a religious agitation begun by William Miller (1781–1849) in 1831, after a minute study of the prophecies of the Bible. Testing the mysterious pronouncements concerning the Messias by a method exclusively historical, he looked for the fulfilment of every prophecy in its obvious surface reading. Every prophecy which had not been literally accomplished in the first coming of Christ must needs be accomplished in His second; therefore, he now return at the end of the world in the clouds of heaven to recover the land of Canaan, and to reign in an earthly triumphant on the throne of David for a thousand years. Moreover, taking the 2,300 days of the Prophet Daniel for so many years, and computing from 457 B.C.—that is, from the commencement of the seventy weeks before the first coming, Miller concluded that the world would come to an end, and Christ would return, in A.D. 1843. He gave wide circulation to his views and gained a considerable following in a few years. When the year 1843 had passed as any other, and the prediction had failed, Snow, one of his disciples, set himself to correct Miller’s calculations, and in his turn announced the end of the world for 22 October, 1844. As the day drew near groups of Millerites here and there throughout the United States, putting aside all worldly occupations, awaited, in a fever of expectancy, the promised coming of Christ, but were again doomed to disappointment. The faithful followers of Miller met in general law on the evening of 22 October, 1844, and professed their unshaken faith in the near personal coming of the Son of God. And this has remained the fundamental point of the Adventist creed. According to the official census of 1890, the Adventists had 60,491 communicants; at present they have about 100,000 adherents all told. The Adventist movement, inaugurated by Miller, has differentiated into the following independent bodies:—

1. Evangelical Adventists (the original stock).—They believe the dead are conscious after separation from the body, and that, after the first, first to reign with Christ on earth for the Millennium, and after the Judgment, in heaven for all eternity; the wicked to rise at the Day of Judgment to be condemned to hell for ever. They may be said to have organized in 1845. They number 1,147 communicants. II. Advent Christians.—These believe that the dead lie in an unconscious state until the millennium, when the righteous will rise; the wicked, at the resurrection of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. They believe that the dead remain unconscious until Judgment, when the wicked will be

Advertisements. Book of.—A series of enactments concerning ecclesiastical matters, drawn up by Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury (1559-75), with the help of Grindal, Horne, Cox, and Bullingham. It is important as connected with the origin of English Nonconformity, and as being one of a group of documents concerning ritual, the import of which became in the nineteenth century the subject of prolonged and inconclusive discussion. On Elizabeth’s accession (November, 1558), the Latin services and the Catholic ceremonial were in use. The return from exile of the extreme Protestants, whose doctrinal disputes at Frankfort had shown to which extremes they had been carried at a time of weakness and of Governors’ was viewed with apprehension by those in authority. The opposition of the House of Lords to the Act of Uniformity (1559), rendering obligatory the use of the English Prayer-Book, made the Government warily follow a policy of compromise. The rubric authorizing (subject to the prose of the act, “until other order should be taken by the Queen”), the retention of the Catholic ornaments in use in the second year of Edward VI, was in direct opposition to the tone of the rest of the Prayer-Book, for the communion service was substantially that of the second Prayer-Book of Edward VI (1552), which had been used at a time when the power of the Reformation was at its height. The Reformers’ dismay was extreme. “Other order”, however, was taken by Elizabeth in the “Injunctions”, of which the provisions, though opposed to the rubric, became the rule of the Anglican Church. The Reformers were further appeased by the wholesale destruction of Catholic vestments and emblems during the General Visitation (April-October, 1559). The Bishops’ Conference held in February, 1560, ended in compromise; the crucifix was rejected, but the cope was retained. Such “rags of the Roman Antichrist” irritated the extreme Reformers, who wanted a worship purified from all traces of Popery, and they were, like the Puritans, known as “Puritans”. They would have none of the cap and gown for clerical use in daily life, nor of the surplice in church. Elisabeth peremptorily called upon the bishops (January, 1564-65) to restore uniformity, and Parker with Grindal and others drew up a “Book of Articles”, which he forwarded to Queen Mary, in 1563. The intense annoyance they were not approved; but after many delays and alterations they were again submitted to Cecil (28 March, 1566), and published under the title of “Advertisements, partly for due order in the publick administration of common sacrifices and usages of the modern church, for the apparell of all persons ecclesiastical.” Elisabeth withheld her formal assent and support; and the bishops were told to exercise their own lawful authority, and so made to bear all the odium their action aroused. The “Advertisements” recognize that it is impossible to get the cope worn at the communion service, and are content to enforce the use of the surplice. Hence, then, the clerical vestment for all services is the surplice, in the parish church, and the cope for the communion service in cathedral churches. Even that was too much for the liking of the extremists. Conformity was enforced under penalty of deposition; thus giving rise to violent dissensions which embittered Parker’s closing years, and occasioned the first open separation of Nonconformists from the Church of England.

Advocates of Nonconformity. See Advocate.

Advocates of Roman Congregations are persons, ecclesiastical or lay, versed in canon and civil law, who plead causes before the ecclesiastical tribunals in Rome. The learning required of these advocates is exceptional and profound. Besides a thorough acquaintance with jurisprudence, both canonical and civil, they must also be versed in moral and dogmatic Theology, and in sacred and profane history. Frequent references to the councils and canons of the Church and to the decrees of the Sovereign Pontiffs oblige them to acquire a deep and varied erudition, which usually embraces language and literature. Many are in the Cardinass’s Court. In several ways the advocate of the Roman Court differs from the ordinary legal pleader. In the first place, it is not his duty to establish the facts in a given case. That is the business of another official called the procurator. The advocate assumes the facts delivered to him by the procurator to be true, and on them he builds his legal argument. Dealing as he does directly with points of law and not with the question of establishing facts, he is freed from the temptation of suborning false witnesses or distorting testimony. Again, a Roman advocate pleads always before learned judges. He cannot be bribed by a sum of money, as the advocate of modern. sistorial advocates proper were originally only seven in number, forming the Consistorial College. Sixtus IV added five more (called jurists), and this number of twelve was definitely fixed by Benedict XIV in 1744. The other advocates are called titular or simple advocates.

WILLIAM H. W. FANNING.

Advocates of St. Peter, a body of jurists constituting a society whose statutes were confirmed by a brief of Pope XII, 5 July 1787. As the name indicates, its main object is the defence of the Holy See in its rights and privileges, both in the spiritual and temporal order. It binds its members to refute calumnies of enemies of the Church, whether derived from distortions of history, jurisprudence, or dogma, but above all are they to devote their legal knowledge to a defence of the Church's rights before civil tribunals. The society was formed in 1787, on the occasion of the Golden Episcopal Jubilee of Pope Pius IX, and the Advocate Count Cajetan Agnelli dei Malherbi, of Rome, became its first president. Pope Pius IX warmly approved of the undertaking, and deputed to extend its influence and interests in every part of the society. The immunities of the society are established by an edict of the pope, and are as follows:

1. It has a right to defend the interests of the Church before civil tribunals.
2. It has the right to maintain the rights of the Church in all parts of the world.
3. It is exempt from all taxes and contributions.

Advocaci Diaboli (Advocate of the Devil), a popular title given to one of the most important officers of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, established in 1587, by Sixtus V, to deal juridically with processes of beatification and canonization. Its official title is Promoter of the Faith (Promotor Fidei). Its duties require him to prepare in writing all arguments, public and private, reduced to their proper effect, against the raising of any one to the honours of the altar. The interest and honour of the Church are concerned in preventing any one from receiving such honours whose death is not juridically proved to have been "precious in the sight of God." (see Beatification and Canonization). Prospero Lambertini, afterwards Pope Benedict XIV (1740–58), was the Promoter of the Faith for twenty years, and had every opportunity to study the workings of the Church in this most important function; he was, therefore, peculiarly qualified to compose his monumental work "On the Beatification and Canonization of Saints," which contains the complete vindication of the rights of the Church in this matter, and sets forth historically its extreme care of the use of this right. No important act in the process of beatification or canonization is valid unless performed in the presence of the Promoter of the Faith. The advocate's duty is to protest against the omission of the forms laid down, and to insist upon the consideration of any objection. The first formal mention of such an officer is found in the canonization of St. Lawrence Justinian under Leo X (1519–21). Urban VIII, in 1631, made his presence necessary, at least by deputy, for the validity of any act connected with the process of beatification or canonization.

Advocatus Ecclesiae, a name applied, in the Middle Ages, to certain lay persons, generally of noble birth, whose duty it was, under given conditions, to represent a particular church or monastery, and to defend its rights against force. These advocates were specially bound to represent their clients before the secular courts. They exercised a civil jurisdiction in the domain of the church, and were also bound to protect the church with arms in the event of actual assault. Finally, it was their duty to lead the men-at-arms in the name of the church or monastery, and to command them in time of war. In return for these services the advocate received certain definite revenues from the possessions of the church, in the form of supplies or services, which he could demand, or in the form of a lien on the church property. Such advocates are to be found even in Roman times; a Synod of Carthage decreed, in 401, that the emperor should be requested to provide, in conjunction with the bishops, defensores for the churches. (Hefele, "Conciliengeschichte," 2d ed., I, 83). There is evidence, moreover, for such defensores ecclesiae in Italy, at the close of the fifth century. Gregory I, however, confined the office to members of the clergy. It was the duty of these defensores to protect the poor, and to defend the rights and possessions of the church. In the Frankish kingdom, and under the Carolingians, the duties of the church advocate were enlarged and defined according to the principles of government which prevailed in the reign of Charlemagne; henceforward we meet with the advocatus ecclesiae in the medieaval sense. A Capitulary of Lothair (Annales Gymn., Hist., Cap. Reg. Franco., I, 201) ordained that the higher clergy, "for the sake of the church's honour, and the respect due to the priesthood (pro ecclesiastico honore, et pro sacerdotum reverentia)" should have advocates. Charlemagne, who obliged bishops, abbots, and abbesses to maintain advocates, commanded that great care should be exercised in the choice of persons to fill the office; they must be judicious men, familiar with the law, and owning property in the county (Grafshaft.--See Capitulary of 802, and 801–13, l. c. 1, 93, 172). The churches, monasteries, and canons, as such, alike required advocates; they were bound to hold at least one defensores for the position above defined. In the time of Carthage the king had the right to appoint the advocates, but many ecclesiastical institutions obtained the right of election. The office was not, at first, hereditary, nor even for life; in the post-Carolingian period, however, it developed into an hereditary one, and was held by powerful nobles, who constantly endeavoured to enlarge their rights in connection with the church or the monastery. Conciliar decrees were passed as early as the ninth century to protect ecclesiastical institutions against the excessive claims of their advocates, who, indeed, grew to be in many ways a hereditary nobility, by definition allowed to deal with the possessions entrusted to them as with their own property, plundered the church estate, appropriated the tithes and other revenues, and oppressed in every possible way those whom they were appointed to protect. The office, since it offered many advantages, was eagerly sought after. The office of the advocate was the duty to settle disputes between them and the churches or monasteries. The bishops and abbots, who found their rights seriously curtailed, appealed to the emperor and to the Pope for protection. In the twelfth century grave warnings issued from Rome, restraining the high-handed actions of the advocates under pain of severe ecclesiastical penalties, which did not, however, put an end to all the abuses that prevailed. On certain occasions, emperors and princes exercised the office of advocatory. For, the said Church, in point of time, did not always send the bishop, which is necessary to make the diocese capable of possessing a patron right. Hence, a right of patronage did not always belong to the Church, or to the bishop, but only to the patron, who was the person entitled to the right. This right was also considered as a legal right, and the patron was considered as the lawful owner of the see. The Church, therefore, had no right to establish a patron who was not entitled to the right.

Advowson (Lat., advocatio; Old Fr., anion.)—In English law the right of patronage of a church or ecclesiastical benefice, a right exercised by nomination of a clergyman to such church or other benefice. English law recognizes two kinds of advowsons, presentative and collatie. Until the year 1898 there was also a third kind, known as advowson donative.

I. In the very early Saxon period parishes and dioceses in England were co-terminous, each bishop residing with his clergy at his cathedral church. The clergy went forth to distant regions of the diocese, preaching and administering the sacraments. But as the ecclesiastical revenues were never sufficient for support of the bishop and clergy, repair of churches and other works of piety and devotion. In course of time parochial churches arose, in some places through the liberality of the inhabitants, in other places by the action of the bishops themselves. By the eighth century, it is said, great lords, such as the lords of manors, had begun to build and endow churches for the use of their families and tenants, or friends. Bishops would permit the founder of a church to nominate his resident priest; and, moreover, consented that, contrary to the ancient custom, the use of its income should be restricted to such a church. But as the bishop's permission was required for the erection of a church, he had to pronounce upon the sufficiency of its endowment unde dignus domus Dei sustentetur (that the house of God should thereby be worthily supported), and the nominee was to be presented to him, and approved of. He was also, in point of right, the patron of an advowson presentative. In those rude ages there followed on this right to nominate, the duty to defend, to become advocatus or advowee, champion or protector of the church of which the patron had named the incumbent. About the year 800 these lay foundations had become common. Moreover, monasteries were often vested with advowsons by act of their founders or benefactors. After the Norman conquest, French or Norman monasteries might hold the advowsons of English parishes. And when at the time of the Reformation the English monasteries were suppressed their advowsons passed with their estates to the crown, as a right of property.

II. Advowsons donative were recognized by the law of England until 1898. A statute of that year made all such advowsons presentative. The owner of an advowson donative possessed by law extraordinary privileges. His right of patronage was exercised in precisely the same manner as the right of the bishop. The latter had not, as in advowsons presentative, the right of instituting; that is, the right of conveying or committing the cure to the incumbent; nor the right of induction; that is, of issuing a mandate inducting the incumbent into possession of the church, with its rights and profits. The patron, on the other hand, had the right of nomination which, originally, was conferred on a person building or endowing a church, appears to have become, by degrees, “appendant to the manor in which it was built” (8 Bingham's Reports, 491) and, therefore, termed an advowson appendant. And the boundaries of manors became the boundaries of parishes. But in many instances advowsons passed out of the hands of the private persons, or to lay or ecclesiastical corporations. Advowsons thus severed from ownership of

III. An advowson collative is an advowson held by a bishop, who is said to confer the benefit “by the one act of collation,” remarks Sir William Blackstone. For, the same with the appointed deputy-advocates (subadovoci) to represent them.
and are termed advowsons in gross. There are in the Church of England more than 13,000 benefices; of these, in or about 1875, private persons held the advowsons of some 7,000, and bishops, of only about 2,324, the remainder being divided among deans and chapters, the universities, and parochial clergy. The ancient duty of protection, or championing, a church, ceased, long since, to attach to the right of presentation. An advowson may apparently be held by a Jew, if he be owner in his own right, and not merely in an official capacity. But no Roman Catholic or alien may exercise the rights of a patron or present to a see, without the vicar chivalry. To the English patron paramount of all benefices in England, belongs the right of presenting to those benefices to which no other person has a right of presentation.

Adyllum (from Adjut), n. a privative of Latin et, enter. a secret chamber or place of retirement in the ancient temples, and esteemed the most sacred spot; the innermost sanctuary or shrine. None but the officiating priests were permitted to enter. From this place the oracles were given. The Holy of Holies, or Sanctum Santorum, of the temple of Solomon was of the nature of the pagan adyllum; none but the high priest being admitted into it, and that only once a year. Among the Egyptians the secoa was the same thing, and is described by Strabo. A well-preserved adyllum that has come to our knowledge is in the little temple in Pompeii; it is raised some steps above the level of the temple itself, and is without light. In Christian architecture it, sometimes signifies the chancel, or altar end of a church. (See CHANCEL.)

Aedan of Ferns, Saint, (Aedh-og or Mo-Aedh-og) Bishop and patron of Ferns, in Ireland, b. at Inisbrelny, near Templeport, County Cavan, about 550; d. at Ferns, 31 January, 632. When a youth he was a hostage in the hands of Aedh Ainmire, High-King of Ireland. He ended his days in the abbey of Kilmoine, in Wales, under St. David, and returned to Ireland in 580, landing on the coast of Wexford. In thanksgiving for the victory of Dunbog, County Wicklow, 10 January, 598, in which King Ead was slain, Bran Dubh, King of Leinster, convened a synod at which, having represented the great services rendered to the kingdom of Leinster by St. Aedan, notably the remission of the Borobrahm tribute, it was agreed that Ferns be made an episcopal see, with Aedan as first bishop. He was also given a nominal supremacy over the other Leinster bishops by the title of Ard-Escop or Chief Bishop. King Bran Dubh with claim Ferns in 603. St. Aedan, who is known as Mogue (Mo-Aedh-og =my dear Aedh) founded thirty churches in the County Wexford. The episcopal seat of Ferns is now at Enniscorthy, where there is a beautiful cathedral dedicated to St. Aedan, whose patronal feast is observed 31 January.

Aedh of Kildare, King of Leinster, an Irish saint, commemorated by Colgan under date of 4 January; but much obscurity attaches to his life-work. The "Annals of the Four Masters" and the "Annals of Ulster" agree in the account of this monarch, who resigned his crown and eventually became Bishop of Kildare. Under the name of Aidas, a Latinized form of Aedh, his name appears to be found in several martyrologies. The year of his death was 639, according to the corrected chronology of the "Annals of Ulster." Colgan tells us that he resigned the throne of Leinster in 591 (really, 592), and entered the great monastery of Kildare, where he served God for forty-eight years, becoming successively abbot and bishop. His episcopate was from about 630 to 639. He must not be confounded with Aedh Finn, king of Osory, known as Aedh the cleric, who was a contemporaneous, and resigned the throne of Osory for a monastic cell. St. Aedh of Leinster is styled Aedh Dubh, from his dark face, whilst Aedh of Osory was fair, hence the affix finn (finn = fair). Another St. Aedh is venerated on 3 May.

Aegidius of Assisi, Blessed, one of the original companions of St. Francis. He is also known as Blessed Giles, and holds the foremost place among the companions of St. Francis. "The Knight of our Round Table" St. Francis called him. Of his antecedents and early life nothing certain is known.

In April, 1209, moved by the example of two leading fellow-Assisians, who became the first followers of St. Francis, he begged permission to join the little band, and on the feast of St. George was invested in a poor habit St. Francis had begged for him. Almost instantly the set out and no one has ever had the right to preach in the Marches of Ancona. He accompanied the saint to Rome when the first Rule was approved orally by Innocent III, and appears to have then received the clerical tonsure. About 1212 Aegidius made a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. James at Compostella, in Spain. Shortly after his return to Assisi he started for Jerusalem, to venerate the Holy Places, visiting on his way home the Italian shrines of St. Michael, at Monte Gargano, and St. Nicholas, at Bari. We next find him in Rome and still later at Tunis. In these journeys Aegidius was ever at pains to procure by manual labour what food and shelter he could find. At Ancona he lifted all the andalus baskets; at Brindisi he carried water and helped to bury the dead; at Rome he cut wood, trod the wine-press, and gathered nuts; while the guest of a cardinal at Rieti he insisted on sweeping the house and cleaning the knives. A keen observer of men and events, Aegidius acquired in the course of these travels, much valuable knowledge and experience, which he turned to good account. For he lost no occasion of preaching to the people. His sermons, if such they can be called, were brief and heartfelt talks, replete with homely wisdom; he never minced his words, but spoke to all with apostolic freedom. After some years of activity under Aegidius name is to be taken to be the hermitage of Fabriano, where he began that life of contemplation and ecstasy which continued with very visible increase until his death. It was in 1262, on the fiftieth anniversary of his reception into the Order of Friars Minor, that Aegidius passed away, already revered as a saint. His immortal canon was confirmed by Pius VI, and his feast is celebrated on the twenty-third of April.

Aegidius was a stranger to theological and classical learning, but by constant contemplation of heavenly things, and by the divine love with which he was inflamed, he acquired that fullness of holy wisdom which filled his contemporaries with wonder, and which drew men of every condition, even the Pope himself, to Perugia to hear from Aegidius' lips the Word of Life. The answers and advice given to them were received with the utmost attention, and they were cited in the works of many subsequent ascetical writers. They are short, pithy, popular counsels on Christian perfection, applicable to all classes. Saturated with mysticism, yet exquisitely human and possessing a picturesque vein of originality, they faithfully reflect the early Franciscan spirit and teaching. The latest and best edition of the "Dicta" is that published at Quaracchi, in 1905. There is a critical English translation of the same: "The Golden Words of the Blessed Brother Giles", together with a sketch of his life, by the writer of this article (Philadelphia, 1906); also a new German version, "Der selige Aegidius von Viterbo Leben und seine Spruchbücher", by Gisbert Minge (Paderborn, 1908).

Aegidius of Viterbo, cardinal, theologian, orator, humanist, and poet, b. at Viterbo, Italy; d. at Rome, 12 November, 1532. He entered the Augustinian Order at an early age and became its general. Aegidius is famous in ecclesiastical history for the boldness and earnestness of the discourses which he delivered at the opening of the Fifth General Council, held in 1512, at the Lateran. It is printed in Harduin's collection of the councils (IX, 1576). Leo X made him cardinal, confided to him several sees in succession, employed him as legate on important missions, and gave him (1523) the title of (Latin) Patriarch of Constantinople. His zeal for the genuine reform of ecclesiastical conditions prompted him to present to Adrian VI a "Promemoria", edited by Constantijn Hoofer in the proceedings of the Munich Academy of Sciences [III class, IV, 3 (62-89)]. Heinrich Steinhäuser states that Aegidius was a continuous member of the great pontifical senate and many deemed him destined to succeed Clement VII. He wrote many works, but only a few of his writings have been printed in the third volume of the "Collectio Novissima" of Marteame. He was a profound student of the Scriptures and a good scholar in Greek and Hebrew.

When urged by Clement VII to publish his works, he is said, by the Augustinian Thomas de Herrera, to have replied that he feared to contradict famous and holy men by his exposition of Scripture. The Pope replied that human respect should not deter him; it was his duty to publish the truth in its rightful place and was contrary to the opinions of others. Provided one did not depart from the truth and from the common tradition of the Church (Nat. Alex., Hist. Ecl., sec. XV, 1, 5; XVI, 354). His principal work is an historical treatise yet unpublished: "Historia viginti seculorum per toludem psalmos conscripta". It is the earliest attempt to write the history of the world before and after the birth of Christ, is valuable for the history of his own time, and offers a certain analogy with Bossuet's famous "Discours sur l'histoire universelle". The six books of his important correspondence (1497-1523) contain the record of his communications, addressed to Gabriel of Venice, his successor, are preserved at Rome in the Bibliotheca Angelica. Cardinal Hegenröther praises particularly the circular letter in which Aegidius made known (27 February, 1519) his resignation of the office of General of the Augustinian Order (Lammer, "Zur Kirchengeschichte des XVI. und XVII. Jahrhundert", Freiburg, 1883, 64-67). Other known works of Aegidius are a commentary on the first book of the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard, three "Eclogae Sacrae", a dictionary of Hebrew roots, a "Libellus de ecclesiis incremento", a "Liber dialogorum", and an "Infor- matio pro sedis apostolicis autoritatis contra Lutheranum sectam".

Alfric, Abbot of Eynsham, also known as "the Grammarian," the author of Homilies in Anglo-Saxon, a translator of Holy Scripture, and a writer upon many miscellaneous subjects. He seems to have been born about 955, and to have died about 1020. The identity of this writer has been the subject of much controversy. Even in Freeman's "Norman Conquest" he is wrongly identified with Alfric, Archbishop of Canterbury (1005). But of late years nearly all scholars have come round to the opinion of Lingard and Dietrich that there was but one Alfric famous in Anglo-Saxon literature, and that this man was never raised to any higher dignity than that of abbot. Of his career we know but little. He was undoubtedly a monk of the Old Monastery of Winchester under Saint Aethelwold, whose life he subsequently wrote in Latin. Some time after his ordination to the priesthood, he was sent to Cerne Abbey, or as he himself writes it "Cermel", in Dorsetshire. There he became, in 1005, abbot of the recently-founded monastery of Eynsham, near Oxford, where he probably remained until his death. Of all the writers in Anglo-Saxon that have been preserved to us Alfric was the most prolific. He is especially remembered for his Homilies, around whom is collected the whole body of homiletic teaching of which concerning the Blessed Sacrament a controversy has raged. Already in the reign of Queen Elizabeth it was asserted by Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, that Alfric in his Homily for Easter Day clearly evinced his disbelief in Transubstantiation, and that he must, moreover, be regarded as expressing the sentiments of the whole Anglo-Saxon church, of which he was a prominent and trusted representative. The details of the controversy cannot be discussed here. It may, however, be noted that the Anglican writer, W. Hunt, who eighteen years ago in the "Dictionary of Na- tional Biography" and "Dictionary of the English Church" said "Alfric was simply opposing the "doctrine of the Roman Church on the subject of the Eucharist," has recently so far modified his view as to allow that "it is possible to reconcile Alfric's words with the present teaching of Rome: his expressions are loose and unphilosophical, and, therefore, capable of being interpreted according to the common way without "real Conquest," p. 376.) This latter view is undoubtedly the more correct. Alfric never intended to attack the doctrine of the Real Presence. He quotes with approval instances of the miraculous appearance of blood at the breaking of the Host. But he had adopted the views of Ratfrancus of Corbie, who in turn addressed Gabriel of Venice, his successor, are preserved at Rome in the Bibliotheca Angelica. AElfric was no opponent of Transubstantiation but has recently been proved to have demonstrated in the monograph of Dr. Aug. Negle (Vienna, 1903). AElfric's numerous works in Anglo-Saxon, which give evidence of his literary power, have now nearly all been printed. Both the "Catholic Homilies" and the "Homilies on the Saints" have been edited with a critical text in 1846, by Thorpe, in the latter in 1900, by Skeat.

AElnoth, monk and biographer, of whom nothing is known except his Life of St. Canute the Martyr, written in 1109. In this work he describes himself as a priest, a native of Canterbury, and states that he has lived in Denmark for twenty-four years. This gives the date at which he left England. In that year certain relics of St. Alban were translated to Denmark, from which fact it has been conjectured that he accompanied them. In the title of his work he is described as a monk; he was probably of the Benedictine monastery of St. Canute, in Odense. No record of his death has been preserved. The English life was first printed by Huitfeld in 1602, reprinted by Meurinus in 1746; but the best critical edition was published by the Bollandists in their "Acta Sanctorum" (July 10), being edited by Solerius.

AElred, Saint, Abbot of Rievaulx, homilist and historian (1092–1166). St. AElred, whose name is also written AElred, AElthered, and Ethelred, was the son of one of those married priests of whom many were in England in the 12th and 13th centuries. He was born at Hexham, but at an early age made the acquaintance of David, St. Margaret's youngest son, shortly afterwards King of Scotland, at whose court he apparently acted for some years as a sort of page, or companion to the young Prince Henry, King David loved his English cousin very much, and wanted to have him to be his bishop, but AElred decided to become a Cistercian monk, in the recently founded abbey of Rievaulx in Yorkshire. Soon he was appointed master of novices, and was long remembered for his extraordinary tenderness and patience towards those under training; the former William, Earl of Lincoln, founded a new Cistercian abbey upon his estates at Revesby in Lincolnshire, St. AElred was sent with twelve monks to take possession of the new foundation. His stay at Revesby, where he seems to have met St. Gilbert of Sempringham, was not of long duration, for in 1146 he was elected abbot of Rievaulx. In this position the saint was not only superior of a community of 300 monks, but he was head of all the Cistercian abbeys in England. Causes were referred to him, and often he had to undertake considerable journeys to visit the monasteries of his order. Such a journey in 1153 carried him to St. Ives, where the abbot of the fifth century King David, for the last time, wrote on his return to Rievaulx, where the news of David's death reached him shortly afterwards, a sym pathetic sketch of the character of the late king. He seems to have exercised considerable influence over Henry II, in the early years of his reign, and to have persuaded him to join Louis VII of France in meeting Pope Alexander III, at Toucy, in 1162. Although suffering from a complication of most painful maladies, he journeyed to France to attend the general chapter of his Order. He was present in Westminster Abbey, at the translation of St. Edward the Confessor, in 1163, and, in view of this event, he both wrote a life of the saintly king and preached a homily in his praise. The next year AElred undertook a mission to the barbarous Pictish tribes of Galloway, where their chief is said to have been so deeply moved by his exhortations that he became a monk. Throughout his long life AElred was an extraordinary example of heroic patience under a succession of infirmities. He was, moreover, so abstemious that he is described as being "more like a ghost than a man." His death is generally supposed to have occurred 12 January, 1166, although there are reasons for thinking that the true year may be 1167. St. AElred left a considerable collection of sermons, the remarkable eloquence of which has earned for him the title of the English St. Bernard. He was the author of several ascetical treatises, notably the "Speculum Charitatis," also a compendium of the scriptures (really a rough draft of a larger work which was never completed), a treatise "De Spiritu et Amicitia," and a certain letter to an anchorite. All these, together with a fragment of his historical work, were collected and published by Richard Gibbons, S.J., at Douai, in 1631. A fuller and better edition is contained in the fifth volume of the "Bibliotheca Cisterciensia" of Tixerent, 1662, from which they have been printed in P. L., vol. CXCV. The historical works include a "Life of St. Edward," an important account of the "Battle of the Standard" (1138), an incomplete work on the genealogy of the kings of England, a tractate "De Sanctimoniali de Watton." (About the Nun of Watton), a "Life of St. Ninian," a work on the "Miracles of the Church of Hexham," an account of the foundations of St. Mary of York and Fountains Abbey, as well as some that are lost. No complete edition of AElred's historical opuscula has ever been published. A few were printed by Tswana, "De Scriptoribus," these were sought in the Rolls Series, and in Raine's "Priory of Hexham" (Surtees Society, Durham, 1864). An anonymous Latin Life of St. AElred is printed by the Benedictines, Acta SS., January (1887), and may be gathered from Raven, "Priory of Hexham," and from AElred's own writings. An excellent short biography was written by F. W. Farrar, "Life of AElred," in "The English Saints," 1845 (new ed. London, 1903); Dict. Nat. Biog. (1885); Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, I, and the great Cistercian collections of Henriquez and Manrique.

Aenas of Gars, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, a convert to Christianity, who flourished towards the end of the 5th century. He is identified with the St. Theophrastus he alludes to Heracleus (of Alexandria) as his teacher, and in some of his letters mentions as his contemporaries writers whom we know to have lived at the end of the fifth century and the beginning of the sixth. His testimony is often quoted in favor of the miraculous gift of prophecy among the Christians. His eyes were cut out by order of the Vandal king Hunicus (Baronius, ad ann. 484, n. 91 sqq.). Like all the Christian Neo-Platonists, Aenas held Plato in higher esteem than Aristotle, although his soquaintance with Plato's doctrine was acquired through traditional teaching and the study of apocryphal Platonic writings not—to any apparent extent, at least—through the study of the genuine "Dialogues." Like Syneusis, Nemesis, and others, he found in Neo-Platonism the philosophical system which best accorded with Christian revelation. But, unlike Syneusis and Nemesis, he rejected some of the most characteristic doctrines of the Neo-Platonists, and was inconsistent with Christian dogmas. For instance, he rejected the doctrine of pre-existence (according to which the soul of man existed before its union with body), arguing that the soul before its union with the body would have been "idle," incapable of exercising any of its faculties (Migne, P. L., CCLI, 1034). Similarly, he rejected the doctrine of the eternal duration of the world, on the ground that the world is corporeal, and, although the best possible "mechanism," contains in itself the elements of dissolution (op. cit. 958 sqq.). Again, he taught that "man's body is composed of matter and form," and that while the matter perishes the "form" of the body retains the power of resuscitating the "matter" on the last day (op. cit. 982).

Aengus, Saint (The Culfdee), an Irish saint who flourished in the last quarter of the eighth century, and is held in imperishable honour as the author of the Psalms of the Saints. Born at Clonengh, Ireland, Aengus was educated at the monastic school, founded there by St. Finnian, not far from the present town of Montrath. Becoming a hermit, he lived for a time at Dysert-beagh, where, on the banks of the Nore, he is said to have communed with the angels. From his love of prayer and solitude he was named the "Culfdee"; in other words, the Celn De, or "Servant of God." (See Culfdees.) Not satisfied with his hermitage, which was only a mile from Clonenagh, and, therefore, liable to be disturbed by students or wayfarers, Aengus removed to a more solitary abode about five miles from Clonenagh. This new hermitage lay between the present towns of Maryborough, was called after him the "Desert of Aengus," or "Dysert-Enos." Here he erected a little oratory on a gentle eminence among the Dysert Hills, now represented by a ruined and deserted Protestant church. His earliest biographer (ninth century) relates the wonderful austerities practised by St. Aengus in his "desert," and though he sought to be far from the haunts of men, his fame attracted a stream of visitors. The result was that the good saint abandoned his oratory at Dysert-Enos, and, after some wandering, came to the monastery at Tallaght, near Dublin, and was governed by St. Maelruain. He entered as a lay-brother, concealing his identity, but St. Maelruain soon discovered him, and collaborated with him on the work known as the "Martyrology of Tallaght," about the year 790. This work is a prose catalogue of Irish saints, and is the oldest of the Irish martyrologies. About this time he finished his famous Felire, a poetical work on the saints of Ireland, a copy of which is in the Leabhar Breach. The last touches were given to this work in the cell at Dysert-beagh (St. Aengus had left Tallaght, not long after the death of St. Maelruain), when he passed away on Friday, 11 March, 824. He was buried in Clonenagh, as we read in his metrical life, and his death is commemorated 11 March.

Anon (Airus; Vulgate, Aenon; Douby, Ennon), mentioned in John, iii, 23, as the locality where the forerunner of Christ baptised. It is described as being "near Salim" and as having "much water." Where is it situated? Barclay's hypothesis, which gratuitously identifies Salim with Jerusalem and selects the Wady Farah as the scene of the Baptist's activity, is improbable. Nor should it be sought in the southern extremities of Palestine, where it would look in vain for "much water." Conder and others favour Ainun, a village to the north-east of ancient Salim. This identification is also open to objections. Ainun is about as near to Nabalus (ancient Sichem) as it is to Salim. Since the former is the more important, we should rather expect the Evangelist to describe Enon as being "near Sichem". Moreover, according to this hypothesis, the place selected by the Baptist would have been in the very heart of Samaritan territory, which the Jews avoided, and, therefore, ill-suited for the missionary purpose of Christ's precursor. The most probable opinion places Enon in the Jordan, some two miles to the west of the stream and about seven miles to the south of Beisan (ancient Scythopolis). This site was on the confines of the Samaritan territory and on the road frequented by the Galileans. Van de Velde found a Salim in this vicinity, and close by "much water." Eusebius, St. Jerome, and St. Silvia saw the ruins of Salim, and there a guide pointed out to them the place where John baptized.

Eons, the term appropropriated by Gnostic heresiarchs to designate the series of spiritual powers evolved by progressive emanation from the divine eternal Being, and constituting the Pleroma, or invisible spiritual world, as distinct from the Kenoma, or visible material world, which is the place of "age," "the ever-existing," "eternity," and may be applied to the divine eternal power, and to the personified attributes of that power, whence it was extended to designate the successive emanations from the divinity which the Gnostics conceived as necessary intermediaries between the spiritual and the material worlds. The Gnostic concept of the Eon may be traced to the influence of a philosophy which postulated a divinity incapable of any contact with the material world or with evil, and the desire to reconcile this philosophy with the Christian notion of a direct interference of God in the affairs of the material world, and participation in the Creation and Redemption of man. Jewish angelology, which represented Jehovah ministered to by a court of celestial beings, and Hellenic religious systems, which imagined a number of intermediaries between the finite and the infinite, suggested the image of subordinate heavenly powers, each less perfect, the further removed it was from the supreme deity, until at length increasing imperfection would serve as the connecting link between the spiritual world and the material world of evil.

In different Gnostic systems the hierarchy of Eons was diversely elaborated. But in all are recognisable a mixture of Platonic, mythological, and Christian elements. There is always the primitive all-perfect Αon, the fountain-head of divinity, and a co-eternal companion Αon. From these emanate a second pair who, in turn, engender others, generally in pairs, or in groups of pairs, in keeping with the Egyptian idea of divine couples. One of these infernal Αons, desiring to know the unknown, goes to penetrate the secrets of the primal Αon, brings disorder into the Αon-world, is exiled, and brings forth a very imperfect Αon, who, being unworthy of a place in the Pleroma, brings the divine spark to the nether world. Then follows the creation of the material universe. Finally, there is evolved the Αon which is able to restore order to the world, and heal the disorder in the material world consequent upon the catastrophe in the ideal order, by giving to man the knowledge which will rescue him from the dominion of matter and evil. The number of Αons varies with different systems, being determined in some by Pythagorean and Platonic ideas on the mystic efficacy of numbers; in others by epochs in, or the duration of, the life of Christ. The Αons were given names, each Gnostic system having its own catalogue, suggested by Christian terminology, and by Oriental, or philosophical and mystical, elements. There were nearly as many Αonic hierarchies as there were Gnostic systems, but the most elaborate of these, as far as is known, was that of Valentinus, whose fusion of Christianity and Platonism is so completely described in the refutation of this system by St. Ireneus and Tertullian. (See Gnosticism, VALENTINUS, BASILIDES, PAPYRUS.)

The best description of Αonic systems is to be found in the refutations of Gnosticism by early Christian writers—EUSEBIUS, Adv. Haer. VII. 11. 11, in Αpologia Nicerius Fathers (New York, 1903), I. 315 sq.; TERTULLIAN, Contro Epicureos, in P. L., XL., 523. The introduction contains graphic schemata illustrating the Αonic genealogy, vi sq. (tr. as above III. 503; HIPPOLYTUS, Philotheumena, in P. L., XIV., 291), a description of Adam, Eve, and the rest in the Hymn of the holy Ones, as above V. 9; BAUER, Christliche Gnosis (Tubingen, 1885). AÉR (Greek, ἀέρ, the air), the largest and outermost covering of the chalice and paten in the Greek church, corresponding to the veil in the Latin rite. It is a veil covering the chalice and paten in the Latin rite, and is beautifully embroidered in the same style and colour as the vestments of the officiating priest. It takes its name either from the lightness of the material of which it was formerly made or from the fact that the priest during the time of the reserved chalice and paten in the Mass holds it high in the air and waves it slowly towards the chalice. Its use, like that of the veil, was originally to cover the chalice and to prevent anything from falling therein before the consecration and before the sacred vessels were brought to the altar. It is first mentioned by name in an explanation of the liturgy (Mass) by a writer of the sixth century, and is also alluded to as “the so-called aé” in the Acts of the Council of Constantinople. In the Greek Orthodox church the veil is put on the shoulders of the deacon who brings the paten to the altar at the great entrance, and the same rite is preserved in the Greek Catholic church, where the aé usually has a couple of short strings to secure it over the shoulders. A similar ceremony is still preserved in the Roman rite, where the deacon at high Mass brings the chalice and paten to the altar and places a special veil over his shoulders. AÉRIUS OF PONTUS, a friend and fellow ascetic of Eustathius, who became Bishop of Sebaste (355), and who ordained Aérius and placed him over the hospital or asylum in that city. Aérius fell out with Eustathius, and the latter for having deserted ascetic practices, and began to preach new doctrines, insisting to the unknowledgeable bishop or priest from laymen, that the observance of the feast of Easter was a Jewish superstition, and that it was wrong to prescribe fasts or abstinence by law, and useless to pray for the dead. According to some, Aérius was inspired to teach these doctrines by his jealousy of Eustathius. For a time, Aérius and Eusebius of Cyzicus, a character distinguished by his tenets popular, and gradually he and his sect became an occasion of abuses, which made them odious. His movement is considered important by the early period of the views even at this early period; but it also shows how strongly the Christians of his day were opposed to the teaching of Aérius.

JOHN J. WYNE.

Aesthetics may be defined as a systematic training in the right thinking and right feeling about art, and is made a part of philosophy by A. G. Baumgarten. Its domain, according to Wolff's system, is that of indistinct presentations and the canons of sensual taste (αἰσθητική γνώμη, from αἰσθάνομαι, to perceive and feel). It has, however, developed into a philosophy of the beautiful in nature and art, and, finally, into a science of the (fine) arts based on philosophical principles. Natural beauty, particular works of art, pure, that is, not sensual, beauty, and philosophical questions are sometimes treated thoroughly, sometimes merely touched upon. Applied aesthetics is the accurate description and valuation of particular works of art, technical esthetics, or the training of the art-student in individual productions; art:stori, the continuous record of the development of art, according to a definite plan. It is the duty of aesthetics always to seek the deepest grounds of the pleasure derived from art, not only in the laws of nature, but, above all, in those of the mind, and thus to come in touch with philosophy. But the fruitful source of sound judgment is to be found in a correct view of the world of art itself. The student of aesthetics, though he cannot wholly dispense with an insight into the technical and artistic production, or with a knowledge of the varied manifestations of beauty in nature and art, or with the exercise of one kind of art or another, must rely chiefly on a quick perceptive faculty, systematizing talent, and an intelligent appreciation. In this respect aesthetics will, on the one hand, offer more, on the other hand, less, than technical treatises on any one art, practical instruction in the exercise of the same, or illustrated art books for everyone.

The Philosophy of Aesthetics.—Aesthetics, as a general science, takes no account of the individual arts. It investigates the physiological and psychological principles of art, the conceptions of art, of beauty, and of the beautiful in art, and develops the universal laws of artistic activity. Clear and orderly thinking, the presupposition of all scientific discussion, is indispensable in aesthetics, the more so because, otherwise, aimless circumlocution and serious errors are unavoidable. All ideas, moreover concerning aesthetic beauty and the aim of art need to be carefully examined in order to find the objective conditions of the art, the relation to nature, and the division and classification of the material that lies to his hand must be taken into account.

The Science of the Arts.—In a history of art only the imitative arts and, possibly, music are, as a rule, included; aesthetics, on the other hand, takes in the arts of oratory as well, though mere eloquence, because of its combinatory practical character, is generally omitted. Originality, aesthetics was chiefly occupied with poetry, the laws of which are the most easily explained. With poetry the ancillary arts of rhythm and acting are inseparably connected. If vocal music be added to these, we have all those which are the direct, though transient, outcome of gesture. As it progresses to the use of musical instruments and gives his artistic productions a permanent existence by means of written notes or marks. The constructive arts, on the other hand, always make use of extraneous material, such as colour, wood, stone, or metal, and subject all that is sung to complete and visible. The graphic and textile arts are grouped with that of painting; with sculpture, ceramics, relief-work, and every kind of engraving; the lesser decorative arts with painting and architecture. The aesthetics of the individual arts does not bear the abstract impress of aesthetics in general; for although it everywhere seeks out the deeper-lying principles of aesthetic satisfaction, it often invades the domain of art-history in search of illustration, in order to prove the laws of art by means of characteristic types.

SYSTEMS AND METHODS.—This peculiar method of dealing with the subject ensures to Aesthetics the position of an independent and valuable science. For this reason various methods and systems have grown up in it, as in art itself, which lay stress on one aspect rather than on another. Idealism loves great subjects, a lofty conception, monumental execution; it looks to find the divine and the spiritual in all things, be it only allegorically and symbolically. It treats aesthetics from above, and guards most effectually against the debasement of art, but it is exposed (as was Platonism in philosophy) to the risk of losing itself in abstraction and, moreover, of not giving due importance to the form of art. With aesthetic formalism, on the contrary, this is the most important matter; it does not ask What, but How; it does not look at the content, but at the form which the artist gives it. It defines what forms are "pleasing" in the absolute sense; that is, combine to make up the image of beauty. When, moreover, it goes beyond the merely aesthetic and considers the verdict of the senses by that of the mind, it draws, with perfect justice, the characteristic distinction between artistic conception and scientific treatment. Form, however, without content would be empty; it should be rather, as it were, the blossoming of the idea, and a growth independent of that of the artist, which gives his genius an impulse towards the highest possible expression. Realism brings into prominence only the truth and palpable actuality of this content. It sets art on a sure foundation and opens the treasures of the visible world of matter. It brings art into living relationship with life and nature, with national characteristics and current ideas, and leads it, through the favouring influence of artistic industries, into the home life of the people. This system, however, does not always safeguard the true worth of the highest art, whose part it is not to imitate, but to idealise reality, to seek its materials in the world of ideas as well as in that of phenomena; which sets a greater, unchangeable truth side by side with one which is lower in this world of experience, and does not, to take one example, regard, after the coarser manner of realistic art, mere fishermen of Galilee, in working garb and with Jewish features, as suitable to create all Abraham and Isaac. It may, therefore, be said with a measure of truth that the chief task of art begins precisely at the point where the truth of nature reaches its perfection. Naturalism, again, goes much further than Realism, in that it not only insists on fidelity to nature, to the point of illusion, in all arts, whether of painting, drama, romance, or other, but also suppresses as far as possible all that is sentimental or superfluous. Relapse into mere sensuousness becomes, in such case, inevitable. Not anatomical and organic fidelity of presentation, but the nude, with its allurement, then easily becomes of chief importance, and the artistic conception sinks likewise, with regard to many things, to the level of mere mechanical and sensuous pleasure. In so far, however, as Naturalism holds aloof from this abyss, it champions the autonomy of art in order to maintain its independence of religion and morality. It thereby sets itself in open contradiction to Christianity; since all things must be subject to the laws of nature, and Artistic expression is indeed neither the act of a blindly toiling genius nor that of an understanding governed by its own laws, but is the act of a free, responsible will. It affects not only the sight and perception of the spectator, but also his mental disposition and his will. It is in this respect that the laws of morality apply to art as a practical calling. Likewise, as against Naturalism, a moral and religious aim in art must be recognized. "Art is its own aim" (art for art's sake), is a principle which holds true only of the immediate or inner aim (finis ultimus). The work must serve, above all, comply with the laws of the art in order to be a complete work of art. But it may, even so, serve other ends, such as the mental and religious betterment of mankind, and, above all, the glory of God. The systems hitherto referred to are old, and have their source in certain fundamental views of art; those which follow owe their origin rather to reflexion and reaction. The names: "Classicism", "Byzantinism", "Orientalism", "Romanticism", "Archaism", and even "Renaissance" (in the ordinary sense of the word) indicate certain tendencies of art, and of aesthetics, which discern the conditions of progress in a revulsion to earlier periods of art-development. Witness the aesthetic conceptions of the "Nazarenes", who laid stress on the poetic, national, and religious temper, in contradistinction to academic stiffness and classical coldness, and who, therefore, reverted to the Italian art of the fifteenth century. W. von Overbeck school. These ideas exercised an important influence upon the Christian school of Germany, down to the period of Steinele and the Düsseldorf school. Pre-Raphaelitism shares with the Nazarenes their predilection for the Early Renaissance, with its fresh-blossoming, freely-evolving simplicity; shares still more their distaste for a narrowing routine and a superficial skill in the business of the artist, gives his genius an impulse towards the highest possible expression. Realism brings into prominence only the truth and palpable actuality of this content. It sets art on a sure foundation and opens the treasures of the visible world of matter. It brings art into living relationship with life and nature, with national characteristics and current ideas, and leads it, through the favouring influence of artistic industries, into the home life of the people. This system, however, does not always safeguard the true worth of the highest art, whose part it is not to imitate, but to idealise reality, to seek its materials in the world of ideas as well as in that of phenomena; which sets a greater, unchangeable truth side by side with one which is lower in this world of experience, and does not, to take one example, regard, after the coarser manner of realistic art, mere fishermen of Galilee, in working garb and with Jewish features, as suitable to create all Abraham and Isaac. It may, therefore, be said with a measure of truth that the chief task of art begins precisely at the point where the truth of nature reaches its perfection. Naturalism, again, goes much further than Realism, in that it not only insists on fidelity to nature, to the
and style. Yet this striving after new forms is not without a certain justification. A somewhat widespread theory, which may be called "Akallism", rejects the old doctrine of the beauty of a true work of art, and aims to set that which has been, or meaning, in the service of the beautiful. As a matter of fact, nearly all writers on aesthetics have made the idea of beauty the foundation of the whole system, and even Jungmann found it impossible to devise a symmetrical system of aesthetics without that idea. There is no need to deny the principle of such a system, but the witness of history is on the side of the so-called aesthetics of beauty. Akallism, however, as a rule, aims at replacing the beautiful not by the great, but by that which is strikingly characteristic, or brutally realistic. Subjectivism threatens scientific aesthetics with an entirely new danger. The possible emphasis of the subjective side of art, and of the psychological and physiological conditions of artistic expression, is undoubtedly an advance—provided objective conditions and norms suffer no diminution of their rightful sphere. Yet there is a growing tendency to regard all aesthetic principles and judgments as mere flimsy, and to substitute all that contains the system, principle, or definition. Such scepticism, born of spiritual weakness and cowardice, makes an end, once for all, of all science.

A word must be added here concerning the various methods of aesthetics. The older, abstract, treatise on art, subject is no longer to be found among the abundant facilities which perception now has at its disposal. More sense-training, however, leads, in its turn, to very superficial knowledge; it is the chief function of perception to prepare the way for mental insight and ideal conception. Nor can we dispense with either the systematic arrangement of the history of art, or the quasi-philosophical basis of aesthetics. The introduction of natural-science methods into aesthetics (Taine, Grant Allen, Helmholtz, Fechner), as well as the close connection between theoretical and practical instruction and artistic expression (Ruskin), offers great advantages, if not relied on exclusively. At the same time, it remains true that high art can never be wholly dissected by the methods of the exact sciences, but rather itself lays down in turn the governing norms which art expression should follow and, having once attained its proper perfection, is not longer dependent on expression. The chief of aesthetics is the great art; the technique and the theories of the lesser arts have a narrower range of material. As a matter of method, it is advisable to set poetry in the foreground of any discussion concerning art, since it is thereby easier to keep the aesthetics of the other arts from becoming mere technique.

History of Esthetics. —Socrates, in Xenophon's "Memorabilia" and "Symposium", makes no distinction between the good and the beautiful, and the same indefiniteness extends to Plato's philosophy (The Republic, Phaedrus, Philebus) and that of Plato, to a great extent. The idealism of philosophy not only gave rise to the work of Longinus concerning "The Sublime", but also inspired Dionysius the Areopagite (De Divinis Nominibus) and several Fathers of the Church. Aristotle, on the other hand, gravely analysed the form and properties of the beautiful, as, in his "Post. Eth."

The further development of the subject of "confused ideas" and "sensitive perceptions", may possess, as a matter of fact, his book had a stronger influence upon the further development of aesthetics than both English and French philosophy had prior to his time. The former, starting from a Platonist idealism, sank further and further into idealism; the latter, too philosophically, on the principle of common sense (Shaftesbury, Hutcheson, Reid, Hume, Burke). Hogarth devoted himself to painting and proposed as the "line of beauty" the curve which bears his name. Among the French, Bateaux, following Aristotle, and the other writers of that art, were well aware of the existence of the principle, but only clung somewhat too closely to the principle of imitating nature. Diderot did the same to an even more marked extent, whereas the later French aesthetics approximated to idealism (Cousin). In Germany aesthetics came to be treated of with much zeal after Baumeister's time, both in a philosophical and in a popular fashion. To allude here only to the first, the art-critics Winckelmann and Lessing were among the numerous followers of the Baumgarten school, the former directing his special attention to the art of sculpture. Kant, again, obtained great influence, and, though his pet theory, that beauty is an idea of the soul, is still a subject of dispute, he stimulated activity in many quarters by means of self-contradictory concatenation of various systems. From him, then, is derived the abstract idealism of Schelling and Schopenhauer, wherein the general idea of beauty is not sufficiently absorbed in the form of it. Following Kant, Hegel (that of Hegel and Schleiermacher) owes its origin to Kant. It regards beauty not as a universal idea, but as an individual idea. To him, too, may be traced the aesthetic formalism of Herbart and Zimmermann, and "aesthetics of feeling" (Kirchmann). Hazlitt, Forster, and the Ästhetik of Berlin (1832-36); Th. follows a rapid review of the existing dangers to faith and morals, to remedy which Pius IX issues this letter summoning the bishops, and others whose right or duty it is to be present, to a General Council to meet in the Basilica of St. Peter in Rome, on the 8th of December, 1869, the anniversary of the dedication of the same church. In this connection, the letter must not be confounded with the Decree "Pastor Aeternus" which was issued by Pius IX at the close of the Council, the following year, and in which the dogmas of Papal Infallibility was defined.

M. O'HORIAN.

Aeterni Patris, The Encyclical of Leo XIII issued 4 August, 1879. Its purpose was the revival of Scholastic philosophy, according to the mind of St. Thomas Aquinas. It opens with the consideration that the Church, although officially the teacher of revealed truth only, has always been interested in the cultivation of every branch of human knowledge, especially of philosophy on which the right cultivation of other sciences in great measure depends. But the Pope declares that the actual condition of thought makes it a duty for him to do something for the study of true philosophy; because many present evils are to be ascribed to false philosophy, inasmuch as, since man is naturally led by reason, the reason leads the will easily follows. The Encyclical then shows how rational philosophy prepares the motives of credibility in matters of faith, and explains and vindicates revealed truths. But the truth unfolded by reason cannot contradict the truths revealed by God; hence, although in the pursuit of natural knowledge philosophy may justly use its own method, principles, and arguments, yet not so as to withdraw from the authority of Divine revelation. The Encyclical next shows, by extracts from many Fathers of the Church, what reason helped by revelation can do for the progress of human knowledge. Then came the Scholastics of the Middle Ages, who brought together and bounded into one harmonious whole, by a system of philosophy, the Christian wisdom of the Fathers. Since it was the work of the Scholastic theologians, according to the Encyclical, to unite divine and human science, their theory should never have succeeded, as it did succeed, if their philosophy had not been a complete system.

Leo XIII then marks out St. Thomas as the prince of the Scholastic theologians and philosophers, for which he finds evidence in the acknowledgment of the universities, of popes, general councils, and even in the fact that he had boasted that if the works of St. Thomas were taken away he would fight and defeat the Church. That accounts for the unrelenting war which has been made against Scholastic philosophy since the Reformation arose. The Encyclical points out how some have turned away from it, but passes on to show how it can help in the pursuit of metaphysical and social science. It also insists that St. Thomas constantly founded his reasons and arguments on experiments; in the course of the centuries which have passed since his time, experiments have, of course, been disclosing facts and secrets of nature; nevertheless the writings of St. Thomas bear witness that the experimental spirit was as strong in him as it is in us. Hence, in the Pope's appeal to the bishops of the Christian world to help in restoring and spreading the "wisdom" (sapientiam) of St. Thomas, he repeats, Sapientiam Sancti Thomas dicat urbe, sapientiam ecclesiae, sapientiam universitatis, sapientiam scientiae (1879). I. 159-163.

The purpose of Leo XIII was the revival of St. Thomas's philosophy and the continuing of his spirit of investigation, but not necessarily the adoption of every argument and opinion to be found in the works of the scholastics. It is worthy of remark that Leo XIII, following up the Encyclical, addressed (15 October, 1879) a letter to Cardinal de Luca in which, besides ordering that the philosophy of St. Thomas be taught in all the Roman seminaries, he founded "the Pontificia Academia" and made provision for a new edition of St. Thomas's works. The Academia has done much to help on the movement thus inaugurated, and a Colloquium of Dominican Fathers have ever since been working at the new (Leonine) edition of St. Thomas. A great part of the work is already completed, but all will not be completed for some years to come.

Aetius, a Roman general, patrician, and consul, b. towards the end of the fourth century; d. 454. He was the son of an Italian mother and Gaudentius, a Scythian soldier of the empire, and in his youth he had been given as a hostage to Alaric (from whom he learned the art of war), and to Rugila, king of the Hun, and in his later years he won among them the prestige and authority that went at once his basis of power and the source of his fall. This deliverer of Europe from the Huni first appears in history as the leader of 60,000 Huns in the pay of the imperial usurper Johannes (424). The ignominious execution of the latter was followed by the pardon of Aetius and his restoration to the favour of the Empress Placidia. He was made Count (probably of Italy), and became the chief adviser of the Western rulers, Placidia and her son Valentine III. In this quality it was not long before he came into conflict with the powerful Bonifacius, Count of Africa, and is said by later historians (Procopius of Byzantium, John of Antioch) to have so discredited the latter with Placidia that he was driven to revolt, brought over (428) the Vandals into Africa, and entered Italy (432) with the purpose of overthrowing in civil war his powerful enemy. But Boniface fell at Tolbiac near Rώm, and Aetius needed time to the Hunniish camp in Pannonia. In 453 he returned to power at Ravenna, and for the remaining seventeen years of the joint reign of Placidia and Valentine III was, as before, the ruling spirit of the Western Empire. The peace that he maintained through his alliances with the Huns and the Alani through, one of the treaties with the Ostrogoths, was broken (450) by the invasion of Attila. In the summer of that year Aetius, in concert with the brave and loyal Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, relieved Rώm besieged by Attila, and arrested the progress of the great Hun on the Catalanian Fields, near Troyes, where he won one of the decisive victories of history, and saved Europe for Latins, Teutons, Celts, and Slavs, as against the degraded and odious Huns. His death followed close upon his triumph; this strong and resourceful man was slain at Ravenna (454) by the weakening Emperor Valentinian III, in a fit of jealous rage, never clearly explained, but supposedly caused by the ambition of Aetius to place his son upon the imperial throne. The assassination of the saviour of Western civilisation led to the assassination (455) of Valentinian.

Affinity (in the Bible).—Scripture recognizes affinity as an impediment to wedlock. This is evident from the legislation contained in Lev., xviii, 8, 14-16, 18, xx, 11, 12, 14, 20, 21. Unlike canonical affinity, which is based on carnal intercourse, affinity in the code of the Old Testament springs from the sponsalia only, which with the Hebrews did not differ substantially from our matrimonium natum. The above mentioned texts forbid marriage (1) in lineae rectae, with stepmother, stepdaughter, grand-stepdaughter, mother-in-law, daughter-in-law; (2) in lineae laterali, with paternal uncle's wife—sunt—(some versions include also maternal uncle's wife), with sister-in-law, except in those cases where the lex leviratus obtains, with wife's sister as long as the former is living. Be it remarked here that the Jews consider the relationship existing between the wife and her husband's family as of a closer nature than that between the husband and his wife's family.

The laws given in Lev., xviii receive sanction in Lev., xx. Death is indicated as the penalty of those who transgress the ordinances of affinity in lineae rectae, whereas childlessness is threatened to those who marry within the forbidden degrees in lineae laterali. It is well to note that childlessness referred to means either that the offspring shall be looked upon as illegitimate, or that they shall be considered as the legitimate descendants of the deceased uncle or brother. In either case they would be outside the law, and their property would pass into another family. No sanction is given to the law prohibiting a man from marrying simultaneously two sisters. From the fact that the separation of the spouses is nowhere enjoined in case they married within the forbidden degree in lineae laterali, we may infer that the existence of these impediments did not void the matrimonial contract. The sanction of the laws in question is, with one exception, rather severe. What reasons dictated this rigour? Moral propriety is one. The expressions "heinous crime" and "great abomination" are tokens of the inspired writer's unfeigned abhorrence of the act as qualified by them. The welfare of family life is another. People closely related as a rule dwell together, especially in Eastern countries. Were it not for the above-mentioned prohibitions, disorders fatal to family life would creep in under the pretext of future marriage. Maimonides and Selden strongly condemn the exorbitant degrees, finally intimates that the observance of these laws will differentiate the chosen people from heathen nations (Lev., xviii, 24). The New Testament does not contain any legislation on this subject, but narrates two incidents where the laws of Leviticus were violated. Herod Antigas married Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip (Matt., xiv, 3, 4; Mark, vi, 17-18; Luke, iii, 19), contrary to Lev., xviii, 16. For even granting that Philip was dead, a much controveersed question, the lex leviratus did not obtain since Herodias had a daughter by Philip. The man of Corinth had his father's wife (1 Cor., v, 1) in lineae laterae.

Affinity (in the canon law), a relationship arising from the carnal intercourse of a man and a woman, sufficient for the generation of children, whereby the man becomes related to the woman's blood-kin and the woman to the man's. If this intercourse is between husband and wife, this relationship extends to the fourth degree of consanguinity, and to the degree of affinity of third degree of affinity of blood relationship. To-day affinity does not beget affinity. Therefore the relatives of the man do not become relatives of the woman's relatives, neither do those of the woman become relatives of the man's relatives. Even if the intercourse were the result of force or by consent, or by mutual consent, or by the consent of the woman, the juridical effect would fail. If the intercourse is illicit, it is a diriment impediment of marriage in the collateral line of the fourth degree, as also in the direct line. If the intercourse is illicit or out of marriage, the impediment to-day is limited to the second degree. The Council of Trent makes no distinction between the two cases. Though the Church has no jurisdiction over the non-baptised, yet it considers an affinity arising before baptism as a diriment impediment. The regulations of the Mosaic law, based on considerations of relationship, are contained in Leviticus, xviii. The design of the legislator was apparently to give an exhaustive list of prohibitions; he not only gives examples of degrees of relationship, but he specifies the prohibitions which are strictly parallel to each other, e.g. son's daughter and daughter's daughter, wife's son's daughter and wife's daughter's daughter, whereas had he wished to exhibit the prohibited degrees, one of these cases would have been sufficient. He prohibits marriage to a brother's widow, but not to a deceased wife's sister. Yet he requires a brother to marry his brother's widow in case the latter died without issue; and he caution the man not to hold intercourse with his wife's sister while she is living, lest the Church of Rome recognizes the impediment of affinity as well as of consanguinity to extend to the seventh degree. This probably arose from the need of mingling the various barbarian races through marriage, an end that was effected by the extension of prohibitions of marriage between persons related. Innocent III in the Fourth Council of Lateran (1215) limited both affinity and consanguinity to the fourth degree. The Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV, c. iv, De Rer.) modified the juridical effect of the extramural intercourse to the second degree of affinity.

The motive of the prohibition of affinity is akin to, though not as strong as, that of consanguinity; there arises from the partners' carnal intercourse a nearness and natural intimacy with the blood-relatives of the other side. The degrees of affinity are determined by the same rule as the degree of blood-relationship. Before the Fourth Council of Lateran two other kinds of affinity were recognized as an impediment to marriage. If a man then married a widow, those who were akin to her by the previous marriage were also akin to the present husband. Moreover, if the first wife of a widower was a widow, the blood relatives of his first wife were akin to the first husband, were also akin to the new wife, and to the last husband. We give an example: Titius contracted and consummated marriage with Bertha. The blood-relatives of Bertha were akin to Titius. Bertha dies. Titius contracts and consummated marriage with Sarah. Of Bertha, akin to Titius by the first kind, became akin to Sarah by the second kind of affinity. Titius dies and Sarah contracts and consummated marriage with Robert. The blood-relatives of Bertha, akin by second kind to Sarah, become akin by the third kind of affinity. In blood relationship, the ancient law, arose between the children of a woman from a deceased husband and the children of her...
AFFIRMATION

husband from a deceased wife. Hence a father and a son could not marry a mother and a daughter. Affinity begot affinity. But the Fourth Council of Lateran took away all but the first kind of affinity; hence the axiom that "affinity does not beget affinity." There was some really groundless discussion in the eighteenth century as to whether a stepfather could marry the widow of his deceased stepson; but it was authoritatively decided, as Benedict XIV states (De Syn. Dioc., IX, xii) that there was no impediment to their marriage, it having been done away with by the Fourth Council of Lateran.

The impediment to marry from affinity arises from ecclesiastical law. This is clearly recognized to-day by theologians with regard to collateral affinity. The Church grants dispensation in all the degrees of this affinity. In regard to affinity in the direct line, there was a serious discussion whether in the first degree it arose from a natural, Divine, or ecclesiastical law; by what law was a stepfather forbidden to marry his stepdaughter? The Church refrains from granting the dispensation, but does not disclaim the right to do so. Indeed, a decree of the Holy Office (20 February, 1858) implies that this affinity arises from ecclesiastical law. "The Holy Father distinctly determined that the dispensation from all impediments dimissorial of marriage derived from the ecclesiastical law, except from the order of the priesthood, and affinity, in the direct line, arising from lawful intercourse." Caisson states (Man. Jur. Canon., Lib. II, De affini., n. 4285) that "Collator Andegaviensis" quotes (394) Sanches and Pontius as asserting that "the Pope . . . dispenses converted infidels married within this first degree of affinity, if they had contracted marriage in accord with the law of their country." This supposes that this affinity in the first degree of the direct line is not an impediment of the natural or Divine law. An additional argument may be drawn from the dispensation which the Church grants in this case where there has been illicit unlawful intercourse. Any repugnance of nature would hold then, as where the intercourse proceeded from marriage.

If a married person should have intercourse with the marriage-partner's blood-relative of the second degree, in the direct or collateral line, a penalty is placed upon the one so sinning of forfeiting the right to ask for marital intercourse from the marriage-partner, though the innocent party does not forfeit the right to claim it. If the wrong had been done and the consanguineous penalty is not incurred, and this is also probably so if done without knowledge of the penalty. If incurred, a dispensation from the penalty may be obtained from the bishop. The affinity would become more complicated, and add new bars to marriage, if the person had intercourse with several persons of varying degrees of affinity. By the Roman law, the affinity ceased at the death of the one from whom it originated. Thus when a remarried father died, his second wife was no longer akin to the children of his former wife. By canon law a marriage not consummated does not beget affinity. By a natural though not a dimissorial impediment, the affinity probably does not extend beyond the second degree. By the French code the affinity in the direct line, and in the first degree of the collateral line, is a bar to marriage, though the privilege was given to the king to dispense in the second degree. By the British marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister, and a marriage of this kind performed in the colonies of the British Empire, where it may be allowed, is not held as valid in Great Britain. In the session of the British Parliament in 1906, a strong effort was made to enact a law to recognize as valid, in Great Britain, such a marriage, if the colonial law recognized its validity where contracted. In Virginia this marriage is null, but it is generally recognized in the other States of the Union. The Greek Church adheres to the law as laid down in Leviticus, xviii, 8, 14, 16, 18; xx, 11, 12, 14, 19, 21. Yet the Greek patriarchs and bishops grant dispensations from some of the affinities therein mentioned, and this affinity beget affinity very extensively. Armenians extend the affinity to the fourth degree. The United Orientals approach the Catholic regulations.

Affirmation, a solemn declaration accepted in legal procedure in lieu of the requisite oath. In England, Canada, and the United States, this is universal. In England and Canada the statutory enactments upon the matter provide that false statements under affirmation shall constitute the crime of perjury in like manner as false statements under oath. The same provision is not found in the legislation of the various States of the Union. This right to affirm instead of giving oath is generally conferred in deference to conscientious or religious scruples against swearing, such as are entertained by Quakers, Moravians, Dunkers, and Mennonites. In the courts of conscience such an affirmation is not held to have the standing of an oath for the cardinal and obvious reason that the intention to swear, i.e. to call God to witness, is formally excluded.

Afflighem, a Benedictine abbey near Alost in Brabant, Belgium. It was founded by a party of six knights who, after abandoning their wild life, had resolved to do penance in the religious life on the scene of their former excesses. After building a church, they received, in 1084, a gift of the neighbouring lands from the Countess Adela and her sons. The rule of St. Benedict was adopted, a Benedictine, Wedering, having been the instrument of their conversion, and in after times the abbey became known for its strict observance of religious discipline. The Dukes of Brabant and Lorraine, and the Counts of Flanders, Louis the Bold, Briouze, and his successors, were its patrons and protectors, and regarded it as a coveted privilege to be buried in the abbey church. Several monasteries, among them Maria-Lach, owe their foundation to monks from Afflighem. St. Bernard, who visited the abbey in 1146, declared that he had found angels there. During this visit that an image of Our Lady is said to have replied to the salutation of the Saint. In 1523, Afflighem joined the Bursfeld Congregation—a union of Benedictine Monasteries formed in the fifteenth century for the stricter observance of monastic rule. In 1868, the Archbishop of Mechlin became commendatory abbot and exercised his authority through a prior. This continued until the Suppression. Archbishop Boonen desired to sever relations with the Bursfeld Congregation and introduce the Monte Cassino observance. Yielding to his solicitations, the Prior, Benedict Haeften, founded, in 1827, a new congregation, "Benedictines of the Order of St. Benedict", which included Afflighem and several other Belgian monasteries. It was dissolved in 1864. In 1796, in consequence of the French Revolution, the monks were dispersed, the buildings destroyed, and the lands sold. The last Prior, Beda Regouts, preserved the miraculous image of Our Lady, and the staff and chalice which had been presented by St. Bernard.
exercise of the teaching office (liberté d’enseignement). During the insurrection of 1848 the Archbishop was led to believe that his presence at the barricades might be the means of restoring peace. He accordingly applied to General Cavaignac, who warned him of the risk he was about to incur. "My life," the Bishop answered, "is little value, but I am glad to risk it." Soon afterwards, the firing having ceased at his request, he appeared on the barricades at the entrance to the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, accompanied by M. Albert, of the national guard, who wore the dress of a workman, and bore a green branch as a sign of peace, and by Tellier, a devoted friend. His reception was very cordial, and he had spoken only a few words, when the insurged, hearing some shots, and thinking they were betrayed, opened fire on the National Guard, and the Archbishop fell. He was removed to his palace, where he died. Next day the National Assembly issued a decree expressing their great sorrow at his death. The public funeral, 7 July, was one of the most striking spectacles of its kind. Archbishop Affre wrote, in addition to his pastorals and various articles in "La France Chrétienne", "Traité de l’administration temporelle des paroisses" (Paris, 1827; 11th ed., 1890), "Traité de la propriété des biens ecclésiastiques" (Paris, 1837), "Introduction philosophe à l’étude du christianisme" (Paris, 5th ed., 1844).

FRANCIS W. GREY.

AFRA, SAINT AND MARTYR. The city of Augusta Vindelicorum (the present Augsburg) was situated in the northern part of the Roman province of Bavaria on the river Lech, not far from its junction with the Danube. It was an important Roman colony, invested with municipal rights (municipium) by the Emperor Hadrian, into which Christianity had penetrated even before the time of Constantine, as is proved beyond question by the martyrdom of St. Afra. It is a indisputable historical fact that a Christian named Afra was beheaded at Augsburg during the persecution of Diocletian (c. 304) for her steadfast profession of faith, and that at an early period her grave was the object of great veneration. The so-called "Martyrologium Hieronymianum", a compilation from various calendars and lists of martyrs, dating in its original form from the fourth century, mentions, under date of 5 August (in some MSS., 6 or 7 August), St. Afra as having suffered in the city of Augsburg, and as buried there (Martyrologium Hieronymianum, ed. de Rossai and Duchesne; Acta SS., II, Nov., 1 sqq.). In his poem on St. Martin, Venantius Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers, up to the sixth century, also mentions Augsburg as her burial place (Vita S. Martini, IV, 642 sq.; Pergius ad Augustam quam Virido et Lica fluentant, Illie ossa sacra venerabere martyris Afra). There are extant certain Acts of the martyrdom of St. Afra (Acta SS., II, August, 39 sqq.; ed. Krusch in Mon. Germ. Hist., SS., RR. Merovingii, III, 56 sqq.), in the opinion of most critics not a coherent whole, but a compilation of two different accounts, the story of the conversion of St. Afra, and the story of her martyrdom. The former is of later origin, and has not the least claim to historical credibility, being merely a legendary narrative of Carolingian use, due up with the intention of connecting with St. Afra the organization of the church of Augsburg. It relates that the grandparents of Afra came from Cyprus to Augsburg and were there initiated into the worship of Venus. Afra was given over as a prostitute to the service of the goddess by her own mother Helena, or Ilana. In the persecution of Diocletian, Bishop Narcissus of Gerundum, in Spain, took refuge from his persecutors in Augsburg, and chanced to find an asylum in Afra's house. Through his efforts the family was converted to Christianity, and baptized. Narcissus, on his departure, ordained presbyter (or bishop) a brother of Hilaria, Dictira, Euphrosyne, and Eutropia or Eupreopia), who, after the remains of the martyr were placed in the tomb, themselves suffered martyrdom. At a second martyrdom, Afra, dealing with her trial and death (Ruinar, Acta Sincera, 482-484, Ratisbon, 1899), is more ancient.

In the opinion of Duchesne it dates from the end of the fourth, or the beginning of the fifth, century. It may, therefore, have preserved, not only the fact of the martyrdom, but also reliable details concerning the Saint and her death. In this narrative Afra alone is mentioned, and there is no trace of those exaggerations and fantastic embellishments which characterize the later legends of the martyrs. According to this Passio, Afra (see MONTES, ACTA OF) was, at the time of the Council of Ephesus, herself a Christian, and refused to participate in pagan rites. She was executed on a little island in the river Lech, and her remains were buried at some distance from the place of her death. The testimony of Venantius Fortunatus shows that her grave was held in great veneration in the sixth century. Her remains are still at Augsburg in the church of St. Ulrich and Afra, beside which stands a famous Benedictine abbey. Her feast is celebrated on 7 August.

AfricA—This name, which is of Phoenician origin, was at first given by the Romans to the territory about the city of Carthage. It gradually came to be applied to the whole Libyan territory occupied by the Romans, and it was understood in this sense as late as the eleventh century, by Pope St. Leo IX., when Julius, bishop of Carthage, asked the primacy of the bishops of ancient Numidia, wrote these words, now engraved in letters of gold on the modern basilica of Carthage, built by Cardinal Lavigeri: "Sine dubio, post Romanum pontificem, primus Nubius episcopus et totius Africæ maximus metropolita Carthaginensis episcopus" (There can be no doubt that after the Roman Pontiff the first Bishop of Nubia, and indeed the principal Metropolis of Africa is the Bishop of Carthage). In their turn the Arabs adopted the name; then the writers of the Middle Ages; finally it has come to include the continent.

I. THE COUNTRY.—Africa is, in extent, about 12,000,000 square miles, or about three times as large as Europe, and five times as large as the United States, without Alaska. It is joined to the Asiatic continent only by the Isthmus of Suez. Its general shape is that of an irregular triangle, which projects southwards as far as the equator, with this divide, seriously affected its historical development prior to the use of steam. It rests on a rocky foundation, which forms an immense plateau in the interior, whence, in isolated masses, branch off ranges like the Atlas, the mountains of Abyssinia, Cape Colony, the Orange, the Skimmer, the Transvaal, the Kenya, Kilima-Njaro, the Mfumbiro, and the Kameruns. These mountains, which attain in some places a height of 20,000 feet, have the appearance of islets, where rise in stages belts of a wonderfully varied vegetation. This plateau is bounded by a coast desert, whence the land sinks gradually. To the west coast is the Cape of Good Hope, the entrance of the Cape Basin, extremely rough and difficult to approach. On the Equator the rivers are frequent and torrential; at Gaboon, for instance, it rains every day for nine months, the atmosphere is heavy with humidity, and the heat is maintained at an almost unchanging temperature. An enormous quantity of water is gathered in aerial seas by the lands, which meet and neutralize each other. This water, drawn down by the daily thunder-storms, forms the vast reservoirs of the interior: the lakes of Timbuctu, Tchad, Victoria, Albert, Tanganyika, Bangweelo, Mweru, Nyassa, and others, whence flow the principal rivers: the Niger, the Benue, the Congo, the Zambesi, and the Nile, and others, less known, but of considerable importance. Most of them flow to the sea over rocky beds, forming rapids and waterfalls. These rivers have their sources at a much greater altitude than the rivers of other continents. The source of the Congo is at 6,000 feet above the sea; the source of the Nile at 4,500; and of the Niger at 3,000; while that of the Amazon is not more than 700 feet, and the Mississippi only about 2,000 feet. It has been said that Africa has been less travelled than any other part of the world. It is there that are found, more than anywhere else, huge mountains, such as Kilimanjaro, Kenya, etc., which rise suddenly from the level surface of great plains; vast lakes of uncertain outlines, which seem at one time to be drying up, and at another to be making new inroads on the land; long rivers whose branches cover millions of square miles, and which, like the Nile, flow slowly through valleys as desolate as an unfinished world; solemn forests and the endless desert, vast and well suited to the peculiar nature of such great plants as the baobab, and of strange creatures like the ostrich, the giraffe, the elephant, the hippopotamus, and the gorilla; in very truth it is the primitive world. It is in the Equatorial zone, and especially towards the west, that the forests are largest, while in other parts they are somewhat irregularly scattered, with trees rising straight and mighty above a vigorous undergrowth. It is possible to travel for days, and even months, in these forests without so much as a glimpse of the sky, except in some chance glen, or glade where the sun has been able to build their little village, or to till their fields. Silence reigns everywhere, broken only, in the daytime, by an occasional flapping of wings overhead; and at night by the shrill music of insects in a monotonous chorus. Storms echo in a frightful fashion; the rains cause an invariable humidity, rendering everything impervious to fire, and it is only during the short dry season of three or four months that it is safe to penetrate these forests. On both sides of the Equator, as far as 15° north and 20° south, stretches a zone that has two sessions, a rainy and a dry season. In this region, for thousands of years, the green and perpetual verdure are but seldom found save in the narrow spaces, stretching ribbon-like along the river banks, or crowding in the valleys, or climbing, in rows, along the mountain-sides. Elsewhere are found great prairies, over which the fire passes at the end of each dry season, and where roam great herds of antelope, a bright carpet, and beyond this double zone, which begins with Equatorial landscapes and ends in a semi-desert, stretches another zone of rocks, grass-lands, swamps, clay, and almost wholly barren sand. This, to the north, is the Sahara and the Libyan desert; to the south, the Kalahari and the solitude that surrounds it. It is a land where the sky is without cloud, and the

also found all over Africa, whose life is on a level with the wretched life of his master. These people derive their food by hunting, fishing, or by collecting from the agricultural or pastoral tribes among whom they live, and whom they supply with meat, ivory, and rubber. Their language as a rule resembles that of the people among whom they have stayed longest. It is, however, among the San (Bushmen) that we must look for the longest. It is said, grew up shortly afterwards by mingling their blood, and possibly their speech, with that of the Negroes (dwarfs). These are the Namas, Nama-kwa, Griqua (Grika), etc., known to Europeans by the generic name of Hottentots (a name derived from a Dutch word meaning "brute"). Somewhat taller, of a darker color, and closer to the Bushmen, than to the Negroes, they have fixed villages and lead a pastoral life. Their language, which is agglutinative, with pronominal suffixes, is characterized by the use of four different kinds of "clicks", also used by the San, and which have no equivalent in our alphabet. In the opinion of many scholars—among them, Deneiker—the primitive Hottentots before their fusion with the San were the original Bantu. This word (from mu-natu, "man", "a being endowed with reason", plural, ba-natu) has been used to designate an important family of languages which stretches from one ocean to the other, from the basin of the Congo and the Victoria Nyanza in the north, to the Orange River and the Limpopo, deducting the Hottentot tribes. Although every tribe in this vast region has its own language, the basis of vocabulary and grammar is common to them all. They are agglutinative in structure, and characterized by pronominal prefixes which not only determine the number and category of the noun, but extend to the adjective and the verb by very rational rules, which are always applied. The Bantu, who include, among other better known tribes, the Zulus, Basutos, Matabele, Makua, Wa-swahili, Wa-nyamwezi, Be-ganda, Be-congo, Bepongwe, Fang, etc., present a great variety of cultures, due, no doubt, to divers mixtures of races, which, as a rule, it is difficult to trace very far back. Their manner of life seems to depend chiefly on the country they live in; they are farmers, shepherds, and fishermen. Certain tribes, such as the Be-gandas, are still formed, and still lead large communities with regular institutions, generally in the form of an autocratic government. Most of them, however, have maintained their patriarchal life, and are scattered in little villages, practically independent of each other. Moreover, litigation and war, slavery, polygamy, the practice of a degrading fetishism, with human sacrifices, the practice of lèpre and the use of tobacco by fire, arbitrary condemnations, poisonings, human sacrifices, and even cannibalism, prevail more or less extensively, and to a greater or lesser degree among all these interesting peoples. Besides the lands occupied by the Bantu, there are to be found in the valleys of Senegal, Gambia, of the Niger, Lake Tchad, and Bénoué, strong and numerous tribes of a more markedly negro type, of great stature, strongly dolichocephalous, with very black skins, rounded foreheads, thick lips, and frequent prognathism. These tribes, sufficiently varied in appearance, are often known under the generic name of Negritos, which are divided into four groups: the Nilotic negroes, such as the Muzzu, the Barhi, the Bongo, the Sandé, etc.; the negroes of the central Sudan, such as the natives of Bornu, Baghirni, Wadai, Darfur, Kordofan, etc.; the negroes of the western Sudan, such as the Sornhil, the Mossi, the Mandinka, and their linguistic neighbors (Mandingo, Wolof, Senegales, Mandinka); and, finally, the coast, or Guinea, negroes, such as the Volof, the Sener, the Susu, the Aku, the Ashanti, the Fanti, the people of Dahomey, the Egbas, the Yoruba, the Mina, and the Ibo, etc. These tribes earth without shade. These deserts, which are not lacking in grandeur and attraction, mark, north and south, the true boundaries of Africa. Beyond the north and south—to the north, Mauretanias, Algeria, Egypt; to the south, the region of Cape Colony—the soil, the climate, the fauna and flora, the inhabitants are no longer characteristically African, but European.

INHABITANTS.—The most recent statistics give the population of Africa as from 160,000,000 to 200,000,000 souls. Of these, 128,000,000 represent the black element very unevenly distributed over the 12,000,000 square miles of surface. In some parts it is very dense, as in the valleys of the Nile and of the Niger; in Algeria, Morocco, and Abyssinia; in the interior, and in the region of Cape Colony; while it is very sparse in great spaces like the Sahara and the Kalahari desert, or the swamps where the tributaries of the Nile and of the Zambezi pour their sluggish currents. The occupation of the country by the European nations, which put an end to local wars, slave-raids, and, to some extent, to poisonings, infanticide, and human sacrifices, might well lead men to hope for the repeopling of Africa. These advantages, however, seem, in modern times, sadly outweighed by the spread of the dread sleeping-sickness and other contagious diseases, and the breaking up of native family life, due to contact with our civilization. African ethnography presents a very complicated problem. Five thousand years before Christ the valley of the Nile was inhabited by a population already possessing a remarkable civilization. Traces of its occupation even prior to that period, during the Age of Stone, have been found from the Atlas to the Cape, from Somaliland to the Guinea Coast. The question, then, arises, whether these primitive populations may not now be represented by the Negroes, or Pygmies, of Africa, mentioned by ancient authors and once more discovered in modern times. Under the various names of "Akka", "Ba-twa", "A-kwa", "Be-kù", etc., they are met with in scantly groups throughout Equatorial Africa, from the banks of the Tuba to the valley of the Ogowai (French Congo) and that of the Congo. Near the Conge they come in contact with another population of greater stature and 4 ft. more developed, with marked physical characters: the "San", called "Bojesmannen" by the Dutch, and "Bushmen" in English. There are two types: one black, the other yellowish; but they undoubtedly constitute distinct races, with well marked ethnic characteristics. There are valid reasons for thinking that they are the remains of one of the earliest races which formerly lived in the Nile basin. Traces of similar populations are found in Europe; and, at the present day a parallel race is represented by the Negroes of the Andamans, Moluccas, and the islands in the vicinity of Indo-China. These little men would therefore seem to have occupied the whole of the ancient continent, scattering from a central point, which, if we may trust certain indications, was the valley of the Euphrates. That which is certain, however, is that the Negroes appear in Africa as a primitive population, which was scattered by the stronger and better organized tribes who came after them. This, moreover, is what explains the great number of negroes themselves, and which has been formed of them by the blacks; they look on themselves, and are looked on by their neighbours, as the first owners of the Earth. It is to them that the forest belongs, with all that it contains, animals and fruits; and the Negroes live in and their life is African in nature. Their life is everywhere the same; they are nomads, who make no settled encampments, have no trade, commerce, or farming, neither flocks nor domestic animals of any kind, except a small dog, are, as a rule, stronger than the Bantu, more industrious, better organised for fighting, and for resistance to invasion. Many, indeed, have known real epochs of prosperity and greatness. Moreover, this superiority is most clearly marked in proportion to the distance from the coast; so that one tribe, who is true of the "black colours", belonging to a different ethnic type, represented by the Hamites (Chamites), also known as Kushites, Ethiopians, or Nubians. To this group should be joined the Bedja of Nubia, the Abyssinians, the Oromo, or Gallas, the Afora, or Danakil, the Somalis, the Masai, and, in the west, the Fulbe and the Fula. All these tribes, who are from skin to black, bronze, or reddish—the result, no doubt of a considerable mingling with the tribes they first met with—are, as a rule, of a regular type, often handsome, with shapely limbs, oval faces, long noses, and hair long and curly; all with an air that appears to greater advantage from their skill in draping themselves in the fashion of antique statues. They are no longer negroes. Most of them lead a pastoral life and, divided into something like clans, tend their flocks on the wide strip of half-desert pasture-land which stretches from Cape Gardafui to Cape Verde. They are intelligent, warlike, independent, given to piracy and fierce from the desert; they are Moors; they have bad neighbours, but have great influence wherever they may be. From the Hamites we pass, by a natural transition, to the Berbers, who have held northern Africa for many centuries. While the other tribes are of Asiatic origin, the Berbers came from Europe at an unknown period, and belong to two types, the brown and the fair. About A.D. 1100, they founded Timbuktu, and spread as far as the Canary Islands; then, roused by Islam, they made their way into Spain, and threatened the south of France. They are represented by the Barbars, the Kabyle, the Tuareg, the Moors of the western coast, and have had a considerable part in the formation of the so-called "Arab" populations of the "Barbary States". In addition to these various elements, yet another, the Semitic, has settled among, and to some extent mingled with, the people of Africa. This element is to be found chiefly in Egypt, in Abyssinia, and on the East Coast. In more recent times there has been an influx of modern Europeans—the Portuguese in Guinea, Angola, and Mozambique; the Dutch on the Gold Coast, at the Cape, and in the valleys of the Orange and the Limpopo; the English, Germans, French, in the Sahara, though of recent origin, and at periods in which it is impossible to determine, men evidently of the same species, but not of the same race, settled on this primitive soil, mingling some of their qualities, changing their hues, confounding their customs and their speech, yet, nevertheless, often retaining clear traces of their original descent.

III. RELIGION.—(A) NATIVE RELIGION. There is no doubt that there is to be found among the nations of Africa, apart from Christianity and Mohammedanism, a religion, a belief in a higher, living, and personal principle, implying on man's part the duty of recognizing it by means of some kind of worship. Individuals have, and always have, their own ways of worshipping, and of looking for help in the causes of which they must always be inquired into. In the hereafter, the spirits or shadows of kings, chiefs, witch-doctors, of great men, rich and powerful, being set free from the bodies to which they were united, wander through space until they find another body into which to enter. They keep after this life the power, often intensified, which they had before; they can injure or give help; they can influence the elements. More, they often bring news of themselves; they cause most of the sicknesses of children; they are seen in dreams; they cause nightmares; they are heard at night; they show themselves in many inanimate objects. The tokens of ordinary persons have less power; of no importance after death, as in life, they disappear. It is important, however, to give all these shades a fixed abode. This is done by means of certain complicated ceremonies: by calling them into caves, into the houses of certain people who profess certain rites, into living animals, but more often into statues, statues of earth, wood, or metal, placed on the skull of the ancestor, or containing some part of his remains—nails, hair, eyebrows, or skin. There are some rebellious shades, however, who are difficult to keep in one spot; they are called back by means of fresh ceremonies. Moreover, on all necessary occasions—for the success of a journey, of a hunt, of a trade, or war, to ward off a plague, to turn aside misfortune—recurrings to the gods, to the四季 ancestories; prayers, offerings, and sacrifices are made, with offerings, to the gods, and offerings made (glasse beads, rice, maize, milk, beer); victims are sacrificed to it, birds, kids, sheep, oxen, men; for the more the shade is to be honoured the more worthy must be the sacrifice. Nor is this all. The offering must, of necessity, be eaten in common; it is by drinking the blood of the flesh that the sons of man sacrificed, in company with the names of the ancestors vanished, yet present, that their favours are obtained, and they are satisfied. This satisfaction is most esteemed when it is possible to sacrifice their enemies, those who have caused their death, and on whose hands their present safety depends. Therefore, the sacrifice of the enemy can be dreamed of. This is the origin of cannibalism, which in some parts of Africa has taken on peculiarly disgusting forms. Ancestor worship, in one form or other, is thus the chief expression of African religion. But besides shades, there are a number of spirits, whose origin is unknown, who reveal themselves in various ways. Most of these are wicked, some terrible, but others are mischievous, capricious, fanciful; while some, again, are more or less indifferent, and sometimes well-disposed. It is the darksome activity of these spirits which must be held accountable for the incidence of diseases, for crops, for droughts, floods, and fires—all the ills that seem to have no apparent cause. The same holds true of possession, so common everywhere. To offset these ills it is necessary to consult the "seers", who, after the necessary ceremonies, will find the name and character of the spirit who is at fault; will indicate the specialist (witch-doctor) to whom recourse must be had, and who will obtain the desired result, a cessation of the trial, a cure of the sickness, an end to the possession, by means of the practices or sacrifices demanded by the spirit. In a word, from the point of view of the black man, the world was formed to progress regularly, and might possibly have attained its end, had its Creator so willed it. But, for unknown reasons, God had left His work exposed to many harmful influences of elements, of animals, of men, of sorcerers, of ghosts, of spirits. And, since He is beyond man's reach, man cannot escape, he is led to placate or to neutralize such influences as can be reached among the thousands that everywhere reveal themselves. It is to the general scheme of these mysterious things that we must reduce the almost universal belief that there exists for each individual family a special kind of spirit or demon, the taboo of the Maoris, which cannot be touched without misfortune: a fruit, a tree, a fish, an animal, whose name one bears. It is to this scheme, again, that the use of amulets must be referred, made, as they are, of rare and outlandish things; of mysterious remedies, of protective fetishes for everything and against everything. Moreover, divination, second-sight, philters, enchantments, horoscopes, forecasts, are equally well known. Judicial trials, held to make known the guilty, are of daily occurrence. But, just as it is possible for man to use his advantage of to neutralize, these mysterious influences, these demons, virtuous or evil, so he can make use of them to effect his revenge, to do harm to those about him, as do sorcerers, conjurers, or wizards. In league with hidden powers, these practitioners send sicknesses, cause death, bewitch their enemies, and roam at night in the form of some creature, of some bird, or animal, to spread their witcheries. They are, consequently, feared and hated. Many have recourse to them, if they can get to know them, in order to join them, or to follow them with their hatred. If they are discovered, they are made to do penance, are sold, killed, or burned as local justice shall decide. It is curious to meet in the heart of the bush, with prayers and incantations addressed to the gods, the practices and faiths of the Middle Ages, and even at the present day. And, if these wizards and witches practise their arts at the risk of their lives, it may be well to add that they have not seldom merited their fate, for many of them, in addition to their adherence to the supernatural, are undeniably very skillful poisoners. Certain anthropologists and ethnologists, anxious to find in Africa a territory propitious to their theories, endeavour to prove that the religious evolution of man starts from simple Naturism, whence it proceeds to Animism, and thence to Fetishism, to absolute rejection with the prince of the world. This upward march, which supposes man to have set out from the lowest stage towards an indefinite progress, appears reasonable. But it is reasoning a priori, based on an untenable hypothesis. The actual facts are found on examination to be far from agreement with this theory.

(1) Naturism is the worship paid to personified natural objects: the sky, the sun, the moon, the mountains, the thunder, etc. The Hottentots have been said to adore the moon, in whose honour they perform long dances. This statement, however, is not known to be true. There are, like all Africans, fond of dancing by moonlight; they hail the moon's reappearance and follow her course closely, since it is she who measures time, but this is very far from being worship. The true objects of Hottentot worship are the spirits of their dead. They recognize, moreover, a Power higher than these shades, "He Go", an expression which the missionaries have made use of to translate the word "God". Again, other Bantu tribes use terms which mean either "Sky" or "God", "Sun" or "God", etc., but make a clear distinction as to the meaning conveyed by these words. Not one, in fact, imagines that a material identity exists between the planet that gives us light, or the firmament wherein it moves, and the Supreme Being who inhabits or makes use of them. The same may be said concerning the thunder. The blacks, indeed, sometimes say that it is God, who by this sign, foretells the rain, but this is not Naturism. Naturism, in its strict meaning, given to the word, does not exist in Africa.

(2) Animism, based on the distinction between matter and spirit, is the belief in beings which have no affinity to any special thing in nature, but are endowed with a higher power; to whom a certain worship is paid, yet who are incapable of being represented in a visible form. Among the most particular and general sense, it may be said that Animism is the religion of a great part of Africa: the Negritos, Hottentots, Bantus of the south and east, many of the Nigrarians, and most of the Hamites, have practically neither fetishes, idols, nor material images, honored with any kind of worship. They believe, as we have said, in the survival of the spirits of the departed (under an ill-defined form which they liken, as a rule, to a shadow), in their possession of more or less power, in the need of honouring them, placating them, and settling them in fixed localities. They believe, also, in the existence of spirits differing from these in their various influences; lastly, in a Higher Power which they more or less clearly distinguish from visible creation, from the earth, the firmament, etc. However, the want of a true idea of a supreme Deity, and scientific ignorance, are the causes of a great mass of superstition of all kinds among the blacks, even among those who are missionaries.

(3) Fetishism.—The question has been raised whether Animism gave birth to Fetishism, or sprang from a purified Fetishism; but the discussion would be futile. These two forms of religion, if one may call them so, seem to correspond more closely with two divergent subjective dispositions than with two principles, two doctrines, or two traditions. We find, in fact, individuals and families, in the midst of animist populations, who materialize the expression of their worship by making images, into which they pour the emotion of veneration, the essence of their feeling for the sacred thing. Fetishism is the sum of beliefs and practices existing in connection with this idea. It is therefore a mistake to fancy that the negro adores the material of which his fetish is made, or attributes to it a supernatural power. On the contrary, the fetish only possesses influence by means of the particular virtue which the fetishist has fixed in it. But, subject to this reservation, anything may become a fetish: images, bones of men or animals, figures more or less grotesque, stones, trees, huts, etc., according to circumstances or to personal predilection. As to the diffusion of Fetishism, Livingstone points to the fact that it seems to have spread more rapidly and more extensively than to the protraction of man from the forest country; an observation that was well founded. And, since western Africa is far more thickly wooded than the eastern part, it is chiefly in the west that we find classic Fetishism, with its material images and its coarse practices. It is practically non-existent among the Hottentots, the Bantu of the east, the Nigritians, the Hamites, and the Negroes. We are thus led to conclude that these peoples, being more given to wandering than the others, often living a pastoral life in a more open country, have been less prone than were the sedentary tribes to materialize their worship in objects difficult to carry about with them. This, possibly, is the explanation of the phenomenon which attracted Livingstone’s attention. However this may be, an impartial study of African religion makes it impossible for anyone, in the absence of a denial of the existence of a peculiar object, to assert that man began on this great continent by having no religious ideas; that from such a state he passed to Naturism, to rise, by degrees, to Animism, Fetishism, and Theism. Indeed, we find as many, or more, facts indicating that the black man, from a religious standpoint, has degenerated. In the record of Africa, the nations are ever the more overgrown by a more or less confused mass of strange superstitions, the essential ideas of which everywhere has been looked upon as the primitive religion: an unseen God, Master of all things, and Organizer of the world; the survival of the human soul, under a form not clearly defined; at times, the idea of reward and punishment in the other world; the existence and activity of spirits, some of whom help men while others deceive them; prayer, sacrifice, the need of a worship; the sacred nature of a fruit, a tree, or an animal; the duty of abstaining from certain actions, of practicing self-restraint; the idea of sin, of the penalty for sin, etc. The sum total of this evidence—and the list might be prolonged—more or less clear, distinct, or scattered, collected from tribes of different origin which cannot possibly have met for centuries, leaves us convinced that at the beginning of the fourth or fifth century, the Negroes were conscious of beliefs and practices, such as are found at the beginnings of every human race, and on which Christianity itself rests, as we have it to-day.

(B) JUDAISM.—The first historical record of the settlement of the Jews in Africa is the story of Joseph; but it is probable that there had been others there before him. Under Moses, who had been educated at the court of the Pharaoh Rameses “in all the wisdom of the Egyptians” (Acts, vii, 22), the Children of Israel once more crossed the Red Sea. Alexander of Macedon, however, recalled many of them, in 332 B.C., to take part in the foundation of Alexandria. Many of the Israelites, princes and good soldiers, have also produced historians such as Alexander of Miletus, surnamed Polyhistor (though modern critics pronounce him a pagan to whom some fragments of a Jewish tendency have been falsely attributed); moralists and philosophers, such as Aristobulus and Philo; elegiac writers on Greek verse, such as the tragic poet Eucius; 500 B.C. It was at Alexandria that the “Seventy” (Septuagint) translated (third century B.C.) the Law and the Prophets into Greek. Thence, the Jews spread over the Cyrenaics, and made their way to Carthage. A second wave of Jewish emigrants, moreover, left Italy on the conquest of the Carthaginian State by the Romans (146 B.C.), and founded trade-exchanges in most of the seaports of northern Africa. Hence, St. Jerome, writing to Dardanus, could say that the Jewish colonies formed in this time an unbroken chain across Africa, from Mauretania to India. Yet another scattering of the Jews followed the taking of Jerusalem by Titus (A.D. 70) and the destruction of the Temple, bringing a third wave of Jewish emigrants into Roman Africa. The triumph of Mohammed at Mecca (A.D. 630), and the rapid spread of his religion, obliged a large number of Jews to leave Arabia. Of those who crossed the Red Sea some took refuge in Abyssinia, a country with which they had long had intercourse, and where they doubtless found some of their older colonies. It is from these, probably, that the Falashas and Gondas are descended, although these tribes trace their ancestry to Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. Others took the well-known route to Egypt, and, following the Mediterranean coast, set out to rejoin their co-religionists in the territories of Tripoli and Tunis. Some, by pursuing the caravan route of Dar-Fur, across the Wadal, Bornu, and Sokoto, arrived, about the middle of the eleventh century, in the valley of the Niger. Finally, when, in 1492, they were driven from Spain, many of them went to Morocco, and others to Tunis. Such varied origins have caused diversities of type, manners, and speech, among the Jews of Africa, but all have kept that peculiar, personal imprint which distinguishes everywhere the Children of Israel. It is estimated that the approximate number of Jews of other races, is divided thus: 50,000 in Abyssinia; 30,000 in Egypt; 60,000 in Tunis; 87,000 in Algeria; 100,000 in Morocco; more than 10,000 along the border of the Sahara, and 1,800 at the Cape; giving a total of about 300,000. The study of their history in Africa leads to the conclusion that their monotheistic influence was real in Egypt and Numidia, and even in the Sudan. At the present day, however, they carry on no religious propaganda, but are satisfied with keeping their Israelitish worship intact, in communities more or less numerous and faithful, under the guidance of rabbis of various classes—officiating rabbis who sacrifice rabbis, who lead to circumcision, rabbi notaries, and grand rabbis.

(C) ISLAMISM.—Islamism has found in Africa a boundless sphere of conquest, and its uninterrupted spread, from the seventh century down to the present time, among all the races of the continent is one of the most remarkable facts in history. Today a Mussulman may travel from Monrovia to Mecca, and thence to Batavia without once setting foot on "infidel" soil. Three phases in this movement of expansion may be distinguished. In the first (635-1050) the Arabs, in a rapid advance, propagated Islam along the whole Mediterranean coast, from Egypt to Morocco, a conquest greatly aided by the exploitation of the country by the Byzantine governors, the divisions among the Christians, and political disorganization. In the ninth and tenth centuries, however, the opposition of the Berbers and the resistance of the Byzantines, assisted by the Normans, but chiefly the mutual strife of the Muslim emirs, arrested its advance; there were still bishops at Carthage, Hippo, and Constantine in the eleventh century. The second period (1050-1750) is connected with the invasion of the Berber (or Arabico-Berber) Bedouin by the Berbers of the Tuareg and the Mzabites of the Sahara. The name Twareg (singular, Targi) was given by the Arabs to the Berbers of the desert, and means "those forsaken of God." They were the founders of Timbuctoo (A.D. 1077), Djenné, and of the principal centres of influence in north-west Africa. While this part of the continent was being converted, willingly or by force, to Islam, eastern Africa was invaded in its turn by colonies of merchants, who, however, readily became warriors, and never failed to be apostles. It was thus that Islam gained the shores of the Red Sea, Somaliland, and as far as Kilosa, and the islands as far as the Comoro Islands and Madagascar. One nation alone, Ethiopia, entrenched in its huge, mountainous citadel, held out against them. Unfortunately, however, since the sixth century, it has held the Monophyseite heresy. It was on these unconquered Christians that the Arabs bestowed the scornful name of Habesh, meaning "sweepings of the nations," whence the name Abyssinia is derived. The last period of the Moham medan expansion extends to the present time. It is due to a veritable recrudescence of fanaticism, sealedly fostered by a number of religious societies, which in turn obtained influence, and spread in all parts of the world, and possess unbounded influence. Daily, one may say, Islam spreads over the great African continent, creeping down from Morocco to Senegal, making inroads on the valley of the Niger and the shores of Lake Tchad, passing from Kordofan to Uganda, and from Zanzibar to the Congo. Bitterly hostile to Europeans by its very nature, it is yet very skilful in adapting itself to circumstances. This is, doubtless, why so many governors, functionaries, travellers and writers, duped by this deep hypocrisy, favour this expansion of Mohammedanism, and are even guilty of flagrant injustice and abuse of power in imposing it. The Mohammedan world, which resists it, embraces it. As there are no Mohammedan statistics, it is impossible to make an accurate census. The following figures may, however, be quoted: 4,070,000 in Algeria; 1,500,000 in Tunis; 10,000,000 in Morocco; 6,800,000 in French Western Africa; 3,000,000 in Egypt; 2,000,000 in Somaliland, Zanzibar, and the interior. The total numbers of Islam in Africa approximately amount to between thirty and forty millions. Its marvelous spread is due to various causes. In Egypt, to begin with, and throughout northern Africa, it was a forcible conquest of countries and peoples in a state of utter social, political, and religious disorganiza tion. These remnants of peoples were intoxicated by a doctrine of great power, covering all that relates to the interests and concerns of man. From the new groups thus remodelled issued successively other conquerors, down to the recent uprisings of the Hafiz and the Mahdi. Moreover, since Islam is at once a religious doctrine, a social system, a political principle, a commercial interest, a civilization that arrogates to itself all manner of rights against the "infidel," it follows that each Muslim is intimately possessed by the spirit of proselytism. To this end he may, and does, make use of every means; all is permitted against the "unbeliever." Islam, therefore, imposes itself by force, by persuasion, by interest, by alliances, by the spirit of imitation, by fashion. It should be added that there is a real affinity between the manners and customs of the Moors and Arabs and those of the more or less mixed populations of northern Africa; and between these and the negro tribes. Moreover, Muslim exclusiveness becomes not a little modified by contact with Fetishism, and if Islam imposes certain beliefs and practices on its black disciples, they, in turn, bring it to a number of their superstitions and usages. Finally, the Mohammedan simplicity, purity, and rigor, its liturgical discipline, its liberal indulgence in respect of morality, all sustained by the hope of a Paradise made up of well-defined and attractive pleasures, combine to make Islam an ideal religion for the childish intelligence and sensual nature of the African peoples among which it labours. These causes, of themselves, suffice to explain the slight hold that Christianity has gained on the Mohammedan social system. The Muslim who becomes a Christian must renounce, not only his faith, but also his family, his social standing, his interests, all the bonds that bind him to his homeland. How utterly mistaken those are who may have held that Islam is a kind of useful, possibly necessary, transition, between Fetishism and Christianity. On the contrary, Islam as it were crystallizes the heart and mind of man. It is not a step taken upward, but a wall that arrests all progress. From a philo sophical and religious standpoint, however, Islam is undoubtedly superior to the Fetishism of the negro. It acknowledges but One God Almighty, who rewards good and punishes evil in a future life; it teaches the need of prayer, penance, and almsgiving; of a public worship; of abstaining from the use of alcohol, pork, unclean meats, etc. But the absolute freedom with which it preys on the "infidel" by means of polygamy, slavery, thefts, and all kinds of injustice, the utter corruption and the spread of venereal disease to which it gives rise, the pride, hypocrisy, and laxness which it engenders in its disciples, the formidable cohesion which it gives them, make the expansion of "Mussulman civilization" among fetishist peoples anything but desirable. From the standpoint of their proximate evolution they have more to lose from it than to gain. As fetishists they constitute a reserve for Christian civilization; as Muslims, they are lost to it.

(2) PARSEEISM.—The Parsee, who is Iranian, was assimilated with the Zoroastrianism of the Parsee colonies at Zanzibar, Mombasa, Natal, and the Cape; Chinese and Indian Buddhists in the Transvaal, and the island of Mauritius; and the Brahminists Banya, natives of Kurachi, Kach, and Bombay, who trade all over the coast of the centres of Eastern Africa, from Port Said to the Cape. None of these, however, make any proselytes, and all will receive due treatment under their respective titles.

(3) CHRISTIANITY. Christianity penetrated into Africa through two principal channels. It was first brought by the Evangelist St. Mark to Alexandria where it soon shone with great splendour and was represented by such men as Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Athanasius, and Cyril. It passed thence into Lower Egypt, then into the Thebaid, Upper Egypt, and Nubia, and, by way of the Red Sea as far as Ethiopia, adopting as its own the Coptic church, which it found there and in Egypt and the Cyrenaica. At the same period, however, about the end of the first century, Roman soldiers and merchants brought the Gospel to Carthage, whence it soon spread to Proconsular Africa, to the Byzacene province, and to Numidia, added a glorious band to the church, and produced such doctors as Tertullian, Minucius Felix, Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius, Optatus, and the great Bishop of Hippo, St. Augustine. (1)

1 The Dissident Churches.—Unfortunately, African Christianity was constantly exposed to the attacks of schism and heresy; of Gnostics, Monophysites, Arians, Pelagians, Manichaeans, Novatians, and Donatists, who divided and enfeebled it, and so paved the way for its destruction, first, by the Vandals and, finally, by Islam. Most of these sects have long since disappeared; but the Monophysites, who, following Eutyches, acknowledge only one nature of Christ (the human having absorbed the human), have continued to exist, and form at the present time three distinct churches: namely, The Armenian Church, whose Patriarch, or Catholicos, resides near Erzerum (see Armenia); The Jacobite Church of Syria and Mesopotamia, whose head is the Patriarch of Anioch (see Jacobites, Monophysites); The Coptic Church of Egypt, governed by the Patriarch of Alexandria, resident at Cairo, who exercises a kind of ecclesiastical suzerainty over the Monophysite Church of Abyssinia. These Copts (from Gr. Αιγυπτιωτα, Egypt), descendants of the ancient Egyptians, are about 200,000 in number, and are spread over some twenty dioceses, as in the seventh and eighth centuries (see Copts.) In Ethiopia (see Abyssinia), the Monophysites number 3,500,000 out of a total population of nearly 4,000,000. The rest are Mussulmans (200,000), Israelites (50,000), Pagans (100,000), or Catholics (30,000). The liberal immigration of Protestants in Europe, and the still makes, considerable efforts on this continent. Every nation in which Protestantism flourishes has taken part in this missionary work: Germany, Norway, Sweden, England, Holland, Switzerland, France, and the United States of America. In 1736 the Missionaries established a settlement at Cape of Good Hope, and formed colonies of farmers and mechanics. Their influence has contributed to the civilization of the Hottentots and Kafirs. They settled among the Kafirs in 1828, and, in 1885, to the north of Lake Nyassa. The mission which they had founded at Christiansburg, on the Gold Coast, and then abandoned, was taken up in 1828 by the Société des missions évangéliques de Basle, which has since spread to the country of the Ashantis, to the German colony of the Togo, and to the Kamer- Déns, where they have replaced (1887) the English Baptists. From Germany, the Berlin Missions have sent out to the Orange Colony, to Griqualand, the Transvaal, and German East Africa; the Rhénish Mission, to the Hottentots, the Namas, the Herreros, and the Ovambos; the North-German Missions (Bremen and Herrmannsburg) to Togoland and the Gold Coast; and, in the Transvaal, to the Basutos and Nlates. In short, there are at least three independent missionary establishments in the country of Erythrées; the Norwegians have an important mission at Betsileo, in Madagascar, numbering 50,000 Malagasy. With the exception of the German mission of Hermannsburg, and the Norwegian missions, which are distinctively Lutheran, all the others have various creeds difficult to specify. The English missions are notably rich and numerous. The most important only need be mentioned here, namely: The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which dates from 1752, and labours on the Guinea Coast, at the Cape, and in Madagascar; The London Missionary Society, founded in 1799, which has stations in English Africa; The London Missionary Society, established in 1795 on an undeniamental basis, which made its action chiefly felt in South Africa, with Moffat and Dr. Livingstone; The Universities Missionary Society, with its centre at Zanzibar; the Baptist Mission at Fernando Po; the Methodist Missions on the Congo; the Methodist Missions of Sierra Leone, the Niger, and the Gold Coast; the Scottish Missions, etc. The French Protestants, in their turn, founded the Société des missions évangéliques at Paris, in 1824, which has sent its agents to the Basutos in northeastern Cape Colony, where they have been very successful; to the French Congo (Gabo region), where they replaced the American Presbyterians (1892); to the Barotsé country on the Upper Zambesi, and, finally, to Madagascar, where they have been called upon to take the place, to some extent, of the English missions (1855). Nor must we overlook the efforts which the different nations have taken the chief part in this work: the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Baptist Church, and the Presbyterian Church. The Methodists began their labours in the colony of Liberia from its very foundation (1820), but it was only in 1853 that they were able to establish a permanent bishopric there. The Baptists, also, have stations in Monrovia, Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Lagos. The most important missions, however, are those of the Presbyterians. In Egypt there is hardly a village on the Nile without one of their schools, under a Coptic bishop. Protestantism, therefore, already considerable activity in Africa, seconded, as it is, by the magnificent generosity of its adherents and of its numerous native assistants. It would be impossible in an article of this kind to specify not only all the societies engaged in African missions, but also the stations they occupy, the personnel they employ, the number of missionaries they have had, the number of neophytes which they profess to have gathered around them. The figures which might be quoted vary according to the documents consulted. There exists, moreover, no estimate of the total. Each year introduces startling discrepancies into the statistics, as in any statistics at their extenuates, there is a risk of misrepresentations. However the most recent returns are as follows (1906):—

Protestant missionary societies in Africa, 95; Ordained missionaries, 1,158; Lay missionaries, 1,993; Native assistants employed, 15,732; Communicants, 274,650; Christians (approximately), 400,000.

To complete the information given above, we subjoin a list of the principal societies, with their spheres of labour. American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Benguela, Rhodesia, Natal; American Baptist Union, Congo State; American Lutherans, Liberia; African Methodist Episcopal Missions, Liberia; African Mission, the river Colonies, Anyama (Central) Presbyterians, Liberia, Kameruns, Gaboon; American (South) Baptists, Liberia, Yoruba; American (South) Presbyterians, Congo State; American Presbyterians (United), Egypt; African Zion Methodist, Liberia; Basler Mission, Gold Coast, Kameruns; Balolo Mission, Congo State, Musom; German African Mission; Berlin Mission (Berlin I), Cape, Orange Colony, Transvaal, Rhodesia, German Africa; Church Missionary Society, Sierra Leone, Yoruba, Nigeria, Seychelles, German Africa, East Africa, Uganda, Egypt; Congregational Union, Cape, Orange Colony; Deutsche Baptisten, Kameruns; Evangelische Missionsgesellschaft für Deutsche Afrika (Berlin III):
German Africa; English Baptist Mission, Congo State; Established Church of Scotland, Nyassa; Evangelical Fosterers Söffelse, Erythrea; Friends (Quakers), Madagascar; Missionaries of St. Paul, West Africa; Hermannsbürg Mission, Natal, Zulu-land, Transvaal; London Missionary Society, Cape, Bechuanaland, Mashonaland, Rhodesia, Madagascar; Leipziger Mission, German East Africa, British East Africa; Methodist Episcopal Missionary Society, Liberia, Cape Coast, Angola; Mission de Flandre, Mozambique; Nord-Afrika Mission, Algeria, Morocco, Egypt; Norddeutsche Missionsgesellschaft (Bremen), Togoland; Norwegian Society of Missions, Natal, Zulu-land, Madagascar; Missionsanstalt Neukirchen bei Mörs a.-R., Rhodesia, British East Africa; Open Brethren (formerly Plymouth Brethren, or Darbyites), Algeria, Morocco, Ben- guela, Lunda; Societé des missions évangéliques de Paris, French Guinea, Basutoland, Barotseland, Gaboon, Madagascar; Protestant Episcopal Mission, Liberia; Primitive Methodist Mission, Fernando Po, Cape; Rheinische Missionsgesellschaft, German South-west Africa, Togoland, Cape, Dutch South Africa Mission, Transvaal, Rhodesia; Swedish Mission (State Church), Natal, Zulu-land; Swedish Society of Missions, Congo State; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, Guinea, Cape, Natal, Basutoland, Orange Colony, Rhodesia, Madagascar, Mauritius, Seychelles; United Church of Christ, Sierra Leone; United Church of Scotland, Calabar, Cape, Kaffirland, Natal, Nyassa; United Methodist Free Church, British East Africa; Universities Mission, Zanzibar, Nyassa, German East Africa; Wesleyan Methodist, Senegambia, Sierra Leone, Togoland, Gold Coast, Lagos and Yoruba, Cape, Kaffirland, Natal, Basutoland, Orange Colony, Transvaal, Natal, and South West Africa; Zanzibar Mission; the British and Foreign Lectureship for mission in Abyssinia; finally, Vasco da Gama, who sailed from Lisbon, with three caravels on 8 June, 1497, and had followed the Mozambique coast as far as Malindi, reached the East Indies on 20 May, 1498. Their discovery gave a great impulse to missions. Portuguese and Spaniards, French and Italians, were all, with an admirable courage, engaged in the work of the foreign apostolate. This period witnessed the founding of the Bishops of Las Palmas in the Canary Islands (1409), Funchal in Madeira (1514), Sant’Iago at Cape Verde; San Thomé and San Salvador (1488), afterwards transferred to Loanda. The Carthusians and Jesuits did wonders in Angola; the Dominicans settled at Mozambique, the bishopric of which dates from 1614; and the Augustinians took Zanzibar, Mombasa, and Paté as their sphere of labour, where they founded numerous Christian communities. Attempts were made at the same time to discover the famous Prester John in Abyssinia, but it was only in the seventeenth century, and for barely forty years, that the Jesuits were able to establish themselves in that country, with the hope, soon destroyed by a violent persecution, of bringing back this ancient church to Catholicism. Unfortunately, however, evil days were destined to blight the fair promise of time. Protestantism at the beginning of the sixteenth century had brought about irreparable divisions of Christianity, and thus hindered the conversion of the world, so now other social, political, and religious disturbances were to check for a while the colonizing activities of the European nations in the countries they had lately discovered. The sectarian policy of the Marquis de Pombal, the bigotry of the Dutch and English governments, and, lastly, the French Revolution, combined to disintegrate the religious orders, and at the same time to destroy the missions. But when the storm was over, the Church was to work to build up the ruins, to make good the harm done, to take up once again her forward march on behalf of civilization. In Africa there were only a few priests and these were at the European trading stations: St. Louis in Senegal, the French island of Goree, the Cape Verde Islands, the Cape of Good Hope, Reunion, and the foci of mission. Indebted to the Jesuits, a priest of the Mission, with a few of his Lazarist brethren, had succeeded in entering Abyssinia, and in taking up, with many precautions, the old missions of the Portuguese Jesuits; and the Franciscans maintained such remanets of their missions as the gift Egypt, in Tripoli, Tunis, and Morocco. But while the powers of one made a final division of the African continent between them, God was making ready a new apostle... for the evangelization of Africa. This work, which was to mark the close of the nineteenth century, had very lowly beginnings, and originated in America. A philanthropic association had existed in the United States since 1817, whose object was to provide a neutral territory in Africa for liberated negro slaves; and the idea was entertained that they might build up an independent country for themselves. The first experiment was made on Sherbro Island, to the south of Sierra Leone; this, however, proved a failure. The undertaking was renewed in 1823 with better success, on a point of冈支博海岸, which became the capital of Liberia. In 1829, Bishop England, of Charleston, S. C., called the attention of Propaganda to the undertaking, and the Second Provincial Synod of Baltimore, which was to meet shortly afterwards (1828), received authority to deal with the matter. The Synod decided to apply to the Jesuits, but the negotiations were not carried through. The matter was finally taken in hand by Bishop Kenrick of Philadelphia, and at his request his vicar-general, the Rev. Edward Barron, was sent out, December 1841, with the title of Prefect Apostolic of United States, and accompanied by the Rev. John O'Callahan and Denis Pindar, a catechist, all of Irish origin. These missionaries arrived at Monrovia after a voyage of thirty-four days, but, finding only a few Catholics among the emigrants, proceeded thence to Cape Palmas, where another town was being built. Its inhabitants numbered about four hundred, and there were eighteen Catholics. The Prefect Apostolic accordingly began his missionary labours, and having visited Cape Palmas, Elmina, and Accra, where he found hopeful traces of the ancient Spanish and Portuguese missions, went to Europe in search of missionaries; and to ask help of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, which had recently been founded at Lyons. Rome nominated him Vicar Apostolic of the Two Guineas and Sierra Leone (22 January, 1842); the Society for the Propagation of the Faith gave him assistance, and the Minister General of the Capuchins promised him the help of religious from the Spanish Province, one of whom was even named prefect apostolic. Unforeseen delays, however, occurred, and this last arrangement was not carried out. Barron, finding himself at the head of a mission without missionaries, went to the shrine of Our Lady of Victories, in Paris, to present the case that was to be taken up by Father M. F. Libermann, superior of a congregation recently founded for the evangelization of the negroes, had several missionaries at his disposal, and had come to ask Our Lady of Victories to open to him a field of missionary labour. An agreement was quickly made, and it was thus that, under the leadership of a prelate from America, the Fathers of the Holy Ghost were led to take up the missions of the Dark Continent. Not long afterwards, Mgr. Barron, disheartened by illness and disappointment, resigned, and the Vicariate Apostolic of the Two Guineas was entrusted to the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, which was soon (1848) to receive theCongregate with the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. This vicariate extended from Senegal to the Orange river, with the exception of the region, then hardly occupied, included in the Portuguese Diocese of St. Paul de Loanda. This vast country was gradually partitioned out, and there arose the present system of missions, and the work of the Holy Ghost, to which the Catholic missions of western Africa are conducted. The Portuguese Bishopric of Angola and Congo had been maintained at Loanda, but the Portuguese missions, properly so called, had entirely disappeared, when the daring initiative of Father Duparquet, another of the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, undertook their revival. In 1872 he founded a permanent post at Landana, which has become the headquarters of the Lower Congo, or Portuguese Congo, Mission. In 1881, the mission of the Huilla Plateau was started, which was to exploit its sphere of action beyond the Cunene; in 1884, the Prefecture Apostolic of the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart at Cassinga, then Caconda, Bikolo, Massaca, and Kuanyama, and reached almost as far as the basin of the Upper Zambesi. Finally, in 1887, a post was founded in Loanda itself, whence the mission passed to Malanana in 1890, and, recently, along the Congo, in the direction of the interior, in the region of the capital, and finally, in 1895, the mission of the Sacred Heart was established, in 1897, in the Cape region to the south, to serve the needs of the European colony, has also been divided, and we now find there: the Vicariates Apostolic of Western Cape Colony (1897); of Central Cape Colony (1874), and of Eastern Cape Colony (1857), served by English priests; the Orange River Prefecture, established by the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, and then made over to the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales at Troyes, and recently raised to a Vicariate (1898); and lastly, the Prefectures of Basutoland (1894) and the Transvaal (1896); the Vicariates of the Orange Free State, now Orange River Colony (1880) and Natal (1859), and the Vicariate of the Missionaries of Mary Immaculate. On the East Coast the missionary movement had its beginning in the Island of Bourbon (Réunion). Two of the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, Father Dalmond in 1848, and Father Monnet in 1849, who had evangelized the Saint Mary Islands and the island of Nonou, were succeeded, one year later, by another, Vicar Apostolic of Madagascar. Death, however, prevented both from settling on the mainland. The mission was, therefore, entrusted, in 1850, to the Society of Jesus. In 1852, the Capuchin Fathers of the Savoy Province were placed in charge of the Seychelles mission, which was made a vicariate in 1858. It was from Bourbon that Father Fayolle, one of the local clergy, who died, later, as Bishop of Grenoble, set out for Zanzibar in 1860. Shortly afterwards, the Fathers of the Holy Ghost took possession of this East Coast and extended their jurisdiction from the Portuguese prelature of Mozambique to Cape Carrafa, coming in touch in the mysterious interior of the continent with the vaguely-defined boundaries which separated them from their brethren of the West Coast. The work had been begun, but more missionaries were needed to prosecute it. These came, indeed, in greater numbers than men had dared to hope for. The vicariate of Mary Immaculate, founded at Marseilles by Mgr. de Mazenod, the following should be named: The Priests of the African Missions at Lyons, founded in 1859 by Mgr. Marion de Brésilhac, on the lines of the Missions Etrangères at Paris; the Missionaries of Our Lady of Africa in Algeria, or White Fathers, founded by the illustrious Cardinal Lavigerie in 1858, and destined to take an early and brilliant share in evangelization of the continent; the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, at Troyes, already mentioned; the Priests of the Sacred Heart, at St. Quentin, who have recently settled in the Congo Free State. The Society of Jesus, moreover, never vanquished, was re-scaling its old place on the Dark Continent, in that same colony, as also in the Zambesi basin, and in Egypt. The Spanish Fathers of the Holy Heart of Mary had long (since 1855) been labouring in Fernando Po and its dependencies; the Belgian missionaries of Scheut-Bruyelles had succeeded the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, and were joined by German missionaries in 1871; German missionaries had followed their countrymen to Togoland, the Kamerun, and Dahomey, in East Africa; the Italian Capuchins, side by side with their French brethren among the Gallas, and the Lazarists in Abyssinia, wished to take their share of missionary labour in the conquered possemissions of King Humbert in Erythrea. We should add, to complete our list, that the Institute of Verona, resuming its former undertaking, has been in charge of the Egyptian Sudan since 1872, and that the English missionaries of St. Joseph, from Mill Hill, have received from the White Fathers the Vicariate of the Upper Nile, in Northern Uganda. In a word, the missionary movement, begun amid so many difficulties, has developed wonderfully, in every direction, and it is comforting for the Catholic to see, at the beginning of this twentieth century, the heroism with which the missionaries are assailing the Dark Continent. In order to give a comprehensive view of the religious activity there, it will be instructive to quote in a single table the various jurisdictions into which Catholic Africa is divided, with their dates of establishment and the society in charge of each.

The most recent statistics, which, unfortunately, are very far from being exact, give a total of 300,000 faithful—362,177, according to Father J. B. Piolet—with 1,064 missionaries. The religious statistics of Africa, in 1906, may be given as follows: Animists, Fetishists, 90,000,000; Mussulmans, 36,000,000; Jews (including the Falashas of Ethiopia), 300,000; other non-Christians (Parsiens, Buddhists, etc.), 4,000; Christians: Monophysite Copts of Egypt, 150,000; Abyssinian Church, 3,000,000; Schismatic Greeks, Armenians, 2,000; Protestants, 400,000; Catholics, 360,000; Total, 130,215,000.

To these Societies of missionary priests must be added a number of congregations of missionary brothers and sisters. (See also names of Princes, Bishops, Vicarates Apostolic, etc.)

Alexandre Le Roy.

African Church, Early.—The name, Early African Church, is given to the Christian communities inhabiting the region known politically as Roman Africa, and comprised geographically within the following limits, namely: the Mediterranean littoral between Cyrene and the east and the river Ampsagas (now the Rummel) on the west; part of it which faces the Atlantic Ocean being called Mauretania. These Christian communities, apparently, extended only as far as the neighbourhood of Tangier. The evangelization of Africa followed much the same lines as those traced by Roman civilization. Starting from Carthage, it overran Proconsular Africa and Numidia, and grew less thorough as it drew near to Mauretania.

History.—The delimitation of the ecclesiastical boundaries of the African Church is a matter of great difficulty. Again, again the Roman pontiffs, most of which they had taken from the Catholics. They had, however, grown so powerful that even such a measure failed to crush them; so numerous were they that a Donatist Council, held at Carthage, in 327, was attended by 270 bishops. Attempts at reconciliation, suggested by the Em-
The emperor Constantius, only widened the breach, and led to armed repression, an ever-growing disquiet, and an emnity that became more and more embittered. Yet, in the very midst of these troubles, the Primate of the Church, bishop Silvanus, died in the year 394: "God has restored Africa to religious unity." Julian's accession (361) and his permission to all religious exiles to return to their homes added to the troubles of the African Church. A Donatist bishop sat in the heretical see of Carthage, in opposition to the orthodox bishop of Carthage, and the emperor. Convocation succeeded another and begot new conflicts. About this period, Optatus, Bishop of Milevei, began to combat the sect by his writings. A few years later, St. Augustine (q. v.), converted at Milan, returned to his native land, and entered the lists against every kind of error. Paganism had by that time ceased to be a menace; in 399 the temples were closed at Carthage. Nevertheless the energy and genius of Augustine were abundantly occupied in training the clergy and instructing the faithful, as well as in theological controversy with the heretics. For forty years, from 390 to 430, the Councils of Carthage (see AFRICAN SYNODS) which reunited a great part of the African Episcopate, public discussions with the Donatists, sermons, homilies, scriptural commentaries, followed almost without interval; an unparalleled activity which had commensurate results. The Pelagian heresy, which had made great strides in Africa, was condemned at the Council of Carthage in 411 (see Donatism, Pelagianism) were stricken to death at an hour when political events of the utmost gravity changed the history and the destiny of the African Church. Boniface, Count of Africa, had summoned the Vandals to Africa in 426, and by 439 the invasion was completed. The barbarians advanced rapidly, and made themselves masters of cities and provinces. In 430 St. Augustine died, during the siege of Hippo; nine years later Geiseric, King of the Vandals, took possession of Carthage. Then began for the African Church an era of persecution of a kind hitherto unknown. The Vandals were Arians and sectaries. Not only did they wish to establish their own Arian sect, but they were bent on the destruction of Catholicism. The churches which the invasion had left standing were either transferred to the Vandals or withdrawn from the Catholics and closed to public worship. For intervention from the Emperor, the Vandals were driven out (474-491) and the conclusion of a treaty of peace with Geiseric, were followed by a transient calm. The churches were opened, and the Catholics were allowed to choose a bishop (476), but the death of Geiseric, and the edict of Hunnerich, in 484, made matters worse than before. A contemporary writer, Victor of Vita (q. v.), has told us what we know of this long history of the Vandal persecution. Even in such a condition of peril, the Christians of Africa were far from showing those virtues which might be looked for in a time of persecution. It is true that Salvius of Marseilles (q. v.) is prone to exaggeration in Carthage, Gratus, but he gives us a most clear and not wholly inaccurate, account of the crimes of all kinds which made Africa one of the most wretched provinces in the world. Nor had the Vandals escaped the effects of this moral corruption, which slowly destroyed their power and eventually facilitated their downfall. During the last years of Vandal rule in Africa," St. Fulgentius (q. v.), in his History of the Vandals, exercised a fortunate influence over the princes of the dynasty, who were no longer ignorant barbarians, but whose culture, wholly Roman and Byzantine, equaled that of their native subjects. Yet the Vandal monarchy, which had lasted for nearly three centuries, seemed to have been firmly established than at its beginning. Hilderich, who succeeded Thrasamond in 523, was too cultured and too mild a prince to impose his will on others. Glimmer made an attempt to deprive him of power, and, proclaimed King of the Vandals in 531, marched on Carthage and became king. His reign was completely successful, and his authority firmly established, when a Byzantine fleet appeared off the coast of Africa. The naval battle of Decimus (13 September, 533) destroyed, in a few hours, the sea-power of the Vandals. The landing of the Byzantine fleet, the taking of Hippo, the capture of Carthage, and the battle of Tricamarum, about the middle of December, completed their destruction and their disappearance.

The victor, Belisarius, had but to show himself in order to reconquer the greater part of the coast, and to place the cities under the authority of the Emperor Justinian. A council held at Carthage in 534 was attended by 220 bishops, representing all the churches. It issued a decree forbidding the public exercise of Arian worship. The establishment of Byzantine rule, however, was far from restoring unity to the African Church. The Council of Carthage brought together the bishops of Proconsular Africa, Byzacena, and Numidia, but those of Tripolitania and Mauretania were absent. Mauretania had, in fact, regained its political autonomy, during the Vandal period. A native dynasty had been set up, and the Byzantine army of occupation never succeeded in conquering a part of the country so far as Tripolitania and Cyrenaica; in 643 they conquered part of the Tripolitana. In 647 the Caliph Othman gave orders for a direct attack on Africa, and an army which had gained a victory at Sdira withdrew on payment of a large ransom. Some years of respite ensued. The African Church showed its firm attachment to orthodoxy by remaining loyal to Pope Martin I (649-685) in his conflict with the Emperor of Byzantium. The last forty years of the seventh century witnessed the gradual fall of Hilderich from the throne of Emparedados into the hands of the Arabs. The Berber, or native tribes, which before this had seemed on the way to conversion to the Gospel, passed in a short time, and without resistance, to Islam. Carthage (q. v.) was taken by the Arabs in 685. Two years later it was re-entered by the Patrician John, but only for a brief period, 598-599. The fall of Carthage was the dissolution of the capital of Northern Africa. In this overwhelming disaster of the Arab invasion the Churches of Africa were blotted out. Not that all was destroyed, but that the remnant of Christian life was so small as to be matter for erudition rather than for history.

CHRISTIAN LITERATURE OF AFRICA.—The ecclesi-ecstatic literature of Christian Africa is the most important of Latin Christian literatures. The first name which presents itself is that of Tertullian (q. v.), an admirable writer, much of whose work we still possess, notwithstanding the lacunae due to lost writings. Such works form the "Passio S. Perpetue" have been attributed to him, but the great apologist stands so complete that he has no need to borrow from others. Not that Tertullian is always remarkable for style, ideas, and theology, but he has furnished matter for very suggestive studies. His style, indeed, is often exaggerated, but his faults are those of a living man, and should be passed over. It is true that his works remain among the most valuable of Christian antiquity. The lawyer, Minucius Felix, has shown so much literary skill in his short treatises of a few pages that he has deservedly attained to fame. The correspondence, treatises, and sermons of Cyprian (q. v.), Bishop of Carthage, are approximately to the middle of the third century, the correspondence forming one of the most valuable sources for the history of Christianity in Africa and the West during his time. His relations with the Church of Rome, the councils of Carthage, his endless disputes with the African bishops, the place, to some extent, of the lost documents of the period, St. Cyprian, indeed, although an orator before he became a bishop, is not Tertullian's equal in the matter of style. His treatises are well composed, and written with art; they do not, however, contain that inexhaustible abundance of views and perspectives which are the sole privilege of certain very lofty minds. Arnobius, the author of an apology for Christianity, is of a secondary interest; Lactantius (q. v.), more cultured and more literary, only belongs to Africa by reason of the richness of his genius. The peculiar bent of his talent is purely Ciceroan, nothing is on his nature. Among these, each of whom has his name and place, there moved others, almost unknown, or hidden under an impenetrable anonymity. Writings collected among the "Spuria" of Latin literature have been sometimes attributed to Tertullian, sometimes to St. Cyprian, or even to Pope Victor, the contemporary of the Emperor Commodus; they need not, however, detain us here. Other authors, again, such as Maximus of Madaura and Victorinus, stand, with Optatus of Milevi, in the front rank of African literature in the fourth century, before the appearance of St. Augustine.

The writings of St. Augustine are so closely connected with his work as a bishop, that it is difficult, at the present time, to separate one from the other. He wrote not for the sake of writing, but for the sake of doing. From the year 386 onward, his treatises appeared every year. Such profuseness is often detrimental to their literary worth; but when profuse, it is without rival. From his own admission, he was negligent concerning beauty of form, of which he hardly ever seems to think in his solicitude about other things. His one aim above all else is to ensure conviction; the result is that we owe to the mere splendour of his genius the few beautiful passages which have fallen from his pen. It is to the loftiness of his thought, rather than to the culture of his mind, that we owe certain pages which are admirable, but not perfect. The language of Augustine was Latin indeed, but a Latin that had already entered on its decline. His desire was to be understood, not to be admired. For Perpetua, Fénelon has been accused of his work in respect of style. But when from his style we pass to his thoughts, we may admire almost unreservedly. Even here we find occasional traces of bad taste, but it is the taste of his period: florid, fond of glitter, puns, refinements—in a word, of the weaknesses of contemporary Latin. Of all St. Augustine's works, only the "Confessions," the "City of God," and the "Commentary on the Gospel of St. John." As regards theology, his works gave Christianity an impulse of which was felt for centuries; the doctrine of the Trinity supplied him with matter for the most finished exposition to be found among the works of the Doctors of the Church. Other writers, theologians, poets, or historians, are to be met with after St. Augustine's time, but their names, honourable as they are, cannot compare in fame with the great ones which we have recorded as belonging to this third and fourth centuries. The endeavour of St. Fulgentius, Bishop of Ruspe, is to think and write as a faithful disciple of St. Augustine. Dracoutius, a meritorious poet, lacks elevation; only an occasional line deserves a place among the poetry which does not die. Victor of Vita, an enthusiastic historian of Carthage approximately to the middle of the third century, in the presence of his too literary descriptions, for the monotonous simplicity of the chronicles, with their rigorous exactness. In the theological or historical writings of Facundus of Hermiane, Vercundus, and Victor of Tunnunum, may be found bursts of passion not wholly without merit from a literary standpoint, but which not seldom leave us doubtful as to the historical accuracy of their narratives or their reminiscences.

The writings of African authors, e. g. Tertullian and St. Augustine, are full of quotations drawn from the Sacred Scriptures. These fragmentary texts are among the most ancient witnesses to the Latin Bible, and are of great importance, not only in connection with the formation of the style and vocabulary of the Christian writers of Africa, but also in regard to the establishment of the biblical text. Africa is represented at the present day by a group of texts in which is preserved the "African Version" of the New Testament. It may now be taken as certain that there never existed in early Christian Africa an official Latin text known to all the Churches, or used by the faithful to the exclusion of all others. The African bishops willingly allowed corrections to be made in a copy of the Sacred Scriptures, or even a reference, when necessary, to the Greek text. With some exceptions, it was the Septuagint text that prevailed, for the Old Testament, until the fourth century. In the case of the New, the MSS. were of the western type. (See Bible, Canon.) On this basis there arose a very rich body of translation, which is a well-established fact as to the existence of a number of versions of the Bible of Africa does not imply, however, that there was no one version more widely used and more generally received than the rest, i.e. the version which is found nearly complete in the works of St. Cyprian. Yet even this version was without rival. From his own admission, he was negligent concerning beauty of form, of which he hardly ever seems to think in his solicitude about other things. His one aim above all else is to ensure conviction; the result is that we owe to the mere splendour of his genius the few beautiful passages which have fallen from his pen. It is to the loftiness third century; in the middle of the fourth the Donatist Tychonius uses and collates two versions of the Apocalypse.

Liturgy.—The liturgy of the African Church is known to us from the writings of the Fathers, but there exists no complete work, no liturgical book, belonging to it. The writings of Tertullian, of St. Cyprian, of St. Augustine are full of valuable information; but in order to permit us to conclude that the liturgy of Africa presented many and characteristic points of contact with the liturgy of the Roman Church. The liturgical year comprised the feasts in honour of Our Lord and a great number of feasts of martyrs, which are offset by certain days of penance; however, in the actual practice of the liturgy, these feasts have conformed rigorously, in this matter, with what was elsewhere customary. The station days (q.v.), Wednesday and Friday, were not of universal observance; they are even spoken of, at times, as rigorous suitable to the Montanist sect. The fast of these days was not continued beyond the third hour after noon. Easter in the African Church had the same character as in other Churches; it continued to draw a part of the year into its orbit by fixing the date of Lent and of the Paschal season, while Pentecost and the Ascension likewise gravitated around it. Christmas and the Epiphany were kept clearly apart from the more elaborate feasts of the martyrs is not always to be distinguished from that of the dead, and it is only by degrees that the line was drawn between the martyrs who were to be invoked and the dead who were to be prayed for. The prayer (petition) for a place of refreshment, refregium, bears witness to the belief of an interchange of help between the living and the departed. In addition, moreover, to the prayer for the dead, we find in Africa the prayer for certain classes of the living. (See African Liturgy.)

Dialects.—Several languages were used simultaneously by the people of Africa; the southern part appears to have been a Latin-speaking country. Indeed, previous to, and during the first centuries of our era we find there a flourishing Latin literature, many schools, and famous rhetoricians. However, Greek was currently spoken at Carthage in the second century; some of Tertullian's treatises were written in Greek. In the age of Graeco-Roman civilization caused the neglect and abandonment of that tongue. At the beginning of the third century an African, chosen at random, would have expressed himself more easily in Greek than in Latin; two hundred years later, St. Augustine and the poet Dracontius had at best but a slight knowledge of the Greek language. No work of Christian literature written in Punic has come down to us, though there can be no doubt but that the clergy and faithful used a language much spoken in Carthage and in the coast towns of the Proconsular Province. The lower and middle classes spoke Punic, and the Circumcellion (q.v.) heretics were to be among the last of its defenders. The Christian writers almost wholly ignore the native Libyan, or Berber, dialect. St. Augustine, indeed, tells us that this speech was only in use among the nomad tribes.

H. Leclercq.

African Liturgy.—This liturgy was in use not only in the old Roman province of Africa of which Carthage was the capital, but also in Numidia and Mauretania; in fact, in all of Northern Africa from the Pyramidal west of Egypt west to the Atlantic Ocean. Christianity was introduced into the proconsular Africa in the latter half of the second century, probably by missionaries from Rome, and then spread rapidly through the other African provinces. The language of the liturgy was Latin, modified somewhat by the introduction of many Africanisms. It is probably the oldest Latin liturgy, since it had been in use long before the Roman Church changed her official language from the Greek to the Latin idioms. A study of the African liturgy might thus be very useful to trace the origin and development of the different rites, and to determine what influence one rite had on another. Since the African Church was dependent upon Rome, always devoted to the See of St. Peter, and since there was constant communication between Africa and Rome concerning ecclesiastical affairs, it may easily be supposed that liturgical questions were raised, different customs discussed, and possibly the same forms or forms of ceremony adopted by the other. At a later date the African liturgy would seem to have exercised some influence upon the Mozarabic and Gallican liturgies. The great similarity in some of the phraseology, etc., would show a common origin or a mutual dependence of the liturgies. The African liturgy may be considered in two different periods: the ante-Nicene period, when the Church was suffering persecution and could not freely develop the forms of public worship, and when the liturgical prayers and acts had not become fixed; and the post-Nicene period, when the simple, improvised forms of prayer gave way to the more formal, set ceremonies of one churc.

I. ANTE-NICENE PERIOD.—It is a difficult matter to reconstruct the ancient African liturgy since there are so few available data; for instance, owing to the ravages of time and of the Saracens, no liturgical codes now survive; in the works of the early Fathers or ecclesiastical writers, and in the acts of the councils there are but few quotations from the liturgical books, and not many references to the words or ceremonies of the liturgy. In the first, or ante-Nicene period, it may be said there were only two writers who furnish useful information on the subject—Tertullian and St. Cyprian. The writings of Tertullian are especially rich in descriptions of ecclesiastical customs, or in clear allusions to existing rites and usages. Some additional information may be gained from the acts of the early martyrs, e.g., the Acts of St. Perpetua, St. Felicitas, who are quite authentic and authentic. Finally, the inscriptions on Christian monuments give much confirmatory evidence on the beliefs and practices of the time. From these various sources one may learn some of the customs which were peculiar to the African Church, and, what formularies and ceremonies were common to all the Roman churches. The prayers of the Christians were either private or liturgical. Privately they prayed every morning and evening, and many of them prayed frequently during the day; for example, at the third, sixth, and ninth hours, before meals, and before undertaking any unusual work or enterprise. The liturgical prayers were said chiefly during the reunions of the faithful to observe the vigils, or to celebrate the agape and the Holy Eucharist. These Christian assemblies in Africa seem to have been modelled on the same plan as those in other countries. They imitated, in a certain measure, the services of the Jewish synagogue, using the name of sacrifice and some institutions peculiar to Christianity. In these reunions three elements are easily distinguishable: psalmody, the reading of passages from the Old and New Testaments, and prayer, to which a homily on the Scripture was generally added. Such meetings were sometimes distinct from the mass, but sometimes an integral part of it, to which the celebration of the divine mysteries. The elders of the Church presided over the assembly, instructions and exhortations were given, prayers recited.
for the needs of the Church, the necessities of the brethren were considered and provided for, and various business pertaining to the Christian community was transacted; and finally, the agape was celebrated as a fitting conclusion to a reunion of the disciples of Christ. The agape seems to have been celebrated in Africa in the same manner as in other parts of Christendom, to have been an abuse to be suppressed here, as well as elsewhere.

These liturgical meetings generally took place at night, or just before dawn, and hence Tertullian speaks of such an assembly as a cura antelucanarum, a “meeting before the dawn” (Apol., ii), while others speak of a “meeting before the sun.” Possibly, as it was necessary to commemorate the time of the Resurrection of the Lord, or perhaps it was selected to enable the Christians in times of persecution to evade the persecutors. The true Christian liturgy, in a strict sense of the word, is the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the sacrifice of the New Law. This generally followed the long prayers of a vigil, and even today some traces of the vigil survive, since a similarity may easily be noticed between the prayers for the ancient vigils, and the first, or preparatory part of the Mass; or perhaps even more clearly in the first part of the Masses for the Ember days, or the Mass of the Pre-sanctified, held by the catechumens. Possibly the Paschal Eucharist was celebrated very early in the morning ordinarily, and the regular day chosen for assisting at the sacrifice and partaking of Holy Communion was the Sunday, in commemoration of the Resurrection of Christ. The Sabbath was not observed by the Christians in the Jewish sense, and the Jewish festivals were also abandoned, as is evident from the words of Tertullian (De idolatria, xiv), speaking of the observance of festivals by Christians, “to whom Sabbaths are strange, and the new-moons and festivals formerly beloved by God.”

The Sunday was now the Lord’s day, a day of rejoicing, on which it was forbidden to fast, nor was it allowed to pray, “unless it be by fasting or kneeling in worship on the Lord’s day to be unlawful.” (Tert., De corona, iii.)

When Sunday was thus kept in honour of the Resurrection it was only natural that Friday should be considered the appropriate day for commemorating the passion and death of Christ, and hence the early Christians met for prayer on Friday. There was also a reunion on Wednesday days, whose origin cannot be satisfactorily accounted for. The Wednesday and Friday meetings were known to Tertullian by the name of stations (stationes). In Africa it appears to have been the custom to celebrate the Holy Eucharist on these days, although it does not appear to have been the practice in other churches. Everywhere these were days of fasting, but as the fast lasted only until the ninth hour, the liturgy would be celebrated and communion distributed about that time in the afternoon. Of all the Sundays, the feast of Easter was the greatest, and was celebrated with special solemnity. Good Friday, called by Tertullian “Pascha” was a day of strict fast, which was prolonged through Holy Saturday. This latter day was only a day for the preparation for the feast of Easter; but still it was the most solemn vigil during the year, and the one on which all the vigils were modelled. Holy Thursday was shown to the faithful as the species of the orthodox liturgical service assigned, the present service being the ancient Easter vigil anticipated. Possibly the vigil of Easter was observed so solemnly on account of the tradition that the Lord would return to judge the world on the feast of Easter, and the early Christians, with a special treatise on this sacrament, describing the preparation required for it, and the ceremonies accompanying it. The catechumens should prepare for the reception of baptism by frequent prayers, by fasting, and vigils. Although he usually speaks of the baptism of adults, he still admits the baptism of infants, but seems to be somewhat opposed to this practice, which was commanded by St. Cyprian. The time set for the solemn administration of baptism was Easter, or any day between Easter and Pentecost, but Tertullian declares that as every day belongs to the Lord it might be conferred at any time. He holds that it should be administered by the bishop, who, however, may delegate a priest or deacon to act in his place, although in certain cases he would permit laymen to baptize. Any kind of water may serve as the matter of the sacrament, and the water is used to baptize the catechumen "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." The mode of baptizing was by triple immersion, which lasted ten to fifteen minutes. Many beautiful symbolic ceremonies accompanied the rite of baptism. Before the candidate for baptism entered the font he renounced the devil with his pomps and his angels. There was also a creed to be recited by the candidate for baptism, probably a form of the Apostles' Creed. Tertullian gives several different forms of this rule of faith. After the neophyte ascended from the font he received a drink of milk and honey, and was then anointed with consecrated oil. Tertullian also states that the neophyte was signed with the sign of the cross, the person who ordained with the invocation of the Holy Ghost, and that the newly baptized Christian then partook of his first holy communion. Tertullian explains many of these ceremonies in his treatise on the Resurrection (viii). "The flesh indeed is washed in order that the soul may be cleansed; the flesh is anointed, that the soul may be consecrated; the flesh is signed (with the sign of the cross) that the soul too may be fortified; the flesh is shadowed with the imposition of hands, that the soul also may be illuminated by the spirit; the flesh feeds on the Body and Blood of Christ, that the soul likewise may fatten on its God." The testimonies relating to the Sacrament of Penance describe principally the public penances imposed for grievous sins, and the absolution of the penitents after the public penances had been performed to the satisfaction of the Church. Tertullian at first asserted that the Church had the power of forgiving or retaining any kind of sin, but after becoming a Montanist he denied that this power extended to certain most heinous crimes, and then ridiculed the practice of the Pope and the Roman Church, who denied absolution to no Christian that was truly penitent for his sins. In writing sarcastically of the procedure in the case of a Pope St. Callixtus, he probably gives a good description of the manner in which a penitent sinner was absolved and readmitted into communion with the faithful. He narrates how the penitent, "clothed in a hair-shirt and covered with ashes, appears before the assembly of the faithful craving absolution, how he prostrates himself before the priests and widows, seizes the hem of their garments, kisses their footprints, clasps them by the knees", how the bishop, in the meantime, addresses the people, exhorting them by the recital of the parable of the lost sheep to be merciful and show pity to the poor penitent who is repented. The bishop absolves the penitents, and the bishop and priests imposed hands upon them as a sign of absolution and restoration into the communion of the Church. Although Tertullian in these words wished to throw ridicule on what he deemed excessive laxity at Rome, still he shows by his story how this practice has been in use in the Church of Africa also, since elsewhere in his writings he mentions doing penance in sackcloth and ashes, of weeping for sins, and of asking the forgiveness of the faithful. St. Cyprian also writes of the different acts of penance, of the confession of sin, of the manner in which the public penance was performed, of the absolution given by the priest, and of the imposition of the hands of the bishop and priests through which the penitents regained their rights in the Church.

Tertullian speaks of the nuptial blessing pronounced by the Church on the marriage of Christians, and how he could a priest perform the blessing of that marriage which is cemented by the Church, confirmed by the oblation, sealed with the benediction, which the angels proclaim, which is ratified by the Heavenly Father. Christian marriage thus seems to have been celebrated publicly before the Church with more or less solemnity, but the nuptial blessing would not have been given if it had not obligatory, except perhaps by force of custom.

Both Tertullian and St. Cyprian mention ordination and the various orders in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, but unfortunately do not give much information which is strictly liturgical. Tertullian speaks of bishops, priests, and deacons whose powers and functions are pretty well defined, who are chosen on account of their exemplary conduct by the brethren, and are then consecrated to God by regular ordination. Only those who are ordained, says St. Cyprian, may baptize and grant pardon of sins. St. Cyprian does not discuss the different orders, mentioning bishops, priests deacons, sub-deacons, acolytes, exorcists, and lectors, and in describing the election of St. Cornelius at Rome, declares that Cornelius was promoted from one order to another until finally he was elected by the votes of all to the supreme pontificate. All the orders except the acolyte order of ostiaries were enumerated by the early African writers. Both exorcists and lectors appear to have occupied a much more important liturgical position in the early ages than in later times. The exorcist, for example, was frequently called upon to exercise the power he had received at ordination. Tertullian speaks of this extraordinary power which was exercised in the name of Christ. Sometimes the exorcist used the rite of exsufflation, and sometimes, as St. Cyprian states, adjured the evil spirit to depart per Deum verum (by the true God). Lectors also had many liturgical functions to perform. The lector, for example, recited the lessons from the Old and New Testament, and read the Gospel from the pulpit to the people. In later ages his duties were divided, and some were given to the other ministers, some to regular chanters.

Among other liturgical ceremonies the early writers often allude to the rites accompanying the burial of the dead, especially the burial of the dead in the tombs. St. Cyprian has a good description of the bodies of the martyrs and confessors. From the earliest times the Christians showed great reverence to the bodies of the faithful, embalmed them with incense and spices, and buried them carefully in distinctively Christian cemeteries. Prayers were said for the repose of the souls of the dead, masses were offered especially on the anniversary of death, and their names were recited in the Memento of the Mass, provided that they had lived in accordance with Christian ideals. The faithful were taught not to mourn for their dead, but to rejoice that the souls of the departed were already living with God and enjoying blessedness, to pray for them, and even to enjoy them, where the reunions of the faithful took place on the anniversaries of the martyrs and of the other Christians who were buried there. The inscriptions on the tombs often state that the departed had lived a life of Christian peace, in pace visibilis, or often beautifully express the faith and hope of the faithful in a future life of happiness together with the Lord—esp. in Deo,—in Deo visa.

Finally, some ceremonial acts might be considered to which reference is often made by the early writers. Prayers are said sometimes kneeling, sometimes standing; for example, on Sundays, and during the fifty days following Easter, it was forbidden to kneel, while on fast days the kneeling posture was considered appropriate. The Christians prayed with their arms stretched out somewhat in the form of a cross. The sign of the cross was made very frequently, often on some object with the intention of blessing it, often on the forehead of Christians to invoke God's protection and assistance. Tertullian in his "De Corona" writes: "At every forward step and movement, at every going in and out, when we put on our clothes and shoes, when we bathe, when we sit at table, when we light the lamps, on couch, on seat, in all ordinary actions of daily life, we trace upon the forehead the sign of the cross." The early Christians were also accustomed to strike their breasts in sign of guilt and contrition for sin. Tertullian believed that the kiss of peace should be given often; in African churches every assembly prayed and celebrated the liturgy. Not only are there many ceremonial acts such as those just mentioned which existed in the third century and have been preserved even to the present in the liturgy, but there are also many phrases and acclamations of the early African Church, which are used in the ancient African liturgical formularies. These expressions and perhaps also the measured style in which they were composed, may have had considerable influence in the development of the other Latin liturgies.

II. POST-NICENE PERIOD.—After the edict of Constantine granting freedom of worship to the Christian religion, and especially after the Council of Nicaea, there was a great development in the liturgy of the Church. It was only natural that for some time after the foundation of the new religion, its liturgy should contain only the essentials of Christian worship, and that in the course of time it should develop and expand its ritual according to the needs of the people. Moreover, the first period was an age of persecution and hence the ceremonial was necessarily curtailed. But when persecution ceased, the Church began immediately to expand her ceremonial, changing and modifying the old forms according to the requirements of public liturgical worship, so that the liturgy would be more dignified, more magnificent, and more impressive. In the beginning great liberty was allowed the individual celebrant to improvise the prayers of the liturgy, provided that he adhered to the strict form in essentials and followed the theme demanded, but at a later date the Church felt the need of a set of formularies and fixed ceremonies, lest dogmatic errors should find expression in the liturgy and thus corrupt the faith of the people. In the fourth century all these tendencies to expansion and development are very noticeable in all the liturgies of the Church. This is true also of that in Africa. In the second period of the history of the African liturgy which embraces the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries to the beginning of the eighth century, when Christianity in Africa was practically destroyed by the Mohammedi ans. No liturgical books of any sort would be believed to be lost, even in temporaries writing. Of the writers of the period St. Augustine is richest in allusions to ceremonies and formularies, but St. Optatus, Marius Victorinus, Ambrosius, and Victor Vitensis gives some useful information. The inscriptions, which are more numerous in this period, and the archaeological discoveries also furnish some liturgical data.

The beginning of a real ecclesiastical calendar, with definitely fixed feasts and fasts, now appears. The great feast of Easter, upon which all the movable feasts depended, is celebrated with greater solemnity than in the time of Tertullian. Before Easter there was a period of forty days' preparation devoted to fasting and other works of penance. The vigil of Easter was celebrated with the usual ritual, but the length of the offices seems to have been increased. The Paschal solemnity was followed by a season of fifty days' rejoicing until Pentecost day, when, in the fourth century, the vigil appears to have a distinctive character as the commemoration of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles rather than as the close of the Easter season. In Holy Week, Holy Thursday commemorated the institution of the Holy Eucharist, and according to St. Augustine, besides the morning Mass, a Mass was also celebrated in the evening in order to carry out all the circumstances of the institution at the Last Supper. Good Friday was observed by attending the long liturgical offices, while Holy Saturday was celebrated in about the same manner as in the time of Tertullian. Ascension Day seems to have been introduced in the fourth century, but in the time of St. Augustine it was universally observed. As for the immovable feasts, Christmas and the Epiphany, which were unknown to Tertullian, were celebrated with the greatest solemnity in the fifth century. The first of January was observed not as the Feast of Circumcision, but as the first day of the liturgical year, instituted for the purpose of turning the people away from the celebration of the pagan festivities which took place at that time of the year. Feasts of other than local saints were introduced, for instance, immediately after Christmas, the feast of St. Stephen, of the Holy Innocents and of St. John and Anne, and later, the feasts of St. John the Baptist, of Sts. Peter and Paul, of the Maccabees, of St. Lawrence, St. Vincent, etc. The festivals of the local martyrs were celebrated with even greater solemnity than in early times, and were often accompanied by feasting which was frequently condemned in the sermons of the time, on account of abuses. When such a large number of feasts was annually observed, it was to be expected that a list or calendar would be drawn up, and, in truth, a calendar was drawn up for the use of the Church of Carthage in the beginning of the sixth century, on which very important information upon the institution and history of the great feast days may be obtained. When Christianity received legal recognition in the Empire, the Christians began to construct churches and adorn them fittingly to serve their purpose. Most of these were built in the old basilica style, with a few exceptions. The churches were dedicated in honour of the holy martyrs frequently, and relics of the martyrs were placed beneath the altars. The inscriptions of the period mention the dedication to the martyrs and also the fact that the relics were placed in the church or in the altar. The altar itself, called genos (table), was usually made of wood, and was either set in a niche in the wall or covered with over with linen cloths. There was a special rite for dedicating churches and also for consecrating altars, in blessed water and the sign of the cross were used.

The Mass became a daily function celebrated every morning, when the Christians could not frequent without fear of persecution, and when the increased number of feasts required a more frequent celebration of the liturgical offices. Little is known with precision and certainty of the composition of the different parts of the Mass, but still there are many allusions in various authors which give some valuable information. The Mass of the catechumen consisted of psalms and lessons from
The lessons were chosen from both the Old and New Testaments, and it would seem that there were three lessons as in some of the Oriental liturgies, one from the Old Testament, one from the Epistles, and one from the Gospels. The Third Council of Carthage decreed that only lessons from the canonical books of Scripture or from the acts of the martyrs on their feast days might be read in the churches. Between the Epistle and Gospel a psalm containing some idea in harmony with the feast of the day was recited, and corresponded to the gradual or tract in the Roman Mass. An alleluia was also sung, more or less solemnly, especially on Sundays and during the fifty days’ prolongation of the Easter festival. The lessons from the Scriptures were generally followed by a homily, after which both the catechumens and the penitents were dismissed, and the Mass of the faithful commenced. This rule of dismissing the catechumens, etc., seems to have been strictly observed, since nearly all the African writers in their sermons or other works use expressions which indicate that their words would be intelligible only to those who had heard the catechumens were instructed in the mysteries celebrated in the Mass of the faithful. The litany may have been recited after the Gospel, although its precise position cannot be determined with certainty. The litany consisted of short petitions for the various needs of the Church, resembling somewhat the petitions in the present Litany of the Saints, or perhaps a link in the chain of the Mysteries of the Church. The litany was recited on Good Friday. The people very probably responded with some acclamation like Kyrie eleison, or Te rogamus audi nos.

In the time of St. Augustine a chant for the Offertory was introduced in the Church of Carthage; it consisted of a psalm having some reference to the oblation, and was sung while the people were making their offerings. Each of the faithful was supposed to bring an offering for his communion. The offerings were received by the bishop and placed upon the altar, with the appropriate prayers, and then the bishop proceeded with the Mass. The Dominus vobiscum preceded the Preface, which properly began with the words Sermo corda, Habemus ad Dominum, Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro, Dignum et justum est. The canon of the Mass was known in Africa as the actio, or agenda, and was mentioned in the ceremonies and in the liturgy. There are, however, some passages in the African writers which show that there was a great similarity between the African actio and the Roman canon, so much so that some of the texts when put in juxtaposition are almost identical. The actio contained the usual prayers, the commemoration for the living and the dead, the words of institution and sanctification of the sacrifice, the commemoration of Christ, the Pater Noster, and the preparation for Communion. The Pater Noster seems to have held the same position that it now has in the Roman canon, and it was said before the Communion, as St. Augustine states, because “the Lord’s Prayer is holy, it purifies our offences, and thus we may approach the communion table with better dispositions. The kiss of peace followed shortly after the Pater Noster, and was closely connected with the Communion, being regarded as a symbol of the fraternal union existing between all those who partook of the Body and Blood of Christ. The faithful received communion frequently, and were encouraged in the practice of receiving daily communion. At the proper time the communicants approached the altar and there partook of the Eucharist under both species, “saying ‘Amen’ to the formula pronounced by the priest in order to profess their faith in the sacrament just received. During the distriof verses and acclamations, and the reading of portions of the Scriptures. There was a special collection of canticles taken from the Old Testament in use in the African Church, and perhaps, also, a collection of hymns composed by uninspired writers, in which were the hymns of St. Ambrose. Many of the verses and acclamations in the writings of the period may be found in the prayer books of the churches of Augustine; was evidently opposed to the growing tendency to abandon the simple recitative tone and make the chant of the offices more solemn and ornate as the ceremonial became more formal. Gradually the formularies became more fixed, and liberty to improvise was curtailed by the African councils. In the prayers of Church and by many shorter verses and acclamations have been quoted in the writings of the period, as for example, the Deo Gratias, Deo Laudes, and Amen, with which the people approved the words of the preacher, or the doxologies and conclusions of some of the prayers. The people still used the sign of the cross frequently in their private devotions as in the days of Tertullian. Other ceremonial acts in common use were striking the breast as a sign of penance, extending the arms in the form of a cross, kneeling during prayers, etc., all of which had been handed down from primitive times. Such are some of the most important of the Church of Africa. Many writers and inscriptions concerning the liturgy of the African Church, and they are useful to show the peculiarities of the Latin rites in Africa as well as the similarity between the African and other liturgies. African Synods.—There was no general council of the entire Church held at any time in North Africa. There were, however, many national or plenary assemblies of bishops representing the North African Church. These are commonly called African or Carthaginian Synods, and are not to be confounded with the district or provincial assemblies, of which there were many in the fourth century as mentioned above. The Roman provinces lay between the Sahara and the Mediterranean and extended from Cyrenaica on the east to the Atlantic on the west, corresponding roughly to the part of the continent occupied by modern Tripoli, Algeria, and Morocco. The Church entered into history there at the end of the second century, and disappeared in the beginning of the eighth.

Ecclesiastical Organizations.—About the middle of the third century the bishops of the three civil provinces (Proconsular Africa, Numidia, and Mauretania) formed but one ecclesiastical province, but as dioceses were multiplied, they came into line with the prevailing political divisions of the country. Diocletian re-districted North Africa into six civil provinces, and by the end of the fourth century the Church had adjusted her organization to these lines. Thus there came to be six dioceses: 1. Proconsular; 2. Numidia; 3. Byzacena; 4. Tripoli; 5. Mauretania Sitifensis; 6. Imperial Mauretania. This organization lasted till the Arab invasion in the seventh century. Because of its civil importance, Carthage was the primate see and held control of these suffragan provinces, except perhaps during the period of the Byzacena under the Bishopric of Carthage. At an early date Tripoli and the two Mauretanias seem to have been independent of Carthage. The Bishop of Carthage was in rank and privilege, though not in name, the Patriarch of the African Church. It was he who called and presided over the general synods, and, early in the fifth century, it was his wont to sign the decrees in the name of all. These synods were held, with but few exceptions (e. g. Hippo, 339; Milevium, 402) at Carthage. In several instances we are able to name the church where the meeting took place: as the "Church of the Second District," or the " Ecclesia Restituta," or the "Secretarium Basilicae Fausti."

Number of Synods.—In the time of Tertullian there were no synods held in Africa. But about 220, Agrippinus called together seventy bishops from Proconsular Africa and Numidia. From the time of St. Cyprian general synods came to be the wonted custom of the Church in Africa. These synods were held in Africa with greater frequency and regularity than elsewhere in Christendom. We know from the letters of St. Cyprian that, except in times of persecution, the African bishops met at least once a year, in the springtime, and sometimes again in the autumn. Six or seven synods, for instance, were held under St. Cyprian's presidency during the decade of his administration (249–258), and more than fifteen under Aurelius (391–429). The Synod of Hippo (393) ordered a general meeting yearly. But this was found too onerous for the bishops, and in the Synod of Carthage (407) it was decided to hold a formal synod only in case of necessity. Thus an annual synod was held in all Africa, and it was to be held at the place most convenient for the purpose. As a matter of fact, the needs were so persistent that general synods were held with perhaps equal frequency up to the Vandals invasion (429), and Carthage continued to be the meeting-place. The Church of Africa then entered on "penal times". Towards the end of the Vandal domination there was a cessation of persecution, and synods were resumed. The general Synod of Carthage in 525, though numerously attended, shows in reality a humble and diminished church. There was an improvement under the Byzantine control (533–647), and the Synod of 584 (perhaps the only general one for this period) is the second largest in point of numbers of all the African synods. In 646 we still find the bishops meeting in provincial synods, on the very eve of the final dissolution of their ancient organization. The Arab domination spread in successive waves from 647 to 699, when Carthage fell. Within the following half century the Church of Roman Africa had ceased to be.

Attendance and Representation.—Elsewhere in Christendom only bishops attended general synods; but in North Africa there was, at least for a time, a representation from this custom. In the synods held under St. Cyprian, to deal with the lapsed, and in the synod of 256, which considered the question of re-baptism, there were present not only the bishops, but many priests and deacons, and even a very large representation of the laity. Only the bishops, however, had a vote in the final determinations. Not all the bishops of the country were required to assist at the general synod. At the Synod of Hippo (393) it was ordered that "dignities" should be sent from each ecclesiastical province. Only one was required fromTripoli, because of the poverty of the bishops of that province. In the synod held in Carthage in the same year, 401, it was ordered that each province should be divided into two or three districts, and that each of them should send deputies to the general synod. Attendance was urgently insisted on. There were ninety bishops in attendance at the synod that condemned Privatus (236–248), and more than two hundred and twenty-three, the largest record of attendance for Africa, at the synod of 440–441. Through her literature, the writings of Tertullian, St. Cyprian, and, more than all, of St. Augustine, rather than by her synodal action that the great Church of Africa has modified the world's history.
The African synods dealt for the most part, as was natural, with matters of local discipline, and were chiefly of interest to students of Church History and Canon Law. Nevertheless, at times, their decrees transcended their immediate and local scope and helped, in concert with Rome, to fix the discipline and to define the doctrine of the Church Universal. The penitential decrees drawn up after the bishops' return and the decrees against Pelagianism are instances in point.

Brief Analysis of Synodal Acts.—The synodal decrees show how restless and factional the national temper was, and how ready to break out into violent schism. Those who lapsed under Decius were strongly discouraged from returning to the hierarchy, and the synods of the fourth and fifth centuries are constantly engaged with the bitter and persistent Donatist Schism, which upset all Africa and perplexed both Church and State. Civil intervention was invoked in the Synod of 404. The persecution of Decius left in Africa, as elsewhere, many who had denied or compromised their faith under fear of death. The Church was now called upon to determine whether she might forgive so grave a sin. In the Synod of May, 251, under the presidency of St. Cyprian, it was decided that the lapses should be admitted to penance, and should be reconciled at least as regards death. The next year (252) further grace was shown them in view of the persecution of Gallus, and all who had entered seriously upon a course of penance were to be restored to fellowship at once. The Church of Africa was not equally fortunate in finding the solution for the difficult problem of the worth of Baptism as administered outside the Church. The earliest synod (about 220) took the matter up and declared such Baptism invalid, and this decision was re-affirmed in synods held in 255–256 under St. Cyprian. All converts should be re-baptised. St. Cyprian strove to press the African views on Rome, but Pope Stephen (q. v.) menaced excommunication. At the celebrated September Synod of 256 the eighty-seven bishops assembled from the three provinces still maintained their attitude against Baptism by heretics. This error was finally retracted in the Synod (345–348) under Gratian.

These records also show how the close relations between Africa and Rome were several times troubled during the course of five centuries. The baptismal controversy put the Church into a state of passive resistance to Rome. In the Synod of September, 256, St. Cyprian was placed in a painful dilemma. While maintaining the right of bishops to think for themselves, he still clung to the necessity of unity in the Church, and would not break the revered bond with Rome. Again, early in the fifth century, the appeal to Rome of Apianus (q. v.), a deposed priest, stirred up strong feeling among the African bishops, and appeals of priests and laics "over sea" (to Rome) went in the Synod of 368. A Legatus came from Rome to adjust the difference. In the Synods of 419 an inquiry was made into the canonical warrant for such appeals. The Roman legates cited by mistake, as canons at Nicea (325), the canons of Sardica (344) regulating the appeals of bishops. This led to a tedious delay, and the whole matter was dropped for the moment. It was reopened a few years later, when Apianus, who had been deposed a second time, on new charges, again appealed to Rome for reinstatement. Faustinus, the Roman legate, reappeared at the Synod of 424 and demanded the annulment of the sentence passed on the priest, having had it subject to a second examination, and admitted his guilt. So nothing further could be done for him. A synodal letter to Rome emphasized how needful it was that Rome should not lightly credit all complainants from Africa, nor receive into fellowship such men as had been excommunicated. At the Synod of Hippo (393), again at the Synod of 397 at Carthage, a list of the books of Holy Scripture was drawn up. It is the Catholic canon (i.e., including the books classed by Protestants as "Apocrypha"). The latter synod, at the end of the enumeration, added, "But let the Church beyond sea (Rome) be consulted about confining this canon." Augustinian and the forty-four bishops who signed the proceedings. Celestius, the friend of Pelagius, came to Carthage to be ordained a priest; Paulinus, the deacon of Milan, warned the Bishop of Carthage against him; and thus, in 411, began the series of synods against Pelagianism. They had the most important influence in checking its spread. The earlier ones seem to have been provincial. The important Synod of 416, under Sylvanus, at Milevum urged Innocent I to stop the heresy, and in the synod of all Africa held at Carthage in 420 the bishops, intensely convinced that vital issues were involved, passed a series of doctrinal utterances with annulments and anathemas against the Pelagians. St. Augustine was present. It was, in respect of doctrine, the most important of all the synods of Africa. It is no longer possible from the meagre remains to attempt a complete list of the general synods of Africa; nor is it any longer possible to determine, re-read in their context, whether the synods were general. The following approximate enumeration is made therefore with all due reserve:

Under St. Cyprian.—Synods about a. d. 220 under Agrippinus; 236–248 (condemned Privatus of Lambessa). Carthage, 251, 252, 254, 255; Autumn of 255, or Spring of 256; September, 258.

Under Gratian, at Carthage, 345–348.

Under Aurelius, at Carthage, Hippo-Regius, 393, 394, 397 (two sessions), June and September; 401; at Millevum, 402; at Carthage, 403–410, end of 417 or beginning of 418; May, 418; May and November, 419, 420, 424.

Agabus, mentioned in Acts, xi, 28, and xxi, 10, as a prophet of the New Testament. Most probably both passages refer to the same person, who appears to have been a resident of Jerusalem. Tradition makes him one of the seventy-two disciples (Luke, x, 1), and one of the martyrs who suffered at Antioch. The Roman Martyrology mentions his name on 13 February, while the Greek Church commemorates him on 8 March. According to Acts, xi, 27–30, Agabus predicted the famine which apparently must be identified with that happening in the fourth year of Claudius, A. D. 48. In the year 498, the pope, according to tradition, predicted to St. Paul his coming captivity, though he could not induce the Apostle to stay away from Jerusalem (Acts, xxi, 10, 11).

Agape.—The celebration of funeral feasts in honour of the dead dates back almost to the beginnings of the worship of the departed—that is, to the very earliest times. The dead, in the region beyond the tomb, were thought to derive both pleasure and advantage from these offerings. The same conviction explains the existence of funeral furniture for the use of the dead. Arms, vessels, and clothes, as things not subject to decay, did not need to be renewed, but food did; hence feasts at stated seasons. But the body of the departed gained no relief from offerings made to it, as the Corinthians (I Cor. 11, 20) were wont to do, accompanied by the obligatory rites. Yet the funeral feast was not merely a commemoration; it was a true commoner, and the food brought by the guests was really meant for the use of the departed. The milk and wine were poured out on the earth around the tomb while food passed in to the mouth through a hole in the tomb.

The use of the funeral feast was almost universal in the Greco-Roman world. Many ancient authors may be cited as witnesses to the practice in classical lands. Among the Jews, aside by taste and reason to all foreign customs, we find that what amounts to a funeral banquet is not the least important of the Jewish colonies of the Dispersion, less impervious to surrounding influences, adopted the practice of fraternal banquets. If we study the texts relative to the Supper, the last solemn meal taken by Our Lord with His disciples, we shall find that it was the Passo- over Supper, with the changes wrought by time on the primitive ritual, since it took place in the evening, and the guests reclined at the table. As the liturgical meal draws to a close, the Host introduces a new rite, and bids those present repeat it when He shall have ceased to be with them. This done, they sing the customary hymn and withdraw. Such is the rite of the Lord's Supper which the reformed Church of today uses. It is plain that He did not command the repetition of the Passover Supper during the year, since it could have no meaning except on the Feast itself. Now the first chapter of the Acts of the Apostles states that the repast of the Breaking of Bread took place very often, perhaps daily. That which was repeated was, therefore, not the liturgical feast of the Jewish ritual, but the event introduced by Our Lord into this feast when, after the drinking of the fourth cup, He instituted the Breaking of Bread, the Eucharist. To what degree this new rite, repeated by the faithful, departed from the rite and formula of the Passover Supper, we have no means, at the present time, of determining. It is probable, however, that, in repeating the Eucharist, it was deemed fit to preserve certain portions of the Passover Supper, as much out of respect for what had taken place in the Council as from the impossibility of thoroughly suspicion of the Jewish Passover rite, so intimately linked by the circumstances with the Eucharistic one.

This, at its origin, is clearly marked as funerary in its intention, a fact attested by the most ancient testimonies that have come down to us. Our Lord, in repeating the Eucharist, repeated these words: "As often as you shall eat this Bread and drink this chalice, you shall show forth the Lord's Death." Nothing could be clearer. Our Lord chose the means generally used in His time, namely: the funeral banquet, to bind together those who remained faithful to the memory of Him who had gone. We may, however, add an account of the origin of the association of the thought of sadness with the Eucharistic Supper, regarded in this light. If the memory of the Master's Passion made the commemoration of these last hours in any measure sad, the glorious thought of the Resurrection gave this meeting of the breach of the Eucharist a new aspect. Thus it was held in the evening, and was continued far into the night. The supper, praying, common prayer, the breaking of bread, took up several hours; the meeting began on Saturday and ended on Sunday, thus passing from the commemoration of the sad hour to that of the triumphant moment; of the Resurrection, of the Feast of the Eucharist, the truth "showed forth the Lord's Death," as it will "until He come." Our Lord's command was understood and obeyed.

Certain texts refer to the meetings of the faithful in early times. Two, from the Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians (I Cor. 11, 20; 2 Cor. 11, 34), allow us to draw the following conclusions: The brethren were at liberty to eat before going to the meeting; all present must be in a fit condition to celebrate the Supper of the Lord, though they must not eat of the funeral supper until all were present. We know, from two texts of the first century, that these meetings did not long remain without direction. The agape, as we shall see, was destined, during the few centuries that it lasted, to fall, from time to time, into abuses. The faithful, united in bodies, guilds, corporations or "collegia," admitted, coarse, interminable men among them, who degraded the character of the assembled. These "collegia" seem to have differed but little from those of the pagans, in respect, at all events, of the obligations imposed by the rules of incorporation. There is no evidence available to show that the collegia from the first undertook the burial of deceased members; but it seems probable that they did so at an early period. The establishment of such colleges gave the Christians an opportunity of meeting in much the same way as the pagans did—subject always to the many obstacles which the law imposed. Little feasts were held, to which each of the guests contributed his share, and the supper was allowed by the authorities as a funerary one. In reality, however, for all faithful worthy of the name, it was a liturgical assembly. The texts, which it would take too long to quote, do not allow us to assert that all these meetings ended with a celebration of the Eucharist. In such matters sweeping generalizations should be avoided. At the outset it must be stated that no text affirms that the funeral supper of the Christian colleges must always and everywhere be identified with the agape, nor does any text tell us that the agape was always and everywhere connected with the celebration of the Eucharist. But subject to these reservations, we may gather that under certain circumstances the agape and the Eucharist appear to form parts of a single liturgical function. The meal, as understood by the Christians, was a real supper, which followed the Communion; and an important monument, a fresco found in the second century, now in the Church of St. Priscilla, at Rome, shows us a company of the faithful supping and communicating. The guests recline on a couch which serves as a seat, but, if they are in the attitude of those who are at supper, the meal appears as finished. They have reached the moment of the Eucharistic communion, symbolized in the fresco by the mystical fish and the chalice. (See Fish; Eucharist; Symbolism.)

Tertullian has described at length (Apolog., vii) these Christian suppers, the mystery of which puzzled the Pagans, and has given a detailed account of the agape, which had been the subject of so much discussion ever since. He gives a clear insight into the ritual of the agape in Africa in the second century. 1. The introductory prayer. 2. The guests take their places on the couches. 3. A meal, during which they talk on pious subjects. 4. The washing of hands. 5. The hall is lit up. 6. Singing of psalms and improvised hymns. 7. Final prayer and departure. The hour of the meeting varied; the use made of torches shows clearly enough that it must have been in the evening or at night. The document known as the "Canons of Hippolytus" appears to have been written in the time of Tertullian, but its Roman or Egyptian origin is in doubt. It contains very precise regulations in regard to the agape; similar texts may be inferred from other texts. We gather that the guests are at liberty to eat and drink according correct the practice entirely, for St. Jerome arraigns Syrian monks for living in cities with Christian virgins. The Agapætes are sometimes confounded with the "Canons of Antioch," but concentric" was excluded, a regulation which seems to indicate that the meeting bore a liturgical aspect.

An example of the halls in which the faithful met to celebrate the agape may be seen in the vestibule of the Church at Domitilla. A bench runs round this great hall, on which the guests took their places. With this may be compared an inscription found at Cherchel, in Algeria, recording the gift made to the local church of a plot of land and a building intended as a meeting-place for the corporation or guild of the Christians. From the fourth century onward, the agape rapidly lost its original character. The political liberty granted to the Church made it possible for the meetings to grow larger, and involved a departure from primitive simplicity. The funeral banquet continued to be practised, but gave rise to flagrant and intolerable abuses. St. Paulinus of Nola, usually mild and kindly, is forced to admit that the crowd, gathered to honour the feast of a certain martyr, took possession of the basilica and atrium, and there ate the food which had been given out in large quantities. The Council of Laodicea (363) forbade the clergy and laity who should be present at an agape to make it a means of supply, or to take food away from it, at the same time that it ordered the setting up of tables in the churches. In the fifth century the agape becomes of infrequent occurrence, and between the sixth and the eighth it disappears altogether from the churches.

One fact in connection with a subject so much studied and discussed seems to be established beyond question, namely, that the agape was never a universal institution. If found in one place, there is not so much as a trace of it in another, nor any reason to suppose that it ever existed there. A feeling of veneration for the dead inspired the funeral banquet, a feeling closely akin to a Christian inspiration. Death was looked upon as the end of the whole man, but as the beginning of a new and mysterious span of life. The last meal of Christ with His Apostles pointed to this belief of a life after death, but added to it something new and unparalleled, the Eucharistic communion. It would be useless to seek for analogies between the funerary banquet and the Eucharistic supper, yet it should not be forgotten that the Eucharistic supper was fundamentally a funerary memorial.

Agapætes (ἀγαπατεῖς, beloved). In the first century of the Christian era, the Agapætes were virgins who consecrated themselves to God with a vow of chastity and associated with laymen. In the beginning this community of spiritual life and mutual support was based on St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians (ix. 5), was holy and eucharistic. But later it resulted in abuses and scandals, so that councils of the fourth century forbade it. The origin of this association was very probably that these virgins, who did not live in community, required laymen to look after their material interests. Later, they, as Paul and the other members of the Church, themselves, had taken a vow of chastity. St. Jerome asked indignantly (Ep., xxii, ad Eustochium) after it had degenerated, unde in ecclesiis Agapæarum pestis intortus? A letter of St. Cyprian shows that abuses of this kind developed in Africa and Asia (Ep., iv, 26; Ep., xxv). The Council of Ancyra, in 314, forbade virgins consecrated to God to live thus with men as sisters. This did not Agapæus, a deacon of the church of Santa Sophia at Constantinople (about 500), reputed tutor of Justinian, and author of a series of exhortations in 72 short chapters addressed (c. 527) to that emperor (G. D. XXVI, 1163). See also above for each chapter form an acrostic of dedication that reads: The very humble Deacon Agapæus to the sacred and venerable Emperor Justinian. The little work deals in general terms with the moral, religious, and political duties of a ruler. In form it is quite sententious and rhetorical, and resembles closely a prayer for work in the roman of Barlaam and Josaphat. Both of these seem to be based on Isocrates, and on Basil the Great and Gregory of Nazianzus. The work of Agapæus was eminently fitted for the use of medieval teachers by reason of its edifying content, the purity of its Greek diction, and its skillful construction. It was translated into Latin, and German, and was highly commended by the humanists of the Renaissance. Some twenty editions of it appeared in the sixteenth century.

Agapæus I (also Agapitus), Saint, Pope (535–536), date of birth uncertain; d. 22 April, 536. He was, like Gelasius, a Roman priest who had been slain during the riots in the days of Pope Symmachus. His first official act was to burn in the presence of the assembled clergy the anathema which Boniface II (q. v.) had pronounced against the latter's rival Dioscurus and had ordered to be preserved in the Roman archives. He confirmed the ordinances of the council of Constantinople which was the liberation of Africa from the Vandal yoke, according to which converts from Arianism were declared ineligible to Holy Orders and those already ordained were merely admitted to lay communion. He accepted an appeal from Contemeliolus, Bishop of Riez, whom a council at Marseilles had condemned for immorality, and he ordered St. Caesarius of Arles to grant the accused a new trial before papal delegates. Meanwhile Belisarius, after the very easy conquest of Sicily, was preparing for an invasion of Italy. The Gothic king, Theodemad, as a last resort, begged the aged pontiff to proceed to Constantinople and bring his personal influence to bear on the Emperor Justinian. To defray the costs of the embassy, Agapæus was compelled to pledge the sacred vessels of the Church of Rome. He set out in midwinter with five bishops and an imposing retinue. In February, 536, he appeared in the capital of the East and was received with all the honours befitting the head of the Catholic Church. As he no doubt had foreseen, the ostensible object of his visit was doomed to failure. Justinian could not be swerved from his resolve to re-establish the rights of the Empire in Italy. But from the ecclesiastical aspect, the visit of the exiled pope issued in a triumph scarcely less memorable than the campaigns of Belisarius. The then occupant of the Byzantine See was a certain Anthimus, who without the authority of the see, had left his episcopal see of Trebizon to join the crypto-Monophysites who, in conjunction with the Empress Theodora were then intriguing to undermine the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. Against the protests of the orthodox, the Empress finally seated Anthimus in the patriarchal chair. No sooner had the Pope arrived than the most prominent of the clergy entered charges against the new patriarch as an intruder and a heretic. Agapetus ordered him to make a written profession of faith and to return to his sees; upon his refusal, he declined to have any relations with him. This vexed the Emperor, who implicated his brother by the deceased, the Dowager Emperess, and he went so far as to threaten the Pope with banishment. Agapetus replied with spirit: "With eager longing have I come to gaze upon the Most Christian Emperor Justinian. In his place I find a Diocletian, whose threats, however, terrify me not." This intrepid language made Justinian pause; and being finally convinced that Anthimus was unsound in faith, he made no objection to the Pope's exercising the plenitude of his powers in deposing and suspending the intruder and, for the first time in the history of the Church, personally consecrating his legally elected successor, Mennas. This measure of the papal pressure was not soon forgotten by the Orientals, who, together with the Latin, venerate him as a saint. In order to clear himself of every suspicion of abetting heresy, Justinian delivered to the Pope a written profession of faith, which the latter accepted with the judicious proviso that "although he could not admit in a layman the right of teaching religion, yet he observed with pleasure that the seal of the Emperor was in perfect accord with the decisions of the Fathers." Shortly afterwards Agapetus fell ill and died, after a glorious reign of ten months. His remains were brought in a leaden coffin to Rome and deposited in St. Peter's. His memory is kept on 20 September, the day of his deposition. The Greeks commemorate him on 22 April, the day of his death.

Agapetus II. Pope, a Roman by birth, elected to the papacy 10 May, 946; he reigned, not ingloriously, for ten years, during which he had been the period of deepest humiliation for the papacy. He was the first true pope of the papacy, one who could successfully uphold by a saintly and resolute pontiff amid the most untoward surroundings. The temporal power had practically vanished and Rome was ruled by the vigorous Princes and Senator Alberchit, who was the prototype of the later Italian Popes. Nevertheless, the name and virtues of Agapetus were respected throughout the entire Christian world. He laboured incessantly to restore the decadent discipline in churches and cloisters. He succeeded eventually in quieting the disturbances in the metropolitan see of Reims. He supported the Emperor Otto the Great in his plans for the evangelization of the heathens of the North. Seeing no other way of putting an end to anarchy in Italy, he joined with other Italian nobles in persuading the Emperor to make his first expedition into the peninsula. During his lifetime, his successor was virtually appointed in the person of Albercht, who was appointed in 951. Later, however, the Emperor forced the Romans to swear that they would elect him as their temporal and spiritual lord upon the demise of Agapetus. The Pope died in August, 956, leaving an unsullied name, and was buried in St. John Lateran.
true that we have the Acts of her martyrdom in two versions, Latin and Greek, the latter deviating from the former (Acta SS., I, Feb., 595 sqq.). Neither of these recensions, however, can lay any claim to historical credibility, and neither gives the necessary internal evidence that the information it contains is real, even if some important details are genuine tradition. If there is a kernel of historical truth in the narrative, it has not as yet been possible to sift it out from the later embellishments. In their present form the Latin Acts are not older than the sixth century. According to them Agatha, daughter of a distinguished family and remarkable for her beauty, was purchased by the Roman Quintianus with avowals of love. As his proposals were resolutely spurned by the pious Christian virgin, he committed her to the charge of an evil woman, whose seductive arts, however, were baffled by Agatha's unwavering firmness in the Christian faith. Quintianus then had her subjected to various cruel tortures. Especially inhuman seemed his order to have her breasts cut off, a detail which furnished to the Christian medieval iconography the peculiar characteristic of Agatha. But the holy virgin was consoled by a vision of St. Peter, who miraculously cured her. Eventually she succumbed to the pressure of public execration on her. As already stated, these details, in so far as they are based on the Acts, have no claim to historical credibility. Allard also characterizes the Acts as the work of a later author who was more concerned with writing an edifying narrative, abounding in miracles, than in transmitting historical traditions. Both Catania and Palermo claim the honour of being Agatha's birthplace. Her feast is kept on 5 February; her office in the Roman Breviary is drawn in part from the Latin Acts. Catania honours St. Agatha as her patron saint, and throughout the region around Mount Etna she is invoked against the eruptions of the volcano, but nowhere against fire and lightning. In some places bread and water are blessed during Mass on her feast after the Consecration, and called Agatha bread.

Agathangelus, a supposed secretary of Tetrarchs II, King of Armenia, under whose name there has come down a life of the first apostle of Armenia, Gregory the Illuminator, who died about 392. It purports to exhibit the events and discourses of Gregory, and has reached us in Armenian and in Greek. The Greek text is now recognized as a translation, made probably in the latter half of the sixth century, while the Armenian is original and belongs to the latter half of the fifth century. Von Gutschmidt maintains that the unknown author may have used as his guide the life of St. Gregory, also a history of his martyrdom and of that of St. Ripsime and her companions. Historical facts are intermingled in this life with legendary or uncertain additions, and the whole is woven into a certain unity by the narrator, who may have assumed his significant name from his quality of narrator of “the good news” of Armenia’s conversion (Agathangelus, Patrologie, 2d ed. (1901), 520, 521. The Armenian text was printed at Constantinople (1706, 1824) and Venice (1630, 1650); the Greek text (with a French translation) is in Langlois, Collections des ecritures anciennes et modernes d’Armenie (Paris, 1867), I. 97-163, reprinted from Acta SS. Nov., I (1911), 400-402; Von Gutschmidt, Agathangelus, in Zeitschr. f. deutsch. morgenl. Gesellschaft (1877), XXXI, 1-60.

Agathos, a Byzantine historian and man of letters, b. at Myrina in Asia Minor about 536; d. at Constantinople 582 (5947). He is a principal authority for the reign of Justinian (527-65), and is often quoted by ecclesiastical historians. He was probably educated at Constantinople, spent some time at Alexandria, and returned to the royal city in 554, where he took up the profession of law and became a successful pleader at the bar. His tastes, however, were literary, and he soon produced nine books of erotic poetry (Daphnicæa), also epigrams and sonnets, many of which are preserved in the so-called Palatine Anthology. He wrote also marginal notes on the Periplus of Pausianias. He is in the last whom we can yet trace some sparks of the poetic fire of the classic epigrammata. At the age of thirty he turned to the writing of history and composed a work in five books “On the Reign of Justinian.” It deals with the events of 552-558, and depicts the wars with the Goths, Vandals, and Franks, as well as those against the Persians and the Huns. He is the continuator of Procopius, whom he imitates in form and also in the abundance of attractive episodes. Agathos, it has been said, is a poet and a rhetorician, while Procopius is a soldier and a statesman. The former loves to give free play to his imagination, and his pages abound in philosophical reflection. He is able and reliable, though he gathered his information from eye-witnesses, and not as Procopius, in the excursions and interviews in political offices. He delights in depicting the manners, customs, and religion of the foreign peoples of whom he writes; the great disturbances of his time, earthquakes, plagues, famines, attract his attention, and he does not fail to insert many incidental notices of cities, forts, and rivers, philosophers, and subordinate commanders”. Many of his facts are not to be found elsewhere, and he has always been looked on as a valuable authority for the period he describes. There are reasons for doubting that he was a Christian, though it seems improbable that he could have been at that late date a genuine pagan. Dr. Milligan thinks (Dict. of Chir. Biog. I, 59) that “he had gained from Christianity those just notions of God and religion to which he often gives expression, but that he had not embraced them in peculiar truths.” His history was edited by B. G. Niebuhr for the “Corpus SS. Byzant.” (Bonn, 1828; P. G., LXXIX-VIII, 1248-56), and it is in Dindorf, “Hist. Greeci minorum” (1871), II, 132-453.

Agathos, Saint, Pope, b. towards the end of the sixth century in Sicily; d. in Rome, 681. It is generally believed that Agathos was originally a Benedictine monk at St. Hermes in Palermo, and there is good authority that he was more than 100 years of age when, in 678, he ascended the papal chair as successor to Pope Donus. Shortly after Agathos became Pope, St. Wilfred, Archbishop of York, who had been unjustly and uncanonically deposed from his see by Theodore of Canterbury, arrived at Rome to invoke the authority of the Holy See in his behalf. The synod which Pope Agathos called and the Lateran to investigate the affair, Wilfred was restored to his see. The chief event of Agathos’s pontificate is, however, the Sixth (Ecumenical Council, held at Constantinople in 680, at which the papal legates presided and which practically ended the Monothelite heresy. Before the decree of the council arrived in Rome, or the synod called by Agathos had died. He was buried in St. Peter’s, 10 January, 681. Pope Agathos was remarkable for his affability and charity. On account of the many miracles he wrought he has been styled Thaumaturgos, or Wonderworker. His memory is celebrated by the Latin as well as the Greek church.
dom, though his account has many excellent qualities, historical as well as literary. Certain facts are related with exactitude, and the author has refrained from all miraculous additions. But on the other hand, the speeches which he attributes to the martyrs, and the allusion by which he strives to connect the massacre of the Theban Legion with the general persecution under Diocletian have given rise to much discussion. The speeches were probably of the Bishop's own composition; the historical groundwork on which he professes to base the martyrdom is wholly independent of the original narrative. The objections raised against the fact itself, and the attempts made to reduce the massacre of the legion to the mere death of six men, one of whom was a veteran, do not seem to merit attention. Barbarous as it may appear, there is nothing incredible in the massacre of a legion; instances might be cited in support of so unusual an occurrence, though it is quite possible that at Agaunum we have to do not with a legion, but with a simiae be added certain “Passiones” of Theban martyrs, who escaped from the massacre of Agaunum, but who later fell victims to the persecution in Germany and Italy. It was only in the episcopate of Theodore of Octodurum (369–391), a long time after the event, that attention was clearly drawn to the massacre of a Roman legion at Agaunum. It was then that, according to St. Eucherius, a basilica was built in honour of the martyrs, whose presence had been made known to Bishop Theodore by means of a revelation. The document of primary importance in connection with this history is the letter of St. Eucherius to Bishop Salvius, wherein he records the successive witnesses through whom the tradition was handed down to his time—over a period, that is, of about one hundred and fifty years. He had journeyed to the place of martyrdom, whether pilgrims came in great numbers, and had, he says, questioned those who were able to tell him the truth concerning the matter. He does not, however, appear to have seen a text of the martyrvexillatio. The silence of contemporary historians, which has been appealed to as an unanswerable argument against the truth of the martyrdom of the Thebans, is far from having the weight that has been given it. Paul Allard has shown this very clearly by proving that there was no reason why Sulpicius Severus, Orosius, Prudentius, Eusebius, or Lactantius should have spoken of the Theban martyrs. He fixes the date of the martyrdom as prior to the year 292, not, as generally received, in 303. Dom Ruinart, Paul Allard, and the editors of the “Analecta Bollandiana” are of opinion that “the martyrdom of the legion, attested, as it is, by ancient and reliable evidence, cannot be called in question by any honest mind”. This optimistic view, however, does not seem to have convinced all the critics. (See EUCHERIUS OF LYONS; MAURICE, ST.)

The letter of Eucherius gives us no details as to the rule imposed on the priests entrusted by Theodore of Octodurum with the care of the basilicas
AGAZZARI; at Agaunum; nor do we know whether they were regular or secular, though a sermon of St. Avitus, Bishop of Vienne, would appear to indicate the existence of a monastic foundation, which was replaced and renewed by the foundation of Sigermund, King of the Burgundians. Of the two documents which confirm this view, the "Vita Severini Acaunensis" contains unreliable and unhistorical traditions and falsehoods; the "Vita Sanctorum Abbatum Acaunensium", a work of slight value, to be received with caution, though certain facts may be gathered from it. At the date of Sigismund's first gift to Agaunum the community was governed by Abbot Enonomus, who died 3 January 518. His next successor but one, Ambroesius, brought Agaunum into notice by an innovation unknown in the West, the Perpetual Psalmody, in 522 or 523 at latest. This Perpetual Psalmody, or laus perennis, was carried on, day and night, by several choirs, or fumae, who succeeded each other in the recitation of the Divine Office, so that prayer went on without cessation. This laus perennis was practiced in the East by the Acemetes (q. v.), and its inauguration at Agaunum was the occasion of a solemn ceremony, and of a sermon by St. Avitus which has come down to us. The "custom of Agaunum" came to be called, spread abroad, Gaul, to Lyons, Châlons, the Abbey of Saint Denis, to Luxeuil, Saint Germain at Paris, Saint Médard at Soissons, to Saint-Riquier, and was taken up by the monks of Remiremont and Laon, though the Abbey of Agaunum had ceased to practise it from the beginning of the ninth century. But Agaunum had gained a world-wide fame by its martyrs and its psalmody. The abbey had some of the richest and best preserved treasures in the West. Among the priceless and artistically exquisite pieces of goldsmith work, we need only mention the châsse (reliquary), containing the glass mosaics of one of the most important in the West for the study of the beginnings of barbarian and Byzantine art. It ranks with the armory of Childeric, the Book of the Gospels at Monza in Italy, and the crowns of Guirazar in Spain. It is decorated not only with mosaics, but with tiles and precious stones, smooth or engraved. The two works are incomparable, and are taken for a cameo, but which is a unique piece of work in spun glass. Its date has been much discussed. The back bears a long inscription, which unfortunately affords no solution of the problem, but we may agree with J. Arbois de Jubaineville that the earlier date and that of the consecration of St. Thomas in the church. Stolle, Das Martyrium der heiligen Annen, in the beginning of the seventh century; childhood, 7-14; puberty, 14-25; majority (young manhood), 25-40; manhood, 40-50 or 60; old age, 60-70; decrepitude, 70-100, or death. The terminal year in each of the above ages must be complete. Canonical age is the year fixed by the canon, or law of the Church, for a subject to become capable of incurring certain obligations, enjoying special privileges, embracing special states of life, holding office or dignity, or receiving the sacraments. Each and every one of these, being a human act, requires a development of mind and body proportioned to the free and voluntary acceptance of these gifts and privileges, also an adequate knowledge of, and capability for, the duties and obligations attached. Hence the Church prescribes that age at which one is generally supposed to have the necessary qualifications. It is evident that a lesser development of body and mind is necessary to the reception of baptism than is required for either matrimony or the priesthood, and greater qualifications for the higher than for the lower offices. Hence, the canonical age necessarily varies as do the privileges, offices, dignities, etc. The three states, ecclesiastical, religious, and laic, embrace all the ecclesiastical enactments concerning age.

ANTE-TRIDENTINE DISCIPLINE.—ECLESIASTICAL STATE.—The ancient discipline was neither universal nor fixed, but varied with circumstances of time and locality. The requisite age, according to Gratian, for tonsure and the first three minor orders, i. e. doorkeeper, reader, and exorcist, was seven. and for acolyte, twelve years complete. The present age for tonsure is seven full years (Cap. 4; de temp. ord. in sexto; Benedict XIV, "Inter sollicitos"); § 9—1795). Subdeaconship called for the attainment of the twelfth year (Conc. Trullanum, 692; Conc. Rothomagensis, 1074). Thirty-two years complete according to Pope Sisinius (385—395, text—C. 3, Dist. 77); twenty-five full years according to various councils, including that of Toulouse (1056); and the twentieth year inchoate according to Clement V (1305—1308). For priesthood, although Pope Sisinius (loc. cit.) demanded thirty-five years of age for the diaconate of the priest, the Council of 649 exacted only thirty full years. Dispensations from that age were frequently granted, owing to the great need for priests from the eighth century onward. The aforesaid Lateran Council fixed the necessary age for a parochial rector at the twenty-fifth year inchoate, which Clement V (loc. cit.) finally confirmed. The episcopate was not conferred until the completion of the forty-fifth year, according to Pope Sisinius (loc. cit.). Various councils fixed the episcopal age at thirty years complete.

TRIDENTINE DISCIPLINE.—The Council of Trent (Sess. xxiii, cap. 4, de Reform.; Sess. xxix, cap. 4) demanded seven years for the former, and a more advanced age than seven for the latter, which, however, may be liibly received before the fourteenth year (ibid., c. 4).—Major Orders. The Council of Trent (Sess. xxiii, cap. 12) fixed the age of twenty-two for Subdeaconship, twenty-three for Deaconship, and twenty-five for the Priesthood. The first day of the year prescribed suffices for the reception of the Order. Trent (Sess. vii, c. 1, de reform.) confirmed the Lateran age of thirty full years for the episcopate. The age for cardinal-deacon or cardinal-bishop was fixed by the Council (Sess. xxv, de reform., cap. 1) at thirty years complete. Sixtus V, however, made the twenty-second year inchoate age sufficient for cardinal-deacon, provided that within a year he can be, and is, ordained deacon, under penalty of loss of active and passive vote in all consistories, and even in the conclave for the election of a pope. Papacy. No certain age is fixed by law for election to the papacy. History records the election of some very young popes. John XI was scarcely twenty-three (Fuga), or twenty-four (according to Berninus), and John XII was not twenty-two. But they were exceptional cases. All positions attached to the papacy require qualifications greater than those necessary even for the episcopate. Consequently, a mature age is desired.—Dispensation from the canonical age is a relaxation of the canon law; hence the pope alone can dispense. He rarely does so in the case of age requisite for subdeaconship or deaconship. But on account of recent military laws in certain European countries, he has dispensed with the age prescribed for candidates for subdeaconship. Though a cleric who has not completed his thirtieth year cannot be elected, he can be postulated for (see ELECTION, POSTULATION) as bishop. The Holy Deaconship required the twenty-fifth year; the cleric is fully twenty-seven years old. Bishops in countries subject to the Congregation of Propaganda (e.g. Great Britain, Ireland, the United States, Holland, Germany, Canada, Australia, India, and the Orient) have faculties (Formula I, art. 3) to dispense (a) with twelve months in the case of candidates, after they are elected, or in orders or not. This applies to regular as well as secular candidates (Holy Office, 29 January, 1896); (b) with fourteen months in the case of deacons, also regular and secular candidates for the priesthood (Formula C, art. 3, etc.). The Canadian bishops are empowered (Formula T, art. 1) to dispense with eighteen months in case of fifteen deacons (regular and secular) about to be ordained priests. These dispensations do not apply to candidates for subdeaconship or deaconship. Though the censures to be incurred by the violators of the canonical age, according to the ancient law, and the constitution of Pius II, have been abrogated (see DECRETIST), nevertheless the vindictive punishments, i.e. pro-hibition to exercise the order received and privation of benefice annexed, still remain in full force (Santi, 1, 120, n. 10; Wernz., Decret., II, 148).

BENEFICES.—No special age was fixed by ancient canons for the consecration of bishops. But the eleventh benefices, Collation, i.e. without any cure of souls attached. The Council of Trent required the fourteenth year inchoate, but it said nothing about the age for benefices whose foundation permitted a lesser age. For such seven years sufficed. The same age was sufficient in the case of canons upon whom collectively, not singly, the cure of souls devolved, as also of recipients of cathedral half-portions and pensions arising from benefices. Canons of collegiate churches whose prebend neither by foundations nor by custom demanded Sacred Orders in its incumbent, were required to be fourteen years old. The Council of Trent did not insist upon it. The age for benefices and college churches with cure of souls attached should have attained their twenty-fifth year (Conc. Trid., Sess. xxiv, cap. 12). The age of twenty-three years complete for parochial benefices, as fixed by the papal decrees (cap. 14, de elect. in sexto), still holds. The Council of Trent made no innovation in this matter. The decennial age of fourteen years for cathedral and collegiate dignitaries without cure of souls was changed to twenty-two years complete, by the Council of Trent (Sess. xxiv, de reform., cap. 12, § 1 ad cetera). A vicar-general must be twenty-five, and a presbyter, or deacon, or sub-deacon, forty years inchoate. For cathedral canons there was no fixed decennial age. Clement V, however, decreed that canons not having at least subdeaconship should have no vote in the chapter, and those possessing a prebend to which a major order was affixed should receive that order within a year, under forfeiture of half the daily distributions and of a vote in chapter. Trent decreed that every cathedral prebend should have attached to it one of the three major orders, which must be received within a year from election to the benefice, but besides all other rights and duties of the division of the canonries, so that the one half should be prebysitical and the other half diaconal and subdiaconal. Hence, for a subdiaconal prebend twenty years complete, for a diaconal twenty-one years complete, and for a presbytery twenty-three years complete sufficed. Where the Trinitarian division was not introduced the Clementine law qualifying the fourteen years holds. Collation of a benefice or ecclesiastical office, without papal dispensation, upon a candidate who lacks even one day of the necessary age, is invalid.

RELIGIOUS STATE. Generals, provincials, abbots, superior regular prelates, having quasi-episcopal jurisdiction must, according to many, have completed their thirtieth year before election (Ferraris, Wernz, et al.); according to others, the twenty-fifth year inchoate will suffice (Plat, Vermeersch, and Ferrari). The various orders and congregations, however, have their peculiar rules as to the requisite age for inferior offices, which differ in their respective organizations. The Council of Trent (Sess. xxv, cap. 7, de regular. et monial.) fixed forty years complete and eight years after her profession for an abbess, mother general, or priorress of any religious order of nuns. Could such one be found in the monastery, then a nun over thirty years old and more than five years a professed, can be elected. An election contrary to these rules is invalid. For clothing with the religious habit or entrance into the novitiate no special age was fixed by doctrinal law. Clement VIII (Cum ad Regularis, 19 March, 1602) decreed that the constitution of each community should be the guide. He directed, however, that lay brothers and lay sisters should not be admitted before their twentieth year. The Sacred Congregation of the Council (16 July, 1632; 7 April, 1634) forbade the reception of novices till they attained their fifteenth year. The Congregation of Bishops and Regulars (23 May, 1659) prohibited the clothing with the habit before the completion of the fifteenth year. The same Congregation (Normae de Novis Institutis, 28 June, 1901) decreed that no one could be admitted under fifteen or over thirty, years of age without dispensation from the Holy See. For religious profession the Council of Trent (Sess. xxv, cap. 15) exacted sixteen years complete with one year's novitiate necessarily preceding. The latest enactment, prescribing simple vows for three continuous years after the novitiate before solemn profession, fixes the age for solemn profession at five years. The Congregation of Bishops and Regulars (3 May, 1902) as well as to men. It is forbidden to postpone the solemn profession of men, who have been under simple vows for three years, beyond the full twenty-fifth year of their age, except in some localities and in India, where the Society of Jesus, in which the profession of simple vows is continued for a much longer term of years than three.

ORDINARY CHRISTIAN LIFE.—No certain age is fixed for baptism; yet the Holy Office (30 July, 1771) forbids the postponement of infant baptism beyond the third day. According to early ecclesiastical discipline confirmation and Holy Communion were administered to infants after baptism. To-day, twelve years is generally recommended for confirmation; but, if urgent reasons exist for not waiting that age, it is expedient not to confirm before the age of reason, i. e. seven years (Roman Catechism; Holy Office, 11 December, 1850; Second Conc. Balt., V, c. iii, 252). Leo XIII commended Robert, Bishop of Marseilles, for introducing the custom of confirming before Holy Communion (22 June, 1897). For confession the age is seven years, i. e. the age of reason, when a child is generally supposed capable of making a sufficient confession. Canon law, however, prescribes the law of annual confession [Conc. Lat., c. 21; Second Conc. Balt., tit. ix; First Plenary Conc. of S. America (Rome, 1899), tit. V, cap. 4]. Children should receive Holy Communion when they have attained the age of discretion (Innocent III in Conc. Lat., c. 21). There is much controversy as to what that age precisely is. According to some, it ordinarily occurs between the tenth and fourteenth year (Suarez, quoted by Benedict XIV, "Syn. Dioc.," VII, xii, 3; Raimundi, "Inst. Past."") tit. I, cap. iv, n. 57; Zitelli, Apparatus Jur. Pont., p. 318, no. 4; Second Plen. Conc. Balt., tit. V); others, e. g. Ferrarini (L. 1, 154, n. 39); when ten or eleven and twelve years. Children in danger of death, capable of committing and making confession of mortal sin, and of distinguishing the heavenly from the ordinary food, and desiring to receive Holy Communion, must not be denied it, although they may not have reached the minimum age (Roman Catechism, de Euch., n. 63; Second Plen. Conc. Balt., and First Plen. Conc. of South America, loc. cit.). Extreme unction is to be administered to a child of seven years or younger, capable of sin. Children of seven years complete are bound by the law of abstinence and of hearing Mass. They can also be sponsors in the conferring of baptism and confirmation; but the Roman Rital (tit. II, n. 24) says that it is more expedient that they should be fourteen years old and also confirmed. The Congregations of Propaganda (4 May, 1774) and the Holy Office (1 July, 1832) forbid children under fourteen years of age to act as sponsors at confirmation. Only those who have completed their twenty-first year are bound to fast. Betrothals [eponasias] require seven full years in the contracting parties. The marriageable age is fourteen full years in males and twelve full years in females, under penalty of nullity (unless natural puberty supplies the want of years). Marriages are null because of the absence of legal or natural puberty are held as eponasias, inducing thereby impediment of "public decorum" (Cap. 14, tit. de despons. impub., X, 4, 2). Civil codes generally require a more advanced age than the canonical. Dispensations, however, as to the required ages are expressly granted by France, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Roumania, and Russia. The marriageable age in France, Italy, Belgium, and Roumania is eighteen for men, and fifteen for women (France requires also, under penalty of nullity, the consent of parents); Holland, Switzerland, Russia (Caucasian Provinces excepted), and Hungary require the consent of the husband and wife; Austria, eighteen and sixteen; Austro-Hungary, eighteen; France, eighteen and fourteen; Austria, fourteen for both parties; Denmark, twenty and sixteen; Germany, twenty-one (minors set free by parents at eighteen) and sixteen years respectively. Marriages contracted in Germany below the ages aforesaid are valid but illegal in Austria. In Bavaria, the minimum age is twenty-one years in males and age. So also in China, where there is a further deviation from canonical age, owing to the Chinese method of reckoning age by lunar rather than solar years (thirteen lunar months make a solar year). The canonical age holds in England, Spain, Portugal, Corsica (Ionian Isles excepted, where it is sixteen and forty-four), and as regards Catholics in the United States. While in some parts of the United States the canonical marriage age of fourteen and twelve still prevails, in others it has been enlarged by statutes. Such statutes, however, as a rule, do not make void marriages contracted by a male and female of fourteen and twelve years respectively, unless the statute expressly forbids them under penalty of nullity. The English Common Law age of fourteen in males and twelve in females prevails in all the Canadian provinces, with the exception of Ontario and Manitoba. Ontario requires fourteen years, and Manitoba sixteen years. In England and Ireland, at more youthful ages than these are not irreparably null and void. They can be, and are, ratified by continued cohabitation after the prescribed age. In all the provinces consent of parents or guardians is required where one or both of the parties have not attained a certain age.—Ontario, Manitoba, and New Brunswick, eighteen years; in Quebec, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Alberta, and Saskatchewan the age is twenty-one. Except in the case of Quebec and Prince Edward Island such consent is only directory, and does not affect the validity of marriage after celebration. Such marriages in the province of Quebec are valid, placed in law, and recognized by parties whose consent is required; in the latter province they are null and void by virtue of a pre-confederation law of 1831. The marriage law in nearly every part of the United States requires the consent of parents before license is granted to minors. Such statutes are merely directive, and do not make void marriages without the parents' consent. ("Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law," art. "Marriage," 1191). Neither in England is a marriage declared void for want of parental consent (Brown, Hist. Matr. Inst., 11, 191).

Age of Man. See Man.

Age of Reason, the name given to that period of human life at which persons are deemed to begin to be morally responsible. This, as a rule, happens at the age of seven, or thereabouts, though the use of reason requisite for moral discernment may come before, or may be delayed until notably after, that time. At this age Christians come under the operation of ecclesiastical laws, such as the precept of attendance on Sunday and holydays, absolution from mortal sins, and annual confession, should they have incurred mortal sin. The obligation of Easter Communion, literally understood, applies to all who have reached the "years of discretion"; but according to the practical interpretation of the Church it is not regarded as binding children just as soon as they are seven years old. At this age a person is juridically considered eligible to act as witness, as sponsor at baptism, or in confirmation, and as a party to the formal contract of betrothal; at this age one is considered capable of receiving extreme unction, of being imprisoned for debts and minor orders, of being the incumbent of a simple benefice (beneficium simplex) if the founder of it should have so provided; and, lastly, is held liable to ecclesiastical censures. In the present discipline, however, persons do not incur these penalties until they reach the age of puberty, unless explicitly included in the decree imposing them. The only censure surely applicable to persons of this age is that for the violation of the clausura of nuns, while that for the malpractice, suaviter diabolo, of clerics, is probably so.

Agen (Aginum), the Diocese of, comprises the Department of Lot and Garonne. It has been successively suffragan to the archdioceses of Bordeaux (under the old regime), Toulouse (1802-22), and Bordeaux (since 1822). Legends which do not antedate the ninth century concerning the hermit, St. Caprasius, martyred with St. Fides by Dacianus; Prefect of Gauls, during the persecution of Diocletian, and the story of Vincentius, a Christian martyr (written about 520), furnish no foundation for later traditions which make these two saints early bishops of Agen. The first bishop of Agen known to history is St. Phobadius, friend of St. Hilary, who published atractus against the Arianism of St. Sylvestre, and was aconverted at the Council of Rimini in 359. Among the bishops of Agen were Wilhelmus II, sent by Pope Urban IV (1261-64) to St. Louis in 1262 to ask his aid in favour of the Latin Empire of Constantinople; Bertrand de Goth, whose uncle of the same name was raised from the Archidioecesis of Bordeaux to the Paral. See under the name of Clement V and 1305-14), and during his pontificate visited the city of Agen; Cardinal Jean de Lorraine (1538-50); the Oratorian, Jules Mascarov, a celebrated preacher, transferred from the See of Tulle, to that of Agen (1789-1793); Hébert, who was curé of Versailles, had contributed to the withdrawal of Madame de Montespan from the royal court, and who when appointed Bishop of Agen (1703) had as vicar-general until 1709 the celebrated Belzunce; de Bonne (1767-1801), who in the parliamentary session of 3 January, 1792, was the first to refuse to sign the constitutional oath. The church of St. Caprasius, a splendid specimen of Romanesque architecture, dating from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, has been made the cathedral in place of the church of St. Etienne, which was unfortunately destroyed during the Revolution. The Bishop of Agen comprised (end of 1905) 278,740 inhabitants, 42 first class parishes, 397 second class parishes, and 27 vicariates, formerly with State exemptions.

Agents of Roman Congregations, persons whose business it is to look after the affairs of their patrons at the Roman Curia. The name is derived from the Latin Agentus in Rebus, corresponding to the Greek Aprocariarius. We first meet these agents for ecclesiastical matters not at the court of Rome, but at the imperial palace of Constantinople. Owing to the close connection between Church and State in the early Christian emperors and the absence of canons concerning many matters of mixed jurisdiction, the principal bishops found it necessary to maintain agents to look after their interests at the imperial court. Until the French Revolution, the pontiffs of France maintained similar agents at the royal court of St. Denis. (See Assemblees ou French Clergy.) At present the agents of the Roman Congregations are employed by bishops or private persons to transact their affairs in the pontifical courts. Such an agency is undertaken temporarily or perpetually. The principal business of the agents is to urge the expedition of the cases of their patrons. They undertake both judicial and extrajudicial business. If it is a question of favours, such as dispensations or increased faculties, these agents prepare the proper supplications and call repeatedly on the officials of the proper congregation until an answer is obtained. They expect to be given the opportunity to pay for the legal documents or to advance in general the affairs of those who employ them. These agents have a recognized position in the Roman Curia, and rank next in dignity before the notaries. The money they expend and the pay they receive depend entirely on the will of their employers. Some authors include under this name the solicitors and expeditioners of the Roman Curia, whose business it is to assist the procurators in the mechanical details of the preparation of cases for the congregational tribunals. Usually, however, these functions are considered as distinct from agents and are entrusting them in dignity.

Aggeus.—1. Name and Personal Life.—The tenth among the minor prophets of the Old Testament, is called in the Hebrew text, Haggai, and in the Septuagint 'Ayyalias, whence the Latin form Aggeus. The exact meaning of his name is uncertain. Many scholars consider it as an adjective signifying "the festive one" (born on feast-day), while others take it to be a shortened form of the noun Hagggyah, "my feast is Yahweh," a Jewish proper name found in I Chronicles, vi, 15 (Vulgata: I Paralip., vi, 30). Great uncertainty prevails also concerning the prophet's personal life. The book which bear his name is very short, and contains no detailed information about its author. The few passages which speak of him refer simply to the occasion on which he had to deliver a divine message in Jerusalem, during the second year of the reign of the Persian king, Darius I (520 b.c.), and all that Jewish tradition tells of Aggæus does not seem to have much historical value. He was born in Chaldea during the Babylonian Captivity, was a young man when he came to Jerusalem with the returning exiles, and was buried in the Holy City among the priests. It also represents him as an angel in human form, as one of the men who bore with Daniel his vision. He saw the vision referred to 1 Dan. x. 7, as a member of the so-called Great Synagogue, as surviving until the entry of Alexander the Great into Jerusalem (331 b.c.), and even until the time of Our Saviour. Obviously, these and similar traditions deserve but little credence.

2. Historical Circumstances.—Upon the return from Babylon (536 b.c.) the Jews, full of religious zeal, promptly set up an altar to the God of Israel, and reorganized His sacrificial worship. They next celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles, and some time later laid the foundation of the Second Temple, called the ‘Temple of Zerubbabel’. Present among the Samaritans—that is, the mixed races which dwelt in Samaria—prevented them, by an appeal to the Persian authorities, from proceeding further with the rebuilding of the Temple. In fact, the work was interrupted for sixteen years, during which various circumstances, such as the Persian invasion of Egypt in 527 b.c., a succession of bad seasons entailing the failure of the harvest and the vintage, the indulgence in luxury and self-seeking by the wealthier classes of Jerusalem, caused the Jews to neglect altogether the restoration of the House of the Lord. Toward the end of this period the political struggles through which Persia passed would have made it impossible for its rulers to interfere with the work of reconstruction in Jerusalem, even had they wished to do so, and this was distinctly realized by the Prophet Aggæus. At length, in the second year of the reign of Darius the son of Byshitta (516 b.c.), Aggæus appeared before the king of the Lord to rebuke the apathy of the Jews, and convince them that the time had come to complete their national sanctuary, that outward symbol of the Divine presence among them.

3. The Prophecies.—The book of Aggæus is made up of two prophetic utterances, each one having the date by which it was delivered. The first (1, 1, 2) is ascribed to the first day of the sixth month (August) of the second year of Darius’ reign. It urges the Jews to resume the work of rearing the Temple, and not to be turned aside from this duty by the enjoyment of their luxurious homes. It also reminds them of a recent drought as a divine punishment for their past neglect. This first utterance is followed by a brief account (I, xii-xiv) of its effect upon the hearers; three weeks later work was started on the Temple. In his second utterance (II, i-x), dated the twentieth day of the same month, the prophet foretells that the new House, which then appears so poor in comparison with the former Temple of Solomon, will one day be incomparably more glorious. The third utterance (II, xi-xx), referred to the twenty-fourth of the ninth month (Nov.-Dec.), declares that as long as God’s House is not rebuilt, the life of the Jews will be tainted and blotted out, but that the day of the Lord will renew the renewed zeal. The last utterance (II, xx-xxiii), ascribed to the same day as the preceding, tells of the divine favour which, in the approaching overthrow of the heathen nations, will be bestowed on Zorobabel, the scion and representative of the royal house of David. The simple reading of these oracles makes one feel that although they are shaped into parallel clauses such as are usual in Hebrew poetry, their literary style is rugged and undecorated, extremely direct, and, therefore, most natural on the part of a prophet intent on convincing his hearers of the truth of what he was saying. The tone of the book of Aggæus, strong internal data occur to confirm the traditional date and authorship of that sacred writing. In particular, each portion of the work is supplied with such precise dates, and ascribed so expressly to Aggæus, that each utterance bears the distinct mark of having been written soon after it was delivered. It should also be borne in mind that although the prophecies of Aggæus were directly meant to secure the immediate rearing of the Lord’s House, they are not without a much higher import. The three passages which are usually interpreted as truly Messianic, are II, viii; II, x; and II, xxi-xxiv. It is true that the meaning of the first two passages in the original Hebrew differs somewhat from the present rendering of the Vulgate, but all three contain a reference to Messianic times. The primitive text of the book of Aggæus has been particularly well preserved. The few variations which occur in the MSS. are due to errors in transcribing, and do not affect materially the sense of the prophecy. Besides the short prophetic work which bears his name, Aggæus has also been credited, but wrongly, with the authorship of Psalms cxvi and cxxvi (Heb. cxvi, cxxvi). (See Psalms.)

Aggressor, Unjust.—According to the accepted teaching of theologians, it is lawful, in the defence of life or limb, of property of some importance, and of chastity, to repel violence with violence, even to the extent of killing an unjust assailant. This is admitted to be true with the reservation included in the phrase “servato moderamen inculpate tutele.” That is, only that degree of violence may be employed which is necessary adequately to prevent one from the attack. Hence, enough in the circumstances to make an enemy it would be unlawful to kill him. It is likewise lawful to aid another to the same extent and within the same limits as are permissible for self-defence. (See Homicide.)

Agil, Saint. See Bavaria.

Agiles (of Aguiers), Raymond d’, a chronicler and canon of Puy-en-Velay, France, toward the close of the eleventh century. He accompanied the Count of Toulouse on the First Crusade (1096-99), as chaplain to Adhemar, Bishop of Puy,legate of Pope Urban II. With Pons de Balan he undertook to write a history of the expedition, but, Pons having been killed, he was obliged to carry on the undertaking alone. At a sortie of the crusaders during the siege of Antioch (28 June, 1098) Agiles went before the column, bearing in his hands the Cross and Lance. As he entered Jerusalem, accompanied the Count of Toulouse on his pilgrimage to the Jordan, and was at the battle of Ascalon. After this he is lost sight of. His “Hystoria Francorum qui ceperrunt Hierusalem” (F. L., CLV, 591-608) is the account of an eyewitness of most of the events of the First Crusade. It was first published by Bongars (Gesta Dei per Francos, I, 139–183), and again in the "Recueil des historiens occidentaux des croisades" (1866), 235–309; it is translated into French in Guizot, "Mémoires sur l'histoire de France" (1824), XXXI, 227–397. The narrative is largely devoted to the visions of Pierfort, 1099, and the authenticity of the Holy Lance found on the eve of battle. Molinier says of the author that he is partial, credulous, ignorant, and prejudiced. "He may be utilised, but on condition of close criticism."

Agilulfus, Saint, Abbot of Stavelot, Bishop of Cologne and Martyr, 750. We know but little of this Saint. The account, written of him by a monk of Malmedy and printed by the Bollandists, is, as they state, quite untrustworthy. He was of good family, was educated under Abbot Angelinus at Stavelot, and eventually became abbot there. Not long afterwards Agilulfus was elected Bishop of Cologne. He is said to have tried to persuade King Pepin on his death-bed not to leave the succession to the throne in his absence. In the influence of his son, he judged it best to allow the Bishop's death by violence soon after is attributed to the vengeance of the prince he sought to exclude. A letter of Pope Zacharias in 747 commends Agilulfus for signing the "Charta vera ex orthodoxo professionis". His remains were conveyed to the Church of Our Lady of the Steple, at Cologne, where they have recently again received public veneration. His feast is kept on 9 July.

HERBERT THUSTON.

Agios O Theos (O Holy God), the opening words in Greek of an invocation, or doxology, or hymn—for it may properly receive any of these titles—which in the Roman Liturgy is sung during the Improperia, or "Reproaches", at the ceremony of the Adoration of the Cross, on Good Friday. The brief hymn is then sung by two choirs alternately in Greek and in Latin, and was first sung in the Office of Holy Week, in the Greek Liturgy, where the Greek words "Agios ὥς θεός, ὥς λαχμός, ὥς ἐκκλησάτο, ὥς μετέφεραν" are expressed in Latinized characters, chosen to represent the Greek pronunciation (e.g. eleose mias for eleothe emas, the aspirate, as in modern Greek, remaining unheard). The hymn is then sung twelve times, alternating with a series of varied "Reproaches".

From the Latin word Sanctor thrice said, the hymn is sometimes referred to as Tersanctus, and is thus apt to be confused with the triple Sanctus at the end of the preface at Mass. In the rubrics of the Greek Liturgy, in which the hymn is said very frequently, it is always referred to as the "Triasgon" (τρίασον=triumph, ἔνωσις=holy), and is thus generally and properly known. It is sung at the Lesser Entrance, or solemn processional carrying of the book of the Gospels at Mass, in the Constantinopolitan and Armenian liturgies and in that of St. Mark. In the Gallican Liturgy it was placed both before and after the Gospel. The hymn is certainly of great antiquity, and perhaps much older than the event assigned by the Greek Monology as its origin. The legend, which may be considered a highly improbable one, recounts that during the reign of the younger Theodosius (408-450), Constantinople was shaken by a violent earthquake, 24 September, and that whilst the people, the Emperor, and the Patriarch Proclus (434-446) were praying for heavenly succour, a child was suddenly lifted into mid-air, to whom forthwith all cried out Kyrie eleison; and that the child, returning again to earth, admonished the people with a loud voice to pray thus: "O Holy God, Holy and Immortal, have mercy on us." The Patriarch was inspired. The fact that the hymn was one of the excommunications of the Fathers at the Council of Chalcedon (451), and that not only is it common to all the Greek Oriental liturgies, but was used also in the Gallican Liturgy [St. Germanus of Paris, (d. 576), referring to it as being sung both in Greek and in Latin: In imitation presule ecclesiae Ajus (this is, Agios or Apa salit, dicens latinum cum grece, as also previously in Greek alone, before the Prophecia] suggests from such a widespread and apparently common use the conclusion that the hymn is extremely ancient, perhaps of apostolic origin. Benedict XIV thought that the Greek formula was joined with the Latin in allusion to the divine voice heard at Constantinople. But the explanation seems hardly necessary, in view of the retention of Kyrie eleison in the Roman Liturgy, as well as of such Hebrew words as Amen, Alleluia, Hosanna, Sabaoth. Reverence for antiquity, and a desire to bring the Latin Liturgy upon the path of modern usage, explain the Greek form. It is true that the Kyrie eleison is not joined to a Latin version. On the other hand, it is so simple and occurs so frequently, that its meaning could easily be learned and remembered; whereas the Trisagion, elaborate and rarely used, might well receive a parallel version into Latin. Various additions made to it from time to time in the East have either disfigured its simplicity or endangered its orthodoxy. Thus, the phrase "Who wast crucified for us", added to it by Peter the Fuller, in order to spread the heresy of the Theopaschites, who asserted that the Divine Nature suffered upon the cross, while susceptible of a correct interpretation, was inserted nevertheless with heretical intent. Traditionally, the hymn had always been addressed to the Holy Trinity (Isaias, vi, 3). Subsequently, Calendion, Bishop of Antioch, sought both to allay the tumults aroused by the addition and to remove the evil suggestion that the Church might be "Christ, King", thus making it refer directly and unequivocally to the Incarnate Word: "O Holy God, Holy and Strong, Holy and Immortal, Christ, King, Who wast crucified for us, have mercy on us." His well-meant effort did not succeed, and his emendation was rejected. The Pope in person, the Patriarch of Antioch, wrote to prove the correct ascription of the hymn to the Son of God, and made the use of the addition general in his diocese.

Gregory VII (1073-85) wrote to the Armenians, who still used the new formula, bidding them avoid all occasion of scandal and suspicion of wrong interpretation, by cancelling a form which neither the Roman nor any Eastern Church, save the Armenian, had adopted. The injunction seems to have been disregarded; for when, centuries after, union with the Armenians was again discussed, a question was addressed (30 January, 1635) to Propaganda, whether the Armenians might still use the formula "Who didst arise from the dead"; on Holy Thursday: "Thou that wast betrayed for us"; on Holy Saturday: "Thou that wast buried for us"; on the Feast of the Assumption: "Thou that didst come to the death of the Holy Mother and Virgin", etc. The Armeno-Roman rite has suppressed all of these variations.
The Trisagion is sung in the Greek Church at all the canonical hours and several times during the long Mass service. In the Latin Church it is sung only on Good Friday, as we have seen. Sung throughout the impressive ceremony of the Adoration of the Cross, the polyphonic musical setting of Palestrina for both the Reproaches' and the Trisagion, as sung by the priests and the masterly choir, with that prince of church song, adds an overpowering pathos of music to the words, and constitutes, like the Hallelujah Chorus of Handel, a marvel of simplicity achieving a marvellous effect.

H. T. HENRY.

Agnellus, Giuseppe, chiefly known for his ecclesiastical and devotional works, b. at Naples, 1621; d. in Rome, 8 October, 1706. He entered the Society of Jesus, in Rome, in 1637. He was professor of moral theology, and rector of the colleges of Montecucciano, Macerata, and Ancona, and also Consultant of the Inquisition of the March of Ancona. He passed the last thirty-three years of his life in the Professed House at Rome, where he died. He wrote (1) "I Cerimoniale annuale". It was adapted to the use of parish priests, and contained explanations for use on Sunday of the year. It went through three editions. (2) A week's devotion to St. Joseph, for the Bona Mors Sodality. (3) Four treatises on the "Exercitia de St. Ignatii", chiefly with regard to election. (4) A Raccolta of meditations for a triduum and a retreat of ten days. (5) On Lent and Advent. Agnellus, Guglielmo, Fra, sculptor and architect, b. at Pisa, probably in 1238; d. probably in 1313. He was a pupil of Niccolò Pisano, who had then brought the art of sculpture to a great perfection, modelled on Greek and Roman ideas, matured by the study of actual truth, and preserving only such traditions of the earlier medieval school as seemed necessary for Christian art at a time when art was truly the handmaid of religion. Agnellus joined the Dominican Order at Pisa in 1257, as a lay brother. He was employed on the conversion of the brethren at Pisa and built the campanile of the Abbey of Settimo, near Florence. His best work is the series of marble reliefs executed, in conjunction with Pisano, for the famous tomb of St. Dominic in the church of that Saint at Bologna. The figures on the funeral urn, in mezzo-rilievo, are about two feet high. Guglielmo's work on the portal of the face of the tomb deals with six Dominican legends, viz: the Blessed Reginald smitten by a distemper; the Madonna healing a sick man and pointing to the habit of the Friars Preachers, indicating that he should assume it; the same man freed from a terrible tempest by holding St. Dominic's hands; Honorius III having his vision of St. Dominic supporting the falling Lateran Basilica; Honorius examining the Dominican rule, and his solemn approbation of it. This work afforded little scope to Fra Guglielmo's imaginative powers, but its mastery execution places him among the greatest artists of his time, second only to his master, Niccolò Pisano. On the other hand, the figures show some faultless characteristics of the period, in the stiffness and lack of finish in the extremities. They are also crowded into too narrow limits. Fra Guglielmo and Niccolò also embellished the upper cornice of the urn with scanthus leaves and birds. We know no more of Fra Guglielmo until 1293 when we find him occupied on the famous Cathedral of Orvieto. Though his share in the sculptures of this edifice is not fully established, it is believed that the bas-reliefs are in great part his work. The length of time he spent at Orvieto is also unknown. In 1304 he was engaged on works of sculpture and architecture at his native Pisa, and was called upon to adorn the facade of the Church of San Michele di Borgo with historical bas-reliefs. Those labours, together with his work on other parts of that church, and the construction of a pulpit, engaged him for the remaining nine years of his life. Fra Guglielmo numbered among the greatest Italian sculptors, far excelling all contemporaries, Arnolfo, Giovanni Pisano, and his master excepted.

Agnellus of Pisa, Blessed, Friar Minor and founder of the English Franciscan Province, b. at Pisa c. 1195, of the noble family of the Agnellis; d. at Oxford, 7 May, 1236. In early youth he was received into the Seraphic Order by St. Francis himself, during the latter's sojourn in Pisa, and soon became an accomplished model of religious perfection. Sent by St. Francis to Paris, he erected a convent there and became custos. Having returned to Italy, he was present at the council of Clermont, and was sent thence by St. Francis to found the Order in England. Agnellus, then in deacon's orders, landed at Dover with nine other friars, 12 September, 1224, having been charitably conveyed from France by the monks of Fécamp. A few weeks afterwards he obtained a house at Oxford and there laid the foundations of the English Province, which became the exemplar for all the provinces of the order. Though not himself a learned man, he established a school for the friars at Oxford, which was destined to play no small part in the development of the university. But his solicitude extended beyond the immediate welfare of his brethren. He sent his friars about to preach the word of God to the faithful, and to perform the other offices of the sacred ministry. Agnellus wielded considerable influence in affairs of state, and in his efforts to avert civil war between the King and the Earl Marshal, who had leagued with the Welsh, he contracted a fatal illness. Eccleston has left us a brief account of his death. Agnellus's body, incorrupt, was preserved with great veneration at Oxford up to the dissolution of the religious houses in the time of Henry VIII. The cultus of Blessed Agnellus was formally confirmed by Leo XIII in 1882, and his feast is kept in the Order on 7 May.

Agnellus of Ravenna, Andreas, historian of that church, b. 805; the date of his death is unknown, but was probably about 846. Though called Abbot, first of St. Mary ad Blachernas, and, later, of St. Bartholomew, he appears to have remained a secular priest, being probably only titular abbot of each abbey. He is best known as the author of the Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Ravennatis", an account of the history of the bishops of Ravenna, on the model of the Roman Liber Pontificalis (q. v.). It begins with St. Apollinaris (q. v.) and ends with Georgius, the forty-eighth archbishop (846). Though the work contains no little unreliable material, it is a unique and rich source of information concerning the buildings, inscriptions, manners, and religious customs of Ravenna in the ninth century. The author shows a strong bias and loses no opportunity of exhibitng the independence of "cephalia" of the church of Ravenna as against the legitimate authority of the Holy See. For his time he is a kind of polemical Gallican. His work bears also traces of personal vanity. In his efforts to be erudite he often falls into unpardonable errors. The diction is barbarous, and the text is faulty and corrupt.

The work of Agnellus was edited by Baccelli (1708), and by Muratori in the second volume of his Scriptores Rerum Italicarum (7 vols., Leiden, 1725). The latter is that of Holder-Egger, in Mon. Germ. Hist. Script. Longob., 205 sqq. (Hanover, 1878). See Ebre, Geschichte der Literatur der Italiener, ii, 374; Bardi, Cronache Italiane nel medio evo (Milan, 1900), 93-98. For the peculiar autograph claimed by the archbishops of Ravenna (akin to that of Milan and Aquilea) see the note of Duchesne in his edition of the Roman Liber Pontificalis (Paris, 1868), i, 343, 344.

THOMAS J. SHARAN.

Agnes, Saint, Cemetery of. See Catacombs.

Agnes, Saint of Assisi, younger sister of St. Clare and Abbess of the Poor Ladies, b. at Assisi, 1197, or 1198; d. 1253. She was the younger daughter of Count Favorino Scioli. Her saintly mother, Blessed Hortulana, belonged to the noble family of the Fiumi, and her cousin Rufino was one of the celebrated "Three Companions" of St. Francis. Agnes's childhood was spent in her native city and at the court of Sasso Rossano on Mount Subasio. On 18 March, 1212, her eldest sister Clare, moved by the preaching and example of St. Francis, had left her father's home to follow the way of life taught by the Saint. Sixteen days later Agnes repaired to the monastery of St. Angelo in Pesaro, where the Benedictine nuns had afforded her temporary shelter, and resolved to share her sister's life of poverty and penance. At this step the fury of Count Favorino knew no bounds. He sent his brother Monaldo, with several relatives and some armed followers, to St. Angelo to force Agnes, if persuasion failed, to return home. The conflict which followed is related in detail in the "Chronicles of the Twenty-four Generals." Monaldo, beside himself with rage, drew his sword to strike the young girl, but his arm dropped, withered and useless, by his side; others dragged Agnes out of the monastery by the hair; seizing her by the arm, they tore her to pieces. Presently St. Clare came to the rescue, and of a sudden Agnes's body became so heavy that the soldiers having tried in vain to carry her off, dropped her, half dead, in a field near the monastery. Overcome by a spiritual power against which physical force availed not, Agnes's relatives were obliged to withdraw and to allow her to remain with St. Clare. St. Francis, who was overjoyed at Agnes's heroic resistance to the entreaties and threats of her pursuers, presently cut off her hair and gave her the habit of Poverty. Soon after, he established the two sisters at St. Damien's, in a small rude dwelling, the humble sanctuarv which he helped to rebuild with his own hands. There several other noble ladies of Assisi joined Clare and Agnes, and thus began the Order of the Poor Ladies of St. Damien's, or Poor Clares, as these Franciscan nuns afterwards came to be called. From the outset of her religious life, Agnes was distinguished for such a degree of virtue that her companions declared she seemed to have discovered a new road to perfection known only to herself. As abbess, she ruled with loving kindness and knew how to make the practice of virtue bright and attractive to her subjects. In 1219, Agnes, despite her youth, was elected abbess of St. Clari and general of the community of the Poor Ladies at Montecolli, near Florence, which in course of time became almost as famous as St. Damian's. A letter written by St. Agnes to Clare after this separation is still extant, touchingly beautiful in its simplicity and affection. Nothing perhaps in Agnes's character is more striking and attractive than her loving fidelity to Christ's ideals and her undying loyalty in upholding the latter in her lifelong and arduous struggle for Seraphic Poverty. Full of zeal for the spread of the Order, Agnes established from Montecolli several monasteries of the Poor Ladies in the north of Italy, including those of Modena, Cesena, and Padua, all of which observed the same fidelity to the teaching of St. Francis and St. Clare. In 1253, Agnes was summoned to St. Damien's during the last illness of St. Clare, and assisted at her last triumphant death and funeral. On 16 November of the same year she followed St. Clare to her eternal reward. Her mother Hortulana and her younger sister Beatrice, both of whom had followed Clare and Agnes into the Order, had already passed away. The precious remains of St. Agnes reposé near the body of her mother and sisters, in the church of St. Clare at Assisi. God, Who had manifested in the Saint during life, glorified her tomb after death by numerous miracles. Benedict XIV permitted the Order of St. Francis to celebrate her feast. It is kept on 16 November, as a double of the second class.

PASCHAL ROBINSON.

Agnes of Bohemia, Blessed, or Agnes of Prague, as she is sometimes called, b. at Prague in the year 1200; d. probably in 1281. She was the daughter of Ottocar, King of Bohemia and Constance of Hungary, a relative of St. Elizabeth. At an early age she was sent to the monastery of Treinitz, where at the hands of the Cistercian religious she received the education that became her rank. She was betrothed to Frederick II, Emperor of Germany; but when the time arrived for the solemnization of the marriage, it was impossible to persuade her to abandon the resolution she had made of continuing her life as a religious in the sanctuary of the cloister. The Emperor Frederick was incensed at the unsuccessful issue of his matrimonial venture, but, on learning that Blessed Agnes had left him to become the spouse of Christ, he is said to have remarked: "If she had left me for a mortal man, I would have taken vengeance with the sword; but I cannot take offence because in preference to me she has chosen the King of Heaven." The servant of God entered the Order of St. Clare in the monastery of St. Saviour at Prague, which she herself had erected. She was elected abbess of the monastery, and became in this office a model of Christian modesty and religious liberty. The Queen lavished on her with the gift of miracles, and she predicted the victory of her brother Wenceslaus over the Duke of Austria. The exact year of the death of Blessed Agnes is not certain; 1281 is the most probable date. Her feast is kept on the second of March.

Agnes of Montepulciano, Saint, b. in the neighbourhood of Montepulciano in Tuscany about 1268; d. there 1317. At the age of nine years she entered a monastery. Four years later she was commissioned by Pope Nicholas IV to assist in the foundation of the mother Monastery of St. Agnes, and became its prioress at the age of fifteen. At the entreaty of the citizens of her native town, she established (1298) the celebrated convent of Dominican nuns at Montepulciano which she governed until the time of her death. She was canonized by Benedict XIII in 1323. Her feast is celebrated on 20 April. Acta SS., April, II, 791, 792, 813-817; LEROUX, La vie de S. Agnes of Rome, Saint, Martyr.—Of all the virgin martyrs of Rome none was held in such high honour by the Church, as St. Agnes. In the ancient Roman calendar of the feasts of the martyrs (Deposito Martyrum), incorporated into the collection of Aurelius Dionysius Philocalus, dating from 354 and often reprinted, e. g. in Ruinart ["Acta Sincera Martyrum" (ed. Ratisbon. 1859), 63 sqq.], her feast is assigned to 21 January, to which is added a detail as to the name of the road (Via Nomentana) near which her grave was located. The earliest sacramentaries give the same date for her feast, and it is on this day that the Latin Church even now keeps her memory sacred. Since the close of the fourteenth century the Fathers of the Church have sung her name, and extolled her virginity and heroism under torture. It is clear, however, from the diversity in the earliest accounts that there was at least that the end of the fourth century no accurate and reliable narrative, at least in writing, concerning the details of her martyrdom. On one point only is there mutual agreement, viz., the youth of the Christian heroine. St. Ambrose gives her age as twelve (De Virginibus, I, 2; P. L., XVI, 200-202: "Haec duodecim annorum martyr faciebat traditur"); St. Augustine as thirteen ("Agnes puella tridecim annorum;" Sermo cclxxii, 6, P. L., XXXVIII, 1251), which harmonizes well with the words of Prudentius: "Aunt jusgali vix habilet oro" ("Peristephanon," Hymn xiv, 10 in Ruinart, Act. Sinc., ed cit. 486). Damusus depicts her as hastening to martyrdom from the lap of her mother or nurse ("Nutricis gremium subito liquescus puellam"); in St. Agusten, 3, ed. Ihm, Damas epigrams, p. 486, 487, the reason whatever for doubting this tradition. It indeed explains very well the renown of the youthful martyr. We have already cited the testimony of the three oldest witnesses to the martyrdom of St. Agnes: (1) St. Ambrose, "De Virginibus," I, 2; (2) the inscription of Pope Damasus engraved on marble, the original of which may yet be seen at the foot of the stairs leading to the sepulchre and church of St. Agnes (Sant' Agnese fuori le mura); (3) Prudentius, "Peristephanon," Hymn 14 The rhetorical narrative of St. Ambrose, in addition to the martyr's age, gives nothing except execution by sword. The narrative of Pope Damasus tells us that immediately after the promulgation of the imperial edict against the Christian Saints Agnes voluntarily declared herself a Christian, and suffered very speedily the martyrdom of fire, giving scarcely a thought to the frightful torments she had endured, concerned only with veiled means of her flowing hair, her chaste body which had been exposed to the gaze of the heathen multitude (Nudaque profusum crimem per membram deicisse, Ne domini templum facies peritura videret). Prudentius, in his description of the martyrdom, adheres rather to the account of St. Ambrose, but adds a new episode: "The young princess threatened with death over her virginity to a house of prostitution, and even executed this threat; but when a young man turned a lascivious look upon the virgin, he fell to the ground stricken with blindness, and lay as one dead." Possibly this is what Damasus and Ambrose have in view, in saying that the princess was endangered; the latter in particular says (loc. cit.): "Habetis igitur in una hostia duplex martyrion, pudoris et religiosis: et virgo permaneat et martyrium obtineat" (Behold therefore in the same victim a double martyrdom, one of modesty, the other of religion. She refused the virgin, and obtained the crown of martyrdom). Prudentius, though, may have drawn at least the substance of this episode from a trustworthy popular legend. Still another source of information, earlier than the "Acts" of her martyrdom, is the glorious hymn: "Agnes beata virginitatis," which, though probably not from the pen of the poet himself, may be certainly considered as more closely to the account of Damasus, still betrays a certain use of the text of St. Ambrose, and was composed not long after the latter work. (See the text in Dreyes, Aur. Ambrosius der Vater des Kirchengesanges, 135, Freiburg, 1893.) The "Acts" of the Martyrdom of St. Agnes belong to a somewhat later period, and are met with in three recensions, two Greek and one Latin. The oldest of them is the shorter of the two Greek texts, on which the Latin text was based, though it was at the same time quite freely enlarged. The longer Greek text was a translation of the Latin enlargement (Pio Franchi de' Cavalieri, "St. Agnes. il nero nella legenda", in Römische Quartalschrift, Supplement X, Rome, 1899; cf. Acts SS., Jan. II, 350 sqq.). The Latin and, consequently, the shorter Greek text date back to the first half of the fifth century, when St. Maximus, Bishop of Turin (c. 430-470), evidently used the Latin "Acts" in a sermon (P. L., LVII, 643 sqq.). In these "Acts" the brothel episode is still further elaborated, and the virgin is decapitated after remaining untouched by the flames. We do not know with certainty in which persecution the courageous virgin won the martyr's crown. Formerly it was customary to assign her death to the persecution of Diocletian (c. 304), but arguments are now brought forward, based on the inscription of Damasus, to prove that it occurred during one of the third-century persecutions subsequent to that of Decius. The body of the virgin martyr was placed in a separate sepulchre on the Via Nomentana, encased around her tombs were laid precious relics and the comb that bore her name. The original slab which covered her remains, with the inscription "Agne sanctissimae," is probably the same one which is now preserved in the Museum at Naples. During the reign of Constantine, through the efforts of his daughter Constantina, a basilica was erected over the grave of St. Agnes, which was later entirely remodelled by Pope Honorius (625-638), and has since remained unaltered. In the apse is a mosaic showing the martyr amid flames, with a sword at her feet. A beautiful relief of the saint is found on a marble slab that dates from the fourth century and is actually a part of the altar of her church. Since the Middle Ages St. Agnes has been represented with a lamb, the symbol of her virgin innocence. On her feast two lambs are solemnly blessed, and from their wool are made the palliums sent by the Pope to archbishops.

Agnesi, Maria Gaetana.—b. at Milan, 16 May, 1718; d. at Milan, 9 January, 1799, an Italian woman of remarkable intellectual gifts and attainments. Her father was professor of mathematics at Bologna. When nine years old she spoke Latin fluently, and wrote a discourse to show that liberal studies were not unsuited to her sex: "Oration qua ostenditur artium liberalium studia femino sexu neutiquam abhorrere." The text was printed at Milan in 1727. She is said to have spoken Greek fluently when only eleven years old, and at thirteen she had mastered Hebrew, French, Spanish, German, and other languages. She was called the "Walking Polyglot." Her father assembled the most learned men of Bologna at his house at stated intervals, and she joined in and defended various philosophical theses. A contemporary, President de Brocche, in his "Lettres sur l'Italie" (I, 243), declares that conversation with the young girl was intensely interesting, as she was attractive in manner and richly endowed in mind. So far from becoming vain over her success, she was averse to these public displays of her phenomenal learning, and at twenty years of age desired to enter a convent. Although this desire was not gratified, the meetings were discontinued, and she led a life of retirement, in which she devoted herself especially to the study of mathematics. The 101 theorems she defended were published in 1738, at Milan, under the title, "Propositiones Philosophiae." Maria showed a phenomenal aptitude for mathematics. She wrote an excellent treatise on conic sections, and in her thirteenth year her "Instituzioni Analitiche" was published in two volumes (Milan, 1749), the first treating of the analysis of finite quantities; the second, the analysis of infinitesimals. This, the most valuable result of her labours in this field, was regarded as the best introduction extant to the works of Euler. It was translated into English by Colson of Cambridge, and into French by d'Alembert, with the notes of Abbé Boisuet. The plane curve, known as versiera, is called "the Witch of Agnesi." Maria gained such reputation as a mathematician that she was appointed by Benedict XIV to teach mathematics in the University of Bologna, during her father's illness. This was in 1760, and two years later her father died. Maria then devoted herself to the study of theology and the Fathers of the Church. Her long aspirations to the religious life were destined to be gratified, for after acting for some years as director of the Hospicio Trivulzie of the Blue Nuns in Milan, she joined the order and died a member of it, in her fifty-first year.

due to a reactionary spirit of protest, and a collection of sceptical arguments, against "dogmatic systems" of philosophy in vogue, so much so as to an adverse criticism of man's knowing-powers in answer to the fundamental question: What can we know? Kant, who was the first to raise this question, in his memorable essay "Kritik der Urteilsfähigkeit", undertook to distinguish between "knowable phenomena" and "unknowable things-in-themselves". Hamilton soon followed with his doctrine that "we know only the relations of things". Modern Agnosticism is thus closely associated with Kant's distinction and Hamilton's principle of relativity. It asserts our inability to know the reality corresponding to our ultimate scientific, philosophic, or religious ideas. (5) Agnosticism, with special reference to theology, is a name for any theory which denies that it is possible for man to acquire knowledge of God. It may assume either a religious or an anti-religious form, according as it is confined to a criticism of rational knowledge or extended to a criticism of theism of belief. De Bonald (1754-1840), in his theory that language is of divine origin, containing, preserving, and transmitting the primitive revelation of God to man; De Lammenais (1782-1854), in his theory that individual reason is the chief reason. Hamilton, in his "Ibn Kunt, une histoire d'idée", in his advocacy of faith in God, the Scriptures, and the Church, affords instance of Catholic theologians attempting to combine belief in moral and religious truths with the denial that valid knowledge of the same is attainable by reason apart from revelation and tradition. To these systems of Fideism and Traditionalism shall be added the theory of Mansel (1820-71), which Spencer regarded as a confession of Agnosticism, that the very inability of reason to know the being and attributes of God proves that revelation is necessary to supplement the mind's shortcomings. This attitude of criticising knowledge, but not faith, was also a feature of Sir William Hamilton's philosophy. (See FIDEISM and TRADITIONALISM.) (6) The extreme view that knowledge of God is impossible, even with the aid of revelation, is the latest form of religious Agnosticism. The new theory regards religion and science as two distinct and separate accounts of experience, and seeks to combine an agnostic intellect with a believing heart. It has been aptly called "mental book-keeping by double entry". Ritschl, reviving Kant's separatist distinction of practical from theoretical knowledge, claims that the ideal is nothing but a guide to action, and that man's capacity for achieving his ends is as a grain of sand in the universe. The knowledge of the world, the soul, or God, and was forced to take refuge against Hume's scepticism in the categorical imperative "Thou shalt" of the "moral reason". He had made "pure reason" powerless by his transfer of causality and necessity from the objects of thought to the thinking subject.

To discredit this idea of a "reality" inaccessible hidden behind "appearances", it is sufficient to point out the gratuitous assumptions on which it is based. Kant's radical mistake was, to prejudge, instead of investigating, the conditions under which the acquisition of knowledge becomes possible. No proof of existence has been offered of a grain of sand in the universe. The categories are wholly subjective; proof is not even possible. The fact that a category lives subjectively in the act of knowing is no proof that the category does not at the same time truly express the nature of the reality known. (Seth, Two Lectures on Theism.) (New York, 1887) p. 19.) The harmony of the mind's function with the objects it perceives and the relations it discovers shows that the ability of the mind to reach reality is involved in our very acts of perception. Yet Kant, substituting theory for fact, would disqualify the mind for its task of knowing the things we live in, and invent a hinterland of things-in-themselves never known as they are, but only as they appear to be. This use of a purely speculative principle to criticize the actual contents of human experience, is unjustifiable. Knowledge is a living process to be concretely investigated, not a mechanical affair for abstract reason to play with. The act of knowing is not always merely abstain from either affirming or denying the existence of God, but crosses over to the old position of theoretic Atheism and, on the plea of insufficient evidence, ceases even to believe that God exists. While, therefore, not to be identified with Atheism, Agnosticism is even found in combination with it. (See THEISM.)

II. TOTAL AGNOSTICISM SELF-REFUTING.—Total or complete Agnosticism—see (2)—is self-refuting. The fact of its ever having existed, even in the formula of Arcaélito, "I know nothing, not even that I know nothing", is questioned. It is impossible to construct theoretically a self-consistent scheme of total ignorance, doubly, univocally. The mind that took to prove its own utter incompetence would have to assume, while so doing, that it was competent to perform the allotted task. Besides, it would be impossible to apply such a theory practically; and a theory wholly subversive of reason, contradictory to the sciences, our infallibles, is a philosophy of unreason out of place in a world of law. It is the systems of partial Agnosticism, therefore, which merit examination. These do not aim at constructing a complete philosophy of the Unknowable, but at excluding special kinds of truth, notably religious, from the domain of knowledge. They are buildings designedly left unfinished.

III. KANT'S DISTINCTION BETWEEN APPEARANCE AND REALITY EXAMINED.—Kant's idea of "a world of things apart from the world we know" furnished the starting-point of the modern movement towards constructing a philosophy of the Unknowable. With the laudable intention of discovering in the rational man he showed that the Latter's analysis of human experience into particular sense-impressions was faulty and incomplete, inasmuch as it failed to recognize the universal and necessary elements present in human thought. Kant accordingly proceeded to construct a theory of knowledge which should emphasize the features of human thought neglected by Hume. He assumed that universality, necessity, causality, space, and time were merely the mind's constitutional way of looking at things, and in no sense derived from experience. The result was that he had to admit the incapacity of our knowledge of the reality of the world, the soul, or God, and was forced to take refuge against Hume's scepticism in the categorical imperative "Thou shalt" of the "moral reason". He had made "pure reason" powerless by his transfer of causality and necessity from the objects of thought to the thinking subject.

To discredit this idea of a "reality" inaccessible hidden behind "appearances", it is sufficient to point out the gratuitous assumptions on which it is based. Kant's radical mistake was, to prejudge, instead of investigating, the conditions under which the acquisition of knowledge becomes possible. No proof of existence has been offered of a grain of sand in the universe. The categories are wholly subjective; proof is not even possible. "The fact that a category lives subjectively in the act of knowing is no proof that the category does not at the same time truly express the nature of the reality known". (Seth, Two Lectures on Theism.) (New York, 1887) p. 19.) The harmony of the mind's function with the objects it perceives and the relations it discovers shows that the ability of the mind to reach reality is involved in our very acts of perception. Yet Kant, substituting theory for fact, would disqualify the mind for its task of knowing the things we live in, and invent a hinterland of things-in-themselves never known as they are, but only as they appear to be. This use of a purely speculative principle to criticize the actual contents of human experience, is unjustifiable. Knowledge is a living process to be concretely investigated, not a mechanical affair for abstract reason to play with. The act of knowing is not always merely abstain from either affirming or denying the existence of God, but crosses over to the old position of theoretic Atheism and, on the plea of insufficient evidence, ceases even to believe that God exists. While, therefore, not to be identified with Atheism, Agnosticism is even found in combination with it. (See THEISM.) philosophical principle on which modern Agnosticism rests, in his doctrine that "all knowledge is relative". To know is to condition; to know the Unconditioned (Absolute, or Infinite) is therefore, impossible, or "absurd; because nothing is conditioned in "absolutely" no conditions (of thought)". This doctrine of relativities contains two serious equivocations which, when pointed out, reveal the basic difference between the philosophies of Agnosticism and of Theism. The first is in the word "relativity". The statement that knowledge is relative may mean still, "I do not know whether the world or God, we must know it as manifesting itself to us under the laws and relations of our own consciousness; apart from which relations of self-manifestation it would be for us an isolated, unknowable blank. Thus understood, the doctrine of relativities states the actual human method of knowing the world, the soul, the self, God, grace, and the supernatural. Who would hold that we know God, naturally, in any other way than through the manifestations He makes of Himself in mind and nature?

But Hamilton understood the principle of relativities in mean that "we know only the relations of things"; only the Relative, never the Absolute. A negative conclusion, fixing a limit to what we can know, was thus drawn from a principle which of itself merely affirms the method, but settles nothing as to the limits, of our knowledge. This arbitrary introduction of a method of self-manifestation of the Agnostic position against Theism. An ideally perfect possible knowledge is contrasted with the imperfect, yet none the less true, knowledge which we actually possess. By thus assuming "ideal comprehension as a standard by which to criticise "real apprehension", the Agnostic invalidates, apparently, the little that we do know, as at present constituted, by the more we might know, if our mental constitution were other than it is. The Theist, however, recognizing that the limits of human knowledge are to be determined by fact, not by speculation, refuses to prejudice the issue, and proceeds to investigate what we can legitimately know of God through His effects or manifestations.

The second serious equivocation is in the terms "Absolute", "Infinite", "Unconditioned". The Agnostic has in mind, when he uses these terms, that vague general idea of being which our mind reaches by ecstasy, the absolute reality, the unconditioned. The result of this emptying process is the Indefinite of abstract, as compared with the Definite of concrete, thought. It is this Indefinite which the Agnostic exhibits as the utterly Unrelated, Unconditioned. But this is not the Absolute in question. Our inability to know such an Absolute, being simply our inability to define the indefinite, to condition the unconditioned, is an irrelevant truism. The Absolute in question with Theist is the real, not the logical; the Infinite in question is the actual Infinite of realized perfection, not the Indefinite of thought. The All-perfect is the idea of God, not the All-perfect, the polar opposite, the Infinite, taken for each other by Pantheists and Materialists from the days of the Ionians to our own. The Agnostic, therefore, disposes the whole Theistic problem when he substitutes a logical Absolute, defined as "that which excludes all relations outer and inner", for the real. Examination of our personal experiences, and of our relations with the universe, would show the Absolute essentially excludes the relation of real dependence upon anything else. We have no right in reason to define it as the non-related. In fact, it manifests itself as the causal, sustaining ground of all relations. Whether our knowledge of this real Absolute is or is not, the question is bound up with the Infinite. God, that is to say, is wholly negative, is consequently a distinct problem (see VI).

V. SPENCER'S DOCTRINE OF THE UNKNOWABLE EXAMINED.—According to Herbert Spencer, the doctrine that all knowledge is relative cannot be intelligibly stated without postulating the existence of the Absolute. The Absolute, he says, "inevitably carries us beyond conditioned existence (definite consciousness) to unconditioned existence (indefinite consciousness). The existence of Absolute Reality must therefore be affirmed. Spencer thus made a distinct advance upon the philosophy of Hume and Mill, in that he knew that whether or not we knew the existence of a God, or whether we were able to prove it was the case, the best effort resulting in "matters of thought", or whether we were able to prove it was the case, the best effort resulting in "matters of thought", or was the essence of his philosophy, and his attitude on the question of any absolute existence. Hamilton and Mansel admitted the existence of the infinite on faith, denying only man's ability to form a positive conception of it. Mansel's test for a valid conception of anything is an exhaustive grasp of its positive contents—a test ideal as to investigate knowledge of the finite and infinite alike. Spencer's test is "inability to conceive the opposite". But since he understood "to conceive" as meaning "to construct a mental image", the consequence was that the highest conceptions of science and religion—matter, space, time, the Infinite—failed to correspond to his assumed test, and it was therefore to be "mere symbols of the real, not actual cognitions of it at all". He was thus led to seek the basis and reconciliation of science, philosophy, and religion in the common recognition of Unknowable Reality as the object of man's constant pursuit and worship. The non-existence of an Absolute is unthinkable; all efforts to know positively what the Absolute is result in contradictions.

Spencer's adverse criticism of all knowledge and belief, as affording no insight into the ultimate nature of reality, rests on glaring assumptions. The assumption that every idea is "symbolic" which cannot be vividly realized in thought is no arbitrary as to be decisive against his entire system; it is a pre-judgment, not a valid canon of inductive criticism, which he constantly employs. From the fact that we can form no conception of infinity, as we picture an object or recall a scene, it does not follow that we have no apprehension of the Infinite. We constantly apprehend things of which we can distinctly frame no mental image. Spencer merely contrasts our picturesque with our unpicturable forms of thought, using the former to criticize the latter adversely. The contradictions of his system are those which rest upon his absolute finite with indefinite thought, and disappear when we have in mind a real Infinite of perfection, not a logical Absolute. Spencer's attempt to stop finally at the mere affirmation that the Absolute exists he himself proved to be impossible. He frequently describes the Unknowable as the "Power manifesting itself in phenomena". This physical description is a surrender of his own position and a virtual acceptance of the principle of Theism, that the Absolute is known through, not apart from, its manifestations. If the Absolute can be known as physical power, surely it can be known as Intelligent Personal Power, or taken for each other by Pantheists and Materialists from the days of the Ionians to our own. The Agnostic, therefore, disposes the whole Theistic problem when he substitutes a logical Absolute, defined as "that which excludes all relations outer and inner", for the real. Examination of our experiences, and of our relations with the universe, would show the Absolute essentially excludes the relation of real dependence upon anything else. We have no right in reason to define it as the non-related. In fact, it manifests itself as the causal, sustaining ground of all relations. Whether our knowledge of this real Absolute is or is not, the question is bound up with the Infinite. God, that is to say, is wholly negative, is consequently a distinct problem (see VI).
Religion must know its object to some extent or be mere irrational emotion. All religion recognizes mystery; truth and reality imperfectly known, not wholly unknowable. The distinction of “knowable phenomena from unknowable reality behind phenomena” breaks down at every turn; and Spencer well illustrates how easy it is to mistake simplified thought for the original mystery. His category of the Unknowable is a convenient receptacle for anything one may choose to put into it, because no rational statement concerning its contents is possible. In fact, Spencer calmly affirms the identity of the two “unknowables” of Religion and Science, without appearing to realize that neither in the one nor in the other has any foundation for this most dogmatic of statements.

VI. THE POWER TO KNOW.—The primary fact disclosed in our sense-knowledge is that an external object exists, not that a sensation has been experienced. What we directly perceive is the presence of the object, not the mental process. This vital union of subject and object in the very act of knowledge implies that things and minds are harmoniously related to each other in a system of reality. The real is involved in our acts of perception, and any theory which fails to take this fact into account disobeys the data of direct experience. Throughout the whole process of our knowing, the mind has reality, fundamentally at least, for its object. The second fact of our knowledge is that things are known according to the nature of the knower. We can know the real object, but the extent of this knowledge will depend on the number and degree of manifestations, as on the actual conditions of our mental and bodily powers. Whatever be the results reached by psychologists or by physicists in their study of the genesis of knowledge or the nature of reality, there can be no doubt of the testimony of consciousness, to the existence of a reality “not ourselves”. Knowledge is, therefore, proportioned to the manifestations of the object and to the nature and conditions of the knowing subject. Our power to know God is no exception to this general law, the non-observance of which is the weakness of Agnosticism in the face of theism. The pivotal assumption in agnostic systems generally is that we can know the existence of a thing and still remain in complete ignorance of its nature. The process of our knowing is contrasted with the object supposedly known. The result of this contrast is to make knowledge appear not as reporting, but as transcendent and detached from its object; and this detachment is what we have qualitatively different from the knowledge we have of it, and, therefore, intrinsically unknowable. This assumption begs the whole question. No valid reason exists for regarding the physical stimulus of sensation as “reality pure and simple”, or as the ultimate object of knowledge. To conceive of knowledge as altering its object is to make it meaningless, and to contradict the testimony of consciousness. We cannot, therefore, know the existence of a thing and remain in complete ignorance of its nature.

The problem of God’s knowability raises four more or less distinct questions: existence, nature, possibility of knowledge, possibility of definition. In treating these, the Agnostic separates the first two, which he should combine, and combines the last two, which he should separate. The first two questions, while distinct, are inseparable in treatment, because we have no direct insight into the nature of anything, and must content to study the nature of God through the indirect manifestations He makes of Himself in creatures. The Agnostic, by treating the question of God’s nature apart from the question of God’s existence, cute himself off from the only possible natural means of knowing, and then turns about to convert his fault of method into a philosophy of the Unknowable. It is only by studying the Absolute and the manifestations together that we can round out and fill in the concept of the former by means of the latter. The idea of God cannot be analyzed wholly apart from the evidence, or proofs. Determination needs the existence of it to be able to succeed in this instance. Spencer overlooked this fact, which St. Thomas admirably observed in his classic treatment of the problem.

The question of knowing God is not the same as the question of defining Him. The two do not stand or fall together. By the Agnostic’s definition, “liability to define” with “total inability to know,” which are distinct problems to be treated separately, since knowledge may fall short of definition and be knowledge still. Spencer furnishes the typical instance. He admits that inquiry into the nature of things leads inevitably to the concept of Absolute Existence, and here his confusion of knowing with defining compels him to stop. He cannot discover in the isolated concept of the Absolute the three conditions of relation, likeness, and difference, necessary for defining it. He rightly claims that no direct resemblance, no agreement in the possession of some same identities, is factually true of the Absolute and the world of created things. The Absolute cannot be defined or classified, in the sense of being brought into relations of specific or generic agreement with any objects we know or any concepts we frame. This was no discovery of Spencer’s. The Eastern Fathers of the Church, in their so-called negative theology, refused the pretentious knowledge of the Gnostics on this very principle, that the Absolute transcends all our schemes of classification. But Spencer was wrong in neglecting to take into account the considerable amount of positive, though not strictly definable, knowledge contained in the affirmation, which he makes in common with the Theist, that God exists. The Absolute, studied in the light of its manifestations, not in the darkness of isolation, discloses itself to our experience as Originating Source. Between the Manifestations and the Source there exists, therefore, some relationship. It is not a direct resemblance, in any very literal sense. But there is some other kind of resemblance which is wholly indirect, the resemblance of two proportions, or Analogy. The relation of God to His absolute nature must be, proportionally at least, the same as that of creatures to their likeness. However infinite the distance and difference between the two, the relation of the object to the subject is sufficient to make some knowledge of the former possible through the latter, because both are proportionally alike, while infinitely diverse in being and attributes. The Originating Source must precontain, in an infinitely surpassing way, the perfections dimly reflected in the mirror of Nature. Of this, the principle of causality, objectively understood, is ample warrant. Spencer’s three conditions for knowledge—namely, relation, likeness, and difference—are thus verified in another way, with proportional truth for their basis. The conclusions of natural theology cannot, therefore, be excluded from the definable, but only from that of the definable. (See Analogy.)

The process of knowing God thus becomes a process of correcting our human concepts. The correction consists in raising to infinite, unlimited significance the objective perfections discernible in men and things. This is not; finished in turn by the process of limiting modes and imperfect features distinctive of created reality, in order to replace these by the thought of the All-perfect, in the plenitude of whose Being one undivided reality corresponds to our numerous, distinct, partial concepts. In the light of this applied corrective we are enabled to attribute to God the perfections manifested in intelligence, will, power, personality, without making the objective content of our idea of God merely the human magnified, or a bundle of accidental features of our knowlging the very essence of His being. The function of denial, which the Agnostic overlooks, is a corrective, not purely negative, function; and our idea of God, inadequate and solely proportional as it is, is, nevertheless positive, true, and valid according to the claws which govern all our knowing.

VII. THE WILL TO BELIEVE—The Catholic conception of faith is a firm assent, on account of the authority of God, to revealed truths. It presupposes the philosophical truth that a personal God exists who can neither deceive nor be deceived, and the historical truth of the fact of revelation. The two together form a bundle of necessary conditions which complete each other. Faith begins where science ends. Revelation adds a new world of truth to the sum of human knowledge. This new world of truth is a world of mystery, but not of contradiction. The fact that none of the truths which we believe on God's authority and which are contained in the pragmatic method now in vogue be raised to the dignity of a universal philosophy. "The soul with its powers does not form an integral whole divided, or divisible, into non-communicating compartments of intellect and will; it is a potential inter-penetrative whole" (De Philos. Nat., p. 468.) In the solidary interaction of all man's powers, the contributions furnished by will and conscience increase and vivify the meager knowledge of God we are able to acquire by reasoning.

VIII. AGNOSTICISM AND THE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH.—The Agnostic denial of the ability of human reason to know God is directly opposed to Catholic Faith. The Council of the Vatican solemnly declares that "God, the beginning and end of all, can, by the natural light of human reason, be known with certainty from the works of creation." (Const.
De Fide, II, De Rev.) The intention of the Council was to reassert the historic claim of Christianity to be reasonable, and to condemn Traditionalism together with all views which denied reason the power to know God with certainty. Religion would be deprived of all foundation in reason, the motives of credibility would become worthless, conscience would be severed from reason, and if the power of knowing God with rational certainty were called in question. The declaration of the Council was based primarily on Scripture, not on any of the historic systems of philosophy. The Council simply defined the possibility of man's knowing God with certainty by reason apart from revelation. This possibility of knowing God was not affirmed of any historical individual in particular; the statement was limited to the power of human reason, not extended to the exercise of that power in any given instance of time or person. The definition thus took on the feature of the objective statement: Man can certainly know God by the "work of reason when the latter is rightly developed, even though revelation be "morally" necessary for mankind in the bulk, when the difficulties of reaching a prompt, certain, and correct knowledge of God are taken into account. What conditions were necessary for this right development of reason when much positive education was required to equip the mind for this task of knowing God and some of His attributes with certainty, the Council did not profess to determine. Neither did it undertake to decide whether the function of reason in this case is to derive the idea of God wholly from reflection on the data perceived by sense and reason, like pure scientific truths, until theoretical reason studies
the problem thoroughly. They present distinct motives for the conscience to appreciate actively, not for the speculative reason to contemplate passively. Conscience appreciates the moral value of testimonies, commands their acceptance, and bids the intellect to consider them with attention.

It is wrong, therefore, to liken the function of conscience to that of speculative reason, to apply to the solution of moral and religious questions the methods of the exact sciences, to give to the latter the monopoly of all certitude, and to declare the region beyond science a region of mere blind belief. On the assumption that the knowable and the definable are synonymous terms, the "first principles of thought" are transferred from the category of knowledge to that of belief, but the transfer is arbitrary. It is too much to suppose that we know only what we can explain. The mistake is in making a general philosophy out of a particular method of scientific explanation. This criticism applies to all systematic attempts to divide the mind into opposite hemispheres of intellect and will, to divorce faith completely from knowledge.
Consciousness is one and continuous. Our distinctions are constructed for our purposes and never amount to real separations. The true attitude of the "pragmatic" thought or the certainties of natural knowledge shows that the world of faith is a world of higher reason. Faith is consequently an intellectual assent;
a kind of superadded knowledge distinct from, yet continuous with, the knowledge derived from experience.

In contrast with this conception of faith and reason as distinct is the widespread view which urges their absolute separation. The word knowledge is restricted to the results of the exact sciences; the word belief is extended to all that cannot be thus exactly ascertained. The passive attitude of the man of science, who suspends judgment until the evidence forces his assent, is assumed toward religious truth. The result is that the "will to believe" takes on enormous significance in contrast with the "power to know," and faith sinks to the level of blind belief cut off from all continuity with knowledge.
According to Agnostic philosophy, the collapse of the rationalist, the loss of confidence, and divine grace co-operate in the production of the act of faith, but it is no less true that reason plays an essential part. Faith is an act of intellect and will;
when duly analyzed, it discloses intellectual, moral, and sentimental elements. We are living beings, not pure reasoning machines, and our whole nature cooperates vitally in the acceptance of the divine word.

"Man is a being who thinks all his experience and perforce must think his religious experience."— Sterrett, "The Freedom of Authority" (New York, 1906) p. 56.—Where reason does not enter at all, we have but caprice or enthusiasm. Faith is not a merely subjective thing,不容许 we think, for subconscious will-attitudes alone, nor is distrust of reason one of its marks.

It is also true that the attitude of the believer, as compared with that of the scientific observer, is strongly personal, and interested in the object of belief. But this contrast of personal with impersonunal attitudes affords no justification for regarding belief as wholly blind. It is unfair to generalize these two attitudes into mutually exclusive philosophies. The moral ideal of conscience is different from the cold, impartial ideal of physical science.
Truths which nourish the moral life of the soul, and which are esteemed by those who think in terms of religious, truths, until theoretical reason studies
the problem thoroughly. They present distinct motives Aristotle, had the preference; but the latter view, that of Plato, was not condemned. God's indirect manifestations of Himself in the mirror of nature, in the created world of things and persons, were simply declared to be true sources of knowledge distinct from revelation.

— From the time of Amalarius (c. 820) onwards we find frequent mention of the use of Agnostus. At a later period they were often sent by the Popes as presents to sovereigns and distin- guished personages. A famous letter in verse accom- panied the Agnosus Dei despatched by Urban V to the Emperor John Paleologus in 1366. In the penal laws of Queen Elizabeth Agnosus Dei are fre- quently mentioned among other "popish trum- phans," the importation of which into England was rigorously forbidden.

— Blessing and Distribution.—We learn from an "Ordo Romanum" printed by Muratorii ("Lit. Rom.," II, p. 1,004) that in the ninth century the Arch- descon Raedachn manufactured the Agnosus Dei early on Holy Saturday morning out of clean wax mingled with a little chirm, and that they were distributed by him to the people on the Saturday following (Sabato in Alba). At a later date the Pope himself generally assisted at both the blessing and the distribution. The great decree of Agnosus Dei took place only in the first year of each pontificate and every seventh year after that. While the use of wax is now prepared beforehand by certain monks, and without the use of chirm. On the Wednesday of Easter week these discs are brought to the Pope, who dips them into a vessel of water mixed with chirm and balsam, adding various con- secratory prayers. The distribution takes place with solemnity on the Saturday following, when the Pope, after the "Agnos Dei" of the Mass, puts a packet of Agnosus Dei into the inverted mitre of each cardinal and bishop who comes up to receive them.

— Symbolism and Use.—The symbolism of the Agnosus Dei is a subject of repeated seasons, and at various epochs in blessing them. As in the pascal candle, the wax typifies the virgin flesh of Christ, the cross associated with the lamb suggests the idea of a victim offered in sacrifice, and as the blood of the pascal lamb of old protected each household from the destroying angel, so the purpose of these consecrated medallions is to protect those who wear or possess them from all malign influences. In the prayers of blessing, special mention is made of the perils from storm and pestilence, from fire and flood, and also of the dangers to which women are exposed in childbirth. It was formerly the custom in Rome to accompany the gift of an Agnosus Dei with a printed leaflet describing its many virtues. Miraculous ef- fects have been believed to follow the use of these objects of piety. Fires are said to have been ex- tinguished, and floods stayed. The manufacture of counterfeits, and even the painting and ornamentation of genuine Agnosus Dei, has been strictly prohibited by various papal bulls.

— Martyrs' Past.—There are also Agnosus Dei of a grey colour, made from wax mingled with the dust which is believed to be that of the bones of martyrs. These, which are called "Paste de SS. Martini," are held to need no special consecration and are treated as relics.

HERBERT THURSTON.

AGNUS DEI (IN LITURGY), a name given to the formula recited thrice by the priest at Mass (except on Good Friday and Holy Saturday) in the Roman rite. It occurs towards the end of the Canon, after the prayer "Hec commixtio", etc. Having finished saying this prayer, the priest covers the chalice with the pall, genuflects, rises, inclines his head (but not his body) profoundly towards the altar and, with hands joined before his breast (and not, therefore, resting on the altar), says with a loud voice: "Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis." (Lamb of God, Who takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us), repeats the formula unchanged, and still a third time, substituting now "dona nobis pacem" (grant us peace) for "miserere nobis"; meanwhile striking his breast thrice, once at each repetition. With "dona nobis pacem", the right hand (the right hand resting throughout, from the first "miserere", on the altar). In Requiem Masses, however, the formula occurs at the same part of the rite, but with the substitution of "dona ei requiem" (grant him rest) for "miserere nobis", and of "dona eis requiem" (grant eternal rest) for "dona nobis pacem". In this case, the priest does not strike his breast, but keeps his hands joined before his breast throughout the whole formula. These rubrical details are given here for the reason that both the formula and the ceremonial accompanying it have undergone various changes in different ages and different places. Into the symbolic reasons for the present practice it is not necessary to enter here.

Slightly changed in respect of one word, peccata for peccatum (peccatum, however, appearing in other sources, such as the Missal of Stowe and other English MSS., and in the Bangor Antiphonary), the formula appears to have been directly taken from the very ancient chant of the "Gloria in excelsis." In the text of the Roman and Ambrosian rites: "Agnus Dei, Filius Patris, Quis tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis; Qui tollis peccata mundi, suscite depopulationem. Qui sit in pace Patris, miserere nobis", containing all the words of the original formula of the Agnus Dei, we may find the immediate source of its text. Its remoter source was the declaration of the Baptist: "Ecce Agnus Dei, ecce Qui tollit peccatum mundi" (John, i, 29), supplemented by the cry of the two blind men (Matt. ix, 27): "Miserere nostri, fili David." The scriptural origin of the formula is therefore evident at a glance. Its symbolism, however, is traced in the Apocalypse through the more than thirty references to the "Lamb that was slain" from the beginning of the world (xxxii, 8); "the blood of the Lamb" (xii, 11); "the Lamb who was in the bosom of life" (xxi, 27); and in the following: v, 6, 8, 12, 13; vi, 1, 16; vii, 9, 10, 14, 17; xiv, 1, 10; xv, 3; xvi, 14; xix, 7; 9, 9, 14, 22, 23, 27; xxii, 1, 3, 14. From the Apocalypse we trace it backward to the First Epistle of St. Peter (i, 19): "the precious blood of Christ who shed it to take away our sins." This is followed by the perplexed reading of the eunuch of Queen Candace (Acts, viii, 32, 33): "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb without voice before his shearer, so openeth he not his mouth ..." and thus finally to the great Messianic chapter of Isaiah (chapter 53), which foretells the sacrifice: "I will bereave, of whom dost the prophet speak this? of himself, or of some other man? Then Philip, opening his mouth and be-

It has been decided that the Lamb, the Son of the Father, who takes the sins of the world, must be sacrificed for the life and salvation of the world. The formula is thus said but once. At about the same part of the Mass in the present Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, the priest divides the Holy Bread into four parts, "with care and reverence (in the language of the rubric) and says: "The Lamb is broken and not divided in sunder; ever eaten and never consumed, but sanctifying the communicants." (Neale, History of the Holy Eastern Church, Introduction, 650). These words are absent, however, from the ancient Mass of the Saint (ninth century). In the Church of Prothesis for the Mass of Christmas, with the preparation of the "Holy Bread," or "Holy Lamb", as it is called) now in use, the prophecy of Isaías is more minutely referred to in the Agnus, qui tollis peccata mundi.
Sordida mundus, cuncta facundas, Agnus odoris,
Dona nobis pacem.

The Cardinal does not mention the date of his source; but the poem is given by Blume and Bannister in their "Tropi Graduales" [Analecta Hymnica (Leipzig, 1905), XLVII, 398], with several dated MS. references. This splendid collection contains no fewer than ninety-seven tropes of the Agnus Dei alone. The following trope of the tenth century will illustrate another form, of which there are many examples, in classical hexameter:...

Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi.
1. Omnipotens, aeterna Dei sapientia, Christe, misericordiae nobis, Agnus Dei . . . peccata mundi,
2. Verum subsistens vero de lumine lumen, misericordiae nobis. Agnus Dei . . . peccata mundi,
3. Omnipotens, aeterna Dei sapientia, Christe, optimus perpetus concedens gaudia vitae,
dona nobis pacem.

Sometimes the tropes were not in measure, whether classical or accentual, but merely in a rude kind of rhymed, or rather, assonantal prose; as the following (tenth century), which has the triple "misericordiae nobis" instead of "dona . . ." etc.:

1. Agnus Dei . . . peccata mundi, Omnipotens, pie,
te precor, miserere nobis,
2. Agnus Dei . . . peccata mundi,
Qui cuncta creasti, Nobis semper (te) adiungeo,
miserere nobis.
3. Agnus Dei . . . peccata mundi,
Redemptor, Christe, Exoramus te suplicibus,
miserere nobis.

Sometimes they were very brief, sometimes extensive, as the following (of which space will allow but one strophe) of the thirteenth century:

1. Agnus Dei, Sine peccati macula
salus permanens, cuncta per secula,
praemunimus, qui tollis peccata mundi;
Hec enim gloria soli Domino est congrua;
miserere nobis.

Two other uses of the Agnus Dei may be mentioned briefly. First, before giving Holy Communion, whether during or outside of Mass, the priest holds a particle up for the faithful to see, saying: "Ecce Agnus Dei, ecce qui tollit peccata mundi. Domine non sum dignus", etc. The use of the formula in this connection appears to be of comparatively recent date. Anciently the formula used was simply "Corpus Christi", "Sanguis Christi", to which the faithful answered "Amen" and a formula similar to that in the Liturgy of St. Mark: "This Holy Body", "The precious Blood of Our Lord and God and Saviour". Secondly, at the end of litanies the formula appears as follows: "Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, Parce nobis, Domine" (Spare us, O Lord). "Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, Exaudi nos, Domine" (Graciously hear us, O Lord). "Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis" (Have mercy on us). Thus, for the litanies of the Saints and for that of Loreto. The litanies of the Holy Name of Jesus adds the word Jesu to the last word, and substitutes Jesu for Domine in the previous two endings. In the so-called "Litanias Romana", found in an old MS.
sacramentary of St. Gregory the Great, the formula appears but once, and then the words of the formula used at Mass: "Agnus Dei . . . mundi, miserere nobis". The use of the formula in litanies is of comparatively recent date.

It remains to say a word about the musical settings of the Agnus Dei in the Mass. Originally, of course, the melody was plainsong, doubtless very simple and syllabic at first, and subsequently developed into richer forms. Recent studies in musical paleography have succeeded in reconstructing some of the melodies from oblivion, and in the Vatican "Kyriele" (1905) we find twenty settings substantially reproducing the ancient texts. These melodies range from the simple and straightforward to the elaborate and polyphonic textures, with a strong tendency towards the ornate and complex. The familiar melody of the Requiem Mass Agnus Dei, with its twenty notes to eighteen syllables, will illustrate a purely syllabic chant, and will serve to explain its assignment to days of penitential character, such as the ferial days in Lent and Advent, Ember and Rogation days, and vigils, to which the "Kyriele" nominally assigns it. With respect to the variety of melody offered in the triple invocation, we find six masses (Nos. I, V, VI, XVIII, XIX, XX) in which the melody remains the same for all three invocations—a form which might be indicated as $a$, $a$, $a$; twelve masses in which the melody of the first and third Agnus Dei are identical, but the second different—$a$, $b$, $a$; one mass in which the first two are identical, while the third varies—$a$, $a$, $b$; and one mass in which all three are different (No. VIII)—$a$, $b$, $c$. In type $a$, $b$, $a$, however, many correspondences of melody between $a$ and $b$ are found. But in the other two groupings, $b$, $c$, the melody of "nobis" is common to all three.

In all this we can perceive the operation of excellent ideas of symmetry and form amid great variety of melody. The plainsong melodies of the Agnus Dei (as, indeed, of other chants as well, the Kyriele in particular) show a remarkable simplicity of form, while the more melismatic chants of the Proper of the Mass will, under enlightened analysis, yield surprisingly beautiful results) are illustrations of the fact that the ancient composers, although working under very different conceptions of music from those which obtain in our days, had clear perceptions of the province of form and proportion. In the exposition of the principles of construction and criticism which we have not as yet, in all likelihood, fully appreciated (Wagner, "Einführung in die Gregorianischen Melodien" (Freiburg, Schweiz, 1895), 247—250, and also, in the Philadelphia quarterly, "Church Music", June, 1906, 362—390), two articles on the Intertines: "Gaudamus omnes in Domino", and March, 1906, 222—232, the article on the "Hae die"

The text of the Agnus Dei, triple in repetition, and, therefore, possessing its own rights of textual symmetry, was respected by the medieval composers; and in this respect, distinguished their forms of treatment from those of the modern composers of modern church music, the absence of any separate treatment of the "Agnus . . . mundi", that grand finale movement in which the moderns have been so accustomed to assemble all their energies of technique, voices, and instruments, and to which they assign a movement entirely different from the preceding one. Familiar examples of this are found in Bach's great Mass in B—minor, where the first two Agnus Deis are solo solos, followed by the "Dona" in four-part fugue. Significant of the musical and liturgical aloofness of the "Dona" from the Agnus Dei in this composition, is the fact that no third Agnus Dei occurs in the movement Mass in D, solo and chorus sing the "Agnus . . . nobis" thrice adagio, the "Dona" forming a new movement in allegretto vivace and requiring more than three times as many pages as the thrice-repeated "Agnus"; so, too, in his Mass in C, the three Agnus Dei are separated by pages as the whole preceding text in poco andante. So, too, Haydn's "Third" ("Dona"), allegro vivace, twice as many pages as all the rest adagio; his "First" ("Agnus", adagio, strings only—"Dona"), allegro, oboe, trumpet, tympani, and strings; his "Sixth" ("Agnus", adagio, "Dona", allegro con spirito, 2); his "Sixteenth", ("Agnus", adagio, 2—"Dona", allegro, 2, strings, clarinets, trumpets, tympani, and organ). Illustrations might be multiplied without number from other masses, of Mozart, Schubert, and the rest. A very interesting exception is found in the masses of Gounod (quite naturally, as he was a Frenchman), who respects the triple symmetry of the text; and we find in his "Agnus" almost the primitive plainsong symphony. Thus, his second mass of the "Orphéonistes" gives us the type $a$, $a$, $b$; his first of the Orphéonistes, the type $a$, $b$, $c$ (agreeing, curiously enough, with the single illustration of that type in the "Kyriele", in having for the two "nobis" and the "dona" the same musical formula); his "Sacred Heart Mass", the type (with slight variations) $a$, $b$, $a$; his "St. Cecilia" (omitting the interpolation of the "Dome non sum dignus", etc.), the type $a$, $a$, $a$ (with slight variation); Gounod's interpolation of "Dome non sum dignus" has been very severely criticized as a great liturgical offence—and so it is; but it is additionally interesting to note, even here, an echo of the medieval custom of an interrupted text; it was also singularly appropriate to the portion of the Mass then reached, namely, the Communion of priest or of people. Of the quasi-dramatic treatments which the Agnus Dei has received in modern times, it is not worth while to speak (e.g. Haydn's Mass in F major, Beethoven's in D, with the roll of drums accentuating the blessings of peace in contrast with the horrors of war), or of the treatments which have thoroughly disfigured, by omissions, insertions, and additions of words, the beauty of the liturgical text; it has so interfered with the words as to make them meaningless (e.g. Piatkowsky's "Mass in F:"—to select from the lesser order, which indiscriminately assigns to each of the "Agnus . . . mundi" a confused jumble of "misere" and "dona"—a conceit, the symbolism of which is not clearly intelligible). In general, these liturgical excesses resulted from the dramatic instinct in the field of sacred music.

Agnostic (Gr. ἄγωστος—struggle), one of the names given by the Donatists to those of their followers who went through cities and villages to disseminate the doctrine of the Donatists. Before the year 317 (Tillmont, Mémo., VI, 96), the Donatists claimed that they were champions of Christ, fighting with the sword of Israel. Their war-cry was "Lauda Deo (Praises to God). They committed many barbarous acts and deeds of violence. Whether they called themselves "fighters" (Agonistic) because they fought the battles of the Lord, or because they were forced to fight those who sought their property against their invasions, is not clear. The Catholics styled the Agonistic, "Circumcellions," i. e., the Christian curators, because they revolved about among the peasants, living on those they sought to indoctrinate.

Agony of Christ (from ἁγωνία, a struggle; particularly, in profane literature, the physical struggle of athletes in the arena, or the mental excitement previous to the conflict).—The word is used only once in Sacred Scripture (Luke xxii. 44) to designate the anguish of Our Lord in the Garden of Gethsemani. The incident is narrated also in St. Matthew (xxvi. 36-46) and St. Mark (xiv. 32-42); but it is remarkable that only St. Luke mentions the details of the sweat of blood and the visitation of the angel. The authenticity of the verses narrating these details (43-44) has been called in question, because of their absence, not only from the text of the other synoptists, but even from that of St. Luke in several of the ancient codices (notably 1/16—the revised Sinaiticus—A., B., et al.). The presence of the verses, however, in the majority of the MSS., both uncial and minuscule, and in the same order as the passages retained in the critical editions of the New Testament. Their acceptance by such scholars as Tischendorf, Hammond, and Scrivener seems to place the question of their authenticity beyond controversy. The "sweat of blood" is understood literally by almost all Catholic exegetes; and medical testimony has been alleged in evidence of the fact that such a phenomenon (haematodrosis), though rare and abnormal, is neither impossible nor preternatural.

Agostini, PAOLO, b. at Vallerano in 1593; d. 1629, famous composer and pupil of the celebrated Nanini, whose son-in-law he became. Taking for models his predecessors of the Venetian and Roman school, he studied in a particular manner the art of composing for a number of simultaneous choirs, and so gained the highest esteem of his contemporaries. On one occasion, after assisting at a mass of his for forty-eight voices, Pope Urban VIII expressed his highest admiration for the composition. Manuscript copies of his works are to be found in the Vatican Archives, and in the Cornisi Library. The only ones printed were two volumes of Psalms (Rome, 1619); two volumes of Magnificat (ib., 1620), and five volumes of masses, for four to twelve voices (ib., 1624-28). He succeeded Ugolini as maestro at the Vatican Chapel in 1627. His compositions were distinguished by elegance and ingenuity, but he could rise to lofty flights of genius, as in an Agnus Dei reprinted by P. Martini in his "Saggio di Compostramento."

Agostino Novello, BLESSED (MATTEO DI TERMINI), b. in the first half of the thirteenth century, at Termini, a village of Sicily, from which he derived his surname. As that village belonged to the Archdiocese of Palermo, he is sometimes called "di Palermo Molitano;" the Breviary says of him quem Thermense et Panormitani cives suum esse dicit. On entering religion he changed his name to Agostino, and later was given the additional name of Novello, a title suggested by his great learning and virtue. His parents, of a noble family originally from Catalonian Spain, educated him most carefully and had him instructed in all the then known sciences, first at home and afterwards in the city of Bologna, where he carried off high honours, especially in civil and canon law. Returning to his native land, he held many positions of honour in the magistracy, fulfilling all the duties of these posts with such prudence and exactitude that the King of Sicily, Manfred, made him one of his counsellors. In this capacity he accompanied the King in the war against Charles of Anjou, who disputed Manfred's right to the crown of Sicily, and in the battle in which Manfred was killed and his army routed, Agostino, thought to be dead, was left in the battlefield among the bodies of other soldiers. Regaining consciousness, he was able to reach his home, and, disillusioned with the world, and the lightness and evanescence of all earthly glory, he determined henceforth to serve the King of kings, Jesus Christ, and forsake all worldly honours and dignities. Following this special inspiration of Heaven, he asked admission as a laybrother into the Order of St. Augustine, and was received in a convent in Tuscany, where he could live unknown to the world, far from his home and his people. Here, devoted to exercises of piety, he lived quietly until a certain one occasioned him once more before the world. The title to some property belonging to the convent was claimed by a rich and learned lawyer of Sienna, Giacomo Pallares. Agostino, in a written document, defended the rights of his brethren. Pallares, who at once perceived that the humble habit of a poor learned jurist, asked to see him, and to his astonishment recognized his former fellow-student of the University of Bologna, Matteo di Termini. He lost no time in acquainting the ecclesiastical authorities with his identity, begging them to keep no longer in obscurity such a wealth of learning. When Clement XI, General of the Order, heard of this, he compelled Agostino, under obedience, to receive Holy Orders, and, moreover, appointed him one of his associates. Agostino reformed the Constitutions and brought much splendour on his Order, of which he became General, a charge which he finally resigned to live in retirement, giving all his time to study, prayer, and penance, whereby he reached a high degree of perfection. Before he was made General, Nicholas IV appointed him his confessor and Grand Penitentiary, a charge which he accepted only under obedience, and with such manifest reluctance that so many protested against his ordination that the Pope and the cardinals were visibly affected. In his retreat in the convent of San Leonardo, near Sienna, he not only dedicated himself to the practice of the virtues proper to the religious state, which he carried to an heroic degree, but, impelled by an ardent and almost consuming charity, he began collecting alms and was able to enlarge and practically rebuild an excellent orphanage and hospital for the sick and aged who had neither means to care for themselves during sickness, nor a place in which to pass their last days. Many of the miracles wrought through the intercession of Blessed Agostino were verified and authenticated. Clement XI, who had beatified him, and Clement XIV authorized his cult on 23 July, 1770.

Agout, CHARLES CONSTANCE CÉSAR JOSEPH MATTHIEU d', a French prelate, b. at Grenoble, 1747; d. at Paris, 1824. He studied at the Seminary of St. Sulpice, at Paris, where he became a priest in 1778. During the French Revolution he emigrated, but returned to France in 1801, after having surrendered his bishopric. He wrote: "Projet d'une banque nationale" (Paris, 1815); "Eclaircissement sur le projet d'une banque nationale" (Paris, 1816); "Lettre à un Jacobin, ou réflexions politiques sur la constitution d'Angleterre et la charte royale" (Paris, AGRA, THE ARCHEDIOCESE OF, is situated in British India and lies between 25° 30' and 32° N. lat., and 75° and 81° E. long. The area in square miles is 91,843. The population, according to the last census, is 28,088,964. The predominant religion of India when missions were first introduced was Mohammedanism. The primitive religion is Hinduism. The bulk of the population then, as now, belonged to this sect. The Archdiocese of Agra is an outcome of the Tibetan Mission, which was the first regularly established in this part of India. Pellegrino da Forli in 1779, and the Capuchins del Sacro Cuore in 1788, established an establishment at the court of the Mughal Empire. S. Ignatius Loyola, O. C. S., on his way to Lahore, in 1794, stayed in the Jesuit establishment at Agra. "Since 1793 the Societas Missionariae in Agra, in the heart of the Punjab, has been the centre of the missionary apostolate for ten years under the Prefect John Francis a Camerino (Bull. Ordin. F. Min. Cap. S. Francisci, t. VII, 250). From 1704 to 1808 thirty bands of missionaries, varying in number from two or three to eleven or twelve, were sent out. Owing to the unsettled condition of Europe, none went beyond 1808 to 1823, to re-enforce these. Ludovic Micaia, a Capuchin of Frascati, was consecrated Bishop on 14 April, 1820, and appointed Vicar-Apostolic of the Tibetan-Hindustan Mission. But circumstances prevented his leaving Europe, where he died, Cardinal Bishop of Frascati. The Right Rev. Zenobius Benucci, O. C. S., Bishop of Herma, was appointed Vicar-Apostolic of Agra, and died at Agra, 23 June, 1824. From then up to 1856 there was a regular succession of vicars-apostolic of Agra. Pope Leo XIII, by the Bull "Humane Salutis Auctore", 1 September, 1886, constituted and erected the Catholic hierarchy of India, and converted the vicariate apostolic of Agra into a metropolitan see. The Mission of Tibet had been productive of good results, and after two centuries (1703–1906) it has expanded into a metropolitan province. The suffragans of the Archbishop of Agra are the Bishops of Allahabad and Lahore, and the Prefect Apostolic of Rajputana, Bettiah and Nepal, Kafiristan and Kashmir. The Metropolitan, with his suffragans, rules over a country comprised in the following political divisions of India: The United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, the Central India Agency, the Punjab, the North-West Frontier Province, Kashmir, and portions of Bengal and the Central Provinces. The Begum Sunroo, who ruled over Sardhana as a vassal of Delhi, was a convert from Mohammedanism. With this princess the fathers of the Tibetan Mission found a home. She obtained from the Holy See the permission of Father Giulio Cesare, one of the members of the Mission, to the episcopal dignity. His Holiness Pope Gregory XVI wrote to her, and sent her tokens of his paternal approbation. This gifted and great woman caused Catholicism to be respected even amidst the decay of the great Mogul empire. She bequeathed to her posterity not only an example of regal munificence in her many charitable endowments, but also a holy heritage in the colony of Christians that survive to this day in her beloved Sardhana. The following list of Bishops of Tibet-Hindustan, with their dates of consecration, is culled from the compilation made by Father Feliciano of the Diocesan library (Cath. Calen. and Directory of the Archdiocese): Rt. Rev. Ludovic Micaia, O. C. S., consecrated 13 April, 1820; Rt. Rev. Zenobius Benucci, O. C. S., 1822; Anthony Pessoni, O. C. S., 1826; Dr. Joseph Angelus Planella, O. C. S., consecrated Bishop of Toposo with right of succession of the Vicar-Apostolic of Agra; Joseph Anthony Borghi, O. C. S., consecrated 1833; O. C. S., 1844; Ignatius Persico, O. C. S., 1854; Angelicus Bedenik, O. C. S., 1861; Michael Angelus Jacobbi, 1868.

Bishop Jacobbi was created first Archbishop of Agra 1 September, 1886, and died at Mussoorie 14 October, 1891. The Most Rev. Dr. Emmanuel Charles Gentili, O. C. S., was consecrated Bishop of Allahabad 29 June, 1897, and appointed Archbishop of Agra 27 August, 1898.

The Archdiocese of Agra has a Catholic population of 9,442; regular priests, 38; secular priests, 13; sisters, 228; brothers, 11; parochial schools for boys, 11; for girls, 5; colleges for boys, 2; for girls, 1; convents, 6; orphanages for boys, 3; for girls, 4; orphanages for girls, 5, inmates 403; for boys, 3; inmates 459; preparatory seminary for native priests, 1.

AGRAM (Zagrabia), also ZAGRA, archiepiscopal see of the ancient kingdom of Croatia, in Austria, founded towards the end of the eleventh century as a suffragan of Kalocsa in Hungary, and made an archiepiscopal see in 1832. Its Latin Catholic population is 1,319,267; there are 1,877 Greek Catholics, 118,304 Greek Schismatics, 9,573 Protestants, and 11,929 Jews; besides a few Mohammedans. Agram has 348 parishes, served by 615 secular and 66 regular priests. The episcopal city (20,000) is pleasantly located in a broad plain, near the Save, and is surrounded to the north and west by vineyards and hills. The cathedral residence of the archbishop and the medieval Gothic cathedral, with its sacristy (itself a church), are remarkable monuments. There are three suffragan sees: Bosnia-Sirmia (with residence at Dukovar), Senj (Zengg, Segna), and Krk (Körös, Kris, Kreute). The vernacular of the people is the Croatian tongue. Agram possesses a university for the southern Slavs, opened in 1874, owing chiefly to the endeavours and sacrifices of Bishop Strossmayer of Dukovar. There are also an archiepiscopal seminary and a college for boys, besides a Greek Catholic seminary and gymnasium. Among the ecclesiastical institutes of Agram is the "Conservatorio Rurale" for the cult of the rural country, a fund of about one million dollars (1852), the interest of which is devoted to the support of establishments of charity and beneficience.

THOMAS J. SHAHAN.

Agrapha, a name first used, in 1776, by J. G. Körner, for the Sayings of Jesus that have come down to us outside the canonical Gospels. After Alfred Rensch had chosen the expression, as the title for his learned work on these Sayings (1880), its technical meaning was generally accepted. We shall consider, first, the limits of the Agrapha; secondly, the sources; thirdly, the list of those that are probably authentic.

LIMITS.—The Agrapha must satisfy three conditions: they must be Sayings, not discourses; they must be Sayings of Jesus; they must not be contained in the canonical Gospels. (a) Being mere Sayings, and not discourses, the Agrapha do not embrace the lengthy sections known as the "Synagogal" and the "Discourses." These works contain also a few quotations of alleged words of Jesus, though they have to be excluded from the Sayings for other reasons. Such seems to be the saying in "Didasc. Syr." II, 8 (ed. Lagarde, p. 14): "A man is unapproved, if he be untempered." (5) Being Sayings of Jesus, the Agrapha do not embrace: (1) The Sayings contained in religious romances, such as we find in the apocryphal Gospels, the apocryphal Acts, or the Letter of Christ to Abgarus (Eus. Hist. Eccl., I, 13). (2) Scripture passages ascribed to Jesus by a mere oversight. Thus "Didasc. Apost. Syr." (ed. Lagarde, p. 11, line 12) assigns to the Lord the words of Prov., xv, 1 (Sept.), "Wrath destroy eth even wise men." (3) The expressions attributed to Jesus by the mistake of the evangelists. The Epistles of Barnabas, iv, 9, reads: "As the son of God says, Let us resist all iniquity, and hold it in hatred." But this is merely a rendering of a mistake of the Latin scribe who wrote "sicut dicit filius Dei," instead of "sicut desit filios Dei," the true rendering of the Greek "μη δει οἱ υἱοί σου τα λάθη των." (4) The Sayings attributed to Jesus by mere conjecture. Reisch has put forth the conjecture that the words of Clem. Alex. Strom. I, 8, 41, "These are they who ply their looms and weave nothing, saith the Scripture," refer to a Saying of Jesus, though there is no solid foundation for the belief. (5) Copies of things outside the canonical Gospels, the Agrapha do not comprise: (1) Mere parallel forms, or amplifications, or, again, combinations of Sayings contained in the canonical Gospels. Thus we find a combination of Matt., vi, 19; x, 9; Luke, xii, 33, in Ephr. Syr. Test. (opp. Greece, ed. Assemani, I, 232): "For I heard the Good Teacher in the divine gospels saying to his disciples, Get you nothing on earth." (2) Homiletical paragraphs of Jesus, thoughts given by ancient writers. Thus Hippolytus (Demonstr. adv. Judaeos, VII) paraphrases Ps. lxviii (lxxi), 26: "Whence he saith, Let their temple, Father, be desolate." CRITERIA OF GENUINENESS.—The genuineness of the Agrapha may be inferred partly from external and partly from internal evidence. (a) External Evidence.—First determine the independent source or sources by which any Saying in question has been preserved, and then see whether the earliest authority for the Saying is of such date and character that it might reasonably have had access to extra-canonical tradition. For Papias and Justin Martyr such access may be admitted, but hardly for a writer of the fourth century. These are extreme cases; the main difficulty is concerned with the intermediate writers. Internal Evidence is always the test; if the Saying under consideration is consistent with the thought and spirit of Jesus as manifested in the canonical gospels. If a negative conclusion be reached in this investigation, the proof must be completed by finding a fair explanation of the rise of the Saying. LIST OF AUTHENTIC AGRAPHA.—The sources from which the authentic Agrapha may be gathered are: (a) the New Testament and the New Testament manuscripts; (b) the Apocryphal tradition; (c) the patristic citations; and (d) the so-called "Oxyrhynchus Logia." Agrapha derived from Mohammedan sources may be curious, but they are hardly authentic. Since the criticism of the Agrapha is in most cases difficult, and often unsatisfactory, frequent disagreement in the critical results must be expected as a matter of course. The following Agrapha are probably genuine sayings of Jesus: (a) In the New Testament and the New Testament manuscripts: In Codices D and Φ, and in some versions of Matt., xx, 28, "But ye seek from the small to increase, and from the greater to be less." In Codex D of Luke, vi, 4: "On the same day, seeing one working on the Sabbath, he said to him: Man, if thou knowest what thou dost, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the Law." In Acts, xx, 35, "Remember the word of the Lord Jesus, how he said: It is a more blessed thing to give, rather than to receive." (b) In apocryphal tradition: In the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Jerome, Ezech., xviii, 7): "In the Gospel which the Hebrews call the Law, to read, that according to the Hebrews, there is put among the greatest crimes he who shall have grieved the spirit of his brother." In the same Gospel (Jerome, Ezech., iii, 3 sq.): "In the Hebrew Gospel too we read of the Lord saying to the disciples: And never, said the Lord, do ye cease when you have hallowed him, nor your brother in love." In Apostolic Church-Order, 26: "For he said to us before, when he was teaching: That which is weak shall be saved through that which is strong." In "Acta Philippi", 34: "For the Lord said to me: Except ye make the lower into the upper and the left into the right, ye shall not enter into my kingdom." (c) In patristic citations: Justin Martyr, Dial. 47: "Wherefore also our Lord Jesus Christ said, In whatsoever things I prepare you, in those I shall judge you." Clement of Alexandria, Strom. I, 24, 158: "And ask, said he, for the greatest things, that other shall be added to you." Clement of Alexandria, Strom. I, 28, 177: "Rightly therefore the Scripture also in its desire to make us such dialecticians, exhorts us: Be approved moneychangers, disapproving some things, but holding fast that which is good." Clement of Alexandria, Strom. V, 10, 84: "For not grudgingly, he saith, did the Lord declare in a certain gospel: My mystery is for me and for the sons of my house." Origen, Homil. in Jer., XX, 3: "But the Saviour himself saith: He who is near me is near the fire; he who is far from me, is far from the kingdom." (d) In the Oxyrhynchus Logia: The first Logion is part of Luke, vi, 42; of the fourth, only the word "poverty" is left; the eighth, too, is badly mutilated. The text of the other Logia is in a more satisfactory condition. Second Logion: "Jesus saith, Except you fast to the world, you shall not in wise find the kingdom of God." Third Logion: "Jesus saith, I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I thirsting among them, and my soul grieved over the sons of men, because they are blind in their heart, and see not." Fifth Logion: "Jesus saith, Wherever there are two, they are not without me, and where the Logion is read, the reader shall find me; cleave the wood, and there am I." Sixth Logion: "Jesus saith, A prophet is not acceptable in his own country, neither doth a physician work cures upon them that know him." Seventh Logion: "Jesus saith, A city judged upon the top of a hill and established can neither fall nor be hid." Eighth Logion: "Jesus saith, Thou hearest with one ear ..." Reisch's contention that seventy-five Agrapha are probably genuine Sayings of Jesus harmonizes with the assumption that all spring from the same source in the New Testament and does not commend itself to the judgment of other scholars.
ments intended to benefit the poorer classes of society by dealing in some way with the ownership of land and obligations. In modern German, indeed, the prefix Agrar is used to mean rural or agricultural, and a German political party, roughly corresponding to the former "country party," or "landed interest" in England, is called die Agrarpartei, often translated as the Agrarians, though unlike the stricter use of the agrarianism given above. Keeping to that stricter use of the term, we can distinguish two social movements running through history, one being agrarian reform, the other agrarian revolution. The border line is indeed obscure, but the difference, as of night and day, fundamental.

Let us look first at the movements of agrarian reform. Conspicuous is the case of the Hebrew Prophets. How far the land organization of the Mosaic Law was ever in full working order is disputed, probably unascertainable. What can be ascertained is the growth, pari passu with the growth of wealth and commerce under the kings, of ill-treatment of the Hebrew peasantry, mainly by over-taxation to pay for a luxurious court, by corn-jobbery and monopoly, and by usurious loans, which made the peasant a debtor-slave or totally dispossessed. Him and we see lawless dispossession: witness the frequent complaints of the commander of the garrison in the time of the exiles. Hecond, and the case of Naboth's vineyard. Against this oppression the Prophets protested so vigorously that by some moderns they have been taken to be Socialists. But they were eminently social reformers, not revolutionists. They incited to no act of human vengeance upon evil-doers, nor to revolt against authority, even when it was misused; but they denounced immorality in home life, fraud in commerce, barbarity to debtors, injustice to the poor; and, under the technical conditions of production in antiquity, the main social problem was the preservation of a free peasantry, and the social question primarily an agrarian question, the Prophets appeared as agrarian reformers, with the not impracticable aim that each man should dwell in security under his own vine and his own fig-tree, on his father's inheritance. Their exhortations, in fact, kept before the Israelites a high social ideal; and by realizing law that debtors' children were to be freed every seventh year, and that loans in kind and money should be gratuitous, the growth of the slave-cultivation of Punic, Greek, and Roman civilization was restrained, and Palestine preserved as a land of Jewish peasant proprietors.

In secular history two conspicuous examples of agrarian reform are those of Solon in Attica and of the Gracchi in Italy. The release of debtors-slaves and the removal of unlawful enclosures seem the main features of Solon's economic legislation, of which indeed full trustworthy details are wanting. The character of the Gracchan reform is more accurately known, being mainly to the land reform making the state to be absorbed by latifundia cultivated by slaves. After the advent of Christianity, the two great processes of agrarian reform were: first, the transformation of rural slaves (often working in chains and sleeping in ergastula), into serfs (coloni), attached to the manors, and then, the introduction of the burdens of serfdom, and the transformation of serfs into a free peasantry, from that of England, in the fifteenth century, to that of Russia, in the nineteenth, a gradual movement from restraint to freedom, from feudal immobility to free trade in land, and to unrestricted agricultural improvement, as the checks to usury were withdrawn, as well as those to over-indebtedness, exhaustive cultivation, wholesale evictions of the peasantry, appropriation of vast tracts by individuals or companies, and the opposite evil of subdividing small farms into fragments; and the opening freedom of the rural classes was leading to poverty and oppression, and reckless competition was leading to the waste of national resources. Hence agrarian reform, suited to the new conditions, social and technical, of rural life, became a necessity, and is in process of being carried out.

The following are some examples: (1) Legislation in the United States (1860). Canaan and parts of some other colonial countries, favouring colonization and bond fide agricultural settlers, as against the occupation of vast tracts for pastoral or speculative purposes; (2) analogous laws in older countries favouring the creation of small holdings, allotments, and gardens, like the British of 1882-92 and the creation of Rentengüter in Germany (1890-96); (3) the American Homestead Exemption Laws, spreading since 1849 to most of the States, the maximum value protected from seizure for debt being $5,000 in California; the maximum area 340 acres in Mississippi. The laws have been the subject of various attacks (thus in 1862, the homestead, under the title of le petit frais de famille, is advocated by the Catholics of France; (4) renewed usury laws, notably in 1880, for Germany, and in 1900 for the United Kingdom and parts of British India; (5) establishment of a special peasants' law in Germany (Anerbietenrechts), enabling one son to preserve the small inheritance; special favours by the Belgian law of 1890 to the succession to small holdings; (6) special legislation against eviction and unfair rents, by the Irish Land Laws of 1881 and 1887, and the Scotch Crofters' Holdings Act of 1886. Parallel to such legislation, and its essential auxiliary, has arisen the modern agricultural co-operative movement, resulting in associations like those of the Patrons of Husbandry, the Farmers' Alliance, and others, in the United States, or the Raiffeisen popular banks among German and Italian peasants, or the peasants' league (Boerenbond) of the Netherlands, or the agricultural cooperatives of Ireland. And just as the new agrarian legislation is the expression in modern form of the fundamental needs of rural life, protected at other times by feudal immobility, so the new co-operative movement is the expression of the need of mutual help, protected at other times by the patriarchal family and the village community.

Let us turn from the movements of reform, seen in rural history, to the movements of agrarian revolution. These were conspicuous in the declining days of classical Greece. Hereon Roscher said well: "In the Greek world all that we call tradition, and the feeling of national honour, national destiny, and national justice, had in fact been supplantled by rationalistic argumentation, and the argumentation directed with terrible exclusiveness to the opposition between rich and poor" (Nationalkonomie, § 204). This opposition, in conformity with the technical and legal conditions of the time, took the nature of any rival of land-privatization, but simply of cancelling debts and re-dividing lands, revolution alternating with counter-revolution. In time, the agrarian struggles became mixed up with the national movement for Greek independence against Roman dominion, the Romans everywhere taking the side of creditors and against the debtors in debtors' bankruptcy (see XXXV, xxxiv). These social revolutions are of importance to us as showing some significant analogies with our own times. It is otherwise with the peasant risings of later times such as the French Jacqueries in the fourteenth century; the English insurrection under Jack Cade in the fifteenth; the German Peasants' War in the sixteenth, and the burning of the chateaux of the French Revolution: all being efforts to remove by violence the legal obligations attached to land or its tillers, and, therefore, being revolutionary agrarianism; but all remote from the agrarian problems of the modern Western World, and very different even from those of the modern Russian Empire.

Rather, it will be more profitable, before dealing with the Single-Tax Theory, to glance at the precursors of Henry George. (1) The Physiocrats taught that land alone yielded net produce, thus it was the natural source of tax and rent, and all was made the immediate source, and all simplified by a single tax (impôt unique) on land. (2) Thomas Spence (1750–1814) urged that landowners should be dispossessed without compensation, and all land held inalienably by the commune. (3) William Ogilvie's "Essay on the Right of Property in Land" (1782) denounced the pernicious monopoly of landowners as the cause of social misery, and urged a distribution of land among genuine cultivators of inalienable hereditary small farms. (4) Ricardo (1772–1823) thought land, labour, and capital to be the three factors of production, yields being given to the landowners, interest to the labourer, and profit to the capitalists, the increasing demand for food from the increasing population inevitably giving the landlord an ever-larger share of the total produce, and leaving less for wages and profits. (5) J. S. Mill followed Ricardo in believing that, through the progress of society, an ever-increasing unearned sum flowed into the pockets of the landlords, but no longer, like Ricardo, appealed to the rights of property in defence of it, but emphasized it by giving it the name of "unearned increment"; and though, in view of the frequent recent changes of ownership, he left past acquisitions untouched, he urged that the State should take not the past, but any fresh unearned increment in the future. Then the American Henry George (1839–97) set forth most attractively in his "Progress and Poverty" (1879) the theory that not merely all future, but all actual unearned increment and "rent", both the incomes or parasitic gains which have been made from the land, and the appropriation of rent by taxation, a single tax on land values replacing all other taxes. This "simple yet sovereign remedy" would raise wages and profits, abolish poverty, lessen crime, elevate morals, and purify government. Indeed this single-tax theory appeared to its author so evident that he recommended it for not only England and the Encyclical (Rerum Novarum, 1891), accepted its reasoning (Open Letter to Pope Leo XIII, New York, 1891). "Progress and Poverty" was translated into eleven languages; a Land-Nationalization Society, still existent (1906), was founded, in England, under Dr. A. Russell Wallace (author of "The Land Nationalisation", London, 1882), who indeed allowed to actual landlords what George calls the "impudent plea" of compensation; the single-tax was advocated by Flürscheim in Germany, and, under the persistent misnomer of "land-reform", still has a German Society to support it (Adolf Damaschke, "Die Bodenreform", Berlin, 1902).

Henry George has been criticized from the economic, the juridical, and the socialist standpoint on the following grounds: (a) That "rent", in the sense of an unearned increment, is not confined to land, but is seen in all forms of production, wherever a commodity yields a surplus only to those who can produce more cheaply than their competitors. (b) That we cannot separate the "original powers of the soil from the land as transformed by culture" (e.g. drainage or accessibility), or separate "property in things created by God" from "property in things made by man", much of so-called "rent" being merely interest on previous expenditure, and the part that is really unearned increment rarely ascertainable. (c) That neither theoretically nor historically true is the alleged tendency to a perpetual rise of rent; the amount depending on differential advantages, the difference incessantly fluctuating up and down, according to varying production, consumption, and communication; and the final twenty years of George's life witnessing a serious decline in the value of farming-land in the United Kingdom and in New England. (d) That in one vast section of British India, where for many years the State has been led by periodic land-reforms to absorb the unearned increment and where the single-tax system is in great measure in force, the population is no better off, but rather more penurious, than in the other vast section, where no such system is in force, but the Permanent Settlement of Bengal instead. (e) That a great unmerited "loss is inflicted on those who have recently bought land, or have received land as their part of a testamentary estate, while those who have recently sold land, or have received cash as their part of a testamentary estate, escape scot-free. (f) That if individuals may not take to themselves the land that belongs to them; that the Irish soil thus belongs no more to the Celts than to the Saxons, the United States no more to the Americans than to the Chinese. Further, from the socialist standpoint, that George offers an illogical half measure, recovering for the workers only one portion of the "surplus product", and leaving competitive anarchy and capitalist exploitation untouched; whereas incomes, in the shape of dividends and interest, are just as much "unearned income" as incomes in the shape of rent.

But though there is discord between revolutionary agrarianism and collectivism, they are alike in opposition to the uniform teaching and tradition of the Catholic Church on the lawfulness of private ownership of income-yielding property, whether it be named "land" or "capital". And they are alike in opposition to the ideal of all great statesmen from Solon to Leo XIII, namely, flourishing populations of small farmers, the "united" or "independent" farm being the key to the productive distribution of landed property, asserts the productivity of large farms to be the greatest, the tendency of small farms to disappear, the misery of their holders, the pity of multiplying them (Progress and Poverty, VI, 1). Equally hostile is the brilliant socialist Karl Kautsky, "Die Agrarfrage" (Stuttgart, 1892), assenting in his "B injections of the small farmer; and, instead of his "sham independence", promising him "redemption from the hell wherein his private property keeps him chained". Neither George nor Kautsky are true to facts, but both are good witnesses to the importance of agrarian reform as fatal to agrarian socialism. The misuse of the rights of property, such as the misdeeds of Scotch and Irish landlordism, and of the tenement-owners of Europe and America, are the food that feeds agrarian socialism. To make such misdeeds impossible is the task of social reform under a wise government. Nor is it accidental that the Encyclicals of Leo XIII form a manual of social politics. For as grace rests on nature, the religion that is alone truly Divine, must also ipso facto be truly human. But the instinct of private property is truly human; and the proper unfolding of human liberty and personality is historically bound up with it, and cannot be forced from the serfship where only labor is due to the master, as to a compulsory partnership, or, on the other hand, where property is confined to a privileged few. Suitably, therefore, the same Pope who had defended the true dignity and true liberty of man urged the diffusion of property as the mean between Socialism and In-individualism, and that where possible each citizen should dwell secure in a homestead which, however humble, AGREDAD, MARIA DE (or, according to her conventual title, Maria de Jesus), a descended Franciscan nuns.

1602; d. 24 May, 1655. Her family name was Coronel, but she is commonly known as Maria de Agreda, from the little town in Old Castile, on the borders of Aragon, where some ancestor, it is said, had built a convent in obedience to commands conveyed by a revelation to Luque Fuente, in his "Discursos eclesiásticos de España." The convents in the provinces were a virtuoso y modelo familia de aquel pueblo.
By some writers they are described as noble, but impoverished. Maria is said to have made a vow of chastity at the age of eight, but no importance need be attached to that, as, naturally, she could not have known the character of such an obligation, and we are not compelled to suppose any divine guidance in case the vow was made. She and her mother entered the convent together, January, 1619, and simultaneously her father and two brothers became Franciscan friars. When only twenty-five, in spite of her unwillingness, she was made abbess, by papal dispensation. This was almost eight years after her entrance. With the exception of an interval of three years, she remained superior all her life. Under her administration the convent, which was in a state of decay, rose to great material prosperity, and at the same time became one of the most renowned in Spain. She died with the reputation of a saint; and the cause of her canonization was introduced by the Congregation of Rites, 21 June, 1672, at the request of the Court of Spain. This was only seven years after her death. What has given her prominence, however, is not so much the holiness of her life, about which there seems to be general consent, as the character of one of her writings known as "La historia de la Virgen, Madre de Dios." This "Divine History of the Mother of God" was first conceived in 1627; that is to say, nine years after she became a nun. Ten years later, by the express command of her confessor, she set to work at it, and in twenty days wrote the first part, consisting of 400 pages. Although it was her desire to prevent its publication, a copy of it was sent to Philip IV., to whom she wrote a great number of letters in the course of her life, and who had expressed a desire to have it. Later on, in obedience to the same confrsdor, she threw away and all her other writings, into the fire, without any apparent repugnance. A third command of a spiritual director, in 1655, resulted in her beginning again, and in 1660 she finished the book. It was not, however, given to the world until five years after her death. It was printed in 1703. Its lengthy title contains no less than ninety words. "The Mystical City" purports to be the account of special revelations, which the author declares were made to her by God, Who, after raising her to a state of sublme contemplation, commanded her to write it, and then revealed to her these profound mysteries. In fact, it declares that God chose her as his own instrument to guide her, the number being afterwards increased to eight, who, having purified her, led her into the presence of the Lord. She then beheld the Blessed Virgin, as she is described in the Apocalypse, and saw also all the various stages of her life: how when she came into the world God ordered the angels to transport her into heaven, how she was carried by a hundred spirits from each of the nine choirs to attend her, twelve others in visible and corporeal form to be always near her, and eighteen of the most splendid to be ambassadors perpetually ascending and descending the Ladder of Jacob. In the twentieth chapter she describes that during the nine months the Blessed Virgin during the nine months she was in her mother's womb; and tells how, when she was three years old, she swept the house with the help of the angels. The fifteenth chapter enters into many details, which by some were denounced as indecent. The style, in the opinion of certain critics, is elegant, and the narrative compact. Görres, on the other hand, while expressing his admiration for the wonderful depth of its speculations, finds that the style is in the bad taste of the period, pompous and strained, and very wearisome in the proximity of the moral applications appended to each chapter.

The book did not attract much attention outside Spain until Crozet, a Recollect friar, translated and published the first part of it, at Marseilles, 1896. This was the signal of a storm, which broke out especially in the Sorbonne. It had already been condemned in Rome, 4 August, 1861, by the Congregation of the Inquisition, and Innocent XI. had forbidden the reading of it, but, at the instance of Charles II., suspended execution of the decree for Spain. But Crozet's translation transgressed the order, and caused it to be referred to the Sorbonne, 2 May, 1696. According to Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte" (trad. Franc., 1892, V., p. 418), it was studied from the 2d to the 14th of July, and thirty-two sessions were held during which 132 doctors spoke. It was condemned 17 July, 102 out of 152 members of the commission voting against the book. It was found that it gave more weight to the revelations alleged to have received in the mystery of the Incarnation; that it added new revelations which the Apostles themselves could not have supported; that it applied the term "adoration" to Mary; that it referred all her graces to the Immaculate Conception; that it attributed to her the government of the Church; that it desired her in every respect the Mother of Mercy and the Mediatrix of Grace, and pretended that St. Ann had not contracted sin in her birth, besides a number of other imaginary and scandalous assertions.

This censure was confirmed on the 1st of October.

The Spanish Court, although through a friend of Bossuet who fully approved the censure, strove to have it annullcd, and expressed his opinion that the Sorbonne could easily do so, as their judgment was based on a bad translation. Bossuet denounced it as "an impious impertinence, and a trick of the devil." He objected to its title, "The Divine Life," to its apocryphal origin, the style, the confessor's addition, and its exaggerated Scotish philosophy. However, although this appreciation is found in Bossuet's works ("Œuvres," Versailles, 1817, XXX, pp. 637-640, and XL, pp. 172 and 204-207), it is of questionable authenticity. As to the reproach of indecency, her defenders alleged that it was the crudities of expression which more recent times would not admit, it is absurd to bring such an accusation against one whose sanctity is generally conceded. New investigations of the book were made in 1729, under Benedict XIII, when her canonization was again urged. On 16 January, 1748, Benedict XIV, in a letter which La Fuente, in his "Historia eclesiastica de España", finds "sumamente curiosa", wrote to the General of the Observantines instructing him to the investigation of the authenticity of the writings, while conceding that the book had received the approbation of the Universities of Salamanca, Alcalá, Toulouse, and Louvain. It had meantime been fiercely assailed by Eusebius Amort, a canon of Pollingen, in 1744, in a work entitled De revelationibus, visionibus, et apparitionibus privatis, regularibus, et publicis, whose, though as yet unconfirmed, was placed by Matheus, a Spanish, and by Maier, a Bavarian, to both of whom Amort replied, was subsequently refuted in another work by Mathes, who showed that in eighty places Amort had not understood the Spanish text of Maria de Agreda.

Mathes, in this exposition, was F. Dalmatius Kich, who published, at Ratisbon, 1750, his "Revelationum Agredanarum justa defensio, cum moderamine incultata tutela", Hegenröräch, in his "Kirchengeschichte", trad. franc., VI, p. 416 (V. Palmé, Paris, 1892), informs us that the condemnation of the book by the Roman Inquisition, in which the problem arose from sources other than the book, whether in its publication, the Decree of Urban VIII, of 14 March, 1625, had been disregarded, or because it contained apocryphal stories, and maintained opinions of the Scotish school as Divine revelations. Some blamed the writer for having said that she saw the earth under the form of an egg, and that it was a globe slightly compressed at the two poles, all of which seemed worthy of censure. Others condemned her for exaggerating the devotion to the Blessed Virgin and for obscuring the mystery of the Incarnation. The Spaniards were surprised at the reception the book met with in France, especially at the Inquisition, which had given its ten years of study before pronouncing in its favour. As noted above, the suspension of the Decree of Innocent XI, condemning the book, was made operative only in Spain, and although Charles II asked to have the permission to read it extended to the whole of Christendom, Alexander VIII not only refused the petition, but confirmed the Brief of his predecessor. The King made the same request to Innocent XII, who did nothing, however, except to institute a commission to examine the reasons alleged by the Court of Spain. The King renewed his appeal, partly, but the Pope died without having given any decision. La Fuente, in his "Historia eclesiastica de España" (V, p. 493), attributes the opposition to the impatience of the Thomists at seeing Scotish doctrines published as revelations, as if to settle various Scholastic disputes. He attributed the name of the Blessed Virgin and in the sense of the Franciscans, to whose order Agreda belonged. Moreover, it was alleged that her confessors had tampered with the text, and had interpolated many of the apocryphal stories which were then current, but her most bitter enemies respected her virtues and holy life, and were far from confounding her with the deluded Illuminata of that period. Her works had been put on the Index, but when the Franciscans protested they were accorded satisfaction by being assured that it was a trick of the printer (supercheria), as no condemnation appeared there.

The works of Maria de Agreda are: 1st, her letters to Philip IV of Spain edited by Fransisco Silvella; 2d, "Leyes de la Esposa conceptos y suspirios del corazón para alcanzar el último y verdadero fin del agrado del Esposo y Señor"; 3d, "Meditaciones de la pasión de nuestro Señor"; 4th, "Sueos ejercicios quotidiana"; 5th, "Escuela Spiritual para subir a la perfección"; the "Mística ciudad" has been translated into several languages; and there are several editions of the correspondence with Philip IV; but the other writings are still in manuscript, either in the convent of Agreda, or in the Franciscan monastery of Queracchi in Italy.

Agria, Erlau, Egger, Jager, an archiepiscopal see of Hungary, founded in 1000, and made an archdiocese in 1804, by Pius VII. It has 633,804 Latin Catholics; 81,217 Greek Catholics, and 503,407 partly Greek Schismatics and partly Protestants, with a sprinkling of Jews. The parishes number 200, and there are 342 secular clergy, and 51 religious. The vernacular tongue is largely Hungarian and German, but Croat, Slavonic, and Armenian are also spoken. The suffragan dioceses are Kosice (Kassa, Kaschau), Rosnynio (Rosanau), Szathmar, and Szepes (Zipo), each of 200,000 of an egg.

Agricula, Saint, Bishop of Trier (Trèves), in the fourth century (332 or 335). A local ninth-century tradition states that he had been Patriarch of Antioch, and that he came to Trier accompanied by Pope Silvester, at the request of the Empress Helena. He was present at the Council of Arles in 314, and signed the acts immediately after the preceding bishop of that diocese, thus indicating that in the fourth century Trier laid claim to the primacy of Gaul and Germany, a claim which his successor, St. Maximin, made good in 318, when he received the Decree of the Council of Sardica (343). St. Athanasius, who came as an exile to Trier in 335 or 336, speaks of the large numbers of faithful whom he found there and the number of churches in course of erection. The famous relics of Trier (Holy Cost, relics of the True Cross, the anchor and the chalice of the Apostle) are said by local tradition to have been brought thither by Agricola. The schools of Trier became famous under Agricola. Lactantius taught in them, and St. Maximin and St. Paulinus, later successors to the See of Trier, came from Aquitaine to study there. Agricola died after an active episcopate of twenty years.

Agricola, Alexander, a celebrated composer of the fifteenth century, and pupil of Okeghem, was, according to some, of Belgian and, according to other writers, of German, origin. Born about 1446, he was educated in the Netherlands and lived there some time. Even in his youth he was a fine singer and performer. Up to 1474 he was a singer in the ducal chapel, at Milan, then entered the service of the Duke of Mantua, then that of Philip, Duke of Austria and King of the Netherlands, following him to Castile, in 1505. There (at Valladolid) he died in the following year, at the age of sixty. He stood in high esteem as a composer. It is believed that a large number of his compositions are still in the libraries of Spain, awaiting a publisher. Of those published, Petrucci printed Agricola's "De re metallica," a volume of five masses bearing the titles: "Le Serviteur", "Je ne demande", "Malheur me bat", "Primi toni", "Secundi toni".

AGRICOLA, GEORGII (BAUER, latinized into AGRICOLA), physician, mineralogist, historian, and controversialist, b. at Clausthal, in Saxony, 24 March 1494; d. at Chemnitz, 23 October, 1555. After a wide course of studies in philosophy, philology, and natural sciences, in Germany and in Italy, he practised medicine for some years at Joachimsthal in Bohemia. In 1530, or 1531, he went, at the invitation of the Elector Maurice of Saxony, to the mining district of Chemnitz, where he continued his favourite studies in geology and mineralogy, and undertook the duties of a Saxon historiographer, a post assigned him by his patron. He approved Luther's first proceedings. The moral effects of the Reformation, however, and a study of the Fathers, had had a mischievous influence on his Catholic Father, which, to the day of his death, he continued to defend boldly and strenuously, even in the midst of Protestant surroundings. He is deservedly styled the Father of Mineralogy. His chief work, "De Re Metallica," gives a minute description of various contemporary methods of mining, smelting, and contains a number of curious woodcuts. It was published at Basle, in 1556, the year after his death. Of his purely historical works, the "Dominatorem Saxoni" (Freiberg, 1558) may be mentioned; the results of his patriotic studies were embodied in an undertaking, "De traditionibus apostolicis". A complete collection of his writings was published at Basle, from 1550 to 1558, and again in 1657; his mineralogical works, in German, by Lehmann, in four volumes, at Freiberg, 1806-13.

AGRICOLA, RUDOLFII, a distinguished humanist of the earlier period, and a zealous promoter of the study of the classics in Germany, b. in 1442, or 1443, at Baffo, near Groningen, Holland, d. at Heidelberg, 28 October, 1485. His family name was Huysmann. He began his study of the higher branches at the University of Louvain, where he studied Cicero and Quintilian, gaining distinction by the purity of his Latin diction and his skill in disputation. He had already become adept in French, and, after taking his degree as Master of Arts, he went to Paris. Here he continued his classical work with Heynlin von Stein, and formed a close friendship with John Reuchlin. Early in the seventies he went to Italy, where he associated himself with the humanists, chiefly in Rome and Ferrara. Devoted to the study of the ancients, he won renown for the elegance of his Latin style and his knowledge of philosophy. He delivered a panegyric on the studies of philosophy in the presence of Hercules d'Este, the Mecenas of humanism. After a sojourn of seven years in Italy, Agricola, returning to Germany, got into close touch with his numerous friends, personally and by letter, and roused their enthusiasm for the promotion of classical learning. His love of independence, however, prevented Agricola from accepting any official position. After a speech in Brussels, at the court of the Archduke, later Emperor Maximilian I, transacting business for the city of Groningen. Resisting all the efforts of his friends to keep him at court, he accepted the invitation of John of Dalberg, Bishop of Worms, to go to the University of Heidelberg, where he began to deliver lectures in 1482. He was admitted into the closest friendship of Dalberg, the generous benefactor of learning. He now began the study of Hebrew, and published an original translation of the Psalms. His fruitful activity in Heidelberg was, unfortunately, of short duration, being brought to a sudden close by his journey to John of Dalberg, who was sent as an ambassador to Innocent VIII. Shortly after his return, Agricola was stricken with a fatal illness, and died at Heidelberg. To Agricola belongs the palm as pioneer of classical learning in Germany. His importance cannot be estimated by the works he wrote; he made as much accomplishment more by their personal influence, and the powerful stimulus they gave to their contemporaries than by their own literary achievements. Thus we gather the full significance of Agricola's work from the testimony of his contemporaries, who upon him the "greatest prince," says the distinguished master, Alexander Hegius, "that I have learned all that I know, or that people think I know." Notwithstanding the impulse Agricola's zeal gave to classical learning, he did not neglect his mother tongue. At the same time he was not only a religious disposer, but possessed of lively faith. His reputation was not stainless. During the last years of his life, he took up the study of theology. His discourse 'De Nativitate Christi' breathes a spirit of deep piety. The most important of his pedagogical writings is the treatise "De studio formando," which he sent to his friend Barbarinus; chief among his philosophical works is "De Inventione Dialectica." A collective edition of his works (Letters, Treatises, Translations, Poems, and Discourses) appeared in two quarto volumes (Cologne, 1539), under the title "Rudolphii Agricolae Lucubrationes aliquot lectu dignissimae in hunc usque diem nusquam prius editae, per Aaratum Amstelodamum.

however, to other pursuits, studied medicine, Hebrew, alchemy, theology, and finally devoted himself to “Cabalism” under the influence of Reuchlin (q. v.) and Raymond Lully (q. v.). He lived and taught in various places, making friends or enemies wherever he went, but was always very successful financially, as he was banished from Cologne for debt, and spent his last days in poverty, a typical example of the irregular, vicissitudinous life led by his kind at that time. His numerous works, chiefly philosophical, have a strong bias towards “occultism”, and turn counter to the received opinions of his time in theology and scholastic philosophy. He lived and died nominally a Catholic, but was openly in sympathy with Luther, whose tone towards the Church and her institutions he adopted, while professing that he was merely attacking abuses, not the Church, an attitude frequently assumed at that period.

His famous work “De incertitudine et vanitate scientiarum”, published in 1527, has been translated into many European vernaculars and is well described as “a compound of erudition and ignorance, gravity and vanity”. It abounds in denunciations of scholasticism, veneration of relics and sacred law and the hierarchy, and demands for a return to the Scriptures as the philosopher’s stone (Lydius lapis) of Christian teaching. For the rest he is no follower of Luther or his companions. They interest him as the first who stood out with success against Catholic orthodoxy. Giordano Bruno (q. v.) made use of his writings, and their influence was long powerful. Among his minor writings are the often quoted booklet “De nobilitate et pre celentia feminae sexus declamatio”, dedicated to Margaret of Austria, “Libellus de sacramento matrimonii”, a commentary on the “Ars Brevis”, of Raymond Lully, etc. A complete edition of his works appeared at Lyons in 1600.

AGrippinus. Bishop of Carthage at the close of the second and beginning of the third century. During his episcopacy the question arose in the African Church as to what should be done with regard to converts from schism or heresy. If they had previously been Catholics, ecclesiastical discipline subjected them to penance. But if it were a question of receiving those who had been baptized outside the Church, was their baptism to be regarded as valid? Agrippinus convoked the bishops of Numidia and Africa for the First Council of Africa (probably 215-217); which resolved the question negatively. He consequently decided that such persons should be baptized, not conditionally but absolutely. Herein, it was noted, have not the true faith; they cannot absolve from sin; the water in their baptism cannot cleanse from sin. These reasons seemed to him to warrant the conclusion arrived at, but it was not the Roman usage. The point, however, had not yet been raised and definitely settled. But assuming their good faith, Agrippinus and his bishops were not excluded from the unity of the Church. Half a century later, St. Cyprian speaks of the continuous good repute of Agrippinus (bona memoria vir); and St. Augustine in writing against the Donatists defends Agrippinus and Cyprian by showing that, although they were mistaken, they were more correct than the unity of the Church.

AGUIRRE, JOSEPH SAEZE DE, Cardinal, a learned Spanish Benedictine; b. at Logroño, in Old Castile, 24 March, 1630; d. 19 August, 1699. He entered the ‘congregation of Monte Cassino. He directed the studies in the Monastery of St. Vincent of Salamanca for fifteen years, and became its abbot. He then professed dogmatic theology and inaugurated the course in Holy Scripture at the University of Salamanca. He was councillor and secretary of the Holy Office and president of its congregation of the province of Spain. His work against the Declaration of the Gallican Clergy of 1682 won him a cardinal’s hat and the warm eulogy of Innocent XI. His correspondence with Bossuet is very characteristic of his combative Quietsim. His excessive labours undermined his health, and for many years he suffered from epileptic attacks. He died suddenly from a stroke of apoplectic. He was buried in the Spanish Church of St. James in Rome, and his heart was deposited in Monte Cassino, as he had requested.

His more important works are on philosophical and theological subjects, but he also produced valuable writings on ecclesiastical history, commentaries on the theology of St. Anselm, two volumes of miscellaneous, and a book to prove that the “De Immitatione Christi” was by the Benedictine, John Gerson.

His principal works on philosophy are: (1) “Philosophia Nova-antiqua” etc., a defence of Aristotle and St. Thomas against their opponents (Salamanca, 1671-2-5, 3 in fol.); (2) “Philosophica Morum” etc. (Salamanca, 1677; Rome, 1695), a commentary on four volumes on Aristotelic Ethics; (3) “De virtutibus et vitis disputationibus ethicis in quibus dissertatur quidcumque spectat ad philosophiam moralium ab Aristotele traditam” (Salamanca, 1677; 2d ed. enlarged, Rome, 1697; 3d ed. Rome, 1717). His principal theological works are (1) a treatise on the Angels, especially the Guardian Angels, which he prepared as his thesis for the degree of Doctor. (2) “S. Anselmi ... Theologia, commentarium et disputationibus tum dogmaticis tum scholasticis illustratas” (Salamanca, 1678-81, 2d ed. Rome, 1688-90). The third volume, “De natura hominis pura”, is especially directed against Jansenist errors. (3) “Auctoritas inffalibilis et imperium Catholicae Sancti Petri”, etc. (Salamanca, 1683), a learned refutation of the four articles of the Declaration of the Gallican Clergy of France in 1682. Aiblinger, Johann Caspar, composer, b. 23 February, 1779, at Wasserburg, Bavaria; d. at Munich, 6 May, 1867. In his eleventh year he commenced his studies at Tegernsee Abbey, where he was instructed in piano, and organ-playing. Four years later he entered the gymnasium at Munich, where he studied under Professor Schlett, his countryman. Thence he went (in 1800) to the University of Landshut. Inwardly drawn to the Church, he completed his philosophy and began theology, but the secularization of many religious orders in Bavaria prevented his entrance into a cloister. He now devoted himself solely to music. Led by the then prevailing ideas that without a visit to Italy no musical education was complete, he turned his footsteps to the way. After a stay of eight years at Vicenza, where he fell under the influence of his countryman Simon Mayr, Aiblinger (1811) went to Venice and there met Meyerbeer, who procured for him an appointment at the Conservatory. His failure to establish a school for classical music led him to Milan, where he assumed the direction of the local Théâtre. On his return to Bavaria King Max I invited him to Munich to direct the Italian opera. King Ludwig appointed him director of the royal orchestra, and sent him to Italy to collect old Italian masterpieces. On his return he became the organist of the church of All Saints, for which he wrote many valuable compositions. In 1864 he resigned, on account of advancing years. Between 1820 and 1830 he tried operatic composition, but was unsuccessful. A crusade against Italian music, which led to the revival of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris", followed. Then he took up church music, studying the old masters and procuring performances of their works. He also wrote much church music, which is generally full of simple dignity and great purity, with a certain degree of freedom, but it is stiff, dry, and weakly sentimental. His instrumentation is not strong. He was, however, inspired with the spirit of the Church. Of his numerous compositions, the requiesses, offertories and graduals, psalmes, litanies, and German hymns, many have been published at Augsburg, Munich, Ratisbon, and Mainz. His choicest works, consisting of masses, vespres, motetes, etc. (133 in number), are preserved in the archives of the royal court chapel in Munich.

Aichinger, Gregor, organist and composer of sacred music, b. probably at Ratisbon in 1665; d. at Augsburg, 21 January, 1696. He was a priest of the Augustinian Canons, and died at the end of his life. As early as 1590 he was the organist to the patronic Jacob Fugger at Augsburg. He paid a visit to Rome in 1699. His musical development was largely influenced by the Venetian school, and especially by Gabrieli. In 1601, or thereabouts, he returned to Augsburg and resided there for the remainder of his life. Of his various compositions we mention "Liturgica, sive Sacra Officia ad omnes dies festos Magnae Dei Matris" (Augsburg, 1603); "Sacre Cantiones", for four, five, six, eight, and ten voices (Venice, 1590); "Tricinia Mariana" (Innsbruck, 1598); "Fasciculus Sacrorum Hebraicorum" (Augsburg, 1691). Read, also, found in Eitner's "Quellen-Lexikon." Proke thus characterizes Aichinger and his fellow-worker Hassler in the Fugger choir: "Though Hassler excelled in intellect and originality, both masters had this in common that they combined the solid features of Italian art with the refined forms which flourished at that time especially in Rome and Venice, and had stamped their works with freer melody and more fluent harmony. Aichinger in particular distinguished himself by a warmth and tenderness of feeling bordering on mellowness, which is nowhere imbued with deep devotion. Meanwhile, he does not lack sublimity nor solemnity, indeed some of his longest compositions satisfy throughout the strictest demands of art."

Aidan of Lindisfarne, Saint, an Irish monk who had studied under St. Senan, at Inisceathay (Scattery Island). He is placed as Bishop of Clogher by Ware and Lynch, but he resigned that see and became a monk at Iona about 630. His virtues, however, shone so resplendently that he was selected (633) as first Bishop of Lindisfarne, and in time became apostle of Northumbria. St. Bede is lavish in praise of the episcopal rule of St. Aidan, and of his Irish co-workers in the ministry. Oswald, King of Northumbria, who had studied in Ireland, was a firm friend of St. Aidan, and did all he could for the Irish missionaries until his death. Aidan's field near Oswestry, 5 August, 642. St. Aidan died at Bamborough on the last day of August, 651, and his remains were borne to Lindisfarne. Bede tells us that "he was a pontiff inspired with a passionate love of virtue, but at the same time of a surpassing mildness and gentleness." His feast is celebrated 31 August.

Aiguillon, Duchess of, Marie de Vigerot de Pontcours, Marquise de Combalet and Duchesse d'Aiguillon, niece of Cardinal Richelieu, b. 1604; d. at Paris, 1675. First promised to Comte de Bethune, son of Sully, she married Antoine de Roure, Marquis de Combalet, in 1620, who was killed two years later at the siege of Montpellier. A childless widow, she entered the Carmelite convent in Paris, fully determined to end her days this way; but Richelieu became so attached to her (XIII) that he had to follow her, and was appointed lady of the bed-chamber to Marie de Médocis. Obliged to do the honours of the Cardinal's palace, she took into her hands the distribution of "his liberality and of his alms", to use Flechier's expressions. Convinced of the vanity of worldly honours, she only busied herself in distributing riches without seeking any enjoyment from wealth. She well deserved, by her virtues and piety, the title of "great Christian" and "heroic woman", which her paeanygists give to her. Charity was her dominant virtue. She had part in all the beneficence of the time. She founded, endowed, or enriched especially the establishments of foreign missions in Paris and in Rome; the church and seminary of Saint Sulpice; the hospitals of Marseilles and of Algiers; the convent of the Carmelites; the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, and all the religious houses of Paris. She gave fifty thousand francs for the foundation of his church. Of the charitable deeds of her charity to the missions of China and she defrayed the expenses of sending the first bishops there. But it was above all the colony of Canada which received a large share of her benefice. She especially recommended this work to her uncle, and Richelieu sent some Jesuits there. The Hôtel-Dieu at Quebec was erected at her expense, and she put the Religieuses Hospitalières of Dieppe in charge of it, after providing for it an annual income of three thousand francs. Masses are still said there daily for the intention of herself and of Richelieu, and an inscription commemorates her over the principal entrance. It was under her exalted patronage that the first Ursulines were sent there. With Olier, she conceived the plan of founding the Colony of Montreal and got the Pope to approve of the society which was formed for this purpose. Finally she had the creation of the bishopric of Quebec brought before the General Assembly of the French clergy, and obtained from Mazarin a pension of 1,200 crowns for its support.

This woman of great mind was sought in marriage by princes of the royal blood, but she preferred remaining a widow the better to pursue her good works. When she was created Duchesse d'Aiguillon, she gave twenty-two thousand livres to found a mission for instructing the poor of the duchy. She was equally the enlightened patroness of the writers of her time. Voiture, Scudéry, Molère, Scarron, and Corneille were recipients of her favours. The last named dedicated to her "Le Cid". After the death of Richelieu, who made her his principal heir, she retired to the Petit-Luxembourg, published her uncle's works and continued her generous benefactions to all kinds of charities. She carried out the Cardinal's last request by having the church and the college of the Sorbonne completed, as well as the Hôtel Richelieu, which has since been converted into the Bibliothèque Nationale. The great Fléchier was charged with pronouncing her funeral oration, which is regarded as one of the masterpiece of eloquence of French pulpit oratory.

Aikenhead, MARY, foundress of the Irish Sisters of Charity, b. in Cork, 19 January, 1787; d. in Dublin, 22 July, 1858; daughter of David Aikenhead, a physician, member of the Established Church, and Mary Staepole, a Catholic. She was brought up in the Church of England, but became a Catholic 6 June, 1802, some time after the death of her father who had been received into the Church on his death-bed. Accustomed early in life to an active life of charity, and feeling called to the religious life, she looked in vain for an order devoted to outside charitable work.

Against her will she was chosen by Archbishop Murray, Coadjutor of Dublin, to carry out his plan of founding a congregation of the Sisters of Charity in Ireland, and in preparation for it she entered the novitiate of three years (1812-15) in the Convent of the Institute of the Blessed Virgin at Micklegate Bar, York, the rule of which corresponded most nearly to the ideas of the Archbishop. She there assumed the name she kept till death, Sister Mary Augustin, though always known to the world as Mrs. Aikenhead. On 1 September, 1815, the first members of the new Order took their vows, Sister Mary Augustin being appointed Superior-General. The following sixteen years were filled with the arduous work of organizing the community and extending its sphere of labour to every phase of charity, chiefly spiritual and secular works, and also with the care and disease shattered Mrs. Aikenhead's health, leaving her an invalid. Her activity was unceasing, however, and she directed her sisters in their heroic work during the plague of 1832, placed them in charge of new institutions, and sent them on missions to France and Australia. After a long period of trial and toil, she passed away in 1851, her excellent second year, having left her Order in a flourishing condition, in charge of ten institutions, besides innumerable missions and branches of charitable work.

Ailebe, Saint, Bishop of Emly in Munster (Ireland); d. about 527, or 541. It is very difficult to sift out the germs of truth from among the mass of legends which have gathered round the life of this Irish saint. Beyond the fact, which is itself disputed, that he was a disciple of St. Patrick and was probably ordained priest, we have very little knowledge of the history of St. Ailebe. Legend says that in his infancy he was left in the forest to be devoured by the wolves, but that a she-wolf took compassion upon him and suckled him. Long afterwards, when Ailebe was bishop, an old she-wolf, pursued by a hunting party, fled to the Bishop and laid her head upon his breast. Ailebe protected his old foster-mother, and every day thereafter she and her little ones came to take their food in his hall. The Acts of St. Ailebe are quite untrustworthy; they represent Ailebe as preaching in Ireland before St. Patrick, but this is directly contradicted by St. Patrick's biographer, Tirechan. Probably the most authentic information we possess about Ailebe is that contained in Cuimmon's eulogium: "Ailebe loved hospitality. The devotion was not untruthful. Never entered a body of clay one that was better as to food and raiment." His feast, which is 20 September, is kept throughout Ireland as a greater double.

The Acts of St. Ailebe may be found in the Codex Salamanensis, edited in 1858 by the Bollandists under the title of Acta Sanctorum Hispaniae, at the chartula of the Earl of Bute (cf. STEBBIN, in Acta SS., Sept., IV. 29-33); HEALY, Irish Schools and Scholars; LANIGAN, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland.

Aileran, an Irish saint, generally known as "Sapiens" (the Wise), one of the most distinguished professors at the School of Clonard in the seventh century. He died of the all-destroying Yellow Plague, and his death is chronicled in the "Annals of Clonard", 26 December. His life is not recorded, but he was attracted to the great School of Clonard by the fame of St. Finian and his disciples, and, about 650, was rector of this celebrated seat of learning. As a classical scholar he was almost without a rival in his day, and his acquaintance with the works of Origen, Philo, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and others, stamps him as a master of Latin and Greek. According to Colgan, numerous works are to be ascribed to St. Aileran, including the "Fourth Life of St. Patrick", a Latin-Irish Litany, and the "Lives of St. Brigid and St. Fechin of Fore". As compiler of the Latin-Irish Litany, there is scarcely a doubt but that St. Aileran was its author. An excellent transcript of it is in the "Yellow Book of Lecain" (Leabhar Buidehe Lecain), a valuable Irish manuscript copyed by the MacFhirsis in the fourth.

teenth century. The best known work of St. Aliran is his tract on the genealogy of Our Lord according to St. Matthew. A complete copy of this remarkable scriptural commentary is at Vienna in a manuscript of S. Medallius (Societate Jesu) in folio, one quartino, written in two volumes with red initial letters. It is entitled: "Tipicus ac Tropologicus Jesu Christi Genealogiae intellectum quem Sanctus Aliranus Scottorum Sapientissimus exposuit". The Franciscan, Patrick Fleming, published a fragment of this "Interpretatio Mystica Progenitorum Jesu Christi" in 1605 in the "Acta Sanctorum" of our Lord Jesus Christ), in 1667, at Louvain —being a posthumous publication passed through press by Father Thomas O'Sheerin, O.F.M., who died in 1673. This was reprinted in the Benedictine edition of the Fathers, in 1677, and again by Migne in his Latin "Patrology" (LXXX, 227 seq.). The Benedictine editors take care to explain that although St. Aliran was not a member of their order, yet they deemed the work of such extraordinary merit that it deserved being better known. To quote their own words, "Aliran unfolded the meaning of Sacred Scripture with so much learning and ingenuity and in his study of sacred history and especially preachers of the Divine Word, will regard the publication as most acceptable." Another fragment of a work by St. Aliran, namely, "A Short Moral Explanation of the Sacred Names", found in the Latin "Patrology" of Migne, displays much of the same art and ability. The Arch Bishop of Paris says of it that it is read over both fragments carefully, and we have no hesitation in saying that whether we consider the style of the Latin, the learning, or the ingenuity of the writer, it is equally marvellous and equally honourable to the School of Clonard." The feast of St. Aliran is celebrated 29 December. Otto Schmid says (Kirchenlex., I, 370) that in medieval times it was customary in the great Swiss monastery of St. Gall to read this admirable work on the Feast of the Nativity of Our Lady (8 Sept.) as a commentary on the Gospel of the day, i.e. the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Matt., i, 1-16).

Ailleboust, d', Family of.—(1) Ailleboust, Louis d', Sieur de Coulanges, third Governor of Canada, date of birth unknown; d. in Montreal 31 May, 1660. He came to Canada in 1643. He was a large contributor to the Company of Commerce, owned the Maniassonne in founding Montreal, building the first fortifications, and was commandant of the city from October, 1646, to May, 1647. Sent to France, he obtained help and important reforms in favour of the colonists. He succeeded Montmagny as Governor General, arriving at Quebec 20 August, 1648. He formed a flying camp of four thousand soldiers to guard the communications between the capital and Montreal. During his term of office the Huron missions of Ontario were destroyed by the Iroquois, and the Jesuits, Crebeuf, Laclame, Daniel, Garnier, and Chabanel, suffered martyrdom (1648-49). He settled the Huron refugees on the Iroquois, of Ontario, and tried to establish an alliance and commercial relations with New England. The Jesuit Drulleticq has left an account of the embassy sent on this occasion. On the 21st of October, 1651, Jean Laron succeeded d'Ailleboust as governor, and the latter was not soon to resign a post in which he had been left without reward or services, several important seigniories were granted him (Argentenaye, Coulanges, Saint-Villenem). He retired to Montreal, where he took to farming, and was the first to sow French grain in Canada. In 1656 he accompanied Maniassonne to France, where he induced the Sulpicians to assume possession of the Island of Montreal, and to send missionary thither. He also persuaded the Sisters of l'Institut Saint Joseph, of Lafièche, to take charge of the Hôtel-Dieu. Returning to Canada with four Sulpicians, d'Ailleboust was entrusted with the interior administration of the province, from 18 September, 1656, until the arrival of d'Argenson. He laid (23 March, 1658) the first stone of the church of Sainte Anne de Beau-pre, the place of pilgrimage which has since become so famous. He died leaving a name as a good Christian, a man of judicious and impartial mind.

(2) Ailleboust, Barbe d' (née de Bouligne), d. birth unknown; d. 1685. Wife of the foregoing; followed her husband to Canada in order to devote her life to the instruction of the Indians. She learned the Algonquin language, which she taught to the Sulpicians. Jeanne Mance, Sister-Bourgeoys, and Barbe d'Ailleboust, rivals in virtue, have given Canada examples worthy of the great ages of the Church. After the death of her husband, with whom she had lived in continence, in order to fulfill a vow made in early life, she withdrew to the Hôtel-Dieu at Montreal, where she divided her time between prayer and good works. In 1663, with the assistance of the Jesuit Father Chaumonot, she founded the Confraternity of the Most Holy Spectacle, which spread all over Canada and did much to preserve good morals. Mgr. de Laval subsequently invited her to Quebec, and gave her the general management of this pious confraternity, which was canonically erected 14 March, 1694, and is still in existence. In 1690 she wrote, printed in Paris, instructing the members of the confraternity as to the virtues which they should practise, and the rules they should follow (La solide dévotion à la Sainte Famille). He also established the feast of the Holy Family, and caused a vast and office book devoted to be published by the Diocese of Quebec. Madame d'Ailleboust, who was endowed with great talents, with charms of mind and person, was sought in marriage by the Governor, de Courcelles, and by the Intendant, Talon, but she was faithful to her vow. She died at the Hôtel-Dieu, in Quebec, whither she had retired, to which she had given her fortune, and where she is held in veneration.

(3) Ailleboust, Charles Joseph d', Sieur des Musseaux, nephew of the foregoing; b. 1624; d. 1700; came to Canada in 1650, where he commanded the flying column organized to protect the settlements against Iroquois attacks, and was Commandant of Montreal from October, 1651, to September, 1653, during the absence of Maniassonne, whom he accompanied to France (1653-56). Argenson, the Governor, who had confidence in d'Ailleboust's worth, suggested him to the King as his lieutenant in 1658. He was made civil and criminal judge of Montreal, a position which he held until 1668. A good soldier, a prudent administrator, an upright judge, d'Ailleboust at his death left, by his marriage with Catherine le Gardeur de Tilly, several children who took service, and distinguished themselves, in the colonial army. They founded the families of d'Argentueil, de Cussey, de l'Empy, and de Manthet; names borrowed from the Seigneuries of the latter, given to him in France, near Auxerre (Yonne). The d'Ailleboust family was confirmed in its rank of nobility by a decree of the King of France, registered at Quebec in 1720. Some of its descendants still live at the village of Caughnawaga, near Montreal.

Ally, Pierre d' (Petruis de Allaco), a French theologian and philosopher, bishop and cardinal, b. 1350 at Compiegne; d. probably 1420 at Avignon. He studied at the College de Navarre, University of Paris. In 1375, by his commentaries on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, he furthered the cause of Nominalism in the University of Paris. Elected on the degree of Doctor of Theology in 1380. At that time he wrote several treatises, in which he maintained, among other doctrines, that bishops and priests hold their jurisdiction from Christ, not from the Pope, that the Pope is inferior to a general council neither the Pope nor the Fathers are strictly infallible, but only the universal Church. In 1384 he became director of the College of Navarre; Gerson and Nicholas of Clemanges were among his pupils. He acquired great fame by his sermons, writings, and discussions. The University having censured several propositions of the Dominican John of Miremont, who denied the ascension of the Blessed Virgin, the latter appealed to Clement VII. In behalf of the University, d'Ailly was sent to Avignon as the head of a delegation, and finally (1389) persuaded Clement to maintain the condemnation. The same year d'Ailly was made Chancellor of the University, Confessor of the King, and Treasurer of the Sainte Chapelle. When Benedict XIII succeeded Clement VII at Avignon, d'Ailly's influence caused him to be recognized at the French court. He was appointed Bishop of Le Puy in 1385, and in 1397 Bishop of Cambrai. He was active in trying to resolve the heresy question of the day, the ending of the great schism. He proposed the assembling of a general council—an idea which he had suggested in a sermon as early as 1381—and endeavored to bring the two Popes to resign. On account of Benedict's hesitations and false promises, d'Ailly withdrew more and more from the Avignon Popes, and when, in 1398, the French King recalled his submission, d'Ailly approved this action. Later, however, he counseled obedience, though only in essential matters, and this course having been accepted by the Council of Paris, he announced it in a sermon in the Church of Notre Dame (1403). At the Council of Aix (Jan., 1400) d'Ailly again advocated the necessity of a general council. The unity of the Church, he claimed, does not depend on the unity of the Pope, but on that of Christ. The Church has a natural and divine right to its unity and self-preservation; hence it can, even without the Pope's sanction, act in a matter of this kind. In 1411 d'Ailly was made cardinal by Alexander's successor, John XXIII., and assisted at the Council of Rome (1412). In 1414 the Council of Constance was convoked, and was successful in ending the schism by the election of Martin V (1418). D'Ailly took a leading part in the council and presided at its third session (March 26, 1415). He insisted on several principles, some of which had been developed already in his earlier writings. He held that the Pope's pronouncements, whether of his own act or by his cardinals, could not now be dissolved by any action of the Pope; as its power came from Christ immediately, all the faithful, and the Pope himself, were obliged to submit to its decisions. He favored the method of voting by nations and the extension of the power of voting to the doctors of theology and of canon law, and to the princes and the legates. These were complete departures from the practice of the Church. After the Council of Constance, d'Ailly was appointed by Martin V legate at Avignon, where he died.

D'Ailly enjoyed considerable celebrity among his contemporaries, who gave him the titles of Aguilae Franciae, et aberrantium a veritate malles indefesae (The eagle of France and the indefatigable hammer of heretics). If his principles concerning the power in the Church are exaggerated—and, in fact, they have been condemned since—they should be considered with reference to the conditions of those times when the Church was divided under the influence of many respects d'Ailly reproduces the theses of Oecum and the Nominalists, that the existence of God cannot be strictly demonstrated, that the doctrine of the Trinity cannot be established from the Scriptures, that positive law is the only basis of morality, etc. In the conflict in which he shows a tendency to mysticism. His works are numerous (154); some of them have not yet been published. Besides those that have reference to the schism and the reformation of the Church, others treat of Holy Scripture, apologetics, asceticism, theology, philosophy and the sciences. He was a believer in astrology, and in his "Cosmography," he attempts to show that the dates of the main events of history can be determined by astronomical calculations. In his "Imago mundi" he taught the possibility of reaching the Indies by the West, and in confirmation of his own reasoning he alleged the authority of Aristotle, Piny, and Seneca. D'Ailly's views were useful to Columbus and encouraged him in his undertaking. [Cf. La découverte de l'Amérique et Pierre d'Ailly, by Sablembier, in "Revue de Lille," 1892, V, 622-641. Columbus had a copy of the "Imago mundi" on the margin of which he had written many notes with his own hand, and which is still to be seen in the Columbia Library at Seville. In another of Columbus's books, the "Libro de las profecías," are to be found many notes taken from d'Ailly's works on cosmogony. Hence Las Casas (Historia de las Indias, vol. 1, xi, 89) says that all "modern" writers d'Ailly exercised the greatest influence on the realization of Columbus's plans. His dissertation on the reformation of the calendar, composed in 1411, and read at the Council of Constance in March, 1417, was later accepted and completed by Gregory XIII. Aimerich, Mateo, a learned philologist, b. at Bordi, in Spain, 1715; d. at Ferrara, 1799. He entered the Society of Jesus at eighteen, and, having completed his studies in a course in philosophy and theology in several colleges of his Order, he was subsequently Rector of Barcelona and Cervera, and Chancellor of the University of Ganda. He was at Madrid, supervising the printing of some books, when the decree of expulsion of the Society from Spain was announced. He went on board ship without a murmur, and thought only of consoling his companions, several of whom were old and infirm. He took up his abode at Ferrara, and it was there, in exile, that he composed the works which have won for him a distinguished place among the philologists and critics of the eighteenth century. What is remarkable about his literary labors is that his only book was the public library, and even that his infirmities often prevented him from consulting. He died, at the age of eighty-four, in sentiments of great piety. Gifted with a fine, judicious mind, he united to his vast erudition the faculty of writing Latin with great elegance and purity. Besides some works in collateral philosophy, asceticism, and dialectics, courses, we have from his pen, 1st, "Nomina et acta Episcoporum Barcinonensis"; 2d, "Quinti Moderati Censorini de vitæ et morte linguae latine Paradoxia philologica, criticis nullis dissertationibus opposita, asserta et probata"; of which there were but four or five copies printed, the largest edition being very rare; 3d, a defence of the preceding work; 4th, "Specimen veteris romanæ literaturæ deperditæ vel adhuc latentis"; 5th, "Novum Lexicon historiciæ et criticum antiquæ romanæ literaturæ." This work, which is the sequel to the preceding, was the one which made Aimérich's reputation. He left also a MS., which was a supplement to his dictionary; and a number of Latin discourses.

AIRE (ATURUM). DIOCESE OF, comprises the territory of the Department of Landes. It was a suffragan of Auch under the old regime, but was not re-established until 1822, when it was again made a suffragan of the re-established Archdiocese of Auch, and was assigned the territory of the former Diocese of Aire and Acque (Dax). The first bishop mentioned is Maximus (represented at the Council of Agde 506). Aire, on the river Adour, the home of St. Philibert, numbered among its bishops during the second half of the sixteenth century François de Foix, Count of Candale, an illustrious mathematician, who translated Euclid and founded a chair of mathematics at the University of Bordeaux. The basilica erected at the birthplace of St. Vincent de Paul is within the limits of the present Diocese of Aire. In the Gallo-Roman crypt of Mas d'Aire is preserved in a sarcophagus the body of St. Quitteria, daughter of a governor of Gallicia, and martyred, perhaps under Commodus, for her resolution to remain a virgin. The city of Saint-Sever, in the Diocese of Aire, owes its origin to an ancient Benedictine abbey, built in the tenth century by a Duke of Gascony as an act of thanksgiving for a victory over the Northmen, and whose church was dedicated to St. Severus. The beautiful Gothic church of Mimi- rut is the only survivor of a great Benedictine abbey. The church of Carcassé, dating from the year 810, is one of the oldest in France. The Diocese of Aire comprised (end of 1805), 291,588 inhabitants, 28 first class, 263 second class parishes, and 40 vicariates formerly with State subventions.

Airoli (or AYROLL). GIOACOMO MARIA, a Jesuit Orientalist and Scriptural commentator; b. at Genoa, 1660; d. in Rome, 27 March, 1721. He was professor of Hebrew in the Roman College, and later succeeded Cardinal Tolomei in the chair of controversy. His knowledge of Hebrew is shown by his Hebrew translation of a homily of Pope Clement XI. He is the author of a number of dissertations on Scripture, mostly of a critical and expemological, which were highly thought of. Sommervogel enumerates fourteen, chief among which are: (1) "Dissertatio Biblica in quâ Scriptura textus aliquot insigniores, abhitis linguis hebraica, syriaca, chaldaea, araboica, graeca, . . . dilucidatur" (Rome, 1704); (2) "Libri LXX hebdomadum recentiores in cap. IX Danielis dissertatio" (Rome, 1713), several times reprinted; (3) "Dissertatio chronologica de anno, mense, et die mortis Domini Nostri Jesus Christi," (Rome, 1718).

A full list of his works is found in Sommervogel, Bibli. de l'Éc. de J. (Paris, 1880), I, 717.

Aisle (Lat. ala; Old Fr. aile), sometimes written Isle, Yle, and Alley; in architecture one of the lateral or longitudinal divisions of a church, separated from the nave (sometimes called the centre aisle) by rows of piers, pillars, or columns. Sometimes a church has one side-aisle only. Often the aisle is continued around the apse, occasionally the sides of the transepts. In very large churches transepts may have three aisles. As a rule in Gothic architecture the aisle-roofs are much lower than that of the nave. The aisle is generally one story, but occasionally there is an upper story, sometimes used as a gallery. As a general rule, churches are divided into three aisles, but there is no fixed rule that governs the number. The cathedrals at Chichester, Milan, and Amiens have five aisles; Antwerp and Paris seven. The most remarkable in this respect, the cathedral of Cordoba in Spain, has nineteen. Aisles existed in the Roman basilicas, and in the majority of Christian churches of all periods. Transepts were sometimes called the cross isle or yle. The term is popularly used to describe the passage between pews or seating.

Aistulf (also AISTULF, AISTULPH, ASTULF, and ASTULPH). King of the Lombards; d. 756. He succeeded his brother Ratchis in 749, and set about the conquest of all Italy. After taking from the Greeks the Exarchate of Ravenna, he was about to seize the Patrimony of St. Peter when Pope Stephen II (or III—752-57) appealed for aid to Pepin the Short, King of the Franks. Failing to influence the Lombard king by persuasion, Pepin led an army through the passes of the Alps, besieged and besieged him in the city of Pavia (754). A peace was then concluded, Aistulf undertaking to surrender the Exarchate and all other territory conquered by him. But Pepin and his Franks had hardly returned to their own country when Aistulf besieged Rome itself, and laid waste the surrounding territory. A second time, according to the Poitiers call, Pepin again besieged Pavia and again overpowered Aistulf. This time Pepin took care to exact substantial guarantees for the fulfilment of Aistulf's promises; the latter was obliged to pay an indemnity and surrender to his conqueror the town of Comacchio, on the Adriatic, which had not formed part of the Exarchate. Constantine Copronymus, the Byzantine Emperor, asserted that the Exarchate of Ravenna was his by right, and had been violently wrested from him by Aistulf. He demanded its restitution by Pepin. The latter replied that the Exarchate and all other territory rescued from the hands of Aistulf belonged to the victor by right of conquest; he then endowed the Holy See with these territories, his representative, Fulrad, Abbot of St. Denis, formally laying the keys of the fortified places with a deed of gift upon the Pope and St. Peter. Aistulf, with the aid of forty years had pretended to postpone the actual evacuation of the territories, and the theoretically surrendered places, and it is probable that he contemplated another essay of the chances of war. A fall from his horse while hunting (or according to some, a wound received from a wild boar) ended his life before he had time to renew his warlike enterprises. He left no male issue. AIX, ARCHIDIOCESE OF (AQUA SEPTIE), full title the Archidioecese of Aix, Arles, and Embrun. It includes the districts of Aix, Arles, and Embrun. The archdiocese of Aix had as its suffragans the sees of Apt, Riez, Fréjus, Gap, and Sisteron; the Archidioce of Embrun, the sees of Digne, Grasse, Vence, Glandevé, Senez, and Nice; the Archidioce of Arles, the sees of Marseille, St. Paul-Trois-Cha- teaux, Toulon, and Orange. The Archishops of Arles and Embrun do not exist to-day, and the Archbishrope of Aix has as dependants the sees of Mars- selle, Fréjus, Digne, Gap, Ajaccio, and Nice. Certain traditions make St. Maximus the first Bishop.
of Aix, one of the seventy-two Disciples and the companion of Mary Magdalen in Provence. The Abbé Duchesne seems to have proved that this saint, the object of a very ancient local cult, was not considered the first bishop of Provence, nor connected with the life of St. Mary Magdalen, except in very recent legends, devised towards the middle of the eleventh century by the monks of Vezelay. The first historically known bishop of Aix is Lazarus, who occupied this seat about the beginning of the fifth century. It is only at the end of the eighth century that Aix became an archbishopric; to that date one who was dependent upon the Bishop of Arles. Arles, which to-day is not even a bishopric, formerly played a very important ecclesiastical rôle. Its first incumbent was St. Trophimus, whose episcopate Gregory of Tours places about the year 250. In a letter to Pope Leo, in 450, the bishops of the province of Arles said that Trophimus was sent there by St. Peter. Is the apostolic origin of the episcopate of St. Trophimus authentic, or was it invented to serve the claims of the church of Aix? This is hard to decide, but it is certain that the date given by Gregory of Tours is much too late, as the bishops of Arles existed before the middle of the third century, and was already flourishing and esteemed in 254 when the Bishop Marcianus was tainted with the Novatian errors. Celebrated names first became connected with the see of Arles in 417 when Pope Zosimus made Patroclus a metropolitan not only of the province of Vienne, to which Arles belonged, but of the two provinces of Narbonne; and to prevent the bishops of Gaul from following the custom of appealing to the episcopal see of Milan, Zosimus made Patrocles a kind of intermediary between the episcopate of Gaul and the Apostolic See. Under Pope Boniface, the successor of Zosimus, the bishops of Narbonne and Vienne were proclaimed metropolitans, and Arles was authorized to keep the southern province of Vienne, the second province of Narbonne, and the Maritime Alps. The church of Arles had then two great bishops at its head, St. Honoratus, founder of the monastery of Lérins (427-429), and St. Hilarius, disciple of St. Honoratus, celebrated as a preacher (429-449), who, after his conflicts with the church of Vienne, had animated disputes with the Pope, St. Leo the Great. Pope Hilary (461-468), intending to confer certain privileges on the Bishopric of Arles, in 474 on 250 provinces of Gaul against the predication hereinafter, and increased the importance of the see. With St. Cesarius (q. v.), Arles (502-542) reached its greatest prosperity; there the Prefect of the Praetorium of Theodoric had his seat, while St. Cesarius represented the Pope with the episcopate of Gaul and Spain, and exercised an indefatigable activity in codifying the canon law of Merovingian Gaul. After Cesarius the superiority of the bishops of Arles was merely nominal; St. Virgilius, monk of Lérins, was made Bishop of Arles in 588, and consecrated the monk St. Augustine, sent to Great Britain by St. Gregory the Great. But after the sixth century there was no longer any question of intermediation; and in the succeeding centuries the metropolitan bishops of Arles and Vienne existed side by side, not without frequent discussion as to the limits of their territory. The creation of the special metropolitan archbishopric of Aix and at Embrun in 794, at Avignon in 1475, diminished the power of which was asserted in 1802. The Blessed Louis Alleman, who played an important part in the councils of the fifteenth century, was Archbishop of Arles from 1423 to 1450.

Among other prelates who brought fame to the see of Aix, must be mentioned Sabran, who was sent to Jerusalem by St. Bernard, Bishop of Paris, in 1178; Philaster (q. v.), Alphonse Louis du Plessis de Richelieu (1625-29), and Michel Mazarin (1644-55), nephews of the cardinals of the same name; Monsignor du Lau, killed at the Carmes prison in 1792.

The church of Aix honors the memory of the martyr Gasparinus, regis emichum of Arles, at the beginning of the fourth century, who was beheaded for having refused to copy the edict of persecution against the Christians; the church of Aix honors the martyr Mitre. The city of Tarascon has for its patron, St. Martha, who, according to the legend, delivered the country of a monster called Tarascanus. St. Marinus, "Saint Marinus de la Mer" in the Camargue contains three venerated tombs, which are objects of a pilgrimage; according to a tradition which is attached to the legends concerning the emigration of St. Lazarus, St. Martha, St. Mary Magdalen, and St. Maximinus, these tombs contain the bodies of the three Marys of the Gospel. The principal councils held at Arles were: that of 314, convened by order of Constantine to condemn the Donatists; that of 353, which defended the Arians against St. Athanasius; and that of 1234, which dealt with the Albignian heresy. A college of the clergy, established by the Church of Aix in 1802, was suppressed in 1876. The cathedral of Arles, at first dedicated to the martyr St. Stephen, and in 1152 under the patronage of St. Trophimus, possesses a doorway and Gothic cloister of the most imposing type of beauty. The cemetery of Alyscamps, celebrated in the Middle Ages, remained, up to the end of the eighteenth century, the remains of St. Trophimus, which were finally moved to the cathedral. The ruins of Montmajour, in the suburbs of Arles, perpetuate the memory of a great Benedictine abbey founded in the twelfth century. The cathedral of Aix is a very beautiful edifice of the twelfth century. The Archdiocese of Aix, at the close of the year 1905, had 188,872 inhabitants, 25 parishes of the first, 106 of the second class and 21 curacies formerly paid by the State.

Aix-en-Provence, Councils of. Councils were held at Aix in 1112, 1374, 1409, 1585, 1612, 1838, and 1850. In that of 1612 the Gallican work of Edmund Richer, "De la puissance ecclésiastique et ecclésiologique" (Paris, 1615), was condemned. In 1838 the Fathers requested Gregory XVI to add "Immaculate" to the word "Conception" in the preface of the Mass for that feast of the Blessed Virgin, which he did. In the council of 1850 many modern errors were condemned, rationalism, pantheism, communism, also the arbitrary interpretation of the Scriptures.

Ajaccio (Adjacensis), Diocese of, comprises the island of Corsica. It was formerly a suffragan of the Archdiocese of Pisa, but since the French Concordat, has been a suffragan of Aix. The first bishop known to history was Evander, who assisted at the Council of Rome in 313. Before the Revolution Corsica contained five other dioceses: Acria (vacant since 1563); Aleria, an ancient city of the Phocians, whose bishop resided at Corte; Sagone, a vanished city whose bishop resided at Calvi, while the chapter was at Vico; Marianna, also a vanished city, whose bishop resided at Bastia; and Nebbio. Pius X, when appointing Mgr. Desanti Bishop of Ajaccio, reserved to the Bishop of Piana the right of nominating anew the diocesan limits, in virtue of which the Diocese of Bastia may be restored. The Byzantime ruins at Mariana perpetuate the memory of the church built by the Phasis in the twelfth century. These were all destroyed in 1267 by the Turks, who took the town and destroyed the church, which was then restored and dedicated to the Madonna. It is now a ruin, and is visited by pilgrims from all parts of the world.

Akhmim, a city of Upper Egypt, situated on the banks of the Nile. Of late years it has attained great importance, on account of the discoveries made there. The town is a mile and a half long, and is surrounded by a wall of stone, two miles in length, and is the seat of a bishopric.

The city is chiefly famous for its papyri and for its tapestries. Among the former, the fragments known as the "Gospel of Peter", the "Apocalypse of Peter", and the "Book of Henech" hold the first place, but need not be discussed here. The tapestries, however, have furnished material of primary importance in the history of textiles. The first examples of these ancient times, a few pieces of uncertain date, were to be found in various European museums. The excavations at Akhmim and the copies made by R. Förster have now supplied us with a quantity of materials in excellent preservation and of the greatest possible variety. The style of these Akhmim tapestries is sometimes original, but in a great many instances it approximates the decorative type of Roman or Eastern art. The older ones are far superior to the others in design, especially in their treatment of the human figure. The growing want of skill in this regard enables us to trace, step by step, the process of decadence. The Akhmim tapestries are in two colours, yellow and pale brown. With the introduction of polychromy, ornament and animal decoration take the place of human figures. Even this animal decoration is often so angular, so poorly rendered, as to end in outlines resembling anatomical designs.

The discoveries at Akhmim have not been confined to tapestries, though these are of the greatest importance to the history of the industrial arts. Förster has brought to light amulets of terra-cotta, clay, brick, and bronze, also jewels and toilet articles of gold or ivory. The discoveries have, however, revealed but little that is new to us in the way of textiles. The tapestry, indeed, shows the Lamb of God, bearing the little banner, which is probably the most ancient example of this still familiar symbolism.

Akominatos, Michael, d. 1215; and Nicetas, d. 1206; also known as Choniates, from their native city, Chonia (the Colossus of St. Paul), two famous Greeks of the later Byzantine period. While studying at Constantinople by their father's wish, Michael acted as tutor to his younger brother Nicetas. Michael became a priest; Nicetas studied history and jurisprudence, in addition to theology, and rose to high honours in the imperial service. As governor of the province of Philippopolis, he witnessed the passage of the Third Crusade under Frederick Barbarossa, in 1189, a march which entailed great hardship and suffering by the whole force. Fearing the attack of the Turks, and which Walter Scott has dealt with, incidentally, in his "Count Robert of Paris", Michael, who, by his brother's influence, had been made Archbishop of Athens in 1175, had a similar experience of "Latin" aggressions, and was even forced to retire to the island of Chios. Akominatos, with his brother from Constantinople to Nicea, where he died. Nicetas is the author of several important works concerning Byzantine theology and history. His "Treasure of Orthodoxy" (Θησαυρός Ἐρθηδοξίας) is a historical and polemical work against all anti-Christian heresies, valuable among other reasons for the treatment of contemporary errors, and in it he is supplementary to the famous "Armory of Doctrine" (Παιδεία Ἀρμοττικής) of Euthymios Zygabenos. It is also prized for its quotations from the synods of his time and for the fragments it has saved from lost Monophysite and other heretical writings. It has never been printed in its entirety; some portions of it are reprinted from earlier editions in Migne (P. G., CXXXIX, 1101-1444; CXL, 9-281). The work was written probably between 1204 and 1210. His fame as an historian of medieval Constantinople rests on his description in twenty-two books of the period from 1180 to 1206; his account of the fateful reigns of the last of the Komneni, especially the vicissitudes of the royal city during, the Fourth Crusade (1204); its siege, capture, and pillage by the Latin Christians (P. G., CXXXIX, 287-1088). Krumbacher vouches for his generally objective temper and equitable treatment of persons and events. The style is bombastic and overlaid with rhetorical ornament. His little treatise on the statues destroyed by the Latin "barbarians" (De Signis, P. G., CXXXIX, 287) is highly prized by students of classical antiquities. Michael, of whom Krumbacher says (p. 409) that his tenure of the see of Chonia was equated to a ray of light in the obscurity of ages, was a meritorious orator, pastoral writer, poet, and correspondent. His discourses cast a sad light on the wretched conditions of contemporary Attica, as does his iambic elegy "On the City of Athens", described as "the first and only surviving lamentation for the decay and ruin of the ancient industrious city". Of his letters 180 have reached us. His character is described as energetic, but gentle and upright. He was too much a Byzantine to denounce the imperial authority in the person of the cruel Andronicus, while that monster lived; but after his death, says Krumbacher, he could not find words to express his sentiments. The Latin and Greek writings are in Migne (P. G., CXL, 298-384; 124-1258). The best edition of his works is that of Spiridon Lambros (Athens, 1879-80).
The History of Nicetas was edited by Beexer for the Corpus Scriptorum Byzant. (Bonn, 1855). The portions relating to the Crusades are found in Millet, Recueil des Historiens du Proche-Orient et de la Croisade (Paris, 1875). For a comparison between Nicetas and the French "Miroir des Croisades", see Vilhardouin, see Sainte Beuve, Cours des Universités du Midi (Paris, 1854), IX, 385-40; see also Tafel, Kommnen und Normannen (1859).

Alabama. See Amadis.

Alaska. The twenty-second State admitted into the Federal Union of America, it lies north of the Gulf of Mexico, and is known as one of the Gulf, or South Central States. It is bounded north by Tennessee, east by Georgia, south by the Gulf and by Florida, and west by Mississippi. It lies between the parallels of 30° 15' and 35° north latitude, and the meridians of 84° 56' and 88° 48' west of Greenwich. From north to south it is 330 miles; and east to west, from 148 to 200 miles. It has an area of 52,250 square miles, of which 710 is water surface and 51,540 land surface. Its area in acres is 33,440,000. It has about 2,000 miles of navigable rivers, and Mobile is its only seaport. The State may be roughly divided into the Tennessee Valley on the north, highly productive of corn, cotton, cereals, and fruits; the mineral region; the cotton belt; the timber and the coast regions. The vegetation in the north belongs to the temperate zone, while in the south it is semi-tropical. Fine hardwood, as well as ordinary timber, are to be found well distributed over the entire State. The climate of the State is equable, and the extremes of heat and cold are rarely experienced. Animals and birds, usual in the West and South-west, are to be found. The streams abound in fish of almost every variety. The principal crop is cotton, the yield in 1905 being 1,249,858 bales, giving the State the third place in cotton production. Corn, wheat, oats, hay, and all other farm and garden products are profitably grown in considerable quantities. Alabama has, in the last quarter of a century, taken very high rank as a mineral State. The following are the statistics for 1905: iron ore, 3,782,591 tons; coal, 11,980,153 tons; coke, 2,756,698 tons; pig iron, 1,684,052 tons. In addition to the items just named, clay, bauxite, cement, graphite, marble, sulphur, and pyrites, silver and gold are mined in paying quantities. The growth of the mineral interests has quickened the laying out of cities, the multiplication of railroad lines, and the development of manufactures. In 1905 there were in the State 1,882 manufacturing establishments with a capital of $105,382,859, employing 3,763 officials, and 62,173 wage earners, and turning out a product valued at $109,169,922. The eleven leading industries in 1905 were: car construction, 16; planing and sawing; 2; cotton gins; 19; foundry and machine shops, 78; blast furnaces, steel works, and rolling mills, 2; lumber and timber products, 590; lumber-planing-mill products, 67; oil, cotton, and coke, 58; printing and publishing, 241; and turpentine and resin, 144. The following are the statistics of railroad mileage, 1905: 4,227.70 miles of main track; 1,317.36 miles of side track; total value of main line, side track, and rolling stock, $53,706,029.93. The public debt of the State is $9,057,000. The State tax rate cannot exceed sixty-five cents per annum on the hundred dollars.

History.—The territory now included in the State was for hundreds of years the home in part of the Creeks, Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, and other Indian tribes. It is not possible to place any approximate limit to their occupation, and their early history is involved in obscurity. Certain it is that the aboriginal inhabitants, first encountered by European explorers in this region, were the direct ancestors of the tribes named. In the early years of the sixteenth century daring sailors came to Mobile Bay; and survivors of the ill-fated Narvaez expedition are believed to have passed across the lower part of the State. In 1540 De Soto traversed the State, entering near Rome, Ga., and passing out not far from Columbus, Miss. On the 18th of October of that year he fought the great battle of Mauvila, one of the most sanguinary of Indian conflicts on the American Continent. He made no settlements, and his expedition was of no value further than for the record left by his chronicles concerning the Southern Indians. In 1560 a Spanish colony was located at Nacozar, believed to be in the present Wilcox county, Ala., but it was short-lived and no details are preserved. A century and a half pass, and a dark veil of obscurity covers the land. In 1697, or 1698, three Englishmen, coming overland from the Carolinas, descended the Alabama River to the village of the Mobilians on the Mobile River. La Salle had in the meantime (1682) taken formal possession of the Mississippi, and named the country Louisiana. Entering the Gulf of Mexico in 1699, Iberville explored the southern coast of what is now the United States, and made temporary settlement at Old Biloxi, near the present Ocean Springs, Miss. In January, 1702, he transferred his colony to 27-Mile Bluff, Mobile River, in the limits of what is now Alabama, and gave it the name of Fort Louis. This was the first attempt at a permanent settlement on the Gulf Coast, and was the site of Old Mobile. It is an interesting fact that in 1707 a number of the French Creoles went from Old Mobile up the Mobile stream to the Mobile of to-day and settled and planted small crops, thus becoming the first farmers in this territory. In 1711, the site of Fort Louis proving unsatisfactory, the whole colony was removed to the present Mobile, and this town was, until 1720, the residence of the governors and higher officers of the colony of Louisiana. Fort Toulouse, at the confluence of the Coosa and Tallapoosa Rivers, was planted as a remote outpost for Indian trade and as a buffer to the English advance from the South Atlantic settlements; in 1721 the first African slaves were landed at Mobile; in 1736 Fort Tombebeche was built on the Tombigbee River in the heart of the Choctaw country, to keep that tribe under French control; on 18 February, 1763, France ceded all her possessions east of the Mississippi, excepting the Island of Orleans, to Great Britain; by treaty of 30 November, 1782, marking the close of the contest of the colonies with the mother country, Great Britain ceded to them all her claims north of latitude 31°; and on 27 October, 1795, Spain relinquished to the United States her claims to West Florida, south of line 31°. Mississippi Territory was created by Act of Congress, 7 April, 1819, and under this and subsequent Acts of Enlargements, 45; the present State of Alabama and Mississippi constituted one Territory until 1817. The Creek Indian War of 1813 and 1814, fought largely in Alabama, and which started General Andrew Jackson on his long public career, temporarily retarded the growth of the Territory. On 1 March, 1817, Alabama Territory was formed, and after the adoption of a constitution under an Enabling Act of 2 March, 1819, the State was, 14 December, formally admitted into the Federal Union. St. Stephens was the seat of government for the Territory. Cuhaba, now Montgomery, was the capital in 1822, and Montgomery, 1846. In 1825 General Lafayette, on his last tour through the United States, visited several towns in Alabama. In the thirties the State University was opened, the terms of the judges were fixed for six years, the first railroad track west of the Allegheny Mountains was built from Tuscumbia, in the direction of Decatur, the Indians were removed to the West, a financial panic fell heavily upon the people, a State penitentiary was provided by law, and imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud, was abolished. To the struggles of the heroic Texans Alabama contributed a number of brave sons; and to the Mexican War she gave 3,126 volunteers.

Under the leadership of William Lowndes Yancey, Alabama had early taken a most advanced position in opposition to the Abolition sentiment and agitation of the North, and in 1860 the Legislature provided for a convention, in case of the election of Lincoln, to decide what action in relation to the government of the State they should take. The convention was held at Montgomery, the delegates from six seceding States, including Alabama, met and formed the Provisional Government of the Confederate States of America. On 15 April, 1861, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, issued a Proclamation of War, and at once the brave and patriotic people of the State rallied to her defence. The Tennessee Valley was the theatre of numberless raids, and the people suffered many indignities at the hands of the Federals. The forts below Mobile, although strongly defended, were taken in 1864, and the town was taken 1865. The University buildings were wantonly burned in 1865, by an invading force under General Croxton. Selma and Montgomery were taken in 1865. Alabama contributed to the war from 1861 to 1865 more than 100,000 men, out of a total white population, in 1860, of 526,271. There was no important battle east of the Tombigbee River in 1818; the most important in the West was at Vicksburg.

The University of Alabama was opened in 1820; in 1822 it was chartered, and in 1847 it was incorporated.

Population.—As previously stated, Mobile was the first settlement of white men in Alabama; and in Alabama was located the first chartered institution to grant diplomas to women. The last quarter of a century has witnessed a remarkable increase of interest in education, and at present (1905) about one-half of the State's revenues go into support of the public or common schools and the higher institutions of learning. The State University, the head of the system, is located at Tuscaloose; the Alabama Polytechnic Institute (agricultural and mechanical) established in 1872, is located at Auburn; the Alabama Girls' Industrial School, at Montevallo; four normal colleges, for white pupils, at Florence, Troy, Jacksonville, and Livingston; three normal schools, for negro pupils, at Montgomery, Tuskegee, and Normal, and nine agricultural experiment stations at Jackson, Evergreen, Abbeville, Sylacauga, Wetumpka, Hamilton, Albertville, Athens, and Blountsville. The common schools are directed by a State superintendent of education, and the local machinery consists of county boards and district trustees. There are fifteen school districts governing schools established by special Acts, as Montgomery, Birmingham, etc. Separate State institutions for both white and negro deaf, dumb, and blind are located at Talladega.
A Reform School for white boys is conducted at East Lake. A separate agricultural experiment station is maintained at Uniontown. Expenditures have been made by the State for educational purposes for the fiscal year ending 30 September, 1906, as follows:
public, or common, school system, $1,215,115.92;
Alabama Polytechnic Institute, $20,280.00; University of Alabama, $27,000.00; Deaf, Dumb, and Blind institutions, $71,322.56; Alabama Girls' Industrial School, $77,000.00; Alabama Industrial School for White Boys, $8,000.00.
In addition to the institutions maintained from the public treasury, there are the following higher institutions supported and controlled by religious denominations: Spring Hill College, near Mobile; St.
Bernard College, Cullman; McGill Institute, Mobile;
St. Joseph's College for Negro Catechists, Montgomery (Catholic); Southern University, Greensboro; North Alabama Conference College, Birmingham; Athens Female College, Athens; and Alabama Conference Female College, Tuskegee (Methodist Episcopal Church, South); Howard College (Baptist); Judson Female College, Marion, (Baptist); Noble Institute, Anniston (Protestant Episcopal); Syno-codical College for Men, Anniston, and Isbell College, Talladega (Presbyterian). Several institutions of high grade are conducted as private enterprises, notably the Marion Military Institute, Colleges of Montevallo and Pace, Huntingdon, Eut-terprise, and the State Normal College of Hanceville.
A law department is maintained on campus.
Co-education obtains in all State institutions, expect in the Alabama Girls' Industrial School and the Livingston State Normal School. There are several schools for the higher education of negroes in addition to the three normal schools above noted, namely:
Talladega College, Talladega; Alabama Baptist Normal and Theological School, Selma; Academic and Industrial Institute, Kowaliga; Calhoun Coloured School, Calhoun; and Normal Industrial Institute, Snow Hill. The Theological School at Selma, as the name implies, has a theological department; the Stullman Institute is conducted under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church, for the education of negro preachers, and St. Joseph's College at Montgomery, is a Catholic institution for the training of negro catechists.
RELIGION.—The Catholic Church on the Alabama
Gulf Coast dates from the coming of Iberville's colonists in 1699. He was accompanied by Father Anastase Douay, who had, by many in error, been with La Salle. Catholic missionaries were abroad in the Mississippi Valley prior to this date, and Biloxi had hardly been located when Father Antony Davon made his appearance. He and Father Dougé ministered to the spiritual wants of the colonists until 1704, and even after, but in this year came the induction, by Davon, of De La Vente as priest of a church formally set up at Fort Louis. This step was taken in consequence of the erection of Mobile into a canonical parish by the Bishop of Quebec. From this time on the Church has a continuous history in Mobile. La Vente alternated with Alexander Huvé, 340 for 17 years, until 1719. Thereafter, until about 1722. Father Jean Mattheu, of the Capuchin Order, officiated at Mobile, 1721 to 1736; while Father Jean François and Father Ferdinand, also Capuchins, as well as Jesuits, were here from 1736 to 1763. From time to time numbers of other names are found, St. Joseph, as minister as officiating parish priest, 1710 to 1728. The old records, showing births, deaths, marriages, and baptisms, are preserved in the church archives at Mobile.
Excellent summaries and details from these records are found in Peter J. Hamilton's "Colonial Mobile" (1897).
After the occupation of Mobile by the Spaniards, in 1780, and the expulsion of the British,
the church was called the Immaculate Conception, a name it has since borne. After American occupation, in 1812, for a number of years no substantial advance was made, and in 1825, when Bishop Portier entered upon his office, the church in Mobile was the only one in Alabama, and he was the only priest.
The Church building was of brick.
The early priests were zealous missionaries, and with consecrated zeal they laboured to bring the untutored child of the forest into the fold of the Church. Father Davon, above mentioned, was first a missionary to the Tunicas. In 1709 churches were erected at Dauphin Island, and also ten miles above Mobile for a band of Apalache Indians, who had been earlier converted by Spanish missionaries.
Father Charles, a Carmelite, was a missionary among them in 1721. There were missions at Fort Toulouse and Fort Tombeebe, and also at Chickasawhlay.
Father Michael O'Leary was for eighteen years among the Choctaws. These missions were largely abandoned after 1763, owing to British occupation.
Until 1772 the parish of Mobile was a part of the Diocese of Quebec. In this year, with the subdivision of the southern country for administrative purposes by Law's Company, there was a parcelling out of parishes among the missionaries located in the orders of the Church. The Illinois country went to the Jesuits; New Orleans and west of the Mississipi to the Capuchins, and the Mobile district to the Barefoot Carmelites. In a very short time a change was made, and Mobile was given over to the Caphins. During Spanish occupation, 1799 to 1819, the Diocese of Santiago de Cubs. Later the northern part of the territory now embraced in the State was under the Archbishop of Baltimore, while the southern was under the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Louisiana and Florida. In 1825 the Vicariate-Apostolic of Alabama and Florida was created, and the Reverend Michael Portier was appointed Bishop.
He was consecrated 5 November, 1826. On 15 May, 1829, the Diocese of Mobile was created, embracing in its bounds West Florida and all of Alabama.
Bishop Portier was continued in his office, and served until his death, in 1839. His successors in order were John Quinlan (1839-1849); Dom Michael Mc-Kinley (1838-1885); and Jeremiah O'Sullivan (1885-1897).
These possessed marked ability and were positive and uplifting forces in the life of the State. The incumbent bishop is the Right Reverend Edward P.
Allen (1897). During the life of the Church in the State it has been served, in Mobile, by many in extensive learning, and men who have contributed their part as well as shaping the growth of the commonwealth in high civic ideals. In addition to the above-named clergy, the following prominent members of the Catholic Church in Alabama should be noted:
Father Abram J. Ryan, poet-priest; Margaret O’Brien Davis, author; Lucian Julian Walker, journalist and author; Raphael Semmes, Admiral in the Confederate Navy; Charles A. M.NAV; and the Sisters of the Sacred Heart and the Sisters of St. Mary.

In educational and benevolent enterprises the Catholic Church of Alabama has an enviable record. Institutions devoted to charity and education under its direction are as follows: Spring Hill College, St. Bernard College, Academy of the Visitacion, and McGill Institute, at Mobile; St. Vincent’s Hospital, at Birmingham; Providence Infirmary, at Mobile; and St. Margaret’s Hospital, at Montgomery. Convents and schools are conducted in Montgomery and Birmingham by the Sisters of Loretto, in Selma by the Sisters of the Sacred Heart; in Barbour County by the Sisters of the Sacred Heart; and in Tuscaloosa by the Sisters of St. Benedict. An asylum for boys is conducted at Mobile by the Brothers of the Sacred Heart; and for girls by the Sisters of Charity of Emmitsburg. Md. St. Joseph’s College for negro catechists is located near Montgomery. A Catholic newspaper, The Messenger, is published in the same city.

Protestant and other religious efforts.—From the very first arrival of American emigrants the Protestant denominations were represented, but it was not until 1808 that formal organization of congregations took place. They entered the field that year most probably in the following order: Methodist, Cumberland Presbyterian, and Baptist. However, in the territorial period the struggle for existence on the part of settlers was so intense that no very general progress was made until the first decade of statehood. From 1819 to 1832 they entered upon a real healthy growth and expansion. A higher state of intellectual cultivation existed among the preachers. Regular houses of worship took the places of the makeshifts of private houses, the county courthouse, and the open air. The camp-meeting grew as a potent factor in the opening of the frontier, and in advancing the cause of the churches. In October, 1823, the Baptist State Convention was organized. On 1 March, 1821, the Presbytery of Alabama was formed, and in 1834 the Synod of Alabama was set off from the Mississippi Synod. From its introduction into the State, in 1808, to 1832 the Methodist Church had at various times been in part under the South Carolina, the Tennessee, the Mississippi, and the Georgia Conferences. In the latter year the Alabama Conference was organized. The Methodist Protestant Church was organized in Alabama in 1829. While there were numbers of individuals in all the States and territories of the occupation of its territory by Great Britain, it was not until 1825 that, in Mobile, its first Episcopal church was organized, but it had no minister until December, 1827. A Primary Convention was held 25 January, 1830, and an organization effected. According to the most reliable information, the Southern Baptists in Alabama numbered 150,945; the Southern Methodists, 325,382; the Southern Presbyterians, 15,020. The following denominations are also represented in the State: Unitarians, Congregationalists, Universalists, Christian Scientists, Lutherans, Salvation Army, and Campbellites. Nearly all of these denominations have well organized societies. The coloured population, which also has several religious organizations of its own. The Jews have strong congregations in all of the leading towns. Sectorian schools have already been noted under the head of education. Orphan asylums and other benevolences are conducted by the Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and the Salvation Army.

State laws on subjects directly affecting religion.—Under the Constitution of 1901, which practically followed earlier instruments, it is provided (Section 2): “That no religion shall be established by law; that no preference shall be given by law to any religious or moral sect, denomination, or mode of worship, that no one shall be compelled by law to attend any place of worship, nor to pay any tithes, taxes or other rate for building or repairing any place of worship, or for maintaining any minister or ministry; that no religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under this State; and that the civil rights, privileges and capacities of every citizen shall not be in any manner affected by his religious principles”. In the courts testimony is required to be given under oath or affirmation. No search warrant can issue unless supported by oath. All executive, legislative, and judicial officers are required by law to receive an oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, and of the State, and to faithfully discharge the duties of the office. By statute the word “oath” includes “affirmation”. (See 71 Ala. Reports, 319, for discussion of nature and character of an oath.) The observance of Sunday is not directly enjoined, but the sanctity of the day is recognized in the prohibition against the working of a child, apprentice, or servant, except in “the customary domestic duties of daily necessity or comfort, or works of charity”, also in the prohibition against shooting, hunting, gaming, card-playing, or racing, or keeping open store or market (except by druggists) on that day. It is to be observed that these provisions “do not apply to the running of railroads, stages, or steamboats, or other vessels navigating the waters of this State, or any manufacturing establishment which requires to be kept in constant operation”. There is no statute against blasphemy or profanity, as such, these subjects being regulated as at common law. There is no constitutional or statutory provision requiring the use of prayer in the State Senate and House of Representatives, but it has always been customary for each body to provide for such a service to be held as it may choose. The clergy of the Episcopal and other clergy of the city, without discrimination, are asked to alternate. Among other holidays, Sunday, Christmas, and Good Friday, are set apart by statute for public observance.

Laws on subjects affecting religious work.—Members of any church or religious society, or the owners of a graveyard, may become incorporated by complying with a liberal statute on the subject, and may hold real and personal property not to exceed $50,000 in value. The property of institutions devoted exclusively to religious, educational, or charitable purposes is exempt from taxation to a limited extent. Certain classes of real property are exempt from jury duty. Military service is voluntary. Marriage between whites and negroes is prohibited. Legislative divorce is not allowed under the constitution. With certain limitations the following are the statutory grounds for divorce: physical and incurable incapacity, adultery, voluntary abandonment, subdivision of land, and the commission of the crime against nature, habitual drunkenness, and cruelty. The Constitution prohibits the appropriation of public school funds in support of any sectarian or denominational school. Liberal charters of incorporation are allowed to religious and charitable institutions, and their property is exempt from taxation as above, but no public funds can be appropriated to any charitable institution “not under the absolute control of the State”. Cemeteries are not subject to taxation. The sale of liquors is regulated by State, county, and municipal license. Special prohibition laws, local dispensaries, and local option laws are in operation in various parts of the State. A State penitentiary is maintained. State and county hospitals, under general or local regulations, are worked in the mines, lumber camps, on the public roads, on farms, and in factories. A reform school for white boys is conducted by the State at East Lake. Insane hospitals, for the whites at Tuscaloosa, and for the negroes at Mt. Vernon, are governed by local boards of trustees. Regulations obtain on the subjects of wills of real and personal property, limited to soundness of mind, and to persons of twenty-one years, in the case of realty, and eighteen years, in the case of personalty. Devices may be made to any person or corporation capable by law of holding real estate. The Supreme Court has held that a bequest to “the Baptist Societies for Foreign and Domestic Missions and the American and Foreign Bible Society” is valid; also one to “Pilgrim’s Rest Association”, and also one for the erection of monuments to certain named persons. In the case of Fosters vs. St. Joseph’s Church (107 Ala., 327), it was held that a sum was to be paid to a church to be expended in paying Mass for the repose of the testator’s soul is invalid, because the church might apply the fund to other uses, and thus defeat the testator’s intent.

Alabanda, a titular see of Caria in Asia Minor, supposed to be the present Arab-Hissar. A list of its bishops is known from 451 to 579. In antiquity its inhabitants were noted for their habits of luxury. It was a diocesan court in imperial times and a very flourishing town.

Alabaster (Gr. ἀλαστρός, or Lat. alabaster, -rum; of uncertain origin). The substance commonly known as alabaster is a fine-grained variety of gypsum (calcium sulphate) much used for vases and other ornamental articles. Oriental alabaster, the alabastrides of the classical writers, is a translucent marble (calcium carbonate) obtained from stalagmitic deposits; because of its usually banded structure, which gives it some resemblance to onyx, it is also called onyx marble, or simply, though incorrectly, onyx. From remote times it was highly esteemed for decorative purposes. Among the ancients Oriental alabaster was frequently used for vases to hold unguents, in the belief that it preserved them; whence the vases were called alabasters, even when made of other materials. Such was the "alabasstrum unguentii" (Matt., xxvi, 7; Mark, xiv, 3; Luke, xii, 7, 3); it was also called by the name of the Roman anointed by Christ for the evening. The vase, however, though probably of alabaster, was not necessarily of that material, as our English translation "alabaster box of ointments" seems to imply.

ALAGONA, the diocese of.—A South American diocese, in eastern Brazil, dependent on Bahia. By a decree of Leo XIII, Postremus hisce temporibus, 2 July, 1900, it was separated from the Diocese of Olinda. The see was exempted from the comitatus of Edinburg and transferred by Pope Pius X to the see of Recife. By the laws of Recife on the north and north-west, the Atlantic on the south-east, and Sergipe on the south-west. Area, 22,583 square miles. Population (1890), 648,009. Monsignor Castilho de Brandao, the first bishop, who resides at Maceio, the capital, a town of 12,000 inhabitants, was consecrated at Belem on 7 May, 1854, and transferred to this see, 5 June, 1901.

ALAGONA, Pietro, theologian, b. at Syracuse, 1549; d. in Rome, 19 October, 1624. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1564, taught philosophy and theology, and was Rector of Trapani. His first works were published under the family name of his mother, Givara. Later on he used his own name, Alagona, and is best known for his Compendium of the works of Martin Aspilcuetas, who was a doctor of theology in Navarre. This Martin Aspilcuetas was the uncle of St. Francis Xavier. The "Enchiriadio seu Manuale Consilia," compiled by Alagona, went through at least twenty-three editions. A translation of it into French, by Legard, was condemned by the Parliament of Rouen, 12 February, 176. He also published a compendium of the "Summa," which ran through twenty-five editions, and a compendium of the whole of Canon Law in two volumes, quarto. In the Jesuit College of Palermo there is also found a treatise by Alagona on Logic and Physics.

Alain Chartier. See Chartier.

Alain de l'Isle, also called Alain de Lille, Alenus ab Insulis, ob de Insulis, Alain von Rhetz etc., monk, poet, preacher, theologian, and ecclesiastic philosopher, b. probably at Lille, whence his name, about 1126; d. at Citeaux, 1203. Alain, there is reason to believe, studied and taught for some time in Paris. In 1179 he took part in the Third Council of the Lateran. Later he entered the Monastery of Citeaux, where he died in 1202 or 1203. Alain attracted extraordinary admiration to his teaching and as a learned man; he was called Alain the Great, The Universal Doctor, etc. To this the legend adds, according to which a scholar, disinherited in a dialectical contest, cried out that his opponent was "either Alain or the devil". Alain's principal work is "Ars Fidelis Catholica", dedicated to Clement III, and composed for the purpose of refuting, on rational grounds, the errors of Mohammedans, Jews, and heretics. With the same view he wrote "Tractatus Contra Haereticos" and "Theologias Regulae". He wrote two poems, "De Planeta Nature" and "Anti-Claudianus". The only collection of Alain's works is Migne's somewhat uncorrected edition, P. L. CCX. The two poems are published by Wright in "Satirical Poets of the Twelfth Century", II (Rerum Britannicarum Scriptores). There are several of Alain's treatises still unpublished, for instance, "De Virtutibus et Vitis" (Codex, Paris, Bibl. Nat., n. 3238). Alain's theology is characterized by a variety of rationalism tinged with mysticism which is found in the writings of John Scotus Erigena, and which afterwards reappeared in the works of Raymond Lully. The mysticism is, perhaps, more in the style than in the matter; the rationalism consists in the effort to prove that all religious truths, even the mysteries of faith, flow out of principles that are self-evident to the human reason unaided.
by revelation. His philosophy is a syncretism, or eclecticism, in which the principal elements are Platonism, Aristotelianism, and Pythagoreanism. He esteemed Plato as the philosopher; Aristotle he regarded merely as a subtle logician. His knowledge of Plato he derived from Martianus Capella Apuleius, Boethius, and others. From the time of Charitonides' first-hand acquaintance with the "Dialogues" being limited to Chalcidius' rendering of a fragment of the "Timeus". He was acquainted with some of Aristotle's logical writings and with the commentaries of Boethius and Porphyry. He derived his Pythagoreanism from those of Hermagoras, Aeschines of Carystus, Asclepius, and Mercurius. Finally his mystic manner was influenced by Pseudo-Dionysius and John Scotus Erigena.

The effect of all these influences was an attempt on Alain's part to fuse into one system the various elements derived from different sources, without taking much pains to find a common basis or a principle of organic synthesis. Thus, in psychology he gives at different times three different divisions of the faculties of the soul: a twofold (ratio, sensualitas), a threefold (sapientia, voluntas, voluptas), and a five-fold (sensus, imaginatio, ratio, intellectus, intelligentia). In physics he teaches that the fire in later Platonico sense); and the bond between them is a physical spirit (spiritus physicus). In cosmology he teaches that God first created "Nature", whose rôle it was to act as his intermediary (De auctoribus veterum) in the details of creating and organizing matter into the universe. At every step in this portion of his philosophy the influence of the neo-Platonic appears. As a writer, Alain exhibited an unusual combination of poetic imaginativeness and dialectical precision. He modelled his style on that of Martianus Capella, though in his later years the influence of Boethius was, perhaps, predominant, but he is to be numbered among the medieval writers who influenced Dante.

Alaman, Lucas, a Mexican statesman and historian of great merit, b. at Guanajuato in Mexico, of Spanish parents, 18 October, 1792; d. in the city of Mexico, 2 June, 1853. He received his early education in the city of Mexico, went to Spain and France in 1814, and returned to America in 1815. He made a second voyage between 1815 and 1823; in 1824 he became minister of the Mexican republic. Alaman was a moderate Republican, and, therefore, violently persecuted by the extremist factions in 1834, and compelled to hide for a full year. After 1836 he dedicated himself to literary and historical work until 1851, when Santa Ana recalled him to the post of Secretary of State. His two monumental works are: "Disertaciones sobre la historia de la Republica mexicana" (Mexico, 1844), and "Historia de Mexico, desde los primeros movimientos que prepararon su independencia en el año de 1808, hasta la época presente" (Ibid., 1849). With the exception of the (now antiquated) conceptions of the primitive civilization of the Mexican Indians, these works are of standard value.

Alamanus, Niccolò, a Roman antiquary of Greek origin, b. at Ancona, 12 January, 1583; d. in Rome, 1626. He was educated in Rome at the Greek College, founded by Gregory XIII, but was ordained deacon and priest according to the Latin rite. After teaching Greek for some time to persons of rank, he was appointed secretary to Cardinal Borghese, and afterwards made custodian of the Vatican Library. His death is said to have been caused by too close attendance at the Creation of the Doge of St. Peter's, to which honourable duty he had been assigned with orders to see that the sepulchres of the holy martyrs were not interfered with in the course of the work. He wrote a "Syntagma de Lateranensiis parietibus" (Rome, 1625) on the occasion of restorations carried out in the church of St. John Lateran by his patron, Cardinal Borghese, also a dissertation on the relative importance of the right and left side as exhibited in certain old papal coins that place St. Paul to the right of St. Peter, "De dextre levaseque manus prorogativae ex antiquis Fontibus nummis Paulum Petro apostolo antependiorum" (Rome, 1637). He is known by the title he gave his chief work, a "Histoire littéraire du siecle de Lyon" (Lyons, 1623) of the famous "Anecdota", or "Secret History", of Procopius, a work that was violently criticized outside of Italy.

Alain, William. See ALLEN.

Alan of Tewkesbury, a Benedictine abbot and writer, d. 1202. Alan is stated by Gervase of Canterbury, a contemporary chronicler, to have been English by race, i. e. not of Norman, or any immigrant, extraction. He is supposed to have spent some years at Benevento in Italy, before entering the Benedictine novitiate at Canterbury, where he became Prior in 1179. He zealously espoused the cause of the clergy against Henry II in the struggle which led to the martyrdom of St. Thomas. He was removed from Canterbury to the Abbey of Tewkesbury, where he could less effectively oppose Henry's encroachments on the rights of the church. The intimacy of St. Thomas with Alan of Tewkesbury enjoyed, and his almost lifelong acquaintance with the politico-ecclesiastical controversies of the time, qualified him to write the "Life of St. Thomas", which (as Life of Becket) is printed in the second volume of "Materials for the History of Thomas Becket", edited by the Rev. J. B. Webb, series, London, 1875-85; Part I, CXC, 1475-88). Alan also collected and arranged a number of the Saint's epistles. Critics are doubtful as to the genuineness of the other works traditionally ascribed to him.

Alan of Walsingham, d. c. 1364; a celebrated architect, first heard of in 1314 as a junior monk at Ely, distinguished by his skill and originality in his acquaintance with the principles of mechanics. He afterwards turned his attention to the study of architecture, and in 1331, when sub-prior of his convent, designed and began to build the beautiful St. Mary's Chapel (now Trinity Church), attached to the cathedral. At the same time he held the office of Prior Cranfield's chapel, the new sacristy, and many minor works. In December, 1321, he was elected sacristan, with sole charge of the fabric of the cathedral. In February, 1322, the great tower of the cathedral fell, and carried with it the choir and other attached portions of the struct-

Alaska. I. History.—The first definite knowledge of Alaska was acquired in 1741 through the expedition under Vitus Bering, a Dane in the Russian service, who, in that year, sailed from Okhotek as far as 58° 30' N. lat. A couple of years later, Siberian fur hunters, starting from the Russian coast along the northeast of the American continent and the Aleutian Islands in search of the valuable sea-otter. In 1762 Andreian Tolstyk, after a sojourn of three years in these regions, returned to Russia, and on his report the cession of the commercial importance of Alaska Catherine II sent an expedition to foster trade and colonization. rival companies began to dispute the territory, but in 1780 two traders, Grigor Shillichkof and Ivan Golikof, relying on home influence, chiefly that of Rezanof, Chamberlain to the Emperor, formed the Russian-American Fur company, the history of which is the history of Muscovite domination in Alaska from 1780 until the sale of the territory to the United States in 1867. In 1786, Gerassim Prilifolof, an employee of the Company, discovered the seal rookeries in the Bering Sea. This discovery occasioned the reopening of trade with China, from which Holland and England, by their greater facilities, had driven Russia. The fur of the seal was especially prized by the Chinese, who had found the secret of plucking and dyeing the skins, and a lucrative trade was the result. Alexander Baranof, who, in 1790, became general manager of the company, was for more than a quarter of a century the pre-eminent genius of a commerce which extended to California and the Sandwich Islands as well as to China. Klikitat Island was at the first head of the Russians in Alaska, but they afterwards established their capital at Sitka, on Baranof Island, where a new centre of Russian activity was established. Shipbuilding and various other industries were started. Rude agricultural implements were made for the Mexican and Canton trade; so were cas for the Spanish mission churches, which are used to be still in use. The policy of inland exploration pursued by the successors of Baranof turned the energies of the fur company into other channels, and necessarily reduced its dividends. The charter granted in 1796 had been renewed in 1821 and 1844. When it expired in 1864 no renewal was granted, nor was it sought. Negotiations had been begun with the United States, which ended in the purchase of Alaska in 1867, for $7,200,000. The official transfer was made in October of that year, General Rousseu acting for the United States and Prince Makkhar for Russia. The Russians were given two years to close up their business in the territory. Meanwhile American activity was rife; squatters and miners flocked into the country, and great commercial companies were organized to exploit the new field. These companies have made fortunes in fisheries and fur-hunting, while in recent years mining and various metals has been promising similar returns.

II. Area and Accessibility.—According to the census of 1900, Alaska embraces, inclusive of the islands, 590,804 square miles. These figures represent all the North American continent west of the 141st meridian of western longitude, with a narrow fringe of territory extending to the Pacific and British territory, all the islands along the coast, and the Aleutian chain. The acreage, according to the Governor's report for 1901, is 360,529,600. This great empire is equal in size to all the States east of the Mississippi. Its heart is a great central plateau, 600 miles long east to west, and 400 miles north to south, though its extreme limits are 800 by 1,000 miles. This does not include the Aleutian Islands—the stepping stones to Asia—that stretch from its southwestward portion westward into the Pacific about 1,500 miles. Numerous inlets provide an easy coastwise intercommunication, but the chief natural highway is the mighty Yukon, navigable for 2,500 miles east to west. It divides the Alaskan territory near the centre, and is ice-free from June to October. Petroff says that at its mouth it discharges into the Bering Sea a greater volume of water than the Mississippi. Several large navigable rivers, notably the Koyukuk and Tanana, flow into the Yukon, but many of the smaller streams, running into the Bering Sea and the Arctic Ocean, are shallow, and available only for small craft, a circumstance which is retarding the work of prospecting and mining. Various railways in and through Alaska are projected, one or two of which are under construction. The completion of those will greatly contribute to advance a hundredfold the interests of the country. Alaska is mountainous, but contains extensive river valleys of productive soil. From Seattle to Skagway is a distance of about 1,000 miles, a little more than from New York to Chicago; and from Seattle to the most distant point of Alaska is about the distance from New York to San Francisco. The gold-fields of the Yukon are reached from Seattle by ocean steamer, rail, and river steamer in about six days. It takes about twice as long to reach the placer miners of Nome. Communication is open during the summer season only; in winter, transportation is carried on with the aid of dog-teams.

III. RESOURCES.—The actual wealth of Alaska consists in fur-seals, fisheries, and gold-mines. The principal breeding-ground of the fur seal is on the Pribilof Islands, just north of the Aleutian chain. From 1868 to the middle of 1903 the seals taken by the American sealing vessels in Alaska was $35,000,000, while the value of $17,000,000 mined in 1905 brought the total value of the Alaskan fur trade in this period to the sum of $52,000,000. These figures take no account of the pelagic-seal catch. The salmon fisheries are another source of wealth; in 1901, 19,000 barrels of canned salmon were sent to the United States, and in 1905 the total value of the fish exportation was $9,010,089. The cod-fisheries promise, by reason of their vast area and rich supply, to exceed in value those of Newfoundland or any other part of the world. Placer gold has been located in many places in Alaska—a fact which proves that the territory is being rapidly explored. Gold mines are being successfully worked in three localities: southeastern Alaska, the Yukon river and its tributaries, and the Cape Nome district opposite the coast of Asia. The output of gold in American Alaska for the fiscal year 1905 was about $10,000,000. It is reported that the Yukon Klondike is now entering into calculations of commerce. There is abundant supply of valuable timber, especially in southeastern Alaska, but it is not yet legally available for export, as the public lands have not been surveyed. Agriculture is possible in about 100,000 square miles in southeastern Alaska, which owes to the "Japana current, which brings the warm north-west winds and produces wheat, oats, grasses for cattle, and vegetables in great variety. The latest official reports speak with praise of the supplies raised at the Holy Cross Mission, on the Yukon. It would be possible for the land to furnish at least a portion of the food supply best needed by the Pacific and British territory, all the islands along the coast, and the Aleutian chain.

IV. CLIMATE.—Alaska offers a great variety of climates. Along the southern and southeastern coasts the "Japan current" distributes a part of its equatorial heat, and creates on the fringe of islands, and for some twenty miles inland, a distinctly temperate zone. The mean temperature of Sitka is 32° Fahrenheit. Winter opens with December, and the snows are gone by May, except on the mountain-sides. Little of the warmth of the "Japan current" reaches north of the Aleutian range. The winter in the Yukon and Seward Peninsula is long, hard, and winter. The summer warm and brief. The winter sun rises in the Yukon valley from 9.30 to 10, and sets between 2 and 3. The summer sun rises at 1.30 in the morning and sets at 10 in the evening, and the twenty hours of daylight are followed by a diffused twilight. In general, the changes of climate in the north are rapid and extreme, the mean summer temperature being from 60° to 70° Fahrenheit, while the winter cold registers as low as 50° and 60° below zero, and near the Arctic Circle still greater extremes are met with, the thermometer reaching 70° below zero. However, owing to the dryness of the atmosphere, the intense cold is not disagreeable, and white men in those northern regions experience no inconvenience in travelling over the tundras with their dog-teams and sleds.

V. GOVERNMENT AND REVENUE.—Alaska, though called a territory, is properly known as the "District of Alaska." It has no legislature and no territorial form of government. It is represented directly by Congress, and locally administered by a governor, assisted by a secretary, and a surveyor-general, United States marshals, and attorneys, appointed by the President, subject to the approval of the Senate. It constitutes a judicial district, with three subdivisions, and three courts. The Governor is required to make an annual report to the Secretary of the Interior. The capital is Sitka, on Baranof Island, a city founded by the Russian Governor of that name in 1799, and the oldest town in Alaska. The sale of liquor to the natives is governed by special regulations. From 1867 to 30 March 1903, the Governor received a revenue of $9,555,909, of which $7,597,331 were paid in as a tax on fur seals, and $528,558 as customs.

VI. EDUCATION.—The pupils are under the official supervision of a United States general agent for education in Alaska, who resides at Washington. In 1887 there were 18 public schools with 58 teachers and 2,083 pupils. From 1884 to 1901 Congress made a small annual grant for the support of these schools, but in 1901 an act was passed by which license fees collected from unincorporated towns were to be applied in part to the establishment and maintenance of schools for the education of Indian children and such other purposes as the Secretary of the Interior might determine would lead to a "civilized life". Such schools are placed in charge of the Governor of Alaska as ex-officio superintendent of education. By the same act the education of the Eskimos and Indians remained under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and provision is made for the work by an annual appropriation ($50,000 in 1905). The principal elements of this public education for the natives are the teaching of the English language, spoken and written, and the arts of reindeer-herding and transportation, helpful at once to the white man and the native (Statement 351 of the Commissioner of Education to the Secretary of the Interior, 30 June, 1905, 26-48).

VII. Native Tribes—Pagan Superstitions, etc. —The Alaskan aborigines fall under four main divisions or groups: (1) The Aleuts, who occupy the whole of the Aleutian Islands, the north coast of the Alaskan Peninsula from Cape Stroganof westward, and its southern coast from Pavlof Bay westward; (2) the Ten'a, or western Athabascans, who are spread over the interior of the territory on both sides of the Yukon river as far west as Koseresky. A among their misguided votaries credit for infallibility and makes them in the eyes of believers mediators between the visible and invisible worlds. Ivan Petroff, in his “Population, Resources, etc. of Alaska” (embodied in the United States Census Report for 1880), describes the Shamanistic ceremonies of initiation, incantations, etc. Veniaminof (John Popoff) the most authoritative Russian writer on Alaska, says: “It was a very rare occurrence that the son of a Shaman adopted the trade of his father. Probably the Shaman on his death-bed forbade his son to do so, explaining to him the worst side of his position, and turning his desires in another direction. Many of the Shamans called their occupation the service of the devil, and told the young men that nobody who had any fear or apprehension must lay claim to the title of Shaman, and that they themselves had not adopted the profession voluntarily, but because they were powerless to resist belt of Eskimo hems them in on the northwest and south and separates them completely from the ocean except at one point near Cook’s Inlet on the North Pacific; (3) the Thlunkeets, or Koloshes, as the Russians called them, who people the islands and coast of southeastern Alaska; (4) the Eskimo, or Inuits, who are scattered along the coast line from Alaska to Labrador. These different groups are subdivided into families, subdivisions which are based mainly on linguistic differences. Like most northern savages they were at one time, and still are in some degree, addicted to Shamanism, or sorcery, which enters intimately into all their relations, personal, social, and civil. An occult influence, they believe, resides in certain persons and is hereditary, being transmitted with its mysteries and paraphernalia (masks, drums, straps, bones, etc.) to sons and grandsons. It enables them to reveal the future, to discover lost or hidden things, and with preternatural assistance to avoid misfortunes or disasters. It ensures them the devil.” There were, of course, numerous errors in a religion allied to such practices. Nevertheless we do not subscribe to the statement (p. 13) in “Handbook 84 on Alaska”, issued by the Bureau of American Republics, Washington (1880): “Except as their ideas are modified by relations and intercourse with white people they have no religion, unless certain definite superstitions, having no connection with any idea of a supreme spiritual being, be called religion.” On the contrary, it can be seen in the writings of Petroff, Holemberg, and Veniaminof that they possess certain elements of religion. Thus, every tribe recognized a Creator, termed in the traditions of the coast, Nunuklukta; throughout the archipelagic circle, Agoughouk; among the Kadiaks, Shilam-Shoa; and along the narrow strip to the southeast, the Yesli, or Yeul. They held an immortality and a state of retributive rewards and punishments even beyond the grave, and this in the uncommon case of cremation of the body. They exhibited at times a wonderfully elaborate moral code. This is especially true of the Hydah branch of the Thlinkete, who, ethnologically, are the most interesting branch of the Thlinkete aborigines. The Hydahs inhabit Prince of Wales Island, and their haunts are visited yearly by hundreds of tourists. The myths attached to their origin—the story of the descent of their families, one from the bear, another from the whale, a third from the raven, and so on; and the elaborate totem system resulting therefrom, with the far-reaching influence they have had on the Hydahs, as a special place among the aboriginal peoples. The totem system, with its well-known poles, or carved tree trunks, originated with the Hydahs, but in course of time extended to the rest of the Thlinkete group. There were three kinds of carved poles: the historical, the death, and the totem, pole, the last giving the line of descent of the mother’s family. Children were always known by the totem of the mother. Many of those poles are still standing, but the combinations of figures of birds and other living things, distorted beyond recognition, are no longer intelligible. The embers and totems, together with the white races, have made the Thlinkete group more or less oblivious of the past. The totem system is dying out; even the family totem is falling into disuse. It was the cause of much injustice and suffering owing to the unequal and unjust distribution of property. Among the traditions of the Alutagouses, certain Biblical narratives—the creation of light, the fall of man, the deluge, the confusion of tongues, the dispersion of races, etc. Polygamy was common in a more or less exaggerated form. In northern Alaska it is no longer so common, though it sometimes occurs. Matrimony, until ratified by the birth of children, is not looked on as being indissoluble, but rather as a sort of espousals. There was also a belief in metempsychosis. They held, with most savages, that it is a strict duty to revenge insult or injury. The hardships to which females were subjected at critical periods are appalling, and may explain their premature old age.

VIII. Missions.—(1) Russian Mission.—Christianity was introduced into Alaska in 1794. A few sporadic attempts were made prior to that date by Russian traders, notably Glotov, but, according to the report of Alexander Baranov, in 1793, the natives were not so much Christian ardour as business considerations that induced the Russians to persuade the Aleuts to accept baptism. The converted natives were always more manageable. They became attached, to a certain extent, to their godfathers, and gave their trade exclusively to them. The first serious attempt to Christianize the Alaskan tribes was made by Shelikof, one of the organizers of the Russian American Fur Company, who, in 1787, petitioned the Russian Synod to send missionaries to convert the Aleuts. He promised to provide them with transportation and to support them in their mission. In 1793, the Russian Orthodox meteorologist and priest instructed the Metropolitan Gabriel to select the best material for the mission, and in 1794 a band of ten, eight ecclesiastics and two laymen, under the guidance of Archimandrite Ivassof, left St. Petersburg for Okhotok, whence they sailed for Kadiak. This large island was for some years the head-quarters of the Russian-American Fur Company, and from it the monks dispersed in different directions under the protection of the fur hunters. Makar proceeded to Unalaska and began to baptize the natives; another, Juvenal, laboured among the natives of Kadiak Island and those on Cook’s Inlet. This missionary work continued for two years. In 1797, Ivassof, the leader, was promoted to the rank of Archbishop of Irkutak, in Siberia, but was lost at sea the following year. Missionary work remained in abeyance until the arrival of Alexander Baranov in Sitka, the new head-quarters of the Fur Company. In 1816, Sobolof, the first Russian-Greek missionary, apparently, who laboured among the Thlinkets, reached southeastern Alaska. In 1823 Ivan Veniaminof, the most distinguished of the Russian ecclesiastics in Alaska, when known as the "Enlightener of the Aleuts", arrived at Unalaska. During a period of nearly thirty years he displayed intense zeal. He was instrumental in spreading Christianity over a vast extent of territory, visiting not only the Aleutian Islands, but all the coast of the mainland from Bristol Bay to the Kuskokwim. Veniaminof was a man of exceptional ability. He mastered the Aleut and Thlinkete languages, translated portions of the New Testament, composed a catechism and hymnal, and began an exhaustive research into the traditions, beliefs, superstitions, etc. of the natives of the Aleutian group. In 1840, after the division of the diocese of Sitka and Bering Sea, Bishop Veniaminof was appointed Bishop of the Kurile and Aleutian Islands, and assumed, after the Russian custom, the name of Innocentius. During his sojourn in southeastern Alaska, he devoted himself with great zeal to the conversion of the Thlinkete. He established at Sitka a seminary for training of native clergymen for the Russian priesthood, an institution which was continued for many years. In 1852, he was transferred to Yakutat, and died in 1879, Metropolitan of Moecow. Veniaminof, of whom there exists a biography, is highly venerated as a man and a writer. Petroff says of him, however, that the success of his work of conversion was only temporary and was confined altogether to the time of his presence among the natives. In 1859, Archimandrite Peter, Rector of the seminary at Sitka, was made bishop of that place. He was succeeded, in 1867, by Bishop Paul. In 1870 his successor, Bishop John, took the title of Bishop of Alaska and the Aleutian Islands. An important event was the transfer, in 1872, of the head-quarters of the Russian missions from Sitka to San Francisco. Bishop Nestor was sent thither, in 1879, in charge of Alaska and the Aleutian Islands; he was lost at sea in 1882. In 1888 Bishop Vladimir was appointed Bishop of Kadiak. In 1891, Bishop Vladimir was succeeded by Bishop Veniaminof, who died in 1898, Bishop Tikhon; and in 1904, Bishop Innocentius. In 1893 Russian orphanages were opened at Sitka, Kadiak, and Unalaska; and in 1894, a Russian church and school at Juneau. Parochial schools are attached to every Russian church. The Report on Education for 1903 (5155-56) enumerates in Alaska thirty schools, with 740 pupils, and adds that there are sixteen parishes in Alaska with 10,225 parishioners. The Czar still maintains a salaried hierarchy there, but his influence is destined to dwindle away before American Missionary endeavours.

(2) Protestant Missions.—Several of the Protestant sects, notably the Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, Swedish Evangelical, Congregational, and Episcopal, are at work in various parts of Alaska. Their mission stations extend up the Yukon and Kuskokwim rivers, and along the main coast as far north as Cape Prince of Wales and Point Barrow. The Presbyterians, who landed in that country in 1878, have been the most successful. They have strongly organized missions in southeastern Alaska. The late Governor of the territory, John B. Brady, was a Presbyterian missionary for years; and the Rev. Sheldon Jackson, another Presbyterian missionary, is Superintendent of Education for the territory. The Catholic Mission at Sitka. Prior to the cession of Alaska to the United States, no Catholic priest had sojourned in the territory. In 1872, Francis Mercier, chief agent of the Alaska Commercial Company at Nuklukhoyit, alarmed at the constantly threatening attitude of the Ten'a on the Yukon and Tanana, took steps to introduce Catholic missionaries among them. He invited the Oblates of Mary Immaculate to take up the work. In the autumn of 1871 Bishop Atwood of Chicago, with two companions, Father Lecorre and an Indian interpreter named Silvain, crossed over the mountains and wintered at Fort Yukon. The following spring the three sailed down the Yukon river to Nuklukhoyit, where they met a large number of natives from the Tanana and Yukon. They then continued their journey down the river, instructing both Ten'a and Eskimo adults and baptizing their children. Notwithstanding the opposition shown by the Shamans and the Russianized natives, the Oblates considered the prospects so bright that they decided to establish stations on the Yukon. After spending a year in reconnoitering, Bishop Clut returned to his own missions, leaving Father Lecorre in residence at St. Michael at the mouth of the river. The missionary remained there until 1874, when the news came to him that the spiritual jurisdiction of the Alaskan territory had been transferred to the Bishop of Sitka. Father Seghers, Charles John Seghers, ultimately gave up his life in the work. In July, 1877, this prelate, with one companion, Father Mandart, made a preliminary voyage to St. Michael, and went up the river as far as Nulato. During the following winter he visited many villages, establishing missions as far as the Coast, in the midst of severe privations. Before his return to civilization, he promised the Ten’a that he would establish missions among them. In the interval Bishop Seghers was transferred to Oregon City as Coadjutor to Archbishop Blanchet. However, his first visit to Alaska produced immediate results. In 1879 Father Althoff went to Wrangel, in southeastern Alaska, from which point he visited the Cassiar country and the coast. He was transferred to Juneau in 1885, where he was joined by Father Heynen, who was sent to aid him in his labours at Sitka. These two apostolic men were the pioneers of the Church in southeastern Alaska. They lived in a log cabin, in the utter isolation of primitive missionary life, preaching the Gospel to Thlinket and white men alike. In September, 1886, Father Althoff brought to Juneau the Sisters of St. Ann, for the service of the new hospital, and thenceforth always abided by their faith. Among these devoted women—Sister M. Zeno, Sister M. Bonsecours, and Sister M. Victor—all three of whom are still living (1900), deserve to be recorded. Bishop Seghers had meanwhile secured his reappointment to the See of Victoria, and resumed his plans, long delayed, for the conversion of the Alaskan tribes. He invited the Society of Jesus to undertake the work of evangelizing the territory. In July of that year, the prelate—now Archbishop Seghers—accompanied by two Jesuits, Fathers Paschal Tosi and Aloysius Robaut, and a hired man named Fuller, started over the Chilcoot Pass for the headwaters of the Yukon. Father Fuller was destined to remain in Alaska for five years, in the midst of severe privations. Before his return to Nulato, not merely to keep the promise he had made to the Ten'a six years previously, but to forestall the members of a sect who were trying to establish themselves at that spot. During the 1,100 miles of the journey opened symptoms of insanity and at times threatened the Archbishop insolently. At Yesseltlatok, near the mouth of the Koyukuk, they took up quarters in an abandoned fishing cabin. On the morning of 25 November Fuller aroused the prelate from his sleep, pointed a rifle at him, and shot him through the heart. Death was instantaneous. The remains of the murdered Archbishop were taken down the Yukon river to St. Michael, whence, two years later, they were transferred to the crypt of the cathedral in Victoria, B. C. The murderer was subsequently tried, convicted, and sentenced to ten years imprisonment. Father Tosi, Father Paschal, Father Althoff, and Father Seghers, under the direction of mission work in Alaska; new and complicated problems presented themselves to them. Father Tosi went to Europe, where he met the president of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith at Lyons, who contributed $4,000 towards the support of the Church in Alaska. A commission, under the presidency of Father Althoff, dated 17 July, 1894, raised Alaska to a Prefecture Apostolic, with Father Tosi, S.J., as the first incumbent of the office. He exercised his duties as Prefect Apostolic until March, 1897, when he resigned, owing to failing health, and died, at the age of fifty-one, on June 6 and January, 1898. The Very Rev. John B. René, S.J., was appointed in his place. He resigned in March, 1904, and was succeeded by the present incumbent, the Very Rev. Joseph R. Crimont, S.J. The conditions of the Alaskan mission have changed greatly since the advent of the first missionaries. The discovery of placer gold-mines in southern Alaska, the influx of Alutiiq, Thlinket, and a few other eastern Alaskan, have robbed Alaska of much of its primitive isolation. There are resident Jesuit priests at Juneau, Douglas, Fairbanks, Nome, Skagway, St. Michael, and Seward. From these centres white missions are attended at Ketchikan, Wrangel, Eagle River, Circle City, Fort Yukon, Sitka, Haines, Valdez, Chenilla, Kliketari, Pastokil, Pimeetalack, Stebben, etc. Among the native tribes there are also missions, especially Ten'a, on the Yukon at Koersersky and Nulato. The Eskimo in the Nome district on the Kuskokwim and in the Yukon Delta are also attended by Jesuit Fathers and Brothers in southeastern Alaska, owing to lack of men and means, no Catholic mission among the Thlinkets has yet been established. A training-school for boys and girls exists at Holy Cross Mission near Koersersky. The girls are under the care of the Sisters of St. Ann. These native children are taught the arts of cooking, sewing, etc.; the boys, with the Jesuit lay brothers as instructors, are taught gardening, carpentry, and smithing of various kinds. The lives of the missionaries who are devoting themselves exclusively to the native population are lives of intense isolation, but their personal sufferings and inconveniences count for little when there are souls to be saved.

IX. THE PREFECTURE APOSTOLIC comprises the 531,409 square miles that make up the Territory of Alaska and the Aleutian Islands. From 1867 to 1874, these missions were subject to the Bishop of Vancouver Island, B. C.; they were then placed in charge of a Prefect Apostolic who resides at Juneau. The total population is about 72,000, of which about 15,000 are Catholics, one-third of these being natives. The mission is entrusted to the Society of Jesus. There are at present (1900) seven Jesuit Fathers, in charge of the two hundred and eighty-eight stations, of which twelve are provided with resident priests, the others being missions attended occasionally. Nine of the missions are provided with chapels. Jesuit Lay Brothers (8) and Brothers of Christian Instruction (2), from Ploermel in Brittany, attend to the Catholic education of the Indians. The girls attend the missions; the Sisters of Providence (8), Sisters of St. Ann (22), and Ursuline Sisters (3). There are five convents, two academies (Juneau and Douglas City) three day schools, four hospitals (Juneau, Eagle, Douglas, and Nome), an orphanage for Indian girls, and an industrial school for Indian boys (Koersersky). The total number of children in Catholic institutions is 283. There is an Alatri, an Italian bishopric under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See, is comprising seven towns in the Province of Rome. The close proximity of this city to Rome is an argument for believing that Christianity was taught there at a very early date, though this does not compel belief in the localities which place the conversion of Ferentino, Alatri, and neighbouring towns in the apostolic age. The route followed by the earliest preachers of the Gospel in Italy is still unknown. We first meet the name of a bishop of Alatri in Faechisia (551) who accompanied Pope Viglius to Constantinople on the occasion of the controversy of the Three Chiefs; and in the church of St. Mary Major in Alatri, is preserved a wooden statue of the Madonna, a splendid example of Roman art of the twelfth century. (See Fogolari, "Scultura in legno del secolo XII", in "L'Arte", 1903, I, IV; also Venturi, "Storia dell'arte Italiana", I, 264.) Alatri contains 16 parishes, 77 churches, chapels, and oratories; 64 secular priests, 52 seminarians; 42 regular clergy; 31 lay brothers; 81 religious (women); 30 confraternities; 1 boys' school (87 pupils); 3 girls' schools (30 pupils). Population, 24,000.

Alb, a white linen vestment with close fitting sleeves, reaching nearly to the ground and secured round the waist by a girdle. It has in the past been known by many various names: linea or tunica linea, or simply talaris, from the fact of its reaching to the feet (calce); camicia, from the idea like nature of the garment; alba (white) from its colour; and finally, alba Romana, this last seemingly in contradiction to the shorter tunics which found favour outside of Rome (cf. Jaffé-Löwenfeld, "Regesta", 2235). Of these the name Albœ almost alone survives. Another use of the word albœ, commonly in the plural Albœ (vestes), occurs in medieval writers. It refers to the white garments which the newly baptized upon Holy Saturday, and wore until Low Sunday, which was consequently known as dominica in Albo (deponentis), the Sunday of the laying aside of the white garments. This rite, however, will be more conveniently discussed under the word "Christening" (q. v.). From the usage mentioned, both Low Sunday and Trinity Sunday, together with the days preceding, seem sometimes to have been called Albor. Possibly our Whit-Sunday, the Sunday after the Pentecost baptisms, may derive its name from a similar practice. We shall treat of the origin, symbolism, use, form, ornamentation, material, and colour of the alb.

It is impossible to speak positively about the origin of this vestment. Medieval liturgists, e. g. Rupert of Deutz, favoured the view that the Christian vestments in general were derived from those of the Jewish priesthood, and that the Alb, in particular represents the Kethoneth, a white linen tunic of which we read in Exodus, xxviii, 39. But a white linen tunic also formed part of the ordinary attire of both Romans and Greeks under the Empire, and most modern authorities, e. g. Duchesne and Braun, say it needless to look for circumstances beyond our alb. This view is confirmed, first, by the fact that in the Eucharistic scenes of the catacomb frescoes (e. g. those indicated by Monsignor Wilpert in his "Pictura Mundi") the white under-tunic is not always found; and, secondly, by the silence of early Christian writers under circumstances which would lead us to expect some allusion to the relation between Jewish and Christian vestments, if any such were recognized (cf. Hieron, "Ad Fabiolam", Ep. 64, P. L., XXII, 607). The fact that a white linen tunic was a common feature of secular attire also makes it difficult to determine the epoch to which we must assign the introduction of our present liturgical garment. The word albo, indeed, meets us not infrequently in connection with ecclesiastical vesture in the first seven centuries, but we cannot safely argue from the identity of the name to the identity of the thing. On the contrary, when we find mention of an alb in the "Expositio Missæ" of St. Germanus of Paris (d. 576), or in the canons of the Fourth Synod of Toledo (663), it seems clear that the vestment intended was of the nature of a dalmatic. Hence we can only say that the words of the so-called Fourth Synod of Carthage (c. 398), "ut diaconus tempore obligaciones tarn vel lectionis albœ, tantum vel albo festivitate," may or may not refer to a vestment akin to our alb. The slender available evidence has been carefully discussed by Braun (Priestlichen Gewänder, 24), and he concludes that in the early centuries some sort of special white tunic was generally worn by priests under the chasuble, and that in course of time this came to be regarded as liturgical. A prayer mentioning "the tunic of chastity," which is assigned to the priest in the Stowe Missal, helps to confirm this view, and a similar confirmation may be drawn from the figures in the Ravenna mosaics, though we cannot be sure that Albo is not here used in a different sense. Before the time of Rabanus Maurus, who wrote his "De Clericorum Institutione" in 818, the alb had become an integral part of the priest's sacrificial attire. Rabanus describes it fully (P. L., CVII, 306). It was to be put on after the amice. It was made, he says, of white linen, to symbolize the self-denial and chastity befitting a priest. It hung down to the ankles, to remind him that he was bound to practise good works to his life's end. At present the priest in putting on the alb says this prayer: "Purify me, O Lord, from all stain, and cleanse my heart, that washed in the blood of the Lamb I may enjoy eternal delights." The symbolism has evidently changed, but little since the ninth century.

As regards the use of the alb, the practice has varied from age to age. Until the middle of the twelfth century the alb was the vestment which all clerics wore when exercising their functions, and it is further mentioned both in his own monastery and at Cluny, not only those who officiated in the sanctuary but all the monks in their stalls wore albs. The alb was also worn at this period in all religious functions, e. g. in taking Communion to the sick, or when assisting "at a synod. Since the twelfth century, however, the cotta or surplice has gradually been substituted for the alb in the case of all clerics save those in greater orders, i.e. sub-deacon, deacon, priest, and bishop. At present the alb is little used outside the time of Mass. All other functions it is permissible for priests to wear a surplice.

Beyond a certain enlargement or contraction as to lateral dimensions, no great change has taken place in the shape of the alb since the ninth century. In the Middle Ages the vestment seems to have been made to fit precisely around the waist, but broader out below so that the lower edge, in some cases, measured as much as five yards, or more, in circumference. No doubt in practice it was pleated and made to hang tolerably close to the figure. Towards the end of the sixteenth century again, when voluminous garments were everywhere in vogue, St. Charles Borromeo prescribed a circumference of over seven yards for the bottom of the alb. But his regulation, though approved, cannot be said to make a law for the Church at large.

Much greater diversity has been shown in the ornamentation of the alb. In the early ages we find the lower edge decorated with a border sometimes both rich and deep. Similar embroideries adorned the wrists and the caputium (head opening), i.e. the neck. In the thirteenth century the fashion of "apparels", which apparently originated in the north of France, rapidly became general. These were oblong patches of rich brocade or velvet or damask, sewn to the lower part of the alb both before and behind. Similar patches were attached to the wrists, producing almost the effect of a pair of cuffs. Another patch was often sewn on to the breast or back, sometimes to both. To these apparels many names were given. The commonest were purpuræ, plagula, grammata, gemmata. This custom, though it lingered on for centuries, and in Milan survives until the present day, gave way finally before the introduction of lace as an ornament. The use of lace, though permitted, ought never to lose the character of a pure decoration. Albæ, with lace reaching above the knees, are, not strictly speaking, en rüle, though there is a special decree of 16 June, 1893, tolerating albæ with lace below the cincture for canons at Mass, on solemn feast days. Formerly a decree of the Congregation of Rites prohibited any coloured lining behind the flounce, or cuffs, or lace with which the alb might be decorated, but a more recent decree (12 July, 1892) has sanctioned the practice.

In point of material the alb must be made of linen (woven of flax or hemp); hence cotton or wool are forbidden. The colour must now be white. Much discussion has been caused by the frequent occurrence in medieval inventories of albæ which apparently comply with neither of these regulations. Not only do we read of red, blue, and even black albs, but albs of silk, velvet, and cloth of gold are frequently mentioned. It has been contended that in many cases such designations must be regarded as referring to the apparel with which the albs were adorned; also that the albs of silk, velvet, etc. were probably of damask or damask. The residue of cases which it is impossible to explain satisfactorily, and the prevalence at least of blue albs seems to be proved by the miniatures of early manuscripts. Moreover, the use of silk and colours instead of albs of white linen has lasted on in isolated instances to our own day. It may be added that, like other sacerdotal vestments, the alb needs to be blessed before use.

Alba Pompea, Diocese of. comprises eighty towns in the province of Cuneo and two in the province of Alexandria, in Italy. Heading the list of the bishops of Alba is a St. Dionysius, of whom we are told that after serving there for some years he became Archbishop of Milan. He was the Dionysius who so energetically opposed the Arian heresy, and was exiled in the year 355, by the Emperor Constans. Paprock rich (Acta SS., VI, 40) disputes the reliability of this tradition, since a bishop of that period was forbidden to leave his diocese for another. A list of nine early bishops of Alba, from another St. Dionysius (350) down to a Bishop Julius (555) was compiled from sepulchral inscriptions found in the cathedral of Alba towards the end of the fifteenth century by Dalmazzo Berendeno, an antiquarian. De Rossi, however, on examination proved it a forgery (Boll. di Arch. Crist., 1868, 45-47). The first bishop of Alba of whose existence we are certain is Lampradius who was present at the synod held in Rome (499) under Pope Gennadius. (Manz, VIII, 235, Mon. Germ. Hist., Auct. Ant., XII, 400.) In the series of bishops, Benzo is notable as an adversary of Gregory VII and a partisan of the Empire in the struggle of the Investitures. (Orsi, "Un libellista del sec. XI", in "Rivista storica Italiana," 1884, p. 427.) The diocese contains 101 parishes; 276 secular priests; 11 regulars; 405 churches and chapels; 10 seminaries.

Alban, Saint, first martyr of Britain, suffered c. 304. The commonly received account of the martyrdom of St. Alban meets us as early as the pages of Bede's "Ecclesiastical History" (Bk. I, chs. vii and xviii). According to this, St. Alban was a pagan living at Verulamium (now the town of St. Albans in Hertfordshire), when a persecution of the Chrisrians broke out, and a certain cleric flying for his life took refuge in Albans house. Alban sheltered him, and after some days, moved by his example, himself received baptism. Later on, when the governor's emissaries came to search the house, Alban disguised himself in the cloak of his guest and gave himself up in his place. He was dragged to the stake, but, though he would not deny his faith, condemned to death. On the way to the place of execution Alban arrested the waters of a river so that they crossed dry-shod, and he further caused a fountain of water to flow on the summit of the hill on which he was beheaded. His executioner was commissioned by him, after striking the fatal blow, was punished with blindness.

A later development of the legend informs us that the cleric's name was Amphibalus, and that he, with some companions, was stoned to death a few days afterwards at Redbourn, four miles from St. Albans. What germ of truth may underlie this legend is difficult to decide. The ecclesiastical authority to mention St. Alban is Constantius, in his Life of St. Germanus of Auxerre, written about 480. But the further details there given about the opening of St. Alban's tomb and the taking out of relics are later interpolations, as has recently been discovered (see Levison in the "Neues Archiv", 1903, p. 148). Still the whole legend as known to Bede was probably in existence in the first half of the sixth century (W. Meyer, "Legende des h. Albinus", p. 21), and was used by Gregory of Tours (p. 58) to that the name Amphibalus is derived from some version of the legend in which the cleric's cloak is called an amphibalus; for Geoffrey of Monmouth, the earliest witness to the name Amphibalus, makes precisely the same mistake in another passage, converting the garment of the cleric into the foot of a sea monster. (See Ussher, Works, V, p. 181, and VI, p. 58; and Revue Celtique, 1890, p. 349.) From what has been said, it is certain that St. Alban has been continuously venerated in England since the fifth century. Moreover, his name was known about the year 580 to Venantius Fortunatus, in Southern Gaul, who commemorates him in the line:

("Carmina", VIII, iii, 155.) His feast is still kept as of old, on 22 June, and it is celebrated throughout England as a greater double. That of St. Amphibalus is not now observed, but it seems formerly to have been attached to 25 June. In some later developments of the legend St. Alban appears as a soldier who has been killed, and his story was also confused with that of another St. Alban, or Albinus, martyred at Mainz.

Albanenses, Manichean heretics who lived in Albania, probably about the eighth century, but concerning whom little is known, except that they were opposed by the orthodox, the Manicheans continued to flourish. (See BOGOMILLS, CATHARI, PAULICANS.) They appear to have professed a very strict and uncompromising form of the heresy, rejecting all doctrinal modifications so as to the eternity of the evil principle, and its absolute equality with the good principle. (Heinem in Dicr de Theol. cath., I, 658.)

FRANCIS W. GREY.

Albania, the ancient Epirus and Illyria, is the most western land occupied by the Turks in Europe. Its extreme length is about 200 miles, and its breadth from forty to ninety miles. On the west and south-west, bordered by the Adriatic, and the Ionian, being a mountainous and rugged territory, some of its peaks reaching a height of 12,000 feet, and the only plain one of note, is that of Scutari (the ancient Scodra, Σκόδρα), which holds the lake of the same name and is watered by its affluent, the Drin. Many rivers flow from savage, inaccessible heights to the Ionian Sea: the Mati, Shkumbi, Ergent or Devol, Voinoysa, Kalamos. Among the most celebrated is the Close, the source of Scar, and the Castor of antiquity. Albania shares with Greece the peculiar phenomenon of subterranean rivers; the waters of the lake of Janina flow through one of these underground channels into the Gulf of Arta, and this gave rise to the myth that here was the entrance to the infernal world of the ancient Greeks. The surrounding country is covered with Cyclopean ruins. In the region of Lakes Ohrida and Presba there are passages through the mountains, which facilitate communication between Albania and Macedonia; and the Turkish mail post actually follows the old Via Egnatia of the Romans from Durazzo (the ancient Dyrrachium) to the Vale of the Alm, where the Breggia river is crossed. Further down, between the Grammos and the Pindar chain, a defile allows communication with the road from Janina to Larissa. The Mavropotamias, or Acheron, formerly received the affluents of the Cocytus and Phlegeton, which have now disappeared. The soil is barren and sterile, cut through by a series of cuts which divide the country into fragments. Inhabitants are few, consisting principally of bards, bark for dyeing, and tobacco. If the Boyana river were made navigable, Scutari would be connected with the sea, and trade would assuredly lead to progress of all kinds; but Mussulman rule precludes the attempt.

The Albanians (more of an ethnographic than a geographic term) are called Arnaouts (Armaoits, Arnaoutes) by the other peoples of the Balkan peninsula; they give themselves the name of Skippers or "mountaineers". They claim descent from the Epriotes and Illyrians, and, like the latter, have always been distinguished by their martial qualities. Having been conquered in the Illyrian wars by Rome, the tribes of this region furnished the best soldiers of the empire; several emperors were of Illyrian stock (Freeman, The Illyrian Emperors, Historical Essays, London, 1892, II, 22-36). Christianity probably penetrated these mountain fastnesses through the Roman soldiers and traders from Epirus and Macedonia; it is doubtful whether any traces of the original apostolate survived the ruin of the Roman State in the West. After the dismemberment of the Roman Empire, the Illyrian population, gradually driven southward by the invading Slavs, became known as Albanians, were long subject to schismatic Constantinople, then fell under the sway of the Serbs, and finally became (1336-56) a province of the medieval Servian Empire under Tsar Stephen Duschan. (See SERBIA.) On its dismemberment, after the battle of Kosovo which took place on 11 June (1389), the victors, under the command of Prince George Castrioti, the famous Scanderbeg who was known also as Iskander Bey, or Prince Alexander, maintained an independent rule in Upper Albania for a quarter of a century (1443-67). This hero, whose feats of valour are almost legendary, was bred as a Moslem at the court of Murad II whom he had been given as a hostage by his father, an Albanian chief; but after having won fame and honour in the Sultan's service, his race asserted itself, and he broke away to place himself at the head of his own people and embrace Christianity. He defeated the Turkish army in several engagements and secured an honourable truce and the right to be encouraged by the Pope and the promise of help from the Venetians, he again attacked the Turks and gained numerous victories. On his death at Alesio (1467), the Sultan exclaimed: "Now that the infidels have lost their sword and buckler, who can save them from my wrath?" The Albanians became disorganized and were finally subdued (1479) to Mussulman domination. They have, however, never been subjugated, and are, even to-day, treated more like allies than subjects. They now supply the Turkish army with its best soldiers, as they once did the legions of Rome, and are exempted from taxes and from compulsory military service. As tax-payers, they receive high pay and many privileges. While several tribes have embraced Islam and others belong to the Greek schism, the best of the population is Catholic, and while guarding traditional customs and a primitive manner of life, practise their religion devoutly. The purity of their morals is preserved through their special devotion to the Balkan peninsula, and the Jesuits Austrian and Italian missionaries have met with conditions most favourable for their teaching. Schools have been opened in all the villages of note by Franciscan and Jesuit Fathers, but the spread of education is hindered by the lack of a grammarized language and headed script. Many attempts have been made to decide upon an alphabet, but none has yet succeeded owing to the difficulty of expressing the oral sounds by any known combination of European letters. A cultured Albanian, therefore, takes Roumanian, Greek, Servian, or Italian, for his medium of intercommunication. An Albanian is published in the Rumoke and Bruxares and other in Belgrade. In the country itself there is no attempt at a newspaper, and the periodicals most prevalent in the towns are Italian publications of a religious tone. The tribes which have resisted Mussulman rule successfully and retained their creed have, notwithstanding this, adopted many Moslem customs.

RELIGION.—For four centuries the Catholic Albanians have defended their faith with bravery, greatly aided by the Franciscan missionaries, especially since the middle of the seventeenth century, when the cruel persecutions of their Mussulman lords began. At that time the Albanians, particularly among the schismatic Greeks. The College of Propaganda at Rome was especially prominent in the religious and moral support of the Albanian Catholics. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, particularly, it educated young clerics for service on the Albanian missions, contributed then as now to their support and to that of the churches, in which good work it is aided by the Austrian Government which gives yearly to these missions about five thousand dollars, in its quality of Protector of the Christian community under Turkish rule. The Church legislation of the Albanians was reformed by Clement XI, who caused a general ecclesiastical visitation to be held (1703) by the Archbishop of Antivari (q. v.), at the close of which a national synod was held. Its decrees were printed by Propaganda (1705), and renewed in 1803 (Coll. Lacedens Conc. Recent., i., 859 sq.). In 1877, Pius IX. created two dioceses for Albania, Sitia, and the Abbatia nullius of St. Alexander of Orosei; (3) Durazzo; (4) Uskup. The latter two are without suffragans, and depend immediately on the Holy See. A seminary, founded in 1858 by Archbishop Topich of Scutari, was destroyed by the Turks, but was later re-established on Austrian territory and placed under the imperial protection. In Scutari the Catholic women, as well as the Mohammedan, are veiled. The Albanian woman works unceasingly in the field and in the home; so that every household care devolves upon her in the frequent absence of the men who are either regular or irregular fighters in the Albanian League. The Albanian woman is proud; the women are dressed in tight skirts of light colour striped with black, and their heads and shoulders are covered on feast days with masques of gold and silver coins. In the Catholic churches, the women appear unveiled, and the humbler class generally remain among the women. The services of the Cathedral of Scutari is most impressive, although primitive to an extreme degree. There is little quiet, for the congregation rasps out the responses with a fervour that precludes either modulation or rhythm; and the incessant rattle of the coins on the women’s bracelets and beads forms a background note. The old vendetta custom is one of the chief factors in the evolution of this semi-barbaric race. The Albanians of to-day give the same promise of a vigorous Christian development as the Franks of the time of Clovis, and it is characteristic of their steadfastness that no bribes or threats have succeeded in drawing them from their first allegiance. While every other race in the Balkans, with the exception of the Western Serbs, called Hrots (Croats), went over to schism, the Roman Catholic faith remained secure in the fastnesses of northern Albania.

When one recalls that to adopt Islamism meant to become a slave and to remain Christian meant to become a slave, deprived of the right to carry weapons, it is easily seen why so many Albanian tribes fell away. The chief tribes of Upper Albania, the Shoshi and the Mirdites, are at once the pioneers of nationality and Catholicity. Long ago the Mirdites were wont to carry off Turkish girls of good family and, after baptising them, make them their wives, so that there is a strong strain of Turkish blood in the Catholic Mirdites of to-day. This tribe has special privileges, such as the place of honour in the Sultan’s army under the command of its own chieftain. In accepting a camaraderie of arms with Mussulman troops it guards its creed and nationality with the same fidelity with which it serves the Sultan when called upon. The Mirdites, about 40,000 in number, and with a chief town of some four hundred houses, Orosei, treat on equal terms with the Porte. The force of circumstanced pressures has driven a number of tribes into the Sultan’s army. To pay for one or other of the causes which are being periodically fought out between antagonists whose success or defeat leaves his own condition almost unchanged. It was an Albanian who led the Greeks in the War of Independence, and again an Albanian who commanded the Turkish troops sent to quell the rebellion. The Kings of Naples kept an Albanian regiment styled the Royal Macedonian, and the famous resistance of Bilisrits in 1854 is due to dogged Albanian bravery. Courage and heroism are inborn qualities of this singular and gifted race. The revival of the national aspirations of Albania dates from 1874, and the Congress (1878) called in Athens in order to compensate Servia and Montenegro for her retention of the Servian lands of Bosnia and Herzegovina, thought to divide the land of Albania between them. The Turks secretly fostered the opposition of both Mussulmans and Catholics, and the Albanian League was formed "for the defence of the country's integrity and the reconstitution of its independence". The territories allotted to Servia were already occupied by her troops when resistance broke forth, and the idea of dislodging them had to be abandoned; but Montenegro was unable to obtain possession of her share, the rich districts of the Albanian coast. The Albanians were met with the unexpected opposition of their former allies, the Turks, now forced by Russia to assist Montenegro, made face against all their enemies with a determin-nation baffled and dismayed Europe. Mehmet Ali was routed, his house at Diakovo burned down, and himself massacred. The Albanians had much to avenge. They had not yet forgotten the war of a century before when their women precipitated themselves by hundreds over the rocks near Yanina to escape the Turks' sacks. The Turks now rekindled their efforts to quell the movement they had themselves helped to precipitate, and Montenegro had to content herself with the barren tracts of the Boyana and the port of Dulego. She could not have aspiré even to these, had not Russia, anxious to spread the doctrines of Orthodoxy, advanced its embassies to the Catholic and Mussulman Albania in favour of the Servian race.

After Scutari, Yanina is the largest and most interesting town of modern Albania. Near it are the ruins of the temple of Dodona, the cradle of pagan civilization in Greece. This oracle uttered its prophecies by interpreting the rustling of oak branches; the fame of its priestesses drew votaries from all parts of Greece. In this neighbourhood also dwelt the six Pelasgic tribes of Selles, or Helles, and the Graikoi, whose names were afterwards taken to denote the Hellenes, or Greeks. The plateau of Yanina is fertile and favorably situated for defensive purposes, and the town has not lost its power even to-day. It was used as a depot for the supply of the army of the city have been able to develop many industries, such as the inlaying of metal, weaving gold-threaded stuffs, and the fabrication of fire-arms. It is difficult to get the exact statistics of any province of the Turkish Empire; the population of Albania is variously estimated, from 1,200,000 to 1,600,000, of which 1,500,000 are strictly Albanian. In the Kirchenlex. (Freiburg, 1899), XI, 18, Father Neher estimates the population at about 1,400,000, one million of which is made up of Musulmans. There are 318,000 members of the Greek schismatic church, and about 120,000 Catholics. It must be added that there are also about 250,000 Albanians, and in Italy about 100,000, the latter being all Catholics. In summing up the characteristics of the race, there are two points on which travellers invariably agree: the chivalry toward the weaker sex of even the untaught Albanian, and the spotless chastity of their women. For the rest, human life is as cheap as in all lands where individuals must reckon on themselves for their preservation.

Albania, a distinguished Italian family, said to be descended from Albanian refugees of the fifteenth century, is said to have divided into two branches, one of Bergamo and those of Urbino. They gave to the Church one Pope (Clement XI, 1700–21) and several well-known cardinals. (1) GIAN GIROLAMO, soldier, statesman, and canonist, b. at Bergamo, 3 January, 1604; d. 25 April, 1691. For services to the Venetian republic he was rewarded with the office of inquisitor at Trieste, and in 1628 was made Prior of the Choristers and Cardinal Ghislieri. When the latter became Pius V, he invited Alban to Rome, made him a cardinal (1570), and employed him on diplomatic missions, among them being the formation of an alliance among Christian princes against the Turks. Gian Girolamo was a distinguished canonist, and was accounted by his contemporaries a man of "a solid judgment, rare erudition and eloquence, free and firm in his decisions, pleasant and temperate in speech, in every way a grave and reliable person." Among his often reprinted works are "De donatone Constantini" (Milano, 1553), which was translated into Latin as "De potestate papae et consiliarii" (Venice, 1544), "De immunitate ecclesiarum" (Rome, 1553): cf. Hurter, "Nomencl. Lit.," (2d ed.), I, 122.—(2) FRANCESCO (see Clement XI).—(3) ANNIBALE, Cardinal—Bishop of Sabina (1711), cousin of Clement XI, b. 15 August, 1682, at Urbino; d. 21 September, 1751; papal of ecclesiastical and literary qualities; his library, a gallery of paintings and sculpture, and a cabinet of coins that eventually was added to the Vatican collection. He edited, in two volumes, the letters, briefs, and bulls of Clement XI (Rome, 1724), the "Menologium Gregorii" (3 vols., Urbino, 1727), and historical memoirs of Urbino (Rome, 1722–24).—(4) ALESSANDRO, brother of Annibale, b. at Urbino, 19 October, 1692; d. 11 December, 1779. He entered the priesthood at the earliest insistence of Clement XI, but gave no little trouble to that Pope because of his worldly and undisciplined life. In 1721 Innocent XII made him cardinal. He was a friend of Pietro Ottoboni, died at his own time, and sided with the opposition in the reign of Clement XIV (1769–74). He was also an enlightened patron of art and artists, helped to reconcile with the Church the sculptor and historian Winckelmann, built the Villa Albani (1780), and filled it with treasures of antique sculpture and other precious relics of Greek and Roman art (dispersed by Napoleon I; the famous Antinous is there still). His coins went to the Vatican Library, over which he presided as bibliothecarius from 1761 (Strocchi, "De vitæ Alex. Albanii," Rome, 1790).—(5) GIUSEPPE, b. at Rome, 30 January, 1727; d. September, 1803; a nephew of Clement XI, and Cardinal—Bishop of Ostia at the age of twenty-seven.—(6) GIUSEPPE, nephew of the preceding, b. at Rome, 1750, made cardinal 1801; he shared the habitual devotion of his house to Austria, took refuge in Vienna, 1796–1814, returned to Rome after the downfall of Napoleon, and occupied offices of distinction in the papal administration until his death (1834). He left his fortune partly to the Holy See, partly for religious purposes. With his brother Filippo the family died out; its name and part of its possessions passed to the Chigi. See also POZZI, Veto Pietro; Monuments Albanum meridionalium historia illustrantia (Rome, 1865 sqq.). Recent ecclesiastical statistics may be seen in O. WINTER, Orbis Terrarum Catholicus (Freiburg, 1890), 122–124, and 130; also in the latest edition of the Missiones Catholicae (Rome, Propaganda; Press, triennially).

Albano, a suburbian see, comprising seven towns in the Province of Rome. Albano (derived from Alba Longa) is situated ten miles from Rome, on the Appian Way. It was a military post, and hence Christian soldiers must have been stationed there at a very early date. Appii Forum and the Three Taverns, where St. Paul was met on his way to Rome by the brethren are not far distant (Acts, 15:36). The see was divided into two branches. The see of Acilius Glabrio was compelled by Domitian to fight, unarmed, in the amphitheatre at Albano, a Numidian bear, according to Juvenal (Sat., iv, 99); an enormous lion, according to Dio Cassius (Hist. Rom., LXXI, iii). This same Acilius Glabrio is later included in a Christian group of the Pagan family of the mostor rei publicae. See also Eusebius of Caesarea (Suidas, D. 10). The "Liber Pontificalis," under the name Silvester (ed. Duchesne, Paris, 1886, I, 185) says: "feit basilicam Augustus Constantini in civitate Albanensi, videlicet s. Ioannis Baptiste" (Harnack, "Die Mission," (Leipzig), 1902, p. 501). This basilica of the time of Con-
Constantine was destroyed by fire toward the end of the sixth century; in the beginning of the ninth (Lib. Pont., Leo III; ed. Duchesne, II, 32). Franconi has established (La catacomba e le basiis Constantiniana di Albano Laziale, Rome, 1877) the identity of this basilica with the present cathedral, which still contains some remains of the edifice dedicated by Leo III to St. Pancrasius. Under the basilica there were discovered confessions of which some were transferred to the cemetery near by. The foundation of the episcopal see of Albano is very probably contemporaneous with the erection of the Constantinian basilica. However, the first bishop of the see of whom we have any knowledge is Dionysius (505-526); it is mentioned in a synod of Euphrasius (463) that we meet with another Bishop of Albano, Romanus. To these is to be added Ursinus, whose name is found on an inscription in the Catacomb of Domitilla. The consular date is either 345 or 365. The importance of this early Christian community is apparent from its cemetery, discovered in 1720 by Marangoni. Being near Rome, it suffered but little from the Christian cemeteries found there. Its plan, clearly mapped out in the “Epitome de locis ss. martyrum quae sunt foris civitatis Rome,” is considered by De Rossi as the synopsis of an ancient description of the cemeteries, written before the time of the Emperor Probus (276-282) and preserved at Sarobon. The remains of the cemetery (VI Inscriptiones Latinae, 1. 374) are in the Catacomb of Callistus, signed by Severianus, Albinus, and several other saints and martyrs. The cemetery contains a number of frescoes from the time of the early Christian period, painted at various times by unknown artists, which show the progress of Christian art from the fourth to the ninth century. The titles of the altar stones of some of the most important tombs are: Peter II, afterwards Pope Sergius IV (1009-12); Boniface (1049), with the titles of cardinal-bishops; and Pope Nicholas IV (1254-58), with the titles of cardinal-bishops. The latter was the author of the “Canons de la Venerabilissima Civitas Jesu Christi,” which were the basis of the Church’s Canon law. The cemetery also contains the remains of many saints and martyrs, including St. Peter of Albinus, who is buried in the nearby church. The cemetery is surrounded by a wall and is open to the public. The ruins of the basilica were excavated in the 19th century and are now open to the public.
the Duke of York and Albany, afterwards James II, all the land lying between the Connecticut and Delaware rivers. Before the transfer Catholics were few. Two Portuguese sailors at Fort Orange in 1626, a Portuguese woman, and a transient Irishman, met by Father Jogues in 1643, made up the quota. After the English possession there is credible evidence that several Catholics from the Netherlands settled in Albany in 1677. After the death of the Franciscan friar by Hennepin provided. In 1682 came Colonel Thomas Dongan as governor, the son of an Irish baronet, afterwards the Earl of Limerick. The project of detaching the Five Nations from the French, who had won them by the disinterested labours of their missioners, was the hereditary policy of the Saratoga under English Jesuit influence, to counteract a similar colonization enterprise at La Prairie under French auspices. The Jesuits, Thomas Harvey, Henry Harrison, Charles Gage, and two lay brothers were the pathfinders under the new regime.

AMERICAN PERIOD.—In 1790 John Carroll was consecrated Bishop of Baltimore, and Albany passed over to his jurisdiction from that of the archbishops of Rouen and the archbishops of Quebec. Saint Mary’s, the first church in the diocese, and for many years the only Catholic church between St. Peter’s, Barclay street, New York City, and Detroit, was built in 1843 byrev. John Conroy. He murdered it by its isolation, its corner stone was laid by one of its trustees, Thomas Barry. The earlier priests during this Baltimore era were Fathers Thayer, Whelan, O’Brien, D. Mahoney, James Buyse, and Hurley. The laymen of mark were James Roubichaux, Louis Le Couture, David McEvans, Thomas Barry, William Duffy, and Daniel Cassidy. On the same day of the year 1808, Baltimore was elevated to the rank of an archdiocese, and three new sees were created: New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. The new Bishop of New York assumed jurisdiction over the entire State, and Albany heard the voice of a new shepherd. From this year to the year of its erection as a diocese (23 April, 1847) there was a steady growth of Catholics, sluggish at first, and afterwards flowing with fuller volume as we approach the years of the Irish famine and the climacteric of immigration. Within this New York era we find P. O’Callaghan, of Albany, John Keenan, of Glen Falls, Keating Rawson, Thomas Sause, and Philip Quinn, of Troy.

BISHOPS OF ALBANY.—(1) The Right Rev. John McCloskey, D.D. (afterwards Cardinal), consecrated Coadjutor-Bishop of New York, 10 March, 1844, transferred to Albany as its first bishop, 21 May, 1847. He first selected the venerable St. Mary’s, of which he was the first pastor. When, however, he found that proving unsuitable, he began the erection of the cathedral of the Immaculate Conception, the corner stone of which was laid 2 July, 1848, by Archbishop Hughes. The edifice, completed with the exception of one of its twin towers, was dedicated 15 November, 1850, being the first in what is now Saratoga under English Jesuit influence, to counteract a similar colonization enterprise at La Prairie under French auspices. The Jesuits, Thomas Harvey, Henry Harrison, Charles Gage, and two lay brothers were the pathfinders under the new regime.

The secular clergy proving insufficient, he invited the assistance of Jesuits, to whom he entrusted the large parish of St. Joseph’s, in Troy. He was tireless in visiting every portion of his extensive diocese, which comprised all that territory now included in the dioceses of Albany, Syracuse, and Utica. He was the first to establish religious houses by instituting Religious of the Sacred Heart in Albany, and the Christian Brothers in Troy. He disarmed anti-Catholic and anti-Irish bias by the charm of his personality and the winsome graces of his consummate oratory.—— (2) The Right Rev. John Joseph Conroy, D.D., consecrated 15 October, 1855. He built the beautiful St. Joseph’s Church in the city of Albany, and established a home for the aged in charge of the Little Sisters of the Poor, and orphans under the care of the Sisters of Charity and Christian Brothers in the same city. The secular clergy still proving inadequate for the growing and insistent needs of the ministry, he encouraged the Augustinian Fathers and the Minor Conventuals to cast their lot with the diocese. He secured the future of Catholic schools by establishing the celebrated convent of the Sacred Heart at Kenwood, and soliciting and welcoming foundations of the Sisters of St. Joseph, of the Sisters of Charity, and of the Sisters of Mercy, and Sisters of the Holy Names. The second diocesan synod was held in his episcopate.— (3) The Right Rev. Francis McNeirny, D.D., consecrated 21 April, 1872. He purchased the rectory for the cathedral clergy at 12 Madison Place, the chancy at 125 Eagle street, and the rectory for St. Joseph’s, as an additional asylum. The Dominican Tertiaries, Sisters of the Good Shepherd, and Redemptorist Fathers established foundations at his invitation. He systematized the work of the chancy, formulated schedules for complete annual reports from each parish, and initiated the practice of convening a ministering conference, and canonically visiting every church in his diocese triennially. Clerical conferences, conducted with method and regularity, were his creation, and he closed his episcopate and his life with their crowning achievement—the enlargement and completion of the cathedral by the donation of the lands at the Tittes and the erection of new sacristies and a tower.—— (4) The Right Rev. Thomas M. A. Burke, D.D., consecrated 1 July, 1894. He erected the school and rectory of St. Joseph’s parish, Albany, whilst its rector, and evidenced administrative capacity of a high order in the management of its affairs. He has enlarged the Redemptorists’ Asylum in Albany, cancelled the indebtedness of the cathedral, refurbished and renewed it, and consecrated it with solemn ceremonial, 16 November, 1902. With characteristic exactitude for all canonical processes and requirements in the matter of synode, visitations, erection of parishes, schools, homes of industry and charity, and the holding of church properties, he is indefatigable and continues the best traditions and labours of his predecessors.

Causes of Growth.—The growth of this see is explained entirely by immigration. The incentives to it were predominantly industrial. Agriculture played only a moderate part, and, as a rule, the land was second choice. In the early years of the last century New York State entered upon a vast scheme of internal improvements—the linking of the great lakes with the ocean by a system of canals and railways. The chief benefactor of the enterprise, it became the principal distributing centre of the army of labourers who flocked into it in quest of employment. Work on the Erie Canal was begun in 1817 and completed in 1825. Development of the entire system of artificial waterways went on simultaneously. These opened up a vast uninhabited country to tillage, colonization, and manufacture. From 1831 to 1852 railroad construction was under way, and as Ireland was then pouring into this country a flood-tide of fugitives from the famine, they found remunerative work at once. The earnings of these labourers were the chief contribution to the endowment of orphanages and missions. On the completion of the canals and railways, some of these strangers purchased land and began a farming life; most of them either threw in their lot with the new settlements sprouting promiscuously along the new lines of travel, or sought residence and employment in special localities because of the prosperous industries. Albany drew numbers because of its lumber, iron, stoves, shoes, cattle, and breweries; Glens Falls attracted by its flourishing lumbering activities; Ballston by its tanneries; Cohoes by its axe industry, and cotton and woolen mills; Troy by the manufacture of stoves, nails, railway iron, and collars; Schenectady and Amsterdam by their textile manufactures. During these years facilities of communication made access to most of the diocese comparatively easy, and the people were attended by a growing ministry. Its northern and lower western sections remained isolated and accessible only with great difficulty for many years, and here were the most frequent leakages from the faith. Bigotry was rife in out-of-the-way corners, and met Catholic practice and profession with slander and slighter—without violence, however. All this is superseded in our day by juster standards of measurement.

Notable Benefactors.—The Right Rev. John J. Conroy, the Right Rev. Monsignor McDermott, and the Rev. P. McCloskey left bequests for education. The Rev. Maurice Sheahan, the Rev. William Cullinan, and Mrs. Peter Cagney were generous patrons of St. Peter's Hospital, Albany. For various and large benefactions the diocese is indebted to John A. McColl, of New York; Anthony N. Brady, and Eugene D. Wood, of Albany; Thomas Breslin, of Waterford; Edward Murphy, Jr.; James O'Neill, Francis J. Molloy, Edmund Fitzgerald, Peter McCarthy, and Daniel E. Conway, of Troy. In the field of charity and Catholic usefulness, where fidelity to the faith is more a matter of personal principle of conduct, the names of Nicholas Hussey, John H. Farrell, Charles Tracey, Peter Cassidy, John W. McNamara, James F. Tracey, John P. McDonough, Edward F. Hussey, of Albany, and Edward Kelly, F. P. Connolly, Cornelius F. Burns, and Stephen D. Troy deserve notice.

Important Events.—Among the notable events of the diocesan history are the erection of the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception (1848-52) and its consecration, 16 November, 1902; the pheomenally fruitful career of St. Joseph's Provincial Seminary, Troy, from 1865 to 1896, at which latter date it was transferred to Dunwoodie, Yonkers, N. Y.; the purchase and consecration of St. Agnes' Cemetery, Albany, 1867; the formation of the Diocese of Ogdensburg in 1872, and of Syracuse in 1888, both of them previously included in the Diocese of Albany; the incoming of the Sisters of Charity (1840), Jesuits (1849-1900), Christian Brothers (1851), Ladies of the Sacred Heart (1853), Augustinian Fathers (1858), Sisters of St. Joseph (1860), Sisters of the Holy Names (1865), Sisters of Mercy (1865), Minor Conventuals (1867), Little Sisters of the Poor (1871), Dominican Tertiaries of St. Catharine de Sturger (1880), and Servants of the Good Shepherd (1894), Redemptorists (1886).

Statistics.—The clergy now (1906) number 214, of whom 168 are diocesan priests, and 49 regulars (Franciscans, Augustinians, Redemptorists, and Salesians). The teaching Brothers are 55, among them 44 Christian Brothers. The Sisters, of religious women, number 686; parishes with resident priests, 105; missions with churches, 49. The parochial schools number 42, with 15,133 pupils (7,107 boys and 8,026 girls). A preparatory seminary (Troy) has 59 pupils. There are 2 colleges with 79 pupils, and 19 academies with 894 pupils. There are 16 convents, 455 religious; 5 hospitals; 2 orphanages; 1 daily list of 197 patients; 2 Houses of the Good Shepherd with 245 inmates; 2 Houses of Little Sisters of the Poor, with 328 inmates; 2 Houses of Retreat, kept by Dominican Sisters, with 35 inmates; 2 Homes for Women, with 15 inmates; and the Seton Home for Working Girls, with 20 inmates.

Albenga, The Diocese of, comprises seventy-nine towns in the province of Port Maurice and forty-five in the province of Genoa, suffragan to the Archdiocese of Genoa, Italy. Legend makes Albenga between the years 121 and 125 the scene of the martyrdom of St. Calogero of Brescia, Bishop of Albenga, under the court of Adrian. But the Acts of his martyrdom, together with those of Sts. Faustinus and Jovita with which they are incorporated, are not historically verified. The first bishop of whom we know anything is Quintinus, who in the year 451 signed the Synodal Letter of Eusebius, Bishop of Milan, to Leo I, in which the condemnation of Nestorius and Eutyches was sanctioned (Mansi). Albenga contains 170 parishes; 485 secular priests; 86 regulars; 119,280 inhabitants; 354 churches and chapels; 90 seminaries.

ERNESTO BUONAIUTTI.

Alberghti, Niccolo, Cardinal and Bishop of Bologna, b. at Bologna in 1387; d. at Sienna, 9 May, 1443. He entered the Carthusian Order in 1394, and was placed as a novice at the monastery of Toscana, near Bologna, as a special means to be made Bishop of Bologna, against his will, in 1417. In this office he still followed the Rule of his Order, was zealous for the reform of regular and secular clergy, and was a great patron of learned men, among whom was Aeneas Sylvius, afterwards Pius II. Martin V, and his successor, Eugenius IV, employed Alberic of Ostia, a Benedictine monk, and Cardinal-Bishop of Ostia from 1138–47. Born at 1090, at Beauneval in France, d. at Verdun, 1147. He entered the monastery of Cluny and became its sub-prior, and later, prior of St. Martin-des-Champs, but was recalled (1126) to Cluny by Peter the Venerable, to aid in the restoration of discipline in that famous monastery. In 1131 he was Abbot of Vezelay in Berry, and thefollowing year he was made Cardinal-Bishop of Ostia by Pope Innocent II (1138). Immediately after his consecration Alberic went as papal legate to England. He was successful in his endeavours to end the war then raging for possession of the throne between the usurpers Stephen of Blois and David I of Scotland, who had been Universities of England and France, and called a council of all the bishops and abbots of England, which assembled at London, December 1138, and at which eighteen bishops and about thirty abbots were present. The chief business of the council, besides some disciplinary measures, was the election of an archbishop for the See of Canterbury. Thibaut, Abbot of Bec, was chosen, and consecrated by Alberic. Accompanied by Thibaut and other bishops and abbots, he returned to Rome in January, 1139. The same year, Alberic was sent to exhort the inhabitants of Bar, a town on the Adriatic, to acknowledge their lawful sovereign Roger II of Sicily, against whom they were in revolt. They refused, however, to listen to the legate of the Holy See, and shut their gates against him. In 1140 Alberic was appointed to examine into the conduct of Rodolph, Patriarch of Antioch. In a council of eastern bishops and abbots, at which Alberic presided, which was held, and was cast into prison (30 November, 1140). Pope Eugenius III sent Alberic (1147) to combat the Henrician heretics (see ALBIGENSES), who were causing much trouble in the neighbourhood of Toulouse. In a letter written at this time to the bishops of that district, St. Bernard of Clairvaux calls Alberic "the venerable Bishop of Ostia, a man who has done great things in Israel, through whom Christ has often given victory to His Church." St. Bernard was induced to join the legate, and it was owing chiefly to the miracles and eloquence of the Saint that the embassy was in some degree successful. Three days before the arrival of St. Bernard, Alberic had been given a very cold welcome. The populace, in des-Albert (ALBERTI), Bishop of Riga, Apostle of Livonia, d. 17 January, 1229. After the inhabitants of Livonia had twice lapsed from Christianity into paganism, and heroic measures were necessary to reclaim them, Albert organised a crusade. He sailed up the Düna (April, 1200), with twenty-three ships; conquered the land on both sides; founded the city of Riga (1201), of which he was the first bishop, and published the famous Order of Knights of the Sword (1202), which served as a standing army; completed the conversion of the country before 1206; and erected the dependent bishoprics of Sembgård-Kurland, Dorpat, and Ösel.

Albert (ALBERTI) II, eighteenth Archbishop of Magdeburg in Saxony, date of birth unknown; d. 1232. He was the son of Günther III, Count of Kevernburg, and began his studies at Hildesheim, completing them later at Paris and Bologna. At an early age he was made a prebendary of the Magdeburg cathedral, and in 1200 was appointed Provost of the Cathedral Chapter by Innocent III. Through the influence of the Bishop of Halberstadt, he was also made as the successor of the Archbishop of Magdeburg (d. 1205). After receiving the papal approbation, which was at first withheld, partly on account of those who had taken part in his election and partly on account of his attitude towards Philip of Swabia, Albert proceeded to Rome, where he was consecrated bishop by the Pope (Dec. 1206) and received the pallium. He entered Magdeburg on Palm Sunday, 15 April, 1207, and five days later a conflagration destroyed many of the buildings of the city, including his own cathedral. One of his first cares was to repair the damage wrought by fire, and in 1208 he laid the corner stone of the present cathedral, which, though completed 156 years later, serves as his most fitting memorial. He likewise rebuilt a large part of the city, and is regarded as the founder of the Neustadt. Magdeburg was also indebted to him for several valuable privileges which he obtained from Otto IV after the death of Philip of Swabia. Albert did much to further the interests of religion. He established the Dominicans (1224), and the Franciscans (1225) in the city, and also founded a convent for women in honour of St. Mary Magdalen.

But Albert’s activity was not confined to his diocese. He also played a prominent part in the great struggle for the imperial crown, which marked the close of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth centuries. Even before his consecration, he had inclined to the side of Philip of Swabia, who sought the crown in spite of his young nephew Frederick, the son and heir of Henry VI (d. 28 Sept., 1197). But later, accepting the papal “Deliberation”, he gave his support to Otto IV, second son of Henry the Lion, who had been set up as anti-king by a party headed by Adolphus of Cologne and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. After the assassination of Philip (July, 1208) Albert did much to have his rival acknowledged as king. Otto is said to have ascended to Rome, accompanied by Albert, where he was crowned by the Pope on 4 Oct., 1209, and soon after seized Ancona and Spoleto—part of the papal territories. Upon attempting to enter Sicily he was excommunicated by Innocent III (Maundy Thursday, 1211), and his subjects released from their allegiance. Albert, after some hesitation, published the bull of excommunication and thenceforth transferred his allegiance to Frederick II, the Hohenstaufens, son of Henry VI. In 1212 Otto returned to Germany and defied the Pope. The struggles that followed, in which Magdeburg and its neighbourhood suffered severely, did not come to an end until Otto’s power was broken at the battle of Bouvines (1214). Albert is said to have died in 1232 during an interval of peace between the Empire and the Papacy.

Albert, Blessed, Patriarch of Jerusalem, one of the conspicuous ecclesiastics in the troubles between the Holy See and Frederick Barbarossa; date of birth uncertain; d. 14 September, 1215. He was in fact asked by both Pope and Emperor to act as umpire in their dispute and, as a reward, was made Prince of the Empire. He was born in the diocese of Milan, became a canon regular in the Monastery of Mortara (not Mortura, as Butler has it), in Milan, and, after being Bishop of Bobbio, for a short time, was translated to the see of Vercelli.

This was about 1184. At that time the Latin occupied Jerusalem, and the Patriarchate falling vacant, Albert was implored by the Christians of Palestine to accept the see. As it implied persecution and a prospect of martyrdom, he accepted, and was appointed by Innocent III, who at the same time made him Papal Legate. His sanctity procured him the veneration of even the Mohammedans. It was while here that he undertook a work with which his name is particularly and permanently associated. In Palestine, at that time, the hermits of Mount Carmel lived in separate cells. One of their number gathered them into a community, and in 1209 their superior, Brocard, requested the Patriarch, though not a Carmelite, to draw up a rule for them. He assented, and legislated in the most rigorous fashion, prescribing perpetual abstinence from flesh, prostrated fasts, long silence, and extreme seclusion. It was so severe that mitigations had to be introduced by Innocent IV in 1246.

The end of this great prelate was most tragic. Summoned by Innocent III to take part in the General Council of the Lateran, in 1215, he was assassinated before he left Palestine, while taking part in a procession, on the feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross. He is honoured among the saints by the Carmelites, on 8 April. The Bollandists call attention to this curious anomaly, that not at Vercelli, or whom he was his benefactor, where he was Patriarch, not among the Canons Regular, to whom he properly belonged, but in the Order of the Carmelites, of which he was not a member, does he receive the honor of a saint. "That holy Order could not or ought not to lose the memory of him by reason of his rank among the Order; it was approved by the Roman Church; in saying which," adds the writer, "I go no way wish to impugn the Carmelite claim of descent from Elias." At Vercelli Albert does not even figure as Blessed, and the Canons Regular honour him as a saint, but pay him no public cult.

Albert, Saint, Cardinal, Bishop of Liège, d. 1192 or 1193. He was a son of Godfrey III, Count of Louvain, and brother of Henry I, Duke of Lorraine and Brabant, and was chosen Bishop of Liège in 1191 by the suffrages of both people and chapter. The Emperor Henry VI violently intruded his own venal choice into the see, and Albert journeyed to Rome to resist it. The Emperor, not fearing the deacon, created him cardinal, and sent him away with gifts of great value and a letter of recommendation to the Archbishop of Rheims, where he was ordained priest and consecrated bishop. Outside that city, soon after, he was set upon by eight German knights of the Emperor's following, who took advantage of the confiding kindness of the saintly bishop, and stabbed him to death. The date of his martyrdom is given variously as 24 November, 1193 (Moroni), 23 November, 1192 (Hoefler), while the Bollandists, placing it in the latter year, give 21 November as its precise date. Bolland says also the day on which the saint's feast is kept. His body was found at Rheims until 1612, when it was transferred by the Archduke Albert of Austria to the church of the Carmelite convent, which he had just founded at Brussels. The relics of this strenuous defender of ecclesiastical liberty, were by permission of the Holy See shared with the canons of Liège.

ALBERT OF AACHEN. See ALBERT OF AIX.

ALBERT OF AACHEN. (ALBERTUS AQUENSIS), a chronicler of the First Crusade. His "Chronicon Hierosolymitanum de bello sacro", in twelve books, from 1095 to 1121, printed in Bongars (Gesta Dei per Francos, I, 184–581), is also found in the fourth volume of the "Recueil des historiens des croisades". It is now usually accepted that he was a canon of Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle), though Wattenbach asserts (Deutsch. Gesch. II, 179) that it is yet doubtful whether the earlier locating of him at the church of Aix-en-Provence be not correct. His narrative is written with little order and less critical skill, his chronology is inexact, and his topographical references are often greatly disfigured. But the work is to be remembered as the outcome of a lifetime of religious and poetic heart, which saw in the contemporary Christian knighthood the salvation of the civilization of Christendom. From this point of view, says Dr. Pastor, "the severe criticism of von Sybel, in his 'Geschichte des ersten Kreuzzugs' (Dusseldorf, 1841), 72–108, loses much of its point." Wattenbach... says that he may have occasionally used good historical material; in general he is the panegyrist of an ideal Christian military service, a brilliant painter of scenes and events; his work and others like it served as a source of inspiration for subsequent Orient or West. A great many instances of devoted soldiers of Christ.

Albert of Brandenburg, Cardinal and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, b. 28 June, 1490; d. 24 September, 1545. As early as 1509 he was Prefect in the Cathedral of Mainz; Archbishop of Magdeburg and Administrator of Halberstadt from 1513; Archbishop of Mainz from 1514; Cardinal Priest from 1518. The indulgence issued by Leo X in 1514 for the building of the new St. Peter’s in Rome, was entrusted to Albert (1517) for publication in Saxony and Brandenburg. This commission has been made by d’Aubigné and others the ground of many accusations against Albert and Leo X, as though they had used the indulgence as a means of enriching themselves personally, “dividing the fruits of the spoils of the credulous souls of Germany” (d’Aubigné, History of the Reformation). Albert employed Tzetzel for the actual preaching of the indulgence and furnished him a book of instructions: “Instructio summaria ad Subcommissiones Posteriorum Confessores.” Later, Martin Luther addressed a letter of protest to Albert concerning the conduct of Tzetzel, found fault with the Bishop’s book of instructions, and asked him to suppress it. Luther’s charges are altogether groundless; the instructions of Albert to the preachers are both wise and edifying; Luther’s letter was disregarded. The accusations which the preachers made were, doubtless, false, Luther was probably justified in thinking that he would find in Albert a strong partisan. The young bishop was somewhat worldly-minded, extravagant, better trained in humanistic studies than in theology, too much given to the patronage of learned men and artists. His long intimacy with Ulrich von Hutten is especially reprehensible. Leo X was obliged to send an admonition to Mainz because so many books hostile to the Faith were being published under the Bishop’s eye. In later life Albert changed his conduct. In his diocese celebrated defenders of Catholicism were employed by Rome, and finally he met with Peter Faber, S.J., and kept him in his diocese (1542–43); after this he was always a friend to the new order. Albert strove earnestly to introduce a more perfect system of religious instruction and brought forward measures for that purpose in the Diet of Nuremberg. He became by his sincerity of his zeal the great defender of the Faith in Germany. As a temporal prince, he ruled his electorate well; he introduced reforms in the administration of justice, into the police system, and into commerce. He was buried in the Cathedral of Mainz. An artistic memorial marks the resting-place of his remains.

Albert of Stade, a chronicler of the thirteenth century. He was born before the close of the twelfth century. It is known that he became abbot of the Benedictine monastery of Stade (near Hamburg) in 1232. Failing to change (1236) the rule of St. Benedict in his abbey to that of the Cistercians, he resigned his office and in 1240 joined the Franciscans. In the same year he commenced to compile his chronicle, which begins in 1236 and comes down to 1256; he may also be the author of the continuations to 1265. The earlier portions appear to have been taken from Bede’s “Libellus de sex statibus mundi”, and Ekkehard’s “Chronicle.” As he approaches his own times, Albert becomes, after the manner of medieval chroniclers, both fuller and more reliable. The first and only complete edition is that printed at Helmstedt in 1587 (Wittenberg, 1608). He is also credited with the authorship of a work called “Troilus,” a Latin epic on the Trojan War, in 3,520 lines, a manuscript copy of which is in the Wollenbüttel library.

Alberti, Leandro, historian, b. at Bologna in 1479; d. same place, probably in 1552. In early youth he attracted the attention of the Bolognese rhetorician, Giovanni Gentile, who became his tutor. He entered the Dominican Order in 1493, and after the completion of his philosophical and theological studies was called to Rome by his friend, the Master General, Francesco Silvestro Ferraris. He served him as secretary and socius until the death of Ferraris in 1538. In 1517, he was appointed postulator in the cause of the canonization of his Order. This work has gone through editions countless and been translated into many modern tongues. Besides several lives of the saints, some of which Papebroch embodied in the “Acta Sanctorum”, and a history of the Madonna di San Luca and the church of St. Domenico, he published in 1514, (1543) a chronicle of his native city (Istoria di Bologna, etc.) to 1273. It was continued by Lucio Caccianemici to 1279. The name of Alberti rests chiefly on Alberti also (Aubertini), Nicolò, medieval statesman, b. at Prato in Italy, c. 1250; d. at Avignon, 27 April, 1321. His early education was directed by his parents, both of whom belonged to illustrious families of Tuscany. At the age of sixteen (1268) he entered the Dominican Order in the Convent of Santa Maria Novella at Florence, and was sent to the University of Paris to complete his studies. He preached in Italy with success, and his theological lectures were especially well attended at Florence and at Rome. He was entrusted by his superiors with important duties in the convents and churches. He was made Proctor-General of the whole Order of St. Dominic by Blessed Nicolò Boccassini, then Master General, and was afterwards elected Provincial of the Roman Province. In 1299, Boniface VIII made him Bishop of Spoleto and soon afterwards sent him as Papal Legate to the Kings of France and England, Philip IV and Edward I, with a view to reconciling them, a seemingly hopeless task. Albertini succeeded in his mission. The Pope in full consistory thanked him, and made him Vicar of Rome. Benedict XI was particularly attached to Albertini, with whom he had often come in the past. After his accession to the Papacy (22 October, 1303) he made Albertini Cardinal-Bishop of Ostia and Dean of the Sacred College, which office he held for eighteen or nineteen years. The civil wars that it the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries had devastated a great part of Italy, especially Tuscany, Romagna, Apulia, and the Marches. The Pope was not unfrequently forced to follow closely the uncritical work written by Annius of Viterbo on the same subject. The work was translated into Latin in 1567, after having been three times enlarged in the Italian. He also wrote a chronicle of Italian events from 1499 to 1525, and sketches of famous Venetians, however, since the editions of the prophecies of the Abbot Joachim and his treatise on the beginnings of the Venetian Republic indicate the current of historical criticism of his day. He was a close friend of most of the contemporary litterati, who frequently consulted him. He is often mentioned in the letters of the poet Giannantonio Fiammingo, who extolled his explanations of the prophecies of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines. He was well known in the legal circles, but his final goal in the friar. Hardly a man of that day had a better knowledge of the contents of most European libraries than Alberti.

Alberti, Leone, Battista, b. 18 February, 1404; d. April, 1472, a Florentine ecclesiast and artist of the fifteenth century. He embraced the ecclesiastical state and became a canon of the Metropolitan Church of Florence, in 1447, and Abbot of San Sovino, or Sant' Eremite, of Pisa. Although Alberti was a scholar, painter, sculptor, and architect, it is by his works of architecture that he is best known. Among them are the completion of the Piti Palace at Florence, the chapel of the Rucellai in the church of St. Pancras, the façade of the church of Santa Maria Novella, the choir of the church of the Nuns, and the churches of St. Sebastian and St. Andrew, at Mantua. His greatest work is generally conceded to be the church of St. Francis at Rimini. His writings on art are his best, and his reputation rests largely on his "De Re Aedificatoria," vol. I, a work on architecture, which was only published after his death. It was brought out in 1455, and the latest edition of it was a folio one at Bologna, in 1732. See ITALY, RENAISSANCE.

Alberts, John Baptist, who is also called Jan Chrzciciel, or Christian, a Polish Jesuit, of Italian extraction, b. at Warsaw, 7 December, 1731; d. August, 1808. He entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus, 14 August, 1748, and left the Society shortly before the suppression, probably in 1779, for his name is not found in the catalogue of 1770. After teaching literature for twelve years in the various Jesuit colleges of Poland, he was entrusted with the care of the great library founded by Zelinski, the famous prelate and litterateur, who had revived literature in Poland, in the library which he bequeathed to Poland was seized by Russia and now forms the nucleus of the Imperial library. Subsequently Alberts was accepted from the library of preceptor to the nephew of the Primate, Archbishop Lubenskii. With his pupil, who afterwards became Minister of Justice in Poland, he travelled through the various countries of Europe, chiefly Italy, to gather material for a great history of Poland. With his own hand he copied manuscripts referring to Poland wherever he found them and in three years amassed a collection of one hundred and ten volumes. When he was not engaged in copying, he read and, on returning home in the evening, wrote out what his prodigious memory retained. Sommervogel says that the net result was two hundred folio volumes. He is called the Polish Polyhistor. His style is rapid, orderly, and methodical. He knew Greek, Latin, Hebrew, and most of the European languages, and translated two volumes of a translation of Macquer's "Roman History"; an abridged "Annals of Poland"; a great number of articles in the "Moniteur", a journal of Warsaw. He also collaborated with Father Naruszewicz, S.J., in a periodical called "Agréeable and Useful Recreations", and produced a work on numismatics, besides many discourses for the Society of Warsaw, which he founded. After leaving the Society, he became Royal Librarian, and Bishop of Zenopolis, and was decorated with the Order of St. Stanislaus. In his work in the Royal Library he not only created a catalogue in ten volumes octavo, but left critical romances in each of the books. He also had ready for publication manuscripts for the history of the three last centuries of Poland, explained by medals; Polish annals up to the reign of Vladislaus IV; and a "History of Stephen Borri". This last has been published.

Albertus Magnus, Blessed (Albert the Great), scientist, philosopher, and theologian, born c. 1206; d. at Cologne, 15 November, 1280. He is called "the Great" and "Doctor Universals" (Universalis Doctor), is recognized as one of the greatest and most extensive knowledge, for he was proficient in every branch of learning cultivated in his day, and surpassed all his contemporaries, except perhaps Roger Bacon (1214-94), in the knowledge of nature. Ulrich Engelbert, a contemporary, calls him the wonder and the miracle of his age: "Vir in omni scientiâ adeo divinus, ut nostri tempos stupor et miraculum congrue vocari possit" (De summo bono, tr. III, iv).

I. LIFE.—Albert, eldest son of the Count of Bollstädt, was born at Lauring, Swabia, in the year 1205 or 1206, though many historians give it as 1200. Certain is that he received his preparatory education, which was received either under the paternal roof or in a school of the neighbourhood. As a youth he was sent to pursue his studies at the University of Padua; that city being chosen either because his uncle resided there, or because Padua was famous for its culture of the liberal arts, for which the young Swabian had a special predilection. The date of this journey to Padua cannot be accurately determined. In the year 1223 he joined the Order of St. Dominic, being attracted by the preaching of Blessed Jordan of Saxony, second Master General of the Order. Historians do not tell us whether Albert's studies were continued at Padua, Bologna, Paris, or Cologne. After completing his studies he taught theology at Hildesheim, Freiburg (Breisgau), Ratisbon, Strasburg, and Cologne. He was in the convent of Cologne, interpreting Peter Lombard's "Book of the Sentences", when, in 1245, he left Germany and proceeded to Paris. Here he acquired the Doctor's degree in the university which, above all others, was celebrated as a school of theology. It was during this period of teaching at Cologne and Paris that he counted among his hearers St. Thomas Aquinas, then a silent, thoughtful youth, whose genius he recognized, and whose future greatness he foretold. The disciple accompanied his master to Paris in 1245, and returned with him, in 1248, to the new Studium Generale of Cologne, in which Albert was appointed Regent, whilst Thomas became second professor and Magister Studentum (Master of Students). In 1254 Albert was elected Provincial of the Order in Germany. He journeyed to Rome in 1256, to defend the Mendicant Orders against the attacks of William of St. Amour, whose book, "De novissimis temporum periculis", was condemned by Pope Alexander IV, on 5 October, 1256. During his sojourn in Rome Albert filled the office of Master of the Sacred Palace (instituted in the time of St. Dominicus for the protection of St. John and the Canonical Epistles. He resigned the office of Provincial in 1257 in order to devote himself to study and to teaching. At the General Chapter of the Dominicans held at Valenciennes in 1259, with St. Thomas Aquinas and Peter of Tarentasia (afterwards Pope Innocent V), he drew up rules for the direction of studies, and for determining the system of graduation, in the Order. In the year 1260 he was appointed Bishop of Ratisbon. Humbert de Romanis, Master General of the Dominicans, being loath to lose the services of the great Master, endeavoured to prevent the resignation, but was unsuccessful. Albert grieved the death of his dear friend in 1262, when, upon the acceptance of his resignation, he voluntarily assumed the duties of a professor in the Studium at Cologne. In the year 1270 he sent a memoir to Paris to aid St. Thomas in combating Siger de Brabant and the Averroists. This was his second special treatise against the Averroist Commentator, the first having been written in 1256, under the title "De Unitate Intellectus Contra Averroem". He was called by Pope Gregory X to attend the Council of Lyons (1274) in the deliberations of which he took an active part. The announcement that he was proceeding to the Council, was a heavy blow to Albert, and he declared that "The Light of the Church" had been extinguished. It was but natural that he should have grown to love his distinguished, saintly pupil, and it is said that ever afterwards he could not restrain his tears whenever the name of St. Thomas was mentioned. Something of his old vigour and spirit returned in 1277, when it was announced that Stephen Temprier and others wished to condemn the writings of St. Thomas, on the plea that they were too favourable to the unbelieving philosophers, and he journeyed to Paris to defend them. Some time after (in which year he drew up his testament) he suffered a lapse of memory; his strong mind gradually becameclouded; his body, weakened by vigils, austerities, and manifold labours, sank under the weight of years. He was beatified by Pope Gregory XV in 1622; his feast is celebrated on the 15th of November. The Bishops of Germany assembled at Fulda in September, 1872, sent to the Holy See a petition for his canonization.

II. WORKS.—Two editions of Albert's complete works (Opera Omnia) have been published; one at Lyons in 1651, in twenty-one folio volumes, edited by Father Peter Janmy, O.P., the other at Paris (Louis Vivès), 1890-99, in thirty-eight quarto volumes, published under the direction of the Abbé Auguste Borgenet, of the diocese of Reims. Paul von Loë gives the chronology of Albert's writings in the "Analekta Bollandiani" (De Vita et scriptis Magistri Alberti). Others have divided his works as follows: The Order is given by P. Mandonnet, O.P., in Vacant's "Dictionnaire de théologie catholique". The following list indicates the subjects of the various treatises, the numbers referring to the volumes of Borgenet's edition: Logic: seven treatises (1, 2). Physical Science: "Physicom" (8). "De Coeli etmundi" (9). "De generatione et corruptione" (1). "Meteororum" (4). "Mineralium" (5). "De Naturae locorum". "De passionibus aera" (10). Biological: "De vegetabilibus et plantis" (10). "De animalibus" (11-12). "De motibus animalium". "De nutrimento et nutrilibi". De statu. "De morte et vita". "De spiritu et ratione" (9). "De senso et sensato" (1). "De Memoria et reminiscientia". "De somno et vigilia". "De natura et origine animae". "De intellectu et intelligibili". "De unitate intellectus" (9). The foregoing subjects, with the exception of Logic, are treated comprehensively in the "Philosophia pauperum" (6). Moral and Political: "Ethica" (7). "Politicum" (8). Metaphysical: "Metaphysicorum" (6). "De causis et processu universitatis" (10). Theological: "Commentary on the works of Denis the Areopagite" (14). "Commentary on the Sentences of the Lombard" (25-50). "Summa Theologiae" (31-33). "Summa de scientiis" (34-35). "Super evangelium missus est" (37). Exegetical: "Commentaries on the Psalms and Prophets" (15-19). "Commentaries on the Gospels" (20-24).
"On the Apocalypse" (38). Sermon (13). The "Quindecim problemas contra Averroistas" was edited by Mandonnet in his "Siger de Brabant" (Freiburg, 1899). The authenticity of the following works is not established: "De apprehensione" (5); "Speculum astronomicum" (5); "De alchimia" (35); "Scriptum super "Artem Aristotelis" (35); "Part. diem" (37); "Libri de adhibendo Deus" (37); "De laudibus B. Virginis" (36); "Biblia Mariana" (37).

III. Influence.—The influence exerted by Albert on the scholars of his own day and on those of subsequent ages was naturally great. His fame is due in a great measure to his being the foremost guide and master of St. Thomas Aquinas, but he was great in his own name, his claim to distinction being recognized by his contemporaries and by posterity. It is remarkable that this farr of the Middle Ages, in the midst of his many duties as a religious, as provincial of his order, as bishop and papal legate, as preacher of a crusade, and while making many laborious journeys from Cologne to Paris and Rome, and frequent excursions into different parts of Germany, should have been able to compose a veritable encyclopedia, containing scientific treatises on almost every subject, and displaying an insight into nature and the mind of God, which has not been surpassed by contemporaries and still excites the admiration of learned men in our own times. He was, in truth, a Doctor Universalis. Of him it may justly be said: "Nil tetigit quod non ornavit; and there is no exaggeration in the praises of the modern critic who wrote: "Whether we consider him as a theologian or as a philosopher, Albert was undoubtedly one of the most extraordinary men of his age; I might say, one of the most wonderful men of genius who appeared in past times" (Jourdain, Recherches Critiques). Philosophy, in the days of Albert, was a practical science embracing everything that could be known by the natural powers of the mind; physics, mathematics, and metaphysics. In his writings we do not, it is true, find the distinction between the sciences and philosophy which recent usage makes. It will, however, be convenient to consider his skill in the experimental sciences, his influence on philosophy.

IV. ALBERT AND THE EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCES.—It is not surprising that Albert should have drawn upon the sources of information which his time afforded, and especially upon the scientific writings of Aristotle. Yet he says: "The aim of natural science is not to diminish, but to increase the content of others, but to investigate the causes that are at work in nature" (De Miner., lib. II, tr. ii). In his treatise on plants he lays down the principle: Experimentsum solutum certificat in talibus (Experiment is the only safe guide in such investigations). (De Veg., VI, tr. ii, i). Discrepantly as he was in theology, he declares: "In studying nature we have not to inquire how God the Creator may, as He freely wills, use His creatures to work miracles and thereby show forth His power: we have rather to inquire what Nature with its immanent causes can naturally bring to pass" (De Coelo et Mundo, I, tr. iv, x). In the question of natural science, he would prefer Aristotle to St. Augustine (In 2. Sent. dist. 13, C. art. 2), he does not hesitate to censure the Greek philosopher. "Whoever believes that Aristotle was a god, must also believe that he never erred. But if one believe that Aristotle was a man, then doubt that he was liable to error just as we are. (Physic. lib. VIII, tr. i, xiv). In a lengthy chapter to what he calls "the errors of Aristotle" (Sum. Theol., P. II, tr. ii, quest. iv). In a word, his appreciation of Aristotle is critical. He deserves credit not only for bringing the scientific teaching of the Stagirite to the attention of medieval scholars, but also for indicating the method and the spirit in which that teaching was to be received. Like his contemporary, Roger Bacon (1214–94), Albert was an indefatigable student of nature, and applied himself energetically to the experimental sciences with such remarkable success that he has been accused of neglecting the sacred sciences (Henry de Montaigu, De scientia Dei, 241). Indeed, many legends have been circulated which attribute to him the power of a magician or sorcerer. Dr. Sighard (Albertus Magnus) examined these legends, and endeavored to sift the truth from false or exaggerated stories. Other biographers content themselves with repeating that the deficiency in the physical sciences was the foundation on which the tables were constructed. The truth lies between the two extremes. Albert was assiduous in cultivating the natural sciences; he was an authority on physics, geography, astronomy, mineralogy, chemistry (alchimia), zoology, physiology, and even phenology. On all these subjects his erudition was vast, and many of his observations are of permanent value. Humboldt pays a high tribute to his knowledge of physical geography (Cosmos, II, vi). Meyer writes (Gesch. der Botanik): "No botanist who lived before Albert can be compared with him. If you insist unless it be that he was not acquainted; and after him none has painted nature in such living colours, or studied it so profoundly, until the time of Conrad, Gesner, and Celsalpin. All honour, then, to the man who made such astonishing progress in the science of nature as to find no one, I will not say to surpass, but even to equal him for the space of three centuries." The list of his published works is sufficient vindication from the charge of neglecting theology and the Sacred Scriptures. On the other hand, he expressed contempt for everything that savoured of enchantment or the art of magic: "Non approbu dictum Aviceaman et Algazel de fascinatione, quis credat non nocet fascinare, nec nocere potest ars magica, nec facti aliquid ex hae timentur de talibus" (See Quétif, I, 167). That he did not admit the possibility of making gold by alchemy or the use of the philosopher's stone, is evident from his own words: "Art alone can produce a sulphur in form." (Non est probatum hoc quod educetur de plumbo esse aurum, eo quod sola ars non potest dare formam substantialem—De Mineral., lib. II, dist. 3).

Roger Bacon and Albert proved to the world that the Church is not opposed to the study of nature, but that knowledge and scientific research have been the means of advancing the Church and helping to raise the dignity and status of the laity. They were the first to write and publish extensively on experimental research, and they left behind them a heritage that has profoundly influenced the course of science in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Their work was not without its critics, and the Church was slow to recognize the importance of their discoveries. Bacon was indefatigable and bold in investigating; at times, too, his criticism was sharp. But of Albert he said: "Studiosissimus erat, et vidit infinita, et habuit expensum, et idio multa potuit colligere in pellago vacuorum infinti" (Opera, ed. Huyser, 1327). Albert's respected authority and traditions, was prudent in proposing the results of his investigations, and hence "contributed far more than Bacon did to the advancement of science in the thirteenth century" (Turner, Hist. of Phil.). His method of treating the sciences was historical and critical. He gathered into one vast encyclopedia all that was known in his day, and then expressed his own opinions, principally in the form of commentaries on the works of Aristotle. Sometimes, however, he hesitates, and does not express his own opinion, probably because he feared that his theories, which were novel at the time, would create surprise and occasion unfavourable comment. "Dica peripateticorum, prout melius potius exponui: nec aliquid in eo potest reprehendere quid ego ipse sentiam in philosophia naturali" (De Animalibus, circa finem). In Augustus Theodosia Drake's excellent work on "Christian Schools and Scholam" (419 sqq.) there are some interesting remarks on "a few scientific views of Albert, which show how much he owed to his own sagacious observation of natural phenomena, and how far he was in advance of his age. ... In speaking of the British Isles, he alluded to the commonly received idea that the Scilly Islands—called Thule—existed in the Western Ocean, uninhabitable by reason of its frightful clime, "but which," he says, "has perhaps not yet been visited by man." Albert gives an elaborate demonstration of the sphericity of the earth; and it has been pointed out that his views of this were anticipated eventually to the discovery of America (cf. Mandenot, in "Revue Thomiste", 1, 1893; 46-64, 200-221).

V. ALBERT AND SCHOLASTIC PHILOSOPHY.—More important than Albert's development of the physical sciences was his influence on the study of philosophy and theology. He, more than any one of the great scholastics preceding St. Thomas, gave to Christian philosophy and theology the form and method which, substantially, they retain to this day. In this respect he was the forerunner and master of St. Thomas, who excelled him, however, in many qualities required in a perfect Christian Doctor. In marking off the path which others had trodden, Albert did not lose the glory of being a pioneer with Alexander of Hales (d. 1245), whose "Summa Theologiae" was the first written after all the works of Aristotle had become generally known at Paris. Their application of Aristotelian methods and principles to the study of revealed doctrine gave to the world the scholastic system which embodies the reconciliation of reason and orthodox faith. After the unorthodox Averroes, Albert was the chief commentator on the works of Aristotle, whose writings he studied most assiduously, and whose principles he adopted, in order to systematize theology, by which was meant a scientific exposition and defense of Christian dogma. The choice of Aristotle as a master excited strong opposition. Jewish and Arabic commentaries on the works of the Stagirite had given rise to so many errors in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries that for several years (1210-25) the study of Aristotle's Physics and Metaphysics was forbidden at Paris. Albert, however, knew that Averroes, Abelard, Amalric, and others had drawn false doctrines from the writings of the Philosopher; he knew, moreover, that it would have been impossible to stem the tide of enthusiasm in favour of philosophical studies; and so he resolved to purify the works of Aristotle of their speculative, physical, and other errors, and thus compel pagan philosophy to do service in the cause of revealed truth. In this he followed the canon laid down by St. Augustine (II De Doct. Christ., xi), who declared that truths found in the writings of pagan philosophers were to be adopted by the defenders of the true faith, while their erroneous opinions were to be abandoned, or explained in a Christian sense. (See St. Thomas, Summa Theol., I, Q. lxxv, a. 5.) All inferior (natural) sciences should be the servants (ancillae) of Theology, which is the superior and the mistress (ibid., I, Pr. 1, quest. 6). Against the rationalism of Abelard and the Albigensians Albert maintained the distinction between truths naturally knowable and mysteries (e.g. the Trinity and the Incarnation) which cannot be known without revelation (ibid., I, Pr. 13, quest. 13). We have seen that he wrote two treatises against Averroism, which destroyed individual responsibility and individual responsibility; by teaching that there is but one rational soul for all men. Pantheism was refuted along with Averroism when the true doctrine on Universals, the system known as moderate Realism, was accepted by the scholastic philosophers. This doctrine Albert based upon the distinction of the universal ante rem (an idea or archetype in the mind of God), in re (existing or capable of existing in many individuals), and post rem (as a concept abstracted by the mind, and compared with the individuals of which it can be predicated).

"Universale duobus constitutur, natura scilicet cui accedit universalitas, et respectu ad multa, in eamque plurimos individuos (M. Met., V. tr. vii, cc. v, vi). A. T. Drake (Mother Raphael, O.S.D.) gives a remarkable explanation of these doctrines (op. cit., 344-429). Though a follower of Aristotle, Albert did not neglect Plato. "Sicis quod non pericurt homo in philosophia, nisi scientia duxit, philosopha esse Melisseum (Met., lib. I, tr. v. c. xv). It is erroneous to say that he was merely the "Ape" (simius) of Aristotle. In the knowledge of Divine things faith precedes the understanding of Divine truth, authority precedes reason (I Sent., dist. II, a. 10); but in matters that can be naturally known a philosopher should not hold an opinion which he is not prepared to defend by reason (ibid., XII; Periherm. 1, I, tr. 1, c. 1). Logic, according to Albert, was a preparation for philosophy teaching how we should reason in order to pass from the known to the unknown: "Docens qualiter et per quse devertitur per notum ad ignoti notionem" (ibid., lib. III, c. i, iv). Philosophy is either contemplative or practical. Contemplative philosophy embraces physics, mathematics, and metaphysics; practical (moral) philosophy is monastic (for the individual), domestic (for the family), or political (for the state, or society). Excluding physics, now a separate study, and thus not in Albert's time, still retain the old scholastic division of philosophy into logic, metaphysics (general and special), and ethics.

VI. ALBERT'S THEOLOGY.—In theology Albert occupies a place between Peter Lombard, the Master of the Sentences, and St. Thomas Aquinas. In systematic order and doctrine he surpasses the former, but is inferior to his own illustrious disciple. His "Summa Theologiae" marks an advance beyond the custom of his time in the scientific order observed, in the elimination of useless questions, in the limitation of arguments and objections; there still remain, however, many of the "expedientia, hindrances, or stumbling blocks, which St. Thomas considered serious enough to call for a new manual of theology for the use of beginners—ad eruditionem incipientium, as the Angelic Doctor modestly remarks in the prologue of his immortal "Summa". The mind of the Doctor Universale is often filled with the greatness of God, and he could not always adapt his expositions of the truth to the capacity of novices in the science of theology. He trained and directed a pupil who gave the world a concise, clear, and perfect scientific exposition and defence of Christian Doctrine; under the same God, therefore, we owe to Albertus Magnus the "Summa Theologiae" of St. Thomas. (See Alexander of Hales, Aristotle, Averroes; Bacon; Roger; Paris, University of; Philosophy, Rationalism, Scholasticism, Thomas Aquinas, St.: Theology.)

Albla: The Archdiocese of, comprises the Department of the Tarn. An archiepiscopal see from 1678 up to the time of the French Revolution. Albl, as suffragans of the Bishops of Rodes, Castres, Cazeres, and Mende, was not re-established until 1822, and by this new distribution it united the ancient Bishopric of Castres and had for suffragans, besides the Diocese of Rodez (joined with Valras) of Cahors, and of Mende, the Bishopric of Perpignan. A local tradition which dates from the twelfth century attributes the foundation of the see to St. Clovis, of African birth, who installed his disciple Anthimus as his successor, and went to Lectoure where he was beheaded. The details of this legend have caused the Bollandists to legiti- mately suspect its authenticity. The first bishop known under the title is Diognatus (about 404). The church at Albi is rich in menomites; it was at Vieux, in the Diocese of Albi, at the end of the fifth century, that the first monastery of the Gauls (cursus sanctorum) was founded by St. Eugene, a bishop exiled from Carthage, St. Longin, and St. Vindemialis, near the tomb of St. Amaranus (martyr of the third century). From the sixth to the eight centuries, two great families of Albi gave many saints to the Church, the Salvia family, to which belonged St. Salvius, Bishop of Albi, St. Rusticus, St. Desiderius, Bishops of Cahors, also St. Dascioi, the companion of St. Radegonda; the Anesor family, to which belonged St. Stigibald, Bishop of Meta, and the latter's sister, St. Sigolima, abbess of Tranca in the Diocese of Albi. The celebrated Cardinal de Bernis, ambas- sador of Louis XV, at Rome, was titular Bishop of Albi from 1764 to 1794. The memory of St. Dominic, who vigorously defended the Albigensian heresy, was still very fresh in the Diocese of Albi; in the vicinity of Castres there is a natural grotto containing several rooms, which is called the grotto of St. Dominic; tradition asserts that it was the retreat of the saint. The Council of Albi, in 1254, triumphed over the Albigensian heresy by organizing the Inquisition in that province. The parish church of St. Lawrence is said to have been founded in the time of Charlemagne. The cathedral of St. Cecilia of Albi (1282-1512) is a typical model of a fortified church; its sculptured gallery is the largest of its kind in France. The ancient Benedictine abbey of Sorèze, founded in 527, was converted into a school in 1026 under the direction of the Dominican Laciardis. The cities of Castres and Gaillac owe their origin to the Bene- dictine abbeys, the first of which, it is said, was founded by Charlemagne, and the second by Raimond I, Count of Toulouse, in 960. The Archdiocese with the Oriental languages, especially Hebrew, and the inhabitants, 49 first-class parishes, 447 second-class parishes, and 68 vicariates with salaries formerly paid by the State.

Albi, Council of.—It was held in 1254 by St. Louis on his return from his unlucky Crusade, under the presidency of Zoon, Bishop of Avignon and Papal Legate, for the final repression of the Albigensian heresy and the reform of the clergy and peasantry. It also legislated concerning the communes.

Albi (or Alba), Juan de, a Spanish Carthusian of the Convent Val-Christ, near Segovia, date of birth uncertain; d. 27 December, 1581. He was familiar with the Oriental languages, especially Hebrew, and had the reputation of being a skilled commentator. His work is: "Sacrarum semenoseum, animadver- sionem et electorum ex utriusque Testamento lectione commentarius et centuria" (Valencia, 1610); it was re-edited in Venice, 1613, under the title "Selecte Annotiones in varia utriusque Testamento loca defensione."

Albicaneis (from Albi, Lat. Albis, the present capital of the Department of Tarn), a Neo-Manichean sect that flourished in southern France in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The name Albicanes, given them by the Council of Tours (1163) prevailed towards the end of the twelfth century and was for a long time applied to all the heretics of that region. They were also called Catharists (sabatii), though in reality they were only a branch of the Catharistic movement. The rise and spread of the new doctrine in southern France was favoured by various circumstances, among which may be mentioned: the connection between the new sect and the ancient dualistic principle; the remnant of Jewish and Mohammedan doctrinal elements; the wealth, leisure, and imaginative mind of the inhabitants of Languedoc; their contempt for the Catholic clergy, caused by the ignorance and the worldly, too frequently scandalous, lives of the latter; the protection of an over-penalising majority of the nobility, and the intimate local blending of national aspirations and religious sentiment.

I PRINCIPLES.—(a) Doctrinal.—The Albigenses asserted the co-existence of two mutually opposed principles, one good, the other evil. The former is the good spirit or soul, the latter, the bad spirit or soul. The world is the combat of the two. The bad principle is the source of all evil; natural phenomena, either ordinary like the growth of plants, or extraordinary as earthquakes, likewise moral disorders (war), must be attributed to him. He created the human body and is the author of sin, which springs from matter and not from the spirit. The old Testament must be either partly or entirely ascribed to him; whereas the New Testament is the revelation of the beneficent God. The latter is the creator of human souls, which the bad principle imprisoned in material bodies after he had deceived them into leaving the Kingdom of light. This earth is the principal of corruption, the place that exists on the human soul. Punishment, however, is not everlasting; for all souls, being Divine in nature, must eventually be liberated. To accomplish this deliverance God sent upon earth Jesus Christ, who, although very perfect, like the Holy Ghost, is still a mere creature. The Redeemer could not take on a genuine human body, because He would thereby have come under the control of the evil principle. His body was, therefore, of celestial essence, and with it He penetrated the ear of Mary. It was only apparently that He was born from her and only apparently that He suffered. His redemption was not operative, but solely instructive. To enjoy its benefits, one must become a member of the Church of Christ (the Albigenses). Here below, it is not the Catholic sacraments but the peculiar ceremony of the Albigenses known as the consolamentum, or “consolation”, that purifies the soul from all sin and endorses the divine grace. The resurrection of the body will not take place, since by its nature all flesh is evil. (b) Moral.—The dualism of the Albigenses was also the basis of their moral teaching. Man, they taught, is a living contradiction. Hence, the liberation of the soul from its captivity in the body is the true end of our being. To attain this, suicide is commendable; it was customary among them in the form of the endura (starvation). The extinction of bodily life on the largest scale consistent with human existence is also a perfect aim. As generation propagates the slavery of the soul to the body, perpetual chastity should be practised. Matrimony for women is unlawful; concubinage, being of a less permanent nature, is preferable to marriage. Abandonment of his wife by the husband, or vice versa, is desirable. Generation was abhorred by the Albigenses even in the animal kingdom. Consequently, abstention from any animal food, which was shared with the household, was observed. Their belief in metempsychosis, or the transmigration of souls, the result of their logical rejection of purgatory, furnishes another explanation for the same abstinence. To this practice they added long and rigorous fasts. The necessity of absolute fidelity to the sect was strongly inculcated. War and capital punishment were absolutely condemned.

II ORIGIN AND HISTORY.—The contact of Christianity with the Oriental mind and Oriental religions had produced several sects (Gnostics, Manicheans, Paulicians, Bogomilae) whose doctrines were akin to the tenets of the Albigenses. But the historical connection between them and the Albigenses, whose predecessors cannot be clearly traced. In France, where they were probably introduced by a woman from Italy, the Neo-Manichean doctrines were secretly diffused for several years before they appeared, almost simultaneously, near Toulouse and at the Synod of Orleans (1022). Those who proposed that the name was given even to certain texts of the Esoteric Church, like the Albigenses, who were entirely heretical. The Councils of Arles (1025), Charroux, Dep. of Vienne (c. 1028), and of Reims (1049) had to deal with the heresy. At that of Beauvais (1114) the case of Neo-Manicheans in the Diocese of Soissons was brought up, but was referred to the archbishops of the French kingdom. The Council of Reims (1148) commended the protected persons who became the object of the inquisitorial tribunals. The Bishop of London, the case of the four bishops, now familiarized the South with some of the tenets of the Albigenses. Its condemnation by the Council of Toulouse (1119) did not prevent the evil from spreading. Pope Eugene III (1145–53) sent a legate, Cardinal Alberic of Oesia, to Langue- duc (1145), and St. Bernard seconded the legate’s efforts. But this preaching produced no lasting effect. The Council of Reims (1148) excommunicated the protectors of the heretics of Gascony and Provence. That of Tours (1163) decreed that the Albigenses should be imprisoned and their property confiscated. A religious disputation was held at the University of Paris, as the result of a council’s result of such conferences. Two years later, the Albigenses held a general council at Toulouse, their chief centre of activity. The Cardinal-Legate Peter made another attempt at peaceful settlement (1178), but he was received with derision. The Third General Council of the Lateran (1179) renewed the previous severe measures and issued a summons to use force against the heretics, who were plundering and devastating Albi, Toulouse, and the vicinity. At the death (1194) of the Catholic Count of Toulouse, Raymond V, his successor fell to Raymond VI (1194–1229) who favoured the heretics. With the accession of Innocent III (1198) the work of conversion and repression was taken up vigorously. In 1205–6 three events augured well for the success of the efforts made in that direction. Raymond VI, in face of the threatening military operations urged by Innocent against him, promised under oath to his benefactors of future salvation. Then the monk Fulco of Marseilles, formerly a troubadour, now became Archbishop of Toulouse (1205–31). Two Spaniards, Diego, Bishop of Osma, and his companion, Dominic Guzman (St. Dominic), returning from Rome, visited the papal legates at Montpellier. By their advice, the excessive outpouring of the splendid of Catholic preachers, which offended the heretics, was replaced by apostolic austerity. Religious disputations were renewed. St. Dominic, receiving the great advantages derived by his opponents from the co-operation of women, founded (1208) at Pouille near Carcassonne a religious congregation for women, whose object was the instruction and the education of the poorer girls of the nobility. Not long after this he laid the foundation of the Dominican Order. Innocent III, in view of the immense spread of the heresy, which infected over 1000 cities or towns, called (1207) upon the King of France, as Suserain of the County of Toulouse, was convinced of the necessity of his appeal on receiving news of the assassination of his legate, Peter of Castelnau, a Cistercian monk (1208), which, judging by appearances, he attributed to Raymond VI. Numerous barons of northern France, Germany, and Belgium joined the crusade, and papal legates were put at the head of the crusade knights. When the Pope sent his legate, Peter of Castelnau, to negotiate with Raymond VI, still under the ban of excommunication pronounced against him by Peter of Castelnau, now offered to submit, was reconciled with the Church, and took the field against his former friends. Roger, Viscount of Béziers, was first attacked, and his principal fortresses, Béziers and Carcassonne, were taken (1209). The monstrous words: "Slay all; God will keep his own" were uttered at the capture of Béziers, by the papal legate, were never pronounced (Tamizy de Larroque, "Rev. des quest. hist." 1866, I, 168-91). Simon of Montfort, Earl of Leicester, was given control of the conquered territory and became the military leader of the crusade. At the Council of Lyon (1245) Raymond VI was again excommunicated for not fulfilling the conditions of ecclesiastical reconciliation. He went in person to Rome, and the Pope ordered an investigation. After fruitless attempts in the Council of Arles (1211) at an agreement between the papal legates and the Count of Toulouse, the latter left the council and prepared to resist. He was declared an enemy of the Church and his possessions were forfeited to whoever would conquer them. Lavau, Dep. of Tarn, fell in 1211, amid dreadful carnage, into the hands of the crusaders. The latter, exasperated by the reported massacre of 600 virgins, spurred on their horses. The crusade now degenerated into a war of conquest, and Innocent III, in spite of his efforts, was powerless to bring the undertaking back to its original purpose. Peter of Aragon, Raymond's brother-in-law, interposed to obtain his forgiveness, but without success. The Pope told the troops to desist with him. The troops of Peter and of Simon of Montfort met at Muret (1213). Peter was defeated and killed. The allies of the fallen king were now so weakened that they offered to submit. The Pope sent as his representative the Cardinal-Deacon Peter of Santa Maria in Aquirio, who carried out only part of his instructions, receiving indeed Raymond, the inhabitants of Toulouse, and others back into the Church, but furthering at the same time Simon's plans of conquest. This commander continued the war and was appointed by the Council of Montpellier (1215) lord over all the acquired territory. The Pope, informed that it was the only effectual means of crushing the heresy, approved the choice. At the death of Simon (1218), his son Amalric inherited his rights and continued the war with but little success. The territory was ultimately ceded almost entirely by both Almoric and Raymond VII to the King of France, while the Council of Toulouse tolerated the Inquisition, which soon passed into the hands of the Dominicans (1233), with the repression of Albigensianism. The heresy disappeared about the end of the fourteenth century.

III ORGANIZATION AND LITURGY.—The members of the sect were divided into two classes: The "perfect" (perfecti) and the mere "believers" (credentes). The "perfect" were those who had submitted to the initiation-rite (consolamentum). They were few in number and were alone bound to the observance of the above-described rigid moral law. While the female members of this class did not travel, the men went, by a series of stages, through the ceremony of initiation. The only bond that attached the "believers" to Albigensianism was the promise to receive the consolamentum before death. They were very numerous, could marry, wage war, etc., and generally observed the ten commandments. Many remained "believers" for years and were only induced to die on the cross under dire affliction—end fatally, starvation or poison rather frequently subsequent moral transgressions. In some instances the consolamentum was administered to those who, after initiation, had relapsed into sin. The hierarchy consisted of bishops and deacons. The existence of an Albigensian Pope is not universally admitted. The bishops were chosen from among the "perfect". They had two assistants, the older and the younger son (filius major and filius minor), and were generally succeeded by the former. The consolamentum, or ceremony of initiation, was a sort of spiritual baptism, analogous in rite and equivalency in significance to the pagan Chinese initiations (Baptism, Penance, Order). Its reception, from which children were debarred, was, if possible, preceded by careful religious study and penitential practices. In this period of preparation, the candidates used ceremonies that bore a striking resemblance to those of the Catholic church. The essential rite of the consolamentum was the imposition of hands. The engagement which the "believers" took to be initiated before death was known as the convenenza (promise).

IV ATTITUDE OF THE CHURCH.—Properly speaking, Albigensianism was not a Christian heresy but an extra-Christian religion. Ecclesiastical authority, after persuasion had failed, adopted a course of severe repression, which led at times to regrettable excesses. Simon of Montfort intended well at first, but later used the pretext of religion to usurp the territory of the Counts of Toulouse. The death-penalty was inflicted, and the enmity of the Church was not forgotten. But it must be remembered that the penal code of the time was considerably more rigorous than ours, and the excesses were sometimes provoked. Raymond VI and his successor, Raymond VII, were, when in distress, ever ready to promise, but never to earnestly fulfill. The Pope and the Church justified in saying that the Albigenses were not worse than others; and still he counselled moderation and disapproved of the selfish policy adopted by Simon of Montfort. What the Church combated was principles that led directly not only to the ruin of Christianity, but to the very extinction of the human race.

Albinus, a scholarly English monk, pupil of Archbishop Theodore, and of Abbot Adrian of St. Peter's, Canterbury, contemporary of St. Anselm (1075-1148). He succeeded Adrian in the abbatial office, and was buried beside him in 732. His chief title to fame lies in the fact that we owe to him the composition by Saint Bede of his "Ecclesiastical History of the English". The latter gratefully records the fact in the letter which he sent to Albinus with a copy of his own work, and expresses his wish that if he could see King Coolwulf, both of which serve as a preface to the narrative. He calls Albinus a most learned man in all the sciences (Hist. Ecc. Angl., v, 20), and says that to his instigation and help the above-mentioned work was chiefly owing (actus ante omnes aegre alumnus recentior opusculum). Saint Bede died from illness that had beset him in Kent, in the year 734, at the arrival of St. Augustine, both ecclesiastical and civil matters. Nothhelm, a priest of London, served as their intermediary, and when the former returned from Rome with additional documents from the pontifical archives, Albinus was again called on to help in fitting them into their places. He seems to have been endowed with a fine historical sense, for the Father of English ecclesiastical history delights in confessing his earnestness, diligence, and erudition in all that pertained to the apostolic period of England's conversion.

Albrechtsberger, Johann G., master of musical theory, and teacher of Hummel and Beethoven, b. at Klosterneuburg in Lower Austria, 8 February, 1736; d. at Vienna, 7 March, 1806. He began his musical career as a choir-boy at the early age of seven. The pastor of St. Martin's, Klosterneuburg, observing the boy's talent and his remarkable industry, and being himself an excellent musician, gave him the first lessons in thoroughbass, and even had a little organ built for him. Young Albrechtsberger's ambition was so great that he did not even rest on Sundays and holidays. To complete his scientific and musical studies, he repaired to the Benedictine Abbey at Melk. Here his beautiful soprano voice attracted the attention of the future Emperor Leopold, who on one occasion expressed his desire to hear him, and he took him as a choir-boy with a ducat. The library at Melk gave him the opportunity to study the works of Caldara Fux, Pergolese, Händel, Graun, etc. The result was the profound knowledge of music which gave him a high rank among theorists. Having completed his studies he became organist at the cathedral there, where he remained for twelve years. He next had charge of the choir at Raab in Hungary, and at Mariastefel. Subsequently he went to Vienna, having been named choir-director of the church of the Carmelites. Here he took lessons from the court organist, Mann, who was highly esteemed at that time. Mann became his friend, as did also Joseph and Michael Haydn, Gassmann, and other excellent musicians. In 1772 he obtained the position of court organist in Vienna, which Emperor Joseph had promised him years before. This position he held for twenty years, and then became choirmaster at St. Stephen's. Here he gathered about him a circle of pupils, some of whom were destined to become musicians of immortal fame. Among them Ludwig von Beethoven, Joseph Eybler, Johann Nepomuk Hummel, Joseph Weigl and others. The Swedish Academy of Music at Stockholm made him a fellow member in 1791. Although in 1798 Albrechtsberg would probably always hold a high rank among musical scientists, his treatise on composition especially will ever remain a work of importance by reason of its lucidity and minuteness of detail. His complete works on thoroughbass, harmony, and composition were published, in three volumes, by his pupil, Ignaz von Seyfried. His many church compositions, on the other hand, while technically correct and ornate, are dry, and betray the theorist. Of his compositions only twenty-seven are printed, out of a total of 261; of the unpublished remainder, the larger part is preserved in the library of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna.

Albuquerque, AFONSO DE (also DALBOQUERQ), surnamed "the Great," b. in Portugal, 1433; d. at Goa, 16 December, 1515. He was second son of Don Vasco de Albuquerque, and became attached to the person of the King of Portugal. He went to Otranto with Alphonso V in 1480, and made his first voyage to the far East in 1503, returning to Lisbon 1504. When Tristan da Cunha sailed for India in 1506, Albuquerque was one of his officers. He formed the plan to monopolize trade with East India for Portugal, and in 1507 he went to the Venetians and the Saracens, and therefore sought to make himself master of the Red Sea. For that purpose he seized the Island of Socotra and attacked Ormuz, landing 10 October, 1507, and raising fortifications. The attack was renewed in the year following, also at Cochin in December. When the Viceroy of India, d'Almeida, returned to Portugal, 1509, Albuquerque was appointed in his place. In 1513, King Emmanuel calls him "protho-capitaneus noster." Annoyed by the constant hostilities of the people of Calicut, he destroyed the place on 4 January, 1510. To secure a permanent foothold on the coast of India, he founded Goa, receiving it two months afterwards, only to return in November, when he took the place again and held it thereafter for the Portuguese. Once safely established on the eastern coast of what is generally comprised under the name of Dekkan, Albuquerque turned his attention to the navigation of the Indian Ocean, especially to discoveries towards the farthest East. He took Malacca in July, 1511, and attempted to explore the Moluccas in the same year. In pursuance of his policy to prevent other nations from intercourse with India, he occupied a strong position at Aden, on the Red Sea, March, 1513, but about the same time the Turks had conquered Egypt and effectively barred access to the far East to all other nations except by sea. While Albuquerque was thus establishing Portuguese colonization in India on a firm footing, and planning advances beyond eastern Asia, the Crown of Portugal was listening to intrigues to his prejudice. Still it may be that the state of his health, greatly impaired through climate and strain, induced King Emmanuel to provide for a successor. Albuquerque was manifestly broken down physically. So Lope Suarez was sent to supersede him. The news of what he considered an act of ingratitude prostrated him, and although he lived for another year, his mind was only capable terms to his successor to pay special deference to the meritorious leader, expressing, at the same time regret at having removed him from his high position, Albuquerque pined and died at the entrance to the bay of Goa, 16 December, 1515. Fifty-one years later his remains were transported to Lisbon, where a more worthy resting place had been prepared for them. Among the distinguished leaders and administrators that sprang up in southern Europe at the end of the fifteenth and in the first half of the sixteenth century, Albuquerque holds a very prominent position. His achievements, from a military standpoint, were greater than any of the so-called conquerors of the New World; for he had to cope with adversaries armed very nearly like the Europeans, with hosts that were superior to any encountered by Cortez or Pizarro, and had at his command forces hardly more numerous than those that achieved the conquest of Persia and Mexico. His enemies opposed him at sea, as well as on land, and they might, at any time, obtain succour from powerful Mohammedan states interfering between Europe and Asia. His only route for communication and relief was around the Cape of Good Hope. When, during the last five years of his life, he could at last turn all his attention and administration, he proved himself a great man in this respect also. His religious zeal was not the less notable. He built churches in Goa and had Franciscans and a famous Dominican with him. The church of the Blessed Virgin at Goa, which he built, is called by Father Spillmann, S.J., "the cradle of Christianity, not only in India, but in all East Asia." (Kirchenlexikon, V, s. v. Goa).

Perhaps the earliest mention of Albuquerque and his achievements in Europe is due to Emmanuel himself, in his letter of "Idus Junii," 1513, Epistolae Potentissimi Rerum Regum et Reipublicae Christianae Portugaliae Maioris in Indiis et Malacidi (Rome, 9 Aug., 1513), wherein the King calls him (perhaps a misprint) "Albahezco." There are available in Goa, no place or date, Joaõ BARBOSA, Asia (second decade, Lisbon, 1553); FERNÃO LOPES DE CARTASANTE, Historia de descubrimentos & conquistas do India (Lisbon, 1599); II, III, IV; DOMINGO DE GOREA, Crónica do Serventismo Senhor Rei d. Alocá, University of.—This university may be said to have had its inception in the thirteenth century, when Sancho IV, the Brave, King of Castile, conceived the idea of founding a Studium Generale in his capital, but it was not adopted until 1251. It was granted full faculties on the Archbishop of Toledo, Gonzalo Gudiol, to carry out this plan. What success attended these efforts is, however, not known; we know only that on 16 July, 1439, Pius II gave permission to the Archbishop of Toledo, Alonso Carrillo, to establish some professorships where, "ten days at the time and appointed or to be appointed," grammar and the liberal arts would be taught. It does not appear that the chairs of theology and canon law were established then, and even grammar was taught only irregularly in the Franciscan convent of San Diego. The honour of founding the University, or, more properly speaking, the College, of San Ildesonzo, belongs to the Franciscan, Francisco Ximenez de Cameros, Prime Minister of Spain, who submitted his plan to Pope Alexander VI, and received his approbation 13 April, 1499. Nevertheless, prior to this there existed certain chairs in the convent of San Diego of the Franciscans, says in the preface. The Pope granted to the College of San Ildesonzo the same concessions allowed to the College of San Bartolomé at Salamanca, and to the college founded at Bologna by Cardinal Albornoz. To the professors and scholars he granted the privileges enjoyed by those of Salamanca, Valladolid, and the other General Colleges. He conferred the degree of Bachelor on the professors, and Doctor of Laws and Master of Arts on the abbots, or, in his absence, on the treasurer, of the Collegiate Church of San Justo and San Pastor. Those who were thus honoured enjoyed the same privileges as the professors of Bolonia and other universities. They could occupy prebendarial stalls for which university degrees were necessary (13 May, 1501). In 1505 ecclesiastical benefices were aggregated to the Colleum scholiarum, and 22 January, 1512, the archbishop published the statutes of the college. Denifle says that research in Germany regarding this university is incomplete and inaccurate. Meneses and Segura, says Denifle, in his Historical and statistical description of the Universities of Europe (Oxford, 1866), II, p. 56, state that "the Universities of Spain were essentially royal creations" (II, p. 56). University degrees were granted to the College of San Ildesonzo. The rector was to be chosen by the students (not by the professors, as was the custom at Salamanca) each year about the feast of St. Luke when studies were resumed. The older students were obliged to study theology; civil law was excluded, although the canonists introduced it in the sixteenth century. In civil and canon law, the course of study included logic, philosophy, medicine, Hebrew, Greek, rhetoric, and grammar. Demetrio de Creta was engaged to teach Greek, and the mathematician, Pedro Ciruelo, explained the theology of St. Thomas. Cisneros not only founded a university, but also carried on a literary career, certain portions of which were devoted to the houses of the students and booksellers. Numerous colleges also sprang up; Santa Catalina and Santa Bambina for philosophers; San Eugenio and San Isidoro for grammarians; and the Trilingue. He erected a hospital in honour of the Mother of God for the students, and established three places of recreation: the Abbey of San Tuy, near Buitrago; the Aldechuela, near Torrelaguna; and Anchuelo, near Alocá. Soon, however, a spirit of insubordination began to show itself in the wrangling of the students with the townspeople, the severe Cisneros apparently showing a strong leniency towards the students. This want of discipline caused the faculty in 1518 to consider the advisability of returning to Madrid. Some of the professors left the university because of the reduction of their salaries. In 1623 an effort was once more made to return to Madrid, but the change was not permanent, and even 1851 was not permanent, as they returned to Alocá in 1823. The final and definite removal took place in 1836. The revenues left to the College of San Ildesonzo by Cisneros reached the sum of 14,000 ducats, and in the sixteenth century reached 42,000, or 6,000 less than those of Salamanca. The celebrated grammarian, Antonio de Nebrija, received 3,333 maravedis a month; the professor of medicine, Dr. Tarragona, was paid 53,000 a year, and Demetrio de Creta an equal sum (100 florins). Cisneros enforced very rigid examinations. In the theological course which was divided into ten terms, there were five tests. The first and most dreaded was the Alumneia, which corresponded to that of the Sorbonne of Paris. Those who failed usually went to other universities. To the successful licentiates lettres de ordem were given, the first being designated by an L, and the others by superior or inferior letters, according to their "merit and degree." In 1570 the magnificent building of the university was completed, the twenty-five letters of the motto ET LUTEAM OLIM MARMOREM NUNC being displayed on as many columns. The patronage exercised by the kings over the universities they had founded or protected led to the sending of visitors and reformers. The principal one sent to the University of Alocá was Don García de Medrano. The reforms which were instituted brought to an end the university autonomy which had been cherished and encouraged by the Catholic Church.

Alocántara, Military Order of.—Alocántara, a town on the Tagus (here crossed by a bridge)—canon was the birthplace of the great Cisneros, the founder of Estremadura, a great field of conflict for the Moslems and Christians of Spain in the twelfth century. First taken in 1167 by the King of Leon, Fernando II, Alocántara fell again (1172) into the hands of the fierce Jusssuf, the third of the African Almohades; nor was it recovered until 1214, when it was taken by Alonzo de Leon, the son of Fernando. In order to defend this conquest, on a border exposed to many assaults, the king resorted to military orders. The Middle Ages knew neither standing armies nor garrisons, a deficiency that the military orders supplied, combining as they did military training with monastic stability. Alcántara was first founded (1214) to receive the Knights of Calatrava, who had lately given many proofs of their gallantry in the famous battle of Las Navas de Tolosa against the Almohades (1212). Alonso of Leon wished to found at Alcántara a special branch of this celebrated order for his realm. But the enterprise was a failure, for the cost was too far from their Castilian quarters. They gave up the scheme and transferred the castle, with the permission of the king, to a peculiar Leonese order still in a formative stage, known as "Knights of St. Julian de Pereiró". Their genesis is obscure, but according to a somewhat questionable tradition, St. Julian of Pereiró was a hermit of the country of Salamanca, where by his counsel, some knights built a castle on the river Tagus to oppose the Moslems. They are mentioned in 1176, in a grant of King Fernando of Leon, but without allusion to their military character. They are therefore acknowledged as a military order by a privilege of Celestine III in 1197. Through their compact with the Knights of Calatrava, they accepted the Cistercian rule and costume, a white mantle with the scarlet overcross, and they submitted to the right of inspection and correction from the Master of Calatrava. The union did not last long. The Knights of Alcántara, under their new name, acquired many castles and estates, for the most part at the expense of the Moslems. They amassed great wealth from booty during the war and from pious donations. It was a turning point in their career. However, ambitions and dissensions increased as time went on. The post of grand master became the aim of rival aspirants. They employed against one another swords which had been vowed only to warfare against the infidels. In 1318, the castle of Alcántara presented the lamentable spectacle of the Grand Master, Ruy Vaz, besieged by his own Knights, sustained in this by the Grand Master of Calatrava. This rent in their body showed no less than three grand masters in contention, supported severally by the Knights, by the Cistercians, and by the king. Such instances show sufficiently to what a pass the monastic spirit had come. All that can be said in extenuation of such a scandal is that the military orders lost the chief object of their vocation when the Moors were driven from their last foothold in Spain. Some authors assign as causes of their disintegration the decimation of the cloisters by the Black Death in the fourteenth century, and the laxity which recruited them from the most poorly qualified subjects. Lastly, there was the revolution in warfare, when the growth of modern artillery and infantry overpowered the armed cavalry of feudal times, the orders still holding to their obsolete mode of fighting. The orders, nevertheless, by their wealth and numerous vassals, remained a tremendous power in the kingdom, and before long they were involved deeply in political agitation. During the fatal schism between Peter the Cruel and his brother, Henry the Bastard, which divided half Europe, the Knights of Alcántara were also split into two factions whichwarred upon each other. The kings, on their side, did not fail to take an active part in the election of the grand master, who could bring such valuable support to the royal authority. In 1409, the regent of Castile succeeded in having his son, Sancho, a boy of eight years, made Grand Master of Alcántara. These intrigues went on till 1492, when Pope Alexander VI invested the Castilian Ferdinand, then grand master of Alcántara for life. Adrian VI went farther, in favour of his pupil, Charles V, for in 1522 he bestowed the three masterships of Spain upon the Crown, even permitting their inheritance through the female line. The Knights of Alcántara were released from the vow of celibacy by the Holy See around 1540, and in the last years of the order's existence, the order was reduced to a system of endowments at the disposal of the king, of which he availed himself to reward his nobles. There were no less than thirty-seven "Commanderies", with fifty-three castles or villages. Under the French domination the revenues of the Knights fell into the hands of the crown in 1808, and they were only partly given back in 1814, after the restoration of Ferdinand VII. They disappeared finally during the subsequent Spanish revolutions, and since 1875 the Order of Alcántara is only a personal decoration, conferred by the king for military services. Alcedo, Antonio de, soldier, b. at Quito (Ecuador) 1755, where his father was President of the Royal Audience from 1728 to 1737. He selected the military career, and rose to the rank of Brigadier General in 1792, in the Spanish army. He wrote a dictionary, historical and geographical, of the West Indies, in five volumes, for which the work of Father Giovanni Coletti, S.J., "Il Nuovo Atlas Delle Americhe meridionale" (Venice, 1771) was a substantial basis. The work of Alcedo was translated into English by G. A. Thompson in 1812, and that translation is looked upon by many as an improvement, whereas it in fact teems with errors from which the original is relatively free.

Alchymy (from Arabic al, the, and Greek χύμα or χυμά, which occurs first in an edict of Diocletian), the art of transmuting baser metals into gold and silver. It was the predecessor of the modern science of chemistry, for the first steps in the developments of the modern sciences were based on the work of the old alchemists. Chemistry dates from the latter half of the eighteenth century. About this time the idea was formulated that the formation of an oxide was an additive process; that an oxide was heavier than the original metal, because something was added to it. The discovery of oxygen is often taken as the date of the birth of chemistry. It established the fact that red oxide of mercury is composed of mercury and oxygen. The discovery of the transmutation of elements, the simple conception gave alchemy its definite existence. From old Egyptian times men had studied the chemical properties of bodies without establishing any tangible or tenable theory. The name alchemy has been applied to the work of all early investigators. By their means were determined a vast number of facts, which were only classified and reasonably explained by the new science of chemistry. Many of the alchemists were earnest seekers after truth, and some of the greatest intellects of their time figure among them. Two motives actuated many investigators: the wish of realizing the transmutation of metals, and the search for terrestrial immortality by the discovery of the elixir vitae. The fantastic element apparent in such desires operated to give Alchemy a bad reputation, and it is not always accorded the place in the history of science to which it is entitled. As the belief in the possibility of the transmutation of metals was almost universal, much of the work of the alchemists was directed to the production of gold. Often the work was perfectly honest, but many instances of charlatanism are on record. Dishonest men practised on the greed of rulers. If discovered to be guilty of fraud, punishment was sometimes administered. Henry IV of England exorted the learned men of his kingdom to study alchemy, and pay off the debts of the country by discovering the philosopher's stone. In the sixteenth century practically all rulers patronized alchemists.

Many clerics were alchemists. To Albertus Magnus, a prominent Dominican and Bishop of Ratisbon, is attributed the work "De Alchimiâ" though this is of doubtful authenticity. Several treatises on alchemy are attributed to St. Thomas Aquinas. He investigated theologically the question of whether gold produced by alchemy could be sold as real gold, and decided that it could, if it really possessed the properties of gold (Sum. Theol., II–II, Q. 77, Art. 2). A treatise on the subject is attributed to Pope John XXII, who is also the author of a Bull "Spondent quas non exhibit" (1317) against dishonest alchemists. It cannot be too strongly insisted on that there were many honest alchemists. Chemists have never given up the belief that the transmutation of elements might yet be effected, and recent work in radio-activity goes to prove its possible accomplishment in the case of radium and thorium.

The literature of the subject is extensive. Many of the works of the old writers have been preserved, often unintelligible on account of the terminology. Modern authors have also written treatises on the history of the subject. Berthelot has edited a work "Collection des anciens Alchimistes Grecs avec les Grecs textes". He has written "Les Origines de l'Alchimie" and other works on the same subject. Schieders "Geschichte der Alchimie" (Halle, 1832) is useful. Observations on the subject will be found in treatises on the history of chemistry, such as Liebig's "Familiar Letters", and Thomson's "History of Chemistry", and in the introductory portions of manuals of chemistry.

Alcumb, Saint, Bishop of Hexham; d. 781. Though we know practically nothing of the life of St. Alcumb, or Alcumburnt, it is clear that he was regarded with much veneration at Hexham in Northumberland. The church founded by St. Willfrid at Hexham became an episcopal see, and Alcumb, succeeding Bishop in 767, led a life of remarkable piety until his death, 7 September, 781. He was buried beside St. Aega outside the church. About two centuries and a half later, after the country had been laid waste by the Danes, all memory of his tomb seemed to have perished, but the Saint is said to have appeared in a vision to a man of Hexham bidding him tell Alfred (Alfric) de Northumbry, scribe of Durham, to have his body translated. Alured obeyed and, having discovered and exhume the Saint's remains, stole one of the bones to take back with him to Durham, but it was found that the shrine could not be moved by any strength of man until she was restored. In 1154, the church having again been laid waste by the building and stored, and the bones of the Hexham saints, those of Alcumb among the rest, were gathered into one shrine. The whole, however, was finally pillaged and destroyed by the Scots in a border raid, A. D. 1295.

Alcmus (Ἀλκμός, "brave"), probably a Greekized form of Heb. דֶּשֶׁת, "Eliacim", high-priest, the leader of the hellenizing party in the time of Judas Maccabaeus. By antagonizing the religious and national sentiments of his countrymen, he won favour at court, and though not of high-priestly stock, he was appointed high-priest by Lysias, the regent of Antiochus Epiphanes (162 B.C.); but the opposition of the Maccabean party prevented him from exercising the office. He therefore went to Demetrius Soter, who in the meanwhile had succeeded Eupator, and denounced Judas and his adherents as rebels and disturbers. Demetrius appointed him to the high-priesthood and sent Bacchides with an army to install him. But the perfidious slaughter of sixty prominent Assideans, the cruelties of Bacchides, and the excesses of Alcimus, which alarmed the Maccabean party, and Bacchides had kindly left the country when Alcimus was forced to appeal to the king for help. Demetrius first sent Nicanor with an army, and, after his defeat and death, Bacchides, in fighting against whom Judas died a heroic death at Laïsa (Eleasa), 160 B.C. Alcimus now set work to carry out his hellenizing policy and to persecute those faithful to the law. But that same year he was stricken with paralysis and died in great suffering.

Alcock, John, Bishop of Rochester, Worcester, and Ely, b. at Beverley, 1430; d. at Wisbeach Castle.
1 October, 1500. After studies at the grammar school in Beverley, he went to Cambridge. About 1461, he was presented to the rectory of St Margaret's, London, and to the deanship of St Stephen's, Westminster. In 1471 he was Master of the Rolls, and in 1468 Prebendary of St Paul's, London. In 1470-71 he was Privy Councillor. He was on the commission that treated with James III of Scotland, and his services were enlisted for similar tasks by Richard III and Henry VII. He was tutor to young King Edward V and baptized Prince Arthur. He was an ardent supporter of great works of art and a fine chapel which he had erected for himself in Ely Cathedral. His published writings are: "Sponsa of a Virgin to Christ" (1486); "Hill of Perfection" (1491, 1497, 1501); "Sermons upon the Eighth Chapter of Luke"; "Gallicanus Joannis Alcock eiscopoi Elisensis ad frates suos curatores in Sinodo apud Barnwell" (1498); "Abbey of the Holy Ghost"; "Castle of Labour", translated from the French, (1536). Alcock is also thought to have written a metrical work in English on the Seven Penitential Psalms. Bute says of him that he "made such a proficiency in virtue that no one in England, no less in the reputation for sanctity". He restored many ecclesiastical buildings, and founded Jesus College, Cambridge, on the ruined nunnery of St Radegund. He also endowed Peterhouse. Alcock was a distinguished canonist, but made no provisions for the study of this branch in Jesus College. His life was one marked by devotion to Christian virtues, full of zeal and of a penitential spirit.

Alcoholism.—The term alcoholism is understood to include not only the dangers that may occur in the human organism after the ingestion of any form of alcohol. These changes vary from the merest transient exhilaration of the cerebral functions up to profound unconsciousness, ending in coma and perhaps in death. These variations depend upon the amount of alcohol taken, the form of alcohol used, the rapidity of its administration, and the habituation of the individual to its effects. A vast amount of literature has grown up around the apparently simple question of the amount of alcohol which can be oxidized or burnt up in the body and its energy made available for the needs of the system. The question whether alcohol is a food and a fuel also aroused much discussion and considerable diversity of opinion. The more accurate methods of study in recent days and the careful work now being done in physiological chemistry make it certain that alcohol can be burned in the body, and that the system may derive energy therefrom, as in the oxidation of sugar or fat. But it must be clearly understood that this statement does not carry with it the idea that alcohol is to be recommended for its food value, or that prior to its oxidation it may not exert some physiological action the reverse of beneficial. As a matter of fact, its disadvantages so far outweigh its useful effects as to make it difficult to see how it can be recommended as a beverage, that its use in this way must be emphatically condemned, while the damage that the consumption of alcohol does to the nervous apparatus, to the intellect and will, and to the moral sense furnishes additional reason why abstinance, during health, should be recommended. To appreciate fully the facts upon which this statement is based we must consider what alcohol is, its chemical composition, the forms of alcohol in common use, its physiological action in the human body, and its poisonous effects in excessive, or in long continued doses.

Alcohol is a liquid composed of ninety-one per cent by weight (94 by volume) of ethyl alcohol and of 9 per cent by weight (6 by volume) of water. Its specific gravity is 0.802 at 60° F. It is a transparent, colourless, volatile, and inflammable substance, with a characteristic, rather pungent, taste and odour. Ethyl alcohol is the alcohol of spirits, wine, and the various spirits and cordials. Its effects upon the system are less dangerous than those of other alcohols, such as amyl, methyl, or butyl. During distillation of grain, unless very carefully conducted, considerable amyl alcohol (fusel oil) will pass over with the ethyl, especially if the process be continued too long, and whiskey stored for several years the amyl alcohol becomes changed into various ethers, which impart the flavour to the spirit. Therefore grain-spirit (whiskey) should be at least two years old, and the spirit from fermented grapes (brandy) at least four years old. Wine is made by fermentation without distillation; red wine by fermenting the juice of coloured grapes in the presence of their skins, and white wine by fermenting the unmodified juice of the grape, free from seeds, stems, and stones. Gin is obtained by adding juniper berries to distilled alcohol. Rum, and molasses spirit, by distillation from sugar or molasses, which has undergone alcoholic fermentation. Malt liquors—ale, beer, porter, etc.—are produced by fermentation of malt and hops. Absolutely pure alcohol is rarely found, even in the laboratory of the chemist. Owing to its great affinity for water, it will abstract it even from the air. What is known as "absolute alcohol" is generally obtained by distillation of the vapour in rows of copper pipes, the condensate being allowed to drip into cold water until it forms a syrup. Most of the shops usually contain about 2 per cent of water. In order to estimate the effects of different forms of alcoholic liquors the following comparative strength should be remembered: Brandy, whiskey, rum, gin, cordials, 30 to 50 per cent of absolute alcohol; Spanish and Italian sweet wine, 17 to 17 per cent; hock and claret, 8 to 11 per cent; ale, porter, stout or beer, 4 to 6 per cent; koumiss, 1 to 3 per cent. Champagne contains from 8 to 10 per cent, but the presence of carbonic acid gas makes it more "heady," that is to say, the cerebral stimulation is produced more quickly, and the carbonic acid acts as a sedative to the stomach, making champagne especially serviceable where prompt stimulation is required and the stomach is irritable, as in seasickness or in yellow fever. Besides the open and undisguised alcoholic preparations cited above, there is a host of patent medicines, proprietary foods, and other alcohols, the effects of which have been promulgated as entirely harmless and as containing no alcohol, and recommended for inebriates, for convalescents, and for persons weakened by disease. Analysis of many of these has shown alcohol in quantities ranging from 7 to 47 per cent. The use of these substances is having a tremendous, but unrecognized, influence, physical, economical, and moral, upon society at the present day. Although it is unquestionably true that alcohol may take the place of some fat or carbohydrate in the food, it is an extraordinary food, to be used only under certain conditions when its ease of oxidation may be of greatest benefit to us. As an additional effect it should not be taken except when needed. It has been compared to the furniture of a ship, together with its decks and stanchions, which are undoubtedly fuel substances, yet which no sane captain would use for fuel purposes, except in the direst need. Physiologists have it in their rule of life that it is correct to advise that the continued use of alcohol in moderate doses is harmless. Alcohol, like salt water in a steam boiler, should be used only in emergencies. To understand this, we must consider its physiological action in the human body.

Physiologists now universally believe that the cell is the scene of all vital processes. The essential processes of nutrition are the metabolic changes... which take place within the cells of the body, all other steps of nutrition being either antecedent or subsequent accessories. The antecedent accessories of nutrition are the preparation of the food, its mastication, its deglutition, its digestion, its absorption, its distribution by the circulatory system, and its selection by the individual cells from the capillaries direct or from the tissue plasma. Physiology believes them all to be part of protoplasm; that is, they are selected and made part of the living cell. A food must therefore satisfy the following conditions: First, it must be digestible and absorbable by the organism which it is to nourish; second, it must be assimilable by the living cells of the organism, in order to build up new tissue; third, after assimilation it must be capable of catabolic changes accompanied by oxidation, in order to liberate energy; fourth, the energy must be liberated at such a time and place as to be advantageous and beneficial to the organism. It is not enough to prove that potential chemical energy is changed into kinetic energy. The oxidation must take place at the right time and place, before the energy liberated can be useful in function. All food is tissue-building in its assimilation; all food is energy-yielding in its catabolism. The only points alcohol possesses in common with the foods are two: first, it is oxidized with the food; secondly, it is diminished catabolism — the so-called “sparking” action of alcohol. This “sparking” is accompanied by an accumulation of the carbonaceous materials of the body and an actual deposit of fat. But this condition is brought about by reducing the activity of the cell by the narcotic effect of the alcohol, and is not in any sense to be compared. Alcohol decreases the increased demand for food by the cell, resulting from proper mental and physical exercise and all conditions which favor vigorous nutrition. Yet the advocates of alcohol as a food in health base upon their physiological misconception a superstructure of fallacious reasoning.

A detailed consideration of the effects of alcohol upon the individual organs and tissues will perhaps elucidate the foregoing statements. Applied to the skin, alcohol excites a sense of heat and superficial inflammation if evaporation be prevented. It causes redness and itching. If the surface be protected by evaporation, the skin is protected from the injury. If evaporation is not prevented, the surface temperature is reduced. The lining of the mouth is corrugated by it — a result due to the abstraction of water and condensation of the albumen. In the stomach it causes a sensation of warmth which is diffused over the abdomen and quickly followed by a general glow of the body. In moderate quantity, it induces an increased blood-supply which enables the mucous follicles and gastric glands to produce a more abundant secretion of stomach juices. When habitually taken, a gastric catarrh is established with the production of a fluid abnormal both in quantity and quality. The irritation is increased by temperature, which is increased by the increased blood-supply of the stomach, resulting in its overgrowth, with the crowding out of the working-cells, which gradually shrink. Alcohol also affects directly the chemistry of the gastric secretion by precipitating the pepsin, a necessary ferment to the digestion of albumen. For the same reason, the oxidation must take place at the right time and place. Alcohol is elaborated in great quantity, sets up pathological fermentation in the starchy carbohydrates and fatty elements of the food, giving rise to acidity, heartburn, regurgitation of food, and a peculiar retching in the morning. Alcohol enters the blood with great facility, and probably almost all taken into the stomach passes into the blood from this organ, and goes directly to the liver by way of the portal vein. In the liver, it increases at first the functional activity of the working-cells, and a more abundant production of bile is the result. Frequent stimulation and consequent overaction result in impairment or loss of the proper function of the part, as is the universal law. The liver cells shrinks. The structural framework increases in size at first but subsequently contracts, producing the small, nodular, hard liver, to which the term cirrhosis has been applied. Alcohol diminishes the chemical strength of the liver, leaving less to draw upon when needed by the system during stress. In small doses alcohol increases the action of the heart and the cutaneous circulation; a slight rise of temperature is observed, and all the functions are for the time being more energetically performed. On the nervous system its first effect is to increase the functional activity of the brain; the ideas flow more easily, the senses are more acute, the muscular movements more active. With increased action of the alcohol, the excitement becomes disorderly, the ideas incoherent and rambling, the muscular movements uncontrolled and incoordinated. With an excessive quantity the actions of the cerebrum are suspended, and complete unconsciousness results. By an extension of the poisonous influence to the nervous centres governing respiration and circulation, these functions may cease, and death result. Alcohol has a special affinity for nervous tissue, and acts as a result chiefly upon the nervous contact, but partly from its effects on the blood current, the working cells of the brain shrink, the supporting structure hardens, the cerebrospinal fluid, which should act as a protective water-jacket, increases in quantity and exerts injurious pressure, giving the familiar picture of “ink brain” so common in the autopsy case of habitual drunks. For large numbers of habitual drunkards. Existing in a less degree, these brain changes are objectively shown in the impaired mental power, the muscular trembling, the shambling gait, and the lack of moral sense of the chronic drinker. Delirium tremens is a variety of alcoholism occurring in some subjects from sudden excess of a periodical kind, in others from a failure of the stomach to dispose, not only of food, but of the accustomed stimulus, and in another group — common in hospitals and jails — to sudden deprivation of liquor in steady drinkers when under arrest for crime. It is the most important factor in the causation of delirium tremens, as is also the use of alcoholic beverages rich in fusel oil — like the cheaper whiskies. The long-continued action of alcohol on the nervous system produces many other chronic disorders. Loss of sensation, epilepsy, motor-paralysis, and blindness often result from alcoholic excess. It is probable that if alcohol could be stamped out for a century insanity would shrink in prevalence seventy-five per cent. The best and latest authorities all agree that the action of alcohol upon the nervous system is always that of a narcotic, whether the dose be large or small. On the other hand, there is no evidence that alcohol produces a reduction, after the primary and transient sensation of heat has passed away. All northern explorers know that the use of alcohol endangers life through cooling of the body. It is useful, in the form of hot drink, to revive a person who has been exposed to cold, but only after the body temperature has been increased. Dr. J. C. Dow, in a campaign, found that the fatigue of marching in the tropics is better borne without the aid of a spirit ration. The power of alcohol to diminish muscular work and agility is so well known that athletes rigorously abstain during training, and the records of the prize-ring demonstrate that only the pugilists who has no alliance with the saloon is able to remain in the game. There is no difference of opinion among physiologists regarding the facts of the action of alcohol in the human body. They differ strenuously regarding the conclusions to be drawn from these facts, some contending that alcohol is a "partial food when taken in moderate quantities". Modern knowledge justifies the belief that in health it is never a food in any sense, be the quantity large or small, but always a poisons. In drawing strong or physiologically speaking, disease it is neither a food nor a poison, but may be a suitable and helpful drug. It should be rightly "Albinus, humilia Levita". Some have thought, however, that he became a priest, at least during the latter years. Describing this period, says of him, celebratut omni des missarum solemnis (Jaffé, "Mon. Alcin., Vita," 30).

In one of his last letters Alcin acknowledged the gift of a casula, or chasuble, which he promised to use in missarum solemnis (Ep. 203). It is probable that he was a monk, and a member of the Benedictine Order, although this also has been disputed, some historians maintaining that he was simply a member of the secular clergy, even when he exercised the office of abbot at Tours.

I. EDUCATOR AND SCHOLAR.—Of his work as an educator and scholar it may be said, in a general sense, that he contributed much to the revival of learning which distinguished the age in which he lived, and which made possible the great intellectual renaissance of three centuries later. In him Anglo-Saxon scholarship attained to its widest influence, the rich intellectual inheritance left by Bede at Jarrow being taken up by Alcin at York, and, through his subsequent labours on the Continent, becoming the permanent possession of civilized Europe. The influences surrounding Alcin at York were made up chiefly of elements from two sources, Irish and Continental. From the sixth century onward Irishmen were busy founding schools as well as churches and monasteries all over Europe; and from Iona, according to Bede, Aidan and other Celtic missionaries bore the knowledge of the classics, along with the light of the Christian faith, into Northumbria. Both Alkheim and Bede had Irish teachers. Celtic scholarship was, however, to enter only remotely and indirectly into Alcin's training. The strongly Roman cast which characterized the School of Canterbury, founded by Theodore and Hadrian, who were sent by the Pope to England in 669, was naturally reproduced in the School of Jarrow, and from this, in turn, in the School of York. The influence of his Disciplinae is discernible, not only in the religious order, but in his devoted adhesion to Roman, as distinguished from particular local or national, traditions, as well as, in an intellectual way, in the fact that his knowledge of Greek, which was a favourite study with Irish scholars, appears to have been very slight.

An important feature of Alcin's educational work at York was the care and preservation, as well as the enlargement, of its precious library. Several times he journeyed through Europe for the purpose of copying and collecting books. Numerous pupils, too, gathered around him, from all parts of England and the continent. In his poem "On the Saints of York", written, probably, before he took up his residence in France, he has left us a valuable description of his academic life at York, together with a list of the authors represented by its catalogue of books. The course of studies embraced, in the words of Alcin, "liberal studies and the holy worship, apparently comprising the trivium and the quadrivium, with the study of Scripture and the Fathers for those more advanced. A feature of the school that deserves mention was the organization of studies on the modern plan, the students being separated into classes, according to the subjects and divisions of subjects studied, with a special teacher for each class. But it was when he took charge of the Palace School that the abilities of Alcuin were most conspicuously shown. In spite of the influence of York, learning in England was declining. The country was a prey to dissensions and civil wars, and Alcuin perceived the necessity of making provision for Charlemagne's education. "When his eagerness for the development of learning an opportunity such as even York, with all its pre-eminence and scholastic advantages, could not afford. Nor was he disappointed. Charlemagne counted on education to complete the work of empire-building in which he was engaged, and of which the studies were connected with educational projects. A literary revival, in fact, had already begun. Scholars were drawn from Italy, Germany, and Ireland, and when Alcuin, in 782, transferred his allegiance to Charlemagne, he soon found surrounding him at Aachen, in addition to the youthful members of the nobility he was called upon to instruct, a band of older learners some of whom were ranked among the best scholars of the time. Under his leadership the Palæo School became what Charles had hoped to make it, the centre of knowledge and culture for the whole kingdom, and indeed for the whole of Europe. Charlemagne, himself, his wife Gisela, his three sons, and two daughters became pupils of the school, an example which the rest of the nobility were not slow to imitate. Alcuin's supreme merit as an educator lay, however, not merely in the training up of a generation of educated men and women, but, above all, in inspiring with his own enthusiasm for learning and teaching the talented youths who flocked to him from all sides. His educational writings, comprising the treatises, "On Grammar", "On Orthography", "On Rhetoric and the Virtues", "On Dialectics", the "Disputation with Pepin", and the astronomical treatise entitled "De Cursu et Salutu Lune ac Bissexti", afford an insight into the matter and methods of teaching employed in the Palace School and the schools of the time generally, but they are not remarkable either for originality or literary excellence. They are mostly compilations generally in the form of dictionaries from the works of earlier scholars, and were probably intended to be used as textbooks by his own pupils.

Alcuin, like Bede, was a teacher rather than a thinker, a gatherer and a distributor rather than an originator of knowledge, and in this respect, it is plain to us now, the best of his genius responded perhaps more than his contemporaries of the age, which was the preservation and the re-presentation to the world of the treasures of knowledge inherited from the past, long buried out of sight by the successive tides of barbarian invasion. Dico et doceo (learn in order to teach) was the motto of his life, and the supreme value he attached to the office of teaching is recognizable in his admonition to his disciples that the idle youth would never become a teacher in his old age (Quî non discit in pueritâ, non docet in senectute, Ep. 27). Alcuin was eminently qualified to be the schoolmaster of his age. Although living in the world and occupied much with public business, he maintained a high standard of intellectual integrity and purity of life. He had an unbounded enthusiasm for learning and a tireless zeal for the practical work of the class-room and library, and the young men of talent whom he drew in crowds around him from all parts of Europe went away inspired with something of his own passion for knowledge. His warm-hearted and affectionate disposition made him universally beloved, and the ties that bound master and pupil often ripened into intimate friendship that lasted through life. Many of his letters that have been preserved were written to his former pupils, more than thirty being addressed to his tenderly loved disciple Arno, who became Archbishop of Salzburg. Before he died Alcuin had the satisfaction of seeing the young men whom he had trained, engaged all over Europe in the work of teaching. "Wherever", says Wattenbach, in speaking of the period that followed, "anything of literary activity indeed, there was a chance of finding a pupil of Alcuin's." Many of his pupils came to occupy important positions in Church and State and lent their influence to the cause of learning, as the above-mentioned Arno, Archbishop of Salzburg; Theodulp, Bishop of Orleans; Eanbald, Bishop of Utrecht; and the celebrated Rabanus Maurus, who became Abbot of (New) Corbie, in Saxony; Aldrich, Abbot of Ferrières, and Fridugis, the successor of Alcuin at Tours. Among his pupils also was the celebrated Rabanus Maurus, the intellectual successor of Alcuin, who came to study under him for a time at Tours, and who subsequently, in his school at Fulda, continued the work of Alcuin at Aachen and Tours.

The development of the Palace School, however, important as it was, was only a part of the broad educational plans of Charlemagne. For the diffusion of learning, other educational centres had to be established throughout the kingdom, and in an age when education was so largely under the control of the Church, it was essential that the clergy should be a body of educated men. With this object in view, a series of decrees or capitularies were issued in the name of the Emperor, which enjoined upon all clerics, secular as well as regular, under penalty of suspension and deprivation of office, the ability to read and write and the possession of the knowledge requisite for the intelligent performance of the duties of the clerical state. Reading-schools were to be established for the benefit of candidates for the priesthood, and bishops were required to examine their clerics from time to time to ascertain the degree of their compliance with these educational laws. A scheme for universal elementary education was also projected. A capitular of the year 802 enjoined that "everyone should send his son to study letters, and that the child should remain in school with all diligence until he had been well instructed in learning" (West, 54). Following the decrees of the Council of Vaison, a primary school was to be established in every town and village, to be taught by the priests gratuitously. It is impossible to say precisely to what extent Alcuin deserves credit for the organization of the vast educational system which was thus established; but as a central higher institution, the Palace School, a number of subordinate schools of the liberal arts scattered throughout the country, and schools for the common people in every city and village. His hand is nowhere visible in the series of legislative enactments referred to; but there can be no doubt that he had much to do with the instigation, if not with the framing, of these laws. "The voice", Gaskin aptly says, "is the voice of Charles, but the hand is the hand of Alcuin". It was with Alcuin, too, and his pupils that the responsibility rested for carrying out the legislation. True, the laws were only imperfectly carried into effect; the measures planned and partially put into practice for the enlightenment of the people did not meet with complete success; the movement for the revival and diffusion of learning throughout the Empire did not last. Yet much was accomplished that did endure. The accumulated store of knowledge which had been in danger of perishing, was preserved, and when the greater and more permanent renaissance of learning came, several centuries later, "when the light began again to pierce through the storm-clouds of feudal strife and anarchy, the foundations laid in the eighth century were still there, ready to receive the weight of the higher learning which the scholars of the new revival should build up” (Gaskoin, 209). Alcuin’s poems range from brief, epigrammatic verses, addressed to his friends, or intended as inscriptions for books, churches, altars, etc., to lengthy metrical histories of political events. His verses seldom rise to the level of real poetry, and, like most of the work of the poets of the period, they often fail to conform to the rules for quantity, just as his prose, though simple and vigorous, shows here and there a seeming disregard for the accepted canons of syntax. His principal metrical work, the “Poem on the Saints of the Church at York”, consists of 1657 hexameter lines and is really a history of that Church.

II. Alcuin as a Theologian.—Alcuin’s work as a theologian may be classed as exegetical or biblical, moral, and dogmatic. Here again the characteristic that has been noted in his educational work is conspicuous: it is that of conservation rather than originality. His nine Scriptural commentaries—on Genesis, the Psalms, the Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Hebrew Names, St. John’s Gospel, the Epistles to Titus, Philemon, and the Hebrews, The Sayings of the Apostles—are a collection of sentences taken from the Fathers, the idea, apparently, being to collect into convenient form the observations on the more important Scriptural passages of the best commentators who had preceded him. A more important Biblical undertaking by Alcuin was the revision of the text of the Latin Vulgate. At the beginning of the ninth century, this version had displaced in France, as elsewhere throughout the Western Church, the Old-Itala (Vetus Itala) and other Latin versions of the Bible; but the Vulgate, as it existed, showed many variants from the original of St. Jerome. Uniformity in the sacred text was, in fact, unknown; church and monastery had its own accepted readings, and varying texts were often to be found in the Bibles used in the same house. Other scholars besides Alcuin were engaged in the task of endeavouring to remedy this condition. Theodulphe of Orleans produced a revised text of the Vulgate which has survived to us as “Codex Mainzianus”. That work of Alcuin has not come down to us, the carelessness of copyists and the extensive usage to which it attained having led to numberless, though for the most part unimportant variations from the standard he sought to fix. In his letters he simply mentions that the work was engaged in, by the order of Charles Magne, “in emendatione Vetus Novi Testamenti” (Ep., 136). Four Bibles are shown by the dedicatory poems affixed to them to have been prepared by him, or under his direction, while he was Abbot of Tours, probably during the years 799-801. In the opinion of Berger the “Tours Bibles” all represent in a greater or less degree, notwithstanding their variations in detail, the original Alcuinian text (Hist. de la vulg., 242). Whatever the exact changes made by Alcuin in the Bible text may have been, the known temper of the man, no less than the limits of the scholarship of the age, makes it certain that these changes were of a far-reaching importance. The idea being, however, to reproduce the genuine text of St. Jerome, so far as possible, and to correct the gross blunders which disfigured the Sacred writings, the Biblical work of Alcuin was, from this point of view, important. Of the three brief moral treatises Alcuin left us, two, “De virtutibus et vitius”, and “De anima et spiritu”, are taken from the subject of the writings of St. Augustine on the same subjects, while the third, “On the Confession of Sins”, is a concise exposition of the nature of confession, addressed to the monks of St. Martin of Tours. Closely allied to his moral writings in spirit and purpose are his sketches of the lives of St. Martin of Tours, St. Vedaet, St. Riquier, and St. Willibrord, the last being a biography of considerable length.

It is upon his dogmatic writings that the fame of Alcuin as a theologian principally rests. Against the Adoptionist heresy he stood forth as the foremost champion of the historical and ecclesiastical events. His power of penetration—a quality of mind which some historians appear to deny him altogether—that he so clearly perceived the essentially heretical attitude of Felix and Elipandus towards the Christological question, an attitude whose heterodoxy was shrouded perhaps even from their own eyes in the beginning, by the specious titles of the descent and adoptive sonship; and it was a worthy tribute to the range of his patristic scholarship when Felix, the chief intellectual defender of Adoptionism, after the disputation with Alcuin at Aachen, acknowledged the error of his position. The condemnation of the rising heresy by the Synod of Regensburg (Ratisbon), in 792, having failed to check its spread, another and a larger synod, composed of representatives of the Churches of France, Italy, Britain, and Galicia, was convened at Frankfort by the order of Charles, in 794. Alcuin was present at this meeting and no doubt took an active part in the discussions in the drawing up of the “Epistola Synodica”, although, with characteristic modesty, he furnishes no evidence of the fact in his letters. Following up the work of the Synod, he addressed to Felix, from whom he had formerly entertained a high esteem, a touching letter of admonition and exhortation. After his transfer to Tours, in 796, he received from Felix a reply which showed that something more than friendly entreaty would be needed to stay the progress of the heresy. He had already drawn up a small treatise, consisting mainly of patristic quotations, against the teaching of the heretics, under the title “Liber Alcuini pro Fide Christiana”, and he now undertook a larger and more thorough discussion of the theological questions involved. This work, in seven books, “Libri VII adversus Feliacem”, was a refutation of the position of the Adoptionists, rather than an exposition of Catholic doctrine, and hence followed the lines of their arguments, instead of a strictly logical order. Alcuin urged against the Adoptionists the universal testimony of the Fathers, the inconsistencies involved in the doctrine itself, its logical relation to Nestorianism, and the rationalistic spirit which was forever prompting to just such attempted human explanations. In the spring of 799 a disputation took place between Alcuin and Felix in the royal palace at Aachen, which ended by Felix acknowledging his errors and accepting the teachings of the Church. Felix subsequently paid a friendly visit to Alcuin at Tours. Having sought in vain to bring about the submission of Elipandus, Alcuin drew up another treatise entitled “Adversus Elipandum Libri IV”, entrusting it for circulation to the commissioners whom Charlemagne was sending to Spain. In 802 he sent to the Emperor the last, and perhaps the most important, of his theological treatises, the “Libelli de Sacrae Scripturae interpretate” (fine 151), a work that is considered the kernel of his system, and which, although probably suggested to him during the discussions with the Adoptionists. The treatise contains a brief appendix entitled “De Trinitate ad Frigidumus questiones XXVIII.”. The book is a carefully thought out summary of Catholic doctrine concerning the Holy Trinity, St. Augustine being perhaps the subject of the greatest number of questions. The position the subject is that held by the Franks, which, although affirmed, is uncertain to what extent Alcuin shared in the attitude of remonstrance assumed by the Frankish Church, at the instance of Charlemagne, towards the badly translated and ill understood decrees of the second Council of Nicaea, held in 787. The style of the “Libri Carolini” which condemned, in the name of the King, the decree of the Council, favours the assumption that Alcuin had at least no direct part in the composition of the work.

Luttrell, in his History of the Order of St. Albans, describes how he had justly merited fame as an educator and theologian. Alcuin has the honour of having been the principal agent in the great work of liturgical reform accomplished by the authority of Charlemagne. At the accession of Charles the Gallican rite prevailed in France, but it was so modified by local customs and traditions as to constitute a serious obstacle to the complete ecclesiastical unity. It was the purpose of the King to substitute the Roman rite in place of the Gallican, or at least to bring about such a revision of the latter as to make it substantially one with the Roman. The strong leaning of Alcuin towards the triumph of the Roman form of worship combined with his conservative character and the universal authority of his name, qualified him for the accomplishment of a change which the royal authority in itself was powerless to effect. The first of Alcuin's liturgical works appears to have been a Homily, or collection of sermons in Latin for the use of priests. The Homily which was printed under his name in a fifteenth century MS. was by a different hand, although it is probable, as Dom Morin contends, that a recently discovered MS. of the twelfth century contains the genuine Alcuinian sermons (Revue Bénédictine, 1892). Another liturgical work of Alcuin consists of a collection of Epistles to be read on Sundays and holy-days throughout the year, and bears the name, "Comes ab Albino ex Caroli imp. precepto emendatus". As previous to his time, the portions of Scripture to be read at Mass were often merely indicated on the margins of the Bibles used, the "Comes" commended itself by its convenience, and as he followed Roman usage here also, the result was another advance in the way of conformity to the Roman liturgy. The work of Alcuin which had the greatest and most lasting influence in this direction, however, was the Sacramentary, or Missal which he compiled, using the Gregorian Sacramentary as a basis, and to this adding a supplement of Masses and prayers drawn from Gallican and other liturgical sources. Prescribed as the official Missal for the Frankish Church, Alcuin's Missal soon came to be commonly used throughout Europe and was largely instrumental in bringing about uniformity of use, at least to the limits of the whole Western Church. Other liturgical productions of Alcuin were a collection of votive Masses, drawn up for the monks of Fulda, a treatise called "De psalmorum usu", a breviary for laymen, and a brief explanation of the ceremonies of Baptism.

A complete edition of Alcuin's works, with the exception of some of his Epistles, is to be found in Migne, comprising volumes C-CI of the "Patrologia Latina". The text of the Migne edition was first published by Froben, Abbots of St. Emmeran, at Ratisbon, in 1777, a previous and less complete edition had been published by Duchesne at Paris, in 1617. A critically accurate edition of eight "Epistles" of Alcuin, together with his poem, "On the Saints of the Church at York", his "Life of St. Willibrord", and his "Life of Alcuin", composed about 829, is found in the fourth volume of the "Bibliotheca Rerum Germanicarum", under the title "Alcuini Epistolae et Opera". A Latin edition was published by J. C. Wattenbach, and Duemmler (Berlin, 1873). This edition contains 293 of Alcuin's Epistles, against the 230 in Migne.

Alcundis, Saint, virgin and abbess (c. 639–684), variously written Adalgundis, Aldegunde, etc. She was nearly related to the Merovingian royal family. Her father and mother, afterwards kings of St. Walbert and St. Bertilia, lived in Flanders in the province of Hainault. Alcundis was urged to marry, but she chose a life of virginity and, leaving her home, received the veil from St. Amandus, Bishop of Maastricht. Then she walked dry-shod over the Sambre and Meuse, combined her asceticism with his conservative character and the universal authority of his name, qualified him for the accomplishment of a change which the royal authority in itself was powerless to effect. The first of Alcundis' liturgical works appears to have been a Homily, or collection of sermons in Latin for the use of priests. Aldfrith, a Northumbrian king, son of King Oswin; d. 14 December, 705. He succeeded his brother, Ecgrith. William of Malmesbury says he received his education in Ireland, where he passed his early life, and imbibed there a love of learning and learned men. He was well versed in the Scriptures. His taste for literature is shown by his parting with a large piece of land as payment for a copy of the "Chromographi". Adamnan, Abbot of Iona, on the occasion of his visit to England for the redemption of some captives, presented his book "De Locis Sanctis" to Aldfrith as a testimonial of the King's appreciation of learning, and Aldhelm, Abbot of Malmesbury, dedicated his work on "Metres" to him who had restored Northumbria, which had been nearly ruined by warfare in the preceding reign, to peace and prosperity. He recalled St. Wilfrid to his Bishopric of Hexham, and later on to that of York, but afterwards became hostile to him. An effort at reconciliation, made some years later at the Council of Whitby, was fruitless. The dissension between Aldfrith and Wilfrid was largely due to their respective advocacy of two different schools of learning—the Roman and the Irish—and of administration, one favouring the Roman and the other the Irish party. Just before his death, however, Aldfrith enjoined on his successor the necessity of becoming reconciled with Wilfrid. Little is known of the results of Aldfrith's rule. William of Malmesbury says Northumbria was considerably restricted through victories of the Picts, and Bede dates the deterioration of ecclesiastical administration in the kingdom from Aldfrith's death.

JOHN J. A BECKET.

Aldhelm, Saint, Abbot of Malmesbury and Bishop of Sherborne, Latin poet and ecclesiastical writer (died 25 May AD 796), was the son of Aldhelm, Adelhelmus, Altheimus, and Adelme, a kinsman of Ine, King of Wessex, and apparently received his early education at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, under an Irish Christian teacher named Maidubh. It is curious that Malmesbury, in early documents, is styled both Maidulfusburgh and Ealdhelmbyrig, so that it is disputed whether the present name is commemorative of Maidubh or Ealdhelm, or, by "contamination", possibly of both (Plummer's "Bede", II, 310). Aldhelm himself attributes his progress in letters to the famous Adrian, a native of Roman Africa, but formerly a monk of Monte Cassino, who came to England in the time of Archbishop Theodore and was made Abbot of St. Augustine's, Canterbury. Seeing, however, that Theodore came to England only in 671, Aldhelm must then have been thirty or forty years of age. The Saxon scholar's turgid style and his partiality for Greek and extravagant terms have been traced with some probability to Adrian's influence (Hahn, "Bonifaz und Lul", p. 14). On returning to settle in Malmesbury our Saint, probably already a monk, seems to have succeeded his former teacher Maidubh, both in the direction of the Malmesbury School (as Abbot of the Monastery); but the exact dates given by historians cannot be trusted, since they depend upon charters of very doubtful authenticity. As abbot his life was most austere, and it is particularly rec-orded of him that he was wont to recite the entire Psalter standing up to his neck in ice-cold water. Under his rule the Abbey of Malmesbury prospered, and in 805, near the town of the village of Aldhelm's, he built a chapel (ecclesia), dedicated to St. Lawrence, built by Aldhelm in the village of Bradford-on-Avon, is standing to this day. (A. Freeman, "Academy", 1886, XXX, 154.) During the pontificate of Pope Sergius (897–916), the Saint visited Rome, and is said to have brought back from the Holy Land the privilege of exemption for his monastery. Unfortunately, however, the document which in the twelfth century passed for the Bull of Pope Sergius is undoubtedly spurious. At the request of a synod, held in Wessex in 875, Aldhelm wrote a letter to the Britons of Devon and Cornwall upon the Paschal question, by which, however, few are said to have been brought back to unity. In the year 705 Hedda, Bishop of the West Saxons, died, and, his diocese being divided, the western portion was assigned to Aldhelm, who reluctantly became the first Bishop of Sherborne. His episcopate was short in duration. Some of the stone-work and stained glass of the Abbaye of St. Ouen at Rouen was brought from Aldhelm's. He died at Doubling (Somerset), in 709. His body was conveyed to Malmesbury, a distance of fifty miles, and crosses were erected along the way at each halting place where his remains rested for the night. Many miracles were attributed to the Saint after his death. Aldhelm died on May the 25th, and in 857 King Ethelwulf erected a magnificent silver shrine at Malmesbury in his honour.

"Aldhelm was the first Englishman who cultivated classical learning with any success, and the first of whom any literary remains are preserved" (Stubbe). Both from Ireland and from the Continent, the monks who wrote Latin literature were taught to ask him questions on points of learning. His chief prose work is a treatise, "De laude virginitatis" ("In praise of virginity"), preserved to us in a large number of manuscripts, some as early as the eighth century. This treatise, in imitation of Sedulius, Aldhelm afterwards verified. The metrical version is also still extant, and Ehwald has recently shown that it forms one piece with another poem, "De octo principaliubia vittis" ("On the eight deadly sins"). The prose treatise on virginity was dedicated to the Abbess and nuns of Barking, a monastery he wished to establish at Ealhelh, probably more than one of the Saint's own relatives. Besides the tractate on the Paschal controversy already mentioned, several other letters of Aldhelm are preserved. One of these, addressed to Acerius, i. e. Ealdfrith, King of Northumbria, is a work of importance on the laws of prosody. To illustrate the rules laid down, the writer incorporates in his treatise a large collection of metrical Latin riddles. A few shorter extant poems are interesting, like all Aldhelm's writings, for the light which they throw upon religious thought in England at the close of the seventh century. We are struck by the writer's earnest devotion to the Mother of God, the veneration paid to the saints, and notably to St. Peter, "the key-bearer", by the importance attached to the holy sacrifice of the Mass, and to prayer for the dead, and by the esteem in which he held the monastic profession. Aldhelm's vocabulary is very extravag-ant, and his style artificial and involved. His prose treatise might perhaps appear to more advantage if it were critically edited. An authoritative edition of his works is much needed. To this day, on account of the misinterpretation of two lines which really refer to Our Blessed Lady, his poem on vir-ginity is still printed as if it were dedicated to a cer-tain Abbess, the Saint. Aldhelm also composed poetry in his native tongue, but of this no specimen Aldric, Saint, Bishop of Le Mans in the time of Louis le Débonnaire, b. c. 800; d. at Le Mans, 7 January, 856. As a youth he lived in the court of Charlemagne, at Aix la Chapelle, as well as in that of his son and successor Louis. By both monarchs he was highly esteemed, but when only twenty-one, he withdrew to Mésa and became a priest, only to return to the court by Louis's request, who took him as a guide of his conscience. Nine years after his ordination he was made Bishop of Le Mans, and, besides being conspicuous for the most exalted virtue, was distinguished by his civic spirit in constructing aqueducts, as well as for building churches, restoring monasteries, and encouraging the civil arts. It was these civil arts that followed the death of Louis, his fidelity to Charles the Bald resulted in his expulsion from his see, and he withdrew to Rome. Gregory IV reinstated him. With the Bishop of Paris, Erchenrad, he, as a deputy of the Council of Aix la Chapelle, visited Pepin, who was then King of Aquitaine, and persuaded him to cause all the possessions of the Church which had been seized by those of his party to be restored. We find him during his lifetime taking part in the Councils of Paris and Tours. His episcopate lasted twenty-four years.

Aldrovandi, Ulisse. Italian naturalist, b. at Bologna, 11 Sept., 1522; d. there 10 Nov., 1590. He was educated in Bologna and Padua, where he obtained the degree of doctor of medicine (1553) and was appointed professor of natural history in the University of Bologna. At his instigation, the Senate of that city established a botanical garden of which Aldrovandi was the first director (1568). He was also made inspector of Pharmacies, a position which brought him into conflict with the apothecaries and physicians. He appealed to Pope Gregory XIII and was sustained (1576). In the interest of science, he travelled extensively, spent a fortune, and gathered rich collections in botany and zoology which became, by his legacy, the nucleus of the Bologna Museum. Erichsen says that the "Liad" in an eleventh-century name. In his scientific work he enjoyed the patronage of Popes Gregory XIII, and Sixtus V, and of Cardinal Montalto. He was buried in the church of St. Stephen at Bologna, and his epitaph was written by Cardinal Barberini, afterwards Pope Urban VIII. The published works of Aldrovandi fill fourteen volumes in folio, four of which were published during his lifetime. The rest were published in various editions between 1599 and 1700 at Bologna, Venice, and Frankfort. These, with Aldrovandi's manuscripts, cover the entire field of natural history, making a vast compilation which, in spite of its proximity, won the admiration of later naturalists like Cuvier and Buffon.

Alea, Leonard, a French polemical writer of the early years of the nineteenth century, b. in Paris, date unknown; d. 1812. He came from a family of bankers. He published anonymously in 1801 his first book, "L'antidote de l'athéisme," and the following year a new edition appeared, enlarged to two volumes, with the title "La religion triomphante des attaques de l'impieité," and bearing the name of its author. The book was written to refute Sylvain Maréchal's "Dictionnaire des Athées" then lately published, and was so timely, fair, and to the point that it received a cordial welcome. Maréchal himself acknowledged his adversary's moderation. Cardinal Gerardi expressed his high appreciation of the work, and Portalis, to whom Alea had dedicated the second edition, was delighted with the book, and subsequently tried to get the author to enter the Council of State but without success. Alea's only other work is "Rédactions contre le divorce," which also appeared in 1802.

Alegame, Philippe, a Jesuit historiographer, b. in Brussels, 22 January, 1592; d. in Rome, 6 September, 1652. After finishing his studies he went to Spain, in the service of the Duke of Osuna, whom he accompanied to Sicily. There he entered the Society of Jesus on 7 September, 1584. He studied at Rome, taught philosophy and theology at Gratz, Austria, and for several years travelled through the various countries of Europe as preceptor of the Prince of Egenberg. His last days were spent in Rome, where he became superior of the house of the Jesuits, and secretary to the General of the Society. He is chiefly known for his "Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu," published in 1642. It was a continuation and enlargement of Father Ribadeneyra's Catalogue, which had been brought up to 1608. He wrote also "Héroes et victime caritasis Societatis Jesu," "De Vitæ et Moribus F. Joannis Cardini Lusiani, e Societate Jesu," and "Acta Sanctæ Justæ virg. et mart., ex variis MSS."

Alegre, Francisco Xavier, historian, b. at Vera Cruz, in Mexico, or New Spain, 12 November, 1729; d. at Bologna, 16 August, 1788. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1747, and soon acquired a reputation as a scholar. Unique learning in everything related to the classics. He occupied a chair at the Jesuit college of Habana, and afterwards at Mérida, in Yucatan; recalled to Europe in 1767, he settled at Bologna, where he died of apoplexy. He left quite a number of shorter works, mostly translations of classics. Among them are the "Alexandrianae" (1773, Italy), the "Promptuarii" (at Venice, 1781), and the "Bibliotheca Batraciomachi" in Latin (Mexico, 1789), together with fragments from Horace and a good translation into Spanish of the first three cantos of the "Art poétique" of Boileau. But the work for which he is especially noted is his "History of the Society of Jesus" (in Spanish, 1787), in New Spain, 1841. Although composed at a time when the Order was persecuted in the Spanish colonies, and often with great vigour, the tone of this most valuable work, indispensable for the study of the colonial history of Mexico and of many of its Indian tribes, is dignified and free from attacks upon Spain and the Spaniards.

ALEMANY, JOSEPH SADOC, first Archbishop of San Francisco, California, U. S. A., b. at Vich in Spain, 13 July, 1814; d. at Valencia in Spain, 14 April, 1888; entered at an early age the orders of the Franciscan Missionaries of the Arzobispado; was consecrated Bishop of Monterey in California (at Rome), 30 June, 1850, and was translated to San Francisco July, 1853, to the See of San Francisco as its first archbishop. He resigned in November, 1884, was appointed titular Archbishop of Pescueza, California, having but recently passed from Mexican to American rule and still containing a large Spanish population with Spanish customs and traditions, the appointment of Archbishop Alemany as the first bishop under the changed conditions was a providential measure. Ten years of missionary activity in Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee had enabled him to master the English language, which he spoke and wrote correctly and fluently; familiarized him with the customs and spirit of the Republic; and imbued him with a love for the United States which he carried with him to the grave. His episcopal labours were to begin among a population composed of almost all nationalities. Born in Spain, educated in Rome, and long resident in America, his experience and his command of several languages put him in touch and in sympathy with all the elements of his diocese. His humility and simplicity of manner, though by nature retiring, drew to him the hearts of all classes. Naturally his first thought was to secure a body of priests and nuns as co-labourers in his new field; for this he made partial provision before reaching San Francisco. The Franciscan Missions (whose memory and whose remains in the second century of their existence are still treasured not by California alone, but by the whole country) having been lately confiscated in the name of "secularization," the missionaries driven away and their flocks largely dispersed, it was evident that his work was simply to create all that a new order of things was called for. This order as unique as a bishop ever had to encounter. The discovery of gold in California a few years before his appointment had attracted to it a population from every quarter of the world, most of whom thought little of making it their permanent home. Many, however, brought the old Faith with them and even in the mad rush of all forces they lived. He lived with them to assist generously to a personality such as that of the young bishop. When he began his work, there were but twenty-one adobe mission-churches scattered up and down the State, and not more than a dozen priests in all California. He lived to see the State divided into three dioceses, with a hundred thousand Catholic population, many churches of modern architecture and some of respectable dimensions, a body of devoted clergy, secular and regular, charitable and educational institutions conducted by the teaching orders of both men and women, such as to meet, as far as possible under the circumstances, the wants of society and the demands of religious instruction. He was ever intent as the first object of his work, upon the spiritual welfare of his people, but in the early years of his ministry in California much arduous labour was expended in protecting the church property from "squatters," and in prosecuting the claims of the Ordinaries against the State. Through the State Department of the United States Government he compelled Mexico to respect her self-made agreement with the Church in California to pay at least the interest up to the date of the decision upon the moneys derived from the enforced sale of the Mission property at the time of the "secularization" and which had been turned into the Mexican Treasury. Under his successor, in the year 1902, a final adjudication of the "Pious Fund" in favour of the Church in California was reached by an International Board of Arbitration at The Hague.

The episcopal office which he had accepted only under obedience was, in a human sense, never congenial to Archbishop Alemany; his whole temperament inclined him to be simply a missionary priest; in a large sense, he continued to be such up to the day of his resignation. His characteristic devotion to the rights of the Church, his love of a common mission of the nation and particularly his admiration of the free institutions of the American Union, were manifested by an occurrence on the occasion of a visit made to his native land after many years' absence. Before an infidel spirit had poisoned the minds of many in power, even in Catholic countries, it had been the custom in Spain, as in other Catholic lands, for priests to wear their sacred orders in the streets. This new spirit indeed had driven him from Spain when a student, desiring as he did to become a member of one of the proscribed Orders, and when he returned on the occasion in question it was a novelty to see him in the streets dressed as a Dominican Friar. When his would-be custodian warned him to put off his cassock for outdoor use he produced his passport as an American citizen, stating that in his adopted country, where Catholics were greatly in the minority, he was permitted to wear any sort of coat he preferred, that surely the privilege could not be denied him in Catholic Spain, the land of his birth, and was not denied; at least, for that once. So wedded was he to the Order of St. Dominic that when becoming Bishop of Monterey, and ever after till his death, he wore the white cassock of the Order and in letter and spirit adhered to the Rule of St. Dominic as far as it is possible outside of community life. The exalted office of archbishop did not grow more agreeable to him with years, and with a view of resigning and becoming again a missionary priest he besought Rome to grant him a coadjutor, cum jure successions, long before one was given him. But he was not having his will; however, this was not until he had reached the scriptural age of three score years and ten, lovingly transferred to his successor the burden which he had borne long and faithfully for his Master's sake. Whilst he had ever the greatest consideration for the comfort of others, his own life was one of austerity. No one but himself ever lived among the people which were so connected with the church that he could make his visits to the Blessed sacrament and keep his long vigils at a little lattice window looking in upon the Tabernacle. No one ever saw him manifest anger; he was ever gentle, but firm when due called for this. He lived in sympathy with the feelings of others that he certainly never intentionally or unjustly wounded them. Most thoughtful and courteous in all he did, he journeyed a thousand miles...
to Ogden, Utah, in November, 1883, to meet for the first time, to accompany thence and to welcome to San Francisco his coadjutor and successor, the Most Rev. W. R. Riordan.

Alone, Giulio, Chinese missionary and scholar, b. at Brescia, Italy, in 1582; d. at Fou-Tcheou, China, in August, 1644. He became a member of the Society of Jesus in 1600, and was distinguished for his knowledge of mathematics and theology. He was sent as a missionary to China in 1610, and while waiting at Macao a favourable opportunity to enter the country he published his "Résultat de l'observation sur l'éclipse de lune du 8 Novembre, 1612, faite à Macao" (Mémoires de l'Acad. des Sciences, 1628). After his arrival in China he translated the Gospel in the provinces of Shan-si and Fi-Kien. He published many works in Chinese on a variety of subjects. Among the most important are a controversial treatise on the Catholic Faith, in which are refuted the principal errors of the Chinese; "The True Origin of all Things," and "The Life of God, the Saviour, from the Four Gospels." There is a complete list of Alen's works in Sommervogel.

Aleppo Archdiocese (Armenian Rite), in Syria. The See of Aleppo is situated in the country that stretches from the Orontes to the Euphrates in the northwestern extremity of the Syrian desert. It rises in the middle of an oasis on eight little hills, and is watered by the Kourik. Ancient Egyptian records mention this town. According to an Arab tradition, Abraham lived in it, and distributed the spoil of the tower of Sodom. Lieutenant I. Halleb. Seleucius Nicator (311-280 B.C.) gave it the name of Berosa (Berrhoë) by which it was known in early Christian times. Its present Semitic name dates from the Arab conquest in 630. It belonged to the Seljuks from 1080 to 1117; to the Ortos from 1118 to 1183; conquered by the Crusaders in 1124; to the Ayoubites from 1183 to 1260 (Mongol Invasion); and to the Egyptian Sultans. In 1317 it passed definitively to the Ottoman Turks, except for the Egyptian occupation, 1833-39. To-day it is the chief residence of a vilayet of the same name. In ancient times Aleppo was a commercial city; and until his death the closest and tenderest friendship existed between them. Having acquitted his successor fully with diocesan affairs and transferred to him as a "corporation sole" all diocesan property (according to a law which he had had passed through the California legislature for the protection of church property), the Archbishop resigned in 1884, returned to his native land, and died there. His intense love for the missionary life and his zeal for souls did not end with his resignation; his seventy years unfitted him for active work of that nature, but he returned to Spain with a dream of founding a missionary college to supply priests for the American missions. For this purpose he left behind him in San Francisco the amount of a testimonial given him by the priests and people of the diocese as some little recognition of his long services and the example of his saintly life among them. He stipulated that, should he not use it for that purpose, it should be expended by his successor for religious and charitable purposes in San Francisco. He received generous support from the diocese, but found the proposed missionary college impracticable. So, on his retirement from thirty years of apostolic labours in California, he left as a legacy to the diocese the example of a true apostle, and died as an apostle should, possessing nothing but the merits of his "works which had gone before him.

ALESANDRIA.

Ales and Terralba, Diocese of, made up of 42 communes in the province of Cagliari, Archiepiscopal of Oristano, Italy. The two sees were united by Julius II in 1503. Christianity was possibly introduced into Sardinia by groups of the faithful, who were condemned to work in its mines (Philos., X, 12; Catal. Liber., s. v. "Philite"); cf. Harnack, Die Mission, etc. (Leipzig, 1902, 602). Gregory the Great alludes to the episcopal see of Ales (anciently Uselli), in his letter to Januarius of Cagliari in 591 (Jaffé, 1130). After this nothing is to be found about it until 1147, when the name of Bishop Rello appears in a diploma. The local traditions of Terralba have preserved the memory of a Bishop Mariano, who erected the cathedral about 1144. The diocese contains 42 parishes, 102 priests, 59,530 inhabitants.

Alessandria della Paglia, Diocese of, in Piedmont, Italy, a suffragan of Vercelli. It was made a see in 1175 by Alexander III, by a Brief of 30 Jan. 1176, in which he declares that he selects a bishop without any detriment to the rights of the chapter for the future. It was suppressed in 1213, and united to the diocese of Aequi, 1405; suppressed, 1803, and re-established as independent in 1817. It was vacant from 1854 to 1867. There are 116,000 Catholics; 61 parishes, 143 secular priests, and 188 churches and chapels.

JOHN J. A. BECKET.

Alessi, Galeazzo, a famous Italian architect, b. 1500; d. 1572. He showed an inclination for mathematics and literature at a very early age, and afterwards studied drawing for civil and military architecture, under the direction of Giambattista Caporali, a Perugian architect and painter. At Rome he became a friend of Michelangelo. He completed the fortress of Perugia, begun by Sangallo, built an apartment in it for the governor of the castle, and erected a number of palaces, regarded as the finest in the city. He resided in Genoa a number of years, engaged in the erection of various edifices, the laying-out of streets, and the restoration of the walls of the city. On the Carignano Hill he built the church of the Madonna. He repaired, restored and embellished the cathedral and made designs for its tribune, choir, and cupola. His abilities were most conspicuous in his design for the harbour. He erected there a large edifice, flanked by rustic columns, and adorned the sea-front with a Doric portico, ingeniously defended by balustrades. This fortress-like work protected the city from within and without and had a spacious square for the military in the interior. He also extended the mole more than 600 paces into the sea, and left a number of designs and models which have been at various times executed by the rich nobles of that city. These and similar splendid edifices have obtained for Genoa the title of La Superba (The Proud). Alessi executed many works at Ferrara. At Bologna he erected the great gate of the Palazzo Publico. He finished the palace of the Institute according to the design of Pellegrino Tibaldi, and made plans for the façade of San Petronio. At Milan he built the church of San Vittore, the whimsical auditorium del Cambio, and the façade of San Celso, and greatly distinguished himself by the erection of the present magnificent palace of Torre Nuova. He also designed edifices in Naples and Sicily, France, Germany, and Flanders. The King of Spain sent for him to execute some buildings, which, however, are not known, and after some time permitted him to return to Perugia, laden with riches and honours. He was received by his fellow-citizens with the most flattering expressions of regard, was admitted into the Scuola di Commercio, and was sent to Pope Pius V on a commission involving public interest. On his return to his own country he was requested by Cardinal Odoardo Farnese to submit a design for the façade of the Gesù at Rome, so expensive that it was never executed. For the Duke della Corgna he built the stately palace of Castiglione on the Lake of Perugia, and for the Cardinal, brother of the duke, he erected another on a hill a few miles from the city. In conjunction with Giulio Danti, a Perugian architect, he was employed in the erection of the church of the Madonna degli Angeli, and a palace at Assisi, built by the bishop of Assisi in 1490. Finally, Alessi submitted to the Spanish Court a design for the monastery and church of the Escorial (q. v.) in Spain. It was considered the best among plans submitted in a general competition by all the architects of Europe, and he was requested to execute it, and indeed to remain in Spain until Alessi was learned, agreeable in conversation, and capable of negotiating the most important affairs.

THOMAS H. POOLE.

Alessio (Alessus, Alexentius), Bishop of European Turkey, since 1886 suffragan of Seutari. It is situated on the principal road of the modern country, probably located near the mouth of the Drin, was founded by Dionysius of Syracuse, and was an important and beautiful city in the time of Diodorus Siculus. It is now known as Alist, Lesch, Escherendari, or Mratav. Like all the cities of Albania, it frequently changed its name in the Middle Ages, and at one time it was possessed of it in 1386. It still belonged to them when Skanderbeg died, but shortly afterwards it fell into the hands of the Turks. In 1501 the inhabitants again returned to the Venetian domination, but in the year 1508 Sultan Bajazet obtained the title of the city, after it had been evacuated and deprived of its garrison. To-colonize the straggling hamlet of about 2,000 people, one-third of whom are Catholics. In it, however, the mountaineers hold a weekly bazaar where very large transactions take place. The Archdiocese or citadel is interesting for the well preserved Roman cisterns and medieval arches it still holds. The first known Bishop of Alessio is Valens, who attended the Council of Sardica in 340. It does not figure prominently in ecclesiastical history until the sixth century, when it is mentioned as a see in the correspondence of St. Gregory the Great (590-604). Since the end of the fourteenth century it came under Venetian rule, it has had again a series of Latin bishops.

Alessio had formerly five churches. The cathedral was dedicated to St. Nicholas and once held the mortal remains of the patriot George Castriota, the immortal Skanderbeg, who died in 1467. Local tradition relates that when the Turks took the town they opened his grave and made amulets of his bones, believing that these would confer indomitable bravery on the wearer. Transformed into a mosque, the cathedral was abandoned by the Ottomans after three dervishes had successively committed suicide from one of its towers. Two other churches dedicated to St. George and to St. Sebastian still survive as mosques. The population is mostly Catholic (about 14,000), attended by fifteen secular priests. The present bishop, elected 24 May, 1870, is Monsignor Franci Malczynski, an alumnus of the Propaganda. He resides at Calmeti, a little distance from Alessio. The town is built on the slopes of rocky hills, on the west bank of the Drin, facing the mountain, the two old church and conven of St. Anthony of Padua under the care of the Franciscan friars, a last remnant of the thirty convents they once possessed in Albania. The site is said to have been chosen by the saint himself, and is greatly venerated, especially by the mountaineers of Seutari who make an annual pilgrimage to it on 13 June, and exhibit on that occasion a very striking piety. The Mussulmans themselves respect the church and confide their treasures to the friars whenever they have reason to fear the rapacity of their pashas.

Within the diocesan limits of Alessio is the quasi-episcopal abbey (abbatia nullius) of St. Alexander Orochi or Orochi, the mountain stronghold of the small but brave body of the Catholic Milites of Albania. Since 1888 it enjoys an independent jurisdiction over this faithful and warlike people which in 1894 obtained from the Pope, through the offices of Lavigerie, the title of abbot, and thereby freed itself from the irksome protectorate of Austria. The abbey has jurisdiction over about 18,000 Catholics, with 16 churches, 13 chapels, 11 secular priests, and 2 Franciscans. The present abbot, elected in 1888, is Monsignor Franto Durnen.

Alexander, name of seven men.—(1) Alexander the Great, King of Macedon, 336–323 B.c. He is mentioned in I Mach., i, 1–10; ii, 2. He is also supposed to be spoken of in Dan., ii, 39; vii, 6; viii, 5–7; xi, 3, 4.—(2) Alexander Balas, eleventh King of Syria, 150–145 B.C. His struggle for the throne, his promises to Jonathan, his pro-Jewish policy may be learned from 1 Macc., i, 1–18. He was variously influenced by his father-in-law, Ptolemy Philometor of Egypt, and Syria thus passed into the hands of Demetrius II (I Mach., xi, 1–19).—(3) Alexander, a son of Simon of Cyrene mentioned by St. Mark (xv, 21) who carried the Cross after Jesus.—(4) Alexander, who was a member of the court that tried Peter and John (Acts x, 24). He identified Peter with Ananias, the brother of Philo and friend of Claudius before he ascended the throne.—(5) Alexander, a Jew or a Jewish Christian (Acts, xix, 33, 34), who attempted to defend St. Paul in his Ephesian difficulty; some identify him with the son of Simon of Cyrene mentioned above.—(6) Alexander, an Ephesian Christian who apostatized (I Tim., i, 20), and who together with Hymenaeus was delivered up to Satan by the Apostle.—(7) Alexander, a copper-smith of Ephesus (II Tim., iv, 14, 15), who did much evil to St. Paul; some identify him with the Alexander mentioned under preceding number.

Alexander, name of several bishops in the early Christian period.—Alexander of Antioch, thirty-eighth bishop of that see (413–421), praised by Theodoret (Hist. Eccl., V, 35) “for the holiness and austerity of his life, his contempt of riches, his love of wisdom, and powerful eloquence.” He healed the last remnant of the Meletian schism at Antioch, and obtained at Constantinople the restitution of the name of St. John Chrysostom to the ecclesiastical diplomas (registrars).—Alexander of Apamea, a Syrian bishop at the Council of Ephesus (431), and one of the eight bishops deputed by the party of John of Antioch to the Emperor Theodosius.—Alexander of Basilinon, bishop of Ephesus (456), to whom St. John Chrysostom, to whom he owed his appointment as bishop, after the fall of his patron he retired (c. 410) to his native Ptolemais in Egypt, where he experienced the hatred of Theophilus of Antioch and the private friendship of Synesius (Ep. 61, 67).—Alexander of Byzantium, as Constantinople was then called, bishop of that see, and one of the bishops deputed by St. John Chrysostom to whom he owed his appointment as bishop, after the fall of his patron he retired (c. 410) to his native Ptolemais in Egypt, where he experienced the hatred of Theophilus of Antioch and the private friendship of Synesius (Ep. 61, 67).—Alexander of Hierapolis (Euphrasitanae), an unbending opponent of St. Cyril in the Council of Ephesus (431), and an equally stanch advocate of Nestorianism, even when John of Antioch and most of the Oriental bishops yielded, and a general reconciliation was effected, Alexander stood out against “the abomination of Egypt”. His character is vividly portrayed in the correspondence of his friend and admirer, the historian Theodoret, as that of a grave, holy, patient, beloved by his people, but harsly rebuked along the line of what seemed to him the orthodox faith. After the exhaustion of all measures to overcome his resistance, he was banished by imperial decree to the mines of Phanuthion in Egypt, where he died (Tillemont, Mon. XIV, 45).—Alexander of Jerusalem, the friend of Origen, and his former student at Alexandria under Pantaenus and Clement. He became bishop of a see in Cappadocia (or Cilicia?) early in the third century, entertained for a time his master Clement, and himself suffered imprisonment for the Faith (204–212). On his release, he visited Jerusalem, and was chosen by the people to succeed the elderly occupant of that see. This was the first case of an episcopal translation and coadjutorship, and had to be ratified by the hierarchy of Palestine assembled at Jerusalem (Valesius in Eus., Hist. Eccl., VI, 11; Socrates, Hist. Eccl., VII, 38). The first Christian theological library was founded by him at Jerusalem (Eus., Hist. Eccl., V, 20). He defended Origen against his bishop, Demetrius, when the latter had taken offence at the permission accorded Origen to expound the scriptures publicly in the church of Cæsarea in the presence of bishops, the latter being the only authoritative exponent of the sacred text. Alexander and Theoctistus (Bishop of Cæsarea) wrote a joint letter to Demetrius, in which they pleaded the ecclesiastical usage of other places (Eus., Hist. Eccl., VI, 19). In the end Origen was ordained a priest by two protectors (c. 230). He bears personal testimony at the beginning of his first homily on the Books of Kings, to the amiable character of Alexander. The latter died in prison at Cæsarea (251) during the Decian persecution. Some fragments of his letters are preserved in the sixth book of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius.

Alexander I, Saint, Pope.—St. Ireneus of Lyons, writing in the later quarter of the second century, reckons him as the fifth pope in succession from the Apostles, though he says nothing of his martyrdom. His pontificate is variously dated by critics, e. g. 106–115 (Duchesne) or 109–116 (Lightfoot). In Christian antiquity he was credited with the pontificate of four or five years (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., IV, 1), and there is no reason to doubt that he was on the “catalogue of bishops” drawn up at Rome by Hegesippus (Eusebius, IV, xxxii, 3) before the death of Pope Eleutherius (c. 189). According to a tradition extant in the Roman Church at the end of the fifth century, and recorded in the Liber Pontificalis, he suffered a martyr’s death by decapitation on the Via Nomentana in Rome, 3 May. The same tradition declares him to have been a Roman by birth, and to have ruled the Church in the reign of Trajan (98–117). It likewise attributes to him, but scarcely with accuracy, the insertion in the canon of the liturgy of the Office of St. Pridemartyr, or of a Grace by Pope Alexander I, inserted into the Institution of the Eucharist, such being certainly primitive and original in the Mass. He is also said to have introduced the use of blessing water mixed with salt for the purification of Christian homes from evil influences (constitutum aquam sparsionis cum sale benefici in habitaculis hominum). Dukas (Lib. Pontificalis, xxvii, 27) speaks of the persistence of this early Roman custom by way of a blessing in the Gelasian Sacramentary that recalls very forcibly the actual Asperses prayer at the beginning of Mass. In 855, a semi-subterranean cemetery of the holy martyrs Sts. Alexander, Eutropius, and Theodotus, on the Via Nomentana, was laid out upon the spot where the above-mentioned tradition declares the Pope to have been martyred. According to some archaeologists, this Alexander is identical with the Pope, and this ancient and important tomb marks the actual site of the Pope's martyrdom. Duchesne, however (op. cit., I, xci–ii) denies the identity of the martyr and the pope, while admitting that the confusion of both personages is of ancient date, probably anterior to the beginning of the sixth century, when the Liber Pontificalis was first compiled (Dufourcq, Gesta Martyrum Romaines (Paris, 1900), 210–211). The difficulties raised in recent times by Richard Lippsius (Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1869) and Adolph Harnack (Die Zeit der Ignatius, in the beginning of the antiochent Bischöfe, 1878) concerning the earliest successors of St. Peter are ably discussed and answered by F. S. (Cardinal Francesco Segna) in his "De successione priorum Romanorum Pontificum" (Rome 1897); with moderation and learning by Bishop Lightfoot, in his "Apostolic Fathers": St. Cezareus" (London, 1890) I, 201–345; especially by Duchesne in the introduction to his edition of the "Liber Pontificalis" (Paris, 1886) I, i–xvii and xviii–xliii.

The letters ascribed to Alexander I by Pseudo-Isidore may be seen in P. G., V, 1057 sqq., and in Hinschius, "Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae" (Leipzig, 1850). His remaining works are said to have been transferred to Freising in Bavaria in 834 (Dümmler, Poëte Latini Aev. Carolini, Berlin, 1884, II, 120).

His so-called "Acts" are not genuine, and were compiled at a much later date (Tillemont, Mém. II, 590 sqq.; Dufourcq, op. cit., 210–211).

THOMAS J. SHARAN.

Alexander II, Pope, 1061–73.—As Anselm of Lucca, he had been recognized for a number of years as one of the leaders of the reform party, especially in the Milanese territory, where he was born, at Baggio, of noble parentage. Together with Hildebrand, he had subscribed in Cluny (q.v.) the solemn renunciation of the simony. The first theatre of his activity was Milan, where he was one of the founders of the Pataria, and lent to that great agitation against simony and clerical continency the weight of his eloquence and noble birth. The device of silencing him, contrived by Archbishop Guido and other episcopal rivals, was to transfer him to Germany and to engage him to the court of the Emperor Henry III, had the contrary effect of enabling him to spread the propaganda in Germany. In 1057 the Emperor appointed him to the bishopric of Lucca. With increased prestige, he reappeared twice in Milan as legate of the Pope, in 1057 in company of Hildebrand and in 1059 with St. Peter Damian. Under the able generalship of this saintly triumvirate the reform forces were held well in hand, in preparation for the inevitable conflict. The decree of Nicholas II (1059), by which the right of papal elections was virtually vested in the College of Cardinals, formed the issue to be fought and decided at the next vacancy of the Apostolic Throne. The death of Pope Nicholas two years later found both parties in battle array. The candidate of the Hildebrandists, endorsed by the cardinals, was the Bishop of Lucca; the other side put forward the name of Cadalus, Bishop of Parma, a protecto and example of the prevailing vices of the age. The cardinals met in legal form and elected Anselm, who took the name of Alexander II. Before proceeding to his enthronization, the Sacred College notified the German Court of their action. The Germans were considered to have forfeited the privilege of confirming the election, reserved to their king with state ceremonies in the days of Nicholas I, and they contemptuously dismissed the ambassador of the cardinals without a hearing. Foreseeing a civil war, the cardinals on 30 September completed the election by the ceremony of enthronization. Meanwhile a deputation of the Roman nobles, who were enraged at their elimination as a dominant factor in the papal elections, joined by deputies of the reformed episcopate of Lombardy, had proceeded to the German Court with a request that the Pope should be deposed in order to a new election. The Empress Agnes, as regent for her ten-year-old son, Henry IV, convened an assembly of lay and clerical magnates at Baele; and here, without any legal right, and without the presence of a single cardinal, the Bishop of Parma was deposed Pope, and named the one new to the regency, and the repentant Empress withdrew to a convent. In a new diet, at Augsburg (Oct., 1062), it was decided that Burchard, Bishop of Halberstadt, should proceed to Rome and, after investigating the election of Alexander on the spot, make a report to the assembly. Burchard's report was entirely in favour of Alexander. The latter defended his cause with eloquence and spirit in a council held at Mantua, at Pentecost, 1064 (C. Wil, Bensoe Panegyricus, Marburg, 1856), and was formally recognized as legitimate Pope. His rival was excommunicated, but kept the contest with the Pope until his death in 1072. During the darkest hours of the schism Alexander and his chancellor, Cardinal Hildebrand, never for a moment relaxed their hold upon the reins of government. In striving contrast to his helplessness amidst the Roman factions is his lofty attitude towards the potentates, lay and clerical, of Europe. Under banners blessed by him, Roger advanced to the conquest of Sicily, and William to the conquest of England. His Regesta fill eleven pages of Jaffé (Regesta Rom. Pontif., 2 ed., 4, nos. 4459–4770). He was omnipresent, through his legates, punishing simoniacal bishops and incontinent clerics. He did not spare even his protector, Anna of Cologne, whom he twice summoned to Rome, once in 1068, to do penance, barefoot, for holding relations with the antipope, and again in 1070 to purge himself of the charge of simony. A similar discipline was administered to Sigfried of Mainz, Hermann of Bamberg, and Werner of Cologne, who lay deposed, St. Peter Damian, at the Diet of Frankfurt, in 1069, under threat of excommunication and exclusion from the imperial throne, deterred Henry IV from the project of divorcing his queen, Bertha of Turin, though instigated thereto by several German bishops. His complete triumph was that of compelling Bishop Charles of Constance and Abbot Robert of Reichenau to return to the King the croziers and rings they had obtained through simony. One serious quarrel with Henry was left to be decided by his successor. In 1069 the Pope had rejected as a simonist the subdeacon Godfrey, whom Henry had appointed as a test to fail the Pope in acquiring the see; the Pope confirmed Atto, the choice of the reform party. Upon the king's ordering his appointee to be consecrated, Alexander pulinated an anathema against the royal advisers. The death of the Pope, 21 April, 1073, left Hildebrand, his faithful chancellor, in high difficulties. Alexander deserved well of the English Church by elevating his ancient, teacher, Lanfranc of Bec (q.v.), to the See of Canterbury; and appointing him Primate of England.

Alexander III, Pope, 1159–81 (Orlando Ban-dinelli), born at a distinguished Sienese family, d. 3 August, 1181. At the age of twenty-three he acquired a great reputation as a canonist, which he increased by the publication of his commentary on the "Decretum" of Gratian, popularly known as "Summa Magistri Rolandi" (ed. Thamer, Innsbruck, 1874). Called to Rome by Eugene III in the year 1158, his advice was sought and applied at the Diet of Besançon (1167) that the imperial dignity was a papal beneficium (in the general sense of favour, not feudal sense of fief), he incurred the wrath of the German princes, and would have hung on the spot under the battle-axe of his life-long foe, Otto of Wittelsbach. Had Frederick not intervened (Hergenröther-Kirsch, Kirchengesch., Freiburg, 1904, II, 451). For the purpose of securing a submissive pontiff at the next vacancy, the Emperor despatched into Italy two able emissaries who were to work upon the weaknesses and fears of the cardinals and the Roman people; the archbishop Otto and the count of Cologne, Rainald von Dassel, whose anti-papal attitude was largely owing to the fact that the Holy See refused to confirm his appointment. The fruits of their activity became patent after the death of Pope Adrian IV (1 September, 1159). Of the twenty-two cardinals assembled, 7 September, to elect a successor all but three voted for Orlando. The contention made later, that the empire and the spiritual realm, was crowned in October, at the monastery of Farfa. The Emperor now interposed to settle a disturbance entirely caused by his own agents, and summoned both claimants before a packed assembly at Pavia.
He betrayed his animus by addressing Octavian as Vicar of Orlando, and the true Pope as Cardinal Orlando.
Alex. Pope Alexander refused to submit his clear right to this iniquitous tribunal, which, as was foreseen, declared for the usurper (11 February, 1160). Alexander promptly responded, from the ill-fated Anagni, by solemnly excommunicating the Emperor and releasing his subjects from their oaths of allegiance.
The schism, far more disastrous to Empire than to the Papacy, lasted for seventeen years and ended after the battle of Legnano (1176) with the unconditional surrender of the haughty Barbarossa, in Venice, 1177. (See Frederick I.)
The childlike legend that the Pope placed his foot on the map where the pontificate Emperor has done valiant service to Protestantism, must be largely Luther. [See the dissertation of George Remus, Nuremberg, 1625; Lyons, 1728; and Gosselin, "The Power of the Pope during the Middle Ages" (tr. London, 1833) II, 133.] Alexander's enforced exile (1169–65) in France contributed greatly to enhance the power of the papacy and to the imperial party in distress. It also brought him into direct contact with the most powerful monarch of the West, Henry II of England. The cautious manner in which he defended the rights of the Church during the quar-tem between the two imposters Normans, King Henry and St. Thomas Becket, the more so that the Pope equalled the displeasure of both contestants, and often since denounced as "shifty", was the strategy of an able commander who, by marches and countermarches succeeds in keeping the field against overwhelming odds. It is no disparagement of the Martyr of Canterbury that the Pope equalled with him in firmness and excelled him in the arts of diplomacy. After Becket's murder the Pope succeeded, without actual recourse to ban or interdict, in obtaining from the penitent monarch every right for which the martyr had fought and bled.

To crown and seal the triumph of religion, Alexander convoked a council over the Third Lateran Council (Eleventh Ecumenical), in 1179. Surrounded by over 300 bishops, the much-tried Pon-tiff issued many salutary decrees, notably the ordeal which vested the exclusive right of papal elections in a two-thirds vote of the cardinals.
Throughout all the vicissitudes of his chequered career Alexander remained a canonist. A glance at the Decretals shows that, as an ecclesiastical legislator, he was scarcely second to Innocent III.
Worn out by trials, he died at Civita Castellana.
When we are told that "the Romans" pursuessed his remains with curses and stones, the remembrance of the papal scene at the seal of Pope IX cannot but make us wonder what value to attach to such a demonstration. In the estimation of Rome, Italy, and Christendom, Alexander III's epitaph expresses the truth, when it calls him "the Light of the Clergy, the Ornament of the Church, the Father of his City and of the World".
He was friendly to the new academic movement that led to the establishment of the great medieval universities (Rashdall, The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, Oxford, 1895, I, 283, 292; II, 138, 724). His own reputation as a teacher and a canonist has been greatly enhanced through the discovery by Father Denifle in the public library of Nuremberg of the "Sententiae Rolandi Bononiensis", edited (Fre-burg, 1891) by Father Ambrosius Gietl. The collection of his letters (Jaffé, Regesta R.R. Pontif., Nos.
10,584–14,424) was enriched by Löwenfeld's publications of many hitherto unknown (Epistoles Pontif.
Rom. ineditae, Leipzig, 1885). Even Voltaire regards him modestly as the liberator of the human race, for abolishing slavery, for overcoming the violence of the Emperor Barbarossa, for compelling Henry II of England to ask pardon for the murder of Thomas Becket, for restoring to men their rights, and giving splendour to many cities (Œuvres, Paris, 1817, X, 98).

Alexander IV, Pope, 1254–61 (Rinaldo Conti), of the house of Segni, which had already given two illustrious sons to the Papacy, Innocent III and Gregory IX, date of birth uncertain; d. 25 May, 1261, at Viterbo. He was created Cardinal-Deacon, in 1227, by his uncle Gregory IX, and four years later Cardinal-chancellor, at the request of Otho the deacon, his solicitude for the Franciscan Order, which he had so well befriended. On the death of Innocent IV, at Naples, 7 December, 1254, the aged Cardinal was unanimously chosen to succeed him. We may well believe his protestation that he yielded very reluctantly to the popular clamour, for the famous Matthew of Paris has depicted him as "kind and religious, assiduous in prayer and strict in abstinence, but easily led away by the whispering of flatterers, and inclined to listen to the wicked suggestions of avaricious persons. The "flatterers" and "avaricious persons" referred to were those who induced the new Pontiff to continue Innocent's policy of a war of extermination against the popes of Frederick II, now reduced to the infant Conrado in Germany and the formidable Manfred in Apulia. Many an historian at the present day agrees with the shrewd chronicler, that it would have been far more statesmanlike and might have averted the disasters that were in destiny for the Church, the Empire, and Italy, had Alexander firmly espoused the cause of Conrado. Detested by the preceding of the infant Frederick, the "viper" that the Roman Church had nourished to become its destroyer, and persuaded that iniquity was hereditary in the whole brood of the Hohenstaufens, he continued Innocent's dubious policy of calling in Englishmen to subdue and destroy the German Lucifer. On 25 March, 1255, he fulfilled an excommunication against Manfred and a few days afterwards concluded a treaty with the envoys of Henry III of England by which he made over the vassal kingdom of the Two Sicilies to Edward of Lancaster, Henry's son, in exchange for the German crown which followed on the death of William of Holland (1256) the Pope supported the claims of Richard of Cornwall against Alfonso of Castile. The pecuniary assistance which these measures brought him was dearly bought by the embitterment of the English clergy and people against the exactions of the Roman See. Manfred's power grew from day to day. In August, 1258, in consequence of a rumour spread by himself, that Conrado had died in Germany, the usurper was crowned king in Palermo, and became the acknowledged head of the Gibelline party in Italy. Alexander lived to see the victor of Montaperti (1260) supreme ruler of Central as well as Southern Italy. In the north of Italy he was more successful, for his crusaders finally crushed the odious tyrant Exzello. In Rome, which was under the rule of hostile magnates and in alliance with Manfred, the papal authority was all but forgotten. Meanwhile the Pope was making futile efforts to unite the powers of the Christian world against the threatening invasion of the Tartars. The crusading spirit had departed. The unity of Christendom was a thing of the past. Whether the result would have been different had a great statesman occupied the Papal Chair during these seven critical years, we can only surmise. Alexander IV ruled the spiritual affairs of the Church with dignity and prudence. As Pope, he continued to show great favour to the children of St. Francis. One of his first official acts was to canonize St. Clare. In a diploma he asserted the truth of the impression of the stigmata. St. Bonaventure informs us that the Pope confirmed in a sermon that he had seen them. In the violent controversies excited at the University of Paris by William of St. Amour, Alexander IV took the friars under his protection. He died, deeply afflicted by the sense of his powerlessness to stem the evils of the age.

Alexander V, Pope (Pietro Philarchii), b. c. 1339, on the island of Crete (Candia), whence his appellation, Peter of Candia; elected 26 June, 1409; d. at Bologna, 3 May, 1410. A homeless beggar-boy in a Cretan city, knowing neither parents nor relations, he became the protegé of a discerner Capuchin friar, from whom he received an elementary education, and under whose guidance he became a Franciscan in a Cretan monastery. The youth gave promise of extraordinary ability, and was sent to enjoy the superior educational advantages of Italy. He studied later at Oxford and finally at Paris, where he distinguished himself as professor, preacher; and writer. He is the author of a good commentary on the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard. During his stay at Paris the Great Schism (1378–1417) rent the Church, and Philarchi was ranged among the partisans of Urban VI (1378–89). Returning to Italy, he found a place in the court of Giovanni Galeazzo Visconti, Duke of Milan, where he acted as a tutor to his sons and ambassador on important missions. Through the favour of the Visconti he was made successively Bishop of Piacenza, in 1386; of Vicenza, in 1387; of Navoya, in 1389; and finally Archbishop of Milan, in 1402. In 1405 Pope Innocent VII made him Cardinal, and turned his ability to advantage with the Viscontii and Lombardy by confirming him as papal legate to Lombardy. Henceforth his history becomes a part of that of the Schism. The Cardinal of Milan was foremost among the advocates of a council. To this end he approved of the withdrawal of the cardinals of Gregory XII from their obedience, sanctioned the agreement of the rival colleges of cardinals to join in a common effort for unity, and negotiated with Henry IV of England and the Archbishop of Canterbury to secure England's neutrality. He thus incurred the displeasure of Gregory XII, who deprived him of the archiepiscopate of Milan, and even declared him to be aborn of the cardinalitial dignity. At the Council of Pisa (25 March, 1409) Cardinal Philarchi was the leading spirit. He preached the opening sermon, a scathing condemnation of the tenacity of the rival popes, and presided at the deliberations of the theologians who declared these popes heretics and schismatics.

On 26 June, 1409, he was the unanimous choice of the cardinals to fill the presumbably vacant Papal Chair. His stainless character, vast erudition, world-wide experience, and tried administrative ability, together with the fact that he had neither country nor relations in the riven Catholic world to favour, gave promise of glory to the Papacy and peace to the Church. Alexander V soon found all nations in sympathy with him, and Spain and Scotland and some Italian cities whose interests were bound up in the legitimacy of the stubborn Benedict XIII. He was deposed, however, to rule but ten months. His pontificate was marked by unsuccessful efforts to reach Rome, then in control of King Ladislas of Naples, whom Alexander deprired of his kingdom in favour of Louis II of Anjou. Detained by Cardinal Cossa in Bologna, the stronghold of that self-seeking adviser, he died there under circumstances which led the enemies of Ferras, his erstwhile Alexander V as John XXXIII, to bring before the Council of Constance the now discredited charge that he had poisoned the Pisan pope. Alexander lived long enough to disappoint the hopes his election inspired. His legitimacy was soon questioned, and the world was chargéd of two popes when it now had three. His ardour for reform diminished. Generous to a fault, he scattered favours with indiscriminate munificence. The mendicant orders were unduly favoured by being confirmed in privileges which parish priests and the theological faculties resented as encroaching on their rights. Whether or not Alexander was a true pope is a question which canonists and historians of the Schism still discuss. The Church has not pronounced a definite opinion, nor is it at all likely that she will. The Roman "Gerarchia Cattolica", not an authoritative work, which prior to 1906 contained a chronological list of the popes, designated Alexander V as the 211th pope, succeeding Gregory XIII, resigned. (See PAPACY.) His remains are interred in the church of St. Francis at Bologna in a tomb magnificently restored in 1889 under the direction of Leo XIII. (See SCHISM, WESTERN; PISA, COUNCIL OF.)

Son of Juan de la Cueva and Isabella Borgia, sister of Cardinal Alfonso Borja, later Pope Callixtus III. The young Rodrigo had not yet definitely chosen his profession when the elevation of his uncle to the papacy (1455) opened up new prospects to his ambition. He was adopted into the immediate family of Callixtus and was known henceforward to the Italians as Rodrigo Borgia. Like so many other political careerists, he was obtruded upon the Church, the question of a clerical vocation being left completely out of consideration. Alexander ordered investigations to be made, every culprit discovered to be hanged on the spot, and his house to be razed to the ground. He divided the city into four districts, placing over each a magistrate with plenary powers for the maintenance of order; in addition, he reserved the Tuesday of each week as a day on which any man or woman could lay his or her grievance before himself personally; “and,” says the dix- hrist, “the king dispensed justice in an ample manner.” This vigorous method of administering justice soon changed the face of the city, and was ascribed by the grateful populace to “the interposition of God.”

Alexander next turned his attention to the defence and embellishment of the Eternal City. He established the Palazzo della Cancelleria of which he was the chiefress capable of sustaining a siege. By the fortification of Torre di Nona, he secured the city from naval attacks. He deserves to be called the founder of the Leone City, which he transformed into the most fashionable quarter of Rome. His magnificent Via Alessandrino, now called Borgo Nuovo, remains to the present day the grand approach to St. Peter’s. Under his direction, Pinturicchio adorned the Appartimento Borgia in the Vatican, pointing the way to his immortal disciple, Raphael. In addition to the structures erected by himself, his memory is associated with the many others built by monarques and other patronages. As a lover of beauty, Vittoria della Branca designed for Ferdinand and Isabella that exquisite architectural gem, the Tempietto, on the traditional site of St. Peter’s martyrdom. If not Branca, some other great architect, equally attracted to Rome by the report of the Pope’s liberality, built for Cardinal Bariatino the magnificent palace of the Cancelleria. In 1500, the ambassador of Emperor Maximilian laid the cornerstone of the handsome national church of the Germans, Santa Maria dell’ Anima. Not to be outdone, the French Cardinal Bricçonnet erected SS. Trinità dei Monti, and the Spanish Santa Maria di Monserrato. To Alexander we owe the beautiful ceiling of Santa Maria Maggiore, in the decoration of which tradition says he employed the first gold brought from America by Columbus.

Although he laid no great claim to learning, he fostered literature and science. As cardinal he had written two treatises on canonical subjects and a de- fense of the Marian faith. He was a graduate of the University and made generous provision for the support of the professors. He surrounded himself with learned men and had a special predilection for jurists. His fondness for theatrical performances encouraged the development of the drama. He loved pontifical ceremonies, to which his majestic figure lent grace and dignity. He listened to good sermons with a critical ear, and admired fine music. In 1497, Alexander decreed that the “Prefectus Sacrarui Pontificii,” commonly called “Sacristan of the Pope,” but virtually parish-priest of the Vatican and keeper of the Pope’s conscience, should be permanently and exclusively chosen from within the Order, an arrangement that still endures. Alexander earned the enmity of Spain, the obloquy of many narrow-minded contemporaries, and the gratitude of posterity, by his tolerant policy towards the Jews, whom he could not be coerced into banishing or molesting. The Jubilee course of pilgrims to Rome in the Jubilee year, 1500, was a significant demonstration of the depth and universality of the popular faith. The capacity of the city to house and feed so many thousands of visitors from all parts of Europe was taxed to the utmost, but Alexander spared no expense or pains to provide for the security and comfort of his guests. The peace amongst Christendom, a coalition of the European Powers against the Turks, was the policy he had inherited from his uncle. One of the first of his public acts was to prevent a collision between Spain and Portugal over their newly-discovered territories, by drawing his line of demarcation, an act of truly peaceful import, and not of usurpation and ambition [Civiltà Cattolica (1865), I, 665-680]. He did his best to dissuade Charles VIII of France from his projected invasion of Italy; if he was unsuccessful, the blame is in no slight degree due to the unprofitable course of that same Giuliano della Rovere who later, as Julius II, made futile efforts to expel the “scabrous papists” who had been allowed to remain. Alexander issued a wise decree concerning the censorship of books, and sent the first missionaries to the New World.

Notwithstanding these and similar actions, which might seem to entitle him to no mean place in the annals of Alexander of the pious and the benevolent, the manner of life that had disgraced his cardinalate (Pastor, op. cit., III, 449-452). A stern Nemesis pursued him till death in the shape of a strong parental affection for his children. The report of the Ferrarese ambassador, that the new Pope had resolved to keep them at a distance from Rome, is quite credible, for all his earlier measures for their advancement pointed towards Spain. While still a cardinal, he had married one daughter, Girolama, to a Spanish nobleman. He had bought for a son, Pedro Luis, from the Spanish monarch the Duchy of Gandia, and when Pedro died soon after he procured it for Juan, his elder brother, surviving his royal father. Alexander had married his son, Pedro, to a cousin of the King of Spain, and became grandfather to St. Francis Borgia, whose virtues went a great way towards atoning for the vices of his kin. The fond father made a great mistake when he selected his boy Caesar as the ecclesiastical representative of the Borgias. In 1488, Pope Innocent VIII made the child eligible for Orders by absolvin him from the ecclesiastical irregularity that followed his birth de episcoe cardinali et conjugato, and conferred several Spanish benefices on him, the last being the Bishopric of Pampeluna, in the neighbourhood of which, by a strange fatality, he eventually met his death. A week after Alexander’s coronation he appointed Caesar, now eighteen years old, to the Archbishopric of Valencia; but Caesar neither went to Spain nor ever took Orders. The youngest son, Iofre, was also to be afflicted upon the Church of Spain. A further evidence that the Pope had deter- mined to keep his children at a distance is that his daughter Lucrezia was betrothed to a Spanish gentleman; the marriage, however, never took place. It had already become the settled policy of the popes to have a personal representative in the Sacred College, and so Alexander chose for this confidential position Cardinal Giovanni Borgia, his sister’s son. The subsequent abandonment of his good resolutions concerning his children may safely be ascribed to the evil counsels of Ascanio Sforza, whom Borgia had rewarded with the vice-chancellorship, and who was virtually his prime minister. The main purpose of Ascanio’s residence at the papal court was the advancement of the interests of his brother, Lodovico il Moro, who had been regent of Milan for so many years, during the minority of their nephew Gian Galeazzo, that he now refused to surrender the reins of government, though the rightful duke had attained his majority. Gian Galeazzo was powerless to assert his rights; but his more energetic wife was grand- daughter to King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, and had preserved her family afte side left Lodovico in constant dread of Neapolitan invasion. Alexander had many real grievances against Ferrante, the latest of which was the financial aid the King had given to the Pope’s vassal, Virginio Orsini, in the purchase of Cerreti and Anguillara, without Alexander’s con- sent. In addition to the taxation and authority involved in the transaction, this accession of strength to a baronial family already too powerful could not but be highly displeasing. Alexander was, therefore, easily induced to enter a defensive alliance with Milan and Venice; the league was solemnly proclaimed, 25 April, 1493. It was cemented by the first of Lucrezia’s marriages. In future, all assaults on the duchy of Argon, Giovanni Sforza, Lord of Pessaro. The wedding was celebrated in the Vatican in the presence of the Pope, ten Cardinals, and the chief nobles of Rome with their ladies; the revelries of the occasion, even when exaggerations and rumours are dismissed, remain a blot upon the character of Alexander, who, in his delight, thought of nothing but the mediation of Spain, he came to terms with the Pope and, as a pledge of reconciliation, gave his granddaughter, Sancia, in marriage to Alexander’s youngest son Jofre, with the principality of Squillace as dower. Cesar Borgia was created Cardinal, 20 September. Ferrante’s reconciliation with the Pope came none too soon.

A few days after peace had been concluded, an envoy of King Charles VIII arrived in Rome to demand the investiture of Naples for his master. Alexander returned a positive refusal; and when Ferrante died, January, 1494, neglecting French protests and threats, he excommunicated his successor, Alfonso II, and sent his nephew, Cardinal Giovanni Borgia, to Naples to crown him. The policy of Alexander was dictated not only by a laudable desire to maintain the peace of Italy, but also because he was aware that a strong faction of his cardinals, with the resolute della Rovere at their head, was pressing the invisistence of the Church. Charles crossed means towards depopulating on the twofold charge of simony and immorality. In September, 1494, the French crossed the Alps; on the last day of that year they made their entry into Rome, needing no other weapon in their march through the peninsula, as Alexander wittily remarked (Commines, vii, 15), than the chalk with which they marked out the lodgings of the troops. The barons of the Pope deserted him one after the other. Colonna and Sa-velli were traitors from the beginning, but he felt most keenly the defection of Virginia Orsini, the commander of his army. Many a saintlier pope than Alexander VI would have made the fatal mistake of yielding to brute force and surrendering unconditionally to the conqueror of Italy; the most heroic of the popes could not have sustained the stability of the Holy See at this crucial moment with greater firmness. From the crumbling ramparts of St. Angelo, the defence of which were still incomplete, he looked calmly into the mouth of that carnage which, without the papal hat, he faced the cabal of della Rovere’s cardinals, clamorous for his deposition. At the end of a fortnight it was Charles who capitulated. He acknowledged Alexander as true Pope, greatly to the disgust of della Rovere, and “did his filial obedience”, says Com-mines, “with all imaginable humility”; but he could not extort from the Pontiff an acknowledgment of his claims to Naples. Charles entered Naples, 22 Feb-uary, 1495, without striking a blow. At his approach the unpopular Alfonso abdicated in favour of his son Ferrantino; the latter, failing to receive support, retired to seek the protection of Spain. Whilst Charles wasted of Argon, months in fruitless attempts to induce the Pope by promises and threats to sanction his usurpation, a powerful league, consisting of Venice, Milan, the Empire, Spain, and the Holy See, was formed against him. Finally, on 12 May, he crowned himself, but in the following July he was cutting his way home through the ranks of the allied Italians. By the end of the year, the French had conquered France. No one wished for their return, except the restless della Rovere, and the adherents of Savonarola. The story of the Florentine friar will be related elsewhere; here it suffices to note that Alexander’s treatment of him was marked by extreme patience and forbearance.

The French invasion was the turning point in the political career of Alexander VI. It had taught him that if he would be safe in Rome and be really master in the States of the Church, he must curb the inaccept of Papal power, which he had been too long the hour of danger. Unfortunately, this laudable purpose became more and more identified in his mind with schemes for the aggrandizement of his family. There was no place in his programme for a reform of abuses. Quite the contrary; in order to obtain money for his military operations he disposed of civil and spiritual privileges, often of the most important manner. He resolved to begin with the Orsini, whose treason at the most critical moment had reduced him to desperate straits. The time seemed opportune; for Virgilio, the head of the house, was a prisoner in the hands of Ferrantino. As commander of his army, he selected his son-in-law Juan, Duke of Gandia. The struggle dragged on for months. The minor castles of the Orsini surrendered; but Bracciano, their main fortress, resisted all the efforts of the pontifical troops. They were finally obliged to raise the siege, and on 25 January, 1497, they were completely routed at Soriano. Both sides were now disengaged; payment of peace was due, and the former Orsini received back all their castles except Cervetri and Anguillara, which had been the original cause of their quarrel with the Pope. In order to reduce the strong fortress of Ostia, held by French troops for Cardinal della Rovere, Alexander wisely yielded the aid of O’Connor and his Spanish veterans. It surrendered to the “Great Captain” within two weeks. Unsuccessful in obtaining for his family the possessions of the Orsini, the Pope now demanded the consent of his cardinals to the erection of Benevento, Terracina, and Pontecorvo into a duchy for the Duke of Gandia. Cardinal Piccolomini was the only member of the Curia to detest against this improper alienation of the property of the Church. A more powerful protest than that of the Cardinal of Sienna reverberated through the world a week later, when, on the sixteenth of June, the body of the young Duke was fished out of the Tiber, with the throat cut and many gaping wounds. Historians have laboured in vain to discover who perpetrated the foul deed; but that it was a warning from Heaven to repent, no one felt more keenly than the Pope himself. In the first wild paroxysm of grief he spoke of resigning the tiara. Then, after three days and nights passed without food or sleep, he appeared in public with a decided determination to set about that reform of the Church “in head and members” for which the world had so long been clamouring. A commission of cardinals and canonists began industriously to frame ordinances which foreshadowed the disciplinary decrees of Trent. But they were never promulgated. Time gradually dispersed the sorrow and extinguished the contumacy of Alexander. From now on Cesar’s iron will was supreme law. That he aimed high from the start is evident from his resolve, opposed at first by the Pope, to resign his cardinalate and other ecclesiastical digni-ties, and to become a secular prince. The condition of Naples was alluring; the papal pronunciamento was accepted with the assurance that the heirless Duke had died childless and was succeeded by his uncle Fed-erigo, whose coronation was one of Cesar’s last, possibly also one of his first, ecclesiastical acts. By securing the hand of Federigo’s daughter, Carlotta, Princess of Tarento, he would become one of the most powerful barons of the kingdom, with ulterior prospects of wearing the tiara. The cardinal of Savonarola, however, could not be overborne. But in the course of the suit, another marriage was concluded which gave much scandal. Lucrezia’s marriage with Sforza was declared null on the ground of the latter’s impotence, and she was given as wife to Alfonso of Bisaglia, an illegitimate son of Alfonso II.

Meanwhile, affairs in France took the unexpected turn which deeply modified the course of Italian history and the career of the Borgias. Charles VIII died in April, 1498, preceded to the tomb by his only son, and left the throne to his cousin, the Duke of Orléans, King Louis XII, who stood now in need of two papal favours. In his youth he had been coerced into marrying Jane de Valois, the saintly but deformed daughter of Louis XI. Moreover, in order to retain Brittany, it was essential that he should marry his deceased cousin's widow, Queen Anne. No blame attaches to Alexander forissuing the desired decree annulling the King's marriage or for granting him a dispensation from the impediment of affinity. The commission of investigation appointed by him established the two fundamental facts that the marriage with Jane was invalid, from lack of consent, and that it never had been consummated. It was the political use made by the Borgias of their opportunity, and the prospective alliance of France and the Holy See, which now drove several of the Powers of Europe to the verge of schism. Threats of a council and of deposition had no terrors for Alexander, whose control of the Sacred College was absolute. Della Rovere was now his agent in France; Ascanio Sforza was soon to retire permanently from Rome. Louis had inherited from his grandmother, Valentina Visconti, strong claims to the Duchy of Milan, usurped by the Sforzas, and made no secret of his intention to enforce them. Alexander cannot be held responsible for the second "barbarian" invasion of Italy, but he was quick to take advantage of it for the consolidation of his temporal power and the aggrandizement of his family. On 1 October, 1499, Caesar, no longer a cardinal, but designated Duke of Valentinois and Prince of Piacenza, set out from Rome to bring the papal dispensation to King Louis, a cardinal's hat to his minister D'Amboise, and to find for himself a wife of high degree. He still longed for the hand of Carlotta, who resided in France, but since that princess persisted in her refusal, he received instead the hand of a niece of King Louis, the sister of the King of Navarre, Charlotte d'Albret. On 8 October, 1499, King Louis, accompanied by Duke Caesar and Cardinal della Rovere made his triumphant entry into Milan. It was the signal to begin operations against the petty tyrants who were devastating the States of the Church. Alexander would have merited great credit for this much-needed work, had he not spoiled it by substituting his own family in their place. What his ultimate intentions were we cannot fathom. However, the tyrants who were expelled never returned, whilst the Borgian dynasty came to a speedy end in the pontificate of Julius II. In the meantime Caesar had to conduct a campaign so successfully that by the year 1501 he was master of all the usurped papal territory and was made Duke of Romagna by the Pope, whose affection for the brilliant young general was manifested in still other ways. During the war, however, and in the midst of the Jubilee of 1500 there occurred another domestic murder. On 15 July of that year the Duke of Biseglia, Lucretia's husband, was attacked by five masked assassins, who grievously wounded him. Convinced that Caesar was the instigator of the deed, he made an unsuccessful attempt, on his recovery, to kill his supposed enemy, and was instantly dispatched. Caesar's body was completed, in April, 1501, the conquest of the Romagna, now aspired to the conquest of Tuscany; but he was soon recalled to Rome to take part in a different enterprise. On 27 June of that year the Pope deposed his chief vassal, Federigo of Naples, on the plea of an immoral alliance with the Turks; he received instead the hand of Christendom, and approved the secret Treaty of Granada, by the terms of which the Kingdom of Naples was partitioned between Spain and France. Alexander's motive in thus reversing his former policy with respect to foreign interference was patent. The Colonna, the Savelli, the Gaetani and other barons of the Patrimony had always been supported in their opposition to the popes by the favour of the Aragonese dynasty, deprived of which they felt themselves powerless. Excommunicated by the Pontiff as rebels, they offered to surrender the keys of their castles to the Sacred College, but Alexander demanded the keys for himself. The popes, who knew that their turn would come next, were so shortsighted as to assist the Pope in the ruin of their hereditary foes. One after another, the castles were surrendered. On 27 July, Alexander left Rome to survey his conquest; at the same time he left the widowed Lucretia in the Vatican with authority to open his correspondence and conduct the routine business of the Holy See. He also erected the confiscated possessions of the aforesaid families into two duchies, bestowing one on Rodrigo, the infant son of Lucretia, the other on Juan Borgia, born to him a short while after the murder of Gandia, and to whom was given the latter's baptismal name (Pastor, op. cit., III, 449). Lucretia, now in her twenty-third year, did not long remain a widow; her father destined her to be the bride of another Alfonso, son and heir of Duke Ercole of Ferrara. Although both father and son at first spurred the notion of a matrimonial alliance between the houses of Ferrara and the Sforzas, they were favoured by the Pope's illegitimate daughter, they were favourably influenced by the King of France. The third marriage of Lucretia, celebrated by proxy in the Vatican (30 December, 1501), far exceeded the first in splendour and extravagance. If her father meant her as an instrument in her new position for the advancement of his political ambitions, the son of Gandia, son of Gandia, she proved an admirable subordinate. She is known henceforth, and till her death in 1519, as a model wife and princess, lauded by all for her amiability, her virtue, and her charity. Nothing could well be more different from the fiendish Lucretia Borgia of the drama and the opera than the historical Duchess of Ferrara. Caesar, however, continued his infamous career of simony, extortion, and treachery, and by the end of 1502 had rounded out his possessions by the capture of Camerino and Sinigaglia. In October of that year the Orsini conspired with his generals to destroy him. With coolness and skill Caesar decoyed the conspirators to Rome and put them to death. The Pope followed up the blow by proceeding against the Orsini with greater success than formerly. Cardinal Orsini, the soul of the conspiracy, was committed to Castle St. Angelo; twelve days later he was a corpse. Whether he died a natural death or was privately executed, is uncertain. Whether it was in truth no time, Caesar was so great the terror he inspired that the frightened barons fled before him, says Villari (I, 356), "as from the face of a hydra". By April nothing remained to the Orsini except the fortress of Bracciano.
they begged for an armistice. The humiliation of the Roman aristocracy was complete; for the first time in the history of the papacy the Pope was, in the fullest sense, ruler of his States.

Alexander, still hale and vigorous in his seventy-third year, and looking forward to many more years of reign, proceeded to strengthen his position by re-plotting his treasury in ways that were more daring than his predecessor, and he allowed himself the luxury of building College new novel; his adherents and countrymen that he had nothing to fear from that quarter. He enjoyed and laughed at the securi taneous lampoons that were in circulation, in which he was accused of incredible crimes, and took no steps to shield his reputation. War had broken out between France and Spain over the division of the spoils. Alexander was still in doubt which side he could most advantageously support, when his career came to an abrupt close. On 6 August, 1503, the Pope, with Cassar and others, dined with Cardinal Adriano da Corneto in a villa belonging to the Cardinal, and very imprudently remained in the open air after nightfall. The entire company paid the penalty by contracting the pernicious Roman fever. On the twelfth the Pope took to his bed. On the eighteenth his life was despaired of; he made his confession, received the last sacraments, and expired towards evening. The rapid decomposition and swol len face of his corpse called the suspicion of poison. Later the tale ran that he had drunk by mistake a poisoned cup of wine which he had prepared for his host. Nothing is more certain than that the poison which killed him was the deadly microbe of the Roman campaigna [Pastor, op. cit., III, 469-472; Creighton, Hist. of the Papacy (London, 1887), IV, 44]. His remains lie in the Spanish national church of Santa Maria di Monserrat.

An impartial appreciation of the career of this extraordinary person must at once distinguish between the man and the office. An imperfect setting, says Dr. Pastor (op. cit., III, 475), "does not affect the intrinsic worth of the jewel, nor does the golden coin lose its value when it passes through impure hands. In so far as the priest is a public officer of a holy Church, a blameless life is expected from him, both because he is by his office the model of virtue to whom the laity look up, and because his life, when virtuous, should be a vanguard for his faith and his church in the world. But when it is not in the hands of God, it is more than one of the spiritual treasures confided to him." There have been at all times wicked men in the ecclesiastical ranks. Our Lord foretold, as one of its severest trials, the presence in His Church not only of false brethren, but of rulers who would offend, by various forms of selfishness, both the children of the household and "those who are within." Sinners, who compared His beloved spouse, the Church, to a threshing floor, on which fall both chaff and grain until the time of separation. The most severe arraignments of Alexander, because in a sense official, are those of his Catholic contemporaries, Pope Julius II (Gregorovius), and the Augustinian, Egidius of Viterbo, in his manuscript "Historia XX Secessorum", preserved at Rome in the Bibliotheca Angelica. The Oratorian Raynaldus (d. 1677), who continued the semi-official Annals of Baroniuss, gave to the world at Rome (ad an. 1460, no. 41) 472, mentioned a third papal but severe reproof of the youthful Cardinal Pope, and stated that, where (ad an. 1495, no. 26) that it was in his time the opinion of historians that Alexander had obtained the papacy partly through money and partly through promises and the persuasion that he would not interfere with the lives of his electors. Mansi, the scholarly Archbishop of Lucum, editor and annotator of Raynaldus, says (XI, 412) that it is easier to keep silence than to write with moderation about this Pope. The severe judgment of the late Cardinal Herrenruther, in his "Kirchengeschichte", or Manual of Church History (4th ed., Freiburg, 1854, II, 982-983) is well known to need more moderation.

So little have Catholic historians obtained so much from that in the middle of the nineteenth century Cesare Cattù could write that Alexander VI was the only Pope who had never found an apologist. However, since that time some Catholic writers, both in books and periodicals, have attempted to defend him from the most gaudious accusations. Two of these, in particular may be mentioned: the Dominican Olivier, "Le Pepe Alexander VI et les Borgias" (Paris, 1870), of whose work only one volume appeared, dealing with the Pope's cardinalate; and Leonetti, "Papa Alessandro VI secondo documenti e carteggi del tempo" (3 vols., Bologna, 1880). These and other works were occasioned, partly by a laudable desire to remove a stigma from the good repute of the Catholic Church, and partly by the gross exaggerations of Victor Hugo and others who permitted themselves all licence in dealing with a name so helpless and derided. It cannot be said, however, that these works have been the basis for some of the recent authors ranks them all as failures. Such is the opinion of Henri de l'Epine in the "Revue des questions historiques" (1881), XXXIX, 147, a study that even Thuane, the hostile editor of the Diary of Burchard, calls "the indispensable guide of all students of Borgia's history". It is also the opinion of the Bollandist Matagne, in the same review for 1870 and 1872 (IX, 466-475; XI, 181-198), and of Von Reumont, the Catholic historian of medieval Rome, in Bonn. Theol. Lit. Blatt (1870), V, 686. Dr. Pastor considers that the publication of the documents in the supplement to the third volume of Thuane's edition of the Diary of Burchard (Paris, 1883) renders "forever impossible" any attempts to save the reputation of Alexander VI. There is all the less reason, therefore, says Cardinal Herrenruther (op. cit., II, 983), for the false charges that have been added to his account, e.g. his attempt to poison Cardinal Adriano da Corneto and his ancestors and his society with the Pope. Likewise, says Pope, his "Life of Leo the Tenth"; by Capfique in his "Eglise pendant les quatre derniers siècles" (I, 41-46), and by Chantrel, "Le Pepe Alexander VI" (Paris 1860), the immortal writers have made only too much capital out of the salacious paragraphs scattered through Burchard and Infessura, there is no more reason now than in the days of Raynaldus and Mansi for concealing or perverting the facts of history. "I am a Catholic," says M. de l'Epine (loc. cit.), "and a disciple of the God who hath a horror of evil. I seek the truth, all the truth, and nothing but the truth. Although our weak eyes do not see at once the uses of it, or rather see damage and peril, we must claim it fearlessly." The same good principle is set forth by Leo XI in his Letter of 8 September, 1699, to Cardinals Dinnan, Del Monte, and others: "I have the study of Church History: "The historian of the Church has the duty to disseminate none of the trials that the Church has had to suffer from the faults of her children, and even at times from those of her own ministers." Long ago Leo the Great (440-461) declared, in his third homily for Christmas Day, that the "dignity of Peter is not to be given to an unworthy successor" (in digno hæredem non deficiat). The very indignation that the evil life of a great ecclesiastical rouses at all times (nobly expressed by Pius II in the above-mentioned letter to Cardinal Rodrigo Borgia) is itself a tribute to the high spiritual ideal which for so long and on so broad a scale the Church has presented to the world in so many holy examples, and has therefore accustomed the latter to demand from priests, "The latter are forgiven nothing", says De Maistre in his great work, "Du Pape", "because everything is expected of them", and, despite the vices legally passed over in a Louis XIV become most offensive and scandalous in an Alexander VI" (II, c. xiv).

The contemporary diaries of Johann Burchard and Stefano Innocentii are to be read with great caution, says Von Kleist, Kirchenlex., I, 490-491. Burchard, Notitia rerum urbanarum commentarii (1483-1500), in Eccard, Notitia aevi Maximiliani ac Genazzanensi (1844); Thuanus (Paris, 1833, 3 vols.); Innocentii, Diario della città di Roma, in Eccard, loc. cit., and in Muratori, SS. Sacr. Ital., III, tit. 17-120, ed. by H. Geffcken (Rome, 1809).—The principal events of his pontificate are related in Rallis, Ann. Ecc. ad annum, 1492-1503. Among modern writers the reader may consult the Catholic histories of Von Reumont, Geschichte der Stadt Rom (Berlin, 1868), II, i, 199-249, also his article in Kirchenlex., I, 483-491, and Pastor, History of the Popes since the Close of the Middle Ages (London, 1895), V, 375 sqq., among Protestant writers Gregorovius, Geschichte der Stadt Rom (Stuttgart, 1890), VII, 229-494, and his Lunares Borgia nach Urkunden und Corresponsen (ibid., 1870); also Creighton, History of the Popes during the Reformation (London, 1897, 3 vols.); see also Zoffoli, in the Realencyclopaedia f. prot. The impressions of the Venetian ambassadors to their senate are found in the Annali della Serenissima Republica, 1238-1500, ed. by Pasquale Vellari (Florence, 3 vols., 1876). The statements of Macchiavelli in Il Principe, in the Lettre Persone by R. Longeaux (Paris, 1843), and elsewhere, are discussed by Pastor, op. cit., 15 sqq. The fairness of the judgment of a Catholic is that of J. A. A. and Garnett in the Encyclopaedia Britannica and in the Cambridge Modern History.

JAMES F. LOUGHLIN.

Alexander VII. Pope (Fabio Chigi), b. at Sienna, 13 February, 1559; elected 7 April, 1655; d. at Rome, 22 May, 1667. The Chigi of Sienna were among the most illustrious and powerful of Italian families. In the Rome of Renaissance times, an ancestor of Alexander VII was known as the "Magnificent". The future Pope, the nephew of the Magnificent, Fabio Chigi, nephew of Pope Paul V, though not as prosperous as his forebears, gave his son a suitable training. The latter owed much also to his mother, a woman of singular power and skill in the formation of youth. The youth of Fabio was marked by continued ill-health, consequence upon an attack of apoplexy in infancy. Unable to attend school, he was taught first by a master and later by able tutors, and displayed remarkable precocity and love of reading. In his twenty-seventh year, he obtained the doctorate of philosophy, law, and theology in the University of Sienna, and in December, 1628, he entered upon his ecclesiastical career at Rome. In 1627 he was appointed by Urban VIII, the former of Siena, and from 1634 to 1639 he served five years under the Cardinals Sacchetti and Pallotta, whose commendations won for him the important post of Inquisitor of Malta, together with the episcopal consecration. In 1639 he was promoted to the nunciature of Cologne; and in 1644 was appointed Secretary of State. In the meantime he had been chosen as representative of the conference of Münster, in which post he energetically defended papal interests during the negotiations that led in 1648, to the Peace of Westphalia. (See Thirty-years' War.) Innocent X called him to Rome in 1651 to be his secretary of state, and in February, 1652, made him Cardinal. In the convocation of 1655, famous for its duration of eighty days, and for the clash of national and factional interests, Cardinal Chigi was unanimously elected Pope. The choice was considered providential. At a time when churchmen were being forced to realize the ever-increasing moral and financial, of nepotism, there was needed a person who would rule without the aid of relatives. For a year the hopes of Christendom seemed to be realized. Alexander forbade his relatives to come to Rome. His own sanctity of life, severity of morals, and aversion to luxury made more resplendent his virtues and talents. But on 24 April, 1656, influenced by those who feared the weakness of a papal court unsustained by ties of family interest, he proposed to bring his brother and nephews to assist him. With their advent came a marked change in the manner of life of the pontiff. The administration was given largely into the hands of his relatives, and nepotic abuses came to weigh as heavily as ever upon the papacy. The endeavours of the Chigi to enrich their family were too indulgently regarded by the Pope; but, ever pious and devout, he was far from having a share in the excesses of his luxury-loving nephews. His burden was heavy, and, besides his time in literary pursuits and in the society of the learned, but the friends whom he favoured were those who could be best relied on as counsellors.

The pontificate of Alexander VII was shadowed by continual difficulties with the young and ill-advised Louis XIV of France, whose representatives were a constant source of annoyance to the Pope. The French prime minister, Cardinal Mazarin, had not forgiven the legate who resolutely opposed him at the conferences of Münster and Osnabrück, or the papal secretaries of state who stood in the way of his anti-Roman policy. During the convokes he had been bitterly hostile to Chigi, but was in the end compelled to accept his election as a compromise. However, he prevented Louis XIV from sending the usual embassy of obedience to Alexander VII, and, while he lived, hindered the appointment of a French ambassador to Rome, diplomatic affairs being more important. The French cardinals, protectors, were in constant fear of the Pope. In 1662 the equally hostile Duc de Créqui was made ambassador. By his high-handed abuse of the traditional right of asylum granted to ambassadorial precincts in Rome, he precipitated a quarrel between France and the papacy, which resulted in the Pope's temporary loss of Avignon and his forced acceptance of the humiliating treaty of Pisa in 1664. (See Louis XIV.) Emboldened by these triumphs, the French Jansenists, who recognized in Alexander an old enemy, became insolently assertive, professing that the propositions were not, to use their expression, "Augustinus" of Cornelius Jansen. (See January.) Alexander VII, who as adviser of Innocent X had vigorously advocated the condemnation, confirmed it in 1665 by the Bull "Ad Sacram" declaring that it applied to the aforesaid work of Jansen and to the very meaning intended by him; he also prohibited its publication and laid on the bishops by all the clergy as a means of detecting and extinguishing Jansenism (q. v.). His reign is memorable in the annals of moral theology for the condemnation of a number of erroneous propositions. Cardinal Hohenruther praises (Kirchengesch. III, 414) the moderation in his handling of dogmatic controversies of the period. During his pontificate, the conversion of Queen Christina of Sweden, who, after her abdication, came to reside in Rome, where on Christmas Day, 1655, she was confirmed by Pope, in whom she found a generous friend and benefactor. He assisted the Venetians in combating the Turks who had gained a foothold in Crete, and obtained in return the restoration of the Jasuits, exiled from Venice since 1606. (See SARPI, VENICE, JESUITS.) The inimical relations between Spain and Portu- gueze were occasioned by the latter's establishment of independence (1640) were a source of grave trials for Alexander, as for other popes before and after him. Alexander VII did much to beautify Rome, one of which he died, and were levelled to make way for straighter streets and broad piazzeas, such as those of Colonna and the Collegio Romano. The decorations of the church of Sta. Maria del Popolo, titular church of more than one of the Chigi cardinals, the Scala Regia, the Chair of St. Peter in the Vatican Basilica, and the great colonnade before that edifice bespeak the genius of Bernini and the munificence of his papal patron. He was also a patron of learning, modernized the Roman University, known as Sapienza, and enriched it with a magnificent library. He also made extensive additions to the Vatican library. His tomb by Bernini is one of the most beautiful monuments in St. Peter's.

Alexander VIII. POPE (PIETRO OTTOBONI), b. at Venice, April, 1610; elected 5 October, 1689; d. at Rome, 1 February, 1691. He was the son of Marco Ottoboni, chancellor of the Republic of Venice, and a descendant of a noble family of that city. The future pope enjoyed all that wealth and social position could contribute towards a perfect education. His early studies were made with marked brilliancy at the University of Padua (q. v.), where, in 1627, he secured the doctorate in canon and civil law. He went to Rome, during the pontificate of Urban VIII (1623-44), and was made governor of Terni, Rieti, and Spoleto. For fourteen years he served as auditor of the Rota (q. v.). At the request of the Republic this favoured son was made Cardinal by Innocent X (19 February, 1652), and was later given the Bis-
Whether he was the first to occupy that see is open to discussion. The Bollandists have also a long paper as to the exact location of Comana as there were several places of that name, but decide for Poiana. The curious name of the saint comes from the fact that he had, out of humility, taken up the work of burning charcoal, so as to escape worldly honours. He is called a philosopher, but it is not certain that the term is to be taken literally. His philosophy consisted rather in his preference of heavenly to earthly things. The discovery was due to the women, and the attempt with which he had been regarded. St. Gregory Thaumaturgus had been asked to come to Comana to help select a bishop for that place. As he rejected all the candidates, some one in derision suggested that he might accept Alexander the charcoal-burner. Gregory took the suggestion seriously, summoned Alexander, and found that he had to do with a saint, and a man of great capabilities. Alexander was made bishop of the see, administered it with remarkable wisdom, and ultimately gave up his life for the Faith, being burned to death in the persecution of Decius. The vagueness of the information we have about him comes from the fact that his name is not found in any of the old Greek or Roman calendars. He would have been absolutely unknown were it not for a discourse pronounced by St. Gregory of Nyssa, on the life of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, in which the election of Alexander is incidentally described. In the modern Roman Martyrology his name occurs, and he is described as a "philosopher divinisissimus." His feast is kept on 11 August.

T. J. CAMPBELL.

Alexander, Saint, Patriarch of Alexandria, date of birth uncertain; d. 17 April, 326. He is, as is clear from his own greatness, prominent by the fact that his appointment to the patriarchal see excluded the heresiarch Arius from that post. Arius had begun to teach his heresies in 300 when Peter, by whom he was excommunicated, was Patriarch. He was reinstated by Achillas, the successor of Peter, and then began to scheme to be made a bishop. When Achillas died Alexander was elected, and after that Arius threw off all disguise. Alexander was particularly obnoxious to him, although so tolerant at first of the errors of Arius that the clergy nearly revolted. Finally, the heresy was condemned in a council held in Alexandria, and later on, as is well known, in the General Council of Nicaea, whose Acts Alexander is credited with having drawn up. An additional merit of this great man is that during his priesthood he passed through the bloody persecutions of Galerius, Maximinus, and others. It was while his predecessor Peter was in prison, waiting for martyrdom, that he and Achillas succeeded in reaching the pontiff, and interceded for the reinstatement of Arius, which Peter absolutely refused, declaring that Arius was doomed to perdition. The refusal evidently had little effect, for when Achillas succeeded Peter, Arius was made a priest; and when in 323, when he came to the helm, the heresies of the Nicene council were still tolerated. It is worth recording that the great Athanasius succeeded Alexander, the dying pontiff compelling the future doctor of the Church to accept the post. Alexander is described as "a man held in the highest honour by the people and clergy, magnificent, liberal, eloquent, just, a lover of God and men, and in virtue the model of all." So mortified was he that he never broke his fast while the sun was in the heavens." His feast is kept on 17 April.

Alexander Briant, Blessed, English Jesuit and martyr, b. in Somersetshire of a yeoman family about 1556; executed at Tyburn, 1 December, 1581. He entered Hert Hall, Oxford, at an early age, where his remarkable beauty and purity of countenance procured for him "the appellation of the "lad of the youth". At Oxford he became a pupil of Father Robert Persons to which fact, together with his association with Richard Holby, is attributed his conversion. Having left the university he entered the English college at Reims, whither Holby had preceded him, and was ordained priest 29 March, 1578. Assigned to the English mission of the following year he laboured with exemplary zeal in his own county of Somersetshire. During his ministrations he reconciled to the Faith the father of his former tutor, Father Robert Persons, and the intimacy resulting from this fresh tie between pupil and master probably led to the former's untimely death. A party of the persecution, searching for Father Robert Persons, placed Blessed Alexander under arrest, 28 April, 1581, in the hope of extorting information. After fruitless attempts to this end at Counter Prison, London, he was taken to the Newgate Tower where he was subjected to the most hideous tortures. To the rack, starvation, and cold was added the inhuman force of needles under the nails. It was during this confinement that Blessed Alexander penned his pathetic letter to the Jesuit Fathers in England requesting admission into the Society, which was granted. But his membership was short-lived; together with six other priests he was arraigned, 16 November, 1581, in Queen's Bench, Westminster, on the charge of high treason, and condemned to death. The details of this last great suffering, which occurred on the 1 December following, like those of the previous torture are reported. Through either slovenliness or with the connivance of the executioner he was put to needless suffering. His face is said to have been strikingly beautiful even up to his death. In his letter to the Jesuit Fathers he protests that he felt no pain during the tortures he underwent, and adds: "Whether this is that miraculous or not, God knows. He was scarcely more than twenty-five years of age at the time of his martyrdom.

E. F. SAXTON.

Alexander Natalis (or Noel Alexandre), a French historian and theologian, of the Order of St. Dominic, b. at Rouen, 19 January, 1639; d. in Paris, 21 August, 1724. He made his early studies at the Dominican College of Rouen and, after entering the Dominican Order in that city, 9 May, 1655, studied philosophy and theology in the convent of Saint Jacques, Paris, where he afterwards taught for twelve years, during which time he gained some renown as a preacher. In 1672, at the wish of his superiors, he obtained the licentiate from the Sorbonne, and in 1675, the doctorate. About this time he attracted much attention by writing against Launoy on the subject of simony. Persuaded by that generous promoter of learning, the great French minister, Jean Baptiste Colbert, to enter the society of savants of which the Abé Colbert (late Archipr. of Rouen) was president, he declared before it on particular events of history with such success that he was urged to write a complete history after the method that he had followed in his lecture. He yielded to this wish of the French scholar and published at Paris, in 1677, the first volume, bearing the general title "Selecta historiarum ecclesiasticarum capitae et in loca ejusdem insignia."
disserationes historice, criticae, dogmaticae", in which he treated of the first century of Christianity, and in 1686, the twenty-fourth volume in which he closed his studies of New Testament history with dissertations on the Council of Trent. In the next few years he published six additional dissertations on the history of the Old Testament. His directness and conciseness, his critical acumen, and his manner of viewing history and dividing it into special studies (then quite original, although now common enough) won for him the approbation of the church. At last the Church granted him letters of commendation and praise from Pope Innocent XI and many cardinals, but later volumes gave offence at Rome because of the author's Gallicanism, and Innocent XI finally forbade (13 July, 1684) the faithful to read the history under pain of excommunication. In the preface to the third edition (Paris, 1699, eight folio volumes) Father Alexander submitted fully to the judgment of the Holy See, and in some scholias added to the dissertations showed that in some instances he had been criticized and judged unjustly. Father Roncaglia (of the Clerks Regular) brought out at Lucca, in 1769, an edition of the thirty-five folio volumes in which he gave the text unaltered, but with the addition of paragraphs and dissertations correcting the most offensive statements.

The work thus corrected was removed from the Index by Pope Benedict XIII, and many editions were thereafter given to the public. The best is that of Archbishop Mansi of Lucca, in nine folio volumes (Lucca, 1749), who added many explanatory notes. An anonymous writer in two supplementary volumes carried the history into the eighteenth century, and added various dissertations from the pens of other historians. The work thus continued at Lucca, and Father Alexander, in 1774, published five folio volumes, and at Bingen, 1785-90, in twenty quarto volumes. Upon the completion of his historical dissertation Father Alexander turned his attention for some years to strictly theological studies, and in 1693 published at Paris in ten octavo volumes a commentary on the "Catechismus Romanus" entitled "Theologia dogmatica et moralis" to which he added for preachers an Index Concinnatorius, distributing the whole work into sketches of sermons for all the Sundays and feast-days of the year. The work has also two appendixes containing valuable letters from his pen on moral theology and canon law, and many papal nominations and episcopal documents bearing on the disputes of the time. Later editions of the work appeared at Paris in 1703, two folio volumes, in 1743, four quarto volumes, and at Einsiedeln in 1768, ten volumes octavo. His next work of importance was a handbook for preachers: "Precepta et praebenda ad predicatores veritatis divini informandos", which first appeared in Paris in 1701, and last at Augsburg in 1763, in octavo. This was followed (1703-10) by a commentary "Commentarius literalis et moralis" on one hundred and sixty Gospels (for Sundays and feast-days) and on the Epistles of the New Testament, which has often been abridged and published under various forms. In 1704, Father Alexander fell into Jansenism by signing the Cas de Conscience, but he soon recanted. Before this he carried on a bitter controversy with Father Daniel, S.J., on the Dominican and Jesuit doctrines on Probabilism, Grace, and Predestination, as compared with the doctrine of St. Thomas, subjects which was terminated by the King, who silenced both parties. In 1706, having been elected Provincial of the Dominican Province of France, he was obliged to interrupt his literary labours. Freed from his administrative duties in 1710, he set himself to the task of writing a commentary on the prophetic books of the Old Testament. In 1712 he was forced to lay aside his pen by a weakness of the eyes which finally resulted in total blindness. He died of old age in the convent of Saint Jacques in Paris, having enjoyed throughout his long and busy literary life a close intimacy with all the learned men of his time, sinecured with God and the Church.

While writing the important works noticed above Father Alexander published several dissertations in which he showed (1) that St. Thomas was the author of the "Summa Theologica"; (2) that St. Thomas was the author of the "Office of Corpus Christi"; (3) that the form of the "Decretals" of the Emperor Justinian and a Dominican, that St. Thomas was not a disciple of Alexander of Hales, and that the Secunda Secundae of the "Summa" was not borrowed from the latter. These, with a dissertation against Father Frassen, O.S.F., on the Vulgate, have been incorporated in his "Historia Ecclesiastica" (Venice edition, 1778).

Father Alexander wrote and published in French: "Recueil de plusieurs pièces pour la défense de la morale et de la grâce de J.C." (Delft, 1698); "Apologie des Dominicanss Missionaires de la Chine, ou réponse au livre intitulé", "Défense des nouveaux chrétiens" (Cologne, 1697); "Conformité des cérémonies de l'Eglise Chinoise" (Geneva, 1701, and a new edition, 1704), "De la confession, pour servir de confirmation à l'apologie des Dominicans Missionnaires de la Chine" (Cologne, 1700); "Lettres d'un Docteur de l'ordre de S. Dominique sur les cérémonies de la Chine" (Cologne, 1700).

Alexander of Abonoteichos, the most notorious impostor of the second century of the Christian era. His life is fully described by Lucian in his Valedixius, written about 1775. He was a public lecturer, of pleasing appearance and captivating address, he gained many followers, not only in his own country but from different parts of the Roman Empire. By cleverly devised oracles he prepared souls for a new birth and exhibited a huge serpent as the embodiment of his new divinity. His fame spread, and about 150 he built in his native city of Paphlagonia a temple to Escolapius, that was soon visited by many from all parts of Greece and Italy. The numerous questions asked of the new oracle were answered by "the prophet" in metrical predictions. In his most prosperous year he is said to have received 73,000,000 sesterces, and to have incurred bodily, mental, and social afflications, for each of which he received a drachma and two oboli. Great officials consulted the oracle, and the Roman Rutilianus married the charlatan's daughter. The non-fulfilment of his predictions he explained plausibly, declaring that Pontius was full of Christians and unbelievers who derided him, and that they should be stoned, or else his god would no longer favour the people. He established new mysteries and on the day of their inauguration he had this proclamation made in the temple: "If an Atheist, a Christian, or an Epicurean be present, let him withdraw. The only may thus enjoy the mysteries of worship joyfully." As the objects of his aversion were being expelled, he continued to cry out: "Out with the Christians!" while the crowd added: "Out with the Epicureans!" Lewdness figured in the ceremonies, and his own private life was marked by licentiousness. He continued in this debasing career for many years before the public deserted him. He had predicted that he would die when 150 years old, translated from this sphere of action to another by a thunderbolt. He died when he was 70 of a loathsome disease, devoured by worms. The Valedixius is dedicated by Lucian to Celerus, possibly the author of the anti-Christian work refuted by Origen.
Elsewhere decidedly hostile to the Christians as in "Peregrinus Proteus", unquestionably Lucian is in this work favourable to them. He shows that while high and low were being led astray by the false mysticism of Alexander of Abonoteichos, the Christians held aloof from him, and with the Epicureans, with whom Lucifer contrasts them, the "Peregrinus", shared the full measure of the arch-hypocrite's hate. It is the testimony of an enemy, who here, at least, is no slanderer, but an unwilling apologist of Jesus Christ and His persecuted adherents.

JOHN A. BECKET.

Alexander of Hales, Franciscan, theologian, and philosopher, one of the greatest of the scholastics, b. at Hales, or Hailles, in Gloucestershire, towards the end of the twelfth century; d. at Paris, in 1245. He was educated at the monastic school in his native village, and probably also at Oxford. After having finished his studies in England, he went to the University of Paris, and there attained the Master's degree, first in the faculty of arts (philosophy) and afterwards in that of theology, in 1208. The remark made by Roger Bacon it is inferred that, in 1210, Alexander was Magister regens in the faculty of arts, and this is the first date of his biography that is certain. Roger is also our authority (though not the only one) that Alexander became arch-deacon; but whether the title was conferred by the Bishop of Paris or by an English bishop, is uncertain. In 1220, Alexander joined the faculty of theology, in which he soon became one of the most celebrated teachers. In 1231, he entered the Order of St. Francis, continuing, however, to perform, as a monk, the duties of a licensed teacher of theology, a fact which was of the utmost importance both for the University and for the course of studies in the Franciscan Order. Alexander died at the convent of his Order in Paris.

In the chronicles and theological treatises of the fourteenth century we find Alexander styled Doctor universi, Doctor Theologiae (Pseudo Gervase); he teaches at the University monasterium (Saint-Maur), principal work is the "Summa Universae Theologiae", begun about the year 1231 and left unfinished. The third part is defective, especially the portion treating of the virtues and other questions in moral theology. To supply this defect, the "Summa Virtutum" was composed by the Franciscan William of Meltona, though the work was, and is still sometimes, ascribed to Alexander himself. It is now agreed that not Alexander of Hales, but Alexander of Bonini is the author of the "Commentaries" on Aristotle's "Metaphysics" and "De Anima." The "Summa Theologiae" has been several times published (Venice, 1743; 1756; Nuremberg, 1481, 1502; Pavia, 1481; Cologne, 1622). A critical edition has recently been promised by the Queraci editors of the works of St. Bonaventure. Alexander's other works (Salimbene, a contemporary, speaks of his "many writings") are still unpublished.

The importance for the history of theology and philosophy lies in the fact, that he was the first to attempt a systematic exposition of Catholic doctrine, after the metaphysical and physical works of Aristotle had become known to the schoolmen. His is not the first "Summa". The collections of "Sentences", which were current in the schools since the eleventh century, and which were often so titled in manuscripts. So that Alexander had many Summats as predecessors for instance: Hugh of St. Victor, Roland, Omnebene, Peter Lombard, Stephen Langton, Robert of Melun, Peter of Poitiers, William of Auxerre, and Robert Pulley. His, however, is the first "Summa" in which use was made of Aristotle's physical, metaphysical, and ethical, as well as logical treatises. Peter Lombard did not quote Aristotle once; Alexander quotes him in almost every Quaestio; he quotes also Arabic commentators, especially Avicenna, and thus prepares the way for Thomas, St. Bonaventure, and Duns Scotus for whom Aristotle was the philosopher. The "Summa" is divided into four parts: the first treats of God, the Trinity, etc.; the second, of creatures, sin, etc.; the third, of Christ, Redemption, supernatural law; the fourth, of the sacraments. Each Part is divided into Questions and each Question into Chapters. The method is a development of that employed by Abelard in his "Yes and Nay", and is practically that with which readers of St. Thomas are familiar. The article opens with a recital of the objections, then follows the thesis, with proofs, scriptural, patristic, and rational, and, at the end of the article, under the title Resolutio are given the answers to the objections.

Alexander's theology is, in its main outlines, identical with that of St. Bonaventure and St. Thomas. Thus he starts with the question of the knowability of God, and decides that, while the mind can form some concept of Him, He is above all that can comprehend what He is. In enumerating the proofs of the existence of God, he lays stress on St. Augustine's argument from the need of an absolute truth, on St. Anselm's ontological argument, on Hugh of St. Victor's argument from consciousness, and on the Aristotelian argument from causality. He teaches that God is the exemplar, efficient and final cause of all things, that He is the Creator and Preserver of all things, that He is pure Actuality (Actus Purus), all things else being composed of matter and form. This latter point, the coextensiveness of matter with created being, later on became a distinctive tenet of the Franciscan School. In the problem of Universals, Alexander takes up the position of a metaphysician and psychologist, and thus reaches a conclusion to which his predecessors of the twelfth century, who argued the question solely from the point of view of dialectics, could never arrive; from which he concludes that every universal is in the mind of God, and also in re, as forms or essences which the active intellect abstracts. This is the conclusion of Moderate Realism. In psychology, more than elsewhere, Alexander shows that he is not prepared to break with the traditional Augustinian teaching, which prevailed in the schools before the introduction of Aristotle's "De Anima". Thus he adopts the threefold division of the faculties of the soul into ratio, which has for its object the external world, intellectus, which has for its object created spiritual substances, and intelligens, which has for its object first principles and the eternal prototypes of things in the mind of God. Augustinian, also, is the doctrine that our knowledge of higher truths, especially of higher spiritual truths, is dependent on special divine illumination. Despite these Augustinian principles, however, he adopts Aristotle's doctrine of the Active and Passive Intellect, and by means of it attempts for knowledge of the external world. Alexander's importance in the history of Christian Ethics is due to the use which he makes of Aristotle's ethical treatises. William of Auzerre, in his "Summa Aurea", made use of a Latin translation of Aristotle's "Ethics"; following his example, though working along independent lines, Alexander and his successors pursued the way for the Highest Good, the nature of virtue, the moral aspects of actions and habits, and brings to bear on his discussions not merely the principles of the ethical law, the ethical definitions of patristic writers, the legislation and practice of the Church, but also the definitions and principles laid down in the "Ethics". God, he teaches, is the highest Good; man's duty is through knowledge and love of God to attain possession of Him. He defines virtue, in the Aristotelian, not in the traditional Augustinian, sense. Alexander, being the first of the great thirteenth century scholastics in point of time, naturally exercised considerable influence on all those great leaders who made the thirteenth century the golden age of Scholasticism. Within his own Order he was the model of other Summists as to method and arrangement of matter. Gerson says that Alexander was a favourite teacher (doctor) of St. Thomas. This, however, need not mean, as it is sometimes taken to mean, that St. Thomas frequently borrowed from Alexander. The influence was exerted chiefly, if not exclusively, through Alexander's "Summa Universae Theologiae", which St. Thomas followed very closely in the arrangement and method of his "Summa Theologiae".

ALEXANDER

ALEXANDRIA

23 June, 1734. He made his profession in the abbey of Vendôme, 26 August, 1757, and after completing his philosophical and theological studies, he proceeded to the monastery of Bonne-Nouvelle, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died sub-prior of the monastery. Though somewhat delicate in health, he was a man of great industry and all his leisure was devoted to the study of mathematics and physical sciences. He wrote an "Historia Mathematica" apparently without thought of publication, for most of his writings were merely transcribed into a large folio volume which was preserved in the library of Bonne-Nouvelle.

Alexandre is known chiefly by two works, "Traité des flux et reflux du flux et reflux", and "Traité général des horloges". The former had already been written when the Academy of Bordeaux proposed the cause of the tides as the subject of a prize essay. He submitted an extract which was deemed worthy of the prize and his success led him to publish the entire work at Paris, 1720. This treatise, based as it is upon the supposed rotation of the earth about the moon, is of interest only from an historical point of view, as a contribution to the solution of a problem which has engaged the attention of the most skilful analysts since the time of Newton. The "Traité général des horloges", Paris, 1734, as its name indicates, is a general treatise on the history and the art of constructing time-pieces. It contains a catalogue of writers on the subject with a brief account of their principal works. Besides his manuscript works on subjects in mathematics, mechanics, etc., Alexandre added a sixth part to Huyghen's treatise "De horologio oscillatorio", in which he describes a clock the length of whose pendulum was automatically varied to enable it to indicate apparent solar time instead of mean solar time. A description of the pendulum mechanism, which never came into practical use, may be found in Berthoud's "Essai sur l'horlogerie", Paris, 1758, where some of its defects are pointed out.
