ALEXANDRIA.—An important seaport of Egypt, on the left bank of the Nile. It was founded by Alexander the Great to replace the small borough called Racontha or Rakhtum. Alexander's successors on the throne of Egypt, soon made it the intellectual and commercial metropolis of the world. Cesar who visited it 46 n. c. left it to Queen Cleopatra, but when Octavius went there in 30 b. c. he transformed the Egyptian kingdom into a Roman province. Alexandria continued prosperous under the Roman rule but declined a little under that of Constantinep. When, after the treaty of October, 642, the Byzantines abandoned it to Amru, the Arab invaders hastened its ruin owing to the conqueror's impatience to build a new town, Cairo, and to transfer to it the government seat. The city was by no means desolate. The ruin had been great under the Arabs, but it became worse under the Turkish rule when the victories of Selim had subjugated the valley of the Nile in 1517. Bonaparte on the 2d of July, 1798, did not find more than 7,000 inhabitants in the town. Since then, thanks to the efforts of Mehemet Ali, due to the army political and commercial events of the nineteenth century, the city of Alexandria has become once more the first port of the Eastern Mediterranean with 235,000 inhabitants. Christianity was brought to Alexandria by the Evangelist St. Mark. It was made illustrious by a lineage of learned doctors such as Pantecon, Cleopatra, Orig.; it has been governed by a series of great bishops amongst whom Athanasius and Cyril must be mentioned. Under Dioscorus, successor of Cyril,
Eutychianism appeared and the native population saw in it an excellent means of freeing themselves from Byzantium. Their zeal for this heresy transformed the town into a battle-field where blood was shed more than once during the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries. At last the patriarchal Church of St. Mark found itself divided among three parties: the native Copts_behind to error, and the foreign Greeks faithful to orthodoxy. After the Arabian conquest, the Greek patriarchate remained vacant for many years; at the time of the Byzantine emperors and the Ottoman sultan its holders were obliged to live habitually at Constantinople. In the meantime, the Coptic patriarchate transferred itself to Cairo and saw most of its disciples become Musulmans. To-day, owing to its commercial importance, Alexandria possesses within its walls every tongue and Christian race: Copts, Greeks, Latins, Armenians, Maronites, Syrians, Chaldeans, Protestant. (1) The Copts, a small community, are divided into Monophysites and Catholics; the chief of the first is the Patriarch of Alexandria and resides at Cairo; the chief of the latter is also Patriarch of Alexandria since Leo XIII created this title in favour of Mgr. Macaire, 19 June, 1890. Owing to two great, the so-called Orthodox and the Melchites. The Orthodox, separated from Rome, are divided into two factions which differ in language and origin, and live in enmity: on one side, the Hellenophones, many of whom are natives of the Greek kingdom; on the other, the Arabophones, subject to the khedive or natives of Syria; all these have a patriarch of Greek tongue and race whose official residence is in the town, near the church of St. Sabas. The Melchites, united to Rome, are natives of Egypt and Syria; they are under the Patriarch of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and all the East, but, as the pretender resides at Damascus, they are governed by a bishop who is vicar of the patriarchate. (3) The Latins have no patriarch. A Latin patriarchate was created by the Crusaders who took Alexandria in 1202 and in 1367; but this patriarchate, established residentially from 1559 to 1866, is become again merely nominal. Now, nothing but a nominal vicar in Cairo is the vicar, a member of the Friars Minor of St. Francis has specially under his direction the Europeans of foreign colonies. (4) The Armenians are divided into Gregorians and Catholics; the latter have a Bishop of Alexandria who resides, however, at Cairo; the former are subject to the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Maronites, whose number is increasing every day, wish to constitute a diocese. In the meanwhile they are governed by priests appointed by the Patriarch of the Lebanon. (6) To the 300 Syrian Catholics of Alexandria and Cairo, a choroepiscopos who resides in the latter town is given. (7) Still less numerous, the United Chaldeans possess no special organization. (8) The Protestants are represented at Alexandria by numerous sects: the Anglican Church has a community since the middle of the nineteenth century and a school; the Scotch Free Church has a church since 1867 and a school; the Evangelical Church of Germany, established in the town since 1857, opened a church in 1866 and a little school. But these are for foreign residents; the mission of the United Presbyterian Church of the United States has a church and two schools for the Copts (about 100 members). Moreover, most of the English missions which are flourishing among the Copts of Upper Egypt have stations or lodgings at Alexandria. We must say the same of every religious order of Catholic missionaries in Egypt. Several of these orders have scholastic establishments. The Jesuits direct the college of St. Francis Xavier. The Brothers of the Christian Schools conduct a college to which a school of arts and trades is attached. They have also free classes and different schools in various parts of the town. The education of young girls is conducted by different religious congregations, such as the Sisters of Charity, the Sisters of the Mother of God, and the Sisters of the Deliverance.

Alexandria, Councils of.—In 231 a council of bishops and priests met at Alexandria, called by Bishop Demetrius for the purpose of Origin unworthy of the office of teacher and of communicating him. In 306, a council held to depose St. Peter of Alexandria deposed Meletius, Bishop of Lycopolis, for idolatry and other crimes. The schism then begun by him lasted fifty years and was the source of much sorrow for the Church of Egypt. In 321 was held the council that first condemned Arius, then parish priest of the section of Alexandria known as Bæculis. After his condemnation Arius withdrew to Palestine, where he secured the powerful support of Eusebius of Cesarea. At the Council of 326, St. Athanasius was elected to succeed the aged Alexander, and various heresies and schisms of Egypt were denounced. In 339, one hundred bishops met at Alexandria, declared in favour of Athanasius, and vigorously rejected the calumnies of the Eusebian faction at Tyre. At a council in 350, St. Athanasius was replaced in his see. In 362 was held one of the most important of these councils. It was presided over by St. Athanasius and St. Eusebius of Vercellae, and was directed against those who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost, the human soul of Our Lord, and His Divinity. Mild measures were agreed on for those apostate bishops who repented, but severe penance was decreed for the chief leaders of the great heresies that had been devastating the Christian Church. In 393, another council met under St. Athanasius for the purpose of submitting to the new Emperor Jovian an account of the true faith. Somewhat similar was the purpose of the Council of 364. That of 370 approved the action of Pope Damasus in condemning Ursacius and Valens (see Arianism), and expressed its surprise that Aëtius was yet tolerated at Milan. In 399, a council of Alexandria condemned, without naming himself, the writings of Origen. In 430, St. Cyril of Alexandria held a council to make known to the bishops of Egypt the letter of Pope Celestine I (422-432), in which a pontifical admonition was conveyed to the heresiarch in Nicaea. In 451, another council met under St. Athanasius for the purpose of settling the question of the Monothelites, with which closed the series of these deliberative meetings of the ancient Church of Egypt.

Alexandria, The Church of. The Church of Alexandria, founded according to the constant tradition of both East and West by St. Mark the Evangelist, was the centre from which Christianity spread throughout all Egypt, the nucleus of the powerful Patriarchate of Alexandria. Within its jurisdiction, and embracing only the cristianî population, were included about 108 bishops; its territory embraced the six provinces of Upper Libya, Lower Libya (or Pentapolis), the Thebaid, Egypt, Arcadia (or Heptapolis), and Augustamnica. In the beginning the suoseccor of St. Mark was the only metropolitan, and he gov- erned ecclesiastically the entire territory. As the Christians multiplied, and other metropolitan sees were created; he became known as the arch-metropolitan. The title of patriarch did not continue to be used until the fifth century [For the controversy concerning the manner of electing the earliest successors of St. Mark see that article and Bishop (cf. Cabrol, Dict. d’archéol. chrét., I, 1204-1210.)]

Up to the time of the second ecumenical council (381) the Patriarch of Alexandria ranked next to the Bishop of Rome; the third canon of this council, afterwards confirmed by the twenty-eighth canon of the Council of Chalcedon (451), the Patriarch of Constantinople, supported by imperial authority and by a variety of concurred advantages, was given the right of precedence over the Patriarch of Alexandria, but neither Rome nor Alexandria recognized the claim until many years later. During the first two centuries of our era, though Egypt enjoyed unusual quiet, little is known of the ecclesiastical history of its chief see, beyond a barren list of the names of its patriarchs, handed down to us chiefly through the ecclesiastical historian Ephraim. They were in order: Anianus (d. 54); Agilias; Cerdon, one of the presbyters whom St. Mark ordained; Primus, also called Ephraim, advanced from the grade of layman; Justus (d. 130); Eumenes; Mark II; Cedalios; Agrippinus; Julian (d. 180). With the successors of Julian we have something more positive in the list of names, but it is not until the year 222 that the Church of Alexandria for forty-two years, and it was he who deposed and excommunicated Origen, notwithstanding his great work as a catechist. Heracas (d. 247) exercised his power as arch-metropolitan by deposing Ammonius, Bishop of Thmuis, and installing a successor (Photius, P. G., CIV, 1229)

Maximus and Theonas (282–300) were followed by Peter, the first occupant of the See of St. Mark to die a martyr (311 or 312). Then came Achillas, who ordained Arius through ignorance of the man’s real character; otherwise St. Athanasius certainly would not have given that bishop the praise he does. On the death of Achillas, Alexander, who proved himself a zealous defender of the orthodox faith in the contest against Arius, was elected bishop by unanimous consent of clergy and people, and in spite of the interested opposition of Arius. Alexander, accompanied by Ammonius, deacon of the Church of Alexandria (325), but died soon after (328). The Meletian faction took advantage of his death, and of the absence of Athanasius from the city, to intrude a creature of their own into the vacant see, one Theonas. He survived but three months, when Athanasius, having returned, was chosen to succeed Alexander.

Of the ante-Nicene bishops who ruled this church, Dionysius and Alexander were the most illustrious, as also were St. Athanasius and St. Cyril among those who subsequently filled the see. Athanasius, supported by Rome, when he sought protection and a council at Rome (see Monteith, History of the Faith against Arius), died in 373, a glorious confessor of the Faith, after an episcopate of forty-three years. The interval between the death of Athanasius and the accession of St. Cyril (412) was filled by Peter II, a zealous bishop, who was obliged to seek refuge in Rome from the persecution of the Arians (d. 419), the Timothy I (381–385) who was present at the second ecumenical council, and was honoured with the contempt of the imperial court, because he vigorously opposed, and refused to acknowledge, the decree which gave the Patriarchate of Constantinople rank over that of Alexandria. Theophilus (385–410), the immediate predecessor of Cyril. Under St. Cyril (412–444) whose noble defence of the Divinity of Christ has rendered his memory precious in the Church, the Patriarchate of Alexandria reached its most flourishing epoch. Over 100 bishops, among them ten metropolitans, acknowledged his authority; he solemnized a council in 425 for the purpose of increasing the number of his churches, monasteries, priests and religious (P. G., LXX, 972). At this time, too, the patriarch possessed considerable civil power, and may be said to have reached the zenith of his reputation. The decline of his office dates from the middle of the fifth century. Under Dioscurus (444–451), the lawful successor of St. Cyril, the Church of Alexandria became embroiled in the Monophysite heresy. Dioscurus was deposed, and later banished. The election of Proterius as Catholic patriarch was followed by an open schism. Proterius was murdered in 457, and Timothy Zelus, a Monophysite, was intruded into the see. The schism was prolonged by Dioscurus and Timothy gave rise to two factions, the orthodox, or Catholic, party, which maintained the faith of the two natures in Christ, as prescribed by the Council of Chalcedon (451), and the Monophysites, who followed the heresy of Dioscurus. The former came to be known as Melchites or Royalists, i.e., adherents or favorites of the emperor, and the latter as Jacobites. The possession of the See of Alexandria alternated between these parties for a time; eventually each communion maintained a distinct and independent succession. Thus the Church of Alexandria became the scene of serious disturbances. Finally it was the turn of the Orthodox to be impoverished; their Church was reduced in the person of the Abbot Paul. Unfortunately, the new patriarch gave some grievous offence to the Emperor, whereupon he was deposed, and Zoilus succeeded him in 541. Among the successors of the latter patriarch, Eulogius, Theodore Scribe, and St. John Chrysostom, the Church attained a new vigour, and restored the Catholic succession (538–539) in the person of the Abbot Paul. a blessing. They suffered many bitter persecutions under successive Moslem rulers. Many among the clergy and laity apostatized. Nor did the Melchites escape. Indeed they were worse off, ground as they were between the upper and nether millstones, the Jacobites and the Saracen. When their patriarchate was restored (727), under Cosmas, in the caliphate of Nisham, their situation was desirable. Through the joint communications of this patriarchate they backed many of their churches. Ignorance and indolence, however, had spread among the Melchites. In the services of the Church the Greek language was soon wholly replaced by the Arabic, and when, in the beginning of the ninth century, the Venetians came away to their own city the body of St. Mark the ruinous patriarchate was hardly more than a name.

With the Jacobites matters were not much better. There was a succession of undistinguished patriarchs, except at intervals, when the see was vacant because of internal disputes. Persecution was frequent, and renegades were numerous. By the eleventh century Alexandria had ceased to be the sole place where the patriarchate was consecrated. From this date Cairo claimed that honour alternately with Alexandria, though the enthronement took place in the latter city. A little later, during the Caliphate of Damascus, the See of Christodoulos (Abd-el-Moussa) of Cairo became the fixed and official residence of the Jacobite patriarch. In the beginning of the reign of Saladin (1169) a serious controversy arose between the Jacobite Patriarchs of Antioch and those of Alexandria, concerning the use of auricular confession. The Jacobite parties of the two patriarchates had for many years kept in close touch with one another. More than once their relations were strained, as happened particularly in the time of John X (Barsusan) of Antioch, and Christodulou (Abd-el-Messiah) of Alexandria. They fell out over the proper preparation of the Eucharistic oblations, in which the Syrian Jacobites were in the habit of mingling a little oil and salt. (Neale, Patriarchate of Alex., II, 214). Christodulou insolently rejected the practice. John of Antioch wrote in its defence. The new controversy about the use of auricular confession severed the once friendly relations. Christodulos (Abd-el-Messiah) and his successor, Cyril of Alexandria, were for abolishing the practice altogether while Michael of Antioch as vigorously insisted upon its continuance (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient., II, 50, 448; Historia Patr. Jacobit. Alex., 550; Neale, op. cit., II, 261).

In the twenty years (1215-35) the Jacobites were without a patriarch, because they could not agree among themselves. During this break in the Jacobite succession, Nicholas I, the Melchite patriarch, addressed an appeal to Pope Innocent III (1198-1216), impleading his good offices with the Templars and Hospitallers in favour of some Christian conquest. On the Holy Sepulchre, 1229 (Te Deum 70), when the Jacobite patriarch was the only Hierarch of the Holy Land, he was supported by the Pope, Honorius III (1216-27), for assistance in the struggles that were fast overwhelming his Church. We may note here that the revolutions which subsequendy befall the Great Empire of Constantinople had little effect on the fortunes of the Church of Alexandria. The same may be said of the Crusades; though closely connected with local Alexandrian history, they do not seem to have had much influence upon its internal ecclesiastical affairs.

There is little left to chronicle of the Jacobite and Melchite history of the Church of Alexandria. Both suffered severely in the crushing persecution of the fourteenth century. The Jacobites, utterly demoralized, managed to continue the succession of their patriarchs, who, as we have seen, resided no longer in Alexandria, but in old Cairo. In its widest extension, the patriarchate included fifteen bishoprics, and laid claim to jurisdiction over all the Coptic Christians of Egypt, Abyssinia, Nubia, and Barbary, or the native tribes of northern Africa. During this dark period the Melchites fell more and more under the influence of the Byzantine patriarchs, and thus sank ever deeper into the Greek Church. Their patriarchs, in fact, were the patriarchs of Nisam. For a time he once was, resides at Stamboul, and glories in the title of 'Patriarch of Alexandria and Ecumenical Judge'. It is an empty title, since he is supreme pastor over only five thousand souls, and where formerly more than one hundred bishops acknowledged the jurisdiction of the patriarchate. The only four now form the synod of the 'Ecumenical Judge'. They are the Bishops of Ethiopia, Memphi, Damietta, and Rosetta.

It will not be out of place to treat briefly of the Latin patriarchate of the Church of Alexandria. Since the seventh century the patriarchate, as we have seen, was divided between the Jacobites and the Melchites, both of which bodies eventually became schismatical. Among the patriarchs a few had courted the friendship of Rome, but none seems to have entered into full communion with her. There were, however, some Christians, as there are now, who receive the sacraments of the Old Church, but remain in full communion with the Holy See.

It was doubtless in their behalf that in the pontificate of Innocent III (1198-1216) a patriarch of the Latin rite was appointed for Alexandria. The time seemed favourable for such an appointment, because of the progress of the Crusades. The actual date is, however, uncertain. Sollerius (Acta SS., Juvi., 1887), and the 'Lexicon Bibliicum' of Simon, quoted by him, speak of a "S. Athanasius Claromontanus pro Latinis, A. D. 1219". There is no further mention of this patriarch, nor is it certain that he was the first incumbent of the Latin patriarchate. We say it is not certain, because the date of appointment, or perhaps of the consecration, of Athanasius, as given by Sollerius, is 1219, whereas the establishment of the Latin patriarchate occurred in 1215. This is clear from the Twelfth General Council (Fourth Lateran), held in that year, and is also confirmed by the decree of the Council of Lyons (1245), which refers to the list of the Latin patriarchs, and heads it with the name of Giles, a Dominican friar appointed in 1210 by Clement V. From this on he follows Sollerius (Acta SS., loc. cit.), who gives us the names of the Latin patriarchs from 1219 to 1547.

After the loss of the Holy Land and the overthrow of all Latin domination in the Byzantine Empire, the Latin Patriarchate of Alexandria ceased to exist except as a mere titular dignity (Wernz, Jus Decretalium, p. 837). In 1895, Pope Leo XIII established a patriarchate of the Coptic rite with two suffragan sees, Minieh and Luksor, for the Copts in communion with Rome, who formerly were under the See of Alexandria (Papal Brief, 7 November 1895).

Alexandrian Library, The.—The Great Library of Alexandria, so called to distinguish it from the smaller or “daughter” library in the Serapeum, was a foundation of the first Ptolemies for the purpose of aiding the maintenance of Greek civilization in the midst of the conservative Egyptians. If the removal of Demetrius Phalerus to Alexandria, in 296-295 B.C., was connected with the organization of the library, at least the plan for this institution must have been formed under Ptolemaios Soter (died c. 284 B.C.), but the completion of the work and its connection with the history of the accession of Ptolemy Philadelphos, permits us to date the donation of the books to Cleopatra, in 41 B.C., of 200,000 volumes from the library of Pergamon. Domitian drew upon the library for transcripts. Under Aurelian, in A.D. 272, the greater part of the Bruchelion was destroyed, and it is most probable that the library perished at this time. The small library in the Serapeum is supposed to have perished when the temple of Serapis was destroyed by Theophilus, but there is no definite statement to that effect. Up to the time of Gibbon, the generally accepted version of the destruction of the library was that, on the capture of the city by the Mahommedans in A.D. 642, John Philoponos, having formed a friendship with their general Ammonius, asked for the gift of the library. Ammon referred the matter to the Caliph Omar and received the answer: “If these writings of the Greeks agree with the book of God, they are useless, and need not be preserved; if they disagree, they are pernicious, and ought to be destroyed.” Accordingly, they were employed in the baths as fuel, and lasted six months. This story is now generally discredited, chiefly because it rests only on the authority of Abulpharagius, a writer six centuries later, while earlier writers, especially Eutychius and Elmacin, make no mention of it. Besides, the act is contrary to Mohammedan custom. John Philoponos lived about a century before the capture of the city, and the statement of the time the rolls lasted as fuel is preposterous. Finally, there is the evidence given above for the earlier destruction of the library.

Alexandrine Liturgy, The.—The tradition of the Church of Egypt traces its origin to the Evangelist St. Mark, and it is likely that the Alexandrine Church ascribes to him the parent liturgy from which all the others used by Melchites, Copts, and by the daughter-Church of Abyssinia are derived. These three bodies possess the three groups of liturgies used throughout the original Patriarchate of Alexandria. There is the Greek Liturgy of St. Mark, the oldest form of the three, used for some centuries after the Monophysite schism by the orthodox Melchites; there are then three liturgies, still used by the Copts, translated into Coptic from the Greek and derived from the Greek St. Mark, and, further, a number of Abyssinian (Ethiopic) uses, of which the foundation is the liturgy of the Ethiopian Church, which is derived from the original Greek Alexandrine rite. By comparing these liturgies and noticing what is common to them, it is possible in some measure to reconstruct the old use of the Church of Alexandria as it existed before the Monophysite schism and the Council of Chalcedon (451). There are, moreover, other indications of the Alexandrine liturgy (d. c. 217) makes one or two allusions to it; St. Anthanasius (d. 373) has many more; the Prayer Book of Serapion, Bishop of Thmuis in the middle of the fourth century, and the descriptions of Pseudo-Dionysius (De hierarchiâ eccl.), at about the same time, in Egypt, make it possible to reconstruct the outline of the Egyptian Liturgy of their time, which is then seen to coincide with the Liturgy of St. Mark.

I. THE LITURGY OF ST. ATHANASIUS, SERAPION, AND PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS.—The Mass was divided into two chief parts, the Mass of the Catechumens and that of the Faithful. When the Arians persuaded a certain Ischyras to accuse St. Athanasius of having overturned his altar and broken his chalice during the Liturgy, they made the mistake of producing a catechumen as a witness. St. Athanasius could at once point out that the chalice is not brought to the altar till the Mass of the Catechumens has been dismissed (Contr. Arian., xxviii and xlvii). The Mass of the Catechumens consisted of Lessons from Holy Scripture, Psalms sung alternately, and Hymnody. Then follow the blessing and dismissal of various kinds of people who are not allowed to be present at the Holy Eucharist, the catechumens, penitents, and ennergumens. In Serapion and Pseudo-Dionysius the Mass of the Faithful begins with the blessing of the oblations to the altar; they are then covered with a veil. The deacon reads out a litany for various causes (σκέψεως), to each petition of which the people reply: "Before the Eucharist, the Mass of the Catechumens begins", and the bishop sums up their prayers in a collect. Then follows the kiss of peace. St. Athanasius appears to place the offering of the gifts at this point (Probst, Lit. des IV. Jahrh., iii). The diptychs are read, followed by another collect and a prayer for the people. The bishop washes his hands and begins the Eucharistic Prayer with the words "Kyrie eleison", and then the kiss of peace. The opening of the Eucharistic Prayer has always been very long in the Egyptian Liturgy. St. Athanasius refers to thanksgiving for the Creation, with detailed references to the different works, the Garden of Eden, the Incarnation, and so on; then comes an allusion to the Angels and their elders, who praise God and say (and the people interrupt the prayer by taking up the Angels’ words): "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts". The bishop continues, praises God the Son who, having been made Man, on the night when He was betrayed took bread, blessed, broke, and gave it to His disciples, saying . . . The words of Institution follow, although St. Athanasius, because of the disciplina arcana, avoids quoting them. Nor does he mention the Epiclesis that certainly followed. Theophilius of Alexandria (385-412) says that: "The Bread of the Lord, in which the Body of the Saviour is shown, which we break for all and the whole Church which is upon the Table of the Church are (at first) unquickened, but are sanctified by the Invocation and descent of the Holy Ghost" (translated by St. Jerome, Ep. xcix, n. 13). The Blessed Sacrament is shown to the people, the Host is broken (the Our Father was probably said at this point), Communion is given, the Host by the bishop, the Chalice by the deacon, and the Thanksgiving (apparently Ps. xxxiii) is said. We notice already in these first references the great length of the first part of the Eucharistic Prayer (the Preface), and the fact that the diptychs are reserved for the Consecration. These two notes are characteristic of all the Egyptian liturgy.

II. THE GREEK LITURGY OF ST. MARK.—This rite as it now exists has already undergone considerable development. A Prothesis (preparation of the oblations before the beginning of the actual liturgy) has been added to it from the Byzantine Liturgy; the Consecration at Communion and Anaphora; the Epiclesis shows signs of the same influence; and the Great Entrance is accompanied by a Cherubikon. Since the Monophysite schism this use was more and more affected by the Byzantine Liturgy, till at last it entirely gave way to it among them. However, it is possible to disengage it from later additions and to reproduce the original Greek Alexandrine Liturgy, the parent rite of all others in Egypt. After the Prothesis, the Mass of the Catechumens begins with the greeting of the priest: "Peace to all", to which the people answer: "And with thy spirit." The deacon says "Fray" and they repeat "Fray" three times; the priest begins with the usual greeting: "Peace to all". R. "And with thy spirit." "The Apostle" is read, and then, after incense has been put into the thurible, follows the Gospel. The deacon tells the people to stand while they hear it. Sozomen (d. after 425) notes as a peculiar custom of Alexandria that the bishop does not stand at the Gospel (Hist. Eccl., VII, xii). After the Gospel follows the Homily. Both Socrates and Sozomen say that in their time only the bishop preaches, and they assign this result to thecus did oversea the cause by Arius (Socr., V, xxii; Soz., VII, 19). In the liturgy of the eighth century (the great Ekklesias) is said by the deacon, "He tells the people to pray for the living, the sick, travellers, for fine weather, and the fruits of the earth, for the regular rise of the waters of the river" (the Nile, an important matter in Egypt), "good rain and the cornfields of the earth", for the salvation of all men, "the safety of Thebes" (for Thebes), "for the Christ-loving sovereigns", for prisoners, "those fallen asleep", "the sacrifice of our offerings", for the afflicted, and for the Catechumens. To each clause the people answer: "Kyrie eleison." The priest meanwhile is praying silently for the same objects, and when the deacon's liturgy is finished, he adds his prayer aloud with a doxology. The "verse" (περιοδιον, a verse from a psalm) is sung, and the deacon says "The Three", that is, three prayers for the whole Church, the Patriarch, and the local Church; in each case the priest ends with a collect. The catechumens are then dismissed, and the Mass of the Faithful begins with the "Great Entrance". The priest and deacon bring the offerings from the Prothesis to the altar while the people sing the Cherubikon. The kiss of peace follows, with the prayer belonging to it; then the Creed is said and the Offertory prayer at the altar. (In other liturgies the Offertory is said before the Great Entrance which is at the place where the deacon begins, as always, with the greeting to the people and the dialogue: "Let us lift up our hearts." R. "We have them to the Lord." R. "Let us give thanks to the Lord." R. "It is meet and just. And then the Eucharistic Prayer: "It is truly meet and just, right, holy, proper, and good for our souls, O Master, Lord, God, Almighty Father, to praise Thee, ging to Thee, thank Thee. . . ." The peculiarity of all the Egyptian Liturgies is that the Supplication for various causes and people, which in all other rites follows the Sanctus and the Consecration, comes at this point, during what we should call the Preface. The Alexandrine Eucharistic Prayer is woven into it a series of prayers for the Church, the Emperor, the sick, fruits of the earth, and so on. Again the priest prays God to "draw up the waters of the river to their right measure"; he remembers various classes of Saints, especially St. Mark, says a prayer for all men, just before the Anaphora; the Eucharist is imbued with special influence: "especially our all-holy, immaculate, and glorious Lady Mary, Mother of God and ever Virgin". The deacon here reads the diptychs of the dead; the priest continues his supplication for the patriarch, the bishop, and the living; the deacon calls out to the people to stand and then to look towards the east; and so at last comes the Sanctus: the many-eyed Cherubim and the six-winged Seraphim.
sing, cry out, praise Thee, and say: 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts'. And then aloud he goes on: 'Sanctify all of us and receive our praise, who with all who sanctify Thee, Lord and Master, sing and say' (and the people continue): 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord.' After the long Preface the Canon up to the words of Institution is very short. The priest, and usually the people, stand and the priest at once comes to: Our Lord, God, and great King (κυρίων και βασιλέων), Jesus Christ, who in the night in which he gave himself to a most dreadful death for our sins, taking bread in His holy, pure, and immaculate hands, and looking up to heaven to Thee, His Father, and God of God, and blessed, broke, and gave it to His holy and blessed Disciples and Apostles, saying [aloud]: Take, eat [the deacon tells the concelebrating priests to stretch out their hands], for this is My Body, broken and given for you for the forgiveness of sins.' R. Amen.

The words of Institution of the Chalice are said in the same way. The priest lifts up his voice at the end, saying: 'Drink of this all'; the deacon says: 'Again stretch out your hands'; and the priest continues: 'This is My Blood of the New Testament, shed for you and for many and given for the forgiveness of sins.' R. Amen. 'Do this in memory of Me.' R. Amen. 'And the Apostles and the Apostles and to Our Lord's death, resurrection, ascension, and second coming and going immediately on to the Epiklesis: 'Send down upon us and upon this bread and chalice Thy Holy Ghost that He as Almighty God may bless and perfect them [aloud] and make this bread the Body.' R. Amen. 'And this chalice the Blood of the New Testament, the Blood of Our Lord, and God, and Saviour, and great King, Jesus Christ.' . . . The Epiklesis ends with a doxology to which the people answer: 'As it was and is'. Then follow the Our Father, said first by the priest silently and then aloud by the people, with the usual Emblesmos, the Inclination before the Blessed Sacrament—the deacon says: 'Let us bow our heads before the Lord', and the people answer: 'Before Thee O Lord'; the elevation with the words: 'Holy things to the Holy'; and the answer: 'One Holy Father, one Holy Son, one Holy Ghost, in the union of Thee.' R. Amen. Then come the Blessings of the Bread, during which Psalm cl (Laudate Dominum in sanctis eius) is sung, and the Communion. The form of Communion is: 'The holy Body' and then 'the precious Blood of our Lord, God and Saviour'. A short thanksgiving follows, and the people, blessing, the blessing quoted from II Cor. xii, 13. Some more prayers are said in the Diakonikon, and the liturgy ends with the words: 'Blessed be God who blesses, sanctifies, protects, and keeps us all through the share in His holy mysteries. He is blessed for ever. Amen.'

The characteristic points of this rite are the nine Kyries and the beginning, the Offertory prayers said at the altar instead of at the Prothesis, and especially the place of the great Supplication before the Sanctus. This last circumstance causes the Consecration to occur much later in this Liturgy than in any of the others. It should be noted that the place of the Supplication is difficult in the Roman Mass. We say part of it (for the Church, Pope, and Bishop, the Memento Viverum and Communicantes) before, and part (Memento Defunctorum, Nobis quoque peccatoribus) after the Consecration. In the Antiochene use, and in all those derived from it, the whole Supplication comes after the Epiklesis. It has been explained that the differences is that originally everywhere the deacon began to read out the clauses of the Supplication as soon as the priest had begun the Eucharistic Prayer. They would then go on saying their parts together, the deacon being interrupted by the words said aloud by the priest. The point at which the Supplication ends would then depend on its length; and if eventually that point (at which the priest sums up its clauses in a collect) were taken as its place in the liturgy, it might occur before the Consecration (as at Alexandria), or after it (as at Antioch), or the Supplication might still be said partly before and partly after (as at Rome). The Roman use, then, would represent an intermediate stage of development (cf. A. Gastoud in Cabrol, Dict. arch. chrét. et de liturgie, Paris, 1904). But the parallels between the Roman and Alexandrine uses are too obvious not to suggest a common source for these Liturgies. There is the allusion to the eleison, save us, of the Our Father five times as soon as the priest stands at the altar, just before the Trisagion which more or less corresponds to our Gloria in excelsis. There are, moreover, clauses and even whole prayers whose common origin with those of our Roman Canon cannot be doubted. As an example, let the prayer said after the reading of the dipliva of the dead be compared with our Supra qua que, and Supplices te rogamus. In St. Mark's liturgy it is: 'Receive, O God, the sacrifice, offerings, and Eucharist of thy servants on Thy holy, heavenly, and spiritual altar in the height of Heaven by the ministry of thy archangels . . . as Thou didst receive the gifts of old of Adam and of Cain and Abel and Enoch andaraham . . .'. There are other parallel passages no less striking; so that, in spite of likenesses between the Roman Canon and the Syrian Anaphora, it is with this Egyptian Liturgy that ours is generally supposed to have had a common source (Duchesne, Origines, p. 54). Socrates and Sozomen notice some peculiarities of the Alexandrine Patriarchate in the fifth century. On Wednesdays and Fridays the Liturgy was not celebrated (Soc., V, xxii, who says this is a most ancient custom). In this case, too, Alexandria and Rome follow the same practice, whereas that of all the other Eastern Churches is different. (Duchesne, Origines, ib., 137.) The first two sees also agreed in having no Mass on Saturday; in other parts of Egypt there was a Liturgy of the Presanctified, and people received Holy Communion on Sunday evening, not fasting (Soc., ib., 137, 81, 89, 355, 135). The Greek Liturgy, Manuscripts.—There are no very old manuscripts of this use; the oldest is a copy of the twelfth century, and kept in the University Library of Messina (gr. n. 177). The Vatican Library contains a thirteenth-century manuscript of the whole Liturgy of the Presanctified, which has become the base of the textus receptus and is reproduced by Swainson and Brightman. There are also a manuscript of Vatican 1207 (Bibl. Vat. gr. 1207) and a copy of the twelfth or thirteenth century at Mount Sinai, with an Arabic translation in the margin. III. THE COPTIC LITURGIES.—After the Monophylistic schism the Copts composed a number of liturgies in their own language. Three of these became the most important and are still used: those of St. Cyril, St. Gregory of Nazianzus, and St. Basil. They fifler only in the Anaphoras which are joined to a common Preparation and Mass of the Catechumens. The Anaphora of St. Cyril, also called that of St. Mark, with the text of the liturgy that is common to all, corresponds exactly to the Greek St. Mark. When it was translated into Coptic a great part of the formulas, such as the Trisagion, the deacon's litany, said at the beginning of the Mass of the Faithful, nearly all the short greetings like the Deo Gratias. For the St. Mark of Mar-qa and everything said by the people had already become universally known in Greek. These parts were then left in that language, and they are still written or printed in Greek, although in Coptic characters, throughout the Coptic Liturgy. A few prayers have been added to the original Greek Liturgy, such as a very definite act of faith in the Real Presence said by the priest before his Communion. There are also Greek versions of the other two Coptic Anaphoras: those of St. Basil and St. Gregory.

The Coptic Liturgies, Manuscripts.—The Vatican Library contains a manuscript of the Anaphoras of St. Basil, St. Gregory, and other eleventh and twelfth centuries, others of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and seventeenth centuries. For the list of other manuscripts (all quite recent) see Brightman, op. cit., LXXI. Printed Texts.—The Complete Manuscripts of the Anaphora of St. Basil (Rome, 1376—For the Uniates). The Kula (Stichilion) and Doxikon are published at Cairo in Coptic and Arabic editions, on 8vo paper, 1885, 1887.

IV. The Ethiopian Liturgies.—In her liturgies, as in everything else, the Church of Abyssinia depends on the Coptic Patriarchate of Alexandria. The normal and original Ethiopian use is the "Liturgy of the Twelve Apostles", which is the Coptic St. Cyril done into their own language. The Abyssinians have also a number of other Anaphoras (ten or fifteen) ascribed to various people such as St. John the Evangelist, the 318 Fathers of Nicaea, St. John Chrysostom, etc., which they join to the first part of their Liturgy on various occasions instead of its own Canon.

The Ethiopian Liturgies, Manuscripts.—The Vatican Library contains a number of tenth-century manuscripts, and there are others and fragments at Paris and Berlin, all as late as the seventeenth century. Printed Texts.—Swainson, op. cit., 346—386; although this is described as the Coptic Ordinary Canon of the Mass, it is the Ethiopic Pre-anaphoral according to the Brit. Mus., MS. 545 (see Brightman, op. cit., lxx.). Petrus Ethodius (sic), Testamentum nedactum in sacre psalmus benedictiones incensa, cerna, etc. (Rome, 1548), 158—167—For the Uniates; this contains the Oros communis and the Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles. Translations.—Latin in Ethodius (op. cit.); Rennaud (op. cit.), 1, reprints it for the * Corpus Christianorum * (S OCD I, 1879) contains versions of the Anaphora of Our Lady Mary and Doctor; Dillman, Chrestomathia Ethiopica (Leipzig, 1866), gives that of St. John Chrysostom, 81—96.

V. The Present Use.—Of these three groups two, the Copts and Abyssinians, still keep their own liturgies. The Copts use that of St. Basil throughout. On Sundays and weekdays, and in Ascension and Canada and Christmas Eve. This order is common to the Monophysite and Uniate Churches. Very soon after the Arabs conquered Egypt (641) their language was the only one understood by the Copts; in less than two centuries Coptic had become a completely dead language. For this reason the rubrics of the Coptic liturgical books have for a long time been written in Arabic as well; sometimes Arabic translations of the prayers are added too. The books needed for the Liturgy are the Kthlidh (choulidyia), Katnna (cat na molon), a lectionary containing the lessons from Holy Scripture, the Synaxar (synaxar), which contains legends of saints, sometimes read instead of those from the Acts of the Apostles, and the "Book of the Ministry*" (Brightman, lxvii). The Coptic and Abyssinian Uniates have books specially printed for them, which differ from the others only inasmuch as the names of Monophysites are omitted, that of Chalcedon is inserted, and the Filolog is added to the Creed. The Orthodox Church of Egypt has long sacrificed her own use for that of Constantinople. For a time after the Monophysite schism she kept the Liturgy of St. Mark in Greek. But there were very few Orthodox left in the country; they were nearly all officials of the Imperial government, and, after the Arab conquest especially, the influence of Constantinople over them, as over the whole Orthodox world, grew enormously. So eventually they followed the Gelasian and Patriarchal Use in everything else. The Orthodox Patriarch of Alexandria even went to live at Constantinople under the shadow of Cesar and of Cesar’s Court Bishop. The change of liturgy took place at the end of the twelfth century. Theodore Balsamon says that at that time a certain Patriarch of Alexandria came to Constantinople and there went on celebrating the Liturgy of his own Church. The Byzantine told him that the use of the most holy Gucmenical throne was different, and that the Emperor had already commands all Orthodox Churches throughout the world to follow that of the Imperial city. So Mark apologized for not having known about this law and conformed to the Byzantine use (P. G., CXXXVIII, 954). Since then the Greek Liturgy of St. Mark has no longer been used by anyone. It remains to be seen whether, now that the Orthodox Church of Jerusalem has begun to make some small restoration of her own use (see Antiochene Liturgy), the very determined and strongly anti-Phanariote prelate who rules the Orthodox Church of Egypt (Lord Photios of Alexandria) will not revive, at any rate for one day in the year, the venerable liturgy of his own see.

Explanations.—Besides the introductions and notes in Rennaud, Brightman, Swainson, Brightman, Lord Bute (op. cit.), Bute, Liturgia des IV. Jahrhunderts (Munich, 1898), 108—124, reprinted in Corpus Christianorum (Rome, 1896); pseudo-Dionysios, etc.; Butler, The Ancient Coptic Church of Egypt (Oxford, 1984); Oros, Mysteries of Egypt (Oxford, 1886); Watts, Rituals of the Coptic Church (London, 1888); Rudolph, Historia Abbissinicae (Frankfort, 1861); Le Brun, Reproduction de l’Espace (Paris, 1788), IV, 499—518, 519—579; Bent, The Sacred City of the Ethiopians (London, 1893).

Alexian Nuns.—Early in the fifteenth century religious women began to be affiliated to the Alexian Brotherhood (see below). These sisters adopted the Rule of St. Augustine and devoted themselves to the same corporal works of mercy as those of the Brothers of St. Alexius, or Cellites. Their habit is black, with a mantle of the same colour and a white cap, whences their common name of "black sisters". The black, or Cellite, sisters at present have their motherhouse at Cologne. They are not represented in the list of religious women established in the United States.

Schlosser in Kirchenle.

Alexians, or Cellites, a religious institute or congregation, which had its origin in Mechlin, in Brabant, in the fifteenth century. Originated by one Peter of a pest called the "black death". Certain laymen united under the guidance of a man named Tobias.
to succour the plague-stricken, without taking any vows or adopting a rule of life. One of their most obvious actions being the burial of those who died from the plague; they were known as "Cellites" (Lat. cella, a cell, and hence, a grave). Eater on, they chose as their patron, Alexius, a saint who served many years in a hospital there. Edessa in Syria, and thenceforth they called themselves the Alexian Brothers. They spread rapidly through Germany, Brabant, Flanders, and other countries. As they were also styled Lollhorden (Old Germ. lollon, to sing softly) from their chants for the dead, they have consequently been sometimes confounded with the Wyclifan sect of heretics, the Lollards. They did not escape calumny and persecution, as appears from the Bull "Ad Audientiam Nostram" (2 Dec., 1377) which Gregory XI sent to the German bishops, especially those of Cologne, Trier, and Mainz, forbidding annoyance of the Cellites and enjoining punishment for their persecutors. This was followed by Bulls of a similar tenor from Boniface IX. (7 Jan., 1396), Eugenius IV (12 May, 1391), Nicholas V, and Pius II. In 1469, the mother-house at Aix-la-Chapelle voiced the general feeling of the Brothers in asking the Prince Bishop of Liège, Louis de Bourbon, to raise that house to a convent of the Order of St. Augustine. This request was granted, and Father Dominicus Brock and five of the Brothers took the solemn vows of religious. This step and the revised constitution of the Order were confirmed by Pius IX (12 Sept., 1870).

The Alexian Brothers have four hospitals in the United States. The first was built in Chicago, 1868; destroyed by the great fire, 9 Oct., 1871, and rebuilt the following year. The second was opened at St. Louis, in 1869, covers an acre with its departments for the insane, nervous diseases, and inebriates. The third is at Oshkosh, Wis. (1880). The fourth was built at Elizabeth, N. J., on land given for that purpose by Right Rev. Bishop Wigger. Competent surgeons and physicians attend to the patients, and the Brothers are nurses and do the housework of the hospitals.

Bishop Vaughan of Salford, England (later, Cardinal), invited the Alexian Brothers to take charge of a new home and hospital in his diocese, which led to their establishing themselves in England in June, 1875. Dr. Lacy, Bishop of Middleborough, secured them for his diocese in 1884. In 1885, they established a Province of their Order and a novitiate in the United Kingdom. The latter, first attached to St. Mary's Convent, Newton Heath, Manchester, was later transferred to Twyford Abbey, near Ealing, which the Alexian Brothers had purchased. In England they do not have any asylums for the care of the insane, as in Germany, Belgium, and America. The English establishments are only for the aged and infirm.

Alexius Brother

Alexius Falconieri, Saint, b. in Florence, 1200; d. 17 February, 1310, at Mount Senario, near Florence. He was the son of Bernard Falconieri, a merchant prince of Florence, and one of the leaders of the Republic. His family belonged to the Guelph party, and opposed the Imperialists whenever they were in power. The name of Edessa in Syria, where Alexius grew up in the practice of the most profound humility. He joined the Laudesi, a pious confraternity of the Blessed Virgin, and there met the six future companions of his life of sanctity. He was favoured with an apparition of the Mother of God, 15 August, 1233, as were these companions. He returned to Mount Senario, the Laudesi. With consistent loyalty and heroism Alexius at once abandoned all, and retired to Le Camarzia, a house on the outskirts of the town, and the following year to Mt. Senario. With characteristic humility, he traversed, as a mendicant, in quest of alms for his brethren, the streets of the city through which he had lately moved as a prominent citizen. So deep and sincere was his humility that, though he lived to the great age of one hundred and ten years, he always refused to enter the priesthood, of which he deemed himself unworthy. The duties of one who was a principal in the material needs of the various communities in which he lived. In 1252 the new church at Cagaggio, on the outskirts of Florence, was completed under his care, with the financial assistance of Chiarissimo Falconieri. The miraculous image of the Annunciation, still highly venerated in Italy, had its origin here. St. Juliana Falconieri, his niece, was trained in sanctity under his personal direction. The influence exerted on his countrymen by Alexius and his companions may be gathered from the fact that in a few years ten thousand persons had enrolled themselves under the banner of the Blessed Virgin in the Servite Order. At his death he was visited by the Infant Jesus in visible form, as was attested by eye-witnesses. His body rests near the church of the Annunciation, in Florence. Clement XI declared Alexius worthy of the veneration of the faithful, 1 December, 1717, and accorded the same honour to his six companions, 3 July, 1725.

Alexius, Saint and Confessor.—According to the most recent researches he was an Eastern saint venerated at St. Cloud, near Paris, and brought to the Byzantine empire to Rome, whence it spread rapidly throughout western Christendom. Together with the name and veneration of the Saint, his legend was known to Rome and the West by means of Latin versions and recensions based on the form current in the Byzantine Orient. This process was facilitated by the fact that according to the earlier Syriac legend of the Saint, the "Man of God", of Edessa (identical with St. Alexius) was a native of Rome. The Greek legend, which antedates the ninth century and is the basis of all later versions, makes Alexius the son of a distinguished Roman named Dominianus. The son of his father, Eudoxius, secretly left his father's house and journeyed to Edessa in the Syrian Orient where, for seventeen years, he led the life of a pious ascetic. As the fame of his sanctity grew, he left Edessa and returned to Rome, where, for seventeen years, he dwelt as a beggar under the stairs of his father's palace, unknown to his father or wife. After his death, assigned to the year 417, a document was found on his body, in which he revealed his identity. He was forthwith honoured as a saint and his father's house was converted into a church placed under the patronage of Alexius. In this expanded form the legend is first found in a hymn (canon) of the Greek hymnographer Josephus (d. 883). It also occurs in a Syrian biography of Alexius, written not later than the ninth century, and which presupposes the existence of the Church of the Saints, a turn based on an earlier Syriac legend (referred to above), composed at Edessa between 450 and 475. Although in this latter document the name of Alexius is not mentioned, he is manifestly the same as the "Man of God" of whom this earlier Syriac legend relates that he lived in Edessa during the episcopate of St. John Chrysostom (412–444). He was later venerated as a saint. In addition to this earlier Syriac legend, the Greek author of the later biography of St. Alexius, which we have mentioned above, has having been written before the ninth century, probably in a book, was related to the life of a beggar and later venerated as a saint. In the West we find no trace of the name Alexius in any martyrology or other liturgical book previous to the end of the tenth century; he seems to have been completely unknown. He first appears in connection with S. Boniface as titular saint of a church in the later diocese of Rome. On the site now occupied by the church of St. Alessio there was at one time a diaconia, i.e., an establishment for the care of the poor of the Roman Church. Connected with this was a church which by the eighth century had been in existence for some time and was dedicated to S. Boniface. In 972 Pope Benedict VII transferred the almost abandoned church to the exiled Greek metropolitan, Sergius of Damascius. The latter erected beside the church a monastery for Greek and Latin monks, soon made famous for the austere life of its inmates. The name of S. Boniface was added to that of St. Alexius as titular saint of the church and monastery. It is evidently Sergius and his monks who brought to Rome the veneration of St. Alexius. The Oriental Saint, according to his legend a native of Rome, was soon very popular with the folk of that city. Among the frescoes executed towards the end of the eleventh century in the Roman basilica of St. Clement (now the lower church of San Clemente) are very interesting representations of events in the life of St. Alexius. His feast is observed on the 17th of July, in the West; in the East, on the 17th of March. The church of S. Boniface, at the foot of the Cenci, was renovated in modern times but several medieval monuments are still preserved there. Among them the visitor is shown the alleged stairs of the house of Euphemia under which Alexius is said to have lived.

Alfield, Thomas. See Thomas Alfield, Blessed.

Alfioli, Count Vittorio, the greatest tragic poet of Italy; b. at Asti (Piedmont), 17 January, 1749; d. at Florence, 8 October, 1803. He was the son of Count Antonio Alfioli and Monica Maillard de Touron. His training (1758–66) at the Regia Academia di Firenze, where the latter was rector, was the best years in disreputable intrigues, profitless roving, and the promiscuous reading of unworthy literature. French he knew well enough, but of his native tongue he had little more than a colloquial smattering. His real education was to begin soon after his twenty-ninth year, when his hitherto dormant genius suddenly kindled in him an indomitable literary ambition, which first caused him to delve into Italian, then into Latin, and, nineteen years later, into Greek with sturdy courage and unflagging perseverance. Italy lacked a tragic literature worthy of the name. Alfioli created it. Having settled at Florence where he lived for twenty years and with Louisa von Stolberg-Gedern, Countess of Albany, the wife of Charles Edward Stuart, the Pretender. In 1792, when devouchery had brought the latter to his grave, the Countess began to share the poet's home. The criticisms of society were ignored and he devoted himself to the life of Sardanapalus. Religious feelings, however, always appeared strong and sincere. He died after receiving the sacraments of the Church and was buried in Santa Croce, where a monument by Canova marks his grave.

Alfioli's literary production, begun in 1778, was not only heroic and luminous. His name is prominent on twenty-two tragedies, viz.: "Filippo," "Polinice,"—both on an extremely weird plot and exhibiting at times the beginner's hand; "Antigone," "Virginia," "Agamemnon," showing greater poetic finish and mature artistic skill; "Orestes," "Rome," "Ottavia," "Timoleon," "Merode,"—in which the author is at his best; "Maria Stuarda," a little below the standard previously set; "La Comune dei Pazzi," full of vigor and poetic impetus; "Don Garzia," "Saul," this being his masterpiece; "Agide," "Sofonisba," "Bruto Primo," "Mirra," rich in striking effects; "Bruto Secondo," "Abele," "Homo Probus," "Antigone," "Andromache," and "Achille," which closed his repertoire. Alfioli's tragedies have been said to be cast in a form often constrained and pedantic. Even if this be true, the fault almost disappears when their forcefulness, freshness, sincerity of feeling, and inspiration are fully appreciated. Nor is the poet's fame waning in the hearts of contemporary Italy. His unrelenting hatred of tyranny, ringing through every word and line, is now more than ever acknowledged to have been the strongest literary factor in Italy's fight for political unity and independence. There is a complete edition of Alfioli's works in twenty-two volumes, by Capraro (Rome, 1805–15). The "Tragedia del Farnese" is his tragi-comedy, the "Vita di Vittorio Alfioli, scritta da se stesso," the "Misogallo," and "Sordi minor writings."

12 June, 1863. For many years the professor of singing at the English College in Rome, he is remembered chiefly for his scientific writings and his collections of the music of the old masters. Perhaps his most valuable work is his "Raccolta di Musica Sacra" in "Il Manoscritto di Polignotto" (Rome, 1863), and "Raccolta di Motetti" (Rome, 1841). On plainchant he published "Accompagnamento coll organo" (Rome, 1840). "Ristabilimento dei libri musicali dell'antica chiesa di S. Gregorio" (Rome, 1843); "Saggio storico del canto Gregoriano" (Rome, 1845); "Prodromo sulla restaurazione de' libri di canto Gregoriano" (Rome, 1857). He also translated into Italian Catel's "Traité d'harmonie" and contributed to the "Gazzetta musicale di Milano" and other periodicals many articles on church music of great value to the student.

Alfonso de Zamora, a converted Spanish Rabbi, baptized 1506; d. 1531. He revised the Hebrew text of the Polyglot Bible, translated the Chaldee paraphrase in it, and added the sixth volume. He published also a work called "Introducciones Hebraicas" (Alcala, 1526).

Alfonso of Burgos, b. of a noble family, in the city of that name; d. at Palencia, 8 December, 1489. He was conspicuous for learning before his entrance into the Dominican order, early in life. His preaching attracted the notice of Ferdinand and Isabella, who selected him as royal confessor. On the recommendation of the latter, Alfonso was appointed to the see of Cordova by Sixtus IV, 30 April, 1477. Remaining there only four years, he was transferred to the Bishopric of Cuenca, and in 1484, or according to Gams (Series Episcoporum, p. 64) in 1486, to Palencia. At the same time he held successively the office of Grand Chaplain of the Court, Councillor of the Catholic King, and President of the Council of Castile. In the latter capacity he was instrumental in getting pecuniary grants from the crown for Columbus. During the years 1487 and 1488 he obtained eight thousand pounds at various times, but he was not a fit agent for such matters. In the absence of the king he exercised his right as President of the Council in giving orders for a payment of three thousand pounds to the discoverer. These duties did not hinder him from repairing many dilapidated churches of his diocese. He built, out of his own revenues, the Dominican convent of St. Vincent Ferrer at Palencia, in 1489. He takes a high rank in the history of Spanish education for completing the Collegium Sancti Gregorii at Valladolid, begun by King Alfonso the Wise (1252-84). Posternity justly calls him the founder of this famous college of his order.

THOS. M. SCHWERTNER.

Alfred, or Alfred, the Great, King of the West-Saxons, b. Wantage, Berkshire, England, 849; d. 879, was the fifth son of Ethelfulw, or Ethelred, King of Wessex, and Osburg, his queen, of the royal house of the Jutes of Wight. When he was four years old, according to a story which has been repeated so frequently that it is generally accepted as true, he was sent by his father to Rome, where he was anointed king by Pope Leo IV. This, however, like many other legends which have crept in about the name of Alfred, is without foundation. Two years later, in 855, Ethelfulw went on a pilgrimage to Rome, taking Alfred with him. This visit, recorded by Asser is accepted as authentic by modern historians. In 868 Ethelfulw died and Wessex was governed by his sons, Ethelbald, Ethelbert, and Ethelred, successively, until 871, when Alfred came to the throne. Nothing is known of his movements during the reigns of Ethelbald and Ethelbert, but Asser, speaking of him during the reign of Ethelred, gives him the title of Secundarius. In 868 he married Ealhswith, daughter of Ethelred, surnamed the Mickle, Ealdorman of the Gainas. The West-Saxons and the Mercians were then engaged in a war against the invading Danes and Alfred took an active part in the struggle. He ascended the throne during the thickest of this conflict, but before the end of the year he succeeded in effecting a peace, probably by paying a sum of money to the invaders. Wessex enjoyed a measure of peace for a few years, but about 875 the Danes renewed their attacks. They were repulsed then, and again in 876 and 877, on which occasion it seems Athelstan pledged a new oath of allegiance. In 878 came the great invasion under Guthrum. For a few months the Danes met with success, but about Easter Alfred established himself at Athelney and later marched to Brixton, gathering new forces on the way. In the battle of Edington (probably the present Edington, in Wiltshire) he defeated the Danes. Guthrum asked for peace and consented to be baptized. It is in connection with this struggle that many of the legends of Alfred have sprung up and been perpetuated—the story of the burnt cakes, the account of his visit to the Danish camp in the guise of a harper, and many others. For fifteen years Alfred's kingdom was at peace, but in 903 the Danes who had been driven out made another onslaught. This war lasted for four years and resulted in the final establishment of Saxon supremacy. These struggles had another result, hardly less important than the freedom from Danish oppression. The successive invasions had cut off from existence most of the individual kingdoms. Alfred made Wessex a rallying point for all the Saxons and by freeing the country of the invaders unwittingly unified England and prepared the way for the eventual supremacy of his successors.

Popular fancy has been busy with other phases of Alfred's career than that which is concerned with his military achievements. He is generally credited with establishing trial by jury, the law of "frankpledge", and many other institutions which were rather the development of national customs of long standing. He is represented as the founder of Oxford, a claim which recent research has disproved. But even the elimination of the legendary from Alfred's history does not in any way diminish his greatness, so much is there of actual, recorded achievement to his credit. His own estimate of what he did for the regeneration of England is modest beside the authentic history of his deeds. He endeavoured, he tells us, to gather all that seemed good in the old English laws, and adds: "I durst not venture much of mine own to set down, for I knew not what should be approved by those who came after us. Not only did he codify and promulgate laws, but he looked, too, to their enforcement, and ingenious devices should be dispensed with for the sake of favour. He devoted his energies to restoring what had been destroyed by the long wars with the invaders. Monasteries were rebuilt and founded, and learned men brought from other lands. He brought Archbishop Plegmund and Bishop Wulfhere from Mercia; Grimbald and John the Old-Saxon from other Teutonic lands; Asser, John Scottus Ereigena and many others. He not only encouraged men of learning, but he laboured himself and gave proof of his own learning. He translated into Anglo-Saxon: "The Consolation of Philosophy" of Boethius, "The History of the World" of Orosius, the "Ecclesiastical History" of Bede, the "Pastoral Rule" and the "Dialogues" of St. Gregory the Great. The "Consolation of Philosophy" he not only translated but adapted, adding much of his own. The "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle", the record of the English race from the earliest time, was improved by him. ROWKES, Editor, Alfred the Great (London, 1899); PLUMMER, Life of Alfred the Great (London, 1902); SCHMID, Die Geister der Angelsachsen in moderner Zeit (1909), has made a very important edition of the "Life of Alfred" by Asser and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. These and the later accounts are by ELYTRA, SIMON OF DURHAM, etc., can be conveniently studied in CONTRIB. ALFRED IN THE CHRONICON (1900). For Alfred's writings see BOWKES, Life of Alfred the Great (Jubilee edition, 1888, 2 vols.). Alfred's Latin works are printed in LUMSDEN'S LEXICON OF THE ANGLO-SAXONS (1808). Alfrida. Saint, virgin and recluse, c. 705. This saint whose name is variously written Erfithritha, Eelfeda, Eelfrithryth, Alfritha, Etheldreda, etc., was a daughter of King Offa of Mercia. According to a late and not very trustworthy legend she was betrothed to St. Ethelbert, King of the East Angles, but when he came to the court of Offa to marry her, he was thereupon expelled by the contrivance of Cynewithreda, Offa's queen. After this Alfrida retired to the marshes of Crowland, where she was built into a cell and lived as a recluse to the end of her days. It is impossible not to suspect the existence of some confusion with Eelfleda, another daughter of Offa, whose husband was also murdered by treachery.

Alfwall, Saint. Bishop of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire; d. 1058. Alfwall, or Ealfwald, is a rather obscure English saint of whom we know little beside the few details preserved by William of Malmesbury (Gest. Pont., Bk. II, § 82). Alfwall had been a monk of Winchester and was consecrated Bishop of Sherborne in 1045, succeeding his own brother Brightwy. He gave great edification by the frugality of his way of life, which was in marked contrast to the riotous banqueting which the example of the Danish monarchs had rendered popular at that epoch. He was very devout to St. Swithin, his old patron of Winchester, and also to St. Cuthbert, to whose shrine at Durham he made a pilgrimage. He died while singing the antiphon of St. Cuthbert. He was, strictly speaking, the last Bishop of Sherborne, for after his death the see of Sherborne was united to that of Ramebury.

Alger of Liége, a learned French priest, b. at Liége, about 1055; d. at Cluny, 1132. He studied at Liége and was appointed Deacon of St. Bartholomew's. About 1100, he was made Canon of the cathedral of St. Lambert, where he remained for twenty years. In 1121, he returned to the Monastery at Cluny, and died there. He was well known as an ecclesiastical writer. A treatise directed against the heresy of Berengarius, "De sacramento corporis et sanguinis Domini" was highly esteemed by Peter of Cluny and Erasmus. He also wrote, "De misericordia et justitia," extracts from the Fathers with brief commentaries on them; a work on Free Will, and one on the "Sacrifice of the Mass." This is contained in the "Collectio Scriptorum Veterum" of Angelo Mai.

Alghero, an Italian diocese comprising twenty-two communes in the province of Sassari, and four in that of Cagliari. An island of Sassari. The city was built by the Doria of Genoa in 1102. In 1105 John, Bishop of Alghero, assisted at the consecration of the Church of the Trinity in Saccargia. After a long period of decadence, the see was renewed and confirmed by Julius II in his Bull of 1503. Pietro Paren, a Genoese, became bishop; he was present at the Lateran Council in 1512, from the first to the seventh session. It contains 20 parishes, 71 secular priests, 94,300 inhabitants.

Cappellani. Numerous Italian missions were established in Algeria; soon after, an apostolic vicar was installed there, who, towards the end of the seventeenth century had under him the pro-vicar of Tunis and the prefect of Tripoli. The episcopal See of Algiers, founded in the second century at Tossium, did not survive the Arabic conquest. It was re-established in 1338 as a suffragan of the Archdiocese of Aix. Mgr. Antoine Adolph Dupuch (d. 1856) was its first bishop until 1845, when he resigned and was succeeded by Mgr. Antoine Pavy (1846-66). On the death of the latter, Algiers became an archdiocese, with two newly-created sees (1867), Oran and Constantine.

Algonquins. The Indians known by this name were probably at one time the most numerous of all the North American tribes. Migrations, inter-marriages, political alliances, wholesale absorption of captives and desertions, however, make it impossible to fix the tribal limits with any degree of exactness; yet the Algonquins may be said to have roamed over the country from what is now Kentucky to Hudson Bay, and from the Atlantic to the Mississippi and perhaps beyond. The Micmacs, Abenakis, Montagnais, Penobscots, Chippewas, Massачusets, Nipissings, Sac, Pottawatomies, and Illinois, the Pequods of Massachusetts, the Mohegans of New York, the Lenapes of Pennsylvania and Delaware, with many other minor tribes, may be classed among them. In common with other Algonquins they have many unmistakable traits in common. John Eliot and Cotton Mather had a very poor idea of them and spoke of their condition as "infinitely barbarous". The early French missionaries gave more flattering accounts of their intellectual power, their poetry, their oratory, their nobility of character.

for suffragans. Mgr. Charles Martial Allemand Lavergie, Bishop of Nancy, became its first archbishop (d. 1893). The Church of Algiers honours in a special manner the memory of several holy confessors of the Order of Our Lady of Mercy for the Redemption of Captives founded in 1232 by St. Peter Nolasco. Among them are St. Peter Armenau (thirteenth century), confessor at Bougie, and St. Raymond Nonnatus (thirteenth century), confessor at Algiers. It cherishes also a particular veneration for the memories of Blessed Raymond Lully who died at Bougie in 1235, and the Venereal Geronimo, buried alive at Algiers in 1568. The Diocese of Algiers (1602), 220,843 inhabitants of European birth (exclusive of the army), 8 first-class; 101 second-class parishes and 25 vicariates, formerly with State subventions. There were also 24 auxiliary priests.

and even their mechanical skill. In his "Indian Tribes of the United States", though referring to somewhat more modern Indians, Drake rather shares the latter view, at least with regard to the Algonquins of Lake Superior. The name Algonquin seemed to be a general designation, and it is not certain that they were united in a confederation at least in one as compact and as permanent as that of the Iroquois, who supplant and crushed them. Whatever union there was had given way before the whites arrived. It is regarded as one of the mistakes of Champlain that he espoused the cause of the Algonquins, whose power was not only waning but who were actually vassals of the Iroquois, and made war against the Iroquois, their enemies; a policy which, besides, threw the Iroquois with the English and resulted in so many bloody wars. In his Preface to the "Jesuit Relations", Thwaites is of the opinion that they have made a larger figure in our history than any other tribe, because through their lands came the heaviest and most aggressive movement of white population, French and English.
but it is now believed that the number was never so great as was at first estimated by the Jesuit fathers and the earliest English colonists. A careful modern estimate is that the Algonquins at no time numbered over 90,000 souls and possibly not over 50,000. But as the actual number of Algonquins now living is in excess of that, it is more than likely that the early missionaries did not exaggerate and that there may have been a quarter of a million of them at one time. Some moderns still claim. The missions among them began with the Micmac tribe of Nova Scotia and the Abenakis (q.v.) of Maine. The work at Tadoussac was contemporaneous with the first attempt at colonization; it extended north as far as Hudson Bay. After the Jesuits were expelled from Canada and France to the Great Lakes on whose shores the Algonquins were found, sometimes living with the Hurons who were kinsmen of the Iroquois. The Chipewas, whom Raymbault and Jogues visited at Sault Ste. Marie in 1641. were Algonquins as were those whom Allouis (q.v.) later gathered together in his famous mission of La Pointe on Lake Superior. The Algonquin language has been more cultivated than any of the other North American tongues. Its sounds are not difficult to catch, its vocabulary is copious and its expressions clear. The early missionaries called it the "Indian court language." It was the most widely used and most learned of all the Indian tongues. "It was spoken, though not exclusively", says Bancroft, "in a territory that extended through sixty degrees of longitude and more than twenty degrees of latitude." This facilitated to some extent the work of the missionaries. Eliot translated the Bible into Algonquin and Father Rasle (q.v.) left an Abenaki Dictionary which is the possession of Harvard University. In recent days, Bishop Baraga (q.v.) of Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, has written a remarkable series of works such as the Ojibway Catechism, prayer book, hymn book, extracts from the Old and New Testament, the Gospels of the year, and a grammar and dictionary. They regarded Manabozho, or the Great Hare, as their ancestor, and the tribe that bore his totem was entitled to the greatest respect. He was the founder and teacher of the nation, the creator of the sun and moon, and the shaper of the earth. He still lives in the Arctic Ocean. The Supreme Spirit they call Moosonee or Manitou, to whom they ascribe some of the attributes of God, but who does not judge or punish evil doing. Bad actions are not considered as committed against him. There is an evil spirit who has to be propitiated, and besides him are many others who bring all temporal misfortunes. Hence the universal superstition, magic, sorcery, and the like. According to one authority the number of Indians of Algonquin stock in 1902 was estimated at about 82,000 souls, of whom 43,000 are in the United States, the remainder being in Canada with the exception of a few refugees in Mexico. benefice, he can support himself fitly for life out of his own fortune. By the title of pension, or stable provision on the pensioner's own fortune to provide for the priest ordained, should he fall into indigence. These three titles do not avail in missionary countries, either because there are no ecclesiastical benefices in such regions, or that personal fortunes are rare, or that there are few willing to bind themselves to support a clerical pension. For this reason, the Congregation of Propaganda, in a celebrated instruction sent to countries dependent on it, permitted bishops to ordain priests under "title of the mission." By this title, the acolyte before receiving the subdeaconship, promises under oath, that, once ordained, he will not enter any religious or community, but that he will live in the diocese under the jurisdiction of the bishop, employing himself in the service of the mission. The cleric so ordained is a charge on the diocese for which he has been ordained, which assures him a respectable support if through infirmity or incapacity he chance to fall into poverty. It should be remarked here that a priest ordained under the title of the mission has a right to his support, even when, through his own fault, he has become unworthy of filling an ecclesiastical position. The Congregation of Propaganda in a response to the Bishop of Norwich, 4 February, 1873, shows clearly that the priest cannot be deprived of his means of support, unless, after repeated warnings, he refuses to amend, and falls into contumacy. Grave offences committed by him such as may even justify his deposition from office, will not warrant the bishop in refusing him means of support. He will, of course, have no right to the pension from the benefice from which he has been deposed, but should be wise to amend, the Church, like a compassionate mother, instead of turning him into the street will supply him with his daily bread, and will endeavour to bring him to a realization of his evil courses and consequent penance.

This obligation of providing for priests ordained under "title of the mission" creates a somewhat heavy burden for dioceses. In these countries, especially the United States and Canada, the bishops have been forced to devise some way of satisfying this demand of their pastoral charge. In virtue of a general instruction of the Congregation of Propaganda, they can grant to the priest or missionary who resigns his parish or mission, on account of infirmity, a pension drawn from the revenues of the parish or mission, to be paid by his successor in it. For a priest to have a claim to such pension, (1) he must have resigned because of infirmity; (2) he must have been ten years in the parish or mission; and (3) the pension must not exceed a third of the revenues of the parish or mission. Moreover, bishops have encouraged among the priests the foundation of Clerical Funds, whose purpose is to afford pecuniary assistance during their life to members who become infirm and incapable of fulfilling an ecclesiastical charge. Priests in good health belonging to the diocese enter into these societies, and the members contribute something every year to the "Clerical Fund." This society is administered by a bureau of which it is customary for the bishop to be the president, and the members are priests chosen by members of the society. The amount disbursed to needy members depends on the contributions received and varies with different places. As fallen priests who have repented cannot be abandoned, the bishops provide for them either by assigning houses of retreat in which they can do penance or by sending them to monasteries, with the watchful care of holy religious they may, by reflecting on the sanctity of their state, cause the grace of ordination to revive.

JOSEPH N. GIGNAC.

Alimony (Lat., alimonica, nutriment, from alere, to nourish), in the common legal sense of the word, is the allowance which by order of the court a husband pays to his separated wife. If she is living separately from him, or if allowance or provision ordered by the court to be paid by her former husband to a divorced woman. There are two kinds of alimony, the one kind, alimony pendente lite, being an allowance to the wife pending a suit between herself and her husband, and the other the allowance or provision after suit has been decided, which is known as permanent alimony. Exclusive jurisdiction of matrimonial causes was in England formerly vested in ecclesiastical courts. These courts, notwithstanding the English common law, by which the property of a wife became on marriage the property of her husband, assigned to a wife who was compelled to live apart from her husband a portion of his income for her maintenance or alimony. Regulating their action by the canon law, these courts confined themselves to two general classes of matrimonial cases: suits for separation (divorce a mensa et toro), and suits to have a marriage dissolved void from the beginning. Alimony pendente lite might be allowed in a suit belonging to either class, but permanent alimony in a suit for separation only. For, being incidental to marriage, alimony was not allowed in a decree declaring a marriage to have been void from the beginning. Non-payment by the husband subjected him to excommunication, a judgment of the ecclesiastical court which the executive department of the civil government enforced through its officer, the sheriff, to whom was issued the writ de excommunication capiendo, reciting that "potestas regia sacrosanctae ecclesiae in querulis suis deesse non debet" (Registram omnium brevium, 65). And so it is said that under the appellation of estovers, collection of alimony was enforced through writ de estoversis habendis. In 1857, jurisdiction in matrimonial cases was taken by statute from the ecclesiastical courts, and the court of divorce and matrimonial causes, with power to grant absolute divorce, was established. In the vast majority of States have matrimonial cases been confined to ecclesiastical courts. The courts in the several states having jurisdiction to award alimony in matrimonial cases and the circumstances under which it may be awarded are to be ascertained from the constitution, the statutes, and the decisions of the courts of each state. By the ancient Roman law there was allowed on behalf of a pupil against an unfaithful tutor or curator a proceeding in which the pupil might obtain what has been termed alimony. In this proceeding it became the tutor's or curator's duty to fix the character and amount of "demere alimenter," and if, remarks CUMIN ("A Manual of Civil Law," 2d ed., London, 1865, 79), "the tutor appeared and falsely alleged that the pupil's means would not allow alimony to be decreed, he would be removed as suspectus and delivered to the Prefectus urbis for punishment." The Civil Law thus furnished a very brief definition of alimony as a claim for support. The term has been used in English literature in the general sense of nourishment. Thus, Jeremy TAYLE refers to the Sacraments being considered "spiritual alimony." See "A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles." H. B. BURKE, Oxford, New York, 1888, s. v. "Alimony." All Hallows College, an institution devoted to the preparation of priests for the missions in English-speaking countries. In the year 1840 a young priest, the Reverend John Hand, who lived with a Vincentian community in Dublin without being bound by their rules, began to take a deep interest in the evangelization of his countrymen in English-speaking lands; and recognizing the homesteads of Catholic Ireland as excellent seed-beds of apostolic workers—as, in a very true sense, petits séminaires—he determined to convert a first six-weeks course there into a college destined exclusively for the education and equipment of missionaries. Such a project in the hands of one so young, unknown, and penniless, seemed chimerical; but Father Hand placed his trust in Heaven and in the traditional generosity of the Irish race. His first step was to go to Rome. There he received from Gregory XVI a Rescript expressing the “fullest approbation of so holy an undertaking.” Upon his return, aided by O’Connell, he obtained from the Corporation of Dublin a lease of a stately mansion on the north side of the city, and with it twenty-six acres of land which in the pre-Reformation days had belonged to the House of All Hallows (All Saints). On the 1st day of November, 1842, with the advice and encouragement of the venerable Archbishop Murray, he formally opened the college and bestowed upon it its present appropriate name. For four years he continued President, directing the studies, establishing the finances, and organizing the work. He made it not only a college, but a university, spending everything he had in solicitudes and labours, especially by the weary work of collecting funds from house to house in the city, and from parish to parish in the country, he died in the spring of 1846, leaving to others the legacy of an ample harvest. A lofty and Celtic ideal had attracted and stimulated Father Hand. He desired All Hallows “to be Apostolic, and to cease to exist, as soon as it ceased to be Apostolic.” He wished the professors to labour without stipend, and the students not only to be taught and boarded, but to receive every collegiate convenience, free of charge. The professors of the college throughout its history have been men of capacity and distinction, and men who have been according to Father Hand’s description “mastered upon the teaching and the training of M. Olier and St. Vincent de Paul. Amongst those who gratuitously gave their services to All Hallows the following deserve special mention: Dr. Bartholomew Woodlock, Dr. Daniel Moirarty, Dr. Michael Flannery, Dr. Eugène O’Connell, Dr. George Conroy, Dr. Lewis Ball, Dr. John Mclavitt, and Dr. Richard Dallat,” all of whom were elevated in course of time to episcopal rank. To these should be added Dr. Thomas Bennet, Provincial of the Carmelites; Dr. Sylvester Barry, now Vicar-General of Sandhurst; Monsignor James O’Brien, Rector of St. John’s College in the University of Sydney; Dr. John McDevitt, author of the “Life of Father Hand”; Father Thomas Potter, and Mr. Henry Bedford, the last two distinguished converts and men of literary eminence. It has been the aim of the directors of All Hallows from the beginning to form missionaries of a practical type, men who would throw themselves with unflagging zeal into the service of the missions of the New World. In furtherance of this aim the studies, discipline, and general spirit of the college have been developed along certain definite lines. In an academic course of seven years three are devoted to physics, mental philosophy, languages, and English literature, the remaining four to Sacred Scripture, history, liturgy, canon law, sacred eloquence, and the science of theology. Throughout the entire period there are classes in elocution and in modern and Gregorian music. Examinations, written and oral, are held twice each year, supplemented by monthly revisions. Prayer, the sacraments, conferences, retreats, and friendly advice are the means used in the formation of character. The students are encouraged to foster and strengthen the spontaneous spirit of piety, which is the heritage of most Irish children. They are also encouraged to develop health and manliness by outdoor and indoor games, and to take an active part in athletic competitions, and long walks. In 1892, in accordance with the wishes of the Irish Episcopate, the Vincentian Fathers undertook the direction of the college, receiving at the same time the co-operation of several of the former professors. Two of these, Dr. Henry O’Loghlen, for a period of a quarter of a century, and Dr. Timothy O’Mahony, Dean for almost an equal period—fill respectively the senior chairs of moral and dogmatic theology. The entire teaching staff consists of fourteen professors, some of them Vincentians, some secular priests, and some laymen. From twenty to thirty students are ordained priests each year on the feast of St. John the Baptist, and sent to various parts of the English-speaking world. For instance, last summer (1905) thirteen were ordained for the Australian mission, one for New Zealand, two for South Africa, seven for different dioceses of the United States, three for Canada, and one for England. The diocesan destination of the missionaries varies each decade with the needs and advances of the Church; but, this fact apart, an easy computation shows that, during an existence of upwards of sixty years, All Hallows has sent about fifteen hundred priests to minister to the Irish in the missions” in the New World. It is worthy of note that this supply of missionaries has been maintained during a period when Ireland herself possessed few educational opportunities, and while her population, under stress of famine and enforced emigration, was dwindling from eight millions to half that number. In the present time about five hundred All-Hallows-trained priests, including two archbishops and twelve bishops, are scattered throughout Great Britain, the British Colonies, the United States, and the Argentine Republic.

All Saints, a feast of the highest rank, celebrated on the first of November, has a vigil and an octave, and giving place to no other feast. It is instituted to honour all the saints, known and unknown, in heaven and on earth, to supply any deficiencies in the faithful's celebration of several feasts during the year. In the early days the Christians were accustomed to solemnize the anniversary of a martyr's death for Christ at the place of martyrdom. In the fourth century, neighbouring dioceses began to interchange feasts, to transfer relics, to divide them, and to join in a common feast; as is shown by the invitation of St. Basil of Cesarea (397) to the bishops of the province of Pontus. Frequently groups of martyrs suffered on the same day, which naturally led to a joint commemoration. In the persecution of Diocletian the number of martyrs was so great that it was impossible to separate any assigned to each. But the Church, feeling that every martyr should be venerated, appointed a common day for all. The first trace of this we find in Antioch on the Sunday after Pentecost. We also find mention of a common day in a sermon of St. Ephrem the Syrian (373), and in the 47th homily of St. John Chrysostom (407). At first only martyrs and St. John the Baptist were honoured by a special day. Other saints were added gradually, and increased in number when a regular process of canonization was established; still, as early as 411 there is in the Chaldean Calendar a “Commemoratio Confessorum” for the Friday after Easter. In the West, Boniface IV, 13 May, 609, or 610, consecrated the Pantheon in Rome to the Blessed Virgin and all the martyrs, ordering an anniversary. Gregory III (731–741) consecrated a chapel in the basilica of St. Peter to all the saints and fixed the anniversary for November. A basilica of the Apostles already existed in Rome, and its dedication was annually remembered on 1 May. Gregory IV (827–844) extended the celebration on 1 November to the entire Church. The vigil seems to have been held as early as the feast itself. The octave was added by Sixtus IV (1471–84).

*All Souls’ Day.—*The commemoration of all the faithful departed is celebrated by the Church on 2 November, or, if this be a Sunday or a feast of the first class, on 3 November. The office of the Dead must be recited by the clergy and all the Masses are to be of Requiem, except one of the current feast, where this is of obligation. The feast of the blessed and the feast is the doctrine that the souls which, on departing from the body, are not perfectly cleansed from venial sins, or have not fully atoned for past transgressions, are debarred from the Beatific Vision, and that the faithful on earth can help them by prayer, almsgiving especially by the presentation of the Mass. In the early days of Christianity the names of the departed brethren were entered in the diptychs. Later, in the sixth century, it was customary in Benedictine monasteries to hold a commemoration of the deceased members at Whitesuntide. In Spain there was such a day on Saturday before Sexagesima or before Pentecost, at the time on St. Isidore (d. 636). In Germany there existed (according to the testimony of Widukind, Abbot of Corvey, c. 980) a time-honoured ceremony of praying to the dead on 1 October. This was accepted and sanctified by the Church. St. Odilo of Cluny (d. 1048) ordered the commemoration of all the faithful departed to be held annually in the monasteries of his congregation. Hence it spread to the other congregations of the Benedictines and among the Carthusians. Of the dioceses, Liège was the first to adopt it under Bishop Notger (d. 1008). It is then found in the martyrology of St. Protadius of Besançon (1053–69). Bishop Ottricus (1120–25) introduced it into Milan for the 15 October. In Spain, Portugal, and Latin America, priests on this day say three Masses. A similar concession for the entire world was asked of Pope Leo XIII. He would not grant the favour but ordered a special Requiem on Sunday, 30 September, 1888. In the Greek Rite this commemoration is held on the eve of theTranslation of the relics of the patron of the diocese.

Allah, the name of God in Arabic. It is a compound word from the article, ‘al, and ilah, divinity, and signifies "the god" par excellence. This form of the divine name is itself a sure proof that ilah was at one time an appellative, common to all the local and tribal gods. Gradually, with the addition of the article, it was restricted to one of them who took precedence of the others; finally, with the triumph of monotheism, He was recognized as the only true God. In one form or another this root ʿilāh occurs in all Semitic languages as a designation of the Divinity; but whether ʿilāh was originally a proper name or non-tribal, or a name of the father of the deity, or a name of a god, there is a much debated question. It is certain, however, that before the time of Mohammed, owing to their contact with Jews and Christians, the Arabs were generally monotheists. The notion of Allah in Arabic theology is substantially the same as that of God among the Jews, and also among the Christians, with the exception of the Trinity, which is positively excluded in the Koran, exil.: "Say God, is one God, the eternal God, the self-existent, you may not see me, nor I see you. There is not any one like unto him." His attributes, denied by the heterodox Mazaïrites, are ninety-nine in number. Each one of them is represented by a bead in the Musulmanic chaplet, while on the one hundredth and larger bead, the name of Allah itself is pronounced. It is preposterous to assert with Curtiss (Ursamitiesche Religion, 119) that the nomadic tribes of Arabia, consider seriously the Oum-el-Gheith, "mother of the rain", as the bride of Allah; and even if the expression were used, such symbolical language would not imply, in the least, the purity of monotheism held by those tribes. (Cf. Revue Biblique, 55, p. 119.) But it be noted that although Allah is an Arabic term, it is used by all Moslems, whatever be their language, as the name of God.

Allahabad, THE DIOCESE OF, suffragan of the Archdiocese of Agra, India, is included between 28° and 30° north lat., and 77° and 83° long. east of Greenwich. It has an area of 150,000 square miles. North and west it is situated between the Closing of Calcutta and Agra, and north and south between the Prefecture-Apostolic of Bettiah and the Himalaya Mountains and Nagpur. The mission dates its origin from 1669, when the Right Rev. Dr. Matheus de Castro, an Indian from Goa by race, and a Brahman by caste, was entrusted by the Propagation of the Gospel with the spiritual care of the kingdom of the Great Mogul. This field of labour was, however, too vast, and the labourers too few. Hence it was that, by a decree of Propaganda, the Prefecture of Tibet and adjoining countries was erected, in 1705, and entrusted to the Capuchin Fathers of the March of Aracer (Marca d'Ancona) Province. The Diocese of Allahabad is an offshoot of that prefecture, and its more or less complete history is as follows: The Vicariate-Apostolic of Patna (now Diocese of Allahabad) when founded was entrusted to the Capuchin Fathers. It was erected in 1645. The first Vicar Apostolic was the Rev. Fr. Anastasius Hartmann, O.M.C., who was nominated by Pope Gregory XVI. His consecration as titular Bishop of Derbe took place in the cathedral of Agra, 13 March, 1846. Dr. Hartmann remained at his post till 16 August, 1849, in which year he was appointed Administrator-Apostolic of Bombay. He took charge of the new office the same year, and held it till 1854, when he was made vicar-apostolic. He ruled over the destinies of the Bombay Mission till June, 1858. When Dr. Athanasius Zuber, O.M.C., who had succeeded Hartmann at Patna in 1849, resigned his office, the latter was nominated a second time Vicar-Apostolic of Patna, 24 January, 1860. The following year the provinces of Oudh were given by the Agra Mission to his vicariate. His death took place at Coorjee (Bankipore), 24 April, 1886. This zealous prelate, who spent ten hard years in organizing the Patna Mission, was born at Hitzkirch, a village in the Rhineland, 7 February, 1815. He entered the Franciscan novitiate at the age of eighteen, and was ordained priest in 1826. As he had taught logic, natural philosophy, and theology for eleven years, he was deeply versed in those sciences and was quite in his element whenever any scientific subject was the topic of conversation. After Dr. Hartmann's death, Father John Baptist of Malegmano became pro-vicar-apostolic. He was succeeded by Father Benedict of Assisi as administrator, in 1867. On 9 February, 1888, Dr. Paul Josi, O.M.C., was elected Bishop of Rhodiopolis and Vicar-Apostolic of Patna. He was consecrated on 1 September, and placed in charge of the See of Allahabad, 24 August, 1881 to the newly-erected Vicariate-Apostolic of the Punjab. Dr. Francis Pesci, O.M.C., was chosen to take his place in the Patna Mission and consecrated on 14 August, 1881. On the establishment of the hierarchy in India by His Holiness Pope Leo XIII, 1 September, 1896, the Vicariate of Patna was con-
Allard, Paul, archiologist and historian, b. at Rouen 15 September, 1841, admitted to the bar and practised law for a short time in his native city, where he became a judge of the civil court. His literary and historical tastes induced him to abandon his profession devoted itself to the study of the history of the Church in the first four centuries. He contributed frequently to the "Revue des Questions Historiques", of which he became editor in 1904, and to various other publications. In 1874 he translated Northcote and Brownlow's "Roma Sotterrana" and made many additions to it, and enriched it with valuable notes. An intimate acquaintance with Giovanni Battista De Rossi and his own studies along various lines, led him to undertake a history of the persecutions suffered by the Christians at the hands of the Roman authorities. The work was planned on very broad lines and executed with a thoroughness that accords with the name of its author. The author was well fitted for the task; his sympathies were Catholic and his reading extensive; he had a minute knowledge of Christian archeology, especially in regard to the Roman Catacomb; he had studied the condition of the Christian slaves, and the history of the Roman emperors and of the Christian Church, and the administrative and constitutional history of Rome. Above all he was well acquainted with the history and spirit of Roman law, and was competent to pronounce judgment on the delicate legal questions involved in the history of the relations between the Christian Church and the Roman State during the era of the persecutions. On this subject his researches have done much to elucidate difficult and debatable points, though his conclusions have not been generally accepted. The main idea of M. Allard's "History of the Persecutions" is that the Christians were unjustly treated by the Roman authorities. He attributes the incompatibility between the spread of Christianity and the permanence of the Roman Empire, though the acceptance of Christianity by the people necessarily implied the final eradication of the old Roman cults and superstitions. The action of the Roman authorities he regards as ill-informed and brutal. Their treatment of the Christians arose from reasons of statesmanship or adherence to traditional policy, but was based entirely on low and unworthy motives. The causes of the persecutions he finds in the blind hatred of the Roman authorities against this "third race", in fanaticism, popular fury, or, as in the case of Maximus and Decius, very largely in private spleen. If any fault can be found with the work of Allard, it is that he appears too ready to accept as contemporary historical sources mere legends and traditions. He followed the example of Le Blant in thinking that most legends and Acts contained some element of truth, and consequently radical in his criticism of the "Acta Martyrum" and of other documents, e.g. the "De Mortibus Persecutorum", of Lactantius, all the assertions of which he seems to accept as testimony of the first order. He leans too strongly to the side of conservatism, and the scientific value of many pages of his work is spoiled by his reluctance to deal unsparingly with dubious and spurious Acts and Passiones. Many instances of this kind might be pointed out, as for example the account of the death of St. Ireneus, the story of Symphorosa, etc. These remarks, however, do not apply to his work on Julian the Apostate, in which he shows more discrimination in the use of his hagiographical material; it is consequently the most valuable of his writings. His principal works are: "Rome souterraine" (Paris, 1874); "Les esclaves Chrétiens depuis les premiers temps de l'Eglise jusqu'à la fin de la domination romaine en occident" (Paris, 1877); "Papa sous les empereurs chrétiens" (Paris, 1879); "Histoire des persécutions pendant les deux premiers siècles" (2d ed., Paris, 1892); "Histoire des persécutions pendant la première moitié du troisième siècle" (Paris, 1881); "La persécution de Dioclétien et le triomphe de l'Eglise" (2 vols., Paris, 1890); "Les chrétiens de l'empire romain" (6 vols., Paris, 1890); "Etudes d'histoire et d'archéologie" (Paris, 1895); "St. Basile" (ibid., 1899); "Julien l'apostat"; 2 vols. Allatius (Alaccio), Leo, a learned Greek of the seventeenth century, b. on the island of Chios in 1586, and d. at Rome, 19 January, 1669. He entered the Greek college at Rome in 1600, spent three years in Lucania with his countryman, Bishop Bernhard Giustiniani, and then returned to Chios where he proved of great assistance to the Latin Bishop, the Antiochans and Patriarch. He received the degree of Doctor of Medicine from the Sapienza, was made Scriptor in the Vatican library, and, later, professor of rhetoric at the Greek College, a position which he held for only two years. Pope Gregory XV sent him to Germany, in 1622, to bring to Rome the famous library of Frederick I., which Maximilian had presented to the Pope in return for the services he had rendered a task which he accomplished in the face of great difficulties. In the death of Gregory XV (1623) Allatius lost his principal patron; but with the support of influential churchmen, he continued his researches.
especially upon the Palatinate manuscripts. Alexander VII made him custodian of the Vatican library in 1661, where he remained till his death. With untiring energy Allatius combined a vast erudition, which he brought to bear on the differences, although in some authorities incline to place him at the head of the Decadent or "Sweet" School of Italian painting. The early works of Correggio are "in style of the Ferrarese School" (Jean Paul Richter); and later he was slightly influenced by Mantegna and Da Vinci. But his mature style is peculiar to himself and the principles of his art prevail in painting and sculpture in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries over all Italy and France. Then there was a School of Correggio, and he had a host of imitators.

Correggio is the most skillful artist since the ancient Greeks in the art of foreshortening; and, indeed, he was master of every technical device in painting, being the first to introduce the rules of aerial perspective. Radiant light floods his pictures and is so delicately graded that it passes subtly into shade with that play of reflections among the shadows which gives transparency in every modulation. This is chiarooscuro. Even in Allegri's earliest works it was prominent, and later he became the acknowledged master of it. His refined feeling made Correggio paint the nude as though a village of ideal beauty; the sensuous in life he made pure and beautiful; earthly pleasures he spiritualized, and gave expression to mental beauty, the very culmination of true Art. His painted pictures are a careful record of a way of life in which he lived and worked partly responsible for this; but his modesty, his retiring disposition, his fondness for solitude, his ideal homelife, his piety, and the fellowship of the Benedictine monks contributed far more to it. Correggio's early works are simple and naïve; later, in some of his church frescoes, he is more conventional; but he always possessed a wondrous grasp of figures in perspective di sotto in su, and gave to them unparalleled movement and grace. He painted angels whose smile was that of happy human love and pictured men in "sublime bliss" and the extremity of great joyousness (Richter).

Among Correggio's greatest works are the noble frescoes in the church of St. Paolo, which rank with the best decorations done in the height of the Renaissance, though consigned to oblivion for two centuries; the frescoes in the cathedral; in the church of St. John; and in the convention of the monks all of them in Parma. On seeing these frescoes Titian exclaimed: "Were I not Titian I should wish to be Correggio." His easel pictures are in every great European gallery. Dresden possesses "The Reading Magdalen," "The Nativity," called "Die heilige Nacht" (the Holy Night), and three Madonnas. In the "Nativity" the light is made to radiate from the Holy Child and illuminate all the other figures and the whole of the picture, a wholly new proceeding in painting and original with Correggio. Concerning the "Reading Magdalen", one of the most popular and most frequently copied pictures in the world, the modern idee among artists is to appropriate it to their own age. Morelli says: "It is most likely a Flemish work. It is painted on copper, and no Italian artist used copper before the close of the sixteenth century. Director Julius Meyer has already pronounced this picture spurious" [cf. Italian Masters in German Galleries] "no doubt." 1833. "Adoring the Infant Christ" (Uffizi) is an exquisite poem of motherhood, full of all that is tender and sweet in human sentiment. Other celebrated masterpieces are "The Marriage of Saint Catherine" (Louvres); "Madonna in Glory" (Munich); "Danae" (Rome); "Madonna del Latte" (St. Peterburg); "Ecce Homo", "Madonna della Cervara," and "Vivant au Panier" (National Gallery); "Madonna and Holy Infant," called "Il Giorno" (Parma); "Noli me tangere," (Madrid); "Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane," (Apeley House, London); and the "Madonna del Coniglio," or "The Zingarella" (Naples). Allegri, Gregorio, a member of the same family which produced the painter Correggio, b. at Rome c. 1580; d. 1652. He was attached to the cathedral at Fermo, as a beneficiary priest, and acted as chorister and composer. The attention of Pope Urban VIII was drawn to him through some of his motets and concerti, and he was appointed, 6 December, 1629, to fill a vacancy among the singers of the Papal Choir, a post which he held until his death. He reached the climax of his fame when he produced his nine-voiced "Misericere" for two choirs, the parts of which are almost entirely written by its execution, in particular upon certain traditional ornaments which give a peculiar, pathetic quality to many passages, but without which it appears to be a piece of almost hopeless insipidity. Allegri's Christian life was in perfect harmony with his artistic occupation; he was, says Prokez, "a model of charity and humility, a father to the congregation, the consolation of captives and the forlorn, a self-sacrificing helper and rescuer of suffering humanity." His published works consist chiefly of two volumes of "Concertini" (1618-19); and two of "Motetti" (1621) all printed by Solchi of Rome. But many of his MSS. are in the archives of St. Peter's, Maria in Vallicella, in the library of the Roman College, and in the collection of the Papal Choir; and the library of the Abbé Santini contained various pieces by him, including "Magnificata," "Improperia," "Lamentazioni," and "Motetti." J. A. VOLKET.

Alleluia.—This liturgical mystic expression is found (a) in the Book of Tobias, xiii, 22; then (b) in the Old Testament, at the time of Moses; and (c) in the New Testament, only in the relation of St. John's vision of Divine service in Heaven as the worship-word of Creation (Apos., xix). In the old Greek version of the Book of Tobias, in the Septuagint Greek translation of the Hebrew psalter, and in the original Greek of the Apocalypse it is not to be found. As the Archangel, in the most ancient tradition, our Latin Vulgate gives it as Alleluia in the Old Testament and in the New. Thus it was given in the earliest Christian liturgies of which we have record. Yet, in place of it, for liturgical use, by way of translation, the English Reformers put the form of words we now find in the Protestant Psalter, and in the Book of Common Prayer. The revisers of the authorized Anglican version of the Bible have used the form Hallelujah in the Apocalypse, xix, 3. To justify this form authors and editors of some recent English Protestant biblical publications have adopted a new Greek form of transcription of the Latin word Alleluia. (See "New Testament in the Original Greek": text revised by Westcott and Hort (Cambridge, 1881), and second edit. of "The Old Testament in Greek According to the Septuagint", by Sweete (1895).

For change of form, compare Smith's Dict. of the Bible (new edit., 1883) and Hastings' Dict. of the Bible (1898-1904).

Alleluia, not Hallelujah, is the traditional Christian and proper English form of transcription. The accent placed as in our liturgical books over u marks its verbal analysis, as that clearly shows in the last line of the Hebrew Psalter: Alleluia. It is thus seen to be composed of: the divine adverb "Allelu" (verb, 557) and the divine pronominal term i.a (77). So, preserving its radical sense and sound, and even the mystical suggestiveness of its construction, it may be literally rendered, "All hail to Him who is!"—taking, "All Hail!" as equivalent to the highest form of the adverbial "Hallelujah." This is the sense in which God said to Moses: "Thus shalt thou say to the children of Israel; Who is hath sent me to you." As such, when was the expression introduced into the Hebrew liturgy?—Besides reasons proper to the text of the Psalter, and those drawn from a purely philological consideration of the word itself, the data of ancient Jewish and Christian tradition all point to the conclusion that it belonged, as a divinely authorized doxology, to the Hebrew liturgy from the beginning. As to when it was first formed, there seems much reason for holding that we have in it man's most ancient expression of devotion and most ancient form of the true believer's primitive credo, primitive doxology, primitive acclamation. That in part would explain the Church's remarkable fondness for its liturgical use. As a rule she uses it wherever joy, consequently triumph, or thanksgiving, is to be emphatically expressed. As to the time of its use, in the Eastern Church it is heard at all seasons of the year; even in Masses for the dead, as it formerly was in the West. There, at present, in the Latin Roman Rite, our own, according to St. Gregory's regulation referred to in his Office, from Easter to Septuagesima it never leaves the Liturgy, except for some passing occasion of mourning or penance, such as Mass and Office for the Dead, in Ferial Masses during Advent, on the feast of the martyred Holy Innocents (unless it fall on a Sunday), and on all vigils which are fast days, if the Mass of the vigil be said. But it is sung on the vigil of Easter (Holy Saturday) and on that of Pentecost, because some of these vigils, in early ages, Mass was said at night, and so was regarded as belonging to the joyous solemnity of the following day. During Easter-time it is the characteristic Paschal note of varying parts of Mass and Office, constantly appearing at the beginning and end, and even in the middle, of psalms, as an instinctive exclamation of ecstatic joy. Certainly hence it thus expressed the Catholic view of its traditional import when noting (in Psalm cvi) that the very sound of the words should be held to signify "a kind of acclamation and a form of ovation which mere grammarians cannot satisfactorily explain; whereas when, in the Old Testament, we have left it untranslated and, in the same way, the Church has taken it into the formulas of her Liturgy"—to which we might add, be the language of her liturgy or of the people who use it at any time or place what it may.

Alleluia in Greek Liturgies.—From the Temple through the Councilum's alleluiaic hymn of thanksgiving, the word passed into the service of the Christian Church, whose liturgical language, like that of the Septuagint and the New Testament, was at first, naturally, Greek. Of course its essential character remained unchanged, but, as an emotional expression of devotion, it was profoundly affected by Christian memories, and by the spirit of the Christian Faith. To its original general significance was thus added a new personal sense as Paschal refrain and, with that, among holy words, a mystical meaning all its own. Even as a form of divine acclaim its force was intensified, the feeling it evoked deepened, the idea suggested widened and elevated, and, above all, purified under the spiritualizing influence of Christian thought. As that thought's supreme expression of thanksgiving, joy, and triumph, "Alleluia" assumed a wider and deeper, a higher and broader meaning and value in the liturgy of the Christian Church in every country of the civilized world. With such supreme Christian significance it appears in the earliest portions of the liturgies of which we have written remains, the so-called "primitiva liturgiae of the East." These may be reduced to four, called respectively, and used ordindly, the "Epistle of the East," of St. Mark, St. James, St. Clement, and St. Chrysostom. The last, now more commonly known as that of Constantinople, is the normal liturgy of the Eastern Churches, used not only by the "Orthodox," or Schismatic, but by the Catholic, or "United," Greeks throughout the world. The Greek Liturgy of St. James is still used by the schismatic Greeks at Jerusalem on his feast day, and in its Syrian recension is the prototype of that of the Maronites who are Catholics. That of St. Mark, apparently the most ancient of all, is very often in verbal agreement with the Coptic Liturgy of St. Cyril and other similar forms, found in the Catholic Church. This liturgy called that of St. Clement, though undoubtedly very ancient, seems to have never been actually used in any Church, so may be here passed over. Now, first glancing through the Liturgy of St. Mark, as presumably the most ancient, we find this rubric, just before the Gospel: "Attend, listen, do not depart; The Prologue of Alleluia."—"The Apostle" is the usual ancient Eastern title for the Epistle, while the "Prologue of Alleluia" would seem to be some prayer recited by the priest before Alleluia was sung by the choir or people. Then, for Alleluiaic anthem, comes the somewhat later insertion known as the Cherubim hymn, before the Consecration: "Let us who mysteries represent the Cherubim, and sing the holy hymn to the quickening Trinity, now lay by all worldly cares, that we may receive the King of Glory invisibly attended by the Angelic orders: Alleluia, Alleluia, Alleluia!" Then, in the next most ancient of these liturgies of the East, known as the Liturgy of St. James, we find the following rubric: "Prieest: Peace be with all. People: And with thy Spirit. Singers: Alleluia!" —Further on, immediately after the Cherubim anthem above noticed, there is the following beautiful invocation before the Consecration: "Pray, then, all who, with keen silenced stand with fear and trembling and ponder naught of itself earthly; for the King of Kings and Lord of Lords, Christ our God, cometh forward to be sacrificed and to be given for food to the faithful; and He is preceded by the Choirs of His Angels with every Dominions and Power, by the many-eved Cherubim and the six-winged Seraphim who covering their faces sing aloud the Hymn: Alleluia, Alleluia, Alleluia!" Finally, in the ancient Greek Liturgy of Constantinople, we find the word used, as acclaiming expression to a kind of chorus, apparently intended to be repeated by the congregation or assistant ministers, etc. The R. who has the paten before thee in the midst of trouble: the Name of the God of Jacob defend thee: R. Save us, O Good Paraclete, who chant to Thee Alleluia. V. Send thee help from the Sanctuary: and strengthen thee out of Sion. R. Save us, O Good Paraclete, who chant to Thee Alleluia. V. Remember all thy offerings: and accept thy burnt offering, O Son of God. R. The Deacon: Attend! The Reader: Alleluia!" The reading of the Apostle being concluded, the rubric gives—"Prieest: Peace be to thee. Reader: Alleluia!" Then, when the catechumen has departed, after the "prayers for the faithful" before the Consecration, we have the Cherubie anthem, with its triple Alleluia for "Holy hymn to the quickening Trinity" as above in the Liturgies of St. Mark and St. James. These extracts will suffice to show that the word from the first has been as it still is used in the liturgies of the East and West in our own day, supreme in Christian acclamation, or lyric cry, before, in the middle, and at the end, of verses and responses, and anthems and hymns. The only difference in regard to it between those of the East and West is that in the former it is still, as it seems at first to have been originally, used only through Lent, and in Offices for the dead, as the Christian cry of victory over sin and death. Thus St. Jerome tells us it was sung at the obsequies of his sister Fabiola. With a kind of holy pride, in his own strong way he writes:—"Sonabant psalmi et aurata temporum reboans in sublime quattuorbat Alleluia." (See Hammond's Ancient Liturgies.)

He made his college course at Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Md., graduating 26 June, 1878, and then entered the seminary there for his theological studies. He was ordained priest 17 December, 1881, and remained at Mount St. Mary's, as a member of the faculty, until early in 1882, when he was made assistant at the cathedral in Boston, and later at Framingham, Mass. In 1884 he returned to Mount St. Mary's to succeed his predecessor as Bishop of Mobile. He was consecrated at Baltimore, Md., 16 May, 1897. In 1889 Georgetown University conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. (Reuss, Biog. Cycle of the Cath. Hierarchy of the U. S.; Catholic Directory, 1896.)

Allen, Frances, the first woman of New England birth to become a nun, b. 13 Nov., 1784, at Sunderland, Vt.; d. 10 Sept., 1819, at Montreal. Her origin, education, and environment were calculated to make her the least likely woman in the United States to take such a step. Her father was the Rev. Dr. James Allen, minister of the Revolution and pioneer of the State of Vermont, and an atheist. He married as his third wife a widow, Frances Montessor; 16 Feb., 1784, and Frances was born 13 Nov., of the same year. After Ethan Allen's death, 12 Feb., 1789, Mrs. Allen, five years later, married Dr. James Penniman. While Dr. Allen, Dr. Penniman was sufficiently averse to religion to exclude every thought of it, as far as possible, from his stepdaughter's mind. Notwithstanding this, her keen and inquiring intellect led to her acquiring such a knowledge of the Catholic religion that when she was twenty-one she asked leave of her parents to go to Montreal ostensibly to learn French, but in reality to become more familiar in a convent school with the belief and practice of Catholics. They consented, but first required her to be baptized by the Rev. Daniel Barber, a Protestant minister of Claremont, New Hampshire. She became a pupil of the Sisters of the Congregation of Notre Dame, at Montreal, in 1807. One day a Sister requested her to place some flowers on the altar, recommending her also to make an act of adoration of the Real Presence of Jesus Christ in the tabernacle. When the young woman attempted to step into the sanctuary she found herself unable to do so. After three futile attempts, she was filled with conviction of the Real Presence, and fell upon her knees in humble adoration.

She was instructed and received baptism, her lack of proper disposition having rendered that conferred by Mr. Barber invalid. At her first Communion she felt within her an unmistakable vocation to the religious life. Her parents promptly withdrew her from the convent and sought by bestowing on the young girl worldly pleasures to oblige her consent to pass with her parents before taking any step in the matter, was at an end, she returned to Montreal and entered the Hôtel-Dieu, making her religious profession in 1810. The convent chapel was thronged, many American friends coming to witness the strange spectacle of Ethan Allen's daughter becoming a Catholic nun. After eleven years of secluded life in religion, Frances Allen died at the Hôtel-Dieu, of lung trouble, 10 Dec., 1819.

Dublin, 1878, 3) that "he was of a turbulent spirit, but a man of hospitality and learning, and a diligent inquirer into antiquities." He belonged to the shifty and unprincipled class of which Thomas Cromwell (q. v.) was leader and mouthpiece, and he closed unworthily the series of Oxford Catholic prelates of Ireland. His successor, George Browne, was a formal apologist and begins the list of the Protestant prelates of the Anglican Church in Ireland.

Allen, WILLIAM, Cardinal; b. England, 1532; d. Rome, 16 Oct., 1594. He was the third son of John Allen, of Rosull, Lancashire, and at the age of fifteen went to Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated B. A. in 1550, and was elected Fellow of his College. In 1554 he proceeded M.A., and two years later was chosen Principal of St. Mary's Hall. For a short time he also held a canonry at York, for he had already determined to embrace the ecclesiastical state. On the accession of Elizabeth, and the re-establishment of Protestantism, Allen was one of those who remained most stanch on the Catholic side, and it is chiefly due to his labours that the Catholic religion was not entirely stamped out in England. Having resigned all his preferences, he left the country in 1561, and sought a refuge in the university town of Louvain. The following year, however, we find him back in England, devoting himself, though not yet in priest's orders, to evangelizing his native county. His success was such that it exceeded his hopes, and he had to flee for safety. For a while he made himself a missionary centre near Oxford, where he had many acquaintances, and later for a time he sought protection with the family of the Duke of Norfolk. In 1565 he was again forced to leave England, this time, as it turned out, for good. He was ordained priest at Mechlin shortly afterwards. The three years Allen spent as a missionary in England had a determining effect on his whole after life. For he found everywhere that the people were not Protestant by choice, but by force of circumstances; and the majority were only too ready, in response to his preaching and missions, to return to Catholicity. He was always convinced that the Protestant wave over the country, due to the action of Elizabeth, could only be temporary, and that the whole future depended on there being a supply of trained clergy and controversialists ready to come into the country whenever Catholicity should be restored. It was to supply this need that he founded the College at Douay since identified with his name. The idea first developed itself in his mind during a pilgrimage to Rome in company with Dr. Vendeville, Regius Professor of Canon Law in the University of Douay, in 1567. No doubt this was one of the thoughts of the city, which was the natural place for his new college; but it was by no means the only one. Douay was a new university, founded by Pope Paul IV, under the patronage of King Philip of Spain (in whose dominions it then was), for the special object of combating the errors of the Reformation; and, what is still more to the purpose, it was already under Oxford influences. The first chancellor, Richard Smith, was an Oxford man, as were several of the most influential members of the university at the time when Allen began. It was his ambition to perpetuate Oxford influences and traditions, and to make his new college practically a continuation of Catholic Oxford. He was himself made in a hired house on Michaelmas Day, 1568. The means of support included, besides Allen's private income, and other voluntary donations, a yearly pension of 200 ducats from the King of Spain, and later on one of 100 gold crowns a month from the King of France. The number of students who were received than the income warranted, a course rendered necessary by the urgent state of Catholic affairs, which Allen met in the spirit of faith; and in the long run, means were never wanting. The names of Thomas Stapleton, Richard Bristowe, Gregory Martin, Morgan Philips, and others are still well known to English Catholics, and are themselves a sufficient record of the ability of Allen's early companions, and of the work done at the college. Allen had the power of instilling his spirit into his followers. They lived together without written rule, but in perfect mutual harmony, working for the common cause. From the day the Douay Bible (q. v.) was published in 1582, when the college was at Rheims; and the Old Testament, though completed at the same time, was delayed by want of funds. It eventually appeared at Douay, in 1590, two years before the Anglican "Authorized Version."

But the work for which Allen's college is now most famous was not part of his original scheme, but an outgrowth from it. This was the sending over of missionaries to work for the conversion of England in defiance of the law, while the country still remained in the hands of the Protestant party. So no Catholic bishops left, and the Marian clergy were rapidly dying out. Granted that the Protestant rule was to continue indefinitely, the only method to save the Catholics from extinction was to send priests from abroad, and Allen was given "faculties" for all England to impart to them. They had to face a hard and precarious life, often persecution, the rack, or even death. When found out they could be convicted of high treason, for which the punishment was to be hanged, drawn and quartered. More than one hundred and sixty Douay priests are known to have been put to death, the great majority belonging to the secular clergy. Among these latter was Robert, alias Confessor for the Faith. Yet such was the spirit which Allen infused into his students that they rejoiced at the news of each successive martyrdom, and by a special privilege sang a solemn Mass of thanksgiving. And the success of the "Seminary Priests", as they were called, was such that at the time of Elizabeth's long life, the island of England was still at heart more than half Catholic. In 1575 Allen made a second journey to Rome, where he helped Pope Gregory XIII to found another college to send missionaries to England. For this purpose possession was obtained of the ancient English hospital of the city, which was converted into a seminary. Returning to Douay, Allen found a storm gathering against the English and in 1578 they were expelled from the town. The collegians took refuge at the University of Rheims, where they were well received, and continued their work as before, Allen being soon afterwards elected canon of the Cathedral Church. In 1579 he paid his third visit to Rome, being summoned thither in order that he might use his unique personal influence to adjust the disputes between the English and the Cardinal, and to ameliorate his new college there. It was during this visit that he was appointed a member of the Pontifical Commission for the revision of the Vulgate. Up to this point the career of Allen had won the universal admiration and gratitude of English Catholics, for what he himself termed his "scholastical attempts" to convert England. Such was not, however, the case with his political labours to secure the same end, which may be said to have begun about this time, and were far less successful. The famous Bull "Regnans in excelsis" was issued by Pius V in 1570, depositing Queen Elizabeth, and releasing her subjects from their allegiance, but it did not take practical shape till seventeen years later, when preparations were made for the invasion of England by the King of Spain. Allen was then once more in Rome, whither he had been summoned by the Pope after a dangerous illness two years before. He never left the Eternal City again, but he kept in constant communication with his countrymen in England. It had been resolved that the Society of Jesus, to which he was greatly attached, undertook to join in the work of the English mission; and now Allen and Father Parsons became joint leaders of the "Spanish Party" among the English Catholics. The exhortation to take up arms in common with the Spanish invasion, printed in Antwerp, was issued in Allen's name, though believed to have been composed under the direction of Father Parsons. At the request of King Philip, Allen was created cardinal in 1587, and held himself in readiness to go to England immediately, should the invasion prove successful. In estimating the number of those who would be adherents to the scheme, however, Allen and Parsons were both at fault. The large majority of English Catholics, generously forgetting the past, sided with their own nation against the Spanish, and the defeat of the Armada (1588) was a subject of rejoicing to them no less than to their Protestant fellow countrymen. Allen survived the defeat of the Armada six years. To the end of his life he remained firmly convinced that the time was not far distant when England would be Catholic again. During his last years there was an estrangement between him and the Jesuits, through personal relations with Father Sturmius; but this remained unimpaired. In 1589 he co-operated with him in establishing a new English college at Valladolid, in Spain. The same year he was nominated by Philip II Archbishop of Mechlin; but, for some reason which has never been satisfactorily explained, the nomination, although publicly shewn to stand several years, was never confirmed. He continued to reside at the English College, Rome, until his death, 16 October, 1594. He was buried in the chapel of the Holy Trinity adjoining the college. The following is a list of his printed works: "Certain Brief Reasons concerning the Catholic Faith" (Douay, 1582); "The Answer of the English Churches Doctrine touching Purgatory, and Prayers of the Souls Depot" (Antwerp, 1565), re-edited by Father Bridgett in 1886; "A Treatise made in defense of the Lawful Power and Authority of the Preesthode to remit sinnes &c." (1567); "De Sancis Antwerto, 1590; "An Apology for the English Seminaries" (1581); "Apologia Martyr" (1583); "Martyrium R. P. Edmundi Campiani, S.J." (1583); "An Answer to the Libel of English Justice" (Mons, 1584); "The Copie of a Letter written by M. Doctor Allen concerning the Yeeding up of the City of Daventrie, unto his Catholicke Majestie, by Sir William Stanley Knight" (Antwerp, 1587), reprinted by the Chetham Society, 1851; "An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England and Ireland, concerning the present Warres made for the Execution of his Holines Sentence, by the highe and mightie Kings Catholike of Spain, by the Cardinal of England, and by his newly appointed of the sentence and deposition of Elizabeth, the usurper and pretended Queene of England" (1588; reprinted London, 1842). Among the known ancient portraits of Cardinal Allen are the following: Painting formerly in refectionary of the English College, Douay, found after the Revolution in the upper wall of the present church of St. Edmund's; a portrait at Douai Abbey, Woolhampton; copy of same at St. Edmund's College, Old Hall; painting formerly the property of Charles Brown Mostyn, Esq., now at Ushaw College, Durham; painting in archiepiscopal palace, Rheims; and a later one, representing him as an old man, at English College, Rome. Also a Belgian print, reproduced in "History of St. Edmund's College", and various reproductions of the above paintings.

Alls (or Allerstein), August, Jesuit missionary in China, b. in Germany; d. in China, probably about 1777, and consequently after the suppression of the Society. His mathematical and astronomical acquirements recommended him to the imperial court at Pekin, where he won the esteem of the Emperor Kiang-long, who made him a mandarin and chief of the Department of Mathematics, a post he held for many years. He has given the world a census of China for the 25th and 26th years of the reign of Kiang-long. His list and the Chinese translation reached Europe in 1779. The work is precious for the reason that the Tartar conquerors objected to census-taking, or at least to census-publication, lest the Chinese might recognize their strength and grow restless. Another element of its value is that it confirms all the calculations of one of his predecessors, Father Ariot (q. v.), and affords a proof of the progressive increase of the Chinese population. In the 25th year he found 196,537,977 souls, and in the following year 198,214,924. It is said to be found in "Description Générale de la Chine", p. 283.

Allies, Thomas William, an English writer b. 12 February, 1813; d. 17 June, 1903. He was one in whom the poetical vein was tenderly blended with the philosopher's wisdom. His musings as a boy were uttered in poetry; conobar scribere et versus erat. From a very early age he loved books more than men, or rather than men; he seemed to converse rather than to deal with them. Circumstances, which fashion lives, but do not make them, played into his hands. For a long time he was an only child; at fourteen he went to Eton, and at sixteen was the first to win the Newcastle Scholarship. His lonely boyhood, 16.35.34.12.12.12.12.12, and the lack of early companions tended to make him serious. He was born at Midsomer Norton, Somersetshire, England. His father, the Rev. Thomas Allies, was at that time curate of Henbury in Worcestershire, later Rector of Wormington, some twelve miles from Cheltenham. His mother, who died a week after his birth, was Frances Elizabeth Fripp, daughter of a Bristol merchant. The first act of father and mother after the birth was to thank God for their little son. The Rev. Thomas Allies married again, his second wife being Caroline Hillhouse, who took little “Tom” to her heart and loved him as one of her own children. He received his first lessons at the Bristol Grammar School and began to study hard. Among his schoolmates was recorded: “A Prize Essay, given by Sir John Cox Hippsley, Baronet, to Thomas William Allies, aged 12 years, and by him delivered before the Mayor and Corporation of Bristol, September 28th, 1825.” In 1827, at his own request, he went to Eton, though in after years he used to regret his early advent at that school. He was only too well aware of the difficulties of coping with his contemporaries, but at no period of his life could his mind have been young. There is a certain maturity about even his youthful poetry. At Eton he was in the house of the Rev. Edward Coleridge, who always remained his devoted friend. From Eton he proceeded to Oxford, taking his M.A. degree in 1832. Wadham was his college. His classical mind learnt classical speech at Eton and Oxford, for no writing of English or of any other spoken tongue can be acquired without a deep study of the ancients. Mr. Allies’s Latin prose has probably not been surpassed. He was not called upon to write, as some were, in Greek, regularly by lecture at the Greek schools of the Colleges and the system of religious inspection of primary schools. He was instrumental in setting up the Training College for Women at Liverpool, which has done magnificent work. Greater, even, was the distinction he won by the work which (he scheme for a Catholic University in Ireland led him to compose. The idea fell through, but the lectures lived, and live on in “The Formation of Christendom,” of which Cardinal Vaughan said, “It is one of the noblest historical works I have ever read.” The Poor School Committee and “The Formation of Christendom” ran on parallel lines in his life, each representing a period of some thirty odd years. Beginning in 1853, his connexion with the Poor School Committee ended in 1890, when he retired on his full pension of £400. The opus magnum similarly ran over a lifetime, from 1861 to 1895, when the closing volume on “The Monastic Life” of his massive work appeared. The first of his numerous and largely represented by the Oxford Movement, of which he was the last survivor. In 1885 Pope Leo XIII created him a Knight Commander of St. Gregory, and in 1893 conferred upon him the signal favour of the gold medal for merit. He expressed his gratitude to the Pope in a letter composed in Christian Latin. “In primo teste et Lucae epistolae pro summo vitae premio uque ad extremum halitum Verbum Tuum donumque gremio amplitiae.” His great achievements were the books he wrote, for they were an alms to God of his whole being as well as of his substance. He outlived all his contemporaries through the pen of Mary H. Allies is in course of preparation. The following is a complete list of his works both before and after his conversion:

Sermons, 1 vol. (1844); The Church of England Cleared from the Charge of Schism (1846); Journal in France (1849); History of the Earliest Settlements of the Brethren of St. Peter, the Source of Jurisdiction and the Centre of Unity (1850); St. Peter, His Name and His Office (1852); The Formation of Christendom, 8 vols. (1861—70), showing the necessary foundation of the Church up to Charlemagne. Some of these volumes have sub-titles, which it has been found wise to retain. Thus, The Christian Church and the Greek Philosophy (vol. III); Church and State (vol. IV); The Holy See and the Holy City (vol. VI); The Holy See and the Holy Church (vol. VII); The Holy See and the Holy State (vol. VIII). Each volume was written in French. Allies’s Apologia pro Vita Sua was published in 1880, and has taken a high place in English Catholic literature. Two volumes entitled Sermons on the Gospels were printed in 1879. They contained, besides the Treatises on St. Peter, nine important essays on the Royal Supremacy and cognate subjects. These volumes and The Journal in France are now out of print. The two volumes on St. Peter have been republished by the Catholic Truth Society, the smaller one at the express desire of Pope Leo XIII, to whom the book is dedicated. A Life's Decision is in the second edition, which contains an important addition. Five volumes of the Forma tion have appeared in the popular edition; the three remain ing volumes will follow at, it is hoped, no distant date. MARY H. ALLIEZ.

His works are: "Aphorismen über den Zusammenhang der heiligen Schriften Alten und Neuen Testaments, aus der Idee des Reiches Gottes" (Ratisbon, 1819); "Häusliche Alterthümer der Hebräer nebst biblicher Geographie" (1821); "Bibliothek der Alterthümer" (Landruth, 1825); "Handschriften der Bibel, in dem Landshutischen Archiv," (in cooperation with Grätz and Haneberg, Landshut, 1843-44); "Uebersetzung der heiligen Schriften Alten und Neuen Testaments, aus der Vulgata, mit Bezug auf den Grundtext, neu übersetzt und mit kurzen Anmerkungen dargestellt, dritte Auflage" (Augsburg, 1833), umgearbeitet." Allocation is a solemn form of address or speech from the throne employed by the Pope on certain occasions. It is delivered only in a secret consistory at which the cardinals alone are present. The term allocatio was used by the ancient Romans for the address made by a commander to his soldiers either before a battle or during it, to animate and encourage them. The term when adopted into ecclesiastical usage retained much of its original significance. An allocation of the Pope often takes the place of a manifesto when a struggle between the Holy See and the secular powers has reached an acute stage. It then usually summarizes the points at issue and details the efforts made by the Holy See to preserve peace. It likewise indicates what the Pope has already conceded and the limit which principle obliges him to put to further concessions. A secret consistory of cardinals, as opposed to a public consistory, is a meeting of papal dignitaries in presence of the Pope to discuss matters of great importance concerning the well-being of the Church. At these secret consistories the Sovereign Pontiff not only creates cardinals, bishops, and legates, but he also discusses with the cardinals grave matters of State arising out of those mixed affairs partly religious, partly civil, in which conflict easily arise between Church and State. In such secret consistories the cardinals have a consultative vote. When the Pope has reached a conclusion on some important matter, he makes his mind known to the cardinals by means of a direct address, or an allocation. Such allocations, though delivered in secret, are usually published for the purpose of making clear the attitude of the Holy See on a given question. They treat generally of matters that affect the whole Church, or of religious troubles in a particular country where ecclesiastical rights are infringed or endangered, or where heretical or immoral doctrines are undermining the faith of the people. Most of the subjects presented to the secret consistory have already been prepared in the consistorial congregation, which is composed of a limited number of cardinals. These conclusions may be accepted or rejected by the Pope as he thinks proper. In matters of statecraft the Pontiff also takes counsel with those most conversant with the subject at issue and with his Secretary of State. His conclusions are embodied in the allocation. Among papal allocutions of later times which attracted widespread attention from the delicacy or delicacy of the matters with which they dealt, may be mentioned those of Pius VII on the French Concordat (1802) and the difficulties created by Napoleon for the Holy See (1808); those of Gregory XVI referring to the troubles with Prussia concerning mixed marriages, and with Russia over the Habsburg crown; those of Pius IX on the relations with the Vatican, the breaking of the Concordat and the consequent separation of Church and State in that country.

Allori, (1) ANIOLO DI COSIMO, called IL BRONZINO, an exceptionally able painter and a poet, b. at Monticello, near Florence, in 1502; d. at Florence in 1572. He was a pupil of Raffaelino del Garbo and at Jacopo de Pontormo's; such an artist as collaborated with assistants, and some of whose unfinished works he completed. Allori, who was the friend of Vasari, became court painter to the Medicean tyrant Cosimo I, Grand Duke of Tuscany. Among his brilliant series of portraits are those of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. A great admirer of Michael Angelo, his work shows that master's grandiose influence. Among his religious, allegorical, and historical paintings the chief is the "Limbo" or "Descent of Christ into Hell" in the Uffizi. For Florentia public buildings Allori executed various works. Some of his most notable paintings in public galleries are "Young Sculptor," "A Letter," "Palazzo Medici," "L'Imprevisto," "La Medici," in the Uffizi; "The Engineer," at the Pitti Palace; "Cosimo I," "Knight of St. Stephen," A Lady," and "Venus, Cupid, Folly, and Time," in the National Gallery in London, the last two painted for Francis I of France. "Christ Appearing to Mary Magdalen," in the Louvre; the "Dead Christ," in the Florence Academy; and "Venus and Cupid," at Buda-Pesth. In the galleries of Vienna and Dresden appear portraits of his patron, Cosimo, accompanied by the Duchess Eleonora. Similar portraits are found at Luca in both the Royal Palace and the Communal Gallery, and in Rome in the palace of the Beccarva. The Duchess is also represented at the Uffizi.

alla, Claude, one of the most famous of the early Jesuit missionaries and explorers of what is now the western part of the United States. He was born in 1562; d. in 1689, near the St. John's River, in the present State of Indiana. Siena calls Alla "the founder of Catholicity in the West". He was a predecessor and subsequently a co-labourer of Marquette, and there is a book still extant containing prayers in Illinois and French, in which an anecdote relates that it was in this book that Alla initiated the custom of singing Mass in the Franciscan Office in the Mission. Alla was a true missionary, and his labours bore fruit in many regions. He died in 1689, and is buried in the Paroiss of the Sacred Heart, in the Missionaries' Seminary, at St. Louis, Missouri.

Alma, a Hebrew word signifying a "young woman", unmarried as well as married, and thus distinct from mithilah, "a virgin" (see Hebrew Lexicons). The interest attaches to this word is due to the famous passage of Isaiahs, vii, 14: "the Alma shall conceive", etc. We can only mention some of the various opinions with regard to the meaning of this Alma in verse. She is said to be: (1) the wife of Asahel; (2) the prophetess mentioned in Is., viii, 3; (3) any young married woman, who, on account of the promised victory of Judah, could at some near date call her child Immanuel (God with us); (4) metaphorically, the Chosen People; (5) the Virgin Mother of the Messiah. This last view is the one adopted by St. Matthew, i, 23, and after him by Christian tradition. (See Emmanuel; Messiahs, and other Commentaries on Isaiahs.)

Alma Redemptoris Mater (Kindly Mother of the Redeemer), the opening words of one of the four Antiphons sung at Compline and Lauds, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, at various seasons of the year. This particular Antiphon is assigned to that part of the year occurring between the first Vespers of the first Sunday in Advent and Compline of the 2d of February (on which day it ceases, even if the Feast of the Purification should be transferred from that day). It consists of six hexameter verses in strict prosodial form, followed by versicle, response, and prayer, which vary for the season: usual Christmas Eve (first Vespers of the Nativity), V. Angelus Domini etc., R. Et conceptus etc., with the prayer Gratiam tuam etc.; thenceforward, V. Post partum etc., R. Dei Genitricis, and the prayer Deus qui nutuert etc. The hexameter verses are credited to Hermannus Contractus, and Hermann "the Cripple" (d. 1054), an interesting biographical notice of whom may be found in Duffield, "Latin Hymn Writers", 149-168. It has been translated into English by Father Caswall (Mother of Christ, hear thou thy people's cry); by Cardinal Newman in "The Tracts for the Times", No. 75 (Kindly Mother of the Redeemer), and J. Wallace (Sweet Mother of Our Saviour blest). Caswall's translation is found in the official "Manual of Prayers" (Baltimore), 76. In the Marquee of Bute's "Brevarid, Winter Part", 176 (Maiden! Mother of Him Who redeemed us, thou that abidest), the unrhymed hexameter version is very literal.

The Antiphon must have been very popular in England both before and after its treatment by Chaucer in his "Prioress's Tale", which is based wholly on a legend connected with its recitation by the "Litel Clergeon":

"This litel childde his litel book lerninge, As he sat in the scole at his prymere, He Alma redemptrix herde singe, As children lerned out antrew, or Hermann "the Cripple"; And, as he dorste, he droom hym ner and ner, And herkned ay the wordes and the note, Till he the firste vers coude al by rote."

Professor Skeat, in his "Oxford Chaucer", thought that the Alma Redemptoris was here the sequence (cf. Mone, Lateinische Hymnen, II, 200):

Alma Redemptoris mater
Quem de caulis misit Pater—
but subsequently (cf. Modern Philology, April, 1906, "Chaucer's 'Litel Clergeon'", for an explanation of the error and a good treatment of many questions related to the Antiphon) admitted that the Brevialy Antiphon was referred to by Chaucer.

Almagro, Diego de, the Elder, date and place of birth not satisfactorily established as yet, generally considered a foundling; came to Panama in 1514 with Pedro Arias de Avila (D’Avila), and soon distinguished himself in military expeditions. When Pisarro, upon the return of Andagoya (1522) from his voyage along the western coast of Colombia, conceived the plan of penetrating farther South, Almagro and Hernando de Luque came to his assistance with funds, and a partnership was formed (1524), leading to a written document executed in 1526, which document both Almagro and Pizarro certified by their marks, neither of them being able to write. Almagro followed after Pizarro on the latter's tedious voyage of exploration in 1524, rejoining him at the end. In one of his landings Almagro lost an eye by an arrow-shot. He went with Pizarro on the voyage of 1526, during which the first tidings of Peru were obtained on the Ecuadorian coast. He arranged to leave Pizarro in the service of the latter's father, while he himself returned to Panama for stores and reinforcements. In this manner he twice saved Pizarro and his followers from starvation, but incurred the reproach that, while his associate bore the brunt of dangers and hardships, he led an easy life, sailing back and forth between Panama and the South. Almagro took no part in the action at Carabaya and the occupation of Cuzco (1532-33). It was Pizarro who until 1535 took the decisive steps both in America and Spain, and performed all the remarkable achievements that characterized the conquest of Peru. It may be that Pizarro cunningly eliminated Almagro from participation in these important transactions, but the latter submitted to it with little protest until 1534, when the landing of Alvarado on the Ecuadorian coast threatened his prospects as well as those of Pizarro. After Alvarado returned to Guatemala, Almagro pressed his claims to a share in the profits of the conquest of the coast, and settled his dispute between himself and Pizarro at Lima. Pizarro was arrived at in 1535, partly through the efforts of some of the clergy. In consequence of that settlement Almagro undertook his only extended campaign in South America, the ill-conducted and unprofitable journey to Chile. Returning from it in the beginning of 1537, he not only claimed Cuzco as part of his administrative domain, but seized it by force of arms and defeated a body of Spanish troops faithful to Pizarro at Abancay (17 April). And thus began the bloody troubles among the Spaniards that disturbed Peru for nearly twenty years afterwards. Hernando Pizarro (brother of Francisco) was taken prisoner by Almagro, but released. In the course of the hostilities that followed Almagro was defeated at Salinas near Cuzco, on the 26th of April, 1538, and was shortly afterwards executed, while a prisoner. Almagro is usually represented as a more noble character than Pizarro. What can be affirmed is that he was greatly his inferior in personal qualities. More pliant in intercourse, careless and weak in many respects, his whole career in South America was that of an auxiliary who thought himself of his own interests when it was too late. His conduct on the expedition to Chile showed no great talent as a leader, nor any of the traits of a chief with which all the preceding and of the younger, a natural son of the preceding and of an Indian woman from Panama. Francisco Pizarro took considerable interest in young Almagro, keeping him near his person at Lima. The chief followers of the elder Almagro, after his execution, gathered around the young man in a conspiracy to put Pizarro out of the way, which deed was consummated 26 June, 1541, at Lima, the assassins assembling for the purpose at Almagro's house. After Pizarro's death young Almagro was proclaimed Governor of Peru by his party, but Cristóbal Vaca de Castro, the royal delegate, was already in the district. He shut him up in the city, and on 15 April, 1542, the opposing parties met at Chuquía, and after a long and bloody engagement the troops of Almagro were completely defeated, and their young leader taken prisoner. He was shortly afterwards executed at Cuzco. With him the name of Almagro became extinct in Peru.

Almeida, JOHN, a Jesuit missionary, b. in London, of Catholic parents, 1571; d. at Rio Janeiro, 24 September, 1653. His real name was Meade, but it was changed into Almeida, because of his Portuguese surroundings. He was one of the most conspicuous of the disciples of the Venerable Joseph Anchieta, the illustrious missionary of Brazil, almost equaling him in the vigour of his austeritys, the character and the number of his missionary exploits. At the age of ten he was sent, some say by his parents, to Viana in Portugal. But he himself writes that he was taken away, in the absence of his parents, by some one who did not know. He was adopted by the family of Benedict de Rocha, with whom, at the age of seventeen, he went to Brazil to engage in mercantile pursuits. He narrates that on the way out he fell overboard, but was, as he thought, almost miraculously saved. He did not continue in business, as was intended, but began a course of studies in a College of a Society of the Jesuits. At the age of twenty-one he became a Jesuit. After one year of novitiate at Rio Janeiro, he was sent to the city of Santo Spiritu, where he met Anchieta, whom he adopted as his model. His life there and up to an extreme old age reads like a story of the ancient Fathers of the Desert. Whatever time could be spared from his active duties was given up to contemplation, to fasting, watchings, disciplines, and other austerities. The marks impressed on his body almost cause a shudder, yet singularly enough they seem to have had no effect upon his health, though he continued them almost to the day of his death. Hair shirts, iron chains, and metal plates with sharp points almost covered his entire body. He was of medium height, with an unusually clear and strong voice. DIEGO, THE YOUNGER, a natural son of the preceding and of an Indian woman from Panama. Francisco Pizarro took considerable interest in young Almagro, keeping him near his person at Lima. Almeria. The Diocese of, a suffragan see of the Archdiocese of Granada in Spain. It is said to have been founded by Indalecius, a disciple of St. James the Greater, at Urci (Vergium). After a long eclipse, its episcopal honour was restored to this little see by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1489, on the occasion of the conquest of Granada. In the meantime it had acquired the Arabic name of Almeria (Marrak). In 1900 its population, all Catholic, was 230,000. There were 110 parish-priests, 32 vicars, 28 canons and prebendaries, 122 churches, 50 chapels, 3 Dominican convents, and 4 houses of female religious.

Almici, Camillo, a priest of the Congregation of the Oratory, b. 2 November, 1714; d. 30 December, 1779. He became a member of the Congregation of the Oratory at an early age and devoted himself to the study of theology, and of Holy Scripture, chronology, sacred and profane history, antiquities, criticism, diplomacy, and liturgy, and was held in much esteem for his great and wide learning. Amongst his contemporaries he was regarded as an oracle upon many subjects, and was looked upon as one of the most celebrated theologians of his order. Of the many works he wrote, the principal are:—"Riflessioni sì di un libro di G. Febronio" (Lucca, 1766); "Critica contro le opere del pericoloso Voltaire" (Brescia, 1770); "Disertazione sopra i Martiri della Chiesa cattolica" (Brescia, 1765) 2 vols.; "Lettera sulla vita e le scritti del P. Sarpi" (1765). The last named is a critical examination of Sarpi’s unreliable history of the Council of Trent.

Almond, John, Cistercian, Confessor of the Faith; d. in Hull Castle, 18 April, 1565. His name has been included in the supplementary process of the English Martyrs, and his case is of special interest as an example of the sufferings endured in the Elizabethan prisons. He came from Cheshire, and had been a monk in the time of Henry VIII; but the name of his abbey has not been identified, nor his fate determined, and after his imprisonment. The long-drawn sufferings, however, amid which he closed his days are set forth in a relation printed by Foley. From this we see that the courageous, patient old priest, after many sufferings in prison, was left in extreme age to pine away under a neglect that was revolting.

Almond, John, Venerable, English priest and martyr, b. about 1577; d. at Tyburn, 5 December, 1612. He passed his childhood at Allerton near Liverpool, where he was born, and at Much-Woldon. His boyhood and early manhood were spent in Ireland, until he went to the English College, Rome, at the age of twenty. He concluded his term there brilliantly by giving the “Grand Act”—a public defence of theses which cover the whole course of philosophy and theology—and was warmly congratulated by Cardinal Pizzolato. Early in life, from an account of his death he describes him as "a reprob of sin, a good example to follow, of an ingenious and acute understanding, sharp and apprehensive in his concocts and answers, yet complete with modesty, full of courage and ready to suffer for Christ, that suffered for him." He was arrested in the year 1608, and again in 1612. In November of this year seven priests escaped from prison, and this may have sharpened the zeal of the persecutors, Dr. King, Protestant Bishop of London, being especially irritated against Almond. He displayed to the last great acuteness in argument, and died with the Holy Name upon his lips.

Patrick Ryan.

Almond, Oliver, priest and writer, b. in the diocese of Oxford. He is believed by Foley to have been the brother of the martyr, the Ven. John Almond (q. v.); but Gillow has shown that this is probably a mistake. Oliver was educated at the English Colleges at Rome (1582-87) and Valladolid, and was a missionary in England. He presented the English College at Rome with a precious chalice. Some of his correspondence is preserved in the Westminster Archives, and he is conjectured by Gillow to have been the writer of a work entitled, "The Unceasing of Heresies, or the Anatomy of Protestantism, written and composed by O. A." (Louvain) 1622, 2vo.

Alms and Almsgiving (Gr. θησαυρός, "pity," "mercy"); any material favour done to assist the needy and poor, and promulgated by charity. Holy Alms, it is evident, then, that almsgiving implies much more than the transmission of some temporal commodity to the indigent. According to the creed of political economy, every material deed wrought by man to benefit his needy brother is almsgiving. According to the creed of Christianity, almsgiving includes a moral service rendered to the Church's sake. Materially, there is scarcely any difference between these two views; formally, they are essentially different. This is why the inspired writer says: "Blessed is he that considereth the needy and the poor" (Ps. xi, 2)—not he that giveth to the needy and the poor. The obligation of almsgiving is complementary to the right of property "which is not only lawful, but absolutely necessary" (Encycl., Rerum Novarum, tr. Baltimore, 1891, 14). Owners' admission, rich and poor must be found in society. Property enables its possessors to meet their needs. The high labour enables the poor to win their bread, accidents, illness, old age, labour difficulties, plagues, war, etc. frequently interrupt their labours and impoverish them. The responsibility of succouring those thus rendered needy belongs to those who have plenty (St. Thomas, Summa Theol., II-II, Q. xxxii, art. 5, ad 2°). For "it is one thing to have a right to possess money, and another to have a right to use money as one pleases." How must one's possessions be used? The Church replies: Man should not consider his external possessions as his own, but as common to all, so as to share them without difficulty when others are in need. Whence the Apostle says: Command the rich of this world to give with ease. This is a duty not of justice (except in extreme cases), but of Christian charity—a duty not enforced by human law. But the laws and judgments of men must yield to the laws and judgments of Christ the true God, who in many ways urges on His followers the practice of almsgiving to predict his almsgiving. (cf. De Lugo, De Just., Disp. xvi, § 154). Scripture is rich in passages which directly or indirectly emphasize the necessity of contributing towards the welfare of the needy. The history of the Church in Apostolic times shows that the early Christians fully realized the importance of this ob-Igation. Community of goods (Acts, iv, 32), collections in church (Acts, xi, 29 sqq.; I Cor., xvi, 1; Gal., ii, 10), the ministry of deacons and deaconesses were simply the inauguration of that world-wide system of Christian charity which has continued until our own time. St. Cyprian devoted a complete treatise (De Opere et Eleemosynâ, P., L., IV, 601 sqq.). St. Basil recounts how St. Lawrence distributed the treasures of the Church to the poor. Questioned by a pagan governor regarding the treasures which he had promised to transmit, Lawrence pointed to the point, saying: Are they treasures in whom is Christ, in whom is faith. Contrary to the envy of the Arians, St. Ambrose lauds the breaking and selling of sacred vessels for the redemption of captives (De Officis Ministerum, xxvii, xxx, P., L., XVI, 141 sqq.). The need is effectively to prevent the need of almsgiving, the Fathers teach that the wealthy should God's stewards and dispensers, so much so that where they refuse to aid the needy they are guilty of theft (St. Basil, Homil. in illud Luce, No. 7, P. G., XXXI, 278; St. Gregory of Nyssa, De Pauperibus Amandis, P., XLVI, 466; St. Chrysostom, in Ev., Ca. Col., IV, 10, p. 110, c. 8); St. Ambrose, De Nab. lib. unus, P., L., XIV, 747; St. Augustine, in Ps. cvil, P., L., XXXVII, 1922). Discretion in almsgiving is counselled in the Apostolic Constitutions: Alms must not be given to the malicious, the intemperate, or the lazy; lest a premium should be set on vice (Con. Apost., ii, 1-33, 4-6). St. Cyprian asserts that adherents of other religions must not be excluded from a share in Catholic charity (De Opere et Eleemosynâ, c. xxv, P., L., IV, 620). After the Apostolic epoch the teaching of the Church regarding almsgiving did not vary throughout the ages. St. Thomas Aquinas has admirably summarized this teaching during the medieval period (St. Thomas, Summa Theol., II-II, Q. xxxii, art. xiii; De Misericordia; De Beneficentia; De Eleemosynâ). No writer of modern times has so admirably epitomized the position of the Church as Leo XIII (Encyclical, Rerum Novarum, 15 May, 1891). The Pope is as explicit as St. Alphonse in the necessity of almsgiving (St. Thomas, op. cit., II-II, Q. xxxii, art. 3; De Conninck, Disp. xxvii, Dub. 8, No. 70). The conjunction of genuine indigence in the poor and ability to minister relief in the riches of the alms accumulator constitutes the obligation of almsgiving (St. Thomas, op. cit., II-II, Q. xxxii, art. 5, ad 3am). Diversity of actual conditions circumscribing the needy, specify the character of indigence. Where the necessities of life are wanting, or where imminent peril threatens vital interests, indigence is extreme. Where the absence of aid leads to serious reverses, givers or fortifying indigence is serious or pressing. Where the quest for the necessaries of life involves considerable trouble, indigence is common or ordinary. The obligation of almsgiving extends to this triple indigence. Scripture and the Fathers speak indiscriminately of the obligation of helping the needy, and this guilt is not restricting the obligation of almsgiving to any particular species of indigence. Nearly all theologians adopt this view. Nevertheless, the better to determine the character of this obligation in the concrete, it is necessary to consider the character of temporalities in those who hold property. In the first place, property necessarily needs maintenance; the indigent is not dispensable to necessity. Property without which vital interests are not jeopardized is considered superfluous thenceunto. Property required to maintain social prestige, i.e. to live in keeping with one's position in society, to educate offspring, to engage domestics, to entertain, etc., is considered equally indispensable from a social standpoint. Property without which social prestige is not endangered is reputed superfluous thenceunto. Accordingly, there is never any obligation of using the necessaries of life for almsgiving, because well-regulated charity ordinarily obliges everyone to provide the vital interests to those of his neighbour. The only exception of the interests of society are identified with those of a needy member (Müller, Theol. Moralis, II, tr., 1, § 30, 112). To a neighbour in extreme indigence relief must be ministered by using such commodities as are superfluous to vital interests, even though these be charged for (Suárez, De Charitate, Disput. vii, § 4, no. 9). The transgression of this obligation involves a mortal sin. Nevertheless no one, however wealthy, is obliged to take extraordinary measures to assist a neighbour even in direful straits, e.g. a wealthy citizen is not bound to send a dying pauper to a more salubrious clime, or to bear the expense of a difficult surgical operation for the betterment of a pauper (Suárez, loc. cit., § 4, no. 4). Nor is a wealthy individual obliged to imperil his social standing to assist a pauper in extreme need (La Croix, Theol. Moralis, II, no. 201). For charity does not bind anyone to employ extraordinary means in order to safeguard his own precarious situation; St. Alphonse, De Alm, c. 106. Nor, if a neighbour in serious or pressing indigence, alms must be given by using such commodities as are superfluous in relation to present social advantages. Nay, more likely in the more acute forms of such indigence those commodities which may in some measure tend to future social advantages must be taxed to succour this indigence (Suárez, loc. cit., no. 5; De Conninck, loc. cit., no. 125; Viva, in prop. xii, damnatum ab Innoc. XI, no. 8). The transgression of this obligation likewise involves a grievous sin, because well-regulated charity obliges one to meet the serious needs of another when he can do so without serious injury to their self-interest (ratio is considered in H. Ap. tr., iv, no. 19). In the ordinary troubles confronting the poor alms must be given from such temporalities only as are superfluous to social requirements. This does not imply an obligation of answering every call, but rather a readiness to meet the obligation of almsgiving out of charity (Suárez, loc. cit., § 5, nos. 7, 10). Theologians are divided into two schools regarding the character of this obligation. Those holding that the obligation is serious seem to espouse a cause in harmony with the teaching of Scripture and the authority of the Fathers (St. Alphonse, op. cit., III, 1, 32; Bouquié, Instruct. Pastoralis Speciales, III, no. 488). At all events, such affluent individuals as always fail to give alms or harshly repel mendicant indiscriminately are unquestionably guilty of grievous sin. Whose is actually obliged to relieve extreme or pressing indigence must give whatever is necessary to ameliorate existing conditions. It is not to the better they can side what must be given as alms to those labouring under ordinary indigence. St. Alphonsus, whose view in this matter is shared by many modern moralists, holds that an outcry corresponding to two per cent of temporalities superfluous to social prestige suffices to secure attention, because it is the spirit of virtue to adopt this method ordinary indigence could easily be remedied. At the same time it is not always practical to reduce problems depending so largely on moral appreciation to a mathematical basis (Lehmkuhl, Theologia Moralis (Specialis), II, ii, no. 609). Furthermore, all either contributing spontaneously to public and private charities, or paying such taxes as are levied by civil legislation to support the indigent satisfy this obligation in some extent (Lehmkuhl, loc. cit., no. 606). Physicians, attorneys, artisans, are bound to render their services to the poor unless provision is made for them at public charge. The remit of such responsibilities the character of the obligation binding thereunto depend on the kind of indigence and the inconvenience which such ministrations impose on physicians, attorneys, or artisans (Lehmkuhl, loc. cit., no. 609). Though the notion of almsgiving eminently to the donation of commodities necessary to lighten human misery, moralists admit that it is sufficient to lend an object whose use alone serves to meet a neighbour’s need (St. Alphonsus, op. cit., III, no. 31; Bouquillon, op. cit., no. 493). Moreover, common sense repudiates almsgiving to those in need simply because they will not labour to escape such need (Ambrose, De Officiis Ministerum, xxx, no. 144). In addition to its innate characteristics, almsgiving should be vested with qualities tending to garner fruitfulness for giver and receiver. Hence, almsgiving should be discreet, so as to reach deserving individuals or families (II Thes., iii, 10; Ecles., xii, 4; prompt, so as to warrant opportunity (Prov., iii, 28); secret and humble (Matt., vi, 2); cheerful (II Cor., ix, 7); abundant (Tob., iv, 9; St. Thomas, Summa Theol., II-II, Q. xxxii, art. 10). The harvest of blessings to be reaped by almsgiving amply suffices to inspire noble-minded Christians “to make unto themselves friends of the Mammon of Justice” (Luke, vi, 30). Nay more, it renders God Himself debtor to those giving alms (Matt., xvi, 40 sqq.). Moreover, almsgiving adds special efficacy to prayer (Tob., iv, 7), tends to appease divine wrath (Heb., xiii, 16); liberates from sin and its punishments (Eccles., xxix), and thus paves the way to the gift of faith (Acts, x, 31). Daily experience proves that those lending a helping hand to stay the miseries of the poor frequently prepare the way for the moral reformation of many whose temporal misery pales before their spiritual wretchedness. Finally, almsgiving tends to guard against root of intolerance and injustice often checked by almsgiving. The various phases of almsgiving may be reduced to two chief classes: individual or transitory, and organized or permanent. Such cases of indigence as frequently fall under the eye of sympathetic observers constitute the province of transitory almsgiving. Though charity organizations have multiplied their sphere of usefulness, special cases of indigence, more readily and effectually reached by individual attention, will always abound. Moreover, experience proves that the conduct and conversation of private benefactors frequently dispose their beneficiaries to reform their wayward lives and become useful members of the Church and State. For this reason there will always be a wide field for individual almsgiving. At the same time, many worthy poor people are too sensitive to appeal to private persons, while many undeserving persons assume the role of professional mendicants from which we are all warned. Yet sympathy is easily moved, and whose purse strings are loosened to answer every call. Moreover, how much better to forestall than to relieve indigence. To render the poor self-reliant and self-supporting is the noblest achievement of well-regulated charity. Sound and successful, if society be endowed with enough opportunities for labour, more than almsgiving will facilitate the realization of this lofty object. This is why various organizations have been established to alleviate the different forms of corporal misery. To the Church belongs the credit of taking the initiative in promoting systematic effort for the welfare of the needy. So abundantly have her labours been blessed that her success has evoked the admiration of her sworn enemies (Encyclical, Rerum Novarum, tr., 18). The history of yesterday and the experience of to-day prove that the Church is still the poor man’s friend. Organized charity is the card of the Christian, whether in persons in their private capacity or by the official proceeding of those whose position binds them to seek the temporal well-being of all classes in society. The various corners of the globe are studded with institutions of divers kinds, reared and maintained by the generous souls of private charity. Humble misery in its various stages, from the cradle to the grave, finds therein a haven of consolation and rest, while the prayers of inmates, legion in number, call the blessing of Him who is the Father of the poor, upon the heads of those whose liberality proves that the charity of the brotherhood defies limitation. Though admirable and far-reaching in its influence, privately organized charity is incapable of effectually coping with the divers forms of misery. This is why civil governments shape their legislation to make provision for such subjects as fall in their efforts in the struggle for existence. Various institutions destined to provide for needy citizens of every class are conducted under State patronage. Directors are appointed, attendants installed, visiting and inspection required, reports submitted, and appropriations annually made to meet the exigencies of such institutions. Encouragement and opportunity are not denied those disposed to ambition, self-respect, and many other motive of voluntary action. No less than associated charities inaugurated by the government to promote organized charity. Through all cities, bureaus are established, and officials deputed, to examine the actual condition of mendicants, so as to discriminate between worthy and unworthy appeals. To this end friendly visiting is encouraged. Proselytizing is disencouraged, so much so that in many localities Catholics and non-Catholics join hands in the work of organized charity. Movements along these lines are to be found in England, Scotland, France, Italy, and Canada. Those best qualified to speak authoritatively in this matter are eloquent in the expression of the faithful of both the Catholic and non-Catholic workers, and equally eloquent in summarizing the admirable results attained through this union of forces. These movements represent the culmination of noblest effort to concrete almsgiving in its fulness, so that all persons may share the same in its effects, thereby animating almsgiving with a human, nay, more, a Divine element, tending to ennoble the poor in healing their misery.

Alnoth, Saint, hermit and martyr; died c. 700. He was a little of St. Alban. Heithold said he appeared to possess any proper day. He is mentioned in Joceley’s life of St. Werburgh as a pious hermit at Weeton who bore with great patience the ill-treatment of the bailiff placed over him, and afterwards became a hermit in a very lonely spot, where he was eventually murdered by two robbers. O’Brien says that he was canonised as a martyr, and there was some concourse of pilgrims to his tomb at Stoneware in Hertfordshire.

Alrogi (4 privative and λόγος, “word”; sc. “Deiners of the Word”). St. Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., III, ii, 9) makes a brief reference to persons who denied the manifestation of the Paraclete, and refused, in consequence, to admit the Gospel of St. John, wherein it is announced. He gives the party no name. St. Hippolytus combated such an error both in his Syntagma and in a special work entitled “In Defence of the Gospel of John and the Apocalypse.” These works are lost, but a good share of their contents is believed to have been preserved by St. Ephrem. St. Ephrem (Haer. LXX) gives a long account of the party of heretics who arose after the Catachygrians, Quartodecimans, and others, and who received neither the Gospel of St. John nor his Apocalypse. He calls them Alugoi (deniers of the Word) because, by rejecting the Gospel of St. John, they rejected the Logos which was revealed in that Gospel. Playing on the term, he opposes them, with a touch of sarcasm, that they are well named, “alugoi,” i.e. “without reason.” These heretics would seem to answer to the description of the obscure persons mentioned by St. Irenaeus, and this is in fact the prevalent opinion about them. The Alugoi, accordingly, may be described as a party which arose in Asia Minor towards the end of the second century. They doubtless embodied a radical protest against the abuse which the Montanists made of the promised Paraclete, and of the Paraclete’s outpourings in visions and prophecies. This would explain why they were led to deny the Gospel of St. John, which foretold the coming of the Holy Spirit. Many of them, and no doubt again they refused all credit to the Apocalypse, which, with its description of the Heavenly Jerusalem and of the reign of a thousand years, fed the imagination of the enthusiasts of Phrygia. The Alugoi attributed these two books to Cerinthus. It is not altogether certain that they denied, in addition, the Godhead of the Son and the divine generation of the Holy Spirit. It does, indeed, say that they rejected the Logos preached by St. John, but he is evidently perplexed by their stupidity in attributing to Cerinthus a Gospel which was written against him. For Cerinthus taught that Christ was mere man, whereas John, in this very book, preaches His Godhead. It may, therefore, well be that the Alugoi did not reject the doctrine itself but only the Logos form under which the doctrine was presented in the Gospel. And St. Ephrem seems to imply as much, for, “for,” says they themselves seem to have to explain, “if we were to have received it, it was as of scholars attains not so much to their christology as to the biblical criticism they developed. It was, doubtless, a doctrinal presupposition which impelled them to reject the Gospel of St. John and the Apocalypse. But they endeavoured to maintain their contention by arguments drawn from an examination of the books themselves. The Gospel of St. John contained, they said, what was untrue; according to them it was not in accord with the other Gospels, mixed up the synoptic order of events, and was, moreover, doxical in doctrine. They made still less account of the Apocalypse, which, they claimed, was often unintelligible, not to say purile and foolish. Thus Apropos of Apoc. ii, 18, they asserted that there was no Christian church in Thyatira at the time. This anti-Catholic movement has been closely studied, since the Johannine question was broached in the last century, for further light on the position and authority of the Fourth Gospel in the early church. Alroguus, Saint, b. in the castle of Castiglione, 9 March, 1568; d. 21 June, 1591. At eight he was placed in the court of Francesco de’ Medici in Florence, where he remained for two years, going then to Mantua. At Brescia, when he was twelve, he came under the spiritual guidance of St. Charles Borromeo, and from him received First Communion. In 1581 he went with his father to Spain, and he and his brothers, in favour of James, the son of Philip II. While there he formed the resolution of becoming a Jesuit, though he first thought of joining the Discalced Carmelites. He returned to Italy in 1584 after the death of the Infanta, and after much difficulty in securing his father’s consent, renounced all the observance of the mendicant order. His brother, 2 November, 1585, a proceeding which required the approval of the emperor, was castiglione a fief of the empire. He presented himself to Father Claudius Acquaviva, who was then General of the Society, 25 November, 1585. Before the end of his novitiate, he passed a brilliant public act in philosophy, having made his philosophical and also his mathematical studies before his entrance. He had in fact distinguished himself, when in Spain, by a public examination not only in philosophy, but also in theology, at the University of Alcalá. He made his vows 25 November, 1587. Immediatly afterwards he began his theological studies. Among his professors were Fathers Vasquez and Axior in 1591, when in his fourth year of theology a famine and pestilence broke out in Italy. Though in delicate health, he devoted himself to the care of the sick, but on the 3d March he fell ill and died 21 June, 1591. He was beatified by Gregory XV in 1621 and canonized by Benedict XIII in 1726. His remains are in the church of St. Ignazio in Rome in a magnificent urn of lapis lazuli wreathed with festoons of silver. The altar has for its centrepiece a large marble relief of the Saint by Le Gros.

A and Ω (Alpha and Omega).—SCRIPTURAL.—The first and the last letter of the Greek alphabet, employed from the fourth century as a symbol expressing the confidence of orthodox Christians in the scriptural proofs of Our Lord's divinity. This symbol was suggested by the Apocalypse, where Christ, as well as the Father, is “the First and the Last” (Rev. 1:8; the Alpha and Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end) (cf. xxii. 13; i. 8). Clement of Alexandria speaks of the Word as "the Alpha and the Omega of Whom alone the end becomes beginning, and ends again at the original beginning without any break" (Strom., IV, 25). Tertullian also alludes to Christ as the Alpha and Omega (De Monogamiâ, v), and from Prudentius (Catemerius, ix, 10) we learn that before the fourth century the interpretation of the apocalyptic letters was still the same: "Alpha et Omega cognominatus, ipse fons et clausula, Omnium que sunt, fuerunt, queque post futura sunt." It was, however, in the monuments of early Christianity that the symbol Alpha and Omega had their greatest vogue. The earliest date at which this symbol occurs is in the year 295, in a dated inscription of Rome. In this example, however, it is to be noted that the Omega takes precedence, and that both letters form part of the inscription, thus: "VIRGO MOR(T)VA ES(T) TVS Ω ET. A NYLLINO OON(S)"; (...) died, a virgin Tuscus and Anulinus being consula.

The question whether this symbol in its regular form, A and Ω, was in use before the Council of Nices (325) has not yet been settled definitely. If so, it was of very rare occurrence. In a fresco which dates from the middle of the fourth century in the “great cave” of the catacomb of Prætextatus, A and Ω are found in connection with the monogrammatic cross. The oldest inscription in which the letters occur in their traditional form dates from 364. From this time on they were a favourite symbol of the orthodox Christians (the Arians regarded it with disfavour) and they are found on the monuments in all parts of early Christendom. The apocalyptic letters were represented either (1) alone, or (2) in connection with human or other figures, or (3) with other symbols. Examples of the first class, to which belongs the inscription of 364, are rare. The second class also is very numerous. One of the most interesting example is it a panel of the fifth century door of St. Sabina's where A and Ω are carved on either side of the risen Christ. Monuments of the third class, representing A and Ω in connection with another symbol, usually the monogrammatic cross, are much more common than those of the two former classes. The minuscule form ω is, in nearly all cases, represented, though some examples of Ω occur in the monuments of Africa and Spain. The words “Alpha and Omega” continued in use in the Mozarabic Liturgy; also in the ancient Irish Liturgy, c. g. in the famous Communion-hymn in the Antiphonary of Bangor.

Alpha and Omega.—IN JEWISH THEOLOGY.—When God passed before the face of Moses on Sinai the great Law-giver of Israel called out: “Jehova, Jehovah, kind and merciful God, of long-suffering, and full of goodness and truth” (Ex., xxiii, 6), in the Douay Version, “O the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, patient and of much compassion, and of plenteous kindness.” God’s being is expressed in the Tetragrammaton or truth—Plenitudi veri et boni, מ""ב ימ""א. They are foremost among God’s moral attributes. They are the immediate outcome of His Divine operations. For God is an infinitely pure spirit. His being is Intellect and Will. Truth is the final object of the intellect, and goodness is that of the will. In the Psalter they are praised and invoked by the poet with holy and loving fondness, e. g. Ps., xxiv, 10; xxxix, 11, 12; lvi, 4, 11; lxxiv, 11; lxxv, 15; cxvi, 2. Of the two perfections truth and goodness, the former ranks higher. Truth is the first of all perfections. The Hebrew word for truth is Emeth ואמת. It is composed of three letters: Aleph + Alpha, Mem + Ω, and Mem + Thet. The Aleph and the Mem are the first and the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet as the Alpha and Omega are of the Greek. Thus the term Emeth (truth) begins with the first letter of the alphabet and ends with the last. This led the Jewish sages to find in this word a mystical meaning. The Aleph or the first letter of Emeth (truth) is the beginning of the world. There was no one before Him of whom He could have received the fullness of truth. The Thaw, or last letter, in like manner signifies that God is the last of all things. There will be no one after Him to whom He could bequeath it. Thus Emeth is a sacred word expressing that in God truth dwells absolutely and in plenteity. Emeth, as the Jewish divine truly say, is the signaculum Dei essentia (see Buxtorf's Lexicon). In Yoma 69b., and Sanh. 64a., the following is related: “The men of the great synagogue prayed to God to remove from the earth the Evil Spirit, as the cause of all trouble. Immediately a scorn fell from heaven. All the word Truth written thereon, and thereupon a fiery lion came out of the sanctuary. It was the spirit of idolatry leaving the earth.” “This legend shows”, says Hanina “that the seal of God is truth”. (Jewish Encyclopedia.)

CHRISTIAN USAGE.—The manner of expressing God’s eternity by means of the first and last letters of the alphabet seems to have passed from the synagogue into the Church. In place of the Aleph and Thaw, the Alpha and Omega were substituted. But the substitution of the Greek letters for those of the Hebrew tongue inevitably caused a portion of the meaning and beauty in thus designating God to be lost. The Greek letters Alpha and Omega have no relation to the word Truth. Omega is not the last letter of the word Δύναμις (truth), as Thaw is of the word Emeth. The sacred and mystical word Truth, expressing in Hebrew, through its letters Aleph and Thaw, God's absolute and eternal being, had to be sacrificed. Α and Ω signify an absolute, infinite, or perfect. It is a Jewish saying that the blessing on Israel in Lev., xxvi, 3–13, is complete because it begins with Aleph and ends with Thaw. Jehovah's absolute perfection is expressed in Is., xli, 4; xliv, 6, by the phrase, "I am the first and the last." Plato, "De Legibus," IV, 713, describes God in the same manner: lex τέλευτη τε καὶ μέγα τοῦ διὸν άνάκτορων ἔχει, and quotes this phrase as a παλαιός λόγος. Cf. also Josephus, C. Apion., II, xxiii. The phrase fitsly expresses the idea that God is eternal, the beginning and end of all things. The fourth Gospel, after stating that the "Word was God," says, "and the Word dwelt among us full of grace and truth." Grace stands for goodness. The phrase is identical with Ex., xxxiv, 6, "full of goodness and truth." We have here the two great divine attributes, Truth and Goodness, assigned to Christ in all their fullness. What Moses has said of God, the paintings of the Catacombs of Petrus and Marcellinus, third century. We further find these two letters in frescoes and mosaics of several other instances, in the chapel of St. Felicitas, and in San Marco in Rome; in the world-famed mosaics of Ravenna, in Gallia Placidia, St. Crisologo, St. Vitale. In the course of time A and Ω ceased to be used as the monogram of Christ for church paintings and ornaments. During the last century the letters I. H. S. (see Abbreviations, Ecclesiastical) completely took their place. Recently, however, on tabernacle doors and antependia the older device is again met with.

Alphabet, Christian Use of the. —The Hebrew, Greek, and Latin alphabets have been variously made use of in Christian liturgy. During Holy Week the Hebrew alphabet is sung, each of its letters preceding one of the verses of the Lamentations of Jeremiah at Matins; having here, however, merely a numerical value, they might be replaced by Number One, Number Two, etc. The musical setting is now usually the same in all churches, the most ancient known at present being that of the Romanesque and Gregorian Liturgy. Codex VII, in 3, of the municipal library of Naples (twelfth century) has a melody which varies with the letters; those for verses xvii, xix, and xx having a simple form, those for xvi and xx a more elaborate one; and, lastly, those for verses xviii and xxii, a form which is little more than a lengthening of the preceding. The simple form reappears most frequently in the MSS., particularly in the "Breviariun secundum consuetudinem curie romane", of the thirteenth century. It was probably about this time that the simple form was preferred to the variety which had hitherto existed.

Alphabet of the Letter Formata. —The letter formata, or letters commendatory, took their name from the seals that were attached to them; indeed, Sirmond quotes a Vatican MS. where the word sigillata occurs instead of formata. In these letters, the Greek alphabet is used in place of numerals. In order to prevent fraud or imposture, it was said that the Fathers of the Council of Nicaea had formulated a decree to the effect that the letter must contain such a series of letters as, in addition of their numerical values, would determine the origin of the document. The initials given to those of the Three Divine Persons, H, S, A; of the Pope; of the writer and recipient of the missive; of the city where it was written; lastly, the letter of the cycle, and the word AMHN. Unfortunately, the writers were ill-instructed; a letter formata of the Church of Mets contains an error of addition, nor is this a solitary instance. The early medieval manuscripts of Formularia show that mistakes were frequent, so that in a short time the means of control became to all intents and purposes illusory.

The Alphabet in the Dedication of a Church. —Both Greeks and Latins made use of letters as numerical signs, but on wholly different principles. Alphabets, among the Latins, were of two kinds: the systematic, which have arbitrary values; and the signs used by land-surveyors (agrimensores), which have fixed values. The land-surveyors formed a corporation which was entrusted by public and private authority with the measuring of properties. The tax was levied in accordance with the owner's situation, but the Surveyor's Office, in time to recognize the loss to which it was exposed through false returns, and instituted an official survey and measurement of landed properties, to be carried out by officers appointed for the purpose. Their measurements, however, which were renewed from time to time, inevitably gave rise to claims for revision, which were handed in to the equalizers, who forwarded them to the surveyors who acted as arbitrators. The Roman Liturgy has preserved a rite which it is interesting to compare with the practice of these surveyors. At the dedication of a church the bishop writes two alphabets on the ground, one Greek and the other Latin with the point of his pastoral staff, along two lines of ashes laid in the form of a croc decussata (X). The two alphabets start from the east and stretch towards the west. The Leonine Sacramentary makes no mention of a ceremony which is clearly set forth in the Gregorian Sacramentary. Thereupon the bishop asks from the left-hand eastern corner to write with his staff on the pavement the letters A B C, as far as the right-hand western corner; beginning again in like manner from the right-hand eastern corner, he writes A B C as far as the left-hand western corner of the basilica. At the period mentioned the bishop was at liberty to write either only A B C or the whole alphabet, in Greek and Latin, or twice in Latin. The rite, however, was not in use everywhere; the sacramentary published by Pamellus, the edition of Roccas, and a manuscript consulted by Dom Ménard, make no allusion to it. Moreover, it is not attested at pleasure; when added the Hebrew alphabet to the two others. Attempts have been made to find the origin of this custom in the rite for taking possession of a heathen temple, a rite which the faithful are said to have adopted and altered; but the texts of Varro and Servius allow of no such explanation. It must rather be sought for in the practice of the land surveyors, who used measures of fixed length in making their surveys, marking them, when necessary, with letters to which they gave a special value of their own. These they called casiteriarum, and included the whole Greek and the whole Latin alphabet, the X (decusato) being the most important letter of their system: It is evident, therefore, that the liturgical rite has grown up out of a practice borrowed from the land surveyors, though we cannot say what alterations it may have undergone in passing from that guild to the Church. In course of time the rite lost its meaning, a spiritual signification was attached to it. After the veneration of the tenth century the reason for using the two alphabets was no longer understood; an English Pontifical of the tenth century mistakes the X for the signum Christi. In this way an ancient usage grew by degrees into a rite proscribed to be the expression of a more abstruse symbolism. Nor was it only in this rite for the dedication of a church that the alphabet was cut down to a mere A B C. The same curtailment is to be seen on two vessels used for baptism, both belonging to the ancient African Church. One, which is of terra-cotta, was found at Carthage. Its symbolism (crosses, A) has a special reference to the neophytes. The other, a white marble basin, spherical in shape, was discovered not long ago, in the Basilica of Dermeche, near Carthage. It has four ears, or handles (orellons, ansae), one of which serves as a spout, while the others bear the letters A B C. Both appear to have been employed liturgically in the fifth or sixth century.

The Gnostic Alphabet.—Lastly, the alphabet held an important place in the systems of several Gnostic sects, though the use and meaning given by them remain very difficult to determine. Certain facts, however, of the matter have begun to grow plainer. It seems certain that the sounds of vowels corresponded with those of the gamut. Then, therefore, we meet with vowels arranged in a seemingly meaningless order, the explanation is to be found in substituting the sound for the letter. The W papyrus of Leyden has given us a clue to these melodies, which may have been sung at the celebration of Gnostic mysteries and orgies.

Alphonsus Liguori, Saint, b. at Marianella, near Naples, 27 September, 1696; d. at Nocera de' Pagni, 1 August, 1787. The eighteenth century was not an age remarkable for depth of spiritual life, yet it produced three of the greatest missionaries of the Church, St. Leonard of Port Maurice, St. Paul of the Cross, and St. Alphonsus Liguori. Alphonsus Mary Antony John Cosmas Damian Michael Gaspard de' Liguori was born in his father's country house at Marianella near Naples, on Tuesday, 27 September, 1696. He was baptized two days later in the church of Our Lady of the Virgins, in Naples. The family was an old and noble one, though affairs had not prospered. The St. Alphonsus belonged had become somewhat impoverished. Alphonsus's father, Don Joseph de' Liguori was a naval officer and captain of the Royal Galleys. The Saint's mother was of Spanish descent, and, if there can be little doubt, race is an element in individual character, we may see in Alphonsus's Spanish blood some explanation of the enormous tenacity of purpose which distinguished him from his earliest years. "I know his obstinacy", his father said of him as a young man; "when he once makes up his mind he is inflexible". Not many deities have come down to us of Alphonsus's childhood. He was the eldest of seven children and the hope of his house. The boy was bright and quick beyond his years, and made great progress in all kinds of learning. In addition his father made him practise the harpsichord for three hours a day, and at the age of thirteen he played with the perfection of a virtuoso. Riding, swimming, a skilful musician, an accomplished pianist, and an evening game of cards; he tells us that he was debarred from being a good shot by his bad sight. In early manhood he became very fond of the opera, but only that he might listen to the music, for when the curtain went up he took his glasses off, so as not to see the players distinctly. The Neapolitan stage at this time was in a good state, but the Saint had from his earliest years an ascetic repugnance to theatres, a repugnance which he never lost. The childish fault for which he most reproached himself in after-life was resisting his father too strongly when he was told to take part in a drawing-room play. Alphonsus was not sent to school but was educated by tutors under his father's eye. At the age of sixteen, on 21 January, 1713, he took his degree as Doctor of Laws, although twenty was the age fixed by the statutes. He said himself that he was so small at the time as to be almost buried in his doctor's gown and that he was so fat. Even then after this the boy began his studies for the Bar, and about the age of nineteen practised his profession in the courts. In the eight years of his career as advocate, years crowded with work, he is said never to have lost a case. Even if there be some exaggeration in this, for it is not in an advocate's power always to be on the winning side, the tradition shows that he was extraordinarily able and successful. In fact, despite his youth, he seems at the age of twenty-seven to have been one of the leaders of the Neapolitan Bar.
Alphonse, like so many saints, had an excellent father and a saintly mother. Don Joseph de' Liguori had his faults. He was somewhat worldly and ambitious, at any rate for his son, and was rough tempered when opposed. But he was a man of genuine faith and piety and stainless life, and he meant his son to be the same. Even when taking him into society in order to arrange a good marriage for him, he wished Alphonse to put God first, and every year father and son would make a retreat together in some religious house. Alphonse, assisted by divine grace, did not disappoint his father's care. A pure and modest boyhood passed into a manhood without reproach. A companion, Balthasar Gito, who afterwards became a distinguished judge, was asked in later years if Alphonse had ever shown signs of levity in his youth. He answered emphatically: "Never! It would be a sacrilege to say otherwise." The Saint's confessor declared that he preserved his baptismal innocence till death. Still there was a time of danger. There can be little doubt but that the young Alphonse with his high spirits and strong character was ardently attached to his profession, and on the way to be spoiled by the success and popularity which it brought. About the year 1722, when he was twenty-six years old, he began to go constantly into society, to neglect prayer and the practices of piety which had been an integral part of his life, and to take pleasure in the attention with which he was everywhere received. "Banquets, entertainments, theatres," he wrote later on—"these are the pleasures of the world, but pleasures which are filled with the bitterness of gall and sharp thorns. Believe me who have experienced it, and now weep over it." In all this there was no serious sin, but there was no high sanctity either, and God, Who wished His servant to be a saint and a great saint, was now to make him take the road to Damascus. In 1723 there was a lawsuit in the courts between a Neapolitan nobleman, whose name has not come down to us, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany, in which property valued at 500,000 ducats, that is to say, 500,000, or £100,000, was at stake. Alphonse was one of the leading counsel; we do not know on which side. When the day came the future Saint made a brilliant opening speech and sat down confident of victory. But before he called a witness the opposing counsel said to him in chilling tones: "Your arguments are wasted breath. You have overlooked a document which destroys your whole case." "What document is that?" said Alphonse somewhat piqued. "Let us have it." A piece of evidence was handed to him which he had read and reread many times, but had always overlooked. Contrary to that which he now saw it to have. The poor advocate turned pale. He remained thunder-struck for a moment; then said in a broken voice: "You are right. I have been mistaken. This document gives you the case." In vain those around him tried to move the judge on the bench tried to console him. He was crushed to the earth. He thought his mistake would be ascribed not to oversight but to deliberate deceit. He felt as if his career was ruined, and left the court almost beside himself, saying: "World, I know you now. Courts, you shall never see me more." For three days he refused all food. Then the storm subsided, and he began to see that his humiliation had been sent him by God to break down his pride and weaken him from the world. Confident that some special sacrifice was required of him, though he did not yet know what, he did not return to his profession, but spent his days in prayer, seeking to know God's will. He knew not exactly how long—the answer came. On 28 August, 1723, the young advocate had gone to perform a favourite act of charity by visiting the sick in the Hospital for Incurables. Suddenly he found himself surrounded by a mysterious light; the house seemed to rock, and an interior voice said: "Leave the world and give thyself to Me." This occurred twice. Alphonse left the Hospital and went to the church of the Redemption of Captives. He laid his sword before the statue of Our Lady, and made a solemn resolution to enter the ecclesiastical state, and furthermore to offer himself as a novice to the Fathers of the Oratory. He knew that the trials were before him. His father, already displeased at the failure of two plans for his son's marriage, and exasperated at Alphonse's present neglect of his profession, was likely to offer a strenuous opposition to his leaving the world. So indeed it proved. He had to endure a real persecution for two months. In the end a compromise was arrived at. Don Joseph agreed to allow his son to become a priest, provided he would give up his proposal of joining the Oratory, and would continue to live at home. To this Alphonse by the advice of his confessor, Father Thomas of the Oratory, agreed. Thus was he left free for his new work, the founding of a new religious congregation. On 23 October of the same year, 1723, the Saint put on the clerical dress. In September of the next year he received the tonsure and soon after joined the association of missionary, secular priests called the "Neapolitan Propaganda," membership of which did not entail residence in common. In December, 1724, he received minor orders, and the subdiaconate in September, 1725. On 6 April, 1726, he was ordained deacon, and soon after preached his first sermon. On 21 December of the same year, at the age of thirty-two, he was ordained priest. For six years he laboured in and around Naples, giving missions for the Propaganda and preaching to the lazzaroni of the capital. With the aid of two laymen, Peter Barbarese, a schoolmaster, and Nardone, an old soldier, both of whom he converted from an evil life, he enrolled thousands of lazzaroni in a sort of confraternity called the "Assisi," which exists to this day. Then God called him to his life work.

In April, 1729, the Apostle of China, Matthew Ripa, founded a missionary college in Naples, which became known colloquially as the "Chinese College." A few months later Alphonse left his father's house, and went to live with Ripa, without, however, becoming a member of his society. In his new abode he met a friend of his host's, Father Thomas Falcoia, of the Congregation of the "Pii Operarii" (Pious Workers), and formed with him the great friendship of his life. There was a considerable difference in age between the two men, for Falcoia, born in 1663, was now sixty-six, and Alphonse only thirty-three, but the old priest and the young had kindred souls. Many years before, in Rome, Falcoia had been shown a vision of a new religious family of men and women whose objects and aims should be the perfection of the virtues of Our Lord. He had even tried to form a branch of the Institute by uniting twelve priests in a common life at Tarentum, but the community soon broke up. In 1719, together with a Father Filangieri, also one of the "Pii Operarii", he had refounded a Consistorium of religious women at Scala on the mountains behind Amalfi. But as he drew up a rule for them, formed from that of the Visitatio nuns, he does not seem to have had any clear idea of establishing the new institute of his vision. God, however, intended the new institute to begin with these nuns of Scala. In 1724, some of the latter left the work in Crostarese, born in Naples on 31 October, 1696, and hence almost the same age as the Saint, entered the convent of Scala. She became known in religion as Sister Maria Celeste. In 1725, while still a novice, she had a series of visions in which she saw a new order of nuns. On 20 April 1727, a rule was revealed to Falcoia many years before. Even its Rule was made known to her. She was told to write it down and show it to the director of the convent, that is to Falcoia himself. While affecting to treat the novice with severity and to take no notice of her visions, the director was surprised to find that the Rule which she had written down was a realization of what had been so long in his mind. He submitted the new Rule to a number of theologians, who approved of it, and said it might be adopted in the convent of Scala, provided the community would accept it. But when the question was put to the community, opposition began. Most were in favour of accepting, but the superior objectd and appealed to Filangieri, Falcoia's colleague in establishing the convent, and now, as General of the "Pii Operarii", his superior. Filangieri forbade any change of rule and removed Falcoia from all communication with the latter. At 1729, however, Filangieri died, and on 8 October, 1730, Falcoia was consecrated Bishop of Castellamare. He was now free, subject to the approval of the Bishop of Scala, to act with regard to the convent as he thought best. It happened that Alphonse, ill and overworked, had gone with some companions to Scala in the early summer of 1730. Unable to be idle, he had preached to the goatherds of the mountains with such success that Nicolas Guerriero, Bishop of Scala, begged him to return and give a retreat in his cathedral. Falcoia, hearing of this, begged his friend to give a retreat to the nuns of his Congregation at the same time. He agreed to both requests and set out with his two friends, John Mazzini and Vincent Mannarini, in September, 1730. The result of the retreat to the nuns was that the young priest, who before had been prejudiced by reports in Naples against the proposed new rule, became its firm supporter, and even obtained permission from the church hierarchy for the change. In 1731, the convent unanimously adopted the new Rule, together with a habit of red and blue, the traditional colours of Our Lord's own dress. One branch of the new Institute seen by Falcoia in vision was thus established. The other was the long delay. No doubt Falcoia had for some time hoped that the ardent young priest, who was so devoted to him, might, under his direction, be the founder of the new Order he had at heart. A fresh vision of Sister Maria Celeste seemed to show that such was the will of God. On 3 October, 1731, at the great friary of St. Francis, she saw Our Lord with St. Francis on His right hand and a priest on His left. A voice said "This is he whom I have chosen to be head of My Institute, the Prefect General of a new Congregation of men who shall work for My glory." The priest was Alphonse. Soon after, Falcoia made known to the prefect his desire to perfect his Institute, and establish an order of missionaries at Scala, who should work above all for the neglected goatherds of the mountains. A year of trouble and anxiety followed. The Superior of the Propaganda and even Falcoia's friend, Matthew Ripa, opposed the project with all their might. But Alphonse directed Father Pagano; Father Fiorillo, a great Dominican preacher; Father Manuilio, Provincial of the Jesuits; and Vincent Cutica, Superior of the Vincentians, supported the young priest, and, 9 November, 1732, the "Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer", or as it was called for seventeen years, "of the Most Holy Saviour", was begun in the little hospice of the nuns of Scala. Though St. Alphonse was founder and de facto head of the Institute, its general direction in the beginning, as well as the direction of Alphonse's conscience, was undertaken by the Bishop of Castellamare and it was not till the latter's death that the general chapter was held and the Saint was formally elected Superior General. In fact, in the beginning, the young priest in his humility would not be Superior even of the house, judging one of his companions, John Baptist Donato, better fitted for the post because he had already had some experience of community life in another institute.

The early years, following the founding of the new order, were not promising. Dissensions arose, the Saint's former friend and chief companion, Vincent Mannarini, opposing him and Falcoia in everything. On 1 April, 1733, all the companions of Alphonse except one lay brother, Vitus Curius, abandoned him, and founded the Congregation of the Blessed Sacrament, which, confined to the Kingdom of Naples, was extinguished in 1860 by the Italian Revolution. The dissensions even spread to the nuns, and Sister Maria Celeste herself left Scala and died, after having for some time been disapproved of sanctity, 14 September, 1755. She was declared Venerable 11 August, 1901. Alphonse, however, stood firm; soon other companions arrived, and though Scala itself was given up by the Fathers in 1738, by 1746 the new Congregation had four houses at Nocera de' Pagani, Ciorani, Ilceto (now Deliceto), and Capasso, all in the Kingdom of Naples. In 1749, the Rule and Institute of men were approved by Pope Benedict XIV, and in 1750, the Rule and Institute of the nuns, Alphonse was lawyer, founder, religious superior, bishop, theologian, and mystic, but he was above all a missionary, and true biography of the Saint at the time. Alphonse did not give this due prominence. From 1726 to 1752, first as a member of the Neapolitan "Propaganda", and then as a leader of his own Fathers, he traversed the provinces of Naples for the greater part of each year, giving missions even in the smallest villages and saving many souls. A special feature of his method was the return of the Saint and his companions, after some months, to the scene of their labours to consolidate their work by what was called the "renewal of a mission." After 1752 Alphonse gave fewer missions. His infirmities were increasing, and he was occupied a good deal with his writings. His promotion to the episcopate in 1762 led to a renewal of his missionary activity, but in a slightly different form. The Saint had four houses, but during his lifetime it not only became impossible in the Kingdom of Naples to get any more, but even the barest toleration for those he had could scarcely be obtained. The cause of this was "regalism", the omnipotence of kings even in matters spiritual, which was one of the causes of general discontent and revolt in all the Bourbon States. The immediate author of what was practically a lifelong persecution of the Saint was the Marquis Tanucci, who entered Naples in 1734. Naples had been part of the dominions of Spain since 1303, but in 1708 when Alphonse was twenty-two years old, papal legation by Austria during the war of the Spanish Succession. In 1734, however, it was reconquered by Don Carlos, the young Duke of Parma, great-grandson of Louis XIV, and the independent Bourbon Kingdom of the Two Sicilies was established. With Don Carlos, or as he is generally called, Charles III, from his later title as King of Spain, came the lawyer, Bernard Tanucci, who governed Naples as Prime Minister and Regent for the next forty-two years. This was to be a momentous revolution for Alphonse. Had it happened a few years later, the new Government might have found the Redemptorist Congregation already suppressed or at least in a state of limbo. But Tanucci, who rather showed itself in forbidding new Orders than, with the exception of the Society of Jesus, in suppressing old ones, the Saint might have been free to develop his work in comparative peace. At this, he was refused the royal equestrian to the Brief of Benedict XIV, and State recognition of his Institute as a religious congregation till the day of his death. There were whole years, indeed, in which the Institute seemed on the verge of summary suppression. The suffering which this brought on Alphonse, with his sensitive and high-strung disposition, was very great, besides what was worse, the relaxation of discipline and loss of followers which in the Church itself, Alphonse, however, was unflagging in his efforts with the Court. It may be he was even too anxious, and on one occasion when he was overwhelmed by a fresh refusal, his friend the Marquis Brancone, Minister for Ecclesiastical Affairs and a man of deep piety, said to him gently: "It would seem as if you placed all your trust here below"; on which the Saint recovered his peace of mind. A final attempt to gain the royal approval, which seemed as if at last it had been successful, led to the crowning sorrow of Alphonse's life: the division and suppression of his Congregation which lasted for the remainder of his life. This was in 1780, when Alphonse was eighty-three years old. But, before relating the episode of the "Regolamento", as it is called, we must speak of the period of the Saint's episcopate which intervened.

In the year 1747, King Charles of Naples wished to make Alphonse a Bishop of Palermo, and it was only by the most earnest entreaties that he was able to escape. In 1762, there was no escape and he was constrained by formal obedience to the Pope to accept the Bishopric of St. Agatha of the Goths, a very small Neapolitan diocese lying a few miles off the road from Naples to Cappadocia with 30,000 uninstructed people, 400 mostly indifferent and sometimes scandalous secular clergy, and seventeen more or less relaxed religious houses to look after, in a field so overgrown with weeds that they seemed the only crop, he wept and prayed and spent days and nights in unremitting labor for thirteen years. More to be feared was the remark of the Pope for an equestrian to Benedict XIV: In a riot which took place during the terrible famine that fell upon Southern Italy in 1764, he saved the life of the synod of St. Agatha by offering his own to the mob. He fed the poor, instructed the ignorant, reorganized his seminaries, reformed his convents, created a new spirit in his clergy, banished scandalous noblemen and women of evil life with equal impartiality, brought the study of theology and especially of moral theology into honour, and all the time was begging pope after pope to let him resign his office because he was doing nothing for his diocese. To all his administrative work we must add his considerable literary labors. He prepared a number of books on prayer, his terrible austerities, and a stress of illness which made his life a martyrdom. Eight times during his long life, without counting his last sickness, the Saint received the sacraments of the dying, but the worst of all his illnesses was a terrible attack of typhus or epidemic fever that struck him in 1768 which lasted from May, 1768, to June, 1769, and left him paralyzed to the end of his days. It was this which gave St. Alphonse the bent head which we notice in the portraits of him. So bent was it in the beginning, that the pressure of his chin produced a dangerous wound in the cheek. Although the doctors succeeded in straightening the neck a little, the Saint for the rest of his life had to drink at meals through a tube. He could never have said Mass again had not an Augustinian prior shown him how to support himself on a chair so that with the assistance of an acolyte he could raise the chalice to his lips. In 1769 Clement XIII (1758-69) and Clement XIV (1769-74) obliged Alphonse to remain at his post. In Feb-

Alphonse returned to his little cell at Nocera in July, 1775, to prepare, as he thought, for a speedy and happy death. Twelve years, however, still separated him from his reward, years for the most part not of peace but of greater afflictions than any which had yet befallen him. By 1777, the Saint, in addition to four houses in Naples and one in Sicily, had four others at Scicli, Frosinone, St. Angelo a Cupo-lino, and Beneventum, in the States of the Church. In cases where he was not heeded in Naples, he looked to these houses to maintain the Rule and Institute. In 1780, a crisis arose in which they did this, yet in such a way as to bring division in the Congregation and extreme suffering and disgrace upon its founder. This crisis arose in this way. From the year 1759 two former benefactors of the Congregation, Baron Sarnelli and Francis Maffei, by one of those strange events not uncommon in Naples, had become its bitter enemies, and waged a vendetta against it in the law courts, the Congregation was almost openly supported by the all-powerful Tanucci, and the suppression of the Congregation at last seemed a matter of days, when on 26 October, 1776, Tanucci, who had offended Queen Maria Carolina, suddenly fell from power. Under the government of the Marquis della Sambuco, who, though a great regalast, was a personal friend of the Saint's, there was promise of better times, and in August, 1779, Alphonse's hopes were raised by the publication of a royal decree allowing him to appoint superiors in his Congregation and to have a novitiate and house of studies. The Government throughout had recognized the good effects of his mission, and it wished the missionaries to be secular priests and not a religious order. The Decree of 1779, however, seemed a great step in advance. Alphonse, having got so much, hoped to get a little more, and through his friend, Mgr. Testa, the Grand Almoner, even to have his Rule approved. He did not, as in the past, have an appeal for an equestrian to Clement XIV; but he hoped the king might give an independent san-tion to his Rule, provided he waived all legal right to hold property in common, which he was quite prepared to do. It was all-important to the Fathers to be able to rebut the charge of being an illegal religious congregation, which was one of the chief allegations in the ever-adjurmed and ever-impending scaffold. But Alphonse was not of that stamp. Submission of their Rule to a suspicious and even hostile civil power was a mistake. At all events, it proved disastrous in the result. Alphonse being so old and so infirm—he was eighty-five, crippled, deaf, and nearly blind—his one chance of success was to be published by a dispensation and subordination, and he was betrayed at every turn. His friend the Grand Almoner betrayed him; his two envoys for negotiating with the Grand Almoner, Fathers Major and Cimino, betrayed him, consultants general though they were. His very confessor and vicar-general in the government of his Order, Father Andrea Minetti, joined in the conspiracy. And when the Rule was so altered as to be hardly recognisable, the very vows of religion being abolished. To this altered Rule, or "Regolamento", as it came to be called, the unsuspecting Saint was induced to put his signature. It was approved by the king and forced upon the stupified Congregation by the whole power of the State. A fearful commotion arose. Alphonse himself was not spared. Vague rumours of impending treachery had got about and had been made known to him, but he had refused to believe them. You have founded the Congregation and you have destroyed it", said the Father Minetti. The Saint only wept in silence and tried in vain to devise some means by which his Order might be saved. His best plan would have been to consult the Holy See, but in this he had been forestalled. The Fathers in the Papal States, with too precipitate zeal, in the very beginning denounced the change of Rule to Rome. Pius VI, already deeply displeased with the Neapolitan Government, took the Fathers in his own dominions under his special protection, forbade all change of rule in their houses, and even withdrew them from obedience to the Neapolitan superiors, that is to St. Alphonse, till an inquiry could be held. A long process followed in the Court of Rome, and on 22 September, 1780, a provisional Decree, which on 24 August, 1781, was made absolute, recognized the houses in the Papal States as alone constituting the Redemptorist Congregation. Father Francis de Paula, one of the chief apostles of the Congregation, says, "in place of those", so the brief ran, "who being higher members of the said Congregation have with their followers adopted a new system essentially different from the old, and have deserted the Institute in which they were professed, and have thereby ceased to be members of the Congregation." So the Saint was cut off from his own Order by the Pope who was to declare him "Venerable". In this state of exclusion he lived for seven years more and in it he died. It was only after his death, as he had prophesied, that the Neapolitan Government at last recognized the original Rule, and that the Redemptorist Congregation was restored under one head (1833), so that it was not only during his years at the Bar, but throughout his whole life—a lawyer, who to skilled advocacy and an enormous knowledge of practical detail added a wide and luminous hold of underlying principles. It was this which made him the prince of moral theologians, and gained him, when canonization was within the reach of possibility, the title of "Doctor of the Church". This combination of practical common sense with extraordinary energy in administrative work ought to make Alphonse, if he were better known, particularly attractive to the English-speaking nations, especially as he was born (1753), so that he not only in soul but in body in all respects, was not only during his years at the Bar, but throughout his whole life—a lawyer, who to skilled advocacy and an enormous knowledge of practical detail added a wide and luminous hold of underlying principles. It was this which made him the prince of moral theologians, and gained him, when canonization was within the reach of possibility, the title of "Doctor of the Church". This combination of practical common sense with extraordinary energy in administrative work ought to make Alphonse, if he were better known, particularly attractive to the English-speaking nations, especially as he was born (1753), so that he not only in soul but in body in all respects.

hagiographers may ignore the fact. While the continual intensity of reiterated acts of virtue which we have called driving-power is what really creates sanctity, there is another indispensable quality. The extreme difficulty of the lifelong work of fashioning a saint consists precisely in this, that every great act of virtue that the saint performs goes to strengthen his character, that is, his will. On the other hand, ever since the Fall of Man, the will of man has been his greatest danger. It has a tendency at every moment to deflect, and if it does deflect from the right path, the greater the momentum the more terrible the result. But the saint, if he has a great momentum indeed, and a spoiled saint is often a great villain. To prevent the ship going to pieces on the rocks, it has need of a very responsive rudder, answering to the slightest pressure of Divine guidance. The rudder is humility, which, in the intellect, is a realization of our own unworthiness, and in the will, docility to right guidance. But how was Alphonsus to grow in this so necessary virtue when he was in authority nearly all his life? The answer is that God kept him humble by interior trials. From his earliest years he had an anxious fear about something which passed into his soul. He who ruled and directed others so wisely, had, where his own soul was concerned, to depend on obedience like a little child. To supplement this, God allowed him in the last years of his life to fall into disgrace with the pope, and to find himself deprived of all external authority, even for his eternal salvation. St. Alphonsus does not offer as much directly to the student of mystical theology as do some contemplative saints who have led more retired lives. Unfortunately, he was not obliged by his confessor, in virtue of holy obedience, as St. Teresa was, to write down his states of grace or his meditations in his prayer book. He who ruled and directed others so wisely, did not at all keep a diary of his spiritual state. The prayer he recommended to his Congregation, of which we have beautiful examples in his ascetical works, is affective; the use of short aspirations, petitions, and acts of love, rather than discursive meditation with long reflections. His own prayer was perhaps for the most part what some call “active”, others “ordinary”, contemplation. Of extraordinary passive states, such as rapture, there are not many instances recorded in his life, though there are some. At three different times in his missions, while preaching, a ray of light from a picture of our Lady entered his mind, and he fell into an ecstasy before the people. In old age he was more than once raised in the air when speaking of God. His intercession healed the sick; he read the secrets of hearts, and foretold the future. He fell into a clairvoyant trance at Arienza on 21 September, 1774, and was present in spirit at the death-bed in Rome of Pope Clement XIV.

It was comparatively late in life that Alphonsus became a writer. If we except a few poems published in 1733 (the Saint was born in 1696), his first work, a tiny volume called “Visita a the Blessed Sacrament” only appeared in 1744 or 1745, when he was already sixty years old. Three years later he published the first sketch of his “Moral Theology” in a single quarto volume called “Annotations to Busebaum”, a celebrated Jansen moral theologian. He spent the next few years in revising this work, and in 1753 appeared the first volume of the “Theologia Moralis” in two volumes, dedicated to Benedict XIV, followed in 1755. Nine editions of the “Moral Theology” appeared in the Saint’s lifetime, those of 1748, 1753–55, 1757, 1760, 1763, 1767, 1773, 1779, and 1785, the “Annotations to Busebaum” counting as the first. In the second edition the work received the definite form it has since retained, though in later issues the Saint retracted a number of opinions, corrected minor ones, and worked at the statement of his theory of Equiprobabilism till at last he considered it complete. In addition, he published many editions of compendiums of his larger work, such as the “Homo Apostolici”, made in 1755. The “Moral Theology,” after a historical introduction by the Viennese theologian, a St. B., which was omitted, however, from the eighth and ninth editions, begins with a treatise “De Conscientia”, followed by one “De Legibus”. These form the first book of the work, while the second contains the treatises on Faith, Hope, and Charity. The third book deals with the Ten Commandments, the fourth with the moral and physical duties of judges, advocates, doctors, merchants, and others. The fifth book has two treatises “De Actibus Humani” and “De Peccatis”; the sixth is on the sacraments, the seventh and last on the censures of the Church.

St. Alphonsus as a moral theologian occupies the golden mean between the schools tending either to laxity or to rigour which divided the theological world of his time. When he was preparing for the priesthood in Naples, his masters were of the rigid school, for though the centre of Jansenistic disturbance was in France, the North was free from it, and Rome was as remote as not to feel the ripple of its waves. When the Saint began to hear confessions, however, he soon saw the harm done by rigourism, and for the rest of his life he inclined more to the mild school of the Jesuits, whom he calls “the masters of morals”. St. Alphonsus, however, did not in all things follow their teaching, especially on one point much debated in the schools; namely, whether we may in practice follow an opinion which denies a moral obligation, when the opinion which affirms a moral obligation seems to us to be altogether more probable. This is the great question of “Probabilism”. Alphonsus was not a probabilist in the extreme (in 1749 and 1755) two treatises advocating the right to follow the less probable opinion, in the end decided against that lawfulness, and in case of doubt only allowed freedom from obligation where the opinions for and against the law were equal or nearly equal. He called his system Equiprobabilism. It is true that theologians even of the broadest school are agreed that, when an opinion in favour of the law is so much more probable as to amount practically to moral certainty, the less probable opinion cannot be followed, and some have supposed that St. Alphonsus means more than this by his terminology. According to this view, a choice of different formula from the Jesuit writers, partly because he thought his own terms more exact, and, partly to save his teaching and his Congregation as far as possible from the State persecution which after 1704 had already fallen so heavily on the Society of Jesus, and in 1773 was formally to suppress it. It is a matter for friendly controversy, but it seems there was a real difference, though not as great in practice as is supposed, between the Saint’s later teaching and that current in the Society. Alphonsus was a lawyer, and as a lawyer he attached much importance to the weight of evidence. In a civil action a serious preponderance of evidence gives one side the case. If civil courts could not decide against a defendant on greater probability, but had to wait, as a criminal court must wait, for moral certainty, many actions would never be decided at all. St. Alphonsus likened the conflict between law and liberty to the conflict between civil action and common bandi, although greater probabilities give it a verdict. Pure probabilism likens it to a criminal trial in which the jury must find in favour of liberty (the prisoner at the bar) if any single reasonable doubt whatever remain in its favour. Furthermore, St. Alphonsus was a great theologian, and so attached much weight to intrinsic probability. He was not afraid of making up his mind. “I follow my conscience”, he wrote in 1764, “and when reason persuades me to make little account of moralists,” to follow an opinion in favour of liberty without weighing it, merely because it is held by someone else would have seemed to Alphonse an abdication of the judicial office with which as a confessor he was invested. Still it must in fairness be admitted that all the weight of the case for Alphonse is able to establish its intrinsic probability at its true worth, and the Church herself might be held to have conceded something to pure probabilism by the unprecedented honours she paid to the Saint in her Decree of 22 July, 1831, which allows confessors to follow any of St. Alphonse's own opinions without weighing the reasons on which they rest.

Besides his Moral Theology, the Saint wrote a large number of dogmatic and ascetical works nearly all in the vernacular. The “Glories of Mary”, “The Selva”, “The True Spouse of Christ”, “The Great Means of Prayer”, “The Way of Salvation”, “Opera Dogmatica, or History of the Council of Trent”, “Sermons for all the Sundays in the Year”, are the best known. He was also a poet and musician. His hymns are justly celebrated in Italy. Quite recently, a duet composed by him, between the Soul and God, was found in the British Museum bearing the date 1700 and signed “To the Holy Doctor in correction of error.” Finally, St. Alphonse was a wonderful letter-writer, and the mere salvage of his correspondence amounts to 1,451 letters, filling three large volumes. It is not necessary to notice certain non-Catholic attacks on Alphonse as a patron of lying. St. Alphonse was so scrupulous about truth that when, in 1776, the regalist, Mgr. Filingeri, was made Archbishop of Naples, the Saint would not write to congratulate the new primate, even at the risk of making another powerful enemy for his persecuted Congregation, because he thought he could not honestly say he “was glad to hear of the appointment.” It will be remembered that even as a young man his chief distress at his breakdown in court was the fear that his mistake might be ascribed to deceit. The question as to what does or does not constitute a lie is not an easy one, but it is a subject in itself. Alphonse said nothing in his “Moral Theology” which is not on record. Some teachers who had once taught him were alighted on.

Very few remarks upon his own times occur in the Saint's letters. The eighteenth century was one series of great wars; that of the Spanish, Polish, and Austrian Succession; the Seven Years' War, and the War of American Independence, ending with the stiffest gigantic struggle in the organization and out of the conquests of 1787. Except in 1745, in all of these, down to the first shot fired at Lexington, the English-speaking world was on one side and the Bourbon States, including Naples, on the other. But to all this secular history about the only reference in the Saint's correspondence which has come down to us is a letter in a letter of April, 1744, which speaks of the passage of the Spanish troops who had come to defend Naples against the Austrians. He was more concerned with the spiritual conflict which was going on at the same time. The days were indeed evil. Infidelity and impiety were gaining ground; Voltair and Rousseau were the idolaters of society; and the ancien régime, by undermining religion, its one support, was tettering to its fall. Alphonse was a devoted friend of the Society of Jesus and its long persecution by the Bourbon Courts, ending in its suppression in 1773, filled him with grief. He died on the very eve of the great Revolution which had swept away in vision the woes which the French invasion of 1798 was to bring on Naples.

An interesting series of portraits might be painted of those who played a part in the Saint's history: Charles III and his minister Tanucci; Charles's son Ferdinand, and Ferdinand's strange and unhappy marriage; Maria Carolina; Maria Antoniette; Cardinal Spinelli, Serresi, and Orsini; Popes Benedict XIV, Clement XIII, Clement XIV, and Pius VI, to each of whom Alphonse dedicated a volume of his works. Even the baleful shadow of Voltaire falls across the Saint's life. The Saint's friends and powerful men to whom he once converted, which alas, never took place! Again, we have a friendship of thirty years with the great Venetian publishing house of Remondini, whose letters from the Saint, carefully preserved as became business men, fill a quarto volume. Other personal friends of Alphonse were the Jesuit Fathers de Lattes, Zaccaria, and Nolent. Most notable of all, the Saint's own confessor was the redoubtable Dominican controversialist, P. Vincenzo Patuzzi, while to make up for hard blows we have another Dominican, P. Caputo, President of Alphonse's seminary and a devoted helper in his work of reform. To come to saints, the great Jesuit missionary St. Francis di Geromino took the little Alphonse in his arms, blessed him, and prophesied that he would do great work for God; while a Franciscan, St. John Joseph of the Cross, was well known to Alphonse in later life. Both of them were canonized on the same day as St. Peter of Verona. St. Francis di Geromino (1694-1775) and St. Alphonse, who were altogether contemporaries, seem never to have met on earth, though the founder of the Passionists was a great friend of Alphonse's uncle, Mgr. Cavalleri, himself a great servant of God. Other saints and servants of God were those of Alphonse's own household, the lay brother, St. Gerard Majella, who died in 1755, and Januarius Sarnelli, Cesar Sportelli, Dominc Blauacci, and Maria Celeste, all of whom have been declared "Venerable" by the Church. Blessed Clement Hofbauer joined the Redemptorist Congregation in the aged Saint's lifetime, though Alphonse never saw in the flesh the man whom he knew would be the second founder of his Order. Except for the chances of European war, England and Naples were then in different worlds, but Alphonse may have seen at the side of Don Carlos when he conquered Naples in 1794, an English boy who was to become the last king of Spain to be under fire and was to play a romantic part in history, Prince Charles Edward Stuart. But one may easily overrode a narrow canvas and it is better in so slight a sketch to leave the central figure in solitary relief. If any reader of this article will go to original sources and study the Saint's life at greater length, he will find his labour a fruitful one.

Much of the material for a complete life of St. Alphonse is still in manuscript in the Roman archives of the Redemptorist Congregation and in the archives of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. The publication of all subsequent lives is the Della vita et titolo del venerabile Alfonso Maria Liguori, of Antonio Tannia, one of the great biographers of literature. Tannia was born about 1724, and entered the Redemptorist Congregation in 1746. As he did not die until 1808 (his work appeared in 1887) he was a Redemptorist for over forty years, and an eye-witness of much that he relates. Even where he is not, he may generally be trusted, as he was a Redemptorist, and his work contains a number of minor inaccuracies, however, and is seriously defective in its account of the founding of his Congregation and of the troubles which fell on it in 1796. Tannia, also, through some mental idiosyncrasy, manages to give the misleading impression that St. Alphonse was a failure. There is a somewhat unfaithful translation of Tannia's work, Mémoires sur la vie et la conqregation de l'Alphonse de Liguori (Paris, 1880), which is in four volumes. (Tournai, 1803). The German life, Dligerer, Leben des heiligen Bolchoh und Kirchenlehrers Alphonse Maria de Liguori (1790, 1807), is scholarly. Tannia has also written a life of the Saint, La Vita di Sant' Alphonse Maria de Liguori (Roma, 1880). (Benevente, Saint Alphonse de Liguori (Paris, 1900, 2 vols., 8vo), gives an extremely full and picturesque account of the Saint's life and times. This has recently been translated into English with additions and corrections (Dublin, 2 vols., royal 8vo; DUMONTIER, Les premières Redemptions (Lille, 1886), and P. GAUDE, Consœurs Marie de France (Paris, 1907)). These letters are particularly valuable in supplementing Tannay's. A centenary edition, Lettres de S. Alfonso Maria de'Gugliori (Rome, 1905), was published by P. KUTZ, C.S.B., director of the Roman archives of his Congregation. An English translation in five volumes is included in the 22 vol._ English translation of S. Alfonso Maria's ascetical works (New York). There are many editions of the Saint's Moral Theology; the best and latest is that of P. GAUDE, C.S.B. (Rome, 1906). The Saint's complete discourses have been translated into Latin by P. WALTER, C.S.B., S. Alfonso Maria de'Gugliori Eclogae (New York, 1903, 2 vols., 4to). See also HARRIS, The Balance of Power (1713-93) (London, 1901); COLLETTA, History of the Mendicant Orders, 3 vols., tr. by E. E. KLEIN (Edinburgh, 1858); VON REUMONT, Die Cora von Moddallons (Berlin, 1881, 2 vols.; JOHNSTON, The Napoleonic Empire in South Italy (London, 1869), 2 vols.). Colletta's book gives the best general picture of the time, but is marred by antiquarian bias.

Alphonse Rodrigues (also ALONSO). SAINT, b. at Segovia in Spain, 25 July, 1533; d. at Majorca, 31 October, 1617. On account of the similarity of names he is often confounded with Father Rodriguez the Mendicant. The devotion in his honor which was so eminent for his holiness was never canonized. The Saint was a Jesuit lay-brother who entered the Society at the age of forty. He was the son of a wool merchant who had been reduced to poverty when Alfonso was still young. At the age of twenty-six he married Mary Sances, a woman of his own station in life, and at thirty-one found himself a widower with one surviving child, two others having died previously. From that time he began a life of prayer and mortification, altogether separated from the world around him. On the death of his third child his thoughts turned to a life as a religious. For several years Penitence associations had brought him into contact with the first Jesuits who had come to Spain, Bl. Peter Faber among others, but it was apparently impossible to carry out his purpose of entering the Society as he was without education, having had only an incomplete year in a new college begun at Alcalá by Francis Vazquez. At the age of thirty-nine he attempted to make up this deficiency by following the course at the College of Barcelona, but without success. His austerities had also undermined his health. After considerable delay he was finally admitted into the Society of Jesus as a lay-brother, 31 October, 1573. With the number of members which had not been established in Spain, and Alfonso began his term of probation at Valencia or at Gandia—this point is a subject of dispute—and after six months was sent to the recently-founded college of Majorca, where he remained in the humble position of porter for forty-six years, exercising a marvellous influence on the sanctification not only of the members of the household, but upon great numbers of people who came to the porter's lodge for advice and direction. Among the distinguished Jesuits who came under his influence was St. Peter Claver, who lived with him for some time at Majorca, and who followed his advice in asking for the missions of South America. The bodily mortifications which he imposed on himself were extreme, the scruples and mental agitation to which he was subject were of frequent occurrence, his obedience absolute, and his absorption in spiritual things even while engaged on most distracting enterprises. At the time of his death he was the author of the well known "Life Office of the Immaculate Conception", and the claim is made by Alegambe, Southwell, and even by the Fathers de Backer in their Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus. Apart from the fact that the Brother had not the requisite education for such a task, Father Costurer says positively that the Office he used was taken from an old copy printed out of Spain, and Father Colin asserts that it existed before the Saint's time. It may be admitted, however, that through it he was popularized. He left a considerable number of MSS. after him, some of which have been published as "Obras Espirituales de B. Alonso Rodrigues" (Barcelona, 1615-26, octavo, complete collection, 8 vols., in quarto). They have no pretensions to style; they are sometimes only reminiscences of domestic exhortations; the texts are often repeated; the illustrations are from every-day life; the treatment of one virtue occasionally trenches on another; but they are remarkable for the correctness and soundness of their doctrine and the profound spiritual knowledge which they reveal. They were not written with a view to publication, but put down by the Saint himself or dictated to others, in obedience to a positive command of superiors. He was declared Venerable in 1626. In 1633 he was chosen by the Council General of Majorca as one of the special patrons of the city and island. In 1760 Clement XIII decreed that "the virtues of the Venerable Alonso were proved to be of a heroic degree"; but the expulsion of the Society from Spain in 1773, and its suppression, delayed his canonization until 1824. He was made a Saint July 6, 1887. His remains are enshrined at Majorca.

Alpinus, Prosperto, physician and botanist, b. at Marostica, in the Republic of Venice, 23 November, 1553; d. at Padua, 6 February, 1617. He studied medicine at Padua from 1574 to 1578, taking his degree as doctor in the latter year. After two years spent at Campo San Pietro, he was appointed physician to the Venetian Consul in Egypt (1580), which gave him a much desired opportunity of pursuing his chosen study of botany under conditions more favourable than he could find in Italy, and of which he took the fullest advantage. While on his return to Venice, in 1588, he became physician to Andre Doria, Prince of Melfi, and was looked upon in Genoa, where he resided, as the first physician of his age. He returned to Padua in 1593, where he filled the chair of botany for many years. He wrote several works on botany, of which the most important being "De plantis Egypti liber" (Venice, 1592). It is said that his earlier work, "De Medicina Egyptiorum" (Venice, 1591) contains the first mention, by a European writer, of the coffee-plant.

FRANCIS W. GREY.

Alsace-Lorraine, THE GERMAN IMPERIAL TERRITORY so known, and divided for State purposes into three civil districts. Lower and Upper Alsace and Lorraine include the two bishoprics of Strasbourg and Metz, which are immediately subject to the Holy See. Christiania penetrated this region at an early period, partly owing to the gifts of the Roman Legions, whose duty it was to guard the boundaries of the Empire against the attacks of the German hordes, partly through Roman merchants who traded with the Germans on the right bank of the Rhine. The first Bishop of Strasbourg of whose name we are historically certain is St. Ambrose (commemorated 26 October), who was present at the Councils of Sardica (343) and of Coéagine (346). The Lombard, Paul the Deacon, a contemporary of Charlemagne, names St. Clement I, one of St. Peter's immediate successors at Rome, as first Bishop of Metz. Prior to the French Revolution the northern part of Alsace belonged to the diocese of Speier, some villages in the west to that of Metz, most of Upper Alsace to Basel, and the neighbourhood of Belfort to the Archdiocese of Besançon. The Diocese of Strasburg embraced the rest of Alsace, but extended to the right bank of the Rhine, including outside of Alsace the deanseries of Lahr, Oettingen, Offenburg, and Ottweiler. The Diocese of Metz included districts now belonging to German and French Lorraine, to the Grand Duchies of Luxembourg and Hesse, to the Bavarian Palatinate, and to Lower Alsace. After the Revolution the provisions of the Concordat as-signed the whole district between the Queich and Line to Bischheim, while the Departments of Bas-Rhin, Haut-Rhin and the greater part of Mont Terrible (Pruntrut) to the Diocese of Strasburg, and those of Moselle, Forêts, and Ardenne to the Diocese of Metz. During the nineteenth century great changes were brought about in the boundaries of both dioceses by agreement arrived at between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities. The civil districts of Upper and Lower Alsace have belonged to the Diocese of Strasburg since 1874, and that of Lorraine to Metz.

POPULATION.—The census of 1 December, 1900, distributes the population as in the following table, in which (A) represents Catholics; (B), Protestants; (C),agnostics; (D), Jews; (E), persons of unknown religion,—

These figures, however, do not include the 34,367 soldiers in the Diocese of Strasburg, and the 44,491 in the Diocese of Metz, who are under the jurisdiction of the Army Bishop in Berlin.

CATHEDRAL CHAPLERS.—There is a Cathedral chapler in each of these two dioceses, which consists in Strasburg of nine, and in Metz of eight actual irremovable canons (canonici titulares), whose appointment must be confirmed by the State. Several bishops of other dioceses, moreover, nominated by the Bishops of Metz and Strasburg alone, belong to the chapters as canonici honorarii, as well as canonici consulti, to live in the diocese, thirty-eight in Strasburg at the present time, and twenty-one in Metz. Four priests, also, not belonging to the diocese, but who have been of service to it, have been made honorary canons by the Bishop of Strasburg.

DIOCESAN ADMINISTRATION.—In the administration of the respective dioceses the bishops are assisted by three vicars-general in that of Strasburg, and by two in that of Metz (who can only be appointed with the consent of the civil authorities), and by seven secretaries in the former diocese and three in the latter.

PARISHES.—The parishes of Alsace-Lorraine, since the Concordat of 1801, have been divided into two classes: regular parishes, whose incumbents must receive the approval of the Government, and are irremovable; and subordinate parishes, whose incumbents are appointed by the bishop only, and may be removed by him. The regular parishes again, fall into two classes, according to their respective importance and revenues. In the Diocese of Strasburg there are thirty-eight parishes of the first, and thirty-four of the second class. In Metz there are sixteen of the first and thirty-nine of the second class. There are 617 subordinate parishes in the Diocese of Strasburg, and 518 in the Diocese of Metz. In many parishes the priests are assisted by curates, who, almost without exception, live in the presbytery, the cost being paid to the parish priest by the parish. The curates themselves are paid either by the State, as are 221 in the Diocese of Strasburg and 118 in

porations (Kirchenfabriken), 73 in the former diocese and 31 in the latter. Six holders of curacies in Strasburg, and three in Metz have houses of their own, and enjoy all the rights of parish priests, with the title of resident vicars. On 1 January, 1906, there were in the Diocese of Strasburg, besides the Bishop of Strasburg, the titular Bishop of Paphos (former Coadjutor of Strasburg), the present Coadjutor (titular Bishop of Erythreia), 1,245 priests, all but eleven of whom were born in the diocese; in the Diocese of Metz, besides the bishop, 869 priests, 793 of whom were born in the diocese, and 76 else-

SINCIPEND.—The State pays the Bishops of Strasburg and Metz $4,000 (18,000 marks) each; the Coadjutor of Strasburg $2,000 (8,000 marks); the vicars-general $600 (3,000 marks), and the canons $700 (2,800 marks). As the Coadjutor Bishop of Strasburg, however, merely holds the office of vicar-general as subsidiary to his other functions, he receives only $500 (2,000 marks) in that capacity. The president of the Directory of the Church of the Augsburg Confession is paid $1,600 (6,400 marks) as stipend, and $400 (1,600 marks) for his expenses as representative; a clerical member $900 (3,600 marks); and each of the lay members $400 (1,600 marks). The Chief Rabbi in Strasburg receives $1,000 (4,000 marks) as salary, and $300 (1,200 marks) for expenses as representative; each of the other chief rabbis $1,000 (4,000 marks). The State pays Catholic parish priests on the following scale (see classification of parishes given above):—

Curates paid by the State receive $150 (600 marks). The State pays, besides, $4,650 (18,600 marks) for expenses of maintenance of the episcopal secretaries in Strasburg and Metz; $1,650 (6,600 marks) in each diocese for the music and choir of the cathedral; $500 (2,000 marks) for the expenses of confirmation and other journeys; $750 (3,000 marks) to the Coadjutor Bishop of Strasburg for living expenses; $18,750 (79,000 marks) as pensions for retired and for maintenance of a retired coadjutor; $15,000 (60,000 marks) as extra assistance to clergymen and their relatives; $6,500 (26,500 marks) as pay for students in the clerical seminaries of Strasburg and Metz; $4,500 (18,000 marks) as pay for students in the universities, as well as assistance to home mission-schools; $31,250 (125,000 marks) in aid of church- and presbytery-building, the furnishing and adorning of churches, and the like material outlay for the support of Catholic worship. The Government pays $1,000 (4,000 marks) yearly as a regular contribution to Catholic worship, $218,750 (874,969 marks) to the Protestants, and $43,790 (175,170 marks) to the Jews. The Protestant pastors draw from the State treasury:—

The Rabbi in Mülhausen receives $600 (2,400 marks), and the other rabbis:—
of the Holy Ghost, and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary at Neuscheurn (1904); the Brothers of Christian Doctrine (of St. John Baptist de La Salle) at Metz; Sisters of Mercy (from Strasbourg) in many hospitals; Benedictine nuns at Oriocourt; Sisters of the Sacred Heart at Montgeron; Sisters of St. Charles Borromeo at Metz; sisters of the Sacred Heart in Thionville; Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in Luxembourg; Sacrament of the Blessed Virgin, of the Holy Redeemer (from Niederbronn) in hospitals; Sisters of Hope at Metz; Sisters of Christian Mercy at Metz; Sisters of the Divine Motherhood at Metz; Sisters of the Poor Child Jesus at Plappeville; Carmelites at Metz; Sisters of the Heart of Mary at Vic; Sisters of the Divine Providence at St. John Neuf; Vincentian Sisters (of Metz) at Metz. These orders of women devote themselves chiefly to the education of girls, the care of the sick and to a contemplative life of penance.

CLERICAL SEMINARIES.—The Episcopal Seminary, together with the Episcopal University of Strasbourg, to which the colleges of the faculties of letters and philosophy, with power to confer academic degrees, were closed at the French Revolution. When, however, Napoleon, by Article XI of the Concordat, granted each bishop permission to establish a seminary in his diocese, Bishop Laurine, who was made Bishop of Strasbourg in 1802, opened a seminary in his cathedral city in the following year (1803), in which young clerics were educated during the course of the nineteenth century. On the 5th of December, 1902, Cardinal Rampolla, Secretary of State, and the Prussian envoy to the Holy See, Freiherr von Rottenhahn, came to an agreement concerning the foundation of a theological faculty at the Kaiser-Wilhelm University of Strasbourg, which was accordingly opened in October, 1903, and in which the following subjects are taught: Preparatory instruction in philosophy and theology, dogmatics, moral theology, apologetics, church history, Old and New Testament exegesis, canon law, pastoral theology, ecclesiastical archæology. The professors are chosen by the bishop and confirmed in their appointment by the Emperor; they are obliged to make a profession of faith, according to the forms and rules of the Church, in the presence of the bishop before entering upon their office. The faculty, which govern the Catholic theological faculties at Bonn and at Breslau apply to the Strasbourg faculty and its members, in their relations with the Church. If the ecclesiastical authorities submit evidence that a professor is unfit to continue his functions as teacher either because of lack of orthodoxy or because of conduct unbecoming a clergyman, the State immediately provides a successor, and takes measures to terminate the offender’s connection with the faculty. Alongside of this theological faculty the Episcopal Seminary continues to exist and gives the young students a parochial training and education fitting them to the priestly office. The seminary, at the present time, is managed by a superior, a director, and three professors. The cost of maintenance for the faculty falls exclusively on the State; the seven ordinary, and one extraordinary, professors who lecture before receiving in 1901, $11,532 (17 Catholic theological chairs there and $575 (2,300 marks) as extra. The clergy of the Diocese of Metz are trained in the seminary at Metz by professors of the Bishop’s nomination.

EPISCOPAL GYMNASIA.—Bishop Raess having refused to acknowledge the State supervision of the Preparatory Seminaries at Strasbourg (Lower Alsace) and Zollhaus (Upper Alsace) to which the John Thallon had been wholly subject to the diocesan authorities.
the two institutions were respectively closed, by Ober-President Möller, on the 24th of June and the 17th of July, 1874. They have since been reopened (the one at Zillisheim on the 20th of April, 1880; the other at Strasbourg, on the 5th of April, 1883), and are known as "episcopal gymnasia." Both institutions follow the curriculum of the higher government schools under the supervision of the highest educational council of Alsatia-Lorraine. The teachers are appointed by the bishop, subject to the approval of the council of education, and must have passed an examination pro fisco or income and be on the State commission. Both have the right to grant the certificates required to be admitted to the one-year military service as volunteers, to such of their students as have successfully completed their "lower second" class, that is to say, a six-years' high school course. In both seminaries the final examinations of the students of the graduating class are conducted by the class-instructors under the supervision of the State school commission. They enjoy, therefore, the same rights as the State gymnasia. The seminaries are maintained by the bishop from fees amounting to $20 (50 marks) yearly from students in the three classes, and $30 (120 marks) for those of the gymnasia classes, as also from alms received during Lent. The Bishop of Strasbourg, in virtue of extraordinary powers, grants an individual dispensation from abstinence during Lent and on the fasts during the year, especially, "on those days when all who avail themselves of it shall make a special offering on behalf of diocesan institutions." These alms amounted to $12,684 (51,453 marks) for the year 1902-3; and $13,455 (53,818 marks) for the year 1903-4. During the school year 1904-5 thirty-seven students were entered at the Episcopal Gymnasia in Strasbourg, and twenty-one at Zillisheim, to 565 and 271 scholars respectively. The Episcopal Gymasia in the Diocese of Metz, at Montigny, enjoys all the rights of a State gymnasia, which are not possessed by the higher episcopal school at Bitich, or by the cathedral school of St. Arnulf at Metz.

COLLECTIONS AMONG THE FAITHFUL.—Six church collections have been made obligatory by the Bishop of Strasbourg: on the Sunday after the Epiphany, for the African missions; on Good Friday, for the Christians of the East; at Easter and Pentecost, for the Peter's Pence; on the feast of the consecration of new parishes; on the Day of the Assumption of the Virgin; and by the use of church edifices by Catholics and non-Catholics; on the Sunday after the feast of St. Odilia, for the blind asylum at Still. In addition to these, collections are made for the work of the Childhood of Jesus (the ransom of heathen children); for the spread of the Faith; for home missions (Society of St. Francis de Sales); and for the assistance of Catholic students. Moreover, since State pensions for retired priests are not sufficient, the priests of the Diocese of Strasbourg have established a supplementary fund, which amounted in 1902 to $4,096 (16,384 marks); in 1903, to $6,078 (24,315 marks); to $7,067 (28,006 marks) in 1904, and to $5,271
(21,085 marks) in 1905.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.—An ordinance, dated 18 April, 1871, and issued by Count von Bismarck-Böhlen, Governor-General of Alsace, obliges every child, on reaching the age of six, to attend either a public or a private school. All pupils now shall be in the family itself. School attendance continues to be obligatory until the final examination, which, for boys, takes place at the age of fourteen, for girls at thirteen. The law of 12 Feb-uary placed all lower and higher education under the supervision and control of the State authorities.
"In all the lands of the Imperial Statthaler (Governor), dated 16 November, 1887, "religion, morality, respect for the State and the laws shall be inculcated by means of teaching and education." The normal curriculum of elementary schools comprises religion, German, arithmetic, drawing, geography, natural history, natural science, singing, carpentry, and feminine handicrafts.
The following are charged with the local supervision of each elementary school:
The burgomaster, the Catholic priest, the Proestant pastor, the delegate of the Jewish religion; and, in parishes of more than 2,000 souls, one or more assistants appointed thereto by the President of the district. The clergy are especially charged with the supervision of the religious instruction given by the teachers in the schools; they have, besides, the right of entering the schools at all times. The greater number of public elementary schools are denominational. Most of the masters are laymen; most of the mistresses, sisters of some teaching order. These communities, whose members teach in public, State, and municipal schools, also maintain private elementary, intermediate, and higher girls' schools.

ART MONUMENTS.—Alsace-Lorraine is rich in important art monuments, the two principal being the famous monument to the late famous minister of Strasbourg, located in the cathedral of Metz. The first was begun in 1015, and finished in July, 1439, and whereas the cathedral at Cologne presents an example of one style Gothic work, the minister at Strasbourg bears traces of many styles. The crypt is early Romanesque, the choir in the middle of the thirteenth century, and the southern portion show the highest triumph of Gothic architecture. It is 110 metres (361 feet) long, and 47 metres (156 feet) wide; the tower is 142 metres (466 feet) high. The Gothic cathedral of Metz was begun under Bishop Conrad von Schart-enberg (1212-20), but was not completed until 1546. In the eighteenth century an Italian porch was built at the west end, but was replaced at the beginning of the twentieth century by one corresponding to the style of the building itself. The cathedral is 122 metres (400 feet) long, 30 metres (98.4 feet) wide in the nave, and 47 metres (154 feet) at the transepts. The two towers are unfinished. The oldest church in Strasbourg is the Romanesque church of St. Stephen, said to have been built in the twelfth century; the oldest in Alsace, St. Peter's collegiate cathedral at Aarlesheim, which dates back to the eleventh.

INSTITUTIONS OF CHARITY.—In October, 1889, a charity organization founded in connection with the Charity Society for Catholic Germany (headquarters at Freiburg im Breisgau).
It has central offices at Paris and Nancy, and is connected with the Oeuvre Internationale de la protection de la conscience infantile de la Ferme de Strasbourg.
In this organization is the centre of all the Catholic benevolent societies and institutions of Alsace-Lorraine. Its object is to make inquiries into actual and prospective causes of distress, and to take special steps for their amelioration; to impart information relating to the poor, and to charitable institutions and undertakings, and to disseminate the true principles of Christian charity by means of appropriate and suitable works. Of the charitable and philanthropic sphere of these charitable societies includes:

1. Crèches for infants, with protection and care of school children of both sexes during play hours.
2. Education of orphans.
3. The provision of clothing for poor children, and the fitting out of poor children on special occasions, such as First Communion; 17 societies.—(6) Homes for the care of the sick and infirm; 45 with 4,421 inmates.—(7) Asylums for idiots, epileptics, and insane; 7 with 2,330 inmates.—(8) Asylums for the blind and for deaf mutes; three with more than 200 inmates each.—(9) Lying-in hospitals for poor women at Colmar, Mainz, Munich, Mülhausen, Rappolstein, Strasburg, and Thann.—(10) Out-of-door care of the sick and poor: (a) By 32 Societies of St. Vincent de Paul with 661 members, who support 1,300 families. A branch of the St. Vincent de Paul Society is the Society of St. Francis Regis, which provides needy people with specifications prepared for civil and religious marriage, and effects the legitimation of children. It exists in all the parishes of Colmar and Mülhausen and in Strasbourg, where, between 1894 and 1897, it brought about 152 marriages between Catholics, 48 between Catholics and Protestants, and 12 between Protestants. (b) By 16 ladies’ societies. (c) By Sisters of the Divine Redemptron in 23 districts; Sisters of St. Joseph in 13, Sisters of the Cross in 10, Sisters of Mercy in 4, and Franciscan nuns in 1. (d) By means of soup establishments and peoples’ kitchens in 11 places. —(11) Care of destitute prisoners at Colmar and Strasbourg. (12) Employment agencies, in 33 places. —(13) The social Services at Strasbourg, founded in connexion with the People’s Society for Catholic Germany, which distributed without pay in one year (1904) information in 333 pamphlets; 113 on old age and disablement insurance, 288 on accident insurance, 62 on sickness insurance, 308 collections, 437 on other civil matters, 280 on penal matters, 63 on matters of trusteeship, 51 on taxation, 24 on military matters, 42 on matters relating to domestic service, 308 on the relations of landlord and tenant, 241 on matters relating to inheritance, 220 on the duties of directors, 61 on property, 60 on various matters. —(14) Protection of girls. This society is connected with the International Catholic Society for the Protection of Girls; its object is to assist with advice and help unprotected, grown-up girls, house servants, factory girls, shop girls, teachers, and others, especially those, who are away from home, and to shield them from dangers and misconduct. Grotesque letters were made to such girls during 1905, 561 letters received, and 765 written; 1,101 domestic servants were lodged in St. Arbogast’s Home, 86 free, for 919 days, and 57 at a reduced price for 1,012 days. —(15) Young ladies’ societies, twenty-four in number. The members of the ladies’ societies are advised as to savings banks and insurance companies. They receive instruction in sewing, mending, ironing, French, singing, and are directed to situations. —(16) Women’s and mothers’ societies, nine in number. These provide assistance for the poorer members in case of sickness, and defray the burial fees in cases of death.—(17) Societies with social objects in eleven places. The members receive free medical attendance and medicine, sick pay, and death pay, and Masses are said for them after death. —(18) There are Homes for workmen and workwomen, and students at Colmar, Erstein, Gebweiler, Mülhausen, Müllerhof near Thann, and Strasbourg.—(19) Higher instruction for boys and girls in 23 schools. —(20) Women’s Union; an organization for women for religious, social, scientific, and charitable purposes. There were as many as 600 members in 1906 in the Women’s Union, the second year after its foundation. —(21) The aim of the youths’ and men’s clubs was to found one of which was founded 20 years ago, but most of which were established within the last twenty years, is not merely to protect and strengthen the faith of their members, but to assist them in their material interests. The first is attained by means of common worship and general communion; the second, in the case of young men, by means of social intercourse, lectures, the use of libraries, athletics, music, and shooting contests, instruction in German, French, arithmetic, drawing, bookkeeping, and short hand; dramatic performances, savings and insurance funds, assistance to the sick and those doing military service, and finding situations for older men. —(22) The checking and social insurance, savings, loans, insurance for sickness and death funds, employment agencies, legal protection, and co-operative societies. According to the latest returns published, there were 40 such youths’ societies, in 1904, with 15,900, and 32 older men’s societies, with 15,346 members. These do not include the three Catholic “Casinos” in Strasburg, or those in Haguenau, Colmar, and Schlettstadt, or the Catholic students’ societies at the University of Strasbourg. These last are Franchise, Merovingia, Stauffa (Catholic Students’ Union of the S. C. V.); Badenia, Rappolstein (Catholic Students’ Association of S. C. V.); Erwina (Catholic Students’ Association of the S. C. V.); Unitas, Catholic Science Students’ Union, the Academic Society of St. Boniface, the Academic Marian Congregation, and the Academic Conference of St. Vincent de Paul. —The following societies, which are gradually becoming firmly established, and are also approved by the Society of the Supporters of the Centrum (Zentrumsverein), the People’s Union for Catholic Germany, the Branch Unions for Catholic schoolmasters and mistresses. On 11 March, 1906, representatives of all the “Centre Societies” in Alsace-Lorraine met at Strasbourg and agreed unanimously on the foundation of a local Centre Party. Statutes of incorporation were drawn up and the working programme for the immediate future decided on. (The Union in Strasbourg has 1,650 members, the one in Mülhausen 2,000.) The People’s Union, known as a legacy of the “other” party, is to host all Catholics, who are against the dangerous and disturbing influence of Social Democracy, had 42,000 members, in Alsace-Lorraine, in 1906, 22,000 of whom were Alsatians, 15,000 German-speaking, and 5,000 French-speaking Lorrainers. Some 600 schoolmasters are members of the Catholic Masters’ Society, and some 450 women-teachers of the Catholic Schoolmistresses’ Society.

Altamura and Acquaviva, an exempt archbishopate in the province of Pari, in southern Italy. Altamura was declared exempt from episcopal jurisdiction by Innocent IV in 1248, and again by Innocent VIII (1484-92). Acquaviva, a town of the Campagna, was declared similarly exempt by Pius IX, and granted to Altamura on 17 August 1848. Altamura has 4 parishes and a Catholic population of 19,333; Acquaviva has one parish and a Catholic population of 8,527; the clergy number 80.

Altar (in Liturgy).—In the Holy Law the altar is the table on which the Eucharistic Sacrifice is offered. Mass may sometimes be celebrated outside a sacred place, but never without an altar, or at least an altar-stone. In ecclesiastical history we find only two exceptions: St. Lucian (312) is said to have celebrated Mass on his breast whilst in prison, and Theodore, Bishop of Tyre, on the hands of his deacons (Mabillon, Histoire littéraire, etc., n. 70). The present Pope of Oxford (Prop. 25), St. Sextus II (257-259) was the first to prescribe that Mass should be celebrated on an altar, and the rubric of the missal (XXI) is merely a new promulgation of this law. It signifies, according to Amalarius (De Eccles. Officis, I, xxiv) the Table of the Lord (mensa Domini), referring to the Last Supper, or the Cross (St. Bernard, De Coenâ Domini), or Christ (St. Ambrose, IV, De Sacram. xii; Abbot Rupert, V, xxx). The last meaning explains the honour paid to it by incensing it, and the five crosses engraved on it signify His five wounds. It is the true place where the priest, as he stood at the altar, faced the people. The altars of the Roman Empire were, as a rule, law courts or meeting places. They were generally spacious, and the interior area was separated by two, or, it might be, four rows of pillars, forming a central nave and side aisles. The end opposite the entrance had a semi-circular shape, called the apse, and in this portion, which was raised above the level of the floor, sat the judge and his assessors, while right before him stood an altar upon which sacrifice was offered before beginning any important public business. When these public buildings were adapted for Christian assemblies slight modifications were made. The apse was reserved for the bishop and his clergy; the faithful occupied the centre and side aisles, while between the clergy and people stood the altar. Later on the altar was placed, in churches, in the apse, against, or at least near, the wall, so that the priest who was facing the east and behind him the people were placed. In primitive days there was but one altar in each church. St. Ignatius the Martyr, Cyprian, Irenaeus, and Jerome, speak of only one altar (Benedict XIV, De Sacr. Missæ, § 1, xvii). Some think that more than one altar existed in the Cathedral of Milan in the time of St. Ambrose, because he sometimes used the word altaris, although others are of opinion that altaris in this place means an altar. Towards the end of the sixth century we find evidence of a plurality of altars, for St. Gregory the Great sent relics for four altars to Palladius, Bishop of Sisteron, France, who had placed in his church four altars, of which remained unconsecrated for want of relics. Although there was only one altar in each church, minor altars were erected in side chapels, which were distinct buildings (as is the custom in the Greek, and some Oriental Churches even at the present day) in which Mass was celebrated only on the same day in each church (Benedict XIV, De Sacr. Missæ, § 1, xvii). In the early ages of Christianity only the bishop celebrated Mass, assisted by his clergy, who received Holy Communion from the bishop’s hands, is the reason that only one altar was erected in each church, but after the introduction of private Masses the number of altars in such churches increased.

Material of Altars.—Although no documents are extant to indicate the material of which altars were made in the first centuries of Christianity, it is probable that they were made of wood, like that used by Christ at the Last Supper. At Rome such a wooden table is still preserved in the Lateran Basilica, although the church was much altered in theocratic warfare. As is evident from the form of an altar, it is but natural to suppose that they were made of wood, probably wooden chests carried about by the bishops, on the lid of which the Eucharistic Sacrifice was celebrated. St. Optatus of Mileve (De Schismate Donatistarum) proves the Donatists for breaking up and using for their own churches the altars of the Catholic Church. St. Augustine (Epist. clxxxv) reports that Bishop Maximianus was beaten with the wood of the altar under which he had taken refuge. We have every reason to suppose that in places in which the persecutions were not raging altars of stone also were in use. St. Gregory Thaumaturgus in the third century built a vast basilica in Neo-Caesarea in which it is probable that more substantial altars were erected. St. Gregory of Nyssa speaks of the consecration of an altar made of stone (De Christi Baptismate). Pulcheria, sister of Theodosius II, presented an altar of gold to the Basilica of Constantinople, St. Helena having presented to the church with precious stones to the church which was erected on the site where the Cross had been concealed for three hundred years; the Popes St. Sixtus III (432-440) and St. Hilary (461-468) presented several altars of silver to the churches of Rome. Since wood is subject to decay, the base metals to corrosion, and the more precious metals were too expensive, stone became in course of time the ordinary material for an altar. Besides, stone is durable and, according to St. Paul (I Cor., x, 4), symbolizes Christ—"And the rock was Christ". The Roman Breviary (9 November) asserts that St. Sylvester (314-335) was the first to issue a decree that the altar should be of stone. But of such a decree there is no documentary evidence, and no mention is made of it in canon law, in which so many other decrees of this Pope are inserted. Moreover, it is certain that after that date altars of wood and of stone were erected in the same church, which prescribed that an altar which is to be consecrated should be of stone is that of the provincial council of Epeanum (Pamiers), France, in 517 (Labbe, Concil. tom. V, col. 771). The present discipline of the Church requires that for the consecration of an altar it must be of stone.

Form of an Altar.—In the primitive times there were two kinds of altars. (1) The arcosolium or monumentum arceatum, which was formed by cutting in the tufa wall of the wider spaces in the catacombs, an arch-like niche, over a grave or sarcophagus. The latter contained the remains of one or more martyrs, and the niche was covered by the floor. On it was placed horizontally a slab of marble, called the mensa, on which Mass was celebrated. (2) The altar detached from the wall in the cubicula, or sepulchral chapels surrounded by loculi and arcosolii, used as places of worship in the catacombs or in the tombs of the early Christians. In the time of Constantine, this second kind of altar consisted of a square or oblong slab of stone or marble which rested on columns, one to six in number, or on a structure of masonry in which were enclosed the relics of martyrs. Sometimes two or four slabs of the same material were placed vertically under the table, forming a stone chest. In Christian tombs the table was sometimes made of wood and rested on a wooden support. Within this support were placed the relics of martyrs, and in order to be able to expose them to view, folding doors were fixed on the front. The Liber Pontificalis states that St. Felix I decreed that Mass should be celebrated on the tombs of martyrs. This no doubt brought about a change of form, from that of a simple table to that of a chest or tomb, and the rule that every altar must contain the relics of martyrs. Usually the altar was raised on steps, from which the bishop sometimes preached (see ALTAR-Steps). Originally it was made in the shape of an oblong, but generally that of a triangle, and stood against a wall, or was placed in the middle of the church, where it was raised slightly above the floor level.

When the tabernacle was introduced the number of these steps was increased. The altar is covered, at least in basilicas and also in large churches, by a canopy supported by columns, called the ciborium (see ALTAR-CANOPY), upon which were placed, or from which were suspended, vases, crowns, baskets of silver, as decorations. From the middle of the ciborium, formerly, a gold or silver dome was suspended to serve as a pyx in which the Blessed Sacrament was reserved. Veils or curtains were attached to the columns which supported the ciborium. (See ALTAR-CURTAIN.)

The altar was often encircled by railings of wood, or metal, called cancelli, or by low walls of marble slabs called transennae. According to the present discipline of the Church, there are two kinds of altars, the fixed and the portable. Both these denominations have a twofold meaning, i.e., an altar may be fixed so that it cannot be moved, or a altar which must be built on a solid foundation. A portable altar, in a wider sense, is one that is attached to a wall, a floor, or a column, whether it be consecrated or not; in the liturgical sense it is a permanent structure of stone, consisting of a consecrated table and support, which must be built on a solid foundation. A portable altar, in a wider sense, is one that may be carried from one place to another; in the liturgical sense it is a consecrated altar-stone, sufficiently large to hold the Sacred Host and the greater part of the base of the chalice. It is inserted in the table of an altar which is not a consecrated fixed altar.

The component parts of a fixed altar in the liturgical sense are the table (mensa), the support (stipes) and the sepulchrum. (See ALTAR-CAVITY.) The table must be a single slab of stone firmly joined by cement to the support, so that the table and support together make one piece. The surface of this table must be smooth and not very much polished, with Greek crosses engraved on its surface, one at each of the four corners, about six inches from both edges, directly above the support, and one in the centre. The support may be either a solid mass or it may consist of four or more columns. These must be of natural stone, firmly joined to the table. The substructure need not, however, consist of one piece, but should in every case be built on a solid foundation so as to make the structure permanent. The support may have any of the following forms: (1) at each corner a column of natural stone, and the spaces between the columns filled with any kind of stone, brick, or cement; (2) the space between the two columns in front may be left open, so as to place beneath the table (exposed) a reliquary containing the body (or a portion of the body) of a saint; (3) besides the four columns, one at each corner, a fifth column may be placed in the centre at each side, and the sides also may be filled with stone, brick, or cement; (4) if the table is small (it should in every case be larger than the stone of a portable altar), four columns are placed under it, one at each corner, and, to make up the full length required, frames of stone or wood are inserted. These additions are not consecrated, and hence may be constructed after the ceremony of consecration; (5) if the table is deficient in width, four columns are placed under it, one at each corner, and a frame of stone or other material is added to the back. This addition is not consecrated, and may be made after the consecration of the altar.

In the last two cases the spaces between the columns may be filled with stone, brick, or cement, or they may be left open. In every case the substructure may be a solid mass, or the interior may remain hollow, but this hollow space is not to be used as a repository for stones or other kind, even such as belong to the altar. Neither the rails nor the Sacred Congregation of Rites prescribe any dimensions for an altar. It ought, however, to be large enough to allow a priest conveniently to celebrate the Holy Sacrifice upon it in such a manner that all the ceremonies can be decorously observed.

Hence altars at which solemn services are celebrated require to be of greater dimensions than other altars. From the words of the Pontifical we infer that the high altar must stand free on all sides (Pontifical circuit septies tabulam altaris), but the back part of smaller altars may be built against the wall.

ALTAR-CANDLES.—For various reasons the Church prescribes that the candles used at Mass and at other liturgical functions be made of bees-wax (luminaria cera).—Missale Rom., De Defectibus, X, 1; Cong. Sac. Rites, 4 September, 1875). The pure wax extracted by bees from flowers symbolizes the pure flesh of Christ received from His Virgin Mother, the wick the soul of Christ, and the wax the divinity of Christ. Although the two latter properties are found in all kinds of candles, the first is proper of bees-wax candles only (Muller, Theol. Moralis, bk. III, tit. i, § 27). It is, however, not necessary that they be made of bees-wax without any admixture. The paschal candle and the two candles used at Mass should be made ex ceri apum saltem in maximis parte, but the other candles in majori vel notalbis quantitate ex etdem ceri (Cong. Sac. Rit., 14 December, 1904). As a rule they should be of white bleached wax, but at funerals, at the office of Temerit in Holy Week, and at the Mass of the Presanctified, on Good Friday, they should be of yellow unbleached wax (Cerem. Episc.). De Herdt (I, n. 183, Resp. 2) says that unbleached wax candles should be used during Advent and Lent, except on feasts, solemnities, and especially during the exposition and procession of the Blessed Sacrament. candles made of bees-wax, tallow, or paraffin are forbidden. The Cong. Sac. Rit. (7 September, 1850) made an exception for the missionaries of Oceania, who, on account of the impossibility of obtaining wax candles, are allowed to use sperm candles. Without an Apostolic indult it is not allowable, and it constitutes a grievous offence to celebrate Mass without any light (Cong. Sac. Rit., 7 September, 1850), even for the purpose of giving Holy Vatisfaction, or of enabling the people to comply with their duty of fasting on days of Mass, on festivals, and on holydays (St. Lig., bk. VI, p. 394). In these and similar cases of necessity it is the common opinion that Mass may be celebrated with tallow candles or oil lamps (ibid.). It is not permitted to begin Mass before the candles are lighted, nor are they to be extinguished until the last Gospel has been recited. In churches and other places where the candles go out, and if possible cannot be again lighted, most authors say that Mass should be discontinued; if this happens after the Consecration, Mass should not be interrupted, although some authors say that if they can possibly be lighted again within fifteen minutes the celebrant may proceed to say Mass (ibid.). If only one rubrical candle can be had, Mass may be celebrated even ex devotis (ibid.).
NUMBER OF CANDLES AT MASS.—(1) At a pontifical high Mass celebrated by the ordinary, seven candles are lighted. The seven candles should be somewhat higher than the others, and should be placed at the middle of the altar in line with the other six. For this reason the altar crucifix is moved forward a little. In Requiem Masses, and at other liturgical services, e.g. Vespers, the seventh candle is held by the bishop or the celebrant outside the chasuble. If the altar is to be consecrated, or if he be the administrator, auxiliary, or coadjutor, the seventh candle is not lighted. (2) At a solemn high Mass, i.e. when the celebrant is assisted by a deacon and subdeacon, six candles are lighted. This is not expressly prescribed by the rubrics, but may be deduced from the rubric designating the number of incensing the altar (Ritus celebrandi Missam, tit. iv, n. 4), which says that the celebrant incenses both sides of the altar with three swings of the censer pro ut distribuentur candelabra. (3) At a high Mass (missa cantata), which is celebrated without the assistance of deacon and subdeacon, at least four candles are required (Cong. Sac. Rit., 12 August, 1854), although six may be lighted. At these Masses under (1), (2), (3), the two lighted candles prescribed by the Missal (Rubr. XX) to be placed one on each side of the cross, are not necessary (Cong. Sac. Rit., 5 December, 1857). At low Mass the usual number of candles to be lighted is four, and if the Mass is celebrated by a bishop, four candles are usually lighted, although the “Ceremoniale Episcop.” (I, cap. xxix, n. 4) prescribes this number only for the more solemn feasts, and two on feasts of lower rite. (5) At a strictly low Mass celebrated by any priest inferior to a bishop, whatever be his dignity, only two candles may be used. (6) In a strictly low Mass, i.e. in a parochial or community Mass on more solemn feasts, or the Mass which is said instead of a solemn or high Mass on the occasion of a great solemnity (Cong. Sac. Rit., 12 September, 1857), when celebrated by a priest more than two candles, and when celebrated by a bishop more than four candles may be used. At all functions throughout the year, except on Good Friday and Holy Saturday, before the Mass bishops are allowed the use of the bugia or hand-candlestick. The use of the bugia is not permitted to priests, whatever be their dignity, unless enjoined by an Apostolic or personal, or by reason of their being curial dignitaries. If, on account of darkness, a priest stands in need of a light near the Missal he may use a candle, but the candlestick on which it is fastened cannot have the form of the bugia (Cong. Sac. Rit., 31 May, 1917). An oil lamp can never be used for Mass (Cong. Sac. Rit., 20 June, 1899). At the Forty Hours’ Devotion at least twenty candles should burn continuously (Instructio Clementina, § 6); at other public exhibitions of the Blessed Sacrament at least twelve (Cong. Sac. Rit., 8 February, 1879); at the private exposition, at least six (Cong. Episc. et Regn., 9 December, 1862). The only blessings at which lighted candles are prescribed are: (1) of the candles on the feast of the Purification; (2) of the ashes on Ash Wednesday; (3) of the palms on Palm Sunday.

DOUBLE ALTAR.—An altar having a double front, constructed in such a manner that Mass may be celebrated on both sides of it at the same time. They are frequently found in churches of religious communities in which the choir is behind the altar, so that whilst one priest is celebrating the Holy Sacrifice for the community in choir, another may celebrate for the laity assembled in the church.

DECLARATION OF PRIVILEGES. — It consists of a solid piece of natural stone which must be sufficiently hard to resist every fracture. It must be consecrated by a bishop or other person having faculties to do so. By virtue of Facultates Extraordinariae C., 6, the bishops of the United States may delegate a priest. It is inserted in, or placed on, the table of the altar, retaining the two inchies of which the front of the altar is decorated. It is placed in such a manner that, by its slight elevation above the table, the celebrant can trace its outlines with his hand and thus recognize its location beneath the altar-cloths. In general it should be large enough to hold the Sacred Host and the greater part of the vessels of the chalice. (Cong. Sac. Rit., 2 May, 1892).

If the altar is intended for the celebration of Masses at which Holy Communion is distributed, it should be large enough to hold the ciborium also. Five Greek crosses are engraved on it, one near each corner and one in the centre, to indicate the place in which theunctions are made at the consecration. If the cross in the centre should be omitted, the unction must not be omitted, but the omission of this unction would not invalidate the consecration (Cong. Sac. Rit., 2 May, 1892). The table and supports on which the portable altar rests may be constructed of any suitable material, wood or stone, provided they have the proper dimensions. For the portable altar the Greeks generally use the antimenium, a consecrated altar-cloth of silk or linen, after the manner of our corporals. When a church is consecrated, a piece of cloth large enough to form several antimensia is placed on the altar. It is consecrated by the priest who celebrates the Mass, and bewails upon him and his altar the chasuble and vestments, and thus makes the altar holy. The chalice and host are placed upon the altar, and the thurible and censer are placed on either side of the altar. The altar is dedicated, and the priest consecrates the altar with the chalice and host. The altar is laid with a white linen cover, and the priest prays for the church and the people. The altar is then consecrated, and the priest prays for the church and the people. The altar is then consecrated, and the priest prays for the church and the people.
crated or not, of their dioceses, provided this privilege had not been previously granted to any other altar in such church under the same conditions.

Stripping of Altar.—On Holy Thursday the celebrant, having removed the ciborium from the high altar, goes to the sacristy. He there lays aside the white vestments and puts on a violet stole, and, accompanied by the deacon, also vested in violet stole, and the subdeacon, vested in violet, goes to the main altar. Whilst the antiphon “Diviserunt sibi” and the psalm “Deus, Deus meus” are being recited, the celebrant and his assistants ascend to the predella and strip the altar of the altar-cloths, vases of flowers, antependium, and other ornaments, so that nothing remains on the cross and the main altar other than the candles extinguished. In the same manner all the other altars in the church are denuded. If there be many altars in the church, another priest, vested in surplice and violet stole, may strip them whilst the celebrant is stripping the high altar. The Christian altar represents Christ, and the stripping of the altar reminds us how He was stripped of His garments when He fell into the hands of the Jews and was exposed naked to their insults. It is for this reason that the psalm “Deus, Deus meus” is recited, wherein the Messiah speaks of the Roman soldiers dividing His garments among them. This ceremony signifies the stripping of Christianity’s valiant banner of glory, The Liturgical Year: Holy Week). It was formerly the custom in some churches on this day to wash the altars with a bunch of hyssop dipped in wine and water, to render them in some manner worthy of the Lamb without stain who is immolated on them, and to recall to the minds of the faithful with how great purity they should assist at the Holy Sacrifice and receive Holy Communion (Leroisy, Histoire et symbolisme de la liturgie). St. Isidore of Seville (De Eccles. Off., I, xxvii) and St. Eulogius of Noyon (Homil. VIII, De Cemâ Domini) say that this ceremony was intended as an homage offered to Our Lord, in return for the humility whereby He deigned to wash the feet of His disciples.

Altar-Bell.—A small bell placed on the credence or in some other convenient place on the epistle side of the altar. According to the rubrics it is rung only at the Sanctus and at the elevation of both Sponsus and Sponsa, at the Consecration, at the distribution of the Host, and at the Communion of the laity, and is not rung at any other occasion of the Mass. At the blessing of the Blessed Sacrament it is rung in the choir (Conc. Rom., Ritual, Tit. iv, n. 6) to invite the faithful to the act of adoration at the Consecration. This must be done even in private chapels (Conc. Sac. Rit., 18 July, 1885). It may also be rung at the “Domine non sum dignus,” and again before the distribution of Holy Communion to the laity, and, once the Host is given out, according to the custom of the place. When the Blessed Sacrament is publicly exposed, (1) it may or may not be rung at high Mass, and at a low Mass which takes the place of the high Mass, celebrated at the Altar of Exposition, according to the custom of the place. (2) It is not rung at low Masses celebrated at low Masses whilst a public celebration is taking place, and at any Mass during the public recitation of office in choir, if said Mass be celebrated at an altar near the choir (Conc. Sac. Rit., 21 November, 1893). It is not rung from the end of the “Gloria in excelsis” on Maundy Thursday to the beginning of the “Gloria in excelsis” on Holy Saturday. During this interval the Memoriale Ritum (Tit. iv, § 4, n. 7) prescribes that the clapper (crotaulus) be used to give the signal for the Angelus, but it is nowhere prescribed in the liturgical functions. The custom of using the clapper on these occasions appears quite proper. The Cong. Sac. Rit. (10 September, 1898) when asked if a gong may be used instead of the small bell answered, “Negative; seu non convenire”. The clapper is in the form of a small bell, and having a knob on top, so as to be easily taken hold of, is placed on the breads. The cover must fit tightly, so that the breads become neither damp nor soiled. The box for the large hosts is of suitable dimensions. A larger box is employed for the patenicles used for the consecrated breads. These patenicles were formerly made of precious metals.

Altar-Bread Boxes.—These are made of wood, tin, Britannia, silver, or other metal. In order that breads may not become bent or curved, a round metal weight, called the “punch,” is placed in each box and having a knob on top, so as to be easily taken hold of, is placed on the breads. The cover must fit tightly, so that the breads become neither damp nor soiled. The box for the large hosts is of suitable dimensions. A larger box is employed for the patenicles used for the consecrated breads.

Altar-Breads.—Bread is one of the two elements absolutely necessary for the sacrifice of the Eucharist. It cannot be determined from the sacred text whether Christ used the ordinary table bread or some other bread specially prepared for the occasion. In the Western Church the altar-breads were probably round in form. Archæological researches demonstrate this from pictures found in the catacombs (Armellini, Lezioni di Cristiana Archeologia, Pars. II, v); and Pope St. Zephyrinus (A. d. 201–219) calls the altar-bread “cornem sive oblatam sphericum figure”. In the Eastern churches they are round or square, and sometimes are potted with the flour from which the breads were formed. In the Eastern Church the breads were made by consecrated virgins; in the Western Church, by priests and clerics (Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Misse, I, § 36). This custom is still in vogue in the Armenian Church. The earliest documentary evidence that the altar-breads were made in thin wafers is the answer which Cardinal Humbert, legate of St. Leo IX, made at the middle of the eleventh century to Michael Cerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople (Fleury, Hist. Eccles., LX, n. 6). These wafers were sometimes very large, as from them small pieces were broken for the Communion of the laity, hence the word “particle” for the small host; but smaller ones were used when only the celebrant communiated.

For valid consecration the hosts must be (1) made of wheaten flour, (2) mixed with pure natural water, (3) baked in an oven, (4) not subject to the elements, (5) not moulded, and they must not be corrupted (Miss. Rom., De Defectibus, III, 1). If the host is not made of wheaten flour, or is mixed with flour of another kind in such quantity that it cannot be called wheat bread, it may not be used (ibid.). If not natural, then the consecrated bread is of doubtful validity (ibid., 2). If the host begins to be corrupt, it would be a grievous offence to use it, but it is considered valid matter (ibid., 3.) For valid consecration (1) the bread must be, at present unleavened in the Western Church; but leavened bread in the Eastern Church; kept among the Maronites, the Armenians, and in the Churches of Jerusalem and Alexandria, where it is unleavened. It is probable that Christ used unleavened bread at the institution of the Blessed Eucharist, because the Jews were not allowed to have leavened bread in their houses on the days of the Asymes. Some authors are of the opinion that down to the tenth century both the Eastern and Western Churches used unleavened bread; others maintain that unleavened bread was used from the beginning in the Western Church; still others hold that unleavened or leavened bread was used indifferently. St. Thomas (IV, Dist. xi, ch. 3) holds that, in the beginning, both in the East and West unleavened bread was used; that when the sect of the Ebonites arose, who wished that the Mosaic Law should be obligatory on all converts, leavened bread was used, and when this heresy ceased the Latins used again unleavened bread, but the Greeks retained the use of leavened bread. Leavened bread may be used in the Latin Church, which is put to a sacrificial use, owing to the fact that the host before him has some substantial defect, and no other than leavened bread can be procured at the time (Lehmkuhl, n. 121, 3). A Latin priest travelling in the East, in places in which there are no churches of his rite, may celebrate with unleavened bread. A priest of the Western Church may, under similar circumstances, celebrate with unleavened bread. For the purpose of giving Vitiacium, if no unleavened bread be at hand, some say that leavened may be used (C. Uttini, Conso di Scienza Lit., bk. II, p. 174, footnote); but St. Liguori, (bk. VI, n. 203, dub. 2) says that the more probable opinion is that unleavened must be used. (2) The hosts must be recently made (Rit. Rom., tit. iv, cap. i, n. 7). The rubrics do not specify the term recentes in speaking of the hosts. In Rome, the bakers of altar-breads are obliged to make solemn affidavit that they will not sell breads older than fifteen days, and St. Charles, by a statute of the Fourth Synod of Milan, prescribed that hosts older than twenty days must not be used in the celebration of Mass. In practice, therefore, those older than three weeks ought not to be used. (3) Round in form, and not broken. (4) Clean and fair, of a thin layer, and of a good consistence to the taste, as is the custom in the Eastern Church. In Rome the large hosts are about three and one-fifth inches in diameter; in other places they are smaller, but should be at least two and three-fourths inches in diameter. The small hosts for the Communion of the laity should be about one and two-fifths inches in diameter (Schober, 3, Alphonsi Liber de Ceremoniis Missae, p. 6, footnote 4). When a large host cannot be obtained Mass may be said in private with a small host. In cases of necessity, such as permitting the people to fulfill the precept of hearing Mass, or administering Viaticum, the Mass may be also said with a small host, but, as liturgists say, to avoid scandal the faithful should be advised (De Herdt, II, n. 137). As a rule the image of Christ crucified should be impressed on the large host (Cong. Sac. Rit., 26 April, 1834), but the monogram of the Holy Name (Ephem. Lit., XIII, 1899, p. 689), or the Sacred Heart (ibid., p. 266) may also be added. (5) The bread should be made, as far as possible, according as they had reference to the Eucharist as a sacrament or as a sacrifice: bread, gift (donum), table (mensa) allude to the Sacriment, which was instituted for the nourishment of our soul; oblation, victim, host, allude to sacrifice. Before the tenth century the word “host” was not employed, probably because before that time the Blessed Eucharist was considered more frequently as a sacrament than as a sacrifice, hence the Fathers use such expressions as communion (synaxis), supper (cena), breaking of bread, etc., but at present the word “host” is used when referring to the Eucharist either as a sacrament or as a sacrifice. In the case of the bread used for the Eucharist either as a sacrament or as a sacrifice (1) for the bread before its consecration, “Susice sancite Pater... hanc immaculatam hostiam” (Offertory of the Mass); (2) for Christ under the appearance of the Eucharistic Species, “Unde et memores... hostiam puram, hostiam sanctam, hostiam immaculatam” (Mass after the consecration). Durandus says that the word host is of pagan origin, and is derived from the word hostio, to strike, referring to the victim offered to the gods after a victory; but it is also of biblical origin, as it represented the matter, or victim, of the sacrifice, e.g. “expiationis hostis” (Exod. xxix, 36).

ALTAR—CANDLES—An altar-candlestick consists of five parts: the foot, the stem, the knob about the middle of the stem, the bowl to receive the drippings of wax, and the pricket, i.e. the sharp point that terminates the stem on which the candle is fixed (Pugin, Glossary). Instead of fixing the candle on the pricket, it is permissible to use a tube which projects from the top of the pricket by a spring placed within (Cong. Sac. Rit., 11 May, 1878). In the early days of the Church candlesticks were not placed on the altar, though lights were used in the church, and especially near the altar. The chandeliers were either suspended from the ceiling, or attached to the side walls, or were placed on pedestals. When the chandeliers were fed with oil they were usually called antstari, when they held candles they went by the name of phari, although frequently these words were applied indiscriminately to either. The lights usually assumed the form of a crown, a cross, a chalice, and so on, but at times they were shaped like real animals. We have no documentary evidence that candlesticks were placed on the altar during the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice before the tenth century. Leo IV (847-855) declared that only the relics of saints and the book of the Gospels might be placed on the altar (Hamel, De cura pastorum). No writer before the tenth century who treats of the altar makes mention of candlesticks on the altar, but mention is made of acolytes carrying candlesticks, which, however, were placed on the floor of the sanctuary or near the corners of the altar, as is still the case in the Greek Church. The custom continued in the twelfth century, and certainly in the thirteenth, lights were placed on the altar; for Durandus (Rationale, I, iii, 27) says “that at both corners of the altar a candlestick is placed to signify the joy of two peoples who rejoiced at the birth of Christ”, and “the cross is placed on the altar between two candlesticks.” The custom of placing candlesticks and candles on the altar became general in the sixteenth century. Down to that time only two were ordinarily used, but on solemn feasts four or six. At present more are used, but the rubric of the missal (20) prescribes only two, one at each side of the cross, at least a low Mass. These candlesticks and their candles must be placed on the altar; their place cannot be taken by two brackets attached to the superstructural steps of the altar, or affixed to the wall (Cong. Sac. Rit., 16 September, 1865). According to the “Ceremonialis Episcoporum” (I, xii, 17) the two candlesticks and candles of various sizes, the highest of which should be near the cross. If all six be of the same size they may be placed on different elevations, so as to produce the same effect; a custom, however, has been introduced of having them at the same height, and this is now permissible (Cong. Sac. Rit., 21 July, 1855). On the other altars of the church there should be at least two candlesticks, but usually four are used; on the altar of the Blessed Sacrament, if the Blessed Sacrament is not kept on the high altar, there should regularly be six. The Roman Missal (Rubr. 20) says also that a third candlestick and candle should be placed at the epistle side, and that this extra candle should be lighted at low Masses from the consecration to the consumption of the Precious Blood. This rubric is only directive (9 June, 1899). The third light is not placed on the altar itself, but on the credence, or on the step of the altar at the place where the altar-boy kneels. A bracket affixed to the altar is not used for the candlestick (Ephem. Lit., IX, 34, 1875). The candlesticks may be made of any kind of metal or even of wood, gilded or silvered; but on Good Friday silvered ones may not be used (Cerem. Episc. II, xxv, 2). The candlesticks destined for the ornamentation of the altar are used on embalment, or for those in the catafalque at the commemoration of the dead (Rit. Rom., VI, i, 8); during Mass or other functions, at least on solemn feasts, they cannot be covered with a cloth or veil
(Cong. Sac. Rit., 12 September, 1857; 16 September, 1865). Candelabra holding several candles cannot be used for the candlesticks prescribed by the Rubrics (Cong. Sac. Rit., 16 September, 1865). The Rubrics say: "Canopae, episcoporum" (I, xiii, 13), treating of the ornaments of the altar, says that a canopy (baldaquinum) should be suspended over the altar. It should be square in form, sufficiently large to cover the altar and the predella on which the celebrant stands, and if it can easily be done, the colour of the material, silk, velvet or other cloth, with which it is covered, should vary with the colour of the ornaments of the altar. It is either suspended from the ceiling by a movable chain, so that it may be lowered or raised when necessary, or it may be attached to the wall, or to the recess at the back of the altar. It may also be a stationary structure, and this is usually the case in large churches, and then it is made of marble, stone, metal, or wood beautifully carved and overlaid with gold or silver, in the form of a cupola erected on four pillars. In liturgy it is called the ciborium (ibid.). The canopy or ciborium is, according to the Rubrics, suspended at the side of the altar of the Blessed Sacrament (23 May, 1845), and over the other altars of the church (27 April, 1897), but a contrary custom has so far prevailed that even in Rome it is usually erected only over the high altar, and the altar of the Blessed Sacrament. For the purpose of the "evento" is to keep the altar from dust or other matter falling upon it from the ceiling, which, being usually very high, cannot be conveniently or easily cleaned. On solemn festivals, or at special solemnities, a temporary canopy is sometimes placed over an altar in or outside the church. The framework on which such a canopy is erected is called the "altar-herse," a word probably derived from hearse, a frame covered with cloth, and formerly set up over a corpse in funeral solemnities.

ALTAR-CARDS.—To assist the memory of the celebrant at Mass in those prayers which he should know by heart, cards on which these prayers are printed are placed on the altar in the middle, and at each end. They were not used before the sixteenth century, and even at present are not employed at the Mass celebrated by a bishop, who reads all the prayers from the Pontifical Canon. At the time the Blessed Sacrament was reserved in the middle of the altar was used, and it was called the "Tabella Secretarium" (tit. xx). Later, another was added containing the Gospel of St. John (recited usually at the end of Mass), and placed on the Gospel side. For the sake of symmetry, another containing the prayer "Deus qui humane substantiae," which is said by the celebrant when he blesses the cruet of water, and the psalm "Lavabo," recited at the washing of the hands, was placed on the Epistle side. Only during Mass should the cards stand on the altar, the middle one resting against the crucifix or tabernacle, the side ones against the canopies or superstructural steps of the altar. At any other time they are either removed or placed face downwards on the altar under the altar cover. When the Blessed Sacrament is exposed outside of Mass, the cards must be removed (Cong. Sac. Rit., 20 December, 1864). If these cards are framed, the frames should, so far as possible, correspond to the architecture of the altar.

ALTAR-CARPETS.—The sanctuary and altar-steps of the high altar are ordinarily to be covered with carpets. If the sanctuary floor be marble, tile, or tessellated woodwork, at least a broad strip of carpet should be placed below the lowest step in line with the sanctuary steps, and are reserved for the predella and altar-steps. If the whole sanctuary and altar-steps cannot be covered, at least the predella of the high altar, and of the other altars should have a rug (Cerem. Episc., I, xii, 15). Exceptions to this rule: 1 From the time of stripping the altars on Maundy Thursday to Holy Saturday, the carpets are removed, and the floor must be swept clean on Holy Saturday before the Mass. 2 During solemn Requiems Masses the floor of the sanctuary and the altar-steps are to be bare, although a suitable rug may be placed on the predella and, when a bishop celebrates, in front of the faldstool (Cerem. Episc., II, xii, 1). The same authority mentions that the carpet should be of green colour, but any may be used.

ALTAR-CAVITY.—This is a small square or oblong chamber in the body of the altar, in which are placed, according to the Pontificale Romanum (De Eccles. Congregatione) the relics of two canonized martyrs, although the Cong. Sac. Rit. (16 February, 1883) decided that if the relic of only one martyr is placed in it the consecration is valid; to these may be properly added the relics of other saints, especially of those in whose honour the church of the altar is consecrated. These relics must be actual portions of the "beatified" body or parts of other objects which they may have used or touched; the relics must, moreover, be authenticated. If the altar is a fixed or immovable altar, the relics are placed in a reliquary of lead, silver, or gold, which should be large enough to contain, besides the relics, three grains of incense and a small piece of parchment on which is written an attestation of the consecration. This parchment is usually enclosed in a crystal vessel or small vial, to prevent its decomposition. The size of the cavity varies to suit the size of the reliquary. If it is a portable altar the reliquaries are placed in a reliquary of lead, silver, or gold, which should be large enough to contain, besides the relics, three grains of incense and a small piece of parchment on which is written an attestation of the consecration. This parchment is usually enclosed in a crystal vessel or small vial, to prevent its decomposition. The size of the cavity varies to suit the size of the reliquary. If it is a portable altar the reliquary is a block of stone, a block of natural stone is inserted for the purpose in the support. The location of the cavity in a fixed altar is (1) either at the front or back of the altar, (2) in the middle of the altar, (3) at the side of the altar, (4) at the table (mensa) at its centre, near the front edge; (5) in the centre, on the top of the base or support if the latter be a solid mass. If the first or the second location is selected, a slab or cover of stone, fit exactly upon the opening, and for this reason somewhat bevelled at the corners, must be provided. The cover should have a cross engraved on the upper and nether sides. If the third location is chosen the table (mensa) itself serves as the cover. In a portable altar the cavity is usually made on the top of the stone near the front edge, although it may be made in the centre of the stone. This cavity is called in the latter case the mensa. In the Church of St. Peter in Rome the mensa is placed near the wall of the church.

ALTAR-CLOTHS.—The use of altar-cloths goes back to the early centuries of the Church. St. Optatus of Mileva says that in the fourth century every Christian knew that during the celebration of the Mysterium the altar is covered with a cloth (ib. VI, 3). Later it became a law, according to Gavantius, that was promulgated by Boniface III in the seventh century. The custom of using three altar-cloths began probably in the ninth century, but at present is of strict obligation for the licit celebration of Mass (Rubr. Gen. Miss., tit. xx; De Defectibus, tit. x, 1). The reason of this prescription given by the Church is that the Precious Blood is held by action and should not be split in it might be absorbed by the altar-cloths before it reached the altar-stone. All authors hold to be a grievous offence to celebrate without an altar-cloth, except in case of grave necessity, e. g. of affording to the faithful the opportunity of assisting at Sunday Mass, or of giving Viaticum to a dying person. To celebrate without necessity on two altar-cloths, or on one folded in such manner that it covers the altar twice, would probably constitute a venial sin. It is usual practice to cover the upper cloth with another cloth prescriptive. Formally the altar-cloths were made of gold and silver cloth, inlaid with precious stones, silk, and other material, but at present they must be made of either linen or hemp. No other material may be used, even if it be equivalent to, or better than, linen or hemp (Can. 34, infra). The lower altar-cloth must cover the entire table of the altar (menae) of the altar, in length and width (Cerem. Episc., I, xii, 11) whether it be a portable or a consecrated fixed altar (Ephem. Lit., 1893, VII, 234). It is not necessary that there be two distinct pieces. One piece folded in such manner as to cover the altar twice from the epistle to the gospel end will answer (Rurab. Miss., tit. xx). The top altar-cloth must be single and extend regularly to the predella on both sides (ibid.). If the table of the altar rests on columns, or if the altar is made after the fashion of a tomb, the second altar-cloth is not necessary, and in the case of an alpum, the top cloth need only cover the table without extending over the edge at the sides (Ephem. Lit., 1893, VII, 234). The edges at the front and two ends may be ornamented with a border of linen or hempen lace in which figures of the cross, ostensorium, chalice, and host, and the like may appear (Cong. Sac. Rit., 5 December, 1868), and a piece of coloured material may be placed under the border to set forth these figures. This is deduced from a decree (Cong. Sac. Rit., 12 July, 1892) which allows such material to be placed under the lace of the alb's cuff. This border must not rest on the table of the altar. Sometimes, instead of attaching this border to the upper cloth, a piece of lace is fastened to the front edge of the altar. Although this is not prescribed, yet it is not contrary to the rubrics. Great care should be taken that these cloths be scrupulously clean. There should be on hand at least a duplicate of the two altar-cloths. The principal altar-cloth should be changed more frequently according to the solemnity of the feast, and therefore several covers, more or less fine in texture, should be constantly kept ready for this purpose. When, during the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, candles are placed on the table of the altar, another clean white cloth, usually a veil, is thrown over the altar-cloth, their being stained or soiled (De Herdt, I, n. 179). We may note here that the corporal and the cerecloth cannot take the place of the altar-cloths.

The three altar-cloths must be blessed by the bishop or someone who has the faculty, before they can be used for the celebration of Mass. In the United States the faculty is granted by the ordinary to priests in general (Facultates, Form. I, n. 13). The formula of this blessing is found in the “Rituale Romanum”, tit. viii, cap. xxvi, and in the “Missale Romanum”, among the “Benedictiones Diversae”. Symbolically the altar-cloths signify the members of Christ and the faithful, whom the altar is encompassed (Pontificale Rom., De ordinat. subdiaconi); or the linens in which the body of Christ was wrapped, when it was laid in the sepulchre; or the purity and the devotion of the faithful: “For the fine linen are the justifications of saints” (Apoc., xiv. 7). Beneath it which the faithful are covered for consecration (chrismale, with which the table of the consecrated altar (even if part of it be made of bricks or other material, and does not form a part of the consecrated altar) should be completely covered (Cerem. Episc., De altaria consecrationes). It must be of the exact size of the table of the altar, and it is placed under the linen cloths, the waxed side being turned towards the table. Its purpose is not only to prevent the altar-cloths from being stained by the oil used at the consecration, but also to keep the cloths dry. Hence it is advisable to have such a cerecloth on all altar-cloths in churches which are accessible to dampness. According to the rubrics, this cloth is removed once a year, that is, during the stripping of the altars on Maundy Thursday; but it may be changed as often as the altar is washed. The cere-cloth is not blessed. It cannot take the place of one of the threeubrical linen cloths. To procure cere-cloths, it is usual to ask candles in a small vessel. When the wax is in a boiling condition, skim off the impurities that remain from the soiled stumps of candles. Dip into this wax the linen intended for the cere-cloth, and when well saturated hang it on a clothes-line, allowing the surplus wax to drop off. When the wax cloth has hardened, place it between two unwaxed sheets of linen of like dimensions. Iron thoroughly with a well heated flat iron, thus securing three wax cloths. The table on which the cloths are ironed should be covered with an old cloth or thick paper to receive the molten wax from the altar-cloth. It should be remembered that unwashed linen when dipped in wax shrinks considerably, hence before the cloths are waxed they should be much larger than the size of the altar for which they are intended.

ALTAR-Crucifix.—The crucifix is the principal ornament of the altar. It is placed on the altar to recall to the mind of the celebrant, and the people, that the Victim offered on the altar is the same as was offered on the Cross. For this reason the crucifix must be placed on the altar as often as Mass is celebrated (Constit., Aecipimus of Benedict XIV, 16 July, 1746). The rubric of the Roman Missal (xx) prescribes that it be placed at the middle of the altar between the candlesticks, and that it be large enough to be conveniently seen by both the celebrant and the people (Cong. Sac. Rit., 17 September, 1822). If for any reason this crucifix is removed, another may take its place in a lower position; but in such case it must always be placed on the altar of the Mass (ibid.). We remarked above that a crucifix must be placed on the altar during Mass. To this rule there are two exceptions: (1) When the Crucifixion is the principal part of the altar-piece or picture behind the altar. (We advise to say the principal part of the altar-piece or picture, for if there is a crucifix, the entire picture represents it, and not the altar on which it is placed, holding a crucifix in his hand, or St. Thomas kneeling before the cross, even if the cross be large, such a picture is not sufficient to take the place of the altar-crucifix.—See Ephem. Lit., 1893, VII, 409); and (2) when the Most Blessed Sacrament is exposed. In both these cases the regular crucifix may be placed on the altar; in the latter the local custom is to be followed (Cong. Sac. Rit., 2 September, 1741), and if the crucifix is kept on the altar it is not incensed (29 November, 1738). From the first Vespers of Passion Sunday to the unveiling of the cross on Good Friday, even if a solemn feast takes place during this time, the crucifix may be covered with a violet veil (Cong. Sac. Rit., 16 November, 1649), except during High Mass on the altar at which Mass is celebrated on Holy Thursday, when the veil is of white material (Cong. Sac. Rit., 20 December, 1783), and on Good Friday, at the thanksgiving of the cross, the crucifix may be covered with a black veil. This is the custom in Rome (Martinucci, Van der Stappen, and others). From the beginning of the adoration of the Cross, on Good Friday, to the hour of None, on Holy Saturday, inclusively, all, even the bishop, the canons and the celebrant, make a simple genuflection to the cross (Cong. Sac. Rit., 9 May, 1857; 12 September, 1857). At all other times during the year a simple genuflection is made to the cross, even when the Blessed Sacrament is not kept in the tabernacle, during any function, by all except the bishop, the canons of the cathedral, and the celebrant (Cong. Sac. Rit., 30 August, 1892). The altar-crucifix need not be blessed; but it may be blessed by any priest, by the formula “pro imaginibus” (Rituale Rom., lit. viii, cap. xxv). It may be well to note that if, according to the Renaissance style of architecture, the throne is a permanent structure above the tabernacle, the altar-crucifix may never be placed under the canopy under which the Blessed Sacrament is publicly exposed, or on the corporal which is used at such exposition (Cong. Sac. Rit., 2 June, 1883). It is probable that the custom of placing a crucifix on the altar did not commence long before the sixth century. Benedict IV (De Sacrificio Missae, P. I, § 19) holds that this custom comes down from the time of the Apostles. However, the earliest documentary evidence of placing a cross on the altar is canon III of the Council of Tours, held in 667: “Ut corpus Domini in Altari, non in armario, sed sub crucis titulo componatur”. Mariano Armellini (Lezioni di Archologia Sacra) tells us that the early Christians were not accustomed to publicly expose the cross for fear of scandalizing the weak, and subjecting it to the insults of the pagans, but in its stead used symbols, e. g. an anchor, a trident, etc. A simple cross, without the figure of Christ, was fixed on the top of the ciboria which covered the altars.

ALTAR-CURTAIN.—Formerly, in most basilicas, cathedrals, and large churches a large structure in the form of a cupola or dome resting on four columns was erected over the high altar, which was called the ciborium. Between the columns ran metal rods, holding rings in which were fastened curtains which, according to the rubrics of the individual churches, were drawn around the altar at certain parts of Mass. These curtains were styled tetravela altaris and were made of linen, silk, gold cloth, and other precious stuffs. In the lives of many of the Roman pontiffs (Gregory IV, Leo IV, Nicholas I) we read that they made presents of such curtains to the church of Rome. When, however, the altar fell into disuse a curtain was suspended at the back of the altar, called a dossal, or doral, and two others, one at each side of it. They were hung to rods fastened in the wall or reredos, or rested on four pillars erected at each end of the altar. The pillars were surmounted by angels holding candelabra, in which candles were burnt on solemn occasions. Probably the sanctuary candelabra of to-day may trace their origin to these.

ALTAR-FRONTAL.—The frontal (antependium, pallium altaris) is an appendage which covers the entire front of the altar, from the lower part of the table (mensa) to the predella, and from the gospel corner to that of the epistle side. Its origin may probably be traced to the curtains or veils of silk, or of other precious material, which hung over the open space under the altar, to preserve the shrines of the saints usually deposited there. Later, these curtains were converted into one piece of drapery which covered the whole front of the altar and was suspended from the table of the altar (Pugin, Glossary). The use of a frontal which covers only a small portion of the front of the altar is forbidden (Cong. Sac. Rit., 10 September, 1898). If the altar is so placed that its back can be seen by the people, that part should likewise be covered with an antependium (Carrem. Episc., I, iii, 11). Its material is not prescribed by the rubrics. It is sometimes made of precious metals, adorned with enamels and jewels, of wood, painted, gilt, embossed, and often set with crystals, or of cloth of gold, velvet, or silk embroidered, and occasiin the space between the mensa and the predella. A guard about three inches wide (plinth), made of wood suitably painted, or of polished metal, may be placed at its lower extremity, resting on the predella. The latter should not be too high, and should be light, so that it may be moved easily by those who move about the altar. Regularly, the colour of the antependium should correspond with the colour of the feast or office of the day (Cerem. Episc., I, xii, 11). The Missal (Rubr. Gen., xx) says this should be the case quoad fieri potest, by which the Missal does not mean necessarily that it must be the same, but only that it may be used ad libitum for another, but that the more precious antependia of gold, silver, embroidered silk, etc., in colours not strictly liturgical, may be used on solemn occasions, although they do not correspond in colour with the feast or office of the day (Van der Steppen, vol. III, p. 45, 5). The following are exceptions to the general rule: (1) When the Blessed Sacrament is publicly exposed the antependium must be white, whatever the colour of the vestments may be. II, however, the Exposition takes place immediately after Mass, or Vespers, the antependium of the colour of the Mass, or Vespers, must be preserved, the celebrant desiring a stricter observance. (2) When the antependium is placed between the Mass, or Vespers, and the Exposition; but if on these occasions he vests for the exposition outside the sanctuary, the antependium if not white must be exchanged for a white one. (3) In solemn votive Masses the colour of the antependium must be that of the vestments, and the missa lection in such cases (missae lectionis) its colour corresponds to that of the office of the day. In private votive Masses celebrated solemnly, i.e. with deacon and subdeacon, or in chant (missae canlitae) it is proper that its colour correspond with that of the vestments. (3) During a solemn Requiem Mass at an altar in the tabernacle of which the Blessed Sacrament is kept, the black antependium cannot be used (Cong. Sac. Rit., 20 March, 1869), but one of a violet colour should take its place. The Ephemerides Lit., (XI, 663, 1897), states that this decree was revoked by a subsequent decree of the same Congregation, 1 December, 1882. It seems strange that the former decree is retained in the latest edition of the Decrees of the Cong. Sac. Rit. The latter decree is an answer to the question: Under these circumstances may the antependium and the conopaeum (cover of the tabernacle) be black? The answer seems to pass over the antependium, and says, "A more careful consideration shows that the canopy over the tabernacle should be of a violet colour." The antependium need not be blessed.

Altar—Horns.—On the Jewish altar there were four projections, one at each corner, which were called the horns of the altar. These projections are not found on the Christian altar, but the word cornu ("horn") is still maintained to designate the sides or corners of the altar. Hence cornu epistola and cornu evangelii mean the epistle and gospel side of the altar respectively; cornu anterius and cornu posterius evangelii or cornu dexterum anterius and dexterum posterius mean respectively the anterior or posterior corner of the altar at the gospel side.

Altar—Lamp.—In the Old Testament God commanded that a lamp filled with the purest oil of olives should always burn in the Tabernacle of the Testimony without the veil (Exod., xxvii, 20, 21). The Church prescribes that at least one lamp should continually burn before the altar (Rubr. Gen., iv, 6), not only as an ornament of the altar, but for the purpose of worship. It is also a mark of honour. It is to remind the faithful of the presence of Christ, and is a profession of their love and affection. Mystically it signifies Christ, for by this material light He enlightens who is the light which enlighteneth every man (John, i, 9). If the resources of the church permit, it is the rule of the Cerem. Episc. (I, xii, 17) that more than one light should burn before the altar of the Blessed Sacrament, but always in uneven numbers, i.e. three, five, seven, or more. The lamp is usually suspended before the tabernacle, but it should hang sufficiently high and removed from the altar-steps to cause no inconvenience to those who are engaged in the sanctuary. It may also be suspended from, or placed in a bracket, at the side of the altar, provided always it be in front of the altar within the sanctuary proper (Cong. Sac. Rit., 1 June, 1899). The lampshade may be made of any kind of metal, and of any shape or form. According to the opinion of reputable theologians, it would be a serious neglect, involving grave sin, to leave the altar of the Blessed Sacrament without this light for any protracted length of time, such as a day or several nights (St. Lig., VI, 248). For symbolical reasons olive oil is prescribed for the lamp burning before the altar of the Blessed Sacrament, for it is a symbol of purity, peace, and godliness. Since pure olive oil, without any admixture, causes some inconvenience in the average American climate, oils containing between 60 and 100 per cent of olive oil is supposed to be legitimate material. Where olive oil cannot be had, it is allowed, at the discretion of the ordinary, to use other, and as far as possible vegetable, oils (Cong. Sac. Rit., 9 July, 1864). In case of necessity, that is, in very poor churches, or where it is practically impossible to procure olive or vegetable oils, it is provided according to the general opinion of theologians (Lehmkuhl, II, n. 132, div. iv, footnote; Konings, Thol. Mor., II, n. 1300, div. iii) would be justified to authorize the use of petroleum. We are of the opinion, however, that there are but few parishes that can claim this exemption on the plea of poverty. Gas (Ephem. Lit., IX, 176, 1895) and electric lights (Cong. Sac. Rit., 4 June, 1895) are not allowed in its stead. The Cerem. Episc. (Ibid.) would have three lights burn continually before the high altar, and one light before the other altars, at least during Mass and Vespers. Before the Blessed Sacrament, wherever kept, a lamp should be constantly burning. Our bishops have the power of granting permission to a priest, under certain circumstances, to keep the Blessed Sacrament in his house. In such cases, by virtue of Faculty, n. 24, Form. 1, the priest may keep it without a light, if otherwise it would be exposed to the risk of being stolen. For the same reason we believe it may be kept also in the church without a light during the night.

Altar—Lantern.—Lanterns are used in churches to protect the altar candles and lamp, if the latter for any reason, such as a drought, cannot be kept lighted (De Hert, 1, n. 183, note 1°). They are of perforated metal-work or set with crystals. They are used also to accompany the Blessed Sacrament when carried from one altar to another in the church, or when it is carried as Viaticum to the sick. In the former case the lanterns are attached to the top of high steps; in the latter, a ring is fastened to the top of ordinary lanterns, and they are carried in the hand of a cleric or an assistant.

Altar—Ledge.—Originally the altar was made in the shape of an ordinar table, on which the crucifix and candlesticks were placed. By degrees, behind the altar a step was introduced, raised slightly above it, for candlesticks; next, a raised shelf for ornaments. This step was called the altar-ledge. Later the tabernacle was added as a stationary appendix of the altar and at its sides and behind it other steps were placed. They are sometimes called degrees or gradini. The front of these steps is sometimes "true beauty only a sublime in darkness." The gradini of Brunelleschi's church of Santo Spirito, Florence, display beautiful miniature groups of subjects from the Passion of Christ.
Altar-linens.—The altar-linens are the corporal, pall, purificator, and finger-towels. The Blessed Sacrament and the vases containing it must always be placed on a corporal, which must be made of linen (Miss. Rom., Ritus celebr. tit. I, n. 1) or hemp (Cong. Sac. Rit., 15 May, 1819) without any embellishment or embroidery. Corporals made of muslin (Cong. Sac. Rit., 15 March, 1664) or cotton (ibid., 15 May, 1819) are forbidden. The edges may be ornamented with fine lace, and a cross may be worked into it near the front edge. No cross is allowed in its centre (De Herdt, I, n. 197), which would necessarily give it should be destroyed by fire, and its ashes thrown into the sacristry. After the corporal has been washed, bleached, and ironed it is folded into three equal parts, both in its length and width; i.e., the anterior part is folded over the middle; then the posterior part is turned down over the anterior part; after this the part at the priest’s right is folded over the middle, and finally the part at the priest’s left is folded over these. The corporal is placed in the burse in such a manner that the edge of the last fold is towards the opening of the burse, so that it is never possible that the corporal was prescribed as early as the fourth century. Originally it was longer and wider than the one in use at present. It covered the whole table of the altar, and was looked upon as a fourth altar-cloth. About the eleventh century it began to be curred, and by degrees was reduced to its present size. The Carthusians use the corporal in its old form (Benedict XIV, De Sacrific. Missae, I, § 31).

Originally the pall was not distinct from the corporal, because the latter was so large as to do away with the need of a distinct pall, and the posterior part of the corporal was so arranged that it could be easily drawn over the host and chalice. When the corporal was reduced to its present size the pall became a distinct cover of the chalice, and is called by Benedict XIV Corporale quo calix tegitur (ibid., § 34). Although prescribed by the rubrics, theologians hold that its use does not sub grani. It may be a single piece of linen or hemp, or it may consist of two pieces of linen or hemp, between which a piece of cardboard is inserted for the sake of stiffening it. The upper side may be ornamented with embroidery or painting in various colours, or covered with cloth of gold, silver, or silk of any colour except black (Cong. Sac. Rit., 17 July, 1894). It may be embellished with a cross or some other emblem. The nether piece must always be of plain white linen or hemp (ibid.) and be detachable for the purpose of washing it (ibid., 24 November, 1905). Since the pall was originally a part of the corporal, the blessing “Benedictio corporali” is used without change in number or words when blessing one or more palls alone, or one or more palls with one or more corporals (ibid., 4 September, 1880). Like the corporal, it is blessed by a bishop, or by a priest who has faculties to do so. It should be large enough to cover the paten. If the pall is wanting, a folded corporal may be used in its stead.

The purificator is a piece of pure white linen or hemp (Cong. Sac. Rit., 23 July, 1878) used for cleansing the chalice. Its size is not prescribed by the rubrics. It is usually twelve to eighteen inches long, and nine or ten inches wide. It is folded in three layers so that when placed on the chalice beneath the paten its width is about three inches. A small cross may be worked in it at its centre to distinguish it from the little finger-towels used at the “Lavabo,” although this is not prescribed. It is not blessed. It is also called the “scapularia” or “pallium.” The Greeks use a sponge instead of the linen purificator. Before soiled corporals, palls, and purificators are given to nuns or lay persons to be laundered, bleached, mended or ironed, they must be first washed, then rinsed twice by a person in sacred orders (Cong. Sac. Rit., 12 September, 1878). Even when soiled corporals are for the time being little stained, they may be used to stiffen them and give them a smooth surface. The same may be done with the palls.

The purificators are always prepared without starch. Finger-towels, used at the “Lavabo” and after administering Holy Communion, may be made of any kind of material, preferably, however, of linen or hemp, and of any size.

some difficulty when collecting the fragments. The rubrics do not prescribe its size. It must be spacious enough to hold the chalice and large host used by the priest, and also the ciborium containing the smaller hosts for the Communion of the laity. It should be a square, at least fifteen by fifteen inches, or an oblong, fourteen by eighteen inches. The corporal must be blessed by a bishop, or by a priest having the faculty to do so, before it may be used the first time. It is not blessed again after it is washed; use at the Holy Sacrifice does not constitute a blessing (Cong. Sac. Rit., 31 August, 1867). The form of the blessing is the “Benedictio corporalium” found in the Rituale Romanum (tit. viii, cap. xxii) which is not changed to the plural even if many corporals are blessed at the same time (Cong. Sac. Rit., 4 September, 1880). The corporal loses its blessing when no part of it is sufficiently large to hold the chalice and host together, and it is forbidden to use a torn or ripped corporal (Hartmann, § 316, n. 6, b). When the corporal becomes unfit for use I.—23
Christianity special veneration was paid to the Mother of God, which in the language of theology is called hyperdulna, to distinguish the honour rendered to her from that given to the other saints. It is the altar, therefore, that after the main or principal altar, the most prominent is that dedicated in a special manner to the Mother of God; and to indicate this special preference, this altar is usually placed in the most prominent position in the church, i.e. at the right (gospel) side of the main altar. In general, any altar of which the Blessed Virgin is the titular.

ALTAR-PIECE.—A picture of some sacred subject painted on the wall or suspended in a frame behind the altar, or a group of statuary on the altar. In the Middle Ages, instead of a picture or group, the altar-piece consisted in some churches of embossed silver or gold and enamelled work set with jewels. Sometimes the picture was set on the altar itself. If the altar stood free in the choir, and the altar-piece was to be seen from behind as well as from before, both sides were covered with painting (Norton, Church Building in the Middle Ages). The decorative frame, or a recess in the church, is also called an altar-piece. (See ALTAR-SCREEN.)

ALTAR-PROTECTOR.—A cover made of cloth, baire, or velvet which is placed on the table of the altar during the time in which the sacred functions do not take place. Its purpose is to prevent the altar-cloths from being soiled or stained by a movement, and to hide any little wider than the table and somewhat longer than the latter, so that it may hang down several inches on each side and in front. It may be of any colour (green or red would seem to be the preferred colours), and its front and side edges are usually scalloped, embroidered, or ornamented with fringes. During the divine services it is removed (Cong. Sac. Rit., 2 June, 1883), except at Vespers, when, during the incensing of the altar at the "Magnificat", only the front part of the table need be uncovered, and it is then simply turned back on the table of the altar. It is called the vesperrale, the strangulum or altar-cover. It need not be blessed.

ALTAR-RAIL.—The railing which guards the sanctuary and separates the laity from the body of the church. It is also called the communion-rail as the faithful kneel at it when receiving Holy Communion. It is made of carved wood, metal, marble, or other precious material, and should be six or seven inches high, and on the upper part from six to nine inches wide. The "Rituale Romanum" (tit. iv, cap. ii, n. 1) prescribes that a clean white cloth be extended before those who receive Holy Communion. This cloth is to be of fine linen, as it is solely intended as a covering of the person who receives the particles which may by chance fall from the hands of the priest. It is usually fastened on the sanctuary side and when in use is drawn over the top of the rail. It should extend the full length of the rail, and be about two feet wide, so that the communicant, taking it in both hands, may hold it under his chin. Its very purpose suggests that it is not to be made of linen, although there is nothing to forbid its having a border of fine lace or embroidery. Instead of this cloth a girt paten, larger than the paten used at the Altar, to which a handle may be attached, or a small gilt or silver salver, or a pall, larger than the chalice pall, may be used. These latter are usually passed from one communicant to another, and when the last has received the end of the rail at the Gospel side has received Holy Communion the Altar-boy carries the paten to the first communicant at the Epistle side. A consecrated paten may never be placed for this purpose in the laity persons.

ALTAR-SCREEN.—The Cenom. Epise. (I, xii, n. 13) says that if the High Altar is attached to the wall (or is not more than three feet from the wall) a more precious cloth, on which images of Our Lord, of the Blessed Virgin, or of saints, are represented, may be suspended above the Altar, unless such images are painted on the wall. This piece of embroidered net, cloth of gold, or tapestry is called the Altar-screen. It is as wide as the altar, and sometimes even extends along the sides of the altar. Its purpose seems to be to separate the Altar from the rest of the sanctuary, and to attract to the Altar the eyes of those who enter the church. It is called the dado or dorsala, which signifies a back panel covered with stuff. Formerly the stuff corresponded in colour with the other ornaments of the Altar and was changed according to the festivals (Pugin, Glossary, s. v. "Dossel"). Instead of the cloth a permanent or movable structure was sometimes raised above the altar at the back. If permanent it consisted of three distinct parts, the base which was as long as the table and the steps of the Altar, and reached to the height of the Altar table; above this came the panel which formed a decorative frame to a picture, bas-relief, or statue, and the cornice, consisting of a frieze and pediment supported by a column or columns. In the earlier structures it was usually made of metal, in the thirteenth century of stone, and from the fourteenth century of wood. Sometimes a folding door was attached which covered the picture during the year, and was opened on great festivals to expose the picture. If it was a permanent structure, it was usually made of silver or other precious material, supported on the Altar itself. The face of this structure which looks towards the nave of the church is called the "retable", and the reverse is called the "counter-retable". This decoration of the altar was not known before the twelfth century. It should always correspond to the architecture or style of the church. The best models are found in the churches of St. Sylvester in Capite, Sts. Maria del Popolo, della Pace, and sopra Minerva, at Rome. When this structure is ornamented with panels and enriched with niches, statues, buttresses, and other decorations, which are often painted with brilliant colours, it is called a "reredos". Sometimes the reredos extends across the whole breadth of the church, and is carried nearly up to the ceiling. This decorative screen, retable, or reredos is also called the altar-piece.

ALTAR-SIDE.—That part of the altar which faces the congregation and intradistinction to the side at which the priest stood when reading the Epistle and at the altar facing the people. In ceremonies we frequently find mention of the right and left side of the altar. Before 1488, the epistle side was called the right side of the altar, and the gospel side the left. In that year, Augustine Patrizi, Bishop of Pienza, published a ceremonial in which the epistle side is called the left of the altar, and the gospel side the right, the denomination being taken from the facing of the cross, the principal ornament of the altar, not of the priest or the laity. This change of expression was accepted by St. Pius V and introduced into the ritual of these or many other altars.

ALTAR-STEPS.—In the beginning altars were not erected on steps. Those in the catacombs were constructed on the pavement, and in churches they were usually erected over the confession, or spot where the remains of martyrs were deposited. In the fourth century the altar was supported by one step above the altar, and in the sixth century the steps leading up to the high altar are for symbolic reasons uneven; usually three, five, or seven, including the upper platform (predella). These steps are to pass around the altar on three sides. They may be of wood, stone, or bricks, but St. Charles (Instructions Ecclesiasticae, §2) would have the steps in the two or four lower steps of stone or bricks, whilst he prescribes that the predella, on which the celebrant stands, should be made of wood. The steps should be about one foot in breadth. The predella should extend along the front of the altar with a breadth of about three feet six inches, and at the sides of the altar about one foot. The height of each step ought to be about six inches. Side altars must have at least one step.

Altar-Stole.—An ornament, having the shape of the ends of a stole, which in the Middle Ages was attached to the front of the altar.

Altar-Stone.—A solid piece of natural stone, consecrated by a bishop, large enough to hold the Sacred Host and chalice. It is inserted into or placed on the surface of a structure which answers the purpose of an altar, when the whole altar is not consecrated. Sometimes the whole table (mensa) takes the place of the smaller altar-stone. It is called a portable altar.

Altar-Tomb.—A tomb, or monument, over a grave, oblong in form, which is covered with a slab or table, having the appearance of an altar. Sometimes the table is bare, and sometimes it supports one or more recumbent sculptured figures. It either stands free, so that the four sides are exposed, or one side is against a wall, when a canopy or niche is often raised above it.

Altar-Vase.—Vase to hold flowers for the decoration of the altar. The Cerem. Episc. (I, xii, n. 12) says that between the candlesticks on the altar may be placed natural or artificial flowers, which are certain appropriate ornaments of the altar. The flowers referred to are cut flowers, leaves, and ferns, rather than plants imbedded in soil in large flowerpots, although the latter may fitly be used for the decoration of the sanctuary around the altar. If artificial flowers are used they ought to be made of superior material, as the word ascorro (ibid.) evidently implies, and represent with some accuracy the natural variations. Flowers of paper, cheap muslin, or calico, and other inferior materials, and such as are old and soiled, should never be allowed on the altar.

Altar-Vessels.—The chalice is the cup in which the wine and water of the Eucharistic Sacrifice is contained. It should be either of gold, or of silver with the cup gilt on the inside; or it may have a cup only of silver, gilt on the inside; in which case the base and stem may be of any metal, provided it be solid, clean, and becoming (Miss. Rom., Ritus celebr., tit. 1, n. 1). On the base, in the bottom of the base, tit. x, n. 1) it may be also made of stannum (an alloy of tin and lead), with the cup gilt on the inside, but authors permit this only by way of exception in case of extreme poverty. Chalices made of glass, wood, copper, or brass are not permitted, and cannot be consecrated by the bishop (Cong. Sac. Rit., 16 September, 1865). The base may be round, hexagonal, or octagonal, and should be so wide that there is no fear of the chalice tilting over. Near the middle of the stem, between the base and the cup, there should be a knob, in order that the chalice, especially after the Consecration, when the priest rests his thumb and index finger joined together, may be easily handled. This knob may be adorned with precious stones, but care should be taken that they do not protrude so far as to hinder the easy handling of the chalice. The base and cup may be embellished with pictures or emblems, even in relief, but in every case it should be borne in mind that the lip of the chalice. The cup should be narrow at the bottom, and become gradually wider as it approaches the mouth. The rounded or turned-down lip is very unserviceable. The height is not determined, but it should be at least eight inches.

Altar-Bread.—The bread in which the altar-bread is offered in the Holy Sacrifice. It should be made of the same material as the chalice, and if it is made of anything else than gold it should be gilt on the concave side. Its edge ought to be thin and sharp, so that the particles on the corporeal may be easily collected. It should not be embelished, at least on the concave side, in any manner; however, one small cross or circle may be made to indicate the place on which it is to be kissed by the celebrant. Any sharp indentation on the upper side prevents its being easily cleaned. Those having a plain surface throughout, with the gradual slight depression towards the centre, are the most susceptible. By a decree of the Cong. Sac. Rit., 6 December, 1886, Pope Pius IX allowed chalices and patens to be used which were made of aluminum mixed with other metals in certain proportions given in the "Instructio," provided the whole surface was silvered, and the cup gilt on the inside, but this decree is expunged from the latest edition of the Decrees. Both the chalice and the paten, before they can be used at the Sacrifice of the Mass, must be consecrated by the ordinary, or by a bishop designated by him. Only in exceptional cases can a priest, who has received special faculties for doing so from the Holy See, consecrate them. By virtue of Facultates Extraordinarii, C. 1, fast vi, the bishops of the United States may delegate a simple priest. The mere fact of celebrating the Holy Sacrifice with an unconsecrated chalice and paten can never supply the place of this rite, specially ordained by the Church.

Loss of Consecration.—The chalice loses its consecration when it becomes unfit for the purpose for which it is destined. Hence it becomes devoid of consecration: (1) when the slightest break or slit appears in the cup near the bottom. This is not the case if the break be near the upper part, so that without fear of spreading its contents, the chalice can remain in place. (2) When a very noticeable break appears in any part, so that it would be unbecoming to use it. (3) When the cup is separated from the stem in such a manner that the parts could not be joined except by an artificer, unless the cup was originally joined to the stem, and the stem to the base, by means of a screwing device. If, however, to the bottom of the cup a rod is firmly attached which passes through the stem to the base, under which is a nut used to hold the different parts together, then, if this rod should break, tuitus videtur to reconsacrate it (Van der Stappen, III, quest. Ixxviii). (4) When it is regilt, except for the base, on the base. A chalice does not lose its consecration by the mere wearing away of the gilding, because the whole chalice is consecrated; but it becomes unfit for the purpose of consecrating in it, for the rubric prescribes that it be gilded on the inside. After being regilt, the celebrating of Mass with the chalice cannot supply its consecration (St. Lig., bk. VI, n. 380). The custom of desecrating a chalice, or other sacred vessel, by striking it with the hand or some instrument, or in any other manner, before giving it to a workman for regilding, is positively forbidden (Cong. Sac. Rit., 23 April, 1822). By making slight repairs upon the chalice or paten, the consecration is not lost. The Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office in 1874 decided that a chalice loses its consecration if it is employed by heretics for any profane use, e.g. for a drinking cup at table. The paten loses its consecration: (1) When it is broken to such an extent that it becomes unfit for the purpose for which it is intended, e.g. if the break be so large that particles could fall through it. (2) When it becomes battered to such an extent that it would be unbecoming to use it. (3) When it is regilt. A chalice which becomes unserviceable is not to be sold, but should, if possible, be used at some sacred purpose.

of the laity are kept. It need not necessarily be made of gold or silver, since the Roman Ritual (tit. iv, cap. i, n. 5) merely prescribes that it be made ex solida decenrique materiāt. It may even be made of copper provided it be gilt (Cong. Sac. Rit., 31 Aug., 1887). If made of any material other than gold, it should be of the color of the altar. If it is to be gilt (Cong. Epist. et Reg., 26 July, 1858). It must not be made of ivory (ibid.) or glass (Cong. Sac. Rit., 30 January, 1880). Its base should be wide, its stem should have a knob, and it may be embellished and adorned like the chalice (vide supra). There should be a slight round edge below the centre, at the bottom, to facilitate the taking out of the particles when only a few remain therein. The cover, which should fit tightly, may be of a pyramidal or a ball shape, and should be surmounted by a cross. The ciborium ought to be at least seven inches high. It is not consecrated, but only blessed by the bishop or priest having the requisite faculties according to the form of the "Benedictio tabernaculi" (Rit. Rom., tit. viii., xxiiii). As long as the Blessed Sacrament is reserved in it, the ciborium must be covered with a veil of precious material of white colour (Rit. Rom., tit. iv., i, n. 5), which may be embroidered in gold and silver and made fit for the purpose; and if it should actually contain the Blessed Sacrament, this veil must be removed. Hence, after its purification at Mass, or when filled with new particles to be consecrated, it is placed on the altar, the veil cannot be put on it. Even from the consecration to the Communion it remains uncovered. Just before placing it in the tabernacle after Communion the veil is placed on it. It is advisable to have two ciboria, as the newly consecrated particles must never be mixed with those which were consecrated before. In places in which Holy Communion is carried solemnly to the sick, other ciboria of the same style is intended for this purpose. The little pyx used for carrying Holy Communion to the sick is made of the same material as that of which the ciborium is made. It must be gilt on the inside, the lower part should have a slight elevation in the centre, and it is blessed by the form "Benedictio tabernaculi" (Rit. Rom., tit. viii., xxiiii). The ciborium and pyx lose their blessing in the same manner as the chalice loses its consecration.

OSTENSORIUM.—The ostensorium (ostensory, monstrance) is a glass-framed shrine in which the Blessed Sacrament is publicly exposed. It may be of gold, silver, brass, or copper gilt (Cong. Sac. Rit., 31 August, 1857). It must be of proper size and shape, emitting its rays to all sides (Instructio Clement., § 5). The base should be wide, and at a short distance above it there should be a knob for greater ease in handling. The ostensorium must be surmounted by a cross (Cong. Sac. Rit., 11 September, 1847). It should not be embellished with the small statues of saints, as these and the relics of saints are forbidden to be placed on the altar during solemn Benediction. At the sides of the receptacle in which the lunula is placed it is appropriate to have two statues representing adoring angels. In the middle of the ostensorium there should be a receptacle of such a size that a large Host may be easily put into it; care must be taken that the Host does not touch the sides of this receptacle. On the front and back of this receptacle there should be a crystal, the one on the back opening like a door; when closed, the latter must fit tightly. The circumference of this receptacle must either be of gold or, if of other material, it should be gilt, and so smooth and polished that any particle that may fall from the Host will be easily detected and removed. The lunula must be inserted and removed without difficulty; hence the device for keeping it in upright position should be constructed with this end in view. The ostensorium need not necessarily be blessed, but it is better that it should be. The form "Benedictio tabernaculi" (Rit. Rom., tit. viii., xxiiii) or the form "Benedictio ostensorii" (Rit. Rom., in Appendice) may be used. When carried to and from the altar it ought to be covered with a white veil.

The lunula (lunette) is made of the same material as the ostensorium or may be of the color of the altar. If it is to be gilt (Cong. Sac. Rit., 31 August, 1887). In form it may be either of two crescents or of two crystals encased in metal. If two crescents be used, the arrangement should be such that they can be separated and cleaned. Two stationary crescents, of different sizes into which the Sacred Host is pressed, are, for obvious reasons, not possible. If two crystals are used it is necessary that they be so arranged that the Sacred Host does not in any way touch the glass (Cong. Sac. Rit., 14 January, 1886). The ostensorium, provided it contains the Blessed Sacrament, may be placed in the tabernacle, but then it should be covered with a white silk veil. (Recent authors say that since the ostensorium is intended merely ad monstrandum and not ad asserendum SS. Eucharistiam it should not be placed in the tabernacle.) When the Blessed Sacrament is taken out of the ostensorium after Benediction it should be opened or made lighter, if it contains the Sacred Host, or if it is removed it should, before being placed in the tabernacle, be enclosed in a receptacle, called the repository (custodia, repository, capula), which is made like the pyx, used in carrying Holy Communion to the sick, but larger, and may have a base with a very short stem. If the Blessed Sacrament is allowed to remain in the crescent-shaped lunula both it and the lunula may be placed in the same kind of receptacle, or in one specially made for this purpose, having a device at the bottom for keeping the Sacred Host in an upright position. The latter should have a platform for the Host to rest securely on, the back part, through which the lunula is inserted. This receptacle is made through- out of silver or of other material, gilt on the inside, smooth and polished, and surmounted by a cross. No corporal is placed in it. If the lunula be made of two crystals, encased in metal, it may, when containing the Blessed Sacrament, be placed in the tabernacle without enclosing it in a custodia. If the host be placed before the Consecration in the lunula made of two crystals, the latter must be opened before the words of Consecration are pronounced. The lunula and the custodia are blessed with the form "Benedictio tabernaculi" (Rit. Rom., tit. viii., xxiiii) by a bishop or by a priest having the faculty. They lose their blessing when they are regilt, or when they become unfit for the use for which they are intended. All the sacred vessels, when not actually containing the Blessed Sacrament, should be placed in an iron safe, or other secure place, in the sacristy, so as to be safeguarded against robbery or profanation of any kind. Each ought to be placed in its own case or covered with a separate veil, for protection against dust and dampness.

VAIN-WINE.—Wine is one of the two elements absolutely necessary for the sacrifice of the Eucharist. For valid and licit consecration vinum de vite, i.e. the pure juice of the grape naturally and properly fermented, is to be used. Wine made out of raisins, provided that it is prepared from its own colour and taste it may be judged to be pure, may be used (Collect. S. C. de (Fide, n. 705). It may be of strong, sweet or dry. Since the validity of the Holy Sacrifice, and the lawfulness of its celebration, require absolutely genuine wine, it becomes the serious obligation of the celebrant to procure only pure wines. And since wines are frequently so adulterated as to escape minute chemical analysis, it may be taken for granted that the safest way of procur-pure wine is to buy it not at second hand, but directly from a manufacturer who understands and conscientiously respects the great responsibility involved in the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice. If the wine is changed into vinegar, or is become putrid or corrupted, if it was pressed from grapes that were not fully ripe, or if it is mixed with such a quantity of water that it can hardly be called wine, its use is forbidden (Missale Rom., De Defectibus, lit. iv. 1).
If the wine begins to turn into vinegar, or to become putrid, or is the unfermented juice as pressed from the grape, it would be a grievous offence to use it, but it is considered valid matter (ibid., 2). To conserve weak and feeble wines, and in order to keep them from spoiling or turning sour, it is customary to add a small quantity of spirits of wine (grape brandy or alcohol) may be added, provided the following conditions are observed: (1) The added spirit (alcohol) must have been distilled from the grape (ex genuinis ritibus); (2) the quantity of alcohol added, together with that which the wine contained naturally after fermentation, must not exceed eighteenths per cent of the whole; (3) the addition must be made during the process of fermentation (S. Romana et Univ.
Inquis., 5 August, 1896).

ALTARAGE.—From the low Latin altaratium, which signified the revenue reserved for the chapter (Chapter) of the cathedral church, it is derived the income of the parish priest (Du Cange, Glossarium).
At present it signifies the fees received by a priest from the laity when discharging any function for them, e.g. at marriages, baptisms, funerals. It is also termed honorarium, stipend, stole-fee.

Altar (in the Greek church.)—I. The word altar (sometimes spelled altor) is used in the Old Slavonic and Russian languages to denote the entire space surrounding what we know as the altar, which is included behind the iconostasis, and is the equivalent of the Greek word βηθά. Thus it corresponds in a manner of liturgical language to the altar board in the Greek church. Hence the altar of the Russian Orthodox or the Ruthenian Greek Catholic churches means the sanctuary, and not merely the altar known to Latin churches. The altar itself is called in Old Slavonic and Russian prestol, "the throne", in allusion to Our Lord's seat there as King. The altar of the Greeks, using the Old Slavonic as their liturgical language, includes not only the altar (prestol) but also the little side altar, or prothesis, where the proskomide (or preparation of the bread and wine for Mass) takes place, and also the seats for the clergy and the throne or cathedra for the bishop.
In the Latin church also these are placed on the altar, while with us they are usually placed behind the altar and on a step or at a lower level so that the occupants may see over the altar.

II. The altar in the Greek church (ἡ τάφρος τῶν) has remained practically unchanged and undamaged.
The Greeks, unlike the Latins, have placed their altar in a recess immediately in front of the iconostasis of the altar. In churches of the Latin Rite the altar itself has been added to by reredos and altar-pieces and the like; yet altars of the older form may still be seen in Rome. In St. Peter's, St. Peter's, Santa Maria Mag-iori, St. John Lateran, St. Paul's, and other churches. Beside this the Western Rite has usually placed at the altar against the wall of the church;
the Greek Rite keeps it apart and isolated so that the officiating clergy may pass around it. The Roman altar, while rectangular, is usually longer in one direction than the other; but the Greek altar is made square so that every measurement is equal.
The altar in the top portion of the altar or one board at least. Herein it differs from the Roman Rite which requires that even a wooden altar should have a stone slab or "sepulchre" wherein are enclosed the relics of the saints. Upon the altar are the candles which are lighted during Mass, the cross, the book and the Holy Incense. While in the Eastern churches the altar is always made only in low relief, and also the book of the Gospels, containing the various Gospels arranged for reading in the Mass for the various Sundays and feast days during the Greek ecclesiastical year. The book of the Gospels is usually laid flat on the altar until the time when the sacred elements are brought for consecration;
then it is stood up on edge in front of, and almost covering the tabernacle. Besides the Gospels, the missal, or εὐχήβιβασμος, is also upon the altar,
from which the priests read and intone the unchangeable parts of the Mass. The tabernacle containing the sacred elements is found only in the Eastern Rite, does not always rest upon the altar. Often these tabernacles, beautifully built, rest upon a pillar or other foundation about a foot or so behind the altar. The altar in the Greek Church, as being the place on which the glory of the Lord rests, is vested with two coverings. The first is of white linen next to the altar itself, and the second or outer covering is made of rich brocade or embroidery and is called the endytion (ἐνδυτίων). Besides this there is the antimension which is usually placed on every altar and which contains the relics of some saint. A church and its altar should be consecrated by a bishop, but sometimes it is found impossible or inconvenient to accomplish this, and so a priest may perform the consecration; but he must use the antimension which has been duly consecrated by the bishop in almost the same manner as an altar is consecrated.

The Greek consecration service, after the singing of hymns and psalms, and the consecration of the holy water used in the service, begins by the bishop sprinkling the altar with holy water. He then pours into the nail holes of the altar-board a mixture of incense wax, and the priests then nail down the sides of the altar-board. The bishop then kneels and prays that the Holy Ghost may descend and sanctify the temple and altar.
Then begins the ablution of the altar. While psalms are being sung the bishop lightly rubs the top board of the altar with soap in the form of a cross and pours water on it, and the priests take cloths and rub the altar dry. Then the bishop takes red wine mixed with a drop of water and pours the mixture on the altar in the shape of a cross and rubs it into the wood. With some drops of the same wine he sprinkles the antimension destined for the new altar.
Then the bishop anoints the top board and the sides of the altar with the same water, and anoints the antimension. In the Greek Catholic Church the altar is washed three times while the psalms are being sung. Then begins the vesting of the altar.
First a white linen covering is placed over the altar crosswise; and over this first cover a second one of brilliant and embroidered material is called the endytion. Then one is placed on the altar a fine large wrap or cloth called the heileton (εἰκώνα) which is somewhat analogous to the burse of the Latin Rite, and in it the antimension is enfolded.
All these are put in place after having been blessed.
and sprinkled with holy water while the appropriate Psalms are being chanted. After this the church is then consecrated, or it is ready for consecration. Among the Greeks the altar is always consecrated on Holy Thursday or on a Thursday between Easter and the Ascension.

Altar (in Scripture).—The English word altar, if the common accepted etymology be accepted—\textit{alta ara}—does not describe as well as its Hebrew and Greek equivalents, \textit{מִזְבָּח} (from \textit{זְבַח}, to sacrifice) and \textit{θυσιαστήριον} (from \textit{θυσία}, to immolate), the purpose of the thing it stands for.

1 IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—As soon as men conceived the idea of offering sacrifices to the Deity, they felt the need of places specially designed for this end. These primeval specimens of altars were necessarily most simple, very likely consisting of a heap of stones or earth, suitable for the fire and the victims. Some of the megalithic monuments left by prehistoric man seem to have been erected for this purpose. It is probable that this simple description of the altars which Cain and Abel used to offer up their sacrifices, though Scripture does not mention in connection with their names any such monuments; such also were the altars built up by Noe after the flood (Gen., viii., 20); by Abraham in Sichem (Gen., xiii., 7); Bethel (Gen., xii., 8, xiii., 18); and Isaac and Jacob at Bersabee (Gen., xxvi., 25; xlv., 1), and by the latter in Galaad (Gen., xxxi., 54). The same may be said of the altar erected in the desert of Sinai before the golden calf (Ex., xxx, 3). During the period of the Judges and of the Kings the altar of the Israelites, owing to their propensity to idolatrous worship, raised up altars to Baal and Ashtaroth, even to Moloch and Chamos. No temple enclosed these altars or those erected to the one true God by the patriarchs; they were raised up in the open air, and preferably on the tops of the hills, whence their name, “high places”. The Chanaanites’ high places were commonly located near large and shady trees, or in the woods, in the midst of which a consecrated precinct was marked out, affording good opportunities for the sacred debaucheries accompanying the Astaroth-worship, which were so often alluded to by the Prophets.

1 ALTAR OF HOLOCAUST.—Modern critics affirm that there existed in Israel different legitimate places of worship before the time of Josias, an assertion, however, which is not to be examined here as only regulations concerning the altar come under consideration at present. The earliest ordinance on the subject is found in Ex., xx, 24-26 as follows: “You shall make an altar of earth unto me, and you shall offer upon it your holocausts and peace offerings, your sheep and oxen, in every place where the memory of my name shall be: I will come there, and will bless thee. And if thou make an altar of stone unto me, thou shalt not build it of hewn stones; for if thou lift up a tool upon it, it shall be defiled. Thou shalt not go up by steps unto my altar, lest thy nakedness be discovered.” These regulations fairly correspond to the practice hitherto commonly followed, as may be gathered from the indications furnished by the histories of the patriachs. The Deuteronomic Law, while enforcing the injunction of local unity of worship, repeals, on the occasion of the altar erected on Mount Hebal, these primitive rules: “Thou shalt build ... an altar not adorned nor polished” (Deut., xxvii, 5, 6; cf. Jos. viii., 30, 31). The description given in the places cited, as well as that of the altar erected near the Jordan by the Rubenite Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manassses (Jos., xxii.), which was “the pattern of the altar of Yahweh”, suggests that the altars there referred to were large constructions (Jos., xxii, 10). It may well be supposed, however, that they were not built on a mound and reached by a slope or even by steps. The motive, indeed, for the rule of Ex., xx, 26, had disappeared since the priests had been provided with breeches (Ex., xxviii, 42). There are reasons to suppose that the altars erected at Silo and the other places of the princes of the Ark in Jerusalem, though probably of smaller dimensions, were of the same general description. These were fixed altars, the splendor of which was to be surpassed in the memory of Israel by that of the altar erected by Solomon in front of the Temple. Before describing it, and sketching its history, it is proper to gather the different references found in the Bible to the portable altar used during the wanderings of the Hebrews through the wilderness.

(a) Altar of Holocauist of the Tabernacle.—According to the prescriptions of Ex., xxvii, 1-8, xxviii, 1-7, this altar of holocaust, constructed of seith wood five cubits square and three in height; it was covered with plates of brass. At its four upper corners were four “horns”, likewise overlaid with brass, which probably served to hold the flesh of the victims heaped upon the altar. In the case of sin-offerings, and of the priest put to death, two horns of these were taken; they were also a place of refuge, as is to be inferred from Ex., xxi, 14. A grate of brass, after the manner of a net, extended to the middle of the altar, and under it a hearth. At the four corners of the net rings had been cast; and through these rings ran two bars of seith wood covered with brass. This grate was indeed not solid, but empty and hollow on the inside. Such expressions as “to come down from the altar” (Lev., iv, 22) lead us to suppose that this altar which was placed at the door of the tabernacle (Lev., iv, 18) was usually set upon a hillock and reached by a slope.

Some believe also that the above-described altar, which was merely a framework, had to be filled with earth or stones, in compliance with the regulations of Ex., xx, 24, and in order to prevent from being injured by the flames of the sacrifices. The altar served not only for the holocausts, but also for all other sacrifices in which the sin was burnt. Fire was unceasingly kept in the hearth for the sacrifices. When this altar was built up, before serving for Divine worship, it was solemnly consecrated by an anointing with holy oil and by daily anointings and aspersions with the blood of the sin-offerings for seven days. For twelve days this was followed by daily sacrifice offered by the princes of each tribe; thenceforth all bloody sacrifices were offered on this altar. Some independent critics, remarking that this altar is mentioned in the sacerdotal code only (cf. Pentateuch), and arguing from the anomalies presented by the idea of the construction in wood, according to which a strong fire continually burned, regard this former altar of holocaust, not as the pattern, but as a projection back to early times and on a smaller scale, of the altar of Jerusalem.

(b) Altar of Holocauist of the Temple of Solomon.—This is the only altar under the name of “brass altar”. It was located in the Temple court, to the east of the Temple proper. In form it resembled the altar of the tabernacle, but its dimensions were much larger: twenty cubits in length, twenty cubits in breadth, and ten cubits in height (II Par., iv, 1). Ex., xiii, 17 suggests that it was erected upon the rock of Sakkara which still can be seen in the Haram es-Sherif. The whole structure, base and altar proper, was entirely filled up with rocks and earth. A slope, which Talmudic traditions suppose to have been broken three times by severe storms, led to the base, which was a few feet wider than the altar proper, in order that the priest might easily go around the latter. This altar, built up by Solomon (III K., viii, 64), was the object of a new consecration during Aasa’s reign (II Par., xv, 5), which makes us think that some restoration had taken place. Ahas remodeled it to a new form, and in its place erected another, similar to that which he had seen in Damascus (IV K., xvi, 10–15). A restoration of the former order of things very likely occurred under Eschias, although the sacred text does not mention it explicitly. Again polluted by Eschias’ son Magoth, it was later on restored and dedicated again to Jehovah by the same prince (IV K., xxi, 4, 5; II Par., xxxiii, 4, 5, 16). The destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonian army (587) was of course fatal to both the Temple and the altar, and both may be applied the sigh of the author of the Lamentations: “The stones of the sanctuary are scattered in the streets!”

Altar of Incense.—In the above description not a word has been said of the incense offerings that were part of the Yahweh worship. There is indeed, on the subject of these offerings and the Temple furniture connected with them, a noteworthy divergence between the hitherto common opinion and that of the modern biblical scholars, especially as regards the introduction of incense into the Yahweh worship as an innovation of relatively recent date (Jer., vi, 20); they remark that, with the exception of a few passages, the origin of which it is easy to determine, the biblical writers speak only of one altar, and that that altar is the altar of incense. Consequently, each priest possesses one (Lev., xvi, 12, 18–20; x; Num., xvi, 17; iii, 4–10). They argue, besides, from the adventitious character, the late date, and the priestly origin, of the so-called Mosaic texts referring to the altar of incense, as well as from the vacillating statements concerning it in the latest sources of Jewish history; and they conclude that neither in the tabernacle nor in the first Temple did there exist an altar of incense. We shall presently give the indications which the opinion heretofore considered as common makes use of in the description of this piece of tabernacle and Temple furniture. The first altar of incense constructed in the wilderness was foursquare, measuring a cubit in length, as much in breadth, and two cubits in height. Made of setim wood, overlaid with the purest gold (hence the name “golden altar”), it was encircled by a crown of the same material; it had likewise a golden crown on its top; and, like many other vessels, it was the costly protectors. The Jews had a sorrowful experience of this, especially when the Persian general Bagoses imposed for seven years a heavy tax upon every sacrifice (Josephus, Ant., XI, vii, 1). The reign of Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) signalized itself by new profanations: “On the fifteenth day of the month Casleu, in the hundred and forty-fifth year of the Grecian era, king Antiochus set up the abominable idol of desolation upon the altar of God” (I Mach., iv, 57; iv, 38). How the tyranny of this prince roused the zeal and courage of the Machabees and their followers, and how, through a long and hard-fought struggle, the generation of the Seleucides cannot be narrated here. Suffice it to say that Judas Machabeus, after having routed Antiochus’ army, “considered about the altar of holocausts that had been profaned, what he should do with it. And a good counsel came into their minds to pull it down: lest it should be a reproach to them, because the Gentiles had defiled it; so they threw it down. And they laid up the stones in the mountain of the temple in a convenient place. Then they took whole stones according to the law, and built a new altar according to the former . . . and took the first month and the second month . . . in the hundred and forty-eighth year . . . they offered sacrifice according to the law upon the new altar of holocausts which they had made” (I Mach., iv, 44–53). The anniversary of this new dedication was thenceforward celebrated by a feast, added to the liturgical calendar. The altar in question remained under the ban of the Temple by the Romans. Josephus and the Talmud disagree as to the dimensions of the base. Instead of being overlaid with plates of brass, like the brazen altar of Solomon’s Temple, it was covered on the outside with a solid plastering which might be easily replaced. By the horn of the southwest corner was an outlet for the blood of the victims, and a hollow to receive libations. Such was the altar at the time of Jesus Christ (Matt., v, 23, 24; xxiii, 18); involved in the curse that hung over the Temple since the Saviour’s last days, it was wrecked with the Temple (Acts, d. 70) by Titus’s army, never to be built up again and dedicated to Jehovah as the altar of incense was.
Altar.

History of the Christian.—The Christian altar consists of an elevated surface, tabular in form, on which the sacrifice of the Mass is offered. The earliest Scripture reference to the altar is in St. Paul (I Cor. x, 21); the Apostle contrasts the “table of the Lord” (τράπεζα Κυρίου) on which the Eucharist is offered, with the “table of devils”, or pagan altars. In Greek liturgies, either used alone or with the addition of such reverential qualifying terms as ἱερό, μνηστικόν, the Epistle to the Hebrews (xiii, 10) refers to the Christian altar as δωρεάντωρ, the word by which the Septuagint alludes to Noah’s altar. This term occurs in several of the Epistles of St. Ignatius (Ad Eph. v; Magnes. iv, 7; Philad. 4), as well as in the writings of a number of fourth and fifth century Fathers and historians; Eusebius employs it to describe the altar of the great church at Tyre (Hist. Eccl. X, iv, 44). Ἴερος, however, was the term generally in use, and the early Fathers often designate an altar, was carefully avoided by the Christians of the first age, because of its pagan associations; it is first used by Synesius, Bishop of Cyrene, a writer of the early fifth century. The terms altar, mensa, ara, altarium, with or without a genitive addition (as mensa Dominii), are employed by the early Fathers to designate an altar. The word ara, however, is more commonly applied to pagan altars, though Tertullian speaks of the Christian altar as ara Dei. But St. Cyprian makes a sharp distinction between ara and altar, pagan altars being ara dialoboli, while the Christian altar is altar Dei [quasi post aras altaris aedificat Dei altare (Ep. ad Grat. vi, ed. Hartel, II, 722; P. L., Ep. Ixiv, iv, 380)]. Altars was the word most commonly used for altar, and was equivalent to the Greek τράπεζα.

I. Material and Form.—The earliest Christian altars were of wood, and identical in form with the ordinary house tables. The tables represented in the Eucharistic frescoes of the catacombs enable us to obtain an idea of their appearance. The most ancient, as well as the most remarkable, of these frescoes, that of the Fractio Panis found in the Capella Greca, which dates from the first decades of the second century, shows seven persons seated on a semi-circular divan before a table of the same form. Tabular-shaped altars of wood continued in use till well on in the Middle Ages. St. Athanasius speaks of a wooden altar which was burned by the Count Heraclius (Athan. ad Mon., iv), and St. Augustine relates that the Donatists tore apart a wooden altar under which the orthodox Bishop Maximianus had taken refuge (Ep. clxxxv, ch. vii, P. L., XXXIII, 805). The first legislation against such altars dates from the year 517, when the Council of Epaon, in Gaul, forbade the consecration of any but stone altars (Mansi, Coll. Conc., VIII, 562). But this prohibition concerned only a small part of the Christian world, and for several centuries afterwards altars of wood were used, until the growing preference for altars of more durable material finally supplanted them. The two table altars preserved in the churches of St. John Lateran and St. Peter in the Vatican are the only ancient altars of wood that have been preserved. According to a local tradition, St. Peter offered the Holy Sacrifice on each, but the evidence for this is not convincing. The earliest stone altars were the tombs of the martyrs interred in the Roman Catacombs. The practice of celebrating Mass on the tombs of martyrs can be traced with a large degree of probability to the first quarter of the second century. The Fractio Panis fresco of the Capella Greca, which belongs to this period is located in the apse directly above a small cavity which Wilpert supposes (Fractio Panis, 18) to have contained the relics of a martyr, and it is highly probable that the stone covering this tomb served as an altar. But the celebration of the Eucharist on the tombs of martyrs in the Catacombs was, even in the first age, the exception rather than the rule. (See Arcosolium.) The regular Sunday services were held in the private houses which were the churches of the period. Nevertheless, the idea of the stone altar, the use of which afterwards became universal in the West, is evidently derived from the custom of celebrating the anniversaries and other feasts in honour of those who died for the Faith. Probably, the custom itself was suggested by the passage in the Apocalypse (vi, 9): I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God. With the age of peace, and especially under the pontificate of Pope Damasus (366-384), basilicas and chapels were erected in Rome and elsewhere in honor of the martyrs, and the altars, when at all possible, were located directly above their tombs. The "Liber Pontificalis" attributes to Pope Felix I (206-214) a decree to the effect that Mass should be celebrated on the tombs of the martyrs (constituit supra memoria martyrum missas celebre, "Lib. Pont.", ed. Duchesne, I, 158).

However this may be, it is clear from the testimony of this authority that the custom alluded to was regarded at the beginning of the sixth century as very ancient (op. cit., loc. cit., note 2).

For the fourth century we have abundant testimony, literary and monumental. The altars of the basilicas of St. Peter and St. Paul, erected by Constantine, were directly above the Apostles' tombs. Speaking of St. Hippolytus, the poet Prudentius refers to the altar above his tomb as follows:—

"Talibus Hippolytii corpus mandator operis Proper ubi apposita est ara dicta Deo."

Finally, the translation of the bodies of the martyrs Sts. Gervasius and Protasius by St. Ambrose to the Ambrosian basilica in Milan is an evidence that the practice of offering the Holy Sacrifice on the tombs of martyrs was long established. The great veneration in which the martyrs were held from the fourth century had considerable influence in effecting two changes of importance with regard to altars. The stone slab enclosing the martyr's grave suggested the stone altar, and the presence of the martyr's relics beneath the altar was responsible for the tomb-like under-structure known as the confessio. The use of stone altars in the East in the fourth century is attested by St. Gregory of Nyssa (P. G., XLVI, 58) and in the West, from the sixth century, the sentiment in favour of their exclusive use is indicated by the Decree of the Council of Ephesus alluded to above. Yet even in the West wooden altars existed as late as the reign of Charlemagne, as we infer from a capsule of this emperor forbidding the celebration of Mass except on stone tables consecrated by the bishop (in menem lapide ab episcopo consecratam (P. L., XCVII, 124)). From the ninth century, however, few traces of the use of wooden altars are found in the domain of Latin Christianity, but the Greek Church, up to the present time, permits the employment of wood, stone, or metal.

II. THE CONFESSIO.—Martyrs were Confessors of the Faith—Christians who "confessed" Christ before men at the cost of their lives—hence the name confessio was applied to their last resting-place, when, as happened frequently from the fourth century, an altar was erected over it. Up to the seventh century in Rome, as we learn from a letter of St. Gregory the Great to the Empress Constantia, a strong sentiment against disturbing the bodies of the martyrs prevailed. This fact accounts for the erection of the early Roman basilicas, no matter what the obstacles encountered, over the tombs of martyrs; the church was brought to the martyr, not the martyr to the church. The altar in such cases was placed above the tomb with which it was brought into the closest relation possible. In St. Peter's, for instance, where the body of the Apostle was interred at a considerable depth below the level of the floor of the basilica, a vertical shaft, similar to the luminaria in some of the catacombs, was constructed between the altar and the sepulchre. Across this shaft, at some distance from each other, were two perforated plates, called cataractae, on which cloths (brandae) were placed for a time, and afterwards highly treasured as relics. But the remains of St. Peter, and those of St. Paul, were not the only tombs of the Apostles enclosed by Constantine in cubic cases, each adorned with a gold cross (Lib. Pont., ed. Duchesne, I, 176). From that date to the present time, except in 1594, when Pope Clement VIII with Bellarmine and some other cardinals saw the cross of Constantine, the interior of their tombs has been hidden from view. Another form of confessio was that in which the slab enclosing the martyr's tomb was on a level with the floor of the sanctuary (presbyterium). As the sanctuary was elevated above the floor of the basilica the altar could thus be placed immediately above the tomb, while the people in the body of the church could approach the confessio and through a grating (fenestella confessionis) obtain a view of the relics. One of the best examples of this form of confessio is seen at Rome in the Church of San Giorgio in Velabro, where the ancient model is followed closely. A Synodal form (tenth century) of confessio is that in the basilicas of San Alessandro on the Via Nomentana, about seven miles from Rome. In this case the sanctuary floor was not elevated above the floor of the Basilica, and therefore the fenestella occupied the space between the floor and the table of the altar, thus forming a combination tomb and table altar. In the fenestella of this altar there is a square opening through which brandae could be placed on the tomb.

III. THE CIBORIUM.—From the fourth century altars were, in many instances, covered by a canopy supported on four columns, which not only formed a protection against possible accidents, but in a greater degree served as an architectural feature of importance. This canopy was known as the ciborium or tegurium. The idea of it may have been suggested by memorias such as those which from the earliest times protected the graves of St. Peter and St. Paul; when the bodies of the remains of the Apostles were erected, and their tombs became altars, the appropriateness of protecting-structures over the tomb-altars, bearing a certain resemblance to those which already existed, would naturally suggest itself. However this may be, the dignified and beautifully ornamented ciboria placed over the central altars, where all religious functions were performed, was an artistic necessity. The altar of the basilica was simple in the extreme, and, consequently, in itself too small and insignificant to form a centre which would be in keeping with the remainder of the sacred edifice. The ciborium admirably met this requirement. The altars of the basilicas erected by St. Constantine at Rome were surmounted by ciboria, one of which, in the Lateran, was known as a fastigium, and is described with some detail in the "Liber Pontificalis" (I, p. 172, and the note of Duchesne on p. 191). The roof was of silver and weighed 2,025 pounds; the columns were probably of marble or porphry, like those of St. Peter's. On the front of the ciborium was a scene which about this time became a favourite subject with Christian artists: Christ enthroned in the midst of the Apostles. All the figures were five feet in height; the statue of Our Lord weighed 125 pounds, and the mosaic in the church. The altar in such cases was placed above the tomb with which it was brought into the closest relation possible. In St. Peter's, for instance, where the body of the Apostle was interred at a consider-the church of Sant' Apollinare Nuovo, at Ravenna. The interior of the Lateran Ciborium was covered with gold, and from the centre hung a chandelier (fornix) "of purest gold, with fifty dolphins of purest gold weighing fifty pounds, with chains weighing twenty-five pounds". Suspended from the arches of the ciborium, or in close proximity to the altar, were "four crowns of purest gold, with twenty dolphins, each fifteen pounds; and before the altar was a chandelier of gold, with eighty dolphins, in which pure nard was burned". Seven other altars were erected in the basilica, probably to receive the oblations; Duchesne notes the coincidence of the number of subsidiary altars with the number of deacons in the Roman Church (Liber Pont., I, 172, and note 33, 191). This splendid canopy was carried away by Alaric in 410, but a new ciborium was erected by the Emperor Valentinian III at the request of Pope Sixtus III (432-440). Only fragments of a few of the more ancient ciboria have been preserved to our time, but the ciborium of Sant' Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna (ninth century), reproduces its principal features.

IV. CHANCEL.—In his description of the Basilica of Tyre the historian Eusebius says (Hist. Eccl., X, iv) that the altar was enclosed "with wooden lattice-work, accurately wrought with artistic carving", so that it might be rendered "inaccessible to the multitude". The partition thus described, which separated the presbyterium and choir from the nave, was the chancel or chancery. In a later age the name "chancel" came to be applied to the presbyterium itself. Portions of a number of ancient chancels have been found in Roman churches, and from reconstructions made with their help by archaeologists a good idea of the early chancel may be obtained. Two of these restored chancels, made from fragments found in the oratory of Equizio and in the Church of San Lorenzo, show the style of workmanship, which consisted of geometrical designs. Chancels were made of wood, stone, or metal.

V. THE ICONOSTASIS.—Constantine the Great, according to the "Liber Pontificalis", erected in St. Peter's, in front of the presbyterium, six marble columns adorned with vine-traceries. Whether these columns were originally connected by an architrave is uncertain, but in the time of Pope Sergius III (687-701) this feature existed. They seem to have served for no special object, and therefore were probably intended to add dignity to the presbyterium. In the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem, also erected by Constantine, there were six marble columns, corresponding with the number of the Apostles. The iconostasis of the Greek Church and the rood-screen of Gothic churches are evidently traceable to this ornamental feature of the two fourth-century basilicas. The iconostasis, like the chancel in the Latin Church, separated the presbyterium from the nave. Its original form was that of an open screen, but from the eighth century, owing to the reaction against iconoclasm, it began to assume its present form of a closed screen decorated with paintings. A colonnade of six columns (seventh century) in the Cathedral of Torcello gives an idea of the colonnades in the Constantinian basilicas referred to.

VI. THE DOVE; TABERNACLE.—During the first age of Christianity the faithful were allowed, when consecration was imminent, to reserve the Eucharist in their homes (See ARCA). This custom gradually disappeared in the West about the fourth century. The Sacred Hosts for the sick were then kept in churches where special receptacles were prepared for them. These receptacles were either in the form of a dove which hung from the roof of the ciborium or, where a ciborium did not exist, of a tower (the tower Eucharistica) which was placed in an oratory. In a drawing of the XIII-cent. altar of the Cathedral of Arras an arrangement is seen which is evidently a reminiscence of the suspended dove in those countries where the ciborium had disappeared: the Eucharistic tower is suspended above the altar from a staff in the form of a crozier. The more ordinary receptacle for this purpose, up to the seventeenth century, was the armarium near, or an octagonal-shaped tower placed on the Gospel side of, the altar. Tabernacles of the latter kind were generally of stone or wood; those of the dove class of some precious metal. Our present form of tabernacle dates from the end of the sixteenth century.

VII. CONSECRATION.—No special formula for the consecration of altars was in use in the Roman Church before the eighth century (Duchesne, Christian Worship, tr. London, 1903, 403 sqq.). In substance, however, what we understand by consecration was practised in the fourteenth century. This original form of consecration consisted in the solemn transfer of the relics of a martyr to the altar of a newly erected church. The translation of the bodies of Sts. Gervasius and Protasius, made by St. Ambrose, is the first recorded example of the kind. (See AMBROSIAN BASILICA.) But such translations of the mortal remains of martyrs were at this time, and long afterwards, of rare occurrence. Relics, however, by which we must understand objects from a martyr's tomb (the brandeia mentioned above), were regarded with only a less degree of respect than the bodies of the martyrs themselves, and were therefore to multiply the body of the saint (Duchesne, op. cit., 402, 405). This reverence for objects associated with a martyr gave rise to the custom of entombing such relics beneath the altars of newly erected churches, until it ultimately became the rule not to dedicate a church without them. An early example of this practice was the dedication of the Church of St. Peter at Rome by St. Ambrose with pignora of St. Peter and St. Paul brought from Rome (Vita Ambros., by Paulinus, c. xxxiii). St. Gregory of Tours (Lib. II, de Mirac., I, P. L., LXXI, 828) mentions the dedication of the Church of St. Julian in his episcopal city with relics of that saint and of another. When relics of the saints could not be procured, consecrated Hosts and fragments of the Gospels were sometimes used; concerning the use of the former for this purpose the English Synod of Calchut (Celiclyth, Chelsea, 816) made a regulation (can. 22, inWilkins, Concilia Angliae, London, 1737, I, 169; Mansi, Coll. Conc., XLIV, 355). Up to the middle of the 16th century in the Roman Church the solemn celebration ofMass was the only form of dedication. If, however, it had been decided to place in the altar the relics of a martyr, this ceremony preceded the first solemn function in the new edifice. Duchesne points out (op. cit., 408) that the liturgical prayers of the Gallican Sarmentary still preserve to this day the form by which the altars bear the unmistakable stamp of the funeral liturgy; this fact is evidently attributable to the custom of entombing relics, regarded as representing the bodies of the saints, at the time of dedication. The translation of relics was a second solemn interment of the saint’s body, and hence the liturgical prayers composed for such occasions appropriately bore the characteristics of the burial service. The principal features of the earliest form of consecration in the Roman Church, as given in the Gelasian Sacramentary, are as follows: The bishop with his clergy enters the Catholic Church, and after the solemn procession to the place where the relics were kept. A prayer was then chanted and the relics were borne by the bishop to the door of the church, and there placed in the custody of a priest. The bishop then entered the church, accompanied by his immediate attendants, and after exorcising the water and mixing with it a drop of chrym., he tore the mortal for enclosing the sepulchre. With a sponge he then washed the table of the altar, and returning to the door he sprinkled the people with what remained of the holy water. After this he took the relics and re-entered the church, followed by the clergy and people chanting another litany. The sepulchre was then anointed with chrym., the relics were placed therein, and the tomb sealed. The ceremony concluded with the solemn celebration of Mass (Duchesne, op. cit., 405-407). The Gallican liturgy of consecration, unlike that of Rome, partook of the character of the liturgy for the administration of baptism and confirmation rather than that of the funeral liturgy. “Just as the Christian is dedicated by water and oil, by baptism and confirmation, so the altar first, then the church, is consecrated by ablution and unction” (Duchesne, op. cit., 407-409).

In the ninth century we find the consecration of altars made by Frankish liturgists to combine the two liturgies of Rome and Gaul; from the result then achieved has developed the actual consecration ritual of the Western Church. In the Greek Church the dedication of the altar was a ceremony distinct from that of the deposition of relics; the two functions were ordinarily performed on different days. On the first day the table of the altar was placed on its support of columns by the bishop in person. After this he proceeded to the consecration which consisted of washing the table, first with baptismal water, then with wine. The altar was next anointed with chrym. and oil, and the tabernacle was placed in the sepulchre with the greatest solemnity. Duchesne calls attention to the close resemblance between the Gallican and the Byzantine liturgy for the consecration of altars (op. cit., 416).

VIII. ORIENTATION.—The custom of praying with facing and turning towards the East is probably an old Christian tradition. The earliest allusion to it in Christian literature is in the second book of the Apostolic Constitutions (XIX, 200-250, probably) which prescribes that a church should be “oblong with its head to the East” (Tertullian also speaks of churches as erected “high and open places, and facing the light”) (Adv. Varr., viii, 3). This practice, which did not originate with Christianity, as given by St. Gregory of Nyssa (De Orat. Dominici, P. G., XLIV, 1183), is that the Orient is the first home of the human race, the seat of the earthly paradise. In the Middle Ages additional reasons for orientation were given, namely, that Our Lord came from the Cross looking towards the East, and that from the East He shall come for the Last Judgment (Durand, Rationale, V, 2; St. Thomas, Summa Theol., II-II, Q. lxxxiv, a. 3). The existence of the custom among pagans is referred to by Clement of Alexandria, who states that their “most ancient temples looked towards the West, that people might not be led astray by the sun when facing the images” (Stromata, vii, 17, 43). The form of orientation which in the Middle Ages was generally adopted consisted in placing the aposi and altar in the Eastern end of the basilica. A system of orientation exactly opposite of this was adopted in the basilicas of the age of Constantine. The Lateran, St. Peter’s, St. Paul’s, and San Lorenzo in Rome, as well as the Basilicas of Tyre and Antioch and the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem, had their apses facing the West. Thus, in these cases the bishop from his throne in the apse looked towards the East. At these churches the second time of the prayer of St. Pius X was used; the Basilica of San Pietro in Vincoli, erected probably in the latter half of the fourth century, reversed this order and complied with the rule. The Eastern aposi is the rule also in the churches of Ravenna, and generally throughout the East. Whether this form of orientation expresses any influence on the change of the celebration from the front to the front of the altar cannot well be determined; but at all events this custom gradually supplanted the older one, and it became the rule for both priest and people to look in the same direction, namely, towards the East (Mabillon, Museum Italicum, ii, 9). Strict adherence to either form of orientation was, necessarily, in many instances impossible; the direction of streets in cities naturally governed the position of churches. Some of the most ancient churches of Rome are directed towards various points of the compass.

IX. ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL ALTARS.—Few ancient altars have survived the ravages of time. Probably the oldest of these is the fifth-century altar discovered at Auriol, near Marseilles. The stone table, on the front of which the monogram of Christ, with twelve doves, is engraved, rests on a single column. Similar in form to the aposi of Ravenna, there are three altars in the consecratio of the Church of St. Cecilia in Rome, which are attributed to the ninth century. In the sixth-century mosaic, of San Vitale and Sanz Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna, two tables of wood, resting on four feet, are represented. They are covered by a long cloth which completely hides the tables. Enlart regards it as probable that the tables enclosed in the altars of the Lateran and Santa Pudenziana are similar in appearance (Manuel d’archéol. Française, I, Archit. Relig., note 1). Altars of the tomb type, like the sarcophagi of the Constantinian epoch, offered a surface the front of which was well adapted to the religious use to which it was put. The earliest existing example of an altar with a carved antependium, however, is the Church of Civitale, dates from the beginning of the eighth century. Our Lord is here represented in the centre of the antependium, accompanied by angels, while the hand of the Father appears behind His head. Of greater interest is the antependium, as well as the side panels, of the altar of the Ambrosian basilica in Milan. The front, over seven feet in length, is of gold, the back and sides of silver. Both front and back are panelled into three compartments, in which reliefs from the life of Christ and St. Ambrose are represented. The subject of the central panel of the front are a Greek cross, in the centre of which Our Lord is represented; in the arms of the cross are the symbols of the four Evangelists, while the remaining spaces contain representations of the Apostles. Crosses are represented on the ends also, with angels in various attitudes. The famous reredos of St. Mark’s, Venice, known as the Pała d’oro, which dates from the tenth century, was originally an antependium. To the following (eleventh) century belongs the splendid golden antependium presented to the Cathedral of Basle by the Emperor Henry II, now in the Musée de Cluny at Paris. The ciborium was in general use as a protection and ornamental feature of altars. The ciborium of Sant’ Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna, which belongs to the early ninth century, is, as noted above, essentially the same as those of the earlier period. After the tenth century, however, except in Italy and the Orient, where ciboria were always in favour, they were rarely employed. The best example of a ciborium of the early Gothic period is in the Church of Our Lady of Halberstadt, Germany: two other Gothic ciboria are in the cathedrals of Ratisbon and Vienna. In Italy numerous medieval ciboria still exist. The early types of Christian altar, unlike those most in vogue during the Middle Ages, had no superstructure. So long, indeed, as the bishop’s throne occupied the centre of the apse a reredos (retabulum), which would conceal the bishop from the congregation, would have been impracticable. By degrees, as we have seen, the custom was introduced, with the general adoption of the Eastern apse, of the celebrant facing in the same direction as the congregation, and it became possible to introduce an ornamental panel at the back of the altar similar to the antependium. Probably the custom of exposing relics on the altar, approved by Pope Leo IV (P.L., CXV, 677), exercised some influence on the development of the reredos, and the antependium naturally suggested its form. The reredos was introduced about the beginning of the twelfth century. The oldest existing example of it is the Pala d’oro of St. Mark’s, Venice, which, after reconstruction, was detached from the front and placed at the back of the altar by the Doge Orseolo Faliero, in 1105. The Church of Kloster-Neuburg, near Vienna, also contains a beautiful example of a twelfth-century reredos, with representations from the Old and the New Testament. The reredos of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries was only moderately elevated when compared with the style which found favour in the late Gothic and Renaissance periods. The practice of exhibiting relics was, as we have seen, authorized in the ninth century, but not before the thirteenth century were reliquaries permanently kept on, or more frequently behind, the altar. In the latter case a platform was specially constructed for the purpose. In some instances the reliquaries formed part of the reredos, but the more common arrangement was to place them on a platform. This practice of permanently exposing relics behind the altar influenced certain other changes of importance with regard to the ciborium and the confessio. The latter feature now disappeared; there was no longer a reason for its existence, since the relics were provided with a new location; and the ciborium was modified into a baldacchino elevated above the reliquary back of the altar. An example of this arrangement of the thirteenth century, may be seen in the chapel of the Blessed Virgin, in the Church of St. Denis, Paris. At first only the altar of relics, usually placed at the end of the apse, was provided with a reredos, but in the course of the fourteenth century the main altar also was similarly provided. The comparative simplicity of the early reredos gradually yielded, in the course of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, to the prevalent taste for richness of adornment, and reliquaries became of secondary consideration. The reredos now became a great structure, reaching in many instances to the vault of the church, containing life-sized statues of Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, and the saints, besides a number of representations in relief of sacred subjects. This structure was usually of wood, carved or painted. It was connected with the altar by means of a predella, or altar-step, similar to the predella of modern altars, for candelabra, on which the Apostles or other saints were depicted. Towards the end of the sixteenth century the influence of the Renaissance effected another change in the form of the altar. Porticoes, modelled after the triumphal arches of antiquity, with statues in high and low relief, took the place of the reredos, and more costly materials, such as rare marbles, were employed in their construction. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries especially, the design of the Renaissance style became surcharged with ornamentation, often in bad taste and of inferior materials.

Altmann, BESSLED, the friend of Gregory VII and Anselm, conspicuous in the contest of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, as Bishop of Passau and Papal Legate. He was born at Paderborn about the beginning of the eleventh century, presided over the school there, was chaplain at the court of Henry III, and then became Bishop of Passau. The Bollandists find that, because of these successive occupations, it is impossible to make him out a Benedictine monk. As a bishop he was famous for his care of the poor, his vigour in the reformation of the Church, the building of new churches and the splendid with which he invested divine worship—Henry IV himself contributing lavishly to enrich the church of Passau, chiefly through the intervention of the Empresses Agnes and Bertha, his wife and mother—and finally for the opposition which he aroused in enforcing Gregorian canons on the celiability of the clergy. With the help of Henry the recalcitrants succeeded in driving him from his see. He was recalled, however, shortly after the death of Hermann the intruder, at whose death-bed he is said to have appeared. Hermann begged for absolution, and asked not to be buried as a bishop. Altmann's subsequent possession of his see lasted only a short time. He was again expelled, and died in exile ten years after. He was one of the four South German bishops who sided with Gregory, and defied Henry, in refusing to take part in the Diet of Worms to depose the Pope.

Alto, SAINT, recluse and missionary in Bavaria, c. 750. Alto has been variously described as an Anglo-Saxon and an Irishman (Scotus), but the name Alto is undoubtedly Irish. We know little of his life except the broad facts that he lived for some time as a hermit, reclaiming the wild forest-land around him, and that he afterwards founded a Benedictine monastery in this spot, now called Altomünster, in the Diocese of Freising, having previously obtained a grant of land from King Pepin. St. Boniface is said to have come to dedicate the church about the year 750. A charter still exists bearing the subscription Alto reclauzeus [Hauck, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (1904), I, 541], which probably dates back to Alto's hermit days. We do not know the year of his death, but he is commemorated on 9 February. The monastery of Altomünster suffered much from the Huns and the depredations of the tyranical nobles, but about the year 1000 it was restored again as a Benedictine monastery. Later it was tenanted by Benedictine nuns and these at the end of the fifteenth century gave place to a community of Brigitines, in whose hands it still remains despite many vicissitudes.

Alton, THE DIOCESE OF, includes that part of Illinois lying south of the northern limits of the County of Adams, Brown, Cass, Menard, Sangamon, Macou, Moultrie, Douglas, and Edgar, and north of the southern limits of the county of Madison, Bond, Lafayette, Effingham, Jasper, and Crawford. It was created 29 July, 1853, by the division of the Diocese of Chicago, then embracing the whole state of Illinois. The new see was first located at Quincy, but was transferred, 9 January, 1857, to Alton. Its German Catholic population came mainly from Cincinnati and settled at Quincy, Teutopolis, and Germania. The Swiss Catholics founded Highland, and Alsations Sainte Marie. The building of railroads brought Irish Catholics in growing numbers. Cahokia, Kaskasia, and Prairie du Rocher, which now belong to the Diocese of Belleville, had been settled by French Catholics at an earlier date. The early history of the see was influenced by the papal bull of 1356, in which the lay Catholics of the early period were Peter and Sebastian Wise of Alton, Mr. Shepherd of Jerseyville, Mr. Picot of Sainte Marie, Charles Rount and his nephew of Jacksonville. Fathers Ostrop, Hisn, and Hickey were energetic missionaries.

b. 22 August, 1809, at Fenestreng, in German Lorraine; d. at Alton, 2 October, 1868, attended the Pont-a-Mousson Seminary, but emigrated to Cincinnati, where he found an opportunity of continuing his studies in view of the priesthood to which he was consecrated 18 March, 1856, by Bishop Weber. He filled several charges in Ohio previous to his consecration, at Cincinnati Cathedral, 26 April, 1857, by Archbishop Purcell. At Alton the bishop found before him 58 churches, five in course of erection; 30 stations visited by 28 priests; six young men studying for the ministry; two female academies, and a population of about 55,000. This population was made up of old French settlers, some Kentuckians, but especially of Irish immigrants driven away from their country by famine, and Germans, by political disturbances. In Illinois they were finding fertile prairies to till, and railroads to build. Thus they enhanced the prosperity of the State, hitherto only partly cultivated, and depending on the rivers and county roads for its means of communication. The non-Catholic population was not particularly hostile. Priests were very scarce, and vocations to the ministry very limited. In such an emergency the Bishop of Alton, in order to look up to the See of St. Louis, in the same year he crossed the ocean and secured followers in France, Rome, Germany, and Ireland. After his return, he enlarged his cathedral, erected the present Bishop's House, encouraged the building of churches, schools, convents, and academies. He attended the Second Plenary Council and went to Rome (1867) for the Centenary of the Holy Apostles. His subsequent missionary labours brought on a severe sickness, which proved fatal. He was buried in a vault under his cathedral. He was succeeded by one of his vicars-general, the Very Rev. Peter Joseph Bulte (1869-99), elected 24 September, 1869, and consecrated 22 January, 1870, in the present Belleville Cathedral (built by him), by Bishop Luers, of Fort Wayne, while the Vatican Council was in session. He was born 7 April, 1820, in Enosheim, Rhenish Bavaria. At the age of six years he emigrated with his parents to Oswego, N.Y. He attended school at Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass; St. Mary's of the Lake, Chicago; and the Grand Seminary of Montreal, where he received ordination, 21 May, 1853. His missionary charges were Waterloo and Belleville. At the time of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866) he was made vicar-general, and theologian to Bishop Jungcker. Bishop Bulte made a great impression on his Church by the indomitable energy with which he introduced order and uniformity in matters of liturgy and discipline. Under his administration was enacted the special law under which most of the church property is held in Southern Illinois. The burning, in the early part of 1884, of the convent built by him while in Belleville, in which twenty-seven lives were lost, proved a severe shock to his constitution. Sickness prevented him from attending the Third Plenary Council. He lingered for several months, going to his reward 15 February, 1886. He was buried side by side with his predecessor. After a vacancy of more than two years, the Rev. James Ryan, then rector of St. Columba's church, Ottawa, in the diocese of Peoria, was appointed Third 27 February, 1888. At the same time the diocese was divided, the southern half being made into the new diocese of Belleville. Bishop Ryan was born near Thurles, Ireland, 17 June, 1848. When seven years old, he emigrated with his parents to Louisville, Ky., studied at St. Thomas' and Joseph's Colleges, Bardstown, in that State, finished his studies at Princeton Park Seminary, Louisville, and was ordained, 24 December, 1871. After a few years of mission labours and teaching, he followed Bishop Spalding to Peoria, laboured on several missions and built a number of churches. He was consecrated, 1 May, 1886, at the St. John Cathedral. He is the first bishop of the first synod of the Alton Diocese, 27 February, 1889.

Statistics.—At present (1906) the diocese numbers 119 diocesan priests, 35 religious, 428 sisters, 143 parishes, 65 parochial schools, with 9,000 pupils, 21,110 children in hospitals, 2 normal and 2 sanc- tory seminaries, with 330 students, 23 theological students, 2 colleges, 3 academies, with 380 students. Of late years many immigrants, Italians, Poles, Slovonsians, and Lithuanians have come to the dio- cese, working in the coal mines that are everywhere opening, and taking the energy of several of the clergy to their utmost capacity. The population of the diocese is 751,107, of which number 75,000 are Catholics.

Altoona, Diocese of, a suffragan see of the province of Philadelphia. The city of Altoona is situated on the eastern slope of the Alleghany mountains, almost midway between Harrisburg and Pitts- burgh, and at an elevation of 1,175 feet above sea level, is surrounded by the Alleghenies, forming a large basin, which is filled with the Delaware water, and is highly land of great worth. It is a little over fifty years old, and is mainly the creation of the Pennsylvania railroad, whose vast workshops, employing about fourteen thousand men, are located there. The population of the city of Altoona is (1906) sixty thousand, about one-fourth of which is Catholic. There are in the city four large Catholic churches with flourishing parish schools. St. John's Church is used as the pro-cathedral.

The Diocese of Altoona was established May, 1901. It comprises the counties of Cambria, Blair, Bedford, Huntingdon, Somerset, and Allegheny, with the counties of Altoona, and the counties of Centre, Clinton, and Fulton taken from the Diocese of Harrisburg. The area of the diocese is 6,710 square miles. Its Catholic population (1906), of which a considerable portion is made up of various foreign nationalities employed in the machine districts and the manufactur- ing town of Johnstown, is about 60,000. Within its narrow limits is the very cradle of the Catholic Church in middle and western Pennsylvania. At the beginning of the last century the whole terri- tory was part of the extensive parish of the famous Russian missionary, Father Galitzin (q. v.). This devoted missionary founded the mission of Loretto in Cambria County, Pa., and made his home there. He expended his vast fortune in the interests of religion. He reached Loretto as early as July, 1799, and died there 6 May, 1840. A beautiful memorial church erected by Charles M. Schwab marks the last resting place in which this distinguished man and noted missionary is held. It was Father Gallitzin's wish and prayer that Loretto should become a bishop's see. As early as 1820 he wrote to Archbishop Mearchal: "Several years ago I formed a plan for the good of religion, for the success of which I desire to employ all the means at my disposal when the remainder of my debts are paid. It is to form a diocese for the western part of Pennsylvania. What a consolation for me if I might, before I die, see this plan carried out, and Loretto made an episcopal see, where the bishop, by means of the lands attached to the bishopric, which is very fertile, would be independ- ent, and where, with very little expense, could be erected college, seminary, and all that is required for an episcopal establishment." He adds that "no bishop has ever penetrated to the distant missions of Western Pennsylvania. There are many missions which have never seen a bishop and never will, at least while the bishop is not a willing and one willing to fulfil the duties of this charge, even at his own expense, without waiting for other recompense than that which comes from above." The prince-priest's hopes were never realized, though an effort was made when the present diocese was bised, to have the see at Loretto rather than at Altoona.

Among the many pioneer priests who have laboured within the limits of the present diocese may be mentioned Father James Bradley, of Newry, who lived to celebrate his golden jubilee in the priesthood; Father Thomas Hayden, of Bedford; Father Lemke, who was a Prussian soldier and a convert from Lumanism; Father John Walshe, of Hollidaysburg. Father Lemke founded the mission and village of Carroll- town, where at present there is a Benedictine priory. Among the Catholic laymen of early days is a family of the Luthers who are said to be direct descendants of Martin Luther and who have given more than one member to the priesthood. The Collins family has also been prominent in advancing the interests of religion.

Next to Loretto in historical importance is Carroll- town, founded in 1839, and named after Archbishop Carroll, the first bishop of the See of Baltimore. A colony of French Trappist monks sought to estab- lish a house of their order there about the beginning of the last century. Driven from France during the revolution of 1791, a number of the monks found a temporary home in Switzerland, where they remained until the influence of the French government began to be felt in that country in 1798; when they were again forced to flee. They passed into Russia, and soon after into Prussia, and finally turned their faces towards the New World under the guidance of Father Urban Guiltiet. The little party landed in Baltimore, 4 September, 1806, and then they set off for the West, but failing to make a foundation there, they next proceeded to Adams County, Pa., and, leaving that place also, they went further west, finally settling down at Florissant, Mo. The first settler near Carrolltown was John Weakland, one of the most powerful and daring of men, and the most famous Catholic pio- neer of Western Pennsylvania. About the year 1830 he donated four acres of ground for the site of a church, and under the direction of Father Gallitzin a log church was built, and dedicated to St. Joseph. Bishop Francis Patrick Kenrick visited this church and administered confirmation there 15 October, 1822. The first bishop of Altoona, the Rt. Rev. Eugene A. Garvey, was consecrated in St. Peter's Cathedral, Scranton, Pa., 8 September, 1901, and was installed in St. John's Pro-Cathedral, Altoona, 24 September. There has been a steady growth of the Catholic population, especially from immigration. Almost every nationality is represented; Slavs and Italians predominate in the mining districts. The scattered Greek and Syrian Catholics within the limits of the diocese, who are visited occasionally by priests of their own nationality. The diocese is amply supplied with priests, and almost every parish has its school. The relations of the Catholic with the police, the criminal, have the obvious and desirable, the good influence of the early Catholic settlers having done much to disarm prejudice. Catholics are well represented in the social, business, and professional life of the community.

In the diocese there are seventy-four secular priests and sixteen regulars; with forty lay brothers, members of religious communities; about three hundred members of the various sisterhoods, chiefly engaged in teaching; and thirty parish schools educating seven thousand children. The Franciscan Brothers conduct a college at Loretto, with an average attendance of about one hundred students; the Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of Charity, and the Sisters of the Holy Name have the same number of young ladies. There is a children's home at Ebensburg, in charge of the Sisters of St. Joseph, with about seventy-five inmates.

MORGAN M. SHEEDY.

Altruism, a term formed by Auguste Comte in 1851, on the Italian adjective altru, and employed by him to denote the benevolent, as contrasted with the selfish propensities. It was introduced into English by George H. Lewes in 1853 (Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences, 1, xxii), and popularized thereafter by exponents and advocates of Comte's philosophy. Though used primarily, in a psychological sense, to designate emotions of a reflective kind, the immediate consequences of which are beneficial to others, its important significance is ethical. As such it defines a theory of conduct by which only actions having for their object the happiness of others possess a moral value. Anticipations of this doctrine are found in Cumberland's "De Legibus Nature" (1672), and in Shaftesbury's "Inquiry concerning Virtue and Merit" (1711), both emphasizing the social Eudemonism, based on Positivism, to which the name of Altruism is given. Comte's system is both ethical and religious. Not only is the happiness to be found in living for others the supreme end of conduct, but a disinterested devotion to Humanity as a whole is the highest form of religious service. His ethical theory may be epitomized in the following propositions.

1. The domination of feeling over thought is the normative principle of human conduct, for it is the affective impulse that governs the individual and the race.

2. Man is under the influence of two affective impulses, the person-preponderate and the society-preponderate. The just balance between these two is not possible, one or other must preponderate.

3. The first condition of individual and social well-being is the subordination of self-love to the benevolent impulses.

4. The first principle of morality, therefore, is the regulative supremacy of social sympathy over the self-regarding instincts. To bring about the reign of altruism Comte invented a religion which substituted for God an abstraction called Humanity. The main defects of Comte's ethical system are those that are common to all forms of Eudemonism: its norm of morality is relative and contingent; it possesses no principles by which the quality of its subject-matter, social happiness, may be defined; its operative principles are no moral obligation at all; its defects are mainly those of Positivism, which denies or ignores any reality beyond external facts, and recognizes no law except the successions, coexistences, and resemblances of these phenomena. Hence it can exist before us no summam bonum outside the region of sense. It confounds physical law with moral law, the fact that the affective faculty moves to action sufficient to make it also the norm of action. It, moreover, contracts the field of morality, and immorality as well, by making purely personal virtue or vice non-ethical. Altruism, a term formed by Auguste Comte in 1851, on the Italian adjective altru, and employed by him to denote the benevolent, as contrasted with the selfish propensities. It was introduced into English by George H. Lewes in 1853 (Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences, 1, xxii), and popularized thereafter by exponents and advocates of Comte's philosophy. Though used primarily, in a psychological sense, to designate emotions of a reflective kind, the immediate consequences of which are beneficial to others, its important significance is ethical. As such it defines a theory of conduct by which only actions having for their object the happiness of others possess a moral value. Anticipations of this doctrine are found in Cumberland's "De Legibus Nature" (1672), and in Shaftesbury's "Inquiry concerning Virtue and Merit" (1711), both emphasizing the social Eudemonism, based on Positivism, to which the name of Altruism is given. Comte's system is both ethical and religious. Not only is the happiness to be found in living for others the supreme end of conduct, but a disinterested devotion to Humanity as a whole is the highest form of religious service. His ethical theory may be epitomized in the following propositions.

1. The domination of feeling over thought is the normative principle of human conduct, for it is the affective impulse that governs the individual and the race.

2. Man is under the influence of two affective impulses, the person-preponderate and the society-preponderate. The just balance between these two is not possible, one or other must preponderate.

3. The first condition of individual and social well-being is the subordination of self-love to the benevolent impulses.

4. The first principle of morality, therefore, is the regulative supremacy of social sympathy over the self-regarding instincts. To bring about the reign of altruism Comte invented a religion which substituted for God an abstraction called Humanity. To this new supreme being, worship was to be paid, especially in its manifestations and representatives, woman, namely, and the benefactors of the race.

strain not differing in kind from other natural impulses. At best, even granting his evolutionary premises, he has only presented us with the genesis of conscience. He has not revealed the nature or source of its peculiar imperative. The fact that I know how conscience was evolved from lower instincts may be a reason, but is not a motive for obeying it. Lastly, the solution of the difficulty arising from the conflict between egoism and altruism is deferred to a future ideal state in which egoism, though transfigured, will be supreme. For the present we must be content to compromise, as best we may, on a relative morality. Spencer's own judgment on altruism may be accepted as a truism of "evolution"; he says "has not furnished guidance to the extent I had hoped... some such result might have been foreseen."

The Catholic teaching on love of others is summed up in the precept of Christ: Love thy neighbour as thyself. The love due to oneself is the exemplar of the love due to others, though not the measure of it. Disinterested love of others, or the love of benevolence, the outward expression of which is beneficence, implies a union proximately based on likeness. All men are alike in this that they partake of the same rational nature made to the Image and likeness of thine man is exalted, changing fellowship into brotherhood. All likeness of whatever grade is founded ultimately in likeness with God. Love, therefore, whether of oneself or of others is in its last analysis love of God, by partaking of Whose perfections we become lovable. The conflict between self-love and benevolence, which is inevitable in all systems that determine the morality of an act by its relation to an agreeable psychological state, need not arise in systems that make the ethical norm of action objective; the ethically desirable and the psychologically desirable are not identified. Catholic ethics does not deny that happiness of some kind is the necessary consequence of good conduct, or that the desire to attain or control it is innate, but it denies that the happiness of it for its own sake is the ultimate aim of conduct. Apparent conflict, however, may arise between duties to self and to others, when only mediatly known. But these arise from defective limitations of the range of one or other duty, or of both. They do not nullify the duties in themselves. The proper rules for determining the prevailing duty given by Catholic moralists are these: (1) Absolutely speaking there is no obligation to love others more than self. (2) There is an obligation, which admits of no exceptions, to love self more than others, whenever beneficence to others entails moral guilt. (3) In certain circumstances it may be obligatory, or at least a counsel of perfection, to love others more than self. Apart from cases in which one's profession or state of life, or justice imposes duties, these circumstances are determined by comparing the relative needs of self and others. (4) These needs may be spiritual or temporal; the need of the other is the measure of the individual; the need of one in extreme, serious or ordinary want; the need of those who are near to us by natural or social ties, and of those whose claims are only union in a common humanity. The first class in each group has precedence over the second.

Catholic ethics recognizes self-love and benevolence by subordinating both to the supreme purpose of creation and the providential ends of the Creator. It teaches that acts of self-love may have a moral quality; that sacrifice of self for the good of others may sometimes be a duty, and when not a duty, may oftentimes be an act of virtue. It distinguishes between precept and counsel. The Fosivist can only give counsel, and in his effort by emphasis and appeal to sentiment to make it imperative, he destroys all ethical proportion. Because the Catholic doctrine does not confound moral obligations with the perfection of moral goodness it is often charged with laxity by those whose teaching underlines all moral obligation. Lastly, the solution of the difficulty arising from the conflict between egoism and altruism is deferred to a future ideal state in which egoism, though transfigured, will be supreme. For the present we must be content to compromise, as best we may, on a relative morality. Spencer's own judgment on altruism may be accepted as a truism of "evolution"; he says "has not furnished guidance to the extent I had hoped... some such result might have been foreseen."

Alumnus (from Lat. alu. "to nurse", or "feed") signifies in ecclesiastical usage, a student preparing for the sacred ministry in a seminary. Originally the word meant a child adopted with certain restricted privileges, or a foster-child. Since the Council of Trent, however, the word has become equivalent to a seminarian, and as such is often referred to the student of the colleges in Rome. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiii. ch. 18, de Ref.) required bishops to establish institutions for the education of students for the priesthood. Formerly, church candidates had been educated in the houses of priests, in monasteries, or in the public universities. According to the Council, such alumni among other qualifications, should be at least twelve years of age and able to read and write, and their diocesep should be such as to give hope that they would adorn perpetually the sacred ministry. Children of the poor were to be especially favoured. In addition, besides philosophy, theology, scripture, and canon law, they were to study rites and ceremonies, sacred eloquence and plain chant. The bishop was to see that the students heard Mass daily, confessed monthly, and communicated as often as advisable. On festival days they were to take part in the cathedral services. The bishop was also exorted to visit these students frequently, to watch over their progress in learning and piety, and to remove hindrances to their advancement. In 1596, the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars laid down rules for the guidance of bishops in regard to "alumni" who attend public universities, requiring especially that they not associate in bands with the students, and that they be gathered frequently for spiritual conferences and for philosophical, theological, and historical discussions. Alumno, Niccolò (real name Niccolò di Liberatore), a notable Umbrian painter in tempera, b. c. 1430, at Foligno; d. 1502. He was the son of a painter, and a pupil of Bartolommeo di Tommaso. His master's assistant was Benvenuto Gozzioli, the pupil of Fra Angelico. The simple Umbrian feeling in his work was somewhat modified by this Florentine influence. His earliest known example (dated 1498) is in the Franciscan Church of La Diruta, near Perugia. He painted banners for religious processions, as well as altarpieces and other pictures, died a rich man, and is supposed by Mariotti to have been the master of Perugino, Pinturicchio, and Andrea di Luigi. Some works ascribed to him are thought to be by another, and contemporary, Alumno, called Desiderato. A "Madonna Enthroned" is in the Brera Gallery in Milan, and there are altarpieces at Perugia, in the Castle at San Severino, at Gualdo.
La Bastia, and Foligno. The predella of the last, which was taken to France by Napoleon, still remains in the Louvre. One of his banners is in a church at Perugia.

AUGUSTUS VAN CLEY.

ALVA, FERNANDO ALVAREZ DE TOLEDO, DUKE OF, b. 1508, of one of the most distinguished Castilian families, which boasted descent from the Byzantine emperors; d. at Thomar, 12 January, 1582. From a young age he was trained in a severe discipline for his future career as warrior and statesman. In his sixteenth year he took part in the war against France; a year later he was in the siege of Pavia, and in 1527 fought against the Turks in Hungary. He enjoyed the esteem of the Emperor Charles V, and played a great rôle in the numerous wars in which Spain was involved for half a century. His chief fame rests upon his mission in 1557 to the riotous Netherlands, where the Guexz had created systematic opposition to the Spanish regent, Margaret of Parma. In the Netherlands, traditionally accustomed to free government, King Philip I found the Dutch people in a condition to erect an absolutism such as prevailed in Spain. He rejected the mild measures proposed by moderate counsellors, and held that a swift punishment should be meted out to this rebellious and heretical country. At first, Philip resolved to go himself to the Netherlands, but he was prevented by the Council of War, which suddenly informed Margaret of Parma that he would send the Duke of Alva to punish the guilty with unbending severity. The "iron duke" was to be the ideal instrument for the execution of this purpose.

The very announcement of Alva's coming spread terror and consternation. Prince William of Orange and other leaders of the Guexz fled to foreign countries. But the popular Counts of Egmond and Hoorn, through blind confidence or reckless courage, resolved to face Alva. On 22 August, Alva, accompanied by a body of select Spanish troops, made his entry into Brussels. He immediately appointed a council to condemn without trial those suspected of heresy and rebellion. On 1 June, 1568, Brussels witnessed the simultaneous decapitation of twenty-two noblemen; on 6 June followed the execution of the Counts of Egmond and Hoorn. The Council of War, which then held the consultation of the tribunal. The Flemings fled in thousands to Holland and Zeeland, where the elements of the rebellion were concentrated under the leadership of the Prince of Orange. In the meantime Alva began a regular campaign in the northern provinces. His victorious troops, whose banner was inscribed with the legend: "Pro lege, regis, greges" plundered the cities of Mons, Mechlen, Zutphen, and Naarden, and left them drenched in blood. In triumph, Alva returned to Brussels. Pope Pius V bestowed on him a consecrated hat and sword, a present heretofore only given to sovereigns. In Antwerp, the governor erected a banner with his name, his portrait, and the figure of a trampling under his feet two allegorical figures, the nobility and the people. The dictator had proclaimed that the expenses of the war must be borne by the Netherlands. In consequence, the resources of the people were drained by taxation. Notwithstanding the protestations of the States-General, he introduced the so-called "tax of the one hundredth, twentieth, and tenth penny". This taxation surpassed all bounds. When on 31 July in Brussels the twentieth and tenth penny were extorted, traffic and commerce came to a standstill. The Dutch people, still for the greater part Catholic, felt themselves unjustly pressed by the "Blood", and in their inborn love of freedom by the Spanish Inquisition. When they saw their commerce and industries tramelled by the odious tenth penny tax, the hatred against the Spanish régime grew so manifest and widespread, that Alva, although victorious on the field of battle, suffered an irremediable moral defeat. The sack of the little seaport of Brielle by the "Beggars of the Sea" was the inspiration that fanned anew the smouldering embers of the rebellion. Haarlem, after a long siege, capitulated to Don Frederic, son of Alva, 12 July 1573; but this victory was speedily followed by the crushing of Alva's army on the fields of Alva and Hue, which defended itself so heroically that the popular cry became: "From Alva, victory begins!"

Alva at last realized that his violent measures were fruitless. "God and mankind are against me", he exclaimed in despair. In vain he begged the King to let him retire. His soft-hearted successor, the Duke of Medina Celi, who passed through the country in June 1572, never really assumed the reins of government but shortly returned to Spain. The 19 October, 1573, Alva was definitively relieved of his office and was succeeded by Don Luis of Requesens. He hastened from the Netherlands, followed by the curse of the people. Before his departure he had promulgated: "Tractatus veni, tractior abit". Once again in Spain he still retained the royal favour, till a love affair of Don Frederic dragged father and son into disgrace. Alva remained in exile at his castle up to 1580, when the acknowledged power of his iron arm, which was sought in vain, was suddenly snatched away from him. In the short space of three weeks he completely subdued the Portuguese. Dissension broke out once more between Philip and Alva; but the Duke had made himself so powerful that Philip, though suspecting that Alva had enriched himself extraordinarily with the spoils of war, and knowing that he had not been able to account to his King, did not dare to lay a hand against the first grande of Spain. A short time after he died at Thomar, 12 January 1582. Alva was, as even Motley in "The Rise of the Dutch Republic" (London, 1868, 9, 336), admires, "the most successful and experienced general of Spain, or of Europe, in his day. No man had studied military science more deeply, or practised it more constantly." In sixty years of military service he was never surprised, never defeated. He excelled in slow and prudent tactics, deeming that nothing was so uncertain as victory. He stands amongst the greatest generals of history. Yet his greatness was confined to the battlefield. He lacked the wisdom of governing.

His tyranny, however, was exaggerated, was exaggerated by the hatred of opposing parties. Alva boasted, as it is said, that he put to death on the scaffold 18,000 Dutchmen; but his successor, Requesens, estimated his executions at 6,000. (Gauchard, Etudes, 11, 386). Motley paints him in the blackest colours, allowing in his favour only the excuse "that he was but the blind and fanatically loyal slave of his sovereign" (541). In reality, Alva came to the Netherlands to carry out the royal orders, and save the King's power and his own. By the terrors and the rigorous suppression of the rebellion. He erected his own statue in Antwerp, not to glorify himself, but to pose as the tyrannical suppressor of the rebellion. In order that Philip might play the rôle of a bold sovereign, he asked the King to order the dismissal of the States-General. But the Dutch, who were the Académie de Belgique, 1899, 224-224). While we deplore his tyrannical method we must give credit to the duke's loyalty. When his personal dignity and views were touched, he dared defy even his King. He was an ardent Catholic, who fiercely served his religion when he combated heresy with fire and sword, but who, as a child of such troubles to the unwisely chose his measures. Notwithstanding his fanaticism he boldly entered the campaign against Paul IV, and when the King offered an advantageous peace to the Pope, the Duke exclaimed angrily that submission and timidity did not agree with politics and war. Alva, like his King, has been blackened savagely by prejudiced historians. As Maurenbrecher says, the curious mixture of both hatred and admiration in the passionate apology for William of Orange. As to Motley's historical work quoted above, Guizot remarks that “M. Motley exhibits in his work both science and passion” (Mélanges biograpb. et littéraires, Paris, 1858). His judgment of Alva is neither objectively justified nor of definitive value.

He took the Franciscan habit in Peru. He lectured on theology, was Procurator-General of the Franciscans, in Rome, and Qualified at the University of Paris. In 1666 he was a translator of the Bible. His principal opponents were the Dominicans. His polemic had such a personal tone and was so violent that he was sent to the Low-Countries. Two editions of his work, "Nodus indissolubilis de conceptu mentis et conceptu ventris" (Madrid, 1661, 1663), are on the Index of prohibited books. His writings fill forty volumes. The most important is his "Armentaria Sapricomphic pro tuum Immaculatae Concepotionis titulo" (Madrid, 1648). In this he collaborated with the best theologians of the Friars Minor.

Alvarado, Alonzo de, a Knight of Santiago, b. at Secada de Trasmura, near Burgos, date unknown; d. 1598. He came to America, and went to Peru with Pedro de Alvarado in 1534. He was no Relative of the latter, however; while charged by some contemporaries with avarice and cruelty, it is undeniable that during the trying period of civil wars in Peru (about 1537 to 1555) Alvarado was an unfailing and determined adherent to the interests of Spain. He always sided with those whom he thought to be sincere representatives of the Spaniards, and it was not always profitable and safe to be on that side. Thus, in 1537, he commanded the troops of Pizarro's followers, when Almagro claimed Cuzco. Defeated and captured by the latter at Abancay, after effecting his escape under great difficulties as well as dangers, and joining those then looked upon as the legitimate governor of Peru, he took part in all the bloody troubles that followed, always as a prominent military leader and always unsuccessful when in immediate command. Still, he was counted upon as a mainstay of the Spanish cause, and occupied a high military position. When Francisco Hernandez Giron raised the standard of rebellion in 1553, Alvarado was put in command of the forces to oppose him. At Chuquinga, in 1554, Alvarado suffered a signal defeat at the hands of the insurgents. Overcome by melanchohy in consequence of that last disaster, he pined away and died five years later. His principal achievement, however, was the pacification of Chachapoya in northeastern Peru, in the years 1555 and 1556, this being the first step taken from Peru towards the Amazonian basin. Alvarado married in Spain, while on a short visit, in 1554.

In the same year Fray Antonio de los Reyes, another Dominican, also published a grammar of that language, and the two works are identical. Alvarado, Pedro de—Of the companions of Cortes, and among the superior officers of his army, Pedro de Alvarado became the most famous in history. A native of Badajoz, son of the commander of Lobon, he was made a Knight of the Order of Santiago in reward for his exploits in Mexico and Central America. He accompanied Grijalva on his exploration of Yucatan and the Mexican coast in 1518, and was the chief officer of Cortes during the conquest of Mexico. As such, he was left in command of the forces at Tenochtitlan, when the conqueror had to move against Pámulo de Narvaez in 1520. During the absence of Cortez it became clear that the Mexican Indians, to avoid themselves of the weakness in numbers of the Spaniards, were preparing to use Pizarro, whom they held as their representative in the Nether world. Foreseeing this, Alvarado, warned of the character of a ceremonial that was going on, as preliminary to an attack upon him, took the offensive, and dispersed the Indians with some bloodshed (the numbers have been considerably exaggerated), but this only caused the Mexicans to begin hostilities at once. Alvarado distinguished himself by his military ability and personal bravery during the disastrous sally of Cortez from Mexico in July, 1520 (Voyage Trieste) and subsequently in the campaign and capture of the Indian stronghold (1521). In 1524 he conquered Guatemala, and became Governor of the Spanish province into which the territory was transformed. He soon undertook to fit out expeditions to the South Sea (with little result), and determined upon following the coast of western South America. Sailing to the coast of Ecuador in 1534, with a well-equipped flotilla, and landing on the Ecuadorian coast, he pushed on to the plateau of Quito, to find it held by Belalcazar for Pizarro. Bloodshed appeared imminent between the rival parties, and the arrival of Alvarado with his reinforcements from Pizarro led to negotiations, as a result of which Alvarado returned to Guatemala, having barred to Pizarro most of his ships, horses, and ammunition, as well as most of his men, against a comparatively modest sum of money. After his return to Guatemala, Alvarado turned his attention to northern Mexico. Constantly quarrelling with Cortez, he easily became the tool of the Viceroy Mendoza. He was in almost unceasing trouble with his neighbour Montejo about the boundaries of their respective territories. While pursuing the pacification of Guadalajara, as lieutenant of Mendoza, he was killed in a battle in the rocky height of Nochiztlan, 24 June, 1541. His wife, Doña Beatriz de la Cueva, lost her life in September of the same year, in the destruction of the city of Guatemala by the volcano called “de Agua.” Alvarado was not a gifted administrator; in fact, he was more distinguished for chivalrous bravery than for intellectual gifts. Physically very propossessing, brave to excess, he was mentally greatly inferior to Cortez and to Nuño de Guzman, while morally his superior. What is told of the outbursts of cruelty with which he is charged cannot be a surprise when the methods of warfare prevailing in his time are taken into consideration. He acted under the pressure of military necessity, and it is always well to test such charges by inquiring into their possibility and into the spirit of their authors. In estimating his conduct in South America we must remember that Alvarado was utterly helpless in presence of the superiority of Pizarro.

Alvarado is so intimately connected with the Conquest of Mexico that older works on that important event must be referred to for mention of Guadalajara. The letters of Cortez, Bernal Diaz del Castillo, Andres de Tapia Aguilar, Soares Peralta, and others. A large number of documents (particularly of importance to students of “histories”) are published in the Documento intitulados de Indias, Coleccion de documentos para la historia de Mexico, vol. 6. Much important material has also been accumulated in the Documento para la historia de Mexico, Joaquin Garcia y Vazquez (first series, II); Gomara and Herrera; Historia de Mexico, by Antonio de Bolea and others, like the Indian writers, Todarco and Pechilochote, Diego Encarte, and Juan de Tobal, also Jurisdicion, Monarchia Indiana; Vettia, Historia antigua de Mexico. Modern writers on the conquest of Mexico are so numerous that it is not possible to enumerate them.

Alvarez, Balthazar, a Spanish mystic, who was the spiritual director of St. Teresa, b. at Cervera, in Spain, in 1538, of a noble family; d. at Belmonte, 26 July, 1580. He studied philosophy and theology in the University of Alcala. When only eighteen years of age, he was remarkable for his extraordinary habit of prayer and piety. His inclination was first towards the Carthusians, because of their life of contemplation, but, finally, he entered the Society of Jesus, at Alcalá, in 1553, fifteen years after its foundation. The fautor of this move was his master of novices and subjected him to the rudest trials. In the novitiate of Simancas he met St. Francis Borgia, and the strongest affection was established between them. He resumed his philosophical and theological studies at Alcalá and Avila, under the guidance of the Dominicans; for as yet the Society had no theologians of its own. The continual interruptions of his studies impeded his progress in scholastic theology, but he compensated for it by the eminence he achieved, through prayer, in mystical theology, which fitted him in a remarkable degree for the office he subsequently held as confessor, master of novices, rector, provincial, and as director of the famous Father Spiritual house of Saint Teresa’s convent in Avila, and as a frequent visitor, was entrusted with the spiritual direction of St. Teresa, then belonging to the mitigated Order of Carmel, but who was on the point of founding the Discalced Carmelites. Alvaráz met with Teresa in matters of the spirit, but defended her from her critics, encouraged her in her work of reform, and had much to do with framing the rules of the new Order. His direction continued for seven years. The Saint declared that it had been revealed to her that Father Balthazar had reached a very high degree of perfection. He followed the usual method of prayer for sixteen years. After that he received a special gift of contemplation. In 1574 he was made rector of Salamanca and visitor of the Province of Aragon, and, in 1579, was about to be sent as provincial to Peru, but that project was never carried out. He was well on in life when his right of prayer was questioned. By some it was looked upon as a delusion of the devil. Alvaráz was compelled to write an account of it to the General of the Society of Jesus, Everard Mercurian, who approved of it, but disowned it as a general practice. At the same time, he expressed his esteem for Father Alvarazo and employed him in the most responsible offices. At his death, St. Teresa had a revelation of his glory in heaven.

Alvarez, Diego, Spanish theologian, b. at Medina de Rio Seco, Old Castile, about 1550; d. at Trani, Kingdom of Naples, 1835. He entered the Dominican Order in his native city, and taught theology for twenty years in the Schools of Burgo de Osma, Plasencia, and Valladolid, and for ten years (1596-1606) at the Monasterio, in Rome. Shortly after his arrival in Rome on 7 November, 1596 he presented to Clement VIII a memorial requesting him to examine the work “Concordia libri Arbitrii”, by Ludovicus de Fabri, of St. Augustinian, S.J., where he exhibited in his lifetime much of the material which had given rise to bitter controversy. Before the Congregation (Congregatio de Auxiliis), appointed by the Pope to settle the dispute, he defended the Thomistic doctrines of grace, predestination, etc., alone for three years, and, thereafter, conjointly with Thomas de Lemos, O.P., to whom he gave the first place, until the suspension of the Congregation (1606). He was appointed. 19 March, 1606, by Paul V, to the Archbishopric of Trani, where he passed the remainder of his life. Besides (1) a commentary on Isaiaas, and (2) a manual for preachers, he published: (3) "Auxilia divinae gratiae et humani arbitrii viribus et libertate, ac causis " (Trani, 1607); (4) "Responsonum ad objectiones adversus concordiam libri arbitrii cum divinâ praeexistit, providentia, et predestinazione, atque cum efficacia praevenientis " (Trani, 1607, 1608); (5) "Libri IV (Trani, 1622); Lyons, 1622); (5) "De origine Pelagianae heresis et eusgressu et damnatione per plures summos pontifices et concilia facta Historia ex annalibus Card. Baroni et alio probatis autoribus collecta" (Trani, 1629);
(6) "Responsumorum liber ultimus hos titulo: Opus praeclarum nunquam hactenus editum, in quo argumentum validissimum concordia liberi arbitrii cum divinâ prescienâ, praedestinatione, et efficacie gratiae prævenientis ad mentem S. Thomas et omni Thomistarum contra eos qui eam impugnâunt sunt, definitur et explicatur" (Trani, 1635); (7) "Opus de auxiliis divinae gratiae et humani arbitrii viribus et libertate, ac legitimâ ejus cum efficacire eorumdem auxiliorum concordia summa, in IV libros distincta" (Lyons, 1620; Cologne, 1621; Trani, 1623); (8) "De incarnatione divini verbi disputationes LXXX, in quinque libros et decenti de divina parte summis theologico docet S. Thomas a Q. J ad 24" (Lyons, 1614; Rome, 1615; Cologne, 1622); (9) "Disputationes theologicae in primam secundae S. Thome, in quibus praecipua omnis quae adversus doctrinam ejusdem et communem Thomistarum a diversis auctoris impugnatur, juxta legitimum sensum praecipitoris ghengelici explicatur et defenditur" (Trani, 1617; Cologne, 1621).

Alvarez, Manoel, educator, b. on the island of Madeira, 1526; d. at Evora, 30 December, 1582. In 1546 he entered the Society of Jesus, taught the classical languages with great success, and was rector of the colleges of Coimbra and Evora. Among the more than three hundred Jesuits who have written text-books on different languages, he took the foremost place. His Latin grammar was adopted as a standard work by the Ratio Studiorum, or Plan of Studies, of the Jesuits. Perhaps no other grammar has been printed in so many editions; Sommervogel, in his Bibliotheca de Compagnia de Jesus, gives a list of twenty-five volumes to a list of about four hundred editions of the whole work, or parts of it, published in Europe, Asia, and America. There exist also numerous translations into various languages: Bohemian, Croatian, Flemish, French, German, Hungarian, Illyrian, Italian, Polish, Spanish. An edition with Chinese translation appeared in Shanghai in 1899. A very interesting edition is one published in Japan in 1594, with partial translation into Japanese. An English edition, "An Introduction to the Latin Tongue, or First Book of Grammar" appeared in 1686. In many editions the text of Alvarez is changed considerably, others are abridged, and original work contains many variations suggested for the teacher. On this account it is more than a mere grammar; it is also a work on the method of teaching Latin, and gives an insight into the method of the old Jesuit colleges. The book was the subject of several controversies. Even Jesuits, in the "Trial Ratio" of 1586, raised six objections and desired, particularly, a better arrangement of some parts and greater clearness. After the publication of Latin grammars by De Condren, the Ortarian, and by Lancelot, of Port-Royal, both in French, the work of Alvarez was frequently censured, because it was written in Latin, and "presupposed what was to be learnt." Still, there were advantages in the course followed by Alvarez. To be sure, to beginners everything was explained in the vernacular; but the early use of a grammar written in Latin accustomed the pupils to speaking and writing that language. Without some practice of this kind a thorough knowledge of Latin could hardly be obtained. In former centuries a facility in speaking and writing Latin, which was the universal language of the educated world, was of the greatest importance. At the present day Jesuit colleges use modern grammars, thereby accommodating themselves to new conditions and changed educational ideas.

Allypius, Saint, the bosom friend of St. Augustine, though younger than he, was, after studying under Augustine at Milan, conspicuous at first as a magistrat in Rome. He abandoned that honour to follow his master into the Church. It is evident that there is no mention of him as a saint in the ancient catalogues. His name was placed in the Roman Martyrology by Gregory XIII, in 1584, the evidence of his sanctity being sufficiently clear from the account of his life by St. Augustine. His conversion began when Augustine was still a manchman, and occurred in consequence of a discussion about the folly of those who give way to sensual indulgence. A relapse occurred subsequently, when he was dragged by some friends to witness the savage games of the arena; but the final step was taken when, in company with Augustine, in obedience to the voice, "Allypius, lege, he read the commissio, etc. They were both baptized by St. Ambrose, at Milan. After living for some time with Augustine, in the monastery of Hippo, he was made Bishop of Tagaste. This was in the year 394, and took place after his return from the Holy Land, where he had seen St. Jerome. Under his guidance Tagaste reproduced the solitude, learning, intelect, exactness, and orthodoxy of Hippo. The exact date of his death is not known, but his festival is kept on 15 August.

Alisate, José Antonio, b. at Oumbas, Mexico, in 1738; d. in 1799. Alisate, who was a priest, was one of the most zealous students of liberal sciences in New Spain in the seventeenth century. More than thirty treatises on various subjects are due to his pen. Astronomy, physics, meteorology, antiquities, and metallurgy, were among the topics on which he wrote, but he also devoted serious attention to certain branches of industry. Thus the growing of silk in Mexico was the subject of several of his papers. He wrote a dissertation on the use of ammonia in combating mephitic gases in abandoned mines, and also prepared maps of New Spain (Mexico). He was frequently opposed, even reviled, at home, but the French Academy of Sciences made him a corresponding member, and the viceroys of Mexico and the archbishops entrusted him with sundry scientific missions. In 1766 he began the publication, at Mexico, of a newspaper, the “Diario literario de México”. His description of the ruins of Xochicalco is the first notice published of these interesting ruins. He also wrote a commentary upon the work of Clavigero on aboriginal Mexico and the natural history of that country.

He was also appointed, at a later date, member of the Vatican preparatory commission for dogmatic questions. In character he was amiable and virtuous. His “Manual of Church History” went through nine editions (1840-72) before his death, and was translated into several foreign languages (Eng. tr. by Pabish and Byrne, Cincinnati, 1874, et seq.). His “Patrology” went through four editions (1846-67). In 1866 he published his edition of the “Oratio Apologética” of St. Gregory of Nisianzus received a second edition. He was also a frequent contributor to various periodicals. He wrote in the first edition of Wetzler and Welte’s “Kirchenlexikon” (Freiburg, 1854) the article on the office of the church historian. He also wrote (1857) a Latin treatise on the relation of Greek and Latin studies to Christian theology, and the valuable work: “Die deutschen Plenarien im 15 und zu Anfang des 16 Jahrhunderts” (Freiburg, 1874).

Amadeo, or Amma, a Semitic term meaning mother, adopted by the Copts and the Greeks as a title of honour applied to religious and to ladies of high rank. In Coptic inscriptions, according to Lecerf, it is given to both of these categories of personages. The Greeks seem to have used it generally in the same sense as the Latin abbatissa or abbess. (2) Amma (amula). A vessel in which the wine offered by the people for the Holy Sacrifice was received (Ordo Rom., 27). Pope Adrian I (772-795) presented to the Church of St. Adrian amma una (Liber Pont. I, 510).

Amadeo (or Omodeo), Giovanni Antonio, an Italian architect and sculptor, b. near Pavia in 1447; d. 27 August, 1522, at Milan. In 1466 he was engaged as a sculptor, with his brother Protasio, at the famous Certosa, near Pavia. He was a follower of the style of Bramantino of Milan, and he represents, like him, the Lombard direction of the Renaissance. He practised cutting deeply into marble, arranging draperies in cartaceous folds, and treating surfaces flatly even when he sculptured figures in high relief. Excepting in these technical points he differed from his master in his aims and range of conception; he surpassed them that he may be ranked with the great Tuscan artists of his time, which can be said of hardly any other North-Italian sculptor.

While engaged at the Certosa, he executed the beautiful door leading from the church into the cloister, still known as the “door of Amadeo”. It is exquisitely decorated in Bramantesque style, reliefs of angels and foliage surround the door, and in the tympanum is a fine relief of the Virgin and Child. He also produced many marble reliefs for the façades of the tombs in the Certosa. After completing his work in Pavia, Amadeo went to Bergamo to design the tomb of Medea, daughter of the famous condottiere Bartholomeo Colleoni, in the Colleoni chapel. He returned to Pavia in October, 1478. On the death of Guiniforte Solari (1481), Amadeo had been temporarily appointed to succeed him as head architect of the Certosa, and was commissioned to design a new façade for the façade, with the assistance of Benedetto Brioseo, Antonio della Porta, and Stefano di Sesto. But it was not till 1490, when he was confirmed in his office, that he made the design which was accepted, and which was subsequently carried out by him and his successors. It is not known when Amadeo made the Borromeo monuments, formerly in the church of St. Pietro in Gessate, at Milan, and now in the Borromeo chapel at Isola Bella, on Lago Maggiore.

About 1490, after an absence of eight or nine years, Amadeo returned to his post at the Certosa and received the contract for the interior, and also for the dome of Milan, and he finished the façade, with the assistance of Benedetto Brioseo, Antonio della Porta, and Stefano di Sesto. But it was not till 1490, when he was confirmed in his office, that he made the design which was accepted, and which was subsequently carried out by him and his successors. upon the old artist, who died ex decrepitude, says the record, worn out not less by adverse fortune than by a life of unremitting labour. A leader among North-Italian sculptors in technic, in facility, and refinement, he would hardly have any rival even among his Tuscan contemporaries, were his style free from the mannerisms, and his standard of beauty more elevated.

Amadis and Akra.—This double title designates two Catholic dioceses of the Chaldean Rite in Kurdistan, Turkey in Asia. The Diocese of Amadis existed originally under another title; it received its actual name after the foundation of the city of Amadis in the beginning of the nineteenth century it was subdivided into three dioceses: Amadis, Zakho, and Akra. On 10 June, 1895, the Dioceses of Amadis and Akra were provisionally united; the bishop resides sometimes in one, sometimes in the other, or in small towns, or even in Chaldean missions. Amadis is the principal garrison town of the vilayet of Mossoul, about fifty miles north of this city. It has 5,000 inhabitants, of whom 2,500 are Musulmans, Kurds for the most part, 1,900 Jews, 1,600 Chaldeans. The Dominicans of Mossoul have a summer residence there. Within the limits of the diocese the great majority of inhabitants are Kurdish Musulmans, mingled with a certain number of Jews. The Christians, all Chaldeans, number 6,000, of whom 3,000 are Catholics and 3,000 Nestorians. The Nestorians have 14 parishes, 16 churches, 13 priests, 6 schools for boys. In Amadis the Protestant missionaries have many missions with schools. Akra is another principal garrison town of the same vilayet (province). It is beautifully situated on the flank of Chindar, with 4,700 inhabitants, of whom 4,650 are Musulmans, 80 Jews, 250 Christians, Chaldeans or Jacobites. The Chaldean bishop and school are in the Jacobite church and chapel, hollowed out of the rock. Zebhar, or Zibar, which name is sometimes joined to the episcopal title of Akra, is another garrison post. In the Diocese of Akra the greater part of the population is composed of Kurdish Musulmans. There are also a small number of Nestorians, some Jacobites, some Chaldeans, Nestorians grouped in the 11 villages, and, finally, 1,000 Chaldean Catholics. The last have 13 parishes, 12 churches, 8 priests, 2 schools for boys. The above figures are those given by J. B. Chabot, in his État religieux des diocèses formant le patriarcat chaldéen de Babylone in the Révue de l'Orient Chaldéen (Paris, 1890), I, 449-450. The missions Catholiques (Rome, 1895), 612, gives the following figures: Amadis, 2,000 Chaldeans, 15 parishes, 5 secular priests, 5 regulars, 1 school (at Araden); Akra, 2,000 Chaldean families, 8 churches, 6 priests. A. Battandier, Annuaire pontif. cathol. (Paris, 1904), 269, indicates 5,000 Chaldeans for both dioceses, of whom 1,000 are for Akra; 17 parishes, 22 secular priests, 4 regulars.

Amalarius of Metz, a liturgical writer, b. at Metz, in the last quarter of the eighth century; d. about 850. He was formerly considered a different personage from Amalarius of Trèves (Trier), but of late, owing to the researches of Dom Morin, the opinion seems to prevail that about 811, Amalarius of Metz became Bishop of Trèves, which diocese he relinquished after two years to act as envoy to Constantinople. Hence he is regarded as author of the works once attributed to Amalarius of Trèves. He was for some time a disciple of Alcuin. After returning to France from Constantinople, he would appear to have assisted at important synods held at Aix-la-Chapelle and Paris. Later, he was sent by Louis le Débonnaire as ambassador to Gregory IV of Rome, this being perhaps the visit to the Eternal City. Later, he governed the Diocese of Lyons during the exile of Agobard, and there tried to introduce his new antiphony, but met with strong opposition from the deacon Florus. When Agobard was restored to his see, both he and Florus turned the writings of Amalarius, in having censured at a synod held at Kiersy in 838 for his opinion concerning the signification of the parts of the divided Host at Mass. Finally Amalarius was involved in the theological controversies on predestination raised by Gottschalk. The date of his death has not been determined with certainty, but it must have been shortly after the year 850. The works of Amalarius treat chiefly of liturgical subjects. His most important and also his longest treatises are entitled De ecclesiasticis officiis and De ordine antiphonarii. The former is divided into four books, in which without observing a strict, any order he treated of the Mass, of the different benedictions, ordinations, vestments, etc., giving an explanation of the various formularies and ceremonies rather than a scientific exposition of the liturgy. The first book explains the liturgical seasons and feasts from Septuagesima to Pentecost and especially the ceremonies of Holy Week. The second book treats of the times for conferring Holy Orders, of the different orders in the Church and of the liturgical vestments. The third book contains a few preliminary chapters on bells, the choir, etc., a treatise on the different parts of the Mass celebrated pontifically according to the Roman Rite, and some chapters on special subjects, e. g. Advent, the Mass for the Dead, etc. The fourth book deals principally with the Divine Office, explaining its integral parts and the offices peculiar to certain liturgical seasons or feast days, but it contains a few supplementary chapters on obsequies for the dead and on subjects of liturgical treatment. In this book Amalarius explains the arrangement of the Divine Office and the variations for the different feasts, and considers in particular the origin and meaning of the antiphons and responses; indeed in this work he would seem a commentator on his own antiphonary compiled at Rome and defender of his method of composition. His Ecclesiae officii missae contains a description of pontifical Mass according to the Roman Rite and a mystical explanation of the different parts of the Mass. Several letters of Amalarius dealing with liturgical subjects have also been preserved. Dom Morin denies the authenticity of the letter of Amalarius in response to certain questions of Charlemagne concerning baptism, as well as the Forma institutionis canoniciorum et sanctimonialium, which is a collection of rules taken from the decrees of councils and works of the Fathers, for clerics and nuns living in his community. Unfortunately his antiphonary and also his Emboles have not been preserved.

Amalarius seems to have had a strong liking for liturgical studies, a liking which was stimulated and fostered by his master Alcuin. His travels to the East gave him considerable information concerning the Eastern rites, but his stay in Rome appears to have imbued him with a love for the Roman liturgy and to have greatly influenced his liturgical work. There he made a special study of rubrics and Roman customs; he inquired diligently of Theodore, the archpriest of the basilica of St. Peter, concerning the formularies and ceremonies there in use, and even sought to obtain copies of the liturgical books to bring to France. Living just at this time when the liturgy was changing, when the fusion of the Roman and Gallican uses was taking place, he exercised a remarkable influence in introducing the present form of the liturgy, which is half-sacredly planted the ancient Roman Rite. He sought to carry out the desire of the Emperor to introduce the Roman liturgy in order to obtain uniformity, but at the same time, like Alcuin and other liturgists of his age, he combined with the Roman whatever he deemed could be preserved in the Gallican Rite, as may be easily seen in his commentary on his own antiphony. The chief merit of his works consists in the fact that they have preserved much accurate and valuable information on the state of the liturgy at the beginning of the ninth century, so that a comparison may easily be made between it and the present liturgy to determine what changes have occurred and to trace the development that has taken place. The most serious defect in his writings is an excessive mysticism which led him to seek far-fetched and even absurd symbolical origins and meanings for liturgical formulas and ceremonies, but the fault may be in a measure excused if it is taken into consideration that it was common to all liturgical writers of that time. He may also have used more liberty in composing, changing, and transposing liturgical texts than ecclesiastical authority in later ages would permit, when the necessity of unity in the liturgy was more imperative. It has even been said that a monopoly of textual works had exercised a great influence on the development of the present Roman liturgy and his works are very useful for the study of the history of the Latin liturgies.

Amalberga, Saint, otherwise Amelia, was related in some way to Pepin of Landen. Whether she was sister or niece, the Bollandists are not sure. She was married to Wiger and became the mother of three saints, Guidila, Reinelda, and Emembertus. The Norman chronicles speak of her as twice married, which seems to be erroneous. Nor are Pharaellia and Ermeleinde admitted by the Bollandists to have been her children. She and her husband ultimately separated, she being left in the world, he having married another, she a nun. There is very great confusion in the records of this saint, and of a virgin who came a century after. To add to the difficulty a third St. Amalberga, also a virgin, appears in the twelfth century. The first two are celebrated simultaneously on 10 July.

Amalberga, Saint, a virgin, very much revered in Belgium, who is said to have been sought in marriage by Charles, afterwards Charlemagne. Continually repulsed, Charles finally attempted to carry her off by force, but though he broke her arm in the struggle he was unable to move her from the altar before which she had protrayed herself. The royal lover was forced to abandon his suit, and left her in peace. Many miracles are attributed to her, among others the cure of Charles, who was stricken with illness because of the rubeneses with which he had treated the saint. She died 10 July, in her thirty-fifth year, five years after Charles had ascended the throne.

Amalec (Amalecites in Douay Vers.; or Amalek, Amalekites; sometimes remembered chiefly as the most hated of all the enemies of the Israelites, and traditionally reputed among the fiercest of Bedouin tribes. I. Origin.—According to a widely accepted interpretation of Gen., xxxvi, 10-12, their desent is to be traced from Amalec, son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau, and ultimately therefore from Abraham; which account is credited by most modern scholars in so far as it indicates the Arabian origin of the Amalecites and a racial affinity with the Hebrews. The Amalec of Gen., xxxvi, 12, however, is not stated to be the ancestor of the Amalecites, though the main purpose of the context, which gives the origin of various Arabian tribes, favours that view; but against it is the earlier account of Gen. iv, 16, which can only be fairly interpreted to mean that the Amalecites, instead of being descended from Abraham, were already a distinct tribe in his day, when they were defeated at Cades (Kadesh) by Chedorlaomer (Chedorlaomer), King of the Elamites. This evidence of their antiquity would be confirmed by the more probable interpretation of those who regard the obscure prophecy of Balaam, concerning "Amalec, the first of the nations" as indicating, not their greatness, but their age, relative to the other nations mentioned in the oracle. No light on the origin of the Amalecites can be gathered from the Old Testament except perhaps the conclusion of a midrash (Num. xvi, 15), which is probably incorrect, that the Amalecites were an offshoot of the Arabian stock and of greater antiquity than the Israelites. The belief in their Arabian descent is confirmed by their mode of life and place of dwelling.

II. Seat.—The Amalecites were nomadic and warlike and their name is consequently connected in the Bible with various regions. Their original home, however, as appears from I K., xxvii, 8, was in the desert to the south and southwest of Judea, which stretches to the border of Egypt and to the foot of Mt. Sinai, and is now called Et Tih; a region too arid for cultivation, but fertile enough to afford excellent pasture. This indication of I K., xxvii, 8, is confirmed by other passages. It was in this desert, at Cades, that they suffered defeat from Chedorlaomer (Gen., xiv), here, farther to the south, at Raphidim, near the foot of Mt. Sinai, they offered opposition to Moses (Ex., xvii); here Saul attacked them (I K., xv), and here the last remnant of the Amalecites met a most ignominious end. But they were not always confined to the desert; they pushed farther north and in Moses' time some of them, at least, are found within the borders of Palestine, and frustrated the attempt of the Israelites to enter the country from the south (Num., xiii).

Twice our present Hebrew text shows them even as far north as the territory of Ephraim (Judges, v, 14; xii, 15); but in both cases there seems to be a faulty reading in the Hebrew, which allows us, therefore, to dispense with the habitual speculations, based on these texts, regarding the great expansion and varying fortunes of the Amalecites from their puzzling omission of Judges (v). (See commentaries of Moore and Lagrange on Judges, and Moore's Hebrew text of Judges in Paul Haupt's polyglot Bible.) Nomads and possessors of the Sinaitic peninsula, the Amalecites necessarily came into contact, and almost inevitably into conflict, with the Israelites.

III. AMALEC AND ISRAEL UNDER MOSES.—Their first meeting took place in the first year of the wandering, after Israel came out of Egypt, and was of such a nature that Israel then conceived a hatred of the Amalecites that outlasted their extermination under King Esheba, many centuries later. Later on, when the Israelites under Moses had encamped on their way to Mount Sinai; in the desert home, therefore, of the Amalecites. Moses, putting Joesue in command, went up to the top of a hill, with Aaron and Hur, and it was on this occasion that the fortune of battle was decided by "the rod of God." Held in the hands of Moses, Israel prevailing while his hands upheld the rod, Amalec when they "dropped," the victory finally going to the Israelites (Ex. xv. 17). There is, however, no account of Exodus to show why the Amalecites should be singled out to incur the special animosity of the Israelites, yet it concludes with the decree of Jehovah that He would destroy the memory of Amalec from under heaven, and that His hand would be against Amalec from generation to generation. Amalec, henceforward, was the aggressor (ibid., v. 8); though it must be borne in mind that the Israelites had invaded their country. The reason for Israel's hatred, which is wanting in this historical account, may be supplied from the later (and hortatory) account given in Deut., xxv., where it is incidentally stated that the head of Amalec's offending lay in his cruel and treacherous attack, by which he disregarded the laws of Bedouin hospitality, which was an affront to God as well as to man. Instead of showing ordinary humanity to the feeble stragglers of the Israelite army, "spent with hunger and labour," they ruthlessly struck them down. Nor, according to the rule of ancient Arabian hospitality, and with some sense of God, the Amalecites ought to have spared, and indeed, rather assisted, those who lagged behind, unfit for battle. That they did the contrary was inhuman and barbarous" (Dillman). Cruelty such as this was considered to render a tribe unfit for existence; so hatred of the Amalecites, even unto extermination, was enjoined upon the Israelites as a religious duty. Even apart, however, from this cruelty, rivalry between the two tribes was almost inevitable, as Amalec could not be expected to regard the displacement of Israel's invasion of his rich pasture-lands.

No further molestation from the Amalecites is related during the journey of the Israelites to Mt. Sinai, or their stay there, or their march to Cades, near the southern boundary of Palestine. It was from this side that the Israelites first attempted the entry into the Promised Land; and here they again encountered the Amalecites, at the place where the ancestors of the latter had been defeated by Chedor-lahomer. Israel had got as far as the wilderness of Pharan (Paran) and from there they sent spies into Palestine to spy out the peoples there, with their lands and cities. The Amalecites, south of the country and apparently at the head of a confederacy of different tribes, or nations, since they soon led a concerted attack on the Israelites; but the spies also brought back reports of giants living in the land, in comparison with whom, they said, "we were in our own sight as grasshoppers; and so we were in their sight." (see Heb. text, Num., xiii, 34). These stories of the giants frightened the people and "the whole multitude crying that night,” and they began to murmur and to wish they had died in Egypt or in the wilderness, rather than be doomed by the Lord to undertake the conquest of the land of giants. Moses, in his exhortation to confidence, contended against their foolish rebellious spirit, but only gained their hatred; and the Lord then passed on them the punishment of the forty years' wandering, decreeing that none of them should enter the Promised Land. This grieving the people exceeding exceedingly, Moses enticed them to go once more to attack the Amalecites and the Chanaanites. But Moses forbade it, prophesying evil because the Lord was not with them. They presumed, nevertheless, to go up, though Moses would not accompany them, and they met the fate foretold; the Amalecites, with their allies, attacking them with considerable slaughter and driving them as far as Horma (Num., xiv, 45). The subsequent history of the Amalecites during the time of Moses is obscure. Their destruction is foretold by Balaam in his famous oracle uttered on the top of Phogor, while he viewed the nations around. "And when he saw Amalec he took up his parable and said: 'Amalec, the first of all the nations, shall perish,' and his destruction, he calls this prophecy (whatever be its date) which shows at least that Amalec once held an important place among the Semitic tribes or nations surrounding Israel (Num., xxiv). The fulfilment of this prophecy is enjoined upon the Israelites by Moses in a farewell discourse, as a solemn charge, "And thou shalt drive them out: and make no league with them nor deal with them: for thou shalt not worship other gods; for the Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God, and visiteth the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and sheweth kindness unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments." (Deut., xxv, 19). And if this seem an inhuman command, let us remember the prevailing sentiment that the Amalecites were "inhuman and barbarous; a people with such evil customs deserves no mercy;" for it is a question of national life or death. It is plain, however, that we are far from the Sermon on the Mount.

IV. PERIOD OF THE JUDGES.—Under Joesue, Israel, entering Palestine from the east, did not come in contact with the Amalecites, but was kept busy fighting other enemies, such as the Ammonites and Moabites, who were endeavours to capture. As soon, however, as the Israelites were well established in Palestine, the old enmity became active again. When Eglon, King of Moab, went up against Israel, he was joined by the Amalecites and Ammonites as allies, and together they subdued the Israelites; and the Amalecites remained in subjection for fourteen years till, through the cunning and treachery of Aod (Ehud) the Benjamite, King Eglon met his tragic death (Judges, iii). Petty warfare between the Amalecites and the Israelites was incessant during most part of the period of the Judges, but the Israelites had by this time become an agricultural people, while the Amalecites remained Bedouin, and made frequent incursions into the land of their enemy and destroyed their crops and cattle (Judges, vi). On one occasion, they accompanied the Madianites on an invasion of Palestine, forming an almost innumerable host; they were unexpectedly attacked at night by Gedeon and 300 picked men, and through panic and (perhaps distrust) turned the sword on another and fled, with Gedeon in pursuit (Judges, vii). V. SAUL.—This defeat of the Amalecites, it seems, had the effect of quieting them for many years, for they are not heard of again till the time of Saul. Saul began his reign by vigorous military operations, waging war, with great success, against "enemies on every side"; among them, the Amalecites, who had been harassing the Israelites (1 K., xiv, 48). Then came the prophet Samuel and reminded Saul of Amalec's old offence and God's decree of extermination. The prophet's words made it clear (xxv, 1—3) that no enemy was hated like Amalec and that his extermination was regarded as a religious duty, imposed by God. All, man, woman, child, and beast, were to be destroyed and Israel was to covet none of Amalec's possessions for spoils. Saul proceeded to carry out this injunction as a character as special punishment upon the Amalecites is emphasized by his mercy to the Cinite (Kنت). Saul invaded the territory of the Amalecites to the south of Palestine and smote them from Hevila in the extreme east, to Sur near the border of Mesopotamia. He cut off over two thousand armed men, put all to the sword,—men, women, and children—except the King, Agag, whom he took alive, and the best of the animals, which he reserved for sacrifice. For this disobedience in sparing Agag and the best of the flocks and herds, Saul was rejected in the name of God by Samuel who hewed down Agag in his presence; from that day his fortune changed, and when, after Samuel’s death, Saul consulted his spirit in the cave at Endor, he was told that he was rejected because he had not executed the fierce wrath of God upon Amalec (Newman’s sermon, “Wilfulness the Sin of Saul”). It was an Amalecite who claimed, untruthfully, it seems (II K., i, with I K., xxxi), to have given King Saul his death-blow. Who still a fugitive from Saul, the Amalecites were living, nearer to its climax the extermination of the doomed race. He was in the service of Achis, King of Geth, in the land of the Philistines, near therefore to Amalecite territory. With his own men, and soldiers borrowed from Achis, he raid the Amalecites and inflicted such slaughter, sparing not a soul (I K., xxxii). The Amalecites, according to the absence of David and Achis, by burning Zoileg (Ziklag), a city which Achis had given to David, and carrying off all its inhabitants, including two wives of David. David pursued and overtook the enemy in the midst of feast and revel, recovered all the spoil and captives, and slew all the Amalecites except 400 young men who escaped on camels (xxx). This slaughter broke the power of the Amalecites and drove them back to their desert home; there a miserable remnant of them lingered on till the days of Eschias, tenth successor of David, when a band of Canaanites, who had suffered to exist in this place, to the last man, Israel’s fiercest foe (1 Par., iv, 42, 43). Thus on Mount Seir was fulfilled the doom passed on them by Moses and Balaam about six hundred years earlier. Their name occurs no more except in Ps. lxxxii (reputed by many to be of the Machabean period) where the use cannot be taken as an historical datum, but is rather poetical, applied to Israel’s traditional enemies. The Egyptian and Assyrian discoveries have as yet disclosed no mention of Amalec. The Bible is our only witness, and its testimony, though sifted and questioned in regard to many details, particularly in the accounts of the battles at Rephidim and Cades, and the marvellous victory of Gideon, has been accepted in the main as a reliable account.

Amalfi, the archdiocese of, directly dependent on the Holy See, has its seat at Amalfi, not far from Naples. This was a populous city between the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. An archbishopric from the twelfth century until 1075, it rivalled Pisa and Genoa in its domestic prosperity and maritime importance. A prey to the Normans who encamped in the south of Italy, it became one of their principal ports. The Emperor Lothair, fighting in favour of Pope Innocent II against King Roger of Sicily, who sided with the Antipope Anacletus, took prisoner in 1133, assisted by forty-six Pisan ships. The city was sacked, and Lothair claimed as part of the boot a copy of the Pandects of Justinian which was found there. But the early beginnings of Amalfi are very obscure; it is not known when it was founded, or when Christianity reached it. That it was early is a reasonable conjecture, considering the facilities for communication with the East which the South of Italy possessed. The first positive indication that Amalfi was a Christian community, however, is supplied by Gregory the Great, who, writing in January, from the Suburban region of Campania, ordered him to constrain within a monastery Primeneus, Bishop of Amalfi, because he did not remain in his diocese, but roam abroad (Reg., V, xiv; cf. Jaffé, RR.P.P., 1403). Amalfi was founded by Primenius in A.D. 596; the regular list of bishops began in 829; it was raised to an archbishopric by John XV in 897. In 1206, after the completion of the cathedral of St. Andrew, the body of the Apostle of that name, patron of Amalfi, was brought there from Constantinople by Pietro, cardinal of Capua, an Amalician. There are about 30,000 inhabitants, 54 parishes, and 279 secular priests. Amalfi occupied a high position in medieval architecture. Among the notable churches of the eleventh century, the campanile, the convent of the Capucini, founded by Cardinal Capuano, richly represent the artistic movement prevailing in Southern Italy at the time of the Normans, with its tendency to blend the Byzantine style with the forms and sharp lines of the northern architecture of the time. In the history of medieval culture Amalfi vindicated a worthy place for herself, especially by flourishing schools of law and mathematics. Flavio Gioia, who made the first mariner’s compass known to Europe, is said to be a native of Amalfi. But Gioia was not the inventor of the compass, which was invented in the East and brought to Europe by the Arabs. In honour of Charles II, a Capetian king then ruling Naples, Gioia put a fleur-de-lis instead of an N, to indicate the north.

Amalricians (Lat., Almarici, Amaurici), an heretical sect founded towards the end of the twelfth century, by Amaury de Béne or de Chartres (Lat., Almaricvs, Amauricvs, Amauricius), a cleric and professor in the University of Paris, who died between 1204 and 1207. The Amalricians, like their founder, professed a species of pantheism, maintaining, as the fundamental principle of their system, that God and the universe are one; that God is everything and everything is God. This led them, naturally, to the denial of Transubstantiation, the confounding of good and evil—since good and sinful acts, so called, are equally of God—and to the consequent rejection of the laws of morality. They held, besides, peculiar views on the Trinity, distinguishing three periods in the Divine economy with regard to man; the reign of the Father, become incarnate in Abraham, which lasted until the coming of Christ; the reign of the Son, become incarnate in Mary, which lasted from the coming of Christ; and the reign of the Holy Ghost, which, taking its beginning from the dawn of the twelfth century, was to last until the end of time. Unlike the Father and the Son, the Holy Ghost was to become incarnate, not merely in one individual of mankind, but in every member of the human race. Moreover, as the Old Law had lost its efficacy at the coming of Christ, so, in their day, the law of the Gospel was to be supplanted by the interior guidance of the Holy Ghost, indwelling in each human soul. In consequence of this they rejected the sacraments as obsolete and useless. Those in whom the Holy Spirit had already taken up His abode were called “the spiritualised,” and were supposed to be already enjoying the life of the Resurrection. The signs of this interior illumination were the rejection of faith and hope, as tending to keep the soul in darkness, and the acceptance, in their place, of the light of positive knowledge. It followed from this that the acquisition of new truths consisted their paradise; while ignorance, which meant adherence to the old order of things, was their substitute for hell.

The Amalricians, though including within their ranks many priests and clerics, succeeded for some time in propagating their errors without being detected by the ecclesiastical authorities. At length, through the efforts of Peter, Bishop of Paris, and the Chevalier Guérin, an adviser of the king, to both of whom secret information of the affair had been given, the inner workings of the sect were laid bare, and the principals and protégés were arrested. In the council of bishops, the council of bishops and bishops of Paris, assembled to take measures for the punishment of the offenders. The ignorant converts, including many women, were pardoned. Of the principals, four were condemned to imprisonment for life. Ten others, priests and clerics, who had been previously reduced to no degree of authority, and being publicly degraded, were delivered to the secular authority and suffered the penalty of death by fire. Five years later (1215) the writings of Aristotle, which had been disturbed by the sectaries in support of their heresy, were forbidden to be read either in public or in private. Regarding the scope of this prohibition see Paris, University of.

Amaury himself, though dead some years, did not escape the penalty of his heresy. Besides being included in the condemnation of his disciples, in the council of 1210 special sentence of excommunication was pronounced against him, and he was convicted, and, according to their resting-places and cast into unconfined must. His doctrine was again condemned by Pope Innocent III in the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) "as insanity rather than heresy", and Pope Honorius III condemned (1225) the work of Scutus Erginin, "De Divinazione Natura", from which Amaury was supposed to have derived the beginnings of his heresy.

Amadus, Saint, one of the great apostles of France, according to Nantes, in France; a scribe of the end of the sixth century. He was, apparently, of noble extraction. When a youth of twenty, he fled from his home and became a monk near Tours, resisting all the efforts of his family to withdraw him from his mode of life. Following what he regarded as divine inspiration, he betook himself to Bourges, where under the direction of St. Austregisile, the bishop of the city, he remained in solitude for fifteen years, living in a cell and subsisting on bread and water. After a pilgrimage to Rome, he was consecrated in France as a missionary bishop at the age of thirty-three. At the request of Colotre I, he began first to evangelize the inhabitants of Ghent, who were then degraded idolaters, and afterwards extended his work throughout all Flanders, suffering persecution, and undergoing great hardship but achieving nothing, until the miracle of restoring to life a child who had been hanged, changed the feelings of the people to reverence and afterwards brought many converts to the faith. Monasteries at Ghent and Mt. Blandin were erected. They were the first monuments to the Faith in Belgium. Returning to France, in 630, he incurred the enmity of King Dagobert, whom he had endeavoured to recall from a sinful life, and was expelled from the kingdom. Dagobert afterwards entreated him to return, asked pardon for the wrong done, and requested him to be tutor of the heir to the throne. The danger of living at court prompted the Saint to refuse the honour. His next apostolate was among the Slavs of the Danube, but it met with no success, and we find him then in Rome, reporting to the pope the results had been to the Pope, Martin I, for instructions. The reply traced his plan of action and the clerics, as usual, treated him with contempt. The information about the Monothelete heresy, which was then desolating the East. Ammas was also commissioned to convocate councils in Neustria and Austrasia in order to have the decrees which had been passed at Rome read to the bishops of Gaul, who in turn commissioned him to bear the acts of their councils to the Sovereign Pontiff. He availed himself of this occasion to obtain his release from the bishopric of Maastricht, and to resume his work as a missionary. It was at this time that he entered into relations with the family of Pepin of Lenden, and helped St. Boniface and St. Ittia to establish their famous monastery of Nivelles. Thirty years before he had gone into the Basque country to preach, but had met with little success. He was now requested by the inhabitants to return, and although seventy years old, he undertook the work of evangelizing them and appears to have banished idolatry from the land. Returning again to his own country, he founded several monasteries, on one occasion at the risk of his life. Belgium especially boasts many of his foundations. Dagobert made great concessions to him for his various establishments. He died in his monastery of Eson, at the age of ninety. His feast is kept 6 Feb. Amasia (Amasea), a titular see and metropolis of Pontus in Asia Minor on the river Iris, now Amasias. Its episcopal list dates from the third century (Gams, I, 442). It was the birthplace of the geographer Strabo, who has left us a striking description of his native city, in a deep and extensive gorge over which rose abruptly a lofty rock, "steep on all sides and descending abruptly to the river". It was famous in antiquity for its rock-cut tombs, reached by galleries, through which some traces of Roman sepulchres, for the ancient kings of Pontus hewn in the solid rock.

Amastris (now Amassera or Samastrzo), a titular see of Paphlagonia in Asia Minor, on a peninsula jutting into the Black Sea. Its episcopal list dates from the third century (Gams, I, 454). It is mentioned by Homer (Iliad, II, 853), a flourishing town in the time of Trajan (98-117), and was of some importance until the seventh century of our era.

Amat, Thaddeus, second Bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, California, U. S., b. 31 December, 1810, at Barcelona, Spain; d. at Los Angeles, California, 12 May, 1878. He joined the Lazarists in early manhood and was ordained a priest at the house of that Congregation in Paris, in 1858. He came to the United States and after 1843 was consecrated Bishop of the Lazarists in Louisiana. He was master of novices in the houses of the Lazarists in Missouri and Philadelphia in 1841-47, and on the promotion of Bishop Alemany of Monterey to be Archbishop of San Francisco, Father Amat was named to succeed him. He was consecrated Bishop of the diocese of Rome, 12 March, 1854. There were seventeen priests in the diocese then to care for the spiritual needs of a very mixed population largely of Spanish origin. The opening of the mining era of the early fifties brought a large accession of other settlers, and Bishop Amat, visiting Europe to obtain additional aid for his diocese, brought back Lazarist priests and Sisters of Charity with him. He was given permission by the Holy See, in 1859, to call himself Bishop of Los Angeles, and changed his residence to that city. There, under his inspiration, the Lazarists opened St. Vincent's College and the Franciscan Brothers took charge of the schools. The Sisters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary were also introduced. A serious spinal affection forced Bishop Amat to ask for a coadjutor and his vicar-general, the Rev. Francis Mora, was so consecrated 3 Aug. 1873. He had begun a new cathedral and lived to see it dedicated 9 April, 1876. When he died, at the age of sixty-seven, the progress of the diocese under his jurisdiction was indicated in the increase to 51 priests, 32 churches, 15 chapels, and 32 stations, 6 academies and substantial parochial schools, asylums, and other charitable institutions.

Amathus, name of two titular sees, one in Syria, suffragan of Apamea, with an episcopal list known from 449 to 536; the other on the southern coast of Cyprus, whose episcopal list reaches from the fourth century to 797. The latter place was one of the most ancient Phoenician settlements on the island, and long maintained the customs and character of an Oriental town. It was famous for the worship of Aphrodite and Adonis, also of the Tyrian god Melkart. The great wheat-fields and rich mines of the Cypriot city were celebrated in antiquity (Ovid, Met., X. 220).

He was educated by the Jesuits in the Maronite college in Rome, 1677-85, and on his return to Syria in the latter year was ordained priest. Having been sent to Rome on business concerning the Maronite Church, he was requested by Cosmo III de Medici to organize an Oriental printing establishment at Florence, and in 1708 he was given the chair of Hebrew at Pisa. Shortly after this Clement XI appointed him a member of the commission charged to bring out a corrected edition of the Septuagint. His chief work is an edition of the Syriac works of St. Ephrem with Latin translation. of which, however, he had only published two volumes when death overtook him; the third was completed by Stephen Assemali.

AMBITION, the undue craving for honour. Anciently in Rome the candidates for office were accustomed to go about (ambrire) soliciting votes. This striving for popular favour was spoken of as ambitio. Honour is the manifestation of a certain reverence for a person because of the worth or assemblage of good qualities which that person is deemed to have. The excessive desire of distinction is of course a sin, not because it is wrong in itself, but because it is assumed that this state of affairs, without proper regard to the mandates of sound religion, this deification, in desire of, or search for, honour may come about chiefly in three ways.

(1) One may want this exhibition of homage for some merit which he really does not possess.

(2) A man may permit himself to forget that the thing or things, whatever they may be, which are thought to deserve the testimony of others, are not his in fee simple, but God's, and that the credit therefore belongs primarily to God.

(3) A person may be so absorbed in the display of esteem for, or deference towards, himself as to fail to notice the particular degree of excellence which has evoked it for the welfare of others (St. Thomas, Summa Theol., II-II, q. cxxxv, Art. 1). Ambition as such is not accounted a mortal sin; it may become such either because of the means it uses to compass its object, as for instance, the simoniacal endeavour to obtain an ecclesiastical dignity, or because of the harm done to another. Ambition operates as a canonical impediment in the following circumstances. Those who take their elevation to a church dignity for granted, and, before receiving the requisite formal enabling notice of it, by some overt act demean themselves as if their election were an accomplished fact, are held to be ineligible. The bestowal of the office in this case is likewise considered invalid. Those who accept an election brought about by an abuse of the secular power are also declared ineligible (Corpr. Jur. Can. in VI Decret., Bk. I, tit. vi, ch. v).

JOSEPH F. DELANY.

AMBO (pl. Ambos, or Ambones), a word of Greek origin, supposed to signify a mountain or elevation; at least Innocent III so understood it, for in his work on the Mass (III, xxxiii), after speaking of the deacon as being the ambo to read the Gospel, he quotes the following from Innocent III: "Get thee upon a high mountain, thou that bringest good tidings to Sion: lift up thy voice with strength". And in the same connection he also alludes to Our Blessed Lord preaching from a mountain: "He went up into a mountain—and opening his mouth he taught them" (Matt., v, 1, 2). An ambo is an elevated desk or pulpit from which in the early churches and basilicas the Gospel and Epistle were chanted or read, and all kinds of communications were made to the congregation; and sometimes the bishop preached from it, as in the case of St. John Chrysostom, who, Socrates says, was accustomed to mount the ambo to address the people, in order to be more distinctly heard (Eccl. Hist., VI, v). Originally there was only one ambo in a church, placed in the nave, and provided with two flights of steps; one from the east, the side towards the altar; and the other from the west. From the eastern one the deacon read the Epistle; and from the western the deacon, facing the people, read the Gospels. The inconvenience of having one ambo soon became manifest, and in consequence in many churches twoambones were erected. When there were two,
they were usually placed one on each side of the choir, which was separated from the nave and aisles by a low wall. An excellent example of this arrangement can still be seen in the church of St. Clement at Rome. Very often the gospel ambo was provided with a permanent candlestick; the one attached to the ambo in St. Clement's is a marble spiral column, richly decorated with mosaic, and terminated by a capital twelve feet from the floor.

Ambones are believed to have taken their origin from the raised platform from which the Jewish rabbis read the Scriptures to the people, and they were first introduced into churches during the fourth century, were in universal use by the ninth, reaching their full development and artistic beauty in the twelfth, and then gradually fell out of use, until in the fourteenth century, when they were largely superseded by pulpits. In the Ambrosian Rite (Milan) the Gospel is still read from the ambo. They were usually built of white marble, enriched with carvings, inlays of coloured marbles, Cosmati and glass mosaics. The most celebrated ambo was the one erected by the Emperor Justinian in the church of Sancta Sophia at Constantinople, which is fully described by the contemporary poet, Paulus Silentiarius in his work ἐν Τοῦ Κωνσταντίνου. The body of the ambo was made of varous precious metals, inlaid with ivory, overlaid with plates of repoussé silver, and further enriched with gildings and bronze. The disappearance of this magnificent example of Christian art is involved in great obscurity. It was probably intact down to the time of the taking of Constantinople by the Crusaders in 1203, when it was largely a mount of its beauty and wealth. In St. Mark's, at Venice, there is a very peculiar ambo, of two stories; from the lower one was read the Epistle, and from the upper one the Gospel. This form was copied at a later date in what are known as "double-decker" pulpits. Very interesting examples may be seen in many of the Italian basilicas; in Ravenna there are a number of the sixth century, one of the seventh at Torcello; but the most beautiful are in the Roman churches of St. Clement, St. Mary in Cosmedin, St. Lawrence, and the Ara Coeli.

CARTYL COLEMAN

Ambo, In the Russian and Greek Church.—Its use is now practically dispensed with in the Roman Rite and the only reminder of it in modern churches is the pulpit or reading desk. Sometimes two ambos were used, from one of which the Epistle was read and from the other the Gospel. Examples of these may be seen in the church of St. Clement at Rome and the cathedral of St. Mark at Venice. In the Russian Orthodox Church the ambo now applied to two or three semi-circular steps leading from the middle of the soleta (or platform immediately in front of the iconostasis) to the floor of the church. These semi-circular steps are directly in front of the royal doors of the iconostasis. In cathedral churches in Russia there is also another ambo situated in the middle of the nave, upon which the bishop stands during certain parts of the pontifical service. In the Greek (Hellenic) Orthodox Church the ambo is more often in the ancient style, but has been removed from the middle to the sides of the church. The Greek Liturgy, however, plainly shows that the ambo was originally raised and that it was in the middle of the church. One of the concluding prayers of the Greek Mass is the "prayer behind the ambo" (ἐπὶ ιεραμόνων), which is directed by the rubric to be said in front of the royal doors outside of the iconostasis. In the Greek Catholic (United) Church, both in Slavic countries and the United States, the ambo is a table standing in front of the royal doors of the iconostasis, upon which there are a crucifix and two candles. It is used as the ambo and replaces the analogion. Services such as baptisms, confirmations, and marriages are performed at the ambo. The Greek Catholic churches of Italy and Sicily do not use the ambo, having apparently followed the Roman Rite in its disuse.

Amboise, George de, French cardinal, archbishop, and statesman, b. at Chaumont-sur-Loire in 1460; d. at Lyons, 25 May, 1510. He was one of the prominent figures of the French Renaissance. Nominated Bishop of Montauban in the year of his fourteenth, he did not assume office till he was twenty-four. In 1493, he became Archbishop of Rouen. He belonged to the party of the Duke of Orleans, who, when he became Louis XII (1498) at once made d'Amboise his prime minister. He was created a cardinal by Alexander VI, the same year. As prince minister, he pursued an ambitious foreign policy, and urged Louis XII to the conquest of Milan; at home, he inaugurated a firm and wise policy of retrenchment and reform, reducing the imposts one-tenth, setting the finances in order, and introducing needed improvements into legislation and the judicature system. As a churchman, he was still less admirable. Ambitious to become pope he strove by every means in his power to compass this end at the death of Alexander VI. Louis XII lent him the prestige of France, and Caesar Borgia intrigued at Rome with the Spanish cardinals in his interest. In the balanced body stood third with the Chairs, the Borgia family, d'Amboise, Rovere receiving fifteen, and Cardinal Caraffa fourteen. When Cesare Borgia retired from Rome, d'Amboise suffered from the reaction, and was content to promote the election of Pius III. On the death of Pius he renewed his efforts and, having again failed, went south to the court between France and Julius II. His plans, however, came to naught through the failure of the French army in Italy. To conciliate the King Julius made d’Amboise "Legato in Lore" for the whole of France’s, a most exceptional honour. Cardinal d’Amboise held his high office in Church and State till his death, which took place at the convent of the Celestins in Lyons, 25 May, 1510. He has a splendid tomb in the Cathedral of Rouen.

Ambronay. Our Lady of, a sanctuary of the Blessed Virgin at Ambronay, France, regarded as one of the two cradles of devotion to Our Lady in the Diocese of Belley. The original church was founded by recluses in the seventh century, and having been destroyed by the Saracens, was rebuilt (c. 803) by St. Barnard (779-942), together with the famous monastery of the same name. About the middle of the thirteenth century the church was reconstructed on a grander scale, and still remains, in spite of the ravages of 1793, one of the most imposing monuments of the diocese, remarkable for its windows, sacristy, altar, and spiral staircase. The façade of one of the naves dates from the ninth century.

Ambros, August Wilhelm, historian of music and art critic, one of the greatest in modern times, b. at Mauth, near Prague, in Bohemia, 17 November, 1816; d. in Vienna, 28 June, 1876. Although destined for the profession of law, in which he obtained the doctor’s degree, and advanced to the point of becoming Councillor of State, he studied music seriously and under the best auspices. He was soon appointed a member of the board of governors of the Royal Conservatory at Prague, and became active as a musical critic. At this period of his career Ambros wrote several overtures for orchestra and a "Stabat Mater." As a composer he reflected very strongly the influence of Robert Schumann. Lacking the vital spark of originality, his compositions have not survived him. He became generally known as an art critic through his book "Die Grenzen der Musik und Poesie", written in reply to Edward Hanlick’s treatise "Vom Musikalisch-Schonen". The latter assumed a materialistic basis for the art of music, defining musical forms as being nothing more than "sounding arabesques". Ambros’s work defines what can be expressed by means of music, and what needs one of the other arts for its manifestation. In this remarkable book the author not only lays down those principles of Catholic philosophy in the light of which he judges the art works of the past and present, but he also displays that extensive knowledge of the architecture, sculpture, the painting, and the literature of all schools and nations, the intercommunication which at that time attracted the attention of the scientific world. With every new work of Ambros, such as "Kulturhistorische Bilder aus dem Musikleben der Gegenwart", "Bunte Blätter" and numerous magazine articles, his reputation increased, until the Breslau publishers induced him, in 1874, to write a complete history of music. Ambros embraced with alacrity this great opportunity for, as he put it, "rendering a service to science and art." The result was the greatest historical work on the art of music in existence. Beginning with the music or antiquity in the first volume, the second is devoted to the Middle Ages, the third to the Northern school, and the fourth deals with Palestina and the transition to the moderns. This history, revealing the great artistic past of the Church, appeared at the time of the revival brought about by the publication of Ponce’s "Musica Divina" and gave tremendous impetus to the movement. Ponce made the treasures of polyphonic art accessible, and Ambros told of their origin. Aside from the permanent historical value of his life work, Ambros has rendered the Catholic cause untold service by vindicating the past, and by proclaiming with a powerful pen and with vast erudition sound philosophic principles in the midst of a wel-nigh all-pervading pantheism. Ambros died before completing the fourth volume of his history. Otto Kade published, in 1882, a fifth volume consisting of musical illustrations collected from the historian’s literary remains, and W. Langhans has brought the history up to date, without, however, showing Ambros’s acumen or soundness. It should be mentioned that Ambros, while holding his official positions in Prague and, after 1872, in Vienna, as an officer of the Department of Justice, professor at the Conservatory, and private tutor to Prince Rudolf, was given leave of absence six months in the year, and provided with the means to enable him to visit the principal libraries of Europe in search of material for his great work.

JOSEPH OTTEN.

Ambrose, Saint, Bishop of Milan from 374 to 397; b. probably 340, at Trier, Arles, or Lyons; d. 4 April, 397. He was one of the most illustrious Fathers and Doctors of the Church, and fitly chosen, together with St. Augustine, St. John Chrysostom, and St. Athanasius, to uphold the venerable Chair of the Prince of the Apostles in the tribunal of St. Peter’s at Rome. The materials for a biography of the Saint are chiefly to be found scattered through his writings, since the "Life" written after his death by his secretary, Paulinus, at the suggestion of St. Augustine, is extremely disappointing. Ambrose was descended from an ancient Roman family, which, at an early period, had embraced Christianity, and numbered among its seions both Christian martyrs and high officials of State. At the time of his birth his father, likewise named Ambrosius, was Prefect of Gallia, and as such ruled the present territories of France, Britain, and Spain, together with Tingitana in Africa. It was one of the four great prefectures of the Empire, and the highest office that could be held by a subject. Trier, Arles, and Lyons, the three principal cities of the province, contend for the honour of having given birth to the Saint. He was the youngest of three children, being preceded by a sister and a brother named Satyrus, who, upon the unexpected appointment of Ambrose to the episcopate, resigned a prefecture in order to live with him and relieve him from temporal cares. About the year 354 Ambrosius, the father, died, whereupon the family removed to Rome. The saint, who was only five years old at the time of his father's death, was placed under the care of his aunt, who became a great help in the religious training of her two sons by the example and admonitions of her daughter, Marcellina, who was about ten years older than Ambrose. Marcellina had already received the virginal veil from the hands of Liberius, the Roman Pontiff, and with another consecrated virgin lived in her mother's house. From her the Saint imbibed that enthusiastic love of virginity which became his distinguishing trait. His progress in secular knowledge kept equal pace with his growth in piety. It was of extreme advantage to himself and to the Church that he acquired a thorough mastery of the Greek language, which was then coming into such glorious development, and which had already given to the intellectual equipment of Saint Augustine, and, in the succeeding age, of the great St. Leo. In all probability the Greek Schism would not have taken place had East and West continued to converse as intimately as did St. Ambrose and St. Basil. Upon the completion of his liberal education, the Saint devoted his attention to the study and practice of the law, and soon so distinguished himself by the eloquence and ability of his pleadings at the court of the pretorian prefect, Anicius Probus, that the latter took him into his council, and later obtained for him the post of curial governor of Liguria and Æmilia, with residence in Milan. "Go," said the prefect, with unconscious prophecy, "conduct thyself not as a judge, but as bishop." We have no means of ascertaining how long he retained the civic government of his province; we know only that his upright and gentle administration gained for him the universal love and esteem of his subjects, paving the way for that sudden revolution in his life which was soon to take place. This was the more remarkable, because the province, and especially the city of Milan, was in a state of religious chaos, owing to the persistent martianism of the Ariotes, and the Arian faction, under the influence of Satyrus, relieved him from the care of the temporalities, and enabled him to attend exclusively to his spiritual duties. In order to supply the lack of an early theological training, he devoted himself assiduously to the study of Scripture and the Fathers, with a marked preference for Origen and St. Basil, traces of whose influence are repeatedly met with in his works. With a genius truly Roman, he, like Cicero, Virgil, and other classical authors, contented himself with thoroughly digesting and casting into a Latin mould the best fruits of Greek thought. His studies were of an essentially practical nature; he strongly felt that he might teach. In the preface of his treatise, "De Officiis," he complains that, owing to the suddenness of his transfer from the tribunal to the pulpit, he was compelled to learn and teach simultaneously. His piety, sound judgement, and genuine Catholic instinct preserved him from error, before his fame as a canonical writer had established his name in the Church. The doctrine of the Sacraments of the Church had reached the ends of the earth. His power as an orator is attested not only by the repeated eulogies, but yet more by the conversion of the skilled rhetorician Augustine. His style is that of a man who is concerned with thoughts rather than words. We cannot imagine him wasting time in turning an elegant phrase, "He was one of those",...

says St. Augustine, "who speak the truth, and speak it well, judiciously, pointedly, and with beauty and power of expression" (De doct. christ., iv, 21).

His Daily Life.—Through the door of his chamber, wide open the livelong day, and crossed unannounced by all, of whatever estate, who had any sort of business with him, we catch a glimpse of the head of the Bishop with the bounteous and the visitors, the high official who seeks his advice upon some weighty affair of state is allowed by some anxious questioner who wishes to have his doubts removed, or some repentant sinner who comes to make a secret confession of his offences, certain that that be Saint Adrian, who was wont to say, "I am alone in the church alone" (Paulinus, Vita, xxxix). He ate but sparingly, dining only on Saturdays and Sundays, and festivals of the more celebrated martyrs. His long nocturnal vigils were spent in prayer, in attending to his vast correspondence, and in penning down the thoughts that had occurred to him during the day in his oft-interrupted readings. His indefatigable industry and methodical habits explain how so busy a man found time to compose so many valuable books. Every day, he tells us, he offered up the Holy Sacrifice for his people (pro quibus ego quotidie instauro sacrificium). Every Sunday his eloquent discourse on the Arianizing tendencies of the Emperor Valens was listened to with great attention. One favourite topic of his was the excellence of virginity, and so successful was he in persuading maidens to adopt the religious profession that many a mother refused to permit her daughters to listen to his words. The saint was forced to refute the charge that he was depopulating the empire, by quasitly appealing to the young men as to whether any of them experienced any difficulty in finding wives. He contends, and the experience of ages sustains his contention (De Virg., vii) that the population increases in direct proportion to the esteem in which virginity is held. His sermons, as was to be expected, were intensely practical, replete with pithy rules of conduct which have remained as household words among Christians. In his method of biblical interpretation all the personages of Holy Writ, from Adam down, stand out before the people as living beings, bearing each his distinct message from God to men. The instruction of the present generation. He did not write his sermons, but spoke them from the abundance of his heart; and from notes taken during their delivery he compiled almost all the treatises of his that are extant.

Ambrose and the Arians. It was but natural that so high-minded, so exalted, so kind to the poor, so completely devoting his great gifts to the service of Christ and of humanity, should soon win the enthusiasm of his people. Rarely, if ever, has a Christian bishop been so universally popular, in the best sense of that much abused term, as Ambrose of Milan. His popularity, conjointly with his intrepidity, was the secret of his success in rooting enthroned iniquity. The heretical Empress Justina and her barbarian advisers would many a time fain have silenced him by exile or assassination, but, like Herod in the case of the Baptist, they "feared the multitude". His heroic struggles against the aggressions of the secular power have immortalized him as the model and forerunner of future Hildebrands, Beockets, and other champions of religious liberty. The elder Valentinian died suddenly in 375, the year following the consecration of Ambrose, leaving his Arian brother Valens to continue a dreary task, and the Empress Justina, determined to rule the provinces formerly presided over by Ambrosius, with no provision for the government of Italy. The army seized the reins and proclaimed emperor the son of Valentinian by his second wife, Justin, a boy four years old. Gratian good-naturedly acquiesced, and assigned to his half-brother the sovereignty of Italy, Illyricum, and Africa. Justina had prudently concealed her Arian views during the lifetime of her orthodox husband, but now, abetted by a powerful and mainly Gothic faction at court, proclaimed her determination to rear her child in that heresy, and once more attempt to Arianize the West. This of necessity brought her into direct collision with the Bishop of Milan. One of his last efforts was to quench the last embers of Arianism in his diocese. That heresy had never been popular among the common people; it owed its artificial vitality to the intrigues of courtiers and soveignets. As a preliminary to the impending contest, Ambrose, at the request of Valens, had denounced to lead and to the wars of Valens, and wished to have as an antidote against Oriental sophistry, wrote his noble work, "De Fide ad Gratianum Augustum", afterwards expanded, and extant in five books. The first passage at arms between Ambrose and the Empress was on the occasion of an episcopal election at Sirmium, the capital of Illyricum, and at the time the residence of Justina. Notwithstanding her efforts, Ambrose was successful in securing the election of a Catholic bishop. He followed up this victory by procuring, at the Council of Aquileia (381), over which he presided, the deposition of the only bishop of the See of Aquileia, Secundianus, both Illyrians. The battle royal between Ambrose and the Empress, in the years 385, 386, has been graphically described by Cardinal Newman in his "Historical Sketches". The question at issue was the surrender of one of the basilicas to the Arians for public worship. Throughout the long struggle Ambrose displayed in an eminent degree all the qualities of a great leader. His intrepidity in the moments of personal danger was equalled only by his admirable moderation; for, at certain critical stages of the drama one word from him would have hurried the Empress and her son from the throne. That word was never spoken. An enduring result of this great struggle with despotism was the rapid development during its course of the ecclesiastical chant, of which Ambrose laid the foundation. Unable to overcome the fortitude of the Bishop and the spirit of the people, the court finally desisted from its efforts. But when it was forced to call upon Ambrose to exert himself to save the imperilled throne.

Already he had been sent on an embassy to the court of the usurper, Maximus, who in the year 383 had defeated and slain Gratian, and now ruled in the West. Largely through his efforts an armistice had been reached between Maximus and Theodosius, whom Gratian had appointed to rule the East. It provided that Maximus should content himself with his present possessions and respect the territory of Valentinian II. Three years later Maximus determined to cross the Alps. The tyrant received Ambrose unavourably and, on the plea, very honourable to the Saint, that he refused to hold communion with the bishops who had compassed the death of Priscillian (the first instance of capital punishment inflicted for heresy by a Christian prince) dismissed him summarily from his court. Shortly after Maximus invaded Italy. Valentinian III, the nephew and brother of Theodosius, who took up their cause, defeated the usurper, and put him to death. At this time Justina died, and Valentinian, by the advice of Theodosius, abjured Arianism and placed himself under the guidance of Ambrose, to whom he became closely attached. Ambrose was named as the successor of Theodosius in the West that one of the most remarkable episodes in the history of the Church took place: the public penance inflicted by the Bishop and submitted to by the Emperor. The long-received story, set afoot by the distant Theobert, which extols the Saint's firmness at the expense of his equally pronounced virtues of prudence and meekness—that Ambrose stopped the Emperor at the porch of the church and publicly upbraided and humiliated him—is shown by modern criticism to have been greatly exaggerated. The emergency called into action the spirit of the saint. The news reached Milan that the sedulous Thessalonians had killed the Emperor's officials, Ambrose and the council of bishops, over which he happened to be presiding at the time, made an apparently successful appeal to the clemency of Theodosius. Great was their horror, when, shortly after, Theodosius, yielding to the suggestion of his court, or to the urging of his newell, ordered an indiscriminate massacre of the citizens, in which seven thousand perished. In order to avoid meeting the blood-stained monarch or offering up the Holy Sacrifice in his presence, and, moreover, to give him time to ponder the enormity of the deed so foreign to his character, the Saint, pleading ill-health, and sensible that he exposed himself to the charge of cowardice, retired to the country, whence he sent a noble letter "written with my own hand, that thou alone mayst read it", exhorting the Emperor to repair his crime by an act of amends, with words of extreme humanity. "And, being laid hold of by the discipline of the Church, did penance in such a way that the sight of his imperial loftiness prostrated the people who were interceding for him weep more than the consciousness of offence had made them fear it when enraged", "Stripping himself of every emblem of royalty", says Ambrose in his funeral oration (c. 34), "he publicly in church bewailed his sin. That public penance, which private individuals shrink from, an Emperor was not ashamed to perform; nor was there afterwards a day on which he did not wear his misfortune, as his plain tunic, without theatrical setting, is much more honourable both to the Bishop and his sovereign."

LAST DAYS OF AMBROSE.—The murder of his youthful ward, Valentinian II, which happened in Gaul, May 395, just as Ambrose was crossing the Alps to baptize him, plunged the Saint into deep affliction. His eulogy delivered at Milan is singularly tender; he courageously described him as a martyr baptized in his own blood. The usurper Eugenius was, in fact, a heathen at heart, and openly proclaimed his resolution to restore paganism. He reopened the ancient temples, and ordered the famous altar of Victory, torn down by the Valentinian, and the prefect Symmachus had maintained a long and determined literary contest, to be again set up in the Roman senate chamber. This triumph of paganism was of short duration. Theodosius in the spring of 394 again led his legions into the West, and in a brief campaign defeated and slew the tyrant, Eugenius. Roman heathenism perished with him. The Emperor recognized the merits of the great Bishop of Milan by announcing his victory on the evening of the battle and asking him to celebrate a solemn sacrifice of thanksgiving. Theodosius did not long survive his triumph; he died at Milan a few days later (January, 395) with Ambrose at his bedside and the name of Ambrose on his lips. "Even while death was dissolving his body", says the Saint, "he was more concerned about the welfare of the churches than about his personal danger". "I loved him, and mourned that the Lord will not hearken to the prayer I send up for his preservation" (In obit. Amb. c. 35). Only two years elapsed before a kindly death reunited these two magnanimous souls. No human frame could long endure the incessant activity of an Ambrose. One instance, recorded by his secretary, of his extraordinary capacity for work is significant. He died on Good Friday. The following day five bishops found difficulty in baptizing the crowd to which he had been accustomed to administer the sacrament unsaid. When the news that he was seriously ill, Count Stilicho, "fearing that his death would involve the destruction of Italy", despatched an embassy, composed of bishops and other chief citizens, every one of whom, he was told, had desired to see him. They were to prolong his days. The response of the Saint made a deep impression on St. Augustine: "I have not so lived amongst you, that I need be ashamed to live; nor do I fear to die, for we have a good Lord". For several hours before his death he lay with extended arms in imitation of his expiring Master, who also appeared to him in a vision. Bodily Christ was given him by the Bishop of Verceil, and, "after swallowing It, he peacefully breathed his last". It was the fourth of April, 397. He was interred as he had desired, in his beloved basilica, by the side of the holy martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius, the discovery of whose relics, during his great struggle with Justina, had so consoled him and his faithful adherents. In the year 835 one of his successors, Angilbert II, placed the relics of the three saints in a porphyry sarcophagus under the altar, where they were found in 1864. The works of St. Ambrose (13 vols.) were issued first in a humanist edition, 1527, under the supervision of Erasmus. A more elaborate edition was published in Rome in the year 1580 and following. Cardinal Montalto was the chief editor until his elevation to the papacy as Sixtus V. It is in five volumes and still retains a value owing to the prefixed "Life" of the Saint, composed by Baronius. Then came the excellent Maurist edition published in two volumes at Paris, in 1856 and 1860; reprinted by Migne in four volumes. The career of St. Ambrose occupies a prominent place in all histories, ecclesiastical and secular, of the fourth century. Tillemont's narrative, in the tenth volume of his "Memoirs", is perhaps the most valuable. The question of the genuineness of the so-called eighteen Ambrosian Hymns is of secondary importance. The great merit of the Saint in the field of hymnology is that of laying the foundations and showing posterity what ample scope there existed for future development.

Writings of SAINT AMBROSE.—The special character and value of the writings of St. Ambrose are at once tangible in the title of Doctor of the Church, which from time immemorial he has shared in the West with St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and St. Gregory. He is an official witness to the teaching of the Catholic Church from the very earliest times of the early centuries. As such his writings have been constantly invoked by popes, councils, and theologians; even in his own day it was felt that few could voice so clearly the true sense of the Scriptures and the teaching of the Church (St. Augustine, De doctrina christ., IV, 46, 46, 50). Ambrose is pre-eminent the ecclesiastical teacher, setting forth in a sound and edifying way, and with conscientious regularity, the deposit of faith as made known to him. He is not the philosophical scholar meditating in silence and retirement on the truths of the Christian Faith, but the strenuous administrator, bishop, and statesman, whose writings are only the record of his life and labours. Most of his writings are really homilies, spoken commentaries on the Old and New Testaments, taken down by his hearers, and afterwards reduced to their present form, though very few of these discourses have reached us exactly as they fell from the lips of the great bishop. An alternative Roman genius shines out with surpassing distinctness; he is clear, sober, practical, and aims always at persuading his hearers to act at once on the principles and arguments he has laid down, which affect nearly every phase of their religious or moral life. "He is a genuine Roman in whom the ethico-practical note is always dominant. He had neither time nor liking for philosophico-dogmatic speculations. In all his writings he follows some practical purpose. Hence he is often content to reproduce what has been already treated, to turn over for another harvest a field already worked. He often draws abundantly from the ideas of some earlier writer, Christian or pagan, but adapts these thoughts with tact and intelligence to the larger public of his time and his people. In formal perfection his writings leave something to be desired; a fact that need not surprise us when we recollect the demand of the time of Ambrose. His ambition abounds in unconscious reminiscences of classical writers, Greek and Roman. He is especially conversant with the writings of Vergil. His style is in every way peculiar and personal. It is never wanting in a certain dignified reserve; when it appears more carefully studied than is usual with him, its characteristics are energetic brevity and bold originality. Those of his writings that are homiletic in origin and form betray naturally the great oratorical gifts of Ambrose; in them he rises occasionally to a noble height of poetical inspiration. His hymns are a sufficient evidence of the sure master that possessed iuxta carmen (Bardenhewer, Les pères de l'église, Paris, 1898, 738–737; cf. Pruner, Die Theologie des heil. Ambrosius, Eichstadt, 1864.) For convenience sake his extant writings may be divided into four classes: exegetical, dogmatic, ascetic-moral, and occasional. The first, consisting of sermons, or devotional expositions, deal with the story of Creation, the Old Testament figures of Cain and Abel, Noe, Abraham and the patriarchs, Elias, Tobias, David and the Psalms, and other subjects. Of his discourses on the New Testament only the lengthy commentary on St. Luke has reached us (Expositio in Lucam). He is not the author of the admirable commentary on the thirteen Epistles of St. Paul known as "Ambrosiaster." Altogether these Scripture commentaries make up more than one half of the writings of Ambrose. He delights in the allegorico-mystical interpretation of Scripture, i.e. while admitting the natural or literal sense he seeks everywhere a deeper mystic meaning that he converts into practical instruction for Christian life. In this, says St. Jerome (Ep. xii) "he was a disciple of Origen, but after the modifications in that master's manner due to St. Hippolytus of Rome and St. Basil the Great." He was also influenced in his time by the Jewish Talmud, to the extent that the much corrupted text of the latter can often be successfully corrected from the echoes and reminiscences met with in the works of Ambrose. It is to be noted, however, that in his use of non-Christian writers the great Doctor never abandons a strictly Christian attitude (cf. Kellner, Der heilige Ambrosius als Erklärer des Alten Testamentes, Ratisbon, 1893).

The most influential of his ascetic-moral writings is the work on the duties of Christian ecclesiastics (De officiis ministrorum). It is a manual of Christian morality, and in its order and disposition follows closely the asceticus of Gerson. Nevertheless," says Dr. Bardenhewer, "the antithesis between the philosophical morality of the pagan and the morality of the Christian ecclesiastic is acute and striking. In his exhortations, particularly, Ambrose betrays an irresistible spiritual power," (cf. P. Turchi, Saint Ambrose, la morale chrétienne au quatrième siècle, Paris, 1895). He wrote several works on virginity, or rather published a number of his discourses on that virtue, the most important of which is the treatise "OnVirgins" addressed to his sister Marcellina, herself a virgin consecrated to the divine service. St. Jerome says (Ep. xiii) that he was the most eloquent and exhaustive of all the exponents of virginity, and this judgment expresses yet the opinion of the Church. The genuineness of the touching little work "On the Fall of a Consecrated Virgin" (De lapu virginitatis) has been called in question, but without sufficient reason. Dom Germain Morin maintains that it is a real work of Ambrose, but like so many of his so-called "books," owes its actual form to some one of his auditors. His dogmatic writings deal mostly with the divinity of Jesus Christ and of the Holy Ghost, also with the Christian sacraments. At the request of the young Emperor Gratian (375–383) he composed a defense of the true divinity of Jesus Christ against the Arian heresy and he denied the true divinity of the Holy Ghost against the Macedonians; also a work on the Incarnation of Our Lord. His work "On Penance" was written in reftutation of the rigoristic tenets of the Novatians and abounds in useful evidences of the power of the Church to forgive sins, the necessity of confession and the meritorious character of good works. A special work on Baptism (De sacramentis regenerationis), often quoted by St. Augustine, has perished. We possess yet, however, his excellent treatise (De Mystis) on Baptism, Confirmation, and the Blessed Eucharist. It is one of the most highly exalted works on the subject. The genuineness has been called in doubt by opponents of Catholic teaching concerning the Eucharist, but without any good reason. It is highly probable that the work on the sacraments (De Sacramentis, ibid.) is identical with the preceding work: only, as in the "Ambrosiaster," it was published by some hearer of Ambrose." Its evidences to the sacrificial character of the Mass, and to the antiquity of the Roman Canon of the Mass are too well known to need more than a mention; some of them may easily be seen in any edition of the Roman Breviary (cf. Probst, Die Liturgie des vierten Jahrhunderts und deren Reform, Münster, 1893, 232–239). The correspondence of Ambrose includes but a few confidential or personal letters; most of his letters are official notes, memorials on public affairs, reports of councils held, and the like. Their historical value is, however, of the first order, and they exhibit him as a Roman administrator and statesman second to none in Church or State. If his personal letters are unimportant, his remaining discourses are of a very high order. His work on the death (378) of his brother Satyrus (De esceusu fratris sui Satyr) contains his funeral sermon on this brother, one of the most profound and touching of Christian eloquence; and the consolatory discourses that were henceforth to take the place of the cold and inept declarations of the Stoics. His funeral discourses on Valentine II (392), and Theodosius the Great (395) are considered models of rhetorical composition; (cf. Villemain, De l'eloquence chrétienne, Paris, ed. 1891); they are also historical documents of much importance. So also is his discourse against the Arian intruder, Auxentius (Contra Auxentum de basilicis tridentina) and his two discourses on the finding of the bodies of the Milanese martyrs Gervasius and Protasius. It is not a few works have been falsely attributed to St. Ambrose; most of them are found in the Benedictine edition of his writings (reprinted in Migne) and are discussed in the manuals of patrology (e.g. Bardenhewer). Some of his genuine works appear to have been lost, e.g. the already mentioned work on baptism. St. Augustine (Ep. 31, 8) is loud in his praise of a (now lost) work of Ambrose on the subject of John 1:4 Cestros (Iambros). Mommsen denies (1890) his authorship of the famous Roman law text known as the "Lex Dei, sive Mosaicarum et Romanarum Legum Collocationem, an attempt to exhibit the law of Moses as the historical source whence Roman civil jurisprudence derived its principles. Editions of his Writings. — The literary history of the editions of his writings is a long one and may be seen in the best lives of Ambrose. Erasmus edited them in four tomes at Basle (1527). A valuable Roman edition was brought out in 1580, in five volumes, the result of many years' labour; it was begun by Sixtus V. while yet the monk Felice Peretti fixed to it is the life of St. Ambrose composed by Baronius for his Ecclesiastical Annals. The excellent Benedictine edition appeared at Paris (1856–90) in two folio volumes; it was twice reprinted at Venice (1745–51, and 1761–82). The latest edition of the writings of St. Ambrose is that of P. A. Bal- lerini (Milan, 1878) in six folio volumes; it has not rendered superfluous the Benedictine edition of du Frische and Le Nourry. Some writings of Ambrose have appeared in the Vienna series known as the "Corpus Scriptorum Classicerum Latinorum" (Vienna, 1857–1907). There is an English version of selected works of St. Ambrose by H. de Brouillette in the ninth volume of the second series of the "Select Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers" (New York, 1896). A German version of selected writings in two volumes, executed by Fr. X. Schulte, is found in the "Bibliothek der Kirchenväter" (Hamburg, 1871–77). For exhaustive bibliographies see Chavalier, Répertoire, etc., Bibl.-Bibliographie (2 ed., Paris, 1905), 186–393; Bardenheuer, in Episcopi (Freiburg, 1901), 337–339; De Broglie, Les Saints; St. Ambroise (Paris, 1899); Davies in Dict. of Christ., Biogr., v. 1, 91–99; Butler, Lives of the Saints, 7 Dec.; Forsey, Ambrosius, Bishop von Milan (Halle, 1884); Ihm, Studia Ambrosiana (Leipzig, 1890); Furst, Collection to Ambrosiana, a collection of learned studies published (Milan 1839) on occasion of the sixteenth centenary of his death. Ambrose of Camaldoli, Saint, an Italian theologian and writer, b. at Portico, near Florence, 16 September, 1386; d. 21 October, 1439. His name was Ambrose Traversari. He entered the Order of the Camaldoli when fourteen and became its General in 1431. He was a great theologian and writer, and knew Greek as well as he did Latin. These gifts and his familiarity with the affairs of the Church led Eugenius IV. to send him to the Council of Basel, where Ambrose strongly defended the primacy of the Roman pontiff and adjured the council not to rend asunder Christ's seamless robe. He was next sent by the Pope to the Emperor Sigismund to ask his aid for the pontiff in his efforts to end this council, which for five years had been trenching on the papal prerogatives. The Pope transferred the council from Basle to Ferrara, 18 September, 1437. In this council, and later, in that of Florence, Ambrose by his efforts, and charity toward some poor Greek bishops, greatly helped to bring about a union of the two Churches, the Decree for which, 6 July, 1439, was called on to die. He died soon after. His works are a treatise on the Holy Eucharist, one on the Procession of the Holy Ghost, many lives of saints, a history of his generalship of the Camaldolites. He also translated from Greek into Latin a Life of Chrysostom (Venice, 1533); the Spiritual Works of Chrysostom (Basel, 1552); the Apocalypse of St. John Climacus (Venice, 1531), P. G., LXXXVIII. He also translated four books against the errors of the Greeks, by Manuel Kalekas, Patriarch of Constantinople, a Dominican monk (Ingolstadt, 1608), P. G., CCL, col. 13–661, a work known only through Wessius's translation. A number of other works of St. John Chrysostom; the treatise of the pseudo-Denis the Areopagite on the celestial hierarchy; St. Basil's treatise on virginity; thirty-nine discourses of St. Ephrem the Syrian, and many other works of the Fathers and writers of the Greek Church. Dom Mabillon's "Letters and Orations of St. Ambrose of Camaldoli" was published at Florence, 1729. St. Ambrose is honoured by the Church on 20 November.

Ambrose of Sienna, Blessed, b. at Sienna, 16 April, 1220, of the noble family of Sansedoni; d. at Sienna, in 1226. When he was only eight years old, Ambrose was cured of a congenital deformity in the Dominican church of St. Mary Magdalene. As a child and youth he was noted for his love of charity, exercised especially towards pilgrims, the sick in hospitals, and prisoners. He entered the novitiate of the Dominican convent in his native city at the age of seventeen, was sent to Paris to continue his philosophical and theological studies under Albert the Great, and had for a fellow-student there St. Thomas Aquinas. In 1248 he was sent with St. Thomas to Cologne where he taught in the Dominican schools. In 1290 he was one of the band of missionaries who evangelized Hungary. In 1299 he was thrown under an interdict for having espoused the cause of the Emperor Frederick II, then at enmity with the Holy See. The Siennese petitioned Ambrose to plead their cause before the Sovereign Pontiff, and so successfully did he do this that he obtained for his native city full pardon and a renewal of all her privileges. The Siennese soon cast off their allegiance; a second time Ambrose obtained pardon for them. He brought about a reconciliation between Emperor Conrad of Germany and Pope Clement IV. About this time he was chosen bishop of his native city, but he declined the office. For a time he devoted himself to preaching the Crusade; and later, at the request of Pope Gregory X, caused the studies which the late war had practically suspended to be resumed in the Dominican convent at Rome. After the death of Pope Gregory X he retired to one of the convents of his order, whence he was summoned in 1295 by Innocent V and sent as papal legate to Siena. He restored peace between Venice and Genoa and also between Florence and Pisa. His name was inserted in the Roman Martyrology in 1577. His biographers exhibit his life as one of perfect humility. He loved poverty, and many legends are told of virtues over carnal tempers, and as an apostolic preacher. His oratory, simple rather than elegant, was most convincing and effective. His sermons, although once collected, are not now extant.

Ambrosian Basilica.—This basilica was erected at Milan by its great fourth-century bishop, St. Ambrose, and was consecrated in the year 386. The basilica in its present form was constructed at four different periods, three of which fall within the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, and the fourth during the Carolingian period. Yet the original church has disappeared, a fairly good idea of its appearance in the time of its founder may be obtained from references in the writings of St. Ambrose, supplemented by modern researches. The original edifice, like the great churches of Rome of the same epoch, belonged to the basilica type; consisted of a central nave flanked by two aisles, two side aisles, an apse, and an apse. Investigations made in 1864 have established the fact that the nave and the aisles of the existing basilica correspond with those of the primitive church; the atrium, however, which dates from the ninth century, is much more extensive than that which it replaced. The sanctuary of the basilica also was enlarged in the ninth century, and two smaller apses, flanking a new central apse of greater depth than the original apse, were occupied by the same place as in the time of St. Ambrose, and the columns of the ciborium appear never to have been disturbed; they still rest on the original pavement. The Ambrosian basilica, so called even during the life of its founder, was consecrated under circumstances which recall one of the most remarkable events in the relation of Church and State in the fourth century. On the death of the Emperor Gratian (383), the Empress Justina, in the name of her son, the young Valentinian II, succeeded to the government of the Western half of the Empire. Justina was a jealous Arian, and Milan, where she took up her residence, was militantly orthodox. As the Arians at the time had no place of worship in Milan, the Empress demanded one from Ambrose; but the Bishop without a moment's hesitation refused to comply with her wish. For more than a year Justina and her advisers endeavoured to force their object; but the Bishop, who was supported by the Catholics of Milan, brought all their exertions to nought. The crisis in the unprecedented contest came during the Holy Week of 386. Ambrose received an order to depart from the city; he replied that he would not desert his flock unless forced to do so. He then proceeded to officiate as usual at the Holy Week services in the new basilica. While these functions progressed, the basilica was surrounded by troops, with the design of seizing the Bishop and the church at one stroke, but the people refused to yield. The doors were closed, and for several days St. Ambrose and the congregation endured a siege. The soldiers, however, were by no means hostile, and many of them joined in the singing of the hymns composed by the Bishop for the occasion. Under these circumstances, practically abandoned by the soldiers as well as by the people, the Empress was forced to yield, and the controversy was settled. For the hymns of Theodosius from taking part in the celebration of the liturgy, as well as the submission of the great Emperor, see AMBROSE, SAINT.

After the final victory of Ambrose over the Arian faction at court, the people requested him to consecrate the basilica, which at its opening had only been consecrated by the Bishop with whose vigil he had been forced to complete the work. When he did so, could he obtain relics of martyrs. This obstacle was removed, St. Augustine informs us (Confess. IX, vii.), by the discovery in the Naborian basilica of the relics of Sts. Gervasius and Protasius, the location of whose tombs was revealed to St. Ambrose in a vision. The translation of these martyrs' relics to the new basilica was made with the greatest solemnity, and served as the crowning triumph of the orthodox over the Arians. In the explorations of 1864 the sarcophagi which in the fourth century contained these relics, as well as the sarcophagus of St. Ambrose, were discovered in the confusion of the ruins. The remains of all three sarcophagi were found in a porphyry sarcophagus to which they had been transferred, probably in the ninth century, by Archbishop Angilbert II (824-839). Like his contemporary and friend, St. Paulinus of Nola, St. Ambrose adorned the walls of his basilica with frescoes representing sacred scenes from the Old and the New Testament. From the distich inscriptions, composed by St. Ambrose, accompanying each group, we learn what subjects were depicted. Noah, the ark, and the dove recalled a favourite subject of the catacombs, though the symbolic meaning was somewhat different. Abraham was represented contemplating the stars, less numerous than his posterity were destined to be; the same patriarch with Sara, in another scene, was acting as host to Angels. Isaac and Rebecca, two scenes from the life of Jacob, and two from that of Joseph formed part of the cycle from the Old Testament. The New Testament was represented by the conversion of Zaccheus, the haemorrhoisae, the Transfiguration, and St. John, reclining on the breast of Our Saviour. The altar of the basilica, erected in the first half of the ninth century, is a work of rare merit. The famous bronze serpent stands on a column in the center, on the left, and is surmounted by a cross on the right. This was brought from Constantinople about the year 1001, by Archbishop Arnulf, and placed in the Ambrosian basilica under the assumption that it was the bronze serpent erected in the desert by Moses. Archaeologists regard it as very probably a pagan emblem of Eaculpius.

Ambrosian Chant.—The question as to what constituted Ambrosian chant in the sense of chant composed by St. Ambrose has been for a long time, and still is, a subject for research and discussion among archaeologists. When Ambrose, who came Bishop of Milan, in 374, he found a liturgy in use which tradition associates with St. Bernabas. It is presumed that this liturgy, which was brought from Greece and Syria, included singing by the celebrant as well as the spoken word and liturgical action. On the other hand, it is certain that the greater part of the chants now used in connection with the Ambrosian, or Milanese, rite, which are frequently designated in the wider sense as Ambrosian chant, originated in subsequent centuries as the liturgy was developed and completed. So far no documents have been brought to light which would prove that the chant composed anything except the melodies to most of his hymns. Of a large number of hymns attributed to him, only fourteen are pronounced with certainty to be his, while four more may be assigned to him with more or less probability. Like any other great man who dominates his time, St. Ambrose had many imitators, and it is hard to say who wrote those written by his contemporaries or those who came after him, in the form which he used, that is, the Iambic dimeter, were called "Hymni Ambrosiani". The confusion brought about in the course of time by the indiscriminate use of this designation has necessitated endless study and research before it was found possible to separate what was written by St. Ambrose and what by his imitators. As regards the melodies, it has been equally difficult for archaeologists to distinguish them and restore them to what was probably their original form. Although the opinion that the early Western Church received into its liturgy, together with the psalms of the Old Testament, the melodies to which they had been sung in the Temple and the synagogues, and that melismatic chants, (those in which many notes may be sung to one syllable of the text, in contradistinction to syllabic chants, in which there is only one note for each syllable) were in use from the beginning, has been defended with plausibility by men like Hagemans, Delitzsch, and, lately, by Houdard (Cantilene Romain, 1905), no direct contemporary testimony that such was the case has yet been discovered. It is likely that the florid, or melismatic, style in which most of our Gregorian psalms are written, and which many scholars believe to be of Hebrew origin, found its way into the Church at a much later period. The literature at the time of St. Ambrose shows that the Greek music was the only kind known to the saint and his contemporaries.

St. Augustine, who wrote his unfinished work
"De Musick" at about the time that St. Ambrose wrote his hymns, gives us an idea as to the form which the melodies must have had originally. He defines music as "the science of moving well" (scientia bene movendi) and the lambic foot as consisting of "arioti and a long of three beats". As in the case of St. Ambrose we have poet and composer in one person, it is but natural to suppose that his melodies took the form and rhythm of his verses. The fact that these hymns were intended to be sung by the whole congregation, over which, according to the Ariost, the saint cast a magic spell by means of his music, also speaks in favour of their having been syllabic in character and simple in rhythm. For several centuries it has been held that St. Ambrose composed what are now termed antiphons and responsories. There is no satisfactory proof that such is the case. The fact that he introduced the antiphon (alternare) mode of singing the psalms and his own hymns (each of the latter had eight stanzas), by dividing the congregation into two choirs, probably gave rise to this opinion. The responsory as practised by direction of St. Ambrose consisted in intoning the verse of a psalm by one or more chanters and the response of the same by the congregation.

Guido Maria Drexes, S.J., F. A. Gevaert, Hugo Riemann, and others have endeavoured to show how the melodies belonging to the authentic Ambrosian texts have been transmitted to posterity and what rhythmical and melodic changes they have suffered in the course of time in different countries. Dreyes first consulted the "Psalterium, cantica et hymni aliquaque divinis officiis ritu Ambrosiano paulludibus communia modulationibus opportunis notata Fredericki [Borromeo] Cardinalis Archiepiscopi juseu edita. Mediolani apud heredes Pacifici Pontii et Joannem Baillartianum, Franciscanum archiepiscopum, MDCXIX" and the complete Ambrosian manuscript Hymnary in the Bibliotheca Trivulziana in Milan, which two works are most likely to contain the best traditions. The melodies as they appeared in these works were then compared with manuscripts of the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries at Naples, Monza, Prague, Heiligen Kreuz, St. Florian (Austria), Nevers (France), and Coldingham (Scotland), preserved by the Cistercian monks, who from the foundation of their order had used the Ambrosian hymnary and not the Roman. This comparison made it possible to eliminate the many metrical accretions and modifications received evidently, at the hands of singers who were influenced by the taste of their times and found the original melodic simplicity unsatisfactory. As to the rhythm, it must be remembered that the Ambrosian, like all plain-chant melodies, lost their rhythm in the course of the Middle Ages. They were transcribed from the ancient neumatic notation into square notes of equal length, the time given to them being determined by the text syllables to which they were sung. Bearing in mind St. Augustine's definition, and the nature of Greek music, and also the fact that in the time accent had not overshadowed quantity in poetry, we see that Dreyes justified in his mode of restoring the melodies, at least as far as their rhythm is concerned. Inasmuch as all the hymns are written in the same metre, the melodies may be, and undoubtedly have been, used interchangeably. The following illustrations will give an idea of the different forms of the same melody in the various codices. The melody to the hymn "Eterne rerum Conditor", according to the above-mentioned Psalterium and the hymnary of the Bibliotheca Trivulziana, we reproduce under (a). Under (b) we will give the same tune as it is contained in a codex of St. Florian dating from the fourteenth century. Under (c) is the same melody as restored by Dreyes, stripped of its added notes, and in the rhythmical form which it probably had originally.

The hymn "Splendor paternae gloriae" exists in more different forms than the one which we have considered above. Version (a) gives the form of the melody as it reads in the Psalterium; (b), as it is in the antiphonary of Nevers of the twelfth century; (c), the version contained in a codex of the thirteenth century in the National Library at Naples; under (d), as it is found in an antiphonary of the fourteenth century in St. Florian, Austria, and, finally, (e) gives us the restored and, probably, the original form.
We next give the five variants of the hymn “Nunc Sancte nobis Spiritus”, of which (a) reproduces the melody as it is in the Bibliotheca Trivulziana; (b), from the codex of Nevers; (c), the Coldingham (thirteenth century) version; (d), that of the Cistercian manuscript of Prague (thirteenth century); and (e) is the Dixev restoration.
Nunc sancte nobis Spiritus,
U num Patri cum Filio, Dignare promptus ingeni,
Nostro refusus pectori.

The melody to the Ambrosian hymn "Hic est dies verus Dei" is of added interest because it is the one to which the Pentecostal hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus" has always been sung. As the Easter hymn is older by several centuries than the "Veni Creator Spiritus", the melody was adapted to the latter; (a) is the form it has in the Psalterium and the hymnary of the Bibliotheca Trivuliana; (b) gives us the Nevers adaptation of the melody to the "Veni Creator Spiritus"; (c) is Driess's restoration of the original form.

Am NZRAUUS Hymnography.—The names of St. Hilary of Poitiers (d. 367), who is mentioned by St. Isidore of Seville as the first to compose Latin hymns, and St. Ambrose, styled by Driess "the Father of Church-song", are linked together as those of pioneers of Western hymnody. The first actually to compose hymns was St. Hilary, who had spent some years of exile from his see, and had thus become acquainted with the Syrian and Greek hymns of the Eastern Church. His "Liber Hymnorum" has unfortunately perished. Daniel, in his "Thesaurus Hymnologicus", mistakenly attributed seven hymns to Hilary, two of which ("Lucis largior splendide" and "Beata nobis gaudia") were, down to the present day, considered by hymnologists generally to have had good reason for the ascription, until Blume (Analecta Hymnica, Leipzig, 1897, XXVII; 48-52; cf. also the review of Merrill's "Latin Hymns", The "Bentley McWilliams Review" (24th March, 1906) showed the error underlying the ascription of Daniel and of those who followed his mistake. The two hymns are mentioned here, since they have the metric and strophic cast peculiar to the authenticated hymns of St. Ambrose and to the wellnigh innumerable hymns which were afterwards composed on the model, and often with the inspiration, of those of the Saint. It may be truly said, then, that St. Ambrose, writing hymns in a style severely elegant, chaste, perspicuous, clothing Christian ideas in classical phraseology, and yet appealing to popular tastes, and succeeding in the appeal, had in fact found a new form and created a new school of Hymnody. Like St. Hilary, St. Ambrose was also a "Hammer of the Arians", for the combatting of whose errors it was his special distinction to have composed hymns. Answering their complaints on this head, he says: "Assuredly I do not deny it... All strive to confess their faith and know how to declare in verse the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost." And St. Augustine (Confessions, IX, vii, 15) speaks of the occasion when the hymns were introduced by Ambrose to be sung "according to the fashion of the East". St. Isidore of Seville (d. 636) testifies to the spread of the custom from Milan throughout the whole of the West, and refers his hymns as "Ambrosian" (P. L., LXXXIII, col. 743). In uncritical ages, hymns, whether metric or merely accented, following the material form of those of St. Ambrose, were generally ascribed to him and were called "Ambrosian". As now used, the term implies no attribution of authorship, but rather a poetical form or a liturgical use. On the other hand, the term will still doubtless be used without implying necessarily a negation of authorship, in the belief that some may be really the compositions of the Saint, despite the calculations of the most recent scholarship, which gives fourteen hymns certainly, three very probably, and one probably, to him.

The rule of St. Benedict employed the term; and Waldrifus Strabo (P. L., CXIV, coll. 954, 955) notes that, while St. Benedict styled the hymns to be used in the canonical hours Ambrosianos, the term is to be understood as referring to hymns composed either by St. Ambrose or by others who followed his form; and, remarking further that many hymns were wrongly supposed to be his, thinks it incredible that he should have composed "some of them, which have no logical coherence and exhibit an awkwardness alien to the style of Ambrose". Daniel gives no less than ninety-two Ambrosian, under the heading.
however, of "S. Ambrosius et Ambrosiani", implying a distinction which for the present he cared not to specify more minutely. The Maurists limited the number they would ascribe to St. Ambrose to twelve. Biraghi and Dreves raise the figure to eighteen. Rayser gives the four universally conceded to be authentic and two of the "Ambrosiani" which he "sufficiently authorizes for his Ambrosian indications: twenty without reservation, seven eight with a varied lot of brackets, question-marks, and simultaneous possessive adoptions to the hymn. We shall give here first of all the four hymns acknowledged universally as authentic: (1) "Æterne rerum Conditor"; (2) "Deus Creator omnium"; (3) "Jaa surgit hora tertia"; (4) "Venit Redemptor gentium". With respect to the first three, St. Augustine quotes from them and directly credits their authorship to St. Ambrose. He appears also to refer to No. 4 (the third verse in whose fourth strophe is: Genima Gigas substantia) when he says: "This going forth of our Giant [Gigantis] is briefly and beautifully hymned by Blessed Ambrose. . . . And Faustus, Bishop of Riez (A.D. 450), quotes the names of the Saints as above, as does also Cassiodorus (d. 575) in quoting the fourth strophe entire. Pope St. Celestine, in the council held at Rome in 430, also cites it as by St. Ambrose. Internal evidence for No. 1 is found in many verbal and phrasal correspondences between strophes 4-7 and the "Hexaëmeron" of the Saint (P.L. XIV, col. 253). Of these four hymns, No. 1 is now found in the Roman Breviary. It is sung at Lauds on Sunday from the Octave of the Epiphany to the first Sunday in Lent, and from the Octave nearest to the first day of October until Advent. There are sixteen translations into English, of which that by Cardinal Newman is given in the Marcus Aurelius, ed. Bishop Trench (I, 90). No. 2 has eight English renderings; No. 3, two; No. 4, twenty-four.

The additional eight hymns credited to the Saint by the Benedictine editors are: (5) "Illuminans altissimus"; (6) "Æterna Christi munera"; (7) "Splendor paternæ gloriae"; (8) "Orabo mente Dominum"; (9) "Somno refectis artibus"; (10) "Consors paterni luminis"; (11) "O lux beata Trinitatis"; (12) "Fit porta Christi pervia". The Roman Breviary pecrels No. 6 out into two hymns: for Martyrs (beginning with a strophe not belonging to the hymn (Christo profusum sanguinis and making a new strophe (Christus benignus). The translations of the original text and of the two hymns formed from it amount to twenty-one in number. No. 7 is assigned in the Roman Breviary to Monday at Lauds, from the Octave of the Epiphany to the first Sunday in Lent and from the Octave of Pentecost to Advent. It has twenty-five translations in English. Nos. 9, 10, 11 are also in the Roman Breviary. (No. 11, however, being altered into "Jam sol recedit ignes". It has thirty-three translations, in all, into English, comprising those of the original text and of the adaptation.) Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12 have verbal or phrasal correspondences with acknowledged hymns by the Saint. Their translations into English are: No. 9, fifteen; No. 10, nine; No. 11, thirty-three; No. 12, two. No. 5 has three English translations; No. 6, one; No. 7, twenty-five. No. 8 remains to be considered. The Maurists give it to the Saint with some hesitation, because of its present ruggedness, being because they knew it not to be a fragment (six verses) of a longer poem, and the (apparently) six-lined form of strophe puzzled them. Daniel pointed out (Thes., I, 23, 24; IV, 13) that it is a fragment of the longer hymn (in strophes of four lines), "Bis termes horas explicans", and credits it without hesitation to the Saint. In addition to the four authentic ones already noted, Biraghi gives Nos. 5, 6, 7, and the following: (8) "Nunc sancte nobis spiritus"; (9) "Rector potens, verax Deus"; (10) "Rerum Deus, tenax vigor"; (11) "Amore Christi nobilis"; (12) "Agnes beate virginis"; (13) "Hic est dies verus Dei"; (14) "Victor Nabor, Felix pars") (15) "Grate Christi Jesu nova"; (16) "Tuororum passio"; (17) "Apostolorum supparem"; (18) "Jesu corona virginum." This list receives the support of Dreves (1893) and of Blume (1901). The beautiful hymns Nos. 8, 9, 10 are those for Tene, Sext, None, respectively, in the Roman Breviary, and also assigns Nos. 15 to the office of Virgins. The Ambrosian strophe has four verses of iambic dimeters (eight syllables), e.g.

Noctem diemque qui regis,
Et temporum das tempora
Ut alleves fastidium.

The metre differs but slightly from the rhythm of prose, is easy to construct and to memorize, adapts itself very well to all kinds of subjects, offers sufficient metric variety in the odd feet (which may be either iambic or spondaic), while the form of the strophe lends itself to musical use, and has an English accentual counterpart of the metric and strophic form illustrates). This poetic form has always been the favourite for liturgical hymns, as the Roman Breviary will show at a glance. But in earlier times the form was almost exclusively used, going to and beyond the eleventh century. Out of 150 hymns in the eleventh-century Benedictine hymnals, for example, not a dozen are in other metres; and the Ambrosian Breviary re-edited by St. Charles Borromeo in 1582 has its hymns in that metre almost exclusively. It should be said, however, that even in the days of St. Ambrose the classical metres were slowly giving place to the work of the Saint occasionally shows; while in subsequent ages, down to the reform of the Breviary under Urban VIII, hymns were composed most largely by accented measure.

EMMONI, in Dict. d'arch. chrét., gives a good list of references. We may add to his list BLUME, Hymnologische Beiträge, II, Repertorium Repertorii (Leipzig, 1901), and especially a.v. Ambrosian Library, The, one of the famous libraries of the world, founded between 1692 and 1699 by Cardinal Federigo Borromeo at Milan. This library is unique from the fact that it was not intended by the Cardinal to be merely a collection of books and masterpieces of art, but was meant by him to include a college of writers, a seminary of savants, and a school of fine arts. It is situated in a building at that time the city hall, in the northern part of Milan, near the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The plans were drawn by the architect, Fabio Magone, and the sculptor, Dionigio Bussola. The buildings were ready in 1699, and became at once, on account of their ample dimensions and elegant decorations, an object of universal admiration. The following description, although of the present building, is an accurate one of the original, as no alterations have ever been permitted; even the floor of plain tiles, with four tables (one in each corner) and a central brazier, is left as the Cardinal arranged it.

A plain Ionic portico, on the cornice of which are the crests of all students of Ambrosiana, gives access to a single hall, on the ground floor, seventy-four feet long by twenty-nine feet broad. The walls are lined with bookcases about thirteen feet high, separated by columns, but by flat pilasters, and protected by wire work of an unusually large mesh, said to be original. true, allusions to various services of the Milanese Church in the writings of St. Augustine and St. Ambrose, and in the anonymous treatise "De Sacramentis", which used to be attributed to the latter, but is now definitely decided not to be his; but these allusions are naturally enough insufficient for more than vague conjecture, and have been used with usual justification to support the Gallican side of the controversy. Even if the rather improbable story of Landulf is not to be believed, the existing manuscripts, which only take us back to the earliest period of Charlemagne, leave the question of his influence open. This much we may confidently affirm, that though both the Missal and the Ordines have been subject to various modifications, often, as might be expected, in a Roman direction, the changes are singularly few and unimportant, and the Ambrosian Rite of to-day is substantially the same as that represented in the early MSS. Indeed, since some of these documents come from places in the Alpine valleys, such as Biasca, Lodrino, Venegono, and elsewhere, while the modern rite is that of the metropolitan cathedral and the churches of the city of Milan, some proportion of the differences may well turn out to be local rather than chronological developments.

The other theory, of which Ceriani and Magistretti are the most prominent representatives, is that the Ambrosian Rite has preserved the pre-Gelasian and pre-Gregorian form of the Roman Rite. Dr. Ceriani (Notitiae Liturgiae Ambrosianae) supports his contention by many references to early writers and by comparisons of antiphons and forms of the Roman Ordinary with the Ambrosian. Both sides admit, of course, the self-evident fact that the Canon in the present Ambrosian Mass is a variety of the Roman Canon. Neither has explained satisfactorily how and when it got there. The borrowings from the Greek service books have been ably discussed by Cagin (Philologie musicale, V), but there are Greek loans in the Roman books also, though, if Duchesne's theory of origin is correct, some of them may have travelled by way of the Milanese-Gallican Rite at the time of the Charlemagne revision. There are evident Gallicanisms in the Ambrosian Rite, but so there are in the present Roman, and the main outlines of the Missal by which MS. Neri provided us are sufficiently certain, though the dates are not. The presence of a very definite Post-Sanctus of undoubted Hispano-Gallican form in the Ambrosian Mass of Easter Eve requires more explanation than it has received, and the whole question of provenance is further complicated by a theory, into which Ceriani not only entered, but whose one feature the question of the origin of the liturgies, Gallican, Celtic, Mozarabic, and Ambrosian alike. There are indications in his liturgical note to the "Book of Cerne" and in "The Genius of the Roman Rite" that Mr. Edmund Bishop, who, as far as he has spoken at all, prefers the conclusions, though not so much the arguments, of Ceriani to either of those, may eventually have something to say which will put the subject on a more solid basis.

III. EARLY MSS.—The early MSS. of the Ambrosian Rite are generally found in the following forms: (1) The "Sacramentary" contains the Oraciones super Populum, Prophecies, Epistles, Gospels, Oraciones super Sindicum, and super Oblata, the Prefaces and Post-Communions throughout the year, with the variable forms of the Communicantes and Hanc igitur, when they occur, and the solitary Post Sanctus of Easter Eve, besides the remnants of the Ordinary. (2) The "Concertio of the Mass." There are often also occasional offices usually found in a modern ritual, such as Baptism, the Visitation and Unction of the Sick, the Burial of the Dead, and various benedictions. It is essentially a priest's book, like the Eugologion of the Greeks.
(2) The "Psalter" contains the Psalms and Canticles. It is sometimes included with the "Manual". (3) The "Manual" is nearly the complement of the "Sacramentary" and the "Psalter" as regards both the Mass and the Divine Office. It contains: For the Divine Office: the "Lauramenta", Antiphons, Responsoria, Psalmody, Offertorium, Confractoria, and a number of interchangeable parts, except the Lessons, which are found separately. For the Mass: the "Ingressa, Psalmelle, Versus, Cantus, Antiphona ante et post Evangelium, Offertoria, Confractoria, and Transitoria. The Manual often also contains occasional services such as ordinations, blessings, etc. (4) A "Psalter" is a "Manual" noted. (5) The "Ritual" and (6) "Pontifical" have contents similar to those of Roman books of the same name, though of course the early MSS. are less ample. The following are some of the most noted MSS. of the rite. (1) Sacramentaries and Missals: (a) The "Birsa Sacramentary"; Bibl. Ambros., A. 24, bia inf., late ninth or early tenth century. Described by Delisle, "Anc. Sacr.", LXXI, edited by Ceriani in his "Monumenta Sacra et Profana". VIII, the Ordinary is analyzed and the Canon given in full in Ceriani's "Notizia". (b) "Sacramentary" note by Bardi; Bibl. Ambr., A. 24, inf., eleventh century. Delisle, "Anc. Sacr.", LXXIV. (c) The "Sacramentary of San Satiro", Milan; treasury of Milan Cathedral; eleventh century. Delisle, "Anc. Sacr.", LXXIII. (d) Sacramentary; treasury of Milan Cathedral; eleventh century. Delisle, "Anc. Sacr.", LXXIV. (e) The "Sacramentary of Arsenio"; near the Lago Maggiore; treasury of Milan Cathedral; eleventh century. Delisle, "Anc. Sacr.", LXXV. (f) Sacramentary belonging to the Marchese Trott; eleventh century. Delisle, "Anc. Sacr.", LXXVI. (g) Sacramentary; Bibl. Ambros., CXX, sup., eleventh century. (h) The "Bergamo Sacramentary"; library of Sant' Alessandro in Colonna, Bergamo; tenth or eleventh century. Published by the Benedictines of Solesmes, "Auctarium Solesmoense" (to Migne's Patrologia), "Series Liturgica". I. (j) Sacramentary; treasury of Monza Cathedral; tenth century. Delisle, "Anc. Sacr.", LXV. (j) "Sacramentary of San Michele di Venego inferiori" (near Varèse); treasury of Monza Cathedral; eleventh century. Delisle, "Anc. Sacr.", LXVIII. These two of Monza Cathedral are more fully described in Frisi's "Memorie storiche di Monza", I, 75-77, 112, and Ambrosi's "Monumenta Ambrosiana", of Bodenr (new Luino); Bibl. Ambr., D., 87 inf.; twelfth century. Noted by Magistretti in "Della nuova edizione tipica del messale Ambrosiano".

IV. THE LITURGICAL YEAR.—The Liturgical Year of the Ambrosian Rite begins, as elsewhere in the West, with the First Sunday of Advent, but that Sunday, as in the Mozarabic Rite, is a fortnight earlier than in the Roman, so that there are six Sundays in Advent, and the key-day of the beginning of Advent is not December 25, as in the Roman, but St. Martin's Day (11 November), which is called the "Sanctorale." The rule of this key also differs. The Roman is: "Adventus Domini celebratur semper die Dominic, qui propinquior est festo S. Andreae Apostoli", which gives a range from 27 November to 3 December. The Ambrosian is: "Adventus Domini inchoatur Dominica proxima post Festum S. Martini", that is to say, from 12 November to 18 November. If, as in 1906, St. Martin's Day falls on a Sunday, the Octave is the first Sunday of Advent; whereas in the Roman Rite if St. Andrew's Day falls on a Sunday, that day itself is Advent Monday. The Feria of Advent which precedes the Feria de Exspectato begin. These days, which some say must have been originally de Exspectato, a quite unnecessary supposition, and on which the ordinary sequence of the Psalter is interrupted and certain proper psalms and antiphons are said, occur according to the following rule: "Officium in Adventu quintum quod de Exspectato celebratur in hac hebdt. VI Adv. nisi dies Nativitatis Domini inciderit in fer. III, vel IV; tunc de Exspectato fit in hebdt. V Adv." So that there must be two and there may be seven of these days. Christmas Eve is not exactly counted as one of them, though, if it falls on a weekday, it has the proper psalms and antiphons of that Feria de Exspectato." it falls on a Sunday, as in 1905, that is not one of the six Sundays of Advent, the last of which is the Sunday before the antiphon of the sixth Sunday is used. On the sixth Sunday of the Advent (Second Sunday of Advent) in the local church, Solemnitas Domini titularis propriis ecclesiastica, class, secondary: the Feast of the Sacred Heart. Second class: the Visitatio, Circumcision, Purification, Transfiguration, Invention of the Cross, Trinity Sunday. Second class, secondary: the Name of Jesus, the Holy Family, the Exaltation of the Cross. The SALEMNO Domini, in the local church, Pente cost and Corpus Domini also count as Solemnitates Domini. (2) Sundays. (3) Solemnia B. M. V. et Sanctorum. First class: the Immaculate Conception, Assumption, Nativity of St. John Baptist, St. Joseph, Sts. Peter and Paul, All Saints, the Ordination of St. Ambrose, and the Patron of the local church. Second class: other feasts of Our Lady, St. Michael and the Archangels, and the Guardian Angels, Decollation of St. John, Feasts of Apostles and Evangelists, St. Anne, St. Charles Borromeo, the Holy Innocents, St. Joachim, St. Laurence, St. Martin, Sts. Nazarius and Celsus, Sts. Protaus and Gervasius, St. Stephen, St. Thomas, Sts. Thomas and James, the two Chairs of St. Peter, the Conversion of St. Paul. (4) Solemnia Majora: St. Agatha, St. Agnes, St. Anthony, St. Apollinaris, St. Benedict, St. Dom inic, the Translations of Sts. Ambrose, Protaus, and Gervasius, St. Francis, St. Mary Magdalene, St. Valentine, St. Vincent. (5) Alia Solemnia are days noted as such in the Calendar, and the days of saints whose bodies or important relics are preserved in any particular church become Solemnia for that church. (6) Non-Solemnia Privilegiata. (7) Non-Solemnia Simplicia. Feasts are also grouped into four classes: first class of Solemnitates Domini and Solemnia; second class of the same; greater and ordinary Solemnia; non-Solemnia, divided into privilegiata and simplicita. Solemnia have two vespers, non-Solemnia only one, the first. The privilegiata have certain propri and the simplicita only the commixta. The general principle of occurrences is that common to the whole Western Church. If two festivals fall on the same day, the lesser is either transferred, merely commemorated, or omitted. But the Ambrosian Rite differs materially from the Roman in the rank given to Sunday, which is only superseded by a Solemnitas Domini, and none of the aforenamed names of Jesus or the Purification falls on Septuagesima, Sexagesima, or Quinquagesima Sunday, it is transferred, though the distribution and procession of candles takes place on the Sunday on which the Purification actually falls. If a Solemn Sanctorum or a privileged non-Solemn falls on a Sunday, a Solemnitas Domini, the Friday or Saturday of the fourth or fifth week of Advent, a Feria de Exequiel, within an Octave of a great Feast, a Feria Luanarum, or a Feria of Lent, the whole office is of the Sunday, Solemnitas Domini, etc., and the Solemnia or non-Solemnia privilegiata is transferred, in most cases to the second or next class of the same name and rank. If the first or second class to the next Feria quocumque jesto etiam solemnni impedita. A simple non-Solemnia is never transferred, but it is omitted altogether if a Solemn of the first class falls on the same day, and in other cases of occurrences it is commemorated, though of course it supersedes an ordinary Feria. If several ferias of the same class, or with the second of another are arranged on much the same principle, the chief peculiarity being that if a Solemn Sanctorum falls on a Monday its first Vespers is kept not on the Sunday, but on the preceding Saturday, except in Advent, when this rule is altered so that the Vespers of the first Sunday of the Advent are applied to the Sunday immediately following, and other Solemnia are only commemorated at Sunday Vespers. The liturgical colours of the Ambro.
man Rite are very similar to those of the Roman, the most important differences being that (except when some greater day occurs) red is used on the Sundays and Feria after Pentecost and the Decollation of St. John until the Eve of the Dedication (third Sunday in October), on Corpus Christi and its Octave, and during Holy Week, except on Good Friday, as well as on the days on which it is used in the Roman Rite, and that (with similar exceptions) green is only used from the Octave of the Epiphany to the end of Septuagesima. During Holy Week, the Vesperal "Four Verses" are from lxix, lxii, ci, cxii, cxii, and viii. During Lent also the Vesperal "Four Verses" are different for every day, except that there are none on Friday, and those on the first four Saturdays are from Ps. xci. In Holy Week the Psalms at the Nocturns and at Vespers are all proper, and on Saturdays during the period from the first Feria de Exsequiis until the Circumcision; and on the Annunciation (sixth Sunday of Advent), Epiphany, Christmas, Name of Jesus, Ascension, Corpus Christi, the Dedication and many Solemnia Sanctorum, and on many other saints' days the Decursus are superseded by Psalms of the Common of Saints.

V. THE DIVINE OFFICE. (1) The Distribution of the Psalm.—The Ambrosian distribution of the Psalter is partly fortnightly and partly weekly. Psalms i to cxvii are divided into ten decursus, one of which, in its numerical order, divided into three Nocturns, is recited at Matins on the Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays of each fortunii, each Nocturn being said under one antiphon. At the Matins of Sunday and Solemnitates Domini and on Feria in Easter and Whit Sunday weeks, and in the octave of Corpus Christi, there are no psalms, but three Old Testament canticles, Beatae Mariae Virginitatis, De noto vidit, and the Canticle of Anna (I K. ii., Confirmatam est; and the Canticle of Jonas (ii., Clamavi ad Dominum, or of Habacuc (ij., Domine audivi. And on Saturdays the Canticle of Moses (Exod. xv.), Cantemus Domino, and half of Psalm cxvii take the place of Decursus at the three Nocturns. At Vespers, Psalms cix to cxvii, except cxvii, cxviii, and cxxix, which are used elsewhere, and cxiii, which is only used in the Office of the Dead and as Psalms Directus at Lauds on Fridays, are divided between the whole seven days of each week in their numerical sequence, and in the same manner as in the Roman Rite. Psalm cxviii, besides being used on Saturdays, is distributed among the four lesser Hours exactly as in the Roman Rite; Psalm i is said at Lauds every day except Sunday, when the Benedicite, and Saturday, when Psalm cxvii, takes its place, and with the Preces (when these are used) at Prime and Terce throughout the year and at None during Lent, while at the Preces of Sext Psalm liii is said, and at those of None Psalm lxxv, except during Lent. Psalm liii precedes Beati immaculati at Prime, and Psalms iv, xxx, i–6, xcx and cxxx are said daily, as in the Roman Rite, at Compline. At Lauds a single Psalm, known as Psalm Directus, differing with the day of the week, is also said.

During Lent Ps. xc is said as Psalmus Directus at Vespers, except on Sundays, Fridays, and Saturdays, and the "Four Verses of a Psalm" at Lauds on Saturdays are alternately from the twelfth and first parts of Ps. cxvii, and on the six Sundays the "Four Verses" are from lxix, lxii, ci, lxii, lix, and viii. During Lent also the Vesperal "Four Verses" are different for every day, except that there are none on Friday, and those on the first four Saturdays are from Ps. xci. In Holy Week the Psalms at the Nocturns and at Vespers are all proper, and on Saturdays during the period from the first Feria de Exsequiis until the Circumcision; and on the Annunciation (sixth Sunday of Advent), Epiphany, Christmas, Name of Jesus, Ascension, Corpus Christi, the Dedication and many Solemnia Sanctorum, and on many other saints' days the Decursus are superseded by Psalms of the Common of Saints.

(2) Other Details of the Divine Office.—Antiphons, in similar construction to those in the Roman Rite are: in Psalmia et canticis, as used in the Roman Rite; in Choro, said after the Lucernarium on Sundays, at the second Vesper of Solemnitas; or on other saints' days, at first Vespers, but not on Saturdays. During Advent and on Solemnia Domini, on Sundays, except in Lent, and on Solemnitas. Responsoria are constructed as in the Roman Rite, and are: Post hymnum, said after the hymn at Matins; Inter lectiones at Matins; cum Inprehensu or cum Piae; after the hymn in the first Vespers of Solemnitas; in Choro, said at Vespers. On Sundays, at the second Vesper of Solemnitas, and at the first of Non-Solemnitas, after the hymn; in Bapstisterio, at Lauds and Vespers of some Solemnitates after the first Psalms Directus, on Feria after the twelve Kyries, at Vespers after the prayer which follows Magnificat; Doxologia or Quadragesimale, on Wednesday in Lent and on Good Friday; at Cornu Altar, at Lauds before the Psalms Directus on Christmas Day, the Epiphany, and Easter Eve; Gradualia, said after the hymn at Lauds on Feria in Lent. Lucturnaria are Responsoria which begin Vespers. Psallenda are single verses, often from the Psalms, said after the twelve Kyries and the second prayer at Lauds, and after the prayers at Vespers. They are variable according to the day, and are followed by either one or two fixed Complenda or Completaria, which are also single verses. Psalms cxvii and cxviii are said at Lauds and Vespers at certain times at Vespers. They are sung together by both chanters, antiphonally. Psalm Quatuor Versus is the name given to four verses of a psalm said at Vespers and Lauds on weekdays, after one of the Collects. Among the Hymns, besides those by St. Ambrose, or commonly attributed to him, many are included by other authors, such as Prudentius, Venantius Fortunatus, St. Gregory, St. Thomas Aquinas, and many whose authorship is unknown. A considerable number of well-known hymns (e.g. "Ave Maris Stella", "A Solis Oruts Cardine", "Jesu Redemptor Omnium", "Iste Confessor") are not in the Ambrosian Breviary, but are many there which are in the Roman, and those that are common to both generally appear as they were before the revisions of Urban VIII, though some have variants of their own. Capitula are short lessons of Scripture used as in the Roman Rite. At the Lesser Hours and Compline Capitula taken from the Epistles are called Epistolae.

(3) Construction of the Offices: (The constantly occurring Dominus vobiscum, etc., has been omitted in this analysis.) MATINAE: Poter noster; Are Maria; Deus in adiutorium; Gloria Patri; Hallelujah or Laus tibi. (The Ambrosians transliterate Hallelujah from Hebrew, not from Greek. They also write chanted not cestum and Annuntiatum not sacristum.) Hymn: Responsoria: canticle, Benedictus ex Deo; Kyrie eleison thrice Psalms or Canticles of the three Nocturns; Lessons, with Responsoria and Benedictions—usually three Lessons, Sundays, homilies; weekdays from the Bible; saints' days, Bible and life of saint. On Christmas Day and Epiphany nine lessons; on Good Friday, six; on Easter Eve, none. On Sundays and festivals, except in Lent and Advent.

Te Deum follows.—Lauda: Introduction as at Mass; canticle, Benedictus, Attendite cælum or Clamavi; Kyrie, thrice; Antiphona ad Crucem, repeated five or seven times, not said on Feria; Oratio secretæ ii; canticle, Cantemus Domino (Ex. xv); Kyrie, thrice; Oratio secretæ ii; canticle, Benedictice, Confitemini Dominum (Ps. cvii), or Misereor (Ps. i); Kyrie, thrice; conclusion. Alleluia (Ps. cx. the feast day).

Capitulum; Kyrie, thrice. Psalms Directus; hymn (on weekdays in Lent, Graduale); Kyrie, twelve times. On Sundays and festivals, Psallenda and Completorium; on Feriae, Responsorium in Baptisterio; Kyrie, thrice; Oratio ii; on Sundays and Solemnities Domini, Psallenda ii and Completorium ii; on weekdays Psalms iv, versus and Completorium; Kyrie, thrice; Oratio iii; commemorations, if any; concluding versicles and responses.—The Lesser Hours (Prime, Terce, Sext, None): Introduction as at Matins. Hymn; psalms; Epistolella; Responsorium Breve (at Prime, Quam olim, vult); Capitulum; Preces (when said); At Prime, three Orates to the other Hours. Kyrie, thrice; Benedictus Domini, etc. (at Prime in choir the Martyrology, followed by Exsultabunt Sancti etc., and a prayer); Fidelium animæ etc. Vesperæ: Introduction as at Matins. On Sundays and Feriae: Lucernarium; (on Sundays, Antiphona in choro); hymn; Responsorium in choro; five psalms; Kyrie, thrice; Oratio i; Magnificat; Oratio ii; on Sundays, Psallenda i, and two Completorium; on Feria, Responsorium in Baptisterio; Kyrie, thrice; Oratio iii; on Sundays, Psallenda ii, and two Completorium; on Feria, Psalms iv versus; Kyrie, thrice; Oratio iv; commemorations; days' Lasts: Lucernarium; at second vespers Antiphona in choro; hymn; Responsorium in choro or cum infantibus; psalm; Kyrie, thrice; Oratio i; Psalm; Oratio ii; Magnificat; Kyrie, thrice; Oratio iii; Psallenda and two Completoria; Kyrie, thrice; Oratio iv; commemorations. Concluding versicles and responses.—Compline: Introducitio, with addition of Conserte nos, etc.; hymn (Te lucis); Psalms iv, xxx, 1–7, xc, cxxxi, cxxxi, cvi; Epistolella; Responsorium; Nunc Dimitis; Capitulum; Kyrie, thrice; Preces (when said); Oratio i, Oratio ii; concluding versicles and responses; Antiphon of Our Lady; Confiteor. There are antiphons to be repeated except those of Compline, and on feast days and canticles. During Lent, except on Saturdays and Sundays, there are two lessons (from Genesis and Proverbs) after Terce; and on Wednesdays and Fridays of Lent and on Feriae de Excepto litany are said then.

VI. THE MASS.—The Ambrosian Mass in its present form is best shown by an analysis pointing out the differences from the Roman. As a great part of it agrees word for word with the Roman, it will only be necessary to indicate the agreements, without giving the passages in full. There are a certain number of ceremonial differences, the most noticeable of which are: (1) When the choir is not occupied, they take up positions at the north and south ends of the altar facing each other. (2) The Prophecy, Epistle, and Gospel are said, in Milan Cathedral, from the great ambon on the north side of the choir, and the procession thereto is accompanied by the offering of bread and wine by the men and women of the Scuola di S. Ambrogio. (4) The filing past and kissing the north corner of the altar at the Offertory. (5) The silent Lavabo just before the Consecration. (6) The absence of bell-ringing at the Elevation. In the rubrics of the Missal there are certain survivals of ancient usage which could only have applied to the city of Milan itself, and may be compared with the "stations" affixed to certain Masses in the Roman Missal of to-day. The Ambrosian Rite supposes the existence of two cathedrals, the Basilica Major or Ecclesia Bisaea, and the Basilica Minor or Ecclesia Martia. In the Roman Missal (St. Mary's) the winter church, and St. Thecla the summer church (Cabrol, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne, col. 1382 sqq.), but Ecclesia Hiemalis and Ecclesia Major in the "Bergamo Missal", and Ecclesia Hiemalis and Ad Sanctam Mearum, in all missals, are evidently contrasted with one another. The summer church of Ambrose, the church of the basilica Martia, is identified with the church of St. Raffaele (quoted by Giulini, I, 416) speaks of the latter being near the summer church, which it is, if the summer church is St. Mary's. There is also assumed to be a detached baptistery and a Chapel of the Cross, though mentions of these are found chiefly in the Breviary, and in earlier times the church of St. Laurence was the starting point of the Palm Sunday ceremonies. The greater, or summer, church, under the patronage of Our Lady, is now the Cathedral; the lesser, or winter, church, which stood at the opposite end of the Piazza del Duomo, and was destroyed in 1548, was under the patronage of St. Thecla. As at Rome, the vestry of the Breviary, (twelfth century) the changes from one to the other were made at Easter and at the Dedication of the Great Church (third Sunday in October), and even now the rubric continues to order two Masses on certain great days, one in each church, and on Easter Eve and through Easter week one Mass is ordered daily pro baptizatis in Ecclesia Hiemalis, and another, according to the Bergamo book, in Ecclesia Majoris. The modern books say, in Omnis ecclesia. There were two baptisteries, both near the greater church.

ANALYSIS OF THE AMBROSIAN MASS.
The Conformatore.

V. In nomine Patris, etc. R. Amen. V. Introibo ad Altare Dei. R. Ad Deum qui tecum. V. Confitemini Domino quoniam bonus.

R. Quoniam in seculum misericordias ejus. Conformatore, etc., Misereatur, etc., Indulgentiam etc., as in the Roman Rite, differing only in adding the name of St. Ambrose to the Conformatore.

V. Adjutorem nostrum etc. R. Qui fecit etc. V. Sit nomen Domini benedictum.

R. Ex hoc nunc et usque in seculum. (Secreto).

Rogo te, altissime Deus Sabaoth, Pater sancte, ut prorsus de cunctis malis sempiternis intercederes et astatibus veniam pecatorum promoveris ac pacificas singularum hostias immolare.

Oramus te, Domine etc., as in the Roman Rite. The "Igressa", which answers to the Roman Intronit.

Except in the Mass for the Departed, when given in the 1475 Missal, it is exactly the Roman Intronit, it consists of a single passage, generally of Scripture, without Psalm, "Gloria Patri", or repetition.

V. Dominus vobiscum etc.

Gloria in Excelsis.—On the Sundays in Lent two litanies are said alternately instead. These litanies strongly resemble and sublate the litany of the Greek Rite and, like that, are said by the deacon. One has the response "Domine Misereare", and the other "Kyrie eleison". A very similar litany in the Stowe Missal (f 16, b) is called "Deprecatio Sancti Martini pro populo".

Kyrie eleison (thrice).

V. Dominus vobiscum etc.

Oratio super Populum, "vel plurès Orationes". The Collect or Collects for the day.

V. Dominus vobiscum etc.

The Prophetical Lesson, when there is one, which is generally on Sundays, "Solemnitates Domini" and
"Solemnia," preceded by a benediction; "Prophetica (or Apostolica) Lectio sit nobis salutis eruditio." According to the letters of Paul and Ghebretch of Rite (or Missal) the first form of the Mass of the Roman Catholic Church until the delivery of the thurible to the deacon, who then reads "Ascendat nobis in obelis," the priest says: "Ecce odor Sancti ut if vid ei; tanguum odor agri pleni, quem Deus benedixit." Then follows the "Offertorium." In the cathedral of Milan there is an interesting ceremony at the Offertory, probably a survival of the early practice of offerings "in kind" by the congregation. Ten old men (known as the "Pescanti") and ten old women who are supported by the Chapter, wear a special costume and belong to what is called the "Scuola di S. Ambrogio," bring offerings of bread and wine to the choir steps and deliver them to the clergy. There is a detailed account of this ceremony in Beroldus (Ed. Magister., 1804, 52). The institution is mentioned in a charter of Bishop Ansemp in the ninth century. Wickham Legg (Ecclesiological Essays, 53) says that these offerings are not now used at the Mass but then being said, but at some later one. He gives photographs of the old men and women and a full description of the ceremony.

The Creed, preceded by "Dominus vobiscum" or "It is here entitled "Symbolum Constantinopolitum," and differs not at all from that in the Roman Mass.

V. Dominus vobiscum, etc.

Oratio super oblata.

The Preface. The "Surgam corda," etc., is exactly as in the Roman Rite, though the plain chant is altogether different. The Preface itself has the word "quia" after "vero," but otherwise begins as in the Roman Rite, as far as "Æterne Deus." After that comes a marked difference, for instead of only ten variations, there are proper Prefaces for all days that have proper offices, as well as uncommon of all classes, and in the final clauses, which vary, as in the Roman, according to the ending of the inserted Proper, there are verbal differences.

The Sanctus, exactly as in the Roman Rite.

The Canon. "Te igiur," exactly as in the Roman Canon. In the printed Missals, even before the Borromean revision, there is a variation which comes after "hec sancta sacrificia illibata," in the Mass of Easter Eve. In the Bergamo Missal it follows immediately after the "Sanctus," without the "Te igiur." clause. It is: "Vere Sanctus, vere benedictus D. N. J. C. Filius tuus qui cum Dominus esset Magistatis, descendens de caelo formam servi, qui prius perierat, suscitat, et sponte pati dignum est; ut eum quem ipse fecerat de morte liberaret. Unde et hoc paschali sacrificium tibi offerimus pro his quos ex aqua et Spiritu Sancto regenerare dignatus es dans eius re cognitionem omnium deorum. ut acceperis in Christo Jesu Dominum nostrum. Pro quibus tibi, Domino supplies fundum preceus ut innumerae eorum pariterque famuli tui Papae nostri N. et Pontificis nostri N. scripta habeas in Libro Viventium. Per eundem, etc." This is in the form of a Post Sanctus of the Mozarabic Rite, though it does not agree exactly with any particular Post Sanctus.

"Memento Domine" is the same as in the Roman. "Communicantes" and "Haec igiur," are variable on certain days, as in the Roman Rite, but the list of saints differs, Linus and Cletus being omitted and Hippolytus, Vincent, Apollinaris, Vitalis, Nazarius and Celsus, Protaagnus, Felice, and Calimerius being added. In the earlier editions there were the following additional names:
Maternus, Eustogius, Dionysius, Ambrose, Simplitian, Martin, Eusebius, Hilary, Julius, and Benedict.
Quam oblationem quam pietas tuae offerimus tu Deus in uniusque sæculi, etc.; the rest as in the Roman Canon. At this point the Priest washes his hand, "nihil dicens".

The next clauses, reciting the Institution, differ verbally.

"Qui pridie quam pro nostra omniumque salute patecit in mediis, etc." Mandatum (Thursday Mass of the Roman Rite) accipiens Panem, elevavit oculos ad
celos ad Deum Patrem suum omnipotentem, tibi gratias agens benedixit, fregit, dedicavit Discipulis suis, dicens ad eos: Accipite et manducate ex hoc omne; Hoc est enim Corpus meum. Simili modo, postquam censatum est, accipiens Calicem, elevavit oculars ad celos, ad Deum Patrem suum omnipottem: item tibi gratias agens, benedixit, tradit-quit Discipulis suis, dicens ad eos: Accipite et bibite ex eo omne: Hic est enim Calix, &c. (as in the Roman Canon). Mandans quoque et dicens ad eos:
Hae quotiescumque feceritis in meam commemorationem facietis: Mortem meum predicabitis, Resurrectionem meam annuntiabitis, Adventum meum separabitis donec iterum de celis veniam ad vos."

It may be noted that this long ending, commemorating the Death, Resurrection and Second Coming, is neerarily identical with that in the "Canon Dominicus Solemnis" in the Congregational and has resemblance to the forms in several of the West Syriac (Jacobite) anaphores. "Unde et memores" differs only in reading "gloriosissimae" instead of "gloriosae Ascensionis".

"Supra quae propitio" inserts "tuo" after "vultu"
and reads "justi petri tuæ Abel".

"Supplices te rogamus" reads "tremenda" instead of
"divinae Majestatis".

"Memento etiam Domine" exactly agrees with the Roman Rite.

"Nobis quoque, minima, et peccatoribus famulis tuis de multisuidine misericordie tuis", continuing as in the Roman Rite, except for the list of saints, which adds a second Joannes, substitutes Andreas
for Matthias, omits Ignatius and Alexander, and adds Euphemia, Justina, Sabina, Thecla, Pelagia, and Catharine (the MSS. and 1475 lists omit Catharine), varying the order a little. The ending also differs in that "nobis famulis tuis" larger prestas ad augmentum fidei et remissione peccatorum trorum: Et est tibi Deo Patri omnipotenti ex +ipsæ et +ipsæ et +ipsæ omnis honor virtus laus et gloria, impe +rium, perpe +tuitas et po +testas in unitate spiritus sancti per infinita sæcula seculorum.
Amen."

The Fraction and Commixture occur at this point, instead of after the "Pater Noster" as in the Roman Rite since St. Gregory the Great.
The priest breaks the Host over the chalice, saying:
"Corpus tuum frangitur, Christe, Calix benedictur."
then laying one part on the paten, he breaks a particle from the other, saying: "Sanguis tuus sit nobis secundum et salvdandas animas, Deus noster." Then he puts the particle into the chalice, saying: "Commixto consecratæ Corporis et Sanguinis D. N. J. C. obis edentibus et sumentibus proficiat ad vitam et gaudium sempiternum." Then follows the "Confractorium", an anthem varying according to the

The Pater Noster, introduced by the same clause
as in the Roman Rite, except on Maundy Thursday and Easter Day, when different forms are used. The Emboulism differs somewhat: "Libera nos... et tercedentem pro nobis Beata Maria Genitrice Dei
ac Domini nostri Jesu Christi et Sancta Apostolitis tuis..." Pauco ante Andrea e Beato Ambrosio Confessore tuo atque Pontifici tuo in omnibus
Sanctis tua... ob ab omnibus perturbatione securi.
Presta eum, cum quo beatus vivis et regnas
Deus in unitate Spiritus Sancti per omnia secularum. Amen."

The "Pax". The priest says: "Pax et communicâ
D. N. J. C. et semper vobiscum. R. Et cum spiritu tuo." The deacon: "Offerte vobis pacem, R. Deo gratias!" The Prayer, "Domine Jesu Christe qui dixisti, etc.," which differs from the Roman in reading "faciatis, custode et regere digneris pro-ptius," Then the "Pax" is given: V. Pax tecum.
R. Et cum spiritu tuo," as in the Roman Rite. In Masses for the Dead the "Offerte vobis pacem", the prayer, and the giving of the "Pax" are omitted, and the "Agnus Dei", differing from the Roman form "pro defunctis" only in adding "et longum dulgentieum cum Sanctia tua in gloria", at the end, is said. The "Agnus Dei" does not occur in other Masses.

The Communion. The preliminary prayers are:
"Domine Sanete Pater omnipotens, eternus Deus da
mihi hoc Corpus Jesu Christi Filii tui Domini mei ita suamure: ut non sit mihi ad judicium sed ad re-missionem omnium peccatorum meorum. Qui tecum vivit, etc.," and "Domine Jesu Christe Fili Dei vivi", which only differs from the Roman in reading
"obedire" for "inherere," Then follows "Domine on sum dignus", as in the Roman Rite, after which comes "Quid retribuam Domino pro omnibus quae retribuisti mihi? Panem celestium accipiam et nomen Dei invocabam Domine D. N. J. C. custodiam animam meam ad vitam aeternam. Quid retribuam, etc., exactly as in the Roman Rite. Then, at receiving the Chalice, "Presta, queso, Domine, ut perceptio Corporis et Sanguinis D. N. J. C. ad vitam nos percutat aeternam", after which "Quod ore sumpe umus, Domine, pura mente capiamus ut de Corpore et Sanguine D. N. J. C. fiat nobis remedium sempiternum." At the Ablution: "Con-ferma hoc, Deus, quod operatus es in nobis et dona Ecclesie tua perpetuum tranquillitatem et pacem."

The "Transitorium" (the Ambrosian equivalent of the Roman "Communion") and the "Oratio Post Communionem" follow.

V. Dominus vobiscum, etc.
Kyrie eleison (trice).
V. Benedictat et exaudiat nos Deus. R. Amen.
V. Procedamus cum pace. R. In nomine Christi.
V. Benedictus domino. R. Deo Gratias.
Then follow: "Pax tibi" (slightly varied), the Blessing and the Last Gospel as in the Roman Rite.
The present form from the "Pax" onward dated from the revision of St. Charles Borromeo, and appears for the first time in print in 1594. In 1475, 1560, etc., the form was as follows:

V. Pax et communicatio D. N. J. C. sit semper
vobiscum.
R. Et cum spiritu tuo.
V. Offerte nobis pacem. R. Deo Gratias.
Pax in ceelo, pax in terra, pax in omni populo pax
sacerdotibus ecclesiarum Dei. Pax Christi et Ecclesiae
maneat semper vobiscum.

Then the Penitential "Pax" to the server, saying "Habete vineum pacis et caritatis ut apti sitis sacrae sanctis mysteriis Dei. R. Amen. Domine Sancte Pater, etc."; as at present. The second prayer, "Domine Jesu Christe, etc., was not used.
(In the early MSS. the giving of the "Pax" ends with "Offerte nobis pacem, etc.")

R. Deo Gratias.
V. Pax et communicatio D. N. J. C. sit semper
vobiscum.
R. Et cum spiritu tuo.
V. Offerte nobis pacem. R. Deo Gratias.
Pax in ceelo, pax in terra, pax in omni populo pax
sacerdotibus ecclesiarum Dei. Pax Christi et Ecclesiae
maneat semper vobiscum.

Corpus D. N. J. C. profiteat mihi sumenti et omnibus pro quibis illud obtuli ad vitam et gaudium
The Chur Missal of 1599.)

Presta, queso, Domine, ut perceptio corporis et Sanguinis D. N. J. C. quem pro nobis dignatus est sugere ab omni nos peccati macula purget et ad vitam percutat aeternam. Per eundem, etc.
Quid estraibum, etc. Calicem salutaris, etc. Domine non sum dignus, etc. Corpus et Sanguis D. N. J. C. propitius sit mihi sumenti et omnibus pro quibus illud obtuli ad vitam et gaudium sempiternam. Per eundem, etc. Deo gratias. Deo Gratias.

Accepta Christi munera sumamus Dei gratia, non a quo sequemur ad salvandum animas, Deus noster. Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis. Gloria Patri, etc. Sicut erat, etc. Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, suscipe depreciationm nostram. Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, dona nobis pacem.

Quid ore sumpimus, etc., as at present. Confrata hoc, Deus, etc., as at present. Placeat tibi, etc.

The eleventh-century MS. (No. 1–d in list above), quoted in the Solemes edition of the Bergamo book, does not contain any more at the "Pax" and "Communion" than "Pax" and "Communication, etc." "Offerte vobis pacem." "Oratio post communionem." "Dominus vobiscum, etc." "Quod ore sumpe

VII. THE OCCASIONAL SERVICES.—Of the services in the Ritual and Pontifical there is not much to say. The ceremonies of Baptism differ in their order from those in the Roman Rite. The Ambrosian order is: renunciation; epiphatha; sufflation; unction; exorcism and second sufflation; signing with the Cross; delivery of the salt; introduction into the church; Creed and Lord's Prayer; declaration of faith; Baptism, for which the rubric is: Ter occiput mergit in aqua in cruciis formam (and, as Legge points out, the Ambrosians boast that their baptism is always by immersion); litany; anointing with chrism; delivery of white robe and candle; dismissal. A great part of the wording is exactly the same as the Roman. The order of the Unction of the Sick shows the progress which the Romain has made in more than a thousand years. The service at present used differs very little except at one point from that given by Magistratti (Mon. Vet., II, 79, 94, 147) from early MSS., and from the form in the undated printed Ritual of the late fifteenth century, but the difference at that point is no less than the introduction of the Roman manner and language. In the old Ambrosian Rite, to anoint the sick person on the breast, the hands, and the feet, with the words: "Ungere oleo sanctificato, more militis et preparatus ad luctam aeris posseis cetravas. Operare creatura olei, in nomine + Dei Patris omnipotentis + et Filii + et Spiritus Sancti + et omnis sanctae Trinitatis spiritus immutus et semem in membris nec in medullis nec in utrae compaginorum hujus hominis [vel multieris] sed operetur in eo virtus Christi Filii Altissimi qui cum aeterno Patri... Amen." Then, "Quidquid peccasti per cogitationem cordis [per operationem manuum vel per intentionem pedum] peacet Deus, Amen." The fifteenth-century printed Ritual of the late fifteenth century, and in the Venetian printed pre-Tridentine Rituals, a form very like the last (but reading Ungere) with the same anointings as in the Roman Rite, is given as the Rite of the Patriarchate of Venice in the form, or something very like it, with the seven anointings is found in the Asti Ritual described by Gastoué. In the modern Ambrosian Ritual the Roman seven anointings and the form, Per istam unctionem, etc., are taken over bodily and the Ungere has disappeared. The differences in the Order of Matrimony are very slight, and the other contents of the Ritual call for no special remark. In the ninth-century Pontifical published by Magistratti the consecration of a church includes the solemn entry, the writing of the ABCDium, with the lambada (that Gaelic word, am bata, crooked staff, which is commonly used in Gallican books), the blessing and mixture of the Ungere eius from the Ungere eius and the anointing of the church and the altar, the blessing of various utensils, and at the end the deposition of the relics. The order given by Mercati from an eleventh-century MS. at Lucca differs from the ninth-century form in that there is a circumambulation and sprinkling, with the sign of the Cross on the door, the writing of an alphabet per pateriem and the making of three crosses on each wall with chrism, before the entry, and there is no deposition of relics. There are also considerable differences of wording. The ordinations in the ninth-century MS. of the same mixed Roman and Gallican type, but are less developed than those of the modern Roman Pontifical.

AMBROSIAN.—St. Ambrose cannot be counted among the founders of religious orders, although, like all great Doctors, he was deeply interested in the monastic life, and closely watched its beginnings in his diocese. He himself made provision for the wants of the monks who lived in a monastery outside the walls of the episcopal city under the guidance of one of his priests, as St. Augustine tells us in his "Confessions". Not all these facts, however, were known by St. Gregory the Great; Sarmatian and Barbarian, indeed, who belonged to their community, gave him great anxiety by their evil conduct and their errors. Virginity, moreover, was but little honored among the women of Milan at the time that St. Ambrose was called... to rule the Church there, but his exhortations so overcame this indifference that the Milanese virgin, now grown to be numerous and fervent, formed the favourite portion of his flock, and widows strove to equal the asceticism and mortification filled with the praises of God, with meditation on the Holy Scriptures and the exercise of various works of Christian charity. It was to one of such associations of virgins who took the instructions of the holy Bishop as their rule of life that St. Marcellina, the sister of St. Ambrose, belonged. These teachings have been summed up in certain treatises of his which have come down to us, namely, in his three books "De virginitate", his one book "De viduis", and those "De virginitate", "De institutione virginis", "De exhortatione virginitatis", and "De laus virginis consecratae" (P. L., XVI., 187-289). St. Ambrose is, in fact, the Father who has done most to promote virginity. His writings, and the example of what was taking place at Milan, did much to foster vocations to virginity and the formation of those communities which were later to grow into monasteries of women. The whole movement, indeed, is one of the most remarkable in the Christian Church in the second half of the fourth century. These holy women, while waiting to have rules for the religious life specially written for them, contented themselves with the Bible, with certain treatises of the Fathers concerning their state, and certain traditions concerning the practical ordering of their lives. Some of these rules unquestionably dated back to the holy Doctors who had presided over the formation of the earliest communities, so that it becomes easy to understand the influence which St. Ambrose exercised over the beginnings of the religious life among women.

The Order of St. Ambrose was the name of two religious congregations, one of men and one of women, founded in the neighbourhood of Milan during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, under the patronage and invocation of St. Ambrose. (a) The cradle of the first was a wood near Milan, where a hermit, Ambrogio Magio, lived, and who died in 1339. From his door the Order of the Blessed Virgin, called also the "Sisters of St. Ambrose," took its name. Its convents were founded in secular houses or monasteries, and in the sixteenth century the order was divided into two branches: one of them, the Poor Clares of St. Ambrose, was named in 1375, and that in Milan, the other in the diocese of Como. Both branches were governed by a general chapter every three years, by the general chapter of the congregation. These nunneries were, therefore, enclosed, and the subprior of the congregation, Mother Joanna of Parma, who entered the Order in 1470, did more than anyone else towards giving it a definite organization. The nuns lived in cloister, under the jurisdiction of the bishops. One of their number was St. Catherine Fieschi Adorno, who died 14 September, 1510.

The Oblates of St. Ambrose and of St. Charles.—St. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, early realized the assistance which the various religious orders would be to him in the reform of his diocese in compliance with the injunction of the Council of Trent. He ordered to accept the rule of the Second Order of St. Benedict, and that of the Somaschi, and Theatines was, therefore, enlisted by him, and he entrusted the management of his seminary to the Jesuits, who were great favourites of his, though he found himself subsequently obliged to take it from them. These various auxiliaries, however, great as was their devotion, were not sufficiently at his disposal to supply all the needs connected with the government of his vast diocese. Accordingly, the Archbishop, in order to fill this gap, decided to found a diocesan religious society whose members, all priests, or destined to become priests, would take a simple vow of obedience to their bishop. Such a society in fact was organized at Brescia, under the name of "Priests of Peace", St. Charles endeavoured, without success, to win over the canons of his cathedral to his idea, but had more success with the "Priests of the Holy Crown", who served the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre and lived in community. His exhortations to his clergy during the Inquisition meetings led certain members of the clergy to fall in with his views, and he was able to install them in the church of the Holy Sepulchre and the adjoining buildings, 16 August, 1578, giving them the name of "Oblates of St. Ambrose". Their community was endowed with the revenues of certain diocesan benefices, and with a portion of the property of the Church of St. Paul in Rome. The latter formed the nucleus of the Congregation of the Humiliati, which had just been dissolved by the Holy See. The rules by which the new congregation were to be governed were submitted by their author to St. Philip Neri and to St. Felix of Cantalice, the latter of whom persuaded him not to impose the vow of poverty, and, in their definite form, received the approbation of Gregory XIII. It was to be the duty of the Oblates to assist the archbishop in the government and administration of the diocese, to fill all such offices as he should entrust to them, to go on missions to the most abandoned places, to serve vacant parishes, to accompany the archbishop and his Colleges in retreating, and, in a word, to devote themselves to the whole work of the ministry in compliance with the orders and wishes of the bishop. They were divided into two bodies, one remaining attached to the church of the Holy Sepulchre, the other going with the archbishop to the chancery or other offices. The latter formed six groups, or associations, under the direction of a responsible superior. The first, taking for their model the method followed at Rome by St. Philip and his priests of the Oratory, made their basilica a veritable centre of pious and charitable works, the effect of which was felt throughout the city.

Their work was directed by St. Charles himself, who was glad to stay among them, sharing their manner of life, and taking part in their exercises and in their tasks, nor is it memory so kept in honour anywhere as in this house. He was wont to say that of all the institutions which he had created, that of the Oblates was the one he held most dear, and on which he set the greatest value. The Oblates of the Holy Sepulchre, moreover, established, for their own assistance, a confraternity of lay Oblates, composed of magistrates and prominent men, who bound themselves to visit the sick and the poor, to keep the faith, and to defend the Faith. The "Company of the Ladies of the Oratory," also founded by them, aimed at fostering the practice of a serious Christian life among women of the world. They further undertook the management of the diocesan seminary, and of the colleges established by their holy founder; they preached the Gospel in the country districts, and even journeyed into the mountains in search of heretics. St. Charles was preparing to establish them in the famous sanctuary of Our Lady of Rho, the very year of his death (1554). The first Oblates belonged to the lost of the Milanese clergy, among whom was his intimate friend, the poet, the Church of St. Augustine. Under Mary of the last century, the Oblates devoted themselves to various apostolic labours in London, and in other missions in the two dioceses of Westminster and Southwark. They have founded in London elementary schools, a higher school for boys, and the College of St. Charles, which is now a University college. The Cardinal had a house in Rome since 1861; in 1867 Pius IX appointed the superior, Father O'Callaghan, rector of the English College, thus giving the Oblates the means of exercising a greater influence on the clergy. The Archconfraternity of the Holy Ghost, Manning's favourite devotion, with its centre at St. Mary of the Angels, has grown largely under their direction. Manning governed the Bayswater community from 1857 to after having governed the Church of Milan; another, Ramazzotti, was Patriarch of Venice (1861). Several Oblates, moreover, have become known by their theological and historical writings. The following may be mentioned: Giovanni Stucchi (d. 1600), author of a treatise on the privileges of the Church's ministers, and of the Pope in particular; Martino Bonacina (d. 1631), one of the foremost moralists of his age, whose theological works have been several times republished, and who died suddenly on his way to fill the position of Nuncio at Constantinople; and, as the best biographers of St. Charles; Sormano and, especially, his contemporary, Sassi (Saxius, d. 1751), who succeeded Muratori as librarian. It is to him that we owe the edition, in five volumes, of the homilies of St. Charles, a history of the archbishops of Milan, and a treatise on the journey of St. Barnabas to that city.

The Oblates outside of Italy.—The example of St. Charles was followed, in the nineteenth century, by Mgr. Pie, Bishop of Poitiers, and by Mgr. Martin, Bishop of Paderborn. The former founded a society of priests on the lines of the Milanese Oblates; and, with a certain shrillness, he called them "Oblates of St. Hilary," the patron saint of his diocese (1850). The latter called his new society the "Congregation of the Priests of Mary." The most famous society of Oblates, however, outside of Italy, is that of St. Charles, established in the diocese of London, where religious orders established in his diocese did not seem to him to answer adequately to modern conditions, nor were they wholly at his disposal. The society of the Oratory, gathered round Faber and Newman, showed him, however, what may be looked for in some of these diocesan societies when directed by a man of ability. Manning was at that time at the Cardinal's disposal, and it was to him that the duty was entrusted of founding the new society, and of drawing up its rules. Manning took the Oblates of Milan as his pattern, and gave his priests the title of "Oblates of St. Charles". The rules which he prescribed for them were practically those drawn up by St. Charles for his disciples, adapted to English conditions, and were approved by the Holy See in 1857 and in 1877. Wiseman installed his Oblates, with their superior and founder, at the church of St. Mary of the Angels, Bayswater. In the direction of the last century, the Oblates have created other missions or religious centres in the diocese of Westminster, and have had their full share in the movement of conversions, which was then taking place in England. Nor did the opposition of Errington, Wiseman's coadjutor, and of the Westminster chapter, hinder the advance of the society, though the Cardinal found himself, indeed, under the necessity of withdrawing from his seminary at St. Edmund's, where he had placed them. The staff of this house had supplied Manning with some of his best subjects, among them with Herbert Vaughan, who was to succeed him at Westminster. Under Mary of the last century, the Oblates devoted themselves to various apostolic labours in London, and in other missions in the two dioceses of Westminster and Southwark. They have founded elementary schools, a higher school for boys, and the College of St. Charles, which is now a University college. The College had a house in Roman since 1861; in 1867 Pius IX appointed the superior, Father O'Callaghan, rector of the English College, thus giving the Oblates the means of exercising a greater influence on the clergy. The Archconfraternity of the Holy Ghost, Manning's favourite devotion, with its centre at St. Mary of the Angels, has grown largely under their direction. Manning governed the Bayswater community from 1857 to 1868. He held that the mission of the Oblates was to revive the English secular clergy by taking part in its life and in its labours, and thus setting them an example. Their community helps them to sanctify themselves by the practices of an approved rule; they devote themselves to ecclesiastical studies, but more especially to ascetical and mystical theology, which enable them to give pious souls an enlightened guidance; they undertake all the tasks assigned to them by the archbishop, whose missions are they, and to whom they owe complete obedience.

Ambrosiaster, the name given to the author of a commentary on all the Epistles of St. Paul, with the exception of that to the Hebrews. It is usually published among the works of St. Ambrose (P. L., XVII, 45-506). Before each Epistle and its interpretation a short prologue is found which sets forth purpose and context. In the commentaries the text is given by sections; and for each portion a natural and logical explanation is furnished. All in all the commentary is an excellent work. Some modern scholars believe it was written before the sixteenth century. Its teaching is entirely orthodox, with perhaps the sole exception of the author’s belief in the millennium. The Latin text of the Pauline Epistles differs considerably from the Vulgate. According to all appearances it was taken from the version known as the “Italian.” Reference to the Greek text is rarely found; in fact the writer seems to be ignorant of the Greek language. The author hardly ever seeks a hidden or mystical sense in the text; hence it becomes evident how widely the commentary differs in character from the exegetical works of St. Ambrose. In his interpretations of Scriptural works St. Ambrose is not much given to research into the natural and literal meaning. Generally he is in quest of a higher allegorical or mystical sense. And although he distinguishes between the literal and the higher signification, still it is the latter principally that he tries to bring out. Not so with Ambrosiaster. The natural and logical sense is the only object the writer has in view. As to the time when the book originated there are no definite indications which point to the latter part of the fourth century. Of the heresies or sects referred to, none antedate that period. The persecution of the Emperor Julian (361-363) is spoken of as a recent occurrence. Finally Pope Damasus (366-384) is mentioned as actually present (i. e. acta) at the Synod of the Church. It is quite likely that the writer lived in Rome; his reference to the primacy of St. Peter and the power wielded by Pope Damasus would suggest the idea. The identification of the writer however is not so easy. During the Middle Ages that commentary was commonly ascribed to St. Ambrose. The MSS which were raised by Erasmus in the sixteenth century; since that period the author has been known as Ambrosiaster (Pseudo-Ambrosius). Scholars have suggested a great variety of names. St. Augustine, in quoting a passage from the commentary, attributes it to St. Hilary; hence some writers believed that either St. Hilary of Poitiers, or St. Hilary of Pavia, or the schismatic deacon Hilary of Rome was meant. Others sought the writer in St. Remigius, in the Pelagian Bishop Julian of Acalum, in the African writer Tucionis, in the schismatic priest Faustinus of Rome, or in the converted Jew Isaac of Rome. Most of these views are mere conjectures, or directly opposed to the facts known about the writer. The more recent opinion is that the author of the commentaries is also the author of the pseudo-Augustinian “Questions Veteris et Novi Testamenti.” According to a suggestion made by Dom Germain Morin, the Ambrosiaster and the Ambrosiaster ad Paulinum are connected with a single author; and the author of these commentaries was a distinguished layman of consular rank, by the name of Decimus Hilarianus Hilarius.

Ambulatory, a cloister, gallery, or alley; a sheltered place, straight or circular, for exercise in walking; the aisle that makes the circuit of theapse of a church. The central eastern apse of a church was often encircled by a semicircular aisle, called the ambulatory. Of these ambulatories there are three species: (1) the ambulatory with tangential chapter- tory without chapels; (2) variants of the above. By far the most common type is that in which the chapels radiate to the north-east, east and south-east. An ambulatory without radiating chapels is so rare in Romanesque work that supposed examples should be regarded as doubtful. Sometimes there is a rectangular ambulatory, as in the Romsey eastern chapel. Ambulatories are constructed either on the inside or outside of a building, or in a public thoroughfare wholly or partially under cover, or entirely open to the sky, and are used only to walk in. The term is sometimes applied to a covered way round a building, such as the space between the columns and cela of a peripteral temple, or around an open space as the cloisters of a monastic church, as the Campo Santo at Pisa, or the atrium of an ancient basilica, e. g. that of St. Ambrose at Milan. The term can be used as an equivalent of either cloister or atrium.

Amelia, THE DioCESE OF, comprises seven towns in the province of Perugia, Italy, and is under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See. The Christian origin of this Umbrian mountain town is wrapped in mystery. The Bishopric of Amelia appears on the pages of history relatively late. Ugelli mentions seven bishops of Amelia, all others are in doubt. He mentions also Stephen, of whom there is no trace in history. Flavius, Bishop of Amelia, seems to have been present at a synod held at Rome, 14 November, 465, by Pope Hilary. Ugelli goes on to enumerate Tiburtius, Martinianus, and then a Sallustino present at a synod held in 502 under Pope Symmachus. Still further according to Ugelli, in the fifth century there was a Bishop of Amelia by name Sincerus. The Bollandists, however, show that the date of his episcopate is uncertain; there is question even of his very existence (June, III, 17). A Bishop of Amelia appears in 649 at the provincial Synod of Ariminum at Ravenna. The city of Amelia had great political importance during the eighth century, when between the opposition of the iconoclast Byzantine emperors and the conquering Lombard power in the centre of Italy the temporal power of the popes grew from day to day. There are 20 parishes, 31 secular priests, 43 regular priests, 78 churches and chapels. The population is 19,500.

Amen.—The word Amen is one of a small number of Hebrew words which have been imported unchanged into the liturgy of the Church, proper sanctiorem auctoritatem as St. Augustine expresses it, in virtue of the OLD TESTAMENT. In the English Version this was the Hebrew word in the mouth of Our Saviour' observes the Catechism of the Council of Trent, "that it pleased the Holy Ghost to have it perpetuated in the Church of God". In point of fact St. Matthew attributes it to Our Lord twenty-eight times, and St. John in his double form twenty-six times. As regards the etymology, Amen is a derivative from the Hebrew verb aman (אמַן) "to strengthen" or "confirm".

Scriptural Use.—I. In the Holy Scripture it appears almost invariably as an adverb, and its primary use is to indicate that the speaker adopt for his own what has already been said by another. Thus in Jer., xxviii, 6, the prophet represents himself as answering to Hananiah's prophecy of happier days; "Amen, the Lord perform the words which thou hast prophesied". And in the imprecations of Deut., xxiv, 14 sqq. we read, for example: "Cursed be the man which hath not the same mind and all the people shall say Amen". From this, some liturgical use of the word appears to have developed long before the coming of Jesus Christ. Thus we may compare I Paralipomenon, xvi, 38, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from eternity; and let the people say Amen and a hallelujah to God", with Ps., cv, 45, "Blessed be the Lord, the God of Israel from everlasting: and let all the people say: so be it" (cf. also II Esdras, vii, 6), these last words in the Septuagint being represented by γένεσαι, γένεσα, and in the Vulgate, which follows the Septuagint by fiat, fiat; but the Masoretic text gives "Amen, Amen". Talmudic tradition tells us that Amen was not said in the Temple, but only in the synagogues (cf. Edersheim, The Temple, p. 127), but by this we probably ought to understand not that the saying Amen was forbidden in the Temple, but only that the response of the congregation, being delayed until the end for fear of interrupting the exceptional solemnity of the rite, demanded a more extensive and impressive formula than a simple Amen. The familiarity of the usage of saying Amen at the end of all prayers, even before the Christian era, is evidenced by Tobias, ix, 12—12. II. A second use of Amen may be found in the New Testament, but not quite unknown in the Old, has to refer to no words of any other person, but is simply a form of affirmation or confirmation of the speaker's own thought, sometimes introducing it, sometimes following it. Its employment as an introductory formula seems to be peculiar to the speeches of Our Saviour recorded in the Gospels, and it is noteworthy that, while in the Synoptists one Amen is usual in St. John the word is invariably doubled. (Cf. the double Amen of conclusion in Num., v, 22, etc.) In the Catholic (i.e. the Reims) translation of the Gospels, the Hebrew word is for the most part retained, but in the Protestant "Authorised version" it is removed. In the Roman Catholic version of the New Testament, Amen is thus used by Our Lord to introduce a statement so as to emphasize the demand of its service upon the faith of His hearers in His word or in His power; e. g. John, viii, 58, "Amen, Amen, I say unto you, before Abraham was made, I am". In other parts of the New Testament it is freely used in the version of St. Paul, Amen usually concludes a prayer or a doxology, e. g. Rom., xi, 36, "To Him be glory for ever. Amen". We also find it sometimes attached to blessings, e. g. Rom., xv, 33, "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen"; but this usage is much rarer, and in many apostolic instances, e. g. all those appealed to by Abbot Cabrol, "Amen is really a later interpolation." III. Lastly the common practice of concluding any discourse or chapter of a subject with a doxology ending in Amen seems to have led to a third distinctive use of the word in which it appears as nothing more than a formula of conclusion. Thus Tobias concludes: "The Lord God of our fathers blessed me through all my life, and my eyes beheld the good things which I have written in this book. Amen". Tobias ends in this way with Amen, and the Vulgate gives it at the end of St. Luke's Gospel. This seems to be the best explanation of Apoc., iii, 14: "These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness who is the beginning of the creation of God". The Amen who is also the beginning would thus suggest much the same idea as "I am Alpha and Omega" of Apoc., i, 8, or "The first and the last" of Apoc., ii, 8.

Liturgical Use.—The employment of Amen in the synagogues as the people's answer to a prayer said aloud by a representative must no doubt have been adopted in their own worship by the Christians of the Apostolic age. This at least is the only natural sense in which to interpret the use of the word in I Cor., xiv, 16, "Else if thou shalt bless with the spirit, how shall he that holdeth the place of the unlearned say Amen to thy blessing?" (_where both τὸ ἀμέν καὶ τὸ σῆμα ἀμένορα_ where τὸ ἀμέν seems clearly to be the custom, τὸ σῆμα seems, however, its use seems to have been limited to the congregation, who made answer to some public prayer, and it was not spoken by him who offered the prayer (see von der Goltz, Das Gebet in der ältesten Christenheit, p. 160). It is perhaps one of the most reliable indications of the early date of the "Didache", or "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles", that, although several short liturgical formulae are embodied in this document, the word Amen occurs but once, and then in company with the word marana, apparently as an ejaculation of the assembly. As regards these liturgical formulae in the "Didache", they do not include the Amen, but perhaps suppose that the Amen was not written because it was taken for granted that after the doxology those present would answer Amen as a matter of course. Again, in the apocryphal but early "Acta Johannis" (ed. Bonnet, c. xciv, p. 197) we find a series of short prayers spoken by the Saint to which the bystanders regularly answer Amen. But it cannot have been very long before the Amen was in many cases added by the utterer of the prayer. We have a noteworthy instance in the prayer of St. Polycarp at his martyrdom, a. d. 155, on which occasion we expressly told in St. John's account that the executioners waited until Polycarp completed his prayer, and pronounced the word Amen" before they kindled the fire by which he perished. We may fairly infer from this that before the middle of the second century it had become a familiar pro-

dice for one who prayed alone to add Amen by way of conclusion. This usage seems to have developed even in public worship, and in the second half of the fourth century, in the earliest form of the liturgy which affords us any safe data, that of the Apostolic Constitutions, we find that in only three instances is it clearly indicated that Amen was to be said by the congregation (i.e. after the Trisagion, after the "Prayer of Intercession", and at the reception of Communion); in the eight remaining instances in which Amen occurs, it was said, so far as we can judge, by the bishop himself who offered the prayer. Finally discovered in the ritual of Bithynian Serapion, which can be ascribed with certainty to the middle of the fourth century, we should infer that, with certain exceptions as regards the anaphora of the liturgy, every prayer consistently ended in Amen. In many cases no doubt the word was nothing more than a mere formula to mark the conclusion, but the real meaning was never altogether lost sight of. Thus, though St. Augustine and Pseudo-Ambrose may not be quite exact when they interpret Amen as verum est (it is true), they are not very remote from the general sense; and in the Middle Ages, on the other hand, the word is often rendered with importunity. Thus, in the "posicio Missae" published by Gerbert (Mon. Lit. Alem., II, 276), we read: "Amen is a ratification by the people of what has been spoken, and it may be interpreted in our language as if they all said: May it so be done as the priest has prayed".

General as was the use of the Amen as a conclusion, there were for a long time certain liturgical formulas to which it was not added. It does not for the most part occur at the end of the early creeds, and a Decree of the Congregation of Rites (n. 3014, 9 June, 1853) has decided that it should not be spoken at the end of them for the administration of baptism, and in the Mass, where indeed it would be meaningless. On the other hand, in the Churches of the East Amen is still commonly said after the form of baptism, sometimes by the bystanders, sometimes by the priest himself. In the prayers of exorcism it is the person exorcised who is expected to say "Amen", and in the conferring of sacred orders, when the vestments, etc., are given to the candidate by the bishop with some prayer of benediction, it is again the candidate who responds, just as in the solemn blessing of the Mass the people answer in the person of the server. We cannot say that any uniform principle governs liturgical usages. At the end of a High Mass the celebrant blesses the deacon before the latter goes to read the Gospel, it is the priest himself who says Amen. Similarly in the Sacrament of Penance and in the Sacrament of Extreme Unction it is the priest who adds Amen after the essential words of the sacramental form, although in the Sacrament of Confirmation this is done by the assistants. Further, it may be noticed that in past centuries certain local rites seem to have shown an extraordinary predilection for the use of the word Amen. In the Mozarabic ritual, for example, not only is it inserted after each clause of the long episcopal benediction, but it was repeated after each petition by the Pope in the Kyrie Eleison. A similar exaggeration may be found in various portions of the Coptic Liturgy.

Two special instances of the use of Amen seem to call for separate treatment. The first is the Amen formerly spoken by the people at the close of the great Egyptian Consecration. The second is that which was uttered by each of the faithful when he received the Body and Blood of Christ. (1) Amen after the Consecration.—With regard to what we have ventured to call the "great Prayer of Consecration" a few words of explanation are necessary. There can be no doubt that by the Christians of the earlier ages of the Church the primary moment of the conversion of the bread and wine upon the altar into the Body and Blood of Christ was not so clearly apprehended as it is now by us. They were satisfied to believe that the change was wrought in the course of a long "prayer of thanksgiving" (εξαγωγή), a prayer made up of several elements of praise and thanksgiving of the words of institution, memento for living and dead, invocation of the Holy Ghost, etc.—which prayer they nevertheless conceived of as one "action" or consecration, to which, after a doxology, they responded by a solemn Amen. For a more detailed account of this aspect of the liturgy the reader must be referred to the article EPICLESIAS. It must be sufficient to say here that the essential unity of the great Prayer of Consecration is very clearly brought before us in the account of St. Justin Martyr (A.D. 150) who, describing the Christian liturgy, says: "As soon as the common prayers are ended and they (the Christians) have saluted one another with a kiss, bread and wine and water are brought to the president, who receiving them gives praise to the Father of all things by the Son and Holy Spirit and makes a long thanksgiving (εξαγωγή εις τον θεόν) for the blessings which He has vouchsafed to bestow upon them; and when he has finished the prayer, the people of God present answer with acclamation 'Amen'". (Justin, I Apol., Ixv, P. G., VI, 428). The existing liturgies both of the East and the West clearly bear witness to this primitive arrangement. In the Roman Liturgy the great consecrating prayer, or "action", of the Mass ends with the solemn doxology and Amen which immediately precede the Pater Noster. The other Amens which are found between the Preface and the Pater Noster can easily be shown to be relatively late additions. The Eastern liturgies also contain Amens similarly intercalated, and in the Missal of the Eastern rites are spoken immediately after the words of Institution, are not primitive. It may be noted that at the end of the seventeenth century the question of Amens in the Canon of the Mass acquired an adventitious importance on account of the controversy between Dom Claude de Vert and Père Lebrun regarding the secrecy of the Canon. It is now commonly admitted that in the primitive liturgies the words of the Canon were spoken aloud so as to be heard by the people. For some reason, the explanation of which is not obvious, the Amen immediately before the Pater Noster is omitted in the solemn Mass at Easter, after Communion.—The Amen which in many liturgies is spoken by the faithful at the moment of receiving Holy Communion may also be traced back to primitive usage. The Pontificale Romanum still prescribes that at the ordination of clerics and on other similar occasions, the newly ordained in receiving Communion should kiss the bishop's hand and answer Amen when the bishop says to them: "May the Body of Our Lord Jesus Christ keep thy soul unto everlasting life" (Corpus Domini, etc.). It is curious that in the lately-discovered Latin life of St. Melania the Younger, of the early fifth century, we are told how the Saint, after receiving Communion before death answered Amen and kissed the hand of the bishop who had brought it (see Cardinal Rambolla, Santa Melana Giuniore, 1905, p. 257). But the practice of answering Amen is Cardinal older than this. It appears in the Canons of Hippolytus (No. 148) and in the In Gregory of Nyssa (c. 364). Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VI, xliii) tells a story of the heretic Novatian (c. 250), how, at the time of Communion, before Amen he made the people say "I will not go back to Pope Cornelius". Also we have evidently an echo of the same practice in the Acts of St. Perpetua, A.D. 202 (Armitage Robinson, St. Perpetua, pp. 85, 86), and probably in Tertul-
American's phrase about the Christian profaning in the amphitheatre the lips with which he had spoken to the multitudes (Acts, v, 18). But even all the Fathers supply illustrations of the practice, notably St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech., v, 18, P. G., XXIII, 1125).

Other Uses.—Finally, we may note that the word Amen occurs not infrequently in early Christian inscriptions, and that it was often introduced into anaphora and greeting (1 Cor., i, 2). Moreover, a number of Greek letters which form Amen according to their numerical values total 99 (a = 1, μ = 40, η = 8, ρ = 50), this number often appears in inscriptions, especially of Egyptian origin, and as a sort of magical efficacy seems to have been attributed to its symbol. It should be noted that Amen is not treated in general encyclopedias and confine ourselves to the ethnography and colonization of the Americas. The so-called aborigines of America are, with exception of the Esquimaux, generally regarded as belonging to one and the same branch of the human family, physically as well as ethnically. From the physical standpoint they have been classified with the type called Mongoloid, but since doubts have arisen as to the existence of such a type, it is safer to state that, anthropologically, the American, and especially the North American Indians, resemble some of the most easterly Asiatie tribes more closely than any other group of the world.

Amendable Indians, an obsolete form of honorary satisfaction, customary in the Church in France as late as the seventeenth century. It was performed at the bidding of the ecclesiastical judge, and within the precinct of his court, though at one time it could be enforced at the church door or in some other public place. It was ordinarily inflicted only on condemned criminals, who appeared stripped to the shirt, barefoot and bareheaded, with candle in hand, and begged pardon of God, the king, and of justice.

Educated at Eichstätt and Wittenberg, he taught philosophy, law, Ories, and Lutheranism at the latter place, where he lived in daily intercourse, his Church, and other leaders of the new movement. He was here that he came to recognize the novelty and falsity of the Lutheran doctrines, and the truth of the Church's teaching. After much controversial correspondence with Melanthon, he left Wittenberg in 1543, and was received, with his wife and children, into the Catholic Church. The Prince Bishop, Maurice von Hütten, made him professor of rhetoric at Eichstätt. A year later, he went to Ingolstadt, as professor of philosophy, where he remained until his death. He is counted among the disciples of his chief, and wrote a number of learned works, such as: "Commentaria in Cicero and Horace", the former of whom appears to be his favourite author; "Antiparadoxa", whence many details of his life and studies are derived, and "Troes Epistolae", concerning the ecclesiastical controversies of the period.

America, also called the Western Continent or the New World, consists of three main divisions: North America, Central America, and South America. The first of these extends from (about) 70° to 15° north latitude. Central America forms an isthmian running from north-west to south-east, and narrowing to a strip of thirty miles in width at Panama; this isthmus extends to the southern point of South America, which connects with the western coast of South America, South America begins in latitude 12° north, terminating in latitude 55° south. Hence North America approximately extends over 3,800 English miles from north to south, South America, 4,500, and Central America constitutes a diagonal running between the two larger masses from north-west to south-east and is approximately a thousand miles in length.

As the object of this article is to compile the data which will help the reader to appreciate the Christian settlement and civilization of America, we omit here the geography, and other aspects of America treated in general encyclopedias and confine ourselves to the ethnography and colonization of the Americas. The so-called aborigines of America are, with exception of the Esquimaux, generally regarded as belonging to one and the same branch of the human family, physically as well as ethnically. From the physical standpoint they have been classified with the type called Mongoloid, but since doubts have arisen as to the existence of such a type, it is safer to state that, anthropologically, the American, and especially the North American Indians, resemble some of the most easterly Asiatie tribes more closely than any other group of the world.

The South American Indian is more nearly allied to the northern than to any extra-American stock. As to the Esquimaux, his skull is decidedly of an Arctic type, corresponding in that respect to Asiatic and even European peoples living inside of the Arctic circle. But these generalizations may have to be modified, with the rapid strides anthropology is making in the field of detailed and local investigation, and it will hereafter be advisable to consider the characteristics of every linguistic stock (and even of its subdivisions) by themselves, allowing for changes wrought in the physical condition by diversity of environment after long residence.

Distribution of Aboriginal Populations.—The distribution of the American population at the time of Columbus is, of course, not known from personal observation, but it may be approximately reconstructed from information gathered in the Americas. The Eskimo held most of the Arctic belt, whereas the so-called Indian swayed the rest of the continent to its southernmost extremity. The population was not nearly as numerous as has long been thought, even where it was most dense, but there are no materials for even an approximate estimate. The great northern and western plains were not settled, although there are traces of pre-Columbian permanent abodes, or at least of some settlements made during a slow shifting along the streams; tribes preying upon the buffalo roamed with that quadrapled over the plains. The north-west of the Pacific was sparsely inhabited and the buffalo led the Indian on its southward wanderings. The aboriginal population of California was not large and lived partly on sea-food. The great northern plateau of Mexico, with the mountains along the Rio Grande, was too arid and consequently destitute of resources of subsistence, to allow permanent settlement; the number is small in numbers; but the New Mexican Pueblos formed a group of sedentary inhabitants clustering along the Rio Grande and scattered in the mountains as far as Arizona, surrounded on all sides by roving Indians.
some of whom, however, like the Navajos, had turned to land-filling also, on a modest scale. The same conditions may be said to have obtained in Arizona. Western Mexico presented a similar aspect, modified by a different climate. While there are within the area of the United States tribes that in the fifteenth century displayed a higher degree of culture than their surroundings (the Natchez, for instance, in the development and extension of sway, the Iroquois) the culture of the Indian seems to have reached its highest degree in Central Mexico and Yucatan, Guatemala and Honduras, and, we may add, Nicaragua. It is as if the tribal wanderings from north to south, which sometimes other tribes had been subject to, had been offset by the narrowing of the continent at the isthmus of Panama. While the abundance of natural resources invited man to remain, geographic features compelled him, and thus arose Indian communities that excelled in culture the Indians in every other part of the continent. South of Panama, nature was too exuberant, and the territory too small, to favour similar progress; hence the Indians, while still quite proficient in certain arts, could not compare with their northern neighbours. In South America the exuberance of tropical life north of the Argentine plains, was as unfavourable to cultural growth as the barren deserts would be. The Amazonian basin, Brazil, the Guyanas, and Venezuela, as well as the eastern declivity of the Andes in general, were thinly inhabited by tribes, few of which had risen above the stage of roving savages. On the western slope of the Andes, in Colombia, the population was somewhat more dense and the houses, although still of wood and canes, were larger and more substantially reared. Sedentary tribes of a lesser degree of culture also dwelt in northern Argentine, limited in numbers and scattered in and between savage groups. The highest development attained by man in South America before its discovery was along the backbone of the Andes from latitude 15° north near the Tropic of Capricorn, or 23° south. This was also the case on the Pacific shore to latitude 20° south, beginning at 2° south. In this zone the cultural growth of the Indian attained a level equal in many ways, superior in some, infinitely less artificial (as for instance, the Indian culture stone), to the culture of the most advanced tribes of Yucatan and Central America. The tribes of Chile were comparatively numerous and fairly advanced, mostly given to land-tillage and hunting; the Patagonians stood on a lower level, and the people of Tierra del Fuego were perhaps round the centre of the scale of humanity in America.

PRE-COLUMBIAN POLITICAL CONDITIONS.—Not even the most advanced among the American Indians had risen to the conception of a Nation or State; their organization was merely tribal, and their conquests or raids were made not with a view of assimilating the subdued, but to pillage for booty (including female captives and human victims for sacrifice), or, at best, for the purpose of exacting tribute and assistance in warfare. Hence America was an irregular checker-board of tribes, independent and always autonomous, even when overawed or overpowered by others. Those tribes whose sway was most extended when America was discovered were: in North America, the Iroquois league in what is now the State of New York; they had organized for the purpose of plunder and devastation and were just then extending their destructive forays; in central Mexico, the confederation of the tribes of Mexico, Tezcoco, and Tlacopan; in Yucatan the Maya; in Amazonia the Chimbas or Chibcha of central Colombia and, in Peru, the Incas. It has not yet been established, however that the Incas had confederates, or if they belonged to the class of sedentary tribes that then overran large expanses of territory, either alone or with the aid of subjugated tribes. Traces of confederacies appeared on the Peruvian coast among the sedentary clusters that were partly wiped out by the Inca not a century previous to the advent of the Spaniards. Of the sedentary Indians that held a sway consider- able extent of territory by their own single efforts, there were the various independent groups of Guatemala and the Tarascans in western central Mexico who were the most conspicuous. In North America the Muskogees, the Natchez, the Choctaws, and, further north, the Dakota and Pawnees displayed considerable aggregative power.

ABORIGINAL SOCIAL CONDITIONS.—The system of social organization was the same in principle throughout the entire continent, differences being, as in general culture, in degree, but not in kind. The clan, or gens, was the unit, and descent was sometimes in the male, sometimes in the female line. But the clan system had not everywhere fully developed; the prairie tribes of North America, for instance, were not all composed of clans. Various causes have been assigned for this exception, but no satisfactory explanation has as yet been suggested. The general characteristics of American Indian society were: internal autonomy, tenure of lands, no political titles, offices, and segregation and exclusion of the different clusters from each other. Infinite boundaries nowhere divided one cluster from another; uninhabited zones, or neutral belts, intervened between the settlements of the tribes; where the population was denser, the belt was narrower, though still devoid of villages. Civil and military administrations were merged into each other, and behind and above both, though partly occult, the power of religious creed and ceremonial determined every action. The shamans or sorcerers, by means of oracular utterances and magic, were the real leaders. These so-called priests also had their organization, the principles of which were the same all over primitive America, as they are the same to-day. Esoteric societies, based upon empirical knowledge and its application to spiritual and material wants, constituted the divisions and classifications of the wizards. These were not in plastic and easily movable, but were indispensable for religious ends, without belonging to one or the other of these clusters of official magicians, exposed himself to dire chastisement. Such were and are the chief features of religious organization among the more advanced tribes; the lesser the degree of culture, the more perfect the system and the less complicated in detail.

RELIGION OF THE ABORIGINES.—Anism is the principle underlying the creed of the Indian everywhere, and Fetishism is its tangible manifestation. Monotheism, the idea of a personal and all-creating and ruling God, nowhere existed among the Indians. The whole world was inhabited by spirits: the rain, which could at will take individual shape in special localities. The Indian feels himself surrounded everywhere by numberless spiritual agencies, in presence of which he is helpless, and which he feels constrained innately to propitiate or appease. Thus far under the domination of his magic and, later, the wizard a hold upon him which he cannot shake off. His every action is therefore preceded by prayer and offerings, the latter are sometimes quite complicated. Among his fetishes, there is little or no hierarchic gradation of idols. Phenomena that seem to exert a greater influence upon man than others are considered to be more powerful, and seem to take effects supposed to act beyond their sphere. Thus there was and is no sun-worship as commonly believed. The sun, as well as the moon, is looked upon as a heavenly body which is the abode of powerful (but not all-powerful) spirits; in many tribes little attention is paid to them. Historic deities also arose among them as the result of belief in mighty wizards whose spirit dwelt in their fetishes. Sacrifices were made to the fetishes, and the most precious objects offered up to human victims being looked upon as the most desirable. Even the practice of scalping was based upon the belief that, by securing that part of the enemy's body nearest to the brain, the captor came into possession of the mental faculties of the deceased, and thus added so much more to his own mental and physical powers. Anthropophagy, or cannibalism, as widely distributed through the tropics, rested on the same conception.

ABORIGINAL LAWS AND LANGUAGES.—The Indian had no written laws. Custom ruled; the decisions of the tribal councils and oracular utterances determined the questions at issue. The council was the chief authority in temporal matters; the chiefs executed its decrees, which were first sanctioned, or modified, by the oracles of the shamans. There was no writing, no letters, but some of the more advanced tribes used pictographs, by means of which they could, to a limited extent, record historic events or other languages. They used their calendars, both astronomical (in a rude way) and ritual. The knotted strings, or guipus, of Peru were a more imperfect method, and their use, in a simpler form, was much more extended than is generally thought. The aboriginal languages of America are divided into three main groups, each divided into dialects. The number of these stocks is becoming gradually reduced as a result of philological study. There is an affinity between some of the idioms of western North America and some of eastern Asia, but further than that resemblances do not go. It is easier to follow the example set by British, and to subdivide the American idioms into geographical groups, each of which embraces a certain number of stocks. There is, however, an objection to this plan in that in some cases one stock is scattered and dispersed over more than one geographic section. There are, for instance, indications that the Shoshones of Oregon, the Pimas, Opatas, Yaqui of Arizona and Sonora, and the Mexicans (Aztecs, Tezucuans, etc.) and a part of the Indians of Nicaragua belong to one linguistic family, which is thus represented both among the North Pacific and Central groups.

The Eskimo, whose language may be classed as specifically Arctic, the most important groups are: in British America the Apatcachens, or Tinné; the Navajos, or Dinné, in Arizona and New Mexico, with their relatives the Apaches or Nédé: the Algonquins, ranging from Nova Scotia in the northeast, on the Atlantic, to New York Bay in the south, and from the headwaters of the Missouri River in the west, across the basin of the Great Lakes; of these Indians the Arapahoes, Blackfeet, Cheyennes, Chipeways, Delawares, Sac and Foxes, and Shawnees are the most generally known. Many tribes of this group (like those of New England for instance) lived originally by fishing and hunting; others, like those of northwestern New York, embracing the Hurons, Eries, Cherokees, etc.; the Muskogees, comprising the tribes along the southern Atlantic coast to part of Florida; the Catawbas, Natchez, and some of the Indians of Florida and Ochulua in Mexico; the Pawnees, Dakotas, and Kickapoos of Kansas; and of the watershed west of the Mississippi; in the West, on the Pacific coast, the north Pacific group extends from Alaska to southern California. The Yumas are scattered from the mouth of the Colorado through portions of Arizona, and a branch of them is said to live in the Mexican State of Oaxaca. The Pueblos of New Mexico and Arizona are looked upon as a separate linguistic cluster also. Of the great Shoshone group mention has already been made.

Mexico further contains a number of clusters linguistically distinct, like the Tafoacs, the Otomis, the Totonacos, Zapotecos, Mixes, Mixtecos, Mayas, Zenules, some of which have been grouped into one family, the Maya, for instance, embrace some of the more highly developed tribes of Guatemala, and the Huaxtecans of the State of Vera Cruz, far to the north of Yucatan. The farther south we go, the more indefinite become linguistic classifications for the reason that the material at hand has not been sufficiently investigated; also that there is, especially in regard to South America, much material still to be collected. It follows, therefore, that the idioms of the Isthmus can hardly be regarded as classified. A number are recognized as apparently related, but that relationship is but imperfectly understood. In South America, we here merely mention the Chibchas, or Muyscas, of Colombia, the extensive Arawak stock, and the Caribes, the former widely scattered, the latter limited to Venezuela, the Orinoco, and Guyana. Of the idioms of Ecuador little is known except that the Quichua language of Peru (mountains) may have supplanted a number of pre-Amerindian idioms. The language of South of the Quichua the great Aymara stock occupied the central plateau, but in primitive times it extended much farther north. In Brazil, the Tupi (Guarani) and Tapuya were, on the coast, the most widely diffused languages. We may further mention the idioms of Guaycurú, which may again be divided into two, the Guaycurú and the Guara, the former of which the Calchaqui were the most advanced, and the unclassified idioms of Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego. This sketch of the distribution of American languages cannot here be carried into greater detail. American linguistics are constantly progressing, and much of what is now apparent is established as liable to be overthrown in the future.

ORIGIN OF THE ABORIGINAL RACES.—The question of the origin of the Indians is as yet a matter of conjecture. Affinities with Asiatic groups have been observed on the north-western and western coast of North America, and certain similarities between the Peruvian-coast Indians and Polynesian tribes seem striking, but decisive evidence is still wanting. The numberless hypotheses on the origin of the primitive Americans that have flooded literature since the days of Columbus have no proper place here. The existing man in America during the ice age must still be a matter of research. Neither is there any proof of the coming of Christian missionaries in pre-Columbian times. There may be indications, but these lack, so far, the support of documentary evidence. If, however, we consider Greenland as an island belonging to the North American Continent, Christianity was introduced into America in the tenth century of our era. The tale of the voyage to “Vinland” attributed to a Bishop Jon, or John, in the fourteenth century, rests on slender foundations. In regard to the visits of Asians to the west coast of America, nothing is known, the Fu-Sang tale being long ago cleared up by the recent Japanese archipelago. Martin Behaim placed on his map of 1492 a note according to which seven Portuguese bishops in the ninth century fled from the Moors to a western island called Antilia and there founded seven towns. Other than this, there is no authority for the story. Finally, there is the tale of Atlantis, told by Plato in his “Timaeus” and his “Critias,” which is equally unsupported. Though the subject of much speculation, no trace of a submerged continent, or part of the American Continent, of which the Antilles would be the remnant, has so far been discovered. The attempts to establish traces of the Atlantean catastrophe in the folklore of Central American tribes have met with indifferent success.
AMERICA

ORIGIN OF THE NAME GIVEN TO THE NEW WORLD.

—The name "America" is the outcome not so much of an accident as of an incident. For nearly a century after Columbus, the Spaniards who had the first right to baptize the continent, having been its first European occupants, persisted in calling their vast American possessions the "Western Indies". That name was held in derision by the English and Dutch, while they were in search of Asia. The belief that America was a part of that continent was dispelled only by Balboa's journey across the Isthmus in 1513. Six years previous to that feat, however, the name America had been applied by some German scholars to that continent. It was not from a spirit of diminishing the glory of Columbus, nor of enforcing the claims of other explorers, but simply in ignorance of the facts. Amerigo Vespucci, a Florentine pilot, first in the service of Spain, then of Portugal, and again in Spanish employ, had made at least two voyages to the Western seas. It is not the purpose here to discuss the voyages Vespucci claimed to have made to the American coast, or that have been attributed to him. For these still somewhat enigmatic tales, and the documents relating thereto, see VESPUCCI, AMERIGO. It suffices to state that at least some of his letters were published as early as 1504. It was not until 1505, however, that Vespucci in a letter to his friend, Martin Waldseemüller (Hylacomylus), who occupied the chair of cosmography, struck by the alleged date of 1497 for Vespucci's first trip to the new continent, he concluded that to the Florentine belonged the honour of the first discovery, and that the New World should hence be named after him. So when, in 1507, a map was established at Basle, through the efforts, chiefly, of the secretary of the Duke of Lorraine, he published, together with Matthias Ringmann, professor of Latin, a geographical work of small compass, entitled "Cosmographie Introductio", in which he inserted the following passage: "I do not see why it may not be permitted to call this fourth part of the world America, the discovery of which is indebted to the curious mind, by the name of Amerige—that is to say, the land of Americans—or America, since both Europe and Asia have a feminine form of name, from the names of women". This suggestion might have had no further consequence, had not the name of America been placed on a map published by Hylacomylus in the same year, whether to designate only that part the discovery of which was credited to Vespucci, or the whole continent as far as known, is not certain. As the "Cosmographie Introductio" was a geographical treatise it was gradually accepted by cosmographers outside of Spain, although Las Casas persistently advocated the discovery of the Latin misermon and a slur on the name of Columbus. Foreign nations successively adopted the name proposed by Waldseemüller. Even Spain finally yielded, substituting "America" for "Occidental Indies" and "New World" as late as the middle of the eighteenth century. As Waldseemüller himself took no interest in the use of the name America. He never laid any claim to being the first discoverer of the new continent, except as far as the (dubious) date of his first voyage seems to do so. He was a personal friend of Columbus as long as the latter lived, and died (1512) with the fame of having been a useful and honourable man. Neither can Waldseemüller be charged with rashly giving Vespucci's name to America. More blame for not investigating the matter with care, and for blindly following a suggestion thrown out by Waldseemüller, attaches to subsequent students of cosmography like Martin Waldseemüller and Ortelius, who distinctly heard him on the command the original Spanish documents, having been for a time royal cosmographer. An attempt to trace the origin of the name to some obscure Indian tribe, said to have been called Amerique, has met with no favour.

—AMERICAN—L. SPANISH.—The European nations which settled the American Continent after its discovery by Columbus, and exerted the greatest influence on the civilization of the New World, were principally five. They rank, in point of date, as follows: Spain, Portugal, France, England, Holland. Sweden made an attempt at colonization, but, as the Swedish colony was limited to a very small fraction of the area of eastern North America and endured not more than seventeen years, it need only be mentioned here. Russian colonization of Alaska and the Danish occupation of one of the Lesser Antilles may also be passed over as unimportant. But the others began to lay the foundations of the New World. The rapidity with which she explored and conquered the territories discovered was amazing. Not sixty years after the landing of Columbus Spanish colonies dotted the continent, from northern Mexico as far south as central and southern Chile. Not only were they along the coast, but in Mexico and Central America they were scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and in South America from the Pacific shore eastward to the crest of the Andes and to the La Plata River. Vast unsettled stretches of land intervened between the colonies in many sections, but these sections could be, and were, traversed from time to time, so that intercourse could be kept up. The entire northern coast of South America was under Spanish sway, and explorations had been carried on, approximately, as far as lat. 42° north along the Pacific; in the interior as far as lat. 40°; the southern United States had been traversed beyond the Mississippi, and Florida, Alabama; the last term of expedition of along the Atlantic shore. The whole Pacific coast, from lat. 44° to the southern extremity of Tierra del Fuego, was already known, settled in places, and frequently visited, and while the Orinoco River had been explored both from its mouth and from the west, expeditions from Venezuela penetrated into the Amazon and its tributaries, a man once reached a point which is now the Argentine frontier from the side of Ecuador. These extraordinary achievements were accomplished by a nation that, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, counted, so far as we can estimate, not ten millions of people.

Such extraordinary activity, energy and, it cannot be denied, in many cases sagacity also, was the outcome of the character of the Spanish people and of their formation. In the first place, the Spaniards are a much mixed race. Since the times of Roman domination, nearly every people of any consequence that overran Europe (Huns and Northern Germans in particular) and America or the Spanish soil, and left traces of their presence in language, customs, and, in some cases (the Visigoths) in laws and organization. Southern invaders from Africa, the Moors, had still further contributed to the mixture. Defence of the Spanish soil and, particularly, salvation of the Christian faith, the people's dearest patrimony, against these Mohammedan conquerors, had made of the Spaniards above all a warrior people. But seven centuries of incessant warfare neither fashioned a very tender-hearted race nor contributed to enrich the country. Spain had once been rich in precious metals, but the Romans impoverished the land by draining the mines. Still the tradition remained, and with the tradition the longing for fortune and the golden fleece, for gold and silver became a powerful incentive to seek and grasp the wealth of the New World. The thirst for gold was neither more nor less intense in the sixteenth century than it is now, but it was directed to much vaster regions. Furthermore, the precious metals were found among peoples to whom they were of no commercial value, much less standards of wealth. To deprive the Indian of gold and silver was, to him, a much less serious matter than to deprive him of his gathered maize or any other staple food. The earliest periods of Spanish colonization were spent in attempts to establish a modus vivendi with the aborigines, like all epochs of that kind, proved disastrous to the weaker—namely, to the Indian. Doubts as to whether the natives were human beings or not were soon disposed of by a royal decree asserting their essential human nature and certain rights necessarily flowing therefrom. They were, however, and (by a law of 1567) declared to be minors who required a stage of tutelage, before they might be made to assume the duties and rights of the white population. Before practically reaching this conclusion, one which once for all determined the condition of the Indian in most South American Republics, and partly in the United States and Canada, much experimenting had been done.

The primitive condition of man in the New World was a problem which European culture four centuries ago was not yet capable of solving. While in Spain the old communal rights of the original components of the realm were for a long time maintained, and a sort of provincial autonomy prevailed, which acted as a check upon growing absolutism, Spanish America was from the outset a domain of the crown. Discovery, by land and sea, and colonization were under the exclusive control of the monarch; only with his permission explorations could be made, and settlement. Personal patronage of the viceroy was placed ostensibly under a wholesome control, but it was also unfavourably hampered in many instances. Not so much, however, in the first century after Columbus as in the two following centuries. The royal patronage, at first indispensable, resulted in securing for Spanish interests an unjust ascendancy over those of the colonists. It was often, and not improperly, contended that the Creoles were in a worse position than the Indians, the latter, as special wards of the Government of Spain, enjoying more protection and privileges than the Spanish Americans. The latter complained particularly of the injustice of assigning two officials each to the exclusion of Creoles. It insured the home Government a strong position in the colonies, but only too often its administration was entrusted to men unfit for the positions through want of practical acquaintance with country and people. It is true that the system of residencia, or final account at the expiration of the terms of office, provided the means of investigation, with, sometimes, discretionary faculties, were a check upon abuses, but by no means sufficient. A code of laws for the Indies, as Spain called its American possessions for a long time, had been in contemplation since the middle of the sixteenth century, and only became effect at the end of the seventeenth. Much of the delay was due to the enormous number of royal Decrees on which legislation had to be based. These Decrees continued to be promulgated as occasion demanded, along with the Code, and they bear testimony to the solicitous attention given by the Spanish monarchs to the most minute details in their management. This was a so-called paternal autocracy, well intended, but most unfavourable, in the end, to the free development of the individual and of the colonies in general.

In the middle of the seventeenth century Spain definitively closed its colonies to the outer world, the mother-country excepted, and even the intercourse with that was severely controlled. It was a suicidal measure, and thereafter the American colonies began to decline, to the great detriment of Spain itself. Still, it should not be overlooked that the measure had, to a great extent, been forced upon Spain by the unrelenting attacks of other nations upon her colonies and her commerce with them, in times of peace as well as in war. Instruction and education were almost completely under the control of the Catholic Church. Secular institutions of learning sprang up late, although the Jesuits had taken the initiative in that direction. Considered the means at hand, much was done to study the geography of the new continent, its natural history, and other branches of science. In the eighteenth century scientific explorations were made on a large scale. Previous to that time, such investigations were mostly due to the Jesuits, especially by ecclesiastics. In the sixteenth century, the Emperor Philip the Second sent to Mexico his own physician Hernandez to study specially the medicinal and alimentary plants of that country. Nutritive plants were imported from Europe and Asia, as well as domestic animals, and it is to the Spaniards that the planting and cultivation of fruit and shade trees in South America is due. But all these improvements did not satisfy the legitimate aspirations of Spanish-Americans, for they were made for the benefit of the native Spaniards. Add to this a vellacitating and heavy system of taxation that weighed almost exclusively on the Creoles, heavy custom-house duties, stringently exacted, and the arbitrary conduct of officials, high and low, and we are not surprised that the colonies took advantage of the opportunity afforded by the weakening of Spain during the Napoleonic period to secure their independence. The magnificent exploitation of the abundant mines of precious metals, discovered everywhere and consequent exploration, was carried on in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries according to methods that were certainly progressive, though the mines began to give out. At the same time, in the great mining centres, the Creoles became so rich that luxury and corruption rapidly spread amongst them. The great bulk of the treasure went to Europe without any profit for Spanish America. The statement that forced labour in the mines diminished the numbers of the Indians is greatly exaggerated. Individual and local abuses are undeniable, but the system established after the same Reino or Revenso had proved wise and salutary when properly administered. In general, the Indian policy of the Spanish Government was based upon the idea that the Indian should in time supply the labour needed in the colonies; it was a policy of solicitous preservation and slow patient education through the agency of the Catholic Church.

II. PORTUGUESE.—As Spain was securing its foothold in the New World, Portugal was rapidly pushing forward in the path of exploration. The outcome was rivalry between the two nations and disputes about the rights and limits of discovery. Both factions, Portuguese and Spanish, appealed to the Pope, who accused both of trespass. His verdict resulted in establishing a line of demarcation, the right of discovery on one side being allotted to...
Spain, on the other side to Portugal. The papal Bulls from 1493, while issued, according to the time, in the form of grants by Divine rights, are in fact, acts of arbitration. The Pope (Alexander VI) had not sought, but never accepted by request of the parties, the office of umpire, and his decisions were modified several times before both claimants declared themselves satisfied. The methods of colonization pursued by the Portuguese were in the main similar to those of Spain, with the difference that the Portuguese insisted on utilizing Africans to complete their pursuits. Again, the territory discovered and occupied (Brazil) was difficult uniformly of access, being mostly covered by vast forests and furrowed by gigantic watercourses, not always favourable to the penetration of the interior. Therefore the Portuguese reached the interior much less rapidly than the Spaniards, and confined their settlements mostly to the coast. The Indian population, thinly scattered and on a much lower level of culture than the sedentary natives in parts of Spanish America, was of little service for the exploitation of the vast and almost impenetrable land. In the beginning of the seventeenth century, Brazil belonged to the Spaniards, and might be conquered by the Dutch. The domination of the latter left no permanent stamp on the country, as it was brought to a close thirty years after its beginning. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Portuguese were the most dangerous neighbors for the Jesuit mission in the Mississippi Basin as well as in Paraguay. Their policy of en-slaving the Indians caused the ruin of more than one mission, and it was only with great effort that the Jesuit state of Paraguay, so beneficial to the aborigines, for a time held its own. The separation of Brazil from Portugal was due more to political disturbances in the latter country than to other causes. An empire was created, with a scion of the royal house of Portugal at its head. It is chiefly to the last Emperor, Pedro II, that Brazil owes its interior development, and to him was due the emancipation of the slaves. The Federal Republic since created has had to contend against many difficulties. III. FRENCH.—The French occupied three regions of the New World: (1) Eastern Canada, (2) Louisiana and the Mississippi Valley, (3) some of the Lesser Antilles and Guiana in eastern South America. The Antilles (Hayti, Martinique, Guadeloupe, etc.), benefited by the course of the warfare carried on against Spain from the sixteenth century. Guiana as a French possession was the fruit of European wars and treaties. Neither of the last two French colonies have exerted any marked influence on American civilization. The French occupation of a part of Hayti had more serious conse-quences. The uprising of the negroes on that island resulted in the establishment of a negro republic, an isolated phenomenon in the annals of American his-tory. The French occupation of Canada lasted two centuries, that of the Valley of the Mississippi a little more than one, and was of the highest importance in the history of the French and American people. It is to the French we owe the earliest acquaintance with these regions. French colonization was different from Spanish, inasmuch as it was attempted on a smaller scale and with less dependence on the home Government. Like Spanish and Portuguese coloniza-tion, however, it was essentially a race to found French Huguenot settlements in Brazil, Florida, and Georgia in the sixteenth century all failed; in Brazil because of mismanagement; in the latter countries because of the Spanish conquest. French colonization began on the banks and near the mouth of the Saint Lawrence. The first colonizers were venturesome mariners who approached the crown for authority as well as for aid and military assistance. But it was personal initiative that laid the foundation. Strange as it may seem, Catherine de Medici gave more support to Protestant than to Catholic undertakings. Political reasons on her part, chiefly the desire to supplant Spain by her American possessions, dictated this anomalous policy. The French settlements remained comparatively few, and hugged the shores of the Saint Lawrence, occupying points of the Lake basin and isolated posts among the Indians and on the seaboard. The necessity of military protection and the limited immigration led to the abandon-ment of the colony controlled by the crown, but for the most part indifferently supported. The French people had little confidence in the future of a domain that promised only furs and wood, showed no traces of precious metals, and where the climate was as forbidding as its Indian inhabitants. It is likely that, owing to the antipathy against the Canadian enterprise prevailing at court, Canada would have been abandoned had not two pertinent reasons prevailed: one, the secret hope of checking the growing influence of England on the new continent, and of eventually annexing the English colonies in North America; the other, the misfortunes of war, which, in the end, went hand in hand, for while the Jesuits were true to their religious mission, they were none the less Frenchmen and patriotic. They soon discovered that the key to the political and military situation was in the hands of the Iroquois Indians, or Six Nations, and that the French mission in the Iroquois and their permanent friendship would eventually secure the balance of power. To induce the Iroquois to become Christians and thereby allies of France, the Jesuits spared no sacrifice, no martyrdom, no efforts. Had the rulers of France been as sagacious as those of Spain in the appreciation of the Jesuit missions, and had they adequately supported them, the outcome might have been favourable. But, while both countries were equally autocratic, the French government was as unsystematic and careless in Canada as the Spanish was careful and methodical in administering its American possessions. The few governors, like Frontenac, capable of controlling the situation were poorly assisted by the mother-country, and inefficiency too often alternated with good administration. Even military aid was sparingly granted at the most critical periods. It is true, however, that the moral and material decay of France, and the other exhausting wants of the French, may be attributed in part to this neglect. The result was the establishment in the French possessions of a sparse population, scattered over so vast a territory that communication was frequently interrupted. That population, with the exception of the inhabitants of the official centres at Quebec and Montreal, where social conditions were partly modelled on those of the motherland, was rude and uneducated by reason of its isolation, though individually hardy and energetic, and their dispersion throughout such a vast territory prevented joint effort. The missionaries had their hands too full, in attending to the Indian missions, to carry out adequately the desire of conquest and utilization. Moreover, from the nature of their occupations, were often compelled to lead an almost migratory life. Thanks to the efforts of a trader and of a Jesuit, the connection between the Lakes and the Mississippi was established in the latter part of the seventeenth century; after the hunting journals of French settlements in Louisiana and Illinois, the English colonies were encompassed by a semi-circle of French possessions. La Salle did for the mouth of the Mississippi River and part of Texas what Champlain had done for the mouth of the Saint Law-rence. Individual enterprise began to make sig-nificant the French in northern Mexico. The conduct of France in its North American dominions towards other European nations was of course guided largely by European political conditions, and the Canadians more than one cent of the other elements of international warfare. To a certain extent the French colonization of the Indian policy of Spain by utilizing the resources afforded by friendly Indian tribes, but these were always fickle and unstable. In the north, on the borders of the Arctic zone, the main element of stability—agriculture—played but a secondary rôle.

But in the Mississippi valley the balance of English supremacy against the French colonists should have proved an element of strength to the French in Canada, it turned to their disadvantage in the end. The incomparably more abundant resources of southern latitudes in a moist climate formed such a contrast with the cold, northern dominions of the English that the American colonists grew stronger. When Voltaire pronounced himself in favour of the Louisiana colony, a marked leaning to abandon Canada made itself manifest in France. The concentrated power of the English colonies, assisted by England's naval supremacy, rendered voluntary abandonment unnecessary.

IV. ENGLISH.—The methods of English colonization in America are so widely known, and its literature is so extensive, that the matter may here be treated with comparative brevity. While in the southern Atlantic States discoveries and settlements were made with the assent of the Crown, under its patronage and by enterprise members of the nobility, the northern sections, New England especially, were colonized through personal initiative. There was no desire for independence, though political, and especially religious, autonomy were the ideals of the Puritan colonists. That religious autonomy has usually been regarded as synonymous with religious liberty. But it took long years of struggle and experimenting before the latter became established in New England. The English system of colonial expansion depended much more on individual enterprise than the Spanish; but there was much less regard for authority unless the latter was represented by law. English colonization was more akin to the Portuguese in its commercial tendency, and superior to the French in the faculty of combining and organizing for a given purpose. Independence of character was an heirloom of northern origin in general, respect for law a specifically English trait. There is no trace of the influence of New England that has greatly contributed to the remarkable growth of the United States. The unparalleled rise and expansion of the United States was due chiefly to personal initiative in the beginning, that afterwards voluntarily submitted to the requirements of organization, and to a political and (subsequently) religious tolerance which opened the country to all outside elements thought to be beneficial. These features, however, were not so much due to the English as to the American character that developed after the North American colonies had achieved their independence, and the Northern element of the population. There was a marked contrast between the position assumed by the Catholic Church towards the Indians and the attitude of Protestantism. The former, as soon as the administration of the Spanish dominions in America began to assume a character of stability, instituted concerted efforts for the conversion and civilization of the Indians. The introduction of the printing-press in Mexico (about 1536) was brought about specially to promote Indian education. The clergy, particularly the regular orders (Franciscans, Dominicans, and others, and later on, on a still larger scale, the Jesuits), became not only teachers, but the protectors of the natives, and in the aim of the crown (in some instances with the crown) to preserve the Indian and defend him from the inevitable abuses of lesser officials and of settlers. Hence, in Spanish America the Indian has held his own more than anywhere else, and has come to be a moderately useful element.

V. THE NEGRO.—The negro has assimilated himself much better than the American aborigine to post-Columbian conditions. Though his condition of life was for centuries deplorable, and though we absolutely condemn slavery in every form, it cannot be denied that it was for the negro a useful school, in which he was slowly introduced to civilized life and became acquainted with ideas to which the Indian has remained a stranger. Of the negro republic, Hayti, we have already spoken. The complete emancipation of the coloured race in the United States has presented to the people of that country a problem which still awaits its solution.

THE WAR OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.—The emancipation of the American colonies from European control changed the political configuration of the continent, both north and south. Of the British possessions in North America as they existed in 1776 only the Dominion of Canada still belongs to the British crown. The other colonies have become the United States of America. Spanish America severed its connection with the mother-country and has been divided into the republic of Mexico, the Central American republics of Guatemala, Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Leon, and Panama; the republics of Hayti, the Antilles (the Antilles until Hayti revolted), Cuba, and the South American republics of Venezuela, Colombia, Brazil, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Paraguay, the Argentine, and Chile. Jamaica remains a British possession; Porto Rico is a possession of the United States. The Lesser Antilles still belong to the powers which owned them prior to 1776, namely: England, France, Holland, Denmark, and Sweden. On the continent, England possesses British Honduras and British Guiana; Holland, Dutch Guiana, or Surinam; and France, French Guiana or Cayenne. Changes like these in the political aspect of a continent might be expected to have considerable influence on the Church in the New World. The Catholic Church, which is so intimately related with the history of civilization in the New World. Nevertheless, the independence of the European colonies has not greatly affected the position of the Church in America. In the United States the Church has flourished under the republican form of government. In Spain and in the other Spanish American States the new conditions have affected the Church more markedly, and not always beneficially. The lack of stability in the political conditions of Spanish American States has so often influenced the deportment of their governments towards the Church that sometimes persecution has resulted, as in Mexico. Attempts to give to the Indian a chance under the new conditions have often been in vain.
teacher, the Church, but have also fostered a racial desire to return to primitive uncivilized conditions. Happily, the material development of many of these countries has counteracted these tendencies, and to a considerable extent holds them in check to-day. The problem is brought into contact with the American Indian, clergy into direct relations with the Holy See, and has proved greatly advantageous to religion. The regular orders, especially the Jesuits, have suffered in some Spanish American countries. In Mexico they have been officially suppressed, but such extreme measures last only as long as their authors retain power.

We have not sufficient data to determine the Catholic population of America. Even in the United States the number usually given, "about 14,000,000", is a conjecture more or less accurate. Spanish-American peoples are Catholic. At least as many as the Catholics. The same applies to the Indians, but the numbers of the aborigines are but very imperfectly ascertained. Still we shall probably not go far astray if we assume that nearly one-half of the population of America are Catholics at least in name. The United States of America alone contain fourteen archbishoprics, thirty-eight bishoprics, and more than 400 vicariates-Apostolic. The remainder of America divides into 150 dioceses, 54 of which are seats of metropolitans. There are to-day two American cardinals: James Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore (created in 1886), and Joaquim Arcoverde de Albuquerque, Cavalcanti, Archbishop of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil (created in 1906). (For the achievements of the famous Catholic missionaries and explorers in the New World, see articles under their respective names. The alleged pre-Columbian discovery is also treated in a separate article.)

Only general works on American ethnography and linguistics can be placed here. The literature on these subjects embodied in monographs finds place in the articles on Indian tribes, languages, and on the biographical articles. The generalization of special monographs initiated by the late Major Powell, under the title of Reports of the Bureau of Ethnology (Washington) now embraces some twenty-five volumes, and their contents are not restricted to North American topics. This collection should be carefully consulted. The Dominican friar Gregorio García presented more fully than any of his predecessors, and in the form of an inquiry into the origin of the first words of American ethnology with reference to linguistics. The first edition of the Diccionario de los Índios appeared at Madrid in 1607, and a second edition was published at Seville, in 1619, much enlarged. In the sixteenth century a number of works on cosmography contain notices of the manners and customs of the American aborigines, but they are scattered and written in a foreign hand (except on Spanish America). The compilations of López de Velasco from 1571-74, Geography and Descriptions (Madrid, 1616), was made on the basis of personal observation and is superficial. In the seventeenth century, the great work of J. de Ibarluz was published (1653), but printed only at the end of the past century is highly important for the ethnology of Spanish America; the book of D. Ovando, General Americana, is mostly controversial. The rare work of the Rabino Manasse ben Israel on the Aborigines of the New Continent is devoted to establishing the descent of the Indians from the Hebrews, and James Adam's History of the American Indians (London, 1775) even improves upon his Jewish predecessor, as does Bouhours, an Encyclopaedia of the Languages of the American Indians (London, 1816). While such books are dedicated to the expounding of a single point of view, a more extensive and reliable scattered data, and are not limited to specific tribes or regions. Systematic investigation of American ethnography and linguistics was carried on by Adémar (Paris 1724). It is to be seen that real progress could be made only by special research and a division of the whole field. So linguistics were separated from ethnography as early as the close of the eighteenth century. In 1773-82 Cout de Gérans published the Encyclopédie des Moeurs du Monde, Paris. About the same time the Abbé Hervy wrote the Flora Americana (21 volumes, Ceesena, 1778-81), the 22d volume of which contains a description of the American aborigines known at the time, philological dissection, polyglot vocabulary, ariatics (numerals), etc. Vater's Abhandlungen (1809-17) continued the work of Adémar by developing in 1806 under the same title. In 1815 he published also Linguarum totius orbis Index Alphabeticus (Berlin, 1847). In 1826, Adrien Balbi published Atlas Ethnographique du Globe (Paris, in which the known American languages are tabulated, as well as those not yet tabulated, but of a general character are: Worley's, A View of the American Indians (London, 1836); McCulloch, Jr., American Indian Languages (Philadelphia, 1836). With the rapid increase of missionary work, and the increasing power and influence of the Church in America, the American languages became more and more hazardous and monographic treatment of special subjects and groups are, therefore, being properly taken under the ethnography and folk-ethnography. Systematic study of this branch, including, of course, linguistics, was begun in the United States by limited to tribes or groups, and the work was thrown open with practical observation. Albert Gallatin, A Synopsis of the Indian Tribes within the United States, East of the Rocky Mountains and in the British and Spanish Provinces of North America (Cambridge, 1836) was the first to initiate this systematic study of the American ethnological Society, (New York, 1845 and 1846) contain the early results of the improved method of study at the work. Schoolcraft, especially the Historical and Statistical Information respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States (Philadelphia, 1861-65) extended the field. On Mexico, the work of Ovando y Berra, Geografía de las Lenguas y Curiosidades geográficas de México (Mexico, 1894) is the most comprehensive and general work extant. Alcide d'Orbigny, L'homme américain (Paris, 1839) has dealt with the Indians of the United States, and has been adopted by many other American ethnologists as a kind of Bible. The student of American ethnography, as a whole, is treated in but few works. Watzek, Anthropologie der Naturvölker der Erde (Berlin, 1877, 4th edition: English tr. London and New York, 1876); and Katzen, History of Mankind (English tr. London, 1866; 2nd English tr. 1898): Anthropogeographische Zeitschrift (Cottbus, 1853), show a lack of practical acquaintance with the countries and peoples they describe. The most important recent general works on the American aborigines are the works of Conscandographic and Affinity in the Human Family (Washington, 1880), Ancient Society (London, 1877), and Brincom, The American Race (New York, 1891). The student, as well as the general reader will do well, however, to check these comprehensive works with the current growing monographic literature on the various groups and tribes of American Indians.

America, Pre-Columbian Discovery of. Of all the alleged discoveries of America before the time of Columbus, only the bold voyages of exploration of the fearless Vikings to Greenland and the American mainland can be considered historically certain. Although there is an inherent probability for the fact of other pre-Columbian discoveries of America, all accounts of such discoveries (Phoenician, Irish, Welsh, etc.) rest on traditions of second or third hand (except on Phoenician), and are unable to justify a serious defence of them. For the oldest written evidence of the discovery of Greenland and America by the Northmen we are indebted to Adam, a canon of the Church of Bremen, who about 1087 went to Bremen where he devoted himself very rapidly to the study of history; and it is the work of the vigorous missionary activity of Archbishop Adalbert of Bremen (1043-72), this "Rome of the North" offered "the best field for such work, being the much frequented centre of the great northern missions, which were spread over Norway and Sweden, Iceland and Greenland. Moreover, Adam found a most trustworthy source of information in the Danish King, Sven Estrithson, who preserved in his memory, as though engraved, the entire history of the barbarians" (the northern peoples). Of the lands discovered by the Northmen in America, Adam mentions only Greenland and Vinland. The former he describes as an island in the northern ocean, and far from Norway as Iceland (five to seven days), and he expressly states that envys from Greenland and Iceland had come to Bremen to ask for preachers of the Gospel. The Archbishop granted their request, even giving the Greenlanders assurances of a speedy visit in person. Adam's information concerning Vinland was no less reliable because of his knowledge of Greenland. According to him the land took its name from the excellent wild grapes that abounded there. Grain also flourished there without cultivation, as King Sven and his subjects expressly assured him. Adam's testimony is of the highest importance to us, not only as being the oldest written account of Norse discoveries in America, but also because it is entirely independent of Icelandic writings, and rests directly on Norse traditions which were at the time still recent. The second witness is Ari Thorgilsson (d. 1148), the oldest and most trustworthy of all the historians of Iceland. Like Adam, Ari is conscientious in citing the sources of his information. His authority was his uncle, Thorkel Gelisson, who in turn was friend and companion of the discoverer himself. Hence from his uncle, Ari learned the name of the discoverer, the origin of the name of the country, the date of settlement, and other welcome details as to the degree of civilization among the people. He was the greatest writer of the adventures of the invaders, the Northmen. The discoverer was Eric the Red, who named the icy coast Greenland, to induce his Icelandic countrymen to colonize the land. As to the date, Ari learned that it was the fourteenth or fifteenth winter before the formal introduction of Christianity into Iceland (1000), i.e., 985 or 986. Ari's information with respect to the civilization of the earlier population of Greenland is of peculiar importance, giving as it does a glimpse of conditions in Vinland. Besides traces of human habitation, Eric and his companions found in Greenland the remains of leather canoes and stone implements. From this Ari concludes, "it may be inferred that was once the dwelling place of the same people who inhabited Vinland, and were called by the Greenlanders Skraelings." Ari in his "Book of Settlements" (Landnámabók), as well as in his "Book of Icelanders," goes into detail concerning the discovery and colonization of Greenland, but mentions the discovery of Vinland only incidentally in connection with the genealogy of the famous Icelandic merchant Thorfinn Karlsefni, who "found Vinland the Good." In the Kristni saga and Snorri's Kings' saga (c. 1150), the discovery of Vinland is attributed in almost identical words to Leif, son of Eric the Red. On his homeward journey from Norway, near Greenland, where he had been commissioned by King Olaf of Norway to preach the Catholic Faith, he found Vinland the Good. As Leif on the same voyage rescued some shipwrecked mariners from certain death, he was named the Lucky. It is quite significant that the name of the God, everywhere spoken of as of a country universally known and needing no further explanation.

These historical data were happily completed in the middle of the twelfth century by a geographer, probably Nicholas, Abbot of Thingeyre (d. 1159). According to his chart, Greenland is shown next is Markland, and from there it is not a great distance to Vinland the Good. Leif the Lucky first discovered Vinland and then coming upon merchants in peril of death, he rescued them by the grace of God. He introduced Christianity into Greenland, and it made such progress that a diocese was erected in Gardar. It may be remarked in passing that this took place about 1125. We also learn from the well-informed geographer that Thorfinn Karlsefni, setting out later to seek Vinland the Good, came to a country "where this land was supposed to be," but was unable to explore and colonize Vinland as he had wished. It should be noted that this geographer speaks of only two voyages to Vinland, the accidental discovery of Leif, and Thorfinn's voyage of exploration; also that in addition to Vinland he mentions two other lands lying to the south of Greenland, which he calls respectively Helluland and Markland. The accounts just quoted are the earliest historical records of the Norse discoveries in Greenland and America, and have been for the greater part overlooked by earlier scholars, even by Einarsson. They were first given prominence, and justly so, by Storm and Reves. Although containing but brief allusions to Vinland, they still bear evidence to a consistent unanimity throughout, and forthright back to the eleventh century and give us certain positive evidence that Eric the Red in 985 or 986 discovered and colonized Greenland, that his son Leif, returning from Norway to Greenland where he was to introduce Christianity, discovered Vinland the Good (1000), that Thorfinn Karlsefni later attempted the colonization of Vinland, but found it too wild and inhospitable to make it a home, and the natives was obliged to resist, that these daring voyages brought to light two other countries lying south of Greenland, Markland and Helluland. In addition to these earliest records, three sagas come up for consideration inasmuch as they give detailed accounts of the first or second voyage of the Old Norsemen or Vikings. If we consider the age of the MSS, through which it has come down to us (or that now represent for us the original), the most important of these sagas is the Karlsefni saga in "Hauk's Book" (1305-35); next King Olaf's saga in the Flatey-book (c. 1387); the third is the saga of Eric the Red in a MS. dating from the beginning of the fifteen century. A comparison of these three sagas shows that the Thorfinn Karlsefni saga agrees with the saga of Eric the Red in all important points, but differs substantially from the King Olaf saga as found in the Flatey-book. According to the first two sagas Vinland was discovered by Eric the Red in 985 or 986 on a voyage from Norway to fulfill the commission of King Olaf to preach Christianity in Greenland. According to the Olaf saga the glory of having discovered America belongs to Bjarni, son of Herjulf, who was believed to have discovered Vinland, Markland, and Helluland as early as 985 or 986 on a voyage from Iceland to Greenland. As already observed, the Olaf saga is directly opposed both to the account of the twelfth-century geographer, who distinctly states that Leif discovered Vinland, and to the Kristni and Snorri sagas containing the same statement, with the additional information that it was during a voyage from Norway to Greenland whither he had been sent by King Olaf to preach Christianity. Unfortunately the Olaf saga, preserved in MS. only in the Flatey-book, was first used to narrate the discovery of America by the Northmen. This saga represents the old Northmen sailing the Atlantic with a confidence to be envied, and the当事的 by the modern mariner. Of the many captains, the leaders of seven different expeditions finding, apparently without difficulty, the bulber (huts) of Leif. This uncritical narrative, to which reference is constantly made, has long helped to discredit the discovery of America by the Northmen. What a conviction of the reality of the sagas of Thorfinn Karlsefni and of Eric, the former of which is preserved in twenty-eight MSS. The first attempt to find Vinland after its accidental discovery by Leif failed utterly. The second and last result after many difficulties in the discovery of a land which from its products might be the Vinland of Leif, but no mention is made of Leif's bulber. The results of historical criticism have, accordingly, given precedence to the Thorfinn and Eric sagas, but it must not be overlooked that the Olaf saga mentions in addition three lands discovered to the south-west of Greenland, of which the first was stony, the second wooded, and the third rich in fishes. These were therefore respectively named respectively Helluland, Markland, and Vinland. The same saga also records a futile attempt to colonize Vinland. Taking as a basis the more detailed and historically trustworthy account given in the sagas of Thorfinn Karlsefni and of Eric the Red, the voyages to Vinland may be briefly summarized. In the year 999, Leif, son of Eric, the Red, set out from Greenland to Norway. His course, though too far to the south, at last brought Leif to his destination and he entered the service of Olaf Tryggvason, King of Norway. Having been con verted to Catholicism while at court, the daring marner was sent back to Greenland by Olaf in the year 1000 in order to co-operate with the priests of the expected mission in Greenland. In the second half of the journey Leif was cast on the shores of a hitherto unknown land where he found the vine and wheat in a natural state, besides masur wood suitable for building purposes. The sailors took with them samples of all these products. Steering north-east they at last reached Vinland. In the winter Leif and his brothers Thorstein and Thorgeir built a settlement at a place called Heirdal, i.e. stone land. Here a number of years passed before the home country heard from them. In 1021, Thorstein the Younger, thor Lawrence, geographical, historical, and philosophical works presented views like those of Torquemada (1703) in his "Historia de las Indias.

It is not a matter of surprise that men finally came to speak of a bishopric in Vinland and of the fruitful work of Bishop Eric as of facts established beyond doubt. In reply to such statements, emission must be laid on the fact that the sources say nothing about that Eric but speak only of the winter journey Leif and his companions passed in a region, which to his success, nor even reporting that he found Vinland again. Nevertheless, those who uphold the theory of a permanent colonization of Vinland urge numerous arguments in support of their position, many of which are long considered inconceivable, as for instance the Norman stone near Newport, Rhode Island. This, as a matter of fact, is merely the ruin of a windmill built by Governor Arnold (c. 1670). The Runic inscription on Dighton
Rock, so often misinterpreted, proves no more.
The inscription is merely Indian picture writing such as is freely found far to the south. In answer to the question what was the manner of Vinland, the Brotherhood of Sankt Thomas, or the Irish, or by St. Thomas the Apostle, or by Irish monks, or by the Northmen. This is clearly proved by the fact that the cross is found as a religious symbol among pre-Christian peoples. When opponents of this view point to the martyrdom of Bishop John of Ireland, the answer is that John (d. 1066) met his death not in Vinland the Good, but in the lands of the Wends as I have elsewhere proved from original historical sources. There is a twofold error in the statement that a valuable cup of Vinland masur wood is mentioned among the tithes of the diocese of Gardar dating from 1327. First, this (capita de nuce ultra-marina) was not part of the tithes of the Greenland diocese of Gardar, but of Skara, a Swedish diocese;
second, this goblet was not of masur but of cocoaanut.
Now are the arguments drawn from the amount and the character of the tithes levied in the diocese of Gardar for the Crusades more convincing. They are based on a computation of the value of the tithes at triple their real amounts, and partly on a mistaken conception of conditions in Greenland. As the sources testify and modern excavations have shown, the Northmen of Greenland, as well as their Icelandic cousins, were active cattle breeders, and raised horses, cattle, sheep, and goats, so that they might easily pay their tithes in calf-skins. And lastly, the story related by Zeno the Younger, of a fisherman having seen Latin books in the library of the King of Estotiland can no more be considered historical than the rest of Zeno's romance. It is a fiction, like the island of Estotiland itself and Plato's Atlantis. The fact that Eric was in Vinland in 1121, but trustworthy accounts of Markland extend to a later date. The Icelandic annals of 1347 have the following record: "There came a Greenland ship to Straumsfjord; the sail was set for Markland, but it was driven hither (Iceland) over the sea. There was a crew of eighteen men". The object of the voyage was mentioned, but the most probable conjecture is that the ship was bound for the forest land to obtain wood, in which Greenland was entirely deficient.
But whatever the unfortunate sailors sought on the shores of Markland, it is an undoubted fact that in the middle of the fourteenth century Markland had been forgotten by the Northern chroniclers. The story of two sinking vessels off the coast of Vinland; such are the meager statements found in
the Iceland annals. Lyschander, in his Greenland
chronicle, is the first to give a poetic expansion of this story (1609). He represents Bishop Eric as bringing "both emigrants and the Faith to Vinland. As Torquemada (1703) in his "Historia de las Indias.

story of two sinking vessels off the coast of Vinland; such are the meager statements found in

more important in legend and song, in which its situation changes at will. The Helluland of history lay to the west, the Greenland of the sagas and the geographical Helluland was located in north-eastern Greenland. To reconcile both views, Björn of Skårdaz devised his theory of two Hellulands, the greater in north-eastern Greenland and the smaller to the south-west of Greenland. Raín arbitrarily located greater Helluland in Labrador and the lesser island in Newfoundland. His scheme of the arbitrary decision to deny wide acceptance, and in this way the site of Vinland was laid unduly far to the south.

For the approximate determination of the geographical position of Helluland, Markland, and Vinland, we find many clues in the original historical sources. "Helluland" in Norse colonization, which is closer to Markland, from which the distance is not great to Vinland the Good which some believe to be an extension of Africa. If this be true, then an arm of the sea must separate Vinland and Markland". If we accept the rash conjecture as to Vinland's connection with Africa, this view of the old twelfth-century Icelandic geographer corresponds to the details of the historical sagas concerning the situation of these lands with respect to Greenland and one another. The sagas, however, contain other clues. A detail in the Olaf saga with regard to the position of the sun at the time of the winter solstice (formerly led many to believe that the period was over) should be definitely determined. As a matter of fact the statement that "on the shortest day of winter the sun was up between eyktastarð and dagmalaustarð" is too vague to permit an exact determination of the position. Only this may be deduced with certainty, that Vinland lay south of 49° north lat., a position that might easily be identified with the situation of central Newfoundland or the corresponding section of Canada. To determine with accuracy the position of Vinland, it must be recalled that the members of Thorfinn's great expedition were looking for the region where Leif had found the vine growing wild. With this purpose in view, they sailed along the coast of America, and discovered first a land which impressed them on account of its long flat stones. They called it Helluland. Taking into consideration the starting point of the voyage, its length and direction, one may well agree with recent historians that the present Labrador coast is the site of Vinland. The saga, without, however, absolutely denying the claims of the northern peninsula of Newfoundland. Setting out from Helluland, after two runs of twelve hours each, the daring mariners came to a land remarkable for its wealth of timber, which they reached "with the help of the north wind on the second or third day the wished-for result. Vinland the Good should therefore be located in the northern part of the vine belt, or almost 45° north lat. Nova Scotia (inclusive of Cape Breton Island) seems to satisfy best the requirements of the sagas. Wild grapes and Indian rice (stiznia aquatica), which is probably meant by the wild wheat of the Northmen, all growing in a natural state, are repeatedly mentioned by eyewitnesses as characteristic of Nova Scotia and the region about the Bay of St. Lawrence, e.g. by Jacques Cartier (1534) and Nicholas Denys (c. 1650). Thorfinn was prevented from settling Vinland by the onslaught of the Skraelings, but his grandchildren, the first encounter with these wild dark-skinned men, remarkable for their uncomely hair, large eyes, and high cheek bones. Opinions differ widely as to the ethnographic classification of these Skraelings, some maintaining that they were Eskimo, while others unhappily class them as Indians. The express mention of skin boats and the opening phase of the voyage indicate that the Markland Skraelings were most probably Eskimo, seems to support the theory that there were Eskimo in Vinland (Nova Scotia) at that period. They may have allied themselves with neighbouring Indians against the Norse invaders. A definitive determination of the position of Vinland, Markland, and Helluland definitely needs to be revisited, and the ruins, runic stones, or other ancient remains from the time of the Vikings. Unfortunately, in spite of the efforts of Horsford and other champions of the Northmen, such remains have not yet been found, and it is not unreasonable that those who deny a permanent Norse colonization lay stress on the absence of Norse remains to prove that Northmen did not succeed in establishing a permanent colony on the American mainland. The case is quite different with Greenland, where for some centuries there existed flourishing Norse colonies. Numerous ruins of churches, monasteries, and farm-buildings, together with miscellaneous remains, enable us to recognize clearly, even to-day, the position and character of the colonies of Greenland.

First as to the location of the colonies, ancient documents are unanimous in speaking of an eastern and a western colony, of which the first was by far the more important. The east, as the name seems to suggest, was formerly sought on the east coast of Greenland. Even after the researches of Grauh (1828-31) and Holm (1880-85), Nordenskjöld held fast to this view. It is true that even during his most successful journey of investigation (1883) did not find the ruins he expected on the eastern coast of Greenland, but this in no way shook his conviction. He simply declared that the old Norse settlements had disappeared, leaving no traces. As to the ruins, so plentiful on the western coast, which he himself had visited, he held that they did not date back to the ancient Northmen, but were of later origin. This dogmatic assertion shook the foundation of the view just then gaining ground, namely, that both eastern and western settlements were situated on the west coast of Greenland. What proof was there that the many ruins of Greenland, with or without remains in connection, owed their origin to the ancient Northmen? Was it right to ascribe the remarkably well preserved stone buildings to the Viking period, or did only the confused heaps of ruins belong to that time? The preliminary data for solving this question were furnished by Guðmundsson, a careful research into "the Church and Its Settlements in Iceland during the Saga Period". With the help of the original authorities, the Danish scholar Brunn and his learned collaborators were enabled to produce proof (1894) that the numerous ruins of Greenland in the neighbourhood of Julianehaab really dated from Norse times, and that in consequence the eastern settlement of the great migration was really located on the western coast of Greenland. Starting from these investigations, as thorough as they were interesting, Finnur Jónsson, a Dane, with the aid of the original sources, was able conclusively to reconstruct in all essential particulars the ancient topography of Greenland and represent it by means of a map. This chart of Jónsson's shows in the vicinity of Julianehaab the ruins of 117 churches and monasteries, large and small. The most remarkable are the episcopal See of Gardar and the manor of Eric the Red, renowned in the saga as the Brattahlid. The western settlement was situated within the limits of the present Godthaab, Greenland, as a matter of fact. Godthaab lies in 51° 30' west of Greenwich, while Julianehaab is approximately 49°. The less numerous ruins of the western district have not been thoroughly explored as yet but almost all their fjords have been Cattle raising and the chase caused the inhabitants to explore their icy country on all sides. To quote from the "King's Mirror" the people have been noted in various places, "on the highest rocks to obtain an extensive view, and see whether they could find a place free from ice and suitable for habitation. Such a region, however, could not be discovered, except those parts already built up which stretched a long distance along the coast. They found that small mountain ranges and the snow-covered valleys, were twelve in the eastern settlement, and four in the western. In a list dating from the year 1300 the number of the former remains unchanged, but the number of churches in the western colony, which had been previously overrun by the Eskimo, was reduced to three, and in Ivar's list (c. 1370) is given as one, that of Steinesis, for a time the seat of "a cathedral and an episcopal residence". This statement of Ivar has given rise to the inference that there were two dioceses in Greenland, Gardar and Steinesis. According to the conjecture of Torfæus, only Eric, the missionary bishop, who there were but two monasteries in Greenland, one of the Canons Regular of the Order of St. Augustine dedicated to Sts. Olaf and Augustine, and a convent of Benedictine nuns. The Dominican monastery fantastically described by Zeno the Younger (1538) never existed in Greenland. During the most flourishing period the number of manors in Greenland amounted to 280, 190 in the eastern and 90 in the western settlement. Assuming that each manor had an average of ten to fifteen inhabitants, we have a sum total of 2800-4200 souls, which is probably near the truth. Dwelling houses were not stable but built to the contour of the land and sea. Generally the buildings for horses, cows, sheep, and goats were not adjoining. The chief occupations of the inhabitants were cattle breeding and the chase. The Kjökkenmöddings which are often to be found to a height of over three feet in front of dwellings, prove that the ancient Northmen were fearless in the pursuit of large game. In these heaps of bones and ashes, the greater part of the remains are those of seals. There are traces of the following domestic animals: a species of small horned cattle (bos taurus), goats (capra hircus), sheep (ovis aries), small horses (equus caballus) and well-developed dogs (canis familiaris). Of the seals native to Greenland, the harp seals show traces of the polar bear (ursus maritimus), the walrus (trichechus rosmarus), three species of seal (erignathus barbarus, phoca vitulina, and phoca jacta) and especially the hooded seal (cystophora cristata). It is not surprising then that the cruise tax levied on the inhabitants of Greenland, who had no currency, consisted of cattle hides, seal skins, and the teeth of whales. Gronlandia decima was termed in a letter of Pope Martin IV to the Archbishop of Trondheim (4 March, 1282): "Non percipitur nisi in bovinum et phocaenum corum ac dentibus et finibus basilicae." In a passage accorded with this is Ivar Bardson's emphatic mention, not only of the white bears and white falcons found everywhere in great abundance, but more particularly of the herds of cows, sheep, and goats, which were, next to the fisheries, the Greenlanders' principal source of income.
and thirteenth centuries. On one of these voyages of exploration in 1194 they reached Svalbard or Svalbarbi. According to Storm’s investigations this island is thought to be Jan Mayen or Spitzbergen. Almost a hundred years later (1285) two priests, sons of Helge, named Aldibrand and Thorvald, discovered Iceland in the year 1100. The correct map of Iceland is found in the great wall chart of the world (1507), “America’s certificate of baptism.”

The representations of Greenland were used by Martin Waldseemüller. The erroneous map of Nicholas Germanus he borrowed from the Ulm edition of Ptolemy, which is based on the Wolfegg parchment MS. of Ptolemy, and presented it in his great wall chart of the world (1507), “America’s certificate of baptism.” The correct map of Iceland is found in the great wall chart of the world (1507), “America’s certificate of baptism.”

The first scholar who inserted the daring Norse discoveries in America in Ptolemy’s map of the world was Claudius Clavus Niger (Swart), a Dane, who left two maps and two geographical descriptions of the northern countries of Europe in which Greenland appears as a peninsula of the continent. The first chart with subjoined description is preserved in the precious MS. of the Archduke Ferdinand (1427), in the city library of Nancy in France. In this MS. the learned cardinal expressly says of the eighth chart of Europe: “Ptolemy makes no mention of these lands (Norway, Sweden, and Greenland) and he seems to have had no knowledge of them. Hence a certain Claudius Cymbrius has described these northern parts, and represented them in charts.” This precious cartographic treasure has been preserved only in the Ptolemy codex of Nancy. Both chart and description have long been known and often reproduced.

As Claudius Clavus used the names of the runes to designate places in Iceland and the ordinal numerals, fursta, (the first), etc., on the map of Eastern Europe, so for Greenland he made use of the words of the runic alphabet, i.e. the word "esynh (a) mank (man) etc., to designate the succession of promontories and rivers which seemed to him most worthy of note. From Claudius Clavus the strange names were adopted by the cartographers Nicholas Germanus and Henricus Martellus. While Nicholas Germanus in his first copies retained the correct names of Iceland, in his second copy (1489), the Scandinavian peninsula, in his later works he transferred Greenland to the Scandinavian peninsula and east of Iceland. On his small charts of the world he completed Ptolemy’s map by first giving to Greenland its correct position, but afterwards he placed it in northern Europe and located north of Greenland the insula glacialis or insula glacies (Iceland). Both fields which covered the mare congelatum. So men arrived at the conviction that there existed a land connection between Greenland and Bjarmeland or north-western Russia. Being uninhabited, this was called Ubygdcar or the "uninhabited land". Accordingly Bjarmeland is described as follows in the above-mentioned geographical description of the time: "Ubygdcar lies south of the Unalaska island, as far north as Greenland". A similar statement occurs in a thirteenth-century account: "To the north of Norway is Finnmarken whence the land extends north-east and east as far as Bjarmeland which is tributary to the Russian king. From Bjarmeland the land extends southward through the borders of Greenland". Finally the author of the "Historia Norwegiae" (thirteenth century) sums up what was known of Greenland in the following noteworthy sentences: "Some sailors wishing to return from Iceland to Norway were driven by adverse winds into the island and regions. At last they landed between Greenland and Bjarmeland in a country which, according to their report, has men of remarkable size, and in the land of the virgins who conceived by drinking water. Greenland is separated from them by rocks covered with ice; it was discovered, colonized, and converted to the Catholic faith by men; it is surrounded by isles of the south, and extends almost to the African islands". These words and others of similar import account both for the correct representation of Claudius Clavus who himself visited Greenland, as well as the faulty map of Nicholas Germanus who pursued his geographical and cartographical studies in Florence about 1470. The recollection of Greenland was kept alive by charts and geographical descriptions even at the time when all communication with the Norse colonies had been broken off. The eighteen sailors who were driven in 1347 from Markland to Iceland proceeded, according to Icelandic records, across Norway to Greenland. There seems at that time to have been no longer any direct communication between Iceland and Greenland. Intercourse was still kept up between Bergen and Greenland by the royal merchantman, the "Knorr", but only at irregular intervals. In the year 1346, according to Icelandic annals, the "Knorr" was laden with land "laden with a rich cargo," returned to Bergen from Greenland, which from 1261 had been like Iceland under Norwegian rule. Not until 1355 did the vessel undertake its next voyage to Greenland. For this journey extraordinary provisions were made and a fortune fitted out. The undertaking is said to have been the "preservation of Christianity" in Greenland which could only be attained by means of a conflict with the Skraelings (Eskimo). It cannot be exactly ascertained when the "Knorr" returned, but it was probably about 1363 or 1364, as about this time Ivar Bardsson who for many years administered the diocese of Gardar, makes his appearance in Norway.

We can gather from the original sources how the Northmen had gradually to retire before the advancing Eskimo. The first collision took place, according to the "Historia Norwegiae" (thirteenth century) in north Greenland. The "Thalbitzer" (i.e. Tholbitzer) reads as follows in literal translation: "Beyond the Greenlanders toward the north the hunters came across a kind of people called the Skraelings; when they are wounded alive their wounds become white, without any issue of blood, but the bloody wounds cease to smoulder when they are dead. They have no iron whatever and use whale teeth for missile weapons, and sharp stones for knives". In the chart of Claudius Clavus (1427), according to we find the Careli, in the extreme north of Greenland, and the accompanying description is as follows: "Tentem autem septentrionalis eius (Gronlandiae) Careli infeudes, quoquorum regio extenditur sub pole septentrionalis versus Seres orientales, quae polus [polar circle] nobis septentrionalis est eis meridionalis [in] gradibus 66°" (The north of Greenland is occupied by the pagan Careli whose country extends from the North Pole toward the eastern Seres; therefore the northern polar circle is to us south, to them north; at 66 degrees south). It is interesting to know that in this very part of Greenland near the Umanak fjord, there now exist a tradition among the Eskimo concerning a battle on the ice between Eskimo and Northmen. The Northmen were the attacking party, but the Eskimo were victorious. Thus Tholbitzer says. From the passage of Tholbitzer and Rink (Eskimoske Eventyr og Saga, Copenhagen, 1866): "The Normen had pursued some little girls who had been out to fetch water. These girls came running home and shouted 'they are attacking us'. The Greenlanders fled and hid themselves between the heaps of stones, yet the Normen managed to get hold of some of them and maltreated them. The Greenlanders, however, by means of artifice, lured their enemies out on the slippery fjord ice, where they could not stand firmly, and thus the Skraelings succeeded in overcoming them one at a time and killed them all". In the course of the fourteenth century the DELS (Danebrog) moved farther southward. About 1396 the western colony fell into their hands. Ivar Bardsson, an eye-witness, related how, under commission of the royal governor, he had taken part in an expedition to drive the Eskimo from the western settlement. But no human being either Christian or heathen was found. Cattle and sheep ran wild. Having put them on shipboard they returned home (Gardar). In 1397 the Icelandic annals report a new attack: The Skraelings assailed the Greenlanders, killing eighteen men, capturing and enslaving two boys. Undoubtedly the many wrecks which took place at this time hampered the catastrophe. The government ship went down north of Bergen. Moreover in 1392 "a great plague" visited the whole of Norway. In 1393 Bergen was conquered and pillaged by the Germans who took with them all ships and anchors. After this we hear of no more voyages of the "Knorr" to Greenland. The last record of Greenland under Norwegian rule dates from 1406. The first ship which appears under the name of a foreign vessel in Greenland is found under the date 1406. It was not till four years later that the ship which had been driven by storms to Greenland reached Norway. To the same period belongs a marriage certificate given 19 April, 1409, by a priest of Gardar to a pagan; the purpose of this marriage must have been the conversion of the pagans. According to the letter of Pope Nicholas V (c. 1448) to the bishops of Iceland, the Christians of Greenland were attacked by the heathens of the neighbouring coasts, and the country was laid waste with fire and sword, but all persons who were fit to become priests were made captives. The approximate date of the invasion is obtained by the mention of "thirty years ago" (1418). The efforts of Nicholas V were unfortunately without success, as appears from the letter of Alexander VI dated in the first year of his pontificate (1492-93). The inhabitants were deprived of religious assistance; there was no longer either bishop or priest and a great part of the population returned to paganism. Those who remained true to the Faith possessed as a memorial of Catholic times only the corporal on which a hundred years before the Lord's Body had been consecrated by the last priest of them who had been pagan. Once a year this corporal was exposed for generation. The date "forty years ago" is not entirely accurate, even if we agree with Storm in taking the last priest to mean the last resident bishop. The statement that "for eighty years no [European] ship had landed on the coasts of Greenland" is not positively made. Björnabo and Petersen inform us of a journey to Greenland hitherto unknown. In the text intended to accompany his second map of Greenland Clavus expressly states: "Grolandie insule chersonesus demonstrat a terrâ inaccessiblei a parte septentrionis vel ignota propter glaciem. Venit enim maiori africani in Grolandia capio ex exercitu quod habesque dubio ex altera parte poli septentrionalis". (The peninsula of the island of Greenland projects from a land inaccessible to the North or unknown on account of the ice. However, the pagan Careli, as I have witnessed, invade Greenland every day with a numerous army and leave no part of the island uninhabited, excepting that of the polar circle.) Clavus, therefore, seems to have been one eye-witness of the last hostile attacks which finally resulted in the destruction of the eastern settlement, which was the last Norse colony in America. It is true that many attempts were still made to connect Alaska with the Norsemen, particularly by the predecessor of the last Catholic Archbishop of Trondhjem, Eric Walkerdorf (d. 1522), but all came to naught. So the last descendants of the old Vikings were left to their own resources and were gradually absorbed by native Eskimo population.

American College, THE, IN ROMÊ.-The American College in Rome, or to give the legal title, "The American College of the Roman Catholic Church of the United States, Rome, Italy", owes its existence chiefly to Archbishop Hughes, of New York, and Archbishop Kenrick of Baltimore, who were the most conspicuous supporters of Pius IX in founding Rome. To see this institution which has done so much for the half-a-century of it's existence to preserve the traditions and maintain unity between the See of Peter and the Church in the United States. When a number of American bishops went to Rome in 1854 to be present at the proclamation of the Dogma of the Immaculate Conception, they expressed to Pius IX the desire to found an American college established that should take rank with the other national colleges in that city. Bishop Michael O'Connor, of Pittsburgh, an alumnus of the Propaganda, seconded the efforts of the leading prelates already mentioned, and specially pressed the matter on the attention of the Pontiff. In his reply to the letter of the then archbishop of New York, the Propaganda, the First Provincial Council of New York, Pius IX proposed the establishment of a North American College in Rome. Archbishop Hughes, who had long fostered this idea, immediately wrote to the other archbishops of the United States and to his suffragans, extolling the Pope's design and asking their advice as to the best method of putting it into execution, and obtaining the necessary means to support the college when established. In the Eighth Provincial Council of Baltimore held from May 6 to May 16, 1855, it was resolved to appoint a committee of three bishops to report on the subject of the American College. Bishop O'Connor, of Pittsburg, Bishop Neumann, of Philadelphia and Dr. Lynch, Administrator of Charleston, were appointed. It was subsequently agreed that the Pope should be asked to select three bishops as a committee to carry out the idea; that the Archbishop of Baltimore should act as promoter of the project, and that an experienced clergyman should be sent to Rome to make the necessary preparations. Pius IX became so interested in the project that he offered to purchase and present a suitable building for the purpose, while the American bishops would furnish it and procure the funds necessary for its establishment. In 1857, the Pope bought for $42,000, the old Visitations Convent of the Umiltà, then occupied by soldiers of the French garrison in Rome. The free use of it in perpetuity was accorded to the American bishops. By reason of its military occupation the building was in bad condition. On 12 December, 1858, the Archbishop of New York ordered a general collection in all the churches of his diocese to procure funds for the necessary repairs and for the furnishing of the college. The people were most generous in their contributions, and the other American archbishops and bishops co-operated so liberally that in a short time the sum of nearly $50,000 was collected. Repairs were immediately begun on the building, and in the year following it was fit for occupancy. On the 8th of December, 1859, the college was formally opened with thirteen students who had for some time been waiting in the College of the Propaganda, for this event. On the first day of the term, the Rev. Monsignor Bedini, Secretary of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda, consecrated the marble altar of the college chapel, and on the twelfth of the same month the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, to whom one of the side altars is dedicated, he celebrated Pontifical Mass in the college church. On the feast of St. Francis de Sales, 29 January, 1860, Pius IX visited the college. To commemorate this event, a tablet bearing the following inscription was put up: "On January 29, 1860, the feast of St. Francis de Sales, Pius IX, the Supreme Pontiff, father and founder of the American College, said Mass in this building, of the alumni with their families, for the special intentions of the college, and designed to give audience to all". His Holiness was assisted on the occasion by Bishop David Bacon, of Portland, Maine, and by Monsignor Goss, of Liverpool. The Rev. Bernard Smith, O.S.B., professor in the Propaganda College, and afterwards an abbot, was chosen by Pius IX to preside temporarily over the Propaganda College until his own consecration. On his appointment, in March, 1860, of the Rev. William George McCloskey, who was then an assistant at the Church of the Nativity, New York City, and later Bishop of Louisville. During the administration of Father McCloskey the college flourished, the number of students increasing rapidly from thirteen to fifty, of whom six came from New York, four from Newark, two from Brooklyn, five from Philadelphia, and the remainder from the New England States, the South, and the West. The first ordination of an alumnus to the priesthood was on the 14th of June, 1862, in the Church of St. John Lateran, by Cardinal Patrizi. The finances of the college were not, however, on a sound basis; the rector, therefore, in 1868, appealed to the American bishops in session at the second Plenary Council of Baltimore. The appeal was successful, for Archbishop Spalding, who as Delegate of the Holy See, convoked and presided at the Council, in his letter promulgating its decrees, commended the college to the good will of the bishops. In consequence, the Rev. George H. Doane, a clergyman and treasurer of the Diocese of Newark, was appointed as assistant to the rector for the purpose of Newburgh to collect funds for the college. After making a tour of the country, he succeeded in collecting $150,000, which at once placed the college on an excellent financial footing.

During the Vatican Council, the American prelates in Rome decided that the property of the college should remain in the hands of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda. With regard to the bursars or scholarships founded, it was agreed that when they were vacant, one-half of the proceeds should go to the college and the other half to the diocese to which the benefactors belonged. However, thirty-five bursars were founded in the college. The Rev. Dr. McCloskey was made Bishop of Louisville, Kentucky, in 1868, and was succeeded by the Rev. Dr. Francis Silas Chatard, who remained rector until 12 May, 1878, when he was consecrated Bishop of Vincennes, Indiana. The Rev. Dr. Louis Hostetler, rector of the college, succeeded Dr. Chatard, and remained in office till his death, 1 February, 1884. Then for a time the Rev. Dr. Augustin J. Schulte governed the college, until the election of the Rev. Dennis J. O'Connell, D.D., now Rector of the Catholic University at Washington. He resigned in July, 1885, and was succeeded by the Rev. William H. O'Connell, D.D., who became Bishop of Portland, Maine, in 1901. The Right Rev. Monsignor Thomas F. Kennedy, of Philadelphia, succeeded him. Under Dr. Kennedy's rectorship property adjoining the college was purchased, in November, 1903, at a cost of $20,000. In 1906, at a cost of $25,000, the Villa Santa Catarina, at Castel Gandolfo, as a summer residence for the students. At the present time (May, 1906) their number is one hundred and fifteen, the largest number the college has ever had. The college has an Alumni Association in the United States, and two hundred and seventy-five members, out of four hundred and fifty students who have been ordained priests in the college. This association made a contribution of $25,000 to the fund for the recent acquisition of new property by the college. Besides the late Archbishop Corrigan, of New York, the following American prelates, who are still living, studied theology in the college: Archbishop Farley, of New York; McWeeney, of Cincinnati; O'Connell, of Boston; Bishops Richter, of Grand Rapids; Burke, of St. Joseph, Mo.; Horstmann, of Cleveland; McDonnell, of Brooklyn; Hoban of Scranton; Ronan of Jaro; P. I.; Dowling of Nueva Segovia; P. I.; Morris, Coadjutor, of Little Rock. Archbishop Riordan, of San Francisco, and Archbishop Seton, as well as Bishops Byrne, of Nashville, Kelley, of Savannah. O'Connor, of Newark, N. J., and Northrup, of Charleston, S. C., are partially indebted to this institution for their training. By his bull of 20 October, 1884, Leo XIII raised the American College to the rank of a Pontifical College. The administration of the college is controlled by a board composed of the archbishops of Baltimore, Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. Its internal management and discipline are entrusted to the rector, who is assisted by the vice-rector and by the spiritual director. The students attend the lectures, and are subject to the academic regulations, of the Urban College of Propaganda. The curriculum of the last-named institution comprises a two-years' course in philosophy and a four-years' course in theology. Supplementary courses are given at the American College on the subjects treated in Propaganda.

The most interesting incident in the history of the American College was the attempt of the Italian government, after the taking of Rome, to seize the college property. Italian statutes of 15 August, 1866, and of 7 July, 1867, confiscated to the State property of religious corporation. An Act of Law of 1873 applied the general law to the City of Rome. The Propaganda had for ten years contended in the courts that these laws did not apply to its property; but the highest Italian court on the 29th of January, 1884, decided the case in favour of the State. Cardinal McCloskey and Archbishop Corrigan, his coadjutor, wrote a joint letter on the 3d of March, 1884, to the President of the United States, Chester A. Arthur, begging him to "ask the King of Italy for a stay of proceedings, if it be not possible further to exempt the institution as virtually American property from the Italian law," and the Bishop Corrigan, who, for a long time, was secretary of the board of bishops, having charge of the affairs of the American College, sent special letters to the Secretary of State, Mr. Frelinghuysen, who wrote on the 6th of March, 1884, to Mr. Astor, the American Minister at Rome, urging him to use his influence with the Italian government to save the college property because "although technically the American College is held by the Propaganda, it is virtually American property, and its reduction would be attended with the sacrifice of interests almost exclusively American." The efforts of President Arthur, Secretary Frelinghuysen, and Mr. Astor, suggested and urged by the cardinal and his coadjutor, saved the college; and on the 28th of March, 1884, Mr. Astor sent a telegram from Rome, announcing that the college had been exempted from the effect of the Italian statutes of confiscation. A report compiled from documents given to the rector by the late Archbishop Corrigan. See also Annual Reports of the Alumni Association.

HENRY A. BRAIN.

American College, The, at Louvain, an institution for the education of priests. Its official title is "The American College of Pontifician Students of the Blessed Virgin Mary." It was founded in 1857, with the cordial support of the Belgian hierarchy, by two American bishops, the Rt. Rev. M. J. Spalding, then Bishop of Louisville, Ky., later Archbishop of Baltimore, and the Rt. Rev. F. P. Lefevre, Administrator of the Diocese of Detroit, Mich. Its purpose was, on the one hand, to enable American-born students to pursue thorough courses of theology in Europe, while familiarizing themselves with the languages, usages, and customs of the Old World; on the other hand, to afford young men of various European nationalities an easy means of preparation for the work of the ministry in America, thus presenting to the bishops an opportunity of adopting well-trained subjects for their several dioceses. Originally, the college was established only for the instruction of students in elementary and advanced theology. They were supposed to have studied philosophy, either in America or in one of the preparatory seminaries of the United States. The curriculum was later extended to what is now the two-years' course in philosophy. In 1896, a faculty of philosophy was organized providing a two-years' course for students who have successfully completed their classical studies.

initiative in establishing the college, its field of action has by no means been confined to their two dioceses. The co-operation of all the dioceses of the United States has been requested, and several ecclesiastical persons in Britain and elsewhere have taken part in the work. These include the Archdiocese of Victoria, B. C., with the suffragan see of New Westminster, and the Archdiocese of Port of Spain, Trinidad, with the suffragan see of Roseau. Among the American bishops who enjoy special rights in connexion with the college and who have contributed to its fund the sum of $1,000, becoming thereby Patrons of the College. To them the constitutions approved by the Holy See in 1895 accord precedence in the matter of sending students to the college, as also in the adoption of its graduates for their dioceses. In the event of the college being closed, they would have certain claims upon its property. The patronal dioceses are at present seventeen in number: Detroit, Louisville, Natchez, Oregon City, Baltimore, Nesqually, Victoria, B. C., Hartford, Buffalo, Port of Spain, New Orleans, Richmond, Newark, Leavenworth, Helena, Belleville, and Tucson. It would be difficult to set a valuation upon the interest held at present by the college. It may, however, be safely stated that since its foundation $110,000 has been expended in the purchase of ground and in the erection of buildings which provide ample accommodation for 150 students. As it was found impossible for the bishops to exercise permanent and effectual control of the college by their collective action, the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore resolved to appoint a committee of three bishops duly qualified to represent the American hierarchy in the management of the college. The members of the committee are at present the Right Rev. C. P. Maes (Covington), Chairman; Most Rev. P. W. Riordan (San Francisco); Right Rev. J. L. Spalding (Peoria). The rector of the college is also subject, as regards both spiritual and temporal administration, to the Congregation of Propaganda. This Congregation appoints the rector on the recommendation of the committee of the bishops and after consultation with the college faculty; and gives him ample authority in the matter of ordaining students. His annual report on the condition of the college must be sent to Propaganda as well as to the committee of bishops.

As to the courses followed by the students, that of advanced theology has been taken, from the first, by students sufficiently well trained to try for the degrees given at Louvain. Of these, Bishop Riordan and Bishop Spalding were made licentiates of theology in 1865 and 1866. Most of the students, however, take the elementary course of theology which, until 1877, was given, partly at the Catholic University and partly at the college, by professors appointed by the rector. The course having been abolished at the university in 1877, the students were allowed to follow the lectures given by the Jesuit Fathers on such subjects as were not treated in the college, namely, moral theology (in part), and Holy Scripture. In 1888 the Belgian hierarchy, at the request of the committee of American bishops, established a full course of elementary theology at the university, which is now followed by the students of the American College, and by those of various other seminaries and religious communities. Certain branches, how ever, as pastoral theology, liturgy, sacred eloquence, and modern languages, are taught at the college by professors belonging to the institution.

From its foundation to the present day, the college has given four archbishops to the hierarchy of the Church: Charles John Seghers (Oregon City), d. 1886; Fr. J. J. O’Connor (Newark); B. Riordan (San Francisco); B. Orth (Victoria, B. C.); and eleven bishops, namely: A. Junger (Nesqually), d. 1895; J. Lemmens (Vancouver Island), d. 1897; J. B. Brondel (Helena), d. 1903; A. J. Glorieux (Boise); C. P. Maes (Covington); J. L. Spalding (Peoria); A. Van de Vyve (Richmond); T. Meerschaert (Oklahoma); J. J. O’Connor (Newark); Wm. Stang (Fall River); Joseph J. Fox (Green Bay). It has sent 661 priests to America, 506 of whom are living and who are distributed as follows in the various provinces: Baltimore, 25; Boston, 35; Chicago, 69; Cincinnati, 122; Dubuque, 19; Milwaukee, 31; New Orleans, 65; New York, 61; Oregon City, 68; Philadelphia, 25; St. Louis, 74; St. Paul, 20; San Francisco, 4; Santa Fè, 23; Victoria, B. C., 16; Port of Spain, 4. There were 72 students entered on the rolls of the college in 1906; 62 in advanced or elementary theology, and 10 in philosophy.

The college has had four rectors since its inception, namely: the Very Rev. P. Kindekens, 1857-60; the Right Rev. Monsignor J. De Neve, 1860-91; the Right Rev. Monsignor Willemsen, who held the office from 1891 to 1898, when the present incumbent, the Very Rev. J. De Becker, assumed the charge. During the ill health of Monsignor De Neve the Right Rev. Monsignor Dumont acted as pro-rector from 1871 to 1873, and the Rev. J. Pulsers from 1873 to 1881. Moreover, since the approval of the constitution of the college by the Holy See in 1895, the exact definition of the duties of a vice-rector, this office has been held, first, by the Very Rev. Wm. Stang, D.D. (1891-92); now Bishop Wm. Stang, Fall River, and by the Rev. P. Masson, who is also professor of pastoral theology, liturgy, and sacred eloquence. There are 21 professors who give, at the University and at the College, the lectures attended by all, or some of the students.

J. A. M. DE BECKER.

—The Rev. Ignatius Victor Eyzaguire, after having spent many years in Chile, his native country, in different works for the salvation of souls, went to Rome, in 1857, and proposed to the Pope the erection of a college for students, from “Latin” American countries, i. e. where the Spanish and Portuguese languages are spoken. Pius IX, who had been Apostolic Delegate in Chile, granted letters of approbation, and urged the bishops to send students and to help the foundation by procuring funds for the maintenance of the seminary. Father Eyzaguire went back to South America, collected some money, and returned to Rome with a few students. He rented a small house for these students and some others who arrived later. They were fifteen in all. Pius IX ordered the Fathers of the Society of Jesus to direct the new college, and they opened the college on 21 November, 1858. In December, 1859, Pius IX helped to purchase a larger house, belonging to the Dominicans, near their Church of the Minerva. He also bought with his own money a villa and a vineyard for the use of the college, and made Monsignor Eyzaguirre protonotary-apostolic. Towards the beginning of 1860 he sent this prelate back to South America as delegate of the Holy See, to urge the bishops again to co-operate on a larger scale in providing the necessary means for the support of the college. At the same time he himself contributed a large sum of money to the new house. During the year 1864 Pius IX sent to the college a great variety of books from his own private library, ordered a new chapel to be erected at his own expense, and furnished it with magnificent vestments, and on 13th November, the 20th anniversary of its foundation, visited the college in person. For all this and many other favours he is considered the principal, if not the first, founder of the South American College. The number of students continually increasing, the superiors had to look for another dwelling. Through the assistance of His Eminence Cardinal Sacconi, protector of the college, part of the old novitiate of the Jesuits, on the Quirinal, which since the year 1848 had been used for a French military hospital, was secured, the house near the Minerva sold, and the new residence opened on 14th April 1867, through the aid of St. Joseph, to whom the college had been dedicated. As the centenary of the martyrdom of Sts. Peter and Paul occurred in this year, many South American bishops visiting Rome brought new students, and the number reached fifty-nine. After the festivities of the centenary Pius IX, almost unannounced, went to the new college, assisted at an "academy", and allowed his name to be added to its legal title, making it "Collegio Pio-LatinoAmericano". In 1870 the bishops attending the Vatican Council increased the number of students to eighty-two. In 1871, the Italian government having expelled the Jesuits from the small part of the novitiate they occupied, acceded to the request of the Brazilian Emperor and permitted the South American College to remain where it was until a suitable house should be found. The new rector, the Rev. Agostino Santinelli, S.J., bought a new site, a palace di Conte, from the Marquis Carafa, near and near the Tiber. The foundation stone was blessed on 29 June, 1884, by the protector, Cardinal Sacconi, in presence of a large assembly, among whom was the Most Rev. Father Peter Beckx, General of the Society of Jesus, then living in the Antwerp House. The work of building began immediately, and Father Santinelli, putting in execution the plans for a grand college he had fostered for very many years, saw the splendid building finished in 1887–88. During this last year the new house received ninety students, but it can accommodate more than 150. It has a splendid chapel, an assembly hall with a capacity for 400 persons, a very spacious dining room for the students, and several small apartments for American bishops visiting Rome. It was there that the first General Council of Latin America (23 May—9 July, 1899) was held. There were present fifty-three prelates, archbishops, and bishops, of whom twenty-nine took up their quarters in the college, together with their secretaries and servants. The solemn opening took place in the college chapel, and all the sessions were held there. In the same chapel on 26 March, 1905, the Cardinal Protector, Joseph C. Vives y Tuto, solemnly proclaimed the Apostolic Constitution "Sedis Apostolicae PROVIDENTIAE", by which the title of "Pontific"! to the college and committed its direction in perpetuum to the Society of Jesus. This constitution, which had been solicited by the bishops during the council, and promised by Leo XIII, has been completed and given by Pius X; it fixes the fundamental rules of the college already tested by so many years of experience, and on this account it is recognised as the Bull of foundation of the college. There were 104 alumni present at the ceremony besides many others; the Very Rev. Aloysius Caterini, S.J., Provincial of the Roman Province, accepted the charge in the name of the college. The bishop of the northern district of Brazil was present. The college, during its existence of nearly fifty years, has seen twenty-five of its former students made archbishops or bishops in their native countries, besides many others created doctors in philosophy, theology, and canon law. The influence of all these on the development of religion has been immense. A member of the college, the first ecclesiastical university in Latin America, have taken their professors exclusively from the alumni of the college. Finally, in 1906, the high tribute of esteem was paid the college by the Holy See, in the choice, from amongst the students formed within its walls, of the first cardinal of Latin America: Monsignor Jean-Baptiste de Albuquerque-Cavalcanti, Archbishop of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. American Protective Association
The American Protective Association, or, as it was usually known, "the P. A. A."., was a secret and exclusive society in the United States, which became a disturbing factor in most of the Northern States during the period 1891–97. Its purpose was indicated clearly enough by its open activity in arranging lectures by "ex-priests", distributing anti-Catholic literature and opposing the election of Catholics to public offices. Of the A. P. A. rules and obligations there was frequent publication during the years 1893–94, now divulged by spies, and now admitted by ex-members. What purports to be a full exhibit of these oaths may be found in the "Congressional Record", 31 October, 1893, in the petition of H. Y. Youmans for the unseating of Representative-in-Congress William S. Linton. These oaths bound members "at all times to endeavour to place the political positions of this government in the hands of Protestants to the entire exclusion of the Roman Catholics" etc. The first Council of the A. P. A. was established 15th March, 1893, in St. Louis. The person who was Henry F. Bowers, a lawyer of that town, a Marylander by birth, and then in his sixtieth year. The order seems to have spread slowly. Its first outbreak in local politics occurred in 1891 at Omaha, Neb., where it endorsed the Republican ticket and swept the town (before Democratic) by a large majority. Thus, the A. P. A. seems to have moved down the Missouri river from Omaha. In Missouri, Kansas City was its first conspicuous base. After the fall election of 1892, a delegation representing the A. P. A. of Kansas City asked Governor-elect Stone to black-list all Catholics when making appointments. "Your association," replied Governor Stone, "is inextricably and un-American, and I am opposed to it. I haven't a drop of Know-Nothing blood in my veins". The following cities are among the more important which were generally regarded as under A. P. A. political dominance during all, or a portion, of the period of 1893–96: Omaha, Kansas City, Rockford (Ill.), Toledo, Duluth, Saginaw, Shreveport; in addition, to some extent, Detroit, St. Louis, and Denver. In New York its principal activity was at Buffalo and Rochester. Pennsylvania (where the so-called patriotic societies were numerous), Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island were also overrun typically, by these new forces. The A. P. A. became militant in California. If we except Kentucky and Tennessee, the A. P. A. made but little impression in the South, although there were mild outcroppings in Georgia and Texas.

course and methods of its early growth, the conditions and provocations, if any, which gave it such a widespread and numerous following are precisely the aspects which are most hidden, and most difficult to determine. A marked loosening of party ties in 1882, and the hard times and industrial unrest of 1883 undoubtedly hastened the A. P. A.'s decline. Its founder, Henry F. Bowers, informs the writer that the coming of Monsignor Satolli, papal delegate, was the greatest single stimulus the movement received. Capital was also made out of parochial-schools questions, then much current in the public press, the Patobon assault in Illinois, the Edwards law in Illinois, and the Bennett law in Wisconsin. From Boston a "Committee of One Hundred" flooded the press and the legislatures, from 1888 to 1892, with "anti-Romanist" documents. Writing in "The Century Magazine" for March, 1894, the Rev. Washington Gladden tells us that the A. P. A. movement began operations in each locality where it spread by "the furtive distribution of certain documents calculated to engender fear and distrust of the Catholics". Of these documents there were, he says, two: one purporting to be instructions to Catholics, apparently bearing the signature of eight peaceable clergy; and the other a "papal bull", or encyclical, calling for the massacre of the Protestants "on or about the feast of St. Ignatius in the year of our Lord, 1893". The A. P. A. movement began to develop a press early in 1893, and in 1894 seventy A. P. A. weeklies were in existence. Nearly all of these were publications of very limited circulation, few of them printing, except around election time, more than a thousand copies. They used "plate matter" and kept "standing" several columns of reading defamatory of the Catholic Church, such as alleged Jesuit and Cardinal seats, as "fact"; and used and circulated "quotations" ascribed to Catholic sources. What Ignatius Donnelly said in the course of his discussion with "Prof." Sims aptly applied to this matter: "I want to say, my friends, that I do not believe in some of the authorities quoted by the professor [Sims]; I doubt their authenticity. When he comes up here and admits that the A. P. A. organization sent out an encyclical of the Pope that was bogus and published documents which were forgeries, he casts doubt on every document he may produce. False in one thing, false in all". Very naturally, Catholic citizens vigorously opposed the A. P. A., and there was a battle in the battle, the battle, the battle. Their press was unremitting in its assaults upon the new movement. Public meetings and anti-A. P. A. lectures and pamphlets were among the means employed. Here and there associations were formed for purposes of defense; and in many places the council met with the A. P. A.'s were systematically watched, and lists of the members procured and circulated. Under the stress of public discussion the secret movement was at a disadvantage, and time and again A. P. A. leaders confessed the desirability of discarding their secret methods and coming out in the open, and also casting aside the intolerant features of their movement.

Professor Johnston, explaining in "The American Encyclopedia of Politics" the failure and sudden collapse of the American party after 1854, says: "The existence of a secret and oath-bound party was always an anachronism in an age and a country where free speech and congress in an age and a country where freedom of congress and in a period of national digit openly acknowledged fealty to the order. In 1895 the A. P. A. was overthrown in the earliest stronghold, Saginaw, Mich., and in 1896 its defeat here was further emphasized by the failure of Representative-in-Congress Linton to secure a re-election. The Bryan wave cleared Omaha and the Nebraska field of A. P. A.-ism, and in Toledo "Golden Rule" Jones deprived it of its last local citadel, in 1897. The A. P. A. leaders had already made a stout effort to prevent the nomination of William McKinley in 1896, and when the futility of this effort was apparent the plan was to secure recognition in the Republican national platform for one or more of the principles of the order, preferably for that opposing appropriations to sectarian institutions. This also failed. President-elect McKinley's appointment (March, 1897) of a Catholic (Judge McKenna, of California) in his first cabinet probably best illustrates the subsequent estimate that the Republican leaders had of the importance of the A. P. A., or of the necessity of being respectful of its sentiments; and, though this act was not a direct blow, as well as the appointment of Bellamy Storer to an important diplomatic mission, and of Terence V. Powderly as Commissioner of Immigration, drew forth bitter protests from the proscriptive leaders, there was not a ripple of antagonism in either house of congress or in any of the states. This was the test the A. P. A. had of the strength of the party. It may have been that many Republican leaders rather enjoyed the discomfiture of the A. P. A., in view of the swaggering tone its followers had assumed in its more prosperous days. For not a few prominent Republicans, like Senators Hoar and Hawley, Thomas B. Reed, Levi P. Morton, and John Sherman, had been made the targets of its bitter attack and innuendo. In fact, it seems probable that during the years 1894-96, A. P. A. was considerably more of a vexation to the leaders of the Republican party than to the prelates of the Catholic Church. The loss of prestige due to these several notable discomfitures in national politics told on the membership of the A. P. A. Its councils failed to meet, its state organizations fell into desuetude, and, although it preserved its national organization by election up to 1900, its history may be said to have closed for all purposes of general interest. H. F. Bowers was re-elected its national president in 1898, an office which he still holds (1906). Although the A. P. A. had a platform calling for not a few changes in the laws, and in the policies of government, it failed to accomplish any of its aims in bringing into our history any new departure in statecraft. Upon two matters only did the A. P. A. leave a record, though a rather ineffectual one, in Congress. It joined in the opposition prevalent for a time against further grants of federal money to the Catholic In- stitute schools; and it sought to prevent by Congress the Marquette statue, presented by the State of Wisconsin to the nation, pursuant to a law of Congress.

Amherst, Francis Kerril, D.D., Bishop of Northampton; b. at London, 21 March, 1819; d. 21 August, 1883. He was the eldest son of William Kerril Amherst, of Parrondo, County Essex, Essex, and of Mary Louisa, daughter of Francis Fortescue Thurlow, of Bosworth Hall, County Leicester, England. He was sent to Oscott College in 1830, and after eight years left it with no intention of entering the ecclesiastical state. He returned to Oscott, however, in 1841, and was ordained priest by Cardinal (then Bishop) Wiseman, 6 June, 1846. Shortly after, he joined the Third Order of St. Dominic, but resigned, 1855, to become professor. After eleven months in this position he was appointed to the mission of Stafford, and thence, on Bishop Wareing's resignation, to the See of Northampton. He was consecrated 4 July, 1853. He was appointed Assistant at the Pontifical Throne 8 July, 1853. He resigned in 1879, due to ill health, and the following year was translated to Soruna. He died at his residence, Fieldgate, Kenil- worth, County Warwick, 21 August, 1883.

Amias, John, Venerable, an English Martyr; b. at Wakefield; d. at York, 16 March, 1589. He exercised the trade of a cloth merchant in Wakefield until the death of his wife, when he divided his property among his children, and became a priest at Reims in 1581. Of his missionary life we know little; he was arrested at the house of a Mr. Morton in Lancashire, taken to York, and tried in company with two other martyrs, Dalby and Dibdale. Anthony (Dean) Champney was present at their execution, of which he has left an account in his history. Other accounts note that he went to death "as joyfully as if to a feast." He was declared Venerable in 1866.

Amice, a short linen cloth, square or oblong in shape and, like the other aeralceral vestments, needing to be blessed before use. The purpose of this vestment, which is the first to be put on by the priest in vesting for the Mass, is to cover the shoulders, and originally also the head, of the wearer. Many of the old religious orders have retained this fashion which prevailed in the Middle Ages; that is to say, the amice is first laid over the head and the ends allowed to fall upon the shoulders, then the other vestments from the alb to the chasuble are put on, and finally, on reaching the altar, the priest will pull the hood back and draw the ends around the neck and over the chasuble like a small cowl. In this way, as will be readily understood, the amice forms a sort of collar, effectively protecting the precious material of the chasuble from contact with the skin. On leaving the sanctuary, the amice is again pulled up over the head, and thus both in entering and going out it is kept in place as the mark of the modern berretta. This method of wearing the amice has fallen into desuetude for the clergy at large, and the only surviving trace of it is the rubric directing that, in putting it on, the amice should for a moment be laid upon the head before it is adjusted round the neck. The subdeacon at his ordination receives the amice from the hands of the bishop, who says to him "Receive the amice, by which is signified the discipline of the voice" (costitatio vocis). This seems to have reference to some primitive use of the amice as a sort of muffler to protect the throat. On the other hand, the word "amice" is directed to say in assuming this vestment speaks of it as galeam salutis, "the helmet of salvation against the wiles of the enemy", thus emphasizing the use as a head covering. Strictly speaking, the amice, being a sacred vestment, ought not to be worn by clerics below the grade of subdeacon.

In tracing the history of the amice we are confronted by the same difficulty which meets us in the case of most of the other vestments, viz. the impossibility of determining the precise meaning of the expressions used by early writers. The word amicatus, which is still the Latin name for this vestment, and from which our word amice is derived, seems clearly to be used in its present sense by Amalarius at the beginning of the ninth century. He tells us that this amicatus is the first vestment put on, and it enfolds the neck (De Eccles. Offic., II, xvii, in P. L., CV, 1094).

We may also probably feel confidence in identifying with the same vestment the anagolagium, or first Ordo Romanus, a document which belongs to the middle of the eighth century or earlier. Anagolagium seems to be merely a corruption of the word anabolitum (or anaboladitum), which is defined by St. Isidore of Seville as a sort of linen wrap used by women to throw over their shoulders, otherwise called a sinon. There is nothing to indicate that this last word was a liturgical garment, hence we must conclude that we cannot safely trace our present amice farther back than the above-mentioned reference in the first Roman Ordo (P. L., LVIII, 940). It is curious that this anagolagium, though it was also worn by the papal deacon and subdeacon, was put on by the Pope over, not under, the alb. To this day the Pope, when pontificating, wears a sort of second amice of striped silk called a fanon, which is put on after the alb and subsequently folded back over the upper part of the chasuble. The amice, moreover, in the Ambrosian Rite is also put on after the alb. At what date the amice came to be regarded as an indispensable part of the priest's liturgical attire is not quite clear; for both Bishop Theodulph of Orleans (d. 821) and Walafrid Strabo (d. 849) seem to ignore it under circumstances in which we should certainly have expected it to be mentioned. On the other hand, the "Admonitio Symbold" of an uncertain date, but commonly referred to the ninth century (see, however, Revue bénédictine, 1892, p. 99), distinctly enjoins that no one must say Mass without amice, alb, stole, maniple and chasuble. Early liturgical writers, such as Rabanus Maurus, were inclined to regard the amice as derived from the ephod of the Jewish priesthood, but modern authorities are unanimous in rejecting this theory. They trace the origin of the amice to some utilitarian purpose, though there is considerable difference of opinion whether it was in the beginning a neck cloth introduced for reasons of seemliness, to hide the bare throat; or again a kercif which protected the richer vestment from the perspiration so apt in southern climates to stream from the face and neck, or perhaps a winter muffler protecting the throat of those who, in the interests of church music, had to take care of their voices. Something may be said in favor of each of these views, but no certain conclusion seems to be possible (see Braun, Die priestlichen Gewänder, p. 5). The variant names, humera(le (i.e. “shoulder cloth”), Germ. Schultertuch), superhumera(le, anagogologium, etc., by which it was known in early times do not help us much in tracing its history.

As in case of the alb, so for the amice, linen woven from the fibre of flax or hemp is the only permissible material. A little cross must be sewn to, or worked upon the amice in the middle, and this the priest is directed to kiss in putting it on. Approved authorities (Braun, Luthers Lehrbuch, p. 618) direct that the amice ought to be at least 32 inches long by 24 inches broad. A slight lace edging seems to be permitted by usage in case of amices intended for use on feast occasions, and the strings may be of white or coloured silk (Barbier de Montault, Costumes de la France, 1833). In Middle Ages when the amice was turned back over the chasuble, and thus exposed to view, it was commonly ornamented by an “apparel”, or strip of rich embroidery, but this practice is no longer tolerated.

BRAUN, DIE PRIESTERLICHEN GEWÄNDEN (Freiburg, 1897), 1-15, suffices for the best historical account, with appropriate illustrations: ROHault de Fleury, LA MESSA, VII, also gives drawings of ancient amices; Thurot in The Monks (Sept. 1886), 282 seq. See also the works mentioned above in the bibliography of ALB: GHIR, THE HOLY SACRIFICE OF THE MASS, (tr. St. Louis, Mo., 1903), 273-277, which supplies a full account of the symbolism attributed to this and other vestments by medieval liturgists.

Amico, Francesco, one of the greatest theologians of his time, b. at Cosenza, in Naples, 2 April, 1578. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1596. For twenty-four years he was professor of theology at Naples, Aquila, and Gratz, and, on the professorial throne of the academy of the last named place. To his eminent science he united a profound humility. He was scholastic in his method, adapting his treatises to a four years' course of teaching. He wrote “De Deo Uno et Trino”, “De Natura Angelorum”, “De Unitate Dei Fide, Spe, et Charitate”, “De Justitiæ et Iure”, which was printed, 16 June, 1651 “dono corrigit”, on account of three propositions in it, which Alexander VII and Innocent XI objected to. The corrected edition of 1649 was permitted. He wrote also on the Incarnation, and the sacraments. In a complete edition, it is said, in the preface, that “his doctrine is according to St. Thomas, and is brief, clear, subtle, and solid.”

AMIDA (DIARBEKIR), THE DIOCÈSE OF (ARMENIAN) Rite in Mesopotamia, Asiatic Turkey.—The foundation of the city of Amida has been attributed to Tigranes I, or Tigranes III (the Great), Kings of Armenia; it has been identified with either Tigranocerta or Dikranagherd. It got from the Greeks and the Romans the name of Amida, and is known in Turkish as Kars-Amid, i.e. “Amida the Black”, which gives more genealogical hint to its Amida or Diarbekir (Land of the Virgin). The town rises on the left bank of the Tigris, about 75 miles from its source and about 900 miles from the mouth of that river. An interior citadel overlooks the double enclosure of the town with its seventy-two towers, and dates back undoubtedly to the Armenian epoch; it was repaired by Valens (a. d. 364-378) and was finished by Anastasius I (491-518). In this citadel is the old Byzantine church of St. John, now used for Musulman worship, and known as Olow Djami, the Long Mosque. In 638, Amida was taken by the Arabs who called it Diarbekir. Later on it passed under Persian dominion. Since 1514, it has been a part of the Ottoman empire and is the chief city of the vilayet of the same name. It has about 35,000 inhabitants, of whom 20,000 are Musulmans (Arabians, Turks, Kurds, etc.), 2,300 Catholics (Chaldeans, Armenians, Syriacs, Melchites, Latins), 8,500 Georgian Armenians, 900 Protestant Armenians, 950 Jacobite Syriacs, 900 Orthodox Greeks, and 300 Jews. Diarbekir possesses an Armenian Catholic bishop, a Syrian Catholic bishop, a Syrian Jacobite bishop, a Chaldean Catholic archbishop, and a Greek Orthodox metropolitan under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Antioch. The Latin Mission of Diarbekir, founded by Pope Jean-Baptiste de Saint-Aignan (1667), remained in the hands of the French Capuchins during nearly a century and a half. Its founder converted (1671) the Nestorian Bishop Joseph, with whom Innocent XI inaugurated (1681) the series of the Chaldean Catholic patriarchs. The town suffered much during the French invasion.

In 1803, at the death of the last French Capuchin, it was entrusted to Italian religious. In 1841, Spanish missionaries took charge of it, but eventually it passed again into the hands of Italian missionaries. The Capuchin Fathers direct a school for boys. Near them the Franciscans built a girls' school for 180 openers (since 1802) and a school for girls. An American Protestant mission, working especially among the Armenians, keeps up three schools: two for boys and one for girls. Besides these foreign establishments Diarbekir possesses fifty-four others. The Turks have 4 madressas, 3 secondary and 23 elementary schools, one of which is for girls. The Gregorian Armenians have 5 elementary schools, one of which is for girls. The Catholic Armenians have an elementary school for boys, the Catholic Chaldeans 3 elementary schools, one of which is for girls. The Catholic Syriacs have an elementary school for boys, and the Israelites an elementary school for girls.

Amiens, Diocese of (Ambianiæ) comprises the department of the Somme. It was a suffragan of the Archdiocese of Reims during the old regime, of Paris from 1802 to 1822, and of Reims again, since 1822. Abbé Duchesne denies any value to the legend of the two Saints Firmin, honoured on the first and twenty-fifth of September, as the first and third Bishops of Amiens. The legend is of the eighth century and full of incoherences. Even on the supposition that St. Firmin, native of Pampeluna, was martyred during the persecution of Diocletian, it is certain that the first bishop known to history is St. Eulogius, who defended the divinity of Christ in the councils held during the middle of the fourth century. Among the bishops of Amiens are counted: Jersuabene, an important part in the Frankish Church; Charles, archbishop, who consecrated Charles the Great in his monastery of Saint-Denis; and Loup I, in 1254, and deposed under Louis the Pious; William of Macon, at the end of the thirteenth century, called the greatest jurist of the University of Paris; Jean de Largrane, known as the Cardinal of Amiens (d. 1402), who figured prominently in the growth of the University; Francois Ruffin, preacher at the court of Louis XIV, who converted to Catholicism the Duke de Montausier and James II, the future King of England; Bonneville, ambassador to Venice under Louis XVI, who, after the Revolution, became a priest, and was Bishop of Amiens from 1781 to 1792. The cathedral (thirteenth century) is an admirable Gothic monument, and was made the subject of careful study by Ruskin in his "Bible of Amiens." The nave of this cathedral is considered a type of the ideal Gothic. The church of St. Achel, near Amiens, and formerly its cathedral, was, in the nineteenth century, the home of a valuable art institute. The bombed churches of St. Riquier and Corbie perpetuate the memory of the great Benedictine abbeys and homes of learning founded in these places in 570 and 662. The Diocese of Amiens, at the end of the year 1905, counted 357,848 inhabitants, 60 cures, or parish. 600 succoureuses, or mission churches, and 49 vicarates, with salaries formerly paid by the State.

Amiot, Joseph Maria, a missionary to China, b. at Toulon, 8 February, 1718; d. at Pekin, 8 or 9 October, 1793. He was admitted into the Society of Jesus in 1737. Sent to China as a missionary in 1740, he soon won the esteem and confidence of the Emperor, Kien Long, whose language, the Tatar, he spoke fluently. His thorough mastery of this tongue as well as the Chinese, and his extensive knowledge of physics, literature, history, mathematics, and music, enabled him to give to the European world, in a voluminous correspondence, much striking and curious information concerning the Chinese. Many of his most important works of Amiot are found in the collection: "Memoires concernant l'histoire, les sciences, les arts, les mœurs et les usages des chinois, par les missionnaires de Pekin" (Paris, Nyon aîné, 1776-89). He composed a Tatar-Manchu grammar and dictionary in French, and a chronological table of the Chinese Emperors from the sixty-first year of the Empire to 1769. There are also articles from his pen on the weights and measures of the Chinese, their military science, music, language, teaching of their books, the geography and climate of their country, and the social conditions of the Tatars-Tourgouthes. These and other works, and where they can be found, are noted by Sommervogel in his "Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus," I., 294 sqq.

Ammen, Daniel, American naval officer and author, b. in Brown County, Ohio, 15 May, 1820; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 July, 1898. His father, a soldier of the war of 1812, migrated to Ohio from Virginia. He was appointed midshipman, 7 July, 1834, and ordered to West Point, where he studied for three months, under his brother Jacob Ammen, later a brigadier general in the United States Army. After serving at sea for several years, he was sent to the Naval School, then near Philadelphia. He was appointed lieutenant 4 November, 1849, and became rear admiral 11 December, 1877. During the Civil War, he was engaged in blockaded duty as Admiral Dupont's executive. He was chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks from 1 May, 1869, to 1 October, 1871, and chief of the Bureau of Navigation from 1 October, 1871, until his retirement, 4 June, 1878. He devoted much time to work on harbour defences, and designed the ram Katahdin, also the "Ammen balsa," or life-raft, used in the navy. In 1872 he was appointed member of a commission to examine and report on the feasibility of constructing a canal through Nicaragua. The commission reported in favour of the Nicaraguan route, which he strongly advocated. In 1878 he went as a delegate to congress in Paris to discuss Isthmian canal questions. He also served on the board for the location of the new Naval Observatory. After his retirement he purchased a farm twelve miles from Washington, at a station named in his honour Ammendale, the seat of the Normal School of the Brothers of Christian Schools, where through his generosity St. Joseph's church was built. Among his works are "The Atlantic Coast" (New York, 1883); "Recollections of Grant" (1885); "The Old Navy and the New" (autobiographical) (Philad., 1891); "Country Homes and Their Improvements," "Les Failles of the Intercean Transit Questions", and various communications to current literature.

Ammon (Egypt. Amun or Amen, "the hidden one"). Heb. 'Amon, Gr. Amun). The supreme divinity of the Egyptian pantheon. He was originally only the chief god of the city of Thebes, but later his worship became predominant in Egypt and extended even to Lydia and Ethiopia. Thebes, however, always retained the centre of his worship, when it was called Ne Amun, "the city of Ammon". In Heb. 'Amon (Nah. iii, 8, Heb. text), and the god himself is designated by Jeremias (xvi, 25, Heb. text) as 'Amon min Nö, Amnon of No, i.e. Thebes. Ammon was worshipped under several names with different attributes. As Ammon-Ra, he was the sun-god, with his chief temple at Thebes; as Khem or Min, he was the god of reproduction; as Khnum, he was the creator of all things, "the maker of gods and men". In the latter character he was represented with the head of a ram, the animal sacred to him, or simply with ram's horns; under this form Ammon is known as the "Theban god," who always attributes horns to him. The chief temple of Khnum was in the oasis of Ammon (now Siwa). There Alexander the Great worshipped him. The Greeks and Romans identified Ammon with Zeus or Jupiter (Zeus Ammon, Jupiter Ammon), whence the name Dioneopolis, City of Zeus, given to Thebes by the Greeks.

Ammon, Saint sometimes called Amun or Amus, b. about 350; an Egyptian who, forced into marriage when twenty-two years old, persuaded his wife on the bridal night to pronounce a vow of chastity, which they kept faithfully, though living together for eighteen years; at the end of this time he became a hermit in the desert of Nitria, and she formed a congregation of religious women in her own native city. Nitria, which Ammon bestowed upon himself, is a mountain surrounded by a desolate region, seventy miles south of Alexandria, beyond Lake Mareotis (which Palladius calls Maria). At the end of the fourth century there were fifty monasteries there inhabited by 5,000 monks. St. Jerome called the place "The City of the As Four Gospel"; it was the name given by a church that was built in a monastery there, authorities disagree, but it is certain that the fame of his sanctity drew many anchorites around him, who erected cells not only on the mountain but in the adjacent desert. St. Anthony came to visit him and induced him to gather his scattered flocks into monasteries. When Ammon died at the age of 62 Anthony, though thirteen days' journey distant, saw his soul entering heaven. He is honoured on 4 October.

Ammonian Sections.—Divisions of the four Gospels indicated in the margin of nearly all Greek and Latin MSS. They are about 1185 in number; 355 for St. Matthew, 355 for St. Mark, 343 for St. Luke, and 232 for St. John: the numbers, however, vary slightly in different MSS. Until recently it was commonly believed that these divisions were devised by Ammonius of Alexandria, at the beginning of the third century (c. 220), in connection with a Harmony of the Gospels, now lost, which he composed. If divided the four Gospels, it was said, into small numbered sections, which were similar in content to the three last Gospels, or simply the section numbers with the name of the respective evangelist, in parallel columns opposite the corresponding sections of the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, which have been chosen as the basis of his Harmony. Of late, however, the view has obtained among scholars that the work of Ammonius was restricted to what Eusebius states concerning it in his letter to Carpianus, namely, that he placed the parallel passages of the last three Gospels alongside the text of St. Mark; and that the sections hitherto ascribed to Ammonius are now ascribed to Eusebius (A. D. 265-340). At any rate the Harmony of Ammonius suggested to Eusebius, as he himself tells us (loc. cit.), the idea of drawing up ten tables (καθένας) in which the sections in question were classified as to show at a glance which sections were common or differed in other sections. In the first nine tables he placed in parallel columns the numbers of the sections common to the four, three, or two evangelists; namely: (1) Matt., Mark, Luke, John; (2) Matt., Mark, Luke; (3) Matt., Luke, John; (4) Matt., Mark, John; (5) Matt., Luke; (6) Matt., Mark; (7) Matt., John; (8) Luke, Mark; (9) Luke, John. In the tenth he noted successively the sections special to each evangelist. The usefulness of these tables for the purpose of reference and comparison soon brought them into common use, and from the fifth century the Ammonian sections, with references to the Eusebian tables, were inserted in the margin of the MSS. (It need hardly be said that our chapters and verses were not then in existence; the first date from the thirteenth, the latter from the sixteenth century.) Opposite each section was written its number, and underneath the number the number of the Eusebian table to be consulted in order to find the usual text or text; a reference to the tenth table would of course show that this section was proper to that evangelist. These marginal notes are reproduced in several editions of Tischendorf's New Testament.

Ammonites.—Origin and Race.—The Ammonites were a race very closely allied to the Hebrews. One of the most prominent traits in the ancient Hebrew belief of this near relationship, for they are called Ben'dammim or "Son of my people", meaning that that race is regarded as descended from Israel's nearest relative. This play of words on the name Ammon did not arise from the name itself, but presupposes the belief in the kinship of Israel and Ammon. The name Ammon itself cannot be accepted as proof of this belief, for it is obscure in origin, derived perhaps from the name of a tribal deity. A strong proof of their common origin is found in the Ammonite language. No Ammonite inscription, it is true, has come down to us, but the Ammonite names that have been preserved do not diadect very nearly akin to the Hebrew; moreover, the close blood relationship of Moab and Amnon being admitted by all, the language of the Moabite Stone, almost Hebrew in form, is a strong witness to the racial affinity of Israel and Ammon. This linguistic argument indicates the belief that Israel always entertained of his kinship with the Ammonites. The belief itself has found expression in an unmistakable manner in Gen. xix, where the origin of Ammon and his brother, Moab, is ascribed to Lot, the nephew of Abraham. This revolting narrative has usually been considered to give literal fact, but of late years it has been interpreted, e.g. by Father Lagrange, O.P., as recording a gross popular error by which the Israelites expressed their loathing of the corrupt morals of the Moabite and Ammonite peoples. It may be doubted, however, that such an error would be directed against Lot himself. Other scholars see in the very depravity of these peoples a proof of the reality of the Biblical story of their incestuous origin. Ethnologists, interpreting the origin from the nephew of Abraham by the canons usually found true in their science, hold it as indicating that the Israelites are considered the older and more powerful tribe, while the Ammonites and Moabites are regarded as offshoots of the same stem. The character of Genesis, which at times seems to preserve popular traditions rather than exact ethnology, is taken as a confirmation of this position. But it is not denied, at any rate, that the Hebrew tradition of the near kinship of Israel, Ammon, and Moab is correct. All three, forming together a single group, are classified as belonging to the Aramean branch of the Semitic race.

Their Country and Civilization.—The Ammonites were settled to the east of the Jordan, their territory originally comprising all from the Jordan to the wilderness of the River Arnon and the River Arnon (Judg. xii, 13-22) which later fell to the lot of Reuben and Gad. "It was accounted a land of giants; and giants formerly dwelt in it, whom the Ammonites called Zomsommin" (Deut. ii, 20), of whom was Og, King of Bashan, who perished before the children of Israel in the days of Moses. The Ammonites were overrun by the Israelites before the invasion of the Hebrews under Josue, driven away by the Amorites from the rich lands near the Jordan and retreated to the mountains and valleys which form the eastern part of the district now known as El-Belka. They still continued to regard their original territory as rightfully theirs, and at later times regained it and held it for a considerable period. Their land, in general, while not very fertile, was well watered and excellent for pasture.
Jeremiah speaks of Ammon glorying in her valleys and trusting in her treasures (Jer. xlix). Her chief city, Rabbath, or Rabbath-Ammon, to distinguish it from a city of the same name in Moab, lay in the midst of a fertile and well-tilled valley. It was the royal city; in the time of David it was flourishing under a wealthy king and was well fortified, though it suffered a great deal from the attack of Joab (II K., xi-xii). Later rebuilt by Ptolemy II (Philadelphus) and called after him Philadelph, it still retains something of its original name, being known at present to the Arabs as Amman. Its ruins to-day are among the most imposing beyond the Jordan, and, despite the thick overgrowth of the city, to lend light and vividness to the already vivid narrative of Joab's assault. The Ammonites had many other cities besides Rabbath (see Jud., xi, 33, and II K., xii, 31), but their names have perished. They indicate, at least, a considerable degree of civilization and show that the Ammonites should not be placed, as is sometimes done, almost on the plane of nomads. In religion they practised the idolatries and abominations common to the Semitic races surrounding Israel; their god was called Milcom, supposed to be another form of Moloch. They seem with the Moabites to have been held in special loathing by the Hebrews, as is shown by the New Testament when converted to the religion of Jehovah, was allowed to enter the Tabernacle; nor his children, even after the tenth generation (Deut., xxiii).

AMMON AND ISRAEL.—This distinction against his nearest relatives was due to the treatment accorded by them to Israel during the march to Palestine, when Israel was struggling towards nationhood. The Hebrews had no intention of taking the land of the children of Lot, either of Moab or of Ammon and were expressly warned against it; this special friendliness and recognition of consanguinity obtained no return from either, who refused provisions to the Israelites and hired Balaam, who was an Ammonite, or at least dwelt among the Ammonites, to curse the host of Israel; though, as is well known, Balaam was forced to deliver instead a blessing (Deut., xxiii, 4, 5; Num. xxiii-xxiv). For this lack of brotherly spirit, the ban was put upon the Ammonites, but upon their appeal was made to spare their land, the Israelites turning aside when they reached the border of the Ammonites. The stretch of land along the Jordan, however, to which they laid claim, was taken from the Amorites who had dispossessed them. Half the land of Ammon, too, is said to have been allotted to the tribe of Gad (Num. xxvii, 17); but there is no record of its alienation from the Ammonites, which moreover would be in contradiction with the divine command already mentioned. It appears to have been territory from which they were already driven. Shortly after the death of Josue, when the Israelites were established beyond the Jordan, the Ammonites allied themselves with the Moabites under King Eglon in a successful attack upon Israel; but the Moabites were in turn defeated and a long peace set in (Jud., iii, 30). Later, after the judgeship of Jair, the Hebrews were simultaneously attacked by the Philistines from the southwest and the Ammonites from the east. Gad, especially, whose dwelling was east of the Jordan, suffered from the incursions of the Ammonites which continued eighteen years; but the victorious enemy pushed beyond the Jordan and laid waste the country of Juda, Benjamin, and Ephraim (Jud., x). At this crisis Ammon, the Ammonites, and Israel, in turn, placed in the person of Jephth, who was chosen leader. The Ammonites demanded the cession of the territory beyond the Jordan, from the Amon to the Jabboek, of which they had been dispossessed; but Jephth refused, since the Israelites had, three hundred years previously, taken the land from the Amorites and not from the Ammonites; he boldly carried the war into the invaders' country, and completely defeated them, taking as many as twenty cities (Jud., xi, 33). By the time of Saul, the Ammonites had again grown to great power and under their King Naas (Nahash) had laid siege to Jabea Galaad. Saul had been chosen king by Samuel only one month before and his election was not ratified by God until as soon as he heard of the siege, he summoned a large army and defeated the Ammonites, inflicting heavy loss (I K., xi). This victory established him in the monarchy. Further operations by Saul against the Ammonites are mentioned without detail (I K., xii, 47), as alike the kindnesses and the cruelties of Saul against the Ammonites (I K., x, 2), probably before his accession. David signalized the beginning of his reign by military exploits and is said to have dedicated to the Lord the spoils of Ammon (vii, 11); however, there is no mention of a war, which seems inconsistent with the friendliness of David to Hanon, the successor of Naas (x, 2). David's proffer of friendship to Ammon was suspected and rejected and his ambassadors maltreated. War ensued. The Ammonites were joined by the Syrians, and both were attacked and routed by Joab, David's leading general. The next year Joab again invaded the territory of the Ammonites, and, either raising his standard on Rabbath and laying siege to the royal city. It was during this siege that the incident of David and Bethsheba happened, which resulted in David sending the faithful Uriah to his death at Rabbath and incurring the deepest stain upon his character. When Joab had reduced the city to the point of surrender, he sent for David who came and reaped the glory of it, transferred the king's massive crown to his own head, sacked the city and slaughtered its inhabitants; and did likewise to all the cities of the Ammonites (x-xii). The power of the Ammonites was now broken, Ammon apparently becoming a vassal of Israel later, towards the end of David's reign, another son of King Naas, either through lack of spirit or genuine humanity, heaped kindness upon David, when the distressed old king was at war with his son Absalom (xvii). Some of the Ammonites seem to have enrolled themselves in David's service; one is mentioned among his thirty-seven valiant warriors (xxxiii, 37). No hostilities are narrated during the reign of Solomon; he chose Ammonite women as his wives, worshipped their god and built a high- place in his honour (III K., xi), which Josias destroyed (IV K., xxiii, 15). When Solomon died the Ammonite king (Jos. xiv, 22) regained his independence and allied themselves with the Assyrians, joining with them in an attack on Gilead by which their territory was increased. Their barbarous cruelty on this occasion called forth the denunciation of Amos, who foretold the destruction of Rabbath (Amos, x, 13). During the Assyrian invasion under Thgealtilaphalsaar, when their neighbours, the Reubenites and the Gadites, were carried into captivity, they regained some of their old territory along the Jordan (IV K., xv, 29; Jer., xlix, 1-6). In the time of Josaphat, King of Judah, when the Israelites were greatly weakened, the Ammonites put themselves at the head of a confederacy of nations for the subjugation of Israel; but suspicions awakening among the allies, they turned to destroying one another and Israel miraculously escaped (II Par., xx, 23). After nearly one hundred and fifty years, Joatham, King of Judah, ventured an attack on Ammon, deeply discrediting the deliverer when he demanded from them a yearly tribute (II Par., xxvii), which, however, was enforced for only three years. But the doom of the Hebrew monarchy was approaching and the Ammonites had a part to play. With others of the surrounding nations, they were employed by Nabuchodonosor, King of Babylon, to overrun the Amor-bach, former Benedictine abbey in Lower Franconia (Bavaria), about twenty-five miles south of Aschaffenburg. It was founded in the early part of the eighth century by St. Pirmin, who had been called to that region by Count Ruthall to preach the Gospel. The Saint, with his disciple Amor, first took up his abode at what is now called Amorbunnern, but later built an abbey near by, in the Oden forest, in the valley of the Muda, a tributary of the Main. The abbey, which was consecrated in 734, became the centre of Christianity and civilization in the Oden forest. The town of Amorbach, which in 1900 had 2,173 inhabitants, grew up about its walls and its monks not only laboured in the neighbouring districts but also penetrated into northern Germany, where they aided in the conversion of the Saxons. Several of the first bishops of Verden, the scene of the missionary activity of these monks, were former abbots of Amorbach. In the early days of its history the abbey received generous gifts from Charles Martel and his sons. Pepin united it to the Diocese of Würzburg, though in modern times it was transferred to Mainz. It suffered much in the tenth century from the invasion of the Huns, and later, in 1521, during the Peasants' War, and in 1631, from the Swedes. In the seventeenth century the abbey buildings and the beautiful church, long famous for its paintings, were rebuilt. Amorbach was suppressed in 1803 and passed into the possession of the house of Leiningen. In 1816, the town and abbey came under the jurisdiction of Bavaria.

Amorrites, a name of doubtful origin and meaning, used to designate an ancient people often mentioned in the Old Testament. It is by many supposed to be derived from a word akin to the Hebrew ’Amir and to mean “mountaineers”, “highlanders”; but ’Amir is “summit”, not “mountain”. The name is much older than any part of the Bible and even much older than the Hebrew people itself; the attempt, then, to fix its meaning by Hebrew usage and the local habitation of the Amorrites in Hebrew times can only be regarded as misdirected effort. The variations of the name, and the fact after the name came to be used, dwelt in mountains can no longer be judged as serious proof that Amorrite means highlander; its significance still remains obscure. It is worthy of note, nevertheless, that the Amorrites of biblical and pre-biblical times have usually been found in mountainous districts, although those best known are the Amorrites of the Jordan Valley, whose sway, however, extended to the mountains east of the Jordan.

I. Extent.—In application, the name has a wider and narrower extent in the Bible, varying in a manner the reason for which cannot often be discovered. (1) At times it seems conterminous with Chanaanite, and to designate all the inhabitants of the Land of Chanaan before the advent of Israel. Thus the Prophet Amos calls Palestine the land of the Amorrite, and the race which Israel cast out was the Amorrite (ii, 9, 10); this usage prevails also in Gen., xlviii, 22, and Jos., xxiv, 15, 18. The same name is gathered from various races and tribes of the main Chanaanitish races or tribes have at one time or another a specific name and at another are classed as Amorrite; thus, the inhabitants of Gabaon are called indifferent-ly Hevites and Amorrites (Jos., xi, 19; II Kings, xxii, 2); and of Jerusalem, either Jebusites or Amorrites (Jos., xv, 63, xviii, 28; Judges, i, 21, and Jos., xx, 6, 6, and Esth., xvi, 3). The Amorrites of Gen., xiv, 13, are Hethites (Hittites) in Gen., xxiii, and the Philistines are likewise deemed Amorrites (I Kings, vii, 14). While the name therefore seems applicable to all the non-Israelish peoples of Chanaan, it is to be noted that it generally has a narrower extension than that of the Hebrews, and sometimes is regarded as only a branch of the Chanaanite family (Gen., x, 16). (2) Another usage distinguishes sharply between Chanaanites and Amorrites, putting both on a level as tribes dwelling with several others in Palestine, the Amorrites, when located, inhabiting the mountains of central and southern Palestine (Deut., i, 7, 19, 27, 44; Gen., xiv, 7, 13; xv, 21; Jos., x, 5, 12, xxiv, 8; Ex., iii, 8, etc.). There is no evidence that the Amorrites at any stage of their history occupied the coast lands. (3) Again, the name is applied to the race living on the east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, from the Arnon to Mt. Hermon, and extending eastward to Jazer and Hesebon (Num., xxi, 13, 24, 32; Deut., iii, 8, 9), comprising the territory of Sehon, King of Hesebon, and Og, King of Baan (Bashan), which later constituted the entire possessions of the Hebrews east of the Jordan.

These variations in the biblical use of the term Amorrite—as designating all the ancient inhabitants of Palestine, or only one part or tribe dwelling in the mountainous districts of the centre and south, or, finally, those east of the Jordan—are found often side by side, and cannot easily be accounted for; it may be remarked, however, that the Hebrew name, in all the inhabitants of Palestine generally occurs when it is question of the idolatrous rites of the ancient inhabitants, or when they are viewed together as a people doomed for their iniquities to be supplanted by the Israelites, in which cases the Amorrites may be taken as the most formidable though they are but part of the population and in reality confined to the districts implied by the other usages of the term. The name of the Amorrite also lingered in Hebrew tradition as representative of gigantic stature and warlike character, and is likely to be employed when the writer is thinking of the ancient inhabitants as Israel’s foes in battle (Deut., ii, 11, 20; iii, 11, 13), while precisely the same population under peaceful conditions is called Chanaanite. It has been noted by upholders of the documentary theory that the writer of the Elohist document seems to use both terms as coextensive. This is the usual account of the Amorrite variations, and is noteworthy in that it is the Amorrite history which it embodies; yet it may well be that the name, instead of being first the name of a southern or trans-Jordanic tribe and extended in time to many various peoples, is on the contrary a survival of an ancient usage for all the inhabitants of Palestine and bordering peoples. As early as 3800 b. c., some believe, the Babylonians called Syria and Palestine the land of the Amorrite. Centuries later (1400 B.C.), in the Tel el-Amarna tablets, the name is applied to the inland country north and north-east of Palestine; Egyptian inscriptions use the term for the same territory, but extend it to the countries eastward as far as the Orontes. In ninth-century Assyrian inscriptions northern and southern Palestine are included under the name. The Amorrites, then, may originally or very early have been applied to all this territory; or more likely it was used first to designate the country north of Palestine and later extended south and east. If these Amorrites of the north, however, are to be considered one in race with the tribes of the Bible, no light has yet been shed upon their migrations into central and southern Palestine or beyond the Jordan. For the present, that part of their history rests in obscurity, though conjectures are plentiful.

II. RACE. — The close relationship of the Amorrite with the races or tribes usually classed as Chanaa- nitish is asserted in Gen., x., 15, 16, and implied in the numerous passages where Amorite is used in place of Chanaanite, Jebusite, or a cognate name. That these tribes are Semitic in origin is doubted by many, but their language, religion, and institutions are unquestionably Semitic. The Amorrite is represented as the Chanaanitish core of the Chanaanite nation of the Bible. Some tribes to connect them with a North African Hamitic race, the Libyans, mainly on the strength of the facial resemblance he discovers between them in one Egyptian sculpture of the time of Rameses III. This resemblance is not elsewhere borne out and in any case must be considered a precarious foundation for such an hypothesis. No details have come down to us which will enable us to distinguish the Amorrites from their kinsfolk (see CHANAAN), except that they seem to have been remarkable for their stature, strength, and wickedness. They dwelt in walled cities and were warlike in spirit.

III. AMORRITES AND ISRAEL. — Though a very ancient race, the Amorrites have left but a slight mark on history in pre-biblical times. They were not the original inhabitants of Palestine, though the time and circumstances of their advent are unknown. They first appear in the Bible as inhabitants of southern Palestine, where they are defeated by Chedorlahomer and his allies (Gen., xiv, 7). The Israelites find them in the same region when they attempt, contrary to the divine command, to enter Palestine from the south and are repulsed (Num., xiii and xiv). About this period certain tribes of Amorites are mentioned as possessing the land east of the Jordan; so there the Israelites next come in contact with the Amorites and ask permission of Sehon, their king, to pass through his dominions, promising to do no damage and to pay for whatever they take on the way. The request being refused, war follows. Sehon is defeated and slain, and the Israelites take possession of his territory from the Arnon to the Jecob. Crossing the Jecob, they inflict the same fate upon Og, King of Bashan, and his territory (Num., xxi; Deut., ii and iii). These lands, which were awarded to the tribes of Ruben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh, extended from the Arnon as far north as the Jabbok and Heshbon (Deut., iv, 46–49). When Joesue had crossed the Jordan and with divine aid had gained several signal victories, fear fell upon the neighbouring Amorrites. The inhabitants of Ga- baon (Gibeon), an Amorrite city, yielded to Joesue, which enraged their brethren. They were accordingly assaulted and besieged by the Amorrite kings (the five kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jericho, Lachis, and Eglon), and sent to Joesue for aid. Joesue, coming to their rescue, put the Amorrites to flight, cut off them in great numbers, captured and slaughtered the five Amorrite kings and hung their bodies upon trees till the evening (Joe., x). It was on this occasion that Joesue commanded the sea and moon to stand still (for various opinions on this passage, see JOSUE). This victory secured to Israel the tenure of Palestine. The Amorrites were not driven out of Palestine nor exterminated. Many of them intermarried with the Hebrews and continued them by their idolatries and practices (Judges, i. 1–2). The remaining tribes of Solomon, and even of Esdras and Nehemias, they are still distinguished from their conquerors, but are finally merged into the general population of Palestine.

Amort, Eugenius, philosopher and theologian, b. at Bibermühl in Bavaria, 15 November, 1682; d. at Polling, 6 February, 1776. He was educated by the Jesuits at Munich and at an early age joined the Canons Regular in the convent of Polling, where he spent most of his life as a teacher of philosophy, theology, and canon law, a tireless student in many departments of ecclesiastical lore, and an investigator of natural phenomena. He was foremost among the Catholic philosophers of the Enlightenment; was a guide and an inspirer of ecclesiastical youth, and may be considered a model of lifelong devotion to all the sciences that befit an ecclesiastic. As early as 1722 he founded, and with some interruptions carried on for several years, an influential review, "Parapsus Bolcius, oder Neueröffner Musenberg". An academy formed by him at Polling became in time the model on which was based the Academy of Sciences of Munich. He spent the years 1733–35 at Rome, whence he returned to Bavaria enriched with precious knowledge acquired by intense study in the libraries of the Eternal City and by intercourse with many learned men. Thenceforth he counted among his correspondents such scholars as Benedict XIII and Benedict XIV, Father Concina, Cardinals Leccari, Galli, Orsi, St. Alphonse Liguori, and others. For a period of forty years his pen was never idle, and from it unceasingly poured forth learned volumes and treatises filled with wisdom and choice learning.

It has been truly said that his seventy volumes, if distributed in an orderly collection, would resemble a general encyclopedia. As a philosopher, he is best known by his solid work "Philosophia Pollingana" (Augsburg, 1730) and by his "Widows Judge", in which he was the author of the land east of the Jordan; so there the Israelites next come in contact with the Amorrites and ask permission of Sehon, their king, to pass through his dominions, promising to do no damage and to pay for whatever they take on the way. The request being refused, war follows. Sehon is defeated and slain, and the Israelites take possession of his territory from the Arnon to the Jecob. Crossing the Jecob, they inflict the same fate upon Og, King of Bashan, and his territory (Num., xxi; Deut., ii and iii). The inhabitants of Ga- baon (Gibeon), an Amorrite city, yielded to Joesue, which enraged their brethren. They were accordingmoderni” (Ulm, 1757), both valuable for their wealth of historical material. In the latter he defends ecclesiastical jurisdiction against the attacks of contemporary jurists and statesmen. The best known of his works is entitled “De revelationibus, visionibus et apparitionibus privatis regulae tute ex Scripturis, Conclusis, Sanctis Patribus et alicubi opiniosis auctores follet, repellente atque exemplis illustrata” (Augsburg, 1744). It was directed against the “Mystic City of God,” the famous work of the Spanish Franciscan nun, Maria de Agreda, and brought him into conflict with several of her Franciscan defenders. This learned scholar found time to prepare for the press a number of other equally valuable works. His prayer-books, “Kurz und Gut” and “Brevier eines guten Christen,” went through many editions. He also compiled select lives of the saints and wrote a German treatise (Venice, 1756) on the invocation of the saints, besides a smaller and a larger catechism. In the discussions waged during the first half of the eighteenth century concerning the authorship of the “De Imitatione Christi” Amorist stood forth as an ardent supporter of the claims of Thomas à Kempis, though his seven works on the subject, besides the claims for the “rare learning and judgment,” have failed to silence the Brethren and the champions of Jean Gerson. The more important are: “Scutum Kempense” (Cologne, 1725); “Plena et succincta informatio de statu totius controversiae” (Augsburg, 1725); and “Certitudo moralis pro Th. Kempens” (Ratisbon, 1764). On his portrait by Jungwirt, who painted “Litterarum maxime sacra- runt per Bavarian restaurator eximium.” The visitor to Bibermühl may now contemplate a marble monument erected in honour of a theologian in whom industry, erudition, critical skill, and piety were united in a high degree.

I. NAME. The third among the Minor Prophets of the Old Testament is called, in the Hebrew Text, “Amos.” The spelling of his name is different from that of the name of Isaias’s father, “Amos’; whence Christian tradition has, for the most part, rightly distinguished between the two. The prophet’s name, Amos, has been variously explained, and its exact meaning is still a matter of controversy.

II. LIFE AND TIMES. — According to the heading of his book (i, 1) Amos was a herdsman of Thecua, a village in the Southern Kingdom, twelve miles south of Jerusalem. Besides this humble avocation, he is also spoken of in vii, 14, as a simple dresser of sycamore-trees. Hence, as far as we know, there is no sufficient ground for the view of most Jewish interpreters that Amos was a wealthy man. Thecua was apparently a shepherd’s town, and it was while following his flock in the wilderness of Judah, that, in the reigns of Oziás and Jeroboam, God called him for a special mission: “Go, prophesy to My people Israel” (vi, 15). In the eyes of the humble shepherd this must have appeared a most difficult mission. At the time when the call came to him, he was “not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet” (vii, 14), which implies that he had not yet entered upon the prophetic office, and even that he had neither learned the school where young men in training for a prophet’s career bore the name of “the sons of a prophet.”

Other reasons might well cause Amos to fear to accept the divine mission. He, a Southerner, was bidden to go to the Northern Kingdom, Israel, and carry to its people and its leaders a message of judgment to which, from their historical circumstances, they were particularly ill-prepared to listen. Its ruler, Jerobeam II (c. 781–741 B. C.), had rapidly conquered Syria, Moab, and Ammon, and thereby extended his dominions from the source of the Orontes on the north to the Dead Sea on the south. The whole northern empire of Solomon thus practically restored had enjoyed a long period of peace and security, marked by remarkable artistic and commercial development. Samaria, its capital, had been adorned with splendid and substantial buildings; riches had been accumulated in abundance; comfort and luxury had reached their highest standard; so that the Northern Kingdom and its entire population felt since the disruption of the empire of Solomon outwardly, religion was also in a most flourishing condition. The sacrificial worship of the God of Israel was carried on with great pomp and general faithfulness, and the long enjoyment of national prosperity was popularly regarded as an undoubted token of the Lord’s favour towards His people. It is true that public morals had gradually been infected by the vices which continued success and plenty too often bring in their train. Social corruption and the oppression of the poor and helpless were very general and widely spread. But the degeneracy could be readily excused on the plea that they were the necessary accompaniments of a high degree of Oriental civilization. Again, religion was debased in various ways. Many among the Israelites were satisfied with the mere offering of the sacrificial victims, regardless of the inward dispositions required for their worthy presentation to a thrice-holy God. Others availed themselves of the thongs which attended the sacred festivals to indulge in immoderate enjoyment and tumultuous revelry. Others again, carried away by the freer association with heathen peoples which resulted from conquest or from intercourse, even went so far as to fuse with the Lord’s worship that of pagan deities. Owing to men’s natural tendency to be satisfied with the mechanical performance of religious duties, and owing more particularly to the great proneness of the Hebrews of old to adopt the sensual rites of foreign cults, so long as they did not give up the worship of their own God, these irregularities in matters of religion did not appear objectionable to the Israelites, all the more so because the Lord did not punish them for their conduct. Yet it was that most prosperous people, thoroughly disposed that God was well-pleased with that which Amos was sent to deliver a stern rebuke for all their misdeeds, and to announce in God’s name their forthcoming ruin and captivity (vii, 17).

Amos’s mission to Israel was but a temporary one. It extended apparently from two years before to a few years after an ear-wax, the exact date of which is unknown (i, 1). It met with strong opposition, especially on the part of Amasias, the chief priest of the royal sanctuary in Bethel (vii, 10–13). How it came to an end is not known; for only late and untrustworthy legends tell of Amos’s martyrdom under the ill-treatment of Amasias and his son. It is more probable that, in compliance with Amasias’s threatening order (vii, 12), the prophet withdrew to Juda, where at leisure he arranged his oracles in their well-planned disposition.

III. ANALYSIS OF PROPHETICAL WRITING. — The book of Amos falls naturally into three parts. The first opens with a prophetic title giving the author’s name and the general date of his minis- try (i, 1), and a text or motto in four poetical lines (i, 2), describing under a fine image the Lord’s power over Palestine. This part comprises the first two chapters, and is made up of a series of oracles against Damascus, Gaza, Tyre, Edom, Ammon, Moab, Judah, and, finally, Israel. Each oracle begins with the same numerical formula: "For three crimes of Damascus [or Gaza, or Tyre, etc., as the case may be], and for four, I will not revoke the doom"; it next sets forth the chief indictment; and finally pronounces the penalty. The chosen nation is denounced because of their ignorance of the true God, because of their breaches of the elementary and unwritten laws of natural humanity and good faith. As regards Juda and Israel, they will share the same doom because, although they were especially cared for by the Lord who drew them out of Egypt and conquered for them the land of Chanaan, and gave them prophets and Nazarites, yet they have committed the same crimes as their pagan neighbours. Israel is rebuked more at length than Juda, and its utter destruction is vividly described.

The second part (chaps. vii-vi) consists of a series of addresses which expand the indictment and the sentence against Israel set forth in ii, 6-16. Amos's indictment bears (1) on the social disorders prevalent among the upper classes; (2) on the heartless luxury and self-indulgence of the wealthy ladies of Samaria; (3) on the too great confidence of the Israelites in their moral superiority; (4) on the religious duties which can in no way secure them against the approaching doom. The sentence itself assumes the form of a dirge over the captivity which awaits the unrepenting transgressors, and the complete surrender of the country to the foreign enemy.

The third section of the book (chaps. vii-ix, x.), apart from the historical account of Amasias's opposition to Amos (vii, 10-17), and from a discourse (viii, 4-14) similar in tone and import to the addresses contained in the second part of the prophecy, is wholly made up of visions of judgment against Israel. In the first two visions—the one of devouring locusts, and the other of consuming fire—the foretold destruction is stayed by divine interposition; but in the third vision, that of a plumb-line, the destruction is permitted to become complete. The fourth vision, like the foregoing, is symbolical; a basket of summer fruit points to the speedy decay of Israel; while in the fifth and last the prophet beholds the Lord standing beside the altar and threatening the Northern Kingdom with a chastisement from which there is no escape. The book concludes with God's solemn promise of the glorious renovation of the house of Israel, and the wonderful prosperity of the purified nation (ix, 8c-15).

III. LITERARY FEATURES OF THE BOOK.—It is universally admitted at the present day that these contents are set forth in a style of "high literary merit". This literary excellence might, indeed, at first sight appear in strange contrast with Amos's obscure birth and humble shepherd life. A closer study, however, of the prophet's writing and of the actual circumstances of its composition does away with that apparent contrast. Before Amos's time the Hebrew language had gradually passed through several stages, and was not so much merely the result of the oral tradition, as the result of an elaborate form. Finally, to associate inferior culture with the simplicity and relative poverty of pastoral life would be to mistake totally the conditions of Eastern society, ancient and modern. For among the Hebrews of old, as among the Arabs of the present day, the vernacular was the language of their oral utterances, with their prevailing tendency to become written and elaborately composed.

V. RELIGIOUS TEACHINGS OF AMOS.—Two facts contribute to give to the religious doctrine of Amos a special importance. First, the prophecies are wellnaigh universally regarded as authentic, and on the other, his work is probably the earliest prophetic writing which has come down to us. So that the book of Amos furnishes us with most valuable information concerning the beliefs of the eighth century B.C. and, in fact, concerning those of some time before, since, in delivering the Divine message to his contemporaries, the prophet always takes for granted that they are already familiar with the truths to which he appeals. Amos teaches a most pure monotheism. Throughout his book he nowhere appears to have been swayed by any of the false notions of the nations. He is no preacher to the heathen nations or to the chosen people. The prophet repeatedly inveighs against the false notions which are current among his contemporaries and are used of God's relation to Israel. He does not deny that the Lord is their God in a special manner. But he argues that His benefits to them in the past, instead of being a reason for them to indulge with security in sins hateful to God's holiness, really increase their guilt and must make them fear a severer penalty. He does not deny that sacrifices should be offered to the Divine Majesty; but he most emphatically declares that such offerings of their own free will are not pleasing to God and cannot placate His anger. On the day of the Lord, that is on the day of retribution, Israelites who shall be found guilty of the same crimes as the heathen nations will be held to account for them severely. It is true that Amos argues in a concrete manner with his contemporaries, and they consider the cases he brings up to be mere principles. Nevertheless, his book is replete with truths which can never become superfluous or obsolete.

Finally, whatever view may be taken of the authorship of the concluding portion of the book of Amos (xii.10), the Messianic bearing of the passage will be readily admitted by all who believe in the existence of the supernatural. It may also be added that this Messianic prophecy is worded in a manner that offers no insuperable objection to the traditional view which regards Amos as its author.

Amovibility, a term applied to the condition of certain ecclesiastics in regard to their benefices or offices. While it is true that holders of so-called perpetual or irremovable dignities can in certain specified cases be deprived of their offices, yet the term "amovibility" is generally restricted to such cases as are removable at the will of the bishop. Such are most of the rectors of churches in the United States and England, as also in general and universal, where those who have charge of succursal churches or are parish assistants. Under the head of removables, dignitaries, canonists generally class also vicars-general, archdeacons, and rural deans. Such an office or benefice is designated manumissum, as opposed to titulare or perpetuum. The interpretation of amovibility has caused considerable controversy. Many canonists have argued that because the possessor of an office holds it ad nutum, he can therefore be deprived of it without cause. Otherwise, they declare, the word amovibility would have no meaning. They note as examples thereby, to this power of the bishop, cases in which he acts from open hatred, or injures the good name of the ecclesiastic, or damages the parish. Likewise, they say, if the person removed were not given another office, he could have recourse to a superior authority, as this would be equivalent to injuring his good name. These canonists also add that the bishop would sin if he removed an ecclesiastic without cause, as his action would be without a proper motive, and because frequent changes are necessarily detrimental to churches. Other canonists seem to maintain for removable rectors (see Rector; Fanum Parish) practically the same rights as to perpetuities, which are possessed by irremovable ecclesiastics. Perhaps, however, the difference between these opinions is little more than verbal. Amovibility must not be confounded with arbitrary removal, which the Church has always condemned. It is opposed rather to the perpetual tenure of those benefices, for removal from which the canons require a cause greater than that provided in canonical process or trial. But there may be other very grave causes that justify a removal besides those named in the canons. Nor does it follow that, because a regular canonical process is not to be observed, all formalities are to be neglected in the removal of rectors who hold their office ad nutum, episcopi; there are also extra-judicial forms which are practically equivalent to a canonical process.

A removable rector is, therefore, one who may be removed without cause expressed in law, but not without a just cause; one who may be removed without canonical process, but not without certain specified formalities, and usually justly although "extra-judicial" as regards the canons. Since, however, removable ecclesiastics have no strict and perpetual right to their offices, any revocation made by the superior ad nutum is valid, though it might be gravely illicit and reversible. Such an officer may be removed by the authority, although an ordinary appeal in the strict sense is barred. In the United States the method of procedure is laid down principally in the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1886) and the Roman Instructions "Quamvis" of 1878 and "Cum Magnopere" of 1894.

Ampère, André-Marie, physicist and mathematician, b. 22 January, 1775, at Lyons, France; d. at Marseilles, 10 June, 1836. His father was a prosperous and educated merchant, his mother a woman of culture and piety, while himself combined the traits of both. The mathematical bent of his mind showed itself very early. Before he knew his letters and numbers he is said to have performed complex arithmetical computations by means of pebbles and beans. His childhood days were spent in the village of Poleymieux-les-Mont-d'Or, near Lyons. His father began to teach him Latin, but, on discovering the boy's thirst for mathematical knowledge, he provided him with the necessary books. It was not long before he had mastered the elements of his chosen study, so that his father was obliged to take the boy to the library of the presbytery, where he would read works of Bernoulli and Euler. On being informed that these books were written in Latin, and that he would need a knowledge of the calculus, he resumed the study of the one and applied himself to that of the other, and at the end of a few weeks was able to take up the serious perusal of difficult treatises in applied mathematics. During the revolution his father returned to Lyons, in 1793, expecting to be safer in the city. After the siege, however, he fell a victim and was executed. This death was a great shock to the delicate, sensitive boy, who for more than a year was in a state bordering on idocy. For this he was suddenly aroused by the reading of two works: J. J. Rousseau's "Letters on Botany" and Horace's "Ode to Licius", which led him to the immediate study of plants and of the classic poets. In 1799 he married Julie Carron, who lived only five years longer, leaving a son who afterwards became a writer of great literary merit. Ampère was obliged to support himself by his father's profession. At first he gave private lessons in Lyons; later, in 1801, he left his wife and child to take the chair of physics at the Ecole Centrale in Bourg. There he wrote the article that attracted the attention of Lalande and Delambre: "Considérations sur la théorie mathématique du jeu". In this he attacks and solves the problem of showing the chances of the gambler are always against him. It is noted for its elegant and polished, though simple, application of the calculus of probabilities. The favourable appreciation of his work by men like Delambre resulted in his call to Lyons and later, in 1805, to the Ecole Polytechnique at Paris, where, in 1809, he rose to the position of Professor of Mathematics in the Académie des Sciences of the Legion of Honour, and where his work alternated between mathematics, physics, and metaphysics. He published a number of articles on calculus, on curves, and other purely mathematical topics, as well as on chemistry and light, and even on zoology. Ampère's fame rests on two remarkable works in electro-dynamics. It was on 11 September, 1820, that an academician, returning from Geneva, repeated before the Academy the epoch-marking experiments of the Danish savant Oersted. A wire through which an electric current passed was shown to deflect a magnetic needle, causing it to place itself at right angles to the direction of the current. The connexion between electricity and magnetism was indicated by these experiments, and the foundation was laid for the science of electro-magnetism. Only a week later, on the 18th of the same month, Ampère demonstrated before the Academy another remarkable fact. He showed by the repulsion or attraction of two wires carrying currents, according as the currents are in the same or in opposite directions. This laid the foundation of the science of electro-dynamics.

Ampère continued his experiments, published the results in 1822, and, finally, developed his 'Mathematical Theory of the Phenomena of Electro-dynamics' in 1830. In 1831 he suggested an electric telegraph, using separate wires for every letter. His final work, published after his death, was the ambitious "Essai sur la philosophie des sciences, ou exposition analytique d'une classification naturelle de toutes les connaissances humaines". His prediction for哲学, psychological, and metaphysical speculation was very marked. His arduous task as teacher, together with the ingrossing functions of a government official—he was Inspector-General of the University—prevented him from devoting himself more to the work of the experimenter. He was a member of the Institute of France, the Royal Societies of Berlin, Stockholm, Brussels, and Lisbon, and other scientific societies. In 1872 Madame Chevereux edited his "Journal et Correspondance". In 1881 the Paris Conference of Electricians honoured his memory by naming the practical unit of electric current the "ampère". His religious life was one of extraordinary sanctity, as the fact that at eighteen years he found three culminating points in his life, his First Communion, the reading of Thomas's "Eloge de Descartes", and the taking of the Basilil. His marriage to the pious Julie Carron was secretly performed by a priest, her family refusing to recognize the competency of the consolitional"دواهjaeja;w2s; in this fact impressed him very deeply. On the day of his wife's death he wrote two verses from the Psalms, and the prayer, "O Lord, God of Mercy, unite me in Heaven with those whom you have permitted me to love on earth". Serious doubts harassed him at times, and made him very much a sceptic. He became a defence in the hearing of the Bible and the Fathers of the Church. "Doubt", he says in a letter to a friend, "is the greatest torment that a man suffers on earth."

AMPHIBOLISM. See CHASUBLE.

Amphibus of Iconium, a Christian bishop of the fourth century, son of a Cappadocian family of distinction, b. perhaps at Cesaerea, c. 339 or 340; d. probably some time between 394 and 403. His father was an eminent lawyer, and his mother Livia remarkable for gentleness and wisdom. He was probably first cousin to Gregory of Nazianzus, and was brought up in the temple, and in the public sphere of the Christian aristocracy of his native province. He studied for the bar, practised at Constantinople, but soon retired to lead a religious life in the vicinity of his friend and relative, the "theologian" of Nazianzus. He was soon drawn within the circle of Basil's friends, and it is said to have been for a while a member of the Christian "City of the Poor" that Basil had built at Cesarea. Early in 374 he was bishop of the important see of Iconium, probably placed there by Basil, whom he continued to aid in Cappadocian ecclesiastical affairs until Basil's death (379). Thenceforth he remained in close relations with Gregory of Nazianzus, and accompanied him to the Synod of Constantinople (381), where St. Jerome met and conversed with him (De Vir. Ill., c. 133). In the history of theology he occupies a place of prominence for his defence of the divinity of the Holy Spirit against the Macedonians (381). It was to the Bishop of Cesaerea that Basil's friend wrote "On the Holy Spirit". He wrote a similar work, now lost. We know, however, that he read it to St. Jerome on the occasion of their meeting at Constantinople. His attitude towards Arianism is illustrated by the well-known anecdote concerning his audience with Theodosius and his son Arcadius. When the Emperor reproved him for ignoring the presence of his son, he reminded him that the Lord of the universe abhorred those who are ungrateful towards His Son, their Saviour and Benefactor. He was very energetic against the Messalians (q. v.), and contributed to the extinction of that heresy. His contemporaries rated him very high as a theologian and a scholarly writer. Not to speak of his admirers and friends already mentioned, St. Jerome says (Ep. 70) of the Cappadocian triad (Basil, Gregory; and Amphibus) that "they cram their books with the lessons and sentences of the philosophers to such an extent that you ought to admire most in them, their secular erudition or their scriptural knowledge". In the next generation Theodoret described him in very flattering terms (Hist. Eccl., Iv, x; V, xvi), and he is quoted by councils as late as 787. His only genuine extant work is, "An Apology for the Christian Religion", his "Epistulae" (pp. 249), the "Epistola Synodica", a letter against the Macedonian heresy in the name of the bishops of Lycozia, and probably addressed to the bishops of Lycoxia (Goldhorn, S. Basili., Opp. Sel. Dogm., 630-633). The spurious "Jambics to Seleucus" offer an early and important catalogue of the canonical writings. Others spurious fragments, current under his name, are taken from scriptural discourses, dogmatical letters and controversial writings (P. G. XXXIX, 13-130). "FASSELER-JENEMANN, Inst. Amphophilus of Side (Sida), in Pamphylia, a bishop of the first half of the fifth century, member of the Council of Ephesus (431), where he vigorously opposed the Messalians and subscribed to the condemnation and deposition of Nestorius. He does not seem to have been any other than a later editor. Even if he did not assist at the "Robber Council" of Ephesus (449), he showed great sympathy for Dioscorus of Alexandria at the Council of Chalcedon, and consented with reluctance to his condemnation. He subscribed to the "tomus" of Pope Leo, and the canons of Chalcedon, although later he wrote to the Emperor Leo (448) that he did not acknowledge the authority of that council. Photius quotes (Bibl. Cod., 230) Eulogius of Alexandria (579–607) in evidence of a later acceptance and subscription by Amphilochius. Only one brief letter-fragment has reached us (P. G., LXXVII, 1515–16).

Amphora, vessels generally made of clay, and furnished with ears or handles. Amphora were used for various purposes, but especially for holding wine. Several monuments of the catacomb of St. Calixtus contain representations of amphora. A fragment of one of these represents a boat with sails attached to a trident, and a cargo consisting of two amphora; on the prow a dove is perched, with the usual olive branch. A fresco also, of the catacomb of Pontianus, represents a boatman on the Tiber with a cargo of amphora. Both representations evidently allude to the calling of the deceased; the dove in the former case with the branch of olive is a symbol expressing the belief that the deceased was already in possession of everlasting peace. Fragments of amphora have been found in the catacombs, one of which, now in the Lateran museum, is inscribed with the words: “Vivas in Deo”. The handle of an amphora in the Kircherian Museum at Rome has the monogram of Christ. The same monogram, engraved between two palms, appears on the neck of an amphora discovered in excavations on the Via Nazionale, at Rome. Altogether about sixty of these utensils have been found inscribed with emblems peculiar to the Christians. A few of the most interesting of this category, containing the monogram, belong to the collection of amphora found in the cellar of the house of SS. John and Paul on the Colian.

Ampleforth. The Abbey of, in the County of Yorkshire, England, belongs to the English Congregation of Benedictines and has a line of continuity with the pre-Reformation Abbey of Westminster through Father Sebert Buckley, last surviving monk of that community. The present abbey was founded in a basement is taken up by the monastic library, consisting of some 30,000 volumes, many of them of extreme rarity. The refectory, lecture halls, and the abbot’s rooms are on the first floor; above are the cells of the monks, forty-eight in all. The public rooms are on the scale of the larger abbeys of pre-Reformation times”. According to the English “Catholic Directory” for 1906, there are fifteen priests in the abbey; but there are a number of dependent missions served by monks of the community. The titular abbeys of Westminster and York and the Cathedral priories of Durham, Worcester, Chester, and Rochester are attached to the abbey.

Amphulla.—Among the smaller objects discovered in the catacombs are a number of fragments of vessels ordinarily used for domestic purposes. Some of these fragments are, probably, portions of the drinking cups used in the celebration of the funeral agape, or banquet, while others again are the remains of vases which contained the unguents that the Christians, like the Jews and the pagans, often interred with the dead. A third class of vessels, ordinarily referred to as blood-ampullae, has been the subject of considerable speculation by archaeologists. Portions of these vessels have been found in the cement employed to enclose certain graves in the catacombs. These vessels contained the sediment from which the red colour they contain, from which they derive the name, blood-ampullae, on the theory that the sediment is the remains of the blood of a martyr. This theory was for a time rather generally accepted, and the presence of a blood-vase was regarded as one of the most typical characteristics of a Christian tomb. However, in the second edition of his "Dict. des antiquités chrétiennes" (Paris, 1877), Leclercq expressed himself as dissatisfied with the proofs put forward by its supporters. Professor Kraus, also, in a work devoted to this subject, pronounced against the unconditional acceptance of the blood theory. The reasons for this conclusion are as follows: (1) the so-called blood-ampullae have been found on tombs of the latter half of the fourth century, a time when the era of persecution was long over; (2) the monogram of Christ, which in practically all cases indicates the age of Constantine, is frequently represented on what are supposed blood-ampullae; (3) the fifth of the tombs with ampullae of this class contained the remains of children under seven, and it is difficult to admit that so large a proportion of martyrs were mere infants; (4) a chemical analysis made at Greenwich of the contents of sixty ampullae has shown that the sediment contains a quantity of oxide of iron, twenty or more, times greater than would have existed in blood.

These results of later investigation are wholly negative, and the theories advanced in place of that formerly accepted are by no means satisfactory. Kraus regards vessels of this class as having been, as a rule, receptacles for holy water; in six instances, however, it seems that they probably contained blood. The Bollandist Victor De Buck conjectures that the wine left after the celebration of Mass was placed in them, but this view is not borne out by the Greenwich analysis. Leclercq concludes his remarks on this matter by calling attention to the fact that ampullae have been found on Jewish tombs fastened in the same way as in the Christian cemeteries, in the catacombs of the Vigna Randanini and the Via Labicana. In relation to this subject two decisions of the Sacred Congregation of Rites are of interest. The first of them, given 10 April, 1668, states that when on a tomb (vas illorum sanguine tinctum) are evidences of a martyr's grave. The second decision, dated 10 December, 1683, is formulated in substantially the same terms (Phialae . . . sanguine tinctae). These decrees require no modification, even at the present time, but it is now necessary to determine by chemical analysis whether the content of a vase is really blood or not. The term ampulla was applied also to the vessels of terra-cotta, metal, or glass in which the holy oils were kept (Opat. Mil., Contra Donatist., II, 19; ampulla chrismatis). The "Sainte Ampoule" used at the consecration of the kings of France in the Cathedral of Reims, is an object of great reverence in medieval France (see REIMS), and was popularly believed to have been brought from Heaven by a dove at the baptism of Clovis (496). In the Cathedral of Monza are preserved several of the ampullae sent to Queen Theodolinda by Pope Gregory the Great; they contained oil from the tombs of the most famous Roman martyrs. This custom of obtaining ampulla filled with oil from the lamps at the shrines of martyrs was generally observed in the Middle Ages; those from the tomb of St. Menas in Egypt, brought to Europe by pilgrims, are especially numerous. Ampullae usually bore the image or symbol of the saint from whose tomb the oil was obtained.

Arna. The name of certain ancient Irish elegies or panegyrics on native saints. The most famous of these which have reached us is known as the Arna of Columb Cille (Columbkill). It was printed with a translation by O'Beirne Crowe in 1871 from the imperfect text in the Leabhar na h'Uidhre; also in his edition of the "Liber Hymnorum" by Professor Atkinson, and in his "Goidelica" by Whitley Stokes, from a perfect, imperfect text in Tadhg O'Coileain Collection. These editions may, however, be considered as superseded by the Bodleian text (Rawlinson B. 502) edited, with a translation, for the first time (Rev. Celt., vols. XX-XXI) by Stokes. According to the traditional account this eulogy was composed about the year 575 by Dallan Mac Forgail, the chief minister of that time, in gratitude for the services of St. Columbkill in saving the bards from expulsion at the great assembly of Druim Cett in that year. "The Arna is not", says Stokes, "as Professor Atkinson supposed, a fragment which indicates great antiquity." Strachan, however, on linguistic grounds, assigns it as present form to about the year 800 (Rev. Celt., XVII, 14). Stokes, too, seems to favour this view (ibid., XX, 16). But linguistic grounds are somewhat uncertain, and Strachan adds "perhaps something more may be learned from a prolonged study of this and other such as the Arna Sasan and the Arna Conrai." Dallan was the author of the former, "held in great repute", says Colgan, "on account of its gracefulness", and also of another Arna on Consall of Iniskeel in Donegal, with whom he was buried in one grave.

Arna.—Central Syria has preserved for us an unquelled series of Christian monuments. From an early period, the insecurity of a land overrun, at intervals, by armies or by brigands, has driven the inhabitants away from a soil, the very fertility of which has made it the prey of armed nomads. The scarcity of wood suggested to architects the possibility of a form of construction in which stones alone should be used, and blocks, placed with wonderful skill and science, should obviate the need of woodwork. This, indeed, explains the long endurance of buildings which have suffered little at the hands of time and not much more from earthquakes.
AMRAHEL

The Syrian houses in the region of Hauran were inhabited, from the third century to the seventh, by small families. A house of this kind in perfect preservation is still to be seen at Amrah. It is a huge dwelling built round three sides of a courtyard. The chief room is a great hall running to the height of two stories. Each of the bedrooms on the ground floor, which were in number, had a kind of small dais covered by a highly ornamented, semicircular canopy, and forming an alocve. A closet, adjoining the room, had cupboards all round it, taken out of the thickness of the walls, and divided by slabs of stone.

A stone house at Amrah had a story which was reached by an exterior staircase. The floor, which serves as ceiling to the ground floor, is made of flagstones resting on arches or on corbels fastened to the wall, and the stone doors turn on stone hinges. In this house, as in other Syrian houses, a large, central hall was the most honourable part of the dwelling, where family meetings were held, and the stranger who was allowed to enter it was as greatly favoured as the guest whom a Roman admitted to his fireside. At the present day this house has found caretakers among the natives themselves. It was found suitable for a quick and inexpensive fitting-up, and the sheik of the village of Dounias has made it his home. The women and children (the baram) live exclusively in the upper story, the sheik's administrative functions are carried on in the ground-floor rooms, while the great hall has been kept for its ancient uses.

Amraphel, King of Sennaar (Shinar), or Babylon, one of the four Mesopotamian kings—the other three being Arioch, King of Pontus (Elassar); Chedorlamarom, King of Elam, and Thadai (Tedal), King of Nations (Goyim)—who, according to the fourteenth chapter of Genesis, jointly invaded Chasna and defeated the five kings of the plains, capturing Lot and his family, together with a rich booty. On their way home they were assailed and routed in a single night by Abraham and his 318 men in the vale of S Side (Siddim), near the Dead Sea. Abraham's prisoners were Lot and his family. Abraham, furthermore, while on his way back from his victorious attack, was met by Melchisedech, the High-Priest of El-Eliion, at Jerusalem, who celebrated Abraham's victory by a thanksgiving offering of bread and wine, taking from him, as his sacerdotal share, the tenth part of the booty. To Biblical scholars and theologians the personality of Amraphel is of considerable interest, owing to the fact that he has been long ago identified by the majority of Assyriologists and Biblical critics with the great Babylonian king, Hammurabi, the sixth monarch of the first Babylonian dynasty, who reigned as such from 1792 to 1750 B.C. This ruler's famous Code of laws of the world, was discovered in 1901-2, in Susa, the ancient capital of Elam, by the French archeological expedition, and was for the first time deciphered and translated by the French Dominican scholar, Father Scheil, of Paris.

The identity of Amraphel and Hammurabi is now generally accepted by Biblical critics. Phonetically, the two names are identical. The variants of the second form are Ammi-rabi, Ammurabi, and Hammum-rabi, etc. Hammurabi, or Ammu, was in all probability the name of a god, as it is found in many compound names such as Sumu-ammu, haammu, and others. The element rabi is very common in Babylonia, and it means "god"; the full name, consequently, means "the god Ammu is great"; on the same analogy as names like Sin-rabi, Sama-rabi, and many others. According to Dr. Linsell, followed by Sayce, and others, the name was pronounced Ammurabi, and, as Dr. Pinches was the first to point out, the form Ammu-rapi is also met with by the side of Hammu-rabi, and like many of the Babylonian kings of that period he was deified, being addressed as ilu-Ammu-rabi or Ammurabi-ilu, i.e. "Ammurabi the god", thus being the equivalent of the Hebrew El, which means "god". Now Ammurabi-ilu or Ammurapili is letter for letter the Amraphel, or Amrapel, of Genesis. According to another hypothesis, suggested by Dr. Huyguy, the 1 at the end of the form Amraphel' is superfluous, for he would join it to the root word, and read it as days of Amraphel, as Arioch king of Elassar was over Shinar, that Chodorlamarom ...." Another, and according to Dr. Pinches perhaps more likely, explanation is that this additional letter 1 is due to a faulty reading of a variant writing of the name, with a polyphoneous character having the value of gut, as well as 1, which form may, in fact, still be found. But whichever hypothesis we adopt, the identity of Amraphel and Hammurabi is phonetically beyond dispute.

The political situation presupposed in Gen. xiv, reflects, furthermore, with a remarkable degree of probability, the condition of the times of Hammurabi's reign. The leader of the forces and the suzerain to whom the Chanaanitish princes were subject, was a king of Elam. Elam, therefore, must have been the predominant power at the time, and the Babylonian king must have been its vassal. The narrative, nevertheless, is dated in the reign of the Babylonian king, and not in that of the King of Elam, and it is to the reign of the Babylonian king that the events described in it are attached. Babylonian, however, was not a united country; there was another king, Arioch of Elassar, who divided with the Amraphel of Sennaar the government of it, and, like Amraphel, acknowledged the supremacy of Elam. Finally, the "nations" (goyim), whatever they were, were also subject to Elam, as well as the distant province of Chasnaa. If we turn our glance to the political condition of Hammurabi's times and period, we shall find that the contemporary monuments of Babylon are in perfect accord with the situation presupposed by Gen. xiv.

AMSTERDAM

Amsterdam, the capital, and second residential city of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, lies, in a semi-circle, on the IJ (Wye), the southwestern part of the Zuidersee, at the mouth of the Amstel, and is joined to the North Sea by the Nordse Canal, constructed between 1865 and 1879. An estimate in 1899 gave the population as 510,853, with 120,701 Catholics and 59,600 Jews; that of 1906 gives a total of 548,000, with over 122,000 Catholics.

The origin of the name "Amsterdam" dates back to the year 1204, when Gijsbrecht II, Lord of the Amstel, built a fortress on this spot. A considerable settlement soon grew up around it, which, in 1296, came into the possession of the Count of Holland. In 1301, it was raised to the rank of a city, and grew prosperous through the influx of large numbers of merchants. To the Merchants' Guild and the Bricklayers Guild most of the city developed on a large scale; at the end of the fifteenth century there were more than twenty monasteries in it, only one of which, however, the Beguinage, has survived the storm of the Reformations in its original form. Of the churches and churches the most famous is the Church of the Holy Offercings; the "Miracle of Amsterdam". It was a place resorted to by countless pilgrims, among others by the Emperor Maximilian, and the street which led to it is still known as the "Holy Way".

The Reformation found an early entrance into Amsterdam. In 1535 occurred the bloody rising of the Anabaptists, and in 1566 the destruction of holy images. The city long remained true, however, to the Catholic cause, despite the lapse of the Netherlands into apostasy. It was only in 1578 that the Calvinists gained the upper hand, drove out the officials who were loyal to the Spanish Government, and, in 1579, joined the Utrecht Union, which stipulated in its fourteenth article that no other public exercise of religion except the reformed should be allowed. The city authorities of Amsterdam, however, were, in the interests of their trade with Catholic nations, more tolerant in the enforcement of this regulation than most of the cities of the Netherlands. Certain orders, such as the Franciscans and the Jesuits, were able, in consequence of the prevailing toleration, to remain there for a long time, practically unmolested, and even in offices of State. Negotiations were, indeed, opened at Rome for the conclusion of a Concordat, and Amsterdam was to have been made a bishopric, but the Calvinistic-Orangist party were able to prevent the execution of the Concordat. The situation, however, improved under William II. The new Constitution of 1848 brought the Catholics complete liberty, and equality with the Protestants, while the year 1853 witnessed the restoration of the Catholic hierarchy, by which Amsterdam became a deanery subject to the Diocese of Haarlem. Catholic progress has kept pace since then with that of the city, which has once more risen to be the chief mercantile city of the Netherlands and one of the most important in Europe. The Catholics, who, in 1817, were 44,000, had risen, in 1885, to over 68,000.

Amsterdam has eighteen Catholic parishes; the most important churches being: the Romanesque Byzantine church of St. Nicholas, with its three towers; the Gothic churches of the Most Sacred the plague which raged in the latter half of the seventeenth century, openly to administer the consolations of religion to the Catholic faithful. Amsterdam, indeed, was at this period rising to the position of the first trading city of the world, a rise due to the fall of Antwerp in 1585, the blockade of the mouths of the Scheldt, and a series of glorious battles with England. The city became, on the contrary, less tolerant under the influence of the Jansenists. In 1660 the public exercise of the Catholic religion was forbidden, on which account the churches dating from that period have the outward appearance of private houses. The religious houses which still existed in 1708 were done away with, and their churches closed.

It was not until the end of the eighteenth century that Catholics gained any considerable measure of religious liberty, which was chiefly due to the founding by Napoleon of the Kingdom of Holland, of which Amsterdam became the capital, 1808–10. The fall of the Napoleonic dynasty and the accession of William I meant the practical cessation of this liberty, and Catholics were debarred from all the Heart of Jesus and of Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception; the church of St. Willibrord, with its seven towers, the largest in the country; and the Jesuit Church of St. Francis Xavier, on the Krijtberg. The following orders of men have houses in Amsterdam: the Jesuits, who also conduct a classical college; the Franciscans, Dominicans, Redemptorists, Augustinians, and Brothers of Mercy; of women, among others, the Béguines, whose convent dates from the fourteenth century; the Franciscan Sisters, Sisters of Our Lady of Tibrug, Dominican Sisters, Sisters of St. Charles Borromeo, Daughters of Mary and Joseph, and others. The most noted Catholic benevolent institutions are the orphanage for boys and girls, the St. Bernard's almshouse for old men and women; that of St. Nicholas, for girls; of St. Aloysius, for abandoned orphans, "Our Dear Lady's Hospice" (hospital and polyclinic); a second hospital, the Catholic Juniorate for the Diocese of Haarlem, St. James's almshouse for old people, etc. The following Catholic societies should also be mentioned: the Netherlands Catholic People's Union,

St. Joseph's Journeymen's Union, the Saint Vincent's Society, the Catholic Guild (for master-workmen), the "Faith and Science" Union, which possesses a library of over 4,000 volumes; the St. Hubert's Society, which supports a home for girls; the St. Willibrord's Society, for the distribution of good books, etc. Amsterdam has three Catholic daily papers, and among her famous Catholic citizens, we may name Holland's greatest poet, Vondel; in later times, Father Roothaan, General of the Society of Jesus from 1829 to 1853; the poet and historian Alberdingk Thijm, and the architect Cuypers.

Amulet (Gr. φαλακρύον; Lat., amuleta), an object generally inserted with mysterious formulae and used by pagans as a protection against various maladies with which they were acquainted (XXXIX. 4, 15). Moses was the earliest writer who mentions amulets (τενεφεροντα amuleta). The derivation of the word is doubtful, but it probably comes from the Arabic kamala, "to carry," amulets being borne on the person. The Oriental peoples were especially addicted to superstitious practices, and with their description into the Roman Empire the use of amulets became equally common in the West. Following the example of Moses, who sought to turn the minds of the Jews from the superstitious emblems to which they were accustomed in Egypt, by substituting for them symbols of an elevating character, the Church, while forming a different system of amulets, limited the use of objects which would remind the bearers of some doctrine of Christianity. Thus St. Clement of Alexandria (Pead., III, 3) recommended the use of such symbols as the fish, the dove, and the anchor on seals and rings. A devotional medal of lead, attributed to the fourth century, represents a martyr extended on a gridiron; one of the fifth or sixth century bears the monogram of Christ and a cross between the letters A and Ω; while a third represents the sacrifice of Abraham, and on the reverse a father offering his son before the confessor of a martyr. Pope St. Gregory the Great and St. Ambrose, on the production of the birth of her son, two phylacteria, one of which contained a fragment of the wood of the True Cross, the other a sentence of the Gospel. The custom of carrying portions of the Sacred Scriptures as phylacteries is mentioned by St. Jerome and St. John Chrysostom (St. Jerome, in Matt. iv, 24; St. John Chrysostom, in Matt. iv, 73). But especially from the fourth century, when imperial favour brought large numbers into the Church, superstitious abuses in the use of devotional emblems became so common that the ecclesiastical authorities were obliged frequently to inveigh against the use of amulets. The Council of Laodicea (latter half of fourth century) prohibited ecclesiastics from making amulets and made the penalty for wearing them excommunication (canon 36). St. John Chrysostom, preaching at Antioch, denounced as a species of idolatry the wearing of amulets, which seems to have been common among his auditory. St. Ambrose denounced the numerous charlatans who dispensed charms, and a collection of canons made by St. Cessarius of Arles (d. 542), formerly supposed to have been canons of the Fourth Council of Council, imposed the penalty of excommunication on those who patronized augurs (can. 89; see Hefele, Con-ciliengesch., II, 76). From one of the sermons (P. L., XXXIX, 2272) of St. Cæsarius it appears that the dispensing of amulets was a regular profession; each disease had its appropriate amulet. These and similar superstitions practices survived to some extent; in one form or another, through the Middle Ages, and their suppression has always been a difficulty with which the Church has had to cope. The most ancient Christian amulet known, from Beirut, is attributed to the second century. It is made of gold and has a ring by which it was attached to the neck. The inscription on it, which is of more than ordinary interest, reads: "I exorcise thee, Satan (O cross, near me) in the name of the living God, that thou mayest never leave thy abode. Pronounced in the house of her whom I have anointed!". Leclercq sees in this invocation proofs of (1) belief in the virtue of the sign of the cross to put demons to flight, (2) of the conferring of extreme unction, (3) of the use of exorcisms", whereas we have here a formula. A favourite Christian amulet in the Orient during the fourth and fifth centuries bore on one side the image of Alexander the Great. St. John Chrysostom, in one of his Antioch instructions (Ad Illumin., Cat., II, 3), censures the use by Christians of amulets with the portrait of the Macedonian conqueror. Several amulets of this class, in the Cabinet of Medals at Paris, show, on one side, Alexander in the character of Hercules, and, on the other, a she-ass with her foal, a scorpion, and the name of Jesus Christ. An amulet in the Vatican Library with the picture of Alexander, bears on the reverse the monogram of Our Lord. Magic nails also, with inscriptions were interred with the dead; one of them for Christian use has the legend "ter dio, ter incanto, in signu Deo et signu Salomonis et signu de nostrâ Art(e) mix". The Gnostics were especially notable for their employment of amulete; the names found most frequently in their invocations are Adonai, Sabaohi, Jao, Michael, Raphael, Sourid (Urtel), and Gabriel. Amulets, USE and ABUSE OF.—The origin of the word amulet does not seem to have been definitely established. See Amulet. It has been used as a safeguard against mishap or danger, or witchcraft, and invoked as a guarantee of success in enterprises. Among the Greeks it was variously known under the designations phylacterion, periamma, and periaptom, whilst to the Arabsians and Persians it was familiar as talisman, possibly derivable from the later Greek, teleisma. Amulets have had quite a general vogue among all peoples of all times and have been characterized by a bewildering variety as to material, shape, etc. St. Ambrose described the number of charlatans who dispensed charms, and a collection of canons made by St. Cessarius of Arles (d. 542), formerly supposed to have been canons of the Fourth Council of Council, imposed the penalty of excommunication on those who patronized augurs (can. 89; see Hefele, Con-
upon one side with many devices. Among the Greeks and Romans amulets seem to have been largely employed as a defence against certain evil powers to whom they attributed no inconsiderable part in the government and control of the world.

The Jews, so far as escape from this superstition was concerned, enjoyed an advantage not possessed by the pagan peoples of antiquity. They had the knowledge of the true God, and the Mosaic law, which gave such minute directions for the government of their religious and social life, contained severe prohibitions of magic and divination. That nevertheless, even in patriarchal times, they were not altogether free from this contamination seems fairly deducible from some passages in Genesis, xxxi, 19, xxxv, 4. Later on there is no doubt but that through their contact with the Egyptians and Babylonians, amongst whom the use of amulets was widespread, they had recourse to talismans in many ways. Whether the tephillin, that is, the small leathern pouches containing passages of the law, and later known as phylacteries, were regarded as amulets at all times, is not susceptible of determination from the references to them in the Pentateuch. In the beginning, at any rate, they do not appear to have had any such purpose; subsequently, however, they unquestionably were employed as such, as is proven by the Targum (Canticle of Canticles, viii, 3) as well as Buxtorf (Synagoga Jud., ed. 1757). There is no doubt but that some of the ornaments used in the apparel of Jewish women were really amulets. This seems to be the proper interpretation of the phrase “little moons” which occurs in Isaiah, iii, 18, as well as the “earrings” mentioned in verse 20 of the same chapter. This superstition dominated even more strongly the Jews of post-Biblical times, partly as a result of their freer intercourse with other people, and partly because of the extreme formalism of their religious life. The Talmud contains evidence of this.

The reliance placed upon amulets, like other forms of superstition, grew out of popular ignorance and fear. With the coming of the Christian religion therefore, it was destined to disappear. It would have been too much, however, to have expected the victory of Christianity in this matter to have been an easy and instantaneous one. Hence it is intelligible that in the newest converts from paganism there remained a disposition, if not to cling to the forms they had of necessity abjured, at all events to attribute to the Christian symbols of worship something of the power and value of the amulets with which they were so generously supplied in heathenism. From the beginning the Church was on the alert to detect the first signs of this abuse and set her face sternly against it. Thus, for instance, we find the Council of Laodicea, in the fourth century, after forbidding the clergy to be sorcerers, conjurers, etc., or to make amulets, deciding that those who wear amulets are to be excommunicated. Epiphanius (Expositio fidei Catholicae, c. 24) witnesses pointedly to the prohibition by the Church of amulets. Objects dear to Christian piety, such as in the early days the representation of the Good Shepherd, the Lamb, palms, relics of the martyrs, and in later days, pictures of the saints, medals, Agnus Dei, etc., were venerated in a relative sense. They were, in the mind of the Church, in no wise thought to have any latent power or divinity in them, or to be calculated to assure, as of themselves, to their possessors, protection against harm or success in undertakings. The Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV) is at some pains to formulate the authoritative teaching of the Church with regard to the honour paid to images of Christ, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the Saints. It does not deal professedly with the subject of amulets, but the words in which it sets forth its mind upon the worship of images describe with a peculiar appositeness the attitude of the Church towards all that array of pious objects, approved or tolerated by her, which have so improperly been stigmatized as amulets. “The Holy Synod commands that especially are images of Christ, of the Virgin Mother of God and of the other Saints to be had and kept in churches; and that due honour and veneration be accorded to them: not because it is believed that any divinity or virtue is in them for which they are to be revered; or that anything may be asked from them; or that any confidence can be placed in the images as was done of old by the Gentiles... but because the honour which is exhibited to them is referred to the prototypes which they represent”, etc. Thus they are sharply and definitively differentiated from the amulets and talismans of popular superstition whether of antiquity or of a later period.

Amulea, a titular see of Peloponnesus in Greece, in the ecclesiastical province of Hellas, a suffragan of Corinth, and in the Middle Ages a Latin see known to the French rulers of Achaia as Micles, or Nicea, afterwards united with the see of Wulkanus and Leonardi (Megalopolis). It was one of the most ancient towns of Greece, and said to have been the home of Tyndarus and of Castor and Pollux (Amyclae fratres). It is mentioned by Homer (IIad, II, 384). It was situated quite close to Sparta in a fertile and wooded district, not far from the river Euromus.

Amyot, Jacques, Bishop of Auxerre, Grand Almoner of France, and man of letters, b. 30 October, 1513; d. 6 February, 1593. He studied in Paris at the College of France, where he earned his living by performing menial services for his fellow students. Although naturally slow, his uncommon diligence enabled him to accumulate a large stock of classical and general knowledge. He took his degree of Master of Arts at the age of nineteen. A secretary of State engaged him as tutor to his children and recommended him to Marguerite d'Angouleme, the only sister of Francis I. He was appointed Professor of Greek and Latin in the University of Bourges. During the ten years in which he held this position, he translated into French the Greek novel "Theogones and Charicles" and several of Plutarch's "Vies", of which the latter had been translated into Latin by the Jesuits. The first four of these were dedicated, conferred upon them, the abbey of Bellozane. After the death of Francis I Amyot accompanied the French ambassador to Venice, and later went to Rome. Cardinal de Tournon, whose favour he had won, sent him with a letter from Henry II to the Council of Trent. On his arrival the king named him tutor to his two younger sons. He now finished the translation of Plutarch's "Vies", and afterwards undertook that of Plutarch's "Morals", which he finished in the reign of Charles IX. The latter made him Bishop of Auxerre, Grand Almoner of France, and Curator of the University of Paris. Notwithstanding his success, Amyot did not neglect his studies; he revised all his translations with great care. His translation of Plutarch is the basis of North's English translation, the source of Shakespeare's three Roman plays. During his closing years, France was the scene of civil war. The Armagnacs, the Guises were murdered, Amyot was falsely accused of having connived at the assassination. This charge greatly afflicted the aged Bishop. It is the general opinion of scholars that, by his translation of Plutarch, Amyot contributed greatly to the refinement of the French language. His style is always simple, charming, picturesque, and pithy. Amyot's works are: translations of Heliodorus (1547) and of Diodorus Siculus (1554), "Amours pastorales de Daphnis et Chloe" (1559), "Vies des hommes illustres de Plutarque" (1565-75), "Oeuvres morales de Plutarque" (1572).

ANABAPTISTS

Anabaptists (Gr. ἀναβάπτειν, again, and βάπτισις, baptism; rebaptizers), a violent and extremely radical body of ecclesiastico-civil reformers which first made its appearance in 1523 at Zwickau, in the present kingdom of Saxony, under the following forms.

I. NAME AND DOCTRINAL PRINCIPLES. — The name Anabaptists, etymologically applicable, and sometimes applied to all Christian denominations that practice re-baptism, is, in general historical usage, restricted to those who, denying the validity of infant baptism, came out of the Church of France, with the Zwickau movement of the sixteenth century. The designation was generally repudiated by those to whom it was applied, as the discussion did not centre around the question whether baptism can be repeated, but around the question whether the first baptism was valid. The Six Articles of the Catholic Church in which the Anabaptists generally agreed were the following: (1) They aimed at restoring what they claimed to have been primitive Christianity. This restoration included the rejection of oaths and capital punishment and the abetment from the exercise of magistracy. (2) In a more consistent manner than the majority of Protestant reformers, they maintained absolute supremacy and sole sufficiency of the canonical Scriptures as a norm of faith. However, private inspiration and religious sentiment played an important role among them. (3) Infant baptism and the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith alone were condemned as contrary to natural religion. (4) The new Kingdom of God, which they purported to found, was to be the reconstruction, on an entirely different basis, of both ecclesiastical and civil society. Communism, including for some of them the community of women, was to be the underlying principle of the new state.

II. ORIGIN AND HISTORY. — The question of the validity of baptism appears in two great phases in ecclesiastical history. The first controversy raged at an early date (third and fourth centuries) and regarded the minister of the sacrament (baptism conferred by heretics). It was at a much later date that the second controversy, which were not only contained, were not contested, was the object of infant baptism was the point controverted. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the Petribusians rejected infant baptism and they and many subsequent medieval heretics (Henricians, Waldenses, Albigeneses, and Bohemian Brethren) held views resembling in some respects the tenets of the Anabaptists. There is, however, little if any historical connection between the Anabaptists and those earlier sects. Luther's principles and examples exercised more influence over the new movement. Private interpretation of the Scriptures, however, and inward teaching by the Holy Ghost could be claimed by any individual, and logically led to the extreme Anabaptist views. (a) Anabaptism in Saxon and Thuringia (1521-25). — Nicholas Storch, a weaver (d. 1525), and Thomas Münzer, a Lutheran preacher (c. 1490-1525), together with the other self-styled "Prophets of Zwickau" made, the basis of the Zwickau movement. The doctrines of the absolute equality of all men and complete community of goods and the resulting disturbances soon brought them into conflict with the civil authorities of Zwickau. Storch, before any repressive measures were taken against him, left with two associates for Wittenberg (1521), where he continued his preaching. Carstadt was soon gained over to the cause. The combined agitation of Carstadt and Storch at Wittenberg, and Carstadt's iconoclastic proceedings forced Luther to leave the Wartburg and appear on the scene. He preached against the new apostles as much vehemently as they had done against him. Storch until his death at Munich travelled through Germany, spreading his doctrines, especially in Thuringia (1522-24) where he was one of the principal instigators of the Peasants' War. Münzer rejected infant baptism in theory, but retained it in practice. He was expelled from Zwickau (1521) and went to Bohemia, where he had but little success as a propagandist. In 1525 he came as preacher to Alsted and married a former nun. He was soon surrounded by a large following, introduced a German religious service and attacked Luther as well as the then existing order of things. He was finally burned at Mulheim in 1525. His movement was interrupted by a journey through the south of Germany, was equally successful. Henry Pfeifer, an apostate monk, who became his co-labourer at Mühlhausen, had prepared the ground for the new gospel. Münzer and Pfeifer became absolute masters of the city, and crowds of peasants andburghers who, discontented with prevailing conditions, flocked around them, pillaged and devastated the surrounding country. To quell the insurrectionary movement John, the Elector of Saxony, Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, and Duke Henry of Brunswick, assembled forces and attacked the peasants, led by Münzer at Frankenhausen (1525). The insurgents were utterly defeated. After the battle Münzer was discovered at Frankenhausen in a bed in which he had hidden, and was delivered up to the executioner. He remained a convert of the Christian Church before his death, while his associate Pfeifer, still impenitent, underwent the death penalty (1525).

(6) The Swiss Anabaptist Movement (1523–25).—Like Luther, Zwingli, the originator of the Reformation in Switzerland, soon found more radical competitors. In 1525 some of his associates separated from him and preached reformation and communism. The party found two capable leaders in John Denk and Balthasar Hubmaier. Its following, recruited especially from the working classes, became considerable, not only in Switzerland, but also in southern Germany and Austria. Augsburg, Nuremberg, and at Wittenberg, stirred the centre of the movement. Resistance to its spread came from two sources. The Anabaptists' teaching added substantially to the causes of the Peasants' War which broke out (1524) in the very territory where the Anabaptists had carried on their propaganda. As a consequence the defeat of the peasants (1525) meant, to a great extent, the dispersion of the Anabaptists. On the other hand, some town councils as that of Zürich (1526) decreed the severest penalties against their adherents. Still in spite of defeat and constant repression, the sect continued to live.

(c) The Anabaptists in Münter (1533–35).—The ascendancy of the Anabaptists in lower Germany and the Netherlands must largely be ascribed to the activity of Melchior Hofmann, a widely travelled friar. The arrival of some of his disciples (Melchiorites) at Münter in Westphalia (1533–34) marks the beginning of the most extraordinary period in the history of Anabaptism. In Münter, Augustine Gottfried became the city of the faith, to which all looked as of one person. Tertullian omits him altogether. To add to the confusion, the order is different. Thus Irenaeus has Linus, Anacletus, Clement; whereas Augustine and Optatus put Clement before Anacletus. On the other hand, the "Catalogus Liberianus", the "Carlist contra Marcionem" and the "Liber Pontificalis" make no mention of Clement. To make their antiquity, make Cletus and Anacletus distinct from each other; while the "Catalogus Felicianus" even sets the latter down as a Greek, the former as a Roman. Among the moderns, Herrenröther (Hist. de l'Eglise, 1, 542, note) pronounces for their identity. So also the Bulliard De Smidt (Dissert. vii, 1). Dollinger (Christenth. u K., 215) declares that "they are, without doubt, the same person"; and that the 'Catalogue of Liberius' merits little confidence before 230." Duchesne, "Origines chrétiennes", ranges himself on that side also; but Jungmann (Dissert. Hist. Ecol., 1, 123) leaves the discussion in doubt. The chronology is, of course, in consequence of all this, very undetermined, but Duchesne, in his "Origines", says "we are far from the day when the years, months, and days of the Pontifical Catalogue can be given with any guarantee of exactness. But is it necessary to be exact about the chronology at this little stage in the history? Anacletus, Saint and Pope, was the second successor of St. Peter. Whether he was the same as Cletus, who is also called Anacletus as well as Anacletus, has been the subject of endless discussion. Irenaeus, Eusebius, and Athanasius speak of an Anacletus of Rome as different from the Cletus of the Acts of Peter. Tertullian, Augustine, and Optatus speak of Cletus and Anacletus as the same person. Tertullian omits him altogether. To add to the confusion, the order is different. Thus Irenaeus has Linus, Anacletus, Clement; whereas Augustine and Optatus put Clement before Anacletus. On the other hand, the "Catalogus Liberianus", the "Carlist contra Marcionem" and the "Liber Pontificalis" make no mention of Clement. Anacleto II, the title which was taken by Cardinal Pietro Pierleone at the contested papal election of the year 1130. The date of his birth is uncertain; d. 31 January, 1138. Though the Pierleoni were conceded to be one of the wealthiest and most powerful senatorial families of Rome, and though they had staunchly supported the Popes throughout the fifty years of their term on the坛, yet it was a matter of forgotten that they were of Jewish extraction, and had risen to wealth and power by usury. The Cardinal's grandfather, named Leo after Pope Leo IX, who baptized him, was a faithful adherent of Gregory VII; Leo's son, Peter, from whom the family acquired the appellation of Pierleoni, became successor of the faction of the Roman nobility which was at enmity with the Frangipani. His marble coffin may still be seen in the cloisters of St. Paul's, with its pompous inscription extolling his wealth and numerous offspring. His attempt to install his son as Prefect of Rome in 1116, though favoured by the Pope, was resisted by the opposite party, and the latter won the battle of the river; the Cardinal was killed, his son and the other son, the future Antipope, was destined for the Church. After finishing his education at Paris, he became a monk in the monastery of Cluny, but before long he was summoned to Rome by Pope Paschal II and created Cardinal-Deacon of SS. Cosmas and Damian. He accompanied Pope Gelasius on his flight to France, and was employed by successive pontiffs in important affairs, including legations to France and England. If we can believe his enemies, he degraded his high office by gross immorality and by his greed in the accumulation of lucre. Whatever exaggeration there may be as to other charges, there can be no doubt that he was determined to buy or force his way into the Papal Chair. When Honorius lay on his deathbed, Pierleone could count upon the votes of thirty cardinals, backed by the support of the mercenary populace and of every noble family in Rome, except that of the Frangipani. At this juncture, Cardinal-Bishop of the Sacred College numbered only sixteen, headed by the energetic Chancellor, Haymaric, and the Cardinal-Bishop of Ostia. These equidromists, as they would have been called in later days, resolved to rescue the papacy from unworthy hands by a coup d'état. Though in a hapless minority, they had the advantage that four of their number were cardinal-bishops, to whom the legislation of Nicholas II had entrusted the leading part in the election. Moreover, the commission of eight cardinals, to which, in apprehension of a schism, it was decided to leave the election, one of them being Pierleone, five were chosen, and the Antipope, Vascon, to whom the Frangipani, under the lead of the Cardinal of San Giorgio, Gregory of Rome, on the pretext of excommunication, to accept the pontifical mantle. He took the name of Innocent II. Later in the day the party of Pierleone assembled in the Church of St. Mark and proclaimed him Pope, with the name of Anacleto II. Both claimants were consecrated on the same day, 23 February, Anacleto in St. Peter's and Innocent in S. Maria Maggiore. How this rival would have been healed, had the decision been left to the canonists, is hard to say. Anacleto had a strong title in law and fact. The majority of the cardinals with the Bishop of Porto, the Dean of the Sacred College, at their head, stood at his side. Although the whole population was against him, his victory seemed complete, when, shortly after, the Frangipani, abandoning what appeared to be a lost cause, went over to him. Innocent sought safety in flight. No sooner had he arrived in France than his affairs took a favourable turn. "Exiled from the city, he was welcomed by the world," says St. Bernard, whose influence and exactions made him the adhesion of practically the entire Christian world. The Saint states his reasons for deciding in favour of Innocent in a letter to the Bishops of Aquitaine (Op. cxvi). They may not be canonically cogent; but they satisfied his contemporaries. "The Pope was and charged sin before the ears of the antipope by any attack, even of his rival; while the other's are not safe even from his friends. In the second place, if you compare the elections, that of our candidate at once has the advantage over the other as being purer in motive, more regular in form, and earlier in time. The last point is out of all doubt; the other two are proved by the merit and the dignity of the electors. You will find, if I mistake not, that this election was made by the more discreet part of those to whom the election of the Supreme Pontiff belongs. There were cardinals, bishops, priests, and deacons, in sufficient number, according to the decrees of the Gallican Church, to make the election of the Pope. The other was performed by the Bishop of Ostia, to whom that function specially belongs." Meanwhile Anacleto maintained his popularity in Rome by the lavish expenditure of his accumulated wealth and the plundered treasures of the churches. His letters and those of the Romans to Lothair of Germany remaining unanswered, he secured a valuable confederate in Duke Roger of Apulia, whose ambition he satisfied by the gift of royalty; on Christmas Day, 1130, a cardinal-legate of Anacleto anointed at Palermo the first King of the Two Sicilies, a momentous event in the history of Italy. In the spring of 1133, the German King conducted Innocent, whom two great synods, Reims and Piacenza, had proclaimed the legitimate Pope, to Rome; but as he came accompanied by only 2,000 horse, the Antipope, safe within the walls of Castle St. Angelo, looked on undismayed. Unable to open the way to St. Peter's, Lothair and his followers entered the church of the Lateran with armed crown in the Lateran. Upon the Emperor's departure Innocent was compelled to retire to Pisa, and for four years his rival remained in undisturbed possession of the Eternal City. In 1137 Lothair, having finally vanquished the insurgent Hohenstaufens, returned to Italy at the head of a formidable army; but since the main purpose of the expedition was to punish Roger, the conquest of Rome was entrusted to the missionary labours of St. Bernard. The Saint's eloquence was more effective than the imperial weapons. When Anacleto died, the preference of the Romans for Innocent was so pronounced that even Ambrone, Vihier, and Baudoin, his successor, soon came as a penitent to St. Bernard and by him led to the feast of the Pope. Thus ended, after eight years of duration, a schism which threatened serious disaster to the Church.

Anæsthesia (from Greek ἀνα, privative, and ἀέρ, feeling), a term in medicine, and the allied sciences, signifying a state of insensibility to external impressions, consequent upon disease, or induced arti-

by the employment of certain substances known as anesthetics, or by hypnotic suggestion. In 1688, the American physician, George Cheyne, carefully observed certain patients who had lost the feeling abruptly limited by a line such as would be followed in an amputation, but not according to the distribution of nerves to the part. In both functional and organic nervous diseases anesthesia may occur in conjunction with hyperesthesia and paresthesia in other parts of the body. Complete sensory anesthesia, with no sensations from cutaneous, or, occasionally, in those who are in a trance. Artificial anesthesia by the use of drugs or the inhalation of vapours only came into general use during the last half of the nineteenth century, but there is abundant evidence to show that its practice is very ancient. Homer mentions nepenthe, "an antidote to grief and rage inducing oblivion to all ills". Herodotus relates that the Scythians inhaled a kind of hemp to produce insensibility. Dioscorides alludes to the employment of mandragora to produce anesthesia when patients are cut or burnt. Pliny refers to the effect of the addition of alcohol as a catalyst in England, if it was taken "before cuttings and puncturings lest they be felt". Lucian speaks of mandragora as used before the application of the cautery. Galen has a short allusion to its power to paralyze sense and motion. Isidorus is quoted as saying: "A wine of the bark of the root is given to those about to undergo operation that being asleep they may feel no pain."

The first mention of anesthesia, in comparatively modern times, is connected with the name of Ugone da Lucca, who was born a little after the middle of the twelfth century. He had discovered a soporific which, on being inhaled, put patients to sleep so that they were insensible to pain during the operations performed by him. The drug he employed is also known to have been mandragora. There are mentions of anesthetics in the literary works of practically every century since that time. Boccaccio in the fourteenth century, in the story of Dionysius, gives an account of effects on the part of the person whom "being drunk would throw a person asleep as long as the doctor judged it necessary". In the fifteenth century William Bulleis described a concoction of an herb which "brings sleep, and casteth man into a trance, until he shall be cut out of the stone". In the sixteenth century Shakespeare, as will be remembered from "Romeo and Juliet," refers four times to the anesthetic plant under the name of mandrake, and twice under the name of mandragora. In the beginning of the seventeenth century Thomas Middleton wrote of "the pits of old surgeons who cast one asleep, then cut the diseased part". Before this Dürer in his engraving showed a man in an anesthetic state "bringing his patient in a senseless slumber before he put in his violent engine". Notwithstanding this continuity of tradition, very little was generally known about the use of anesthetics, and it seems probable that their effects were rather uncertain. About the beginning of the nineteenth century the task of finding a reliable anesthetic was taken seriously. In 1800 Sir Humphrey Davy described the effects of nitrous oxide, or laughing gas, in allaying pain or toothache. He suggested its employment in surgery. Ether began to attract attention at the end of the eighteenth century. It was used by inhalation in England, in relief of asthma, and by Dr. Warren, of Boston, in the treatment of the later stages of consumption. In 1818, Faraday proved that the inhalation of the vapour of ether produced anesthetic effects similar to those of nitrous oxide. This fact was also demonstrated by the American physician, Gorham, in January, 1833; and Wood and Bache, in 1834. The first practical use of anesthesia, however, was delayed until December, 1844, when Horace Wells, a dentist, of Hartford, Conn., had a tooth extracted while under the influence of nitrous oxide, or laughing gas. He had been resolved to make this patient painless by this means, but was deterred from pursuing the purpose by an unfortunate failure in experiments in Boston. About two years later Dr. William Morton, also a dentist of Boston, made use of the vapour of ether for anesthesia in the extraction of teeth. Subsequently he employed it in cases requiring severe dental operations, and on the 4th of February, two months the news of his discovery reached England, and before the end of 1846 operations on anesthetized patients were performed in London. At the beginning of the year 1847, Sir James Y. Simpson, the distinguished surgeon and obstetrician of the University of Edinburgh, employed ether to allay labour-pains. In November, 1847, Simpson announced his discovery that chloroform was as effective an anesthetic as ether, and lacked many of its inconveniences. Ives, in Connecticut, had used chloroform for difficult breathing in 1832. After Simpson's announcement it came to be used especially in Scotland, in England, and America, as the favourite anesthetic, though ether continued to be employed here to a considerable degree. A series of investigations, in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, showed that chloroform had a much greater mortality than ether, and now the latter has replaced it almost entirely for anesthetic purposes. Other substances, such as the chloride of ethyl and bromide of ethyl, have also been employed. Recent years have seen the development of local anesthesia to replace general anesthesia for minor operations. It has been demonstrated that even extensive operations can be performed without causing pain, by the injection of cocaine and similar substances in the neighbourhood of the site of the operation, or into the nerves leading to the part. Spinal anesthesia, which is a form of local anesthesia, consists in injecting substances into the spinal cord which paralyse all the sensory nerves below the point of the injection. For a time, about the end of the nineteenth century, it was very popular, but it proved to have many inconveniences and some serious results, and was not always reliable. General anesthesia always involves some risk. Even in the most careful hands deaths occasionally occur. Usually the fatal termination comes at the very beginning of the administration of the anesthetic, and seems to be at least partly due to shock. It is impossible to foresee such fatalities, and they occur not infrequently in the young and apparently strong and vigorous. It is important, therefore, that clergymen should take precautions by arranging the administration of the sacraments before anesthesia, even though it may be but for a slight operation. Surgeons should warn patients of the risks, even though they are but slight, since the reassurance from the due performance of Christian duties will usually make the patient more composed, and less subject to the influence of shock.

church in Anagni claims an Apostolic origin. Anagni as a bishopric appears in history in the fifth century. Felix its bishop was present at the Lateran Synod held in 457 (Mansi, VII, 1171), and Fortunatus was amongst those who signed the Acts of the Synod of 499 (Mansi, VII, 1175). Anagni is, therefore, both in itself, and in consequence, a very ancient and venerable See.

In later centuries the Bishopric of Anagni attained great importance because its occupants received special consideration from the popes. Zachary of Anagni was the legate of Nicholas I at the Synod held in Constantinople in 851 to decide as to the validity of the election of Photius to the patriarchate. In 1032, Nicholas II sent the Bishop of Anagni to Rome to get the privilege of voting in the Papal Conclave. In 1110, five popes, all related to one another: Innocent III (1198-1216); Gregory IX (1227-41); Alexander IV (1254-61); Boniface VIII (1294-1303). St. Thomas Becket in his flight was received at Anagni by the canons, and a chapel erected to him in the basement of the cathedral at the request of Henry II of England, is now used as a place of sepulture for the canons. Boniface VIII was violently attacked at Anagni by Guillaume Vogare and Sciarra Colonna, emissaries of Philippe le Bel. Various privileges have been conferred on the diocese and the canons by different popes. The canon of the cathedral has several rights, such as chests and vestments. There are 31,200 Catholics, 26 parishes, 59 secular priests, 52 regulars, 45 seminarists, 50 churches or chapels.

Anagni, Council of (1160). At this council, surrounded by his cardinals and bishops, Alexander III solemnly excommunicated the Emperor Frederick (Barbarossa), the Pfalzgraf Otto, and their followers, and renewed the excommunication of the Antipope Octavian (Victor III). The Emperor's subjects were declared absolved from their oath of allegiance.

II. ANALOGY IN PHYSICAL AND NATURAL SCIENCES.

I. In Physical and Natural Sciences.

Analogy, a philosophical term used to designate, first, a property of things; secondly, a process of reasoning. We have here to consider its meaning and use: I. IN PHYSICAL AND NATURAL SCIENCES; II. IN THEOLOGY; IV. IN RELATION TO THE MYSTERIES OF FAITH.

I. ANALOGY IN PHYSICAL AND NATURAL SCIENCES. — Analogy means certain similarity mixed with difference. This similarity may be founded entirely or chiefly upon a conception of the mind; in this sense we say that there is analogy between the light of the sun and the light of the mind, between a lion and a courageous man, between an organism and society. This kind of analogy is the source of metaphor. The similarity may be founded on the real existence of similar properties in objects of different species, genera, or classes; those organs, for instance, are analogous, which, belonging to beings of different species or genera, and differing in structure, fulfill the same physiological functions or have the same connections. As a process of reasoning, analogy consists in concluding from some analogical properties or similarity under certain aspects to other analogical properties or similarity under other aspects. It was by such a process that Franklin passed from the analogy between the effects of lightning and the effects of electricity to the identity of their causes. Cuvier founded the analogy between certain organs of fossils and these organs in actual species to the analogy of the whole organism; that we infer from the analogy between the organs and external actions of animals and our own, the existence of consciousness in them. Analogical reasoning is a combination of inductive and deductive reason-in itself, it is necessarily conceived to some extent through the beings which depend on it and are related to it. It is not an Unknown or Unknowable. It can be known in different ways. We remark in finite things a manifold dependence. These things are produced; they are produced according to a certain plan and in view of an end. We concede that they have a cause which possesses in itself a power of efficiency, exemplarity, and finality, with all the elements which such a power requires: intelligence, will, personality, etc. This way of reasoning is called by the Schoolmen the "way of causality" (via causalitatis). (Cf. Pseudo-Dion., De Div. Nom., in P. G., III, 496, et alium; St. Thomas, Summa Theol., I, Q. iii, a. 3; Q. xiiii, a. 12.) When we reason from the effects to the First, or Ultimate, Cause, we eliminate from it all the defects, imperfections, and limitations which are in its effects just because they are effects, as change, limitation, time, and space. This way of reasoning is "the way of negation or remotion" (via negationis, remotionis). (Cf. Pseudo-Dion., ibid.; also, St. Thomas, Summa Theol., I, Q. iii, xiii, a. 1; C. Gent., lib. i. xiv.) Finally, it is easily understood that the perfections affirmed, in these two ways, of God, as First and Perfect Cause, cannot be the same as that which we assume in that they have in finite beings, but only in an absolutely excellent or supremum way (via eminentia, excellentia). (Cf. Pseudo-Dion., Div. Nom., c. i, § 41, in P. G., III, 516, 590; c. ii, §§ 3, 4, in P. G., III, 664, 689; St. Thomas, ibid.)

What is the value of our knowledge of God acquired by such reasoning? According to Agnosticism this attribution of perfections to God is simply impossible, since we know them only as essentially limited and imperfect, necessarily relative to a certain species or genus, while God is the essentially Perfect, the infinitely Absolute. Therefore all that we say of God is false or at least meaningless. He is the Unknownable; He is infinitely above all our conceptions and terms. Agnosticism admits that these conceptions and names are a satisfaction and help to the imagination in thinking of the Unthinkable; but on condition that we remember that they are purely arbitrary; that they are practical symbols without objective value. According to Agnosticism, to think or say anything of God is necessarily to fall into Anthropomorphism. St. Thomas and the Schoolmen ignore neither Agnosticism nor Anthropomorphism, but declare both of them false. God is not absolutely unknowable, and yet it is true that we have not an adequate knowledge of Him; we have not the concepts and name Him in an "analytical way". The perfections manifested by creatures are in God, not merely nominally (equivoce) but really and positively, since He is their source. Yet, they are not in Him as they are in the creature, with a mere difference of degree, nor even with a more specific or generic difference (univocè), for there is no common concept including the finite and the Infinite. They are really in Him in a supremum manner (eminentia) which is wholly incomensurable with their mode of being in creatures. (Cf. St. Thomas, Summa Theol., I, Q. xiii, a. 3; C. Gent., lib. i, c. xxii, xxxvii, in I Sent., Dist., iii, Q. xii, a. 1, ad 4am.) We must experience and express these perfections only by analogy; not by an analogy of proportion, for this analogy rests upon a participation in a common concept, and, as already said, there is no element common to the finite and the Infinite; but by an analogy of participation of these perfections in God, and they are in Him in the same relation to His infinite essence that they are in creatures in relation to their finite nature. (Cf. St. Thomas, Summa Theol., I, Q. iv, a. 3; Q. xiii, a. 5; Q. ii, De verit., a. 11, in corp. ad 2am; ibid., c. xxii, a. 7, ad 9am.) We must affirm, therefore, that all perfections are really in God, infinitely. This infinitely we cannot define or express; we can say only that it is the absolutely perfect way, which does not admit any of the limitations which are found in creatures. Hence our conception of God, though very positive in its objective content, is, as represented in our mind and expressed in our words, more negative than positive. We know what God is not more than what He is. (Cf. St. Thomas, Summa Theol., I, Q. iii, the whole question; Q. xiii, a. 2, 3, 5, 12; Q. ii, De veritate, a. 1, ad 9am, ad 10am.) Such a conception is evidently neither false nor meaningless; it is clearly inadequate. In a word, our conception of God is, as a human conception and it cannot be other. But if we necessarily represent God in a human way, if even it is from our human nature that we take most of the properties and perfections which we predicate of Him, we do not conceive Him as a man, not even as a perfected man, since we eliminate from those properties, as attributes of God, all limits and imperfections which in man and other creatures are a very part of their essence.

IV. ANALOGY IN THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE MYSTERIES OF FAITH. The Fathers of the Church always emphasized the inability of the human reason to comprehend adequately the mysteries of faith, and insisted on the necessity of using analogical conceptions in their representations and expressions. St. Thomas, after the Pseudo-Dionysius and Albertus Magnus, has given the theory of analogy so applied to the mysteries of faith. (Cf. St. Thomas, Summa Theol., I, Q. i, a. 9; Q. xxii, a. 1; Liber Brevior 9, vi. 1; Liber Brevior 12, vi. 1.) The Vatican Council set forth the Catholic doctrine on the point. (Cf. Const., Dei Filius, cap. iv; cf. also Conc. Colonienses, 1860.) (1) Before Revelation, analogy is unable to discover the mysteries, since reason can know of God only what is manifested to us in His created things. (2) In Revelation, analogy is necessary, since God cannot reveal the mysteries to men except through conceptions intelligible to the human mind, and therefore analogical. (3) After Revelation, analogy is useful to give us certain knowledge of the mysteries, either by comparison with natural things and truths, or by consideration of the mysteries in relation with one another and with the destiny of man.

G. M. SAUVAGE.

Analysis (dén "up" or "back", and neglect, "to loose") means a separation; it is the taking apart of that which was united, and corresponds exactly to the Latin form "resolution" (re + solving). Its opposite is synthesis (syn, "together", and ribeum, "to put together", hence, a "putting together, combination"). According to this etymology, analysis, in general, is the process by which anything complex is resolved into simple, or, at least, into less complex parts or elements. This complex may be: (1) Concrete, that is, an individual substance, quality or property, in either the De Trinitate mental order; (2) Abstract and ideal; incapable, therefore, of existing apart from the mind that conceives it.

(1) In the case of a concrete object, we must distinguish three degrees of analysis. Sometimes a real separation or isolation is effected. To resolve a chemical compound into its elements, or white light into the elementary colours, to dissect an organism, to take a machine to pieces, is to proceed analytically. But frequently actual isolation is impossible. Thus the factors of a movement or of a psychological proposition may be set apart and be set separately. If the process occurs at all, it must be a complex one. We may, however, reach an analytical result by means of different successive syntheses, i. e. by variations in the grouping of the elements or circumstances. In order to ascertain the individual nature of any determined element, factor, or circumstance, we must go beyond it, leave it, and study the state of permanency, while the accompanying elements, factors, or circumstances are eliminated or changed; or, on the contrary, it may be eliminated or modified, while the others remain constant. The four methods of induction belong to this form of analysis. It is also in a large measure the method of psychological experiment and of introspective analysis. Finally, it may be impossible to effect any real dissociation of a concrete thing or event, either because it cannot be reached or controlled, or because it is past. Then mental dissociation and abstraction are used. In a concrete statement the mind can separate part or feature which cannot in reality be separated. Analogy and comparison of such cases with similar instances in which dissociation has been effected are of great value, and the results already ascertained are applied to the case under examination. This occurs frequently in physical and psychological science, in the method of the statistician or the sociologist in the study of events and institutions.—(2) When the complex is an idea, analysis consists in breaking it up into simpler ideas. We are in the abstract order and must remain therein; consequently, we do not take into consideration the extension of an idea, that is, its range of application to concrete things, but its intension, or connotation, that is, its ideal contents. To analyze an idea is to single out in it other ideas whose ideal complexity, or whose connotation is not so great. The same must be said of analytical reasoning. The truth of a proposition or of a complex statement is analytically demonstrated by reverting from the proposition itself to higher principles, from the complex statement to a more general truth. And this applies not only to mathematics, when a given problem is solved by showing its necessary connection with a proposition already demonstrated, or with a self-evident axiom from all the simpler things, the causes, the effects, and the condition under the law, the cause, and the condition. Principle, law, cause, nature, condition, are less complex than conclusion, fact, effect, action, conditioned, since these are concrete applications and further determinations of the former. A physical law, for instance, is a simplified expression of all the facts which it governs. In one word, therefore, we may characterize analysis as a process of resolution and regression; synthesis, as a process of composition and progression.

The confusion that has existed and still exists in the definition and use of the terms analysis and synthesis leads to the divergence of the separately complexes which have to be analyzed. Moreover, the same object may be analyzed from different points of view and, consequently, with various results. It is especially important to keep in mind the distinction between the connotation and the denotation of a word. As the two vary in inverse ratio, it is clear that, in an idea, the connotation of the connotative elements implies an increase in extension. Hence connotative analysis is necessarily an extensive synthesis, and vice versa. Thus, if my idea of a child is that of "a human being under a certain age", by connotative analysis I may omit the last determination "under a certain age", what remains is less complex than the idea "child", but applies to a greater number of individuals, namely: to all human beings. In order to restrict the extension to fewer individuals, the connotation must be increased, that is, further determinations must be added. In the same manner, a fact, when reduced to a law, either in the physical, the mental, or the historical order, is reduced to something which has a greater extension, since it is assumed to rule all the facts of the same nature, but the law is less complex in connotation, since it does not share the individual characters of the concrete events.

The necessity of deriving from the fact that knowledge begins with the perception of the concrete and the individual, and that whatever is concrete is complex. Hence the mind, unable to distinctly grasp the whole reality at once, must divide it, and study the parts separately. Moreover the innate tendency of the mind towards unification and classification leads it to neglect certain aspects, so as to reach more general truths and laws whose range of application is larger. The relative usefulness of analysis and synthesis in the various sciences depends on the nature of the problems to be solved. The knowledge can be had in the right attitude, and on the stage of development of the science. Induction is primarily analytic; deduction, primarily synthetic. In proportion as a natural science becomes more systematic, i. e. when more general laws are formulated, the synthetic process is more freely used. Previous analysis then enables the mind to "compose" by deduction the law. Where, on the contrary, the law has to be discovered, observation and analysis are dominant, although, even then, synthesis is indispensable for the verification of hypotheses. Some sciences, such as Euclidean geometry, proceed synthetically from simple to complex truths. Analysis has the advantage of adhering more strictly to the point under investigation; synthesis is in danger of going astray, since from the same principle many different conclusions may be drawn, and a multitude of real or possible events are governed by the same law. For this same reason, however, synthesis, in certain sciences at least, is likely to prove more fruitful than analysis. It also has the advantage of starting from that which has a natural priority, for the conditioned presupposes the condition. When the result is already known, and the relation between a principle and its consequences is given in which facts are connotated, synthesis is a great help in teaching others. In synthesis the strictness of logical reasoning is required. Accuracy and exactness in the observation of phenomena, attention to all their details, the power of mental abstraction and generalization are qualities indispensable in the analytic process.

The literature of analysis includes all works on logic and on the methods of the sciences. We give only some few references. DUGALD STEWART. Philosophy of the Human Mind, P. II, iv, § 3; WUNDT. Anaphora (Gr., anaphorē, offering, sacrifice), a liturgical term in the Greek Rite. It is variously used in the liturgies of the Greek Orient to signify that part of the service which corresponds substantially to the Latin Canon of the Mass. It also signifies the offering of Eucharistic bread; the large veil (see AER) that covers the same, and the procession in which the offering is brought to the altar (Brightman).—1. In the Greek Rite the Anaphora are numerous, while in the Roman Rite the Canon of the Mass is from time immemorial quite... invariable. The Greek Anaphora is substantially of apostolic origin, though in its present form it dates from the end of the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century; noญ, no reference and impressive ceremony than the Roman Rite. The priest accompanied by the deacon and the acolytes and censer-bearers, goes to the prothesis (a small side altar where the proskenias is performed) and they solemnly bring the blessed bread and wine through the small diaconal door of the iconostasis and proceed to the centre of the church or at least directly in front of the royal doors, where, turning to the people and holding the sacred gifts in their hands they pray successively for the ecclesiastical and secular authorities. In the Greek Orthodox Church prayers are said for the emperor as king, the Holy Synod, as worthier instrument of the divine government. In the Greek Catholic Church these prayers are said for the Pope, the Archbishop, Emperor, King, etc., using the same words. The priest and deacon then proceed solemnly to the altar bearing the Sacred Elements through the royal doors. This part of the Greek Mass is called the Greek Exposition. After the chalice has been placed on the altar the priest completes the Offertory with this prayer: "Receive also the prayer of us sinners and cause it to approach Thy Holy Altar, and strengthen us to present gifts and spiritual sacrifices unto Thee for our sins and the ignorances of the people, and count us worthy to find grace before Thee; that our sacrifice may be acceptable unto Thee; and that the spirit of Thy grace may rest upon us and upon these gifts presented, and upon all Thy people". (See CONSECRATION; MASS; PREPARATIONS; GREEK RITE.)

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

Anarchy.—(4 private, and 420, rule); anarchy means an absence of law. Sociologically it is the modern theory which proposes to do away with all existing forms of government and to organize a society which will exercise all its functions without any controlling or directive authority. It assumes as its basis that every man has a natural right to develop all his powers, satisfy all his passions, and respond to all his instincts. It insists that the individual is the best judge of his own capacity; that justice, well understood, tends to the securing of general conditions; that each one recognizes the advantage of justice in economic relations; and that mankind, in the man, is right in what it does. As a human being is a free, intelligent agent, any restraint from without is an invasion of his rights and makes him tyrannized. Proudhon (1809-1865), whose writings are diffuse, obscure, and paradoxical, is regarded as the father of the system; but Diderot is claimed by some, and also the association of the Enragés, or Hébertistes of the French Revolution. According to Proudhon, "anarchy is order" and, borrowing from J. J. Rousseau, "man is naturally good, and it is only submitting to him, all property is theft". As crime is mostly committed against property, abolishing one is preventing the other. Criminals are not to be punished, but treated as lunatics, or sick men. There are to be no rulers in Church or State; no king, no president, no judges; they are all, because it introduces God as the basis of authority, and degrades man by inculcating meekness and submission, thus making him a slave and robbing him of his natural dignity. Free love is to take the place of marriage, and family life, with its restraints, is to cease.

To the objection that men cannot live together without society, both because of the implied contradiction in such a claim, and because of the social instinct in man, the answer is: We do not destroy society, but exclude authority from it. Anarchy supposes an association of individual sovereigns acting independently of any central or collective power. It aims at a society in which all the members are federated in free groups or corporations according to the professions, arts, trades, business, etc., which happen to suit the fancy of each, so that not only will all be co-proprietors of everything—land, mines, masts, trades, businesses, professions, exchange, etc.—but every one will thus be able to follow his own individual bent. Moreover, as all are united in a harmony of interests, all will labour in union to increase the general welfare, just as is done in business corporations, in which union is based on mutual advantage, and is free from all prejudice from within or without.

As to the means to be employed to bring about this ideal condition, opinion is divided, some holding for the evolutionary, some for the revolutionary method; the former proposing to realize their Utopia by the means now at their disposal, chiefly universal suffrage; while the latter are determined to effect it at once by violent methods. In this respect the first class shades off into collective socialism, the second remaining pure anarchists. Both, however, differ from socialism on one very important point. For while agreeing with anarchists in the desirability of abolishing all existing institutions, socialism aims at what it calls "socialized society". It postulates a central power which will assign occupations, distribute awards, and supervise and direct the collective interests. It absorbs the individual in favour of the State; anarchy does the very opposite. Generally speaking, according to Duruy, also, socialism strives to create a classless society and seeks its end by gradual evolution from present conditions. Its public alienation from anarchical methods is evidenced in its treatment of the Russian Bakounin, who was conspicuous for his activity in the French Revolution of 1848, and who, when handed over to Russia, escaped from Siberia and fomented the Russian disorders of 1866, chiefly through his agent Netschaeff, and was finally associated with Cluceret and Richard in the atrocities of the French Commune of 1871. In 1868 he had established the International Alliance of Social Democracy, and endeavoured to unite it with the National Association of Workingmen established by the socialist Marx in 1864. The coalition was of short duration. A violent schism began at the Congress of the Hague, in 1872, and then the party of anarchy may be said to have begun as a distinct organization. Bakounin subsequently organized the Fédération Jurassienne. He issued a paper called the Le Génie du GouVERNEMENT, but nothing much was done until the founding of La Révolte by Elisée Reclus and Kropotkin.

The principles of anarchy were again repudiated in the Socialist Congress of Paris in 1881 (from which the anarchists were expelled) and in congresses at Zürich, in 1883, and at Hamburg and London, in 1889.

It was in the Congress of Paris held in Geneva in 1863, that the distinctive term of Anarchist was applied to an autonomous soc-
tion of that Convention. But how far the theories and practice of each run into those of the other is difficult to determine. For independently of official pronouncements by the various congresses, the lines of demarcation between the two movements are not unfrequently obscure. Thus, according to some writers, anarchists may be classified first as extreme Individualists; those, namely, who regard the individual as the "true" state and such is the term employed—which is to be reduced as soon as possible to a minimum. This was the position of Herbert Spencer and Auberon Herbert, who would probably have resented being placed in the category of anarchists. Spencer's doctrine about the minimizing of government authority was borrowed from Giuseppe Piazzi. Justus J. 1785. A class might be described as Expectants; those who are willing to admit a central control until public opinion is sufficiently educated to dispense with it. William Morris left the Social Democrats when he found himself drifting in that direction. Finally there are the Universal Negatives, or Nihilists, who believe in the assassination of rulers and in other violent manifestations of hatred of present conditions. The first so-called scientific exposition of this nihilistic anarchism seems to have been made by the eminent French geographer Elisee Reclus and the Russian Prince Kropotkin, who built it into a definite system, typical of its form and influence in the Russian repressed liberty of speech, liberty of conscience, which are claimed as rights, and are regarded as essential in modern civilization, no matter to what extravagance they may be carried—even to the propagation of the most revolutionary and immoral doctrines—have magnified the importance and sacredness of the individual until he has become a law unto himself in ethics and religion, and is practically persuaded of his absolute independence of his Creator in his conduct of life. In much of the literature of the day there exists almost an idolatry of human power, no matter with how much crime it is associated. In Russia, the methods in the suppression of those who question the name of God from the schools, and which absolutely debar even the mention of the name of God from the schools, and which admits no religious instruction, or only an ethical code without sanction or authority, could not fail to develop a generation of anarchists. Their fathers have some memories of religion and a sense of obligation clinging to them; the rising generation will have none. Finally, the excessive accumulation of wealth in the hands of a few by supposedly dishonest methods, and its alleged use in corrupting legislatures to perpetuate abuses, furnish material for unprincipled demagogues to arouse the worst passions of the multitude. Moreover, even if the condition of the poor is not as bad as formerly, the contrast with the luxury of the rich is sufficient to excite impatience and anger, while the absence of religious motives makes poverty and suffering not only insupportable, but, in the eyes of the victims, unnecessary and unjust.

The theory of anarchy is that the state is unnecessary. Apart from the fact that it runs counter to some of the most cherished instincts of humanity, as, for instance, family life and love of country, it is evident that society without authority could not stand for a moment. Men whose only purpose would be to satisfy all their inclinations are by the very fact at the level of the animal creation. The methods they already employ in the prosecution of their designs show how the animal instincts quickly assert themselves. The only remedy of the disorder is evidently a return to right reason and the practice of religion; and, as a protection for the future, the profession of Christian morality in the education of youth.

Anastasia, SAINT, CHURCH OF. See Rome.

Anastasia, SAINT, MARTYR. This saint enjoys the distinction, unique in the Roman liturgy, of having a special commemoration in the second Mass on Christmas day. This Mass was originally celebrated not in honour of the birth of Christ, but in commenceration of this martyr, and towards the end of the fifth century her name was also inserted in the Roman canon of the Mass. Nevertheless, she is not a Roman saint, for she suffered martyrdom at Sirmium, and was not venerated at Rome until almost the end of the fifth century. It is true that a later legend makes her a Roman, though even in this legend she did not suffer martyrdom at Rome. The same legend connects her name with that of St. Chrysogonus, likewise not a Roman martyr, but put to death in Aquileia, though he had a church in Rome dedicated to his honour. According to this "Passio", Aquileia was the daughter of a Roman, named Romanus, and had Chrysogonus for a teacher. Early in the persecution of Diocletian the Emperor summoned Chrysogonus to Aquileia where he suffered martyrdom. Anastasia, having gone from Aquileia to Sirmium to visit the faithful of that place, was beheaded on the island of Palmaria, 25 December, and her body interred in the house of Apollonia, which had been converted into a basilica. The whole account is purely legendary, and rests on no historical foundations. All that is certain is that a martyr named Anastasia gave her life for the faith in Sirmium, and that her memory was preserved in that church. The so-called "Martyrology Hieronymianum" (ed. De Rossi and Duchesne, Acta SS., 2 November) records her name on 25 December, not for Sirmium alone, but also for Constantinople, a circumstance based on a separate story. According to Theodorus Lector (Hist. Eccles., II, 65), during the patriarchate of Gennadius (438-471) the body of the martyr was transferred to Constantinople and interred in a church which had hitherto been known as "Anastasia" (Gr. Ἀναστασία, Resurrection); thenceforth the church took the name of Anastasia. Similarly the cultus of St. Anastasia was introduced into Rome from Sirmium by means of an already existing church. As this church was already quite famous, it brought the feast of the saint into especial prominence. There existed in Rome from the fourth century, at the foot of the Palatine and above the Circus Maximus, a church which had been adored by Pope Damasus (366-384) with a large mosaic. It was known as "titulus Anastasii", and is mentioned as such in the Acts of the Roman Council of 499. There is some uncertainty as to the origin of this name; either the church owes its foundation to and was named after a Roman nun named Anastasia, as in the case of several other churches of Rome (Duchesne); or it was originally an "Anastasia" church (dedicated to the Resurrection of Christ), such as existed already at Ravenna and Constantinople; from the word "Anastasia" came eventually the name "titulus Anastasii" (Grisor). Whatever way this happened, the church was an especially prominent one from the fourth to the sixth century, being the only titular church in the centre of ancient Rome (see ROME, EARLY CHRISTIAN), and surrounded by the monuments of the city's pagan past. Within its jurisdiction was the Palatine where the imperial court was located. Since the veneration of the Sirmian martyr, Anastasia, received a new impetus in Constantinople during the second half of the fifth century, we may easily infer that the intimate contemporary relations between Old and New Rome brought about an increase of devotion to St. Anastasia at the foot of the Palatine. At all events the insertion of her name in the Roman Canon of the Mass towards the end of the fifth century, and the celebration of the second Mass on Christmas day in her honour during the sixth century, show that she then occupied a unique position among the saints publicly venerated at Rome. Thenceforth the church on the Palatine is known as "titulus sanctae Anastasii"; and the martyr of Sirmium became the titular saint of the old fourth-century basilica. Evidently because of its position as titular church of the district including the imperial dwellings on the Palatine this church long maintained an eminent rank among the churches of Rome; only two churches preceded it in honour: St. John Lateran, the mother-church of Rome, and St. Mary Major. This ancient sanctuary stands to-day quite isolated amid the ruins of Rome. The commemoration of St. Anastasia in the second Mass on Christmas day is the last remnant of the former prominence enjoyed by this saint and her church in the life of Christian Rome.

Anastasiopolis, name of four ancient episcopal sees located respectively in Galatia (suffragan of Acryna), in Phrygia (suffragan of Laodicea), in Caria, and in Thrace (Garnes, 441, 446, 458).

Anastasius, Saint, Bishop of Antioch, a.d. 559, distinguished for his learning and austerity of life, excided the enmity of the Emperor Justinian by opposing certain imperial doctrines about the Body of Christ. He was to be deposed from his see and exiled, when Justinian died; but Justin II carried out his uncle's purpose five years later, and another bishop, named Gregory, was put in his place; on the death of that prelate, in 593, Anastasius was restored to his see. This was chiefly due to Pope Gregory the Great, who interceded with the Emperor Maurice and his son Theodosius, asking that Anastasius be restored to Rome, if not to Antioch. From some letters sent to him by Gregory, it is thought that he was not sufficiently vigorous in denouncing the claims of the Patriarch of Constantinople to be universal bishop. He died in 608, and another bishop of the same name is said to have succeeded him in 599, to whom the translation of Gregory's "Regula Pastoralis" is attributed, and who is recorded as having been put to death in an insurrection of the Jews. Nicephorus (Hist. Eccl., XVIII, xiv) declares that these two are one and the same person. The same difficulty occurs with regard to certain Sermones de orthodoxia fide, some assigning them to the latter Anastasius, but thinking that there was but one bishop of that name.

Anastasius I, Saint, Pope, a pontiff who is remembered chiefly for his condemnation of Origenism. A Roman by birth, he became pope in 399, and died within a little less than four years. Among his friends were Augustine, Jerome, and Paulinus. Jerome speaks of him as a man of great holiness who displayed in his poverty a spirit that was during the time of the barbarian invasions.

Anastasius II, Pope, a native of Rome, elected 24 Nov., 496; d. 16 Nov., 498. His congratulatory letter to Clovis, on the occasion of the latter's consecration, is now deemed a forgery of the seventeenth century (J. Kavet, Bibl. de locr. des Chartres, 1885, XLVI, 258-59). He insisted on the removal from theписание of the name of Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, but recognized the validity of his sacramental acts, an attitude that displeased the Romans. He also condemned Traducianism.
ANASTASIUS

Anastasius III, Pope, the one hundred and twenty-third occupant of the Holy See, elected September, 911; d. November, 913. He was a Roman by birth, of certain southern origin. His reign was marked with moderation, but beyond this history gives no details of his life, except that he was active in determining the ecclesiastical divisions of Germany. He succeeded Sergius III (904-911), and reigned, at most, about two years and two months.

Anastasius IV, Pope, crowned 12 July, 1153; d. in Rome, 3 December of the following year. It was during his pontificate and owing to his exertions that the Pantheon was restored. He also granted special privileges to the Order of the Hospitaliters of St. John of Jerusalem. He is chiefly known for his attitude towards Frederick Barbarossa and recognition of him as Emperor, as Bishop of Magdelenburg, which he terminated an ecclesiastical quarrel. His extant works consist of some letters and a treatise on the Trinity.

Anastasius, Saint, once a magician, became a convert of the Holy Cross and was martyred in 628. He was a soldier in the army of Choezoes when that monarch carried the Cross from Jerusalem to Persia. The occasion prompted him to ask for information; then he left the army, became a Christian, and afterwards a monk in Jerusalem. His Persian name, Magundat, he changed to Anastasius. After seven years of ascetic observance, he was appointed Bishop of the city which he thought, by the Holy Ghost to go in quest of martyrdom and went to Cæsarea, then subject to the Persians. Reproaching his countrymen for their magic and fireworship, both of which he had once practised, he was taken prisoner, cruelly tortured to make him abjure, and finally carried down near the Euphrates, to a place called Barsaloe, or Bethsaloa, according to the Bollandists, where his sufferings were renewed while at the same time the highest honours in the service of King Choezoes were promised him if he would renounce Christianity. Finally, with seventy others, he was strangled to death on the feast of January 628. His body, which was thrown to the dogs, but was left untouched by them, was carried thence to Palestine, afterwards to Constantinople, and finally to Rome.

Anastasius Sinaites, Saint, a Greek ecclesiastical writer, b. at Alexandria in the first half of the seventh century; d. after 700. He was abbot of the monastery of Mt. Sinai, and so active an opponent of the Monophysites, Monothelites, and Jews that he was known as "the new Moses". His principal work is the "Hodegos" (Οδηγός), or "Guide", written in defence of the Catholic Faith against the attacks of the aforementioned heretics. It was a popular manual of controversy among the medieval Greeks. The (154) "Questions and Answers on Various Theological Subjects" is so copious and copious.

He also wrote a "Devout Introduction to the Hexameron" in twelve books, the first eleven of which have reached us only in a Latin translation.

These and other minor writings are found in Migne (P.G. LXXXIX); Le Quen attributed to him, without sufficient reason, the "Antiquorum Patrum Doctrinae de Verbi Dei Incarnatones".

THOMAS J. SHAHAN.

Anathema (Gr. ἀθημα, or ἀνάθημα, literally placed on high, suspended, set aside), a term formerly indicating offerings made to the divinity which were suspended from the roof or walls of temples for the purpose of being exposed to view. Thus anathema according to its etymology signifies a thing offered to God. The word anathema is sometimes used in this sense in the Old and New Testament. In Judith, xvi, 23, it is said that Judith, having taken all the arms of Holofernes which the people had given him, and the curtain of his bed which she herself had brought, offered them to the Lord as an anathema of oblivion. In 11 Mach., ix, 18, Antiochus promises to adorn with precious gifts (anathemata) the temple he has pillaged; and in Luke, xxii, 5, mention is made of the temple built of precious stones and adorned with rich gifts (anathemata). As obdurate objects were also exposed to view, e.g. the head of a criminal or of an enemy, or his arms or spoils, the word anathema came to signify a thing hated, or execrated, or detested by the public; hence the word is used in the New Testament, e.g., "To understand the word anathema", says Vigouroux, "we should first go back to the real meaning of herem of which it is the equivalent. Herem comes from the word haram, to cut off, to separate, to curse, and indicates that which is cursed and condemned to be cut off or exterminated, whether a person or a thing, and in consequence, that which man is forbidden to make use of." This is the sense of anathema in the following passage from Deut., vii, 26: "Neither shalt thou bring anything of the idol into thy house, lest thou become an anathema like it. Thou shalt detest it as dung, and shalt utterly destroy it as uncleanness and filth, because it is an anathema." Nations, individuals, animals, and inanimate objects may become anathema, i.e. cursed and devoted to destruction. It was thus that the people inhabiting the Promised Land were anathematized as Moses says (Deut., vii, 1, 2): "When ... the Lord thy God shall have delivered them unto thee, thou shalt utterly destroy them." When a people was anathematized by the Lord, they were to be entirely exterminated. Saul was rejected by God for having spared Agag, King of the Amalecites, and the greater part of the booty (I X v, 9-23). Anyone who spared any of the spoils belonging to an anathema, became himself anathema. There is the story of Achan who had charge of the spoils of Jericho: "The anathema is in the midst of thee, O Israel: thou canst not stand before thy enemies till he be destroyed out of thee that is defiled with this wickedness. Achan, with his family and herds, was stoned to death, because it is cities that are anathematized. When the anathema is rigorous all the inhabitants are to be exterminated, the city burned, and permission denied ever to rebuild it, and its riches offered to Jehovah. This was the fate of Jericho (Jos., vi, 17). If it is less strict, all the inhabitants are to be put to death, but the herds may be divided among the victors (Jos., viii, 27). The obligation of killing all inhabitants occasionally admits of exceptions in the case of young girls who remain captives in the hands of the conquerors (Num., xxxi, 18). The severity of the anathema in the Old Testament is explained by the fact that there was a cry against the pagans and protecting them against the idolatry professed by the neighbouring pagans.

In the New Testament anathema no longer entails death, but the loss of goods or exclusion from the society of the faithful. St. Paul frequently uses this.
word in the latter sense. In the Epistle to the Romans (ix, 3) he says: "For I wished myself to be an anathema from Christ, for my brethren, who are my kinsmen according to the flesh", i. e. "I should wish to be separated and rejected of Christ, by that means I would procure the salvation of my brethren to whom I am an anathema in the same sense," he says (Gal, i, 9): "If any one preach to you a gospel besides that which you have received, let him be anathema." But he who is separated from God is united to the devil, which explains why St. Paul, instead of anathematizing, sometimes delivers a penalty to Satan (2 Cor. xi, 3). Anathema signifies also to be overwhelmed with male dicions, as in I Cor., xvi, 22: "If any man love not our Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema." At an early date the Church adopted the word anathema to signify the exclusion of a sinner from the society of the faithful; but the anathema was pronounced chiefly against heretics. All the councils, from the Council of Nicea to that of the Vatican, have worded their dogmatic canons: "If any one says... let him be anathema." Nevertheless, although during the first centuries the anathema did not seem to differ from the sentence of excommunication, beginning with the second century the priest was separated from the laity, and excommunication was made a distinct corpus. A Council of Tours desires that after three warnings there be recited in chorus Psalms against the usurper of the goods of the Church, that he may fall into the curse of Judas, and that he may die not only excommunicated, but anathematized, and that he may be stricken by the sword of Heaven. This distinction was introduced into the canons of the Church, as is proved by the letter of John VIII (872-82) found in the Decree of Gratian, (c. III, q. V, c. XII): "Know that Engel trude is not only under the ban of excommunication, which separates her from the society of the brethren, but also under anathema, from the body of Christ, which is the Church." This distinction is found in the earliest Decretals, in the chapter Cum non ab homine. In the same chapter, the tenth of Decretals II, tit. I, Celestine III (1191-98), speaking of the measures it is necessary to take in proceeding against a cleric guilty of theft, homicide, perjury, or other crimes, says: "If, after having been deposed from office, he is incorrigible, he should first be excommunicated; but if he perseveres in his contumacy he should be stricken with the sword of anathema; but if plunging to the depths of crime he be rejected from the society of the faithful, he should be given over to the secular arm." At a late period, Gregory IX (1227-41), bk. V, tit. xxxix, ch. lix, St quem, distinguishes minor excommunication, or that implying exclusion only from the sacraments, from major excommunication, implying exclusion from the society of the faithful. He declares that it is major excommunication which is meant in all texts in which mention is made of excommunication. Since that time there has been no difference between major excommunication and anathema, except the greater or less degree of ceremony in pronouncing the sentence of excommunication.

Anathema remains a major excommunication which is to be promulgated with great solemnity. A formula for this ceremony was drawn up by Pope Zachary (741-52) in the chapter Debeti duodecim sacramentis, Cause xii, quest. iii. The Roman Pontiff classifies it in the form of communicandis et absolvendi, distinguishing three sorts of excommunication: minor excommunication, formerly incurred by a person holding communication with anyone under the ban of excommunication; major excommunication, pronounced by the Pope in reading a sentence; and anathema, or the penalty incurred by crimes of the gravest order, and solemnly promulgated by the Pope. In passing this sentence, the pontiff is vested in amice, stole, and a violet cope, wearing his mitre, and assisted by twelve priests clad in their surplices and holding lighted candles. He takes his seat in front of the altar or in some other suitable place, and pronounces the formula of anathema, which ends with these words: "Wherefore in the name of God the All-powerful, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, of the Blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and of all the Saints, in virtue of the power which has been given us of binding and loosing in Heaven and on earth, we deprive N— of the Communion of the Body and Blood of Our Lord, we separate him from the society of all Christians, we exclude him from the bosom of our Holy Mother the Church in Heaven and on earth, we declare him excommunicated and anathematized and we judge him condemned to eternal fire with Satan and his angels and all the reprobate, so long as he will not burst the fetters of the demon, do penance and satisfy the Church; we deliver him to Satan to mortify his body, that his soul may be saved on the day of judgment." Whereupon all the assistants respond: "Fiat, fiat, fiat." The pontiff and the other clerics, on the steps of the altar, pour the candles they have been carrying, and notice is sent in writing to the priests and neighbouring bishops of the name of the one who has been excommunicated and the cause of his excommunication, in order that they may have no communication with him. Although he is delivered to Satan and his angels, he can still, and is even bound to repent. The Pontifical gives the form for absolving him and reconciling him with the Church. The promulgation of the anathema with such solemnity is well calculated to strike terror to the criminal and bring him to a state of repentance, especially if the Church adds to it the censures of the Marana thatha.

At the end of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, xxvi, 22, St. Paul says, "If any man love not our Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema, marana thatha," which means, "The Lord is come." But commentators have regarded this expression as a formula of excommunication very severe among the Jews. This opinion, however, is not sustained by Viguours, "Dict. de la Bible" (s. v. Anathème). In the Western Church, Maranatha has become a very solemn formula as anathema, by which the criminal is excommunicated, abandoned to the judgment of God, is set apart from the communion of the faithful and from the coming of the Lord. An example of such an anathema is found in these words of Pope Silverius (536-38): "If anyone henceforth deceives a bishop in such a manner, let him be anathema maranatha before God and his holy angels." Benedict XIV (1740-58—De Synodo clericum X., l c) cites the anathema marana thatha formulated by the Fathers of the Fourth Council of Toledo against those who were guilty of the crime of high treason: "He who dares to despise our decision, let him be stricken with anathema marana thatha, i. e. may he be damned at the coming of the Lord, may he have his place with Judas Iscariot, he and his companions. Amen." There is frequent mention of this anathema maranatha in the Bulls of erection for abbeys and other establishments. Still the anathema maranatha is a censure from which the criminal may be absolved; although he is delivered to Satan and his angels, the Church will not refuse to hear the penitent. Or, as the Pontiff Ordo of the 20th century says, he will turn him once more into the communion of the faithful. More than that, it is with this purpose in view that she takes such rigorous measures against him, in order that by the mortification of his body his soul may be saved on the last day. The Church, animated by the spirit of God, does not wish the death of the sinner, but rather that he be converted and live. This explains why the most severe and terrifying formulas of excommunication, containing all the rigours of the Mataratha have, as a rule, clauses like this: Unless he becomes repentant, or gives satisfaction, or is compelled.

Anatoth, possibly plural of Anath, a feminine Chaldean deity, worshipped in Chanaan [Enc. Bib. s. v. Anath; Lagrange, "Juges" (Paris, 1903), 62-63]. (1) Anatoth is identified with Anath, a city half miles north-east of Jerusalem and everything favours that identification; around Anata are found the names of the villages mentioned in Isaias, x, 28. From its height (2235 ft.), Anata, which seems to have been fortified in the past, commands a fine but desolate view east and south-east; the north end of the Dead Sea and the Lower Jordan are visible across the hills of the wilderness. Between Jerusalem and Anata rise the heights of the Scopus (Mesarif), where Titus and his legions encamped when besieging Jerusalem. On those heights is built the village of El 'Tawiyeh (2390 ft.), perhaps the Laia mentioned with Anatath in Isaiah, (ii. 11). Geography des alten Palast. (175). Anatoth is reckoned among the Levitical cities of Benjamin (Jos., xxx, 18; I Par., vi., 60). Abiazer, one of David's valiant men, was from that city (II K., xxii, 27), which had also given to David one of his first followers in the person of Jehu (I Par., xii, 3). There Abiathar the priest, had lands, to which he was banished by Solomon, suspicious of the understanding between his brother Adonias and Abiathar (III K., ii, 26). One hundred and twenty-eight men of Anatoth returned from Babylon, according to the list in I Esd. (Ezra), ii, 23 and II Esd. (Neh.), vii, 27. But its chief interest lies in the fact that it was the home of Jeremia family (Jer., i, 1; xxxii, 27; xxxii, 7-9). But there he also, "the type . . . of the incomparable One", experienced that "no prophet is accepted in his own country" (Jer., xi., 21-23). (2) One of the sons of Becher (Becher in the genealogy of Benjamin) I Par., vii, 8. (3) One of the subscribers to the covenant [II Esd. (Neh.), x, 19].

Anastolie, Saint, Virgin and Martyr in the time of Decius, was put to death in the city of Thyrum, or Tharum, or Thora. About the identity of the place there is considerable discussion among the critics. She was living in retirement with her sister when the persecution was raging, and was sought in marriage by a youth named Aurelius. That she was actually espoused, the Ballondists do not; the point of yielding because of the solicitations of her sister Victoria, she was strengthened by the vision of an angel. Banished to Thora she was denounced as a Christian. The executioner Audax shut her up in a room with a venomous serpent, but she prayed to God for mercy and then was beheaded. She was put to death by the sword. Her feast is kept 9 July.

Anastolius, Saint, Bishop of Laodicea in Syria, d. 283; a foremost scholar of his day in the physical sciences and in Aristotelian philosophy. There is a fragment left by him, written in Greek, and also a treatise on the time of the Paschal celebration. A very curious story is told by Eusebius of the way in which Anastolius broke up a rebellion in a part of Alexandria known as the Bruchium. It was held by the forces of Zenobia, and being strictly beleaguered by the Romans was in a state of starvation. The saint, who was living in the Bruchium at the time, made arrangements with the besiegers to receive all the women and children, as well as the old and infirm, continuing at the same time to let as many as wished by the means of escaping. It broke up the defence and the rebels surrendered. It was a patriotic action on the part of the saint, and was as one of great benefit to saving so many innocent victims from death. In going to Laodicea he was seized by the people and made bishop. Whether his friend Eusebius had died, or whether both occupied the see together, is a matter of much discussion. The question is treated at length by the Ballondists. His feast, like that of his namesake the Patriarch of Constantinople, is kept on 3 July.

Anastolius, Saint, Patriarch of Constantinople in the time of Theodosius the Younger. The heretic Dioscurus had favoured his appointment as patriarch, hoping for his support, but he found in Anastolius a determined enemy, who in the Council of Chalcedon condemned him and his followers. How he died is disputed, but it would appear that the heretics put an end to his career. This was accomplished after eight years in the patriarchate. The great annalist condemns him in a somewhat violent manner, for conniving with Dioscurus for his appointment to the see; for demanding in contravention of the statutes of Nicaea, the supremacy of Constantinople over Antioch and Alexandria; for meanness in opposing a new formula of doctrine; for declaring that Dioscurus was not condemned at Ephesus on account of the faith; for removing the meritorious Eustathius from the archidiaconate, and naming the unworthy Andrew; for weakness, if not connivance in dealing with the heretics. All of these serious accusations are discussed by the Ballondists, who give a verdict in favour of Anastolius. He is held by them to be a true Catholic, a saint, and a prophet. The Pope blamed him, not for error but because he permitted himself to be consecrated by a schismatic. One enthusiastic biographer narrates that his miracles were multiplied until he could stand on the sea. He was born at Alexandria, and before becoming patriarch distinguished himself at Ephesus against Nestorius, and at Constantinople against Eutyches, though the profession of faith which he drew up was rejected by the papal legates. When he was in danger of death he was restored to health by St. Daniel the Styliote, who came to Constantinople to see him. His feast is kept 3 July.

Anatomy (Gr. ánatomos) literally, cutting up, or dissection; now used to signify the science of the form and structure of living beings. It is a department of biology that is divided into animal and vegetable anatomy. Animal anatomy is further divided into comparative anatomy, that is, the study of different animals for purposes of comparison, and special anatomy which forms any application of the structure of a single animal. This last embraces the departments of embryology, the study of the formation of living beings, and morphology, the study of the form and structure. Further important divisions are: physiological anatomy, the study of parts in relation to their functions; surgical or topographical anatomy which relates to the relations of different parts, and pathological anatomy which treats of the changes brought on by disease, in various organs or tissues.

History: Greek and Latin Period.—Anatomical knowledge had its beginnings very early in the history of the race. Animal sacrifices led to a knowledge of animal anatomy. The works of Galen and Erasistratus applied to these facts.

The art of embalming also necessitated a knowledge of the position of blood vessels and certain organic relations. Even Homer used many terms which indicate a much deeper knowledge of human structures than might be expected thus early. The first record of anatomy is the description of the circulation of blood. The knowledge of the venae cavae did not come until the time of Hippocrates of Cos, about 400 B.C. The Greek Father of Medicine knew the bones well, probably because of the ready opportunities for their study to be found in tombs, but did not know the distinction between veins and arteries, and uses the term ἀποζύλον in reference to the trachea. He used the term нерв to signify a sinew or tendon. Until the time of Aristotle, about 330 B.C., no additions were made to anatomical knowledge. There seems to be no doubt that this Greek philosopher frequently dissected animals. His description of the sora and its branches is succinct. This is the first time in the history of anatomy that the word sora, Greek δόρυ, a knapsack, was used. His knowledge of the nerves was as little as that of Hippocrates, but he was thoroughly familiar with the internal viscera, and he distinguished the jejenum or empty part of the small intestine from the cecum, or blind gut, so called because it is a sort of cul-de-sac; the colon, and the sigmoid flexure. The word rectum is the literal translation of his description of the straight process of the bowel to the anus. A contemporary of Aristotle, Praxagoras of Cos, was the first who distinguished the arteries from the veins and spoke of the former as air vessels because after death they always contained only air.

All of this knowledge had been gained from dissections of animals. It was at Alexandria in the beginning of the third century before Christ that two Greek philosophers, Herophilus and Erasistratus, made the first dissections of the human body. None of their writings have come down to us. We know what they discovered, however, from the references to them made by Galen, Oribasius, and other medical writers. Erasistratus discovered the heart valves and called them, from their forms, sigmoid valves. He should be studied by the student of the brain and recognized the nature of nerves which he described as coming from the brain. He seems even to have appreciated the difference between nerves of motion and sensation. There is a claim that he discovered the lymph vessels in the mesentary also. Herophilus applied the name of twelve inch portion of the intestine to the part which has since been called the duodenum. He described the straight venous sinus within the skull which is still sometimes called by his name. He is also said to have given the name of calamus scriptorius to the linear furrow at the lower part of the fourth ventricle.

Needless to have distinguished the semi-circular canals of the ear. After Celsus, who lived during the half-century before Christ, the next important name is that of Galen, who was born about A.D. 120. Galen was not only an investigator but a collaborator of all the medical knowledge down to his time. His work was destined to rule anatomical science down to the sixteenth century, and even beyond it, that is, for nearly fourteen hundred years. Galen's osteology is almost perfect. His knowledge of muscles was more incomplete, but it was far beyond that of any of his predecessors. He did not add much to the previous knowledge with regard to blood vessels, though he made a great contribution to the study of the veins. Blood of living animals arteries contained not air but blood. His description of the veins and arteries, however, is rather confused and here his knowledge is most imperfect. His additions to the knowledge of the nervous system are very important. He described the falk and exposed by successive sections the ventricles and the choroid plexus. In general, his description of the gross anatomy of the brain is quite advanced.

Medieval Period.—With the fall of the Roman Empire and the invasions of the barbarians there came an end for at least five or six centuries to all anatomical study. Within the first signs of a reawakening of interest in anatomy after this long sleep showed themselves at the famous medical school at Salernum. There is no doubt that even during the tenth century Salernum had a reputation as the best place for invalids with ailments that could not be cured elsewhere. Many distinguished members of reigning families found their way down to this little town and its reputation soon attracted medical students. There is a tradition connecting the rise of the school at Salernum with the Benedictine monks whose great monastery of Monte Cassino was not far away. Definite details are, however, lacking. In the thirteenth century the medical courses at Salernum began to be regularly organized. At the beginning of the twelfth century regulations for the first State examinations in medicine were made. Anatomy was a required subject, but was studied by means of the pig which was thought to be closely related to man in anatomical structure. Curiously enough this animal is now reasserting a place in medicine as a favourite subject for research and instruction in embryology.

About the middle of the thirteenth century Frederick II made it a rule that the students at Salernum be at the universities at the end of each year. Salernum was one of the earliest to make a name for itself, but both Paris and Bologna were not far behind. At Paris beyond the end of the thirteenth century the famous Heronemusville was giving a series of demonstrations on human cadavers that attracted students from all over Europe, and William of Salicet, at Bologna, attracted quite as much attention. There appears to be no doubt that he made many human dissections, and there is a definite tradition of his having made more than one dissection on the body of a nobleman in order to determine whether death was due to poisoning. This fact of itself would seem to show that this was not an unusual procedure, since if William were not accustomed to seeing bodies dissected frequently he would scarcely be trusted as an expert in determining the cause of death or absence of death in such a case.

It is very commonly accepted that there was an interruption in the development of anatomical knowledge about the beginning of the fourteenth century because of a papal decree forbidding dissection. The statement that such a decree was promulgated at the Council of Vienne is not to be found in nearly every history of medicine published in English, and, as been made much of in books on the supposed apposition of science and religion. There was no such decree, however, and the declaration that the development of anatomy interfered with the powers of the Church, as required by the pope, is founded on nothing more substantial than a misunderstanding of the purport of a decree of Pope Boniface VIII. In the year 1300 this Pope issued the Bull "De Sepulturis," the title of the Bull runs as follows: "Persons cutting up the bodies of the deceased and purposely cooking them in order that the bones being separated from the flesh may be carried for burial into their own countries are by the very fact excommunicated." The only possible explanation of the misunderstanding that the Bull forbade dissection is that some one read only the first part of that Bull and disregarded the second part which said that the methods of preparing bones for study in anatomy was by boiling them in order to be able to remove the flesh from them easily, that this decree forbade such practices thereafter.

The first authoritative history in which this interpretation of the Bull appeared was the "Histoire littéraire de la France," which originally issued by the Benedictines of Saint-Maur, but continued by the members of the Institute of France, and it is in one of the volumes of the continuation that the declaration with regard to the interruption of anatomical studies by dissection is made. Not only the Bull, but also the aforementioned edict of the Benedictines is cited by authors of the history of anatomy just after its issuance shows that it was not misinterpreted so as to hamper anatomical progress. Within the decade after the date of the Bull, Mondino began to perform at Bologna the series of public dissections of human bodies on which was founded his text-book of anatomy. This was to be the authority on this subject for the next two centuries in Europe. It is sometimes said that Mondino dissected only a few bodies, but Guy de Chauliac, himself a distinguished anatomist later in the fourteenth century, declares that Mondino dissected human bodies a number of times (nullitas in his word). In 1319 there is the record of a criminal prosecution for body-snatching at Bologna, and it is clear that a number of such events had happened before the criminal courts were appealed to in the matter. At this time, according to the statutes of the university, teachers of anatomy were required to make a dissection of the body of a criminal who had been executed, and that gave the first good description of the thymus gland. His dissections of the eye and of the ear made anatomical knowledge of these structures, also, much more definite.

Modern Anatomy. The time was evidently ripe for the coming of the great father of modern anatomy, Vesalius. He was a Fleming, educated originally at the University of Louvain, where he acquired, besides his classical studies, a taste for scientific investigation. He went to Paris to study under Dubois, better known by his Latin name of Sylvius. Though the Sylvian fissure is named after him, Dubois did not accomplish very much while he was there, because most of the dissections were always made on dogs, but Vesalius eked out his knowledge by studying human bones from the cemeteries at Paris. From Paris Vesalius went to Padua where he became professor of anatomy when only twenty-one. After teaching at Padua for some years he was invited to give courses in anatomy at Bologna which was then a papal city. After a time Pisa also called him to a professorship and he seems to have lectured successfully in each of these universities for several years. At the age of twenty-eight he had completed his book "De Fabrica Corporis Humani" which was forever to remain a classic of anatomy. The Middle Ages neither interfered with the portions of the human body on which Vesalius did not throw new light. His new additions to anatomical knowledge are so numerous that they cannot even be mentioned briefly here. Besides the new information he conveyed there was still a more important feature of Vesalius’s work. His methods definitely did away with the old dependence on authority in anatomy which had for so long made men cling to Galen, and prevented progress. After the preliminary opposition on the part of the over-conservative, his discoveries proved an incentive to many younger men who proceeded to carry his methods into the investigation of every part of the body. The story is often repeated that he was hampered in his researches by the Inquisition and by the ecclesiastical authorities has no foundation in fact.

Contemporary with him were Eustachius, whose memory is perpetuated in the name of the Eustachian tube which he first described, and Fallopian, who corrected certain of the mistakes of Vesalius with regard to the bones and the muscles, but who will be known for his discovery of the ureteric appendage which bears his name, and finally Columbus, who succeeded Vesalius and corrected certain details of his description of the heart and its appendages, tracing the course of the blood from the right to the left side of the heart, so that he has often been claimed as the original discoverer of the circulation of the blood. Columbus was afterwards called to Rome to be the professor of anatomy in the Papal University. Eustachius was for some years before this pope, and was the Pope and a professor at the University. Italy continued to be for centuries the most fruitful field of anatomical investigation. Fallopian was succeeded by Fabricius who is perhaps best known as the professor under whom Harvey, the English discoverer of the circulation of the blood, made his anatomical studies in Italy. Harvey’s discovery was not published until 1628, though he had known it for nearly ten years before that. In the meantime Aselli at Pavia, in 1622, had described the lacteal vessels in the mesentery.

Outside of Italy the distinguished anatomists are rare. Servetus who was burnt by Calvin, in 1533, for his errors with regard to the Trinity in his book on that subject, gave an astonishingly clear description of the lesser or pulmonic circulation. This was published nearly a century before Harvey’s work on the circulation. The most important work done outside of Italy was accomplished by Steno, or Sumen, who demonstrated the existence of the sphenoid sinus and, in the second half of the century, described the lachrymal glands, and gave clear notions as to the ovaries. Besides this he demonstrated that the heart was a muscle and not the seat of the emotions that it had hitherto been considered. He became a convert to Catholicism, and eventually a Catholic bishop. Though he was a Dane his work was done in the Netherlands, the second centre of the anatomical interest in Europe. Here during the first half of the seventeenth century Bartholin, Swammerdam, and Blee made important discoveries. Bartholin’s name is perpetuated in the glands described by him; while the latter two added much to our knowledge of the structure of the veins. In the second half of the century Ruyysch, in Amsterdam, first employed injections for anatomical study, while Brunner and Peyer described their glands in the small intestine. Some important work was done in England and in the second half of the seventeenth century. Wharton studied the glands of the mouth, Glisson studied the liver and especially the capsule which has since borne his name, and Willis, after whom the arterial circle at the base of the brain is named, made successful investigations of the brain and nerve. The main current of advance in anatomy, however, remained in Italy. Malpighi’s work is the greatest of the century, with a possible exception of Harvey’s discovery. Malpighi described the movements of the blood corpuscles, the structure of bone and of the teeth, the Malpighian layer in the skin, and the Malpighian bodies in the spleen and kidney. He also did work in botany, in which the Englishman, Grew, was his rival. A great contemporary of his was Danzi, who discovered the corpuscles in milk and in blood, and also had some idea of the cellular nature of the skin.

The eighteenth century saw the rise of another great series of Italian anatomists. Four names are especially deserving of mention; those of Danzi, who combined clinical and anatomical knowledge; Valvasor, famous for his work on the ear; Santorini, who added much to our knowledge of the face and its appendages, and Morgagni whose main work was concerned with morbid anatomy, but who also added greatly to our knowledge of normal anatomy. In France, Winsten like Stenon, a Dane like Here, who, as a convert to Catholicism, wrote the first treatise of descriptive anatomy founded on observation alone, and began the series of text-books which made this century famous, Haller, the first great German anatomist, flourished about the middle of this century. His contributions, with wonderful engravings, represent a distinct advance in the methods of studying and teaching anatomy. Two distinguished contemporaries in Germany were Meckel who discovered the diverticulum and Lieberkuhn after whom the glands are named. In Great Britain, the Hunters, William and John, did excellent work in this century, and Hewson contributed not a little to comparative anatomy.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century the most important name is that of Bichat, who unfortunately was cut off at the beginning of his thirties when giving promise of being the greatest anatomical genius that ever lived. In England, the Monroes at Edinburgh, and Sir Charles Bell, famous for his differentiation of the nerves of motion and sensation, did excellent work. The important advances in anatomy, however, in this century were destined to be made with the microscope. Schwann discovered that all animal tissues were made of cells and thus opened up a new outlook in anatomy. Not long after, Max Schultz demonstrated that all cellular material, plant or animal, was composed of protoplasm. Following these up, Virchow, studying morbid anatomy rather than normal tissues, still more emphasized the vast differences in the parts of the body. A Dane, a teacher of Schwann and Virchow, Johann Muller, though not as illustrious as either of his great disciples, is the man to whom Germany owes the introduction of methods of investigation that were to be so fruitful for the medical sciences during the next half century. Muller, and Schwann, Weismann, and the other Catholics, and Schwann continued his work in the Catholic Universities of Louvain and Liege creating special interest in anatomical studies in these places. At Louvain the biological journal of the University, La Cellule, has proved the medium for the publication of many important anatomical advances, especially in the present century. Among its contributors is the name of Ramon-y-Cajal who added so much to the knowledge of brain anatomy. There are many other names that deserve mention in the nineteenth century, such as Kolliker, Retzius, Henle, Corts, Hecker, Richard Owen, Goodsir, Huxley, Billroth, and Wackery who cannot be omitted from any adequate account of this period.

Anatomy in America.—The first courses in human anatomy in America were offered in New York City by Drs. John Bard and Peter Middleton, about 1750, and at nearly the same time by Dr. Thomas Cadwalader in Philadelphia. In 1762 Dr. Shippen gave a medical lecture in Philadelphia. In 1783, with Dr. John Morgan, he organized a school of medicine as a department of what is now the University of Pennsylvania. Medical schools were founded.

at Columbia College, New York, in 1768; at Harvard in 1783; Dartmouth, 1797; University of Maryland, 1807; Yale, 1810; Brown, 1811; Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., 1817. Until the last quarter of the nineteenth century very little more than the training of medical students for their work as general practitioners was accomplished in the anatomical departments of American medical schools. Certain names, as those of the elder Warren, Isaac Wistar, William Horner, deserve to be mentioned.

The important names in the development of anatomy in America are concerned more with comparative than with human anatomy. Cope and Marsh, Agassiz and Leidy, made names for themselves that were known all over the world. Harrison Allen, Thomas Dwight, and Charles Minot, with J. A. Ryder represent in their various departments distinct in the least importance. In brain anatomy there has been some excellent work from Burt Wilder, E. A. Spitzka, Llewellys Barker, and W. C. Spiller. In general, however, the period of successful investigation into anatomical problems seems to be only just opening up. Definite arrangements for the carrying on of research and now generally termed as necessary appendages of university anatomical departments and much can be expected in the very near future. ANASARBUS, a titular metropolitan see of Cilicia (Lesser Armenia), suffragan of Antioch, known also to the ancients as Nova Troas, to the crusaders as Naxera, and to the Arabs as Aln-Zarba. Councils were held there in 431 and 435.

AFASCO, PEDRO DE, b. at Chachapoyas (Peru) in 1560; d. at Atunc, Paraguay, 1605. His father was Pedro de Afasco, a Spanish captain, companion of Belalazar in the conquest of Ecuador; and through him, it is said, the first notice of the "Dorado" of Gustavit reached the Spaniards in Ecuador. In the age of twenty-two Afasco became a Jesuit. In 1577 he was sent to Jul, on Lake Titicaca. Thence he passed to the Chaco tribe among the Abipones and, in 1593, to Paraguay, where he died. He was an indefatigable missionary and a zealous student of Indian languages. Highly respectable authorities, like Gonzalez Davila and Legrand, credit him with having composed grammars, "doctrines," and catechisms in nine different Indian languages of South America.

IV. none of Afasco's linguistic works have been published, and it is to be feared that, most if not all, of his catechisms are lost.

ANCHETE, JOSEPH, a famous Jesuit missionary, commonly known as the Apostle of Brazil, b. on the island of Tenerife, in 1539; d. in Brazil, 1597. After studying at Coimbra, he entered the Society of Jesus, at the age of seventeen, and when a novice nearly ruined his health by his excessive austerity, causing an injury to the spine which made him almost a hunchback. He was sent to the New World, with no idea of making him a missionary, but in the hope of restoring his shattered health. He reached Brazil in 1553, and laboured there among the colonists and savage natives for forty-four years. His first work was teaching Latin to some of the junior members of the Society and to a certain number of externs. Very likely it was the first classical school in America. He was a perfect master of Latin, Castilian, and Portuguese, and quickly acquired a knowledge of the native tongue, in which he composed a grammar and dictionary as well as two books of religious instruction, to assist the missionaries in the work of converting the natives. He was a poet, and wrote canticles which immediately became very popular among the savage and Portuguese. To effect a reformation of morals, he composed and directed a drama which was acted in the open air at Bahia. By means of interludes in Brazilian the Indians were able to grasp its meaning. This also was possibly the first attempt at dramatic art in the New World. At the time he was a priest, he accompanied the missionaries on their apostolic journeys, and on one occasion remained a willing hostage among the wild Tamious who were waging a fierce war against the settlers; twice he was on the point of being killed and eaten. During his captivity he is said to have composed a poem of nearly five thousand verses, and, as there were no means of putting it on paper, he committed it to memory, and wrote it out after he returned to the colony. It was during the last military operations to suppress the Tamuin uprising that he was recalled from the expedition, and ordained a priest by Peter Leitao, the first bishop who arrived in Brazil. Apart from his supernatural gifts, he was remarkable for his captivating eloquence and gracefulness of speech. He had a fair knowledge of medicine, which he made use of in helping his Indians, and he displayed an unusual skill in the details of business when, later in life, he was called to the office of rector and provincial.

But it is chiefly as a thaumaturgus, as a daring missionary, and as a man of extraordinary holiness, that Anchete is remembered. He is narrated of him that the birds of the air and even the beasts of the forest submitted to his caress; the waters of the sea formed a wall about him while he was praying; the touch of his garments restored health to the sick. He possessed the gift of prophecy, and frequently described events that were occurring at great distances. Though suffering from bodily infirmities, he undertook the most laborious missions, and thus at times seemed to have a supernatural power to do without sleep or rest. The districts which he evangelized were always the most exhausting and dangerous. His power over men, both savage and civilized, was irresistible. His prayers were constant, and he was often, though unaware of it himself, surrounded by a dazzling light. He was almost absolutely without any earthly possessions, and went barefoot on his apostolic expeditions. Even before he was a priest he was entrusted with the investigation of houses of the Society; and when he could not prevent from these missions, he was made rector of the College of St. Vincent, and, subsequently, Provincial of Brazil, relinquishing this post only when his failing strength made it impossible for him to fulfil its duties. The people clamoured for his canonization, and he was declared Venerable by the Church. The process of his beatification is now continuing.
ANCHOR (AS SYMBOL).—The anchor, because of its great importance in navigation, was regarded in ancient times as a symbol of safety. The Christians, therefore, in adopting the anchor as a symbol of hope in a future existence, merely gave a new and higher signification to a familiar emblem. In the teachings of Christianity the virtue of hope occupies a place of great importance; Christ is the unfailing hope of all who believe in Him. St. Peter, St. Paul, and several of the early Fathers (Cabrol, Dict. d'arch. chrét., col. 2000) speak in this sense, but the Epistle to the Hebrews for the first time connects the idea of hope with the symbol of the anchor. The writer says that we have "as an anchor of the soul, sure and firm" (Heb., vi, 19-20). The hope here spoken of is obviously not concerned with earthly, but with heavenly things, and the anchor as a Christian symbol, consequently, relates only to the hope of salvation. It ranks among the most ancient of Christian symbols. The well-known fragment of the inscription discovered in the cemetery of St. Domitilla, which De Rossi reads (sepulcrum Flaviorum) contains the anchor, and dates from the end of the first century. During the second and third centuries the anchor occurs frequently in the epitaphs of the catacombs, and particularly in the most ancient parts of the cemeteries of Sts. Priscilla, Domitilla, Calixtus, and the Cemeterium major. About seventy examples of it have been found in the cemetery of Priscilla alone, prior to the fourth century. In the oldest of these (second century) the anchor is found associated with such expressions as "pax tecum, pax tibi, in pace," thus expressing the firm hope of these inscriptions that their friends have been admitted to Heaven. The anchor is also found in association with proper names formed from the Latin or the Greek term for hope—spect, swtv. St. Ambrose evidently had this symbol in mind when he wrote in Ep. ad Heb. vii, "As an anchor thrown from a ship prevents this from being borne about, but holds it securely, so faith, strengthened by hope," etc.

VARIOUS FORMS OF THE ANCHOR.—Different forms of the anchor appear in the epitaphs of the catacombs, the most common being that in which one extremity terminates in a ring adjoining the cross-bar while the other ends in two curved branches or an arrowhead. There are, however, many deviations from this form. In a number of monuments of Sts. Calixtus and Priscilla the cross-bar is wanting, and in others the curved branches are replaced by a straight transversal. These departures from regularity do not appear to have any especial significance, but the cruciform anchor marks an interesting symbolic development. The rare appearance of a cross in the Christian monuments of the first four centuries is a well-known peculiarity; not more than a score of examples belong to this period. Yet, though the cross is of infrequent occurrence in its familiar form, certain monuments appear to represent it in a manner intelligible to a Christian but not to an outsider. The anchor was the symbol best adapted for this purpose, and the one most frequently employed. One of the most remarkable of these disguised crosses, from the cemetery of St. Domitilla, consists of an anchor placed upright, the transverse bar appearing just beneath the ring. To complete the symbol, two fishes are represented with the points of the curved branches in their mouths. A real cross, standing on a sort of pedestal to the right of this, is sufficient indication that the author of the figures intended a symbolic representation of the Crucifixion (Cabrol, loc. cit., fig. 557). Of even greater interest in this connection is the representation of a cross-anchor with two fishes suspended from the cross-beam, also found in the cemetery of St. Priscilla. There can scarcely be any doubt that the author of this and similar representations intended to produce a symbolic picture of the crucifixion: the mystic Fish (Christ) on the suggested cross (the anchor). To the same category of symbols, probably, belongs the group of representations of the dolphin and trident. The anchor as a symbol is found only rarely in monuments from the middle of the third century, and early in the fourth century it had disappeared.

ANCHORITES (ἀνάχως, I withdraw), also hermits (ἀνυματιμοί, desert-dwellers, Lat., eremitas), in Christian terminology, men who have sought to triumph over the two unavoidable enemies of human salvation, the flesh and the devil, by depriving them of the assistance of their ally, the world. The natural impulse of all earnest souls to withdraw temporarily or forever from the tumult of social life was sanctioned by the examples and teachings of Scripture. St. John Baptist in the desert and Our Lord, withdrawing ever and anon into solitude, were examples which incited a host of holy men to imitate them. Since these men despised and shunned the world, it cannot surprise us that the world answered with corresponding contempt. The world is an imperious tirant, and thoroughly selfish; niggardly in its gratitude to those lofty souls whose lives are entirely devoted to its betterment without regard to its praise or censure. It pursues as rebels, and derides as fools, those who shake off its yoke and scatter to the winds its riches, honors, and pleasures. In its extremest isolation, the life of the Christian anchoret is no No Man's Land, but the abode of God. From the first, freed from all distracting cares leads an existence most consonant to man's rational nature, and consequently productive of the highest type of happiness obtainable on this earth. Moreover, no matter how deeply the hermit buries himself in the thicket or wilderness, he is always within easy reach of the call to the service of Thee, and to the rest of all who call upon Him. Hundreds of cells will cluster about his; his experience will be invoked for the drawing up of rules of order and for spiritual guidance; in short, his hermitage is gradually transformed into a monastery, his solitary life into the cenobitic. If he again longs for solitude, and plunges deeper into the desert, the same process will begin, as we see in the case of St. Anthony of Egypt. Furthermore, though these saintly men have thrown off the yoke of the world, they remain subject to the authority of the Church, at whose command, in critical times, they are forth from their hermitage to strengthen the ranks of her spiritual army. Thus did Anthony (286-356) come to Alexandria on the appeal of Athanasius; thus did the sons of Benedict, and Romuald, and Bruno, and Bernard, do yeomen's work in the medival struggle with barbarism. Indeed, it would be difficult to point out a single great champion of Christian civilization who was not trained to the spiritual combat in the wilderness.

The chief resorts of the earliest of these fugitives from human society were the vast deserts of Egypt and Syria, whose caves and tombs soon housed an incredible number of Christian ascetics. The first attempts at self-discipline by this untutored host were sometimes crude, and tinctured with Oriental fanaticism; but before long the authority of the Church and the wise maxims of great spiritual masters, notably Pachomius, Hilianor, and Basil, fashioned them into a well disciplined armory of distinct aims and methods. Soon the rule obtained, that those only should be authorized to live solitary lives who had previously spent a time of probation in a monastery, and had been permitted by their abbot to withdraw. Between the monks, who lived and worked in common (the so-called cenobites) and those who lived in absolute solitude, there were many gradations. Some lived in separate cells and met only for prayer, some for meals, some only on Sundays. The strangest form of asceticism was that adopted by the Stylians (q. v.), men who lived for years on the tops of high columns, from which they exhorted and instructed the asta-stricted populace. Coming to more modern times, canonists distinguish four different species of Hermits: (1) Those who have taken the three monastic vows in some religious order approved by the Church. Such are the Hermits of St. Augustine, the Hermits of St. Jerome, etc. (2) Those who live in common but are not approved by the monastery of their own choice. (3) Those who without vows or community life adopt a peculiar habit with the approval of the bishop, and by him are deputed to the service of a church or oratory. (4) Those who, without any ecclesiastical authority, adopt the habitus eremiti and live without any ecclesiastical authority. To obviate the possible abuses on the part of this last class of hermits, the Holy See has at different times issued stringent legissation, which may be read in Benedict XIV "De Syn. Dicete." VI, iii, 6, or in Ferraris, "Biblotech", s. v. "Eremita".

Ancient of Days, a name given to God by the Prophet Daniel, vii, 9, 13, 22, in which he contrasts His eternal powers with the frail existence of the empires of the world. It is from these descriptions of the Almighty that Christian art derived its general manner of representing the first person of the Holy Trinity. Ancient of Days is expressed in Aramaic by Atty yodmin; in the Greek by divine or kósmou, and in the Vulgate by Antiqua

Ancilla Dei.—In early Christian inscriptions the title ancilla Dei is often given to a deceased woman. From the first century, attesting spiritus, from the 6th century in the Middle Ages it has sometimes been assumed, without sufficient proof, that the persons so qualified in the first age of Christianity were consecrated virgins. The inscriptions containing this formula are of two classes: one, in which it is merely stated that a given person was ancilla Dei; the other, from which it is clear that this title was sometimes given to persons who certainly were not religious. It is with the latter class that we are concerned. The former class is the more numerous, but one of the latter is quite explicit. This informs us that a certain monument was erected by a woman of the name of Lucilla, who styled herself ancilla Dei. (Laur)entius Rufine coagi Dei ancilla (Lucilla) . . . " (De Rossi, Roma Sott., III, p. 11, n. 4). In a Roman inscription of the first quarter of the sixth century a certain Guttus is referred to as ancilla Dei, and it is further stated that she was nonness—"in possession of the nun Guttus, a handmaid of God" (and present is nonness Guttus ancilla Dei). This reference proves that even in the sixth century, ancilla Dei was a title not peculiar to religious; the author regarded it as necessary to state explicitly that she was nonness (Cabrol, Dict. d'arch. chret., 1902). From the pontificate of St. Gregory the Great (590-604), however, only nun as a rule, were qualified by this title: "ancillas Dei quas vos Graecia lingua monastrias dicitis" (Greg. M. Ep., vi, 23).

Ancona, CIRIACO D'ANCONA, an Italian antiquary, whose family name was Pizzicoli, b. at Ancona about 1391; d. about 1455 at Cremona. During voyages of commerce throughout the Orient he collected a great store of inscriptions, manuscripts, and other antiquities. Returning in 1420 after a trip to the United Rhine, Beirut, Damascus, Cyprus, Mitylene, Thessalonica, and other places. He enjoyed the patronage of Eugenius IV, Cosmo de' Medici, and the Visconti of Milan. In 1443 he visited Morea in Greece, where he copied inscriptions mentioned in the correspondence of Filippo, Trissino, Donato Ariutino, and others. He is accounted the best equipped, most learned, and accurate worker in the province of epigraphies during the period of the Renaissance. His accuracy in copying ancient inscriptions is said by De Rossi (op. cit. below, 377) to be 'the chief credit and undying glory of Ciriaco'. Most of his manuscripts have been lost; those published after his death are "Itinerarium" (Florence, 1742); "Epigrammata reperta per Illyricum a Kyriaco Anconitano" (Rome, 1664), the latter very rare. Mazzu-chelli mentions other works in his "Scrittori d'Italia" (iv.).

Ancona and Umiana, an Italian diocese in the Archdiocese of Ancona, comprising ten towns in the province of Ancona. It is an important seaport town, favourable for commerce between the East and Italy, across the Adriatic. Ancona must have had a Christian community within its walls at a very early date. Excavations made in the village of Varano, near Ancona, in 1890, have yielded a chalchal stone with a Christian inscription. The character of the writing of the epitaph shows that it belongs to the end of the third century, and we are justified in believing that the church at Ancona did not possess catacombs, but an open burial place. For the purpose of preserving the remains of the organized Christian community before the time of Constantine, Harnack [Die Mission, etc., (Leipzig, 1902), 501, 502] advances arguments that seem perfectly legitimate. Eusebius says (VI, 43) that the Roman Bishop Cornelius, in the year 250, held a synod of sixty Italian bishops against Novatian. It may be assumed that the jurisdiction of Rome as a metropolitan see, about the year 250, embraced not less than two hundred bishoprics, since all the bishops of a given territory did not attend the synods. It follows that Christians were found in all the more important cities, amongst which, of course, was Ancona. The church was under the patronage of saints, Primanius and Cyriacus, evidently very ancient, but their rank and the time they flourished are uncertain. In the year 462, Mark of Ancona came to the synod held under Pope Hilary; and in 465, to the new synod convoked by the same Pope under the conduct of Numistius, united in 1422, at the time of Pope Martin V. From an archeological point of view, besides the place of sepulture mentioned above, the cubiculum of the veteran Flavius Eventius, with a singular inscription and a magnificent mosaic of the fourth century, is worthy of mention, as is also the sarcophagus of Flavius Gorgonius, comes privatarum lartitionum (count of the emperor's private largesse), of the same century. There is also an "Evangelium Sancti Martellini" in uncial characters, of the seventh century, preserved in the Chapter Library. The Cathedral of Ancona, dedicated to St. Cyriacus, and standing in the highest part of the city, is in a style of architecture that has felt the direct influence of Oriental art. It was finished in the eleventh century and has a cupola with a quadrangular base like St. Fosca on the Venetian lagoons and St. Anthony at Padua.

Ancona contains 37 parishes; 86 churches, chapels, and chapels of the secular parishes; 50 regular clergy; 8 lay brothers; 70 religious (women); 50 confraternities; 4 schools for boys (400 pupils); 5 schools for girls (250 pupils). Population 81,662.

Anconae Ripio, or RIREA INCUSARUM, is the name given to a thirteenth-century code of rules for the life of anchorites, which is sometimes called "The Nuns' Rule." In Middle English the word anchorize is for solitariness or the authorizes of the sexes: but in this case it refers only to ladies who had left the world and were established in a secluded place, in order to lead a life devoted to the practices of religious observance. Of the text of this "Rule" several copies are extant in the English libraries. One of the commercial (Imperial) scrolls, is entitled "Anconae Wise" and is thought by some to be an abridgment, or adaptation, of the Latin tract of Simon of Ghent who was Bishop of Salisbury (1297-1315). The British Museum possesses five copies, three of which were collated for the printed edition published for the Camden Society by the Rev. James Morton in 1852. Besides reading the modern English version or translation which was reprinted in a small volume in 1905. Mr. Morton, in his introduction, has given many reasons for rejecting the notion that the English version is a translation of Simon of Ghent's tract, and considers that the British Museum Cott. MS. is, probably the original English version of the "Anconae Ripio." Moreover, in the opinion of many experts, the curious Anglo-Saxon language in which the code of rules is written seems to require an earlier date than the close of the thirteenth century. It is thought probable that the real author of the little book is Bishop Richard Poore, who held the see of Salisbury from 1217 to 1229, when he was translated by the Pope to Durham. It is right, however, to mention the fact that some writers consider that the time of the composition of the "Rule" must be put at a later date. Although there is nothing whatever in the work to warrant the assertion, it has usually been taken for granted that it was composed for the nuns who dwelt at Tarrent in Dorsetshire. Bishop Poore was born in that place, and a sister of his is said to have become a nun in that convent. Be that as it may, it is certain that the Bishop, for some reason, came to be regarded as the author of the convent and that in his last sickness he journeyed to Tarrent and died there in 1237.

The "Anconae Ripio" contains many interesting details of the life led by the solitary ladies for whom it was written. Although the "ancreste" was alone in the strict sense, that is, she inhabited her cell or cells alone, except for the "maidens" or servant who attended to her wants, still, in this case, there were three or more of these solitary ladies living under the same roof. "I know not," says the author of the rule, "any anchorises that with more abundance, or more honour, hath all that is necessary to her than we three have." We also learn that the convent, or house, of these ladies was adjoining the church, and that through windows in the cells of each they were enabled to practise their devotions and to follow the services and especially the Holy Sacrifice, as well as pay their homage to the Blessed Sacrament hanging over the altar. Under the avaries of the nuns, according to this rule, is simplicity itself. After having begun the day by a visit to the Blessed Sacrament, the sisters were instructed to fall on their knees before their crucifixes and occupy themselves with salutations to Our Saviour represented before their eyes on the Cross. They were then to sing Our Blessed Lady with "five ayes", before beginning the Hours of her Office, which were to be followed by a Litany and the Office for the Dead. The day was mostly occupied by prayer. The author admits that this and the keeping of "the ten old Commandments" constitute a hard fashion of life, but adds that "nothing is ever so tedious, the love doth not make it tender and soft and sweet." Ancyra, the modern Angora, a titular see of Galatia in Asia Minor, suffragan of Laodicea. It was said to have been founded by Mida, was a chief place of the Gallic conquerors of Asia Minor (c. 277, b. c.), and in imperial times a centre of commerce. It is famous for the official record of the Acts of Augustus, known as the "Monumentum Aniceranum," an inscription cut in marble on the walls of an ancient temple, several times copied and edited since the sixteenth century. The ruins of Ancyra furnish today valuable bas-reliefs, inscriptions, and other architectural fragments. Its episcopal list is given in Gams, "Series episc. Eccl. cath.;" also of that of another Ancyra in Pliny, "Hist. Nat."

ANCYRA, COUNCILS OF.—Three councils were held in the former capital of Galatia (now Angora) in Asia Minor, during the fourth century. The first great orthodox plenary synod, was held in 314, and its twenty-five disciplinary canons constitute one of the most important documents in the early history of the administration of the Sacred of Penance. Nine of them deal with conditions for the reconciliation of the lapsi; the others, with marriage, alienations of church property, etc. The synod of 358 was a Semi-Arian concilium, presided over by Basil of Ancyra. It condemned the grosser Arian blasphemies, but set forth for what was the first time in a council a heretical doctrine in the proposition that the Son was in all things similar to the Father, but not identical in substance. In 375, Arian bishops met at Ancyra and deposed several bishops, among them St. Gregory of Nyssa.

Andalusia.—This appellation is derived from Al-Andalus, the name given by the Arabs to the portion of Spain subject to their dominion. According to the opinion of D. E. Saavedra, the name was applied after the battle of Las Naves in 1212 (when the Sierra Morena became the dividing line between the Basques and the Moorish). The limits of the territory under the control of the Moors, the limits of which were approximately the same as those of the present Andalusia, this country is situated in the southern part of the Iberian peninsula, and is bounded on the north by the provinces of Badajoz and New Castle, on the south by the Mediterranean Sea and the Atlantic Ocean, on the east by the provinces of Albacete and Murcia, and on the east by Portugal. Its total area is about 33,950 square miles, and the number of its inhabitants, according to the latest census (verified in 1900), 3,435,893. The principal mountain ranges that traverse this country are the Sierra Morena in the north, the Sierra Nevada in the south, and Sierra Almargrera and Sierra de Gador to the east. The largest rivers are the Guadalquivir, the Guadalete, Rio Tinto, the Guadalmedina, and the Genil, a tributary of the Guadalquivir. The climate in general is temperate, the section bordering directly on the sea being hot. The soil is very fertile in almost all the level country, especially in the flat arable land around Cordova and Seville, and in the wide open plain of Granada; it is poor in other sections, because of the scarcity of water—as in certain parts of the province of Cadiz—or because of saline properties of the soil—as in Alpujarras. The most important products are cereals, olives, beet-root, and sugar-cane in the low lands; grapes, figs, oranges, and pomegranates in the vega (irrigated lands). The oils of Cordova and Seville, and the wines of Jerez and Malaga are famous; also the raisins of Malaga. Much attention is given in Cordova and Seville to the breeding of fine horses, and these provinces are also famous for their breed of bulls.

At the present time there are in Andalusia two archbishoprics: Seville and Granada; and five bishoprics: Cadiz, Cordova, Jaen, Malaga, Almeria, and Guadix. The military department is represented by a capitania general, with headquarters at Seville and eight stations, one in each province. The judiciary is divided into two districts (audencias territoriales), that of Seville and that of Granada; the political and administrative department is divided into eight provinces, each named from its capital: Seville, Cadiz, Huelva, Cordova, Jaen, Malaga, Granada, and Almeria. The Andalusian speak a dialect of the Spanish language, the chief difference being the pronunciation of the letter h, giving s the sound of z, and c the sound of s (in the syllables ce, ci), and the suppression of the final s. Many strangers visit Andalusia every year, especially in the spring, attracted by the beauty of the many historic monuments—pre-eminently, the cathedral and Alcazar of Seville, the cathedral of Cordova, and the Alhambra—and also by the typically national character of the Holy Week services at Seville, and of Corpus Christi at Granada. Fairs of great local interest are held in both cities in the week following these services. Andalusia was inhabited in early historic times by a people of Iberian origin; the Tartedani occupied what are now the provinces of Seville and Huelva; the Tarduli, Jaen, Cordova, and part of Granada; the Basuli, Malaga, and the coast of Granada; and the Saccetani, Jaen, Guadix, Baen, and Almeria. To this region, called Tartesos by the Greeks, Tartessus by the Phoenicians came, about the year 1100 B.C., settling in what is now Cadiz, and later spreading to Malaga, Adra, and Jete, all three celebrated for their deposits of salt. The Carthaginians succeeded the Phoenicians in power, and ruled over almost the whole of Andalusia until their expulsion by the Romans. Under the Roman dominion Andalusia formed a part of Farther Spain (Hispania Ulterior) during the Republic, and an independent province, called Botica, in the time of the Empire. With the Germanic invasion came the Vandals, who possessed and inhabited the country, followed by the Visigoths when the Vandals passed over into Africa. When Atanagild called the Byzantines to his aid, he gave them as a compensation the most southerly portion of Andalusia, but Leovigild, Suintila, and Sisebut succeeded in reuniting it to the monarchy of the Visigoths. Under the rule of the Emirs, subordinates of the Caliph of Damascus, and in the time of the Caliphate of Cordova, Andalusia was the centre of the political life and literary and artistic culture of the Arab people. At the downfall of the Caliphate (1030), it was subdivided into eleven independent states, some extremely small: Cordova, Jaen, Seville, Carmona, Marbella, Malaga, Ronda, Granada, and Almeria. The Almoravides (1086-1129) and the Almohades (1129-1272) subjugated all this territory to their dominion. Ferdinand III, the Saint, King of Castile and Leon, in the middle of the thirteenth century, reconquered Jaen, Cordova, and Seville, leaving to the Arabs only the kingdom of Granada, which comprised the greater part of the present provinces of Malaga, Granada, and Almeria. Finally, after a war which lasted nine years, Ferdinand and Isabella, the Catholic, obtained possession of Granada, entering the capital city in triumph, 2 January, 1492. Andalusia has produced many illustrious men, poets, painters, and the profession of arms. It will be sufficient to mention the philosopher Francisco Suarez, the ascetic writer Fray Luis de Granada, the painter Murillo, and El Gran Capitan, Gonzalvo de Cordova.

EDUARDO DE HINOJOJOA.

Andersen, William Henry, English Jesuit and writer, b. in London, England, 26 December, 1816;
d. 28 July, 1890. After three years at King's College, London, he matriculated at Oxford, when about nineteen, and entered Balliol. Soon after, he won a scholarship at University College and took a degree in 1840. He received Anglican ordination, became Vicar of Wrentham, and in 1846 of St. Margaret's, Leicester. In 1856 he was received into the Church in Paris by Father de Ravignan. Ordained at Oscott by Bishop Ullathorne in 1853, he was appointed a lecturer at Ushaw College and afterwards preacher and confessor at the University Church in Dublin. During his stay in Ireland the Franciscan convent of Drumshambo was founded, mainly through his efforts. In 1856 he was called to London by his uncle, Cardinal Manning, whose secretary he remained till he joined the Jesuits in 1872. From 1875 to 1889 he lived in Manchester, doing excellent work as preacher, spiritual guide, and writer.

Father Anderson began his literary apostolate by writing Catholic tales: "Bonneval, a Story of the Fronde" (1857), "Owen Evans, the Catholic Crusoe" (1862), "Afternoons with the Saints" (1883), "In the Snow, Tales of Mt. St. Bernard" (1866). All these stories, save the first, went through nine or ten editions, and were translated into German and French. Out of valuable works from his pen, "Papist Apostolici" (1882), "Evenings with the Saints" (1883), and "Britain's Early Faith" (1887). His controversial writings are the very best of the kind, his method being to undertake rather than to exaggerate. Among his works the best known are: "Is Ritualism Honest?", "Controversial Papers" (1878), "Luther's Words and the Word of God" (5th thousand, 1883), "Luther at Table", "What sort of a man was Luther?" (13th thousand, 1883), "What do Catholics Really Believe?", "Confession to a Priest" (1881).

His newspaper work displayed a fine sense of irony in treating the polemics of the day. He was ever busy writing for the "Weekly Register", the "English Messenger of the Sacred Heart", the "Xaverian", "Merry England", the "Month", the "Irish Monthly", and other serial publications. His last works were: "The Old Religion of Taunton" (1890); and "Five Minutes' Sermons" the latter completed only in part when he heard the Master's summons.

Anderley, Anthony Maria, General of the Society of Jesus, b. in Berisl, Canton Valais, Switzerland, 3 June, 1819; d. at Fiesole, Italy, 18 January, 1892. He entered the Society at Breg in 1839 and, after his novitiate, taught the classics at the college of Freiburg, where he was admired as a finished Latin scholar. When the Jesuits were expelled from Switzerland in 1848, young Anderley, with nearly fifty others came to the United States. He was sent to St. Louis to complete his studies, and was ordained priest there, 29 Sept., 1848, by Archbishop Kenrick. Father Anderley was appointed procurator of the German congregation of Green Bay, Wisconsin, where he devoted himself with great energy to his flock for two years. He was recalled to Germany in 1850, and assigned to one of the missionary bands of the German Province. In 1853, he was chosen to be rector of the students of the Society in Paderborn and remained in charge of their studies until 1859, when he was appointed Provincial of the German Province. During Father Anderley's term of office, which lasted six years, he purchased the splendid medieval abbey of Maria-Laach where he established the province-house of higher studies. In 1866, he was sent to Maria-Laach as professor of moral theology. In 1870, he was called to Rome and made Assistant-General of the Society, for the German-speaking provinces. Father Anderley was elected Vicar-General, with the right of succession to the venerable Father Beckx in 1883, by delegates from the whole Society. He died in Rome on the death of Father Beckx, in 1887, Father Anderley assumed all the duties of General of the Society of Jesus. He edited and published a new edition of Reuter's "Neo-Confessarius" which he enriched with valuable notes. In his administration of the Society of Jesus, Father Anderley was remarkable for great firmness of character.

Anderson, Henry James, scientist and educator, b. in New York City, 6 February, 1799; d. at Lahore, India, 19 October, 1875. He graduated at Columbia College in 1818, and afterwards studied medicine at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. He did not practise long, but devoted himself to scientific and literary pursuits. When twenty-six years old he was appointed professor of mathematics and astronomy in Columbia College. He retained this chair for twenty-five years, and in 1866 became emeritus professor. In 1848 he accompanied as geologist, the United States Deep Sea exploration expedition commanded by Captain William F. Beech, U. S. N. There he observed, and in 1850, he became a convert to the Catholic Faith and was ever after one of its most zealous adherents. He joined the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and when the Particular Council of New York was instituted in 1856 he was made its president. When the Supreme Council was organized in 1860, he was chosen its head. To his example, influence, and labours the Society in New York City is greatly indebted for its subsequent success. The New York Catholic Protector was founded and built under his inspiration. Pope Pius IX received him in Rome several times, and made him a Knight Commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great in recognition of his merits and zeal for religion. He was organizer and president of the Catholic Union, having for its special objects the defence of the rights of the Holy See, and the promotion of the Faith. In the Spring of 1875 he went to Lourdes and Rome as a pilgrim, and later on travelled extensively in Europe, in expense, to observe the transit of Venus. On his homeward journey, by way of India, where he accomplished an ascent of one of the Himalayan peaks, he was, soon after reaching Lahore, stricken with a malignant disease which proved fatal. His body was brought to New York, and buried in a vault, 19 March, 1876, in a vault under the Church of the Madonna, which he had been instrumental in building, at Fort Lee, New Jersey. His requiem was sung in St. Patrick's Cathedral, and Cardinal McCloskey, in the sermon, said: "I remember to have heard from the lips of a distinguished Oxford scholar that he never met a man in England with such humility." His principal writings were early contributions to the New York "Quarterly Review" and to mathematical journals, and in 1848 and 1849 two geological reports by him on the Dead Sea Expedition, "Geological Reconnaissance of Part of the Holy Land," were published by the U. S. government.

Anderson, Lionel Albert, an English Dominican, b. about 1625; d. 21 October, 1710. The son of a Lincolnshire gentleman, he suffered much for his faith. He became a convert, entered the order of St. Dominic at Paris in 1638, was ordained priest in 1665, and returned to London, where he was known under the assumed name of Munson. He was later accused by Titus Oates of being a conspirator against the King and Parliament, was indicted for being a priest.
contrary to the law of England, was tried and condemned to death at the Old Bailey, in 1679 or 1680, by the notorious Soggs. He was pardoned by Charles II, after undergoing a year's imprisonment in Newgate, and was exiled for life. In 1684, after a voyage to Holland, he returned to England with a free pardon from James II, fled with that to the Continent in 1688, returned again to England in 1689, and died at the patriarchal age of 91. Anderson, Patrick, a Scotch Jesuit, b. at Elgin in Morayshire in 1575; d. in London, 24 September, 1624. He was the nephew of Dr. John Leslie, Bishop of Ross, a faithful adherent of Mary Queen of Scots, and her ambassador at the French Court. After completing his education at the University of Edinburgh, he entered the Society of Jesus at Rome, in 1597, and in due time acquired a reputation as a linguist, mathematician, philosopher, and divine. In 1600 he was appointed to the Scotch mission, where his labours were highly successful and his hairbreadth escapes served to marvellously edify his countrymen. He left Scotland for Paris to meet his superior, Father James Gordon, late in 1611. Father Anderson undertook to supply the great dearth of missionaries in his native country by collecting nearly one hundred youths in Scotland, all of them most eager to serve God. In 1615 he became the first Jesuit Rector of the Scots College in Rome, founded fifteen years before by Pope Clement VIII. Returning to Scotland he was soon after betrayed by a pretended Catholic, and committed to the Tolbooth jail, Edinburgh, where, in the daily expectation of torture and death, he displayed the heroic intrepidity of a true martyr. He was finally set at liberty on the petition, it is supposed, of the French Ambassador, who requested to have him for his confessors. Father Anderson has left us some valuable and interesting letters relating to his missionary labours in Scotland; these letters may be found in part in the London "Month," for December, 1870. No one was better qualified to bear witness to the state of the Church in Scotland during the reign of James the First. In 1623 he published "The Ground of the Catholicke and Roman Religion in the Word of God," a work which shows that he had carefully studied the written argument for the Catholic Faith. While imprisoned in Edinburgh he also compiled the "Memoirs of the Scotch Saints," formerly in manuscript at the Scots College in Paris.

Both his mother and wife remained faithful to the Church, but James himself seems to have followed his father's example, and temporized so far as to attach his name to an address (1618) for the "disarming of recusants," and to perform other official duties repugnant to a true Catholic. He died about 1618. Father John Clark, rector of Liche College, in his eulogy of Father Henry Holland, S.J., makes the erroneous statement that James Anderson, under the pseudonym "John Brelename, priest," was the author of a valuable work entitled "The Protestant's Apology," an assertion that has been accepted generally. It has been shown, however, that the works of "John Brelename, priest," were from the pen of Father Lawrence Anderson, S.J., a nephew of James, who, however, is thought to have sheltered the press with which the work was printed. Anderton, Robert, Venerable, an English priest and martyr, b. in the Isle of Wight about 1560; d. 25 April, 1588. He matriculated at Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1578. He afterwards went abroad, was converted, and then entered the college at Reims in 1590. It was there that he and Marsden began that companionship which was not broken even in death. Having completed their course, they set sail for England, but were overwhelmed in a storm. They prayed that they might die on land rather than on sea, and their prayer was granted. Driven ashore, they were at once seized and immediately after tried and condemned. They now pleaded that they had not transgressed the statute, as they had been cast on shore forerce. This led to their being summoned to London, where they were examined upon the celebrated "bloody question", whether they would fight against the Pope, even if the quarrel were for purely religious causes. Though they acknowledged Elizabeth as their lawful queen in all temporal matters, they would not consent to the required test. The sentence was then confirmed, and a proclamation was published explaining their guilt. They were taken back and executed near the palace where they had been cast ashore, being hanged, drawn, and quartered. Challoner, Memoirs; Politen, Acts of English Martyrs (1891), 60-62. Anderton, Roger, a Catholic layman, son of Christopher Anderson of Lostock, brother of James and uncle of Lawrence Anderson. His name often appears on the Recusant Roll of London, and of his numerous family four became nuns. For a long time it was customary to attribute to him the authorship of the works written by his nephew Lawrence, under the name of "John Breiname, priest," and by other hands, although they seem to have been merely edited by him, the press maintained and protected by different members of the Anderton family. A list of these publications is among the Bindles of Crosby MSS. Roger Anderton is thought to have re-established this press at Birchley after the inquisition post-mortem of James Anderson of Lostock and the seizure of his books. He is said to have died in 1640. Anderton, Thomas, an English Benedictine, b. in Lancashire in 1611; d. 9 October, 1671. He was the sixth son of William Anderton, Esq., of Euxton, Lancaster, and Isabel, daughter of William Hancock of Pendle Hall, Lostock. Having been educated with his parents remained faithful to the Church in spite of persecution. Thomas made his profession in 1630, at the Benedictine monastery of St. Edmund, in Paris, and in 1636 was ordained priest, and successively became Novice-Master, Sub-Prior, and, in 1640, Prior of St. Edmund's. In 1641 he was Definitor, and in 1657 secretary to the chapter. From 1661 to 1666 he was Prior of St. Benedict's I-30
Andlaw, Heinrich Bernhard, Freiherr von, a famous Catholic statesman of the nineteenth century, b. 20 August, 1802, at Freiburg im Breisgau; d. 3 May, 1871. His chief sphere of activity was in the Church, where he was the archbishop of Freiburg im Breisgau. He was the younger son of Baron Konrad Karl, Frhr. von Andlaw-Birseck, who had emigrated from Switzerland and entered the Austrian service, and who, after the union of Breisgau with Baden (1806), worthily filled official and ministerial positions in the latter State. The son received a good state-school education, studied at Landshut and Freiburg, served for a short time as an officer of dragoons, travelled in France and Italy, and was then received into the Baden service as a councillor in a department of the State. He remained there, however, only until the year 1835, when he was appointed to the seat of the government巡查员 in the neighbourhood of Freiburg, and acted thenceforward, until the day of his death, as an independent in politics. In 1835 the landed nobility of Murge elected him to the Lower House of the Baden legislature, of which, except for two short intervals, he remained a member until his sixtieth year.

What especially characterized Andlaw among the many contemporary leaders of German Catholicism was the charm of his knightly bearing, his manly, honest faith, the tone of his discourse, and the rich music of his voice. He has been rightly called the German Mostaembert. If, on the one hand, he lacked the Frenchman's youthful fervour, on the other, he was a more profound statesman, who thought in true statesmanlike fashion not only in matters affecting the local administration of his own State but in those connected with the national policy of Germany. For this reason he deserves to be better known by the present generation. There is some ground for this in the fact that Andlaw never found an opportunity, as head of a State government, to put his views into practice. He experienced an invincible aversion to Baden methods of government both before and after the Reichsgründung. He stood for the bureaucratic and to the liberal-constitutional. Twice, in 1848 and in 1856, he went so far as to move the impeachment of the leading ministers. It was under these conditions that he set out, with the Catholics of his country, from Egypt to the land of liberty. He renounced all attempts at direct offensive action against the Baden government, and sought to perfect the reorganization of the Catholic Church of Baden in conformity with the principles of the constitution of the Catholic Church in Germany and to assure their participation in the political-ecclesiastical affairs of the fatherland on the basis of the common law and the lines of modern parliamentary methods. In these two things he held a middle position, for the purpose social and political transformation of Germany. He devoted himself especially to the education of the clergy and to charitable undertakings. He was four times president of the Catholic Congress: at Linz in 1850, at Munich in 1861, at Trier in 1865, and at Fulda in 1870. The centre of his activity remained till the end in Baden, where, since 1837, he had been helpful in all ecclesiastical matters to Archbishop von Wicari, whom he held in high honour. It was this devotion which moved the chairman of the First Catholic Congress at Mainz (1848) to hail Andlaw as "preeminently a man of action and conflict, at a time when few Germans dare to espouse the cause of the Church". His writings are: "Über die Stiftungen im Grossherzogtum Baden" (Freiburg, 1845); "Offenes Sendschreiben an Dr. J. B. v. Hirscher zur Abwehr gegen dessen Angriffe auf die katholische Vereine" (Mainz, 1850); "Der Aufbau und Umbau in Baden, als eine natürliche Folge der Landesgesetzgebung" (Freiburg, 1850); "Offenes Sendschreiben über politische und religiöse Freiheit an den Grafen Theodor v. Scherer" (Freiburg, 1881); "Offenes Sendschreiben an Herrn Dr. Joh. von Kuhn über die Frage der freien katholischen Universität" (Frankfurt, 1868); "Die Lehre der Wirren im Lichte der modernen Gesetzgebung und Bundesgesetze" (Freiburg, 1865); "Gedanken meiner Muse" (in two parts; a portion of the first part published in 1859; the whole work, at Freiburg, in 1860, 1865).

Andleby, William, Venerable, martyred at York on 4 July, 1587. He was born at Etton in Yorkshire, of a well-known gentle family. A young priest he went abroad to take part in the Dutch War (see ARMADA, SPANISH), and called at Douay to interview Dr. Allen, whom he attempted to confute in argument. Next day he recognized that Allen was right, was converted, and eventually became a priest. Mention is found of his having served at Mr. Tyrwhitt's, in Lincolnshire, and also of his having succoured the Catholic prisoners in Hull block-house. "His zeal for souls was such as to spare no pains and to bear no dangers. For the first four years of his mission he travelled always on foot, meantly attired, and carrying with him in usually in his vestments and a silver spoon to say Mass; for his labours lay chiefly amongst the poor, who were not stocked with such things. Afterwards, humbly yielding to the advice of his brethren, he used a horse and went somewhat better clad. Wonderful was the austerity of his life in frequent watchings, fastings, and continual prayer, his soul so absorbed in God that he often took no notice of those he met; by which means he was sometimes exposed to suspicions and dangers from the enemies of his faith, into whose hands he at last fell after twenty years' labour in the vineyard of the Lord" (Challoner). He was condemned for his priestly character, and suffered the terrors of the block. Laymen, John Abbot, Thomas Warr, and Edward Fulthorp.

Andradon, Alonso, biographer and ascetic writer, b. at Toledo, 1590; d. at Madrid, 20 June, 1672. Before entering the Society of Jesus (1612) he read philosophy in Toledo, was afterwards rector of Plasencia and minister in foreign countries. In his declining years he wrote some thirty-four volumes on different subjects, some worthy of note for their learning, excellence of doctrine, and pleasing style, which to some extent conceal his carelessness and excessive simplicity. He is chiefly known as the continuator of Nuremberg's "Varones Illustres", biographies of distinguished members of the Society of Jesus. His "Guia de la Virtud é Imitacion de Nuestro Señor" deserves special mention.

Andrade. Antonio de, the pioneer missionary and explorer of Tibet in the seventeenth century, b. at Oleiros, Portugal, 1560; d. at Goa, 19 March, 1634. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1596. From 1600 to 1624 he was the chief missionary in the Indies. In 1624, after almost incredible hardships he succeeded in penetrating into Thibet. Kindly received by the head sovereign of the country, Andrade returned to Agra for other workers like him. He established a missionary center at Chaparanga. Recalled to Goa to act as superior of the Indies, he died there, poisoned for the Faith. Andrade has given in letters to his superiors and others a graphic and accurate account of his discoveries and labours. These have been published in Spanish and French and are incorporated in the works of P. J. Darde, S.J., "Histoire de ce qui s'est passé en Ethiopie" (Paris, 1628), and "Histoire de ce qui s'est passé au royaume du Thibet" (Paris, 1629).

Andrade de Payva, Diego, a celebrated Portuguese theologian of the sixteenth century, b. at Coimbra, 26 July, 1528; d. 1 December, 1575, at Lisbon. After finishing his course at the University of Coimbra, he entered Holy Orders and remained a professor of theology. So great was his reputation that King Sebastian appointed him theologian at the Council of Trent, 1561. Here he merited the special thanks of the Pope by an able work in defence of the papal authority. While at the council he wrote his "Decem libri orthodoxarum explicationum" (Venice, 1564, 1594; Cologne, 1564, 1574) against the work of Chemnitz, "Theologia Jesu trium capitum". In this book he discusses and defines the chief points of doctrine attacked by the heretics. Chemnitz answered by his well-known "Examen Conc. Trid.", in reply to which Andrade published "Defensio Tridentinorum Cath." (Lisbon, 1578 and 1595). He published also three volumes of sermons in Portuguese. Andrade de Payva had not only a grasp of theological questions which won for him an important position among sixteenth-century theologians, but he was also so clear and convincing in the exposition of his arguments that he proved an admirable apologist, and it was matter of regret that his untimely death prevented the completion of his great work, the "Defensio Trid. fidei." This had progressed as far as the fifth session, inclusive of the doctrine upon the Eucharist and on the conception of divine in which it marshalled an imposing array of authorities.

André (Andreus), Bernard, native of Toulouse, Austin friar, poet laureate of England, and chronicler of the reign of Henry VIII (1485-1509). He was his tutor to Prince Arthur, and probably had a share in the education of Henry VIII. He was also a tutor at Oxford, and seems to have been blind. His "Historia Henrici Septimi" was edited (1858) by Mr. James Gairdner, who says of André's chronicle of events to the Cornish revolt of 1497 that it is valuable "only as one of the very few sources of contemporary information in a partially obscure period." His writings are mostly in Latin, and betray in a marked and typical way the influence of the contemporary Renaissance, both as to thought and diction.

André, Yves Marie, mathematician, b. 22 May, 1675, at Chateauneuf, in Lower Brittany; d. at Caen, 25 February, 1704. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1693. Although distinguished in his scholastic studies, he was, on account of his Gallicanism, Carthusianism, and Jansenism, assigned to scientific studies and made royal professor of mathematics at Caen where he remained for thirty-nine years. A literary essay on "The Beautiful" won him great fame, and is considered a classic. During his lifetime the Society was suppressed, and the philosophical and religious errors which he could not express as a Jesuit were openly espoused when he was secularized. He condemned his former associates for their action against Cardinal de Rohan, but was not himself a strong anti-Ultramontane. He was intimately associated with Malebranche, and kept up an extensive correspondence with him. While in the Society his Gallicanism and Jansenism made it impossible to appoint him to any responsible office. He obstinately refused to change his views. On the suppression of the Society he withdrew to the Canons Regular of Caen, and the Parliament of Rouen provided him with a pension. Although his best work by far is his "Essay on the Beautiful", there is considerable ability in his "Traité de l'homme". He wrote a poem on the "Art of Conversation", which was translated into English in 1777. Several other works were published, among which was one with the curious title, "Man as a Static Machine; a Hydraulic Machine; a Pneumatic Machine; and a Chemical Machine". Though the work was never found, it is pretty certain that he wrote a "Life of Malebranche." Victor Cousin had much to do with publishing the posthumous letters of Father André to whom we owe as many as eighteen works, some of them in folio, on metaphysics, hydrography, optics, physics, civil and military architecture, along with treatises on literary subjects, sermons, catechetical instructions, etc.

Andres, Giovanni D., canonist, b. at Mugello, near Florence, about 1275; d. 1348. He was educated by his father and at the University of Bologna, where he afterwards became professor of canon law, after having taught at Padua and Pisa. His period of teaching extended over forty-five years. Trithemius, Baldus, Forster, and Bellarmino pay him the highest tributes and on his death during the plague in 1348 his name is said to have been inscribed in the San Domenico at Bologna. His career is summed up in the epitaph: "Rabbi Doctorum, Lux, Censor, normaque morum. His works are "Glossarium in VI decretalium librum" (Venice and Lyons, 1472); "Glossarium in Clementinae; Novella, sive Commentarius in decretales epistolas Gregorii IX" (Venice, 1581); "Mercuriales, sive commentarius de canonicis sexi; Liber de laudibus S. Andrea Dotti, Blessed, b. 1256, in Borgo San Sepolcro, Tuscany, Italy; d. there 31 August, 1315. He was of noble parentage, being the brother of Pietro Dotti Dotti, master of the body-guard of Philip the Fair. Andrea grew up as many other noblemen of his time, was ever distinguished for eminent piety as well as for courage in the field. In 1278 St. Philip Beniti delivered a sermon at the opening of the general chapter of his order in Borgo, and young Dotti was so struck by its eloquence and sanctity of manner that he once asked to be admitted to the Servite Order. He was received by the General, and by reason of his piety and brilliant attainments was soon after ordained to the priesthood. His zeal manifested itself principally in preaching and penance. He occupied various positions in the city of Rome and was consecrated Blessed Bartholomew, and by his charity and zeal won over to the Order a large number of hermits.
living at Valluccia. Many visions were vouchsafed him, and he worked a great many duly authenticated miracles. After long years of preaching, he retired into a hermitage and renewed his penances, and died there. He was buried in a church of his native town. Pius VII authorized his cult.

Andrea Pisano, or da Pisa (the name by which Andrea da Pontevaria is known), an Italian sculptor and architect, b. 1270; d. 1348. He was a pupil of Giovanni Pisano, and first learned the trade of a goldsmith, which was of benefit to him in his later work. He is said to have helped his master on the sculpture for St. Maria della Spina, in Pisa, and to have worked on St. Mark's and the Doge's palace, at Venice, before he went to Florence. Here he achieved the one work indisputably his; the first of the three bronze doors for the baptistery of the Duomo at Florence, the one on the south side. He spent years on it before it was finally set up in 1336. The date 1330 on the door refers to the wax model and not to the casting. The door has a number of quatrefoils, each with a single figure, and the others have scenes from the life of St. John the Baptist. Pisano's mature style was due to the influence of Giotto. After Giotto died, Pisano built two stories of niches above Giotto's work on the Campanile, quite possibly from Giotto's designs. From 1347 to 1349 he was chief architect of the Duomo of Orvieto, which was designed and begun by Lorenzo Maitani. Andrea Pisano had two sons, Nino and Tommaso, who were also sculptors, but his most distinguished pupil was Andrea da Cione, who is known as Orcagna.

Andreas I, King of Hungary. See Hungary.

Andreas of Ratisbon, or Regensburg, historian of the later fourteenth and earlier fifteenth century. All that is known concerning him is gathered from the scanty particulars given in his works. He was ordained priest at Eichstädt in 1406, and joined the Canonry of the Church of St. Agnes, a college-chapel where he devoted himself to historical studies. His principal works are "De statu urbis Ratisbon. antiquo et de variis Heresibus", the "Chronicon Generale", and the "Chronicon de Ducibus Bavariae", to 1439, which gained him the title of the "Bavarian Livy", and which he afterwards translated into German, and continued to 1452. He is the principal forerunner of the famous Bavarian historiographer, Aventinus.

Andreas, Felix De, first superior of the Congregation of the Mission (Lazarists) in the United States and Vicar-General of upper Louisiana, b. at Demonte, in Piedmont, Italy, 15 December, 1775; d. at St. Louis, Missouri, U. S., 15 October, 1820. After making his preparatory studies in his native place he entered the novitiate of the Congregation of the Mission, at Mondovi, 1 November, 1797, and was ordained priest at Piacenza, 14 August, 1801. When only four years a priest he conducted the retreats for those about to be ordained. His constitution was not robust and in 1806 he was sent to Monte Carlo, but to the surprise of all he did not succumb to the climate that seemed least likely to be affected by the rigorous religious persecutions of the time, which for a while drove Pius VII from Rome. Here Father De Andreas was constantly engaged from 1810 to 1815 in giving missions, and retreats for the clergy or the seminarians. He also gave many missions in the suburbs of the city. When the religious houses in Rome were suppressed, the Propaganda students attended his lectures on theology. It was no unusual thing for him to preach four times a day on different subjects. In view of later events, it is worth of reflection that Father De Andreas at this time received such a conviction that he was destined to a mission involving the need of English that he resolutely mastered that language. In 1815 Father Dubourg, Apostolic Administrator of the Diocese of Louisiana (which then extended along both sides of the Mississippi from the Gulf of Mexico to the Canadian Lakes) arrived in Rome to secure priests for that immense vineyard. As soon as he knew of Father De Andreas he applied to Father Sicardi, his superior, to let him go to Louisiana, and when the latter declared it impossible, as his place could not be filled, he exposed the situation to Pius VII, who appointed the young priest to this mission. In company with five others, Father De Andreas embarked from France, 12 June, 1816, and reached Baltimore, 26 July. They remained there at St. Mary's Seminary, as guests of Father Bruté until 3 September, and then started on a tedious journey to the west arriving at Louisville, 19 November, where at Bishop Flaget's suggestion they remained in his seminary of St. Thomas at Bardstown until Bishop Dubourg should arrive. Father De Andreas gave up his duties at Bardstown and laboured at improving his English. Bishop Dubourg reached there with thirty priests, 29 December, 1817, and they went to St. Louis in 1818. There the Congregation had its first establishment. Father De Andreas had charge of two schools, one for religious students, another for temporary students, established by Bishop Dubourg. Land for a seminary was given at "The Barrens," a colony eighty miles south of St. Louis, in Perry County, and when the bishop allowed his residence to be used for a novitiate, Father De Andreas became master of novices. Exhausted by the hardships of missionary work, he died, after a short life of forty-two years, greatly esteemed for sanctity. The process of his canonization, begun in St. Louis in 1900, was completed in August, 1902, when the evidence was presented to the Congregation of Rites, at Rome.

Andres, Juan, a Spanish canonist, b. at Xativa, or San Felipe, in Valencia. Of Moorish extraction, he became a Christian in 1587 and entered the priesthood. On the fall of Granada Ferdinand the Catholic invited him to labour in that city for the conversion of the Mohammedans. He wrote a translation of Spanish of the Koran and a work entitled "Confusión de la secta mahometana" (Seville, 1537). It is a work frequently quoted against Mohammedanism. The English version is by Joshua Nottstock (London, 1652). According to Fuster, Andres

THOMAS WALKER.

Andrew, SAINT.—The name Andrew (Gr., Ἀνδρέας, manhood, or valour), like other Greek names, appears to have been common among the Jews from the second or third century A. D. St. Andrew, the Apostle, son of Jonah or John (Matt., xvi, 17; John, i, 42), was born in Bethsaida of Galilee (John, i, 44). He was brother of Simon Peter (Matt., x, 2; John, i, 40). Both were fishermen (Matt., iv, 18; Mark, i, 16), and at the beginning of Our Lord's public life occupied the same house at Capernaum (Mark, i, 21, 29). From the fourth Gospel we learn that Andrew was a disciple of the Baptist, whose testimony first led him and John the Evangelist to follow Jesus (John, i, 35-40). Andrew at once recognised Jesus as the Messiah, and hastened to introduce to Him his brother, Peter (John, i, 41). Thenceforth the two brothers were disciples of Christ. On a subsequent occasion, prior to the final call to the apostolate, they were called to a closer companionship, and then they left all things to follow Jesus (Luke, v, 11; Matt., iv, 19, 20; Mark, i, 17, 18). Finally Andrew was chosen to be one of the Twelve; and in the various lists of Apostles given in the New Testament (Matt., x, 2-4; Mark, iii, 16-19; Luke, vi, 14-16; Acts, i, 13) he is always numbered among the first four.

(See APOSTLES.)

The explicit reference to him in the Synoptists occurs in Mark, xiii, 3, where we are told he joined with Peter and John in putting the question that led to Our Lord's great eschatological discourse. In addition to this scanty information, we learn from the fourth Gospel that on the occasion of the miraculous feeding of the five thousand, it was Andrew who said: “There is a boy here who has five barley loaves and two fishes; but what are these among so many!” (John, vi, 8, 9); and when, a few days before Our Lord's death, certain Greeks asked Philip that they might see Jesus, Philip referred the matter to Andrew as to one of greater authority, and then both told Christ (John, xii, 20-22). Like the majority of the Twelve, Andrew is not named in the Acts except in the list of the Apostles, where the order of the first four is Peter, John, James, Andrew; nor have the Epistles or Apocalypse any mention of him. From what we know of the Apostles generally, we can, of course, supplement somewhat these few details. As one of the Twelve, Andrew was admitted to the closest familiarity with Our Lord during His public life; he was present at the Last Supper; beheld the risen Lord; witnessed the Ascension; shared in the graces and gifts of the first Pentecost, and helped, amid threats and persecution, to establish the Faith in Palestine. When the Apostles went forth to preach to the nations, Andrew seems to have taken an important part, but unfortunately we have no certainty as to the extent or place of his labours. Eusebius (H. E., III, 1, in F. G., XX, col. 216), relying, apparently, upon Origen, assigns Scythia as his mission field: Ἀνδρέας ἔτεκεν Σκύθες τὴν Ἑλλάδα; while St. Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 32, in F. G., XXXVI, col. 228) mentions Egypt as his field (Ecy.

ed Marcell., P. L., XXII, col. 589) Achasia; and Theodoret (on Ps. cxvi, P. G., LXXX, col. 1805) Hellas. Probably these various accounts are correct, for Nicephorus (H. E., II, 39, P. G., CXVI, col. 860), relying upon early writers, states that Andrew preached in Cappadocia, Galatia, and Bithynia, then in the land of the anthropophagi and the Scythian deserters. Afterwards in Byzantium itself, where he appointed St. Stachys as its first bishop, and finally in Thrace, Macedonia, Thessaly, and Achasia. It is generally agreed that he was crucified by order of the Roman Governor, Δῆσας or Αὐγάθα, in Achasia, and that he was bound, not nailed, to the cross, in order to prolong his sufferings. The cross on which he suffered is commonly held to have been the decussate cross, now known as St. Andrew's, though no evidence for this view seems to be no older than the fourteenth century. His martyrdom took place during the reign of Nero, on 30 November, A. D. 60; and both the Latin and Greek Churches keep 30 November as his feast. St. Andrew's relics were translated from Patre to Constantinople, and deposited in the church of the Apostles there, about A. D. 357. When Constantinople was taken by the French, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, Cardinal Peter of Capua brought the relics to Italy and placed them in the cathedral of Amalfi, where most of them still remain (Ugelli, Italia Sacra, VII). St. Andrew is honoured as their chief patron by Russia and Scotland.

Andrew, SAINT, a martyr of the Faith in Lampasacus, a city of Mysia, in the persecution of Decius. He and two companions were brought before the proconsul and interrogated about their belief. One of the three, Nichomachus, presumptuous and over confident, unfortunately apostatized under torture. Andrew and his companion Paul, after having undergone the sufferings of the rack, were thrown into prison. Meantime a girl of sixteen, named Dionysia, who had reproached Nichomachus for his fall, was seized and tortured, and then subjected to the approaches of three libertines, but was protected by an angel, who appeared in the morning. After the agony of a saintly death, she was taken out and stoned to death. As they lay in the arena, Dionysia, escaping from her captors and hurrying to the place of execution, asked to be alined. She was carried away by force, and suffered death by the sword. The feast of these martyrs is kept on 15 May.

Andrew Avellino, SAINT, b. 1521 at Castronuovo, a small town in Sicily; d. 10 November, 1608. His baptismal name was Lancelotto, which out of love for Christ Andrew changed into Andrew when he entered the Order of Theatines. From his early youth he was a great lover of chastity. After receiving his elementary training in the school of Castronuovo, he was sent to Venice to pursue a course in the humanities and in philosophy. Being a handsome youth, his chastity was often exposed to danger from female admirers, and to escape their importunities he took ecclesiastical tonsure. Hereupon he went to Naples to study canon and civil law, obtained the degree of Doctor of Laws and was ordained priest at the age of twenty-six. For some time he held the office of lawyer at the ecclesiastical court of Naples, treating the cases of the clergy. His sudden death at twenty-five from a fall in the stairs of his cell is said to have been preceded by visions of saints and angels. Shortly thereafter he was received into the Carmelites. He was a model of asceticism, asceticism and fervent devotion. He received the Holy Eucharist daily and kept watch and ward in the church. He was also known as a preacher and a confessor. He was a great admirer of St. Francis of Assisi and often compared himself to him. He was canonized by Pope Pius VII in 1847.

Andrew Bobola, BLESSED, MARTYR, b. of an old and illustrious Polish family, in the Palatinate of Sandomir, 1590; d. at Janów, 16 May, 1657. Having entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Wilna (1611), he was ordained in 1622, and appointed preacher in the Church of St. Casimir, Wilna. After making his solemn vows and returning to Rome, he was assigned to teach at Bobruisk, where he wrought wonders by his preaching and distinguished himself by his devotion during an epidemic of the plague. In 1636 he began his work in the Lithuanian missions. During this period Poland was being ravaged by Poles, Russians, and Tartars, and the Catholic faith was made the object of concerted attacks by Protestants and schismatics. The Jesuits, in particular, had much to endure. Bobola's success in converting schismatics drew upon him the rage of those high in authority, and the adherents of the Greek Pope decided to centralize their forces in Poland. A Catholic nobleman of this province offered the Jesuits a house at Pinsk, and here Father Bobola was stationed. The schismatics vainly endeavored in every manner to hinder him in the exercise of his apostolic duties, extending their persecutions to attacks upon his person. On 16 May, 1657, he was seized by two Cossacks. They dragged him to the scaffolding, then tying him to their saddles, they dragged him to Janów where he was subjected to incredible tortures. After having been burned, half strangled, and partially flayed alive, he was released from suffering by a sabre stroke. His body was interred in the collegiate church of the Society at Pinsk, where it became the object of great veneration. It was later transferred to Polosk, where it is still held in honour, even by the schismatics. Father Bobola was declared Blessed by Pius IX in 1853, and his feast is kept by the Society of Jesus, 23 May.

F. M. RUDGE.

Andrew Corsini, SAINT, of the illustrious Corsini family, b. in Florence, in 1302; d. 1373. Wild and dissolute in youth, he was startled by the words of his mother about what had happened to her before his birth, and, becoming a Carmelite monk in his native city, began a life of great austerity and mortification. He was sent as a novice to Paris and Avignon, and, on his return, became the Apostle of Florence. He was regarded as a prophet and a thaumaturgus. Called to the See of Fiesole, he fled, but was discovered by a child, and compelled to accept the honour. He redoubled his austerities as a bishop, was lavish in his care of the poor, and was sought for everywhere as a peace-maker, notably at Bologna, whither he was sent as papal legate to heal the breach between the nobility and the people. After twelve years in the episcopacy, he died at the age of seventy-one, and miracles were so multiplied at his death that Eugenius IV permitted a public cult immediately, but it was only in 1609 that Urban VIII canonized him. His feast is kept on 4 February.

Andrew of Cesseaux. Bishop of that see in Cappa- dea, assigned by Krummacher to the first half of the sixth century, though he was only placed by others from the fifth to the ninth century. His principal work is a commentary on the Apocalypse (P. G., CVI, 215–458, 1387–94), important as the first commentary on the book that has come down to us, also as the source from which most of its later commentators have drawn. This writer differs from most of the Byzantine commentators by reason of his extensive acquaintance with early patristic literature.

Andrew of Constantinople. See Andrew of Rhodes.

Andrew of Crete. Saint (sometimes called Andreas in English biography), theologian, homilist, hymnographer, b. at Damascus about the middle of the seventh century; d. 4 July, 740 (or 720), on whose behalf a feast is celebrated in the Greek Gospels. At the age of fifteen he repaired to Jerusalem, entered a monastery, was enrolled amongst the clerics of Theodore, Bishop of Jerusalem (whence he is also commonly styled Andrew of Jerusalem), rose to some distinction, and was finally sent by Theodore in 685 to felicitate the Emperor, Constantine Porphy- rius, on the holding of the Sixth General Council. His embassy fulfilled, he remained at Constantinople, received deaconship, again distinguished himself, and was finally appointed to the metropolitan see of Gortyna, in Crete. At first an opponent of the Monothelite heresy, he nevertheless attended the concilium of 712, in which the decrees of the Council were abolished, but in the following year amended his course, and thenceforward occupied himself in worthy functions, preaching, composing hymns, etc. As a preacher, his twenty-two published and twenty-one unpublished discourses, a treatise on the hypostatic union, the doctrine of the Trinity, the Fifteenth Article of the Creed, etc., are seen to consist of clauses or phrases separated by cesuras. Some hymnologists look on them as illustrations merely of modulated prose; but Cardinal Pitta considers the clauses as truly metrical, and discovers sixteen rules of prosodical government. The prosodical quantity of syllables seems to be disregarded (a feature of the evolution of Latin hymns as well), although the number of the syllables is generally equal, while accent plays a great part in the rhythm. These troparia are built up into an ode, the first troparion being a hymus, a strophe which becomes a type for those following in regard to melody, tone (or mode) and rhythmic structure. The odes, in turn, are built up into canons, and are usually eight in number (theoretically nine, the second being usually omitted, although the numeration remains unaltered). A hymn of two odes is a diatessaron, of three, a triodion; the form for Lenten Office, whence the name of "Tri- dion" for the Lenten Office Book. The himar, a troparion indicating the Greek tone or mode, which then prevails throughout the canon, may be bor- rowed by a different canon if this be in the same tone. It should be added that the Greek tones do not correspond with the Latin in their octaves. Some of St. Andrew's odes have more than one himar; thus, in the Great Canon the second and third odes have each two; the Long Canon (180 strophes) in honour of Sts. Simeon and Anne the Prophetess, has three in the first, second, third, sixth, seventh, eighth, fifteenth, and twenty-five; and four in the fourth. Altogether, the sufficiently authentic work of St. Andrew furnishes no fewer than one hundred and eleven himars: a fertility beyond that of any other hymnographer.

To return to the canon. In addition to the nine already referred to, wrongly ascribed to him by fifteenth others, yet unpublished, are perhaps too hastily assigned to him. Leaving all these aside, however, we have the following in the first tone: (a) on the resurrection of Lazarus, still sung on the Friday before Palm Sunday, at the apodeison (a prayer after the service), corresponding to our Com- mon Prayer (9 Dec.); (b) St. Constantine, 17 Oct.; (c) St. Machabees martyrs (1 Aug.); (d) St. Ignatius of Antioch (2 Dec.). The titles affixed will serve to... indicate the variety of themes. In addition to these, ten other canones and four triodia furnish illustrations of his work in the second, third, and fourth Authentic, and the second and fourth plagal tones. He is also credited with the authorship of many idiomela (short, detached troparia, somewhat similar to modern canticles). He is found especially early in lists of the feasts of the Greek calendar, usually as dozasticha and aposticha at Lauds and Vespers, and in processional and vesperal stichera. (The word idiomela is variously interpreted as suggesting that each idiomela has its own proper melody, or, understanding melos poetically, rhythm. Sometimes idiomela is used in a sense of 'idiomela of the stichera idiomela; but in this case they seem to preserve no structural similarity or affinity, and have been compared to irregular verses in English.)

H. T. HENRY.

Andrew of Lonjumeau, Dominican missionary and papal ambassador, b. in the Diocese of Paris; d. c. 1253. He first appears in the company of missionaries sent to the East by Blessed Jordan of Saxony in 1228. On this journey he gained great proficiency in several Oriental languages. When Baldwin II gave over the Crown of Thorns to King Louis IX, Andrew was commissioned, together with the Legate to the present James of Paris, to bear the sacred treasure to France. But on reaching Constantinople, they were asked by the barons, who ruled in the vacancy, to carry the relic to the Venetians, to whom it had, in the meantime, been sold. Both set out about Christmas, 1238. At Venice Andrew remained behind in custody of the Crown of Thorns and James hastened to King Louis for further instructions. Were the latter willing to guarantee two hundred thousand pounds of gold, the impoverished Venetians were ready to dispose of the relic. In 1239 the two Friars had reached Troyes with the Crown. From that place King Louis carried it on his shoulders to the newly built chapel at Aix. In 1245 Andrew was sent as papal ambassador by Innocent IV to the Oriental schismatic patriarchs, to induce them to unite with the See of Rome. Contrary to all expectation he found them orthodox as is evident from their joint letter to the King of Cyprus (Ann. Ecle., 1247). Andrew was probably the bearer of this letter to the Holy Father. On his journey to the patriarchs Andrew halted to treat with the Mogul Khan Baihoitni, and, after his death, with Ercoilti. Though this diplomatic mission utterly failed, as Bernard Guidonis expressly declares (Chronicon, ad an. 1249) we have the testimony of subsequent missionaries to show that many converts were made to the Faith. Andrew died some time after 1253, for that year he was active as missionary in Palestine. The Franciscan, Rubruquis, in his work On Oriental customs, declares that everything he had heard from Andrew on the subject, was fully borne out by his own personal observations.

THOMAS M. SCHWERTNER.

Andrew of Rhodes (sometimes, of Colobus), theologian, d. 1440. He was a Greek by birth, and born of schismatic parents. In early youth he had no opportunities for education, but afterwards devoted himself to Latin and Greek, and to theology, especially the questions in dispute between the Latin and Greek Churches. The study of the early Fathers, both Greek and Latin, convinced him that, in the disputed points, truth was on the side of the Latin Church. He therefore solemnly abjured his errors, made a profession of faith, and entered the Dominican Order about the time of the Western Schism. He led thenceforth an apostolic life. He joined Andrew of Crete in his efforts to induce his fellow-Greeks to follow in his footsteps and reunite with Rome. In 1413 he was made Archpriest of Rhodes. The Dominican biographer, Echard, credits him with having taken an active part in the twentieth session of the Council of Constance (1414-18). Others maintain that there is here a confusion with Andrew of Capece who was the friend of Basle, he delivered an oration in the name of the Pope (Mani, XXIX, 465-481). He took part in the Council of Ferrara-Florence, and was one of the six theologians appointed by the Papal Legate, Cardinal Julian, to reply to the objections of the Greeks. He preferred to become a missionary among the Ethiopians, and under the guidance of another Andrew, bishop of Ethiopia, he was consecrated a bishop by Eugene IV, and succeeded in establishing peace. He also succeeded in overcoming the local forms of the Nestorian, Eutychian, and Monothelite heresies. The heretical bishops abjured and made a profession of faith at a synod held at Nicosia; some of the prelates went afterwards to Rome, to renew their profession before the Holy See. There are preserved in the Vatican manuscript copies of his treatise on the Divine essence and operation, compiled from the commentaries of St. Thomas Aquinas, and addressed to Cardinal Bessarion, also a little work in the form of a dialogue in reply to a letter of Mark Ephraem against the rites and ceremonies of the Roman Church (P. C., CL, 862).

Andrew the Scot, SAINT, Archbishop of Fiesole, b. probably at the beginning of the ninth century; d. about 877. St. Andrew and his sister St. Bridget were born in Ireland. There they seem to have studied under St. Donatus, an Irish scholar, and when the latter decided to make a long pilgrimage to the holy places of Italy, Andrew accompanied him. Donatus and Andrew arrived at Fiesole when the people were assembled to elect a new bishop. A heavenly voice indicated Donatus as the most worthy of the duties and rights attached to that office, he made Andrew his archdeacon. During the forty-seven years of his episcopate Andrew served him faithfully, and he was apparently encouraged by Donatus to restore the church of St. Martin a Mensola and to found a monastery there. Andrew is commemorated by his own personal visions. He had a personal vision to the church of St. Martin a Mensola and to found a monastery there. Andrew is commemorated by his own personal visions. He had a personal vision of the holy places of Ireland and to boundless charity to the poor. He died shortly after his master St. Donatus; and his sister St. Bridget is believed to have been miraculously conducted from Ireland by an angel to assist at his death-bed. After St. Andrew's holy death, Bridget led the life of a recluse for some years in a remote spot among the Apennines. St. Andrew is commemorated on 22 August.

HERBERT THURSTON.
Andrews, William Eubenhus, editor and author, b. at Norwich, England, 6 December, 1773; d. London, 9 April, 1837. His parents, who were converts to the Catholic faith, he was brought up in that persuasion and entered the printing office of the "Norfolk Chronicle" as an apprentice. He rose to be editor of the paper, which post he held from 1799 to 1813. In 1815 he went to London to devote himself to advancing the Catholic cause by means of the press, and in July of that year he established "The Orthodox and Catholic Monthly Intelligencer." He was materially aided by Bishop Milner, but in 1820 he was obliged to suspend publication. During this period he began the publication in Glasgow of a weekly pamphlet, "The Catholic Indocator," but pecuniary inability forced him to suspend it after one year. With the assistance of Bishop Milner he established in December, 1820, a weekly newspaper, "The Catholic Advocate of Civil and Religious Liberty," which was discontinued nine months later. In January, 1822, two periodicals were established, one, "The Catholic Miscellany," devoted to Catholic interests but under the control of Andrews; the other, "The People's Advocate," exclusively political, under his avowed editorship. The "Advocate" lived only seven weeks, and after two months the sole editorship of the other devoted on Andrews. He continued it under serious financial strain until it was abandoned in 1825, when it passed into the hands of another. The same year he revived the "Orthodox Journal" and continued it for several months. In September, 1824, he established a weekly paper, "The Truth Teller," which lasted for twelve months, and was afterwards continued as a pamphlet, but finally discontinued in 1829 through lack of support. "The Truth Teller" is notable for the vigour with which it assailed O'Connell.

It would seem that his zeal for starting Catholic papers makes him, either directly or indirectly, responsible also for the inception, 2 April, 1825, of "The Truth Teller," New York's first distinctly Catholic paper. There is no direct information extant now as to the details of his connection with the New York paper, or whether the idea was to have it as a sort of local edition of the London publication. The first six issues, however, bear the imprint of "William E. Andrews & Co."

In 1826 and 1827, Andrews was, in effect, the publisher of "The Catholic Indocator." That name was changed to George Pardow and William Denman, without any reason being assigned. George Pardow was an English Catholic, and so was Denman, both having emigrated to New York a few years before. In the early issues of the New York Truth Teller there are constant references to the work of Andrews in London, showing an intimate relationship, but never, however, giving any positive statement as to a business connection. (See Catholic Press.)

Andrews again revived the "Orthodox Journal," which he subsequently continued as "The British Liberator," and later as "Andrews's Constitutional Paper." From 1832 to 1834 he issued a weekly paper, "Andrews's Penny Orthodox Journal," and in 1836 "Andrews's Weekly Orthodox Journal," which after three months became "The London and Dublin Orthodox Journal." It was continued after his death by his son. In 1826 Andrews had established a society known as "The Friends of Civil and Religious Liberty," which had a little more than a year distributed nearly 500,000 tracts. This society was the parent of the "Metropolitan Tract Society" and many similar organizations. In addition to his editorial labours, Andrews wrote "The Catholic School Book" (1814); "The History of the Popes, from Inor to Innocent XII" (1814); "The Conspiracy of Titus Oates" (1816); "The Ashton Controversy," eighteen pamphlets (1822-23); "A Critical and Historical Review of Fox's Book of Martyrs" (3 vols., 1824-26); an abridgment of "Plowden's History of Ireland"; "The Catholic's Vade Mecum." "Popey Triumphant," a satirical pamphlet; "The True Synods," and edited "The History of the Popes from the Time of Gallus II," edited Pope in 1118.

The name, however, of Richard is genuine, as a Richard of Andria was present at the Eleventh Ecumenical Council (Third Lateran, 1179) held under Pope Alexander III. The first Bishop of Andria known to history is mentioned in the Translation of St. Nicholas Pilgrim, celebrated in Trani in 1143, but it does not give his name. In Andria, as in all the principal cities of Apulia, there are many artistic remains. Worthy of mention is the Castel del Monte near Andria. Andria has 15 parishes, 200 secular priests, 6 regulars, 41 seminarists, 53 churches or oratories. There are 101,000 souls. There are the chaps. Aniero, Felice, an eminent Roman composer, b. c. 1560; d. c. 1630. From 1575 he was for four years a basso soprano in the Papal Chapel and at the court of the celebrated master Nanini. His first appointment was as choirmaster of the English College in Rome, and his next a similar one under Cardinal Aldobrandini. In 1584 he succeeded Palestrina as composer to the Papal Choir, a post created specially for him by Pius V, and which was adhered to by him. Several of his compositions, e.g. an "Adoramus Te, Christe" and a "Stabat Mater," for three choirs, passed for a long time as Palestrina's work. Aniero's compositions (which are very numerous) are characterised by originality and fine artistic feeling. Many were printed during the period 1585-1622. We may mention "First Book of Hymns, Cantates and Motets for eight voices" (Venice, 1596), dedicated to Pope Clement VIII, which was followed later by a second volume, "Three Books of Spiritual Madrigals for Five Voices," "Two Books of Spiritual Concerts for Four Voices." But a large proportion of them exist only in manuscript, and are preserved in various Roman libraries, especially that of the Roman College.

Aniero, Giovanni Francesco, b. in Rome c. 1567; d. c. 1620. He spent four years as a chorister at St. Peter's, under Palestrina. He was in turn choirmaster to Sigismund and to Charles V, and in 1589 was sent to Rome to conduct the cathedral of Venice, 1610; but he soon after went to Rome as musical instructor at the Seminary of Novo, and from 1613 to 1620 was choirmaster to Pope Gregory XIII, at St. John Lateran, and also three years to Cardinal Mazarin at Rome. His compositions were much admired by other composers; his motets and motet-like madrigals were much imitated. His "Il人格e, a capella" (1634) is a popular choral piece. His "Ercole, oratorio," adapted by Palestrina for St. Peter's, is a distinguished work, and is still sung in many churches. His music and his name were revered by his contemporaries. His son, Giovanni Filippo (1590-1648), also a composer, was sent to Spain by King Philip III as a sort of ambassador, and was a friend of Monteverdi. He was choirmaster of the cathedral of Florence, then of Aachen, where he died. He wrote many sacred and secular compositions, but is best known for his madrigals and motets. His son, Giovanni Filippo II, was also a composer.
master at the church of Santa Maria de' Monti. In 1616 he took holy orders. Anfossi was among the first Italian composers to use the eighth note, or quaver, and its subdivisions. He left a large number of works, embracing all the usual forms of sacred music, the list of which may be found in Vogel's "Weltliche Vokalmusik Italiens" and Eitner's "Quinta cento". Among his most unusual compositions is a work made up of notes as long as those of Père Matthieu's "Cantus solus" in "Dictionnaire historique" of Moré. From the materials collected by Père Anselme and Caille de Fourny he prepared the "Histoire généalogique et chronologique de la maison royale de France et des grands officiers de la couronne", which was left unfinished at his death, but was published in a later form by a collaborator. The latter also prepared three additional volumes. His other works include "L'Etat de la France", edited in 1749 by the Benedictines of Saint-Maur, with a supplementary volume on the coronation, the armorial bearings, and prerogatives of the kings of France.

Anfossi, Filippo, an Italian Dominican, b. at Taggia, in the province of Genoa; d. in Rome, 15 May, 1625. Pius VII on his return to the States of the Church appointed him Vicar-General of the Order of Preachers and later Master of the Sacred Palace, 1815–25. In this quality he carried on the negotiations in 1815 with the Poles of Lamsen in regard to the corrections to be made in his "Essai sur l'indifférence" (Paris, 1821–23). He was among the most ardent defenders of the Roman Church against the various forms of Gallicanism represented by Scipione de Ricci, Vincenzo Palmieri, and Guillaume de la Luserne. Among his public works are: "Difesa della ... 'Aureom' 'Fide' in cui si traggono le maggiori questioni che hanno agitato in questi tempi la chiesa." (Rome, 1810 and 1818); "Motivi per cui il Padre Filippo Anfossi Domenicano ha creduto di non potere adorare alle quattro proposizioni gallicane." Ange de Saint Joseph, French missionary friar of the Order of Discalced Carmelites, b. at Toulouse, 1636; d. at Perpignan, 1697. He wrote works on Oriental pharmacutics. His family name was Joseph de la Brosse. In 1662 he took up the study of the Greek. In 1664 with Celestino A San-Liduvina, brother of the great Orientalist Golius; in 1664 he was sent to the East as missionary, and while visiting Smyrna and Ispahan was instructed in Persian by Balthazar, a Portuguese Carmelite. He passed ten years in Persia and Arabia, acting as prior at Jaffan and, later, at Baarrah. On the capture of the latter place by the Turks, he went to Constantinople and succeeded in gaining for his mission the protection of the Sultan, through the mediation of the French ambassador. He was recalled to Rome in 1679, and in 1680 was made superior of missions in Holland, England, and Ireland, where he spent many years. He was Provincial in his order at the time of his death. His writings are: "Pharmacopoea Persica, ex idiomate persico in latim conversa" (Paris, 1681). Hyde (Biographia Britannica, cited by Langlé, Biographie universelle) asserts that the credit for the work really belongs to Père Matthieu. A peculiarity of his was his work by Père Ange de Saint Joseph, which is praised by Bernier, Péris de la Croix, and Chardin is "Gazophylacium lingue Persarum" (Amsterdam, 1684), a grammar with a dictionary in Latin, Italian, and French.

Angel, (Latin angelus; Greek ἄγγελος; Hebrew, אָנָגָל, from the root: אָנָגָל means "one going" or "one sent": messenger. The word is used in Hebrew to denote indifferently either a divine or human messenger. The Septuagint renders it by ἀγγέλος which also has both significations. The Latin version, however, distinguishes the divine messenger from the human by rendering the original in the one case by angelus and in the other by angelus or more generally by numitus. In a few passages the Latin version is misleading, the word angelus being used where numitus would have better expressed the meaning, e. g. Is., xviii; 2, xxxiii, 3, 6. It is with the spirit-messenger alone that we are here concerned. We have to discuss the meaning of the term in the Bible, the offices and names assigned to the angels, the distinction between good and evil spirits, the divinations of the angelic choirs, the question of angelic appearances, and the development of the scriptural idea of angels. The angels are represented throughout the Bible as a body of spiritual beings intermediate between God and men; "Thou hast made him (man) a little less than the angels" (Ps., viii, 6). They, equally with man, are created beings: "praise ye Him, all His angels: praise ye Him, all His hosts ... for He spoke and they were made and they were created" (Ps., cxlviii, 2, 5; Col, i, 16, 17). That the angels were created was laid down in the Fourth Lateran Council (1215). The decree "Firmiter" against the Albigenses declared both the fact that they were created and that men were created after them. This decree was repeated by the Vatican Council, "Dei Filii". We mention it here because the words: "He that liveth for ever created all things together" (Eccles., xviii, 1) have been held to prove a simultaneous creation of all things; but it is generally conceded that "together" (simul) may here mean "equally", in the sense that all things were "alius creati creati"; that is, created by God, the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says: "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent to minister to them who shall receive the inheritance of salvation?" (Heb., i, 14). It is as messengers that they most often figure in the Bible, but, as St. Augustine, and after him St. Gregory, express it: angelus est nullius substantialis, ne nec essentiae nec essentia functionis, viz: that of attendants upon God's throne in that court of heaven of which Daniel has left us a vivid picture: "I beheld till thrones were placed, and the Ancient of Days sat; His garment was white as snow, and the hair of His head like clean wool: His throne was like a fiery flame, and His wheels like the wheels of it like a burning fire. A swift stream of fire issued forth from before Him: thousands of thousands ministered to Him, and ten thousand times a hundred thousand stood before Him: the judgment sat and the books were opened” (Dan., vii, 9, 10; cf. also Ps., xvi, 7; cii, 20; Is., vi, etc.). This function of the angelic host is expressed by the word “assistance” (Job, i, 6; ii, 1), and our Lord refers to it as their perpetual occupation (Matt., xviii, 10). More than once we are told of seven angels whose special function it is thus to “stand before God’s throne” (Rev., x, 4; Apoc., viii, 2-7; vii, 9). The same thought may be intended by “the angel of His presence” (Is., lix, 9), an expression which also occurs in the pseudo-epigraphical “Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs”.

But these glimpses of life beyond the veil are only occasional. The angels are never in the role of God’s messengers to mankind. They are His instruments by whom He communicates His will to men, and in Jacob’s vision they are depicted as ascending and descending the ladder which stretches from earth to heaven while the Eternal Father gazes upon the wanderer below. It was an angel who found Agar in the wilderness (Gen., xvi); angels drew Lot out of Sodom; an angel announces to Gideon that he is to save his people; an angel foretells the birth of Samson (Judges, xiii), and the angel Gabriel instructs Daniel (Dan., viii, 16), though he is not called an angel in either of these passages. In the New Testament, the same heavenly spirit announced the birth of St. John the Baptist and the Incarnation of the Redeemer, while tradition ascribes to him both the message to the shepherds (Luke, ii, 9), and the most glorious mission of all, that of strengthening the King of Angels in His Agony (Luke, xxii, 43). The spiritual nature of the angels is manifested very clearly in the account which Zacharias gives of the revelations bestowed upon him by the ministry of an angel. The prophet depicts the angel as speaking “in him”. He seems to imply that he was conscious of an interior voice which was not that of God but of His messenger. The Masoretic text, the Septuagint, and the Vulgate all agree in thus describing the communications made by the angel to the prophet. It is a pity that the “Revised Version” should, in apparent defiance of the above-named texts, obscure this trait by persistently giving the angel as “the angel of...” instead of “within me” (cf. Zach., i, 9, 13, 14; ii, 3, 4v, 5; v, 10). Such appearances of angels generally last only so long as the delivery of their message requires, but frequently their mission is prolonged, and they are represented as the constituted guardians of the people, as in some parts of the Exodus (Exod., xiv, 19; Baruch, vi, 6). Similarly it is the common view of the Fathers that by “the prince of the Kingdom of the Persians” (Dan., x, 13; x, 21) we are to understand the angel to whom was entrusted the spiritual care of that kingdom, and we may perhaps see in the man of Macedonia” who accompanied Paul into St. Paul and was taken away by an angel of that country (Acts, xvi, 9). The Septuagint (Deut., xxxiii, 8), has preserved for us a fragment of information on this head, though it is difficult to gauge its exact meaning: “When the Most High divided the nations, when He scattered the children of Adam, He established the bounds of the nations according to the number of the angels of God”. How large a part the ministry of angels played, not merely in Hebrew theology but in the religious ideas of other nations as well, appears from the expression “like an angel of God”. It is three times used of Christ (Rev., iv, 10; x, 23; xxii, 9), at once by Asch of Geth (I K., xxix, 9). It is even applied by Esther to Assuerus (Esther, xv, 16), and St. Stephen’s face is said to have looked “like the face of an angel” as he stood before the Sanhedrin (Acts, vi, 15).

Throughout the Bible we find it repeatedly implied that each individual soul has its tutelary angel. Thus Abraham, when sending his steward to seek a wife for Isaac, says: “He will send His angel before thee” (Gen., xxiv, 7). The words of the nineteenth Psalm which the devil quoted to our Lord (Matt., iv, 6) are well known, and Judith accounts for her heroic deed by saying: “As the Lord liveth, His angel hath been my keeper” (xiii, 20). These were words ascribed to many others (Gen., xvi, 8; Gen., xx, 8; xxi, 12; 42; 43; xxii, 5; xxxviii, 9; Acts, xi, 7; Ps., xxviii, 8), though they will not of themselves demonstrate the doctrine that every individual has his appointed guardian angel, receive their complement in our Saviour’s words: “See that you despise not one of these little ones, for I say that their angels in Heaven always see the face of My Father Who is in Heaven” (Matt., xviii, 10), words which illustrate the remark of St. Augustine: “What lies hidden in the Old Testament, is made manifest in the New”. Indeed, the book of Tobias seems intended to teach this truth more than any other, and St. Jerome in his commentary on the above words of our Lord says: “The dignity of a soul is so great, that each has a guardian angel from its birth.” The general doctrine that the angels are our appointed guardians is considered to be a point of faith (cf. Mazella, De Deo Creato (Rome, 1880), i, 374), but (117) St. Jerome says that the human race has his own individual guardian angel is not of faith; the view has, however, such strong support from the Doctors of the Church that it would be rash to deny it (cf. St. Jerome, supp). Peter the Lombard (Sentences, lib. II, dist. xi) was inclined to think that one angel had charge of several individual human beings. St. Bernard’s beautiful homilies (xi-xiv) on the nineteenth Psalm breathe the spirit of the Church without however deciding the question. The Bible represents the angels not only as our guardians, but also as actually interceding for us. The angel Raphael (Tob., xii, 12) says: “I offered thy prayer to the Lord” (cf. Job, v, 1 (Septuagint), and xxxiii, 23 (Vulgate); Apoc., viii, 4). The Catholic cult of the angels is thus thoroughly scriptural. Perhaps the earliest explicit declaration of it is to be found in St. Ambrose’s words: “We should pray to the angels who are given to us as guardians” (De Virg., ix, 18). The question, “Can angels intercede with God?”, becomes then: “What can angels do for us?”. An undue cult of angels was reproved by St. Paul (Col., ii, 18), and that such a tendency long remained in the same district is evidenced by Can. 35 of the Synod of Laodicea (Hefele, History of the Councils, ii, 317).

DIVINE PROTECTION OF THE WORLD.—

The foregoing passages, especially those relating to the angels who have charge of various districts, enable us to understand the practically unanimous view of the Fathers that it is the angels who put into execution God’s laws regarding the physical world. The Semitic belief in genii and in spiritus, which cause good or evil results, is a part of it and to be found in the Bible. Thus the pestilence which devastated Israel for David’s sin in numbering the people is attributed to an angel whom David is said to have actually seen (II K., xxiv, 15-17, and more explicitly, I Par., xxii, 14-15). Even the wind rustling in the tree-tops was regarded as an angel (II K., v, 23, 24; I Par., xiv, 14, 15). This is more explicitly stated with regard to the pool of Probatica (John, v, 1-4), though there is some doubt about the text; in that passage the disturbance of the water is said to be due to the periodic visits of the angel. The Semitic belief in the outwardly harmonious of the universe, as well as interruptions of that harmony, were due to God as their originator, but were carried out by His ministers. This view is strongly marked in the “Book of Jubilees” where the heavenly host of good and evil angels is ever interfering in the material universe.
Maimonides (Directorym Perplexorum, iv and vi) is quoted by St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theol., I, Q. 1, 3) as holding that the Bible frequently terms the angels of heaven the ministers of the omnipotence of God (cf. St. Jerome, In Mich., vi, 1, 2; P. L., iv, col. 1206). Though the angels who appear in the earlier works of the Old Testament are strangely impersonal and are overshadowed by the importance of the message they bring or the work they do, there are not wanting hints regarding the exact ranks in the heavenly hierarchy. After Adam's fall Paradise is guarded against our First Parents by cherubim who are clearly God's ministers, though nothing is said of their nature. Only once again do the cherubim figure in the Bible, viz., in Ezekiel's marvellous vision, where they are described at great length (Ezech., i), and are actually called cherubim in Ezechiel, x. The Ark was guarded by two cherubim, but we are left to conjecture what they were like. It has been suggested with great probability that we have their counterpart in the winged bulls and lions guarding the Assyrian palaces, and also in the griffins and similar individual angels with human heads who are depicted on the walls of some of their buildings. The seraphim only appear in the vision of Isaiah, vi, 6. Mention has already been made of the mystic seven who stand before God, and we seem to have them in an indication of an inner cordona that surrounds the throne. The term archangels also occurs in St. Justin, Apol., 95; St. Iren., Adv. Hœr., ii, 20; but St. Paul has furnished us with two other lists of names of the heavenly cohorts. He tells us (Ephes., i, 21) that Christ is raised up "above all principality, and power, and virtue, and dominion;" and, writing to the Colossians (i, 16), he says: "In Him were all things created in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominations, or principalities or powers." It is to be noted that he uses two of these names of the powers of darkness when (ii, 15) he talks of Christ as "dispelling the principalities and powers . . . triumphing over them in Himself." And it is a not little remarkable that only two verses later he warns his readers not to be seduced into any "religion of angels." He seems to put his seal upon a certain lawful angelology, and at the same time to warn them against indulging superstitution on the subject. We have a hint of such superstitions in England, wherein, as already stated, the angels play a quite disproportionate part. Similarly Josephus tells us (Bell. Jud., II, viii, 7) that the Essenes had to take a vow to preserve the names of the angels. We have already seen how (Dan., x, 12-21) various districts are allotted to various angels who are termed their princes, and the same feature reappears still more markedly in the Apocalyptic "angels of the seven churches," though it is impossible to decide what is the precise signification of the term. These seven Angels of the Churches are generally regarded as being the Bishops occupying these sees. St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his Letter to the Bishops of Asia, twice terms them "Angels," in the language of the Apocalypse. The treatise "De Coelesti Hierarchia," which is ascribed to St. Denis the Areopagite, and which exercised so strong an influence upon the Scholastics, treats at great length of the hierarchies and orders of the angels. It is generally conceded that this work was not due to Denis in this precise sense, but only to the general spirit of this period, in which there is a tendency to express the Baptist title "sons of God," and particularly the expression "sons of God"; cf. Job, i, 6; ii, 1; xxxviii, 7; but on the other hand, see Ps., ii, i; lxviii, 6; De Sacrificiis; II, De Lege Allegorica, I, 12; III, 73; and for the view of Gen., vi, 1, cf. St. Justin, Apol., Archangels, Virtues, Powers, Principalities, Dominations, Thrones, Cherubim, and Seraphim. That there are Angels and Archangels nearly every page of the Bible tells us, and many of the books of the Old Testament and New Testament are filled with the heavenly hierarchy. After Adam's fall Paradise is guarded against our First Parents by cherubim who are clearly God's ministers, though nothing is said of their nature. Only once again do the cherubim figure in the Bible, viz., in Ezekiel's marvellous vision, where they are described at great length (Ezech., i), and are actually called cherubim in Ezechiel, x. We have already seen how (Dan., x, 12-21) various districts are allotted to various angels who are termed their princes, and the same feature reappears still more markedly in the Apocalyptic "angels of the seven churches," though it is impossible to decide what is the precise signification of the term. ii, 5. It should moreover be noted that the Hebrew word nephelem rendered gigantes, in vi, 4, may mean "fallen ones". The Fathers generally refer it to the sons of Seth, the chosen stock. In I K., xxiii, 9, an evil spirit is said to possess Saul, though this is probably a metaphorical expression; more explicit is III K., xxii, 19-23, where a spirit is depicted as appearing in the midst of the heavenly army and offering, at the Lord's invitation, to be a lyin spirit in the mouth of Ahab's false prophets. We might, with the Scholastics, explain this as referring to a malum genus, which is actually caused by God owing to man's fault. A truer exegesis would, however, dwell on the purely imaginative tone of the whole episode; it is not so much the mood in which the message is cast as the actual tenor of that message which is most to occupy our attention.

The picture afforded us in Job, i and ii, is equally imaginative; but Satan, perhaps the earliest individualization of the fallen Angel, is presented as an intruder who is jealous of Job. He is clearly an inferior being to the Deity and can only touch Job with God's permission. How theologic thought advanced as the sum of revelation grew appears from a comparison of II K., xxiv, 1, with I Paral., xxi, 1. Whereas in the former passage David's sin was said to be due to "the wrath of the Lord" which "stirred up David", in the latter we read that "Satan moved David to number Israel". In Job, iv, 18, Satan does not appear as a defender of the Deity, or as the one to find a definition of the name. In his angels He found wickedness. The Septuagint of Job contains some instructive passages regarding avenging angels in whom we are perhaps to see fallen spirits; thus xxxii, 23: "If a thousand death-dealing angels should be (against him) not one of them shall wound him", and xxxvi, 14: "If their souls should perish in their youth (through rashness) yet their life shall be wounded by the angels"; and xxi, 15: "The riches unjustly accumulated shall be vomited out, an angel shall drag him out of his house"; cf. Prov., xvii, 11; Ps., xxxiv, 5; 6; Ixxxvi, 49; and especially, Esco., xxxix, 33, a text which, as far as can be gathered from the present state of the MS., was in the Hebrew original. In some of these passages, it is true, the angels may be regarded as avengers of God's justice without therefore being evil spirits. In Zach., iii, 1-3, Satan is called the adversary who pleads before the Lord against man, just as the High priest (Num., xxvi, 4); and Our Lord Himself has given colour to this view by using the imagery of the latter passage when saying to His Apostles: "I saw Satan like lightning fall from heaven" (Luke, x, 18). In New Testament times the idea of the two spiritual kingdoms is clearly established. The devil is a fallen angel who in his fall has drawn multitudes of the heavenly host in his train. Our Lord terms him "the Prince of this world" (John, xiv, 30); he is the tempter of the human race and tries to invoke the sin of Adam (Matt., xvi, 23; II Peter, ii, 4; Ephes., vi, 12; II Cor., xi, 14; xii, 7). Christian imagery of the devil as the dragon is mainly derived from the Apocalypse (ix, 11-15; xii, 7-9), where he is termed "the angel of the bottomless pit", "the dragon", "the old serpent", etc., and is represented as having actually been in combat with the Archangel Michael. The similarity between scenes such as these and the early Babylonian accounts of the struggle between Merodach and the dragon Tiamat is very striking. Whether we are to trace its origin to vague reminiscences of the mighty saurians who once peopled the earth is a moot question, but the curious reader may consult Boussenet, "The Anti-christ Legend" (tr. by Keane, London, 1896). The translator has prefixed to it an interesting discussion on the origin of the Babylonian Dragon-Myth.

The term Angel in the Septuagint.—We have had occasion to mention the Septuagint version more than once, but it may not be amiss to indicate a few passages where it is our only source of information regarding the angels. The best known passage is Is., ix, 6, where the Septuagint gives the name of the Messias as "the Angel of great Counsel". We have already drawn attention to Job, xx, 15, where the Septuagint reads "Angel" instead of Messiah. There is also Is., xxvi, 14, and to xxvii, 14, where there seems to be question of evil angels. In ix, 7, Septuagint (B) adds: "He hath devised hard things for His Angels"; but most curious of all, in xl, 14, where the Vulgate and Hebrew (v, 19) say of Behemoth: "He is the beginning of the ways of the heavens, and shall make his sword to approach him", the Septuagint reads: "He is the beginning of God's creation, made for His Angels to mock at", and exactly the same remark is made about "Leviathan", xli, 24. We have already seen that the Septuagint generally renders the term "sons of God" by "angels", but in Deut., xxvii, 23, the Septuagint has an addition in which both terms appear: "Rejoice in Him all ye heavens, and adore Him all ye angels of God; rejoice ye nations with His people, and magnify Him all ye Sons of God." Nor does the Septuagint merely give us these additional references to the angels; it gives us sometimes a fuller declaration of their nature and character concerning them in the Vulgate and Massoretic text. Thus the difficult elih of MT in Job, xli, 17, which the Vulgate renders by "angels", becomes "wild beasts" in the Septuagint version. The early ideas as to the personality of the various angelic appearances are, as we have seen, remarkably vague. At first the angels are regarded in quite an impersonal way (Gen., xvi, 7). They are God's vicegerents and are often identified with the Author of their message (Gen., xlviii, 15-16). But while we read of "the Angels of God" meeting Jacob (Gen., xxxii, 1) we at other times read of one who is termed "the Angel of God" par excellence, e.g. Gen., xxxi, 11. It is true that, owing to the Hebrew idiom, this may mean no more than "an angel of God" and the Septuagint renders it with or without the article at will; yet the three visitors at Mambre seem to have been of different ranks, though St. Paul (Heb., ch. xiii, 2) regards all as angels. In every story in Gen., xiii, develops, the speaker is always "the Lord". Thus in the account of the Angel of the Lord who visited Gideon (Judges, vi), the visitor is alternately spoken of as "the Angel of the Lord" and as "the Lord". Similarly, in Judges, xiii, the Angel of the Lord appears, and both Manoah and his wife exclaim: "We shall certainly die because we have seen God." This want of clearness is particularly apparent in the various accounts of the Angel of the Exodus. In Judges, vi, just now referred to, the Septuagint is very careful to render the Hebrew "Lord" by "the Angel of the Lord"; but in the story of the Exodus it is the "Angel" who appears before them in the pillar of a cloud (Exod., xiii, 21), and the Septuagint makes no change (cf. also Num., xiv, 14, and Neh., ix, 7-20). Yet in Exod., xiv, 19, their guide is termed "the Angel of God". When we turn to Exod., xxxiii, where God is angry with His people for worshipping the golden calf, it is hard not to feel that it is God Himself who has hitherto been their guide, but who now refuses to accompany them any longer. God offers an angel instead, but at Moses's petition He says (14), "My face shall go before thee", which the Septuagint reads by after, though the following verse shows that the rendering is impossible. There is no need to say "If Thee Myself dost not go before us, bring us not out of this place." But what does God mean by "my face"?
Is it possible that some angel of specially high rank is intended, as in Is. lxiii, 9 (cf. Tobias, xii, 15)? May not this be what is meant by "the angel of God" (cf. Num. xx, 16)?

That a process of evolution in theological thought accompanied the gradual unfolding of God's revelation is the assumption of terms (cf. Jux. ii, 2, and Exod., xxi, 2). St. Augustine, in the various verses entertained regarding the person of the Giver of the Law. The Massoretic text as well as the Vulgate of Exod., iii and xix-xx clearly represent the Supreme Being as appearing to Moses in the bush and on Mount Sinai; but the Septuagint view, that God, Himself who gave the Law, yet makes it "the angel of the Lord" who appeared in the bush. By New Testament times the Septuagint view has prevailed, and it is now not merely in the bush that the angel of the Lord, and not God Himself, appears, but the angel is also the Giver of the Law (cf. Gal., iii, 19; Heb., ii, 2; Acts, vii, 30). The person of "the angel of the Lord" finds a counterpart in the personification of Wisdom in the Sapiential books and in at least one passage (Zach., iii, 1) it seems to stand for that "Son of Man" whom Daniel (vii, 13) saw brought before the Ancient of Days. Zachariae scanty historical data, among them the designation of Jesus the high priest standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan stood on His right hand to be His adversary." Tertullian regards many of these passages as preludes to the Incarnation; as the Word of God adumbrating the sublime character in which He is one day to manifest Himself (cf. the Prologue of the Gospel of St. John, and the text in Marc., ii, 27; III, 9; 1, 10, 21, 22). It is possible, then, that in these confused views we can trace vague gropings after certain dogmatic truths regarding the Trinity, reminiscences perhaps of the early revelation of which the Protevangelium in Gen., iii, is but a relic. The earlier Fathers, going by the letter of the text, maintained that it was God Himself who appeared. He who appeared was called God and acted as God. It was not unnatural then for Tertullian, as we have already seen, to regard such manifestations in the light of preludes to the Incarnation, and most of the Eastern Fathers followed the same line of thought. It was held as recently as 1851 by Vandenbroeck, "Dissertatio Theologica de Theophaniis sub Veteri Testamento" (Louvain).

But the great Latins, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and St. Gregory the Great, held the opposite view, and with good grounds. It is St. Augustine (Sermo vii, de Scripturis, P. G., V) in treating of the burning bush (Exod., iii) says: "That the same person who spoke to Moses should be deemed both the Lord and an angel of the Lord, is very hard to understand. It is a question which forbids any rash assertions but rather demands careful investigation." Augustine, however, maintained that it was God Himself who appeared. He who appeared was called both the Lord and the angel of the Lord because he was Christ, indeed the prophet (Is. ix, 6, 7) surely styled Christ the "Angel of great Counsel."" The saint proceeds to show that such a view is tenable though we must be careful not to fall into another error in stating it. He points out, however, that if we hold that it was an angel who appeared, we must explain how he came to be called "the Lord," and he proceeds to show how this might be: "Elsewhere in the Bible when a prophet speaks it is yet said to be the Lord who speaks, not of course necessarily the prophet is the Lord but because the Lord is the prophet. Similarly in the same way when the Lord condescends to speak through the mouth of a prophet or an angel, it is the same as when he speaks by a prophet or apostle, and the angel is correctly termed an angel if we consider him himself, but equally correctly is he termed 'the Lord' because God dwells in him." He concludes: "It is the name of the indweller, not of the temple." And a little further on: "It seems to me that we shall most correctly say that our forefathers recognized the Lord in the angel," and he addsuces the authority of the New Testament writers who clearly so understood it and yet sometimes allowed the same angel to be the Lord (cf. Jux. ii, 2, and Gal., iii, 19). The saint discusses the same question even more elaborately, "In Heptateuchum," lib. vii, 54, P. G., III, 558. As an instance of how convinced some of the Fathers were in holding the opposite view, we may note Theodoret's words (In Exod.): "The Lord spoke by the prophet, as he said to Balaam, and the angel of the Lord, as he said to Moses. The former is called God, and the latter who appeared to him. But (Moses) called Him an angel in order to let us know that it was not God the Father whom he saw—for whose angel could the Father be?—but the Only-begotten Son, the Angel of great Counsel" (cf. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles., I, ii, 7; St. Ireneaus, Hist., iii, 6). But the view propounded by the Latin Fathers was destined to live in the Church, and the Scholastics reduced it to a system (cf. St. Thomas, Quest., Disp., De Potentia, vi, 8, ad 3º); and for a very good exposition of both sides of the question, cf. "Revue biblique," 1894, 232-247.

ANGEL IN BABYLONIAN LITERATURE.—The Bible has given us the angel in angels, or spirits intermediate between God and man, is a characteristic of the Semitic peoples. It is therefore interesting to trace this belief in the Semites of Babylonia. According to Sayce (The Religions of Ancient Egypt and Babylonia, Gifford Lectures, 1901), the engraving of Semitic beings on the Sumerian tablets of Babylonia is marked by the entrance of angels or sukkalii into their theosophy. Thus we find an interesting parallel to "the angel of the Lord" in Nebo, "the minister of Merodach" (ibid., 355). He is also termed the "angel" or interpreter of the will of Merodach (ibid., 496), and Sayce accepts the Hammel's statement that it can be shown from the Minean inscriptions that primitive Semitic religion consisted of moon and star worship, the moon-god Athtar and an "angel" god standing at the head of the pantheon (ibid., 315). The Biblical conflict between the kingdoms of good and evil finds its parallel in the "spirits of heaven" or the Igi— who constituted the "host" of which Ninip was the champion (and from whom he received the title of "chief of the angels") and the "spirits of the earth," or Annuna-Ki, who dwelt in Hades (ibid., 355). The Babylonian sukkalli corresponded to the Biblical messengers of the Lord, and were called the Lord's will and executed his behests (ibid., 361). Some of them appear to have been more than messengers; they were the interpreters and vicegerents of the supreme deity, thus Nebo is "the prophet of Borippa." These angels are even termed "the sons of the deity whose vicegerents they are; thus Ninip, at one time the messenger of En-il, is transformed into his son just as Merodach becomes the son of Ea (ibid., 496). The Babylonian accounts of the Creation and the Flood do not contrast very favourably with the Biblical accounts, and the same must be said of the chaotic hierarchies of gods and angels which modern research has revealed. Perhaps we are justified in seeing in all forms of religion vestiges of a primitive nature-worship which has at times succeeded in debasing the purer revelation, and which, where that primitive revelation has not received successive increments as among the Hebrews, results in an abundant crop of weeds.

Theories concerning the idea of certain angels being in charge of special districts (cf. Dan., x, and above). This belief persists in a debased form in the Arab notion of Genii, or Jinns, who haunt particular spots. A reference to it is perhaps to be found in Gen., xxxii, 1, 2: "Jacob also went on the journey he had begun: and the angels of God met him: And when he saw them he said: These are the camps of God, and he called the name of that place Mahanaim, that is, 'Camps.' Recent explorations in the Arab district about Petra have revealed certain precipices marked off with stones as the abiding-places of angels, and the nomad tribes frequent them for prayer and sacrifice. These places bear a name which corresponds exactly with the 'Mahanaim' of the Bible, and the name is preserved in the Bible spp. Evangelica, Religions Sémitées, 184, and Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 445. Jacob's vision at Bethel (Gen., xxviii, 12) may perhaps come under the same category. Suffice it to say that not every-thing in the Bible is revelation, and that the object of the sacred writings is not merely to teach truths but also to make clearer certain truths taught us by nature. The modern view, which tends to regard everything Babylonian as absolutely primitive, and which seems to think that because critics affix a late date to the Biblical writings the religion therein contained must also be late, may be seen in Haag, 'Théologie Biblique' (339). This writer sees in the Biblical angels only primitive deities debased into demi-gods by the triumphant progress of Mono-theism.

ANGELS IN THE ZEND-AVESTA.—Attempts have also been made to relate to a Persian angel the angels of the Bible and the "angels of the hand" of the Zend-Avesta. That the Persian domination and the Babylonian captivity exerted a large influence upon the Hebrew conception of the angels is acknowledged in the Talmud of Jerusalem, Rosch Haschannas, 56, where it is said that the names of the angels were introduced from Babylon. It is, however, by no means clear that the angelic beings who figure so largely in the pages of the Avesta are to be referred to the older Persian religion of the time of Cyrus and not rather to the Neo-Zoroastrianism of the Sassanides. If this be the case, as Darmenter et al. have rather reverse the position and attribute the Zoroastrian angels to the influence of the Bible and of Philo. Stress has been laid upon the similarity between the Biblical "seven who stand before God" and the seven Amesha-Spentas of the Zend-Avesta. But it is must be noted that these latter are really six, the number seven is only obtained by counting "their father, Ahura-Mazda," among them as their chief. Moreover, these Zoroastrian archangels are more abstract than concrete; they are not individuals charged with weighty missions as in the Bible. A good portion of the whole question is to be found in "Rev. Bibl." (Journ. Bibl. and Apoc., 1904) and for the similar view entertained by de Harlez see "Rev. Bibl." (1896), 169.

ANGELS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—Ritherto we have dwelt almost exclusively on the angels of the Old Testament, whose visits and messages have been by no means rare; but when we come to the New Testament their name appears on every page and the number of references to them equals those in the Old Dispensation. It is their privilege to announce to Zachary and Mary the dawn of Redemption, and to the shepherds its actual accomplishment. Our Lord in His discourses tells to them as to "the world" that they should be the "guiding amongst men," was yet receiving the silent unseen adoration of the hosts of heaven. He describes their life in heaven (Matt., xxii, 30; Luke, xx, 36); He tells us how they form a body-guard round Him and at word from Him would answer to His last command, it is the privilege of one of them to assist Him in His Agony and sweat of Blood. More than once He speaks of them as auxiliaries and witnesses at the final judgment (Matt., xvi, 27), which indeed they will prepare (ibid., xiii, 49-49); and lastly, they are the joyous witnesses of His triumphant Resurrection (ibid., xxiii, 2). It is to such minds that sceptical Sees, Zoroastrianism, and the angels who figure in the Bible supply a most natural and harmonious progression? In the opening page of the sacred story the Jewish nation is chosen out from amongst all the nations of the earth by the Lord, from the stock from whose seed He would one day raise up a Redeemer. The angels appear in the course of this chosen people's history, now as God's messengers, now as that people's guides; at one time they are the bestowers of God's law, at another they actually bear the law; the Word of God is their mission. What we are helping them to mature. They converse with His prophets, with David and Elias, with Daniel and Zacharias; they slay the hosts against Israel, they serve as guides to God's servants, and the last prophet, Malachi, bears a name of peculiar significance: "the Angel of Jehovah." He seems to sum up in his very name the previous "ministry by the hands of angels", as though God would thus recall the old-time glories of the Exodus and Sinai. The Septuagint, indeed, seems not to know his name as that of an individual prophet and its rendering of the opening verse of his prophecy is peculiarly solemn: "The angel of the Lord came out of the hand of His angel; lay it up in your hearts." All this loving ministry on the part of the angels is solely for the sake of the Saviour, on Whose face they desire to look. Hence when the fullness of time was arrived it is they who bring the glad message, and as the psalmist says "Gloria in excelsis Deo," the new-born King of Angels in His hurried flight into Egypt, and minister to Him in the desert. His second coming and the dire events that must precede that, are revealed to His chosen servant in the island of Patmos. It is a question of revelation again, and consequently its ministers and messengers of old appear once more in the sacred story and the record of God's revealing love ends fittingly almost as it had begun: "I, Jesus, have sent My angel to testify to you these things in the churches." (Revel., xlii, 2, 16). It is easy for the student to trace the influence of surrounding nations and of other religions in the Biblical account of the angels. Indeed it is needful and instructive to do so, but it would be wrong to shut our eyes to the higher line of development that we have shown and which brings out so strikingly the marvellous unity and harmony of the whole divine story of the Bible. Angela Merici, SAINT, foundress of the Ursulines, b. 21 March, 1474, at Desenzano, a small town on the Lake of Gera, d. 27 January, 1540, at Brescia. She was left an orphan at the age of ten and together with her elder sister came to the home of her uncle at the neighbouring town of Salo where they led an angelic life. When her sister met with a sudden death, without knowing to the last day, what she in the course of the next two years, Angela was much distressed. She became a tertiary of St. Francis and greatly increased her prayers and mortifications for the repose of her sister's soul. In her anguish and pious simplicity she prayed God to reveal to her the condition of her deceased sister.
It is said that by a vision she was satisfied that her sister was in the company of the saints in heaven. When she was twenty year old, her uncle died, and she returned to her paternal home at Desenzano. Convinced that the great need of her times was a better instruction of young girls in the rudiments of the Christian religion, she converted her home into a school where she taught all the girls of Desenzano and taught them the elements of Christianity. It is related that one day, while in an ecstasy, she had a vision in which it was revealed to her that she was to found an association of virgin sisters devoted to their lives to the religious training of young girls. The school she had established at Desenzano soon bore abundant fruit, and she was invited to the neighboring city, Brescia, to establish a similar school at that place. Angela gladly accepted the invitation. In 1524, while making a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, she became suddenly blind when she was on the island of Crete, but continued her journey to the Holy Places and was cured on her return while praying before a crucifix at the same place where she was struck with blindness a few weeks before. When, in the jubilee year 1555, she had come to Rome to gain the indulgences, Pope Clement VII, who had heard of her great holiness and her extraordinary success as a religious teacher of young girls, invited her to remain in Rome; but Angela, who shunned publicity, returned to Brescia. Finally, on the 25th of November, 1555, Angela chose twelve virgins and laid the foundation of the order of the Ursuline in a small house near the Church of St. Afra in Brescia. Having been five years superior of the newly-founded order, she died. Her body lies buried in the Church of St. Afra in Brescia. She was beatified in 1592, by Clement XIII, and canonized in 1807, by Pius VII. Her feast is celebrated on May 31.

Angela of Foligno, Blessed. Umbrian penitent and mystical writer. She was born at Foligno in Umbria, in 1248, of a rich family; d. 4 January, 1309. Married at an early age, she loved the world and its pleasures and, worse still, forgetful of her dignity and duties as wife and mother, fell into sin and led a disorderly life. But God, having in His mercy inspired her with a deep sorrow for her sins, made her little by little to the height of perfection and to the understanding of the deepest mysteries. Angela has herself recorded the history of her conversion in her admirable "Book of Visions and Instructions", which contains seventy chapters, and which was written from Angela's dictation by her Franciscan confessor, Father Arnold of Foligno. Some time after her conversion Angela had placed herself under the direction of Father Arnold and taken the habit of the Third Order of St. Francis. In the course of time the fame of her sanctity gathered around her a number of Tertiaries, men and women, who strove under her direction to advance in holiness. Later she established a house at Foligno, who to the Rule of the Third Order added the three vows of religion, without, however, binding themselves to enclosure, so that they might devote their time to works of charity. Angela at last passed away, surrounded by her spiritual children. Her remains repose in the Church of St. Francis at Foligno. Numerous miracles were worked at her tomb, and Innocent XII approved the immemorial veneration paid to her. Her feast is kept in the Order on the 30th of March. Bl. Angela's high authority as a spiritual teacher may be gathered from the fact that Bollandus, among other testimonial quotes Maximilian Sandeus, of the Society of Jesus, who calls her the "Mistress of Theologians", whose whole doctrine has been drawn out of the Book of Life, Jesus Christ, Our Lord.

The life of Blessed Angela has been written by Mariano of Florence, and Rodolfo of Bollandius in their chronicles, by Jacobelli, Vita de Santi e Beati dell'Umbria, and Wadding, Annales Minorum, who have derived their information from her Book of Visions and Instructions. The editio princeps of this book, known as the "Religio Diarum Anglicarum de spiritibus", was published for her life and teaching. B. Angela de Pulciano Vivorum et Institutionum Liber (reprinted Cologne, 1601) was revised by Bollandus, Acts and Monuments, and by Lammert with German tr., (Cologne, 1851); and Parchavelle's translation (Foligno, 1872) has been recently issued (New York, 1903). Paschal Robinson.
Angelico, fra, a famous painter of the Florentine school, b. near Castello di Viochio in the province of Mugello, Tuscany, 1387; d. at Rome, 1455. He was christened Guido, and his father's name being Picro he was known as Guido, or Guidolino, di Pietro, but his full appellation to-day is that of "Blessed Fra Angelico Giovanni da Firense". He and his supposed younger brother, Fra Benedetto da Fiesole, or da Mugello, joined the order of Preachers in 1407, entering the Dominican convent at Fiesole. Giovanni was twenty years old at the time the brothers began their art careers as illustrators of manuscripts, and Fra Benedetto, who had considerable talent as an illuminator and miniaturist, is supposed to have assisted his more celebrated brother in his famous frescoes in the convent of San Marco in Florence. Fra Benedetto was superior at San Domenico at Fiesole for some years before his death in 1448. Fra Angelico, who, during a residence at Fiesole had come under the influence of Giotto whose work at Assisi was within easy reach, soon graduated from the illumination of missals and choir books into a remarkably native and inspiring master of religious paintings, who glorified the quaint naturalness of his types with a peculiarly pious mysticism. He was convinced that to picture Christ perfectly one must needs be Christlike, and Vasari says that he prefaced his paintings by prayer. His technical equipment was somewhat slender, as was natural for an artist with his beginnings, his work being rather thin, dry, and hard. His spirit, however, glorified his paintings. His noble holy figures, his beautiful angels, human but in form, robed with the hues of the sunrise and sunset, and his supremely earnest saints and martyrs are permeated with the sincerest of religious feeling. His early training in miniature and illumination had its influence in his more important works, with their robes of golden embroidery, their decorative arrangements and details, and pure, brilliant colours. As for the early studies in art of Fra Angelico, nothing is known. His painting shows the influence of the Siennese school, and it is thought he may have studied under Gherardo, Starnina, or Lorenzo Monaco. On account of the struggle for the pontifical throne between Gregory XII, Benedict XIII, and Alexander V, Fra Giovanni and his brother, being adherents of the first named, had in 1406 to leave Fiesole, taking refuge in the convent of their order established at Foligno in Umbria. The pest devastating that place in 1414, the brothers went to Cortona, where they spent four years and then returned to Fiesole. There Fra Angelico remained for sixteen years. He was then invited to Florence to decorate the new Convent of San Marco which had just been allotted to his order, and of which Cosmo de' Medici was a munificent patron. At Cortona are found some of his best pictures. It was at Florence, however, where he spent nine years, that he painted his most important works. In 1445, Pope Eugenius IV invited Fra Angelico to Rome and gave him work to do in the Vatican, where he painted for him and his successor, Pope Nicholas V, the frescoes of two chapels. That of the cappella del Sacramento, in the Vatican, was destroyed later by Paul III. Eugenius IV then asked him to go to Orvieto to work in the chapel of the Madonna di San Brizio in the cathedral. This work he began in 1447, but did not finish, returning to Rome in the autumn of that year. Much later the chapel was finished by Luca Signorelli. Pope Eugenius is said to have offered the painter the place of Archbishop of Florence, which, through modesty and devotion to his art he declined. At Rome, besides his great paintings in the chapels of the Vatican, he executed some beautiful miniatures for choral books. He is buried in Rome in the church of Santa Maria sopra Minerva. Among the thirty works of Fra Angelico in the cloisters and chapter house of the convent of San Marco in Florence (which has been converted into a national museum) is notable the famous "Crucifixion", with the Saviour between the two thieves surrounded by a group of twenty saints, and with bust portraits of seventeen Dominican fathers below. Here is shown to the full the mastery of the painter in depicting in the faces of the monks the emotions evoked by the contemplation of heavenly mysteries. In the main Gallery are “The Coronation of the Virgin”, “The Virgin and Child with Saints”, “St. Damasus and St. Gregory”, “St. Damasus and St. Benjamin of St. John the Baptist”, “The Preaching of St. Peter”, “The Martyrdom of St. Mark”, and “The Adoration of the Magi”, while among the examples at the Florence Academy are “The Last Judgment”, “Paradise”, “The Deposition from the Cross”, “The Entombment”, scenes from the Lives of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, and various subjects from the life of Christ. At Fiesole are a “Madonna and Saints” and a “Cucifixion”. The predella in London is in five compartments and shows Christ with the Banner of the Resurrection surrounded by a choir of angels and a great throng of the blessed. There is also there an “Adoration of the Magi”. At Cortona appear at the Convent of San Domenico the fresco “The Virgin and Child with four Evangelists” and the altar-piece “Virgin and Child with Saints”, and at the baptistery an “Annunciation” with scenes from the life of the Virgin and of St. Dominic. In the churches, the “Sung as Litanies”, “Sung on Clouds”, and at Rome, in the Corsini Palace, “The Ascension”, “The Last Judgment”, and “Pentecost”. At the Louvre in Paris are “The Coronation of the Virgin”, “The Crucifixion”, “The Martyrdom of St. Cosmas and St. Damian”. Berlin has the finest of all, in its “Summum Opus”, and the National Gallery, “The Martyrdom of St. Cosmas and St. Damian”. At Madrid is “The Annunciation”, in Munich “Scenes from the Lives of St. Cosmas and St. Damian”, and in St. Petersburg a “Madonna and Saints”. Mrs. John L. Gardner has in the art gallery of her Boston Museum an “Assumption” and a “Dormition of the Virgin”. There are other works at Parma, Perugia, and Pisa. At San Marco, Florence, in addition to the works already mentioned are “Madonna della Stella”, “Coronation of the Virgin”, “Adoration of the Magi”, and “St. Peter Martyr”. The Chapel of St. Nicholas in the Vatican at Rome contains frescoes of the “Lives of St. Lawrence and St. Stephen”, “The Four Evangelists”, and “The Teachers of the Church”. In the gallery of the Vatican are “St. Nicholas of Bari”, and “Madonna and Angels”. The work at Orvieto finished by Signorelli shows Christ as a glory of angels with sixteen saints and prophets.”

AUGUSTUS VAN CLEEF.

Angelo Carloletti di Chivasso, Blessed, moral theologian of the order of Friars Minor; b. at Chivasso in Piedmont, in 1411; and at Coni, in Piedmont, in 1495. From his tenderest years the Blessed Angelo was remarkable for the holiness and purity of his life. He attended the University of Bologna, where he received the degree of Doctor of Civil and Canon Law. It was probably at the age of thirty that he entered the Order of Friars Minor and virtues and learning soon gained the confidence of his brethren in religion, and he was four times chosen to fill the office of vicar-general of that branch of the order then known as the Cismonante Observance. In 1480 the Turks under Mahomet II took possession of Constantinople, and Angelo had the “bel paese”, Blessed Angelo was appointed Apostolic Nuncio by Pope Sixtus IV, and commissioned to preach the holy war against the invaders. The death of Mahomet and the ultimate retirement of the Turkish forces from the Italian peninsula were evidence that God had fulfilled his predictions. In 1491, he was appointed Apostolic Nuncio and Commissary by Innocent VIII, jointly with the Bishop of Mauriana, the purpose of their mission being to take active steps to prevent the spread of the heretical doctrines of the Waldenses.

But it was perhaps by his writings that Blessed Angelo rendered the greatest service to religion. His works, translated into Latin by Wadding, consist of twenty-five “Scriptores Ordinis Minorum”. By far the most noted of these is the “Summa de Casibus Conscientiae”, called after him the “Summa Angelica”. The first edition of the “Summa Angelica” appeared in the year 1476, and from that year to the year 1610 it went through twenty-five editions, twenty-five of which are preserved in the Royal Library at Munich. The “Summa” is divided into six hundred and fifty-nine articles arranged in alphabetical order and forming what would now be called a dictionary of moral theology. The most valuable and most important of these articles is the one entitled “Interrogationes in Confessione”. It serves, in a way, as an index to the whole work. Judging the character of the work of Bl. Angelo as a theologian from this, his most important contribution to moral theology, one is impressed with the gravity and fairness that characterized his opinions throughout.

When in 1604 the cardinals of the Congregation for the confessiorum et eorum qui cupiunt laudabiliter vivere, is a most valuable guide in matters of conscience and approaches closely, in the treatment of the various articles, to usiastic theology as this science is now understood, hence the title of the “Summa Angelica”. Indeed, in 1620, under the dictat XIII approved the cult that had for long been paid to Bl. Angelo, especially by the people of Chivasso and Coni. The latter chose him as their special patron, while his feast is kept on 12 April throughout the order of Friars Minor.

STEPHEN M. DONOVAN.

Angelo Giareneo da Cegol, one of the leaders of the so-called Spiritual Franciscans, b. at Fosombrone, about 1247; d. at Santa Maria d’Aspro, 15 June, 1337. He entered the order in 1262, or thereabouts. Believing that the rule of St. Francis was not being observed and interpreted according to the mind and spirit of the Seraphic Father, he retired to a hermitage with a few companions and introduced a new branch of the order, to which he gave the name “Clareni”. By the Bull of Sixtus IV, “Dominus Noster Jesus Christus”, the “Clareni” were united to the main body of the order and placed under the obedience of the Minister General. The influence of the prophetic writings of Joachim of Floris, a Calabrian abbot, on Angelo and his followers, and in fact on the “Spirituals” generally of the thirteenth century, cannot be overrated. They all looked forward to the time when the religious orders, whose laxity had been occasioned in great measure by the general looseness of the times, would be restored to their former discipline and to a pope angelicus and a new order of Friars. But the number of Angelo’s followers was small; and his so-called reform brought upon himself in particular, and the “Clareni” in general, the suspicious disfavour of the Friars Minor who were not prepared to follow the extreme interpretation of the rule of St. Francis of Angelo and his followers, and in consequence little better than a homeless and persecuted wanderer, travelling through Greece, Armenia, and the different provinces of Italy until, in 1311, he came to Avignon to answer the charge of heresy that had been brought against him. He was finally acquitted after a tedious and unprofitable discussion. In 1321 he retired to the little hermitage of Santa Maria d’Aspro, in the diocese of Marsico in Basilicata, where he died in the odour of sanctity on the 15th of June of the same year. Angelo Clareno is the author, at least in great part, of the "Chronica septem tribulatium Ordinis Minorum", which records the persecutions suffered by the "Spirituales", beginning with the innovations made during St. Francis' sojourn in the East, and continuing under Elias, Crescentius, and Bonaventure. This work is characterized by heroic endurance; but is tinged with bias and bitterness. Another work of Angelo's that deserves mention is the "Declaratio regular Ministerum". Acts SS., July, III, 500-576; Eshlel, Archiv für Literatur und Kirchengeschichte des Mühlalaters (Berlin, 1885), i, 507-558; (1896) ii, 92-94; 299-327; (1897) i, 553-622; II, 1-190; Tocco, L'orosia nel medio evo (Florence, 1884); Wadding, Annales Minorum, 1289, et passim; Lemmenn, Chronica B. Angels, Early Christian Representations of.

—Angels were seldom represented in Christian art before Constantine. The oldest fresco in which an angel appears is the Annunciation scene (second century) of the cemetery of St. Priscilla. A third-century painting of the same subject was discovered by Wilpert in the cemetery of Sta. Peter and Marcianus; in both representations the Archangel Gabriel is depicted in human form, robed in tunic and pallium. The "Good Angel" (angelus bonus) of the fourth-century syncretistic fresco representing the judgment of Vibia is also depicted in human form, dressed as a sacred personage. The winged angel, for which abundant scriptural references could be adduced, does not appear in pre-Constantinian Christian art, for the reason, probably, that such figures might too readily recall certain favourite subjects of classic art. Another fact worthy of note.

British Museum, shows the Archangel Michael standing on the uppersteps of an architecturally adorned doorway, with a staff in one hand and a globe surmounted by a cross in the other. The figure is admirably executed. A second development in the artistic conception of angels is marked in the Annunciation scene (fifth century) depicted on the triumphal arch of St. Mary Major's. Unlike the same subject in the catacombs, the Archangel Gabriel is soaring through the air towards Mary, who is seated in the midst of attendant winged angels. From the fifth century angels became a favourite subject in Christian art, no longer merely as figures demanded to complete a historical scene, but very often as attendants on Our Lord and the Blessed Virgin. The mosaic of St. Mary Major's mentioned above, as well as two mosaics of St. Apollinare Nuovo and St. Vitale (sixth century), Ravenna, are examples of angels in this character. The Archangels Michael and Gabriel dressed in the military chlamys and bearing military standards inscribed with the word Agnos (blessed) were represented in mosaics at St. Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna. The Hierarchia caelestis of pseudo-Dionysius exercised an important influence on the artistic conception of angels from the sixth century. Prior to that time, it is true, a distinction was made between different categories of the angelic host, but now the relations of angels to God were represented in the East after the manner of the various grades of court functionaries rendering their homage to the Emperor.

Cults of Angels.—Early Christian literature, like early Christian art, contains few references to angels. This fact is easily accounted for by the circumstances of the time, for with the popular belief in a multitude of deities it was necessary to lay particular emphasis on the unity of God. An official cult in honour of the angels in the first centuries of Christianity would have made imminent the danger of their being regarded as inferior divinities. Witness the vagaries of Gnosticism. Still, there is sufficient evidence to show that the relations of angels to God were not excluded from Christian teaching. Justin Martyr (Apol., i, vi) states that the "host of Good angels" was held in the greatest veneration, and his contemporary, Athenagoras, refers to the duties of angels "whom God appointed to their several posts, to occupy themselves about the elements, and the heavens, and the world" (Legatio, x). In the fourth century we find Eusebius of Caesarea distinguishing accurately between the cult rendered to

During paschal time the antiphon of Our Lady, "Regina coeli lactare," with versicle and prayer, is to be substituted for the Angelus. The Angelus indulgence is one of those which are not suspended during the year of Jubilee.

HISTORY.—The history of the Angelus is by no means easy to trace with confidence, and it is well to distinguish in this matter between what is certain and what is in some measure conjectural. In the first place it is certain that the Angelus at midday and in the morning were of later introduction than the evening Angelus. Secondly it is certain that the midday Angelus, which is the most ancient of the three, was not a mere development or imitation of the morning and evening devotion. Thirdly, there can be no doubt that the practice of saying three Hall Marys in the evening somewhere about the year 1100 had become general throughout Europe by the first half of the fourteenth century, and that it was recommended and indulged by Pope John XXII in 1318 and 1327. These facts are admitted by all writers on the subject, but when we try to push our investigations further we are confronted with certain difficulties. It seems needless to discuss all the problems involved. We may be content to consider simply the necessity of immediate detail at which T. Esser, O. P., and the present writer have arrived, in two series of articles published about the same time quite independently of each other.

THE EVENING ANGELUS.—Although according to Father Esser's view we have no certain example of three Hall Marys being recited at the sound of the bell in the evening earlier than a decree of the Provincial Synod of Gran in the year 1307, still there are a good many facts which suggest that some such practice was current in the thirteenth century. Thus there is a vague and not very well confirmed tradition which ascribes to Pope Gregory IX, in 1299, an indulgence enjoying a special indulgence for the salutations and praises of Our Lady. Again, there is a grant of Bishop Henry of Brixen to the church of Freins in the Tyrol, also of 1299, which concedes an indulgence for saying three Hall Marys "at the even tolling." This, indeed, has been suspected of interpolation, but the same objection cannot apply to a decree of the Franciscan General Chapter in the time of St. Bonaventure (1263 or 1269), directing preachers to encourage the people to say Hall Marys when the Complin bell rang. Moreover, these indications are strongly confirmed by certain inscriptions on the bells of the thirteenth century. Further back than this direct testimonial do not go; but on the other hand we read in the "Regulæ Concilii," a monastic rule composed by St. Aethelwold of Winchester, c. 975, that certain prayers called the tres orations, preceded by psalms, were to be said after Complin as well as after Matins and again at Prime, and although there is no express mention of a bell being rung after Complin, there is express mention of the bell being rung for the tres orations at other hours. This practice, it seems, is confirmed by German examples (Martihn, De Antiq. Eccles. Ribuus, IV,39), and as time went on it became more and more definitely associated with three separate peals of the bell, more especially at Bec, at St. Denis, and in the customs of the Canons Regular of St. Augustine (e. g. at Barnwell Priory and elsewhere). We have not in these earlier examples any mention of the Hall Mary (q. v.), which is now an absolutely familiar as an antiphon in the Little Office of Our Lady about the beginning of the eleventh century (The Month, November, 1901), but it would be the most natural thing in the world that once the Hall Mary had become an everyday prayer, this should for the laity take the place of the more elaborate tres orations recited by the monks; just as in

HUGH POPE.

ANGELS—PRESENT USAGE.—The Angelus is a short practice of devotion in honour of the Incarnation repeated three times each day, morning, noon, and evening, at the sound of the bell. It consists essentially of the recitation of the Hall Mary, to which in later times have been added three introductory verses and a concluding versicle and prayer. The prayer is that which belongs to the antiphon of Our Lady, "Alma Redemptoris," and its recitation is not of strict obligation in order to gain the indulgence. From the first word of the three verses, i.e. Angelus Domini nuntiavit Maria (The angel of the Lord declared unto Mary), the devotion derives its name. The indulgence of 100 days for each recitation, with a plenary once a month, was granted by Benedict XIII, 14 September, 1724, but the conditions prescribed have been somewhat modified by Leo XIII, 14 April, 1904. Finally it was necessary that the Angelus should be said kneeling (except on Sundays and on Saturday evenings, when the rubrics prescribe a standing posture), and also that it should be said at the sound of the bell; but more recent legislation allows these conditions to be dispensed with for any sufficient reason, provided the prayer be said approximately at the proper hours, i.e. in the early morning, or about the hour of noon, or towards evening. In this case, however, the whole Angelus as commonly printed has to be recited, but those who do not know the prayers by heart or who are unable to read them, may say five Hall Marys in their place.

ANGELS OF THE CHURCHES.—St. John in the Apocalypse is shown seven candelsticks and in their midst the Son of Man holding seven stars (Apoc., 1, 13, 20). The candelsticks represent the seven Churches of Asia, the stars, the angels of those Churches. He is bidden to write to the respective angels of those Churches and distribute to each his meed of praise or blame. Origen (Hom. xiii in Luc., and Hom. xx in Num.) explains that these are the guardian angels of the Churches, a view upheld by Dean Alford. But St. Ephraemi (Hsr., xxv) explicitly rejects this view, and, in accordance with the imagery of the passage, explains it of the bishops. The comparison of a teacher to a star is quite Scriptural (Dan., xii, 3). St. Augustine's reason for interpreting angels of the Churches as the prelates of the church is that St. John speaks of them as falling from their first charity which is not true of the angels [Ep., xliii (al. cxlii), n. 22].

the case of the Rosary, one hundred and fifty Hail Marys were substituted for the one hundred and fifty psalms of the Psalter. Moreover, in the Franciscan Order, on some days, it was the custom to recite the Angelus in the early hours of the morning. As mentioned above, this is precisely what we find, viz., that the laity in general were to be induced to say Hail Marys when the bell rang at Complin, during, or more probably after, the office of the friers. A special appropriateness for these gatherings of Our Lady was found in the belief that at this very hour she was saluted by the angel Gabriel. Again, it is noteworthy that some monastic customs in speaking of the tres orationes expressly prescribe the observance of the rubric about standing or kneeling according to the season, which rubric is insisted upon in the recitation of the Angelus to this day. From this we may conclude that the Angelus in its origin was an imitation of the monks' night prayers and that it had probably nothing directly to do with the curfew bell, rung as a signal for the extinction of fires and lights. The curfew, however, first meets us in Normandy in 1061 and is then spoken of as a bell which summoned the people to say their prayers, after which summons they should not again go abroad. If anything, therefore, it seems more probable that the curfew was grafted upon this primitive prayer-bell rather than vice versa. If the curfew and the Angelus coincided at a later period, as apparently they did in some cases, this was probably accidental.

Angelus was the last suggestion about the tres orationes also offers some explanation of the fact that shortly after the recital of the three Hail Marys at evening had become familiar, a custom established itself of ringing a bell in the morning and of saying the Ave three times. The earliest mention seems to be in the chronicle of the city of Parma, 1318, though it was the town-bell which was rung in this case. Still the bishop exhorted all who heard it to say three Our Fathers and three Hail Marys for the preservation of peace, whence it was called 'the peace bell'. The same designation was also applied elsewhere to the evening bell. In spite of some difficulties it seems probable enough that this morning bell was also an imitation of the monastic triple plea for the tres orationes or morning prayers; for this, as noted above, was rung at the morning office of Prime as well as at Complin. The morning Ave Maria soon became a familiar feature in all the monasteries, excepting England, and was almost as generally observed as that of the evening. But while in England the evening Ave Maria is enjoined by Bishop John Stratford of Winchester as early as 1324, no formal direction as to the morning ringing is found before the instruction of Archbishop Arundel in 1599.

The Midday Angelus.—This suggests a much more complicated problem which cannot be adequately discussed here. The one clear fact which seems to result alike from the statutes of several German Synods in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, as well as from books of devotion of a somewhat later date, is that, in the monasteries, the It was spoken of as a peace bell and formally commended by Louis XI of France in 1475 for that special object, was closely associated with the veneration of the Passion of Christ. At first it appears that this midday bell, e.g. at Prague in 1380, and at Mainz in 1381, was rung only by degrees extended to the other days of the week. In the English Horae and the German Hortulus Animae of the beginning of the sixteenth century rather lengthy prayers commemorating the Passion are provided to be said at the midday tolling of the bell in addition to the ordinary three Aves. Later on (e.g. in The Shuchwarden's Thesaurus), while our modern Angelus versicles are printed, much as we say them now, though minus the final prayer, an alternative form commemorating our Lord's death upon the cross is suggested for the noontide ringing. These instructions, which may be found as early as 1451 in England (Pepys MS 1576) and from 1531 in the Regina Celi for the morning (see Esser, 784), suggest that the Resurrection should be honoured in the morning, the Passion at noon, and the Incarnation in the evening, since the times correspond to the hours at which these great Mysteries actually occurred. In some prayer-books of this epoch different devotions are recommended for each of the three hours. Again, the idea of the Regina Celi for the morning (see Esser, 784), suggests prayers for noon and our present verses for sundown. To some such practice we do not owe the substitution of Regina Celi for the Angelus during paschal time. This substitution was recommended by the Angelus Recessus de festis at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Our present three verses seem first to have made their appearance in an Italian catechism printed at Venice in 1560 (Esser, 789); but the fuller form now universally adopted cannot be traced back earlier than 1612. It is noted that somewhat earlier than this a practice was widespread in Italy of saying Laus De profundis' for the holy souls immediately after the evening Angelus. Another custom, also of Italian origin, is that of adding three Glorias to the Angelus in thanksgiving to the Blessed Trinity for the privileges bestowed upon our Lady. (See also HAIL MARY.)

Angelus Bell.—The triple Hail Mary recited in the evening, which is the origin of our modern Angelus, was closely associated with the ringing of a bell. This bell seemingly belonged to Complin, which was theoretically said at sundown, though in practice it followed closely upon the afternoon office of Vespers. There can be little doubt that in all save a few exceptional cases, the tolling of the Ave bell was distinct from the ringing of curfew (trepotium); the former taking place at the end of Complin and perhaps coinciding with the prayers for peace, said in choir; the latter being the signal for the close of day and for the general bed-time. In many places, both in England and France, the curfew bell is still rung and it rang at a relatively late hour, varying from 8 to 10, but that the actual peel lasts in most cases for a notable period of time, being prolonged for a hundred strokes or more. Where the town-bell and the bells of the principal church or monastery were distinct, the curfew was generally rung at the town-bell. Where the curfew-bell served for both purposes, the Ave and the curfew were probably rung upon the same bell at different hours. There is a great lack of records containing any definite note of time regarding the ringing of the Ave bell, but there is at least one clear example in the case of Cropredy, Oxfordshire, where in 1572 a bequest (e.g. in the curfew) condition that they should "toll daily the Avees bell at six of the clock in the mornyng, at xii of the clock at noone and at foure of the cloke at afternoone" (North, Church Bells of Lincolnshire, 169). At the same time it seems clear that in the case of cathedral churches, etc., where the Office was said in choir, the interval between Complin and the (anticipated) Matins of the next ciso; the true reading is perhaps dulcissimi mellis. Or again: Ecce Gabrielle sonor hac campana fidehis (Behold this bell of faithful Gabriel sounds); or Missi de calix nomen habebo Gabriellis (I bear the name of Gabriel sent from heaven), or Missus vero pie Gabriel fert lata Maria (Gabriel bears joyous tidings to holy Mary). We can hardly be wrong in regarding these bells as Angelus bells, for in the Diocese of Lincoln alone we find nineteen of the surviving medieval bells bearing the name of Gabriel, while only six bear the name of Michael, a much more popular patron in other respects. In France, the Ave Maria seems to have been the ordinary label for Angelus bells; but in Germany we find as the most common inscription of all, even in the case of many bells of the thirteenth century, the words O Rex Gloria Vm Cum Pace (O King of Glory, Come with Peace); as for instance, one of the bells of Freiburg in the Brisgau, dated 1258. To explain the popularity of this inscription we have to remember that according to medieval tradition the Annunciation took place at evening. It was then that the Prince of Peace took flesh and dwelt among us. Moreover in Germany, the Netherlands and in some parts of France, Angelus was regularly known as the "Peace bell", and pro pace schlagen (to toll for peace) was a phrase popularly used for ringing the Angelus.

MANNER OF RINGING.—With regard to the manner of ringing the Angelus it seems sufficient to note that the triple stroke repeated three times with a pause between seems to have been from the very beginning. In the fifteenth-century constitutions of Syon monastery it is directed that the lay brother "shall toll the Ave bell nine strokes at three times, keeping the space of one Pater and Ave between each three tollings". Again a fifteenth-century bell at Erfurt bears the words: Cum ter reloco, pie Christiferam ter aveto (When I ring thrice, thrice devoutly greet the Mother of Christ). Still earlier, the statutes of Wells Cathedral, in 1331, direct that "three strokes should be struck at three several times upon the great bell in quick succession", and this shortly before curfew. Similarly, at Lerida in Spain, in 1308, the bishop directs that "after Complin and as the shades of night are falling" the bell is to be pealed three times with intervals between (Villanueva, Viage, XVI, 323), while the faithful are directed on hearing the bell to fall on their knees and recite Ave Maria.

Angelus Silesius (Johannes Scheffer), courtier, poet, controversialist, the son of a Lutheran Polish nobleman, b. in Breslau in 1624; d. 9 July, 1677. He took the degree of doctor of philosophy and medicine, in Padua, in 1648, became court physician to the prince of Oels, in Silesia, was received into the Catholic Church in 1653, taking at confirmation the name of Angelus, to which he added the sur- name Silesius (Silesian), by which he is known in the history of literature. In 1661 he was ordained priest and retired to the monastery of the Knights of the Cross in Breslau, where he died. His fortune he gave to pious and charitable institutions. With the Jesuits Spee and Balde, he was one of the few distinguished poets that Germany produced in an age of poetical barrenness and debased taste. He pub-ished, in 1657, the two postical works on which his fame rests. "The Soul's Spiritual Delight" (Heilige Seelelust) is a collection of more than two hundred religious songs, many of them of great beauty, which have found their way not only into Catholic, but even into Protestant hymn books. The "Cherubic Pilgrim" (Der Cerubinische Wandersmann) in a collection of the sixteenth century contains a wealth of full of deep religious thought expressed in epigrammatic form. A small number of these couplets seem to savour of quietism or pantheism. They ought to be interpreted in an orthodox sense, for Angelus Silesius was not a pantheist. His prose writings are of more spiritual value than his poems. He composed with the ecclesiastical "Imprimatur," and, in his preface, the author himself explains his "paradoxes" in an orthodox sense, and repudiates any future pantheistic interpretation. In 1663 he began the publication of his fifty-five controversial tracts against the various Protestant sects. Of these, the first two, selected thirty-nine which he published in two folio vols. under the title of "Ecclesiologia."

Anger, desire of vengeance. Its ethical rating depends upon the quality of the vengeance and the quantity of the passion. When these are in conformity with the prescriptions of balanced reason, anger is not a sin. It is rather a praiseworthy thing and justifiable with a proper zeal. It becomes sinful when it is sought to wreak vengeance upon one who has not deserved it, or to a greater extent than it has been deserved, or in conflict with the dispositions of law, or from an improper motive. The sin is then in a general sense mortal as being opposed to justice and charity. It may, however, be venial if the punishment aimed at is but a trifling one or because of lack of full deliberation.

Likewise, anger is sinful when there is an undue vehemence in the passion itself, whether inwardly or outwardly. Ordinarily it is then accounted a venial sin unless the excess be so great as to go counter seriously to the love of God or of one's neighbour.

Angers, Diocese of (Andegovum), comprises the territory embraced in the department of Maine and Loire. It was a suffragan see of the Archdiocese of Tours under the old régime as well as under the Concordat. The first Bishop known in history was Poblet, who, when present in 372, at the election of the Bishop of Tours, made a determined stand against the nomination of St. Martin. The legend concerning the earlier episcopate of a certain Auxilius is connected with the cycle of legends that centre about St. Firminus of Amiens and is contradicted in the tradition anterior to the thirteenth century. Among the illustrious names of the Diocese of Angers during the first centuries of its existence are those of St. Maurilius, disciple of St. Martin, and at an earlier period hermit of Chalones, who made a vigorous stand against idolatry, and died in 427; Thalassius, consecrated bishop in 515, who has left a brief but valuable compendium of canon law, consisting of the decisions of the councils of the province of Tours; St. Albinus (sixth century); St. Licinius formerly Count of Anjou, and bishop during the early part of the seventh century. As for the tradition that St. Renatus, who had been raised from the dead by St. Martin, was Bishop of Angers for some time shortly before 450, it bases its claims to credibility on a late life of St. Maurilius written in 905 by the deacon Archinal, and circulated under the name of Gregory of Tours, and it seems to have no real foundation. Among the Bishops of Angers in modern times were Cardinal de la Balue (1467) confined by Louis XI in an iron cage (1469-80) for his negotiations with Charles the Bold; the Jansenist, Henri Arnauld (1649-93); Monseigneur Freppel (1870-91), who had a seat in the Chamber of Deputies, and warmly defended religious interests; Monseigneur Mathieu (1893-1917), the cardinal of the Curie, and an ardent member of the French Academy. The cathedral of St. Maurice, a majestic structure without side aisles, dates from the twelfth century and exhibits the characteristic type of Angevin or Plantagenet architecture. During the Middle Ages Angers was a flourishing monastic city with six great monasteries. St. Aignan, founded by St. Germain, was the predecessor of St. Serge by Clovis II; St. Julien, St. Nicholas and Ronceray, founded by Count Foulques Nerra, and All Saints, an admirable structure of the twelfth century. In 1219 Pope Callixtus II went in person to Angers to assist at the second consecration of the church attached to the Abbey of Ronceray. The Diocese of Angers includes Fontevrault, an abbey founded at the close of the eleventh century by Robert d'Arbrissel but which did not survive the Revolution. The cloister and the old abbey church containing the tombs of the four Plantagenets have great archaeological value. The ruins of St. Maurilius constitute the memory of the former metropolitan abbey of that name. In 1244, a university was founded at Angers for the teaching of canon and civil law. In 1432 faculties of theology, medicine, and art were added. This university was divided into six "nations", and survived up to the time of the Revolution. In consequence of the law of 1875, giving liberty in the matter of higher education, Angers again became the seat of a Catholic university. The Congregation of the Good Shepherd (Bon Pasteur), which has houses in all parts of the world, has its mother-house at Angers by virtue of a papal brief of 1855. Berengarius, the heresiarch, condemned for his doctrines on the Holy Eucharist, was Archdeacon of Angers about 1039, and for some time found a protector in the person of Eusebius Bruno, Bishop of Angers. Bernier, who played a great rôle in the wars of La Vendée and in the negotiations that led to the Concordat, was curé of St. Land in Angers. At this time Angers comprised 514,058 inhabitants, 37 cures or parishes of the first-class, 377 parishes of the second-class and 129 vicariates with salaries formerly paid by the State.

Angers, University of.—The University of Angers is, probably, a development of the cathedral school of that city. Early in the eleventh century this school became famous under the direction of Marbodus, afterwards Bishop of Rennes, and of Tibur, afterwards Bishop of Angers, both pupils of the renowned canonist, Fulbert de Chartres. It was enlarged in 1229 by an influx of students, many of them Englishmen, from the University of Paris, who sought in Angers a shelter from the direct control of the King of France. (See PARIS, UNIVERSITY OF.) Angers then became a centre of erudition in law, and a studium generale, although it was officially recognized as such only in 1337, by an episcopal ordinance. It received in 1364 from King Charles V a charter granting the same privileges as those enjoyed by the University of Orleans. It was only in 1492 that a Bull of Eugenius IV. established faculties of theology and medicine, and arts to the faculty of canon and civil law. This organisation continued until the French Revolution. After the National Assembly had granted to all freedom of teaching (1 July, 1875), the French bishops decided to found five Catholic universities, and Angers.
thanks to Bishop Freppel, was chosen for the western portion of France, including the Dioceses of Angers, Rennes, Laval, Le Mans, Angoulême, Tours, and Poitiers. The university then took the title of "Facultés Catholiques de l'Ouest". It comprises the faculties of letters, of sciences, and of law, and a superior school of agriculture, with a teaching staff of 45 professors and from 200 to 300 students, most of whom are laymen belonging to the faculty of law. Angers was a favorite among the faculty in the past. Monsieur Sauve, author of numerous theological and philosophical works, Father Billot, now a professor in the Gregorian University at Rome, Father Antoine, author of a remarkable course of social economy, while it still retains Monsieur Legendre, and the biblical geologist, distinguished novelist, René Bazin. The University publishes the "Revue des Facultés Catholiques de l'Ouest" and a "Bulletin des Facultés Catholiques de l'Ouest".

Engraves, Notre Dame des (Our Lady of the Angels), a miraculous shrine near Lurs, France, containing a crypt (Sainte Chapelle) which tradition dates back to an early period. Archaeological finds, inscriptions, and the records left by antiquaries give evidence that this was once the site of a Roman city and a station termed in ancient itineraries Alnumum (founded 150 B.C.). Situated as it was on a Roman road connecting cities which are believed to have been evangelized at an early period, Alumum probably received the Faith at the same time. There is an ancient tradition that one of the first disciples of Christ erected an oratory here in honor of the Mother of God, and that it took the name Alnumum, later contracted into Aulum. Though several chapels were built on this site and destroyed, an ancient tablet survived all calamities. On the occasion of a cure wrought before this tablet (2 August, 1665) a choir of angels, it is said, was heard singing; on the repetition of the marvel the following year the name of the shrine was changed to Our Lady of Angels, and it was placed in charge of the Recollect Fathers of St. Francis. In 1752 Bishop de Sizeron of Sion appointed the feast of the Holy Name of Mary, making this sanctuary a centre of the devotion. In 1791 the religious were expelled, and the church despoiled. On the reopening of the churches the pilgrimages recommenced, and still continue. The most important of them takes place on 2 August.

Angilbert, Saint, Abbot of Saint-Riquier, d. 18 February, 814. Angilbert seems to have been brought to this abbey, where he was pupil and friend of the great German scholar Alcuin. He was intended for the ecclesiastical state and must have received minor orders early in life, but he accompanied the young King Pepin to Italy in 782 in the capacity of primicerius palatii, a position much envied. In 786 he was elected abbot of the Benedictine monastery of Saint-Riquier. In the academy of men of letters which rendered Charlemagne's court illustrious Angilbert was known as Homer, and portions of his works, still extant, show that his skill in verse was considerable. He was several times sent as envoy to the pope, and it is charged against him that he identified himself with the hereditary life of Charlemagne. He joined in the controversy on images. In 790 he was named Abbot of Centula, later known as Saint-Riquier, in Picardy, and by the help of his powerful friends he not only restored or rebuilt the monastery in a very sumptuous fashion, but endowed it with a precious library of 200 volumes. In the year 808 he had the honour of receiving Charlemagne as his guest. It seems probable that Angilbert at this period (whether he was yet a priest is doubtful) was leading a very worldly life. The circumstances are not clear, but modern historians consider that Angilbert undoubtedly had an intimate friendship with Charlemagne's unmarried daughter Bertha, and became by her the father of two children, one of whom was the well-known chronicler Nithard. This intrigue of Angilbert's, sometimes regarded as a marriage, has been disputed by Hénecque and others, but is now generally admitted. To remember that the popular canonizations of that age were very informal and involved little investigation of past conduct or virtue. It is, however, stated by Angilbert's twelfth-century biographer that the abbot before his death did bitter penance for this "marriage", and the historian Nithard, in the same passage in which he claims Angilbert for his father, also declares that Angilbert's body was found incorrupt some years after his burial. Angilbert has been acclaimed as the author of a fragment of an epic poem on Charlemagne and Leo III, but the authorship is disputed. On the other hand, Mené believes that he has preserved in certain portions of the famous "Annales Lorschenses".

He entered the Society of Jesus in 1765, and after the suppression of the Jesuits retired to Polotak. Angiolini has left after him many valuable works in his scholarship. He is the author of a Polish grammar for the use of Italians; he wrote original poems in Italian, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and several comedies in Polish, and a translation from the Greek into Italian in three octavo volumes of Josephus Flavius (Florence, 1771). Angiolini also translated into his mother tongue the Electa, Eadius, and Antigone of Sophocles (Rome, 1782). Other works of Angiolini are an Italian translation of Thucydides, incomplete, and a Polish translation of Sophocles.

Anglesa, The Priory of, Cambridgeshire, England, was founded in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Nicholas for a community of Austin Canons, by Henry I. Dugdale was unable to find any charter of foundation; but a deed cited by him in an appendix, with remarks, appears to be the charter election ceded by Elizabeth de Burgh, Lady de Clare, to the canons in 1333, lends some support to the opinion of Leland and Speed that Richard de Clare was a founder, or at least a patron, of the house, as was also Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, in the reign of Henry V. In information with regard to this priory is scanty. No register of the house is extant. There are some remains of Anglesa Priory in the back part of a mansion-house, they are found to differ indeed in the text, but to be entirely alike in the essential character of the "forms" appointed to accompany the imposition of hands, and that is to say, to signify this part of the order to be imparted, and supplicate Almighty God to bestow upon the candidate the divine gifts necessary for his state. In the Western Church, though there are traces of a now obsolete "form" anciently employed in parts of Gaul, the form of the Roman Pontifical is the only one that has persisted, and it quickly passed into universal use. This form of prayer, Deus honorum omnium, which can be found in the "Pontificale Romanum," its earliest appearance in writing is in the so-called "Leoneum Sacramentary," referred by Duchesne to the sixth century; that it should appear there is proof positive that it must have been in existence for some time previously, at least as orally preserved, the force of which proof is greatly strengthened by the testimony to the conservatism of the Roman Church which we have from Pope Innocent I. For this Pope, writing in A. D. 416, to Deceiutius, Bishop of Eugubium, complains that "if but a few years ago a man was ordained to preserve ecclesiastical ordinances as they were handed down to us by the Blessed Apostles, no diversity, no variety would be found in the very orders and consecrations themselves," but adds, "Who does not know and consider that what was delivered to the Roman Church by St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and to this day kept (by it), ought to be observed by all, and that no practice should be substituted or added without being sanctioned by authority or precedent." When we trace downwards the history of this Roman rite we find that the conservative principle enunciated by St. Innocent has been faithfully followed. Thus Morinus, a great authority, writes, "We deem it necessary for the reader to know that the modern Roman Pontifical contains all that was in the earlier Pontificals, but that the earlier Pontificals do not contain all that is in the modern Roman Pontifical. For some things have been added to the recent Pontificals, for various pious and religious reasons, which are wanting in all the ancient editions. And the more recent Pontificals are, the more these additions obtrude themselves. But this is a wonderful and impressive fact, that in all the volumes, ancient, modern, and modern, in the form of ordinance as regards words and as regards ceremonies, the later books omit nothing that was present in the older. Thus the modern form of ordinance differs neither in word nor in ceremony from that used by the ancient Fathers." Among the additions which Morinus has in mind as having been made during the early Middle Ages, the tradition of the instruments, that is, of the paten and chalice in the case of the priesthood, and that of the book of the Gospels in the case of the episcopate, are the most important. Indeed, these drew to themselves so much attention that for many centuries they and the rites which go with them were regarded by many to be more essential than the imposition of hands and the prayer, Deus honorum. Still there was never any danger that the prevalence of these theological views would affect the validity of the ordinations given, for the simple reason that the principle of never omitting anything was rigidly accorded to.

The Origin of the Anglican Succession.—It was this venerable ordination rite, as preserved in the English varieties of the Roman Pontifical, which was in use in the country when Henry VIII began his assaults on the ancient religion. He did not himself personally touch the sacraments, but, by the aid of Cranmer and his associates who, under the rule of Somerset and Northumberland, were engaged in remodelling the whole fabric of the Church of...
England to suit their extreme Protestant conceptions. These men pronounced the ancient forms to be utterly superstitious and requiring to be replaced by others more in conformity with the simplicity of the Gospel. Hence the origin of the Edwardine Ordinal, which, under the sanction of the Act of 1550, was drawn up by six prelates and six others of the realm learned in God's law, by the King's Majesty to be appointed and assigned. This new rite underwent some further changes two years later, and was thus brought into the form in which it remained till the year 1662, when it was somewhat improved by the addition of clauses defining the nature of the ordination. As the only lasting influence on the country, we may disregard it here, as we may also disregard, as of less consequence, the rite for the ordination of deacons. In the Ordinal of 1552 the "essential form", that is, the form adjoined to the imposition of hands, was, in the case of the priesthood, merely this: "Receive the Holy Ghost. Whose sins thou dost forgive they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain they are retained; and be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of His Holy Sacraments"; and these other words, whilst the Bible was being delivered, "Take authority to preach the Word of God and to administer the Holy Sacraments to the congregation, where thou shalt be so appointed." In the case of the episcopate it was, "Take the Holy Ghost, and remember that thou stir up the grace of God which is in thee by imposition of hands, for God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of sobriety; and these others, while the Bible was delivered, "Give heed unto reading, exhortation, and doctrine. Think upon these things contained in this book. . . . Be to the flock of Christ a shepherd not a wolf; feed them, devour them not; hold up the weak, heal the sick, bind together the broken, bring again the outcasts, seek the lost. . . ." The additions made in 1662 were, in the case of the priesthood (after the words, "receive the Holy Ghost"), "for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands"; and in the case of the episcopate (after the words, "Take the Holy Spirit") "for a bishop in the Church of God now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands". By this new Ordinal seven bishops and a number of inferior clergy were made during the last two years of Edward VI. On the accession of Mary in 1553 it was dispersed into the Papists and seduced. On the accession of Elizabeth in 1558 its use was restored, and has continued (with the addition of the defining clauses since 1662) down to the present day. The Anglican clergy are thus the creation of this Ordinal, and, primarily, the validity of their orders is dependent on its sufficiency—that is, on its sufficiency in its earlier form, for if that be wanting, the Apostolical succession must have lapsed long before 1662, and could not be resuscitated by the additions then made. It was on this consideration of the character of the Edwardine rite that the Holy See based its definitive decree of 1896. Still, for the complete understanding of the history of the subject it is necessary to know something of the circumstances under which Archbishop Parker was raised to the episcopate, and of the further defects which the Anglican succession has been thought to inherit from its relation to the same. This Dr. Matthew Parker was chosen by Queen Elizabeth to be her first Archbishop of Canterbury, and received his consecration by the death of Cardinal Pole, and all the other sees of the kingdom, with a single exception, were vacant likewise, either because of the death of their predecessors, or because the bishops who survived were, in the eyes of the Government, deprived for refusing to conform to the new order of things. The Queen intended through Parker to raise up a new hierarchy, but a difficulty confronted her. When consecrated himself, Parker could consecrate his intended colleague; but how was he to get consecrated himself? None of the Catholic bishops still living would consent to perform the ceremony, and in default of them the Queen had recourse to foreign prelates, among them the three whose names are known to history—reputation, three of whom (William Barlow, John Scory, and Miles Coverdale) had been deprived by Mary, and the fourth (John Hodgkins) was a turncoat who had been consecrated suffragan Bishop of Bedford in 1537 and had consistently changed his religious belief. The time she had given the lead, and he, with the others as his assistants, consecrated Parker, 17 December, 1559, in the private chapel at Lambeth, using the Edwardine Ordinal. Three days later Parker, with the aid of Barlow, Scory, and Hodgkins, consecrated four others at Bow Church. From these ancestors the whole Anglican succession is sprung. Was, then, the consecration of Parker a valid act? This is the other ground of dispute round which, as a matter of history, the controversy has gathered.
isolated cases, the documentary evidence for which is deficient. Moreover, Leo XII, in his Bull "Apostolicae Curae", speaks of many such cases as having been formally referred to the Holy See at different times, with the result that the practice of re-ordaining was invariably observed. Two of these cases were, in 1684 and 1704, the second of which attracted a certain amount of attention. It was that of John Clement Gordon, who had received all the Anglican orders formally to inclose the Episcopal rite and from the hands of the prelates who derived their orders from the Anglican succession. The decision was that, if he would minister as a priest, he must receive the priesthood and all previous orders afresh.

The History of the Controversy.—Though such was the practice sanctioned by the Holy See for dealing with Anglican orders administratively, the Holy See did not, as it usually does not, publish the motives of its decision. The duty of vindicating its action in regard to these orders was thus left to the zeal and industry of private theological writers, whose methods are too unsatisfactory to the facts they could and apply to them the same theological tests as the Church authorities were known to recognize. In this way there came into existence that series of controversial treatises on either side which covered the whole period from the beginning of the seventeenth century to the present day. The Holy See has given not merely a final decision, but one supported by the motives on which it is based, these ancient treatises have lost a good deal of their interest. A very brief account of them may therefore suffice here, but the reader who requires more may be referred to the pages of Canon Eustout. That the controversy did not begin till early in the reign of James I is, perhaps, explicable on the ground that the first generation or two of the Anglican clergy were too Zwinglian or Calvinistic to care about having Apostolical succession. But in 1588-89 Bancroft, in a celebrated sermon at Paul's Cross, took up the higher ground, which was powerfully maintained a few years after by Bilson and Hooker, the pioneers of the long line of Jacobean and Caroline divines. Then the writers on the Catholic side began to controvert this position, but in the first instance not very happily. The circumstances of Parker's controversy had been almost unknown and were unknown to the Catholic party, who accordingly gave credence to a piquant rumour called "The Nag's Head story". This was to the effect that, as no Catholic bishop could be got to consecrate Parker, he and others, when together at the Nag's Head in Cheapside, knelt down before Scory, the deprived Bishop of Chichester, who placed a Bible on the neck of each, saying at the same time, "Receive the power of preaching the Word of God sincerely"; and that this strange ceremony was the fountain-head of the whole Anglican succession. This story was first published by Kellison in 1605, in his "Sacra Officium", and was not calculated to add to the credit of other Catholic writers in the following years. To these Mason in his "Vindicatio Ecclesiae Anglicanae" replied on the Anglican side, in 1613, and was the first to call attention, at all events effectively, to the entry in Parker's "Register" of his consecration on 17 December, 1559, in the private chapel at Lambeth, and to the evidence of the Abbot, to clench this statement of Mason's, caused four Catholic priests, prisoners in the Tower, to be taken to Lambeth and there shown the "Register", on the genuineness of which they were invited to declare. An inspection under such circumstances (for they were all the time under the jealous eyes of seven Protestant bishops) was not calculated to convince, and Champney, who wrote in 1616, suggests, what was clearly the general opinion of the Catholics at the time, that the entry in question was a forgery. On one or two occasions previously it had apparently been seen by individual Catholics, but its existence was not connected with the history of the Church till Mason's book appeared, and then the fact that an appeal to it should not have been made by the Anglican party till so long after the reputed date of the occurrence seemed to be highly suspicious. Nor will these suspicions appear unnatural to anyone who reflects on the extraordinary efforts of the Elizabethan writers when challenged to say how their Metropolitan was consecrated; such as, for instance, was shown by Jewell in his reply to Harding's direct inquiries. Probably, however, the real motive of this reticence was in the reputation of the consecrators to whom Parker was driven to have recourse; for there can be no question, to use the words of Champney, that no one who knew all the lines of converging evidence that tell in its favour, but that his consecration did take place on the day in and the manner described in the "Register", and that the latter was a contemporary document. On the other hand, the Nag's Head story was supported by the facts as almost incredible in itself to be accepted as historical—although to say this is by no means the same as saying that those who brought it forward in the first instance, or maintained it during several generations, were acting dishonestly. It is, however, an error to assume that because the Roman Catholics arrested their case against Anglican orders exclusively on the spuriousness of the Lambeth "Register" or the truth of the Nag's Head story. On the contrary, although they intermingled some proofs like those mentioned which have had to be abandoned, it is wonderful how sound was the position they took up from the first in their general statement of the argument. Thus Champney, the first systematic writer on the Catholic side, directs his first and chief attack against all orders conveyed by the Edwardine Ordinal, whether in the reign of Edward VI or subsequently, and contests their validity on the ground of the insufficiently of the rite itself. Moreover, though inclining, with most of the theologians of his time, to hold that other ceremonies besides imposition of hands and the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost", were essential to validity, he gives due weight to the contrary opinion of Vasques, and takes up exactly the same position as was taken up by Morinus in regard to the practical case to be followed. "The determinate matter", he says, "and form of some sacraments—and, among others, of Holy Orders, ... are not so clearly and distinctly declared in the Councils and Fathers, but that various opinions, based on weighty reasons and authorities, have been held and defended with good probability of truth ... (But) the Church does not suffer any harm or loss (from this uncertainty) because she knows for certain that she has (in her rites) the true matter and form which Christ gave to His Apostles, although no one can define precisely what things and principles it consists in". It is obvious that it was not calculated to provide that there is no omission of any part of the (rite) which the Church is wont to use in administering her sacraments, and in which it is universally agreed that the true matter and form is contained. But if anyone were obstinately to follow his own opinion, and exclude all other things, actions, and forms which he refutes, the (4) Archbishop of Canterbury, such as he himself judges essential, he would render those sacraments untrustworthy, and would in consequence be inflicting on the Church a most serious harm." It is only when he comes to treat of Elizabethan orders in their relation to Archbishop Parker that Champney alleges other grounds of invalidity, and he then compiles his arguments under the following five heads—(1) the truth of the Nag's Head story; (2) the spuriousness of the Lambeth "Register"; (3) the want of episcopal character in Barlow, Parker's chief consecrator; (4) the insecurity of the rite used, in view of its many omissions; (5) the probability that it does not contain the essentials of a valid Ordinal. These are the same arguments which the subsequent writers debated and developed, except for a somewhat different emphasis. In the Catholic story, the necessity for became apparent not long after Champney's time.
For Champney, as we have seen, though without speaking too positively, contended for the necessity of other elements in the matter and form than the mere imposition of hands and the words attached to the "form" attached to the imposition of hands.
On these lines the controversy was continued in the latter part of the seventeenth century by Talbot and Lawgar on the Catholic side, and by Bramhall, Burnet, and Prideaux on the Anglican. At the commencement of the next century, in 1704, the case of John Clement Gordon, to which reference has already been made, was taken before the Holy See and examined. The result was to elicit from the Holy Office a formal re-affirmation of the necessity of re-ordering convert clergymen; nor was this decision motivated, as an incorrect publication of the decree by Le Quien suggested, by any acceptance of the argument. The story of the new rite, how-soever the nature of the Edwardine rite, a copy of which was procured and specially examined by the Sacred Congregation. A few years later the scene of the controversy shifted to France. The Abbé Renaudet wrote a "Mémoire", published in 1720, in which he re-examined orders and consistory of the "Popes" Head story, and of the novelty and insufficiency of the Anglican rite. He was answered shortly after by the Père Courayer, whose works in defence of Anglican orders, as coming from the Catholic side, called a great sensation in England, where the author was held in high favour; and later, when he had to leave France on a charge of unsound doctrine, he was invited over to this country and was given a pension by George II. The principal answer to Courayer was that of the Abbé Le Quien, whose "Nullité des ordinations anglicanes" appeared (Paris) in 1730, but Father John Constable, S.J., embodied a great prize in his "Examen des ordinations anglaises", an English work published very shortly after. In the nineteenth century, with the rise of the Tractarian party, and of the more Catholic ideas of the priesthood which it caused to prevail, the question of Anglican orders was felt to be of vital importance for the High Church party, and the controversy became proportionately more acute. As, too, the principle of historical evidence had by then come to be better understood, and the facilities for the study of documents were vastly improved, a series of works resulted which has considerably advanced our knowledge of the subject. Of these the most valuable on the Anglican side were Mr. A. W. Hadden's edition of Bramhall, and his own "Apostolical Succession in the Church of England", Dr. F. G. Lee's "Validity of the Holy Orders of the Church of England", and more recently
Mr. Denny's "Anglican Orders and Jurisdiction", the last being perhaps the most complete work that has appeared in defence of the orders. On this subject, Ewbank's "Queries of Anglican Orders Discussed" and Mr. W. A. Hutton's "Anglican Ministry" were the most noticeable.
The former, though it errs in giving away an important argument, through misconceiving the purport of a decision of the Holy Office, still bears the mark of thoroughness (though not of exhaustiveness) of investigation of many historical points; the latter is chiefly valuable for its exposition of the broader aspect under which Newman preferred to regard the subject.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENTS ON EITHER SIDE.—To some extent the proofs and arguments cast to and fro by the disputants have necessarily been indicated above, but it will be well to summarize them here as a preliminary to an account of the Bull
"Apostolicae Curae" (which see also s. v.).
1. Of the Nag's Head story nothing more need be said, as no person of intelligence now believes in it.
2. Nor is there any finality to the public rule indicated by Champney, still insists on the retention of the other ceremonies in all Western ordinations, the general tendency since the publication of Morinus's work has been to reject the Anglican rite mainly on the ground of the insufficiency of the "form" attached to the imposition of hands.
3. In regard to Barlow's case the following is now known: though there is no record of his consecration in the "Archiepiscopal Register", this only proves that the "Register" was very negligently kept; that there is no record in this "Register" of the consecrations of several other bishops, Gardiner included, yet no one doubts that these were validly consecrated; (4) that Barlow had a written inventory that Barlow could have gone on acting as bishop for over twenty years without attention having been called by some person or other to his want of consecration. The Catholic writers, on the other hand, point out that it is not merely the absence of just a single entry in Cranmer's "Register" which stands against him, but (1) the absence of an entire set of documents which should have borne reference to his consecration if it occurred; (2) the discovery of one document which is exceptionally worded, and so worded as apparently to provide for the avoidance of consecration; (3) the views of the non-necessity of consecration which Barlow himself expressed; (4)
the difficulty of assigning a date when the ceremony could have taken place; (5) and the likelihood that, as the King and Cranmer are known to have shared his views, he might have been able to keep his secret to himself and pass as a consecrated bishop.
Still the Catholic writers do not make these points against him, but only that it is not certain that he was, and hence, that orders derived from him, as are those of the Anglican clergy, must be considered doubtful, unless supplemented by a conditional ceremony.
4. For the sufficiency of the Anglican Rite, as it stood in the first century of its use, the defenders argue that, although it may have been undesirable to substitute this new rite for the ancient and venerable rite which preceded it, the change was within the competence of the Edwardine and Elizabethan authorities, since every national Church has authority to select its own rites and ceremonies, as long as such a rite is a remnant, as an element which, in the sacrament of the Universal Church, is essential to validity. To this it is replied that no evidence is forthcoming to show that any such authority has ever been recognized in national Churches; that, on the contrary, though local churches have at times added further prescriptions to the ancient hands on the altar to them from time immemorial, they have, as Morinus has told us, never ventured to subtract anything that was in previous use, fearing lest in so doing they might touch something which was essential.

To this the defenders reply that at least the Anglican rite has retained all that is to be found in the Roman Ordinary in its earliest known form, as well as in the Eastern ordinals, which the Holy See has ever recognized as valid; and that it must be held therefore to have retained all that can reasonably be claimed as necessary. But in the first place, though the course of theological opinion inclines to judge that the introduction of hands on the altar to the third place by the third prayer is a change from all the other sacraments and is unreasonable in itself, it is as if, writes Cardinal Segna (Revue Anglo-Romaine, 29 February, 1896), in a wedding ceremony, "the bride and bridegroom should stand at the altar and in many an eloquent phrase declare their mutual love, but when the moment has arrived for pronouncing the decisive word 'I will', should shut their lips in stubborn silence." And in the fourth place, the remote context, instead of determining the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost," to signify the bestowal of a true priesthood, determines them to an exactly opposite sense. It is true that the tradition of the other nations of the world and of the Reformers was that in places, but, as explained at the head of this article, these names at the Reformation were often used in a sense from which all notion of the priesthood and mystical powers had been drained off. That was the sense in which they were intended by those who framed and authorized the Edwardine rites is proved by the statements of classical Anglican writers like Hooker, who defend the retention of the old names on the plea that "as for the people, when they hear the name [priest] it draweth no more their minds to any cogitation of sacrifice than the name of a senator or of an alderman causeth them to think upon old age, or to imagine that every one so termed must needs be ancient because years were respected in the nomination of both" (Eccles. Polity, V, lxxviii, 2). There is, moreover, the broad fact that, when the old and the new rite are compared, it appears that the difference lies just in this: that the framers of the old rite regarded the ceremony in the "form" accompanying the imposition of hands as a means of consecration, whereas in the Anglican version it was a means of consecration to a parish clergy as well as to the consecration of a bishop. And so, too, with the priesthood, though in a somewhat less degree.

For here the words of the "form" are, "Receive the Holy Ghost; whose sins thou dost forgive they are forgiven, and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained. And be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of His Holy Sacraments"; whereas the power to forgive sins does not discriminate between the priest and the bishop, and besides is only a secondary and incidental, not the primary and essential, function of the priestly ordination. The defenders would have their further rejoinder. It is not necessary they contend, that the nature of the order imparted should be defined by the words of the "form" taken by itself alone; it is sufficient if the meaning of this "form" is determined to a definite sense by the context of the other prayers and ceremonies which precede or follow; and they point out that in the titles of the rites—"The form of ordering Priests" and "The form of consecrating an Archbishop or Bishop"—in the presentation of the candidates, and in several of the prayers, the needful mention of the order to be imparted is declared. Moreover, they refer to a decision of the Holy Office, 9 April, 1704, in regard to some Abyssinian ordinations, as witnessing that the Holy See itself has recognized the words, "Take the Holy Ghost" to be sufficient, when said with the imposition of hands, if the remainder of the rite is sufficiently determinate. But, in the first place, as regards this Abyssinian case, its nature has been mistranslated. It was not published by Father Brandi, in his "Roma e Canterbury". In the second place, none of the rites, ancient or modern, which the Holy See has ever recognized lends any support to this theory of an indeterminate form determined by a remote context.

5. According to Catholic doctrine, it is necessary for validity that the minister of a sacrament should not only employ a proper form, but should also have a proper intention. Thus Pole, in his instructions to the Bishop of Norwich (which Leo XIII cites in his Bull of condemnation), tells him to treat as not validly consecrated those pretending bishops in whose previous consecration ceremonies the form and not the substance of the Church's ministration of grace was attempted, as Ridley expressed it, "the form of a table shall more move the simple people from the superstitions of the Popish mass unto the right use of the Lord's supper." glican prelates of any generation, since, according to theologians like Bellarmine, even an heretical minister's intention is sufficient as long as it is a general intention that Christ does, whatever this may be. But, it is replied, it is impossible not to recognize that the minister's intention is an essential element. Why, for instance, is there a valid consecration at Mass when the priest pronounces the words, "This is my Body", but not when he pronounces the same words in the presence of bread which reading from St. Matthew's Gospel in a community refectory? Still the Church trusts to the Providence of God to watch over all such defective intentions as are not externally manifested, and assumes that the minister's intention is correct in every serious administration of the rites, unless he is—like Cranmer, for instance—a person of heterodox opinions. Where, however, a defective intention is manifested externally, she must deal with it, and that is what has happened in respect to the Anglican ordinances. The rite, as has been explained, was altered in Edward VI's time to give expression to a heterodox belief concerning the nature of Holy Orders, and was likewise adopted in this sense by the Elizabethan authorities. When, then, they proceeded to administer it, the only reasonable interpretation of their action was that they conformed their intention to their rite, and that, too, by a Catholic spirit, they viewing the act as one of a twofold ground: the defect of the form and the defect of the intention.

6. In modern times the Anglican clergy often appeal, as confirmatory of the above doctrinal and historical considerations, or even as having an independent value, to what may be called an experiential argument. "It is all very well", they say, "to bring forward these external arguments to discredit our orders. But we have an internal testimony which appeals to us more powerfully, namely our intimate consciousness of the spiritual benefit we experience when we make use of the sacraments of which our orders are the source to us. If they were invalid orders, how is it conceivable that God should so bless their use to those who have recourse to them?" This is an argument which no one has stated more forcibly than Cardinal Newman in the Third Lecture of his 'Anglican Difficulties', where, too, he asked what could be the value of the sacraments, if the community were not convinced of the truth of their efficacy, if the church were not convinced of the truth of their efficacy, if the church were not convinced of the truth of their efficacy? Here it will be enough to say (1) that for those who bring it forward it proves too much, since Wesleyans and others could claim as much, and on the same grounds, for their own ordinances, which no one supposes to be dependent for their efficacy on the validity of an Apostolical succession; (2) that it founding the efficacy of a rite ex opere operato, or as an appointed channel of sacramental grace, and its efficacy ex opere operantis, or as a stimulus to the piety of well-disposed hearts; (3) that the rule of the Catholic Church is, while by no means undervaluing the evidential power of internal experience, to place it in the rear of the test of divine teaching by applying the test of her own divinely authenticated external teaching.

THE BULL OF LEO XIII.—From the foregoing account it can readily be understood why the practice of re-ordaining convert clergymen has subsisted. Anglicans, however, have always resisted this practice, and maintained that the Holy See could never have sanctioned it had the facts been properly presented. In 1894 this contention was pressed upon the notice of some French ecclesiastics by some Anglican leaders who were discussing with them the prospects of corporate reunion. The result was that the French twenty-two bishops, in their notice of Leo XIII, assuring him that this impression prevailed among many well-disposed Anglicans, who felt that they were being unfairly treated. The Pope was moved by what he heard, and determined that he would have the whole question re-investigated thoroughly. Accordingly, he selected eight clergymen who had shown special interest in the matter. His true concern, he said, was for the church, and of whom four were known to be disposed to recognize Anglican orders and four to be disposed to reject them. These he summoned to Rome and formed into a consultative commission under the presidency of Cardinal Mazzella. They were given access to all documents from the archives of the Vatican and the Holy Office which would throw light upon the points at issue, and they were bidden to sift the evidence on either side with all possible fulness and care. After sessions which lasted six weeks, the Commission was dissolved, and the acts of its discussions were laid before a judicial committee of cardinals. There the rite was re-examined, and after two months' study, in a special meeting under the presidency of the Pope, decided by a unanimous vote that Anglican orders were certainly invalid. After an interval for prayerful consideration of this vote, Leo XIII determined to adopt it and accordingly published his Bull 'Apostolicae Curae' on the 18th of September, 1896. In this Bull he begins by expressing his affectionate interest in the English people and his desire for their return to unity, and by reciting the circumstances which had led to the issue of this solemn decision. He then calls attention to the fact that the rejection of ordination in the same manner by his predecessors. In the reign of St. Pius IX, and by Leo XIII, were engaged in reconciling the kingdom, letters of direction were sent to the latter, which, as their text shows, required him to treat those who had received orders by a form other than the 'the accustomed form of the Church'—a phrase which, says Pope Leo, can only refer to the Edwardine Ordinal—as needing to be ordained or consecrated afresh. At that time, then, the Holy See judged the Anglican form to be insufficient, and that it persisted in this adverse judgment is manifest from the fact that for more than three centuries it has sanctioned the practice of re-ordaining absolutely the holders of orders obtained through this form; for 'since in the Church it has always been a firm and established rule that the sacrament of Order ought not to be repeated, it never could have silently acquiesced in and tolerated such a custom'; had it deemed the Anglican form to be regular, it might have acted otherwise. Moreover, it continues the Bull, the Holy See not only acquiesced in the practice, but on many occasions gave it renewed sanction by express judgments, to two of which, the second being that of John Clement Gordon, it calls particular attention, repudiating in connexion with this latter the allegation that the rejection of Gordon's previous orders had been prompted by any other cause than the character of the Anglican rite (a copy of which was procured and examined by the judges), or even that in judging of the rite the essential point considered was the omission in it of any tradition of the instruments. The Bull proceeds to point out that the practice of bearing the title of 'Apostolicus Curae' forms the first part of the 'Apostolicus Curae', and in view of it Leo XIII observes that the question could not really be considered still open. He has wished, however, "to help men of good will by shewing them the greatest consideration and charity," and he proceeds to expound the principles on which the Anglican Rite is judged by himself, as well as by his predecessors, to lack the conditions of validity. "In the examination", he says, "of any rite for effecting and administering of Sacraments, distinction is rightly made between the part which is ceremonial and that which is essential, usually called the 'material' and 'formal' matter by the theologians. The matter of the New Law, as sensible and efficient signs of invisible grace, ought both to signify the grace which they effect, and effect the grace which they signify."
Although the signification ought to be found in the whole essential rite, that is to say, in the ‘matter’ and ‘form’, it still pertains chiefly to the ‘form’. For, the ‘matter’ is the part which is not determined by itself, but which is determined by the ‘form’. And this appears still more clearly in the Sacrament of Orders, the matter of which, in so far as it makes this rite be signified, is the imposition of hands, which indeed by itself signifies nothing definite, and is equally used for several orders and for confirmation. But the words which until recently were commonly held by Anglicans to constitute the proper form of priestly ordination, namely the Holy Ordinal, not only in the least definitely express the sacred Order of Priesthood, or its grace and power, which is chiefly the power of consecrating and of offering the true Body and Blood of the Lord’ (Council of Trent, Sess. XXIII, de Sacr. Ord., Can. 1) in that sacrifice which is no mere commemoration of the sacrifice of the Cross’ (ibid., Sess. XXXIII, de Sacr. Miss., Can. 3) . . . The same holds good of episcopal consecration. For to the formula, ‘Receive the Holy Ghost’, not only were the words ‘for the office and work of a bishop’ etc., added at a later period, but even these, as we shall presently state, must be understood in different senses, and bear in the Catholic rite’. In this passage the Bull sanctions the principle that a sacramental rite must signify definitely what it is to effect, and that this definite signification must be in the essential ‘form’ or words in proximate connection with the ‘matter’; also that, in the case of Holy Order, what must be definitely signified is, in the ordination of priests, the Order of the Priesthood or its grace and power, and similarly in the consecration of bishops; the grace and power in each having reference to the accomplishment of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. This principle accepted, it follows at once that the Anglican Ordinal, at least as it stood till 1662, lacks the essential conditions of sufficiency. But the Bull further examines how far the remainder of this Ordinal, or the circumstances under which it came into being, can be held to determine the ambiguity of the ‘essential form’. And here it sanctions the judgment of the Council of Trent, or its decree: ‘The history’, it says, ‘of that time is sufficiently eloquent as to the animus of the authors of the Ordinal against the Catholic Church; as to the abettors whom they associated with themselves from heterodox sects; and as to the end in view. . . . Under their return from the Council of Trent, it is obvious they corrupted the liturgical order in many ways to suit the errors of the Reformers. For this reason, in the whole Ordinal not only is there no clear mention of the sacrifice, but every trace of these things which had been in such prayers of the Catholic rite as they had not entirely rejected, was deliberately removed and struck out. In this way the native character—or spirit, as it is called—of the Ordinal clearly manifests itself. Hence, if, vitiated in its origin, it was wholly insufficient to confer orders, it was impossible that in the course of time it should become sufficient, since it remained always what it was (i.e. of violated origin). For once a new rite has been initiated, in which, as we have seen, the Sacrament of Orders is adulterated or denied, and from which all idea of consecration and sacrifice has been rejected, the formula, ‘Receive the Holy Spirit’ (the Spirit, namely, which is infused into the soul of the recipient of the Sacrament of Orders), is no longer good, and so the words ‘for the office and work of a priest or bishop’, and the like, no longer hold good, but remain as words without the reality which Christ instituted.’ Likewise in regard to the defect of intention, the Bull endorses the judgment adverse to Anglican ordination which Catholic writers had always urged. ‘When anyone has rightly and seriously made use of the due ‘form’ and ‘matter’ requisite for effecting or conferring the sacrament, he is considered by that very fact to do what the Church does. On this principle rests the doctrine that a sacrament is truly conferred by the ministry of one who is a heroic or unbaptized, provided the requisites of the rite be changed, with the manifest intention of introducing another rite not approved by the Church, and of rejecting what the Church does, and what, by the institution of Christ, belongs to the nature of a sacrament, then it is clear that not only is the form of intention wanting to the sacraments, but that the intention is adverse to, and destructive of, the sacrament.’ These are the defects in the Anglican Succession, on the existence of which the Bull bases its decision. It will be noticed that they are of the most fundamental kind, and are independent of any defects that may be thought to arise out of the omission in the Ordinal of a tradition of the instruments, or of the doubt about Barlow’s consecration. To examine into the nature and bearing of the latter when a sufficient basis for a certain conclusion had been supplied by the former would have been a superfluous and unprofitable task, and for that reason it seems best that even for the private inquirer these other considerations will retain in the future the interest they had in the past. At the same time the Bull has in no way pronounced them to be frivolous or unfounded, as has been suggested. It remains to give the formal definition of the Bull, which is in the following terms: ‘Wherefore, strictly adhering in this matter to the decrees of the Pontiffs Our Predecessors, and confirming them most fully, and, as it were, renewing them by Our authority, of Our own motion and certain knowledge We pronounce and declare that ordinations carried out according to the Anglican rite have been and are absolutely null and void.’ The publication of the ‘Apostolicae Curae’ caused, as was to be expected, much excitement in England; nor did the Anglican party, for whose sake it was intended, show any disposition to accept either its form or its contents. It was at once condemned, to have created a crisis sufficiently serious to require that it should be met by some formal reply. Accordingly, in the early part of 1897 there appeared, in both a Latin and an English edition, an Answer of the Archbishops of England to the Apostolicae Curae, which was addressed to the whole body of Bishops of the Catholic Church’. This answer, which came to be known by its Latin name of the ‘Responsio’, is a distinctly Low-Church document, of which the leading contention is that the Pope had misjudged the Anglican Ordinal through failure to recognize the right of national Churches to reform and revise their own formulas, and by applying to this Ordinal a false and untrustworthy rule. The true rule to which an ordinal should be conformed, it urges, is the rule of Holy Scripture, and it is in this rule that the Reformers sought their guidance. They found an enormous accretion of sacerdotalist ideas embodied in the words and ceremonies of the older Ordinal, whereas, in the New Testament, the sacerdotalist conception of the Christian ministry was altogether absent. And, on the other hand, they found that the aspects of the Christian ministry which had laid the most stress—those, namely, which concerned the pastor’s duty to go forth in His Master's name as His steward, His watchman, His messenger, to tend the sheep, and, if need be, lay down his life for their sakes, to preach the word, to convert sinners, to remit offences in the Church, to render mutual services to one another, and much else of the same kind—were very insufficiency set forth in the Pontifical. Accordingly, in drawing up their new rites, they endeavoured as far as possible to accommodate the former rite and give prominence to the latter, while in their “forms” they assigned to the priesthood the words which, according to the New Testament, Our Lord used in promoting His Apostles to this office, and to the episcopate the words of St. Paul which “were believed to refer to the consecration of St. Timothy to be Bishop of Ephesus” (1 Cor. 4:17). In fulness of meaning, however, they could not reasonably be charged with having endangered the efficacy of their rite. This is in brief the defensive argument of the “Responsio.” But it also charges the Pope with having, in his zeal to condemn the orders of the Anglican Church, overlooked the contradictions in which he was involuntarily the position of his own Church. In condemning the Anglican “forms” as wanting in definite signification, he condemned, by implication, the orders of his own Church, since the Roman Pontifical in its pre-medieval text was not a whit more definite than the Elizabethan Anglican; and in attaching the same relative value to the imposition of hands in the connected words he was condemning by implication his predecessor, Eugenius IV, who attached that virtue to the tradition of instruments and the words connected therewith, not even making mention of imposition of hands among the requisites. One thing is clear by this, that while the pope is the other criticisms of the “Apostolicus Cura” which poured forth from the Anglican press, namely, that the character of the Bull and its arguments had been greatly misapprehended. Hence, Cardinal Vaughan and the English Catholic Bishops, in the early part of 1596-7, published a “Vindication of the Bull ‘Apostolica Cura,’ in reply to a letter addressed to them by the Anglican Archbishops of Canterbury and York.” In this “Vindication,” after some preliminary observations on the extrinsic reasons which the Bull had given for its decision, attention is called to the false standpoint from which the two Archbishops had judged the arguments of the Bull. In their “Responsio” they are mainly occupied with challenging the soundness of the principles on which the papal decision had been based. They urge that it rests on a false and unscriptural conception of the priesthood, and that, if this more scriptural conception were substituted, the decision must have been different. But this, the “Vindication” points out, is ignorantio elenchii. Of course the Pope considers that the Catholic conception of the priesthood is in conformity with Scripture; but that was not the question under consideration. The Anglican grievance was that those of their clergy who came over to us were re-ordained; and to complain of this was to contend that even on our principles their orders ought to be recognized; while no doubt the particular section of the Anglican communion which took most to heart this practice of re-ordination was in substantial agreement with our conception of the order. Hence the Holy See, in examining the question, necessarily assumed the validity of its own principles, and inquired only if they had been duly applied. The “Vindication”, however, to facilitate the understanding of the Pope’s reasons, sets itself to expand, explain, and elucidate by reference to the places in the Bull, of legal documents, gives only in a highly condensed form. It is not necessary here to epitomize the “Vindication,” but mention may be made of its study of the opinions in regard to the Eucharistic Presence, the Mass, and the priesthood of Cranmer and his followers, as likewise the same subjects expressed by a series of Anglican di-vines during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, which showed that the tradition initiated by Cranmer persisted.

The Authority of “Apostolicus Cura.”—The question has been raised whether the Korroachmentment of the Bull “Apostolica Cura” is or is not to be taken as an infallible utterance of the Holy See. But even if it were not it would not follow that it can be disregarded, and its eventual withdrawal confidently anticipated. What may be safely assumed is that it fixes the belief and practice of the Catholic Church in variebility. This sentence no doubt is not meant to signify when in his letter to Cardinal Richard, of 5 November, 1896, he declared that his “intention had been to pass a final judgment and settle (the question) forever” (absolute judicare et penitus dimittere), and that “Catholics were bound to receive (the judgment) with the fullest obedience as perpetuo firmam rationem, irremissivm.” Still, as a matter of speculative interest, it may be asked whether the definition is strictly infallible, and the answer may be stated shortly thus. It belongs to a class of ex cathedra utterances for which infallibility is claimed on the ground, not indeed, of the terms of the Vatican definition of the dogma, but of the consent of the Holy See, the consentient teaching of the theologians, as well as of the clearest deductions from the principles of faith. To understand what is meant it is necessary to bear in mind the distinction between a dogma and a dogmatic fact, the former being a doctrine of revealed truth, the latter a fact connected with a revealed doctrine that it would be impossible without inconsistency to assert the former and deny the latter. It may be urged that the Vatican Council merely defined that the Pope when speaking ex cathedra has “that infallibility which is inherent in the office of ex cathedra and in the exercise of the Supreme Pontiff in defining doctrine of faith and morals,” without going on to define the range of infallibility which Our Lord wished His Church to have. But it must be remembered (1) that the Vatican Council, had it not been forced to suspend its sittings by the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, intended to supplement this first definition by others which would have gone into details in regard to the object of infallibility; (2) that to suppose that Church authority can define a doctrine to be true, but cannot decide whether it is contained in or denied by any particular writing—such as an ordination rite—is to suppose that the power had been bestowed on the Church of Rome; (3) that since the time of Jansenius there has been a practical consensus theologorum in holding that infallibility does extend to dogmatic facts, a judgment which would undoubtedly bring this Bull within the category of infallible utterances.

Most of the leading works of Anglican Orders have been mentioned in the body of this article, but of recent date there are also the following: ON THE CATHOLIC SIDE: BARNES, THE Pope and the Ordinal (1890), a convenient collection of the documents concerned; RAYNELL, Ordinal of Edward VI (1870); in a later article in Tablet (Feb. 19, 1895), November 1, 1895; and February—July, 1897). SYDNEY F. SMITH. Anglicanism.—A term used to denote the religious belief and position of members of the Established Church of England, and of the communicating churches in the British possessions, the United States, and elsewhere. It includes those who have accepted the work of the English Reformation as accomplished in the Church of England, and the Churches which in other countries have adhered, at assert substantially, to its doctrines, its organisation, and its liturgy. Apart from minor or missionary settlements, the area in which Anglicanism is to be found corresponds roughly with those portions of the globe which are, or were formerly, under the British flag. The number of Catholics in the world is said to exceed 230,000,000 (estimates by M. F. Poitevin, the French Secretary of the Catholic Statistical Association Quarterly for March, 1892). The number belonging to the Greek and Eastern Churches is about 100,000,000. The number of Anglicans in all countries is something less than 25,000,000. Thus the relative proportion of those three Christian bodies which are sometimes grouped together as Episcopalian in notable and may be fairly stated by the three figures, 23, 10, 24. The growth of Anglicanism has followed mainly upon the expansion of the Anglo-Saxon race. Its area may be said to include, besides the three nuclear countries (England, Ireland, Scotland), six others, namely: the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India. But the bulk of its membership, in fact more than two-thirds, is to be found in England. In all the other countries of its area it is in a minority of the Christian population. In five of them—England, Scotland, the United States, Canada, and India—its numbers are considerably exceeded by those of the Catholic Church. Its foreign missions are very generously supported, and have extended their activity far into the heathen countries. The following table is compiled from comparatively recent statistics. The numbers given are of members, except when it is stated to be of communicants. The ratio of communicants to members may be anything between 1 in 3 and 1 in 8.

The foregoing statistics concerning the Christian population of England and her dependencies are, with the exception of Australia and New Zealand, taken from the Census, 1901 (British Empire Official Year Book, which is also to be consulted for the Anglican population of Ireland, Canada, New Zealand, and India). The figures for the Christian populations of Australia, in 1901, and New Zealand are given respectively in "Whitaker’s Almanac", 1906, which includes 6,551 aborigines, and the "New Zealand Year Book", 1904, which excludes the Maoris. The Christian population of the United States is based on the Abstract of the Twelfth Census, and that of South Africa on the European population, 1904, as contained in "Whitaker’s Almanac", 1906. For several decades there has been no return of religious denominations in the British Government Census. The Church of England is popularly estimated to include about 17,000,000. Its official Year Book" (1900), which is also the authority for the number of communicants in the United States and South Africa, gives the number of communicants in England as 2,223,207. This multiplied by 6 would give a membership of 13,339,242. The same authority gives the number of baptisms as 615,621. This, upon the usual practice of 221, would give a membership of 13,580,000. The number belonging to the Church of England would thus seem to be between thirteen and seventeen millions. For the number of Anglicans in Australia in 1901, refer again to "Whitaker’s Almanac", 1906.

BELIEFS.—To form a general idea of Anglicanism as a religious system, it will be convenient to sketch it in rough outline as it exists in the Established Church of England. The whole subject is too large to be dealt with here, and the differences of detail, mainly in liturgy and church-government, to be found in the other portions of the Anglican communion. The members of the Church of England are professed Christians, and claim to be baptized members of the Church of Christ. They accept the Scripture alone as the Word of God. They hold the Scriptures to be the sole and supreme rule of faith, in the sense that the Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation and that nothing can be required of anyone as an article of faith which is not contained therein, and cannot be proved thereby. They accept the Book of Common Prayer as the practical rule of their belief and worship, and in it they use as standards of doctrine the three Creeds—the Apostles’, the Nicene, and the Athanasian. They believe in two sacraments of the Gospel, Baptism and the Lord’s Supper, as generally necessary to salvation. They claim to have Apostolic succession and a valid episcopal ministry, and only persons whom they believe to be thus ordained are allowed to minister in their churches. They believe that the Church of England is a true and reformed part, or branch, or pair of provinces, of the Catholic Church of Christ. They maintain that the Church of England is free from all foreign jurisdiction. They recognize the King as Supreme Governor of the Church and acknowledge that to him “apartains the government of all estates whether civil or ecclesiastical, in all causes.” The clergy, before being appointed to a benefice or licensed to preach, subscribe and declare that they “assent to the Thirty-nine Articles, and to the Book of Common Prayer, and of Ordering of Bishops, priests, and deacons, and believe the doctrine of the Church of England as therein set forth to be agreeable to the Word of God”. One of the Articles (XXV) thus subscribed approves the First and Second Book of the Heavens in containing “the godly and wholesome doctrine necessary for these times”, and adjures them to be read in churches “diligently and distinctly”. To these general characteristics we may add by way of corrective that while the Bible is accepted with latitude is allowed as to the nature and extent of its inspiration; that the Episcopalian teaching of the Church of England is subject to various and opposed interpretations; that Apostolic succession is claimed by many to be beneficial, but not essential, to the nature of the Church; that the Apostles’ Creed is the only one to which assent can be required from the laity, and the Articles of Religion are held to be binding only on the licensed and beneficed clergy.

CHIEF GOVERNMENT.—Inside these outlines, which are necessarily vague, the constitution of the Church of England has been largely determined by the events which attended its settlement under the Tudors. Before the breach with Rome under Henry VIII there was absolutely no doctrinal difference between the faith of Englishmen and the rest of Catholic Christendom, and “Anglicanism”, as connoting a separate or independent religious system, was unknown. The name Ecclesia Anglicana, or English Church, was of course employed, but always in the Anglican and Papal use it contained the whole part or region of the one Catholic Church under the jurisdiction of the Pope which was situated in England, and precisely in the same way as the Church in Scotland was called the Ecclesia Scotitana, the Church in France, the Ecclesia Gallica, and the Church in Spain the Ecclesia Hispánica. That such national or regional appellations were a part of the style of the Roman Curia itself, and that they in no wise disturbed the abiding conviction of the independence of Rome, is sufficiently well known to all who are familiar with pre-Reformation records. Pope Honorius III, in 1218, in his Bull to King Alexander speaks of the Scottish Church (Ecclesia Scotianna) as "being immediately subject to the Apostles", and the abbot and superiors of England in their letter to Innocent IV, in 1246, declared that the English Church (Ecclesia Anglicana) is "a special member of the Holy Church of Rome" [Matthew Paris (Rolls Series), IV, 531]. In 1413 Archbishop Arundel, with the assent of Convocation, affirmed against the Lollards the fourth article of the English Church, and declared that the Roman Church resorted to the divine institution of the Papacy and the duty of all Christians to render obedience to it (Wilkins, Concilia, III, 355). In 1521, only thirteen years before the breach, John Clerk, the English Ambassador at Rome, was able to assure the Pope in full consistory that England was second to no country in Christendom, "not even to Rome itself", in the "service of God: and of the Christian Faith, and in the obedience due to the Most Holy Roman Church" (Clerk's oration, ed. Jerome Emerson). The first point of severance was clearly one of Erastianism. When the news of the divorce reached England, Henry VIII gave his assent to four anti-papal statutes passed in Parliament in the spring of 1534, and in November the statute of the Royal Supremacy declared the King to be Supreme Head of the English Church (without the limiting clause of 1532), and an oath was prescribed, affirming the Pope to have no jurisdiction in the realm of England. The actual ministry of preaching and of the sacraments was left to the clergy, but all the powers of ecclesiastical jurisdiction were claimed by the sovereign. The Act of Supremacy required that the King, as Supreme Head of the Church, "shall have full power and authority from time to time to visit, repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, offences, contemptes, enormities whatsoever they be which by any manner, spiritual authority or jurisdiction ought or may be lawfully referred to the Pope", and made it his duty to see that the bishops proceeded in due order (xxiii). The Act of Supremacy laid stress on the importance of the bishops being "Letters of Business", gave them permission to do so, and even then the canons so made were to have effect only when approved by the King. Another statute secured to the Crown the absolute control in the appointment of bishops. The chapters were bound under penalties of Praemunire to elect the person named by the King and no other, and the Archbishop was bound under the same shameful penalties to consecrate the person so named within twenty days after receipt of the King's writ (Significavit) commanding him to do so. This enactment, which an Anglican bishop in recent times has aptly described as "the Magna Charta of tyrannical prelates", remains in force to the present day. Within the last few years the Law Courts have ruled that no opposition to the episcopal confirmation of a person nominated by the Crown can be allowed. Thus the chief note of the Henrician settlement is the fact that Anglicanism was founded in the acceptance of the King's Right of Supremacy, and that the latter was placed upon a decided Erastian basis. When the Act of Royal Supremacy, which had been repealed by Queen Mary, was revived by Elizabeth, it suffered a modification in the sense that the Sovereign was styled "Supreme Governor" instead of "Supreme Head". In a subsequent "Admonition", Elizabeth issued an Epistle to her Subjects on the Supremacy, to the effect that she laid claim "to no power of ministry of divine offices in the Church". At the same time she reasserted in full the claim made by Henry VIII as to the authority of the Crown in matters ecclesiastical, and the great reformatory changes made by the latter number of pieces of legislation, the chief of which was the union of the Articles of Westminster with the Church of England in 1559. After her accession the Act of Supremacy was brought out and enforced in a royal visitation commissioned by the royal authority. In 1625, Charles I, in a Royal Declaration prefixed to the Articles, stated that it belonged to the king, as "the chief officer of the commonwealth", to "enforce and maintain the Church committed to our charge, in unity of religion and the bond of peace", and decreed that differences arising as to the external policy of the Church were to be settled in Convocation, but its ordinances were to be submitted to the Crown for approval, which would be given to them if they were not contrary to the laws of the land. Archbishop Laud, in his "Preliminary Articles", granted to the canons drawn up in Convocation and duly published, but not yet attempted at spiritual independence was speedily suppressed. The indirection of Parliament was so great that he himself begged leave to withdraw them, and the House of Commons passed a resolution unanimously declaring that "the Clergy in Convocation assembled has no power to make any canons or constitutions whatsoever in matters of doctrine, discipline or otherwise to bind the Clergy and laity of the land without the common consent in Parliament" (Resolution, 16 December, 1640). The effect of the legislation under Henry VIII, revived by Elizabeth, and confirmed in subsequent reigns, has been, as Lord Campbell pointed out in his famous Gorham judgment, in April, 1850, to locate in the Crown all that decisive jurisdiction which before the Reformation had been exercised by the Pope. Until the year 1833, the Crown exercised this supreme control through a body of delegates called the Court of Delegates. Its members were appointed by the Great Seal, and consisted of lay judges, with whom might be associated a number of bishops or clergymen. In 1833 this Court was abolished, and its powers were transferred to the King in Council. Hence matters which come under its purview are now decided by the King upon the advice of the first part of the Privy Council which is known as the Judicial Committee. The statute (2 and 3 William IV, xcvii) expressly states that its decisions are final, and are not subject to any commission of review. It must be observed that this tribunal does not only form to decide questions of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but also to pronounce upon the abstract orthodoxy or heterodoxy of opinions. "Its duty extends only to the consideration of that which is by law established to be the doctrine of the Church of England, upon the due and legal construction of its Articles and formularies" (Gorham decision, March, 1850). But upon this ground the Crown decided that the views of Mr. Gorham, whose notorious rejection of the doctrine of baptismal regeneration had shocked his bishop and scandalized the Tractarians, were "not contrary or repugnant to the declared doctrine of the Church of England as by law established". Numerous protests of tyrannical prelates by the English Churchmen, but all attempts to reverse the decision were unavailing, and Mr. Gorham duly received institution to the benefice which his bishop had refused him. In like manner, in 1849, when vehement opposition was made to the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford, the Prime Minister of the day insisted on the right of the Crown, and the Vice-General of the Archbishop ruled that no exception could be suffered against one whom the Crown had elected, and by its consent, and the Courtiers wavered not. The Bench sustained his ruling. Thus, whatever views or aspirations have been held theoretically by Anglican divines on the spiritual authority of the Anglican Church, the Royal Supremacy remains an effective reality, and the Crown, supported by Parliament and the people, both guarantees and witnesses that it may be taught, and the persons who shall be put in office to teach them, has possession of the practical and substantial control. It is the characteristic of the Anglican Reformation that the supreme and far-reaching regulative jurisdiction which was exercised by the Holy See was, after the severance from Rome, taken over, to all intents and purposes, by the Crown, and was never effectively entrusted to the Anglican Spirituality, either to the Primate, or to the Episcopate, or even to Convocation. As a result, there is to this day the lack of a living Church Spiritual Authority which has been to the Anglican Church a source of its strength and disorder. In 1904 a royal commission was appointed to investigate the complaints against ecclesiastical discipline, and in July, 1906, it issued its report, in which it points out that at no time in the past have the laws of public worship been uniformly observed, and recommends the formation of a Court which while exercising the Royal Jurisdiction, would be bound to accept the episcopate on questions of doctrine or ritual. This, if granted, would be the first step towards the partial emancipation of the Spirituality from the thrall of the civil power, in which it has been held for more than three centuries. It is estimated that this system is separable from the doctrine of Royal Supremacy, which is an outcome of its union with the State, and of the circumstances of the English Reformation. In countries outside of England and Wales Anglican Churches exist, and, it is said, all the more prosperously from being untrammelled by the State connection. But even in those countries the decisive voice in the government of the Anglican Church is not entrusted to the Episcopate alone, and in some of them the lay power in the synods has made itself felt, and has shown that it can be as really a master as any Tudor sovereign invested with royal dignity. The supremacy of the Supreme Council in the domain of doctrine, as the sole guarantee of true religious liberty, is still lacking in the Anglican system, and the problem of supplying it remains unsolved, if not insoluble.

Doctrinal and Liturgical Formularies.—The doctrinal position of the Anglican Church, in like manner, can only be adequately studied in its history, which divides itself into a number of stages or periods. The first, or Henrician, period (1534-47) includes the breach with Rome, the setting up of an independent national church, and the transfer of the supreme Church authority from the Papacy to the Crown. The Ecclesiand (1547-53) and Elizabethan (1558-1603) periods carried the work of separation much further. Both accepted the Henrician basis of rejection of the Papacy and erection of the Royal Supremacy, but built upon it the admission of the doctrinal and liturgical changes which make up mainly the Reformation and union with the Continent in the great Protestant movement of the sixteenth century. Although the policy of Henry VIII, after the breach with Rome, was ostensibly conservative, and his ideal seemed to be the maintenance of a Catholic Church in England, minus the Pope, it is incontestable that in other ways his action was in fatal contradiction to his professions. By raising to power, and by maintaining in positions of unique influence, his three great agents, Thomas Cromwell, Thomas Cranmer, and Edward Seymour, all of whom were always, and as openly as they dared, in sympathy with the Reformation, Henry VIII, whether by chance or design, in the latter days, undoubtedly prepared the way and opened the gates to the Protestantism which came in under Edward and Elizabeth. In 1535 he sent agents to negotiate an agreement with the Reformers in Germany, and in 1537 he was led by Cromwell, in communion with the teachings of Cranmer and the propositions with the Protestant princes assembled at Smalkald. He wrote to Melanchthon to congratulate him on the work which he had done for religion, and invited him to England. Melanchthon was unable to come, but in 1538 three German divines, Burkhardt, Boyneburg, and Myconius, were sent to London, where they remained some months, and held conferences with a deputed number of the Anglican bishops and clergy. The Germans presented as a basis of agreement a number of Articles based on the Lutheran Confession of Augsburg. On the doctrinal part of these Articles, the first thirteen, both Protestantism, Lithuanian, and English were agreed to (Cromwell, 8 September, 1538). On the second part, the "Abuses" (viz., private Masses, celibacy of the Clergy, invocation of Saints) the King would not give way, and finally dissolved the conference. Although the negotiations thus formally came to an end, the Thirteen Articles on which agreement with the Germans had been made were kept by Archbishop Cranmer, and afterwards by Archbishop Parker, and were used as test articles to which the preachers whom they licensed were required to subscribe. Eventually they became the nucleus of the Articles of Religion which were authorized under Edward VI and Edward VII, and which in the main, though with many modifications, have remained in the English Church to this day. The correspondence between these Articles and the Lutheran Confession of Augsburg, from which they were originally taken. By the death of Henry VIII (27 January, 1547) the main obstacle to the reforming influence was removed. With the accession of Edward VI, who had been brought up in the reformed faith, with Seymour, also a Protestant, omnipotent in the Council, and Cranmer, now able to show his hand and work his will, the party of the Reformation became possessed of all the resources of national power, and during the five years of the reign (1547-53) remained triumphantly in the ascendant. This period witnessed the spurious doctrine of the supremacy of the State as the source of all ecclesiastical authority, and the practical abolition of episcopal and parochial distinctions. One of the cardinal principles of the Reformation which the German delegates had brought over in 1538 was that "the Mass is nothing but a Communion or synaxis" (Tunstall's Summary, M. S. Coppel. E. V., 296). Cranmer vehemently upheld this conception of the Eucharist. One of the first Acts under Edward VI was the introduction of a new English Communion Service, which was to be inserted at the end of the Mass, and which required Communion to be given under both kinds. This was soon after followed by a Book of Common Prayer, with a Communion Service entirely taking the place of the Eucharistic prayers of Cranmer. One of the chief authors of this book. Whether it ever received the assent of Convocation has been questioned, but it was approved by Parliament in 1549. Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, in opposing Cranmer's denial of the Real Presence and of the Sacrifice of the Mass, argued that the Mass, as used in the new Prayer Book implied the acceptance of these doctrines; whereupon Cranmer and his fellow-reformers drew up a new Prayer Book, still more Protestant in tone and character. In it the order of the parts of the Communion Service was considerably altered, and the passages used by Gardiner as apparently favour—Anglican formularies can only be determined by the candid and competent examination of the evidence as a whole, first, by the study of the plain meaning of the text; secondly, by the study of the historical setting and the circumstances in which they were framed and authorized; thirdly, by the known beliefs of their chief authors and of those by whom they were accepted; fourthly, by comparison with the Catholic pre-Reformation formularies which they supplanted; fifthly by the examination of the facts and the exact value of their doctrinal terminology as found in the controversies of the time; sixthly— if the examination is not to be hopelessly narrow— by the study of the general Reformation in Europe, of which the English Reformation, albeit with local features, was an integral part of the result. Here it is only possible to state the conclusions arising from such an inquiry in briefest outline.

Connexion with the Parent Movement of Reformation.—There can be no doubt that the English Reformation is substantially a part of the great Protestant Reformation upheaval of the sixteenth century, and that its doctrine, liturgy, and chief promoters were to a very considerable extent derived from, and influenced by, the Lutheran and Calvinistic movements on the Continent. There was first of all the living or personal connection. The English Reformation was in many respects a part of the work that was done in the Reformation in England—Cranmer, Barlow, Hooper, Parker, Grindal, Scory, Mary, Cox, Coverdale, and many others, were men who lived and laboured amongst the Protestants of the Continent, and remained in constant and cordial touch and communication with them. (See Original Letters of the Reformation.) Reciprocally, continental reformers, like Peter Martyr and Martin Bucer, were welcomed to England and made professors of Divinity at the universities. Others, like John a Lasco, and Paul Fagius, became the friends and guests of Cranmer. A second bond was the adoption of the same essential doctrines. The great principles and tenets set forth in the works of Luther, Melanchthon, and Calvin, or Zwingle, are reproduced with or without modifications, but substantially, and often almost verbatim in the literature of the English Reformation. The chief doctrines which are thus reproduced are the following: (a) the formula of the Protestant Reformation as a whole are the following nine: rejection of the Papacy, denial of Church Infallibility; Justification by Faith only; supremacy and sufficiency of Scripture as Rule of Faith; the triple Eucharistic tenet (viz. (a) that the Eucharist is a Communion or Sacrament, and not a Mass and sacrifice, save in the sense of praise or commemoration; (b) the denial of Transubstantiation and worship of the Host; (c) the denial of the sacrificial office of the priesthood and the propitiatory character of the Mass; the non-necessity of auricular Confession; the rejection of the invocation of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of the saints; the prohibition of prayers for the dead; the rejection of the doctrine of Indulgences. To these may be added three disciplinary characteristics which are founded on doctrine: the giving of Communion in both kinds; the substitution of tables for altars; and the abolition of monastic vows and the celibacy of the clergy. These twelve doctrines and practices of the continental Reformation have undoubtedly, though not always in the same measure, entered into the fibre of the English Reformation, and have all found expression, more or less emphatic, in the Anglican formularies. Hence, while the name “Puritan” is not found in the Prayer Book, it is used in the Coronation Service when the King promises to maintain “the Protestant religion as by law established”.

Anglican beliefs and services. In the Act of Union the Churches of England and Ireland are styled “the Protestant Episcopal Church”, a name still retained by the Anglican Church in America. A third bond between the Reformation on the Continent and that which took place in England is to be found in the actual composition of the formularies. The Anglican Articles owe much, through the Thirteen Articles, to the Confession of Augsburg, and also to the Confession of Württemberg. Notable portions of the baptismal, marriage, and confirmation services are derived from the “Simplici et Pia Delibero” which was compiled by the Lutheran Hermann von Wied, with the aid of Bucer and Melanchthon. A considerable part of the Anglican ordinal (without the distinctive form for each Order) is found in Bucer’s “Scripta Anglicia”, has been pointed out by the late Canon Travers Smith. In this triple bond—personal, doctrinal, and liturgical—the continental and Anglican Reformations are, amid many and notable differences, substantially and inseparably interwoven as parts of one and the same great religious movement.

Collation of Formularies.—The comparison of the Anglican Prayer Book and Ordinal with the Protestant services was not without result, for it led to a second conclusion which is in harmony with the above. On making an analysis of what has been removed, and what has been retained, and what has been altered, it becomes unmistakably apparent that the main motive which determined and guided the construction of the new liturgy was the same as that which inspired the whole Reformation movement, namely: the determination to have the Lord’s Supper regarded as a Sacrament or Communion, and not as a Sacrifice, and to remove whatever indicated the sacrificial character of the Eucharist, or the Real Objective Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Host. The Catholic liturgical forms, missal, breviary, pontifical, were in possession and had been in actual use for centuries. In making a liturgical reform, it was by the necessity of the case impossible that the changes made should not have reference to them, standing, as they did, in the relation of a terminus a quo to a terminus ad quem of reformulation. If the Sarum Missal, Breviary, and Pontifical are placed side by side with the Anglican Prayer Book and Ordinal, and a comparison made of the corresponding parts, the motive, drift, and intention of the framers are clearly revealed. In the Sarum formulary, in the Reformation formulary there are twenty-four passages which express with clearness the Catholic Sacerdotium, or sacrificial character of the office and work of the priesthood. Of these not one was allowed to remain in the Anglican Ordinal. In the Ordinary of the Mass alone there are some twenty-two positions in which the sacrificial nature of the Eucharist and the Real Presence of Christ as a Victim are expressed or implied. All these have been suppressed and eliminated in the Anglican Communion Service, and passages of a Reformational or non-committal character substituted. Thus, with regard to no less than forty-nine places, the new formularies bear the marks of deliberate exclusion and of anti-sacrificial and anti-sacerdotal significance. (See The Tablet, London, 12 June, 1897.)

Development and Parties.—Although the Anglican Articles and liturgy have been practically unchanged since 1662, it was a time of deep concern and thought of a religious body like the Church of England should present the note of development, and that such development should eventually outgrow, or at least strain, the historic interpretation of the formularies, and the more so because there has been no living authority to adapt or readjust them to the newer needs or aspirations. The development may be said to have been guided by three main influences. There has been the deepseated attachment to the principles of the Reformation in which the Anglican settlement was founded, and the determination to preserve the standards of belief and worship thus established. This loyalty to the Protestant character of the Anglican Church has incidentally produced the Low Church, or Evangelical, school of Anglicanism. A second influence is that of rationalism, which, both in England and in Germany, has acted as a solvent of Protestantism, especially in the form of destructive biblical criticism, and which, though in the effort to emancipate the Church from an aversion to all that is dogmatic, supernatural, or miraculous. Its exponents, who are numerous, learned, and influential, are generally classed as the Broad Church, or the Latitudinarian, school of Anglican religious thought. A third influence which has made itself felt upon Anglicanism, and one more vital and more penetrating and progressive than the other two, has been that of Catholicism, whether as reflected in Catholic antiquity or as beheld in the actual Catholic and Roman Church. The effect of this influence may be traced in what has been called the historic High Church party. A number of Anglican bishops were sent to Rome in the eighteenth centuries, while bitterly opposed to Rome, and, when Popes, stood above the prevailing low level of churchmanship, and put forward higher and more philologic views, in matters of Church authority, belief, and worship. Although comparatively few in number, and wittily outnumbered by their fellow churchmen, they were destined to serve as a point d’appui for a subsequent development. Such writers as Bishop Andrews (d. 1629), Bishop Overall (d. 1619), Bishop Montague (d. 1641), Archbishop Laud (d. 1644), Archbishop Bramhall (d. 1663), Dr. Theobald, (1615-1672), Bishop Ken (d. 1711), Dr. Waterland (d. 1740), may be regarded as representative of this section.

Oxford Movement.—In 1833 a strong current of popular opinion directed against the Anglican Church aroused in its defence the zeal of a small band of Oxford students and writers, who, gradually gathered under the informal leadership of John Henry Newman. Among these were John Keble, C. Marriott, Hurrell Froude, Isaac Williams, Dr. Pusey, and W. G. Ward. Their object was to make good for the Anglican Church its claim to the note of Catholicity. Their task led them to look both behind and outside the Anglican Church for the foundation of a new church. There was no Anglican High Church divines of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries on one side, and a catena of certain Fathers on the other, it was hoped that a quasi-continuous chain of Catholic tradition could be made to connect the Anglican Church of their day with Catholic antiquity. Translations of the Fathers, works on liturgy, the festivals of the “Christian Year”, and above all a memorable series of “Tracts for the Times”, conveyed with telling force the newer and broader conceptions of churchmanship which entered into the spirit of the defenders. In “Tract 90” an attempt was made, somewhat on the lines of St. Ambrose’s doctrine of the publican and the Pharisee, to reconcile the teaching of the Council of Trent. The result was a doctrinal and devotional crisis such as England had not witnessed since the Reformation, and the Oxford or Tractarian movement, during the last three or four decades, it has been termed “The Apostasy”, in 1833, to Newman’s conversion in 1845, formed a historic epoch in the annals of Anglicanism. The fact that the work of the movement was informally a study de Ecclesid brought both the writers and their readers more directly face to face with the claims of the Church of Rome. A large number of those who took part in the movement, and notably its great leader, became Catholics, while others, in remaining Anglicans, gave a new and pro-Catholic direction and impulse to Anglican thought and worship. It may be said that in the case of Newman, Oakley, Wilberforce, Ward, and a host of others, the research of the nature of Catholicity and the rule of faith brought them to realize the need of the living voice of the Church (the Divina Providentia Divinae fides), and failing to find it in the Anglican episcopate, they sought it where alone it could be found. Others, like Pusey, Marriott, Keble, sought what they called the voice of the “Church” in the inanimate formularies (or regula remota) which, after all, is the only thing in the liturgy of the Church that conciliates the definitions to the Scriptures as the area over which they still used, after the manner of true Protestants, their private judgment. The same principle is always more or less at work and goes as far now as then to sift those who come from those who stay. [If we bear in mind that by “Church” was thus meant the silent self-interpreted formularies (or regula remota), and by “Bishops” the living magisterium (or regula proxima) sought in Anglicanism, we shall feel that there is a great truth contained in Pusey’s well-known saying, three years after the secession of Newman: “I am not disturbed by it—never was disturbed by anything the bishops. It was perhaps the difference between Newman and me. He threw himself upon the bishops and they failed him. I threw myself on the English Church and the Fathers, as under God, her support” (Letter to J. Marriott, 2 January, 1848).]

Anglican Revival.—Although the Oxford movement is regarded as having come to a close at the conversion of Dr. Newman in 1845, a large section of the Anglican public had been much too profoundly stirred by its ideals ever to return to the narrowness of the religious horizons which were bounded by the Reform Act. Its influence has survived the unceasing flow of converts to the Catholic Faith, and is shown in the Anglican Church itself by that notable change of belief, temperament, and practice which is known as the Anglican Revival. The last fifty years have witnessed the development of an influential and growing school of religious thought which, with its influence on the life of the Church, is steadily labouring to Catholicize the Church of England. It has set up the claim, hopelessly untenable in the face of historical evidence, that the Anglican Church is one and continuous with the Ancient Catholic Church of the country, and is an integral part of the Catholic Church of today. It maintains that the Catholic Church is one, and contemplates as a stage in Catholicism the Anglican Church, with the result that those who stay in the Church seek to ratify its position, and to escape from its fatal isolation, by desiring some scheme of corporate reunion and especially by endeavouring to obtain some recognition of the validity of its orders. With the truest charity, which consists in the reputation of truth, Pope Leo XIII in his Encyclical on Unity, pointed out that there could be no reunion except on the solid basis of dogmatic unity and submission to the divinely instituted authority of the Apostolic See. In September, 1896, after a full and exhaustive inquiry, he issued a Bull declaring Anglican Orders to be “utterly null and void”, and in a subsequent Brief addressed to the Archbishop of Paris, he required all Catholics to accept this judgment as “fixed, settled, and irreceivable” (firmum, rationet irreceivable). The Anglican Revival continues to reiterate its claim and to appropriate to itself, wherever practicable, whatever in Catholic doctrine, liturgy, and practice, church vestments, etc., in order to give a semblance of Catholicity to its form of worship. By the Lambeth judgment of 1891 it acquired a public sanction for many of its innovations. Since then it has gone further, and holds that no authority in the Church of England can override things which are authorised by “Catholic consent”. It stands opposed to the life of the Church as it is in the life of the Church as a whole, as the papal system is philochatholic in its views and aspirations, but hopelessly committed to heresy and to heretical communication, and built upon an essentially Protestant foundation. Although to Catholics its very claim is an impious usurpation of what belongs to right to the Catholic Church alone, it fulfils an informal mission of influencing English public opinion, and of familiarizing the English people with Catholic doctrines and ideals. Like the Oxford movement, it educates more pupils than it can retain, and works upon premises which cannot but carry it in the long run farther than it is willing to go. A thorough theory would regard any western church, branches, or a province theory which is known to the rest of the provinces, and a continuity theory of which more than twelve thousand documents in the Record Office and the Vatican Library are the overwhelming refutation, cannot form a standing ground which is other than temporary and transitional. In the meantime, its work amongst the masses is often a species of catechumenate for Catholicism, and in all cases it is an active solvent and a steady undoing of the English Reformation.

Anglin, Timothy Warren, Canadian journalist and member of Parliament, b. in the town of Clonskilly, County Cork, Ireland, 1822; d. 5 May, 1886, in Ontario. He was educated in Anglican schools and for a time in his native corporation. His family was financially ruined in the famine of 1846-47 and he emigrated to the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, in 1849. He was a public speaker, but made his mark as the most vigorous writer on the Catholic press in the country. He founded in 1851 the ‘Morning Freeman’ (1851). On the question of the total prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors, although a strong advocate of temperance, he separated himself from his political friends and fought the measure which he considered too drastic and unworkable. He was a member of the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick, but was expelled at its next session. In 1860 Mr. Anglin was returned as representative of the city and county of Saint John, a constituency from which no Catholic had ever been elected. When the scheme of confederation of the British North American provinces was mooted, he took a prominent part in the opposition, because he did not believe, as was asserted, that the proposed union of the provinces was necessary for the continuance of their connexion with the empire, and because he was convinced it must cause an enormous increase in the rate of taxation in New Brunswick. Just at this time a small body of men calling themselves Fenians appeared on the border of the province and threatened an invasion. Dr. D. B. Killam, their leader, issued a proclamation inviting the anti-confederates to join with them, overthrow British tyranny, and maintain the legislative independence of the province. The anti-confederates were in no way responsible for Dr. Killam’s invasion or proclamation, which had the effect, however, of raising a no-popery cry, and of driving Mr. Anglin from public life for a few years. When Canadian confederation became an accomplished fact, Mr. Anglin accepted the situation loyally. He consented to become a candidate in the county of Gloucester for a seat in the House of Commons of Canada. When the McKenzie government was formed, Mr. Anglin was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, a position he held from 26 May, 1874, until 31 May, 1877. No one lent more dignity to the high position of first commoner of Canada and his rulings were never questioned, so strict was his impartiality.

Mr. Anglin was a Canadian statesman of eminence, but he deserves a place in history more particularly as an able, fearless, and indefatigable journalist, doing battle for the cause of Catholic education. In New Brunswick the issue of the greatest importance was the anti-separate school legislation. During many years Mr. Anglin, through the columns of the “Freeman” and on the floor of the House of Commons, fought a valiant battle for his co-religionists. His efforts, and the exertion of those who laboured with him were so far successful that in the greater part of the province a compromise was made, which allows Catholics to have their own schools and teachers, and to give religious instruction before and after school hours. This was far from being all he would wish, but it is much better than the utterly anti-Catholic, irreligious system at first insisted upon by the law. Mr. Anglin joined the editorial staff of “The Toronto Globe” in 1883, and was editor-in-chief of “The Toronto Tribune”, a Catholic weekly. He died at the age of seventy-four.

Anglo-Saxon Church, THE. I. ANGLO-SAXON OCCUPATION OF BRITAIN.—The word Anglo-Saxon is used as a collective name for those Teutonic settlers, the foundation stock of the English race, who after disposing of the Celtic inhabitants of Britain in the middle of the fifth century, remained masters of the country until a new order of things was created in 1066 by the coming of the Normans. Though etymologically open to some objection (cf. Stevenson’s “Asen”, 140) the term Anglo-Saxon is convenient in practice, the more so because we do not know very much concerning the provenance of the Low German tribes who about the year 449 began to extend the Hunnic Empire from the Rhine into England. The Jutes who came first, and occupied Kent and the Isle of Wight, have been supposed to be identical with the inhabitants of Jutland, but it has been recently shown that this is probably an error (Stevenson, ibid., 167). They were, however, a Frisian tribe. The Saxons of the fifth century were better known and more widely spread than the present Frisians, of the present Friesland, Holstein, and Brunswick. The Angles in Tacitus’ day were settled on the right bank of the Elbe close to its mouth. They seem to have been nearly akin to their then neighbours, the Lombards, who after long wanderings eventually became the masters of Italy. Now represented by Sussex and Essex, founded a great kingdom in the West which gradually absorbed almost the whole country south of the Thames. In fact, the King of Wessex ultimately became the lord of the entire land of Britain. The Angles, who followed close upon the heels of the Saxons, founded the kingdoms of East Anglia (Norfolk and Suffolk), Mercia (the Midlands), Deira (Yorkshire), and Bernicia (the country farther north). The extermination of the native inhabitants was probably not so complete as was at one time supposed, and a recent authority (Hodgkin) has declared that “Anglo-Celt rather than Anglo-Saxon is the fitting designation of our race.” But, although the Britons were Christians, the survivors were in any case too insignificant a body to convert their conquerors. Only in the extreme west and north, where the Teutonic invaders could not penetrate, did the Celtic Church still maintain its succession of priests and bishops. No effort seems to have been made by them to preach to the Saxons, and later on, when St. Augustine and St. Lawrence tried to open up friendly relations, the British Church held severely aloof.

II. CONVERSION.—Everyone knows the story of the Roman Mission which first brought to the English the knowledge of the Gospel. St. Gregory’s deep compassion for the angel-faces of some captive Anglo-Saxon children in the Roman slave-market led in time to the sending of the monk St. Augustine and his companions. They were well received by Ethelbert of Kent who had already married a Christian wife. Augustine landed in Thanet only in 597, but before the end of the century most of the Jutes of Kent had been converted. Acting on instructions previously received, he went to Arles to receive episcopal consecration. Frequent communications were exchanged with Rome, and St. Gregory in 601 sent Augustine the pallium, the emblem of archiepiscopal jurisdiction, directing him to consecrate to other bishops and to see that the newly founded diocese of London was established. This was not possible, and Canterbury became the mother church of England. London, however, very shortly afterwards had its church, and Mellitus was consecrated to reside there as Bishop of the East Saxons, while another church was erected at Rochester with Justus as bishop. On Ethelbert's death in 616 great reverses befell the cause of Christianity. Essex and part of Kent apostatized, but St. Lawrence, the new archbishop, stood his ground. A few years later a great advance was made by the marriage of the powerful King Eadwine of Northumbria to a Kentish Christian princess. Paulinus of York, who had at his death been sent to help Augustine, was consecrated bishop, and, accompanying her as her chaplain, he was able to baptize Eadwine in 627, and build the church of St. Peter at York. It is true that a pagan reaction six years afterwards swept away most of the results achieved, but even then his deacon James remained at work in Yorkshire. Meanwhile Felix, a Burgundian monk acting under orders from Canterbury, had gained over East Anglia; and Birinus, who had been sent straight from Rome, began in 634 the conversion of the people of Wessex. In the North it seemed as if the Faith was almost extinguished, owing mainly to the relentless opposition of Penda, the pagan King of Mercia, but help came from an unexpected quarter. In 634 the remnants of Northumbrian sovereignty were soon grasped by St. Oswald, who had been brought up in exile among the Irish monks settled in Iona, and had there become a Christian. When this young prince had gained a victory over his enemies and established himself more firmly, he summoned (c. 635) a Scottish (i.e. Irish) missionary from Iona. This was St. Aidan, who established a community of his followers in the island of Lindisfarne, and thence evangelized all the land of the north. St. Aidan followed the Celtic traditions in the points in which they differed from the Roman (e.g. the keeping of Easter), but there can be no question as to his sanctity or as to the wonderful effects of his preaching. From Lindisfarne came St. Cedd and St. Chad, two brothers who respectively evangelized Essex and Mercia. To Lindisfarne also were indebted, at least indirectly, for St. Cuthbert, who consolidated the empire of Christianity in the north, and for St. Wilfrid, who, besides converting the South Saxons, the tardiest of the Teutonic settlers to receive the Gospel, accomplished the great task of reconciling the Christians of Northumberland to the Roman Easter and to the other institutions which required the support of papal authority. To sum up, it has been said, not inaptly, that in the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons “the Roman planted, the Scot watered, the Briton did nothing.”

III. DEVELOPMENT UNDER ROMAN AUTHORITY.

Meanwhile great work of organization had been going on. Theodore of Tarsus, a Greek monk who had been consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalian, came to England in 669. He was warmly welcomed by all, and in 673 held a national council of the English bishops at Hertford, and another in 680 at Hatfield. In these synods much was done to promote purity, to define the limits of jurisdiction, and to restrain the wanderings and mutual interference of the clergy. What was still more important, St. Theodore, visiting the whole of England, consecrated new bishops and divided up the vast dioceses which in many cases were coextensive with the kingdoms of the heptarchy. It has been a consequence of this last proceeding that a feud for a while broke out between Theodore and Wilfrid, the latter being driven from his See of Ripon and appealing to Rome. But after some tempestuous years, marked alike by great endurance and missionary zeal on Wilfrid’s part, Theodore acknowledged that he had done grave wrong to his brother bishop. They were reconciled and for the short time that remained worked together harmoniously in the cause of Roman order and discipline. It would seem that in the interests of anti-papal controversy, a great deal too much has been made of the divergent customs of the Roman and Celtic missionaries. Both in Scotland and on the Continent, Irish Christianity was thoroughly loyal in spirit to the See of Rome. Such men as St. Cuthbert, St. Cedd, St. Chad, and St. Wilfrid co-operated heartily with the efforts to preach the Gospel made by the teachers sent from Canterbury. The Celtic customs had already received their death-blow in the choice made by the Northumbrian King Oswiu, when at the Synod of Whitby (664) he elected to stand by the Roman Key-bearer, St. Peter. In fact, after the lapse of a few years they are no more heard of. In the eighth century the pope granted the pallium to Egbert, Bishop of York, and thus restored the see as an archiepiscopal according to a scheme already foreshadowed in St. Gregory’s letter to Augustine. Moreover, two very important synods were held at this period. The one, in 747, was summoned at the instance of Pope Zacharias, whose letter was read aloud, and devoted itself to thorough-going legislacourse of which Wessex gradually acquired a position of supremacy, the Danish incursions destroyed many great seats of learning and centres of monastic discipline, such, for instance, as Jarrow, the home of St. Bede. To the extent these calamities soon exercised a disastrous effect upon the lives and work of the clergy. King Alfred the Great strove hard to put things on a better footing, and, speaking generally, the devotion of secular rulers towards the papacy and the Church was never more conspicuous than at this period. To this belongs the famous grant to the Church of a tenth of his land by Ethelwulf, father of Alfred. This had nothing directly to do with tithes, but it showed how completely the principle was recognised and how close was the union between Church and State. The final victory of Alfred over the Danes, the treaty with Guthrum their leader at Wedmore, and the consequent reception of Christianity by the invaders, did much to restore the Church to happier conditions. In the joint code of laws published by Alfred and Guthrum, apostasy was declared a crime, negligent priests were to be fined, the payment of Peter’s Pence was commanded, and the suppression of heathen rites was forbidden. The union between secular and ecclesiastical authority at this time, and indeed throughout the whole of the Anglo-Saxon period, was very close, and some of the great national councils seemed almost to have the character of Church synods. But the clergy, while remaining closely identified with the people, and discharging in each district the functions of local state officials, seem never to have quite regained the religious spirit which the period of Danish invasions had impaired. Thus, in the time of St. Dunstan, who was Archbishop of Canterbury from 960 to 988, a very strong movement made itself felt (encouraged especially by St. Ethelwold of Winchester, and St. Oswald of Worcester and York), which aimed at replacing the secular clergy by monks in all the more important “ministers.” There can be no doubt that at this period the law of celibacy was still observed by priests, and the custom of marrying was so general that it seemed to have been impossible to enforce any very severe penalties against deserters. Hence, great efforts were made by the three saints named and by King Edgar to renovate and spiritualise monasticism upon the lines of the great Benedictine rule, hoping thereby also to raise the tone of the secular clergy and to increase their influence for good. For the same end St. Dunstan sought to remedy the isolation of the English Church not only by intercourse with France and Flanders, but also, in the words of Bishop Stubbs, “by establishing a more intimate communication with the Apostolic See”. Henceforth nearly all archbishops went personally to Rome for the pallium. These efforts resulted in a distinct advance in general culture, through England no longer led, but was content to follow the scholars of the Continent. Still, much was gained, and when, after renewed invasions, a Danish dynasty became masters of England, “the society which was unable to withstand the arms of Canute, almost immediately humanized and elevated him”. Canute was a fervent convert. He made a great pilgrimage to Rome in 1016—17, his legislation was largely ecclesiastical in character, and he insisted anew on the payment of Peter’s Pence. These Roman influences were also reinforced under Edward the Confessor by the appointment of several foreigners to English sees and by a great revival of pilgrimages to Rome. The foreigners were probably both more devout and more capable than the native priests that were available. There is nothing to show that competent Englishmen were passed over. On the contrary, when in 1062 papal legates again visited England they were responsible for the appointment of one of the greatest native archbishops of Anglo-Saxon times, St. Wulstan, Bishop of Worcester. In himself “a faultless character” (Dict. Nat. Biog., s. v.), he lived on under Norman rule, for nearly thirty years, serving to perpetuate the best traditions of the Anglo-Saxon Church in the reorganized hierarchy of the Conquest.

IV. ECCLESIASTICAL ORGANIZATION.—There can be no doubt that in the Christianizing of Britain the monk came before the secular priest, the minster (monasterium) was prior to the cathedral. St. Augustine and his companions were monks, belonging seemingly to communities founded by St. Gregory himself, though it would be a mistake to regard them as identical in discipline, or even in spirit, with the Benedictines of a later age. Still greater would be the error of using modern standards to judge of the monks of the Celtic Church; those rude but ascetic missionaries who established themselves in the lonely island of Lindisfarne, and who in their excursions under the leadership of St. Aidan gradually built up the Church of Northumbria. The early monastic institutions of the West, both Roman and Celtic, were very adaptable and seem to have been well fitted for missionary efforts; but they were nevertheless incapable of providing permanently for the spiritual needs of a Christian population, as they essentially supposed some form of common life and the gathering of numbers in communities. As soon, then, as the work of conversion had made some little progress, it became the aim of the bishop or abbot—and under the Celtic system the abbot was often the religious superior of the bishop—to draw young men into intercourse with their community and after more or less of instruction to ordain them priests and send them to dwell among the people, wherever their ministrations were most needed, or where provision for their support was most readily offered. To a large extent the parochial system in England was brought into being by what may be called private chaplaincies (cf. Earle, Land Charters, 73). It was not, as used formerly to be maintained, the creation of Archbishop Theodore or any one organizer. The gesith, or noble landowner... in any “township” (this, of course, was a rural division) would build a church for his own private convenience, often in contiguity to his own house, and then he would either obtain from the bishop a priest to serve it or, more commonly, would present some nominee of his own for ordination. No doubt the bishop himself was also active in providing churches and clergy for noteworthy centres of population. Indeed, Bede writing to Archbishop Egbert of York urged that there ought to be a priest in each township (in singularis vicis), and to this day the parishes coincide with the old townships (now known as “civil parishes”), or in more thinly populated districts with a group of townships. While, in this way parishes came into being out of the oratories of the lords, a strong effort seems to have been made by the bishops at an early date both to check abuses and to secure some definite provision of a permanent nature for the support of the priest. This often took the form of lands legally “booked” to the saint to whom the church was dedicated. At first the bishop seems to have been seized of these endowments, as also of the tithes and of the general contributions for ecclesiastical purposes known as “Church-shot”, but soon the parish priest himself acquired, along with fixity of tenure, the administration of these emoluments. It is quite possible that the general prevalence in England of lay patrons with the right to present to benefices (q. v.) is to be traced to the fact that the parish church in so many cases originated in the private oratory of the lord of the township. It is difficult to determine what and how the organization of the parochial system should be regarded as complete. We can only say that the Dommesday commission in the reign of William the Conqueror takes it for granted that every township had its own parish priest. The dioceses which were first divided up with some degree of adequacy by Archbishop Theodore were further added to. As time went on, York, as we have noticed, became an archbishopric under Egbert, but the province of York was always far behind Canterbury in the number of its suffragans. On the other hand, the recognition almost universally accorded to Canterbury, and the path of fealty taken by the bishops to the archbishop probably did much towards developing the idea of the national unity. At the close of the Anglo-Saxon period there were some seventeen bishoprics, but the numerous subdivisions, suppressions, translations, and amalgamations of sees during the preceding centuries are too complex to be detailed here. The matter has been very fully discussed, in “English Dioceses”, by G. Hill, who gives the following list of bishoprics in 1066. I add the date of foundation; but in some cases, indicated in brackets, the see was suppressed or transferred and afterwards refounded. Canterbury 597; London, 604; Rochester, 604; York, (625), 664; Dorchester (634), 870 with Leicester; Lindisfarne, 635, later Durham; Lichfield, 656; Winchester, Hereford, 669; 602; East Anglia (Elmham), 673; Worcester, 680; Sherborne, 705; Sussex (Selsey), 705; Ramsbury, c. 906; Crediton, c. 906; Wells, c. 906; Cornwall (St. Germans), 931. Some of these were more famous under other names. Thus Ramsbury was later on represented by Salisbury or Sarum, which, owing to the influence of St. Osmund (d. 1099), a post-Conquest bishop, acquired a sort of liturgical primacy among the other English dioceses. Similarly, the sees established at Dorchester, Elmham, and Crediton were lost, and others transferred to the far more famous cities of Lincoln, Norwich, and Exeter. Other bishoprics at one time renowned, such as those of Hexham and Ripon, were suppressed or merged into more important dioceses. At the period of the Norman Conquest, York had only one suffragan see, that of Lindisfarne or Durham, but it obtained a sort of irregular supremacy over Worcester, owing to the abuse that for a long time the same archbishop had been accustomed to hold the sees of York and Worcester at once. Undoubtedly a large part of the shopping and changing which are noticed in the delimitation of the old Saxon sees are due to the effects of the Sarum and English irruptions. The same cause is no doubt mainly responsible for the decay of the older monastic system; though something should also be laid to the charge of the looseness of organization and the undue prevalence of family influence in the succession of monastic dignitaries, which, in many instances, was no more than the Kloster only the semblance of religious life. The “booking” of land to these pretended monasteries seems in the early period to have become recognized as a fraudulent means of evading certain burdens to which the land was subject. The prevalent system of “double monasteries”, in which both sexes resided in the same building, the nuns under the rule of an abess, seems never to have been viewed with approval by Roman authority. It is not clear whether the English derived this institution from Ireland or from Gaul. The best known examples are Whitby, Coldingham, Bardsey, Wenlock, Repton, Ely, Wimborne, and Barking. Some of these were purely Celtic in origin; others, for example the last, were certainly founded under Roman influence. Only in the case of Coldingham have we any direct evidence of grave scandals resulting. When, however, in the tenth century, after the subjugation of the Danes, the monastic system revived once more, English monks went to Fleury which had recently been reformed by St. Odo of Cluny, and the Fleury tradition was imported into England. (Eng. Hist. Review, IX, 691 sq.) It was the spirit of Fleury which, under the guidance of St. Dunstan and St. Ethelwold, animated the great centres of English monastic life, such as Winchester, Worcester, Abingdon, Glastonbury, Eynsham, Ramsey, Peterborough, and many more. We must also remember, as an explanation of the efforts made at this time to dislodge the secular canons from the cathedrals, that these secular canons were themselves the successors, and to some extent the equals, of the religious monks. It was felt that all sacred traditions cried out for the restoration of a worthier clergy and a stricter observance. Even during times of the greatest corruption ecclesiastical authority never fully acquiesced in the marriage of the Anglo-Saxon Masspriests, though this was not uncommon. On the other hand, it should be remembered that the word priest (as opposed to messu_priest) of itself only means clerics in minor orders, and consequently every mention of the son of a priest does not necessarily presuppose a flagrant violation of the canons. To the clergy in general, clerical privileges, and great privileges were accorded which the law fully recognised. The priest, or mass-thren, enjoyed a high wergeld (i.e. man-price, a claim for compensation proportionate to dignity), and an increased mundbyrd, or right of protection. He ranked as a thane, and the parish priest together with the reeve and the four best burgars of each township attended the hundred-moot as a matter of right. On the other hand, the clergy and their property, at least in later times, were not exempt from the public burdens common to all. Saeve for the option of the corseled, a form of ordeal by blessed bread, the clergy were judged in the ordinary tribunals, and frithborh, or the duty of finding a number of sureties for their keeping the peace, was incumbent upon them as upon other men.

V. ECCLESIASTICAL OBSERVANCES.—The close union of the religious and social aspects of Anglo-Saxon life is nowhere more clearly seen than in the penitential system. Codes of penalties for moral offences, which were known as Penitentials and were ascribed to such venerable names as Theodore, Bede, and Egbert, meet us from an early period. The application of these codes, at least in some imperfect way, lasted until the Conquest, and the public penance enforced upon the offenders seems almost to have had the effect of a system of police. Closely related with this was the practice of making confession to the parish priest on Shrove Tuesday or shortly afterwards. In cases of public offences against morality, reconciliation was commonly deferred at least until Maundy Thursday, at the end of Lent, and belonged of strict right to the bishop alone. Confession may have been relatively infrequent, and probably enough its necessity was only recognized when there was question of sins of a pahly grievous character, but it is certain that secrecy was respected in the case of hidden sins, and that abjuration was given, at least in the precatory form. The earliest example of our modern declarative form of abjuration in the West is probably of very early origin. Of the general prevalence of confession no stronger proof can be given than the fact that the term commonly used in Anglo-Saxon to denote a parish was scriftacic (i.e. shift shire, confession district). Like the observance of certain appointed fasts and festivals, the obligation of confession was made a subject of secular legislation by the king and his Witan. Another obligation enforced by legal enactment in the Witenagemot (council of the wise men) was the Cyrician (i.e. church-shot, church dues). The nature of this payment is not quite clear, but it seems to have consisted in the first fruits of the seed-harvest (cf. Kemble, Saxons in England, I, 559). It was apparently distinct from tithes and probably was even older than the formation of regular parishes (Baldwin Brown, Arts in Early Eng., I, 314-316). The payments of the tithe of increase was first plainly enjoined in the legal synod held at Caerleon in the (Saxon) 757 and the obligation was confirmed in an ordinance of Athelstan, 927. Soul-shot (soul scet), also a payment enforced by legal sanction, seems to have been a due paid to the parish church with a view to the donor's burial in its churchyard. The importance attached to it shows how intimately bound up with Anglo-Saxon religious conceptions was the duty of prayer for the dead. The offering of Masses for the dead is legislated for in some of the earliest ecclesiastical documents of the English Church which have been preserved to us, e.g. in the "Penitential" of Theodore. The same desire to obtain the prayers of the living for the souls of the departed is manifested alike in the wording of the land charters and in the earliest stone monuments. The cross erected at Bewcastle in Cumberland about 671, in honour of the Northumbrian king Alchfrith, has a runic inscription asking prayers for his soul. Religious communities as early as the first half of the eighth century banded themselves together in associations pledged to recite the psalter and offer Masses for their deceased members, and this movement which spread widely in Germany and on the Continent had its origin in England (See Ebner, Gebetsverbrüderungen, 30). Similarly among secular persons guilds were formed, the main object of which was the making of prayers for the souls of their members after death (Kemble, Saxons, I, 511). For the same purpose, at the obsequies of the great, doles of food were commonly distributed, and slaves were manumitted. Another institution many times mentioned in the later Anglo-Saxon laws is that of Peter's Pence (Rom-fisco, Rom-pennig). It appears from a letter of Pope Leo III (796-816) that King Offa of Mercia promised to send 365 mancusses yearly to Rome for the maintenance of the poor and of lights, and Asser tells of some similar gift of Ethelwulf, the father of King Alfred, to St. Peter. More very long after, it seems to have taken the form of a regular tax collected from the people and annually transmitted to Rome. This voluntary contribution undoubtedly bears witness to a very close union between England and the Holy See, and indeed this is made clear to us in numerous other ways. It is Bede who directs special attention to the migration of Anglo-Saxons from England to the Holy City and to the abdication of kings, like Cædwalla and Ine, who resigned the crown and went to Rome to die. The prevalence of dedications to St. Peter, the generous gifts of such men as the Abbot Ceolfrith, whose present to the Pope, known as the "Codex Amiatinus", is preserved to this day, together with the language of several of the English synods, all point in the same direction. The fact was even commented upon by continental contemporaries, and the "Gesta Abbatum Fontanellensiun" (Saint Vandrille), written c. 840, speaks of the "English who are always specially devoted to the Apostolic See" (Hauck, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, I, 457, 3d ed.). We have very good evidence of the existence in the Anglo-Saxon Church of the whole of the present sacramental system, including Extreme Unction, Holy Orders, and Matrimony. The Mass was the centre of all religious worship, and the Holy Sacrifice was certainly offered privately, sometimes as often as three or four times in the same day by the same priest, but always fasting. The attempt made, upon the authority of certain expressions of Abbot Ælfric (q. v.), to show that the Anglo-Saxon Real Presence is wholly illusory. (See Bridgett, Hist. of Holy Eucharist, I, 119 sq.). In these matters of faith and ritual England differs in no substantial respect from the rest of Western Christendom. The Latin language was used both in the liturgy and in the canonical hours. The books were the Roman service books without any important additions of native or Celtic growth. The principal foreign influence which can be discerned is a likeness to the ritual observances of southern Italy (e. g., Naples), a peculiarity to which attention has been drawn on many occasions by Edmund Bishop and Dom Germain Morin. It is probably due to the fact that Adrian, Abbot of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, who came to England in the train of Archbishop Theodore, had brought with him the traditions of Monte Cassino. Even the coronation service, which began by being pronouncedly Celtic, was remodelled about the time of Æthelstan (973) in imitation of the usages which obtained in the coronation of the Emperor of the West (Robertson, Historical Essays, 203 sq.; Thurston, Coronation Ceremonial, 18 sq.). Hence many interesting details of liturgical custom, e. g. the churchyard procession on Palm Sunday, the dramatic dialogue beside the Sepulchre on Easter eve, the episcopal benediction after the Pater Noster of the Mass, the multiplication of prefaces, the great O's of Advent, the communion of the laity under both species, etc., were not peculiar to England, even though in some cases the earliest recorded examples are English examples. As regards the veneration of the saints and of their relics, no Church was farther removed than the Anglo-Saxon Church from the principles of the Reformation. The praises of our Blessed Lady are sung by Aldhelm and Alcuin in Latin, and by the poet Cynewulf (c. 775) in Anglo-Saxon, in glowing verse. An English monk (Church Quarterly Rev., XIV, 286) has frankly admitted that "Mariolatry is no very modern development of Romanism—the Blessed Virgin was not only Dei Genitrix and Virgo Virginum, but in a tenth-century English litany she is addressed thus:—

Sancta Regina Mundi, ora pro nobis;
Sancta Salvatric Mundi, ora pro nobis;
Sancta Redemptrix Mundi, ora pro nobis."

The bodies of the saints, e. g. that of St. Cuthbert, were reverently honoured from the beginning and esteemed the most precious of treasures. Besides the feasts of Christ and Our Lady, a number of saints' days were observed throughout the year, to which in a synod of 747 the festivals of St. Gregory and St. Augustine, the true apostles of England, were specially added. Later secular legislation determined the number of such feasts and prescribed abstention from servile work. All feasts of the Apostles had vigils on which men fasted. Sts. Peter and Paul's day was celebrated with an octave. The Ordeals, a method of trial by "judgment of God", though accompanied by prayer and conducted under the supervision of the clergy, were not exactly an ecclesiastical institution, neither were they peculiar to the Anglo-Saxon Church.

VI. Missions.—Of the missionary enterprise of the Anglo-Saxons a more detailed account must be sought under the names of the principal missionaries and of the countries evangelized. It will be sufficient to say here in general that the preaching of the Irish monks, of whom St. Columban was the most celebrated, in central and western Europe, was followed and eclipsed by the efforts of the Anglo-Saxons, in particular by those of the Northumbrian St. Wilfrid and the West Saxon Winfrith better known as St. Boniface. St. Boniface, to whom a later age gave the name of the Apostle of Germany, was supported by many followers, e. g. Lull, Willibald, Burchard, and others. The work of evangelization in Germany was almost accomplished in the eighth century, the crowning effort being made by St. Willihad between 772 and 789, in the North, beside the banks of the Elbe and the Weser. These missionary undertakings were much assisted by the devotion of many holy Englishwomen, e. g. Sts. Walburg, Lioba, Tecila, and others, who founded communities of nuns and in this way did much to educate and Christianize the young people of their own sex. At a somewhat later date another great missionary field was provided for Anglo-Saxon seal in the northern lands of Denmark and Scandinavia. St. Sigfrid led the way under the protection of King Olaf Tryggvesson, but the accession of King Canute to the throne of England was an important factor in this new development. Although not much is known of the history of the missions in Sweden and Norway, it has lately been shown by such scholars as Taranger and Freisen, alike from linguistic and liturgical considerations, that the impress of the Anglo-Saxon Church is everywhere recognisable in the Christian institutions of the extreme North.

VII. LITERATURE AND ART.—Both literature and art among the Anglo-Saxons were intimately bound up with the service of the Church, and owed almost all their inspiration to her ministers. In the century or more which preceded the terrible Viking raid of 878 extraordinary progress was made. Aldhelm, copy of the Gospel of St. John, now at Stonyhurst College, which was buried with St. Cuthbert and found in his tomb. But this precocious development of culture was, as already explained above, terribly blighted by the inroads of the Danes. With the era of King Alfred, however, there are many signs of recovery. His own Anglo-Saxon prose, mostly translations, is conspicuous for its grace and freedom, also the remarkable work of art known as the Alfred Jewel bears witness, with rings and other objects of the same epoch, to a very high level of technical skill in goldsmith’s work. Within the century of Alfred’s death we also find that in this period of comparative peace and religious revival an admirable school of calligraphy and illumination had grown up which seems to have had its principal home at Winchester. The Benedictional of St. Æthelwold and the so-called Missal of Robert of Jumièges are famous

Bede, and Alcuin represented the high-water mark of Latin scholarship in the Christian West of that day, and the native literature, so far as we can judge from the surviving poetry of Cædmon and Cynewulf (if the latter, as seems likely, is really the author of the “Christ” and the “Dream of the Rood”) was of unparalleled excellence. With this high standard the arts introduced from Rome, especially by St. Wilfrid and St. Benedict Biscop, seem to have kept pace. Nothing could be more remarkable for graceful design than the ornamentation of the stone crosses of Northumbria to the end of this period, e.g., those of Bewcastle and Ruthwell. The surviving manuscripts of the same epoch are not less wonderful in their way. We have spoken of the copy of the Bible written at Jarrow and taken to Rome by Ceolfrid as a present for the Pope. Two other equally authentic relics are the Lindisfarne Gospels and the MSS, which may be regarded as typical of the period. In literature also this was a time of great development, the inspiring motive of which was almost always religious. Considerable collections of homilies are preserved to us, many of them rhetorical in structure, which are specially connected with the names of Ælfric and Wulfstan. Besides these we have a number of manuscripts which contain translations, or at least paraphrases, of books of Scripture; Bede’s last work, as is well known, was to translate into his native tongue the Gospel of St. John, though this has not survived. St. Paul’s commonly Latin texts were transcribed, and an Anglo-Saxon gloss written over each word as an aid to the student. This was the case with the famous Lindisfarne Gospels, written and illuminated about the year 700, though the Anglo-Saxon interlinear translation was only added some 250 years afterwards. The manuscript, one of the treasures of the British Museum, is also remarkable for the beauty of its illuminated ornament. This form of decoration, though no doubt originally derived from the Irish missionaries who accompanied St. Aidan to Northumbria, soon became a distinctive feature of the art of the Anglo-Saxons. It is as conspicuous in their stone carvings (compare the early crosses mentioned above) as it is in their manuscripts, and has survived in a modified form. In the field of history, again, we possess in the so-called "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle", reaching in some manuscripts from the Saxon conquest down to the middle of the twelfth century, the most wonderful chronicle in the vernacular of many European peoples; while in the "Beowulf" we have a comparatively full transcription of a pagan Teutonic poem which in subject and inspiration is older than the eighth century. But it is impossible to enumerate within narrow limits even the more important elements of the rich literature of the Anglo-Saxon period. Neither can we describe the many architectural remains, more particularly of churches, which survive from before the Conquest, and which, though mainly noteworthy for their massive strength, are not by any means lacking in a sense of beauty or destitute of pleasing ornament. The ancient Saxon tower of Ely Cathedral, for example, might be appealed to as an illustration of the rest.

Anglia-Turni, an Italian diocese comprising twenty-seven towns and three villages in the province of Cosenza and the province of Cosenza, Archidioecesis Avenariae. The diocese is sometimes called Turni because this last-named city was transferred the See of Anglona, after the latter's destruction, in the days of Queen Anna of Naples. Mention of the Diocese of Anglona in history is very rare; all knowledge of its original and ecclesiastical organization is lost in the Middle Ages. Only in 1077 do we find a Bishop of Anglona, Simon, who was present at the ceremony of donation of some rich fields made by Hugo di Bari and his wife Ginnara to the celebrative Basilian monastery of Sts. Elias and Anastasius, near Montecorvino (Urgelli, vili, 79). The diocese contains 135 secular priests, and 95,000 inhabitants.

Angola and Congo, also known as Santa Cruz de Reino de Angola, and as São Paulo de Loanda, diocese of Portuguese West Afical, suffragan of Lisbon. Its territory was discovered by the Portuguese in the latter part of the fifteenth century, and after 1514 was subjected to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Grand Prior of the Order of Christ at Funchal in the Madeira Islands. In 1596 it was made an episcopal see by Clement VIII. The natives (Bantu, Bundas, Bushmen, etc.) number, it is said, 2,000,000. There are 1,000,000 Catholics, for whom, according to Father Werner's figures, there are 32 parishes, 8 churches, and 8 Catholic missions. In these figures he quotes the diocesan reports to the Propaganda, in "Missiones Catholicae", for 1888. The bishop resides at Loanda, a great seaport (14,000), with a railway that reaches inland some 200 miles to Ambaca, through a territory covered with rich plantations.
Angora, The Diocese of (Armenian rite), in Asia Minor (Asiatic Turkey).—The Europeans now call Angora, and the Turks, Engürü, the ancient capital of Galatia, in Asia Minor, which was known to the Greeks and Romans as Ancýra. Midas was its legendary founder, and it witnessed the triumphal march of Alexander. Under the Seleucids, Antiochus III (223-186 B.C.) it lost temporarily its freedom. It was the capital of the Galatian kings, Dejotaros and Amyntas. When the later died (25 B.C.), it became a Roman city and was very flourishing under Augustus. The Byzantines permitted its capture by the Persians in A.D. 619; later it is said, the Persians under the leader Sukhrad demolished the city. When the battle of Antioch, 1402, in which Sultan Bayezet was killed by Timour-Leng (Tamerlane) and his Mongols, and six months in 1833, when Ibrahim Pasha, the son of the Khedive Mehemet Ali, led the Egyptian troops as far as the Boeoporus. Though the chief town of the vilayet, or district, of the same name, the modern Angora no longer claims the glory of the old Ancýra. It can show, however, besides a great many inscriptions, the ruins of several Roman monuments, among them the famous temple of Rome and Augustus, on whose walls is inscribed in marble the will of Augustus, with the principal events of his reign (Archæum, Augustæum). Ancýra was at an early date a Christian city, and counts several martyrs; the best known are the Bishop St. Clement, whose memory is preserved by a mediæval church, and the publican St. Theodotus. Unhappily, neither the Acts of Clement nor those of Theodotus can claim high rank as historical documents. After the persecution of Maximinus (probably in 314) Ancýra witnessed an important council whose twenty-five canons are yet extant. Marcellus, Metropolitan of Ancýra, was prominent in the Arian controversy, likewise his successor Basil (d. 373). Among the other Metropolitans of Ancýra, St. Malchi, into Domitian, who took part in the Origenist controversies during the sixth century. The actual population of Angora comprises 18,000 Mussulmans, 16,000 Orthodox Greeks, 5,000 Catholic Armenians, 100 Protestant Armenians, 400 Jews. The Orthodox Greek community is governed by a metropolitan and has 2 churches, 1 monastery, 2 schools for boys, and 2 for girls. The Catholic Armenian community is organized as a dioecese, and has 4 churches, 1 convent for men, 1 for women, 3 schools for boys, and 1 for girls. The Gregorian Armenian community is governed by a bishop, and has 2 churches, 1 monastery, 1 school for boys, and 1 for girls. The Protestant Armenians have 1 church, and form a missionary station under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, directed from Cessarea. The little Latin colony, attracted by the railway, is visited by the Augustinians of the Assumption, missionaries at Cessarea. There is also a large French establishment conducted by the Christian Brothers. (See Ancýra. J. PAREIGRE.

Angoulême (Engolisma). Diocese of, comprises the Department of the Charente in France, and has always been suffragan to the Archbishopric of Bordeaux, under the old regime as well as under the Conooodat. Its first bishop was Ausonius, a disciple, it is said, of St. Martial, concerning whom we have two historical authorities: St. Gregory of Tours, who held that St. Martial preached the gospel in Limoges about the year 250, and the Limousin traditions, transmitted or invented by the chronicler Adhémar de Chabannes, who maintained that St. Martial was the immediate disciple of St. Peter. The latter opinion St. Ausonius was a bishop of the first century; according to the former, of the third century. We incline towards the opinion of St. Gregory. (See Limoges.) St. Salvius, honoured as a martyr at Valsplaines, whom the "Galîa Christiana" makes a Bishop of Angoulême, was undoubtedly only a missionary bishop of the eighth century. In the list of the Bishops of Angoulême is found the name of the poet Octavien de St. Gelais (1494-1502). The religious monuments of the province of Angoumois are remarkable for their admirable Romano-Byzantine façades. The most beautiful of them is St. Peter's Cathedral at Angoulême. The memory of a wealthy and famous Augustinian abbey, founded in 1122, is kept alive by its ruins at Couronne, near Angoulême. The Diocese of Angoulême (at the end of 1905), contains 330,305 inhabitants, 30 curés or first-class parishes, 332 succursals or second-class parishes, and 8 vicariates formerly with State subventions.

Angra, Diocese of, the episcopal see of the Azores, suffragan of Lisbon, known as Angra do Heroismo, created in 1534 by Paul III, vacant from 1637 to 1671. It is situated on the island of Terceira and includes, besides that island, the eight others that form the group of the Azores: São Jorge, Graciosa, Fayal, Pico, Flores, Corvo, São Miguel, and São Maria. The entire population is 1,320,943 Catholics, is 262,073. There are 353 priests, 108 parishes, 41 succursals, or mission, churches, and 332 churches and chapels.

Angulo, Pedro, native of Burgos in Spain, came to America in 1524 as a soldier, but joined the Dominican order in 1529, and became a companion of Las Casas in Guatemala, Central America in general, and the greater Antilles (Santo Domingo). He was made Provincial of the Dominicans for Chipas Province, and Bishop of Vera Paz, but died soon afterwards, in 1561. Fray Pedro Angulo was one of the principal figures of the earliest Indian Missions in Southern Mexico and Guatemala, much more important, capable, and successful than Las Casas. His devotion to his work knew no obstacles; he visited tribes after tribe, lived and taught among them. He was one of those who, perceiving the tendency of the Indian to grasp things rather with the eye than with the ear, resorted to charts on which biblical subjects were allegorically represented. These he carried with him through the wilderness to use as illustrations for his discourses to the natives. He was very proficient in two Indian languages, the Nahua and the Zutuhil, and wrote several tracts on religious subjects in the latter.

AD. F. BANDELIER.

Anhalt, Vicariate Apostolic, comprising the territory of the German Duchy of Anhalt, of 860 square miles. It contained, 1 December, 1905, 328,029 inhabitants: 13,493 Catholics, 311,999
Protestants, 1,460 Jews, and 1,077 members of other sects. The vicar apostolic is the Bishop of Paderborn, who names the pastors of the vicariate. There are four parishes: Dessau, Bernburg, Cothen, and Cleves. The public schools are under the direction of the State, yet the Church, with the permission and support of the government, maintains sixteen private schools and fifteen teachers, with about nine hundred children in average attendance. Before the Reformation, the territory comprised under the present vicariate apostolic belonged to the Bishopric of Meissen, Brandenburg, and Merseburg. The few Catholics who remained true to their faith after the fall of these dioceses, received little attention from the Roman Propaganda, to which they were subject until after 1622. In 1719, the Franciscans of the Saxon province of their order established a mission at Anhalt. In 1805, Duke Friedrich Franz gave it a chapel, and in 1807 permission to hold divine services in public. A mission was founded at Zerbst in 1773, and at Cothen in 1816. Duke Ferdinand of Cothen and his wife became Catholics at Paris, 24 October, 1825, and the Cothen parishes were attached to the congregation under the direction of Father Beckx, S.J. Pope Leo XII raised this to the dignity of a parish (17 May, 1826) and placed it directly under the Holy See, whose first representative was the Vicar Apostolic of Saxony, Papal Nuncio at Munich since 1827. The Jesuits resumed the charge until 1848; since then the parish has been under secular priests from the Diocese of Paderborn. The mission station at Dessau was made a parish in 1830; the Papal Nuncio established parishes 2 June, 1859, in Bernburg and Zerbst, which were not recognized by the government of Anhalt until 1871, being founded without its consent. By the Papal Brief of the 17 March, 1868, the Catholics of Anhalt became subject to Bishop Martin of Paderborn. Since that time with the approval of the government of Anhalt, the Bishop of Paderborn undertakes the direction of the Catholics of Anhalt as the "Apostolic Administrator in the Diocese of Anhalt." During the Prussian Kulturkampf, after the death of Bishop Martin (16 July, 1870), the see of Paderborn remained vacant, the appointment of the temporary vicar apostolic was assigned to the Nuncio at Munich; Canon Drobe of Paderborn was appointed Apostolic Delegate and bishop of Paderborn in 1882 (d. March, 1891). His successors were Simar, (1892) and Schneider (1900).

Johannes Lins, "Anicius, Saint, Pope, the Roman Pontiff who succeeded Pius towards the year 157, and reigned till about 168. According to Duchesne (Origines) the confusion of dates about this period is such that more exact verification is impossible. While Anicius was Pope, St. Polycarp, then in extreme old age, came to confer with him (160-162) about the Pashal controversy. Upon the end of the East celebrating the feast on the fourteenth of the month, and no matter on what day of the week it fell; whereas in Rome it was always observed on Sunday, and the day of the Lord's death on Friday. The matter was discussed but nothing was decided. According to Eusebius: "Polycarp could not persuade the Pope, nor the Pope, Polycarp. The controversy was not ended, but the bonds of charity were not broken;"

the Pope permitting the aged saint to celebrate on the day he had been accustomed to in the Church of Smyrna.

Hegepius, the first Christian historian whose writings are of great value, because he lived near the time of the Apostles, also came to Rome at this time. His visit is recorded by most eclesiastical authors as noteworthy, inasmuch as it calls attention to the fact that many illustrious men repaired to Rome at that period, thus emphasizing very early the supreme dignity and authority of the Roman Pontiffs. Marcellus, Clement, and Cerdus were also at Rome, disturbing the Church by their Manicheism. Anicius suffered martyrdom in 161, but the dates vary between 16, 17, and 20 April.

Anima, College and Church of the, in Rome.—S. Maria dell'Anima, the German national church and hospice in Rome, received its name, according to tradition, from the picture of Our Lady which forms the breast of arms (for we read Virgo between two souls). It was founded as early as 1350, as a private hospice for German pilgrims, and was erected on its present site in 1388, by Johann Peters of Dodrecht, officer of the Papal Guard, and his wife. Pope Boniface IX granted it indulgences in 1388. In 1406, it was raised by the German colony to the rank of a national institution and united with a Brotherhood governed by Provisors and a Congregation. The foundation was confirmed by Innocent VII, who exempted it from all but papal jurisdiction, and took it under his immediate protection. In 1418, it was greatly enriched by the legacy of its accursed founder, Dietrich of Nien. The Priors of the fifteenth century, with the exception of Sixtus IV, showed it great favour. United, in 1431, with the German hospice of St. Andrew which had been founded in 1372, by a priest, Nicholas of Kulin, it became during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the German national and religious centre in Rome, as well as burial place; in short, it became synonymous with the German nation in Rome, and in its remarkable Community Book (unscientifically edited at Rome and Vienna in 1875) the most important names may be found.

The chief "Protectors" of this period were: Theodor von Coblenz (1431); Gerhard von Elten (1431); Johann Rode (1431); Heinrich Sentilheben (1430); Nicolaus Tungen (1462); Albert Cock (1468); Melchior Neckau (1479); Johann Burckard of Stralsburg (1494); Bernhard Sculteti (1503); Kaspar Wirt (1506); Wilhelm of Eckenwort (1509); Jakob Acopcellus (1530); Martin Luspi (1536); Peter Vorsius (1542); Jadokius Hoftelder (1546); Kaspar Hoyer (1551); Alexander Junius (1557); Johann Fonek (1558); Kaspar Gropper (1564); Gerhard Voes (1584); Klemens Sublindius (1586); Richard Stravius (1589). These were followed, later, by: Lambert de Vivardis (1585); Hermann Ostenberg (1602); Johann Baptist Rembold (1614); Sigismondo de Vivardis (1619); Lukas Holstenius (1635); Theodorich Amayden (1636); the two Guatteri, and the two Emeryx.

The present church which owes its Renaissance style to the influence of Bramante, was built by German subscriptions, between 1499 and 1526. It stands on the site of the old church built between 1431 and 1499, and was decorated by the great artists of the period. Among its treasures is the famous Holy Family of Giulio Romano. It is the resting place of the last German Pope, Adrian VI, as well as of Cardinals Eckenwort, Gropper, Andrew of Austria, Siusius and the Hereditary Prince of Cleve (1575). Although the Emperor Maximilian I took the institution under his special imperial protection in 1518, it fell off greatly, during the period of religious strife; it remained nevertheless a stronghold of German nationalism, so far as it was in need. After Sixtus V, the Anima grew in political importance as well, inasmuch as during the great events that took place in Germany, and during the Thirty Years War, it came to be looked upon by the nation, the national representatives, and even by the pope, as a national work of thanksgiving and a refuge to all. The visitation of the Ambassador Martinits in 1697 (confirmed by an edict of Leopold I in 1699), ushered in the most eventful period in the history of the Anima. In 1742 the Congregation decided in favour of Maria Theresa and against the Emperor. In 1798, the French plundered the church and took possession of it as the property of the French Republic (in behalf of Belgium), but were driven out by the Neapolitan troops. An attempt on the part of Napoleon to annex this institution was also defeated. These vicissitudes had the effect of gradually changing the house from what it originally intended to be and of turning it over, almost entirely, to Italians. It was only in 1833 that the noble determination of the Emperor Francis Joseph I restored it to its former purpose. He opened the institution to his Austrian subjects, and brought about its reorganization by means of an Apostolic Vatitation in 1859 (Brief of 15 March).

From that time the Anima has gradually regained its old position, by timely adaptation to modern conditions. Its field of action is extending, step by step, to the boundaries of the German-speaking peoples. It has been the originator and support of almost every new German national undertaking in Rome. It possesses a special importance as the place where religious services are held on the occasion of political or national festivals, as parish church of the German colony, and as the centre in Rome of national charitable associations. It is also a hospice for German pilgrims, and the stopping place of German bishops and priests from Austria, Germany, and America. It acts, at the same time, as intermediary for Austrian and German dioceses in their relations with the Curia, and serves as a home for German-speaking priests.

The Anima, as a college of priests, dates back to the sixteenth century, it was founded by the well known Master of Papal Ceremonies, Burkhard of Strasbourg. As early as the sixteenth century it consisted of fourteen chaplains. No noteworthy persons, however, are to be found among them, for the reason that they held their positions for an indefinite term, or even for life. Notwithstanding numerous attempts to reform, especially that of 1584, the moral condition of the college left much to be desired. The French Revolution destroyed it, and, in particular, eliminated the German elements. It was only after the restoration of 1859 that the college was reorganized (1863). The brief of reorganization, placed in the possession of the college, enjoined that the members of the college "shall acquire a better and more perfect knowledge of theological matters in Rome and shall study the transaction of ecclesiastical affairs in the Holy See, so that each may carry to his diocese the methods of the Roman Curia, the spirit of discipline, and a true knowledge of the sacred curia's residence in Rome. The two years' residence in the college affords special opportunities for the study of canon law in theory at the Papal universities, and in practice under the higher church officials. It is for this reason that many students of the Anima are promoted, on their return home, to positions of trust and dignity in their respective dioceses. The list of deserving members, since its restoration, have gone forth from this training school, no fewer than 300 in all, includes eleven bishops and twenty university professors. In addition to the chaplains, whom the German and Austrian bishops appoint in regular succession, other priests are admitted on an indefinite term, and serve to all. The college is now residing in the house. The college is governed by a rector, who controls the spiritual management under a Cardinal Protector (at present H. E. Cardinal Steinhübel), and the temporal, under Austrian protection, assisted by a procurator. The first rector was the well known writer and universalist, Alois Flir, the restorer of the institution, who died in 1589 as auditor of the Rota. He was succeeded by Michael Gusmers, afterwards Dean of Brixen (1860-72); by Karl Jägig of Prague (1875-87); Frans Doppelbauer, now Bishop of Linz (1887-99); Frans Vogl, now Bishop of Trieste (1889-1902) and by the Rt. Rev. Ignatius Lohninger of Linz (since 1902).

Anima Christi.—This well-known prayer dates its origin from the first half of the fourteenth century and was enriched with indulgences by Pope John XXII in the year 1330. All the manuscripts practically agree as to these two facts, so there can be no doubt of their exactness. In regard to its authorship all we can say is that it was, perhaps, written by John XXII. Of this we are not certain, as this Pope has been falsely accredited with similar pious compositions, and a mistake could easily be made of confounding the one who gave the indulgence with the real author. The Anima Christi was and is still generally believed to have been composed by St. Ignatius Loyola, as he puts it at the beginning of his "Spiritual Exercises" and often refers to it. This is a mistake, as has been pointed out by many writers, since the prayer has been found in a number of prayer books printed during the youth of the saint and is in manuscripts which were written a hundred years before his birth (1511). James Mears, the English hymnologist, found it in a manuscript of the British Museum which dates back to about 1370. In the library of Avignon there is preserved a prayer book of Cardinal Peter De Luxemburg, who died in 1387, which contains the Anima Christi in practically the same form as we have it to-day. It has also been found inscribed on one of the gates of the Alcazar of Seville, which brings us back to the times of Don Pedro the Cruel (1350-69). This prayer was so well known and so popular at the time of St. Ignatius, that he only mentions it in the first edition of his "Spiritual Exercises", evidently supposing that the exertion or reader already knew it. In the later editions, it was printed in full. It was by assuming that everything in the book was written by St. Ignatius that it came to be looked upon as his composition. All this has been told at length by Guido Drees (Stimmen aus Maria-Laach, IV, 493) and B. Baeten (Revue historique, XXXII, 630).

Animals, Worship of. See IDOLATRY.

Animals in Christian Art.—In Christian art animal forms have always occupied a place of far greater importance than was ever accorded to them in the art of the pagan world. In the early days of Latin and Byzantine art, and even in the period of its full bloom in the Middle Ages, a prodigious number of representations of animals is found not only in monumental sculpture, but in illuminated manuscripts, in stained glass windows, and in tapestry as well. Three reasons may be given for this unexcelled fondness for animal life. First, because it affords an easy medium of expressing or symbolizing a virtue or a vice, by means of the virtue or vice usually attributed to the animal represented. Secondly, because of the traditional use of animal forms as an element of decoration. And, thirdly, because of that return to the direct study of nature on the part of the medieval designers, which included, in one loving investigation, man, the lower animals, and the humblest plants. The paintings of the first period, as seen in the Catacombs, show us, usually, the lamb accompanying the Good Shepherd, a representation of the Christian soul during its earthly life. Birds, too, appear, either as simple decorative elements transmitted from antique paintings, or used symbolically as in Noah's dove, symbolical of the Christian soul released by death; the peacock, with its ancient meaning of immortality, and the phoenix, the symbol of apotheosis. The symbol of perhaps the widest distribution is the Icthys, which since the second century has represented graphically the celebrated acrostic: "Jesus Christos Theou Uios Soter", and so becomes the symbol of Christ in the Eucharist. Artistically, these various representations are somewhat crude and artless, and show the decadence of the pagan art of the time, although a certain trace of youthful grace hints of the coming revival.

After the recognition of the Church by Constantine, the Apocalypse is the source from which are derived most of the decorative themes of Christian Art. The lamb is now the most important of these, and its meaning is either the same as before or, more frequently perhaps, it is symbolic of Christ the expiation victim. The dove is the Holy Spirit, and the four animals that St. John saw in Heaven (Apoc., iv. v.) are used as personifications of the Four Evangelists. Under the influence of Byzantine art, a great variety of fantastic animals, such as dragons, birds with human heads, winged lions, etc., entwined themselves around the decorative forms until foreign wars and the iconoclast movement brought this period of vigorous art to an end.

During the succeeding three centuries, we find merely unimportant artistic manifestations, and it is only in the Romanesque buildings that we find new types of animals. These are usually either purely fantastic or composite, that is, made up of elements of different species combined in one. Often, the subject grows out of foliage forms; and monsters are shown fighting one another. In the spandrels of the entrance doorways, around the glorified Christ, the lion, the ox, the man, and the eagle are shown, holding the holy books. This is a favourite motif in the sculpture of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Sometimes the JWes of a monster figure the entrance of Hall, into which sinners are plunged.

With the beginning of the thirteenth century Gothic art affords the greatest number and the best representations of animal forms. The great cathedrals, especially those of the Isle of France, where sculpture reached its highest point of excellence, are a sort of encyclopedia of the knowledge of the time. They show, therefore, examples of all the then known animals, that is, whether by legend or experience. The "bestiaries", popular treatises on natural history which exhibit a curious admixture of truth and error, are fully illustrated in the cathedrals in the stone carving of the capitals, the parapets, and the tops of the buttresses, and in the woodwork of the stalls. For example, one readily recalls the beautiful birds of prey, the wild boars, and the feline forms of the towers of Notre Dame in Paris; the birds covered with draperies, or the elephants at Reims; the enormous oxen of the towers of Laon, placed there in the service of those animals during the construction of the Cathedral. With the animals of the country, domestic or wild, those of remote parts of the earth, known by a few specimens, are also represented. Thus we find the lion, the elephant, apes, etc.; legendary animals also, like the unicorn, the basilisk, the dragon, and the Griffin. Imaginary creatures are also frequent, and the gargoyles alone display such a variety of them as to make us wonder at the fecundity of the artists of the period. Viollet-le-Duc remarks that he does not know, in France, two gargoyles alike. These unreal figures are, nevertheless, given such a semblance of reality as to make them the faithful copies of nature. The failure in modern times to rival these productions of medieval sculpture, while avoiding a literal copy of them, but increases our appreciation of their value. The symbol which usually attaches to the various animals is derived for the most part from the "bestiaries". Thus, for the lion, strength, vigilance, and courage; for the siren, voluptuousness; for the pelican, charity. The four animals which symbolize the leading characteristics of each of the Four Evangelists became more and more an accessory used to characterize the figure of the Evangelists themselves.

In the same way many saints, when not characterized by the instruments of their martyrdom, are accompanied by animals which identify them;
as, St. Roche, with a dog; St. Hubert, with a stag; St. Jerome, with a lion; St. Peter, with a cock; St. Paul the Hermit, with a raven, etc. The Bible, also, gives some motives, as the ram of Isaac, the golden calf, the brazen serpent. The artistic value of such works, whether in the Bible, is not too much praised or studied. With the fourteenth century, animals become less frequent in iconography. The fifteenth and sixteenth centuries use them again, but copied more closely from life, usually of small size, and without any intention of symmetry. In the sixteenth century, animals are now realistic, rabbits, lizards, etc. With the Renaissance, animals were nearly banished, except as an accessory to the human figure. Modern Christian art, being mostly temporary revivals of one or another period of the art of other ages, takes the symbols and decoration of the period under revival, without adding anything new. The study of animals, therefore, though adding much of value and interest to profane art, did not produce any results in church sculpture or painting worth mentioning.

PAUL P.CRET.

Animals in the Bible.—The Bible makes no pretensions to science; we must not therefore expect to meet in its pages with any kind of elaborate classification, whether zoological or otherwise. The sacred books, on the other hand, were composed by, and for a people almost exclusively given to husbandry and pastoral life, hence in constant communication with nature. To such a people references to the world, animal and vegetable, natural, and the more animals abounded in the country, the more frequent and varied these allusions may be expected to be. In point of fact, the names of a large number of animals—over a hundred and twenty species—occur in the Scriptures. A closer examination of the way in which references to animals are introduced, the frequency of allusions to certain species, and the date of the documents in which they are found, may give a fair idea of the conditions of the country at the different stages of its history. The species, for instance, called in Hebrew re'em, very probably the auroch, or wild ox, totally disappeared almost the whole of the Babylonian captivity; the wild ass, the lion, and a few others long ago became extinct in Palestine; other species are now so scarce that they could hardly afford a familiar subject for illustration. The variety of animals spoken of in the Bible is remarkable; the ostrich, for instance, a denizen of the torrid regions, and the camel of the waterless districts around Palestine, are mentioned side by side with the roebuck and deer of the woody summits of Lebanon. This variety, greater probably in Palestine than in any other country in the same latitude, should be attributed to the great extent of territory and temperate climate in this small country. Furthermore, that the Palestine desert, contrary to what is now as rich as it used to be during the Biblical times, must not be wondered at; the land, now bare, was then well wooded, especially on the hills east of the Jordan; hence the changes. Although no regular classification is to be sought for in the Bible, the classification of animals, some walks, others fly, many are essentially swimmers, several crawl on the ground. This classification, more empiric than logical, would not by any means satisfy a modern scientist; it must be known, however, if we wish fairly to understand the language of the Scriptures on the matters connected therewith. The first class, the behemoth, or beasts, in the Biblical parlance, includes all quadrupeds living on the earth, with the exception of the amphibia and such small animals as moles, mice, and the like. The Bible, however, includes the ichthyocert (behemoth in the strict sense), and beasts of the field, i.e. wild animals. The fowls, which constitute the second class, include not only the birds, but also "all things that fly", even if they "go upon four feet", as the different kinds of locusts. Of these, many are living in the mountains, and no particular species is mentioned; the "great whales" are set apart in this class, while the rest are divided according as they have, or have not, fins and scales (Lev., xi, 9, 10). The reptiles, or "creeping things", form the fourth class. References to this class are relatively few; however, it should be noticed that the "creeping things" include not only the reptiles properly so called, but also short-legged animals or insects which seem to crawl rather than to walk, such as moles, lizards, etc. From a religious viewpoint, all these animals are divided into two classes, clean and unclean, according as they can, or cannot, be eaten. We shall not attempt to follow the alphabetical order, the list of the animals whose names occur in the Bible; whenever required for the identification, the Hebrew name will be indicated, as well as the specific term used by naturalists. This list will include even such names as griffon, lamia, siren or unicorn, which, though generally applied to fabulous beings, have nevertheless, on account of some misunderstandings or educational prejudices of the Greek and Latin translators, crept into the versions, and have been applied to real animals. (In the following list D.V. stands for Douay Version, A.V. and R.V. for Authorised and Revised Version, etc., and Hebrew names for Hebrew names.)

ADDAX.—A kind of antelope (antilope addax) with twisted horns; it very probably corresponds to the dishon of the Hebrews and the pygarg of the divers translations (Deut., xiv, 5). ADDER.—A poisonous snake of the genus Vipera. The word, unused in the D.V., stands in the A.V. for four different Hebrew names of serpents. ANT. (Prov., vi, 6; xxx, 25).—Over twelve species of ants exist in Palestine; among them the ants of the genus Atta are particularly common, especially the atta barbaro, of dark colour, and the atta structor, a brown species. These, with the phidole megacephala, are, unlike the Driveri of northern Europe, not stored with stores of corn for winter use. Hence the allusions of the wise man in the two above-mentioned passages of Proverbs. ANTELOPE.—The word, first applied as a qualification to the gazelle, on account of the lustre and soft expression of its eye, has become the name of a genus of running quadrupeds intermedium between the deer and the goat. Four species are mentioned in the Bible: (1) the dishon (D.V. pygarg; Deut., xiv, 5), commonly identified with the antilope addax; (2) the gzb (Deut., xii, 15, etc.; D.V. roe) or gazelle, antilope dorcas; (3) the she'll (Deut., xiv, 5; D.V. wild goat; Is., li, 20; liii, 19; D.V. wild ox), which is identical with the bubalis; and (4) the yshmr (Deut., xiv, 5), the name of which is given by the Arabs to the roebuck of Northern Syria and to the oryx (the white antelope, antilope oryx) of the desert. APE.—Nowhere in the Bible is the ape supposed to be indigenous to Palestine, with the exception of the many monkeys, baboons, tarsiers, gibbons, and peacocks among the precious things imported by Solomon from Thrasy (II K., x, 22; II Par., ix, 21). Asp.—This word, which occurs ten times in D.V., stands for four Hebrew names: (1) Pethen (Deut., xxxii, 33; Job, xx, 14, 16; Ps., lii (Hebr., lvii), 5; Is., xi, 8). From several allusions both to its deadly venom (Deut., xxxii, 33), and to its use by... serpent-charmers (Psa., lvi (Hebr., lvii), 5, 6). It signifies that the cobras (ṣaṣṣaṣs) is most probably significant.

safely to step upon its body, or even linger by the hole where it coils itself, is manifestly a sign of God's particular protection (Psa., xc (Hebr., xc), 13; Isa., xi, 8). Sophar, one of Job's friends, speaks of the wicked as sucking the venom of pāšēn, in punishment whereof the food he takes shall be thrown in his face and in the gall of this poisonous reptile (Job, xx, 16, 14). (2) "Akḥāḥād, mentioned only once in the Hebrew Bible, namely Ps., cxxi (Vulg., cxxxix), 4, but manifestly alluded to in Ps., xiii, 3, and Rom., iii, 13, seems to have been one of the most highly poisonous kinds of viper, perhaps the Vipera inderita (Ehrenberg)." (3) Pyramids, very common in Syria and North Africa.

(3) Sháḥāl is also found only once to signify a snake, Ps., xcii (Vulg., xc), 13; but what particular kind of snake we are unable to determine. The word shāḥāl might possibly, owing to some copist's mistake, have crept into the place of another name now impossible to restore. (4)iphān (Is., lix, 5), "the hisser," generally rendered by basilisk in D.V. and in ancient translations, the latter sometimes calling it regulus. This snake was deemed so deadly that, according to the common saying, its hissing alone, even its look, was fatal. It was probably a small very venomous species, perhaps the basiliscus, according to Cheyne. Ass.—The ass has always enjoyed a marked favour above all other beasts of burden in Palestine. This is evidenced by two very simple remarks. While, on the one hand, mention of this animal occurs over a hundred and thirty times in Holy Writ; on the other hand, the Hebrew vocabulary possesses, to designate the ass, according to its colour, sex, age, etc., a supply of words in striking contrast with the ordinary penury of the sacred language. Of these various names the most common is ḥāmōr, "reddish," the hair of the Eastern ass being generally of that colour. White asses, more rare, were also more appreciated and reserved for the use of the nobles (Judges, v, 10). The custom was introduced very early, as it seems, and still prevails, to paint the most shapely and valuable donkeys in stripes of different colours. In the East the ass is much larger and finer than in our parts, and in several parts of the best breeds are carefully preserved. Asses have always been an important item in the resources of the Eastern peoples, and we are repeatedly told in the Bible about the herds of these animals owned by the patriarchs (Gen., xii, 16; xxx, 43; xxxvi, 24, etc.). The word is rendered "lame" in Gen., xxxi, 30, etc. Hence the several regulations brought forth by Israel's lawyer on this subject: the neighbour's ass should not be coveted (Exod., xx, 17); moreover, should the neighbour's stray ass be found, it should be taken care of, and its owner assisted in tending this part of his herd (Deut., xxii, 3, 4). If the ass is found foraging for itself in the mountains or elsewhere, the owner should be informed immediately, so that he maychester it. Although the Scriptures speak of "saddling" the ass, no saddle was used by the rider; a cloth spread upon the back of the ass and fastened by a strap was all the equipment. Upon this cloth the rider sat, a servant usually walking alongside. Should a family journey, the women and children would ride the ass, attended by the mule (Exod., xix, 20). This mode of travelling has been popularized by Christian painters, who copied the eastern customs in their representations of the Holy Family's flight to Egypt. Scores of passages in the Bible allude to asses carrying burdens; the Gospels, at least in the Greek text, speak of multitudes run by asses (Matt., xviii, 6; Mark, ix, 14; Luke, xxii, 12), etc. The Ass.—The Law forbade ploughing with an ox and an ass together (Deut., xxii, 10). The statement is confirmed by the statements of Greek writers. We learn that part of the cavalry force in the Persian army rode donkeys; we should perhaps understand from IV K., vii, 7, that the Syrian armies followed the same practice; but no such custom seems to have ever prevailed among the Hebrews. With them the ass was essentially for peaceful use, the emblem of peace, as the horse was the symbol of war. The flesh of the ass was unclean and forbidden by the Law. In some particular circumstances, however, no law could prevail over necessity, and we read that during Josiah's reign, when Benadad, king of Aram, was the enemy of the land, the city, that the head of an ass was sold for fourscore pieces of silver (IV K., vi, 25). Ass's Colt.—This is more specially the symbol of peace and meek obedience (John, xxi, 15). Ass, Wild, corresponds in the O. T. to two words, pē'rē and 'ārāk. Whether these two names refer to different species, or are, the one, the genuine Hebrew name, the other, the Arabic equivalent for the same animal, is uncertain. Both signify one of the wildest and most untameable animals. The wild ass is larger and more shapely than the domestic one, and outstrips the fleetest horse. Its untamableness joined to its nobleness made it a fit symbol for the wild and plunder-loving Ismael (Gen., xvi, 12). The wild ass, extinct in western Asia, still exists in central Asia and the deserts of Africa. Attacus (Lev., xi, 22).—Instead of this Latin word, the A.V. reads bald-locust. According to the tradition enshrined in the Talmud, the word is common to several insects, but the peaceful smooth head is probably signified. Aurochs, or wild ox (urus, primigenius), is undoubtedly the rimu of the Assyrian inscriptions, and consequently corresponds to the re'em or rōm of the Hebrews. The latter word is translated sometimes in our D.V. as rhinoceros (Isa., xxxii, 17; Job, xxxix, 9, 10), sometimes by unicorn (Ps., xxii, 22; xxxii, 6; xxi, 11; Isa., xxxiv, 7). That the re'em, far from being unicorn, was a two-horned animal, is suggested by Ps., xxii, 22, and forcibly evidenced by Deut., xxxii, 17, where its horns represent the two tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh; that, moreover, its aksa, or back, is a shrewd parallelism from the Hebrew text: The voice of Yahweh makes Lebanon skip like a bullock, and Sirion like a young re'em"; or Isa., xxxiv, 7: 'And the re'em shall go down with them, and the bulls with the buffalo;' and still more convincingly by such implicit descriptions as that of Job, xxxix, 10: 'Shall the rōm be willing to serve thee, or will he stay at thy crib? Canst thou bind the rēm with thy thong to plough, or will he break the cords of valleys after thee?" These references will be very clear, the last is a variant of the domestic ox, which one would try in vain to submit to the same work as its domestic kin. Hence there is very little doubt that in all the above-mentioned places the word aurochs be substituted for... rhinoceros and unicorn. The aurochs is for the sacred poets a familiar emblem of untamed strength and ferocity. It no longer exists in western Asia. Another kind of dog is the long-haired mastiff, dwelling among ruins (gen. Cynocephalus); it was an object of worship for the Egyptians. Some deem it to be the ‘haired one’ spoken of in Is., xiii, 21 and xxiv, 14, but it is very doubtful whether it ever existed west of the Euphrates. BADGER.—No mention of the badger (male furus) is made in the Bible, whereas the A.V. regularly gives it as the English equivalent for tăbah. The skin of the tăbah is repeatedly spoken of as used for the outer cover of the tabernacle and the several pieces of its furniture. The old translations, and the D.V. after them, understood the word tăbah to mean a color (violet; Ex., xxx, 5; xxvi, 14; xxxv, 7, 23; xxxvi, 19; Num., iv, 10, 25; Ezek., vii, 10); but this is a misrepresentation; so also is the rendering of the A.V.; for though the badger is common in Palestine, yet the Hebrew name most probably indicates the dogon (haliocore humprichtii or haliocore tabernaculii), a very large species of dog, wallowing in the dust and covered with a skin of which is used to the present day for such purposes as those alluded to in the Bible. BASTIJK occurs in the D.V. as an equivalent for several Hebrew names of snakes: (1) Pēthēn (Is., xc, 13), the cobra; had the Latin and English translators been more consistent, they would have rendered this well-known word here, as in the other places, by sap; (2) Ĉephe' and Ĉephe' ēnt (Prov., xxiii, 32; Is., ix, 8; xiv, 29; Jer., viii, 17; (3) Ėpēch (Is., ix, 5), a kind of viper impossible to determine, or perhaps the echis arenicola; (4) flying ṣārāph (Is., xiv, 29; xxx, 6), a winged serpent (?) possibly also a reptile like the draco fimbriatus, which, having long ribs covered with a fringe-like skin, is able to glide through the air for short distances. BAT.—The bat, fourteen species of which still exist in Palestine is reckoned among unclean “winged things” (Lev., xi, 19; Deut., xiv, 18). Its abode is generally in dark and desolate places such as ruins and caverns. BEAR.—The bear spoken of in the Bible is the ursus syriacus, scarcely different from the brown bear of Europe. Since the destruction of the forests, it is now rarely seen south of Lebanon and Hermon, where it is common. Not unfrequently met in the Holy Land during the O. T. times, this much dreaded animal is very conspicuous and destructive instants; to dare it was accordingly a mark of uncommon courage (I K., xvii, 34-36). Its terror-stirring roars and its fierceness, especially when robbed of its cubs, are repeatedly alluded to. BEAST, WILD.—The expression occurs twice in the D.V., but much oftener in the A.V., and R.V., where it is in several places a substitute for the awkward “beast of the field”; the Hebrew name of wild animals at large. The first time we read of “wild beasts” in the D.V., it fairly stands for the Hebrew word zār [Ps. lxxxix (Hebr., lxxx), 14], albeit the singular wild beast is a clumsy translation. The same word, however, rendered in the A.V. and R.V., as though it in some places a substitute for the masculine demonyms: (Is., xxxiv, 14), dragons (Ps. lxxxiii, 14; Jer., i, 39); it possibly refers to the hyena. BEE.—Palestine, according to Scripture, is a land flowing with honey (Ex., iii, 8). Its dry climate, its rich abundance, and variety of aromatic flowers, and its limestone rocks render it particularly adapted for beekeeping. Bees, therefore, are common in Palestine and hived, abound there. All the different species shown in the names of bombus, nomia, andrena, ommia, megachile, anthophora, are widely spread throughout the country. The hived honey bee of Palestine, apis lascala, belongs to a variety slightly different from ours, characterized by yellow stripes on the abdomen of the male bees (male fasciatus). It is seen only in rocks [Ps. lxxx [Hebr., lxxxii], 17], in hollow trees (I K., xiv, 25), even in dried carcasses ( Judges, xiv, 8). Syrian and Egyptian hives are made of a mash of clay and straw for coolness. In O. T. times, honey was an article of export [Gen., vi, 11; Ex., xviii, 17]. Bees are spoken of in Holy Writ as a term of comparison for nations or armies relentlessly harassing their enemies. Deborah, the Hebrew name for bee, was a favourite name for women. BEETLE, given by A.V. (Lev., xi, 22) as an equivalent for Hebrew, ārēh, does not meet the requirements of the context: “Hath the legs behind longer, whereon it hoppest upon the earth?” and more than the bruchus of D.V., some species of locust, the locusta migratoria being very likely intended. BEEMOTH, is generally translated by “great beasts”; in its wider signification it includes all mammals living on earth, but in the stricter sense it is applied to wild beasts of the desert. However in Job, xi, 10, where it is left untranslated and considered as a proper name, it indicates a particular animal. The description of this animal has long puzzled the commentators. Many of them now admit that it represents the hippopotamus, so abundant in Egypt; but others consider it as properly correspondent as well to the rhinoceros. BIRD.—No other classification of birds than into clean and unclean is given. The Jews, before the captivity, had no domestic fowls except pigeons. Although many birds are mentioned, there occur few allusions to their habits. Their instinct of migration, the tearing or netting them, and the caging of song birds are referred to. BIRD, DYED.—So does the English version, Jer., xii, 9, wrongly interpret the Hebrew ‘āygal, which means beast of prey, sometimes also bird of prey. BIRD, SINGING.—This singing bird of Soph., ii, 14, according to the D.V., owes its origin to a mistranslation of the original, which most probably should be read: “And their voice shall sing at the window”; unless by a mistake of some scribe, the word qöl, voice, has been substituted for the name of some particular bird. BIRD, SPECKLED, Hebrew ẓāḥāl (Jer., xii, 9). A much discussed translation. The rendering of the English is not unconvincing; but meaning less it may seem to some, is supported by the Targum, the Syriac, and St. Jerome. In spite of these authorities many modern scholars prefer to use the word hyena, given by the Septuagint and confirmed by Ecclesiasticus, xxiii, 22 as well as by the Arabic (žāāl) and rabbinical Hebrew (ẓāḥāl); names of the hyena. BISON, according to several authors, the re'em of the Bible. It belongs to the same genus as the aurochs, but being indigenous to America (whence its name, bos americanus) and specifically different from the aurochs, cannot possibly have been known by the Hebrews. BRITTEN, according to some interpreters, the English are related to the heron and inhabiting the recesses of swamps, where its startling, booming cry at night gives a frightening impression of delusion. In the D.V., bittern stands for Hebr. qa'tāth (Lev., xi, 18; Is., xxxiv, 11; Soph., ii, 14), although by some in consequence the same Hebrew word is rendered Deut., xiv, 17, by cormorant, and Ps. ci (Hebr., cii), 7, by pelican. The pelican meets all the requirements of all the passages where qa'tāth is mentioned, and would perhaps be a better translation than cormorant. Blast certain, designates, Deut., xxviii, 42, a voracious insect; the Hebrew pelicas, “chirping” suggests that the insect may cry, and might be substituted for blast. In Ps. lxvii (Hebr., lxxviii), 46, blast stands for ḥāsil, “the destroyer”, perhaps the locust in its caterpillar state.
in which it is most destructive. BOAR, WILD.—The only allusion to this animal is found Ps. lxxix (Hebr., lxxx), 14; however, the wild boar was undoubtedly always, as it is now, common in Palestine, having its lair in the woods and the most destructive to vineyards. BRUCHUS.—Though it occurs once (Lev., xi, 22) as an equivalent for Hebrew, "'arbeh" (probably the locusta migratoria), the word bruchus is the regular interpretation for yeldeg, "licker". The Biblical bruchus may be fairly identified with the beetle, or some lacewing akin to it. Anyway the yeldeg of Jer., li, 14, 27, should have been rendered in the same manner as everywhere else. BUBALE, antilope bubalis, or aelaphus bubalis, which should not be confounded with the bubale, bos bubalis, is probably signified by the Hebrew, 'heb', interpreted by the LXX as translators, wild goat, in Deut., xiv, 5, and wild ox, Isa., ii, 20. It still exists in Palestine, but was formerly much more common than now. BUFFALO (bos bubalis).—So does the D.V. translate the Hebrew, yahmär, III K., iv, 23 (Hebr., I K., v, 3). Being a denizen of marshy and swampy lands, the buffalo must have been scarcely known by the Hebrews. Moreover, its flesh seems to exclude the identification with the animal referred to in the above mentioned passage, where we should probably read roebuck. BULL.—Another word for buffalo, D.V., Deut., xiv, 5. According to good authorities, the ox, or white antelope, were introduced into Palestine by the yahmär, possibly meaning, as its Arabic equivalent does, both the roebuck and the ox. BULL.—A symbol of fierce and relentless adversaries [Ps. xxi (Hebr., xxii), 13]. BULLOCK.—The bullock, as yet unacustomed to the yoke, is an image of Israel's inordinate mind before he was subdued by the captivity (Jer., xxxi, 18). BUZZARD (Hebr., dâ'ah).—Probably the ringtail of D.V. and the glede of A.V. (Deut., xiv, 13); possibly, through a scribe's error, might be identified with the kite, dâ'ah, of Lev., xi, 14. The buzzard, three species of which exist in Palestine, has always been common there. CAMEL, one of the most popular representations of the deity among the Chanaanites. The camel is, in Biblical poetry, a figure for vexing and pitiless foes [Ps. xxi (Hebr., xxii), 13]. The lated calf was a necessary feature, so to say, of a feast dinner. CAMEL, a prominent domestic animal of the East with a head of one of the finest breed. In the desert, it is man's only draft animal. CAMEL, the one-humped camel (camelus dromedarius), and the two-humped camel (camelus bactrianus). The camel is used for riding as well as for carrying loads; its furniture is a large frame placed on the humps, to which cradles or packs are attached. In this manner was all the merchandise of Assyria and Egypt transported. It may not appreciate being hitched up, or may be hitched to a wagon or to a plough, and in fact is not frequently yoked together with the ass or the ox; the female supplies abundantly her master with a good milk; camel's hair is woven into a rough cloth wither and tents and cloaks are made; finally its flesh, albeit coarse and dry, may be eaten. With the Jews, however, the camel was reckoned among the unclean animals. CAMELOPARDALUS, occurs only once in the D.V. (Deut., xiv, 5), as a translation of xemir. The word, a mere transcription of the Latin and the Greek, is a combination of the name of the camel and the leopard, and indicates the giraffe. But this translation, which we find in the A.V. (chamois), is doubtless erroneous; neither the giraffe nor the chamois ever lived in Palestine. The wild sheep, or mouflon, which still lingers in Cyprus and Arabia Petraea, is very likely intended CANKERWORM, the locust in its larva state, in which it is most voracious. So does A.V. render the Hebrew, 'kaph, which the D.V. (Deut., vii, 20) seems better. CAT.—Mention of this animal occurs only once in the Bible, namely Bar., vi, 21. The original text of Baruch being lost, we possess no indication as to what the Hebrew name of the cat may have been. Possibly there was not any; for although the cat was very familiar to the Egyptians, it seems to have been altogether unknown to the Jews, as well as to the Assyrians and Babylonians, even to the Greeks and Romans before the conquest of Egypt. These and other reasons have led some commentators to believe that the word cat, in the above cited place of Baruch, might not unlikely stand for another name now impossible to restore. CATTLE.—Very early in the history of mankind, animals were tamed and domesticated, to be used in agriculture, for milk, for their flesh, and especially for sacrifices. Many words in Hebrew expressed the different ages and sexes of cattle. West of the Jordan the cattle were kept on high plains and hills south and east they roamed in a half-wild state; such were the most famous "bulls of Basan". CERASES (Hebr., shephiphon) should be substituted in D.V. for the colourless "serpent", Gen., xlix, 17. The identification of the shephiphon (porcupine, erinaceus famulus, or vipers caeroplastes) is evidenced by the Arabic name of the latter (shefum), and its customs in perfect agreement with the indications of the Bible. The cerastes, one of the most venomous of snakes, is in the habit of coiling itself in little depressions such as camel's footprints, and suddenly darting on any passing animal. CHAMELEON (Hebr., kōdāh).—Mentioned Lev., xi, 30, with the mole (Hebr., tinshemith), in spite of the authority of the ancient translations, it is now generally admitted that the tinshemith is the chameleon, very common in Palestine; whereas the kōdāh is a kind of large lizard, perhaps the land monitor (psammonaurus scincus). CHAMOIS (antilope rupicapra) is now totally unknown in western Asia, where it very probably never existed. The opinion of those who see it in the Hebrew xemir (Deut., xiv, 5) should consequently be entirely discarded (see Camelopardalis). CHARADRION (Hebr., 'ōphib, Lev., xiii, 13, in the D.V. xiv, 7); a wading bird, or plover; but it rather stands here for the hen, all the species of which (this is the sense of the expression "according to its kind"), numerous in Palestine, should be deemed unclean. CHECQUILVIS (Lev., xi, 5; Deut., xiv, 7), a mere translocation of the Greek name of the porcupine, corresponds to the Hebrew shaphôn, translated, Ps. cii (Hebr., civ), 18, by irchin, and Prov., xxx, 26, by rabbit. As St. Jerome noticed it, the shaphôn is not the porcupine, but a very peculiar animal of about the same size, dwelling among the rocks, with horns in holes, and called in Palestine "bear-rab", on account of some resemblance it bears to two other wild animals, the coney, or daman (byraz syriacus). Its habit of lingering among the rocks is alluded to, Ps. ciii, 18; its wisdom and defencelessness, Prov., xxx, 24-26. "It cannot burrow, for it has no claws, only nails half developed; but it lies in holes in the rocks, and feeds only at dawn and dusk, always hurrying sentinels posted, at the slightest squeak from which the whole party instantly disappears. The coney is not a ruminant (cf. Lev., xi, 5), but it sits working its jaws as if re-chewing. It is found sparingly in most of the rocky districts, and is known among Sinai" (Tristram). COBRA (naja aspis), the deadly snake called "the mango of the Hebrews, found in Palestine and Egypt and used by serpent-charmers. COCHINEAL (coccus ilticis).—A hemiptera homoptera insect very common on the Syrian holm-oak, from the female of which the crimson dye (kermes) is prepared. The complete name in Hebrew is equivalent to "scarlet insect", the "insect" being not uncommonly omitted in the translations. Cock, Hen, and serpent would be translated as "wild-cats", "spotted" and "the captivity. No wonder, consequently, that the three times we meet with the word cock in the D.V. it is owing to a misinterpretation of the primitive text. (1) Job, xxxviii, 35, the word סֶכְחֵי means soul, heart: "Who hath put wisdom in the heart of man? and who gave him understanding?" (2) Prov., xxx, 18, and Job, xxxvii, 24, could be translated as "serpent", "crown", "turtle-dove", or "the captive". (3) Is., xxii, 17, where the word גֶּבֶּר, great, strong man, has been rendered according to some rabbinical conceptions. In Our Lord's time domestic poultry, introduced from India through Persia, had become common, and their well-known habits gave rise to familiar expressions, and afforded good and easy illustrations (Mark, xii, 35; xiv, 30, etc.). Jesus Christ compared His care for Jerusalem to that of a hen for her brood. COCKATRICE. A fabulous serpent supposed to be produced from a cock's egg brooded by a serpent; it was alleged that its hissing would cause all other birds to fly, and that its breath, even its look, was fatal. The word is used in A.V. as the regular equivalent for Hebrew, קְפֶּה'וֹן. COLT.—See Ass's Colt (sup.). CONY.—See Chero- grillus (sup.). CORAL, Hebrew, רָמָּם should probably be substituted, Job, xxxvii, 18, for "eminent things", and Ezek., xxvi, 16, for "silk" in the D.V. The coral dealt with at Tyre was that of the Red Sea or even of the Indian Ocean; coral seems to have been scarcely known among the Jews. COU-MORANT (Lev., xi, 17; Deut., xiv, 17), very frequently met with on the coasts, rivers, and lakes of Palestine, probably corresponds to the שְׁלדָּכ of the Hebrew, although this name, whose meaning "the plunger", might be applied to some other plunging bird. COW.—See CATTLE (sup.). CRANE (grus cíne-rae).—The word does not occur in D.V., but seems the best translation of Hebrew, דֵּחָר, read in two passages: Is., xxxviii, 14, and Jer., viii, 7, where its loud voice and migratory instincts are alluded to. There is little doubt that the two above indicated places of D.V., where we read "swallow", should be corrected. CRICKET, a good translation for Hebr., צֶּכָּד, "chirping", which besides the feature suggested by the etymology, is described Deut., xxvii, 42, as a migratory insect. See CRANE. We do not read this word in any other place than Lev., xii, 29 (D.V.), where it corresponds to the Hebrew, צב; the animal is, nevertheless, often spoken of in the Holy Books under cover of several metaphors: רֶמֶד, "the proud" (Is., li, 9); דַּן, "the stretchier" (Ezech., xxix, 3); חָוָא, (leviathan) (Ps. lxii (Hebr., xxv), 14; Job, xi, 20, xli, 25). See DRAGON (inf.). The crocodile (crocóldi us vulgaris) is still found in great numbers, not only in the upper Nile, but also in Palestine. A remarkable description of the crocodile has been drawn by the author of the Book of Job. He depicts the difficulties of surviving even of all the birds, the Cuckoo, unoccupied as to voice, would be the bird called "the crocodile", Hebrew שִׁפַּדָּפֶה (Lev., xi, 16; Deut., xiv, 15), and there reckoned among the uncouth birds. Two species, the cuculus canus, and the oxylous Pla- darius live in the Holy Land; however there is little probability that the cuckoo is intended in the mention of "seas", where we should perhaps see the sea-water and the various species of sea-gulls.

DABOIA ZANTHINA.—See Bœdis (sup.). DAMAN.—See Cherogibus (sup.). DEER.—(Hebr., אָיֶל). Its name is frequently read in the Scriptures, and its habits have afforded many allusions or comparisons, which fact suggests that the deer was not rare in Palestine in ancient times. It was noted for its swiftness, its shyness, the love of the roe for her fawns, are alluded to; it seems from Prov., v, 19 and some other indirect indications that the words 'ayygal and 'ayygalah (deer and hind) were terms of endearment most familiar between lovers. DEMONS (Is., xxxiv, 14).—So does D.V. translate πέτρον; it is certainly a word of doubtful import. The word 'ayygal would refer to the hyena (hyaena striata), still found everywhere in caves and tombs. So also is the word "devils" of Bar., iv, 35. We possess no longer the Hebrew text of the latter; but it possibly contained the same word; anyway, "hyena" is unquestionably a far better translation than the mere meaningless "devils". DIPRA—The D.V., following the Vulgate (Deut., viii, 15) thereby means a serpent whose bite causes a mortal thirst; but this interpretation seems to come from a misunderstanding suggested by the Septuagint; the original writer most likely intended "watering place", and the D.V. rightly puts it, and not any kind of serpent. DOG.—The dog in the East does not enjoy the companionship and friendship of man as in the western countries. Its instinct has been cultivated only in so far as the protecting of the flocks and camps against wild animals is concerned. In the towns and villages it roams in the streets and places of which it is the ordinary scavenger; packs of dogs in a half-wild state are met with in the cities and are not unfrequently dangerous for men. For this reason the dog has always been, and is still looked upon with loathing and aversion, as filthy and unclean. With a very few exceptions, whenever the dog is spoken of in the Bible (where it is mentioned over forty times), it is with contempt, to remark either its voracious instincts, or its fierceness, or its loathsomeness; it was regarded as the emblem of lust, and of all uncleanness in general. As the Mohammedans, to the present day, term Christians "dogs", so did the Jews of old apply that infamous name to Gentiles. DOVE (Hebr., יְבָנָה).—Though distinguishing it from tór, the turtle-dove, the Jews were perfectly aware of their natural affability and speak of them together. The dove is mentioned in the Bible oftener than any other bird (over fifty times); this comes both from the great number of doves in Palestine, and of the favour they enjoy among the people. The dove is first spoken of in the record of the flood (Gen., viii, 8-12); later on we see that Abraham offered up some in sacrifice, which would indicate that the dove was very early domesticated. In fact several allusions are made to doves-cotes, with their "windows" or latticed openings. But in olden times as well as now, besides the legions of pigeons that swarm around the villages, there were many more rock-doves, "doves of the valleys", as they are occasionally termed (Ezech., vii, 16; Jer., ii, 14); . When the flight, the mountain gorges with the rustling of their wings. The metallic lustre of their plumage, the swiftness of their flight, their habit of sweeping around in flocks, their plaintive coo, are often alluded to by the different sacred writers. The dark eye of the dove, encircled by a line of bright red skin, is also mentioned: its swiftness and innocence, its love and affection, and love, and, most naturally, its name was one of the most familiar terms of endearment. Our Lord spoke of the dove as a symbol of simplicity; the sum of its perfections made it a fitting emblem for the Holy Spirit. DRAGON, a word frequently found in the translations of the Bible, at substitution, so it seems, for other names of animals that the translators were unable to identify. It stands indeed for several Hebrew names: (1)  דָּנָּן (Job, xxx, 29; Is., xxxiv, 13; xxxv, 7; xliii, 20; Jer., ix, 11; x, 22; xiv, 6; xlii, 33; li, 37; Mich., i, 8; Mal., i, 3), unquestionably meaning a denizen of desolate places, and generally connected with a bed; (2) תַּמְרֵּךְ by some scholars; (3) תַּמְרֵּךְ by others in a few passages with the sense of serpent [Deut., xxxii, 33; Ps., xc (Hebr., xci), 13; Dan.,xiv, 22-27]. In the latter most likely signifying the crocodile [Ps., ixliii (Hebr., lxxiv), 13; Is., li, 9; Ezek., xxxix, 3], or even a sea-monster (Ezek., xxxii, 2), such as whale, porpoise, or dugong, as rightly translated Lam., iv, 3, and as the ancient translators rendered Genesis, iii, 7; (3) ἱπποφόν (leviathan), meaning both the crocodile [Ps., ixliii (Hebr., lxxiv), 14] and sea-monster [Ps. cii (Hebr., civ), 26]; (4) ἱππόμοιον (Ps., ixliii, 14; Jer. 1, 39), which possibly means the hyena. Other places, such as Ezek., x, 7; xii, 6; Eccles., xxv, 23, can be neither traced back to a Hebrew original, nor identified with sufficient probability. The author of the Apocalypse repeatedly makes mention of the dragon, by which he means the "old serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, who seduce the whole world" (Apoc., xii, 1, estc.). On the dragon land and sea monster, represented as a monstrous winged serpent, with a crested head and enormous claws, and regarded as very powerful and ferocious, no mention whatever is to be found in the Bible. The word dragon, consequently, should really be blotted out of our Bibles, except perhaps Is., xiv, 29 and xxx, 6, where the ἰδίωτα ἰδίωτα is possibly spoken of. See Bashiik, 4 (sup.). DROMEDARY.—The word so rendered, Is., lx, 6, signifies rather a swift and nimbly bred camel. DUGONG.—See BADGER (sup.).

EGLE.—So is generally rendered the Hebrew אֶשֶּר, but there is a doubt as to whether the eagle or the vulture is intended. It is probable that the Hebrews did not distinguish very carefully these different large birds of prey, and that all are spoken of as though they were of one kind. Anyway, four species of eagles are known to live in Palestine: Aquila chrysaetos, aquila naxia, aquila heliaca, and circatus gallicus. Many allusions are made to the eagle in Scripture: its inhabiting the dizzy cliffs for nesting, its keen sight, its habit of congregating to feed on the slain, its swiftness, its longevity, its remarkable care in training its young, are often referred to (see in particular Job, xxxix, 27-30). When the relations of Israel with their neighbors were more perplexing, the eagle was an emblem of the Assyrians, the Babylonians, and finally of the Persian kings. ELEPHANT.—We learn from Assyrian inscriptions that before the Hebrews settled in Syria, there existed elephants in that country, and Tiglath-Pileser I tells us about his exploits in elephant hunting. We do not read, however, of elephants in the Bible until the Machabean times. True, III Kings speaks of ivory, or "elephants' teeth", as the Hebrew text puts it, yet not as indigenous, but as imported from Ophir. In the post-exilic times, especially in the books of the Maccabean authors, it is frequently mentioned; they were an important element in the armies of the Seleucids. These animals were imported either from India or from Africa. ERICUS, a Latin name of the hedgehog, preserved in the D.V. as a translation of the Hebrew word qippôd (Is., xiv, 23; xxxiv, 11; Song, ii, 14) and wrongly qippd (Is., xxxiv, 15). The above identification of the qippôd is based both on the Greek rendering and the analogy between this Hebrew word and the Talmudic (qippôd), Syriac (qûlûd), Arabic (qin̄fûd) and Ethiopian (qin̄fût) names of the hedgehog. Several scholars, however, discard this identification, because the hedgehog, contrary to the qippôd, lives neither in marshes nor ruins, and has no voice. The bittern meets all the requirements of the texts where the qippôd is mentioned. It should be noticed nevertheless that hedgehogs are far too rare in Palestine. As to the qippôd of Is., xxxiv, 15, read "sorrel" by some scholars. ATALIB, and interpreted accordingly by the Septuagint, Vulgate and the versions derived therefrom, its identity is a much discussed question. Some, arguing from the authorities just referred to, confound it with the qippôd, whereas others deem it to be the arrow-snake; but besides that no such animal as arrow-snake is known to naturalists, the Hebrew text seems to call for a different interpretation. The Hebrew language, generally poor, shows a remarkable opulence when there is question of all things connected with pastoral life. Six names at least, with their feminines, express the different stages of development of the sheep. Its domestication goes back to the time of Adam, so that the early traditions enshrined in the Bible speak of the first men as shepherds. Whatever may be thought of this point, it is out of question that from the dawn of historical times down to our own, flocks have constituted the staple of the riches of the land. The center of Palestine is generally the oris laticaudata, the habit of which, with its long tail, is the species of sheep, too well known to be here dwelt upon. Let it suffice to notice that scores of allusions are made in the Holy Books to these habits as well as to the different details of the pastoral life. FALCON.—See HAWK (inf.). FALLOW-DEER (cerus dama or dama vulgaris), believed by some to be so signified by Hebrew, yâhâtur. The fallow-deer is sacred in the Holy Land and found only on the Mount Thabor. If it is mentioned at all in the Bible, it is probably ranked among the deer. FAWN (Prur., v, 19), for Hebrew, yîlāh, feminine of yâl, which shoat represents it. It seems to result from the animal passages, rendered by wild goat (bez syriacus). See GOAT, WILD (inf.). FAWN.—An equivalent in D.V. (Jer., 1, 39), after St. Jerome, for Hebrew, t'yym. St. Jerome explains that they were wild beings, denizens of deserts and woods, with a hooked nose, a horned forehead, and goat feet. He translated the Hebrew by fig-faun, adding to the original the adjective fœcarii, possibly following in this the pagan idea which, supposing that figs incline to lust, regarded figs-graves a well fitted abode for fauns. The same Hebrew word is rendered Is., xiii, 22 by owls, and Is., xxxiv, 14, by monsters, which shows a universal confusion of the eagle and the owl. The true meaning being "howlers", seems to point out the jackal, called the "howler" by the Arabs. FLEA, spoken of I K., xxiv, 15; xxvi, 20, as the most insignificant cause of trouble that may befall a man. FLOCK.—The flocks of Palestine include generally both sheep and goats. The sheep eat only the fine herbage, whereas the goats browse on what the sheep refuse. They pasture and travel together in parallel columns, but seldom intermingle more closely, and at night they always classify themselves. The goats are for the most part black, the sheep white, dappled or piebald, forming a very marked contrast. The shepherd very properly leads the flock, calling the sheep by their names from time to time; in his footsteps follows an old he-goat, whose stately bearing affords to the natives matter for several comparisons; the Arabs, indeed to this day, call a man of stately mien a "he-goat". The Hebrew word at sun rises has been used in extraneous and is ordinarily in some of the many caves found on every hillside, and with trained dogs guards them at night. FLY.—Two Hebrew words are thus translated: (1) 'ārûh is the name of the Egyptian fly of the fourth plague; this name, a collective one, though rendered by dog-fly in the Septuagint, seems to signify all kinds of flies. Flies are at all times an almost insufferable nuisance; the common house-fly, with the goat, vexes men, while gad-flies of every description make the hedges, bushes, and trees, and the goats, sheep, and cattle, woe-begone, of infest animals. (2) Zebibb is likewise the collective name of the Palestinian fly, but more specifically of the gad-fly. Though a trifle less annoying than in Egypt, flies were, however, deemed a plague severe enough in Palestine to induce the nations to marvel at the greatness of the land of God. Baal-zebibb, the master of the flies, that they and their cattle be protected against that scourge. Fowl.—This word which, in its most general sense, applies to anything that flies in the air (Gen. i, 20, 21), and which frequently occurs in the Bible with this meaning, is also sometimes used in a different sense, forming the names of birds, to which reference is sometimes made in the Old Testament, where it stands for all fatted birds that may be reckoned among the delicacies of a king's table; so likewise Gen. xvi, 11 and Is., xviii, 6, where it means birds of prey in general. In this latter signification allusions are made to their habit of perching on bare or dead trees, or of flocking together in great numbers. Fox.—Thus is usually rendered the Hebrew, sh'dd, which signifies both fox and jackal, even the latter more often than the former. The fox, however, was well known by the ancient Hebrews, and its cunning was as proverbial among them as among us (Ezech., xiii, 4; Luke, xxi, 32). Faco.—Though not named as a word connected with O. T. in connection with the second plague of Egypt. Two species of frogs are known to live in the Holy Land: the rana esculenta, or common edible frog, and the hyla arborea, or green tree-frog. The former throngs wherever there is water. In Aqoc, xvi, 18, the frog is the emblem of unclean spirits. GAZELLE (Hebr., qebi, i.e. beauty) has been known at all times as one of the most graceful of all animals. Several species still exist in Palestine. Its different characteristics, its beauty of form, its swiftness, its timidity, the splendid and meekness of its eye, are in the present time, as well as during the age of the O. T. writers, the subjects of many comparisons. However, the name of the gazelle is scarce, if at all, to be found in the Bible; in its stead we read roe, hart, or deer. Like a few other names of graceful and timid animals, the word gazelle has always been in the East a term of endearment in poetry and art. G. (I Par., viii, 9; IV K., xii, 1; II Par., xxiv, 1; Acts, ix, 36). GECKO.—Probable translation of the ṣaḥaq of the Hebrews, generally rendered in our versions by shrew-mouse, for which it seems it should be substituted. The gecko, ptyodactylus gecko of the naturalists, is common in Palestine. GIER-EAGLE.—So does A. V. render the Hebrew, rāhham (Lev., xi, 18) or rāhamman (Deut., xiv, 17). By the gier-eagle, the Egyptian vulture (neophron pernopterus), or Pharaoh's hen, is generally believed to be signified. However, whether this bird should be regarded as the raven is not easy to decide; for while, on the one hand, the resemblance of the Arabic name for the Egyptian vulture with the Hebrew word rāhham seems fairly to support the identification, the mention of the rāhham in a list of wading birds, on the other hand, casts a serious doubt on its correctness. GRAFFER.—See CAMELOPAR-D. GAZA.—The Philistines, the Hebrews, and Pharaohs, often use the name scinosiph in Ex., viii, 16, 17 and Ps. civ (Hebr., cv), 31, and known under the familiar name of mosquito, culex pipiens, is taken in the New Testament as an example of a trifle. Goat.—Though the sacred writers spoke of the ewe more frequently than of the goat, yet with the latter they are very well acquainted. It was indeed, especially in the hilly regions east of the Jordan, an important item in the wealth of the Israelites. The goat of Palestine, particularly the capra membrina, affords numerous illustrations and allusions. Its remarkably long ears are referred to by Amos, iii, 12; its glossy dark hair furnishes a graphic type of the expression, human hair, none other than the hair of a goat. (Cant., iv, 1; vi, 4; this hair was woven into a strong cloth; the skin tanned with the hair on served to make boots for milk, wine, oil, water, etc. The kid was an almost essential part of a feast. The goat is mentioned in Dan., viii, 5, as the symbol of the sacred placidianon established by means of the separation of the just and the wicked on the last day is borrowed from the customs of the shepherds in the East. GOAT, WILD, Job, xxxix, 1; I K., xxxiv, 3, where it is an equivalent for yadël, translated, Ps., cii (Hebr., civ), 18, by hart, Prov., vi, 19, by fawn, is most probably the hez syriacus, a denizen of the rocky summits in Arabia and Syria, as it was regarded as a model of grace (Prov., v, 19), and its name, Jehovah, Jalaha, was frequently given to persons (Judges, v, 6; I Eed., ii, 56, etc.). GRASS-HOPPER, is probably the best rendering for the Hebrew, ṣădāb (Lev., xi, 22; Num., xiii, 34 (Hebr., xiii, 33); Is., xi, 22; Eccles., xii, 5), etc., as in the A. V., if the Hebrew word be interpreted "hopper" as Credner suggests; the D. V. uses the word locust. The grasshopper is one of the smaller species of the locust tribe. GRIFFON.—So D. V., Lev., xi, 13 (whereas Deut., xiv, 12, we read "grype") translates the Hebrew, pérê, the "breaker," whereby the latter is either a vector or a beast as the gypetus borbonicus, the largest and most magnificent of the birds of prey is probably intended. The opinion that the Bible here speaks of the fabulous griffon, i.e. a monster begotten from a lion and an eagle, and characterized by the beak, neck, and wings of an eagle and the legs and rump of a lion, is based only on a misinterpretation of the word. GRIFFON-VULTURE, a probable translation in several cases of the Hebrew, nēšeθ, regularly rendered by eagle. This most majestic bird (gyps fulvus), the type, as it seems, of the eagle-headed figures of Assyrian sculpture, is most likely referred to in Mich., i, 18, on account of its bare neck and head. GRYPH, Deut., xiv, 12. See GRIFFON (sup.).

HAIR.—See Asp (sup.). HARE.—Mentioned Lev., xi, 6; Deut., xiv, 7, in the list of the unclean quadrupeds. Several species live in Palestine: lepus syriacus in the north; lepus judaicus in the south and lepus arvernensis, common in the Jordan valley, to be distinguished from lepus aegyptiacus and lepus isabellinus. The statement of the Bible that the hare "cheweth the cud" is a classical difficulty. It should be noticed that this is not the reason why the hare is reckoned among the unclean animals; but the cause thereof should be sought in the fact that though it cheweth the cud, which certainly it appears to do, it does not divide the hoof. HART and HIND.—Either the fallow-deer, still occasionally found in the Holy Land, or the red deer, now extinct, or the deer generally. It has afforded many illustrations to the sacred writers, and was especially by its foveal (Cant., ii, 9; Is., xxxv, 9), its surfootedness [Ps. xvii (Hebr.), xviii], 34; Hab., iii, 19], its affection (Prov., v, 19), and its habit of hiding its young (Job, xxxix, 1). HAWK (Hebr., nāḳ) is, in the Scriptures, a general denomination including, with the falcon, all the smaller birds of prey, the kestrel, sparrow-hawk, and other less common, but common in Palestine. NIGHT-HAWK, A.V. for Hebrew, tahmad, more exactly translated in D.V. by owl; some bird of the latter kind is indeed undoubtedly intended, probably the barn owl (strix flammae). SPARROW-HAWK (falco nius), one of the hawks of Palestine, so common that it might be considered in the Scriptures to be the hawk par excellence. HEDGEHOG.—See Erinus (sup.). HEN.—See COCK (sup.). HERON.—Mentioned Lev., xi, 19, in the list of unclean birds, but probably in the wrong.
place in the D.V.; heron, indeed, should be substituted for charadrius, whereas in the same verse it stands for hirundo; the A.V. corriges it. See HART (sup.). HIPPOTOMUS—See BEHEMOTH (sup.). HOBBY (falco subbuteo). See HAWK (sup.). HORSE.—See HOUF (inf.). HORNET (Hebr., cil'ah; vespa crabro).—One of the largest and most pugnacious wasps; when disturbed they attack cattle and other stock with such violence that they are quite exterminated, even by the use of driving men and cattle to madness, but even of killing them (Exod., xxiii, 28; Deut., vi, 20; Jos., xxiv, 12). HORSE.—The horse is never mentioned in Scripture in connection with the patriarchs; the first time the Bible speaks of it, it is in reference to the Egyptian army pursuing the Hebrews. During the war of conquest and Judges, we find horses only with the Chanaanese troopers, and later on with the Philistines. The hilly country inhabited by the Israelites was not favourable to the use of the horse; this is the reason why the Bible speaks of horses only in connection with war. David and Solomon established a cavalry and chariot force; but even this, used exclusively for wars of conquest, seems to have been looked upon as a dangerous temptation to kings, for the Deuteronomy legislation forbids them to multiply horses for themselves. The grand description of the war-horse in Job is classic; it will be noticed, however, that its praise is more for the strength than for the swiftness of the horse. The prophet Zacharias depicts (ix, 10) the Messianic age as one in which no hostilities will be heard of; then all warlike apparel being done away with, the horse will serve only for peaceful use. HOUF (Lev., xi, 18; Deut., xiv, 18).—The analogy of the Hebrew with the Syrian and Coptic for the name of this bird makes the identification doubtful, although some, after the example of the A.V., see in the Hebrew darkhphath, the lapwing. The Egyptians worshipped the houf and made it the emblem of Horus. HYENA.—This word is not to be found in any of the English translations of the Bible; it occurs twice in the Septuagint, Jer., xii, 9, and Ecclus., xii, 22, being in both places the rendering for the Hebrew name קָבָהָד. The hyenas are very numerous in the Holy Land, where they are most active scavengers; they feed upon dead bodies, and sometimes dig the tombs open to get at the corpses therein. Two Hebrew names are supposed to designate this hyena, קָבָהָד (1) קַבָּהָד. This word, which has been interpreted "spotted bird," Jer., xii, 9, by modern translators following the Vulgate, has been rendered by "holy man." Ecclus., xii, 22. Despite the authorities that favour the above mentioned translation of Jer., xii, 9, the consistency of the Septuagint on the one hand, and on the other the parallelism in the latter passage, in addition to the analogy with the Arabic and rabbinical Hebrew names for the hyena, fairly support the identification of the קָבָהָד with this animal. (2) סִיִּיָּם, rendered in divers manners in different parts: "white" (Is., xi, 21; "denim," Is., xiv, 14; dragons, Ps. lxxii (Hebr., lxxiv), 14; Jer., i, 39). IBEX.—See GOAT, WILD (sup.). IBIS.—The word occurs twice in the D.V. (Lev., xi, 17; Is., xxxiv, 11) as an equivalent for יָנָהָס הָפֹל, some good authorities, however, though the יָנָהָס הָפֹל is mentioned among wading birds, do not admit the above identification and place the ibis among another group (cf. leprous, leprous, laphus), which term great owl, is spoken of. The ibis was worshipped by the Egyptians as the emblem of Thot. ICHEMUN.—See WEASEL (inf.). ICIRIN.—D.V. Ps. ci, 18. See CHEROGRILLUS (sup.). JACKAL.—Frequently alluded to in Holy Writ, this animal is real with many of the western translations, probably because the animal, however common in Africa and southwestern Asia is unknown in European countries. The name regularly substituted for jackal is fox. The jackal seems to be designated in Hebrew by three different names: שָׁיֲדָל ("the digger"); "tygyn, "the maner" and "the abuser." It is unable to state the differences marked by these three names. Numerous references may be found throughout the Bible to the jackal's howlings and gregarious habits. JERBOA.—This little animal, at least four species of which abide in Syria, is nowhere mentioned in connection with war. It is therefore useless, very probably be reckoned among the uncalled animals indicated under the general name of mouse. KESTREL.—A slender hawk, most likely one of the species intended by Lev., xi, 16, for it is very common in Palestine. The remark of Job, xxxix, 26, strikingly points out the tinnunculus cenchria, one of the Pales- tinian Kestrels. See COW. KITE.—See CATTLE (sup.). KITE.—As suggested by the analogy with the Arabic, the black kite (milvus migrans) is probably meant by Hebr. דַּאָה or דַּאָבָה (Lev., xi, 14; Deut., xiv, 13; Is., xxxiv, 15), interpreted kite in the D.V.; it is one of the most common of the scavenger birds of prey of the country, and for this reason, is carefully protected by the villagers. Other kinds of kites, in particular the milvus regalis, are common in Palestine. LAMB.—The Paschal Lamb was both a commemoration of the deliverance from the bondage in Egypt, and a prophetic figure: the Son of God sacrificed to free His people from the power of sin and death. See EWE. (sup.) LAMIA (Is., xxxiv, 14).—Is a translation of Hebrew, לִלִית; according to the old popular legends, the lamia was a female bloodthirsty monster, devouring men and children. In the above cited place, some kind of owl, either the screech or the hooting owl, is very probably meant. LAMMMERGEYER (gypaetus barbatus), very likely signified by the Hebrew, פֶּרֶס, translated by griffon in D.V. LARUS.—Lev., xi, 16; Deut., xiv, 15. See CUCKOO (sup.). HORSE-LEECH (Prov., xxx, 15).—Both the medicinal leech and the horse-leech are frequently found in the streams, pools, and wells; they often attach themselves to the inside of the lips and nostrils of drinking animals, thereby causing them much pain. LEOARD.—Under this name come a certain number of carnivorous animals more or less resembling the real leopard (felas leoparthus), namely felis jubata, felis lynx, felis rufus, etc., all formerly numerous throughout Palestine, and usually found especially in the woody districts. The leopard is taken by the Biblical writers as a type of cunning (Jer., v, 6; Osee, xiii, 7), of fierceness, of a conqueror's sudden swoop (Dan., vii, 6; Hab., 1, 8). Its habit of lying in wait by a well or a village is repeatedly alluded to. LEVIATHAN.—The word Leviathan (Hebr., לִיוֹתָתָה, which occurs six times in the Hebrew Bible, seems to have puzzled not a little all ancient translators. The D.V. has kept this name, Job, iii, 8; xl, 20; Is., xxvii, 1; it is rendered by dragon Ps. lxxiii (Hebr., lxxiv), 14, and ci (Hebr., civ), 28; the word leviathan (1) occurs in Job (xi, 20 and Ps. lxxxiii, 14); (2) a sea-monster (Ps. cii, 26, Is., xxvii, 1); (3) possibly the Draco constellation (Job, iii, 8). LION.—Now extinct in Palestine and in the surrounding countries, the lion was common there during the O.T. times; hence the great number of words in the Hebrew language to signify it; under this name alone more than a hundred and thirty times in the Scriptures, as the classical symbol of strength, power, courage, dignity, ferocity. Very likely as the type of power, it became the ensign of the tribe of Judah; so was it employed by Solomon in the decoration of the temple and of the king's house: hence the name D.V. north for the lion represents Jesus Christ as the lion of the tribe of Juda. The craft and ferocity of the lion, on the other hand, caused it to be taken as an emblem of Satan (1 Pet., v, 8) and of the enemies of the truth.
(II Tim., iv, 17). Lizard.—Immense is the number of these reptiles in Palestine; no less than forty-four species are found there. Among those mentioned in the Bible we may cite: (1) the Leätz, common name of the lizard; (2) the green lizard, the blind worm, etc.; (3) the chémat, or sand-lizard; (3) the cár, or dáb, of the Arabs (uromastix spinipes); (4) the kódh, the divers kinds of monitor (pammosaurus scincus, hydrotherosurus niloticus, etc.); (5) the ‘a‘ikah or gégé; (6) the sand lizard, possibly the locust in its larva state, the palmerworm; (7) the locust in general; (8) chagéb, most likely the grasshopper; (9) hégél, the “destroyer,” perhaps the locust in its caterpillar state, in which it is most destructive; (10) hágol, translated in the D.V. ophiomachus; (7) yélq, the stinging locust; (8) ñúcht, possibly the cricket; and (9) sólán, rendered by attuscus, or bald locust (probably the tree-locust). Unrecorded, or at least very rare, is the boil of every stage of its existence. Louse.—According to some this species of vermin was one of the features of the third Egyptian plague. It is but too common through all eastern countries.

Mildew.—A word occurring a certain number of times in the Bible. Believed by some to be a Hebraism for Hebrew, hégél, which probably means a kind of locust. Mole.—Two Hebrew words are thus rendered. The first, tinshémeth (Lev., xi, 30), would, according to good authorities, rather signify the chameleon; with the second, hapáppérath (Is., ii, 20), some burrowing animal is undoubtedly intended. The mole of Syria is not the common mole of Europe, talpa europea, but the mole-rat (spalax typhus), a blind burrowing rodent. Mosquito.—See Gnát (sup.). Motte.—Is in the D.V. besides Is., xiv, 11, where it stands for rimmah, “worms,” the common rendering for two words: ñák (Job, iv, 19), and ñe (Is., ii, 8), the exact meaning of the former is uncertain, whereas by the latter the clothes moth is meant. Mouflon.—See Chamois, Camelopardus (sup.). Mouse.—This word seems to be a general one, including the various rats, dormice, jerboas, and hamsers, about twenty-five species of which exist in the country. Moth.—The only one of the eight listed in Lev., xix, 19, the Israelites early in the course of their history possessed mules; these animals, in a hilly region such as the Holy Land, were for many purposes preferable to horses and stronger than asses; they were employed both for domestic and warlike use.

Ophiomachus.—See Locust (sup.). Oryx.—See Antelope (sup.). Osprey (Hebr., šémtygh).—The fishing eagle, which name probably signifies all the smaller eagles. Osiprage.—See Lammgeyeter (sup.). Osstrich.—Still occasionally found in the southeastern deserts of Palestine, the ostrich, if we are to judge by the many references to it, was well known among the Hebrews. The beauty of its plumage, its fleetness, its reputed stupidity, its leaving its eggs on the sand and hatching them by the sun’s heat are repeatedly alluded to. Owl.—A generic name under which many species of nocturnal birds are designated, some being known in the Hebrew, some others possessing none. Among the former we may mention the little owl (athene persica), the Egyptian eagle-owl (bubo ascalaphus), the great owl of some authors, called ibis in the D.V., the screech or hooting owl, probably the hilith of Is., xxxiv, and the lanius of St. Jerome and the D.V.; the former, called “a watchman” (i.e., night- hawkm to the Hebrew and rendered by night- hawk in the A.V.; and the gippóth of Is., xxxiv, 15, as yet unidentified. Ox.—See Cattle (sup.). Ox, Wild, Is., ii, 20, probably antilope bubalis. See Antelope (sup.).

Palmerworm (Hebr., qázám).—A general word for the locust, very likely in its larva state. Partridge.—Although very common in the Holy Land, the partridge is mentioned only three times in the sacred literature: I K., xxvi, 20 alludes to chasing it on the mountains; Jer., xvii, 11, to the robbing of its eggs; Ecclus., xi, 32, to keep the deposing partridge. Two kinds of partridges are known to reside in the hilly resorts of Palestine; the francolin inhabits the plains, and various sand-grouse are found in the deserts. Peacock.—The texts where it is spoken of (III K., x, 22; II Par., ix, 21) clearly indicate that it was not indigenous to Palestine, but imported, probably from India. Pelican, D.V., Ps. (Hebr., ci), 7, for Hebr. gádán, in other places is rendered by bittter, for which it might be advantageously substituted. Pelicans are usually found about marshes (Is., xxxiv, 11), and are in the habit of sitting for hours in sandy desolate places (Ps., ci (Hebr., cii), 7; Soph., ii, 14) after the dry season. Apparently the most voracious of all birds, even the palm tree (Hebr. hó) is in Job, xxx, 18, where the belief in its immorality seems referred to; however, the sense adopted by D.V., after Vulgate and Septuagint, should not be slighted. Pigeon.—See Doves (sup.). Plunderer.—See Cormorant (sup.). Porcupine.—An equivocal word, rendered in a number of passages with the analogy of the Hebrew qippód with the Arabic name of this animal, to be spoken of in the Bible. See Ericus (sup.). Porphyry is in Vulgate and D.V. (Lev., xi, 18), the equivalent for the Hebrew, râhám, translated in the Septuagint by sýmán and in the Greek version, porphyryon stands for the Hebrew tinshémeth, interpreted “sýmán” by the Latin and English Bibles. The hypothesis that the Greek translators used a Hebrew text in which the two words râhám and tinshémeth stood contrariwise to their present order in the Massoretic text, might account for this difference. This hypothesis is all the more probable because in Deut., xiv, 17, porphyry appears to be the Greek translation for râhám. Whatever this may be, whether the porphyry, or purple water-hen (porphyrio antiquorum), or the Egyptian vulture, should be identified with the râhám remains uncertain. See Gier-Eagle (sup.). Pygarg (Deut., xiv, 5).—This was the Latin name of the Large blue owl (tyto alba), which, in Greek, means “white-rumped,” a character common to many species, though the antilope addax is possibly sly rendered by the Hebrew word atônám.

Quail.—The description given Ex., xvi, 11-13: Num., xi, 31, 32; Ps., lxxvii (Hebr., lxxviii) 27-35, and ev (Hebr., ev), 40, the references to their countless flocks, their low flying, their habit of alighting on land in the morning, together with the analogy of the Hebrew and Arabic names, make it certain that the common quail (coturnix vulgaris) is intended.

ragamuffin. This name, applied to St. Paul by his sceptical teachers of Athens, has become, through a mistranslation, "word-sower" in our Bibles (Acts, xvii, 18). NIGHT-RAVEN, the equivalent in Ps. cx (Hebr., cii), 7, of the Hebrew word translated Lev., xi, 17, by screech-owl, seems to mean the blue thistle-grass, a very well-known bird of the country, which is fond of sitting alone on a roof or a rock. RHINOCEROS, Num., xxiii, 22, stands for Hebrew, re'em, and should consequently be rendered by aurochs. RINGTAIL.—So D.V., Deut., xiv, 13, translates rd'sh, possibly substituted by a scriber's error for dd'sh, and very likely meaning the black vulture (coragyps migrans).

SATyr.—So is the Hebrew s'dr rendered Is., xiii, 21, and xxxiv, 14, by R.V. (D.V.: "hairly one"). The same word in Lev., xvii, 7, and II Par., xi, 15, is translated "devils" in all English Bibles. S'dr usually signifies the he-goat. In the latter passages this sense is clearly inapplicable; it seems hardly applicable in the former. The writers of Leviticus, and II Paralipomenon possibly intended some representation of the same description as the goat-headed figures of the Egyptian Pantheon. Concerning the s'dr mentioned in Isaias, no satisfactory exact equivalent has yet been given. SCROCHEAL (sup.).—SCRPING.—See GNAT (sup.). SCORPION.—Very common in all hot, dry, stony places; is taken as an emblem of the wicked. SEA-GULL.—Its different kinds are probably signified by the word translated larus. See CUCKOO (sup.). SEAL.—See BADGER (sup.). SEA-MONSTER, LAM., iv, 3, probably means such animals as the whale, porpoise, dugong, etc. SERPENT.—A generic term whereby all ophidia are designated; ten names of different species of snakes are given in the Bible. SHREW.—So does D.V. translate the Hebr. tsdin, which however means rather some kind of lizard, probably the gecko. Siren, Is., xii, 22, a translation for Hebrew tdn, which indicates an animal dwelling in ruins, and may generally be rendered by jackal. No other resemblance than a verbal one should be sought between this tdn and the fabulous being, famous by its allurements, called Siren by the ancient poets. SNAIL should be read instead of wax, Ps., lviii (Hebr., lviii), 9, to translate the Hebrew, shtabthil. Unlike the snakes of northern climates which hibernate, those of Palestine sleep in summer. The Psalmist alludes "to the fact that very commonly, when they have secured themselves in some chink of the rocks for their summer sleep, they are still exposed to the sun rays; usually enveloping the whole of the body, till the animal is shrivelled to a thread, and, as it were, melted away" (Tristram).

SPARROW.—The Hebrew word cippor, found over forty times, is a general name for all small passerine birds, of which there exist about a hundred and fifty species in the Holy Land. SPIDER.—An insect living by millions in Palestine, where several hundred species have been distinguished. Its web affords a most popular illustration for frail and ephemeral undertakings (Job, viii, 14; Is., lix, 5); in three passages, however, the translators seem to have wrongly written spider for moth (Ps. xxxviii (Hebr., xxxix), 12; siah (Ps. lxxxix (xx), 9), and pieces (Os., viii, 5). STORK.—The Hebrew word sh'dhah, erroneously rendered "heron" by the Douay translators, Lev., xi, 19, alludes to the well-known affection of the stork for its young. Several passages have reference to this bird, its periodical migrations (Jer., vii, 7), its flocks, its nests, its flight, its feeding, and its use for making a rope, from its white body (Zach., v, 9; D.V., kite; but the stork, h'sh'dhah, is mentioned in the Hebrew text). Two kinds, the white and the black stork, live in Palestine during the winter. SWALLOW.—Two words are so rendered: derin, "the swift flyer", which means the chimney swallow and other species akin to it (Ps. lxxiii (Hebr., lxxxiv), 4; D.V., turtle; Prov., xxvi, 2; D.V., sparrow), whereas d'qš or q'sš may be translated by "swift", this bird being probably intended in Is., xxxviii, 14, and Jer., vii, 7. SWAN.—Mentioned only in the list of unclean birds (Lev., xi, 18; Deut., xiv, 16). The swan having always been a bird of great beauty there was little need of forbidding to eat its flesh; by the Hebrew ts'emeth, some other bird might possibly be designated. SWINE.—The most abhorred of all animals by the Jews; hence the swineherd's was the most disgusting employment (Luke, xv, 15; cf. Matt., vii, 25). SWINE are very seldom kept in Palestine. TIGER, Job, iv, 11 (Hebr., lysh'hah), should be "leon". TURTLE.—See DOVE (sup.).

VIPER.—See ASP (sup.). VULTURE.—So does D.V. render the Hebrew, gyyah, Lev., xi, 14; Deut., xiv, 13; Job, xxxviii, 7. As has been suggested above, the text of Job at least, seems to allude to the kite rather than to the vulture. Several kinds of vultures are nevertheless referred to in the Bible; so, for instance, the bearded vulture (gypaetus barbatus), called griffon in the D.V.; the griffon-vulture (gyps fulvus), the Egyptian vulture (neophron percnopterus), etc. In the biblical parable vultures are oftentimes termed eagles.

WATERHEN.—See PORPHYRION (sup.). WEASEL, Lev., xi, 29, must be regarded as a general name, probably designating, besides the weasel proper, the polecat and ichneumon, all very common in the country. WOLF.—See EAGLE, vultures, etc. (sup.). WORM.—in English the translation for two Hebrew words: rimmah [Exod., xvi, 24; Is., xiv, 11; (Job, vii, 5, A.V.); and toll (Exod., xvi, 20, etc.).]; these two Hebrew words are general; the former designates particularly all living organisms generated and swarming in decaying or rotten substances; the latter includes not only worms, but also such insects as caterpillars, centipedes, etc.

CHARLES L. SOUVAY.

ANIMISM (Lat., Animia, Soul) is the doctrine or theory of the soul. In current language the term has a twofold signification: I. PHILOSOPHICAL—the doctrine that the soul is the principle of life in man and in other living things. As applied to man it embodies the essence of spiritualism as opposed to Materialistic philosophy. II. ETHNOLOGICAL—a theory proposed in recent years to account for the origin and development of religions; according to it it is known as the Soul or Ghost-theory of religion.

PHILOSOPHICAL.—For the application of the theory of animism to living things in general, see Life. So far as it is specially concerned with man, animism aims at a true knowledge of man's nature and dignity by establishing the existence and nature of the soul, its union with the body, its origin and duration. These problems are at the basis of the animistic, and underlie all our studies in mental and moral life. The importance of animism to-day is shown because (1) its validity as a theory has been questioned; (2) a school has arisen which treats psychology without reference to the soul; and hence the attempt at "psychology without a soul", e.g. Sully; James, Murray, Dewey, Russell, Huxley.

In establishing the doctrine of animism the general line of reasoning is from effect to cause, from phenomena to their subject or agent. From the acts of mind and of will manifested in individual conscious life, we are forced to admit the existence of an indwelling power which is the human soul; from the nature of the activity is inferred the nature of the agent. Scholastic philosophy, with Aristotle and the Christian Fathers, vindicates the true dignity of man by proclaiming the soul to be a substantial and spiritual principle endowed with immortality. The soul is a substance because it has the elements of being, potency, stability, and is the subject of modifications—which elements make up the notion of substance. That the soul is a spiritual substance, i.e. immaterial and a spirit, is inferred from its acts of intelligence and of free will, which are performed without the intrinsic energy of the bodily organism. By consciousness is understood in general terms the future life of the soul after separation from the body. The chief errors are those which contend (1) that the soul is not a substance. Thus (a) some writers, e.g. Kant, hold that the soul is not a real, but only a logical, subject; (b) modern Pantheism, even especially in New England Transcendentalism (e.g. Emerson, Royce) and the Neo-Hegelian school which unifies human and divine consciousness (e.g. Prof. T. H. Green); (c) the school of Associationists (e.g. Hume, Davis, Höffding, Sully), who contend that the soul is only a bundle or group of sensations; (d) those who teach that the soul is only activity, nothing more (Wundt), or "a wave of consciousness" (Morgan); (e) the Agnostic and Positivistic school (e.g. Locke, Spencer, James, Prof. Bowne, Comte), who affirm that the soul is unknown and unknowable, although some among them postulate it, as the subject of our conscious states; (f) the materialistic school which denies its existence altogether (e.g. Tyndall, Huxley).

(2) That the soul is neither spiritual, nor immortal. Modern Materialism, Positivism, and Agnosticism have tried in every way to establish this thesis. Various theories of knowledge have been proposed, and the discoveries of modern science have been cited in its behalf. Appeal has been taken to psychophysiology and to such facts as the localization of function, the correlation of thought to the structure of the brain, and the results of cerebral lesion. Theories of Morism (e.g. the double-aspect theory) have been proposed to account for the acts of mind and of will. Yet animism as a doctrine of the spiritual soul remains unshattered, and the spiritualistic philosophy is only more strongly entrenched. (Cf. Substances, Agnosticism, Positivism, Materialism, Soul, Immortality, Psychology.)

Ethnological.—In this sense animism is the theory proposed by some evolutionists to account for the origin of religion. Evolution assumes that the higher civilized races are the outcome and development from a ruder state. This early stage resembles that of the lowest savages existing to-day. The belief in spiritual beings, and represents the minimum or rudimentary definition of religion. With this postulate as the groundwork for the philosophy of religion, the development of religious thought can be traced from existing data and therefore admits of scientific treatment and understanding. The belief in the animistic principle of continuity, which is the basal principle in other departments of knowledge, was thus applied to religion. Comte had given a general outline of this theory in his law of the three states. According to him the conception of the primary mental condition of mankind is a state of "pure fetishism, constantly characterized by the tree and the groove," the tendency to conceive all external bodies soever, natural or artificial, as animated by a life essentially analogous to our own, with mere difference of intensity. Proposed at a time when evolution was in the ascendency, this opinion fell at once under the severest criticism. The view was entertained that by a wider and more complete induction religion might be considered as a purely natural phenomenon and thus at last be placed on a scientific basis.

The foundation of animism as a theory of religion is the twofold principle of evolution: (1) the anthropological assumption that the savage race give a correct idea of religion in its primitive state; (2) the philosophical assumption that the savage state was the childhood of the race and that the savage mind should be likened to a child (e.g. Lubbock, Tylor, Comte, Tiele, Reville, and Spencer). Hence the conception of the child as the prototype of the religious conception is traced from existing data, viz. the beliefs of the lowest savages, and through deeply modified as mankind rises in culture, yet it always preserves an unbroken continuity into the midst of modern civilization. This continuum, or common element, in all religions is animism. The importance of animism in the science of religion is due to Tylor, who represents it as a primitive philosophy supplying at the same time the foundation of all religion. His work entitled "Primitive Culture", first published in 1863, is justly called the "Gospel of Animism". Animism comprehends the doctrine of souls and spirits, but has its starting point in the former. Dreams and visions, apparitions in sleep and at death, are supposed to have revealed to primitive man his soul as distinct from his body. This belief was then transferred to other objects. As the human body was believed to live and act by virtue of its own spirit, so it was believed that the soul as it seemed to be carried on by other spirits. To the savage mind, animals, plants, and all inanimate things have souls. From this doctrine of souls arises the belief in spirits. Spirits are of the same nature as souls, only separated from bodies—e. g. genii, fairies, demons—and acting in different ways as tutelary guardians, lingering near the tomb or roaming about (Spiritism), or incorporated in certain objects (Fetishism, Totemism). They appear to man in a more subtle material form as vapour, or as an image retaining a likeness to the bodily shape; and they are feared by him, so that he tries to control them. Religion has been called "superstition or animism." Thus unconsciousness, sickness, derangement, trance were explained by the departure of the soul. Among savages and Buddhist Tatars the bringing back of lost souls was a regular part of the sorcerer's profession. The belief prevails among the American Indians that if the sleeper suddenly he will die, as his vagrant soul may not get back in time. For the savage, as the lowest of men, is supposed to be actuated by the lowest of passions. Hence the fear-theory of religion is essential to animism.

Animism therefore discovers human life in all things, and animism, in all human thought. Animism is the belief in spiritual beings, and represents the minimum or rudimentary definition of religion. With this postulate as the groundwork for the philosophy of religion, the development of religious thought can be traced from existing data and therefore admits of scientific treatment and understanding. The belief in the animistic principle of continuity, which is the basal principle in other departments of knowledge, was thus applied to religion. In the rivers, the lakes, the fountains, the woods, the mountains, the trees, the animals, the flowers, the grass, the birds. Spiritual existences—e. g., elves, gnomes, ghouls, ghosts, manes, demons, deities—inhabit almost everything, and consequently almost everything is an object of worship. The Latin Romans, with their "day of the souls leading to the spirit-land"; and the Northern Lights are the dances of the dead warriors and seers in the realms above. The Australians say that the sounds of the wind in the trees are the voices of the ghosts of the dead communing with one another or warning the living of what is to come.

The perception of the human soul through dreams and visions served as a type on which primitive man framed his ideas of other souls and of spiritual beings from the lowest elf up to the highest god. Thus the gods of the higher religions have been evolved out of the spirits, whether ghosts or not, of the lower religions; and the belief in ghosts and spirits was produced by the savage's experience of dreams and trances. Here, it is claimed, we have the germ of all religions, although Tylor confesses that it is impossible to trace the process by which the doctrine of souls gave rise to the belief in deities. Originally, it seems, there were the traditions of elevation of human souls to non-human beings; they were not supernatural, but only became so in the course of time. Now, as modern science shows the belief in ghosts or spirits to be a hallucination, the highest and purest religion—being only the elaboration of savage beliefs, to the savage mind reasonable enough—cannot be accepted by the modern mind for the reason that it is not supernatural nor even true. Such in brief is the outline of the theory by which Tylor attempts to explain not only the phenomenon but the whole history and development of religion.

Tylor's theory expresses two sides of animism, viz., souls and spirits. Spencer attempts to synthesize them into one, viz., souls or ancestor-worship. He agrees with Tylor in the animistic explanation of dreams, dreams, death, madness, idiocy, i. e., as due to spiritual influences; but differs in presenting one solution only; viz., cult of souls or worship of the dead. "The rudimentary form of all religion," he writes, "is the propitiation of dead ancestors," or "ghost propitiation." Hence Spencer denies that the ascription of life to the whole of nature is a primitive thought, or that men ever ascribed to non-human and inanimate phenomena souls of their own. Spencer's theory is known as the "Ghost-theory of Religion" and at the present time is generally discredited even by evolutionists. With Tylor the worship of the dead is an important subdivision of animism; with Spencer it is the one and all of religion. Lippert consistently carries out the theory of Spencer and, instead of animism, uses the word Seelenkult. De la Sausaye says that Lippert pushes his view to an extreme and supports it with rich, but not over-trustworthy, material. Schultze considers fetishism and animism as equally primitive. F. B. Jevons rejects the theory that the gods of earlier races were spirits of dead men deified.

The animism of Tylor is vague and indefinite. It means the doctrine of spirits in general, and is best expressed by "Animated Nature". Fetishism is a subordinate department of animism, viz., the doctrine of spirits embodied in, or attached to, or conversing with, the material objects. The animism of Tylor differs little from the naturalism of Reville or the fetishism of De la Riaille. It accounts for the belief in immortality and metempsychosis. It thus explains the belief in the passage of souls from men to beasts, and to spirits and gods. It includes tree-worship and plant-worship—e. g., the classic hamadryad, the tree-worship of the South African natives, the rice-feasts held by the Dyaks of Borneo to keep the rice-souls in the plants lest by their departure the crop decay. It is the solution proposed for Manes-worship, for the Lores and the Penates among the Greeks and Romans, for the soul of the dead, for the souls of the gods who go on protecting the family as the chief deities of the tribe. In animism Tylor finds an explanation for funeral rites and customs—feasts of the dead, the human sacrifices of widows in India, of slaves in Borneo; sending messages to dead chiefs of Dahomey by killing captives taken in war, the slavering of the Haware's cow who is the soul of the Arab's camel at the graves of his masters, placing food and weapons in, or on, the tomb—customs which survive in the practice of burning paper messengers and placing stone, clay, or wooden substitutes on graves in China and Japan.

The general principles of animism are: (1) in the last analysis it is a biological theory, and attempts to explain all phenomena through analogy with biological phenomena. To the savage, and to primitive man, all moving things lived, and the fancy which created ghosts or souls to account for human life soon extended to the fancy which perceived ghosts or souls in other external objects. (2) The greater value it attaches to unwritten sources, viz., folk-lore, customs, rites, tales, and superstitions, in comparison with literary sources. (3) That spiritual beings are modelled by man on the primary conception of his own human soul. (4) That their explanation is based on the primitive childlike theory that they are thoroughly and throughout animated nature. (5) The conception of the human soul is the source and origin of the conceptions of spirit and deity, from the lowest demon up to Plato's ideas and the highest God of Monotheism. (6) Yet it gives no unified concept of the world; for the pervade, and crowd nature are individual and independent. (7) It is without ethical thoughts and motives. Thus Tylor holds as proved that religion and morality stand on independent grounds; that, while lower races have a code of morals, yet their religion—animism—is immoral, and thus the popular idea that the moral government of the universe is an essential tenet of natural religion simply falls to the ground.

The followers of Tylor have pushed these principles to an extreme and applied them with more or less success. The first and most direct method of the anthropological school is to begin with a pre-religious stage, from which religious ideas slowly emerged and elaborated themselves. Hence religious life was preceded by a period characterized by an utter absence of religious conceptions. Thus Tiele holds that animism is not a religion, but a sort of primitive philosophy, which not only controls religion, but rules the whole life of man in the childhood of the world. It is a belief that every living thing—i. e., moving thing—is for primitive man animated by a feeling, feeling, willing spirit, differing from the human in degree and power only; Religion did not spring from the idea of these manifestations are dominated by animism, that being the form of thought natural to primitive man. Pflouderer teaches that belief in God was formed out of the prehistoric belief in spirits, that these spirits are ancestor-spirits and nature-spirits and that the gods are simply the development of beliefs to which the worship of elders and chieftains was the first religion.

says "the present probability is that in the infancy of the race there was at least no objective expression of religious feeling", and that "there must have been a time in the progress of organic forms from some lower to that highest mammal, man, when he did not have, religious consciousness; for it is doubtful even the slightest traces of it can be discerned in the inferior animals". The French school of anthropology is distinguished by its outspoken atheism and materialism. Darwin, Spencer, and Lubbock hold that primitive man had no idea of God. Linguistic analysis, as Baynes clearly proves, shows this to be the real foundation of science; for it has exerted great influence on the study of religions during the last twenty years. This is shown in the animistic trend of Prof. Maspero’s study of the Egyptian religion; in the contention of the late Prof. W. Robertson Smith that the religion and social institutions of the Semites are founded on Totemism; in the emphasis laid on the animism of the ancient Israelites by Dr. Stade; in the worship of the dead and of ancestors among the Vedic Indians and the Persians; in the study of soul-worship among the Greeks, by E. Rhode. That this influence was not for good or evil is shown by Prof. Brinton’s argument that the acceptance of animism as a sufficient explanation of early cults has led to the neglect, in English-speaking lands, of their profounder analysis and scientific study.

Tylor published the third edition of “Primitive Culture” confident of having proved the evolution theory as to the origin of our civilization from a savage condition, the savage belief in souls and spirits as the germs of religion, and the continuity of this belief in its progressive forms of development up to Monotheism. Yet the hope was short-lived. Most scientific research, and especially criticism have repudiated this theory of its former wide influence. (1) The assumption that the lowest savages of to-day give approximately a faithful picture of primitive times is not true. Savages have a past and a long one, even though not recorded. "Nothing in the natural history of man", writes the Duke of Argyll, "can be more certain than that morally and intellectually and physically he can and often does sink from a higher to a lower level". Max Müller assures us that "if there is one thing which a comparative study of religions places in the clearest light, it is the inevitable decay to which everything is exposed. We cannot trace back a religion to its first beginnings, we find it free from many blemishes that affected it in its later states". Even Tylor admits that animism is everywhere found with the worship of a great God. Brinton holds that the resemblance of the savage mind to that of the child is superficial and likens the savage to the uncultivated and ignorant adult among ourselves.

(2) It is opposed by the Philological and Mythological schools. Thus Max Müller explains much in animism by superstition, a poetical conception of nature, and not by animistic personification. He says that inanimate objects were conceived as active powers and as such were described as agents by a necessity of language, without, however, predating life or soul of them; for human language knows at first no agents except human agents. Hence animism was a stage of thought reached slowly and not by divine inspiration. Such is Prof. Brinton’s conception of animism in ancient Aryan mythology", he writes, "is often no more than a poetical conception of nature which enables the poet to address sun, moon, rivers and trees, as if they could hear and understand his words." The same truth finds abundant illustration by the Duke of Argyll, who adds, "what is called animism is a superstition which, after having recognized agents in sun, moon, rivers and trees, postulates on the strength of analogy the existence of agents or spirits dwelling in other parts of nature also, haunting our houses, bringing misfortunes upon us, though sometimes conferring blessings. These ghosts are often mixed up with the ghosts of the departed and in many cases seem to have deserted the earth in the history of ancient superstition." The ghost, or ancestor, theory received a fatal blow from Lang’s “Making of a Religion”, where it is shown that the belief of the most primitive savages is in a High God, Supreme God, and Moral God. Lang thus confutes Tylor’s contention: (a) that man should not have possibly started with a belief in Supreme Being; (b) that religion and morality must have separate origins. Even in China, where ancestor-worship prevails, we find it distinct from the worship of gods, and there is no trace of an ancestor having ever become a god. Again, soul-worship and ancestor-worship are not identical, and with many tribes much attention is paid to conciliating the souls of the dead where ancestor-worship is unknown. Brinton holds the former to be older and more general. The aim is to get rid of the soul, to put it to rest, or send it on its journey to a better region. The latter who have other objects to maintain that folk-lore has no independent value and as a source of mythology is of only secondary importance.

(3) Animism is not the sole and chief source of religion. De la Saussaye says that the belief of the Teutons consisted of a number of connected ideas concerning spirits and souls, and that F. B. Jevons holds that the religious idea is no part of animism pure and simple, and to make the personal and agents of animism into super natural agents or divinities, there must be added some idea which is not contained in animism, and that idea is a specifically religious idea, one which is apprehended directly or intuitively by the religious consciousness. E. Mokt, whose inclinations lean to Tylor, is yet constrained by a scientific mind to recognize nature-worship and the great gods as original; and he warns the student of Teutonic mythology that he must not allow himself to be seduced into disregarding the fact that the worship of the God of Heaven is one of the most original elements of the Teutonic belief. De la Saussaye and Pfeiderer are agreed that the supposition according to which every conception of an object—e.g. tree, sun, moon, clouds, thunder, earth, heaven—as a living being has an animistic character is undemonstrable and improbable. They show from Teutonic mythology that the power and beneficent influence of these objects of nature and their symbolic conception belong to another sphere of ideas and sentiments than that of animism.

(4) Prof. W. Robertson Smith and Prof. Frazer conclusively prove that the animistic religion of fear was not universal nor primitive. According to Prof. Frazer, the primitive reason of sacrifice was in communion with God. Even if animism cannot be entirely explained animistically as the cult of souls. Animistic conceptions may enter into the worship of ancestors and heroes; but other ideas are so essential that they cannot be regarded merely as modifications of soul-worship. (5) It is not possible to define animism. Prof. Brinton says that no special form of religious thought which expresses itself as what has been called by Dr. Tylor Animism, i.e. the belief that inanimate objects are animated and possess souls or spirits." This opinion, which in one guise or another is common to all religions and many philosophies, "is merely a secondary phenomenon of the religious sentiment, not a trait characteristic of primitive faiths". De la Saussaye holds that animism is always and everywhere mixed up with religion; it is nowhere the whole of religion. Cf. Anthropology, Mythology, Evolution, Totemism, Shamanism, Religion, Spirituality.

Animuca, Giovanni, an Italian composer, b. at Florence about 1500; d. 1571. He was a pupil of Claude Goudimel. He was made choir-master at the Vatican and retained this position until his death. He was the real predecessor of Palestrina not only in office, but also in his earnest endeavours to attain harmonic clearness in the midst of all the devices of counterpoint then so much in vogue. He aimed at perfecting the style of the old Flemish school by harmonic fullness, by a more natural melodic progression of the voices, and a closer correspondence of the melody with the text. His friendship with St. Philip Neri resulted in his appointment as music-master to the new society founded by the saint. He composed the first laudi for its use. These laudi were songs of praise for several voices, and were always performed after the sermon. For the sake of variety, Animuca composed single stanzas and later on single lines in the shape of solos, concluding with a proper laurai for the effective chorus. A first version of them appeared in 1566, a second in 1570. These laurai proved to be the germ of the later oratorium, for from their dramatic tone and tendency the oratorium seems to have been developed. In this sense St. Philip Neri has been called the "Father of the Oratorios." In addition, Animuca composed many masses, motets, psalms, and madrigals of which some were published in Venice and Rome, 1548–88. But his compositions which were never printed are far more numerous, and the MSS. of them to-day are, for the most part, in the Sixtine Chapel, Vatican, Paris, and the library of Duke d. at Rome, 1563. He was choir-master at the Lateran for two years (1550–52). He left little printed music. There is a motet of his in a collection published at Venice (1568), and madrigals of his composition are found in many of the miscellaneous collections published between 1551 and 1611.

Anise (Matt., xxiii, 23) has been, since Wyclyf, the rendering of arvōn in the English Versions. But this is not accurate. The exact equivalent of the plant is Anisum (L.) (anc.) while Anise corresponds to the pimpinella anisum. The error in translation, however, is of great importance, both plants belonging to the parsley family (umbelliferae), and sharing many properties in common. The dill is an annual plant, "with finely striated stems, usually one foot to one foot and a half in height, pinnate leaves with wide segments, and yellow flowers" (Enc. Bib.). The Jews used it as a condiment. It is mentioned several times in Rabbinic literature, especially in connection with the question of tithes. Besides the articles specified in the Mosaic Law, the Rabbis had, in course of time, subjected to tithe many other objects, including the precious products of the earth that were esculent and could be preserved.

*Anna*s Verses of Scripture. See Bible, Versions of the.

Anna.—Supt. *Aphel: R. V. has Hannah, which is nearer the Hebrew and graciousness, from בנה, to be gracious. (1) Anna (I K., ii, 21), mother of Samuel, was one of the two wives of Elcanas, a man of Ramah, a Zuphite of the hill-country of Ephraim. As a true woman of her nation, she felt keenly the reproach of barrenness, all the more so that her rival, Phanelah, more favourably endowed then she, did not fail to remind her of her affliction (I K., i, 6–7). On one of the family's pilgrimages to Silo, Anna made a vow that, should God bless her with a son, she would consecrate him to His service as a Nazarite (I K., 9–11). Her prayer was heard, and after weaning her son, she brought him to Heli in Silo (I K., i, 24–28). This generous fulfilment of her vow was amply rewarded (I K., ii, 21). Anna's canticle (I K., ii, 1–10) gives rise to questions similar to those regarding the Magnificat, to which it has some striking resembances. Though a beautiful psalm, it is found inappropriate on Anna's lips, having no special reference to her situation, beyond the quite general remark in v. 5b. Unless v. 10b be taken as a prophecy of the rise of the monarchy or of the Messiah (cf. Vignourea, Bible polyglotte, II, 295 note), the canticle would be, whatever its more precise date, posterior to establishment of the monarchy. (2) Anna, wife of Tobias, and the wife of the tribe of Nephtalii (Tob., i, 9–9). Together with her husband and son, also called Tobias, she was taken into captivity to Ninive by Shalmanasar (i, 2, 11). Her rôle is quite secondary in the narrative. Her rather passionate nature serves to bring out more strongly by contrast the deeply religious character of Tobias (cf. ii, 19–22, and the beautiful prayer which his misunderstanding with his wife brings on the lips of Tobias iii, 1–6). Her sincere and solicitous love for her son is well expressed in v, 23–28; x, 1–7; xi, 5 (cf. the remark above).

(5) Anna is carefully described by Luke, ii, 36–38, as the prophetess of Pheletiel, of the tribe of Aser. The biographic notes given by Luke regarding the aged prophetess, of whom legend knows that she had had Mary under her tutelage in the Temple, bring out her great sanctity. In spite of her early widowhood, she had never married again, but had devoted her life to the service of God. She answered properly the portrait of the model widow of I Tim., v, 5–9. As she used to spend most of her time in the Temple, her presence at the scene narrated in Luke, ii, 25–35, is easily understood. Hence her praise to God, the subject of which was Jesus, with the burden that He was the longed-for Redeemer. Anna is also the traditional name of the mother of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Anna Comnena, Byzantine historian, eldest daughter of Alexius Comnenus, Emperor of Constantinople (1081–1118). She was born in 1083, and married for the fourth time to the Greek princes, an excellent education in the Greek classics, history, geography, mythology, and even philosophy. She was married to Nicephorus Bryennius, son of a former pretender to the imperial office, and in 1118 joined in a conspiracy to place her husband on the throne. Failing her ambition, she retired with her mother, the Empress Irene, to a monastery that the latter had founded, and wrote in fifteen books her famous "Alexian" (Ἀλέξιαν). It was finished by 1148, and describes the career of her father, from 1069 to his death in 1118; it is thus a continuation of her husband's "Historical Materials," that comes down to 1079. The Princess is the historian of the fortunes of the Comneni family. Her own observations are often valuable by reason of her personal knowledge and the close acquaintance with public affairs that she owed to her high rank, but she also made use of diplomatic correspondence of her family and the imperial archives. Critics praise the fullness and choice quality of her historical information; she seems to have gone so far as to utilize in her account of Robert Guiscard a Latin contemporary chronicle, which was written probably by the Archbishop of Bari. At the same time they point out the paucity and ultra-biographical character of her work, it being formally devoted to the fame and honor of her father. As a true Byzantine she looks on the Crusades only from the narrow and selfish standpoint of Constantinople, and detests soundly all Latins. The chronology is defective. She loves to describe scenes of splendor, great state-actions, audiences, and feasts, whatever is concrete and picturesque. Nor is she adverse to satire, court gossip, and distraction. Profounder matters, financial military, and constitutional, escape her purview. Withal, however, Krumbacher calls it "one of the most remarkable monuments of medieval Greek historiography," the first notable production of the medieval Greek Renaissance set afoot by Psellus and powerfully furthered by the family of the Princess. She strains in her vocabulary for an Attic elegance, though construction and style betray too often the difference between the two models (byzantine and classical) whom she aims at imitating. She avoids, as unfit for the pen of an historian, uncouth foreign names and vulgar terms. Her studied precision in the matter of hellenizing causes her pages to take on a kind of mummy-like appearance when compared with the vigorous, living Greek of contemporary popular intercourse.

Annals. Ecclesiastical. —The historical literature of the Middle Ages may be classified under three general heads: chronicles, annals, and lives of the saints.

Chronicles. Chronicles originated in ancient Greece, while annals are first found among the Romans. During the Middle Ages the term chronicle included every form of history, but the word in its earliest usage signified simply a chronological table. As a matter of fact, profane history, as dealt with by pagan historians, no longer appealed to Christian writers. History, as viewed from the Christian standpoint, took into account only the Kingdom of God, and to the new generation the centre of such history was the narration of the misfortunes undergone by the Jewish nation, a subject ignored by Roman historians. Christians and Jews read the history of the Old Testament in sympathy with their ideal. It was necessary, first of all, to synchronize the dates of Christian and profane chronology, so that an attempt might be made to combine the subject-matter of both. Thus it was that chronicles came into existence. St. Isidore of Seville (c. 601) attempted to synchronize the chronology of the Old Testament with the Bible, and the chronicles of the history of the Middle Ages were, in the main, collections of dates without causal connection or synthesis. The genius of one writer, St. Augustine, conceived an original way of fusing matter in a universal history, and embodied it in his treatise on 'The Two Cities'. He had no disciples, however, in the Middle Ages. These early chronicles reviewed the facts of universal history, and are to be distinguished from the chronicles of the eleventh century, which are merely local narratives chiefly concerning the history of the author's country. Moreover, the chronicles deal chiefly with the past, and this distinguishes them from annals properly so called.

Annals.—The term annals, though often confused with chronicles, nevertheless indicates a different class. Like chronicles, they are chronological records, but taken down successively, registering from day to day the events of each year. This gives an idea of the fundamental distinction between annals and chronicles. Chronicles are ordinarily compilations requiring lengthy preparatory work, arranged after a preconceived plan, and revealing the personality of their author in the conduct of the narrative. Annals, on the other hand, are original, and may be written by priests, monks, ecclesiastics, etc., without any apparent plan. When written from day to day, they require no effort of composition; they reveal a succession of many hands, and leave an impression of impersonal labour. They might well be compared with our daily papers, while chronicles come nearest to our modern memoirs. The prototype of all medieval annals is the famous "Chronograph", or Calendar, of 354, an official document of the Roman Empire, containing in embryo the annals of later periods. Besides an official calendar, and other items, this precious document has a record of other consular annals up to 354, the consular tables for the hundred years succeeding 312, a list of the popes up to Liberius, and a universal chronicle reaching as far as 338. Besides the consular annals drawn up at Ravenna, and of great importance for the fifth century, the consular tables are interesting, inasmuch as they throw light upon the origin of medieval annals. The method of calculation according to imperial reigns, were indeed necessary before the ancient chronological system was abandoned. But once this custom fell into disuse, the consular tables, used to determine the date of Easter and other movable feasts, became the basis of the chronology. of the day. Every church of any importance possessed a copy, and once Dionysius Exiguus had admitted the canon of Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, for calculating the dates of the Christian era, and Byzantium possessed large tables in his work entitled "De ratione temporum," the influence exerted by such tables increased.

Origin of Annals.—The use of paschal tables was very early prevalent in England, and the custom of making a chronological list of events was introduced into Gaul and Germany by Anglo-Saxon missionaries, who beginning their labours on the continent during the course of the seventh century. In the margin of these paschal cycles notes were made, opposite the year, of occurrences and historical events of which it was desired to keep a record. This is the origin of annals. The list of popes, as given by the "Chronograph", of 354, furnishes a concrete example of the formation of annals. This list, dating back to 230, was continually being filled out, and little it was embellished by an account of the chief events of the pontificate, a list of the works undertaken by the various pontiffs, their merits, details of ecclesiastical organization, and the management of their finances. This was the beginning of the famous "Pontificale Romanum", more commonly known under the title of "Liber Pontificalis". In imitation of this collection, there developed in many cathedrals and abbeys similar records, modelled on the plan of the "Liber Pontificalis". We may cite as examples the "Gesta episcoporum Aquitaniae" of the year 841, also the greater number of local histories of abbey or episcopal sees gathered in the eleventh century under such titles as "Gesta episcoporum Cameracensium", "Gesta episcoporum Leodiensium", etc. The annals which we find in embryo in the "Chronographus" and the "Liber Pontificalis" do not appear in a well-defined form until the Carolingian period. At least no specimens have come down to us dating from Merovingian times, and we can easily see why on the continent annals appear only towards the end of the eighth century. Having originated in England, where the tables of Bede were amplified by marginal annotations more copious as time went on, these rudimentary annals were introduced everywhere by the Anglo-Saxon missionaries. Copies were soon made of the marginal notes, and they were passed from hand to hand, and from monastery to monastery, copied separately on the general basis of all medieval annals. To these notes as a nucleus were added local data; the different versions were compared and arranged in chronological order; other annotations were made, of special local interest; lastly, they were filled out from other sources. Some of the earliest annals clearly betray their foreign source or origin. Thus the "Annales Mosellani", taken from the great annals of the monastery of Lorsch, show at the beginning of the records for 704–707 names undoubtedly Irish, proving that the little chronicle "De temporibus" of Bede was in use until 705, before the annals of Frankish origin appear for the first time. Of special interest, also, from this point of view are the annals discovered by Pertz in a manuscript of St. Germain-des-Prés. They begin with short annotations from Lindisfarne, for the years 643–664. Next in order come notes of Canterbury for 673–690. It appears that this manuscript was taken from England to the court of Charlemagne and there, from 782 to 787, inserted yearly the names of the different places where the Emperor celebrated Easter. To this primitive basis the monks of Saint-Germain-des-Prés added local annotations based in turn on ancient annals. In the Denison, names from Lindisfarne are found heading the annals of Fulda and Corvei. The earliest Carolingian annals are now grouped by historians under three principal heads: (1) The "Annales S. Amandi", and others derived from them; (2) The annals which grew out of the early historical narratives of the monastery of St. Germain-des-Prés; (3) The "Annales Lusien- ses". In spite of the imperfect character of these narratives, they show traces of true Carolingian legitimism, as well as the loyalty of their authors to the Austrasian dynasty. They are not continuous narratives, and their rudimentary form, consisting of a simple arrangement of recollections in chronological order, is the result of a class of literature. In Belgium especially these early annals were filled out in various monasteries, until after many alterations they formed the basis of the celebrated Chronicle of Sigebert of Gembloux (1112).

The Reichsannalen.—Under Charlemagne annals as a class began to appear in a new form. These narratives are without doubt anonymous, but many of them bear a personal stamp, which gives to the whole a certain official character. There now becomes apparent in annals a tendency to form a history of the kingdom, written under the inspiration of the court. Whence we have the term "Reichsannalen" in order to distinguish the latter class from monastic annals. The historian Ranke (Zur Kritik fränkisch-deutscher Reichsannalisten, Berlin, 1854) has demonstrated this official tendency especially in connection with the "Annales Lusenses maioris". These annals could not have been written in the solitude of the ecclesiastical cell, but under the internal influence of the court. If, on the one hand, the great internal misfortunes and disensions of the kingdom are carefully ignored, so as not to cast discredit on the reigning princes, the writers of these annals are nevertheless very well informed, and, on the other hand, show themselves to be fully in touch with whatever concerns military manoeuvres and international affairs. After 796 the "Annales Lusenses maioris" are written in an entirely different style, and in the form which characterizes them from this time until 829 there is a tendency to regard them as coming in part from the pen of Einhard. This is still, however, a controverted question. As the "Reichsannalen" date only from 741, need was felt of obtaining information on the history of the preceding period, and with this purpose in view (according to the opinion of Waits) the "Chronicon Universale" ("Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores", XIII, 1–19) was compiled and from these notes we find extracts from the "Little Chronicle" of Bede, diversified by matter borrowed from St. Jerome, Orosius, the chronicle of Fredegarius and his successors, the Gesta Francorum, the chronicle of Isidore of Seville, the "Liber Pontificalis", the "Annales Mosellani", and the "Annales Lausannenses". From about this same period date the "Annales Lusenses minores" (806?), the "Annales Maximi- mianiae" (710–811) and the "Annales of Flavigny" (816). The "Reichsannalen" were in greatest vogue, it is now thought, during the unity of the Carolingian empire under Charlemagne. Through the Carolingian period and the early years of the Empire, the "Chronica" of Verden and the account of the "Deeds of the House of the Romans" of Theodoric, we find in the now independent provinces direct continuations of the "Reichsannalen". In Germany the reigns of Louis the Pious and his sons produced the "Annales Fuldensis". There is no doubt that they were written in a monastery, and that the character of the narratives was entirely of alien origin, although they pretend to review the history of the whole kingdom. The author must certainly have been in touch with the court. The narrative is objective and of great value. For the period from 711 to 829, they draw upon the royal annals, from 741 to 787 from the "Annales Lusenses maioris"; and from 741 to 823 they take their inspiration from the "Annales Lusienes", which in turn have an undoubtlessly official character. A species of Reichsannalen is found in the "Annales Mettensis". In France also we have continuations of the "Annales du Benoît" (Copies) in the "Chronicon Universalitatum", a universal character. These annals are almost the only sources of the "Chronicon de gestis Normannorum in Francia", and after 835 were supplemented by the pen of Prudentius of Troyes (d. 861). They were continued by Hincmar of Reims to 885. Later, these annals with the "Annales Veronensis", passed into the "Chronicon Veronense", an attempt at a general history extending as far as 899. This class of annals was continued in the tenth century by Flodoard of Reims (d. 966), who reviewed the chief events from 919 to 966. The Reichsannalen were in vogue only in those countries that had once been part of the Carolingian Empire. For Lotharingia we must mention the "Chronicle" of Regino, Abbot of Prüm (d. 915), which covers the period between the birth of Christ and 906. The work is arranged according to the chronological list of the reigns of emperors, and the form resembles that of the Reichsannalen. Nevertheless, there is this difference, that Regino reviews the events of the past while the royal annals were contemporary with the events they recorded. In countries which were at some distance from the centre of the Carolingian empire, or which had never been under the sway of Charlemagne and his successors, annals took either the form of chronicles in Latin, if they were in a universal character, or were merely local narratives, as those which appeared in Carolingian provinces after the tenth and eleventh centuries.

Annales in Italy.—Thus Italy is very poor in annals, a barrenness which is attributed to the lack of speculative and theological interests in the country. It is difficult to give any praise to such examples as the "Chronica Saneti Benedicti Casinensis", written at Monte Cassino, under the Abbot John (914-934); the "Constructio Farfensis", a history of the foundation of the abbey, written at Farfa in the middle of the ninth century; an extract from Paul the Desioun with continuation, the "Andrea presbyteri Bergomatis chronicon", written at Bergamo in 877; and the chronicle of Benedict of St. Andrew, at Mount Soracte in 968, which, unfortunately, is filled with legends. All these productions, conceived in the annalistic style, are extremely barbarous, and one notes that some of them, like the "Chronicon Salernitaneum" of 974, which has some claims to literary merit. The matter is good despite the lack of critical ability which disfigures the work.

In Spain.—In Spain we find only universal annals or chronicles. Mention may be made of the "Chronicon" of Idafires, Bishop of Galicia (870), who continued the Chronicle of St. Jerome; and the Chronicle of Isidore of Seville, "De sex etatibus mundi", one of the earliest types of annals, dated according to the Spanish era, which began thirty-eight years before the Christian era.

In England, where annals based on the paschal cycle had their origin, furnished but few examples of this class, as compared with France and Germany. Worthy of notice are the "Annales Cantuarienses" (618-690); the "Historia Elenisa Ecclesiae" (700); the paschal tables and chronicle of Bede; the "Annales Nordhambranii" (794-802); the "Annales Cambriae" (550-823); the "Annales Cambriae" (444-1066), etc. In this country historiography proper begins only with the Norman Conquest (1066). At that time the authors of English chronicles begin to be vastly superior to others in their adherence to fact, and they evince a remarkable zeal for accuracy of information, and the employment of primary sources.

In Ireland. In medieval Ireland there was a special class of persons who made it their business to record, with the utmost accuracy, all remarkable events, simply and briefly, without any ornament of language, without exaggeration, and without (ellipses omitted). As a rule they set down only what occurred during their own lives; earlier happenings were regularly taken from previous compilations constructed on the same plan. The general accuracy of these records has been tested and verified in various ways, e.g. by their references to physical phenomena. It is known date (ellipses omitted) the concurrent testimony of foreign writers, their own consistency among themselves, and the evidence of ancient monuments. Many of the ancient Irish annals have disappeared and are known only by name; not a few, however, are still extant. To a great extent they were composed in the native tongue, Coille, and are therefore the most important philological monuments. Amongst these annals written entirely or mostly in Irish are the following: The "Chronographia Flanniae", principal of the school of Monumentales (d. 1056), known as "The Annalist" and the most learned scholar of his age in Ireland. This work exhibits in parallel columns the succession and regnal years of several pre-Christian, foreign dynasties, and are carefully constructed series of the Kings of Ireland. It contains, also, parallel lists of the same monarchs, and the royal Annals of Ireland and the Kings of Scotland, from the time of St. Patrick to 1119. This work, consisting of 4,000 lines, and is really annals or history versified, a kind of class-book or manual of general history for the use of his pupils (Hyde). Imperfect copies of it are preserved at Dublin in the "Book of Leabhar" and the "Book of Ballymote". The "Annales of Tigernach" (Teerna), written in Irish with an admixture of Latin, deal chiefly with the history of Ireland. He was Abbot of Clonmacnoise and Roscommon and died in 1088; it is conjectured by M. d'Arbois de Jubainville that his annals (valuable but meagre) were based on some ancient records kept uninterrupted at Clonmacnoise from 544, the year of its foundation. These annals were edited by Whitley Stokes in the sixteenth and seventeenth volumes of the "Revue Celtique" (Paris, 1895-96).

The "Annales of Inisfallen", compiled in the abbey of that name on an island in the Lakes of Lough Derg, except in one place, are probably Irish and Latin, are generally ascribed to the year 1215, though "there is good reason to believe that they were commenced two centuries earlier" (Joyce). They were later on continued to 1318 (O'Connor, S.S. Rev. Hib., 1825). The "Annales of Ulster" were written on the little island of Sensait Machair at St. John's Island, and are of great value. The "Annales of Loch Cé" (Key), from an island in Lough Key, Roscommon, are written in Irish, and treat chiefly of Ireland (1014 to 1638), though English, Scotch, and continental happenings are noticed. They were edited by the Rolls Society by W. M. Hennessy (London, 1871). The "Annales of Connaught" from 1224 to 1562 are written in Irish, and are extant in manuscript copies in Trinity College, and in the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin. The "Annales of Boyle", a famous abbey in Roscommon, are written in Irish and Latin, and though very meagre, come down from the remotest period to 1293 (O'Conor, id.). There is a vellum copy in the British Museum. The "Chronicon Scotorum" (Chronicle of the Scots, or Irish), of uncertain origin, but written out in its present shape about 1650 by the Irish antiquary Dualaí MacFirbis, was edited and translated for the Rolls Series by W. M. Hennessy (London, 1866). The “Annals of Clonmacnoise” from a very early date to 1408 were written originally in Irish, but are now known only in an English translation made in 1827. It was recently edited by Rev. Denis Murphy, S.J. (Dublin, 1896). It was only after the Norman Conquest that exclusively Latin annals were written in Ireland. Probably the most ancient of them are the “Annals of Multifarnham”, from the beginning of the Christian era to 1224, edited by A. Douglas Brewer, the Irish Ecclesiastical Gazetteer (Dublin, 1849). The same society published also the Latin annals of John Clyn (a Kilkenny Franciscan) and Thady Dowling, from the birth of Christ to 1348, “mere entries of names and facts”. The “Annals Hiberniae” of Christopher Pembroke, from 1162 to 1370, are said to be for that period “the chief authority on the affairs of the English settlement in Ireland” (ed. J. T. Gilbert, Rolls Series, London, 1884).

Monastic Annals.—The annals of the Carolingian period, the Reichenannen, and their continuations are to be found all through the Middle Ages. In the twelfth century, however, there appeared a new class of annals, which it is of importance to describe, for they sprang from new social conditions. By this time the feudal system had succeeded the former unity of the Carolingian kingdom. Each estate (fief), both lay and ecclesiastical, had become a little world apart, having full charge of its own life. The political seigneur and the sympathy of common interests disappeared, and churches and monasteries busied themselves chiefly with their saints, their relics, and their local interests. The consequences soon appeared in the province of historiography. There could now be no question of general or universal history. Local history prevailed, and with the exception of Germany, where the great universal concept of the Roman Empire had persisted, and where the great Chronicles suffer no default during this period, other lands give us chiefly monastic annals and local histories. The most important of these are the episcopal annals or chronicles, which review the history of the diocese or episcopate. They are generally arranged after the plan of the “Liber Pontificalis”, and relate in connection with each bishop or abbot the chief events and achievements of his administration in chronological order. Attempts had been made along the same lines in the earlier part of the Middle Ages and the Latin annals of Otmar of Freising, already named, and the celebrated chronicler Otto of Freisingen, or Bamberg (d. 1158). Son of St. Leopold of Austria, and related through his mother to the line of emperors, Otto was invited by Frederick Barbarossa, personally, to write the history of his times. It was for Frederick that he composed the “Chronicon”, a universal history in eight books filled with philosophical ideas, and imitating “De Civitate Dei” by St. Augustine. Otto reached the history of his own time (1100–46) in the seventh volume. The work was interrupted by his death, and was continued by Hagewin, Provoost of Freisingen, who added four volumes (1155–80). The whole is remarkable for the manner in which events are linked together.

Anglo-Norman Chronicles.—To this period belong the great Anglo-Norman chronicles, which came into existence with the conquest of William of Normandy. The principal Anglo-Norman chronicles are written by foreigners, the Normans being of the Frankish branch of the race. William of Jumièges, who in his “Histoire Normannorum” gives a résumé of the chronicle of Dudan of Saint-Quentin (860–1002) and continues it up to 1135; Odericus Vitalis, the most important of all, who wrote a general history of the Normans in England, France, England, and Normandy, “Histoire Ecclesiastique”, covering the period from the beginning of the Christian era to 1142. Lastly we have William of Malmesbury (d. 1148), who wrote the history of England, beginning with its Saxon origins, under the title “De Gestis Anglorum in hodierno saeculo” (with his “Historia Novella” (1126–46). At this time also there appeared two great chronicles, the “Chronica” of Roger Hoveden (732–1201) and the “Chronica major” of Matthew of Paris, beginning with the creation and continuing up to 1259. During the same period the Crusades gave the impulse for a new sort of literature, very often written by a private author after a preconceived plan, with an informing idea which dominates the narrative, giving it a personal character. The form alone still recalls earlier annals. During the eleventh century examples of this class were produced in Belgium: at Cambrai the “Gesta Sancti Remigii” becomes the “Chronicon” of Cambrai written by a clerk of the cathedral; at Liége the “Gesta episcoporum Lotharingiae”, by the Canon Anselm, a work directly connected with the chronicle of Herigerus of Lobbes. There are, even at this early period, great annals, real chronicles, embodying diplomas and acts of donation, with the subject-matter well synthesized. From this time on it is hard to distinguish between annals and chronicles. In addition we come across manuscripts, like the “Annals” of Lambert of Hersfeld (1077–80), which are in reality personal memoirs. By the side of these episcopal chronicles there appear an immense number of local annals, written with minute fidelity things of interest to the monastery—donations, misfortunes, floods, storms, transfers of relics, etc.—a miscellany reminding us of the various items of our daily papers. Some of these annals still recall the far-off origin of this class of literature and one may here place the “Chronicon St. Dionysii ad cyclicum parvum” (eleventh centuries). Every monastery of any importance possessed these collections of notes, the total number of which is extremely large. This movement is closely connected with the monastic revival, which began in the eleventh century owing to the Reforms of Cluny. With this religious awakening are connected two movements, one internal, the other external, which contributed not a little to the development of medieval historiography. On the one hand we have the Quarrel of Investitures and on the other the Crusades. For the Quarrel of Investitures, the final struggle above all, at the得意 in 1122, between Henry of Blois, already named, and the celebrated chronicler Otto of Freisingen, or Bamberg (d. 1158). Son of St. Leopold of Austria, and related through his mother to the line of emperors, Otto was invited by Frederick Barbarossa, personally, to write the history of his times. It was for Frederick that he composed the “Chronicon”, a universal history in eight books filled with philosophical ideas, and imitating “De Civitate Dei” by St. Augustine. Otto reached the history of his own time (1100–46) in the seventh volume. The work was interrupted by his death, and was continued by Hagewin, Provoost of Freisingen, who added four volumes (1155–80). The whole is remarkable for the manner in which events are linked together.
his characters, and in logical presentation of facts. His "Belli Sacri historia" is a work remarkable for the times. In Spain the most important Chronicle for the period of the Crusades is the "Chronica Hisp?nica" of Rodrigo de Torquemada of Toledo (1248), which is original in the section on the thirteenth century. The Crusades also gave birth to two other classes of historical literature: a revival of universal chronicles, and the Chronicles and Annals written in the vernacular.

Universal chronicles.—The annals and chronicles of the feudal period put into circulation an amount of disconnected information, and an attempt was now made to meet the need of a new method of synthesis, which was making itself felt. Universal and general history, which had disappeared at the advent of feudalism, gained fresh vigour during the Crusades, when the different territories and populations came once more into contact with each other, and the political horizon widened out. These Latin annals and chronicles bear a close resemblance to one another and rest for the most part on common sources. Patient toil has been required to distinguish between the original copies. However, we find the intrusion of legend into this field of literature. On the other hand, beginning with Robert of Auxerre, writers indicate their sources, perhaps under the influence of the scholastic method of disputation. The Crusades also mark the point of diversion between the universal chronicles and the historical chronicles in the vernacular. It was for the literate people—that is to say, the great mass of the populace who could not understand Latin—that the first chronicles and annals in the vernacular were intended. The earliest of these chronicles were in rhyme, like the ballads of the troub?"crs and trouv?r?es which they were intended to replace. They contain quotations from the Latin chronicles which were consulted, or of which a translation was attempted. In Normandy and in England the most important of these chronicles is Robert Wace (1155), Canon of Bayeux under Henry II of England. He wrote the "Roman de Brut", a popular version of the story of the Britons, and the "Roman de Rou", based in part on the Chronicles of William of Jumi"gues and Odericus Vitalis. For France mention may be made of Villehardouin (d. 1213), who in his "Conqu?ste de Constantinople" reviewed the history of the Second Crusade; and John of Nieul, called "chronographer", of Sigebert of Gembloux (d. 1112), a continuation of the chronicles of Eusebius and St. Jerome from 381 to the author's own time. In this work Sigebert, a well-informed man of independent spirit, follows the chronology of his predecessor Mar?nas Scoto, endeavouring to bring into proper proportion the various parts of his history. A multitude of annals of earlier centuries were used in the preparation of this "chronicle". Quite as important as the "chronicle" of Sigebert is the "chronicon uspergense" of Ekkehard of Aura (d. 1129?), one of the most celebrated German historians of the thirteenth century. Concerning the "chronicle" of Sigebert of Auxerre (d. 1212), we find that he marks the transition between the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. His chronicle, reaching from the Creation to 1211, preserves the moderation of the earlier chronicles, eliminating the tales and romances of troubadours and trouv?r?es, who had undermined the legendary literature that was gradually gaining in influence. Alberic of Trois-Fontaines (d. about 1252) made a brave attempt to resist the current, by disregarding romantic fictions in his "chronicle" (1241), but he admits without question the fables of P?etrus P?etrus. In this way these great compilations of annals of the thirteenth century lose their value what they gain in volume. At the same time John of Colonna (1298), an Italian Dominican, wrote his "Sea of Historie". Vincent of Beauvais (d. 1284), also a Dominican, compiled a great encyclopedia of annals, which is known under the title of "Speculum Majus". What gives an encyclopaedic character to this vast work is the fact that the author combines sacred, profane, and literary history into a continuous narrative. Too extensive to come into common use, this work of Vincent of Beauvais nevertheless had great vogue through the medium of the chronicle of Martinus Polonus (d. 1150), who arranged a condensed version.

Influence of the mendicant orders.—With the rise of the mendicant orders, such as the Dominicans, there arose a new literature answering the different needs of these orders. In contrast with the ancient Benedictines, who, being confined within the silence of their cloisters, found no interests outside the monastery, the Dominican monks were less concerned with feudal questions and mingled more in the life of the people. The result is that their annals, while containing more material of general historical interest, show fewer charters and documents, and care less for the local affairs of a province or an establisment. However, we find a beginning intrusion of legend into this field of literature. On the other hand, beginning with Robert of Auxerre, writers indicate their sources, perhaps under the influence of the scholastic method of disputation. The Crusades also mark the point of diversion between the universal chronicles and the historical chronicles in the vernacular. It was for the literate people—that is to say, the great mass of the populace who could not understand Latin—that the first chronicles and annals in the vernacular were intended. Authors of annals.—Medieval annals strictly speaking, that is to say collections in which facts are set down successively from day to day, are for the most part anonymous. There can be no question of discovering the authors of these collections, for often a brief examination of the original manuscript reveals a succession of many hands. Furthermore, it is very often impossible, or at least exceedingly difficult, to determine the original home of these annals.
They are very often called after the name of the monastery in which the manuscript was found, e.g. "Annales Bertiniensi", "Annales Sc. Amandi", etc. Often the only indication of the source of these Annals is the appearance of notes of local interest peculiar to the annals in question, inserted among common material known to have been taken from other sources. The repetition of notes concerning a definite locality or region may often lead to the discovery of the place of origin. Undoubtedly there are exceptions and the above-mentioned Lambert of Hersfeld, to cite no others, do not come within this anonymous class. But there are real chronicles, and even memoirs, in which the style, the co-ordination of material, revealing a personality, are corroborated by indications of the author himself. This is not true of the great majority of chronicles, and it happens more than once that great names like those of Herigerus of Lobbes, Anselm of Liege, Otto of Freisingen, Marianne Scotus, and Sigebert of Gembloux lend their authority to these literary productions. In annals and chronicles of a general character there is often to be found a section copied from the "Annales" of Fulda and others following, ginning with the very time of composition. In these annals the part which has been copied can often be traced very far back, and may reveal, in spite of the many disfigurations, the original source of this literary production. This is the case, for example, in the annals of the abbey of Nevers, written in Latin and discovered by Pertz and mentioned above. In chronicles the copied portion corresponds almost always to the period previous to the time when the author began to write and that alone, as a general rule, has any value as a contemporary document. These points apply only to annals properly so called, and to universal chronicles. We have, obviously, historical collections which are valuable in all their parts, but for annals properly so called the case is rare, and for chronicles it is true, in general, only of local chronicles. These, in fact, are often based on documents which may have perished, such as acts of donation, deeds, domestic memoirs, information of a more particular character than universal chronicles, and by far more liable to destruction.

Use of Annals and Chronicles.—We have seen that we possess some chronicles which are of great value because they embody within the narrative chronic values. It is often impossible to trace which have disappeared. These chronicles, then, perform the function of a cartulary. There are annotated cartularies where the various documents are arranged in chronological order for the reign of the abbot or prince during which the events took place. This is notably the case in the "Gesta Abbatum Lithiumensi" of Folcuin of Saint-Bertin, a work sometimes called "Chartarium Foluciini" (961). Episcopal chronicles also offer us frequent instances of this class. It is sufficient to mention the "Gesta episcoporum Cameracensium" of the eleventh century. The majority of these local chronicles reproduce popular legends of which they concern and confine themselves to recording gossip and various kinds of information. They often combine data based on monuments still in existence, without asking themselves whether the version of these sources had been tainted with legend, and they did not take the trouble to examine the origin and value of their information. We should not be too severe in passing judgment on these works. The authors were bounded by a limited horizon, often equipped with merely a rudimentary training, without the many devices for facilitating labours furnished by science to-day, such as works of reference and historiography. Such chronicles, moreover, were often written with the same purpose as the lives of the saints. Those, having a general tendency to enhance as much as possible the glory of their hero, were nothing more than panegyrics. Monastic chronicles and annals are not free from this, and even those of the Châtelain, who accounts for the life of the saint who founded the abbey, concerning themselves more with asceticism than with the historical facts and events, which would be of such value to us to-day. In conclusion, the first part of these chronicles, written for the most part by monks, and all too often in the manner of the "Pantocrator's Cycle", the copyists were often deceived as to the juxtaposition of chronological notes and historical events. This material error became later the source of a multitude of chronological mistakes, which, passing from the annals into compilations or universal chronicles, falsified the history. The chroniclers of this sort Marius Scotus wrote his chronicle. Finally, these annals and chronicles, being above all compiled works, were not concerned with eliminating the contradictions that the fusion of legendary and historical facts had caused. Thus Benedict of St. Andrew, of Mount Soratte, who accepted and reproduces the legend of Charlemagne's voyage to the Orient, an episode which had been spread abroad by legendary ballads. He inserts this narrative among the historical data taken from the "Vita Karoli" of Einhard, and does not seem to be at all chagrined at the contradiction resulting from this juxtaposition. It is true that there were in the Middle Ages choice minds, like those of Herigerus of Lobbes, Folcuin of Saint-Bertin, Otto of Freisingen, Sigebert of Gembloux, etc., whose works prove them to have been lights of criticism, but unfortunately they are the exception. All this class of literature is extremely valuable, as are official documents and parallel sources of information, if they are to serve as material for the history of the distant past.

Hanan, Syr. Hanan) of same derivation as Hannah (see Anna). Anna was succeeded (a. d. 6 or 7) Joazar in the high-priesthood by Apollonius of Tyana, who was succeeded by Antipater to attend to the incorporation of Archelaus's territory into the Roman province of Syria (Josephus, Ant., XVIII, ii, 1). After his deposition (a. d. 15) by V. Gratus, the high-priests followed upon one another in rapid succession: Ismael, Eleazar (son of Anna; perhaps the same as that of Acts, iv, 6, Anna being the Greekized name of Eleazar), Simon, until we come to Joseph, called Caiaphas, who knew how to retain the favour of the Roman authorities from a. d. 18 to 36 (Josephus, Ant., XVIII, ii, 2). But his deposition did not deprive Anna's influence which must have remained considerable, to judge by the fact that beside Eleazar, his son, and Joseph Caiaphas, his son-in-law (John, xviii, 13), four other sons, viz., Jonathan (perhaps the John of Acts, iv, 6, where D reads loutsas), Theophilus, Matthias, Ananus (Ananias) II., obtained the dignity of high-priests (Jos., Ant., XVIII, iv, 5; v, 11). The organization of his Church, and his references to Annas convey the same impression. His name appears with that of Joseph Caiaphas, who was the actual high-priest during the ministry of the Saviour (Matt., xxvi, 3, 57; John, xi, 49, 51) in the elaborate synchronisms wherewith St. Luke introduced the public ministry of Our Lord (xxii, iii, 2). The commanding position of the former high-priest is attested also by the prominent place accorded to him in Acts, iv, 6; here Anna is introduced as the High-Priest, whilst Joseph Caiaphas's name simply follows with those of the other members of the high-priestly race. These formulae, which might have left on the reader the impression that the author considered Anna and Caiaphas as discharging the functions of the high-priesthood simultaneously (Luke, iii, 2), or even that Anna alone was the actual high-priest (Acts, iv, 6), have given rise to many hypotheses—more or less plausible. They are to be considered as not strictly accurate, but they are a testimony to the ascendancy of Anna. But Anna is more than a mere chronological landmark in the life of the Saviour; according to our common text of John, xviii, 13-27, Anna would have played a part at a decisive point of the life of Jesus, at least in the arrest of the Lord was brought directly to Anna, in whose palace a kind of unofficial, preliminary interrogatory takes place, an episode entirely omitted by the Synoptists. It must be said, however, that the common text seems to be here in a disturbed condition, as Maldonatus had already remarked (I, 27-28). If the order of Sarm. (XVIII, 13, 24, 14-15, 19-23, 18-18, 25-27) is adopted, the succession of the facts gains in clearness and consistency, though the Anna epistle becomes altogether secondary in the narrative. The "house of Anna," wealthy and unscrupulous, is pronounced accursed in the Talmud, together with the corrupt high-priesthood. Originally, "hostess" of the sanctuary (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah I, 263 f.).

Annat, François, French Jesuit, theologian, writer, and one of the foremost opponents of Jansenism, b. 5 February, 1590, at Rodez; d. in Paris, 14 June, 1670. He entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus, 16 February, 1607, was professor of philosophy for six, and of theology for seven years, in the college of his order at Toulouse. Later he filled the same office at Montpellier. Later he was Assistant to the General in Rome, and Provincial of Paris. In 1654 he was sent to court as confessor to Louis XIV, and, after the faithful and unselfish discharge of the responsible duties of this office, he was compelled to retire from the service of the King to the Duchesse de la Vallière. He became known to the learned world, in 1632, by the publication of a defence of the Jesuit doctrine of Divine grace against the Oratorian Gibieuf. In 1644 he began a series of more lengthy contributions to the celebrated controversy that sought to reconcile human freedom with Divine efficacious grace. He was prominent in defending Catholic orthodoxy against the attacks of the Port Royal theologians, and merited, in consequence, the notice of the versatile Pascal, who directed the last of the "Provincial Letters" against Père Annat. A full description of his life and work is to be found in Sommervogel's "Bibliothèque de la compagnie de Jésus." A complete edition, in three volumes, of his writings appeared in Paris, in 1666, under the title "Opuscula Theologica." JAMES J. Sullivan.

Anнат, the first fruits, or first year's revenue of an ecclesiastical benefice paid to the Papal Curia (in medieval times to bishops also). One result of the centralizing of ecclesiastical administration in the Roman Curia during the course of the thirteenth century was that ecclesiastical benefices became more and more generally "collated," i. e. granted, directly by the Pope. This was so, not only in the case of bishoprics and monasteries, vacancies which were filled by Rome either by direct appointment or by papal confirmation, but also in the case of smaller church livings (canoncates, parishes, etc.). On such occasions the papal treasury received from the new incumbent a certain tax derived from the income of the living. Since the fifteenth century this tax has been generally known as annates, a term comprehending all monev taxes paid into the Apostolic Camera (papal treasury) on the occasion of the collation of any ecclesiastical benefice by the Pope. The term annata is derived from the Latin words "annata," meaning: (1) the servitia communia, payable on the granting of bishoprics or monasteries, appointments made in a consistory; these payments were divided between the cardinals and the papal treasury; (2) the servitia minuta, due on like occasions to various subordinate officials of the Curia; (3) the real annata in the narrower sense of the term, which were paid on the granting of a minor ecclesiastical benefice by the Pope outside of the consistory; all these payments reverted to the Apostolic Camera; (4) the so-called quindennia, payable every fifteen years by livings permanently united with some other bishoprics or parishes. Originally the real annata in the fourteenth centuries, annata, or annalia, signified only the third class, the taxes derived from lesser benefices. In their origin, therefore, as well as in actual character, annates are distinct from other money tributes received by the papal treasury, or Camera, from ecclesiastical persons and institutions—from the canons and prebends of certain cathedral chapters. In recognition of their direct dependence on the Chair of S. Peter, the pallium monies contributed by an archbishop on receiving the pallium, the visitation tributes given by an individual bishop and archbishop on his regular visitatio ad limina. Still more there are annates to be distinguished from those accruing to the Papal Curia chiefly from the kingdoms of Northern Europe (England, Denmark, Poland, etc.) in token of a certain protection accorded by the Roman Church, and from the feudal tribute due from such territories as stood in real feudal relationship to Rome (e.g. Naples). Among these payments made to the Roman Church in the fifteenth century under the general term of annates, the oldest are the servitium communia and the servitium minuta. At a very early period bishops who received episcopal consecration in Rome were wont to present gifts to the various ecclesiastical authorities concerned. Out of this custom there grew up a practice by which in the Roman Church in the thirteenth century a regular scale of payment was prescribed for all the dioceses and abbeys liable to this tax upon appointment or confirmation of their prelates. During the thirteenth century there likewise arose in many cathedrals and collegiate churches the custom, later prating for the bishop or other ecclesiastical officials a year's income from vacant benefices. In exceptional cases some bishops received from the Pope authority to levy this annate on all benefices in their dioceses falling vacant within a specified period. In 1306 Clement V reserved for the papal treasury a year's revenues from all benefices throughout England and Scotland at that time vacant or falling vacant within a period of three years. John XXII, in 1316, made a similar reservation of annates for three years on all ecclesiastical livings, with a few exceptions. From this time on the popes of the fourteenth century were frequently forced to limit the scale and measures to be taken to relieve the Church from the straits. Moreover, after the thirteenth century the annate was required from benefices that had been for any reason whatever collated directly by the Pope. This practice was fixed by John XXII (1316–34) at half the annual revenue. At the Council of Constance (1414–18) and later, many complaints were made concerning these assessments; and in concordate made by the popes with separate countries the annates were regulated anew. In particular it was decided that annates on reserved benefices could be paid to the Curia only when the annual income exceeded twenty-four gold gulden. With the gradual transformation of the system of benefices, the annates, strictly so called, disappeared. To-day they are levied only on the occasion of new appointments to dioceses not subject to Propaganda, and after the manner fixed by the latest concordate or by the papal documents (Bulls of Circumcision) that legate to the diocese.

Anne, Saint (Heb., Hannah, grace), Ann, Anne, Anna, Anna, the traditional name of the mother of the Blessed Virgin Mary. All our information concerning the names and lives of Sts. Joachim and Anne, the parents of Mary, is derived from apocryphal literature, the Gospel of the Nativity of the Lord, Pseudo-Matthew and the Protoevangelium of James. Though the earliest form of the latter, on which directly or indirectly the other two seem to be based, goes back to about A.D. 150, we can hardly accept as beyond doubt its various statements on its sole authority. The supposed facts, as given in the Protoevangelium, are without great authority and portions of it were read on the feasts of Mary by the Greeks, Syrians, Copts, and Arabians. In the Occident, however, it was rejected by the Fathers of the Church until its contents were incorporated by Jacobus de Voragine in his "Golden Legend" in the thirteenth century. On a feast-day Joachim presented himself to offer sacrifice in the temple, he was repulsed by a certain Ruben, under the pretext that men without offspring were unworthy to be admitted. Whereupon Joachim, bowed down with grief, did not return home, but went into the mountains to make that complaint to God in solitude. Also Hannah, having learned the reason of the prolonged absence of her husband, cried to the Lord to take away from her the curse of sterility, promising to dedicate her child to the service of God. Their prayers were heard; an angel came to Hannah and said: "Hannah, the Lord has heard your prayer; He will give you a son to conceive and give birth, and the fruit of thy womb shall be blessed by all the world." The angel made the same promise to Joachim, who returned to his wife. Hannah gave birth to a daughter whom she called Miriam (Mary). Since this story is apparently the reproduction of the biblical account of the conception of Samuel, whose mother was also called Hannah, even the name of the mother of Mary seems to be doubtful.

The renowned Father John Eek of Ingolstadt, in a sermon on St. Anne (published at Paris in 1579), pretends to know even the names of the parents of St. Anne. He calls them Stollanus and Emerentia. He says that St. Anne was born after Stollanus and Emerentia had been childless for twenty years; that St. Joachim died soon after the presentation of Mary in the temple; that St. Anne then married Cleophas, by whom she became the mother of Mary Cleophas (the wife of Alpheus and mother of the Apostles James the Lesser, Simon and Judas, and of Joseph the Just); after the death of Cleophas she is said to have married Salomos, to whom she bore Maria Salome (the wife of Zebedeus and mother of the Apostles John and James the Greater).

This same spurious legend is found in the work of Gerson (Opp. III, 59) and of many others. There arose in the sixteenth century an animated controversy over the marriages of St. Anne, in which Barinius and Bellarmine defended her monogamy. The Greek Menaea (25 July) call the parents of St. Anne Mathan and Maria, and relate that Salome and Elizabeth, the mother of St. John the Baptist, were daughters of two sisters of St. Anne. According to Epphanusius it was maintained even in the fourth century by some enthusiasts that St. Anne conceived without the action of man. This error was revived in the West in the fifteenth century. (Anna, specul. per osculum Johannis.) In 1677 the Council of Fornelli condemn the error of Imperiali, who taught that St. Anne in the conception and birth of Mary remained virgin (Benedict XIV, De Festis, II, 9). In the Orient the cult of St. Anne can be traced to the fourth century. Justinian I (d. 565) had a church dedicated to her. The canto of St. Anne was composed by St. Theophanes (d. 817), but older parts of the Office are ascribed to Antolius of Byzantium (d. 458). Her feast is celebrated in the East on the 25th of July, which may be the day of the dedication of her first church at Constantinople or the anniversary of the arrival in Constantinople of the Greek Church. It is found in the oldest liturgical document of the Greek Church, the Calendar of Constantinople (first half of the eighth century). The Greeks keep a collective feast of St. Joachim and St. Anne on the 9th of September. In the Latin Church St. Anne was not venerated, except, perhaps, in the south of France, before the thirteenth century. Her picture, painted in the eighth century, which was found lately in the church of Santa Maria Antiqua in Rome, owes its origin to Byzantine influence. Her feast, under the influence of the "Golden Legend", is first found (26 July) in the thirteenth century, e. g. at Douai (in 1291), where a foot of St. Anne was venerated (fere viridarium). In 1634 it was introduced in England by urban VI, 21 November, 1378, from which time it spread all over the Western Church. It was extended to the universal Latin Church in 1584.

The supposed relics of St. Anne were brought from the Holy Land to Constantinople in 710 and were still kept there in the church of St. Sophia in 1333. The tradition of the church of Apt in southern France pretends that the body of St. Anne was brought to Apt by St. Lazarus, the friend of Christ, who was hidden by St. Auspicius (d. 398), and found again during the reign of Charlemagne (feast, Monday after Pentecost). The relics were transferred to a magnificent chapel in 1664 (feast, 4 May). The head of St. Anne was kept at Mainz up to 1510, when it was stolen and brought to Duren in Rheinland. St. Anne is the patroness of Brittany. Her miraculous picture (feast, 7 March) is venerated at Notre Dame d'Auray, Diocese of Vannes. Also in Canada, where she is the principal patron of the province of Quebec, the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupré is well known. St. Anne is patroness of women in labour; she is represented holding the Blessed Virgin Mary in her lap, who again carries on her arm the Child Jesus. She is also patroness of nurses, Christ being compared to gold, Mary to silver.

Anne d'Auray, Sainte. A little village three miles from the town of Auray (6,500 inhabitants), in the Diocese of Vannes (Morbihan), in French Brittany, famous for its sanctuary and for its pilgrimages, or parties, in the honour of St. Anne, to whom the people of Brittany, in very early times, and according to Christian, had dedicated a chapel. This first chapel was destroyed about the end of the seventh century, but the memory of it was kept alive by tradition, and the village was still called "Keranna", i.e. "Village of Anne". More than nine centuries later, at the beginning of the seventeenth century (1624-25), St. Anne is said to have appeared several times to a simple and pious villager, and commanded him to rebuild the ancient chapel. The apparitions became so frequent, and before so many witnesses, that Sebastien de Rosmadel, Bishop of Vannes, decided to invest the sanctuary. Young Nicolazic, to whom St. Anne had appeared and numerous witnesses, testified to the truth of events which had become famous throughout Brittany, and the Bishop gave permission for the building of a chapel. Anne of Austria and Louis XIII enriched the sanctuary with many gifts, among them a relic of St. Anne brought into the shrine in the thirteenth century, and in 1641 the Queen obtained from the Pope the erection of a confraternity, which Pius IX raised to the rank of an archconfraternity in 1872. In the meanwhile pilgrimages had begun and became more numerous year by year, nor did the Revolution put a stop to them. The chapel, indeed, was plundered, the Carmelites who served it driven out, and the miraculous statue of St. Anne was burned at Vannes in 1793; yet the faithful still flocked to the chapel, which was covered with ex-votos. In 1810 the convent of the Carmelites was restored into a petit séminaire. In 1868, the Cardinal of St. Marc laid the first stone of the present magnificent basilica. Finally, in 1868, Pius IX accorded to the statue of St. Anne, before which many miracles had been wrought, the honour of being crowned. St. Anne has continued to be the favourite pilgrimage of Brittany down to the present day—

C'est notre mère à tous; mort ou vivant, dit-on, A Sainte-Anne, une fois, doit aller tout Breton.—

The basilica, which is in Renaissance style, is a work of art. The marbles of the high altar are the gift of Pius IX; many of the bas-reliefs, with the statues of Nicolazic and Keriolé, are the work of the sculptor Falguière. The principal pilgrimages take place at Pentecost and on the 26 July.

Anne de Beaupré, Sainte. Devotion to Saint Anne, in Canada, goes back to the beginning of New France, and was brought thither by the first settlers and early missionaries. The hardy pioneers soon began to till the fertile soil of the Beaupré hillsides; in the region which now forms the parish of Sainte Anne de Beaupré, houses were built by 1650. Nor was it long before the settlers built themselves a chapel where they might meet for Divine worship. One of their number, the Sieur Etienne Lessard, offered to give the land required at the spot which the church authorities should find suitable. On 13 March, 1658, therefore, the missionary, Father Viguet, came to choose the site for the foundations of the proposed chapel which, by general consent, was to be dedicated to St. Anne. That very day the Saint showed how favourably she viewed the undertaking by healing Louis Gilmont, an inhabitant of Beaupré, who suffered terribly from rheumatism of the loins. Full of confidence in St. Anne, he came forward and placed three stones in the foundations of the new building, whereupon he found himself suddenly and completely cured of his ailment.

This first authentic miracle was the precursor of countless other graces and favours of all kinds. For two centuries and a half the great wonder-worker has ceaselessly and lavishly shown her kindness to all the sufferers who from all parts of North America flock every year to Beaupré to implore her help. The old church was begun in 1768, and used for worship until 1876, when it was replaced by the present one, opened in October of that year. This last was built of cut stone, by means of contributions from all the Catholics of Canada. The offerings made by pilgrims have defrayed the cost of fittings and decoration. It is two hundred feet long, and one hundred wide, including the side chapels. Leo XIII raised it to the rank of a minor basilica in 5 May, 1889, it was solemnly consecrated by Cardinal Taschereau, Archbishop of Quebec. It has been served by the Redemptorists since 1878. On either side of the main doorway are huge pyramids of crutches, walking-sticks, bandages, and other appliances left behind by the cripples, lame, and sick, who, having been cured, have come to St. Anne at her shrine, have gone home healed.

Relics.—The canons of Carcassonne, at the request of Monseigneur de Laval, first Bishop of Quebec, sent to Beaupré a large relic of the finger-bone of Saint Anne, which was first exposed for veneration on 12 March, 1870, and has ever since been an object of great devotion. Three other relics of the saint have been added in later times to the treasures of this shrine. In 1892 Cardinal Taschereau presented to the shrine the skull of St. Anne. It measures four inches in length, and was brought from Rome by Mgr. Marquis, P.A.

PILGRIMAGE.—The pilgrimage to Beaupré has not always had the importance which it has gained in our time. Only in the last quarter of the nineteenth century did it attain to the growth, organization, and fame which now render it comparable with the great pilgrimage to Lourdes. Until 1875 the yearly number of pilgrims did not exceed 12,000, but to judge by the heap of crutches left at the saint’s feet, there must always have been many marvellous cures wrought at Beaupré. More favourable conditions have enabled the wonderful growth of these pilgrimages of late years. The strong impulse given by Cardinal Taschereau and his suffragans; the zeal of the Canadian clergy in organizing parish and confraternity pilgrimages; the many new railways, and, particularly, the line between Quebec and Beaupré (21 miles); the “Annales de la Bonne Sainte Anne”, more than 40,000 copies of which are published every month—all these have combined to favour the trend of pilgrimage to the shrine of Beaupré. Moreover, devotion to St. Anne is to-day more than ever the devotion of the Canadian people.

The figures given will give an idea of the growth of the pilgrimages during the last twenty-five years:—In 1880, 36,000 pilgrims visited the shrine; in 1890, 105,000; in 1900, 135,000; in 1905, 168,000.

Anency (Anneckiensis), Diocese of, comprises the Department of Haute-Savoie in France, with the exception of several parishes in the cantons of Alby and Rumilly, which belong to the Diocese of Chambéry. In addition, the canton of Ugenes (Department of Savoie). It is suffragan to the Archdiocese of Chambéry. From 1535 to 1801 the bishops of Geneva, exiled by the Reformation from Geneva, lived at Annecy. St. Francis of Sales was Bishop of Annecy from 1602 to 1622. From 1801 to 1822, Annecy belonged to the Diocese of Chambéry and Genève, but made an appeal to pope 15 Jan. 1822, by the bull “Sollicita catholicorum greges”. The memory of St. Bernard of Menthon, founder of the hospice of the Grand St. Bernard, is still honoured in the Diocese of Annecy. St. Francis of Sales and St. Jane Frances de Chantal founded the Congregations of the Visitatin at Annecy in 1610; at the death of its foundress the convents belonging to this order numbered 87. The relics of these saints are preserved in the Church of the Visitatin at Annecy. The ancient Benedictine abbey of Talloires, near the Lac d’Annecy, lends a certain picturesque to the scene. The Diocese of Annecy comprised (end of 1876) 30,000; in 1890, 26,200; that year and subsequent, 27,800; 1895, 27,900 second class parishes, and 167 vicariates, formerly with state subventions.

Annegarn, Joseph, Catholic theologian and popular writer, b. 13 October, 1794, at Ostbevern in Westphalia; d. 8 July, 1843, at the Lyceum Hasianum, Brunsberg, East Prussia. He was the author of church history. He rendered great service to Catholic literature and to the cause of the Church in Germany by his “Universal History”, written primarily for Catholic youth, and published in eight volumes in 1827-28. His purpose was frankly evangelical, and the book is profusely illustrated and well suited to youthful readers and to the general public. The selection from the mass of materials and the arrangement are judicious. Excellent features of the History are the numerous character sketches of great historical personages and the chronological tables. Succeeding editors have kept it almost intact, except for brilliant, almost anachronistic, and it remains a standard work in Catholic families in Germany, where it has taken the place of anti-Catholic popular histories. Annegarn was also the author of “Handbuch der Patrologie” (1839). (See Buchberger Kirchliches Handlexikon, a.v.).

Annibaldi, Annibale d’, theologian, b. of a Roman senatorial family early in the thirteenth century; d. at Rome, 1 January, 1271. He joined the Dominican Order at an early age and was sent to Paris to complete his studies. Here he formed an intimate friendship with St. Thomas Aquinas and succeeded him as regent of studies at the Convent of St. Jacques. After teaching in Paris for some years, he was called to Rome by Innocent IV to fill the post of Master of the Sacred Palace. He served in this capacity under Alexander IV and Urban IV, the latter of whom created him Cardinal in 1282. When Clement IV, in 1265, handed over the kingdom of the Two Sicilies to Charles I of Anjou, Annibale was put at the head of the commission empowered to treat with the monarch and register his agreement to the papal stipulations. The King received the insignia of investiture at Rome from the hands of the Cardinal. On 6 January, 1266, Annibale anointed and solemnly crowned Charles I in the Lateran Church at Rome, the Pope being detained at Perugia. During the vacancy succeeding the death of Clement IV, Annibale received and treated with Philip III of France and Charles I at Viterbo (1270). During a papal mission at Orvieto, the Cardinal died, and, by his own request, was buried in the Church of San Agostino. He was born in 1230, and devoted his entire life for his learning and virtues. St. Thomas Aquinas dedicated his “Catena Aurea” to him. Annibale, besides several small theological treatises now lost, wrote a commentary on the “Sentences” and “Quodlibeta”, which has been ascribed to St. Thomas, and published with his commentary in the Paris edition of 1889, by Frette. A manuscript in the Carmelite monastery in Paris calls Annibale a Carmelite who later became a Cistercian abbot. But Échard shows that no man of that name belonged to either order in the twelfth or thirteenth century.

Annibale, Giuseppe d’, Cardinal, a theologian, b. at Borbona in the Diocese of Rieti, 22 September, 1815; d. at the same place, 18 July, 1892. He was appointed professor in the Seminary of Rieti and later vicar-general of the diocese. He was preconized Titular Bishop of Carysto by Leo XIII, 12 Aug., 1881, was created Cardinal-Prince of Boniface, 11 Feb., 1889, and became Prefect of the Congregation of Indulgences. His treatise on moral theology is entitled “Summulae theologicae morals”, (Milan, 1881-83). Another work, a commentary on the Constitution, "Apostolica Sede" (Rieti, 1880), is also valuable to theologians and canonists. Hunter, Nomenclator, III, 1448; Beugnet, in Dict. de Théol. Cath., s. v.

JOHN J. A. BECKET.

Annulus of Viterbo (Giovanni Nanni), archaeologist and historian, b. at Viterbo about 1432; d. 13 November, 1502. He entered the Dominican Order early in life and won fame as a preacher and writer. He was highly esteemed by Sixtus IV and Alexander VI; the latter made him Master of the Sacred Palace. He was skilled in the Oriental languages, and was so devoted a student of classical antiquity that he changed his name to one that reminded him of Rome's Golden Age. Among his numerous writings may be mentioned: (1) "De futuris Christianorum triumphis in Turcos et Sarracenos"; a commentary on the Apocalypse, dedicated to Sixtus IV, to Christian kings, princes, and governments (Genoa, 1480); (2) "Tractatus de imperio Turecorum" (Genoa, 1480). He is best known, however, by his "Antiquitatum Variorum," 17 vols. (Venice, 1742, et seq.). In this work he published alleged writings and fragments of several pre-Christian Greek and Latin profane authors, destined to throw an entirely new light on ancient history. He claimed to have discovered them at Mantua. This work met at once both with believers in the genuineness of sources, and with severe critics who accused him of wilful interpolation, or even fabrication. The spurious character of these "historians" of Annius, which he published both with and without commentaries, has long been admitted. It would appear that he was too credulous, and really believed the texts to be authentic. It may be said that Colbert left to the "Bibliothèque Nationale" at Paris a manuscript of the thirteenth century, supposed to contain fragments of the writings of two of these writers, i.e. Berosus and Megasthenes. The more important of his unpublished works are: "Volumen libris septuaginta distinctum de antiquitatibus et gestis Etrurorum"; "De correctione typographica chronoromnium"; "De dignitate officii Magistri Sacri Palatii"; and lastly, his "Chronologia Nova," wherein he undertakes to correct the anachronisms in the writings of Eusebius of Cesarea.

Ann. (or Hanno) Saint, Archbishop of Cologne in 1055. When very young he entered the ecclesiastical state, under the guidance of his uncle, a canon of Bamberg. He had formerly adopted the profession of arms. His attainments both in sacred and profane learning as well as his unusual virtu selected him for the curia of the Emperor Henry III who called him to his court. He is said to have been a man of remarkably handsome presence and of rare eloquence and in a very special way adapted for great undertakings. A lover of right and justice, he defended them fearlessly in all circumstances. He was made Archdeacon of Cologne, and his consecration was a scene of unwonted splendour, though very trying to him, as he accepted the office with the greatest repugnance. At the death of Henry, the Empress Agnes made him regent of the empire, and entrusted him with the education of the young prince, afterwards Henry IV, who had already corrupted by the flatterers who surrounded him. The Archbishop's strictness was soon found to be distasteful to the prince, and he was deprived of his office of regent, but the disorders which followed on account of the exactions and injustice of those who were attached to Henry became so unbearable that in 1072 Anno again resumed the reins of government.

The Church at that time was torn by the schisms of antipopes. Anno joined with Hildebrand and St. Peter Damian in the work of order and reformation. Hergenrötzer, however, speaks of "the discord of the court of Germany, of the frequent sharp reproaches addressed to the powerful Anno by Pope Nicholas II" (Hist. de l'église, III, 283). It was probably because of a plea for more power to be given to the German emperors in papal elections. The feeling was so strong in Germany that the antipope, allied with the bad elements of Italy, and an antipope in the person of Cadalus, the Bishop of Parma, was put forward. The rightful Pope, at the time, was Alexander II. At a great assembly held at Augsburg in 1082, Anno pronounced a discours in favour of Alexander, but was unable to obtain the adherence of all the bishops. A council at Mantua ruled in favour of Alexander; the Empress Agnes had been won over by St. Peter Damian; but the influence of Adalbert, the Archbishop of Hamburg-Bremen, and others prevailed to such an extent that it was impossible to separate Germany altogether from Cadalus, who however, died four years later. Hergenrötzer (Hist. de l'église, III, 377), the automatic nepotism of prelates, so common then, was shared by Anno, and he instances the giving of the Archbishops of Friesland to his nephew Conon, who because of it was assassinated shortly after his appointment. Whether or not this be true, it is certain that the cares of state did not prevent Anno from fulfilling his duty as a bishop. His prayer was continuous, his austerities extreme, his preaching incessant, his charity inextinguishable. He reformed all the monasteries of his diocese and established five new ones for the Canons Regular and Benedictines. He died 4 December, 1075, and was canonized shortly afterwards.

Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, The FACT OF, is related in Luke, i. 26-38. The Evangelist tells us that in the sixth month after the conception of St. John the Baptist by Zacharias, the angel Gabriel was sent from God to the Virgin Mary, at Nazareth, a small town in the mountains of Galilee. Mary was of the house of David, and was espoused (i.e. married) to Joseph, of the same royal family. She had, however, not yet entered the household of her spouse, but was still in her mother's house, working, perhaps, over her dowry. (Bardenhewer, Maria Verk., 69). And the angel having taken the figure and the form of man, came into the house and said to her: "Hail, full of grace (to whom is given grace, favoured one), the Lord is with thee." Mary having heard the greeting words did not speak; she was troubled in spirit, since she knew not the angel, nor the cause of his coming, nor the meaning of the salutation. And the angel continued and said: "Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found grace with God. Behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and shalt bring forth a Son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Most High; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of David his father; and he shall reign in the house of Jacob forever. And of his kingdom there shall be no end." The Virgin understood that there was question of the coming Redeemer. But, why should she be elected from amongst women for the splendid dignity of being the mother of the Messiah, having vowed her virginity to God? (St. Augustine). Therefore, not doubting the word of God like Zachary, but filled with fear and astonishment, she said: "The Lord has fulfilled his saying to my heart, because I know not man".

The angel to remove Mary's anxiety and to assure her that her virginity would be spared, answered: "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee. And therefore also the Holy which shall be born of thee shall be called Son of God." In token of the truth of his word he made known to her the conception of St. John, the miraculous pregnancy of her relative now old and sterile: "And behold, thy cousin Elisabeth; she also has conceived a son in her old age, and this is the sixth month with her that is called barren: because no word shall be impossible with God." Mary may not yet have fully understood the meaning of the heavenly message and how the maternity might be reconciled with her vow of virginity, but clinging to the first words of the angel and trusting to the Omnipotence of God she said: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it done to me even according to thy word." Since 1889 Holzmann and many Protestant writers have tried to show that the verses Luke i, 34, 35, containing the message of conception through the Holy Ghost are interpolated. Usener derives the origin of the "myth" from the heathen hero worship; but there is no need to prove that it is of Judaic origin (Isaia, vii, 14, Behold a Virgin shall conceive, etc.). Bardenhewer, however, has fully established the authenticity of the text (p. 13). St. Luke may have taken his knowledge of the event from an older account, written in Aramaic or Hebrew. The words: "Blessed art thou among women" (v. 28), are spurious and taken from verse 25, the account of the visitation. Cardinal Cajetan wanted to understand the words: "because I know not man", not of the future, but only of the past: up to this hour I do not know man. This manifest error, which contradicts the words of the text, has been universally rejected by all Catholic authors. The opinion that Joseph at the time of the Annunciation was an aged widower and Mary twelve or fifteen years of age, is founded only upon apocryphal documents. The local tradition of Nazareth pretends that the angel met Mary and greeted her at the fountain, and when she fled from him in fear, he followed her into the house and inquired if she knew him. (v. Palæst., 1890.) The year and day of the Annunciation cannot be determined as long as new material does not throw more light on the subject. The present date of the feast (25 March) depends upon the date of the older feast of Christmas.

The Annunciation is the beginning of Jesus in His human nature. Through His mother He is a member of the human race. If the virginity of Mary before, during, and after the conception of her Divine Son was always considered part of the deposit of faith, this was done only on account of the historical facts and the results of divination. The Son of God did not in itself necessitate this exception from the laws of nature. Only reasons of expediency are given for it, chiefly, the end of the Incarnation. About to found a new generation of the children of God, the Redeemer does not arrive in the way of earthly generations: the power of the Holy Spirit ensures the supernatural generation and the Sonship of the humanity. Many holy fathers (Sts. Jerome, Cyril, Ephrem, Augustine) say that the consent of Mary was essential to the redemption. It was the will of God, St. Thomas says (Summa, III-XXX), that the redemption of mankind should depend upon the consent of the Virgin Mary. This does not mean that God in His plans was bound by the will of a creature, and that man would not have been redeemed, if Mary had not consented. It only means that the consent of Mary was foreseen from all eternity, and therefore was received as essential into the design of God.

Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, The Feast of the, 25 March, also called in old calendars: Festum incarnationis, initium redemptionis, conceptio Christi, Annuntiatio Christi, Annuntiatio Dominae. In the Church, which Mary took in the Redemption is celebrated by a special feast, 26 December, the Annunciation is a feast of Christ; in the Latin Church, it is a feast of Mary. It probably originated shortly before or after the Council of Ephesus (c. 431). At the time of the Synod of Laodicea (372) it was not known; St. Proclus, Bishop of Constantinople (d. 446), however, seems to mention it in one of his homilies. He says, that the feast of the coming of Our Lord and Saviour, when He vested Himself with the nature of man (quo hominum genus indicatur), was celebrated during the entire fifth century. This custom, however, may be genuine; the words may be understood of the feast of Christmas.

In the Latin Church this feast is first mentioned in the Sacramentarium of Pope Gelasius (d. 496), which we possess in a manuscript of the seventh century; it is also contained in the Sacramentarium of St. Gregory (d. 604), one manuscript dates back to the eighth century. Since these sacramentaries contain additions posterior to the time of Gelasius and Gregory, Duchesne (Origines du culte chrétien, 118, 261) ascribes the origin of this feast in Rome to the seventh century; Probst, however, (Sacramentarien, 264) thinks that it really belongs to the time of Pope Gelasius. The tenth Synod of Toledo (656), and Trullan Synod (692) speak of this feast as one universally celebrated in the Catholic Church.

All Christian antiquity (against all astronomical possibility) recognized the 23th of March as the actual day of Our Lord's death. The opinion that the Incarnation also took place on that date is found in the pseudo Cyprianic work "De Pascha Computus", c. 240. It argues that the coming of Our Lord and His death must have coincided with the creation and fall of Adam. And since the world was created in spring, the Saviour was also conceived, and died shortly after the adven. Thus the following calculations are found in the early and later Middle Ages, and to them, no doubt, the dates of the feast of the Annunciation and of Christmas owe their origin. Consequently the ancient martyrlogies assign to the 25th of March the creation of Adam and the crucifixion of Our Lord; also, the fall of Lucifer, the passing of Israel through the Red Sea and the immaculation of Isaac. (Thurston, Christmas and the Christian Calendar, Amer. Eccl. Rev., XIX, 568.) The original date of this feast was the 25th of March. Although in olden times most of the churches kept it at Easter in Lent, the Latin Church transferred it to the 18th of December, and when some tried to introduce the Roman observance of it on the 25th of March, the 18th of December was universally confirmed, and the feast was confirmed by the tenth Synod of Toledo (656). This law was abolished when the Roman liturgy was accepted in Spain.

The church of Milan, up to our times, assigns the office of this feast to the last Sunday in Advent. On the 25th of March a Mass is sung in honour of the Annunciation. (Ordo Ambrosianus, 1906; Maga-

The schismatic Armenians now celebrate this feast on the 7th of April. Since Epiphany for them is the feast of the birth of Christ, the schismatic Armenian church formerly assigned the Annunciation to 5 January, the vigil of Epiphany. This feast was always a holy day of obligation in the Universal Church. As such it has been abrogated for France and the French dependencies, for the United States, for England and Scotland, though not for Ireland. By a decree of the S. R. C., 23 April, 1895, the rank of the feast was raised from a double of the second class to a double of the first class. If this feast falls within Holy Week or Easter Week, its office is transferred to the Monday after the octave of Easter. In some German churches it was the custom to keep it before Palm Sunday if the 25th of March fell in Holy Week. The Greek Church, when the 25th of March occurs on one of the last three days in Holy Week, transfers the Annunciation to Easter Monday; on other days, even on Easter Sunday, its office is kept together with the office of the day. Although no octave is appointed in Lent, the Dioceses of Loreto and of the Province of Venice, the Carmelites, Dominicans, Servites, and Redemptorists, celebrate this feast with an octave.

ANNUNCIADORES, THE ORDERS OF THE. I. ANNUNCIADORES, a penitential order founded by St. Jeanne de Vals (b. 1464; d. 4 February, 1506), daughter of Louis XI of France, and wife of the Duke of Orléans, later Louis XII. After the annulment of her marriage with Louis XII she retired to Bourges, where, overcoming the opposition of her confessor Father Gilbert Nicolai, and the counsellors of the Pope, she succeeded in her design of founding an order in honour of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary. She herself composed the Rule, entitled “The Ten Virtues of the Blessed Virgin,” the imitation of which she proposed as the aim of the order. It was confirmed by Alexander VI (1501), and 8 October, 1502, the first five members received the veil, the institution being personally taken by Father Gabriel Nicolai, whose name was changed by Brief of Alexander VI to Gabriele Maria, was constituted Superior, and after revising the constitutions, presented them for confirmation to Leo X (1517), who placed the Order under the jurisdiction of the Order of St. Francis. In addition to the triple vow of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the members were bound to the recitation of the Office, the observance of cloisteral rule, and the wearing of the habit. This is grey with scarlet capular and white mantle. Foundations were made in France, but did not survive the Revolution. During the pontificate of Paul IV the Order possessed forty-five convents in France and Belgium, of which several still exist in the latter country. The foundress was canonized in 1775.

II. ANNUNCIADORES, CELESTIAL, a religious order for women founded by Bl. Maria Vittoria Fornari (b. 13 December, 1590; d. 10 March, 1613), daughter of the death of her husband, Angelo Strata, left her the care of six children, and it was only after they had entered the religious life that she was free to carry out her life work, for which she had been preparing by retirement and the practice of austere virtue. Her last request was to mean for some time after her death, her director, Father Bernardi Zanetti of the Society of Jesus, and the Archbishop of Genoa to withhold their consent, which, however, was finally obtained (1602), and a convent was erected at the expense of one of her companions, Vincenza Lomellini. Father Zannoni drew up the constitutions for the religious. Clement VIII approved them in 1604, placing the Order under the Rule of St. Augustine. In the same year ten members were received, each adding the name Maria Annunziata to her baptismal or religious name, and they made their solemn vows 7 September, 1605. The second foundation was made in 1612, and the third a little later in Burgundy; after which the Order spread through France, Germany, and Denmark. The constitutions were confirmed by Paul V (1613), Gregory XV, and Urban VIII (1631). The cloister is unusually rigid, and the members devote much of their time to preparing vestments and altar linen for poor churches.

ANNUNCIATES OF LOMBARDY, a religious order of Lombardy known as Ambrosians, Sisters of St. Ambrose, or Sisters of St. Marcellina, organized at Pavia in 1408 by young women from Venice and Pavia, under the direction of Father Beccarisi, O.S.B., for the care of the sick, and at a later date placed under the Rule of St. Augustine. The constitutions, providing for a postulat-general assisted by three visitors, were approved by Nicholas V but amended by Pius V. Eventually each convent became subject to the ordinary of its own diocese. Among the many saints belonging to this Order is St. Catherine of Genoa.

IV. ARCHICONFRATERNITY OF THE ANNUNCIATION, established in 1460 in Rome in order to provide dowries for poor girls. During the pontificate of Pius II it was connected with the Dominican Church of the Minerva in which was built later the beautiful chapel of the Annunciation. At an earlier period the Pope himself presided at the annual ceremonies held 25 March, and presented with his own hand the documents entitled the recipients to the donor. This association has received large bequests, and benefits on an average four hundred persons yearly. The money gift is now twenty-five scudi ($25.00) for those about to marry, and fifty for those entering a religious order.

V. ANNUNZIATA, a name by which the Servites are sometimes known, their chief monastery at Florence, Italy, being dedicated to the Annunciation.

ANQUETIL, LOUIS-PIERRE, a French historian, b. in Paris, 21 Feb., 1723; d. 6 Sept., 1806. He entered the Congregation of Sainte-Geneviève when seventeen and became a priest. He taught theology and letters there; then became director of the seminary at Reims, and wrote a history of that city, his first book. In 1771 he became the librarian of the abbey of La Roë, in Anjou, and soon after was appointed director of the college of Senlis, which belonged to his order. Here he wrote his "Histoire de la Ligue". In 1768 he obtained a priory at Château-Renard and abandoned teaching. About the time of the Revolution he became the librarian of the Bibliothèque de la Ville near Paris. During the Reign of Terror he was imprisoned for some time at Saint Lazare where he worked on his "Histoire Universelle". When released after 9 Thermidor he finished it. His last work, "Histoire de France", states in the preface that Anquetil undertook it "in the arid and arid years of the Revolution", as the result of reading the works of the old age. Augustin Thierry (Quatrième lettre sur l'Histoire de France) calls the work "cold and colourless" and says Anquetil compares unavourably with the French historians Méseray, Daniel, and Velly, although he admits that he could freely grasp the manners and spirit of a past age when he studied them in their original sources. Anquetil’s works are: 1. “Mémoire servant de réponse pour le sieur Delaistre, libraire à Reims, contre le sieur Anquetil” (Reims, 1763); 2. “Almanach de Reims” (1764); 3. “Extrait de Ligeuse, ou Histoire politique, et troubles de la Fronde pendant le XVIe et le XVIIe siècle” (1763, 3 vols.); 4. “Vie du marchâel de Villars, écrit par lui-même”, followed by “Journal de la Cour de 1724 à 1734” (1787); 5. “Louis XIV, sa Cour et le Rêgent” (1789); “Précis de l’histoire universelle”; “Histoire de France depuis les Gaules jusqu’à la fin de la monarchie” (1805); “Notice sur la vie de M. Anquetil-Duperron”. This was his brother, a notable Orientalist, his junior by eight years, who died one year before him.

Ansaldo, Casto Innocenzo, theologian and archeologist, b. at Piacenza, in Italy, 7 March, 1710; d. at Turin, in 1780. In 1726 he entered the Dominican Order at Parma, where he pursued his preparatory studies, and in 1733 was a student of the Minerva Observatory. In 1734 he attached himself to Cardinal Orsi. In 1735 he taught philosophy at Santa Caterina in Naples, and the following year received the chair of metaphysics at the University. The King of Naples created a chair of theology for him in 1737, which he retained till 1745. From 1745 to 1770 he taught successively at Brescia, Ferrara, and Turin. In the latter city he taught for twenty years with great success and repute. He was averse to the scholastic method and therefore had serious trouble with the authorities of the Order, which was finally smoothed over by Cardinal Quirini and Benedict XIV. His published works fill several volumes, and have ever been prized for a combination of theological and historical erudition. Most of them are directed against the anti-Christian tendencies of his day. His most important works are: “Patriarchæ Josephi, Egypti olim proregis, religio a criminationibus Basnagi vindicata” (Naples, 1738); “De nobilitatis” (Venice, 1741); “De tradizione principiorum legis naturalis” (Brescia, 1743); “De Romanâ tutelarium deorum in oppugnationibus urbium evocatione liber singularis” (Brescia, 1742); “De martyrius sine sangue” (Venice, 1750); “Vindicationes antiquitatum sacrarum” (of UgoUli, a valuable Anti-Dodwellian dissertation on the sufferings of the primitive Christians; “Herodiati infanticiie vindicatie” against those who impugned its historicity (Brescia, 1746); “De authenticis sacrum Scripturâm lectionibus” (Verona, 1747), a very learned and solid work in favour of the accuracy of the Fathers in quoting Scripture; “De baptismate in Spiritu Sancto et igni commentarii sacer philologico-criticis” (Milan, 1752); “De Theurgiâ deque theurgici a divo Paulo memoriam commentarius” (Milan, 1761); “Riflessioni sopra i mezzi di perfezionare la filosofia morale” (Turin, 1778), with a biography of the author; “De perfectione morali” (Turin, 1790); “Prelaciones theologicae de re sacramentaria” (Venice, 1792). His controversy with Francesco Zanotti in defence of Maupertuis’s apology (Berlin, 1749) for Christian morality, as superior to that of the Jewish law, was celebrated in the eighteenth century. He also compiled: “Deliarum religione naturale e rivelata” (Venice, 1755), a collection of evidences and admissions from the works of celebrated non-Catholics. His brother, also a Dominican, Carlo Agostino, wrote a work (Turin, 1765) on the large number of the Christians before Constantine; another brother, Pietro Tommaso, wrote an excellent dissertation on the divinity of Christ (Florence, 1754).

Having entered the Dominican Order and completed his studies at Salamanca, he was sent in 1625, together with many others, as a missionary to the Philippine Islands. Whilst serving as chaplain in a hospital for Chinese and Japanese at Manila he had occasion to master these languages. In 1631 he was transferred to Japan and survived the break of the persecution in 1632. Disguised as a bond he travelled over the land administering the rites of religion. He was seized 4 August, 1634, and subjected to tortures that lasted seven days. Not the least of his sufferings was his enforced presence at the beheading of his companion, Thomas of St. Hyacinth, and sixty-nine other Christians. On 18 November he was suspended till dead from a plank with his head buried in the ground. Whilst detained in Mexico, on his way to the Philippine Islands, he wrote in Latin a series of lives of Dominican saints after a similar work by Hernando del Castillo and left at Manila an unfinished treatise on Chinese sects and idols.

Anschar (or Anscharius), Saint, called the Apostle of the North, was b. in Picardy, 8 September, 801; d. 5 February, 865. He became a Benedictine of Corbie, whence he passed into Westphalia. With Harold, the newly baptised King of Denmark who had been expelled from his kingdom but was now returning, he and Auktbert went to preach the Faith in that country where Ebbo, the Archbishop of Reims, had already laboured but without much success. Anschar founded a school at Schleswig, but the intolerable zeal of Harold provoked another storm which led to a second expulsion. He then entered Sweden and preached the Gospel there. Although the embassy had been attacked on its way and had apparently abandoned its mission, Anschar succeeded in getting the “Travels of antiquitatum sacrarum” of UgoUli, a valuable anti-Dodwellian dissertation on the sufferings of the primitive Christians; “Herodiati infanticiie vindicatie” against those who impugned its historicity (Brescia, 1746); “De authenticis sacrum Scripturâm lectionibus” (Verona, 1747), a very learned and solid work in favour of the accuracy of the Fathers in quoting Scripture; “De baptismate in Spiritu Sancto et igni commentarii sacer philologico-criticis” (Milan, 1752); “De Theurgiâ deque theurgici a divo Paulo memoriam commentarius” (Milan, 1761); “Riflessioni sopra i mezzi di perfezionare la filosofia morale” (Turin, 1778), with a biography of the author; “De perfectione morali” (Turin, 1790); “Prelaciones theologicae de re sacramentaria” (Venice, 1792). which are said to have given a favourable answer. It was probably due to the prayers of the saint. A chalice, the bishop’s staff and a rochet. In 854 we find him back in Denmark, where he succeeded in changing the enmity of King Eric into friendship. Eric had expelled the priests who had been left at Schleswig, but at the request of Anseach recalmed them. The saint built another church in Ljutland and introduced bells, which up to that time were regarded as instruments of magic. He also induced the king to mitigate the horrors of the slave-trade. He was eminent for his piety, mortification, and observance of the monastic rule. He built hospitals, ransomed captives, sent immense alms abroad, and regrettted only that he had not been found in many men and places. Though he wrote several works, very little of them remains. He had added devotional phrases to the psalms, which, according to Fabricius, in his Latin Library of the Middle Ages, are an illustrious monument to the piety of the holy prelate. He had also compiled a life of St. Willehad, first Bishop of Bremen, and the preface which he wrote was considered a masterpiece for that age. It is published by Fabricius among the works of the historians of Hamburg. Some letters of his are also extant. He is known in Germany as St. Scharis and such is the title of his collegiate church in Bremen. Anseach in Hamburg under this title was converted into an orphan asylum by the Lutherans. All of his successes as a missionary he ascribed to the piety of Louis le Débonnaire and the apostolic zeal of his predecessor in the work, Ebbo, Archbishop of Reims, who, however, as a matter of fact, had failed.

Anse, Councils of.—Several medieval councils were held in this French town (near Lyons). That of 994 decreed, among other disciplinary measures, abstention from servile labour after three o’clock (None) on Saturday, i.e. the observance of the vigil of Sunday. The council of 1025 was held for the purpose of settling a conflict between the monks of Cluny and the Bishop of Mâcon, who complained that, though their monastery was situated in his diocese, it had obtained the first half of the archbishopric of Vienne. St. Odilon of Cluny was present and exhibited a papal privilege exempting his monastery from the episcopal jurisdiction of Mâcon. But the fathers of the council caused to be read the ancient canons ordaining that in every country the abbots and monks should be subject to their own bishop, and declared null a privilege contrary to the canons. The Archbishop of Vienne was required to apologize to the Bishop of Mâcon. In 1076 a council was held for the purpose of furthering the ecclesiastical reforms of St. Gregory VII. At the council of 1100, Hugues, Archbishop of Lyons, demanded from the assembled bishops, whom was St. Anselm of Canterbury, a subsidy for the expenses of the journey that, with the Pope’s permission, he was about to make to Jerusalem. In 1112 the Catholic Faith and investitures were the subjects of conciliar decrees.

Ansegisus, Archbishop of Sens, d. 25 November, 879, or 883. He was a Benedictine monk, Abbot of St. Michael’s, at Beauvais, and in 871 became Archbishop of Sens. After Charles the Bald was crowned by the Pope in 875, he asked the Pope to appoint Ansegisus papal legate and primate over Gaul and Germany. With a papal legate of French nationality, amicably disposed towards the Emperor, Charles the Bald thought he could more easily extend his influence as emperor over those countries. The Pope yielded to the wish of Charles, and the bishops assembled in Mainz. The bishops of Pontonch were asked to acknowledge the primacy of Ansegisus they protected, especially Hincmar, Archbishop of Reims, against what they considered an infringement on their rights. Though Ansegisus retained the title, it is doubtful whether he ever possessed the powers of Primate of France and Germany.

Ansegisus, Saint, b. about 770, of noble parentage; d. 20 July, 833, or 834. At the age of eighteen he entered the Benedictine monastery of Fontanelle (also called St. Vandrille after the name of its founder) in the diocese of Rouen. St. Girolaw, a relative of Ansegisus, was then Abbot of Fontanelle. From the beginning of his monastic life St. Ansegisus manifested a deep piety united with great learning, and upon the recommendation of the Abbot St. Girolaw he was entrusted by the Emperor Charlemagne with the government and reform of two monasteries, St. Sixtus near Reims and St. Memius (St. Mange) in the diocese of Châlons-sur-Marne. Under the direction of St. Ansegisus two monasteries soon regained their former splendour. Charlemagne, being much pleased with the success of Ansegisus, appointed him Abbot of Flavay, or St. Germer, a monastery in the Diocese of Beauvais, the buildings of which were threatening to fall into ruins. At the same time Charlemagne made Ansegisus supervisor of royal works under the general direction of Abbot Einhard. Under the management of Ansegisus the structures of the monastery of Flavay were completely renovated, monastic discipline was restored, and the monks were instructed in the sacred and the profane sciences. Louis le Débonnaire esteemed Ansegisus as highly as his father Charlemagne had done and, seeing how all monasteries flourished that had at one time been under the direction of Ansegisus, he put him at the head of the monastery of Luxeuil in the year 817. This monastery was founded by St. Columban as early as 590 and, during the seventh and eighth centuries, was one of the most renowned monasteries and school of Christendom. Of late, however, its discipline had grown lax. Having restored this monastery to its former splendour, he was in 823, after the death of Abbot Einhard, transferred as abbot to the monastery of Fontanelle, where he had spent the early days of his monastic life. He immediately applied himself with vigour to restore monastic fervour by pious exhortations and, most of all, by his own edifying example. Some learned and saintly monks whom he invited from Luxeuil to Fontanelle assisted him in his great work of reform. Hand in hand with a reform of discipline came a love for learning, which was enriched with valuable books, such as the Bible, some works of St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, St. Gregory the Great, St. Bede, etc. The most learned of the monks were put to writing original works, while the others occupied themselves with transcribing valuable old books and manuscripts. In a short time the library of Fontanelle became one of the largest in Europe and acquired great renown for accuracy of transcription and beauty of writing. A dormitory, a refectory, a chapter-house, a library, and other new structures were erected at Fontanelle by St. Ansegisus. On account of his great learning and reverence he was sent to visit distant countries by Louis le Débonnaire. The many and costly presents which he received as legate from foreign princes he distributed among various monasteries. While Abbot of Fontanelle he wrote a "Constitutio pro monachi de victu et vestitu", in which he determines exactly how much food, what articles of dress, etc., the monks were to receive from the lord of the monastery and made precise the rules of the monastery. The work which made the name of Ansegisus renowned for all times is his collection of the laws and decrees made by the Emperor Charlemagne and his son Louis le Débonnaire. These laws and decrees, being divided into articles or chapters, are generally called "Capitularis" and form the first book of the four books entitled "Quattuor Libri Capitularium Regum Francorum". The first and the second book contained all the "Capitularis" relating to church affairs, while the third and the fourth books had all the "Capitularis" relating to state affairs. It was completed in the year 827. Shortly afterwards it was approved by the Church in France, Germany, and Italy, and remained for a long time the official book on civil and canon law. Shortly before his death Ansegisus was attacked by paralysis which ended his holy and useful life on 20 July, 833 or 834. His earthly remains are buried in the Abbey of Fontanelle, where his feast is celebrated on 20 July, the day of his death.

Anselm, Nicholas. See Anselm.

Anselm, Saint; Archbishop of Canterbury, Doctor of the Church, b. at Aosta, a Burgundian town on the confines of Lombardy, 1033-34; d. 21 April, 1109. His father, Gundulf, was a Lombard who had become a citizen of Aosta, and his mother, Ermenburga, came of an old Burgundian family. Like many other saints, Anselm learnt the first lessons of piety from his mother, and at a very early age he was fired with the love of learning. In after life he still cherished the memories of childhood, and his biographer, Eadmer, has preserved some incidents which he had learnt from the saint's own lips. He had, for example, heard his mother speak of God, Who dwelt on high, ruling all things. Living in the mountains, he thought that Heaven must be on their lofty summits. "And while he often revolved these matters in his mind, it chanced that one night he saw in a vision that he must go up to the summit of the mountain and have ten to the court of God, the great King. But before he began to ascend the mountain, he saw in the plain through which he had passed to its foot, women, who were the King's handmaids, reaping the corn; but they were doing this very negligently and slothfully. Then, grieving for their sloth, and rebuking them, he besought the Lord to change them, and to make them work for their Lord and King. Thereafter, having climbed the mountain he entered the royal court. There he found the King with only his cupbearer. For it seemed that, as it was now Autumn, the King had sent his household to gather the harvest. As the boy was called by the Master, and driving night he sat at his feet. Then with charity kindling in his heart, he was asked who and whence he was and what he was seeking. To these questions he made answer as well as he knew. Then at the Master's command some moist white bread was brought him by the cupbearer; he tasted thereon in his presence, wherefore when morning came the young monk was told to mix with his things which he had seen, as a simple and innocent child he believed that he had truly been fed in heaven with the bread of the Lord, and this he publicly affirmed in the presence of others." (Eadmer, Life of St. Anselm, I, 2.) Eadmer adds that the boy was beloved by the Master, and at fifteen entered the monastery of the monastery. But the abbot, fearing the father's disapproval, refused him. The boy then made a strange prayer. He asked for an illness, thinking this would move the monks to yield to his wishes. The illness came, but not as he wished, for he now determined to leave the monastery. None the less he determined to gain his end at some future date. But ere long he was drawn away by the pleasures of youth and lost his first ardour and his love of learning. His love for his mother in some measure restrained him. But on her death it seemed that his anchor was lost, and he was at the mercy of the waves.

At this time his father treated him with great harshness; so much so that he resolved to leave his home. Taking a single companion, he set out on foot to cross Mont Cenis. At one time he was fainting with hunger and was fain to refresh his strength with snow, when the servant found that some bread was still left in the baggage, and Anselm regained strength and continued the journey. After passing nearly three years in Burgundy and France, he came into Normandy and tarried for a while at Avranches before finding his home at the Abbey of Bec, then made illustrious by Lanfranc's learning. Anselm profited so well by the Benedictines of this monastery that he became his most familiar disciple and shared in the work of teaching. After spending some time in this labour, he began to think that his toil would have more merit if he took the monastic habit. But at first he felt some reluctance to enter the Abbey of Bec, where he would be overshadowed by Lanfranc. After a time, however, he saw that it would profit him to remain where he would be surpassed by others. His father was now dead, having ended his days in the monastic habit, and Anselm had some thought of living on his patrimony and relieving the needy. The life of a hermit also presented itself to him as a third alternative. Anxious to act with prudence, he first asked the advice of Lanfranc, who referred the matter to the Archbishop of Rouen. This prelate decided in favour of the monastic life, and Anselm became a monk in the Abbey of Bec. This was in 1060. His life as a simple monk lasted for fourteen years, for on 10 June 1069 he heard the voice of the Abbot of Caen, and Anselm was elected to succeed him as Prior. There is some doubt as to the date of this appointment. But Canon Forc? points out that Anselm, writing at the time of his election as Archbishop (1083), says that he had then lived thirty-three years in the monastic habit, three years as a monk without preference, fifteen as prior, and fifteen as abbot (Letters of Anselm, Ill, vii.). This is confirmed by an entry in the chronicle of the Abbey of Bec, which was compiled not later than 1136. Here it is recorded that Anselm died in 1109, in the fortieth year of his monastic life and the seventy-eighth of his age. He was appointed prior of the monastery; fifteen, prior; fifteen, abbot; and sixteen, archbishop (Forc?, Histoire de l'abbaye de Bec, III, 173). At first his promotion to the office vacated by Lanfranc gave offence to some of the other monks who considered they had a better claim than the young stranger. But Anselm's election by general consent, long before, had won their affection and obedience. To the duties of prior he added those of teacher. It was likewise during this period that he composed some of his philosophical and theological works, notably, the "Monologion" and the "Prologium". Besides giving good counsel to his monks under the name of "Admonitio", he wrote on many other subjects, for others by his letters. Remembering his attraction for the solitude of a hermitage we can hardly wonder that he felt oppressed by this busy life and longed to lay aside his office and give himself up to the delights of contemplation. But the Archbishop of Rouen bade him retain his office and prepare for yet greater burdens.

This advice was prophetic, for in 1078, on the death of Herluin, founder and first Abbots of Bec, Anselm was invited to enter into his cell, and it was found that the difficulty that the monks overcame his reluctance to accept the office. His biographer, Eadmer, gives us a picture of a strange scene. The Abbots-elect fell prostrate before the brethren and with tears besought them not to lay this burden on him, while the monks themselves cried "No, no!" He knew nothing of the movement until the King’s repentance passed away with his sickness, and Anselm soon saw signs of trouble. His first offence was his refusal to consent to the alienation of Church lands which the King had granted to his followers. Another difficulty arose from the King’s need of money. Although his see was impoverished by the royal rapacity, the Archbishop was expected to make his majesty a free gift; and when he offered five hundred marks they were scornfully refused as insufficient. As if these trials were not enough, Anselm had to bear the reproaches of some of the monks of Bec who were loath to lose him; in his letters he often mentioned that he did not wish to add to his sins. He finally was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, 4 December, 1093. It now remained for him to go to Rome to obtain the pallium. But here was a fresh occasion of trouble. The Antipope Clement was disputing the authority of Urban II, who had been recognized by France and Normandy. It does not appear that the English King was a partisan of the Antipope, but he wished to strengthen his own position by asserting his right to decide between the rival claimants. Hence, when Anselm asked leave to go to the Pope, the King said that no one in England should acknowledge either Pope till he, the King, had decided the matter. The Archbishop insisted on going to Pope Urban, whose authority he had already acknowledged, and, as he had told the King, this was one of the conditions on which alone he would accept the archbishopric. This grave question was referred to a council of the realm held at Rockingham in 1095, at the instance of the King. Anselm showed the authority of Urban. His speech is a memorable testimony to the doctrine of papal supremacy. It is significant that not one of the bishops could call it in question (Eadmer, Historia Novorum, lib. 1). Regarding Anselm’s belief on this point we may cite the frank words of Dean Hook: "Anselm was simply and simply right. He believed in St. Peter as the chief ” of the Apostles; that as such he was the source of all ecclesiastical authority and power; that the pope was his successor; and that consequently, to the pope was due, from the bishops and metropolitans as well as from the rest of mankind, the obedience which a spiritual suzerain has the right by right to assert from his vassals" (Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, (London, 1860-75), II, 183).

William now sent envoys to Rome to get the pallium. They found Urban in possession and recognized him. Walter, Bishop of Albano, came back with them as legate bearing the pallium. The King was in Gascony, and was made prisoner by the French, who at first endeavoured to get Anselm deposed by the legate. Eventually a reconciliation was occasioned by the royal difficulties in Wales and in the north. The King and the Archbishop met in peace. Anselm would not take the pallium from the King’s hand, but in a solemn service at Canterbury, on 11 July, 1095, it was laid on the altar by the legate, whence Anselm took it. Fresh trouble arose in 1097. On returning from his ineffectual Welsh campaign William brought a charge against the Archbishop in regard to the contingent he had furnished and required him to meet this charge in the King’s court. Anselm declined and asked leave to go to Rome. This but after a short time Anselm was told to be ready to sail in ten days. On parting with the King, the Archbishop gave him his blessing, which William received with bowed head. At St. Omer’s Anselm confirmed a multitude of persons. Christmas was spent at Cluny, and the rest of the winter at Lyons. In the spring he resumed his journey and crossed the Mont Cenis with two companions, all travelling as simple monks. At the monasteries on their way they were frequently asked for news of Anselm. On his arrival in Rome he was treated with great honour by the Pope. His case was considered and laid before the council, but nothing to the benefit of Anselm was communicated. During his stay in Italy Anselm enjoyed the hospitality of the Abbot of Tellase, and the summer in a mountain village belonging to this monastery. Here he finished his work, “Cursus Dei Homin”, which he had begun in England. In October, 1095, Urban held a council at Bari to deal with the difficulties raised by the Greeks in regard to the procession of the Holy Ghost. Here Anselm was called by the Pope to a place of honour and bid to take the chief part in the discussion. His arguments were afterwards committed to writing in his treatise on this subject. His own case was also brought before the council, and Adela of Jumièges communicated William but for Anselm’s intercession. Both he and his companions now desired to return to Lyons, but were hidden to avoid the action of another council to be held in the Lateran at Easter. Here Anselm heard the canons passed against Investitures, and the decrees of excommunication against the offenders. This incident had a deep influence on his career in England.

While still staying in the neighbourhood of Lyons, Anselm heard of the tragic death of William. Soon messages from the new king and chief men of the land summoned him to England. Landing at Dover, he hastened to King Henry at Salisbury. He was kindly received, but the question of Investitures was at once raised in an acute form. Henry required the Archbishop himself to receive a fresh investiture. Anselm alleged the decrees of the recent Roman council and declared that he had no choice in the matter. In the difficulty Anselm lost the King’s confidence, and the King decided to send to Rome to ask for a special exemption. Meanwhile, Anselm was able to render the King two signal services. He helped to remove the obstacle in the way of his marriage with Edith, the heiress of the Saxon kings. The daughter of St. Margaret had sought shelter in a convent, where she had worn the veil, but had taken no vows. It was thought by some that this was a bar to marriage, but Anselm had the case considered in a council at Lambeth, where the royal maiden’s liberty was fully established, and the Archbishop himself gave his blessing to the marriage. Moreover, when Robert, last of the Plantagenet line of the Normans, was waging war in Scotland, it was Anselm who turned the tide in favour of Henry. In the meantime Pope Paschal had refused the King’s request for an exemption from the Lateran decrees, yet Henry persisted in his resolution to compel Anselm to receive investiture. The revolt of Robert de Bellesme put off the threatened rupture. To gain time the King sent another embassy to Rome. On its return, Anselm was once more required to receive investiture. The Pope’s letter was not made public, but it was reported to be of the same tenor as his previous reply. The envoys now gave out that the Pope had only sent a letter to the King’s request, but could not say so in writing for fear of offending other sovereigns. Friends of Anselm who had been at Rome, disputed this assertion. In this crisis it was agreed to send to Rome again; meanwhile the King would continue to urge an abbots. Anselm should not be required to consecrate them.

During this interval Anselm held a council at Westminster. Here stringent canons were passed against the evils of the age. In spite of the compromise about investiture, Anselm was required to consecrate bishops invested by the King, but he firmly refused, and it soon became evident that his firmness was taking effect. Bishops gave back the staff they had received at the royal hands, or refused to be consecrated by another in defiance of Anselm. When the Pope’s answer arrived, repudiating the story of the envoys, the King asked Anselm to go himself and write him a letter of compliance. At last the royal request he was willing to lay the facts before the Pope. With this understanding he once more betook himself to Rome. The request was again refused, but Henry was not excommunicated. Understanding that Henry did not wish to receive him in England, Anselm interrupted his homeward journey at Lyons. In this city he received a letter from the Pope informing him of the excommunication of the councillors who had advised the King to insist on investitures, but not decreasing anything about the King. Anselm resumed his journey, and on the way he heard of the illness of Henry’s wife. He turned with joy to Rome, and on her recovery informed her that he was returning to England to excommunicate her brother. She at once exerted herself to bring about a meeting between Anselm and Henry, in July, 1105. But though a reconciliation was effected, and Anselm was urged to return to England, the claim to invest was not relinquished, and recourse had again to be made to Rome. A papal letter authorizing Anselm to absolve from censures incurred by breaking the laws against investitures healed past offences but made no provision for the future. At length, in a council held in London in 1107, the question found a solution. The King relinquished the claim to invest bishops and abbots, while the Church allowed the prelates to do homage for their temporal possessions. Lingard and other writers consider this a triumph for the King, saying that he had the substance and abandoned a mere form. It was true that the point was no longer a matter of church discipline, and the question had been waged. The rite used in the investiture was the symbol of a real power claimed by the English kings, and now at last abandoned. The victory rested with the Archbishop, and as Schwane says (Kirchenlexicon, s. v.) it prepared the way for the later solution of the same controversy in Germany. Anselm was allowed to end his days in peace. In the two years that remained he continued his pastoral labours and composed the last of his writings. Eadmer, the faithful chronicler of these contents, gives a pleasing picture of his peaceful death. The dream of his childhood was come true; he was to climb the mountain and taste the bread of Heaven.

His active work as a pastor and stalwart champion of the Church makes Anselm one of the chief figures in religious history. The sweet influence of his spiritual teaching was felt far and wide, and its fruits were seen in the intellectual and social revolution of the twelfth century. The freedom of the Church in a crisis of mediaval history had far-reaching effects long after his own time. As a writer and a thinker he may claim yet higher rank, and his influence on the course of philosophy and Catholic theology was even deeper and more enduring. If he stands on the shoulders of St. Patrick, St. Gregory, St. Augustine, and Thomas Aquinas. His merits in the field of theology have received official recognition;
he has been declared a Doctor of the Church by Clement XI, 1720, and in the office read on his feast day (21 April) it is said that his works are a pattern for all theologians. Yet it may be doubted whether his position is generally appreciated by students of divinity. In some degree his work has been hidden by the fabric reared on his foundations. His books were later the theme of Peter Lombard, of St. Thomas, as the usual text of commentators and lecturers in theology, nor was he constantly cited as an authority, like St. Augustine. This was natural enough, since in the next century new methods came in with the rise of the Arabic and Aristotelian philosophies. The books of St. Anselm were probably less always more fit for regular theological reading; Anselm was yet too near to have the venerable authority of the early Fathers. For these reasons it may be said that his writings were not properly appreciated till time had brought in other changes in the schools, and men were led to study the history of theology. But though his works are not cast in the systematic form of the "Summa" of St. Thomas, they cover the whole field of Catholic doctrine. There are few pages of our theology that have not been illustrated by the labours of Anselm. His treatise on the procession of the Holy Spirit has helped to guide modern speculation on the Trinity. "Cur Deus Homo" throws a flood of light on the theology of the Atonement, and one of his works anticipates much of the later controversies on Free Will and Predestination. In the seventeenth century, a Spanish Benedictine, Cardinal d’Aguirre, made the writings of Anselm the groundwork of a course of theology, "S. Anselmi Theologia" (Salamanca, 1678–81). Unfortunately the work never got beyond the first three folio volumes, containing the commentaries on the "Monologium". In recent years Dom Anselm Česényi, O.S.B. has accomplished the task on a more modern scale in a little Latin volume on the theology of St. Anselm, "De Theologia S. Anselmi" (Brünn, 1884).

Besides being one of the fathers of scholastic theology, Anselm fills an important place in the history of philosophic speculation. Coming in the first phase of the controversy on Universals, he had to make his decision. Nominalism, the official philosophy of the court of Charles V, was from this fact, partly from his native Platonism, his Realism took what may be considered a somewhat extreme form. It was too soon to find the golden mean of moderate Realism, accepted by later philosophs. His position was a stage in the process, and it is significant that one of his biographers, John of Salisbury, was among the first to find the first to find the true solution (Stockl, History of Mediaeval Philosophy, I, 425).

Anselm’s chief achievement in philosophy was the ontological argument for the existence of God put forth in his "Proslogion". Starting from the notion that God is "that than which nothing greater can be thought", he argues that what exists in reality is greater than that which is only in the mind; wherefore, since "God is that than which nothing greater can be thought", He exists in reality. The validity of the argument was disputed at the outset by a monk named Gaunilo, who wrote a criticism on a monk named Gaunilo, who wrote a criticism on an essay in which Anselm tells a curious story about St. Anselm’s anxiety while he was trying to work out this argument. He could think of nothing else for days together. And when at last he saw it clearly, he was filled with joy, and made haste to commit it to writing. The waxen tablets were given in charge to one of the monks, but when they were wanted they were missing. Anselm managed to recall the argument; it was written on fresh tablets and given into safer keeping. But when it was wanted it was found that the wax was broken to pieces. Anselm with some difficulty put the fragments together and had the whole copied on parchment for greater security. The story sounds like an allegory of the fate which awaited this famous argument, which was lost and found again, pulled to pieces and restored in the course of controversy. Rejected by St. Thomas and his followers, it was revived in its refined form by Descartes. After being assailed by Kant, it was defended by Hegel, for whom it had a peculiar fascination; he recurs to it in many parts of his writings. In one place he says that it is generally used by later philosophers, "yet always along with the other proofs, although it alone is the true one" (German ed. 1830, XII, 541). One must remember that all minds are not cast in one mould, and it is easy to understand how some can feel the force of arguments that are not felt by others. But if this proof were indeed, as some consider it, an absurd fallacy, how could it appeal to such minds as those of Anselm, Descartes, and Hegel? It may be well to add that the argument was not rejected by all the great Schoolmen. It was accepted by Alexander of Hales (Summa, Pt. I, Q. iii, memb. 1, 2), and supported by Scotus. (In I, Dist. ii, Q. ii.) In modern times it is accepted by Möhler, who quotes Hegel’s defence with approval.

It is not often that a Catholic saint wins the admiration of German philosophers and English historians. But Anselm has this singular distinction. Hegel’s appreciation of his mental powers may be matched by Freeman’s warm words of praise for the great Archbishop of Canterbury. "Stranger as he was, he has won his place among the noblest worthies of our island. It was something to be the model of all ecclesiastical perfection; it was something to be the creator of the theology of Christendom; but it was something higher still to be the very embodiment of righteousness and mercy, to be handed down in the annals of humanity as the man who saved the hunted hare and stood up for the holiness of Ælfwine" (History of the Norman Conquest, IV, 444).

Collections of the works of St. Anselm were issued soon after the invention of printing. Česényi mentions nine earlier than the sixteenth century. The first attempt at an edition of the entire Christiani, was made by Raynaud, S.J. (Lyons, 1630), which rejects many spurious works, e.g. the Commentaries on St. Paul. The best editions are those of Dom Gerberon, O.S.B. (Paris, 1675, 1721; Venice 1744; Migne, 1845). Most of the more important works have also been issued separately; thus the "Proslogion" is included in Hurter’s "Opuscula Sanctorum", published with the "Proslogion" by Haas (Tübingen). There are numerous separate editions of the "Cur Deus Homo" and of Anselm’s "Prayers and Meditations"; these last were done into English by Archbishop Laud (1638), and there are French and German versions of the "Meditations" and the "Monologium". "Cur Deus Homo" has also been translated into English and German; see also the translations by Deane (Chicago, 1903). For Anselm’s views on education, see Bec, Abbey of.

The chief sources for Anselm’s life are his own letters and the two biographical works of his friend, disciple, and secretary, Eadmer, monk of Canterbury, and Bishop-elect of St. Andrews, Eadmer’s Historia Nrorum may be called the "Life and Times of St. Anselm"; his Historia vita et mortis vita and the Life of St. Anselm, the first, published in 1623 with notes by John Selden, is included in Gerberon’s and Migne’s editions of the works of St. Anselm, the second has been many times reprinted; an edition was published by Nutt (London, 1836), together with Cur Deus Homo. Both have been edited in the Monumenta Germania, and there is a brief account of the miracles of St. Anselm which is also ascribed to Eadmer, but its authorship is doubtful. Pasch Rainer, in his valuable Fasciculus biographiae, vindicated the veracity of the medieval chronicler, whose methods have much in common with modern biographers. Other early writers on Anselm, such as John of Salisbury, add some new details, but their account of the Anselm of Lucca, THE YOUNGER, Saint, b. at Mantua c. 1036; d. in the same city, 18 March, 1086. He was nephew of Anselm of Lucca, the Elder, who endowed the Papal throne with Alexander II in 1061. In the year 1071 Alexander II designated Anselm as Bishop of Lucca and sent him to Germany to take investiture from Henry IV. Anselm went to Germany, but was loath to receive the insignia of spiritual power from a temporal ruler and returned without investiture. In 1073 Gregory VII, successor of Alexander II, also appointed Anselm Bishop of Lucca, but advised him not to accept his ring and crosier from Henry IV. For some reason, Anselm accepted investiture from Henry, but soon felt such remorse that he resigned his bishopric and entered the Order of St. Benedict at Padiirone, a monastery of the Cluniaese Reform, where he remained until the capture of Desiderius by Charlemagne. Having been abbot for fifty years, Anselm died at Nonantula in 1081, and the town of that name still honours him as its patron.

Anselm of Lyon (Anselmus Laudensis), d. 15 July, 1117, one of the famous theologians of the Middle Ages, known from his learning as Doctor Scholasticus. He was educated at the abbey of Bec, under St. Anselm of Canterbury, who made him acquainted with the new scholastic theology. From 1076 he taught for a while with much distinction at Paris, and co-operated with William of Champeaux in establishing the university there. He returned to Lyon about the end of the eleventh century and founded a local school which became so famous that Abelard, then thirty years of age, who was teaching philosophy at Paris, removed to Lyon in order to study theology under him. Anselm's chief work is his “Glossa interlinearia”, a commentary on the whole Vulgate (Antwerp, 1634), one of the chief exegetical works of the Middle Ages, which, as the “Glossa ordinaria” of Walfrid Strabo. His known writings are found in Migne, P. L., CLXII, 1187-1660.

Anselme, Antoine, a celebrated French preacher, b. at l'Isle-Jourdain in the Comté d'Armagnac, 13 January, 1652; d. at Saint-Sever, 8 August, 1737. His father was a distinguished surgeon. Anselme studied at Toulouse and became a priest. As a child he was called the "Little Prophet", because he would repeat with appropriate gestures sermons which he had heard on the Sunday. The bishop ordered him to bring the boy up to his death. After his ordination he preached in Toulouse, and the Marquis de Montespan was so delighted with his eloquence that he made him instructor to his son, the Marquis d'Antin, and brought him to Paris. Père Anselme's eloquent sermons there soon procured him such repute as a sacred orator that parishes wishing to secure him had to do so two or three years in advance. In 1681 the French Academy chose him to deliver before it the panegyric on St. Louis. Two years later (1683) he preached at Court. Mme de Sévigné in one of her letters (8 April, 1689) speaks in warm terms of his eloquence and devotion. He became a member of the Academy of Inscriptions in 1710. He died at the age of eighty-five, in the Abbey of Saint-Sever which Louis XIV had given him in 1699. Father Anselme's writings are some odes printed in the "Recueil de l'Académie des Jeux Floraux de Toulouse"; "Panegyrics of Saints and Funeral Orations at Paris in 1718" (3 vols. 8vo., with his portrait); "Sermons for Advent, Lent, and Various Occasions" (Paris, 1717-18. and 1722-3); divers dissertations inserted in the "Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions" from 1724 to 1729.

d (from Lat. ante—a before, and diluvium—flood; people who lived before the Flood). Among the names Penteateuchus enumerates ten patriarchs. A genealogical table of them is given (Gen., v.). Their names, lifetime, and age at which they begot their successors are systematically stated. The modern theory of the composition of the Pentateuch assigns the chapter in which this table occurs to the documentary source commonly called the "Priestly Code," or by abbreviation, P. (See Penteateuch.) In the narrative of this code the table of the ten patriarchs is said by critics to have followed immediately after the Hexahemeron of chapter i. The account of the creation concluded or began, they maintain, with the phrase: "These are the generations of heaven and earth." (Gen., ii, 4.) The list of the patriarchs begins: "This is the book of the generations of Adam." The thread of the same narrative is said to be further continued in chapter vi. 9, by means of the same phrase: "These are the generations of Noé." The intervening chapters, critics hold, belong to an older account of the primeval time. Critics allege that among the names of the ten patriarchs there are six that occur also in the list of the descendants of Cain. The table of Cainites is given in chapter iv. ver. 17-18. The six names, supposed to be the same both registers, are Cain or Caïn, Henoch, Jared, Mavisel or Malael, Mathusael or Mathusala, and Lamech. The different manner in which in some of the names are spelled in the parallel list is held to be insignificant. As the table of Cainites in chapter iv. is assumed by critics to be from an older document than that of the Adamites in chapter v., the inference was obvious that the names of the former table were taken from the former. For this inference critics find a support in the meaning of the names Adam, Enoe, and Cain or Caïn. The names Adam and Enoe mean "man"; Cain or Caïn means "the one begotten" or "the son obtained." cf. iv., 1. Thus we would have the names Adam-Cain, Enoes-Caï'n, namely, man, and his scion.

The Number Ten.—In fixing upon the number ten as the number of patriarchs the author may have followed some ancient and perhaps widely spread tradition. It is said that the ten patriarchs with their abnormally long lifetimes resemble those of the first ten Babylonian kings as recorded by Berosus, Eusebius, Chron. Arm., i, i. t. XIX, col. 107-108. According to Vigouroux, "Dictionnaire de la bible," the tradition of ten ancient ancestors is found also with other races; e.g. among the Hindus, with their ten Pitris or forfathers, comprising Brahma and the nine Bramadikas; among the ancient Germans and Scandinavians, with their belief in the ten ancestors of Odin, etc. But it is equally possible that the number ten is simply due to a systematic method of computation. Thus the pre-historic age from Adam to Abraham was to comprehend twenty generations, ten from Adam to Abraham, and ten from Abraham to Thare. A similar systematic arrangement we have in the genealogical table of Christ in St. Matthew containing three times fourteen generations. The following table contains the names of the patriarchs with their respective ages according to the Hebrew text, Septuagint, and Samaritan Bible; also the names of the reign of the ten Babylonian kings. The first column gives the age at which the patriarch begot his successor, the second the remainder of his years, the third the total number of his years. The list of Babylonian kings is taken from Vigouroux (Dict. de la bible):—

As the table shows, the original text and its two versions differ greatly in fixing the number of years from Adam to the Flood. In the Hebrew Bible the number is 1,656, in the Samaritan, 1,307; in the Septuagint, 2,242. On a closer examination it will be found that the difference between the Hebrew text and the Septuagint is chiefly occasioned by the systematic addition of 100 years which the Septuagint has made to the age of six patriarchs at the birth of their successors. The Samaritan on the contrary has in the case of three patriarchs deducted 100 years. No reliable clue that we know of has as yet been found for deciding which of the computations is the original. Presumption is on the side of the one in the Hebrew text being the oldest text of the three. On the other hand, the Samaritan has the advantage that the lifetime of the three patriarchs Jared, Mathusala, and Lamech has been shortened, so that there is a gradual decrease in the number of years of each patriarch from Adam to Noe. In the table of the ten Babylonian kings the length of their reign is calculated by means of sars. Berosus counts 120 sars. The sars has an astronomical value of 3,600 years and a civil value of eighteen and one-half years (Vigouroux, Dict. de la bible). According to the first estimation of the sars, the total number of years for the ten kings would be 432,000, according to the second 2,220. The efforts made to bring the sars or 432,000 years of the Babylonian kings, into harmony with the 1,656 years of the patriarchs (e. g. by equating seven Hebrew days with five Chaldean years) have yielded no satisfactory result.

Longevity of the Patriarchs.—Various theories have been advanced for explaining the abnormally long lifetime of the patriarchs. They may be classified into three groups: (1) The Literal and Historical Interpretation.—The genealogical table is accepted as a record of the past and as possessing the ordinary certainty of history. The ten patriarchs are held actually to have lived the long life assigned to them. The object which God intended by this extraordinary longevity is said to have been the increase of man on earth and the preservation of ancient tradition. In answer to the objection that the system of the human body does not permit of so long a lifetime, it is argued that a special providence of God had favoured the ancients with a peculiar organization and body and had provided for them a special kind of food and climate. Thus already Josephus: “Let no one make account of their virtue, and the good use they made of it in astronomical and geometrical discoveries, etc.” Furthermore in corroboration of the Biblical account he names as witnesses the historians Manetho the Egyptian Historian, the Chaldean, Mochus, Hestigmis, Hieronymus the Egyptian, and others, who all bore testimony to the longevity of primeval man. Ant., I, III, 9. (2) The Metaphorical Interpretation.—The names of the ten patriarchs signify ten dynasties or tribes. Each dynasty might have comprised a succession of several rulers. The explanation is ingenious. It may be doubted, however, whether this was the meaning of the narrator. By naming the patriarchs he seems to have meant one individual. For he states the age at which the patriarch begot the son who was to succeed him. Others argue that the Hebrew word, 'Shanah, in the list of the ten patriarchs signifies the duration not of a year, but of a month. But in that case Enos begot his successor when he was eight years of age, and Malaeel and Henoch begot theirs when they were five. Others again, but without sufficient ground, say that the year is to be taken as a year of three months, or a civil year of 365 days and 250,375 days until Joseph, and only after him are we to allow for it the natural duration. (3) The Mythical Interpretation.—We have already pointed out that according to the theory of the documentary composition of the Pentateuch, chapter v belongs to the original history named by the critics the “Priestly Code.” If the genealogical dates recorded in that narrative are examined, a gradual and systematic shortening of man’s lifetime is distinctly noticeable. From Adam to Noe the duration of man’s life ranges from 500 to 1,000 years. From Sem to Thare it ranges from 200 to 600 (xi. 10-12). From Abraham to Moses, from 100 to 200. Abraham lived 175 years; Isaac, 180; Jacob, 147 (Gen., xxxv, 28; xxv, 7; xliv, 28). After that the average human life is 70 or 80 years. “And the days of our years in them are three score and ten years. But if in the strong they be fourscore years” (Ps., lxxxix, 10). Critics, moreover, hold, as we have seen, that a marked deviation from the original structure of the “Priestly Code” the genealogical table in chapter v immediately followed the account of the Creation in chapter i. If so, the narrative of this Code contained no mention of paradise, nor of man’s immortality, fall, and punishment. On the other hand, it may have been in the opinion of its author of this Code that the smooth and even course of man’s life, the result of his continued state of innocence, ANTEGNATI contributed to the possibility of his attaining a preternaturally old age. But when this primordial innocence was lost the duration of his life was shortened. Thus the longevity of the patriarchs would agree with the notion of the primordial status and existence of man, as known and implied by theologians of the time.

Anterus (Anteros), Saint, Pope (21 November, 235–3 January, 236). We know for certain only that he reigned some forty days, and that he was buried in the famous "papal crypt" of the cemetery of St. Calixtus at Rome [Northcote and Brownlow, Roma Sotterranea, (London, 1879) I, 296–300]. The "Liber Pontificalis" (ed. Duchesne I, 147; cf. xcv–vi) says that he was martyred for having caused the Acts of the martyrs to be collected by notaries and committed to the archives of the Church. This tradition seems old and respectable; nevertheless the best scholars maintain that it is not sufficiently guaranteed by its sole voucher, the "Liber Pontificalis", on account, among other things, of the late date of that work's compilation. (See PAPACY, NOTARIES). The site of his sepulchre was discovered by De Rossi in 1854, with some broken remnants of the Greek epitaph engraved on the narrow oblong slab that closed his tomb, an index at once of his origin and of the prevalence of Greek in the Roman Church up to that date. For the "Epistola Anter" attributed to him by Pseudo-Isidore see Hinrichs, "Decret. Pseudo-Isidoriane" (Leipzig, 1863), 156–160 and P. G. X, 165–168. Cf. "Liber Ponti", (ed. Duchesne), I, 147.

Anthemius, a Byzantine official of the fourth and fifth centuries, of high rank and fine character. He was one of the most celebrated magistrates of his day, noted for his wisdom and his administrative ability. St. Chrysostom and he entertained the greatest respect for each other. Anthemius was Magister Officiorum at the time of the disturbances which followed St. Chrysostom's deposition (Easter, 404), and the Saint's enemies demanded from him the books which he had been accused of having. At first he refused, but then yielded to their importunities, declaring that they were responsible for the consequences (Pallad. 83). Anthemius was made consul in 405, and soon after Prefect of the East (Cod. Theod. Chronol., 149), a position he held until 417. St. Chrysostom wrote to him in warm terms (Ep. exvii). The title of Patrician is given to him in the law of 28 April, 406 (Cod. Theod. Chron. 149). He was principal adviser to Theodosius the Younger (Soc., Hist. Eccl., VII, 1) and, through his daughter's marriage to Procopius, became grand-father to the Emperor Anthemi. He took part in the reception of the reliefs from Procopius, presented to Constantine (Chron. Alex. 714; Theod. Lect. ii, 64; Tillemon, Empereurs).

Anthony, Saint, founder of Christian monasticism. The chief source of information on St. Anthony is a Greek Life attributed to St. Athanasius, to be found in any edition of his works. A note of the recent controversy concerning this Life is not appended to this article; here it will suffice to say that now it is received with practical unanimity by scholars as a substantially historical record, and as a probably authentic work of Athanasius. Valuable subsidiary information is supplied by secondary sources: the "Aposthegmata", chiefly those collected under the letters being published in the "Journal des Savants", in 1889. Toward the close of the same year Anthelmiv validated his position by the publication at Paris of his work "De veris operibus SS. Patrum Leonis et Prosperi". The opposition between Anthelmiv and Queenel butler in regard to the authorship of the Athanasian Creed. Queenel thought it the work of Vigilius, Bishop of Thapsus, in Africa, who towards the end of the fifth century was driven from his see by Huneric, King of the Vandals, and taking refuge in Constantinople wrote against the Arians, but the Eastern and Novatians, attributing his own works to St. Augustine and St. Athanasius. Anthelmiv, on the contrary, inclined to the view of Père Pithou, who attributed it to St. Vincent of Lérins; and in 1693 he published his "Nova de symbolo Athanasiano disquisitio". In this work Anthelmiv endeavoured to prove that the Creed cannot be the production of St. Athanasius, as it was composed not earlier than the fifth century; and that its author was a Gaul. St. Vincent was known to have had the intention of filling out at length a confession of faith in the mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation; this, taken in conjunction with the similar style of expression between the Athanasian Creed and the writings of St. Vincent, is the foundation of Anthelmiv's argument. His brother, Charles, Bishop of Grasse, collected and published several other historical papers, the most notable of which was a pamphlet, "On the Life and Death of St. Martin of Tours". In 1694, Anthelmiv made vicar-general to the Bishop of Pamphylia, but his health, already impaired by a life of severe study and unremitting labour, could not stand the additional strain put upon it by his new duties, and he returned to his native city in a vain attempt to recuperate. Here he died in the forty-ninth year of his age.
Anthony's name (at the head of Cotterill's 'alphabetical collection, P. G., LXV, 7); Cassian, especially Coll. II; Palladius, "Historia Lausiaca," 3, 4, 21, 22 (ed. Butler). All this matter may probably be accepted as substantially authentic, whereas what is related regarding St. Anthony in St. Jerome's "Life of the Hermit" cannot be used for historical purposes. Anthony was born at Coma, near Hermopolis Magna in the Fayum, about the middle of the third century. He was the son of well-to-do parents, and on their death, in his twentieth year, he inherited their possessions. He had a desire to imitate the life of the Apostles and the early Christians, and one day, on hearing in the church the Gospel words, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell all thou hast," he received them as spoken to himself, disposed of all his property and goods, and devoted himself exclusively to religious exercises. Long before this it had been usual for Christians to practise asceticism, abstaining from marriage and exercising themselves in self-denial, fasting, prayer, and works of piety; but this they had done in the midst of their families, and without leaving house or home. Later on, in Egypt, such ascetics lived in huts, in the outskirts of towns and villages, and the common practice about 270, when Anthony withdrew from the world. He began his career by practising the ascetic life in this fashion without leaving his native place. He used to visit the various asetics, study their lives, and try to learn from each of them the virtue in which he seemed to excel. Then he took up his abode in one of the tombs, near his native village, and there it was that the Life records those strange conflicts with demons in the shape of wild beasts, who inflicted blows upon him, and sometimes left him nearly dead. After fifteen years of this life, at the age of thirty-five, Anthony determined to withdraw from the habitation of men and retire into absolute solitude. He crossed the Nile, and on a mountain near the east bank, then called Pispir, now Der el Memun, he found an old fort into which he shut himself, and lived there for twenty years without seeing the face of man, food being thrown to him over the wall. He was at times visited by pilgrims, whom he refused to see; but gradually a number of would-be disciples established themselves in caves and in huts around the mountain. Thus a colony of ascetics was formed, who begged Anthony to come forth and be their guide in the spiritual life. At length, about the year 310, he yielded to this temptation, and emerged from his retreat, and, to the surprise of all, he appeared to be as when he had gone in, not emaciated, but vigorous in body and mind. For five or six years he devoted himself to the instruction and organization of the great body of monks that had grown up around him; but then he once again withdrew into the inner desert that lay between the Nile and the Red Sea, near the shore of which he fixed his abode on a mountain where still stands the monastery that bears his name, the Der Mar Antonius. Here he spent the last forty-five years of his life, in a seclusion, not so strict as at Pispir, for he allowed some of those who could visit him, to use the cross to the desert to Pispir with considerable frequency. The Life says that on two occasions he went to Alexandria, once after he came forth from the fort at Pispìr, to strengthen the Christian martyrs in the persecution of 311, and once at the close of his life (c. 350), to preach against the Arians. The Life places his death at the age of one hundred and sixty, and St. Jerome places his death in 356-357. All the chronology is based on the hypothesis that this date and the figures in the Life are correct. At his own request his grave was kept secret by the two disciples who buried him, lest his body should become an object of reverence.

Of his writings, the most authentic formulation of his teaching is without doubt that which is contained in the various sayings and discourses put into his mouth in the Life, especially the long ascetic sermon (19-43) spoken on his coming forth from his retreat at Pispir. It is a translation attributed to him in the "Apophthegmata" really go back to him, and the same may be said of the stories told of him in Cassian and Palladius. There is a homogeneity about these records, and a certain dignity and spiritual elevation that seem to mark them with the stamp of truth, and to justify the belief that the picture they give us of St. Anthony's personality, character, and teaching is essentially authentic. A different verdict has to be passed on the writings that go under his name, to be found in P. G., XL. The Sermons and twenty Epistles from the Arabic are the common source of pronouncedly spurious. St. Jerome (De Viris Ilustribus) only knows Anthony by his sayings translated from Coptic into Greek; the Greek appears to be lost, but a Latin version exists (ibid.), and Coptic fragments of three of these letters have recently been printed (Journ. of Theol. Studies, July, 1906) agreeing closely with the Latin; they may be authentic, but it would be premature to decide. Better is the position of a Greek letter to Theodore, preserved in the "Epistola Ammonis ad Theophilum", § 20, and said to be a translation of a Coptic original; there seems to be no sufficient ground for doubting that it really was written by Anthony (see Butler, Lampric Histories of the Monks, ii. 157). The authorities are agreed that St. Anthony knew no Greek and spoke only Coptic. There exists a monastic Rule that bears St. Anthony's name, preserved in Latin and Arabic forms (P. G., XL, 1065); it has recently been critically investigated by Contestz (DIE REGEL DES H. ANTONIUS, METTEN, 1896), with the result that, while it cannot be received as having been actually composed by Anthony, it probably in large measure goes back to him, being for the most part made up out of the utterances attributed to him in the Life and the "Apophthegmata"; it contains, however, an element derived from the spura sertica, from the Rule of Pachomius (Baxter, op. cit. Part I, 231, 232), but Paul's existence was wholly unknown till long after Anthony had become the recognized leader of Christian hermits. Nor was St. Anthony a great legislator and organizer of monks, like his younger contemporary Pachomius: for, though Pachomius's first foundations were probably some two hundred and fifty years after Anthony's coming forth from his retreat at Pispìr, it cannot be shown that Pachomius was directly influenced by Anthony, indeed his institute ran on quite different lines. And yet it is abundantly evident that from the middle of the fourth century throughout Egypt, as elsewhere, and among the Pachomian monks themselves, St. Anthony was looked upon as the founder and father of Christian monasticism. This great position was no doubt due to his combination of personal qualities that stand out clearly in all the records of him that have come down. The best study of his character is Newman's in the "Church of the Fathers" (reprinted in "Historical Sketches"). The following is his estimate: "His doctrine surely was pure and unimpeachable, and his temper is heavenly, without cowardice, without gloom, without formality, without self-complacency. Superstition is abject and crouching, it is full of thoughts of guilt; it distrusts God, and dreads the powers of evil. Anthony at least had nothing of this, being full of holy confidence, divine peace, cheerful- ness and valorousness, be he (as some men may judge) ever so much an enthusiast" (op. cit., Anthony in Conflict). Full of enthusiasm he certainly was, but it did not make him fanatical or morose; his urbanity and gentleness, his moderation and sense stand out in many of the stories related of him. Anthony was in a sense a mystic (Gelos), for as far as Anthony was maintaining that all virtues discretion was the most essential for attaining perfection; and the little-known story of Eulogius and the Cripple, preserved in the Lausiac History (xxi), illustrates the kind of advice and direction he gave to those who sought his guidance.

The monasticism established under St. Anthony's direct influence became the norm in Northern Egypt, from Lycopolis (Asyut) to the Mediterranean. In contradistinction to the fully cenobitical system, established by St. Pachomius in the south, it continued to be of a semi-eremitical character, the monks living commonly in separate cells or huts, and coming together only occasionally for church services; they were left very much to their own devices, and the life they lived was not a community life according to rule, as now understood (see Butler, op. cit., Part I, 233-238). This was the form of monastic life in the deserts of Nitria and Scete, as portrayed by Palladius and Cassian. Such groups of semi-independent hermitages were later on called Louras, and have always existed in the East alongside of the Baslian monasteries; in the West St. Anthony's monachism is in some measure represented by the Cistercians with St. Bernard as father of the order, and such its rôle in Christian history. He is justly recognized as the father not only of monasticism, strictly so called, but of the technical religious life in every shape and form. Few names have exercised on the human race an influence more deep and lasting, more wide-spread, or on the whole more beneficent.

It remains to say a word on the controversy carried on during the present generation concerning St. Anthony and the Life. In 1877 Weingarten denied the Athanasian authorship and the historical character of the Life, which he pronounced to be a mere romance. His conclusion was that, unconnected with Christian monks, and that there fore the dates of the "real" Anthony had to be shifted nearly a century. Some imitators in England went still further and questioned, even denied, that St. Anthony had ever existed. To anyone conversant with the literature of monastic Egypt, the notion that the fictitious hero of a novel could ever have come to occupy Anthony's position in monastic history can appear nothing else than a fantastic paradox. As a matter of fact these theories are abandoned on all hands; the Life is received as certainly historical in substance, and as probably being the product of the tradition of monastic origins is reinstated in its great outlines. The episode is now chiefly of interest as a curious example of a theory that was broached and became the fashion, and then was completely abandoned, all within a single generation. (On the controversy see Butler, op. cit., Part I, 210-228; Part II, ix-xi). The Greek Life is among the works of Athanasius (ed. Ben. I, ii; P. G., XXVI). A contemporary Latin translation is in Howett's "Variae Patrum" (P. L., LXIV), and an English translation by Robertson in the vol. of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers. Further materials have been published in a monastic sketch by Tillemont (Memoires, VII). Hannay's "Christian Monasticism" (London, 1863) contains some good passages on St. Anthony (96). Several Lives of St. Anthony, such as the "Vita Antoni" of Socrate in Scriptorum and other Lives of the Saints, St. Anthony's feast occurs on 21 January.

E. C. BUTLER.

Anthony, Saint. Orders of. Religious communities or orders under the patronage of St. Anthony the Hermit, father of monasticism, or professing to follow his rule.

I. Disciples of St. Anthony (Antonians), men drawn to his hermitage in the Thebaid by the fame of his holiness, and forming the first monastic community. These he taught to live in poverty, mortifying the flesh, and leading a solitary, penitential life. They were the first monks, solitaries, as they are usually called. A few of them were joined by others; and the Anthony's rule, but in reality their rules date no further back than St. Basil. The Maronite Antonians were divided into two congregations called respectively St. Isaiah and St. Eliseus, or St. Anthony. Their constitutions were approved by Clement XII, the former in 1746, the latter in 1732. The former has 19 convents and 10 hospitals; the latter, which has been subdivided, 10 convents and 8 hospices under the Aleppo branch, and 31 convents and 27 hospices under the Baladite branch.

II. Antonines (Hospital Brothers of St. Anthony), a congregation founded by a certain Gaston of Dauphiné (c. 1095) and his son, in thanksgiving for miraculous relief from "St. Anthony's fire", a disease then epidemic. Near the Church of St. Anthony at Saint-Didier de la Motte they built a hospital, which became the central house of the order. The members devoted themselves to the care of the sick and to the care of those who had the disease above mentioned; they wore a black habit with the Greek letter Tau (St. Anthony's cross) in blue. At first laymen, they received monastic vows from Honorius III (1218), and were constituted canons regular with the Rule of St. Augustine by Boniface VIII (1297). The congregation spread through France, Spain, and Italy, and gave the Church a number of distinguished scholars and prelates. Among their privileges was that of caring for the sick of the papal household. With wealth came relaxation of discipline and a reform was ordained (1616) and partially carried out. In 1777 the congregation was suppressed with the Knights of Malta but was suppressed during the French Revolution.

III. Antonians, a congregation of orthodox Armenians founded during the sixteenth century at the time of the persecutions of Catholic Armenians. Abram Atar Porsigh retired to the Libanus with three companions, and founded the monastery of the Most Holy Saviour under the protection of St. Anthony, to supply members for mission work. A second foundation was made on Mount Lebanon, and a third in Rome (1753), which was approved by Clement XIII. Some members of this congregation were accused of an uncanonical and prominent part in the Armenian Schism (1870-80).

IV. Congregation of St. Anthony, in Flanders, founded in 1615, and placed under the rule of St. Augustine by Paul V, and under the jurisdiction of the provincial of the Belgian Augustinians. The one monastery was called Castelletum.

V. ANTONIANS, CHALDEAN, of the Congregation of Saint-Hormisdas, founded by Gabriel Dambo (1809) in Mesopotamia. They have 4 convents and several parishes and stations.

F. M. RUDIGER.

Anthony of Padua, Saint, Franciscan Thaumaturgist, b. at Lisbon, 1195; d. at Vercelli, 13 June, 1231. He received in baptism the name of Ferdinand. Later writers of the fifteenth century asserted that his father was Martin Bouillon, descendant of the renowned Godfrey de Bouillon, commander of the First Crusade, and his mother, Theresa Tavejra, descendant of Froila I, fourth king of Asturias. Unfortunately, however, his genealogy is uncertain; all that we know of his parents is that they were noble, powerful, and God-fearing people, and at the time of Ferdinand’s birth were both still young, and living near the Cathedral of Lisbon. Having been educated in the Cathedral school, Ferdinand, at the age of fifteen, joined the Canons Regular of St. Augustine, in the convent of St. Vincent, just outside the city walls (1210). Two years later to avoid being distracted by relatives and friends, who frequently came to visit him, he betook himself with permission of his superior to the Convent of Santa Croce in Cóimbra (1212), where he remained for eight years, occupying his time mainly with study and prayer. Gifted with an excellent understanding and a prodigious memory, he soon gathered from the Sacred Scriptures and the writings of the Holy Fathers a treasure of theological knowledge. In the year 1220, having been conveyed into the Church of Santa Croce the bodies of the first Franciscan martyrs, who had suffered death at Morocco, 16 January of the same year, he too was inflamed with the desire of martyrdom, and resolved to become a Friar Minor, that he might preach the Faith to the Saracens and suffer for Christ’s sake. Having confided his intention to some of the brethren of the convent of Olivares (near Cóimbra), who came to beg alms at the Abbey of the Canons Regular, he received from their hands the Franciscan habit in the same Convent of Santa Croce. Thus Ferdinand left the Canons Regular of St. Augustine to join the Order of Friars Minor, taking at the same time the new name of Anthony, a name which later on the Convent of Olivares also adopted. A short time after his entry into the order, Anthony started for Morocco, but, stricken down by a severe illness, which affected him the entire winter, he was compelled to return to Porto in Portugal the following spring, 1221. His ship, however, was overtaken by a violent storm and driven upon the coast of Sicily, where Anthony then remained for some time, till he had regained his health. Having heard meanwhile from the brethren of Messina that a general chapter was to be held at Assisi, 30 May, he journeyed thither, arriving in time to take part in it. The chapter over, Anthony remained entirely unnoticed. “He said not a word of his studies”, writes his earliest biographer, “nor of the services he had performed; his only desire was to follow Jesus Christ and Him crucified”. Accordingly, he applied to Father Graziano, Prefect of the Theological faculty of the University of Paris, to take a place where he could live in solitude and penance, and enter more fully into the spirit and discipline of Franciscan life. Father Graziano, being just at that time in need of a priest for the hermitage of Montepaolo (near Forli), sent him thither, that he might celebrate Mass for the lay-bread run. While Anthony lived retired at Montepaolo it happened, one day, that a number of Franciscan and Dominican friars were sent together to Forli for ordination. Anthony was also present, but simply as companion of the Provincial. When the time for ordination had arrived, it was found that no one had been appointed to preach. The superior turned first to the Dominicans, and asked that one of their number should address a few words to the assembled brethren; but everyone declined, saying he was not prepared. In their emergency they then chose Anthony, whom they thought only able to read the Missal and Breviary, and commanded him to speak whatever the spirit of God might put into his mouth. Anthony, compelled by obedience, spoke at first slowly and timidly, but soon enkindled with fervour, he began to explain the most hidden sense of Holy Scripture with such profound erudition and sublime doctrine that all were struck with astonishment. At that moment began Anthony’s public career. St. Francis, informed of his learning, directed him by the following letter to teach theology to the brethren:

“To Brother Anthony, my bishop (i.e. teacher of sacred sciences), Brother Francis sends his greetings. It is my pleasure that thou teach theology to the brethren, provided, however, that as the Rule prescribes, the spirit of prayer and devotion may not be extinguished. Farewell!” (1224). Before undertaking the instruction, Anthony went for some time to Vercelli, to confer with the famous Abbot, Thomas of Vercelli; thence he taught successfully at Montepaolo in 1224, and later at Toulouse. Nothing whatever is left of his instruction; the primitive documents, as well as the legendary ones, maintain complete silence on this point. Nevertheless, by studying his works, we can form for ourselves a sufficient idea of the character of his doctrine; a doctrine, namely, which, leaving all systematization, prefers an entirely sapiential character, corresponding to the spirit and ideal of St. Francis.

It was as an orator, however, rather than as professor, that Anthony reaped his richest harvest. He possessed in an eminent degree all the good qualities that characterize an eloquent preacher: a loud and clear voice, a winning countenance, wonderful memory, and profound learning, to which were added from on high the spirit of prophecy and an extraordinary gift of miracles. With the zeal of an apostle he undertook to reform the morality of his time by combating in an especial manner the vices of luxury, avarice, and tyranny. The fruit of his sermons was not only his journey, but the change it wrought in the lives of the people who heard him. No less fervent was he in the extinction of heresy, notably that of the Cathares and the Patarines, which infested the centre and north of Italy, and probably also that of the Albignenses in the south of France, though we have no authorized documents to that effect. Among the most celebrated and the most notable in the conversion of heretics, the three most noted recorded by his biographers are the following:—The first is that of a horse, which, kept fasting for three days, refused the oats placed before him, till he had knelt down and adored the Blessed Sacrament, which St. Anthony held in his hands. Legendary narratives of the fourteenth century say this miracle took place at Toulouse, at Wadding, at Bruges; the real place, however, was Rimini. The second most important miracle is that of the poisoned food offered him by some Italian heretics, which he rendered innocuous by the simple formula of the liberty given to the name of Christ. The third is that of the famous sermon to the fishes on the bank of the river Brenta in the neighbourhood of Padua; not at Padua, as is generally supposed. The zeal with which St. Anthony fought against heresy, and the great and numerous conversions he made rendered him worthy of the glorious title of Most Hereticorum (Hammer of the Heretics). Though his preaching was always seasoned with the salt of discretion, nevertheless he spoke openly to all, to the rich as to the poor, to the people as well as those in authority. In a synod at Bourges in the presence of many prelates, he reproved the Archbishop, Simon de Montfort, so severely, that he induced him to sincere amendment.

After having been Guardian at Le-Puy (1224), we read Anthony in the year 1226, Custos Provincial in the province of Limousin. The most authentic miracles of that period are the following: Preaching one night on Holy Thursday in the Church of St. Pierre du Querioz at Limoges, he remembered he had to sing a Lesson of the Divine Office. Interrupting suddenly his discourse, he appeared at the same moment among the friars in choir to sing his Lesson, after which he continued his sermon. Another day preaching in the square des créneaux at Limoges, he was caught in a shower of rain and his audience from the rain. At St. Junien during the sermon, he predicted that by an artifice of the devil the pulpit would break down, but that all should remain safe and sound. And so it occurred; for while he was preaching, the pulpit was overturned, but no one hurt; not even the saint himself. In a monastery of Benedictines, where he had fallen ill, he delivered by means of his tunic one of the monks from great temptations. Likewise, by breathing on the face of a novice (whom he had himself received into the order), he confirmed him in his vocation. At Avallon, where he had been a prior, he preserved from the rain the maid-servant of a benefactress who was bringing some vegetables to the brethren for their meagre repast. This is all that is historically certain of the sojourn of St. Anthony in Limousin.

Regarding the celebrated apparition of the Infant Jesus at Pontmain, our French writers maintain it took place in the province of Limousin at the Castle of Chateauneuf-la-Forêt, between Limoges and Eymoutiers, whereas the Italian hagiographers fix the place at Camposanpiero, near Padua. The existing documents, however, do not decide the question. We have more certainty regarding the apparition of St. Francis to St. Anthony at the Provincial Chapter of Arles, whilst the latter was preaching about the mysteries of the Cross. After the death of St. Francis, 3 October, 1226, Anthony returned to Italy. His way led him through La Provence on which occasion he wrought the following miracle: Fatigued on the journey, he stopped at the house of a poor woman, who placed bread and wine before them. She had forgotten, however, to shut off the tap of the wine-barrel, and to add to this misfortune, the Saint's companion broke his glass. Anthony began to pray, and suddenly the glass was filled with wine and the barrel, and the woman was saved. Shortly after his return to Italy, Anthony was elected Minister Provincial of Emilia. But in order to devote more time to preaching, he resigned this office at the General Chapter of Assisi, 30 May, 1230, and retired to the Convent of Padua, which he had himself founded. The last Lent he preached was that of 1231; the crowd of people which came from all parts to hear him, frequently numbered 30,000 and more. His last sermons were principally directed against hatred and enmity, and his efforts were crowned with wonderful success. Permanent reconciliations were effected, peace and concord re-establishcd, and debts resuspended. Restitutions were made, and enormous scandals repaired; in fact, the priests of Padua were no longer sufficient for the number of penitents, and many of these declared they had been warned by celestial visions, and sent to St. Anthony, to be guided by his counsel. Others after his death said that he appeared to them in their dreams, admonishing them to go to confession.

At Padua also took place the famous miracle of the amputated foot, which Franciscan writers attribute to St. Anthony. A young man, Leonardo by name, in a fit of anger kicked his own mother. Re-reflecting, he confessed his fault to St. Anthony, who is said to him: "The foot of him who kicks his mother deserves to be cut off." Leonardo ran home and cut off his foot. Learning of this, St. Anthony took the amputated member of the unfortunate youth and miraculously rejoined it. Through the exertions of St. Anthony, the Municipality of Padua, 15 March, 1231, passed a law in favour of debtors who could not pay their debts. A copy of this law is still preserved in the museum of Padua. From this, as well as the following occurrence, the civil and religious importance of the Saint's influence in the thirteenth century is easily understood. In 1230, while war was being waged in Lombardy, St. Anthony accompanied with some friends to Verona to solicit from the ferocious Ezzelino the liberty of the Guelph prisoners. An apocryphal legend relates that the tyrant humbled himself before the Saint and granted his request. This is not the case, but what does it matter, even if he failed in his attempts; he nevertheless jeopardized his own life for the sake of those oppressed by tyranny, and thereby showed his love and sympathy for the people. Invited to preach at the funeral of a usurer, he took for his text the words of the Gospel: "Where thy treasure is, there also is thy heart." In the course of the sermon, he died. "The man is dead and buried in hell; but go to his treasurer and there you will find his heart." The relatives and friends of the deceased, led by curiosity, followed this injunction, and found the heart, still warm, among the coins. Thus the triumph of St. Anthony's missionary career manifests itself not only in his miracles and his numberless titles, but also in the popularity and subject matter of his sermons, since he had to fight against the three most obdurate vices of luxury, avarice, and tyranny.

At the end of Lent, 1231, Anthony retired to Camposanpiero, in the neighbourhood of Padua, where, after a short time he was taken with a severe illness. Transferred to Vercelli, and strengthened by the apparition of Our Lord, he died at the age of thirty-six years, on 13 June, 1233. He had lived fifteen years with his parents, ten years as a Canon Regular of St. Augustine, and eleven years in the Order of Friars Minor.

Immediately after his death he appeared at Verceil to the Abbot, Thomas Gallo, and his death was also announced to the citizens of Padua by a troop of children, crying: "The holy Father is dead; St. Anthony, St. Anthony, be praised!" Gregory IX, first by a decree, and afterwards by the Bull of his sanctity by the numerous miracles he had wrought, inscribed him within a year of his death (Pentecost, 30 May, 1232), in the calendar of saints of the Cathedral of Spoleto. In the Bull of canonization he declared he had personally known the saint, and we know that the same pontiff, having heard one of his sermons at Rome, and astonished at his profound knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, called him: "Ark of the Covenant!". That this title is well-founded is also shown by his several works: "Expositio in Psalmos", written at Montpellier, 1224; the "Sermone de tempore", and the "Sermone de Sancto" written at Padua, 1232—33. The name of Anthony became celebrated throughout the world, and with it the name of Padua. The inhabitants of that city erected to his memory a magnificent temple, whither his precious relics were transferred in 1263, in presence of St. Bonaventure, Minister General at the time. When the vessel, which for thirty years his sacred body had reposed was opened, the flesh was found reduced to dust, but the tongue uninjured, fresh, and of a lively red colour. St. Bonaventure, beholding this wonder, took the tongue affectionately in his hands and kissed it, exclaiming, "O blessed tongue that always praised the Lord, and made others bless Him, now it is evident what great merit thou hast before God." The fame of St. Anthony's miracles has never diminished, and even at the present day he is acknowledged as the greatest thaumaturgist of the times. He is especially invoked for the recovery of things lost, and is also expressed in the celebrated responsory of Friar Julian of Spires:

Indeed his very popularity has to a certain extent obscured his personality. If we may believe the coarser and recent criticism of some of the modern biographers, in order to meet the ever-increasing demand for the marvellous displayed by his devout clients, and comparatively oblivious of the heroic features of his life, have devoted themselves to the task of handing down to posterity the posthumous miracles wrought by his intercession. We need not be surprised, therefore, to find accounts of his miracles that may seem to the modern mind trivial or incredible occupying so large a space in the earlier biographies of St. Anthony. It may be true that some of the miracles attributed to St. Anthony are legendary, but others come to us on such high authority that it is not possibly to eliminate them or exclude them away a priori without doing violence to the facts of history.

Anthony of Sienna, a Dominican theologian, so called because of his great veneration for St. Catherine of Sienna, b. near Braga in Portugal, hence sometimes known as "Santos". He was born at 2 January, 1585. He studied at Lisbon, Coimbra, and Louvain, taught philosophy for several years in the latter place, where he was made Doctor of Theology in 1571, and put in charge of the Dominican college there in 1574. He supported the Portuguese pretender Antonio de Beja, and was banished from the Spanish dominions, after which he travelled for scientific purposes in Italy, England, and France. He was one of the collaborators in the Roman edition of St. Thomas's works (1570—71) prepared by order of St. Pius V. He published (Antwerp, 1569) an edition of the "Summa Theologicae" with exact indication of all authors, sacred and profane, quoted by the Saint, and (ib., 1571) a similar edition of the "Questiones Disputatae" and other "opuscula" of St. Thomas. The commentary on Genesis, edited by him two years later at Antwerp as a work of St. Thomas, is not authentic. His edition of the Saint's commentaries on the Psalms, published at Antwerp in 1584, was published in 1612 by Conrad Merelles, O.P., in the Antwerp edition of the works of St. Thomas. He also brought out (Paris, 1585) a "Chronicon" and "Bibliotheca Ordinis Predicatarum".

Anthony of the Mother of God (A. de Olivera), a Spanish Carmelite, b. at Leon in Old-Castile; d. 1641. He taught Aristotle's dialectics and natural philosophy at the University of Alcala de Henares (Complutum). With the collaboration of his colleagues, he undertook an encyclopedia intended for students in arts and philosophy. This work, originally styled "Colegium Complutense philosophicum" (Alcala, 1624; other editions, 1629; Lyons, 1637, 1651, 1668), was highly esteemed by Thomists. It was at first a treatise on logic; but in the course of time, methodical plan of classification, which was added, and the work served as an introduction to the great "Course of Theology" of the Salmanticenses. The first three volumes of this "Course" are also attributed to Anthony.

Anthropomorphism. See men.

Anthropomorphism, Anthropomorphites. (ανθρωπομορφος, man, and μορφη, form), a term used in its widest sense to signify the tendency of man to conceive the activities of the external world as the counterpart of his own. A philosophic system which borrows its strength from this tendency is Anthropomorphism. The word, however, has been more frequently employed to designate the play of that impulse in religious thought. In this sense, Anthro-pomorphism is the ascription to the Supreme Being of the form, organs, operations, and general characteristics of human nature that has not yet developed into the more magnified man, subject to human voices and passions. The Bible, especially the Old Testament, abounds in anthropomorphic expressions. Almost all the activities of organic life are ascribed to the Almighty. He speaks, breathes, sees, hears; He walks in the garden; He sits in the heavens, and the earth is His footstool. It must, however, be noticed that in the Bible locations of this kind ascribe human characteristics to God only in a vague, indefinite way.

He is never positively declared to have a body or a nature the same as man's; and human defects and dises are never even figuratively attributed to him. This conception of God as the nearest possible representation of the man who has known and been human is found in the fact that truth can be conveyed to men only through the medium of human ideas and thoughts, and is to be expressed only in language suited to their comprehension. The limitations of our conceptual capacity oblige us to represent God to ourselves in ideas that have been originally drawn from our knowledge of self and the objective world.

The Scriptures themselves amply warn us against the mistake of interpreting their figurative language in too literal a sense. They teach that God is spiritual, omniscient, invincible, omnipresent, ineffable. Insist-ent upon this metaphorical and not literal meaning of theology led to the error of the Anthropomorphists.

Throughout the writings of the Fathers the spirituality of the Divine Nature, as well as the inadequacy of human thought to comprehend the greatness, goodness, and infinite perfection of God, is continually emphasized. At the same time, Catholic philosophy acknowledges the approach of the intellectual and emotional life of men to the great mysteries of God, ultimately leading the mind to a recognition of the human form. The error was so gross, and, to use
St. Jerome's expression (Epist. vi, Ad Pammachium), so absolutely senseless, that it showed no vitality.
Towards the end of the century it appeared among some bodies of African Christians. The Fathers who wrote against it did so almost implicitly, in the time of Cyril of Alexandria, and later among the anthropomorphists among the Egyptian monks. He composed a short refutation of their error, which he attributed to extreme ignorance. (Adv. Anthr. in P. G., LXXVI.) Concerning the charges of anthropomorphism preferred against Melito, Tertullian, Origen, and Lactantius, see the respective articles. The error was revived in northern Italy during the tenth century, but was effectually suppressed by the bishops, notably by the learned Ratberius, Bishop of Verona.

Anthrist (ἀνθριστός). In composition ἀντι has various meanings: ἀντιτρέπων denotes a king who fills an interregnum; ἀντιπράττων, a propretor; ἀντιστάτων, a proconsul; in Homer ἀντλεως denotes one resembling a god in power and beauty, while in other works it stands for a hostile god. Following mere analogy, one might interpret ἀντιχιστός as denoting one resembling Christ in appearance and power; but it is safer to define the word
according to its biblical and ecclesiastical usage.

I. BIBLICAL MEANING OF THE WORD.—The word Antichrist occurs only in the Johannine Epistles; but there are several references in the Apocalypse in the Pauline Epistles, and less explicit ones in the Gospels and the Book of Daniel.

A. IN THE JOHANNINE EPISTLES.—St. John supposes in his Epistles that the early Christians are acquainted with the teaching concerning the coming of Antichrist which he has heard and is about to proclaim (I John, ii, 18): “This is Antichrist, of whom you have heard that he cometh” (I John, iv, 3). Though the Apocalypse speaks of several Antichrists, he distinguishes between the many and the one principal agent: “Antichrist cometh, even now there are become many Antichrists” (I John, ii, 18). Again, the writer outlines the character and work of Antichrist:
“They went out from us, but they were not of us”
(I John, ii, 19); “Who is a liar, but he who denieth that Jesus is the Christ? This is Antichrist, who denieth the Father and the Son” (I John, ii, 22); “And every spirit, that denieth Jesus of Galilee, is an Antichrist” (I John, iv, 3); “For many seducers are gone out into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh: this is a seducer and an Antichrist” (II John, 7). As to the time, the Apocalypse places the coming of Anti-christ at “the last hour” (I John, ii, 18); again, he maintains that “he is now already in the world”
(I John, iv, 3).

B. IN THE APOCALYPSE.—Nearly all commentators find Antichrist mentioned in the Apocalypse, but they do not agree as to the particular chapter of the Book in which the mention occurs. Some point to the “beast” of xi, 7, others to the “red dragon” of xii, others again to the beast “having seven heads and ten horns” of xiii, sqq., while many scholars identify Antichrist with the beast which had “two horns, like a lamb” and spoke “as a dragon” (xiii, 11, sqq.), or with the scarlet-coloured beast “having seven heads and ten horns” (xiv), or, finally, with Satan “loosed out of his prison,” and seducing the nations (xx, 7, sqq.). A detailed discussion of the reasons and against each of these opinions would be out of place here.

C. IN THE PAULINE EPISTLES.—St. John supposes that the doctrine concerning the coming of Antichrist is already known to his readers and believe that it had become known in the Church through the writings of St. Paul. St. John urged against the heretics of his time that those who denied the mystery of the Incarnation were faint images of the future great Antichrist. The latter is described more fully in II Thess., ii, 3, sqq., II Cor., xii, 9. In the Church of Thessalonians, disturbances had occurred on account of the belief that the second coming of Jesus Christ was imminent. This impression was owing partly to a misunderstanding of I Thess., iv, 15, sqq., partly to the machinations of deceivers. It was with a view of remedying these disorders that St. Paul wrote his Second Epistle to the Thessalonians:

D. IN THE EVANGELISTS AND DANIEL.—After studying the mysteries of Antichrist in St. Paul’s Epistle to the Thessalonians, one easily recognizes the “man of sin” in Dan., vii, 8, 11, 20, 21, where the Prophet describes the “little horn.” A type of Antichrist is found in Dan., vii, 8 sqq., 23, sqq., xi, 21–45, in the person of Antiochus Euphapes. Many commentators have found more or less clear allusions to Antichrist in the coming of false Christs and false prophets (Matt., xxiv, 24; Mark, xiii, 6, 22; Luke, xxi, 8), in the “abomination of desolation,” and in the one that “shall come in his own name” (John, v, 43).

II. ANTICHRIST IN ECCLESIASTICAL LANGUAGE.— Bousset believes that there was among the Jews a densely developed legend of Antichrist, which was actcepted and amplified by Christians; and that this legend diverges from and contradicts in important points the conceptions found in the Apocalypse.
We do not believe that Bousset has fully proved his point; his view as to the Christian development of the concept of Antichrist does not exceed the merits of an ingenious theory. We need not here enter upon an investigation of Gunkel’s work, in which he traces back the idea of Antichrist to the primeval dragon of the deep; this view deserves no more attention than the rest of the author's mythological fancies. What then is the true ecclesiastical concept of Antichrist? Suppose we assume that it is an individual person, a signal enemy of Christ. This excludes the contention of those who explain Antichrist either as the whole collection of those who oppose Jesus Christ, or as the Papacy. The Wels- denians and Albigensian heretics, as well as Wyclif and Hus, called the Pope by the title of Antichrist, but it is clear that they used the term only metaphorically. It was only after the time of the Reformation that the name was applied to the Pope in its proper sense. It then passed practically into the creed of the Lutherans, and has been seriously defended by them as late as 1861 in the "Zeitschrift für lutherische Theo- logie," where the False Prophet of Antichrist is said to have taken place between 19 February and 10 November, A. D. 607, when Pope Boniface III obtained from the Greek emperor the title "Head of All the Churches" for the Roman Church. An appeal was made to Apoc., xiii, 18, in confirmation of this date, and it was calculated from Apoc., xi, 3, that the end of the world might be expected A. D. 1866. Cardinal Bellarmine refuted this error both from an exegetical and historical point of view in "De Rom. Pont.," III. The individual person of Antichrist will not be a demon, as some of the an- cient writers believed; nor will he be the person of the despot, as the Eastern Church held. He will be a human person, perhaps of Jewish extraction, if the explanation of Gen., xlix, 17, together with that of Dan's omission in the catalogue of the tribes, as found in the Apocalypse, be correct. It must be kept in mind that extra-Scriptural tradition furnishes us no revealed supplement to the Biblical data concerning Antichrist. While these latter are sufficient to make the believer recognize the "man of sin" at the time of his coming, the lack of any additional reliable revelation should put us on our guard against the day-dreams of the Irvingites, the Mormons, and other recent proclaimers of new revelations.

It may not be out of place to draw the reader's attention to two dissertations by the late Cardinal Newman on the subject of Antichrist. The one is entitled "The Patristic Idea of Antichrist"; it considers successively his time, religion, city, and person. The other is the "Forerunner and Third Son of the "Tractates for the Times", and has been repub- lished in the volume entitled "Discussions and Arguments on Various Subjects" (London, New York, and Bombay, 1889). The other dissertation is contained among the Cardinal's "Essays Critical and Histori- cal" (Vol. II; London, New York, and Bombay, 1887), and bears the title "The Protestant Idea of Antichrist."

In order to understand the significance of the Cardinal's essays on the question of the Antichrist, it must be kept in mind that a variety of opinions are to be found in the Church. True, there is a tradition that Antichrist is an evil principle, not embodied either in a person or a polity; this opinion is in opposition to both St. Paul and St. John. Both Apostles describe the adversary as being distinctly concrete in form. (2) A second view accepts the Antichrist in person as a pretended person, which maintains that he is a person of the Nestorians, Diodore, Julian, Caligula, Titus, Simon Magus, Simon the son of Gia, the High Priest Ananias, Vitellius, the Jews, the Pharisœans, and the Jewish zealots have been variously identified with the Antichrist. But there is little traditional authority for this view, and it does not appear to have been fully the prophetic predictions, and, in the case of some of its adherents, it is based on the supposition that the inspired writers could not transcend the limits of their experiences. (3) A third opinion con- ceded that the Antichrist must indeed appear in a concrete form, but it identified him with the system of the Papacy. Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, Melancthon, Bucer, Beza, Calixtus, Bengel, Michaelis, and almost all the Protestant writers of the Continent are cited as upholding this view; the same may be said of the English theologians Cranmer, Ridley, Rogers, Hutchinson, Tyndale, Sandys, Philpot, Jewell, Rogers, Fulke, Bradford, King James, and Andrews. Bramhall introduced qualifications into the theory, and after this its ascendency began to wane among English writers. Nor must it be supposed that the Papal-Antichrist theory was upheld by all Protestants in the same form. (4) The Papal-Antichrist theory is identified with Antichrist and the Papacy by Chyster, Aretius, Foxe, Namier, Mede, Jurieu, Newton, Cunningham, Faber, Woodward, and Habershon; the first Apocalyptic Beast holds this position in the opinion of Marlorat, King James, Daubus, L. Galloway; both Beasts are thus identified by Brightman, Farcus, Vitringa, Gill, Bachmaur, Fraser, Croly, Fysh, and Elliott.

After this general survey of the Protestant views concerning the Antichrist, we shall be able to appreciate some of Cardinal Newman's critical remarks on the question. — (1) If any part of the Church be accused of being Antichrist, all of Antichrist and the Protestant branch inclusive. (2) The Papal- Antichrist theory was gradually developed by three historical bodies: the Albigensians, the Waldenses, and the Fraticelli, between the eleventh and the sixteenth centuries: are these the expositors from whom the Church of Christ is to receive the true interpretation of the prophecies? (3) The defenders of the Papal-Antichrist theory have made several signal blunders in their arguments; they cite St. Bernard as identifying the Beast of the Apocalypse with the Pope, though St. Bernard speaks in the passage of the Antipope; they appeal to the Abbé Joschim as believing that Antichrist will be elevated to the Apostolic See, while the Abbé really believes that Antichrist will overthrow the Pope and usurp his See; finally, they appeal to Pope Gregory the Great as asserting that whoever claims to be Universal Bishop is Antichrist, whereas the great Doctor really speaks of Antichrist as a figure of the anti-Christ, as a figure of the anti-Christ, as a figure of the anti-Christ, as a figure of the anti-Christ, as a figure of the anti-evident evil. (4) Protestants were driven to the Papal-Antichrist theory by the necessity of oppos- ing a popular answer to the popular and cogent arguments advanced by the Church of Rome for her own authority. Farel and Hurd, the advocates of the Papal-Antichrist theory, cannot be matched against the saints of the Church of Rome. (6) If the Pope be Antichrist, those who receive and follow him cannot be men like St. Charles Borromeo, or Fénelon, or St. Bernard, or St. Francis of Sales. (7) If the Church must suffer like Christ, and if Christ was called "a man of sorrows," the true Church must expect a similar reproach; thus, the Papal- Antichrist theory becomes an argument in favor of the Roman Church. (8) The gibe, "If the Pope is not Antichrist, he has bad luck to be so like him," is really another argument in favor of the claims of the Pope; since Antichrist is a figure of Christ, and the Pope is an image of Christ, Antichrist must have some similarity to the Pope, if the latter be the true Vicar of Christ.
or solutum for such of the faithful as were not prepared to go to Communion or were unable to get to the Holy Sacrifice. If they could not partake of the body of Our Lord they had the consolation of partaking of the bread which had been blessed and consecrated for them, by which they were not considered as having taken it. In the Eastern Church mention of the antidoron began to appear about the ninth and tenth centuries. Germans of Constantinople is the earliest Eastern author to mention it in his treatise, 'The Explanation of the Liturgy', about the ninth century. Subsequently to him many writers of the Eastern Church (Vol. I.), (PassionScope) have written on the custom of giving the antidoron. The usage to-day in the Orthodox Greek Church, following the Nomocanon, is to employ the fragments or unused pieces of the various prosphora, except that from which the agnese is taken for the purpose of the antidoron. The canonical regulations of the Russian Orthodox and Greek (Hellenic) Orthodox Churches require that the antidoron should be consumed before leaving the church, and that it should not be distributed to unbelievers or to persons undergoing penance before absolution. While the rite still continues in the East it was finally given up by the Western Church, and now only survives in the Roman Rite in the pain bénit given in the French churches and cathedrals at High Mass, in certain churches of Lower Canada, and occasionally in Italy, on certain feasts. A similar custom also obtains among the Syrian Christians (Christians of H. Michael's) and the Maronites, where it is the dressers of the teaching. The sect attained its greatest development in Arabia towards the end of the fourth century, and the name Antidicamarianites was specifically applied to it by St. Ephraim who wrote against them in an interesting letter giving the history of the doctrine and proofs of its falsity (St. Ephraim, Contra Haeres., Ixxxviii, 1033 sqq.).

Antigonish (Miems, nalaugikameek, "where the branches are torn off"), is the shiretown of the county of the same name in Nova Scotia. On the 23d of August, 1886, it was made the see of one of the dioceses constituting the ecclesiastical province of Halifax. The first see was Arichat. The diocese takes in the three easternmost counties of Nova Scotia proper, with the whole island of Cape Breton. Up to 1817, Nova Scotia formed a part of the Diocese of Quebec; in that year it was erected into a vicariate, and the Right Rev. Edmund Burke appointed the first bishop. The see was successively held by the Right Rev. William Fraser. On the 21st of September, 1844, the vicariate was divided, and two dioceses were formed, the see being Halifax and Arichat. Bishop Fraser was appointed to the latter see. An alumnus of the Scottish College at Valladolid, he was a strong man, both in body and mind, and well fitted to play the part of pioneer missionary bishop. He died 4 October, 1851, and was succeeded, 27 February, 1852, by the Right Rev. Colin Francis MacKinnon, D.D., a graduate of Propaganda. He was a man of apostolic zeal, and of singularly amiable character. Failing health led him to resign, 1 January, 1872, and the see was successively held by John Cameron, D.D., also a graduate of Propaganda, and consecrated at Rome, 22 May, 1870, became administrator of the diocese. On his resigning this charge, Bishop MacKinnon was made titular Archbishop of Amida. He died two years later, 26 September, 1879.

Within the Diocese of Antigonish is the historic town of Louisbourg. As far back as 1604 French priests were in Nova Scotia, then known as Acadie, or Acadia. Between that date and the taking of Louisbourg by the English in 1758, the indefatigable missionaries of France busied themselves with the evangelization of the native Miems. The fact that... the whole tribe still hold fast the faith preached to them, despite the efforts made from time to time to rob them of it and the paucity of priestly labours in the fifty years that followed the fall of Louisbourg, attests the thoroughness with which the early holy life. The first session of the court, appointed in 1905 to inquire into his title to saintship, was held in June, 1906.

St. Francis Xavier’s College, established at Antigonish in 1855, and endowed with university powers in 1866, is the chief seat of learning. Mt. St. Bernard, an academy for young ladies, conducted by the Sisters of Notre Dame, is affiliated to St. Francis Xavier’s. The Sisters of Notre Dame have eight other convents within the diocese; the Sisters of Charity, six; the Daughters of Jesus, lately come from France, four; the Sisters of St. Martha, one. The Trappists, at Petit Clairvaux, Tracadie, are the only religious order of men. In 1871, the Catholic population was 62,853; in 1891, it was 73,500, of whom about 42,000 were Highland Scotch, 19,000 French, 11,000 Irish, and 1,500 Miames. The present population is in the neighbourhood of 80,000. There are 101 priests, including 11 Trappists, 67 churches with resident pastors, and 34 missions with churches.

Antimensium, also Antiminsion (Gr. ἀντίμισθρος, from ἀντίτιθεν, instead of, and μίσθος, table, altar), a consecrated corporal of a kind used only in the Greek Rite. It is called in Russian and Slavonic antimins, and answers substantially to the portable altar of the Roman Rite. It consists of a strip of fine linen or silk, usually ten inches wide and about thirteen to fourteen inches long, ornamented with the instruments of the Passion, or with a representation of Our Lord in the Sepulchre; it also contains relics of the saints which are sewn into it, and certified by the bishop. It is required to be placed on the altar in Greek churches just as an altar-stone is required in the Latin churches, and no Mass may be said upon an altar of that rite which has no antiminsium. It is placed at the Offertory by the Latin corporal. Outside of the Mass it rests on the altar, folded in four parts, and enclosed in another piece of linen known as the heileton. Originally it was intended for missionaries and priests travelling in places where there was no consecrated altar, or where there was no bishop available to consecrate an altar. The bishop consecrated the antiminsium almost as he would an altar, and the priest carried it with him on his journey, and spread it over any temporary altar to celebrate Mass. Originally, therefore, it stood literally for its name; it was used instead of the Holy Table for the Sacrifice of the Mass by others.

The word antimensium is met with for the first time about the end of the eighth and the beginning of the ninth centuries. The rapid adoption of the object was owing largely to the spread of Iconoclasm and other heresies. In the seventh canon of the Seventh General Council (787) it was ordered that "according to ancient custom which we should follow the Holy Sacrifice should only be offered on an altar consecrated by placing the relics of the saints or of martyrs therein" (Mansi, XIII, 428).

As a result of this decree the use of the antimensium became quite general, because, owing to various congregations and settlements (Ross, XIII, 428). The altar in numberless churches had ever been consecrated by a bishop, or whether that rite had ever been canonically performed; on the other hand, all were anxious to comply with the canon. Recollet and Jesuit Fathers did their work. Till the closing years of the eighteenth century, some hundreds of the aborigines, together with a remnant of the first French settlers, known as Acadians, and a few Irish families, made up the Catholic population of what is now the Diocese of Antigonish. In 1791, the first party of Catholic immigrants from the Scottish Highlands reached Pictou in two ships. Driven from their native braves and glens by the rapacity of the landlords, who turned their ancestral holdings into sheepwalks, they found new homes and free holdings in the wild woods of Nova Scotia. From this time forward the tide of Scottish immigration gathered strength, until it reached its highest point in 1817. In July, 1802, about 1,500 Highland Scottish Catholics were settled along the shores of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. For the greater part of the time they were without a priest, save for the occasional visits of the Rev. Angus Bernard MacEachern afterwards Bishop of Charlottetown, P. E. I., who braved the perils of the sea in an open boat to bring them the consolations of religion. In the same year two priests came out from Scotland, and these in turn were followed by others. They shared with their people the hardships incidental to pioneer life in "the forest primeval." Among the priests who laboured during the first two decades of the nineteenth century in the territory now comprised in the Diocese of Antigonish were Abbé Lejartel, among the Acadians; the Reverend Alexander MacDonnell, William Chisholm, and Colin Grant, in the Scottish settlements on the mainland; the Reverend James Grant, an Irish priest, in Antigonish; the Reverend Alexander MacDonnell in the Scottish settlements in Cape Breton, and Father Vincent, founder of the Trappist Monastery at Tracadie, among the Miames and Acadian. The last-named, known in the Gaelic-speaking communities as A Sagart Bar, or White Priest, from the flowing white robe of his Order, which he wore also on his missionary journeys, was a man of singularly of the antimensium, such as missionaries and travel- ing priests were using, the Holy Sacrifice could be offered on any altar, because the antimensium, at least, had been properly consecrated and contained the required relics. Although it was primarily intended for altars which had not been consecrated by a bishop, it gradually became used for all altars in the Greek Church. It was much used in military camps, on shipboard, and among the hermits and cenobites of the desert, where a church or a chapel was unknown. After the great schism which divided the Eastern Church from the Holy See, the antimensium was looked on as a peculiarly Greek religious article. The united Greek Church has also retained it, although, by special regulations of the Holy See, in its absence an altar-stone may be used by them. A Greek Catholic priest may say Mass in a Greek church upon an altar-stone, yet a Latin priest may not say Mass upon an antimensium in a Latin church, although either may use the antimensium in a Greek church (Benedict XIV, Imposita nobis).

In the Council of Moscow (1675) the Russian Church decreed that antimensia should be used upon every altar, whether it had been consecrated by a bishop or not. The only apparent exception allowed in the Church is that the antimensia without relics may be used upon the altar of a cathedral church. The form of consecration of the antimensia is almost the same as that followed by a bishop in consecrating an altar. Indeed, they are usually consecrated at the same time as the altar, and are considered to share in the latter's consecration; by way of exception, especially in the Russian Church, they may be consecrated at another time. As already said, the customary material was originally pure linen; yet, since 1862, by a decree of the Holy Synod in Russia, they may be made either of linen or silk. They have varied slightly in size and form, but the kind now used is about the size of those made in the twelfth century. They are often beautifully embroidered, the decorations usually representing Our Lord in the Sepulchre, sometimes with a cross and sometimes with a chalice above Him; they also have the letters IC. XC. NKA, i. e. “Jesus Christ conquers,” or other traditional devices worked upon them. Never has any material been employed in an antimensium, upon an altar the old one must not be removed, but must be kept next to the altar under the altar-cloth. Usually the date of consecration is worked upon them. By a decree of the Holy Synod in 1842, each Russian church must keep an exact register of the antimensia in it.

Antinoe (or Antinopolis), a titular see of the Thebaid, now Esneh or Eesneh, a city in Egypt, built by the Emperor Hadrian A. D. 132, in memory of his favourite, Antinous. Situated in the very centre of Egypt, the city attracted more than ordinary attention, not only by its splendour, but by its opulence, being constructed, as it was, on the plan of Roman and Greek cities, without any traces of Egyptian architecture. The topography of its ruins is yearly growing less distinct, since an European industry set up in the neighbourhood draws on its antique materials as it might on some deserted marble quarry. After the fashion of Greek and Roman cities, it was built of stone along the sides of which ran porticoes and colonnades, and several of the streets were arched over.

Antinoe played but a small part in the history of Christianity. It became the seat of a bishopric subject to Thebes, and a good many monasteries were founded in the neighbourhood. Thanks to the Egyptian climate, the cemeteries opened in recent years have supplied the science of Christian antiquity with many noteworthy objects. Roman and Byzantine burial-places have been found in a wonderful state of preservation. The bodies, before being interred, underwent a treatment that in use with the ancient Egyptians, and were carefully dressed; clothes, stuffing, and a mask being used instead of mumification, which was no longer practised. The bodies, however, had the appearance of mummies. To this manner of preparing their dead we owe the preservation of various per- sonal effects as well as the mask, of a young woman named Euphemiian (?). contained an embroidery case in the folds of her dress, and shoes of red leather enriched with gold tracery. The excavations carried on by M. A. Gayet have brought to light objects which are now in the Musée Guimet at Paris, such as prayer-chaplets, baskets, phials, boxes of wood and ivory, etc. Papyri have also been found at Antinoe, one of the most interesting being the will of Aurelius Celsus.

Several ruins of some importance are to be seen in the neighbourhood of Antinoe. One of the most remarkable is that of Oma-Abou-Hennys, where there is an underground church, ornamented with paintings of real interest, less on account of the choice of subjects than for the skill and taste which they show in a Coptic artist of the seventh or eighth century. They represent scenes from the Gospel, with a few drawn from the apocryphal books, and are interspersed with a great number of inscriptions, most of which are mutilated or indecipherable.

Antinomies. See Kant, Philosophy of.

Antinomianism (ar’i, against, and réiws, law), the heretical doctrine that Christians are exempt from the obligations of the moral law. The term first came into use at the Protestant Reformation, when M. M. Luther, in his treatises on the teaching of Johannes Agricola and his sectaries, who, pushing a mistaken and perverted interpretation of the Reformer's doctrine of justification by faith alone to a far-reaching but logical conclusion, asserted that, as good works do not promote salvation, so neither do evil works hinder it; and that Christians are necessarily sanctified by their very vocation and profession, so, as justified Christians, they are incapable of losing their spiritual holiness, justification, and final salvation by any act of disobedience to, or even by any direct violation of the law of God. This theory—for it was not, and is not, necessarily, anything more than a purely verbal doctrine, and many professors of Antinomianism, as a matter of fact, led, and led, lives quite as moral as those of their opponents—was not only a more or less natural outgrowth from the distinctly Protestant principle of justification by faith, but probably also the result of a turning of the mind with regard to the relation between the Jewish and Christian dispensations and the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. Doubtless a confused understanding of the Mosaic ceremonial precepts and the fundamental moral law embodied in the Mosaic code was to no small extent operative in allowing the confusion of two distinct principles to go beyond all reasonable bounds, and to take the form of a theoretical doctrine of unlimited licentiousness.

can be traced in the teaching of the earlier heresies. One of the Gnostic sects—possibly, for example, Marcion and his followers, in their antithesis of the Old and New Testament, or the Carapocritans, in their doctrine of the indistinguish of good works and their contempt for all human laws—held Antinomianism or quasi-Antinomian views. In any case, it is generally understood that Antinomianism was promulgated by some of the sects of the Gnostic. The New Testament passages of the New Testament writings are quoted in support of the contention that even as early as Apostolic times it was found necessary to single out and combat this heresy in its theoretical or dogmatic, as well as in its grosser and practical, form. The insistence on St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans and to the Ephesians (Rom., iii, 8, 31, vi, 1; Eph., v. 6), as well as those of St. Peter in the Second Epistle (II Pet., ii, 18, 19), seem to lend direct evidence in favour of this view. Forced into a somewhat doubtful prominence by the "slanderers" against whom the Apostle found it necessary to warn the faithful, persisting spasmodically in several of the Gnostic bodies, and possibly also colouring some of the tenets of the Albigensians, Antinomianism reappeared definitely, as a variant of the Protestant doctrine of faith, early in the history of the German Reformation. At this point it is of interest to note that the man who was the most prominent leader of the reforming movement in Germany and his disciple and fellow townsmen, Johannes Agricola, Schütter, or Schneider, sometimes known as the Magister Isleibus, was born at Eisleben in 1492, nine years after the birth of Luther. He studied, and afterwards taught, at Wittenberg, whence, in 1525, he went to Frankfort with the intention of teaching and establishing the Protestant religion there. But shortly afterwards he returned to his native town, where he remained until 1536, teaching in the school of St. Andrew, and drawing considerable attention to himself as a preacher of the new religion by the courses of sermons that he delivered in the Nicolai Church. In 1536 he was recalled to Wittenberg and given a chair in the University. Then the Antinomian controversy, which had really begun some ten years previously, broke out afresh, with renewed vigour and bitterness. Agricola, who was undoubtedly a able and intelligent disciple of his master upon the subject of grace and justification, and who wished to separate the new Protestant view more clearly and distinctly from the old Catholic doctrine of faith and good works, taught that only the regenerate were under the obligation of the law, and that all others were absolved and altogether free from any such obligation. Though it is highly probable that he made Agricola responsible for opinions which the latter never really held, Luther attacked him vigorously in six dissertations, showing that "the law gives man the consciousness of sin, and that the fear of the law is both wholesome and necessary for the preservation of morality and of divine, as well as human, institutions"; and on several occasions Agricola found himself obliged to retract or to modify his Antinomian teaching. In 1540 Agricola, forced to this step by Luther, who had secured to this end the assistance of the Elector of Saxony and of the "Formula Concordiae". St. Alphonsus Ligouri states that after Luther's death Agricola went to Berlin, commenced teaching his blasphemies again, and died there, at the age of seventy-four, without any sign of repentance; also, that Florinundus calls the Antinomians "Atheists who believe in neither God nor the devil." So much for the origin and growth of the Antinomian heresy in the Lutheran body. Among the high Calvinists also the doctrine was to be found in the teaching that the elect do not sin by the commission of actions that in themselves are contrary to the precepts of the moral law, while the Anabaptists of Münster had no scruple in putting these theories into practical practice.

From Germany Antinomianism soon travelled to England, where it was publicly taught, and in some cases even acted upon, by many of the sectaries during the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell. The state of religion in England, as well as in the Colonies, immediately preceding the reign of Charles II, was one of history, was an extraordinary one, and when the Independents obtained the upper hand there was no limit to the vagaries of doctrines, imported or invented, that found so congenial a soil in which to take root and spread. Many of the religious controversies that then arose turned naturally upon the doctrines of faith, grace, and justification which occupied so prominent a place in contemporary thought, and in these controversies Antinomianism frequently figured. A large number of works, tracts, and sermons of this period are extant in which the fierce and intolerable doctrines of the sectaries are but thinly veiled under the cloak of quotations from the Bible that lend so peculiar an effect to their general style. In the earlier part of the seventeenth century, Dr. Tobias Crisp, Rector of Brinkwater (b. 1600), was accused, in company with others, of holding and teaching similar views. His most notable work is "Christ Alone Exalted" (1649). His opinions were controverted with some ability by Dr. Daniel Williams, the founder of the Dissenters' Library. Indeed, to such an extent were extreme Antinomian doctrines held, and even practised, as early as the reign of Charles I, that, after Cutworth's sermon against the Antinomians (on I John, ii, 3, 4) was preached before the Commons of England (1647), the Parliament was obliged to pass severe enactments against them (1648). Anyone convicted on the oaths of two witnesses of maintaining that the moral law of the Ten Commandments was no rule for Christians, or that a believer need repent or pray for pardon of sin, or that public worship should be abandoned if he refused, be imprisoned until he found sureties that he would no more maintain the same. Shortly before this date, the heresy made its appearance in America, where, at Boston, the Antinomian opinions of Mrs. Ann Hutchinson were formally condemned by the New Court of Oyer and Terminer. Although from the seventeenth century onward Antinomianism does not appear to be an official doctrine of any of the more important Protestant sects, at least it has undoubtedly been held from time to time either by individual members or by sects, and taught, both by implication and actually, by the religious leaders of several of these bodies. Certain forms of Calvinism may seem capable of bearing an Antinomian construction. Indeed it has been said that the heresy is in reality nothing more than "Calvinism run to seed". Mosheim regarded the Antinomians as a rigid kind of Calvinists who, disdaining the doctrine of predestination, drew as generous conclusions to religion and morals. Count Zinzendorf (1700-60), the founder of the Herrnhuters, or Moravians, was accused of Antinomianism by Bengel, as was William Huntington, who, however, took pains to disclaim the imputation. Perhaps the most noteworthy instance is that of the Plymouth Brethren, who were quite frankly Antinomian in their doctrine of justification and sanctification. It is their constant assertion that the law is not the rule or standard of the life of the Christian. Here again, as in the case of Aanticomism, it is a theoretical and not a practical Antinomianism that is indicated. Much of the teaching of the members of this sect recalls "the wildest vagaries of the Antinomian heresy, while at the same time their earnest protests against such a construction being put upon their words, and the evident desire of their writers to enforce a high standard of practical holiness, forbid us to follow out some of the absurdities and to be their seventh conclusion." Indeed, the doctrine generally is held theoretically, where held at all, and has seldom been advocated as a principle to be put in practice and acted upon. Except, as has already been noted, in the case of the Anabaptists of Munster and of some of the tenets and sections of the Community. As in the former cases, so in the latter, as well as in a small number of other isolated and sporadic cases, it is highly doubtful if it has ever been directly put forward as an excuse for licentiousness; although, as can easily be seen, it offers the gravest possible incentive to, and even justification of, both private and public immorality in its worst and most insidious forms.

As the doctrine of Antinomianism, or legal irresponsibility, is an extreme type of the heretical doctrine of justification by faith alone as taught by the Reformers, it is only natural to find it condemned by the Catholic Church in company with the fundamental tenets of the Reformation. Thus, in the Ecumenical Council of Trent was occupied with this subject, and published its famous decree on Justification. The fifteenth chapter of this decree is directly concerned with the Antinomian heresy, and condemns it in the following terms: "In opposition also to the cunning wits of certain men who, by good words and fine speeches, deceive the hearts of the innocent, it is to be maintained that the received grace of justification is lost not only by infidelity, in which even faith itself is lost, but also by any other mortal sin, however, faith be not lost; whereby defending the doctrine of the Divine law, which excludes from the Kingdom of God not only the unbelieving, but also the faithful who are fornicators, adulterers, effeminate, abusers of themselves with mankind, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, extortioners, and all others who commit deadly sins; from which, with the help of Divine grace, it is possible to reform, and on account of which they are separate from the grace of Christ." (Cap. xv, cf. also Cap. xii.) Also, among the canons anathematizing the various erroneous doctrines advanced by the Reformers as to the meaning and nature of justification are to be found the following: "Curses upon anyone who shall be favorable to the sect of Antinomians, that every thing is commanded in the Gospel; that other things are indifferent, neither commanded nor prohibited, but free; or that the Ten Commandments in no wise appertain to Christians; let him be anathema."—Can. xx. If anyone shall say that a man who is justified and how perfect soever is not bound to the observance of the commandments of God and of the Church, but only to believe; as if, forsooth, the Gospel were a bare and absolute promise of eternal life, without the condition of observation of the commandments; let him be anathema. —Can. xxi. If anyone shall say that Christ Jesus was given of God unto men as a Redeemer in whom they should trust, and not also as a legislator whom they should obey; let him be anathema. —Can. xxvii. If anyone shall say that there is no deadly sin but that of infidelity; or that grace once received is not lost by any other sin, however grievous and enormous, save only by that of infidelity; let him be anathema."

The minute care with which the thirty-three canons of this sixth session of the Council were drawn up is evidence of the grave importance of the question of justification, as well as of the conflicting doctrine advanced by the Reformers themselves upon this subject. The four canons numbered above leave no doubt as to the distinctly Antinomian theory of justification that falls under the anathema of the Church. That the moral law persists in the Gospel dispensation, and that the justified Christian is still under the whole obligation of the laws of God and of the Church, is clearly asserted and defined under the problem anathema to be their seventh conclusion. The character of Christ as a lawgiver to be obeyed is insisted upon, as well as His character as a Redeemer to be trusted; and the fact that there is grievous transgression, other than that of infidelity, is taught without the slightest ambiguity—thus showing the most marked separation of the teaching of the Church. In connection with the Tridentine decrees and canons may be cited the controversial writings and direct teaching of Cardinal Bellarmin, the ablest upholder of orthodoxy against the various heretical tenets of the Protestant Reformation.

But so grossly and so palpably contrary to the whole spirit and teaching of the Christian revelation, so utterly discordant with the doctrines inculcated in the New Testament Scriptures, and so thoroughly opposed to the interpretation and tradition from which even the Reformers were unable to free themselves, that the doctrine of Antinomian that, while we are able to find a few sectaries, as Agricola, Crisp, Richardson, Saltmarsh, and Hutchinson, defending the doctrine, the principal Reformers and their followers were instant in condemning and repudiating it. Luther himself, Rutherford, Schullerford, Sedgwick, Gataker, With, Bull, and William, have written works upon the refutations of a doctrine that is quite as revolting in theory as it would ultimately have proved fatally dangerous in its practical consequences and inimical to the propagation of the other principles of the Reformers. In Nelson's "Review and Analysis of Bishop Bull's Exposition . . . of Justification" the advertisement of the Bishop of Salisbury has the following strong recommendation of works against the "Antinomian folly": "To the censure of tampering with the strictness of the Divine Law may be opposed Bishop Horsley's recommendation that will be the best guide, "The Harmony of the Testaments," as the best protection against the contagion of Antinomian folly." As a powerful antidote to the Antinomian principles opposed by Bishop Bull, Cudworth's incomparable sermon, preached before the House of Commons in 1647, cannot be too strongly recommended. This was the general attitude of the Anglican, as well as of the Lutheran, body. At what time, on several occasions the case, the ascendency of religious leaders, at a time when religion played an extraordinarily strong part in the civil and political life of the individual, was not in itself sufficient to stamp out the heresy, or keep it within due bounds, the aid of the secular arm was promptly invoked, as in the case of the intervention of the Elector of Brandenburg and the enactments of the English Parliament of 1648. Indeed, at the time, and under the peculiar circumstances obtaining in New England in 1637, the synodical condemnation of Mrs. Hutchinson did not fall far short of a civil judgment.

Impugned alike by the authoritative teaching of the Catholic Church and by the disavowals and solemn declarations of the greater Protestant leaders and confession or formularies, verging, as it does, to the discredit of the teaching of Christ and of the Apostles, inimical to common morality and tending the grave possibility of being so dangerous to the established social and political order, it is not surprising to find the Antinomian heresy a comparatively rare one in ecclesiastical history, and, as a rule, where taught at all, one that is carefully kept in the background or practically explained away. There are few who would care to assert the doctrine in so uncompromising a form as that which Robert Browning, in "Johannes Agricola in Meditation", with undoubted accuracy, ascribes to the Lutheran originator of the heresy:

I love God's warrant, could I blend
All hideous sins, as in a cup,
To drink the mingled venom up;
Secure my nature could convert
The draught to blossoming gladness fast:
While sweet dews turn to the gard'ns' hurt,
And bloat, and while they bloat it, blast,
As from the first its lot was cast.

For this reason it is not always an easy matter to determine with any degree of precision how far certain forms and offshoots of Calvinism, Socinianism, or even Lutheranism, may not be susceptible of Antinomian interpretations; while at the same time it must be remembered that many sects and individual holding opinions dubiously, or even indulgently, of an Antinomian nature, would indignantly repudiate any direct charge of teaching that evil would be considered by action and not as a law of justified Christians. The shades and gradations of heresy here merge insensibly the one into the other. To say that a man cannot sin because he is justified is very much the same thing as to state that no action, whether sinful in itself or not, can be in the right of a justified person, no matter who he is. Nor is the doctrine that good works do not help in promoting the sanctification of an individual far removed from the teaching that evil deeds do not interfere with it. There is a certain logical nexus between these three forms of the Protestant doctrine of justification that would seem to have its natural outcome in the assertion of Antinomianism. The only doctrine that is conclusively and officially opposed to this heresy, as well as to those forms of the doctrine of justification by faith alone that are so closely connected with it, both doctrinally and historically, is to be found in the Catholic dogmas of Faith, Justification, and Sanctification.

Antioch (Aρτευελα, Αντιοχία), The Church of.—I. ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE CITY.—Of the vast empire conquered by Alexander the Great many states were formed, one of which comprised Syria and other countries to the east and west of it. This realm fell to the lot of one of the conqueror's generals, Seleucus Nicator, or Seleucus I, founder of the dynasty of the Seleucids. About the year 300 B.C. he founded a city on the banks of the lower Orontes, some distance below Antioch, the capital of his dedicated rival Antigonus. The city which was named Antioch, from Antiochus the father of Seleucus, was meant to be the capital of the new realm. It was situated on the northern slope of Mount Silpius, on an agreeable and well-chosen site, and stretched as far as the Orontes, which there flows from east to west. It grew soon to large proportions; new quarters or suburbs were added to it, so that ultimately it consisted of four towns enclosed by as many distinct walls and by a common rampart, which with the citadel reached to the summit of Mount Silpius. When Antiochus the Great became the prince of Pompey (64 B.C.), Antioch continued to be the metropolis of the East. It also became the residence of the legates, or governors, of Syria. In fact, Antioch, after Rome and Alexandria, was the largest city of the empire, with a population of over half a million. Whenever the emperors came to the East, they honoured it with their presence. The Seleucids as well as the Roman rulers vied with one another in adorning and enriching the city with statues, theatres, temples, aqueducts, public baths, gardens, fountains, and cascades; a broad avenue with four rows of columns, forming covered porticoes on each side, traversed the city from east to west, to the length of several miles. Its most attractive pleasure resort was the beautiful grove of laurels and cypresses called Daphne, some four or five miles to the west of the city. It was renowned for its park-like appearance, for its magnificent temple of Apollo, and for the pompous religious festivities in the month of August. From Antioch was sometimes surnamed Epidaphnes. The population included a great variety of races. There were Macedonians and Greeks, native Syrians and Phcenicians, Jews and Romans, besides a contingent from further Asia; many flocked there because Seleucus had given them the right of a city. Nevertheless the city remained always predominantly a Greek city. The inhabitants did not enjoy a great reputation for learning or virtue; they were excessively devoted to pleasure, and universally known for their witicism and sarcasm. Not a few of their peculiar traits have reached us through the sermons of St. John Chrysostom, the letters of Libanius, the "Miscopogon" of Julian, and other literary sources. Their loyalty to imperial authority could not always be depended upon. In spite of these defects there was at all times in Antioch a certain number of men, especially in the Jewish colony, who were given to serious thoughts, even to thoughts of religion. After the fifth century Antioch lost much of its size and importance. It was visited by frequent earthquakes, by not less than ten from the second century B.C. to the end of the sixth century of the Christian era. Twice it was captured and sacked by the Persians, in A.D. 260 and 350, and in each case was almost completely destroyed, but was rebuilt by the Emperor Justinian I (527-565) on a much smaller scale, and called Theopolis. It is said that no small portion of his walls remained until 1825, a specimen of the military architecture of the sixth century. In 638 it was taken by the Mohammedans, who restored to the Byzantine Empire in 969, and reconquered by the Seljuks in 1084. From 1098 until 1268 it was in the hands of the Crusaders and their descendants; the Sultan Bibras of Egypt took it in 1268; and in 1517 it came with Syria under the Turkish Empire. The former populous metropolis of the small towns on the east coast with an aggregate population of about 20,000 inhabitants (see Aleppo).

II. CHRISTIANITY OF ANTIΟCH.—Since the city of Antioch was a great centre of government and civilization, the Christian religion spread thither almost from the beginning. Nicolas, one of the seven deacons of Jerusalem, fled from Antioch (Acts, vi, 5). The seed of Christ's teachings was carried thither by some disciples from Cyprus and Cyrene, who were from Jerusalem during the persecution that followed upon the martyrdom of St. Stephen (Acts, xi, 19, 20). They preached the teachings of Jesus, not only to the Jewish colony but also to the Greeks and Gentiles, and soon large numbers were converted. The mother-church of Jerusalem having heard of the occurrence sent Barnabas thither, who called Saul from Tarsus to Antioch (ib., 22, 25). There they laboured for a whole year with such success that the followers of Christ were acknowledged as forming a distinct community, "so that at Antioch the disciples were first named Christians" (ib., 26). Their charity was exhibited by the offerings sent to the famine-stricken brethren in Judea. St. Peter himself came to Antioch (Gal., ii, 11), probably about the year 44, and according to all appearances lived there for some time (see Peter, Saint). The community of Antioch, being composed in part of Greeks or Gentiles, had views of its own on the character and conditions of the new religion. There was a faction among the disciples in Jerusalem which maintained that the Gentiles should receive the new faith without requirements of circumcision. This position should pass first through Judaism by submitting to the observances of the Mosaic law, such as circumcision and the like. This attitude seemed to close the gates to the Gentiles, and was strongly contested by the Christians of Antioch. Their plea for Christian liberty was defended by their leader, Paul and Barnabas, and received full recognition in the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem (Acts, xv, 22-32). Later on St. Paul defends this principle at Antioch even in the face of Peter (Gal., ii, 11). Antioch became soon a centre of missionary propaganda. It was thence that St. Paul and his companions started out for Paul and Barnabas on their fourth and final journey to the countries of the East. The Church of Antioch was also fully organized almost from the beginning. It was one of the few original churches which preserved complete the catalogue of its bishops. The first of these bishops, Eudocius, reached back to the Apostolic age. At a very early date the Christian community of Antioch became the central point of all the Christian interests in the East. After the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) it was the real metropolis of Christianity in those countries.

In the meantime the number of Christians grew to such an extent, that in the first part of the fourth century Antioch was looked upon as practically a Christian city. Many churches were erected there for the accommodation of the worshippers of Christ. In the fourth century there was still a basilica called "the ancient" and "the apostolic". It was probably one of the oldest architectural monuments of Christianity; and it was both the meeting place of the bishops and the house of Theophilus, the friend of St. Luke (Acts, i, 1). There were also sanctuaries dedicated to the memory of the great Apostles Peter, Paul, and John. Saint Augustine speaks (Sermo, cc, n. 5) of a basilica of the holy Machabees at Antioch, a famous shrine from the fourth to the sixth century (Card. Rampolla, n. "Bessarione", Rome, 1897-98, I-II). Among the pagan temples dedicated to Christian uses was the celebrated Temple of Fortune (Tycheion). In it the Christians of Antioch enshrined the body of their great bishop and martyr Ignatius. There was also a martyrium or memorial shrine of Babylas, a third-century martyr and bishop of Antioch, who suffered in the reign of Decius. For the development of Christian domestic architecture in the vicinity of the great city see De Vegoli, "Architectura civile et religiosa de la Syrie Centrale" (Paris, 1865-77), and the similar work of Howard Crosby Butler (New York, 1903). The very important monastic architecture of the vicinity will be described under Simeon Stylites and Byzantine Architecture. The Emperor Constantine (306-337) built a church there, which he adorned so richly that it was the admiration of all the ancients (St. John Chrys., Hom. in Ep. ad Eph., X, 2, Ep. ad Vit., "Vita Ignat.," I, and "De laud. Const.," c. 9). It was completely pillaged, but not destroyed, by the Goths in 540. The Church of Antioch showed itself worthy of being the metropolis of Christianity in the East. In the ages of persecution it furnished a very large quota of martyrs, the bishops setting the example. It may perhaps be mentioned that St. Ignatius, the most famous. Theophilus (q. v.) wrote in the latter part of the second century an elaborate defence and explanation of the Christian religion. In later ages there were such men as Flavian (q. v.), who did much to reunite the Christians of Antioch divided in the time of the Arian Controversy (q. v.). John Chrysostom (q. v.) afterwards Bishop of Constantinople, and Theodoret, afterwards Bishop of Cyrus in Syria. Several heresies took their rise in Antioch. In the third century Paul of Samosata (q. v.), Bishop of Antioch, professed erroneous doctrines. Arianism had its original root not in Alexandria but in the great Syrian city, Antioch; Nestorianism sprang up from the doctrine of Theodore of Mopoeustes (q. v.) and Nestorius (q. v.) of Constantinople. A peculiar feature of Antiochenes life was the frequency of conflict between the Jews and the Christians; several grievous seditions and massacres are noted by the historians from the end of the fourth century to the beginning of the seventh century. (Lecleer, Dict. d'arch. et de liturg. chrét., I, col. 2396).

III. Patriarchate of Antioch.—When the early organization of the Church of Antioch, owing to its origin and influence, could not fail to become a centre of special higher jurisdiction. Traces of this power were seen in the very first ages. Towards the end of the second century Serapion, Bishop of Antioch (q. v.) gave instructions on the Apocryphal Gospel of St. Peter to the Christians of Rhodes, a town not of Syria but of Cilicia. Tradition has it that the same Serapion consecrated the third Bishop of Edessa, which was then outside of the Roman Empire. The councils held about the middle of the third century in Antioch, called together bishops from Syria, Palestine, Arabia, and the provinces of Eastern Asia Minor. Dionysius of Alexandria spoke of these bishops as forming the synod, and constant mention of the planting of the Church of Antioch, which Demetrius of Antioch was mentioned in the first place. At the Council of Anacrya (314) presided over by Bishop Vitalis of Antioch, about the same countries were represented through the bishops of the principal cities. In general, the Churches in the "East", as this complexus of Roman provinces was known (cf. Oriens Christianus), gravitated towards the Church of Antioch, whose bishop from remote antiquity exercised a certain jurisdiction over them. This custom was sanctioned by the Council of Nicaea (325). The Fathers of this assembly decreed in the sixth canon that the privileges of the Church of Antioch should be maintained, and in the second canon of the Council of Constantinople (381) the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Antioch comprised, and was restricted to the civil diocese of the Orient (see Roman Empire) which included all the easternmost provinces of the Roman Empire. In the Council of Ephesus (431) the Bishops of Cyprus were declared independent of Antioch; and in that of Chalcedon (451) the three provinces of Palestine were detached from Antioch and placed under the Bishop of Jerusalem (see Cyprus). From the foregoing it is evident that, while in the early ages the jurisdiction of Antioch extended over the Christian communities in the whole of Christian Empire, its proper limits were Syria, Palestine, and Eastern Asia Minor. Gradually it was so restricted that by the middle of the fifth century it was confined to the northern part of the civil diocese of the Orient and the countries outside of the Roman Empire. The title given to the Bishop of Antioch on account of his higher jurisdiction was “Patriarch”, which he held in common with other dignitaries of a similar rank. His jurisdiction could be exercised not only with regard to the faithful within his territory, but also over the ordinary and the metropolitan bishops of his patriarchate. It seems worthy of mention here that early in the fourth century the sees of the bishops in possession of Antioch both urban and rural properties, both in the old and the “new” parts of the city, and even in the Jewish quarter. (Liber Pontif., ed. Duchesne, I, 177, 195; cf. cxii sq.) The patriarchate of Antioch lost much of its importance after the middle of the fifth century owing to many adverse circumstances. The Bishop of Constantinople (q.v.), who aspired to the first rank in the Eastern Church, acquired gradually, and long maintained, a controlling influence over the Church of Antioch. In the latter part of the fifth century the Monophysites, under Peter Fullo, endeavoured to take possession of the patriarchal see. After the death of their leader Severus (539) they elected their own patriarch of Antioch. During the centuries that followed the conquest of Antioch by the Saracens (638), the succession of orthodox incumbents of the patriarchal see was irregular, and they had to suffer much from the new conquerors who showed a decided aversion to the Monophysite patriarchs (see MOHAMMEDANISM).

When the Greek schism (q. v.) was consummated in the eleventh century, the orthodox patriarchate of Antioch, owing to traditional Byzantine influence, was drawn into it, and remained schismatic despite repeated efforts of the Apostolic See for a reunion. At present the Greek patriarch resides in Damascus, the city of Antioch having long since lost all political importance. It was not only the Monophysites who dismembered thus early the patriarchate of Antioch. The Nestorians who emigrated into Persia after their condemnation at Ephesus (431) soon became so strong that at the end of the fifth century their bishop, Babæus of Seleucia, made himself independent of Antioch, and established a new patriarchate with its centre in Seleucia, afterwards in Bagdad. Those Syrians who remained united with Rome (now known as the Chaldaens) continued to acknowledge a patriarch of their own, who was in possession of Babylon and lives in Mosul. Among the other oriental communities united with Rome there are three which have all their patriarchs of Antioch, viz. the Maronites, the Melchites, and the Catholic Syrians (see GREEK CHURCH, UNITAT).

IV. LATIN PATRIARCHATE OF ANTIOCH.—When the crusaders took possession of Antioch in 1098, they reinstated at first the Greek patriarch, then John IV. About two years afterwards the said dignitary found that he was unfitted to rule over Western Christians, and withdrew to Constantinople. Thereupon the Latin Christians elected (1100) a patriarch of their own, a one-time bullionist of Bernard who had come to the Orient with the crusaders. From that time Antioch had its Latin patriarchs, until in 1268 Christian, the last incumbent, was put to death by the Sultan Bibars, during the conquest of the city. The Greeks also continued to elect their own patriarchs at Antioch, and generally in Constantinople. The jurisdiction of the Latin patriarchs in Antioch extended over the three feudal principalities of Antioch, Edessa, and Tripolis. Towards the end of the twelfth century the island of Cyprus was added. In practice they were far more dependent upon the pope than their predecessors, the Patriarchs. After the fall of Antioch (1268) the popes still appointed patriarchs who, however, were unable to take possession of the see. Since the middle of the fourteenth century they have been only titular dignitaries. The title of Latin Patriarch of Antioch is yet conferred; but the recipient resides in Rome, and is the titular head of the chapter of the basilica of St. Mary Major. V. SYNODS OF ANTIOCH.—Owing to the special position of Antioch many synods were held there. A belief, that some find expressed for the first time by Pope Innocent I (407—417; Mansal, Conc., III, 1055) that others locate about 787 (Herder, K. L., 112), was current in the past that the Apostles held a council in Antioch (see CANONS, APOTLE). We are informed by this text (Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. Hist., I, 90—93) that the name of Christians was formally assigned to the followers of the Saviour by the Apostles, and that special instructions were given to the Apostolic missionaries and to their converts. These canons, according to Cardinal Hergenröther (Herder, K. L., 1 c.), are apocryphal, “a mere compilation from the data of the (canonical) Acts and from other writers.” About the year 251 a council was held, or planned to be held, at Antioch, on the subject of Novatianism (q. v.) to which Fabius, Bishop of Antioch, was inclined. The bishops chiefly interested in it, apart from Fabius, were Helenus of Tarsus, Firmilian of Caesarea in Cappadocia, and Theoctitus of Caesarea in Palestine, who invited also Dionysius of Alexandria. The matter had no further consequence, since Fabius died shortly afterwards and not much attention was accorded to the views of his opponents whose views on the reconciliation of the apostates were less extreme. Between the years 264 and 268 three different synods were held on account of erroneous doctrines on the nature of Jesus Christ and His relation to God, attributed to Paul, Bishop of Antioch, and a native of Samosata. Bishops from Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Cilicia, Cappadocia, Pontus, and Lycaonia took part in these deliberations. Finally, in the third synod, they deposed Paul, convicted him of heresy, and elected Donnus in his place. Under the protection of the Princess Zenobia of Palmyra, Paul was able to maintain himself for some time. He was expelled in the end (272) by a decree of the Emperor Aurelian (270—275).

Most of the synods held during the fourth century reflected the struggles that followed upon the Arian controversy. The council of 330 deposed the orthodox Eustathius, Bishop of Antioch; and for a long time the Arian Anthimus was allowed to retain his position. Anthimus held in 340 Athanasius of Alexandria was deposed, and a certain Gregory, from Cappadocia, was consecrated in his stead. The intruder could take possession of his see only under a military escort. The deposition of Athanasius was ratified in the synod of the following year (341), which was held on the occasion of the dedication of the “great”, or “golden” church mentioned above as built by Constantine. The twenty-five disciplinary canons passed by this council were afterwards received by the universal Church. The four creeds adopted, though not heretical, still depart from the symbol of faith made by the apostles by local assemblies. In the council held in 344 Athanasius of Alexandria was deposed, and a certain Gregory, from Cappadocia, was consecrated in his stead. The Arians, who had come to the synod of the following year (341), which was held on the occasion of the dedication of the “great”, or “golden” church mentioned above as built by Constantine.

at the end a Semi-Arian declaration. At last, in 378, a large number of Oriental bishops, assembled in Antioch, broke with Ariusianism altogether. They gave their assent to the Nicene faith as it had been expressed by Pope Damasus (q. v.) and a Roman synod in 368; viz., that the Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost were one substance. The synod held in 381 decided that there were only two persons in the One substance and the same of the Holy Trinity. Thus the schism and the heresy of the Oriental and Western Church were finally extinguished. The synod of the fifth and sixth centuries were usually concerned with the theological controversies of the time. Thus the council of 424 decreed the expulsion of Pelagius from the Church and the condemnation of the Anarchus and the Arian and Pelagian physiologists were dealt with in the synods of 432, 447, 451, 471, 478, 481, 482, 508, 512, 565. A synod of the year 445 rendered a decision in the matter of Athanasius, Bishop of Pherra, accused of misconduct and brought before the patriarch of Antioch. Finally, a synod held about the year 546 was caused by the Orientalist controversies of Palestine. During the period of Latin domination two synods were held at Antioch. In 1139 Raddulf, the second Latin Patriarch of Antioch, was deposed for having appealed to complete independence from Rome, and for cruel treatment inflicted on some ecclesiastics. In 1191 Litigius, called Pontus, a nickname of Antioch, was deposed for claims on the principality of Antioch in favour of the Count of Tripolis, against Armenia, which was placed under interdict. Ecclesiastical life in Antioch became all but extinct from the time that the city was permanently taken by the Mohammedans.

FRANCIS SCHAFFER

Antioch, of Syria.—It is difficult to realize that in the modern Antakieh (28,000 inhab.), we have the once famous "Queen of the East," which, with its population of more than eighty millions, a beautiful site, its trade and culture, and its important military position, was a not unworthy rival of Alexandria and of Rome. An empire raging under Joseuphus, Bel. Jud., III, 2-4). Founded in 300 b. c. by Seleucus I (Nicator), King of Syria, Antioch stood on the Orontes (near the Ata), at the point of junction of the Lebanon and of the Taurus ranges. Its harbour, fifteen miles distant, was Seleucia (cf. Acts, xiii, 4). This was the chief port on the Mediterranean. From it it was distinguished by the [la Ἰωνία (or την Ἰωνία) ἀκρογόνον, now Bet el ma, five miles west from Antioch] came from the ill-famed sacred grove, which, endowed with the right of asylum, and so on, by "a rare change," the refuge of innocuous (cf. II Mach., iv, 33 sq.), had become the haunt of every foulness, whence the expression Daphnici mores. However, the vivid description of Antioch's immorality, largely the result of the greater mingling of races and civilizations, may be exaggerated; as said in another connexion [cf. Lepin, Jesus Messie, etc. (2d ed., Paris, 1903), 54, note], les braves gens n'ont pas d'histoire, and of that class there must have been a large proportion of Jews (cf. II Macc. vii, 33; Acts, xvi, 21). The Jews had been among the original settlers, and, as such, had been granted by the founder here, as in other cities built by him, equal rights with the Macedonians and the Greeks (Jos. Ant., XII, iii, 1; Contra Ap., II, iv). The influence of Rome was marked. Although it had been founded as a governor of their own, and forming a large percentage of the population, was very great (Josephus, Ant. Rom., XII, iii, 1; Bel. Jud., VII, iii, 3, VII, v, 2; Harnack, Mission u. Ausbreitung d. Christenthums, p. 5, note 2). Unknown discipul, dispersed by the persecution in which Stephen was put to death, brought Christianity to Antioch (Acts, xi, 19). Cf. Acts, vi, 5, where the author characteristically mentions the place of origin of Nicholas, one of the seven deacons. In Antioch the new Faith was preached to, and accepted by the Greeks with such success that Christianity received here its name, perhaps originally in reference to Antioch, as decided by the ecumenical councils. In 26 the new community, once acknowledged by the mother-church of Jerusalem (Acts, xi, 22 sq.), soon manifested its vitality and its intelligence of the faith by its spontaneous act of generosity toward the brethren of Jerusalem (Acts, xi, 27-30). The place of apostleship of the Apostle of the Gentiles (Acts, xi, 26), Antioch became the headquarters of the great missionaries Paul and Barnabas, first together, later Paul alone. Starting thence on their Apostolic journeys they brought back thither the report of their work (Acts, xiii, 2 sq.; xiv, 25-27; xv, 36 sq.; xviii, 22, 23), Acts, xv (Gal. ii, 1-10) of some evidence in the synods of the Apostles in the General Church. There arose the great dispute concerning circumcision, and her resolution occasioned the recognition of the "catholicity" of Christianity.

II. Antioch of Pisidia.—Like its Syrian namesake, it was founded by Seleucus Nicator situated on the Sebeaca road. This road left the highroad from Ephesus to the East at Apamea, went to Iconium and then southeast through the Cilician Gates to Syria (cf. Acts, xviii, 23). The city lay south of the Sultan Dagh, on the confines of Pisidia, whence its name of "Antioch towards Pisidia" (Strabo, XII, 8). Definitively a Roman possession since Amyntas's times (25 b. c. B.C.), it became a Roman city (6), a colony, with a view to checking the brigands of the Taurus mountains (II Cor., xi, 26). Beside its Roman inhabitants and older Greek and Phrygian population, Antioch had a prosperous Jewish colony whose origin probably went back to Antiochus the Great (223-178 B.C.) (cf. Josephus, Ant., XII, iii, 2 sq.), and whose influence seems to have been considerable (cf. Acts, xiii, 43, 50; xiv, 20 sq.; Harnack, "Die Mission", p. 2, note 2 and ref.). Acts, xiii, 14-52 describes at length the sojourn of St. Paul at Antioch. The episode, clearly important to the historian, has been justly compared to Luke's Acts, 30; it is a kind of prelude- or prologue, where Paul's Gospel is outlined. A longer stay of the missionaries is implied in Acts, xiii, 49. On his return from Derbe, St. Paul revisited Antioch (Acts, xiv, 20). Two other visits seem implied in Acts, xvi, 4, 6; xviii, 23.

Antiochene Liturgy.—The family of liturgies originally used in the Patriarchate of Antioch begins with that of the Apostolic Constitutions; then follow that of St. James in Greek, the Syrian Liturgy of St. James, and the other Syrian Anaphoras. The line may be further continued to the Byzantine Rite (the older Liturgy of St. Basil and the later and shorter one of St. John Chrysostom), and through it to the Armenian use. But these no longer concern the Church of Antioch. I, The Liturgy of the Apostolic Constitutions forms that old Antiochene order described as a complete liturgy is that of the Apostolic Constitutions. It is also the first member of the line of Antiochene uses. The Apostolic Constitutions (q. v.) consist of eight books purporting to have been written by St. Clement of Rome (died c. 104). The first six books are an interpreted edition of the Didascalia ("Teaching of the Lord's Apostles and Disciples", written in the first half of the third century and since edited in a Syriac version by de Lagarde, 1854); the seventh book is an equally modified version of the Didache (Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, probably written in the first century and in the form that survives in the original of the New Testament by Philotheus, 1883) with a collection of prayers. The eighth book contains a complete liturgy and the eighty-five "Apostolic Canons". There is also part of a liturgy modified from the Didascalia in the second book. It has been suggested that the compiler of the Apostolic Constitutions may be the same person as the author of the six spurious letters of St. Ignatius (Pseudo-Ignatius). In any case he was a Syrian Christian, probably an Apollinarist, living in or near Antioch either at the end of the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century. And the liturgy that he describes in his eighth book is that used in his time by the Church of Antioch, with certain modifications of his own. That the writer was an Antiochene Syrian and that he describes the liturgical use of his own country is shown by various details, such as the precedence given to Antioch (VII, xvi, VIII, x, etc.); his mention of Christmas (VIII, xxvii), which was kept at Antioch about 380, probably only in that year; his list of the more important persons in church at Antioch, including the bishop; and his reference to his father as living in Antioch (ib., xxvi). The rubrics are added by the compiler, apparently from his own observations.

The liturgy of the eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions, then, represents the use of Antioch in the fourth century. Its opening litany is the "Mass of the Catechumens". After the readings (of the Law, the Prophets, the Epistles, Acts, and Gospels) the bishop greets the people with II Cor., xiii, 13 (The grace of Our Lord Jesus Christ and the charity of God and the communication of the Holy Ghost [with you all].) They answer: And with your spirit. The people answer: And with your heart. Then follows a litany for the catechumens, to each invocation of which the people answer "Kyrie eleison"; the bishop says a collect and the deacon dismisses the catechumens. Similar litanies and collects follow for the Eucharist, the catechumens (e.g., the Patmosians [comprising the catechumens in den three year Jhundertes (Leipsic, 1902).]

After the Kiss of Peace (The peace of God be with you all) the deacon calls, upon the people to pray for various causes which are nearly the same as those of the bishop's litany and the bishop gathers up their prayers. He then makes them the sign of the Eucharist, saying: "Holy things for the holy" and they answer: "One is holy, one is Lord, Jesus Christ in the glory of God the Father, etc." The bishop gives the people Holy Communion in the form of bread, saying to each: "The body of Christ", and the communicant answers: "Amen." The deacon follows with: "The blessing of the chalice of life." R. "Amen." While they receive, the xxxii Psalm (I will bless the Lord at all times) is said. After Communion the deacons take what is left of the Blessed Sacrament to the tabernacles (παραφόρος). There follows a short thanksgiving, the bishop dismisses the people and the deacon ends by saying: "Go in peace.

Throughout this liturgy the compiler suggests that it was drawn up by the Apostles and he inserts sentences telling us which Apostle composed each separate part, for instance: "And I, James, brother of Zebedee, as the deacon shall say at once: "No one of the catechumens," etc. The second book of the Apostolic Constitutions contains the outline of a liturgy (hardly more than the rubrics) which practically coincides with this one. All the liturgies of the Antiochene class follow the same general arrangement as that of the Apostolic Constitutions. Gradually the preparation of the oblation (Prothesis, the word also used for the credence table), before the actual liturgy begins, develops into an elaborate service. The preparation for the lessons (the little Entrance) and the carrying of the oblation from the Prothesis to the altar (the great Entrance) become solemn processions, but the outline of the liturgy; the Mass of the Catechumens and their dismissal; the litany; the Anaphora beginning with the words "Right and just" and interrupted by the Sanctus; the words of Institution; Anamnissis, Epiklesis and Supplication for all kinds of people at the Church are in the tradition with the words "In the presence of the holy;" the Communion distributed by the bishop and deacon (the deacon having the chalice); and then the final prayer and dismissal—this order is characteristic of all the Syrian and Palestinian use, and is followed in the derived Byzantine liturgies. Two points in that of the Apostolic Constitutions stand out. No saint's name and there is no Our Father. The mention of saints' names, especially of the "All-holy Mother of God", spread considerably among Catholics after the Council of Ephesus (431), and prayers invoking her under that title were then added to all the Catholic liturgies. The Apostolic Constitutions have preserved an older form unchanged by the development that modifies forms in actual use. The omission of the Lord's Prayer is curious and unique. It has at any rate nothing to do with relative antiquity. In the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" (VIII, ii, 3) people are told to pray three times a day as the Lord commanded in his Gospel: Our Father; etc.

II. The Greek Liturgy of St. James.—Of the Antiochene liturgies drawn up for actual use, the oldest one and the original from which the others have been derived is the Greek Liturgy of St. James. The earliest reference to this is in the quinextum Council (II Trullan A. p. 692), which quotes it as being really composed by St. James, the brother of Our Lord. The Council appeals to this liturgy in defending the mixed chalice against the Armenians. St. Jerome (died 420) seems to know it. At any rate at Bethlehem he quotes it as a liturgical form the words "who alone is sinless," which occur in this Liturgy (Adv. Pel., II, xxii). The fact that the Jacobites use the same liturgy in Syriac shows that it existed and was well established before the Monophysite schism. The oldest manuscript is one of the tenth century formerly belonging to the Studium and now in the University library of that city. The Greek Liturgy of St. James follows in all its essential parts that of the Apostolic Constitutions. It has preparatory prayers to be said by the priest and deacon and a blessing of the incense. Then begins the Mass of the Catechumens with the little Entrance. The deacon follows with a litany (κοίτα) to which people answer "Kyrie eleison." Meanwhile the priest is saying a prayer to himself, of which only the last words are said aloud, after the litany is finished. The singers say the Trisagion, "Holy God, holy Strong One, holy Immortal One, have mercy on us." The practice of the priest saying one prayer silently while the people are occupied with something different is a later development. The Lessons follow, still in the older form, that is, long portions of both Testaments, then the prayers for the catechumens and their dismissal. Among the prayers for the catechumens is a reference to the cross (lift up the horn of the Christian, by the power of the unbreakable and life-giving cross) which must have been written after St. Helen found it (c. 326) and which is one of the many reasons for connecting this liturgy with Jerusalem. When the catechumens are dismissed, the deacon tells the faithful to "know each other," that is to observe whether any stranger is still present.

The great Entrance which begins the Mass of the Faithful is already an imposing ceremony. The incense is blessed, the oblation is brought from the Prothesis to the altar while the people sing the Cherubikon, ending with three Alleluias. (The text is different from the Byzantine Cherubikon). Meanwhile the priest says another prayer silently. The creed is then said; apparently at first it was a shorter form like the Apostles' Creed. The Offertory prayers and the litany are much longer than those in the Apostolic Constitutions. There is as yet no reference to the Image (Icon). (The place of the clergy) The beginning of the "Anaphora" (Preface) is shorter. The words of Institution and Anamnissis are followed immediately by the Epiklesis; then comes the Supplication for various people. The deacon reads the "Diptychs" of the names of people for whom they pray; then follows a praise of the Saints, mentioning St. Mary, the late and highly praised Lady Mary, Mother of God and ever-virgin. Here are inserted two hymns to Our Lady obviously directed against the Nestorian heresy. The Lord's Prayer follows with an introduction and Embolesmos. The Host is shown to the people with the same words as in the Apostolic Constitutions, and then broken, and part of it is put into the chalice while the priest says: "The mixing of the all-holy Body and the precious Blood of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ." Before Communion Psalm xxxii is said. The priest says a prayer before his Communion. The deacon concludes the prayers. There is no such form as: "The Body of Christ," he says only: "Approach in the fear of the Lord," and they answer: "Blessed is He who comes in the name of the Lord." What is left of the Blessed Sacrament is taken by the deacon to the Prothesis; the prayers of Thanksgiving are shorter than those of the Apostolic Constitutions. The Liturgy of St. James as it now exists is a more developed form of the same use as that of the Apostolic Constitutions. The prayers are longer, the ceremonies have become more elaborate, incense is used continually, and the preparation is already on the way to become the complicated service of the Byzantine Eucharist. There are continual invocations of saints; but the essential outline of the Rite is the same. Besides the reference to the Holy Cross, one allusion makes it clear that it was originally drawn up for the Church of Jerusalem. The first supplication after the Epistle is: "We offer to thee, O Lord, for Thy holy places which Thou hast glorified by Thine own presence, Thy Church and by the coming of Thy holy Spirit, especially for the holy and illustrious Sion, mother of all churches and for Thy holy, Catholic and apostolic Church throughout the world." This liturgy was used throughout Syria and Palestine, that is throughout the Antiochenes Patriarchate. This liturgy was used in the Church of Jerusalem until the Council of Ephesus (431) before the Nestorian and Monophysite schisms. It is possible to reconstruct a great part of the use of the city of Antioch while St. John Chrysostom was preaching there (370-397) from the allusions and quotations in his homilies (Probst, Liturgie des IV. Jahrh., II, i, 156, 198). It is then seen to be practically that of St. James; indeed whole passages are quoted word for word as they stand in St. James or in the Apostolic Constitutions.

The Catechisms of St. Cyril of Jerusalem were held in 348; the first eighteen are addressed to the Com-]petitors of the Church with the converts and the neophytes in Easter week. In these he explains, besides Baptism and Confirmation, the holy liturgy. The allusions to the liturgy are carefully veiled in the earlier ones because of the disciplina a-vanti; they become much plainer when he speaks to people just baptized, although even then he avoids quoting the baptism form or the words of consecration. From these Catechisms we learn the order of the liturgy at Jerusalem in the middle of the fourth century. Except for one or two unimportant variations, it is that of St. James (Probst, op. cit., II, i, ii, 77-104). This liturgy appears to have been used in other languages, Greek at Antioch, Jerusalem, and the chief cities where Greek was commonly spoken, Syriac in the country. The oldest form of it now extant is the Greek version. Is it possible to find a relationship between it and other parent-use? There are a number of very remarkable parallel passages between the Anaphora of this liturgy and the Canon of the Roman Mass. The order of the prayers is different, but when the Greek or Syriac is translated into Latin there appear a large number of phrases and clauses that are identical with ours. It has been suggested that Rome and Syria originally used similar liturgies and that the order of the Canon of our Mass may be solved by reconstructing it according to the Syrian use (Drews, Zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Kanons). Mgr. Duchesne and many authors, on the other hand, are disposed to connect the Gallican Liturgy with that of Syria and the Roman Mass with the Alexandrine use. Duchesne and many others doubt the origin of the Greek liturgy. The Melchites and Jacobites continued using the same rites. But gradually the languages became characteristic of the two sides. The Jacobites used only Syriac, while the whole movement of the national revolt against the Emperor), and the Melchites, who were nearly all Greeks in the chief towns, generally used Greek. The Syriac Liturgy of St. James now extant is not the original one used before the schism, but a modified form derived from it by the Jacobites for their own use. The preparation of the oblation has been changed in many ways. The schism ascribes the beginning of the anaphora and after it this Syriac liturgy follows the Greek one almost word for word, including the reference to Sion, the mother of all churches. But the list of saints is modified; the deacon commemorates the saints "who have kept unsealed the faith of Nicene, Constantinople and Ephesus"; he names "James the brother of Our Lord" alone of the Apostles and "most chiefly Cyril who was a tower of the truth, who expounded the incarnation of the Word of God, and Mar James and Mar Ephram, eloquent mouths and pillars of our holy Church." Mar James is Baradat, through whom they have their origin and from whom their name (543). In Ephram the Patriarch of Antioch who reigned from 539-545, but who was certainly not a Monophysite? The list of saints, however, varies considerably; sometimes they introduce a long list of their patrons (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. Col., II, 101-104). This liturgy was used even earlier on the archiepiscopal see till the Council of Ephesus, 431 before the Nestorian and Monophysite schisms. It is then seen to be practically that of St. James; indeed whole passages are quoted word for word as they stand in St. James or in the Apostolic Constitutions.

The Syriac rite adds after "holy Immortal one," the words: "who was crucified for us." This is the addition made by Peter the Dyer (μπράτι, fule), Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch (458-471), which seemed to the Orthodox to conceal Monophysite heresy and which was adopted by the Jacobites as a kind of proclamation of their faith. In the Syriac use a number of Greek words have remained. The deacon says σώμαν καλέω in Greek and the people continually cry out "Kurilledes" and "Amen" in Hebrew. Short liturgical forms constantly become fossilised in one language and count almost as inarticulate exclamations. The Greek ones in the Syriac liturgy show that the Greek language is the original. Besides the Syriac Liturgy of St. James, the Jacobites have a large number of other Anaphoras which they join to the common Preparation and Catechumen's Mass. The names of sixty-four of these Anaphoras are known. They are attributed to various saints and Monophysite bishops; thus there are the Anaphoras of St. Basil, St. Cyril of Alexandria, St. Peter, St. Clement, Doctors of Alexandria, John Maro, James of Edessa (died 708), Severus of Antioch (died 518), and so on. There is also a shortened Anaphora of St. James of Jerusalem. Renaudot prints the texts of forty-two of these liturgies in a Latin translation. They consist of different prayers, but the order is practically always the same. The Liturgy of the Syriac Church in Antioch (as used in the days of Lent except Saturdays) follows the other one very closely. There is the Mass of the Catechumens with the little Entrance, the Lessons, Mass of the Faithful and great Entrance, litanies, Our Father, breaking of the Host, Communion, thanksgiving, and dismissal. Of course the whole Eucharistic prayer is let out—but the object seems to be that they lie on the Prothesis before the great Entrance (Brightman, op. cit., 494-501).

IV. The Present Time.—The Jacobites in Syria and Palestine still use the Syriac Liturgy of St. James, as do also the Syrian Uniates. The Orthodox of the Patriarchate of Antioch, Babylon, and Jerusalem, have forsaken their own use for many centuries. Like all the Christians in communion with Constantinople, they have adopted the Byzantine Rite. This is one result of the extreme centralization towards Constantinople that followed the Arab conquests of Egypt, Palestine, and Syria. The Melchite Patriarchate of Antioch, Babylon, and Jerusalem, has also adopted the Byzantine Rite. This has been the case for all their flocks through the Monophysite heresy, became the merest shadows and eventually even left their sees to be ornaments of the court at Constantinople. It was during that time, before the rise of the new national churches, that the Byzantine Patriarch developed into something very like a pope over the whole Orthodox world. And he succeeded in foisting the liturgy, calendar, and practices of his own patriarchate on the much older and more venerable sees of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. It is not possible to say exactly when the older uses were supplanted by the Byzantine. The Balsamon says that by the end of the twelfth century the Church of Jerusalem followed the Byzantine Rite. By that time Antioch had also doubtless followed suit. There are, however, two small exceptions. In the island of Zakynthos and in Jerusalem itself the Greek Liturgy of St. James was used on one day each week—Monday on Zakynthos, the feast of St. James, the "brother of God". It is still so used at Zakynthos, and in 1888 Dionysios Latsas, Metropolitan of Zakynthos, published an edition of it for practical purposes. At Jerusalem even this remnant of the old use had disappeared. But in 1900 Lord Damianos, the Orthodox Patriarch of Jerusalem, requested, for one day in the year, not 23 October but 31 December. It was first celebrated again in 1900 (on 30 December as an exception) in the church of the Theological College of the Holy Cross, Lord Epiphanius, Archbishop of the River Jordan, celebrated, assisted by a number of concelebrating priests. The edition of Latsas was used in Jerusalem and the Chrysostomos-Moulos has been commissioned to prepare another and more correct edition (Echos d'Orient, IV, 247, 248).

It should be noted finally that the Maronites use the Syrian St. James with a very few slight modifications, and that the Nestorians, Byzantine, and Armenian liturgies may be derived from that of Antioch. (See also Liturgies, Eastern.)

Antiochus of Palestine, a monk of the seventh century, said to have been born near Anycya (Asia Minor), lived first as a solitary, then became a monk and Abbot of the famous laura or monastery of St. Saba near Jerusalem. He witnessed the Persian invasion of Palestine in 614, and the massacre of forty-four of his companions by the Bedouins. Five years after the conquest of the Holy Land by Chosroes, Anycya was taken (810) and destroyed by the Persians, which compelled the monks of the neighbouring monastery of Attaline to leave their home, and to move from place to place. As they were, naturally, unable to carry many books with them, the Abbot Eustathius asked his friend Antiochus to compile an abridgment of Holy Scripture for their use, and, also a short account of the martyrdom of the forty-four monks of St. Saba. In compliance with this request he wrote a work known as "Panpecta of Holy Scripture" (in 130 chapters, mistaken by the Latin translator for as many homilies). It is a collection of moral sentences, drawn from Scripture and from early ecclesiastical writers. He also wrote an "Exomologesis" or prayer in which he relates the miseries that had befallen Jerusalem since the Persian invasion, and begs the divine mercy to heal the Holy City's many ills (P. L., LXXIV, 1422-1450). These works seem to have been written in the period between the conquest of Palestine by Chosroes and its reconquest by the Emperor Heraclius (628). The introductory chapter of the "Panpecta" tells of the martyrdom referred to; its last chapter contains a list of heretics from Simon Magnus to the Monophysite followers of Severus of Antioch. The book is of special value for its extracts of works long no longer existing; it is a matter of interest, then, uncommon, in early Christian literature.

Antipater of Bostra (in Arabia) in the fifth century, one of the foremost Greek prelates of the Roman Orient: fourth bishop of the Galilean city of Bethsaida Umm el-Qaiwain, and pronounced opponent of Origen. Little is known of his life, save that he was held in high esteem by his contemporaries, civil and ecclesiastical. He is rated among the authoritative ecclesiastical writers by the Fathers of the Seventh General Council (787).

There has reached us, in the acts of this council, only a few fragments of his lengthy refutation of the "Apology for Origen" put together (c. 309) by Panphilus and Eusebius of Cesarea. The work of Antipater was looked on as a masterly composition, and, as late as 540 was ordered to be read in the churches of the East as an antidote to the spread of the Origenistic heresies (Cod. Const. Con. I. 381, 362). He also wrote a treatise against the Apollinarists, known only in brief fragments, and several homilies, two of which have reached us in their entirety. His memory is kept on 13 June. A work by him, "De scripturis" is quoted in the Cod. Const. Con. I. 1709-95; see also VALIÉRE in Dict. de théol. cath., 1, 1400; Acta SS., 13 June: VENALENE in Dict. of Christ. Biog., 1, 122; BARDENHEWER, Patr., 239. 240 (2nd ed. 1901), 498-503.

Antipatris, a titular see of Palestine, whose episcopal list is known from 449 to 451 (Gams, 452). It was built by Herod the Great in honour of his father Antipatris, and is mentioned in Acts, xxii, 31. Its ancient name and site, says Smith, "are still preserved by the modern Misr al-Aqabeh or as a considerable size, . . . about three hours north of Jaffa."

SMITH, Dict. of Greek and Roman Geogr., 1, 147; JACQUET, in VOG. Dict. de la Bible (1891), s. v.
Antiphon.—(From the Greek ἀντίφωνον, sounding against, responsive sound, singing opposite, alternate chant). From the Blessed Virgin Mary, "Alma Redemptoris Mater", "Salve Regina", "Ave Regina Colorum", and "Regina Coeli", although originally sung in connexion with psalms, from which they derive their name, have been sung as detached chants since the year 1239, when Pope Gregory IX ordered that one of them, according to the season, be sung at the end of the office. In a St. Gall MS. of the thirteenth century "Salve Regina Antiphon" is assigned to the office for the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin. A Paris MS. of the twelfth century assigns "Alma Redemptoris" and "Ave Regina" to the office for the feast of the Assumption. In a twelfth century antiphonary in St. Peter's Library at Rome is "Ave Maria gratia plena", the second Sunday of Easter. The melodies to these texts are among the most beautiful in the whole Gregorian repertory. As they were intended to be sung by the congregation, they are of simple and graphic construction. They breathe a deeply religious spirit and are an efficacious means by which to reveal to the singer the mystical contents of the texts which they musically interpret. While the four antiphons in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary and those occurring in the Mass have been prolific texts for figured settings both with the masters of classic polyphony and with modern writers, those preceding the Vespers psalms are almost universally sung to the Gregorian melodies.

Antiphon (ἀντίφωνον). In the GREEK CHURCH.—Socrates, the church historian (Hist. Eccl., VI, viii), says that St. Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, the third in succession from St. Peter in that see, once had a vision of angels singing the praises of the Trinity in alternating hymns, and remembering his vision he gave this form of singing to the Church of Antioch. From there it spread to all other Churches. In the Greek Church the antiphon was not only retained as a form of singing, but it was made an integral part of the Mass, and also a part of the liturgical morning and evening services. It is especially known as a portion of the Greek Mass, and the divisions of the antiphons are kept in the Greek and the third antiphons. The choir is singing alternately the verses of the antiphons the priest at the altar recites secretly the prayer of each antiphon. These antiphons come in the early part of the Mass, after the Great Synaphe, or litany, with which the Mass opens, and they change according to the feast of which it is celebrated. They usually consist of three verses and three responses, and each closes with "Glory be to the Father", etc., with the response sung to it, as well as to "As it is now", etc. The Greek Προεγγυμ (an Office book corresponding to the Roman Breviary) gives the different antiphons for the various feasts. The Greek versions of the verses and responses are usually the same. Where there are no special antiphons appointed for the Sunday, the Greek Orthodox churches in Russia and Greece usually sing Psalm cxi for the first antiphon, Psalm clxv for the second antiphon (which two are often called the "Triplets", as they are different from the Psalm for the third antiphon, singing the verses alternately instead of the verses and responses. In the Greek Catholic churches of Austria, Hungary, Italy, and the United States, where there are no special antiphons for the day, they sing Psalm lxv for the first antiphon, to each verse of which they add the words "O Mother of God, save us"; Psalm lxvi for the second antiphon, to each verse of which is added the words "O Son of God, risen from the dead, save us who sing to thee, Alleluia", and Psalm xcv for the third antiphon with the same antiphonal responses. If it be a weekday, however, the response to the second antiphon usually is: "By the prayers of the saints, O Saviour, save us", while the response to the third antiphon is, "O Son of God, who art wonderful in thy Saints save us who sing to Thee, Alleluia". This prayer is, in fact, the first of a recited antiphon, the second of St. Chrysostom's. Besides the antiphons of the Mass there are also the antiphons of Vespers commonly called the kalhemata, or psalms sung while seated, and the antiphons of matins called the anabathmi, or prayers of degrees, as well as certain chants used on Holy Thursday, all of which are sung antiphonally. These latter are not usually known as antiphons, but are generally called by their special names.

Andrew J. Shipman.

Antiphon, IN GREEK LITURGY.—The Greek Liturgy uses antiphons, not only in the Office, but also in the Mass, at Vespers, and at all the canonical Hours. Nor is this all; antiphons have their prescribed place in almost every liturgical function. The essence of antiphony prevailed consistently in the alternation set up between the soloists and the choir in the rendering of a psalm. About the fourth century, alternate singing which up to that time had been in use only in secular gatherings, found its way into meetings for liturgical worship. This does not, however, imply that the antiphonal chanting of psalms was a novelty in the fourth century, since it was used in the Synagogue, and it is not at all likely that the Church would have waited so long before assimilating a practice highly conducive to the due order of public prayer.

The real novelty consisted in the introduction of a more ornate melody into antiphonal psalmody. The soloists chanted the text of the alternation set up, in the stated intervals the people broke into upon them with a refrain. The Apostolic Constitutions speak of a custom, which, Eusebius tells us, was in use in his time. It had come to be no longer a matter of an interjected refrain, foreign to the text of the psalm, or linked onto each verse, but of a very short ending, sometimes a mere syllable, which the whole people chanted, drowning the voices of the soloists and finishing the word or phrase which they had left unfinished. This latter method seems to have been general in Syria, and had been used by the Jews at an earlier period. The refrain, a kind of exclamation for the text, recurring at stated intervals consisted either of one word, or of two or three, though sometimes of a whole verse or troparium. This antiphonal method was also in use among the Jews, and is easily recognizable in the case of certain psalms. It was this method which the Church took as her own. St. Athanasius, speaking of the place of the Alleluia (q. v.), in the psalms, calls it a "restrain" or a "response." The Alleluia is, as a matter of fact, the interjectional refrain of most frequent occurrence. It is referred to by Tertullian, from whose time onward this exclamation retains its place in ecclesiastical chant. In the Syrian and Eastern Churches of the fourth century its role is a prominent one.

The formula used as a refrain varied in length, as has been already stated, but the general tendency was probably towards brevity. A "Canzon of the Antiphons", published by Cardinal Pitra, includes some very concise formulas, among which the Alleluia often recurs. The others are, as a rule, drawn from the first verse of their respective psalms, while similar ones are interjected between the verses of the Scripture canticles. These endings may be compared with those of Gregorian plainsong: "Miserere nobis," "Exaudi nos, Domine," "Te deum, Domine nostrum," etc. Even when the longer refrain took the place of the exclamation, it did not exceed at the most, a phrase of some fifteen words, St. Athanasius tells us that the custom was due to a desire to allow the people a share in the liturgy, while sparing them the necessity of leaving their hearts, which, indeed, the mass of them would have been unable to do. A great many texts might be quoted in the Greek world alone, all showing that the reader or singer (cantor) recited the whole psalm, but that the response of the crowd broke in upon the recitation at regular intervals. St. John Chrysostom, St. Gregory of Nyssa, and Calixtus, all testify to this custom. St. Basil, in his letter to the faithful of Neo-Caesarea, writes as follows: "Leaving to one the duty of intoning the melody, the others answer him." The same custom prevailed at Constantinople in 536 for the singing of the Trisagion. Nor shall we be surprised if, in the same instance, i.e., the hymn of St. Methodius in his "Banquet of the Ten Virgins", composed prior to the year 511. Each alphabetical strophe sung by the bridesmaid, Thecla, is followed by a uniform refrain, rendered by the whole choir of virgins.

The antiphonal system is, therefore, found to be characterized by the interjection of a refrain, or of a simple exclamation. This system did not alter the customary method, but merely added a new and accessory element to it. The structure of the antiphon thus consists of hymn-like strophes, interspersed with verses of Scripture, whereas the response is drawn from the psalm itself. In the psalmus responsorius, moreover, all present take up the refrain, while in the case of the antiphon, the hymn-like strophes are rendered alternately by the choir. The custom of calling alternate psalmody antiphonal is probably due to this fact. The hymn-like strophes in these responsoria must be considered as material for elaboration, so that, little by little, the verses of the psalms had to give place to the additional strophes. There exist examples of psalms or groups of psalms reduced in this way to three or four verses, and sometimes, even to a single verse.

H. Leclercq.

Antiphonary (Lat. antiphonarium, antiphonarius, antiphonarius liber, antiphonale; Gr. ἀντιφωνον, antiphon, antiphone, anthem), one of the present liturgical books intended for use in the Church (i.e. in the liturgical choir), and originally characterized, as its name implies, by the assigning of it a prominent part in the antiphons used in various parts of the Roman Liturgy. It thus included generically the antiphons and antiphonal chants sung by cantor, congregation, and choir at Mass (antiphonarium Missarum, or graduale) and at the canonical Hours (antiphonarium officii); but now it refers only to the sung portions of the Divine Office or Breviary. The antiphoner thus used by the Church is an antiphonary (still in reputable use) and antiphoner (considered obsolete by some English lexicographers, but still sometimes used in current literature). In the "Prioresses Tale" of Chaucer it occurs in the form "antiphonere":

He Alma Redemptoris herde synghe
As children lerned hire antiphoner.

The word Antiphonary had in the earlier Middle Ages sometimes a more general, sometimes a more restricted meaning. In its present meaning it has also been variously and insufficiently defined as a "Collection of antiphons in the notation of Plain Chant", and as a liturgical book containing the antiphons "and other chants". In its present complete form it contains, in plain-chant notation, the music of all the sung portions of the Roman Breviary immediately preceding the place where the sections of the Hours of the Divine Office, or Canonical Hours. While in the Missal, however, the introits, graduation, sequences, offertories, communions, as well as the texts of the Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei are both read by the celebrant and sung by the choir, their notation is not given; only the antiphons, or chants, of the celebrant and the verses of the responses, are indicated by the place in the notation of the Gloria, the Credo, the chants of the various Prefaces, the two forms of the Pater Noeter, the various forms of the Ite, or Benedictus, the Blessing of the Font, etc.). The omitted chants (styled concertus), which are to be sung by the choir, are contained in a supplementary volume called Graduale only. The Graduale itself was placed immediately after the sections of the Missal, and this explains the term "Graduale". In like manner, the Roman Breviary, all of which, practically, is meant for singing in the choir, contains no music; and the "Antiphonarium" performs for it a service similar to that of the Liber Gradualis for the Missal. Just as the Liber Gradualis and the Antiphonarium are, for the sake of convenience, separated from the Missal and Breviary respectively, so, for the same reason, still further subdivisions have been made of each. Into those of the "Graduale" we need not enter. The "Antiphonarium" has been issued in a compendious form for the large number of churches in which the Canon laws of the Divine Offices are sung only on Sundays and Festivals. This Antiphonarium Romanum compendiose redactum ex editionibus typicis etc., includes, however, the chants for the Masses of Christmas, the triduum of Holy Week, and other desired Offices, and is issued in a single volume. Another separate volume is the "Vesperale", which contains also the Office of Compline; and of the "Vesperal" a further compendium has been issued, entitled Epitome ex Vesperali Romano. All the above volumes are in the Ratisbon edition. Associated somewhat in scope with the Antiphonarium is the "Directorium Chori", which has been described as furnishing the ground plan for the antiphonary, inasmuch as it gives or indicates all the music of the chants (except the responsories after the Lessons), the tones of the psalms, the brief responsories, the "Venite Exsultet", the "Sanctus" and "Benedictus", the text of all the psalms, the full melody of the hymns, and the new feasts were added to the "official edition" of the "Directorium" in 1888.

The word Antiphonary does not therefore clearly describe the contents of the volume or volumes thus entitled, in which, are found many chants not in the antiphon (technically so called), such as hymns, responsories, verses, and responses, psalms, the "Te Deum", the "Venite Adoremus", and so forth. The expression "antiphonal chant" would, however, comprise all these different kinds of texts and chants, since they are so constructed as to be sung alternately by the two divisions of the liturgical choir; and in this sense the word Antiphonary would be sufficiently inclusive in its implication. On the other hand, the corresponding volume for the chants of the Mass, namely the "Graduale", or Liber Gradualis, includes many other kinds of liturgical texts and chants in addition to the responsories, such as introits, tralals, offertories, communions, as well as the fixed texts of the "Ordinarium Missæ", or "Kyrie". It may be said, then, that these two books receive the names Antiphonarium and Graduale from the technical name of the most important chants included in them. Fundamentally and the chants which are sung in the Mass or of the Divine Office, are sung antiphonally, and might, with etymological propriety, be comprised in the one general musical title of Antiphonary.

antiphony and the "Graduale" have received the general title of "Gregorian Chant," in honour of St. Gregory the Great (590-604), to whom a widespread, very ancient, and most trustworthy tradition, supported by excellent internal and external evidence, ascribes the great work of revising and collecting into one unifying code the various texts and chants of the liturgy. Doubtless the ancient musical setting of the liturgy contained only those texts which were appointed for the celebrant, and did not include the texts which were to be chanted by the cantor and choir; and the "Antiphonarium Missae" supplied the omitted texts for the choir as well as the chants in which the texts were sung. Gregory's antiphony is found in the enduring stamp it impressed on the Roman liturgy. Other popes had, a medieval writer assures us, given attention to the chants; and he specifies St. Damasus, St. Leo, St. Gelasius, St. Symmachus, St. John I, and Boniface II. It is true, also, that the chants used at Milan were styled, in honour of St. Ambrose (called "the "Father of Church Song"), the Ambrosian Chant. But it is not known whether any collection of the chants had been made before that of St. Gregory, concerning which his ninth-century biographer, John the Deacon, wrote: Antiphonarium Gregorii episcopi sanctissimi... The antiphons mentioned by the biographer has not as yet been found. What was its character? What is meant by canto? In the century in which John the Deacon wrote his life of the Saint, a canto meant the literary feat of constructing a coherent poem out of scattered excerpts from an ancient author, in such wise, for example, as to make the verses of Virgil sing the mystery of the Epiphany. The work, then, of St. Gregory was a musical canto, a compilation (canto... compltavil) of pre-existing material into a coherent and well-ordered whole. This does not necessarily imply that the musical centonization of the melodies was the special and original work of the Saint, as the practice of constructing new melodies from separate portions of older ones had already been in vogue two or three centuries earlier than his day. But it is clear that the canto was one of melodies as well as of texts. In answer it might indeed be said that in the earliest ages of the Church the chants must have been so very simple in form that they could easily be committed to memory; and that most of the subsequently developed antiphonal melodies could be reduced to a much smaller number of types, or typical melodies, and could thus also be learned and yet it is clear that the developed melodies of St. Gregory's time had never possessed a musical notation, had never been committed to writing. What made his antiphony so very useful to chancers (as John the Deacon esteemed it) was probably his careful presentation of a revised text with a revised melody, written either in the characters used by the ancient authors (as set down in Boethius) or in neumatic notation. We know that St. Augustine, sent to England by the great Pope, carried with him a copy of the precious antiphony, and founded at Canterbury a flourishing school of singing. That this antiphony contained a collection of liturgies sung in the Second Council of Cloveshoo (747) directing that the celebration of the feasts of Our Lord should, in respect to baptism, Masses, and music (in cantilenæ modo) follow the method of the book "which we received from the Roman Church". That this book was the antiphonary is clear from the testimony of Egbert, Bishop of York (732-766), who in his "De Institutione Catholica" speaks of the "Antiphonarium" and "Missale" which the "blessed Gregory... sent to us by our teacher, Blessed Augustine".

It will be impossible to trace here the progress of the Gregorian antiphony throughout Europe, which resulted finally in the fact that the liturgy of Western Europe, with a few exceptions, finds itself based fundamentally on the work of St. Gregory, whose labours comprised not merely the sacred and the "Antiphonarium Missae", but also the Order. It may be said that the next highly important step in the history of the antiphony was its introduction into some dioceses of France where the liturgy had been Gallican, with ceremonies related to those of Milan and with chants developed by newer melodies. From the year 754 may be dated the change in favour of the Roman liturgy. The introduction of the Roman antiphonary on his return from an embassy to Rome, introduced the Roman liturgy into his diocese and founded the Chant School of Metz. Subsequently, under Charlemagne, French monks went to Rome to study the Gregorian tradition there, and some Roman teachers visited France. The interesting story of Ekkehard concerning Petrus and Romanus is not now credited, Romanus being considered a mythical personage; but a certain Petrus, according to Notker, was sent to Rome by Charlemagne, and finally, at St. Gall, trained the monks in the Roman style. Besides Metz and St. Gall, other important schools of chant were founded at Rome and at Schauenburg. In the course of time new melodies were added, at first characterized by the simplicity of the old tradition, but gradually becoming more free in extended intervals. With respect to German manuscripts, the earliest are found in a style of neumatic notation different from that of St. Gall, while the St. Gall manuscripts are derived not directly from the Italian but from the Irish-Anglo-Saxon. It is probable that before the tenth and eleventh centuries (at which period the St. Gall notation began to triumph in the German churches) the Irish and English missions brought with them the notation of the English antiphonary. It would take too much space to record here the multiplication of antiphonaries and their gradual deterioration, both in text and in chant, from the Roman standard. The school of Metz began the process early. Commissioned by Louis the Pious to compile a "Graduale" and antiphonary, Amalarius, a priest of Metz, found the Roman antiphony in the monastery of Corbie, and placed in his own compilation an M when he followed the Metz antiphony, R when he followed the Roman, and an I C (asking Indulgence and Charity) when he followed his own ideas. His changes in the "Graduale" were only creditable. Part of the revision which, together with Elisagarius, he made in the responsories as against the Roman method, were finally adopted in the Roman antiphony. In the twelfth century the commission established by St. Bernard to revise the antiphonaries of Citeaux criticized with undue severity the work of Amalarius and Elisagarius and withal produced a faulty antiphony for the Cistercian Order. The multiplication of antiphonaries, the differences in style of notation, the variations in melody and occasionally in text, need not be further described here. In France, especially, the multiplicity of liturgical books does not make it clear that when Dom Guéranger, in the middle of the last century, started the work of introducing the Roman liturgy into that country, sixty out of eighty dioceses had their own local breviaries. Of the recoursed to medieval manuscripts, the reproduction of various antiphonaries and grinals by the Mediaeval Music Society, and especially by Dom Mocquereau in the "Paleographie Musicale", founded eighteen years ago (which has already given phototypic reproductions of antiphonaries of Einsiedeln, of St. Gall, of Hartker, of Montpellier, of the twelfth-

H. T. HENRY.

Antiphony, Gregorian.—It is no longer possible to reconstruct completely a primitive Christian antiphony; by a careful study of the text, however, we can establish the fact of its existence at a remote date. The extant historical texts permit us to infer that there have been, from the very earliest Christian times, groups and series, consisting of certain combinations of antiphons. The original collection of melodies, however, grew up rather as the result of changes and combinations than of additions in the strict sense. A first and very ancient distinction seems to be that drawn between “idiomelodic” antiphon, or those fitted with special melodies, and “acalculated” antiphonums, adapted, by means of certain variations, to a common type of melody more or less frequently recurrent in the collection.

The list of melodies was, therefore, limited; indeed, at the early period in question, oral tradition may well have sufficed to hand down a certain number of musical formulas. When, later on, the ecclesiastical chants had been co-ordinated, it was found necessary to provide them with a notation. We learn, from several texts, that from the fourth century onward the singers commonly used either a book or a page bearing the notation of the liturgical passage which they were to sing, not the words, however, about that time they had only the words before them, without the melody. The oldest trace of this discipline is to be found in an Egyptian papyrus belonging to the collection of the Archdiocese of Rainier. It is ten inches wide by four inches long (26 cm. x 11 cm.); the handwriting points to about the year 300. On examination, the papyrus proves to have been long in use, the fingers of the singers having made holes where they held it. There is no great difficulty in reading it; the language used is the common Greek. We give the restored text and the translation:

"'O γεννήτος τω Βαθύλατρω καταναλωτς τω Ναζαρητ" καταγεροθεοτυθεν εν τη Γαλατεία, οδηγευς εν εις τω οίκον τω σωστή τον οποίον, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργάνων, το άνευ και εσχατον εκείνων οργά

"—He was born in Bethléem, where he was reared at Nazareth, and who lived in Galilee. We beheld a portent out of heaven. The shepherds who kept watch wondered at sight of the star. Falling on their knees, they said: Glory be to The Father, alleluia; Glory be to The Son and to The Holy Spirit, Alleluia, Alleluia, Alleluia."

"Tybi the 5th (26 Dec.). Great is Saint John the Baptist, who preached penance in the whole world, for remission of our sins."

These antiphons were, it is probably, connected with the Feast of the Mass, the longer one, for the Feast of the Epiphany, which carried with it the commemoration of the baptism of Christ by St. John the Baptist, was divided into three parts, serving the purpose, successively, of refrains to sections of psalms. The shorter one was a simple acrostic and was repeated after each verse.

The document just transcribed is now the sole contemporary manuscript of the ancient liturgy. For a somewhat less remote period we possess, fortunately, one of very different importance, namely, the antiphony known as the Gregorian.

The attribution to Pope Gregory I (580–604) of an official codification of the collection of antiphons occurring in the Divine Office has at frequent intervals, exercised the wit of the learned. At the end of the ninth century John the Deacon (d. c. 882) ascribed to Gregory I the compilation of the books of music used by the schola cantorum established at his pontificate. The statement, however, was, left room for discussion. Goussainville was the first to express (1885) a doubt as to the authenticity of the so-called antiphory of the Gregorian antiphonary. He was followed by Ellies du Pin, by Dom Denys de Sainte Marie, and by Cassinir Oudin, who added nothing noteworthy to the arguments of Goussainville. In 1729, J. Georges d’Eckhart suggested Pope Gregory II (715–731) as the author of a work which tradition had for centuries ascribed to Gregory I; his arguments were more or less trivial. In 1749, Dominick Georgi took up the defence of the traditional opinion; among other arguments he brought forward a text which he asserted to be the antiphon at issue but which seems to have been postulated. This was a text of Egbert of York which Georgi transferred to the end of his book, in the form of a note, so that it was neither seen nor made use of. When, three years later, Vezzioli again took up the question, he also overlooked this particular text, and voluntarily deprived himself of an important argument in favour of the authorship of Gregory I. In 1772 Gallicioli followed in the footsteps of Vezzioli, but renewed the latter’s concessions to the adversaries of Gregory I, nor did he make any secret of his surprise at the silence of Goussainville, Isaac de Seville, and Bede, concerning the liturgical antiphonary. Being only partially convinced, he refrained from any conclusion, and left the matter undecided.

It was reopened by Berget in 1774, and by Zaccaria in 1781, the latter of whom at last hit upon the text of Egbert. Between 1781 and 1890 no one seems to have discussed, critically, the attribution of the antiphonary to any particular pope. Indeed, the question was supposed to have been settled by the discovery of the antiphonary itself, which was said to be none other than the St. Gall MS. 359 of the tenth or ninth century, containing an antiphonary between pages 24 and 158. This illusion passed through various phases from 1837 to 1848, and Danjou, in his turn, discovered the Gregorian antiphonary in a Montpellier manuscript of the tenth or eleventh century. In 1851 the Jesuit Lambillette published a facsimile of the St. Gall manuscript, but the Gregorian question made no real progress.

The discussion concerning the antiphony was suddenly revived, in 1890, by a public lecture delivered before the Belgian Academy on 27 October, 1890, by Monsieur F. A. Gevaert. The argument of the famous savant has been thus summarized by Dom Morin: "The productive period of church musical art extends from the pontificate of St. Celestine (422–432) to about the year 700, and is divided into two epochs. That of simple chant, the latest development of Graeco-Roman music, includes the last years of the Western Empire and the whole duration of the Gothic kingdom (425–568). The second, that of church music in accordance with a uniform melodic style, in harmony with the tendencies and tastes of the Byzantine influence. Finally, it was most probably the Syrian, Gregory III (731–741), the last but one of the Greek popes, who co-ordinated and united all the chants of the Mass in a collection similar to that which his predecessor, Agatho, had caused to be compiled for the anthems of the Day-Hours. As to the first Gregory, no evidence prior to that of John the Deacon alludes to the part ascribed to him. But there is evidence for the popes of Greek origin who followed him, and in the eighth and ninth centuries, Agatho and Leo II. Indeed, in respect of the chant of the Church, it is very probable that the great pope Agatho took no immediate interest in this part of divine worship; much less do the antiphonas and the sacramentary which bear his name agree in any way with the ecclesiastical calendar of St. Gregory’s time; if they are as all rightly called Gregorian, it must be in reference either to Gregory II (715–731) or, more probably, to his successor, Gregory III, who died in 741."

This theory called forth many refutations. Dom G. Morin set himself to prove that the traditional attribution was correct, in a book published in 1896, and in a sermon for the second fast of the fourth month, Egbert formulates the composition of both the antiphonary and the sacramentary to St. Gregory. He set out with the conversion of England: "noster didascalus beatus Gregorius". At a somewhat earlier period, Aldhelm of Sherburne (d. 709) also bore witness to St. Gregory’s authorship of the sacramentary, but said nothing concerning the antiphony. In an essay Dom Morin reviewed critically all the texts relating to the antiphonary known as Gregorian. Though mostly of a late date, they owe to their mutual agreement an appreciable historical value. There are, however, other and more ancient texts, which, though more recent, contain the controversy. Dom Morin’s text seems to end with Egbert, between 725 and 742. This silence is, of course, one of the least one hundred and ten years. This silence might have been supposed. In the very year (732) that Egbert was raised to the See of York another prelate, Acca of Hexham, was forced to resign the office which he had held since 709. Beds appears to have been one of Egbert's friends from that time onward, which enables him to inform us (H. E. V, 20) that Acca had learned the ecclesiastical chant from a certain Maban, who had acquired it, himself, while living in Kent, from the successors of the disciples of the Blessed Pope Gregory. Acca had, in fact, spent twelve years in Maban's school. If we take into account these twelve years, it follows that the first lessons given by Maban go back to the year 720, at which date Maban had had time to be trained by the successors of the disciples of Pope Gregory. Gregory II became pope in 715; a space of five years is, evidently, not easy to reconcile with the plain meaning of what Bede says. But it is true that we cannot stretch, that is to say, be understood thus: Maban was taught in Kent, between 715 and 720, by pupils trained on the spot by Roman singers sent by Gregory II. But, apart from the fact that no such mission has been ascribed to Gregory II, the words of Bede are too plain to permit this evasion of the difficulty. Bede in fact tells us that the chant taught by Maban (about 720) was simply a reform of the same chant which had undergone certain changes by long use. It is evidently impossible, then, to explain how, between 715 and 720, Maban could instruct Acca in a chant which had been long in use, and which had had so far away from new a character as the reform which, if its promoter were Gregory II, it dated, at the earliest, from five years previous. It seems, therefore, as though these words of Bede were equivalent to an early Anglo-Saxon ascription of the ecclesiastical chant to Pope Gregory II.

Speaking of Putta, Bishop of Rochester (666-676), the same historian says (H. E. IV, 2): "He was above all things skilful in the art of singing in church according to the Roman fashion, which he had learned from the disciples of the Blessed Pope Gregory". There can be no doubt in this case, nor can anyone but Gregory I be meant. Thus the gap between St. Gregory and Egbert (604-732) becomes greatly lessened, almost, indeed, by a half, and Bede's silence can no longer be appealed to in connexion with the work of St. Gregory. Evidence for his authorship of the ecclesiastical chant is met with at a period so near Gregory's own time that the hypothesis is tenable. Does it follow that St. Gregory was, as John the Deacon says, the compiler of the antiphonary? There are, at least, good reasons for thinking so. One last argument may be cited on his behalf. The series of antiphons in the antiphonary, intended to be sung at the Communion during the Masses for the majority of the days of the week, shows that it is based on the Book of Psalms. Their order reveals the idea that governed the choice of them. With certain exceptions, to be referred to presently, the antiphons follow one another in the numerical order of the Psalms from which they are drawn. The series thus obtained begins on Ash Wednesday and ends on Friday in Passion Week, forming a regular succession of Psalms from I to XXVI, except for the interjections caused (1) by intercalations and (2) by lacunae.

These intercalations affect (1) the five Sundays, (2) the six Thursdays, (3) the Saturday following Ash Wednesday, and the first Sunday of the Games of the Sundays which are explained by the adoption of a ferial, or week-day, sequence; that of the Thursdays by the simple observation that the Thursdays were not included in the liturgical system for Lent at the period when Psalms I to xxvi were divided between the other days of the week. From the "Libri Pontificum" it is Gregory II who introduced the Thursday of each week into the liturgical system of Lenten Masses. Now it proves to be these very Thursdays which interrupt the order that the remaining days of the week would otherwise show.

No more precise and decisive accumulation of proof could possibly be wished for. We thus grasp the chronological element at the moment of its interposition into the very heart of the antiphonary. Gregory II—therefore still less Gregory III—is not the original author of the compilation whereon he has left his mark by misunderstanding the principle which governed the last original compilation known as the antiphonary is therefore not due to Gregory II, nor is it from him that it has become known as the Gregorian antiphonary. Its existence prior to his time is proved by the intercalation of the Thursdays which interrupt the continuity of an harmonious arrangement, to which Gregory II may rather have wished to respect it as a work thenceforward irreformable, as a traditional deposit which he refused to disturb and re-order. It is not easy to say, or even to convey an idea of, what this primitive edition of the antiphonary may have contained; but there can be no doubt that it contained in their actual order the Lenten communion-antiphons, and is certainly anterior to Gregory III and to Gregory II. This fact alone proves the existence of an antiphonial collection, known as the Gregorian antiphonary, prior to the time of Pope Gregory II.

Antipodes.—Speculations concerning the rotundity of the earth and the possible existence of human beings with their feet turned towards ours" were of interest to the Fathers of the Early Church only in so far as they seemed to encroach upon the fundamental Christian dogma of the unity of the human race, and the consequent universality of original sin and redemption. This is clearly seen from the following passage of St. Augustine (De Civitate Dei, xvi, 9): "As to the fable that there are Antipodes, he says: men cannot be so blind as not to see that the sun rises when it sets on us, men who walk with their feet opposite ours, there is no reason for believing it. Those who affirm it do not claim to possess any actual information; they merely conjecture that, since the earth is suspended within the universe, and that the sun is on one side of it as on the other, therefore the part which is beneath cannot be void of human inhabitants. They fail to notice that, even should it be believed or demonstrated that the world is round or spherical in form, it does not follow that the part of the earth opposite to us is not completely covered with water, or that any conjectured dry land there should be inhabited by men. For Scripture, which confirms the truth of its historical statements by the accomplishment of its prophecies, teaches no falsehood; and it is too absurd to say that some men might have set sail from this side and, travelling from week to week of years, have found there a race of human beings descended from that one first man." This opinion of St. Augustine was commonly held until the progress of science, whilst confirming his main contention that the human race is one, dissipated the scruples arising from a defective knowledge of geography. A singular exception occurs to us in the 18th century. From a letter of Pope St. Zachary (I May, 748), addressed to St. Boniface, we learn that the great Apostle of Germany had invoked the papal censure upon a certain missionary among the Bavarians.
named Vergilius, generally supposed to be identical with the renowned Fergusil, an Irishman, and later Archbishop of Salzburg. Among other alleged misdeeds and errors was numbered that of holding "that beneath the earth there was another world and other men, another sun and another sky." In reply, the Pope directs St. Boniface to convocate a council and, "if it be made clear" that Vergilius adheres to this "perverse teaching, contrary to the Lord and to his own soul," to "expel him from the Church, deprived of his priestly dignity." This is the only information that we possess regarding an incident which is mentioned to have occurred largely in the imaginary warfare between theology and science. That Vergilius was ever really tried, condemned, or forced to retract, is an assumption without any foundation in history. On the contrary, if he was in fact the future Archbishop of Salzburg, it is more natural to conclude that he succeeded in convincing his consors that by "other men" he did not understand a race of human beings not descended from Adam and redeemed by the Lord; for it is patent that this was the feature of his teaching which appeared to the Pope to be "perverse" and "contrary to the Lord." Instead of narrow censure, the Church and his theology have our highest esteem for having, throughout the ages, firmly upheld the important doctrine of the universal brotherhood of the human race. At the same time we recognize that the case of the Irish monk who suffered the penalty of being several centuries in advance of his age remains on the page of history, like the parallel case of Galileo, as a solemn admonition against a hasty resort to ecclesiastical censures. Antivari, The Archdiocese of (Antibarum), so called from its position opposite to Bari in Italy, the Catholic archepiscopal see of Montenegro. By the treaty of Berlin (1879) this ancient seaport of Albania was adjudged to the little inland principality of the Black Mountain and shortly after (1886) the Catholic Archdiocese was declared independent and freed from the influence of its suffragans Alessio, Pulati, Belgrade, Zeta, and Savina, henceforth attached to Scutari. The See of Antivari claims to date from the fifth century; it was certainly an episcopal see in the ninth and was refounded in the course of the twelfth century. In the early Middle Ages Antivari remained subject to the Greek emperors. For it was one of the numerous little Dalmatian republics that chose their own laws and rulers, and finally fell under the sway of the Serb kings. Towards the beginning of the thirteenth century it sought union with Venice, but fifty years later became subject to Lewis of Hungary, who lost it, in turn, to the Balza princes of Teuta, and with these it returned eventually to Venice (1450). For almost a century Antivari enjoyed the blessings of peace under Venetian dominion, and her commerce flourished to the highest degree, but in 1538, while Sultan Selim II was striving against the Venetians in Dalmatia, the pasha of Hersek besieged the city and compelled it to surrender, and he was forced to retire, but in 1571 through the treachery of its governor, Donato, the town fell into the hands of the Turks. The conditions of capitulation were honourable, but the Turks ceased to respect them, one half of the citizens went into voluntary exile in order to preserve their faith, while the other half embraced Islam. John VIII, Archbishop of Antivari, who had vainly tried to make Donato offer resistance to the Turks, was taken prisoner and handed over to Ali-Pasha, commander of the fleet. Ali exhibited him everywhere dressed in his pontifical vestments and after the battle of Lepanto (7 Oct., 1571). In 1649 Foscolo, governor of Dalmatia for the Venetian Republic, was persuaded by the Archbishop of Antivari and a deputation of Christians to come to their aid. His movements were betrayed to the pasha of Scutari, who surprised his troops before they could re-embark, and massacred a great number. Once more, in 1717, the Venetian governor of Dalmatia tried to deliver Antivari, but the attempt was again fruitless. At last, in 1875, Prince Nicolai of Montenegro victoriously entered the ancient town and incorporated it with Montenegro. The city has a population of about 27,000 of whom 8,769 are Moslems. It is built on a lofty precipitous site and offers now few traces of its ancient grandeur; the streets are narrow, of a Turkish aspect, and the houses miserable. Nevertheless thirty monasteries, it is said, were once found within its walls. The old castle is a ruin, but the Cathedral of St. George, formerly transformed into a mosque, is well preserved. A few miles outside Antivari, near Cape Volinizza, is the Virgin's Rock, theme of a national poem, whence in the time of Sultan Selim (1524-73) a young girl threw herself into the sea rather than fall into the hands of the Turks. The population of Montenegro (1886) is about 600,000, with some 6,789 Catholics. There are 27 churches and chapels, 12 secular priests, and 9 religious. Until the close of the Russo-Turkish War (1878) the Catholics of Montenegro were subject to the Vicar-Apostolic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. A correspondent between the Holy See and the See of Montenegro (18 Aug., 1886) now regulates the status of the Catholics in the principality. By its terms the exercise of the Catholic religion is declared free; the archbishop is chosen without interference of the state, but must be an acceptable choice (persona grata); the see is declared immediately subject to the Pope, and the archbishop is to receive the title of "Illustissimo Monsignore" and to enjoy a yearly pension of 5,000 francs. The government also pledges itself to keep yearly at its expense one student in the Propaganda College at Rome, whence they have come for a long time the secular priests of this territory. Moreover, at the request of the Prince of Montenegro, the right to the Old-Slavonic Liturgy was confirmed by the Holy See (originally conceded by Innocent IV. in 1246, and renewed by Gregory XV.) from a treasurier, into which the Roman Liturgy translated into Old-Slavonic, and in this shape in use among eighty or a hundred thousand Catholic Slavs of Trieste, Gorizia, Spalato, Sebenico, and other Dalmatian centres. Until lately it was in the Cyrillic alphabet, but since 1890, at the request of the archbishop, the Holy See has permitted the use of the Glagolitic alphabet, to avoid similarity of usage with their schismatic neighbours. (See C Y R I L A N D M E T H O D I U S.)

A copy of the new missal, printed at the Propaganda press in Rome (Ordo et Canon Missae Slavice, 1887) was presented by Leo XIII in 1893 to the Prince of Montenegro, a decree of the Congregation of the Consistory (7 March, 1902) Antivari is declared the primatial see of Dalmatia, an honour which it enjoyed as early as the twelfth century. The present bishop is Monsignor Simon Milinovic, a Franciscan, elected 8 Oct., 1896. (P I A R L E T T, Hl. Saec. Antofagasta, The Vicariate Apostolic of, Chile, dependent on the Sacred Congregation of Ecclesiastical Affairs. By the treaty of 24 November, 1884 between Chile and Bolivia, the part of the province of Antofagasta which belonged to Bolivia was ceded to Chile. A new diocese was accordingly created in 1885 by which the见 of Antofagasta contained 18,253. The area of the vicariate in square miles is 46,597. There are six parishes under the jurisdiction of the vicar-apostolic: Nuestra Señora del Carmen, Tocopilla, Santa Maria Magdalena de Colbas, San José de Antofagasta, San Felipe de Neri de Carahue, San Roque de Conoqui, and San Pedro de Atacama. The ecclesiastical vicariate of Antofagasta and that of Tarapacá depend directly on the Holy See, but appeals from their vicars should come to the Archbishopric of Santiago.

Antoine, Paul Gabriel, a French theologian, b. at Lunéville, 10 January, 1678; d. at Pont-à-Mousson, 22 January, 1745. At the age of fifteen he applied for admission into the Society of Jesus, and was received 9 October, 1693. On the completion of his studies he taught "humanities" for several years, first at Pont-à-Mousson, and then at Colmar. Returning to the former city, he occupied the chair of philosophy, and later that of theology. On the death of his "Dogmatic Theology" appearing in 1723, and three years later his "Moral Theology" in three volumes. He was afterwards rector of the College of Pont-à-Mousson, where he died in his sixty-fifth year. His "Theologia universa, speculativa et dogmatica", embracing the whole field of scholastic inquiry met with an enthusiastic reception, and has long since stamped the author as among the first theologians of the age. It went through nine editions during his life, and ten after his death. It is remarkable for its clearness and solidity. Still more flattering was the reception accorded the Theologia morale universa. It was first published in Paris in 1726, in duplicate volumes. It has since gone through sixty editions in different countries. The Roman edition of 1747, published by Philip Carbognano, O.M., contained several additions to the original; among them, chapters on Condemned Propositions, Reserved Decrees of Recent Councils, and the Deeds of Rome. "Moral Theology" was so highly esteemed by Benedict XIV that he prescribed its use by the students of the College of Propaganda, and it was likewise received by many of the bishops throughout France and Italy. Yet, despite the fact that it is remarkable for three qualities seldom found united, viz. clearness, fulness, and energy, it is no longer a text-book at the present day. For, in the opinion of the learned Gury, Antoine inclines too much towards the side of severity, a judgment fully confirmed by St. Alphonsus Ligouri (Homo Ap., xvi, 108). Besides his theological works, Antoine published also several ascetical and devotional treatises.

Anton Ulrich, Duke of Brunswick—Lüneburg-Wolfenbüttel, a convert to the Catholic faith, b. 4 October, 1633; d. 27 March, 1714. In 1653, with his brother August, Rudolph, he became co-regent of the dukedom, and on the latter's death (1704) succeeded to the throne. He was a very gifted and well educated man, the most scholarly prince of his time, and, in the history of German literature, ranks as pioneer in the department of historical romance. He was also an accomplished draughtsman and a writer. His bent, however, was toward the study of the Fathers, and the points of variance between Catholics and Lutherans. He often conversed on such subjects with theologians of both sides, among them the Hildesheim canon, Rudolph May, and Amadeus Hamilton, a Theatine. He entered the Church secretly 10 January, 1710, but soon, in deference to the advice of Clement XI, made public his conversion in the presence of the Archbishop of Mainz. While he safeguarded officially the actual ecclesiastical and political conditions in his duchy, he devoted himself earnestly to the interests of Catholicism. Among other works, he published, in Latin and German, a learned apology for his conversion entitled "Fifty Motives for preferring the Catholic religion to all others". It was soon suppressed, and is therefore a very rare book; an Italian translation of it was sent to Clement XI. The Duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel in 1714 obtained papal approval for their administration by the Bishops of Hildesheim. In a document signed 3 February, 1714, by his sons August and Ludwig, he provided that in the future the exercise of the Catholic religion should be free in his State. Two of his daughters, Henrietta and Augusta Dorothea, followed his example, and returned to the mother church.

Antonelli, Giacomo, Cardinal, Secretary of State to Pius IX, b. at Sommillo, in the Papal States, 2 April, 1806; d. in Rome, 6 November, 1876. Of well-to-do parents later endowed by Gregory XVI, he made his preliminary studies at the Roman Seminary, and took up the law course at the Sapienza, obtaining the degree of Doctor of both Laws in his twenty-first year. On entering the diplomatic service of the Holy See he was appointed by Gregory XVI. to the consular, being subsequently consecrated (1830), referendary of the superior law court, assessor of the criminal tribunal, delegate to Orvieto, Viterbo, and Macerata, canon of St. Peter's (made dean, 1840). In 1841 he was made Minister of the Interior and in 1845 Treasurer of the Apostolic Camera. "De Pia Caritas" (1845), and "Helmos Criticalis" (1848) made him cardinal with the diaconal title of St. Agatha alla Suburra (1847), and later the title of St. Maria in Via latà. The Pope created him in turn Minister of Finance in the first ministerial council; president of the newly-organized Council of State; member of the ecclesiastical commission for civil reform (February, 1848), and premier of his first constitutional ministry (10 March, 1848), in which there was a preponderance of lay element. Resigning this office (3 May, 1848) to Count Mamiani, who organized a new liberal ministry, Antonelli became Prefect of Sacred Palaces, and after the death of Rossi arranged the flight of the Pope to Gaeta, where he was made Secretary of State and conducted the negotiations for the restoration of papal rule. Returning to Rome with the Pope (12 April, 1850), he retained the reins of power which he held until his death, twenty-seven years later. His life during this period is inextricably bound up with the history of the reign of Pius IX. Until 1870 he was practically the temporal ruler of Rome, being charged by Pius IX with the care of public interests, that the Pontiff might devote himself more exclusively to his spiritual duties. It is impossible as yet to form a just estimate of the works of Antonelli, or to reconcile the extravagant praise of his admirers with the vituperations of his enemies. It must be said that he defended vigorously the rights of the Holy See, won the respect of princes and statesmen for his diplomatic ability, and showed himself fearless, braving alike public opinion and private jealousy. In extenuation of the charge that his aim was to a large extent personal aggrandizement, it must be recalled that he was a statesman rather than a prelate, and that he was not a priest, although most assiduous in the discharge of his religious duties.

Antonelli, Leonardo Cardinal, b. at Sinigaglia, 6 November, 1730; d. 23 January, 1811, nephew of Cardinal Nicolò Maria Antonelli. During the early part of his long diplomatic career he held among other offices those of canon of the Vatican Basilica, prefect of archives in the Castle of San Angelo, Secretary of the Sacred College and Assessor of the Holy Office. He was created Cardinal-Priest of St. Sabina by Pius VI in the consistory of 24 April, 1775, and later Dean of the Sacred College and Bishop of Ostia and Velletri. At the time of the French Revolution, with a view to preventing the suspension of church services he lent his support to the vote for the civil constitution of the French clergy decreed by the National Assembly of France (21 May, 1790). In addition to the responsible posts already mentioned, he filled those of grand penitentiary, prefect of the Signature of Justice and of the Congregation of the Index, and pro-secretary of Briefs. He assisted in the preparation of the Concordat, and was present at the election of Pius VII (21 May, 1790). In 1804 he later accompanied to Paris. He was banished from Rome by the French (1808) to Spoleto and later to Sinigaglia, where he died, leaving to the Congregation of Propaganda bequests for the support of twelve Armenian students in the College of Urbano. Though Antonelli has been criticized for arrogating to the papacy too arbitrary a civil power, a perusal of his letter to the bishops of Ireland reveals a more tolerant spirit than is generally attributed to him. Possessed of a rich library, he was the friend and protector of letters, and had as librarian the learned Cancelleri. He also acquired some fame as an archaeologist.

He also edited (and defended) the commentary of St. Athanasius on the Psalms (ib., 1746), sermons of St. James of Nisibis (Armenian and Latin, ib., 1756), and under the name of Emman. de Asevedo, S.J., Vetus Missale Romanum-Monasticum Lateranense (ib., 1752).

Antoniano, Giovanni, patrologist, b. at Nim- guen, in Holland, early in the sixteenth century; d. same place, in 1588. From his very entrance into the Dominican Order, in his city, his passion for study, industry, and inclination for patristic studies, singled him out as a capable editor of the writings of the Fathers of the Church, then urgently called for by the learned. As Prior of Nimguen in 1566, and again in 1587, he distinguished himself for his erudition and erudition and for his fundamental principles of Protestantism. He was associated in his literary labours with Henry Gravius, whose pupil he was, and whom he succeeded as editor of the works of the Fathers. Antoniano published (Cologne, 1537), with the critical apparatus of his day, the work of St. Gregory of Nyssa on the creation of man and the “Hexameron” of St. Basil the Great, both in the Latin translation of Dionysius Exiguus. He also published (Cologne, 1560) the writings of St. Paulinus of Nola, and (Antwerp, 1568) the letters of St. Jerome.

Antoniano, Silvio, Cardinal, writer on education, b. 31 December, 1540, in Rome; d. there 16 August, 1603. He was educated at the University of Ferrara, which conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws (1558) and appointed him professor of classical literature. In 1563 Pius IV called him to the chair of belles-lettres in the Sapienza University, a position in which he enjoyed the friendship of distinguished churchmen, especially of St. Charles Borromeo. He resigned his chair, however, in 1566, took up the study of theology under the direction of St. Philip Nerli, and was ordained priest, 12 June, 1568. During the latter part of the sixteenth century Humanism made rapid progress in Italy under the leadership of men like Saloni, Piccolomini, and Valierio. Sharing their enthusiasm, Antoniano devoted himself to the study of educational problems, and at the instance of St. Charles Borromeo, wrote his principal work on the Christian education of children. (Tre libri dell' educazione cristiana degli infanti, Verona, 1683.) In 1707 Pius VII appointed Antoniano Secretary of Papal Briefs (1590), and created him cardinal, 3 March, 1599. His work passed through several editions in Italian and was translated into French by Guignard (Troyes, 1586, Paris, 1783), and into German by Kunz (Freiburg, 1888). Its principal features are insight into the mind of the child, sympathy with its dangers and needs, and solicitude for its moral training. Valuable suggestions are also given on physical culture, on the education of the senses of the people, and on the preparation of teachers for their work. The other writings of Antoniano, many of which have not been published, deal with legal, historical, and liturgical subjects. Their author was one of the compilers of the Roman Catechism and a member of the commission conducted by Clement VIII with the revision of the Roman breviary.

Antoniewicz, (Botow), Charles, a Polish Jesuit and missionary, b. in Lwów (Lemberg), 6 November, 1807; d. 14 November, 1852. He was the son of Joseph Antoniewicz, a nobleman and lawyer. His pious mother, Josephine (Nikorowicz), attended to his early education on their estate at Skwarzawa, whither they moved in 1818. After the death of his father (1823), Charles entered the University at Lwów, to study law, devoting, however, much time to philosophy; hence, besides Polish, he spoke fluently German, French, Italian, and English. Here he also gathered material for the history of the Armenians in Poland. Several of his works were printed in Polish and German poetry. Having finished his course in law with the highest distinction (1827), he made a tour through Austria and Roumania. During the Polish insurrection of 1830–31, he served for some time under General Dwernicki. In 1833 he married his cousin Sophia Nikorowicz, and settled in Skwarzawa. His happy marital life ended with the death of his five children, followed shortly by that of his wife. This devout woman took the religious vows on her death-bed, beseeching her husband to enter some order. His mother also died as a religious in the Benedictine Order. This, as well as the advice of his spiritual director, Father Frederick Rinn, S.J., induced him to seek admission to the novitiate of the Jesuits at Stara Wieś in September, 1839, where he took the solemn vows 12 September, 1841. His philosophical studies were made at Tarnopol, where he was a colleague of the great theologian Count Pogorzelski. His theological studies he finished at Nowy Sącz. He was ordained priest on 10 October, 1844, by Bishop Gutkowski. While yet a student, he attracted universal attention by his unusual oratorical gifts. Upon the request of Count d'Este, Governor of Galicia, the Provincial (Father Pierling) appointed him missionary for the Sandec district, where crime and lawlessness (massacre of the nobility, 1846) reigned supreme. During seven months Antoniewicz gave over twenty missions, preaching over 200 sermons. Great was the success of his apostolic zeal and unremitting toils. His hair was bed, his coat, compelled him to seek a mountainous climate in spring, 1847. Having recovered, he was assigned to St. Nicholas in Lwów, as preacher, and as confessor for students. When on 7 May, 1848, the Society of Jesus was dissolved in Austria, Antoniewicz went to Silesia (Graevenberg), returning incognito, however, to Lwów in 1850. Being rejected, he left the country, came to Warsaw, and finally to Cracow, just after the memorable confagation of 15 July, 1850, to console the grief-stricken inhabitants. On this occasion he delivered the famous sermon "On the ruins of Cracow" (Na zgłoszczen Krakowa). At the instance of Cardinal Diepenbrock he again gained missions in Silesia; he also founded a house in Nissa, and was appointed its first superior. At the urgent entreaty of Archbishop Przyłuski, he extended his missionary activity to Posen (1852). His boundless devotion and self-sacrifice during the terrible outbreak of cholera will always be remembered; for the hero, having himself been infected, died a victim of brotherly love, 14 November, 1852. In the church at Obra, where he rests, his friends erected to his memory a monument, surmounted by his bust. A terse Latin sketch describes his brief but zealous career. In youth he composed many charming poems; later he gave preference to religious themes. He had genuine poetical talent, rich imagination, a delicate sense, and a captivating style. Especially beautiful are his "Wianek krzyżyowy" (Garland of the Cross), "Wianek majowy" (Wreath of May), "Jan Kanty, Św. Jacek" (St. Hyacinth), etc. He is the author of many devotional works, and ranks high as an ascetic. These works, though simple in language, breathe genuine piety, singular gravity, and tender emotion; e. g. "Czytania święteczne dla ludu" (Festive Readings for the Faithful), "Św. Izidor Orazc" (St. Isidore), "Grobys świętych polskich" (The Tombs of the Polish Saints), "Listy w duszu Bożym do przyjaciół" (Spiritual Letters to Friends), and many more. He is, however, best known as an orator. But his ability cannot be judged by his printed sermons; his eloquence was an inspired heart-to-heart appeal. He is a master when he speaks on the eternal mercy, the Victim of the Cross, or the Blessed Virgin Mary. His sermons were collected and arranged by his fellow-townsmen, John Badeni (Lemberg), and published (Cracow, 1893, 2d ed.), under the title "Kazania ks. Karola Antoniewicza", "Zbiór pieśni" (a collection of poems) was likewise published in 1898–99 by Father J. Badeni. In the impossibility of enumerating here all of his writings it may be said that he composed over seventy-six different works; six before he became a Jesuit, and seventy as a Jesuit, twenty-seven of which were published after his death.

Antonius, Saint, Archbishop of Florence, b. at Florence, 1 March, 1389; d. 2 May, 1459; known also by his baptismal name Antonius (Anthony), which is found in his autographs, in some MSS, in printed editions of his works, and in the Bull of canonization, but which has been finally rejected for the diminutive form given him by his affectionate fellow-citizens. His parents, Niccolo and Thomasina Pierozzi, were in high standing. Niccolo being a notary of the Florentine Republic. At the age of fifteen (1404) Antonius applied to Bl. John Dominic, the great Italian religious reformer of the period, that at the Convent of Santa Maria Novella in Florence, for admission to the Dominic Order. It was not until a year later that he was accepted, and he was the first to receive the habit for the Convent of Fiesole about to be constructed by Bl. John Dominic. With Fra Angelico and Fra Bartolommeo, the one to become famous as a painter, the other as a miniaturist, he was stopped at Fiesole, to make his novitiate under Bl. Lawrence of Ripafra. Upon the completion of his year in the novitiate, he returned to Fiesole, where he remained until 1409, when with his brethren, all faithful adherents of Pope Gregory XII, he was constrained to leave the Florentine Republic. At that time he took shelter in the Convent of Foligno. A few years later he began his career as a zealous promoter.
of the reforms inaugurated by Bl. John Dominic. In 1414 he was vicar of the convent of Folligno, then in turn sub-prior and prior of the convent of Cortona, and later prior of the convents of Rome (Minerva), Naples (Saint Peter Martyr), Gaeta, Sienna, and Fiesole (several times). From 1433 to 1446 he was vicar of the Tuscan Congregation formed by Bl. John Dominic of Capistrano to embody a more rigorous observance. During this period he established (1436) the famous convent of St. Mark in Florence, where he formed a remarkable community from the brethren of the convent of Fiesole. It was at this time also that he built, with the munificent aid of Cosimo de' Medici, the adjoining church, at the conclave, with which Fiesole was joined (Epiphany, 1441). As a theologian he took part in the Council of Florence (1439) and gave hospitality in St. Mark's to the Dominican theologians called to the council by Eugene IV.

Despite all the efforts of St. Antoninus to escape ecclesiastical dignities, he was forced by Eugene IV, who had personal knowledge of his saintly character and administrative ability, to accept the Archbishopric of Florence. He was consecrated in the convent of Fiesole, 13 March, 1446, and immediately took possession of the see over which he ruled until his death. As he had laboured in the past for theupbuilding of a religious life in France, so he henceforth laboured for it in his diocese, devoting himself to the visitation of parishes and religious communities, the remedy of abuses, the strengthening of discipline, the preaching of the Gospel, the amelioration of the condition of the poor, and the writing of books for clergy and laity. These labours were interrupted several times that he might act as ambassador for the Florentine Republic.

Ill health prevented him from taking part in an embassy to the emperor in 1451, but in 1455 and again in 1458 he was at the head of embassies sent by the government to the Supreme Pontiff. He was called by Eugene IV to assist him in his dying hours. He was frequently consulted by Nicholas V on questions of Church and State, and was charged by Pius II to undertake, with several cardinals, the reform of the Roman Court. When his death occurred, 2 May, 1459, Pius II gave instructions for the funeral, and presided at it eight days later. He was canonized by Adrian VI, 31 May, 1523.

The literary productions of St. Antoninus, while giving evidence of the eminently practical turn of his mind, show that he was a profound student of history and philosophy. His principal work is the "Summa Theologica Moralis, partitibus IV distincta," written shortly before his death, which marked a new and very considerable development in moral theology. It also contains a fund of matter for the student of the history of the fifteenth century. So well developed are its juridical elements that it has been published under the title of "Jurisprudentiae Historiae et Casuarii Summa." An attempt was lately made by Crohns (Die Summa theologica des Anton von Folligno und die Schätzung des Werks im Hexenhammer, Helsingfors, 1903) to trace the fundamental principles of misogyny; so manifest in the "Summa" of Thomism" of the man inquisitorial to this work of Antoninus. But Paulus (Die Verachtung der Frau beim hl. Antonin, in Historisch-Politische Blätter, 1904, pp. 812-830) has shown more clearly than several others, especially the Italian writers, that this hypothesis is untenable, because based on a reading of only a part of the "Summa" of Antoninus, after the first appearance of the work (Venice, 1477), fifteen editions were printed at Venice, Spire, Nuremberg, Strasbourg, Lyons, and Basle. Other editions appeared in the following century. In 1740 it was published at Verona in 4 folio volumes edited by P. Ballardini; and in 1741, at Florence by Mamachi and Remedelli, O.P.

Of considerable importance are the manuals for confessors and penitents containing abridgments, reproductions, and translations from the "Summa" and frequently published in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries under the name of St. Antoninus. An unsuccessful attempt has been made to show that he was not the author of the Italian editions. At the most it should be granted that he committed to others the task of editing one or two. The various editions and titles of the manuals have caused confusion, and it made it appear that there were more than one Antoninus. A critical edition and classification is given by Mandonnet in the "Dictionnaire de théologie catholique." Of value as throwing light upon the home life of his time are his treatises on Christian life written for women of the Medici family and first published in the last century under the titles:—(1) "Opera a ben vivere... Con altri ammaestramenti," ed. Father Palermo, one vol. (Florence, 1858) (2) "Regola di vita cristiana," one vol. (Florence, 1866). His letters (Lettere) were collected and edited, some for the first time by Tommaso Corsetto, O.P., and published in one volume, at Florence, 1858.

Under the tutelage of "Chronicorum partibus tribus distincta ab initio mundi ad MCCCLIX" (published also under the titles "Chronicorum opus" and "Historiarum opus"), he wrote a general history of the world with the purpose of presenting to his readers a view of the workings of divine providence. While he did not give way to his imagination or colour facts, he often fell into the error, so common among the chroniclers of his period, of accepting much that sound historical criticism has since rejected as untrue or doubtful. But this can be said only of those parts in which he treated of early history. When writing of the events and politics of his own age he exercised a judgment that has been of the greatest value to later historians. The history was published at Venice, 1474-79, in four volumes of his "Opera Omnia" (Venice, 1490; Nuremberg, 1484; Basle, 1491; Lyons, 1517, 1527, 1585, 1588, 1587). A work on preaching (De arte et vero modo disserendi sermone) containing 450 folio leaves, the largest of the fifteen century. The volume of sermons (Opus quadragesimale et de sanctis sermonum, sive flos florum) is the work of another, although published under the name of St. Antoninus.

Antoninus Pius (Titulus Hadrianus Antoninus Pius), Roman Emperor (138-161), b. 18 September, a. d. 86, at Lanuvium, a short distance from Rome; d. at Lorigino, 7 March, 161. Much of his youth was spent at Lorium, which was only twelve miles from Rome. Later on he built a villa here, to which he would frequently come to the care of the empire, and in which he died, in his seventy-fifth year. His early career was that usually followed by the sons of senatorial families. He entered public life while quite young and after exercising the office of praetor, became consul in 120, at the age of thirty-four. Shortly after the expiration of his consulate he was invested within fifteen years by the four men of consular rank whom he placed over the four judicial districts into which Italy was then divided. The duration of this office and its character cannot be decided with accuracy. An toninus was afterwards proconsul in Asia, where his remarkable administrative qualities attracted the attention of the Emperor, who admitted him to the "Consilium Principis" on his return to Rome. After the death of the ablest of his colleagues, Lucius Verus, Hadrian adopted Antoninus as his successor, on condition that he, in turn, would adopt as his sons and successors M. Annius Verus (Marcus Aurelius) and Lucius Verus. On his adoption (25 February, 138) Antoninus changed his name to Titus Julius Hadrianus Antoninus Pius. In July, 141, he died, having reigned without a successor until the death of the latter, 10 July, 138, when he became sole ruler. Historians, generally speaking, are unanimous in their praise of the character of Antoninus and of the success and blessings of his reign (for a rather unfavourable estimate, see Schiller, Geschichte der röm. Kaiserzeit, II, 138). His conception of the duties of his office was high and noble, and his exercise of the almost unlimited power placed in his hands marked him as a man thoroughly devoted to the interests of humanity. In his private life and in the management of his court he followed true Stoic simplicity, even to the exception of the bishop Melito of Sardis, whose cheap luxury of life was the envy of all. In his reign was unquestionably the most peaceful and the most prosperous in the history of Rome. No wars were undertaken, except those necessary to guard the frontiers of the Empire against invasion or to suppress insurrections. The conflicts with the Berbers in Africa, and some of the German and Scythian tribes on the Huns, were not punitive expeditions to prevent further encroachments on Roman soil. The short-lived invasion in Egypt and that of the Jews in Armenia and Palestine were quickly suppressed. For years the Poms Romana prevailed over the entire Empire, and brought blessings and happiness to probably 150,000,000 people, whose interests and whose safety were safeguarded by an army of 350,000 soldiers. The only extension of the Roman territory in the reign of Antoninus was in Britain, where a new wall was built at the foot of the Caledonian mountains between the Forth and the Clyde, considerably farther north than the wall of Hadrian.

The internal peace and prosperity were no less remarkable than the absence of war. Trade and commerce flourished; new routes were opened, and new roads built throughout the Empire, so that all parts of it were in close touch with the capital. The renowned life of the provinces and flourishing cities covered the Roman world, is revealed by the numerous inscriptions that record the generosity of wealthy patrons or the activity of free burghers. Despite the traditional hostility of Rome to the formation of clubs and societies, guilds and organizations of all conceivable kinds, mainly for philanthropic purposes, came into existence everywhere. By means of these associations the poorer classes were in a sense insured against poverty and had the certainty that they would receive decent burial. The activity of the Emperor was not confined to merely official acts; private movements for the welfare of the poor were on all sides; charity work of all kinds was unrestrained, and untinted support. The scope of the alimentary institutions of former reigns was broadened, and the establishment of charitable foundations such as that of the "Puelles Faustianoi" is a sure indication of a general softening of manners and a truer sense of duty than those of the period with less available literary and scientific activity, though the general artistic movement of the time was decidedly of the "Rococo" type. The most lasting influence of the life and reign of Antoninus was that which he exercised in the sphere of law. Five great Stoic jurists -- Julius Africanus, M. Annius Verus, Salvius Valens, Volusius Marcellus, and Diocletianus -- were the constant advisers of the Emperor, and, under his protection, they infused a spirit of leniency and mildness into Roman legislation which effectually safeguarded the weak and the unprotected, slaves, wards, and orphans, against aggressions of every kind, and yet preserved the old system of law in its integrity. It must be observed that this legislation was modelled in the reign of Antoninus, but an impulse was given in this direction which produced the later golden period of Roman jurisprudence under Septimius Severus, Caracalla, and Alexander Severus.

In religion Antoninus was deeply devoted to the traditional worship of the Roman Empire. In the latter years of his reign he became a convert to the sect of Hadrian, man of the blind fanaticism of his successor. Perhaps as a consequence superstition and the worship of new deities multiplied under his administration. In his dealings with the Christians Antoninus went no further than to maintain the procedure outlined by Trajan, though the unwavering devotion of the Emperor to the national gods could not fail to bring the conduct of the Christians into unfavourable contrast. Very few indications of the Emperor's attitude towards his Christian subjects are to be found in contemporary documents. The most valuable is that of the Christian epistles of Eusebius (op. cit., IV, xxvi, 10). In his "Apology" to Marcus Aurelius he speaks of "letters" addressed by Antoninus Pius to the Larissaeans, the Thessalonians, the Athenians, and to all the Greeks, forbidding all tumultuous outbreaks against the Christians. The edict found in Eusebius (op. cit., IV, 13) is now looked on by most critics as a forgery of the latter half of the third century. In the past, Tilllemont, and in the present, Wieseler stand for its genuineness. "It speaks in admiring terms of the innocence of the Christians, declares unproved the charges against them, bids men admire the steadfastness and faith with which they met the earthquake and other calamities that drove others to despair, ascribes the persecutions to the jealousy which men felt against those who were truer worshippers of God than themselves."

This temper of mind was entirely in conformity with the spirit of the existing legislation as laid down by Trajan and interpreted by Hadrian: that extra-judicial action on the part of the people against the Christians should not be tolerated by the authorities. The death of Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, which took place in 155 or 156, shows how a Roman proconsul, though he knew his duty, still permitted himself to be swayed by popular clamour. In the first century of the Christian era, we see how ineffectual popular outrages were in the face of strong administration, and how efficiently the interests of the Christians were safeguarded, except in the case of actual evidence in an open court. There can be no doubt, however, that persecution did take place in the reign of Antoninus, and that many Christians did suffer death. The pages of the contemporary apologists, though lacking in detail, are ample proof that capital punishment was frequently inflicted. The passive attitude of Antoninus had no small influence on the internal development of Christianity. Hereusy was then rampant; the synods and councils, which had only taken the bonds of discipline and morality, and to enforce unity of doctrine, concerted action was called for. The tolerant attitude of the Emperor made possible a broad and vigorous activity on the part of the Christian bishops, one evidence of which is the institution of the post of metropolitan in Rome, a position then first held on an extensive scale, and described at some length by Eusebius in his Church History. In this way, it may be said, the Emperor contributed to the development of Christian unity.

The known details of the life of Antoninus Pius are found in the Scriptores Historiae Augustae, Gellius, Eusebius, Porphyry, Suidas, Lycius Victor, Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, and the sources usually found in all histories of the period, e.g. Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (an overdrawn, but ele-
ANTONIO

Antonio Maria Zaccaria, Saint, founder of the Clerks Regular of St. Paul, commonly known as the Barnabites; b. in Cremona, Italy, 1502; d. 5 July, 1539. While he was still an infant his father died, leaving the care of the child’s education to his mother. A commission for the purpose of finding him an almoner. After completing the studies given in the schools at Cremona he was sent to Padua for his philosophy, and in 1520, when he had finished this course, began the study of medicine in the university at that place. At the age of twenty-two he received his degree of Doctor of Medicine and returned to Cremona to practise his profession. Three years later he began to study theology and received holy orders in 1528. He now devoted himself with renewed energy to works of charity and mercy, visiting and consoling the sick in hospitals and poor-prisons. The ministry of the sick and the administration of the sacraments produced such great fruit that St. Antonio was encouraged to seek a larger field for his labors and to carry out a great project which he had formed for the good of souls. He went to the populous city of Milan, of which he was a Burgess, and entered the Confraternity of Eternal Wisdom. Among the members of this religious body he allied himself with two priests, Fathers Ferrari and Morigia, and told them of his idea of founding a congregation of secular clergy. Northern Italy at this period was in a deplorable condition. Frequent wars had devastated the country. The advent of the Lutheran soldiery and their contempt for everything Catholic had spread the contagion of bad example, while famine and plague followed in the track of the soldiers. These scourges combined to produce a state of misery that appealed more powerfully to Antonio and his associates. The Congregation of the Regular Clerks of St. Paul, St. Antonio’s which began with five members, was canonically sanctioned by Pope Clement VII in 1533. Their rule bound them to “regenerate and revive the love of the Divine worship, and a truly Christian way of life by frequent preaching and the faithful administration of the sacraments.”

The first superior of the new congregation was St. Antonio, who soon became known in Milan as an apostle. Besides giving conferences in churches to ecclesiastics and lay people, he went into the streets of the city with crucifix in hand, and produced great fruit in souls by preaching on the Passion and Death of Christ and the need of penance for sin. When he resigned the superiority to Father Morigia and later went to Vicenza at the request of Cardinal Ridolfi. There he succeeded in reforming morals and in bringing two religious communities of women to a stricter observance of their rule. In the latter labors he was greatly aided by a congregation of nuns “The Angelicals of St. Paul”, which he had founded in Milan. He introduced, also, the devotion of the “Forty Hours’ Prayer”, in Vicenza. The last two years of his life were spent in Milan. He sought there a more suitable church for his Congregation and accepted the offer of the church of St. Giberti, but died before it was reached. From this church of St. Barnabas, the Congregation received the name by which its members are commonly known, i.e. Barnabites. Worn out by his voluntary penances, as well as by his untiring labors of charity, he was attacked by fever during one of his missions. Knowing that this illness was his last, he had himself brought to his native city, Cremona. There, in his mother’s house, he received the last sacraments and peacefully expired at the early age of thirty-seven. His body was found incorrupt 27 years after his death. He was declared Blessed by Pius XII on 21 February 1950. (See BARNABITES.) On 15 May, 1897, he was solemnly canonized in St. Peter’s, Rome, by Pope Leo XIII. His writings are: “Detti notabili, raccolti da vari autori” (Venice, 1583); “Constitutiones ordinis clericrorum regularium” (not published); “Sermones super precepta Decalogi” (not published). "La breve resa delle fonti della Congregazione dei Barnabiti e delle Angioliche di St. Paolo" (Tournai, 1896); "Storia di M. Antonio of Vicenza, Maria, a Reformed Minorite, b. at Vicenza, 1 March, 1834; d. at Rovigno, 22 June, 1884. After his ordination (1856) he devoted himself to the study of scholastic authors, especially of St. Bonaventure whose “Breviloquium” he published in a new edition (Venice, 1874; Freiburg, 1881). He also edited the “Lettera di S. Pietro ad Eustachio” (Venice, 1880), in which the terminology of the scholastics is explained. His contributions to hagiography include nineteen studies of the lives of saints of the Franciscan Order.

Antonio, a supposed Latin Christian poet of the third century, under whose name there is printed in Migne (P.L., V., 261-282) an apologetic poem of Antonini carmen adversus paganos which he attributed to it to another unknown Antonius, an imaginary contemporary of Commodian. But Muratori, says Dr. Bardenhewer, has shown that the poem belongs to St. Paulinus of Nola (351-431). There are two critical editions, by Oehler (Leipzig, 1847), and by Burian (Munich, 1890), both of whom attribute it to Paulinus of Nola (351-431). Antwerp (Anvers, Antwerpen, Spanish Amberes), a city of Belgium, in the archiepiscopal of Mechlin, situated on the Scheldt (Escaut), about sixty miles from the sea, at the confluence of the little river Schyn, once navigable. Its foundation was probably due to some wandering Teutonic tribe; the people were certainly Christian from about the middle of the seventh century (Dierckxzen, Antuerpia Christo nasceae ab an. 641, etc., Antwerp, 1747-63, 1773), as is seen by the famous saints then met with in its history as the Irish virgin Dymphna, Eligius, Augustijn, as described in the Delftse chronicles and the Northmen in 855, but soon arose from its ruins. In the tenth and eleventh centuries it appears as the capital of the Margraves of Antwerp, and from that time to the French Revolution recognized, through all political vicissitudes. no other source of authority in its various political masters. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the Dukes of Brabant favoured its development by many privileges, political and commercial. In the course of the fourteenth century the Counts of Flanders were its lords paramount and in the fifteenth it recognized the overlordship of the archbishop of Cambrai, through which relationship it eventually rose to its highest prosperity, when with the rest of the Burgundian inheritance it passed under the control of Emperor Charles the Fifth (1517-56). After his death there broke out a long series of sanguinary conflicts, partly religious and partly politico-commercial, in which the overlordship of the great house of Burgundy, which had been disposed of by the Treaty of Cambrai (1559) whereby the southern or Catholic provinces of the Low Countries were enabled to preserve their faith, though at a great price from a commercial standpoint.

The latter quarter of the eighteenth century was marked by much unrest, owing to the anti-Catholic or Febronian policy of Emperor Joseph II (1765-90). During the French Revolution Antwerp was incorporated (1794) with France, and was made by Napoleon (1804-13) the chief naval fortress of his empire. After his overthrow it was incorporated (1815) with the new kingdom of Holland, but came again into the hands of Belgium during the revolution of 1830, and has risen since then to the position of a foremost centre of European commerce and industry.

POPULATION AND COMMERCE.—The population of Antwerp rose in the sixteenth century (1660) to the phenomenal figure of 200,000. It was then the London of the continent, and owed its prosperity to various causes, among which may be mentioned the decay of earlier commercial centres like Bruges and Venice, consequent on the discoveries of Columbus and Vasco da Gama, and the natural deepening of the western entrance of the Scheldt. From the Middle Ages it had inherited a growing trade in fish, salt, and oats, in English wool, and in exchanges of all kinds with the various states of Europe. But now commercial products came no longer by way of the Adriatic and over Venice to the wharves of Antwerp, but directly by sea; this was especially true of the merchandise of the New World. Merchants from all countries flocked to the Scheldt, but they were the agents of the Hanseatic League and of the merchant adventurers of England; it became the chief banking centre of Europe. The rich Fuggers of Augsburg had a house in Antwerp whence they loaned large sums to kings and cities. In those days, it is said, a thousand ships anchored off the city, and one hundred came and went daily. Its fairs were less famous than those of Nuremberg and Novgorod, and had been much frequented even in medieval times, for purposes of barter. But this prosperity declined in the terrible political-religious wars of the last three decades of the sixteenth century, and the trade of Antwerp sank to a point below the level of the Thirty Years War (1618-18). The Treaty of Westphalia, signed in the latter year, contained a clause in the interest of Holland, providing for the closing of free navigation on the Scheldt. Thereby was closed also the regular source of Antwerp's trade and industry, and not until the French Revolution, or rather until 1863, that an unimpeded traffic was provided for on the broad smooth-flowing river that rivals the Thames and the Hudson as a creator of national wealth.

ECCLASISTICAL DEVELOPMENT.—In the Middle Ages Antwerp was comprised with the see of Cambrai. But in 1559, at the instance of Philip II., a new arrangement of the episcopal sees of the Low Countries was made by Paul IV, whereby three archiepiscopal and fourteen episcopal sees were created, and all external jurisdiction, however ancient abolished. Antwerp became one of the six suffragans of Mechlin, and remained such until the end of the eighteenth century. This step did not meet with the goodwill of the merchants of the city, who feared the introduction of the Inquisition and the costliness of an episcopal establishment, and urged the transfer of the new see to Louvain, where it would be more accessible to the inhabitants of the city. The new heretical doctrines were already deeply rooted in the city and vicinity, and their representatives were of course the chief opponents of the step, though certain Catholic monastic interests were very active, being now called on by the Pope to provide for the support of the new see. Finally, the cardinal Schenk (son of Schenk von Brederode) was transferred from Bois-le-Duc to Antwerp in 1569 as first bishop of the new see, and governed it until his death in 1576. Ten years of religious and political conflict elapsed before another bishop could be appointed in the person of Livinus Torriani (Van der Beke) a Louvain theologist, graceful humanist, and diplomat. He died in 1595. The scholarly Miraus (Le Mire) was Bishop of Antwerp from 1604 to 1611, and was succeeded in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries by a series of fifteen bishops, the last of whom was Cornelius Nolier, Bishop of Louvain. The last Bishop of Antwerp from 1785 to his death in 1798, Pius VII suppressed the see 29 Nov., 1801, by the Bull "Qui Christi Domini vices". Its former Belgian territory now belongs to the Archdiocese of Mechlin, the Dutch portion to the Diocese of Breda (Foppens, Historia Episcopatus Antwerpiani, Brussel, 1717; Ram, Synopsis actuum ecc., Antwerp, Brussels, 1856). The abbeys and convents of Antwerp were long very famous centres of its religious life. In the twelfth century the Canons Regular of St. Norbert (Premonstratensians) founded the abbey of St. Michael, that became later one of the principal abbeys of the Low Countries, sheltered many royal guests, and eventually excited no little cupididity and persecution by reason of its great wealth. The Cathedral of Antwerp was originally a small Premonstratensian shrine known familiarly as "Our Lady of the Stump". Many other religious orders found a shelter in Antwerp, Dominicains, Franciscains, Carmes, Augustins (1632), likewise female branches of the same. The Cistercians had two great abbeys, St. Sauveur, founded in 1451 by the devout merchant, Peter Pot, and St. Bernard, about six miles from Antwerp, founded in 1233 (Papebroch, "Annales Antwerpenses," t. xxii, 1890, ed. Mertens and Buchmann, Antwerp, 1846-48).

RELIGIOUS Conflicts.—The medieval religious life of Antwerp seems to have been troubled by only one notable heresy, that of Tanchelino in the twelfth century. But the principles and doctrines of Luther and Calvin soon found sympathisers among the German, English, and other foreign merchants and also among the citizens. First the Anabaptists and then the Calvinist field-preachers attacked with a fierce persistency the existing religious order. To the religious differences were added patriotic feelings and the hatred of Spanish domination. Popular revolts and insurrections, nursed in cities and provinces, did not occur in the city until August, 1566, when the splendid cathedral that had been 176 years in process of building was sacked by a Calvinist mob, the seventy altars destroyed, and all the works of art it contained defaced or stolen. Similar scenes occurred in all the other churches and convents of Antwerp. Thereafter Spain ruled by the sending of the Duke of Alba, and the great military captains of the age, who inaugurated a reign of terror that bore with equal severity on Protestant and Catholic, since it interfered with the trade of the city and vicinity by stopping the supply of English wool for the looms of Flanders, and by intensifying the religious and patriotic sentiment whose seeds had first been sown by the Antwerp and the Calvinists. Henceforth the history of Antwerp (ecclesiastical and civil) is intimately bound up with the story of the Gueux (Beggars) resistance to the policy of Philip II (1556-98). The sack of Antwerp by the mutinous Spanish troops (4 Nov., 1576), that French troops attempted to recur, in 1583, to the famous siege of the city by Spain's great captain Alessandro Farnese, Duke of Parma and Piacenza, are among the darkest pages of the great city's pitiful story in the last decades of the sixteenth century. At a cruel price, set rather by politics than by religion, the Catholic faith had been preserved in Antwerp, and Protestant dissenters were tied in the Chalmers. From 1599 to 1621 the Catholic Netherlands were governed by Albert, Archduke of Austria and his spouse Isabella, daughter of Philip II. After the death of "the Archdukes", Spanish rule was once more made permanent in this "cockpit of Europe" until 1714 when, as one result of the War of the Spanish Succession, the government of the Catholic Netherlands again fell to Austria.

Intellectual Life.—Amid religious and political conflict the Catholic intellectual life of Antwerp never flagged. The city is famous in the annals of printing. In 1492, that year of the discovery of America, Antwerp, as a fly-sheet, a Latin translation of the letter of Columbus in which he announced his discovery of the New World, and in this way probably first made known the great event to the men of Northern Europe. But it is to Christopher Plantin (d. 1589), and his son-in-law and successor Moretus, that the city chiefly owes its fame as a centre of book-making and distribution. This "giant among printers" organized the trade on a basis hitherto unattempted, began and executed extraordinary enterprises, and founded a house that lasted during the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries in which period it enjoyed a monopoly of the sale of missals and breviaries throughout the vast Spanish dominions. It was the Plantin press that issued the first volume of the "Acta Sanctorum" (1643), an enterprise begun at Antwerp by the Jesuit Herbert Roewey (d. 1628), organized there by his confereius John Baptist van der Borcal (d. 1647), and continued there until 1778, when it fell a victim of the ridiculous "reforms" of Joseph II. Plantin's own masterpiece is the great Antwerp Polyglot Bible in six folio volumes, the "Biblia Regia" issued at Antwerp from 1559 to 1573, and really at Plantin's own expense. Besides the scholarly bishops of Antwerp already mentioned, the city boasted of other notable Catholic scholars, the great critic and savant Justus Lipsius, and other helpers of Plantin, e.g., Kiliaen, the Flemish lexicographer, and Orteldius and Mercator, the geographers (Max Rooses, Christophe Plantin, imprimeur anversois, Antwerp, 1900). In modern times it is celebrated as the home of Hendrik Conscience, the immortal Flemish novelist, and of Augustin De Backer, the erudite biographer of the Society of Jesus.

The Painters of Antwerp.—In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries Catholic faith, municipal prosperity, and a certain large-mindedness combined to make Antwerp the greatest painter center in Europe, none in Europe. It was often called "the Florence of the North," and was well-known in medieval times for its "Guild of St. Luke" founded in 1382, and active until the end of the last century. Prominent among the illustrious artists of Antwerp are the great portrait painter Quentin Metsys (1466-1530) and Peter Paul Rubens (1577-1640), the latter at once a prince of painters, courtier, diplomat, and Antwerp's most distinguished citizen. He was also a very devout Catholic and heard Mass daily before beginning his work. Other famous artists were Van Dyck, Jordaens, Teniers, the Sintgen-Seghers, and painters like Luys Faydherbe and the Quellina. In modern times the genius of the old Antwerp painters has revived in masters like Wappers, Leys, and others. Religious realism, rich and vivid colouring, vigour of execution, minuteness of detail, abundance of ornament and light, characteristic works of the Antwerp school of painters. Their city has long since become a museum of religious art unique on the northern side of the Alps, and highly expressive of the earnest spiritual Catholicism of the once warlike burghers, now a new race of merchant-princes. The armies of Philip II in 1576, and of the troops of Philip IV, in 1659 and 1661, committed great outrages, but the results of these were not so disastrous as those to which Napoleon's Conquest was committed there against the Catholic religion. Priests were exiled, even murdered; the churches and convents were closed and pillaged; the Catholic hierarchy abused and insulted in every conceivable manner; statues, paintings, and art-works of all kinds belonging to the churches were sold at public auction, and only the overthrow of the Directory in November, 1799 by Napoleon Bonaparte prevented the demolition and sale of the incomparable cathedral as mere stone, timber, and iron.

English Catholic Interest.—The interest of Catholic England in Antwerp is nowhere apart from the close commercial relations that existed from the beginning of the twelfth century to the end of the sixteenth. Persecuted English Catholics often took refuge in that city; thus English Briggite nunns of the royal abbey of Syon House, nearly all of them of noble birth, were welcomed there in the time of Henry VIII. A convent of English Carmelite nuns was founded there in 1619, and flourished until the French Revolution, when the sisters returned to Lanherne in Cornwall where their convent still exists. Mention is made in the city annals of Gilbert Curie, his wife Barbara Mowbray, and his sister Elizabeth Curie, devoted adherents of Mary Stuart, the latter, her attendant at the block (Lingard, Hist. of England, VI, vi, 463). Their house at Antwerp was a shelter for persecuted Catholics from England. Dying, Gilbert Curie bequeathed sixty thousand florins to the Scotch College at Douai. Another Richard Antwerp was the famous Richard Verstegen, a prominent religious publicist, author of the famous "Theatrum crudelitatis haereticorum" (Antwerp, 1586), with engravings designed by himself, a vivid polemical account of the sufferings of contemporay Catholics for their faith, also of several other works written in Flemish.

Objeets of Religious Interest.—The Cathedral (St. Mary's) begun in 1354, is said to have been 176 years in process of erection. It is cruciform in shape, with triple aisles and an ambulatory. Its dimensions in feet are: length 384, breadth of nave 171, height 132. The portals are supported by a forest of columns (125). The great northern tower is nearly 400 feet high and was compared by Napoleon Bonaparte to Mechlin lace hung aloft in mid-air. Its organ, built in 1891, contains ninety registers and is said to be the largest in Belgium. Among the famous art-treasures of the cathedral is the "Descendens in Terram, 1555", the "Assumption" by Rubens. It was much damaged by the Calvinists in 1565 and by the French (1794-98). Other important churches are: St. Charles Borromeo, built 1614-21, and once decorated with thirty-six large ceiling-frescoes by Rubens; the churches of Matis (1497-1617), once the "Navarette" of place of the wealthy and distinguished families of Antwerp and filled with their monuments and chapels, including the Rubens chapel; St. Paul, built by the Dominicans (1531-71), since the battle of Lepanto (1571) the seat of a famous confraternity of the Rosary. There are also churches dedicated to St. Andrew, St. Augustine, St. George, St. Michael and Peter. St. John. The Plantin-Moretus Museum exhibits the workshop and residence of that great family of ecclesiastical printers (purchased in 1876 by the municipality) quite as they were in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In the various rooms may be seen copies of old missals and breviaries, correspondence of learned men (St. Charles Borromeo, Baronius), portraits of famous editors (Arias Montanus, Justus Lipsius) employed by Plantin and Moretus, drawings by Rubens, engravings by famous masters, artistic bindings, and specimens of all the most perfect work done for this establishment of learned printers during their flourishing period. Altogether it is a 'unique picture of the dwelling and contiguous business premises of a Flemish patrician at the end of the sixteenth century'

The Catholic population of Antwerp and arrondissements is 344,817 (census, 1900). The city contains 34 Catholic churches and chapels, 2 Protestant churches, and 9 synagogues. There are 7 religious orders of men and 30 of women. The chief educational institutions are the Academy of Fine Arts, Academy of Trades, Normal School, Royal Athenæum, College of St. John Berchmans, Institute of St. Norbert, College of Notre Dame and Trades Institute, etc. There are 7 boarding schools for girls and 30 for boys. There are in addition boarding schools and day schools under the following religious orders: Ursulines, Sisters of Our Lady, Sisters of the Terinck Foundation, Sisters of the Sacred Heart, Ladies of Christian Instruction, the Apostolines, Annunicates, Sisters of Mary and Sisters of the Heart of Mary. Among the charitable institutions are a Beguinage, a house of the Little Sisters of the Poor, with about 400 inmates; the mother-house of the Sisters of the Heart of Jesus, for the protection and reclamation of women. There are orphanages for boys and girls, two sailors' homes, an asylum for the insane, a number of hospitals, e. g. St. Elizabeth's with a capacity of 400 and Stuiwenberg 500. In Antwerp also is situated the mother-house of the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart.

Anunciación, fray Domingo de la, a Dominican missionary, b. at Fuenteovejuna, 1510; d. in Mexico, 1591. In the world his name was Juan de Ecieja; his father was Hernando de Ecieja. At the age of thirteen he was admitted into the Order of St. Francis, but was refused. His father having died, he emigrated to New Mexico (Mexico) with his elder brother, Hernando de Paz, who became secretary of the first royal audiencia. Prosperity spoiled Hernando, but the younger brother, Juan, kept aloof from the temptations of wealth and ambition, and entered the Order of Dominicans in 1531, or 1532. He assumed the name of Domingo de la Anunciación, under which he thereafter was known. He was one of the most zealous instructors of the Mexican Indians in the sixteenth century. During the epidemic of 1545 he attended to the natives unceasingly and, in 1566, was president of the sixteenth century, sacraments, from Mexico as far south as Oaxaca, wandering on foot from village to village. In 1559, Fray Domingo, with three other priests and a lay brother, all of the Order of St. Dominic, accompanied Don Tristan de Arriallano y Luna on his disastrous expedition to Florida. Shipwrecked, deprived of almost every resource, he suffered the most. All attempts to penetrate inland failed, and the survivors had to go back as best they could. After his return to Mexico he continued as teacher among the Indians, but was twice prior of the convent of Santo Domingo at the capital, once prior of the convent of Puebla, four times master of novices, and finally prior of various provincial councils. In 1585 he became blind and died six years later, universally regretted for his virtues and untiring devotion to the cause of religion and education, chiefly of the Indians. His eldest brother, Hernando, finally induced him to abandon the life of dissipation he had been leading, also became a Dominican, and rose to a high position in the order. Fray Domingo de la Anunciación has left, as far as is known, only one literary monument, which is very rare. It bears the title: "Doctrina Xipiana Breve y Compendiosa &c &c" (Mexico, 1560), and is a dialogue between master and pupil on the Christian doctrine, in Spanish and Mexican.

The biography of Fray Domingo is based almost exclusively upon the work of FRAY AGUSTÍN DAVILA PADILLA: Historia de la fundación y discarnación de la orden de los predicadores de la orden de los predicadores (first edition, Madrid, 1596; second, 1611; third, 1625; third, 1657). The book is exceedingly rare. That the Doctrina Xipiana was said to be printed in 1545, instead of 1560, is an error of Padilla. That error is confirmed by Padilla. That error is confirmed by Padilla. That error is confirmed by Padilla.

Anunciación, fray Juan de la, b. at Granada in Spain, probably 1520-1530. He went to Mexico, where he joined the Augustine convent in 1554. He was several times prior of the convents of Mexico and Puebla, and twice definidor. He died at the age of eighty. He was also rector of the college of San Pablo. Fray Juan belongs to the class of religious so numerous and so little known, or least considered, who devoted themselves with special attention to the literary and religious education of the Indians. He published in Mexico three books, which are of at least linguistic value to-day, and were originally useful for the instruction of the aborigines of Nahua stock. The earliest, that of the year 1570, is a "Doctrina Cristiana" in Mexican (Nahuatle and Spanish). In the same year he published "Sermones para publicar, despedir la Bula de la Santa Cruzada," in Mexican and Spanish. He was then sub-prior of the convent of St. Augustine in Mexico. Finally, in 1577, there appeared, his "Sermonario en lengua Mexicana... con un Catecismo en lengua Mexicana y Española, con el Calendario." Very few copies of these works are known to exist.

fragman of Turin, and comprising 73 towns in the province of Turin. Although St. Ursus is sometimes said to have been the first bishop, this is greatly contested. The first known, certainly, as such was St. Eustachius, whose name coupled with Aosta is signed to a letter sent to Leo I by the second Synod of Milan (451). [F. Savio, S. J. Gli Antiichi Vescovi d'Italia (Piemonte), Turin, 1847-1856]. By the ninth century the list of bishops is fairly complete. Suppressed in 1802 it was re-established in 1817. Aosta has 82,000 Catholics; 87 parishes, 188 secular priests, 24 regulars, 55 seminarians, 566 churches, chapels, or oratories. In the cathedral treasury is a chest of gold of Anicianus Prorus, Roman consul in 406, which shows the Emperor Flavius conqueror of the hordes of Alaric. It was discovered in 1833. St. Anselm (1033-1109), Archbishop of Canterbury, was a native of Aosta. St. Bernard de Menthon (1008), Archdeacon of Aosta, founded the hospice on the Alps named after him, as a relief to pilgrims in the passage of the Alps.

Apaches, a tribe of North American Indians belonging linguistically to the Athapaskan stock whose original territory is believed to have been North-western California. The family spread southward into California and thence diffused itself over Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona. Onate, in 1598, is the first writer to mention Apaches by this name. The Apaches, from their first appearance in history, have been noted for their ferocity and restlessness. Opposed to fixed abodes, they have ever been a terror to the more peaceably inclined red men.

The history of Catholic missionary effort among the Apaches is a sad one. We find Franciscans at work among them as early as 1629, when Father Benavides founded Santa Clara de Capo on the borders of the Apache country in New Mexico. Yet, though an Apache chief, Sanaba, had been converted to the Faith, we hear of the tribe itself only as a despoiler of the Christian Pueblo Indians. At the beginning of the eighteenth century, the Jesuit missionaries of Upper California also came in contact with the Apaches. The latter frequently harried the missions near the Arizona frontier with a ferocity which gained for them the reputation of the Iroquois of the West. As a means of protecting their converts, the Jesuits attempted to convert the savage Apaches, and the celebrated Father Kino (Kuehn), cosmographer and missionary, undertook the task. He made such a favourable impression on them that the dynasty of the Jesuit missions in Arizona is named among them, but his death shortly after frustrated the design, and we hear no more of Jesuit missions to the tribe. In 1733, Father Aponte y Lis, a Franciscan labouring on the Texas mission, devoted his best efforts to winning over the Apaches. He persuaded the Spanish Viceroy to lend material assistance, and finally, in 1757, San Saba and San Luis de Amarillas were established; but the nomadic Apaches refused to settle on reservations, despite the efforts of Fathers Turrero, Santiesteban, Molina, and other Franciscans. Moreover, the neighbouring Indians resented the attempt to domesticate the Apaches, burned the missions, and murdered several of the fathers. Another mission, San Lorenzo on the Rio José, founded in 1761, was maintained for a few years by Fathers Ximenes and Bafos. Out of some 3,000 Apaches they induced about 400 to settle at the mission, and baptized 80 persons in danger of death. Toward the latter result were now entertained, as the Apaches allowed their children to be instructed and their sick to be visited, but the Comanches destroyed the settlement in 1769. We read of no more organized work among the Apaches. Soon after the United States Government had acquired the southwestern territories, it came into collision with the restless Apaches, and a relentless state of war with the tribe has existed practically down to the present day. In 1870 the Apaches of Arizona were visited by the Rev. A. Jouvenecou, a secular priest, but he found no Christians among them. A few Jecarelas Apaches, living dispersed among the Navajos, have been baptized, but as a tribe the Apaches have been little Christianized. Catholic missionaries and Indian agents agree in describing them at the present day as the most savage, degraded, and immoral of all our North American Indians. Their number is estimated at 5,200, of whom 300 have been removed to Oklahoma.

APARISI y GUIJARRO, ANTONIO, parliamentary orator, jurisconsult, Catholic controversialist, and Spanish litterateur, b. in Valencia, 28 Mar., 1815; d. in Madrid, 5 Nov., 1872. He was extremely gifted; of extensive knowledge, brilliant imagination, graceful and beautiful power of expression, and exquisite literary taste. As a man, he was modest, kind-hearted, and most charitable, a fervent Catholic and an ardent patriot. In 1839 he was admitted to the bar, and defended many criminal cases, winning them in almost every instance. He published poems and articles in the Revista de Novedades Vaquero (1841-42), in La Restauracion, in the Catholic review of Valencia (1843-44), and was editor of the newspaper, "El pensamiento de Valencia" (1857-58). He contributed to "La Esperanza," "La Estrella," and particularly to "La Regeneracion" (Nov., 1862, to Nov., 1872), Catholic newspaper of the followers of Madariaga. He was named at different times, and collaborator in the publication of the review "La Concordia" (1863-64).

He was sent as representative from Valencia to the Cortes (1858-65), where, as leader of the royalists in the House of Representatives, he delivered many eloquent discourses against the disentailment laws, in defence of Catholic union, in reprobation of despoiling the Pope of his temporal power, and on other vital questions touching the Church and Spain. In Paris, in 1869, he attempted to unite the royal families of Isabel II and Charles of Bourbon, and for dynastic reasons also went to Paris and London in 1869-70, and took part in the Carlist conference in Switzerland in April, 1870. He took the initiative in the formation in Paris of a Central Congress of the Carlist party. In 1860 he wrote the treatise "El Papa y Napoleón," and later four others: "Los tres Órdenes" (1869), "El Rey de España" (1869), "La cuestión dinástica" (1869), and "La Restauración" (1872), leaving unpublished "El libro del pueblo." In February or March of 1870 he had an audience with Pius IX, who bestowed on him many marks of special favour. In 1871 he was elected senator from Guipuzcoa. He was also made a member of the Royal Spanish Academy, but did not live to take his seat. The works of Aparisi were published in Madrid during the years 1873 to 1877, in five volumes, containing his biography as well as poems, discourses, political and academic, articles and treatises, and many forensic writings and speeches.

Aphellos, founder of a Gnostic sect; d. at an advanced age late in the second century. What little is known of his life is gleaned chiefly from fragments of his works and from his antagonism toward Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., V, xii), and from Tertullian's "Prescription against Heretics" (xxx). At Rome he separated from Marcion, whose most famous pupil he was, and went to Alexandria, where he met the visionary Philumenus, whose utterances he regarded as inspired. Besides collecting her works in a book entitled "Manifestations," he wrote an extensive work, Συνάγωγαν, an attack on Mosiac theology. The moral character of Aphellos is differently estimated according as one is influenced either by Rhodon's uncoloured picture of the aged heresiarch, or by the stories of scandals in his early life to which Tertullian, without exaggeration, refers.

Aphian (or Aphiad), Saint, an illustrious martyr, under the Emperor Maximian, c. 306. He was only eighteen when he entered the temple at Cesarea, where the prefect Urbanus was offering sacrifice. Seizing the outstretched hand that was presenting the incense, he approached the magistrate with the idolatrous act. The guards fell upon him furiously and, after cruelly torturing him, flung him into a dungeon. The next day he was brought before the Prefect, torn with iron claws, beaten with clubs, and burned over a slow fire, and then sent back to continue his torments. Three days later he was again thrown from prison and thrown into the sea with stones tied to his feet. Eusebius, an eyewitness, declares that an earthquake simultaneously shook the city, and that the sea flung up his corpse on the shore. He belonged to Lycia, but had withdrawn to Cape. The prefect's parents, who were both distinguished and rich, resisted his efforts to convert them to Christianity. St. Pamphilus was at Cesarea at the time, expounding Holy Scripture, and the young Aphian was one of his disciples. He lived at the house of Eusebius, but gave no intimation of his purpose to make the public protest which ended in his martyrdom. The Greeks refer to him as the brother of St. Eadius. In the old martyrlogies his feast was on the fifth, but the Bollandists pronounce for the second of April as the correct date. Acta SS., I, April; Butler, Lives of the Saints, 2 April.

Aphrata (Gr. Aphrētra, Syr. Αφραθάλ, or Phorhal).—The long list of Syrian writers whose works have come down to us is headed by Aphrata (fourth century), surnamed the "Persian Sage." The few biographical data which we possess of this illustrious author are gleaned from his own writings. From these we learn that he was born of pagan parents during the last half of the third century, veiled in the breast the Christian empire. After his conversion to Christianity he embraced the religious life, and was later elevated to the episcopate, on which occasion he assumed the Christian name of Jacob. The adoption of this name subsequently led to a confusion of identity, and for centuries the works of Aphrata were ascribed to the famous Jacob, Bishop of Nisibis (d. A.D. 338). It was not until the tenth century that the "Persian Sage" was finally identified with Aphrata, the name under which he is known to modern scholars. According to a MS. of the British Museum dated A.D. 1064 (Oront. 7, 81877) Aphrata was "bishop of the monastery of M corresponds on the eastern shore of the Tigris, near the modern Mosul in Mesopotamia. The ruins of this monastery, now called "Sheikh Matta," are still to be seen. It was here that his works are most of his life.

Regarding the date of his death, nothing is known. Enmises (Chron. Enm. 1907) supposes that Phorhal, or Aphrata, flourished in the time of Papas I., the Catholicus who died in A.D. 334. This is in accord with the data found in our author's writings which place the period of his literary activity between A.D. 337 and 345.

The writings of Aphrata consist of twenty-three "Demonstrations," or homilies on moral and controversial topics. The first twenty-two are alphabetical, each beginning with one of the Syriac letters in alphabetic order, and may be divided into two groups according to the time of their composition. The first ten, which were written in A.D. 337, treat of the "Faith," (iii) "Penitence," (vii) "Resurrection," (ix) "Humility," and (x) "Pastors." The second group, composed in A.D. 344, are entitled, (xi) "Circumcision," (xii) "The Passover," (xiii) "The Sabbath," (xiv) "Ecclesiastic," (xv) "Divine Meats," (xvi) "The Call of the Gentiles," (xvii) "Jesus the Messiah," (xviii) "Virginity," (xix) "Dispersion of the Cities," (xx) "Almsgiving," (xxi) "Persecution," (xxii) "Death and the Latter Times." To this collection is subjoined a twenty-third "Demonstration," composed in A.D. 345 and entitled "Concerning the Grape," in reference to Isaiua, lxv. 8. These homilies, which are also called "Epistles" because they are in the form of answers to the queries of a friend, constitute the earliest extant document of the Syrian Church, and besides their linguistic importance are of the highest value for the Catholic apologist. They abound with precious information on the most important questions of dogmatic and moral theology, liturgy, ecclesiastical, and even profane history, and are pregnant with important conclusions in favour of the conformity of the doctrines of the Catholic Church with those of the early Christian Church in the fourth century. St. Ephrem, for example, the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin, and her Divine Maternity, the foundation of the Church on St. Peter, and the existence of all the sacraments except Matrimony, which is not mentioned. In regard to the Holy Eucharist, Aphrata affirms that it is the real Body and Blood of Christ. In his seventh "Demonstration," he treats of penance and penitents, and represents the priest as a physician who is charged with the healing of a man's wounds. The sinner must make known to the physician his infirmities in order to be healed, i.e. he must confess his sins to the priest, who is bound to secrecy. Because of the numerous quotations from Holy Writ used by Aphrata, his writings are also very valuable for the history of the canon of Sacred Scripture and of exegesis in the early Mesopotamian Church.

The edict de princeps of the Syriac text of the twenty-three "Demonstrations" was issued by W. Wright, Patrologia Syriaca, the translation of the Aphrata. Since then another edition of the series of twelve has been published by the Benedictine scholar Dom Parrot [Grafin, Patrologia Syriaca (Paris, 1894), I], including a Latin version, and preceded by a learned and copious introduction. A German translation of the whole work was published by Bert (Gebruder Herder, Texte und Untersuchungen (Leipzig, 1888), III). An English translation of eight "Demonstrations," including an historical introduction, was published by Dr. John Gwynn (Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (New York, 1898), XIII).

Arius of Sica. A priest of the diocese of Sica, in proconsular Africa. Interest attaches to him only because of his appeal to Rome from his bishop's sentence of excommunication, and the consequent protracted parleying between Rome and Carthage about the privileges of the African church in regulating its own discipline. In the resentment which the peremptory exclusions of the Lateran synod provoked in the African bishops opponents of the Papacy read the denial by the Church of St. Augustine of the doctrine of Papal supremacy; and thus the case of Arius has come to be the classical example in anti-Roman controversial works, illustrating the fifth-century repudiation of Papal claims to disciplinary control. Arius was deposed by Urbanus, Bishop of Sica; for grave misconduct, appealed to Pope Zosimus, who, in view of irregularities in the bishop's procedure, ordered that the priest should be reinstated, and his bishop dismissed. Chagrined, perhaps, at the unworthy priest's success, a general synod of Carthage, in May, 418, forbade appeal "beyond the seas" of clerics inferior to bishops. Recognizing in what was virtually a restatement of previous African legislation an expression of displeasure on the part of the African bishops, Pope Zosimus sent a delegation to defend his right to receive certain appeals, especially those claimed by him at the Council of Nicaea, but which in fact were canons of the Council of Sardica. The African bishops who met the legates, while not recognizing these decrees as Nicene, accepted them pending verification. In May, 419, was held the sixteenth Council of Carthage, and there again the representations of Zosimus were accepted, awaiting the result of a comparison of the Nicene canons as they existed in Africa, in which the decrees cited by the Pope had not been found, with those of the churches of Antioch, Alexandria, and Constantinople. By the end of the year 419 Pope Boniface, who had succeeded Zosimus in December, 418, was informed by the Eastern codices that the alleged decrees; but, as the now repentant Arius had meantime been assigned to a new field of labour, interest in the affair subsided. The letter to Pope Boniface, while evidencing irritation at the arrogance of the legate Faustinus, contains nothing incompatible with belief in the Pope's supremacy.

Some four years later Arius relapsed into scandalous courses, was once more excommunicated, and again appealed to Rome. Pope Celestine, who had succeeded Boniface in September, 423, reinstated him and deputed the unwelcome Faustinus to smite him in conclusion before the African bishops. The legate's exasperating efforts in behalf of the unworthy priest were miserably thwarted by Arius's admission of his guilt. Incensed, in these provoking circumstances, by the heightened arro gance of Faustinus and the misinformed Pope's haste in sustaining Arius, a number of African bishops addressed to Celestine the famous letter, "Optaremus," in which they bitterly resent the insults of the tactless legate, and request that in future the popes will exercise due discretion in hearing appeals from Africa and exact from the African Church in such matters no more than was allowed for by the privileges of those bishops with all its boldness, cannot be construed into a denial of the Pope's jurisdiction by the Church of Africa. It simply voices the desire of the African bishops to continue the enjoyment of those privileges of partial home-rule which went by default to their church during the stormy period when the theory of universal papal dominion was too often reduced to practice, because of the trials which the growing church had to endure. But before the time of Arius, as the Sardican canons referred to attest, Western Europe had come to accept Rome as a court of last appeal in disciplinary causes. Africa, too, was now ready, and its readiness is shown by the case of Arius as well as by the records of like appeals to Rome to which St. Augustine himself bears witness.

Apocalypse. From the verb ἀποκάλυψις, to reveal, is the name given to the last book in the Bible. Protestants call it the Book of Revelation, the title which it bears in the King James Version. Although a Christian work, the Apocalypse belongs to a class of literature dealing with eschatological subjects and much in vogue among the Jews of the first century before, and after, Christ.

AUTHENTICITY.—The author of the Apocalypse calls himself John. "John to the seven churches which are in Asia" (Ap., i, 4). And again, "I, John, your brother and your partner in tribulation...hears in the island which is called Patmos, for the word of God" (i, 9). The Seer does not further specify his personality. But from tradition we know that the Seer in the Apocalypse was John the Apostle, the son of Zebedee, the Beloved Disciple of Jesus. At the end of the second century the Apocalypse was acknowledged by the historical representatives of the principal churches as the genuine work of John, the Apostle. In Asia, Melito, Bishop of Sardis, one of the Seven Churches of the Apocalypse, acknowledged the "Revelation of John" and wrote a commentary on it (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., IV, 26). In Gaul, Irenaeus firmly believes in its Divine and Apostolic authority (Adv. Haer., IV, 20). In Africa, Tertullian frequently quotes Revelation without apparent misgivings as to its authenticity (C. Marcion, III, 14, 25). In Italy, Bishop Hippolytus assigns it to the Apostle St. John, and the Muratorian Fragment (a document about the beginning of the third century) enumerates it along with the other canonical writings, adding, if it is the Apocalypse of St. Peter, but with the clause, quum quidam ex nostris in ecclesia legi noluit. The Vetus Itala, moreover, the standard Latin version in Italy and Africa during the third century, contained the Apocalypse. In Egypt, Clement and Origen believed without hesitation in its Joanne authority. They were both scholars and men of critical judgment. Their opinion is all the more valuable as they had no sympathy with the millennial teaching of the book. They contented themselves with an allegorical interpretation of certain passages but never ventured to impugn its authority. Approaching more closely the apostolic age we have the testimony of St. Justin Martyr, about the middle of the second century. From Eusebius, (Hist. Eccl., IV, xviii, 8), as well as from his dialogue with the Jew, Tryphon (c. 81), held in Corinth in the time of Hadrian, so essential to the apostolic literature, that he admitted the authenticity of the Apocalypse.

Another witness of about the same time is Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, a place not far from Ephesus. If he himself had not been a hearer of St. John, he certainly was personally acquainted with several of his disciples (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., III, 39). His evidence, however, is not of the importance of Caesareus, in the prologue to his commentary on the Apocalypse, informs us that Papias admitted its inspired character. From the Apocalypse undoubtedly Papias derived his ideas of the millennium, on which account Eusebius decries his authority, declaring him to have been a man of limited understanding. The apostolic writings which are extant furnish no evidence for the authenticity of the book.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST ITS AUTHENTICITY.—The Alogi, about A. D. 200, a sect so called because of the doctrine of the logos-doctrine, deny the authenticity of the Apocalypse, assigning it to Cæ- rinthus (Epiphanius, LI, 33; cf. Irenæus, Adv. Haer., III, 11, 9). Caius, a presbyter in Rome, of about the same time, holds a similar opinion. Eusebius quotes his words taken from his Disputation: "But Cærinthus by means of revelations which he pretended were written by a great Apostle falsely pretended to wonderful things, asserting that after the resurrection there would be an earthly kingdom" (Hist. Eccl., III, 28). The most formidable antagonist of the authority of the Apocalypse is Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, disciple of Origen. He is not opposed to the suggestion that Cærinthus is the writer of the Apocalypse. "For," he says, "this is the doctrine of Cærinthus, that there will be an earthly reign of Christ, and as he was a lover of the body he dreamed that he would reign in the gratification of the sensual appetite". He himself did not adopt the view that Cærinthus was the writer. He regarded the Apocalypse as the work of an inspired man but not of an Apostle (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., VII, 25). During the fourth and fifth centuries the tendency to exclude the Apocalypse from the list of sacred books continued to increase in the Syro-Palestinian churches. Eusebius expresses no definite opinion. He contents himself simply with making the statement: "It is accepted among the canonical books but by others rejected" (Hist. Eccl., III, 25). St. Cyril of Jerusalem does not name it among the canonical books (Catech., IV, 33-36); nor does it occur on the list of the Synod of Laodices, or on that of Gregory of Nazianzus. Perhaps the most telling argument against the apostolic authorship of the book is its omission from the Peshito, the Syrian Vulgate. But although the authorities giving evidence against the authenticity of the Apocalypse deserve full consideration they cannot annul or impair the older and unanimous testimony of the churches. The opinion of Origen, however, moreover, is not free from criticism. From the manner in which Dionysius argued the question, it is evident that he thought the book dangerous as occasioning crude and sensual notions concerning the resurrection. In the West the Church persevered in its tradition of apostolic authorship. St. Jerome, however, seems to have been influenced by the doubts of the East.

THE APOCALYPSE COMPARED WITH THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—The relation between the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel has been discussed by authors, both ancient and modern. Some affirm and others deny their mutual resemblance. The learned Alex-

andrine Bishop, Dionysius, drew up in his time a list of differences to which modern authors have had little to add. He begins by observing that whereas the Gospel is anonymous, the writer of the Apocalypse prefixes his name, John. He next points out how the characteristic terminology of the Fourth Gospel is totally absent from the Apocalypse, and so essential to the apostolic literature, that the Apocalypse is not in the Apocalypse. The terms, "life", "light", "grace", "truth", do not occur in the latter. Nor did the crudeness of diction on the part of the Apocalypse escape him. The Greek of the Gospel he pronounces correct as to grammar, and he even gives its author credit for a certain elegance of style. But in the Greek of the Apocalypse he finds barbarous and disfigured by solecisms. He, therefore, inclines to ascribe the works to different authors (Hist. Eccl., VII, 25). The upholders of a common authorship reply that these differences may be accounted for by bearing in mind the peculiar nature and aim of each work. The Apocalypse contains visions and revelations. In conformity with other books of the same kind, e. g. the Book of Daniel, the Seer prefixed his name to his work. The Gospel on the other hand is written in the form of an historical record. In the Bible, works of that kind do not bear the signification of the term "Gospel". As regards the absence of Joannine terminology in the Apocalypse. The object of the Gospel is to prove that Jesus is the life and the light of the world, the fullness of truth and grace. But in the Apocalypse Jesus is the conqueror of Satan and his kingdom. The defects of grammar in the Apocalypse are concealed. Some of them are quite obvious. Let the reader but notice the habit of the author to add an apposition in the nominative to a word in an oblique case; e. g. iii, 12; xiv, 12; xx, 2. It further contains some Hebrew idioms: e. g. ἐπαξίασεν equivalent to ἐπιστολήν, the one that is to come", instead of ἐπιστολήν, "the lamb making atonement for sin by its blood is taken from Isaías, lii. Throughout the Apocalypse the portrait of Jesus is that of the lamb. Through the book runs the thought of its being the Lamb with seven seals and has triumphed over Satan. In the Gospel Jesus is pointed out by the Baptist as the lamb of God . . . him who taketh away the sin of the world" (John, i, 29). Some of the circumstances of His death resemble the rite observed in the eating of the paschal lamb, the symbol of redemption. His crucifixion takes place on the Sabbath day on which the Passover was eaten (John, xviii, 28). While hanging on the cross, His executioners did not break the bones in His body, that the prophecy might be fulfilled: "no bone in it shall be broken" (John, xix, 38). The name Logos, "Word", is quite peculiar to the Apocalypse. The word is not found in the Fourth Gospel. The first sentence of the Gospel is, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God". The first epistle of St. John begins, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard . . . of the word of life". So one critic on the Apocalypse says, "And his name is called the Word of God" (xix, 13).

TIME AND PLACE.—The Seer himself testifies that the visions he is about to narrate were seen by him whilst in Patmos. "I John . . . was in the island which is called Patmos, for the word of God and for the testimony of Jesus" (i, 9). Patmos is one of the group of small islands close to the coast of Asia Minor, about twelve geographical miles from Ephesus. Tradition, as Eusebius tells us, has handed down that John was banished to Patmos in the reign of Domitian for the sake of his testimony of God's word (Hist. Eccl., III, 18). He also mentions the phrase: “for the word of God and for the testimony of Jesus” (i, 9). It is true that the more probable meaning of this phrase is, “in order to hear the word of God”, etc., and not “banished because of the word of God”, etc., (cf. i, 2). But it was quite natural that the Seer should have regarded his banishment to Patmos as prearranged by Divine Providence, and that he might himself bear a testimony to God's word. The tradition recorded by Eusebius finds confirmation in the words of the Seer describing himself as “a brother and partaker in tribulation” (i, 9). Irenæus places the Seer's exile in Patmos at the end of Domitian's reign. “Pene sub nostro seculo ad fines Domitianis imperii” (Adv. Haer., V, 4). The Emperor Domitian reigned A.D. 81–96. In all matters of Joannine tradition Irenæus deserves exceptional credit. His lifetime bordered upon the Apostolic age and his master, St. Polycarp, had been among the disciples of St. John. Eusebius, chronicling the statement of Irenæus without any addition of his own, gives the year of the Seer's exile the fourteenth of Domitian's reign. St. Jerome also, without reserve or hesitation, follows the same tradition. “Quarto decimo anno, secundum post Neronem persecutionem movente Domitianis, in Patmos insulam relegatus, scriptum Apocalypsim” (Ex libro de Script. Eccl.). Against the united testimony of these three witnesses of tradition the statement of Epiphanius, placing the Seer's banishment in the reign of Claudius, A.D. 41–54, appears exceedingly improbable (Herr., iii, 12, 33).

The Epistles to the seven Churches. The Churches are Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. The Epistles are short exhortations to the Christians to remain steadfast in their faith, to beware of false apostles, and to abstain from fornication and from meat offered to idols.

(2) The Book with the Seven Seals. Chaps. iv and v. The vision of God enthroned upon the Cherubim. The throne is surrounded by twenty-four elders. In the right hand of God is a scroll sealed with seven seals. In the midst of the Cherubim and the elders the Seer beholds a Lamb “a lamb as it had been occisus”, having on its throat the scar of the gash by which it was slain. The Seer weeps because no one either in heaven or on earth can break the seals. He is comforted on hearing that the Lamb was worthy to do so, because of the redemption it had wrought by its blood. The portrait of the throne is taken from Ezek., i. Comparison in both cases of the description of the four beasts. They resemble a lion, an ox, a man, and an eagle. Their bodies are full of eyes (cf. Ap., iv, 8; and Ez., x, 12). The twenty-four elders were probably suggested by the twenty-four courses of priests ministering in the Temple. The Lamb slain for the sins of mankind is from Isaacs, iii, 14.

Chaps. vi and vii. The seven seals and the numbering of the Saints. At the opening of four seals, four horses appear. Their colour is white, black, red, and sallow, or green (χαλκός = γάλακτος, piebald). They signify conquest, slaughter, death, and destruction. The vision is taken from Gen., xxi, 14. At the opening of the fifth seal the Seer beholds the martyrs that were slain and hears their prayers for the final triumph. At the opening of the sixth seal the predestined to glory are numbered and marked. The Seer beholds them divided into two classes. First, the 600,000 Jews, 12,000 per tribe; and he might be under the control of God's word. The tradition recorded by Eusebius finds confirmation in the words of the Seer describing himself as “a brother and partaker in tribulation” (i, 9). Irenaeus places the Seer's exile in Patmos at the end of Domitian's reign. “Pene sub nostro seculo ad fines Domitianis imperii” (Adv. Haer., V, 4). The Emperor Domitian reigned A.D. 81–96. Their colour is white, black, red, and sallow, or green (χαλκός = γάλακτος, piebald). They signify conquest, slaughter, death, and destruction. The vision is taken from Gen., xxi, 14. leopard, the third beast of Daniel (vii, 6); it had feet like a bear, the second beast of Daniel (vii, 5); and ten horns which are ten kings. The great dragon gives full power unto the beast, whereupon all the world worship it (viz. those whose names are not contained in the book of the lamb). The followers of the beast have its mark on their head and hand. The beast from the land has two horns like a lion, however lies in the ways of the beast. The means of tokens and miracles. Throughout the remainder of the book it is called the false prophet. Its office is to assist the beast from the sea, and to induce men to adore its image. The first act of the drama concludes with a promise of victory over the beast by the lamb of God.

xv, xvi. The seven vials. They are the seven plagues preceding the destruction of the great city, Babylon. They were for the greater part suggested by the Egyptian plagues. The first vial is poured out on the earth. Men and beasts are smitten with ulcers (Ex., ix, 10). The second and third vial upon the seas and rivers. They become blood (Ex., vii, 20–21). The fourth vial upon the sun. It burns men to death. The fifth vial upon the throne of the beast. It causes great darkness (Ex., x, 11–29). The sixth vial upon the Euphrates. Its waters are dried up and form a passage for the kings of the East (Ex., xiv.). The seventh upon the air. Storm and earthquake destroy Babylon.

Third Act. Chaps. xvii, xviii. The great harlot. She is seated upon the scarlet beast with the seven heads and ten horns. She is robed in scarlet and decked with gold. On her head is written: Mystery, Babylon the great. The kings of the earth commit fornication with her. But the day of her visitation has come. She is made a desolate place, the habitation of unclean animals (Is., xiii, 21, 22). Her fall is lamented by the rulers and merchants of the earth.

Fourth Act. Chaps. xix, xx.—The victory over the beast and the great dragon. A knight appears mounted on a white horse. His name is “The Word of God”. He defeats the beast and the false prophet. They are cast alive in the pool of fire. Their defeat is followed by the first resurrection and the reign of Christ for a thousand years. The martyrs rise to life and partake with Christ in glory and happiness. Daniel, the great dragon, and beast are cast into chains. At their completion he is once more set at large to torment the earth. He deceives the nations Gog and Magog. These two names are taken from Ezek., chaps. xxviii, xxxix, where, however, Gog is the king of Magog. At last he also is cast for all eternity in the pool of fire. Hereupon the general judgment and the resurrection take place.

Fifth Act. Chaps. xxi, xxii. The new Jerusalem (cf., Es., xi-xlvi.). God dwells in the midst of His saints who enjoy complete happiness. The new Jerusalem is the spouse of the lamb. The names of the Twelve Tribes and the Twelve Apostles are written on its gates. God and the lamb are the sanctuary in this new city.

Epilogue. Verses 18–21. The prophecy of the book is soon to be fulfilled. The Seer warns the reader not to add anything to it or take away from it under pain of forfeiting his share in the heavenly city.

Purpose of the Book.—From this cursory review of the book, it is evident that the Seer was influenced by the prophecies of Daniel more than by any other book. Daniel was written with the object of comforting the Jews under the cruel persecution of Antiochus. The Seer who wrote the Apocalypse had a similar purpose. The Christians were persecuted in the reign of Domitian. The danger of apostacy was great. False prophets went about, trying to seduce the people to conform to the heathen practices and to take part in the Caesar-worship. The Seer urges his Christians to remain true to their faith and to bear witness for Christ and His kingdom. He encourages them with the promise of an ample and speedy reward. He assures them that Christ’s triumphant coming is at hand. Both in the beginning and at the end of his book the Seer is most emphatic in telling his people that the hour of victory is nigh. The pagans, saying that it was of deceit, he tells them that those things which are written in it; for the time is at hand” (i, 3). He closes his visions with the pathetic words: “He that giveth testimony of these things saith, Surely I come quickly: Amen, Come, Lord Jesus”. With the coming of Christ the woes of the Christians will be avenged. Their oppressors will be given up to the judgment and the everlasting torments. The martyrs that have fallen will be raised to life, that they may share the pleasures of Christ’s kingdom, the millennium. Yet this is but a prelude to the everlasting beatitude which follows after the general resurrection. It is an article of faith that Christ will return at the end of time to judge the living and the dead. But the time of His second advent is unknown. “But of that day and hour no one knoweth, no, not the angels of heaven, but the Father alone” (Matt., xxiv, 36). It would appear, and is so held by many, that the Christians of the Apostolic age expected that Christ’s return during their own lifetime was near. “This seems to be the more obvious meaning of several passages both in the Epistles and Gospels (cf. John, xxi, 21–23; Thess., iv, 13–18). The Christians of Asia Minor, and the Seer with them, appear to have shared this fallacious expectation. Their mistaken hope, however, did not affect the soundness of their belief in the essential part of the dogma. Their views of a millennial period of corporal happiness were equally erroneous. The Church has wholly cast aside the doctrine of a millennium previous to the resurrection. St. Augustine has perhaps more than any one else helped to free the Church from all crude fancies as regards its pleasures. He explained the millennium allegorically, and applied it to the Church of Christ on earth. With the foundation of the Church the millennium began. The first resurrection is the spiritual resurrection of the soul from sin (De Civ. Dei, Lib. XX). Thus the number, 1,000, is to be taken indefinitely.

Structure of the Book and its Literary Composition.—The subject-matter of the Apocalypse required a threefold division. The first part comprises the seven exhortatory letters. The leading idea in the second part is the wisdom of Christ. It is symbolized by the book with seven seals. In it are written the eternal decrees of God touching the end of the world, and the final victory of good over evil. No one except Jesus, the lamb slain for the sins of the world, is worthy to break the seals and read its contents. The third part describes the power of Christ over Satan and his kingdom. The lamb slays the dragon and the beast. This has been developed in a drama of five acts. In five successive scenes we see before us the struggle, the fall of Babylon, the harlot, the victory, and final beatitude. The third part is not only the most important, but also the most successful from a literary point of view.
that is weird and grotesque. He delights in portraying locusts with hair like that of women and horses with tails like serpents. There are occasional passages revealing a sense of literary beauty. God removes the curtain of the firmament as a scribe rolls up his scrolls. The stars fall from the heavens like figs from the fig-tree shaken by the storm (vi, 12–14). On the whole, however, the Seer shows more love for Oriental splendour than the appreciation of true beauty.

INTERPRETATION.—It would be alike wearisome and useless to enumerate even the more prominent applications made of the Apocalypse. Racial hatred and religious rancour have at all times found in its vivid, suggestive, and alluring matter a field for their exercise. By that meaning of the name, persons as Mahomet, the Pope, Napoleon, etc., have in turn been identified with the beast and the harlot. To the "reformers" particularly the Apocalypse was an inexhaustible quarry where to dig for invertebrates that they might hurl them against the Roman hierarchy. The seven hills of Rome, the scarlet robes of the cardinals, and the unfortunate abuses of the papal court made the application easy and tempting. Owing to the patient and strenuous research of scholars, the interpretation of the Apocalypse has been transferred to a field free from the obscurity of the ostracism. By that meaning the Seer is determined by the rules of common exegesis. Apart from the resurrection, the millennium, and the plagues preceding the final consummation, they see in his visions references to the leading events of his time. Their method of interpretation may be called historic as compared with the theological and political application of former ages. The key to the mysteries of the book they find in chap. xvi, 8–14. For thus says the Seer: "Let here the mind that hath understanding give heed."

"The beast from the sea that had received plenteous of power from the dragon, or Satan, is the Roman Empire, or rather, Cæsar, its supreme representative. The token of the beast with which its servants are marked is the image of the emperor on the coins of the realm. This seems to be the obvious meaning of the passage, that all business transactions, all buying and selling were impossible to them that had not the mark of the beast (Ap., xiii, 17). Again, that it is proximate to the time of Christ it is obvious from the instruction on which the image of Cæsar was stamped (Matt., xxii, 15–22). But it should be borne in mind that the horror of the Jews for the imperial images was principally due to the policy of Caligula. He confiscated the property of the Jews and established their temples into heathen temples by placing his statue in them. He even sought to erect an image of himself in the Temple of Jerusalem (Jos., Ant., XVIII, vii, 2). The seven heads of the beast are seven emperors. Five of them the Seer says are fallen. They are Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. The year of Nero's death is A. D. 68. The Seer goes on to say, "One is", namely Vespasian, A. D. 70–79. He is the sixth emperor. The seventh, we are told by the Seer, "is not yet come. But when he comes his reign will be short". Titus is meant, who reigned but two years (79–81). The eighth emperor is Domitian (81–96). Of him the Seer has something very peculiar to say. He is identified with the beast. He is described as the one that "was, and is not, and shall come up out of the bottomless pit" (xvii, 8). In verse 11 it is added: "And the beast which was and is not: the same also is, and is of the same stock with him. And he speaks like a demented langur. But the clue to the solution is furnished by a popular belief largely spread at the time. The death of Nero had been witnessed by few. Chiefly in the East a notion had taken hold of the mind of the people that Nero was still alive. Gentiles, Jews, and Christians were under the illusion that he was hiding himself, and as was commonly thought, he had gone over to the Parthians, the most troublesome foes of the empire. From there they expected him to return at the head of a mighty army to avenge himself on his enemies. The existence of this fanciful belief is a well-attested fact.Tacitus speaks : "Asia falsa exterrita velut Nero adventaret, vario super ejus exitu rumore eoque pluribus vivere eum fingebant credientibusque" (Hist., II, 8). So also Dio Chrysostomus: καὶ νῦν (about A. D. 100) ἦν πᾶντες ἐνθυμομένοι γὰρ, ὅ τι δὲ πλὴντο καὶ ἀποκρινόμενον (Ones., 21, 10; cf. Suet., "Ner.," V, 57, 58; and the Sibyls, Catull., I, 7; V, 28–33). Thus the contemporaries of the Seer believed Nero to be alive and expected his return. The Seer either shared their belief or utilized it for his own purpose. Nero had made a name for himself by his cruelty and licentiousness. The Christians in particular had reason to dread him. Under him the first persecution took place. The second occurred under Domitian. But unlike the previous one, it was not confined to Italy, but spread throughout the provinces. Many Christians were put to death, many were banished (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., III, 17–19). In A. D. 64 Nero gave way to the means of calumny, and the second Nero, "Nero redivivus". Hence he described him as "the one that was, that is not, and that is to return". Hence also he counts him as the eighth and at the same time makes him one of the preceding seven; viz. the fifth, Nero. The identification of the two emperors suggested itself all the more readily since even pagan authors called Domitian a second Nero (calvinus Nero, Juvenal, IV, 38). The popular belief concerning Nero's death and return seems to be referred to also in the passage (xiii, 3): "And I saw one of its heads as it were slain to death: and its death's wound was healed". The ten horns are commonly explained as the vassal rulers under the supremacy of Rome. They are described as kings (βασιλεῖς), here to be taken in a wider sense, that they are not real kings, but received power to rule with the beast. Their power, moreover, is but for "one hour," signifying its short duration and instability. In the Seer he marked the beast with the number 666. His purpose was that by this number people may know it. "He that has understanding, let him count the numbers of the beast. For it is the number of a man: and his number is six hundred and sixty-six". A human number, i.e. intelligible by the common counting. The number 666 expresses the change of Jewish genealogy. Its object is to conceal a name by substituting for it a cipher of equal numerical value to the letters composing it. For a long time interpreters tried to decipher the number 666 by means of the Greek alphabet, e. g. Iren., "Adv. Hær.," V, 33. Their efforts have yielded no satisfactory result. Better success has been obtained by using the Hebrew alphabet. Many scholars have come to the conclusion that Nero is meant. For when the name "Nero Cæsar" is spelled with Hebrew letters (אָנָא בֶּלַע), it yields the cipher 666. א = 50, ב = 200, נ = 50, כ = 50, ז = 50, ד = 50; ת = 600; נ = 500; א = 500; ד = 500; ב = 500. Thus, 666. The second beast, that from the land, the pseudo-prophet, whose office was to assist the beast from the sea, probably signifies the work of seduction carried on by apostate Christians. They endeavoured to make their fellow Christians adopt the heathen practices and submit to them. All this sounds like frantic language. But the clue to its solution is furnished by a popular belief largely spread at the time. The death of Nero had been witnessed by few. Chiefly in the East a notion had taken hold of the mind of the people that Nero was still born is Christ; her other seed is the community of the faithful. In this interpretation, of which we have given a summary, there are two difficulties: (1) In the enumeration of the emperors three are passed over, viz. Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. But this omission may be explained by the shortness of their reigns. Each one of the three reigned but a few months. (2) The Apocatastasis of the reign of Domitian. But according to the computation given above, the Seer himself assigns his work to the reign of Vespasian. For if this computation be correct, Vespasian is the emperor whom he designates as “the one that is”. To this objection, however, it may be answered that it was the custom with the writers of Daniel and the Sibylline books, to cast their visions into the form of prophecies and give them the appearance of being the work of an earlier date. No literary fraud was thereby intended. It was merely a peculiar style of writing adopted as suiting their subject. The Seer of the Apocalypse follows this practice. Though actually banished to Patmos in the reign of Domitian, after the destruction of Jerusalem, he wrote as if he had been there and had seen his visions in the reign of Vespasian when the temple perhaps yet existed. Cf. II, 1, 2.

It is not proper without mentioning the theory advanced by the German scholar Vischer. He holds the Apocalypse to have been originally a purely Jewish composition, and to have been changed into a Christian work by the insertion of those sections that deal with Christian subjects. From a doctrinal point of view, we think, it cannot be objected to. There are other instances where inspired writers have availed themselves of non-canonical literature. Intrinsically considered it is not improbable. The Apocalypse abounds in passages which bear no specific Jewish character but, on the contrary, show a decidedly Jewish complexion. Yet on the whole the theory is but a conjecture. (See also Apocrypha.)

C. VAN DEN BIESEN.

Apocatastasis (Gr., ἀποκατάστασις; Lat., restitution in pristinum statum, restoration to the original condition), a name given in the history of theology to the doctrine which teaches that a time will come when all free creatures shall share in the grace of salvation. It is often called restorationism, and is closely connected with or syncretized with the doctrine of universal salvation. This doctrine was explicitly taught by St. Gregory of Nyssa, and in more than one passage. It first occurs in his “De anima et resurrectione” (P. G., XLVI, cols. 100, 101), where, in speaking of the punishment by fire assigned to souls after death, he compares it to the process whereby gold is refined in a furnace, through being separated from the dross with which it is alloyed. The punishment by fire is not, therefore, an end in itself, but is ameliorative; the very reason of its infliction is to separate the good from the evil in the soul. The process, moreover, is a painful one; the sharpness and duration of the pain are such as to cause hatred of the punishment among the guilty; the flame lasts so long as there is any evil left to destroy. A time, then, will come, when all evil shall cease to be since it has no existence of its own apart from the free will, in which it inheres; when every free will shall be turned to God, shall be in God and to the evil shall no more have wherein to exist. Thus, St. Gregory of Nyssa, the first to use the term “apocatastasis”, believed that the last evil will be destroyed and that the universe will be restored in its original state. This is the doctrine of the apocatastasis as taught by St. Gregory of Nyssa.

Deus erit omnis in omnibus (I Cor., xx, 28), which means that evil shall, ultimately, have an end, since if God be all, then there is no longer any place for evil (cols. 104, 105; cf. col. 152). St. Gregory recourses to the same thought of the final annihilation of evil, in his “Oratio catechica”, ch. xxvi; the same comparison of fire which purges gold of its impurities is to be found there; so also shall the power of God purify nature of that which is preternatural, namely, of evil. Such purification will be painful, as is a surgical operation, but the phantom of the Apocatastasis is complete. And, when this restoration shall have been accomplished (ἡ εἰς τὸ ἄρχων ἀποκατάστασις τῶν νῦν ἐν κακίᾳ κοιμώματι), all creation shall give thanks to God, both the souls which have had no need of purification, and those that shall have needed it. Not only man, however, shall be freed from evil, but the devils and the evil enmity into the world (τὸς τὸν ἐναντίον τῆς κακίας ἐνθεώ, καὶ αὐτὸν τῆς τῆς κακίας εὐφυρή λίμνης. P. G., XLV, col. 69.) The same teaching is to be found in the “De mortuis” (ibid., col. 550). Bardenhewer justly observes (“Patrologie”, Freiburg, 1901, p. 266) that St. Gregory says elsewhere no less concerning the eternity of the fire, and of the punishment of the lost, but that the Saint himself understood this eternity as a period of very long duration, yet one which has a limit. Compare with this “Contra Usurarios” (XLVI, col. 436), where the suffering of the lost is spoken of as eternal, aeterna, and “Oratio Catechet.”, XXVI (XLV, col. 69), where evil is annihilated after a long period of time, μακρὰς τετελεῖσθαι. These verbal contradictions explain why the defenders of orthodoxy should have thought that St. Gregory of Nyssa’s writings had been tampered with by heretics. St. Germanus of Constantinople, writing in the eighth century was so far as to say that those who held that the devils and lost souls would one day be set free had dared “to instil into the pure and most healthful spring of his [Gregory’s] writings the black and dangerous poison of the error of Origen, and to cunningly attribute this foolish heresy to a man famous alike for his virtue and his learning” (quoted by Photius, Bibl. Cod., 223; P. G., CIII, col. 1105). Tillemont, “Mémoires pour l’histoire ecclésiastique” (Paris, 1703), IX, p. 602, inclines to the opinion that St. Germanus had good grounds for what he said. We must, however, admit, with Bardenhewer (loc. cit.) that the explanation given by St. Germanus is not the true one. This was, also, the opinion of Petauus, “Theolog. dogmat.” (Antwerp, 1700), III, “De Angeliia”, 109–111.

The doctrine of the apocatastasis is not, indeed, peculiar to St. Gregory of Nyssa, but is taken from Origen, whose writings concern the question of the eternity of punishment. Tixeront has well said that in his “De principiis” (I, vi, 3) Origen does not venture to assert that all the evil angels shall sooner or later return to God (P. G., XI, col. 168, 169); while in his “Comment. in Rom.”, VIII, 9 (P. G., XIV, col. 1186), he states that the devils, unlike the Jews, will not be converted, even at the end of time. Elsewhere, on the other hand, and as a rule, Origen teaches the apocatastasis, the final restoration of all intelligent creatures to friendship with God. Tixeront writes thus concerning the matter: “Not all shall enjoy the beatitude of the happy life which each person shall enjoy in many mansions, but all shall attain to it. If Scripture sometimes seems to speak of the punishment of the wicked as eternal, this is in order to terrify sinners, to lead them back into the right way, and it is always possible, with attention, to discover the true meaning of these texts. It must, however, always be accepted as a principle that the punishment of the just will be amended, and that the sole end of His greatest anger is the amelioration of the guilty. As the doctor uses fire and steel in certain deep-seated diseases, so God does but use the fire of hell to heal the impenitent...
All souls, all intelligent beings that have gone astray, shall, therefore, be restored sooner or later to God's friendship. The evolution will be long, incalculably long in some cases, but a time will come when God shall be all in all. Death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed, the body shall be made spiritual, the soul freed from the material form and there shall be, in the universe, only peace and unity." [Tixeront, Histoire des dogmes, (Paris, 1905), I, 304, 305.]

The palmary text of Origen should be referred to "De principiis", III, 6, 6; (P. G., XI, col. 338-340). For Origen's teaching and the passages wherein it is expressed consult H. Schlier, "De fornici Platonici Ratio Platonici" in P. G., XVII, col. 1023-26) and Petavius, "Theol. dogm., De Angelis", 170-109; also Harnack ["Dogmengeschichte" (Freiburg, 1894), I, 645, 646], who translates the teaching of Origen on this point with that of Clement of Alexandria. Tixeront also writes very aptly concerning this matter: "Clement allows that sinful souls shall be sanctified after death by a spiritual fire, and that the wicked shall, likewise, be punished by fire. Will their chastisement be eternal? It would not seem so. In the Stromata, VII, 2 (P. G., IX, col. 416), the punishment of which Clement speaks, and which suggests a judgment in support of repentance, is referred to repentance; in chapter xvi (col. 541) the author lays down the principle that God does not punish, but corrects; that is to say that all chastisement on His part is remedial. If Origen be supposed to have started from this principle in order to arrive at the doctrine of the resurrection, then the doctrine of Gregory of Nyssa is well as well—"it is extremely probable that Clement of Alexandria understood it in the same sense" (Histoire des dogmes, I, 277). Origen, however, does not seem to have regarded the doctrine of the resurrection as one meant to be preached to all, it being enough for the generality of the faithful to know that it was accomplished. (Contra Celsum, VI, 26 in P. G., XI, col. 1332.)

The doctrine, then, was first taught by Origen, and by Clement of Alexandria, and was an influence in their Christianity due to Platonism, as Petavius has plainly shown (Theol. dogmat. De Angelis, 100), following St. Augustine "De civitate Dei" XXI, 15. Compare Janet, "La philosophie de Platon" (Paris, 1869), I, 603. It is evident, moreover, that the doctrine involves a purely natural scheme of divine justice and of redemption. (Plato, Republic, X, 614.)

It was through Origen that the Platonist doctrine of the resurrection had been held by St. Gregory of Nyssa, and simultaneously to St. Jerome, at least during the time that St. Jerome was an Origenist. It is certain, however, that St. Jerome understands it only of the baptized: "In restitutione omnium, quando corpus totius ecclesiae nunc dispersum atque laceratum, verus medicus Christus Jesus sanaturus ademerit, unusquisque sequendum mensuram fidei et cognitionis Filii Dei... suum recipiet locum et inaeptud id esse quod fuerat." (Comment. in Eph., iv, 16; P. G., XXVI, col. 503.) Everywhere else St. Jerome teaches that the punishment of the devils and of the impious, that is of those who have not come to the Faith, shall be eternal. (See Petavius, Theol. dogmat., De Angelis, 111, 112.) The "Ambrosiaster" on the other hand seems to have extended the benefits of redemption to the devils, (In Eph., iii, 10; P. L., XVII, col. 382), yet the interpretation of the "Ambrosiaster" on this point is not devoid of difficulty. [See Petavius, p. 111; also Harnack de la philosophie positive, depuis l'origine, etc. (Paris, 1904) 187.]

From the moment, however, that anti-Origenism prevailed, the doctrine of the resurrection was definitely abandoned. St. Augustine protests more strongly than any other writer against an error so contrary to the doctrine of the necessity of grace. See, especially, his "De gestis Pelagii", I; "In Origene dignissime detestatur Ecclesia, quod etiam illi quo Dominus dicit: terno supplicio puniendos, et ipse diabolos et angelos eius, post tempus licet proligerium pugnari liberabantur a peccat, et sanctis hominum Dei regem praebemus, tamen invidemus ad hereburnt." Augustine here alludes to the sentence pronounced against Pelagius by the Council of Diospolis, in 415 (P. L., XLIV, col. 325). He moreover recurs to the subject in many passages of his writings, and in Book XXI "De Civitate Dei" sets himself earnestly to prove the eternity of punishment. The author, therefore, in this error concerning its intrinsically purgatorial character. We note further, that the doctrine of the resurrection was held in the East not only by St. Gregory of Nyssa, but also by St. Gregory of Nazianzus as well; "De seipso", 566 (P. G., XXXV, col. 1010), but the latter, though he asks the question, finally decides neither for nor against it, but rather leaves the answer to God. Köstlin, in the "Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie" (Leipzig, 1896), I, 617, art. "Apokatastasis", names Diodorus of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia as having also held the doctrine of the resurrection, but cites no passages in support of this statement. The doctrine was formally condemned in the first of the famous anathemas pronounced at the Council of Constantinople in 543; Harduin, Coll. Conc. III, 254.—Et sive antiquis apos tostatique praebebat, ætatem æternum. [See, also, Justinian, Liber adversus Originem, anathemas 7 and 9 (P. G., LXXVI, col. 989).] The doctrine was then censured, but looked on as heterodox by the Church.

It was destined, nevertheless, to be revived in the works of ecclesiastical writers, and it would be interesting to verify Köstlin's and Bardenhewer's statement that it is to be traced in Bar Sudali, Dionysius the Areopagite, Maximus the Confessor, Scotus Erigena, and Amalric of Bena. It reappears in the Reformation in the writings of Denk (d. 1527), and Harnack has not hesitated to assert that nearly all the Reformers were apocatastasticals at heart, and that it accounts for their aversion to the traditional teaching concerning the sacraments (Dogmengeschichte, III, 661). The doctrine of the resurrection viewed as a belief in a universal salvation is found among the Anabaptists, the Moravian Brethren, the Christadelphians, among rationalistic Protestants, and finally among the professed Universalists. It has also, of course, been held by such philosophic Protestants as Schleiermacher, and by a few Roman Catholics, for instance, in England, Eckstein and Pflaster in Germany, Matter in France. Consult Köstlin, art., cit., and Grétil, "Exposé de théologie systématique" (Paris, 1890), IV, 603.

Accessiusarius (Gr. ἀποκρίσιας, an answer; cf. Lat. respondens, from respondere).—This term indicates in general the ecclesiastical envos of Christian antiquity, whether permanent or sent temporarily on special missions to high ecclesiastical authorities of royal courts. In the East the patriarchs had their apostasiarii at the imperial court, and the metropolitan archbishops of the African Church were sent in the letters of St. Gregory the Great (590-604) very frequent mention is made of such envoy (respondentes). In view of the great importance attaching to the relations between the popes and the imperial court of Constantinople, especially after the fall of the Western Empire (476), and during the great dogmatic controversies in the Greek Church, these papal representatives at Constantinople took on greatly, when and relative peace and security were granted the most important and responsible among the papal envoys. The first of these apocop-riarii seems to have been Julianus, Bishop of Cos, accredited by St. Leo the Great to the court of Emperor Marcian (450-457) for a considerable period of time during the Monophysite heresies. From then upon, forty-two were restorations of the sacred certerum of the Israelites which had perished in the Captiv-ty; they were to be published openly, but the remaind were to be guarded in secret for the exclusive use of the wise (cf. Dan. xii, 4, 9, where the prophet is bidden to shut up and seal an inspired book until an appointed time). Accordingly it may be accepted as highly probable that in its original meaning an apocryphal writing had no unfavourable import, but simply denoted a composition which claimed a sacred origin, and was supposed to have been hidden for generations, either absolutely, awaiting the due time of its revelation, or relatively, inasmuch as knowledge it was committed to a very small circle. However, the name Apocrypha soon came to have an unfavourable signification which it still retains, comprising both want of genuineness and canonicity.
These are the negative aspects of the modern application of the name; on its positive side it is properly applied only to a well defined class of literature, putting forth scriptural or quasi-scriptural preten-sions, and which originated in part among the Hebrews during the two centuries preceding Christ and for a space after, and in part among Christians, both orthodox and heterodox, in the early centuries of our era.

I. APOCRYPHA OF JEWISH ORIGIN.—Ancient literature, especially in the Orient, used methods much more free and elastic than those permitted by our modern and Occidental culture. Pseudepigraphic composition was in vogue among the Jews in the two centuries before Christ and for some time later. The attribute of a great name of the distant past to a book by its real author, who thus effaced his own personality, was, in some cases at least, a mere literary fiction which deceived no one except the ignorant. This holds good for the so-called "Wisdom of Solomon", written in Greek and belonging to the first century B.C. The use of the N.T. to assumed name did not stand as a symbol of a type of a certain kind of literature, the intention was not without a degree of at least objective literary dis-Honesty. The most important and valuable of the extant Jewish apocrypha are those which have a large apocalyptic element; that is, which are pre-
