cipitated as "unofficial" with none of them. St. Jerome evidently applied the term to all quasi-scriptural books in his estimation lay outside the canon of Holy Writ,
and the Protestant Reformers, following Jerome's cata logue of Old Testament Scriptures—one which
was at once erroneous and singular among the Fathers of the Church—was extended to the excess of the Catholic canon of the Old Testament over that of the Jews. Naturally, Catholics refuse to admit such a denomination, and we employ
"deuterocanonical" to designate this literature, which non-Catholics conventionally and improperly call "Apocrypha" (or "Apokryphes")—(See also Old Testament.) The original and proper sense of the term apocryphal as applied to the pretended sacred books was early obscured. But a clue to it may be recognized in the so-called Fourth Book of Ezra, which relates that Ezra (Ezra) by divine inspiration composed ninety-four books. Of these, forty-two were restorations of the sacred certerum of the Israelites which had perished in the Captiv-ty; they were to be published openly, but the remaining were to be guarded in secret for the exclusive use of the wise (cf. Dan. xii, 4, 9, where the prophet is bidden to shut up and seal an inspired book until an appointed time). Accordingly it may be accepted as highly probable that in its original meaning an apocryphal writing had no unfavourable import, but simply denoted a composition which claimed a sacred origin, and was supposed to have been hidden for generations, either absolutely, awaiting the due time of its revelation, or relatively, inasmuch as knowledge it was committed to a very small circle. However, the name Apocrypha soon came to have an unfavourable signification which it still retains, comprising both want of genuineness and canonicity.

These are the negative aspects of the modern application of the name; on its positive side it is properly applied only to a well defined class of literature, putting forth scriptural or quasi-scriptural preten-sions, and which originated in part among the Hebrews during the two centuries preceding Christ and for a space after, and in part among Christians, both orthodox and heterodox, in the early centuries of our era.

I. APOCRYPHA OF JEWISH ORIGIN.—Ancient literature, especially in the Orient, used methods much more free and elastic than those permitted by our modern and Occidental culture. Pseudepigraphic composition was in vogue among the Jews in the two centuries before Christ and for some time later. The attribute of a great name of the distant past to a book by its real author, who thus effaced his own personality, was, in some cases at least, a mere literary fiction which deceived no one except the ignorant. This holds good for the so-called "Wisdom of Solomon", written in Greek and belonging to the first century B.C. The use of the N.T. to assumed name did not stand as a symbol of a type of a certain kind of literature, the intention was not without a degree of at least objective literary dis-Honesty. The most important and valuable of the extant Jewish apocrypha are those which have a large apocalyptic element; that is, which are precipitated as "unofficial" with none of them. St. Jerome evidently applied the term to all quasi-scriptural books in
his estimation lay outside the canon of Holy Writ,
and the Protestant Reformers, following Jerome's cata logue of Old Testament Scriptures—one which
was at once erroneous and singular among the Fathers of the Church—was extended to the excess of the Catholic canon of the Old Testament over that of the Jews. Naturally, Catholics
refuse to admit such a denomination, and we employ
"deuterocanonical" to designate this literature,

APOCRYPHA

NAME AND NOTION.—Etyronomically, the derivation of Apocrypha is very simple, being from the Greek ἀπόκρυφος, hidden, and corresponding to the neuter plural of the adjective. The use of the singular for the plural: 'it is hidden' and 'it is not known', when referring to a single work. When we would attempt to seize the literary sense attaching to the word, the task is not so easy. It has been employed in various ways by early patristic writers, who have sometimes entirely lost sight of the etyomology; hence the term 'unofficial' with none of them. St. Jerome evidently applied the term to all quasi-scriptural books which in his estimation lay outside the canon of Holy Writ,
and the Protestant Reformers, following Jerome's cata logue of Old Testament Scriptures—one which
was at once erroneous and singular among the

prophecy on its human side had its springs, its occasions, and immediate objects in the present; the prophets were inspired men who found matter for comfort as well as rebuke and warning in the actual conditions of Israel's theocratic life. But when ages had elapsed, and the glowing Messianic promises of the prophets had not been realized; when the Jewish people had chafed, not through two or three, but many generations, under the biting yoke of foreign masters or the constantly repeated pressure of heathen states, reflecting and fervent spirits, finding no hold on their handed down order of things on earth and fixed their vision on another and ideal world where God's justice would reign unthwarted, to the everlasting glory of Israel both as a nation and in its faithful individuals, and unto the utter destruction and endless torment of the Gentile oppressors and the unrighteous. Apocalyptic literature was both a message of comfort and an effort to solve the problems of the sufferings of the just and the apparent hopelessness of a fulfillment of the prophecies of Israel's sovereignty on earth. But the inevitable consequence of the apocalyptic distrust of everything present was its assumption of the guise of a fiction or of a mixture of the two words: pseudonymous character. Naturally basing itself upon the Pentateuch and the Prophets, it clothed itself fictitiously with the authority of a patriarch or prophet who was made to reveal the transcendent future. But in their effort to adjust this future to the present world within the framework of the apocalyptic writers unfolded also a philosophy of the origin and progress of mundane things. A wider view of world-politics and a comprehensive cosmological speculation are among the distinctive traits of Jewish apocalyptic. The Book of Daniel is the one book of the Old Testament which the non-inspired apocalypses bear the closest affinity, and it evidently furnished ideas to several of the latter. An apocalyptic element existing in the prophets, in Zacharias (i—vi), in Tobias (Tobias, xiii), can be traced back to the visions of Ezechiel which form the prototype of apocalyptic; all this had its influence upon the new literature. Messianism of course plays an important part in apocalyptic eschatology and the idea of the Messiah in certain books received a very high development. But even when it is transcendent and mystic it is intensely, almost fanatically, national, and surrounded by fanciful and often extravagant accretions to the unchanging and permanent elements of apocalyptic. Apocalyptic often takes the place of the prophets, especially the Deutero-Isaia, and is far from having a uniform and consistent physiognomy. Sometimes the Messianic realm is placed upon the transfigured earth, centring in a new Jerusalem; in other works it is lifted into the Heavens; in some books the Messiah is wanting or is apparently merely human, while the Parables of Henoch with their pre-existent Messias mark the highest point of development of the Messianic concept to be found in the whole range of Hebrew literature.

(1) Jewish Apocalypses.—(a) The Book of Henoch (Ethiopic). The antediluvian patriarch Henoch according to Genesis “walked with God and was seen no more” (v. 24). He is said to be the forerunner of Noah. “This man was the father of all those who had knowledge of God who were of the earth” (Gen. viii. 20). The apocalyptic Henoch was associated with the dead before God, and his book described the heavenly realms and the order of law and justice that reigns there. The book contains visions of the afterlife, the creation of the world, and the end times. Henoch was rewarded for his purity and faithfulness, and he was allowed to rule in heaven and to bring salvation to the human race.

(b) The Book of Jubilees. This book is said to have been written in the 150s BCE and is also called the Book of the Generations of the Earth. It is a detailed account of the history of the world from the Creation to the coming of the Messiah. The book contains apocalyptic visions and prophecies of the future, including the coming of the Messiah. It is notable for its detailed genealogies and its eschatological themes.

The Book of Enoch. This book is one of the most important apocalyptic texts in Jewish tradition. It is said to have been written by the righteous Enoch, who subsequently ascended to heaven and was rewarded for his righteousness. The book contains visions of the afterlife, the creation of the world, and the end times. It is notable for its detailed genealogies and its eschatological themes.

The Book of Enoch is a complex and multi-layered text, with various versions and translations. It has been influential in the development of Jewish and Christian eschatology, and has been seen by some as a precursor to the New Testament. The book contains prophecies of the coming of the Messiah, and describes the end times in great detail. It is notable for its detailed genealogies and its eschatological themes.
race. The remaining section, under the symbolism of cattle, beasts, and birds, sketches the entire history of Israel down to the Messianic reign.—Book III, xci-xcvii, cviii. It professes to give a prophetic vision of the last days of the house of Israel. This part is distinguished by its account of a sharp conflict between the righteous of the nation and their wicked opponents both within and without Israel. They triumph and slay their oppressors in a Messianic kingdom without a personal Messiah. At its close occurs the final judgment, which inaugurates a blessed and immortal kingdom for the righteous. For this purpose all the departed will rise from a mysterious abode, though apparently not in the body (cii, 3, 4). The wicked will go into the Sheol of darkness and fire and dwell there forever. This is one of the earliest mentions of Sheol as a state of torment, preceding by a long way all mention of Gehenna. The author has described the place of retribution for the wicked as Tartarus and Geennon.—Book IV, xxxvii-lxx, consists of three "Parables." The first describes the secrets of heaven, giving prominence to the angelic hosts and their princes. The second parable (xlii-liv) deals with the Messias, and is the most striking and remarkable book. The essence of Daniel is easily traceable here, but the figure of the Messias is sketched much more fully, and the idea developed to a degree unparalleled in pre-Christian literature. The Ælect One, or Son of Man, existed before the sun and stars were created, and is to be the ruler over all men who obey and do good. For this end there will be a resurrection of all Israel and a judgment in which the Son of Man will render to everyone according to his deeds. Iniquity will be banished from the earth and the reign of the Messias will be everlasting. The third parable (lviii-lx) describes again the happiness reserved for the just, the great judgment and the secrets of nature. Here and throughout the Book of Parables the author gives piecemeal his theory of the origin of sin. Going a step further back than the fault of the Watchers of the first book, he attributes their fall to certain mysterious Satans. Book V, lxxvii-lxxxvii, lxxxix, lxxxi (transposed) may be called the Book of Celestial Physics, or Astronomy. It presents a bewildering mass of revelations concerning the movements of the heavenly bodies, given to Henoch by the angel Uriel. The final chapters of the entire work, cv-cvii, are devoted to the creation. (b) Assumption of Moses.—Origen, "De Principiis," III, ii, 1, names the Assumption of Moses—Ἀναπαραστάσις μνημείων—as the book cited by the Epistle of Jude, 9, where there is an allusion to a dispute between Michael and Satan over the body of Moses. Aside from a few other brief references in patristic literature, nothing more was known of this apocryphon until the Latin MS, containing a long portion of it, was discovered by Ceriani in the Ambrosian Library, at Milan, and published by him in 1861. Its identity with the ancient work is established by a quotation from the latter in the Acts of the Nicene Council. The book purportedly contains the sayings delivered in written form to the safe-keeping of Josue (Joshua) by Moses when the latter, in view of his approaching death, appointed Josue as his successor. The ostensible purpose of these deliveries is to confirm the Mosaic laws and the admonitions of the prophets. The entire history of Israel is outlined. In a rather glowing and glowing manner the book delineates under its prophetic guise the ministry of Israel's Hasmonæan rulers and Sadducean priests. The historical allusions come down to the reign of an insolent monarch who is plainly Herod the Great, and a powerful ruler who shall come from the west and subjugate the people—a reference to the punishes expected of Quintillus Varus, 4 n. But the Messias will intervene and execute Divine wrath upon the enemies of the nation, and a cataclysm of nature, which is depicted with truly apocalyptic sublimity, will forerun the beginning of the kingdom. This is not a judgment of correction or a judgment of individuals. The book then returns to the doings of Moses and Josue. The MS breaks off abruptly at chapter xii, and the portion cited by Jude must have belonged to the lost conclusion. This apocalypse has with solid reasons been assigned to the early years after Herod's death, between 4 B.C. and 4 A.D. In it is mentioned that neither of Herod's sons, Philip and Antipas, had yet reigned thirty-four years, since the writer, hazard a prediction that proved false, says that the sons should enjoy shorter reigns than their father. Thus the latest possible date of composition is fixed at A. D. 30. The author was a Jew, and in all likelihood a Palestinian one. He belonged neither to the Pharisees of the type of Christ's epoch, nor to the Sadducees, since he exorcises both alike. He must have been either a Zealot, that is an ultra-Nationalist and Messianist, or a fervid Essene. He wrote in Hebrew or Aramaic. The Latin text is translated from a Greek version. (c) Book of the Secrets of Henoch (Slavonic Henoch).—In 1892 attention was called to Slavonic MSs, which on examination proved to contain another Henoch book differing entirely from the Ethiopic compilation. "The Book of the Secrets of Henoch," contains passages which parallel exactly the Book of Origen to which there is nothing corresponding in the Ethiopic Henoch. The same may be said about citations in the "Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs." Internal evidence shows that the new Henoch was composed by an Alexandrian Jew about the beginning of our era, and in Greek. The work is sharply marked off from the older book by the absence of a Messias and the want of reference to a resurrection of the dead. It mingles many bizarre details concerning the celestial realm, the angels, and stars, with advanced ideas on man's destiny, moral excellence, and the punishment of sin. The patriarch is taken up through the seven heavens to the very throne of the Eternal. Some of the details throw interesting light on various obscure allusions in Holy Writ, such as the superimposed heavens, the presence of evil powers "in heavenly places," Execheel's strange creatures full of eyes. The Fourth Book of Esdras (Fourth Esdras or Fourth Esdras).—The personage serving as the screen of the real author of this book is Esdras (Ezra), the priest and scribe and leader among the Israelites who returned from Babylonia to Jerusalem. The fact that two canonical books are associated with his name, together with a genuine literary power, a profoundly religious spirit pervading Fourth Esdras, and some Mosaic points of contact with the Gospels combined to win for it an acceptance among Christians unequalled by any other apocryphon. Both Greek and Latin Fathers cite it as prophetic, while some, as Ambrose, were ardent admirers of it. Jerome alone is positively unfavourable to it. Without, however, this was not a serious work for it early times, it is a remarkable fact that the book never got a foothold in the canon or liturgy of the Church. Nevertheless, all through the Middle Ages it maintained an intermediate position between canonical and merely human compositions, and even after the Council of Trent, together with Third Esdras, was placed in the appendix to the official edition of the Vulgate. Besides the original Greek text, which has not survived, the book has appeared in Latin, Syriac, Armenian, Ethiopic, and Arabic versions. The first and last two chapters of the Latin translation do not exist in the original MSS, but have been added in the Latin hand. And yet there seems to be no hesitation in relegating the Fourth Book of Esdras to the ranks of the apocrypha. Not to insist on the allusion to the Book of Daniel in xii, 11, the date given in the first version (iii, 1) is erroneous, and the whole tenor and character of the work places it in the age of apocalyptic literature.

The dominant critical dating assigns it to a Jew writing in the reign of Domitian, A. D. 81-96. Certainly it was composed some time before A. D. 215, since it is mentioned by Clement of Alexandria.

The original text, iii-xiv, is of one piece and the work of a single author. The motive of the book is the problem lying heavily upon Jewish patriots after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. The outlook was dark and the national life seemed utterly destroyed. In contrast, the anxious spirit pervades the work, and the writer, using the guise of Esdras lamenting over the ruin of the first city and temple, insistently seeks to penetrate the reasons of God’s apparent abandonment of His people and the non-fulfilment of His promises. The author would learn the future of his nation. His interest is centred in the latter; the universalism of the book is attenuated. The apocryphal is composed of seven visions. The Messianism of Fourth Esdras suffers from the discouragement of the era and is influenced by the changed conditions produced by the advent of Christianity. Its Messias is national, and his reign merely one of glancing upon earth. Likewise the eschatology labours with two conflicting elements: the redemption of all Israel and the small number of the elect. All mankind sinned with Adam. The Fourth Book of Esdras is sometimes called by non-Catholics Second Esdras, as they apply the Hebrew form, Ezra, to the canonical books.

(c) Apocalypse of Baruch.—For a long time a Latin fragment, chapters lxxxviii-lxxxv, of this pseudograph had been known. In 1866 a complete Syriac text was discovered by Monsignor Ceriani, whose researches in the Ambrosian Library of Milan have so enriched the field of ancient literature. The Syriac is a translation from the Greek; the original was written in Hebrew. There is a close relation between this apocryphal and that of Fourth Esdras, but critics are divided over the question, which has influenced the other. The probabilities favour the hypothesis that the “Apocalypse of Baruch” is an imitation of Fourth Esdras and therefore later. The approximate dates assigned to it range between A. D. 50 and 117. The “Apocalypse of Baruch” is a somewhat artificial production, without the originality and force of Fourth Esdras. It deals in part with the same problems, viz., the sufferings of the theocratic people, and their ultimate deliverance, over whose expression certain passages are freed from evident Christian interpolations, its Messianism in general is earthly, but in the latter part of the book the Messias’s realm tends unmistakably towards a more spiritual conception. As in Fourth Esdras, sin is traced to the disobedience of Adam. Greater importance is attached to the law than in the related composition, and the points of contact with the New Testament are more striking. The author was a Pharisee, but one who, while adopting a distinctly Jewish view, was probably acquainted with the Christian Scriptures and freely it was borrowed. A contribution of some recent students of the “Apocalypse of Baruch” have seen in it a composite work, but the majority of critics hold with better reason to its unity. The book is lengthy. It speaks in the person of Baruch, the secretary of Jeremias. It opens with a palpable error of chronology. Baruch announces the doom of the city and the destruction of the Babylonian Empire, but not the Chaldeans, but angels, will bring about the destruction. Another and pre-existent Holy City is reserved by God, since the world cannot exist without a Jerusalem. The artificiality and te-diousness of the apocalypse are redeemed by a singular breadth of view and elevation of doctrine, with the limitation noted.

(f) The Apocalypse of Abraham has recently been translated from Slavonic into German. It relates the circumstances of Abraham’s conversions and the visions thereupon accorded him. His guide in the celestial realm is Joel, an angel distinct from God, but also in the temple. The first part of the apocalypse has affinities with Fourth Esdras and the “Apocalypse of Baruch.” The origin of evil is explained by man’s free will. The Elect, or Messiah, will gather the dispersed tribes, but God alone will punish the enemies of Israel. Particularism and the transcendent character of the last comings are a part of this apocalypse. Its data, however, are so vague that it is impossible to fix the time of its composition.

(g) The Apocalypse of Daniel is the work of a Persian Jew of the twelfth century, and is unique in foretelling two Messiahs: one, the son of Joseph (Christ), whose career ends in his failure and death; the other the son of David, who will liberate Israel and reign on earth gloriously.

Besides the works noted above at the end of the general section on Jewish Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, the following are worth noting:

(v) Special for Fourth Esdras: The complete Latin text is best cited in James and Bengel’s Novum Testamentum (3rd ed., Cambridge, 1895), 1, 2d ed.; Latin Bibliae want the missing fragment in vii.

(2) Legendary Apocrypha of Jewish Origin.—(a) Book of Jubilees or Little Genesis. Epiphanius, Jerome, and others quote a work under the title “The Jubilees” or “The Little Genesis.” St. Jerome testifies that the original was in Hebrew. It is cited by Byzantine authors down to the twelfth century. The idea that we hear in the book is that of the creation in an Ethiopic MS. in the last century. A considerable Latin fragment has also been recovered. The Book of the Jubilees is the narrative of Genesis amplified and embellished by a Jew of the Pharaonic period. It professes to be a revelation given to a Jew of that name ‘Jubilees’ in the third century B.C. It professes to be a systematic chronology according to the years, weeks of years, and jubilees. A patriarchal origin is ascribed to the great Jewish feasts. The angelology is highly developed, but the writer disbelieved in the resurrection of the body. The observance of the Law is insisted on. It is hard to fix the date of the religious circle in which the work arose. Jerusalem and the Temple still stood, and the Book of Henoch is quoted. As for the lowest date, the book is employed by the Jewish portion of the “Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs.” Estimates vary between 153 b. c. and A. D. 60. Among the lost Jewish Apocrypha there belong to this period so-called “Maccabean” books.

(b) The Book of James and Mammes, and II Timothy, iii, 8, applies these names to the Egyptian magicians who reproduced some of the wonders wrought by Moses. The names are not found in the Old Testament. Origen remarks that St. Paul does not quote “from public writings but from a sacred book which is called Jannes and Mambre”. The names were known to Pliny, and figure in the Talmudic traditions. Recently R. James in the “Journal of Theological Studies”, 1901, II, 572–577, claims to have found a fragment of this lost apocryphal Book of the Latin and Old English versions.

(3) Third Book of Ezares. This is also styled by non-Catholics the First Book of Ezares, since they give to the first canonical Ezares the Hebrew form Ezra. Third Ezares is one of the three uncanonical books appended to the official edition of the Vulgate. It exists in two of the oldest codices of the Vulgate, viz. Dunquerque and Mercadolinius, where it preceded the canonical Ezares. The same is true of MSS. of the Old Latin and other versions. Third Ezares enjoyed exceptional favour in the early ages of the Church, being quoted as Scripture with implicit faith by the leading Greek and Latin Fathers (See Conley, Introductio Generale, I. 201). St. Jerome, however, the greatest minimizer of sacred literature, rejected it as apocryphal, and thenceforward its standing was impaired. The book in fact is made up for the most part of materials taken from the inspired books of Paralipomenon, Ezares, and Nehemias, put together, however, in great disorder and in a way, viz. in Paralipomenon-Nehemias, and which is supposed that it was subsequent to the above Scriptures, since it was evidently composed in Greek and by an Alexandrian Jew. The only original part of the work is chapters iii–v, 6. This recounts a contest between three Jewish youths of the bodyguard of King Darius, each striving to formulate the wisest saying. The victory is awarded to Zorobabel (Zerubbabel), who defends Truth as the strongest force, and the audience shouts: “Great is Truth and powerful above all things!” (Magna est veritas et praevalebit.) The date of composition is not ascertainable except within very wide limits. These are on one side c. 300 b. c., the latest time assigned to Paralipomenon-Nehemias, and on the other, c. A. D. 100, the era of Josephus, who employed Third Ezares. There is greater likelihood that the composition took place before our Era.

(d) Third Book of Machabees is the title given to a book which is found in the Alexandrine codex of the Septuagint version and various private MSS. It gives an account of an attempted desecration of the Temple at Jerusalem by the Egyptian king, Ptolemy IV (philopator), after his victory over Antiochus the Great at Raphia, 217 b. c., and the miraculous intervention of his army and the Egyptian Jews through a massacre with elephants. This apocryphobounds in aburdities and psychological impossibilities, and is a very weak piece of fiction written in Greek by an Alexandrian Jew, and probably designed to encourage its countrymen in the midst of persecutions. It contains certain historical facts, apparently an extravaganter and varying version of the occurrence related by Josephus, “Against Apion”, II, 5. The date cannot be determined. Since the book shows acquaintance with the Greek additions to Daniel, it cannot be earlier than the first century B.C., and thus later than the first century after Christ. The Syrian Church was the first to give it a friendly reception, presumably on the strength of its mention in the Apostolic Constitutions. Later, Third Machabees was admitted into the canon of the Greek Church, but seems never to have obtained a place in the Latin Church.

(3) Apocryphal Psalms and Prayers.—(a) Psalms of Solomon. This is a collection of eighteen psalms composed in Hebrew and, as is commonly agreed, by a Pharisee of Palestine, about the time of Pompey’s capture of Jerusalem, 63 b. c. The collection makes no pretensions to authorship by Solomon, and therefore is not, strictly speaking, apocryphal. The name of the wise king became associated with it later and doubtless was the means of preserving it. The spirit of these psalms is one of great moral earnestness and righteousness, but it is the righteousness of the Pharisees, consisting in the observance of the legal traditions and ceremonial Law. The Hasmonean dynasty and the Sadducees are denounced. A Messianic deliverer is looked for, but he is to be merely human. He will reign by holiness and justice, and not by the sword. Free will and the resurrection are taught. The Psalms of Solomon are of value in illustrating the religious views and attitudes of the Pharisees in the age of Our Lord. The MSS. of the Septuagint contain the end of the psalms, which is a short psalm (cl), which, however, is “outside the number”, i. e. of the Psalms. Its title reads: “This psalm was written by David himself in addition to the number, when he had fought with Goliath.” It is based on various passages in the Old Testament, and there is no evidence that it was ever written in Hebrew.

(b) Prayer of Manasses (Manasseh).—A beautiful penitential prayer put in the mouth of Manasses, King of Juda, who carried idolatrous abominations so far. The composition is based on II Paralipomenon, xxxiiij, 11–13, which states that Manasses was carried captive to Babylon and there repentent; while the same source (18) refers to his prayer as recorded in certain chronicles which are lost. Learned opinion differs as to whether the prayer which has come down to us was written in Hebrew or Greek. Several ancient manuscripts of the Septuagint contain it as an appendix to the Psalms. It was also incorporated in the ancient so-called Apocryphal Constitutions. In editions of the Vulgate antedating the Council of Trent it was placed after the books of Paralipomenon. The Clementine Vulgate relegated it to the appendix, where it is still to be found in reprints of the standard text. The prayer breathes a Christian spirit, and it is not entirely certain that it is really of Jewish origin.

(4) Jewish Philosophy.—(a) Fourth Book of Machabees. This is a short philosophical treatise on the supremacy of pious reason, that is reason regulated by divine law, which for the author is the Moses Law. In setting up reason as the master of human passion, the author was distinctly influenced by Stoic philosophy. From it also he derived his four cardinal virtues: prudence, righteousness (righteousness for itself), fortitude, temperance; ἀληθινός, δικαιότης, ἁμηκτικός, σωφρόνος, and it was through Fourth Machabees that this category was appropriated by early Christian ascetical writers. The second part of the book exhibits the sufferings of Eleazar and the seven Macabean brothers as examples of the dominion of pious reason. The aim of the Hellenistic Jewish author was to inculcate devotion to the Law. He is unknown. The work was erroneously ascribed to Josephus by Eusebius and others. It appears to have been produced before the fall of Jerusalem, but its date is a matter of conjecture.

II. APOCRYPHA OF JEWISH ORIGIN WITH CHRISTIAN ACCRETIONS.—(a) Sybiline Oracles. See the separate article under this title. (b) Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. This is an extensive pseudepigraph, consisting of (1) narrations in which each of the twelve sons of Jacob relates his life, embellished by Midrashic expansions of the Biblical data; (2) exhortations by each patriarch to the practice of virtues, or the shunning of vices illustrated in his life; (3) apocalyptic portions concerning the future of the twelve tribes, and the Messianic times. The body of the chronicles is undoubtedly Jewish, but there are many interpolations of an unmistakably Christian origin, presenting in their ensemble a fairly full Christology, but one suspected of Docetism. Recent students of the Testaments assign with much probability the Jewish groundwork to the Hasmoncean period, the limits fixed by 153-63 B.C. (Hebrew), which extol the tribes of Levi and Juda are interpreted as an apology for the Hasmoncean pontif-kins.

The remaining ten tribes are supposed to be yet in existence, and are urged to be faithful to the representatives of the priestly and royal power. In this defence of the Machabean dynasty, and by a writer with Platonic tendencies, probably a priest, the Testaments are unique in Jewish literature. True, there are passages in which the sacerdotal caste and the ruling tribes are unsparingly denounced, but these are evidently later insertions. The eschatology is rather advanced. The Messiah is to spring from the tribe of Levi (elsewhere, however, from Juda); he is to be the eternal High-Priest—a unique feature of the book—as well as the civil ruler of the nation. During his reign sin will gradually cease. The gates of paradise are to be opened and the Israelites and converted Gentiles will dwell there and eat of the tree of life. The coming of the righteous and king is therefore to be an eternal one on earth, therein agreeing with the Ethiopic Henoch. The Testaments exist complete in Greek, Armenian, Latin, and Slavonic versions. Aramaic and Syriac fragments are preserved.

(c) The Ascension of Isaiah consists of two parts: (1) The Martyrdom of Isaiah, in which it is told that the prophet was slain in twain by the order of the wicked King Manasses. (2) The Ascension proper. This purports to be the description by Isaiah of a vision in which he was rapt up through the seven heavens to the presence of the Trinity, and beheld the descent of the Son, „the Beloved“, on His mission of redemption. He changes form in passing through the inferior celestial circles. The prophet then sees the glorified Beloved reascending. The Martyrdom is a Jewish work, saving some rather large interpolations. The rest is by Christian hands or perhaps a single writer, who united his apocalypse with the Martyrdom. There are tokens that the Christian element is a later growth. Both Schürer and van Baren maintain that our work is the same with that much in favour among several heretical sects under the name of the “Anabatic ton“, or “Ascension of Isaiah“. The Jewish portion is thought to have appeared in the first century of our era; the remainder, in the middle of the second century. Tertullian seems to have been acquainted with the Martyrdom; Sts. Jerome and Epiphanius are the earliest witnesses for the Ascen-

III. APOCRYPHA OF CHRISTIAN ORIGIN.—The term Christian here is used in a comprehensive sense and embraces works produced both by Catholics and heretics; the latter are chiefly members of the various branches or schools of Gnosticism, which flourished in the second and third centuries. The Christian apocryphal writings in general imitate the books of the New Testament and therefore, with a few exceptions, fall under the description of Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse.

(1) Apocryphal Gospels.—The term apocryphal in connection with special Gospels must be understood as bearing no more unfavourable an import than “uncanonical“. This applies to the Gospel of the Hebrews and in a less degree to that of the Egyptians, which in the main seem to have been either embodiments of primitive tradition, or mere adaptations of Gospel material to specific religious and amplifications. It is true, all the extant specimens of the apocryphal Gospels take the inspired evangelical documents as their starting-point. But the genuine Gospels are silent about long stretches of the life of Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, and St. Joseph. Frequently they give but a tantalizing glimpse of some episode on which we would fain be more fully informed. This reserve of the Evangelists did not satisfy the pordonable curiosity of many Christians eager for details, and the severe and dignified simplicity of their narrative left unappeased imaginations seeking the sensational and the marvellous. When, under the influence of Gnosticism, the early Church had shown an excessive tendency to embellish and amplifications. Church and the Fathers were hostile even towards the narratives of orthodox authorship. It was not until the Middle Ages, when their true origin was forgotten even by most of the Fathers, that these apocryphal stories began to enter largely into sacred legends, such as the "Aurea Sacra", into miracle plays, Christian art, and poetry. A comparison of the least extravagant of these productions with the real Gospels reveals the chasm separating them. Though worthwhile historically, the apocryphal Gospels have helped us to better understand the religious conditions of the second and third centuries, and they are also of no little value as early witnesses of the canonicity of the writings of the four Evangelists. The quasi-evangelistical compositions concerning Christ which make no pretensions to be Gospels will be treated elsewhere. They are all of orthodox origin. (See AGRAFIA.)

(a) Apocryphal Gospels of Catholic Origin.—The Protoevangelium Jacobi, or Infancy Gospel of James, purports to have been written by "James the brother of the Lord", i.e. the Apostle James the Less. It is based on the canonical Gospels which it expands with legendary and imaginative elements, which are sometimes puerile or fantastic. The birth, education, and marriage of the Blessed Virgin are described in the first eleven chapters and each of these is the source of various traditions current among the faithful. They are of value in indicating the veneration paid to Mary at a very early age. For instance it is the "Protoevangelium" which first tells that Mary was the miraculous offspring of Joachim and Anna, previously childless; that when three years old the child was taken to the Temple and dedicated to its service, in fulfilment of her parents' vow. When Mary was twelve Joseph is chosen by the high-priest as her spouse in obedience to a miraculous sign—a dove coming out of his rod and resting on his head. The nativity is embellished in an unrestrained manner. Critics find that the "Protoevangelium" is a composite into which two or three documents enter. It was known to Origen under the name of the "Book of James". There are signs in St. Justin's works that he was acquainted with it, or at least with a parallel tradition. The work, therefore, has been supposed to be authentic, as is also the case with a familiarity with Jewish customs, and critics have surmised that the groundwork was composed by a Jewish-Christian. The "Protoevangelium" exists in ancient Greek and Syriac recensions. There are also Armenian and Latin translations.

Gospel of St. Matthew.—This is a Latin composition of the fourth or fifth century. It pretends to have been written by St. Matthew and translated by St. Jerome. Pseudo-Matthew is in large part parallel to the "Protoevangelium Jacobi", being based on the latter or its sources. It differs in some particulars always in the direction of the more recent or more refined of its data, or the parallel belief parallel ones of the older pseudograph. Such is the age of fourteen in which Mary was betrothed to Joseph. A narrative of the flight into Egypt is adorned with poetic wonders. The dragons, lions, and other wild beasts of the desert adore the infant Jesus, and the palm-trees bow their heads that the Holy Family, as the bearers of the cross, may rest there. The idols of Egypt are scattered when the Divine Child enters the land. The "Gospel of the Nativity of Mary" is a recast of the Pseudo-Matthew, but reaches only to the birth of Jesus. It is extant in a Latin MS. of the tenth century.

Portions of the Infancy.—The Arabic is a translation of a lost Syriac original. The work is a compilation and refers expressly to the "Book of Joseph Caiphas, the High-Priest", the "Gospel of the Infancy", and the "Perfect Gospel". Some of its stories are derived from the Thomas Gospel, and some from the Revelation of the Virgin Mary. However there are miracles, said to have occurred in Egypt, not found related in any other Gospel, spurious or genuine, among them the healings of leprosy through the water in which Jesus had been washed, and the curses effected through the garments become blackened, and the garments have become blackened, and also the episodes of the robbers Titus and Dumachus, into whose hands the Holy Family fell. Titus bribes Dumachus not to molest them; the Infant foretells that thirty years thence the thieves will be crucified with Him, Titus on his right and Dumachus on his left and that the former will accompany Him into paradise. The apocryphon abounds in allusions to characters in the real Gospels. Lipsius opines that the work as we have it it is a Catho-lic retouching of a Gnostic compilation. It is impossible to ascertain its date, but it was probably composed before the Mohammedan era. It is very popular with the Syrian Nestorians. An originally Arabic "History of Joseph the Carpenter" is published in Tischendorf's collection of apocrypha. It describes St. Joseph's death, related by Our Lord to His disciples. It is a tasteless and bombastic effort, and seems to date from about the fourth century.

The Gospel of Gamaliel.—Dr. A. Baumstark in the Revue Biblique (April, 1906, 253 sqq.), has given this name to a collection of Coptic fragments of a homo- geneous character, which were supposed by another Coptic scholar, Reveillout, to form a portion of the "Gospel of the Twelve Apostles" (q.v. infra). These fragments have been referred to a single Gospel also by Lacauc in "Fragments d'apocryphes coptes de la bibliothèque nationale" (Cairo, 1904). The narrative is in close dependence on St. John's Gospel. The author did not pose seriously as an evangelist, since he explicitly quotes from the fourth canonical Gospel. He places the relation in the mouth of Gamaliel of Acts, v. 34. Baumstark assigns it to the fifth century. The writer was evidently influenced by the "Acta Pilati".

The Transitus Mariae or Evangelium Joannis which is written in the name of St. John the Apostle, and describes the death of Mary, enjoyed a wide circulation in the Coptic and Syriac parts of the East, in different languages which exist. The Greek has the superscription: "The Account of St. John the Theologian of the Falling Asleep of the Holy Mother of God". One of the Latin versions is prefaced by a spurious letter of Melito, Bishop of Sardis, explaining that the object of the work was to compone of a heretical composition of the same title and subject. There is a basis of truth in this statement as our apocryphon betrays tokens of being a Gnostic writing worked over in an orthodox interest. A "Transitus Mariae" is numbered among the apocry- pha by the official list of the "Decretemum of Gelasianus". It is extant in the fifth or six centuries, and is composed in a work on the way for the acceptance of mythical amplifications, still its latter form and details were considerably influenced by the Transitus and kindred writings. Certainly the homilies of St. John Damascene, and hence the Transitus Mariae, are the result of this influence, e.g. the second homily, xii, xiii, xiv. Going further back, the "Encomium" of Modestus, Bishop of Jerusalem, in the seventh century (P. G., LXXXVI, 3311), and the Pseudo-Dionysius of the fifth (De divinis nominibus, iii), probably suppose an acquaintance with apocryphal narratives of the Death and Assumption of the Blessed Virgin. These narratives have a common groundwork, though varying considerably in minor circumstances. The Apostles are preternaturally transported from different quarters of the globe to the Virgin's deathbed, those who had died being resuscitated on purpose. The place of the Apostles' residence is Jerusalem, though the Greek version places Mary first at Bethlehem. A Jew who ventures to touch the sacred body instantly loses both hands, which are restored through the mediation of the Apostles. Christ accompanied by a train of angels comes down to receive His mother's soul. The Apostles bear the body to Gethsemani and deposit it in a tomb, whence it is taken up alive to Heaven. (b) Judaistic and Heretical Gospels.—Gospel according to the Hebrews. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, and St. Epiphanius speak of a "Gospel according to the Hebrews," which was the sole one in use among the Palestinian Judeo-Christs, otherwise known as the Nazarenes. Jerome translated it from the Aramaic into Greek. It was evidently very ancient, and several of the above-mentioned writers associate it with St. Matthew's Gospel, which it seems to have replaced in the Jewish-Christian community at an early date. The relation between the Gospel according to the Hebrews and our canonical Matthew Gospel is a matter of controversy. The surviving fragments prove that there were close literal resemblances. Harnack asserts that the Hebrew Gospel was entirely independent, the tradition it contained being parallel to that of Matthew. Zahn, while excluding any dependence on our Greek canonical Matthew, maintains one of the Hebrews who informed to whom, the general contents were derived from the latter. This Gospel seems to have been read as canonical in some non-Palestinian churches; the Fathers who are acquainted with it refer to it with a certain amount of respect. Twenty-four fragments have been preserved by ecclesiastical writers. These indicate that it had a number of sections in common with the Synoptics, but also various narratives and sayings of Jesus, not found in the canonical Gospels. The surviving specimens lack the simplicity and dignity of the inspired writings; some even savour of the grotesque. We are warranted in saying that while the general material was impressed on it by historical starting-point primitive tradition, it has been figured in the interests of a Judaizing Church. (See AGRAPHA.)

Gospel According to the Egyptians.—It is by this title that Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Hippolytus of Rome, and Eusebius describe an uncannical work, which evidently was culled in Egypt. All agree that it was employed by heretical sects— for the most part Gnostics. The scanty citations which have been preserved in the Fathers indicate a tendency towards the Encratite condemnation of marriage, and a pantheistic Gnosticism. The Gospel according to the Egyptians is one of the canonical records in the Alexandrian Church, as Harnack would have us believe, but it seems to have enjoyed a certain popularity in the country districts among the Coptic natives. It could scarcely have been composed later than the middle of the second century and it is not at all impossible that it received some primitive material not represented in the canonical Gospels. Gospel of St. Peter.—The existence of an apocryphal composition bearing this name in Christian antiquity has long been known by references to it in certain early patristic writers who intimate that it originated or was current among the Didascaliae of the Egyptians. The text of it has been thrown on this document by the discovery of a long fragment of it at Akhmim in Upper Egypt, in the winter of 1886-87, by the French Archaeological Mission. It is in Greek and written on a parchment codex at a date somewhere between the sixth and ninth century. The fragment narrates part of the Passion, the Burial, and Resurrection. It betrays a dependence, in some instances literal, on the four inspired Gospels, and is therefore a valuable additional testimony to their early acceptance. While the apocryphon has many points of contact with the genuine Gospels, it diverges curiously from them, particularly in the treatment of our Lord, and bears evidence of having treated them with much freedom. No marked heretical notes are found in the recovered fragment, but there are passages which are easily susceptible of a heterodox meaning. One of the few extra-canonical passages which may contain an authentic tradition is that which describes Christ seated on a throne by His tormentors. Pseudo-Peter is intermediate in character between the genuine Evangelues and the purely legendary apocryphon. Its composition must be assigned to the first quarter or the middle of the second century of the Christian era. C. Schmidt thinks he has found traces of what is perhaps a second Gospel of Peter in some ancient papyri (Schmidt, Sitzungsberichte der königlichen preuss. Akademie zu Berlin, 1895; cf. Bardenhewer, Geschichte, I, 397, 399). Only one or two quotations remain of the Gospel of St. Philip mentioned by Epiphanius and Leontius of Byzantium; but these are enough to prove its Gnostic colouring. Gospel of St. Thomas.—There are two Greek and two Latin redactions of it, differing much from one another. A Syriac translation is also found. A Gospel of Thomas was known to many Fathers. The earliest to mention it is St. Hippolytus (155-65) who informs us that it was current among the Naassenes, a sect of Syrian Gnostics, and cites a sentence which does not appear in our extant text. Origen relegates it to the heretical writings. St. Cyril of Jerusalem says it was employed by the Manicheans; Eusebius rejects it as heretical and spurious. It is clear that the original Pseudo-Thomas was of heterodox origin, and that it dates from the second century; the citations of Hippolytus establish that it was palpably Gnostic in tenor. But in the extant Thomas Gospel there is no formal or manifest Gnosticism. The prototype was evidently expurgated by a Catholic hand, who, however, did not trace it out with absolute exactitude. The apocryphon in all its present forms extravagantly magnifies the Divine aspect of the boy Jesus. In bold contrast to the Infancy narrative of St. Luke, where the Divinity is almost effaced, the author makes the Child a miracle-worker and intellectual prodigy, and in harmony with Doceism, sublimates the atoning sacrifice in Him. This pseudo-Gospel is unique among the apocryphas, inasmuch as it describes a part of the hidden life of Our Lord between the ages of five and twelve. But there is much that is fantastic and offensive in the pictures of the exploits of the Boy Jesus. His youth not only faded out of mere childish fancy, as when He formed clay pigeons, and at a clap of His hands they flew away as living birds; sometimes, from benevolence; but again from knowledge and retribution.

The Deacon of Galium was the apocryphal Gospel of St. Bartholomew among the apocrypha. The earliest allusion to it is in St. Jerome's works. Recently scholars have brought to light fragments of it in old Coptic MSS. One of these Orientalists, Baumstark, would place its composition in the first part of the fourth century, by Peter the Syrian. It is mentioned by Origen and Eusebius among the heretical literature along with the Peter and Thomas Gospels. Hippolytus states that the Basilidian Gnostics appealed to a "secret discourse" communicated to them by the Apostle Matthias who had received instruction privately from the Lord Jesus. The net result of all this is that the tradition concerning apocryphal literature, quotes with respect several times the "Tradition of Matthias." A Gospel of the Twelve Apostles was known to Origen (third century). Other patristic notices give rise to some uncertainty whether the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles of antiquity was truly distinct from that of the Hebrews. The greater probabilities oppose their identity. Recently the claim has been made by M. Reveillout, a Coptic scholar, that the lost Gospel has been in a considerable measure recovered in several Coptic fragments, all of which, he asserts, belong to the same shape and form. The document has been successfully combated by Dr. Baumstark in the "Revue Biblique" (April, 1906, 245 sqq.), who will allow at most a probability that certain brief sections appertain to a Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, written originally in Greek and current among Gnostic Ebionites as early as the second century. There exists a late and entirely spurious Syriac "Gospel of the Twelve Apostles," published by J. Rendell Harris (Cambridge, 1900). It is enough to note the existence of other pseudo-Gospels, of which very little is known beside the names. There was a Gospel of St. Andrew, probably identical with the Gnostic "Acts of Andrew" (q. v., infra); a Gospel of Barnabas, a Gospel of Thaddeus, a Gospel of Eve, and even one of Judas Iscariot, the last in use among the Gnostic sect of Cainites, and which glorified the traitor.

(2) Pilate Literature and Other Apocryphal Concerning Christ.—While Christianity was struggling against the forces of Roman paganism, there was a natural tendency to dwell upon the part which a representative of the Roman Empire played in the supreme events of Our Lord's life and of Pilate's. The procurator of Judaea, even at the cost of exaggeration and amplification, into a weapon of apologetic defence, making that official bear witness to the miracles, Crucifixion, and Resurrection of Christ. Hence arose a considerable apocryphal literature of which the Gospel of Pilate is one of the best known. In part, the apocryphon, it is characterized by exaggerating Pilate's weak defence of Jesus into strong sympathy and practical belief in His divinity. Report of Pilate to the Emperor. In the apocryphal Acts of Peter and Paul there is embodied a letter purporting to have been sent to Pontius Pilate by the apostles Tertullian (Apologia, xxi) after giving a sketch of the miracles and Passion of Christ, subjoins: "All these things Pilate... announced to Tiberius Cesar." A comparison between this account of Pilate and the actual records reveals a lit- erary dependence between them, though the critics differ as to the priority of these documents. In chapters xxxv, xxxviii, xlviii, of Justin's Apologia, that Father appeals confidently as a proof of the miracles and Passion of Jesus to "Acts" or records of Pontius Pilate existing in the imperial archives. While it is possible that St. Justin may have heard of such a report, and even probable that the procurator transmitted some account of the events at Jerusalem to Rome, it is on the other hand admissible that Justin's assertion was based on nothing more than hypothesis. This is the opinion of the majority of the experts. During the persecutions under Maximin in the fourth century spurious anti-Christian Acts of Pilate were composed in Syria, as we learn from Eusebius. It is probable that the pseudographic letter was forged as an offset to these. For Acta Pilati or Gospel of Nicodemus, see the separate article. The story of the Anaphora Pilati, or "Relation of Pilate", is frequently found appended to the texts of the Acts. It presupposes the latter work, and could not have been composed before the middle of the fifth century. It is found in MSS. combined with the Paradoceon of giving up of Pilate, and dates from the oldest form of the legend dealing with Pilate's subsequent life. A still later tradition is found in the Latin Epistola Pilati ad Tiberium. There exists a puerile correspondence consisting of a pretended Letter of Herod to Pilate and Letter of Pilate to Herod. They are found in Greek and Syriac in a number of the eleventh century MSS., and the rest of these pseu- dographs may be as old as the fifth century. The Narrative of Joseph of Arimathea furnishing imaginary details of the two thieves crucified with Christ, and the begging of the body from Pilate, seems to have enjoyed popularity in the Middle Ages in the Byzantine East, judging from the number of MSS. which contain it. The oldest of those published belongs to the twelfth century. The relation is appended to some Latin texts of the Acta Pilati, under the title "Historia Josephi". It may be read in English in Walker's and the Ante-Nicene Fathers' collection of the apocrypha. The oldest form of the Paschal-Correspondence, which strips away the story of Edessa, is found in Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica, I, xiii), who vouches that he himself translated it from the Syriac documents in the archives of Edessa, the metropolis of Eastern Syria. The two letters are accompanied by an introduction which probably is an excerpt from the same source. According to this, Abgar V, Toparch or King of Edessa, suffering from an incurable disease, and having heard the story of Christ's miracles sends a courier to Jerusalem, bearing a letter to Jesus, in which he declared Him to be a god, or the son of a god, and invites Him to Edessa, justifying the request partly by his desire to be cured, partly by his wish to offer to Jesus an asylum against the malignant Jews. Our Lord replies: "Blessed art thou, thou hast believed in Me without seeing Me. For it is written that those who have seen Me will not believe Me; and that those who have not seen Me will believe and love Me. But as to thy prayer that I come to thee, it is necessary that I fulfill here all that the Father has commanded Me. But after my taking up I shall send thee one of My disciples, who will heal thy pains, and keep life for thee and thine". Accordingly, after the Ascension, "Judaeus Thomas", an Apostle, despatches to Edessa, one of the twelve, who cures the King of his disease, and preaches Christ to the assembled people. This, adds Eusebius, happened in the year 340, i.e. of the Seleucid era; corresponding to A.D. 28-29. The pleasing story is repeated with variations in later sources. The "Teaching of Addai", a Syrian apocryphon (q. v. in the corruptions of the O. T.), tells the story of Jesus, who takes pity on the incurable. The authenticity of the alleged letter of Christ has always been strongly suspected when not absolutely denied. As early as the sixth century the Gelasian Decretum brands this correspondence as spurious. Its legendary environment and the fact that the Church at large did not accept as genuine its pretended origin from Our Lord as a sacred document is conclusive against it. As for the letter of Abgar, its genuineness was formerly favoured by many skilled in this literature, but since the discovery of the "Teaching of Addai", published in 1876, the presumption against the authentic character of Abgar's epistle, owing to the close resemblance of a portion to passages in the Gospels, has become an established certainty. Lipsius, a high authority, is of the opinion that the Abgar correspondence goes back to the reign of the first Christian ruler of Edessa, Abgar IX (179-216), and that it was elicited by a desire to force a link up with that epoch with the time of Christ. (See ABBAR.)

3) APOCRYPHAL ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. The motive which first prompted the fabrication of spurious Acts of the Apostles was, in general, to give Apocryphic support to heretical systems, especially those of the many sects which are comprised under the term Gnosticism. The darkness in which the New Testament leaves the missionary careers, and the ends the Apostles made with the details handed down by ecclesiastical tradition, left an inviting field for the exercise of inventive imaginations, and offered an apt means for the insidious propagation of heresy. The Jewish-Christian Church, which early developed un-Chalcedonian tendencies in the form of Ebionism, seems to have first produced Apocryphal histories of certain of these, we have very few remains outside the material in the voluminous Pseudo-Clement. The Gnostic Acts of Peter, Andrew, John, Thomas, and perhaps Matthew, date from the early portion of the third century or perhaps a little earlier. They abound in extravagant and highly coloured marvels, and are interspersed by long pretended discourses of the Apostles which served as vehicles for the Gnostic predications. Though the pastors of the Church and the learned repudiated these as patently heretical writings, they appealed to the fancy and satisfied the curiosity of the Didascaliae and the Church fathers, using them by Michaelis in the East and Priscillianists in the West, but they found favour with many unenlightened Catholics. Since it was impossible to suppress their circulation entirely, they were rendered comparatively harmless by orthodox editing which excised the palpable errors, especially in the apocryphal elements, leaving the allegorical and its riotous excessure. Hence most of the Gnostic Acts have come down to us with more or less of a Catholic purification, which, however, was in many cases so superficial as to leave unmistakable traces of their heterodox origin. The originally Gnostic apocryphal Acts were gathered into collections which bore the name of the Παραδικαί (Circuits) or Πράκτικα (Acts) of the Apostles, and to which we were attached the name of a Leucius Charinus, who may have formed the compilation. The Gnostic Acts were of various authorship. Another collection was formed in the Frankish Church in the sixth century, probably by a monk. In this the Catholic Acts have been preserved; it is by no means uniform in its various manuscript representations. By a misunderstanding, the authorship of the whole, under the title "Historia Certaminis Apostolorum", was ascribed to an Abdia, said to have been the first Bishop of Babylon, disciple of the Apostle Andrew. This collection was formed by the Latin Paschome, or Martyrdoms, of those Apostles who had been neglected by the Gnostic Acts, viz., the two James, Philip (Matthew?), Bartholomew, Simon, and Jude. The literature grew by accretions from heretical sources and eventually took in all the Apostles, including St. Paul. The motive of these non-heretical apocryphas was primarily to gratify the pious curiosity of the faithful regarding the Apostolic founders of the Church; sometimes local interests instigated their composition. After the model of the Gnostic Acts which were of a different derivation, they abounded in prodigies, and like those again of the Apocrypha, they took starting-point the traditional dispersion of the Twelve from Jerusalem. Regarding the historical value of these apocryphal narratives, it requires the most careful criticism to extricate from the mass of fable and legend any grains of historical truth. Even accepting the facts the Apostolic lives, as represented by these documents, are self-contradictory or confused. In general their details are scientifically worthless, unless confirmed by independent authorities, which rarely happens. Much of their apocryphal matter was taken up by the offices of the Apostles in the Latin breviaries of thelectionaries, composed in the seventh and eighth centuries at an extremely uncertain time.

(a) Gnostic Acts of the Apostles.—Acts of St. Peter. There exist a Greek and a Latin Martyrdom of Peter, the latter attributed to Pope Linus, which from patristic citations are recognized as the conclusion of an ancient tradition, attributed to "Acts of Saint Peter". Another MS., bearing the name "Actus Petri cum Simone", contains a superior translation with several passages from the original narrative preceding the Martyrdom. The work betrays certain tokens of Gnosticism, although it has been purged of its grossest features by a Catholic reviser. It is one of the triumphs of the Gnostic legend. The Magus at Rome, and the Apostle’s subsequent crucifixion. These Acts as we have them are of high antiquity, though it is impossible to always discern whether the Gnostic writers are quoting from them or an earlier tradition. Undoubtedly Commodian (c. 250) employed our extant Acts of Peter.—Acts of St. John. The heretical character imputed to these by certain Fathers is fully confirmed by extant fragments, which show a gross Doccetism, and an unbridled phantasy. Doubtless the author intermingled valuable Ephesian traditions with his fables. There are reasons of weight to regard the work as having come together with the Acts of St. Peter, and probably those of St. Andrew, by a single person, in the latter half of the second century, under the name of a disciple of St. John, called Leucius. Clement of Alexandria was acquainted with the pseudepigraph. The Johanneae Acts of the Pseudo-Traditores (compare the canonical Acts, vi, 5) are a Catholic working-over of Gnostic material.—Acts of St. Andrew. Pseudepigraphic Acts of St. Andrew are noted by several early ecclesiastical writers, as in circulation among Gnostic and Manichean sects. The original form has perished except in a few poetic quotations. But we possess three individual Acts under different names, which prove to be orthodox recensions of an original comprehensive Gnostic whole. These are: (1) "The Acts of Andrew and Matthias" (or Matthew as given by some authorities); (2) "Acts of Peter and Andrew" (the original language of the above is Greek); (3) "The Martyrdom of the Apostle Andrew"; has come down in both Greek and Latin recensions. The Latin text is the original one, and cannot be earlier than the fifth century. It purports to be a relation of the heroic death of St. Andrew by eyewitnesses who are "presbyters and deacons of the Church of Achaia". It is so lively and vivid that it is difficult to believe, but no reliance can be placed on its data. (See APOSTOLIC CHURCHES; ANDREW, ST.; APOSTLE.—The Acts and Martyrdom of St. Matthew are in literary dependence on the Acts of St. Andrew (q. v., supra), and hence the reading "Matthew" may be an error for "Matthias", since evidently the companion of Peter and Andrew is intended. The work exists in Greek and a later Latin. There is also a Coptic-Ethiopian martyrdom legend of St. Matthew. (See MATTHEW, ST.; APOSTLE; APOSTOLIC CHURCHES.)—Acts of St. Thomas. No Apostolic apocryphon has reached us in a completeness equal to that of the Thomas Acts. Though much in Greek, Syriac, and Ethiopic versions. Their Gnostic traits pierce through the Catholic re-touching; in fact, the contents show a conscious purpose to exalt the dualistic doctrine of abstention from conjugal intercourse. Scholars are much inclined to attribute the original to a Syrian origin and to the work of the "magician" Adiartacus. The signs point strongly to the third century as the era. The translation of the remains of St. Thomas to Edessa in 232 may have furnished the inspiration for the composition. The Acts relate the prodigies performed by the Apostle in India, and end with his martyrdom there. They are interlarded with some remarkable hymns; some of real literary beauty but with strong Gnostic colouring. Recent researches have revealed elements of truth in the historical setting of the narrative. The Acts of St. Thomas are mentioned by Epiphanius and Augustine as in use in different heretical circles. It is possible that such a work was used by a Gnostic as in circulation among the Bardaisanians (see THOMAS, ST.; APOSTLE.)—Acts of St. Bartholomew. We possess a Greek Martyrdom, dating in its present form from the fifth or sixth century; also a Latin "Passio Bartholomaei". Both are tainted with Nestorianism, and seem to have come from a single Bardaisanian text containing the "Passio" and "Passio Longa" versions by which the Apostle overthrew idolatry and converted a king and his subjects in "India". The whole is a legendary tissue. (See BARTHOLOMEW, ST.; APOSTLE.)

(b) Catholic Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles.—Acts of St. Peter and Paul. These are to be distinguished from the Gnostic Acts of Peter and the orthodox Acts of Paul. The MSS. which represent the legend fall into two groups: (a) consisting of all the Greek; in one of the Greek MSS. the journey of St. Paul to Rome, and the martyrdom of the two Apostles; (b) composed of one Greek MS. and a great number of Latin ones, presenting the history of the passio only. Lipsius regards the journey section as a ninth-century addition; Bardeneuer will have it belong to the fourth. This section begins with Paul's departure from the island of Mileto, and is evidently based on the canonical narrative in Acts. The Jews have been aroused by the news of Paul's intended visit, and induce Nero to forbid it. Nevertheless the Apostle secretly enters Italy; his companion is missing for himself at Pentecost and behelds in. In rebuttal that city is swallowed up by the sea. Peter receives Paul at Rome with joy. The preaching of the Apostles converts multitudes and even the Empress. Simon Magus traduces the Christian teachers, and there is a test of strength in miracles between that magician and Elichem of Paro. Simon essays a flight to heaven but falls in the Via Sacra and is dashed to pieces. Nevertheless, Nero is bent on the destruction of Peter and Paul. The latter is beheaded on the Ostian Way, and Peter is crucified at his request head downward. Before his death he relates to the people the "Quo Vadis?" story. Three men from the East carry off the Apostles' bodies but are overtaken. St. Peter is buried at "The place called the Vatican", and Paul on the Ostian Way. These Acts are the chief source for details of the martyrdom of the two great Apostles. They are also noteworthy as emphasizing the close concord between the Apostolic founders of the Roman Church. The date (a. d. 55) of composition is involved in obscurity. Lipsius assigns the epitaph to the Epistle of St. Paul (c. 235), but it is not clear that the Fathers adduced employed any written source for their references to the victory over Simon Magus and the work of the Apostles at Rome. Lipsius assigns the kernel of the Martyrdom to the second century; Bardenhewer refers it to the first half of the third. The Acts of Peter and Paul undoubtedly embody some genuine traditions. (See Peter, St., Apostle; Paul, St., Apostle; Simon Magus.)—Acts of St. Paul, Origen and Eusebius expressly name the παράδεισος Πάδων; Tertullian speaks of writings falsely attributed to Paul: "Quod si Pauli perspicuum inscriptum erat," He is cautioning his readers against the tale of Thecla preaching and baptizing herself. Hitherto it was supposed that he referred to the "Acts of Paul and Thecla". The "Acts of Paul", presumed to be a distinct composition, were deemed to have perished; but recently (1890) a Coptic papyrus MS., torn to reds, was found in New Egypt, and proves to contain approximately complete the identical Acts of Paul alluded to by a few ecclesiastical writers. This finds established the fact that the long-known Acts of Paul and Thecla and the apocryphal correspondence of St. Paul with the Corinthian Church, as well as the Acts of St. Paul, are nearly only excerpts from the original Pauline Acts. The newly-discovered document contains material hitherto unknown as well as the above-noted sections, long extant. It begins with a pretended flight of St. Paul from Antioch of Pisidia, and ends with his martyrdom at Rome. The narrative rests on data in the canonical books of the New Testament, but it abounds in marvels and personages unhinted at there, and it disfigures traits of some of those actually mentioned in the Sacred Writings. The Acts of Paul, therefore, adds nothing trustworthy to our knowledge of the Apostle of the Gentiles. Fortunately the above-cited passage of Tertullian (De Baptismo, xvii) informs us of its authorship and aim. The African writer observes that the pseudo-history was the work of a priest of Asia Minor, who on the discovery of the fraud, was deposed from an ecclesiastical charge, and confessed that he forged the book out of love for St. Paul. Eusebius classifies it among the ἀντιλογομένα, or works having locally quasi-canonical authority.—Acts of Paul and Thecla. The early detachment of these as well as the Martyrdom from the Acts of St. Paul may be accounted for by ecclesiastical use as festal lectures. Despite Tertullian's remark regarding this pseudo-graph, it enjoyed an immense and persistent popularity through the patristic period and the Middle Ages. The manner is to be explained mainly by the romantic and spirited flavour of its narrative. Exceptional among the apocryphists, the author kept a curb upon his fertile imagination, and his production is distinguished by its simplicity, clearness, and vigour. It deals with the adventures of Thecla, a young woman of Iconium, who upon being compelled to become the bride of Simon Magus, left her home, dressed as a bride, and lived a life of virginity and missionary activity, becoming a companion of St. Paul, and preaching the Gospel. She is persecuted, but miraculously escapes from the fire and the savage beasts of the arena. The relief into which abstention from imagery is wrought in these Acts makes it difficult to escape from the conclusions that they have been coloured by Enarrative ideas. Nevertheless the thesis of Lipsius, supported by Consson, that a Gnostic Grundscrift underlie our present document, is not accepted by Harnack, Zahn, Bardenhewer, and others. The apocryphon follows the New Testament Acts of St. Paul, but is more loosey and is full of unhistorical characters and events. For instance, the writer introduces a journey of the Apostles, to which there is nothing analogous in the Sacred Books. However, there are grains of historical material in the Thecla story. A Christian writer of that name has been recognized by St. Paul at Iconium, and suffered persecution. Gutschmidt has discovered that a certain Queen Tryphena was an historical personage (Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, X, 1864). (See THECLA.)—Acts of St. Philip. The extant Greek fragments supply us with five (10-14) of the fifteen Acts composing the work. Of those 1-7 are a mixture of various legends, each, it would seem, with an independent history; 8-14 is a unit, which forms a parasitic growth on the ancient but somewhat confused traditions of the missionary activity of an Apostle Philip in Hierapolis of Phrygia. Zahn's view of the Acts, written for an All-oriental Catholic monk of the fourth century, is a satisfactory hypothesis. The largest fragment was first published by Batifol in "Analecta Bollandiana", IX (Paris, 1890). A Coptic "Acts of Philip" is also to be noted. (See Philip, St., Apostle.)—Acts of Sebastian, etc. There are Latin, Coptic, Ethiopic, and Armenian histories of the missions and death of St. James the Greater, the son of Zebedee. Lipsius assigns the Latin to about the third century. Coptic and Armenian Acts and Martyrdom of St. James the Less depend mostly on the Hecagipras tradition, preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., IV, xxii).—Acts of St. Matthew. The Apostolic Acts of the Pseudo-Abdias contain a Latin "Passio Sancti Matthæi", which preserves an Abyssinian legend of St. Matthew, later than the Coptic Martyrdom noticed in connection with the Gnostic Acts of that saint. The correct historical setting indicates that the recension was the work of an Abyssinian of the sixth century, who wished to date the establishment of the Abyssinian Church (fourth century) back to the Apostolic times. However, the kernel of the narrative is drawn from older sources. The Abdias Passio places St. Matthew's martyrdom in Abyssinia. (See Matthew, St., Apostle.)—Teaching of Addai (Thaddeus). In 1870 an ancient Syriac document containing the "The Teaching of the Apostle", was published for the first time. It proved to closely parallel the Abgar material derived by Eusebius from the Edessa archives, and indeed purports to have been entrusted to those archives by its author, who gives his name as Labubna, the son of Sennak. It is full of legendary but interesting material describing the relations between Jesus and King Abgar of Edessa. Thaddeus, or Addai, one of the seventy disciples, is sent, after the Resurrection, in compliance with Christ's promise, to Abgar, heals the ruler and Christianizes Edessa with the most prompt and brilliant success. Notable is the story of the paschal lamb and the instance of Abgar's envoy to the former. Since the narrative of a Gaulish pilgrim who visited Edessa about 390 contains no allusion to such a picture, we may reasonably conclude that the Teaching of Addai is of later origin. Critics accept the period from the death of Thaddeus, c. 430, to 430, and leave passionate, and it is now found in the Abdias collection. The scene is Persia and Babylonia. It has been recognized that the
The historical setting of these Acts agrees remarkably with what is known of the conditions in the Parthian empires in the second century after Christ. The Acts of St. Barnabas appear to have been composed toward the end of the fifth century by a Cypriot. They are ascribed to St. Mark the Evangelist, and are historically worthless. They are extant in the original Greek and in a Latin version. The narrative is based upon the primitive traditions and activities of the apostle Mark, and Paul, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. — Geza Alfoldi. This is the latest of the pseudo-Acts, having been composed by a monk of Trèves, in the twelfth century, as a prelude to an account of the translation of the sacred relic, and the body of St. Matthias to that city, and their subsequent veneration in the church that was to have been the center of the history of the Apostle's career from a Hebrew MS. (4) Apocryphal Doctrinal Works. — Testamentum Domini Nostrî Jesu. It was known that a Syriac work of this name existed, and published in 1856. In 1899 Monsignor Rahmani, Patriarch of the United Syrians, published from a late MS. the Syriac text, a Latin introduction and translation. The work is in two books. It begins with an apotheosis of the approaching day of Antichrist alleged to have been uttered by Our Lord after His Resurrection. Between this and the body of the work there is a very loose connection, as the main portion represents Christ as enacting, even to small details, laws for the governance and ritual of the Church. The writer places on Our Lord's lips description of liturgical observances prevalent in his own time. The Clementine Constitutions, and Apostolic Canons. Monsignor Rahmani assigns the Testament to the second century, and places the above works in the relation of dependence on it. But critics argue that this document is accorded a high antiquity to the Testament, dating it in the fourth or fifth century, and inverting the dependence mentioned. On the ground that there is no indication of an acquaintance with the book outside the Orient, and that Arabic and Coptic recensions of it are known, Dr. A. Baumstark regards the publication of this book, although it is older than the Pope's circle, and current in the national Churches of that sect in Syria and Egypt. The apocalyptic opening was found in a Latin MS. of the eighth century, and published by M. R. James, "Apocrypha Anecdota." (Cambridge, 1893). The Preaching of Peter and Kerygma Patris. Clement of Alexandria repeatedly quotes from a Ἱφρόνης Ἰωάννου, concerning whose credibility he obviously has no doubt. On the other hand, Eusebius classes it as apocryphal. A certain "Doctrine of Peter," mentioned by a later writer, was probably identical with the "Preaching." From this book, the heretics have taken form to a very imperfect idea of it. It spoke in St. Peter's name and represented him above all as a teacher of the Gentiles. The doctrinal parts occur in a framework of an account of the missionary journeys. The apocryphal was probably suggested by the text, 11 Peter, 1, 5. A work which was so well accepted in the Church was thought to have been of the same period (c. 140-215), and which was known to the (Gnostic Heracleon (c. 160-170), must have come from almost Apostolic antiquity. Scholars favour the first quarter of the second century. The fragments which remain betray no signs of heterodox origin. There is a Syriac "Preaching of Simon Peter in the City of Rome." — Two Ways or Judicium Petri. This is a moralising treatise ascribed to St. Peter, and prefixed to the Didache (q. v.). It is of Jewish-Christian origin, and probably was based on the so-called Epistle of Barnabas." — Preaching of Paul. The only witness to this work is the "true" Epistle of Barnabas in the pseudo-Cyprian writings. According to this it represented Christ as confessing personal sins, and forced by His mother to receive baptism.

(5) Apocryphal Epistles. — Pseudo-Epistles of the Blessed Virgin. These are all composed in Latin and at late dates. (1) The Epistle of the Blessed Virgin to the Living and the Exquisite edition of the apocrypha. It exhorts to faith and courage. There is a reply from Ignatius. (2) The Epistle to the Messenianes, i.e. the inhabitants of Messina, Sicily, is equally brief; it conveys an exhortation to faith, and a blessing. (3) The Epistle to the Florentines was expounded in a sermon of Savonarola, 25 October, 1495. We have no other testimony of it. It is four lines in length. — Pseudo-Epistles of St. Paul. The Pseudo-Clementine homilies contain as a preface two letters, the first of which purports to be from Peter to James the Less, beseeching him to keep his (Peter's) preaching secret. It is evident that there is no connection between the Epistles of St. Paul; Correspondence with the Corinthians. The ancient Syrian (Edessene) Church revered as canonical a third Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, which is accompanied by a letter from the pastors of that Church, to which it is an answer. But the latter is anonymous. This century the Syrian Church fell under the influence of the Greek, and in consequence the spurious letter gradually lost its canonical status. It was taken up by the neighbouring Armenians and for centuries has formed part of the Armenian New Testament. Latin and Greek writers are completely silent about this pseudo-Latin writing in most of the manuscripts found. It was obviously suggested by the lost genuine Pauline letter referred to in 1 Cor. v. 9; vii. 1. It was composed by a Catholic presbyter about 160-
170, and is a disguised attack on some of the leading errors of Gnosticism. This correspondence long had an independent circulation, but recently it has been proved that "Epistle was publicly read into the Acts of St. Paul (q. v.).—Pseudo-Epistle to the Laodiceans. In the genuine Epistle to the Colossians, Paul, after instructing them to send their Epistle to Laodicea, adds: "read that which is from the Laodiceans". This most probably regards a circular letter, the so-called "Epistle to the Laodiceans"; but it has been held to be a lost letter to the Laodicen Christians. The apocryphal epistle is a transparent attempt to supply this supposed lost sacred document. It consists of twenty short lines and is mainly made of matter taken from Philippians and other Epistles, and pieced together without sequence or logical aim. Our apocryphal text in Latin and translations from the Latin, though it gives signs of a Greek original. It can hardly be the pseudo-Laodicean letter said by the Muratorian Fragment to have been invented by the heresiarch Marcion. Despite its insipid and suspicious character, this compilation was frequently copied in the Middle Ages, and enjoyed a certain degree of respect, although St. Jerome had written of it: ab omnibus exploditur. (See Laodicea.) The Muratorian Fragmentist mentions together with a spurious epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans, one to the Alexandrian, which was forged under the auspices of Marcion. We have no other certain knowledge of the apocryphal Epistles of St. Paul. St. Paul and Seneca. This consists of eight pretended letters from the Stoic philosopher Seneca, and six replies from St. Paul. They are identical with a correspondence alluded to by Jerome (de Viris Illustr., xii) without passing judgment on their value, noting that they are read by many. These letters, therefore, could not have been composed after the second half of the fourth century. They are based on the early traditions of Seneca's leanings towards Christianity and the contemporary residence at Rome of Paul and the philosopher. We will merely note the existence of a spurious Letter of St. John, the Apostle, to a dropout man, healing his disease, in the Acts of St. John by the pseudo-Prochorus; one of St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, to Quadratus, in Armenian (Vetter, Litterarische Rundschau, 1896).

(6) Christian Apocryphal Apocalypses—A Apocalypse of the Testamentum D. N. Jesu Christi. (See the section on the Testamentum above.) The Apocalypse of Mary is of medieval origin, and is probably nothing more than an adaptation of an ancient text. It describes the Blessed Mother's descent to Limbo, and exists in Greek MSS. It has been printed in the Tischendorf collection (Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti).—Apocalypses of St. Peter. The Muratorian Fragment, written at Rome in the latter part of the second century, names the apocalypses of John and Peter side by side without indicating their use in the Church, remarking that some do not acknowledge the latter. There is abundant evidence that the Petrine apocrypse was believed authentic in many quarters of the early Church, and enjoyed in a certain measure canonical authority. Clement of Alexandria (Rhetor. I, xx), even honored it with a commentary; Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VI, xiv, 1), places it almost on an equality with the antilegomena or better class of disputed writings; Jerome rejects it hastily. Notwithstanding this, as late as the middle of the fifth century it was季ultimately incorporated into the Acts of St. Paul (q. v.). The few citations of patristic writers were unable to convey an idea of its contents, but fortunately a considerable fragment of this ancient document was discovered at Akhmim, Egypt, together with the pseudo-Petrine Gospel in the language of the original, viz. Greek. A fragment of Clement of Alexandria from the recovered parts enables us to identify the MS. with certainty as a portion of the apocalypse of antiquity. The passage relates to a vision granted by Christ to the Twelve on a mountain, exhibiting the glory of two departing brethren, the splendour of heaven, and a gruesome picture of hell. The language has a Jewish-Christian flavour. The apocryphon is attributed by critics to the first quarter of the second century, and is therefore one of the earliest specimens of non-canonical literature. There exist under the names Apocolypse of St. Peter, Apocrypha of St. Peter through Clement, Liber Clementis, varios; and various other names, which have nothing in common with the ancient Greek one—the Apocolypse of St. Paul. A prelatory notice pretends that this work was found in a marble case under the house of Paul at Tarsus, in the reign of King Theodosius (a. d. 397-399), and upon intelligence conveyed by an angel. This indicates the period of the apocalypse, but in asking who revealed the secrets seen by the Apostle in his transport to the third heaven, alluded to in II Cor., xii, 2, and was composed in Greek. From this Pauline apocalypse must be distinguished a Gnostic work entitled the "Ascension of Paul", referred to by St. Epiphanius, but of which no remains have survived. There is a spurious "Apocolypse of John", of comparatively late origin. Regarding the so-called Apocolypse of St. Bartholomew see Gospel of St. Bartholomew.

IV. THE APOCOLYPSE AND THE CHURCH.—At a very early period orthodox writers and, presumably, ecclesiastical authorities found it necessary to distinguish between the genuine inspired books and a multitude of spurious rival—this fact which is a very important element in the formation of the Christian canon. Thus as early as about A. D. 170, the author of the descriptive Latin catalogue known as the "Muratorian Fragment" mentioned certain works as fictitious which were not afterwards noticed. At a later time devoted attention to the great mass of heretical pseudo-graphic writings (minnarellis multitudo aporophorum et perperam scripturarum, Adv., Her., I, xx). Undoubtedly it was the large use heretical circles, especially the Gnostic sects, made of this insinuating literature which first called with the animadversions on the official guardians of the Church. The East, the books outside the canon (Comment. in Matth., xvi, 25). St. Athanasius in 367 found it necessary to warn his flock by a pastoral epistle against Jewish and heretical apocalypses (P. G., 14, 1430). Another Greek Father, Epiphanius (312-403) in "Hereses", 26, could complain that copies of Gnostic
Apocrypha were current in thousands. Yet it must be confessed that the early Fathers, and the Church, during the first three centuries, were more indulgent towards Jewish pseudographs circulating under venerable Old Testament names. The Book of Benothon and the Assumption of Moses had been cited by the canonical Epistle of Jude. Most of the fathers admitted the Inspiration of Fourth Eadmas. Not to mention the Shepherd of Hermas, the Acts of St. Paul (at least in the Thecla portion) and the Apocalypse of St. Peter were highly revered at this and later periods. Yet, withal, no apocryphal work found official recognition in the Western Church. In 37 Pope Leo the Great began an attack on the pseudo-apostolic writings, "which contained the germ of so many errors...they should not only be forbidden but completely suppressed and burned" (Epist. xv, 15). The so-called "Decretum de recipiendis et non recipiendis libris" is attributed to Pope Gelasius (496), but in reality is a compilation dating from the beginning of the sixth century, and containing collections made earlier than Gelasius. It is an official document, the first of the kind we possess, and contained a list of 39 works besides those ascribed to Leucius, "disciple of the devil," all of which it condemns as apocryphal. From this catalogue that in the Latin Church by this time, apocrypha in general, including those of Catholic origin, had fallen under the ecclesiastical ban, always, however, with a preoccupation against the danger of heterodoxy. The Synod of Braga, in Spain, held in the year 563, anathematizes any one "who reads, utters, or defends the inconstant decisions set in circulation by heretics." Although in the Middle Ages these condemnations were forgotten and many of the pseudo-graphic writings enjoyed a high degree of favour among both clerics and laity, still we find superior minds, such as Alcuin, St. Bernard, St. Thomas Aquinas, pointing out their weakness or fallacy. An echo of ancient regulations occurs in the work De Festis B. M. V. of Benedict XIV, declaring certain popular apocrypha to be impure sources of tradition. (See Canon of Sacred Scripture.)

GEORGE J. REID.

Apodosis (Gr. ἀπόδοσις, a giving back), a usage of the Greek Church corresponding somewhat to the omission of a feast in the Latin Church. For several days after a great feast the celebrant turns back to certain prayers of the feast and repeats them in commemoration of it. The last day of such repetition of the prayers of the previous feast is called the apodosis. This time may be longer or shorter than the Latin octave of one week, because great feasts in the Greek Church are commemorated for a longer time than minor ones.

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

Apollinarism, a Christological theory, according to which Christ had a human body and a human sensitive soul, but no human rational mind, the Divine Logos taking the place of the latter. As the theory of this hypothesis, Apollinianism (Ἀπολλιναρία) the younger Bishop of Laodicea, flourished in the latter half of the fourth century and was at first highly esteemed by men like St. Athanasius, St. Basil, and St. Jerome for his classical culture, his Biblical learning, his defence of Christianity and his loyalty to the Nicene faith. He evoked his teacher, Apollinaris the Younger, in reconstructing the Scriptures on classical models, in order to compensate the Christians for the loss of Greek literature of which the edict of Julian had deprived them. St. Jerome credits him with "innumerable volumes on the Scriptures"; two apologetics of Christianity, one against Porphyry, and the other against Julian; a refutation of Eunomius, a radical Arian, etc.; but all these works are lost. With regard to Apollinaris's writings which bear on the present theory, we are more fortunate. A contemporary anonymous book: "Adversus fraudes haereticorum" was written for the Arian bishops in order to win credence for their error, circulated a number of tracts under the approved names of such men as Gregory Thaumaturgus (Ἑκ τῷ μήπος πιστῶς, Exposition of Faith), Athanasius (τῷ σοφότατῳ, On the Incarnation), Pope Julius (προς τῷ ἐν Ἑρατῷ, On Unity in Christ), etc. Following that clue, Lequien, already in the Anti-Nicene Collection (1892), have shown that in all probability these are Apollinaris's writings. Moreover, the Fathers of the Church who wrote in defence of orthodoxy, e. g., Athanasius, in two books against Apollinaris; Gregory Nazianzen, in several letters; Gregory of Nyssa in his "Ἀντιγραφή", Theodoret, in his "Heretici Fabula" and "Dialogue", etc., incidentally give us ample information on the real system of the Laodician.

The precise time at which Apollinaris came forward with his heresy is uncertain. There are clearly two periods in the Apollinarian controversy. Up to 376, we have no reason to believe he was a public teacher; in which he was held, Apollinarius's name was never mentioned by his opponents, i.e. by individuals like Athanasius and Pope Damasus, or by councils like the Alexandrian (362), and the Roman (376). From this latter date it is open war. Two more Roman councils, 377 and 381, and a number of Fathers, plainly denounce and condemn as heretical the views of Apollinaris. He failed to submit even to the more solemn condemnation of the Council of Constantinople, 381, whose first canon entered Apollinarianism on the list of heresies, and he died in his error, about 392. His following, at one time considerable in Constantinople, Strasburg and Philadelphia, increased no fewer than twenty-one, and the ancient writers consider him. Some few disciples, like Vitalis, Venantius, Polemon, and Timothy, tried to perpetuate the error of the master and probably are responsible for the forgeries noticed above. The sect itself soon became extinct. Towards 416, many returned to the mother-Church, while the rest drifted away into Monophysitism.

THEORY.—Apollinaris based his theory on two principles or suppositions, one ontological or objective, and one psychological or subjective. Ontologically, it appeared to him that the union of humanity with God could not be realized by man, but by a juxtaposition or collocation. Two perfect beings with all their attributes, he argued, cannot be one. They are at most an incongruous compound, not unlike the monsters of mythology. Inasmuch as the Nicene faith forbade him to belittle the Logos, as Arius had done, he forthwith proceeded to maintain the humanity of Christ, and divest it of its noblest attribute, and this, he claimed, for the sake of true Unity and veritable Incarnation. Psychologically, Apollinaris, considering the rational soul or spirit as essentially liable to sin and capable, at its best, of only precarious efforts, saw no way of saving Christ's impeccability and divinity, but by the elimination of the human spirit from Jesus' humanity, and the substitution of the Divine Logos in its stead. For the constructive part of his theory, Apollinaris appealed to the well-known Platonic division of human nature: body (σῶμα, σώματος), soul (ψυχή διανοιγμον, spirit (νοοτροπίας, ψυχή λογικής). He said, sanctifying this ancient dualism, that man is a human soul or principle of animal life, but not the human spirit. The Logos Himself is, or takes the place of, the human spirit, thus becoming the rational and spiritual centre, the seat of self-consciousness and self-determination. By this simple device
the Laodicene thought that Christ was safe. His substantial unity secure, His moral immutability guaranteed, and the infinite value of Redemption made self-evident. And in confirmation of it all, he quoted from St. John, 1, 14 “and the Word was made flesh”.: St. Paul, Phil. ii, 7, “Being made in the likeness of men and in habit found as a man”, and I Cor., xv, 47 “The second man, from heaven, heavenly”.

Doctrine of the Church. — It is to be found in the seventh anathema of Pope Damasus in the Council of Rome, a passion against them who say that the Word of God is in the human flesh in lieu of and place of the human rational and intellectual soul. For, the Word of God is the Son Himself. Neither did He come in the flesh to replace, but rather to assume and preserve from sin and save the rational and intellectual soul of man.” In answer to Apollinaris’s basic principles, the Fathers simply denied the second as Manichæan. As to the first, it should be remembered that the Council of Ephesus and Chalcedon had not yet formulated the doctrine of the Hypostatical Union. It will then appear why the Fathers contended themselves with other arguments in rebuttal, e. g. (1) because that the Logos is the Word, therefore the Logos assumed all that is human—therefore the person also—sin alone excepted; that Jesus experienced joy and sadness, both being properties of the rational soul. (2) Christ without a rational soul is not a man; such an incongruous compound, as that imagined by Apollinaris, can never be God-man nor stand as the model of Christian life. (3) What Christ has not assumed He has not healed; thus the noblest portion of man is excluded from Redemption. They also pointed out the correct meaning of the Scriptural passages alleged by Apollinaris, remarking that the word Ἰάσωκ in St. John and other parts of the Holy Writ is by synecdoche for the whole human nature, and that the true meaning of St. Paul (Philippians and I Corinthians) was determined by the clear teaching of the Pastoral Epistles. Some of them, however, incautiously insisted upon the limitations of Jesus’ knowledge as proof positive that His mind was truly human. But when the hierarch would have taken them farther afield into the very mystery of the Unity of Christ, they feared not to acknowledge their ignorance and gently derided Apollinaris’s mathematical spirit and implicit reliance upon mere speculation and human reasoning. The Apollinarian cause, which nowadays appears somewhat childish, had its importance in the history of Christian dogma; it transferred the discussion from the Trinity into the Christological field; moreover, it opened that long line of Christological debates which resulted in the Chalcedonian symbol.

Apollinaris, Saint, was one of the first great martyrs of the Church. He was made Bishop of Ravenna by St. Peter himself. The miracles he wrought there soon attracted official attention, for the simple preaching was so many conversions to the Faith, while at the same time bringing upon him the fury of the idolaters, who beat him cruelly and drove him from the city. He was found half dead on the seashore, and kept in concealment by the Christians, but was captured again and compelled to walk on burning coals and a second time expelled. But he remained in the vicinity, and continued his work of evangelisation. We find him then journeying in the province of Æmilia. A third time he returned to Ravenna. Again he was captured, hacked with knives, had scalding water poured over his wounds, and was beaten in the mouth with stones, because he persisted in preaching, and then, loaded with chains, was flung into a horrible dungeon to starve to death; but after four days he was put on board ship and sent to Greece. There the same course of preachings, and miracles, and sufferings continued; and when his very presence caused the oracles to be silent, he was, after a cruel beating, sent back to Italy. All this continued for three years, and a fourth time he returned to Ravenna. By this time Vespasian was Emperor, and he, in answer to the complaints of the pagans, issued a decree of banishment against the Christians. Apollinaris was kept concealed for some time, but as he was passing out of the gates of the city, was set upon and savagely beaten, probably at Classis, a suburb, but he lived for seven days, foretelling meantime that the persecutions would increase, but that the Church would ultimately triumph. It is not certain what was his native place, though it was probably Antioch. Nor is it clear if the bishopric of Apollinaris was that of Christ, as has been suggested. The precise date of his consecration cannot be ascertained, but he was Bishop of Ravenna for twenty-six years.

Apollinaris, Saint, the most illustrious of the Bishops of Valence, b. at Vienne, 453; d. 520. He lived in the time of the irruption of the barbarians, and unhappily Valence, which was the central see of the recently founded Kingdom of Burgundy, had been scandalized by the dissolute Bishop Maximus, and the see in consequence had been vacant for fifty years. Apollinaris was of a family of noble and saints. He was little over twenty when he was ordained priest. In 486, when he was thirty-three years old, he was made Bishop of the long vacant See of Valence, and under his zeal and care it soon recovered its ancient glory. Abuses were corrected, and morals reformed. The Bishop, in order to fight the news of his first ill success filled the city with consternation. His return to health was miraculous. He was present at the great conference of Lyons, between the Arians and Catholics, which was held in presence of King Gondebald. He distinguished himself there by his eloquence and learning. A memorable contest in defence of marriage brought Apollinaris again into special prominence. Stephen, the treasurer of the kingdom, was living in incest. The four bishops of the province commanded him to separate from his companion, but he appealed to the King, who sustained his official and exiled the four bishops to Sardina. As they refused to yield to the King’s要求, and after some time permitted them to return to their sees, with the exception of Apollinaris, who had rendered himself particularly obnoxious, and was kept a close prisoner for a year. At last the King, stricken with a grievous malady, repented, and the Queen in person came to beg Apollinaris to go to the court, to restore the monarch to health. On his refusal, the Queen asked for his cloak to place on the sufferer. The request was granted, the King was cured, and came to beg absolution for his sin. Apollinaris was sixty-four years old when he returned from Sardinia to Valence, and his people received him with every demonstration of joy. He died after an episcopate of thirty-four years, at the age of sixty-seven, his life ending, as it had begun, in the constant exercise of the most exalted holiness.

Acta SS., October, III.
Apollinaris (The Elder), a Christian grammarian of the fourth century, first at Berytus in Phoenicia, then at Laodicea in Syria. He became a priest, and was among the staunchest upholders of the Council of Nicaea (325) and of the Arianism. When the Apostate forbade Christian professors to lecture or comment on the poets or philosophers of Greece (362), Apollinaris and his son bearing the same name, both highly cultivated and resourceful, zealously strove to replace the literary masterpieces of antiquity by new works, which should show the Christian side of the advantages of polite instruction and help to win respect for the Christian religion among the heathen. According to Socrates (Hist. Eccl., II, xvi; III, xvi), the elder Apollinaris translated the Pentateuch into Greek hexameters, converted the first two books of Kings into an epic poem of twelve books. Four canons for the tragedies modeled on Euripides, comedies after the manner of Menander, and odes imitated from Pindar, Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., V, xviii; VI, xxv) says nothing of the poetical works of the elder Apollinaris, but lays stress on those of his son. This improvised Greek literature, however, admired by genuine, did not survive. As soon as Julian the Apostate (361-363), the son of Constantius II, took power, he closed the schools of the great Christian schools, and the memory of the courageous efforts of Apollinaris to nullify the malice of Julian survived.

Apollinaris Claudius, Saint, a Christian apologist, Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia in the second century. He became famous for his polemical treatises against the heretics of his day, whose errors he showed to be entirely borrowed from the pagans. He wrote two books against the Jews, five against the pagans, and two on "Truth." In 177 he published an eloquent treatise for the Christians, addressed to Marcus Aurelius, and appealing to the Emperor's own experience with the "Thundering Legion," whose prayers won him the victory over the Quadi. The exact date of his death is not known, but it was probably while Marcus Aurelius was still Emperor. None of his writings is extant. His feast is kept on January 8.

Apollonia, Saint, a holy virgin who suffered martyrdom in Alexandria during a local uprising against the Christians previous to the persecution of Decius (end of 248, or beginning of 249). During the festivities commemorative of the first millenary of the Roman Empire, the agitation of the heathen populace rose to a great height, and when one of their poets prophesied a calamity, they committed bloody outrages on the Christians whom the authori- ties thereupon sought to silence. For this reason, then Bishop of Alexandria (247-265), relates the sufferings of his people in a letter addressed to Fabius, Bishop of Antioch, long extracts from which Eusebius has preserved for us (Hist. Eccl., I, vi, 41). After describing how a Christian man and woman named by the seditious Metras and Quinta, were seized by the seditionists while they were off to market, and put to the most cruel tortures, and how the houses of several other Christians were completely pillaged, Dionysius continues: "At that time Apollonia the τρίχας περήφανη (virgo virginitatis), by which she very probably means not a virgin advanced in years, but a decent young woman, was seized with all her teeth. They then erected outside the city gates a pile of fagots and threatened to burn her alive if she refused to repeat after them impious words (either a blasphemy against Christ, or an invocation of the heathen gods). Given at her own request, a little freedom, she sprang quickly into the fire and was burned to death." Apollonia belongs, therefore, to that class of early Christian martyrs who did not await the death they were threatened with, but either to preserve their chastity, or because they were confronted with the alternatives of renouncing their faith or suffering death, voluntarily embraced the latter in the form prepared for them. In the honour paid to her martyrs the Church made no distinction between these women and others. St. Augustine touches on this question in the first book of the "City of God," apropos of suicide (De Civ. Dei, I, 26): But, they say, during the time of persecution certain holy women plunged into the water with the intention of being swept away by the waves and drowned, and thus preserve their threatened chastity. Although they quitted life in this wise, nevertheless they receive high honour as martyrs in the Catholic Church and their feasts are observed with ceremony. This is a matter in which I dare not pass judgment lightly. For I know not but that the Church was divinely authorized through trustworthy revelations to honour thus the memory of these Christians. It may be that such is the case. May it not be, too, that these acted in such a manner, not through human caprice but on the command of God, not erroneously but through obedience, as we must believe in the case of Samson? When, however, God gives a command and makes it clearly known, who would account obedience thereto a crime or condemn such pious devotion and ready sacrifice?" The narrative of Dionysius may suggest the close resemblance of this to the act of St. Apollonia; in his eyes she was as much a martyr as the others, and as such she was revered in the Alexandrian Church. In time, her feast was also popular in the West. A later legend assigned a similar martyrdom to Apollonia, a Christian virgin of Rome in the reign of Julian the Apostate. There was, however, but one martyr of this name, i.e. the Saint of Alexandria. The Roman Church celebrates her memory on 9 February, and she is popularly invoked against the toothache because of the torments she had to endure. She is represented in art with pincers in which a tooth is held. There are a considerable number of churches dedicated to her at Rome but it no longer exists. The little square, however, in which it stood is still called "Piazza Sant' Apollonia."

J. P. Kirsch.

Apollonius of Ephesus, anti-Montanist Greek ecclesiastical writer, between 180 and 210, probably from Asia Minor, for he is thoroughly acquainted with the Christian history of Ephesus and the doings of the Montanist Irenaeus. If it was a great Deacon, it was probably an unknown author of "PresDEestinatus" (says I, 26, 27, 28; P. L., LIII, 596), he was a Bishop of Ephesus, but the silence of other Christian writers renders this testimony doubtful. He undertook the defence of the Church against Montanus, and followed in the footsteps of Zosimus of Comana, Julian of Apamæa, and Synesius of Achaimnus, who dealt with the Mantinean theses. His work is cited by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., V, 18), and is praised by St. Jerome (De vir. ill. c. 11), but has been lost, and not even its title is known. It seems certain that it showed the falsity of the Montanist prophecies, recounted the unedifying lives of Montanus and his prophets, also gave currency to the report of their suicides by hanging, and threw light on some of the sects of the sect, including the apostateThemison and the pseudomartyr Alexander. The former, having evaded martyrdom by means of money, posed as an innovator, addressing a letter to his partisans after the manner of the Apostles, and finally blasphemed Christ and the Church; the latter, a notorious thief, publicly condemned the second epistle of St. Paul. We know from Eusebius that Apollonius spoke in his work of Zoticus, who had tried to exercise Maximilla, but had been prevented by Themison, and of the martyr-Bishop Thraseas, another adversary of Montanism. He very probably gave the signal in it for the movement of opposition to Montanism which had been prepared for months. At all events, he recalls the tradition according to which Our Lord had advised the Apostles not to go far from Jerusalem during the twelve years immediately following His Ascension, a tradition known to Clement of Alexandria from the apocryphal "Predicatio Petri". He moreover recounts the restoration to life of a dead man at Ephesus by the Apostle St. John, whose Apocalypse he knew and quotes. He takes rank among the opponents of Montanism with the "Anonymous" of Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., V, 16, 17), with Militantes and with Apollinaris. Eusebius (loc. cit.) says his work constituted an abundant and excellent refutation of Montanism. St. Jerome qualified it as "a lengthy and remarkable volume". It did not therefore pass unnoticed, and must have roused some feeling among the Montanists since Tertullian felt it necessary to reply to it. After his six books Μεταλλακτικόν, in which he apologized for the ecclesias into which the Montanist prophets fell before prophesying, Tertullian composed a seventh especially to refute Apollonius; he wrote it also in Greek for the use of the Asiatic Montanists.

Apollonius of Tyana. See NEO-PYTHERGOIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Apologetics, a theological science which has for its purpose the explanation and defense of the Christian religion, and which, it should be noted, is not a form of apologetics. The term is derived from the Latin adjective, apologeticus, which, in turn has its origin in the Greek adjective, ἀπολογιστικός, the substantive being ἀπολογία, "apology", "defence". As an equivalent of the plural form, the variant, "Apologies", is招呼和, and that found in recent times, is suggested probably by the corresponding French and German words, which are always in the singular. But the plural form, "Apologetics", is far more common and will doubtless prevail, being in harmony with other words similarly formed, as ethics, statistics, homiletics. In defining apologetics as a form of apologetics, we understand the latter word in its primary sense, as a verbal defence against a verbal attack, a disproving of a false accusation, or a justification of an action or line of conduct wrongly made the object of censure. Such, for example, is the Apology of Socrates, such as the Apologia of John Elvis. This is the only sense attaching to the term as used by the ancient Greeks and Romans, or by the French and Germans of the present day. Quite different is the meaning now conveyed by our English word, "apology", namely, an explanation of an action acknowledged to be open to blame. The same idea is expressed almost exclusively by the English adjective, "apologetic", and in fact is the only one in English and the French adjective, "apologetic". For this reason, the adoption of the word, "Apologetics", in the sense of a scientific vindication of the Christian religion is not altogether a happy one. Some scholars prefer such terms as "Christian Evidences", the "Defence of the Christian Religion". "Apologetics" and "Apology" are not altogether interchangeable terms. The latter is the generic term, the former the specific. Any kind of accusation, whether personal, social, political, or religious, may call forth a corresponding apologetics. It is only apologies of the Christian religion that fall under the term Apologetics. There is scarcely a dogma, scarcely a ritual or disciplinary institution of the Church that has not been subjected to hostile criticism, and hence, as occasion required, been vindicated by proper apologies. But besides these forms of apology, there are the answers which have been called forth by attacks of various kinds upon the historical interpretation of the Christian dogmas. Apologies written to vindicate now this, now that ground of the Christian Catholic faith, that has been called in question or held up to disbelief and ridicule.

Now it is out of such apologies for the foundations of Christian belief that the science of apologetics has taken form. Apologetics is the Christian Apology par excellence, combining in one well-rounded system the arguments and considerations of permanent value that have found expression in the various single apologies. The latter, being answers to specific attacks, were necessarily conditioned by the circumstances "that forced them to use a confused, controversial, partial vindications of the Christian position. In them the refutation of specific charges was the prominent element. Apologetics, on the other hand, is the comprehensive, scientific vindication of the grounds of Christian Catholic belief, in which the calm, impersonal presentation of the underlying principles is of paramount importance, the refutation of objections being added by way of corollary. It addresses itself not to the hostile opponent for the purpose of refutation, but rather to the inquiring mind by way of information. Its aim is to give a scientific presentation of the claims which Christ's revealed religion has on the assent of every rational mind; it seeks to lead the inquirer after truth to recognize, first, the reasonableness and trustworthiness of the Christian revelation as realized in the Catholic Church, and secondly, the corresponding obligation of accepting it. While not compelling faith—for the certitude it offers is not absolute, but probabilistic—this quality of the argument ad compatibility with a religious religion amply suffice to vindicate the act of faith as a rational act, and to discredit the estrangement of the sceptic and unbeliever as unwarranted and culpable. Its last word is the answer to the question: Why should I be a Catholic? Apologetics thus leads us beyond the Clinton faith to the acceptance of the Catholic Church as the divinely authorized organ for preserving and rendering efficacious the saving truths revealed by Christ. This is the great fundamental dogma on which all other dogmas rest. Hence apologetics also goes by the name of "fundamental theology". Apologetics is generally viewed as one branch of dogmatic science, the other and chief branch being dogmatic theology proper. It is good to note, however, that in point of view and method also they are quite distinct. Dogmatic theology, like moral theology, addresses itself primarily to those who are already Catholic. It presupposes faith. Apologetics, on the other hand, leads up to faith. The former begins where the latter ends. Apologetics is pre-eminently a positive, historical discipline, whereas dogmatic theology is rather philosophical and deductive, using as its premises data of divine and ecclesiastical authority—the contents of revelation and their interpretation by the Church. Its object is not only to expound the elements of natural religion, the sources of its authoritative data, that dogmatic theology comes in touch with apologetics. As has been pointed out, the object of apologetics is to give a scientific answer to the question, Why should I be a Catholic? Now this question involves the complete and individual. The other, still more fundamental, question is: Why should I profess any religion at all? The answer to the latter question is easily divided into three great divisions: First, the study of religion in general and the grounds of theistic belief; second, the study of revealed religion and the grounds of Christian belief; third, the study of the Church and the grounds of Catholic belief. Each of these divisions, the apologist inquires into the nature of religion, its universality, and man's natural capacity to acquire religious ideas. In connection with this the modern study of the religious philosophy of uncultured peoples has to be taken into consideration, and the various theories concerning the origin of religion present themselves for critical discussion. This leads to the examination of the grounds of theistic belief, including the important questions of (1) the existence of a divine Personality, the Creator and Preserver of the world, exercising a special providence over man; (2) man's freedom of will and his corresponding religious and moral responsibility in dependence on God; (3) the immortality of the human soul, and the future life with its attendant rewards and punishments.Coupled with these questions is the refutation of monism, determinism, and other anti-theistic theories. Religious philosophy and apologetics here march hand in hand.

The second division, on revealed religion, is even more comprehensive. After treating the notion, possibility, and moral necessity of a divine revelation, and its discernibility through various internal and external criteria, the apologist proceeds to establish the fact of revelation. Three distinct, progressive stages of revelation are set forth: Primitive Revelation, Mosaic Revelation, and Christian Revelation. The chief sources on which he has to rely in establishing this triple fact of revelation are the Sacred Scriptures. But if he is logical, he must proceed from their inspiration and treat them provisionally as historical books, an impartial and unprejudiced examination must depend on the critical study of the Old and New Testaments by impartial scholarly, and build on the accredited results of their researches touching the authenticity and trustworthiness of the sacred books purporting to be historical. It is only by anticipation that an argument for the fact of primitive revelation can be based on the ground that it is taught in the inspired book of Genesis, and that it is implied in the supernatural state of our first parents. In the absence of anything like contemporary documents, the apologist has to lay chief stress on the high antecedent probability of primitive revelation by historical books, but sufficient scope for primitive man is compatible with a very crude stage of material and aesthetic culture, and hence is not discredited by the sound results of prehistoric archeology. Closely connected with this question is the scientific study of the origin and development of the most important religious species; and, as still larger subjects bearing on the historic value of the sacred Book of Origins, the compatibility with Scripture of the modern sciences of biology, astronomy, and geology. In like manner the apologist has to content himself with showing the fact of Mosaic revelation to be highly probable. The difficulty, in the case of Old Testament criticism, of recognizing more than a small portion of the Pentateuch as documentary evidence contemporary with Moses, makes it incumbent on the apologist to proceed with caution lest, in attempting to prove too much, he may bring discredit upon the Christian religion as a whole.

When the apologist comes to the subject of Christian revelation, he finds himself on much firmer ground. Starting with the generally recognized results of New Testament criticism, he is enabled to show that the synoptic Gospels, on the one hand, and the undisputed Epistles of St. Paul, on the other, offer two independent, yet mutually corroborative, masses of evidence concerning the person and work of Jesus. As this evidence stands, it affords a testimony of thoroughly reliable witnesses and their associates, it presents a portraiture of Jesus that is truly historical. After showing from the records that Jesus taught, now explicitly, now implicitly, that he was the long expected Messiah, the Son of God sent by His Heavenly Father to enlighten and save mankind, and to found the new kingdom of justice, Apologetics proceeds to set forth the grounds for believing in these claims: (1) the surpassing beauty of His moral character, stamping Him as the unique, perfect man; (2) the lofty excellence of his moral and religious teaching, which has no parallel elsewhere, and which answers the highest aspirations of the human soul; (3) His miracles wrought during His public mission; (4) the transcendent miracle of His resurrection, which He foretold as well; (5) the wonderful regeneration of society through His undying personal influence. Then, by way of supplementary proof, the apologist compares his program with the various rival religious systems of the world—Brahminism, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, Confucianism, Taoism, Mohammedanism—and shows how in the person of its founder, in its moral and religious ideal and influence, the Christian religion is immeasurably superior to all others, and alone has a claim to our assent as the absolute, divinely-revealed religion. Here, too, in the survey of Buddhism, the specious objection, not uncommon to-day, that Buddhist ideas and legends have contributed to the formation of the Gospels, calls for a summary refutation.

Beyond the fact of Christian revelation the Protestant apologist does not proceed. But the Catholic rightly insists that the scope of apologetics should not end here. Both the New Testament records and those of the sub-Apostolic age bear witness that Christianity was meant to be something more than a religious philosophy of individual thought. The system of individual belief and practice, and that it cannot be separated historically from a concrete form of social organization. Hence Catholic apologetics adds, as a necessary sequel to the established fact of Christian revelation, the demonstration of the true Church of Christ and its identity with the Catholic Church. In the age of the Apostles and their immediate successors is set forth the institution of the Church as a true, unequal society, endowed with the supreme authority of its
Christian Church was the bitter opposition it met from paganism. The polytheistic religion of the Roman Empire, venerated for its antiquity, was intertwined with every fibre of the body politic. Its providential influence was a matter of firm belief. It was associated with the highest culture, and had sanctified the sanctum of countless altars in city and country, in Rome. Its splendid temples and stately ritual gave it a grace and dignity that captivated the popular imagination. On the other hand, Christian monotheism was an innovation. It made no imposing display of liturgy. Its disciples were, for the most part, people of humble birth. Greek sacred literature had little attraction for the fastidious reader accustomed to the elegant diction of the classic authors. And so the popular mind viewed it with misgivings, or despised it as an ignorant superstition. But opposition did not end here. The uncompromising attitude of the new religion towards pagan rites was decried as the greatest impertinence. The Christians were branded as atheists, and as they held aloof from the public functions also, which were invariably associated with these false rites, they were accused of being enemies of the State. The Christian custom of worshipping in secret assembly seemed strange, for freedom from such was forbidden by Roman law. Nor were calumnies wanting. The popular imagination easily distorted the vaguely-known Agape and Eucharistic Sacrifice into abominable rites marked by feasting on infant flesh and by indiscriminate lust. The outcome was that the people and authorities took alarm at the rapidly spreading Church and sought to repress it by force. To vindicate the Christian cause against these attacks of paganism, many apologies were written. Some, notably the "Apology" of Justin Martyr (150), the "Plea for the Christians", by Athenagoras (177), and the "Apology" of Tertullian (197), were addressed to the emperors for the purpose of securing for the Christians immunity from persecution. Others were composed to convince the pagans of the folly of polytheism and of the saving truth of Christianity. Such were: Tatian, "Discourse to the Greeks" (190), Theophilus, "Three Books to Autolycus" (180), the "Epistle to Diognetus" (about 190), the "Octavius" of Minucius Felix (192), Origen, "True Discourse against Celsus" (248), Lactantius, "Institutes" (312), and St. Augustine, "City of God" (415-426). In these apologies the argument from Old Testament prophecy has been employed, that of the power of miracles. But the one on which most stress is laid is that of the transcendent excellence of Christianity. Though not clearly marked out, a twofold line of thought runs through this argument: Christianity is light, whereas paganism is darkness; Christianity is power, whereas paganism is weakness. Enlarging on these ideas, the apologists contrast the logical coherence of the religious tenets of Christianity, and its lofty ethical teaching, with the follies and inconsistencies of polytheism, the low ethical principles of its philosophers, and the indecencies of its mythology and of some of its rites. They likewise show that the Christian religion claims the one true mediator, who, by transforming man from a slave of sin into a spiritual freeman, they compare what they once were as pagans with what they now are as Christians. They draw a telling contrast between the loose morality of pagan society and the exemplary lives of Christians, whose devotion to their religious principles is stronger than duty itself.

SECOND PERIOD: CHRISTIANITY IN CONFLICT WITH MOHAMMEDAN RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY. The one dangerous rival with which Christianity had to contend in the Middle Ages was the Mohammedan religion. Within a century of its birth, it had torn from Christendom some of its fairest lands and extended like a huge crescent from Spain over Northern Africa, Egypt, Palestine, Arabia, Persia, and Syria, to the eastern part of Asia Minor. The danger which this fanatic religion offered to Christian faith, in countries where the two religions came in contact, was not to be treated lightly. And so we find a series of apologies written to uphold the truth of Christianity and fight the errors of Islam. The earliest was the “Discussion between a Saracen and a Christian” composed by St. John Damascene (about 750). In this apology he vindicates the dogma of the Incarnation against the rigid and fatalistic conception of God made by Mohammed. He adds his approval of the resurrection of Christ, pointing out the grave defects in Mohammed’s life and teaching, and showing the Koran to be in its best parts but a feeble imitation of the Sacred Scriptures. Other apologies of a similar kind were composed by Peter the Venerable in the twelfth, and by Raymond of Martini in the thirteenth century. Hardly less dangerous to Christian faith was the rationalistic philosophy of Islamism. The Arabian conquerors had learned from the Syrians the arts and sciences of the Greek world. They became especially proficient in medicine, mathematics, and philosophy, for the study of which they erected in every important town its college and library. By the twelfth century Moorish Spain had nineteen colleges, and their renown attracted hundreds of Christian scholars from every part of Europe. Herein lay a grave menace to Christian orthodoxy, for the philosophy of Aristotle as taught in these schools had become thoroughly tinted with Arabian pantheism and rationalism. The peculiar tenet of the celebrated Moorish philosopher Averroes was much in vogue, namely: that philosophy and religion are two independent spheres of thought, so that what is true in the one may be false in the other. Again, it was commonly taught that faith is for the masses who cannot think for themselves, but philosophy is a higher form of knowledge which noble minds should seek to acquire. Among the fundamental dogmas denied by the Arabian philosophers were creation, providence, and immortality. To vindicate Christianity against Mohammedan rationalism, St. Thomas composed his “Summa contra Gentiles”, in four books. In this great apology the respective claims of reason and faith are carefully distinguished and harmonized, and a systematic demonstration of the grounds of faith is built up with arguments of reason and authority such as appealed directly to the minds of educated persons in the Middle Ages. God, predestination, creation and the future life, St. Thomas refutes the chief errors of the Arabian, Jewish, and Greek philosophers, and shows that the genuine teaching of Aristotle confirms the great truths of religion. Three apologies composed in much the same spirit, but belonging to a later age, may be mentioned here. The one is the fine work of Louis Vivès, “De Veritate Fidei Christianae Libri V” (about 1530). After treating the principles of natural theology, the Incarnation, and Redemption, he gives two dialogues, one between a Christian and a Jew, the other between a Christian and a Mohammedan, in which he shows the superiority of the Christian religion. Similar to this is the apology of the celebrated Dutch theologian Grotius, “De Veritate Religionis Christianae” (1627). It is in six books. An able treatise on natural theology is followed by a demonstration of the truth of Christianity based on the life and miracles of Jesus, the holiness of His life and the perfection of His religion. In proving the authenticity and trustworthiness of the Sacred Scriptures, Grotius appeals largely to internal evidence. The latter part of the work is devoted to a refutation of paganism, Judaism, and Mohammedanism. An apology on somewhat similar lines is that of the Huguenot, Philip de Mornay, “De la vérité de la religion chrétienne” (1579). It is the first apology of note that was written in a modern tongue.

THIRD PERIOD. CATHOLICISM IN CONFLICT WITH PROTESTANTISM. The outbreak of Protestantism in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and its rejection of much of the fundamentals of Catholicism, called forth a mass of controversial apologetic literature. It was not, of course, the first time that the principles of Catholic belief had been questioned with reference to Christian orthodoxy. In the early ages of the Church heretical sects, assuming the right to prophecy and the re-interpretation of the spirit of Christ, had given occasion to St. Irenæus “On Heresies”, Tertullian “On Prescription against Heretics”, St. Vincent of Lérins, in his “Commonitory”, to insist on unity with the Catholic Church, and, for the purpose of confuting the heretical errors of private interpretation, to appeal to an authoritative rule of faith. In like manner, the rise of heretical sects in the three centuries preceding the Reformation led to an accentuation of the fundamental principles of Catholicism, notably in Monesta’s “Summa contra Catharos et Waldenses” (about 1225), and Torquemada’s “Summa de Ecclesiis” (1450). So far a great deal of the outpouring of the many sources of Protestant ideas, it became the duty of the hour to defend the true nature of the Church of Christ, to vindicate its authority, its divinely authorized hierarchy under the primacy of the Pope, its visibility, unity, perpetuity, and infallibility, along with other doctrines and practices branded as superstitions.

In the first heat of this gigantic controversy the writings on both sides were sharply polemic, abounding in personal recriminations. But towards the close of the century there developed a tendency to treat the controverted questions more in the manner of a calm, systematic apology. Two works belonging to this time are especially noteworthy. One is the “Disputationes de controversiis Christianae Fidei” (1581-92), by Robert Bellarmine, a monumental work of vast erudition, rich in apologetic material. The other is the “Principiorum Fidei Doctrinalium Libri V” by Robert Bellarmine, who was pronounced to be the prince of controversialists. Though not so erudite, it is more profound than the work of Bellarmine. Another excellent work of this period is that of Martin Bucer, “De Ecclesia Christi” (1633).

CHURCHES PERIOD: RATIONALISM IN CONFLICT WITH RATIONALISM.—(A) From the Middle of the Seventeenth to the Nineteenth Century. Rationalism—the setting up of the human reason as the source and measure of all knowable truth—is, of course, not confined to any one period of human history. It has existed from the earliest days of philosophy. But in Christian society it did not become a notable factor till the middle of the seventeenth century, when it asserted itself chiefly in the form of Deism. It was associated, and even to a large extent identified with the rapidly growing movement towards greater intellectual freedom which, stimulated by fruitful scientific inquiry, found itself seriously hampered by the narrow views of inspiration and of historic Bible-interpretation which then prevailed. The Bible had been set up as an infallible source of knowledge not only in matters of religion, but of history, chronology, and physical science. The result was a reaction against the very essentials of Christianity. The Deists became the principal propagators of theism, leading in many cases to downright atheism. Starting with the principle that no religious doctrine is of value that cannot be proved by experience or by philosophical reflection, the Deists admitted the existence of a God external to the world, but denied every form of divine intervention, and accordingly rejected revelation, inspiration, miracles, and prophecy. Together with unbelievers of a still more pronounced type, they assailed the historic value of the Bible, decriyng its miraculous narratives as fraud and superstition. The movement started in England, and in the eighteenth century spread to France and Germany. The results of this new method of searching, for it found zealous exponents in some of the leading philosophers and men of letters—Hobbes, Locke, Hume, Voltaire, Rousseau, d’Alembert, Diderot, Lessing, Herder, and others. But able apologists were not lacking to champion the Christian cause. Some produced influential works that would win honour for their scholarly defence of fundamental Christian truths—Lardner, author of the “Credibility of the Gospel History,” in twelve volumes (1741–55); Butler, likewise famous for his “Analogy of Religion Natural and Revealed to the Constitution of Nature” (1736); Campbell, who in his “Dissertation on Miracles” (1766) gave a masterly answer to Hume’s arguments against miracles; and Paley, whose “Evidences of Christianity” (1794) and “Natural Theology” (1802) are among the classics of English theological literature. On the continent, the work of defence was carried on by such men as Bishop Huet, who wrote “Demonstratio Regni Dei” (Paris, 1679); Leibnitz, whose “Thésodicee” (1684), with its valuable introduction on the conformity of faith with reason, had a great influence for good; the Benedictine Abbot Gerbert, who gave a comprehensive Christian apology in his “Demonstratio Veris Religionis versus Ecclesiæ Contra Quasuis Falasæ” (1780); and the Abbé Berger, whose “Traité historique et dogmatique de la vraie religion,” in twelve volumes (1760), showed ability and erudition. —(b) The Nineteenth Century. In the last century the conflict of Christianity with rationalism was in part lightened and in part complicated by the marvellous development of scientific and historic inquiry. Lost languages, like the Egyptian and the Babylonian, were recovered, and thereby rich and valuable records of the past—many of them unearthed by laborious and costly excavation—were made to tell their story. Much of this bore on the relations of the ancient Hebrew people, on their tribal and religious history, and on some instances creating new difficulties, for the most part helped to corroborate the truth of the Bible history. Out of these researches have grown a number of valuable and interesting apologetic studies on Old Testament history: Schrader, “Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament” (London, 1872); Hebrew scholars’ “Egypt and the Books of Moses” (London, 1840); Harper, “The Bible and Modern Discoveries” (London, 1891); McCurdy, “History, Prophecy, and the Monuments” (London-New York, 1894–1900); Finches, “The Old Testament in the Light of the Historic Records of Assyria and Babylon” (London-New York, 1902); Abbé Gainet, “La bible sans la bible, ou l’histoire de l’ancien testament par les seuls témoignages profanes” (Bar-le-Duc, 1871); Vigouroux, “La bible et les découvertes modernes” (Paris, 1889). On the other hand, Biblical chronology, as then understood, and the literal historic interpretation of the Book of Genesis were thrown into confusion by the advancing science of astronomy, with its grand nebular hypothesis; biology, with its even more fruitful theory of evolution; geology, and prehistoric archeology. Rationalists eagerly laid hold of these scientific data and sought to turn them to the discredit of the Bible and likewise of the Christian religion; forthwith they were forthcoming to essay a conciliation of science and religion. Among them were: Dr. (afterwards Cardinal) Wiseman, “Twelve Lectures on the Connection between Science and Revealed Religion” (London, 1847), which, though antiquated in parts, is still valuable reading; Reussch, “Nature and the Bible” (London, 1876). Others more modern and up to date are: Duillé de Saint-Projet, “Apologie scientifique de la foi chrétienne” (Paris, 1885); Abbé Guibert, “In the Beginning” (New York, 1904), one of the best Catholic treatises on the subject; and more recent still, A. de Lapparent, “Science et apologie” (Paris, 1903). In fact, the search for new forms of scientific inquiry for Christian belief was the application of the principles of historic criticism to the books of Holy Scripture. Not a few Christian scholars looked with grave misgivings on the progress made in this legitimate department of human research, which promised to undermine the recognition of many traditional views of Scripture. Rationalists found here a congenial field of study, which seemed to promise the undermining of Scripture-authority. Hence it was but natural that the encroachments of Biblical criticism on conservative theology should be disputed inch by inch. On the whole, the outcome of the long and spirited contest has been to the advantage of Christianity. It is true that the Pentateuch, so long attributed to Moses, is now held by the vast majority of non-Catholic, and by an increasing number of Catholic, scholars to be a compilation of four independent sources put together in final shape after the time of the Evangelists. But even if the antiquity of much of the contents of these sources has been firmly established, as well as the strong presumption that the kernel of the Pentateuchal legislation is of Mosaic institution. This has been shown by Kirkpatrick in his “Divine Library of the Old Testament” (London—New York, 1901), by Driver in his “Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament” (New York, 1897), and by Abbé Lagrange, in his “Méthode historique de l’Ancien Testament” (Paris, 1903; tr. London, 1905). In the New Testament the results of Biblical criticism are still more assuring. The attempt of the Tübinger school to throw the Gospels far into the second century, and to see in most of the Epistles of St. Paul the work of a much later hand, has been absolutely discredit. The synoptic Gospels are now generally recognized, even by advanced critics, to belong to the years 65–85, resting on earlier written and oral sources and, indeed, have been with certainty to at least a. p. 110, that is, within a very few years of the death of St. John. The three Epistles of St. John are recognized as genuine, the pastoral letters being now the chief object of dispute. Closely connected with the theory of the Tübingen School is the attempt of some to explain away the miraculous element in the Gospels as the mythical fancies of an age much later than that of Jesus. Strauss’s views, embodied in his “Life of Jesus” (1835), were ably refuted, together with the false assertions and inductions of the Tübingen School, by such Catholic scholars as Kuhn, Hug, Senp, Döllinger, and by the Protestant critics, Ewald, Meyer, Wieseler, Tholuck, Luthardt, and others. The outcome ofStrauss’s “Life of Jesus,” and of Renan’s vain attempt to improve on it by giving it a legendary form (Vie de Jésus, 1883), has been a number of scholarly biographies of our blessed Lord: by Fouard, “Christ the Son of God” (New York, 1891); Didon “Jesus Christ” (New York, 1891); Ebersheim, “Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah” (New York, 1890), and others. Another field of study which grew up chiefly in the last century, and has had an influence in shaping the science of apologetics, is the study of religions. The study of the great religions of the world, and their comparison with Christianity, furnished material for a number of specious arguments against the independent and supernatural origin of the Christian religion. So, too, the study of the origin of religion in the light of the religious philo-

Another factor in the growth of apologetics during the last century was the rise of numerous systems of philosophy that, in the teaching of such men as Kant, Fichte, Hegel, Schelling, Comte, and Spencer, were openly or covertly in opposition to Christian belief. To counteract these systems, Pope Leo XIII revived throughout the Catholic world the teaching of Thomistic philosophy. The many works written to vindicate Christian Theism against Pantheism, Materialism, Positivism, and Evolutionary Monism have been of great service to apologetics. Not all these philosophical ideologies, indeed, are scholastic. They represent several western schools of thought. France has furnished a number of able apologetic thinkers who lay chief stress on the subjective element in man, who point to the needs and aspirations of the soul, and to the corresponding fitness of Christianity, and of Christianit[...]. The one for the feast of the Annunciation is: "To-day is the crowning of our salvation and the manifestation of the Mystery which is from eternity; the Son of God becometh the Son of the Virgin, and Gabriel announceth the glad tidings of grace: wherefore let us cry out with him to the Mother of God; Hal, full of grace, the Lord is with thee!". Andrew J. Shipman.

Apologetics (ἀπολογία) is a dismissal, a dismissal by the priest at the end of the Catholic mass, and at other times in the company of the faithful. It was originally sung at the end of the Mass and very much like the Roman collect or post-communion, inasmuch as it changes for each feast-day of the year, and commemorates the subject of the feast. The apolysis at Christmas reads as follows: "Thy Nativity, O Christ, hath arisen on the world as the light of knowledge; for at it those who worshipped stars were taught by a star to adore Thee, O Sun of Righteousness, and to know Thee, O true Light, from on high; Glory to Thee, O Lord!". The one for the feast of the Annunciation is: "To-day is the crowning of our salvation and the manifestation of the Mystery which is from eternity; the Son of God becometh the Son of the Virgin, and Gabriel announceth the glad tidings of grace: wherefore let us cry out with him to the Mother of God; Hal, full of grace, the Lord is with thee!". APOSTASY

Apostasy (ἀπόστασις, from, and ὀστᾶν, station, standing, or position). The word itself in its etymological sense, signifies the desertion of a post, the giving up of a state of life; he who voluntarily embraces a definite state of life cannot leave it, therefore, without rigorous law. The case of the fifth book of the Decretals of Gregory IX mentions two other kinds of apostasy: apostasy inobedientis, disobedience to a command given by lawful authority, and iteratio baptismatis, the repetition of baptism, "quoniam reiterantes baptismum videntur apostatam dum recedunt a priore baptismate". As all sin involves disobedience, the apostasy inobedientis does not constitute a specific offence. In the case of iteratio baptismatis, the offence falls rather under the head of heresy and irregularity than of apostasy; if the latter name has been given to it, it is because it appears that the Decretals of Gregory IX combine into one title, under the rubric "De apostatia et reiterantibus baptismi" (V, title 9) the two distinct titles of the Justinian Code: "Ne sanctum baptisma iteretur" and "De baptismis" (I, titles 6, 7), in Corpus juris civilis of Jacques Krueger, (Berlin, 1888), II, 60-61. See München, "Das kanonische Gerichtsverfahren und Strafrecht" (Cologne, 1874), II, 362, 363. Apostasy, in its strictest sense, means apostasy a Fide (St. Thomas, Summa theologica, II-II, Q. xii a. 1).

APOSTASY A FIDE, OR PERDIFIDE, is the complete and voluntary abandonment of the Christian religion, and is based upon the principles of Naturalism, Rationalism, and Unbelief, such as Paganism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, etc., or merely makes profession of Naturalism, Rationalism, etc. The heretic differs from the apostate in that he only denies one or more of the doctrines of revealed religion, whereas the apostate denies the religion itself, a sin which has always been looked upon as one of the most grievous. The "Shepherd" of Hermas, a work written in Rome in the middle of the second century, states positively that there is no forgiveness for those who have wilfully denied the Lord. [Similit. ix, 26, 5; Funk, Opera Patrum apostolcorum (Tübingen, 1890), II, 457]. Apostasy, therefore, is a class of sins for which the Church imposed perpetual penance and excommunication without hope of pardon, leaving the forgiveness of the sin to God alone. After the Decian persecution (249, 250), however, the great numbers of Lapsi and Libellatuci, and the heretics of the Martys and Coniores, who assumed the right of remitting the sin of apostasy by giving the Lapsi a letter of communion, led to a relaxation of the rigour of ecclesiastical discipline. St. Cyprian and the Council of the African Church which met at Carthage in 251 admitted the principle of the Church's right to remit the sin of apostasy, even in the hour of death, if the council which he held at Rome confirmed the decisions of the Synod of Carthage, and the discipline of forgiveness was gradually introduced into all the Churches. [Epist. 3. Cypriani, 55 et 88; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinarum (Vienna, 1853-1857), II, ed. Hertig, 524 et 566, 679; Funk, Geschichte der kirchlichen Abhandlungen und Untersuchungen (Paderborn, 1897), I, 155-157; Ballot, Histoire d'histoire et de théologie positive (Paris, 1902).
When the Roman Empire became Christian, apostates were punished by deprivation of all civil rights. They could not give evidence in a court of law, and could neither bequeath nor inherit property. To induce anyone to apostatize was an offence punishable with death (Theodosian Code, XVI, title 7, De apostatis; title 8, De Judaeis; Cod. Justiniani, book 1, tit. 91, 1840, 1521–1607; Code of Justinian, I, title 7, De apostatis, l. c. 60, 61). In the Middle Ages, both civil and canon law classed apostates with heretics; so much so that title 9 of the fifth book of the Decretals of Gregory IX, which treats of apostasy, contains only a secondary provision concerning apostates from the first placed in the right order of juridical conception. (Leipsig 1879–81), II, 790–792). Boniface VIII, however, by a provision which was amended in the sixth book of the Decretals [V, title 2, De hiereticis, 13 (Friedberg, II, 1075)], merely classed apostates with heretics in respect of the penalties which they incur. This decretal, which only mentions apostate Jews by name, was applied indifferently to all. The Inquisition could therefore proceed against them. The Spanish Inquisition was directed, at the end of the fifteenth century, chiefly against apostates, the Maranos, or new Christians, Jews converted by force rather than by conviction; while in 1609 it dealt with the Marranos, or professedly-converted Moors of Spain.

To-day the temporal penalties formerly inflicted on apostates and heretics cannot be enforced, and have fallen into abeyance. The spiritual penalties are the same as those which apply to heretics. In order, however, to incur these penalties, it is necessary, in accordance with the general principles of canon law, that the apostasy should be shown in some way. Apostates, with all who receive, protect, or befriend them, incur excommunication, reserved special modo to the Sovereign Pontiff (Constitution Apostolica Sedis, n. 1). They incur, moreover, the note of "infamy", at least when their apostasy is notorious, and are "irregular"; an infamy and an irregularity which extend to the son and the grandson of an apostate father, and to the son of an apostate mother, should the parents die without being reconciled to the Church (Decree of Gratian, Distinction 2, II, 76). The decretals of the Decretals (Friedberg, I, 191, II, 1069 and 1075). Most authors, however, are of opinion that the irregularity affects only the children of parents who have joined some particular sect, or who have been personally condemned by ecclesiastical authority (Gasparri, "Tractatus de clericis, ordinibus, et recognitione", Paris, 1859, 288 and 294; Lehmkühl, Theologia moralis (Freiburg im Br., 1898), II, 725; Wernz, Jus decretalium (Rome, 1899), II, 200; Hollweck, Die kirchlichen Strafgesetze (Mainz, 1899), 162). Apostates are debarred from ecclesiastical burial (Decretals of Gregory IX, Bk. V, title 7, viii, Friedberg, II, 779). Any writing of theirs, in which they uphold heresy and schism, or labour to undermine the foundations of faith, are on the Index, and those who read them incur the excommunication reserved, special modo, to the Sovereign Pontiff (Constitution of Leo XIII, Officiorum et munera, 25 January, 1897, i, v; Veremphilia de uniuslibris libellis et operibus, (Rome, 1901), 3d ed., 57, 112). Apostasy constitutes an impediment to marriage, and the apostasy of husband or wife is a sufficient reason for separation a thoro et cohabitatione, which, according to many authorities the ecclesiastical tribunal may make personal. Decretals of Gregory IX, IV, title 19, viii; (Friedberg, II, p. 722). Other, however, maintain that this separation cannot be perpetual unless the innocent party embraces the religious state (Decretals of Gregory IX, ibidem, vii (Friedberg, II, 722). See Gasparri, "Tractatus canonici de matrimonio" (Paris, 1891). II, 283; De Becker, "De matrimonio" (Louisain, 1903), 2d ed., 424). In the case of clerics, apostasy involves the loss of all dignities, offices, and benefices, and even of all clerical privileges (Decretals of Gregory IX, V, title 7, ix, xiii. See Hollweck, 163, 164).

APOSTASY AB ORDINE.—This, according to the present discipline of the Church, is an amendment of the clerical state and state by clerics who have received major orders. Such, at least, is the definition given of it by most authorities. The ancient discipline of the Church, though it did not forbid the marriage of clerics, did not allow them to abandon the ecclesiastical state of their own will, nor to renounce monastic or clerical vows. The Council of Chalcedon threatens with excommunication all deserting clerics without distinction (Hardouin, II, 603). This discipline, often infringed indeed, endured throughout a great part of the Middle Ages. Pope Leo IX decreed, at the Council of Reims (1049): "No quis monachus vel clericus a suo gradu apostataret", all monks and clerks are forbidden to abandon their state (Hardouin, VI, 1007). The Decretals of Gregory IX, published in 1234, preserve traces of the older discipline under the title De apostatis, which forbids all clerics, without distinction, to abandon their state (V, title 9, (Friedberg, II, 734). However, at an earlier date, given permission to clerks in minor orders to quit the ecclesiastical state of their own will (Decretals of Gregory IX, III, title 3, vii; see also x, Friedberg, II, 458–460). The Council of Trent did not restore the ancient discipline of the Church, but deemed it sufficient to command the bishops to exercise great prudence in bestowing the tonsure, and only laid the obligations involved in the clerical state on clerics who have received major orders and on those who enjoy an ecclesiastical benefice (Session XXIII, De Reformacione, iv, vi). Whence it follows that all other clerks can quit their state, but, by the very fact of doing so, lose all the privileges of the clergy. Even the clerk in minor orders who enjoys an ecclesiastical benefice, should he wish to be laicized, loses his benefice by the very fact of his laicization, a loss which is to be regarded not as the penalty, but as the consequence, of the loss of his ecclesiastical state. These considerations suffice, it would seem, to regulate the opinion maintained by some writers [Hinschius, System des Katholischen Kirchenrechtes (Berlin, 1885), V, 905], who think that a clerk in minor orders can, even at the present time, be an apostate, and that such a person is not subject, among others, by Scherer, (Handbuch des Kirchenrechtes (Gratz, 1886), I, 313; Wernz, II, 338, note 24; Hollweck, 299).

To-day, after three ineffectual notices, the apostate clerk loses, ipso facto, the privileges of clergy [Decretals of Gregory IX, V, title 9, ii; title 38, xxiii, xxiv (Friedberg, II, 789 and 897)]. By the very fact of apostasy he incurs infamy, which, however, is only an infamy of fact, not one of law imposed by canonical legislation. Infamy involves irregularity, and is an offence punishable by the loss of ecclesiastical benefices. Finally, should the apostate persist in apostasy, the bishop may pronounce the Constit. of Benedict XIII, Apostolicae ecclesiae regimine, 2 May, 1725, in Bullarum amplissima collectio (Rome, 1736), XI, ii, 400).

APOSTASY A RELIGIONE, OR MONACHATUS. is the culpable departure of a religious from his monastery or cloister, for the purpose of withdrawing himself from the obligations of the religious life. A monk, therefore, who leaves his monastery with the intention of returning is not an apostate, but a runaway, and so is the one who leaves it intending to enter another religious order. The monks and hermits of the early Church made no vow of always continuing to live the ascetic life upon which they had entered. The rule of St. Pachomius, the father of the cenobitical life, allowed the religious to leave his monastery [Ladeuze, Histoire du cénerbitique, p. 318.] without permission (Louvain, 1896, p. 285].

But from the fourth century onwards the religious state became perpetual, and in 385 Pope Siricius, in his letter to Himerius, expresses indignation against religious men or women who were unfaithful to their propostitum sanctitatis (Harden, I, 848, 449). The Council of Chalcedon decreed that those who desired to return to the world should be excommunicated, and the Second Council of Arles called him an apostate (Hardouin, 11, 602, 603, 775). Throughout the Middle Ages numerous councils and papal decretes insisted on this perpetuity of the religious life, of which Peter Damian was one of the great champions (Migne, P.L., CXXIV, 874-878).

Paul IV, at the time of the Council of Trent, instituted very strict legislation against apostates by his Bull Postquam, dated 20 July, 1558. These provisions were, however, recalled two years later, by Pius IV, in the Constitution, Sedis apostolicae, of 3 April, 1559 (Bullarum amplissima collectio [Rome, 1745], IV, i, 343, and IV, ii, 10).

As the law stands to-day, the canonical penalties are inflicted only upon apostates in the strict sense, that is, those professed with solemn vows, with whom Jesuit scholastics are classed by privilege. Religious belonging to congregations with only simple vows, therefore, and those with simple vows in orders which also take solemn vows, do not incur these penalties. 1. Apostasy is a grave sin, the absolution of which the superior may reserve to himself [Decree "Sanctissimae" of Clement VIII, 28 May, 1593, "Bullarum ampl. collectio" (Rome, 1756), V, v, 254].

2. The religious is suspended from the exercise of all orders which he may have received during the period of his apostasy, nor is this penalty removed by his return to his monastery [Decretals of Gregory IX, V, title 9, v (Friedberg, II, 792)].

3. He is bound by all the obligations laid on him by his vows and the constitutions of his order, but if he has laid aside the religious habit, and if a judicial sentence has pronounced his deposition, he loses all the privileges of his order, in particular that of exemption from the jurisdiction of the ordinary and the right of being supported at the expense of his community (Council of Trent, Session XXV, de regularibus, xii).

4. The fact of laying aside the religious habit involves the penalty of excommunication [III, tit. 24, ii, of the sixth book of Decretals (Friedberg, II, 1065)].

5. In several religious orders apostates incur the penalty of excommunication, even when they have not laid aside the religious habit, in virtue of special privileges granted to the order. 6. The apostate is bound to return to his monastery as soon as possible, and the Council of Trent enjoins bishops to punish religious who shall have left their monasteries without the permission of their superiors, as deserters (Session XXV, de regularibus, iv).

Moreover, the bishop is bound to take possession of the person of the apostate monk and to send him back to his superior [Decree of the Congregation of the Council, 21 September, 1624, in "Bullarum amplissima collectio" (Rome, 1756), V, v, 248]. In the case of an apostate nun who leaves a convent enjoying pontifical cloister, she incurs the excommunication reserved specially to the Sacred Congregation of the Apostolic Sede, n°, 6. See Vermeersch, "De religiosis institutis et personis" (Rome, 1902), 1, 200; Hollweck, 299; Scherer, 1, 538. See also HERESY; IRREGULARITY; CLERIC, RELIGIOUS ORDERS.

13. The words already referred to, the older canoniasts may be consulted, especially SCHMALZGÖDER and REIFENSTIEL, who in their commentaries follow the order of the Decretals, at Book V, title 9. As modern canonists no longer treat of apostasy under a special heading, they must be consulted where they refer to ordinations and irregularities, the duties of the clerical state, the immunities of the clergy, offences and penalties, and, chiefly, when they write concerning heresy. Apostle (in Liturgy), the name given by the Greek Church to the Epistle of the Mass, which is invariably of Apostolic origin and never taken, as sometimes happens in the Roman Rite, from the Old Testament. It is also the name of the book used in the Greek Church containing the Epistles sometimes a fish; St. Andrew with a single cross; and from which the anagnostes (reader) reads the proper Epistle for the day in the celebration of the Mass. As now printed and used in the Orthodox Greek Church in Constantinople and Athens, and in the Greek Catholic Church (as printed by the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith) it is only the proper Epistles, but also the proper antiphons and prokeimenon for the different days of the Greek ecclesiastical year. (See Epistle.)

Apostle Spoon.—A set of thirteen spoons, usually silver, the handles of which are adorned with representations of Our Lord (the Master spoon) and the twelve Apostles. Anciently they were given by sponsors as baptismal gifts to their godchildren, the wealthy giving complete sets, others a smaller number, and a poor person a single spoon. The Apostles are distinguished one from the other by their respective emblems: St. Peter with a key; St. Andrew with a single cross; St. James Major with a pilgrim's staff and gourd; St. John with a chalice; St. Philip with a long staff surmounted with a cross; St. James Minor with a fuller's bat; St. Thomas with a spear; St. Bartholomew with a butcher's knife; St. Matthew with a wallet, sometimes containing a halberd; St. Thaddeus, or Jude, with a carpenter's square; St. Simon with a saw. In some sets St. Paul takes the place of St. Matthias; his emblem is a sword. It is doubtful if these spoons were much in use before 1500; the oldest known is of the year 1593, and they first appeared as a request in the will of one Amy Brent who bequeathed in 1516 "XIII syver spoones of J' hu and the XII Apostells." They are alluded to by the dramatists, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Middleton, Beaumont, and Fletcher. In Henry VIII, Act 5, Scene 3, the King asks Cranmer to be sponsor for the infant Elizabeth; Henry is a poor man because he has been "wastin'"; Henry banters him in these words: "Come, come, my lord, you'd spare your spoons." While these apostle spoons were used on the Continent, especially in Germany and Holland, they were never as much in vogue there as in England.

Apostles.—Under this title it may be sufficient to supply brief and essential information, I, on the name "Apostle"; II, on its various meanings; III, on the origin of the Apostolate; IV, on the office of the Apostles and the conditions required in them; V, on the authority and the prerogatives of the Apostles.
I. THE NAME.—The word "Apostle", from the Greek ἀποστόλος (Apostolos) means one who is sent forth, dispatched—in other words, who is entrusted with a mission, rather, a foreign mission. It has been given to a strong, influential person, a messenger, and means as much as a delegate. In the classical writers the word is not frequent. In the Greek version of the Old Testament it occurs once, in III Kings, xiv, 6 (cf. ibid., xii, 24). In the New Testament, on the contrary, it occurs, according to Bruder's Concordance, about eighty times, and denotes not only all the disciples of the Lord, but some of them specially called. It is obvious that our Lord, who spoke an Aramaic dialect, gave to some of his disciples an Aramaic title, the Greek equivalent of which was "Apostle". It seems to us that there is no reasonable doubt about the A.D. being given to the Twelve by the Lord, and that they continued to be so regarded by the Church till after the ascension of the Lord, and that the later Jews, and probably already the Jews before Christ, denoted "those who were despatched from the mother city by the rulers of the race on any foreign mission, especially such as were charged with collecting the tribute paid to the temple service" (Lightfoot, "Galatians", London, 1886, p. 98). The word apostle would be an exact rendering of the root of the word beliah, = ἀποστόλος.

II. VARIOUS MEANINGS.—It is at once evident that, in a Christian sense, everyone who had received a mission from God, or Christ, to man could be called "Apostle". In fact, however, it was reserved to those of the disciples who received this title from Christ. At the same time, like other honourable titles, it was occasionally applied to those who in some way realized the fundamental idea of the name. The word also has various meanings.

(a) The name Apostle denotes principally one of the twelve disciples who, on a solemn occasion, were called by Christ to a special mission. In the Gospels, however, those disciples are often designated by the expressions αὐτῷ ἀπαντήσει (the disciples) ἐξ οὗ ἐκάθεκα (the Twelve) and, after the treason and death of Judas, even ἐξ ἑνὸς (the Eleven). In the Synoptics the name Apostle occurs but seldom with this meaning. Thus, in Mark xvi, 15; other books of the New Testament, chiefly in the Epistles of St. Paul and in the Acts, this use of the word is current. Saul of Tarsus was, miraculously converted, and called to preach the Gospel to the heathens, claimed with much insistence this title and its rights. (b) In the Epistle to the Hebrews (iii, 1) the name is applied even to Christ, in the original meaning of a delegate sent from God to preach revealed truth to the world. (c) The word Apostle also has in the New Testament a larger meaning, and denotes some inferior disciples who, under the direction of the Apostle, preached the Gospel in Christian kingdoms. Then we have Actanabas (Acts, xiv, 4, 14), probably Andronicus and Junias (Rom., xvi, 7), Epaphroditus (Phil., ii, 25), two unknown Christians who were delegated for the collection in Corinth (II Cor., vii, 23). We know not why the honourable name of Apostle is not given to such men and missionaries, to the Confessors, and others who would equally merit it—There are some passages in which the extension of the word Apostle is doubtful, as Luke, xi, 19; John, xiii, 16; II Cor., xi, 13; I Thess., i, 7; Eph., iii, 5; Jude, 17, and perhaps the well-known expression "Apostles and Prophets". Even in an ironical meaning the word occurs (II Cor., xi, 6; xii, 11) to denote pseudo-apostles. There is but little to add on the use of the word in the old Christian literature. The first and third meanings are the only ones which occur frequently, and even in the oldest literature the larger meaning is seldom found.

IV. OFFICE AND CONDITIONS OF THE APOSTLE.—The Gospels point out how, from the beginning of his ministry, Jesus called to him some Jews, and by a very diligent instruction and formation made them his disciples. After some time, in the Galilean ministry, he selected twelve whom, as Mark (?) and Luke (vi, 13) say, "he named apostles therefore in a special vocation, a formal appointment of the Lord to a determined office, with connected authority and duties. The appointment of the twelve Apostles is given by the three Synoptic Gospels (Mark, iii, 13–19; Matthew, x, 1–4; Luke, vi, 12–16) nearly in the same words, so that the three narratives are literally dependent. Only on the immediately connected events there is some difference between them. It seems almost needless to outline and disprove rationalistic views on this topic. The holders of these views, at least some of them, contend that our Lord never appointed twelve Apostles, never intended to establish any group of disciples to take the place of the ministry, and eventually to carry on his work. These opinions are only deductions from the rationalistic principles on the credibility of the Gospels, Christ's doctrine on the Kingdom of Heaven, and the eschatology of the Gospels. Here it may be sufficient to observe that the view of the appointment of the twelve Apostles is the only explanation of the three synoptic Gospels constitutes a strong historical argument, representing, as it does, a very old and widely-spread tradition that cannot be erroneous; (b) that the universally acknowledged authority of the Apostles, even in the most heated controversies, and from the first years after Christ's death (for instance in the Jewish controversies), as we read in the oldest Epistles of St. Paul and in the Acts, cannot be explained, or even be understood, unless we recognize some appointment of the Twelve by Jesus.

IV. OFFICE AND CONDITIONS OF THE APOSTLE. —Two of the synoptic Gospels add to their account of the appointment of the Twelve brief statements on their office: Mark, iii, 14, 15, "He appointed twelve to be with him and to send them to herald, and to have power to heal the ill people and to cast out demons"; Matthew, x, 1, "He gave them power over unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal every disease and every illness". Luke, x, 9, where he relates the appointment of the Twelve, adds nothing on their office. Afterwards (Mark, vi, 7–13; Matthew, x, 5–16; Luke, ix, 1–5), Jesus sends the Twelve to preach the kingdom and to heal, and gives them very definite instructions. From all this results that the Apostles are to be with Jesus and to aid Him by proclaiming the kingdom and by healing. However, this was not the whole extent of their office, and it is not difficult to understand that Jesus did not indicate to His Apostles the whole extent of their mission, while as yet they had such imperfect ideas of His own person and mission and of the mission of their own. The mission of the Apostles is made still clearer by the sayings of Christ after His Resurrection. Here such passages as Matthew, xxviii, 19, 20; Luke, xxiv, 46–49; Acts, i, 21–22 are fundamental. In the first of these texts we read, "Go ye therefore and make disciples all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Son and the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all I have commanded you". The texts of Luke point to the same office of preaching and testifying (cf. Mark, xvi, 15). The Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles written by the Apostles exhibit them in the constant exercise of this office. Everywhere the Apostles govern the disciples, preaches the doctrine of Jesus as an authentic witness, and administers the sacred rites. In order to fit it as an office, it seems necessary to have been instructed by Jesus, to have seen the risen Lord. And these are, clearly, the conditions required by the Apostles in the candidate for the place of Judas Iscariot. "Of the men, therefore, who have accompanied us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John to the day he was taken up from us, during these days, must one become a witness with us of his resurrection" (Acts, i, 21, 22). This narrative, which seems to come from an Aramaic Palestinian source, like many other details given in the earlier chapters of Acts, is ancient and cannot be set aside. It is confirmed by an action taken by an apostle named Paul: because he was called in an extraordinary way to the Apostolate, he was obliged often to vindicate his Apostolic authority and proclaim that he had seen the Lord (1 Cor., ix, 1). Instruction and appointment by Jesus were, therefore, the regular conditions for the Apostolate. By way of exception, an extraordinary vocation, as in the case of Paul, or a choice by the Apostolic College, as in the case of Matthias, could suffice. Such an extraordinarily called or elected Apostle could preach Christ's doctrine and the Resurrection of the Lord as an authoritative witness.

AUXILIY AND PREROGATIVES OF THE APOSTLES.—The authority of the Apostles proceeds from the office imposed upon them by our Lord and is based on the very explicit sayings of Christ Himself. He will be with them all days to the end of ages (Matthew, xxviii, 20), give a sanction to their preaching (Mark, xvi, 16), send them the "promise of the Father" (Acts, xx, 20), vouchsafing to them the mission of the Holy Ghost (Acts, x, 38); and shall be with them, teaching you nothing that they should receive as the word of God (1 Thess., ii, 13), punishments (Acts, v, 1—11; 1 Cor., v, 1—5), administers the sacred rites (Acts, vi, 1 sq.; xvi, 33; xx, 11), provides successors (II Tim., i, 6; Acts, xiv, 22). In the modern theological terms the Apostle, besides the power of order, has a general power of jurisdiction and magisterium (teaching). The former comprises the power of judging religious matters, and enforcing obligations by means of suitable penalties. The latter includes the power of setting forth with authority Christ's doctrine. It is necessary to add here that an Apostle could receive new revealed truths in order to propose them to the Church. This, however, is something wholly personal to the Apostle. (See Revelation; Inspiration.)

Catholic theologians rightly speak in their treatises of some personal prerogatives of the Apostles; a brief account of these may not be superfluous. (a) A first prerogative, not clearly inferred from the text of the New Testament nor demonstrated by solid reasons, is their confirmation in grace. Most modern theologians admit that the Apostles received so abundant an infusion of grace that they could avoid every mortal fault and every fully deliberate venial sin.—(b) Another personal prerogative is the universality of their jurisdiction. The words of the Gospel on the subject are these: "Amen, I say to you, whatever you shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatever you shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matthew, xvi, 19). (c) Prima facie these prerogatives are reckoned personal infallibility, of course in matters of faith and morals, and only when they taught and imposed some doctrine as obligatory. In other matters they could err, as Peter, in the question of practical intercourse with the converted heathens; they might also accept certain current opinions, as Paul seems to have done when referring to the Parousia, or Second Coming of the Lord. (See Jesus Christ.) It is not easy to find a stringent scriptural demonstration for this prerogative, but reasonable arguments suggest it, e. g., the impossibility for all his hearers to verify and try the doctrine of the Apostle. The disputed question whether an Apostle writing on religious matters would have, merely by his Apostolic office, the prerogatives of an inspired author. This was asserted by the Catholic theologian, Dr. Paul Schans of Tübingen (Apologia des Christenthums, II), and by some others, e. g., John in "Etudes religieuses" (1904). Others, Catholic theologians, unanimously deny it, e. g., Father Pesch (De Inspiracione Sacræ Scripturae, 1906, pp. 611—634). (See Inspiration; New Testament.)

VI. APOSTOLATE AND EPISCOPATE.—Since the authority with which the Lord endowed the Apostles was given them for the entire Church, it is natural that this authority should endure after their death, in other words, pass to successors established by the Apostles. In the oldest Christian documents concerning the primitive Churches we find ministers established, some of them, at least, by the usual rites of imposition of hands. These have various names: priests (προφέροντες, Acts, xi, 30; xiv, 22; xx, 2, 4, 6, 22, 23; xvi, 4; xx, 17; xxi, 18; I Tim., v, 17; 19; Titus, i, 5); bishops (ἐπίσκοποι, Acts, xx, 28; Phil., i, 1; I Tim., iii, 2; Titus, i, 7); presidents (ἐξουσιώτεροι, I Thes., v, 12; Rom., xii, 8, etc.); heads (ὑγιείμενοι, Hebrews, xiii, 7, 17, 24, etc.); shepherds (πρεσbyteri, Eph., iv, 11); teachers (didaskaloi, Acts, xiii, i; I Cor., xii, 28 sq. etc.); prophets (προφάται, Acts, xiii, 1; xv, 32; I Cor., xii, 28, 29, etc.); and some others. Besides them, there are Apostolic delegates, such as Timothy and Titus. The most frequent terms are priests and bishops; they were destined to become the technical names for the "authorities" of the Christian community. All other names are less important; the deacons are out of the question, being of an inferior order. It seems clear that amid so great a variety of terms for ecclesiastical authorities in Apostolic times several must have been used in expressing laws, duties, and the like. From the beginning of the second century in Asia Minor, and somewhat later elsewhere, we find only three titles: bishops, priests, and deacons; the last charged with inferior duties. The authority of the bishop is different from that of the priesthoods, as is evident from several of the letters of the martyr Ignatius of Antioch. The bishop—and there is but one in each town—governs his church, appoints priests who have a subordinate rank to him, and are, as it were, his counsellors, presides over the Eucharistic assemblies, teaches his people, etc. He has, therefore, a general power of governing and teaching, quite the same as the modern Catholic bishop; this power is substantially identical with the general authority of the Apostles, without, however, the personal prerogatives ascribed to the latter. St. Ignatius of Antioch declares that this ministry holds legitimately its authority from God through Christ (Letter to the Philadelphiaans, i). Clement of Rome, in his Letter (i, 98), states with energy the legitimacy of the ministry of bishops and priests, and proclaims that the Apostles established successors to govern the churches (xiii—xiv). We may conclude with confidence that, about the end of the second century, the ministers of the churches were regarded as legitimate successors of the Apostles; this conclusion is of primary importance.

Another and more difficult question arises as to the precise functions of those ministers who bear, in the Acts and in the Epistles, the various above-mentioned designations, chiefly the bishop and the presbyter (priests and bishops). (a) Some authors (and this is the traditional view) contend that the τελευταὶ of Apostolic times have the same dignity as the bishops of later times, and that the ἀπόστολοι of the apostolic writings are the same as the priests of the second century. This opinion, however, might gain weight by the evident identity of bishop and priest in Acts, xx, 17 and 28. Titus, i, 5-7, Clement of Rome to the Church of Corinth, xliiv. (b) Another view recognizing this synonymous character estimates that these officers whom we shall call bishops-priests had never the supreme direction of the church Unique title; but, on the other hand, it is maintained, was exercised by the Apostles, the Prophets who travelled from one church to another, and by certain Apostolic delegates like Timothy. These alone were the real predecessors of the bishops of the second century; the bishops-priests were the same as our modern priests, and had not the plenitude of the priesthood. This opinion is fully discussed and proposed with much learning by A. Micheli (L’origine de l’épiscopat, Louvain, 1900). (c) Mgr. Batiffol (Rev. bibli., 1895, and Etudes d’hist. et de théol. positive, i, Paris, 1903) expresses the following opinion: In the primitive churches there were two . . . offices, viz., the office of Apostle and the office of Prophets. Apostle; (2) some ἀπόστολοι had no liturgical function, but only an honourable title; (3) the τελευταὶ, several in each community, had a liturgical function with the office to preach; (4) when the Apostles disappeared, the bishopric was divided: one of the bishops became sovereign bishop, while the others were subordinated to him: these were the later priests. This secondary priesthood is a diminished participation of the office and sole primitive priesthood; there is, therefore, no strict difference of order between the bishop and the priest. Whatever may be the solution of this difficult question (see Brünnow, Pufendorf), it remains certain that in the second century the general Apostolic authority belonged, by a succession by ascension ratified as legitimate, to the bishops of the Christian churches. (See Apostolic Succession.) The bishops have, therefore, a general power of order, jurisdiction, and ministry, but not the personal prerogatives of the apostles.

VII. The Feasts of the Apostles.—The memorable words of Hebrews, xiii, 7: “Remember your presidents who preached to you the word of God,” have always echoed in the Christian heart. The primitive church had a profound veneration for their deceased Apostles (Clement of Rome, Ep. ad Corinth. v); its first expression was doubtless the devotional reading of the Apostolic writings, the following of their orders and counsels, and the imitation of their virtues. It may, however, be reasonably supposed that some devotion began at the time of the deaths of the earliest time of their death or martyrdom; the ancient documents are silent on this matter. Feasts of the Apostles do not appear as early as we might expect. Though the anniversaries of some martyrs were celebrated even in the second century, as for instance the anniversary of the Bishop of Smyrna (d. 154-156), the Apostles had at this time no such commemoration; the day of their death was unknown. It is only from the fourth century that we meet with feasts of the Apostles. In the Eastern Church the feast of Saint James the Less and Saint John was celebrated on the 27th of December, and on the feast of Saint Peter according to St. Gregory of Nyssa and a Syrian monology. These commemorations were arbitrarily fixed. In the Western Church the feast of Saint John alone remained on the same day as in the Eastern Church. The commemoration of the martyrdom of Saint Peter and Saint Paul was established in the Galatians (London, 1890). From the sixth century the feast of Saint Andrew was observed on the 30th day of November. We know but little of the feasts of the other Apostles and of the secondary feasts in the great western churches of the Eastern Churches; all these feasts were observed at the beginning of the ninth century. For additional details see Duchesne, “Christian Worship” (London, 1903), pp. 277-283, and B. Zimmerman in Cabrol and Leclercq’s Dict. d’archéol. et de lit. chrét. i, 2631-35. Honoré COPIETTERS.

Apostles’ Creed, a formula containing in brief statements, or articles, the fundamental tenets of Christian belief, and having for its authors, according to tradition, the Twelve Apostles.

I. Origin of the Creed.—Throughout the Middle Ages it was generally believed that the Apostles, on the day of Pentecost, while still under the direct inspiration of the Holy Ghost, composed their present Creed between them, each of the Apostles contributing one of the twelve articles. This legend dates back to the sixth century (see Pseudo-Augustine in Migne, P. L., XXXIX, 2189, and Firminian, ibid., LXXXIX, 1034), and it is foreshadowed still earlier in a sermon attributed to St. Ambrose (Migne, PG, 16, 530-32; Hauck’s Real-encyclopadie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche 3 ed., Leipzig, 1882; Græwe in Pont. Dictionnaire de l’Eglise, ii, 1070-71; and L’Ancien et le Nouveau Testament, 2 ed., Paris, 1891). In the Psalter, a post-vulgate manuscript (D. de théol. cath., Paris, 1901), i. 1647-60, L. DE BAINVILLE in Dict. de théol. cath., (Paris, 1901), i. 350-52; Hauck, Die Mission und Auseinandersetzungen des Christentums (Leipzig, 1902).

Honoré COPIETTERS.
lar speaking of the Creed as the "Symbol of the Trinity", and recognizing it as an integral part of the rite of baptism (Migne, P. L., III, 1165, 1143). It should be added, moreover, that Kattenbusch (II, p. 80, note) believes that the same use of the words can be traced as far back as Tertullian. Still, in the first two centuries after Christ, though we occasionally find mention of the Creed under other designations (e.g. regula fidei, doctrina, traditio), the name symbool does not occur. Rufinus was therefore wrong when he declared that the Apostles themselves had "for many just reasons" selected this very term. This fact, joined with the intrinsic impropriety of the statement of the surprising silence of the New Testament and of the Ante-Nicene fathers, leaves us no choice but to regard the circumstantial narrative of Rufinus as unhistorical.

Among recent critics, some have assigned to the Creed an origin much later than the Apostolic Age. Harnack, e.g., asserts that in its present form it represents only the baptismal confession of the Church of Southern Gaul, dating from earliest in the second half of the fifth century (Das apostolische Glaubensbekennniss, 1892, p. 3). Strictly construed, the terms of this statement are accurate enough; there is some probability that it was not finally fixed in Rome, but in Rome, that the Creed really assumed its final shape (see Burn in the "Journal of Theol. Studies", July, 1902). But the stress laid by Harnack on the lateness of our received text (T) is, to say the least, somewhat misleading. It is certain, as Harnack allows, that another and older form of the Creed (R) had come into existence, in Rome itself, before the middle of the second century. Moreover, as we shall see, the differences between R and T are not very important and it is also probable that R, if not itself drawn up by the Apostles, is at least based upon an outline which dates back to the Apostolic age. Thus, taking the document as a whole, we may say confidently, in the words of a modern Protestant authority, that "in and with our Creed we confess that which since the days of the Apostles has been the faith of united Christendom" (Zahn, Apostles' Creed, tr., p. 222). The question of the apostolicity of the Creed ought not to be dismissed without due attention being paid to the evidence that:

(1) There are very suggestive traces in the New Testament of the recognition of a certain "form of doctrine" (τρόπος διδασκαλίας, Rom., vi, 17) which moulded, as it were, the faith of new converts to Christ's law, and which involved not only the word of faith believed in the heart, but "the meat of the word made unto salvation" (Rom., x, 8–10). In close connection with this we must recall the profession of faith in Jesus Christ exacted of the eunuch (Acts, viii, 37) as a preliminary to baptism (Augustine, "De Fide et Operibus", cap. ix; Migne, P. L., LVII, 205) and the formula of baptism itself in the name of the Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity (Matt., xxviii, 19; and cf. the Didache vii, 2, and ix, 5).

Moreover, as soon as we begin to obtain any sort of detailed description of the ceremonial of baptism, we find that, as a preliminary to the actual immersion, a profession of faith was exacted of the convert, which exhibits from the earliest times a clearly divided and separate confession of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, corresponding to "the three persons" invoked in the formula of baptism. As we do not find in any earlier document the full form of the profession of faith, we cannot be sure that it is identical with our Creed, but, on the other hand, it is certain that nothing has yet been discovered which is inconsistent with such a supposition.

For example, the "Canons of Hippo" (c. 220) or the "Didascalia" (c. 250) in Hahn's "Bibliotheke der Symbole" (8, 14, 35); together with the alliterative allusions in Justin Martyr and Cyprian.

(2) Whatever difficulties may be raised regarding the existence of the Disciplina Aracisi in early times (Kattenbusch, II, 97 sqq.), there can be no question that in Cyril of Jerusalem, Hilary, Augustine, Leo, the Gelasian Sacramentary, and many other sources of the fourth and fifth centuries the idea is greatly insisted upon; that according to ancient tradition the Creed was to be learned by heart, and, moreover, to be considered as a "symbol" or sign, undoubtedly provides a plausible explanation of the fact that in the case of no primitive creed is the text preserved to us complete or in a continuous form. What we know of these forms in their earliest state is derived from what we can piece together from the quotations, more or less scattered, which are found in such writers, for example, as Irenæus and Tertullian.

(3) Though no uniform type of Creed can be surely recognized among the earlier Eastern writers before the Council of Nicaea, an argument which has been considered by many to disprove the existence of any Apostolic formula, it is a striking fact that the Eastern Churches in the fourth century were found in possession of a Creed which reproduces with variations the old Roman type. This fact is fully admitted by such Protestant authorities as Harnack (in Hauck's Realencyclopädie, I, 747) and Kattenbusch (I, 380 sq.; II, 194 sq., and 737 sqq.). It is obvious that these data would harmonize very well with the theory that the primitive Creed had been delivered to the Christian community of Rome, either by Sts. Peter and Paul themselves or by their immediate successors, and in the course of time had spread throughout the world.

(4) Furthermore note that towards the end of the second century, a Latin extract from the writings of St. Irenæus in southern Gaul and of Tertullian in far-off Africa two almost complete Ctenides agreeing closely both with the old Roman Creed (R), as we know it from Rufinus, and with one another. It will be useful to translate from Burn (Introduction to the Cenades, pp. 50, 51) his tabular presentation of the evidence in the case of Tertullian. Cf. Macdonald in "Ecclesiastical Review", February, 1903.

De Praescr., ii (P. L., II, 156).

The following formula is divided into two parts:

(1) Believing in one God Almighty, (1) I believe in one God, maker of the world,
(2) and his Son, Jesus Christ, (2) the Word, called His Son, Jesus Christ,
(3) and the son of God Jesus Christ, (3) by the Spirit and power of God the
(4) crucified under Pontius Pilate, (4) the Father made flesh in Mary's womb,

(8) will come to judge the living and the (8) will come with glory to take the good
(9) who has sent from the Father the (9) sent the vicarious power of His Holy Holy Ghost, (10) to govern believers (in this passage (12) through resurrection of the flesh.

Des Prescr., xiii and xxxvi (P. L., II, 26, 49).

(1) I believe in one God, maker of the world,
(2) the Word, called His Son, Jesus Christ,
(3) by the Spirit and power of God the Father made flesh in Mary's womb, and born of her,
(4) fastened to a cross,
(5) was caught up into heaven,
(6) will come with glory to take the good into life eternal, and condemn the damned to everlasting perdition.

(12) restoration of the flesh.
Such a table serves admirably to show how incomplete is the evidence provided by mere quotations of the Creed, and how cautiously it must be dealt with. Had the Creed possessed only its "De Virginibus Velandis," we might have said that the article concerning the Holy Ghost did not form part of Tertullian's Creed. Had the "De Virginibus Velandis" been destroyed, we should have declared that Tertullian knew nothing of the clause "suffered under Pontius Pilate." And so forth.

(5) It must not be forgotten that while no explicit statement of the composition of a formula of faith by the Apostles is forthcoming before the close of the fourth century, earlier Fathers such as Tertullian and St. Irenæus insist in a very emphatic way that the "rule of faith" is part of the apostolic tradition. Tertullian in particular in his "De Predestinatione", after showing that by this rule (regula doctrinæ) he understands something practically identical with our Creed, insists that the rule was instituted by Christ and delivered to us (tradita) as from Christ by the Apostles (Migne, P. L., II, 26, 27, 33, 50). As a conclusion from this evidence the present writer, agreeing on this whole with such authorities as Semeria and Batiol, that we cannot safely affirm the Apostolic composition of the Creed, considers at the same time that to deny the possibility of such origin is to go further than our data at present warrant. A more pronouncedly conservative view is upheld in the "Ecclesiastical Review", January to July, 1903.

II. THE OLD ROMAN CREED.—The Catechism of the Council of Trent apparently assumes the Apostolic origin of our existing Creed, but such a pronouncement has no dogmatic force and leaves opinion free. Modern apologists, in defending the claim to apostolicity, extend it only to the old Roman form (R), and are somewhat hampered by the objection that if R had been really held to be the inspired utterance of the Apostles, it would not have been modified at pleasure by various local churches (Rufinus, for example, testifies to such expansion in the case of the Church of Aquileia), and in particular would never have been entirely supplanted by T, our existing form. The difference between the two will best be seen by printing them side by side.

R.
1. I believe in God the Father Almighty;
2. And in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord;
3. And in the Holy Ghost and of (ex) the Virgin Mary;
4. Crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried;
5. The third day He rose again from the dead;
6. He ascended into Heaven,
7. Sitteth at the right hand of the Father,
8. Whence He shall come to judge the living and the dead,
9. And in the Holy Ghost,
10. The Holy Church,
11. The forgiveness of sins;
12. The resurrection of the body.

T.
1. I believe in God the Father Almighty;
2. And in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord;
3. Who was conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary;
4. Suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried;
5. He descended into hell; the third day He rose again from the dead;
6. He ascended into Heaven, sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty;
7. From thence He shall come to judge the living and the dead;
8. I believe in the Holy Ghost;
9. The Holy Catholic Church,
10. The communion of saints,
11. The forgiveness of sins;
12. The resurrection of the body, and life everlasting.

Neglecting minor points of difference, which indeed for their adequate discussion would require a study of the Latin text, we may note that R does not contain the clauses "Creator of heaven and earth", "descended into hell", "the communion of saints", "life everlasting", nor the words "conceived", "suffered", "died", and "Catholic". Many of these additions, but not all, were probably known to St. Jerome in Palestine (c. 380.—See Morin in Revue Bénédictine, January, 1904) and about the same date to the Dalmatian, Nicetas (Burn, Nicetas of Remesiana, 1905). Further additions appear in the creeds of southern Gaul at the beginning of the sixth century, but T probably assumed in the shape in Rome itself some time before A. D. 700 (Burn, Introduction, 239; and Journal of Theol. Studies, July, 1902). We know nothing certain as to the reasons which led to the adoption of T in preference to R.

III. ARTICLES OF THE CREED.—Although T really contains more than twelve articles, it has always been customary to maintain the twofold division which originated with, and more strictly applies to, R. A few of the more debated items call for some brief comment. The first article of R presents a difficulty. From the language of Tertullian it is contended that R originally omitted the word Father and added the word one; thus, "I believe in one God Almighty". Hence Zahn infers an underlying Greek original still partly surviving in the Nicene Creed, and holds that the first article of the Creed suffered modification to counteract the teachings of the Monarchian heresy. It must suffice to say here that although the original Greek probably be Greek, Zahn's premises regarding the wording of the first article are not accepted by such authorities as Kattenbusch and Harnack.

Another textual difficulty turns upon the inclusion of the word only in the second article; but a more serious question is raised by Harnack's refusal to recognize, either in the first or second article of R, any acknowledgment of a pre-existent or eternal relation of Sonship and Fatherhood of the Divine Persons. The Trinitarian theology of later ages, he declares, has read into the text a meaning which it did not possess for its framers. And he says, again, with regard to the ninth article, that the writer of the Creed did not conceive the Holy Ghost as a Person, but as a power and gift. "No proof can be shown that about the middle of the second century the Holy Ghost was believed in as a Person." It is impossible to do more here than direct the reader to such Catholic answers as those of Blum and among Anglicans to the very convenient volume of Swete. To quote but one illustration of early patristic teaching, St. Ignatius at the end of the first century repeatedly refers to a Sonship which lies beyond the limits of time: "Jesus Christ... came forth from one Father... was with the Father before the world was" (Magn. 6 and 7). While, with regard to the Holy Ghost, St. Clement of Rome at a still earlier date writes: "As God lives, and the Lord Jesus Christ lives, and the Holy Spirit, the faith and hope of the elect" (cap. lvii). This and other like passages clearly indicate the consciousness of a distinction of God the Father analogous to that recognized to exist between God and the Logos. A similar appeal to early writers must be made in connection with the third article, that affirming the Virgin Birth. Harnack admits that the words "conceived of the Holy Ghost" (T), really add nothing to the belief of the "Holy Ghost" (R). He admits consequentially that "at the beginning of the second century this belief in the miraculous conception had become an established part of Church tradition". But he denies that the doctrine formed part of the earliest Gospel preaching, and he thinks it consequently impossible that this article could have been in the first century. We can only answer here that the burden of proof rests with him, and that the teach-ung of the Apostolic Fathers, as quoted by Swete and others, points to a very different conclusion.

Rufinus (c. 400) explicitly states that the words "descended into hell" were not in the Roman Creed, but existed in that of Aquileia. They are also in some Greek Creeds and in that of St. Jerome, later restored by Morin. It was no doubt a remembrance of St. Peter iii, as suggested by Irenæus and others, which caused their insertion. The clause "communion of saints", which appears first in Niceta and St. Jerome, should unquestionably be regarded as a mere expansion of the article "holy Church". "Saints", as used here, originally meant not those who the living members of the Church (see the article by Morin in Revue des Études) at litérature ecclésiastique, May, 1904, and the monograph of J. P. Kirsch, Die Lehre von der Gemeinschaft der Heiligen, 1900). For the rest we can only note that the word "Catholic", which appears first in Niceta, is dealt with separately; and that "forgiveness of sins" is probably to be understood primarily of baptism and should be compared with the "one baptism for the forgiveness of sins" of the Niceno Creed.

IV. USE AND AUTHORITY OF THE CREED.—As already indicated, we must turn to the ritual of Bollandists, for the most primitive and important use of the Apostles' Creed. It is highly probable that the Creed was originally nothing else than a profession of faith in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost of the baptismal formula. The fully developed ceremonial which we find in the seventh Roman Ordo, and the Gelasian Sacramentary, and which probably represents the practice of the fifth century, assigns a special day of "scrutiny" for the imparting of the Creed (traditio symboli), and another, immediately beforehand, the actual administration of the Sacrament, for the reddito symboli, when the neophyte gave proof of his proficiency by reciting the Creed aloud. An imposing address accompanied the reddito and in an important article, Dom de Puniet (Revue d'Histoirre Éclesiastique, October, 1904) has recently shown that this address is almost certainly the composition of St. Leo the Great. Further, three questions (interrogationes) were put to the candidate in the verb of baptism, which questions are themselves only a summary of the oldest form of the Creed. Both the recitation of the Creed and the questions are still retained in the Ordo baptizandi of our actual Roman ritual; while the Creed in an interrogative form appears also in the Baptismal Service of the Anglican "Book of Common Prayer". Outside of these, the baptismal Creed is recited daily in the Church, not only at the beginning of Matins and Prime and the end of Compline, but also, literally in the course of Prime and Compline. Many medieval synods enjoined that it must be learnt by all the faithful, and there is a great deal of evidence to show that, even in such countries as England and France, it was formerly learnt in Latin. As a result of this intimate association with the liturgy and teaching of the Church, the Apostles' Creed has always been held to have the authority of an ex cathedra utterance. It is commonly taught that all points of doctrine contained in it are part of the Church's Faith, and cannot be called in question under pain of heresy (St. Thomas, Summa Theologica, II-II, Q. i, art. 9). Hence Catholics have generally been content to accept the Creed in the form, and in the sense, in which it has been authoritatively expounded by the living Magisterium of the Church. For those Protestants who accept it only in so far as it represents the evangelical teaching of the Apostolic Age, it becomes a matter of supreme importance to investigate its original form and meaning. This explains the pondering amount of research devoted to this subject by Protestant scholars as compared with the contributions of their Catholic colleagues.

The materials for any profound study of the history of the Creeds must be sought in the great works of Carpi, Unserer Kaiser Ludwig I., Quellen zur Geschichte der Kirche (Christiannis, 1869); Haen, Bibliothek der Symbole (3rd ed., 1897); Krall, Kritische Untersuchung, Das Apostolische Symbol (2 vols., Leipzig, 1894-1900); and others, which have since been reprinted in his Studies, 1904, and secondly the already quoted articles of Dr. Alexander MacDonald in the (American) Ecclesiastical Review, 1865. In French, we have the excellent little summary of V. Ernioni, Le Symbole Apostolique (2nd ed., 1901); A. Bach, Les Apôtres et la litérature ecclésiastique, May, 1904, and the monograph of J. P. Kirsch, Die Lehre von der Gemeinschaft der Heiligen, 1900). For the rest we can only note that the word "Catholic", which appears first in Niceta, is dealt with separately; and that "forgiveness of sins" is probably to be understood primarily of baptism and should be compared with the "one baptism for the forgiveness of sins" of the Niceno Creed.

HERBERT THURSTON.

Apostles of Erin, THE TWELVE.—By this designation are meant twelve holy Irishmen of the sixth century who went to study at the School of Clonard, in Meath. About the year 520 St. Finian founded his famous School at Cluain-Earrard (Erard's Meadow), now Clonard, and thither flocked saints and learned men from all parts of Ireland. In his Irish life it is said that the average number of scholars under instruction at Clonard was 3,000, and a stanza of the hymn for Lauds in the office of St. Finian runs as follows:—

Trium virorum millium,
Sorte fit doctor humilis;
Qeri his fudit fluviun
Ut inps emanans rivulis.

The Twelve Apostles of Erin, who came to study at the feet of St. Finian, at Clonard, on the banks of the Boyne and Kinnebreg Rivers, are said to have been St. Ciaran of Seighir (Seir-Kieran) and St. Ciaran of Clonmacnois; St. Brendan of Innisfallen and St. Brendan of Clonfert; St. Columba of Tir-da-giall (Terryglass) and St. Columba of Iona; St. Mobhi of Clonseanin; St. Ruadhna of Lorrha; St. Monan of Inishganny (Scattery Island); St. Ninnidh the Saintly of Loch Erne; St. Lassiterin mac Nadfraesch, and St. Canice of Clonfert. Though there were many other holy men educated at Clonard who could claim to be veritable apostles, the above twelve are regarded by Irish writers as "The Twelve Apostles of Erin". They are not unworthy of the name of apostles, whose studies were founded on the Sacred Scriptures as expounded by St. Finian. In the hymn from St. Finian's Office we read:—

Regressus in Clonardiam
Ad catedram lecturam,
Apponit diligentiam
Ad studium Scripturum.

The great founder of Clonard died 12 Dec. 549, according to the "Annals of Ulster", but the Four Masters give the year as 548, whilst Colgan makes the date 563. His pastoral feast is observed on 12 December.

Apostleship of Prayer, the, a pious association otherwise known as a league of prayer in union with the Heart of Jesus. It was founded at Vals, France, in 1844 by Francis X. Gautrellet. It owes its popularity largely to the Reverend Henry Ramire, S.J., who, in 1881, adapted its organization for parishes and various Catholic institutions. He wrote it into his book "The Apostleship of Prayer," which has been translated into many languages. In 1879 the association received its first statutes, approved by Pius IX, and in 1896 these were revised and approved by Leo XIII. These statutes set forth the nature, the constitution, and the organization of the Apostleship of Prayer as its object; and order in the matter of prayer for the mutual intentions of the members, in union with the intercession of Christ in heaven. There are three practices which constitute three degrees of membership. The first consists of a daily offering of one's prayers, good works, and sufferings, the second, of daily recitation of a decade of beads for the special intentions of the Holy Father recommended to the members every month, and the third, of the reception of Holy Communion with the motive of reparation, monthly or weekly, on days assigned. The members are also urged to observe the Holy Hour, spend in meditation on the Passion. The name given to the general of the association is the General of the Society of Jesus, who usually deputes his power to an assistant. At present the Reverend A. Drive, S.J., editor of the "Messenger of the Sacred Heart," is the deputy. He controls the organization by the aid of the editors of the "Messenger of the Sacred Heart" in different parts of the world. At present they number thirty. In each country diocesan directors are appointed who attend to the aggregation of new centres of the League and promote its interests in their respective territories. A centre may be a parish, a pious society, a religious community, a college or academy, or any religious or charitable institution. The priest, usually the pastor or chaplain, in charge of a centre is known as the Local Director. In order to organize a centre, he appoints promoters, usually one for every ten or fifteen members, who with him hold special meetings, canvass for new members, and circulate the monthly letters containing the monthly practices for the members. To erect a centre it is necessary to obtain a diploma of aggregation which the deputy moderator issues through the editors of the "Messengers of the Sacred Heart" in their respective countries. To be a member it is necessary to have one's name recorded in the official register of some local centre. There are now over 62,500 local centres in various parts of the world, about 6,685 of which are in the United States, 1,800 in Canada, 1,600 in England, 2,000 in Ireland, 200 in Scotland, and 400 in Australia. The Association numbers over 25,000,000 members, about 4,000,000 of whom are in the United States. In schools and academies it is usually conducted in a form suitable for the pupils, known as the pope's militia. The members are entitled to many indulgences.

Apostolic Camera.—The former central board of finance in the papal administrative system, which at one time was of great importance in the government of the Churches and the administration of justice. The Camera Apostolica consists today of the cardinal-camerlengo, the vice-camerlengo, the auditor, the general treasurer (an office unoccupied since 1870) and seven camerlens. Since the States of the Church have ceased to exist, and the income of the papal treasury is chiefly derived from Peter's-pence and other alms contributed by the faithful, the Camera has no longer any practical importance as a board of finance, for the revenue known as Peter's-pence is managed by a special commission. The officials who now constitute the Camera hold in reality no real offices. On the occasion of a vacancy in the Papal See he is even yet first in authority after the cardinals, and entrusted with the surveillance of the conclave, to which no one is admitted without his permission. The Auditor-General of the Camera, also one of the highest prelates, was formerly the chief judge in all cases concerning the financial administration of the Curia. Before 1870 he presided over the supreme court, to which the Pope referred the most important questions for decision. The Treasurer-General formerly had supreme financial control of the whole income derived from the temporal possessions of the Church, and the distribution of the tribute accruing to the papal treasury. The College of Clerics of the Apostolic Camera consists now of seven members, though formerly the number was variable. The members of the body, who even to-day are chosen from among the highest prelates, had formerly not only the management of the property and income of the Holy See, and were consulted collectively on all important questions concerning their administration, but also officiated as a court in all disputes affecting the papal exchequer. When Pius IX, after the installation of the various ministries, divided among them the administrative duties, he assigned to each cleric of the Camera the presidency of a section of the department of finance. Four of them, moreover, were members of the commission appointed to examine the accounts of the Camera. They are entitled to special places whenever the Pope appears in public on solemn occasions, in the papal processions, and in papal consistory. At the death of the Pontiff they take possession of the Apostolic Palaces, attend to the taking of the inventories, and manage the internal or domestic administration during the vacancy. In the conclave they have charge of all that pertains to the table of the cardinals. Apart from the clerics of the Camera, the other clerics of the Curia are now usually professors and canonists, with regular ecclesiastical appointments.

Although the Apostolic Camera and the prelates forming it have lost the greater part of their original authority, the body was formerly one of the most important in the Curia. The character and method of their administration have undergone much modification in the past, being affected naturally by general economical development, and by the vicissitudes of the States of the Church and the central curial administration. Since the middle of the twelfth century we find a papal chamberlain (camerae domini papae) in the Curia, entrusted with the financial management of the papal court. At that early period the income of the papal treasury came chiefly from many kinds of census, dues, and tributes paid in from the territory subject to the Pope, and from churches and monasteries immediately dependent upon the administration. The Camera (later Pope Honorius III, 1216-27) made in 1192 a new inventory of all these sources of papal revenue, known as the "Liber Censuum." The previous list dated back to Gelasius I (492-496) and Gregory I (590-604), and was based on lists of the incomes accruing from the patrimonies, or fanded property of the Roman Church. In the thirteenth century the Apostolic Camera entered on a new phase of development. The collection of the crusade taxes, regularly assessed after the time of Innocent III (1198-1216), added new duties to the papal treasury, to which were committed both the collection and distribution of these assessments. Moreover, during the course of this century the system of payment in kind was transformed into the monetary system, a process considerably influenced by the introduction of new financial terms, communitas ecclesiae, collegium clericorum, etc. The situation of the Camera sacra—that is, the papal financial board—was regulated at fixed sums. The various taxes were listed in their order in P. K. Ebel, "Hierarchia Catholica" (Münster, 1898-1901); the income regularly yielded by them to the Curia is by no means small. To these we must add the annates, taken in the narrower sense, especially the great universal reservations made since the time of Clement V and John XXII, the extraordinary subsidies, moreover, levied since the end of the thirteenth century, the census, and other assessments. The duties of the Apostolic Camera were thus considerable. For the representation of all the monies employed thenceforth a great number of agents known as collectores. With time the importance of this central department of finance became more marked. The highest administrative officers were always the chamberlain (camerarius) and the treasurer (aesaurarius)—the former is regularly a bishop, the latter often of the same rank. Next in order came the clerics of the Camera (clerici camerae), originally three or four, afterwards as many as ten. Next to these was the judge (auditor) of the Camera. The two first-named formed with the clerics of theCamera its highest administrative council; they controlled and looked closely to both revenues and expenses. In their service were a number of inferior officials, notaries, scribes, and messengers. The more absolute system of ruling the Church which developed after the beginning of the sixteenth century, as well as the gradual transformation in the financial administration, modified in many ways the duties of the Apostolic Camera. The Camerarius (camerengo, chamberlain) became one of the highest officers in the government of the Papal States, and remained so until the beginning of the nineteenth century, when new methods of administration called for other officials. Finally, in 1970, on account of the various temporal powers it possessed almost entirely to exercise any practical influence on the papal administration. The Apostolic Camera must be distinguished from the treasury or camera of the College of Cardinals, presided over by the cardinal-camerengo (Camerarius Sacri Collegii Cardinalium). It had charge of the common revenues of the College of Cardinals, and appears among the curial institutions after the close of the thirteenth century. It has long ceased to exist.

Apostolic Church. See Apostolity.

Apostolic Churches.—The epithet Apostolic (Apostolic Church) occurs as far back as the beginning of the second century; first, as far as is known, in the superscription of Ignatius’s Epistle to the Trallians (about 110), where the holy bishop greets the Trallian Church thus: “to the household of the first born, to the doxologist, the faithful, the apostles, and the apostolic character, viz., after the manner of the Apostles. The word Apostolic becomes frequent enough from the end of this century on, in such expressions as an “Apostolic man,” an “Apostolic writing,” “Apostolic Churches.” All the individual orthodox churches of the Roman Catholic Church who are called Apostolic because they were in some more or less direct connection with the Apostles. Indeed, that is the meaning in which Tertullian sometimes uses the expression Apostolic Churches (De Prescriptionibus, c. xx; Adversus Marcionem, IV, v). Usually, however, especially among the Western writers, from the second to the fourth century, the term is meant to signify the ancient particular Churches which were founded, or at least governed, by an Apostle, and which, on that account, enjoyed a special dignity and acquired a great apologetic importance. To designate these Churches, Ireneus has often recourse to a paraphrase of the title “H. Petr. H. Paul.” In the writings of Tertullian we find the expressions “mother-Churches” (ecclesiae matrises, originales), frequently “Apostolic Churches” (De Prescriptionibus, c. xxi). At the time of the Christological controversies in the fourth and fifth centuries some of these Apostolic Churches represented the orthodox faith. Thus, it happened that the title “Apostolic Churches” was no longer used in apologetic treatises, to denote the particular Churches founded by the Apostles. For instance, Vincent of Lérins, in the first half of the fifth century, makes no special mention in his “Communitorium” of Apostolic Churches. But, towards the same epoch, the expression “the Apostolic Church” came into use in the singular, as an appellation for the whole Church, and that frequently in connection with the older diction “Catholic Church”; while the most famous of the particular Apostolic Churches, the Roman Church, took as a convenient designation the title “Apostolic See” (Vincent of Lérins’s Communitorium, c. ix). This last title was also given, though not quite so often, to the Antiochian and to the Alexandrian Church.

I. Chief Apostolic Churches.—It is not possible, in a summary, to give an account of the missionary activity of the Apostolic Church in the Greek and Latin Christian Churches by them. We have, if not complete, at least sufficient, information about the preaching and the works of St. Peter in Jerusalem, Antioch, and Rome; of St. James the Elder in Jerusalem; of St. John in Jerusalem and Ephesus; of St. Paul at Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, Troas, Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, and Rome. In these towns—and not all entitled thereto are included in the nomenclature—there were Christian communities founded by the Apostles that could be called Apostolic Churches. However, when the writers of the second and the third centuries only refer ordinarily to some of these churches. Thus, e. g., Ireneus (Adv. Herr., III, iii, 2) mentions the Roman Church, “the greatest, most ancient and known to all, founded and established by two most glorious Apostles, Peter and Paul”, the Church at Ephesus, and the Smyrnean Church, where he as Pachomius’s disciple, Tertullian enumerates others (De Prescriptionibus, c. xxi): “You who are rightly solicitous for your salvation, travel to the Apostolic churches. . . . If Achaia is not distant, you have Corinth. If you are near Macedonia, you have Philippi, you have Thessalonica. If you can go to Asia, Ephesus. If you are in the neighbourhood of Italy, you have Rome.” Then follows a splendid panegyric of the Roman Church, the first among the Apostolic Churches (see also c. xxii).

II. The Apologetic Argument of Irenaeus and Tertullian.—The oldest Christian literature shows with great evidence that the first controversies among Christians were already done in the texts of the Old Testament, sayings of Our Lord, and the authority of the Apostles. This last ground was very important in the case of new questions on which there existed no explicit teaching of Christ. Therefore, it is easy to understand that the Apostolic Churches could not be lost sight of in such controversies, and it may be of interest to point out the Apologetic argument of Irenaeus and Tertullian, which is founded on the preservation of the Apostolic doctrine in the various Apostolic Churches. Irenaeus, having exposed, in the first two books of his great work, “Against the Heresies”, the doctrines of the various Gnostic sects, and having shown their intrinsic absurdity, proceeds in the third book to refute them by means of theological arguments, especially Scriptural ones. But before dealing with biblical proofs, he attempts the other method of convincing heretics, namely, that which consists in appealing to the Catholic tradition preserved in the churches through the conduct of bishops. The reasons are these: The church, being too numerous, it may be sufficient to examine into the doctrine of one, viz., of the Roman Church, or, at least, of some of the oldest churches (III, ii, iii).

He says: “Even if there is a controversy about a little question, should we not have recourse to the most ancient in which the Apostolic Church and take from them the safe and trustworthy doctrine?” (III, iv, 1). Tertullian, with his characteristic energy, takes up the same argument in his famous work “On Prescription Against Heresies”. His general process of reasoning runs thus: Christ chose two Apostles to whom he communicated His doctrine. The Apostles preached this doctrine to the churches they founded, and hence the same doctrine came to the more recent churches. Neither did the Apostles corrupt Christ’s doctrine, nor have the Apostolic Churches corrupted the preaching of the Apostles. Heresy is always posterior and, therefore, erroneous. “We have to show,” he says (c. xxi), “whether our doctrine . . . is derived from Apostolic teaching, and whether, therefore, other doctrines have their origin in a lie. We are in communion with the Apostolic Churches, because we have the same doctrine; that is the testimony of the unanimous Church; and no other doctrine is a true one; hoc est testimunium veritatis. In Tertullian’s writings against Marcion (IV, v) we find an application of this apologetic argument. Having developed the historical argument founded on the preservation, as a matter of fact, of the Apostolic doctrine in the chief Apostolic Churches, we must add that, besides it, such writers as Irenaeus and others used often also a dogmatic argument founded on the necessary preservation of Christian truth in the whole Church and in the Roman Church in particular. The two arguments are to be carefully distinguished.

III. Apostolic Statements Concerning Relics of the Apostles in Apostolic Churches.—The tomb of the Apostle, founder of the Church, was religiously venerated in some of the Apostolic Churches, as, e.g., the tombs of Sts. Peter and Paul in Rome, of St. John at Ephesus. A statement of Tertullian’s has given rise to some curious and curious statements of Apostles preserved in the Apostolic Churches. “Travel” he writes in “De Praescriptionibus” (c. xxxvi), “to the Apostolic Churches in which the seats of the Apostles still occupy their places [apud quas ipsae adhuc cathedra apostolorum suis locis preservant], in which their authentic Epistles are still read, sounding their voice and representing their face [apud quas ipse authenticae litterae eorum recitantur, sonantes vocem et representantes faciem uniusque]”. The words “authentic epistles” might denote merely the epistles in the original text—the Greek (cf. Tertull. De Monogomia, c. xi); but here it is not the case, because in Tertullian he speaks of the genuine text of the canonical books was still read nearly everywhere, and not in the Apostolic Churches only. We must take the epistolae authenticae to mean the autographs of some Epistles of the Apostles. Indeed in later times we hear of recovered autographs of Apostolic writings in the controversies about the Apostolic origin of some Church books or about the authenticity of the liturgical dignity. So the autograph of the Gospel of St. Matthew was said to have been found in Cyprus. (See E. Nestle, Einführung in das griechische Neue Testament, Göttingen, 1899, 29, 30). If the authentic epistles are the Apostolic autographs, the apostolic seats (ipsae adhuc cathedra apostolorum) mean the seats in which the Apostles preached, and the expression is not metaphorical. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VII, 19) relates that in his time the seat of St. James was as yet extant in Jerusalem. On old pictures of Apostles cf. Eusebius, ibid., VII, 18. Whether or not even the oldest of these statements historically true remains still a debated question. We regard it as useless to record what may be found on these topics in the vast amount of matter that makes up the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles and other legendary documents.

HONORÉ COPPIETERS.

Apostolic Church-Ordinance, a third-century pseudo-Apostolic collection of moral and hierarchical rules and instructions, compiled in the main from ancient Christian sources, first published in Ethiopic by Ludolf (with Latin translation) in the “Commentarius” to his “HistoriaEthiopica” (Frankfort, 1891). It served as a law-code for the Egyptian, Ethiopian, and Arabian churches, and rivaled in authority and esteem the Didache, under which name it sometimes went. Though of undoubted Greek origin, these canons are preserved largely in Coptic, Arabic, Ethiopic, and Syriac versions. The Apostolic Church-Ordinance was first published in Arabic by Prof. M. P. Fink in “As itms of Apostolic Church-Ordinance” in a twelfth-century Greek manuscript discovered by him at Vienna (Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843, I, 107–132). He also gave the code the name “Apostolische Kirchenordnung” by which it is generally known, though in English it is usually called the Didache. Sometimes the Greek Church-Order, Apostolic Church-Directory, etc. The document, after a short introduction (i–iii) inspired by the “Letter of Barnabas”, is divided into two parts, the first of which (iv–xv) is an evident adaptation of the first six chapters of the Didache, the moral precepts of which are attributed severally to the Apostles, by those of whom, introduced by the code says, “Peter says”, etc., is represented as framing one or more of the ordinances. The second part (xv–xxx) treats in similar manner of the qualifications for ordination or for the duties of different officers in the Church. The work was compiled in Egypt, possibly in Syria, in the third century, or, as Fink assigns its compilation to the first half of the third century; Harnack to about the year 300. Who the compiler was cannot be conjectured, nor can it be determined what part he had in framing canons 15 to 30. Duchesne considers them largely the compiler’s own work; Fink thinks he drew upon at least two sources now unknown; while Harnack undertakes to identify by name the now lost documents upon which the compiler almost entirely depended. The Sahidic (Coptic) text was published by Lagarde in "Egyptiaca," (Leipzig, 1883), and the Bohairic (Coptic) by Tattam (The Apostolical Constitutions, or Canons of the Apostles, London, 1848). The corresponding text with English translation was published by Dr. Arendzen in "Journal of Theol. Studies" (October, 1901).

Apostolic Constitutions. A fourth-century pseudo-Apostolic collection, in eight books, of independent, though closely related, treatises on Christian discipline, worship, and doctrine, intended to serve as a manual of guidance for the clergy, and to some extent for the laity. Its tone is rather hortatory than preceptive, for, though it was evidently meant to be a guide for moral instruction and for the observance of liturgical law, its injunctions often take the form of little treatises and exhortations, amply supported by scriptural texts and examples. Its elements are loosely combined without great regard for order or unity. It purports to be the work of the Apostles, whose instructions, whether given by them as individuals or as a body, are supposed to be gathered and handed down by the pretended compiler, St. Clement of Rome, the authority of whose name gave fictitious weight to more than one such piece of early Christian literature. The Church seems never to have regarded this work as of undoubted Apostolic authority. The Trullan Council in 692 rejected the work on account of the interpolations of heretics. Only that portion of it to which has been given the name "Apostolic Canons" was received; but even the fifty of these canons which had then been accepted by the Western Church were not regarded as of certain Apostolic origin. Where known, however, the Apostolic Constitutions were held generally in high esteem and served as the basis for much ecclesiastical legislation. They are to-day of the highest value as an historical document, revealing the moral and religious conditions and the liturgical observances of the third and fourth centuries. Their text was best known in the Western Church till the Middle Ages. In 1546 a Latin version of a text found in Crete was published by Capellus, and in 1563 appeared the complete Greek text of Bovius and that of the Jesuit Father Torres (Tirraniu) who, despite the glaring archaisms and incongruities of the collection, contended that it was a genuine work of the Apostles. Four manuscripts of it are now extant, the oldest an early twelfth-century text in St. Petersburg, an allied fourteenth-century text in Vienna, and two kindred sixteenth-century texts, one in Vienna, the other in Paris. In its present form the text represents the gradual growth and evolution of usages of the first three centuries of Christian Church life. The compiler gathered from pre-existing moral, disciplinary, and liturgical codes the elements suited to his purpose, and by adaptation and interpolation framed a system of constitutions which, while suited to contemporary needs, could not be regarded as original. Thanks to recent textual studies in early Christian literature, most of the sources of which the compiler used are now clearly recognizable. The first six books are based on the "Didascalia of the Apostles", a lost treatise of the third century, of Greek origin, which is known through Syriac versions. The compiler of the Apostolic Constitutions made use of the greater part of this older treatise, but he adapted it to the needs of his day by some modifications and extensive interpolation. Liturgical evolution made necessary a considerable amplification of the formulae of worship; changes in disciplinary practice called for alterations in the laws; scriptural references and examples, intended to enforce the lessons inculcated by the Apostolic Constitutions, are more frequently used than in the parent Didascalia. The seventh book, which consists of two distinct parts, the first a moral instruction, and the latter liturgical, depends for the first portion on the early second-century Didache or "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles", which has been amplified by the compiler in much the same manner as the Didascalia was amplified in the framing of the first six books. The rediscovery of the Didache in 1873 revealed with what fidelity the compiler embodied it, almost word for word, in his expansion of its precepts, save for such omissions and changes as were made necessary by the lapse of time. The fact that the Didache was itself a source of the Didascalia will explain the repetition in the seventh book of the traditions of the preceding books. The source of the second portion of the seventh book is still undetermined. In the eighth book are recognized many distinct elements whose very number and diversity render it difficult to determine with certainty the sources upon which the compiler drew. The eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions may be divided into three parts thus: the introductory chapters (i-ii) have for their foundation a treatise entitled "Teaching of the Holy Fathers concerning Gifts", possibly a lost work of Hippolytus. The transitional third chapter is the work of the compiler himself (xv-xvii) and the fourth (xviii) contains the "Apostolic Canons". It is the second part (y-xvi) which presents difficulties the varied solution of which divides scholars as to its sources. Recent studies in early Christian literature have made evident the kinship of several documents, dealing with disciplinary and liturgical matters, closely allied with this eighth book. Their interdependence is not so clearly understood. The more important of these documents are: The "Canons of [pseudo?] Hippolytus"; the "Egyptian Church Ordinance"; and the recently discovered Syriac text of "The Gospel of Our Lord Jesus Christ". According to Dr. Hans Achermann, "Gospel of Hippolytus"; where he considers to be a third-century document of Roman origin, is the parent of the "Egyptian Church Ordinance", whence came, by independent filiation, the Syriac "Gospel of Our Lord Jesus Christ", and the eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions. In this hypothesis the "Canons of Hippolytus", or more immediately the "Egyptian Church Ordinance", and the contemporary practice of the Church would be the source from which the compiler of the Apostolic Constitutions drew. Dr. F. X. Funk, on the other hand, argues strongly for the priority of the eighth book of the latter, whence, through a parallel text, are derived the other three documents which he considers as fifth-century works, a conclusion not without its difficulties of acceptance, particularly with regard to the place of the "Canons of Hippolytus" in the chronology. If the priority of the Apostolic Constitutions be admitted, it is not easy to identify the sources on which the compiler drew, and the compiler may have been inspired by the practice of some particular church. The Antiochene "Diaconica" was not without some influence on him, and it may be that he had at hand other, now lost, ceremonial codes. It is not improbable that his Liturgy is even of his own creation and was never used in just the form in which he gives it. (See Antiœchæa Liturgy.)

A study of the sources of this work suggests the many needs which the compiler endeavoured to meet in gathering and setting down these many treatises on doctrine, discipline, and worship, and the extent and variety of his work may be suggested by a summary of the contents. The first book deals with the duties of the Christian laity, particularly in view of the dangers resulting from association with those not of the Faith. Vanity in dress and underestimation of others are among the things condemned. The second book is concerned principally with the clergy. The qualifications, the prerogatives and duties of bishops, priests, and deacons are set forth in detail, and their dependence and support provided for. This book treats at length of the regulation of penitential practice, of the caution to be observed in regard to accused and accusers, of the disputes of the faithful and the means of adjusting differences. This portion of the Apostolic Constitutions is of special interest, as portraying the penitential and the hierarchical system of the third and fourth centuries. Here also is a number of ceremonial details regarding the Christian assembly for worship which, with the liturgy of the eighth book, are of the greatest importance and interest. The third book treats of widows and of their office in the Church. A consideration of what they should not do leads to a treatise on the duties of deaconesses and on baptism. The fourth book deals with charitable works, the providing for the poor and orphans, and the spirit in which to receive and dispense the offerings made to the Church. The fifth book treats of those suffering persecution for the sake of Christ and of the duties of Christians towards them. This leads to a consideration of martyrdom and of idolatry. Liturgical details as to feasts and fasts follow. The sixth book deals with the history and doctrine of the early schisms and heresies; and of "The Law," a treatise against Judaistic and heathen superstition and uncleanness. The seventh book in its first part is chiefly moral, condemning vices and praising Christian virtues and Christian teachers. The second part is composed of liturgical directions and formulae. The eighth book is largely liturgical. Chapters iii—xxvii treat of the confessing of all orders, and in connection with the consecration of a bishop is given in the portion of the so-called "Apostolic BOE" the most ancient extant complete order of the rites of Holy Mass. Chapters xxviii—xlvi contain a collection of miscellaneous canons, moral and liturgical, attributed to the various Apostles, while chapter xlvi consists of the eighty-five "Apostolic Canons." The strikingly characteristic style of many interpolations in the Apostolic Constitutions makes it evident that the compilation, including the "Apostolic Canons," is the work of one individual. Who this Pseudo-Clement was cannot be conjectured; but it is now generally admitted that he is one with the interpolator of the Ignatian Epistles. As early as the author of thesecond-centuryBishopUssher, recognizing the similarity of the theological thought, the peculiar use of Scripture, and the strongly marked literary characteristics in the Apostolic Constitutions and in both the interpolations of the seven epistles of Ignatius and the six spurious epistles attributed to the Bishop of Antioch, suggested the identification of the Pseudo-Clement with the interpolator of Ignatius, a view which has won general acceptance, yet not without some hesitancy which may not be dispelled until the problem of the sources of the eighth book is solved. Efforts tending to a further identification of the author of this extensive and truly remarkable literature of interpolations have not been successful. That he was a cleric may be taken for granted, and a cleric not favourably disposed to ascetical practices. That he was not rigidly orthodox—for he uses the language of Subordinationism—is also evident; yet he was not an extreme Arian. But whether he was an Antiœchianian, as Dr. Funk would infer from his insistence in denying the human soul of Our Lord, or a Semi-Arian, or even a well-meaning Nicean whose language reflects the unsettled views held by not a few of his misguided contemporaries, cannot be determined. For, whatever his theological views were, he does not seem to be a passionate or the only person who had any disciplinary hobby which he would foist on his brethren in the name of Apostolic authority. Syria would appear to be the place of origin of this work, and the interest of the compiler in men and things of Antiœch would point to that city as the centre of his activities. His interest in the Ignatian Epistles, his citation of the Syro-Macedonian calendar, his use of the so-called Council of Antiœch as one of the chief sources of the "Apostolic Canons," and his construction of a liturgy on Antiœchene lines confirm the theory of Syrian origin. Its date is likewise difficult to determine with any degree of accuracy; but minus a quo would be the Council of Antiœch in 341. But the reference to Christmas in the catalogue of feasts (V, 13; VIII, 33) seems to postulate a date later than 376, when St. Epiphanius, who knew the Didascalia, in the enumeration of feasts found in his work against heresies makes no mention of the December feast, which in fact was not celebrated in Syria until about 378. If the compiler was of Arian tendencies he could not have written much later than the death of Valens (378). The absence of references to either the Nestorian or the Monophysite heresies precludes the possibility of a date later than the early fifth century. The most probable opinion dates the compilation about the year 380, without excluding the possibility of a date two decades earlier or later. Apostolic Fathers. The Christian writers of the first and second century, Antiœchian who are known, or are considered, to have had personal relations with some of the Apostles, or to have been so influenced by them that their writings may be held as echoes of genuine Apostolic teaching. Though restricted by some to those who were actually disciples of the Apostles, the term applies by extension to others who are supposed to have been such, and virtually embraces all the remains of primitive Christian literature antedating the great apologies of the second century, and forming the link of tradition that binds these latter writings to those of the New Testament. The name was apparently unknown.
in Christian literature before the end of the seventeenth century. The term Apostolic, however, was commonly used to qualify Churches, persons, writings, etc., from the early second century, when St. Ignatius, in the exordium of his Epistle to the Trallians, saluted their Church “after the Apostolic manner.” About 170, Jean Baptiste d’Antioche (probably Jean Baptiste d’Éphèse) published his “SS. Patrum qui tempore apostolici floruerunt opera,” which title was abbreviated to “Bibliotheca Patrum Apostolicorum” by J. L. Ittig in his edition (Leipzig, 1699) of the same writings. Since then the term has been universally used. The list of Fathers included under this title has varied over the centuries. The writings which were generally felt to be epistolary in form, after the fashion of the canonical Epistles, and were written, for the greater part, not for the purpose of instructing Christians at large, but for the guidance of individuals or local churches in some passing need. Happily, the writers so amplified their theme that they combine to give a precious picture of the Christian community in the age which follows the death of St. John. Thus Clement, in a paternal solicitude for the Churches committed to his care, endeavours to heal a dissension at Corinth and insists on the principles of unity and submission to authority, as best conduce to peace; Polycarp, fervent to the Christian end which solaced him on his way to martyrdom, sends back letters of recognition, filled with admonitions against the prevailing heresy and highly spiritual exhortations to keep unity of faith in submission to the bishops; Polycarp, in forwarding Ignatian letters to Philippi, sends, as requested, a simple letter of advice and encouragement. The letter of Pseudo-Barnabas and that to Diognetus, the one polemical, the other apologetic in tone, while retaining the same form, seem to have in view a wider circle of readers. The other three are in the form of treatises: the Didache, a manual of moral and liturgical instruction; the “Shepherd,” a book of edification, apocalyptic in form, is an allegorical representation of the Church, the faults of her children and their need of penance; the “Expositions” of Papias, an exegetical commentary on the Gospels.

Written under such circumstances, the works of the Apostolic Fathers are not characterized by systematic expositions of doctrine or brilliance of style. “Diognetus” alone evidences literary skill and refinement. Ignatius stands out in relief by his striking personality and depth of view. Each writes for his present purpose, with a view primarily to the actual needs of his time. But, in the case of the Fathers, primitive charity and enthusiasm, his heart pours out its message of fidelity to the glorious Apostolic heritage, of encouragement in present difficulties, of solicitude for the future with its threatening dangers. The dominant tone is that of fervent devotion to the brethren in the faith, revealing the depth and breadth of the zeal which was imparted to the writers by the Apostles. The letters of the three bishops, together with the Didache, voice sincerest praise of the Apostles, whose memory the writers hold in deep filial devotion; but their recognition of the unapproachable superiority of their masters is equally evident. The pomposity, so rife amongst the Fathers of the subsequent periods. The fervent feeling of the after-care of the day, Apostolic charity, was not to be found again in such fullness and simplicity. Letters breathing such sympathy and solicitude were held in high esteem by the early Christians and by some were given an authority little inferior to that of the Scriptures. The Epistle of Clement was read in the Sunday assemblies at Corinth during the second century and later (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., III, xvi; IV, xxxii); the letter of Barnabas was similarly honoured at Alexandria, Hermas was popular though little known, but popularly in the West. Clement of Alexandria quoted the Didache as "Scripture." Some of the Apostolic Fathers are found in the oldest manuscripts of the New Testament at the end of the canonical writings: Clement was first made known through the "Codex Alexandrinus"; similarly, Hermas and Pseudo-Barnabas are appended to the canonical books in the "Codex Sinaiticus." Standing between the New Testament era and the literary efflorescence of the late second century, these writers represent the original elements of Christian tradition. They make no pretension to treat of Christian doctrine and are present in a complete and scholarly manner and cannot, therefore, be expected to answer all the problems concerning Christian origins. Their silence on any point does not imply their ignorance of it, much less its denial; nor do their assertions tell all that might be known. The dogmatic value of their teaching is, however, of the highest order, considering the originality and high integrity of the documents and the competence of the authors to transmit the purest Apostolic doctrine. This fact did not receive its due appreciation even during the period of medieval theological activity. The increased enthusiasm for positive theology which marked the seventeenth century diverted attention of the "apocrypha" since then they have been the eagerly-questioned witnesses to the beliefs and practice of the Church during the first half of the second century. Their teaching is based on the Scriptures, i.e., the Old Testament, and on the words of Jesus Christ and His Apostles. The authority of the latter was decisive. Though the New Testament canon was not yet, to judge from these writings, definitively fixed, it is significant that with the exception of the Third Epistle of St. John and possibly that of St. Paul to Philemon, every book of the New Testament is quoted or alluded to more or less clearly by one or another of the Apostolic Fathers, while the citations from the "apocrypha" are extremely rare. Of equal authority with the written word is that of oral tradition (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., III, xxxii; I Clem., vii), to which must be traced certain citations of the "Sayings" of Our Lord and the Apostles not found in the Gospels.

Meager as they necessarily are in their testimony, the Apostolic Fathers bear witness to the faith of Christians in the chief mysteries of the Divine Unity and Trinity. The Trinitarian formula occurs frequently. If the Divinity of the Holy Ghost is but once obscurely alluded to in Hermas, it must be remembered that the Church was as yet undisturbed by anti-Trinitarian heresies. The dominant error of the period was Docetism, and its refutation furnishes these writers with an occasion to deal at greater length with the Person of Jesus Christ. He is the Redeemer of whom men stood in need. Ignatius (Ephes., i) calls Him the "living God" (Trull., ii; Ephes., i; and see vii). The notoriety of the Epistle to the Hebrews forms the basis of their teaching. Jesus Christ is our high-priest (I Clem., xxxvi-lxiv) in whose suffering and death is our redemption (Ignat., Eph., i, Magnes., ix; Barnab., vii; Diogn., ix); whose blood is our ransom (I Clem., xii-lxxi). The fruit of the Divine love and of the passion is in a general way the destruction of death or of sin, the gift to man of immortal life, and the knowledge of God (Barnab., iv-v, vii, xiv; Did., xvi; I Clem., xxiv-xcv; Hermas, Simil., v, 6). Justification is received by faith and works as well; and so clearly is the efficacy of good works insisted on here to represent the Apostolic Fathers as failing to comprehend the pertinent teaching of St. Paul. The points of view of both St. Paul and St. James are cited and considered complementary (I Clem., xxxxi, xxxii, xxxvii, xxxviii; Ignat. to Polyc., vi). Good works are insisted on by Hermas (vi, i, i Simil., v, 3), and Barnabas proclaims (c. xix) their necessity for salvation. The Church, the "Catholic" Church, as Ignatius for the first time calls it (Smyrn., vii), takes the place of the chosen people; is the mystical body of Christ, the faithful being the members thereof, united by oneness of faith and hope, and by a charity which prompts (Hermas, vii, i Simil., vii) the spiritual authority is secured by the hierarchical organization of the ministry and the due submission of inferiors to authority. On this point the teaching of the Apostolic Fathers seems to stand for a marked development in advance of the practice of the Apostolic period. But it is to be noted that the familiar tone in which episcopal authority is treated precludes the possibility of its being a novelty. The Didache may yet deal with "prophets," "Apostles," and itinerant missionaries (x-xi, xii-xiv), but this is not a stage in development. It is anomalous, outside the current of development. Clement and Ignatius represent the church with its orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, ministers of the Eucharistic liturgy and administrators of temporalities. Clement's Epistle is the philosophy of "Apostolicity" and its corollary, episcopal succession. Ignatius gives in abundance and illustration of what Clement had by principle. For Ignatius the bishop is the centre of unity (Eph., iv), the authority whom all must obey as they would God, in whose place the bishop rules (Ignat. to Polyc., vi; Magnes., vi, xiii; Smyrn., vi, xi; Trull., vii); for unity with and submission to the bishop is the only security of faith. Supreme in the Church is he who holds the seat of St. Peter at Rome. The intervention of Clement in the affairs of Corinth and the language of Ignatius in speaking of the Church of Rome in the exordium of his Epistle to the Romans must be understood in the light of Christ's charge to St. Peter. One rounds out the other. The deepest reverence for the memory of St. Peter is visible in the writings of Clement and Ignatius. They couple his name with that of St. Paul, and this effectually disposes the antagonism between these two Apostles which the Tübingen theory postulated in tracing the pretended development of a united church from the Cyprianic and Pauline factions. Among the sacraments alluded to is Baptism, to which Ignatius refers (Polyc., ii; Smyrn., viii), and of which Hermes speaks as the necessary way of entrance to the Church and to salvation (Vis., iii, 3, 5; Simil., ix, 16), the way from death to life (Simil., viii, 5), while the Didache deals with it liturgically (vii). The Eucharist is mentioned in the Didache (xiv) and by Ignatius, who uses the term to signify the "flesh of Our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Smyrn., vii; Ephes., xx; Philad., iv). Penance is the theme of Hermes, and is urged as a necessary and a possible recourse for him who sins parricide after baptism (Hermes, lii). The Didache refers to a confession of sins (iv, xiv) as does Barnabas (xiv). An exposition of the dogmatic teaching of individual Fathers will be found under their respective names. The Apostolic Fathers, as a group, are found in no one manuscript. The literary history of each will be found in connection with its various authorities. The latest was that of Cotelerius, above referred to (Paris, 1672). It contained Barnabas, Clement, Hermes, Ignatius, and Polycarp. A reprint (Antwerp, 1698-1700; Amsterdam, 1724), by Jean Leclerc (Clericus), contained much additional matter. The latest are those in the Ancilla Bibliographiae Lightfoot, "The Apostolic Fathers" (5 vols. London, 1889-1890); abbreviated edition, Lightfoot, “Apostolic Queen” for the first time in the letters patent granted to the imperial plebanopotentiate sent to the College of Cardinals after the death of Benedict XIV. In the instructions imparted to this ambassador the hope is expressed that the Holy See will not withhold this title in future from the prince of Hungary (1877, 1878, 1879, 1881). In a fifth edition of Hefele’s “Lettre Patr. Apostoliciuorum” (Tübingen, 1839; 4th ed., 1855) enriched with notes (critical, exegetical, historical), prolegomena, indexes, and a Latin version. The second edition meets all just demands of a critical presentation of these ancient and important writings, and in its introduction and notes offers the best Catholic treatise on the subject.

Apostolic Majesty, a title given to the Kings of Hungary, and used, since the time of Maria Theresa, by the King himself, as also in letters addressed to him by officials or private individuals. The origin of the title dates from St. Stephen, who is supposed to have received it from Pope Sylvester II in recognition of the activity displayed by him in promoting the mission of the Christian Church in Hungary. Hartvik, the biographer of St. Stephen, tells us that the pope hailed the king as a veritable “Apostle” of Christ, with reference to his holy labours in spreading the Catholic Faith through Hungary. The bull, however, of Sylvester II, dated 27 March of the year 1000, whereby the pope grants St. Stephen the title of King of Hungary, and recognizes the kingdom he had offered to the Holy See and confines on him the right to have the cross carried before him, with an administrative authority over bishoprics and churches, affords no basis for the granting of this particular title. Moreover, the bull, as is clearly proved by the latest research, is a forgery of later date than 1574. Pope Leo X having conferred the title of Defender Fidei on Henry VIII of England, in the year 1521, the nobles of Hungary, with Stephen Werbōczí, the learned jurist and later Palatine of Hungary, at their head, opened negotiations with the Holy See to have the title of “Apostolic Majesty” said to have been conferred by Sylvester II to St. Stephen, conferred on King Louis II. But these negotiations led to no result. In 1627, Ferdinand III endeavoured to obtain the title for himself, but desisted from the attempt when he found the Primates of Hungary, Peter Pázmály, as well as the Holy See itself, unwilling to give in to his request. When, however, measures were taken, in the reign of Leopold I (1657-1705) to make the royal authority supreme in the domain of ecclesiastical jurisdiction and administration, the title “Apostolic Majesty” came into use. Maria Theresa makes use of the title

Apostolic See, The (sede apostolica, cathedra apostolica). This is a metaphorical term, used, as happens in all languages, to express the abstract notion of authority by the concrete name of the place in which it is exercised. Such phrases have the double advantage of supplying a convenient sense-image for an idea purely intellectual and of exactly defining the nature of the authority by the addition of a single adjective. An Apostolic see is any see founded by an Apostle and having the authority of its founder; the Apostolic See is the seat of authority invested by the Roman Church in the Patriarchates of Peter, the chief of the Apostles. Hence, and barbarian violence swept away all the particular Churches which could lay claim to an Apostolic see, until Rome alone remained; to Rome, therefore, the term applies as a proper name. But before heresy, schism, and barbarian invasions had done their work, the authority as the fourth in the hierarchy of the Church had already the Apostolic See par excellence, not only in the West but also in the East. Antioch, Alexandria, and, in a lesser degree, Jerusalem were called Apostolic sees by reason of their first occupants, Peter, Mark, and James, from whom they derived their patriarchal honour and jurisdiction; but Rome is the Apostolic See, because its occupant perpetuates the apostolate of Blessed Peter extending over the whole Church. Hence also the title Apostolicus, formerly applied to bishops and metropolitans, was gradually restricted to the Pope of Rome, the Dominus Apostolicus, who still figures in the Litany of the Saints at the head of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The authoritative acts of the popes, inasmuch as they are the exercise of their Apostolic power, are styled acts of the Holy or Apostolic See. The See is thus personified as the representative of the Prince of the Apostles, as in Pope Leo III’s confirmation of the Papal Constitution (Code of Excommunication’s): “Iciscire et Nos et per nostrum officium hsec vene randa Sedes Apostolicae his quae definitas sunt, consentit, et beati Petri Apostoli auctoritate confirmat.” (Therefore We also and through our office this venerable Apostolic See give assent to the things that have been defined, and confirm them by the authority of the Blessed Apostle Peter. It is a fact worthy of notice that, in later times, all those who wished to minimize the papal authority, Protesting, Gallican, etc., used the term Curia (Roman Court) in preference to Papa, in order thus to obscure the dogmatic significance of the latter term. The cathedra Petri, the Chair of St. Peter, is but another expression for the sedes apostolica, cathedra denoting the chair of the teacher. Hence the limitation of papal infallibility to definitions ex cathedra amounts to this: papal definitions can claim infallibility only when pronounced by the pope as the holder of the privileges granted by Christ to Peter, the Rock upon which He built His Church. The same formula conveys the meaning that the pope’s infallibility is not personal, but derived from, and coextensive with, his office of visible Head of the Universal Church, in virtue of which he sits in the Chair of Peter as Shepherd and Teacher of all Christians. (See Infallibility.) From ancient times a distinction has been made between the Apostolic See and its actual occupant: between sedes and sedens. The object of the distinction is not to treat the sede and its occupant one to the other, but rather to set forth their intimate connection. The See is the symbol of the highest papal authority; it is, by its nature, permanent, whereas its occupant holds that authority but for a time and inasmuch as he sits in the Chair of Peter. It further implies that the supreme authority is a supernatural gift, the same in all successive holders, independent of their personal worth, and inseparable from their ex officio definitions and decisions. The Vatican definition of the pope’s infallibility when speaking ex cathedra does not permit of the sense attached to the distinction of sedes and sedens. The reign of bishops, probably that aspect of the official use of the authority vested in the See, with explicit declaration of its exercise, the sedens was separate from the sedes.

J. WILHELM.

Apostolic Succession.—Apostolicity as a note of the true Church being dealt with elsewhere, the object of this article is to evade the question: Apostolic succession is found in the Roman Catholic Church. (2) That none of the separate Churches have any valid claim to it. (3) That the Anglican Church, in particular, has broken away from Apostolic unity.

Roman Claim.—The principle underlying the Roman claim is contained in the idea of succession. “To succeed” is to be the successor of, especially to be the heir of, or to occupy an official position just as Victoria succeeded William IV. Now the Roman Pontiffs come immediately after, occupy the position, and perform the functions of St. Peter; this is, his successors. We must prove (a) that St. Peter came to Rome, and ended there his pontificate; (b) that the Bishops of Rome who came after him held his official position in the Church. As soon as the problem of St. Peter’s coming to Rome passed from theologians writing pro domo sua into the hands of uninterested historians, i.e., within the last half century, it required the presence of no scholar now dares to contradict; the researches of German professors like A. Harnack and Weizsäcker, of the Anglican Bishop Lightfoot, and those of archiologists like De Rossi and Lanciani, of Duchesne and Barnes, have all come to the same conclusion: St. Peter did reside and die in Rome. Beginning with the middle of the second century, there exists a universal consensus as to Peter’s martyrdom in Rome; Dionysius of Corinth speaks for Greece, Irenaeus for Gaul, Clement and Origen for Alexandria, Tertullian for Africa. In the third century the people claim the authority in Rome, not only the fact that they are St. Peter’s successors, and no one objects to this claim, no one raises a counter-claim. No city boasts the tomb of the Apostle but Rome. There he died, he left his inheritance; the fact is never questioned in the controversies between East and West. This argument, however, has a weak point: it leaves aside one hundred years for the formation of the historical legends, of which Peter’s presence in Rome may be one just as much as his conflict with Simon Magus. We have, then, to go farther back into antiquity. About 150 the Roman presbyter Caius offers to show to the heretic Proclus the trophies of the Apostles: “If you will go to the Vatican, and to the Via Ostiensis, you will find the monuments of those who have founded this Church.” Can Caius and the Romans for whom he speaks have been in error on a point so vital to their Church? Next we come to Papias (c. 138–150). From him we get only the faint indication of places, not to mention any order, in which he placed the apostles, for he states that Mark wrote down what Peter preached, and he makes him write in Rome. Weizsäcker himself holds that this inference from Papias has some weight in the cumulative argument we are constructing. Earlier than Papias is Ignatius Martyr (before 117), who, on his way to martyrdom, writes to the Romans: “I do not commend you as did Peter and Paul; they were Apostles, I am a disciple” words which according to Lightfoot have no sense if Ignatius did not believe Peter and Paul to have been preaching in Rome. Earlier still is Clement of Rome writing to the Corinthian Church: “The present See in the first century. He cites Peter’s and Paul’s martyrdom as an example of the sad fruits of fanaticism and envy. They have suffered amongst us” he says, and Weizsäcker rightly sees here another proof for our thesis. The Gospel of St. John, written about the same time as the letter of Clement to the Corinthians, also contains a clear allusion to the martyrdom by crucifixion of St. Peter, without, however, locating it (John, xxi, 18, 19). The very oldest evidence comes from St. Peter himself, if he be the author of the First Epistle of Peter, or if not, from a writer nearly of his own time: The Church that Peter founded is still the Church at Rome (1 Peter, 5, 13). That Babylon stands for Rome, as usual amongst pious Jews, and not for the real Babylon, then without Christians, is admitted by common consent (cf. F. J. A. Hort, “Judaistic Christianity”, London, 1895, 155). This chain of documentary evidence, linking its first link in Scripture itself, and broken nowhere, puts the sojourn of St. Peter in Rome among the best-ascertained facts in history. It is further strengthened by a similar chain of monumental evidence, which Lanciani, the prince of Roman topographers, sums up as follows: “For the archaeologist the presence and execution of St. Peter and Paul in Rome We must place beyond a shadow of doubt, by purely monumental evidence!” (Pagan and Christian Rome, 123).

St. Peter’s Successors in Office.—St. Peter’s successors carried on his office, the importance of which grew with the growth of the Church. In 97 we find such expressions as: “the Church of Corinth.” The Roman Bishop, Clement, unites himself with an authoritative letter to restore peace. St. John was still living at Ephesus, yet neither he nor his intercessed with Corinth. Before 117 St. Ignatius of Antioch addresses the Roman Church as the one which “presides over charity . . . which has never deceived any one, which has taught others.” St. Irenæus (180-200) states the theory and practice of doctrinal unity as follows: “With this Church [of Rome] because of its more powerful principality, every Church must agree, that is, the faithful everywhere, in which [i.e. in communion with the Roman Church] the tradition of the Apostles has ever been preserved by those on every side” (Adv. Haereses, III). The heretic Marcion, the Montanists from Phrygia, Praxeas from Asia, come to Rome to gain the countenance of its bishops; St. Victor, Bishop of Rome, threatens to ordain the Asia Minor churches; St. Eusebius refuses to receive St. Cyprian’s deputation, and separates himself from various Churches of the East; Fortunatus and Felix, deposed by Cyprian, have recourse to Rome; Basiliades, deposed in Spain, betakes himself to Rome; the presbyters of Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, complain of his doctrine to Dionysius, Bishop of Rome; the latter excommunicates him, and he explains. The fact is indisputable: the Bishops of Rome took over Peter’s Chair and Peter’s office of continuing the work of Christ (Duchesne, “The Roman Church before Constantine”, Catholic Univ. Bulletin (October, 1904) X, 429-460). To be in communion with the Church one must have an affiliation to the See of Peter is necessary, for, as a matter of history, there is no other Church linked to any other Apostle by an unbroken chain of successors. Antioch, once the see and centre of St. Peter’s labours, fell into the hands of Monophysite patriarchs under the Emperor Zenon, and Antioch at the end of the fifth century. The Church of Alexandria in Egypt was founded by St. Mark the Evangelist, the mandatory of St. Peter. It flourished exceedingly until the Arian and Monophysite heresies took root among its people and gradually led to its extinction. The shortest-lived Apostolic Church is that of Jerusalem. In 130 the Holy City was destroyed by Hadrian, and a new town, Ælia Capitolina, erected on its site. The new Church of Ælia Capitolina was subjected to Cesarea; the very name of Jerusalem fell out of use till after the Council of Nice (325). The Greek Schism now claims its allegiance. Whatever of Apostolicity remains in these Churches founded by the Apostles is owing to the fact that Rome picked up the broken succession and linked it anew to the See of Peter. The Greek Church, embracing all the Eastern Churches involved in the schism of Photius and Michael Cerularius, the Russian Church can and does claim to Apostolic succession either direct or indirect, i.e. through Rome, because they are, by their own fact and will, separated from the Roman communion. During the four hundred and sixty-four years between the accession of Constantine (323) and the Seventh General Council (787), the whole or part of the Eastern episcopate lived in schism for no less than two hundred and three years: namely, from the Council of Sardica (343) to St. John Chrysostom (389), 55 years; owing to Chrysostom’s condemnation (404-415), 11 years; owing to Acacius and the Henoticon edict (484-519), 35 years; in Monothelism (680 years); owing to Photius’ images (726-757), 61 years; total, 203 years (Duchesne). They do, however, claim doctrinal connection with the Apostles, sufficient to their mind to stamp them with the mark of Apostolicity.

The Anglican Continuity Claim.—The continuity is brought forward by all sects, a fact showing how vital to the eleventh and the twelfth Church, Apostolicity is. The Anglican High-Church party asserts its continuity with the pre-Reformation Church in England, and through it with the Catholic Church of Christ. “At the Reformation we but washed our face” is a favourite Anglican saying; we are to show that in reality they had their head, and have been a truncated Church ever since. Etymologically, “to continue” means “to hold together”. Continuity, therefore, denotes a successive existence without constitutional change, an advance in time of a thing in itself steady. Steady, not stationary, for the nature of a thing may be to grow, to develop on certain internal lines, while changing yet always the selfsame. This applies to all organisms starting from a germ, to all organizations starting from a few constitutional principles; it also applies to religious belief, which, as Newman says, changes in order to remain the same. On the other hand, a “branch” or “continuity” which whenever a constitutional change takes place in the Church enjoys continuity when it develops along the lines of its original constitution; it changes when it alters its constitution either social or doctrinal. But what is the constitution of the Church of Christ? The answer is as varied as the sects calling themselves Christian. Being persuaded that continuity with Christ is essential to their legitimate status they have excogitated theories of the essentials of Christianity, and of a Christian Church, exactly suiting their own denomination. Most of them repudiate Apostolic succession as a mark of the true Church; they founded it; the controversy is not with such, but with the Anglicans who do pretend to continuity. We have points of contact only with the High-Churchmen, whose leanings towards antiquity and Catholicism place them midway between the Catholic and the Protestant parties and simply.

England and Rome.—Of all the Churches now separated from Rome, none has a more distinctly Roman origin than the Church of England. It has often been claimed that St. Paul, or some other Apostle, evangelized the Britons. It is certain, however, that whenever Welsh annals mention the introduction of Christianity into the island, invariably they conduct the reader to Rome. In the “Liber Pontificalis” (ed. Duchesne, I, 130) we read that “Pope Eleutherius received a letter from Lucius, King of Britain, that he might be made a Christian by his orders.” The incident is told again and again by the Venerable Bede; it is found in the Book of Landaff, as well as in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; it is accepted by French, Swiss, German chroniclers, together with the home authorities Fabius Ethelward, Henry of Huntingdon, William of Malmesbury, and Giraldus Cambrensis. The Saxon invasion swept the land wherever it penetrated, and drove the British Christians to the western borders of the island, or across the sea into Armorica, now French Brittany. No attempt at converting their conquerors was ever made by the conquered. Rome once more stepped in. The missionaries sent by Gregory the Great converted and baptized King Ethebert of Kent, with thousands of his subjects. In 597 Augustine was made Prince over all England, and his successors, down to the Reformation, have ever received from Rome the Pallium, the symbol of super-episcopal authority. The Anglo-Saxon hierarchy was thoroughly Roman in its discipline and its faith and practice, in its obedience and affection: witness even Bede’s “Ecclesiastical History”. A like Roman spirit animated the nation. Among the saints recognized by the Church are twenty-three kings and sixty queens, princes, or princesses of the different Anglo-Saxon dynasties, reckoned from the seventh century. St. Cuthbert made the journey to the tomb of St. Peter, and to his successor, in Rome. Anglo-Saxon pilgrims formed quite a colony in proximity to the Vatican, where the local topography (Borgo, Sasania, Vicus Saxorum) still recalls their memory. There was an English school in Rome founded by King Ethebert and Pope Gregory II (715-731), and supported by the Romescot, or Peter’s-peace, paid yearly by every Wessex family. The Romescot was made obligatory by Edward the Confessor, on every monastery and household in possession of land or cattle to the yearly value of thirty pence.

The Norman Conquest (1066) wrought no change in the religion of England. St. Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109) testified in his writings (in Matt., xvi) and by his acts. When pressed to surrender his right of appeal to Rome, he answered the king in court: "You wish me to swear never, on any account, to appeal in England to Blessed Peter or his Vicar; thus I say ought not to be commanded by you, who are a Christian, for to swear this is to abjure Blessed Peter; he who abjures Blessed Peter undoubtedly abjures Christ, who made him Prince over his Church." St. Thomas Becket shed his blood in defence of the liberties of the Church against the encroachments of the Norman king (1170). Groseteste, in the thirteenth century, writes more forcibly on the Pope's authority over the whole Church than any other ancient English bishop, although he resisted an ill-advised appointment to a canony made by the Pope. In the fourteenth century Duns Scotus teaches at Oxford that they are excommunicated who think to hold anything different from what the Roman Church holds or teaches." In 1411 the English bishops at the Synod of London condemn Wycliffe's proposition "that it is not of necessity to salvation to hold that the Roman Church is supreme among the Churches." In 1535 Blessed John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, was put to death for upholding against Henry VIII the Pope's supremacy over the English Church. The most striking piece of evidence is the wording of the oath taken by archbishops before entering into office: "I, Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury, from this hour forward, will be faithful and obedient to St. Peter, to the Holy Apostolic Roman Church, to my Lord Pope Celestine, and his successors canonically succeeding. . . I will, saving my order, give aid to defend and to maintain against every man the primacy of the Roman Church and the royalty of St. Peter. I will visit the threshold of the Apostles every three years, either in person or by my deputy, and I will bind by apostolical dispensation,. . . So help me God and these Holy Gospels." (Wilkins, Concilia Angliae, II, 199.) Chief Justice Bracton (1260) lays down the civil law of this country thus: "It is to be noted concerning the jurisdiction of superior and inferior courts, that in the first place the Pope has ordinary jurisdiction in spirituals, so the king has, in the realm, in temporal. The line of demarcation between things spiritual and temporal is in many cases blurred and uncertain; the two powers often overlap, and conflicts are unavoidable. During five hundred years such conflicts were frequent. Their very recurrence proves that England acknowledged the papal supremacy, for it requires two to make a quarrel. The complaint of one side was always that the other encroached upon its rights. Henry VIII himself, in 1533, still pleaded in the Roman Courts for a divorce. Had he succeeded, the supremacy of the Pope would not have been a question of defender. It was only after his failure that he questioned the authority of the tribunal to which he had himself appealed. In 1534 he was, by Act of Parliament, made the Supreme Head of the English Church. The bishops, instead of swearing allegiance to the Pope, sworn allegiance to the King, without any saving clause. Blessed John Fisher was the only bishop who refused to take the new oath; his martyrdom is the first witness to the breach of continuity between the old English Church and the new Anglican Church. Hereby stepped in to widen the breach. The Thirty-nine Articles teach the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith alone, deny purgatory, reduce the seven sacraments to two, insist on the infallibility of the Church, establish the king's supremacy, and deny the pope's jurisdiction in England. Mass was abolished, and the Real Presence; the form of ordination was so altered to suit the King's views of his supremacy that it is not effective, and the succession of priests failed as well as the succession of bishops. (See Anglican Orders.) Is it possible to imagine that the framers of such vital alterations thought of "continuing" the existing Church? When the hierarchical framework is destroyed, what the doctrine founded is removed, when every stone of the edifice is carelessly rearranged to suit individual tastes, then there is no continuity, but collapse. The old façade of Battle Abbey still stands, also parts of the outer wall, and the old name remains; but pass through the portal, and one faces a stately, newish, comfortable mansion; green lawns and shrubs hide old foundations of church and cloisters; the monks' scriptorium and storerooms still stand to add the visitor's mood. Of the abbey of 1538, the abbey of 1906 only keeps the mask, the diminished sculptures and the stones—a fitting image of the old Church and the new Church of England. James Grant's History of the English Church in the 16th Century lays bare the essentially Protestant spirit of the English Reformation, in a letter on "Continuity" (reproduced in the Tablet, 20 January, 1906), shifts the controversy from historical to doctrinal ground. "If the country", he says, "still contained a community of Christians—that is to say, of real believers in the great gospel of salvation, men who still accepted the old creeds, and had no doubt Christ died to save them—then the Church of England remained the same Church as before. The old system was preserved, in fact all that was really essential to it, it as regards doctrine nothing was taken away except some doubtful scholastic propositions." Apostolic Union of Secular Priests. The, an association of secular priests who observe a simple rule embodying the common duties of their state, afford mutual assistance in the functions of the ministry, and keep themselves in the spirit of their holy vocation by spiritual conferences. Its object is the sanctification of the secular clergy in their missionary lives among the people. Its spirit is a personal love for Jesus Christ. It was established in the seventeenth century by the Venerable Bartholomew Holzhausen, and was revived and reorganized in France about forty years ago by Canon and its spread to a great number of dioceses throughout the Christian world, in France, Belgium, Austria, Ireland, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, United States, Canada, South America, Australia, and parts of Asia. The Holy Father proclaims the fact that he was a member of it, and had experienced its utility and excellence, and admires the advantages derived from it, even after his elevation to the episcopate. The brief goes on to summarize its organization. Proposing as it does to all its associates a uniform rule of life, monthly reunions and spiritual conferences, and the well-maintained bond of obedience, it strengthens union among the clergy and unites by a bond of spiritual fraternity priests who are scattered far apart. The dangers of solitude are removed, and there is a concentrated effort on the part of all to attain the common end. Each priest under these conditions devotes himself to the well-being and perfection of all, and, though prevented by the cares of his ministry from enjoying the advantages of living in community, he does not feel that he is deprived of the benefits of the religious family; nor are the counsels and assistance of his brothers wanting. The brief then recites the approval of the institute by Leo XIII in Apostolic letters of 31 May, 1880, and again in 1887, when he gave it a cardinal-protector the Cardinal Vicar of Rome, Monsignor Lucido Parrocchi. Then follows a recital of the indulgences and special privileges granted to the priests who are members. These may be found in Beringes, ed. 1905, II, 450.

The blessings which the founders aimed at are attained as follows: (1) The rule is the bond of this society, and its vital principle; insisting on the fact that the priest ought to study, love, and imitate Jesus Christ, it maps out the life of the priests of the Apostolic Union, indicating to them the spiritual exercises and meditations at their disposal, and requires that they be used monthly, each month, each year, and counsels with regard to the holy ministry. (2) The monthly bulletin, which is a kind of examination on the principal exercises in the rule of life. It is so arranged that the member can indicate every day his performance of the duties imposed. There are also signals, acknowledged for this purpose. The bulletin is sent monthly to the diocesan superior, who returns it with his comments. This monthly bulletin, marked carefully each day and examined by the superior, assures regularity, maintains fervor, guards against failures and diminishes faults; it establishes the spirit of order, self-denial, obedience and humility, and secures the benefits of spiritual direction. (3) Reunions are more or less frequent according to circumstances. Where the associates are numerous, they are divided into groups, each of which has its reunion at a central point. It is quite a common practice for the members to meet in common. They also assemble, wherever circumstances permit, once a year to make a retreat of at least five days. (4) The works of zeal supported by the associates are the recruiting of the clergy and the nurture of ecclesiastical vocations. (5) The common life. The Apostolic Union favours the practice of the clergy of the same parishes living in common wherever this can be advantageously done. The associates recite daily a prayer to which is attached a special indulgence. (6) Organization. The different diocesan organizations canonically erected are united under a president-general, who has the submission of a bulletin regularly to the superior of the Union. Each diocesan association chooses its superior, and the associates are bound to the superior by the practice of the monthly bulletin. There is an organ, "Etudes Eclesiastiques", which is a monthly review dedicated to the interests of parochial life.

Apostolic Cure, a Bull of Leo XIII issued 15 September, 1896, and containing the latest papal decision with regard to the validity of Anglican orders. Decisions had already been given that such orders are invalid. The invariable practice also of the Catholic Church was to ordain regularly to the sacred order whenever clergymen who had received orders in the Anglican Church became converts, and desired to become priests in the Catholic Church, they have been unconditionally ordained. In recent years, however, several members of the clergy and laity of the Anglican Church have taken the step that the practice of the Catholic Church in insisting on unconditionally ordaining clerical converts from Anglicanism arose from want of due inquiry into the validity of Anglican orders, and from mistaken assumptions which, in the light of certain historical investigations, could not justly be maintained. These, especially, who were interested in the movement that looked towards Corporate Reunion thought that, as a condition to such reunion, Anglican orders should be accepted as valid by the Catholic Church. A few Catholic writers, also, thinking that there was at least room for doubt, joined with them in seeking a fresh inquiry into the question and an authoritative judgment from the Pope. The Pope therefore permitted the question to be re-examined. He commissioned a number of men, whose opinions on the matter were known to be divergent, to state, each, the ground of his judgment, in writing. He then summoned them to Rome, directed them to interchange writings, and, after all the documents and an authoritative judgment had been directed them to further investigate and discuss it. Thus prepared, he ordered them to meet in special sessions under the presidency of a cardinal appointed by him. Twelve such sessions were held, in which "all were invited to free discussion". He then directed that the acts of those sessions, together with all the documents, should be submitted to a council of cardinals, "so that when all had studied the whole subject and discussed it in Our presence each might give his opinion". The final result was the Bull "Apostolicae Curae", in which Anglican orders were declared to be invalid. As the Bull itself explains at length, its decision rests on extrinsic and on intrinsic grounds.

(1) The extrinsic grounds are to be found in the fact of the implicit approval of the Holy See given to the constant practice of unconditionally ordaining convert clergymen from the Anglican Church, and the declarations of the Holy See as to the invalidity of Anglican orders on every occasion when its decision was evoked. According to the teaching of the Catholic Church, to attempt to confer orders a second time on the same person would be a sacrilege; hence, the Church, by knowingly allowing the practice of ordaining convert clergymen, supposed that their orders were invalid. The Bull points out that orders received in the Church of England, according to the change introduced into the Ritual under Edward VI, were disowned as invalid by the Catholic Church, not through a custom grown up gradually, but from the first that Church had the authority. Thus, when a movement was made towards a reconciliation of the Anglican Church to the Holy See in the reign of Queen Mary (1553–58), Pope Julius III sent Cardinal Pole as Legate to England, with faculties to meet the case. Those faculties were "certainly not intended to deal with an abstract state of things, but with a specific matter in issue." They were directed towards providing for holy orders in England "as the recognized condition of the circumstances and the times demanded." The faculties given to Cardinal Pole (8 March, 1554) distinguished two classes of men: "first, those who had really received sacred orders, either before the accession of Henry VIII, or, if after it and mini-eres infected by error and schism, still according to the condemned Catholic Rite; the second, those who were initiated according to the Edwaridine Ordinal, who on that account could be promoted, since they had received an ordination that was null." The mind of Julius III appears also from the letter (29 January, 1555) by which Cardinal Pole sub-delegated his faculties to the Bishop of Norwich and the Bishop of Exeter to the Bishop of Norwich; and from the letter by the Pope, 20 June, 1555, and a Brief dated 30 October, 1555. The "Apostolate Cures" cites also, amongst other cases, that of John Clement Gordon who had received Orders according to the Edwaridine Ritual. Clement XIII issued a Decree on 17 April, 1704, that he should be ordained under that rite if he grounded his decision on the "defect of form and intention".

(2) The intrinsic reason for which Anglican Orders are pronounced invalid by the Bull, is the "defect of form and intention". It sets forth that "the Sacraments of the New Law, as sensible and efficient signs of invisible grace, ought both to signify the grace which they effect, and effect the grace which they signify". The rite used in administering a sacrament must be directed to the meaning of that sacrament; else there would be no reason why the rite used in one sacrament may not effect another. Where the sacrament is administered in one manner and administering that sacrament, and the rite used according to that intention.

The Bull takes note of the fact that in 1682 the form introduced in the Edwaridine Ordinal of 1552 had added to it the words: "for the office and work of a priest", etc. But it observes that this rather shows that the Anglicans themselves perceived that the first form was defective and inadequate. But even if this addition could give to the form its due signification, it was introduced too late, as a century had already elapsed since the adoption of the Edwaridine Ordinal; and, moreover, as the hierarchy had become extinct, there remained no power of ordaining.

The same holds good of episcopal consecration. The episcopate undoubtedly by the institution of Christ most truly belongs to the Sacrament of Orders and constitutes the priesthood in the highest degree. So that it is not a sacrament to transmit the grace of the priesthood and the true priesthood of Christ were utterly eliminated from the Anglican rite, and hence the priesthood is in nowise conferred truly and validly in the episcopal consecration of the same rite, for the like reason, therefore, the episcopate can in nowise be truly and conferred upon, and this the more so because among the first duties of the episcopate is that of ordaining ministers for the Holy Eucharist and Sacrifice.

The Pope goes on to state how the Anglican Ordinal had been adapted to the errors of the Reformers, so that thus vitiated it could not be used to confer valid orders, nor could it later be cured of this intrinsic defect, chiefly because the words used in it had a meaning entirely different from what would be required to confer the Sacrament. The force of this argument, which is clear to Anglicans themselves, may be applied also to the prayer "Almighty God, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" at the rite. Not only is the proper form for the sacrament lacking in the Anglican Ordinal; the intention is also lacking. Although the Church does not judge what is in the mind of the minister, she must pass judgment on what appears in the external rite. Now to confer a sacrament one must have the intention of doing what Christ intended; but those disposed that it is no longer acknowledged by the Church as valid, it is clear that it cannot be administered with the proper intention. He concludes by explaining how carefully and how prudently this matter has been examined by the Apostolic See, how those who examined it with him were agreed that the question had already been settled, but that it might be reconsidered and decided in the light of the latest corruptions over the question. He then declares that ordinations conducted with the Anglican rite are null and void, and implores those who are not of the Church and who seek orders to return to it, so that the Church, where they will find the true aids for salvation. He also invites those who are the ministers of religion in their various congregations to be reconciled to the Church, assuring them of his sympathy in their spiritual struggles, and of the joy of all the faithful when so earnest and so disinterested men as they are embrace the Church. He concludes with the usual declaration of the authority of this Apostolic letter. (See ANGLICAN ORDERS).

M. O’RIORDAN.

Apostolate Sedis Moderationem, a Bull of Pius IX (1846-78) which regulates anew the system of episcopal suffragans and representatives in the Church. It was issued 12 October, 1869, and is practically the present penal code of the Catholic Church. Although its Founder is divine, the Church is composed of members who are human, with human passions and weaknesses. Hence the need of laws for their direction, and of legal penalties for their correction. In the course of centuries these penal statutes accumulated to an enormous extent, some confirming, some modifying, some abrogating others which had been already made. They were simplified by the Council of Trent (1545-63). But afterwards new laws had to be enacted, some had to be altered, and some abrogated as before. Thus these penal statutes became again numerous and complicated, and a cause of confusion to canonists, of perplexity to moralists, and often a source of scruples to the faithful. Pius IX, therefore, simplified them again after three hundred years of accumulation, by the Bull "Apostolate Sedis Moderationem". In quoting the more solemn papal decrees, the practice is to entitle them from their initial words. (See BULLS AND BRIEFS.)

The words of this title are the first words of the document. The best general description that can be given of this legislation is an extract from itself. The following translation of the initial part of the Bull gives the spirit of the Bull is not quite literal, but it is faithful to the sense of the document: "It is according to the spirit of the Apostolic See to so regulate whatever has been decreed by the ancient canons for the salutary discipline of the faithful, as to make provision by its supreme authority for their needs according to the time and circumstances, and at the same time considered the Ecclesiastical Censures, which, per modum latae sententiae ipsoque facto incurrerendas, for the security and discipline of the Church, and for the restraint and correction of licence in the wicked, were wisely decreed and promulgated, have been from age to age gradually and greatly multiplied, so that some, owing to altered times and customs, have even ceased to serve the end or answer the occasion for which they were imposed; while doubts, anxieties, and scruples, have for that reason not infrequently troubled the consciences of those who have the cure of souls and of the faithful generally. In Our desire, in fact, that the authority of the Church should be not only superior, but also a rich source of good, in the exercise of which the Church should be the more so willing to promote the peace and the spiritual allure of all, if a reform of those censures be made and placed before Us, in order that, on mature consideration, We might determine those of them which ought to be retained and observed, and those which it would be wet to alter or abrogate. Such revision having been made, having taken counsel with Our Venerable Brothers the Cardinals General Inquisitors in matters of faith for the Universal Church, and after a long and careful consideration, We, of Our own accord, with full knowledge, mature deliberation, and in the fullness of Our Apostolic power, decree by this present present moderation, suspension, Excommunication, Supervision, or Interdict, of any kind soever, which per modum late sententiae ipsoque facto incurrénda have been hitherto imposed, those only which We insert in this Constitution and in that manner in which We insert them, are to be in force in future; and We also declare that these have their force and operation from the authority of this Constitution, and also derive their force altogether from this Our Constitution, just as if they had been for the first time published in it.

According to those introductory passages, the Bull “Apostolica Sedis” left all canonical penalties and impediments (deposition, degradation, deprivation of benefice, irregularity, etc.) as they were before, except those with which it expressly deals. And it deals expressly with those penalties only, the direct purpose of which is the reforming the punishment rather than the punishment of the person on whom they are inflicted, namely, the persons (excommunicated, suppressed, and interdicted). Moreover, it deals only with a certain class of censures. For clearness it is well to observe that a censure may be so attached to the violation of a law that the law-breaker incurs the censure in the very act of breaking the law, and a censure as decreed binds at once the conscience of the law-breaker without the process of a trial, or the formality of a judicial sentence. In other words, the law has already pronounced sentence the moment the person who breaks the law has completed the act of consciously breaking it; for which reason, censures thus decreed are said to be decreed per modum late sententiae ipsoque facto incurrénda, i.e. censure of sentence pronounced and incurred by the act of breaking the law. But, on the other hand, a censure may be so attached to the breaking of a law that the law-breaker does not incur the censure until, after a legal process, it is formally imposed by a judicial sentence, for which reason, censures thus decreed are called ferenda sententia, i.e. censure of sentence to be pronounced. Censures of this latter kind were left out by this Bull, and remain just as they were before, together with those penalties above referred to, the direct purpose of which is punishment. The Bull “Apostolica Sedis” therefore deals, exclusively with censures late sententia. Now, how has it altered or abrogated them? It abrogated all except those expressly inserted in it. Those which are inserted in it, whether old ones revived or re-taught, or new ones enacted, bind throughout the Catholic Church, all customs of any kind to the contrary notwithstanding, because this Bull, being the source of the binding power of all and each of them, even of such as might have gone into disuse anywhere or everywhere. The censures retained are inserted in the Bull in two ways: First, it makes a list of a certain number of them; Second, it inserts in a general manner, that the Council of Trent, either newly enacted, or so adopted from older canons as to make them its own; not those, therefore, which the Council of Trent merely confirmed, or simply adopted from older canons.

We have so far determined those censures which are in force throughout the Bull “Apostolica Sedis”, and will now take some of those which the Council of Trent is to be taken in the Church in that sphere of its legislation. But one who has incurred a censure can be freed from it only through absolution by competent jurisdiction. Although a censure is merely a medicinal penalty, the chief purpose of which is the reformation of the person who has incurred it, yet it does not cease of itself merely by one’s reformation. It has to be taken away by the power that inflicts it. It remains, therefore, to consider briefly those of the Bull “Apostolica Sedis” with respect to the power by which one may be absolved from any of them. They are placed in that Episcopal Power, in the usual order of the Church. Any priest who has jurisdiction to absolve from sin can also absolve from censures, unless a censure be reserved, as a sin might be reserved; and some of the censures named in the Bull “Apostolica Sedis” are not reserved. It may be well to observe here that the reservation from sin and absolution from censure are always the acts of jurisdiction in different things; the former belongs to jurisdiction in foro interno, i.e. in the Sacrament of Penance; the latter belongs to jurisdiction in foro externo, i.e. without and outside the Sacrament of Penance. Some censures of the “Apostolica Sedis” are reserved to bishops; so that bishops, within their own jurisdiction, or one specially delegated by them, can absolve from censures so reserved. Some are reserved to the Pope, so that not even a bishop can absolve from these without a delegation from the Pope. Finally, the Bull “Apostolica Sedis” gives a list of twelve censures which are reserved in a special manner (speciali modo) to the Pope; so that to absolve from these censures requires a special delegation, in which these are specially named. These twelve censures, except the one numbered X, were taken from the Bull “In Cena Domini”, and consequently, since the publication of the “Apostolica Sedis”, the Bull “In Cena Domini” has been added to and modified from 1720. It was actually published at Rome, and since 1567 elsewhere, on Holy Thursday) ceased to be, except as an historical document. Of these eleven canonical offences, five refer to attacks on the foundation of the Church; that is, on its faith and constitution. Three refer to attacks on the power of the Church and on the free exercise of that power. The other three refer to attacks on the spiritual or temporal treasures of the Church. A few censures have been enacted since the Bull “Apostolica Sedis” was published. These are usually mentioned and interpreted in the published commentaries on that Bull. The commentary by Fr. Francini and Pardi (published in 1720) mentions the editors of the “Acta Sanctae Sedis”, is the most complete. That issued (Prato, 1894) by the late Cardinal D’Annibale, however, is of all others to be recommended for conciseness and accuracy combined.

_Apostolici_, the name of four heretical bodies. I. Heretics of the third century.—The sect of the Eunomians, which sprung up in the second century in Asia Minor, with principles borrowed from Tatian or Marcion, practised an excessive asceticism which exaggerated Christian morality and distorted the teaching of the Church. By the third century they had split into groups of Apostolici, Apostacti, and Hydroparasites or Aquarian names taken from their customs or tenets. The Apostolici so called claimed to lead the life of the Apostles and to be derived from them. Hence they proscribed marriage and property-holding as evil things, admitting into their body no married men or property owners. They lapsed into Novatianism, and finally became Marcionites, where their name, of which nothing is known. II. Heretics of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries.—The sect of the Apostolici, or false Apostles, was started in 1260, at Parma, Italy, by an ignorant man of low extraction named Gerard Segarelli (also written Segalelli, Segarelli, Cearelli), who strove to reproduce the life of the Apostles. He adopted a white cloak and gray robe, let his beard and hair grow, and wore the sandals and cord of the Franciscans. He sold his house, gave away the price he received, and traversed the streets preaching penance and Apostolic poverty. He had followers to such an extent that in 1287 the Council of Würzburg forbade them to continue their mode of life and prohibited the faithful from aiding them. Segarelli remained at Parma, was in prison for a while, and then in the bishop's palace, where he was regarded as an object of amusement. The sect increased, and Honorius IV (11 March, 1288) and Nicholas IV (1290) condemned the lives of the Apostolici. He was again imprisoned in 1294, escaped, was retaken, abjured his errors, but relapsed, and the secular authorities burned him at Parma, 18 July, 1300. Dulcin, a bold, mediocre, and unscrupulous man, assumed control of the false Apostles, issued manifestoes, and finally collecting his partisans withdrew with them to the mountains of Vercelli and Novara, until 1306, when Clement V organized a crusade against him. He was captured, his body broken and delivered to the flames, and his disciples crushed. Some of the sect appeared, however, in Spain, 1315; John XXII took measures against them in 1318, and they were mentioned by the Council of Constance, 1374. Their characteristic from the start was a declaration of a return to the life, and especially the poverty, of the Apostles. Honorius IV and Nicholas IV charged them with violating a decree of the Second Ecumenical Council of Lyons in forbidding a new apportionment of the lands of the Church to the Apostles. Dulcini's tenets were: the imitation of Apostolic life; poverty to be absolute, obedience, interior; and one engaged himself, though by no vow, to live by alms. Dulcin also taught that the course of humanity is marked by four periods: (1) that of the Old Testament; (2) that of Jesus Christ and the Apostles; (3) the beginning of the Church; and (4) the end of the world. He uttered several false prophecies and professed liberty of thought. Free moralities have been imputed to this sect by the Chroniclers (Chronica, 117) and Bernard Gui (Practica inquisitionis hereticæ pravitatis, 339), but the papal bulls are silent on this head.

III. The New Apostolici of the Twelfth Century, chiefly in the vicinity of Cologne, and at Périgueux, in France, permitted no marriage, forbade the use of fish meat, because it were the result of sexual intercourse; they explained that sinners (i.e. all who did not belong to their sect, in which alone was to be found the true Church) could neither receive nor administer the sacraments. In consequence they set aside the Catholic priesthood and gave each member of the sect the power to consecrate at his daily mealtime and so to receive the Body and Blood of Christ. They rejected infant baptism, veneration of the saints, prayers for the dead, purgatory, and disdained the use of oaths, because all this was not found in the teaching of Christ and the Apostles. Their external conduct was blameless, but their low standard of living, asceticism for chastity, their community life with women was a clear proof of their deceptive and dangerous character. Meanwhile the people had come to know their character and the public aversion and disgust constantly increased, particularly in the vicinity of Cologne, where two Apostolici were burned three days after being given three days for consideration were burned alive. St. Bernard in his sermon calls on civil authority to take regular procedure against them.

IV. _Apostolici_, a branch of the Anabaptists, which practised poverty, interpreted Scripture literally, and declared the washing of feet necessary, from which they were called also Pedonites. JOHN J. A. BECKET.

_Apostolici Ministeri_, a bull issued 23 May, 1724, by Innocent XIII, for the revival of ecclesiastical discipline in Spain. The Primate and King Philip of Spain had reported to the Pope that the disciplinary laws of the Council of Trent were gradually falling into disuse. The Pope submitted the matter to the Sacred Congregation of the Index and the Council, with its advice issued the above-mentioned Bull. It lays down rules for the secular and for the regular clergy of Spain, of which the following are the leading points: (a) Tonsure is in no case to be conferred unless to meet the demands of religion, and in each case the cleric must be assigned to some church. (b) Seminarists, lest their studies be interfered with, are to attend the Cathedral on festival days only. (c) All candidates for holy orders must undergo an examination and show adequate knowledge. (d) The benefices or the title for which one is ordained must be sufficient for his decent support, and the benefices of minor canons are to be suppressed. (e) Those who have the cure of souls must regularly instruct the faithful under their care, and in any cases where through past laxity of discipline they are not fit to do it themselves, must at their own expense have it done by others who are capable. (f) Parishes which consist of the parochioners cannot regularly attend Mass are to be divided, according to the discretion of the bishop, irrespective of the will of the parish priest; or at least, a second church must be built for their convenience within the parish. (g) In view of evils which have arisen, the number of persons who receive the habit in any particular convents must not exceed a number in which a full course of instruction for the religious life of the community are of capable of supporting.
Apostolicity of doctrine requires that the deposit of faith committed to the Apostles shall remain unchanged. Since the Church is infallible in its teaching (see INFALLIBILITY), it follows that if the Church of Christ still exists it must be teaching its Doctrine. Hence Apostle for me is a guarantee of Apostolicity of doctrine. St. Ireneaeus, Adv. Haeres., IV, xxvi, n. 2) says: "Wherefore we must obey the priests of the Church who have succession from the Apostles, as we have shown, who, together with succession in the episcopate, have received the certain mark of truth according to the will of the Father; all others, however, are to be suspected, who separated themselves from the principal succession," etc. In explaining the concept of Apostolicity, then, special attention must be given to Apostolicity of mission, or Apostolic succession.

Apostolicity of mission means that the Church is one moral body, possessing the mission entrusted by Jesus Christ to the Apostles, and transmitted through them and their lawful successors in an unbroken chain to the present representatives of Christ upon earth. This authoritative transmission of power in the Church constitutes Apostolic succession. Apostolic succession must be both material and formal; the material is the succession in the Church through a series of persons from the Apostolic age to the present; the formal adding the element of authority in the transmission of power. It consists in the legitimate transmission of the ministerial power conferred by Christ upon His Apostles. No one can give a power which he does not possess. Hence in tracing the mission of the Church back to the Apostles, no lacunas can be allowed, no new mission can arise; but the mission conferred by Christ must pass from generation to generation through an uninterrupted lawful succession. The Apostles do not give it to the Church and then leave it in turn to those legitimately appointed by them, and these again select others to continue the work of the ministry. Any break in this succession destroys Apostolicity, because the break means the beginning of a new series, which is not Apostolic. "How shall they preach unless they be sent?" (Rom., x, 15). An authoritative mission to teach is absolutely necessary, a man-given mission is not authoritative. Hence any concept of Apostolicity that excludes authoritative union with the Apostolic mission robs the ministry of its Divine character. Apostolicity, or Apostolic succession, means that the mission that Jesus gave to His Apostles upon earth continues to Christ upon the Apostles must pass from them to their legitimate successors, in an unbroken line, until the end of the world. This notion of Apostolicity is evolved from the words of Christ Himself, the practice of the Apostles, and the teaching of the Fathers and theologians of the Church.

The intention of Christ is apparent from the passages of Holy Writ, which tell of the conferring of the mission upon the Apostles. "As the Father hath sent Me, I also send you" (John, xx, 21). The mission of the Apostles, like the mission of Christ, is a Divine mission; they are the Apostles, or ambassadors, of the Emperor Christ, who is given to Me in heaven and on earth. Going, therefore, teach ye all nations; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world" (Matt., xxviii, 18). This mission which Jesus has "constituted" He means that it must be transmitted with its Divine character until the end of time, i. e. there must be an unbroken lawful succession which is called Apostolicity. The Apostles understood their mission in this sense. St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans (x, 13-19), insists upon the necessity of a Divinely established mission. "How shall they preach unless they be sent?” (x, 15). In his letters to his disciples Timothy and Titus, St. Paul speaks of the obligation of preserving Apostolic doctrine, and of ordaining other disciples to continue the work entrusted to the Apostles. “Hold the form of sound words, which thou hast heard from me in faith and in love which is in Christ Jesus” (2 Tim., i, 13). “And the things which thou hast heard from me by many witnesses, the same commend to faithful men, who shall be fit to teach others also” (2 Tim., ii, 2).

“For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting and shouldst ordain priests in every city, as I also appointed thee” (Tit., i, 5). “The things that are written as the Acts of the Apostolic mission by lawfully appointing others to the work of the ministry, so their successors were to ordain priests to perpetuate the same mission given by Jesus Christ, i.e., an Apostolic mission must always be maintained in the Church.

The writings of the Fathers constantly refer to the Apostolic character of the doctrine and mission of the Church. See St. Polycarp, St. Ignatius, Epist. ad Smyrn., n. 8, St. Clement of Alex., St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Athanasius (History of Ariusism), Tertullian, Lib. de Precept. n. 32, etc. We quote a few examples which are typical of the testimony of St. Ireneus (Adv. Heres. IV, n. 2): “Wherefore we must obey the priests of the Church, who have succession from the Apostles,” etc.—quoted above. St. Clement (Ep. I, ad Cor., 42-44): “Christ was sent by God, and the Apostles by Christ. They appointed the above-named and then gave them command that when they came to die other approved men should succeed to their ministry.” St. Cyprian (Ep. 76, Ad Magnum): “Novatianus is not in the Church, nor can he be considered a bishop, because in contempt of Apostolic tradition he was ordained by himself without succeeding to any one.” Hence authoritative transmission of power, i.e., Apostolicity, is essential. In all theological works the same explanation of Apostolicity is found, based on the Scriptural and patristic testimony just cited. Billaud (III, 306) concludes his remarks on Apostolicity in the words of St. Jerome: “We must abide in that Church, which was founded by the Apostles, and not in Arses to this day.”

Mazella (De Relig. et Eccl., 359), after speaking of Apostolic succession as an uninterrupted substitution of persons in the place of the Apostles, insists upon the necessity of jurisdiction or authoritative transmission, thus excluding the hypothesis that a new Church is ever to be formed in the place of the mission bestowed by Christ and transmitted in the manner described. Billot (De Eccl. Christi, I, 243-275) emphasizes the idea that the Church, which is Apostolic, must be presided over by bishops, who derive their ministry and their governing power from the Apostles. Apostolicity, then, is that Apostolic succession by which the Church of to-day is one with the Church of the Apostles in origin, doctrine, and mission.

The history of the Catholic Church from St. Peter, the first Pontiff, to Pius X, the present Head of the Church, is an evident proof of its Apostolicity, for no break has shown in the line of succession. Cardinal Newman (Diff. of Anglicans, 369) says: “Say there is no church at all if you will, and at least I shall understand you; but do not meddle with a fact attested by mankind.” Again (393): “No other form of Christianity but this present Catholic Communion enables us to rest in the twofold shadow, the Christianity of antiquity, viewed as a living religion on the stage of the world;” and again, (395): “The immutability and uninterrupted action of the laws in question throughout the course of Church history is a plain note of identity between the Catholic Church of the first ages and that which now goes by that name.” If any break in the Apostolic succession had ever occurred, it could be easily shown, for no fact of such importance could happen in the history of the world without attracting universal notice. Regarding questions and contests in the election of certain popes, there is no real difficulty. In the few cases in which controversies arose, the matter was always settled by a competent tribunal in the Church, the lawful Pope was proclaimed, and he, as the successor of St. Peter, received the Apostolic mission and jurisdiction in the Church. (Tatian, III, 446). Again, the heretics of the early ages and the sects of the Middle Ages have attempted to falsify their teaching and practices by appealing to the doctrine of the Catholic Church, or to their early communion with the Catholic Church. Their appeal shows that the Catholic Church is regarded as Apostolic even by those who have separated from her communion.

Apostolicity is not found in any other Church. This is a necessary consequence of the unity of the Church. (See CHURCH, UNITY OF THE.) If there is but one true Church, and if the Catholic Church, as has just been shown, is Apostolic, the necessary inference is that no other Church is Apostolic. (See Newman, Diff. of Anglicans, 369, 393.) All sects that reject the Episcopate, by the very fact, make Apostolic succession impossible, since they destroy the channel through which the Apostolic mission is transmitted. Historically, the beginnings of all these Churches can be traced to a period long after the time of Christ and the Apostles. Regarding the Greek Church, it is sufficient to note that it lost Apostolic succession by withdrawing from the jurisdiction of the lawful successors of St. Peter in the See of Rome. The same is to be said of the Anglican claims to continuity (MacLauglin, The Divine Plan of the Church, 213; and, Newman, History of the Christian Church, II) for the case of separation destroys their jurisdiction. They have based their claims on the validity of orders in the Anglican Church (see ANGLICAN ORDERS). Anglican orders, however, have been declared invalid. But even if they were valid, the Anglican Church would not be Apostolic, for jurisdiction is essential to Apostolicity of mission. A study of the organization of the Anglican Church shows it to be entirely different from the Church established by Jesus Christ.

Apostolicum Pasendi Munus, a Bull issued by Clement XIII, 12 January, 1765, in defence of the Society of Jesus against the attacks made upon it. It relates that both privately and publicly the Society was the object of much calumny. On the other hand, the Society was the subject of praise on the part of bishops for the useful work its members were doing in their dioceses. To confirm this approval, and to counteract the calumnies which had been spreading throughout different countries, the Pope determined to establish the Society as it was originally constituted, approves its end, its method of work, and whatever socialities its members have under their charge.
Apostates (from Gr., ἀνατέλλωνεν, to renounce), the adherents of a heresy which sprang up in the third century and spread through the western and southern parts of Asia Minor. What little we know of this obscure sect we owe to the writings of St. Epiphanius. He tells us that they called themselves Apostates (i.e., renunciators) because they scrupulously renounced all private property; they also affected the name of Apostolici, because they pretended to follow the manner of life of the Apostles. The saint regards them as a branch of the Tatians, akin to the Euchemians and the Catharics. "The sacraments and mysteries are different from ours; they pride themselves upon extreme poverty, bring divisions into Holy Church by their foolish superstitions, and depart from the divine mercy by refusing to admit to reconciliation those who have once fallen, and like those from whom they have sprung, condemn marriage. In place of the Holy Scriptures, which they reject, they base their heresy on the apocryphal Acts of Andrew and Thomas. "They are altogether alien from the rule of the Church."

At the time when St. Epiphanius wrote, in the fourth century, they had become an insignificant sect, for in place of the worship of the sects of groups in Phrygia, Cilicia, and Pamphylia, whereas the Church of God, according to Christ's promise, has spread to the ends of the earth, and if marriage is an unholy thing, then they are doomed to speedy extinction, or else they must be born out of wedlock. In the name of the Father out of wedlock there was the sight that they then are impure. And if they are not impure, although born in wedlock, then marriage is not impure. . . . The Church praises renunciation, but does not condemn marriage; she preaches poverty, but does not intolerably inveigh against those who possess property inherited from their parents with which they support themselves and assist the poor; many in the church abstain from certain kinds of food, but do not look with contempt upon those who do not so abstain." St. Basil mentions these heretics in his Epistles. He gives them the name of Ανατελλόμενοι (Apostates) and says that they declared God's creatures defiled (σκώματα). They are also briefly mentioned by St. Augustine and by St. John Damascene. They were condemned in the Code of Theodosius the Great as a branch of the Manicheans.

BULDER.

Apotheosis (Gr. ἀπόθεσις, and θεός, deify), deification, the exaltation of men to the rank of gods. Closely connected with the universal worship of the dead in the history of all primitive peoples was the consecration as deities of heroes or rulers, as a reward for bravery or other great services. "In the same manner every city worshipped the one who founded it" (Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City, III, v). Because of the theocratic form of their government, and the religious character which sovereign power assumed in their eyes, the peoples of the great nations of the Orient—Persia, Chaldea, Egypt—owed divine honours to living rulers. Hero-worship had familiarized them with the idea that a human by illustrious deeds can become a god, and contact with the Orient made them ready to accept the grosser form of apotheosis by which divine honours were offered to the living (Boissier, La religion romaine, I, 112). Philip of Macedon was honoured as a god, Amphipolis, and his son, Alexander the Great, not only claimed descent from the god of Egypt, but decreed that he should be worshipped in the cities of Greece (Beurler, De divinis honoribus quos acciperunt Alexander et successoribus ejus, p. 17). After his death, and probably largely as the result of the teaching of Euhemerus, that all the gods were deified humanists, it is a custom prevalent among the Greeks (Dollinger, Heiden-} thum und Judenthum, 314 sqq.). In Rome the way for the deification of the emperors was prepared by many historic causes, such as the cult of the mages or the souls of departed friends and ancestors, the worship of the legendary kings of Rome. On the Indiges, the myth that Romulus had been transported to heaven, and the deification of Roman soldiers and statesmen by some of the Greek cities. The formal enrolement of the emperors among the gods began with Cesar, to whom the Senate decreed divine honours before his death. Through political motives Augustus, by endowing the building of temples and the organization of priestly orders in his honour throughout the provinces and even in Italy, refused to permit himself to be worshipped in Rome itself. Though many of the early emperors refused to receive divine honours, and the senate, to whose right of designation belonged, refused to confirm others, the great majority of the Roman rulers and many members of the imperial family, among whom were some women, were enrolled among the gods. While the cultured classes regarded the deification of members of the imperial family and court favourites with boldly expressed scorn, emperors, if not personal, was a powerful element of unity in the empire, as it afforded the pagans a common religion in which it was a patriotic duty to participate. The Christians constantly refused to pay divine honours to the emperor, and their refusal to strew incense at the time of the emperor's death was the signal that he was dead.

The custom of decreeing divine honours to the emperors remained in existence until the time of Gratian, who was the first to refuse the insignia of the Summus Pontifex and the first whom the senate failed to place among the gods.

Apparition. See VISIONS.

Apparitor, the official name given to an officer in ecclesiastical courts designated to serve the summons, to arrest a person accused, and, in ecclesiastico-civil procedure, to take possession, physically or formally, of the property in dispute, in order to secure the execution of the judge's sentence, in countries where the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in substantial integrity, is recognized. He thus acts as constable and sheriff. His guarantee of his delivery of the summons is evidence of the knowledge of the summoned of his obligation to appear, either to stand trial, to give testimony, or to do whatever else may be legally enjoined by the judge. This instrument becomes the basis of a charge of contumacy against anyone refusing to obey summons. The new summary form of procedure, granted by Leo XIII in 1880 to the bishops of Italy, provides, in articles XIV, for the elimination of this officer, yet necessary in some ecclesiastical courts: "Wherever for the delivery of the summons and not less than a week before, an appanator of the court, the defect may be supplied by designating a reliable person who shall certify to the fact, or by use of the system of registry of letters, where this prevails, and whereby is required an acknowledgment of delivery, receipt, or rejection." This is in force likewise in the form of procedure appointed for the Church in the United States.

Appeal as from an abuse (Appel comme d'abuse) was originally a recourse to the civil courts against the usurpation by the ecclesiastical forum of the rights of civil jurisdiction; and likewise a recourse to the ecclesiastical forum against the usurpation by the civil forum of the rights of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Thus defined, the "appeal as from an abuse" was, in itself, legitimate, because its object was to correct an abuse committed both by the State and of the Church. An abuse would be an act on either hand, without due authority, beyond the limits of their respective ordinary and natural jurisdictions. The canons (can. "Dilecto", in bk. VI of Decretals, "De sent. excom.", in ch. vi) did not exclude a recourse to the civil authority when the acts of ecclesiastic civil authority were beyond the limits of the same. Civil authority, especially as reciprocity gave the ecclesiastical authority the right to repel with the same weapons any usurpation by the lay judge to the damage of the rights of the Church. Thus also a recourse to the supreme civil ruler was not deemed amis when an ecclesiastical court undertook a cause belonging to the competency of a higher ecclesiastical court, and the ruler was asked (can. "Placuit" in Decree of Gratian, Pt. II, Q. I, ch. xi) merely to forward it to the proper tribunal, without, however, claiming to delegate to it any jurisdiction. Perhaps the first formal manifestation of this appeal in the legitimate sense was the Council of Trent. The ecclesiastical judges had acquired a reputation for greater learning and equity, and by the good will of the State, not merely ecclesiastical, but many civil cases of the lay were adjudicated by them. In 1529 complaint was brought to King Philip de Valois by the advocate general, Peter de Cugnibres, that the civil tribunals were fast lapsing into contempt, and were being abandoned. The purport of the complaint was to restrict the competency of the ecclesiastical tribunals to their own legitimate fields. Bickerings between the two forums were henceforth frequent. The Council of Trent, in the summer of the sixteenth century, advanced far in the way of frequent ruptures with the Church. When the Protestant states in the new revolution had acquired control and supervision over the newly reformed bodies even in their spiritual relations, the Catholic states, particularly France, strove to limit the jurisdiction of the Church as far as they could without casting aside the profession of the Catholic Faith. The Pragmatic Sanction was a serious aggression by France upon the acknowledged rights of the Church and of the Holy See. It is in France that we find the most fragrant series of encroachments on the jurisdiction of appeals as from an abuse, which resulted in substituting to civil tribunals questions of definitions of faith, the proper administration of the sacraments, and the like. This brought confusion into the regulation of spiritual matters by encouraging ecclesiastics to rebel against their lawful ecclesiastical superiors. The lay tribunals undertook to adjudge. First, whether the decrees of the State authorities had a right to refuse them to those deemed unworthy, or the right to Christian burial of Catholics dying impenitent or under Church censures; whether interdicts or suspensions were valid; whether monastic professions should be annulled; whether the monk's permission was necessary for preaching; whether the suppression of monasteries was not in the hands of the State, but in those of the Papacy; and also to decide the justice of canonical privations of benefices. Many other subjects intimately connected with the teaching of the Church were brought before lay tribunals, and unanswerable decisions rendered in open contradiction to the canons, as can easily be surmised both from the absence of theological knowledge, and from the visible animosities shown in decisions that undertook to subject the spiritual power of the Church to the dictates of transient politics. A Catholic government should respect the ecclesiastical canons. This was the interference of the Pope of the Inquisition of the Church and with the Church, and not the feeling of the Roman Emperors. It is true that the latter were occasionally called guardians of the canons, and that they often established these canons with the civil legislation of the Empire (see Acta Conciliorum, i. 25, 30, 31, MOCAN). This did not mean, however, that the Emperors were the source of the binding power of the canons, which was recognized as inherent in the pope and bishops as successors to the power of the Apostles to bind and loose, but that the duty of a Catholic empire was to aid in the enforcement of the ecclesiastical laws by the civil authority. The Church was recognized as autonomous in all things of the divine law and in matters of ecclesiastical discipline. We find the decennatals councils appealing to the emperors to put into force their decrees about the Faith, though no one should infer from this that they were judges of the faith. So, likewise, when Justinian inserts ecclesiastical disciplinary decrees in the civil code he explains (Novella, xliii): "we have thus decreed, following the canons of the holy Fathers." When rulers like Charlemagne seemed to take upon themselves undue authority, insisting upon certain canons, the bishops claimed their sole right to govern the Church. Even in mixed assemblies of bishops and nobles and princes, the bishops insisted that the civil power should not encroach upon the rights of the Church, e. g. in the case of Charles V. (Zimmerli, 29) did not hesitate to recognize, however, that in his day (the eighteenth century), as well as in former ages, the Catholic rulers of Catholic States, in their quality of protectors of the Church, might receive a recourse from ecclesiastics in ecclesiastical matters, in order that justice might be done them by their ordinary ecclesiastical judges, not as deputies of the civil rulers, but as ordinary judges in their own forum. In her concordats with Catholic states the Church, in view of the changed circumstances of society, has granted to several that the civil cases of clerics, and such as concern the property and temporal rights of ecclesiastics, if other ecclesiastical foundations, may be brought before the civil courts. Nevertheless, all ecclesiastical causes and those which concern the Faith, the sacraments, morals, sacred functions, and the rights connected with the sacred ministry, belong to the ecclesiastical forum, both in regard of persons and of matter (cf. Concordat with Ecuador in 1881). In the United States, as decreed by the Council of Baltimore (1837), the church law is that if any ecclesiastical person or member of a religious body, male or female, should cite an ecclesiastic or a religious before a civil court on a question of a purely ecclesiastical nature, trouble would be caused by the court to the person cited, unless recourse is had to the civil courts, there is not the means or the power of enforcing an ecclesiastical decision for the protection or recovery of one's own. A special proviso was made by Propaganda for the United States (17 August, 1856), that if a priest should bring a cleric before a civil tribunal on an eclesiastical or other question without permission from the bishop he could be forced to withdraw the case by the infliction of penalties and censures, yet the bishop must not refuse the permission if the parties have ineffectually attempted a settlement before him. If the bishop is to be cited, the permission must be with some delay. By a declaration of Propaganda (6 September, 1886), a cleric's transfer of a claim to a layman for the purpose of evading the censures is checked by the requirement of the consent of the bishop to such transfer, if made for the purpose of the suit. Justice Strong, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in his lecture on "Law to Church Policy" (p. 41), speaks of the Church as "an interior organization within a religious society," and adds (p. 42), "I think it may be safely asserted as a general principle that whenever questions of discipline, of faith, of Church rule, of membership, or of office, have been decided by the Church, in its own modes of decision, civil law tribunals accept these decisions as final and apply them as made."

Appeals.—The purpose of this article is to give a comprehensive view of the positive legislation of the Church on appeals belonging to the ecclesiastical forum; but it does not treat of the nature of the ecclesiastical forum itself nor of the rights of the Church and its supreme head, the pope, to receive appeals in ecclesiastical matters. For these and other similar questions see Pope, Primacy, Councils, Gallicanism, Ecclesiastical Forum.

I. Definition, Kinds, and Effects.—An appeal is a legal application to a higher authority for redress of a lower authority's act. The lower authority is called juez a quo (judge appealed); the higher authority, juez ad quem (appeal judge or court). Appeals are judicial and extrajudicial. A judicial appeal is one made against such acts as are performed by the lower authority, acting in the official capacity of judge at any stage of the judicial proceedings. Hence a judicial appeal is not only one taken from a final sentence, but such is also an appeal taken from an interlocutory sentence, viz. from a sentence given by the judge before pronouncing the final judgment. An extrajudicial appeal is one made against acts not performed by the inferior authority when not acting as judge, such as for instance a bishop's order to build a school, the election of a candidate to an office, and the like. Every appeal, when admissible, has an effect called devotissimo effectus, consisting in this, that the defendant cannot be heard by the appeal judge the right to take cognizance of, and also to decide, the case in question. Appeals have often also a suspensive effect, which consists in suspending the legal force of a judgment or an order so that the judge appealed is prevented from taking any further action in the case unless his action tends to favour the appellant in the exercise of his right of appeal.

II. Appeals in Church History.—The right of appeal is founded on the law of nature, which requires that a subject, bound as he is to abide by the action of a superior liable to err, should be supplied with some means of defence in case the latter, through ignorance or malice, should violate the laws of justice.

Accordingly, the sacred canons as early as the first ecclesiastical council allow clerics who believe themselves to have been wronged by their bishops to have recourse to higher authorities (Council of Nice, 325, can. 5). In the same century, and in the following centuries the same right is insisted upon in other councils, both local and universal. In the East mention of it is made in the councils of Antioch (341, c. 6, 11), and Chalcedon (451, can. 9). In the West it is met with in the councils of Carthage (390, can. 5; 397, can. 10; and 398, can. 86), Mileve (can. 22), Vannes (465, can. 9), Vienne (442), Orleans (538, can. 20). According to these canons the court of appeal was that of the neighbouring bishops of the provincial synod; and there is mention of the metropolitan with the other bishops in documents of the Council of the Emperor Constantine (Council of Arles, 314, can. 86; of Miletus, 588, can. 26; Council of Frankfort, 794). But as the provincial councils came to be held less frequently, the right of receiving appeals from any bishop of a province remained with the metropolitan alone; a practice which was repeatedly sanctioned in the Decretals (c. 11, X, De offic. ord., 1, 31; c. 66, X, de appel. II, 28), and has never since been abandoned. Though the right of appeal was never denied, it had to be kept within the proper bounds in order that what was allowed as a means of just defence should not be used for evading or putting obstacles to the administration of justice.

In this canonical legislation followed several of the rules laid down in the Roman civil law (Corpus Juris Civilis), e. g. those prescribing the limits of the time available for entering an appeal (Nov. 23, C. 1; c. 32, X, De elect., I, 6), or finishing the case appealed (1, 5, De temporibus...appellationum, c. VII, 63). The same is true of laws excluding certain appeals which are rightly presumed to be made for no other reason than in order to retard the execution of a sentence justly pronounced (1, un. C. Ne licet in unam edemque causae, VII, 70; c. 65, X, De appel., II, 28).

In several points, however, the sacred canons were less rigorous, either by leaving more to the discretion of the judge appealed in cases of laws intended for his benefit or interpreting more liberally laws imposing strictures on the appellant in the exercise of his right (c. 2, De appel. Clem., II, 12; 1, 24, De appel., VII, 62; 1, un D. De libellis dimissor., XXIX, 6). Moreover, if abuses crept in, they were checked by the sacred canons, as appears from the enactments of popes and councils of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, embodied in the authentic collections of the "Corpus Juris Canonici", in the title "De appelationibus". Thus we see, in 1181, the Third Lateran Council (c. 26, X, De appel., II, 28) forbidding subjects to appeal from ecclesiastical discipline, and at the same time preventing bishops and other prelates from taking undue measures against their subjects when the latter were about to use their right of appeal. Again, in 1215, we see the Fourth Lateran Council (c. 10, De offic. ord., I, 31) insisting that appeals must be made in time, while taking legal action for correcting or reforming morals.

These and other similar wise regulations were enforced again by the Council of Trent (Sess. 22, c. 7, De reform.; c. 3, De appel., in 6). Especially did this council provide that the regular administration of a diocese should not suffer from appeals. Thus, besides forbidding (Sess. 22, c. 1, De ref.) that appeals or different lawsuits should be made by way of appeal or remonstrance for the reformation of morals and correction of abuses, it mentioned explicitly several acts of pastoral administration which were not to be hampered by appeals (c. 5, Sess. 7, De ref.; c. 7, Sess. 21, De ref.; c. 18, Sess. 24, De ref.), and it ordained that appeals should not be made by way of appeal while visiting his diocese (c. 10, Sess. 24, De ref.).

Moreover, in order to protect the authority of local ordinaries, it prescribed that if cases of appeals of a criminal nature had to be turned over to judges outside the Roman Curia by pontifical authority, they should be delegated to the metropolitan or the highest bishop from among them. Finally, this council provides that appeals should not cause unnecessary delays in the course of a trial, where it forbade (as the Roman law had done) appeals from interlocutory sentences, admitting only a few necessary exceptions (c. 1, Sess. 13, De ref.; c. 20, Sess. 24, De ref.). The decrees of the Council of Trent and other pontifical laws, framed for the purpose of reconciling freedom of appeal with the prompt exercise of episcopal jurisdiction in matters admitting of no delay, were too important to be allowed to go into desuetude, and were embodied by Benedict XIV in his constitution "Ad militantis", 20 December 1742, n. 174.

After this brief reference to the main sources of the laws concerning ecclesiastical appeals—the "Corpus Juris Canonici", the "Corpus Juris Civilis", the Council of Trent, the Const. "Ad militantis",—it only remains to mention the Instruction of 11 June, 1880, sent to the Italian hierarchy by the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, containing rules for a summary procedure (also in the matter of appeals) to be used by bishops in trying criminal cases. This same Instruction with a few changes was sent a few years later by the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda to the hierarchy of the United States of North America. In the following paragraphs we shall refer to these two documents by calling them respectively Instr. Sacra, and Instr. Cum magnopere.

III. PRESENT LEGISLATION.—1. Persons possessing the right of appeal. The right of appeal is granted to all, except such as are excluded by the law. The law excludes: (1) Those who have renounced their right, either expressly, or tacitly, for instance by not appealing within the prescribed time. (2) Those who have been condemned in their absence, when such absence was due to contumacy. (3) Those who have disregarded the law to his adversary, while the appeal of the latter was pending. (4) Those against whom three sentences (all in the very same case) have been passed. (5) Those who besides having confessed their crime in court have been also fully convicted by legal proofs. (6) The party who of his own accord chose not to make use of the poteo, or the proof called juramentum litis decisorum (decisive oath). (7) Excommunicated persons are forbidden to appeal from extrajudicial acts; though, unless they areviandent (see EXCOMMUNICATION), their appeal can be admitted if in court nobody objects; and moreover, the viandent, are admitted when their contention is that their excommunication was invalid, and in a few more cases in which equity or the common good requires that they should be heard.

2. Cases in which appeals are admitted.—Appeals are admitted in all cases not excepted by the law; they should have no appeal if the crime is evidently notorious. (2) Against an interlocutory sentence or order, except in the following cases: (a) when the interlocutory judgment is equivalent to a final sentence, because it is such that a final sentence cannot be expected, for instance when the judge has decided on the basis of proofs; (b) when such interlocutory decision or order takes place during a trial which admits no appeal from its final sentence, as happens in the case of one against whom two sentences have already been passed; (c) when, in general, the injury is such that it cannot be remedied by a new sentence pronounced by an appeal from the final sentence, as is the case when the penalty inflicted is such that no further action can annul its effects. To distinguish the interlocutory sentences under (a) from those under (b) and (c), the former will be called quasi-final sentences, and the latter purely interlocutory sentences. (3) The appeal is not taken from an appeal, from an act of the party (i.e., from an act of justice). (4) From sentences pronounced ex in forma con scientia. (5) In cases settled by transaction (compromise), or decided by arbitrators to whom the parties had of their own accord referred the settlement of their disputes. (6) Whenever the appeal is evident a frivolous one, being altogether groundless.

3. When appeals have a suspensive effect.—In cases not excepted in the preceding paragraphs the general rule is that judicial appeals, besides having the devolutive effect common to all appeals, have also a suspensive effect. Some authors hold the suspensive principle with regard to extrajudicial appeals and base their assertion on c. 10, De appel., in sexto (II, 15) and on c. 51, 52, X, De appel. (II, 28). Others deny that an extrajudicial appeal, as such, has a suspensive effect, because it is not an appeal properly so called, but they hold that it has this effect as a praescroci et ad causam (a legal application for a cause or suit). Hence extrajudicial appeal has this suspensive effect only while the cause or suit is pending, that is, from the time when the appellate judge admits the appeal and begins to examine the case (Ut lite pendente nihil innovetur, Decretals of Gregory IX, Book II, tit. 16). But neither judicial nor extrajudicial appeals have a suspensive effect in cases expressly excepted by the law. Accordingly:—

(1) An appeal has no suspensive effect (a) when it is taken from any act which inflicts a censure properly so called (viz., a censure having the characteristic of being a punishment of a temporal character, such as a suspension from his right to a salary; or, finally, to the case when the censure either has only been threatened, or it has been inflicted conditionally, and the condition under which it would be incurred has not yet been verified. (2). An appeal has only a suspensive effect when the judge appeals to the appeal to a new sentence granted to him with the clause appellatione remota, provided the case is not one of those expressly mentioned by the law as admitting an appeal. In these cases the appeal may have also a suspensive effect. (3) Appeals have no suspensive effect in the cases laid down in the Const. "Ad militantis" of Benedict XIV. With regard to this document the following points are worthy of notice: (a) This constitution does not contain new laws, but only confirms already existing enactments and restores them to their former vigour, if obsolete (§ 48). (b) In the cases which it enumerates it forbids in general that appeal which should have no appeal if the crime is evidently notorious. (c) Not even the suspensive effect is forbidden, where, in matters referred to in this constitution, the preceding legislation allowed it. Thus it has been authoritatively declared that if a bishop, whether in performing his diocesan visitation or in taking measures for correcting morals at any other time, proceeds against a cleric judicially, the appeals from such judgments must have a suspensive effect [Decretal of Clement VIII, 16 October, 1600, n. viii; Sacred Congr. of the Council, reported by Pallottini (Collectio Dectorum S. C. C. vol. I., Appellatio, § 1, nn. 98 sq.)]. Besides these universal laws, there may be particular enactments forbidding, with the sanction of the Holy See, suspensive appeals (Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, n. 296).

4. The Appellate Judge. (1) The appellate judge must belong to a higher court than that of the judge appellee. Hence no appeal is possible from the pope or an eccenmical council. From the Roman Congregations appeals properly so called are not admitted. Again, one cannot appeal to a bishop from his vicar-general acting as ordinary, because when acting as such the vicar-general is an official not judicially distinct from the bishop; nor can one appeal to a metropolitan, either from bishops exempt from metropolitan jurisdiction or from bishops acting in their capacity as legates. (2) Moreover, an appeal has to be taken to the judge who is immediately superior to the judge appellee, except when this immediate superior is unable, physically or morally, to receive the appeal, and also when the appellant wishes to appeal to the pope's representative (a legate, or a nuncio, or a delegate apostolic having the power of a legate) or directly to the Holy See (that is, to the Sacred Congreg. of the Propaganda, from missionary countries; to the Sacred Congreg. of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs from South America and countries subject to this Congregation; and, from any other country, to the Congregation competent in the matter in question). However, the Holy See does not always admit appeals in cases not yet tried on first appeal before the metropolitan.

According to this rule: (a) From a bishop, dioecesan or of a see, from the vicar-capitular or administrator the appeal has to be made to the metropolitan. (b) From the sentence passed by a metropolitan in second instance the appeal has to be made either to the Holy See or to its representative as above. The same holds good for an appeal taken from the sentence pronounced by a metropolitan in first instance, by a suspensive appeal to the nearest metropolitan (Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, n. 316). In the case of a metropolitan subject to a patriarch possessing patriarchal rights, the court of appeal from the metropolitan will be the court of the patriarch. (c) From a legate or a delegate representative having the power of a legate, no appeal lies except to the Holy See. (d) In the case of a sentence passed by a judge acting in virtue of delegated jurisdiction, the appeal has to be made to the judge by whom the jurisdiction was delegated.

5. The Appeal itself.—A. Time. For entering an appeal the peremptory term of ten days is allowed, after which term the appeal is not admitted. In judicial cases the ten days are counted from the time when the sentence was pronounced, if the party was there present, or from the moment when the party knew of it, if the sentence was passed in his absence. The Instr. Sacra, art. 39, and Cum magn., art. 38, as soon as the appeal has been entered, the judge appellee has to forward the entire original acts of the case to the appellate court. In extraordinary appeals, by a suspensive appeal to the pope or letters containing the certificate of appeal. Hence the appellate judge is not required to ask for them, and consequently there can be no question of the peremptory term of thirty days available for demanding them, nor of the next peremptory term for presenting them. On the other hand, in keeping with the same instructions, the appellate judge, having received the acts and taken cognizance of the appeal, has to notify the appellant that within twenty days (according to the Instr. Sacra, art. 40) or thirty days (according to the Instr. Cum magn., art. 39) he must appoint his counsel, to be approved by the same appellate judge; or the case has to be made peremptory, so that if the appellant does not make the said appointment in time the appellate judge will formally pronounce the right of appeal to be forfeited. C. Judgment on the admissibility of the appeal. The appellate judge, on receiving the said thirty days from the time the appeal was received, must examine whether the appeal is legitimate; hence he should make sure: (a) that the case is not one of those in which appeal is not permitted; (b) that the appellant is not one of those persons excluded by the law; (c) that he has appealed within the prescribed time; (d) that there are sufficient grounds for the appeal.—D. Inhibitions. Once the appellate judge has ascertained that the appellant has legitimately appealed, and that the appeal is not one of those that have only a devolutive effect, he has the right to, in the judge appellee's judgment letters called inhibitory, forbidding him to take further action in the case.—E. Attentates. Finally, it is the duty of the appellate judge to reverse what are called attentates (attentata), if there are any; by which term is meant whatever (in the case of an appeal having a suspensive effect) the judge appellee may have done prejudicial to the appeal letters of the time when his jurisdiction was suspended.—F. Withdrawal of the appeal. Prior to the time when the appellate court begins to try the case, the appellant is allowed by the law to withdraw his appeal, even if the appellant does not consent. Once, however, the appellate court has begun to try the case, the appellant is no longer free to renounce his appeal unless the appellee agrees to it.—G. Judgment of the case on appeal. The appellant having done what is required on his part for introducing his appeal, the appellate judge allows him a fixed time for presenting whatever he wishes to allege in his own favour, and at the same time denies prejudicial to the appeal letters of the time when his jurisdiction was suspended. In this trial the law does not allow new actions, that is, claims which are different from the main point at issue in the first instance and which would rather constitute a new controversy not yet tried by the judge appellee. In an appeal the final sentence of the final sentence the judge is allowed to admit new evidence, whether to prove what was already alleged but not sufficiently proved, or to prove a new allegation; provided this has a close bearing on the main point at issue in the first trial and is not equivalent to a new action; the same right should be granted to the appellees in his reply. In an appeal from a purely interlocutory sentence new evidence is not allowed, and the court in forming its decision must confine itself to the evidence deduced from the acts of the first trial. The formalities to be observed in the trial of the case on appeal do not differ from those of the first instance. The case ought to be tried and finished within one year from the time when the appeal was interposed, or within two years where there is sufficient cause for delay. If the appellate judge through his own fault does not prosecute his appeal during this time he will be considered as having abandoned his appeal, and his time fixed by law cannot be shortened by the appellate judge except for some reason of common good, nor can it be extended except with the consent of both parties. The sentence by which the second instance is ended must contain a declaration as to the justice or injustice of the previous judgment, by which declaration that judgment is confirmed or reversed.

6. Appeals to the Roman Congregations.—In appeals to the Roman Congregations, substantially the same rules are observed. Within the peremptory term of ten days the appellant must interpose his appeal before the judge appellee, who will immediately inform the cardinals of the process to the Congregation. Before the case is discussed in the Congregation, a judge-referee (ordinarily one of the cardinals) is appointed, whose duty is to report the case to the Congregation for decision. He fixes the day when the Congregation will consider and decide the case. Before this date the judge-referee issues a summary of the acts of the whole case together with the written defenses prepared by the lawyers or procurators of the parties. These lawyers and procurators are also allowed to explain by word of mouth their written information. At the appointed day the case is proposed to the Congregation, and decided by it, after the cardinals have heard the report of the judge-referee. The decision has the force of a judicial sentence. Against it there is no true appeal; but the Congregation grants another means of redress called beneficium naves auditu damae. Since, however, the Congregation adds to its decision the words et amplius (a clause meaning that the case should not be presented again), it is more difficult to obtain a new hearing, which is granted only for new and very strong reasons. Finally, when the time within which the petition for a new hearing must be presented has elapsed without presentation, or when, after such a new hearing is not granted, the Congregation, on request made by the parties, will forward to them a rescript containing an official communication of the sentence. Cases are sometimes tried in the Roman Curia in a simpler form (economic). This is done for the sake of the parties, whose expenses are thus reduced, since in this kind of process they are not required to have lawyers, but whatever can be alleged in support of their rights is brought to the notice of the cardinals in a report officially drawn up, and to this report, in more important cases, is added the opinion of two consultants of the Congregation.

7. Means of redress available where appeals are not admitted.—A. Querela nullitatis (Complaint of nullity). Against a sentence which is invalid the legal remedy is not appeal, which is made only against an unjust sentence, but the complaint of nullity. This complaint of nullity differs from an appeal in the following points: (a) It can be proposed within thirty years, nay, indefinitely, if the sentence be such that its enforcement happens to be an occasion to sin (such as would be the sentence treating as valid a marriage contracted with an impediment which cannot be removed by the nullity of the parties). (b) One is allowed to make this complaint to the same judge who passed the sentence, unless this judge has been delegated for a particular case. (c) It has no suspensive effect, unless the nullity is evident. B. Restitutio in integrum (Restoration to the original condition). When one has failed to lodge an appeal within the time prescribed, and this has happened because it was impossible for him to act, the law grants what is called restitution in integrum. This restitution is, in general, that remedy by means of which one who has suffered damage, because prevented from acting, can be restored to the condition in which he was before the damage took place. (See Commentators on the Decretals, Book I, title 41.) C. Recursus (Recourse). In all cases when appeals are forbidden, one can make use of the remedy called recursus, which, strictly speaking, is an act by which one petitions the Holy See to grant him redress in a case in which the law does not recognize the right of appeal. This recourse differs from an appeal in the following points: (a) it is an extraordinary remedy; (b) it can be granted only by the Holy See; (c) it has no suspensive effect.

Appetite (ad, to pote, to seek), a tendency, an inclination, or direction. As it is used by modern writers, the word appetite has a psychological meaning. It denotes 'an organic need represented in consciousness by certain sensations. The appetites generally recognized are those of hunger, thirst, and sex; yet the need of air, the need of exercise, and the need of sleep come under the definition of appetite. The term appetence or appetency applies not only to organic needs, but also in a general manner to other conative tendencies in man, such as his own satisfaction in some state or result; to conative tendencies of all sorts (Baldwin, Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology, s. v. Appetite, Appetence.) For the schoolmen, appetitus had a far more general signification, which we shall briefly explain. (References are to St. Thomas's works.) Appetite includes all forms of internal inclination (Summa Theol., I-II, Q. viii, a. 1; Quest. disputate, De veritate, Q. xxxii, a. 1). It is found in all beings, even in those that are unconscious. The inclination to what is good and suitable, and consequently the aversion to what is evil, for the avoidance of evil is a good—are included. They may be directed towards a thing that is absent or towards one that is actually present. Finally, in conscious beings, it is not restricted to organic needs or lower tendencies, but extends to the highest and noblest aspirations. Two main kinds of appetite are recognized by the schoolmen: one unconscious, or natural; the other conscious, or elicitus, subdivided into sensible and rational. From their very nature, all beings have certain tendencies, affinities, and forms of activity. The term natural appetite includes all these. It means the inclination of an object to that which is in accord with its nature, without and against the will of the reason why such a thing is acceptable. This tendency originates immediately in the nature of each being, and remotely in God, the author of that nature (Quest. disp., De veritate, Q. xxv, art. 1). The appetitus elicitus follows knowledge. Knowledge is the possession by the mind of an object in its ideal form, whereas appetite is the tendency towards the thing thus known, but considered in its objective reality (Quest. disp., De veritate, Q. xxxii, a. 10). But as knowledge is of two specifically different kinds, so also is the appetite (Summa Theol., I, Q. lxxxi, a. 2). The appetitus sentientius, also called animalia, follows intuition. It is the inclination towards a thing that has a certain faculty; its functions are not functions of the sole alone, but of the body also. It tends primarily "to a concrete object which is useful or pleasurable," not to the "reason itself of its appetibility". The appetitus rationalis, or will, is a faculty of the spiritual soul, following intellectual knowledge, tending to the good as such and not primarily to concrete objects. It tends these in so far as they are known to participate in the abstract and perfect goodness conceived by the intellect (Quest. disp., De veritate, Q. xxv, a. 1). In the natural and the sensitive appetites there is no freedom. One is necessitated by the law of nature itself, the other by the sense-apprehension of a concrete thing as pleasant and useful. The will, on the contrary, is not necessitated by any concrete good, because no concrete good fully realizes the concept of perfect goodness which alone can necessarily draw the will. In this is to be found the fundamental reason of the freedom of the will (Quest. disp., De veritate, Q. xxv, a. 1). The sensitive appetite is divided into appetitus concupiscibilis and appetitus irascibilis, according as its object is apprehended simply as good, useful, or pleasurable, or as being obtainable only with difficulty and by the overcoming of obstacles (Summa Theol., I, Q. lxxxi, a. 5; Q. lxxxi, a. 8; I-I, Q. xxiii, a. 1; Quest. disp., De veritate, Q. xxv, a. 2). All the manifestations of the sensitive appetite are called passions. In the scholastic terminology this word has not the limited signification in which it is commonly used to-day. There are six passions for the concupiscible appetite: love and hatred, desire and aversion, hope and fear, and five for the irascible appetite: hope and despair, courage, fear, and anger (Summa Theol., I-II, Q. xxxiii, a. 4).

In man are found the natural, the sensitive, and the rational appetites. Certain of man's natural appetites have their satisfaction in some personal interest, e. g. conservation of life, health, physical and mental welfare and perfection. Some of them regard the interest of other men, and some relate to God. Such inclinations, however, although springing immediately from human nature, become conscious and deliberate in many of their determinations (Summa Theol., I, Q. ix, a. 3, 4, 5). The tendency of the various faculties to perform their appropriate functions is also a natural appetite, but not a distinct faculty (Summa Theol., I, Q. lxxx, art. 1, ad 3; Q. lxxxvii, art. 1, ad 3). The sensitive appetite in man is under the control of the will and can be strengthened or checked by the will's determination. Control, however, is not absolute, for the sensitive appetite depends on organic conditions, which are not regulated by reason. Frequently, also, owing to its suddenness or intensity, the outburst of passion cannot be repressed (Summa Theol., I, Q. lxxxi, a. 3; I-II, Q. xvii, a. 7; Quest. disp., De veritate, Q. xxv, a. 4). On the other hand, the sensitive appetite exerts a strong influence on the will, both because the passions modify organic conditions and thus influence all cognitive faculties, and because their intensity may prevent the mind from applying itself to the higher operations of intelligent and voluntary action (Summa Theol., I-I, Q. ix, a. 3; Q. xxxii, a. 1). The theory of appetite has various applications in theology. It affects the solution of such problems as man's desire for God, the consequences of original sin, and the perfection of Christ's humanity. It is of importance also in questions concerning the natural moral law, responsibility, virtue, and vice, the influence of passion as a determinant of human action. Among the medieval theologians, St. Thomas held that intelligent creatures desire naturally to behold the essence of God. The knowledge which they have of Him through His works serves only to lead them to immediate vision. Scotus, while admitting this desire as a natural tendency in man, claimed that it could not be realized without the assistance of grace. The discussion of the problem was continued by the commentators of St. Thomas, and it has been revived by modern theologians. Cf. Sestili, "De naturali intelligentia animae appetitum intuendi divinam essentiam" (Rome, 1896).

Appianus, Saint. See Aphian.

Approbation, an act by which a bishop or other legitimate superior grants to an ecclesiastic the actual exercise of his ministry. The plenitude of ecclesiastical power given by Christ to His Apostles resides solely in the bishops. From the bishop, who is the head of the Church, the government and care of souls, namely, the dispensing of doctrine and of the sacraments. The helpers with whose aid the bishop exercises his pastoral ministry are the parish priests, their vicars and co-workers. These possess the power by virtue of the episcopal delegation, transmitted by means of many acts differing one from the other. The permanent capability and the appointment to the service of the Church in general are transmitted by means of Holy orders. The actual appointment to the exercise of ministry in a determined sphere springs from the conferring of an ecclesiastical office, to which, in accord with the spirit of the Church, is recognized as a permanent charge, and hence should not be given except after a special proof of fitness by him who is invested therewith. Even when a priest, by Holy orders and appointment to a charge, is made capable of the pastoral ministry and is suspended from the exercise of his duties, his jurisdiction still depends upon the will and faithfulness of the mandatory; and at the same time other extensive variable circumstances, v. g. the actual situation of the Church or the spirit of the times, may determine now an extension, now a restriction, and at times suspension or revocation of the delegated power. From this it follows that, besides orders and the appointment to a charge, a special act of delegation is necessary for the actual exercise of the pastoral ministry. Hence the word approbation is appropriate to keep the co-workers of the bishop alert, to remind them of their dependence, to give them the facility to hear, the confession of his subjects. The Council of Trent, quoted above, decrees: "Although in the practice of absolving from sins, nevertheless the Holy Synod ordains that no one, even though he be a regular, is able to hear the confessions of seculars, not even of priests, and that he is not to be reputed fit there unto, unless he either holds a parochial benefice or is, by the bishops, after an examination if they shall think it necessary, or in some other way, judged fit and has obtained their approbation, which shall be granted gratuitously—any privileges and custom whatsoever, though immemorial, to the contrary notwithstanding." This is the basis of the actual discussion in such matters. St. Giovanni Berlusconii, in his "Summa de能is," Book III, Tract. XXI, (sect. 3, tract. xxi) says that before the Council of Trent a parish priest by law could validly and lawfully give jurisdiction to any priest who had the proper qualifications of the natural and divine law to hear confessions, without approbation or jurisdiction from the bishop. The Council of Trent withdrew this by its requirement of the approbation of the bishop. A parish priest has from his "parochial benefice" the implied approbation of the bishop and ordinary power to hear the confessions of his own parishioners, even outside his parish or diocese.

By bishop is meant also his vicar-general, or the vicar, or even a very heated administrator of a see, also any regular prelate having ordinary jurisdiction over a certain territory. This approbation may be given orally or in writing, and may be given indirectly, as when, for instance, priests receive power to choose in their own diocese an approver or other diocesan of their confessor. The bishop may wrongfully but validly give approbation, without which no priest may hear confessions. Approbation ceases at the time fixed, by revocation of the bishop, if attached to a benefice; by the loss of the benefice; also by censure, if inflicted publicly; if the censure is inflicted privately, the exercise of jurisdiction is unlawful but valid. The pope may grant this jurisdiction to those who have the essential requirements in any part of the world, and to whomsoever he thinks fit. A bishop may grant it likewise in his own diocese, and superiors of regulars to their subjects. By custom an approbation is validly given to any one of the diocese in which he is approved. An approved confessor may hear the confessions of those coming from another diocese who come in good faith, and not fraudulently to escape the reservations of their own diocese. An approved confessor may absolve from the cases "reserved" in another diocese, but only from those reserved in his own. A confessor's jurisdiction may be restricted to various classes of persons, e. g. to children, or to men, without the right to hear women. A special approbation is required to hear nuns or women of religious communities, and this extends with modifications to all communities of recognized sisterhoods. A confessor approved for one convent is not presumed to be approved for all. A confessor having temporary jurisdiction for "reserved cases" may continue to exercise it in any case begun before the lapse of the appointed time. The priest travelling on the high seas, if he be approved by his own diocesan, may validly hear it respect to the cases of his companions during the whole journey, even if from time to time the vessel put into a port or ports outside the jurisdiction of said ordinary (S. C. Inq., 4 April, 1900).

Approbation given in a general way does not cease at the death of the giver. Approbation may be revoked, and restricted to a place, time, and persons, according to the judgment of a bishop. By the decree quoted of the Council of Trent, regulars must obtain the approbation of the bishops to hear the confessions of seculars, even of priests. This general clause was inserted to put an end to the spurious and erroneous approbations that had arisen from privileges granted to the regulars. In 1215 the Fourth Lateran Council had decreed that all the faithful of either sex who had reached the use of reason should confess to their own (parish) priest at least once a year. If any should wish to confess to another priest, permission should be obtained from their own priest; otherwise, the absolution should be void. Shortly after this council the popes granted many privileges to the members of the Franciscan and Dominican Orders of friars lately established, and exhorted the bishops to allow them to preach in public squares or churches and to hear confessions in their currency. In the dissensions between the friars and the secular clergy brought from Boniface VIII., in 1299, an edict requiring a request to the bishop that certain selected friars should receive permission to hear confessions. If the bishops refused, he by his plenary power authorized the friars to hear confessions to the same extent as the parish priests. Benedict XI, in 1304, increased this privilege, but Clement V, in 1311, restricted the privileges to those granted by Boniface VIII. At times the dissensions and disputes in the various countries of Europe between the bishops and secular priests and the friars became very heated. As an instance of the extent of these controversies in England and Ireland occurs in the "Catholic University Bulletin" (April, 1905, 195 sqq.), which gives the details of the arraignment of the mendicant friars by the celebrated Fitz Ralph, Archbishop of Armagh, in 1357, before Innocent VI at Avignon. The Council of Constance took to remit the difficulties by restricting the privileges of the regulars, mainly in those things connected with the care of souls and the administration of the sacraments, which it sought to replace directly under the control of the bishops. The privileges of the mendicant friars had been extended to other orders; in particular, to the Society of Jesus.
During the period of Queen Elizabeth's persecution of Catholics an archpriest was appointed by Rome with episcopal authority to govern the secular priests in England. By decree of Urban VIII., 6 May, 1631, papalrubrics, especially those which determined in a special way this person or thing. In theology, appropriation is used in speaking of the different Persons of the Trinity. It consists in attributing certain names, qualities, or operations to one of the Persons, not, however, to the person as such, but in preference to the other. The qualities and names thus appropriated belong essentially to all the Persons; yet, according to our understanding of the data of revelation and our theological concepts, we consider some of these characteristics or names as belonging to one Person rather than to another, or as determining more clearly this particular Person. Thus we consider the Father as particularly characterized by omnipotence, the Son by wisdom, and the Holy Ghost by love, though we know that the three have essentially and by nature an equal omnipotence, wisdom, and love (cf. St. Thomas, Summa Theologica, I, Q. xxxix, n. 3; Franzelin, De Deo Trino, i, Th. xi, 216). Appropriation is not merely arbitrary; it is based on our knowledge of the Trinity, which knowledge has its sources and rules in Revelation (Scripture and tradition) and in the analogies which our reason discovers between created things and persons and the Persons of the Trinity. As these persons are represented in Revelation, to us, the analogical and supereminent way, and we appropriate to each Person of the Trinity the names, qualities, or operations which in creatures are the consequences or properties of this characteristic. Appropriation, therefore, has its source in Revelation, and it has its foundation and rule in the very characteristic way in which the personal personality in the Trinity and the relations existing between the essential properties of the Divine Nature and this constitutive characteristic of each person—these relations in God being known by analogy with the relations existing between these same properties and this same characteristic in creatures (St. Thomas, loc. cit.; Franzelin, loc. cit.). Among the names used in speaking of the Persons of the Trinity, the name God is often appropriated to the Father, the name Lord to the Son, the name Spirit, in the sense of immaterial substance, to the Third Person. Among the Divine attributes, eternity is appropriated to the Father, immutability to all things; beauty to the Son, Who, proceeding by way of intelligence, is the perfect image of the Father; fruition of the Holy Ghost, Who proceeds through love. Again, unity is appropriated to the Father, truth to the Son, and goodness to the Holy Ghost. Among the attributes, creation, omnipotence is appropriated to the Father, with all the operations which it implies, especially creation; wisdom and its works, especially the order of the universe, to the Son; and to the Holy Ghost, charity and its works, especially sanctification (cf. Denzinger, Enchiridion, n. 5, 3, etc., 17, 47). Again, efficient causality and the things appropriated to the Father; exemplary causality with the organisation of all things, to the Son; final causality with the conservation and perfecting of all things, to the Holy Ghost [cf. St. Thom., “Summa Theol.”, I, Q., xxxix, a. 8; E. Dubois, “De Exemplario Divino”, XII., § 4 (Rom., 1977)]. The progressive theo-physiological method or theory is of comparatively recent origin. But from the begining of Christianity, it was used as a spontaneous expression of the Catholic conception of the Trinity.
It has its source, as already said, in Scripture and in tradition. In Scripture it is used notably by St.
Isidore, I, 3; vi, 4; John Chrysostom, Hom. in i, 3; xi, 31; cf. also, I Pict., i, 3). In tradition it is expressed especially in the formulas of faith, or Symbols (cf. Denninger, “Enchiridion”, n. 2-13, 17, 47); in liturgy, and especially in doxologies (cf. Dom Cabrol, “Le livre de la prière antique”, xix, Poitiers, 1900); in inscriptions and pictures (Franzelin, op.
cit.; H. Marucchi, “Études d’archéologie chrétientienne”, Rome, 1900). As early as the third century with Origens, later with St. Gregory of Nyssa, St. Basil, St. Gregory Nazianzen, and others, the Greek Fathers speak of the κλάδων, or divine appellations, though it cannot be said that they furnished a theory of apostles. (De Dévotio. Etudes de théologie positive sur la S. Trinité, études xvii, xxxv, Paris, 1898). This theory is established by the Latin Fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries, especially by St. Hilary, “De Trinitat.”, II, n. 1; P. L., t.,
col. 50; St. Augustine, “De Trinitat.”, VI, x, P. L., col. 16, 363; St. Ioannes Cassian, “De Pentecoste”, LXXVI, iii, P. L., t., IV, col. 405.

In the Middle Ages, the theory was accepted, completed, and systematically taught by the Schoolmen (cf. St. Bonaventure: In I Sent. dist., xxxiv, q. iii;

APSE

(Lat., apsis or absides, Ionic Gr., abis, an arch), the semicircular or polygonal terminal to the choir or aisles of a church. A similar termination is time sometimes given to transcepts and naves. The term in ecclesiastical architecture generally denotes that part of the church where the clergy are seated or the altar placed. It was so called from being usually domed or vaulted, and was so used by the Greeks and Romans. The term is sometimes applied to a county hall or an altar; a dome at each end of each aisle of a room; the bishop’s seat in old churches; a reliquary;
a recess, semicircular in plan, covered over with a vault in the shape of a semi-dome or any other description of roof. The apse is always solid below, though generally broken by windows above. The cap is an apse, always enveloped by an enclosure of columns on the ground floor, and opening into an aisle, which again opens into three or more apsidal chapels. Sometimes the apse is a simple semicircle; out of this, in some large churches, a smaller semi-circle springs, as Becket’s crown at Canterbury, and as in the churches at Sens, Langres, and many others in Europe. Sometimes the apse is a sort of cluster of chapels, as at Beauvais, Troyes, Tours, etc. The detail of late date at Le Mans is composed of no less than five apses, one being twice the depth of the others, and forming the Lady Chapel. Large circular and polygonal apses generally have radiating chapels within, as at Westminster Abbey. The term apse was first used in reference to a Roman basilica, of which it was a characteristic feature. The term was also used by Mars Ulterius. It is now completely decayed, but in the time of Sabacceo and Palladio there seem to have been sufficient remains to justify an attempt at restoration. It is nearly square in plan (112 feet by 120). The cella here is a much more important part than is usual in Greek temples, and terminates in an apse, which afterwards became characteristic of all places of worship. In Trajan’s basilica at one end was a great semicircular apse, the back part of which was raised, being approached by a semicircular range of steps. In the centre of this platform was the raised seat of the questor or a second apse. As the steps, places were for the assessors or others engaged in the business being transacted. In front of the apse was placed an altar, where sacrifice was performed before commencing any important public business.

In the basilica, when used as a place of Christian worship, dating from the fourth century, the whole congregation of the faithful could meet and participate in the ceremonies and devotions. The bishop took the place occupied by old of the pretor or questor; the presbyters, the places of the assessors.
Very little change was needed to erect a Christian altars. The site of the steps, places for the assessors or others engaged in the business being transacted.
In front of the apse was placed an altar, where sacrifice
was performed before commencing any important public
business.

The basilica of the heathen became the ecclesia, or place of assembly, of the early Christian community.
In the church of Ibrim, in Nubia, there is the pecu-larity of an internal apse, which became general in Eastern, but less frequent in Western, churches, though sufficiently so to make its introduction at this early period worthy of notice. Another example to make this early form intelligible is that of the church of St. Reparatus, near Orleans in Algeria, the ancient Castellum Tingitanum. According to an inscription still extant, the church was consecrated 250, but the second apse seems to have been added about the year 403, to contain the grave of the saint. As it now stands, it is a double-apsed basilica, 80 feet long by 32 broad, divided into five aisles and exhibiting on a miniature scale all the peculiarities of plan which we once fancied we were not adopted until some centuries later. In this instance both apses are internal, so that the side aisles are longer than the central one, apparently no portion of them having been cut off for calcidica or vestries, as was very often done in that age. At Parenzo in Istria there is a basilica built in the year 542, with three aisles and an apse at the west end of the church; the nave is divided into three aisles with an arcade, and the nave and aisles; Venice, presents one of the most extensive and best preserved examples of the fittings of the apse, and gives a better idea of the mode in which the apses of churches were originally arranged than anything to be found in any other church, either of the same type or of an earlier one. There, and probably of the ninith or tenth century, is the most singular as well as the most ancient part of the church, and is formed in a manner of which no other example seems to be known. Externally, it is two sides of a square; internally, a semicircle; at each angle of the exterior and on each face is a pilaster, which supports an entablature that might very well mislead

I.42
A Northern antiquity to mistake it for a pagan temple. The plan of the church at Planes deserves to be looked at for its singularity; it is a triangle with an apse attached to each side, and supporting a circular part terminating in a plain roof. As a constructive puzzle it is curious, but it is doubtful how far any utility was subserved by such a freak. The church of Ste-Croix at Bourges is the only other Arlesian church that is supposed to be the only one of its kind. Built as a sepulchral chapel, it is a singularly gloomy but appropriate erection. In the Byzantine style the apse was retained, as in St. Sophia at Constantinople, in the old Byzantine churches at Ravenna, and in several churches in France.

The apse is almost universally adopted in Germany, and is very common in France and Italy. In different parts of England there are many churches with semicircular apses at the east end, chiefly in the Norman style, and some in which this form has evidently been altered at a subsequent period. In several cases the crypts beneath have retained the form when the superstructure has been altered. The apse is virtually a continental feature and contrasts with the square termination of English Gothic work. The traditional semicircular apse, greatly enlarged and, in the perfected style, changed to a polygonal plan is the most characteristic eastern termination of the larger French churches. The low Romanesque apse, covered with the primitive semidome and enclosed with its simple wall, presented no constructive difficulties and produced no imposing effect. But the soaring French chevet, with its many-celled vault, its arcaded stories, its circling aisles, and its radial chapels, taxed the inventive powers to the utmost and entranced the eye of the beholder. The apse of St. Germain-des-Prés (second quarter of the twelfth century) may reasonably be regarded as the first great Gothic apse ever constructed. Norwich cathedral is perhaps the finest example of the round apse in England. The cathedral of Durham, of which the nave and choir were finished much as they are now seen about the beginning of the twelfth century, had originally an apse; but on account of a defect in the masonry this was taken down and the present magnificent chapel of the Nine Altars substituted. The chevet of the thirteenth century is occasionally met with in England, as at Lichfield and Westminster. There is an apse in each arm of the transept in the churches at Melbourne, Gloucester, Ramsay, Chichester, Chester, Norwich, Lincoln, Christ Church in Hants, Tewkesbury, Castle Acre, Evesham. If the transept was long enough it would sometimes be two apses on each arm, as at Cluny, Canterbury, St. Augustine's, and St. Albans.

Apses.

Ape Chapel, a chapel radiating tangentially from one or more divisions of the apse, and reached geometrical, semicircular, or octagonal, externally to the walls or piers of the apse. In plan, the normal type of the tangential chapel is semicircular; some, however, are polygonal, and some composed of a small circle, serving as choir, and part of a large circle, as nave; some are oblong with canted corners. In England, such a chapel connects the north and south aisles of the eastern transept, and from the ambulatory projects an eastern chapel or chapels. The eastern chevet of Westminster Abbey, surround as five apsidal chapels, is the only complete example of this feature in England. The common source of the ambulatory and radiating chapels seems to have been the chapel of St. Martin of Tours, where originally there was a choir of two bays, and an apse of five bays, surrounded by a single ambulatory and five radiating chapels. Altars, which had before cumbered the nave, could now be placed in the new radiating chapels of the ambulatory, which had been the church of a community of monks. Each apsidal chapel could be treated as a sanctuary, to be entered only by the officiating priest and his attendants, and the ambulatory served as the necessary nave for the worshippers. The usual number of these radiating chapels is three. The two chapels are often found in the Benedictine foundations, and occasionally in those of the Cluniac reform. St. Martin of Tours, St. Savin, and Cluny have five-choir chapels; Amiens, Beauvais, Cologne, and Le Mans have seven apsidal chapels. No ambulatory with tangential chapels is older than about A.D. 900. The per-apsidal plan of Westminster Abbey, commenced in 1050 by Edward the Confessor, anticipated Cluny by thirty-nine years, a plan which was reproduced at Gloucester in 1089 and at Norwich in 1096. Radiating chapels are almost entirely a continental plan and most frequently found in French and Gothic structures. The chevet is very generally the square termination of the nave. Traces of an early apsidial treatment are found in Canterbury Cathedral. In continental churches the central apse chapel was often the Lady-chapel. In England the Lady-chapel was generally placed at the side. Apsidal (also written Apsidial), a small or secondary apse, one of the apses on either side of the main apse in a triapsidal church, or one of the apse-chapels when they project on the exterior of the church, particularly if the projection resembles an apse in shape. Bond (Gothic Architecture in England, 165) says that the Norman plan of eastern limb which the Norman builders brought over to England at the Conquest, contained a central apse flanked by apsidioles.

Aquarians (Gr., Ἀκώραιανταί; Lat., Aquarii), a name given to several sects in the early Church. The Ebionites, as St. Epiphanius tells us, had an idolatrous veneration for water (aqua), which they regarded as the vehicle of the Holy Spirit, and rejected the use of wine as something evil. The name, however, seems to have been given chiefly to the followers of Tatian, of whom Theodoret speaks as follows: "Tatian, after the death of his master, Justin the Martyr, set himself up as the author of a heresy. Among the things he rejected were marriage and the use of alcohol, but was the father of the Aquarians, and of the Encratites. They are called Hydroparasites, because they offer water instead of wine [in the Eucharist]; and En-crises because they neither drink wine nor eat animal food. From these they abstain because they abhor them as something evil. ... They are mentioned by St. Ireneus and by Clement of Alexandria. St. Augustine in his "Catalogue of Heresies" says: "The Aquarions are so called because in the cup of the Sacrament they offer water, not that which the whole Church offers," St. John Chrysostom, arguing against the Aquarions, declares that Our Lord drank wine after His Resurrection in order to prove that at the institution of the Eucharist also He had used wine. At the time of St. Cyprian the practice existed in some parts of Africa of using water instead of wine, as the celebration of the Eucharist. He strongly condemned it in one of his letters, attributing it to ignorance and simplicity rather than to an heretical spirit.

Aquila, The Archiepiscopal See of.—An Italian archiepiscopal see in the Abruzzi, directly dependent on the Holy See. The See of Forovonium preceded it, in 680. The Diocese of Aquila was erected by Alexander II, 20 February, 857. Pius VII joined it to the suppressed See of Cittàdiavela in 1818, and Pius IX raised it to an archiepiscopal see, 23 January, 1876. It has 167,800 Catholics; 135 parishes; 217 secular priests; 29 regulars; 130 seminarians; 264 churches or chapels. Aquila is on a high mountain, with beautiful views. The first church, the cathedral, is dedicated to Sts. Maximus and George, martyrs. The body of St. Bernardine of Sienna, who died in Aquila, is preserved in a church erected there in his honour. St. Celestine V was also buried there in 1296 in the monastery of Collemaggio, where he was made Pontiff. Aquila has suffered from three earthquakes, and in that of 2 February, 1703, over two thousand persons perished, eight hundred of whom were in the church of St. Dominic, where Communion was being given. The priest was found in the ruins, still holding in his hand the ciborium, containing two hundred particles, perfectly whole.

Aquilas and Priscilla (or Prisca), Jewish tentmakers, who left Rome (Aquila was a native of Pontus) in the Jewish persecution under Claudius, 49 or 50, and settled in Corinth, where they entertained St. Paul, as being of their trade, on his first visit to the town (Acts, xvii, 3 sq.), The time of their conversion to the Faith is not known. They accompanied St. Paul to Ephesus (Acts, xv, 18, 19), instructed the Alexandrian Apollo, entertained the Apostle Paul at Ephesus for three years, during his third missionary journey, kept a Christian church in their house (I Cor., xvi, 19), left Ephesus for Rome, probably after the riot stirred up by the silversmith Dives, 21-24; Acts, xix, 24, kept in Rome, first in church in their house (Rom., xvi, 3-5), but soon left that city, probably on account of the persecution of Nero, and settled again at Ephesus (II Tim., iv, 19). The Roman Martyrology commemorates them on 8 July. It is not known why Scripture several times names Priscilla before Aquila; the different opinions are evenly divided.

A notable fact is modern difficulties based on the frequent change of residence of Aquila and Priscilla are treated by Cornely, (Rom., xvi, 3-5).

Aqueilea, a former city of the Roman Empire, situated at the head of the Adriatic, on what is now the Austrian sea-coast, in the county of Görz, at the confluence of the Anse and the Torre. It was for many centuries the seat of a famous Western patriarchate, and as such plays an important part in ecclesiastical history, particularly in that of the Holy See and Northern Italy. The site is traditionally known as Aglar, a village of 1,500 inhabitants. The city arose (180 B.C.) on the narrow strip between the mountains and the lagoons, during the Illyrian wars, as a means of checking the advance of that warlike people. Its commerce grew rapidly, and in the time of Marcus Aurelius, it became the Etruscan fortress of the empire against the barbarians of the North and East, it rose to the acme of its greatness and soon had a population of 100,000. It was pillaged in 238 by the Emperor Maximinus, and was so utterly destroyed in 452 by Attila, that it was afterwards hard to recognize its original site. The Roman inhabitants, together with those of smaller towns in the neighbourhood, fled to the lagoons, and so laid the foundations of the city of Venice. Aqueilea arose again, but much diminished, and was once more destroyed (590) by the Lombards; after which it came under the Dukes of Friuli, was again a city of the Holy Roman Empire, and in the latter half of the 17th century became a feudal possession of its patriarchate, whose temporal authority, however, was constantly disputed and assailed by the territorial nobility.

Ecclesiastical History.—Ancient tradition ascertains that the see was founded by St. Mark, sent thither by St. Peter, previous to his mission to Alexandria. St. Hermagoras is said to have been its first bishop and to have died a martyr's death (c. 70). At the end of the third century (285) another martyr, St. Helarius (or Hilarius) was Bishop of Aqueilea. In the course of the fourth century the city was the chief ecclesiastical centre for the region about the head of the Adriatic, afterwards known as Venetia and Istria. In 381, St. Valerian appears as metropolitan of the churches in this territory; his synod of that year, held against the Arians, was attended by 32 (or 24) bishops. In time a part of Western Illyria, and, to the north, Noricum and Raetia, came under the jurisdiction of Aquileia. Verona, Treviso, Belluno, Feltre, Vicenza, Treviso, Padua, were among its suffragans in the fifth and sixth centuries. As metropolitan of such an extensive territory, and representatives of Roman civilization among the Ostrogoths and Lombards, the bishops of Aquileia sought and obtained from their barbarian masters the honorific title of patriarchal, personal, however, as yet to each titular of the see. This title aided to promote and at the same time to justify the strong tendency towards independence that was quite early manifest in its relations with Rome, a trait which it shared with its less fortunate rival, Ravenna, that of patriarchical dignity. It was only after a long conflict that the popes recognized the title thus assumed by the metropolitan of Aquileia. Owing to the acquiescence of Pope Viglius in the condemnation of the "Three Chapters," in the Fifth General Council at Constantinople (553) the bishops of Northern Italy (Liguria, Etruria) and Aquileia, them those of Venetia and Istria, broke off communion with Rome, under the leadership of Macedonius of Aquileia (555-556). In the next decade the Lombards overran all Northern Italy, and the patriarch of Aquileia was obliged to fly, with the treasures of his church, to the little town of Trieste, a last remnant of the imperial possessions in Northern Italy. This political change did not affect the relations of the patriarchate with the Apostolic See; its bishops, whether in Lombard or imperial territory, stubbornly refused all invitations.
to a reconciliation. Various efforts of the popes at Rome and the archbishops at Ravenna, both peaceful and otherwise, met with persistent failure to renew the bonds of unity until the election of Candianus (606 or 607) as Metropolitan of Aquileia (in Grado). Weary of fifty years' schism, those of his suffragans whose sees lay within the limits of the empire joined him in submission to the Apostolic See; his suffragans abroad and dependent on their schemes went further, and established in Aquileia itself a patriarchate of their own, so that henceforward there were two little patriarchates in Northern Italy, Aquileia in Grado and Old-Aquileia. Gradually the schism lost its vigour, and by 700 it was entirely spent; in the synod held that year at Old-Aquileia it was finally closed. It was probably during the seventh century that the popes recognized in the metropolitan of Grado the title of Patriarch of Aquileia, in order to offset its assumption by the metropolitan of Old-Aquileia. In succeeding centuries it continued in use by both, but had no longer any practical significance. The Patriarch of Old-Aquileia lived henceforth, first at Cormons, and from the eighth to the thirteenth century at Friuli. In the latter part of the eighth century the creation of a new metropolitan see at Salzburg added to the humiliation of Old-Aquileia, which claimed as its own the territory of Carnithia, but was excluded from the arbitration of Charlemagne, by which Ursus of Aquileia (d. 811) was obliged to relinquish to Arno of Salzburg the Carnithian territory north of the Drave. German feudal influence was henceforth more and more tangible in the ecclesiastical affairs of Old-Aquileia. In 1011 one of its patriarchs, John IV, surrounded by thirty bishops, consecrated the new Cathedral of Bamberg. Its influential patriarch, Poppo, or Wolfgang (1019–42) consecrated his own cathedral at Aquileia, 13 July, 1031, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary. In 1047, the Patriarch Eberhard, a German, assisted at the Roman synod of that year, in which it was declared that Aquileia was inferior in honour only to Rome, Ravenna, and Milan. Nevertheless, Aquileia lost gradually to other metropolitan seizes of its suffragans, and when the Patriarchate of Grado was at last transferred (1451) from that insignificant place to proud and powerful Venice, the privilege of Aquileia would not but suffer notably. In the meantime, during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the Patriarchs of Aquileia had greatly favoured as a residence Udine, an imperial donation, in Venetian territory. In 1348 Aquileia was destroyed by an earthquake, and its patriarchs were henceforth, to all intents and purposes, Metropolitan of Udine. Since the transfer of the patriarchal residence to Udine the Venetians had never lived in peace with the patriarchate, of whose imperial favour and tendencies they were jealous. When the patriarch Louis of Teck (1412–39) compromised himself in the dispute between Hungary and Venice, the latter seized on all the lands donated to the patriarchate by the German Empire. The loss of his ancient temporal estate was averted in a little later (1445) by the succeeding patriarch, in return for an annual salary of 5,000 ducats allowed him from the Venetian treasury. Henceforth only Venetians were held to have rights in the see. Under the famous Domenico Grimani (Cardinal since 1497) Austrian Friuli was added to the territory of the patriarchate whose jurisdiction thus extended over some Austrian dioceses.

Extinction of the Patriarchate.—The 109th and last Patriarch of Aquileia was Daniel Dolfin (Delfino), coadjutor since 1714 of his predecessor, Dionigio Dolfin, his successor since 1734, and Cardinal since 1747. The Venetian claim to the nomination of the Patriarch of Aquileia had been met by a counter-claim on the part of Austria since the end of the fifteenth century when, as mentioned above, Austrian dioceses came to be included within the jurisdiction of the patriarchate. Finally, Benedict XIV was chosen as arbiter. He awarded (1748–49) to the Patriarchate of Udine the Venetian territory in Friuli, and for the Austrian possessions he created a vicariate Apostolic with residence at Görz. The bishops of the vicariate became dependent of the patriarchate of Aquileia, directly on the Holy See, in whose name all jurisdiction was exercised. This decision was not satisfactory to Venice, and in 1751 the Pope divided the patriarchate into two archdioceses; one at Udine, with Venetian Friuli for its territory, the other at Görz, with jurisdiction over Austrian Friuli. Of the three dioceses, patriarchate of Aquileia, Venetian Friuli, and Görz, there remained but the parish church of Aquileia. It was made immediately subject to the Apostolic See and to its rector was granted the right to write in the episcopal insignia seven times in the year.

Aquilae, Councils of.—A council held in 381, presided over by St. Valerian of Aquileia, and attended by thirty-two bishops, of Aquileia and lasstrius of Brescia and St. Justus of Lyons, deposed from their offices certain stubborn partisans of Arius. This council also requested the Emperor Theodosius and Gratian to convene at Alexandria a council of all Catholic bishops in order to put an end to the Meletian Schism at Antioch, since 362 the source of the greatest scandal in the Christian Orient. The council of 553 inaugurated the schism that for nearly a century separated many churches of Northern Italy from the Holy See; in it the Bishops of Venetia, Istria, and Liguria refused to accept the decrees of the Fifth General Council (553) on the plea that by the condemnation of the Three Chapters it had undone the work of the Council of Chalcedon (451). The Council of 1184 was held against incendiaries and those guilty of sacrilege. In 1400 a council was held by Gregory XII against the pretensions of the rival popes, Benedict XIII (Peter de Luna) and Alexander V (Peter of Candia). He declared them schismatical, but promised to renounce the papacy if they would do the same. In 1596 Francesco Barbaro, Patriarch of Aquileia, held a council at which he renewed in nineteen decrees the legislation of the Council of Trent.

Aquinas, Thomas, St. See Thomas Aquinas, St.

Aquino, Sora, and Pontecorvo, The Diocese of.—An Italian diocese immediately subject to the Holy See. It comprises 29 towns in the province of Caserta and 7 in that of Aquino. Aquino became a bishopric in 465; Sora, in 275, with a regular list of bishops from 1221; Pontecorvo, on 28 June, 1725, and was immediately united to the diocese of Aquino. There is a shrine of St. Atanagilda of Aquino in the cathedral of Mila. Aquino has a population of 50,150; 21 parishes, 77 secular priests, 55 regulars, 55 seminarians, 91 churches and chapels. Sora has 95,200 inhabitants; 44 parishes, 182 secular priests, 37 regulars, 189 seminarians, 220 churches or chapels. Pontecorvo has 12,000 inhabitants; 8 parishes, 3 secular priests, 6 regulars. 25 churches. The seat of the bishop is at Rocca Secca. St. Constans is the patron of the cathedral. He was Bishop of Aquino in 566. Galeazzo (Bishop, 1543) was one of the four judges of the Council of Trent, and Filippo Filonardo (bishop, 1608) became a cardinal. The post-Josephine letter, n. 40, being, the empire Pescennius Niger (A. D. 190), and the Angelic Doctor, St. Thomas (A. D. 1225), were born at Aquino.

Arabia—Arabia is the country of Islam and, in all probability, the primitive home of the Semitic race. It is a peninsula of an irregularly triangular form, or rather, an irregular parallelogram, bounded on the north by Syria and the Syrian desert; on the south by the Indian Ocean; on the east by the Persian Gulf and Babylonia; and on the west by the Arabian Gulf and the Red Sea. Its western coast line, along the Red Sea, is about 1,800 miles, while its breadth, from the Red Sea to the Persian Gulf, is about 600 miles. Hence its size is about one million square miles and, accordingly, it is about four times as large as the State of Texas, or over one-fourth of the size of the United States, and as large as France, England, Germany, Belgium, Holland, Austria-Hungary, Switzerland, Italy, Servia, Rumania, and Bulgaria all combined.

The general aspect of Arabia is that of a central table-land surrounded by a desert belt, sandy to the west, south, and east, and stony to the north. Its outline is a little like a high, low and sterile, although, towards Yemen and Oman, on the lower south-west and lower south-east, these mountains attain a considerable height, breadth, and fertility. The surface of the midmost table-land is sandy, and thus about one-fifth of Arabia is cultivated, or rather two-thirds cultivated, and one-third irreclaimable desert. According to Doughty, the geological aspect of Arabia is simple, consisting of a foundation stock of plutonic rock wherein lie sandstone and, above that, limestone. Arabia has no rivers, and its mountain streams and fresh-water springs, which in certain sections are quite numerous, are utterly inadequate, considering the immense geographical area the peninsula covers. Wadys, or valleys, are very numerous and generally dry for nine or ten months in the year. Rains are infrequent, and consequently the vegetation, except in certain portions of Yemen, is extremely sparse. Arabia was divided into Deserta (desert), Felix (happy), and Petraea (stony), due to Greek and Roman writers, is altogether arbitrary. Arabic geographers know nothing of this division, for they divide it generally into five provinces: the first is Yemen, embracing the whole western peninsula; the second is Bahra'a, Mahra, Oman, Shehr, and Nej, the second is Hijaz, on the west coast and including Mecca and Medina, the two famous centres of Islam. The third is Tahama, along the same coast between Yemen and Hijaz. The fourth is Najd, which includes most of the central table-land, and the fifth is Yamama, extending all the way between Yemen and Najd. This division is also inadequate, for it omits the greater part of North and East Arabia. A third and modern division of Arabia, according to politico-geographical principles, is into seven provinces: Hijaz, Yemen, Hadramaut, Oman, Hassa, Irak, and the present, with the Sinaitic peninsula and about 200 miles of the coast south of the Gulf of Akaba which is under Anglican rule, Hijaz, Yemen, Hassa, and Irak are Turkish provinces, the other three being ruled by independent Arab rulers, called Sultains, Ameers, or Emirs, who to-day as of old are constantly fighting amongst themselves for control of the land. Perim, in the Strait of Bab-el-Mendeb, and Socotra are under English authority.

The fauna and flora of Arabia have not been as yet carefully investigated and studied. The most commonly known flora-produce are the date-palm, coffee, and a variety of medicinal plants, gums, balsams, etc. The fauna is still more imperfectly known. Among the wild animals are the lion and panther (both at present scarce), the wolf, wild boar, jackal, gazelle, fox, monkey, wild cow, or white antelope, ibex, horned viper, and cobra. Of the domestic animals are the ass, mule, sheep, goat, dog, and above all the horse and the camel.

The actual population of Arabia is a matter of conjecture, no regular or official census having ever been undertaken. According to the most modern and acceptable authorities, the population cannot exceed three millions, of whom probably all of whom are Mohammedans. The personal appearance of the Arab is rather attractive. He is, as a rule, undersized in stature, dark in complexion, especially in the South, with hair black, copious, and coarse; the eyes are dark and oval, the nose aquiline, and the features regular and well-formed. The ordinary life of the Arabs is simple and monotonous, usually out-of-doors and roving. They are usually peaceful, generous, hospitable, and chivalrous, but jealous and revengeful. In later times, however, they have greatly deteriorated.

Modern Exploration of Arabia.—Up to a century and a half, our information concerning Arabia was based mainly on Greek and Latin writers, such as Herodotus, Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, and others. This was meagre and unsatisfactory. The references to Arabia found in the Old Testament were even more so. Hence our best sources of information are Arabic writers and geographers, such as Hamadani’s "Arabian Peninsula", Beck and Yaqut’s geographical and historical dictionaries, and similar works. These, although extremely valuable, contain fabulous and legendary traditions, partly based on native popular legends and partly on Jewish and rabbinical fancies. The cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria have also thrown great and unexpected light on the early history of Arabia. But above all, mention must be made of the researches and discoveries of scholars like Halévy, Müller, Glaser, Hommel, Winckler, and others. The first European scientific explorer of Arabia was O. Niebuhr, who, in 1761-64, by the order of the Danish kings, undertook an expedition into the Arabian peninsula. He was followed, in 1799, by Reinna, the English agent of the East India Company. The Russian scholar U. J. Setzen undertook a similar expedition in 1808-11, and for the first time copied several inscriptions in the "Arabian Nights". In 1814-16, J. L. Burckhardt, a Swiss, and probably the most distinguished of Arabian explorers, made a journey to Hijaz and completed the pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina. Burckhardt’s information is copious, interesting, and accurate. Captain W. R. Welles made a journey to Oman and Hadramaut, and Ch. J. Crusden completed, in 1838, a similar journey from Mokha to Sana, copying several South-Arabian inscriptions, which Rödiger and Gesenius attempted to decipher.

Then came the German, Adolf von Wrede, who, in 1843, visited Wady Doan and other parts of Hadramaut, discovering the cuneiform inscription of five long lines. In 1843 Thomas Joseph Arnaud made a very bold and successful journey from Sana to Marib, the capital of the ancient kingdom of the Sabean, and collected about fifty-six inscriptions. In 1845-48, G. Wallin travelled through Hayil, Medina, and Ta’ma, proceeding from west to east. Then, in 1866, the Irishman, J. E. Martin, the translator of the "Arabian Nights", undertook a pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, and, in 1877 and 1878, twice visited the land of Midian, in North Arabia. In 1861 a Jew from Jerusalem, Jacob Saphir, visited Yemen, where he found several Jewish settlements, and other parts of Arabia; while in 1882, Dr. Edgar J. Goodspeed made his memorable tour from the Dead Sea to Qatif and Oman, visiting the great north-western territory between the Sinaitic peninsula, the Euphrates, Hayil, Medina, Najd, and practically the whole of central Arabia, till then unknown to scholars and travellers. Colonel Kelly visited central Arabia in 1871, and in 1878, Dr. Edward W. Goodspeed, an Orientalist and the pioneer of Saharan philology, in the guise of a poor Jew from Jerusalem, explored Yemen and south Arabia, copying about 700, mostly very short, inscriptions. He advanced as far as the South Arabian Jof, the territory of the ancient Mineans. In 1870-71, H. von Maltzan made a few short trips from Aden along the coast, and in 1876-78 Charles Doughty made his famous tour to Mada in Salih, Hayil, Ta’izz, Khatib, Bura, Onaiza, and Tayif, where he discovered several Nabatean, Lihyanian, or Tumidic, Minean and so-called proto-Arabic inscriptions. In 1879-80 the Italian Renzo Manzini made the first excursion to Sheba, or Saba, the ancient capital of Yemen. In 1878-79, Lady Anne Blunt, Lord Byron’s granddaughter, together with her husband, Sir Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, made a tour from Damascus through the North Arabian Jof, the Nefud desert, and Hayil. In the years 1882-84 the Swiss, Eduard Glaser, who had been the first and very fruitful expedition to southern Arabia, where he discovered and copied numerous old Arabian inscriptions; and in 1883-84 Charles Huber, together with Julius Euting, the Semitic epigraphist of Strasburg, undertook a joint expedition to northern Arabia, discovering the famous Arabic inscriptions of Ta’izz (sixth century B.C.). In 1882-83 Ed. Glaser made his second journey to southern Arabia, collecting several Minean inscriptions; and in 1887-88 he made his third expedition, which proved to be the most successful expedition yet undertaken, as far as epigraphical results are concerned.

The inscriptions discovered and copied were over 400, the most valuable among them being the so-called “Dam-inscription,” of 100 lines (fifth and sixth centuries of the Christian Era) and the “Sirwah inscription,” of about 1,000 words (c. 550 b. C.). His fourth expedition took place in 1892-94, and was from Damascus to Arabia. Leo Hirsch, of Berlin, visited, in 1893, Ta’s, Abd al Salam, and other places, Theodore Bent and his wife in 1893-94. In 1896-97, the distinguished Arabic scholar, Count Carlo Landerg, visited the coast of South Arabia, making special studies of the modern Arabic dialects of those regions, besides other geographical and epigraphical researches. In 1898-99 the expedition of the Vienna Academy to Shabwa was organized and conducted by Count Landberg and D. Müller, which, however, owing to several difficulties and disagreements, did not accomplish the desired results. Other expeditions have since engaged in the same work, and the results of their expeditions have been threefold: geographical, epigraphical, and historical. These results have opened the way not only to fresh views and studies concerning the various ancient South-Arabic dialects, such as Minean, Sabaean, or Himyarite, Hadramautic, and Khaybaric, but have also shed unexpected light on the history of the old South Arabian states and dynasties. These same discoveries have also thrown considerable light on Old Testament history, on early Hebrew religion and worship, and on Hebrew and comparative Semitic philology.

ARABIA AND THE OLD TESTAMENT.—The Old Testament references to Arabia. The term Arabian, as the name of a particular country and nation, is found only in later Old Testament writings, i. e. not earlier than Jeremia (sixth century B.C.). In older writings the term Arab is used only as an appellative, meaning "desert," or "people of the desert," or "descendants of Abraham." For Arabia in the earliest Old Testament writings is either Ismael, or Madian (A. V., Ishmael, or Midian), as in the twenty-fifth chapter of Genesis, which is a significant indication of the relative antiquity of that remarkable chapter. The meaning of the term Arab can be either that of "Nomad," or the "Land of the Nomad." The land of Arabia was called the "Country of the East," and the Arabs were termed "Children of the East," as the Arabian peninsula lay to the east of Palestine. According to the genealogical table of the tenth chapter of Genesis, Cham’s (A. V., Ham) first-born was Cush. Cush (A. V., Cush) had five sons, whose names are identical with several regions in Arabia. Thus the name of Sabha—probably the same as Sheba—occurs to the west of Babylonia, which was considered by the Biblical record of Gen., xi, as the traditional starting point of the earliest Semitic migrations. By the ancient Hebrews, however, the land of Arabia was called the "Country of the East," and as the Arabs were termed "Children of the East," as the Arabian peninsula lay to the east of Palestine.

The second is Hevila in northern Arabia, or, as Glaser prefers, in the district of Yemen and al-Kasim. The third is Regma (A. V., Ramah), in south-western Arabia, mentioned in the Sabean inscriptions. Then comes Sabata, mentioned in Yemen, in southern Arabia, and as far east as Oman. The fifth is Sabatha (A. V., Sabtah), or better Sabata, the ancient capital of Hadramaut, in South Arabia. Regma’s two sons, Saba and Dadan (A. V., Sheba and Dedan), or Daidan, are also two Arabic geographical names, the first being the famous Sheba (A. V., Sheba) of the Book of Kings, whose Queen visited Solomon, while the second is near Edom or, as Glaser suggests, north of Medina. In v. 28 of the same Genesiac chapter, Saba is said to be a son of Jocanet (A. V., Joktan), and so, also, Elmodad, Assarhoth, Helwa, Ophir (A. V., Almoqad, Hazarmaveth, Havilah), etc., which are equally Arabian geographical names), while in chapter xxv, 3, both Saba and Dadan are represented as grandsons of Abraham.

The episode of Sara’s handmaid, Agar (A. V., Hagar), and her son, Ismael (A. V., Ishmael), is well known. According to this, Ismael is the real ancestor of the majority of Arabian tribes, such as: Nabjoth, Cedar, Al sun, Nebajoth, Haran, Hedar, Thara, Jethur, and Cedam (A. V., Nebajoth, Kedar, Abdeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jethur, and Cedam (A. V., Nebajoth, Kedar, Abdeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jethur, and Cedam, respectively). Equally well known are the stories of the Madianite, or Ismaelite, merchants who bought Joseph from his brethren, that of the forty-years’ wandering of the Hebrew tribes over the desert of Arabia, of the Queen of Saba, etc. In later Old Testament times we read of Nehemias (A. V., Nehemiah), who suffered much from the enmity of an Arab sheik, Goseam (A. V., Geshem), a better Oshmu (Neh. iv. 30; doust, V. Doust, ii. 10, vi. 6), and he also enumerates the Arabs in the list of his opponents (Neh. vii. 11) that the Arabians brought tribute to King Josaphat (A. V., Jehoshaphat). The same chronicler tells us, also, how God punished the Midanites, and how the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar listed the Arabians, who were beside the Ethiopians (II Paral., xxi, 16), and how he helped the pious Ozias (A. V., Ozziah) in the war against the "Arabians that dwelt in Gubral" (xxvi, 7). The Arabians mentioned here are in all probability the Nabateans of northern Arabia; as our author wrote in the second or third century B.C.

The NORTH-Arabian Musribi and the Old Testament.
Another important geographical name frequently mentioned in the Old Testament, and in all instances referred, till recently, to Assyria, is Assir (abbreviated into Sur). A country of similar name has also been discovered in Old Testament times. The importance of these new facts and researches has of late assumed such bewildering proportions, the credit for which unmistakably belongs to Winckler, Hommel, and Cheyne. It is needless to say that however ingenious these hypotheses may appear, they are not as yet entitled to be received without caution. The detail study of the Old Testament is, in fact, the elaborate theories of these eminent scholars, a great part of the historical events of the Old Testament should be transferred from Egypt and Chassan into Arabia; for, according to the latest speculations of these scholars, many of the passages in the Old Testament which, until recently, were supposed to refer to Egypt (in Hebrew Mısraim) and to Ethiopia (in Hebrew, Kush) do not really apply to them but to two regions of similar names in North Arabia, called in the Assyro-Babylonian inscriptions Mursi, or Mursim, and Chush, respectively. They held that part by part, by means of accidental mistakes and partly by reason of corruption in the text, and in consequence of the faded memory of long-forgotten events and countries, these two archaic North-Arabian geographical names became transformed into names of similar sound, but better known, belonging to a different geographical area, namely, the Egyptian Mısraim and the African Chush, or Ethiopia.

According to this theory, Agar, Sarai’s handmaid (Gen., xvi, 1), was not Misirite or Egyptian, but Mursite, i.e. from Mursi, in northern Arabia. Abraham (Gen., xii, 10) did not go down into Mısraim, or Egypt, where he is said to have received from the Pharaoh a gift of men-servants and handmaids, but into Misrím, or Mursi, in northern Arabia. Joseph, when bought by the Ismaelites, or Madianites, i.e. Arabs, was not brought into Egypt (Mısraim), but to Mursi, or Misrimum, in north Arabia, which was the home of the Madianites. In I Kings (A. V., I Sam.), xxx, 13, we should not read “I am a young man of Egypt (Mısraim), slave of an Amalecite”, but of Mursi in north Arabia. In II Kings (A. V., I K.), iii, 1; xi, 1, Solomon is said to have married the daughter of an Egyptian king, which is extremely improbable; for Misrimum in north Arabia, and not Egypt, is still the country wintering Israel, and daughter Solomon married. In I Kings (A. V.), iv, 30, the wisdom of Solomon is compared to the “wisdom of all the children of the east country [i.e. the Arábians] and all the wisdom of Egypt”. But the last-mentioned country, they say, is not Egypt but, as the parallelism requires, Madian, or Mursi, whose proverbial wisdom is frequently alluded to in the Old Testament. In III Kings, x, 28 sq., horses are said to have been brought from Egypt; but horses were very scarce in Egypt, while very numerous and famous in Arabia. The same emendation can be made in at least a dozen more Old Testament passages. The result, however, would follow if we applied the same theory to the famous sojourn of the Hebrews in Egypt; for it is self-evident that if the Israelites sojourned not in the Egyptian Misraim, but in the north Arabian Mursi, and from thence fled into Chush, it was nearly contemporaneous with the ancient Hebrew history and religion would be of that more revolutionary character. Similar emendation has been applied with more or less success to the many passages where Chush, or Ethiopia, occurs, such as Gen., ii, 13; x, 6; Num., xii, 1; Judges, iii, 10; 1 Kings (A. V., I Kings), xviii, 21; Isa. xx, 3; xlv, 14; Hab., iii, 7; Ps., lxxxvi, 4; II Par. (A. V., Chron.), xiv, 9; xxi, 16, etc.

EARLY HISTORY OF ARABIA TILL THE RISE OF ISLAM.—To the historian, the earliest history of Arabia is a blank page, little or nothing being historically known and ascertained as to the origin, migrations, history, and political vicissitudes of the Arabian nation. Mohammedan tradition concerning the early history of the peninsula are mostly legendary and highly coloured, although partly based on Biblical data and rabbinical traditions. Hardly less unsatisfactory are the many references found in Greek and Latin writers. The mention of Arab tribes, under the various forms of Arab, Arabu, Abiri, and possibly Urbi, frequently occurs in the Assyro inscriptions as early as the ninth century B.C., and their country is spoken of as seldom or never traversed by any conqueror, and as inhabited by wild and independent tribes. We read, e.g., that in 684 B.C. Salmanasar II (A. V., Shalmanazer) in his battle against the Arab country wintering in the north Arabian Mursi. A few years later Theglathphalasar III (A. V., Tiglathpileser) undertook an expedition into Arabia; and in the latter half of the eighth century B.C. we find Assyrian influence extending over the north-west and east of the peninsula. One century later a number of Arabian tribes of inscriptions were defeated by Assurbanapal (A. V., Esarhaddon) at Basu. Assurbanapal also repeatedly speaks of his various successful expeditions into and conquests in the lands of Mursi, Magan, Meluhha, and Chush in Arabia. In the Behistun inscription of the Persian king Darius, a few years after the conquest of Babylon, are recorded the inscriptions of the Behistun and the numerous South-Arabian inscriptions thus far discovered and deciphered by Halévy, Winckler, D. H. Müller, Hommel, Ed. Glaeser, and others do not throw much light on the early history of Arabia. But the epigraphic evidences and the many ruins still extant in various parts of the peninsula that small degree of highly developed civilization must have existed among the ancient Arabs at a very early age.

The two most important kingdoms of ancient Arabia are that of the Mineans (אֶרְזָאָר of the Old Testament) and that of the Sabeans, whence the Queen of Sheba came to pay her homage of respect and admiration to King Solomon. A third kingdom was that of Kataban, a fourth, Hadramaut, as well as those of Libyan, Ra'dan, Habashah, and others. The Minean Kingdom seems to have flourished in southern Arabia as early as 1200 B.C., and from the various rival independent kingdoms in southern Arabia, they seem to have extended their power even to the north of the peninsula. Their principal cities were Main, Karan, and Yatil. The Sabean, or Himyarite, Kingdom (the Homeite of the classics) flourished either contemporaneously (D. H. Muller) or slightly later, Hommel] the Minean. Their capital was Marib (the Maribya of the Arabian classics), famous for its dam, the breaking of which is often mentioned by later Arabic poets and traditions as the immediate cause of the fall of the Sabean power. The Sabeans, after two centuries of repeated and persistent attacks, finally succumbed in overthrowing the rival Minean Kingdom. Their power, however, lasted till about 300 A.D., when they were defeated and conquered by the Abyssinians.

The Katabanian state, with its capital, Ta'if, was ruined some time in the second century after Christ, probably by the Sabeans. Towards the beginning of the first century, at most for a time, the three powerful Arab states were the Sabean, the Himyarite, and that of Hadramaut. In the fourth century the Himyarites, aided by the Sassanian kings of Persia, appear to have had a controlling power in southern Arabia, while the Abyssinians were absolute rulers of the north. These, however, were overthrown by Himyar and temporarily confined to the Tahamah district (A.D. 378), succeeded, in 525, with the help of the Byzantine Emperor, in overthrowing the Himyarite power, killing the king and becoming the absolute rulers of South Arabia. In 568 the Abyssinians were finally driven out of Arabia, and the power restored to the Yemenites; this vassal kingdom of the Persian Empire lasted until the year 634, when it was absorbed, together with all the other Arab states, by the Mohammedan conquest.

Such was the political condition of southern Arabia previous to the time of Mohammed. Of central Arabia little or nothing is known. In northern and north-western Arabia there flourished the Nabatean Kingdom, the people of which, though Arabian by race, nevertheless spoke Aramaic. The Nabateans must have come from other parts of Arabia to the North some time about the fifth century B.C., for at the beginning of the Machabean period we find them well established in that region. Shortly before the Christian Era, Antigonus and Ptolemy had in vain attempted to gain a footing in Arabia; and Pompey himself, victorious elsewhere, was checked on its frontiers. During the reign of Augustus, Aulus Gallus, the Roman Prefect of Egypt, with an army composed of 10,000 Roman infantry, 500 Jews, and 100 Nabateans, undertook an expedition against the province of Yemen. He took by assault the city of Ne'ran, on the frontier of Yemen, and advanced as far as Marib, the capital of Yemen, but, owing to the resistance of the Arabs and the disorderliness of his army, which was unaccustomed to the heat of the tropical climate, he was forced to retreat to Egypt without accomplishing any permanent and effective conquest. Later attempts to conquer the country were made by Roman governors and generals under Trajan and Severus, but these were mostly restricted to the neighbourhood of the principal cities of Nabataea, Bostra, Petra, Palmyra, and the Sinaic peninsula.

Another North-Arabian kingdom was that of Hira, situated in the north-easterly frontier of Arabia adjoining Irak, or Babylonia. Its king governed the western shore of the Persian Gulf. It was founded in the second century of the Christian Era and lasted about 424 years, i.e. till it was absorbed by the Mohammedan conquest. The kings of Hira were more or less vassals of their powerful neighbours, the Sassanian kings of Persia, paying them allegiance and tribute. Another Arabian state was that of Ghassan whose kings ruled over a considerable part of north-western Arabia, lower Syria, and Hijaz. It was founded in the first century of the Christian Era and lasted till the time of Mohammed. The Romans and Byzantine emperors were often harassed by Roman and Byzantine encroachments and by unequal alliances. In both these kingdoms (i.e. Hira and Ghassan) Christianity made rapid progress, and numerous Christian communities, with bishops, churches, and monasteries, flourished there. (For Christianity in Arabia, see below.)

Another Arabian kingdom was that of Kindah, originally from Irak, or north-eastern Arabia, and Mesopotamia. This rather short-lived and weak kingdom began about the fifth century of the Christian Era and ended with Mohammed, i.e. about one century and a half later. Its power and authority embraced the whole of the Hijaz and as far south as Oman. Besides these independent kingdoms, various Arab tribes, such as that of Koreish, to which Mohammed belonged, Rababah, Qays, Jawzain, Tamin, and others, were constantly endeavouring to assume independent rank and authority, but these attempts were finally and permanently shattered by the Mohammedan conquest, which put an end to all tribal faction and preponderances by uniting them all into one religious and political kingdom, the Kingdom of Islam.

found by Glaser, and the ruins of a supposed church, afterwards turned into a heathen temple, are utterly wanting. Christianity in Arabia had three main centres in the north-west, north-east, and south-west of the peninsula. The first embraces the Kingdom of Khassan (under Roman rule), the second that of Himyar (under Muslim power), the third the kingdoms of Himyar, Yemen, and Nijran (under Abyssinian rule). As to central and south-east Arabia, such as Nejd and Oman, it is doubtful whether Christianity made any advance there.

North-Arabian Christianity.—According to the majority of the Fathers and historians that Christendom of the Syrian and Arabian empire is to be traced back to the Apostle Paul, who in his Epistle to the Galatians, speaking of the period of time immediately following his conversion, says: “Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went to Arabia, and returned to Damascus” (Gal. i. 17). What particular region of Arabia was visited by the Apostle, the length of his stay, the motive of his journey, the route followed, and the things he accomplished there are not specified. His journey may have lasted as long as one year, and the place visited may have been part of the area formed under the kings of the Sasanian or Sasanic Persian or, better, as Lamarcq remarks, “not to the desert, but rather to a district south of Damascus where he could not expect to come across any Jews” (Expansion of Christianity, 1905, II, 301). Jerome, however, suggests that he may have gone to a tribe where his mission was unsuccessful as regards visible results. Zwemer’s suggestion (Arabia, the Oracle of Islam, 1900, 302–303), that the Koranic allusion to a certain Nabi Shali, or the Prophet Shali, who is said to have come to the Arabs preaching the truth and was not listened to, and who, consequently, in leaving them said: “O my people, I did preach unto you the message of my Lord, and I gave you good advice, but ye love not sincere advisers” (Surah vii), refers to Paul of Tarsus—this theory need hardly be considered.

In the light of the legend of Abgar of Edessa, however, and considering the fact that the regions lying to the north-west and north-east of Arabia, under the im remembrance of Persia, were in constant contact with the northern Arabs, among whom Christianity had already made fast and steady progress, we may reasonably assume that Christian missionary activity cannot have neglected the attractive mission field of northern Arabia. In the Acts of the Apostles (10:36) we read of the preaching of the gospel of the Arabs on the day of Pentecost, and Arabs were quite numerous in the Parthian Empire and around Edessa. The cruel persecutions, furthermore, which raged in the Roman and Persian Empires against the followers of Christ must have forced many of these to seek refuge on the safer soil of northern Arabia.

Christianity in Khassan and North-West Arabia.—The Kingdom of Khassan, in north-western Arabia, adjacent to Syria, comprised a very extensive tract of territory and a great number of Arab tribes whose first migrations there must have taken place at the time of the Roman empire, the people of the great time of the people of the Great.

Towards the third and fourth centuries of the Christian era these tribes already formed a confederation powerful enough to cause trouble to the Roman Empire, which formed with them alliances and friendships in order to counterbalance the influence of the Messenian Arabs of Syria, who were under Persian rule. The kings of Khassan, although of Arabian race, appear to have been of Arabian descent from the tribe of Azd, in Yemen. Gafshah, their first king, dispossessed the original dynasty, and is said to have been confirmed in his conquest by the Roman governor of Syria. Their capital city was Balka till the time of the second Itarit, when it was supplanted by Petra and Sideir. Although living a nomadic life and practically independent, with “no dwelling but the tent, no inurement but the sword, no law but the traditionary song of their bard’s”, these Arabs were under the nominal, but quite effective control of the Romans as early as the twelfth century. The Arabs always looked upon the Romans as their best and most powerful defenders and protectors against the Sassanian dynasty of Persia, by which they were constantly oppressed and molested.

The Nabataean Kingdom, which comprised the Sasanian peninsula, the sea-coast to the Gulf of Arabia, to Al-Hauran, and that portion of Palestine, which was to be annexed to the Roman Empire in a.D. 105, comprised also many Arab tribes which were for a long time governed by their own sheikhs and princes, their stronghold being the country around Boqra and Damascus. These sheikhs were acknowledged as such by the Roman emperors, who gave them the title of phyarch. The ever-increasing number and importance of these tribes and of those living in the Ghasanid territory were such that in 531, by the consent and authority of the Emperor Justinian, a real Arab-Roman kingdom was formed under the guidance of a king whose power and authority extended over all the Arabs of Syria, Palestine, Phoenicia and north-western Arabia. Another Syro-Arabian Kingdom, in which Arab tribes were very numerous, is that of Palmyra, which retained for a long time its independence and resisted all encroachments. Under Odenathus, the Palmyrene kingdom flourished, and it reached the zenith of its power under his wife and successor, the celebrated Zenobia. After her defeat by Aurelian (272), Palmyra and its dependencies became a province of the Roman Empire.

Christianity must have been introduced among the Syrian Arabs at a very early period; if not among the tribes living in the interior of the Syro-Arabian desert, certainly among those whose proximity brought them into continuous social and commercial contact with Syria. Rufinus (Hist. Ecclesiastica, II, 6) tells us of a certain Arabian Queen, Mavia, or Maowia (better, Ma'awiyah), who, after having repeatedly fought and was driven out of the Roman Empire, at last sought peace on condition that a certain monk, called Moses, should be appointed bishop over her tribe. This took place during the reign of Valens (about 374), who was greatly inclined to Arianism. Moses lived a hermit life in the desert of Egypt, and accordingly had no need of the support of the bishop of Alexandria in order to be ordained bishop, as the Bedouin queen required. The Bishop of Alexandria was then a certain Lucius, accused of Arianism. Moses refused to be ordained by a heretical bishop, and was so obedient in his refusal that it was necessary for the emperor to bring from exile a Catholic bishop and send him to the queen.

Oriens de Pevsevel (Histoire des Arabes avant l'Isamisme, etc., II, 215) affirms that towards the beginning of the fourth century, and during the reign of Djabala I, Christianity was again preached, and accepted by another Arab tribe. Sozomenus, in his history, refers to the fact that before the time of Valens an early form of Christianity spread among the inhabitants of the tribe of Gafshah, obtaining a son through the prayers of a Syrian hermit, embraced Christianity, and all his tribe with him. Lequien (Oriens Christianus, II, 851) tells us that this prince Zaraeeom places himself under the reign of Constantine, and accepts it by another Arab tribe. holy hermits and monks scattered in the Syro-Arabian desert, for whom the Arab tribes had great respect, and to whose solitary abodes they made numerous pilgrimages. The Lives of the Bishops and Theologians implicitly affirm that the life and miracles of St. Hilarion and of St. Simeon the Stylite made a deep impression on the Bedouin Arabs. Many tribes accepted Christianity at the hands of the latter Saint, while many others became so favourably disposed towards it that they were baptized by the patriarchs of the Syrian Church. In the life of Saint Euthymius, the monk of Pharán, tells the story of the conversion of an entire Arab tribe which, towards 420, had migrated from along the Euphrates into Palestine. Their chief was a certain Aspebeastos. He had a son afflicted with paralysis, who at the prayers of the saint completely recovered. Aspebeastos himself was afterwards ordained bishop over his own tribe by the Patriarch of Jerusalem (see below). These detached facts clearly indicate that during the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries of the Christian Era, Christianity must have been embraced by many Arab tribes, and especially by the tribe of the Ghassanids, which is celebrated by Arab historians and poets as being from very early times devotedly attached to Christianity. It was of this tribe that the proverb became current: “They were lords in the days of ignorance [i.e. before Mohammed] and stars of Islam.” (Zwemer, Arabia, the Cradle of Islam, 304.)

The numerous inscriptions collected in northern Syria by Waddington, de Vogüé, Clermont-Ganneau, and others also clearly indicate the presence of Christian elements in the Syro-Arabian population of that region and especially around Bosra. In the days of Origen there were numerous bishops in the towns lying south of the Hauran, and these bishops were once grouped together in a single synod (Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, II, 301). As early as the third century this part of Syro-Arabia was already well known as the “mother of heresies.” Towards the year 244 Origen converted to the orthodox faith Beryllus, Bishop of Bosra, who was a confessed anti-Trinitarian (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., VI, 20); and two years earlier (242) a provincial synod of Arabia was held in connexion with the proceedings against Origen, which decided in his favour. This great teacher of the Church was also well known at that time to the Arab bishops; for about the year 215 he had travelled as far as Arabia at the request of the Roman governor, before whom he laid his views (Eusebius, op. cit., VI, 19, and Harnack, op. cit., 301). In 250 the same teacher went to Arabia for the second time to combat certain heretics who taught that the soul died with the body, but that it would rise up again with it on the Judgment Day (Eusebius, op. cit., VI, 39).

The “Onomastikon” of Eusebius and the Acts of the Council of Nicaea (325) also indicate the presence of Christians, during the days of Eusebius, in Arabia, as indicated in the Acts of the Second, Third, and Fourth Ecumenical Councils of Chalcedon (Harnack, op. cit., 302-303). At the Council of Nicaea there were present six bishops of the province of Arabia: the Bishops of Bosra, Philadelphia, Jabrud, Sodom, Betharma, and Dionysius (Wright, Early Christianity in Arabia, 73; and Harnack, op. cit., 303). One tradition makes an Arab the first convert of Zosimus, Bishop of Chalcis (ed. Mathew, 24). The Christians of Hira were called ’Dâd, or “Worshippers”, i.e. “worshippers of God”, in opposition to “pagans” (Labourt, Le christianisme dans l’empire perse sous la dynastie sassanide, 1904, 206).

The condition of the Christian Church in Persia and Mesopotamia in the early centuries is well documented, but we must confine ourselves to what was extant, but that of the Christian Arabs of Hira is very obscure. We know, however, that towards the end of the fourth, and the beginning of the fifth, century Christianity retained its considerable success and popularity. Kilian (L. Kirchenwesen, 368) states that at the close of the fifth century, at least, it is said to have been, if not a follower of Christ, certainly a great protector of his Christian subjects.
During his reign the Kingdom of Hira rose to great power and celebrity, for his domain extended over all the Arabs of Mesopotamia, over Babylonia, along the Euphrates down to the Persian Gulf, and as far north as the islands of Bahrain. He caused great and magnificent buildings to be erected, among which were the two famous castles of Khawanig and Sidir, celebrated in Arabic poetry for their unsurpassed splendour and beauty. The city of Hira was then, as afterwards, called after his own name, i. e. "the Hira of Nu'mân," or "the city of Nu'mân," and was his chief residence. He was celebrated by Arab writers, historians, and poets. Before and during the reign of this prince, the Persian monarchs, from Shapor to Korbod, had relentlessly persecuted the Christians, and their hatred for the new religion was naturally imparted to their vassal kings and allies, principal among whom was Nu'mân.

In 410 St. Simeon the Stylite, who was in all probability of Arab descent, retired to the Syro-Arabian desert. There the fame of his sanctity and miracles attracted a great many pilgrims from all Syria, Mesopotamia, and northern Arabia, many of whom came to Nu'mân's subject, his brother-in-law, and the eloquent exhortations of the Syrian hermit induced many of these heathen Arabs to embrace Christianity, and Nu'mân began to fear lest his Christian subjects might be led by their religion to desert to the service of the Romans. Accordingly, he charged his vassals to dissuade the Syrian satraps from intercourse with the Christian Romans, under penalty of instant death. On the night of the issue of the edict, St. Simeon is said to have appeared to him in a dream, threatening him with death if he did not revoke the edict and allow his Christian subjects absolute religious freedom. Terrified and humbled, Nu'mân revoked the order and became himself a sincere admirer of Christianity, which his fear of the Persian King did not permit him to embrace. When the change of sentiment that had taken place in their prince was publicly known, the Arabs of his kingdom are said to have flocked in crowds to receive the Christian faith. This memorable event seems, to all appearances, to be historical; for it is related by Cosmas the Presbyter, who assures us that he heard it personally from a certain Roman general, Antiochus by name, to whom it was narrated by Nu'mân himself (Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, I, 247; and Wetzer, Mythol. Islam., cit., 79).

In 418 the empress Theodora, sister of the Emperor Justinian, visited Isfahan (the author of Kitab-al-Aghani), Abulfaed, Nuwairi, Tabari, and Ibn Khaldun (quoted by Caussin de Perceval, Histoire des Arabes, etc., III, 234) relate that Nu'mân abdicated the throne and retired to a religious and ascetic life, although he is nowhere expressly said to have become a Christian.

The greatest obstacle to the spread and success of Christianity in Hira was the immediate hatred of the Sassanian monarchs towards the Christians of their empire and the fierce persecutions to which they were subjected. Encouraged and incited by these suzerains, the princes of Hira persecuted more than once their Christian subjects, destroyed their churches, and sentenced to death their bishops, priests, and consecrated virgins. One of these princes, Mundhir ibn Imru'l-Qais, to whom Dhu Nu'mân sent the news of the massacre of the Christians of Na'amah and incited his state against them by the goddess Uzza, the Arabian Venus, four hundred consecrated Christian virgins (Tabari, ed. Noldeke 171). His wife, however, was a fervent Christian of the royal family of Ghassan, Hind by name. She founded at Hira a famous monastery after her own name, in which many Nestorian patriarchs and bishops rested and were buried. Yaqut, in his "Geographical Dictionary" (ed. Wüstenfeld), reproduces the dedicatory inscription which was placed at the entrance of the church. It runs as follows: "This church was built by Hind, the daughter of Harith ibn Amr ibn Hujr, the queen-immortal of Kings, the mother of King Amr ibn Mundhir, the servant of Christ, the mother of His servant and the daughter of His servants [i. e. her son and her ancestors, the Christian kings of Ghassan], under the reign of the King of Kings, Khoresro Anoushirwan, in the time of Bishop Mar Ephrem. May God, to Whose honour she built this chapel, forgive me for my want of mercy on her and on her son. May He accept him and admit him into His abode of peace and truth. That He may be with her and with her son in the centuries to come." (See Duchesne, Les églises séparées, 350-351.)

The inscription was written during the reign of her Christian son, Amr ibn Mundhir, who reigned after his idolatrous father, from 554 to 569. After him reigned his brother Nu'mân ibn Qabus. This prince is said to have been led to embrace Christianity by his admiration of the constancy and punctuality of a Christian Syrian whom he had designated to die a martyr's death. "And so he was stoned to death, and the pious and eloquent exhortations of the Syrian hermit went on to wastefully kill two of his friends, and when sober, in repentance for his cruelty and in remembrance of their friendship, he erected tombs over their graves, and vowed to moisten them once every year with the blood of an enemy. One of the first victims intended for this purpose was a Nestorian from the Christian of Syria, who entreated the Mundhir to allow him a short space of time to return home for the purpose of acquitting himself of some duty with which he had been entrusted; the boon was granted on his solemn promise to return at an appointed time. The time came, and the Christian Syrian was puncutal to his word, and thus saved his life." (Wright, op. cit., 143, in Pococce, "Specimen Historiarum Arabum", 75). After his conversion to Christianity, Qabus melted down a statue of Venus of solid gold, which had been worshipped by his tribe, and distributed the gold produce among the poor (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl., VI, xxii). Following his example, many Arabs became Christians and were baptized.

Qabus was succeeded by his brother, Mundhir ibn Mundhir, during whose reign paganism held sway once more among his subjects, and Christianity was kept in check. After him reigned Nu'mân ibn Mundhir (580-597). Gunduz, a Nestorian from Tabaristan, was converted to Christianity. His granddaughter, Hind, who was a Christian poet, "Adi ibn Zayd. He saw her for the first time during a Palm Sunday procession in the church of Hira, and became infatuated with her. Nu'mân was one of the last kings of his dynasty that reigned at Hira. One of his sons, Mundhir ibn Nu'mân, lived in the time of Mohammed, whom he opposed at the head of a Christian Arab army of Bahrain; but he fell in battle, in 633, while fighting the invading Moslem army.

The Christians of Hira professed both the Nestorian and the Monophysite heresies; both sects having had their own bishops, churches, and monasteries within the same city. Bishops of Hira (in Syriac, Hirtha de Tayaye, or "Hira of the Arabs") are mentioned as present at the various councils held in 410, 430, 485, 499, and 588. Towards the year 730 the Diocese of Hira was subdivided into three distinct Archdioceses with the respective titles of Bishop of Akula, Bishop of Kufa, and Bishop of the Arabs, or of the tribe of Ta'lab. From 686-724, Georgius, the famous Bishop of the Arabs, was still entitled Bishop of the Tagoukites, of the Tayyaites, and of the Akulites, i. e. of the tribe of Tanoukh, of Tay, and of the district of Akula [Assemani, Bibl. Orient., II, 459, 419; Lequen, Oriens Christianus, II, 1567, 1585, and 1597; Guidi, Zeitschrift für deutsche morgenländische Gesellschaft, XLIII, 410; Ryssel, Georgs des Araberbischofs Gedichte und Briefe, 44; Duchesne, op. cit., 349–352; Chatbot, Synodicon Orientale (1902), 275; Labouret, Le Christianisme dans l’Empire Perse sous la dynastie Sassanide (1904), 206–207, 156 and passim).

The missionary efforts of Frumentius must have taken place during the reign of Constantine, and either shortly before 340, or shortly after 346; for during the interval Athanasius was absent from Alexandria, and, as the stay of the two Tyrians at the court of Himyar cannot have lasted less than fifteen years, it follows that Meropius’s journey must have taken place between these years 320 and 325. The legend of Meropius and Frumentius, however, seems to refer to the evangelization of Ethiopia rather than to that of Himyar, or, if to that of Himyar, its conversion must have been only of an indirect and transitory character.

To the mission of Frumentius may also refer the testimony of two Arab historians: (1) al-Mas’udi (Travels, I, 369–371; also Wright, Christianity in Arabia, 33), according to which the Arabs of Najran, in Yemen, were first converted by a Syrian Christian captured by some Arab robbers and taken to their country.

Another Christian mission to Himyar took place during the reign of Constantine (357–361), who, towards the year 356, chose Bishop Theophilus, the famous deacon of Nicomedia and a zealous Arian, to conduct an embassy to the court of Himyar. The eloquence of Theophilus so impressed the king that he became favourably disposed towards the Arians, and built and dedicated to them, one at Dhafar (or Safar), another at Aden or at Sanaa, and the third at Hormuz, near the Persian Gulf. As the aim of the embassy was to ask the King of Himyar to grant freedom of worship to the Roman citizens in the Kingdom of Himyar, it follows that Christianity must have attained there a certain importance. According to Philostorgius, the king himself became a Christian, but this is improbable. At any rate, whether Theophilus succeeded in converting more Himyarites to the Christian faith or whether, as Assemani seems to believe, he simply perverted the already existing Christian population to the Arian heresy cannot be determined. From the facts that the latest royal Himyarite inscription, couched in pagan terms, bears the date of 281, that local Jewish inscriptions date from 378, 448, 458, and 467, and that the first Christian inscription, discovered by Glaser and considered by Hommel the latest of the Himyarite inscriptions, was accompanied by a dedicatory formula addressed to the power of the All-Merciful, and His Messiah and the Holy Ghost’), dates only as late as 542–543 (Glaser, Skize der Geschichte Arabiens (1889), 12 sq.), it does not follow that Christianity at the time of Theophilus had not attained any official position in Himyar, although it is undeniable that the two prevailing creeds were then Paganism and Judaism. Arab historians, such as Ibn Khalikan, Yaqut, Abuelfeda, Ibn-al-Attir, and especially the early biographers of Mohammed, unanimously affirm that towards the fourth and fifth centuries of the Christian Era Christianity flourished in Hira, Himyar, and Najran, and among many tribes of the North and South, Quda‘ah, Bahran, Tanukh, Taglib, Tay. We are far, however, from accepting all these ecclesiastical testimonies concerning the origin and development of Christianity in South Arabia as critically ascertained and conclusive. Fictitious elements and legendary traditions are undoubtedly ingredients of the original narratives, yet it cannot be doubted that a certain amount of truth is contained in them.

Positive traces of ecclesiastical organization in southern Arabia first appear in the time of the Emperor Anastasius (491–518). John Diaconomenos (P. C., LXXVIII, 212) relates that during this emperor’s reign the Himyarites, who had become followers of Judaism since the time of the Queen of Sheba, or Saba, were converted to Christianity, and received a bishop, Silvanus by name, who was that writer’s own uncle, and at whose instance he wrote his ecclesi-
Asia. It is not improbable that the testimony of Ibn Ishaq, the earliest and most authoritative biographer of Mohammed (d. 770), according to which the first apostle of Christianity in Yemen was a poor Syrian mason named Phemion, who with a companion named Salih were captured by an Arab caravan and sold to a prominent Najranei, refers to this Salih. He was of a certain Abdallah ibn Thamir, who became a great missionary and thus succeeded in converting the town of Najran to the religion of Christ (Tabari, ed. Noldeke, 178). According to Halévy (Archives des missions, VII, 40), even at the present time there is still a mosque in Najran dedicated to this Ibn Thamir, another, on the other hand, asserts that as early as the latter half of the third century, a certain Abd- Kelal, son of Dhu-l Awd, who was King of Himyar and Yemen from 273 to 297, became a Christian through the teaching of a Syrian monk, but, on being discovered by his people, was killed (Causin de Perecaul, Histoire des Arabes avant l'Islamisme, III, 234). Assemann, followed by Causin de Perecaul, thinks that Christianity first entered Najran in the time of Dhu Nuwas (sixth century). This king, he says, was so alarmed by its advance that he ordered a general massacre of the Christians if they refused to embrace Judaism, and he and his family perished. He identifies Harith, or Arethas, the Christian prince and martyr of Najran, with the above-mentioned Abdallah ibn Thamir, whose tribe's name was, according to him, Harith or Arethas. This, however, is improbable, for at the time of Dhu Nuwas's accession to the throne, Christianity was already flourishing in Najran, with its own bishop, priests, and churches.

What was the exact condition of Christianity in southern Arabia during the fifth and sixth centuries, we do not know; but from the episode of the martyrdom of Najran it clearly appears that its spread was constant and steady. The principal and most powerful obstacle to the permanent success of Christianity in Yemen was undoubtedly the numerous communities of Jews scattered in that section of the peninsula, who had acquired so great a religious, political, and monetary influence that they threatened for a while to become the dominant power. They had their own poets and orators, synagogues, schools, princes, and even kings. Their power was constantly used to keep in check the progress of Christianity, and they were the direct cause of the almost entire annihilation of the Christians of Najran. Like other religious communities, "when oppressed, they [the Arab Jews] became persecutors when they had acquired sovereignty."

Margoliouth, Mohammed and the Rise of Islam (London, 1905), 36. This persecution, which occurred in 523, and in which the Jews piled faggots and lit fires, and the Christians were burned, happened as follows.

About the beginning of the sixth century, the kingdom of Himyar and Yemen was subject to Abyssinian rule. Kalib, King of Abyssinia, known by the Greek historians under the name of Esbaan, or Heliostaio, had succeeded, after a desperate struggle, in subjugating the Himyarites of the extreme south of Arabia. Though not a Christian, he was favorably inclined towards Christianity, as he was on friendly terms with the Romans. He is said to have vowed to become a Christian in the event of his conquering Himyar, a vow he in all probability fulfilled. Rabliah ibn Mubhar, the defeated Himyarite king, who, like the rest of the inhabitants of Najran, was a Jew, was compelled to seek shelter in Hira, and was succeeded by a certain Yusuf Dhu Nuwas, likewise a Jew, but vassal to the Negus of Abyssinia. About the year 523 (not 500, as the majority of Arab historians believe), and as soon as the victorious Abyssinian army had retraced its steps, Dhu Nuwas revolted against Esbaan and, instigated by the Jews, resolved to wreak his vengeance on the Christians. All who refused to renounce their faith and embrace Judaism were put to death without respect to age or sex. The town of Najran, to the north of Yemen, and the chief town of the district, suffered the most. Dhu Nuwas marched against the latter city and, finding it impregnable, treacherously promised the inhabitants full amnesty in the case of their surrender.

On entering the city, Dhu Nuwas ordered a general massacre of all the Christians. "Large pits were dug in the netherworld of Cheldos, and all those who refused to abjure their faith and embrace Judaism, amounting to many thousands, including the priests and monks of the surrounding regions, with the consecrated virgins and the matrons who had retired to lead a monastic life, were committed to the flames. The chief men of the town, with their prince, Arethas [called by some Arabian writers Abdallah ibn Athamir], a man distinguished for his wisdom and piety, were put in chains. Dhu Nuwas next sought their bishop, Paul, and when informed that he had been some time dead, he ordered his bones to be disinterred and burnt with his palace and his household. Paul and his companions were conducted to the side of a small brook in the neighbourhood, where they were beheaded. Their wives, who had shown the same constancy, were afterwards dragged to a similar fate. One named Ruma, the wife of the chief, was brought with her two virgin daughters before Dhu Nuwas; their surpassing beauty is said to have moved his compassion, but their constancy and devotion provoked in a still greater degree his vengeance; the daughters were put to death before the face of their mother, and Ruma, after having been compelled to taste their blood, shared their fate. When he had thus perpetrated the tragedy of Najran, Dhu Nuwas returned with his army to Sanas."—Wright, op. cit., 54-55.

From here Dhu Nuwas hastened to inform his friends and allies, Kabad, King of Persia, and Al-Mundhir, Prince of Hira, of the event, urging them to imitate his example and exterminate their Christian subjects. Dhu Nuwas's messengers arrived 20 January, 524, at Huhuf (El-Hassa), near the Persian Gulf, where Al-Mundhir was then entertaining an embassy sent to him by the Emperor Justin and composed of Sergius, Bishop of Rosapha, the priest Abrames, and other followers of the wind. Among them was the Monophysite Simeon, Bishop of Beth-Aram, in Persia. Al-Mundhir received and communicated the news of the massacre to the members of the embassy, who were horrified. According to Ibn Ishaq, the number of the massacred Christians was 20,000, while the letter of the Bishop of Beth-Aram said there were 427 priests, deacons, monks, and consecrated virgins, and more than 4,000 laymen. This Monophysite Bishop of Persia, immediately after his return to Hira, wrote a circumspect account of the sufferings of the Christians of Najran and sent it to Simeon, Abbot of Gabas, near Gaza. In it he tendered to the Chaldaean bishops the whole of the territory dedicated to the Patriarch of Alexandria, to the King of Abyssinia, to the Bishops of Antioch, Tarsus, Cesarea in Cappadocia, and Edessa, and urges his Roman brethren to pray for the afflicted Najranites and to take up their cause. A certain Dhu Thalaban, who escaped the massacre, fled to the court of Constanti- nius II, and implored the emperor to redress the wrong of his persecuted countrymen. In the meanwhile the news of the massacre had spread all over the Roman and Persian Empires; for in that same year, John the Psalmist, Abbot of the Monastery of Beth-Aphrodisos, wrote in Greek an elegy on the Najranite martyrs and their chief, Harith. Bishop Sergius of Rosapha, the head of the embassy, wrote also a very detailed account of the same events in Greek. Even in the Koran (Surah lxxxv) the event is mentioned and is universally alluded to by all subsequent Arab, Nestorian, Jacobite, and Occidental historians and writers.

The news of the massacre weighed heavily on Elesbaan, King of Abyssinia, who is said to have now become a very fervent Christian. He determined to take revenge on Dhu Nuwas, to avenge the massacre of the Christian Najranites, and to punish the Yemenite Jews. Accordingly, at the head of seventy thousand men and a powerful flotilla, he descended upon Himyar, invaded Yemen, and with relentless fury massacred thousands of Jews. Dhu Nuwas, after a brave fight, was defeated and slain, and his whole army routed. The whole fertile land was once more a scene of bloodshed and devastation. The churches built before the days of Dhu Nuwas were again rebuilt on the sites of their ruins, and new bishops and priests were appointed in the place of the martyrs. An Abyssinian general, Eusephuas, was appointed King of Himyar, and during his reign a cathedral church at Sanaa was attempted to raise the standard of revolt, but was defeated. A few years later the Himyarites, under the leadership of Abramos, or Abraha, a Christian Abyssinian, revolted against Eusephuas, and in order to put down the revolution the King of Abyssinia, Abraha, father of one of his relatives, Aretias, or Arvat. The latter was slain, however, by his own soldiers who joined the party of Abramos. A second Abyssinian army took the field, but was cut to pieces and destroyed. Abramos became King of Himyar, and from Procopius we know that he, after the death of Elesbaan, made peace with the Emperor of Abyssinia and acknowledged his sovereignty.

During the reign of Abramos Christianity in South Arabia enjoyed great peace and prosperity. "Paying tribute only to the Abyssinian crown, and at peace with all the Arab tribes, Abraha was loved for his justice and moderation by all his subjects and idolized by the Christians for his burning zeal in their religion." Large numbers of Jews were baptized who were said to have been converted to Christianity by a public dispute between them and St. Gregentius, the Arabian Bishop of Dhaif. In this dispute, between Hashim, the great rabbi, and his most learned rabbis, and Christ is said to have appeared in Heaven. Many idolaters sought admission to the Church; new schemes of benevolence were inaugurated, and the foundations were being laid for a magnificent cathedral at Sanaa, where is said to have existed a picture of the Madonna, afterwards moved by the Qurashiites and placed in the Kaaba, at Mecca (Margolouth, op. cit., 42).

In short, South-Arabian Christianity, during the reign of Abramos, i.e. in the first half of the sixth century, "seemed on the eve of its Golden Age" (Zwemer, Arabia, The Cradle of Islam, 308). The kingdom and the people were incessantly pressed by the inquisition of Bishop Gregentius, his great friend, admirer, and counsellor, a code of laws for the people of Himyar, still effective in Greek, and divided in twenty-three sections. The authenticity of this code, however, is doubted by many, as it is more ascetic and monastic in character than ecclesiastical, in fact, of St. Gregentius and his relations with Eusephuas, Abramos, and Herban are interwoven with legend (Duchesne, op. cit., 334-336). In 550, Abramos's glorious reign came to a disastrous end. According to Arab historians, the event took place in 570, the year of Mohammed's birth; but, as Noldeke has shown, this is simply an ingenious arrangement in order to connect the rise of Islam with the overthrow of the Christian rule in Yemen; for the latter event must have taken place at least twenty years earlier (Tabar, I, 205). Abramos's defeat is reported by all Mohammedan historians with great joy and satisfaction, and is known simply as "the defeat of the Elephant." Mohammed himself devoted to it an entire surah of his Koran. This defeat forms the last chapter in the history of South-Arabian Christianity and the preface to the advent of Mohammed and Islam. It was brought about as follows.

Towards the first half of the sixth century the territory of Caaba, in the "Isle of old, the Eleusis of Arabia. It was sought and annually visited by thousands of Arabs from all parts of the peninsula, and enriched with presents and donations of every kind and description. Its custodians were of the tribe of Qurishi, to which Mohammed belonged, and which had then become the most powerful and illustrious of Hijaz. Abramos, the Christian King of Himyar, beheld with grief the multitudes of pilgrims who went to pay their superstitious devotions to the heathen deities of the Caaba, and, in order to divert the attention and worship of the heathen Arabs to another object, he resolved to build a magnificent cathedral in Sanaa. The work was completed and far surpassed the Caaba in the splendour of its decorations. To attain his object, Abramos issued a proclamation ordering the pilgrims to relinquish their former route for the shorter and more convenient journey to the Christian church of Sanaa. The object was not attained, and the result was reduced to a precarious financial and politico-religious condition. To avenge themselves and to depreciate in the eyes of the Arab tribes the Christian church of Sanaa they hired a certain man of the Kenanah tribe to enter the church and defile it by strewing it with dung, which was enough to make the Arabs look at the place with horror and disgust. The operation was successfully effected, and its criminal agent fled, spreading everywhere in his flight the news of the profanation of the Christian church. The act was a signal of war and vengeance, and Abramos determined to destroy the tribes of Kenanah and Qurashi, and to demolish the Caaba. Accordingly, at the head of a powerful army, accompanied by numerous elephants, he invaded Hijaz, defeated all the hostile tribes in his way, and approached Mecca.

The chief of the tribe of Qurashi and the guardian of the Caaba was then the venerable Abdoll-Mu'tafa, who stood at the head of the tribes and paid the leaders. This chief, at the news of the approach of the Himyarite army, sought peace with Abramos, offering him as a ransom for the Caaba a third part of the wealth of Hijaz; but Abramos was inflexible. Despairing of victory and overwhelmed with terror, the inhabitants of Mecca, led by Abdoll-Mu'tafa, took refuge in the neighbouring mountains that overhung the narrow pass through which the enemy must advance. Approaching the city by way of the narrow valley, Abramos and his army, not knowing that the heights were occupied by the Qurashiites, fell beneath the numberless masses of rock and other obstruction, and was never seen again as has been "The Elephant by the assailants. Abramos was defeated and compelled to retreat. His army was almost annihilated, and the king himself returned a fugitive to Sanaa, where he died soon after, as much of vexation as of his wounds.

Mohammedan writers attribute the defeat of Abramos and the victory of Qurashi to supernatural intervention, not unlike that which defeated the army of Sennacherib under the walls of Jerusalem. Be this as it may, by the defeat of the Himyarite army Qurashi became supreme in command and authority. In the meanwhile, Yaksoum and Masrouq, sons of Abramos, had succeeded him in turn, but their power had so much declined that they had to seek alliance with the Sassanian kings of Persia, who were the nominal overlords of Arabia. In 588, two years before Mohammad's birth, a Persian military expedition invaded Yemen and Oman and brought the Christian Abyssinian dynasty and that of Abramos to an end. A tributary prince was appointed over Himyar by the Sassanian kings, in the person of Anbathu Yemeni, a descendant of the old line of Himyarite kings. Their seventh king, David, reigned in the reign of Masrouq, and at the instigation of some noble and rich Himyarites who had assisted him with money and all the means available, repaired to Constantinople and appealed to Mauricius, the Byzantine emperor, for assistance in delivering his kingdom from the Persians. Mauricius sent to help him, on the ground that the unity of Christian faith between the Abyssinians and the Byzantines prevented him from taking any such action. Saif, disappointed and hopeless, went to Nu'man ibn al Mundhir, Prince of Hira. This prince presented Saif to Khosroes Nourshivr, King of Persia, to whom he explained the object of his mission. Khosroes at first was unwilling to undertake so dangerous an enterprise, but afterwards, won over by the promises of Saif and the advice of his ministers, sent an army of 4,000 Persian soldiers, drawn from prisons, under the command of Wahris and accompanied by Saif himself.

The army advanced to Hadramaut, where it was joined by Saif's own adherents, 2,000 strong, and attacked Maerouq, who was defeated and slain in battle. Saif was installed king over Himyar but subject to Khosroes Nourshivr. His first act was to expel from Himyar most of the Abyssinian residents, among whom were many Christians. Subsequently, Saif was murdered by some Abyssinian members of his own court; and after his death no more native Himyarite princes were placed on the throne. He was succeeded first by Wahris, leader of the Persian army, then by Zin, Binegas, Chore, Chocarau, and Badhan, the last of whom was the governor of Himyar at the time of Hisham's conquest of Arabia. With the overthrow of the Abyssinian dynasty in the south, the increase of factional rivalries between the Byzantine and the Persian Empires in the north, and the advent of Islam in Arabia, it must not be imagined, however, that this violent end came without heroic resistance. The famous church, built by Abramos at Sanan, was still in a flourishing condition at the time of Mohammed, who speaks of his own visit to it, and of listening to the sermons of its famous and eloquent bishop, Qass ibn Sa'da. The Christians of Najran successfully resisted, during the life of the Prophet, all attempts at Islamic proselytism, although, under 'Omar, Mohammad's second successor (634-644), they were finally compelled to embrace Islam; many refused to do so and were expelled. These migrated to Kufa and entered into commerce. By the end of the eighth century, the Nestorian patriarch, Timotheus I (778-820), appointed over them a bishop with both native and Nestorian clergy, schools, and churches.

Christianity, in the time of Mohammed, under one form or another, must have had also some followers in Hijaz, the stronghold of Islam and especially around Mecca. Slaves were not infrequently Christian captives brought in by the trading Arabs in their journeys to Syria and Mesopotamia. An Arab poet, quoted by Wellhausen (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, IV, 200), says: "Whence has Al-Asha his wine? From Abramos and Hira of whom he bought his wine; they brought him to them." These Christian influences are clearly visible in the Koran. Among the early friends and followers of the Prophet were Zaid, his adopted son, who was of Christian parentage; and others of the same family, who are translated "heretics" (monks), abandoned Christianity for Islam. One of these, Warqa, is credited by Moslem writers with the knowledge of the Christian Scriptures, and even with having translated some portions of them into Arabic. Father L. Sheikho, S.J., of the Catholic University of Beirut, Syria, has made a selection of extracts from ante-Islamic and immediately post-Islamic Arabic poets, in which Christian ideas, beliefs, and practices are alluded to. (See "Al-Maashriq" in "The Orient" of 1905, also published separately.) Medina, the Prophet is said to have received repeated embassies from Christian tribes. His treatment of the Christian Arabs was distinctly more liberal and courteous than that accorded by him to the Jews. He looked on the latter as a dangerous political menace, while he regarded the former not only as subjects, but also as friends and allies. In one of his supposed letters to the Bishop of the tribe of Harith, to the Bishop of Najran, and to their priests and monks, we read: "There shall be guaranteed to you the protection of God and His Apostles for the possession of your churches and your worship and your monasteries, and no bishop, priest, monk, shall be molested, as long as you remain true and fulfil your obligations. To Bishop Yuhanna ibn Ruba and to the chiefs of the people of Ayla he wrote: "Peace to you. I commend you to God besides Whom there is no God. I would not war against you without first writing to you. Either accept Islam or pay poll-tax. And hearken to God and His Apostle and to these envos. . . . If you turn my envoy's back and are not friendly to them, then I will accept no reparation from you, but I will war against you and will take the children captive and will slay the aged. . . . If you will hearken to my envoy's, then shall you be under God's protection and Mohammad's and that of his allies." —W. A. Sheed, Islam and the Oriental Churches (1904), 103. To the heathen Arabs he held out no compromise; they had either to embrace Islam or die; but to the Christians of his country he always showed himself generous and tolerant, although he sent to the Mohammedan tribes in his time an order that he who changed his religion was to be put to death. He himself changed his policy towards them and is said to have commanded that none but Moslems should dwell in the land. In one of his controversies with the Christian tribe of Taghib, Mohammed agreed that the adults should remain Christian but the children should not be baptized (Wellhausen, op. cit.). The feelings between the Christian and the Mohammedan Arabs were so friendly at the time of the Prophet that many of the latter sought refuge with the former on more than one occasion. Under 'Omar, however, Mohammad's second successor, the policy of Islam towards the Christians completely changed. The "torment" of the abjuration of "Omar", which, though generally regarded as spurious, cannot be entirely disregarded.

'Omar's policy practically put an end to Christianity in Arabia, and certainly dealt a death-blow to the Christian religion in the newly conquered West. Christian Arabs were not driven from the peninsula, where many Christians, moved by the wonderful success of the Moslem arms, abandoned their religion and accepted Islam. Some preferred to pay the poll-tax and retain their faith. Others, like the Najranites, in spite of the promise of Mohammad that they should be undisturbed, fled to the Wadi Hasa and settled partly in Syria and partly near Kufa, in lower Mesopotamia (Muir, History of the Caliphate, 155).
The tribe of Tabghib was true to its faith, and Bar-Hebreus tells us of two of its chieftains who later suffered martyrdom (Chronicon Syriacum, 112, 115). We continue to hear for a long time of Jacobite and Nestorian bishops of the Arabs, one even being Bishop of Sanaa, Yemen, and Bahrain, and of the border regions (Bar-Hebreus, Chronicon Ecclesiasticum, I, 363; II, 122, 123; and Thomas of Marga, Book of Governors (ed. Budde, 1893), II, 448 sqq.).

Under the Umayyad and Abbasid Caliphs, Christianity enjoyed, with few exceptions, great freedom and respect throughout all the Mohammedan Empire, as can be seen from the facts and data collected by Ammianus Marcellinus according to the many Nestorian and Jacobite patriarchs from the seventh to the eleventh centuries received diplomas, or firmans, of some sort from Mohammed himself, from Umar, Ali, Merwan, Al-Mansur, Harounal-Raschid, Abu Ja'far, and others. (Sheed, op. cit., 299–241; Assemani, De Catholicis Nestorianis, 41–43 sqq.; Bar-Hebreus, Chronicon Ecclesiasticum, I, 309, 317, 319, 325; II, 465, 625; III, 307, 317, 229, 433, etc.; and Thomas of Marga, op. cit., II, 123, note.)

In conclusion, few words may be said of the various creeds that existed among the Christian Arabs of the north and of the south belonging, as well as of their practical observance of the Christian religion and duties. We have already seen how that part of Arabia adjacent to the Syrian borders was, from the third century on, regarded as the “mother of heresies”. The religious and political freedom of the Arab tribes opened the door to all creeds, errors, and heresies. Before the rise and spread of Nestorianism and Monophysitism, the Arian heresy was the prevailing creed of the Christian Arabs. In the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries Arianism was supplanted by Nestorianism and Monophysitism, which had then become the official creed of the two most representative Churches of Syria, Egypt, Abyssinia, Mesopotamia, and Persia. Like the Arabian Jews, the Christian Arabs did not, as a rule, particularly in the times immediately before and after Mohammed, attach much importance to the practical observance of their religion. The Arabs of pre-Islamic times were notorious for their indifference to their theoretical and practical religious beliefs and observances. Every religion and practice was welcomed so long as it was compatible with Arab freedom of conscience and sensuality; and, as Wellhausen truly remarks, although Christian thought and sentiment could not have infus ed among the Arabs through the channel of poetry, it is in this that Christian spirituality performs rather a silent part (op. cit., 263).

Arabian Christianity was a seed sown on stony ground, whose product had no power of resistance when the heat came; it perished without leaving a trace when Islam appeared. It seems strange that these Christian Arabs, who had bishops, and priests, and churches, and even heresies, of their own, apparently took no steps towards translating into their language any of the Old and New Testament books; or, if any such translation existed, it has left no trace. The same strange fact is also true in the case of the numerous Jews of Yemen (Margoliouth, op. cit., 35; and Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, II, 300). Of these Emmanuel Deutsch remarks that, “acquainted with the Halacha and Haggada, they seemed, under the peculiar story-loving character of their countrymen, to have combined the latter with all its gorgeous hues and colours” [Remains of Emmanuel Deutsch, Islam (New York), 92]. As to the Christians, at least the bishops, the priests, and the monks must have had some religious books; but as we know nothing of their existence, we are forced to suppose that these books were written in a language which they learned abroad, probably in Syria.

Arabia, The Vicariate Apostolic of.—Arabia formerly belonged to the mission of Gall (Africa), but was made a separate apostolic prefecture by Pius IX, 21 Jan., 1875. It was reopened to the mission of Gall, then made a vicariate Apostolic, by Leo XIII, 25 April, 1888, under Monseigneur Lasarre. The Capuchin Fathers under Monseigneur Lasarre had long been in charge of the Aden mission, together with that of Somaliland. The first vicar Apostolic brought to Aden an Embassy of Franciscan sisters, to whose care the British authorities entrusted 100 Gall children rescued from Arab slave ships. With these liberated captives it was hoped to found a Catholic colony at some distance inland, but circumstances had, as late as 1906, prevented this and other attempts to carry the Faith into the interior of Arabia. This vicariate Apostolic has 12,000,000 inhabitants, of whom about 15,000 are Catholics; 11 missions, 4 churches or chapels, 6 stations. (For origins of Arabian Christianity, see CHRISTIANITY IN ARABIA, under ARABIA.)

Arabia, Councils of.—In 248 and 247 two councils were held at Bosra, Arabia, against Bar-Hebreus, Bishop of the see, and others who maintained with him that the soul perished and arose again with the body. Origen was present at these synods and convinced these heretics of their errors (Eusebius, Hist. Ecc., VI, xix; Baronius, Ann. Ecc. ed. an., 248, §§ 4–5).

Arabian School of Philosophy.—Until the eighth century the Arabians, although they expressed their religious feelings in a somewhat mystic poetry, failed to give expression to their thoughts about the world around them, except in so far as those thoughts may be said to be expressed in the Koran. It was only when a separate intercourse with other civilizations, notably with that of Persia, that their speculative and scientific activities were stimulated into action. A circumstance which favoured the study of letters and philosophy was the accession to the thron about A.D. 750 of the Abbasides, an enlightened line of Caliphs who encouraged learning, and patronized the representatives, chiefly Syrian and Persian, of foreign culture. The introduction of foreign ideas resulted in first a profound movement among the followers of Mohammed. There was on the one hand a movement in the direction of heterodoxy, a kind of rationalistic questioning of the authority of the Koran, which led to the rejection of the current anthropomorphism and fatalism. The representatives of this movement were known as the "Mutasillites" or "Dissidents." They were the first heretics of Islam. Opposite to this movement was the orthodox current, tending to emphasize more and more the authority of the Koran, while, at the same time, it attempted to do this by the aid of Greek philosophy and science. The representatives of this movement were called the "Mutasallim," or "professors of the word." They were rationalists; it is true, in so far as they fell back on Greek philosophy for their metaphysical and physical explanations of phenomena; still, it was their aim to keep within the limits of orthodox belief. In this they bore a close resemblance to the first Schoolmen of Rome. In a sense, against both the "Mutasillites" and the "Mutasallim," arose the "Sufa," or "Mystics," who flourished chiefly in the Persian portion of the Arabian Empire. They represented the most extreme phase of protest against all philosophical inquiry; they condemned the use of Greek philosophy even within the limits of orthodoxy, and taught that truth was to be discovered by reverent reading of the Koran and meditation on the words of the sacred text. They placed contemplation above observation and inquiry, and set more value on ecstatic meditation than on the study of Plato and Aristotle. From the conflict of these divergent forces arose, about the ninth century, the tendency of thought represented by the philosophers of Islam. These philosophers had more in common with the Dissidents and the Theologians than with the Mystics; they made ample use of Greek philosophy, and in their free inquiry into the secrets of nature, in which they soon outstripped the Greeks themselves, they paid little attention to the authority of the Koran. For this reason they fell into disrepute with the rulers both in North Africa and Spain, as well as in the East, and instances of persecution, exile, and death inflicted by the Caliphs on the philosophers of Islam were of frequent occurrence from the ninth century to the thirteenth.

Taking its origin from the neo-Platonic schools of Syria and Persia, the philosophy of the Arabs was at first Platonic in spirit and tendency. The Arabs translated the "Timaeus," the "Republic," and the "Laws," and when, attracted by the medical treatises of Galen, they were led to the study of Aristotle, they translated not only the genuine writings of the Stagirite, but also the so-called "Theologia Aristotelis" which was merely a compilation from the "Enneades" of Plotinus, and the famous "Libri de Causis" which was a compilation from the "Theologicae Institutiones" of Theophrastus. From the beginning, they imparted to Aristotelian teaching a neo-Platonic meaning, and even those among them who came to be recognized as the most faithful exponents of Aristotelianism were not entirely free from the influence of the neo-Platonists. Plotinus of reality, an entity of pyramidal God at the apex and material things at the base of the pyramidal structure, Proclus' view of hypostatized universals as constituting a hierarchy of "Causes," mediating between God and matter, came to be the recognized views in the philosophical schools of Eastern and Western Islam.

Among the most famous of the Arabian philosophers of the East were Alkindi or Alkindi (d. about the year 870), Alfarabi (d. about 950), Avicenna, or Ibn Sina (980-1037), the astronomer Alhazen (eleventh century), and Algazel, or Gzali (1055-1111). In the West, that is in Northern Africa and in Moorish Spain, the most celebrated philosophers were the Avempace, Ibn Badis (d. 1198), Abn Bekr, or Ibn Toefal (1100-85), and Averroes, or Ibn Roedh (1126-98). Of these Avempace, Avicenna, and Averroes were best known to the Scholastics. Avicennism, whom the Schoolmen regarded as an Arabian, was in reality a Jewish philosopher and poet, born in Tunisia and inflated by the caliphs of the Aghlabids. The philosophy of Avicenna was distinguished by its originality; in point of fact, it is merely an interpretation of Greek philosophy and, even as an interpretation, adds little to the interpretations already given by Plotinus, Proclus, Simplicius, and the Syrian neo-Platonists. It is Arabian only in the sense that it was written in Arabic—the greatest of its representatives, Alfarabi, Avicenna and Averroes, were not natives of the Arabian peninsula at all. In one respect only did the Arabians develop Greek philosophy, namely, in its relation to medicine, and it was in this regard that they exerted the most far-reaching influence. Like the neo-Platonists from whom they borrowed their interpretation of Aristotle, the Arabians were pantheists or semi-pantheists. Aristotle taught that matter was the eternal substratum of movement; in eternity, taught the Arabians, there was no distinction between the actual and the possible, between the subject and the object, and the Mover. Therefore, whenever the Arabians had the courage of their convictions they taught more or less openly that God, the First Mover, is really the subject of movement, that He and the Universe are substantially identical. The various teachers, however, interpreted the Mover otherwise, more or less successfully between philosophical pantheism and the monotheism of the Koran. With regard to the government of the universe, the Arabians taught that Divine Providence is concerned only with the universal, not with the particular. The world, says Averroes, is a city which is governed from the centre by a ruler whose immediate authority extends only to his own palace, but who, through his subordinates, rules each and every district of the city subject to his sway. This doctrine implied the mediation of numberless beings from the Highest Intelligence down to the lowest material creature. From God, who is indeed the Absolute, the Arabians called the Creator, of the Universe, there emanates in the first place, the First Intelligence (akin to the Αγωγος of Philo), then the Second Intelligence, and so on, down to the lowest of all the cosmic intelligences, the intelligence which animates and directs the sphere of the moon. Each of these intelligences is incorporated in, or inhabited, a heavenly sphere—hence the close dependence of medieval astrology on the Arabians, and on their immediate disciples in astronomy, as, for instance, Roger Bacon (q. v.). The lowest intelligence, to which reference has just been made (the intelligence which rules the sphere of the moon), was Averroes, or Ibn Badis, or Proclus, and in Greece, it is the knowledge of the Averroists in treating of intellectual knowledge Aristotle (see Aristotle and the Aristotelian School). This in that in the acquisition of ideas a twofold mental principle is involved, the one active and the other passive. The text of Aristotle is hence the master of the point. De Anima, Book III, the commentaries on it, are less known what was the Stagirite meant by the "active intellect". The Arabians here, as elsewhere, took up the tradition of the neo-Platonic. The latter had taught that the "active intellect" is something physically distinct from the individual soul; an intelligence, namely, that is, somehow, common to all men. The Arabians adopted this monopsychism and made it part of their psychology. There is, they taught, but one active intellect, and that is common to all men. It resides in the sphere of the moon, but, being brought, in some way, into contact with the individual soul (which thereby "participates" in it), it generates there the universal, abstract, immaterial, idea. This is the impetus which Scholastic philosophy of the unity and separation of the active intellect that the Scholastics directed their attacks on the Arabians. The Scholastics objected to the doctrine on two accounts. They denied that it was a tenable doctrine in psychology, and they denied that it was a faithf ul interpretation of Aristotle. The Scholastics parted the soul into the two parts of Albert the Great and St. Thomas, both of whom wrote special treatises on the unity of the intellect, and on one point at least the most unsympathetic critic of Scholasticism agrees with them, namely, they argue that monopsychism is not in keeping with the general tone and spirit of Aristotlean philosophy.

Another aspect of monopsychism to which the Scholastics did not fail to call attention was its bearing on the question of immortality. The passive intellect, the Arabians taught, is material, and perishes with the body. The active intellect, although it is eternal and blessed, is not one of the parts of the individual soul. There is nothing, therefore, in man that has the power of resisting death; and to say that man is immortal because the personal, universal, intellect is immortal has no more meaning than if one were to say that man is immortal because the laws of nature are immortal. This conclusion is frankly admitted by Averroes, who teaches that according to philosophy the human soul is mortal, although according to theology it is immortal. This admission of the principle of twofold truth (namely, that what is false in philosophy may be true in theology, and vice versa) shows more clearly than any other the impenetrability of the Scholasticism and Scholasticism. The Scholastic movement from beginning to end, whatever may be its deviations and aberrations on other points, held steadfastly to the principle that, since God is the Author of all truth, the truth of reason and the truth of revelation (that is, philosophy and theology) cannot come to any real conflict. The beginning of the decline of Scholasticism dates from the introduction (from Arabic sources) into the Schools of the principle of twofold truth. In the acquisition of knowledge, the Arabians taught, there is a contact (contactus, contactio) of the intellectual active intellect with the individual passive intellect. The contact, indeed, is only momentary. The passive intellect, however, has a longings for the active intellect, desires it, as matter desires form. Hence the tendency on the part of the individual soul towards a more permanent union with the Great Immaterial Intellect, a union that is to be attained by the practice of asceticism and the exercise of the contemplative powers of the mind. In this union man becomes a saint and a seer, a being divine rather than human; in this state of ecstasy all that is base and petty becomes transformed into the sublime and noble, until at last man can exclaim, "I am God". Here again one sees how closely the Arabic reproduces the neo-Platonic doctrine of purification and ecstasy. It is only fair, however, to add that some of the more faithful Aristotelians among the Arabians, such as Averroes, were content to put scientific knowledge in the place of ecstatic contemplation and thus succeeded in avoiding the contradictions implied in the mysticism of the Sufis.

The Arabic philosophy, as is well known, exercised a profound influence on the Scholastic philosophy of the twelfth and succeeding centuries. It is not so well-known that, even when Scholasticism was at its height, when Albert and Thomas were attracting attention by their brilliant exposition of Aristotelian philosophy, there was in the very heart of the Scholastic stronghold, the University of Paris, a group of philosophers who openly professed adherence to the doctrine of Averroes. And this current of Averroism is traceable in the progress of Scholastic philosophy down to the time of the Renaissance. Still, one must not overrate the debt which Scholasticism owes to "Arabism", as it was called. The Arabians contributed in a very large degree to making Aristotle known in Christian Europe; however, in doing this, they were but transmitting what they themselves had learned from their sources; and, moreover, the Aristotle who finally gained recognition in Christian Europe was not the Arabic Aristotle, but the Greek Aristotle, who came to Western Europe by way of Constantinople. The Arabians, in the second place, contributed to medieval medicine, geography, astronomy, arithmetic, and chemistry, but failed to exert any direct influence in philosophy. They provoked discussion, their doctrines were the occasion of disputation and controversy, and thus, indirectly, they contributed to developing the philosophy of the Schools; but, beyond this they cannot be said to have contributed anything of weight to Scholasticism. Indeed the whole spirit of Arabic philosophy—its tendency towards materialistic pantheism, its doctrine of the unity of the intellect, its hesitation on the problem of individual immortality, and, above all, its doctrine of the twofold truth—must have revealed at every point of possible contact the utter impossibility of a reconciliation between Arabic and Scholastic Aristotelianism. It is true the Schoolmen, or some of them at least, drew largely from Avicenna's "Fons Vitae"; but, though they did not suspect it, their teacher in that case was a Jew, not an Arabian. Indeed whatever influence came from the Hebrew translation of the "Fons Vitae", the Scholastics placed the highest emphasis on the enlightenment given to them by the translation of the Arabic. When Arabic works were translated into Latin the translation was often made from the Hebrew translation of the Arabic text, and the Jew was often the only means of interchange of ideas between Moorish and Christian Spain. Whatever Scholasticism owes to the Arabians, it owes in equal, if not in greater measure, to the Jews.

WILLIAM TURNER.

Arabici, a small sect of the third century, whose founder is unknown, and which is commonly named from Armenia, where it flourished, but sometimes also from Dalmatia, where it originated, from the nature of the error. The soul was believed to perish with the body, though both soul and body would be revived again at the day of judgment. The Arabici were misled not, apparently, by any philosophical speculation about the nature of the soul, but by their biblical excesses of doctrine. "I am only death!" This passage, they held, ascribes undying life to God alone, and therefore precludes its unbroken possession by man. They failed to distinguish immortality as it is an essential attribute of God from the imparted immortality which man has from Him. The sect was short-lived, and the Arabici, about forty years of extra time beyond the Church, through the persuasive mediation of Origen, at a council held in 250.

De Arad, the Monastic School of. The three islands of Aran stretch across the mouth of Galway Bay, forming a kind of natural breakwater against the Atlantic Ocean. The largest of the three, called Aran Mor, is about nine miles in length, and little more than one in average breadth. The bluish-grey limestone of which it is entirely composed is as hard as marble and takes a fine polish. In many places it is quite bare; in others the sandy soil affords a precocious sustenance for more than three thousand people who dwell upon the island, and largely supplement the produce of their arid fields by the harvest of the stormy seas around their island home, to which they cling in good or bad times with a passionate love. During three hundred years, from about 500 to 800, Aran Mor and its sister islands were a famous centre of sanctity and learning, which attracted holy men from all parts of Ireland to study the science of the saints in this remote school of the Western world. For nearly a thousand years the coastal islands and the neighbouring islands had long been occupied by a remnant of the ancient Fingol group, who, driven from the mainland, built themselves rude fortresses in the strongest points of the islands, the barbaric ruins of which still excite wonder. Their descendants were still pagans at the close of the fifth century, when St. Enda first dared to land upon their shores, seeking, like so many of the saints of his time, "a desert in the ocean". The inhabitants of the islands at this time were the remnant of a great prehistoric people, whose works, even in their ruins, will outlive the monuments of later and more civilized peoples. Side by side with these magnificent remains of pagan architecture are now to be seen the remains of the churches and cells of Enda and his followers, making the Isles of Aran the most holy, as they are the most interesting spots, within the wide bounds of Britain's insular empire.

Tradition tells us that Enda came first across the North Sound from Caronma Island on the coast of Connemara, and landed in the little bay at Aran Mor under the vallage of Killanehy, to which he has given his name, and near which he founded his first monastery. The fame of his austere sanctity soon spread throughout Erin, and attracted religious men from all parts of the country. Amongst the first who came to visit Enda's island sanctuary was the celebrated St. Brendan—the Navigator, as he is called—who was then revolving in his mind his great project of discovering the promised land beyond the western seas. He came to Aran Mor to find the "Tutor of the Saints of Erin", to drink in heavenly wisdom from the lips of blessed Enda, for Enda seems to have been the senior of all these saintly Irishmen. He was young, and he was loved and revered by them all as a father. Clonard was a great college, but Aran of Enda was the greatest sanctuary and nursery of holiness throughout all the "land of Erin". Here, also, we find Columcille, who had not yet quite schooled his fiery spirit to the patient endurance of injustice or insult. He came to Aran Mor, to find a school and a satchel, to learn divine wisdom in this remote school of the sea. He took his turn at grinding the corn, and herding the sheep, and fishing in the bay; he studied the Latin version of the Scriptures, and learned from Enda's lips the virtues of a true monk, as exemplified by the saint and his companions, and he saw it exemplified in the daily life and godly conversation of the blessed Enda himself, and of the holy companions who shared his studies and his labours. Reluctantly did Columcille leave the sacred isle; and we know, from a poem which he has left, how dearly he loved Enda. "O Enda, my son," he sorrowed when the "Son of God" called him away from that beloved island to preach beyond the seas. He calls it "Aran, the Sun of all the West", another pilgrim's Rome, under whose pure earth he would as soon be buried as nigh to the graves of Saints Peter and Paul. With Columcille at Aran Enda was also the gentle St. Carthadh, St. Aiden, nearly as old as Enda himself; St. Ciaran the Elder of Lismore; the two Sts. Jerys of Glendalough, two brothers; St. MacCreiche of Coremore; St. Lonan Kerr, St. Neehan, St. Guigneus, St. Papes, St. Libeus, brother of St. Enda—all these were there. Enda divided Aran Mor into two parts; one half to be assigned to his own monastery of Killanehy, the other, or western half, to such of his disciples as chose "to erect permanent religious houses on the island". This, however, seems to have been a later arrangement. At first it is said that he had 150 disciples under his own care, but when the establishment greatly increased in numbers, he divided the whole island into ten parts, each having its own religious house and its own superior, while he himself retained a general superintendence over them all. The existing remains prove conclusively that there must have been several distinct monastic houses on the island. We find several of the ruins at Killanehy, at Kilronan, at Kilmurvey, and further west at the "Seven Churches". The islanders still retain many vivid and interesting traditions of the saints and their churches. Fortunately, too, we have in the surviving stones and inscriptions other aids to confirm these traditions, and identify the founders and patrons of the existing ruins. The life of Enda and his monks was very frugal and austere. The day was divided into fixed periods for prayer, labour, and sacred study. Each community had its own church, and its village of stone cells, in which they slept either on the bare ground covered with a bundle of straw, or curled up in the clothes worn by day. They assembled for their daily devotions in the church or oratory of the saint under whose immediate care they were placed; silently they took in a common refectory their fragal meals, which were cooked in a common kitchen, for they had none in their dogkens or stone cells; however cold the weather and the seas. They invariably carried out the monastic rule of procuring their own food and clothing by the labours of their hands. Some fished around the islands; others cultivated patches of oats or barley in sheltered spots between the rocks. Others went out with the net and the basket, and baked it for the use of the brethren. So, in like manner, they spun and wove their own garments.
from the undyed wool of their own sheep. They could grow no fruit in these storm-swept islands; they drank neither wine nor mead, and they had no flesh meat, except perhaps a little for the sick. Sometimes, on the high festivals, or when guests of distinguished company came to make a pilgrimage to the island, one of their tiny sheep was killed, and the brethren were allowed to share—if they chose—in the good things provided for the visitors. Enda himself never tasted flesh meat, and we have reason to believe that many of the monks followed their abbott's example in this as in other respects. Aran was not a school of secular, but of sacred learning. The study of the Scriptures was the great business of its schools and scholars. They set small store indeed on points of minute criticism, their first object being to make themselves familiar with the language of the sacred volume, to meditate on its meaning, and apply it in the guidance of their daily lives.

Aranda, Philip, Jesuit theologian, b. at Moneva, Aragon, 3 February, 1642; d. at Saragossa, 3 June, 1669. He is described by Father Michel de St. Joseph, in his "Bibliographia Critica", as "a most acute theologian, eloquent in speech, and a most practical and expert athlete in the scholastic arena." He entered the Society of Jesus in 1658. He taught philosophy and theology at Saragossa. He published a treatise in 1663, "De Dei scientia, praedestinante et praecedente," which examines ably the entire subject of the scientia media, and solidly and subtly expounds and illustrates the questions of predestination and grace. He explains the mind of St. Augustine, and "without difficulty," it was said, "gave the meaning of his difficult expressions, maintaining that the reference whatever to predestination was a word which he contended was never, even equivocally, used by the great Doctor. He adds an appendix on why the procession of the Second Person is called generation. He wrote on the Incarnation and Redemption; on the natural and supernatural operation of man; on human acts; on good and evil; and the supernatural. He wrote also a "Life of the Servant of God, Isabel Pobar". He was connected with the Inquisition of Aragon and was synodal examiner of the Archdiocese of Saragossa. He was fiercely attacked in a satirical work by Martin Serra, a Dominican, who declared against "the indifferent, headless, inefficacious writings of certain theologians, especially the olla podrida of Father Philip Aranda," an assault which almost evoked an interdict against the church of the friar.

Arason Jón, the last Catholic bishop of Iceland before the introduction of Protestantism, b. 1484; d. 7 November, 1550. He was consecrated Bishop of Hólar by his archbishop in the Metropolitan See of Nidaros (Trondheim), in Norway, 1524. He was a typical Icelandic and a man of extraordinary talents, though poorly versed in Latin, and openly neglectful of the law of celibacy. He was thoroughly devoted to the cause of the Church, but a man of severe and pietistic piety. In 1535, when he was Bishop of Denmark, having ordered a change of religion in Iceland, in 1538, he encountered there the opposition of Ogmundur Pálsson, Bishop of Skálholt, as well as that of Arason. Ogmundur Pálsson, who was old and blind, was made prisoner by Kristoffer Huitfeldt, a royal official, and magistral, and imprisoned, where he died in 1542. His successors were Lutheran bishops. The leadership of the Catholics consequently devolved on the Bishop of Hólar, Arason Jón. He maintained the offensive, in order to rule the Diocese of Skálholt in a Catholic spirit, and to have a Catholic appointed bishop there. Marteinn Einarsson had returned from Denmark, confirmed as bishop by the king, to oppose him; but Arason Jón took him prisoner. Although suspended and declared an outlaw by the king, Arason Jón was encouraged by a letter from Pope Paul III to continue his efforts to extirpate heresy. His energy and his zeal knew no bounds. In an attempt to capture his greatest adversary, Dadi Gudmundsson, he was himself taken prisoner and handed over to the king's brother, Christian Skriver. Christian, however, Marteinn Einarsson, was at once set free, and without awaiting any formal judgment the decapitation of Arason and two of his sons, Are and Björn, who had been stanch allies of their father, was agreed upon.

Some fishermen avenged the death of their bishop by killing Christian Skriver and his adherents in the following year. The body of Arason was then transferred, in triumph, from Skálholt to Hólar. The people, as a sign of their veneration for him, elected his son Jón as his successor. But the election lacked confirmation. Protestantism, now that Catholicism had no leader, met with no open opposition. The people, however, continued to cherish the faith of their fathers for a long time and looked on Arason as a national hero and a martyr. Five Lutheran bishops of Skál, and three of Hólar, were descendants of his, and in later times, among the converts at a Catholic mission given in Iceland was a woman descended from the hero bishop.

Arator, a Christian poet of the sixth century, probably of Ligurian origin. He studied at Milan under the patronage of the Bishop Laurentius and of Ennodius; then went to Ravenna by the advice of Parthenius, nephew of Ennodius. He took up the career of a lawyer. He was treated with courtesy on account of his oration in behalf of the Dalmatians, and protected by Cassiodorus, he entered the service of the Gothic court, but resigned at the time of the struggle with Byzantium (about 536). Pope Vigilius made him Subdeacon of the Roman Church. It was then that he wrote in hexameters two books "De Actibus Apostolorum," and the history of the story of the Acts; the first book, dedicated to St. Peter, concludes with Chapter XII; the second, dedicated to St. Paul, with the martyrdom of the two Apostles. Many important events are omitted, others only alluded to. Arator himself declared that his aim was to give the mystical and moral meaning of the book. Accordingly, he often gives strange interpretations of numbers and names. He endeavours to praise St. Peter at the expense of St. Paul and the other Apostles. His style and versification are fairly correct, and he cleverly evades the entanglements of symbolism. Some of his works were verses prose; and with another subject, Arator could have become a vigorous writer. The poem was very successful. Viglius had the author read it in public at the church of St. Peter ad Vincula. The reading lasted four days, as the poet had to repeat many passages by request of his audience. His work was a success among the populace, and his poetry, when they came to be known. We have also two addresses in distichs written by Arator to the Abbot Florius and to Viglius, as well as a letter to Parthenius. The two latter contain biographical details. The date of the poet's death is unknown.

To-day they are limited to something like the North American “reservations” in the same region. In 1898, they were said to number 73,000, which figure is probably exaggerated. But they are one of the most numerous Indian tribes, as well as the most warlike, in America. When first met by the Spaniards in the middle of the sixteenth century, the Araucanians formed a league of clans, or aílaragues, some forty in number, scattered over four geographical ranges called by them Butalmapu. Their mode of government was, and is even now, very rudimentary. The so-called shamen, or chiefs, exercise little authority. In case of imminent danger, a war chief, or toqui, was chosen by a general council, at which the aílaragues would be as fully represented as possible. The toqui exercises his discretionary authority as long as a war lasts, or as long as he is successful, or the medicine-men support him. Those who are not war-chiefs, or shamans, are numerous among the Araucans and wield great power through their oracular utterances. When the Spaniards first came in contact with the Araucanians, in 1550, the latter were a sedentary tribe, dwelling in wooden buildings, and, like all Indians, constantly in conflict with their neighbours. The land was tilled on a modest scale, chiefly by women. There are no evidences that the Araucanians were exceptionally aggressive, although towards their northern neighbours, the Purumancas, they entertained a special enmity. However, with the successive establishment of threatening towns by Valdivia the conqueror of Chile, their apprehensions were aroused, and hostilities ensued. The first encounters resulted unfavourably for the Araucanians, to whom the weapons and tactics of the Spaniards were a surprise. But they soon began to learn. Valdivia invaded the range of Arauco, and was completely defeated. The 2 December 1553, his force of 500 men annihilated, and himself killed. The tactics then made use of by the Indians under the leadership of the toqui Caupolican and a young Indian named Lautaro, showed military qualities hitherto unobserved among the American aborigines. War with the Araucanians thereafter went on for nearly two centuries with varying success, and no impression was made upon the Indians, who displayed unusual grasp, perspicacity, and aptitude for improvement in everything relating to warfare. They soon made use of the horse and organized a cavalry capable of opposing the Spanish in the open field. They also made use of artillery, and, by the invention or perfection of ingenium, their weapons had been exceedingly primitive. Spears or lances, with points of hard wood, flint, wooden clubs, and clubheads of stone constituted the arms with which they at first successfully encountered the Spanish soldiers. ARAWAKS

Araucanum. See ORANGE, COUNCIL OF.

Arawaks (also Aruacas), the first American indigenes met by Columbus—not to be confounded with the Araucas or Arahouques, linguistically allied to the Chibchas of Columbia—an Indian stock, widely distributed over South America, from the Andes in Peru to the Atlantic coast in Guyana. The Arawaks were met by Columbus only in the Guianas, but they had been met by the West Indians a generation later, in Haiti, Cuba, Jamaica, and Puerto Rico. In the fifteenth century and possibly for several centuries previous, Indians of Arawak stock occupied the Greater Antilles. It is not impossible that up to a certain time before Columbus they may have held all the West Indian islands. Then an intrusive Indian element, that of the Caribs, gradually encroached upon the southern Antilles from the mainland of Venezuela and drove the Arawaks northward. The latter showed decided fear of their aggressors, a feeling increased by the cannibalism of the Caribs.

Generally speaking, the Arawaks are in a condition between savagery and agriculture, and the status varies according to environment. The Arawaks on the Bahamas were practically defenseless against the Caribs. The aborigines of Cuba and Haiti, enjoying superior material advantages, stood on a somewhat higher plane. The inhabitants of Jamaica and Puerto Rico, immediate neighbours of the Caribs, were almost as fierce as the latter and probably as anthropophagous. Wedged in (after the discovery of Columbus) between the Caribs on the South and the Europeans, the former relentless destroyers, the latter startling innovators, the Arawaks were doomed. In the course of half a century they succumbed to the unwanted labour imposed upon them, epidemics doing their share towards extermination. Abuse has been heaped upon Spain for this inevitable result of first contact between races whose civilization was different, and whose ideas were so incompatible. Colonization in its beginnings on American soil had to go through a period of experiments, and the Indians naturally were the victims. Then the experimenters (as is always the case in newly discovered lands) did not at first belong to the most desirable class. Columbus himself (a b. c. v. b. c. d. as i. v. b. c. e. f. de a. b. c. d. e. f. g. h. i. j. k. l. m. n. o. p. q. r. s. t. u. v. w. x. y. z.), conqueror and importers of disease, contributed much to the outcome by measures well intended, but impractical, on account of absolute lack of acquaintance with the nature of American aboriginals. (See COLUMBUS, LAS CABAS.) The Church took a deep interest in the fate of the Antillean Arawaks. The Hieronymites and, later, the Dominicans defended their cause, and propagated Christianity among them. They also carefully studied their customs and religious beliefs. Fray Roman Pane, a Hieronymite, has left us a very remarkable report on the lore and ceremonial of the Indians of Hayti (published in Italian in 1571, in Spanish in 1572), in the second volume of his history. The anonymous descriptions, from anonymous, but surely ecclesiastical, sources, are contained in the "Documentos inéditos de Indias". The report of Fray Roman Pane antedates 1508, and it is the purely ethnographic treatise on American Indians.

While lamenting the disappearance of the Indians of the Antilles, writers of the Columbian period have, for controversial effect, greatly exaggerated the numbers of these people; hence the number of victims charged to Spanish rule. It is not possible that Indians constantly warring with each other, and warring upon by an outside enemy like the Caribs, not given to agriculture except in as far as women

He wrote a catechism in the native language of Brazil. Southwell says of it: "This catechism, begun by others in Brazil, he augmented considerably. It was published at Lisbon under his name, and is regarded as without a superior in the catechetical art. It was afterwards translated into the native American tongue."

ARAUJO, FRANCISCO DE, Spanish theologian, b. at Verin, Galicia, 1580; d. Madrid, 19 March, 1664. In 1601, he entered the Dominican Order at Salamanca. He taught theology (1616-17) in the convent of St. Paul at Burgos, and in the latter year was made Professor of Theology at Salamanca. Six years later he succeeded to the chair, and held it until 1648, when he was appointed Bishop of Sevoga. In 1656 he resigned his see, and retired to the convent of his order at Madrid. His writings are: Commentary on the "Metaphysics" of Aristotle (2 vols., Salamanca, 1617; 2d ed., ibid. 1631); "Opuscula tripartita, h. e. in tres controversias tripticis theologiarum divinae" etc. (Douay, 1633); a commentary in seven volumes on the "Summa" of St. Thomas (Salamanca and Madrid, 1635-47); "Variae et selectae decisiones morales ad stat. eccl. et civil. pertinentes" (Lyons, 1647); a Grammar of the Hebrew Language (Lyons, 1647). In the second volume of his commentary on the "Prima Secundae" there is a treatise on Predistribution and Grace, the doctrine of which is Molinistic. Martines de Prado has proved that this was not written by Araujo, who, in a later work, shows clearly his adherence to the Thomistic tenets with respect to these questions.

worked the crops, without domestic animals, in an excruciating climate, could have been nearly as numrous as, for instance, Las Casas asserts. The exsemiation of the Antillean Arawaks under Spanish rule had not yet been impartially written. It is no worse a page of history than many filled with English atrocies, or than those which tell how the North American aborigines have been disposed of in the roomy white man. The Spaniards did not, and could not, yet know the nature and possibilities of the Indian.
They could not understand that a race physically well-endowed, but the men of which had no conception of work, could not be suddenly changed into hardy tillers of the soil and miners.
And even the conqueror of the latter had to admit that their original homes were on the eastern slope of the Andes, where the Campos (Chunchos or Antis) represent the Arawak element, together with the Shipibos, Piroes, Conibos, and other tribes of the extensive Pano group. A Spanish officer, Pedro de Candia, first discovered them in 1538. The earliest attempts at Christianization are due to the Jesuits. They made, previous to 1602, six distinct efforts to convert the Chunchos, from the side of Huánuco in Peru, and from northern Bolivia, but all these efforts were failures. There are also traces that a Jesuit had penetrated those regions, in 1581, more as an explorer than as a missionary. Notwithstanding the ill-success accompanying the first ef-facts, the Jesuits persevered, and founded missions among the Moxos, one of the most southerly branches of the Arawaks, and also among the Baures. Those missions were, of course, abandoned after 1677.
During the eighteenth century there were attempts, the field of which the Jesuits were deprived, especially the missions among the Pano or Shipibo tribes of the Beni region of Bolivia. The late Father Rafael Sanz was one of the first to devote himself to the difficult and dangerous task, and he was followed by the Jesuits Antonio Amezcua, who is now Bishop of La Paz. The latter has also done very good work in the field of linguistics. Missions among the Goajiroes in Colombia, however, had but little success. Of late the tribe has become more approachable. The Arawaks of the upper Amazonian region were probably met by Alonso Mercadillo, in 1537, and may have been seen by Orellana in 1538-39. The Arawak tribes occupying almost exclusively the southern banks of the Amazon, they were reached by the missionaries later than the tribes on the north bank. Franciscans accompanied Juan de Salinbas Loyola (a relative of St. Ignatius) in 1555, but the results of these expeditions were not permanent.

In the heart of the Andean region the Friars of the Order of Our Lady of Mercy (Mercedarios) were the first to establish permanent missions. Fray Francisco Ponce de Leon, "Commander of the colonial city of Jaén de Oregamoros", and Diego Vaca de Vargas, Governor of Jaén, organized in 1619 an expedition down the Maranon to the Maynas.
In 1619 they founded the Mission of San Francisco Borja, which still exists as a settlement. The first baptisms of Indians took place 22 March, 1620. The year following, Father Ponce made an expedition lower down the Amazon, beyond the mouth of the Rio Huallaga where he came in contact with the Arawak tribes, to whom he preached, and some of whom he baptised. The Franciscans entered from the direction of Jauja or Tarma, towards Chancha-mayo, in 1631 and 1635. The first foundation was at Quimiri, where a chapel was built. Two years later, the founders, Fathers Gerónimo Ximénez and Cristóval Larios, died at the hands of the Campes on the Péréné River. Work was not interrupted, however, and three years later (1640) there were esablished about the salt-hill of Vitoc seven chapels, each with a settlement of Indian converts. But in 1742 the appearance of the Arawaks in the region of the Maypures and Maynas, so extensively converted and so large in number, seemed to envisioned an almost general uprising of the aborigines.
Until then the missions had progressed remarkably.
Of the most savage tribes, like the Conibos, they became at least partly reduced to obedience, and led a more sedate, orderly life. In 1725 the College of Ocopa was founded. All these gains (except the College of Ocopa and the regions around Tarma and Cajamarmilla) were lost until, after 1751, Franciscan missionaries again began to enter the lost territory, and even added new conquests among the fiercest Arawaks (Cashibos) on the Ucayali.
Conversion in these regions has not been less than thirty-four ecclesiastics having perished at the hands of Indians of Arawak stock in the years between 1637 and 1766. Missionary work among the Arawaks of Guyana and on the banks of the Orinoco, began, in a systematic maner, in the second half of the seventeenth century, and was carried on from the Spanish side among the Maypures of the Orinoco, from the French side along the coast and the Essequibo River. Wars between France, England, and Holland, the indifferent, systemless ways of French colonization, but chiefly the constant incursions of the Caribs, incorporated or overtaken in the progress of the missions. Ethnologically the Arawaks vary in condition. Those of Guyana seem to be partly dedentate. They call themselves Lokonono. They are well built. Descent among them is in the female line, and they are polygamous. They are land-tillers and hunters. Their houses are sheds, open on one side, and the women are the weavers of the wooden clubs. Their religious ideas are, locally varied, those of all Indians, animism or fetishism, with an army of shamans, or medicine-men, to uphold
it. Of the Campes and the tribes comprised within the Pano group, about the same may be stated, with the difference that the Arawaks are generally considered as fierce cannibals (Cashibos and Conibos).
It must be observed, however, that this cannibalism is,
under certain conditions, practised by all the forest tribes of South America, as well as by the Aymará of Bolivia. It is mostly a ceremonial practice and, at the bottom, closely related to the custom of scalping.

The "Letters of Columbus" contain the earliest information about the American Indians. The first letter, 22 February, 1493, were Arawaks. The report

AD. F. BANDELLER.

Arbitration, in a general sense, is a method of arranging differences between parties by referring them to a disinterested outsider whose decision the parties to a dispute agree in advance to accept as in some way binding. The whole process of arbitration involves the reference of issues to an outside party, investigation, decision, acceptance or enforcement of it. The condition which invites arbitration is one wherein a number of persons of equal, or nearly equal power, disagree obstinately concerning a right, privilege, or duty, and refuse to come to terms themselves. The underlying assumptions are that the sense of fairness is dulled in the opponents by advocacy of self-interest, and by obstinacy, and that the judgment of a capable disinterested outsider will command the parties to do justice and equity. The motive which prompts appeal to arbitration is found finally in society's desire to eliminate force as a sanction of right, and to introduce effectively the principles of the ethical order into the settlement of disputes among its members. Courts, rules of law and procedure have as their purpose the protection of order and justice by compelling men to settle vital differences in a peaceful manner. In the main, society must always trust to the common sense, honour, and conscience of men to arrange peacefully the differences which arise in everyday life. When, however, differences of actual or possible grave social consequences arise, wherein high principles or great interests are involved, and the parties of themselves fail to agree, society attempts to secure order by creating institutions to decide the situation according to predetermined rules of law. The movement to introduce arbitration is somewhat a development of disputes between laborers and employers is an effort in society to lift such conflicts from the plane of brute force to the level of the ethical order; to provide a rational method of settling such disputes as fail to be resolved by other peaceful means.

The Issues.—The issues which have arisen between labourers and employers concern the division of profits in industry or the rate of wages, and the formal recognition of labour unions, which professedly claim a right to have a voice with the employer in determining questions of hours, methods of work, conditions of work, manner of payment of wages, and disputes generally connected with the arrangement of terms to govern future relations or the interpretation of the terms of an already-existing labour contract.

The Parties.—As a rule, the labour union and not the individual is a party to the industrial conflict. The individual cannot assert his right of equality with his employer. Only a large body of labourers in an industry or a factory is strong enough to raise an issue effectively against an employer. An active and advanced minority of the labouring class have created labour unions which undertake the care of the interests of the members, and aim to deal on equal footing with the employer. Where the men in a shop or factory are not unionized, they may organize temporarily to enforce a demand or resist a policy, but, generally speaking, it is the union which is invoked when there is conflict between employers and labourers. Until recently, each employer, in his individual capacity, dealt with his working men or with the union. In late years, however, organizations of employers have been built up extensively and they now tend to replace the individual employer in dealing with organized labour.

The Place of Arbitration.—As industrial evolution has been much more rapid than the adjustment of social institutions, serious conflicts of interest, of views, of principles, have arisen in the industrial world, to arrange which, with final authority, we have in fact neither accepted methods nor adequate institutions. The way has thus been left open to permit the settlement of these disputes by trial to the arbitral or economic power of the parties to resist. The strike and the lockout, with their accompanying secondary phases, are the last resort to which industrial conflicts are, by a sort of necessity, referred. The penalties suffered by society are found in social disorder, estrangement, widely felt disturbance of business, and enormous financial losses. In the face of this incredible condition, public opinion and the enlightened self-interest of labourers and employers have begun the work of creating and testing peaceful methods by which differences may be anticipated and prevented, or if not prevented, settled in a secure, just, and peaceful manner. In the creation of these institutions the principle of making the conditions of industrial peace, society is held back to an extent by traditional principles, settled views, established interests and constitutional problems. This has tended to turn the current of effort towards non-legal rather than legal methods of industrial peace. Arbitration, conciliation, mediation, trade agreements, shop committees, joint conferences, are some of the institutions that have resulted. The function of arbitration is best understood when the institution is seen in relation to the whole industrial situation out of which it springs.

1.—To a great extent relations between the unorganized labourers and employers are peaceful. If labourers ask only what employers offer, or employers give all that labourers ask, there is no prospect of difficulty while such conditions endure. Whether one explains the peaceful relations referred to by apathy, weakness, or hopelessness of unorganized labour, or by the benevolence of employers, or by the antagonism to the labour union, one should not overlook the fact that in a very large section of the industrial field relations are peaceful.

2.—Relations between employers and labour unions are to a considerable extent peaceful and at times even cordial, though without any formal effort at definite antici pation of trouble. Whatever the explanation, whether the generosity of the employer or the consertrative effect of the union, the relations between them are largely peaceful, a fact which is a well-known and often very costly. In many districts, the only effect of peace is to increase the distress of the unemployed, who are left to a state of subjection. 3. In another increasing class the relations of employers and labourers are cordial, or at least peaceful, through formal, mutual understandings, and oral or written contracts. In these cases the accredited representatives of employers and of labour unions meet and decide the questions bearing on the contract of labour, reach conclusions, and embody them in some form of definite understanding to cover a given period. In such cases provision is usually made for the peaceful settlement of unforeseen minor disputes. The classes referred to show that industrial peace does actually exist to a considerable extent already. However, it still remains possible that disagreement, estrangement, war, appear in any of the classes referred to. Hence no statistical enumeration of the numbers of employers and labourers who live and labour peacefully covers the whole situation. We lack still a final authoritative institution which will be prepared to settle in a peaceful manner the conflicts that may arise. The possibility of strike or lockout in the classes enumerated being recognized, we may proceed to consider employers and unions actually at war. Assuming that the employer takes action adverse to the union's will, or vice versa, threats may be made, counter-threats may be, war may be declared, causing a strike, or lockout, with its train of varied evils. The contest is then thrown to the level of brute force, each party depending on his own economic power to resist, and on the expectation of the harm that may come to his opponent. In advance of the actual suspension, the party may prepare for the declaration of strike, or at any time during a strike, the parties may endeavour either to prevent an outbreak, or to terminate it, by efforts at compromise among themselves. If they fail to do so, representatives of the public, of civil, of religious, of political organizations, may intervene to induce them to come to an agreement among themselves for the sake of the public. If all such efforts fail of result, one peaceful recourse is left, namely, to ask the parties, who of themselves will not agree, to place the issue in the hands of a disinterested tribunal and abide by the decision. When this is done, the process is called Arbitration. A tribunal is appointed to and does not have to be a forum for the particular parties arrange the terms of the labour contract formally and for a definite period, the process is called Trade

Arbitration, or collective bargaining, defined by the Industrial Commission as "the process by which the general terms of the labour contract itself, whether the contract be written or oral, are determined by negotiation directly between employers or employees' associations and organized workmen."

When differences of any kind arise, whether of great or of minor importance, if the parties them-

mission as the settlement by the parties between themselves of minor disputes, as to the interpretation of the terms of the labour contract, whether that contract be an express one or only a general understanding", while it is further stated that in England quite commonly the term conciliation is applied to "the discussion and settlement of questions between the parties heretofore settled by the parties or their agents who are themselves actually interested". Trade agreements, as a rule, provide for the reference of unforeseen minor disputes to a board of conciliation composed of representatives of both sides. The intervention of outside parties who seek to induce the opponents to arrive at a peaceful settlement of their differences, is called Mediation, defined by the Industrial Commission as "the intervention, usually uninvited, of some outside person or body, with a view to bringing the parties to the dispute together in conciliatory conferences". When there is no agreement that an outside party is to intervene in the dispute, and they agree to refer it to a third party or body for judgment, the process is called Arbitration, defined by the Industrial Commission as "the authoritative decision of the issues as to which the parties have failed to agree, by some person or persons other than the parties". Arbitration involves, therefore, reference of issues to a third party, investigation, decision, action on the decision by the antagonists. It is greatly to be regretted that usage has not succeeded in establishing clear definitions. One may, however, avoid confusion if one will distinguish the following situations: (1) Informal peaceful relations between unions and employers; (2) Formal peaceful relations provided for in trade agreements in advance of any estrangement or difference; (3) After differences have arisen, all efforts made by the parties themselves to establish peace, whether before or after a strike has been declared; (4) Reference to outside parties of the issues and authoritative decision by them; (5) Intervention of disinterested outsiders, who aim to induce the parties to arrange for peace, either among themselves or through reference to outside parties. To these situations respectively, excluding the first, the terms trade agreements, conciliation, and intervention, may be applied.

LIMITS OF ARBITRATION.—It would be a mistake to assume that arbitration is a panacea. It is not necessarily effective beyond the term for which a decision is made. While the elements of conflict remain in society the possibility of dispute remains. Hence, at best, arbitration is a temporary expedient, one of the highest importance no doubt, but it does not eradicate the evils to which it is applied. There are certain issues between employers and labourers which will not be submitted to arbitration; fundamental rights claimed by each party and held to be beyond the realm of dispute. Thus, for instance, the labour union will not submit to arbitration the question of the right of the labourer to join a union or the right of the union to represent its members. On the other hand, the employer would not submit to arbitration his right to manage his own business. The Industrial Commission remarks: Whether it is for the benefit of the parties or the public, whether arbitration as questions of interpretation is perhaps doubtful. It is certainly the case that minor questions are more often arbitrated than those of great importance involving general conditions of future labour."

KINDS OF ARBITRATION.—Arbitration is voluntary when it is freely invited, or accepted by the parties to the controversy, without reference to law, when only good faith is involved in the acceptance of the decision. It is compulsory when the civil law compels the parties to the industrial conflict to submit to the decision of a board of arbitration. The law may require a legal board of arbitration on behalf of the parties to the controversy, render a decision, and make public a report. The decision in this case has no binding power and no sanction other than that of public opinion. The law may provide a board which the parties may invoke if they wish, whose decision is binding when both parties join in request for action. The law may provide encouragement, opportunity, boards, of which employers and labourers may avail themselves in case of dispute. In such cases the law may or may not confer upon a board power to administer oaths, to subpoena witnesses and compel the production of papers and books. In no case is arbitration the rule to represent the conflicting-interests by equal numbers of representatives who agree on an umpire and thus complete the organization of the

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION.—Sentiment throughout the powerful industrial nations seems to be unanimous against compulsory arbitration, which involves legal enforcement of decision. Labour unions, employers, and representatives of the public generally, in the United States, and in Europe as well, agree in opposing it. The sentiment against it is perhaps strongest in the United States, as is shown by the amount of testimony collected by the Industrial Commission. Compulsory investigation and decision with publication of facts and of decision is frequently favoured where great interests are involved, as in interstate commerce, and not a few are found who favour enforcement of decision where both parties invoke arbitration. New Zealand alone has attempted full compulsory arbitration. The reasons alleged against compulsory arbitration are numerous. It appears to invade the property rights of the employer, or the personal liberty of the labourer, since the former might be compelled by the court to give wages against which he might strongly object, and the latter might be forced to labour in spite of himself. It is difficult to make the action of compulsory arbitration reciprocal, since the employer is more easily held than the labour union, unless the latter be incorporated and be made financially responsible, a condition from which the unions usually shrink. As arbitration is not binding by a rule of law, it is feared that sympathy with the weaker party might sway them, and that they would be inclined to "split the difference", thereby ensuring some gain to labour, a prospect which, it is said, might encourage strikes and prompt unreasonable demands. It is claimed that decisions unfavourable to labourers would tend to strengthen the already-growing suspicion of government and of courts. Furthermore, the employer sees in compulsory arbitration divided jurisdiction in his business, interference of outsiders who lack technical knowledge, probable overturning of discipline, and a weakening of his position, points that were made with some feeling against Cardinal Manning in his mediation in the great Dock Strike. Fear is expressed that employers would be driven to organize for self-protection, that they would be inclined to raise prices, or adulterate products, in order to offset losses occasioned by adverse decisions of arbitrators. There are in addition constitutional difficulties which in most modern nations might make the operation of compulsory arbitration difficult, even if the public were to accept it. It is urged in favour of compulsory arbitration that the prospect of it would inevitably create a more conciliatory attitude of mind in employers and labourers, that common fear of undesirable results would develop the practice of trade agreement and conciliation, that society would thereby gain finally legal guarantee of industrial peace, and would be spared the enormous losses, confusion, and violence that result from strikes. The modern tendency is away from arbitration—enforcement of decision when both parties agree to submit to arbitration, and compulsory arbitration where vital public interests are immediately concerned, as in interstate commerce—avoid many of the objections and appear to promise good results.

Voluntary Arbitration.—That opposition to compulsory arbitration is directed against the compulsory feature, and not against arbitration as such, is seen from the practical sympathy, and even enthusiasm, with which voluntary arbitration is received. In the United States, which may be taken as the model, there are forms of voluntary arbitration—industry, and speaking strongly in favour of voluntary arbitration. It deplores strikes, provides careful scrutiny and a thorough test of feeling before permitting strikes, and generally provides for appeal to conciliation or arbitration. Mr. Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, said before the Conciliation and Arbitration in Chicago, in 1894: "As one who has been intimately and closely connected with the labour movement for more than thirty years from boyhood, I say to you that I have yet to receive a copy of a Constitution of any general organization, or local organization, of labour which has not the remark in regard to it that work not undertaken, conciliation or arbitration shall be tried; and, with nearly twelve thousand local trade unions in the United States, I think that this goes far to show that the organizations of labour are desirous of encouraging amicable arrangements of such schedules and conditions of labour as shall tend to peace." This is fully corroborated by the Industrial Commission, which said in its report, six years later, that "the rule of local and national trade unions, almost without exception, provides for conciliatory negotiations with employers before a strike may be entered upon. In nearly all trade agreements, a provision is made for arbitration, and in disputes, whenever minority disputes of any kind arise. As to employers, one should recall that all employers who stand in friendly relations with union labour, either informally, or formally, in trade agreements, are presumptively favourable to arbitration. The employer who refuses to arbitrate whenever the union is inclined not to favour arbitration, since it involves recognition of the union. He may be willing to meet a committee of his men and hear complaints, and even grant demands, but his method is not that of arbitration. The following, from the Principles of the National Association of Manufacturers, adopted in 1904, is typical. The Association "favours an equitable adjustment of the differences between employers and employees by any amicable method that will preserve the rights of both parties", though at the same time the Association declares that it will permit no interference by organizations. The Republican National Platform of 1896, as well as the Democratic, declared in favour of arbitration in inter-state-commerce controversies. Nothing on the subject appeared in either platform in 1900. The Republican platform of 1904 contained only an endorsement of President Roosevelt's mediation and conciliation of 1902. The Democratic platform declared directly for arbitration without qualification. A remarkable expression of public opinion in the United States is seen in the creation of the National Civic Federation which has held a number of national conferences in the interest of industrial peace. Representatives of employers, of labouring men, of political life, of churches, of academic circles, have met in these conventions and their endorsements of attempts to establish industrial peace, through trade agreements, conciliation, and voluntary arbitration, have been unanimous and enthusiastic. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States forms six committees on industrial peace, and the Labour and Capital whose duty it is "to hold themselves in readiness to act as arbitrators should their services be desired between the men and their employers with the view to bringing about mutual conciliation and harmony in the spirit of the Prince of Peace." The action of Cardinal Manning in the Strike in London in 1889, together with his great efforts to establish boards of conciliation in the London District; the presence and activity of Archbishop Ireland in the National Civic Federation; the efforts of Archbishop Ryan in the Philadelphia strike, in 1896; the work of Bishop Quigley in the strike of 1897 in Chicago; and Bishop Ignatius, in the strike of 1902, that of Bishop Hoban, of Scranton, in the street-car strike of 1903, and in 1906; the activity of Bishop Spalding in the anthracite-strike commission in 1902-3, the strong public approbation given by His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, and as well many instances of successful activity by clergymen, all serve to show that Catholic leaders recognize the value of conciliation and arbitration in promoting industrial peace. In France, Belgium, Germany, and Italy we find the Catholic attitude equally strong. In these countries the endorsement of the organization of labour is most emphatic, as is also the demand by representative Catholics for recognition of organizations of labour, for boards of conciliation and arbitration, all of which is in harmony with the spirit and teaching of Leo XIII, who, in his encyclical on the condition of the working men, expresses strong approval of conciliatory methods in arranging disputes between labour and capital.

GOVERNMENTAL ARBITRATION.—The Government of the United States enacted laws, in 1888 and 1896, by which provision is made for mediation, conciliation, or arbitration, in interstate commerce disputes.
If both parties join in requesting action, the decision of the board is enforceable in equity for one year.
The law authorizes an investigation, decision, and publication of decision, whether or not such action is invited. The only effect produced by the law was the creation of the strike commission to investigate the anthracite strike in 1902. In 1895 twenty-five States of the Union had made legal provision for arbitration, the earliest law being that of Maryland, of 1878. There are four forms of boards: (1) Local arbitration without permanently constituted boards, found in four States; (2) Permanent district or county boards, established by private parties, found in four States; (3) Arbitration or Conciliation through the State Commissioner of Labour, found in five States; (4) State boards for the settlement of industrial disputes, found in seventeen States.
In some States several types of institution may be found. The laws in the first group of States are practically dead letters. The same may be said of the second group, with the exception of Pennsylvania, where some effect has been produced. Intervention by State Commissioners of Labour has had but moderate success. In only eight of the seventeen States which have State boards of arbitration have real results been accomplished. The States are New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Ohio, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri. The records, for instance, of New York and Massachusetts are repre-

In England the present law dates from 1896. It provides for the registration of private boards of conciliation or arbitration by the Board of Trade, and it permits the Board of Trade in times of dispute to investigate and mediate, on the request of either party, or to appoint a board of conciliation, or on the request of both parties to create a board of arbitration. In the period of 1896-1903, requests for in-
rendered, and it applies to all labourers who may work for an employer affected by the decision. The court may extend an award to a whole competitive field. The law concerning arbitration applies to all employers potentially, but only to such labour organizations as are registered. Registration is voluntary. Hence compulsory arbitration in New Zealand depends absolutely on the favourable attitude of organized labour towards it. In 1904 there were 266 registered unions with a membership of 27,640. In seven years, under the action of the law, fifty-four cases of dispute were settled by boards of arbitration. The higher courts have ruled in this respect.

Arbogast (Gaelic Arascaich), Saint, has been claimed as a native of Scotland, but this is owing to a misunderstanding of a name "Scotia", which is how the Middle Ages really meant Ireland. He flourished about the middle of the seventh century. Leaving Ireland, as so many other missionaries had done, he settled as a hermit in a German forest, and then proceeded to Alase, where his real name, Arascaich, was changed to Arbogast. This change of name was owing to the difficulty experienced by foreigners in pronouncing Irish Christian names; thus it is Moengal, Maelmaedhog, Cellach, Gillais, Gilla in Coimmed, Tuathal, and Arascaich were respectively transformed into Marcellus, Malaclu, Gall, Gelasius, Germanus, Tuttul, and Arbogast.

St. Arbogast found a warm friend in King Dagobert II of Austrasia, who had been educated at Saine, in Meath, in Ireland, and was restored to his kingdom on the demise of King Childebert II. Monstrelet authenticates the story of King Dagobert in Ireland; and the royal exile naturally fled to Saine in order to be under theegis of the Ard-Righ (High-King) of Ireland, at Tara. On Dagobert's accession to the throne of Austrasia, Arbogast was appointed Bishop of Strasburg, and was famed for sanctity and miracles. It is related that the Irish saint raised to life Dagobert's son, who had been killed by a fall from his horse. St. Arbogast died in 678, and, at his request, was buried on the slopes of a mountain, where only malefactors were interred. The site of his burial was subsequently deemed suitable for a church. He is commemorated 21 July.

Arbroath Abbey of.—This monastery was founded on the east coast of Scotland (1178) by William, the Lion, for Benedictines, and was colonized by monks from Kelso. The foundation was in honour of St. Thomas of Canterbury, martyred eight years previously, with whom William had been on terms of personal friendship. At his death in 1214 William was buried in the eastern portion, then just finished, of the noble church, which was completed in 1233. It had a choir of three bays and a nave of nine, with side aisles, two transepts, a central and two western towers. The monastery was richly endowed by William and his successors, and by various Scottish barons, and was one of the most opulent in the kingdom. The monks constructed a harbour, and fixed a bell on the Incheape Rock as a warning to mariners. The last Abbot of Arbroath was David Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, 1459-1508. After his death, the abbey was bestowed on the Hamiltons, the abbey being erected into a temporal lordship. Services were held up to 1590 in the lady-chapel, "stripped of its altars and images". The existing ruins of the church are considerable and imposing, but of the conventual buildings only a few fragments remain.

Arbuthnott, Missal of, a manuscript Scottish missal or mass-book, written in 1491 by James Sibald, priest of Arbuthnott, in Scotland, for use in that church. After the Reformation, it, together with two other MSS. written in the same hand, became the property of the family of Arbuthnott, in whose possession it remained until 1897, when it was purchased by Mr. Archibald Coats of Paisley, who presented it to the museum of that town. The MS. is written on vellum, in large Gothic characters, with numerous miniatures, illuminated capitals and borders. It consists of 244 leaves and is complete. It contains also a full-length painting of St. Ternan, the apostle of the Picts, and patron saint of the church of Arbuthnott. It is of unique historical and liturgical interest, as being the only missal of the Scottish Use now extant. It commences with a leaf of "Fraeres be Maes", then follows the Form of Excommunion in Scottish and Latin, succeeded by three leaves of rubrics and the calendar. The mass itself is mainly that of Sarum with some variations, and, of the typical editions of the Sarum missal, that of 1498 agrees most closely with it. The Sarum Rite, as emended by St. Osmond of Salisbury in the eleventh century, after having been adopted in most of the English dioceses, penetrated into Scotland early in the twelfth century, and continued in use there up to the Reformation. The differences between the Arbuthnott and the Sarum missals lie chiefly in the Sancitorale. Masses for certain saints being found in the one which is lacking in the other. The Arbuthnott missal contains also a number of Sequences, not to be found in either the Sarum, York, or Hereford missals, nor yet in the MS. troparium in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

Arcæ, a box in which the Eucharist was kept by the primitive Christians in their homes. St. Cyprian (De lepide, xxvi) tells of a woman “who with unworthy hands” attempted “to open her box in which the Holy (Body) of the Lord”, but was unable to do so because of fire which issued therefrom the moment she touched it. (Cum quaedam arcam suam in quo Domini sanctum fuit manus immundis tempus aperiens, etc.). A representation of the last words is represented by Wilpert to exist in a fresco of the catacomb of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus. The scene depicts Christ seated, reading from an open roll; on His right are three amphoræ, and on the left a square box filled with loaves, symbols of the Eucharist. It also signified a receptacle for the offerings of Christians for the Arcadian. See John Chyrsostom, Saint.

Arcadus, also Arca, now Tel-Arka, a titular see on the coast of Phoenicia, between Tripolis and Antara, suffragan of Tyre. Its episcopal list is given in Gams (p. 434) from 364 to 451. It was a Latin see during the Crusades, and now gives a title to a Greek and a Maronite bishop. In antiquity it was famous for the worship of Aphrodite and for a temple of the Roman Emperor, Alexander Severus, who was born there in a temple during a visit of his parents. It had long sieges by the Arab corsairs of Saracen, in the seventh century, and in the eleventh (1099) by the Crusaders into whose hands it eventually fell. Later it was destroyed by the Mamelukes after they had expelled the Christian population. There was another Arca in Cappadocia, suffragan of Nicosia. Its episcopal list (451-890) is given in Gams (p. 441).

Arcanum, an Encyclical Letter on Christian marriage, issued 10 February, 1880, by Leo XIII. Its object is to show that, since family life is the germ of society, and marriage is the basis of family life, the healthy condition of civil no less than of religious society depends on the inviolability of the marriage contract. The argument of the Encyclical runs as follows: The mission of Christ was to restore man in the supernatural order. That should benefit man also in the natural order; first, the individual; and then, as a consequence, human society. Having laid down this principle, the Encyclical deals with Christian marriage which sanctifies the family, i.e. the unit of society. The marriage contract, Divinely instituted, had from the beginning two properties: unity and indissolubility. Through human weakness and willfulness it was corrupted in the course of time; polygamy destroyed its unity, and divorce its indissolubility. Christ restored the original idea of human marriage, and to sanctify more thoroughly this institution He raised the marriage contract to the dignity of a sacrament. Mutual rights and duties were secured to parents and children; and mutual rights and duties between parents and children were also asserted; to the former, authority to govern and the duty of training; to the latter, the right to parental care and the duty of reverence. Christ instituted His Church to continue His mission to men. The Church, true to her commission, has always maintained the unity and indissolubility of marriage, the relative rights and duties of husband, wife, and children; she has also maintained that the natural contract in marriage having been raised to the dignity of a sacrament, these two are henceforth one and the same thing so that there cannot be a marriage contract amongst Christians which is not a sacrament. Hence, while admitting the right of civil authority to regulate the civil concerns and consequences of marriage, the Church has always claimed exclusive authority over the marriage contract and its essentials, since it is a sacrament. The Encyclical shows by the light of history that for centuries the Church exercised, and the civil power admitted, that authority. But human weakness and willfulness began to throw off the bridle of Christian discipline in family life; civil rulers began to disown the authority of the Church over the marriage tie; and rationalism sought to sustain them by establishing the principle that the marriage contract is no contract at all, or at least that the natural contract and the sacramental are separable and distinct things. Hence arose the idea of the dissolubility of marriage and divorce, superseding the unity and indissolubility of the marriage bond. The Encyclical points to the consequences of that departure in the breaking up of family life, and its evil effects on society at large. It points out as a consequence, that the Church, in associating authority over marriage ceremonies, has shown itself not only the enemy but the best friend of the civil power and the guardian of civil society. In conclusion, the Encyclical commissions all bishops to oppose civil marriage, and it warns the faithful against the dangers of mixed marriages.

Arch.—A structure composed of separate pieces, such as stone or bricks, having the shape of truncated wedges, arranged on a curved line so as to retain their position by mutual pressure. This method of construction is called arcuated, in contradistinction to the trabeated style used in Greek architecture, where the voids between column and column, or between column and wall, were spanned by lintels. These separate stones which compose the—here by an arch—called vousoirs, or arch-stones. The lowest vousoirs are called springers. The springers usually have one or both joints horizontal. The upper surface of the springer, against which the first vousoir of the real arch (that is, in which both joints radiate) starts, is said to be skewbacked; the upper face of the vousoir is called the keystone. The under, or concave, side of the vousoir is called the intrados or soffit, and the upper, or convex, side, the extrados of the arch. The suppo. is which afford resting and resisting points to the arch are called piers and abutments. The upper part of the pier or abutment where the arch rests—specifically, where it springs from—is the impost. The span of an arch is, in circular arches, the length of its chord, and generally, the width between the points of its opposite impostes whence it springs. The rise of an arch is the height of the highest point of its intrados above the line of the impost; this point is sometimes called the semicircle of the crown. If an arch be enclosed, or is imagined as being enclosed, in a square, then the spaces between the arch and the square are its spandrels.

Fomia of Arch.—In Rome and Western Europe, the pointed type of arch is the semicircular. In this the centre is in the middle of the diameter. Where the centre is at a point above the diameter, it is called a stilted arch. When the arch is formed of a curve that is less than a semicircle (a segment of a circle), with its centre below the diameter, it is called a segmental arch. Or if the curve is greater than a semicircle and has its centre above the diameter, it is called the horseshoe arch. All these arches are struck from one centre. The second class is struck from two centres. This arch is the pointed. There are three chief varieties. The first is the equilateral. In this the two centres coincide with the line of the diameter. The second, acutely pointed, is the lancet. In this the centres are on the line of the diameter, but outside it. The third is the obtuse, or drop, arch. In this the centres are still on the line of the diameter, but inside. The third class consists of arches struck from three centres. The first is the employer of the pointed. The second, acutely pointed, is the handle arch. The fourth class consists of arches struck from four centres. The first variety is the four-centred, or Tudor, arch. The curves can be struck in different ways, and the long curves sometimes replaced by straight lines with a short curve at the juncture. Another variety of arch struck from three or four centres is the ogee arch. In this, one or two of the centres are below, but the other two are above the arch. So the two upper curves of the arch are concave, the two lower convex.

Foiled arches have three or more lobes or leaves. The simplest are the round-headed trefoil; the pointed trefoil is an arch whose head meets in a point. The lobe goes by the name of the shouldered arch. A trefoil arch is a trefoiled arch enclosed in a pointed arch. A trefoiled arch is not enclosed in any other arch. Besides the trefoiled, there is the cinquefoil arch, with five lobes or foliis, and the multifoiled arch, with more than five.

Flat Arch.—In a flat arch the voussoirs are wedge-shaped, but the extrados and intrados are composed of straight lines. Sometimes, to strengthen a flat or slightly curved arch, the voussoirs are notched or joggled. Compound Arches.—If the arch needs to be unusually strong, it is better to construct two independent arches, one on the top of the other. Or it may be constructed in three separate rings. Each of these sub-arches, or rings, of which the whole compound arch is composed, is called an order. It is a safer form of arch than the simple arch. This system of concentric arches was frequently used by the early Romans and the early Christians. Another is the so-called cloaca maxima at Rome; three occur where it enters the Tiber. In some compound orders the faces are in the same plane. But as a rule the orders are successively recessed, i.e. the innermost sub-arch, or order, is narrow, the next above it broader, the next is broader still, and so on. This is called the Roman or Romanesque. Another is the Gothic. Seminental Arch.—This arch occurs occasionally in Norman work. It is called the horseshoe arch. They are not uncommon in Norman ribbed vaults. They occur in the aisled basilica of Diana, near the Euphrates, which has the inscription A.D. 540. In Eastern work the horseshoe arch is frequently not round-headed, but acutely pointed. This facilitates construction, as the upper or more difficult portion of the arch or dome can then be constructed by corbeling and without centering, as in many Indian domes. Pointed Arch.—Of the antiquity of the pointed arch in the East there can be no question; in many cases it is as much an Eastern as an Italian arch. It is seen in the Romanesque of Europe. But it does not follow that the latter borrowed it. It has probably been invented again and again, as necessity arose. In countries where there was no timber, or no tools to work it, the natives had to build shelters in stone. Frequently the one-way known of roofing these was to pile flat stones on one another, i.e. with horizontal bed, not with radiating joints, each course projecting a little further inward as the wall went up. Plainly, these walls would topple in if a semicircular roof had been attempted, but they could be got to stand if the roof was built in the form of a pointed arch—at any rate, if the arch was very acutely pointed.

Although the Romanesque architects had solved the greatest problem of the Middle Ages, viz. how to vault throughout with stone a clerestoried church, Basilican in plan, without the aid of the pointed arch, many of the points were left to the ingenuity of the builders and the masons. This provided a new and facilitated building construction. Next to the use of diagonal ribs and flying buttresses it was the greatest improvement introduced into medieval architecture (Francis Bond). The pointed arch is stronger than any other kind of arch; it has a more vertical and a less lateral thrust than a semicircular one. It was of the greatest use in vaulting.

Archeology, The Commission of Sacred, an official pontifical board founded in the middle of the nineteenth century for the purpose of promoting and directing excavations in the Roman Catacombs and on other sites of Christian antiquarian interest, and of propagating the objects found during such operations. At that period Giovanni Battista De Rossi, a pupil of the archeologist Father Marchi, had already begun the investigation of subterranean Rome, and achieved results which, if confirmed, promised a rich reward. In a vineyard on the Appian Way he discovered (1849) a fragment of a marble slab bearing the inscription: "NELVIS MARTYR", which he recognized as belonging to the sepulchre of Pope Cornelius, martyred in 253, whose remains were laid to rest in the Catacomb of St. Callixtus on the Appian Way. Concluding that the vineyard in which the marble fragment was found overlay this Catacomb, he engaged over the vineyard in order that excavations might be made there. The Pope, after listening to the representations of the young enthusiast, said: "These are but the dreams of an archeologist"; and he added that he had works of more importance on which to spend his money. Nevertheless, he ordered the purchase to be made, and an annual revenue of 18,000 francs to be applied for excavations and future discoveries. The Commission of Sacred Archeology was then appointed to superintend the application of this fund to labours in the Catacombs and elsewhere. The first meeting of this Commission was held at Rome on 1851, at the residence of Cardinal Patrizi, who presided over it by virtue of his office, and selected its members, first amongst them being the Sacristan of His Holiness, Mgr. Castellanl, whose office up till then included that of the preservation of sacred relics. Mgr. Vincenzo Tiziani, a distinguished Preacher of the Roman University; Marino Marinii, Canon of St. Peter's; Father Marchi, S.J., and G. B. De Rossi, were the first members. At present it is presided over by the Vicar of His Holiness, Cardinal Respighi, and among its members are such well known archeologists as Mgr. Giuseppe Wilpert, Father Germaino, C.P., Father Bonaventura, S.J., Orazio Marucci, Giuseppe Gatti, Baron Rodolfo Kanzler, Mgr. Storniolo, and P. Franchi de' Cavalieri. The work achieved under its direction is very extensive. It includes the formation of the Museum of Catacomb Inscriptions and Christian Antiquities in the Lateran Palace, of a size and character otherwise than academically. The origin of the arch is not known. It was largely used by the Assyrians, and by the Egyptians as well, at a very early date; but for some unknown reason they did not introduce it into their greatest works. The practical introduction and use of the arch was due to the Romans. The pointed arch came into use about the twelfth century, and was destined to give birth to a new style of architecture. The pointed arch, whatever its origin, made its appearance almost at the same time in all the civilized countries of Europe. As this was immediately after the first Crusade, it has been conjectured that the Crusaders came to know it in the Holy Land, and introduced it into their respective countries on their return from the East. It was in use among the Saracen and Mohammedan nations, and was extensively employed in Asia. But exactly with what nation in the East the pointed arch originated, and in what manner, are problems equally difficult to solve.

Archbishop (Aρχιεπίσκοπος, archiepiscopos). I.—In the Catholic Church an archbishop or metropolitan, in the present sense of the term, is a bishop who governs a diocese strictly his own, while he presides at the same time over the bishops of a well-defined territory comprised of one or more provinces. Hence none of these subordinate bishops rule over others. These bishops are called the suffragans or comprovincials. The archbishop's own diocese is the archidioecese. The several dioceses of the district form the archiepiscopal, or metropolitan, province.

Historical Origin.—Some writers wrongly point to Sts. Timothy and Titus, the disciples of St. Paul, as the first archbishops in the Church. Probably they were metropolitan in the wider sense of the term, one for Asia Minor, the other for the island of Crete. But it remains impossible to assign the exact date when archbishops, as we now use the term, were first appointed. It is true that metropolitan are mentioned as a well-known institution in the Church by the Council of Nicaea (325) in its fourth, fifth, and sixth canons, and by the Council of Antioch (341) whose seventh canon is a classical passage in this matter. It reads: "The bishops of every province must be aware that the bishop presiding in the metropolis has charge of the whole province; because all who have business come together from all quarters to the metropolis. For this reason it is decided that he should, according to the canonical order, come first before the Holy Synod even when he is present beyond what concerns their respective dioceses and the districts belonging thereto", etc. But it cannot be denied that even at that period the term "metropolitan" was used indiscriminately for all higher ranks above the simple episcopate. It was thus applied also to patriarchs and primates. The same must be said of the term "archbishop" which does not occur in the present meaning before the sixth century, although the office of archbishop or metropolitan in the stricter sense, indicating a hierarchical rank above the ordinary bishops but below the primate and patriarch was already substantially the same in the fifth century as it is to-day. A peculiar condition obtained in Africa, where the archiepiscopal office was not attached to a certain see, the metropolis, but where it always devolved upon the senior bishop of the province, whatever see he might occupy. He was called "the first or chief bishop", or also "the bishop of the first or chief see".

Jurisdiction.—The jurisdiction of the archbishop is twofold, episcopal and archiepiscopal. The first extends to his own diocese exclusively and comprises the rights and powers of the fullest government of the diocese, clergy and laity, spiritual and temporal, except as restricted by Church law. Unless such restriction be clearly stated in law, the presumption is in favour of the episcopal authority. The contrary holds in regard to the archiepiscopal authority. It extends to the province and the suffragan bishops only in as far as it is explicitly stated in the law. Where the law is silent, the presumption is against the archiepiscopal power. Be it ever so, that a rightfully established and approved custom obtains the force of law. Archiepiscopal jurisdiction, being permanently attached to the office as such, is ordinary jurisdiction, not merely delegated or vicarious. It reaches immediately the suffragan bishops, and mediates the faithful through them. However, it has not always been the same either in regard to time or place. While the metropolitan office was everywhere the same in character, the extent and measure of its right and power would be greatly modified by local conditions, particular laws and customs, and sometimes by papal privileges. Although many of these rights are mentioned in different places of the Corpus Juris Canonici, yet there never was a uniform law to define them all in detail. In former times the archbishop's jurisdiction was far more ample than it is at present. The metropolitan could confirm, consecrate, and transfer the bishops of his province, accept them as his vicars, commissions, etc. He could also issue decrees of church law and punish the faithful. This power, however, was limited to his own territory and could not be exercised outside it. In the Council of Trent the rights of archbishops in power are regulated by the Church calendar of the province by fixing and announcing the date of Easter, administer the suffragan dioceses in case of vacancy, and, finally, receive appeals lodged with him from any part of his province. But this extensive power of archbishops was later on greatly restricted, especially in the Latin Church, by several of the popes, and lastly by the Council of Trent. The charge made by the Jansenists that the popes curtailed the rights of archbishops in order to increase and strengthen their own claim of universal primacy, is best refuted by the fact that the metropolitan authority, in its struggles against encroaching primates and patriarchs or rival metropolitan, found no stronger support than that given by the Holy See. On the other hand, Rome had also to defend the native or acquired rights and privileges of suffragan bishops against usurping claims of their metropolitan. The Holy See confirmed and further extended the rights of metropolitan even more than the popes had done. In the Catholic Churches of Asia and Africa the former metropolitan office is to-day merged in the patriarchal office. The archbishops under those patriarchs have no province nor archiepiscopal jurisdiction, but only hold the rank or archiepiscopal dignity. But in Austria, Hungary, Roumania, Servia, and Herzegovina the Catholics of the different Oriental rites, Ruthenians, Greeks, and Armenians, still have archbishops in the proper sense, who retain a large portion of their former jurisdiction and more than the Latin Church. In the Council of Trent the rights of an archbishop in the Latin Church may be described as follows: (1) In regard to his suffragan bishops the metropolitan may compel them to assemble in provincial council every three years, and to attend faithfully to their episcopal duties, in particular those of residing within their own dioceses or their particular circumscriptions, and of maintaining diocesan synods, and of maintaining diocesan seminaries (where clerical candidates cannot otherwise receive an ecclesiastical training). In the provincial council the archbishop is invested with all the rights of the presiding officer, but his voice counts no more than that of any of his suffragan. Modern practice has it also that when the archbishop's warning is not beseemed by the delinquent suffragan, he will not himself use compulsory measures, e., g., censures, but report them to Rome. (2) Generally speaking, the metropolitan has no direct jurisdiction over the subjects of his suffragans. But he acquires such jurisdiction in three ways, namely: by appeal, by devotion, and by the canonical deprivation. To-day an archbishop visit a suffragan diocese unless the matter has been discussed and approved by the provincial council. Matters of episcopal jurisdiction will devolve upon the archbishop in certain cases mentioned in the law, when the suffragan bishop neglects to do his duty, e., g., to fill in due time vacant bishoprics, or to communicate when the necessary conditions have been complied with. This proceeds on the general principle that superiors ought to remedy the neglect of their inferior lest too great harm be done to the Church and her faithful children. When a diocese becomes vacant the cathedral chapter is bound to elect a vicar-capitular who will act as administrator of the vacant diocese. If such election is not made in eight days the archbishop of the province will appoint the vicar-capitular. In the United States the archbishop appoints an administrator of the vacant diocese, until Rome shall further provide. If the archdiocese becomes vacant the senior suffragan appoints the administrator. An appeal or recourse, judicial or extrajudicial, lies directly, at least in the regular course of ecclesiastical procedure, from the bishop to his archbishop, as to the next higher instance. Whenever some disputed matter is thus brought, according to the law, from a suffragan diocese before the metropolitan for adjudication, he acquires direct jurisdiction over the case. Appeals and recourses by the archbishop's own subjects against his judicial sentences, or other ordinances given in the first instance, lie directly, when allowed by law, to the Holy See, at least in the absence of a proper primate or patriarch. But, to expedite and facilitate matters, other ways are usually granted by Rome, e., g., as to appeal from the archbishop to his senior suffragan, as in England; or to the nearest other metropolitan, as in the United States and in Germany; or to a second and special metropolitan council, according to the province, as in France. Since the establishment of the Apostolic Delegation in the United States, cases from the suffragan sees (except matrimonial cases) are usually brought directly before the delegate and no longer before the archbishop. (3) Archbishops are "sacrosanctum" without appeal, as a compulsory feature, the superiors of religious orders, even those who are otherwise exempt, in charge of parishes or congregations, to have the Gospel preached in such parishes according to the provisions of the Council of Trent. It may be observed, however, that, although such are by law the rights of an archbishop, their exercise is now seldom called for, as the more prominent position is rather one of honour and dignity than of actual jurisdiction. Still, with all this, it remains necessary to distinguish the incumbent of a metropolitan see from the bearer of a mere honorary title of archbishop (who never receives the pallium) from a metropolitan, or one who prelates without an actual see and sometimes to ordinary bishops. By the Mohammedan conquest nearly all of the early metropolitan sees in Asia and Africa became extinct. In more recent time some of these were restored by the popes, being made metropolitan sees. The others are conferred as a mere honorary distinction, mostly upon prelates of the Roman courts and coadjutor bishops of metropolitans. Besides the powers of jurisdiction, archbishops also enjoy certain rights of honour within their province. The foremost among these is the right of wearing the pallium, and of the pallial vestments, the archbishop cannot exercise any metropolitan functions nor officiate in pontifical vestments within the province, unless by a special privilege from the Holy See. Other honorary rights are: to have the procession cross carried immediately before him, to wear the mitre and cassock, to have people, to precede his suffragans, and to occupy the bishop's throne, all this anywhere in the province. In the archiepiscopal coat of arms the episcopal hat is flanked by ten tassels on each side. His address is "Your (His) Grace", "Most Reverend". MANNER OF APPOINTMENT.—The vacancy of an archiepiscopal see is notified to the pope as that of an ordinary bishopric, whether it be by an election properly so called, or by a presentation or nomination, or by direct papal appointment. If the new archbishop be a priest, he will receive episcopal consecration; if already a bishop, he will be solemnly installed in the new office. But it is neither the consecration nor the installation which makes the archbishop. It is his appointment to an archiepiscopal see. STATISTICS.—There are at present (1906) in the Catholic Church 164 archbishops with provinces, and with only one diocese but no province, and, lastly, 89 purely titular archbishops. In the United States there are now 14 provinces, in British America 9, in Cuba 1, in the Philippine Islands 1. For a full description of the present metropolitan organization in the Catholic Church, East and West, see the article HIERARCHY. IN THE EASTERN SCHismatic (so-called Orthodox) Church archbishops are as a rule only titular, without any suffragans, but with their own diocese, the same as most of the Catholic metropolitans in the East. But in the autocephalous, or independent, national churches of Austria, Hungary, Servia, Roumania, Bosnia, and Herzegovina the so-called archbishops or metropolitans exercise, in union with the autocephalous synod, the highest ecclesiastical authority over the Church of such country. Their office, therefore, resembles that of a patriarch. III. THE ANGLICAN EPISCOPAL CHURCH has two archbishops in England, one of Canterbury, the other of York. The latter, like his bishopric, is provincial, and the title metropolitan is considered as personal. The two archbishops in Ireland, one of Armagh, the other of Dublin. Their authority is similar to that of Catholic archbishops. In Scotland the Episcopalians have no archbishops, but one of the bishops is chosen by the rest to act as archbishop "primus inter pares" (see BISHOP, DIOCESE, METROPOLITAN, HIERARCHY, PRIMATE). S. Archconfraternity, a confraternity empowered to aggregate or affiliate other confraternities of the same nature, and to impart to them its privileges. The conditions governing aggregation, the ordinary method of conducting the process, and a list of the principal archconfraternities comprehend the information necessary to a proper understanding of the general subject. A preliminary requisite to gain the indulgences is the canonical erection, that is, the determination of the church to which the confraternity to be aggregated. Canonical erection is the approval of the proper ecclesiastical authority which gives the organization a legal existence. Archconfraternities do not erect confraternities; they merely aggregate them. It ordinarily belongs to the bishop of the diocese to erect confraternities. In the case, however, of many confraternities and archconfraternities the power of erection is vested in the heads of certain religious orders. Sometimes, especially in missionary countries or under abnormal conditions,

Only the general process of conducting the aggregation is given. If it pertains to the bishop to erect the confraternity, then the pastor of a church or the superior of a religious house petitions him for a canonical erection, giving the kind of confraternity desired, its title, its patron saint, the church and locality where it is to be erected, its directors, and any deviations from the ordinary rules of the confraternity in question, and asking the consent of the bishop for aggregation to the archconfraternity. If the erection pertains to the head of a religious order, then the bishop's consent to the aggregation is required. In all cases the information just detailed must be sent to the bishop and to the head of the order to insure the validity of the process. Formule embodying such essential information may be obtained from the author of this article on confraternities. Some of the more widely known archconfraternities are those of the Holy Name, the Blessed Sacrament, the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the Precious Blood, the Holy Face, the Holy Rosary, Our Lady of Perpetual Help, Solemnity of the Blessed Heart of Mary for the Conversion of Sinners, the Cord of St. Francis, Christian Doctrine, Bonae Mors, Christian Mothers.

BÉRARD, Les Indulgences (Paris, 1905), II, gives the legislation on this subject, with a list of the archconfraternities, their nature and requirements, and formulae for canonical erection and for aggregation. Archdeacon (Lat. archidiaconus; Gr. ἀρχαῖδικαῖον), the incumbent of an ecclesiastical office dating back to antiquity, and up to the fifteenth century of great importance in diocesan administration, particularly in the West. In the first century of their existence, and in the fourth century, and it is then first met with in the history of the Donatist schism, written about 370 by Optatus of Mileve (I, xvi, ed. Corp. Script. Eccl. Lat., XXVI, 18). However, as he here bestows the title on Cecilian, a deacon of Carthage early in the fourth century, it would appear that since then the title was not an original one of the church. Towards the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century, the term begins to appear more frequently both among Latin and Greek authors. We also occasionally find other names used to indicate the office, e.g., a rhetor, a apocrifopoi (Thedore, Hist. Eccl., I, xxvi, in F. G., LXXXII, 981). The term soon acquired fixity, all the more rapidly as the archidiaconal office became more prominent and its duties were more sharply defined. The beginnings of the archdiaconate are found in the first three centuries of the Christian era, and were made by those who had received from Christ the mission of the apostles. The archdeacon is the diaconus episcopi of primitive Christian times, the deacon whom the bishop selected from the diaconal college (see Deacon) for his personal service. He was made an assistant in the work of ecclesiastical administration, was charged with the care of the poor, and was supposed to be the other deacons in the administration of church property. He thus became the special procurator, or aconomus, of the Christian community, and was also entrusted with the surveillance of the subordinate clergy. In this early period the duties of the diaconus episcopi were not juridically defined, but were performed under the direction of the bishop and for the time specified by him. Beginning with the fourth century this specialized activity of the diaconus episcopi takes on gradually the character of a juridical ecclesiastical office. In the round of ecclesiastical administration certain duties appear established by the law to be that of the aconomus. Thus, in the period from the fourth to the eighth century the archdeacon is the official supervisor of the subordinate clergy, has disciplinary authority over them in all cases of wrong-doing, and exercises a certain surveillance over their discharge of the duties assigned them. It was also within the archdeacon's province to examine candidates for the priesthood; he had also the right of making visitations among the rural clergy. It was even his duty, in exceptional cases of episcopal neglect, to safeguard the interests of the Church; to his hands were entrusted the preservation of the Faith in its primitive purity, the custody of ecclesiastical discipline, and the prevention of damage to the property of the Church. The archdeacon was, moreover, the bishop's chief confidant, his assistant, and when it was necessary, his representative in the exercise of the manifold duties of the episcopal office. This was especially the case in the administration of ecclesiastical property, in the care of the sick, the welfare of prisoners, and the training of the clergy. In the East there was no further development of the archdiaconate; but in the West a new stage was inaugurated with the eighth century. By virtue of his office the archdeacon became, next to the bishop, the regular organ of supervision and discipline in the diocese. In this respect he was assigned a proper and independent jurisdiction (juridicato proprio) and even as late as the twelfth century there was a constant effort to increase the scope of this authority. The great amount of business to be transacted necessitated in large dioceses the appointment of several archdeacons. The first bishop who handled with padrone the business of the See was Heddo of Strasburg, who in 774 divided his diocese into seven archidiaconates (archidiaconatus rurales). His example was quickly followed throughout Western Christendom, except in Italy where the majority of the dioceses were so small as to need but one archdeacon. Henceforth the archidiaconus magnus of the cathedral (usually the provost, or prepositus of the chapter), whose duties chiefly concerned the city clergy, is offset by the archidiaconus rurales placed over the deans (archipresbyters rurales). These archdeacons were generally priests, either canons of the cathedral chapter, or the presbyters of the town or small towns. The authority of the archdeacons culminated in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. At that time they exercised within the province of their archdeaconates a quasi-episcopal jurisdiction. They made visitations, during which they were empowered to levy certain assessments on the clergy; they conducted courts of first instance, and had the right to punish clerics guilty of lapes; they could also hold synodal courts. But the archdeaconate was also predominantly ecclesiastical administration. He saw that the archpriests performed their duties, gave canonical investiture to the holders of prebends, and authorized incorporation of the same; he supervised the administration of church revenues, and kept in repair the places of worship. He drew up the jubilee documents for in the exercise of the duties of his office and the performance of the judicial acts that it entailed. It came about frequently that the archdeacones were not appointed by the bishop, but were chosen by the cathedral chapter; sometimes they received their office from the king. After the twelfth century, on account of the vast extent of their duties, they were aided by various officials and vicars appointed by themselves. This great authority proved in time very burdensome to the clergy and brought with it too great a limitation of the episcopal authority. In the thirteenth century numerous synods began to re-examine the position of the archdeacons. They were forbidden to employ their own special officials and were prohibited from exercising their authority when the bishop was present in their territory. They were also deprived of the right of freely visiting the parishes of their archidiaconate, of deciding important points in matrimonial causes, and of passing sentence on clerics guilty of grave crimes. Moreover, by the creation of the diocesan office of vicar-general, there was opened a court of higher resort than that of the archdeacon, and to it reverted the greater part of the business once transacted in the court of the archdeacon. When finally the Council of Trent (1559) prohibited civil and matrimonial causes should hereafter be brought before the bishop (Sess. XIV, XX, De reform.); that the archdeacon should no longer have the power to excommunicate (Sess. XXV, iii, De ref.); that proceedings against ecclesiastics unfaithful to their vow of celibacy should no longer be carried on before the archdeacon (Sess. XXV, iv, De ref.); and that archdeacones should make visitations only when authorized by the bishop, and then render to him an account of them (Sess. XXIV, iii, De ref.), the archdeaconate was completely bereft of its independent character. From this time the archidiaconatus rurales gradually disappeared from the places where they still existed. The archidiaconate of the cathedral, where the office was still retained, soon became practically an empty title; the chief duties of the incumbent were to assist the bishop in his pontifical duties and to vouch for the moral worthiness of candidates for ordination. Among Protestants, the Anglicans preserved, along with the primitive ecclesiastical organization, the office of archdeacon with its own special jurisdiction. In German Protestant parishes, with less congruity, the title of archdeacon was conferred on the first Underpfrar, or assistant pastor.

Archdeacon, Richard, an Irish Jesuit, whose name is sometimes given as Archdekin or Arskdein, b. at Kilkenny, 30 March, 1620; d. 31 August, 1693. He entered the Society of Jesus, at Mechlin, 20 September, 1642, and taught humanities, philosophy, theology, and Holy Scripture at Antwerp and Louvain. He wrote a treatise in English and Irish on Miracles, and the Life of St. Padraig. He was not condemned by the Holy See and the so-called prophecy of St. Malachy, an Irish saint, and the principal controversies about the faith. This he called "Theologia Quadrupartiata"; it was meant for use chiefly in Ireland. The book sold very rapidly, more than a thousand copies having been disposed of in a few months. He subsequently published it in Irish and Tripartite. The preface informs his readers that he had more time at his disposal for writing than he had for the preceding book. The "Tripartita" passed through thirteen editions. The twelfth edition contains the "Life of Oliver Plunkett and Peter Talbot". The work is remarkable for its order, conciseness, and lucidity. In spite of its numerous editions, beginning with the year 1671, it was put on the Index in 1700, donec corrigatur. Although at least the Antwerp edition of 1718 was corrected, especially as regards the "pecatum philosophicum", and the Cologne edition of 1730 was "revised and corrected", yet in the Index it was still placed as condemned. He left in MS. a "Theologia Apostolica". Hurter speaks of him as auctor gravis et probabilis. Webb in his "Compendium of Irish Biography" (Dublin, 1878) declares of the treatise on miracles that it is said to have been the first book printed in English and Irish conjointly."

Archbishop, James, an English missionary priest, b. in London, 17 November, 1751; d. 22 August, 1832. While employed at a public house called "The Ship", in Turn Stile, Lincoln's Inn Fields, where Catholics secretly assembled for Divine service, he attracted the favourable notice of Dr. Challoner and was sent, in 1769, to study at Douai College. He returned in 1780, after his ordination, to carry on the mission in the public house where he had formerly been employed. He was for many years vicar of the London District and received the papal degree of Doctor of Divinity at the same time with Drs. Lingard, Gradwell, and Fletcher. His published works are: "Sermons on Various Moral and Religious Subjects" (London, 1757, 1788, 1816); "Second Series" (London, 1801, 1823); "Third Series" (London, 1817); "Sermons," 2 vols. (London, 1794, 1794, 1797); "Sermons on Matrimonial Duties, etc." (London, 1804); "Letter to J. Milner, Vicar-Apostolic of the Midland District (Being a Reply to a Letter in which he accuses the author of immorality)" (London, 1810); "Sermon on Universal Benevolence, —Some Reflections on Religious Persecution and the alleged proceedings at Naima." (2d ed., London, 1816). His portrait was engraved by Turner after a painting by James Ramsay in 1826.

Arches. The Court of, so called from the fact that it was anciently held in the Church of St. Mary le Bow (Sancta Maria de Arcebe), in Cheapside, was the chief and most ancient court and consistory of the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Originally the judge of this court, the official Principal of the Arches, took cognizance of causes throughout the ecclesiastical province, and by his patent was invested with the right of hearing appeals from the Dean of the Arches. This latter exercised jurisdiction over a "peculiar," consisting of thirteen parishes including St. Mary le Bow, within the diocese, but exempt from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London. Eventually the office of Dean and that of Principal of the Arches became merged; and by the Public Worship Regulation Act of 1874 a judge of the provincial courts of Canterbury and York was provided, and "all proceedings hereafter taken before the judge in matters arising within the province of Canterbury shall be deemed to be taken in the Arches Court of Canterbury." [From the Court of Arches in the past it usually lay to the Pope. After the Reformation it was transferred to the King in Chancery (25 Hen. VIII. c. 19); and later (2 & 3 Will. IV, c. 92; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 41) to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.] Suits are conducted by means of citation, production of libel (accusation), answer to libel, arguments of advocates, and the judge's decree. This court exercises appellate jurisdiction from each of the diocesan courts within the province of Canterbury. It may also take original cognizance of causes by letters of Request from such courts. It latterly sat in the hall belonging to the College of Civilians (Doctors' Commons) until the ecclesiastical courts were thrown open to the bar and to solicitors generally, and all probate and divorce business taken away (1857), since when it sits at Lambeth or Westminster.

ARCHIEREUS (Greek, ἀρχιερεύς; Russian, archikiril), a Greek word for bishop, when considered as the culmination of the priesthood. It is very much used in the names of the books of the Greek Orthodox and Greek Catholic Churches for those services which correspond to the pontifical services of the Roman Rite. This word must not be confounded with prooikierous (archpriest), the highest ecclesiastical rank to which a married priest may attain in the Greek Church.

ARCHIMANDRITE. (Gr. ἀρχιμαντίρης, I command, and μάντης, a sheeplod), in the Greek Rite the superior of a monastery, or of several monasteries. The term seems to have originated during the fourth century in the far East (Mesopotamia, Persia), and to have spread thence to Egypt and Asia Minor. In the fifth and succeeding centuries it occurs frequently in the writings of the Greek Fathers, also in the acts of councils, and was even adopted quite extensively in the West where it did not disappear from occasional usage until the ninth century. The archimandrite seems to have been only the superior or abbot of his own monastery; gradually, however, he came to exercise authority over a number of monasteries, and by the eleventh century the archimandrites of such monastic centres as Mount Athos, and Mount Olympus in Bithynia, were the equivalent of our Western abbots-general. At present there are in the Greek Church two kinds of archimandrites, the original monastic officers exercising jurisdiction in their respective monasteries, and honorary archimandrites and well-educated priests attached to the chanceries of the great patriarchates (e. g. Constantinople), or at the head of certain branches of temporal administration; in a word, not unlike the Roman prelates or the principal officers of a Western diocese. It is from the ranks of these quasi-monastic priests that the bishops are often selected, when not taken directly from the monasteries. The archimandrite is appointed by ecclesiastical authority (patriarch, metropolitan bishop), also, in Russia, by the Holy Synod, and in some monasteries by election. He has the right to wear a pectoral cross, the epigion in the celebration of Mass, and to sign a cross before his name after the manner of bishops. The monastic archimandrites have also the right to the pastoral staff, and to a peculiar mantle having four squares of embroidered cloth called "the tables of the law". Their rights and privileges differ somewhat by law or custom in different parts of the Greek Church. The usual distinction, common to all, is a black veil tied about the peculiar head-gear of the Greek ecclesiastic and falling on the back. Archimandrites enjoy the right of precedence among other priests; among themselves this right is regulated by the dignity of their origin; thus an archimandrite of Constantinople outranks those of inferior episcopal appointment. There is a formal rite for the appointment of these bishops, and creation of these officers, performed with more solemnity in the instalment of monastic archimandrites. The office is found not only in all Greek Churches subject to Constantinople, but also in the Russian, Bulgarian, and other so-called autocephalous Churches, that once owed allegiance to that patriarchal see; it exists also among the Catholic (Melchite or Uniat) Greeks. It is not known among the Armenians, Chaldeans, Syrians, Maronites, Copts, or Abyssinians. An important survival of it in the West is seen in Sicily, where, after the time of Roger II (1130-54), the archimandrite of the great Basilian Abbey of San Savino in Messina enjoyed extensive, even quasi-episcopal, jurisdiction, eventually, however, becoming a secular or commendatory abbott (Ferraris, Bibl. promp.ta, s. v.). This Basilian monastery was suppressed by the Italian government.

ARCHINTO, FILIPPO, an Italian theologian and diplomatist, b. 1500 at Milan of the distinguished family of that name; d. 1558. At the age of twenty he obtained the doctorate in law at the University of Padua. He became such a warm advocate of diplomacy that Paul III named him successively Governor of the City of Rome, Vice-Chamberlain Apostolic, Bishop of the Holy Sepulchre, and of Saluzzo. He also sent him to preside in his name at the Council of Trent, then transferred to Bologna. St. Ignatius Loyola named him a priest in the early years of the Society of Jesus, and only his death prevented his installation in the archiepiscopal chair of Milan to which Paul IV had nominated him. His theological works are "De fide et sacramentis" (Cracow, 1545; Ingolstadt, 1546; Turin, 1549); "Observationes über novi christiani orbis pace habita" (Rome, 1544).

Archives, Ecclesiastical, may be described as a collection of documents, records, muniments, and memorials, pertaining to the origin, foundation, growth, history, rights, privileges, and constitutions of a diocese, parish, monastery, or religious community under the jurisdiction of the Church; the term is also applied to the place of depository where such records and documents are kept.

The word archive is derived from the Latin archivum, archivium, post-classical terms. Cicero used tabulario, and Pliny tabellum. Pomponius Mela (L. d. 37–54) seems among the first to use archivum in the sense of archives (De orbis situ, lib. IIII). Archivum appears twice in the New Testament, Phil. 4:18, Col. 2:2. Archivum (archeion) is a transliteration of the Greek ἀρχεῖον, used among the Greeks to express the senate-house, the council-house; the college of magistrates convened therein; the place reserved for state papers; the documents themselves; and finally, applied to many sanctuaries, which became the depositories of documents important enough to hand down to posterity. Not only Greece, but also the ancient civilizations of Israel, Phoenicia, Egypt, and Rome appreciated the value of preserving important records and usually reserved for the archives a part of the temple; these archives are embalmed in the "memorial stones," as far as possible, immunity from violation. Christian Rome, impressed with the reverence and importance attached by Jew and Gentile to such depositories, and recognizing the need of proper and safe custody of the sacred vessels and the Holy Scriptures, sought out for this purpose, in the beginning, the remains of some worthy Christian family, and later, during the persecutions, some secret chamber in the catacombs. In these primitive archives the early Church placed the Acts of the martyrs. St. Clement (L. d. 93), the fourth of the Roman Pontiffs, appointed for Rome seven notaries to record for future ages the sayings and sufferings of the saints who went to martyrdom. Pope An- terus (235–236) displayed such zeal for the keeping of these records of the martyrs as to win for himself a martyr's crown after but one month in the Chair of Peter; and tradition tells of the existence, even in his day, of archives in the Lateran Basilica, and the safe keeping of documents pertaining to the administration and temporalities of the Church. This official keeper of the archives, who became the registrar of the medieval cathedral, was called in Rome tabularius, and in Constantinople chartophylax (χαρτοφυλακ). The Council of Nicaea (325) judging from its sixteenth canons felt the need of such a church official. The Council of Mileve (402), in Africa, prescribed a matricula, or archives, for records of ordination, to prevent disputes about seniority among the bishops. The famous canonist, Van Espen, commenting on the ninth canon of the Second Council of Lyons (1274), says that "the palace of the patriarch of Constantinople was kept the archives, called the chartophylacium, in which the episcopal laws and documents containing the privileges and rights of the church were laid up. Frequently, important State papers and valuable manuscripts of private writers were written upon the archives of the church; the Code of Justinian was therein deposited by order of the Emperor. The monasteries were quick to follow the example of the episcopal cities in the keeping of archives. Monastic archives owe much to the introduction of the scripторium (manuscript room) with its armaria (book-chests) into Monte Cassino by St. Benedict (529), and into the monastery of Viviers by its famous abbot, Cassiodorus (531). The preservation of the fragments of Greek and Roman classics now extant is largely due to the monasteries, which for twelve centuries from the fall of the Western Empire were the custodians not only of sacred texts, but also of manuscripts of the ancient Greek philosophers and the Latin rhetoricians. A medieval monastery was often rich in archives, containing rare manuscripts, beautiful chiaroscuro, paintings, precious metal-ware, and documents pertaining to the rights of a people, the privileges of kings, and treaties between nations. The universities of the thirteenth century, as Bologna and Paris, products of the episcopal schools, maintained valuable archives.

In 1587, Pope Sixtus V conceived the idea of erecting in Rome a general ecclesiastical depository to serve for archives for all Italy; the plan, however, was not found practicable, and the Pontiff then decreed that each diocese and religious community should establish and maintain its own local archives. The most detailed legislation with regard to the erection, the arrangement, and the safe custody of the archives in the churches of Italy was that of "Rector Vigilantia" of Benedict XIII (1727), the norm for the present discipline in this matter. As a result of mandatory decrees of provincial and synodal councils, archives are now found in every well organized centre. Besides the Vatican archives and those of the various Roman Congregations, there are: (1) the archiepiscopal, or Roman, archives, which are preserved in the acts of the Metropolitan cura, or curia; (2), the episcopal, or diocesan archives containing acts of synods, documents from the Holy See, the minutes of the episcopal curia, records of ordinations and matrimonial dispensations, deeds of diocesan property, and reports of the spiritual and financial condition of every parish in the diocese; (3), the parochial archives, maintained in each parish for safely and securely preserving all documents properly connected with the history of the parish, mandates and pastoral of the bishop, registers for an accurate record of baptisms, confirmations, marriages and deaths, and of the spiritual condition of souls visited in the parish; also the books pertaining to the administration of the finances of the parish with due regard to the protection of all church property. The civil law usually considers parish registers as authentic public records.

Archontics (from ἀρχων, prince, ruler), a Gnostic sect which existed in Palestine and Armenia about the middle of the fourth century. St. Epiphanius seems to be the earliest Christian writer who speaks of this strange sect. He relates that a young prince in Palestine named Peter had been convicted of Gnostic errors, deposed from the office of the priesthood and expelled by Bishop Aeius. He fled into the desert, and there was made a centre of Gnostic heresy. In his old age, apparently but not really converted, he returned to Palestine, where he lived the life of an anchorite in a cave near Jerusalem and attracted followers by the austerity of his life and the practice of extreme poverty. Shortly before the death of the Emperor Constantius (337-361), Eutocius, coming from Egypt, visited the anchoret Peter and was imbued by him with the doctrines of the sect and carried them into Greater and Lesser Armenia. St. Epiphanius excommunicated Peter and the sect seems to have died out soon after. Following the description of St. Epiphanius in giving a summary of the doctrines of the sect, we find there are seven heavens, each of which is ruled by an ἄρχων (prince) surrounded by angels begotten by him, who are the jailers of the souls. In the eighth heaven dwells the supreme Mother of light. The king or tyrant of the seventh heaven is Saboth, the god of the Jews, who is the father of the Devil. The Devil, dwelling upon earth, rebelled against his father, and opposed him in all things, and by Eve begot Cain and Abel. Cain slew Abel in a quarrel about their sister, whom both loved. The souls, which are of heavenly origin are the food of the princes who cannot live without them. When they have fed they ascend the stages (years) and have escaped the baptism of the Church and the power of Saboth, who is the author of the law, it flies to each of the heavens, makes humble prayer to its prince, and finally reaches the supreme Mother and Father of all things, from whom it has dropped upon the earth. Theodoret adds that it is the practice of some of these heretics to pour oil and water on the heads of the dead, thereby rendering them invisible to the princes and withdrawing them from their power. "Some of them", continues St. Epiphanius, "pretend to fast after the manner of the monks, deceiving the simple, and boast of having received the eucharist. They compound the body, admitting only that of the soul; they condemn baptism and reject the participation of the Holy Mysteries as something introduced by the tyrant Saboth, and teach other fables full of impiety." "They are addicted", says St. John Damascene, "to the most shameful kind of lust." The apocryphal books were the greater and lesser Symphoria, the "Anabatikon [assumption] of Issias", a book called Αλλαγέων, and other pseudo-prophetic writings. They rejected the Old Testament, but used sentences torn from their context both in the Old and the New Testament to prop up their heresy. St. Epiphanius refutes their extravagant doctrines at some length, showing the absurdity and dishonesty of their abuse of Scripture texts. He writes, not with the calm detachment of the historian, but with the zeal of the pastor who is dealing with contemporary error.

ARCHPRIEST—Just as among the deacons of the bishop's church one stood out as the special assistant and representative of the bishop, and, as archdeacon, acquired a jurisdiction of his own, so did the patriarch of the fourth century in numerous diaconyes an arch-priest, or head of the college of presbyters, who aided and represented the bishop in the discharge of his liturgical and religious duties. As a rule, and especially in Rome, whence the custom spread, the eldest of the presbyters was invested with this rank; in the Greek Church, on the other hand, his appointment often lay in the hands of the bishop. By the seventeenth canon of the Fourth Synod of Carthage, the archpriest was also associated with the bishop as his representative in the care of the poor. After the complete Christianization of the Roman and German nations, archpriests were associated with another kind of archpriest. The spiritual needs of the population scattered through the rural districts multiplied so rapidly that it became impossible for the clergy of the episcopal city to attend to all. Consequently, we soon find the larger rural centres equipped with their own churches, a permanent clergy, and their own sources of support. The inhabitants of the neighbouring hamlets, and of the widely scattered monasteries, from the beginning, subject to these larger, or mother-churches (ecclesia rusticana, diaecesana, parochia), in so far as it was there that they heard Mass and received the sacraments. The entire parish was known as christianitas or plebe.

The archpriest was the first in rank among priests attached to such mother-churches. He was at the head of the local clergy, had charge of Divine worship, and supervised the duties of the ecclesiastical ministry. He was, however, subject to the archdeacon; several archpriests in large parishes constituted an archidiaconate.

A private chapel, which gradually multiplied on the estates of the great landowners and to which priests were attached, with the bishop's permission, were not exempt from the jurisdiction of the archpriest. All parishioners were obliged to be present at the mass said on Sunday in the mother-church (ecclesia baptismalis, titulus major). All baptisms took place there and burial services were held nowhere else. In the lesser churches of the territory (tituli minores) there were permitted only the daily Mass, the usual evolutions, and instruction in the elements of Christian faith. The archpriest of the mother-church was the head of all the clergy in his parish, and was responsible for the proper execution of their ecclesiastical duties and for their manner of life. Gradually, it came about, especially in the Carolingian period, that many tituli minores became independent mother-churches, and the results of such dispensations, including Sunday Mass and baptism, were performed; the number of parishes was thus notably increased. It came about also that when a diocese was very extensive, the entire diocese was subdivided into a number of districts (called archipresbyterates, decanates, or christianitates), each of which a priest was placed as archpriest. The use of the term archipresbyterate for these diocesan districts proves that the former extensive parishes made a basis for this division, though the boundary lines of the new districts did not necessarily correspond with the limits of the original parishes. In many cases entirely new ecclesiastical districts were created.

were created, and sometimes several former archipresbyterates were united. Sometimes, also, attention was paid to the civil subdivisions of the territory in question. The entire clergy of such a district constituted the rural chapter, at the head of which was the archpriest or rural dean. It was his duty, as representative of the bishop, to supervise the religious and ecclesiastical life of the entire territory. He enforced the regulations of the bishop and the decrees of diocesan synods, and watched over their observance; presented to the bishop for ordination all candidates for ecclesiastical office; adjusted minor differences among the clergy, and made known to the archdeacon any grosser misdeeds of clergy or laity in order that suitable penance might be imposed upon the offender. It was customary in the Carolingian period that on the first of every month the archpriest and the clergy of vicar, or vicar forane (vicarii foraneti), an office at time revocable. In France, and in those neighbouring territories affected by the ecclesiastical reorganization that followed the French Revolution, each of the new dioceses was divided into deaneries whose limits were calculated to correspond with the civil subdivisions. In each district the parish priest of the principal church was usually the dean. According to actual ecclesiastical law the division of a diocese into deaneries pertains to the bishop; he may, if he chooses, combine several such districts and make of them a single larger one. The selection of the deans pertains entirely to the bishop, though in some countries the rural chapters still retain the right of election. Deans possess no proper jurisdiction; they are merely delegates of the bishop for the performance of stated ecclesiastical duties. Their principal duty is to facilitate relations between the his deanery should meet in common in order to discuss matters of importance. At a later date such meetings were called only once or twice a year.

The rural chapter acquired in time the right of presentation to the deanship; it also elected a came-rarius for the administration of certain common funds, and a dfficulator, or assistant to the dean.
The union of several such archipresbyterates formed an archdiocesanate, whose deans were subject to the archdeacon.

In course of time, the office of dean or archpriest underwent many changes. This development was not the same in every country, and to this fact are traceable many local differences. The Council of Trent was content with the establishment of regulations concerning the visitation of parishes
by the deans (Sess. XX IV, cap. 3, De reform.). St.
Charles Borromeo abolished the office of dean in his diocese and established in its place that of rural clergy of their deanery and the ordinary (the bishop), to exercise a certain supervision over the clergy,
to visit the parishes, and look into the administration of parochial duties by the parish priests. They are also wont to receive from the bishop permanent faculties for the performance of certain ecclesiastical benefices. The duty of assisting the bishop at pontifical Mass, once incumbent on the archpriest of the cathedral, has devolved partly on the dean of the cathedral chapter, and partly on the auxiliary-bishop, should there be one.

Arcosolium. —This word is derived from arcus "arch" and solium, a term sometimes used by Latin writers in the sense of "sarcophagus"; solium porphyretici marmaria (Suet., Ner., 50). The term arcosolium was applied by the primitive Christians to one form of the tombs that exist in the Roman catacombs. Thus, an inscription was formed by first excavating in the tufa walls a space similar to an ordinary loculus surmounted by an arch. After this space was cleared an oblong cavity was opened from above downwards into that part of the rock facing the arch; a marble slab placed horizontally over the opening thus made completed the tomb, which in this way became a species of sarcophagus hewn out of the living rock. The horizontal slab closing the tomb was about the height of an ordinary table from the ground. In some instances, as in the "papal crypt" and the crypt of St. Januarius, the front wall of the arcosolium tomb was constructed. A species of tomb similar in respects but one to the arcosolium is the so-called sepulchrum a mena, or table-tomb; in this a rectangular niche takes the place of the arch. The baldashino tombs of Sicily and Malta belong also to this class; they consist of a combination of several arcosolia. A more ancient form of the arcosolium than that described consisted of an arched niche, excavated to the level of the floor, in which sarcophagi of marble or terra-cotta containing the remains of the deceased were placed. Arcosolium tombs were much in vogue during the third century in Rome. Many of the later martyrs were interred in them, and there are reasons to suppose that in such instances the horizontal slabs closing the tombs served as altars on certain occasions. The arcosolia of the Roman cemeteries were usually decorated with symbolic frescoes, the vault of the arch and the lunette being prepared with stucco for this purpose. One of the most interesting examples of an arcosolium adorned in this manner may be seen in the catacomb of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus; in the lunette the miracle of Cana is represented as a symbol of the Eucharist, while on the arch a baptismal scene and a symbol of baptism—all associated with Eucharistic symbols—are depicted on either side of a veil. A second excellent example of an originally decorated arcosolium, in the Cameretum Majus, represents on the arch our Saviour between two praying figures, and in the lunette Mary as an orans (unique in the catacombs), with the child Jesus. Arculf, a Frankish Bishop of the latter part of the seventh century. According to some, e. g. Alexis de Gourges (Le saint Susire, Périgueux, 1868), he was Bishop of Périgueux; but it is generally believed he was attached to some monastery. St. Bede relates (Hist. Eccles. Angl., V, 15) that Arculf, on his return from a pilgrimage to the Holy Land about the year 670 or 690, was cast by a tempest on the shore of Scotland. He was hospitably received by Adamnan, the abbot of the island monastery of Iona, to whom he gave a detailed narrative of his travels in the Holy Land, with specifications and designs of the sanctuaries so precise that Adamnan, with aid from some extraneous sources, was able to produce a descriptive work in three books, dealing with Jerusalem, Bethlehem, the principal towns of Palestine, and Constantinople. Adamnan presented a copy of this work to Aldfrith (q. v.), King of Northumbria in 698. It aims at giving a faithful account of what Archae adorned during his journey. As the latter "joined the seal of an antiquarian to the devotion of a pilgrim" during his nine months' stay in the Holy City, the work contains many curious details that must have been observed and never been chronicled." Bede makes some excerpts from it (op. cit., v, c. xvii), and bases upon it his treatise "De locis sanctis". It was first edited by Father Greter, S.J. (Ingolstadt, 1819). Mabillon gives an improved text in Acta SS. N. Bened., 1804, 502-522; (revised in P. L., XXXXI, 778) and by Delpln, "Essai sur les anciens pèlerinages à Jerusalem" (Paris, 1870).

Ardbeg (High Field), an Irish diocese in the ecclesiastical province of Armagh, takes its name from a town in the parish and barony of same name in county Longford, province of Leinster. Here, according to Colgan, St. Patrick baptized Main, Lord of South Teffia, in Longford, built a church in a place called Ardbacad, which to this day is a see, and consecrated Mel, the son of Master Durecan, then the bishop, leaving Mel, or Melcu (Mel's brother) as co-bishop. Ardbeg Healy accepts this statement, though Lanigan and O'Hanlon reject the co-episcopate of the brothers. The church of Ardbeg was founded in 454 and is justly held to have been one of the most ancient in Ireland. St. Mel, or Moel, was not only the bishop of this church, but also abbot of the adjoining monastery, and is yet patron of the diocese. Outside the town are the ruins of a small primitive church the remains of which are of cyclopean character. The see originally comprised the country of the Eastern Conmaice. It consisted of the territory of the O'Fersals and the O'Quinns in the county Longford, called Annally, and the territory of Muiniir Éolaís, i.e. of MacRannal (O'Rawlins) in Leitrim. From the death of St. Mel to the coming of the English under Henry 11 (1169) the extant records of episcopal succession (for which see Gams, Series episcoporum Ratisbon, 1875-76) are uncertain, and it is only in the fourteenth century that we learn of a see over this diocese in 754, having journeyed to Rome with some companions, died at Ratisbon, of which see he is said to have been bishop. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries several members of the O'Feral clan occupied the chair of St. Mel. The Diocese of Clonmacnois was united to that of Ardbeg in 1729, during the episcopate of Bishop Flynn, and so continues. The modern Diocese of Ardbeg includes nearly all of Longford, the greater part of Leitrim, and portions of King's County, Westmeath, Roscommon, and Sligo. There is a cathedral chapter of Ardbeg (annually granted by the Crown) at which are forty-one parishes in the united diocese. The seat of the bishop is at Longford, where a fine cathedral and a diocesan seminary have been erected. (See Clonmacnoise.)

Ardrabhad (Hill of Braccan, or Brecan), site of an ancient abbey, now a parish and village in the county Meath, Ireland, three miles west from Navan. Ardrabhad Abbey was founded and governed by St. Brecan. He was grandson of Carthan Finn, first Christian prince of Thomond and son of Escalibid Baldearg, also prince of Thomond, whom St. Patrick baptized. Brecan had the gift of prophecy. He died, Petrie says, early in the sixth century (but Walter Urry, who was also contemporary, gives 658), and his body was interred in Templebraccan, a church he founded in the Great Isle of Arran. Petrie copied the inscription on his tombstone discovered early in the nineteenth century. The “Martyrology of Donegal” calls him Bishop of Arrbrosscan; but the founder of that see was, I think, Urry, who succeeded Brecan as abbot. Dr. Urry’s charity towards children was remarkable. He wrote lives of Sts. Brigid and Patrick, and died 657.

Tirechán, who succeeded him, compiled the “Acts of St. Patrick” received from the lips of Urry. Between the ninth and the twelfth century Arrbrosscan was often pillaged and burned by Danish natives. The succession of abbot-bishops continued till the English invasion, when abbey and town declined. After the Synod of Kells (1152) Arbraccan and other small sees of the kingdom of Meath were united under the title of Meath, and the episcopal residence was fixed there at an early date.

Ardilliers, Notre Dame des (Lat. argilla, Fr. argile, colloquial artille, clay), a statue, fountain, and Church of Our Lady at Auvergne, France. Sometimes the fountain was often the scene of pagan sacrifices. A monastery founded by Charlemagne at Saumur was destroyed by the Normans and the one surviving monk retired to a cave near the spring of Ardilliers, a statue of Our Lady is said to remain unbroken now. A statue discovered in the abbey in 1545 is believed to be identical with the one just mentioned. The miracles wrought in connection with this image caused the erection of a small arch for it above the spring, whose waters were found to have healing virtues. A chapel was built and dedicated (1553) attaining magnificent proportions and was successive additions to the presbytery. The waters of the spring were placed in charge (1614). Devotion to Notre Dame des Ardilliers was widespread, and many miracles were wrought. Her clients number such illustrious personages as Louis XIII, Anne of Austria, Marie de Medici, Henrietta of England, Cardinal Richelieu, and many others. Mme. de Montespan led a life of penance in a modest dwelling near the church. The founder of the Sulpician Company went there for inspiration, and the Ven. Grignon de Montfort to beg divine blessings on the institutes of the Fathers of the Holy Ghost and the Daughters of Wisdom he was about to found. Cities placed themselves under the protection of Notre Dame des Ardilliers, promising annual deputations of pilgrims. During the Revolution the church was despoiled of its treasures, but was not destroyed, and the image was left unharmed. In 1849 the ravages of time necessitated the renovation of the chapel, which had been built by Richelieu, and pilgrimages became more frequent than ever.

Areopagus (Ἀρεόπαγος), the name of (1) the Hill of Mars, situated to the west of and close by the Areopagus at Athens; (2) the court held upon the hill. The first legend accounts for the name of the hill by narrating that thereon the Amazons had offered sacrifice to Ares. Another legend declares that upon this mount Ares had been tried for the murder of Halirrhothius by a court of twelve gods. The latter legend was evidently suggested by the fact that from the earliest antiquity the Hill of Mars was the seat of a council, which had for one of its duties the trial of certain criminal cases. But the primary purpose of the council of the Areopagus was to direct religious worship and therefore, incidentally, to pass judgment upon theological innovations. It may be that the formal and officiously impartial administration of this function when St. Paul was brought before it; but it is more probable that the event narrated in Acts, xvii, 19 sqq. was not a legal trial of the Apostle or an authoritative judgment of his doctrine. Rather, it would seem from the informal character of his introduction to the assembly and his abrupt quitting of it in the midst of disorder (ibid., xvii, 32, 33) that he was conducted before the Areopagites upon the sacred hill merely that their curiosity might be satisfied by seeing him and hearing him, undisturbed by the rout in the Agora below. Some have thought, however, that St. Paul, on the occasion, was subjected to a formal trial on the ground that the Hill of Mars was too sacred a place to be invaded, and the council too august a tribunal to be disturbed except for actual judicial proceedings. At any rate it seems certain that in the time of St. Paul, the council of the Areopagus was clothed with judicial powers as considerable as it had ever enjoyed, and that among its rights was that of passing final judgment in matters pertaining to the religion of the Athenians. Before such a tribunal St. Paul was doubtless eager to speak, and the immediate result of his address (ibid., xvii, 22–31) was the conversion of at least one of the members of the venerable council.

The most satisfactory description of the location and the council, as well as of the incident, is to be found in Cowper and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul (London, 1860–62), ch. x.

Arethas of Caesarea, b. at Patra, Greece, about 860, was, like all the eminent men of that time, a disciple of Photius. He became Archbishop of Caesarea early in the tenth century, and is reckoned one of the most scholarly theologians of the Greek Church. He is the compiler of the oldest extant Greek commentary (scholia) on the Apocalypse, for which considerable use the similar work of his predecessor Andrew of Caesarea. It was first printed in 1535 as an appendix to the works of Eumenius and is found in P. G., CVI, 493. Dr. Ehrhard inclines to the opinion that he wrote other scriptural commentaries. To his interest in the earliest Christian literature, caustic, perhaps from the above-named Andrew, we owe the Arethas Codex (Paris, Gr. 451), through which the text of the Greek Christian Apologists has, in great measure, reached us (Bardenhewer, Patrologie, 40). He is also known as a commentator of Plato and Lucian, the famous manuscript of Plato (Codex Clarkianus), which descends from the Palimpsest of Arethas, was copied by him of Arethas. Other important Greek manuscripts, e. g. of Euclides, the rhetor Aristides, and perhaps of Dio Chrysostom, are owing to him. Not a few of his minor writings, contained in a Moscow manuscript, are said still to await an editor (see F. G., loc. cit., p. 2587). Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinische. Literatur, 2d ed. To avoid this he fled from the city, but eventually saved the Christian people from paying the penalty in his stead, and underwent very cruel treatment at the hands of the pagan mob (Sozomen, Hist. He entered the Society in 1761, but was deported to Italy on the occasion of the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain (1677). Here he won the esteem and confidence of Cardinal Lorenzana, who proved a Mecenas for the young Spanish Jesuit, bore the expenses of his learned works, and named his executor. Arévalo was much esteemed at Rome and held various offices of trust, among them that of "pontifical hymnographer"; he was made theologian of the Penitentia (see Cura Romana) in 1809, in succession to the learned Muzzarelli. In 1818 he returned to Spain, King Ferdinand of Spain, by means of a royal pardon, entered the restored Society, and became Provincial of Castile (1820). His principal works are: "Hymnodia Hispanica" (Rome, 1786), a restoration of ancient Spanish hymns to their original metrical, musical, and grammatical perfection. History.—The territory of the Argentine Republic was originally inhabited by Indian tribes of savage disposition who were "reduced" to civilization through the Catholic religion. The missions founded in these regions were called "Reducciones" (Re reductions) by the Spaniards to convey the idea that these establishments were intended to tame the wild spirit of the savages and reduce them to a condition of relative civilization. One such establishment in the region of the Río de la Plata, or Plate River, was the fort called La Sanetí Spiritus, erected by Sebastian Cabot, a Venetian in the service of Spain, and son of John Cabot the celebrated navigator who cruised along the eastern coast of North America. This fort was erected in 1526 at the confluence of the Paraguay and Paraguay Rivers, and was garrisoned with 170 men. Four years later it was destroyed by Timbú Indians, who killed the men, carried away the women and children, and burned all the buildings. Together with the report of his trip to these regions Cabot forwarded to Spain some silver jewelry which the Guaraní Indians had presented to him; whence comes the name of Río de la Plata (River of Silver), given to the stream through the mistaken idea that silver mines abounded on its banks. In 1535 Don Pedro de Mendoza, a Spanish general in the service of Charles V, came with a powerful expedition consisting of 14 ships and 2,000 soldiers, and on 6 January laid the foundations of a city which he called Santa María de Buenos Aires. Some time afterwards this settlement was attacked and partially destroyed by the Indians. The work of rebuilding it was begun 11 June, 1580, by Don Juan de Garay. The city of La Asunción, now the capital of Paraguay, was founded by Juan de Ayolas, a lieutenant of Mendoza, 15 August, 1536. Under the rule of Hernando Arias de Saavedra, generally called Hernandarias, who was born on Argentine soil, and had been elected governor by the settlers, the Jesuits were called to civilize the Indians. The first Fathers landed at Salta in 1586, and established a college at Córdoba, in which they sent mission work among all parts of the Argentine territory. Fathers Montoya and Cataldino went to Paraguay and settled, in 1610, at La Asunción. Seven years after the landing of the Jesuit Fathers, over 100,000 Indians had been congregated in four different towns and were engaged in cultural pursuits and useful arts and trades. They built houses, hospitals, and asylums; learned to read and write, and became acquainted also with painting, sculpture, and music. Even at this early date they had established a printing office with type made by themselves. In course of time, this work of civilization was greatly extended. The Jesuit "Provincias Argentinas" of Señores Uribarri and Colombo states that in or about 1631 there were not less than thirty centres of population under the rule of the Jesuits. Each town had a curate who was at the same time the governor, the judge, and the spiritual adviser of the inhabitants. But the expulsion of the Jesuits by Philip IV of Spain, and of the mission work by Charles III put an end to this prosperous condition. The expulsion took place in Buenos Aires, 3 July, 1767. Governor Don Francisco de Paula Bucarelli was the official entrusted with the execution of the disastrous measure. On 1 August, 1776, the Government of Spain decided to establish what it called the "Capitularía del Río de la Plata", under Don Pedro de Zeballos, the first viceroy. The last viceroy was Don Baltasar Hidalgo de Cisneros (1809). The revolutionary movement which ended in the independence of the country, began in the Argentine territory, as everywhere else in South America, in 1808, at the time of the imprisonment of King Ferdinand of Spain by Napoleon. The formal declaration of independence was made, 9 July, 1816. In 1833, after the country had passed through the ordeals of several civil wars, a war with Brazil, and the Rossa Dictatorship, the federal constitution which is now in force (amended in 1860) was framed and promulgated. Since then the Argentina has prospered and developed rapidly.

Sources of Wealth.—The most important factors of the wealth and prosperity of the Argentine Republic may be grouped under three different heads: agriculture and agricultural industries, cattle-raising and its cognate occupations, and commerce. The chief agricultural pursuits are the cultivation of wheat, maize, linseed, alfalfa, sugar cane, tobacco, and grapes. The whole area of cultivation, in 1904, was estimated conservatively at 7,500,000 hectares, or 18,750,000 acres (Uren and Colombo, "Geografía Argentina," Buenos Ayres, 1905). According to official information of 1901, the area of cultivation of the different products was as follows:

The agricultural industries are chiefly the manufacture of flour, sugar, cigars, wines, spirits, and ale. The exportation of flour in 1901 represented a total of 71,742 tons, estimated at $2,711,208 in gold. Cattle-raising and its cognate industries constitute the most lucrative business of the Argentine Republic. Nature has endowed Argentina with advantages for agricultural and pastoral farming hardly to be found in any other country of the world.

Foreign Trade.—The foreign trade of the Argentine Republic is mainly with the countries enumerated in the following table. The values of this trade are given in gold.—

The chief imports from Argentina into the United States in 1904 were hides and skins, $4,389,123; the chief exports from the United States to Argentina were agricultural implements, $4,996,476; timber, $2,996,912, and mineral oil, $1,868,957.

Shipping and Navigation.—In 1902, the registered shipping consisted of 101 steamers of 38,770 tons, and 151 sailing vessels of 38,071 tons; total, 252 of 76,841 tons. In 1904, the number of ocean-going vessels which entered the port of Buenos Aires was 2,072 with an aggregate tonnage of 3,896,197 tons, as against 1,842 of 3,461,208 tons in 1903.

I. Public Status of the Church.—Under the second article of the federal Constitution, "the Federal Government supports the Roman Catholic Apostolic Religion." According to the last complete, official national census, referred to above, of every thousand inhabitants of the country there were 991 Catholics, 2 Jews, and 7 Protestants and dissenters of whatever kind. The total population (3,854,911) is distributed as follows: native Catholic population, 2,944,397, of whom 1,449,793 are male, and 1,494,604 female; foreign Catholic population, 976,739, divided into 617,470 males, and 359,259 females. The total Catholic population is 3,921,136. The non-Catholic population included 26,750 Protestants, 6,085 Jews, and 940 other non-Catholics. The federal congress appropriates every year a certain amount of money to assist the Church in meeting its expenses. For the fiscal year of 1905 these appropriations amounted to $557,420 in the national currency. Out of this sum, $617,420 were set aside for the salaries of Church functionaries and ecclesiastics of all kinds, and for defraying the necessary expenses of Divine worship. The balance ($240,000) represented "subsidies" to certain churches in the provinces.

II. Hierarchy.—The Argentine hierarchy consists of the Archbishop of Buenos Aires, and the Bishops of Córdoba, La Plata, Paraná, San Juan de Cuyo, Santa Fé, Salta, and Tucumán. The right to appoint a bishop belongs, according to the Holy See; but the federal Senate has the right, when a vacancy occurs, to send three names to the President of the Union for transmission to Rome, where the choice is to be made, if made at all, out of the three nominees. Each cathedral is provided, according to Spanish usage, with a chapter, i.e., a number of canons and ecclesiastical officials appointed by the government upon nomination of the respective bishops. There is an ecclesiastical seminary in each diocese, under the control of the bishop, for the support of which an appropriation is made yearly. The Holy See is represented at Buenos Aires by an Apostolic nuncio, who ranks as the dean of the diplomatic corps. The Argentine Nation has in Rome a chargé d'affaires. Until lately the representation of the Argentine Republic at the Pontifical Court was entrusted to the Argentine representative in Paris. The Catholic spirit which animated the framers of the federal constitution is forcibly illustrated by the provisions of article 76, which requires as a condition of eligibility for the position of President, or Vice-President, of the Union, "to belong to the Roman Catholic Apostolic religion"; and by those contained in clauses 15 and 20, article 67, which respectively empower the federal Congress "to promote the conversion of the Indians to the Catholic religion," and "to admit into the territory of the Republic other religious orders additional to those now in existence". Article 20 of the same instrument grants to foreigners the right of freedom of worship. The right of approval and ratification of concordats and agreements with the Holy See, of nomination for the ecclesiastical positions of high rank, and of allowing or refusing promulgation in the Argentine press, for example, is delegated to the civil government. These treaties, and rescripts of the Supreme Pontiff, are respectively regulated by clause 19, article 67, and by Clauses 8 and 9 of article 86.

III. ECCLESIASTICO-CIVIL LEGISLATION.—Though this country is Catholic, civil marriage, lay primary instruction, and purely municipal cemeteries are permitted. The civil marriage law, which was passed, 2 Nov., 1888, and went into effect, 1 Dec., 1889, gives validity only to marriages celebrated before the public officer in charge of the registry of births, marriages, and deaths. The ceremony may take place at the residence of either the groom or the bride, but four witnesses shall then be required. The registrar is forbidden to prevent the contracting parties from seeking to have their union blessed immediately afterwards by a minister of their religion. Article 64 of the law declares that the right to teach Latin and Greek in Argentina is the separation a mené et vero, without dissolution of the bond of marriage.

IV. CHURCHES OF BUENOS AIRES.—The cathedral of Buenos Aires is a magnificent edifice, erected on the site of the first church of the settlement built by Don Juan de Garay in 1580. This church was burned in 1582. The cathedral of Buenos Aires, as originally intended, was a chapel erected by the Jesuits in 1772, but was not completed until 1853. The cathedral is a beautiful example of the neoclassical style, with a large dome and a high altar. It is the seat of the Archbishop of Buenos Aires, who is also the Primate of the Argentine Church. The cathedral is surrounded by a beautiful park, which is a popular landmark for tourists and locals alike.

V. EDUCATION, COLLEGIATE AND UNIVERSITY.—It is well known that the Jesuits were the pioneers of progress and public instruction in all the vast region which extends on both sides of the River Plate, where they founded schools and novitiates, and propagated learning as well as Christian faith. Their college of St. Francis Xavier, established at Córdoba in 1611, and completed in 1613, soon became the Colegio Máximo of the Jesuit province of La Plata, which embraced what is to-day the Argentine Nation and Chile. This institution, where grammar, Latin, philosophy, and theology were taught, and whose chief architect was Father Tapia, was re-opened a little later, the University of Córdoba, still in existence, and in the order of time, the second university established in South America; the first was that of San Marcos at Lima (1551). Public schools in the Argentine Republic as in the United States are absolutely secular. But the law of public instruction provides that, "after official hours, religious instruction (Catholic or otherwise) may be given to the children who voluntarily remain in the schools for the purpose of receiving it. This religious instruction in the public schools shall be given: only by the authorized ministers of the different persuasions, before or after school hours".

VI. SANCTUARY OF LUJÁN AND CHRIST OF THE ANDES.—In the city of Luján, about two hours and a half by rail from the federal capital, is the celebrated shrine of our Lady of Luján, since 1630 a centre of intense religious fervour. It is to be made part of the national basilica of sanctuary of construction. When finished this will be one of the most imposing buildings of its kind in Spanish America. How closely interwoven the Catholic faith is with the life and ideas of the Argentine people may be seen by the monument known as El Cristo de los Andes (The Christ of the Andes), erected on the summit of that range, chiefly by the efforts of an Argentine lady and Monsignor Benevente, Bishop of San Juan de Cuyo. It is a colossal statue of Our Lord, with a cross in His left hand, and the right raised as if blessing the world. The statue is made from old bronze cannon left by the Spaniards, and is the work of a native sculptor, 36 at 14,000 feet above the sea-level, on the line which divides the Argentine Republic from Chile, and commemorates the arbitration by both nations of the boundary question that more than once endangered their mutual peace.

VII. NON-CATHOLIC POPULATION.—The small non-Catholic population has five Protestant houses of worship, as follows: one Anglican Episcopal, one Lutheran, one Methodist Episcopal, one Scotch, and one in which the worship varies according to the time of day in which it is offered. The first Protestant church was built in 1829.

Argentré, Charles du Plessis de, b. 16 May, 1673; d. 17 October, 1740. He entered the seminary of St. Sulpice at Paris, and studied theology at the Sorbonne; he was ordained priest in 1699, and was made doctor of Theology in 1700. He held successively the offices of Abbe de la Trégueret of Croix-de-l'Isle, Deán of Lavall, Viscount-General of the Bishop of Trelgrevier (1707), and Royal Almoner. He was made Bishop of Tulle in 1723 and distinguished himself for beneficence, interest in ecclesiastical studies, and personal exercise of the ministry. Among his writings is a book de la foi (Paris, 1701); "Elements Theologica" (Paris, 1702), in which he rejects Papal Infallibility but defends that of the Church in the matter of the condemned Janissary propositions; "Lexicon Philosophicum" (Hague, 1706), a treatise on the difference between the natural and the supernatural order (Paris, 1707). "Explication des Éléments de l'Église" (Tulle, 1717), and other theological, scriptural, and philosophical works. He edited the theological works of Martin Grandin (Paris, 1710-12) and added several theological dissertations of his own, among them one on Pope Honorius. He is best known by his "Collectio Judiciorum de novis erroribus qui ab initio sec. XII [to 1735] in Ecclesiis proscripti sunt atque notati; Censoria etiam judicia academiarum . . .," 3 vols. (Paris, 1724-36). This valuable collection contains many documents relative to theological controversies since the twelfth century, pontifical "acts," decisions of Roman Congregations, and decrees of ecumenical councils. (Oxford, Paris, Louvain, principally those of Paris). The latest document quoted is dated 1723. There is a complete bibliography of his French and Latin works in the "Mémoires de Trévoux" (1734), I, 223-225.

Argos, a circular sea of Peloponnesian Greece, from the fifth to the twelfth century, about twenty miles south-west of Corinth (Gams, pp. 490-431). It was considered the oldest city of Greece and was once the head of the Doric League, and in its time one of the largest and most populous of the Greek cities. Argos was famous in Greek antiquity for the worship of Hera (Juno), and her great temple, the Heraean (1200-72 B.C.), was considered one of the most magnificent monuments of Greek architecture. In the fifth century, b.c., the city was also famous for its temple of Apollo, the chief Doric sanctuary, and as the seat of celebrated schools of sculpture and music, especially of the flute. Its medieval history is lost; but (A.D. 1100) it is (in the French gréco-romanes, Paris, 1873. XXIX-XXX, 236-424), and by Gregorius, Gesch. der Stadt. Ath., Stuttgart, 1889, I, 364, and II, 583. In the fourteenth and fourteenth centuries it was the seat of a diocese, being then held successively by the French Dukes of Athens and the Byzantines; in 1463 it passed under Ottoman rule. Its present population is about 10,620.

Argiello, Luis Antonio, Governor of California, b. at San Francisco, 1784; d. there in 1830. His family was one of the most influential and distinguished in the early history of California. His father, Dario José Argiello, was acting Governor of California in 1814-15, and Governor of Lower California from 1815 to 1822. In August, 1806, Don Luis succeeded his father as Comandante of California with the rank of lieutenant. He was captain from 1818, and Governor from November, 1819, to February, 1822. Don Luis was the only Governor during the Mexican Era and the first native of California to hold that office. He was also acting governor under the provisional government which preceded the Mexican Republic. In 1821 he conducted what is popularly known as Argiello's Expedition, the most important of the early exploration of the North Country ever made by the Spaniards in California. He was hardly less popular than his illustrious father, and, though involved at times in controversies, he left a reputation for honesty, ability, and kindness of heart.

Argyll and the Isles, The Diocese of—The Diocese of Argyll, founded about 1200, was separated from the Diocese of Dunkeld; it included the western part of Dunkeld, beyond the Drumblan mountain range, together with the Isle of Lismore, in which the cathedral was erected. The first bishop was Harold, chaplain of the Bishop of Dunkeld, chosen on account of his acquaintance with the Gaelic tongue. The Diocese of the Isles included the islands off the west coast of Scotland, formerly subject to Norway, and annexed to the Scottish Crown in 1206 under James I. The Archbishop of Drontheim continued to exercise jurisdiction over these islands, but in the middle of the eighteenth century the Hebrides were ecclesiastically separated from the Isle of Man, which was subjected to the province of Canterbury (and later to York). A century and a half afterwards Alexander VI, at the request of King James IV, united the See of the Isles and the abbacy of Iona, which were henceforth held by the same person, the cathedral of the newly-constituted diocese being established at Iona. There were thirty pre-Reformation Bishops of the Isles, the last being Roderick Maclean, who died in 1553.

The last of the sixteen Bishops of Argyll was William Cunningham, who died in 1562; for his successor, James Hamilton, seems never to have received consecration. Both sees thereafter remained vacant for over three hundred years, until 4 March, 1878, Leo XIII re-elected the Scottish hierarchy, the united diocese of Argyll and the Isles being included among the revived bishoprics. The present diocese comprises the counties of Argyll and Bute and the Government of a line drawn from the northern extremity of Loch Luing to the junction of the counties of Inverness, Aberdeen, and Banff; also the islands of Arran and Bute, and the Hebrides. The actual Bishop (1906), the second since the restoration of the hierarchy, is the Right Rev. George Smith, who was consecrated pro-cathedral Bishop of Inverness in 1868. The diocesan jurisdiction is estimated at between 12,000 and 13,000 souls. It has tended to diminish rather than to increase in recent times, owing to the drain caused by emigration, and also to the depopulation of many districts of the West Highlands, due to the turning of large tracts of land by the proprietors into deer forests. There are but two towns of any size (in importance in the diocese, Oban and Rothesay; and the only access to many of the outlying missions is by sea. By a singular contrast, the wealthiest Catholic landowner in the kingdom, the Marquis of Bute, has his principal place of residence (a palatial mansion on which his father is said to have expended upwards of a million sterling), in what is probably the poorest diocese in the British Isles.

Argyropulos, John, humanist, and translator of Aristotle, b. at Constantinople, 1416; d. at Rome about 1486. It is certain that he was a teacher at Padua in 1434, although it is not clear why he returned to Constantinople in 1441. After the conquest of his native city by the Turks (1453) he joined the band of Renaissance refugees who fled the Marmara to refuge in Italy. In 1456 he was summoned to Florence by Cosimo de' Medici for the purpose of teaching (Aristotelian) philosophy and instructing the youthful Pietro and Lorenzo. In 1471 a plague broke out in Florence: this was the occasion of his leaving Florence for Rome, where he was summoned by Pope Sixtus IV. There he continued his career as teacher, having among his pupils many cardinals and bishops and some distinguished foreigners, such as Reuchlin. He died at Rome; the year of his death is uncertain, but 1486 is the most probable date. He was one of the few who contributed most to the revival of Greek learning in Italy. After Manuel Chrysoloras, he and George of Trebizond and George Gemistus had the largest share in making known to Western Europe the treasures of ancient Greek literature. Like all the other humanists, he was somewhat intemperate in his zeal for his chosen subject, and in his desire to extol the excellence of Greek literature, he expressed his contempt for the literature of ancient Rome; he was especially severe in his criticism of Cicero. His most serviceable works are his translations of many of Aristotle's works (published by Aldo Manucci, 1518-20) and his discourses on "Ethics" and "Politics" (published 1541). He also wrote several theological treatises, including one on the "Procession of the Holy Ghost." (P. G., Cl. VIII, 991 sqq.). Many of his works are still in manuscript.

Artaiolo, Saint, martyred at Milan in 1065, for his attempt to reform the simoniacal and immoral clergy of that city. He was of noble extraction, b. at Cutiacum, near Milan, and after his studies, at Laon and Paris, was made a canon in the cathedral city. For inveighing against abuses he was excommunicated by the bishop Guido, but was immediately reinstated by Pope Urban II, who exhorted him to continue the work of reformation. He succeeded in having the bishop excommunicated because of his repeated lapses, but a riot ensued, resulting in serious injury to Arialdo. Previously an attempt had been made on his life with a poisoned sword. Later, when on his way to Rome, he was waylaid by the emissaries of Guido and slain. Ten months after, his body was found in Lago Maggiore in a perfect state of preservation, and emitting a sweet odour. It was carried with great pomp to Milan, and exposed in the church of St. Ambrose from Ascension to Pentecost. It was subsequently interred in the church of St. Celius, and in the following year, 1067, Alexander II declared him a martyr.

Arianism, a heresy which arose in the fourth century, and denied the Divinity of Jesus Christ.

Doctrine.—First among the doctrinal disputes which troubled Christians after Constantine had recognized the Church in A.D. 313, and the parent of many more during some three centuries, Arianism occupies a large place in ecclesiastical history. It is not a modern form of unbelief, and therefore will appear strange in modern eyes. But we shall better grasp its meaning if we term it an Eastern attempt to rationalize the creed by stripping it of mystery so far as the relation of Christ to God was concerned.

In the New Testament and in Church teaching the name of Nazareth appears as the common name He took to Himself (Matt. xxi. 17; John x. 36), while the Fourth Gospel declares Him to be the Word (Logos), Who in the beginning was with God and was God, by Whom all things were made. A similar doctrine is laid down by St. Paul, in his undoubtedly genuine Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon. It is reiterated in the Letters of Ignatius, and accounts for Pliny's observation that Christians in their assemblies chanted a hymn to Christ as God. But the question how the Son was related to the Father (Himself acknowledged on all hands to be the one Supreme Deity), gave rise, between the years A.D. 60 and 200, to a number of Theosophic systems, called generally Gnosticism, and having for their authors Basiliades, Valentinus, Tatian, and other Greek speculators. Though all these visited Rome, they had no following in the West, which remained free from controversies of an abstract nature, and was faithful to the creed of its baptism. Intellectual influences were chiefly Alexandria and Antioch, Egyptian or Syrian, and speculation was carried on in Greek. The Roman Church held steadfastly by tradition. Under these circumstances, when Gnostic schools had passed away with their "conjugations" of Divine powers, and "emanations" from the Supreme unknowable God (the "Deep" and the "Silences"), all speculation was thrown into the form of an inquiry touching the "likeness" of the Son to His Father and the "sameness" of His Essence. Catholics had always maintained that Christ was truly the Son and truly God. They worshipped Him with divine honours; they would never consent to separate Him, in idea or reality, from the Father, Whose Word, Reason, Mind, He was, and in Whose Heart He abode from eternity. But the technical terms of doctrine were not fully defined; and even in Greek words like essence (soma), substance (heteran), nature (rouma) were used in a way that cast doubt on the teachings drawn from the pre-Christian sects of philosophers, which could not but entail misunderstandings until they were cleared up. The adaptation of a vocabulary employed by Plato and Aristotle to Christian truth was a matter of time; it could not come in a day; and certainly the Church of the Greek had it to undertake for the Latin, which did not lend itself readily to subtle yet necessary distinctions. That disputes should spring up even among the orthodox who all held one faith, was inevitable. And of these wranglings the rationalist would take advantage in order to substitute for the ancient creed his own inventions. The drift of all he advanced was this: to deny that in any true sense God could have a Son; as Mohammed tersely said afterwards, "God neither begets nor is He begotten." (Koran, cxiii). We have learned to call that denial Unitarianism. It was the ultimate stage of Arian opposition, which had always believed. But the Arian, though he did not come straight down from the Gnostic, pursued a line of argument and taught a view which the speculations of the Gnostic had made familiar. He described the Son as a second, or inferior God, standing midway between the first Father and creatures; and Himself made out of nothing, and all things else; as existing before the worlds or the ages; and as arrayed in all divine perfections except the one which was their stay and foundation. God alone was without beginning, unoriginate; the Son was originated, and once had not existed. For all that has an origin must begin to be.
Such is the genuine doctrine of Arianism. Using Greek terms, it denies that the Son is of one essence, nature, or substance with God; He is not consubstantial (homoousios) with the Father, and therefore not like Him, or equal in dignity, or co-eternal, or within the real sphere of Deity. The Logos which St. John exalts is an attribute, Reason, belonging to the Father, but not a person distinct from another, and therefore is a Son merely in figure of speech. These consequences follow upon the principle which Arianus maintains in his letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia, that the Son “is no part of the Ingenerate.” Hence the Arian sectaries who regarded Logos-speeches were strictly Anomoeans, said that the Son was “unlike” the Father. And they defined God as simply the Unoriginate. They are also termed Exocontians (ἐξ οὗ ἐκτισθησατο), because they held the creation of the Son out of nothing.

But a view so unlike tradition found little favour; it required softening or palliation, even at the cost of logic; and the school which supplanted pure Arianism from an early date affirmed the likeness, either without adjunct, or in all things, or in substance, of the Son to the Father, while denying His co-equal dignity and co-eternal existence. These men of the Via Media were named Semi-Arians. Their approach is in strict and literal, to the high doctrine, but many of them held the orthodox faith, however inconsistently; their difficulties turned upon language or local prejudice, and no small number submitted at length to Catholic teaching. The Semi-Arians attempted for years to invent a compromise between irreconcilable views, and their shifting creeds, tumultuous councils, and worldly devices tell us how mixed and motley a crowd was collected under their banner. The point to be kept in remembrance is that, while they affirmed the Word of God to be everlasting, they imagined Him as having become the Son to create the worlds and redeem mankind. Among the ante-Nicene writers, a certain ambiguity of expression may be detected, outside the school of Alexandria, touching this last head of doctrine. While Catholic teachers held the Monarchia, viz. that there was only one God; and the Trinity, that this Absolute One existed in three distinct subsistences; and the Circumstances of Word, Father, and Son, were separated, in fact or in thought, from one another, yet an opening was left for discussion as regarded the term “Son,” and the period of His “generation” (γεννασθησατο). Five ante-Nicene Fathers are especially quoted: Athanasius, Tatian, Theophilus of Antioch, Hilary, and Novatian, and both historians and fathers took to involve a peculiar notion of the Sonship, as though it did not come into being or were not perfect until the dawn of creation. To these may be added Tertullian and Methodius. Cardinal Newman held that their view, which is found clearly in Tertullian, of the Son existing after the Word, is connected as an ante-Nicene with Petavius. Petavius cost from the same expressions in a reprehensible sense; but the Anglican Bishop Bull defended them as orthodox, not without difficulty. Even if metaphorical, such language might give shelter to unfair disputants; but we are not answerable for the slips of teachers who express themselves in promiscuous hasty truths really held by them. From these doubtful theorizings Rome and Alexandria kept aloof. Origen himself, whose unadvised speculations were charged with the guilt of Arianism, and who employed terms like “the second God,” concerning the Logos which we have adopted by the Church, this very Origen taught the Deity of the Son of the Word, and was not a Semi-Arian. To him the Logos, the Son, and Jesus of Nazareth were one ever-substituting Divine Person, begotten of the Father, and, in this way, “subordinate” to the source of His being. He comes forth from God as the creative Word, and so is a ministering Agent, or, from a different point of view, is the First-born of creation. Dionysius of Alexandria (260) was even denounced at Rome for calling the Son a work or creature of God; but he explained himself to the pope on orthodox principles, and confessed the Homousian Creed on the person distinct of the Father.

History.—Paul of Samosata, who was contemporary with Dionysius, and Bishop of Antioch, may be judged the true ancestor of those heresies which re-adopted Christ beyond the Divine sphere, whatever epithets of deity they allowed Him. The man Jesus, according to Paul, was distinct from the Logos, and, in Milton’s later language, by merit was only the Son of God. The Supreme is one in Person as in Essence. Three councils held at Antioch (264–268, or 269) condemned and excommunicated the Samosatene. But these Fathers would not accept the Homousian formula, dreading lest it should be taken to signify one material or abstract substance, according to the usage of the heathen philosophies. Associated with Paul, and for years cut off from the Catholic communion, we find the well-known Lucian, who edited the Septuagint and became at last a martyr. From this learned man the school of Antioch drew their inspiration, in strict and literal, to the high doctrine, and Arianism, and Arian himself, all came under Lucian’s influence. Not, therefore, to Egypt and its mystical teaching, but to Syria, where Aristotle flourished with his logic and its tendency to Rationalism, should we look for the home of an aberration which had it finally triumphed, would have anticipated Islam, reducing the Eternal Son to the rank of a prophet, and thus undoing the Christian revelation.

Arius, a Libyan by descent, brought up at Antioch and a school-fellow of Eusebius, afterwards Bishop of Nicomedia, took part (306) in the obscure Mele- tian schism, was made presbyter of the church called “Baucalia” at Alexandria, and opposed the Sabellians, himself committed to a view of the Trinity which denied all real distinctions in the Supreme. Epiphanius describes the heresiarch as tall, grave, and winning; no aspersion on his moral character has been sustained; but there is some possibility of personal differences having led to the quarrel could it be shown that in public synod, he accused of teaching that the Son was identical with the Father (319). The actual circumstances of this dispute are obscure, but Alexander condemned Arius in a great assembly, and the latter found a refuge with Eusebius, who adopted the language and motives embittered the strife. Many bishops of Asia Minor and Syria took up the defence of their “fellow-Lucianist,” as Arius did not hesitate to call himself. Synods in Palestine and Bithynia were opposed to synods in Egypt. During several years the argument raged; but when, by his defeat of Constantius (324), Constantine became master of the Roman world, he determined on restoring ecclesiastical order in the East, as already in the West he had undertaken to put down the Donatists at the Council of Arles. Arius, in a letter to the Nicomedian prelate, had boldly rejected the Catholic faith. But Constantine, turning to the consequences this very document sent from Nicomedia to Alexander a famous letter, in which he treated the controversy as an idle dispute about words and enlarged on the blessings of peace. The emperor, we should call to mind, was only a catechumen, imperfectly acquainted with Greek, which much incompetent to the difficulties to exercise over the Catholic Church a dominion resembling that which, as Pontiff Maximus, he wielded over the pagan worship. From this Byzantin e conception (labelled in modern times Erastianism) we must derive the calamities which during many hundreds of years set their mark on the development of Christian dogma. Alexander could not go unavenged, nor could Arianism and his supporters would not yield. A council was, therefore, assembled at Nicaea, in Bithynia, which has ever been counted the first ecumenical, and which held its sittings from the middle of June, 325. It is commonly said that Hosius of Cordova presided. The Pope, St. Silvester, was represented by his legate, Valens. The representative of Antioch was deposed on a charge of Sabellianism (331), and the Emperor sent his command that Athanasius should receive Arius back to communion. The saint firmly declined. In 335 the heresiarch was absolved by two councils, at Tyre and Jerusalem, the former of which deposed Athanasius on false and pernicious grounds of his ecumenical opinions. He was exiled to Trier, and his sojourn of eighteen months in those parts cemented Alexandria more closely to Rome and the Catholic West. Meanwhile, Constantia, the Emperor's sister, had recommended Arius, whom she thought an injured man, to Constantine's leniency. Her dying words implored him, and he recalled the Libyan, exacted from him a solemn adhesion to the Nicene faith, and ordered Alexander, Bishop of the Imperial City, to give him Communion in his own church (336). Arius openly triumphed; but as he went about in parade, the evening before this event was to take place, he expired from a sudden disorder, which Catholics could not help regarding as a judgment of heaven, due to the bishop's prayers. His death, however, did not stay the plague. Constantine now favoured none but Arians; he was baptized in his last moments by the shifty prelate of Nicomedia; and he bequeathed to his tithes (337) a codicil which permitted the episcopate of his sons to be filled by persons of his own choosing, in the name of the Church, and his own. The Emperors had the heretics, the bishops, even Constantine himself, to back them, and the Church was divided. The time was ripe for the double council of 336, which added the Nicene Creed to the Nicaean, and confirmed the sentence of 325 against Arius and his followers. The Nicene Creed is the only creed known to us which was not made up on the spur of the moment, but was the result of mature consideration and consultation of the wisest minds of the time. The creed is a confession of faith, and contains the essential dogmas of the Christian religion. It is the foundation of all Christian doctrine, and is the basis of all Christian worship. It is the expression of the belief of the Church in the one God, the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Spirit. It is the declaration of the faith of the Church, and it is the admission of the truth of the gospel. It is the standard of all Christian doctrine, and it is the measure of all Christian worship. It is the expression of the belief of the Church in the one God, the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Spirit. It is the declaration of the faith of the Church, and it is the admission of the truth of the gospel. It is the standard of all Christian doctrine, and it is the measure of all Christian worship. It is the expression of the belief of the Church in the one God, the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Spirit. It is the declaration of the faith of the Church, and it is the admission of the truth of the gospel. It is the standard of all Christian doctrine, and it is the measure of all Christian worship.
Arianism was quoted by Innocent I in his correspondence with the bishops of Africa.

Having won over Constant, who warmly took up his cause, the invincible Athanasius received from his Oriental and Semi-Arian sovereign three letters commanding, and at length entreaty his return to Alexandria (349). The factious bishops, Ursus and Alexander, instigated against him the hands of Pope Julius: and as he travelled home, by way of Thrace, Asia Minor, and Syria, the crowd of court-prelates did him abject homage. These men veered with every wind. Some, like Eusebius of Cesarea, held a Platonizing doctrine which they would not give up, though they declined the Arian heresy. But many were adherents to dogma. And a new party had arisen, the strict or pious Hocioisians, not friends of Ariansius, nor willing to subscribe the Nicene terms, yet slowly drawing nearer to the true creed and finally accepting it. In the councils which now follow these good men play their part. However, when Constant died (330), and his Semi-Arian brother was left supreme, the persecution of Athanasius redoubled in violence. By a series of intrigues the Western bishops were persuaded to cast him off at Arles, Milan, Ariminiun. It was concerning this last council (350) that St. Jerome wrote: "Nothing in the whole world of the Church evoked and mustered to itself Athanasius. For the Latin bishops were driven by threats and chicanery to sign concessions which at no time represented their genuine views. Councils were so frequent that their dates are still matter of controversy. Personal issues disguised the dogmatic importance of a struggle which had gone on for thirty years. The Pope of the day, Liberius, brave at first, undoubtedly orthodox, but torn from his see and banished to the dreary solitude of Thrace, signed a creed, in tone Semi-Arian (compiled chiefly from one of Sirmium), renounced Athanasius, but made a stand against the so-called "Homoean" formula of Ariminun. This new party was led by Acacius of Cesarea, an aspiring churchman who maintained that he, and not St. Cyril of Jerusalem, was metropolitan over Palestine. The Homoeans, a sort of Protestants, would have no terms employed which were not found in Scripture, and thus evaded some of the substance. A more extreme party, the "Anomaean", followed Aetius, were directed by Eunomius, held meetings at Antioch and Sirmium declared the Son to be "unlike" the Father, and made themselves powerful in the last years of Constantius within the palace. George of Cappadocia persuaded the Alexandrine Catholics. At last the emperor retired into the desert among the solitaries. Hosius had been compelled by torture to subscribe a fashionable creed. When the vacillating Emperor died (361), Julian, known as the Apostate, suffered all alike to return home who had been exiled on account of religion. A momentous gathering, over which Alexandrine and Valens in 362, at Alexandria, decided the orthodox Semi-Arians with himself and the West. Four years afterwards fifty-nine Macedonian, i.e. hitherto anti-Nicene, prelates gave in their submission to Pope Liberius. But the Emperor Valens, a fierce heretic, still laid the Church waste. The battle was now turning decisively in favour of Catholic tradition. Western bishops, like Hilary of Poitiers and Eusebius of Verceil, banished to Asia for holding the Nicene faith, were acting in union with St. Basil, the two St. Gregories, and the reconciled Semi-Arians. As an insect moved upon a stone the four Tetrarchy. Theodosius, a Spandari and a Catholic, governed the whole Empire. Athanasius died in 373; but his cause triumphed at Constantinople, long an Arian city, first, by the preaching of St. Gregory Nazianzen, then in the Second Council (381), at the opening of which Melitius of Antioch presided. This saintly man had been estranged from the Nicene champions during a long schism; but he made peace with Athanasius, and now, in company of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, represented a moderate influence which won the day. No deputies appeared from the West. Melitius died almost immediately. St. Gregory Nazianzen, his disciple, preserved his memory. A creed embodying the Nicene was drawn up by St. Gregory of Nyssa, but it is not the one that is chanted at Mass, the latter being due, it is said, to St. Epiphanius and the Church of Jerusalem. The Council became ecumenical by acceptance of the Pope and the ever-orthodox Westerns. From this moment Arianism in all its forms was driven from its place within the Empire. Its developments among the barbarians were political rather than doctrinal. Ulphilas (311-388), who translated the Scriptures into Moeso-Gothic, taught the Goths across the Danube an Homoean theology. Arian kingdoms arose in Spain, Africa, Italy (after the conquest of Gades), Vandals, Alans, and Lombards received a system which they were as little capable of understanding as they were of defending, and the Catholic bishops, the monks, the sword of Clovis, the action of the Papacy, made an end of it before the eighth century. In the form which it took under Anianus, Eunomius, Hilary, it has never been revived. Individuals, among whom are Milton and Sir Isaac Newton, were perhaps tainted with it. But the Socinian tendency out of which Unitarian doctrines have grown owes nothing to the school of Antioch or the councils which opposed Niccns. Neither has any Arian leader stood forth in history with a character of heroic proportions. In the whole story there is but a single hero—the undaunted Athanasius—whose mind was equal to the problems, as his great spirit to the vicissitudes, of a question on which the future of Christianity depended.

Arianism, the Diocese of, is in the Archdiocese of Beneventum, comprising seven towns in the province of Avellino, four in that of Beneventum, and one in the province of Foggia. Ariano, a very ancient town of the Hirpi, is built on the hills, Heruli, at a distance of seven miles from Beneventum. Its name is of pagan origin: Ora Jani. There are no documents that fix the time of its conversion to Christianity. Beneventum, at the beginning of the fourth century, had a bishop, and the Gospel may have reached Ariano from that city. The Bishop of Beneventum was one who was present at the Synod of Rome, held in the year 313. (See Rott, Reliquiae Sacrae, III, 312, and Harnack, Die Mission, etc., 501.) Ariano was an episcopal city from the tenth century and perhaps before that time. We find it first mentioned in the Bull of Pope John XIII (965-972). It was established the title of city, named after it, by Pope Gregory XIII (1572-1585), as a suffragan see. The first bishop known to have occupied this see was Mercadus, a native, not of Padua, as Ughelli believed, but of Poitiers, which Vitale has shown. In 1070, he erected in his cathedral a marble baptistery on the walls of which verses were inscribed.

In the following year Manfredus was at the consecration of the church of Monte Cassino by Alexander III. Tradition has a whole series of bishops prior to him as proved by a declaration of 1080 made in favour of the monastery of St. Sofia in Beneventum. This diocese contains 25 parishes; 90 churches, chapels, and oratories of 125 seconds; 50 semi-parishes; 90 villages, 3 regular priests; 2 lay-brothers; 32 religious (women); 22 confreterates; 3 girls' schools (95 pupils). Population 50,400.

ARIA, Francis, writer of ascetical treatises, b. at Seville in Spain, 1533; d. in that place, 15 May, 1605. He was received into the Society of Jesus at the age of twenty-six. He was professor of scholastic theology at Cordova, of moral theology at Trigueros, rector of the college in the latter place and also at Cadiz. His works are "Spiritual Profit", "Treatise on the Rosary", "Imitation of Our Lady", "Imitation of Christ", "Mental Prayer", "The Use of the Sacraments", "The Promises of God", "The Turpitude and Grievousness of Sin". Most of them have been translated into various languages. His life and writings show this high esteem for the great master of the spiritual life, John of Avila, and St. Francis of Sales, in the "Introduction to a Devout Life", recommends the perusal of his works. He was commonly regarded as a saint, and was remarkable for his gift of prayer and his spirit of penance. Much of his time was devoted to the care of negroes, Moors, and the inmates of hospitals and prisons. From his earliest youth his predilection for spiritual things manifested itself; his career as a student in Alcalá was brilliant, and while a secular priest he laboured as an apostle in his native city of Seville. At his death it was difficult to protect his body from the piety of the people, who proclaimed him a saint and endeavoured to secure parts of his apparel as relics. ARIA DE AVILA, Pedro (also known as P Legarias DAVILA), a Spanish knight from Segovia, b. about the middle of the fifteenth century; d. at Leon, 1530. He married an intimate friend of Queen Isabella (whence probably his preternature) and saw some service in Europe. At the age of nearly seventy years he was made General (1514) of the largest of the English expeditions hither sent to America, and reached Santa Marta in Colombia with nineteen vessels and 1,500 men. Thence he went to Darien, where the discoverer of the South Sea, Balboa, governed. Pedrarias superseded him, gave him his daughter in wedlock, and afterwards had him judicially murdered in Panama. In 1516 he founded the city of Panama. He was a party to the original agreement with Pizarro and Almagro which brought about the discovery of Peru, but withdrew (1526) for a small compensation, having lost confidence in the outcome. In the same year he was superseded as Governor of Panama and returned to Spain, where he died, over eighty years old. He left an unenviable record, as a man of unreliable character, cruel, and unscrupulous. Through his foundation of Panama, however, he laid the basis for the discovery of South America's west coast and the subsequent conquest of Peru.

The journal of Andagoya has been translated into English by Markham and published by the Hakluyt Society (London, 1865) under the title Narrative of Proceedings of Pedrarias Dávila, together with an account of the conquest of Panama. It is to be found in the first volume of Prescott, History of the Conquest of Peru.

ARIA MONTANUS, BENEDICTUS, Orientalist, exegist, and editor of the "Antwerp Polyglot", b. at Frejenal de la Sierra in Estremadura, Spain, 1527; d. at Seville, 1598. Passing through the schools of Seville, he studied theology and the Oriental languages at Alcalá, later gaining proficiency in the various European languages by means of extended travel. He became a clerical member of the Military Order of St. James, and accompanied the Bishop of Segovia to the Council of Trent (1562) where he won great distinction. On his return he retired to a hermitage at Arcasena whence he was summoned by Philip II (1568) to supervise a new polyglot edition of the Bible, with the collaboration of many learned men. The work was issued from the press in 1572 (7 vols., 8 volumes) under the title "Biblia sacra hebraica, chaldaica, grecia et latina, Philippii regis catholici pietate et studio ad sacrosanctum Ecclesiam usus", several volumes being devoted to a scholarly apparatus biblicus. Aria was responsible for the first part of the actual matter, besides the general superintendence, and in obedience to the command of the king, took the work to Rome for the approbation of Gregory XIII. Leon de Castro, professor of Oriental languages at Salamanca, to whose translation of the Vulgate Aria had opposed the original Hebrew text, denounced Aria to the Roman, and caused him to be severed from the Spanish Inquisition for having altered the Biblical text, making too liberal use of the rabbinical writings, in disregard of the decree of the Council of Trent concerning the authenticity of the Vulgate, and confirming the Jews in their beliefs by his Chaldæan paraphrases. After several journeys to Rome, Aria was freed of the charges (1580) and returned to his hermitage, refusing the episcopal honours offered him by the King. He accepted however, the post of a royal chaplain, but was only induced to leave his retirement for the purpose of superintending the Escorial library, and of teaching the Oriental languages. He divided his time between prayer and study. In addition to the works written in connection with the Polyglot, the most celebrated of which is "Antiquitatem judaicarum libri IX" (Leyden, 1593), Aria left many commentaries on various books of the Bible; also: "Humane salutis monumenta" (Antwerp, 1571); a Latin translation of the "Itinerary" of Benjamin of Tudela, and other works on widely varying subjects. He was also celebrated as a poet whose verse being chiefly of a religious nature.

ARIBO, ARCHBISHOP OF MAINZ, date of birth unknown; d. 6 April, 1032; son of Arbo, Count Palatine in Laubenthal, and Adela, and one of the most important churchmen of his time. Choosing an ecclesiastical career, he became successively deacon in the church of Salzburg, master of arts, and then a canon of the Emperor, Henry II, who appointed him to the Archbishopric of Mainz. His consecration took place 1 October, 1021, with great pomp. The following year he revived the famous Gandersheim controversy which concerned the rival claims of the bishops of Hildesheim and the archbishops of Mainz (delegation over Gandersheim), situated on the boundary between the two dioceses, but from time immemorial subject to Hildesheim. Having advanced his claims without success in the synods of Frankfurt (1027) and Pöhlden (1028), Ario finally renounced them in Mainz (1029). Ario, true to his nature, remained future silence. Ario figured prominently in the politics of the time. On the death of Henry II, which brought the male line of the Saxon emperors to an end, the spiritual and temporal princes of the empire assembled to elect a new sovereign, and it was Ario's candidate who was chosen, under the title of Conrad II, and was anointed by him in Mainz. The powerful discourse preached on this occasion shows the deep spirituality of Ario's nature. Under Conrad he filled the office of chancellor for Germany and Italy. There are records of two journeys to Rome, the first to the Lateran Council (1029) the second before his death. He finished the convent of Goss in Styria begun by his father and devoted earnest efforts to the rebuilding and decoration of the cathedral which had been destroyed by fire in 1009. It was Ario who obtained for the archbishops of Mainz the right of coinage. His internal administration of the diocese was most energetic and capable. The zeal for the reform of ecclesiastical discipline is evidenced by the Council of Seligenstadt which he convened in the first year of his episcopate (August, 1022). Later he practically reorganized the archdiocese. His interest in education prompted him to summon Ekkehard of St. Gall to assume the charge of the schools of Mainz. His own intellectual powers were of no mean order as is manifested by his taste for poetry and his own treatise on "The Fifteen Gradual Psalms" wherein he is termed in his epigraph saecrivs psalmographus. Ario's contemporaries unite in praise of his character—his disinterestedness and capability. Despite the brusqueness of his nature and the severity of his discipline, he enjoyed the confidence and respect of his suffragans. His moral character has been proved unimpeachable.

Ariosto, Ludovico, called "The Italian Homer" the son of Nicolò Ariosto, Governor of Reggio, and Daria Malaguzzi, b. at Reggio in Emilia, 8 September, 1474; d. at Ferrara, 6 June, 1533. Ludovico was the eldest of ten children, and on the death of his father, in 1500, became head of the family. When nine years of age he composed and acted in the fable "Tosce." He gave five years to the study of law, and for twenty years devoted himself to Greek and Latin authors. From 1503, or thereabouts, he was attached to the court of Cardinal Ippolito d'Este, but in 1518 he fell into disfavour with his patron. The Cardinal's brother, Duke Alfonso, then employed Ariosto in various diplomatic missions, in which he conducted himself with such admirably to his name and skill. In 1512 to 1522 he governed the district of Garfagnana and freed it from the robber-bands which had infested it. In 1530, perhaps, he married a Florentine widow, Alessandra Benucci. Ariosto wrote sonnets and sonnets and sonnets in the style of Petrarch, and five comedies, of which the earliest, "La Cassarla," was represented for the first time in 1509, and the latest, "La Scialubica," was completed by his brother Gabriele on the death of the poet. Of more importance are his seven Satires in terza rima, and extending from 1517 to 1531, giving much information on his own life and laying bare the vices of the time. The principal foundation of Ariosto's glory is the "Orlando Furioso," begun about 1505, it was published in Ferrara, 21 April, 1516. Ariosto continued to correct it, and in 1532 published the second, enlarged and definitive edition. The poem was dedicated to Cardinal Ippolito. At first reading it appears to be a disconnected patchwork of fragmentary adventures following upon each other in no logical order; but on close analysis it becomes apparent that the episodes are spun around three principal incidents: Paris besieged by the Moors, the rage of Orlando, and, as the central subject, the love and marriage of Ruggiero and Bradamante, by which the origin of the house of Este is accounted for. Aristaes, a name given in Josephus (Ant. XII, ii, parvis) to the author of a letter ascertaining the Greek translation of the Old Testament to six interpreters sent into Egypt from Jerusalem at the request of the librarian of Alexandria. (See Septuagint Version.)

Aristides, a Christian apologist living at Athens in the second century. According to Eusebius, the Emperor Hadrian, during his stay in Greece (123–127), wished to be initiated into the Eleusinian Mysteries. A persecution of the local Christians followed, due, probably, to an outburst of pagan zeal, aroused by the Emperor's act. Two apologies for Christianity were composed on the occasion, that of Quadratus and that of Aristides which the author presented to Hadrian, at Athens, in 126 (Eus. vii. 126–127, ed. Schmid). St. Jerome, in his work De vir. il., xx, calls him "philosophus eloquentissimus, and, in his letter to Magnus (no. LXXX), says of the "Apologeticum" that it was "contextum philosophorum sententiarum," and was later imitated by St. Justin Martyr. He says, further (De vir. il., loc. cit.),"that the best and most highly thought of Eusebius (loc. cit.), in the fourth century, states that he had a wide circulation among Christians. It is referred to, in the ninth century, by Ado, Archbishop of Vienne, and Usuard, monk of St. Germain. It was then lost sight of for a thousand years, until, in 1785, the Mochitaro monks of No, at Venice, published a Latin translation of an Armenian fragment of the "Apology" and an Armenian homily, under the title: "S. Aristidis philosophi Atheniensis sermones duo." In 1889, Professor J. R. Harris of Cambridge discovered a Syriac version of the whole "Apology" in the Convent of St. Catherine on Mt. Sinai, and translated it into English (Texts and Studies, Cambridge, 1891, i. i.). Professor J. A. Robinson found that the "Apology" is contained in the "Life of Barlaam and Josaphat", ascribed to St. John Damascene. Attempts have also been made to restore the actual words of Aristides (Hennecke, "Greek Apologists", 1864, of 1883, to the date and occasion of the "Apology" there are differences of opinion. While some critics hold, with Eusebius, that it was presented to Hadrian, others maintain that it was written during the reign of Antoninus Pius (138-161). The aim of the "Apology" is to show that Christians only have the true conception of God. Having affirmed that God is "the selfsame being who first established and now controls the universe", Aristides points out the errors of the Chaldeans, Greeks, Egyptians, and Jews concerning the Deity, gives a brief summary of Christian belief, and emphasizes the righteousness of Christian life as a means to the correction of the vices of paganism. The tone throughout is elevated and calm, and the reasonableness of Christianity is shown rather by an appeal to facts than by subtle argumentation. It is interesting to note that during the Middle Ages the "Life of Barlaam and Josaphat" had been translated into nearly every language. English is the first, so that what was in reality the story of Buddha became the vehicle of Christian truth in many nations.

Aristotle. The greatest of heathen philosophers, b. at Stagira, a Greek colony in the Thracian peninsula Chalcidice, 384 b. c.; d. at Chalcis, in Euboea, 322 b. c. His father, Nicomachus, was court-physician to King Amynatas of Macedonia. This position, we have reason to believe, was held under various predecessors of Amynatas by Aristotle's ancestors, so that the practice of medicine was considered in the family. Whatever early training Aristotle received was probably influenced by this circumstance; when, therefore, at the age of eighteen he went to Athens his mind was already determined in the direction which it afterwards took, the investigation of natural phenomena. From his eighteenth to his thirty-seventh year he remained at Athens as pupil of Plato and was, we are told, distinguished among those who gathered for instruction in the Grove of Academus, adjoining Plato's house. The relations between the renowned teacher and his illustrious pupil have formed the subject of various legends, many of which represent Aristotle in an unfavourable light. Do not there were divergencies of opinion between the master, who took his stand on sublime, idealistic principles, and the scholar, who, even at that time, showed a preference for the investigation of the facts and laws of the physical world? It is probable that Aristotle needed the curb rather than the spur; but we have no reason to believe that there was an open breach of friendship. In fact, Aristotle's conduct after the death of Plato, his continued association with Xenocrates and other Platonists, and his allusions in his writings to Plato's doctrines, prove that while there were differences of opinion between teacher and pupil, there was no lack of cordial appreciation, or of that mutual forbearance which one would expect from men of lofty character. Besides this, the legends, so far as they reflect unfavourable relations of Aristotle to Plato, are more. Eusebius, who were known to antiquity as calumniators in the capacity of professional writers, such as Justin Martyr and Gregory Nazianzen, the reason is to be sought not in any well-grounded historical tradition, but in the exaggerated esteem in which Aristotle was held by the philosophers of his day. Aristotle's power was that of a great mind, both in Greece and Rome, and the reason for the esteem in which he was held is that he made discoveries which are still of value.

After the death of Plato (347 b. c.), Aristotle went, in company with Xenocrates, to the court of Hermias, ruler of Atarneus in Asia Minor, whose niece and adopted daughter, Pythias, he married. In 344, Hermias having been murdered in a rebellion of his subjects, Aristotle went with his family to Mytilene and thence, one or two years later, he was summoned to his native Stagira by King Philip of Macedon, to become the tutor of Alexander, who was then in his thirteenth year. Whether or not we believe Plutarch when he tells us that Aristotle not only imparted to the future world-conqueror a knowledge of ethics but imparted to him the profound secrets of philosophy, we have positive proof, on the one hand, that the royal pupil profited by contact with the philosopher, and, on the other hand, that the teacher made prudent and beneficial use of his influence over the mind of the young prince. It is due to this influence that Alexander, on the disposal of his teacher ample means for the acquisition of books and the pursuit of his scientific investigation; and history is not wrong in tracing to the intercourse with Aristotle those singular gifts of mind and heart which almost up to the very last distinguished Alexander among the few who have known how to make moderate and intelligent use of victory. About the year 335 Alexander departed for his Asiatic campaign; thereupon Aristotle, who, since his pupil's accession to the throne of Macedonia, had occupied the position of a more or less informal advisor, returned to Athens and there opened a school of philosophy. He may, as Gellius says, have conducted a school of rhetoric during his former residence in the city; but now, following the example of Plato, he gave regular instruction in philosophy, choosing for that purpose a gymnasium dedicated to Apollo Lyceius, from which his school has come to be known as the Lyceum. It was also called the "Aristotelian School", because it was there that the doctrine of atoms was first introduced and that the atomics of Leucippus and Democritus were discussed. Aristotle, however, had a broader view of the subject, and his investigations in the realm of natural phenomena. When we read the works treating of zoology we are quite prepared to believe Pliny's statement that Alexander placed under Aristotle's orders all the hunters, fishermen, and fowlers of the royal kingdom, and all the overseers of the royal forests, lakes, ponds, and tile-ranges, and when we observe how fully Aristotle is informed concerning the doctrines of those who preceded him, we are prepared to accept Strabo’s assertion that he was the first who accumulated a great library. During the last years of Aristotle’s life the relations between him and his former royal pupil began to be very much strained, involving the charges of impiety and prejudice against Callisthenes whom he had recommended to the King. Nevertheless, he continued to be regarded at Athens as a friend of Alexander and a representative of the Macedonian dominion. Consequently, when Alexander’s death became known at Athens, and the tidings which reached him to the Lamian war, Aristotle was obliged to share in the general unpopularity of the Macedonians, and the charge of impiety, which had been brought against Anaxagoras and Socrates, was now, with even less reason, brought against him. He left the city, saying (according to many ancient authorities) that he would not give the Athenians a chance to win a third time against philosophy. He took up his residence at his country house, at Chalcis, in Euobia, and there he died the following year, 322 B.C. His death was due to a disease from which he had long suffered. The story that his death was due to hemlock poisoning, as well as the opinions that according to him he was “carried into the sea because he could not explain the tides” are absolutely without historical foundation.

Very little is known about Aristotle’s personal appearance except from sources manifestly hostile. There is no reason, however, to doubt the faithful-ness of the statues and busts coming down to us, possibly from the first years of the Peripatetic School, which represent him as sharp and keen of countenance, and somewhat below the medium height. His character, as revealed by his writings, his will (which is undoubtedly genuine), fragments of his letters, and the allusions of his unprejudiced contemporaries, was that of a high-minded, meek, undaunted, devoted to his family and his friends, kind to his slaves, fair to his enemies and rivals, grateful towards his benefactors—in a word, an embodiment of those moral ideals which he outlined in his ethical treatises, and which we recognize to be far above the concept of moral excellence current in his day and among his people. When Platonism ceased to dominate the world of Christian speculation, and the works of the Stagirite began to be studied without fear and prejudice, the personality of Aristotle appeared to the Christian writers of the thirteenth cen-tury, as it had to the unprejudiced pagan writers of his time, majestic, unimpeachable by any great moral defects, “the master of those who know”.

PHILOSOPHY.—Aristotle defines philosophy in terms of essence, saying that philosophy is “the science of the universal essence of that which is actual”. Plato had defined it as the “science of the idea”, meaning by idea what we should call the unconditional basis of phenomena. Both pupil and master regard philo-sophy as concerned with the universal; the former, however, finds the universal in particular things, and calls it the essence of things, while the latter finds that the universal exists apart from particular things, and defines the universal as a pattern or idea.

For Aristotle, therefore, philosophic method implies the ascent from the study of particular phenomena to the knowledge of essences, while for Plato philosophic method means the descent from a knowledge of universal ideas to a contemplation of particular imitations of those ideas. In other words, Plato’s method is both inductive and deductive, while Aristotle’s is essentially inductive. In other words, for Plato’s tendency to idealize the world of reality in the light of intuition of a higher world, Aristotle substituted the scientific tendency to examine first the phenomena of the real world around us and thence to reason to a knowledge of the essences and laws which no intuition can reveal, but which science can prove to exist. In fact, Aristotle’s notion of philosophy corresponds, generally speaking, to what was later understood to be science, as distinct from philo-sophy. In fact, the larger sense of the word, he makes philosophy coextensive with science, or reasoning.

“All science (philosophy) is either practical, poetical, or theoretical.” By practical science he understands ethics and politics; by poetical, he means the study of poetry and the other fine arts; while by theoretical philosophy he means physics, mathematics, and metaphysics. To the latter he gives in the Nicomachean Ethics he defines as “the knowledge of immaterial being, and calls it “first philosophy”, “the theologic science”, or “of being in the highest degree of abstraction.” If logic, or, as Aristotle calls it, Analytic, be regarded as a study preliminary to philosophy, we have as divisions of Aristotelian philosophy (I) Logic; (II) Theoretical Philosophy, including Metaphysics, Physics, Mathematics; (III) Practical Philosophy; (IV) Poetical Philosophy.

I. LOGIC.—Aristotle’s logical treatises, constituting what was later called the “Organon”, contain the first systematic treatment of the laws of thought and reasoning. Aristotle’s conception of the logical form, in fact, the first attempt to reduce logic to a science, and consequently entitle their writer to be considered the founder of logic. They are six in number and deal respectively with: (1) Classification of Notions, (2) Judgments and Propositions, (3) the Syllogism, (4) Demonstration, (5) the Propositional Syllogism, and (6) Fallacies, as covering practically the entire field of logical doctrine. In the first treatise, the “Categories”, Aristotle gives a classification of all concepts, or notions, according to the classes into which the things represented by the concepts, or notions, naturally fall. These classes are sub-divided, and in his analysis of them, which is understood as meaning merely a mental or psychic condition, place, time, situation, and habit (in the sense of dress). They are carefully to be distin-guished from the Predicables, namely, genus, species (definition), difference, property, and accident. The latter are, indeed, classes into which ideas fall, but only in so far as one idea is predicated of another. That is to say, while the Categories are primarily a classification of modes of being, and secondarily of notions which express modes of being, the Predicables are primarily a classification of modes of predication, and secondarily of notions or ideas, according to the relationship regarding them of subject and predicate.

In the treatise styled “Analytica Priora”, Aristotle treats the rules of syllogistic reasoning, and lays down the principle of induction. In the “Analytica Posteriora” he takes up the study of demonstration and of indemonstrable first principles. Besides, he treats of knowledge in general, its origin, process, and development up to the stage of scientific knowledge. From certain well-known passages in this treatise, and from his other writings, we are enabled to sketch his theory of knowledge. As was remarked above, Aristotle approaches the problems of philosophy in a scientific frame of mind. He means to venture to be the true source of all our knowledge, intellectual, as well as sensible. “There is nothing in the intellect that was not first in the senses” is a fundamental principle with him, as it was later on with the Schoolmen. All knowledge begins with sense-experience, which, of course, has certain sensations, which are a changeable phenomenon. But though intellectual knowledge begins with sense-experience, it does not end there, for it has for its object the abstract, universal, immutable essence. This theory of cognition is, so far, summed up in the principles: Intellectual knowledge is essentially dependent on sense-knowledge, and intellectual knowledge is, nevertheless, superior to sense-knowledge. How, then, does the mind pass from the lower knowledge to the higher? How can the knowledge of the sense-perceived (αἰττεμένη) lead to a knowledge of the intelligible (γνωστόν)? Have some divine power revealed the intelligible in the sense-perceived. The mind does not, as Plato imagined, bring out of a previous existence the recollection of certain ideas, of which it is reminded at sight of the phenomenon. It brings to bear on the phenomenon a power peculiar to the mind, by virtue of which it renders intelligible those qualities which are imperceptible to the senses, because hidden under the non-essential qualities. The fact is, the individual substance (first substance) of our sense experience—this book, this house—has certain individuating qualities (its particular size, shape, colour, etc.) which distinguish it from others of its species, and which alone are perceived by the senses. But in the same substance, there is underlying the individuating qualities, its general nature (whereby it is a book, a table, a house); this is the second substance, the Essence, the Universal, the Intelligible. Now, the mind is endowed with a power capable of realizing the quality of the substance by intuition, or induction (Aristotle is not very clear as to the precise nature of this power) by which it removes, so to speak, the veil of particularizing qualities and thus brings out, or leaves revealed, the actually intelligible, or universal, element in things, which is the true and proper intellectual knowledge. In this theory, intellectual knowledge is developed from sense-knowledge in so far as that process may be called a development in which what was only potentially intelligible is rendered actually intelligible by the operation of the active intellect. The Universal was in re before the human mind began to work, but it was not known, or by it known, until the mind by the process of intuition grasped the essence of things. Universal qualities are found in all beings, with the exception of the Supreme Cause, in Whom there is no imperfection, and, therefore, no potentiality. He is all actuality, Actus Purus. All other beings are composed of actuality and potentiality, a dualism which is a general metaphysical formula for the dualism of matter and form, body and soul, substance and accident, the soul and its faculties, passive and active intellect. In the physical order, potentiality and actuality become Matter and Form. To these are to be added the Agent (Efficient Cause) and the End (Final Cause); but as the efficiency and finality are to be reduced, according to the empirical analysis, to Form, we have in the physical order two ultimate principles of Being, namely, Matter and Form. The four generic causes, Material, Formal, Efficient, and Final, are seen in the case, for instance, of a statue. The Material Cause, that out of which the statue is made, is the marble or bronze. The Formal Cause, that according to which the statue is made, is the idea existing in the first place as exemplar in the mind of the sculptor, and in the second place as intrinsic, determining cause, embodied in the matter. The Efficient Cause, or Agent, is the sculptor. The Final Cause is that for the sake of which (as, for instance, the price paid or the use for which) the statue is made. All these are true causes in so far as the effect depends on them either for its existence or for the mode of its existence. Pre-Aristotelian philosophy either failed to discriminate between the different kinds of causes, confounding the material cause with the efficient principle; or, recognized that there is a principle of finality, hesitated to apply that principle to the details of the cosmic process. Aristotle philosophizes, by discriminating between the different generic causes and retaining, at the same time, all the different kinds of causes which played a part in the previous philosophy, in true development in metaphysical speculation, and shows itself a true synthesis of Ionian, Eleatic, Sophistic, Pythagorean, and Platonic philosophy. A point which should be emphasized in the exposition of this portion of Aristotle's philosophy is the doctrine that all action of matter is the development of that potentiality which was somehow potentially contained in the material on which the agent works. This is true not only in the world of living things, in which, for example, the oak is potentially contained in the acorn, but also in the inanimate world in which heat, for instance, is potentially contained in water, and needs but the agency of fire to be brought out into actual-lity. Ex nihil nihil fit. This is the principle of development in Aristotle's philosophy which is so much opposed to the modern notion of evolution. Merely potentiality, without any actuality or realization—what is called materia prima—nowhere exists by itself, though it enters into the composition of all things except the Supreme Cause. It is at one pole of reality, He is at the other. Both are principia. Matter possesses what may be called the most attenuated reality, since it is purely indeterminateness; God possesses the highest and most complete reality, since He is in the highest grade of determinateness. To prove that there is a Supreme Cause is one of the tasks of metaphysics, the Theologic Science. And this Aristotle undertakes in the main portion of his work on Physics. In the "Physics" he adopts and improves on Socrates' teleological argument, the major premise of which is, "Whatever exists for a useful purpose must be the work of an intelligence." In the same treatise, he argues that, although motion is eternal, there cannot be an infinite series of movers and of things moved, that, therefore, there must be one, the first in the series, which is unmoved, ὁ πρῶτος κύριος διάτοτος—primum movens immobile. In the "Metaphysics" he takes the stand that the actual is of its nature antecedent to the potential, that, consequently, before all matter, and all composition of matter, there must be a Being Who is purely actual, and Whose life is self-contemplative thought (ειδης νοημος). The Supreme Being imparted movement to the universe by moving the First Heaven; the movement, however, emanated from the First Cause as desirable; in other words, the First Heaven, attracted by the desirability of the Supreme Being "as the soul is attracted by beauty," was set in motion, and imparted its motion to the lower spheres and thus, ultimately, to our terrestrial world. According to this theory, God never leaves the eternal repose in which His blessedness consists. Will and intellect are incompatible with the eternal unchangeableness of His being. Since matter, motion, and time are eternal, the world is eternal. Yet, it is caused. The manner in which the world originated is not defined in Aristotle's philosophy. It seems hazardous to say that he taught the doctrine of creation of the world by anything. This much, however, he said: He lays down principles which, if carried to their logical conclusion, would lead to the doctrine that the world was made out of nothing.

(2) Physics—Physics has for its object the study of a "being intrinsically endowed with motion," in other words, the study of nature. For nature differs from art in this: that nature is essentially self-determinant from within, while art remains exterior to the products of art. In its self-determination, that is to say in its processes, nature follows an intelligent and intelligible form, "Nature is always striving for the best." Movement is a mode of being, natural to the condition of a potential being actualizing itself. There are three kinds of movement, quantitative (increase and decrease), qualitative (alteration), and spatial (locomotion). Space is neither matter nor form, but the "first and unmoved limit of the containing, against the contained." Time is the measure of succession of the present moment, of the duration of the motions of motion, space, and time, Aristotle refutes the Eleatic doctrine that real motion, real space, and real succession imply contradictions. Following Empedocles Aristotle, also, teaches that all terrestrial bodies are composed of four elements or respective principles, namely, earth, and water. These elements determine not only the natural warmth or moisture of bodies, but also their natural motion, upward or downward, according to the preponderance of air or earth. Celestial bodies are not constituted by the four elements but by ether, the natural motion of which is circular. The sphere is the center, the modern notion a spherical, stationary, body, and around it revolve the spheres in which are fixed the planets. The First Heaven, which plays so important a part in Aristotle's general cosmogonic system, is the heaven of the fixed stars. It surrounds all the other spheres, and, being a being of intelligence, it moves toward the Deity, drawn, as it were, by His Desirability, and it thus imparted to all the other heavenly bodies the circular motion which is natural to them. These doctrines, as well as the general concept of nature as dominated by design or purpose, came to be taken for granted in every philosophy of nature, from Newton to Galileo, and the birth of modern physical science.

Psychology in Aristotle's philosophy is treated as a branch of physical science. It has for its object the study of the soul, that is to say, of the principle of life. Life is the power of self-motion, or of movement from within. Plants and animals, since they are endowed with the power of adaptation, have souls, and the human soul is peculiar only in this, that to the vegetative and sensitive faculties, which characterize plant-life and animal life respectively, it adds the rational faculty—the power of acquiring universal and intellectual knowledge. It must therefore be different from the soul of an animal. Aristotle says that the soul of the soul he does not mean merely the principle of thought; he means the principle of life. The soul he defines as the form, actualization, or realization, of the body, "the first entelechy of the organized body possessing the power of life." It is not a substance distinct from the body, as Plato taught, but a co-substantial principle with the body, both being united to form the composite substance, man. The faculties or powers of the soul are five-fold, nutritive, sensitive, appetitive, locomotive, and rational. Sensation is defined as the faculty by which we receive the forms of sensible things without the matter, as the wax receives the figure of the seal without the metal of which the seal is composed." It is a "movement of the soul," the "form without the matter" being the stimulus which calls forth that movement. The νυκτήρ as that form is called, while it is analogous to the "affixes" about which the "soul" is said, since it is said about the object, but a mode of motion, mediating between the object and the faculty. Aristotle distinguishes between the five external senses and the internal senses, of which the most important are the Central sense and the Imagination. Intellect (νοῦς) differs from the senses in that it is concerned with the abstract and universal, while they are concerned with the concrete and particular. The natural endowment of intellect is not actual knowledge, but merely the power of acquiring knowledge. The mind "is in the beginning without ideas, it is like a smooth tablet on which nothing is written." All knowledge, then, is actualized by the action of the intellect of elaboration or development of sense-knowledge. In this process the intellect exhibits a two-fold phase, an active and a passive. Hence it is customary to speak of the Active and Passive Intellect, though it is by no means clear what Aristotle meant by these terms. The most critical passages of the work "On the Soul," the mixture of Stoic pantheism, in the explanation of the earlier commentators, not to speak of the later addition of extraneous elements on the part of the Arabian, Scholastic, and modern transcendentalist expounders of the text, have not defined it precisely what meaning to attach to the terms Active and Passive Intellect. It is enough to remark here that (1) according to the Scholastics, Aristotle understood both Active and Passive Intellect to be parts, or phases, of the individual mind; (2) according to the Arabsians and some earlier commentators, the first of these, perhaps, being Aristotle, he understood the Active Intellect to be a divine something, or at least something transcending the individual mind; (3) according to some interpreters, the Passive Intellect is not properly an intellectual faculty at all, but merely the aggregate of sensations out of which ideas are made, as the statue is made out of marble. Suffice it to say that the Active Intellect transcends matter and material conditions, Aristotle argues that it is immaterial and immortal. The will, or faculty of choice, is free, as is proved by the recognized voluntariness of virtue, and the existence of reward and punishment.

(3) Mathematics was recognized by Aristotle as a division of philosophy, co-ordinate with physics and metaphysics, and is defined as the science of immovable being. That is to say, it treats of quantitative being and does not, like physics, confine its attention to the sensible.

III. PRACTICAL PHILOSOPHY.—This includes ethics and politics. The starting-point of ethical inquiry is the question: In what does happiness consist? Aristotle answers that man's happiness is determined by the end or purpose of his existence, or in other words, that his happiness consists in the "good proper to him." Aristotle says: And for this reason his happiness, therefore, must consist in that of which he is capable, or, as is more accurately expressed, that is, in living a life of virtue. Virtue is the perfection of reason, and is naturally two-fold, according as we consider reason in relation to the lower powers (moral virtue) or in relation to itself (intellectual, or theoretical, virtue). Moral virtue is defined "a certain habit of the faculty of choice, consisting in a mean suitable to our nature, and fixed by reason, in the manner in which prudent men would fix it." It is of the nature of moral virtues, therefore, to avoid all excess as well as defect; rashness, for example, is as much opposed to the virtue of modesty as shamelessness is to the intellectual virtues (understanding, science, wisdom, art, and practical wisdom) are perfections of reason itself, without relation to the lower faculties. It is a peculiarity of Aristotle's ethical system that he places the intellectual virtues above the moral, the theoretical above the practical, the active above the contemplative, the active above the ethical. An important constituent of happiness, according to Aristotle, is friendship, the bond between the individual and the social aggregation, between man and the State. Man is essentially, or by nature, a "social animal," that is to say, he cannot attain complete happiness except in social and political dependence on his fellow-man. This is the starting-point of political science. That the State is not absolute, as Plato taught, that there is no ideal State, but that our knowledge of political organization is to be gained by studying and comparing different constitutions of States, that the ideal is the political system that best suits the character of the people—these are some of the most characteristic of Aristotle's political doctrines.

IV. POETICAL PHILOSOPHY.—Under this head came Aristotle's theory of art and his analysis of the beautiful. As Platonists, while defining beauty, as "the imitation of nature," he does not mean that the plastic arts and poetry should merely copy nature's productions; his meaning is that nature embodies the idea so also does art, but in a higher and more perfect form. Hence his famous saying that poetry is "the highest of the intellectual "poetic" arts". Hence his equally famous doctrine that the aim of art is the calming, purifying (εὐθυγράφης) and ennobling of the affections. For this reason, he prefers music to the plastic arts because it possesses a higher ethical value. Aristotle's conception of beauty is vague and undefined. At one time he emphasizes order, at another time merely order and grandeur, as constituents of the beautiful. These latter qualities he finds especially in moral beauty. It is impossible here to give an estimate of Aristotle's philosophy as a whole, or to trace its influence on subsequent philosophical thought. It is necessary to say that in a science of knowledge, it is scientific rather than metaphysical; its starting-point is observation rather than intuition; and its aim, to find the ultimate cause of things rather than to determine the value (ethical or aesthetic) of things. Its influence extended, and still extends, beyond the realms of science and philosophy. Our thoughts, even on subjects far from science and philosophy, fall naturally into the Categories and formulas of Aristotelianism, and often find expression in terms which Aristotle invented, so that the "half-understood words of Aristotle have become laws of thought to other ages."
translated several of Aristotle's logical treatises into Latin. These translations and Porphyry's "Introduction" were the only Aristotelian works known to the scholars of the Scholastic age, that is to say, to the Christian philosophers of Western Europe from the ninth to the twelfth century. In the twelfth century the Arabian tradition and the Byzantine tradition met in Paris, the metaphysical, physical, and ethical works of Aristotle were translated partly from the Arabian and partly from the Greek text, and, after a period of suspicion and hesitancy on the part of the Church, Aristotle's philosophy was adopted as the basis of a rational exposition of Christian dogma. The suspicion and hesitation were due to the fact that, in the Arabic text and its commentaries, the teaching of Aristotle had become perverted in the direction of materialism and pantheism. After more than two centuries of almost universally unquestioned triumph, Aristotle once more was made the subject of dispute in the Christian schools of the Renaissance period, the reason being that the Humanists, like the Arabians, emphasized those elements of Aristotle's teaching that first caught the eye of St. Thomas with Christian doctrine. With the advent of Descartes, and the shifting of the centre of philosophical inquiry from the external world to the internal from nature to mind, Aristotelianism, as an actual system, began to be more and more identified with traditional scholasticism, and was not studied apart from scholasticism except for its historic interest.

WRITINGS.—It is customary to distinguish, on the authority of Gellius, two classes of Aristotelian writings: the exoteric, which were intended for the general public, and the aecrotic, which were intended merely for the limited circle of those who were well versed in the phraseology and modes of thought of the School. To the former class belonged the "Dialogues", of which the best known were the "Eudemus", three books on "Philosophy", four books "On Justice", also the treatises (not in dialogue form) "On the Good", and "On Ideas", all of which are unfortunately lost. Under this head mention should be made also of the "Poems", "Letters", "Orationes", "Apology", etc., which were at one time ascribed to Aristotle, though there can be little doubt of their spuriousness. To the class of aecrotic writings belong all the extant works and also the lost treatises (containing an anatomical description of the head, the anatomy, and the polities (a collection of the different political constitutions of the Greek States; a portion, giving the Constitution of Athens, was discovered in an Egyptian papyrus and published in 1891). The extant works may be arranged in the following classes, with the Latin titles by which they are generally cited:

Logical Treatises: These were known to the Byzantine writers as the "Organon", including (1) "Categories"; (2) "De Interpretatione"; (3) "Analytica Prioria"; (4) "Analytica Posterioria"; (5) "Topica"; (6) "Rhetorica"

Metaphysical Treatises: The work commonly cited as "Metaphysics" or "Metaphysics" was (or, at least, a portion of it was) entitled by Aristotle "First Philosophy" (πρώτη φιλοσοφία). The title τοῦ πρώτου was first given it by Andronicus of Rhodes, in whose collection, or edition, of Aristotle's works it first appeared. Other physical treatises led to:

Physical Treatises: (1) "Physica", or "Phusis Auscultatio", commonly called Physics; (2) "De Celo"; (3) "Meteorologica"

Biological and Zoological Treatises: (1) "Historie Animalium"; (2) "De Generatione et Corruptione"; (3) "De Generatione Animalium"; (4) "De Partibus Animalium"

Psychological and Anthropological Treatises: (1) "De Anima"; (2) "De Sensu et Sensibili"; (3) "De Memoriam et Reminiscientia"; (4) "De Vita et Morte"; (5) "De Longitudine et Brevitate vite".

Ethical and Political Treatises: (1) "Ethica Nicomachea"; (2) "Politics". The "Eudemonics Ethic" and the "Magna moralia" are not of directly Aristotelian authorship.

Poetical and Rhetorical Treatises: (1) "De Poetica"; (2) "De Rhetorica"; both of these are genuine only in parts.

Of the extant works some were written in their present form and were intended for finished scientific expositions. Others, though written by Aristotle, were intended merely for lecture notes, to be filled out in oral teaching. Others, finally, are nothing but the notes jotted down by his pupils, and were never retouched by the master. This consideration, it is often said, makes the student of Aristotle's work attach very different values to different parts of the text; no one, for example, would think of attaching to a citation from the First Book of the "Metaphysics" the same value as to a quotation from the Second Book. According to a well-known tradition and repeated by Plutarch and Suidas, Aristotle's library, including the manuscripts of his own works, was willed by him to Theophrastus, his successor as head of the Peripatetic School. By Theophrastus it was bequeathed to his heir, Neleus of Scepsis. After Neleus's death the manuscripts were hidden in a cellar or pit in order to avoid confiscation at the hands of the collectors, and there they remained for almost two centuries, until in Sulla's time they were discovered and brought to Rome. At Rome they were copied by a grammarian named Tyrannion and edited (about 70 B.C.) by Andronicus of Rhodes. The substance of this story may be regarded as true: the inference, however, that during all that time there was no copy of Aristotle's writings available, is not warranted by the facts. It is not implied in Strabo's narrative, nor is it in itself probable. One or two books may have been lost to the School until Andronicus's edition appeared; but the same cannot be true of the whole. Corpus Aristotelicum. Andronicus's edition remained in use in the Peripatetic School during the first few centuries of our era. For the various translations of the text into Syriac, Arabic, Latin, etc., see preceding.

A standard edition of Aristotle's works is that of BNEKER (5 vols., Berlin Academy, 1821-70); FIRMIN-Didot ed. (5 vols., Paris, 1848-69) gives the Greek text and Latin translation in parallel columns. The best edition of the Latin commentary on Aristotle is M'CRON, Arist. opera omnia (laetus) (1674). WILLIAM TURNER.

Arius, an heresiarch, b. about A.D. 250; d. 336. He is said to have been a Libyan by birth. His father's name is given with that of his son. In 366, Arius, who had learnt his religious views from Lucian, the presbyter of Antioch, and afterwards the martyr, took sides with Meletius, an Egyptian schismatic, against Peter, Bishop of Alexandria. But a reconciliation followed, and Peter ordained Arius deacon. On a first dispute by the presbytery, Arius, who was a restless churchman, who, however, gained the friendship of Archilles, Peter's successor, was made presbyter by him in 315, and had the charge of a well-known district in Alexandria called Bucephalus. This entitled Arius to expound the Scriptures officially, and he exercised much influence. He quelled the quarrel with Bishop Alexander broke out over the fundamental issue of our Lord's divine Sonship and substance. (See Ariasim.) While many Syrian prelates followed the innovator, he was condemned at Alexandria in 321 by his diocesan in a synod of nearly one hundred Egyptian and Libyan bishops. Deprived and excommunicated, the heresiarch fled to Palestine. He addressed a thoroughly unsound statement of principles to Eusebius of Nicomedia, who yet became his lifelong champion and who had written in a letter to Constantine by his worldly accomplishments. In his house the proscribed man, always a ready writer, composed in verse and prose a defence of his position which he termed "Thalia". A few fragments of it survive. He is also said to have published songs for sailors, millers, and travellers. This side of his nature was illustrated. Tall above the common, thin, ascetical, and severe, he has been depicted in lively colours by Epiphanius (Heresies, 69, 3); but his moral character was never impeached except doubtfully of ambition by Theodoret. He must have been of great age when, after fruitless negotiations and a visit to Egypt, he appeared in 323 at Nicæa, where the confession of faith which he presented was torn in pieces. With his writings and followers he underwent the anathemas subscribed by more than 300 bishops. He was banished into Illyricum. Two prelates shared his fate, Theonas of Marmarica and Secundus of Ptolemiæa. At Alexandria the old Meletian friends, created troubles in Alexandria. Eusebius persuaded Constantine to recall the exile by indulgent letters in 328; and the emperor not only permitted his return to Alexandria in 331, but ordered Athanasius to reconcile him with the Church. On the saint's return many more troubles ensued. The packed and partisan Synod of Tyre deposed Athanasius on a series of futile charges in 335. Catholics were now persecuted; Arius had an interview with Constantine and submitted a creed which the emperor judged to be orthodox. By imperial rescript Arius required Alexandria of Constantine's people to give him Communion; but the stroke of Providence defeated an attempt which Catholics looked upon as a sacrilege. The heresiarch died suddenly, and was buried by his own people. He had winning manners, an evasive style, and a disputatious temper. But in the controversy which is called after him the period 324-325, was the beginning in the church, he did not represent the tradition of Alexandria but the topical subtleties of Antioch. Hence, his disappearance from the scene neither stayed the combatants nor ended the quarrel which he had rashly provoked. A party-theologian, he exhibited no features of genius, and he was the product, not the founder, of a school.

Arizona, said to have been, probably in the original form of the word, Arizone, and in this form a Pima (Indian) word of which the meaning is unknown. With perhaps less probability there has been assigned to the word a Spanish origin. The motto of Arizona is Dixit Deus. It is one of the continental territories of the United States of America, bounded on the north by the State of Utah, on the south by the Republic of Mexico, on the east by the Territory of New Mexico, and on the west by the States of California and Nevada, between latitude 31° and 37°, and longitude 109° and 117°.

History.—The region embraced in the Territory was ceded to the United States by Mexico, a portion in 1848, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and the remainder in 1854, by the Gadsden treaty. Until 1863, this region was part of the Territory of New Mexico, and at the time of its acquisition by the United States, Iowans were almost the only inhabitants of this country, reputed to be rich in precious metals. Among those who flocked to the new domain were fugitives from justice, persons expelled by the Vigilance Committee of San Francisco, and Mexicans of a degraded class. The history of the early years following the cession is a sad record of violence and general lawlessness among the white inhabitants, and of deplorable Indian troubles. "Murder and other crimes were committed with impunity", is the statement of President Buchanan to Congress in 1858, when repeating his recommendation of 1857 that a territorial government be established, a statement and recommendation which he reiterated in 1859. Examining the causes of the Indian troubles, the traveller, Raphael Pumpey, contrasts the selfish aims of the frontiersmen with the missionary zeal of the Jesuits who had formerly laboured in Spanish America, and their success in elevating the condition of the Indians, a success whose limit "was always determined by the capricity of the home government, and of the mining population". Quite contrary to the fact, a report prevailed about the time of the cession, that the Jesuits themselves had worked mines in the region during the former years. Although evil conditions continued, the Territory of Arizona was not established by law until 1863. In 1864 the new Territory was invaded by the forces of the Southern Confederacy which were defeated by volunteer troops of California. Internal disorders did not cease on the organization of a territorial government. In 1872 the Territory was much harassed by Indians, and in 1873 its Governor declared that "all the Arizonians felt discouraged". Even in 1882, President Arthur conveyed to Congress the report of the Governor of Arizona that violence and anarchical prevailing. This condition was at that time largely attributed to "Cow-boys", and Indian disturbances were prevalent for some years thereafter.

Population, Climate, Resources, etc.—The Territory's seat of government, temporarily established in 1864 at Prescott, was, in 1867, fixed at Tucson, and, in 1877, transferred to Prescott again. Phoenix is the present capital. The twelfth United States census, besides 24,644 Indians, reports a population, in 1900, of 122,931. By the census of 1880 the population of Arizona, then a county of New Mexico, appears to have been only 6,482. Of the population in 1900, there were 98,698 natives and 24,235 foreigners. Of negro descent there were 1,194. Including in the list those who could only read, with those who could neither read nor write, 25.4 per cent of the males of voting age were illiterate. Of males 15 years of age and over, 49.5 per cent were single, 43.6 per cent married, and .7 per cent divorced. Of females 15 years of age and over, 41 per cent were single, 64.8 per cent married and 1 per cent divorced. According to the report of the chief of the Weather Bureau, the highest temperature observed at any weather station in Arizona during the year 1903 was 120°, the lowest 18°. Two stations report each of these extremes. The smallest rain-fall reported for the same year from any station is 0.80 of an inch, the greatest 25.05 inches. In October, 1903, a trace of snow is reported at one station; there is no report of snow in November at any station; and for the following six months, to May, 1904, inclusive, the greatest fall reported is 4.1 inches, two stations reporting only a slight fall of snow. Agriculture is greatly dependent upon irrigation. Limited by supply of water for irrigation, the area of farming land is probably 2,000,000 acres out of 5,000,000 acres. About 40,000,000 acres, or more than one-half the area of the Territory, are available for grazing lands of superior quality. Mines of gold, of silver, of copper, and of coal are to be found in the Territory. Of manufacturing establishments there were 169 in the year 1905, with a capital of $14,392,654. The value of products was $29,935,192. The value of the products of smelting and refining copper comprises 81.1 per cent of the total of all industries, and these, with cars and general shop construction and repairs by steam railroad companies, flour and grist-mill products, lumber and timber products, are the four largest industries. There are 1,556 miles of railroads. (See Council Memorial No. 1, Appendix B, in The Revised Statutes of Arizona Territory, 1901, p. 1511.) The assessed valuation of taxable property for the year 1900 is stated to have been $33,782,465.99.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT.—In the same manner as in the Territories of the United States, the governor of Arizona is appointed by the President. A legislative assembly elected by counties meets every two years. There is no female suffrage except at elections of school trustees. A Bill of Rights provides that the civil and political rights of no person are to be encroached upon, and that no one shall be incompetent to testify as a witness on account of religious opinions or for want of religious belief. An elaborate system of public-school education is established by law. There are a university and two normal schools and more than 15,000 children are educated at the public schools. (See above cited Memorial.) Among the “powers and duties” of boards of trustees of school districts, a statute mentions the excluding “from school and school libraries of all books, publications or papers of a sectarian or denominational character.” No books, tracts or papers of a sectarian character are to be used in or introduced into any public school, nor “any sectarian doctrine taught therein.” No school funds are to be received by “any school whatever under the control of any religious denomination.” A teacher is subject to revocation of certificate or diploma “who shall use any sectarian or denominational books or teach any sectarian doctrine, or conduct any religious exercises in his school.”

CHURCH IN ARIZONA.—In 1850, New Mexico, having been ceded to the United States, was made a separate and independent territory, and Rev. John B. Lamy, formerly a priest of the Diocese of Cincinnati. On his arrival, as he stated to the Propaganda in 1865 when referring to conditions happily passed away, he found in the vast vicariate twenty priests, neglectful and extortionate, corrupt, and no one to assist him. New Mexico was erected into the Diocese of Santa Fé, and Dr. Lamy became its first bishop. The territory added to the national domain by the Gadsden treaty, in 1854, was placed under his jurisdiction, and he, in 1859, sent Very Rev. J. P. Machebeuf to Tucson. Until a rude chapel could be erected Mass was said for the Indians of the presidio who had undertaken the mission, and one of these priests “revived Catholicity,” to quote the words of Dr. John Gilmary Shea, “at the splendid old church of San Xavier del Bac” (the corner-stone of which seems to have been laid in 1783), “long a solitary monument in a wilderness.” The ancient inhabitants having been driven off by hostile Indians, during the Civil War ecclesiastical affairs continued peaceful, and in 1865 the bishop reported to the Propaganda an estimated Catholic population of five thousand in Arizona, and a great improvement in ecclesiastical matters. In 1895, Rev. J. B. Salpointe was appointed Vicar Apostolic and consecrated Bishop of Doryla, 20 June, 1896. The vicariate Apostolic was erected into the Diocese of Tucson in 1897, the Rev. P. Bourgade, afterwards Archbishop of Santa Fé, becoming its first bishop. The diocese comprises the whole Territory, 112,920 square miles, with a portion, amounting to 18,292 square miles, of New Mexico. In the diocese there are 25 secular priests, 11 regular priests, 21 churches, with resident priests, 31 missions with churches, and 95 stations, 6 parochial and 4 Indian schools, the total of young people educated in Catholic institutions in the State is 1,556. The Catholic population is about 40,000. A law of the Territory permits “any person being the archbishop, bishop, president, trustee in trust, president of state, overseer, presiding elder, rabbi, or clergyman of any church or religious society” to become a corporation "with continual and perpetual succession." CHARLES W. SLOANE.

ARk is a generic term which, in the Bible, is applied to two different objects: the one, the refuge in which, according to the Biblical narration, Noe was saved from destruction in the Deluge; the other, a piece of the tabernacle and temple furniture.

Noe's Ark.—The Hebrew name to designate Noe's Ark, the one which occurs again in the history of Moses' childhood, suggests the idea of a box of large proportions, though the author of Wisdom terms it a vessel (Wisd., xiv, 6). The same conclusion is reached from the dimensions attributed to it by the Bible narrative: three hundred cubits in length, fifty in breadth, and thirty in height. The form, however, is likely found to the right or left of the movement for navigation, but, as has been proven by the experiments of Peter Jansen and M. Vogt, it made the Ark a very suitable device for shipping heavy cargoes and floating upon the waves without rolling or pitching. The Ark was constructed of gopher wood, or in these days coated with pitch, or bitumen, to render it water-tight. The interior contained a certain number of rooms distributed among three stories. The text mentions only one window, and this measuring a cubit in height, but there existed possibly some others to give to the inmates of the Ark. A ladder had also been on the side of the Ark; God shut it from the outside when Noe and his family had gone in. Apart from Noe’s family, the Ark was intended to receive and keep animals that were to fill the earth again (Gen., vi, 19, 20; vii, 2, 3) and all the food which was necessary for them. After the Flood, the Ark rested upon the mountains of Armenia (Gen., viii, 4——according to Vulgate and Douay, the mountain of Ararat; Authorized Version). Tradition is divided as to the exact place where the Ark rested. Josephus (Ant., i, iii, 6), Berosus (Eus., Prep. Ev., IX, ii, P. G., XXI, 697), Onkelos, Pseudo-Jonathan, St. Ephrem, locate it in Kurdistan. Berosus relates that a part of Xisuthrus’s ship still remained there, and that pilgrims used to go and make charms of it against witchcraft. Jewish and Armenian tradition admitted Mount Ararat as the resting place of the Ark. In the first century A.C., the Armenians affirmed that remnants of it could yet be seen. The first Christians of Apamea, in Phrygia, erected in this place a convent called the Monastery of the Ark, where a feast was yearly celebrated to commemorate Noe’s coming out of the Ark after the Flood. Suffice it to remark, then, the text of Genesis (viii, 4) mentioning Mount Ararat is somewhat lacking in clearness, and that nothing is said in the Scripture concerning the name of the mountain. Many difficulties have been raised, especially in our epoch, against the pages of Holy Writ in which the history of the Flood and of the Ark is narrated. This is not the place to dwell upon these difficulties, however considerable some may appear. They all converge towards the question whether these pages should be considered as strictly historical throughout, or only in their outward form. The opinion that these chapters are mere legendary tales, Eastern folk-lore, is held by some non-Catholic scholars; according to others, with whom several Catholics side, they preserve, under the embroidery of poetical parallelism, the memory of a fact of a far-off age, as by a very old tradition. This view, were it supported by good arguments, could be readily accepted by a Catholic; it has, over the age-long opinion that every detail of the narration should be literally interpreted and trusted in by the historian, the advantage of suppressing as meaningless some difficulties once deemed unanswerable.

ARK OF THE COVENANT.—The Hebrew word ‘arkh, by which the Ark of the Covenant is expressed, does not call to the mind, as that used for Noe’s Ark, a large construction, but rather a chest. This word is generally determined in the sacred text; so we find in the Ark of the Lord (Num., x, 33; Deut., x, 8, etc.), the Ark of the Testament (Ex., xxx, 26), the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord (Num., x, 33; Deut., x, 8, etc.), the Ark of the Covenant (Jos., iii, 6, etc.), the Ark of God (I Kings, iii, 5, etc.), the Ark of the Lord (I Kings, iv, 6, etc.). Of these, the expression Ark of the Covenant has become most familiar in English.

(1) Description and use.—The Ark of the Covenant was a kind of chest, measuring two cubits and a half in length, a cubit and a half in breadth, and a cubit and a half in height. Made of settim wood (an incorruptible acacia), it was overlaid within and without with the purest gold, and a golden crown or rim ran around it. At the four corners, very likely towards the upper part, four golden rings had been cast; through them passed two bars of settim wood overlaid with gold, to carry the Ark. These two bars were to remain always in the rings, even when the Ark was taken out of the tabernacle, for the Ark was not to be carried with the ring handles, only with the bars. The cover of the Ark, termed the “propitiatory” (the corresponding Hebrew word means both “cover” and “that which makes propitiuous”), was likewise of the purest gold. Upon it had been placed two cherubim of beaten gold, looking towards each other, and spreading their wings so that both sides of the propitiatory were covered. What exactly these cherubim were, is impossible to determine; however, from the analogy with Egyptian religious art, it may well be supposed that they were images, kneeling or standing, of winged persons. It is worth noticing that this is the only exception to the law forbidding the Israelites to make graven images. It is an exception so much the more harmless to the faith of the Israelites in a spiritual God because the Ark was regularly to be kept behind the veil of the sanctuary. The form of the Ark of the Covenant was probably inspired by some article of the furniture of the Egyptian temples. But it should not be represented as one of those sacred cups or chalices on which the gods of Egypt were solemnly carried in procession; it had, very likely, been framed after the pattern of the naga of gold, silver, or precious wood, containing the images of the gods and the sacred emblems. According to some modern historians of Israel, the Ark, in every way analogous to the bors used upon the banks of the Nile, contained the sacred objects worshipped by the Hebrews, perhaps some sacred stone, meteoric or otherwise. Such a statement proceeds from the opinion that the Israelites during their early national life were given not only to idolatry, but to eating out of its growth, and used to it. After the Ark had been adored Yahweh in inanimate things, then they worshipped him in the bull, as in Dan and Bethel, and that only about the seventh century did they rise to the conception of an invisible and spiritual God. But this description of Israel’s religious history does not tally with the most certain conclusions derived from the texts. The idolatry of the Hebrews is not proven any more than their polytheism; hence the Ark, far from being viewed as in the opinion above referred to, should rather be regarded as a token of the choice that Yahweh had made of Israel for his people, and a visible sign of his invisible presence in the midst of his beloved people. When the Ark was first destined to contain the testimony, that is to say the tables of the Law (Ex., xi, 18; Deut., x, 5). Later, Moses was commanded to put into the tabernacle, near the Ark, a golden vessel holding a gomor of manna (Ex., xvi, 34), and the rod of Aaron which had blossomed (Num., xxi, 10). According to the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix, 4), and the Jewish traditions, they had been put into the Ark itself. Some commentators, with Calmet, hold that the book of the Law written by Moses had likewise been enclosed in the Ark; but the text says only that the book in question was put into “in the side of the Ark” (Deut., xxi, 22)—moreover, what should be understood by this book, whether it was the whole Pentateuch, or Deuteronomy, or part of it, is not clear, though the context seems to favour the latter interpretations. However, this may be, we learn from III Kings, vii, 9, that when the Ark was placed in Solomon’s temple, it contained only the tables of the Law. The holiest part of the Ark seems to have been the oracle, that is to say the place whence Yahweh made his prescriptions to Israel. “Thence”, the Lord had said to Moses, “will I give orders, and will speak to thee over the propitiatory, and from the midst of the two cherubim, which shall be upon the Ark of the testimony, all things which I will command the children of Israel by thee” (Ex., xxv, 22). And indeed we read in Num., vii, 89, that when Moses “entered into the tabernacle of the covenant, to consult the oracle, he heard the voice of one speaking from the propitiatory, and from the midst of the two cherubims”. Yahweh used to speak to his servant in a cloud over the oracle (Lev., xvi, 2). This was, very likely, also the way in which he communicated with Josue after the death of the first leader of Israel (cf. Jos., vi, 6–11). The oracle was, so to say, the very heart of the sanctuary, the dwelling-place of God; hence we read in scores of passages of the Old Testament that Yahweh "sitteth on [or rather, by] the cherubim." In the last years of the Babylonian Exile, the devotion of reverence to God's holiness, avoiding pronouncing any of the names expressing the Divinity in the Hebrew language, such as El, Elohim, etc., and still less Yahweh, the ineffable name, i.e., a name unutterable to any human tongue; instead of these, they used metaphors or expressions having reference to the Divine attributes. Among the latter, the word shekinah became very popular; it meant the Divine Presence (from shāḵān, to dwell), hence the Divine Glory, and had been suggested by the belief in God's presence in a cloud over the propitiatory. Not only did the Ark signify God's presence in the midst of his people, but it also betokened the Divine help and assistance, especially during the warlike undertakings of Israel; no greater evil accordingly could befal the nation than the capture of the Ark by the enemies, as, we shall see, happened towards the close of the period of the Judges and perhaps also at the taking of Jerusalem by the Baby- leonians, in 587 B.C.

(2) History.—According to the sacred narrative recorded in Exodus, xxv, 10-22, God Himself had given the description of the Ark of the Covenant, as well as that of the tabernacle and all its appurtenances. God's command was fulfilled to the letter by Bezaleel, under the direct guidance of the spirit of the Divine. He was "devised and to work in gold, and silver, and brass, and in engraving stones and in carpenters' work" (Ex., xxxvii, 1-9). Before the end of the first year after the Exodus, the whole work was completed, so that the first month of the second year, the first day of the month, everything belonging to the Divine service could be set up in order. Moses then "put the testimony in the ark, thrusting bars underneath, and the oracle above"; he "brought the ark into the tabernacle" and "drew the veil before it to fulfil the commandment of the Lord" (Ex., xxv, 18). On that day God showed His pleasure by filling the tabernacle of the testimony with His Glory, and covering it with the cloud that henceforward would be to His people a guiding sign in their journeys. All the Levites were not entitled to the guardianship of the sanctuary and of the Ark; but this office was entrusted to the kindred of Caath (Num., xxxviii, 1). Whenever the camp was to set forward, Aaron and his sons went into the tabernacle of the covenant and the Holy of Holies, took down the veil that hung before the door, wrapped up the Ark of the Testimony in it, covered it again with dung on skins, and put in the bars (Num., iv, 5, 6). When the people pitched their tents to sojourn for some time in a place, everything was set again in its customary order. During the journeys the Ark went before the people; and when it was lifted up they said: "Arise, O Lord, and let Thy enemies be scattered, and let them that hate Thee flee from before Thy face!" And when it was set down, they said: "Return, O Lord, to the multitude of the host of Israel!" (Num., x, 33-36). Thus did the Ark preside over all the journeys and stations of Israel during all their wandering life in the wilderness.

As has been said above, the sacred chest was the visible sign of God's presence and protection. This appeared in the most striking manner in different circumstances. When the spies who had been sent to view the Promised Land returned and gave their report, murmurs arose in the camp, which neither threatenings nor even the death of the authors of the scurrilous reports could avert. Again the Ark of the Israelites went up to the mountain to meet the Amalecites and Chanaanites; "but the ark of the testament of the Lord and Moses departed not from the camp." And the enemies came down, smote, and slew the presumptuous Hebrews whom God did not help. The next two manifestations of Yahweh's power were due to Moses' prayer — and to Josue's leadership. When the people were about to cross the Jordan, "the priests that carried the ark of the covenant went on before them; and as soon as they came into the Jordan, and their feet were dipped in part of the water, the waters that came down from above stood in one place, and swelling up became a great distance from the channel that was dried up" (Jos., iii, 14-17). A few days later, Israel was besieging Jericho. At God's command, the Ark was carried in procession around the city for seven days, until the walls crumbled at the sound of the trumpets and the shouts of the people, thus giving the assailing army a free opening into the place (Jos., vi, 6-21). Later again, after the taking and burning of Hai, we see the Ark occupy a most prominent place in the solemn assize of the nation held between Mount Garizim and Mount Hebal (Jos., viii, 33).

The Israelites having settled in the Promised Land, it became necessary to appoint a place where to erect the tabernacle and keep the Ark of the Covenant. Silo, in the territory of Ephraim, about the centre of the conquered country, was selected (Jos., xviii, 1). There, indeed, during the obscure period which preceded the establishment of the Kingdom of Israel, do we find the "house of the Lord" (Judges, xviii, 31; xx, 18), with its High-Priest, to whose care the Ark had been entrusted. Did the precious palladium of Israel remain permanently at Silo, or was it carried about, whenever the emergency required, as, for instance, during warlike expeditions?—This point can hardly be ascertained. Be it as it may, the narration which closes the Book of Judges supposes the presence of the Ark at Bethel. True, some commentators, following St. Jerome, translate here the word Bethel as though it were a common noun (house of God); but their opinion seems hardly reconcileable with the other passages where the same name is used, and, for this reason, the discussions concerning the name of the city of Bethel. This is no place to discuss at length the various explanations brought forward to meet the difficulty; suffice it to say that it does not entitle the reader to conclude, as many have done, that there probably existed several Arks throughout Israel. The remark above made, that the Ark was possibly carried hither and thither according as the circumstances required, is substantiated by what we read in the narrative of the events that brought about the death of Heli. The Philistines had waged war against Israel, whose army, at the first encounter, was defeated; their banners to the enemy were given, and the Ark captured, and borne to the city of the Philistines. Notwithstanding Yahweh's presence in the midst of their army, the Philistines were at last driven out, and the Ark brought back to Bethel (1 Sam., iv, 19-22). Thereupon the ancients of the people suggested that the Ark of the Covenant be fetched unto them, to save them from the hands of their enemies. So the Ark was brought from Silo, and such acclamations welcomed it into the camp of the Israelites, as to fill with fear the hearts of the Philistines. The presence of Yahweh's presence in the midst of their army was a certain victory, the Hebrew army engaged the Philistines on the second day, met an overthrow still more disastrous than the former; and, what made the catastrophe complete, the Ark of God fell into the hands of the Philistines.

Then, according to the Biblical narrative, began for the sacred chest a series of eventful peregrinations through the cities of southern Palestine, until it was brought to Shiloh, the national sanctuary, where it remained set up for many generations.
solemnly carried to Jerusalem. And never was it returned to its former place in Silo. In the opinion of the Philistines, the taking of the Ark meant a victory for the God of Israel. Consequently, they accordingly brought it to Azotus and set it as a trophy in the temple of Dagon. But the next morning they found Dagon fallen upon his face before the Ark; they raised him up and set him in his place again. The following morning Dagon again was lying on the ground, but much mutilated by a cruel disease (perhaps the bubonic plague) smote the Azotics, while a terrible invasion of mice afflicted the whole surrounding country. These scourges were soon attributed to the presence of the Ark within the walls of the city, and regarded as a direct judgment by Yahweh. Hence it was decided that the assembly of the rulers of the Philistines that the Ark should be removed from Azotus and brought to some other place. Carried successively to Gath and to Accaron, the Ark brought with it the same scourges which had occasioned its removal from Azotus.

Finally, after several months, on the suggestion of the priests and their diviners, the Philistines resolved to give up their dreadful trophy.

The Biblical narrative acquaints us with a special interest for us, by the insight we get therefrom into the religious spirit among these ancient peoples. Having made a new cart, they took two kine that had never been yoked to the cart, and they brought up their calves at home. And they laid the Ark of God upon the cart, together with a little box containing golden mice and the images of their boils. Then the kine, left to themselves, took their course straight in the direction of the territory of Israel. As soon as the Bethsharmites recognised the Ark upon the cart that was coming towards them, they went rejoicing to meet it. When the cart arrived in the field of a certain Joesue, it stood still there. And as there was a great stone in that place, they split up the wood of the cart and offered the kine a holocaust to Yahweh. With this sacrifice ended the exile of the Ark in the land of the Philistines. The people of Bethshames, however, did not long enjoy its presence among them. Some of them inconsiderately cast a glance upon the Ark, wherupon they were severely punished by God; seventy men (the text usually received says seventy men and fifty thousand of the community, but this is Bethshames only a small country place) were smitten, as a punishment for their boldness. Frightened by this mark of the Divine wrath, the Bethshamarites sent messengers to the inhabitants of Carithaiarim, to tell them how the Philistines had brought back the Ark, and invite them to convey it to their own town. So the men of Carithaiarim came and brought up the Ark and carried it into the house of Abinadab, whose son Eleazar they consecrated to its service (I Kings, vii, 1).

The actual Hebrew text, as well as the Vulgate and all translations dependent upon it, intimates that the Ark was with the army of Saul in the famous expedition against the Philistines, narrated in I Kings, xiv. This is a mistake probably due to some late scribe who, for theological reasons, substituted the "ark of God" for the "ephod". The Greek translation here gives the correct reading; nowhere else, indeed, in the history of Israel, do we hear of the Ark of the Covenant as an instrument of divination. It may consequently be safely affirmed that the Ark remained in Carithaiarim up to the time of David. It was natural that after this prince had taken Jerusalem and made it the capital of his kingdom, he should desire to consolidate it also as a sanctuary. For this end, he thought of bringing thither the Ark of the Covenant. In point of fact the Ark was undoubtedly in great veneration among the people; it was looked upon as the palladium with which heretofore Israel's life, both religious and political, had been associated. Hence, nothing could have more suitably brought about the realization of David's purpose than such a transfer of the Ark. We read in the historical accounts of this solemn event: the first is found in the Second Book of Kings (vi); in the other, of a much later date, the chronicler has cast together most of the former account with some elements reflecting ideas and institutions of his own time (Par., xiii). According to the narrative of II Kings, vi, which we shall now in part read in the words with great pomp to Baal-Juda, or Carithaiarim, to carry from there the Ark of God. It was laid upon a new cart, and taken out of the house of Abinadab. Oza and Ahio, the sons of Abinadab, guided the cart, the latter walking before it, the former at its side, while the king and the priests sang the psalms of praise and singing, and playing instruments, escorted the sacred chest.

This day, however, like that of the coming of the Ark to Bethshames, was to be saddened by death. At a certain point of the procession, the oxen slipped; Oza forthwith stretched out his hand to support the Ark and died on the spot. David, frightened by this accident, stopped the procession, and now unwilling to remove the Ark to Jerusalem, he had it carried into the house of a Gethite, named Obededom, which was probably in the neighbourhood of the city. The presence of the Ark was a source of blessings for the house to which it had been brought. Obededom wished to complete the work he had begun. Three months after the first transfer, accordingly, he came again with great solemnity and removed the Ark from the house of Obededom to the city, where it was set in its place in the midst of the tabernacle which David had pitched for it. Once more was the Ark brought out of Jerusalem, when David betook himself to flight before Absalom's rebellion. Whilst the King stood in the Cedron valley, the people were passing before him towards the way that leads to the wilderness. Among them came also Sadaq and Abiathar, bearing the Ark. Whom when David saw, he commanded to carry back the Ark into the city: "If I shall find grace in the sight of the Lord", said he, "he will bring me again, and will shew me both it and his tabernacle". In compliance with this order, Sadaq and Abiathar carried back the Ark of the Lord into Jerusalem (II Kings, xxvii).

The tabernacle which David had pitched to receive the Ark was not, however, to be its last dwelling place. The King indeed had thought of a temple more worthy of the glory of Yahweh. Although the building of this edifice was to be the work of his successor, David himself took heart to gather and prepare the materials for its erection. From the very beginning of Solomon's reign, this prince showed the greatest reverence to the Ark, especially when, after the mysterious dream in which God answered his request for wisdom by promising him wisdom, riches, and honour, he offered up burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the Ark of the Covenant of Yahweh (III Kings, iii, 15). When the temple and all its appurtenances were completed, Solomon, before the dedication, assembled the elders of Israel, that they might solemnly convey the Ark from the place where David had set it up to the Holy of Holies. Thence it was, most likely, now and then, taken out, either to accompany military expeditions, or to enhance the splendour of religious celebrations, perhaps also to comply with the ungodly commands of wicked kings. However this may be, the chronicler tells us that Josias commanded the Levites to remove it to its place in the temple, and forthwith to take it thence in the future (II Par., xxxv, 3). But the memory of its sacredness was soon to pass away. In one of his prophecies referring to the Messianic times, Jeremiah announced that it would be utterly forgotten: "They shall say no more: The ark of the covenant of Yahweh, neither shall it come upon the heart, neither shall they remember it, neither shall it be visited, neither shall that be done any more" (Jer., iii., 16).

As to what became of the Ark at the fall of Jerusalem, in 588 B.C., there exist several traditions, one of which has found admittance in the sacred books. In the letter of the Jews of Jerusalem to those who were in Egypt, the following details are given as copied from a writing of Jeremiah: "The prophet, being warned by God, commanded that the tabernacle and the ark should accompany him, till he came forth to the mountain where Moses went up and remained with God for forty days. And when he came thither he found a hollow cave and he carried in thither the tabernacle and the ark and the altar of incense, and so stopped the door. Then some of them that followed him came up to mark the place; but they could not find it. And when Jeremiah perceived it, he blamed them saying: the place shall be unknown, till God gather together the congregation of the people and receive them to mercy. And then the Lord will shew these things, and the majesty of the Lord shall appear, and there shall be a cloud as it was also shewed to Moses, and he showed it when Solomon prayed that the place might be sanctified for the great God" (II Kings, ii., 28).

According to many commentators, the letter from which the above-cited lines are supposed to have been copied cannot be regarded as possessing Divine authority; for, as a rule, a citation remains in the Bible what it was outside of the inspired writing; the impossibility of dating the original document makes it very difficult to pass a judgment on its historical reliability. At any rate the tradition which it embodies, going back at least as far as two centuries before the Christian era, cannot be discarded on mere a priori arguments. Side by side with this tradition, we find another mentioned in the Apocalypse of Esdras; according to this latter, the Ark of the Covenant was taken by the victorious army that razed Jerusalem after having taken it (IV Esdr., x, 22). This is certainly most possible, so much the more that we learn from IV Kings, xxv., that the Babylonian troops carried away from the temple the ark (Ex. xxi., 4) when they reoccupied it, and got they could lay their hands upon. At any rate, either of these traditions is certainly more reliable than that adopted by the redactors of the Talmud, who tell us that the Ark was hidden by King Josias in a most secret place prepared by Solomon in case the temple might be taken and destroyed. It was a common belief among the rabbis of old that it would be found at the coming of the Messiah. Be this as it may, this much is unquestionable: namely that the Ark is never mentioned among the appurtenances of the second temple. Had it been preserved there, it would most likely have been now and then alluded to, at least on such occasions as the consecration of the new temple, or the re-establishment of the worship, both after the exile and during the Machabean times. True, the chronicler, who lived in the post-exilic epoch, says of the Ark (II Par., v, 9) that "it has been there unto this day". But it is commonly admitted, on good grounds that the writer mentioned made use of, and wove together in his work, without as much as changing one single word of them, narratives belonging to former times. If, as serious commentators admit, the above-recorded passage be one of these "implicit citations"; it might be inferred thence that the chronicler probably did not know enough to assert the existence of the Ark in the second temple.

Catholic tradition, led by the Fathers of the Church, has considered the Ark of the Covenant as one of the purest and richest symbols of the realities of the New Law. It signifies, in the first place, the In excavate Word of God. "Christ himself", says St. Thomas Aquinas, "was signified by the Ark. For in the same manner as the Ark was made of setim wood, so also was the body of Christ composed of the most pure human substance. The Ark was entirely overlaid with gold, because Christ was filled with wisdom and charity, which gold symbolises. In the stone tables of the Law were likewise contained in the Ark, to mean that Jesus is the author of the Law". To these points touched by the Angel of the Schools, it might be added that the Ascension of Christ to heaven after His victory over death and sin is figured by the coming up of the Ark to Sion. St. Bonaventure has also seen in the Ark a mystical representation of the Holy Eucharist. In like manner the Ark might be very well regarded as a mystical figure of the Blessed Virgin, called by the Church the "Ark of the Covenant"—Federis Urq.

Arkansas, one of the United States of America, bounded on the north by the State of Missouri, on the south by the States of Louisiana and Texas, on the east by the States of Mississippi and Tennessee, and on the west by the State of Texas and by Indian Territory, between latitude 33° and 37° and longitude 90° and 95°, has an area of 53,535 square miles. The boundaries are set forth with considerable particularity in the State constitution, which may be compared the Act of Congress, 15 June, 1836, admitting Arkansas as a state.

The motto of the State is Regnans populi. The name was that of a tribe of Indians, formerly inhabitants of the region, a tribe also known as Quapaws or Osarks, and called also Al- kans by Illinois Indians and other Algonquins (Charlevoix). A resolution passed in 1881 by the Legislative Assembly of the State enters to confusion which had arisen "in the pronunciation of the name of our State" and resolves "that it should be pronounced in three syllables with the final ‘s’ silent, the ‘s’ in each syllable with the Italian sound, and the accent on the first and last syllables".

The region now included in Arkansas was a portion of the Louisiana purchase from France and ceded by the treaty of 1803. A census of the "province de la Louisiane", made in 1788, states the population of Arkansas to be 119. An Act of Congress, 26 March 1804, provided that so much of the ceded territory north of 39° of north latitude should be named the district of Louisiana and governed by the governor of the Indiana Territory. By Act of 3 March, 1805, the name was changed to "Territory of Louisiana" and a territorial government established. This name was changed to "Missouri" by Act of 4 June, 1812, and a temporary government established. By Act of 2 March, 1819, all of the territory south of a line beginning on the Mississippi River at 36° north latitude, running thence west to the river St. François, thence up the same to 36° 30' north latitude, and thence west along the territorial boundary line, was established as a new Territory to be known as "the Arkansas Territory".

Climate.—Concerning weather conditions, the report of the chief of the Weather Bureau states the highest temperature observed at any weather station in Arkansas during the year 1893 was 105°, observed at two stations, the lowest—12° also observed at two stations. The smallest rainfall reported for the year is 34.48 inches, the greatest 65 inches. So early as November, 1903, there were snowfalls at three of the stations, in December at all the stations except one, in January, 1904, at all the stations except three, in February, at all except four, no snow is reported in March, and in April a trace is reported at two stations. The greatest fall of the season was 11.5 inches, the least, 0.5 of an inch. The reports of temperature are from sixty-one stations, of rainfall from sixty-six stations, and on thirteen stations.

History.—The Territory was visited during 1819 by the distinguished botanist, Thomas Nuttall. Of the district watered by the "Arkansas" river which in a generally southeasterly course flows through Arkansas, he states that it is scarcely less fertile than Kentucky and favorable to productions more valuable and salable, while "the want of good roads is scarcely felt in a level country measured by rivers". And he remarks upon the "lucrative employment" to be found in "a country which produces cotton". Some of the settlers were of French Canadian origin, among them descendants probably of the traders whom the Sieur de Tonti, when, in 1685, he proceeded up the river to the village of the Arkansas. In the settlement on the banks of the "Arkansas" river "a few miles below the bayou which communicates with White river", Nuttall found the sum of general industry "insufficient" and the love of amusements "as in most of the French colonies... carried to extravagance". Indeed this traveller comments unfavourably upon "the generality of those who, till lately, inhabited the banks of the Arkansas". And "at the Cadron" he found that "every reasonable and rational amusement appeared... to be swallowed up in the draining given by the gleicha"r..." while at "the Pecanerie now the most considerable settlement in the territory except Arkansas", and settled by about sixty families, the more industrious and honest suffered from the dishonest practices of their indolent neighbours, "renegades from justice... fleed from honest society". In contrast to a portion of this indictment against early territorial conditions may be mentioned the prohibitory liquor laws of the modern State, and their rigorous enforcement (Digest of the Statutes, §§ 5093-5148; The United States in our own Time, 769; Arkansas a belt of the belt of the nation, 15 June 1836). The State long continued to be sparsely settled. Colonel R. B. Marcy, who seems to have visited some portions of Arkansas so late as 1854, refers in "Army Life" to the "sparsely scattered forest habitations" on the borders of Arkansas and Texas "far removed from towns and villages... visited by a stranger who tells us, "the ideas, habits and language of the population... are eminently peculiar and very different from those of any other people I have ever before met with in my travels". These borderers seem to have been generally illiterate. And Colonel Marcy describes also the interior settlements of Arkansas and those of Texas and southwestern Missouri as regions where "the traveller rarely sees a church or school-house" (Army Life, 386). While yet "ruddy and thinly settled" (Schoeler, Hist. of U. S. of Am., VI, 92), Arkansas by ordinance of its Convention on 6 May, 1861, joined its fortunes with the other States of the West of the Mississippi, forming the Southern Confederacy. As in Missouri so in Northern Arkansas, guerrilla warfare followed during more than a year. Afterwards warfare in Arkansas became of a more important character. In 1863 Arkansas Post was captured by the Federal forces; there was a sharp engagement at Arkadelphia, and engagements at Fayetteville and sixteen miles from Fort Smith. The Federal garrison of Helena and that of Pine Bluffs were unsuccessfully attacked by the Confederate forces during this year. At the battle of Chickamauga, the First Arkansas regiment lost forty-five per cent of its men. "And these losses" it is said "included very few prisoners". (Campbell and Battlefield, 484.) In June, 1868, the State was restored to the Union and to representation in Congress, with an agreement to perpetuate universal suffrage. During the reconstruction period, Arkansas was not exempt from sad experiences comparable to those of other Southern States. A contested election in 1872 for Governor caused much confusion until 1875.

Constitution and Government.—By the constitution of the State the city of Little Rock is made the State capital. Legislative power is vested in a General Assembly to meet every two years. There is no female suffrage. The Act of Congress of 1855 which has been already mentioned provides that no law of the Territory of Louisiana shall be valid "which shall lay any person under restraint or disability on account of his religious opinions, profession or worship". And the State constitution now in force is much similar to the one with the ten points of the so-called "free soil" hold office, and requires that no one shall be incompetent as a witness on account of religious belief, adding "but nothing herein shall be construed to dispense with oaths or affirmations". "All men", declares the constitution, "have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; no man can, of right, be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent. No human authority can, in any case or manner whatsoever, control or interfere with the right of conscience, and no preference shall be given to any religious denomination, or mode of worship above any other." The constitution directs the enactment of suitable laws to protect every religious denomination in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of public worship. It also ordains the maintenance by the State of a "general, suitable and efficient system of free schools".

Education.—In pursuance of this direction the laws of the State make elaborate provisions for free schools and a "University of Arkansas". (Digest of the Statutes, §§ 7494-7739.) No teacher is to be licensed in the public schools unless he believes "in the existence of a Supreme Being". And no teacher in these schools "shall permit sectarian books to be used as reading or text books in the school under his care". The twelfth United States Census reports a school attendance in 1900 of 230,180 persons, of whom 115,813 were females. Including Negro schools, this enrolment reached 329,375 persons, of whom 176,528 could neither read nor write, 20 per cent of the males of voting age were illiterate.

Population.—The population of the State in 1900 was 1,311,564 according to the census. Only 14,289 persons were foreign born. Of Negro descent there were 366,856. Of males fifteen years of age and over, 37.9 per cent were single, 50.1 per cent married, and 0.3 per cent divorced, 0.4 per cent being reported unknown. Of females fifteen years of age and over, 26 per cent were single, 60.6 per cent married and 0.6 per cent divorced, 0.1 being reported unknown.

Business Statistics.—The total assessed valuation of property for 1899 was $189,998,150, the State indebtedness on 1 October, 1900, $1,432,915.95. Arkansas is chiefly an agricultural State. Little Rock with a population of 42,636 was the only city of which the population was estimated in 1901 to exceed 25,000. Three other cities, namely, Fort Smith City, Hot Springs City, and Pine Bluffs City, were the only other cities of which the population exceeded 8,000. Being south of 37° of latitude the State is within "the cotton belt," and cotton has become its principal crop, as Nutall seems to have foreseen in 1819. In 1899 the value of the cotton crop was $28,053,813, or 49.4 per cent of the value of all the crops of the State. Of the corn crop the value was $17,572,170. Of potatoes a production is reported of 1,783,969 bushels and of tobacco, 831,700 pounds. Notwithstanding the chief importance of the two crops here mentioned, a growth during the period from 1850 to 1900 in manufacturing and mechanical industries. The six leading mechanical industries in 1905 were: (1) cars and general shop construction and repairs by steam railroad companies; (2) flour and gist mill products, lumber, and lumber planing mill products, including sashes, doors, and blinds; (5) oil, cotton seed, and cake; (6) printing and publishing. Of manufacturing establishments there were 1,907, of which 1,344 were devoted to the six leading industries. The amount of capital invested in manufactures was $46,206,116, the value of products $53,864,394. Of all manufacturing establishments 88.3 per cent were in, 1905, in the rural districts. There is a small production of coal, estimated in 1905 to amount to 2,000,000 short tons, one-half of which is classed as semi-anthracite. The railroad mileage in 1904 is reported to be 4,126.44 miles.

Catholic Life.—Concerning the history of the Catholic Church in the State, from 1793 until 1801 Arkansas with all of the territory included in the Louisiana purchase formed a portion of the Diocese of Louisiana and Florida. On the cession to the United States in 1803 Bishop Carroll appointed Rev. Michael Meighan as administrator Apostolic. In 1805 appointed administrator Apostolic. "When the decree of the Propaganda confiding Louisiana to his care reached Bishop Carroll," writes Dr. Shea (Life and Times of the Most Rev. John Carroll), "it was a matter of great and pious satisfaction to him to know that there was one priest in Louisiana whose virtue and ability were known to him. . . ." In upper Louisiana there was scarcely any priest other than a priest whom the historian mentions. Great disorder and relaxation of discipline seems to have existed in various regions of the vast diocese. In 1812 in another urgent appeal from Archbishop Carroll the Rev. Wm. H. Wyatt, "an able and energetic man," remarks Dr. Shea, was appointed administrator Apostolic. In 1815 he was consecrated bishop. In 1824 Right Rev. Joseph Rosati became coadjutor with residence at St. Louis, and to his special care the Territory of Arkansas was committed at an early date and the Little Rock Catholics who had never seen a priest, and on the Arkansas River there were found sixteen Catholic families "who reported that Mass had twice been offered there." Arkansas Post was the only place after leaving New Madrid where there were enough Catholics to maintain a priest (Cath. Ch. in the U. S.). The missionaries were perhaps not surprised to find great religious ignorance among the Arkansas Catholics, and that for most of those whom the missionaries met, the celebration of Mass was "a wonderful ceremony" (Shea, op. cit.). In 1826 the diocese was formally divided, and Bishop Rosati made Bishop of the new Diocese of St. Louis, comprising the portion of the divided diocese north of Louisiana. So late as 1830 the bishop wrote, "In Arkansas Territory where there are more than two thousand scattered Catholics, there is not a single priest." But in 1832 one priest had entered the Territory and to his aid a newly-ordained priest was sent in that year. Bishop Rosati died in 1843. The State of Arkansas with Indian Territory was erected into the new Diocese of Little Rock, and the Rev. Andrew Byrne of the Diocese of New York was named as its bishop, and was consecrated in 1844. Despite all past efforts Bishop Byrne found that the Catholic population of the whole diocese did not exceed "seven hundred souls . . ." scattered in every county in the state. There was only one priest. There were two churches loaded with debt. Dr. Shea states that "the prevailing ignorance and vice were deplorable and almost beyond the reach of his fatherly care. He wrote concerning the inhabitants of the interior of the State, "these people have but little appreciation of the sanctity and holiness of the principles inculcated by our Christian religion" (Army Life, 387). In the beginning of 1861 the diocese had nine priests on seven churches, thirteen parishes, and about 1,000 communicants. During the Civil War, Bishop Byrne died and during the war no successor was appointed. In 1866 the Rev. Edward Fitzgerald of Columbus, Ohio, was named as bishop. "He made the sacrifice", says Dr. Shea, "and was consecrated, 3 February, 1867, to find but five priests in the diocese and three houses of Sisters of Mercy".

Catholic Religious Statistics.—In 1891, the Indian Territory became a vicariate Apostolic, and in 1905 was erected into the Diocese of Oklahoma, and in 1906, the diocese, presided over by the Right Rev. Bishop Fitzgerald, comprised only the State of Arkansas. In the diocese there are 26 secular priests and 34 priests of religious orders, 41 churches with resident priest, 32 missions with churches, and 67 stations, 1 college for boys with 60 students, 8 academies with 1,006 students, 29 parishes and missions with schools having 1,042 pupils, 2 industrial schools for Boys with 314 pupils, 2 industrial schools for Girls with 20 orphans, the total young people under Catholic care being 3,109. The Catholic population is about 17,000. A law of the state provides that "lands and tenements" not exceeding forty acres "with the improvements and appurtenances" may be held in perpetual succession for the use of any religious society for "a meeting house, burying ground, camp-ground, or residence for their preacher."
Arlegui, Fray José.—A Spaniard from Biscay, first attached to the Franciscan province of Cantabria, then transferred to Zacatecas in Mexico. He wrote a number of works and treatises on theological subjects, some of value to the student of Indian ethnology. His most important work was the "Crónica de Zacatecas," which was published in 1737. He gives an account of the missions in his province, and of the first attempts to bring them to Christianity.

Crónica de Zacatecas, 1737. Very rare.

Arles, The Synods of.—The first Council of Arles was held in 314, for the purpose of putting an end to the Donatist controversy. It confirmed the findings of the Council of Rome (313), i. e. it recognized the validity of the election of Bishop of Carthage, and confirmed the excommunication of Donatus of Caesarea. Its seventy-two canons dealing with various abuses that had crept into ecclesiastical life since the persecution of Diocletian (284-305), are among the most important documents of early ecclesiastical legislation. A council held in 353, attended, among others, by two papal legates, was decidedly Arian in attitude. The legates were tempted into rejecting communion with Athanasius and refused to condemn Arius, an act which filled Pope Liberius with grief. In the synod of 443 (482), attended also by bishops of neighbouring provinces, fifteen new rules were formulated, mostly regarding of earlier disciplinary decrees. Neophytes were excluded from major orders; married men aspiring to the priesthood were required to promise a life of continency, and it was forbidden to consecrate a bishop without the assistance of three other bishops and the consent of the metropolitans. A council of 451 held after the close of the Council of Chalcedon in that year, sent its adhesion to the "Epistola dogmatics" of Leo I, written to Flavian of Constantinople. (See Eucharianism.) A council was held on New Year's Day, 465, to settle the differences that had arisen between the Abbot of Levoca and the Bishop of Arles. Among the canons of the archiepiscopal See of Vienne and Arles a council was held in the latter city in 463, which called forth a famous letter from St. Leo I (Leoins I, Opp., ed. Ballerini, I, 988; Hefele, Concilii geschichte, II, 590). Between 475 and 490 another council was held, attended by thirty bishops, in which the predestinationist teachings of the priest Lucidus were condemned. In 524 a council was held under the presidency of St. Cæsarius of Arles; its canons deal chiefly with the conferring of orders. Little is known of the councils of 554 and 682. An important council was held in 813, at the instigation of Charle-

crees insist on a sufficient ecclesiastical education of bishops and priests, on the duty of both to preach frequently to the people and to instruct them in the Catholic Faith, on the obligations of parents to in-

tion of Christian Faith, the awakening in the popular heart of a sense of divine goodness and of salutary fear by the consideration of past evils. In 1236 a council held under the presidency of Jean Bausson, Archbishop of Arles, issued twenty-four canons, mostly against the prevalent Albigeosian heresy, and for the observance of the decrees of the Lateran Council of 1215 and that of Toulouse in 1229. Close inspection of their dioceses is urged on the bishops, as a remedy against the spread of heresy; testaments are declared invalid unless made in the presence of the parish priest. This measure, met with in other councils, was meant to prevent testamentary dispositions in favour of known heretics. In 1251, Jean, Archbishop of Arles, held a council near Avignon (Concilium Insculatum), among whose thirteen canons is one providing that the sponsor at baptism is bound to give only the white robe in which the infant is baptized. In 1269 a council held by Flor-

ce, decrees of interpretation must be received fasting, and that on Sundays and feast days the religious should not open their churches to the faithful, nor preach at the hour of the parish Mass. The laity should be instructed by their parish priests. The religious should also frequent the parochial service, for the sake of good example. This council also condemned the doctrines spread abroad under the name of Joachim of Flora. In 1275, earlier observances, twenty-two in number, were promulgated anew at a Council of Arles.

Armachanis. See Janseni Eri, Cornelius; Lombard, Peter (Bishop of Armagh); Fitzralph, Richard.

Armadia, The Spanish, also called the Invincible Armadia (infrona), and more correctly La Armada Grande, was a fleet (I) intended to invade England and to put an end to the long series of English aggressions against the colonies and possessions of the Spanish Crown; (II) it was however all but destroyed by a week's fighting and a dangerous gale; (III) this led to the gradual decadence of the maritime power of Spain; (IV) Catholics upon the whole supported the Armada, but with some notable excep-

I. English Provocation.—At the commencement of Elizabeth's reign (1558) Philip had been her friend. His misfortune is the fact that between the archiepiscopal See of Vienne and Arles a council was held in the latter city in 463, which called forth a famous letter from St. Leo I (Leoni I, Opp., ed. Ballerini, I, 988; Hefele, Concilii geschichte, II, 590). Between 475 and 490 another council was called, attended by thirty bishops, in which the pre-destinationist teachings of the priest Lucidus were condemned. In 524 a council was held under the presidency of St. Cæsarius of Arles; its canons deal chiefly with the conferring of orders. Little is known of the councils of 554 and 682. An important council was held in 813, at the instigation of Charle-

crees insist on a sufficient ecclesiastical education of bishops and priests, on the duty of both to preach frequently to the people and to instruct them in the Catholic Faith, on the obligations of parents to in-

tion of Christian Faith, the awakening in the popular heart of a sense of divine goodness and of salutary fear by the consideration of past evils. In 1236 a council held under the presidency of Jean Bausson, Archbishop of Arles, issued twenty-four canons, mostly against the prevalent Albigeosian heresy, sued reprisals on both sides, trade was paralyzed, and war was on the point of breaking out, both on the occasion of the Northern Rising (1569) and at the time of the English marriage in 1570. The imprudent Spanish ambassador, Don Gara Despe, was then expelled from England, Philip having previously dismissed from Spain the English ambassador, Dr. Mann, an apostate priest, whose secession was naturally considered an insult. Whilst the Spanish fleet was fighting the cause of Christianity against the Turks at Lepanto (1572), Dutch privateers sacked the almost defenseless colonies on the Spanish Main, from which he returned with enormous booty (1570, 1571, 1572–73). Slightly better relations between the two countries ensued towards the close of this decade, when Elizabeth feared that, with the decay of Spanish power in the Netherlands, France might conquer that country for herself. So in 1578 a Spanish ambassador was received in London, though the same time Drake was allowed to sail on his great buccaneering voyage around the world. On his return public opinion began to demands the "master-robber of the New World", but Elizabeth exerted herself warmly in his favour, gave him the honour of knighthood, and three years later, immediately before sending his army to fight the Spaniards in the Netherlands, she despatched him once more to spoil the West Indies. It was then that Drake "convincing Spain that the eagle was not so weak" (J. R. Seeley, Growth of British Policy). Mr. Froude and the older panegyrists of Queen Elizabeth frequently justify the English piracies as acts of retaliation against the cruelties of the Inquisition, and maintain that Philip had given cause for war by encouraging plots against Elizabeth’s throne and life. The prime motive of the Armada, they say, was to overthrow Protestantism. But these statements cannot be substantiated, and are misleading (see Laughton, p. xxii; Pollen, The Month, February, March, April, 1902). It is true that the ineffectual attempts of Spain to shut out the rest of Europe from traffic with her colonies were unwise, perhaps unjust, and acted as an incentive to secret and unwarranted traffic. But it must also be remembered that trade monopolies flourished in England to such an extent that her pirates may have taken to that profession because honourable trade was impracticable (See B. Sneyd, History of Privy Council, VII, p. xviii). On the other hand, one must unreservedly blame the cruelty of Alva and of the Spanish Inquisitors, which much embittered the struggle when it had once begun.

II. THE CONFLICT.—Since July, 1580, Philip had begun to regard the English freebooters in a new light. He had then made good by force of arms his claim to the crown of Portugal, by which he became lord over the rich and widely-stretching Portuguese colonies. If he did not soon bestir himself to defend them, they would be lost as well as robbery, moreover, a considerable fleet. The danger from the Turk had been greatly diminished. The religious wars had sapped the power of France. James of Scotland had broken the trammels with which Elizabeth had bound him during his boyhood, and he showed some desire to help his mother, Queen Mary, and she might expect a help of sixty warships, and a considerable army that should be sent to liberate her. But Philip arrived at his conclusion so very slowly and silently that it is hard to say when he passed from speculative approbation of war to the actual determination to fight. In April, May, and June, 1587, Drake commenced to comply with Elizabeth’s wish, attacked the Spanish shipping, burnt the half-finished and unmannned ships at Cadiz, and did enormous damage to the Spanish navy. Philip, at last convinced that fight he must, now began to exert himself to the utmost. But his inefficiency as an organizer was never more evident. He selected only two of the secret of sea-power, but unwilling to admit that there was any special need for expert advice and direction, he wasted months on making plans of campaign while the building and victualling of the fleet was neglected. The Spaniards of that day were reputed the best soldiers in the world, but in naval manueuvres and in the use of heavy artillery they were far behind their rivals. The worst blunder of all was committed after the death of the Marquess of Santa Cruz, Don Alvaro de Bazan the elder, a veteran sailor, the only naval commander of repute that Spain possessed. Philip after long consideration, appointed the less experienced Don Martin de Mendoza to succeed him. In vain did the duke protest his inability and his lack of experience in naval matters. The king insisted, and the great nobleman loyalty left his splendid castle to attempt the impossible, and to make in good faith the most disastrous errors of leadership. A striking comment on the inefficiency of the vast preparations is afforded by the letters of the papal nuncio at Philip’s court. He reports at the end of February, 1588, that he had been talking with the other envoys from Germany, France, and Venice, and that none of them could make out for certain that the fleet was intended to attack England. After all, for Philip it would be weak. Next month he was reassured by one of Philip’s own councillors—they felt sure all would go well, if they once got a footing in England (Vatican Archives, Germania, CX sq., 58, 80). The Armada left Lisbon on the 20th of May, 1588. It consisted of about 130 ships, and 30,493 men; but at least half the ships were transports, and two-thirds of the men were soldiers. It was bound for Flanders, where it was to join the Prince of Parma, who had built a number of pontoons and transports to carry over his army. But the fleet found it necessary to put back into the harbour of Corunna almost immediately, in order to refit. The admirals was already suggesting that the expedition should be given up, but Philip continued to insist, and it sailed again on the 12th of July, according to the old style then observed in England. This time the voyage prospered, and a week later the Armada had assembled in the English Channel and procesoed to Plymouth. On the 20th of July, eastwards towards Flanders. Beacon lights gave notice of their arrival to the English, who hurriedly put out from Plymouth and managed to slip past the Spaniards in the night, thus gaining the weather gauge, an advantage they never afterwards lost. The fighting ships of the Armada were ranged in a crescent, the transports keeping between the horns, and in this formation they slowly advanced up channel, the English cannonading the rearmost, and causing the loss of three of the chief vessels. Still on Saturday afternoon, 27 July, the Spaniards were safely in Calais, and the matter of refitting indeed, but with numbers still almost intact. According to the best modern authorities, these numbers, which had been at first slightly in favour of Spain, now that the English had received reinforcements and that the Spaniards had met with losses, were in favour of the English. There were 111 English ships fighting, but this is a guess, and weight of guns the advantage was with the English, and in gunnery and naval tactics there was no comparison at all. Howard did not allow his enemy any time to refit. The next night some fireships were drifted into the Armada as the tide went out. The Spaniards, already ready to slip their cables, but nevertheless suffered some losses from collisions. On the Monday following, the great battle took place off Gravelines, in which the Spaniards were entirely outclassed and defeated. It says much for their heroism that only one ship was reported captured; but three sank, four or five ran ashore, and the Duke of Medina Sidonia took the resolution of leading the much damaged remnant round the north of Scotland and Ireland, and so back to Spain. But for that very difficult voyage there would have been a large number of prisoners in the fleet. More and more ships were now lost in every storm, and at every point of danger. Eventually, on the 13th of September, the duke returned to Santander, having lost about half his fleet and about three-quarters of his men.

The report as to the extent as were the effects of the failure of the Armada, they are nevertheless often exaggerated. The defeat no doubt set bounds to the expansion of Spain, and secured the power of her rival. Yet it is a mistake to suppose that this change was immediate, obvious, or uniform. The wars of religion in France, promoted by Elizabeth, ended in weakening that country to such an extent that Spain seemed within two years after the Armada to be nearer to universal domination than ever before, and this consummation was averted by the reconciliation of Henry IV to Catholicism, which, by reuniting France, restored the balance of power in the contest against Spain. On the other hand, the peace of Vervins in 1598. Even the change of sea-power was not immediate or obvious. In reality England had always been the superior at sea, as the history of Drake and his colleagues clearly shows. Her weakness lay in the smallness of her standing navy, and her want of adequate ammunition. Spain took so long to attempt a readjustment of the balance of sea-power, that England had ample time to organize and arm a superior fleet. But Spain, though she failed at sea, remained the chief power on land and, having recognized her naval inferiority, strengthened her land defences with such success that the deprivations of the English in her colonies after the defeat were incommensurably less than those which had occurred before. Her decline ensued because the cause of the defeat were not remedied. Slave-labour, with its attendant corruptions, in the colonies, want of organization, of development and of free government at home, joined with grapsing at the last hour, and was however great, were the causes of the decline of the great world-power of the sixteenth century.

IV. CATHOLIC CO-OPERATION.—Among the many side issues which meet the student of the history of the Armada, that of the co-operation or favour of the Church is of especial importance. The Church, in England, is naturally important for Catholics. There can be no doubt, then, that though Spanish predominance was not at all desired for its own sake by the Catholics of England, France, and Germany, or of Rome, yet the widespread suffering and irritation caused by the religious war which Elizabeth had fomented, and the indignation aroused by her religious persecution, and the execution of Mary Stuart, caused Catholics everywhere to sympathize with Spain, and to regard the Armada as a crusade against the most dangerous enemy of the Faith. Pope Sixtus V agreed to renew the excommunication of Elizabeth, and to grant a large subsidy to the Armada, but, knowing the slowness of Spain, would give nothing till the expedition should actually land in England. In this way he saved his million crowns, and was spared the reproach of having taken futile proceedings against the heretical queen. This excommunication was not very highly esteemed, and there is extant a proclamation to justify it, which was to have been published in England if the invasion had been successful. It was signed by Cardinal Allen, and is entitled "An Admonition to the Nobility and Laity of England". It was intended to comprise all that could be said against the queen, and the indictment is therefore fuller and more forcible than any other put forward by the religious exiles, who were generally very reticent in their complaints. Allen also carefully consigned his publication to the fire, and we only know of it through one of Elizabeth's ubiquitous spies, who had previously stolen a copy. There is no doubt that all the exiles for religion at that time shared Allen's sentiments, but not so the Catholics in England. They had always been the most conservative of English parties. The resentment they felt at being persecuted led them to blame the queen's ministers, but to protest against the right of the pope to question the great power of Elizabeth was evident, the forces and intentions of Spain were unknown quantities. They might, should, and did resist until complete justification was set before them, and this was in fact never attempted. Much, for instance, as we know of the Catholic clergy then labouring in England, we cannot find that any of them used religion to advance the cause of the Armada. Protestant and Catholic contemporaries alike agree that the English Catholics were energetic in their preparations against it. This being so, it was inevitable that the leaders of the Catholics abroad should lose influence, through which Spain promised to accelerate the end. The pope and all among whom they lived had been of the same mind, it was evidently unjust to blame their want of political insight too harshly. In point of fact the change did not come until near the end of Elizabeth's reign, when, during the appeals against the archpriest, the old leaders, especially the retreat of Hungary, were in danger for the Spanish alliance. The terms of the blame were exaggerated, but the reason for complaint cannot be denied.

The literature that has gathered round the Armada is voluminous, and has of course been largely influenced by the national and religious prejudices of the contending nations. Much may suffice to indicate how the war has been viewed. Almost all writers hitherto have written of the "Invincible Armada", thinking that they were using an epithet applied to their fleet by the Spaniards themselves, and one that deservedly betrayed Spanish pride. Now it appears that it was only one of the insults of contemporary English pamphleteers, and is not found in any contemporary Spanish writer. (Laughton, p. xix.) On the English side the most representative of the old school are J. L. BUTLER, Rise of the English Republic, and W. S. W. BACON, The English Rebellions 1547-60 (1888). On the Catholic side are E. TOHMEN, and J. J. LAMBERT. On the Protestant side, and especially in the reign of Mary, are J. C. F. GARRIGUES, Amor de Dios y de la Patria (Madrid, 1854); J. C. ELLIOT, La Armada Inglesa (Madrid, 1892); and J. H. POLLEN, The Armada of 1588 (London, 1882). Of later books, the most important is the Armada In England (1895), by W. H. TILTON, with the assistance of C. H. K. DODD, and J. H. C. DODD. It is the most complete history of the Armada ever written, and is a monument to the researches of the Navy Records Society (London, 1892-93). Among the Spanish writers, it is impossible to speak of their contributions to the history of the Armada. There are many, but none of them have been superseded by the publication of English and Spanish State papers, especially those of the last thirty years. Among the best recent works are the letters of Bernal Díaz de Toro, the Don Quijote de la Mancha (1892), and the Armada and the Spanish Armada, by J. A. DUQUESNE, Les armées espagnoles (Paris, 1892); and N. H. ULRICH, Der englische Krieg (Berlin, 1892), and the Armada in England, by T. F. KNOX, Letters of Cardinal Allen (London 1892).
in 1906 of thirteen members, including a dean, archdeacon, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, theologian, and canons. Diocesan clergy, 139; regulars, 39; churches and chapels, 156; primary schools, 227; Catholic population (1901), 147,358. The suffragan sees are Meath, Ardfag, Clogher, Derry, Down and Connor, Dromore, Kilmore, Raphoe.

At the recent synods grants of land from the chieftain Daire, on the hill called Ard-Macha (the Height of Macha), built a stone church on the summit and a monastery and some other religious edifices round about, and fixed on this place for his metropolitan see. He also founded a school in the same place, which soon became famous and attached to which were the schools and books of the time other religious bodies settled in Armagh, such as the Culscees, who built a monastery there in the eighth century. The city of Armagh was thus until modern times a purely ecclesiastical establishment. About 446, St. Patrick, aided by Secundinus and Auxiliius, two of his disciples, held a synod at Armagh, of which some of the canons are still extant.

One of these expressly mentions that all difficult cases of conscience should be referred to the judgment of the Archbishop of Armagh, and that if too difficult to be disposed of by him with his counsellors they should be referred for judgment to Rome. In Irish times, the primacy of Armagh was never questioned, and for many centuries the priates were accustomed to make circuits and visitations through various parts of the country for the collection of their dues. This was called the "Cattelages", or the "Law of St. Patrick". Beginning in 734, during the incumbency of Primate Congrus, it continued till long after the English invasion, but ceased as soon as English prelates succeeded to the see.

Two kings gave it their royal sanction: Felim, King of Munster, in 822, and the famous Brian Boru, in 1006. The record of the latter's sanction is preserved in the Book of Armagh, in the handwriting of Brian Boru's chaplain. To add solemnity to their collecting tours, the priates were in the habit of carrying with them the shrine of St. Patrick, and as a rule their success was certain. These collections seem to have been made at irregular intervals, probably for the purpose of keeping up the famous school of Armagh, said at one time to contain 7,000 students, as well as for the restoration, often needed, of the church and other ecclesiastical buildings when destroyed by fire or plundered in war.

The Irish annals record no fewer than seventeen burnings of the city, either partial or total, probably under the orders of the Danes and the clergy driven out of it. It was also sacked by De Courcy, Fitz-Aldelm and Philip of Worcester during the conquest of Ulster by the Anglo-Normans.

The struggle of the primacy of Armagh by laymen in the eleventh century has received great prominence owing to St. Bernard's denunciation of it in his life of St. Malachy, but the abuse was not without a parallel on the continent of Europe. The chiefs of the tribe in whose territory Armagh stood usurped the position and temporal emoluments of the priory and discharged by deputy the ecclesiastical functions. The see was entirely given up for two generations until Cellach, known as St. Celsus (1105-29), who was intruded as a layman, had himself consecrated bishop, and ruled the see with great wisdom. In 1111 he held a great synod at Fiadh-Mic-Aengus at which were present fifty bishops, 500 priests, and all the clergy of Munster, the Danes, and his nobles. During his incumbency the priory of Sts. Peter and Paul at Armagh was re-founded by Imar, the learned prelector of St. Malachy. This was the first establishment in Ireland into which the Canons Regular of St. Augustine had been introduced. Rodric O'Connor, monarch of Ireland, afterwards granted it an annual pension for a public school. After a short interval, Celsus was succeeded by St. Malachy O'Morgair (1134-37), who later suffered many tribulations in trying to effect a reformation in the diocese. He resigned the see after three years and retired to the Bishops' Chair in Rome and solicited the Pope for two palliums, one for the See of Armagh and the other probably for the new Metropolitan See of Cashel. The following year he introduced the Osterican Order into Ireland, by the advice of St. Bernard. He died at Clairsy, while making a second journey to Rome. St. Malachy is henceforward known as the patron saint of the diocese. Gelasius succeeded him and during a long incumbency of thirty-seven years held many important synods which effected great reforms. At the Synod of Kells, held in 1152 and presided over by Cardinal Paparo, the Pope's legate, Gelasius received the pallium and at the same time three others were handed over to the new metropolitan sees of Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam. The successor of Gelasius in the see, Cornelius Mac Conaille, who died at Chambéry the following year, on a journey to Rome, has been venerated ever since in that locality as the patron saint. He died at Viterbo (1178-80), during whose incumbency the see suffered greatly from the depredations of the Anglo-Norman invaders. William Fitz-Aldelm pillaged Armagh and carried away St. Patrick's crozier, called the "Staff of Jesus". O'Caran's successor was Thomas O'Connor (1181-1201). In the year after his succession to the see, Pope Lucius III, at the instance of John Comyn, the first English prelate in the See of Dublin, tried to abolish the old Irish custom according to which the primates claimed the right of making solemn circuits and visitations in the province of Leinster as well as those of Tuam and Munster. The papal Bull issued was to the effect that no archbishop or bishop should hold any assembly or ecclesiastical court in the Diocese of Dublin, or treat of the ecclesiastical causes and affairs of the said diocese, without the consent of the Archbishop of Dublin, if the latter were actually in residence, or, if he were not, if he, his legate, or the Apostolic legate. This Bull laid the groundwork of a bitter and protracted controversy between the Archbishops of Armagh and of Dublin, concerning the primatial right of the former to have his cross carried before him and to try ecclesiastical cases in the diocese of the latter. The question, however, must not be confounded with that respecting the primacy, which did not arise till the seventeenth century.

ENGLISH PERIOD (1215-1359).—As the first Anglo-Norman adventurers who came to Ireland showed very little scruple in despoiling the churches and monasteries, Armagh suffered considerably from their depredations and the clergy were almost reduced to beggary. When the English kings got a footing in the country, they began to interfere in the election of bishops and a contest arose between King John and the Pope regarding Eugene Mac Gillaweer, elected to the primatial see in 1203. This struggle was perfected by the General Council of the Lateran in 1215 and died at Rome the following year. The English kings also began to claim possession of the temporalities of the sees during vacancies and to insist on the newly-elected bishops suing them humbly for their restitution. Primate Reginald (1261-70), a Dominican, who succeeded in uniting the county of Louth to the See of Armagh, Primate Patrick O'Sealan (1261-70), also a Dominican, rebuilt to a large extent the cathedral of Armagh and founded a house for Franciscans in that city.
The next primate was the Venerable Oliver Plunket (1669–81), the cause of whose beatification was present before the papal court. After his access to the see he was obliged to defend the primatial rights of Armagh against the claims put forward for Dublin by its archbishop, Dr. Peter Talbot. At a meeting of the Catholic clergy in Dublin in 1760, each of these prelates refused to subscribe subsequences. In the autumn, were written works on the ancient rights and prerogatives of his see, published in 1762, under the title "Jus Primatiae; or the ancient Pre-eminence of the See of Armagh above all the other Archbishops in the Kingdom of Ireland, asserted by O. T. H. P". This was replied to two years later by Dr. Talbot, whose work was called "Primacicus Dublensis; or the chief reasons on which the Church of Dublin relies in the possession and prosecution of her right to the Primacy of Ireland". A violent persecution stilled the controversy for some time and subsequent primates asserted their authority from time to time in Dublin. In 1719 two Briefs of Clement XI were in favour of the claims of Armagh. Still the matter was not allowed to rest and Dr. Hugh MacMahon felt compelled to write a work treating the subject exhaustively in answer to an anonymous pamphlet published by Father John Hennesey, a Jesuit of Clonmel. Dr. MacMahon, in his work, called "The Original Right of Armagh" in 1728 under the title of "Jus Primatiae Armacanum; or the Primatial Right of Armagh over all the other Archbishops and Bishops and the entire clergy of Ireland, asserted by H. A. M. T. H. P". This learned work contains the last word on the subject and is conclusive. In practice, however, the primatial right has fallen into desuetude in Ireland as in every other part of the Church. In 1769, Venerable Oliver Plunket was arrested on a ridiculous charge of conspiring to bring 20,000 Frenchmen into the country and of having levied moneys on his clergy for the purpose of maintaining 70,000 men for an armed rebellion. After being confined in Dublin Castle for many months, he was presented for trial on these and other charges in Dundalk; but the jury, though all Protestants, refused to find a true bill against him. The venue, however, of his trial was changed by his enemies to London, where an English jury, without hearing a single word before he was able to gather his witnesses and bring them across, though he made the request to the judge. The principal witnesses against him were some disreputable priests and friars of Armagh whom he had censured and suspended for their bad conduct. He was dragged on a sledge to Tyburn on 1 July, 1681, where he was hanged, drawn, and quartered in presence of an immense multitude. His head, still in a good state of preservation, is in the possession of the Dominican nuns of Drogheda.

Penal Times.—During this trying period, the primates had to live in the greatest obscurity in order to disarm the malice of the clergy. Dominic Maguire (1653–1707), a Dominican, succeeded to the see after the death of the Venerable Oliver Plunket. This primate, having to go into exile after the surrender of Limerick in 1691, spent the sixteen years that intervened between that time and his death in a very destitute condition. The see of Armagh was administered by a vicar, Patrick Donnelly, a priest of the diocese, who in 1697 was appointed Bishop of Drogheda, though retaining the administration of Armagh for several years afterwards. His name occurs in the government register of the "popish clergy" of Armagh, made in 1712, as the "priest of that part of the parish of Newry that lies in the county of Armagh. The sureties for his good conduct were Terence Murphy of Lurigan and Patrick Guinniss of the same town. Altogether the names of nineteen parish priests appear on the register for the county of Armagh. From the returns made in 1731 by the Protestant archbishops and bishops regarding the growth of popery in Ireland, we find that in the Diocese of Armagh there were 26 Mass-houses, 77 officiating priests, 5 friaries, 22 friars, 1 nunnery with 9 nuns, 7 private chapels and 40 popish schools. Owing to the severity of the laws there was no priori resident in Ireland for twenty-three years after the flight of Primate Maguire, in 1691. Hugh MacMahon (1714–57), Bishop of Derry, who died the last resident in this house, was living during the worst of the penal times, the pri- mate was obliged constantly to wander from place to place, saying Mass and administering Confirmation in the open air. Nevertheless, in spite of these difficulties he has left his name to posterity by the learned work "Jus Primitiae Armacianum", written by command of the pope in defence of the primatial rights of Armagh. He was succeeded by his nephew, Bernard MacMahon (1737–47), then Bishop of Clogher, who is described as a prelate remarkable for zeal, charity, prudence, and sound doctrine. He also suffered considerably from the persecution, and spent some time in hiding. In the time of the Taoiseach O'Donovan the see was vacated, but the present occupant of the see, Cardinal Michael Logue, succeeded to the primacy in 1887. He is the first Primate of Armagh to become a member of the Sacred College. He has devoted himself for several years to the task of beautifying and completing in every sense the noble edifice erected by his predecessors, the cf. synod-hall, muniment-room, the purchase in fee simple of the site, and the interior decorations and altars, he has spent more than £50,000 on what is now known as the National Cathedral. This great temple was consecrated on 24 July, 1904. Cardinal Logue, representing Pope Pius X, was present at the consecration.

RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS IN THE ARCHDIOCESE.—There is a Franciscan and an Augustinian friary in Drogheda, and the Dominicans have one founded by Primate Netterville in 1224. They also have one in Dundalk, established originally at Carlowford in the early part of the fourteenth century. Of the modern congregations, the Vincentians were introduced into Armagh by Primate Dixon in 1861, to take charge of the ecclesiastical seminary. The Marist Fathers, also at Primate Dixon's request, came to Dundalk the same year to conduct a college. The Redemptorists were brought there by Primate Mac Gettigan in 1876. Primate Cullen brought the Irish Christian Brothers to Armagh in 1851, Primate Dixon brought them to Drogheda in 1857, and Primate Kieran to Dundalk in 1889. The French Congregation of Christian Brothers (De la Salle) have schools in Dundalk, Keady and Ardee. The Presentation Brothers have schools at Dungannon. The Dominican Nuns, invited to Drogheda in 1722 by Primate Hugh MacMahon, conduct a boarding-school and a day-school. The Presentation Nuns, who settled in Drogheda in 1813, and in Portadown in 1852, have large poor-schools in both towns. The Sisters of Mercy, also devoted to the education of the poor, came to Dundalk in 1847, to Ardee in 1859, and to Dungannon in 1894. They also have convents at Bessbrook and Cookstown. The Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul came to Drogheda in 1855, where they conduct an industrial school for boys and a school for girls. The Sisters of the Sacred Heart were brought to Armagh by Primate Cullen in 1850. There is a missionary school for girls attached to their convent. There is a convent of Poor Clares at Keady, one of St. Louis at Middletown, and one of the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception at Magheracloone. The Academy of St. Patrick, Dungannon, is conducted by the diocesan clergy. The Catholic Diocesan Orphan Society is under the direction of the Primate.

MODERN TIMES.—Patrick Curtis (1819–32), who had been rector of the Irish College of Salamanca, was appointed to the see in more hopeful times and lived to witness the emancipation of the Diocese of Armagh, the end of penal laws in Ireland. He was one of the first to join the Catholic Association, and being on friendly terms with the Duke of Wellington, whom he had met in Spain during the Peninsula War, was able to advance considerably the cause of Catholic Emancipation. Thomas Kelly succeeded (1832–45). He laid the foundation-stone of St. Peter's Church in Drogheda, which was to serve as his pro-cathedral, one of the first Catholic churches to be built within the walls of a town in Ireland since the Protestant Reformation. The Protestant Corporation of Drogheda, wearing their robes and carrying the mace and sword, appeared on the scene and forbade the ceremony to proceed, but their protest was disregarded.

PROTESTANT ARCHBISHOPS.—Hugh Goodacre, the first Protestant prelate who presided over the Diocese, was appointed in 1861. The see was consecrated according to the Protestant ordinal and survived his consecration only three months. Adam Loftus (1563–67), from whom the Irish Protestant hierarchy claim to derive their orders, was consecrated with a column of Duncan, a prominent figure in Dublin according to the form annexed to the second Book of Common Prayer of the time of Edward VI. The most learned of the Protestant primates was James Ussher (1624–58), whose most important works were “Veterum Epistoliarum Hibernicarum Syllogos,” published and “Selecta a Hiberniae Ecclesiis Antiquitates,” which appeared in 1639. He left his valuable library, comprising several thousand printed books and manuscripts, to Trinity College, Dublin, and his complete works were published by that institution in twenty-four volumes at the cost of £3,000. In spite of his learning, his primate’s chair was marked by a most intolerant bigotry against the Irish Catholics. His judgment against toleration of Papists, i. e. “to consent that they may freely exercise their religion and profess their faith and doctrine is a grievous sin,” was a signal for the renewal of persecution and led to the Rising of the Irish Catholics in 1641 (see BLOOM, 63), another learned Protestant divine, succeeded Ussher.

His works on polemic and other subjects have been published in four folio volumes. Narcissus Marsh (1702–13), another learned prelate, built the noble library of St. Sepulchre’s in Dublin, which bears his name filled with a valuable collection of theological and Oriental works and liberally endowed it in support of a librarian and deputy. Hugh Boulter (1724–42), John Hoadly (1742–48), and George Stone (1746–64) are principally famous as politicians and upholders of the “English Interest” in Ireland. The first two supported and promoted the penal laws against the Catholics, but Stone was opposed to persecution. Richard Robinson, first Baron Rokeby (1765–94), raised Armagh by his munificence from extreme decay to a state of opulence and embellished it with various useful public institutions. He built an episcopal palace, a public library, an infirmary, and an observatory. Lord John George Beresford (1822–62) was also distinguished by his munificence. He restored Armagh Cathedral at a cost of £34,000, and is said to have spent £280,000 in acts of public benevolence. On his successor, Marcus Gervais Beresford (1862–85), fell a large portion of the task of providing for the future organization and support of the Protestant Church of Ireland, which was disestablished from 1 January, 1871. After the flight of the Earls O’Neill and O’Donnell, large portions of their forfeited estates were made over to the Protestant see, which, together with the land previously belonging to the see in Catholic times, made up a total of 100,563 acres, producing in modern times a gross revenue for the Protestant primate of £17,670. By the Church Temporalities’ Act of 1833, this was considerably reduced, and the net income of the see before the disestablishment was £12,087. Since that event the revenues of the Church Representative Body of £2,500, with the palace free of rent. The glebe lands belonging to the eighty-eight benefices in the diocese comprised 19,290 acres. Since disestablishment, about £9,000 are contributed annually by the voluntary system for sustentation funds and about £5,000 for various other purposes. The Irish Episcopalians formed twenty-two per cent of the population of the diocese, Presbyterians seventeen per cent, and Catholics sixty-one per cent, a proportion which has remained almost the same ever since. The non-Catholic population in 1901 was 733.

Armagh, The Book of, technically known as Liber Ar(d)Macianus.—A celebrated Irish-Latin manuscript preserved in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin. It is a vellum in small quarto, in fine state of preservation, with the exception, of the commencement, where a few pages are missing. In its present condition it consists of 221 leaves (442 pages) with the writing in double or, less often, in triple columns. The Irish hand is used throughout, some of the leaves are laid down on one side, and some of the letters are lightly coloured black, red, green, and yellow. The penmanship is, on the whole, very beautiful, distinct, and uniform. The only drawings in the manuscripts are four, representing the symbols of the Evangelists. Because of the value of the Book of Armagh, it was often richly bound, and encased in shrines of artistic workmanship. The Book of Armagh was also known as the ‘Canons of Patrick’, and it was once thought that it was the Patron’s own book and in part the work of Patrick himself. It was left for Bishop Charles Graves, however, to discover from the erasures in the manuscript itself, and from references in the Annals to names which he had pieced together from the Book of Armagh, that the name of the scribe of, perhaps, the entire work was Ferdonach of Armagh, who died in 845 or 846, and that he wrote the first part of the Book in the year 807 or 808.

The Book of Armagh is, in the main, a transcript of documents of a much older period than the Book which has preserved them, and these documents are of inestimable value for the early history and civilisation of Ireland. Above all, this collection is valuable because it contains the earliest writings that have come down to us relating to St. Patrick. The author of one of the Lives of Patrick, which the Book of Armagh contains, was one Muirchu Maccu Machteni, who wrote at the request of Aed, Bishop of Sletty. The author of the other Life was Tirechan, who wrote at the request of Aed, Bishop of Sletty. These authors wrote at about the middle of the seventh century, and had as their authorities even older memoirs. The Book contains other miscellaneous documents relating to St. Patrick, and gives considerable information on the rights and prerogatives of the See of Armagh. Among the most interesting is the German life of “Liber Angueli” (so spelled in the Irish fashion to show that the g was not palatalized), “the Book of the Angel”, wherein an angel is represented as entrusting to St. Patrick the primatial rights of Armagh; the Eusebian Canons, St. Jerome’s letter to Urbanus, Epistles of St. Patrick, also by Pelagius, Epistles of James, Peter, John, and Jude; the Apocalypse, the Gospels according to Matthew, Mark, John, and Luke, and the “Life of

STUART, History of Armagh, ed. AMBROSE COLEMAN (Dublin, 1900); The Annals of the Four Masters (Dublin, 1851–56); VHL; IRISH HISTORY OF ARMAGH AND MIDDLE-TERTIARY ANNALES OF ULSTER, 431–1541 (Dublin, 1887–91); VEN. OLIVER
St. Martin of Tours", by Sulpicius Severus. At the bottom of folio 16 verso, there is an entry which the scribe says was made "in conspectu Briani imperatoris Senecae", that is, in the presence of Brian Boru, probably in the year 1002.

St. Bernard, writing in the twelfth century, in his "Life of Malachi", speaks of a certain book which, he says, was one of the marks of the primatial rights of the See of Armagh. This was probably the "Libera Ardamachanius". In such high estimation was this Book held that a custodian was appointed for it and in virtue of his office he had, as his remuneration, no less than eight townlands. It was probably one of his functions to carry the Book on occasions of state and ceremony. The name of the keeper (in Irish, Maor, "steward") became in the course of time the name of the keeper, since the office was hereditary, and they became known as mac (pl. meic) Maor, or, anglicized, Moyre, Moyer. The precious Book thus changed hands frequently, and there is mention in the records that it was once pawned as security for a claim of fine. In the latter part of the seventeenth century it passed from the hands of the MacMoyres into the possession of the Brownlow family of Lurgan, with whom it remained until 1853, when it was purchased for three hundred pounds by the Irish antiquarian, Dr. Reeves, and by him transferred, on the same terms, to the Anglican primate Beresford, who presented it to Trinity College, Dublin. There is evidence to show that the Book was often used when giving testimony, and that oaths were sworn, and covenants ratified on it. This may account for some of the pages having the appearance of having been rubbed or touched frequently.

The Irish Book of Armagh is of the greatest importance for the history of the Irish language. It is not only one of the very oldest monuments of the Old-Irish, since it is antedated only by the fragmentary glosses in the Irish manuscripts preserved on the Continent, but it is the earliest extant specimen of a continuous narrative in Irish prose. It represents the language of the end of the seventh, or of the beginning of the eighth, century. The phonetic peculiarities of the Irish of that period, as evidenced in the Book of Armagh, are described briefly by Whitley Stokes and John Strachan in the preface to the second volume of their "Theoetica Poetica" (Dublin, 1872). This same volume contains all the Irish found in the Book of Armagh.

On the date of the manuscript, see CHARLES GRAVES, in the Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy, II, 316 sq., 326 sq. The date of the manuscript has been discussed by GEORGE PETRIE in his Inquiry into the Origin and Uses of the Round Towers of Ireland, in the memoirs of the Royal Irish Academy, 1847, 330 sq. All the documents in the Book relating to St. Patrick are in WHITLEY STOKER'S The Trispartite Life of St. Patrick, pt. II, 1887, and were reprinted by E. HOGAN, from the Aniceta Bollandiana, I and II, under the caption Excerpta hibernica ex Libro Armachano, in his Outlines of the Grammar of Old-Irish (Dublin, 1880). See also STUART, Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh, ed. COLEMAN (Dublin, 1900); BETHEAM, Irish Antiquities (London, 1827); WAYL, A History of Armagh (1810 ed. Dublin), 105-106. A critical, definitive edition of the whole Codex, reproducing the texts and notes added by the late D. J. MURPHY, is now announced for immediate publication by Professor Gwynn of Dublin.

JOSEPH DUNN.

Armagh, THE SCHOOL OF, seems to have been the oldest, and down to the time of the Anglo-Norman invasion continued to be one of the most celebrated of the ancient schools of Ireland. It dates, so far as we can judge, from the very foundation of the See of Armagh, for it has always been regarded as one of the primary duties of a bishop to make due provision for the education of his clergy, and as far as possible to exalt his own character by the good example of his actions. Patrick was certainly not the man to neglect this important duty. When the foreign clergy of various grades who had accompanied the apostle to Ireland had been all assigned to the care of the first churches which he had founded in Meath and Connaught, it became necessary to train native youth for the service of the Church. The purpose of Patrick was to establish a kind of parochial school. That is to say, when he found a likely subject for the ministry, especially amongst the youthful bards or brenhons, he took him into his own missionary train, wrote a catechism of Christian doctrine for him, and then entrusted him to his own bishop. He might be instructed in the Ordo of the Mass and the administration of the sacraments. It was the very best thing that could be done at the time, but it was, of course, only a temporary expedient. Armagh was founded most probably in 457, that is, in the twenty-fifth year after the founding of Trim as we are expressly told in the "Notes to Trencham". We may fairly assume that one of the first things Patrick did was to establish a school in connexion with his own cathedral, for the training of the clergy, and no doubt he himself exercised a general supervision over the direction of the infant seminary. But he was now too old to hold to teach to the young. Armagh would naturally be chief director of the Cathedral School. His first conditor, his nephew Sechnall, died about this time, or earlier, and Bencinus, Irish secretary and psalm-singer to the saint, was chosen to succeed Sechnall in the office of conditor so, we may fairly assume, he became the director of the semiromanesque.

Bencinus was admirably qualified for the office. There is some reason to think that his family belonged to the bardic order, and we know that he had been trained by Patrick in sacred learning from his early youth and was, moreover, well versed in the language and learning of his native land. Hence, we find that he was appointed secretary to the great Commission of Nine, which a few years before had been constituted for the purification of the Brehon Laws. He was also chief singer in the church services, and to him the original compilation of the "Book of Rights" has been always attributed. No doubt the School of Armagh would be primarily a great theological seminary, not only for Patrick's royal city or see, but also for students from all parts of Ireland; for the chief seat of ecclesiastical authority should also be the fountain of sound doctrine for all the land. As a schoolmaster as Bencinus we may be sure that due attention would be paid to the cultivation of the ancient language of Erin, and also of her bardic history and romantic tales, which were all familiar to him from his youth. Still, sacred science would be the chief study of Armagh, and, above all, the constant and profound study of the Scripture would be the primary purpose of its scholars. Their theological studies were all based on Scripture, and although theology had not yet assumed the scientific form which was given to it by the great scholastic doctors, and which has ever since been retained, it was brought to high perfection in Ireland, and they were careful to expound the positive theology of the Latin Fathers, whose writings were well known in Armagh, as we know, to some extent, from the "Book of Armagh" itself.

One of the most famous books at a somewhat later period in all the schools of Ireland and especially at Armagh, was the "Morals" of St. Gregory the Great. It is a large treatise in thirty-five books, and, although nominally merely a commentary on the Book of Job, it is in reality one of the most beautiful works on moral theology in its widest sense that has ever been penned. Every verse of Job is made the text for an homily; now on one section of interpretation, but a series of moral reflections conveyed in sweet and touching language, in which argument and exposition are very happily blended. On Sacred Scripture St. Jerome seems to have been the best authority, and he knew both from the fragments of Ailleran the Wise, published by Migne, and from the Irish manuscripts of St. Columban's great monastery at Bobbio, that our Irish scholars were familiar with nearly all his work. In dogmatic theology we do not think that, during the first two centuries of their history, the Celtic scholars were familiar with the writings of the Church of Rome. The same is true to have derived their dogma from St. Hilary and other writers of the French Church rather than from the great Father of the African Church.

One of the earliest and most distinguished teachers of the School of Armagh, after the time of St. Patrick and St. Columbanus, was Ciaran of Raphoe, the "Destruction of Britain", which is still extant, shows that he was a man both of large culture and of great holiness, wonderfully familiar with the text and application of Sacred Scripture, and in every way qualified to rule the Schools of Armagh. We know little or nothing of the writings of the subsequent teachers in the School of Armagh, though we have a record of the names of several, with eulogies of their wisdom and scholarship. The number of English students attracted to the Schools of Armagh by the fame of their professors was so great that in later times the city was divided into three wards, the "allullah", city called: the "Europe", the "Saxon", and the "Celtic". Had he lived four years more he would have seen the sun of Armagh's glory set in darkness and blood, when De Courcy, and De Burgo, and De Lacy, year after year, swooped down on the ancient city, plundered its shrines, and slaughtered or drove far away its students, its priests, and its professors. Once again Armagh was made desolate by ruthless bands, and that desolation was more complete and more enduring than the first. Let us hope, however, that the proud cathedral lately built on Macha's Height gives promise of a glorious future yet store in store for the ancient city of St. Patrick, and for its famous Schools.

ARMAGNAC. GEORGE'S D', A French cardinal and diplomatist, b. c. 1501; d. 2 June, 1585. He belonged to the illustrious family of Foix d'Armagnac. In his youth he was the protégé of Cardinal d'Amboise. The Duke of Alençon introduced him to Francis I, and in 1529 he was appointed Bishop of Rodez, was ambassador to Venice 1556-38, took part in the war between Francis I and Charles V, and distinguished himself by contributing to the emperor's retreat from the south of France (1538). In 1539 the king sent him as ambassador to Rome, where the cardinal's hat was bestowed upon him. In 1537-38 he was appointed lieutenant general of the king at Toulouse, together with Paul de Carrets, Bishop of Cahors. Eight years later he was raised to the Archbishorip of Toulouse, which he left in 1565, Pius IV having appointed him legate at Avignon, together with Cardinal de Bourbon. In this capacity Cardinal d'Armagnac defended the interests of the Church against the Huguenots and brought about a good understanding between the people of Avignon and those of Orange and Languedoc. The pope showed his approval of d'Armagnac's administration by promoting him to the Archbishorip of Avignon (1570). His great care for the Church, the extensive and austere virtues, and the protection which he granted to the arts and sciences place him in the first rank of the faithful servants of the Church in the sixteenth century.

JEAN LE BARR.

Armelino, Mariano, a Benedictine historian, b. in Rome (according to others, at Ancona) in 1657; d. at Foligno in 1737. At the age of twenty he entered the Benedictine order, in St. Paul's, Rom, and was sent to Monte Cassino to complete his studies. From 1687 to 1695 he taught philosophy at various monasteries of the Cassinese Congregation. From 1697 to 1722 he devoted himself to preaching and became famous throughout Italy for his Lenten sermons. In 1722 Pope Innocent XIII appointed him abbot of the monastery of St. Paul in Assisi, and in 1734, to the Monastery of St. Felician, near Foligno. He wrote the "Bibliotheca Benedictina-Cassinensis", a carefully compiled list and sketch of all the authors of the Cassinese Congregation, and a few other historical and hagiographical works concerning the Cassinese Congregation of Benedictines.

MICHAEL OTT.

Armenia, a mountainous region of Western Asia occupying a somewhat indefinite area to the southeast of the Black Sea. Although the name "Armenia" occurs twice in the Vulgate, the regular biblical designation of the country is "Ararat", a name which is doubtless identical with the "Ursartu" of the cuneiform inscriptions. Not being delimited by permanent natural boundaries, the territory covered by the term has varied in extent, from the union to the present day, and even as early as the time of the ancient Romans there was recognized a Lesser as well as a Greater Armenia, the former embracing a portion of Asia Minor. Politically Armenia has ceased to exist, having been partitioned between Turkey, Persia, and Russia, the largest share being possessed by Turkey. The mountainous area of about 120,000 square miles consists in the main of an elevated plateau traversed by several mountain ranges which run parallel to the Caucasian mountains on the north. A few of the principal peaks, the most noted of which is Ararat, the "holy mount" of the religions of Asia Minor, stand above the line of perpetual snow. Among the important rivers that take their rise in Armenia are the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Araxes. There are many lakes, chief among which are Lake Sevan and Lake Van. The latter is eighty miles in length and about twenty-eight miles in breadth, and is probably the "Upper Sea of the Nairi" mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions. The climate is severe, including the extremes of heat and cold. There are practically but two seasons, summer and winter, the latter lasting from October to March, and the transition from one to the other is abrupt. The peculiarities of the climate, among which may be noted a considerable degree of humidity, are due in part to the proximity of the Black Sea, partly to the high elevation of the region, and, of course, to the inhabited localities being from 5,000 to 8,000 feet above sea level. Scarcely any trees are to be found on the Armenian mountains, but those planted in the inhabited localities, which latter are successfully cultivated in the valleys and around Lake Van. Wheat, barley, hemp, cotton, and tobacco are also raised. Pre-eminent among the domestic animals are the horse and buffalo. The mountainous tracts yield excellent pasturage, and in consequence, the rearing of live stock is more extensively carried on than agriculture. On account of the various subjugations of the country the inhabitants of Armenia belong to different races. The native Armenians and Kurds form each about a quarter of the entire population; the Turkish and Turcoman elements constitute the major part of the remaining half, and Greeks, Jews, and Gypsies are scattered throughout the country. The Armenians themselves, of whom only about 1,000,000, or about one-half of the total number, live in Armenia, are a commercial people par excellence.

The Church in Armenia.—I. ANCIENT POLITICO-CONSTITUTION.—The name Armenia appears for the first time in the cuneiform inscriptions under the name of Artaxia. Much obscurity obtains as to the derivation of the word. Some would refer it back to the Vannian word Armatnisc, a stella, while others would connect it with Arman, a district lying to the south of Lake Van. Armenia is the name given to a mountainous strip of land situated in the southwestern portion of Asia. On one side it touches the Black Sea, on the other the Caspian, while on the north and on the south it is enclosed respectively by the Caucasus and the Taurus Mountains. Within its confines is the celebrated Lake Van. In shape it somewhat resembles a triangle. As a race the Armenians resemble the Persians as well as the Persians, the earliest inhabitants of Armenia were a white race, whose capital, Dhuspa, stood on the site of the present city of Van. An Arvan race replaced it and it is from this latter stock that the modern Armenians have sprung. They style their ancestors the Hait and make allusion to their country as Hizatan. They claim that the father of their race, Halk, was the son of Thorgumara, whom in Genesis we find to be the third son of Gomer. This belief has given rise to many beautiful legends. Be this as it may, it was about the end of the seventh or the beginning of the sixth century B. C. that this new race took possession of the country. In number and strength it was superior to its predecessor, but this new people also was subject to the Medes and the Persians. With the victory of Alexander the Great the Artaxians fell into Greek hands. The Seleucids of Syria, under whose control the land soon passed, allowed it the choice of its rulers. In 190 B. C. the Romans threw Antiochus the Great, Artaxias and Zariadis, who were then ruling the land, declared themselves kings, the former in Armenia proper, the latter in Sophene. Thus began the national dynasty of the Arsacides, which became famous under Tigranes the Great. Later the Roman and the Parthian successively reigned over the country, which soon chose as its rulers Tiridates, the brother of the Parthian king. When the Arsacides lost the Persian throne to the Sassanians (A. D. 226) Armenia declared itself against the new house and there ensued a bloody conflict between the two countries, which lasted for several centuries.

II. CONVERSION TO CHRISTIANITY.—The nature and characteristics of the paganism which preceded Christianity in Armenia are practically unknown to us. Attempts have been made to identify its gods with those of Greece, but all we know are the names and the sanctuaries of its pagan deities. Obscurity likewise shrouds the beginnings of Christianity in the country. Native historians of a rather late period would have us believe that several of the Apostles preached in Armenia, and that some of them, as St. Bartholomew and St. Thaddeus, died there. A popular legend ascribes to them the latter the eastern limits of the land. Although the very ancient writers of the country, such as Korioun, Agathangelus, etc., do not even mention the name of Thaddeus, yet the legend, which apparently came at a late period from a Greek source, has so prevailed that even to-day the head of the Armenian Church claims to be occupying the “throne of St. Thaddeus”. Although legendary, this tradition witnesses that Christianity at a rather early date passed from Syria over into Armenia.

The letter of Meruzan to Demetrios of Alexandria (A.D. 248-265) confirms us in the belief that Christianity had already penetrated into Armenia before the time of St. Gregory the Illuminator. However, it is around St. Gregory that the story of Christianity’s growth in Armenia centres; for in him Armenia had its first-born of the royal blood of the Arsacides, and brought in early infancy to Cæsarea of Cappadocia because of a Persian persecution of the Armenians, he was there instructed in the Christian Faith. About 261 he returned to Armenia and after much persecution brought the king and a large number of people to faith. Gregory was subsequently consecrated Metropolitan of Armenia (according to Cardinal Hegenrother) in 302, by Leontius, Archbishop of Cæsarea, he took up his residence at Aghtchut. Under his influence the Faith began to spread throughout the land. Priests from the Greek Empire aided him in the work of conversion. When Christian asceticism had a good hold in the country, the metropolitan turned his attention to the organization of the Church. The national language replaced the Syriac in the liturgy. To win over the converted pagan priests more fully, he chose from their sons, after educating them, the occupants of a dozen episcopal seats consecrated by him. Several dignities were given to the sacerdotal families, which retained them for some time. The office of catholics or patriarch was for a considerable period confined to the family of St. Gregory. A beautiful legend, lacking, however, a historic basis, tells of a trip by him to Rome. His missionaries went as far north as Georgia and Albania.

In 311 Maximinus began war on the struggling Church of Armenia, but met with many repulses. About this time St. Gregory passed away, having spent the last years of his life in solitude. After his death we find the progress of the infant Church stayed by internal dissensions. At the time apostates were numerous, and in their eagerness to subjugate the country the Persians lent every encouragement to perversion. Meanwhile, successors filled the office of metropolitan once held by St. Gregory. His youngest son, Aristaces, took the post of his father and the Church of Armenia rose to new heights. In 372 the Armenian episcopate took an active part in the affairs of the Christian world. St. Basil of Cæsarea visited a great part of Armenia and corrected many abuses. Led on by his example, the Catholicoi Nerses in the Synod of Aghtchut (c. 365), the first authentic Armenian synod, laid the foundations of the first hospitals and other charitable institutions for the country. He gave an impetus to monastic life and promulgated numerous laws on marriage and the observance of fasts. These reforms, showing a Greek influence, arrayed against the catholicoi the king and the nobles, and thus we may reasonably conclude that independence and intolerance of foreign influence which is so important a factor in the history of the Armenian Church. An anticatholicos was appointed by the king, and soon Nerses died a violent death. Then a fierce anti-religious reaction set in. State endowments were in part withdrawn. Numbers of the clergy fell away, and charitable institutions were allowed to crumble to ruins. Pagan practices came into use everywhere and the Christianity of but a few years before seemed to have died out. The vacant see of the catholicoi was filled by the king, and the coveted position went to Iousik, of St. Gregory. St. Basil clamoured for the rights of his Cæsarean see, but, though supported by the older clergy of Armenia, his claims were not allowed, and the consecration of the Armenian catholicoi was thus lost forever to the Church of Cæsarea.

The religion of the Armenian Church was thus begun. Shortly after this event occurred the death of Manuel the Mamikonian, which was the signal for Rome and Persia to divide Armenia between them. Of the country, which both had lost and reconquered, and were now parceling out (387) four-fifths went to Persia. As a consequence, persecution was immediately roused against the Christian Church, and the Christians were forced to take to the mountains. The man of the hour for the Christian cause was the catholicoi, Isaac the Great, the son of Nerses. About him rallied all parties. Even during his exile the people remained attached to him. Consequently the Armenian Church flourished in spite of difficulties, ecclesiastical discipline was enforced, and the intellectual standard of the people raised. His death in 439 was a great loss to the cause of Christianity in Armenia. The Persian masters continued to leave no stone unturned to stifle Christianity and to replace it by Nestorianism. The Armenian, however, remained constant in the face of persecution. Another foe attacked them, and that was heresy. Gnosticism in the second century and Paulicianism in the sixth and seventh centuries had adherents among the Armenians, but the chief heresies to be mentioned in the Armenian church at this time were Monophysitism and Nestorianism. The works of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Diodorus of Tarsus, which were filled with Nestorian ideas, were translated into Armenian, and through them endeavours were made to disseminate the teachings of Nestorius. Rabulas of Edessa and Acacius warned the bishops against these writings. A synod was held and two priests were despatched to Constantinople to ask of Proclus what was the right position in the matter. In reply came the famous “Document for the Armenians” which was held in high honour by the Armenian ecclesiastical authorities, and which exerted a powerful influence on their theology. Henceforth the Armenians were bitter opponents of Nestorianism. But where Nestorianism failed, Monophysitism succeeded. The Council of Chalcedon, which condemned that error, was held while the Armenians were fighting against the Persians’ endeavour to crush out Christianity. As soon as they heard of the Council of Chalcedon, it had taken place; opposition arose against it, and the charge of the Monophysites that Chalcedon had but renewed the Nestorian error was readily believed. Monophysitism was accepted, and the decrees of Chalcedon rejected. The attitude of the Armenians in this entire matter was dictated not so much by a love of orthodoxy as by the desire of promoting the welfare of their country; for, by receiving Monophysitism, they hoped that Greek favour would be gained and Persian domination more easily thrown off. Writings were published in Armenia against Chalcedon and appealing, urged a return to the primitive Church of the East. The Catholicoi of the Synod of Vagharshapat (491) solemnly condemned in the presence of the Armenian, Iberian, and Albanian bishops the Council of Chalcedon. Within half a century, this condemnation was reaffirmed by the two Councils of Tvin, the second of which was held in 552, and fifth, in July 562, the beginning of the Armenian era. The Greeks, having returned to orthodoxy, tried several times to lead back the Armenians also from Monophysitism. In 571 the Catholicoi John went with part of his clergy to Constantinople, where he died, after making an act of fidelity to this orthodoxy. This had no effect on Armenian thought. In 591 the Greek emperor Maurice, having taken most of Armenia from the Persians, invited the Catholicoi, Moses I, to convoy to Constantinople the bishops and nobles of Armenia, his request met with a refusal. Then the emperor had the Armenian bishops in the Roman territory assemble and recognize the Council of Chalcedon. He chose for the office of patriarch a bishop named John, with residence at Avan. Thus in 593 the Armenian Church found itself divided into two sections. Soon after the Iberians fell away, with the Catholicos Koursor at their head, recognizing Monophysitism and the authority of the Armenian patriarch. For a time the Albanians also declared themselves independent, but soon came back. When Heraclius had conquered the country and thus deprived the Persians of their control for the second time (629), he obtained from the Catholicos Exz the consent of Nestorius, and there was no mention being made of Chalcedon. The union with the Greeks thus effected lasted during the lifetime of Heraclius. But in the Synod of Tvin (645) Chalcedon was again condemned. Meanwhile, the Arabs had attacked the country, which fell, an easy victim, before them, and so Armenia, which once had its own rulers and was at other times under Persian and Byzantine control, passed into the power of the Caliphs.

III. LITERATURE, EARLY, MEDIEVAL, AND MODERN.—Of the literature of pagan Armenia only a few works come down to us. The foundation of what we know as Armenian literature must therefore be sought in Christian times. Very rich in itself, Christian Armenian literature dates from the invention of the national alphabet by Mesrob. In these first years of the fifth century were composed some of the apocryphal works which, like the "Discourses" attributed to St. Gregory and the "History of Armenia" said to have come from Agathangelus, are asserted to be the works of these and other well-known men. Connected with early Armenian literature are the names of such illustrious persons as Isaac the Great and Mesrob, by whom an impetus was given to the literature of the country. They translated the Bible from a Syriac version and revised their translation by means of the Septuagint of the Hexapla, and the Greek text of the New Testament. There followed various other translations which for the most part are of great importance, since the originals of many have been lost. Of these we mention the "Homilies" of St. John Chrysostom, two works of Philo on "Providence," together with some of his Biblical commentaries, the "Chronicle" of Eusebius, and the works of St. Euphem. This early period of Armenian literature also produced original compositions. Esnik of Kon, and especially the invention of "rules" and the "Bible" and "History of the Life of St. Mesrob and of the Beginnings of Armenian Literature". These men, both of whom were disciples of Mesrob, bring to an end what may be called the golden age of Armenian literature.

The medieval period opens with comparative sterility. The first name of importance is met with in the eighth century, that of John Otznati, surnamed the "Philosopher". A "Discourse against the Paulicians", a "Synodal Discourse", and a collection of the canons of the councils and the Fathers anterior to his day, are the principal works of his now, but the apocryphal translations of the works of several of the Fathers, particularly of Sts. Gregory of Nyssa and Cyril of Alexandria, from the pen of Stephen, Bishop of Siounik. It was two centuries later that the celebrated "History of Armenia" by the Catholicos John VI Vartane, written from the origin of the nation to the year A.D. 925. A contemporary of his, Ananias of Mok, an abbot and the most celebrated theologian of the time, composed a treatise against the Thondrakians, a sect imbued with Manicheism. The name of Choerov, Bishop of Andsevatsents, is honoured because of his interesting commentaries on the Breviary and the Mass-Prayers. Gregory of Narek, his son, is the Armenian Finard from whose pen came elegies, odes, panegyrics, and homilies. Stephen Asoghik, whose "Universal History" reaches down to A.D. 1004, and Gregory Magistros, whose long poem on the Old Testament, "The Days," displays at their head, remains probably the last writers worthy of mention in this period.

The modern period of Armenian literature can be well dated from the Renaissance of letters among the Armenians in the twelfth century. The Catholicos Nerses, surnamed the Gracious, is the most brilliant author in the beginning of this period. Besides his poetic works, where he was called the "Taker of Edessa", there are prose works including a "Pastoral Letter", a "Synodal Discourse", and his "Letters". This age gave us also a commentary on St. Luke and one on the Catholic Epistles. Of note, too, is the Synodal Discourse of Nerses of Lampron, Archbishop of Tarsus, delivered at the Council of Hromela in 1179, which is anti-Monophysite in tone. The thirteenth century gave birth to Vartan the Great, whose talents were those of a poet, an exegete, and a theologian, and whose "Universal History" is extensive in the field it covers. Gregory the Preaching, who wrote the "Tent of Jerusalem", and Gregory Nerses, who wrote the "Tent of Edessa", are the last hymn writers of note. Of the fourteenth century the "Tent of Edessa" is a notable work on the history of the Armenians. In the fifteenth century the church was given a new impetus by the work of St. Gregory Nerses of Lampron, who wrote a "History of the Lives of the Fathers" and the "History of the Monastery of the Holy Cross of the Cross". The sixteenth century saw Armenia in the hands of Persia, and a check was for the first time put on literature. However, in scattering the Armenians to all parts of Europe, the Persian invasion had its good effects. They established printing shops in Venice and Rome, and in the following century (the seventeenth) in Lemberg, Milan, Paris, and elsewhere. New works were republished and new ones given forth. The Mechitarists of Venice have been the leaders in this movement; but their publications, although numerous, have been often uncritical. Their brothers, the Mechitarists of Vienna, have been likewise active in this work and it is to their society that Balgy and Catergon belong, two well-known writers on Armenian topics. Russia, Constantinople and Etchmiadzin are the other centres of Armenian literary efforts and the last-named place is especially worthy of note. Indeed it is so rich in岗学, and scientific methods and taste. Looking back over the field of Armenian literature, we note a trait of the national character displayed in the bent the Armenians have had for singing the glories of their land in history and chronicles. Translations have ever been an important part of Armenian literature. In this connection, the standards of religion and science seem to be written rather for its doctrines than for the facts themselves. A last feature is that the golden age came early and with the passing of centuries the Armenian writers grew fewer and fewer.

IV. THE CRUSADES.—Although the native dynasty of the Bagratides, to which the Arabs gave the royal crown of Armenia, was founded under favourable circumstances, yet the feudal system by gradually weakening the country, brought about its ruin. Thus internally enfeebled, Armenia proved an easy victim for the Seljuk Turks under Alp-Aralan, the latter half of the eleventh century. Thus after death or servitude at the hands of those who had assassinated his relative, Kakig II, King of Ani, an Armenian named Rupen with some of his countrymen went into the gorges of the Taurus Mountains and then into Tarsus of Cilicia. Here the Byzantine governor took them as prisoners, and the members of the First Crusade appeared in Asia Minor. Hostile as they were to the Turks, and unfriendly to the Greeks, these Armenian refugees joined forces with the crusaders. Valiantly they fought with the Christians of Europe, and for their reward, when Antioch had been taken (1097), Constantine, the son of Roupen, received from the crusaders the title of baron. Within a century, the heirs of Roupen were further rewarded by the grant of a kingdom known as Cilicia or Lesser Armenia, to be held as a vassal government of the Holy See and of Germany. This kept them in touch with the crusader states with which the Armenian states have sided in the contest of the other crusades. This kingdom lasted till 1375, when the Mamelukes of Egypt destroyed it.

V. To the End of the Seventeenth Century.

—The establishment of the Kingdom of Lesser Armenia created more frequent relations between the Armenian people and the Holy See. On the occasion of the crowning of King Leo II, the union of the Armenian Church with Rome was proclaimed under Catholicoi Gregory VI. Only southern Armenia was affected by this. In 1251, however, there took place at Six at the order of Pope Innocent IV a council of Armenians to witness to their belief in the procession of the Holy Ghost. In strange contrast we find James I refusing to send representatives to the Council of Lyons. Yet, when Pope Boniface VIII began his pontificate, Catholicoi Gregory VII sent to him an expression of filial attachment. A little later (1267) a council was held by the Armenians over the East, repudiated the old union, and repudiated, and two natures acknowledged in Christ. The bonds of union which united Rome and Armenia during this period gave way more or less after the fall of Lesser Armenia in 1375. Harassed from without, by the Turks, and weakened by the internal strife that divided it into so many independent patriarchates, Armenia had after that date but spasmodic relations with Rome. Which of the patriarchs during this period remained united to the West is hard to determine. Yet, even in the darkest days, there were always some Armenians who remained attached to Rome. The Dominican missionaries in founding houses in Armenian territory were instrumental in the training of native missionaries called the “United Brothers”, whose sole aim was to procure union with Rome. Their founder, John of Kermi, went too far in his zeal, so that Pope Benedict XII was forced to have the Armenian excommunicated in council and the errors ascribed to these monks. These cries of unorthodoxy did much to estrange Armenia from the West. The Fathers of the Council of Basle (1433) asked the catholics to attend, but the invitation was not accepted. However, in the Council of Ferrara-Florence, the Armenians, not having a last attempt was made to bring about reunion. It was at the behest of Eugenius IV that Catholicoi Constantine V had despatched his delegates. The decree “Exultate Deo”, which was to effect the union, was published in 1439, containing among other things the Nicene Creed, the definitions of Chalcedon, and the Leitourgia of Pope Leo I. Meanwhile, Constantin died. A few years later a rent occurred in the Armenian Church which gave a setback to the plan of union. Armenia was divided into two large jurisdictions, that of Cilicia and that of Etchmiadzin in Greater Armenia, each with its own catholics. The latter of the two patriarchates was looked upon as devoted to the cause of union with Rome. Its Catholicoi, Stephen V, paid a visit to the Eternal City, and in 1650 Aghob IV, just before his death, made a profession of Catholic faith, an example followed by many of his successors. Some of the patriarchs were friends of Rome, such as Gregory IX, while others were hostile.

VI. Catholic Missions in the Nineteenth Century.

—The action of Count Ferriol, minister of Louis XIV at Stamboul (1689—1709), in carrying off to Paris the Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople, who evinced strong anti-Catholic tendencies, served to bring persecution upon the Armenian Catholics in the Turkish Empire, which lasted till 1830. The declaration of religious liberty at that time caused the Catholic missions in Armenia to become more energetic than ever before. In 1838, Eugène Boré, still a layman, founded at Tibriz and Isphahan two schools for Armenians, which the French missionaries have conducted. Within twenty years this order had three other missions. The barefooted Carmelites with Bagdad as their centre are labouring for the Armenians in that city and Bassorah. Since 1856 the French Dominicans have been active in the provinces of Mossoul, Bittis, and Hamah, in which territories they are also working with the French missionaries and are working with Diarbekir as their headquarters. Lesser Armenia is a field cultivated chiefly by Jesuit missionaries, and, unlike the rest, since their efforts are confined to the Armenians. The Oltre-Sisters of the Assumption and the Sisters of St. Joseph from Lyons are effectively assisting them in their work, in which some 31 Fathers and Brothers are engaged.

When we come to statistics, we find that out of a population of 2,000,000 Armenians comprising from two to three millions, approximate figures give to Protestantism 40,000 to 50,000, to Catholicism 60,000 to 80,000, the rest remaining Orthodox. The greatest number of the Catholic Armenians is found in Constantinople. Of the Catholic Armenians, the greater part are under the patriarchate, whose full title is “the Patriarch of Cilicia of the Armenians”, and whose residence is at Constantinople. Under his jurisdiction are 3 other Armenian archbishops, 12 bishops, 1 being at Alexandria in Egypt, 9 patriarchal vicars, one of whom resides at Jerusalem. In Rome there is a titular bishop for the Armenians, whose chief function is that of ordaining. The Armenian patriarch is assisted in the work of tending to his flock by a vicar who is a titular archbishop, by an electoral council or an assembly of 12 priests, by a civil council and by two other councils, one of which is for the national hospitals. Directly under his charge are 3 large churches, that of St. Gregory the Illuminator at Leghorn, those of St. Blaise and St. Nicholas at Rome, the 2 seminaries of Zmar and Rome, and finally the 16 churches and the 16 schools for Armenians, which the French in the Armenian Archdiocese of Lemberg there are about 5,500 faithful, the greater part being in Galicia, the rest in Bukowina. The religious orders among the Armenians are of but comparatively recent origin and are not very prosperous. The Mechitarists of Vienna, the most flourishing, have about 100 members and some lay-brothers. The Mechitarists of Vienna are not quite so numerous. Among the women, the Armenian Sisters of the Immaculate Conception have flourishing schools at Constantinople and Angora.
tolicae Sedem" (26 November, 1853), the city became a diocese. The first bishop was Johann Alexi (1854–65); he was succeeded by Johann Venceslav (1855–58), Pavel (1872–79), and Johann Szabó, appointed in 1879 (b. 16 August, 1836). The diocese of Armeniastadt contains about 683,300 inhabitants; 332,900 Catholics of the Greek-Romanian Rite, 41,100 of the Latin Rite, and 1,600 of the Armenian Rite. It has one cathedral, six canonicates, four titular abbeys, one formal provostship, forty-five deaneries, 490 mother-churches, 391 dependent churches (Filialkirchen), one monastery with four monks (Basilian Order, in Biskád), 475 pastors, 25 church-club rectorates, 17 apostolic faculties, and 64 clerics. The bishop directs a diocesan academy with seven professors, one teachers' training college, with four professors, one Armenian-Catholic Ober-Gymnasium, and about 600 public schools, with 38,900 pupils. The cathedral and the episcopal residence, architecturally speaking, are insignificant, a far more imposing building being the principal Armenian-Catholic church, built in 1792.

Arménia, Fray Nicolás, Bishop of La Paz (capital of Bolivia, South America), appointed 22 October, 1901; b. at Benedo, diocese of Vitoria, Spain, 5 December, 1845. He was a Minorite and came to America to make mission journeys under the guidance of Father Rafael Sans, and followed the footsteps of that pioneer in the forests and on the river courses of the Beni region. He had, previous to his coming to South America, spent several years in France, and brought to the mission field, besides devotion to apostolic duties, a solid fund of knowledge in physics, astronomy, and natural science. The savage and cannibal tribes lurking in the fastnesses of the Beni region were numerous, but often hostile, and had for years been cruelly decimated by epidemic disease (smallpox). To reach them he cut his way through almost impenetrable woods from one abandoned hamlet to another, exposed to the most appalling hardships from hunger, climate, and disease. He taught and preached wherever and whenever he fell in with Indians, establishing and re-establishing missions; in this way he gathered materials for the geography, natural history, and anthropology of the unknown regions. It cost him much labour to have these afterwards published, and his valuable books are, unfortunately, extremely rare at present. His principal publications are: "Diario del Viaje al Madre de Dios, hecho por el P. Fray Nicolás Armentia, en el año de mil ochocientos ochenta y cuatro y mil ochocientos ochenta y cinco, en calidad de comisionado para explorar el Madre de Dios" etc.; usually bound with "Navegación del Madre de Dios" (La Paz, 1887); and "Descripción de la Provincia de los Mojos, en el Reino del Perú" (La Paz, 1888)—the latter is a Spanish translation of the book of the Jesuit Franz Xaver Eber, "Descubrimiento Provincia Moxitarum" (Buda, 1791). "Vocabulario del Idioma Shipibo del Ucayali" appeared in "Boletín de la Sociedad geográfica de La Paz", I, No. 1. This is thus far the most complete vocabulary of any of the Pano stock (see Arawaks), and embraces more than 3,800 words. "Los Indios Mosetenes y su lengua" was published at Buenos Aires, 1905.

Aside from personal recollections of the writer, gathered during years of intercourse with this people, there is a short biographical notice of Fray Guadalupe, in Toce's "El vocabulario etc." (La Plata, 1902), with portraits. The works cited in the text contain many scattered notices of the eventful career of the eminent missionary.

Armidale, The Diocese of, situated in New South Wales (Australia), with its cathedral at Armidale, 335 miles north of Sydney. It is one of the six suffragan sees of the province of Sydney. Its boundary on the north is the Queensland border, on the east, the Diocese of Lismore, on the west, the Diocese of Wilcannia, ten miles beyond Walgett, and on the south, the Dioceses of Maitland and Bathurst. Area of Armidale Diocese, about 85,000 square miles. Armidale was not proclaimed a municipality till 1863. Ten years before that date (in 1853) the Rev. Dr. Timothy Leitch, who was the first resident priest. It was then a sparsely populated agricultural and pastoral district, where Catholics were few and far apart. Father McCarthy made Armidale his head-quarters; and (says Cardinal Moran) "his missionary district embraced all the territory north of Walgett as far north as the pastoral border, and to the Pacific Ocean. His periodical excursions lasted for three months. From the Tweed to the Richmond, thence to the Clarence and on to Walcha, then across the Liverpool Plains to the Gwydir, and back by way of Glen Innes and Tenterfield to Armidale. Such was the route which he traversed in the discharge of his ordinary duties." He was afterwards transferred to the Carcoar district at a time when it was "in a ferment from the violence and lawlessness of the bushrangers. He rendered a great service alike to the State and to those unhappy outlaws, many of whom he succeeded in withdrawing from their life of crime and compelled to settle in Ireland in 1879. Till 1864 all New South Wales was under the spiritual charge of the Bishop of Sydney. In that and the following years were created the present Dioceses of Goulburn (1864), Bathurst (1865), and Maitland (1867). Armidale (says Cardinal Moran) "was also marked out for an episcopal see", but it was not till 1869 that its first Bishop, the Right Rev. Timothy O'Mahony, was appointed. Till 1887 the diocese had a vast and unwieldy area, and at the time that the new Bishop entered into possession it had no railroad running through it, "and even the ordinary roads were few. The first cathedral was a little wooden church, 82 feet by 18, replaced by a brick and stone structure, opened in 1872, and measuring 102 feet by 32. Bishop O'Mahony's stay in Armidale was embittered by grave accusations that were fomented by a false clerical friend and given to the press and public by open enemies. He resigned his see in 1879 and was appointed auxiliary bishop to the Archbishop of Toronto, where he died in 1892. He was succeeded by the Right Rev. Elzevir Torreggiani (1879–1904), an Italian Capuchin who had been on the mission in England and Wales. In Australia, as in Great Britain and Italy Dr. Torreggiani was in the habit of his order. His first visitation of his straggling and difficult diocese occupied three years. The coast district was, in 1887, erected into the Diocese of Grafton (now known as the Diocese of Lismore). A portion of the Maitland diocese was at the same time added to that of Armidale. Dr. Torreggiani died, 28 January, 1904. E. F. McRae succeeded by the Right Rev. Patrick Joseph O'Connor, who had been his coadjutor from 3 May, 1903.

Statistics (towards the close of 1905).—Parochial districts, 15; churches, 52; secular priests, 22; regulars, 2; nuns, 144; secular teachers, 4; boarding schools for girls, 4; primary schools, 19; children in Catholic schools, 2,510; Catholic population, 25,540.

Arminianism, the popular designation of the doctrines held by a party formed in the early days of the seventeenth century among the Calvinists of the Netherlands. The tendency of the human reason to revolt against Calvin's "decretum horribile" of predetermination absolute and salvation and damnation meted out without regard to merit or demerit had aroused opposition in thinking minds from the first promulgation of the dogma; but whilst the fanatic religious wars of religion engrossed the attention of the masses, thinking minds were few and uninfluential. Calvin's reach, he banished them and the fearful natures of his followers and had everywhere aroused a fierce spirit of strife and bloodshed. It threw on paradoxes. This unnatural spirit could not survive a period of calm deliberation; a leader was sure to rise from the Calvinistic ranks who should point out the baneful corollaries of the Genevan creed, and be listened to. Such a leader was Jacobus Arminius (Jakob Hermansoon), professor at the University of Leyden. He was born at Oudewater, South Holland, in 1560. While still an infant he lost his father, a cutler by trade, but through the generosity of strangers he was enabled to perfect his education at various universities at home and in foreign parts. In his twenty-second year the brilliant youth, whose talents were universally acknowledged, was sent to Geneva at the expense of the merchants' guild of Amsterdam, in order to imbibe genuine Calvinism at the feet of Beza. In 1586 he began a trip to Italy, which was to widen his mental horizon. Rumours beginning to spread that he had fallen under the influence of the Jesuits, Suarez and Bellarmin, he was recalled to Amsterdam, was pronounced orthodox, and appointed preacher of the reformed congregation. This office he filled with ever increasing renown for fifteen years. He had all the qualifications of a great pulpit orator—a sonorous voice, a magnificent presence, and a thorough knowledge of Scripture, which he expounded in a clear and pleasing manner, dwelling with predilection on its ethical features and avoiding the polemical asperities characteristic of the school. Yet his later years were spent in being emblazoned by polemical strife. The revolt against predestination absolute was taking shape. A professor at Leyden had already pronounced Calvin's God "a tyrant and an executioner". The learned layman Koonhert, in spite of ecclesiastical censure, continued to inveigh successfully against the dominant religion of Holland; and he had converted two ministers of Delft who had been chosen to argue him into submission, from the supralapserian to the infralapserian position. (See CALVINISM.) The task of confounding the "heretic" was now entrusted to the disciple of Beza. Arminius advanced not a word, but simply made Calvinism repugnant to all the instincts of his soul. More and more clearly, as time went on, his writings and sermons taught the doctrines since associated with his name and after his death embodied by his disciples in the famous five propositions of the "Remonstrants". For the sake of reference we give the substance of the "Remonstrants" as condensed by Professor Blok in his "History of the People of the Netherlands" (III, ch. xiv).

"They (the Remonstrants) declared themselves opposed to the following doctrine: (1) Predestination in its extreme form; (2) God's power to make men good or bad for their own interest; (3) He had judged men and to eternal bliss, others to eternal damnation, without any other law than His own pleasure. On the contrary, they thought that God by the same resolution wished to make all believers in Christ who put faith to God and His works and for His sake would only condemn the unconverted and unbelieving. (2) The doctrine of election according to which the chosen were counted as necessary and unconditionally blessed and the outcasts necessarily and unavoidably lost. They urged the milder doctrine that Christ had died for all men, and that believers were only chosen in so far as they enjoyed the forgiveness of sins. (3) The doctrine that Christ died for the elect alone to make them blessed and no one else, ordained as mediator; on the contrary, they urged the possibility of salvation for others not elect. (4) The doctrine that the grace of God affects only those who have believed, and mediante these Grace "probates cannot participate in this through their conversion, but only through their own strength. On the other hand, they, the 'Remonstrants', a name they received later from this, their 'Remonstrances', hold that man 'has no saving belief in himself, nor out of the force of his free-will', if he lives in sin, but that it is necessary that he be born again from God in Christ by means of His Holy Spirit, and renewed in understanding and affection, or will and all strength', since without grace man cannot resist sin, although he cannot be counted as irreparable to grace. (5) The doctrine that he who had once attained true saving grace can never lose it and be wholly debased. They held, on the contrary, that whoever had received Christ's quickening spirit had thereby a strong weapon against Satan, sin, the world, and his own flesh, although they would not decide at the time without further investigation—whether it was they had adopted this too, whether he could not lose this power 'for taking the beginning of his being, Christ.'"

The ultra-Calvinists responded by drafting a "Contra-Remonstrantie" in the following seven articles: (1) God had, after Adam's fall, reserved a certain number of human beings from destruction, and, in His eternal and unchangeable counsel, destined them to salvation through Christ, leaving the others alone in accordance with His righteous judgment. (2) The elect are not only the good Christians who are adult, but also the "children of the covenant as long as they do not prove the contrary". (3) The judgment of their sins by their actions is not to be emblazoned by polemical strife. The revolt against predestination absolute was taking shape. A professor at Leyden had already pronounced Calvin's God "a tyrant and an executioner". The learned layman Koonhert, in spite of ecclesiastical censure, continued to inveigh successfully against the dominant religion of Holland; and he had converted two ministers of Delft who had been chosen to argue him into submission, from the supralapserian to the infralapserian position. Arnauld, Arnaut, or Arnauld, a celebrated family, the history of which is intimately connected with that of Jansenism and of Port-Royal. Though originally of Auvergne, the family fixed its seat, about the middle of the sixteenth century, in Paris, where several members distinguished themselves at the Bar. Antoine Arnauld (1560–1619) was a famous lawyer in the Assembly of Paris, and a Counsellor of the French Parliament. In 1692, during the reign of Louis XIV, he was appointed a Commissioner for the suppression of Jansenism.

Then Pascal came to his friend's assistance and wrote, under the pseudonym of Montalte, his "Provincial Letters". The first four took up Arnauld's quarrel with Jansenism; they denounced Jansen's attacks on the moral code of the Jesuite; and the last three reviewed the questions of Jansenism, and particularly the distinction between law and fact. But the Assembly of the Clergy, in 1669, asserted the Church's right of passing infallible judgment on dogmatic facts as well as faith, and the same year Arnauld and Father Azémat published "Défense des nouveaux chrétiens et des missionnaires de la Chine, du Japon et des Indes" (1667). Arnauld thereupon constituted himself the champion of de Pontchâteau's works and published between 1690 and 1693 five additional books. He was working on the sixth, "La Calomnie", at the time of his death. This work is biased and full of prejudice. He retails without reserve or moderation, and with evident malice, all the differences and quarrels which had arisen among men of good faith, or between religious communities engaged in the same work without having the limits of the questions clearly defined. According to Arnauld the Jesuits were always in the wrong, and he relates with calm credulity everything that the ill will of their enemies had attributed to them, without concerning himself as to the truth of these statements. Malebranche, the Oratorian, differed with him on the subject of providence, and expressed his displeasure in his "Naturae et de la Grâce". Arnauld attempted to stop its publication, and, failing, he opened a campaign against Malebranche (1683). Without attempting to refute the treatise, he took up the opinion that "we see all in God", laid down by the philosopher in a preceding work, "Recherche de la vérité" and attacked it in "Des vraies et des fausses idées". Malebranche objected to this shifting of the question, claiming that to bring before the public a purely metaphysical problem to be refuted and confounded with all the weapons of ridicule was unworthy of a great mind. Arnauld now showed no moderation whatever, even going to the point of attributing to Malebranche opinions which he had never held. His "Philosophical and Theological Reflections" on the "Traité de la Nature et de la Grâce" (1685) scored a triumph for the Jansenist party, but it lessened his own prestige. Malebranche's death in 1751 had the effect of increasing Arnauld's standing more than one bitter line directed against his antagonist, and he confessed himself "weary of furnishing the world a spectacle, and having the "Journal des Savants" filled with their respective platitudes". Nevertheless the quarrel ended only with the death of Arnauld. Jansenism had not been forgotten, and Arnauld was to the last its zealous, untiring champion. It is impossible to enumerate all his writings in its defence. The majority were anonymous, so that they might reach France more easily. His "New Defence of the Mon's New Testament"—a work which had been objectionable from Paris, and the most violent of all his works. We may also mention the "Phantôme du Jansénisme" (1686), from which the author hoped great results for his sect. He proposed in this work to justify the so-called Jansenists by showing Jansenism to be nothing but a phantom, as there is no one in the Church who holds any of the five condemned propositions, and he proceeds to discuss whether or not these propositions have been taught by Jansenius. On this last point Arnauld was always immovable, constantly inventing new subterfuges to prevent himself from seeing the truth. Sainte-Beuve was not wrong in writing (Fort Royal, p. 11, viii) that he is more into the things that the pope says than the popes what they think and define as the favourite thesis of the Jansenists, beginning with Arnauld. In 1700 the Assembly of the Clergy of France condemned this proposition: "Jansenism is a phantom", as false, scandalous, rash, injurious to the French Clergy, to the Sovereign Pontiff, to the Universal Church"; as "schematical, and favouring the condemned errors". Arnauld died at Brussels, at the age of eighty-three. Nicolàis had, by revising his writings, kept him for a time within the bounds of moderation, but when Nicolàis was replaced by Father Quensel of the Oratory, Arnauld allowed himself all the extremes of language, and his passion for polemics was given full scope. He died in the arms of Quensel, who administered the Viaticum and the Viaticum, though he had no power to do so. He was interred privately, and his heart taken to Port-Royal. Boileau, Racine, and Santeuil composed for him epitaphs which have become famous. Arnauld's works are classed under five heads: on belles-lettres and philosophy; on grace; controversial works against Protestants; those against the Jesuit; on Holy Scripture. The mass of his writings is enormous, and seldom read to-day. There is no pretence at style. He was a learned man and a subtle logician, but he entirely ignored the art of persuading and pleasing, and his erroneous teachings mar his best pages. His "Grammaire de la langue française", and "Logique" are the works most easily read.

II. JACQUELINE-MARIE-ANGÉLIQUE ARNAULD, sister of the preceding, b. 1591, d. 6 August, 1661, was the third of the twenty children of Antoine Arnauld. While still a child she showed great keenness of intellect and wonderful endowments in mind, will, and character. To please her grandfather Marion, the advocate, she consented to become a religious, but only on condition that she be made abbess. At the age of eight (1599) she took the habit of a Benedictine novice at the monastery of Saint-Antoine in Paris. She was transferred (1618) to the Abbey of Maubuisson, ruled by Angélique d'Estrees, sister of the beautiful Gabrielle d'Estrees, mistress of Henry IV. The child was brought up in liberty, luxury, and ignorance, and was left entirely to her own impetuous and fantastic impulses. At Confirmation she took the name Angélique, in compliment to the abbess, and gave up that of Jacqueline, which she had hitherto borne. A reprehensible fraud of the Arnauldins obtained from Rome abbatial bulls for Angélique, then eleven years of age. She was named coadjutrix to the Abbess of Port-Royal (1602) and continued to live, as she had lived before, without serious duties, but abounding in favour. Her days were taken up with walks, prose reading, and visits outside the monastery, all of which could not prevent a deadly ennui which nothing could dispel. "Instead of praying", she tells us, "I set myself to read novels and Roman history". She felt drawn by no call. Too proud to retract her steps, at the age of seventeen she confirmed the promise made at eight and, "bursting with spite", signed a formula her father placed before her, which was to forge on her forever the heavy chain of a vocation imposed on her. A sermon preached by a visiting Friar at the Abbaye de Port-Royal (1608) was the occasion of her conversion. She resolved to change her mode of life at once, and to effect a reform in her monastery. She began with herself, and determined, despite every obstacle, to follow the rules of her order in all their rigour. She had infinite trouble in encompassing the Abbess of Port-Royal, (1611), who was the successor of the Abbé de Saint-Yves, such was the steadfastness of the young abbess that she closed the doors of the monastery to her own father and brothers despite their indignant protests. This was the "day of the grating" which remained famous in the annals of Jansenism. After the reform of Port-Royal, Mère Angélique undertook to recall to the path of regularity the abbess from Paris, where scandals were frequent. Angélique d'Estrees, the abbess, led such a life that her sister Gabrielle reproached her as being "the disgrace of our house". It is impossible to tell in a few lines what patience, courage, and gentle, persistent firmness were necessary to bring about this reform. Mère Angélique had accurately judged and sustained this reform by St. Francis de Sales. She even thought of abandoning the crosier to enter the Visitation Order, which the saint had just founded. She was one of those characters, however, who yield before those they consider superior, but stand firm and immovable in the face of others. The saint saw that his daughter had sufficiently divided her father's work. The years that followed (1620–30) were the best years for Port-Royal, years of regularity, prayer, and true happiness. There were many novices; the reputation of the abbey went far and wide. In 1625, thinking that the valley of Port-Royal was unhealthy for her religious, Mère Angélique established them all in Paris, in the Faubourg Saint-Jacques. It was at this time that the abbess made the acquaintance of Zamen, Bishop of Langres, who had reformed the Benedictine Abbey of Tard, near Dijon, and was thinking of founding an order in honour of the Blessed Sacrament. He considered the fusion of the two monasteries important, and found the abbess an ally in this project. He broached it to the abbess, who agreed to the project, and together they began the erection of a new monastery near the Louvre. The bishop's sumptuous taste, however, contrasted with the abbess's spirit of austere poverty. Mère Angélique, being self-willed to the point of being ill when opposed, wished to have it built according to her ideas and to impose her will on those around her. She was replaced as abbess, although it was her sister Agnès who was elected Abbess of Tard. Even when second in rank Angélique gave as much trouble, when the "Secret Chaplet" was a term used to designate a mystical treatise of twenty pages composed by Mère Agnès, sister of Angélique, in which the Sacrament of Love was represented as terrible, formidable, and inaccessible. This little book was disturbing, on account of the false spiritual tendencies it revealed, and it was condemned by the Sorbonne (18 June, 1633). For the first time, Port-Royal was looked on with suspicion, as having clouded the integrity of its doctrine. Nevertheless an anonymous champion had issued a brochure in apology of the "Chaplet", which caused a tremendous scandal. This was Jean du Vergier de Hauranne, Abbé of Saint-Cyr. Mère Angélique had known the Abbé for ten years, in the character of a family friend, but she felt no sympathy whatever with his teachings. From 1633, however, she took sides with him, introduced him into her community, and made him the confessor of her religious and the oracle of the house. The Bishop of Langres tried in vain to displace him, but Angélique entrenched herself deeper in obstinacy. This marks the separation between Tard and Port-Royal; from this time, also, the history of Mère Angélique is one of constant scandal. Jean du Vergier de Hauranne, Abbé of Saint-Cyr, became master of Port-Royal. He took away the sacraments, blinded souls, and subjugated wills. To dispute his ideas was regarded as a crime deserving of punishment. About the monastery were grouped twelve men of the world, most of them of the family of the abbess; under the name of the "Solitaries of Port-Royal". Further, Mère Angélique had gathered under her crosier five of her sisters and many of her nieces. It may be said with truth that the Port-Royal of the seventeenth century was her creation. With Saint-Cyr it became a centre of alarming error. Richelieu understood this, and caused the arrest (15 May, 1635) of the dangerous Abbé, and his confinement in the prison at Vincennes.
Mère Angélique became more than ever attached to her director, in whom she saw one persecuted for justice’s sake. At his death (1643) she found herself without a guide, but her perversity was complete. She retired into an atmosphere of complete and obdurate impiety, with no thought but to bring about the triumph of the principles held by him whom she had honored as a doctor. During the following years, also, and at the time of the Bull issued by Innocent X, she encouraged by word and by letters the upholders of Jansenism. She compared herself to St. Paula persecuted by the Pelagians. Far from confining herself within the limits of her monastery, she threw herself into the struggle for those children whom she regarded as her favourite ideas; she continually wrote letters encouraging some and condemning others, among the latter including even St. Vincent de Paul. Stronger than all the rest in the loftiness of her intelligence and the firmness of her character, Mère Angélique was a leader of the party, and a leader who would die sooner than surrender. As a matter of fact, she did expire (6 August, 1661) filled with solicitude for her religious caused by the signing of the Formulary, and her own fear of a "terrible eternity". She left various writings and a collection of letters to be found in the "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps", 1744. Her memoirs and letters have survived her ten years. We owe to her a work entitled "Image de la religieuse parfaite et imparfaite" (1665). She resisted and suffered much at the time of the Formulary. It was of Mère Angélique and her religious that De Pérefixe, Archbishop of Paris said: "These sisters are as pure as angels, but as proud as devils".

III. ROBERT ARNAUD D’ANDILLY, b. 1589, d. 27 September, 1674, was the eldest of Antoine Arnaud’s twenty children. On the death of his father in 1619, he became, according to custom, head of his family. With him obstinacy and pride were hereditary faults to which were added excessive vehemence and abruptness of temper. It is related that on the "day of the grating" he flew into a passion with his sister Angélique, even to the point of threatening her and calling her a "monster of ingratitude and a parrot", because she refused to allow her father to enter the church. In the year 1621 he became a friend of Saint-Cyrain, and participated in all his errors. It was not his fault that the Abbess of Port-Royal did not give her confidence sooner to the famous Abbé. Like the rest of the family, he hated the Jesuits as personal enemies, but supported the champions of orthodoxy. He was affected to combine with a regular attendance at court a very ardent piety. He was in great honour at court and his son Pomponne became Minister of State. He was looked on with favour by the Queen Regent, Anne of Austria, and had powerful friends. The Jansenist party took advantage of this to obtain the release of Saint-Cyrain from the prison of Vincennes, where he had been confined by Richelieu. D’Andilly tried to gain over the Duchesse d’Aiguillon, niece of the Cardinal. She went to Rueil to see her uncle, but the minister cut short her prayers by showing her the real state of affairs. It was D’Andilly who arranged to have Antoine Le Guéméné, one of his worldly friends, to enter Port-Royal, for to her he played the rôle of lay director. On becoming a widow, he left the court and retired to Port-Royal des Champs, having been preceded by one of his sons, Arnaud de Luzancy (1646). He founded three hospices already there: Antoine Le Maître, Le Maître de Sacy, and de Séricourt. For thirty years he lived in this retreat, occupied with literary and manual labour. He chose to cultivate trees, and sent to the queen monstrous fruits which Mazarin laughingly called "blessed fruits". During the same period he translated the Jewish historian Josephus, the works of St. Therese, and the lives of the Desert Fathers. He also applied himself to poetry, and according to Sainte-Beuve his spiritual canticles are unsurpassed even by the works of Godeau, or even of Corneille, certainly of the Corneille of the "Imitation". D’Andilly’s letters and other prose works (he published a collection of letters in 1645) are considered in the same class as those of Voiture and even of Balzac. With regard to the Formulary, he used his influence to avert, or at least mitigate, the persecutions of the religious of Port-Royal. When, in 1636, the order came for the dispersal of the Petites Écoles, i. e. the twenty or so that he had maintained in the neighborhood of Paris, the pure doctrine of their sect, and the loneliness of the solitaries themselves, Arnaud d’Andilly wrote innumerable letters to Anne of Austria and Mazarin, letters of submission, of commendation, of thanks. He gave his word that the orders would be obeyed; he temporized, and obtained respite, and although he was a factious spirit, he caused, on the whole, but little apprehension, and was allowed to write, to plot, and even to dogmatize at his ease. All these things, dangerous in themselves, in his hands took on a sort of worldly grace, as being light and destitute of malice. Moreover, who would have dared to disturb him from the queen he was "the only lover". He died at the age of eighty-five, preserving to the end his bodily and mental vigour. He reared three sons and four daughters. We have from his pen, in addition to the works mentioned, translations of the "Confessions of St. Augustine", the "Scala paradisi" of St. John Climacus, the "De contemptu mundi" of St. Eucherius, and the memoirs of his life. The last work reveals in the author a family vanity which amounts to boastfulness.

IV. HENRI ARNAULD, brother of the preceding, b. in Paris, 1597; d. 1692. He was first destined for the Bar, but was taken to Rome by Cardinal Bentivoglio, and during this absence, which lasted five years, the court granted him (1624) the Abbey of Saint-Nicholas. In 1637 the Chapter of Toul offered him the bishopric of that city, and the king, at the recommendation of Father Joseph, confirmed the choice. He was obliged to wait three years for his Bulls, during which period (1621) he became a friend of Saint-Cyrain, and participated in all his errors. It was not his fault that the Abbess of Port-Royal did not give her confidence sooner to the famous Abbé. Like the rest of the family, he hated the Jesuits as personal enemies, but supported the champions of orthodoxy. He was affected to combine with a regular attendance at court a very ardent piety. He was in great honour at court and his son Pomponne became Minister of State. He was looked on with favour by the Queen Regent, Anne of Austria, and had powerful friends. The Jansenist party took advantage of this to obtain the release of Saint-Cyrain from the prison of Vincennes, where he had been confined by Richelieu. D’Andilly tried to gain over the Duchesse d’Aiguillon, niece of the Cardinal. She went to Rueil to see her uncle, but the minister cut short her prayers by showing her the real state of affairs. It was D’Andilly who arranged to have Antoine Le Guéméné, one of his worldly friends, to enter Port-Royal, for to her he played the rôle of lay director. On becoming a widow, he left the court and retired to Port-Royal des Champs, having been preceded by one of his sons, Arnaud de Luzancy (1646). He founded three hospices already there: Antoine Le Maître, Le Maître de Sacy, and de Séricourt. For thirty years he lived in this retreat, occupied with literary and manual labour. He chose to cultivate trees, and sent to the queen monstrous fruits which Mazarin laughingly called "blessed fruits". During bishop of Paris, to foretell the tempest which the obligation of signing the Formulary would arouse at Port-Royal. At the same time he encouraged the religious to resist or take refuge in subtleties which took all sincerity from their submission. Arnauld was one of the four prelates who in 1665 loyally refused to sign the Formulary of Alexander VII, and issued a mandate against it. He was about to be cited before an ecclesiastical tribunal when the pope died. Clement IX, successor to Alexander VII, judged it preferable in the interests of religion to silence the whole affair. He accorded the Clementine Pardon to this party, and they insolutely took advantage of it. The bishop preserved his Jansenistic sentiments to the very end, and did all in his power to promote the spread of this error in his diocese. He pursued with disfavour, and sometimes with vehemence, the partisans of orthodoxy. One should read the "Mémoires" of Joseph Grandet, third superior of the Seminary of Angers, to know to what a degree Jansenism had imbued the bishop, who otherwise was not deficient in good qualities. It cannot be denied that he was energetic, austere, devoted to his duty, and filled with zeal. In 1662, when his mother was approaching to the punishment on the city of Angers, which was in revolt, the bishop appeased her with a word. On giving her Holy Communion, he said: "Receive, Madame, your God, Who pardoned His enemies when dying on the Cross." There is still quoted a saying of his, "the love of his work." One of his letters was being requested to take a day each week for relaxation, he replied: "I shall willingly do so, if you give me a day on which I am not bishop." But despite this excellent sentiment he remains one of the most enigmatic figures of the seventeenth-century episcopate. He died in 1692, at the ripe old age of eighty-five. The negotiations carried him to the Court of Rome and various Italian courts have been published in five volumes (Paris, 1745).

Arne, THOMAS AUGUSTINE, an English composer, b. 12 March, 1710, at London; d. 5 March, 1778. Although of Catholic parentage, he was educated at Eton, and was appointed in a solicitor's office for three years. In 1740 he married Cecilia Young, eldest daughter of Charles Young, organist of All Hallows, Barking, a pupil of Geminiani and one of the best singers of her day. Arne wrote the music for Thomson and Mallet's masque of "Alfred", to celebrate the four-hundredth anniversary of the accession of the House of Hanover. It is in this work the well known "Rule Britannia" occurs. In 1742 Arne went to Ireland, and during his sojourn there produced his oratorio "Abel" and his operas "Britannia" and "Comus" with great success. On his return, he was engaged again as composer at Drury Lane, and in 1746 was appointed to the choristers of St. George's Chapel and Marylebone Gardens. The University of Oxford conferred the degree of Doctor of Music on Arne, 6 July, 1759. Three years after this, he wrote "Aratzeros", an opera in the Italian manner, with recitative but no spoken dialogue, taking the text of Metastasio's "Aratzeros". In 1764, Doctor Arne produced his second oratorio, "Judith". His later productions were "Elfrida" and "Caracatus", additions to Purcell's music for "King Arthur", and some music for Garrick's ode for the Shakespeare Jubilee in 1769. Arne was buried in the Church of St. Paul, in Covent Garden. He was the first to introduce female voices into the chorus of oratorios.

Arn Thorlaksson, an Icelandic bishop, b. in Iceland, 1237; d. at Bergen, 1297. While a deacon, he visited Norway, in 1262, and became a friend of King Magnus. Ordained priest, he was soon appointed administrator of the Diocese of Holar, and was conspicuous for his zeal regarding the law of celibacy. He was assistant of the Bishop of Skalholt, in 1267, and succeeded him in that office, being consecrated in 1269 at Nidaros (Trondhjem) in Norway. On his return to Iceland, he set about reorganizing the ecclesiastical administration. Striving to regularize the regulation of the hierarchy in 1252, the Iceland bishops had become suffranguis of the metropolitan of Nidaros. In 1284 Iceland became still more dependent politically on the king of Norway. Up to that time Iceland had been a republic, governed by the Althing, which was composed of forty-eight chiefs, ninety-six councillors, and an announcer of laws, who was president. At the time Christianity was introduced many of these chiefs built churches on their lands and assumed at the same time ecclesiastical administration of them. The Church became identified with the State. The Althing, the legislative assembly in which the bishops had seats, made laws in matters of the church and controlled church affairs. Arn Thorlaksson, confronted with this state of things, protected the church interests, and especially had to fight for the investiture of priests and the temporal administration of the churches and their effects. With this in view, he visited Norway in 1275, and obtained some concessions from the king. On his return to Iceland, he proposed to the Althing (1275) a Kristnefri, i.e. Christian law, with which his name is particularly associated. Some time after this the jus patronatus (the right of patronage) revived, and the bishop again became the real king and of the archbishop. Having arrived in Norway, in 1297, for this purpose, he succeeded in obtaining the compromise that where laymen owned more than half of a church they should retain its temporal management, but in every other case the bishops should have it. He died the same year at Bergen. Although he had not obtained all the rights of the Church, he at least secured its organization and uniformity, and, as far as civil law was concerned, such observance of the laws as dependency on the kings of Norway permitted. History regards him as the most influential and important man of his time in Iceland.

Arnobius, a Christian apologist, flourished during the reign of Diocletian (284–305). St. Jerome says, in his Chronicle, that before his conversion Arnobius was a distinguished rhetorician at Sicca in Proconsular Africa, and owed his name to a dream. To overcome the doubts of the local bishop as to the earnestness of his Christian belief he wrote (about 305) an apologetic work in seven books that St. Jerome calls (De Vir., III., lxix) "Adv. Cels. sectones" but is entitled "Adv. Princes, sectones" in the only (ninth-century) manuscript that has reached us. Arnobius is a vigorous apologist for the Christian Faith, defends and expounds its noble monotheism (Deus princ. sectus sumus), the Divinity of Christ and of the Christian religion, proves its rapid diffusion, its incredible influence over uncivilized peoples, and its agreement with the views of the best philosophers. Apropos of the Christian tendencies of Plato, he has left us a very remarkable treatise on the nature of the soul (I, 14-62). Heathen idolatry he refutes as filled with contradictions and immoral. His work especially Books III-V, abounds with curious information gathered from reliable sources (e.g., Cornelius Laber) concerning the forms of idolatrous worship, temples, idols, and the Greco-Roman mythology of his time, for which reason it is much esteemed by Latin philologists and antiquarians. Arnobius is more earnest in his defense of Christianity than correct in his tenets. Thus, he holds the heathen gods to be real beings, but subordinate to the supreme Christian God; the human soul is not the work of God, but of an intermediate being, and is not immortal by nature, but capable of putting on immortality itself.

For a bibliography of his alleged order to slay indiscriminately both Catholics and Albigenses at the siege of Béziers (1209) see Chevalier, "Répertoire" (Bio-Bibl., I, 319). The accusation has been amply refuted by Ph. To him and his son John are owing the upper part of the nave and the completion of the choir. The change from three to five naves is said to have been made by his advice. He displeased the humanists by his attitude in the Reuchlin conflict, and was made the butt of Hutten's satire (Janssen, Gesch. d. deutschen Volkes, etc., I, 111, 18th ed.; II, 47, 18th ed.).—ARNOLD OF VILLANUEVA, see Villanueva.—ARNOLD OF VON BORG, Benedictine Prior of St. Emmeram at Regensburg (1084), author of a life of St. Emmeran ("Patriologia Latina," CXLI; Wattenbach, "Deutsche Geschichtsquellen" (6th ed.), I, 64 sq.).

THOMAS J. SHAHAN.

Arnold of Brescia (ARNALDUS, ARNOLDUS, ERMALDUS, b. at Brescia towards the end of the eleventh century; date of death uncertain. If there is any truth in the statement made by Otto of Freisingen that Arnold completed his studies under the direction of Abelard, he must have gone to Paris about 1115. This would explain the affection towards the French master which he showed later in life, and we could easily understand how it came about that Abelard called him to his side after the Lateran Council of 1119, as St. Bernard intimates he did. In the judgment of some critics, however, there is not sufficient evidence for this first sojourn of Arnold in France, vouched for by Otto of Freisingen who lived until 1192-97. In any case Arnold entered a convent of canons regular in his native city where he was ordained a priest and appointed prior or provost of his community. He was fitted for this high office by the austerity of his life, his detachment from earthly things, his love of religious discipline, the clearness of his mind, and an originality and charm of expression that he brought to the service of a lofty ideal. Brescia yielded to his powerful influence, and in the course of some years Arnold was placed at the head of the reform movement then stirring the city. Precisely at this time Brescia, like most other Lombard cities, was entering upon the exercise of its municipal liberties. The government was in the hands of two consuls elected annually, but over against their authority that of the bishop, as principal landed proprietor, still remained. Hence arose between the rival forces inevitable conflicts in which were involved, together with political passions, the interests of religion. The sight of these conditions grieved Arnold and prompted him to apply a remedy. By constant dwelling on the evils which afflicted both city and Church, he came to the conclusion that their chief causes were the wealth of the clergy and the temporal power of the bishop of Brescia. It was not best, therefore, to take drastic measures at once to strip the monasteries and bishoprics of their wealth, and transfer it to laymen? Was not this the surest and quickest method of satisfying the civil authorities and of bringing back the clergy, by poverty, to the practice of evangelical perfection? To reduce this to a working theory, Arnold ventured to formulate the following propositions: "Clerics who own property, bishops who hold regalia [tenures by royal grant], and monks who have possessions cannot possibly be saved. All these things belong to the [temporal] prince to whom priests cannot dispose of them except in favour of laymen."

The welcome given such teachings by the higher clergy may readily be inferred. Brescia passed through an alarming crisis, the various phases of which, owing to the brevity and obscurity of the chronicler's narrative, are not always clearly traced. From the testimony of various authors, however, Otto of Freisingen, St. Bernard, and John of Salisbury (supposed author of the "Historia Pontificum"), the following facts areascertained: a journey made by Bishop Manfred to Rome about 1138; an insurrection during his absence; the attempt of Arnold to prevent him on his return from taking possession of his see or temporal power; the appeal of the rebellious provost and his condemnation by Innocent II, at the Lateran Council, in 1139. Silence and exile were the penalties imposed on Arnold, and he was forbidden to return to Brescia without the express permission of the bishop of his own city.

The following year (1140) we find Arnold at Sens at the side of Abelard, who was about to make his last struggle against the champions of orthodoxy. St. Bernard awaited steadfastly both combatants, whose attack was turned to utter rout. In the words of the Abbé de Clairvaux, the "squire" was involved in the downfall of the "knight." The sentence passed upon Abelard by the council was confirmed by Innocent II. Arnold fared no better, for both were condemned to perpetual confinement in separate monasteries (Bull of 16 July, 1140). This de tree, however, was never put into execution; the young Abbot of Cluny, Arnold, feigned retirement to Mont Sainte descended, and pursued unscrupulously with his taunts the detractors of Abelard. Thus he described the Abbot of Clairvaux as a man "puffed up with vain glory, and jealous of all those who have won fame in letters or religion, if they are not of his school". Thus boldly challenged, Bernard took up the gauntlet and denounced Arnold to Louis VII as "the incorrigible schismatic, the sower of discord, the disturber of the peace, the destroyer of unity", and brought about the "Most Christian King" to the kingdom of France" him whom he had so readily exiled.

Arnold, compelled to flee, took refuge in Switzerland and fixed his abode at Zurich in the diocese of Constance. The Abbot of Clairvaux continued active in pursuit, and some time afterwards (1143) we find the exile in Bohemia begging protection from a papal legate named Guy. This prelate, who was confounded with the bishop of Aosta, treated Arnold with great friendliness. This attitude vexed St. Bernard, who addressed to the legate a discourse on prudence, which, however, remained unheeded by Guy. There is every reason to believe that Arnold had given his host pledges of sincere submission, for this fact alone would explain his return to Italy, thenceforth open to him. This, too, explains the solemn abjuration which he made at Viterbo, before Pope Eugenius III, in 1145. The pontiff, on reconciling him with the Church, had imposed a form of penance then customary: fasting, vigils, and pilgrimages to whose escape he was not privy. Unfortunately, in the air which Arnold was about to breathe there were floating the germs of revolt. Rome was endeavouring to re-establish her Senate to the detriment of the temporal power of the popes. A movement so thoroughly in keeping with the earlier piety and standards of the rebels, the reformer could not but secure his sympathy and even his outspoken support. It was soon discovered that he was siphoning the clergy and disseminating from the Capitol his plans for ecclesiastical reform. The Curia became the chief object of his attacks; he depicted the cardinals as vile hypocrites and misers playing among Christians the role of Jews and Pharisees. He did not even spare the pope. Eugenius III, whose gentle moderation this terrible reformer had but recently acknowledged, was suddenly transformed into the executioner of the Church, more concerned with pampering his lust and vanity, and neglecting his office for the public welfare. The pope, the Apostles whose place he filled". In particular, Arnold reproached the pope for re-flying on physical force, and for "defending with homicide" his rights when contested. Eugenius III was forced to leave the Eternal City, and for some time (1146—49) Roman democracy triumphed under Arnaldi the Great. Though excommunicated by the pope (15 July, 1148), Arnold did not despair of his position. By degrees, however, his revolutionary programme took on another character. The abolition of the temporal power of the papacy was now only the first step; the second contemplated the subordination of the spiritual to the civil power. Wetzel, one of his disciples, presumed to offer to King Conrad III the keys of the Castle of Sant'Angelo, so that the German emperors might have the future disposal of the tiara and the government of Rome. Arnold's policy, at first republican, thus ended in downright imperialism. Frederick Barbarossa, however, Conrad's successor, refused to support the schemes of the Roman agitators. With much cleverness and tact, Eugenius III won over the emperor to the cause of the papacy. Arnold was thus rendered helpless. The senatorial elections of November, 1152, had turned against him, and marked the beginning of his fall.

Little is known of Arnold during the brief reign of Anastasius IV (July, 1153—December, 1154), but the election of Adrian IV was fatal to his cause. He had fallen into the hands of Odo, Cardinal-Deacon of St. Nicholas in Carceri Tulliani, but was freed by the Viscoutts of Campagnatico, and found for some years a safe refuge in their territory. They "looked on him as a prophet" inspired by God. However, as in an agreement between Adrian and Frederick Barbarossa, the pope obtained the emperor's promise that he would either excommunicate Arnold and remove him, willing or unwilling, from the custody of the Venioutts of Campagnatico. Frederick did not hesitate to make and keep this promise, and accordingly Arnold was handed over to the Curia. It is quite difcult to give an exact account of the trial of Arnold. According to the story recounted by Arnold himself, the emperor had secretly removed from the ecclesiastical prison and put to death by the servants of the prefect of Rome, who had suffered great injuries from the revolution fomented by Arnold. It is very probable, however, that the Curia had a larger share in his condemnation. One annex does seem to us to say that the pope personally ordered him to be hanged. Another writer affirms, with more semblance of truth, that Adrian confined himself to demanding Arnold's degradation so that he might be delivered over to the secular power. According to the author of a poem recently discovered (and he seems to be well informed), Arnold when brought in sight of the gallows faced his death courageously. When urged to recant his teachings, he answered that he had nothing to withdraw, for death for the truth is the lot of the just. asked only for a brief respite to pray and beg Christ's pardon for his sins. After a short mental prayer he gave himself up to the executioner, and offered his head to the noose. After hanging from the gallows for a short time, his body was burned, and the ashes thrown to the winds. Another chronicler, the "lest the people might collect them and honour them as the ashes of a martyr."

"Forger of heresies", "sower of schisms", "enemy of the Church", "schismatic", "heretic", such are the terms used by Otto of Freisingen, by the author of the "Historia Pontificum", by the Abbots of Clairvaux, by Eugenius III, and Adrian IV to stigmatize Arnold. Given the vagueness of these characterizations, it is not easy to specify the dogmatic errors into which the innovator fell. Otto of Freisingen echoes a rumour according to which Arnold held offensive views on baptism and the Eucharistic elements, and that he wanted to do away with the "squire" of Abelard, to say nothing of the charge of Clairvaux in one of his letters accuses Arnold of being "an enemy of the Cross of Christ." But must we conclude from this that Arnold was a follower of Pierre de Bruys, who condemned the adoration of the Cross? It is much more probable that the words of St. Bernard are to be taken broadly or in a metaphorical sense. In reality it was in practical matters that Arnold showed himself inimical to the teachings accepted at his time. He began by condemning the adorations of the wealth of the churchmen, an act which in itself placed him in the class of true reformers; St. Bernard and Gerhoh de Reichersperg said the same thing. But Arnold did not stop at this; he went so far as to deny the very principle of proprietary right as claimed by the Church, and thereby assailed the temporal power of the pope. All these assertions belong to the prince; the pope should relinquish the government of Rome; bishops, priests, and monks can own nothing without incurring the penalty of eternal damnation."

"On all these points the innovator, to say the least, was simply guilty of temerity. And since he had a hierarchy that was opposed to his views, he ended by questioning its authority. According to him, the Church had become corrupt in the persons of covenanted and simoniacal priests, bishops, and cardinals, and was no longer the true Church. "The pope", he says, "is no longer the Apostle, and as such, he despises in life the teachings of the Apostles, there is no obligation of reverence and obedience towards him." The unworthy clergy lose the right of administering the sacraments, and the faithful need no longer confess to them. It is sufficient that they confess to one another. If it be true, as stated by Fauriel, that the author of the poem above quoted, that Arnold had fallen into these errors, the schismatical and heretical character of his teachings remains no longer doubtful. His disciples, i. e. those whom the thirteenth-century documents call the Arnoldists, or Arnoldiates, taught other errors no less scandalous, for which, however, Arnold cannot justly be held responsible.

For the original authorities concerning Arnold, see Historia Pontificum (the author of which is probably John of Bamburg) in Mon. Germ. Hist. (col., Hanover, 1888), XX, 537, 538; Otto of Freisingen, Gestis Friderici imperatoris, II, 20-23, in Mon. Germ. Hist., XX, 366, 367, 403, 404; Gufsermons in the cathedral in defence of the Church, arraigning the inactivity of the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, and predicted the revolution which finally culminated in the Peasants' War. His anti-Reformation attitude and utterances embittered Luther, who now violently assailed his old teacher (Diet of Worms, II, 204, 215, 224, 225). His removal to Würzburg in 1526, did not interrupt his activity against the innovators. In 1530 he accompanied the Bishop of Würzburg to the Diet of Augsburg. Returning, he died at Würzburg.

HENRY G. GASS.

Arnolfo di Cambio, sometimes called di Lapo, the principal master of Italian Gothic, b. at Florence, about 1232; d. in the same city, in the seventy-first year of his age probably in 1300, during the brief period of Dante's power. Who Arnolfo was seems to be scarcely known, though few architects have left so many works of renown, after our own day.

According to Baldinucci, Cigognara, and Gaye, the father of Arnolfo was called Cambio, and came from Colle, in the Val d' Elsa. Arnolfo's first appearance in history seems to have been among the band of workmen engaged upon the pulpit in the Duomo of Sienna, as pupil or journeyman of Nicola Pisano. With him there was a certain Lapo, sometimes called his father (Vasari), sometimes his instructor, but who very likely was only his fellow-workman and associate. The same band of workmen, under the same master, Nicola, worked also in Pisa, Perugia, Cortona, Arezzo, and Rome, and worked for a period of 30 years old when his father died. He had already attained high repute, having learned from his father whatever the latter could teach, and also having studied the art of design under Cimabue for the purpose of employing it in sculpture. He was already considered the best architect in Tuscany when the Florentines confided to him the construction of the outer circle of their city walls; they also erected after his plans the Loggia of Or San Michele, their corn-market, covering it with a simple roof, and building the piers of brick. The year when the cliff of the Magnoli, undermined by water, caved in on the side of Santa Lucia, on the Via de' Bardi, the Florentines issued a decree that no building should be thenceforth erected on this perilous site. In this regulation they followed Arnolfo's counsel. His judgment has been proved correct by the ruin of many magnificent houses and other buildings in later times.

In 1265, Arnolfo built the Loggia and Piazza of the Priori. He also rebuilt the principal chapel of the Badia (abbey) at Florence, with an additional chapel on each side, and restored the church and choir which had been constructed on a much smaller scale by Conti Ugo, the founder of that abbey. The old church was demolished later, in 1226, and was rebuilt in the form of a Greek cross. For Cardinal Giovanni degli Oraini, the pope's legate in Tuscany, Arnolfo erected the campanile of the same church, a work highly appreciated in those times; but the stonework of this tower was not completed until 1309. In the church of Santa Croce, belonging to the Friars Minor, was begun after the designs of Arnolfo, in which he gave so large an extent to the nave and side aisles that the excessive width rendered it impossible to bring the arches within the roof; he therefore judiciously raised the arches from pier to pier, and on these he constructed the roof, from which he conducted the water by stone gutters built on the arches, giving them such a degree of inclination that the roofs were secured against injury from damp. The novelty and the ingenuity of his contrivance were no greater than its utility. At a later period, Arnolfo drew the plans for the first cloister to the old convent of this church. Soon afterwards he superintended the removal of the various arches and tombs (ancient monuments mentioned by Boccaccio) in stone and marble, that surrounded parts of the external walls of the church of San Giovanni, and covered the walls of the church with block marble from Prato. About the same time Arnolfo designed certain buildings in the upper Val d' Arno, above the fortress of San Giovanni and Castel Franco, for the greater convenience of the inhabitants and the more commodious supply of their markets; they entrusted the design of these works also to Arnolfo (1295), and he so completely satisfied them that he was elected a citizen of Florence. When these undertakings were completed, the Florentines resolved to construct a cathedral in their city, of such extent and magnificence that human power or industry should be able to produce nothing superior or more beautiful. Arnolfo prepared and executed the model for the cathedral, within a known area, on the site of the old cathedral of the Fiore, directing that the external walls should be enriched with polished marbles, rich cornices, pilasters, columns, carved foliage, figures, and other ornaments. The cathedral, as Arnolfo planned it, may be seen in Simone Memmi's great painting in the Spanish chapel in Santa Maria Novella. In the general plan he incorporated the earlier (cathedral) church known as Santa Reparata, besides other small churches and houses which stood around it. To please the Signoria he also built into the new edifice the tower of the Vescov, or 'Cow', in which hung the great bell of Arnolfo. From this it seems good-natured pleasantry was so styled by the Florentines. To accommodate this tower at the centre of the building was a troublesome business (Vasari) but it was so skilfully accomplished by “filling up the tower with good material” such as flint and lime, and laying a foundation of immense stones, that it proved equal to the support of that enormous construction, the cupola, which Brunelleschi erected upon it, and which Arnolfo had probably not even thought of placing thereon. The cathedral was finally completed in May, 1886. Within a few years the cathedral, the Palazzo Publico, and the two great churches of Santa Croce and Santa Maria Novella, sprang up almost simultaneously. The Duomo was founded, according to some, in 1294, the same year in which Santa Croce was begun; according to others, in 1298. Between these two dates, in 1296, Arnolfo undertook the erection of the Palazzo of the Signoria, the seat of the Florentine government, and the centre of all popular life. His genius requires no other evidence than these famous edifices. The stern strength of the Palazzo and the noble lines of the cathedral show how well he knew how to vary and adapt his art to the different requirements of municipal and religious functions, and to the necessities of the age. Arnolfo died after he had built the Palazzo and just as the round apec of the cathedral was approaching completion. His portrait by Giotto may be seen in Santa Croce, beside the principal chapel; he is one of the two men who are speaking together in the foreground, where monks are represented as the death of 1294, in the so-called "Baldinucci, Del Miglio Fiorense Illustrato, IV, 96; GATE Carteggio degli artisti, I, 445, 446; CIGOGNARA, Storia della Chirurgia, Scott; Cathedral in Florence, II, 521, 513, 325; FLETCHER, A History of Architecture, 417.

ARNULF

Belgium, 17 May, 1811; d. at Cincinnati, 29 July, 1865. He entered the Society of Jesus at Florissant, Missouri, in 1831. After the usual course of Jesuit training, he was appointed to teach in the colleges of the Missouri province of the Society. While engaged in this work, he published an exact and scholarly Greek scholar. During a dangerous illness, after his ordination as priest, Father Arnoudt bound himself by vow to labour with zeal to promote devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Upon his recovery he wrote his great work "De Imitatione Sacri Cordis Jesu". This work was published in Rome in 1846, and went through several editions. For some time it was reprinted for ten years.

At the end of that period, having been approved by Father General Roothaan, the work was published "typis et sumptibus fratum Caroli et Nicolai Benziager" in Einsiedeln, 1863. It was translated into English by Father Fastré and published at Cincinnati in 1866. Translations were made in French, German, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Flemish, and Hungarian. The French translation, published at Besançon, passed through eighteen editions between the years 1864 and 1887. Sommer-vogel gives the dates of two English, two Flemish, and four French versions of Father Arnoudt's works. Of these, Father De Smet, the missionary, is authority for the statement that Father Arnoudt left at his death the following MSS.: a Greek epic poem of about 1,200 verses, a collection of Greek odes, and a Greek grammar, and these ascetical works: "The Glory of Jesus", "The Delight of the Sacred Heart of Jesus", and a collection of spiritual retreats entitled "The Abode of the Sacred Heart".

Also in the London ed. of The Imitation of the Sacred Heart (1867) and the Tournay ed. (1872) are published notices of the author by Ruesch and Panizz. HoPZTbE, respectively. Father Arnoudt's relatives in Belgium have preserved forty-six of his autograph letters.

ARNULF. VETT, a Bavarian historian, b. at Landsbiilt in 1440; d. at the same place about the year 1505. He was educated at Amberg and at Vienna, was parish priest of St. Martin's Church in his native city, and chaplain to Bishop Sixtus. He is counted among the fathers of Bavarian history, and is praised by Aventin as one of his most important predecessors. He wrote a "Chronicon Austriacum", down to 1488 (Pez, Script. rer. Austr., I, 165; Liber de gestis episcoporum Frisingensium (Deringer, Gesch. des Bistums Freis, III); and the "Chronicon Baiourorum" (Pez, Theiss. I, ii, 19 sq.). This is far superior to his former writings, but is itself equally surpassed by the unpretentious narrative of the German version, which the compiler himself undertook, and carried ten years further.

ARNULF of Bavaria, son of Liutpold of the Agilulfing family and of Kunigunde, and Duke of Bavaria from 907 to 937. His reign fell in a troubled time. The Magyars had begun their predatory incursions into Germany, in which they destroyed everything wherever they penetrated. When, in the year 907, they again advanced against Bavaria in larger numbers than ever, the Margrave Liutpold summoned the entire fighting force of his people for the defence of the country. The Bavarians, however, were comically crushed in July in a battle but Liutpold himself, nearly all the Bavarian nobles, and a number of bishops, were killed. The land then became an easy prey to the barbarians and was ruthlessly devastated. Ludwig, King of the East Franks, withdrew to the western division of the empire. Under these almost hopeless conditions Arnulf, the son of Liutpold, began his reign. He did not lose courage, however, and succeeded, 11 August, 909, in defeating the Magyars on the Rott as they were returning from Swabia. This defeat did not prevent the Magyars from undertaking new plundering expeditions in the following years. But this terrible foe was defeated in a battle on the Inn not far from Passau, in the year 913, by a combined army of the Bavarians under Arnulf and of the Swabians under Erecinger and Berchtold, who were the brothers of Arnulf's mother, Kunigunde. On account of a quarrel of a quarter of a town between the brothers Conrad and the Swabian dukes, Arnulf took up arms against the king in favour of his uncles. The marriage of Conrad and Kunigunde, the mother of Arnulf and sister of the Swabian dukes, did not allay the enmity. Arnulf was obliged to flee the country, but after a Swabian victory over the followers of the king he returned to Bavaria and established himself at Salzburg and Regensburg (Ratisbon). Conrad advanced in 916 against his stepson once more and defeated him, but was not able to drive him entirely out of the country. In order to put an end to this disorder, the German bishops held a synod in 916 at Mainz. Salzthal and the Abbot of St. Gall invited Arnulf with excommunication in case he did not present himself by 7 October before a synod at Regensburg. Arnulf, however, continued his struggle against Conrad. He was eventually induced to submit by Conrad's successor, Henry I, but only after he was accorded the right of independent government in Bavaria, the right of coinage, and the right of appointment to the bishoprics. This agreement was made in 921, before Regensburg. After receiving these concessions Arnulf acknowledged the German king as his over-lord. Otherwise, he was an independent ruler in his own land and called himself in his official documents "Duke of Bavaria and of God". During his struggle for the independence of Bavaria, Arnulf had confiscated many monastic estates and properties, and had granted these lands as fiefs to his nobles and soldiers. Many churches, already grievously affected by the predatory incursions of the Magyars, were in this way completely impoverished and, if possible, in some cases destroyed. Only one abbot, Egilof of Niederaltach, attended the Synod of Regensburg in 932. The great monasteries of Benediktbeuren, Isen, Moosburg, Niederaltach, Schäftlarn, Schliersee, Tegernsee, and Wessobrunn, had lost almost all they possessed in the church of Arnulf's time. They were all not only dispossessed, but moreover condened by some of the German bishops. Drakof, Bishop of Freising, encouraged by the example of the duke, appropriated some possessions of the churches of Schäftlarn, Moosburg, and Isen.

On account of his confiscations Arnulf was nicknamed der Schlomme (the Bald). Conditions were, however, decidedly better after the duke's submission to King Henry. The Bavarian bishops met in synod at Regensburg, 14 January, 932, and in the summer of the same year they held a synod in connection with other territorial nobles at Dingolfing. An agreement was reached that the lands wrested from the communities and other nobles were returned to them. Arnulf himself showed zeal in rebuilding the churches that had been destroyed. Although the decisions of the synod were never fully carried out, the way was prepared for better conditions and more orderly rule. Arnulf died 14 July, 937, and was buried in the church of St. Emmeram in Regensburg.

Arnulf of Lisioux (Lexovien i s s i s o f L u x o v i e n s i s), in France, d. 31 August, 1184. He was educated by his brother, the Bishop of Sees (Sagis), studied canon law at Rome, and was made a canon of Pope Innocent II a violent letter against Gerard, Bishop of Angoulême (Muratori, SS. RR. Ital., III, 43; 434), a partisan of the Antipope Anastasius II (Peter Leonis). In 1141 he was raised to the See of Lisioux, accompanied Louis VII on his crusade (1147), was made a cardinal deacon, and, during the schism, encouraged his brother bishops to defend the cause of ecclesiastical liberty against Henry II of England. He was a partisan of the king in the conflict between Henry and St. Thomas Becket, and after the murder of the latter undertook the royal defence before the pope. In 1181, or perhaps a little earlier, he lost the good will of the king, and for a while that of Pope Leo. He then resigned his see because of age and feebleness and retired to the Abbey of St. Victor at Paris, where he died. His writings include a collection of letters, made by himself, and some poetry, and are in P. L., CCLX.

Arnulf of Metz, Saint, statesman, bishop under the Merovingians, b. c. 580; d. c. 640. His parents belonged to a distinguished Frankish family, and lived in Lusitania, the eastern section of the kingdom founded by Clovis. In the school in which he was placed during his boyhood he excelled through his talent and his good behaviour. According to the custom of the age, he was sent in due time to the court of Theodebert II, King of Austrasia (595-612), to be initiated in the various branches of the government. Under the guidance of Gundulf, the Mayor of the Palace, he soon became so proficient that he was placed on the regular list of royal officers, and among the first of the king's ministers. He distinguished himself both as a military commander and in the civil administration; at one time he had under his care six distinct provinces. In due course Arnulf was married to a Frankish woman of noble lineage, by whom he had two sons, Ansegisel and Clodulf. While Arnulf was enjoying worldly emoluments and honours he did not forget higher and spiritual things. His thoughts dwelled often on monasteries, and finding the saintly Romaricus, likewise an officer at the court, he planned to make a pilgrimage to the Abbey of Lérins, evidently for the purpose of devoting his life to God. But in the meantime the Episcopate of Metz became vacant. Arnulf was universally designated as a worthy candidate for the office, and he was consecrated bishop of that see about 611. In his new position he set the example of a virtuous life to his subjects, and attended to matters of ecclesiastical government. In 625 he took part in a council held by the Frankish bishops at Reims. With all this Arnulf retained his station at the court of the king, and took a prominent part in the national life of the time. In 615, after the death of Theodebert, he, with Pepin of Landen and other nobles, called to Austrasia Clothaire II, King of Neustria. When, in 623, the realm of Austrasia was entrusted to the king's son Dagobert, Arnulf became not only the tutor, but also the chief minister, of the young king. At the time of the estrangement between the two kings in 625, Arnulf with other bishops and nobles tried to effect a reconciliation. But Arnulf dreaded the responsibilities of the episcopal office, and grew weary of court life. About the year 626 he obtained the appointment of a successor to the Episcopal See of Metz; he himself and his friend Romaricus again withdrew to a second cloister in the counties of the Vosges. There he lived in communion with God until his death. His remains, interred by Romaricus, were transferred about a year afterwards, by Bishop Goeric, to the basilica of the Holy Apostles in Metz.

Of the twenty sons of Arnulf, Clodulf became his third successor in the See of Metz. Ansegesil remained in the service of the State; from his union with Begga, a daughter of Pepin of Landen, was born Pepin of Heristal, the founder of the Carlovingian dynasty. In this manner Arnulf was the ancestor of the mighty rulers of that house. The third Arnulf's continuance of the See and the temporal office and career in the Merovingian State. The bishops were much considered at court; their advice was listened to; they took part in the dispensation of justice by the courts; they had a voice in the appointment of royal officers; they were often used as the king's ambassadors, and held high administrative positions. For the people under their care, they were the protectors of their rights, their spokesmen before the king, and the link uniting royalty with its subjects. The opportunities for good were thus unlimited; and Arnulf used them to good advantage.

Atrás (Artebratim), The Diocese of, comprises the Department of Pas-de-Calais in France. On the occasion of the Concordat, the three Dioceses of Arras, Saint-Omer, and Boulogne were united to make the one Diocese of Arras. It was a suffragan of Paris from 1802 to 1841, in which year Cambrai again became an archdiocese and Arras returned to it as suffragan. At the beginning of the sixth century St. Remi (Remigius), Archbishop of Reims, placed in the See of Arras St. Vedastus (St. Vaast) (d. c. 540), who had been the teacher of Clovis after the victory of Tolbiac. His successors, Dominicus and Vedulfus, are both venerated as saints. After the death of the latter, the See of Arras was transferred to Cambrai, and it was not until 1093 that Arras again became a diocese. Among the bishops of Arras are Cardinal Antoine Perrenot de Granvelle, Councilor of the emperor, Charles V, Bishop of Arras from 1545 to 1562, later Archbishop of Lyons and Cardinal of the Empire; Francois Richafort, a celebrated preacher; Bishop of Arras from 1562 to 1575; Monseigneur Parisia (d. 1666), who figured prominently in the political assemblies of 1648. The old cathedral of Arras, constructed between 1030 and 1396, and dedicated to St. Vaast, was one of the most beautiful Gothic structures in northern France. It was destroyed during the Revolution. Two famous relics were long greatly venerated at Arras: the "sacred manna", said to have fallen from heaven in 371 during a severe famine, and the "holy candle", a wax taper said to have been given to Bishop Lambert in 1105 by the Blessed Virgin. To the death of the latter, far from Arras, the city of Saint-Omer, a diocese till the Revolution, perpetuates the memory of St. Audomar, or Omer, Bishop of Thérouanne, the apostle of the Morini in the sixth century. Its cathedral, a Gothic monument of the fourteenth century, was built over the saint's tomb. The relics of St. Audomar, of St. Bertin, and of St. Omer, kept alive the memory of two celebrated abbey's of the same name; the Abbey of St. Bertin (founded in the seventh century) gave twenty-two saints to the Church. The Diocese of Arras at the end of 1905 contained 955,391 inhabitants, 52 parishes, 690 churches of the parish state, and 53 vicariates formerly with state subventions.

In 1588 he was appointed Rector of the College of San Martin at Lima, which post he filled thence in the course of twenty-four years. He visited Europe in 1601, sent to Rome by his superiors. Returning in 1604, he became Rector of the College of Arequipa (1614-22), and the following year was appointed Rector of the College of San Esteban in Lima, where he died in 1625. His principal work is the 'Frivole del Peru,' a treatise on the theory of light, heat, and electricity, and also on the causes of the movement of mercury in the barometer. ARRIAGA, JULIA, a native of Mexico in the eighteenth century. Little more is known of his life than that he was Prefect and Commissary of the Church of Our Lady of Querétaro, in central Mexico (Mexico), a zealous and efficient missionary, and a highly esteemed member of the Franciscan Order. He deserves special mention as having been the author of the second volume of the "Chronicles of Querétaro" (for first part see Espinosa, Isidro Felix), a book that is of inestimable value for the history of missions and colonization of northwestern Mexico, Arizona, and California.

ARRIGON, NICOLA, mathematician, b. at Florence and died there in 1639. He was distinguished as a lituante, but chiefly as a mathematician and a philosopher. He was one of the most prominent disciples of Galileo, and occupied an illustrious place in the Florentine Academy and in that of Della Crusca. He was one of those who formed the Platonistic Academy which was re-established by the Grand Duke Ferdinand and the Prince, afterwards Cardinal, of Two Sicilies. Arrighetti was mentioned in the opening discourse. He undertook to translate the Dialogues of Plato into Tuscan and so engaged when he died. He left a great number of MSS. in prose and verse, among which are some Cicilae, or serio-comic compositions in vogue at the time, on such subjects as the tortoise, the cucumber, pickles, etc.

Arsenius Autorizilas, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the thirteenth century; d. 1275. He entered a monastery in Nicessa, changing his secular name George for Gennadius and finally for Arsenius, and became the hegoumenos (abbot) of the monastery without taking orders. On his return from an embassy to Pope Innocent IV from John Vatatzes in 1254, he withdrew to a monastery on Lake Apollosion. His father the envoy of Theodore II Lascaris, who had succeeded Vatatzes in 1255, came to offer him the patriarchal throne, made vacant in 1254 by the death of Manuel. His patriarchate was peaceful till the rise of Michael Palaeologus. Theodore II died in 1258, entrusting his son John's minority to George, who was later exiled by Michael and killed. Vainly remonstrating, Arsenius withdrew to the monastery of Pachaius without resigning his authority. Failing to make him either act or resign, the emperor and the court bishops replaced him byNicephorus of Ephesus, who died after six months. The recovery of Constantinople by the Greeks in July, 1261, rendered the choice of a patriarch imperative. His partisans renominated Arsenius, whom the emperor accepted, provided he recognized the validity of the orders conferred by Nicephorus. Arsenius agreed but refused to officiate with the new bishops. On his return he crowned Michael for the second time in St. Sophia, retaining intact, as he imagined, the rights of John. To make sure, however, that John should never succeed him, Michael destroyed his ward's eyes, 25 Dec., 1261. Shocked at this atrocity, the patriarch excommunicated him and demanded his absolute abandonment of the imperial throne. Two years later deposition Arsenius (May, 1264), and exiled him to the convent of St. Nicholas on the island of Proconneus, where he died. The adherents of Arsenius, including the emperor's own kinsmen, withdrew from the communion of the new patriarch, Germanus, formerly Bishop of Adrianople. The next patriarch undertook, in 1267, to absolve the emperor from the sentence of excommunication imposed by Arsenius. This gave rise to the Arsenian schism, which lasted until April, 1315, when it finally yielded to the diplomacy of the Patriarch Niphon.

Arsenius, Saint, anchorite, b. 354, at Rome; d. 450, at Troe, in Egypt. Theodosius the Great having invested the Emperors Gratian and Pope Damascus to find him in the West a tutor for his son Arcadius, they made choice of Arsenius, a man well read in Greek literature, member of a noble Roman family, and said to have been a deacon of the Roman Church. He reached Constantinople in 383, and continued as tutor in the imperial court for seven years, during the last three of which he also had charge of his pupil's brother Honorius. Coming one day to see his children at their studies, Theodosius found them sitting while Arsenius talked to them standing. This he would not tolerate, and caused the teacher to sit and the pupils to stand. On his arrival at court Arsenius had been given a splendid establishment, and probably because the Emperor so desired, he lived in great pomp, but all the time felt a growing inclination to renounce the world. After praying long to be enlightened as to what he should do, he was told: "Arsenius, flee the company of men, and thou shalt be saved." Thereupon he embarked secretly for Alexandria, and hastening to the desert of Scetis, asked to be admitted among the solitaries who dwelt there. St. John the Dwarf, to whose cell he was conducted, though previously warned of the sanctity of his visitor, welcomed him with all the hospitality of his house, and left him standing by himself while he invited the rest to sit down at table. When the repast was half finished he threw down some bread before him, bidding him with an air of indifference eat if he would. Arsenius meekly picked up the bread and ate, sitting on the ground. Satisfied with this proof of humility, St. John kept him under his direction. The new solitary was from the first most exemplary, yet unwittingly retained certain of his old habits, such as sitting cross-legged or laying one foot over the other. Noticing this, the abbot requested some one to imitate Arsenius in humility and service of the brethren, and upon his doing so, forthwith rebuked him publicly. Arsenius took the hint and corrected himself. During the fifty-five years of his solitary life he was always the most meanly clad of all, thus punishing himself for his former seeming vanity in the world. In like manner, to atone for having used perfumes at court, he never changed the water in which he moistened the palm-leaves of which he made mats, but only poured in fresh water upon it as it wasted, thus letting it become starchy in the extreme. Even while engaged in manual labour he never relaxed in his application to prayer. At all times copious tears of devotion fell from his eyes. But what distinguished him most was his disinclination to all that might interrupt his union with God. When, after long search, his place of retreat was discovered, he not only refused to return to court and act as adviser to his former pupil, the Emperor Arcadius, but he withdrew even more, as an almoner to the poor and the monasteries of the neighbourhood. He invariably denied himself to visitors, no matter what their rank and condition, and left to his disciples the care of entertaining them. His contemporaries so admired him as to surname him "the Great."

Arsinoe, a titular see of Egypt, now Medina el Fârûm, capital of the district of that name, and situated on the west bank of the Nile between the river and Lake Moris, now on the Bahr-Youssef, about fifty-two miles south-west of Cairo. Its episcopal list (c. 250–649) is given in Gams (p. 461). It is the most famous of several homonymous cities of Egypt, greatly favoured and renamed by Ptolemy II (284–247 b. c.) in honour of his sister and wife Arsinoe. Samaritan Jews were soon found there, and ere long it rivalled Alexandria for the vineyards and gardens that abounded on its soil, the most fertile in Egypt. It did a brisk trade in vegetables, and was renowned for its figs and roses. For its piety towards the crocodile it was known as Crocodilopolis, a haunt of crocodiles. It became eventually a flourishing centre of Christian life, but in 642 was betrayed by the Monophysite Copts to Amru, the Arab lieutenant of Mohammed. As the modern Fayum (Coptic φ-ω-μ, Fiûm, i.e. Lake Morris) it is celebrated for the discovery (1877–78) of a great many papyri manuscripts, some of which are important for the earliest Christian history of Egypt; they are being given a logical account in the report of the "Egypt Exploration Fund". It has several Coptic churches and Moslem mosques, and some manufactures, especially of woollen stuffs. Its trade in rose-water and nitre is considerable. The population is about 26,000.

Another Aramea was located on the Heropolite Gulf of the Red Sea, and as one of the principal harbours of ancient Egypt carried on an extensive trade with India in silks, spices, ivory, etc. It is mentioned in Exodus, xiv, 2, 9, and Numbers, xxxiii, 7, and is said to be identical with Argeorum near Suez. Arsinne on the west coast of Cyprus was an episcopal see from the fifth to the twelfth century (Gams, p. 439, and Lequien, II, 1065–68). Several other cities of the name are mentioned in Smith.

Aramon (or Artemas), mentioned as the leader of an Antitranitarian sect at Rome, in the third century, about whose life little is known for certain. He is spoken of by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., V, 28) as the forerunner of Paul of Samosata, an opinion confirmed by the Acts of a council held at Antioch in 272 years ago. They are described in the Hellenic section of the British Museum (Additional MSS. 51,885), and in a manuscript diary of considerable interest, also in Latin, which gives particulars of his numerous cases. This diary shows him to have been held in the highest esteem as a physician. Arthur sometimes called himself Thomas Arturus, FitzWilliam his father's name being William. He was born at Bordeaux and subsequently studied medicine in Paris. He returned to Ireland in 1619, and in May of that year started to practise his profession in Limerick. He succeeded so well that on the invitation of various influential people he settled in Dublin, in 1624. When the English physicians failed to relieve Archbishop Ussher of a serious complaint from which he suffered Arthur was summoned to Drogheda to take charge of the case. With the "pseudo-primas Armdachus", as he calls him, he stayed for some time subsequent to 22 March, 1625, and accompanied him to Lambay Island in the county of Meath in order to cure him. He was most successful, and his reputation as a skillful physician was enormously enhanced by this case. He received a fee of fifty-one pounds, then justly considered a munificent reward. He himself says that the cure made him famous among the English, whom he hereby distinguished for the sake of the Catholic religion". In his diaries he mentions another case for which he was paid ten pounds by the Marquis of Ormonde. In his diary he occasionally alludes to the affairs of Ireland but only in the briefest possible way. His Catholic feelings are everywhere shown. Among his patients was Charles Fleetwood, Commander-in-Chief of the English forces in Ireland, at whose request he wrote a treatise on the disease from which that soldier was suffering. The only writer who seems to have made use of Arthur's manuscript is Maurice Lenihan in his "History of Limerick", where one or two epigrams are quoted.

Articles of Faith (Greek, Ἀρτικυλία; Latin, articulorum, joint), certain revealed supernatural truths such as those contained in the symbol of the Apostles. The terms were not used by the Fathers or by ecclesiastical writers in the early Middle Ages. St. Bernard and Richard of St. Victor prefer the latter approach to truths having God for their object and so explicitly stated as to compel assent. According to St. Thomas Aquinas, the article of faith is any revealed supernatural truth which is distinct in itself from other such truths but which unites with them to form the organic whole of Christian teaching. Thus the articles of the Creed announce truths which are in themselves distinct from one another but parts of a complete summary of the truths which have been revealed to help us to gain our last end. They are for Christian theology what the psychological account in Latin elegance. Not every revealed truth is an article of faith, nor are theologians agreed on what constitutes an article or faith. Some would limit these articles to the contents of the Apostles' Creed. Others say that every truth defined by the Church, or in any other manner explicitly proposed for our belief, is an article of faith. De Lugo denies them an essential character or primary truths which are the basis of other revealed truths or principles. In the Catechism of the Council of Trent (p. 1, c. 1, q. 4), the truths of the Apostles' Creed are called articles "by a sort of simile frequently used by our forefathers; for as the members of the body are divided by joints (articula), so also in the profession of faith whatever is to be believed by us distinctly and separately from anything else we properly and appropriately call an article'.

ARTICLES, THE ORGANIC; a name given to a law regulating public worship, comprising 77 articles relative to Catholicism, and 44 relative to Protestantism, presented by order of Napoleon to the Tribunate and the legislative body at the same time that he made these two bodies vote on the Concordat itself. Together with the Concordat, the Organic Articles were published as a law, under the same title and the same preamble, 8 April, 1802, and the various governments in France which have since followed one another, down to 1905, have always professed to regard the Organic Articles as inseparable from the Concordat. Pope Pius VII, however, as early as 24 May, 1802, declared formally, in a consistorial allocution, that these articles had been promulgated without his knowledge, and that he could not accept them without modification.

The articles which refer to Catholicism fall under four titles. Title I deals with "the government of the Catholic Church in its general relations to the rights and constitution of the State." In virtue of these articles, the authorization of the Government is necessary for the publication and execution of a papal document in France; for the exercise of the theological faculties by any representative of the pope, for the holding of a National Council or a Diocesan Synod. Moreover, the Council of State, thanks to the formality of the appel comme l'abus, may declare that there is abus in any given act of the ecclesiastical authority, and thus thrust itself into the affairs of the Church. Title II deals with the ministers of public worship, whose powers it defines: the rules and regulations of seminaries must be submitted to the State; the "Declaration of 1682" must be taught in the seminaries; the number of those to be ordained must be fixed yearly by the Government; the curés of important parishes cannot be appointed by the bishop without the consent of the State. Under Title III, devoted to public worship, the legislature forbids public processions in towns where there are adherents of different creeds. It fixes the dress of the priests, who must be dressed "in the French fashion and in black"; it prescribes that there shall be only one catechism for all the churches of France. Article IV has reference to the boundaries of dioceses and parishes, and to the salary of ministers of religion.

It was not long, however, before many of these articles became a dead letter. M. Emile Ollivier, in his speech from the tribune, 11 July, 1868, said: "It would be difficult to cite even one or two that are still kept; even these are not enforced every day, but are only dragged from their nothingness and obscurity on great occasions, when there is need of something to be done or something not to be done." Even the Third Republic has never claimed the right to prevent the bringing of papal documents into France, to fix the dress of the priests, to insist on the teaching of the Declaration of 1682, and the judgments Tuum quum ab abusu, pronounced by the Council of Trent against the bishops, have always been boldly platonic.

The Organic Articles as such were the outcome, philosophically speaking, of a certain Gallican and Josephist spirit, whereby the State sought to rule the Church. Historically speaking, the French Legislature in drawing up these articles, which limited the scope of the Concordat, had set an unfortunate example, followed twenty years later by the various German governments, which having in their turn treated with the Holy See, hastened to counteract their own agreements by means of certain territorial enactments.

The law of 1905, which separated Church and State in France, abrogated the Organic Articles at the same time that it abrogated the Concordat. (See Concordat of 1801.)

Artoklasia (Gr. ἀρτοκλασία = to break, the breaking of bread). A peculiar service in the Greek Church performed as the concluding part of Vespers. Five loaves of ordinary bread, a measure of wine, and a measure of oil are set upon the analo- gion before the iconostasis in front of the altar. These are first incensed, and then the priest taking one of the loaves into his hands blesses them as follows: "O Lord Jesus Christ our God, Who didst bless the five loaves in the desert and satisfy therewith five thousand men, do Thyself bless these loaves also, the wheat, the wine and the oil; multiply them in this holy abode unto all the world; and sanctify Thy faithful servants of time and eternity that receive them. For Thou art He who blessest and hallowest and nourishest all good things, O Christ our God, and to Thee we send up glory with Thine unoriginate Father and Thine all-holy and good and life-giving Spirit, now and for ever, world without end". Afterwards the xiiiith Psalm is said, ending with the singing of the eleventh verse: "The poor have become poor and have suffered hunger; but they that seek the Lord shall not be deprived of any good things", and then the people are blessed. This office was introduced in monasteries where the monks kept an all-night vigil and the food was necessary for them, but became a Church office for the whole Eastern Rite. Originally there was a breaking of the bread and a distribution of the bread and wine, but that has been discontinued, although the Greek rubric still says, "Note that the blessed bread is a preventive of all manner of evils if it is received with faith". The ceremony of artoklasia is now seldom used in the Greek Catholic Church, since, in imitation of the Roman Rite, the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament according to a Greek form has taken its place.

ARTS, BACHELOR OF, a degree marking the completion of the traditional curriculum of the college. In the early medieval universities, the Mastership, or Doctorate, was the great academic prize. The Bachelorship does not appear to have existed at first, either at Bologna or Paris. It probably originated from the practice of employing the more advanced students to assist in teaching those who were younger, such teaching being regarded as a preparation for the Mastership. Before being allowed to begin to teach, the student had to maintain a thesis or disputation in public. The technical term for this was "Determination". To "determine" meant, for the student, to resolve questions in a public disputation in order to prove his fitness to enter upon the second stage of his career for the Mastership. "Determination" was thus an imitation of "Inception", which admitted to the Mastership, and like the latter it soon developed into a mere academic ceremony, examinations being held beforehand to ascertain the fitness of the candidate. Of these there were two, a prelimi- nary one, known as "Responsions", and a second one, more severe, known as Examen Baccalaurea-
The development of the system of "colleges" at Oxford and Cambridge, contributed greatly to preserving the effectiveness and popularity of the traditional Arts course in England. The immense addition to the stock of human knowledge in modern times, together with the multiplication of distinct branches of science suitable for educational purposes, have profoundly affected the Baccalaureate curriculum. One effect is seen in the development of the principle of election of courses. In the words of the statutes, the time, to a young man who was an apprentice. The academic condition which the word was employed to designate involved the idea of an apprenticeship in teaching. The later academic term Baccalaurius (spelled Baccalarius at first) was probably a corrupt Latinization of the term used in the same way in the Middle Ages.

The length of the course in Arts in the medieval universities varied considerably according to time and place. The statutes framed for the University of Paris, in 1215, by Robert de Courçon, the papal legate, fixed the minimum length of the course at six years. Twenty years of age being required for its completion, and the reception of the license. Later statutes fixed the minimum age for determination at fourteen years. At Paris the time between matriculation and determination was usually from one to two years. The tendency at Paris, and on the Continent, was towards early determination. The English statutes that are ten years of age in the liberal arts, that the Baccalaureate eventually disappeared altogether from Continental universities. At Oxford and Cambridge, on the other hand, the tendency was towards late determination. At Paris the age for entrance was about thirteen, and for determination about fifteen. At Oxford the boy entered at about the age of fourteen, and passed four years before being allowed to determine. The English Bachelor was thus several years older than the French or German Bachelor. The custom of late determination at Oxford and Cambridge, which was largely due to the development of the English grammar-school system, furnishes a historical explanation of the fact that the American college graduate to-day is several years older than the French Bachelor, or the German student on finishing the Gymnasium, American colleges having adopted the English system in this respect. The studies leading to the Baccalaureate vary naturally with the time of the respective course. Those prescribed at Oxford in 1267 were as follows:

1. The Old Logic: Porphyry, "Isagoge", the "Categories" and "De Interpretatione" of Aristotle, and the "Sex Prinzipia" of Gilbert de la Porre, with "De Anima" and "De Generatione et Corruptione".
3. Grammar: Priscian, "De Constructionibus".
4. Or, in place of Grammar, Natural Philosophy: "Physica" of Aristotle, "De Anima", "De Generatione et Corruptione".

The influence of the humanistic movement of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries upon the A.B. curriculum was shown in the partial replacement of the Aristotelian courses by the Latin and Greek classics, although the theological controversies and civic wars prevented the formal transition in the faculty towards neutralizing the effect of humanism upon the universities. The Jesuits, however, carried forward the movement, and were long noted as the leaders in classical education throughout Europe.

Arts, The Faculty of, one of the four traditional divisions of the teaching of the liberal arts. It is impossible to fix the date of the origin of autonomous faculties in the early medieval universities, because, as Denifle has observed, the division did not take place all at once, or as the result of deliberate action, but came about gradually, as the result of a spontaneous inner development. As a matter of fact, the formation of faculties and the same academic impulse that gave rise to the universities themselves. The mother universities of Europe were those of Paris and Bologna. The germ of the University of Paris was the voluntary association of the teaching Masters, after the fashion of the universally recognized ecclesiastical order. At Bologna, it was the association of the students that gave rise to the corporate university. In both places it was but natural, and, as it seems to us now, inevitable, that the teachers in a common field of knowledge should gradually come to act together along the lines of their identical interests. Such unions appear to have been formed soon after these two universities came into existence, if indeed they did not exist before. Schools of arts, theology, law, and medicine had been established throughout Europe previous to the organization of the universities. With the separate existence of such schools, there was from the outset a division of the university teaching body into faculties. Although there is evidence of the existence of a general association of the Masters at Paris, about the year 1175, the first direct proof of the existence of faculties in the same university dates back only to the year 1215, when the four faculties then recognized were theology, arts, canon law, and civil law. The term facultas was used at first to designate a specific field of knowledge; but in 1255 we find the Masters at Paris using the term in the modern meaning of a union of the teachers in a certain department of knowledge. The new turn given to the meaning of the word was not without significance. The centre of power, the facultas, had shifted from the objective to the subjective side of knowledge. Henceforth the teacher was to be the dominant influence.

The term Arts, in medieval academic usage, compassed the studies of the masters of the higher non-professional intellectual activity. The traditional liberal arts derived from the Romano-Hellenic schools, were seven in number. They were made up of the trivium, embracing grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic, and the quadrivium, or music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. The trivium may be said to have corresponded to the Arts studies proper in the modern college course, and the quadrivium to the science studies. While the medieval universities held to the traditional number of the liberal arts, they did so only in a theoretical way. New subjects were at times introduced into the curriculum, and classified as belonging to one or other of the seven arts. The instruction given under the several arts was, quantitatively as well as qualitatively, very unequal. The trivium generally formed the body of the Arts curriculm, especially up to the A.B. degree. After that, more or less of the quadrivium was given, together with individual courses covering the ground of the trivium. Grammar was a wide term. Theoretically, it included the study of the whole Latin language and literature. Rhetoric was the art of expression, both in writing and speaking. It corresponded to what we should now call, in a broad sense, oratory. Dialectic was the study of philosophy, including logic, metaphysics, ethics, and politics. Generally, at the great authority, the Magister, as he came to be reverently called. Certain of his treatises had long been known throughout Europe, and these, together with the logical works of Boethius, were called, in school parlance, the Old Logic; in contradistinction to those Aristotelian treatises which became known in Northern Europe only in the twelfth century, and hence were designated as the New Logic. The old cloistral and cathedral schools had kept alive the study of the Latin classics, and handed it on to the universities; but the passion for dialectic swept aside the study of grammar and rhetoric. The Latin classics were largely read, but the Greek classics were unknown. It was not until the rise of Humanism in the fifteenth century that the study of the ancient literatures of Rome and Greece was, generally speaking, made a regular and important part of the university course in Arts.

The following list includes books that are to be read, or lectured on, by the Masters of the Faculty of Arts, at Paris in 1254. It covers the period of six or seven years from entrance, or matriculation, up to the Master's degree, and, were the disputations added, it might be regarded as typical of the Arts course in the medieval universities generally. A specific date was set for finishing the reading of each book.

1. Old Logic: Porphyry, "Isagoge" (Introduction to the Categories); Aristotle, "Categories" and "Periphrasis"; Boethius, "Divisions" and "Topiques", except Bk. V.
5. Astronomy: Aristotle, "De Coelo" and "Meteorum".
6. Psychology and Natural Philosophy: Aristotle, "Physics"; "De Animalibus"; "De Anima"; "De Generationibus et Corruptionibus" (attributed to the time of Aristotle), "De Causis"; "De Sensu et Sensibilibus"; "De Sensu," "De Vigilia"; "De Plantis"; "De Memoria et Reminiscencia"; "Vita De Morte," "De Honore," "De Beneficis," "De Magnifici," "De Contemptu," etc.
7. Grammar and Rhetoric: Priorian Major (19 books of his "Institutio Grammatica"), Priorian Minor (last two books of the same); Gilbert de la Porret, "Sex Principia"; Barbarismus (third book of Donatus, "Ars Major"); Priorian, "De Amenta".

(Cf. Chartularium Univ. Paris, Part I, n. 246.)

Masters of Arts, like masters, or doctors, of other faculties, were divided into regents and non-regents. Regents were Masters actually engaged in teaching. All who received the degree of Master in the Arts course at Paris derived only from the Faculty of Arts, i.e., to teach, for a period of two years, unless dispensed. The purpose of this statute was, partly at least, to provide a sufficiency of teachers for the Arts course, which usually included the great mass of the students of the University, and which was the necessary gateway to the higher studies of theology, law, and medicine. As the Master's degree, at Paris, could be taken at twenty years of age, the consequence of the regimen rule was to make the Faculty of Arts a body of young men, many of them being at the same time students of one of the higher faculties, or preparing to become such. Teaching included lectures, disputes, and disputations. It was long before there were salaries, the Masters being dependent on what they were able to collect as tuition-fees from their pupils. The oath requiring newly created Masters to teach for a period at the university was abolished at Paris only in 1492. At Oxford, teaching for a half-century later, and some vestiges of it remained until comparatively recent times. The Privy Grant of the modern German University represents a development of the medieval regimen rule.

At Oxford and Cambridge, which have the most faithfully adhered to the medieval archetype, the Faculty, of Arts, occupies a position of preeminent importance. At Oxford, especially, the Arts studies still furnish the materials for the most characteristic type of mental training given by the University. The A.B. course is followed by the great majority of the students, and philosophy, much of it Aristotelian, is still the backbone of the body of knowledge for all candidates for the Baccalaureate. The Master of Arts at Oxford on taking his degree becomes a member of the Faculty by right, and a member of the governing body of the University as well. The governing body consists of two houses, the Congregation and the Convocation, the former including all resident Masters, and the latter those who are non-resident. Outside of England, the relative position of the Faculty of Arts in the university has been considerably altered since medieval times. The promising development of the Arts studies under Humanism was checked in Northern Europe by the battles that raged in these universities and civil wars which grew out of the preaching of the new doctrines by Luther and the other reformers. The effect was most evident in Germany, where, until the close of the seventeenth century, the course in Arts, or Philosophy, as it had come to be called, was relegated to a position of decided inferiority. Theology was in the foreground, and it became the fashion to look upon the study of the classics with contempt. With the eighteenth century, however, a new era began. Under the lead of the new universities, Halle and Göttingen, philosophical studies gradually regained a place of importance, and the Licentia docendi, which the University of Salamanca had by the end of the sixteenth century completely recovered their ancient prestige. Taking Germany as a whole, the Faculty of Philosophy includes to-day about one-fourth of all the teachers in the universities. In modern times the development of knowledge, especially of sciences, has, in some universities, led to fundamental changes in the constitution of the Faculty of Arts. Owing to the multiplication of courses, the teachers in the Faculty of Arts in many cases outnumber those in all the other Faculties together. The difficulties arising out of this condition come not only from the fact that the Faculty of Arts in such cases is a larger body than it formerly was, but also from the fact that its members have fewer interests in common. In the days when Aristotle was the text-book for both philosophy and science, it was natural enough that teachers of the two branches should work side by side; their courses overlapped on both sides. But to-day there is often little in common between them, except what results from the traditional association of their respective subjects under the same faculty. In France, the problem has been met by splitting the Faculty of Arts into two separate faculties, those of Letters and of Science. At most of the German universities the Faculty of Philosophy has remained intact, but the old humanistic group of studies and the mathematical-science group receive recognition respectively as distinct departments. In a few institutions, however, the problem has been solved, as in France, by dividing the Faculty of Philosophy into two separate faculties, or even into three. In American universities and colleges the Faculty of Arts occupies much the same position as at Oxford, although there is considerable diversity in the names by which it is officially known. It usually has under its jurisdiction the great majority of professors and students, and all courses of study outside of the purely professional and technical departments. In some cases the Faculty has been split up into several distinct faculties; but in general there has been a strong desire to adhere to the medieval tradition that all cultural studies, whether undergraduate or professional, whether in the arts or in the sciences, should be grouped together, the danger of insufficiency being guarded against usually by dividing the Faculty into a number of departments, each of which controls, to a greater or less extent, the work of its instructors and students.

Arts, Master of, an academic degree higher than that of Bachelor. The conferring of the degree of Master of Arts, as a title invested with certain specific academic privileges, is closely connected in origin with the early history of the University of Paris, which was the mother-university in arts as Bologna was in law. Originally, the degree meant simply the right to teach, the Licentia docendi, and this right could be granted, in Paris, only by the Chancellor of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, or the Chancellor of St. Geneviève. According to the Tenement of Lauren, held in 1179, this Licentia docendi had to be granted gratuitously to all duly qualified applicants. It was the Chancellor's right to determine the question of the applicant's fitness. But in time, as the number of candidates for the degree increased, and the university developed, the ceremony of presentation before the Chancellor became more and more of a formality, and the responsibility for the fitness of the candidate devolved upon his teacher, and his teacher's associates. Although, however, the Chancellor's licence unquestionably conferred the right to teach, it did not make the recipient a full Master. For this it was required, in addition, that the faculty in which the candidate was to teach, namely the University of Paris, did recognize the recipient as a Master, and admit him to a place among themselves. This ceremony, by which the Licentiate became a full Master, was known as Inceptio. As the term implies, the ceremony involved a beginning of actual teaching, the Licentiate delivering a lecture. The term "Commencement," as applied to graduation exercises, is but the English equivalent of the medieval Inceptio, and was first used at Cambridge. The ceremony of formally investing the young teacher with the title and insignia of a Master consisted in the bestowal of the biretta, or Master's cap, the open book, and the kiss of fellowship, after which he took his seat in the magisterial chair. Half a year or so elapsed between the granting of the Licence and the Inception. No examination was required before Inception, the candidate's fitness having been tested before the conferring of the Licence. Those who survived the trial from the Chancellor were admitted to Inception as a matter of course. The candidate for the Licence in Arts had to pass two examinations, a preliminary one, conducted by the Chancellor, and another conducted by the faculty itself. In going to receive the Licence, the candidates were arranged in the order of their academic standing, a custom which developed into the modern system of graduation honours. The ceremony was conducted with great pomp. Part of the proceedings consisted in the "Collations", or the giving of lectures by some of the candidates. The Chartularium of the University of Paris gives the formula used by the Chancellor in conferring the Licence as follows: "Et ego suectoriter apostolorum Petri et Pauli in hac parte mihi commissâ do vobis licentiam legendi, regendi, disputandi et determinandi ceteraque actus scholasticos seu magistrales exercendi in facultate artium Parisiis et universitate Patruis, in collationibus, in quaestoriatibus et in omnibus sanctis.

Amen." (Chartularium, II, App. 679.)

In medieval times, the title of Master was practically synonymous with that of Doctor, the former being more in favour at Paris and the universities modelled after it, and the latter at Bologna and its derivative universities. At Oxford and Cambridge this distinction came to be drawn between the Faculty of Law, Medicine, and Theology and the Faculty of Arts in this respect, the title of Doctor being used for the former, and that of Master for the latter. In Germany "Doctor" is exclusively used, but the German university diploma still frequently evidences the original equivalence of the two titles, the recipient being styled Magister Artium et Doctor Philosophiae. In France the original practical equivalence of the Licentiate and the Mastership, or the Doctorate, developed into a distinction amounting to separate degrees. Under the present university system in France, the Bachelor may attain the Licence in Arts one year after receiving the Baccalaureate, although generally two years at least are found necessary. After the Licentiate, a considerable period elapses before the Doctorate can be obtained. No set time is required for the Doctorate, but the high standard of qualification prevents candidates from applying for it in consequences for many, years after the Licentiate is received.

At Oxford, the degree of Master of Arts has retained much the same academic significance it had during the Middle Ages. The degree admits the recipient ipso facto to the Faculty of Arts and to the
The ancient privilege of "Regency", or the right to teach, though only in the colleges, the university professors being specially appointed. In American universities, which followed here the example of Oxford and Cambridge, the Mastership was, until 1860, the only degree given in Arts after the Baccalaureate, and it was usually conferred several years after the Baccalaureate, residence at the institution meanwhile not being requisite. In that year, however, the growing influence of German academic ideals was evidenced in the introduction by Yale, of the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. Since then one university after another has introduced this degree, until at present, the offering of a course of study and research leading to the Doctorate in Philosophy, has come to be looked upon as a test of the fitness of an institution to be classed as a graduate school or university. Generally speaking, a minimum of three years' time is required for the degree after the Baccalaureate, and a thesis embodying original research on some important subject is, as in Germany, regarded as the most important test of qualification. The development of the Doctorate course in American universities has had important effects upon the degree of A.M. It now holds a middle place between the Baccalaureate and the Doctorate, and in order to obtain it in the universities, a minimum residence of one year is required. The bringing together in this way of the historic degrees of Master of Arts and Doctor of Philosophy, although effected somewhat at the expense of the Mastership, is an interesting phenomenon pointing to the two great university types after which the American university has been moulded, the relative positions of the two degrees indicating, at the same time, the predominance at present of the German over the English type.

Arts, The Seven Liberal.—The expression artes liberales, chiefly used during the Middle Ages, does not mean arts as we understand the word at the present day, but those branches of knowledge which were taught in the schools of that time. They are called liberal (Lat. liber, free), because they serve the purpose of training the free man, in contrast with the artes illiberales, which were pursued for economic purposes; their aim is to prepare the student not for gaining a livelihood, but for the pursuit of science in the strict sense of the term, i.e. the combination of philosophy and theology known as scholasticism. They are seven in number, but may be arranged in two groups, the first embracing grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic, in other words, the sciences of language, of oratory, and of logic, better known as the artes sermocinales, or language studies; the second group comprises arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music, i.e. the mathematico-physical disciplines, known as the artes reales, or physicae. The first group is considered to be the elementary group, whence these branches are also called artes triviales, or trivium, i.e. a well-beaten ground like the junction of three roads, or a cross-roads open to all. Contrasted with them we find the mathematical disciplines as artes quadriviales, or quadrivium, or a road with four branches. The seven liberal arts are thus the members of a system of studies which embraces language branches as the lower, the mathematical branches as the intermediate, and science properly so called as the uppermost and terminal grade. Though not a distinct development conceded by its name only until the Middle Ages, still it extends in the history of pedagogy both backwards and forwards; for while, on the one hand, we meet with it among the classical nations, the Greeks and Romans, and even discover analogous forms as forerunners in the educational system of the ancient Orientals, its influence, on the other hand, has lasted far beyond the Middle Ages, up to the present time.

It is desirable, for several reasons, to treat the system of the seven liberal arts from this point of view, and this we propose to do in the present article. The subject possesses a special interest for the modern student, extending through more than two thousand years and still in full operation, here challenges our attention as surpassing both in its duration and its local ramifications all other phases of pedagogy. But it is equally instructive for the philosopher because thinkers like Pythagoras, Plato, and St. Augustine collaborated in the framing of the system, and in much thought and, we may say, much pedagogical wisdom have been embodied in it. Hence, also, it is of importance to the practical teacher, because among the comments of so many schoolmen on this subject may be found many suggestions which are of the greatest utility.

The Oriental system of study, which exhibits an instructive analogy with the one here treated, is that of the ancient Hindus still in vogue among the Brahmins. In this, the highest object is the study of the Vedas, i.e. the science or doctrine of divine things, the sacred writings of ancient India, for the understanding of which auxiliary sciences were pressed into service, four of which, viz. phonology, grammar, exegesis, and logic, are of a linguistically-logical nature, and can thus be compared with the Trivium; while two, viz. astronomy and metrics, belong to the domain of mathematics, and therefore to the Quadrivium. The remainder, viz. law, ceremonial lore, legendary lore, and dogma, belong to theology. Among the Greeks the place of the Veda is taken by philosophy, i.e. the study of wisdom, the science of ultimate causes which in one point of view is identical with theology, "Theological" or "Natural Theology" i.e. the doctrine of the nature of the Godhead and of Divine things, was considered as the domain of the philosopher, just as "political theology" was that of the priest, and "mystical theology" of the poet. [See O. Willmann, Geschichte des Idealismus (Brunswick, 1894), I, § 10.] Pythagoras (who flourished between 540 B.C. and 510 B.C.) first called himself a philosopher, but was also esteemed as the greatest Greek theologian. The curriculum which he arranged for his pupils led up to the lepida kategoria, i.e. the sacred teaching, the preparation for which the students received i.e. mathematika, or sciences. In which was occupied with the mathema, the "science of teaching"—that, in fact, now known as mathematics. The preparation for this was that which the disciples underwent as deissmatikos, "hearers", after which preparation they were introduced to what was then current among the Greeks as mousica phainetai", "musical education", consisting of reading, writing, lessons from the poets, exercises in memorizing, and the technique of music. The intermediate position of mathematics is attested by the ancient expression of the Pythagoreans meta hemina i.e. "spear-distance"; properly, the space between the combatants; in this case, between the elementary and the strictly scientific education. Pythagoras is moreover renowned for having converted geometrical, i.e. mathematical, investigation into a form of education for freemen. (Proclus, Commentary on Euclid, I, p. 19, την περι την γεωμετρια φιλοσοφιαν ουκ ημιτονικα μεταθεται χαρατις την υποimation αγνωστην, he covered a mean or intermediate stage between the mathematics of the temple and the mathematics of practical life, such as that used by surveyors and business people; he preserves the high aims of the former, at the same time making it the palestra of intellect; he prescribes a religious discipline into the service of secular life without, however, robbing it.
of its sacred character, just as he previously transformed physical theology into natural philosophy without alienating it from its hallowed origin. (Geschichte des Idealismus, I, 19 at the end). An extension of the elementary studies was brought about by the active, though somewhat unsettled, mental life which developed after the Persian wars in the 5th b. C. Plato, in his study of reading and writing, they advanced to the theory of speaking and its theory (rhetoric), with which was combined dialectic, properly the art of alternate discourse, or the discussion of the pro and con. This change was brought about by the sophists, particularly by Gorgias of Leontium. They also attached more importance to special knowledge in the practical and practical knowledge. Of Hippias of Elis it is related that he boasted of having made his mantle, his tunic, and his foot-gear (Cicero, De Oratore, iii, 32, 127). In this way, current language gradually began to designate the whole body of educational knowledge as encyclical, i. e. as universal, or all-embracing (εγχειρία πανεμπορία, or μαθηματα; εγχειρία πανεμπορία). The expression indicated originally the current knowledge common to all, but later assumed the above-mentioned meaning, which has also passed into our word encyclopedia.

Socrates having already strongly emphasized the necessity of a Platonic education, Plato (429-347 b. C.) protested against its degeneration from an effort to acquire culture into a heaping-up of multifarious information (πολυπεραγμοσι). In the “Republic” he proposes a course of education which appears to be the Pythagorean course perfected. It begins with musico-gymnastic culture, by means of which he aims to impress upon the senses the fundamental forms of the beautiful and the good, i. e. rhythm and form (αειδε). The intermediate course embraces the mathematical branches, viz. arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music, which are calculated to put into action the powers of reflection (διάφωσ), and to enable the student to progress by degrees from sensual to intellectual perception, as he successively masters the theory of numbers, of forms, of the kinetic laws of bodies, and of the laws of (musical) sounds. This leads to the highest grade of the educational system, its pinnacle (δρυς) so to speak, i. e. philosophy, which Plato calls dialectic; thus, elevating the word from its current meaning to signify the science of the Eternal as ground and prototype of the world of sense. This progress to dialectic (διαλεκτικ νοεροσ) is the work of our highest cognitive faculty, the intuitive intellect (αναγνωστικον αναγνωστικόν), a psychological, or noetic, basis for the sequence in his studies, namely: sense-perception, reflection, and intellectual insight. During the Alexandrine period, which begins with the closing years of the fourth century before Christ, the encyclical studies assume scholastic forms. Grammar as the science of language (technical grammar) and explanation of the classics (exegetical grammar), take the lead; rhetoric becomes an elementary course in speaking and writing. By dialectic they understood, in accordance with the teaching of Aristotle, directions enabling the student to present acceptable and valid views on a given subject. By dialectic he means a psychological, or noetic, basis for the sequence in his studies. Among the Romans grammar and rhetoric were the first to obtain a firm foothold; culture was thus identified with eloquence, as the art of speaking and the mastery of the spoken word based upon a manifold knowledge of things. In his “Institutiones Oratoriae” Quintilian, the first professor eloquentiae at Rome in Vespasian’s time, begins his instruction with grammar, or, to speak precisely, with Latin and Greek Grammar proceeds to the plain study of words and conclusions with rhetoric, which comprises not only elocution and a knowledge of literature, but also logical—in other words dialectical—instructions. However, the encyclical system as the foundation of the liberal arts, or Artes Bona, i. e. the learning of the vir bonus, or patriot, was also preserved in special individual schools of practical and practical knowledge and discipline (Digituriae) of the learned M. Terentius Varro of Reate, an earlier contemporary of Cicero, treats of the seven liberal arts adding to them medicine and architecture. How the latter science came to be connected with the general studies is shown in the book “De Architectura”, by M. Vitruvius Pollio, a writer of the time of Augustus, in which excellent remarks are made on the organic connection existing between all studies. “The inexperienced”, he says, “may wonder at the fact that so many various things can be retained in the memory; but as soon as they observe that all branches of learning hang in close connection with each other, the matter will seem very simple; for universal science (εγχειρία, discipline) is composed of the special sciences as a body is composed of members, and those who from their earliest youth have been instructed in the different branches of knowledge (partis eruditionibus) recognize in all the same fundamental features (notas) and the mutual relations of all branches, and therefore grasp everything more easily” (Vitr., De Architectura, I, 1, 12).

In these views the Platonic conception is still operative, and the Romans always retained the conviction that in philosophy alone was to be found the perfection of education. Cicero enumerates the following as the elements of a liberal education: grammar, music, literature, poetry, natural science, ethics, and politics. (Artes quibus liberales doctrinae atque ingenio continentur; geometria, litterarum cognitio et poetarum, atque illa quae de naturis rerum, quae res dominium moribus, quae de rebus publicis dicitur.)

Christianity taught men to regard education and culture as a work for eternity, to which all temporary objects are secondary. It softened, therefore, the antithesis between the liberal and illiberal arts; the Platonic conception of education was purified of its psychological basis, and so “that the man of God may be perfected, furnished to every good work” (II Tim., iii, 17). In consequence, labour, which among the classic nations had been regarded as unworthy of the free man, who should live only for leisure, was now ennobled; but learning, the offering of leisure, lost nothing of its dignity. The Christians retained the expression, μαθηματα πεπερισμα, studia liberalia, as well as the gradation of these studies, but now Christian truth was the crown of the system in the form of religious instruction for the people, and of theology for the learned. The appreciation of the several branches of knowledge was largely influenced by the view expressed by St. Augustine in his little book, “De Doctrina Christiana”. As a former teacher of rhetoric and as master of eloquence, he was thoroughly familiar with the Artes and had written upon some of them. Grammar retains the first place in the education of the young; but, not to interfere with the search for the truth which they contain. The choicest gift of bright minds is the love of truth, not of the words expressing it. “For what avails a golden key if it cannot give access to the object which we wish to reach, and why find fault with a wooden key if it serves our purpose?" (De Doctr. Christ., IV, 11, 26). In estimating the importance of linguistic studies as a means of interpreting Scripture, Augustine would be less interested in exegetical, rather than technical grammar. Dialetic must also prove its worth in the interpretation of Scripture; "it traverses the entire text like a tissue of nerves" (Per totum textum scripturarum colligata est nervorum vicus, ibid., II, 40, 56). Rhetoric contains the rubric of fuller discussion (argumenta extensoria disputationis); it is used rather to set forth what we have understood than to aid us in understanding (ibid., II, 18). St. Augustine compared a masterpiece of rhetoric with the wisdom and beauty of the cosmos, and of history "ita quidam non verborum, sed rerum, eloquentiam opposivm secundum unum componitur" (De Civit. Dei, XI, 18). Mathematics was not invented by man, but its truths were discovered; they make known to us the mysteries concealed in the numbers found in Scripture, and lead the mind upwards from the mutable to the immutable; and interpreted in the spirit of Divine Love, they become for the mind a source of that wisdom which has ordered all things by measure, weight, and number (De Doctr. Christ., II, 39, also Wisdom, xi, 21). The truths elaborated by the philosophers of old, like precious ore drawn from the depth of the well-dug; Prov. 4:20 are triumphantly proved by the Christian in the spirit of the Gospel, just as the Israelites used the sacred vessels of the Egyptians for the service of the true God (De Doctr. Christ., II, 41).

The series of text-books on this subject in vogue during the Middle Ages begins with the work of an African, Marcianus Capella, written at Carthage about A. D. 420. It bears the title "Satyricon Libri IX" from saturo, sc. lanx, a full dish". In the first two books, "Nuptias Philologiae et Mercurii", carrying out the allegory that Phœbus presents the Seven Liberal Arts as maidens to the bride Philology, mythological and other topics are treated. In the seven books that follow, each of the Liberal Arts presents the sum of her teaching. A simpler presentation of the same subject is found in the little book, intended for clerics, entitled, "De artibus ac disciplinis liberillianum", which was written by Taddeo Gaddi in the Dominican convent of Santa Maria Novella in Florence, printed in 1432, the central figure of which is St. Thomas Aquinas, who either Doctr. Christ. (about A. D. 250) or Priscian (about A. D. 530), the two most prominent teachers of grammar, in the art of instructing a boy; Rhetoric accompanied by Cicero; Dialectic by Zeno of Elea, whom the ancients considered as founder of the art; Arithmetic by Abraham, as the representative of the philosophy of numbers, and versed in the knowledge of the stars; Geometry by Euclid (about 300 B.C.), whose "Elements" was the text-book par excellence; Astronomy by Ptolemy, whose "Almagest" was considered to be the canon of star lore; Music by Tuba C's using the hammer, probably in allusion to the number 600. These muses have suggested to Pythagoras his theory of intervals. As counterparts of the liberal arts are found seven higher sciences: civil law, canon law, and the five branches of theology entitled speculative, scriptural, scholastic, contemplative, and apologetic. (Cf. Geschichte der Idealisismus, II, Par. 74, where the position of St. Thomas Aquinas towards the sciences is discussed.)

An instructive picture of the seven liberal arts in the twelfth century may be found in the work entitled "Didascalia", and "Eruditorium Didascalici", written by the Augustinian canon, Hugo of St. Victor, who died at Paris in 1141. He was descended from the family of the Counts Blankenburg in the Harz Mountains and received his education at the Augustinian convent of Hammersleben.
in the Diocese of Halberstadt, where he devoted himself to the liberal arts from 1109 to 1114. In his "Didascalicon", VI, 3, he writes, "I make bold to say that I never have despised anything belonging to erudition, but have learned much which to others seemed to be trifling and foolish. I remember how, as a schoolboy, I endeavoured to ascertain the number of grains of sand on the surface of the earth, under my hands, and how I formulated my own thoughts concerning them [pendentes liberis], namely: that one cannot know the nature of things without knowing their names. How often have I set myself as a voluntary daily task the study of names [nomina] which are included in all of the Holy Writ as the mean of perpetuating for the sake of brevity, by means of a catchword or two [dictionibus] on the page, in order to commit to memory the solution and the number of nearly all the opinions, questions, and objections which I had learned. I invented legal cases and analyses with pertinent objections [dispositiones ad incubum controreserit], and in doing so carefully distinguished between the methods of the rhetorician, the orator, and the sophist. I represented numbers by pebbles, and covered the floor with black lines, and proved clearly by the diagram before me the differences between acute-angled, right-angled, and obtuse-angled triangles, to the greater astonishment of the class. Natural philosophy seen in a square has the same area as a rectangle two of whose sides are multiplied, by stepping off the length in both cases [utroque procurrens podismo]. I have often watched through the winter night, gazing at the stars [horoscopus—not astrological forecasting, which was forbidden, but pure star-study]. Often have I strung the magaga [Gr. µαγάγας, an instrument of 20 strings, giving ten tones] measuring the strings according to numerical values, and stretching them over the wood in order to catch with my ear the difference between the tones, and at the same time to gladden my heart with the sweet melody. This was all done in a boyish way, but it was far from useless, for this knowledge was not burdensome to me. I do not recall these things in order to boast of my attainments, which are of little or no value, but to show you that the most orderly worker is the most skilful one [silvis incedere aptissime qui incedet ordinem alis]. For many, who, wishing to wit a great jump, fall into an abyss: for as with the virtues, so in the sciences there are fixed steps. But, you will say, I find in histories much useless and forbidden matter: why should I busy myself therewith? Very true, there are in the Scriptures many things which, detached by themselves, will be bold enough for acquiring, but which, if you compare them with others connected with them, and if you weigh them, bearing in mind this connection [in toto suo truitinare cæperis], will prove to be necessary and useful. Some things are worth knowing on their own account; but others, though apparently offering no return for our trouble, should not be neglected, because without them the former cannot be thoroughly mastered [enucleare scrii non possunt]. Learn everything; you will afterwards discover that nothing is superfluous; limited knowledge affords no enjoyment [coarctata scientia jucunda non est].

The connection of the Arts with philosophy and wisdom was faithfully kept in mind during the Middle Ages. Hugo says of it: "Among all the departments of knowledge the ancients assigned seven to be studied by beginners, because they found that they spread out more than the thirty that whoever has thoroughly mastered them can afterwards master the rest rather by research and practice than by the teacher's oral instruction. They are, as it were, the best tools, the fittest entrance through which the way to philosophic truth is opened to our intellect. Hence the names trivium and quadrivium, because here the robust mind progresses as it upon roads or paths to the secrets of wisdom. It is for this reason that there were among the ancients, who followed this path, so many wise men. Our schoolmen [scholasticæ] are disinclined, or do not know while studying, how to adhere to the appropriate method, whence it is that there are many viri mathenarum [doctores], but few wise men" (Didascalicon, III, 3).

St. Bonaventure (1221-74) in his treatise "De Reductione artium ad theologiam" proposes a profound explanation of the origin of the Artes, including philosophy: baseing it upon the method through which Holy Writ teaches us to live, Scripture speaks to us in three ways: by speech (sermo), by instruction (doctrina), and by directions for living (vita). It is the source of truth in speech, of truth in things, and of truth in morals, and therefore equally of rational, natural, and moral philosophy. Rational philosophy, having for object the spoken truth, treats it from the triple point of view of expression, of communication, and of impulsion to action; in other words it aims to express, to teach to persuade (exprimere, docere, movere). These activities are represented by sermo congruus, verus oratus, and the arts of grammar, dialectic, and rhetoric. These are the means by which things themselves as rationes seminales, the truth in the mind as rationes intellectuales, and the truth in God as rationes ideales, and accordingly it is divided into physics, mathematics, and metaphysics. Moral philosophy determines the vertas vita for the life of the individual as monastica (µοναστικά), the domestic life as economica, and for society as politica.

To general erudition and encyclopedic learning medieval education had less close relations than that of Alexandria, principally because the Trivium had a formal character, i. e. it aimed at training the mind rather than imparting knowledge. The system of classic authors was considered as an appendix to the Trivium. Hugo, who, as we have seen, does not undervalue it, includes in his reading poems, fables, histories, and certain other elements of instruction (poema, fabula, historia, didascalia quadam). The science of language, to use the expression of Augustine, is still designated as the key to all positive knowledge; for this reason its position at the head of the Arts (Artes) is maintained. So John of Salisbury (b. between 1110 and 1120; d. 1180, Bishop of Chartres) says: "If grammar is the key of all literature, and the mother and mistress of language, it will certainly turn out to be the proper threshold of philosophy. Only he who thinks that what is written and spoken is unnecessary for the student of philosophy" (Metaleticus, I, 21).

Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173) makes grammar the servant of history, for he writes, "All arts serve the Trivium Wisdom, and each lower art, if rightly ordered, leads to a higher one. Thus the relation existing between the word and the thing required that grammar, dialectic, and rhetoric should minister to history" (Rich., ap. Vincentium Bell., Spec. Doctrinale, XVII, 31). The Quadrivium had, naturally, certain relations to the sciences and to life; this was recognized by the progressions of geometry, and the study of the calendar as a part of astronomy. We meet with the development of the Artes into encyclopedic knowledge as early as Isidore of Seville and Rabanus Maurus, especially in the latter's work, "De Universo". It was completed in the thirteenth century, and is well known by the works of Vincent of Beauvais (d. 1264), instructor of the children of St. Louis (IX). In his "Speculum Naturale" he treats of God and nature; in the "Speculum Doctrinale", starting from the Trivium, he deals with the sciences; in the "Speculum Morale" he discusses the moral world. To these a continuator added a “Speculum Historiae” which was simply a universal history.

For the academic development of the Artes it was of importance that the universities accepted them as a part of their curricula. Among their own faculties, the Ordo Theologorum, also called the faculty of philosophy, was fundamental: Universitas fundator in artibus It furnished the preparation not only for the Ordo Theologorum, but also for the Ordo Legislatorum, or law faculty, and the Ordo Physicorum, or medical faculty. Of the methods of teaching and the continued study of the universities of the sixteenth century, that of the textbook of the contemporary Carthusian, Gregory Reisch, Confessor of the Emperor Maximilian I, gives us a clear picture. He teaches in twelve books: (I) of the Rudiments of Grammar; (II) of the Principles of Logic; (III) of the Parts of an Oration; (IV) of Memory of Letter-writing and of Arithmetic; (V) of the Principles of Music; (VI) of the Elements of Geometry; (VII) of the Principles of Astronomy; (VIII) of the Principles of Natural Things; (IX) of the Origin of Natural Things; (X) of the Soul; (XI) of the Powers; (XII) of the Physical Philosophy. The Latin edition printed in 1512 at Strasburg has for appendix: the elements of Greek literature, Hebrew, figured music and architecture, and some technical instruction (Grecarum litterarum Institutiones, Hebraearum litterarum Rudimenta, Musices figurarum Institutiones, Architecture Rudimenta). At the universities the Artes, at least in a formal way, held their place up to modern times. At Oxford, Queen Mary (1553–58) erected for them colleges whose inscriptions are significant, thus: “Grammatica, Litterae disce”; “Rhetorica persuasor mores”; “Dialectica, Impostures fugae”; “Arithmetica, Omnis numeris constant”; “Musica, Ne tibi dissidiae”; “Geometria, Cura quae domi sunt”; “Astronomia, Altiora ne quiesceris”. The title “Master of the Liberal Arts” is still granted at some of the universities in connection with the Doctorate of Philosophy; in England that of “Doctor of Music” is still in regular use. In practical teaching, however, the system of the Artes has declined since the sixteenth century. The Renaissance saw in the technique of style (eloquentia) and in its mainstay, erudition, the ultimate object of collegiate education, thus following the Roman rather than the Greek. Grammar and rhetoric came to be the chief elements of the study of the sciences of the Quadrivium were embodied in the miscellaneous learning (eruditio) associated with rhetoric. In Catholic higher schools philosophy remained as the intermediate stage between philosophical studies and professional studies; while according to the Protestant scheme philosophy was taken over (to the university) as a Faculty subject. The Jesuit schools present the following gradation of studies: grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, and, since philosophy begins with logic, this system retains also the ancient dialectic.

All the studies spoken of above, must be sought in the encyclopedic learning which grew unceasingly during the seventeenth century. Amos Comenius (d. 1671), the best known representative of this tendency, who sought in his “Orbis Pictus” to make this diminutive encyclopedia (encyclopaedia) the basis of the earliest grammatical instruction, contains so much talk-of-the, the knowledge of which the common people believe a master of philosophy to acquire thoroughly”, and proudly declares, “Our men rise to greater height” (Magna Didactica, xxx, 2.) His school classes are the following: grammar, physics, mathematics, ethics, dialectic, and rhetoric. In the eighteenth century undergraduate studies take on more and more the encyclopedic character, and in the nineteenth century the class system is replaced by the department system, in which the various subjects are treated simultaneously with little or no reference to their gradation; in this way the Artes, which were finally surrendered. Where, moreover, as in the Gymnasia of Germany, philosophy has been dropped from the course of studies, miscellaneous erudition becomes in principle an end unto itself. Nevertheless, present educational systems preserve traces of the older systematic arrangement (language, mathematics, philosophy). In the early years of his Gymnasium, the course the youth must devote his time and energy to the study of languages, in the middle years, principally to mathematics, and in his last years, when he is called upon to express his own thoughts, he begins to deal with logic and dialectic, even if it be only in the form of composition. He therefore touching upon philosophy. This gradation which works its own way, so to speak, out of the present chaotic condition of learned studies, should be made systematic; the fundamental idea of the Artes Liberales would thus be revived.

The Canon of the Liberal Arts. The liberal arts we should advance gradually from sense-perception by way of intellectual argumentation to intellectual intuition, is by no means antiquated. Mathematical instruction, admittedly a preparation for the study of logic, could only gain if it were conducted in this spirit, if it were made logically clearer, if its technical content were reduced, and if it were allowed by logic. The express correlation of mathematics to astronomy, and to musical theory, would bring about a wholesome concentration of the mathematico-physical sciences, now threatened with a plethora of erudition. The insistence of older writers upon the organic character of the content of mathematics, deserves earnest consideration. For the purpose of concentration a mere packing together of uncorrelated subjects will not suffice; their original connection and dependence must be brought into clear consciousness. Hugo’s admonition also, to distinguish between hearing (or learning, properly so called) on the one hand, and practice and invention on the other, for which there is good opportunity in grammar and mathematics, deserves attention. Equally important is his demand that the details of the subject taught be weighed—fruitinare, from frutina, the goldsmith’s balance. This gold balance has been used far too long, and it is not surprising that education has suffered. A short-sighted realism threatens even the various branches of language instruction. Efforts are made to restrict grammar to the vernacular, and to banish rhetoric and logic except so far as they are applied in composition. This, is, therefore, not useless to remember the “keys”. In every department of instruction method must have in view the series: induction, based on sensuous perception; deduction, guided also by perception, and abstract deduction—a series which is identical with that of Plato. All understanding implies these three grades, we go from the meaning of what is said, we next understand inferences drawn from sense perception, and finally we understand dialectical conclusions. Invention has also three grades: we find words, we find the solution of problems, we find thoughts. Grammar, mathematics, and logic likewise form a systematic series. A grammar and mathematics of the classical rational and constructive, and the logical rational and speculative (cf. O. Willmann, Dikaktit, II, 67). Humanists, over-fond of change, unjustly condemned the system of the seven liberal arts as barbarous. It is no more barbarous than the Gothic style, a name invented to a reproach. The Gothic, built up on the conception of the old basilica, ancient in origin, yet Christian in character, was misjudged by the Renaissance on account of some excesses, and obscured by the additions engrafted upon it by modern lack of taste (op. cit., p. 230). That the achievements of our forefathers should be understood, recognized, and adapted to our own needs, is surely to be desired.

Artvin, a Russian city in the trans-Caucasian province of Kutais, is situated near Turkish Armenia on the left bank of the Tchoruk, which flows into the Black Sea. In 1894 it contained 5,900 inhabitants, mostly Armenian and Turkish. In Artvin and vicinity there are nine Armenian-Catholic churches, four schools for boys and three schools for girls. The Gregorian Armenians have five churches and two schools. The Armenian-Catholic Diocese of Artvin (Artvinensis Armenorum) was established in 1850 by Pius IX for the United Armenians in southern Russia, and was first suffragan to the Metropolitan of Constantinople, afterwards directly subject to the Armenian-Catholic Patriarch of Cilicia, whose see is Constantinople. The first bishop was, Titus Nersis (1850-58), who succeeded by Antonius Jalal (1859) and Joannes Baptista Zazarian (1878). In 1878, Russia annexed the entire territory of this diocese and united it with Tiraspol. Up to the present time, Russia has prevented the appointment of a bishop and is now trying to cause an apostasy among the Armenians. The diocese of Artvin numbers about 12,000 Catholics of the Armenian Rite; 25 mission priests (of whom 23 are natives); 30 churches and chapels; 22 primary schools with almost 900 pupils. The girls are instructed partly by the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The Catholic Diocese of Aphrodisia in the diocese of Artvin are subject to the regular jurisdiction of the Bishop of Tiraspol.

Arundel, Thomas, sixth Archibishop of Canterbury, second son of Robert, Earl of Arundel and Warren, b. 1353; d. 19 February, 1414. In 1374, while only in his twenty-second year, he was promoted from the archdeaconry of Taunton to the See of Exeter. Made chancellor, 24 October, 1386, he was transferred to York in 1389, and, by papal provision, to Canterbury, 25 September, 1396, when he resigned the chancellorship. In the second year after his translation he incurred the displeasure of the King, Richard II, was attainted of high treason, and banished, together with his brother, Richard Earl of Arundel, and the Duke of Gloucester. He escaped, first to France, then to the papal court, where he was well received by Boniface IX, who conferred upon him the Archiepiscopate of St. Andrews. On the accession of Henry IV, Roger Walden, his successor in the primatial see, was declared a usurper, and Arundel restored, 21 October, 1399, Walden being transferred to York. He was a prominent as having taken a strong stand against the Lollards whose new doctrine he, in company with the bishops of the province, petitioned Rome to condemn, and on account of his sturdy assertion of Transubstantiation and the prerogative and divine institution of the Papacy.

Arundell, Thomas, first Lord Arundell of Wardour, b. 1560; d. at Oxford, 7 November, 1639. He was the son of Sir Matthew Arundell of Wardour Castle, Wiltshire. The Arundells were a very old Norman family settled in Cornwall and dating back to about the middle of the thirteenth century. Thomas, first Lord Arundell of Wardour, was grand-son of a Sir John Arundell, of the Arundella of Lan-berne, "the Great Arundells," a Catholic branch of the family. Sir John had become a Catholic (Dodd, Church History) through Father Cornelius, a native of the neighbouring town of Bodmin. Owing to his defence of Cornelius, Sir John Arundell was imprisoned for nine years in Ely Palace, Hol-land (Challoner, Memoirs, p. 1503). Thomas, first Lord Arundell of Wardour, called "the Valiant," was strongly adverse to the Reformers and refused to attend Protestant services. Elizabeth committed him to prison in 1580. When he was freed, he travelled, and entered the Austrian service under Archduke Matthias, brother of Em-peror Rudolph II. He was fighting against the Ottomans in Hungary, and at the siege of Gran, or Strigonium, 7 September, 1505, he was the first through the breach and, scaling the tower, plucked the Crescent thence and planted in its place the Imperial Standard. The Emperor created him and his posterior Counts of the Holy Roman Empire, 14 December, 1595. On his return to England the peers decided that no privilege or precedence should be shown to his title. James I, recognizing Arundell's deserts and loyalty, rewarded him by creating him a peer with the style and title of Baron Arundell of Wardour, 1605. Charles I at the beginning of his reign forbade the new peer to be styled as a Catholic, though Thomas had contributed liberally to avert the danger of the Spanish Armada. Lord Arundell of Wardour died at the age of seventy-nine. His portrait, by Van Dyck, 1635, is at Wardour.

Thomas, second Lord Arundell of Wardour, succeeded his father in 1639. In the trouble between Charles I and the Parliament, the House of Commons ordered Arundell's arrest, November, 1641, but he evaded capture, and when the royal standard was unfurled at Nottingham, 22 August, 1642, he raised a company of horse and fought for His Majesty's cause. He was wounded in battle, and died at Oxford, 1643. His wife, the heroic Lady Blanche Arundell, was the sixth daughter of Edward, Earl of Worcester, an admirable Catholic, and a discreet and loyal subject. She is known by her spirited defence of Wardour Castle, Wiltshire, during the siege begun by her husband against the men at her command, she withstood thirteen hundred rebels, under Sir Edward Hungerford and Colonel Strode, for eight days. When obliged to capitulate she did so on honourable terms, signed 8 May, 1643. She left the castle destitute, and was supported with lodgings by Sir Edward Herbert. She died at Winchester, 28 October, 1649, and was buried with her husband at Tisbury.

Henry, third Lord Arundell of Wardour, b. 1608; d. 1694, was the sole male issue of Thomas, second Lord, and Lady Blanche Arundell. When he succeeded to the title, in 1643, his wife and sons were born, and Wardour Castle was in the hands of the Parliamentary forces under General Ludlow. To dissuade them, he sacrificed his castle by springing a mine under it. He was subsequently wounded in several battles, his estates were sequestrated, and he was forced to leave the country. When the monarchy was restored Nether Stowey, on whose perjured statement Lord Arundell of Wardour was thrown into the Tower at the instance of the House of Commons, in October, 1678, with four other Catholic peers. During his confinement he wrote some poems, which were published under the title of "Five Little Meditations in Verse" (London, 1679). After five years of imprisonment, during which time one of the peers, Stafford, had been beheaded, and another had died in the Tower, Arundell and his two remaining companions were released, and their indictments annulled, on the ground of perjury. James II made Arundell Keeper of the Privy Seal, 1687. In 1688 he presented an address in the House of Commons. But he afterwards disavowed the admission of Father Petre into the privy council. At the Revolution of 1688 he retired from public life. He was praised for his piety and for his kindness to poor Catholics.

Asaph. See Psalms.

Asaph (or Asa). Saint, first Bishop of the Welsh See of that name (second half of the sixth century). No Welsh life of him is extant, but local tradition points out the site of his ash, his church, his well, and his valley, Onen Assa, Fynnon Assa, Llanfassa, Pentasia. All these sites are in Tengenel, near Holywell, which is said to be the saint's seat and hermitage in that neighbourhood. The want of a Welsh life, however, is in part compensated for by Jocelyn of Furness's life of St. Kintigern, or Mungo, the founder of the Diocese of Glasgow. This saint during his exile (c. 545) betook himself to Wales, and there founded the Celtic Monastery of Llanelwy (the church on the Elwy), as the Welsh still call the town of St. Asaph. Of the building and government of few Celtic monasteries do we know so much as about Llanelwy. The church was built "of smoothed wood, after the fashion of the Britons, but they could not get but cut it of stone." The 965 disciples, of whom Asa was one, were divided into three groups: 300 of the unlettered farmed the outlying lands, 300 worked in the offices around the monastery, and 365 (the number corresponds to the days of the year) attended to the divine services. Of these the oldest assisted Kentigern in the government of the diocese, and the rest were subdivided into three choirs. "As soon as one choir had terminated its service in church, immediately another entering commenced it; and that again being concluded another entered to celebrate." The founder, after the manner of other Celtic saints, used frequently to pray standing in the icy cold river, and, once, having suffered very severely under this hardship, he sent the boy Assa, who was then attending him, to bring a fagot to burn and warm him. Asaph brought him live coals in his apron, and the miracle revealed to Kentigern the sanctity of his disciple. So when the old man was recalled to Strathclyde, after the battle of Arderyd, in 573 (the only definite date we have in the life), Asaph was consecrated bishop to succeed him, and became the first Welsh bishop of the see. The feast of his deposition is kept on 1 May, but we possess no further details of his life, nor do we know the year of his death.

Ascalon, a titular see of Palestine whose episcopal list (351–930 or 40) is given in Gams (p. 453). It was one of the five chief cities of the Philistines (Josh, xxi. 26), and, on a location, on the sea-coast between Gaza and Joppa, made it a stronghold, and as such it was held by the Arabs after their conquest of it in the seventh century. The city was taken by the crusaders, but was destroyed, in 1270, by Sultan Bibars, and its port blocked up to prevent the place ever again falling into Christian hands. Its extensive ruins still remain, and present a scene of mournful desolation.

Ascelin, Ambassador of Innocent IV (1243–54) to the Tatars. He entered the Dominican Order, probably at Paris, in 1221 or 1222. He was distinguished for learning and a zeal zeal for the spread of the Christian Faith. For these reasons, he was selected in 1245, together with three other Dominicans, by Humbert de Romanis, whom as Provincial of France the pope had ordered to select fit men for the embassy to attempt the conversion of the Sultan Melik Saleh, then encamped in Persia. On the authority of Vincent de Beauvais (Speculum Historiale, XXI, 40) who got his information from one of the embassy, Simon of St. Quentin, they met the first great army of the sultan, 24 May, 1247. But their mission was unsuccessful, since they did not bring presents to win the mercurial courtiers. Believing that Ascelin refused the recognition of the khan's dignity. In consequence of this the friars were condemned to death. The khan threatened to flay the leader of the embassy, Ascelin, and send his skin to the pope. The death sentence was remitted in July, 1247, after several months of miserable imprisonment. At the same time the sultan released sufficiently to allow the friars to preach the Gospel and administer the sacraments. This agreement was probably made in the hope of winning Louis IX, of whose military powers Ascelin often spoke, to participate in a concerted onset of the khan on the Mohammedan troops then bounding the march of the Tatar army. The embassy returned to Rome about Easter, 1248, bearing a respectful letter from the sultan to the pope. No proof can be adduced to show that Ascelin met a martyr's death in 1255 on another mission to the Sultan, as Fontana and Bazenvius assert. Bergeron (Recueil des voyages faits en Asie du XIII au XVIIe siecle) gives a description of the embassies of Ascelin and his companions.

Ascendente Domino, a Bull issued by Gregory XIII, 24 May, 1584, in favour of the Society of Jesus, to confirm the Constitutions of the Society, and to continue the privileges already granted to it by Paul III, Julius III, Paul IV, and Pius V. It recalls and confirms the means which St. Ignatius had prescribed in order that the Society might attain the end for which he had founded it. Candidates have first to make two years' novitiate; then they take three simple vows. Thus they cease to be novices, and belong to the body of the Society. They are either Scholastics or formed Temporal Coadjutors, according as they are destined for studies or for domestic duties in the Society. These simple vows are perpetual on the part of those who make them, but on the part of the Society they bind only so long as the General thinks fit to retain as members of the Society those who have taken them. The formed Temporal Coadjutors, after some years, if the General thinks them fit, are admitted to the grade of Formed Temporal Coadjutors. But before they become either Professed or formed Spiritual Coadjutors, the Scholastics, having completed their studies, must go through a third year's probation. If Professed, they take a fourth vow of obedience to assume any mission the Pope may enjoin on them. Any, even those with simple vows made at the end of the second year's novitiate, who leave the Society under any pretext (unless to become Carthusians), without express permission, shall be regarded as apostates, and incur excommunication. The simple vows which they make after their novitiate constitute them religious in the true and proper sense of the word, with the consequent privileges. Thus they enter into a community and the required vows, as solemn vows with other religious, are a diriment impediment to matrimony, that is, a marriage contract attempted by a Jesuit with other vows, even though he be not a priest, would be null and void.

Ascension, the elevation of Christ into heaven by His own power in presence of His disciples the fortieth day after His Resurrection. It is narrated in St. Mark, xvi, 19, St. Luke, xxiv, 51, and in the first chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. Although the place of the Ascension is not distinctly stated, it is found by the Acts that it was Mount Olivet, since after the Ascension the disciples are described as returning to Jerusalem from the mount that is called Olivet, which is nigh Jerusalem, within a Sabbath day's journey. Tradition has consecrated this site as the Mount of Ascension and Christian piety has preserved the ceremonies of erecting over the site a basilica. St. Helena built the first memorial, which was destroyed by the Persians in 614, rebuilt in the eighth century, to be destroyed again, but rebuilt a second time by the crusaders. This the Mohammedans also destroyed, leaving only the octagonal structure which encloses the stone said to bear the imprint of the feet of Christ, that is now used as an oratory. Not only is the fact of the Ascension related in the passages of Scripture cited above, but it is also elsewhere predicted and spoken of as an established fact. Thus, in St. John, vi, 63, Christ asks the Jews:—"If then you shall see the Son of Man ascend up where He was before?" and xx, 17, He says to Mary Magdalene:—"Do not touch Me, for I am not yet ascended to My Father, but go to My brethren, and say to them: I ascend to My Father and to your God, and to your God." Again, in Ephe. iv, 8-10, and I Corinthians iii, 16, the Ascension of the Christ is spoken of as an accepted fact. The language used by the Evangelists to describe the Ascension must be interpreted according to usage. To say that He was taken up, or that He ascended, does not necessarily imply that they locate heaven directly above the earth; no more than the words "sitteth on the right hand of God" mean that this is His actual posture. In disappearing from their view "He was raised up and a cloud received Him out of their sight" (Acts, i, 9), and entering into glory He dwells with the Father in the honour and power denoted by the Scripture phrase.

Ascetical Theology. See THEOLOGY, ASCETICAL.

Asceticism from the Greek ἀσκήσις, which means practice, bodily exercise, and more especially, athletic training. The early Christians adopted it to signify the practice of spiritual things, or spiritual exercise performed for the purpose of acquiring habits of virtue. At present it is not infrequently employed in an opprobrious sense, to designate the religious practices of Oriental fanatics as well as those of the Christian saint, both of whom are by some placed in the same category. It is not uncommonly confounded with austerity, by Catholics, but incorrectly. For although the flesh is continually lusting against the spirit, and repression and self-denial are necessary to control the animal passions, it would be an error to measure a man's virtue by the extent and character of his bodily penances. External penances even in the saints, are regarded with suspicion. St. Jerome, whose proneness to austerity makes him an especially valuable authority on this point, thus writes to Celantia: "Be on your guard with regard to mortification of your body by all sorts of fasting, lest you imagine yourself to be perfect and a saint; for perfection does not consist in this virtue. It is only a help; a disposition; a means, though a fitting one, for the attainment of true perfection." Thus asceticism, according to the definition of St. Jerome, is not an effort to attain true perfection, penance being only an auxiliary virtue thereto. It should be noted also that the expression "fasting and abstinence" is commonly used in Scripture and by ascetic writers as a generic term for all sorts of penance. Neither should asceticism be identified with mysticism. For although genuine mysticism cannot exist without asceticism, asceticism, the reverse is not true. One can be an ascetic without being a mystic. Asceticism is ethical; mysticism, largely intellectual. Asceticism has to do with the moral virtues; mysticism is a state of unusual prayer or contemplation. They are distinct from each other, though mutually co-operative. Moreover, although asceticism is generally associated with the objectionable features of religion, and is regarded by some as one of them, it may be and is practised by those who affect to be swayed by no religious motives whatever.

Natural Asceticism.—If for personal satisfaction, pleasure, honor or another merely human reason, a man aims at the acquisition of the natural virtues, for instance, temperance, patience, chastity, meekness, etc., he is, by the very fact, exercising himself in a certain degree of asceticism. For he has entered upon a struggle with his animal nature; and if he is to achieve any measure of success, his efforts must be continuous and protracted. Nor can he excuse the practice of penance. Indeed he will frequently inflict upon himself bodily and mental pain. He will not even remain within the bounds of strict necessity. He will punish himself severely, either to atone for failures, or to harden his powers of endurance, or to strengthen himself against future failures. He will be commonly described as an ascetic, as in fact he is. For he is endeavouring to subject the material part of his nature to the spiritual, or in other words, he is striving for natural perfection. The defect of this kind of asceticism is that, besides being prone to error in this respect, it performs only those actions and the means it adopts, its motive is imperfect, or bad. It may be prompted by selfish reasons of utility, pleasure, aestheticism, ostentation, or pride. It is not to be relied upon for serious efforts and may easily give way under the strain of weariness or temptation. Finally, it fails to recognize that perfection consists in the acquisition of something more than natural virtue.

Christian Asceticism. It is prompted by the desire to do the will of God, any personal element of self-satisfaction which enters the motive vitiating it more or less. Its object is the subordination of the lower to the dictates of right reason and the law of God, with the view of the cultivation of the virtues which the Creator intended man to possess. Absolutely speaking, the will of God in this matter is discoverable by human reason, but it is explicitly laid down for us in the Ten Commandments, or Decalogue, which furnishes a complete list of mental and moral duties. Penitence is positive; others, negative. The negative precepts, "thou shalt not kill," "thou shalt not commit adultery," etc., imply the repression of the lower appetites, and consequently call for penance and mortification; but they intend also, and affect, the cultivation of the virtues which are opposed to the things forbidden. They develop meekness, gentleness, self-control, patience, constancy, chastity, justice, honesty, brotherly love, magnanimity, liberality, etc.; while the first three which are positive in their character, "thou shalt adore thy God," etc., bring into vigorous and constant exercise and cultivation of these virtues: religion, reverence, and prayer. Finally, the fourth insists on obedience, respect for authority, observance of law, filial piety, and the like. Such were the virtues practised by the mass of the people of God under the Old Law, and this may be considered the mass of the Old Testament. For apart from the many instances of exalted holiness among the ancient Hebrews, the lives of the faithful followers of the Law, that is the main body of the ordinary people, must have been such as the Law enjoined, and although their moral elevation might not be designated as asceticism in the present restricted and distorted meaning of the term, yet it certainly appeared to the pagan world of those times very much as exalted virtue does to the world to-day. Even the works of penance to which they were subjected in the many fasts and abstentions, as well as the requirements of their ceremonial observances, were much more severe than those imposed upon the Christians who succeeded them.

In the New Dispensation the binding force of the Commandments continued, but the practice of virtue took on another aspect, inasmuch as the dominant motive presented to man for the service of God was not fear, but love through fear, with no means eliminated. God was love, and love indeed, but He was at the same time the Father, and men were His children. Again, because of this sonship the love of one's neighbour ascended to a higher plane. The "neighbour" of the Jew was one of the chosen people, and even of him rigorous justice was to be exacted; it was an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. In the Christian dispensation the neighbour is not only one of the true faith, but the schismatic, the outcast, and the pagan. Love is extended even to one's enemies, and we are bidden to pray for, and to do good to, them who revile and persecute us and do all manner of evil against us. This supernatural love for even the vilest and most repellent representatives of humanity constitutes one of the distinctive marks of Christian asceticism. Moreover, the more extended and luminous revelation of Divine things, coupled with the greater abundance of spiritual assistance conferred chiefly through the instruments of the Church, have made the practice of virtue easier and more attractive and at the same time more elevated, generous, intense, and enduring, while the universality of Christianity lifts the practice of asceticism out of the narrow limitations of being the exclusive privilege of a single race into a common possession of all the nations of the earth. The Acts of the Apostles show the transformation immediately effected among the devout Jews who formed the first communities of Christians. That new and elevated form of virtue has remained in the Church ever since.

Wherever the Church has been allowed to exert her influence and find value of the highest order among her people. Even among those whom the world regards as simple and ignorant there are most amazing perceptions of spiritual truths, intense love of God and of all that relates to Him, sometimes remarkable habits of prayer, purity of life both in the physical and mental, heroism of those submitting to poverty, bodily suffering and persecutions; magnanimity in forgiving injury, tender solicitude for the poor and afflicted, though they themselves may be almost in the same condition; and what is most characteristic of all, a complete absence of envy and the need of personal aggrandizement and contentment and happiness in their own lot; while similar results are achieved among the wealthy and great, though not to the same extent. In a word, there is developed an attitude of soul so much at variance with the principles and methods generally obtaining in the pagan world that, from the beginning, it was commonly described and denounced as folly. It might be classified as very lofty asceticism if its practice were not so common, and if the conditions of poverty and suffering in which these virtues are most frequently practised were not the result of practical necessity, even with his sublime and benevolent spirit, the ascetic has not so far considered the conditions of asceticism as voluntary, the patient and uncomplaining acceptance of them constitutes a very noble kind of spirituality which easily develops into one of a higher kind and may be designated as its third degree, which may be described as follows: In the New Law, those who have not merely the reaffirmation of the precepts of the Old, but also the teachings and example of Christ Who, besides requiring obedience to the Commandments, continually appeals to His followers for proofs of personal affection and a closer imitation of His life than is possible by the mere fulfillment of the Law. The motives and the means of the ascetic possess both the national and the universal, which is the basis taken by ascetical writers for their instructions. This imitation of Christ generally proceeds along three main lines, viz.: mortification of the senses, unworldliness, and detachment from family ties.

It is especially that asceticism comes in for censure on the part of its opponents. Mortification, unworldliness, and detachment are particularly obnoxious to them. But in answer to their objection it will be sufficient to note that condemnations of such practices or aspirations must fall on Holy Scripture also, for it gives a distinct warrant for all three. Thus we have, as regards mortification, the words of St. Paul, who says: “I chastise my body and bring it into subjection: lest perhaps when I have preached to others, I myself should become a castaway” (1 Cor., ix, 27); while Our Lord Himself says: “He that taketh not up his cross, and followeth Me, is not worthy of Me” (Matt., x, 38). Commanding unworldliness, we have: “My kingdom is not of this world” (John, xviii, 36); approving detachment, there is the text, not to cite others: “If any man come to Me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple” (Luke, xiv, 26). It is scarcely necessary to note, however, that the word “hate” is not to be taken in its strict sense, but only as indicating a greater love for God than for all things together. Such is the general scheme of this higher order of asceticism.

The character of this asceticism is determined by its motive. In the first place a man may serve God in such a way that he is willing to make any sacrifice rather than commit a grievous sin. This disposition of soul, which is the lowest in the spiritual life, is necessary for salvation. Again, he may be willing to make such sacrifices rather than offend God by voluntary evil. He may, without fear of sin at all, be eager to do whatever will make his life harmonize with that of Christ. It is this last motive which the highest kind of asceticism adopts. These three stages are called by St. Ignatius “the three degrees of humility”, for the reason that they are the three steps in the diminution of self, and consequently three great advances towards conformation with God, who enters the soul in proportion as self is expelled. It is the spiritual state of which St. Paul speaks when he says: “And I live, now not I; but Christ liveth in me” (Gal., ii, 20). Other ascetic writers describe them as states or conditions of the beginner, intermediate, and perfect. They are not, however, to be considered chronologically distinct; as if the perfect man had nothing to do with the methods of the beginner, or vice versa.

“...the building of the spiritual edifice”, says Scaramelli, “is simultaneous in all its parts. The roof is stretched while the foundations are being laid.” Realizing the perfect man, even with his sublime disinterested, imitative asceticism, always needs of the fear of damnation, in order that, as St. Ignatius expresses it, if ever the love of God grows cold, the fear of hell may rekindle it again. On the other hand, the beginner who has broken with mortal sin has already started on his growth to perfect charity. These states are also described as the purgative, illuminative, and unitive ways.

It is evident that the practice of unworldliness, of detachment from family and other ties, must be for the greatest number not the actual performance of those things, but only the serious dispositions or resolutions to make such sacrifices, in case God should require them, which, as a matter of fact in their case, He does not. They are merely affective, and not effective, but none the less they constitute a very sublime kind of spirituality. Sublime as it is, there are many examples of it in the Church, nor is it the practice of those who have not chosen the priestly life of the world or are about to do so, but it is the possession also of many whom necessity compels to live in the world, married as well as single, of those who are in the enjoyment of honour and wealth and of responsibility as well as of those who are in opposite conditions, effectively realising or aspirations, but their affections take that direction.

Thus there are multitudes of men and women who though living in the world are not of it, who have no liking or taste for worldly display, though often compelled by their position, social or otherwise, to assume it, who avoid worldly advancement or honour not out of pusillanimity, but out of unconcern, or contempt, or knowledge of its danger; who, with opportunities for pleasure, practise penance, sometimes of the most rigorous character; who would willingly, if it were possible, give up their lives to works of charity or devotion; who love the poor and dispense alms to the extent of, and even beyond, their means; who have strong attraction for prayer, and who withdraw from the world when it is possible for the meditation of divine things; who frequent the sacraments assiduously; who are the soul of every undertaking for the good of their fellow-men and the glory of God; and who, in the midst of their own worldly cares and anxieties is the advancement of the interest of God and the Church. Bishops and priests especially enter into this category. Even the poor and humble, who, having nothing to give, yet would give if they had any possessions, may be classed among such servants of Christ.

That this asceticism is not only attainable but attained by laymen serves to bring out the truth which is sometimes lost sight of, viz., that the practice of perfection is not restricted to the religious state. In fact, though one may live in the state of perfection, it is, be a member of some religious order, no one can surpass in perfection by a layman in the world. But to reduce these sublime dispositions to actual practice, to make them not only affective but effective, to realize what Christ meant when, after having told the multitude on the Mount of the blessedness of poverty of spirit, He said to the Apostles, “Blessed are you who are poor”, and to reproduce also the other virtues of Christ and the Apostles, the Church has established a life of actual poverty, chastity, and obedience. For that purpose, it has founded religious orders, thus enabling those who are desirous and able to practise this higher order of asceticism, exacting purity, and perfection.

MONASTIC OR RELIGIOUS ASCETICISM.—The establishment of religious orders was not the result of any sudden or mandatory legislation by the Church.
On the contrary, the germs of religious life were implanted in it by Christ Himself from the very beginning. For in the Gospel we have repeated invitations to follow the evangelical counsels. Hence, in the first days of the Church, we find that particular kind of asceticism widely practised which later developed into the form known by the Roman Orders. In the "History of the Roman Breviary", by Batiffol (tr. Bayley), 15, we read: "In proportion as the Church in extending itself had grown older, there had taken place within its bosom a drawing together of those souls which were possessed of the greatest zeal and fervour. These consisted of men and women, living in the world and in the desert, severing themselves from the ties and obligations of ordinary life, yet binding themselves by private vow or public profession to live in chastity all their life, to fast all the week, to spend their days in prayer. They were called in Syria Monemassites and Parthenes, ascetics and virgins. They formed, as it were, a third order, a confraternity. In the first half of the fourth century, we find these associations of ascetics and virgins established in all the great Churches of the East, at Alexandria, Jerusalem, Antioch, Edessa." Men like Athanasius, Clement of Alexandria, John Chrysostom, and others wrote in the name of each order. They had a special place in the church services and it is noteworthy also that at Antioch "the ascetics there formed the main body of the Nikene or orthodox party". But "dating from the reign of Theodosius and the time when Catholicism became the social religion of the world, comes the movement when a deep cleavage in religious society manifested itself. These ascetics and virgins, who, till now, have mingled with the common body of the faithful, abandon the world and go forth into the wilderness. The Church of the multitude is no longer a sufficiently holy city for these pure ones; they go forth to build in the desert where they will live." (Cf. Duchesne, Christian Worship.)

The time when these foundations began is said by Batiffol to be "when Catholicism became the social religion". Previous to that, with their pagan surroundings, such establishments would have been out of the question. The instinct for monastic institutions was there, but its realization was delayed. Those who enter a religious order take the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, which are considered here only inasmuch as they differentiate a particular kind of asceticism from other forms. These vows are substantial because they are the basis of a permanent and fixed condition, of the balance of life, and affect, modify, determine, and direct the whole attitude of one who is bound by them in his relations to the world and to God. They constitute a mode of existence which has no other purpose than the attainment of the highest spiritual perfection. Being perpetual, they ensure permanence in the practice of virtue and prevent it from being intermittent and sporadic; being an absolute, free, irrevocable, and complete surrender of the most precious possessions of man, their fulfillment creates a spirituality, or a species of asceticism, of the most heroic character. Indeed it is inconceivable what more one can offer to God, or how these virtues of poverty, chastity, and obedience can be exercised in a higher degree. That the observance of these vows is a reproduction of the manner of life of Christ and the Apostles, and has, as a consequence, given countless saints, the Church, is a sufficient answer to the accusation that the obligation to observe them is degrading, inhuman, and cruel, a reproach often urged against them.

While concurring in the practice of the same fundamental virtues, the religious bodies are differentiated from one another by the particular object which prompted their separate formation, namely, some need of the Church, some new movement which had to be directed, some rebellion or heresy that had to be combated, some spiritual or corporal aid that had to be brought to mankind, etc. From this there resulted that besides the observance of the three main virtues of poverty, chastity, and obedience, each religious order was inspired by the special spirit animating it. Thus the Benedictine Order was the offspring of the time of the beginning of Christianity, when labour was considered a badge of slavery, the great, the learned, the noble, as well as the humble, the ignorant, and the poor, filled the deserts of Egypt and supported themselves by manual labour, their withdrawal from the world being also a part of the rejection of paganism. After the destruction of the Roman Empire the Benedictines taught the barbarians agriculture, the arts, letters, architecture, etc., while inculcating the virtues of Christianity; the poverty of the Franciscans was a condemnation of the luxury and extravagance of the age in which they originated; the need of protecting the faithful from heresy gave rise to the Order of Preachers; rebellion against authority and defection from the Pope called for a special emphasis on obedience and loyalty to the Holy See by the Society of Jesus; the defence of the Holy Land created the Military Orders; the spread of education, missionary work, etc. all called into existence an immense variety of congregations, whose energies were directed along one special line of good works, with the consequent development to an unusual degree of the virtues which were needed to attain that special end. Meanwhile, their rules, covering every detail and every moment of their daily lives, called for the practice of all the other virtues.

In some of the orders the rules make no mention of corporal penance at all, leaving that to individual devotion; in others great austerity is prescribed, but excess is provided against both by the rules. All the rules have been subjected to pontifical approval and because superiors can grant exceptions. That such penitential practices produce morbid and gloomy characters is absurd to those who know the light-heartedness that prevails in strict religious communities; that they are injurious to health and even aggravate life cannot be seriously maintained in view of the remarkable longevity noted among the members of very austere orders. It is true that in the lives of the saints we meet with some very extraordinary and apparently extravagant mortifications; but in the first place, what is extraordinary, is not so extraordinary, and in another which is ruder and more inured to hardship. Again, they are not proposed for imitation, nor is it always necessary to admit their wisdom, nor that the biographer was not exaggerating, or describing as continual what was only occasional; and on the other hand it is not forbidden to suppose that some of these penitents may have been prompted by the Spirit of God to make themselves atoning victims for the sins of others. Besides, it must not be forgotten that these practices went hand in hand with the cultivation of the sublime virtues, that they were for the most part performed in secret, and in no case for ostentation and display. But even if there was abuse, the Church is not responsible for the aberrations of individuals, nor does her teaching become wrong if misunderstood or misapplied, as might have been done inadvertently or unconsciously, even by the holiest of her children. The regulated use of corporal penance is essential for an ascetic way of life.
A common accusation against religious asceticism is that it is synonymous with idleness. Such a charge ignores all past and contemporary history. It was the ascetic monks who virtually created our present civilization, by teaching the barbarian tribes the value and dignity of manual labour among them in the mechanical arts, in agriculture, in architecture, etc.; by reclaiming swamps and forests, and forming industrial centres from which great cities developed, not to speak of the institutions of learning which they everywhere established. Omitting the special instances of instances, we have still the fact that ascetics in the establishment, organization, management, and support of tens of thousands of asylums, hospitals, refuges, and schools in civilized lands by men and women who are wearing themselves out in labouring for the good of humanity, there are hundreds of thousands of men and women bound by vows and practising religious asceticism who, without any compensation to themselves except the supernatural one of sacrificing themselves for others, are at the present moment labouring among savage tribes all over the world, teaching them to build houses, till their lands of uncultivated acres, while at the same time imparting to them human learning in the drudgery of schools, and leading them in the way of salvation. Idleness and asceticism are conditions absolutely incompatible with each other, and the monastic institution where idleness prevails is already in the sere and yellowed leaf, swept away by some special upheaval, will be abolished by ecclesiastical legislation. The precept which St. Paul laid down for ordinary Christians has always been a fundamental principle of genuine asceticism: "If any man will not work, neither let him eat." (1 Thess. iii, 10). But, as a matter of fact, the Church has seldom had to resort to so drastic a measure as destruction. She has easily reformed the religious orders which, while giving her many of her most learned men and illustrious saints, have been ever a source of pride because of the stupendous work they have achieved, not only for the honour of God and the advancement of the Church, but in uplifting humanity, leading it in the ways of virtue and holiness, and establishing institutions of benevolence and charity for every species of human suffering and sorrow.

In apparent contradiction with the assertion that the rejection of all worldly pleasures is to be found in monastic life is the fact that monasticism not only exists in the pagan religions of India, but is associated with great moral depravity. Attempts have been made to show that these Hindu institutions are merely travesties of Christian monasteries, probably those of Nestorianism, the result of primitive Christian traditions. But neither of these suppositions can be accepted. For, although, doubtless, Indian monasticism in the course of ages borrowed some of its practices from Nestorianism, the fact is that it existed before the coming of Christ. The explanation of it is that it is nothing else than the outcome of the natural free and absolute man to withdraw from the world for meditation, prayer, and spiritual improvement, instances of which might be cited among the ancient Greeks and Hebrews, and among ourselves in the Brook Farm and other American experiments. But whether they were merely instanced, or the wording of a natural stimulus to it only goes to show, in the first place, that monastic seclusion is not unnatural to man; and secondly, that some Divinely constituted authority is needed to guide this natural propensity and to prevent it from falling into those extravagances to which religious enthusiasm is prone. In other words, there must be the natural need and absolute man to use power to legislate for it along the lines of truth and virtue, to censure and condemn and punish what is wrong in individuals and associations; a power able to determine infallibly what is morally right and wrong. The Catholic Church alone claims that power. It has always recognized the ascetic aspect in man, has approved associations for the cultivation of religious perfection, has laid down minute rules for its guidance, has always exercised the strictest surveillance over them, and has never hesitated to abolish them when they no longer served the purpose for which they were intended. Moreover, as genuine asceticism does not exist before the 4th century, its aims at supernatural, perfection, and as the supernatural in the New Dispensation is in the guardianship of the Catholic Church, under its guidance alone is asceticism secure.

JEWISH ASCETICISM.—Besides the ordinary observers of the Old Law, we have the great Hebrew saints and prophets whose deeds are recorded in Holy Writ. They were ascetics who practised the loftiest virtue, who were adorned with remarkable spiritual gifts, and consecrated themselves to the service of God and their fellow-men. As to the Schools of the Prophets, whatever they may have been, it is admitted that one of their functions was to inculcate the virtue of virtue, and in that respect they may be regarded as schools of asceticism. The Nazarites were men who consecrated themselves by a perpetual or temporary vow to abstain all the days of their Nazariteness, that is, during their separation from the world, from the asceticism and isolating influence of other intoxicating drink, from vine or strong drink, from any liquor of grapes, from grapes dried or fresh, and indeed from the use of anything produced from the vine. Other observances which were of obligation, such as letting the hair grow, avoiding defilement, etc., were ceremonial rather than ascetic. The Nazarites were exclusively Jewish men, and there is said to be no instance in the Old Testament of a female Nazarite. They were a class of persons "holy to the Lord" in a special sense, and made their vow of abstinence an example of self-denial and moderation and a protest against the indulgent habits of the Chanaanites which were involving the people of Israel. Samson and Samuel were consecrated by their mothers to this kind of life. It is not certain that they lived apart in distinct communities, like the Sons of the Prophets, though there is an instance of three hundred of them being found together at the same time.

The Recharities, whom, however, Josephus does not mention, appear to have been a nomad tribe, distinguished chiefly by their abstinence from wine, though it is not certain that other intoxicants were forbidden, or that such abstinence was prompted by motives of penance. It may have been merely to prevent the culture of the vine in order to keep them in their nomadic state, the better to escape corruption from their Chanaanitish neighbours. There were also Essenes who lived a communal life, possessed no individual property, affected an extreme simplicity in diet and dress, and lived apart from great cities to preserve themselves from the contaminating influence of them abjured marriage. They devoted themselves to the sick, and for that purpose made a special study of the curative qualities of herbs and boasted of possessing medical recipes handed down from Solomon. Hence their name, Essenes, or Healers. Finally, the Pharisees, who were the Puritans of the Old Law, but whose virtues and austerities we know to have been often only pretence, although there were, doubtless, among them some who were in earnest in the practice of virtue. St. Paul describes himself as a Pharisee of the Pharisees. Outside of Judea, there were said to be a certain number of Jewish men and women who observed the same discipline, Marcet, near Alexandria, who mingled their own religious observances with those of the Egyptians, and who lived a life of voluntary poverty, chastity, labour, solitude, and prayer. They were called Therapeute, which, like Essenes, means Healers. Rappoppo, in his "History of Egypt" (XI, 29), says that the origin of the Egyptian priesthood led a similar kind of life. We know of the Therapeute only from Philo. How true his descriptions are cannot be determined.

HERETICAL ASCETICISM.—In the second century of the Church appear the Encratites, or The Austeres. They were a section of the heretical Gnostics, chiefly Syrians, who, because of their erroneous views about matter, withdrew from all contact with the world, and denounced marriage as impure. About the same period came the Montanists, who forbade second marriage, enjoined rigorous fasts, insisted on the perpetual exclusion from the Church of those who had ever committed grievous sin, stigmatized flight in time of persecution as reprehensible, protested that virgins should be always veiled, reprobated paintings, statuary, military service, theatres, and all worldly sciences. In the third century the Manicheans held marriage to be unlawful and prohibited from wine, meat, milk, and eggs; all of which with their holiness, and their renunciation of matter, the Flagellants was a sect that began about 1260. They journeyed from place to place in Italy, Austria, Bohemia, Bavaria, and Poland, securing themselves to blood, ostensibly to excite the populace to contrition for their sins, but they wore soon prohibited by the ecclesiastical authorities.

They appeared again in the fourteenth century, in Hungary, Germany, and England. Pope Clement VI issued a Bull against them in 1349, and the Inquisition pursued them with such vigour that they disappeared altogether. They were bitter enemies of the Church. The Manichæans of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were, as their name implies, Puritans. Though teaching the doctrines of the Manicheans, they affected to live a purer life than the rest of the Church. Chief among them were the Waldenses, or Poor Men of Lyons, who accepted evangelical poverty and then defied the Pope, who suppressed them. Although Protestantism has been incessant in its denunciations of asceticism, as it is amazing to note how many extreme instances of it the history of Protestantism furnishes. The Puritans of England and New England, with their despotic and cruel laws, which imposed all sorts of restrictions not only upon themselves, but upon those who examined them. The early Methodists, with their denunciations of all amusements, dancing, theatres, card-playing, Sunday enjoyments, etc., were ascetics. The numberless Socialist colonies and settlements which have sprung up in all countries are illustrations of the same spirit.

PAGAN ASCETICISM.—Among the Greeks, we have the school, or quasi-community, of Pythagoras, whose object was to extinguish the passions, but it was philosophical rather than religious in its character and may be placed in the category of Natural Asceticism.

BRAHMINICAL ASCETICISM. It is frequently contended that the existing Brahmin priesthood led of India which in some respects is equal, if not superior, to that of Christianity. It inculcates the virtues of truthfulness, honesty, self-control, obedience, temperance, alms-giving, care of the sick, meekness, forgiveness of injuries, returning good for evil, and its success is a matter of wonder, besides having a higher professed end, the purification of the body and spirit. In the monasteries, confession of faults, but only of external ones, is practised, and great importance is attached to meditation. Their penances are comparatively moderate. Nevertheless, in spite of its glorification of virtue, this manner of life cannot be regarded a religion, but is devoted to religious ends, practicing the pantheism and other errors of Brahminism, it ignores God entirely, and is atheistic or agnostic, admitting no dependence on the Divinity and acknowledging no obligation of worship, obedience, love, gratitude, belief; consequently, eliminating all virtue. Its avoidance of sin is purely utilitarian, etc., to escape its consequences. Its ultimate end is extinction.

alternate stand and sit. In summer let him expose himself to the heat of five fires; during the rainy season, let him live under the open sky; and in winter be dressed in wet clothes, thus greatly increasing the rigour of his austerities. "Protracted fasts of the most austere characters are also enjoined. In all this, there is no asceticism. These suicidal penances, apart from their wickedness and absurdity, are based on a misconception of the purpose of mortification. They are not supposed to alone for sin or to acquire merit, but are prompted by the idea that the greater the austerity the greater the holiness, and thus besides hastening absorption in the divinity they will help the penitent to obtain such a mastery over his body as to make it invisible at will, to float in the air, or pass with lightning speed from place to place. Being believers in metempsychosis, they regard these sufferings as a means of avoiding the punishment of new births under the form of other creatures. Their pantheism destroys the very essential idea of virtue, for there can be no virtue, as there can be no vice, where one is a part of the deity. Again, the belief that there is no reality outside of Brahma prevents the use or abuse of creatures from having any influence on the spiritual development of the soul. Finally, as the end of existence is absorption in Brahma, with its attendant loss of personality and its adoption of an unconscious existence for all future time, it holds out no inducement to the practice of virtue. The whole system is based on pride. The Brahmin is superior to all mankind, and contact with another caste than his own, especially the poor and humble, is pollution. It makes marriage obligatory, but compels the wife to adore the husband no matter how cruel he is, permitting him to reject her at will; it encourages polygamy, and the burning and burial of widows in the suttee in which the British Government has not yet succeeded in preventing. It abhors manual labour and compels the practice of mendicancy and idleness, and it has done nothing for the physical betterment of the human race, as the condition of India for many centuries clearly shows. Its spiritual results are no better. Its liturgy is made up of the most disgusting, childish, and cruel superstitions, and its contradictory combinations of pantheism, materialism, and idealism have developed a system of cruel divinities worse than those of pagan antiquity. It is consequently not real asceticism.
in Nirvana, thus having no inducement to virtue, while it accords the lower state of Swarga, with its sensual delights, to those who were helpful to the Buddhas. Like its predecessor, its idea of ultimate extinction is the extension of the Brahminist aspiration, and leads logically to suicide. It holds marriage in abhorrence, and suppressing all legitimate desires, forbidding all recreation, music, scientific pursuits, etc. Industrial occupations are regarded with contempt, and the ideal state is beggary and idleness. Although insisting upon celibacy as the proper state of man, it sanctions polygamy and divorce. It speaks most complacently of Buddha's many hundred wives, before his conversion, lauds the extensive seraglio of Bimbisasa, its most distinguished royal convert, without hinting at its being any derogation from the standard of conduct of a Buddhist layman, while "the official head of Southern Buddhism at the present day, the King of Siam, exercises without scruple the privilege of maintaining a harem" (Aiken). It did not abolish the caste system except in the monasteries. Finally, "in the spread of this religion to other lands it adopted the idolatrous and obscene worship of Nepal; gave it the degradation of the Brahmans; built a temple in Thibet, and is overlaid with the superstitions peculiar to China, Mongolia, and Thibet." It is an abuse of terms to describe the practices of such a creed as asceticism.

In conclusion, it may be said that the difference between false and true asceticism is this: false asceticism starts out with a wrong idea of the nature of man, of the world, of God; it proposes to follow human reason, but soon falls into folly and becomes fanatical, and sometimes insane, in its methods and projects. With an exaggerated idea of the rights and powers of the individual, it rebels against all spiritual control and, usurping a greater authority than the Church has ever claimed, leads its dupes into the wildest extravagances. Its history is one of disturbance, disorder, and anarchy, and is barren of results in the acquisition of truth, or the uplifting of the individual, and in works of benevolence or intellectual progress; and in some instances it has been the instrument of the most deplorable moral degradation. True asceticism, on the contrary, is guided by right reason, assisted by the light of revelation; it comprehends clearly the true nature of man, his destiny, and his obligations. Knowing that God has been created and placed above human condition, but elevated to a supernatural state, it seeks to illumine his mind and strengthen his will by supernatural grace. Aware that he has to control his lower passions and withstand the assaults of the evil spirit and the seductions of the world, it not only permits, but enjoins, the practice of penance, while, by the virtue of prudence which it inculcates, it prevents excess. Instead of withdrawing him from his fellow-men and inducing moroseness and pride, it bestows on him joy and humility, inspires him with the greatest love for humanity, and cultivates that spirit of self-sacrifice which has, by its work of benevolence and charity, contributed countless benefits on the human race. In a word, asceticism is nothing else than an enlightened method adopted in the observance of the law of God through all the various degrees of service, from the obedience of the ordinary believer to the absorbing devotion of the greatest saints, in accordance with each one's measure of grace imparted by the Spirit of Light and Truth.

In 1819 he began the study of theology and philosophy at the University of Heidelberg, but soon turned his attention to the history, at the instigation of the well-known historian Schlosser. On the completion of this course, in 1823, he was appointed instructor at the Select School of Frankfurt-on-the-Main. In 1842 he obtained a reputation as Professor of History at the University of Bonn, whence he removed to Vienna in 1823, to fill the same position. Within two years he became a member of the Vienna Academy of Sciences, was ennobled in 1870, and retired from the exercise of his profession in 1872, ten years prior to his death. While in Frankfurt he wrote: "Geschichte der Westgoten" (Frankfort, 1827); "Geschichte der Ottonen in Spanien" (Frankfort, 1829, 1856; 2d ed., Vienna, 1860); "Geschichte Spaniens und Portugals zur Zeit der Almaroviden und Almoraviden" (2 vols., Frankfort, 1833, 1837); "Geschichte der Heruler und Gepiden" (first in Schlosser's "Archiv für Geschichte und Literatur" and then separately, Frankfort, 1835); "Geschichte Kaiser Karls des Großen" (Heidelberg, 1840). While in Bonn he published, first, the "Urkundliche Geschichte der Grafen von Wertheim" (2 vols., Frankfort, 1843) and then edited the "Allgemeine Kirchenlexikon" (4 vols., Frankfort and Mainz, 1846-81). Most of the historical articles being from his own pen, he contributed to the history of the Roman Emperors, and published the interesting, though not always tenable, results of his investigations in the "Sitzungsberichten und Denkschriften" of the Vienna Academy of Sciences. His "Geschichte der Wiener Universität" was written to mark the celebration of the 250th anniversary of the University of Vienna. The first volume (Vienna, 1865) dealt with the period from 1365 to 1465; the second (Vienna, 1877), with the Viennese humanists of the time of the Emperor Maximilian I; the third, which appeared after his death (Vienna, 1886), brings the history down to 1565. His two latest works attracted no little attention: "Die früheren Wanderjahre des Conrad Celtes, und die Anfänge der von ihm errichteten gelehrten Societäten" (Vienna, 1869); and, more especially, "Roe- witha und Conrad Celtes" (Vienna, 1867, 2d ed., 1868). In this work, he endeavored to prove that the Empress Adelaide, hitherto attributed to the nun Roeswitha of Gandersheim, really originated in the sixteenth century and was composed by the humanist Conrad Celtes. The contention was, however, immediately and effectually confuted. PATRICIUS SCHLAGER.

Ascoli-Piceno, THE DIOCESE OF, comprising sixteen towns in the Province of Ascoli-Piceno, two in that of Aquila, and two in that of Teramo, Italy. It is under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See. "Ascoli-Piceno is one of the cities of Italy," says Harnack (Die Mission, etc., Leipzig, 502), "but, because of its remote position, it has had a Christian community and a bishopric from the middle of the third century, when at the Synod held by Pope Cornelius in Rome sixty bishops were present." (Eus. VI, xlix). The traces of its bishopric, however, do not appear until the fourth century: St. Emilianus was made bishop by Dionysian; Claudius, present at the Synod of Rimini (A.D. 296), and, in the fifth century. IDanger, present at the Synod of Milan which sent the famous letter to Pope Leo I (440-461), were Bishops of Ascoli. Worthy of note in Ascoli, from an artistic standpoint, is the baptistery dating from the twelfth century. One of its bishops, Gino degli Ascoli, in 1153, became Pope Clement VII (1523-34). The political importance of his pontificate, during the struggle between Charles V and Francis I is well known. Ascoli-Piceno contains 167 parishes; 305 churches, chapels, and oratories; 206 secular priests; 150 seminarians; 15 regiments of cavalry; 126 religious (women); 118 confraternities, and a population of 120,210.

Ascoli, Satriano, and Cirignola, an Italian diocese, suffragan to the Archdiocese of Beneventum, comprising six towns and two villages, in the Province of Foggia. In 968, Ausculum Appulum appears as an episcopal city amongst the suffragan sees of Beneventum, but the first bishop of whom we have any knowledge is Maurus, present at the consecration of the Church of St. Angelo at Volturino (1059). Cirignola, known on account of its relative importance, must have been a suffragan diocese, but its history is lost in the matter. When Pius VII reorganized the ecclesiastical provinces of the Neapolitan Kingdom, on the occasion of the Concordat (16 February, 1818) with Ferdinand I, King of the two Sicilies, he restored Cirignola to its ancient episcopal dignity and intrusted it to the Diocese of Ascoli. At the end of the year 1905 this diocese contained 11 parishes; 62 churches, chapels, and oratories; 98 secular priests; 60 seminarians; 8 regular clergy; 4 lay brothers; 46 religious (women); 18 confraternities; 3 girls' schools with an attendance of 140. Asseity (Lat. a. from se, itself; ens a se) is the property by which a being exists of and from itself. It will be easily understood that this property belongs, and can belong only, to God. When we look for the efficient, exemplary, and final cause of all things, of their existence, nature, and organization, we come ultimately to a Being Who does not depend for His existence, in any sense or degree, on any other than Himself; Who has in Himself His own reason of existence, Who is for Himself His own exemplary and final cause. It is to this very property of absolute independence, or self-existence by nature that we give the name of asseity. This notion of asseity, however, according to our conception, a negative and a positive aspect; absolute independence and self-existence, which complement each other and form one single objective property. (See God.) As is easily seen, the Catholic concept of asseity which represents God as absolutely independent and self-existent by nature, and consequently, transcendent, is opposed not only to any possible change from all eternity, is altogether opposed to the pantheistic concept of absolute or pure being, which absolute or pure being evolves, determines, and realizes itself through all time. (See PAN THEISM.) This quality of independence and self-existence has been preserved by the Fathers and Catholic theologians, though the word asseity itself began to be used in theology only in the Middle Ages. The only point disputed among the theologians is, whether this property constitutes the very essence of God. (See ASSEITY, DIVINE.)

Aseneth (Heb., אִנֵסְתֵּחַ; Vulg., Aseneth), the daughter of Putiphar (Poti-phera), priest of On. The Pharaoh of Egypt gave her to wife to the Hebrew Pharaoh's brother Joseph; and she bore him two sons, Zaphenath and Ephraim (Gen., xli, 45–50; xlv, 20). In the ancient polity of the Egyptians the priests were second in honour only to the Pharaoh; hence the Pharaoh of Joseph's time gave him wife of one of the first princesses of the land. All Egyptologists agree that it is a composition of the name of one of the priests of the name of the goddess Neith, a tutelary deity of Saia. Neith was considered as an emanation of Ammon, and was associated with him as the female principle in the creation of the universe. Her hieroglyph is a shuttle. The Greeks identified her with Athene. Some interpret Aseneth, "dwelling of Neith", others interpret the name, "servant of Neith", or "sacred to Neith". The name Aseneth has not been found among the monuments of Egypt; but similar ones have been found as As-Ptah, As-Ment, As-Hathor, etc. In the apocryphal literature there are many curious legends of Aseneth.

Aser (Heb., אֶסֶּר).—Though the form Aser uniformly appears in the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Douay versions, an inspection of the original text clearly shows that the correct form of the name is Aser. Aser was the eighth son of Jacob, born to him in Paddan-Aram. He was the second son of Zelphs, the handmaid of Lia, Jacob's wife. His name is derived from the root Asher, to make or declare happy. His mother bestowed this name on him; for she declared that through her childbearing, women will call me blessed (Gen., xxx, 13). In the Bible there are recorded of Aser four sons and one daughter called Sara (Gen., xlv, 17). The descendants of Aser are enumerated (I Par., vii, 30–40).

II. One of the twelve tribes of Israel, being descended from Aser, the son of Israel. Its tribal territory is described in Judges, iii, 16–17. It lay along the Mediterranean Sea from Mt. Carmel northward to the river Leontes, the modern Nahr el-Qusaimiyeh. Its eastern boundary was an irregular line, dividing it from Zabulon and Naphtali. Its farthest eastern boundary was the city Ahalab, most probably the modern el-Dijich. The land of Aser held twenty-two cities, with their villages; but the Aserites did not drive out the inhabitants of these cities, but dwelt among them. Their land was fertile, as was foretold by Jacob: the bread of Aser was fat; he yielded royal dainties (Gen. xlii, 20); he dipped his foot in oil (Deut., xxxiii, 24). The numerous valleys of the land are well watered by the wadys El-Houbieichiyeh, El-Ezziyeh, Ez-Zerka, Ker Kera, El-Kourn; and the rivers Nahr Mefsouchk, Nahar Semiriye, Nahar Namin, and Nahar el-Moukh-hatta, the ancient Cison. Aser's littoral was irregular. Its northern portion has a mean width of less than two miles. At Ras en-Naourah, the ancient Scala Tyriorum, the mountain plunges its wall of rock out to the water-line. Southward from this point the littoral broadens until, at Ez-zib and on southward to Saint Jean d'Acre, it is sometimes more than ten miles in width. This great plain and the valleys extending inland produced for Aser an abundance of wheat, barley, and other cereals.
Even in the present decadent state of the land, the region is rich in cereals. The slopes of the hills, now covered with thick brushwood, were, in the days of Israel's prosperity, covered with olive-trees, fig-trees, and vines. The fertility of the land gave rise to the saying, that in Aser oil flowed as a river. The valleys, the slopes of the hills, and the high places are covered with Chanaanean, Jewish, Byzantine, and later ruins, showing a sort of stratified succession of the civilizations that have flourished in the land. In the history of Israel the tribe of Aser plays an unimportant part. When the first census of land was made in Aser, the numbers given were 41,500 men that were able to go forth to war (Numbers 1, 40–41). Their chief was Pheguel, the son of Ocran. In Num. xxxvi, 47, this number had grown to 53,400. When the warriors of the tribes of Israel came to David in Hebron to make him King over Israel, there came out of Aser 40,000 soldiers [1 Par. (Chron.), xii, 36]. Aser's offering for the first altar dedicated by Moses in the desert is recorded in Num., vii, 72–77. In the tribe of Aser there were four Levitical cities: Masal, Abdon, Helchath, and Rohob, with their suburbs. When Zabulon and Nephtali exposed their lives unto death in war against Jabin, King of the Canaanites, Aser dwelt on the seashore and abode in the havens; hence it is chanted in the Song of Deborah (Judges, v, 17). It redeemed itself somewhat from this reproach by marching with Gideon against Madian. When Ezzechias invited the men of the northern kingdom of Israel to come to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem to keep the Passover, some of the tribe of Aser came (II Par., xxx, 11).—Anna the prophetess was of Aser (Luke, ii, 36).

IV. Aser, an erroneous rendering in the Vulgate (Ex., vi, 24), of the name Assir, the son of Core. In the Vulgate text of I Par., vii, 22, the same person is called Assir.

Asgaard (from As, plural Aser, or in English, "Aser"—Norwegian for the gods—and gard, "yard", i.e. enclosure, garden; the Garden of the Gods). It was the great place where the Aseres and their wives, the Asses (Norse, Aunrir), dwelt apart, and from which they ruled. A bridge called Bilrost led to it. In the middle of Asgaard was a great castle in which was kept the treasure (Ases) held by the unions. In it were two magnificent halls: Gladshelm, with the throne Hildskjofl, for Odin, and seats for the Asses; and Vinogulf, with a throne for Frigg and seats for the Asses. From this heavenly country the Aseres govern the course of the world and of men. Odin reigns there as father and head, who penetrates all, animates all; gives men intelligence and enthusiasm, and breathes into them the desire for combat and war. At his side was his wife Frigg, the all-nourishing earth, who had Fensal as her abode. The other principal dwelling-places of the Aseres in Asgaard were Thorvdvang, or Thorudgive, where dwell Thor, the son of Odin and of Frigg, and who was the thunder, the strength, the sanctification of the world, the friend of men, the defender against the evil powers, the protector of agriculture and of family life; Breidablik, where dwell Balder with his wife Nanna; Noaturn, the abode of Njord; Thryheim, that of Alfrith; Orkin, the seat of Frey; Himmendorf, whence Heimdal protected the Aser; Ydal, where dwells Ull; Gleitner, where Forseti lived, the just of the Aser; Folkvang, with the hall Sessyrmere, where Freya lived, the Asses of Love, and Sokkvasbekk, the dwelling of Sages. Moreover, there was Lidagjafl, from which Odin saw the whole universe, and where there was Valakjafl. All covered with silver, and the yet more splendid and sumptuous hall, Valhal. Above Asgaard stretch the more elevated heavens, whose splendour culminates in Gimle, an unapproachable and golden hall, more luminous than the heavens. The site of Asgaard was near the Don, which was regarded as the boundary line between Asia and Europe. Hence Snorre derives the name As from Asia, and imagined that the Aseres were inhabitants of Asia.

Ash Wednesday.—The Wednesday after Quinquagesima Sunday, which is the first day of the Lenten fast. The name dies cinerum (day of ashes) which it bears in the Roman Missal is found in the earliest existing copies of the Gregorian Sacramentary and probably dates back to the eighth century. On this day all the faithful according to ancient custom are exhorted to approach the altar before the beginning of Mass, and there the priest, dipping his thumb into ashes previously blessed, marks upon the forehead—or in the case of women on the back of the hand—one of the sign of the cross, saying the words: "Remember, O sinner, that thou art dust and unto dust thou shalt return." The ashes used in this ceremony are made by burning the remains of the palms blessed on the Palm Sunday of the previous year. In the blessing of the ashes four prayers are used, all of them ancient, and the ashes are sprinkled with holy water and fumigated with incense. The celebrant himself, be he bishop or cardinal, receives, either standing or seated, the ashes from some other priest, usually the highest in dignity of those present. In earlier ages a penitential procession often followed the rite of the distribution of the ashes, but this is not now prescribed.

There can be no doubt that the custom of distributing the ashes to all the faithful arose from a devotional imitation of the practice observed in the case of public penitents. But this devotional usage, the reception of a sacramental which is full of the symbolism of penance (cf. the connotation of the "Dies Irae") is of earlier date than was formerly supposed. It is mentioned as of general observance for both clerics and faithful in the Synod of Beneventum, 1091 (Mansi, XX, 739), but nearly a hundred years earlier than this the Anglo-Saxon homilist Ælfric assumes that it applies to all classes of men. "We read," he says, "in the books both in the Old Law and in the New that the men who repented of their sins bestrewed themselves with ashes and clothed their bodies with sackcloth. Now let us do this little at the beginning of our Lent that we may burn our ashes upon our heads to God...ought to repent of our sins during the Lenten fast." And then he enforces this recommendation by the terrible example of a man who refused to go to church for the ashes on Ash Wednesday and who a few days after was accidentally killed in a boar hunt (Ælfric, "Lives of Saints," ed. Skeat, I, 262–263). It is possible that the Custom of Ash Wednesday was suggested by the rite of Ash Wednesday was reinforced by the figurative exclusion from the sacred mysteries symbolized by the hanging of the Lenten veil before the sanctuary. But on this and the practice of the beginning of fast on Ash Wednesday see below.

Ashby, George, monk of the Cistercian Monastery of Jervaulx in Yorkshire, executed after the Pilgrimage of Grace, in the year 1537. His name is found in several English martyrologies, but there is the utmost uncertainty as to the right form of his name, and as to the place and mode of his death. After the “Pilgrims” had been persuaded to disperse, Henry VIII turned with fury upon the monasteries in whose favour the rising had taken place, and ordered his soldiers “to take the abbots and monks forth with violence and to have them brought without delay in their monastic apparel — not for a terrible example to others.” Whether Ashby suffered then, or whether he was executed in June, when his abbot, Adam Sedbergh, was put to death, is uncertain. Stow seems to allude to him when he says that one Astibe of Jervaulx died with the Abbot of Sawley, at Lancaster, 10 March, 1537. It is also possible that the name may be taken from Astley, one of the “Pilgrims” said to have visited Jervaulx. The fact that one or more monks of the abbey were executed for not embracing Henry’s schismatical measures is not disputed.

Ashby, Thomas, suffered at Tybarn, 29 March, 1544. His name was originally contained in the process of the English Martyrs, as the fact of his execution for denying the King’s Supremacy was mentioned by the chroniclers of the time and from them was recorded by Sander, though not by other Catholic writers. The “Promotor Fidelium” rejected this as insufficient, and a somewhat ambiguous statement has since been found in the Grey Friars’ Chronicle; to wit, that Ashby was “sometime a priest and forsook it.” Possibly, therefore, while rejecting the Royal Supremacy, he did not accept the Pope’s.

Ashes.—It is not easy to arrive at the fundamental conception of the liturgical use of ashes. No doubt our Christian ritual has been borrowed from the practice of the Jews, a practice retained in certain details of synagogue ceremonial to this day, but the Jewish custom itself needs explanation. A number of passages in the Old Testament connect ashes (efer ו_aspect) with mourning, and we are told that the mourner sat or rolled himself in, sprinkled his head or mingled his food with, “ashes”, but it is not clear whether in these passages we ought not rather to translate efer as dust. The same phrases are used with the word afer (אפר) which certainly means dust. It may be that the dust was originally laid from the grave, in token that the living felt himself one with the dead, or it may be that humiliation and the neglect of personal cleanliness constituted the dominant idea; for a similar manifestation of grief was undoubtedly familiar among Aryan peoples. (Tannr, S. T., 1776 and 1785.) The less probable that the cleaning properties of ashes (though this also has been proposed) are taken as significant of moral purification. The chief foundation for this last suggestion is the Rite of the Red Heifer (Num, xix, 77) in which the ashes of the victim were used to have with water the normal efficacy of purifying the unclean. (cf. Heb. ix, 13.)

Be this as it may, Christianity at an early date undoubtedly adopted the use of ashes as symbolic of penance. Thus Tertullian prescribes that the penitent must “live without joy in the roughness of sackcloth and the equalor of ashes” (De Pecc., x); and many similar passages might be quoted from Cyril and other Fathers. Eusebius in his account of the apostasy and reconciliation of Natalis describes him as coming to Pope Zephyrinus clothed in sackcloth and sprinkled over with ashes (στόάς κατασκέυασας, Hist. Eccles., V, 28). This was the normal penitential garb, and in the expulsion of those sentenced to do public penance, as given in the early pontificals, the sprinkling of ashes always plays a prominent part. Indeed the rite is retained in the Pontificale Romanum to this day. With this garb of penance we must undoubtedly connect the custom, so frequent in the early Middle Ages, of laying a dying man on the ground upon sackcloth sprinkled with ashes when about to breathe his last. Early rituals direct the priest to cast holy water upon him, saying, “Remember that thou art dust and unto dust thou shalt return.” After which he asked: “Art thou content with sackcloth and ashes in testimony of thy penance before the Lord, in the day of judgment?” And the dying man answered: “I am content.” It is also liturgically used in the rite of the dedication of a church, first of all to cover the pavement of the church upon which the alphabet is written in Greek and Latin letters, and secondly to mix with oil and wine in the water which is specially blessed for the consecration of the altar. This use of ashes is probably older than the eighth century.

HERBERT THURSTON.

Ashley, Ralph, Venerable, martyr, a Jesuit laybrother, first heard of, it seems, as cook at Douay College, which he left 28 April, 1590, for the English College at Valladolid. Here he entered the Society of Jesus, but after a time returned to England because of ill-health. He fell in with Father Tesimond (Greenaway), who eulogizes very highly the courage he had displayed among the Dutch heretics, by whom he had been captured during his journey. He landed in England 9 March, 1598, and was sent to serve Father Edward Oldcorne. Eight years later the two were arrested at Hindlip, near Worcester, and were kept together with Father Garnet, and Nicholas Owen, another laybrother, servant to Garnet. The two servants were terribly tortured, Owen dying of his torments, while the reticent answers and trembling signatures of Ashley’s extant confessions bear eloquent testimony to his constancy. He was ultimately remanded with Oldcorne to Worcester, where they were tried, condemned and executed together, 7 April, 1606, giving an admirable example of heroically faithful service.

Ashton, John, an early Jesuit missionary in Maryland, b. in Ireland, 1742; d. in Maryland, 1814, or 1815. He was one of the first priests to visit the Catholics of Baltimore. This was between the years 1776 and 1784, and in the latter date, as resident priest, Father Charles Sewall, was appointed. The Jesuits at that time lived at White marsh, about midway between Washington and Baltimore. The temporary church used by Father Ashton in Baltimore was an unfinished building, begun by an Irishman near the present site of Battle Monument, now the centre of civic and commercial activity. It was the first brick building in Baltimore. Finding it abandoned, some Acadian refugees occupied the upper quarter which was still habitable. Father Ashton said Mass in the lower room, although the hogs which had taken possession of it had first to be driven out. The priest brought his vestments with him, and a rude altar was erected. The faithful never numbered more than forty, and consisted chiefly of Acadians and a few Irish. This is the first Baltimore congregation of which there is any record. Father Ashton entered the novitiate of Jesus in 1729. He was first employed in the missions of Yorkshire, England. He must have been a man of business capacity, as at the assembly of the clergy of Maryland and Pennsylvania, which convened at Whitemarsh, in 1784, he was unanimously elected procurator-general, whose duty it was to preside over the management of the various estates of the clergy. Subsequently, in 1788, he was appointed to superintend the building of Georgetown College.

Ashton, Roger, Venerable, Martyr, third son of Richard Ashton of Crooton, in Lancashire. He was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn, 23 June, 1592. His indictment is not preserved. Challoner says he was procuring a dispensation from Rome to marry his second cousin. Later evidence, while confirming this, shows that it was not the only cause. In 1585 he had gone to serve in the Low Countries under the Earl of Leicester against the Spaniards. Sir William Stanley having been placed on guard over the town of Deventer, which had revolted from the Spaniards, he, with the assistance of Ashton, gave the town back to Spain and went over to their side (29 January, 1587). Cardinal Allen published a "Defence" of this act in the form of a letter addressed to one "R. A.", whose letter to the Cardinal is prefixed, and under these initials it seems natural to recognize our martyr. Stanley next entrusted to Ashton the difficult task of bringing over his wife from Ireland, but she was already under arrest, and he is said to have then sent Ashton to Rome. At the close of the year 1587 he returned to England and was apprehended in Kent with the marriage documents already mentioned. In January 1588 he was in the Tower, where he lay till towards the close of the year, when he was transferred to easier confinement in the Marshalsea. From this he managed to escape and he fled to his brothers in Lancashire. He was seized later, at Shields near Newcastle, while trying to escape over the seas. Transferred thence to Durham and York, he was tried and sentenced at Canterbury, and died "very resolutely, making profession of his faith and "... pitied of the people", though the infamous Topcliffe tried to stir up ill-feeling against him by enlarging on his sentence in Spain.

Asia.—In the present article it is intended to give a rapid survey of the geography, ethnography, political and religious history of Asia, and especially of the Asiatic, as a part of the condition of Asiatic Christianity and Catholicism. For further information concerning the religious conditions of the various Asiatic countries, the reader is referred to the special articles on the subject in this Encyclopaedia.

Asia is the largest of the continents, having a circumference of 22,401,700; a surface of 12,500,000 square miles, or about one-third of the whole of the dry land. It is also the oldest known portion of the globe, the earliest known seat of civilization and, in all probability, the cradle of the human race, although scholars differ as to whether the primitive home of mankind should be located in South-western Asia, or in more particular parts of the Tigris-Euphrates valley, as the Biblical tradition of Genesis seems to indicate, or rather in Central Asia, and more particularly in the Indo-Iranian plateau. On the north, Asia is bounded by the Arctic Ocean; on the east, by the Pacific Ocean; on the south, by the Indian Ocean; and on the west, by the Persian Gulf, the Tigris-Euphrates valley, the Mediterranean, and the Red Sea.

The physical features of Asia, owing to its immense geographical area, are of great diversity. There we meet with the most extensive lowlands, the most immense table-lands, and at the same time with the highest chains of mountains, and the most elevated summits in the world. About two-thirds of its area is table-land, and the other third mountainous regions, some of which are covered with perpetual snow. The lowland sections may be divided into six distinct regions, namely: (1) The Siberian lowland, which is by far the largest, and for the most part cold, gloomy, and barren; (2) the Bucharian lowland, situated between the Caspian Sea and the Lake Aral, a wide sterile waste; (3) the Arabian lowland, the most productive and fertile; (4) the Hindustan lowland, of about 500,000 square miles, comprising the great valley of the Ganges, and very fertile; (5) the Indo-Chinese lowland, including the regions of Cambodia and Siam; and (6) the Chinese lowland, extending from Peking as far as the tropic of Cancer, of about 220,000 square miles, and extremely fertile. Asia is poor in lakes but very rich in rivers, the most famous of which are the Tigris and the Euphrates, the Indus with its many tributaries, the Brahmaputra, the Ganges, the Irrawaddy, the Salwin, the Me-nam, the Me-kong, the Hong-Kiang, the Yang-tze-kiang, the Hwang-ho, or Yellow River, the Amur, and the many river-systems of Siberia. On account of its vast extent and diversity of climate, the mineral, vegetable, and animal products of Asia are naturally varied, rich, and almost unlimited.

Geographically, Asia may be divided into four regions: (1) Northern Asia, or Asia Minor, which includes Siberia, Caucasus, and the Aral-Caspian Basin, i.e. Russian Turkistan, the Turkoman country, Khiva, Bokhara, and the region of the upper Oxus; (2) Eastern Asia, comprising China, Mongolia, Korea, and Japan; (3) Southern Asia, comprising India, Indo-China, and Siam; (4) South-western Asia, comprising the famous historic lands of Persia, Media, Babylonia, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Syria, Phoenicia, Palestine, and Arabia.

Politically, Asia is divided as follows: (1) Russian Empire, including Siberia and as far west as the borders of Turkey, Persia, and Turkistan, and as far east as Japan; (2) Chinese Empire, including Mongolia, Manchuria, and Tibet; (3) Japanese Empire; (4) India proper, or British Empire; (5) Siam; (6) Indo-China, under French dominion; (7) Afghanistan; (8) Persia; and (9) Asiatic Turkey, which comprises all Trak and Mesopotamia, Kurdistan, Armenia, Asia Minor, Syria, and Arabia.

The population of Asia, according to the estimates of 1901, is estimated at about 800,000,000, or more than half the entire population of the earth, and divided as follows: Asiatic Russia, 24,947,500; China, 330,829,900; Korea, 9,670,000; Japan, 46,494,000; Indo-China, 15,590,000; Siam, 6,920,000; India, 312,741,700; Afghanistan, 6,460,000; Persia, 16,000,000; Asiatic Turkey, including Arabia, 19,126,500.

reduced to three great groups, or races, viz.: (1) the Mongolian, or Turanian, to which belong all the inhabitants of the whole Northern Asia and as far south as the plains bordering the Caspian Sea, including Tibet, the Indo-Malayan peninsula, Japan, Korea, and the Archipelago, making by far the largest part of the population of Asia. The Mongolian race is characterized by its yellow skin, black eyes and hair flat noses, oblique eyes, short stature, with little hair on the body and face. (2) The Aryan, or Indo-European, which groups together the majority of European peoples belong. It extends over the whole of Southern and part of Western Asia, embracing the Hindus, the Iranians, the Medo-Persians, the Armenians, the Caucasians, and the inhabitants of Asia Minor. (3) The Semitic, which extends over the whole of South-western Asia, and comprises the Arabs, the Assyro-Babylonians, or Mesopotamians, the Syrians, the Jews, and the entire Mohammedan population of Asiatic Turkey.

The numerous languages spoken in Asia may be roughly classified as follows: (1) The Turanian branch, to which belong the Mongolian, the Manchu, the Tuchin, the Japanese (b.c.) and the Tatar. (2) The Aryan, or Indo-European, to which belong most of the hundred and twenty languages and dialects of India, especially the old Sanskrit, the Irian, or old Persian, which is the language of the Avaestas and of the Achemenian inscriptions, the Armenian, the Persian, and a modern Persian. (3) The Semitic group, to which belong the ancient languages of the Assyrians and Babylonians, the various, but mostly extinct, old Chanaanitish dialects, the Hebrew, the Phenician, the numerous eastern and western Aramaic dialects, known as Syriac, and represented nowadays by the modern Chaldaean and neo-Syriac dialects used by the Nestorians of Kurdistan, Persia, and Mesopotamia, and finally Arabic, which in various forms and dialects is spoken throughout Arabia and by the great majority of the Mohammedan populations of Hindustan, Persia, Mesopotamia, and Syria, as well as by most of the Christians of the two last-mentioned countries.

History of Asia.—At what period man first made his appearance in Asia we do not know, although there have been various and conflicting theories advanced as to when that event took place. Present-day opinion, however, is that somewhere from the fifth to the seventh millennium b. c., Asia was chiefly peopled by two great races, viz., the Semitic and the Mongolian, or Turanian. The former occupied the south-western portion of Asia, that is to say, the lands lying on the south-east corner of the Mediterranean and contiguous to the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, including Syria, Phenicia, Palestine, Arabia, and the extensive regions watered by the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, afterwards composing the two mighty empires of Babylon and Assyria; the latter occupied the regions of Northern and Eastern Asia, being the various kings and nations from the Arctic to the Chinese, the Japanese, the Tatars, with their distinct kingdoms and dynasties. The history and the development of these north and east Asiatic kingdoms are, comparatively speaking, of little importance for the international history of civilized Asia, inasmuch as their power and influence did not extend materially on the western part of the world and the destinies of the Near East. Even the Tartar and Turcoman hordes, who for the last six centuries have held under their sway the destinies of Western Asia, soon adopted the Mohammedan religion and civilization.

Unlike their Eastern brethren, the Aryan tribes of Southern Asia and Iran did not play a very important part in the pages of history. With the ex-
RELIgIONS OF ASIA.—The principal religions of Asia are: Brahminism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Taoism, Zoroastrianism, Mohammedanism, Judaism, and Christianity. Brahminism is the oldest known and surviving religious system of the people who, counting 210,000,000 Hindu adherents. Buddhism (from Buddha, "the wise", "the enlightened") owes its origin to Gautama, otherwise called Sakya Muni (i.e., the Sakya sage), who flourished towards the middle of the sixth century B.C. It is by far the widest-spread religion in Asia, counting more than 100,000,000 adherents, 300,000,000 persons in India, counting 210,000,000 Hindu adherents. Buddhism is in China, where it is the chief of the three recognized religions. Its other followers are found in Siberia, Korea, Japan, and India (Ceylon and Burmah). Reformed Buddhism is a recent development in China and Japan, and it plainly shows the influence of Christianity. Confucianism is one of the chief religions of China, the other two being Buddhism and Taoism. Confucianism is a system of philosophy rather than religion. It is the official religion of the State, and the basis of the social and political life of the Chinese nation. Taoism is the third recognized religion of China. It takes its name from that of its founder, Lao-tzu, or Lao-tze, who lived in the sixth century before the Christian Era. Taoism as a religious system has degenerated from its high original mysticism into a system of superstitious observances, and so forms an accepted religion of the lowest and most ignorant classes of Chinese, counting both 100,000,000 adherents. It has also many followers in Cochin-China and Japan. Zoroastrianism is the religion of the ancient Iranians and Persians. Its founder was Zoroaster, the great prophet of Iran, who flourished towards the sixth century B.C. Once a very powerful religion, Zoroastrianism has almost vanished before Islamism, counting nowadays only a few thousand followers in Persia and India.

MOHAMMEDANISM IN ASIA.—Mohammedanism, or Islamism, is one of the three great Semitic religions, the other two being Judaism and Christianity. No accurate figures have as yet been taken of the Mohammedan population of the world. The latest approved estimate, however, places the number at a little over two hundred millions. Of these, sixty millions are in Africa, and most of the rest in Asia, as follows: 18,000,000 in Asiatic Turkey; 30,000,000 in China; 60,000,000 in India and Burmah; 31,000,000 in the Malay Archipelago; and 20,000,000 in Afghanistan, Caucasia, and Russian Turkistan. In the Mindanao Kingdom and in the Sulu group of the Philippine Islands there are about 360,000 and 230,000 Mohammedans respectively. The relations of Mohammedanism to Oriental Churches and Christianity are in the article MOHAMMEDANISM, and in the articles on the various Oriental Churches.

CHRISTIANITY IN ASIA.—Asia is the cradle and the primitive home of Christianity; for it was in its extreme south-western borders, i.e. in Palestine, the home of the chosen people, that the Founder of Christianity chose to appear, to live, and to preach the new Dispensation to the world. His Apostles and Disciples actively began the evangelization of the world, and tradition tells us that the Apostles went to different localities: some to Palestine, others to Asia Minor, some to Greece and Rome, and others to Mesopotamia, Armenia, Babylonia, Arabia, Egypt, Ethiopia, and many other parts of Asia. In India, Palestine and Syria, however, were naturally the first recipients of the new religion, and here... the Jewish communities furnished the first nucleus of Christian proselytes. From Syria, Christian propaganda spread into Phoenicia and Asia Minor, and through the effective preaching of St. Paul, it spread into the principal cities of the Mediterranean coast and Asia Minor, crossing the borders of Asia and reaching into the very heart of the Roman Empire. From the Acts of the Apostles it can be conclusively shown that as early as the second half of the first century of the Christian Era, Christian communities existed in the following Asiatic cities: Jerusalem, Antioch, Damascus, Alexandria, Samaria and Samaritan villages (Acts, viii), Lydda (ix), Joppa (ib.), Jerecusa in Palestine (Acts, x), Antioch in Syria (xi), Thyre (xxxi), Sidon (xxvii), Tarsus (ix, x, xi, xvi), Salamine in Cyprus (xili), Paphos in Cyprus (xii), Perge in Pamphylia (xiii, xiv), Antioch in Pisidia (xiv), Iconium (xiii, xiv), Lysra (xiv), Derbe (xv), several unnamed localities in Galatia (Gal., i, Peter, i), in Cappadocia (I Peter, i), Ephesus (Acts, and Paul's Epp.), Laodicea (Paul's Epp.), Hierapolis in Phrygia (Paul's Epp.), Smyrna (Apoc.), Sardis (ib.), Philadelphia in Lydia, Laodicea in Lydia, and very probably also in Ashdod in Philistia, Seleucia, Attalia in Pamphylia, Amphipolis, Apollonia, Assus, Malta, and other islands of the Mediterranean. From Syria and Asia Minor the activity of the early Christian missionaries spread north, south, east, and west through Edessa, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Egypt, Ethiopia, and into Africa, Greece, Italy, and the West. As regards Asia, we have historical evidence that, towards the middle of the second century, Christian communities were established also in Edessa, various cities of Mesopotamia, along the Tigris and the Euphrates, Mesene, Magneisa, Troilles in Caria, Philomelium in Pisidia, Parium in Myia, Nicomedia, Otrus, Hierapolis, Pepuzu, Tymion, Aradan, Apamea, Cumane, and Eumene in Phrygia, Anerya in Galatia, Sinope, Anazaria in Pontus, Debultum in Thrace, Larisa in Thessalia, Myra in Lycia, etc. (See Harnack, Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, II, 240 sq.). From the signatures of the various Asiatic bishops who assisted at the Council of Nicaea (325) we have conclusive evidence that towards the year 300, and in fact considerably earlier, there existed in the following Asiatic provinces and cities not only Christian communities, but also organized ecclesiastical centres: Jerusalem, Cesarea, Samaria, Sebaste, Lydda-Diospolis, Joppa, Saroe, Emmaus, Nicopolis, Sichem-Neapolis, Scythopolis, Jamnia, Azotus, Ascalon, Gaza, Gadara, Capitolias, Bethhe- a, Anea, Anim and Jattir, Bethbhabara, Sarch- Ake, Batanea, Pheno, and many other episcopal sees in Asia Minor, Cyprus, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Edessa, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, etc. In the last three mentioned regions, in fact, we have positive traces of fully organized dioceses and churches as early as the first half of the third century, with metropolitan and patriarchal sees. In the fourth, fifth, sixth, and the beginning of the seventh century, until the rise of Islam, Christianity became the dominant and generally accepted religion of Western Asia, with the exception of Arabia. The Christian Church, however, was subject politically to two mighty rival powers, the Roman and the Parthian; but it was first of all in the provinces of Thrace, Syria, North-west Arabia, west-Euphratean-Mesopotamia, and Asia Minor, that subject; while to the latter belonged east-Euphratean-Mesopotamia, north-east Arabia, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, and Media. The endless rivalry and wars of these two powers deeply affected the unity and to the permanent unity of the two great Christian Churches, the Roman and the Persian.

These obstacles notwithstanding, the Christian Church of Persia, from its very beginning down to the middle of the fifth century, was dependent on the Patriarch of Antioch and consequently in communion with Rome, although it had its own metropolitan, the great Catholics of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, in Babylonia. But the Nestorian and Monophysite heresies of the fifth century broke this union asunder. Nestorianism, unable to gain any permanent footing in Syria, Asia Minor, and the West, found a strong ally and defender in the Sasanian kings of Persia and in the Monophysite Church, which towards the end of the fifth century, had already completely estranged itself from Antioch and Rome, and had become an independent national Church, having for its ecclesiastical head the great Catholics of the East, i. e. of Seleucia-Ctesiphon. In the meanwhile, Monophysism began to rage in Syria, Armenia, Arabia, and Mesopotamia alike, forming thus another independent heretical Church. Soon after, the Nestorian and the Monophysite Churches of Western Asia prospered and developed to such an extent as to compete in greatness and influence with the Christian Church of the Roman Empire. With the advent of Islam, however, the rapid conquest of the Mohammedii armies (seventh century), Christianity in Arabia, Mesopotamia, Persia, Armenia, Syria, and Asia Minor suffered most severely. Soon after the death of Mohammed, all these provinces fell, one after the other, into the hands of the Mahommedans, while, the entire extinction of Christianity in Western Asia. Thanks, however, to the tolerant attitude of the majority of the Umayyads and Abbasid caliphs of Damascus and Bagdad respectively, Christianity in the Mohammedan Empire rose gradually to a new and unprecedented life and vigour, and in the eighth, ninth, and tenth centuries the Nestorian and the Monophysite Churches, but especially the first, reached their highest degree of prosperity. Nestorian and Jacobite theologians, philosophers, and men of letters soon became the teachers of the conquering Arabs and the pioneers of Islamo-Arabic science, civilization, and learning. Nestorian physicians became the attending physicians of the court, and the Nestorian patriarch and his numerous bishops were regarded in Asia as second to none in power and authority. From Western Asia, Nestorianism spread into India, Ceylon, Socotra, and the Malabar coasts, China, India, and the East, where it soon became extremely influential and possessed numerous churches and well-organized bishoprics. So that as early as the ninth and tenth centuries, the jurisdiction of the Nestorian Catholics of Seleucia extended over Central, Southern, west-Central, and South-western Asia, as far as Syria, Arabia, Cyprus, and Egypt, and had more than two hundred subordinate bishops and metropolitan. In the meanwhile, the Monophysite Church held sway in Syria, Egypt, North Mesopotamia, and Armenia, where it developed strength, if not equal, certainly not very inferior, to that of the Nestorians. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the Mongolian and Tatar invasions and devastations in Central and Western Asia put an end to Arabic dominion, dealing, at the same time, a deadly blow both to the Nestorian and the Jacobite Churches, and causing havoc and consternation among Asiatic Christians in general. The whole of the Nestorian and Jacobite Christians were massacred, their churches and monasteries ruined, and a great number of the wandering compelled to renounce their faith and embrace Moslem. The weakened condition of both the Nestorian and Jacobite Churches paved the way to the Moslem Faith and destroyed their patriarchs and bishops, thanks to the incessant and salutary work of the early Catholic missionaries.
asked to be once more united with Rome as of old. The stream of conversions became more pronounced and rapid during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and has continued so till our own day. Franciscan, Dominican, Carmelite, and Jesuit missions were established all over Asia with the result that a large number of Nestorians and Monophysites have long since renounced their heretical creeds and embraced Catholicism. The same gratifying movement took place in the schismatic Greek Church of Syria and Asia Minor as well as in the Monophysite Church of Armenia.

ACTUAL CONDITION OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—The Christians of Asia are intimately connected with the rise and progress of the Catholic missions. The merit of having first disclosed to the West, and to Rome in particular, the mysterious and impenetrable East as well as the condition of Oriental Christianity undoubtedly belongs to the Crusaders. Profiting by this information, and ever solicitous for the welfare of the Church of Christ, the popes were the first to seize the opportunity for a Catholic propaganda in the Far, as well as in the near East. Towards the end of the thirteenth century, Innocent IV, Gregory X, and Honorius II sent the Franciscan missionaries, Lorenzo of Giovanni Pian del Corpo, Pietro Ruyshbroek (de Rubruquis), Giovanni of Cremona, and others, as their representative delegates, to the great Mogul, Kublai Khan, on behalf of the Oriental Christians. In 1306, the Franciscan, Giovanni di Montecorvino, was sent by Benedict XI on a similar mission to China, where he was subsequently appointed bishop with seven auxiliary bishops by Clement V, and where he died in 1350. In 1318, the Dominican Francesco di Persiglia was appointed Bishop of Sultaniah, in Tartary, by Pope John XXII, and in 1321–28, another Dominican missionary, Giordano Catalani, accompanied by three Franciscan friars, made two successful journeys to India, to the coast of Malabar, to Ceylon, and to China. In 1323, the Franciscan, Odorico of Pordenone, visited Ceylon, Java, Borneo, Khan-Balik, Tibet, and Persia, returning in 1331 after having baptized more than 20,000 pagans. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries Franciscans and Dominicans who were sent out by the popes as the official guardians of the sanctuaries of Jerusalem and the Holy Land, began to extend their missionary activity to North Syria, North-west Mesopotamia and Egypt, while the Carmelites advanced into Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Persia. In 1501, the Franciscan, Enrico di Coimbra, accompanied the Portuguese, Alvares de Vara, into Calicut, Cochin, Goa, and Canganore; and in 1521, Catholic missionaries first penetrated into the Philippine Islands. During the years 1541–45, St. Francis Xavier evangelized India, the coasts of Malabar and Travancore, and Ceylon; in 1546 Malacca; in 1548 the Moluccas; from 1549–51 Japan, and in 1551, while on his way to China, he died after an apostolic career not less wonderful and unique than successful and rich in results.

With the mission of St. Francis Xavier in India and the founding of the Society of Jesus, there began a new era for Catholic missionary enterprise, an era of indomitable zeal and exceptional success. Jesuits, Dominicans, Franciscans, and Carmelites were now eagerly vying with one another for the Christianization of Asia. Naturally enough the numerous Nestorian, Jacobite, Armenian, and Greek schismatic communities and churches scattered through the Turkish dominion in Syria, and in Minor Armenia, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and through Persia attracted their first attention; and, thanks to their noble missionary efforts and their zeal, great numbers of schismatic Orientals with many of their bishops, priests, and monks joined the Catholic Church. Catholic missions and schools, seminaries, and churches, hospitals, and other charitable institutions were established among all these schismatic Oriental Churches in Asiatic Turkey and Persia, as well as among the heathen in China, India, Korea, Siam, Cochin-China, and Japan. Soon after, Oriental dioceses, or the Latin Rite, Apostolic prefectures, and Apostolic delegations were created and permanently established, with the gratifying result that now, at the beginning of the twentieth century, the Catholic Church is seen firmly established in every Asiatic region, side by side with Brahminism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Mohammedanism, Judaism, Nestorianism, Monophysitism, the schismatic Greek Church, and Protestantism.

The Oriental Churches of Western Asia (Turkey and Persia), however, are for us of particular interest, as they represent old and venerable national Churches, having their own hierarchy, rites, liturgical languages and usages, and ecclesiastical discipline, which had, as early as the fifth century, separated themselves from the Church of Rome. They represent what we usually call Oriental Churches, and are divided as follows: (1) The Nestorian Church, extending over Babylonia and Chaldees, Mesopotamia, and Assyria, Kurdistan, Persia, and the coast of Malabar in India. (2) The Jacobite Church (Monophysite), which extends over Syria, North-west Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Malabar. (3) The Armenian Church (Monophysite), which extends over the whole of Armenia, Persia, Asia Minor, and part of Syria. (4) The Maronite Church, which is a branch of the Syrian Church and extends over Mount Lebanon and Syria. (5) The Greek Church, scattered over Syria, Phoenicia, and Asia Minor. Another Church, generally referred to as an Oriental Church, is the Coptic, or Abyssinian, which, being restricted to African soil, must be here omitted. It must be noted, however, that each of the above-mentioned Oriental Churches, the Maronite excepted, which is entirely Catholic, is divided into two independent branches, or Churches; the one Catholic and in communion with Rome; the other schismatic and separated from Rome; each, however, having its own patriarch, bishops, priests, and local churches. They may be classified as follows:

I—NESTORIAN CHURCH.

II—JACOBITE CHURCH.

Schismatic Jacobites, or simply Jacobites, commonly called Catholics, Syrian, or simply Syrians.

Schismatic Armenians, or simply Armenians.

Schismatic Greeks, or simply Orthodox Greek Church.

Catholic Churches, commonly called Melchite Church, or simply Melchite.
which has been scrupulously prescribed and insisted upon by the Roman pontiffs, under penalty of suspension and excommunication; no clerical or lay member being allowed to change his rite without a special dispensation of the Holy See.

Catholicism in Asia.—Asiatic Turkey. The entire Christian population of Asiatic Turkey is 3,349,882, of which 692,431 are Catholics, 97,370 Protestants, and the rest schismatic. The Christians may be classified as follows: Asia Minor: 6,423 Catholic Armenians; 193,416 Schismatic Armenians; 994,922 Schismatic Greeks; 2,079 Jacobites; 5,838 Latins, and 3,400 Protestants. There are also 308,740 Maronites; 141,219 Melchites; 304,230 Schismatic Greeks; 19,459 Catholic Armenians; 23,834 Schismatic Armenians; 1,865 Chaldeans; 25,632 Syrians; 47,805 Jacobites; 39,034 Latins, and 21,520 Protestants in Palestine, Phoenicia, and Syria as far north and west as the Euphrates, or a total of 388,740 Catholics; 141,556 Melchites; 1,652,430 Schismatic Greeks; 88,558 Catholic Armenians; 991,682 Schismatic Armenians; 46,785 Chaldeans; 92,000 Nestorians; 39,622 Syrians; 78,210 Jacobites; 46,867 Latins, and 97,370 Protestants. The population of Arabia is entirely Mohammedan, except in the sea-port of Aden, where there is an Apostolic vicariate with about 1,500 Christians.

Persia.—There are in Persia 20,000 Chaldeans; 50,500 Nestorians; 5,035 Catholic Armenians; 81,654 Schismatic Armenians; 200 Latins, and about 2,670 Protestants. In Afghanistan there is not a single Christian church or any organized Christian community.

India.—The number of Catholics in India, including Ceylon, is about 2,069,791, with 4,938 churches and chapels; 105 seminaries and colleges; 2,312 schools; 37 hospitals; 2,190 European missionaries; 1 patriarch (in Goa); 7 archbishops; 26 bishops; 3 Apostolic vicars, and 3 Apostolic prefects. The number of the Jacobites is about 120,000, the Chaldeans (independent of the Chaldean Patriarch of Babylon, although formerly dependent on him) about 100,000. The number of Protestants in India is about 700,000 (1889).

China.—The Catholic population of China is about 820,000, governed by 39 Apostolic vicars and 2 Apostolic prefects, with 955 European missionaries, having 4,067 churches and chapels, 90 colleges and seminaries, 4,067 schools and orphan asylums, and 62 hospitals. The number of Protestants, in 1900, is given by Fearn as 200,000.

Korea.—There are in Korea 45,000 Catholics, with 1 bishop and 42 priests; Protessants (Methodists and Baptists), 7,000.

Japan.—In Japan the Catholics number 60,500, with 1 archbishop (Tokio), 3 bishops (Nagasaki, Osaka, and Hakodate), and about 130 missionary priests. The number of Protestants is about 100,000, and that of the Orthodox Greek Russians, about 5,000, with 1 bishop.

Indo-China.—(French Colony) 820,000 Catholics, with 410 missionary priests; 3,304 churches and chapels; 24 seminaries and colleges; 2,349 schools and orphan asylums, and 98 hospitals.

Philippine Islands.—There are in the Philippine Islands estimated at about seven millions, of which about 600,000 are wild tribes and pagans, about six millions Catholics, and the rest Mohammedans and pagans. The Catholic Church is governed by an Apostolic delegate, 1 archbishop, and 4 bishops with numerous secular and regular priests, and a large number of lay members.

Asiatic Russia.—The Christian population of Asiatic Russia is estimated at about fourteen millions, 75,000 of whom are Catholics, and the rest schismatic Greeks (Greco-Russian Church).

All the above statistics are only approximately correct, as the various censuses so far published are often doubtful, contradictory, and conflicting. According to P. Pisani (Vacant, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, I, coll. 2006–2007), the entire population of Asia, according to their various religions and creeds, may be approximately classified as follows:

I. Buddhists, 400,000,000; Brahmins, 200,000,000; Mohammedans, 100,000,000; other heathen religions, 800,000,000; Christians, 20,000,000; total, 800,000,000.

II. Protestants: In Western Asia, 85,000; India, 817,000; China and Korea, 210,000; Japan, 50,000; total, 1,162,000.

III. Catholics: Asiatic Russia, 70,000 to 75,000; Asiatic Turkey and Persia, 700,000; India, 2,140,000; China, Korea, Japan, and Indo-China, 1,710,000; Philippine Islands, 6,000,000; total, 10,625,000.

Gabriel Ouesans.

Asia Minor, the peninsula mass that as the Asiatic continent projects westward of an imaginary line running from the Gulf of Alexandria (Iesus) on the Mediterranean to the vicinity of Trebizond (Trapezus) on the Black Sea. It is washed by three great seas, the Euxine (Black Sea) on the north, the Mediterranean on the south, and the Ægean on the west. It is located between 36°-42° north latitude and 26°-40° east longitude. The extreme length is about 720 miles and the extreme breadth about 420, though the average is 650 and 300 miles respectively. At its extreme western limit it almost touches the European mainland, from which it is separated for several miles by the narrow straits of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles (Hellespont) and by the small Sea of Marmora (Propontis) through which connecting waters the Mediterranean and the Black Sea are brought into mutual contact.

I. Name.—In remote antiquity it had no common denomination, being known variously after the races or kingdoms that it includes. The name "Asia" was soon popularized by the Romans for whom it meant only the populous and cultivated western sea-board, organized by them into a province, together with neighbouring territory (Myasia, Lydia, Caria, Phrygia) more or less civilized after the Greco-Roman ideas. The first written form of Asia Minor is the Christian Orosius (Hist., I, 2, 10), about the year 400. The early Byzantine writers often refer to it as ἠμπριά "Asia," "Little Asia." In Byzantine administration it came soon to be known under the somewhat elastic name of ἀνατολικά or "rising sun," i.e. "the East." It was, politically speaking, "the Anatolic theme," one of the twenty-nine provinces of the Byzantine empire from the seventh century to the eleventh century, when it became a Turkish land. Since then it has become officially known as Anatolia (Anadolu, Natalia, Nodolia), and as such constitutes an important part of Asiatic Turkey, is in fact the chief political and religious mainstay of the present Moslem constitution as far as it is based on Constantinople. Asia Minor is also known as the Levant, a Western (Italian and French) equivalent for Anatolia. This term however, applies chiefly to the commercial and industrial centres of the same name, though in ecclesiastical language and history it often includes both Egypt and the Holy Land. It was only gradually, and in response to divers influences and agencies, that under the name of Asia Minor... were included the remote semi-Oriental territories of Cappadocia and Pontus, Cilicia and Lesser Armenia. Outside of Roman law and administration their only element of civilization was the Christian religion, and it is not at all insignificant that the first expression of a sense of close and solid relationship should come from a Christian philosophic historian, and precisely at the moment when the new religion had finally borne down in town and country all former eminence and splendour, and filled with a new spirit the exhausted races and now lifeless culture of past ages.

II. GEOGRAPHY.—It is an elevated plateau, ranging in its surfaces from two to five thousand feet above the sea level, from which rise great mountain chains that run east and west with a certain regularity, while minor ones run in the form of transverse ridges, and isolated peaks of savage grandeur are widely scattered over the immense table-land. In extent Asia Minor covers about 270,000 square miles and is about the size of France, while in its main physical features it has often been compared with Spain. The western part of the country, the coast of Pontus, rise abruptly from the sea for a long distance, are broken by no good harbours, and fall gradually away towards the Bosphorus. Those of the southern Taurus range run in an irregular line not far from the Mediterranean and form a natural barrier between Asia Minor and Europe by the only part of the sea which is broken only by the coastal plains of Pamphylia and Cilicia. Inland, the Anti-Taurus range and isolated peaks lift their huge walls from seven to ten thousand feet and render difficult the intercommunication of the inhabitants. Some of these peaks, like Mt. Argeus in Cappadocia (15,100) are of volcanic origin, and smaller cones with well-preserved craters are numerous. There are but few passes, usually at a great height, the most notable of them being the famous Gates of Cilicia (Pylae Cilicicae) at the southern extremity, a narrow gorge (3,300) between two lofty mountains, the only entrance from the plains of Syria, and therefore at all times the road followed by the Eastern conquerors of Asia Minor. At the extreme west the mountains descend gradually to the sea which they pierce with numberless headlands and projections that give rise to the system of bays and inlets in which Asia Minor has always made the best use of its chief resources and its most attractive charm.

Asia Minor is a rich field for the geologist. The immense central mass of Mt. Argeus in Cappadocia is largely cretaceous limestone, and elsewhere, south and west, calcareous rocks abound. The rivers carry off enormous quantities of this material, and, as it hardens to travertine, forces them to shift their beds, petrifies vegetation, and sterilizes the surroundings. Igneous rocks are frequent, and there is still abundance of the Proconnesian and Phrygian marbles that once tempted the sculptors and builders of Pergamus and Rhodes. The mineral wealth is very much neglected, there are numerous and fall mostly into the Black Sea or the Mediterranean. But they are all sinuous and narrow, and as a rule very shallow. Moreover, falling from great interior heights, they become regularly torrential floods that carry away vast masses of alluvial matter, which they deposit in the sea, thereby filling up good harbours, converting into lakes ports once open, and pushing their deltas so far seaward that they become a menace to navigation. The lack of navigable rivers reaching well into the interior has always been a source of political and economic weakness for Asia Minor, and is perhaps the chief reason why in antiquity it never took on the character of a great united state. In later times this was much more deplorable, owing to the ruin of the once excellent system of Roman roads, the suspicions and unprogressive attitude of the Turkish authorities, and the decay of all the land-improvements made by the original native races, the Scythians and others, the barbarians of the imperial period, and the Byzantine population. The interior plateau has an average altitude of 3,500 feet, and stretches north-east by south-west a distance of 250 miles in length by 160 in breadth. Much of it is a treeless and barren waste, shattered with salt lakes or brackish pools, some with a stunted growth of saline brush, wormwood, sage, and fern. Yet it supports many nomadic and semi-nomadic tribes of Turcomans and Yurukis, who wander at will over these lonely wastes and undulating downs in search of pasturage and water for their vast flocks of sheep and goats, though in the summer months depend mainly upon the low-lying levels for purer air and the welfare of their flocks.

There are twenty-six lakes on this great plateau, some of which compare favourably with the great lakes of Switzerland, both for size and beauty. Hot medicinal springs are very numerous and form one of the distinctive features of the land. In general the climate is colder than that of the European peninsula within the same degrees of latitude, and is subject to greater extremes of temperature. One cause of the great extremes of cold and heat is the general lack of moisture; that of the clouds is intercepted by the lofty peaks of the Causse and Taurus. The discharge of all the rivers is only about one-third of the united volume of the rivers of France. The northern coast, between Constantinople and Sinope, is exposed to the cold blasts of unimpeded polar winds and to sultry summer heats; on the other hand, to the north-east the lofty peaks of the Causse and Taurus intercept the cold winds from the steppes of Russia and permit the growth of magnificent forests and of wild fruit-trees in abundance. The western coast has a temperature somewhat lower than that of Greece, owing to the atmospheric currents developed by the countless headlands and inlets of the Ionian coast. The southern coast, sheltered from the north winds by the Taurus range, enjoys a warm and genial climate comparable to that of southern France, though its summer is very dry. On the central plateau the climate is affected by the elevation and aspect of the land, but chiefly by the less rains; in some places the 'rainfall is for six or seven months unflecked by a single cloud. As a rule, the summer is exceedingly hot and the winter equally cold. Even on the coast malaria is endemic, owing to the stagnant pools, swamps, and marshy tracts formed by the shifting of river beds, inundations, and the formation of deltas. Moreover, the deforestation of the interior permits the contaminated air of the low-lying pestilential plains to be wafted freely over the central plateau. In respect to climate Asia Minor has greatly deteriorated since Roman antiquity, owing chiefly to the low-grade civilization of its Turkish population and the utter neglect of the country. The region.

The flora of Asia Minor is very varied, apart from the scanty vegetation of the inland plateau. The oak is found there in fifty-two varieties, half of which occur nowhere else. On the northern slopes of the central plateau grow the walnut, box, beech, ash, and other trees; the great forest of Ajakh-Dagh (Sea of Trees) is 120 miles long by 40 broad, and its trees exhibit generally a much larger growth than those of other lands under the same altitude. There are also great forests on all the northern slopes of the Black Sea ranges. On the southern slopes of the Taurus, to an altitude of 6,000 feet, noble cedar groves grow and tower above the pines, firs, and junipers, while below them, gradually dropping to the sea, are broad belts of palm groves and aloes and other sub-tropical growths. In the eastern Pontic region and elsewhere the apple, pear, plum, and cherry grow wild; indeed, Asia Minor is said to be the home of the fruit-trees which are looked on as of Western origin. Oriental plane and cypress, quasi-sacred symbols of domestic comfort and of human sorrow, are found everywhere. In the sheltered southern valleys the vine, fig, orange, lemon, and citron grow amid the rich aromatic shrubbery, and lend to the landscape the aspect of Sicily or the most favored district of the south coast. Driven by these rude warlike invaders, they soon took to the open sea, and so eventually settled in the islands of the Archipelago and along the southern coast of Asia Minor wherever the river-mouths or the plains offered tempting sites for trade and enterprise. It was from this group of the kings of Asia Minor and Caria with whose history Herodotus (I, 7–14) begins his account of the wars of the Greeks and Persians; for Asia, he says, with all the barbarian tribes that inhabit it, is regarded by the Persians as their own (ibid., I, 4). Thenceforth, from the ninth to the sixth century B.C., it is a long procession of Greeks (Ionians, Æolians, Dorians) who descend regularly on the shores of Asia Minor as traders, colonists, adventurers; above all, men of Ionian race. They build their city and sanctuary of Miletus near the shrine of the Lydian sun-god; they adopt other local deities, intermarry with the natives and establish upon an over-large scale those whose brevity composed the first great chapter in the history of the Western mind. (Sayce, The Ancient Empires of the East, London, 1884; Grote, History of Greece.) The earliest known coins (square-punched, electron) are of Lydian origin, belong to the seventh century B.C., and are perhaps a result of the mercantile intercourse of Greeks and natives. The oracle of Delphi now attracted the Lydian kings, "the first of the barbarians," says Herodotus, "to send presents to that Greek temple," and so along the lines of a common religion there sprang up an ever closer intercourse of both races.

About the middle of the sixth century B.C., a certain hegemony over most of the peninsula was established by Croesus, King of Lydia, but this petted child of antique fortune was soon overthrown (548–546 B.C.) by the Persian Cyrus, after which for two centuries the entire land was an outlying province of Persia, from whose throne the "Great King" fitted in with the ambition and patriotism of the Greeks of the mainland to bring about sympathetic wars in defence of the Asiatic Greeks and then in defence of the Hellenic fatherland (500–449 B.C.). These immortal efforts of the Greeks arrested forever the repeated overflows of Oriental arrogance and oppression, and made ready the way for the career of Alexander the Great who was destined to revenge on the Orient all the wrongs, supposed or real, of the Greeks of Asia Minor, and to open the career of European grandeur and progress. An uneasy and disturbed period followed during which the Seleucid successors of Alexander pretended to dominate from Antioch the rich and easy prey of Asia Minor that had fallen to Alexander after the battles of the Granicus and of Issus (334–333 B.C.), fought respectively at either end of the peninsula. In this time arose the new kingdom of Pontus, Bithynia, Cappadocia, Phrygia, and Media; partly Greek and partly native, also the interesting Celtic kingdom of Galatia founded (280 B.C.) by warlike adventurers from Gaul, and so organized by them that for the next six or seven centuries it bore the stamp of many peculiar Celtic institutions and traditions. In the distant states of the south and south-west, now took on a fresh development, forever connected with the little mountainous kingdom of Pergamus.
and its Greek rulers known as the Attalids, from Attalus, a favourite name of its kings. Then came the wars with republican Rome (190–63 B.C.), ending in the latter year with the defeat and death of the great Mithradates VI, "the Oriental defender of Greek liberties", whereby Pontus and Bithynia, i.e. the shores of the Black Sea, were for a long time freed from the peril of Oriental domination. In general the first three centuries of Roman imperial administration were a period of peace and progress for Asia Minor. From the fourth to the seventh century a long period of Eastern Roman rule with Persia went on, the vicissitudes of which were of no little importance to the great province across which the imperial armies and the warriors of Persia moved to and fro. The annihilation of Persian ambition by Emperor Heraclius (A.D. 610–641) only shifted the source of danger; henceforth the Arab and his successor, the Turk, take up the continuous challenge of the Orient, and finally make it good. Predatory Arab invasions from 672 to 717 were repelled with vigour from Constantinople, after which for over three centuries the land remained subject to the predatory raids and depredations of the Avars during this period almost endless conflict with the Arab dynasties made the Christian buffer-state of Armenia a scene of unutterable woe, and even Asia Minor was constantly menaced by the children of the Prophet. In the end the bravery and military skill of the Macedonian emperors (867–1057) availed not against the continuous pressure of fresh hordes from the far East, and the middle of the eleventh century saw two fatal events, almost contemporaneous and intimately connected, the final separation of the Greek and Latin churches (1040), and the conquest of Asia Minor by Malek Shah and his Seljuk Turks (1055–71). After the death of Malek (1092) his children disputed and divided the splendid inheritance left by him. But Asia Minor, henceforth Rûm (i.e. Rome, the Turkish name of all Byzantine territory), did not pass from their control; they set up their thrones at Nicea, Nicomedia, and eventually (1097) at Iconium (Konia). The crusaders of the twelfth century usually took the great highway over Asia Minor, either entirely into Syria, or partly, to embark at ports on the southern coast. Here and there they set up a temporary rule, but could not sustain it against the inexhaustible multitude of the Turkish hordes and the treachery of the governor. The Mongol hordes (1235), the Seljuks ruled Asia Minor, until the appearance of the Mongol hordes (1235). The overlordship of the latter lasted for some sixty years, until about 1304, when the rule of the Ottoman Turk was inaugurated by the victories of Othman I, and the successful reigns of his three sons, Urkan, Murad I, and Bajazet I. A ray of hope shone for the Christian Byzantines during the thirteenth century when the Empire of Nicea (1204–1330) held Bithynia, Lydia, a part of Phrygia and the islands of the Archipelago, i.e. the western region of Asia Minor, and against both the Franks and the Turks; Cilicia, Cilicia, however, was saved by the Samothrace, the seat of the Empire of Trebizond (1204–1461) on the Black Sea nourished feebly the hopes of Greek Christians for a return of independence under the cross. But Nicea fell and became an outpost of Ottoman conquest, and Trebizond scarcely survived the fall of Constantinople (1453). Both weak states had armed themselves against the Turk; Trebizond against Constantinople (1204), and though they made the coast line Christian for three centuries, they were unable to loosen the grip of the Turkish hordes of "the Black Sheep" and others on the table-land of the interior. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the loss of commercial supremacy along the coasts of Asia Minor and in many of the islands. They left permanent memorials in military architecture (since then the Turks call ruins indiscriminately "Djenovessi kaleşsi" or Genoese castles), and especially in the commercial and maritime law, in business relations and methods, and in the class known henceforth as "the Levantins". But the mutual jealousies and rivalries of the Italian commercial republics, and their predominating secular aims, prevented any serious attempt to oust the Seljuk Turk from the high table-lands and eastern border. Ottoman rule and life spread rapidly, threatened only for a brief while by a new Seljuk invasion westward (1589–1612), and by the disastrous battle of Angora in the latter year (Creasy, History of the Ottoman Empire, new ed., London, 1882). In the end, however, Turkish fortune and courage prevailed, and permanent dominion over the peninsula was secured to the Osmanli by the capture of Constantinople in 1453, since which time save for a partial occupation by the Egyptian Mohammed Ali (1831–39) the Turk has held in peace this richest jewel of Mediterranean empire. As a rule, the inland Turk has cared only for fresh pasturage for his flocks. Every stream running from the mountains to the sea has been dammed to supply water for sheep and goats he has despaired agriculture and the life of towns. Needless of the future he has ruined all cultivation of the land, allowed its once perfect development to decay completely, and driven the Christian peasant of the Byzantine age to the mountains or the sea, where he has not induced him to adopt, with the normal life, the law of the Romans. It is the lower and grade civilization of the steppe of Turkestam made permanent on the former site of supreme Helenes refinement of life and of Christian sublimity of teaching and virtue. And it is universally admitted that only a reconization from Europe can restore its original felicitous conditions. (Vieillen de Saint Martin, "Description historique et géographique de l’Asie Mineure", Paris, 1852; Heyd, "Geschichte des Levantenhandels", Stuttgart, 1879, tr. into French by Reynaud, Paris, 1880–86.)

The Roman Province.—Under the Roman rule, republican and early imperial, the numerous political entities that had sprang up in Asia Minor after the death of Alexander the Great disappeared rapidly and made way for a unity and efficiency of administration, a peace and prosperity, hitherto unknown. The little Greek kingdoms of Pergamus and Bithynia were left to Rome by the wills of their rulers, usually, than founded. The black hordes that infested its waters, was only too grateful for imperial protection; Pontus alone was won from Mithradates VI in a memorable war during which the Cels of Galatia sided with victorious Rome and reaped the reward of their good fortune in governmental favour. With their kings, Deotadus and Amyntas, the line of Celtic rulers of Asia Minor closed; after the death of Amyntas (25 B.C.) Galatia became a Roman province. The last king of Cappadocia died in the reign of Tiberius, and the land was forsworn with the entire peninsula. Without doing violence to local customs or traditions, the imperial government assured to the provincials an administration at once responsible and equitable, of swift and thorough justice, of continuous peace, easy communication, protection to life and property and the fruits of honest industry. The provinces were divided into districts, like Ancyra, the gold-embroiderer of Attalia, and the sculptor of Diana statuettes in Ephesus were henceforth assured of permanent prosperity, and with them all the other callings and occupations of the most highly civilized part of the Mediterranean world. Manufactures and industry must have increased before the end of the second century Asia Minor had touched the acme of temporal felicity. Taxation, as everywhere in the empire, was close and minute, but not intolerable. Occasionally the taxes were remitted and in periods of public calamity (earthquakes, inundations) the public treasury came to aid the unhappy provincials. The revenues of the peninsula, deeply impaired by republican misgovernment, the Mithradatic wars, and the campaigns against pirates, increased with rapidity; the fertile islands of the archipelago together with Cretes and Cyprus, centuries ago hellenized in polity, tongue and civilized institutions, were bee-hives of industry. Rhodes, e.g., was the great workshop of Greek sculptors who worked, though in a decadent way, the glorious traditions of the Ionian and Pergamene schools. For every available piece of ground on the coasts was intensely cultivated, as the pitiful wreckage of agricultural engineering yet shows, while in the interior the plains of Galatia were covered with goats and sheep, and those of Cappadocia with the finest breed of horses known to the ancients. That all the industrial virtues were highly cultivated is shown by a list of occupations drawn from Christian inscriptions of the fifth century (Cumont). They exhibit among other callings oil-dealers, scribes, greengrocers, potters, coppersmiths, skinners, mariners, money-changers and goldsmiths. On the imperial side, the few new cities were added to the five hundred busy urban hives of the western coast, but Greek civilization went hand in hand with Roman law through the interior and was welcomed, e.g., in the mountains of uncouth Cappadocia and of rugged warlike Isauria where the Attalids and Seleucids had never been able to acclimatize it. For the better administration of justice the land was divided into a certain number of judicial districts (conventus juridici) and assizes were regularly held in the chief towns of the same.

A certain unity of religion was reached in the worship of Rome and Augustus, i.e. of the dead and later of the living emperors, to whom temples were built in the metropolitan cities (Augusteum, Cesarium), and in the celebration of whose festivals the Asiatic provincial proclaimed his gratitude, exercised his new Roman patriotism, and felt himself drawn nearer, if not to his fellow-Asiatics, at least to the marvellous darling of fortune enthroned upon the distant Tiber. The man of Asia Minor had long been subject to Persia without revolt, and then to the children of the brilliant marshals of Alexander; submission was natural to him, and this time the religion in its train all that was needed to make life perfect in so favored land, i.e. peace and prosperity. As high-priest of the provincial department of the imperial religion of Rome and Augustus his influence over all religious matters was great. The office seems at times to have been closely identified with that of the president of the emperor's festival, and was the formal source of much of the persecution directed against the Christians of the province, especially during the annual festival, when the deputies of the provincial cities met at the metropolis and manifested their patriotism, among other ways, by denouncing the followers of Jesus for refusing to adore the divinity (numen, genius) of the emperor. An ideal picture of the office, affected, however, by Christian institutions and experience, is given by Julian the Apostate in his famous letter to the Galatarch (Ep., xlvi; cf. Eus., Hist. Eccl., VIII, xiv, 9). With the honour of president of the annual festival of the emperor went other additional titles (archon, Bithynarch, Galatarch), in addition to various marks of honour. Only the rich could pretend to merit it, for the office carried with it the right and the duty to defray the expenses of such festivals. But there were many to claim it, for provincial pride was strong in Asia Minor, and such rivalries as the metropolitan cities was very keen. The new worship of Rome and Augustus was not unlike a religion established by law, though it never interfered with the older forms of Greek or Oriental worship, or the numerous miraculous asylums, or even such individual careers as those of Apollonius of Tyana or Alexander of Abdis. The Galatarch was left their ancient liberty of internal administration, the repartition of imperial assessments, and the preservation of local order. Only the wealthy could vote for the magistrates, and the time was yet far off when their descendants would try in vain to breed themselves of an hereditary dignity that in the end contained with the Roman magistrates' burdens. Occasionally the imperial government looked into the municipal book-keeping and even controlled the municipal decrees; more frequently it exercised a certain surveillance over the nomination of the chief of police (eirenearch). The public safety was assured in the earlier imperial times by a small army of 5,000 auxiliary troops in Galatia, and by the Black Sea fleet of forty ships stationed at Trebizond. In the time of Vespasian two legions were quartered in Cappadocia and along the upper waters of the Euphrates. A few soldiers scattered throughout the cities and towns, the increasing Roman magistrates as messengers, sheriffs, bailiffs, and the like. Asia Minor, in which both the senate and the emperor exercised, in theory at least, a co-ordinate jurisdiction until the end of the third century, was too contented and loyal to call for other troops than were necessary for protection from the foreign enemy, or to repress brigandage. The latter was, unhappily, never quite suppressed in a land well fitted for the flight and concealment of the lawless. Up to the time of Justinian certain parts of Isauria and Cilicia were the home of bold freebooters, despite the ever tightening military checks, the increase of taxation, and the growing influence of Christian principles. There were often in municipal life lack of integrity, corruption, and waste, coupled with intrigues, rivalries, and factions, but this is no more than might be expected amid such unexampled prosperity, in a land where no large political life existed, and where climate and the narrow municipal horizon conspired to diminish energy and magnify local and temporary interests. "The calm sea," says Mommsen, "easily becomes a swamp, and the lack of the great pulsation of general interest is clearly discernible also in Asia Minor".

A complex system of the cities of Asia Minor in the last days of the empire, their prosperity and magnificence, partly inherited and partly to the credit of Rome, sounds to modern ears like exaggeration. Their ruins, however, are convincingly eloquent. Marble and granite, exquisitely and solidly worked, were the building materials of the countless temples, baths, assembly-rooms, gymnasiums, deep-pillared porticoes and colonnades that graced even the smallest of its cities, and were very often the gifts of private individuals, who exhibited thus in their little "fatherland" (as the Christian Bishop Abercius calls his native city Hierapolis), a power of self-sacrifice and affection for the public weal for which no larger stage was open. Countless art-works in marble and bronze, often replicas of incomparable Greek originals carried away in the republican period, decorated the public buildings and the open squares; even these copies seem at last to have been confiscated by Christian emperors, as Constantine famed, Bithynic. Aqueducts and reservoirs, embankments and levees, saved and controlled the useful waters that are now the ruin of the land. Terraces built with skill and art multiplied the productive power of the fertile soil. From the city gates there radiated numerous long lines of sculptured tombs, whose broken inscriptions now throw light on the rich and varied life of the antique world. In the fine arts the correct sense of the Greeks was the guide, but in commercial and industrial life the Roman seems to have been dominant. Latin mercantile words are often transmuted into Greek, and there are numerous other evidences of close commercial intercourse with Italy. Famous Greek teachers and physicians frequented the Italian cities (Tac., Ann., XII, 61, 67) somewhat as the Byzantine humanists frequented those of Northern Italy. The great municipal families and those well established on the vast estates of the central table-land seem to have cherished the pure literary type was universal, and to some extent provided for by the cities and even by the imperial government. We read of principals and inspectors of schools, of teachers of writing and music, of masters of boxing, archery, and spear-throwing, of special privileges for teachers of rhetoric and grammar; in a word the ideal education of the Greek mainland as crystallized in the classic writers and in the still vigorous school of Athens, was in a large measure reproduced in Asia Minor. Homer and the tragedians of the 5th century B.C. have all left a chief result of it all was a race of remarkable public orators known as sophists or rhetoricians, wandering academic lecturers on the glories of the past or on commonplace of philosophy, poetry, and history. Often bilingual, they were admired by the provincials, whose favour they held by flattery and sympathy, and by careful attention to the use in en speech—voice, gesture, dress, attitude. Some of them, like Dio Chrysostom, exhibit genuine native patriotism, but in all of them there echoes a hollow declamatory note, the best evidence of the hopeless character of Greek paganism, of which they were now the chief spokesmen. The rapidity of its episcopate and its influence was deep and lasting, and though they were inimical to the Christian religion, this influence may yet be traced in not a few of the Greek Christian writers of their own and later times. Apart from this class the pagan society of Asia Minor seems to have contributed but a few great names to the annals of science and literature. Two of them come from Bithynia, the above-mentioned rhetorician Dio Chrysostom, moralist and philosopher, and Arrian of Nicomedia, historian of Alexander the Great and popularizer of Epictetus. Pergamus boasts the name of the leather goods trade. The Athenian Faith in Hordius of Cos, a man of scientific attainments in his own department, and also of general philosophic culture, but a stern enemy of the Christian religion. Nevertheless, just as Roman Asia Minor boasts of no first-class cities like Alexandria or Antioch, but only of a great many second and third-class centres of population, so in literature the great names are wanting, while general literary culture and refinement, both of speech and taste, are widespread, and, in the near western section, universal. The cosmopolitan character of imperial administration, the diffusion of education, the facility of travel, and the free use of the two great civilized tongues, made the man of Asia Minor, in a certain sense, a citizen of the world and fitted him peculiarly to play an important part from the fourth century on in the spread of Christianity and the adaptation of its ideas to Graeco-Roman society. Indeed, without special encouragement from the East, the increase of their youth, the Basils and the Gregorys lose half their interest for us. (Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, New York, 1887, II, 345-97; Ramsay, The Historical Geography of the Roman Empire. London, 1890.)

Spread of Christianity in Asia Minor.—As everywhere in the Roman empire, so in Asia Minor it was the numerous Jews in which the Christian religion found its first adherents. In the last pre-Christian centuries the Seleucid kings of Syria had transplanted from Palestine to Asia Minor thousands of Jewish families whose descendants were soon scattered along all the coasts and throughout a great part of the interior. The Acts of Philip (Acts, ii, 5, 9, 10) there were present among the disciples "Jews, devout men out of every nation under heaven," also representatives of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. On his several missionary journeys, St. Paul visited many parts of Asia Minor and establishe the first Christian churches; in the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters of Acts there is a vivid and circumstantial description of all the chief phases of his Apostolic activity. His conversion of the Galatians, in particular, has a perennial interest for Western Christians, since at least a large portion of that province was composed of descendants of those Celts of Gaul who had settled there in the third century B.C. and in St. Paul's time, and for centuries afterwards, still retained their Celtic speech and many Celtic institutions (Lightfoot, Commentary on Galatians, London, 1896, 1-15; Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, New York, 1889, 130-151). Asia Minor was the principal scene of the labours of St. John; he wrote his Apocalypse on the desolate island of Patmos, and his Gospel probably at Ephesus. He established firmly in the latter city a famous centre of Christian life, and an ancient tradition, as old as the Council of Ephesus (431), says that the Blessed Virgin spent her last years in the vicinity of Ephesus, and passed thence to her reward. From Ephesus St. John travelled much throughout Asia Minor and has always been credited with the first establishment of the new religion. The conversion of the young robber, touchingly told in the "Quis Dives?" of Clement of Alexandria exhibits the popular concept of St. John in the mind of the average Christian of Asia Minor about the year 200. In the "Acts of Thelata" it is now recognized that we have a fragment of a life of St. Paul in Asia Minor, written about the middle of the second century, though without ecclesiastical approval, which throws no little light on several phases of the great Apostle's career, but slightly touched on in the Acts and the Pauline Epistles. St. Peter, too, preached the Gospel in Asia Minor (Acts, xvi, 13) and is addressed "to the strangers dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia", i.e. in northern, western, and central Asia Minor. That the new religion spread rapidly is proved by the famous passage in the letter of Pliny (Ep. x, 97), Roman governor of Bithynia, addressed to the Emperor Trajan about 112, in which he says that the whole province is overrun with the contagion of Christianity, the temples are abandoned and the meat of the victims unsaleable, persons of every age, rank, and condition are joining the new religion. At this period also the Church History of Eusebius shows us the admirable figure of St. Ignatius of Antioch, of whose seven letters five are addressed to Christian churches of Asia Minor (Philadelphia, Ephesus, Smyrna, Tralles, Magnesia) and reveal an advanced stage of Christian growth. It was at this time that St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, of whom we hear so much, born in Asia Minor, both prominent Christian figures of the second century, the latter being the foremost ecclesiastical writer of his period. It is in Asia Minor that synods, or frequent assemblies of Christian bishops, first meet us as a working ecclesiastical institution; even in remote and uncouth Cappadocia they were not infrequent in the third century. It was therefore fitting that when the first general council of the Catholic Church was held (325) it should be called together at Nicaea (Iznik) in western Asia Minor, to which area was sent the episcopal and stanchly Christian. Of the (traditional) 318 bishops who attended that council about one hundred were from Asia Minor; the semi-barbarous Isauria sent fourteen city bishops and four rural bishops (choreiscopsi), while remote Glicia sent nine city bishops and one rural bishop. Indeed, the episcopal system of Asia Minor seems to have been almost completed by this time. (Ramsay, Cities and Bishops of Asia Minor, in Histor. Geogr. of Asia Minor, London, 1890, 104–426.) In any case, there were in that territory in the fifth century some 450 Greek-speaking bishops. In the institution of the Choreiscopi, bishops (choreiscopi) appears first in Asia Minor (Council of Ancyrta, 314) and seems to be the origin of the later parochial system. It is in Asia Minor that arose, or were fought out, nearly all the great ecclesiastical conflicts of the early Christian period. The Church History of Eusebius, first published before 325, exhibits the Christian bishops of Asia Minor during the second and third centuries in conflict with semi-Oriental philosophic heresies like Gnosticism, that developed under the leadership of keen critical rationalists like Marcion of Sinope on the Black Sea, while the germs of the great christolo-gies, e.g., Sabellianism, were first forged on the same soil. Here, too, met the famous councils that overturned these heresies (Nicea in 325, Ephesus in 431, and Chalcedon in 451). Internal reform of the Christian Church was first undertaken from Asia Minor, where Montanism, a native of Phrygia, began the rigorist movement known as Montanism, and denounced the growing laxity of Christian life and the moral apathy of the religious chiefs of the society. He claimed for himself and certain female disciples the survival of the early Christian prophetic gifts, or personal religious inspiration, which seems to have been more frequent and to have survived longer in Asia Minor than elsewhere (Harnack, Mission und Ausbreitung, 287, 402). The immediate cause of the last great persecution, that of Diocletian (284–305), seems to have been the rapid growth of Christianity in all Asia Minor, particularly in the imperial capital, then located at Byzantium. Maximian, the pious, and his wife Macrina, the pious (Euseb., Hist. Eccl., IX, ix), that nearly all the Orient had become Christian, and in this he was merely the echo of the dying words of the contemporary Christian scholar and mystic of Antioch, Irenaeus (Hist. Eccl., IX, vi) that in his time the greater part of the Roman world had become Christian, even entire cities. Such a Christian city of Phrygia, Eusebius tells us (Hist. Eccl., VIII, xi, 1), was given to the flames by the pagans in the persecution of Diocletian; the inhabitants perished in a man with that first year's Thyatira in the same province was an entirely Christian city, though intensely Montanist in religious temper. The city of Apameia in the same province seems to have become quite Christian before 300. The work of Chrysostomus (Inscriptions Antiquiores de l'Asie Mineure, Rome, 1895) exhibits undeniable epigraphic evidence that Phrygia was widely Christianized long before the conversion of Constantine (312). The words of Renan (Origines du Christianisme, III, 363, 364) are therefore eminently true: "Theorcsward (from A.D. 112) for the words of Plutarch (De 그래스 de Christian land. There began the public profession of Christianity; there are found, from the third century, on monuments exposed to the public gaze, the terms Christianos or Christians; there the formulæ of epitaphs convey revered references to Christian dogmas; there, from the days of Septimius Severus, great cities adopted the Christian population; and, finally, or rather adapt their old traditions to biblical narrations. A great number of the Christians of Ephesus and Rome came from Phrygia. The names most frequently met with on the monuments of Phrygia are the antique Christian names (Trophinus, Tychnis, Tryphenus, Papias, etc.) the names appear in the apostolic times, and of which the martyrlogies are full." The Acts of the Christian Bishop, Pionius of Smyrna, a martyr of the time of Decius (249–251), portray that city as largely Christian, and with (aposis and the Jews) entirely devoted to its rhetori-cal studies. Bishop. As Gregory of Nyssa relates, aporos of Gregory of Cappadocia, (c. 213–275), the Wonder-worker, disciple and friend of Origen, that during the thirty-five or forty years of his episcopal activity he had Christianized nearly all Pontus. It is an unfair exaggeration (Harnack, 475–479) to attribute his success to toleration of heathen customs, amusements, etc. So good a Christian theologian as Gregory of Nyssa could relate this condensation of the Wonder-worker without perceived any real sacrifice of Christian principles in faith or morals; some concessions there must always be when it is question of conversions in the Roman empire. His "Sermon on the Wine" (c. 48), one of the earliest and most venerable documents of diocesan legislation, presupposes many well-established Christian communities, whose captive ecclesiastics and citizens (c. 260) spread the first germs of Christianity among the piratical Goths of the Black Sea. Asia Minor was certainly the first part of the Roman world to accept as a whole the principles and the spirit of the Christian religion, and it was not unnatural that the warmth of its conviction should eventually fire the neighbouring Armenia and make it, early in the fourth century, the first of the ancient states formally to accept the religion of Christ (Euseb., Hist. Eccl., IX, xii, 2). The causes of the rapid conversion of Asia Minor are not, in general, dissimilar to those which elsewhere favoured the spread of Christianity. It may be accepted, with Harnack, that the ground was already prepared for the new religion, inasmuch as Asia Minor was a land of oriental monarchy, the home of many disciples, and discredited polytheism, while on the other hand Christianity was confronted by no State religion deeply and immemorially entrenched in the hearts of a united and homogeneous people (the imperial worship being a late innovation and accepted only a few years after); and it is true of other parts of the Roman empire, and it remains certain that the local opposition to the Christian religion was nowhere stronger than in the cities of Asia Minor where Antoninus Pius (138–161) had to check the illegal violence of the multitude (Euseb., Hist. Eccl., IV, xxxii), even if we do not accept Aporros the Rhodian's "invention" (ibid., IV, xii), it is of ancient origin and exhibits an enduring Christian sense of intolerable injustice, already foreshadowed in I Peter, iv, 3–5, 12–19. The literary opposition to Christianity was particularly strong, as already said, among the rhetoricians and grammarians, i.e., among the public teachers and the philosophers, not to speak of the pagan imperial priesthood, nowhere so well organized and favoured as in every province of Asia Minor. Lactantius tells us that the last known anti-Christian pamphleeters were both from Bithynia in Asia Minor (Inst. V, 2), Hierocles, the governor of Bithynia, was especially withholds. The principal theologians of Asia Minor (Irenaeus, Gregory the Wonder-worker, Methodius of Olympus, Basil of Neocaesarea, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory..." Nysa) do not differ notably in their concepts of the Christian religion from those of Syria or Egypt or the West. It seems therefore quite incorrect to describe with Harnack the original conversion of Asia Minor as a gradual and rather peaceful transformation of the native heathenism and no real extirpation (keine Ausrottung, sondern eine Umfor-mung, op. cit., 463). If this were so, it must always remain a great mystery how the Christianity of Asia Minor could present, on the eve of its political triumph, so remarkable a front of unity in sound doctrine as is represented now. And the alleged original pagan sources were so numerous and conflicting, so gross and impure.

Of the ecclesiastical administration of Asia Minor, after the triumph of the Christian religion, but little need be said. Like the rest of the Roman empire the land was divided into two administrative ter-
tricts to be supervised). They were Pontus and Asia, respectively an eastern and a western territory. In the first were twelve civil provinces, to which corresponded the ecclesiastical provinces of Cappadocia, Lesser Armenia, Pontus, Phrygia, Lydia, Caria, Lycia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycania, and the Cyclades or islands of the Ægean. By the end of the fourth century these eighteen provinces were the patriarchy of Constantinople, while on the south-eastern coast, Isauria and Cilicia, with the island of Cyprus, were subject to the patri-archate of Antioch, Cyprus in a restless and discontented way. All were more easily reached from the mouth of the Orontes; yet other reasons, historical, national, and temperamental, co-operated with the ambition of the clergy of Constantinople to draw this line of demarcation between the two great ecclesiastical spheres of influence in the central Orient, whereby Armenia was drawn within the radius of Syro-Antiochene influence, to the great detrimet, later on, of Catholic unity. (Duchesne, Histoire ancienne de l'église, Paris, 1906, I, 433 sqq.) The ambition of the clergy of Constantinople, their jealousy of old Rome, and imperial favour, had won this pre-eminence for the royal city. It had never evangelized Asia Minor; that was done from Antioch, and in the third century the two ecclesiastates of Asia Minor were in the hands of the patriarchs of Cappadocia and Ephesus in Asia proper, were subject to the patriarch of the great Syrian city. In the latter half of the third century, long before the founding of Constantinople (330), the bishops of Asia Minor were wont to attend the synods of Antioch and in turn that patriarch occasionally presided over the synods held in Asia Minor. It was from Antioch that the churches of Asia Minor got their liturgy; from them it radiated to Constantinople itself and eventually throughout the greater part of the Greek Church (Duchesne, Origins of Christian Worship, London, 1896, 71). Once established, however, the new religion disappeared. Only the most of the churches of Asia Minor remained unchallenged, especially after the Arab conquest of Syria (636) when the ancient influence of Antioch on eastern Asia Minor disappeared. Nevertheless, the ecclesiastical organization of Asia Minor was too solidly ingrained in the popular life to disappear very slowly. If we had complete lists of the subscriptions to the Greek council of the eighth and ninth centuries, we should know more about the survival of the episcopal system and its various modifications under Byzantine rule. As it is, not so much is known on the subject as the history of Asia Minor by a certain number of catalogues or lists of the patriarchates with their metropolitan and autocephalous archbishops, also of the suffragans of the metropolitans, which are extant under the Latin name of "Notitiae Episcopatum" (ed. Parthey, Berlin, 1866). These catalogues were originally known as Τάσσεως, and they allude rather to the seventh or eighth century (Παλαία Τάσσεως), while others underwent frequent correction, more or less scientific and thorough, even as late as the thirteenth century (Krumbacher, Gesch. der byzant. Litteratur, 2d ed., Munich, 1897, 415, 416; Ramsay, Hist. Geogr. of Asia Minor, 89, 427). Together with the geographies of Ptolemy and Strabo (the latter a native of Asia Minor and praised by Ramsay for his accurate and lucid work), the famous "Tabula Peutingeriana" (a fourth-century map of the imperial road-system radiating from Constantinople), and the "Synodemus" of Hierocles, a sixth-century account of the sixty-four Byzantine provinces and their more than 900 cities, these episcopal lists enable us to follow the continuity of Christian public life in Asia Minor throughout the troubled centuries of political and economic decay that finally ended in the blank horror of Islamicitc shephtism. Krumbacher notes in his list the strict adherence to ancient geographical names, and the recurrence of original diocesan names, long after they had ceased to correspond with the reality of things, somewhat as the Roman Church yet continues to use the titles of extinct sees located in countries now subject to non-Christian political control.

IV. PRESENT CIVIL CONDITIONS.—In the absence of a reliable census the population of Asia Minor is variously given. Larousse (1898) puts it at 9,235,000, of whom 7,179,000 are Moslems and 1,548,000 Christians. This does not include the small Greek Christian principality of Samos (45,000) nor the island of Cyprus (210,000) nor that of Crete (360,000), all three being frequently counted as parts of Asia Minor. Neher (Kirchenlex., VII, 775) puts the total population at 10,750,000. It is mostly composed of Ottoman Turks who still reproduce the primitive type, especially in the interior, where nomadic tribes, like the Turcomans and Yuruk, exhibit the characteristics of the original Ottoman conquerors. In general the term "Turk" is applied to all sedentary Mohammedans in Asia Minor, whatever be their origin; it is also applied to the nomads, descendants of Arab and negro slaves, to the numerous immigrants from Bosnia and Bulgaria (Slavs in blood, but Moslems in faith), and to the Albanian soldiers settled in Asia Minor. Similarly, the term applies to Moem desendants of Arab and negro slaves. Some of the nomadic tribes (Yuruk) are Mohammedan only in name, though of ancient Turkish descent. They are generally known as Turcomans and live with their flocks in their own tent-encampments, primitive clans with no cohesion; they spend their lives in transit from the plains to the mountains, and vice versa, in search of pastureage, water, and pure air. With them may be included the Cretans, wandering tinkers, and horse dealers. There are also other small remnants of the original Turkish immigration that still affect the ways of their fierce ancestry, the Ashars and the Zebeks, from whose ranks the government draws its most fanatical troops. The Moslem and the Christian, both sedentary and nomad, differ so much in features and social habits from the Turks that they are not classed with the latter; they resemble much their brethren of the Armenian highlands, are evidently of Medie origin, and speak dialects of Persian with the Syriac and Armenian words found on the seashore, in the numerous island of this region, and in the large inland cities of Cappadocia and Pontus, the Greeks are numerous; on the southern coast and in the islands they are in the vast majority and, except politically, are the dominant race as of old, being the commercial and industrial element. Not a secondary Turkey are of Greek descent; the original descendants of voluntary or compulsory exiles; on the other hand, not a few Greeks isolated in the interior yet speak Turkish, a stigma of hated subjection that Greek patriotism aims at effacing. There are many Armenians in Asia Minor, sometimes gathered in distinct settlements, and again scattered through the Turkish villages; the taxes are usually farmed out to them, for which reason they are bitterly hated by the Turkish peasant who complains of their rapacity. They retain usually their native tongue. On the Persian frontier of Asia Minor, in some secluded valleys, are found yet a few Nestorians, descendants of those Syrian Christians who fled in remote times to these fastnesses either to avoid the oppression of their Moslem masters in Mesopotamia or before the encroachments of nomad tribes.

V. GOVERNMENT.—Asia Minor proper is divided into fifteen "vayet" or administrative territories, two separate sanjaks (districts) and a sanjak (Samos). At the head of each is a "vali" or provincial governor, in whose council a seat is given to the spiritual head of each of the non-Moslem communities. Each vilayet is divided into sanjaks or districts, and these are again subdivided into communal groups or communes, presided over respectively by officers known as mutessarifs, kaimakams, mudirs, and mukhtars. The code is the common law of Islam, known as Nizam, and there is an appeal to the High Court at Constantinople from the civil, criminal, and commercial courts in each province.

It is to be noted that in the conquered Roman provinces the Arabs first, and then the Turks, retained much of the Roman (Byzantine) Law, especially as regarded their Christian subjects, and in so far as it did not conflict with the Koran (Amos, History of the Civil Law of Rome, London, 1883). The chief cities of Asia Minor are Smyrna (300,000), Trebizond, Iskanderun (Iesus, Scanderoon), Adana, Angora (Ankara), Sivas (Sebastea), Sinope, Samsun (Amisus), Koniah (Iconium), Kaisariye (Caesarea in Cappadocia). Adalia is the largest seaport on the southern coast; Broussa (Prusa), magnificently situated at the foot of Mt. Olympus in Bithynia, is the seat of the French and British industries, and of the immense Jewish population; the early Ottoman sultans. Kaisariye at the foot of Mt. Argeus, with its memories of St. Basil the Great, is one of the world's oldest trade-centres, recognized as such from the dawn of history under its Semitic name Mazaica; it is even now the most important commercial town in eastern Asia Minor.

Sivas in the valley of the Kizil-Irmak (Halyss) is a wheat centre. Trebizond on the Black Sea justifies even yet the foresight of its early Greek founders. Erzerum in Lesser Armenia is an important mountain fortress.

COMMUNICATION AND EDUCATION.—There are no roads in the sense of our modern civilization; pack animals, including horses, have always been used by the Turks, both sedentary and nomad, for transportation, both of persons and goods. Recently carts have come somewhat into use. There are relays of horses at intervals on the main lines of communication, and in the larger cities. A trans-Syrian railroad from Constantinople to Baghdad on the Persian Gulf has long been projected. It has reached Koniah and on its way passes Ismid (Nicomedia) and Eskehir (Dorylea). In all there are about 220 miles of railway in the vast peninsula. One of the principal modern educational instruments is at Ankara, the city of Galatia. The Greek communities in Asia Minor cherish no public duty more than that of education, and make many sacrifices in order to provide for their children, in primary and secondary schools, a high grade of the education they admire. It is in reality a genuine Hellenism based on the study of the ancient classical, the history of their ancestors both peninsular and continental, and that to Islam, a strong sense of mutual relationship, and a vivid hope that they will again be called to the direction of public life throughout the peninsula. There is, however, a manifold opposition to this modern Greek ideal. If it were possible to bring about the reunion of the long separated Churches the ideal could be notably furthered.

VII. RESOURCES.—Asia Minor is yet largely an agricultural and pastoral land. On the high plateaux immense flocks of sheep and goats are raised, whose wool is used for domestic purposes, for export, or for the manufacture of Turkish rugs and carpets. The silk manufactures of Brousse in the sixteenth century a staple of Asia Minor, have greatly decreased. Viticulture, once the pride of Asia Minor, has almost perished. The use of wine is forbidden by the Koran; hence the grape is cultivated by the Turks only for the making of confections, and by the Greeks chiefly for personal use.

Chios and Smyrna, famous in antiquity, are no longer made; their place is taken by dried raisins that form a principal article of export. Boxwood, salt-fish, barley, millet, wheat, oil, opium, rage, wool, and cotton, hides, galls, wax, tobacco, soap, liquorice, and figs are all exported and are the staple products of the land, the proportions becoming the natural advantages of the land. It has already been stated that a few mines and marble quarries are worked, but in a feeble and intermittent way. The popular genius is foreign to all progress, the government is based on corruption and oppression, and the national religion is eminently suspicious and repressive. The land has the reputation of honesty, kindliness, hospitality, but he has no bent for the active and energetic Western life, loves dearly his "kief" or somnolent vegetative repose, and is hopelessly in the grasp of two rapacious enemies, the usurer and the tax-gatherer. The Greek and the Armenian are the dominant commercial factors, and are in several ways equipped to wrest from the Turk everything but political control of the country.

VIII. THE ISLANDS.—Leaving aside the great islands of Crete and Cyprus, no longer under immediate Turkish control and held by the British, the Archipelago forms a special administrative district. Their number is legion; some of them are very fertile, others are mere peaks and ridges of rock. They export fruit, some wine, raisins, olive oil, and mastic, and their sponge fisheries are very valuable. Among the islands famous in antiquity are Tenedos near the mouth of the Dardanelles, Lemnos between the Dardanelles and Mt. Athos, Lesbos, the native place of Alceus and Sappho, between the Dardanelles and Smyrna. The island of Icaria recalls the legend of Icarus, and Patmos the sojourn of St. John and the writing of the Apocalypse. Cos awakens memories of the great healer Hippocrates, and the island of Rhodes has a history second to none of the small insular states of the world. Its strong fleets made it respected in Greek antiquity, and its maritime code was taken over by the Roman Law. Its bronze Colossus, astride the mouth of its harbour, was one of the seven wonders of the world. For nearly four hundred years it was the home of the Knights of St. John, and its famous siege and capture by Suleiman I (1522) filled all Western Christendom with equal sorrow and admiration. Since 1832 the island of Samos has been a special sanjak by itself. In the full flood of ancient Ionian luxury, art, and science, Samos was foremost of the Hellenic colonies along the coast of Asia Minor. There Pythagoras was born, and Antony and Cleopatra died at Samos. In ancient times it was a favourite resort for those weary of the agitated life of Rome.

IX. VICARIATE APOSTOLIC OF ASIA MINOR.—In 1818 the Vicariate Apostolic of Asia Minor, founded in the seventeenth century, was confided by Pius VI to the Archdiocese of Smyrna. Since then the Archbishop of Smyrna exercises jurisdiction over the Latin Catholics of the greater part of Asia Minor, a few places excepted. Smyrna itself is the chief centre of Catholicism in the peninsula. It was founded as a Latin see by Clement VI in 1346, became extinct in the seventeenth century, was restored and elevated (1818) to the archiepiscopal dignity by Pius VII. For about a century and a half, from 1818 to the latter part of the eighteenth century, the Jesuits exercised with success the pastoral ministry at Smyrna, for many centuries the chief resort of the once numerous Latin Christian Telamonti or Italians and French known as “Levantines.” They were the traders, merchants, travellers, agents of all kinds in business at the various centres of commerce in the islands and along the coast of Asia Minor, which are known as “Scale” to the Italians and “Echelettes” to the French. Here the famous “lingua franca,” or jargon of a few hundred words, known as “Provençal,” was used. In Smyrna, also, at Adiabene, with others, with words, with some Greek and Turkish, was the principal medium of commercial communication. When the Jesuits first entered Smyrna they found there some 30,000 well disposed Christians and 7,000 to 8,000 Armenians. Lazarists and Capuchins were also active at Smyrna during this period. The Latin Catholics of Smyrna and vicinity are variously estimated from 15,400 to 18,000. There are in the city proper 8 churches and 8 chapels. The parishes are 3 in number and the clergy 61 (19 secular priests and 42 religious, Franciscans, Capuchins, Dominicans, Lazarists, Mehitarians). There are 15 schools (8 for boys, 7 for girls), with 3 boarding-schools or academies for girls, conducted respectively by the “Dames de Sion,” the Sisters of Charity, and the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception. The orphan asylums number 4, with about 250 orphans. There is a hospital. Since 1850 the Sisters of Charity (87) and since 1840 the Brothers have been active at Smyrna in works of charity and education; the latter had in their college (1901) 155 pupils. The Lazarists conduct a college known as the College of Propaganda, founded in 1841; it has about 100 pupils. The present Archbishop of Smyrna and Administrator Apostolic of Asia Minor is Monsignor Raffaele Francesco Marango, a Dominican, from 1871 to 1904 parish priest of Galata (Constantinople), and since 1904 Ordinary of Smyrna. He has one suffragan, the Bishop of Candia, or Crete. Outside of Smyrna, there are very few Latin Catholics in Asia Minor. “Missionaries” have been sent since the latter part of the 19th century to give the names of 16 scattered missions. Since 1886 the Assumptionist Fathers of Constantinople and the Oblate Sisters of the same congregation have devoted themselves to missionary work along the line of the railway from Broussa to Koniah (Izmirum). They have opened 8 schools for boys and 7 for girls, in which they care for about 1,200 children. Their services are mostly in demand for the Latin Catholics engaged in business or in the construction of the railway. Moslem fanaticism and Greek jealousy are sources of opposition. In 1900 there were engaged in charitable and educational work on these territories 100 Latin Catholic (Uniat) Greeks on the mainland have no special organization of their own but are subject to the Latin Archbishop of Smyrna as Administrator of the Vicariate Apostolic of Asia Minor. Formerly all Catholics in the Archipelago (Latin and Greek) were under the jurisdiction of Smyrna, but since the Maltese Exarchate was established at the beginning of this century, the Prelate of Smyrna has been Apostolic for the island of Rhodes, including eleven other islands. In this prefecture the Catholics number about 360 in a population of 36,000, and are attended by 2 Franciscan missionaries. They have 6 churches and chapels, a college, with 60 pupils directed by the Chupiches, an Administration for girls (130) directed by Franciscan Tertiaries. The Catholic (Uniat) Armenians scattered through the peninsula have their own ecclesiastical organization dependent on Constantinople, where the Porte now recognizes the Catholic Armenian Patriarch of Goricia, since 1867 officially resident in the Turkish capital. He is the successor of the Armenian archbishop-primate created at Constantinople in 1830 by the Holy See for the benefit of the Uniat Armenians, but ignored by the Porte until 1867, when Pius IX secured the recognition of the settlement just mentioned. There are episcopal sees for the Catholic Armenians of Asia Minor at Adana (2,500), Brousse (7,000), Kaisariye or Cessarea (1,500), Melitene (4,000), Erzerum (10,000), Trebizond (5,000), and Sivas (3,000). In all these places the Catholic Armenians are far outnumbered by their schismatic countrymen. The Mehitarian Fathers (Armenian monks) have stations at Brousse, Angora, Trebizond, and, since 1835, Adana. The same is true of the valley of the Meander, where there are about 3,000 Armenian Catholics in a population of 40,000 or 50,000. The Armenian Catholic patriarch at Constantinople has a jurisdiction over his people (18,000 in Constantinople), both civil and ecclesiastical, analogous to that of the Greek Orthodox patriarch and his own schismatic fellow-patriarch. The Catholic Armenian clergy of Constantinople numbered (1901) 85; of these 26 were Mehitarians (10 from Vienna, 16 from Venice), and 9 were Antonian monks. There were 5 schools for boys and 3 for girls, with 300 pupils, 2 colleges and 1 lyceum, 1 hospital, 1 asylum for the insane and 1 asylum for invalids. Their churches and chapels number 16, and the parishes 13. The present patriarch is Monsignor Sabbaghian (Peter Paul XII). Since 1889 the law of celibacy, that until then had not been observed by all the Armenian Catholic clergy, has been made obligatory. The “Missionary List” for 1901 indicates the following Latin missionaries in Armenian centres of Asia Minor: Jesuits, Capuchins, Lazarists, and Trappists (in all about thirty) at Adana, Erzerum, Sivas, Trebizond, and Kaisariye.

X. GREEK-ORTHODOX CHURCH AND NON-UNIAT ARMENIANS.—The great majority of the Christians of Asia Minor belong to the so-called Greek-Orthodox or schismatic patriarchate of Constantinople. In ecclesiastical and ecclesiastico-civil matters they are subject to the patriarch according to the arrangement made on the fall of Constantinople (1453), variously described as the “Reception of the Missions” (Baron d’Avril, La protection des Chrétiens dans le Levant, Paris, 1901). The power of the patriarch, both ecclesiastical and civil, regulated by and divided with the National Assembly and the Great Synod at Constantinople, is extensive. Of the twelve metropolitans who now compose his primate three are from Adana (Mesopotamia, Nicosia, and Chalcedon) and are habitually resident in the capital, while the other nine are elective at fixed periods. These three, together with the metropolitan of Heraclea in Thrace, hold the patriarchal seal that is divided into four parts. The Greek-Orthodox spirituality extends over the islands of the Archipelago and along the whole coast-line of Asia Minor, is said to number about one million; in recent times it tends to increase and is now commercially dominant in the greater part of Asiā Minor. There are several Greek (Basilian) monasteries in the peninsula, six on the coast of the Black Sea, near Samsun and near Trebizond. There is also one (Lemboe) near Smyrna. In the islands the number is larger; there are 3 on Chios, 7 on Samos, 2 on Patmos, and several in the Princes Islands near Constantinople. Cyprus has 4 and Crete 50 (55). Among the monasteries in the parts of Asia Minor, sometimes in the cities and sometimes in their own villages, in some places among the Turkish populations. Since 1307 they have had a bishop resident at Constantinople, and since 1461 there has been in that capital a patriarch of the nation on the same political level as the Greek patriarch, recognized as the civil head of his people and their agent in all matters affecting their religion and in many civil matters. Until 1830 this schismatic patriarch was recognized by the Porte as the civil representative also of the Catholic Armenians; as stated above, it was only in 1845 that the latter obtained recognition of their own patriarch in the person of Monsignor, afterwards Cardinal, Anton Hounen. There are about 40,000 Armenians resident in Constantinople, and in Asia Minor, as already stated, their number is quite large; of the 120 lay members who make up the National Assembly of the Armenians at Constantinople, one-third must be chosen from Asia Minor. They have the following metropolitan sees in the peninsula (most of them provided with suffragans): Kaisaria, Nicomedia, Brussa, Smyrna, Amasia, Sivas, Erzerum, and Trebizond. The bishop of the schismatic Armenian usually resides in monasteries of their own nationality, which are thus centres both of national and ecclesiastical life. Asioangaber (Hereb, יַבְרֵל יֶאֱשֶׂה), more properly Eson-geber, a city of Idumea, situated on the northern extremity of the Ḫelane Gulf, now called the Gulf of Akabah. It is mentioned six times in the Holy Scriptures: Numbers, xxxiii, 35; Deut., ii, 8; III K. (Vulgate), ix, 26; xxii, 49; II Par. (Chron.), vii, 17; xx, 36. The general site of Asioangaber is indicated in II K., ix, 26 (יַבְרֵל), but the city disappeared, so that its precise site is a matter of conjecture. The Children of Israel encamped in Asioangaber in their journey through the wilderness (Num., xxxiii, 35). The ships of Solomon and Hiram started from this port on their voyage to Ophir. It was the main port for Israel's commerce with the countries bordering on the Red Sea, and Indian Oceans.

Josephat, King of Juda, joined himself with Ochoiazas, the wicked King of Israel, to make ships in Asioangaber; but God disapproved the unholy alliance, and the ships were broken in the port (II Par., xx, 37).

Aske, Robert, an English gentleman, and nominal leader of the 30,000 Northern Catholics who rose in defence of the monastery at the time of the revolution by Henry VIII (1538). Among their requests was the suppression of the Lutherian heretical books, the punishment of heretical bishops and of the king's evil advisers, the recall of his anti-ecclesiastical legislation, the prosecution of his "visitors," Lee and Layton, and the holding of a parliament in the North. Alarmed at the size of the insurrection, the king offered an unlimited pardon and promised to redress their grievances in a parliament at York. Thereupon Aske disbanded his army, which, however, was soon again in the field, when it was seen that the king would not redeem his promises. The insurgents were defeated by the king's army, and their attempt to seize Hull and Carlisle. Most of the leaders were taken and hanged by scores; Aske was executed at York in June, 1537.

Asmood, the name of the demon mentioned in the Book of Tobias (iii, 8). The name is most probably derived from the Hebrew root אַסָּמָּד, to destroy: so that the being was called to the demon called Abaddon, the Destroyer, in the Apocrypha, ix, 11. The Book of Tobias relates that the virgin Sara, the kinswoman of Tobias, had been given successively to seven husbands; but they had all been slain on the night of the marriage, because of the communation of the names of Jehovah. For this fact, a superition had arisen that the demon loved the maiden and slew her husbands through jealousy. In the Greek text of Tobias, it is stated that the younger Tobias himself was moved by this superstition. The inspired text in no way approves the superition. God allowed the demon to slay these men because they entered marriage with unholy motives. The pious youth, Tobias, acting under the instructions of Raphael, shaved Sara to wife, and Raphael expels the demon. The exemplary chastity and temperance of Tobias and Sara save them from the demon, and offer an example for mankind. In fact, the permission given by God to the demon in this history seems to have as a motive to chasten man's lust and sanctify marriage. The Rationalists have vainly endeavored to set down this history as a Persian myth. For a full refutation of their theories, see Gutterer, "Das Buch Tobias".

ASPERGES (Latin, aspergere, to wash, sprinkle), the rite of sprinkling the congregation with holy water before the principal Mass on Sunday, so called from the words intoned at the beginning of the ceremony, taken from Ps. 1, throughout the year except at Easter-tide, when Vidi aquam, from Ps. cxvii, is sung. A very different ceremony, that may take place before the Mass, such as the blessing of palms or of candles, is performed by the celebrant priest wearing vestments of the liturgical colour of the day. It is omitted when the Blessed Sacrament is exposed, though many rubricists think that sprinkling is one of the altars, not of the congregation, should then be omitted. After intoning the antiphon the priest recites the psalm Misereor or Confitebori, according to the season, sprinkling first the front and platform of the altar, then himself, next the ministers and choir, and lastly the congregation, usually walking through the main part of the church, though he need not go beyond the gate of the sanctuary or choir. The ceremony has been in use at least from the tenth century, growing out of the custom of early antiquity of blessing water for the faithful on Sundays. Its object is to prepare the congregation for the celebration of the Mass by moving them to sentiments of contrition, as suggested by the words of the fiftieth psalm, or by impressing on them that they are about to assist at the sacrifice of our redemption as suggested in the psalm used at Easter time.

Aspicuenta (also Aspicueta), generally known as Navarrus, or Doctor Navarri, a famous Spanish canonist and moral theologian; b. in the Kingdom of Navarre, 13 December, 1491; d. at Rome, 1 June, 1586. He was a relative of St. Francis Xavier, studied at Alcalá and in France, and became professor of canon law at Toulouse and Cahors. Later, he returned to Spain and occupied the same chair for fourteen years at Salamanca, and for seven years at Coimbra in Portugal. At the age of eighty he went to Rome to defend his friend Bartolomeo Carranza, Archbishop of Toledo, accused before the Tribunal of the Inquisition. Though he failed to exculpate the Archbishop, Aspicuenta was highly favored by several popes, and was looked on as an oracle of learning and prudence. His humility, disinterestedness, and charity were proverbial. He reached the patriarchal age of 95, and is buried at Rome in the national Church of San Antonio de' Portoghesi. Among other lives of Aspicueta there is one by his nephew, prefixed to the Roman edition of his works. His "Manuale sive Enchiridion Confessariorum et Penitentium" (Rome, 1568) originally written in Spanish, was long a classical text in the schools and in ecclesiastical practice. In his work on the revenues of benefices, first published in Spanish (Salamanca, 1568), translated into Latin (1568), and dedicated to Philip II and St. Pius V, he maintained that beneficed clergymen were free to expend the fruits of their benefices only for their own necessary support and that of the poor. He wrote numerous other works, e.g. on the Breviary, the regulars, ecclesiastical property, the jubilee, etc. A compendium of his writings was printed at Rome in 1590 (3 vols. fol.); also at Lyons 1590; Venice, 1602; and Cologne, 1615 (2 vols. fol.). A compendium of his writings was made by J. Castellanus (Venice, 1598).

ASS. THE, IN CARICATURE OF CHRISTIAN BELIEFS AND PRACTICES.—The calumnies of onanology, or ass-worship, attributed by Tacitus and other writers to the Jews, was afterwards, by the hatred of the latter, transferred to the Christians (Tac., I, v, 3, 4; Tert., Apol., xvi; "Ad nationes", I, 14). A short time before he wrote the latter of these treatises (about 197), Tertullian relates that as an apostate Jew one day appeared in the streets of Carthage carrying a figure robed in a toga, with the ears and hoofs of an ass, and that this monstrosity was labelled: Deus Christianorum Onococes (the God of the Christians begotten of an ass). "And the crowd believed this infamous Jew," adds Tertullian (Ad nationes, I, 14). Minucius Felix (Octaviius, ix) also alludes to this fabulous accusation and revilement against the Christians. The caricature of the Crucifixion, discovered on a wall in the Palace of the Caesars on the Palatine in 1857, which represents a Christian boy worshipping a crucified figure with ass's head, is a pictured form of this calumny. A Greek inscription, "Alexamenos worshiping his God," is scratched on the caricature. This person is generally held to have been a Christian page of the palace, in the time of the first Antonines, whose companions took this means of insulting his religion. Wünsch, however, conjectures that the caricature may have been intended to represent the god of a Gnostic sect which identified Christ with the Egyptian ass-headed god Typhon-Seth (Breherie, Les origines du crucifix, 15 sqq.). But the reasons advanced in favour of this hypothesis are not convincing. The representations on a tetractys fragment discovered in 1881, at Naples, which dates probably from the first century, appear to belong to the same category as the caricature of the Palatine. A figure with the head of an ass and wearing the toga is seated in a chair with a roll in his hand, instructing a number of baboon-headed pupils. On an ancient gem the onoecephalous teacher of two human pupils is dressed in the pallium, the form of cloak peculiar to sacred personages in early Christian art; and a Syrian term-cotta fragment represents Our Lord, book in hand, with the ears of an ass. The ass as a symbol of heresy, or of Satan, is represented in a fresco of the catacomb of Prætextatus: Christ, the Good Shepherd, is protecting His flock from impurity and heresy symbolized as a pig and an ass. This representation dates from the beginning of the third century (Vilbert, Picture delle Catacombe, Pl. 61, 1).

Assemani (Arabic, Sam'an, i.e. Simeon), the name of an illustrious Maronite family of Mount Lebanon, Syria, four members of which, all ecclesiastics, distinguished themselves during the eighteenth century in the East and in Europe. For their zeal, learning, and attachment to the Roman See, they were held in great esteem by the Popes, who conferred upon them many well-merited ecclesiastical dignities and offices. Oriental, but especially Syriac studies owe more to them than to any others; for it was through their researches, collection of manuscripts, and voluminous publications that Syriac studies, and in general the history, hagiography, liturgy, and literature of the Oriental Churches were first introduced into Europe. Therefore they can be justly regarded, if not as the creators, certainly as the most illustrious pioneers, of modern Oriental studies. In this work they were preceded by other Maronite scholars, known to Orientalists under their Latinized names of Echellensis, Sciadrensis, Sionita, and Benedictus. To these and to the Assemani we owe the fact that the characters, vowels, and pronunciation of Syriac, first introduced by them in Europe, were after the so-called Western Syriac, or Jacobite, and not as the Syrian of Moslems, original and correct, of the Eastern Syriac, or Nestorian. This anomaly, however, is easily explained by the fact that, as the Western Syriac system is the one used by the Maronite Church, to which these scholars belonged, it was but natural that they should adopt this in preference to the other. The four Assemani following are:

JOSEPH SIMEON, b. in the Mountains of Lebanon, Syria, 1687; d. at Rome, January, 1768. In 1703, he entered the Maronite College, Rome, to study for the priesthood. Soon after his ordination he was given a post in the Vatican Library, and in 1715-17 sent by Clement XI to the East for the purpose of collecting Oriental manuscripts; he accomplished his task successfully, visiting Cairo, Damascas, Aleppo, Mount Lebanon, and especially the Nitrian desert. He brought these manuscripts to Rome, and they were placed by order of the Pope in the Vatican Library, where they formed the nucleus of its subsequently famous collection of Oriental manuscripts. In 1735-38 he was sent again to the East, and returned with a still more valuable collection. On his return, he was made titular Archbishop of Tyre and Librarian of the Vatican Library, where he devoted the rest of his life to carrying out a most extensive plan for editing and publishing the valuable Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Persian, Hebrew, and Greek MSS., treasures of the Vatican. His published works are very numerous, besides others (about one hundred in number) which he left in manuscript form. The majority of these, however, were destroyed by a fire, which, in 1768, broke out in his Vatican apartment, adjacent to the Library. His published works are the following: (1) "Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana in quin manuscriptus codices Syriacos, Arabicos, Persicos, Turcos, Hebrewos, Maronitacos, Armenicos, Etiopicos, Greecos, Egiptiacos, Ibericos et Malabaricos .. Bibliotheca Orientalis, Nova et Amplior .. Simonicus Assemanus" (Rome, 4 vols. fol., 1719-28). This gigantic work, of which only the first four volumes appeared, was to comprise twelve volumes, of which the unpublished ones were as follows: Vol. V, "De Syriaco sacrae Scripturarum versionibus"; Vol. VI, "De libris eorundem orientalium"; Vol. VII, "De Conciliorum collectionibus Syriacis"; Vol. VIII, "De collectionibus Arabicos"; Vol. IX, "De Scriptoribus Greecis in Syriacum et Arabicum conversis"; Vol. X, "De Scriptoribus Arabicos Christianos"; Vol. XI and XII, "De Scriptoribus Arabicos Mahometanis". Considerable preparation for these unpublished volumes was made by the author, a portion of which was destroyed by fire. The four published volumes are divided as follows: Vol. I, "De Scriptoribus Syris orthodoxis"; Vol. II, "De Scriptoribus Syris monophysitis"; Vol. III, "Catalogus Ebed-jesus Sobesens" (of Nestorian writers); Vol. IV, "De Scriptoribus Syris aliarumque extant grecos, syriaco et latine"; 6th volume, folio. The first three volumes were edited by our author, the fourth and the fifth by the Maronite Jesuit Mubarak, or Benedictus, and the sixth by Stephanos Evodius Assemani (see below).—(3) "Italica historia scriptores ex bibliotheca Vaticana a liarumque insigne bibliothecarum manuscriptis codicibus collegit" etc., four volumes, folio (Rome, 1751-53).—(4) "Kalendaria ecclesiae universe" etc., to consist of twelve volumes, of which only the first six appeared (Rome, 1755), treating of "Slovaeciae sive Graeco-Moschea"; the other six, which were to treat of the Syriac, Armenian, Egyptian, Egyptian, Greek, and Roman saints, were partly prepared, but destroyed by fire.—(5) "De sacra imaginibus et reliquias", destined to comprise five volumes. Parts of the manuscript were saved and extracts from it given by Bottrarius (Rome, 1776).—(6) "Bibliotheca Vaticana Orientalis" (Rome, 1762-66).—(7) "Abraham Echellensis; Chronicon Orientale", printed in "Scriptores Historiae Byzantinae", vol. XVII. —(8) "Rudimenta lingue Arabico" (Rome, 1732).—(9) Several dissertations, in Italian, on Oriental Churches, published by Cardinal Angelo Mai in his "Scriptorum Orientum veterum Collectio" (Rome, 1831). From these Maronite writers, viz., G. Cardahi (Liber Thessauri de arte poetica Syrorum, pp. 171-183) and Mgr. Joseph Dib, Archbishop of Beirut, Syria ("Spiritus Confutatius", etc., in Latin and Arabic), we learn that J. S. Assemani had in preparation four more gigantic works. The first on "Syria vetus et nova", in nine volumes; the second a "Historia Orientalis", in nine volumes; the third, "Concilia ecclesiae Orientalis", in six volumes; and the fourth "Euchologis seu Liturgiis ecclesiae orientalis", etc., in seven volumes. From his "Bibliotheca juris Orientalis", etc. we learn that our author was: "Utiusque naturae Apostolis Referendi; Bibliothecae Vaticanae Praefectus, Basilicae Sancti Petri de Urbe Canonicus; Sanctae Romanae et Universalis Inquisitionis Consulor"; also "Sacra Penitentialiarum Apostolic Sigillator", etc. All our author's works, but especially his "Bibliothecae Orientalis", which has been till recently, and which to the greatest extent is the most highly valued on the subject, needs thorough revision in the light of the many newly discovered and edited Syriac manuscripts.

JOSEPHUS ALOYSIUS, brother of the preceding, b. in Tripoli, Syria, 1710; d. at Rome, 1782. He made his theological and Oriental studies in Rome and under the care of his illustrious brother. He was appointed by the Pope, first as professor of Syriac at the Sapientia in Rome, and afterwards professor of liturgy, by Benedict XIV, who made him also member of the academy for historic research, just founded. His principal works are: (1) "Codex liturgicus ecclesiæ universalis in XV libros distributus." (Rome, 1749-66).—This valuable work has become so rare that a bookseller in Paris recently issued a photocopy of it. (2) "De Sacris ritibus Dissertatio." (Rome, 1757). (3) "Commentarius theologico-canonicus criticus de eislicibus, earum reverentiss atque asylat attue concordiæ Sacerdotii et Imperi." (Rome, 1760). (4) "Dissertatio de unione et commuscione ecclesiastica." (Rome, 1770). (5) "Dissertatio de canonibus pontificiis etulbis." (Rome, 1770); and (6) "De Catholicis seu Patriarchis Chaldaorum et Nestorianorum commentarius historico-chronologicus," etc., (Rome, 1775); (7) "De Synodo Dioscoesan Dissertatio." (Rome, 1776); (8) A Latin version of Ebed-jesus's "Collectio Canonum," published by Cardinal Mai in his "Scriptorium Veterum Nova Collectio." (pt. I, pp. vii, viii and 1-168; pt. II, pp. 1-268, etc.).

STEPHANUS EVODIUS, or AWWAD, titular Archbishop of Apamea in Syria, b. in Syria 1707; d. in Rome, 1782; nephew of the two preceding brothers, and prefect of the Vatican Library after the death of J. B. B. His lifetime included two uncles at the Vatican Library. He became a member of the Royal Society of London. His principal works are: (1) the sixth volume of "Ephemeris Syri opera omnia," (see above); (2) "Bibliotheca Medicea Laurentiæ et Palatinae codicum manuscriptorum orientalium catalogus." (Florence, 1742); (3) "Acta Sanctorum Martyrum Orientalium et Occidentaliuin." (Rome, 1748). The first part gives the history of the martyrs who suffered during the reign of the Sasanian Kings of Persia: Sapor, Veranes, and others; (4) "Bibliotheca Apostolica Vaticanae codicum manuscriptorum catalogus," to be completed in four volumes, completed to 1784, by A. Assemani: Vol. I, Oriental manuscripts; Vol. II, Greek; Vol. III, Latin; and Vol. IV, Italian. The first three volumes appeared in 1769-69, but the fourth, of which only the first eight pages were printed, was destroyed by fire in 1768; (5) "Catalogo della biblioteca," (Rome, 1764).

SIMEON, great-grand-nephew of the first and second Assemanis, b. 1752, in Tripli, Syria; d. at Padua, Italy, 1821. He made his theological studies in Rome, and at the age of twenty-six visited Syria and Egypt. In 1778 he returned to Rome, and then went to Genoa, with the intention of going to America, but he was prevented. In 1785 he was appointed professor of Oriental languages at the seminary of Padua, and in 1807 was transferred to the University of the same city, to fill the same chair. He had many admirers and friends, such as Cardinal Borgia, the founder of the Museo Borgiano at the College of the French, Rome, and the Abbot of St. Sulpice de Sacy, and others. His works are: (1) "Saggio storico sull' origine, culto, letteratura, e costumi degli Arabi avanti Maometto." (Padua, 1787); (2) "Museo Cufico Nianiano, illustrato," in two parts (Padua, 1789-88); (3) "Catalogo dei codici manoscritti orientali della biblioteca Nianiana," in two parts (Padua, 1787-92); (4) "Globus ecclesiæ arabico-cuficus Veliterni musei Borgiani . . . illustratus, præmissa de Arabum astronomiæ dissertatio." (Padua, 1790); (5) "Se gli Arabi ebbero alcuna influenza sull' origine della poesia moderna in Europa." (1803); (6) "Sopra le monete Arabe effigiate sul reliquiario di Padua (1809)." Our author had a most masterly detection of the literary imposture of Vella, which claimed to be a history of the Saracens in Syria.

Assemblies of the French Clergy, quinquennial representative meetings of the Clergy of France for the purpose of appointing the financial burdens laid upon the Church by the kings of France, and incidentally for other ecclesiastical purposes. The Assemblies of the French Clergy (Assemblies du Clergé de France) had a financial origin, to which, for that matter, no one traced the origin of the establishment of all deliberative assemblies. Long before their establishment, however, the State had undertaken to impose on the Church her share of the public expenses. The kings of France, powerful, needy, and at times unscrupulous men, could not behold side by side with the State, or within the State, a wealthy body of men, gradually extending their possessions throughout the kingdom, without being tempted to draw upon their coffers and, if need were, to pillage them. During the Middle Ages the Crusades were the occasions of frequent levies upon ecclesiastical property to assist the military expeditions. The Saladin Tithe (Saladin Tithe) was inaugurated when Philip Augustus (1180-1223) united his forces with those of Richard of England to deliver Jerusalem from Saladin. At a later period the contributions of the clergy were increased, and during the reign of St. Louis (1225-70) we find record of thirteen subsidies within twenty years, while under Philip the Fair (1285-1314) there were twenty-one tithes in twenty-eight years. It has been estimated that the latter monarch received altogether from the clergy the equivalent of 400,000,000 francs in the present currency ($80,000,000). The modern era brought no decrease in the taxes imposed on the Church. Francis I, for example (1515-48), made insistent calls on the ecclesiastical treasury. The religious wars stirred up by Protestantism furnished the French kings with pretexts for fresh demands upon the Church. In 1560, the clergy held a convention at Poissy to consider matters of Church and State, an occasion marked by a Colloquy (Colloque de Poissy) between the Catholic bishops and the Protestant ministers, in which the chief orators were the Cardinal of Lorraine and Theodore Beza. At this assembly the Clergy bound themselves by a contract made in the name of the whole clerical body to pay the king 1,000,000 livres ($320,000) annually for a period of six years; they also bound themselves to restore to him certain estates and taxes that had been pledged to the Hotel de Ville of Paris for a yearly rent, or revenue, of 630,000 livres ($126,000). In other words, the clergy bound themselves to redeem Imperial indemnities, 10 years a capital of 7,550,000 livres ($1,512,000). The French monarchs, instead of settling their debts, made fresh loans based on this rent, or revenue, paid by the Church, as if it were to be something permanent. After lengthy discussions, the clergy assembled at Melun (1579-80) consented to renew the contract and agreed that it must continue to be repeated every decade until the French Revolution. The Assemblies of the Clergy were now an established institution. In this way the Church of France obtained the right of freely meeting and of free speech just when the meetings of the States-General (1614-1615) were for the first time suspended, and the voice of the nation was to be hushed for a period of 200 years. At a very early date, these assemblies adopted the form of organization which they were to preserve until the French Revolution. The election of the deputies forming the body was arranged according to ecclesiastical provinces. It was decided in 1619 that each province should send four deputies (two bishops and two priests) to the assemblies de contrôle held every ten years, and twice to the assemblies des comptes which met once during the interval of ten years. Under this arrangement an assembly was convened every five years. There were two steps in the election of deputies. First, at the diocesan assembly were convened all holders of benefices, in their capacity as nucleuses of which they were delegates. These then proceeded to the metropolitan see, and under the presidency of the metropolitan elected the provincial deputies. Theoretically, parish priests (curé/s) might be chosen, but as a matter of fact, by reason of their social station, inferior to that of abbés et canons, they seldom had seats in the assemblies. The rank of subdeacon sufficed for election; the Abbé Legendre relates in his memoirs as a contemporary incident that one of these young legislators, after an escapade, was soundly flogged by his preceptor who had accompanied him to Paris. The assemblies at all times reserved to themselves the right to decide upon the validity of procurators and the authority of deputies. They wished also to reserve the right of electing their own president, whom they always chose from among the bishops. However, to conciliate rivalries, several were usually nominated for the presidency, only one of whom exercised that function. Under a strong government, royal, and during the resolution to maintain their right of election, the Assemblies were unlikely to choose a person not in favour at court. We know that during the reign of Louis XIV Harlay de Champvallon, Archbishop of Paris, was several times president. Finally, Saint-Simon tells us the royal displeasure deprived him of his influence with the Clergy, and even shortened his life. The offices of secretary and "promotor", being looked on by the bishops as somewhat inferior, were assigned to deputies of the second rank, i.e. to priests. Like all other parliaments, the Assemblies of the French Clergy divided their work among commissions. The "Commission of Temporal Affairs" was very important and had an unusually large amount of business to transact. Financial questions, which had given rise to these assemblies, continued to claim their attention until the time of the Revolution. Beginning with the seventeenth century, the majority of the orders and the Hôtel de Ville was an item of slight importance as compared with the sums which the Clergy were compelled to vote the king under the name of dons gratis, or free gifts. It had been established during the Middle Ages that the Church should contribute not only to the expenses of the Crusades, but also towards the defence of the kingdom, a tradition continued to modern times. The religious wars of the sixteenth century, and the siege of La Rochelle (1628) under Richelieu, and to a still greater extent the political wars waged by Henry IV, Louis XIII, and Louis XIV, led to a system of subsidies on which occasioned the levying of enormous subsidies on the Clergy. The following example may serve as an illustration: the Clergy, who had voted sixteen millions livres (32,000,000) in 1779, gave thirty millions more (56,000,000) in 1780 for the expenses of the French Government in the war of the American Revolution. They gave up of their own accord in 1778 eight millions and in 1785 eighteen millions. The Church was then to the State what, under similar circumstances, the Bank of France is to-day. The French kings more than once expressed their gratitude to this body for the services it had rendered both monetarily and in the payment of large subsidies at critical moments when, as now, money was the sinews of war. It has been calculated from official documents that during three-quarters of a century (1715-89) the Clergy paid, in either for the rentes of the Hotel de Ville or as "free gifts," over 380 million livres (769,000,000). We may well ask ourselves if, with all their privileges, they did not contribute towards the public expenses as much as the rest of the nation. In 1789, when accepting, with all the cahiers or propositions emanating from the Clergy, the law imposing on the Church of France an equal share of the public expenses, the Arch-bishop of Paris, Monseigneur de Juigné, was able to say that the Church already contributed as much as the other orders (nobility, bourgeoisie, and people); its burdens would not be increased by the new law that imposed upon all an equal share in contributing to the expenses of the State. The Assemblies of the Clergy conducted their temporal administration in a dignified and imposing manner, and with much perfection of detail. They appointed for ten years a receiver-general (Receveur-General), in reality a minister of finance. The office carried with it a generous salary, and for election to it a two-thirds majority was required. He was bound to the right of the clergy, to the right of the faithful, and to the right of the Archbishop of Paris and render a detailed account of his management to the assembled Clergy. In each diocese there was a board of elected delegates presided over by the bishop, whose duty it was to apportion the assessments among the beneficed ecclesiastics. This system diocèse des dîmes (Diocesan Board of Tithes) was authorized by the Code of 1720. Over it were superior boards located at Paris, Lyons, Rouen, Tours, Toulouse, Bordeaux, Aix, and Bourges, courts of appeal, whose decisions were final in all disputes concerning the contributions of the dioceses within their jurisdiction. In this way the Clergy had an administration of their own, independent of the State, a very important privilege under the old regime. It may be added that they knew how to merit such a favour. In the whole nation their credit stood highest; the archives have preserved for us many thousands of rental contracts made in the utmost confidence by private individuals with the Church. Certain details of the ecclesiastical financial system are even yet worthy of study. It has been said that M. de Villèle introduced into France the conversion of annuities and the consequent reduction of interest; as a matter of fact this was practised by the Clergy from the beginning. They were the first to think of negotiating loans in order to furnish the sums demanded by Louis XIV. Necke, a competent judge, commended the Clergy for the care they took in liquidating these debts. He also praised the clerical system of the distribution of taxes, according to which the beneficed ecclesiastics throughout the kingdom were divided into eight départements, or classes, in order to facilitate the apportionment of taxes in ascending ratio, according to the resources of each. This shows that even under the old regime the Clergy had placed on a practical working basis, in their own domain, the system of reverse land tax and the system of graduated assessment of income. It may be said that the system of administering the ecclesiastical temporalities as developed by the Assemblies of the Clergy of France was remarkably successful. Possibly, they succeeded only too well in maintaining the financial immunities granted the Church. These were the result of the Revolution when they accepted the principle that the public burden should be equally divided among all classes of the nation, a step they had delayed too long. Public opinion had already condemned in an irresistible manner all privileges whatsoever. The Assemblies of the Clergy did not confine themselves to temporal matters. Doctrinal questions and spiritual matters held an important place among the subjects discussed in them. Indeed, the Colloquy of Poissy, the original germ of the Assemblies, was expressly convened for the discussion of Protestantism, and in opposition to schism and heresy. Practically every Assembly, from the first in 1559 to the last in 1789, dealt with the severe measures against Protestantism that came from this quarter. The eighteenth century, with its philosophers and encyclopedists, brought the Assemblies of the Clergy anxieties of a new and alarming character. They did their best to withstand the progress of infidelity, stirred up and encouraged by the French kings during the vacancy of a see to appropriate its revenues and make appointments to benefices. For centuries, even back in the Middle Ages, such sequestration of ecclesiastical rights on the part of the State had given rise to innumerable abuses and depredations. The kings of France had often affirmed that the right of Régale was superior to them in the hierarchy of the Crown over all sees, even those previously exempt from the assertion of this right. Under Louis XIV, these claims were vigorously enforced. Two prelates, Pavillon, Bishop of Alet, and Caulet, Bishop of Pamiers, made a lively resistance to the royal pretensions. The pope sustained them with all his authority. Thereupon the king convoked the famous Assembly of 1682, presided over by Harlay de Champvallon, and Le Tellier, Archbishops, respectively, of Paris and of Reims. Bossuet, though firm in his allegiance to the Holy See, was cautious about menacing the Council, and on the 9th of November, 1681, preached in the church of the Grands Augustins at Paris his celebrated sermon "On the Unity of the Church." This immortal masterpiece of eloquence was so fortunate as to secure the approbation of both pope and king. Contrary to its custom, the Assembly ordered the discourse to be printed. The question of the Régale was quickly decided according to the royal wish. A far graver question, however, was laid before the Assembly when Louis XIV asked them to pronounce upon the authority of the pope. Bossuet, who felt the peril lurking in such discussions, tried to temperate and requested that, before proceeding further, Christian tradition on this point be carefully studied. This move proving unsuccessful, the Bishop of Meaux stood out against the (Gallican) propositions presented in the name of the commission by Choiseul-Frasiol, Bishop of Tournai. Thereupon both questions were turned over to Bossuet himself; he succeeded in eliminating them by his subtle art of question of appeals to a future council, a proposition several times condemned by the Holy See. It was then that the Assembly voted (19 March, 1682) the famous "Four Articles" that may be briefly summarized as follows:

1. The pope has no right, direct or indirect, over the temporal power of kings.
2. The pope is inferior to the General Council, and the decrees of the Council of Constance in its fourth and fifth sessions are still binding.
3. The exercise of pontifical authority should be regulated by the ecclesiastical canons.
4. Dogmatic questions of the pope are not irrevocable until they have been confirmed by the judgment of the whole Church.

Bossuet, who was drawn into the discussion in spite of himself, and who in all questions inclined towards the least arbitrary solution, wrote his "Déclaration" in justification of the decisions of the Assembly. It was not published, however, until after his death. The king ordered the "Four Articles" to be promulgated from all the pulpits of France. Innocent XI (1676-89), notwithstanding his dissatisfaction, hesitated to pass censure on the publication of the "Four Articles". He contented himself with expressing his disapproval of the decision made by the Assembly on the question of the Régale, and refused the papal Bulls to those members of the Assembly who had been selected by the king for vacant sees. To lend unity to the action of the Assemblies, and to preserve their influence during the long intervals between meetings, two ecclesiastics were elected who were thenceforth, as it were, the executive power of the Church of France. They were known as Agents-General (Agents Généraux) and were very important personalities under the old regime. Although chosen from among the clergy of the several orders, i.e. from among the priests, they were always men of good birth, distinguished bearing, and quite familiar with the ways of the world and the court. They had charge of the accounts of all receivers, protected jealously all rights of the Church, drew attention to whatever was prejudicial to her prerogatives or discipline, and became the means of ecclesiastical authority and interest in all cases to which the Church was a party. They enjoyed the privilege of committimus, and were specially authorized to enter the king's council and speak before it on ecclesiastical matters. On the occasion of each Assembly these agents rendered an account of their administration in reports, several folio volumes of which have been published since the beginning of the eighteenth century under the title of: Rapports d'agence. The usual reward for their services was the episcopate. Their duties prepared them to administer the Church, to understand public affairs. Monseigneur de Ciech, Monseigneur de Marcillat, Abbé de Montesquieu, and Talleyrand, all of whom played important roles in the Constituent Assembly, had been in their time Agents-General of the Clergy.

The reader may now judge of the importance attaching to the Assemblies of the Clergy under the old regime. The mere fact that they could meet the king, converse with him on questions of finance, religion, administration, even of politics, and, when necessary, lay complaints before him, was in those days a very great privilege. At a time when the people were with the voice, but without the vote, to assemble (enjoying, indeed, special favours, but without rights; forming no distinct corps, and with no official organ of their interests), the Clergy were represented, had a voice in affairs, could defend themselves, attack their opponents, offer remonstrances. It was a unique position, and added still more to the prestige of the clergy in the eyes of the nation. It was truly extraordinary that they should have so jealously preserved the right of voting on their taxation, a right which for three centuries the people had allowed to lapse. It was an evidence of great power when the Clergy could force an absolute monopoly to discuss with them grave questions of finance, could vote freely on their own contributions and set forth their demands, could seize the occasion of their "free gifts" to draw to all manner of religious interests the royal attention and good will in a way that would prove the policy of the Ancien Règime unprofitable to the clergy (I give that you may give), efficacious even under a Louis XIV. It is worthy of note that in the suspension of the meetings of the States-General, of councils national or provincial, these Assemblies enabled the Clergy to exercise a corrective surveillance over all the interests of the Church. As for the monks, the Assemblies ensured the Clergy an autonomous financial administration by which they might better defend themselves against the menace of the taille, or land tax, escape the often odious interference of the royal treasury, redeem the new assessments known as the capitation (poll-tax) of the tenth, the fiftieth, and twentieth—all which favours could be obtained only in consideration of contributions, of prompt authoritative decisions. We have, indeed, already remarked that these Assemblies succeeded all too well in retaining the ecclesiastical exemptions until 1789, just before the States-General were again convoked, when, yielding to the pressure of popular opinion, and in the interest of the clergy, the States-General were induced to relinquish them. In the eyes of posterity the doctrinal rôle of the Assemblies of the Clergy was more striking than their administration of the ecclesiastical temporalities. If they were unable to weather the storm that lay low the institutions of the old regime, it was in great part to the fact that their share in the interests and life of the people was inconsiderable. By defending ecclesiastical privilege with so much heat and constancy these Assemblies appeared to be occupied almost solely with clerical interests. Moreover, the method of their recruitment, almost exclusively from the higher clergy, begot a temper of indifference towards their fate on the part of the curés, or parish priests, who were soon called to exercise a decisive influence on the course of the States-General. Had the Assemblies been less attached to the prerogatives of absolute power, even at a time when ideas of liberty were gaining a hold on public opinion in France, they might have become what they were qualified for by their organization and their operation—a standing invitation to a parliamentary form of government and a preparation for the same. The tardy stand taken by the Assemblies, with its bold plies to the Holy See, to the rights of the people and for the convocation of the States-General, came a trifle too late; the effect produced was lost sight of in the general ferment. The vote by which the national parliament was assured of equal taxation for all deprived these Assemblies of their raison d’être; it was precisely for the regulation of special contributions from the Clergy that they were established and had been kept up. Henceforth, like the parlements and other bodies apparently detached from, or loosely connected with, the life of the nation, they were fated to be merged in its new and larger unity. Despite the manner of their establishment by statute, and the power of the old regime, the Assemblies had been one of the ornaments—it might be said, one of the glories—of the Church of France. During centuries of political servitude they offered the example of a free parliament in regular operation; their financial administration, though successful, conducted with much dignity; in time of war they rendered the State notable services, and some of their meetings will be always remembered for the important religious and political discussions they provoked. For these reasons the Assemblies fill a brilliant page in the annals of the French Clergy, and will merit at all times the attention of the student of history.

The records of the National Archives contain the authentic proceedings (Procès-verbaux) of the Assemblées des États de France, depuis 1560, jusqu’à présent (1767-78, 9 vol.). The later Assemblies had each a Procès-verbal printed in one volume. Records were published (1771), I and VIII: Louis SEBART, Les assemblées du clergé de France (Paris, 1800) 1561-1615; MAURY, in Revue des deux mondes (1878): Bouhours, in Revue cléricale (1905-06); Sicard, L’Ancien clergé de France (Paris, 1893-1903).

Asser, John (or ASERIUS MENEVERNIS), a learned monk of St. David’s, Menewia, in Pembroke; d. probably, 910. He was educated in the monastery of St. David’s by his kinsman, Archbishop Asserius. His repute for learning led King Alfred to invite him to his court (about 885). Asser required six months for consideration. Illness at Winchester led to his remaining there for a year and a half. Finally, on his recovery, as Alfred still urged his request, Asser agreed to spend half of each year with him. His first visit lasted eight months, and Alfred gave him many presents on parting, including the monasteries of Amesbury and Banwell. Later, Asser received a grant of Exeter, and was made Bishop of Sherborne, before 900. Asser wrote a life of Alfred (Annales rer. gest. Alfredi Magni) in 893. The work in question is a Norman translation of the English history from 849 to 887, and a personal and original narrative of Alfred’s career down to the latter date. The Welsh birth of the author is indicated by his use of Cletic names, and the English are constantly styled Saxons. The authentic work of Asser is found only in the edition of Francis Wisse (1722), printed from a tenth-century Cottonian MS, (Otho, A, XII) which was burned in 1731. The burning of the cakes, references to St. Neot, and to Alfred’s founding the University of Oxford are not in Asser’s work, nor does Florence of Worcester allude to them, although he drew freely on that Vita, without, however, knowing the name. Archbishop Parker’s edition of Asser’s “Annales” presents the “Life” with many interpolations. A new edition is announced by W. H. Stevenson. There are three English translations (Giles, 1848; J. Stevenson, 1854; E. Conybeare, 1900. See GROSS, “Sources”, etc., 180). The authenticity of Asser’s book has been called into question. Pauli discusses the subject very thoroughly in the introduction to his “King Alfred” (Berlin, 1851). See T. D. Hardy, in the introduction to Petrie (London, 1848).

Asses, Feast of.—The celebration of the “Festum Asinorum” in medieval and ecclesiastical circles was a pastime in which all, from the dignitaries in the upper stalls of the sanctuary to the humblest among the ecclesiastics, participated. The feast dates from the eleventh century, though the source which suggested it is much older. This source was the pseudo-Augustinian “Sermon contra judaeos, paganos, et Arianos de Symbolo” (P. L., XLII, 1117), written probably in the sixth century, but ascribed throughout the Middle Ages to St. Augustine (E. K. Chambers, “The Medieval Idea of the Jester” in Mediaeval Studies, 1930). The collection of a device or copy of an eleventh-century manuscript which gives the sermon in dramatized form, see Édite de la Méridi., “Les Origines latines du théâtre moderne”, 179-187; and for a complete history of this manuscript, and the theatre that grew out of it, “Les origines du spectacle de Christ” by Marius Sepep (1931). The original sermon itself is a highly dramatic piece. The preacher impersonates the Hebrew prophets whose Messianic utterances he works into an argument establishing the Divinity of Christ. Having confuted the Jews out of the mouths of their own teachers, the orator addresses himself to the unbelieving Gentiles—“Pero iudaeorum”—The testimory of Virgil, Nabuchodonosor, and the Erythraean Sibyl is eloquently set forth and interpreted in favour of the general thesis. As early as the eleventh century this sermon had taken the form of a metrical dramatic dialogue, the stage-arrangement adhering closely to the original. Additions and adaptations were gradually introduced.

A Rouen manuscript of the thirteenth century outlined (Glossarium, s. v. Festum) exhibits twenty-eight prophets as taking part in the play. After Terece, the rubric directs, "let the procession move to the church, in the centre of which let there be a furnace... and an idol for the brotheren to refuse to worship." The procession filed into the church. On the right side were Amos, Amos, Amo, Izaiah, Izaiah, Izaiah... Balaam and his Ass... Zachary and Elizabeth, John the Baptist and Simeon. The three Gentile prophets sat opposite. The proceedings were conducted under the auspices of St. Augustine, whom the preacher represented. Beginning with Moses, the presiding dignitary called on each of the prophets, who successively testified to the birth of the Messiah. When the Sibyl had rec-cited her acrostic signs on the Signs of Judgment (Du Méril, 1861), all the prophets sang in unison a hymn of praise to the long-sought Saviour. Mass immediately followed. In all this the part that pleased the congregation was the role of Balaam and the Ass; hence the popular designation of the "Processus Prophetarum" as "the Feast of the Ass".
The part of Balaam was soon dissociated from its surroundings and expanded into an inde-dependent drama. The Ruben rubrics direct that two messengers be sent by King Balaak to bring forth the prophet. Balaam advances riding on a gorgeously caparisoned ass (a wooden, or hobby, ass, for the rubric immediately bids somebody to hide beneath the trappings—not an enviable position when the further direction to the rider was carried out—"and let him goad the ass with his spurs".
From the Chester play it is clear that the prophet rode on a wooden animal, since the rubric supposes that the speaker for the beast is "in saink" (Thos.
Wright, "The Chester Plays," I, v). Then follows the scene in which the ass meets the angered angel and protests at length against the cruelty of the rider. Once detached from the parent stem, the "Festum Assis" branched out in various directions.
In the Beauvais thirteenth-century document, quoted by the editors of Ducange, the "Feast of Asses" is already an independent trope with the date and purpose of its celebration changed. At Beauvais the Ass may have continued his minor role of enlivening processionals. On the fourteen of January, however, he discharged an important function in that city's festivities. On the feast of the Flight into Egypt the most beautiful girl in the city, with a pretty child in her arms, was placed on a richly draped ass, and conducted with religious gravity to St. Stephen's Church. The Ass (possibly a wooden Ass) was stationed at the right of the altar, and the Mass was begun. After the Introit a Latin Process was sung. The first stanza and its French refrain may serve as a specimen of the nine that follow:—

Orientis partibus
Adventavit Asinus
Pulcher et fortissimus Sarcinus aptissimus.
Hex, Sire Asnes, car chantes,
Vous aures du foin asses
Et de l'avoine a pleantz.

—From the Eastern lands the Ass is come, beautiful and very brave, well fitted to bear dens. Up! Sir Ass, and sing. Open your pretty mouth. Hay will be yours in plenty, and oats in abundance."

Mass was continued, and at its end, apparently without awakening the least consciousness of its impropriety, the following direction was observed:
"In fine Missae sacerdos, versus ad populum, vice 'Et, Missa Est', ter hinnahabit: populus vero, vice 'Deo Gratias', ter respondebit, 'Hininam, hinham, hinham..." (At the end of Mass, the priest, having turned to the people, in lieu of saying the 'Et, Missa
est', will pray thrice; the people instead of replying
'Deo Gratias' say, 'Hininam, hinham, hinham.'"

This is the sole instance of a service of this nature in connection with the Feast of the Ass. The Feast Assinorum gradually lost its identity, and became incorporated in the ceremonies of the Deposuit or united in the general merrymaking on the Feast of Fools. The "Processus Prophetarum", whence it drew its origin, survives in the Corpus Christi and Whitsun Cycles, that stand at the head of the modern English drama.

Congregation of the Inquisition. The Holy Office is better known as the Congregation of the Universal Inquisition. Its functions at present are to watch over matters connected with faith and to examine into the suspected tenets of persons or books. The Assessor holds the office next in dignity after the Cardinals of the Congregation. When the Congregation has reached a decision, the Assessor communicates the result to the Pope on the same evening, in case the latter has not presided over the assembly.
The Assessor must be present at all four meetings of this Congregation. On Saturday he examines into the matters laid before the Holy Office and decides, together with four other officials, whether a vote of the consultors be necessary in the case, or whether the Cardinals of the Congregation should pass upon the matter at once. On Monday, he calls the consultors into council. He is present on Wednesday at the secret meeting of the Cardinals and on Thursday at the solemn assembly which sometimes takes place under the presidency of the Pope.
The Assessor has also charge of the Secretariate and sees that current business is expedited. The office of assessor is so important that it is included among the cardinalitial appointments; that is, the only promotion considered preferable for an assessor is to raise him to the rank of cardinal.

Assessors, in ecclesiastical law, are learned persons whose function is to counsel a judge with whom they are associated in the trial of causes. They are called assessors because they sit beside (Lat. assidere)
the judge. Assessors are required to examine documents, consult precedents, and in general explore the laws for points bearing on the cause at issue.
A judge who is either overburdened with business or conscious of his inexperience in law cases may voluntarily associate assessors with himself, or they may be assigned to him by superior authority.
Assessors are expected to be men beyond suspicion of partiality, whose learning is considerable, whose judgment against the judge's actions or rulings, they are to be unexceptionable witnesses. As assesseors are advisers of the judge, and not judges themselves, they are not endowed with any jurisdiction. Neither do they bear a public character, but are present at trials in a private capacity. They may, however, take part in the examination of the accused or of witnesses. Owing to their non-judicial character, laymen may be employed as Assessors in spiritual and ecclesiastical matters, though by the canons of the Church they would be incompetent as judges, even if a cleric were joined with them in a judicial capacity. As an Assessor is commonly looked upon as restraining in some manner the dignity, if not the jurisdiction, of the judge, the Sacred Congregations have declared that a cathedral chapter cannot impose an assessor on the Vicar-Capitular secured by ASSICUS, Saint, Bishop and Patron of Elphin, in Ireland, one of St. Patrick's converts, and his work in iron. In the “Tripartite Life of St. Patrick” (ed. Whitley Stokes) we read: “Bishop St. Assic was Patrick's coppersmith, and made altars and square bookcases. Besides, he made our saint's patena in honor of Bishop Patrick, and of them I have seen three square patens, that is, a paten in the Church of Patrick in Armagh, and another in the Church of Ely, and the third in the great-church of Donoughpatrick (at Carns near Tulske).” St. Assicus was a most expert metal worker, and was also renowned as a bell-founder. Of his last days the following graphic description is given by Archbishop Healy: “Assicus himself in shame because of a lie told either by him, or as others say, of him, fled into Donegal, and for seven years abode in the island of Rathlin O'Binne. Then his monks sought him out, and after much labour found him in the mountain glens, and tried to bring him home to his own monastery at Elphin. But he fell sick by the way, and died with the monks. So they buried the venerable old man in the churchyard of Rath Cunga, now Racoon, in the Barony of Tírugh, County Donegal. The old churchyard is there still, though now disused, on the summit of a round hillock close to the left of the road from Ballyshannon to Donegal, about a mile to the south of the village of Ballintra. We sought in vain for any trace of an inscribed stone in the old churchyard. He fled from men during life, and, like Moses, his grave is hidden from them in death.” His feast is celebrated 27 April, as is recorded in the “MartYROLOGY OF TALLAGHT” under that date.

ASSIDEANS (Hebr., ἀσίδαοι, ἀσιδίασα, saints; Gr., 'Ἀσίδαιοι', men endowed with grace (Ps., xxxix, 5; cxlviii, 14). They were the maintainers of the Mosaic Law against the invasion of Greek customs. When the Machabees struggled against Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), the Assideans naturally joined their cause (I Mach., ii, 42, 43). However, not all the adherents of the Machabees were Assideans; according to I Mach., vii, 13, the Scribes and the Assideans sought to make peace with the Syrians, while the other followers of the Machabees suspected them. That this suspicion was well-founded may be inferred from the fact that Alcimus, who had been made High Priest by Demetrius I (I Mach., vii, 9), slew sixty Assideans in one day (I Mach., vii, 16). According to II Mach., xiv, 3, the same Alcimus “wilfully defiled himself”, and later on he testified before Demetrius II among the Jews that all the Assideans, of whom Judas Machabeus is captain, nourish wars, and raise seditions, and will not suffer the realm to be in peace” (II Mach., xiv, 6). There is an opinion which maintains that the Assideans were identical with the later Pharisaees.

Assimilation, Physiological.—In this sense the word may be defined as that vital function by which an organism changes nutrient material into living protoplasm. Most modern scientists admit that the notion of assimilation is not exhausted by the chemical changes that take place. Their definition of assimilation, moreover, is in most frequent the true expression of the reality. To give but one instance, the physiologist Rosenthal defines assimilation as the “peculiar property common to all cells of bringing forth from different materials substances specifically similar to those which pre-exist in those cells.” But, like him in explaining the concept of assimilation, they frequently mistake its true nature and deny again what they conceded before. In other words, they often refuse to acknowledge that food, in being changed into living substance, participates in properties which in themselves are not of a nature totally different from the forces of inorganic matter. Our reason for disapproving this view rests on the fact that, while the action of inorganic matter is essentially of a transient nature, and passes from subject to subject, the same inanimate matter acquires by the process of assimilation the faculty of “acting on itself, of developing and perfecting itself by the action of acting immortally”. That is, the action proceeds from an internal principle and “does not pass into a foreign subject, but perfects the agent.” The activities implied in the nutrition of an animal really proceed from it. It spontaneously moves about and selects among a thousand solid particles, a definite kind and quantity of food in strict proportion to its own needs, and appropriates it in a suitable manner. Then, in anticipation of a definite end to be realized, it elaborates from the food the chemical constituents to be used for the renewal and increase of its protoplasm, and arranges the renewal in that manner. Thus the entire action proceeds from the animal and finally serves, or tends to serve, no other purpose than to maintain the integrity of its protoplasm and to give it the total perfection of the species. On the other hand, it is evident that such immanent actions belong to a sphere totally different from the transient actions of which alone inorganic matter is capable. If inorganic matter is to act, it must be acted upon, and the reaction is mathematically equal to the action. It is, therefore, merely passive. But organisms act, even if no action is exerted upon them from without; and if an action results from stimulation, the reaction is not merely passive, nor is, in fact, the stimulation the adequate cause of the action. In this activity, however, we need not assume a production and accumulation of new material energy. The activity of the vital principle in the processes of assimilation simply consists in directing the constant transformation of existing material energy towards definite ends and according to a definite plan of organization. In other words, the algebraic sum of all the energy in the universe is not altered by the living principle. Nor are the elements changed in their nature and mutual action. They require the faculty of any immanent action to be in them, and remain parts of living cells. Thus, through assimilation they become subject to a higher principle which in constant agreement with their own physical and chemical laws directs them towards the uniform perfection of the entire organism.

Assimilation, Psychological.—As applied to mental processes, assimilation designates its force and meaning from the analogy which many educators have found to exist between the way in which food is incorporated into the living tissue and the manner in which truth is acquired by the growing mind. That education means the assimilation of truth is almost a commonplace in modern pedagogy. Few, however, have felt the full force of the comparison or realized how completely the psychological in this as in other instances follows the lines of the physiological. Just as the living cell cannot delegate the task of assimilation, so the mind cannot by any contrivance of educational methods evade the task of performing the assimilative process for itself. All that the teacher can do is to prepare the material and to stimulate the mind of the pupil; the pupil himself must perform the task of incorporating into his mind the truth presented to him. In the second place, the mind cannot take over into its own substance a complex truth as such. The truth must first be broken up into less complex component parts, which are assimilable by the mind in its present condition of development.

There is little profit, for example, in placing before the pupil a finished essay, unless the pupil is taught to analyze the finished literary product into its constituent elements, and to reconstruct those elements into the essay. This, of course, is more than the task of summarizing each paragraph and labelling it more or less happily. When the term assimilation is used with reference to mental development, it is well to remember that, while it originally referred to the building up of anatomical elements, these elements, once constructed, have an immediate physiological bearing. Each particle of matter that is lifted into the living tissue acquires thereby a functional unity, that is, it is brought into functional relation with every other particle of the organism. Similarly, a truth once incorporated into the mind sheds its light on the entire mental content, and is retained by the mind, not merely as an isolated truth. Acting on these principles, the up-to-date educationist insists: first, that each new truth should be not only an addition to the stock of knowledge of the pupil, but also a functional acquisition, something that stimulates the pupil’s mind to increased activity; secondly, that in every educational undertaking the centre of orientation should be shifted from the logical centre of the body of truth to be imparted to the present needs and capacities of the growing mind.

THOMAS EDWARD SHIELDS.

ASSISI, THE DIOCESE OF, is in the civil province of Umbria, Italy. The town of Assisi (Assium), which takes its name from Mount Asi, on which it is situated, lies almost in the centre of the province of Umbria, about halfway between the cities of Perugia and Foligno, and forty-one miles north of Rome. The beginnings of Assisian history are involved in much obscurity; but in early imperial times it had become a flourishing municipality of no mean importance, and lays claim, with some show of truth, to being the birthplace of the Latin poet Sextus Aurelius Propehitius. The Gospel was first preached to the Assisians about the middle of the third century by St. Cyprianius, Bishop of Bettona (ancient Vettona), who suffered martyrdom under the Emperor Maximian. About 235 St. Rufinus was appointed Bishop of Assisi by Pope St. Fabian; suffered martyrdom about 236; and was followed by St. Victorinus and his immediate successor, St. Sabinus, died martyrs, the latter being most cruelly beaten to death. Of the bishops who occupied the See of Assisi during the fifth and sixth centuries, one, Aventius, is worthy of mention. It was this heroic prelate who interceded (544) with Totila in behalf of the Assisians, and saved the city from the ravages of the Ostrogothic army on its way to Rome. In succeeding centuries mention is made of several Bishops of Assisi who were present at general councils of the Church. Thus, in 659, Aquilinus was summoned by Pope Martin I to be present at the Lateran Council, convened for the purpose of formulating a decree against the Monothelites. During the seventh and eighth centuries Assisi fell under the power of the Lombard dukes, and in 773 was razed to the ground by Charlemagne for its determined resistance to him. He restored it, however, and at the same time all traces of Arian belief and Lombard sympathies disappeared. About the same time the great Abby of Roera (or Roza) was built at Assisi, which made the town thenceforth a great power in the political life of central Italy. Bishop Hugo, whose episcopal chair lasted from 1036 to 1050, transferred the episcopal chair to the cathedral of San Rufino, which he himself raised over the little oratory beneath which the Saint’s bones had rested for eight centuries. From St. Rufinus to the present incumbent of the See of Assisi, the Right Reverend Monsignor Ambrose Luddi, O.P., the bishops of that see have numbered some ninety-two; but of these some are little known, and the existence of others is more or less problematical. The present Bishop is the spiritual birthplace of St. Francis. All the places sanctified by his presence have been preserved in their original state or transformed into sanctuaries. Foremost among these is the basilica of Our Lady of Angels, erected on the model of St. Peter’s at Rome through the beneficence of Pope St. Pius V., which shelters the famous little chapel of the Portiuncula, the cradle of the Franciscan Order, where St. Francis received the great Perdono d’ Assisi, more commonly known as the Portiuncula Indulgence. Within this basilica also stands the tiny cell in which St. Francis died, and which contains among other things the well of St. Domenico and the St. Francis’s death mask. St. Francis’s remains now repos in the patriarchal basilica of San Francesco, erected through the exertions of Brother Elias, the first stone of which was laid by Gregory IX, 25 July, 1228. Consecrated by Innocent IV, this church is composed of three sanctuaries, one over the other, and is one of the earliest specimens of Gothic architecture in Italy. “There is nothing like it,” says Taine. “Before seeing it one has no idea of the art and genius of the Middle Ages.” It is difficult to overestimate the stimulus given to Italian art by the building of this great double basilica, and the decoration of which the foremost painters of the day were engaged, including Cimabue and Giotto, whose famous mystical frescoes, illustrative of the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, adorn the lower church. The recent revival of widespread interest in all that concerns St. Francis has made Assisi the goal of a new race of literary and artistic pilgrims. The splendours and associations of the basilicas of San Francesco and Santa Maria degli Angeli tend to overshadow the other churches of Assisi. The cathedral of San Rufino, mentioned above, which dates from 1140, is noted for its beautiful façade and possesses a font (the only one in Assisi) in which not only St. Francis and St. Clare, but the Emperor Frederick II was baptized. The Chiesa Nuova, a Greek cross, surmounted by five cupolas and standing on the site of St. Francis’s parental house, was built at the expense of Philip II of Spain, in 1798. Santa Chiara, founded by St. Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth century, due to the genius of Filippo di Campello, contains the remains of St. Clare, the co-foundress with St. Francis of the Poor Ladies, or Clare, as they are now called, and daughter of Count Favorino Scifi, an Assisian noble. The convent of St. Donnino’s, in which the holy abbess lived, stands without the city and is little changed since her day.
Aside from the churches and convents, perhaps the most interesting monuments in Assisi are the remains of the temple of Minerva, a striking reminder of the Roman period, and the renowned castle known as the Rocca Maggiore, besides twenty-six small hamlets and villages, each, with the exception of Porsiano, having its church and resident priest. There are 3 educational institutions for boys, with 206 pupils; and 1 episcopal seminary, with 28 seminarists. There are 64 secular priests, and 125 priests of religious orders; while the faithful of the diocese number 28,500. There are 8 monasteries of men and 18 convents of nuns. The churches, chapels, and oratories in the diocese number 190, with 35 parishes in all. The Diocese of Assisi is immediately subject to the Holy See, a privilege which it has enjoyed from remote antiquity.

Assistant at the Pontifical Throne (Assistent Throno Pontificii).—Bishops, assistant at the pontifical throne are those prelates who belong to the Papal Chapel (Capella Pontificia), and hold towards the Pope much the same relation as cathedral canons do to their bishop. At solemn functions these Assistants, adorned with cope and mitre, surround the throne of the Pope, while other bishops are not privileged to be in his immediate vicinity. To this College of Assistants belong ex officio all patriarchs and those archbishops and bishops to whom the Pope has granted the privilege by brief. The Throne-Assistants rank immediately after the Cardinals. They are privileged to celebrate Mass in private oratories and to dispose of a certain sum from their episcopal revenues in favour of their own obsequies, or to lay it aside for their own obsequies. These Throne-Assistants are always created Counts of the Apostolic Palace, and they belong to the Pontifical Family.

Assise of Clarendon. The.—A name improperly applied to the Council held at Clarendon, 25 January, 1164, where Henry II required St. Thomas Becket and the English bishops to subscribe sixteen "Constitutions," alleging them to be customs of the realm. One gave into the King's hands the custody of vacant sees and abbies and made election to them dependent on his license and assent. The second and seventh provided that the King's justice should, in every suit to which an ecclesiastic was a party, determine whether the cause was spiritual or secular; if the former, that a royal officer should be present in the bishop's court where it was tried; and that on conviction of the defendant, in a criminal action, should be handed over to the secular arm for punishment. By the third no King's officer was to be e commeqno sor to an English bishop, without injury to the Crown. The fourth required royal leave before any Church dignitary might pass beyond sea, i. e. to Rome. The fifth allowed no appeals to the Pope except the King suffered them. All causes, however spiritual, were to be terminated in England. Of these enactments, the first violated Henry I's treaty; King Stephen's confirmation of the Church's liberties, and Henry III's promise to William the Conqueror forbade this custom and established separate "Courts Christian," which, however, neither derived their authority from the civil power nor went by its rules. They dealt with all cases involving clerics, i. e. persons who had received the tonsure. They would not pronounce a sentence of blood. Their penalties were "for the salvation of souls," and the most severe for an ecclesiastic was to be deprived from his order. Abuses followed this milder jurisdiction. Henry II, it appears, was intent on setting up in his kingdom a procedure which the old imperial law exhibited, and which Gratian's "Decretum" quotes (C. II, q. i, c. 18, c. 31). "Curia tradet puniendos," said an edict of the Emperor Arcadius received into the Theodosian Code, touching unwilling clerics. To similar effect Innocent III: after degradation, certain clerics were to be given up for punishment to the secular power (Regesta Innocentii III, i, 574); II, 1919; and, as practice had never been the English custom. St. Thomas argued that deprivation was penalty sufficient, however grave the offence; and that no man ought to be punished twice, as he would be if the civil magistrate took in hand the guilty party after he was condemned. Henry did not affect to be God's Vicar in spirituals. Yet his constitutions infringed the liberties which English clerics (clerici) had enjoyed, as well as sometimes abused. By cutting off appeals to Rome he was anticipating the Tudor legislation. The Church courts were superior to the royal in matters of learning, procedure, and justice. Their popularity was not undeserved. Excommunication of great officers in an age of violence was often the sole weapon against tyranny. St. Thomas, in resisting the constitutions, had precedent on his side. But Henry never could have meant to abolish the privilege of appeal, even when the clerk of a young canon had broken the law. The penalty of a fine. Such a clerk was to be allowed to plead (respondere) before lay judges; to be tried, condemned, degraded in the spiritual court; and then to be chastised by royal authority. Hence Alexander III's hesitation to support the Archbishop becomes intelligible. The Pope did it, true, in 1168, confirm his action; and in 1178, when St. Thomas had been canonized, a partial agreement took place at Northampton between the King and the Holy See, represented by Cardinal Pietrocone. Clerks who broke the Forest Laws, or held feudal tenures, were made subject to the lay courts. The Constitutions of Clarendon were not directly revised. In Magna Charta the first article guarantees, without specifying them in detail, the liberties of the Church, "almost in the form," says J. A. Froude, "in which Becket himself would have defined them." It may be added that the real Assize of Clarendon, in 1168, laid down instructions for judges on circuit and included provisions altogether distinct from the assembly at which St. Thomas underwent his great temptation.
