tr. translation or translated. By itself it means "English translation," or "translated into English by." Where a translation is into any other language, the language is stated.

tr., tract. tractate.
v. see (Lat. vide).
Ven. Venerable.

II.—ABBREVIATIONS OF TITLES.

Acta SS. Acta Sanctorum (Bollandists).

Hast., Dict. of the Bible Hastings (ed.), A Dictionary of the Bible.

Kirchenlexikon Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlexikon.

P. G. Migne (ed.), Patres Graeci.

Vig., Dict. de la Bible Vigouroux (ed.), Dictionnaire de la Bible.

NOTE I.—Large Roman numerals standing alone indicate volumes. Small Roman numerals standing alone indicate chapters. Arabic numerals standing alone indicate pages. In other cases the divisions are explicitly stated. Thus "Rashdall, Universities of Europe, i. ix" refers the reader to the ninth chapter of the first volume of that work; "I. p. ix" would indicate the ninth page of the preface of the same volume.

NOTE II.—Where St. Thomas (Aquinas) is cited without the name of any particular work the reference is always to "Summa Theologica" (not to "Summa Philosophiae"). The divisions of the "Summa Theol." are indicated by a system which may best be understood by the following example: "I-II, Q. vi, a. 7, ad 2 um" refers the reader to the seventh article of the sixth question in the first part of the second part, in the response to the second objection.

NOTE III.—The abbreviations employed for the various books of the Bible are obvious. Ecclesiastes is indicated by Eccles., to distinguish it from Ecclesiastes (Eccles.). It should also be noted that I and II Kings in D. V. correspond to I and II Samuel in A. V.; and I and II Par. to I and II Chronicles. Where, in the spelling of a proper name, there is a marked difference between the D. V. and the A. V., the form found in the latter is added, in parentheses.

CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

N

New Mexico, a territory of the United States now (Jan., 1911) awaiting only the completion of its Constitution and the acceptance by the Federal authorities to rank as a state. It lies between 31° 20' and 37° N. lat., and between 103° 2' and 109° 2' W. long.; it is bounded on the north by Colorado, on the east by Oklahoma and Texas, on the south by Texas and the Republic of Mexico, and on the west by Arizona. It is about 370 miles from east to west, 335 from north to south, and has an area of 122,580 sq. miles, with mountain, plateau, and valley on either side of the Rio Grande. The average rainfall is 12 inches, usually between July and September, so that spring and summer are dry, and agriculture and grazing suffer. The climate is uniform, the summers, as a rule, moderate, and the atmosphere being dry, the heat is not oppressive.

In the north-west and north-east the winters are long and severe; while in the central and northern portions the winters are usually short and mild. In the United States census of 1900 the population was 141,382, of which 33 per cent was illiterate; in the census of 1910 the population was 327,396. About one-half of the inhabitants are of Spanish descent.

The soil in the valleys is a rich and sandy loam, capable, with irrigation, of producing good crops. It is also rich in gold and silver, and important mines have been opened near Deming, Silver City, and Lordsburg, in the south-western part of the state. There are copper mines near Glorieta in the north, and near Santa Rita in the south; while coal is found in great abundance near Gallup, Cerillos, and in the northern part of New Mexico. The gross value of coal for 1907 was $7,517,843, or about $3,832,128. In 1909 the net product in coal, shipped from the mines, was 2,708,624 tons, or a total value of $3,881,508.

A few forests exist in the eastern plains, and abundant timber is found in the north-western and central districts. Though mining and commerce as well as agriculture are now in process of rapid development, New Mexico is still a grazing country. Sheep-farming is the most important and lucrative industry; cattle-farming is also of importance. In 1908 and 1909 severe droughts caused the sheep industry to decline somewhat. In 1909 New Mexico shipped 700,500 head of sheep; in 1908, 853,800; in 1907, 975,800. The wool shorn in 1909, from over 4,000,000 sheep, was 18,000,000 lbs., which brought an average of 19 cents per lb., yielding a cash production of $3,420,000. The shipments of cattle in the same year amounted to 310,326, and 64,350 hides were handled in the same period. Farming is successfully carried on in the Rio Grande and other valleys, Indian corn, wheat, and garden products being the chief staples. In 1907 the territorial governor's report placed the value of the agricultural products at $25,000,000, but this was a gross overestimate. The important manufacturing interests are those connected with mining, railroads, etc. Lumbering is being developed by capital brought from the East, and large lumber mills are now in operation, notably at Albuquerque. There are about 141,282, $3,832,128, as the chief industry.

There are 75 banks (41 national and 34 territorial) in the state, with an aggregate capital of $3,274,086. The bonded debt of the state is $1,002,000, of which $89,579.49 is covered by the sinking fund.

HISTORY. In April, 1536, there arrived at Cihuacán, in the Mexican Province of Sinaloa, Álvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca, Andrés Dorantes, Alonso del Castillo Maldonado, and the negro Estevanico, the only survivors of the ill-fated expedition of Narváez which had left Spain in 1528. Mexico City, the Viceroy of Mexico was told, and the preparations for the wealth of the country to the north, and he forthwith commanded Coronado, governor of the Province of Nueva Galicia, to prepare an expedition. The preparations went slowly, and Mendoza ordered Friar Marcos de Niza to make a preliminary exploration of the northern country. The Franciscan left Cihuacín in 1539, accompanied by Estevanico and a few Indians. After untold hardships he reached the famous pueblo of Zuni, took possession of all the surrounding country, planted the cross, and named the territory "The New Kingdom of St. Francis". Marcos de Niza is, therefore, rightly called the discoverer of New Mexico and Arizona. He then returned to Mexico, and his narrative, especially what he said about the seven cities of Cibola, was an incentive to Coronado, who set out from Cihuacín in 1540, accompanied by Marcos and a large body of Spaniards and Indians. Coronado crossed Sonora (now Arizona) and entered New Mexico in July, 1540. The expedition returned in 1542, but, although many regions were discovered, no conquests were made nor colonies established. In 1563 an expedition was led into New Mexico by Francisco de Ibarra; it is worth mentioning only for the reason that de Ibarra returned in 1565 with the boast that he had discovered "new Mexico", which was, probably, the origin of the name. Espejo entered New Mexico in 1584, but accomplished nothing. In this same year a Francisccan Friar, Augustin Rodriguez, entered with a few companions, and lost his life in the cause of Christianity. In 1581 Espejo called New Mexico Nueva Andalucia. By 1588 the name Nuevo Mejico was evidently well known, since Villagrà's epic is called "Historia del Nuevo Mejico".

The expeditions of Espejo and Father Agustin Rodriguez were followed by more than one of an important character, and it was not until 1598, when Don Juan de Oñate, accompanied by ten Franciscans under Father Alonso Martinez, and four hundred men, of whom one hundred and thirty were accompanied by their wives and families, marched up alongside the Rio Grande, and settled at San Juan de los Caballeros, marking the discovery of the Rio Grande, thirty miles north of Santa Fe. This was the first permanent Spanish settlement in New Mexico. Here was established, also, the first mission, and San Juan de los Caballeros (or San Gabriel a few miles west on the Chama river?) was the capital of the new province until it was moved to Santa Fe some time between 1621 and 1626. The colony prospered, missions were established by the Franciscans, new settlements arose, and by the middle of the seventeenth century general prosperity prevailed. In the year 1680, however, a terrible Indian rebellion broke out under the leadership of Pope, an Indian of the pueblo of San Juan. All the Spanish settlements were attacked, and many people massacred. The survivors fled to Santa Fe, but, after the rebellion was crushed, were once more in the city and were driven out of the province.

Thus was destroyed the work of eighty years. The Spaniards did not lose courage; between 1691 and 1693 Antonio de Vargas reconquered New Mexico and entered it with many of the old colonists and many more new ones, his entire colony consisting of 500 people, with 2,500 horses, 30,000 sheep, and 30,000 fowls. The old villages were occupied, churches rebuilt, and the missions re-established. A new villa was founded, Santa Cruz de la Cañada, around which most of the families which had come with De Vargas under Padre Farfán were settled. The colonies, no longer seriously threatened by the Indians, progressed slowly. By the end of the eighteenth century the population of New Mexico was about 31,000, or about half Spaniards. The first half of the nineteenth century was a period of revolutions—rapid transformations of government and foreign invasions, accepted by the Spanish inhabitants of New Mexico in an easy-going spirit of submission unparalleled in history.

In 1821 the news of Mexican independence was received by the people of New Mexico, ignorant of the events which had preceded it, and knew absolutely nothing of the situation, they celebrated the event with great enthusiasm and swore allegiance to Hurblide. In 1821, just three years after independence, came the news of the fall of Hurblide and the inauguration of the Republic of Mexico: the people of San Juan del Rio Grande rejoiced, and the new regime was applauded as blessing to New Mexico. When war was declared between the United States and Mexico—an event concerning which the New Mexicans were ignorant—General Stephen Watts Kearny was sent to conquer New Mexico. In 1846 he entered the territory, and General Armijo, the local military chief, fled to Mexico. Kearny took possession of the territory in the name of the United States, promising the people all the rights and liberties which other citizens of the United States enjoyed. The people joyfully accepted American rule, and swore obedience to the Stars and Stripes. At one stroke, no one knew why or how, a Spanish colony, which had been the frontier of Spain for three centuries, was brought under the rule of a foreign race and under new and unknown institutions. After the military occupation by Kearny in 1846, Charles Bent was civil governor. He was murdered at Taos, in 1817, by some Spaniards whom he had grossly offended. In 1847–48 Don Celestino Vigil was civil governor.

In 1818, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, New Mexico was formally ceded by Mexico to the United States, and in 1850 it was regularly organized as a territory (which included Arizona until 1861), and James S. Claiborne became governor. The first territorial Legislative Assembly met at Santa Fé in 1851; most of the members were of Spanish descent, and this has been true of all the Assemblies until the end of the century. Up to 1910 the proceedings of the Legislature were in Spanish and English, interpreters being always present. During the years 1861–62 the Territory of New Mexico and the State of Colorado were ceded to the United States by the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and the new Territory was divided into two States—New Mexico and Colorado. New Mexico was organized as a State in 1880, and has since then made rapid progress. Since 1850 many unsuccessful attempts have been made to secure statehood; at last, in June, 1890, Congress passed an Enabling Act; New Mexico is to adopt a Constitution, subject to the approval of Congress.

One of the first acts of the State of New Mexico was to withdraw the claim to the land of Marcos de Niza, as we have seen above, reached New Mexico near the pueblo of Zuñi in 1539. This short expedition may be considered, therefore, as the first mission in New Mexico and what is now Arizona. With the expedition of Coronado (1540–42) several Franciscans under Marcos de Niza entered New Mexico. There is some confusion about their exact number and even about their names. It seems reasonably certain, however, that Marcos had to abandon the expedition after reaching Zuñi, and that two Franciscan priests, Juan de Padilla and Juan de la Cruz, and a lay brother, Luis de Escalona, continued with the expedition into New Mexico, remained as missionaries among the Indians whom Coronado refused to follow in 1542, and were finally murdered by the Indians. These were the first three Christian missionaries to receive the crown of martyrdom within the present limits of the United States. Forty years after the Niza and Coronado expeditions of 1540–42, it was again a Franciscan who made an attempt to gain the New Mexico Indians to the Faith. This was Father Agustin Rodríguez, who was the first friar among the Indians in Northern Mexico and, accompanied by two other friars, Juan de Santa María and Fr. Francisco López, and some seventeen more men, marched up the Rio Grande and visited many of the pueblos on both sides of the river. The friars decided to remain in the new missionary field when the rest of the expedition returned in 1582, but the Indians proved untractable and the two friars received the crown of martyrdom.

When news of the fate of Agustín Rodríguez reached San Bartolomé in Nueva Vizcaya, Father Bernardino Beltrán was desirous of making another attempt to evangelize New Mexico, but, being alone, would not remain there. It was in 1580 that Don Juan de Oñate was the first Spanish friar to settle in New Mexico, at San Juan de los Caballeros. Ten Franciscan friars under Father Alonso Martínez accompanied Oñate in his conquest, and established at San Juan the first Spanish Franciscan mission. Missionary work was begun in earnest, and in 1599 Oñate sent a party to Mexico for re-enforcements. With this party went Fathers Martínez, Salazar, and Vergara to obtain more friars. Salazar died on the way, Martínez did not return, but a new Franciscan comisario, Juan de Escalona, returned to New Mexico with Vergara, and the missionaries were being established in the near pueblos, and prosperity was at hand, but Oñate's ambitions proved fatal: in 1601 he desired to conquer the country to the north and west, and started on an expedition with a small force, taking with him two Franciscans. The people who remained at and near San Juan de los Caballeros were guarding the villages. Civil disorder followed, and the newly-settled province was abandoned, the settlers, with the friars, moving south. Father Escalona remained, at the risk of his life, to await the return of Oñate; but he had written to the viceroy, asking that Oñate should be recalled. Oñate, with a new comisario, Francisco Escobar, and Father San Buenaventura, set out on another counter expedition, and Es-were re-established. Not only were most of the old missions again in a prosperous condition, but new ones were established among the Apaches, Navajos, and other tribes. Towards the middle of the eighteenth century, petty disputes arose between the friars and the Bishop of Durango, and the results were unfavorable to the missions, which at that time numbered from 20 to 25. Father Juan Mirabal being guardian.

In 1560 Bishop Tamarón of Durango visited the province. From this time on the Franciscan missions in New Mexico changed, the friars in many cases acted as parish priests, and their work did not prove so fruitful.

In the middle of the eighteenth century, and during the last years of Spanish rule (1800-1821), the missions declined more and more. The Franciscans still remained, and received salaries from the Government, not as missionaries but as parish priests. They were under their guardian, but the Bishop of Durango controlled religious affairs, with a permanent vicar in New Mexico. The Mexican rule of 1821-1846 was worse than the Spanish rule, and the missions existed only in name. At the beginning of the American occupation, in 1846, the missions, as such, no longer existed.

The missionary work in what is now Arizona was in some cases that of the New Mexico friars, who from the border of Mexico extended their labours among their missionaries and the Moquis. A few of these missions, however, had no connection whatever with the missionary work of New Mexico. After Niza's exploration in 1540, we know little of the missionary work in Arizona proper, until 1563, when Fray Francisco Parras, who was almost alone in his work, was killed at Aguatevi. In 1608 four Franciscans attempted to establish three missions among the Moquis, but were killed during the New Mexican rebellion of that year. In Northern Mexico, close to the Arizona line (or, as it now is known, Pimeria Alta), the Jesuits were doing excellent mission work in 1600-1700. It was a Jesuit, also, Father Eusebio Francisco Kino, who explored what is now southern Arizona, in 1687. Two missions were re-established, however, in Arizona before Father Kino's death in 1711, though churches were built, and many Indians converted. The work of Father Kino was abandoned after his death, until 1732, when Fathers Felipe Segesser and Juan B. Grashoffer established the first permanent missions of Arizona at San Xavier del Bac and San Miguel de Guadalupe. In 1770 the two missions were attacked and plundered by the Pimas, but the missionaries escaped. In 1752 the missions were reoccupied. A rivalry between the Franciscans and the Jesuits hindered the success of the missions.

In 1757, however, the controversy between Jesuits and Franciscans was ended, and the Jesuits expelled. The Government, not content with their expulsion, confiscated the mission property, though the Franciscans were invited to the field. Four Franciscans arrived in 1768 to renew the missionary work and found the missions in a deplorable state, but they persuaded the Government to help in the restoration and to restore the confiscated property. It is to be observed that these missions of Arizona, as well as many of those of Sonora in Mexico, were, until 1873, under the control of the College of Santa Cruz (just across the Arizona line in Northern Mexico), separated from Mexico in 1776, and湘潭 to the control of Father Francisco Garces from 1768 to 1774. Father Garces labored continually among the Indians until he lost his life, in 1781, in his missionary work near the Colorado River in California territory. Arizona was admitted to the Union in 1912, and in 1828 the Mexican Government ordered their abandonment. From this time until 1859, when Bishop Lamy of Santa Fe sent the Rev. J. P. Machebeuf to minister to the spiritual needs of Arizona, there were no signs of Christianity in Arizona other than abandoned missions and ruined churches.

While the admission of New Mexico to statehood, its government is still that of a territory of the United States, regulated by the provisions of the Federal Statutes. Accordingly, the governor and other executive officers are appointed by the executive authority of the United States and paid by the Federal Treasury; the Legislative, or Territorial (House of Representatives and Senate) is elected by the people of the territory; the Territorial Judiciary (a chief justice and five associate justices) is appointed by the President of the United States for a term of four years, but justices of the peace are elected for two years.

Education.—The educational system of New Mexico dates from 1800 and is still in process of development. The public-school system is governed by a territorial Board of Education consisting of seven members. This board appoints the school funds, prepares teachers' examinations, selects books, etc. There are also the usual county and district officers. At present there are approximately 1000 public schools in New Mexico, with about 50,000 pupils, of whom 50% are Indians. There are 70 denominational schools, with 5,000 pupils, and 18 private schools, with 288 pupils. Furthermore, there were, in 1908, 25 Indian schools with 1933 pupils.

The Catholic schools of the territory number 23, with about 100 teachers and about 1500 pupils (estimated in 1910, 1,212 in 1908). The most important Catholic establishment in New Mexico is the New Mexico College at Santa Fe, founded in 1859 by Bishop J. B. Lamy. The sisters' charitable institutions (hospitals, etc.) are state-aided. In 1909 the appropriations for these purposes amounted to $12,000. The other denominational schools are distributed as follows: Presbyterian, 25; Congregational, 9; Methodists, 11; Baptist, 1. The territory, or state, university was established in 1889 at Albuquerque. It is supported by territorial appropriations and land revenues. For the year 1900-10 the income was $40,000. Its teaching force consisted, in 1909-10, of 16 professors, associate professors, and instructors, and the number of students in attendance was 130. There are three normal schools, one at Las Vegas, one at El Rito, and one at Tucumcari, all of which are a mission school of mines at Socorro; and a college of agriculture and mechanical arts at Mesilla Park—the best equipped and most efficient school in New Mexico, receiving both federal and territorial aid aggregating $100,000 a year (1900-10), having a teaching force of 40 professors, assistant professors, and instructors, and an attendance of 150 students (1900-10). The combined valuation of the territory's educational institutions is about $1,000,000, while the annual expenditures aggregate $275,000.

Religion.—In 1850, when New Mexico was organized as a territory of the United States, it including, till 1848, Arizona and part of California) was made a vicariate Apostolic, under the Rt. Rev. John B. Lamy. In 1853 New Mexico (with exceptions noted below) was made the Diocese of Santa Fe, and the vicar Apostolic became its first bishop. In 1856 this diocese became the Archdiocese of Santa Fe, and Bishop Lamy was appointed by the Holy See its first archbishop. The diocese includes all of New Mexico, except Doña Ana, Eddy, and Grant Counties, which belong to the Diocese of Tucson. The present Archbishop of Santa Fe is the Rt. Rev. John B. Pitaval. The Catholic population of the territory in 1882 was 12,500; in 1900 it was 121,558 (U. S. Census Bulletin, no. 103, p. 36). But these figures do not include Catholics in the territory; they therefore do not include the Catholic population of Arizona and probably also of Colorado. In 1906 the Catholics were more than 88 per cent of the church membership of the territory, which was 137,009, distributed as follows:—

At present (1910) the total Catholic population of New Mexico may be estimated at not less than 130,000, about 120,000 being of Spanish descent. No definite statistics are available on this last point. The large Catholic population of New Mexico is due to its having been colonized by the Spaniards, whose first thought on founding a colony was to build churches and establish missions. The recent Catholic immigration has been from the Middle West, and this is largely Irish.

Catholics distinguished in Public Life.—The fact that until about the year 1800 the population of the territory was mostly Spanish, and therefore Catholic, is the reason why most of the men who have figured in the history of New Mexico are Catholic. Among the more prominent may be mentioned: Donaciano Vigil, military governor, 1847-48; Miguel A. Otero, territorial secretary, 1861; delegates to the Federal Congress, José M. Gallegos, 1853-54; Miguel A. Otero, 1855-60; Francisco Perea, 1863-64; José F. Chavez, 1865-70; José M. Gallegos, 1879-85; Bishop R. A. M. Otero, 1879-80; Tularin Luna, 1881-82; Francisco A. Manzano, 1883-4. The treasurers and auditors from 1863 to 1886 were all, with but one exception, Catholic Spaniards.

Legislation affecting Religion.—(1) Absolute freedom of worship is guaranteed by the Organic Act constituting the territory, and by statute preference to any religious denomination by law is forbidden. (2) Horse-racing and cock-fighting on Sunday are forbidden; labour, except works of necessity, charity, or mercy, prohibited, and the offence is punishable by a fine of from $5 to $15. (3) No religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust in this territory. (4) Oaths are administered in the usual forms, but an affirmation may be used instead of an oath, and every individual has conscientious scruples against taking an oath. (5) No statutory enactment punishing blasphemy or profanity has ever been passed in this territory. (6) It is customary to open the sessions of the Legislature with an invocation of the Supreme Being, but there is no statutory authority either for or against this practice. The Catholics, until 1891, when this function has always been discharged by a Catholic priest. (7) Christmas is the only religious festival observed as a legal holiday in New Mexico. New Year's Day is also a legal holiday, but Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, All Souls' Day, etc., are not recognized. (7) There has been no decision in the courts of New Mexico regarding the seal of confession, but it is to be presumed that, in the absence of any statutory provision covering the point, the courts of the territory, on principle, being confined, as they are, to the state of New Mexico, would refuse to entertain the plea of the assertion of the invalidity of the priest is a confidential communication and therefore inviolable. (8) Churches are in the contemplation of the laws of New Mexico, in the category of charitable institutions. (9) No religious or charitable institution is permitted to hold more than $50,000 worth of property; any property acquired or held contrary to the provisions of this article shall be forfeited to the United States. The property of religious institutions is exempt from taxation when it is being used and devoted exclusively to its appropriate objects, and not used with a view to pecuniary profit. The clergy are exempt from jury and military service. (10) Marriage may be either by religious or civil ceremony. The male and female, eight years of age, and over, together, for marriage with parent's consent; after the male is twenty-one and the female eighteen they may marry regardless of parents' consent. Marriages between first cousins, uncles, aunts, nieces and nephews, half-brothers and sisters, grand-parent and grandchildren, are declared incestuous and absolutely void. (11) Education in the public schools may be imparted to religious students. No religious bequests are recognized unless written in duly attested by the lawful number of witnesses. There are no restrictions as to cemeteries other than that they must not be near to running streams. (14) Divorce may be obtained for cruelty, adultery, desertion, and for almost every ground recognized by other statutes of this jurisdiction. The provision for granting divorce must have been a bona fide resident of the territory for more than a year prior to the date of filing the action. Service on the defendant must be personal, if the defendant is within the territory; but may be by publication, if the whereabouts of the defendant are unknown. Trials of divorce are without a jury.

The territory and the sea 110° E. latitude, and between the sea and 120° E. longitude—a territory of over 30,000 sq. miles (nearly as large as Ireland or the State of Maine). Abbot Torres brought out many priests and young ecclesiastics for the monastery and parochial work, and built churches in the more settled districts of his new territory. Since Abbot Torres became superior in 1901, the number of churches has increased from one to ten. To foster higher education, Abbot Torres has erected a magnificent convent and ladies' college, and has in hand a similar institution for boys. He has already completed a large and commodious girls' orphanage. All these works have been accomplished at the expense of the patronage of the present government. The funds thus has not confined his energies solely to New Mexico. He founded the "Drysdale River Aborigines Mission", 2000 miles away, in the extreme north-west of Australia, an unexplored land inhabited only by the most treacherous savages. This mission was opened on 12 July, 1899, with a party of fifteen in charge of two priests.

Abbot Torres was consecrated bishop in Rome on 22 May, 1910. On the fourth of the same month, by a Decree of the Propaganda, he was appointed administrator Apostolic of Kimberley, and had the "Drysdale Mission" erected into an abbey nullius. He has now under his jurisdiction a territory of 147,000 sq. miles, an area nearly as large as five important states of the United States—viz., Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Virginia, Maine. The present position (1910) of the mission is: churches, 10; priests, 17 (several, 7); monastic students, 9; other religious, 33, nuns, 18; high school, 1; primary schools, 1; charitable institutions, 2; children attending Catholic schools, 530; Catholic population, 3900.

JAMES FLOOD.

New Orleans, Archdiocese of (New Aul- lice), erected 25 April, 1763, as the Diocese of Saint Louis of New Orleans; raised to its present rank and title 19 July, 1830. Its original territory comprised the ancient Louisiana Purchase and East and West Florida, being bounded on the north by the Carolina boundary, on the east by the St. Marys, and the Rio Perdido, on the south by the Diocese of Baltimore, and on the south by the Diocese of Limares and the Archdiocese of Durango. The present boundaries include the State of Louisiana, between the twenty-ninth and thirty-first degree of north latitude, an area of 23,208 square miles. The entire territory of Louisiana was reduced to a single diocese by a division of its history into four distinct periods.

1. Early Colonial Period. — The discoverers and pioneers, De Soto, Iberville, La Salle, Bienville, were accompanied by missionaries in their expeditions through the Louisiana Purchase, and in the tolsemne beginnings of the first feeble settlements, which were sites of the present city of New Orleans. From the beginning of its history, Louisiana had been placed under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Quebec; in 1050 the priests of the Seminary of Quebec petitioned the second Bishop of Quebec for authority to establish missions in the West, investing the superior sent out by the seminary with the powers of vicar-general. The field for which they obtained this authorization extended further than the Mississippi Valley and its tributaries. They proposed to plant their first mission among the Tamarois, but when this became known, the Jesuits claimed that tribe as one already under their care; they received the new missionaries with personal cordiality, but felt keenly the official action of Bishop St-Vallier, in what they regarded as an intrusion. Fathers Joliet de Montigny and Antoine Davion, and Francois Buson de Saint-Cosme were the missionaries sent to found the new missions in the Mississippi Valley. In 1069 Iberville, who had sailed from France, with his two brothers Bienville and Sarvolle, and Father Du Ru, S.J., coming up the estuary of the Mississippi, found Father Montigny and the Chevalier Bordenave, priests of the colony, on the steps of the little fort at Biloxi, the first permanent settlement in Louisiana. Father Bordenave was its first chaplain, thus beginning the long line of zealous parish priests in Louisiana.

In 1073 Bishop St-Vallier proposed to erect Mobile into a parish, and annex it in perpetuity to the seminary of Quebec. The project was carried out, and Mobile was erected 20 July, 1073, and united to the Seminary of Foreign Missions of Paris and Quebec. Father Rouleaux de la Vente, of the Diocese of Bayeux, was appointed parish priest and Father Huyse his assistant. The Biloxi settlement being difficult of access from the sea, Bienville thought it unsuitable for the headquarters of the colony. In 1074 he selected Tchouteque, the present site of New Orleans, about 100 miles from the mouth of the Mississippi River, where there was a deserted Indian village. Bienville directed his men to clear the ground and erect buildings. The city was laid out according to the plans of the Chevalier Le Blond de la Tour, chief engineer of the colony, the plans including a parish church, which Bienville desired to be dedicated under the invocation of St. Louis. The old St. Louis cathedral stands on the site of this first parish church, and the presbytery in Cathedral Alley is the site of the first modest clergy house. Bienville called the city New Orleans after the Due d'Orleans, and the whole territory Louisiana, or New France.

In August, 1075, the Due d'Orleans, as Regent of France, issued letters patent establishing a joint-stock company to be called "The Company of the West," to which Louisiana was transferred. The company was obliged to build churches at its own expense wherever it should establish settlements; also to maintain the necessary number of duly approved priests to preach, perform Divine service, and administer the sacraments under the authority of the Bishop of Quebec. Bienville experienced much opposition from the Company of the West in its attempt to remove the colony from Biloxi. In 1072 Father Francois de la Harpe, Vicar General of the Capuchins of Louisiane, made a tour of New France from the Lakes to the Mississippi, visiting New Orleans, which he describes as "a little village of about one hundred cabins dotted here and there," with little attempt at order, a large wooden warehouse in which he said Mass, a chapel in course of construction and two storehouses and a number of cabins which soon took shape, and with the consent of the company, the colony was moved to this site in 1073. Father Charlevoix reported on the great spiritual destitution of the province occasioned by the missions being scattered so far apart and the scarcity of priests, and this compelled the council of the company to erect Mobile into a diocese in 1073. Accordingly, the company applied to the Bishop of Quebec, and on 10 June, 1072, Louisiana was divided into three ecclesiastical sections. The district north of the Ohio was entrusted to the Society of Jesus and the Priests of the Foreign Missions of Paris and Quebec; that between the Mississippi and the Rio Perdido, to the Discalced Carmelites, with headquarters at Mobile. The Capuchins were to extend their settlements farther west, and their district was given to the Capuchins.

A different arrangement was made for the Indian and new French settlements on the lower Mississippi. Because of the remoteness of this district from Quebec, Father Louis-Francois Duplessis de Mornay, a Capuchin of Meudon, was consecrated, at Bishop St-Vallier's request, at Quebec in April, 1074. Bishop St-Vallier appointed him vicar-general for Louisiana, but he never came to America, although he eventually succeeded to the See of Quebec. When the Company of the West applied to him for priests for the lower Mississippi Valley he offered the more populous field of colonists to the Capuchin Fathers, in whose charge of the missions the Company did not take any immediate steps, and it was not till 1070 that any of the order came to Louisiana. Father Jean-Matthieu de Saint-Anne is the first whose name is recorded. He signs himself in 1070 in the register of the parish of New Orleans. The last entry of the secular clergy in Mobile was that of Rev. Alexander Wildey, Bishop of Quebec, who died at Mobile in 1070. He was said to have come directly from France and consequently found application to the Bishop of Quebec long and tedious; Father Matthieu therefore applied to Rome for special powers for fifteen missions under his charge, representing that the great distance from the Bishop of Quebec made it practically impossible for him to apply to the Bishop of Quebec. A brief was really issued (Michael a Tugio, "Bullarium Ord. PP. Minor. S.P. Francisci Capucorum", Vol. 17: 10-52; BLJ, pp. 322, 323), and Father Matthieu seems to have assumed that it exempted him from episcopal jurisdiction, for, on 10 March, 1073, he signs the register "Pere Matthieu, Vicare Apostolicque Curie de la Mobile".

In 1072 Bishop de Mornay entrusted the spiritual jurisdiction of the colony to the Capuchin priests, who were to establish missions in all parts of Louisiana with residence at New Orleans, but were not to exercise any ecclesiastical function there without the consent of the Capuchins. They were to minister to the French in the Illinois District, with the Priests of the Foreign Missions, where the superior of each body was a vicar-general, just as the Capuchin superiors at New Orleans. In the spring of 1073 Father Raphael de Luxembourg arrived to assume his duties as superior of the Capuchin Mission in Louisiana. It was a difficult task that the Capuchins had assumed. Their congregations were scattered over a large area; there was much poverty, suffering, and ignorance of religion. Father Raphael, in the cathedral archives, says that when he landed in New Orleans he could hardly secure a room for himself and his brethren to occupy pending their arrival in the province; for the latter occupied or converted into a chapel; for the population seemed indifferent to all that savoured of religion. There were less than thirty persons at Mass on Sundays; yet, undismayed, the missionaries set to work and soon saw their zeal rewarded with a greater reverence for religion and more faithful attendance at church. In 1725 New Orleans had become a real city, and among its inhabitants, the Capuchins having a flock of six hundred families. Mobile had declined to sixty families, the Apaache Indians (Catholics) numbered sixty families, there were six at the Balize, two hundred at St. Charles or Les Allemandes, one hundred at Point Coupee, six at Natchez, fifty at Natchitoches and the other missions which are mentioned in the "Bullarium Capucinorum" (Vol. VIII, p. 330).

The founder of the Jesuit Mission in New Orleans was Father Nicolas-Ignatius de Beauvilliers, who was appointed vicar-general for his district. He visited New Orleans and returned to France to obtain Fathers of the Society for his mission. Being also commissioned by Bishop de Bienville, in the capacity of a hospital and school, he applied to the Ursulines of Rouen, who accepted the call. The royal patent authorizing the Ursulines to found a convent in Louisiana was issued 18 Sept., 1726. Mother Mary Tranchenep of St. Augustine, with seven professed nuns from Rouen, Le Havre, Vannes, Flornel, Hennebon, and Elbouf, a novice, Madeleine Haencher, arrived in New Orleans on 12 January, 1727, and, accompanied by Fathers Tartarin and Doutreleau, set sail for Louisiana. They reached New Orleans on 6 August to open the first convent for women within the present limits of the United States of America. As the convent was not ready for their reception, the governor gave up his own residence to them. The Ursulines, on their return from their departure from Rouen through a period of thirty years in Louisiana, is told by Sister Madeleine Haencher in a diary still preserved in the Ursuline Convent of New Orleans, and which forms, with Father Charlesvoix's history, the principal record of those early days. On 7 August, 1727, the Ursulines began in Louisiana, and since continued without interruption. They opened a hospital for the care of the sick and a school for poor children, also an academy which is now the oldest educational institution for women in the United States. The convent in which the Ursulines then took up their abode still stands, the oldest conventual structure in the States and one of the earliest in the limits of the Louisiana Purchase. In 1821 the Ursulines removed to the lower portion of the city, and the old convent became first the episcopal residence and then the diocesan chancery.

Meanwhile Father Mathurin le Petit, S.J., established a mission among the Choctaws; Father Du Poisson, among the Arkansas; Father Doutreleau, on the Mobile; Father Tartarin and Le Bouleguer, on the Mississippi; Father Guymonneau among the Metche-ganaes; Father Soulé, among the Yazoos; Father Baudoin, among the Chickasaws. The Natchez Indians, provoked by the tyranny and rapacity of Chopart, the French commandant, in 1729 nearly destroyed all these missions. Father Du Poisson and Father Tartarin were killed by the Indians. As an instance of the faith implanted in the Iroquois about this time there was received into the Ursuline Order at New Orleans, Mary Turpin, daughter of a Canadian father and an Illinois mother. She died a professed nun in 1761, at the age of fifty-two with the distinction of being the first American born nun in this country. The immigration of women had been small. Bienville made constant appeal to the mother country to send honest wives and mothers. From time to time ships freighted with girls would arrive; they came over in the great body of the Crown of Canada; but as they were sent by the king to be married to the colonists. The Bishop of Quebec was also charged with the duty of sending out young women who were known to be good and virtuous. As a proof of her respectability, each girl was furnished by the bishop with a curiously wrought casket; they are known in Louisiana history as "casket girls." Each band of girls, on arriving at New Orleans, was confided to the care of the Ursulines until they were married to colonists able to provide for their support. Many of the best families of the state are proud to trace their descent from "casket girls."

The city was growing and developing; a better class of immigrant was pouring in, and Father Charlesvoix, on his visit in 1728, wrote to the Duchesse de Lesdiguiéres: "My hopes, I think, are well founded that this wild and desert place, which the reeds and trees still cover, will be one day, and that not far distant, a city of opulence and the metropolis of a rich colony." His words were prophetic: New Orleans is now the second city of the United States. When Bienville died in 1732, there were few seculars, but he had established missions. There was a governor with a military staff, bringing to the city the manners and splendour of the Court of Versailles, and the manners and usages of the mother country stamped on Louisiana life characteristics in marked contrast to the life of any other American colony. The society of Fathers of New Orleans was for a time reduced to a mere name, but directed the Ursulines, and had charge of their private chapel and a plantation where, in 1751, they introduced into Louisiana the culture of the sugar-cane, the orange, and the fig. The Capuchins established missions wherever they could. Bishop St.-Vallier had been succeeded by Bishop de Monravy, who never went to Quebec but ruled for almost five years. His successor, Henri-Marie de Brueil de Pontbriand, appointed Father de Beauvilliers, S.J., his vicar-general in Louisiana. The Capuchin Fathers refused to recognize Father de Beauvilliers' authority, claiming, under the agreement of the Company of the West with the coadjutor bishop, de Monravy, that the superior of the Capuchins was, in perpetuity, vicar-general of the province, and that the bishop could appoint no other. Succeeding bishops of Quebec declared, however, that they could not, as bishops, admit that the assent of a coadjutor and vicar-general to an agreement with a trading company had forever deprive every bishop of Quebec of the right to canonically appoint his own vicar-general. This incident gave rise to some friction between the two orders which has been spoken of derisively by Louisiana historians, notably by Gayarré, as "The War of the Capuchins and the Jesuits." The archives of the diocese, as also the records of the Capuchins in Louisiana, show that it was simply a question of jurisdiction, which gave rise to a contention so petty as to be unworthy of notice. Historians exaggerate this beyond all importance, while failing to chronicle the shameful spoliations of the Jesuits by the French Government which suddenly settled the question forever.

In 1761 the Parliaments of several provinces of France had condemned the Jesuits, and measures were taken against them in the kingdom. They were expelled from Paris, and the Superior Council of Louisiana, following the example, on 9 June, 1763, just ten years before the order was suppressed by Clement XIV, passed an act suppressing the Jesuits throughout the province, declaring them dangerous to royal authority, to the rights of the bishops, and to the public. The Jesuits were charged with neglecting their mission, with having developed their plantation, and with usurping the office of vicar-general. To the first charge the record of their labours was sufficient refutation; to the second, it was assuredly to the credit of the Jesuits that they made their plantation so productive as to maintain their missionaries; to the third, the action of the bishops of Quebec in appointing the vicar-general and that of the Superior Council itself in suspending him was the answer. Were that the case, the Jesuits' property was confiscated, and they were forbidden to use the name of their Society or to wear their habit. Their property was sold for $150,000. All their chapels were levelled to the ground, leaving exposed even the vaults where the dead were interred. The Jesuits were ordered to give up their missions, to turn to New Orleans and to leave on the first vessel sailing for France. The Capuchins forgetting their difference interfered in behalf of the Jesuits; and finding their petitions unavailing went to the river bank to receive the returning Jesuits, offered them a home alongside of their own, and in every way showed their disapproval of the Council's action. The Jesuits which were never the less grateful for the books they had been able to save from the spoliation.

Father Boudoin, S.J., the benefactor of the colony, who had introduced the culture of sugar-cane and oranges from San Domingo, and figs from Provence, a man to whom the people owed much and to whom Louisiana to-day owes so much of its prosperity, alone remained. The next list of the Jesuits, who had spent thirty-five in the college. He was broken in health and too ill to leave his room. They dragged him through the streets when prominent citizens intervened and one wealthy planter, Etienne de Boré, who had first succeeded in the granulation of sugar, defied the authorities, and took Father Boudoin to his house. Father Boudoin had never acknowledged a Jesuit. The most monstrous part of the order of expulsion was that, not only were the chapels of the Jesuits in lower Louisiana—many of which were the only places where Catholics, whites and Indians, and negroes, could worship God—levelled to the ground, but the Council carried out the decree even in the Illinois district which had been ceded to the King of England and which must now be given back. They ordered even the vestments and plate to be delivered to the king's attorney. Thus was a vast territory left destitute of priests and altars, and the growth of the Church retarded for many years. Of the ten Capuchins left to administer to this immense territory, five were retained in New Orleans; the remainder were ordered to leave Louisiana. It is interesting to note that the only native Louisiana priest at this time and the first to enter the holy priesthood, Rev. Bernard Viel, born in New Orleans 1 October, 1736, was among the Jesuits expelled from the colony. He died in France, 1821. The inhabitants of New Orleans then numbered four thousand. Father Boudoin, S.J., the benefactor of the colony, was ceded to Spain, and Antonio Ullén was sent over to take possession. The colonists were bitterly opposed to the cession and finally rose in arms against the governor, giving him three days in which to leave the town. (See LOUISIANA.) The Spanish Government resolved to punish the parties who had so insulted its representative. Don Boudoin, sent Alexander Boudoin, a relative of the officer of government, Labrènche, President of the Council, who chiefly instigated the passing of the decree expelling the Jesuits from the colony, and the rebellion against the Government, was tried by court martial and with six of his partners in his scheme, was shot in the Place d'Armes. O'Reilly reorganized the province of Louisiana and four years later the Spanish Armies, taken by the officials shows that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was then officially recognized in the Spanish dominions. "I appointed swear before God...to maintain...the mystery of the Immaculate Conception of Our Lady, the Virgin Mary." The change of government affected ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The Province of Louisiana passed under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Santiago de Cuba, the Right Rev. Jaime José de Esquivel, and Spanish Capuchins began to fill the places of their French predecessors. Consejo of 1 January, 1777, was left open, but Father Cirilo de Barcelona with four Spanish Capuchins to New Orleans. These priests were Fathers Francisco, Angel de Revillagigado, Louis de Quintanilla, and Aleman. They reached New Orleans, 19 July, 1773. The genial ways of the French brethren had never been administered with the spirit of the Jesuits, and he informed the Bishop of Cuba concerning what he considered "lux methods of conduct and administration." Governor Unzaga, however, interfered in behalf of the French Capuchins, and wrote to the bishop censuring the Spanish friars. This offended the bishop and both referred the matter to the Spanish Court. The Government expressed no opinion, but advised the prelate and governor to compromise, and so preserve harmony between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities. Some Louisiana historians, Charles Gayarré among others, speak of the depravity of the clergy of that period. These charges are not borne out by contemporary testimony; the archives of the cathedral witness that the clergy performed their duties with great sobriety and without violating their monastic prejudices or secular antipathies. One of the first acts of Father Cirilo as pastor of the St. Louis Cathedral was to have the catechism printed in French and Spanish.

The Bishop of Santiago de Cuba resolved to remedy the deplorable conditions in Louisiana, where confirmation had not been administered for thirty years, and the inability to visit this distant portion of his diocese, he asked for the appointment of an auxiliary bishop, who would take up his abode in New Orleans, and then visit the missions on the Mississippi as well as those in Mobile, Pensacola, and St. Augustine. The Holy See appointed Father Cirilo de Barcelona titular Bishop of Trich and auxiliary of Santiago de Cuba. He was consecrated in Cuba in 1781 and proceeded to New Orleans where for the first time the people enjoyed the presence of a bishop. A saintly man, he infused new life into the province. The whole of Louisiana and the Floridas were under his jurisdiction. According to official records of the Church in Louisiana in 1785, the church of St. Louis, New Orleans, had a parish priest, four mission priests, and thirty-one Jesuits. He is the following points: Terre aux Boeufs, St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, St. James, Ascension, St. Gabriel's at Iberville, Point Coupee, Attakapas, Opleonas, Natchitoches, Natchez, St. Louis, St. Genevieve, and at Bernard or Manchac (now Galveston). On 25 November, 1785, Bishop Cirilo appointed as parish priest of St. Anthony of Padua, Moreton Arce de Sedella, one of the six Capuchins who had come to the colony in 1779. Father Antonio (popularly known as "Père Antoine") was destined to exert a remarkable influence in the colony. Few priests have been more assailed by historians, but a careful comparison of the ancient records of the cathedral with the testimony of the Spanish Government, shows that he did not deserve on the one hand the indignities which Gayarré and Shea heap upon him, nor yet the excessive honours with which tradition has crowned him. From the cathedral archives it has been proven that he was simply an earnest priest striving to do what he thought his duty amid many difficulties. In 1787 a number of unfortunate Acadians came at the expense of the King of France and settled near Plaquemines, Terre aux Boeufs, Bayou Lafourche, Attakapas, and Opleonas, adding to the already thrifty colony. They brought with them the precious Register of St. Charles aux Mines in Acadia extending from 1689 to 1749, only six years before their cruel deportation. These were deposited for safe keeping with the priest of St. Gabriel at Iberville and are now in the diocesan archives. St. Augustine being reoccupied by part of the army in 1783, the King of Spain made efforts to provide for the continuance of Catholicism in that ancient province. As many English people had settled there and in West Florida, notably at Baton Rouge and Natchez, Charles III applied to the Irish College for priests to attend the English-speaking population. Accordingly Rev. Michael O’Riain, an Irish priest was sent to Florida. Catholic worship was restored, the city at once resuming its own old aspect. Rev. William Savage, a clergyman of great repute, Rev. Michael Lumnort, Rev. Gregory White, Rev. Constantine Makenna, Father Joseph Denis, and a Franciscan with six fathers of his order, were sent to labour in Louisiana. They were distributed through the Natchez and Baton Rouge distri-trics, and were the first Irish priests to come to Louis-iana, the pioneers of a long and noble line to whom this archdiocese owes much. In 1787, the Holy See divided the Diocese of Santiago de Cuba, erected the Bishopric of St. Christopher of Havana, Louisiana, and the Floridas, with the Right Rev. Joseph de Trespasados de Porto Rico as bishop, and the Right Rev. Gabriel de Palmia as auxiliary bishop for the special direction of Louisiana and the two Floridas.

Louisiana thus formed a part of the Diocese of Ha-

Near Fort Natchez the site for a church was purchased on April 11, 1788. The earliest incumbent of whom any record was kept was Rev. Francis Lenna. Most of the people of Natchez were troublesome Protestants or Americans, who had sided with England. They enjoyed absolute religious freedom, no attempt to proselytize was ever made. On Good Friday, 21 March, 1788, New Orleans was swept by a conflagration in which nine hundred buildings, including the parish church, with the adjoining convent of the Ursulines, the house of Bishop Cirilo and the Spanish School, were reduced to ashes. From the ruins of the old irregularly built French City rose the stately Spanish City, Old New Orleans, practically unchanged as it exists to-day. Foremost among the public-spirited men of that time was Don Andreas

Almonaster y Roxas, of a noble Andalucian family and resident in the colony. He had obtained a very great fortune in New Orleans, and at a cost of $50,000

he built and gave to the city the St. Louis Cathedral. He rebuilt the house for the use of the clergy and the Charity Hospital at a cost of $11,000. He also rebuilt the town hall and the Cabildo, the buildings on either side of the cathedral, the hospital, the boys’ school, a chapel for the Ursulines, and founded the Leper Hospital.

Meanwhile rapid assimilation had gone on in Louisiana. Americans began to make their homes in New Orleans and in 1791 the insurrection of San Domingo drove there many hundreds of wealthy noble refugees. The archives of the New Orleans Diocese show that Peter Conneen was appointed a Collector

on 20 May, 1790, to erect Louisiana and the Floridas into a separate see, and on April 9, 1793, a decree for the dismemberment of the Diocese of Havana, Louisiana, and the Provinces of East and West Florida was issued. It provided for the erection of the See of St.

Louis of New Orleans, which was to include all the Louisiana Province and the Provinces of East and West Florida. The Bishops of Mexico, Agapoli,

Michoacan, and Caracas were to contribute, pro rata,

a fund for the support of the Bishop of New Orleans,

until such time as the see would be self-sustaining.

The decree left the choice of a bishop for the new see to the King of Spain, and he on 25 April, 1793, wrote to the King that he had not found a suitable person, and directing him to return immediately to Catolia with a salary of one thousand dollars a year, which the Bishop of Havana was to contribute.

Bishop Cirilo returned to Havana and seems to have resided with the Hospital Friars, while endeavouring to obtain his salary, so that he might return to Europe. It is not known where Bishop Cirilo died in poverty and humiliation.

The Right Rev. Luis Peñalver y Cárdenas was appointed first bishop of the new See of Saint Louis of

New Orleans. He was a native of Havana, born 3

April, 1719, and had been educated by the Jesuits of his native city, receiving his degree in the university in 1741. He was a priest of irreproachable character, and a skilful director of souls. He was consecrated in the cathedral of Havana in 1783. The St. Louis parish church, now raised to the dignity of a catherdral, was dedicated 25 December, 1791. A letter from the king, 14 August, 1794, deceased that its donor, Don Almonaster, was authorized to occupy the most prominent seat in the church, second only to that of the viceregal patron, the intendante of the province, and to receive the kiss of peace during the Mass. Don Almonaster died in 1796 and was buried under the altar of the Sacred Heart.

Bishop Peñalver arrived in New Orleans on 17 July,

1795. In a report to the king and the Holy See he reported the condition of the colony in all respects, including the number of religious duties. He condemned the laxity of morals among the men, and the universal custom of concubin-age among the slaves. The invasion of many persons not of the faith, and the tolerance of the Government in admitting all classes of adventurers for purposes of trade, had brought about disrespect for religion.

He expressed his concern that the Catholic population and of a lodge of French Freemasons, which counted among its members city officials, officers of the garrison, merchants and foreigners. He believed the people clung to their French traditions. He said that the King of Spain possessed “their bodies but not their souls”. He declared that “even the French whom Nuns, from whom good results were obtained in the instruction of girls, were so decidedly French in their inclinations that they refused to admit Spanish women, who wished to become members of their order and many were in tears because they were obliged to read spiritual exercises in Spanish books”. It was a gloomy picture he prefaced; but he set to work and on 21 December, 1795, called a synod, the first and only one held in the diocese of colonial New Orleans.

He also issued a letter of instruction to the clergy declaring the fact that many of his flock were more than five hundred leagues away, and how impossible it was to repair to one and the same time to all. He entrusted the pastors to the blessed Virgin Mary and in all things to fulfil their duties. This letter of instruction bearing his signature is preserved in the archives of the diocese, and, with the call for the synod, forms the only documents signed by the first

Bishop of New Orleans.

Bishop Peñalver everywhere showed himself active in the cause of educational progress and was a general benefactor of the poor. He was promoted to the

See of Guatemala, 20 July, 1801. Before his depature he appointed, as vicars-general, Rev. Thomas

Canon Hasset and Rev. Patrick Walsh, who became officially recognized as “Governors of the Diocese”.

Territorially from this ancient see have been errected the Archbishops of St. Louis, Cincinnati, St. Paul, Dubuque, and Chicago, and the Bishops of Alexandria, Mobile, Natchez, Galveston, San Antonio, Little

Rock, St. Augustine, Kansas City, St. Joseph, Davenport, Cheyenne, Dallas, Winona, Duluth, Concordia,

Omaha, Sioux Falls, Oklahoma, St. Cloud, Bismarck, and Cleveland.

The Right Rev. Francis Porro y Peinade, a Franciscan of the Convent of the Holy Apostles, Rome, was appointed to succeed Bishop Peñalver. But he never took possession of the see. Some old chronicles in Louisiana, and he was never consecrated; others that he was, and died on the eve of leaving Rome. Bishop Portier (Spalding's "Life of Bishop Flaget") says, that he was translated to the See of Tarrazona. Then New Orleans remained vacant many years after the death of Bishop Olivier. In 1789, the Due d'Orleans (afterwards King Louis-Philippe of France) with his two brothers, (the Due de Montpensier and the Comte de Beaujolais), visited New Orleans. They were received with honour, and when Louis-Philippe became King of France he remembered many of those who had entertained him when in exile, and was generous to the Church in the old French province.

III. FRENCH AND AMERICAN PERIOD.—By the Treaty of San Ildefonso, the Spanish King on 1 October, 1800, engaged to retrocede Louisiana to the French Republic six months after certain conditions and stipulations had been executed on the part of the Spanish Government. The Holy See deferred the appointment of a bishop.

On 30 April, 1803, without waiting for the actual transfer of the province, Napoleon Bonaparte by the Treaty of Paris sold Louisiana to the United States. De Laussat, the French Commissioner, had reached New Orleans on 20 March, 1803, to take possession of the province; but failing of an opportunity of having to evacuate and general confusion prevailed. Very Rev. Thomas Hasset, the administrator of the diocese, was directed to address each priest and ascertain whether they preferred to return with the Spanish forces or remain in Louisiana; also to obtain from each parish an inventory of the plate, vestments, and church furniture, which he said had been saved by the Spanish Government. Then came the news of the cession of the province to the United States. On 30 April, 1803, De Laussat formally surrendered the colony to the United States commissioners. The people felt it keenly, and the cathedral archives show the difficulties to be surmounted. Father Hasset, as administrator, issued a letter to the clergy on 10 June, 1803, announcing the new domination and notifying all the permission to return to Spain if they desired. Several priests signified their desire to follow the Spanish standard. The question of withdrawal was also discussed by the Ursuline Nuns. Thirteen out of the twenty-one choir nuns were in favour of returning to Spain or going to Havana. De Laussat went to the cathedral, and found that it was in itself without molestation. Notwithstanding this Mother St. Monica and eleven others, with nearly all the lay sisters applied to the Marquis de Casa Calvo to convey them to Havana. Six choir nuns and two lay sisters remained to begin again the work in Louisiana. They elected Mother St. Xavier Fargeon as superioress, and resumed all the exercises of community, maintaining their academy, day school, orphan asylum, hospital and instructions for coloured people in catechism. Father Hasset wrote to Bishop Carroll, 23 December, 1803, that the retrocession of the province to the United States of America impelled him to present to his consideration the present ecclesiastical state of Louisiana, and the problems that were arising in his jurisdiction. The ceded province consisted of twenty-one parishes some of which were vacant, the churches were, to use his own words, "all decent temples and comfortably supplied with ornaments and everything necessary for divine services, i.e., of twenty-six ecclesiastics in the province only four had agreed to continue their residence stations under the French Government; and whether any more would remain under that of the United States only God knew." Father Hasset said that for his own part he felt that he could not with propriety, relinquish his post, and consequently awaited superior orders to take his departure. He said that the Rev. Patrick Walsh, vicar-general and auxiliary governor of the diocese, had declared that he would not abandon his post providing he could hold it with propriety. Father Hasset died in April 1804. Father Antonio Sedella had returned to New Orleans in 1794, and resumed his duties as parish priest of the St. John cathedral, which he had been appointed by Bishop Carroll. After the cession a dispute arose between him and Father Walsh, and the latter, 27 March, 1805, established the Ursuline Convent as the only place in the parish for the administration of the sacraments and the celebration of the Divine Office. On 21 March, 1804, the Ursuline nuns besought the Rev. Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, in which he predicted the passage of an Act of Congress guaranteeing their property and rights. The president replied reassuring the Ursulines, "The principles of the constitution of the United States," he wrote, "are a sure guaranty to you that it will be preserved to you sacred and inviolate, and that your Institution will be preserved independent of the laws of the government it is under. Be assured that it will meet with all the protection your office can give it."

Father Walsh, administrator of the diocese, died on 22 August, 1806, and was buried in the Ursuline chapel. The Archdiocesan See of Santo Domingo, the metropolis of the province, to which the Diocese of Louisiana was joined a few years before, and by which the French had been invested, assumed one of the bishops of the Spanish province would interfere in the New Orleans Diocese, though the Bishop of Havana extended his authority once more over the Florida portion of the diocese. As the death of Father Walsh left the diocese without any one to govern it, Bishop Carroll, who had meanwhile informed himself of the condition of affairs, resolved to act under the decree of 1 Sept., 1806, and assuming jurisdiction, Father Antoine had been openly accused of intriguing against the Government; but beyond accusations made to Bishop Carroll there is nothing to substantiate them. He was much loved in New Orleans and some of his friends desired to obtain the influence of the French Government to have him appointed to the Bishop of Louisiana, but Bishop Carroll wrote to the new Orleans cathedral a letter from Father Antoine to the Bishop of Baltimore declaring that having heard that some members of the clergy and laity had applied to Rome to have him appointed to the Bishopric of Louisiana, he hereby declared to the Bishop of Baltimore that he could not consider the proposition, that he was anxious to do our duty and to do any good. He would be grateful to the bishop if he would cut short any further efforts in that direction.

Bishop Carroll wrote to James Madison, secretary of State (17 November, 1806) in regard to the Church in Louisiana, and the recommending of two or three clergymen one of whom might be appointed Bishop of New Orleans. He declared that he would not recommend any being purely ecclesiastical the Government could not interfere. He seemed, however, to share the opinions of Bishop Carroll in regard to the character and rights of Father Antoine. In 1806 a decree of the Propaganda confided Louisiana to the care of Bishop Carroll of Baltimore, and created him administrator Apostolic. He appointed Rev. John Olivier (who had been Cabildo until 1803), Vice-General of Louisiana and chaplain of the Ursuline Nuns at New Orleans. Father Olivier presented his documents to the Governor of Louisiana, and also wrote to Father Antoine Sedella apprising him of the action of the Propaganda. Father Antoine called upon Father Olivier, but he was not satisfied as to Bishop Carroll's authorization. The vicar-general published the decree and the bishop’s letter at the convent chapel. The Rev. Thomas Flynn wrote from New Orleans to Bishop Carroll on 5 November, 1827, that the trustees were going to install him. He describes the new building as good one with a tolerably good bell, a high altar, and commodious pews. The house for the priest was convenient but in need of repair. Except Rev. Father Maxwell there was scarcely a priest in Upper Louisiana in 1807.

For the origin of the decree issued by the Holy See to Bishop Carroll had not been so distinct and clear as to obviate objections, he applied to the Holy See asking that more ample and distinct authorization be sent. The Holy See placed the Province of Louisiana under Bishop Carroll who was requested to send to the New Orleans Diocese either Rev. Charles Nerinckx or some secular or regular priest, with the rank of administrator apostolic and the vicar-general, and to continue only at the good will of the Holy See according to instructions to be forwarded by the Propaganda. Bishop Carroll did not act immediately, but on 18 August, 1812, appointed the Rev. Louis G. V. Dubourg administrator apostolic of the Diocese of Louisiana and the two Floridas. Dr. Dubourg’s authority was at once recognized by the Archbishop of Bordeaux, the remainder of the clergy. The war between the United States and Great Britain was in progress and as the year 1814 drew to a close, Dr. Dubourg issued a pastoral letter calling upon the people to pray for the success of the American arms. During the battle of New Orleans (8 January, 1815) Gen. Andrew Jackson sent a messenger to the Vicar-General to ask his prayers for his success. When victory came he sent a courier thanking the sisters for their prayers, and he decreed a public thanksgiving; a solemn high Mass was celebrated in the St. Louis Cathedral, 23 January, 1815. The condition of religion in the diocese was not encouraging, seven out of fourteen parishes were vacant. Father Menard was appointed, and Dr. Dubourg went to Rome to ask for a priest. There the Propaganda appointed him bishop, 18 September, 1818, and on 24 September he was consecrated by Cardinal Joseph Pamphili (see Dubourg).

Bishop Dubourg proposed the division of the diocese and the erection of a see in Upper Louisiana, but the news of troubles among the clergy in New Orleans and the necessity of obtaining the right to deprive the bishop of his cathedral so alarmed him that he solicited the Propaganda to allow him to take up his residence in St. Louis and establish his seminary and other educational institutions there. He sailed from Bordeaux for New Orleans (26 June, 1817), accompanied by five priests, four subdeacons, eleven seminarians, and three Christian Brothers. He took possession of the church at St. Genevieve, a ruined wooden structure, and was installed by Bishop Flaget. He then established the Lazarist Seminary at Bois Brule ("The Barrens"), and brought from Bardstown, where they were temporarily sojourning, Father Andries, Father Rosati, and the seminarians, and installed them in the seminary at St. Genevieve. The Brothers of the Christian Doctrine opened a boys’ school at St. Genevieve. At his request the Religious of the Sacred Heart, comprising Misses Marie, Julienne, Jeremie, and a number of lay sisters reaching New Orleans, 30 May, 1818, succeeded to St. Louis and opened their convent at the same time. Upon his return to New Orleans, 1821, Bishop Dubourg held the first synod since the progress of Louisiana. Where he had found ten superannuated priests there were now forty active, zealous men at work. Still appeals came from all parts of the immense and divided diocese for priests, and the whole of the difficulties of the diocese were shown in a letter from the banks of the Columbia in Oregon begging him to send a priest to minister to 1500 Cathonies there who had never had any one to attend to them. The Ursuline Nuns, frequently annoyed by being summoned to court, appealed to the Legis dature blaming the clergy for the treatment under the French and Spanish dominations. Their civil rights were recognized and a law was passed, 28 January, 1818, enacting that where the testimony of a nun was required it should be taken at the convent by commission. It had a far-reaching effect in later days upon legislation in the United States in similar cases. Spain by treaty ceded Florida to the United States, 22 February, 1818, and Bishop Dubourg was then able to extend his episcopal care to that part of his diocese, the vast extent of which prompted him to form plans for the erection of a metropolitan see west of the Alleghanies. This did not meet with the approval of the bishops of the United States; he then proposed to divide the Diocese of Louisiana and the Floridas, establishing a see at New Orleans embracing Lower Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Florida. Finally, 13 August, 1822, the Vicar Apostolic of Mississippi and Alabama was formed with the Rev. Joseph Rosati, elected Bishop of Tenagra, as vicar Apostolic. But Archbishop Marechal of Baltimore reneged because in establishing this vicariate the Propaganda had inaugurated St. Louis as the see of the Archbishop of Baltimore as the whole of those States except a small portion south of the thirty-first degree between Perdido and Pearl River belonged to the Diocese of Baltimore. Bishop Rosati also wrote representing the poverty and paucity of the Catholics in Missouri and Alabama, and the necessity of a bishop remaining at the head of the seminary. Finally his arguments and the protests of the Archbishop of Balti

tcr removed, and the Holy See suppressed the vi cariate, appointing Dr. Rosati coadjutor to Bishop Dubourg to reside at St. Louis. Bishop Rosati was consecrated by Bishop Dubourg, at Donaldsonville, 25 March, 1824, at the house of Father Menard. In 1823 Bishop Dubourg took up the subject of the Indian Missions and laid before the Government the necessity of a plan for the civilization and conversion of the Indians west of the Mississippi. His plan met with the approval of the Government and an allowance of $200 a year was assigned to four or five missionaries, the increased if that project proved successful.

On 29 August, 1825, Alabama and the Floridas were erected into a vicariate Apostolic, with the Rev. Michael Portier the first bishop. The Holy See divided the Diocese of Louisiana (18 July, 1826) and established the Sec of New Orleans with Louisiana as its diocese, and the Vicar Apostolic of Mississippi as the vicariate appointed the Bishop of New Orleans. The country north of Louisiana was made the Diocese of St. Louis, Bishop Rosati being transferred to that see, Bishop Dubourg, though a man of vast projects and of great service to the Church, was little versed in business methods; discouraged at the difficulties that rose to thwart him he resigned his see and was transferred to Montana, where he was appointed Bishop of the Sec of New Orleans, declined the appointment urging that his knowledge of English qualified him to labour better in Missouri, Illinois, and Arkansas, while he was not sufficiently versed in French to address the people of New Orleans with success. On 20 March, 1827, the papal Brief arrived permitting him to re maintain in St. Louis but charging him for a while with the administration of the Diocese of St. Louis. He appointed the Rev. Leo Raymond de Necker, C.M., vicar-general, and strongly recommended his ap dtment for the vacant see. Father de Necker, then in Belgium whether he had gone to recuperate his health, was summoned to Rome and appointed bishop. Returning to New Orleans, 20 May, 1830, he was installed in the See of New Orleans. Bishop de Necker was born, 6 June, 1800, at Wevelghem, Belgium, and while a seminarian at Ghent, was accepted for the Diocese of New Orleans.
by Bishop Dubourg. He joined the Lazarists and was ordained in St. Louis, Missouri, 13 October, 1822. On 23 February, 1832, he convoked a synod attended by twenty-one priests. Regulations were promulgated for better discipline and steps were taken to form an association for the dispensation of good literature among the young Americans who were now pouring into New Orleans. The ancient French limits had long since disappeared. Such was the enterprise on all sides that in 1830 New Orleans ranked in importance immediately after New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. It was the greatest cotton and sugar market in the world. Irish emigration also set in, and a church for the English-speaking people was necessary. The old Ursuline chapel were the only places of worship in New Orleans. A site was bought on Camp Street near Julia, a frame church, St. Patrick's, was erected and dedicated on 21 April, 1833. Rev. Adam Kindel was the pastor of this, the first English-speaking congregation of New Orleans. The foundation of this parish estopitated the first secular acts of the Clergy. The year was one of sickness and death. Cholera and yellow fever raged. The priests were kept busy day and night, and the vicar general, Father B. Richard, and Fathers Martial, Tichotol, Kindeloff victims to their zeal. Bishop de Neveere, who had retired to a convent at Convent, La., in hope of restoring his health to his health, was hastened to return by the decision of the outbreak of the epidemic, and began visiting and ministering to the plague-stricken. Soon he too was seized with fever and succumbed ten days later, 5 September, 1833. Just before the bishop's death there arrived in New Orleans a priest who was destined to exercise for many years an influence upon the life and progress of the Church. He was an ordained secular priest, Ignatius Mullin; he was immediately appointed to the vacant rectorship of St. Patrick's. Upon the death of Bishop de Neveere, Fathers Anthony Blane and V. Lavadiere, S.J., became the administrators of the diocese.

In November, undismayed by the epidemic which continued, a band of Sisters of Charity set out from Emmitsburg to take charge of the Charity Hospital. The nuns had come into the diocese about 1832 to assume the direction of the Peydras Asylum, erected by Julian Peydras, a Huguenot. Seven of the new colony from Emmitsburg were sent to the Asylum and ten to the Charity Hospital. Bishop de Neveere had invited the Tertiary Sisters of Mount Carmel to make a foundation in New Orleans. A convent and school were erected in 1833, a convent school and orphanage being opened.

Father Augustine Jeanjean was selected by Rome to fill the episcopal vacancy, but he declined and Father Anthony Blane was appointed and consecrated on 22 November, 1835 (see BLANC, ANTHONY). Bishop Blane knew the great want of the diocese, the need of priests, whose ranks had been decimated by age, persecution, and overwork. To meet this want Bishop Blane asked the Jesuits to establish a college in Louisiana. They arrived on 22 January, 1837, and opened a college at Grand Coteau on 5 January, 1838. He then invited the Lazarists and on 20 December, 1838, they arrived and set out to open a diocesan seminary at St. Martinville. In 1839, Julian Peydras having died, the Asylum which he founded passed entirely under Presbyterian auspices, and the Sisters of Charity being compelled to relinquish the direction, St. Patrick's Orphan Asylum, now New Orleans Female Orphan Asylum, was founded and placed under their care.

In 1841 the Sisters Marisantes of Holy Cross came to take charge of the Peydras Orphan Boys' Asylum. The convent also acted as an academy for young ladies and the Orphanage of the Immaculate Conception for girls. Among the comforts of the colored people, the nuns also deeply concerned Bishop Blane, and he worked assiduously for the proper spiritual care of the slaves. After the insurrection of San Domingo in 1793 a large number of free coloured people from that island who were slave-holders themselves took refuge in New Orleans. Thus was created a free colored population among which successive epidemics played havoc leaving aged and orphans to be cared for. According to Bishop Blanc the Bishop of Rome, M. P. Kossel, V.G., founded the Sisters of the Holy Family, whose duty was the care of the coloured orphans and the aged coloured poor. It was the first colored sisterhood founded in the United States, and one of the only two that exist.

Bishop Blanc planned the erection of new parishes in the City of New Orleans, and the houses of the Holy Ammunation were founded in 1831. The foundation of these parishes greatly diminished the congregation of the cathedral and the trustees seeing their influence waning entered upon a new war against religion. Upon the death of Father Aloysius Moni, Bishop Blane appointed Father C. Maehaut rector of the cathedral, but the wardens refused to recognize his appointment. The trustees then erected in 1832 as part of the cathedral parish. Under this ordinance Rev. Bernard Pernol was prosecuted. The old chapel had long outlived its purpose, and on 19 December, 1842, Judge Prevot decided the ordinance illegal and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained its decision. The faithful of St. Patrick's parish having publicly protested against the unauthorized proceedings, the tide of public opinion set in strongly against the men who thus defied all church authority. In January, 1843, the latter submitted and received the parish priest appointed by the bishop. Soon after the faithful Catholics of the city petitioned the Legislature to amend the Act incorporating the cathedral, and bring it into harmony with ecclesiastical discipline. In 1846, in the session of that year the Legislature felt that he could not treat with the wardens as they defied his authority by authorizing the erection of a monument to Freemasons in the Catholic cemetery of St. Louis. To free the faithful, he therefore continued to plan for the organization of parishes and the erection of new churches. Only one low Mass was said at the cathedral, and that on Sunday. Bishop Blane convened the third synod of the diocese on 21 April, at which the clergy were warned against yielding to the illegal claims of trustees, and the erection of any church without a deed being first made to the bishop was forbidden. For the churches in which the trustees system still existed special regulations were made, governing the fining of keeping accounts. At the close of 1844 the trustees, defeated in the courts and held in contempt by public opinion throughout the diocese, yielded completely to Bishop White.

This controversy terminated, a period of remarkable activity in the organization of parishes and the building of new churches. In 1848, the Church of St. Mary's, intended to replace the old Ursuline chapel attached to the bishop's house, was laid on 16 Feb., 1846; that of St. Joseph's on 16 April, 1846; that of the Ammunation on 10 May, 1846. The Redemptorists founded the parish of the Assumption, and were installed in its church on 22 Oct., 1847. The parish of Mater Dolorosa at Carrollton (then a suburb) was founded on 8 Sept.; that of the Holy Name of Mary at Algiers on 13 Dec., 1818. In 1819 St. Stephen's parish was founded in the then suburb of Bouligny under the Lazarist Fathers and Sts. Peter and Paul came to existence. The corner-stone of the Redemptorist church of St. Alphonsus was laid by Bishop Ursuline, Father Theobald Mathew, on 11 April, 1850; two years later it was found necessary to enlarge this church, and a school was added. In 1851 the foundation-stone of the church of the Immaculate Conception was laid, on the site of a humble edifice erected in 1818. This is said to have been the first church in the city dedicated to the Immaculate Conception. The parishes of St. John the Baptist in the uptown and of St. Anne in the French quarter were organized in 1852.

The French congregation of Notre-Dame de Bon Secours was organized on 16 Jan., 1858. In the midst of great progress yellow fever broke out and five priests and two Sisters of Charity swelled the roll of martyrs. The devoted services of the Sisters of Charity, especially during the ravages of the yellow fever, in attending the sick and caring for the orphans were so highly appreciated by the Legislature that in 1816 the State made them a grant of land near Donaldsville for the opening of a novitiate, and a general subsidy was voted throughout the diocese for this purpose. The sisters established themselves in Donaldsville the same year.

In 1813, anxious to provide for the wants of the increasing German and Irish emigration, Bishop Blanc had summoned the Congregation of the Redemptorists to the diocese and the German parish of St. Mary's. Another was founded by Rev. Czackert of that congregation. In 1817 the work of the Society of Jesus in the diocese, which had been temporarily suspended, was resumed under Father Maisonneuve as superior, and a college building was started on 10 June. In the following year Father Maisonneuve and a brilliant young Irish associate, Father Blackney, fell victims to yellow fever. The population of New Orleans now numbered over fifty thousand, among whom were many German immigrants. Bishop Blanc turned over the old Ursuline chapel to the Germans of the lower portion of the city, and a church was erected, which finally resulted in the foundation of the Holy Trinity parish on 25 October, 1817. In 1819 the College of St. Paul and St. Peter, under Bishop Blanc was erected, and St. Charles College became a corporate institution with Rev. A. J. Jourdan, S. J., as president. In 1829 Bishop Blanc attended the Seventh Council of Baltimore at which the bishops expressed their desire that the See of New Orleans be raised to metropolitan rank. On 19 July, 1850, Pius X established the Archdiocese of New Orleans, Bishop Blanc being chosen to the archiepiscopal dignity. The Province of New Orleans was to embrace New Orleans with Mobile, Natchez, Little Rock, and Galveston as suffragans sees. The spirit of Know-Nothingism invaded New Orleans as other parts of the United States, and Archbishop Blanc found himself in the thick of the battle. Public debates were held, contests were set up, and young men were enlisted in crushing the efforts of the party in Louisiana being the Iton. Thos. J. Semmes, a distinguished advocate, Rev. Francis Xavier Leray and Rev. N. J. Perche, both afterwards Archbishop of New Orleans. Father Perche founded (1841) a French diocesan journal "Le Propaganda Catholique", which vigorously called the Know-Nothings to order. On 6 June a mob attacked the office of the paper, and also made a fierce attack on the Ursuline Convent, breaking doors and windows and hurling insults at the nuns.

In 1853 New Orleans was desolated by the worst epidemic of yellow fever in its history, seven priests and five sisters being among its victims. On 6 March, 1854, the School Sisters of Notre Dame arrived in New Orleans to take charge of St. Joseph's Asylum, founded to furnish homes for those orphaned by the epidemic. St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum was also opened as a home for foundlings and infant orphans, and entrusted to the Sisters of Charity. On 29 July, 1853, the Holy See elevated the diocese of New Orleans, which at that time embraced all Louisiana and established the See of Natchitoches (q. v.). The new diocese contained about twenty-five thousand Catholics, chiefly a rural population, for whom there were only seven churches. The Convent of the Sacred Heart at Natchitoches was the only religious institution in the new diocese. In 1855 Archbishop Blanc went to Rome and was present at the solemn definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. In his report to the Propaganda he describes his diocese as containing forty quasi-parishes, each with a church and one or two priests and a residence for the clergy; the city had eighteen churches. The diocese had a seminary under the Priests of the Mission with an average of nine students; the religious orders at work were the Jesuits with three establishments, Priests of the Mission with three, and Redemptorists with two. The Catholic population of 95,000 was made up of natives of French, Spanish, Irish, or American origin, French, Germans, Spaniards, and Italians. Distinctive Catholic schools were increasing. The Convent of the Sacred Heart, Sisters of Holy Charity, Mariniennes of the Holy Cross, Tertiary Carmelites, School Sisters of Notre Dame, and the Coloured Sisters of the Holy Family were doing excellent work. Many abuses had crept in especially with regard to marriage, but after the erection of new churches with smaller parochial schools the situation had improved, and the frequentation of the sacraments was increasing.

In 1855 the Fathers of the Congregation of the Holy Cross came to New Orleans to establish a manual industrial school for the training of the orphan boys who had been rendered homeless by the terrible epidemic of 1853. They established themselves in the lower St. Mary's district, and the school acquired an average of nine students; it was increased to seventy and the frequentation of the sacraments was increasing.

In 1857 they opened their college, which is now one of the leading institutions of Louisiana. On 20 January, 1856, the First Provincial Council of New Orleans was held, and in January, 1858, Archbishop Blanc held the fourth diocesan synod. In 1859 the Sisters of the Sacred Heart opened a school for the education of New Orleans to open a reformatory for girls. Bishop Blanc opened another diocesan seminary in the same year, and placed it in charge of the Lazarist Fathers. He convoked the second provincial council on 22 January, 1860. Just before the second session opened he was taken so seriously ill that he could no longer attend the meetings and was compelled to resign his usual health, but he died 20 June following.

Right Rev. John Mary Odin, Bishop of Galveston, was appointed successor to Archbishop Blanc, and arrived in New Orleans on the Feast of Pentecost, 1861. The Civil War had already begun and excitement was intense. All the prudence and charity of the archbishop were needed to preserve peace and maintain discipline, Archbishop Odin found it necessary on 1 January, 1863, to issue regulations regarding the recklessness and carelessness that had prevailed in the temporal management of the churches, the indecency of which had been compelled to assume they from bankruptcy. The regulations were not well received at first, but the Bishop visited Rome entering in the spring of 1863, when he had obtained the approval of the Holy See for his course of action. It was not till some time later that through his charity and zeal he obtained the cordial support he desired. His appeals for priests while in Europe were not heeded and early in 1863 forty seminarians and five Ursulines arrived with Bishop Dr.
buis of Galveston. Among the priests were Fathers Gustave A. Rouxel, later Auxiliary Bishop of New Orleans under Archbishop Chapelle, Thomas Hesslin, afterwards Bishop of Natchez, and J. R. Bogart, vicar-general under Archbishop Janssens. In 1800 the Dominicans from Cabra, Ireland, came to New Orleans and took charge of St. John the Baptist Church and open an academy. In 1854 the Sisters of Mercy came to the city to assume charge of St. Alphonsus’ School and Asylum and open a convent and boarding-school, and the Marists were offered the Church of St. Michael at Convent, La. On 12 July, 1864, they assumed charge of Jefferson College founded by the Sisters of Mercy in Galveston. In 1878, Bishop Odin petitioned the Holy See to establish a diocese. The diocese was incorpored on 15 August, 1866, the legal name and title being “The Roman Catholic Church of the Diocese of New Orleans”. In 1867 during a terrible epidemic of yellow fever and cholera, Fathers Spiessberger and Sebos of the Redemptorists died of charity. Father Sebos was re-established a seminary and in 1888 the latter institution has been introduced in Rome (1905). In 1896, owing to financial trials throughout the South, the diocesan seminary was closed. In February, 1868, Archbishop Odin founded “The Morning Star” as the official organ of the Archdiocese, which it has continued to be to date.

During the nine years of Bishop Odin’s administration he nearly doubled the number of his clergy and churches. He attended the Council of the Vatican, but was obliged to leave Rome on the entry of the Garibaldian troops. His health was broken and he returned to his native home, Amherle, France, where he died on 25 May, 1870. He was born on 25 February, 1801, and entered the Lazarists. He came as a novice to their seminary, the Barrens, in St. Louis, where he completed his theological studies and received ordination (see GALVESTON, DIOCESE OF). He was an excellent administrator and left his diocese free from debt.

Archbishop Odin was succeeded by the Rev. Napoleon Joseph Perche, born at Angers, France, January, 1815. He completed his studies at the Seminary of Beauvau, was ordained on 19 September, 1839, and sent to Murr near Angers where he worked zealously. In 1837 he came to America with Bishop Flaget and was appointed pastor of Portland. He came to New Orleans with Bishop Blaiz in 1841, and he soon became famous in Louisiana for his zeal and learning. Archbishop Odin petitioned Rome for the elevation of Father Perche as his coadjutor with the right of succession. His request was granted and, on 1 May, 1870, Father Perche was consecrated in the cathedral of New Orleans titular Bishop of Abdera. He was promoted to the see on 25 May, 1870. One of his first acts was the re-establishment of the diocesan seminary. The Benedictine Nuns were received into the diocese in 1870.

The Congregation of the Immaculate Conception, a diocesan sisterhood, was founded in the year 1873 by Father Cyprian Venissat, at Labadieville, to afford education and assistance to the children of families impoverished by the war. In 1875 the Poor Clares of Covington, La., made a foundation which on 25 November, 1877, was received into the Congregation of the Discalced Carmelites of St. Louis. The Sisters of St. Joseph from Galveston, Texas, undertook the care of the infirm and aged in New Orleans. In 1876 the Holy Cross Fathers opened a college in the lower portion of the city. Owing to the financial difficulties it was necessary to close the diocesan seminary in 1881. Archbishop Perche was a great scholar, but he lacked administrative ability. In his desire to relieve Southern families ruined by the war, he gave to all largely and royally, and thus plunged the diocese into a debt of over $600,000. He was growing very feeble and an application was made to Rome for a coadjutor.

Bishop Francis Xavier Lery of Natchitoches was transferred to the see of Natchez. Wilfrid A. Lamy, administrator of affairs on 23 October, 1879, and at once set to work to liquidate the immense debt. It was during the administration of Archbishop Perche and the coadjutorship of Bishop Lery that the Board of Trustees of the cathedral which formerly had caused so much trouble passed out of existence in July, 1881, and was transformed into a corporation. Father Lamy became Bishop Perche and Bishop Lery jointly, for the benefit and use of the Catholic population. Archbishop Lery was born at Châtel-sur-l’Eau, Brittany, France, 20 April, 1825. He responded to the appeal for priests for the Diocese of Louisiana in 1843, and completed his theological studies at the Sulpician seminary in Baltimore. He accompanied Bishop Chanele to Natchez and was ordained by him on 31 January, 1846. He was a most active missionary in the Mississippi district and in 1860 when pastor of Vicksburg he brought the Sisters of Mercy from Baltimore to establish a school there. Several times during his years of activity as a priest he was stricken with yellow fever.

During the Civil War, he served as a Con- federate chaplain; and on several occasions he was taken prisoner by the Federal forces but released as soon as the sacred character of his office was established. On the death of Bishop Martin he was appointed to the See of Natchitoches, and consecrated on 22 April, 1877, at Rennes, France; on 23 October, 1879, he was transferred to the bishopric of New Orleans and Bishop of Galveston, His most difficult task was the bringing of financial order out of chaos and reducing the enormous debt of the diocese. In this he met with great success. During his administration the debt was reduced by at least $300,000. His health, however, became impaired, and he died at Galveston, 25 September, 1887.

The see remained vacant for nearly a year, Very Rev. G. A. Rouxel administering the affairs of the diocese, until the Right Rev. Francis Janssens, Bishop of Natchez, was promoted to fill the vacancy on 7 August, 1888, and took possession on 16 September, 1888. Archbishop Janssens was born at Tilburg, Holland, on 17 October, 1833. At the age of 21, on his studies in the seminary at Bois-le-Duc; he remained there ten years, and in 1866 entered the American College at Louvain, Belgium. He was ordained on 21 December, 1866, and arranged to come to America. He arrived at Richmond in September, 1868, and became pastor of the cathedral in 1870. He was Administrator of the Diocese, and then Bishop of the Right Rev. James (later Cardinal) Gibbons to the vacant see; Bishop Gibbons appointed him vicar-general, and five years later when he was appointed to the Archiepiscopal See of Baltimore, Father Janssens became again administrator of the diocese. On 7 April, 1881, the See of Natchez became vacant by the consecration of Right Rev. Wm. Elder as Archbishop of Cincinnati and Father Janssens succeeded. While Bishop of Natchez he completed the cathedral commenced forty years before by Bishop Chanele. Not the least of the difficulties that awaited him as Archbishop of New Orleans was the heavy indebtedness resting upon the see and the constant drain thus made on the purse of the clergy. The establishment of the diocesan seminary and the rapid growth of the population augmented the demand for priests. He at once called a meeting of the clergy and prominent citizens, and plans were formulated for the gradual liquidation of the debt of the diocese, which was founded to be $324,759. Before his death he had reduced it to about $130,000. Notwithstanding this burden, the diocese, through the zeal of Archbishop Janssens, entered upon a period of progress. He went to a conference in New Orleans in March, 1890, was to found a little seminary, which was opened at Ponchatoula, La., 3 September, 1891, and placed under the direction of the Benedictine Fathers. He went to Europe in 1889 to secure priests for the diocese and to arrange for the sale of bonds

American lines of the Antilles. He returned to New Orleans as archbishop, 1 July, 1906, and new life was infused into every department of religious and educational and charitable endeavour. Splendid new churches and schools were erected, especially in the coloured race. Among the new institutions were St. Joseph's Seminary and College at St. Benedict, La.; St. Charles College, Grand Coteau, built on the ruins of the old college destroyed by fire; Lake Charles Sanitarium; Marquette University; and the Seaman's Haven, where a chapel was opened for sailors. The new sistershoods admitted to the diocese were the Lazarist Fathers, who established the Institute of a sanitarium at Lake Charles; the Religious of Divine Providence in charge of the school in Broussardville; and the French Benedictine Sisters driven from France, who erected the new Convent of St. Gertrude at St. Benedict, La., destined as an industrial school for girls. A large industrial school and farm for children boys and the education of the Sisters of the Holy Family was opened in Gentilly Road, and two new parishes outlined for the exclusive care of the coloured race. In 1907, the seminary conducted by the Lazarist Fathers was closed and Archbishop Blank opened a preparatory seminary and placed it in charge of the Benedictine Fathers. The diocese is a member of the Congregation of St. Martin, the Chinese Missions of the Sisters of St. Joseph, which was established under Archbishop Janssen and is the only Catholic institute for deaf-mutes in the South. It is in charge of the School Sisters of Notre Dame.

New Orleans' priesthood, like the population of Louisiana, is cosmopolitan. The training of the priesthood has been conducted at home and abroad; the diocese owing much to the priests who came from France, Spain, Ireland, Germany, and Holland. Several efforts were made to establish a permanent seminary and recruit the ranks of the priesthood from the diocese itself. At various times also the diocese had students at St. Mary's and St. Charles Seminaries, Baltimore, the American College, Louvain, and has (since 1906) three theological students at the different seminaries in Europe and America. Each parish is incorporated and there are the corporate institutions of the Jesuits and other religious communities. The houses of study for religious are the Jesuit scholasticate at Grand Coteau, and the Benedictine scholasticate of St. Benedict at St. Benedict, La. The Poor Clares, dissolved at St. Martinville, the Children of Charity, the Metis of Marianistes of the Holy Cross, Ursuline Nuns, Religious of the Sacred Heart, Sisters of St. Joseph, Sisters of Perpetual Adoration, Sisters of the Immovable Conception, Sisters of the Holy Family (coloured), Sisters of Mount Carmel, have mother-houses with novitiates in New Orleans. In early days there were distinct parishes in New Orleans for French, English, and German-speaking Catholics, but with the growing diffusion of the English language these parish lines have disappeared. In all the churches where necessary, there are French, English, and German sermons and instructions; there are churches and chapels for Italian emigrants and Hungarians, a German settlement near Rayne, domestic missions for negroes under the charge of the Holy Family Sisters and Josephite Fathers and Lazarists at New Orleans and Bayou Petite, Prairie.

The educational system is well organized. The principal institutions are: the diocesan normal school; the Marquette University under the care of the Jesuits; 7 colleges and academies with high school education; 9 giving college courses; 9 conducting business for young ladies, under the direction of religious communities, with 2201 students; 102 parishes with parochial schools having an attendance of 20,000 pupils; 117 orphan asylums with 1341 orphans; 1 infant asylum with 161 infants; 1 industrial school for whites with 90 inmates; 1 industrial school for coloured orphan boys; 1 deaconate asylum with 40 inmates; 3 hospitals; 2 homes for the aged white, and 1 for the aged coloured poor; 1 house of the Good Shepherd for the reform of wayward girls; a Seaman's Haven. The state asylums for the blind, etc., hospitals, prisons, reformatories, almshouses, and secular homes for incurables, consumptives, convalescents, etc., are all visited by Catholic priests, Sisters of Mercy, conferences of St. Vincent de Paul, and St. Margaret's Daughters. There is absolute freedom of worship. The first St. Vincent de Paul conference was organized in 1852.

The diocese has one Benedictine abbey (St. Joseph's), of the Right Rev. Rev. and Secular Canons, 125 secular priests, 123 priests in religious communities, making a total of 279 clergy; 133 churches with resident priests and 90 missions with churches, making a total of 223 churches; 55 stations and 42 chapels where Mass is said. The total Catholic population is 550,000; yearly baptisms include 15,155 white children, 223 negroes, 20,111 white children, and 354 coloured adults (total number of baptisms 18,873); the communions average 750,180; confirmations 11,215; converts, 817; marriages, 3533 (including 323 mixed). The large centres of church activity are the cities of New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Plaquemine, Donaldsonville, Thibodaux, Houma, Franklin, Bayou Lafourche, St. Martin, St. Charles, Morgan City, St. Martin, Crowley, Lake Charles. The churches and schools are all insured; an association for assisting infirm priests, the Priests' Aid Society, has been established and mutual aid and benevolent associations in almost every parish for the assistance of the laity. Assimilation is constantly going on among the different nationalities that come to New Orleans through intermarriage between Germans, Italians, French, and Americans, and thus is created a healthy civic sentiment that conduces to earnest and harmonious progress along lines of religion, charitable, educational, and social endeavour. The Catholic laity of the diocese is naturally largely represented in the life and government of the community, the population being divided 40 per cent whites, 35 per cent Catholics hold prominent civil positions, such as governor, mayor, and member of the Bar, State Legislature, and United States Congress. A Catholic from Louisiana, Edward D. White, has been recently (1910) appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Catholics are connected with the state normal schools, Catholic hospitals, schools, colleges, universities and public libraries, and are represented in the corps of professors, patrons, and pupils of the Louisiana State and Tulane universities. Three fourths of the teachers of the public schools of Louisiana are Catholics.

The laity take a very active interest in the religious life of the diocese. Every church and convent has its altar society for the care of the tabernacle, societies of the Blessed Virgin for young girls and women. The Holy Name Society for men, young and old, is established throughout the diocese, while conferences of St. Vincent de Paul are established in thirty churches. St. Margaret's Daughters, indulged like the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, has twenty-eight circles at New Orleans and the fraternal orders in many churches. Besides the Third Order of St. Francis, the diocese has confraternities of the Happy Death, the Holy Face, the Holy Rosary, and the Holy Agony; the Apostleship of Prayer is established in nearly all the churches, while many parishes have confraternities adapted to their special needs. The Catholic Knights of America and the Catholic War Veterans of the United States are firmly established, while the Holy Spirit Society, devoted to the defence of Catholic Faith, the diffusion of Catholic truth, and the establishment of churches and schools in wayside places, is doing noble work along church extension lines. Other societies are the Marquette League, the Society for the Propa-
New Pomerania, Vicariate Apostolic of—New Pomerania, the largest island of the Bismarck Archipelago, is separated from New Guinea by Dampier Strait, and extends from 148° to 152° E. long., and from 4° to 7° S. lat. It is about 348 miles long, from 12½ to 20½ miles broad, and has an area of 9650 sq. miles. Two geographical regions are distinguishable. Of the northeastern section (known as the Gazelle Peninsula) a great portion is occupied by wooded mountain chains; otherwise (especially about Blanche Bay) the soil is very fertile and admirably watered by rivers (e.g. the Torin and Kerawat), which yield an abundance of fish. The white population is practically confined to the northern part of this section, in which the capital, Herbertshohe, is situated. The western and larger section also has extensive mountain chains, which contain numerous active volcanoes.

The natives are finely built, coffee brown in colour, half regular face to the upper lip, where well cared for as at the mission stations, approach the European standard, though their lips are somewhat thick and the mouth half or wide open. While resembling the southeastern Papuans, they use weapons unknown to the latter—e.g. the slung, in the use of which they possess marvellous dexterity, skilfully inserting the sharp ends. They live in bark huts, and are subject to the constant feuds raging among them. One of their strongest institutions is their money (devarra), composed of small cowrie shells threaded on a piece of cane. The difficulty of procuring these shells, which are found only in very deep water, accounts for the value set on them. The unit is a fathom (the length of an arm). They have no chiefs; an individual's importance varies according to the amount of devarra he possesses, but the final decision for peace or war rests with the tribe. This entire absence of authority among the natives is a great obstacle in the way of government. The natives are very superstitious; a demon resides in every tree, and marks its distaste by throwing fire against the people. To propitiate the evil spirits, a piece of devarra is always placed in the grave with the corpse.

The celebrated institution of the Duk-Duk is simply a piece of imposture, by which the older natives play upon the superstitions of the younger to secure the food they can no longer earn. This institution (a native name for 'long hair') plays regularly in a boat at night with the new moon, and receives the offerings of the natives. The standard of morality among the natives of New Pomerania is high compared with that observed in New Mecklenburg (the other large island of the Bismarck Archipelago), where the laxity of morals, especially rape suicide and the scant respect shown for marriage, seems destined rapidly to annihilate the population. In Nov., 1884, Germany proclaimed its protectorate over the New British Archipelago; New Britain and New Ireland were given the names of Neuquemoren and Neuquemarlenburg, and the whole group was renamed the Bismarck Archipelago. The great advantage of the island is its climate, a native or European being immune from the ravages of fever. The native population is estimated at about 100,000, the foreign population (1889) at 773

Newport (England). Diocese of (Neopolitanis).—This diocese takes its name from Newport, a town of about 70,000 inhabitants, situated at the mouth of the river Usk, in the county of Monmouth. Before the restoration of hierarchal government in England by Pius IX in 1850, the old "Western District" of the diocese, since 140, been divided into two vicariates. The northern, comprising the twelve counties of Wales with Monmouthshire and Herefordshire, was called the Vicariate of Wales. When the country was divided by an Apostolic Brief dated 29 Sept., 1850, into dioceses, the six counties of South Wales, with Monmouthshire and Herefordshire, became the Diocese of Newport and Menevia. Menevia is the Latin name for St. David's, and the double title was intended to signify that at some future day there were to be two distinct dioceses. The first bishop of the Diocese of Newport and Menevia was the Right Reverend Thomas Joseph Brown, O.S.B., who had already, as vicar Apostolic, ruled for ten years the Vicariate of Wales. A further re-adjustment of the diocese was made in March, 1895, when Leo XIII separated from it five of the counties of South Wales, and formed a new vicariate, which was to consist of all the twelve Welsh counties except Glamorganshire. Since that date the name of the diocese has been simply "Newport", and it has consisted of Glamorganshire, Monmouthshire, and Herefordshire. The Catholic population (1910) is about 13,500, the general population being about 1,050,000.

The diocesan church, in virtue of a Decree of the Congregation of Propaganda, 21 April, 1852, issued at the petition of Cardinal Wiseman and the rest of the hierarchy, was to consist of monks of the English Benedictine Congregation residing in the town of Newport. As the congregation, up to this date (1910), have not been able to establish a house in Newport, permission from the Holy See has been obtained for the members of the chapter to reside at St. Michael's pro-cathedral, Belmont, near Hereford. The chapter comprises a cathedral prior and nine canons, of whom four are allowed to be non-resident. Their choral habit is the cuculla or frock of the congregation with a special almsce. In assisting the bishop they dispense with the cuculla, and wear the almsce over the surplice. The present bishop, the Right Reverend John Cuthbert Hesley, O.S.B., was consecrated as auxiliary of Newport on 29 September, 1873, and succeeded in February, 1881, to Bishop Brown. He resides at Bishop's House, Llanishen, Cardiff. The pro-cathedral is the beautiful church of the Benedictine priory at Belmont. There in the diocese about 10 secular diocesan priests, 21 Benedictines (of whom 15 work on the Mission), and 14 Rosarian Fathers. There are five deaneries. The principal towns are Cardiff, Newport, Swansea, and Merthyr Tydfil. The only religious house of men is the Cathedral Priory, Belmont, which is the residence of the cathedral prior and chapter, and is also a house of studies and novitiate for the English Benedictines. 0f religious women there are houses of Poor Clares, Our Lady of Charity, and Good Shepherd, Sisters of Our Lady of Chavagnes, St. Joseph of Amaye, St. Vincent de Paul, and others. There are four certified Poor Law schools: one for boys, at Trefoist, and three for girls—two, at Hereford and Monmouth, and one, at Newport, conducted by the Sisters of Charity, one at Cardiff, conducted by the Sisters of Nazareth. There are 50 churches in the diocese, besides several school chapels and public oratories. There are about 11,000 children in the Catholic elementary schools. There are four secondary schools for girls, and one centre (in Cardiff) for female pupil teachers.

Newton, John, soldier and engineer, b. at Norfolk, Virginia, 24 August, 1823; d. in New York City, 1 May, 1895. He was the son of General Thomas Newton and Margaret Jordan. In 1838 he was appointed from Virginia a cadet in the U. S. Military Academy, and graduated in 1842, standing second in a class that included Rosecrans, Pope, and Longstreet. Commissioned second lieutenant of engineers, he was engaged as assistant professor of engineering at West Point, and later in the construction of fortifications and other engineering projects along the coasts of the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico. Commissioned first lieutenant in 1852 and promoted captain in 1856, he was appointed chief engine of cadets, and in 1858. At the opening of the Civil War he was chief engineer of the Department of Pennsylvania, and afterwards held a similar position in the Department of the Shenandoah. Commissioned major on 6 August, 1861, he worked on the construction of the defences of Washington until March, 1862. He was commissioned colonel 2 Sept., 1861, brigadier-general of volunteers, and received command of a brigade engaged in the defence of the city. He served in the army of the Potomac under McClellan during the Peninsula Campaign, and distinguished himself by his heroic conduct in the actions of West Point, Gaines Mills, and Glendale. He led his brigade in the Maryland campaign, taking part in the forcing of Crampton Gap and in the battle of Antietam, and was for his gallant services brevetted lieutenant-colonel. He died at Fredericksburg in the storming of Marye's Heights, and was rewarded on 20 March, 1863, with the rank of major-general of volunteers. He commanded divisions at Chancellorsville and Salem Heights, and, at the death of Reynolds on 2 July, 1863, was given command of the First Army Corps, which he led on the last two days of the battle of Gettysburg. On 3 July, 1863, for gallant service at Gettysburg, he was brevetted colonel of regulars. He engaged in the pursuit of the Confederate forces to Warrenton, Virginia, and towards the end of 1863 was active in the Rapidan Campaign. In May, 1864, he was transferred to the Army of the Cumberland, and commanded under Longstreet the Second Division of that army.

Commissioned lieutenant-colonel of engineers in the regular service on 28 December, 1865, Newton was ordered in April, 1866, to New York City, where he thenceforth resided, engaged on the engineering labours that made his name famous. He was superintendent of the construction of the defenses on the Long Island side of the Narrows, of the improvements of the Hudson River, and of the fortifications at Sandy Hook. He was also one of the board of engineers deputed to carry out the modifications of the defenses around New York City. The proposed enlargement of the Harlem River, and the improvements of the Hudson from Troy to New York, of the channel between the Highlands and the Sates Island, of the improvement of the harbours on Lake Champlain were put under his charge. On 30 June, 1879, he was named colonel, and on 6 March, 1884, chief of engineers in the regular service with the rank of brigadier-general. Among Newton's achievements, the most notable was the removal of the dangerous rocks in Hell Gate, the principal westward passage of Sound, and of Bird's Eye River. To accomplish this task successfully, required the solution of difficult engineering problems never before attempted, and the invention of new apparatus, notably a steam driving machine, which has since been in general use. Newton carefully studied the problem, and the accuracy of his conclusions was shortly afterwards confirmed by the experience of the result with the objects sought. Hallett's Reef and Flood Rock, having been carefully mind under his directions, were destroyed by two great explosions (24 September, 1876; 10 October, 1885). This engineering feat excited the universal admiration of engineers, and many honours were conferred upon him. On Newton's voluntary retirement in 1888, his Major Grace of New York, recognizing his superior skill, appointed him commissioner of public works on 28 August of that year. His health was so bad that he never recovered, and on 24 November, 1888, he died at his home in the West Side of New York.

New Year's Day.—The word year is etymologically the same as hour (Skoot), and signifies a going, a recurring. In Semitic, 3722 year, signifies repetition, or of the same kind; the circle of the year, or circle of the seasons. There was no necessary starting-point in the circle of the year, we find among different nations, and among the same at different epochs of their history, a great variety of dates with which the new year began. The opening of spring was a natural beginning, and in the Biblical text there is a close relationship between the beginning of the year and the seasons. The ancient Roman year began in March, but Julius Cæsar, in correcting the calendar (46 B.C.), made January the first month. Though this custom has been universally adopted among Christian nations, the names, September, October, November, and December (i.e. the seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth), remind us of the past, when March began the year. Christian ephemerides and counsels commended the heathen orgies and excesses connected with the festival of the Saturnalia, which were celebrated at the beginning of the year; Tertullian blames Christians who regarded the customary presents—called strena (Fr. drennes) from the goddess Strenia, who presided over New Year's Day (cf. Ovid, "Fasti," 1:52—90), and which were celebrated in various parts of the course (De Idol. xiv). But the end of the sixth century the Council of Auxerre (can. I) forbade Christians "strenas diabolicae observare." The II Council of Tours held in 589 (can. 17) prescribes prayers and a Mass of expiation for New Year's Day, adding that this is a practice long in use (patres nostri statuto). Dances and orgies connected with the new year were to be expiated by Christian fasts (St. Augustine, Serm., execvii-xiiii in P. L., XXXVIII, 1024; Isidore of Seville, "De Div. Off. Ecel.," I, xiii; Trullan Council, 892, can. xix). When Christmas was fixed on 25 Dec., New Year's Day was sanctified by commemorating it or the Communion, for which feast the Christian Sacrarium (Titus, "Antiquitates," 38:14) has determined. Christians did not wish to make the celebration of this feast very solemn, lest they might seem to countenance in any way the pagan extravagance of the opening year.

Among the Jews the first day of the seventh month, Tishri (end of September), began the civil or economic year "with the sound of trumpets" (Lev., xxiii, 21; Num., xxxix, 1). In the Bible the day is not mentioned as New Year's Day, but the Jews so regarded it, so named it, and so consider it now (Mishnah, Rosh Hash., I, 1). The sacred year began with Nisan (early in April), a later name for the Biblical abib, in a month of new wine and spring, and the month in which in the month of the Lord they in the month of the year, the moon is fixed for the Passover and the great Feast; "in this month the Lord thy God brought thee out of Egypt by night" (Deut., xvi, 1). Barley ripens in Palestine during the early part of April, and thus the sacred year began with the harvest, the civil year with the sowing of the crops. From Biblical data Josephus and many modern scholars hold that the twofold beginning of the year was pre-exilic, or even Mosaic (cf. "Antiq.", I, iii, 31). Since Jewish months were regulated by the moon, while the ripening barley of Nisan depended upon the sun, the Jews resorted to intercalation to bring sun and moon dates into harmony, and to keep the months in the seasons to which they belonged (for method of adjustment, see Ebersheim, "The Temple, Its Ministry and Services at the Time of Jesus Christ," xii).

Christian nations did not agree in the date of New Year's Day. They were not opposed to 1 January as the beginning of the year, but rather to the pagan extravagances which accompanied it. Evidently the natural opening of the year, the springtime, together with the Jewish opening, the sacred year, Nisan, suggested the propriety of putting the beginning in that beautiful season. Also, the Dionysian method (so named from the Abbot Dionysius, sixth century) of dating events from the coming of Christ became an important factor in New Year calculations. The Annunciation, with which Dionysius began the Christian era, was fixed on 25 March, and became New Year's Day for England, in early times and from the thirteenth century to 1 Jan., 1752, when the present custom was adopted. The reason why the New World (escially Germany) began with Christmas, thus being almost in harmony with the ancient Germans, who made the winter solstice their starting-point. Notwithstanding the movable character of Easter, France and the Low Countries took it as the first day of the year, while Russia, up to the eighteenth century, made September the New Year's Day. The western nations were since the sixteenth, or, at the latest, the eighteenth century, have adopted and retained the first of January.
In Christian liturgy the Church does not refer to the first of the year, any more than she does to the fact that the first Sunday of Advent is the first day of the ecclesiastical year.

In the United States of America the great feast of the Epiphany has ceased to be a holyday of obligation, but New Year continues in force. Since the mysteries of the Epiphany are commemorated on Christmas
—the Orientals consider the feasts one and the same in import—it was thought advisable to retain by prejudice, under the title "Circumcision of Our Lord Jesus Christ," New Year's Day as an obligation. The Fathers of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore petitioned Rome to this effect, and their petition was granted (Con. Plen. Bult., III., pp.
105 sqq.). (See Circumcision, Feast of the; Chronology; Christmas.)

New York. Archdiocese of (Neo-Eboracensis); see erected 8 April, 1808; made archiepiscopal 19 July, 1850; comprises the Boroughs of Manhattan, Bronx, and Richmond in the City of New York, and the Counties of Dutchess, Orange, Putnam, Rockland, Sullivan, Ulster, and Westchester in the State of New York; also the Bahamas Islands (British Possessions); and the whaling and trading stations on the New York and Bahama Islands.
The latter territory was placed in 1866 under this jurisdiction by the Holy See because the facilities of access were best from New York; it formerly belonged to the Diocese of Charleston. The suffragans of New York are the Dioceses of Albany, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Ogdensburg, Rochester, and Syracuse in the State of New York, and Newark and Trenton in New Jersey. All these, in 1808, made up the territory of the original diocese. The first division took place 23 April, 1847, when the creation of the Dioceses of Albany and Buffalo cut off the northern and western sections of the State; and the second, in 1853, when Brooklyn and Newark were created into separate dioceses.

New York is now the largest see in population, and the most important in influence and material prosperity of all the ecclesiastical divisions of the Church in Continental United States.

I. Colonial Period. Nearly a century before Henry Hudson sailed up the great river that bears his name, the Catholic navigators Verrazano and Gasparotta reached its shores, and made up their minds and planted it under the patronage of St. Anthony. The Calvinistic Hollanders, to whom Hudson gave this foundation for a new colony, manifested their loyalty to their state Church by ordaining that in New Netherland the "Reformed Christian religion ac-should be dominant. It is probable, but not certain, that there were priests with Verrazano and Gomez, and that from a Catholic altar went up the first prayer uttered on the site of the present great metrop-olises of the New World. While public worship by Catholics was not tolerated by the Dutch governor, William Kieft, and the people of New Amsterdam to the Jesuit martyr, Father Isaac Jogues, in 1643, and after him, to his brother Jesuits, Fathers Bressani and Le Moyne, must be remembered to their everlasting credit. Father Jogues was the first priest to traverse the State of New York; the first to plant a mission; the first to make a written report of New York. When he reached Manhattan Island, after his rescue from captivity in the summer of 1643,

he found there two Catholics, a young Irishman and a Portuguese woman, whose confessions he heard.

St. Mary's, the first rude chapel in which Mass was said in the State of New York, was begun, on 18
May, 1655, on Manhattan Island, the City of Syracuse now stands, by the Jesuit missionaries, Fathers Claude Dablon and Pierre Chaumonot.
In the same year another Jesuit, Father Simon Le Moyne, journeyed down the river to New Amsterdam, and from a letter sent by the Dutch preacher, Megapolensis (a renegade Catholic), to the papal Legate, the Jesuits were permitted to return to New York. He had visited Manhattan "on account of the Papists residing here, and especially for the accommodation of the French sailors, who are Papists and who have arrived here with a good price." The Church had no foothold on Manhattan Island until after 1664, when the Duke of York claimed it for an English colony.
Twenty years later, the Catholic governor, Thomas Dongan, not only fostered his own faith, but enacted the first law passed in New York establishing religious liberty. It is believed that the first Mass said on the island (30 October, 1683) was in a chapel he opened about where the custom house now stands. With him came three English Jesuits, Fathers Thomas Harvey, Henry Harrison, and Charles Gage, and they were soon followed by a number of other missionary Jesuits, among whom were these five: Father Henry Callicot, the first to visit the Mohawk.
From this time on the Langhorne family, who were Catholic by birth, were held in high esteem by all, with the result that the Jesuits at New York had a favorable and not unnatural bias for the converts. The notoriety of Father Le Moyne, who had visited Manhattan and warned theenties not to go there, caused a common superstitious belief to be entertained about the Island, and Father Peter Kalmius, in 1698, was appointed to establish the new Church,

Of this Jacob Leisler, the fanatical usurper of the government, wrote to the Governor of Boston, August, 1689: "I have formerly urged to inform your
Hon. that Coll Dongan, in his time did erect a Jesite College upon cellour to learn Law to the Judges and frontiersmen with the Jesuits, and without a body of people at the State House taken without more than three per cent of the vote. The Jesuits, however

With the fall of James II. and the advent of William of Orange to the English throne, New York's Catholic colonial history was almost stamped out by drastic penal laws (see New York, State of). In spite of them, however, during the years that followed a few scattered representatives of the Faith drifted in and settled down unobservedly. To minister to them there came new and then from Philadelphia a zealous German Jesuit missionary, Father Ferdinand Steinmayer, who was commonly called "Father Farmer." Gathering them together, he said Mass in the house of a German fellow-countryman, and appointed out the loft of a dwelling on Water Street, and wherever else they could find an accommodation. Then came the Revolution, and in this connexion, owing to one of the prominent political issues of the time, the spirit of the leading colonists was intensely anti-Catholic. The first flag raised by the Sons of Liberty in New York was inscribed "No Popery." When the war was ended, and the Congress of New York, the Catholic representatives of France, Spain, Portugal, with Charles Carroll, his cousin Daniel, and Thomas Fitz Simmons, Catholic members of Congress, and officers and soldiers of the foreign contingent, merchants and others, soon made up a respectable congregation.

Mass was said for them in the house of the Spanish

1808, and ceased to be a holyday of obligation.

13, 1809: "I have formerly urged to inform your minister, Don Diego de Garodqui, on Broadway, near the Bowling Green, in the Vauxhall Gardens, which was a ball on the river from near Warren Street, and was a source of the chaplain in De Grasse's fleet, and was acting as private chaplain to the Portuguese consul-general, Don José Roiz Silva, took upon the care of this scattered flock, which numbered less than two hundred, and only about forty of them practical in the observance of the Church. Finally, an Irish Capuchin, Father Charles Whelan, who had served as a chaplain in De Grasse's fleet, and was acting as private chaplain to the Vauxhall Gardens on July 17, 1795, was delivered to me at the beginning of October in the City of New York, where our Right Rev. Bishop Carroll has thought proper to send me in the capacity of rector of the Mission of this immense congregation and Vicar General of the Diocese till the arrival of the Right Rev. Richard Luke Concannon, Bishop of New York. The congregation chiefly consists of Irish, some hundreds of French, and as many Germans, in all, according to the common estimate, of 11,000 souls. Rev. Mr. Fenwick, a young Father of our society, distinguished for his learning and piety, has been sent along with me. I was no sooner arrived in the city and beheld, the Trustees, though before their arrival they had not spent a cent for the reparation and furniture of their clergyman's house, laid out for the said purpose above $800. All men seem to revile at the very name of the Society of Jesus, though yet little known in this part of the country. What rapid progress was made, he indicates, two years later, when, again writing to Father Strickland, on 1 Sept., 1801, he tells how it is but two years that we arrived in this city without having a cent in our pocket, nor even our passage money, which the Trustees paid for Father Fenwick and myself, and not far advanced as to see not only the Catholic religion highly respected by the first characters of the city, but even a Catholic college established, the house well furnished both in town and in the college improvements made in the college [sic] for four or five hundred dollars, is a thing which I am at a loss to conceive, and which I cannot attribute to the liberality of whom alone, therefore, be all glory and honour. The college is in the centre not of Long Island but of the Island of New York, the most delightful and most healthy spot of the whole island, at a distance of four small miles from the city, and of half a mile from the East and North rivers, both of which are seen from the house, situated between two roads which are very much frequented, opposite to the botanic gardens which belong to the State. It has adjacent to it a beautiful lawn, garden, orchard, etc. This spot is now the site of St. Patrick's Cathedral on Fifth avenue.

We can judge from the family names on the register of St. Peter's church that the early Catholics of New York were largely Irish; next in number come the French, then the Germans, followed by those of Italian, Spanish and English origin. There were enough Germans in 1808 to think themselves entitled to a church and pastor of their own nationality, for on 2 March of that year Christopher Fischer, John Knecht, Martin Niesler, and Francois Werneken signed a petition which they sent to Bishop Carroll praying him "to send us a pastor who is capable of undertaking the spiritual Care of our Souls in the German Language, which is our Mother Tongue."
Many of us do not know any English at all, and those who have some knowledge of it are not well enough versed in the English Language as to attend Divine Service with any utility to themselves. As we have not yet a place of worship of our own, we have made application to the Trustees of the English Catholic Church in this city to grant us permission to perform our worship in the German Language in some church at such times as not to interfere with their regular services. This permission they have readily granted us. During the Course of the year we shall take care to find an opportunity to provide ourselves with a suitable building of our own, and, if this we have no doubt that our number will soon considerably increase." Nothing came of this petition, and no separate German congregation was organized in New York until a quarter of a century after its date. But Father Kohlmann saw to it that another church should be started, and the corner-stone of "the Broad Street and the Bowery Road" in 1809, to meet the needs of the rapidly increasing number of Catholics on the east side of the city. It was also to serve as the cathedral church of the new diocese. The corner-stone was laid 8 June, 1809, but, owing to the hard times and the war of 1812 with England, the structure was not ready for use until 1 May, 1815, when it was dedicated by Bishop Cheverus who came from Boston for that purpose. It was then far on the outskirts of the city, and, to accustom the people to go there, Mass was said at St. Peter's every other Sunday. The ground on which it was built was purchased in 1801 for a graveyard, and the interments in it from that time until the cemetery was closed in 1833 numbered 521,153. Some of the Catholic Laymen prominent during this period were Andrew Morris, Matthew Reed, Cornelius Heeney, Thomas Stoughton, Dominick Lynch, Benjamin Disbrey, Peter Britsell, uncle of the Rev. James A. Neil, the first native of New York to be admitted to the priesthood, Joseph Icard, merchant and architect, Hugh McCann, Dennis Doyle, Miles F. Closey, and Anthony Trapasso, a native of Meta, Italy, pioneer Italian merchant and the first foreigner to be naturalized under the Constitution, Francis Varej, John B. Lasala, Francis Cooper, George Gottsberger, Thomas O'Connor, Thomas Brady, Dr. William James Maeneven, and Bernard Dornin, the first Catholic publisher, for whose edition of Fasori, A History of the Church, the church was dedicated in 1807, there were 318 New York City subscribers.

III. THE Hierarchy.—A. When Bishop Carroll learned that it was the intention of the Holy See to recognize the government of the Church in the United States by dividing the Diocese of Baltimore and creating new sees, he advised that New York be placed under the See of Baltimore, as it was in the line of the Episcopate of Boston, and that a suitable choice could be made for that diocese. Archbishop Troy of Dublin, however, induced Pius VII to appoint as New York's first bishop an Irish Dominican, Father Richard Luke Concanen, who had resided many years in Rome as the agent of the Irish bishops and was much esteemed there. He was prior of St. Clement's at Rome, librarian of the Minerva, and distinguished for his learning. He refused a nomination for a see in Ireland and was much interested in the missions in America, about which he had kept up a correspondence with Bishop Carroll. It was at his suggestion that Father Concanen found the first house of the Dominicans in Kentucky. He was consecrated first Bishop of New York at Rome, 21 April, 1808, and some time afterward for Leghorn on his way to his see, taking with him the pallium for Archbishop Carroll. After waiting there for a ship for four months he returned to Rome. Thence he went to Naples, eventually sailing to Leghorn with military forces in possession of the city detained him as a British subject, and, while waiting vainly to be released, he died of fever, 19 June, 1810. Finding that he could not leave Italy, he had asked the Pope to appoint the Rev. Ambrose Marechal to be his coadjutor bishop in New York. The American bishops cordially endorsed this choice and considered that the appointment would be made. Archbishop Carroll, writing to Father C. Plowden, of London, 25 June, 1815, said: "It was known here that before the death of Dr. Concanen his Holiness at the Dr.'s entreaty intended to assign to him as his coadjutor the Rev. Mr. Marechal, a priest of St. Sulphius, now in the Seminary here, worthy of any promotion in the Church. This will explain that this measure would be pursued; and that we made no presentation or recommendation of any other for the vacant see."

B.—Archbishop Troy, of Dublin, however, with the other Irish bishops, proposed to the Pope another Irish Dominican, the Rev. John Connolly, for the vacant see of New York, and he was consecrated at Rome, 6 Nov. 1814 (see Connolly, Bishop). A selection which might have proved embarrassing to American Catholics, for Bishop Connolly was of British subject, and the United States was then at war with Great Britain. "I wish," wrote Archbishop Carroll to Father Plowden, 25 June, 1815, "this may not become a very dangerous precedent fruitful of suspicion upon our religious freedom a false opinion of the servility of our principles." Owing to his own views of the situation in the diocese, Bishop Connolly did not announce his appointment to his fellow-members of the hierarchy or to the administrator of the diocese. Father Kohlmann was, therefore, in anticipation of the bishop's arrival, recalled by his superiors to Maryland, and the college was closed, and the other Jesuits soon after left the diocese. Finally, Bishop Connolly arrived in New York unannounced, and without any formal local welcome, 24 Nov., 1815, his ship taking sixty-eight days to make the voyage from Dublin. In the district it was found that everything was to be created from resources that were very small and in spite of obstacles that were very great. The diocese embraced the whole State of New York and half of New Jersey. There were but four priests in this territory. Lay trustees had become so accustomed to having their own way that they were not disposed to admit even the authority of a bishop.
Dr. Connolly was not wanting in firmness, but the pressing needs of the times, forcing an apparent concession to the established order of things, subjected him to much difficulty and many humiliations. He was a friend of Dr. Bishop Power, and when the latter, as Bishop of New York, was refused the salary of the Archbishop, he wrote the Cardinal, Prefect of Propaganda, in February, 1818, but he discharged all his laborious duties with humility and earnest zeal. His diary further notes that he told the cardinal: "I found here about 13,000 Catholics. . . At present there are about 10-000 mostly Irish; at least 10,000 Irish Catholics arrived in New York and within these few years. They spread through all the other states of this confederacy, and make their religion known everywhere. Bishops ought to be granted to wherever here is willing to erect a Cathedral, and petition for a bishop. The present dioceses are quite too extensive. Our Cathedral owes $3,000 borrowed to build it. . . This burden has the purpose of supporting a sufficient number of priests, or from thinking to erect a seminary. The American youth have an invincible repugnance to the ecclesiastical state."

He made a visitation of the diocese, no mean accomplishment at that time; provided churches for the people in Brooklyn, Buffalo, Albany, Utica, and Paterson; introduced the Sisters of Charity, started the orphan asylum, and encouraged the opening of parochial schools. He died at his residence, 512 Broadway, 5 Feb., 1823, worn out by his labours and anxieties. Notable men of this period were Fathers Michael O'Gorman and Richard Bulger—the latter the first priest ordained in New York (1820)—Charles D. French, John Power, John Farman, Thomas Connolly, and Philip Larnsey and John Shannon. There were several distinguished converts, including Mother Seton, founder of the American branch of the Sisters of Charity; the Rev. Virgil Barber and his wife, the Rev. John Richards, the Rev. George Kewley, the Rev. George E. Irmschel, Keating Lawson, and others. Two years elapsed before the next bishop was appointed, and the Rev. Dr. John Power during that period governed the diocese as administrator. Brooklyn's first church was organized during this time. It was during Bishop Connolly's administration also, that New York's first Catholic paper "The Truth Teller" was started, on 2 April, 1825.

The choice of the Holy See for the third bishop was that of Dr. John Dubois, president of Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg (see Dubois, Joux), and he was consecrated at Baltimore, 29 October, 1826. The Rev. William Taylor, a convert who had come from Cork, Ireland, in June, 1818, at the suggestion of Bishop England of Charleston, endeavoured to be himself made bishop, going to Rome in January, 1820, for that purpose. This visit to Rome being fruitless, Taylor went to Boston, where he remained several years with Bishop Cheverus, returning to New York when that prelate was transferred to France. He was exceedingly popular with non-Catholics because of his liberality. He preached the sermon at the consecration of Bishop Dubois, and took occasion to explain what he called "disastrous experiences which resulted from indignities inflicted" on the bishop in New York. He left New York simultaneously with the arrival of the bishop there, and sailed for France, where his old friend Mgr Cheverus, then Archbishop of Bordeaux, received him. He died suddenly, while preaching in the Irish college, Paris, in 1828.

None of the predicted disturbances happened when Bishop Dubois took possession of his see, though the abuse of trusteeism, grown more and more insolent and unmanageable by tolerate, hampered his efforts from the very start. Fanaticism was aroused among the Protestant sects, alarmed at the numerical increase of the Church through the immigration attracted by the commercial growth of the State. But in spite of all, he went on bravely visiting all parts of the State, building and encouraging the building of churches wherever they were needed, obtaining and from Rome and from the charitable in Europe. He found but two churches in the city when he came to; these he added six others and multiplied for his flock the facilities for practising their religion, his constant endeavour being to give his people priests, churches, and schools. With the trustees in New York City and in Buffalo he had many sad experiences, but he publicly upheld his constituted authority. In 1834 he organized, with the Rev. John Raffiner as pastor, the first German Catholic congregation in New York in a small disused Baptist church at Pitt and De Lancey Streets, which became the church of St. Nicholas. It was about this time, too, that a public controversy over Catholic doctrine raged between the Calvinist ministers, Rev. John Breckenridge and Rev. William Brownlee, and the vicar-general, Rev. Dr. Power, assisted by Fathers Varela, Levins, and Schindler. It was followed by the fanatical attack on Catholic religious communities known as "The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk." Dr. Dubois "had then reached the age of seventy and, though still a vigorous combatant when necessary, was disarmed to religious controversy. Perhaps he did not understand the country and the people as well as the younger men who had grown up in America; perhaps he was deterred by his memories of the French Revolution" (Herbermann, "Hist. Records and Studies", 1, Pt. 2, 333).

At length the many burdens and anxieties of his charge told on the bishop, and he asked for a coadjutor, naming the Right Rev. P. F. Bynack, Chancellor of Philadelphia, as his first choice, and the Rev. Thomas F. Mulledy, S.J., and the Rev. John Hughes, of Philadelphia, as alternates. Father Hughes, of Philadelphia, who had been his pupil at Emmitsburg, was selected and consecrated titular Bishop of Basilo, 7 January, 1838. His youth and vigour soon put new life into the affairs of the Church in New York, and were especially efficient in meeting the aggressions of the lay trustees. Bishop Hughes had fully realized the dangers of the system as shown in Philadelphia, and he lost no time in meeting and crushing it in New York. Bishop Dubois, through ill health, had to relinquish the details of his charge more and more to his youthful assistant, whose activity he warmly welcomed. Several attacks of paralysis warned him to give up the management of the diocese. His remaining days he spent quietly preparing for the end, his conductor ever treating him with respectful kindness and sympathy. He died 29 December, 1810, full of years and merits. Those of his assistants who were notably prominent were Father Felix Varela, an eminently pious and versatile priest, an exile from Cuba, and the Revs. Joseph Schneider, Dr. Constantine C.
Pise, Alexander Mappett, John Rafferty, the pioneer German priest in America; the Rev. Theobald Maquaire, Michael Curran, Gregory B. Parlow, Luke Berry, John N. Neumann, later a Redemptorist and Bishop of Philadelphia, and John Walsh, long pastor of St. James, Brooklyn.

D.—Bishop Hughes, the administrator, at once assumed the title of the see as its fourth bishop, and is the really great figure in the consecrated page
New York’s history. “It was a day of great men in the civil order,” says the historian, Dr. John Gillary Shea, “the day of Clay, Webster, Calhoun, yet no man of that era spoke so directly or so effectively to the American people as Bishop Hughes. He was no mere man of Church. It had been well said in any assemblage he would have been not abolable. He was full of noble thoughts, and his consecrated intentions and devo ted to the Church; every plan and every project of his mind aimed at the aggrandizement
of the country.”
The story of his eventculteral career is told in a separate article (see HUGHES, John), and it will suffice to mention here some of the many distinguished men who helped to make his administration so salutary in local records. Among them were the Rev.
William Quarter, afterwards first Bishop of Chicago, and his brother, the Rev. Walter J. Quarter, the Rev. Ber-ard O’Reilly, first Bishop of Hartford; the Rev. John Loughlin, first Bishop of Brooklyn; the Rev. James R.
Bayley, first Bishop of Newark and Archbishop of Baltimore; the Rev. David Fenwick, first Bishop of Portland; the Rev. William G. McCloskey, first recctor of the American College at Rome and fourth Bishop of Louisville, Ky., son of one of the Brooklyn pioneers; the Rev. Andrew Byrne, first Bishop of Little Rock; the Rev. John J. Conroy, Bishop of Albany;
the Rev. William Starrs, vicar-general; the Rev. Dr.
Andrew McGlynn, the Rev. Dr. Archdeacon McCarron, the Rev. John Kelly (Eugene Kelly’s brother), who went as a missionary to Africa and then became first pastor at Jersey City. These are only a few of the names that are prominent. Among the notable converts of this period may be mentioned the Rev. Thomas S. Preston, J. V. Huntington, F. E. White, Donald McLeod, Isaac T.
Packard, A. F. Hewitt, Alfred Young, Clarence Walworth, and Edgar P. Wadhams, later Bishop of Ogdensburg.

E.—As the successor of Archbishop Hughes, Bishop John McCloskey of Albany was promoted to be the second archbishop. He had been consecrated Conductor of New York, with the right of succession, in 1844, but resigned both offices to become the first Bishop of Albany in 1847 (see McCloskey, John).
He returned to New York in spite of his own protests of unworthiness, but with the unanimous approval and rejoicing of the clergy and laity. He was born in Brooklyn, 10 March, 1810, and was therefore the first native bishop, as he was the second native of New York to be ordained to the priesthood. He was a gentle, polished, amiable prelate, and accomplished much for the progress of Catholic New York. The Protector, the Foundling Asylum, and the Mission of the Immaculate Conception were among the churches founded under his auspices; he resumed work on the new Cathedral, and saw its completion; the provincial seminary at Troy was organized; churches, schools, and charitable institutions were everywhere increased and improved. In the stimulation of a general appreciation of the necessity of Catholic education the archbishop (he refused to call it the purple in 1875) was incorruptible and most vigorous. He was the foundations of the structure, laid deep by his illustriuous predecessor, upheld an edifice in which all the requirements of modern educational methods should be found. Like him, also, as years crept on, he asked for a coadjutor, and the Bishop of Newark, Michael Augustine Corrigan, was sent him.

Born in New York, 3 August, 1839, his college days were spent at Mt. St. Mary’s, Emmitsburg, and at Rome. Ordained in 1863, Bishop Corrigan became president of Seton Hall College in 1868, Bishop of Newark in 1875, Coadjutor of New York in 1880, and archbishop in 1885 (see Corrigan, Michael A.).
He died, from an accidental fall during the building of the Notre Dame Cathedral, 10 December, 1888.
It was said of him by the New York “Evening Post”:
“The memory of his life distills a fragrance like to that of St. Francis.” By some New Yorkers he was for a time a much misunderstood man, whose memory time will vindicate. Acute thinkers are appreciating his worth as a civilan as well as a churchman, and the fact that Catholicism, from her earliest days, was embattled in the strife of Socialism and effectually and permanently checked its advance. He was an administrator of ability and, socially, a man of winning personality.
To the serious problem of providing for the spiritual need of the throngs of European immigrants he gave successful consideration. The splendid seminary at Dunwoodie is his best memorial. Its beautiful chapel he built at a cost of $60,000—his whole private inherited fortune. During his administration controversy over the school question was waged with a certain amount of acrimony. He was regarded as the leader of those all over the country who stood for uncompromising Catholic education.
Archbishop Corrigan was also drawn into conflict with the Rev. Dr. Edward McGlynn, the rector of Stephen’s church, a man of considerable ability, but whose radical views on the ownership of land had brought on him the official censure of Cardinal Simeoni, Prefect of Propaganda. In the municipal election of 1886, in spite of the archbishop’s warnings, he became the open partisan of Henry George who was defeated in his primary by Rev. Dr. McGlynn. As a consequence, he was suspended, and, as an alumnus of the College of Propaganda, was summoned to Rome to answer the charges made against him.
He refused to go and was excommunicated.—For details and text of official letters, see Archbishop Corrigan’s statement to New York papers (21 January, 1887) and Dr. McGlynn’s formal answer in Henry George’s “Standard” (5 February, 1887).—Dr. McGlynn’s partisan parties organized themselves into what they called the Anti-Poverty Society. He addressed this body every Sunday until about Christmas, 1892, when, having willingly accepted the conditions laid down by the pope, he was absolved from censure and reconciled by Mgr. Satolli, the Apostolic Delegate. He issued a published statement by Mgr. Satolli, the conditions were in this form: “Dr. McGlynn had presented a brief statement of his opinions on moral-economic matters, and it was judged not contrary to the doctrine constantly taught by the Church, and as recently confirmed by the Holy Father in the encyclical "Rerum Novarum." Also it is hereby made known that Dr. McGlynn, besides publicly professing his adherence to all the doctrines and teachings of the Catholic Church, has expressed his regret (saying that he would feel the greatest regret in it) for any word or act of his that may have seemed lacking in the respect due to ecclesiastical authority, and he hereby intends to repair as far as he can any offense which may have been given to Catholics. Finally, Dr. McGlynn has of his own free will declared and promised that, within the limits of a not long period of time, he will withdraw from the spirit and manner which are coming to a good Catholic and a priest." In 1891 Dr. McGlynn was appointed pastor of St. Mary's church, Newburg, where he remained quietly until his death in 1901.

Archbishop Corrigan made his last visit ad limina in 1890 and after his return, until his death in 1902, devoted himself entirely to the duties of his high office. His death brought out the fact that he was the foremost figure of the community in the respect and affection of his fellow-citizens. His unassuming personality and his gentle method, his considerate kindness and his unaffected piety were pathways to the love and veneration of his own flock. His steady, comrade, as well as his persuasive, manner of, not only teaching, but also of acting out the doctrines of his religion, his profound scholarship, his experienced judgment, were ever employed when there was question of a religious, moral, or civil import to his fellow-men. The truth of this is to be found in the testimony of Leo XIII, himself, of the civil dignitaries of the state, of the bishops of his own clergy and laity, on the mournful occasion of his death. Under the second and third archbishops, Mgr. William Quinn, V.G., was a prominent figure, and among his associates of this era were Mgr Thomas S. Preston, Mgr Arthur J. Donnelly, Mgr James McMahon, Mgr P. F. McSweeney, Fathers M. Curran, William Everett, W. H. Chowny, Felix H. Farrell, Eugene McGuire, Thomas Farrell, Edward J. O'Reilly, M. J. O'Farrell (later Bishop of Trenton), and Edmund Aubril.

G.—As fourth archbishop, the Holy See confirmed the choice of the diocesan electors, and appointed to fill the vacancy the auxiliary, the Right Rev. John Murphy Farrell, who was unanimously chosen as the archbishop on 15 September, 1902. He was born at Newton Hamilton, County Aranagh, Ireland, 20 April, 1842. His primary studies were made at St. McCarten's College, Monaghan, and, on his coming to New York, were continued at St. John's College, Fordham. Thence he went to the provincial seminary at Troy for his philosophical course, and after the Fifth Avenue, Fifth Street, Fourth Avenue, and Fifty-first Street, has been in the possession of the church authorities, and used for ecclesiastical purposes, except during a very brief interval (1821–1824), since 1 March, 1810. The block on which the Cathedral stands was purchased at its then marketable value first eight years added nearly fifty parochial schools to the primary list, encouraged the increase of high schools, and founded Cathedral College as a preparatory seminary.

In the proceedings of the annual convention of the Catholic Educational Association held in New York in 1899, and of the National Eucharistic Congress in 1901, Archbishop Farley took a most active and directive part. Synods were held regularly every third year, and theological conferences quarterly, to give effect to every instruction and legislative act of the Holy See. A monthly recollection for all the priests of the diocese assembled together was instituted. Provision was made for the religious needs of Italians and other foreign immigrants—the Italian portion of his flock numbering about 100,000 souls. The great work of issuing The Catholic Encyclopedia owed its inception and progress to his help and stimulus. The centenary of the erection of the diocese was celebrated under his direction by a magnificent festival lasting a week (April 27–May 2, 1908); the Lady Chapel of the Cathedral was completed, the Cathedral debt was paid off, and the edifice was consecrated on the 5th of October, 1910. Cardinal Vincenzo Vanutelli, papallegate to the Twenty-first Eucharistic Congress, Cardinal Logue, Primate of all Ireland, Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore, 70 prelates, 1,000 priests, and an immense congregation of the laity being present at the Mass of the day. Archbishop Farley was given an auxiliary in the Right Rev. Thomas F. Cusack, who was consecrated titular Bishop of Themisera, 25 April, 1901. Bishop Cusack was born in New York, 22 Feb., 1862, and made his classical course at St. Francis Xavier's College where he graduated in 1880. His theological studies were pursued at the provincial seminary, Troy, where he was ordained priest in 1885. He was a very successful director of the Diocesan-Apostolate (1892–1901) before his consecration as bishop, after which he was appointed Rector of St. Stephen's parish.

IV.—Diocesan Institutions.—The Cathedral.—St. Patrick's Cathedral, standing on the crest of New York's most magnificent thoroughfare, is the noblest temple ever dedicated, in any land, to the honour of the Apostle of Ireland. It is an edifice of which every citizen of the great metropolis is justly proud. Its style is the decorated and geometric Gothic of which the cathedrals of Reims, Amiens, and Cologne are prominent examples. It was planned in 1853 by James Renwick of New York; construction was begun in 1858, and the building was formally opened and dedicated on 25 May, 1879 (though operations having been suspended, owing to the Civil War, from 1861 to 1865). The site of the cathedral, the block bounded by Fifth Avenue, Fifth Street, Fourth Avenue, and Fifty-first Street, has been in the possession of the church authorities, and used for ecclesiastical purposes, except during a very brief interval (1821–1824), since 1 March, 1810. The block on which the Cathedral stands was purchased at its then marketable value
New York Literary Institution, the first collegiate school of the diocese, in a house on Mott Street opposite the church. It was an immediate success, and was soon removed to a house on Broadway, and then, in March, 1812, to a suburban site in the village of Falls, now Fifth Street and Fifth Avenue, the site of St. Patrick's Cathedral. Although well patronized by the best families in the city, the inability of the Jesuit community to keep up the expense of repairs forced the abandonment of the enterprise in 1815. To supply teachers for girls, Father Kohlmann secured several Ursuline Nuns from Cork, Ireland, who arrived in the city 9 April, 1812. Their convent was located near the New Literary Institution, and the Legislature, by the Act of 25 March, 1814, incorporated "The Ursuline Convent of the City of New York," in which "Christiane Fagan, Sarah Walsh, Mary Baldwin and others are incorporated for the purpose of teaching poor children". After a year, as no other subjects joined their community, and they were not satisfied with the location, which was too remote from the city for their own, and daily spiritual direction from a chaplain, these nuns gave up the school and returned to Ireland.

With the advent of Bishop Connolly to the diocese (21 November, 1815) St. Patrick's parochial school was opened in the basement of the cathedral. The "Catholic Almanac" for 1822 relates that "there are in the city two extensive Catholic schools conducted upon a judicious plan, and supported partly by the funds of the State and partly by means raised on the part of the school more than a year by the two congregations". The report of the trustees of St. Peter's church to the superintendent of common schools, in 1824, states that the average number of scholars in St. Peter's and St. Patrick's schools whose opening had been about 500 each. These two were the pioneer schools of that great Catholic parochial system of free schools throughout the diocese which has been the example and stimulus for Catholic education all over the United States. On 28 June, 1817, three Sisters of Charity, sent to her native city by Mother Seton, arrived in New York from Emmitsburg to take charge of the orphan asylum and school of St. Patrick's. In 1830 these Sisters of Charity took charge of St. Peter's school and opened two academies. In 1816, owing to the conflict between the French rule of their institute, forbidding the care of boys, and other details of discipline which greatly interfered with diocesan progress, Bishop Hughes received permission to organize an independent community of diocesan autonomy. This was established 8 December, 1816, with the election of Mother Elizabeth Boyle as the first superior. The novitiate was opened at 35 East Broadway, but in 1847 was moved to Fifth Avenue and One Hundred and Fifth Street, where the academy for girls and orphan-house of Mount St. Vincent was established. Ten years later the city took the property for Central Park, and the community moved to the site of the Hudson, just below Yonkers, where the College of Mount St. Vincent, and the headquarters of the community now are. There are about eighteen hundred of these sisters teaching in more than sixty parochial schools and in charge of diocesan institutions.

In 1811 a community of the Religious of the Sacred Heart was sent to New York by Mother Barat, and established their first school at Houston and Mulberry Streets. A year later this was moved to Astoria, Long Island, and in 1846 to the present site of the convent at Manhattanville, where, under the direction, for many years, of the famous Mother Mary Alice Harlup, it became, not only a popular educational institution but the center whence radiated most of the progress made by the Institute throughout the United States. When the first Religious of the Sacred Heart arrived in New York, 31 July, 1827, on their way from France to make the first foundation in the United States at St. Louis, Missouri. Bishop Dubois was most probably impressed by them, and wished to have a community for New York also. A letter which he wrote to Mother Barat in the following October expresses this desire and gives a view of his charge at that time. "It was my intention," he says, "to visit you and your pious associates in Paris in order to give you a better idea of our country before asking you to establish a house in New York. There is no doubt as to the success of an order like yours in this city; indeed it is greatly needed; but a considerable sum of money would be required to supply the urgent needs of the foundation. The Catholic population, which averages over thirty thousand souls, is very poor, besides chiefly composed of Irish emigrants. Contributions from Protestants are so uncertain and property in this city so expensive that I cannot promise any assistance. All I can say is that I believe one of your schools, commenced with sufficient money to purchase property and support itself until the ladies have time to make themselves known, would succeed beyond all our expectations. . . . I have the sorrow of witnessing an abundant harvest rotting in the earth, through lack of Apostolate labourers and the necessary funds to organize the various needs of the community. Although Bishop Dubois was not able to accomplish his desire to have a school then established, his prophecy as to its success when it was opened was amply justified by subsequent results.

The Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of St. Dominic, School Sisters of Notre Dame, and other teaching communities followed in the course of the succeeding years, until now (1910) the parish schools of the archdiocese are in charge of twenty-six different religious communities, twenty-two of Sisters and four of Brothers. In 1829 an Irishman named James D. Boyle with the approbation of Bishop Dubois attempted to establish a community of the Irish Brothers of Charity to teach the boys' schools, and opened two schools. The attempt failed in the course of the year, owing to want of business tact and the unqualified spirit of trusteeship. The Christian Brothers opened their first school in New York in September, 1818, in St. Vincent de Paul's parish, at 16 East Canal Street. Later it was opened in Canal Street in 1830, moved to Mulberry Street in 1836 and East Second Street in 1837. Manhattan College was opened in 1853. These Brothers have charge also of the De La Salle Institute, the Classton Point Military Academy, twenty-six parish schools, and the great Catholic Propertoray. Bishop Hughes, in 1846, invited the Jesuits to return to the diocese and take charge of St. John's College and Seminary at Fordham, which he had opened there in the old Rose Hill manor house, 21 June, 1841. The seminary was moved to Troy in 1864, and St. John's remained as part of Fordham University. St. Francis Xavier's College was begun at the school of the church of the Holy Name of Jesus, Elizabeth Street, in 1857. It was opened in Third Avenue near Twelfth Street, and finally located in West Sixteenth Street in 1870. Loyola School was opened by the Jesuits in 1899 at Park Avenue and Fifty-third street.

As has been said, the state appropriation for education was divided at first among all schools. Public education in New York, at the opening of the nineteenth century, was denominational, and under the direction of the Public School Society organized in 1805 "to provide a free school for the education of poor children in the city who do not belong to, or are not provided for by any religious denomination". In 1808 the name was changed to the "Free School Society of New York" and again in 1826 to the "Public School Society of New York", with power "to provide for the education of all children not otherwise provided for". This society gradually became, under the control of intolerant sectarian ministers, a combination against Catholic interests so that, when, in 1830, the Catholic parish schools of the city, the attendance of about 4000 pupils, made a demand for the share of the school appropriations to which the law entitled them, it was refused by the Board of Aldermen after a memorable hearing of the Catholic petition in the City Hall on 29-30 October, 1840, at which Bishop Hughes made one of his greatest oratorical efforts. As a result of this contest the Public School Society was soon after abolished, and the present system of public school education was enacted. The Catholics of New York also determined to organize and maintain their system of free parish schools. "Go, Bishop Hughes told them, "build your own schools; raise arguments in the shape of the best educated and most moral citizens of the Republic, and the day will come when you will enforce recognition.

To supply priests for the diocese Bishop Dubois established a seminary at Nyack-on-Hudson, in 1833, but it was burned down just as it was ready to be opened. Cornelius Herhey then offered the bishop the ground in Brooklyn on which St. John's now stands, refusing, however, to give the diocese the title to the property immediately, and the design to build in Brooklyn was abandoned. In 1838 the estate of John Lafarge, Grovemont, in Jefferson County, was purchased and the seminary begun there. The place was then so inaccessible and impracticable that it was given up, and, on 21 June, 1841, Bishop Hughes, administrator of the diocese, opened with thirty students the new St. John's seminary and college at Fordham, then a village just outside the city. The Rev. John McCloskey, later Archbishop of New York and first cardinal in the United States, was its first president. The seminary remained at Fordham until 21 Oct., 1864, when it was moved again to Troy, where St. Joseph's seminary began with fifty-seven students transferred from Fordham. The faculty was composed of secular priests from Ghent, Belgium, under the direction of the Very Reverend H. Vanderhende. Here the seminary remained until 1866, during which period more than 700 priests were prepared there. The building was then given over to the Sisters of St. Joseph of the Diocese of Albany as a novitiate and training school, and on 12 August, 1896, the new provincial seminary at Dunwoode was solemnly dedicated by Cardinal Satollo, then Apostolic delegate to the United States. The care of this seminary was entrusted to the Dominicans, but these retired
In 1906, and the work was continued by the secular clergy of the archdiocese. A further step in providing facilities for seminary training was taken up by Archbishop Farley in September, 1903, by the opening of Cathedral College for the preparatory studies of ecclesiastical students.

In the cause of education the work done by the Catholic publishers must be noted. For New York, with the increase of its Catholic population, developed also into a great producing and distributing centre for Catholic literature of all kinds. It is claimed for Bernard Dornin who arrived in New York in 1803; an exile from Ireland, that he was the first publisher of exclusively Catholic works in the United States. His edition of Pasturini’s “History of the Christian Church” (1807) was the first Catholic book published in New York. The next year he issued an edition of Dr. Fletcher’s “Reflections on the Spirit of Religious Controversy”, for which he had 141 city subscribers. There were 318 for the Pasturini book, and these two lists make an interesting directory of Catholic New York families at the opening of the nineteenth century. This was the precursor of many similar directories. He was followed in New York by Matthew Field who published “at his library 177 Bowery within a few doors of Deaneck St.” the first American year book, “The Catholic Layman’s Directory to the Church Service; with an almanac for the year 1817.” About 1823 John Doyle began to publish books at 237 Broadway, and many of these, when he had issued many books of instruction and devotion. Most of the Doyle plates were taken over by Edward Dunigan, who had associated with him in business his half-brother James B. Kirker. He was the first publisher to encourage Catholic authors to give them their writings. John Gilmary Shea’s early histories were published by this firm, as was a fine edition of Haydock’s Bible, and many other well-known pre-revolutionary works. In 1837 Dennis and James Sadlier began to issue Butler’s “Lives of the Saints” and an edition of the Bible in monthly parts, and thus commenced what later developed into one of the largest book concerns in the United States. The list of their publications is as varied as it is lengthy, and remarkably for the number of their clients, the society of “Metropolitan” school books. Patrick O’Shea, who had been associated with the Dunigan concern, began for himself in 1854 and, until his death, in 1906, was a very industrious producer of Catholic books, his publications including, besides a great number of school books, many editions of valuable works, such as Darras’ “History of the English Church,” the “American Republic,” Linnard’s “History of England”, Wiseman’s and Lacordaire’s works. Benezinger Brothers, in 1853, opened the branch of their German house that developed into the great concern, covering all branches of the trade. Father Isaac T. Hecker, C.S.P., as part of his dream for the evangelization of the non-Catholic fellow-countrymen, founded, in 1856, the Catholic Publishing Company. Into this enterprise his brother, George V. Hecker, also a convert, unsoldly put thousands of dollars. Its manager was Lawrence Kehoe, a man well versed in all the best ideals of the trade, who sent out its many books, bound and printed in a lavishness of style not attempted before.

New York gave early evidence of the characteristic of heroic charity. In a letter written by Father Kohlmann, 21 March, 1809, he mentions “applications made at all houses to raise a subscription for the relief of the poor by which means $3000 have been collected to be paid constantly each year”. New York then had only one church for its 16,000 Catholics. It was held in a small wooden house at Mott and Prince Streets, the “New York Catholic Benevolent Society”, for its support and management, was incorporated the same year by the Legislature—the first Catholic Society so legalized in the state—and Mother Seton sent three of her Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg to take care of the children. This asylum was moved in 1851 to the block adjoining the Cathedral in Fifth Avenue and remained there until this property was sold and the institution located in Westchester County, in 1875. A Union Emigrant Society, to aid immigrants, the precursor of the Irish Emigrant Society and the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank (see Emigrant Aid Societies) was organized in 1829. St. Patrick’s, the first New York Conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, was affiliated to the Paris Council in 1839, and in the steady increase of the organization throughout the diocese opened a new field for Catholic charity, to be undertaken by the Congregation of the Sisters of Charity against the raids on poor and neglected Catholic children in the public institutions was mainly through its members, and out of their efforts, in great measure, also grew the great Catholic Protecory, the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin, the Foundling Asylum, and the more recent Fresh Air and Convalescent Homes, the Orphans’, and other incidental details of modern philanthropy.

V. STATISTICS.—The following religious communities now have foundations in the diocese (1910):

The progress of the diocese is shown by the records kept of the gradual growth of population which made the great metropolitan diocese the leading Catholic diocese in the United States. The remarkable increase begins with the immigration during the canal and railroad-building period, after 1825, the exodus from Ireland following the famine year of 1847, and the German flight after the Revolutionary disturbances of 1848. In 1826 in New York City there were but three churches and 30,000 Catholics; and in the whole diocese (including New Jersey) there were only eight churches, eighteen priests, and 150,000 Catholics. The diocesan figures for 1850 are recorded as follows: churches, 57; chapels, 5; stations, 50; priests, 99; seminary, 1, with 31 students; academies, 9; hospital, 1; charitable institutions, 15; Catholic population, 200,000. In 1873 the increase is indicated by these figures: churches, 130; chapels, 60; stations, 80; priests, 210; academies, 22; select schools, 18; hospitals, 4; charitable institutions, 20; religious communities of men, 17, of women, 22; Catholic population, 600,000.
In 1900 we find these totals: churches, 250 (city, 111; country, 138); chapels, 154; stations, 34; priests, 676 (regulars, 227); 112 ecclesiastical students; 60 parish schools for boys in city, with 18,953 pupils; 61 for girls, with 21,199 pupils; parish schools outside city for boys, 32, with 3743 pupils, for girls, 34, with 1512 pupils; in colleges and academies, 2430 boys and 2275 girls. Of these: 175 orphan asylums, 846; 23 emigrant homes, 5; homes for aged, 3; hospitals, 15; industrial and reform schools, 26; infant asylum, 1; orphan asylums, 6; total of young people under Catholic care, 68,269; Catholic population, 1,000,000.

The figures for 1910 are: archbishop, 1; bishop, 1; churches, 331 (city, 147; country, 184); chapels, 198; schools, 3,158; total of pupils, 34,076; priests 929 (secular, 605; regular, 324); theological seminary (Dunwoody), 1; students, 165; students (Rome), 11; preparatory seminary, 1; students, 235; pupils in colleges and academies for boys, 3407; in academies for girls, 812; parish schools, New York City, for boys, 90, with 27,200 pupils; for girls, 90, with 4,600 pupils; New York City, 58, with 6377 male pupils, 6913 female; total in parish schools, 72,193; schools for deaf mute, 3; day nurseries, 15; emigrant homes, 5; homes for the aged, 4; hospitals, 23; industrial and reform schools, 36; orphan asylums, 7; asylums for the blind, 2; total of young people under Catholic care, 101,087; Catholic population, 1,219,920.

The Hudson, which is 314 miles from Troy to the junction of the Erie Canal at Buffalo, and 301 miles from the Ohio River to the mouth of the Niagara River, are now churches and priests in New York for Germans, Italians, Poles, French, Hungarians, Bohemians, Lithuanians, Greek Albanese, Greek Syrians, Greek Ruthenians, Slovaks, Spaniards, Chinese, for coloured people and for deaf mutes.

JOSEPH F. MOONEY.

NEW YORK, STATE OF, one of the thirteen colonies of Great Britain, which on 4 July, 1776, adopted the Declaration of Independence and became the United States of America.

BOUNDARIES AND AREA.—The State of New York lies between 40° 20' 40" and 45° 0' 2", N. lat., and between 71° 51' and 79° 45' 51" W. long. It is bounded by Lake Ontario, the St. Lawrence River, and the Dominion of Canada on the north, by Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut on the east; by New York, New Jersey, and the Atlantic Ocean on the south, and by Pennsylvania, Lake Erie, and the Niagara River on the west. It has an area of 49,170 square miles, of which 1,550 square miles is water surface. From east to west it is 326-46 miles in width; it is 300 miles long on the line of the Hudson River.

PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS.—The physical geography of New York is marked by the presence of the Adirondack Mountains in the northern part. In the southern and eastern part lie important portions of the Appalachian system, of which the principal branches are: the Catskill Mountains on the west bank of the Hudson River below Albany; the ranges of the Blue Ridge, which cross the Hudson at West Point and form the Kittatinny and Berkshire Hills and the Green Mountains on the eastern boundary of the State and in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Vermont, and the foothills of the Alleghenies in the south-western portion. The highest peak in the State is Mount Marcy in the Adirondacks, which has an altitude of 5,344 feet. The valley of the Mohawk divides the mountainous district in the eastern part of the State, and forms a natural channel in which the Erie Canal now lies, and which affords easy communication by water and rail between the Great Lakes and the Hudson River valley. On the Niagara River is one of the great waterfalls of the world, Niagara Falls, which is a mile wide and 167 feet high. The preservation of its natural beauty has been ensured by the erection of a State Park, which adjoins a similar park established by the Canadian Government.

Geologically, the State of New York is most interesting. The Hudson River valley and the Adirondacks form part of the Archean continent, which is regarded as the oldest portion of the earth's surface. The Hudson River rises in the Adirondack country. It is navigable for 151 miles from Troy to Westfield, in the state of New York, and has a fall at the mouth of the river of 1,000 feet, which presents one of the most interesting and important examples of basaltic rocks in the world. The principal rivers of the State, besides the Hudson River, are the great Hudson River and its tributary, the Mohawk, the Susquehanna River, which rises in Lake Otsego in the central part of the State, the Delaware, which rises on the western slope of the Catskill mountain country, and the Allegheny, which rises in the south-western corner of the State. None of these is of commercial importance within the State of New York, all passing on to form the principal rivers of Pennsylvania. The series of large inland lakes in central New York form a marked feature of its physical geography. They are of great natural beauty, being of importance for transportation and commerce, and many of the large cities and towns of the State have grown up on their banks. The land surrounding them and the valleys of the brooks and small rivers which form their feeders and outlets are of remarkable fertility. The forests of the State are extensive. They lie principally in the Adirondack, Catskill, and Blue Ridge country. They are the remnants of the primeval forests that once covered most of the State. The State has established by constitutional provision and statutory enactments an extensive system of forest preserves. They are the Adirondack Preserve, containing approximately 1,500,000 acres, and the Catskill Preserve, containing 110,000 acres. Provision is made by law for increasing their area from year to year. The beautiful valleys of the Hudson and its tributaries extend from the sea into the foothills of the Adirondacks at Lake George. The valley of Lake Champlain on the eastern slope of the Adirondacks adjoins the valley of Lake George, and continues it, except for the divide of about two miles at its beginning, into the Dominion of Canada and the St. Lawrence valley. The great central plain of the State, lying between the mountainous districts of the south and west and the Great Lakes and the Adirondacks and the eastern mountain ranges on the north and east, is renowned for the fertility of its soil and the extent of its manufactures.
The only sea-coast of the State is formed by Long Island, and extends for 130 miles from New York Harbour to Montauk Point, which is nearly opposite the boundary line between the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island. The waters lying between Long Island and its continental margin are Long Island Sound, one of the most important waterways of the United States. From the head of navigation on the Hudson River at Troy, a distance of 151 miles from the sea, there extends across the State to Lake Erie one of its great possessions, the Erie Canal, completed in 1825. It is 387 miles long. From Troy to Whitehall at the head of the navigation on the Hudson River are great works, the Champlain Canal, establishing water connexion with the St. Lawrence valley on the north. Ample communication by water from the Lake States on the west and from Canada on the north to the Atlantic Ocean at New York Bay is provided by this canal system. There are also three other important interior canals owned by the State, the Oswego, the Cayuga and Seneca, and the Black River canals. In 1909 the goods carried free on these state canals valued nearly sixty million dollars. There is now under construction by the State the Great Barge Canal, which it is estimated will cost more than $60,000,000. It is intended to provide navigation for modern canal barges of 1000 tons from Lake Erie to New York City. The relative importance of New York in the system of transportation has been an important factor in its growth. The easy communication afforded by its great rivers and its convenient waterways has made it the favoured highway for domestic trade and commerce and emigration for more than a century, while its possession of the greatest seaport of the North Atlantic Ocean has made the State a natural terminus of land and sea traffic from North America. The ice-free and deep-banked port of New York, lying at the mouth of the Hudson River, with its wide roadsteads and anchorages and vast transportation facilities is indeed the greatest property of the State of New York. The port has a total water front of 141 miles.

Means of Communication.—The means of communication are admirable.

Railroads.—In 1907 there were 8,055 miles of railway and 3,950 miles of electric railway tracks. The great railroad of the State is the New York Central system between New York and Buffalo which provides communication between New York City and the principal places in all parts of the United States by its own lines and connections with lines of other systems. The New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, besides having its terminal in New York City, crosses the southern part of the State into the coal and iron country of Pennsylvania. It controls also the extensive New York, Ontario, and Western Railroad, extending diagonally across the State from Oswego on Lake Ontario to the Hudson River at Weehawken, opposite New York. The Erie system, in addition to being one of the trunk lines to Chicago, is probably the greatest freight carrier in the Union. Its passenger traffic around New York City is also of great extent. Its terminal is in Jersey City opposite New York. The Delaware and Hudson Railroad extends from its connexion with the Grand Trunk of Canada, at Rouse's Point on Lake Champlain, to Albany, where it forms a connexion with a network of roads extending into many of the important centres of central and western New York. The Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western Railroad runs parallel to the southern boundary of the State in New Jersey and Pennsylvania and has its western terminal at Honesdale on the Lehigh River also opposite New York City. It extends also to the north a most important line from Binghamton to Buffalo, Utica and Oswego. It is the greatest of the anthracite coal carriers. The Buffalo, Rochester, and Pittsburg Railroad connects the three large cities named in its title, and serves one of the important agricultural, manufacturing, and mining districts of the States of New York and Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania Railroad, one of the great national trunk lines, with its Hudson tunnels and its new vast terminal in New York City, is one of the greatest improvements on New York System's main lines centre about Philadelphia. It owns and operates in addition to its other properties the entire railroad system of populous Long Island, whose wonderful growth in population and industry seems but a presage of still more extensive development. The Hudson Tunnels under the Hudson River connect the City of New York with the mainland of New York State. Railroads on the New Jersey side of the Hudson; recently completed (1910) tunnels under the East River bring the Long Island Railroad into direct connexion with the Pennsylvania system, and thus with the rest of the continent. These tunnels are a marvellous achievement in subaqueous construction. The development of the terminals of these trunk lines and of their accessories from the initial stages to the present advanced localities is an instructive lesson in the astounding development of the Western Hemisphere in less than eighty years. The first railroad in the State, the Hudson and Mohawk, was built in 1831. It was 17 miles long and ran from Albany to Schenectady on the Mohawk. It was one of the earliest steam railroads in the world.

Highways.—In various parts of the State the navigation of water within New York State is not less wonderful. To the ocean navigation that fills the port of New York must be added the traffic on the rivers, lakes, and canals of the State and upon Long Island Sound. The prosperous cities and towns which are ranged along the banks of the Hudson River, across the State on the lines of the canals and the lakes, and upon the shores of Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, and the St. Lawrence River are sustained largely by it.

Wagon Roads.—The improved system of State highways, begun in late years, has given modern highways to many of the rural districts and laid out avenues between the cities. It is based upon subventions of highway improvements by means of loans and aids from the State treasury to the various local authorities. The growth of vehicular traffic by electric trams and by automobiles has greatly promoted this work.

Climate.—The climate of the State is salubrious, and corresponds generally with that of the north temperate zone. In 1908—which was somewhat abnormally warm—New York had an average temperature above zero maximum and 35° below zero minimum. For 1909 the mean annual temperature of the entire State was 45.8°. The average rainfall throughout the State for the same year was 36.43 inches. New York State is divided by the Department of Agriculture of the United States into three climatological districts: (1) the Hudson, Delaware, and Susquehanna basins, (2) the Allegheny River, and (3) the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence. The great extent of the State causes very variable climatic conditions within its boundaries. In 1909 the mean annual temperature for one part of the Adirondack region was 39° and for the vicinity of New York City 52°. The rainfall during the year 1909 averaged from 18 to 10 inches in Livingston County to 62.7 inches in Jefferson County. The winters in the Adirondack country, the St. Lawrence, and the Champlain valleys are generally severe, while the Hudson Valley, Long Island, and the vicinity of New York City have moderate winters and hot summers.

Population.—New York has been since 1820 the most populous state in the Union. The Federal Census returns of 1910 place the population at 9,115,279; the State Census of 1905 placed it at 8,067,308. The City of New York in 1910 comprised 1,766,883 souls. It is one of the centres of the population of the world. In a circle of 600 square miles area with its centre at the Battery (the same area as that of Greater London) there are dwelling six millions of people, or scarcely a million, than in the London district, which can be remembered in one minute. This metropolitan district is the most cosmopolitan community in the world. Its urban character is most varied and interesting. One division of it, the City of New York proper, is so large that if divided it would make three cities such as Chicago, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh. Yet nearly a million and a half of people live outside the limits of the city and within the indicated area.

The cities of Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Albany, and Troy are the five next in size; according to the census of 1910 they include respectively 233,715, 218,149, 137,249, 100,233, and 76,813 people. In 1906 there were 821 Indians still on the State Reservations. There were 47 municipalities in New York in 1900 having a population of more than 5000 people, and in them 68.5 per cent of the people dwelt. In 1900 there were 3,614,780 males and 3,654,114 females in the State. There were 99,232 coloured people, 1,900,425 of the population or a little less than one quarter were foreign born. Of these there were 104,026 Germans, 65,255 Swedes, 82,188 Russians, 13,660 Russian (mostly Hebrews), and 135,665 English—to mention only the largest groups. The total population in the State in 1790 was 310,120 by the first Federal Census. In 120 years it has increased more than twenty-six times.

In 1906, according to the Federal Census Bureau, there were 2,283,768 Roman Catholics in New York, forming 63.6 per cent of the total of 3,591,974 religious communicants or church members in the State of New York. It is the largest religious denomination in the State. However, only 43.7 per cent of the people of the State claimed membership in any church or denomination. In 1906 there were 278 Roman Catholic parishes in New York, 189,386 Roman Catholic communicants, and 86.6 per cent over the figures of the census reports of 1890. The number of Protestant Episcopal communicants at the same date in the State was 24 for each 1000 of the population. In 1906 the Federal Census reports show that in the State of New York the number of churches and halls for worship was 9,165, having a seating capacity of 3,191,267. There were also 50,000 scholars valued at $222,237,335, the Sunday schools were 7,995 in number and attended by 1,247,051 scholars. The entire value of all church property was $255,106,824, on which the debt was $28,382,866. The Catholic Annual for 1910 shows the following carefully gathered for the dioceses of New York State. All these data should be noted, are wholly included within the State boundaries and together comprise the whole State:

These Catholic estimates are interesting for the purposes of comparison with those of the official reports, and particularly as being in advance of the results of the Federal Census of 1910, which are now being prepared but cannot be published in detail for some years to come. Present the population of the State of New York, according to the census of 1910, is 9,113,279, about one-tenth of the entire population of the United States.

MORTALITY AND RESURRECTION.—New York is the wealthiest State in the Union. The aggregate value of all the property within the State was in 1901, as estimated by the Federal Census Bureau, was $14,769,012,207, of which $9,151,929,081 represented real property and improvements. The revenue of the State Government in 1908-9 was $52,257,399. The City of New York received the entire revenue of $538,906,398 in 1908, and had in the same year a funded debt of $580,012,644. The resources of the State of New York lie first in its commerce, and then in its manufactures, agriculture, and mining.

Commerce.—In 1908 New York City was the third shipping port of the world, being surpassed only by London and Liverpool. Its imports were valued at approximately 780 millions and its exports 600 millions. The tonnage movement of foreign trade for the year ending June 30, 1909, was entered, 12,528,723 tons; cleared, 11,866,431 tons. The shipping of the inland waters of the Great Lakes under the State of New York as of equal vast extent. Buffalo, with a population of over 300,000, receives in its port on Lake Erie a large portion of the shipping trade of Canada and of the Lake States of the Union. The other ports of Lakes Erie and Ontario are similar prosperous.

Manufactures.—New York is the leading State of the Union in manufactures. In 1908, the value of manufactures was $2,786,070,000, and the value of its manufactures products was approximately $2,500,000,000. In the same year it produced 47 per cent of the men's and 70 per cent of the women's clothes made in the United States. The value of its textile output in the same year was $111,571,226. Onondaga.—In 1910 the town of Onondaga had 226,720 farms of a total area of 22,641 acres, of which 15,599,986 acres were improved land. The principal crops are maize, wheat, oats, potatoes, and hay. The wool clip in 1908 was estimated at 5,100,000 pounds. The largest dairy interests in the United States are within the State of New York.

Minerals.—The mines of the State in 1908 yielded products valued at $45,909,861; the quarries produced building stone valued at $8,137,279. The Onondaga salt springs produced in the same year products of the value of $2,186,738, while the petroleum wells yielded $2,097,533 worth of crude petroleum.

Public Debt.—The State of New York has no funded debt except for the State bonds. Its outstanding bonds for these purposes for 30 September, 1909, aggregated $11,230,600. It has no direct taxation. It has a surplus in its treasury. The assessed valuation of the taxable property within the State for 1909 was just short of $10,000,000,000. The title of "Empire State," given to New York by common consent, is well deserved.

Educational System.—The public educational system of New York is extensive and arranged upon broad plans. It is governed by a general revised statute of more than 2000 sections called "Education Law", adopted in 1910. This now provides for a central organization called the "Education Department," composed of the regents of the University of the State of New York, who are the legislative branch, and the Commissioner of Education, who is made the chief executive officer of the system and of the regents. The work of the Educational Department is divided into three parts, the common schools, the academic or secondary schools, and the colleges and universities. The head of the regents is the chancellor. Executive control, however, is entrusted to the commissioner of education, who, with his assistants and subordinates, has charge of the enormous details of the entire educational system of the State.
under the legislative control of the regents and the direction of the statutes of the State passed by the legislature. There are controlled and under the jurisdiction of the State separate corporations, formed either by the regents or by special statutes. They are under either private or municipal control. There is no State university as such, although Cornell University has been given many of the privileges and State aid usually granted to such an institution. These corporations are subject, however, to the provisions of the Education Law and the jurisdiction of the Education Department. The academic or secondary schools are also either private or public. The public secondary schools are directly in charge of the school boards and boards of education of the various divisions of the State. The private academies may enroll themselves under the laws of the State and pay a nominal tax to the public. The private schools are enrolled in the school districts of the State. Their diplomas are recognized and their examinations are given, and the diplomas of the public academies in respect to examinations and certificates from the Education Department. There is, however, no legal compulsion put upon them in this respect. The common schools of the State are divided generally into those which are controlled by the local boards of education in the cities and towns, and those which are controlled by the local school officials elected by the people in the school districts in other parts of the State. Woman suffrage is granted in school officers' elections. In the great cities of the State the common and secondary schools are usually placed in charge of school boards and officers provided for in the city charters, which are in the form of statutes enacted by the legislature.

In New York City is situated the large college known as the College of the City of New York, maintained at public expense. It has the most extensive buildings for educational purposes in the city and an enrollment of more than 5,750 pupils. On the Hudson, at West Point, is situated the famous United States Military Academy and for the most part is entirely under Federal control through the War Department, and has 525 cadets in attendance. The professional schools of the State of all classes are controlled by the Education Department under stringent provisions. Admission to the secular classes is generally granted by State certificates authorized by rigid examinations by State examining boards. There is also one for the Catholic schools which are also either under departmental control or, in the more populous centers, under the control of the several boards of education of the localities. Primary education is compulsory between the ages of seven and sixteen years. The State does not interfere, however, with the liberty of choice of schools by parents. No discrimination is made against parochial and private schools, which have enrolled themselves with the Education Department: they receive, however, no public financial aid, if the small grant made by the Department to defray the cost of examinations in the enrolled secondary schools be excepted.

In 1908 there were 1,841,638 children between five and sixteen years of age in the State, of whom there were 1,273,751 pupils and 30,132 teachers in the public schools. The academies or secondary schools of the State had 95,170 pupils and 1,238 teachers; the colleges and universities had 22,097 students and 2,999 teachers. There were 12,008 public school buildings, 144 public secondary schools or academies, and 30 colleges and universities. The appropriation of public moneys for educational purposes in New York State for the year 1907 was $36,319,624. The City of New York alone paid in 1909 for public school education $36,319,624. Its schools contained 730,234 pupils and had 17,073 teachers and directors. The public statistics of the Department of Education of New York State show that there are 153 parochial schools besides numerous academies and colleges, were conducted under the auspices of the Catholic Church in New York in 1908. The number of pupils in the Catholic educational institutions of the State cannot be given certainly, and the schools and academies make no public reports, but it is conservatively estimated that 210,000 pupils were in the Catholic schools in 1908. The State Education Department reported that in 1907, 179,677 pupils were registered as in the Roman Catholic Elementary Schools alone. The Catholic Annual of 1910 states: "The system of education under Catholic care including the orphans and other inmates of charitable institutions as 260,420.

There are many excellent high schools and academies in the State conducted by the Catholic teaching orders of men and women and by secular priests and laymen. The colleges under Catholic auspices are: New York University, St. Francis Xavier College, Manhattan College, St. Bonaventure College, St. Francis College, St. John's College, Brooklyn—all in New York City; Canisius College at Buffalo, Niagara University at Niagara Falls, and the College of New Rochelle, a flourishing college for women in charge of the Ursuline Nuns. All of these institutions are under the jurisdiction of the Education Department of the State. The Corporation of the City of New York is given in the Constitution of the State a provision that neither the State nor any subdivision thereof should use its property or credit or any public money or authorize or permit either to be used directly or indirectly in aid or maintenance thereof for any examination or inspection of any school or institution of learning wholly or in part under the control of a denomination or in which any denominational tenet or doctrine is taught. The Catholic seminaries for the education of priests are flourishing. The great novitiates of the Jesuits, Redemptorists, and Christian Brothers, and several others maintained by various religious orders, are in the Hudson Valley, south of Poughkeepsie. To the north are the St. Joseph's College at Dunwoodie, Westchester County, which is the monument of the late Archbishop Corrigan, one of the leading seminaries of the United States. The diocesan seminaries of St. John's at Brooklyn, St. Bernard's at Rochester, and the Seminary of Our Lady of Angels, conducted by the priests of the Mission at Niagara Falls, in the Diocese of Buffalo, are of the highest standard of theological instruction.

MILITIA.—The militia of the State, which is composed exclusively of volunteers, numbers 17,038 trained officers and men in all the arms of the military service. It is intended to form the nucleus of a military force in time of need by training volunteer citizen-soldiers in the military art. It is most liberally supported by the State and is kept in training in cooperation with the Federal Government.

LIBRARIES.—The libraries of the State are numerous and important. The Education Department maintains a generous system for the establishment of libraries and provides generous State aid for their support. The great library of the State is the New York Public Library, in whose collections of books, pamphlets, newspapers, etc., are 1,449,260 books and 295,067 pamphlets, in all 1,431,338 volumes. It will soon (1911) occupy the magnificent building erected by the City of New York in Bryant Square at Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street, which has been completed. It is largely endowed by the testaments of the late John Jacob Astor and Mrs. James Lenox, and Samuel J. Tilden, and receives aid from the City Treasury.

HISTORY.—The territory which now forms the State of New York may, as regards its history, be divided into two parts. The first part includes the Hudson River valley, the valley of the Mohawk, the land around Newark Bay and New York Harbour, and the western part of the State, and is generally, of speaking generally, were, together with the sparse Delaware River settlements, the only portions of New Netherland actually occupied by the Dutch when the province was granted by the English Crown to the Duke of York in 1664. The second part comprises the rest of the State excluding eastern Long Island: this was the Indian country, the home of the Iroquois and the other tribes forming the Five Nations, now mostly remembered from the old romances, but a savage and fierce race of people. The Dutch and English colonists. As late as 1756 there were only two countries to be found in the entire province west of the Hudson River. Interposed between the French and the Dutch (and afterwards the English), and brought from time to time into their quarrels for supremacy, the Indians kept the land between the Great Lakes, the Hudson, and the Ohio, in view of its "dark and bloody geography" until the close of the eighteenth century, as part of the military operations of the Revolution, the expedition of the American forces, sent by Washington under command of General John Sullivan, finally broke their power at the Battle of Newton near Elmira in 1779.

Although their military power was thus destroyed, the Indians still remained a menace to the settlers in remote districts for many years. Gradually, however, their opposition was overcome, and they finally became the wards of the State, living on reservations set apart for their exclusive occupancy. A remnant of them (1821 in the year 1905) still survives. Early in the nineteenth century, large grants of land began to be made to the State for the support of the poor and promoters for the purpose of fostering occupation by settlers. Systematic colonization was immediately undertaken, and a large emigration from Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and the Dutch settlements in the Hudson Valley began to flow into the Iroquois country. This continued prosperously, but especially with the gift of a large grant to the State by the late Robert R. Livingston, in which great figures in the history of New York upon his taking the office of Governor in 1811, pressed forward vigorously the long-standing plans for the construction and completion of the great artificial waterways of the State, the Erie and the Champlain canals. English immigration then became essential to supply the labour needed for the success of these plans. Stalwart men and women flocked from the British Islands and Germany in astounding numbers, and in forty years the population of New York City increased more than six times (from 33,131 in 1790 to 202,589 in 1830). The labouring men, who worked outside the cities on the public works, with their families became settlers in the various sections. In the midst of the canals, the general prosperity which succeeded the successful completion of these works and their operation, and the consequent enormous development of the State's resources, drew others into the territory. The population of the State of New York itself increased from 340,120 in 1790 to 1,019,608 in 1830.

The European immigrants thus began to include a large proportion of Catholics. Bishop Dubois estimated that in 1830 there were 32,000 Catholics in New York City and 150,000 throughout the rest of the State and in northern New Jersey, made up chiefly of poor emigrants. The Irish element was very large, and the first Catholic congregations in New York were in some cases almost wholly Irish. To them soon came their devoted missionary priests to minister to them in the Faith which had survived among their race and grown even brighter in the night of the iniquitous penal days, which had then but just begun to pass away. The State of New York, because of the uncertain boundaries of the old Dutch province and New Netherland, at one time laid claim to a country which now comprises the State of Vermont, and also to part of the land now lying in western Massachusetts and Connecticut. These claims were settled by mutual agreement in due course and the boundaries were fixed. The State of Vermont therefore became the fourteenth State of the Union in 1791, being the first admitted after the adoption of the United States Constitution in 1789. The first complete State Constitution framed after the Revolution was that of New York. It was adopted on 29 April 1777, at Kingston on the Hudson. John Jay, George Clinton, and Alexander Hamilton were its principal framers. The City of New York became the capital of the State after the Revolution, as it had been the capital of the Province of New York before. Upon the adoption of the United States Constitution in 1789 it became the capital of the United States. President Washington was inaugurated there at Federal Hall at the head of Broad Street, the first capital of the United States. His house stood at the foot of the street leading up to Federal Hall, the Washington Building. In 1790 the capital of the United States was removed to Philadelphia, and in 1797 the capital of the State was removed to Albany where it has since remained. Since 1820 the City of New York has been the commercial and financial centre of the continent of North America.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY. — On 8 April, 1808, the Holy See created the Diocese of New York coincidently with the establishment of the American Hierarchy by the erection of Baltimore to be an Archiepiscopal See with New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Bardstown (now Louisville) as suffragan sees. Doctor Richard Luke Concanan, an Irish Dominican priest in Rome, domiciled in New York, but died at Naples in 1809, while awaiting an opportunity to chafe Napoleon Bonaparte's embargo and set out for his see. After a delay of six years his successor Bishop John Connolly, also a Dominican, arrived at New York in November, 1815, and ministered as the first resident bishop to his scattered congregations of Irish Catholics. At that time, he describes himself as "mostly Irish") in union with the four priests, who were all he had to help him throughout his immense diocese. He died on 5 February, 1825, after a devoted and self-sacrificing episcopate, and is buried under the altar of the new St. Patrick's Cathedral. During the vacancy of the see, preceding the arrival of Bishop Connolly (1808-15), the diocesan affairs were administered by Father Anthony Kohlmann (q. v.). He rebuilt St. Peter's church in Barclay Street, and in 1809 bought the site of old St. Patrick's Cathedra in Mott Street, the building of which he finished in 1815. He also bought in 1809 the land and old residence in the large Gives Block on Fifth Street—part of which is the site of the present St. Patrick's Cathedral—and there established a flourishing boys' school called the New York Literary Institution.

In 1822 the diocesan statistics were: two churches in New York City, one in Albany; one in Utica, one in Auburn, one at Catskill on the Black River, all of which were served by one bishop and eight priests. Bishop Connolly was succeeded on 29 October, 1826, by John Dubois (q. v.), a Frenchman who had been a fellow student of Rohespierre and was one of the émigré priests of the French Revolution. He was one of the founders of Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Maryland—"the mother of priests," as it has been called—and passed through the cholera epidemic of 1822, when 3000 people died in the City of New York between July and October. He increased the churches and brought to his diocese zealots priests. It is noteworthy that he ordained to the priesthood at St. Patrick's in June, 1836, the Venerable Father McGivney (q. v.), afterwards the Bishop of Philadelphia. After a life of arduous labour, trial, and anxiety both as a missionary, an educator, and a pioneer bishop, his health broke down, and he was granted in 1837 as confidant John Hughes (q. v.), who justly bears the most distinguished name in the annals of the American hierarchy even to this day.
Bishop Hughes was consecrated on 9 February, 1838. A stroke of paralysis attacked the venerable Bishop Dubois a few weeks before, and he became an invalid until his death on 20 December, 1842, whereupon he was succeeded by his coadjutor as Bishop of New York. In April, 1847, the Sees of Albany and Buffalo were created. Bishop John McCloskey (q. v.), afterwards the first American cardinal, who was then Coadjutor Bishop of New York, was transferred to Albany, and Rev. John J. Farley, Supertendent of the Congregation of the Mission, was made Bishop of Buffalo. In October, 1850, the Diocese of New York was erected into an archiepiscopal see with the Sees of Boston, Hartford, Albany, and Buffalo as its suffragans. Archbishop Hughes sailed for Rome in the following month, and received the pallium from the hands of the Pope himself.

The career of Archbishop Hughes and the history of his archiepiscopal and its suffragan sees are fully treated under their appropriate titles, and need not be discussed here. The life of Archbishop Hughes marked the great formative period in the history of the present Church in New York. His great work in the cause of education, in the establishment of the parochial school system, the separation of ecclesiastical and other religious orders, and the erection of seminaries and colleges for the training of candidates for the priesthood, as well as in the solution of the tremendous problems connected with the building up of the churches and charities and the preservation of the Faith, had a profound effect upon the attitude of the State of New York towards religious and ecclesiastical matters. The Know-nothing movement of the fifties (see KNOW-NOTHING) was profoundly felt in New York, but the number and importance of the Catholic population protected them from the cowardly assaults made upon the Catholics in other places. The presence of Archbishop Hughes was a great factor in strengthening the forces defending the overwhelming defeat which this un-American movement met. The only effect of this sectarian agitation upon the legislation of the State was the passage in 1853 of a plainly unconstitutional statute which sought to prevent Catholic bishops from holding title to property in trust for churches or congregations of cults of no avail whatever. In 1862, after the Civil War began, it was quietly abandoned.

In 1853 the Dioceses of Brooklyn in New York and of Newark in New Jersey were established, the first Bishop of Brooklyn being Reverend John Longhlin and the first Bishop of Newark Reverend James Roosevelt Bayley (q. v.), who later became Archbishop of Newark. In 1855 the Diocese of Rochester was separated from Albany, and the venerable and beloved apostle of Catholicism in north-western New York, Bishop Bernard J. McQuaid (q. v.), appointed its first bishop.

In 1872 the Diocese of Ogdensburg was created, and in November, 1886, the youngest diocese of the State was established. It is unnecessary to sketch further here the history of Catholicism in New York during the incumbency of the archiepiscopal office by Cardinal McCloskey, Archbishop Hughes's successor, and that of his successor Archbishop Corrigan, or of his Grace, John M. Farley, its present archbishop. It is sufficient to record the continual progress in the advancement of Catholic interests, in the building up of the Church and in adjusting its activities to the needs of the people.

Distinguished Catholics.—The Catholics of New York State have produced their full proportion of persons of distinction in the professions, commercial, political, and social life. Of the ninety-seven justices who now sit in the Supreme Court seventeen are of the Church. Among the lower courts are many Catholics. Since 1860 three mayors of New York City (Meets, Grace, Grant, and Gilroy) have been Catholics. Francis Kerman was United States Senator for New York from 1876-82. Denis J. Brennan, closely connected with the Catholic cause, was for many years the Clerk of the New York Supreme Court and was twice Chief Clerk of the Court of Appeals, the court of last resort, by his retirement for age in 1908 after a continuous service of eighteen years. The first Catholic Justice of the Supreme Court was John R. Brady, elected in 1859, and loyal sons of the Church have been on that bench ever since. Mayors of the great cities of the State, prominent journalists, architects, and members of Congress, and a multitude of other public officers have been chosen from the Catholic citizenship ever since the beginning of the nineteenth century and have rendered distinguished service to the State. For many years the two brilliant leaders of the New York Bar were Charles O'Connor and James T. Barron, sons of Irish Catholic immigrants. In medicine Gaming S. Bell and Thomas A. Aldrich are well kept for many years the Catholic name at the top of the profession, and they have now worthy successors. In the great public works and industries of the State Catholics have had more than their share of the labour and its rewards. In the commercial life of New York some of the largest fortunes have been honourably earned by Catholic men, who have been most generous to the religious and charitable works of the State.

Legal.—The State of New York has a constitutional government. It was the model of that of the United States of America. The union of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government under one head, the only constitutional head, with the executive head as the governor. The constitution of 1846, under which this State is now governed, was adopted by the State Convention in the same year and 1846, in accordance with the provision of the federal Constitution.

The State of New York has always been foremost in the pursuit of freedom of worship and religious toleration. It is true, however, that her first Constitution in 1777 excluded all priests and ministers of the Gospel from her legislature and offices, and put a prohibitory statute upon the distribution of religious tracts for citizenship. Herein we find an echo of the bitter intolerance of the eighteenth century, which was strongly opposed in the Convention. The naturalization disability disappeared very soon on the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789, and, by subsequent constitutional amendments, all these restraints of antinomian bigotry have been removed. The first able to find a home in New York was Benjamin Franklin, the first American able to find a home in New York, the first American

New Netherland, and the other emigrants and their descendants who came within their influence in the Province of New York, early learned the value and reason of religious toleration. The Dutchmen in America did not persecute for religion's sake.

The present civil relations of the Catholic Church to the State of New York and the history form an interesting study. The Dutch Colony of the seventeenth century was officially intolerantly Protestant, but was, as has been noted, in practice tolerant and fair to people of other faiths who dwelt within New Netherland. When the English took the province from the Dutch in 1664, they granted full religious toleration to the other forms of Protestantism and preserved the property rights of the Dutch Reformed Church, while recognizing its discipline. The General Assembly of the province held in 1682 under the tenure of Rev. Thomas Dongan, an Irish Catholic nobleman, adopted the Charter of Liberties, which proclaimed religious liberty to all Christians. Although this charter did not receive formal royal sanction, the fact of religious toleration was nevertheless universally recognized. In 1688 the Stuart Revolution in England reversed this policy of liberality, and the Dutch settlers and all church members of the mother-country, in all its bitter intolerance and persecution by law of the Catholic Church and its adherents. In 1697, although the Anglican Church was never formally established in the Province of New York, Trinity Church was founded in the City of New York by royal charter, and received many charters and other liberal favors, being the source of its present great wealth. The Dutch Reformed Churches continued, however, to enjoy their property and the protection of their rights undisturbed by the new Anglican foundation, the inhabitants of Dutch blood being then largely in the ascendancy. This condition continued many years, for it is a fact that the Dutch, who had the majority of the inhabitants of the Province of New York, were, contrary to general belief, not of English descent.

The political conditions at home, and also the long contest between England and France for the control of North America resulted, as has been stated, in the enactment of the several forms of religious and civil laws, which were extended in many cases principally against the Catholic missioners among the Iroquois, who were almost exclusively Frenchmen. They were adopted also, it is consoing to think, against the protest of many of the best of the colonial legislators and under the urging of authority, and were rarely enforced. The several acts of the colonial legislatures concerning the Catholic Church were not enforced by the royal governor, having been declared unconstitutional. The Constitution of 1777 in all the colonies, and the State Constitution of 1777 provided, as has been seen, for general religious liberty. The Legislature in 1784 carried out the declaration. It provided "that an universal equality between every religious denomination, according to the true spirit of the Constitution, toward each other shall forever prevail," and following this by a general act providing for the incorporation of churches and religious societies under clear general rules, few, simple, and easy for all. This law made a most unusual provision in aid of justice for the vesting in these corporate bodies immediately of "all the temporalities granted or devised directly to said church, congregation or society, or any person or body of persons whatsoever," and although such gift, grant or devise may not have strictly been agreeable to the rigid rules of law, or might on strict construction be defeated by the operation of the statutes of mortmain." It made provision also with great presence for the protection of clergy-men from the exercise of arbitrary power by the lay directors of religious houses, by empowering the trustees of the church the power to fix the salary of the clergyman and by requiring the congregation to fix it at special meetings. To prevent abuses, however, and in accordance with legal tradition and precedent, restrictions upon the amount of real estate and personal property which a church might hold, the Constitution of the State of New York was placed in control of all such matters by requiring that annual reports should be made by the churches to it. This was the case crystallized of the principle of the Constitution, that, while the State protects and fosters religion in its beneficent work, it must not interfere in religious matters. It is as follows: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed, adjudged, or taken to abridge or affect the rights of conscience or private judgment or in the least to alter or change the religious constitutions or governments of other than the said churches, congregations or societies, so far as respects or in any wise concern the doctrine, discipline or worship thereof."

The Constitution of 1777 and the legislation of the Revolutionary period in aid of it are remarkable for their deep sagacity and great grasp of principles, as well as for the conservative and same treatment of the innovations and novelties which the radical changes in the government made necessary. This is the more remarkable when it is remembered that this Constitution was adopted in time of war and was framed by men who laid down their arms in most cases to join in the deliberations upon it, and that the Legislature first met immediately after the close of this war time. It was besides a venture in an almost virgin field.
and breadth are priceless treasures of the citizens of New York. The peaceful and patient working of the Constitution is due, no doubt, particularly in the present day, to the correct construction and interpretation of the law for the State. It enacts that the law of the State should be constituted of the Common Law of England and of the Acts of the Legislature of the Colony of New York, as together forming the law of the colony on 19 April, 1775 (the day of the battle of Concord and Lexington). It was expressly declared, however, "that all such parts of the said Common Law and all such of the said Statutes and Acts aforsaid or parts thereof as may be construed to establish or maintain any particular denomination of Christians or their ministers, are repugnant to this constitution and hereby are abrogated and rejected."

To New York belongs the honour of having been the first of the English-speaking states from the time of the Protestant Reformation, to protect by its courts and laws, the secrecy and sanctity of auricular confession. In June, 1813, it was judicially determined that auricular confession as a part of church discipline protects the priest from being compelled in a court of law to testify to statements made to him therein. The decision in the so-called Dodge's Case, in which the Mayor's Court of New York City on the trial of one Phillips for theft, and the priest, whose protest was there considered, was the revered Father Anthony Kohlmann mentioned above. The decision is more remarkable because it was contrary to the principles of the English cases, and the opposite view had the support of Sir William Blackstone. Although no form of religion is considered by the State of New York as having rights superior to any other, yet the fact of the existence of the Christian religion as the predominating faith of the people has been uniformly recognized by the courts, constitutional conventions, and legislatures. As early as 1711, Chancellor Kent, writing the opinion of the Court of Appeals in the case of Phillips v. Johnson (294), made the celebrated dictum: "We are a Christian people and the morality of the country is deeply ingrained upon Christianity." This famous case arose on the conviction of the defendant for blasphemy in maliciously reviling Jesus Christ in a public place. In the absence of a specific statute the question was whether the defendant was guilty of the common law offence of blasphemy. The Court held that it was, because to vilify the Author of Christianity under the circumstances presented was a gross violation of decency and good order, and blasphemy was an abuse of the right of religious liberty. The court further held that, though the Constitution discarded religious establishments and prohibited the taking of oaths on the part of those offences against religion and morality which have no reference to any such establishment or to any particular form of government, but are punishable because they strike at the root of moral obligation and weaken social ties; that the Constitution never meant to withdraw religion in general, and with it the best social and moral culture and social virtues, from the consideration and notice of the law; and that the framers intended only to banish test oaths, disabilities and the burdens, and sometimes the oppressions, of Church establishments, and to secure the people of the State freedom from coercion and an equality of right on the subject of religion.

This decision of the Supreme Court that, although Christianity is not the religion of the State, considered as a political corporation, it is nevertheless closely interwoven into the texture of society and is intimately connected with all the social habits, customs, and modes of life of the people, gave offence in certain quarters. In view of this Huggles case, an amendment was proposed to the framers of the said Convention of 1821 to the effect that the judiciary should not declare any particular religion to be the law of the land. It was rejected after a full debate in which its opponents, while differing in details, agreed "that the Christian religion was engrained upon the law and entitled to protection in the laws of morals and the strength of Government." In 1851 a similar question was presented for decision in the well-known case of Landenmiller vs. People (33 Barb. Reports 548). The plaintiff sought from the court an injunction to restrain the police of New York City from interfering with theatrical performances on Sunday. The opinion of the Supreme Court was written by Justice Covert as the decision of the highest court. It contains an admirable and exhaustive study of the Sunday laws. It takes the claim of the plaintiff, stated broadly, to be that "the Bible, and religion with all its ordinances, including the Sabbath, are as effectually abolished by the Constitution as the Established Church in France during the Revolution, and so effectually abolished that duties may not be enforced as duties to the State because they have been heretofore associated with acts of religious worship or connected with religious duties." It then proceeds: "It would be strange that a people, Christian in doctrine and worship, and with many of the usages of the Church of England and the Reformed Churches, should be denied these shrines for the privilege of worshipping God in simplicity and purity of faith, and who regarded religion as the basis of their civil liberty and the foundation of their rights, should, in their zeal to secure to all the freedom of conscience which they valued so highly, solemnly repudiate and put beyond the pale of the law the forms which were used by the old Church of England to crown the throne of God, who, they openly and avowedly profess to believe, had been their protector and guide as a people." The Court announced the broad decision that every act done, maliciously tending to bring religion into contempt, may be punished at common law, and the Christian Sabbath, as one of the institutions of religion in the United States, may be described by such laws as the Legislature in their wisdom may deem necessary to secure to the community the privilege of an undisturbed worship, and to the day itself that outward respect and observance which may be deemed essential to the peace and good order of society, and to preserve religion and its ordinances from open reviling and contempt. It further held that this exercise of power by the Legislature is a duty of the State to the community and to the State. This decision firmly established the proposition that, as a civil and political institution, the establishment and regulation of a Sabbath are within the just powers of civil government. It remains the law of the State confirmed by many decisions up to this time.

To New York has been due the passing of many important questions of law, time to time in the courts as to how far the English doctrines as to "superstitions uses", mortmain, and charities, especially in relation to the ownership of lands by religious corporations and charitable corporations and as to their capacity to take charitable bequests and devises, remained the law of the State under the Constitution, and so specific a decision by the courts, as expressly held that that English post-Reformation doctrine has no place in this State; that those professing the Roman Catholic Faith are entitled in law to the same respect and protection in their religious observances as those of any other denomination, and that these observances cannot be condemned as superstitions by any court as matter of law. The right to make provision for Masses for the dead by contracts made inter vivos was expressly proclaimed by the Court of Appeals. Direct bequests for Masses are in law "charities" and to be considered as such. As to these charities generally, the Court of Appeals in 1888 settled finally after much discussion that the English doctrine of charity was not popularly held, and its refinements, was not the law in New York; that the settled policy of the State was clear, and consisted in the creation of a system of public charities to be ad-administered through the medium of corporate bodies, created by legislative power and endowed with the same legal capacity to hold property for their corporate purposes, as a private person or an ordinary private corporation had to receive and hold transfers of property. It was decided, therefore, in the leading case of Holland vs. Alocq (108 New York Reports 329), that religious corporations could not be made defensible as such except to incorporated churches or other corporations having legal power to take property for such purposes. There is no difficulty in practice, however, in this regard, as Mass legacies are now either given to an incorporated church directly, or are left as personal bequests accompanied by requests, which in no case do derogate from the absolute quality of the gift.

However, it is to be noted that the rules laid down by the Court of Appeals in the matter of charities have been radically changed by legislation since 1888. The decision of the Court of Appeals in the Tilden will case, by which the elaborate plans for public charity made by Samuel J. Tilden were defeated by the application of these rules, was followed almost immediately by Chapter 701 of the Laws of 1883, which provides that gifts by will for charitable purposes shall not be defeated because of indefiniteness in designating the beneficiaries, and that the power in the regulation of the gifts for charitable purposes formerly exercised by the Court of Chancery under the ancient law of England, have been transferred to the Supreme Court as a Court of Equity. The Court of Appeals construing this statute has held that the existence of a competent corporation or other definable trustee with power to take is no longer necessary for the validity of a trust for charitable uses, and that any legal trust for such purposes may be executed by proper trustee. If none are named, and the trust will be administered by the Supreme Court. It is important to note, however, that this act must be confined to the cases to which it applies, and that it does not enable an unincorporated charity or association to take bequests or devises.

There exist, however, notwithstanding the liberality of the New York system, some important restrictions upon the conduct of religious and charitable corporations. The better opinion and the weight of judicial authority are, that, notwithstanding the repealing act of the Legislature of 1788 above noted, the English statutes of Elizabeth, which restricted religious and charitable corporations, may hold in the absence of a contrary statute, until their real estate has been adopted as the law of this State, and that such acts can only be lawfully done under the order of the Supreme Court. Limitations upon the value of the property and the amount of the income of religious and charitable corporations have also been uniformly made by the New York Statutes. The present law, however, is most liberal in this respect, the property of such corporations being limited to $6,000,000 and the annual income to $600,000, and provision is also made that no increase in the value of property arising otherwise than from improvements made thereon by the owners shall be taken into account. By recent act also the strict requirements for accounting to the Supreme Court, the successor of the Court of Chancery, as to their property and income, which in the early statutes controlled such corporations, are confined to cases where the attorney-general intervenes for the purpose by petition to the Supreme Court upon proper cause being shown.

The law of New York on the general subject of the Church and the religious depositions of the latter before the law has been defined by the statutes and numerous decisions. The results may be briefly stated as follows: Religious societies as such are not legal entities, although as an aggregation of the individuals composing them, for motives of convenience, they are recognized as existing in certain cases. They can neither sue nor be sued in civil courts. They cannot hold property directly, although they may control property held by others for their use or upon trusts created by them. The existence, however, of the Church proper, as an organized legal entity, is not recognized by the municipal laws of New York. There is no statute which authorizes the incorporation of the Church at large. The incorporation is generally made of the congregation or assemblage of persons accustomed stedily to meet for Divine worship, although provision has been made for the incorporation of special ecclesiastical bodies with governing authority over churches. For example, the Catholic dioceses of Albany, Buffalo, and Rochester have been thus incorporated formally. The general plan provided especially for the incorporation and government of the churches of the separate denominations, as gathered into congregations. Each important denomination, therefore, has its own particular provisions in the Religious Corporation Law, the general statute of the State which has codified these laws and decisions. In the case of the Roman Catholic Church, incorporation is obtained in this way. A certificate of incorporation must be executed by the archbishop or bishop, the vicar-general of the diocese, the rector of the congregation, and two laymen thereof, selected by such officials or a majority of them. It must state the corporate name of the church, and also state where its principal place of worship exists or is intended to be located. On filing such certificate with the clerk of the county in which the principal place of worship is or is intended to be, or with the Secretary of State in certain cases, the corporation is created.

Questions of the civil rights of persons, relating either to themselves or to the corporeal property, and their relations to church organizations, are as a matter of course the subject of adjudication in the civil tribunals. Judicial notice will be taken of the existence of the church discipline or government in some cases, and it is always the subject of evidence. When, therefore, personal rights and rights of property are in cases in the courts dependent upon questions of doctrine, discipline, church government, customs, or law, the civil court will consider as controlling and binding the determinations made on such questions by the highest tribunal within the Church to which they have been presented. While a clergyman, or other person, may always insist that his civil or property rights as an individual shall be regulated by the law of the land, his relations, rights, and obligations arising from his position as a member of some religious body must be determined according to the laws and procedure enacted by that body for such purpose. Where it appears, therefore, in one case that questions growing out of relations between a priest and his bishop, and been submitted by the parish to an ecclesiastical tribunal which the church itself had organized for hearing such cases and was there decided by it, it was held by the Court of Appeals that the civil courts were justified in refusing to proceed further, and that the decision of the Church and bishop as to discipline and jurisdiction in the matter was a bar and a good defense (Baxter vs. McDonnell, 177 New York, 33). The Church at large, however, under the law of New York depends wholly upon moral power to carry on its functions, without the possibility of appeal to the civil authorities for aid either through the Legislature or the Court. Where there is no incorporation, those who deal with the Church must trust to the honor and good faith of the members. The congregations formed into civil corporations are governed by the principles of the common law and statute law. With their doctrinal peculiarities, and denominational character, the courts have nothing to do, except to carry out the statutes which protect their rights in this respect. However, these statutory rights are, as will be seen, very extensive. Generally speaking, whatever the corporation chooses to do that is within their corporate power is lawful except where restricted by express statute.

Control of Churches.—From time to time important restrictions upon the general power of the religious corporations in particular denominations have been made. The present Religious Corporation Law, for example, requires the trustees of such a body to administer the temporalities of the church in accordance with the denominational or ecclesiastical governing body, if any, with which the corporation is connected, and in accordance with the provisions of law relating thereto, and further for the support and maintenance of the corporation and its denominational or charitable work. It requires also the consent of the bishops and other officers of the religious denomination or ecclesiastical governing body, if any, with which the church corporation is connected, except in churches which have a congregational form of government.

Ecclesiastical Persons.—The relations of ecclesiastical persons one to the other have also been considered by the courts. It has been held that the personal, civil, and religious character of such persons is as far as their form, force, and effect are concerned, it has been determined, however, that the relation of master and servant does not exist between a bishop and his priests, but only that of ecclesiastical superior and inferior. Finally, the courts have ruled that a priest or minister in any church by assuming that relation subjects himself to the jurisdiction of the court to the extent of his capacity to the law and customs of the ecclesiastical governing body from which he derives his office and in whose name he exercises his functions.

Marriage.—Until very recent times New York followed the common law respecting marriage. All that was required for a valid marriage was the deliberate consent of competent parties entering into a present agreement. No ceremony or intervention of a civil authority was necessary.

However, it is now provided that, although the contract of marriage is still in law a civil contract, marriages not ceremonial must be proven by writings authenticated by the parties under strict formalities and in the presence of at least two witnesses and registered in the county clerk's office. It is provided also that ceremonial marriages must not be celebrated without first obtaining a marriage license. It is to be noted, however, that a failure to procure the marriage license does not invalidate a ceremonial marriage, but only subjects the offending clergyman or magistrate, who officiates thereat, to the penalties prescribed in the statute. A clergyman and certain magistrates are given power to solemnize marriages. No particular form is required except that the parties must expressly declare that they take each other as husband or wife. In every case one witness besides the clergyman or magistrate must be present at the ceremony. It is provided, however, that modes of solemnizing marriage adopted by any religious denomination are to be regarded as valid notwithstanding the statute. This amending statute was passed at the session of 1867, and there are as yet no important adjudications upon it.

Annulment of Marriage.—An action to annul a marriage may be brought by a woman where she was under sixteen years of age at the time of the marriage and the consent of her parents or guardian was not had and the marriage was not consummated and not ratified by mutual assent after she attained the age of sixteen years. Either the husband or wife may sue for annulment of marriage for fraud, nonage, prior valid marriage, or because consent was obtained by force, duress, or fraud, and finally for physical incapacity under certain rigid restrictions. The tendency of the courts of late years is to construe the provision as to fraud liberally, and annulment has been granted on this ground where the husband has been proved to have seduced and deceived the wife into marriage, and again where false representations had been made before the marriage by the woman as to the birth of a child to the plaintiff. The Court of Appeals in the last case held, as the reasonable construction of the statute, that the essential fact to be shown was that the fraud was material to the degree that, if the parties had known to the contrary, they would not have consented to the marriage (Di Lorenzo vs. Di Lorenzo, 174 New York, 467 and 471). This decision, it should be noted, was put squarely on the ground that in New York marriage is a civil contract to which the consent of parties capable in law of contracting is essential, and, where the consent is obtained by fraud, the marriage is voidable and may be annulled at the option of the party injured, without regard to the case of any other contract. Condensation of the force, duress, or fraud is required to be assumed from the fact of voluntary cohabitation after knowledge of the facts by the innocent party, and will, if established, defeat the action. Provision is also made for an action for the annulment of a marriage in certain cases, by either party where the marriage has been obtained by false representations or having it annulled or by a parent or guardian or next friend either in the lifetime of a party or after his or her death, where such an action will further the cause of justice.

Divorce.—Actions for absolute divorce and the dissolution of marriage can be maintained only for the cause of adultery. The present law for divorce unless both parties were residents of the State when the offence was committed, or were married within the State, or the plaintiff was a resident of the State at the time of the offence and is resident when the action is commenced, or finally when the offence was committed within the State and the injured party is a resident of the State when the action is commenced. Divorces obtained by citizens of New York in the courts of foreign jurisdiction are not recognized as valid in the State of New York unless personal jurisdiction of both of the parties is properly obtained by the foreign courts. Collusion of the parties is strictly guarded against. Condensation of the offence is made a defence. The action must be brought within five years after the发现 of the offence. Adultery by the plaintiff is a complete defense to the action. The provisions for the custody of the children of a dissolved marriage and for the maintenance of the innocent wife and children are very detailed and effective. Remarriage is forbidden to the guilty party during the life of the spouse, unless, after five years have elapsed, proof is made of his or her uniform good conduct, when the defendant may be permitted by the Court to marry again. The practical effect of these prohibitions is very slight because the entire validity of the subsequent marriages of guilty parties in New York divorce actions, when they are made out of the State of New York, is recognized by the New York courts, the only penalty provided for disclosure to the decree being the punishment of the offender for contempt of court, and the infliction of this penalty is unheard of at this season of the day. The division of property, certain kinds of benevolent corporations are still further restricted in respect to the portion of the property which persons which they may receive; in some cases it is only one-fourth. In respect to the invalidity by statute of legacies or devises made by wills executed within two months of the testator's death, this limitation was formerly widely applicable. Recent amendments have restricted it to the corporations formed under the old statutes, and it applies now to very few others, and these mostly corporations created by special statutes. Bequests and devises to unincorporated churches or charities, are, as has been stated, invalid. Foreign religious and charitable corporations, however, may take bequests and devises if authorized to do so by reference charters. They are also permitted to carry on unhampered the work in the State of New York. The legacies and devises to religious, charitable, and benevolent corporations are exempt from the succession tax assessed upon legacies and devises in ordinary cases.

Exemption from Taxation.—The Tax Law provides that the real and personal property of a "corporation or association organized exclusively for the moral or mental improvement of men or women or for religious, Bible, tract, charitable, benevolent, missionary, hospital, infirmary, educational, scientific, literary, library, patriotic, historical, or cemetery purposes or for the enforcement of law relating to children or animals" in which the entire proceeds for all purposes are used exclusively for carrying out thereupon one or more of such purposes, shall be exempt from taxation. Great care is taken, however, to protect against the abuse of this right of exemption. In some few cases further exemptions are also made; thus, for example, real property not in exclusive use for the above corporate purposes may be exempt from taxation if the property is devoted exclusively to the charitable use of the corporation. Property held by any officer of a religious denomination is entitled to the same exemption under the same conditions and exceptions as property held by a religious corporation itself.

Freedom of Worship.—It is expressly provided by statute that all persons committed to or taken charge of by incorporated or unincorporated houses of refuge, reformatories, protectories, or other penal institutions, receiving either public moneys or a per capita sum from any municipality for the support of inmates, shall be entitled to the free exercise and enjoyment of religious worship and religious services, without preference, and that these provisions may be enforced by the Supreme Court upon petition of any one feeling himself aggrieved by a violation of it (Prison Law Section 20). It is further provided that all children committed for destitution or delinquency by any court or public officer shall, as far as practicable, be sent to institutions of the same religious faith as the parents of the child.

Liquor Law.—The excise legislation of the State is treated in an elaborate general statute called the "Liquor Tax Law", but better known as the "Raines Law" from the name of the late Senator John Raines who drafted it. In substance it provides for a State Department of Excise presided over by a commissioner of excise, appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Senate, who is given charge of the issuance of all licences to traffic within the State in intoxicating liquor, and also of the collection of the licence fees and the supervision of the enforcement of the drastic penalties provided for violation of the law. The purpose was to make the granting of excise licences by the local authorities, who had in some cases greatly abused the power, and also to subject local peace and police officers to the scrutiny, and in some cases the control of the State authorities in excise matters. It has resulted generally in a great improvement in excise conditions throughout the State, as well as incidentally in an enormous increase in the revenue of the State from this source. It has caused the abstinence from drinking in the lower classes, denied them the pleasure of holding any social entertainment, and has improved general order and decency in the business of trafficking in liquor, especially in the congested parts of the cities. The principle of high license is carefully followed. The fee for a saloon licence, for example in the Borough of Manhattan, is $1200 per annum; the charge decreasing, according to the circumstances, to $150 per annum in the rural districts.

The State is divided into excise districts which are in charge of deputy commissioners supervised by the staff of the commissioner of excise at Albany. Although it is an unusual provision which thus centralizes the power over the liquor traffic at Albany, and it seems to violate the principle of home rule adopted by all the public parties; its experiment is on the whole successful with the State.

It should be noted that this law has created a very great abuse because of its provision attaching the right to sell liquor on Sunday to the keeping of hotels. There have thus sprung into existence the "Raines Law Hotels", which, satisfying the very inadequate provisions of the statute, obtain hotel licences without any legitimate business reason, and are under the guise of such purposes ipso facto used for the purpose of supplying liquor on Sunday. They are generally conducted as to their hotel accommodations in such a way as to be a menace to public order and decency in the poorer residential districts of the large cities of the State. They often defy police control, and their legal status makes their regulation or supervision most difficult. Earnest efforts have been made to close down many of them, but they have met with but partial success. Ample provision is also made for local option as to prohibitive liquor licences in all localities of the State excepting the larger cities. It has worked well in practice.

Clergyman.—Priests and ministers of the Gospel are exempted from service on juries and from service in the militia of the State. A clergyman is compelled to render the usual personal property to the extent of $1500 is exempt from taxation, if he is regularly engaged in performing his duties, is permanently disabled by impaired health, or is over seventy-five years old. The dwelling-houses and all religious corporations, actually used by the officiating clergyman thereon, are also exempt to the extent of $2000. Any clergyman who appeared at his pleasure to visit all the county jails, workhouses, and State prisons when he is in charge of a congregation in the town where they are located.

Holidays.—The legal holidays of the State are New Year's Day, Lincoln's Birthday (12 February), Washington's Birthday (22 February), Memorial Day (30 May), Independence Day (July 4), Labor Day (first Monday of September), Columbus Day (12 October), and Christmas Day. If any of these days fall on Sunday, the day following is a legal holiday. The statute also provides that the day of the general election, and each day appointed by the President of the United States or by the Governor of the State as a day of "general thanksgiving, general fasting and prayer, or other religious observances", is a legal holiday. Each Saturday, which is not a holiday, is a half-holiday. There is of course no religious significance in the creation of any of these holidays, as far as the State is concerned. Good Friday, by general custom, is observed as a holiday throughout the State, although it is not designated as a legal holiday. The religious sects of the local school systems throughout the State also provide liberty to both Christian and Jewish scholars to take time from the school attendance for religious observances on their respective holidays.

EDWARD J. McGUIRE.

New Zealand, formerly described as a colony, has, since September, 1907, by royal proclamation, been granted the style and designation of "Dominion", the territory remaining, of course, as before under British sovereignty. It consists of three main islands (North Island, South Island, sometimes also called Middle Island, and Stewart Island) and several smaller ones, the largest of which, Egmont, is the principal group. The smaller groups included within the dominion are the Chatham, Auckland, Campbell, Antipodes, Bounty, Kermade, and Cook Islands, along with half a dozen atolls situated outside the Cook Group. The total area of the dominion—104,751 square miles—is about one-seventh less than the British Isles. The climate is generous, and the quality of the grazing land available has made New Zealand a great wool, meat, and dairy-produce country. Its agricultural capabilities are very considerable; its forests yield excellent timber; and its mineral resources, though as yet but little developed, are not very varied in character. The country is made up of a mountainous real estate; much of which, Ngauruhoe, the highest cone of Mount Tongariro, was in active eruption in 1906, and a volcanic belt mark the centre of the North Island. In the North Island also is the wonderland of the boiling geyser—said by geologists to be the oldest in the world, with the exception of those in Wyoming and Idaho—and the famous of which, Tekapo, possesses great eruptive virtue for all rheumatic and skin diseases. An Alpine chain, studded with snow-clad peaks and mantled with glaciers of greater magnitude than any in the Alps of Europe, descends along the west coast of the South Island. In the South Island also are the famous Otago lakes (Wanaka, Wakatipu, Te Anau, and Manapouri) with the late Anthony Treadgold wrote, "I do not know that lake scenery could be finer". The south-west coast of the island is pierced by a series of sounds or fiords, rivalling in their exquisite beauty the Norwegian and Alaskan fiords; in the neighbourhood is a waterfall (the Sutherland Falls) over 1000 feet in height. Judged by mortality statistics the climate of New Zealand is a healthful one, and is the envy of the world. The total population of the dominion on 31 December, 1908, was 1,020,713. This included the Maori population of 17,731, and the population of Cook and other Pacific islands, aggregating 12,330.

1. Civil History.—Tasman discovered the islands in 1642 and called them "Nova Zelandia"; but Captain Cook, who visited the coast throughout the following years, first made them known. The colony was planted in 1840 by a company, formed in England and known first as the New Zealand Company, afterwards as the New Zealand Land Company, which with auxiliary associations founded successively the settlements of Wellington, Nelson, Taranaki, Otago, and Canterbury. New Zealand was then constituted a dependency of the Colony of New South Wales.
robed and despoiled by the early white civilization and by trader-missionaries, tardy justice has at length been done to the Maoris, who have four members in the house of representatives and two in the legislative council, all men of high lineage and natural orators. Until recent years it was supposed that the Maoris were dying out, but later statistics show the contrary. The official figures show that the Maori population fell from 11,993 in 1891 to 30,108 in 1911, and a native of Westford County, took her first two children on a journey of over two thousand weary miles of ocean to be baptized at Sydney. Through Poynton's entreaties for a missionary the needs of the country became known, first at Sydney and next at Rome. In 1835 New Zealand was included in the newly created Vicariate Apostolic in New Zealand; in the following year the Bishop of Auckland, the late Sir Charles Clifford, was a Catholic, and his son, Sir George Clifford, one of New Zealand's prominent public men, was educated at Stonyhurst College, and has shown his fidelity to old ties by naming his principal New Zealand establishment his father's name—The Western Ocean. The Catholic names in the list of past premiers, cabinet ministers, and members of Parliament who have helped to mould the laws and shape the history of the country. The present premier (1910), the Right Hon. Sir Joseph Ward, P.C., K.C.M.G., is a Catholic, and out of a legislative council of forty-five members fifteen are Catholic.

The prominent feature of the political history of the past twenty years has been the introduction and development of that body of "advanced" legislation for which the name of New Zealand has become more or less famous. The mere enumeration of the enactments would occupy considerable space. It must suffice to say that a man thrown into a foreign country is enabled, by flinging the shield of the State over every man who works for his livelihood; and, in addition to regulating wages, they cover practically every risk to life, limb, health, and interest of the industrial classes. It should be mentioned that there is no strong party of professors of Socialism in the diet, and there is no monopoly, examined and taken on their merits, and not otherwise. Employers have occasionally protested against some of the restrictions imposed, as being harassing and vexatious; but there is no political party in the country which propresses to repeal these enactments, and there is a general consensus of opinion that, in its main features, policy is likely to stay. In 1893 an Act came into force which granted the franchise to women. The women's vote has had no perceptible effect on the relative position of political parties; but it is generally agreed that the women voters have been mainly responsible for the marked increase in recent years of the no-vote at the general elections. Elections are held more orderly than formerly.

II. The Maoris.—The New Zealand natives, or Maoris, as they call themselves, are generally acknowledged to be intellectually and physically the finest aboriginal race in the South Sea Islands. Their magnificent courage, their high intelligence, their splendid physique and manly bearing, the stirring part they have played in the history of the country, the very ferocity of their long-relinquished habits, have all combined to invest them with a more than ordinary degree of interest and curiosity. Of their origin it can only be said, broadly, that they belong to the Polynesian race—ethnologists have tried to trace a likeness between the Red Indians of North America and a people who came to this New Zealand about twenty-one generations ago (i.e., about five hundred and twenty-five years from Hawaii, an island of the Pacific not identified with any certainty. After being in a total population of 26,707. At the last Government census (1906) the Catholic total had amounted to 417, or less than 0.01 per cent. Of the total population of the dominion (exclusive of Maoris), according to the census number, was 38,387, so that the Catholic population is slightly over one-seventh of the whole. To-day (1910) the estimated Catholic population of New Zealand is over 130,000, with 1 dioceses, 1 archbishop, 3 suffragan bishops, 212 priests, 62 religious brothers, 3,536 nuns, 393 churches, 2 ecclesiastical seminaries (comprising 1 preparatory and 1 collegiate seminary for members of the Marist Order), 2 colleges for boys, 32 boarding and high schools, 18 superior day schools, 15 charitable institutions, and 112 Catholic primary schools. According to the "New Zealand Official Year-Book," for 1909 (a Government publication) the total number of Catholic schools in the dominion is 172 and the number of Catholic pupils attending is 12,650. New Zealand has added one new religious congregation (the Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion), founded in 1854 by Mother Mary Albert, to "Heaven's Army of Charity" in the Catholic Church. Under the direction of their venerable foundress the members of the order conduct schools for Maoris in the Dioceses of Christchurch and the Wanganui River, a home for incurables, Wellington, and a home for incurable children, Island Bay, Wellington. The order has quite recently extended its operations to Auckland.

The ordinary organizations of the faith, as usually found in English-speaking countries, are well and solidly established throughout the dominion. For beneficence purposes New Zealand, being the separate district of the Hibernian Australasian Catholic Benefit Society. Thanks to capable management, due to the fact that the society has drawn to its ranks the ablest and most representative of the faithful, the organization is making remarkable progress. On 30 January, 1910, the membership was reported at 26,220; the total fund held was £22,000; the income, chiefly from the sick fund amounted to £12,558.00 (over $20,000). The Society of St. Vincent de Paul was probably the earliest lay organization established in New Zealand, a conference formed at Christchurch in July, 1867, by the Rev. Fr. Chastagner, S.M., being the first founded in Australasia. In almost every parish there are young men's (friars) literary, and athletic; in connexion with these a federation has been formed under the name of the Federated Catholic Clubs of New Zealand. In 1900 a Newman Society, on the lines of the Oxford University Newman Society, but with wider and more directly practical objects, was inaugurated by the Catholic graduates and undergraduates of New Zealand University. As the number of university men amongst New Zealand Catholics is now a very considerable, the new society promises to prove an important factor in the defence and propagation of the faith.

IV. MISSIONS TO THE MAORIS.—From the outset, the conviction of the native race was set in the forefront of the Church's work in this new land. When the first missionaries arrived in the Diocese of Wellington, left the Diocese of Auckland in 1850, they had in that part of the North Island 5044 neophytes. In 1853 there were about a thousand native Christians in the Diocese of Wellington. Homes and schools for native children were founded by the Sisters of Mercy at Auckland and Wellington; and in 1857 the governor, Sir George Grey, in his official report to Parliament, gave high praise to the Catholic schools among the Maoris. Until 1860 the Maori mission was most flourishing. Then came the long years of fierce racial warfare, during which the natives kept their territory closed against all white men; and the Catholic missions were almost completely ruined. They are being steadily built up once more by two bodies of earnest and devoted men, the Marist Fathers in the Archdiocese of Wellington and Diocese of Christchurch, and the Mill Hill Fathers in the Dioceses of Auckland, the Waikato, and of Ngati. The number of Catholics in New Zealand during the last twenty-five years may be gathered from the following summaries. (a) The Archdiocese of Wellington and Diocese of Christchurch (districts: Otaki, Hirimarama, Retaihi, Wairoa, and Okato) have about 40 stations and 19 churches, served by 7 priests. There are also 4 native schools; 1 highly efficient native high school, maintained by the Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion, the Diocese of Auckland, and the Sisters of Our Lady of Lady's of Compassion. The total number of Catholic Maoris is about 2000. Several very successful conventions of Maori tribes have been held in Otaki since 1903. At the last (held in June, 1909), which was attended by His Grace Archishop Redwood, the institution of a Maori Catholic magazine was decided upon and has since been carried out. (b) The Diocese of Auckland (districts: Rotorua, head-quarters of the provincial mission, Matata, Taumarua, Hokianga, Okaihau, Whangaroa, Whangarei, Dargaville, and Coromandel) has 57 stations and 22 churches, served by 16 priests, of whom 9 are wholly and 7 are partly engaged on the Maori mission. There are 12 native schools. The total number of Catholic Maoris is about 4000. Throughout the three dioceses the Maori population is extremely scattered, and the missionaries have frequently to travel great distances. As the deleterious influence of Maori tohungapuni (belief in wizards and "medicine-men") is on the wane, and the rancorous feelings engendered by the war are now subsiding and the public school system has been extended, most of the mission field is most hopeful and promising.

V. Education.—Primary education is compulsory in New Zealand; and of every 100 persons in the dominion at the time of the census of 1906, 85.5 could read and write, 1.6 could read only, and 11.9 could neither read nor write. As mentioned above, New Zealand has a double public school system, consisting of governmental (which, in each province has its separate legislative and the control of education within its borders, and most of the provinces subsidized denominational schools. The provincial legislatures were abolished by the Acts of 1875-6, and one of the early measures (1874) of the centralized New Zealand Government was to abolish aid to denominational schools and to introduce the governmental system known as "free, secular, and compulsory." From that day to this the entire public school system of New Zealand has remained, legally, purely secular.

From the first Catholics have protested against the exclusion of Christian teaching from the schools; and they have refused, and continue to refuse (unless where forced by circumstances) to send their children to schools from which their religion is excluded. As in other countries, so here, Catholics have shown the sincerity of their protest by creating, at enormous and continual sacrifices, a great rival system of education under which some 13,000 Catholic children are nurtured into a full and wholesome development of body and mind. As a rule, this is done by the Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion (known as "Free, secular, and compulsory"), the same secular curriculum as that prescribed under the Education Act for the public schools; and they are every year inspected and examined, under precisely the same conditions as are the public schools, by the State inspectors. The cost of carrying on the public school systems is not derived from special taxation; but the amount is paid out of the Consolidated Fund, to which Catholics, as taxpayers, contribute their share. Catholics are thus subjected to a double impost: they have to bear the cost of building, equipping, and maintaining their own schools, and they are compelled also to contribute their quota of taxation for the maintenance of the public school system, of which, from conscientious motives, they cannot
The history of Catholic journalism in New Zealand is in effect the history of the "New Zealand Tablet", founded by the late Bishop Moran in 1873, the Catholics of this country having followed the principle that it is better to be represented by one strong paper than to have a multiplicity of publications. From the first, the paper has been fortunate in its editors. In the earlier days the work was carried on by its revival in the battle for Catholic rights, and by his valued lay assistant, Mr. J. F. Perrin, was of a solid character.

The prestige and influence of the paper was still further enhanced by the Rev. Henry W. Cleary, D.D., who made the "New Zealand Tablet" a power in the land, and won the respect of all sections of the community not only in the Catholic Church, but for the Catholic body which it represents. In February, 1910, Dr. Cleary was appointed Bishop of Auckland, and was consecrated on 21 August in Eminisworth cathedral, Co. Wexford, Ireland. It is safe to say that there are few countries in the world in which, in proportion to size and population, the Catholic press has a higher status than that possessed by New Zealand.

J. A. SCOTT.

Nicaea, titular see of Bithynia Secunda, situated on Lake Acanthus, in a fertile plain, but very unhealthy in summer. It was first colonized by the Batti and was called Ancora or Helcroa. Destroyed by the Myslans, it was rebuilt about 315 n. c. by Antigonus, after his victory over Eumenes, and was thenceforth called Antigonia. Later Lysimachus enlarged it and called it Nicaea in honour of his wife. At first the kings of Bithynia resided there almost as often as at Nicomedia between which and Nicaea arose a struggle for influence. It was here the birthday and the historian Dio Cassius. Phry the Younger frequently mentions the city and its public buildings. Numerous coins of Nicaea attest the interest of the emperors. After the first Council, held there in 325, Constantine gave it the title of metropolis, which Valens afterwards withdrew, but which it retained ecclesiastically. In the fifth century it took three suffragans from the jurisdiction of Nicomedia, and later six. In 787 a second Ecumenical Council (the seventh) was held there against the Iconoclasts, which, like the first, assembled more than 300 bishops. Among its archbishops, of whom Le Quen (Orins Christ., I, 639-50) names forty-six, those worthy of mention are Theophanes, the first known bishop, a partisan of Arius at the council of 325; Anastasius, a sixth-century writer; Sts. Peter and Theodore Graptos, two victims of the Iconoclasts in the ninth century; Ignatius, the biographer of the patriarchs Tarasius and Nicephorus; Gregory Asbestos, former metropolitan of Smyrna and the author of Plutarus; the Nestorian Pope Nicetius; the Cardinal Aristotle and polemist under Alexius Comnenus; and Bessarion, afterwards cardinal.

Nicaea grew more important during the Middle Ages. Captured by the Seljukids at an unknown date, perhaps subsequent to the revolt of Melissenus against Nicephorus Botaniates, it was afterwards ceded to the Turks by Alexius Comnenus. In 1206 the troops of Peter the Hermit, having attempted to capture the city, were repulsed and defeated and sacred. In June, 1207, the city was taken, after a memorable siege, by the Crusaders and ceded to them.

The See of Nicaea was also of some importance, being created by Constantine the Great in 320. In 321, Nicaea, restored, fortified, and embellished, became the capital of the new Byzantine Empire. The city was captured by the Turkish Sultan Orkhan in 1333, from which time it has formed a part of the Ottoman Empire.

To-day Nicaea is called Isnik. It is a village of 1,500 Greek and Turkish inhabitants in the sandjak of Fethahal and the vilayet of Brusa. The Greek metropolis resides at the yearly EASTER, where the Sunday of Paschal is venerated. The ramparts, several times restored and now in a good state of preservation, are 281 yards in circumference. There are 288 towers, some of them very ancient. Four ancient gates are well preserved. Among the monuments may be mentioned Yehudi-Djami, the Green Mosque, and the church of the Assumption; which, with the church of the Virgin Mary, was restored in the last century, the mosaics of which are very rich.

NICEA, COUNCILS of, respectively the First and Seventh Ecumenical Councils, held at Nicaea in Bithynia (see above).

I. THE FIRST COUNCIL OF NICEA (First Ecumenical Council of the Catholic Church), held in 325 on the occasion of the heresy of Arianism (see ARIANISM). As early as 320 or 321 St. Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, convoked the Council of Alexandria, in which more than one hundred bishops from Egypt and Libya showed themselves against Arius. He was convoked in his church and to recruit followers. Being finally driven out, he went to Palestine and from there to Nicomedia. During this time St. Alexander published his "Epistola enucleat," to which Arius replied; but there was no decision. The quarrel had become a personal one, and the two authors of these epistles were excommunicated. Cesarea and his two abbreviators, Socrates and Sozomen, as well as Rufinus and Gelasius of Cyzicus, report no details of the theological discussions. Rufinus tells us only that daily sessions were held and that Arians and Eusebius were the only opponents. The Council was fully treated under Homousion. For the Creed of Eusebius, see EUSEBIUS OF CESAREA: Life.) St. Athanasius assures us that the activities of the Council were nowise hampered by Constantine's presence. The emperor had by this time escaped from the influence of Eusebius of Nicomedia, and was under that of Hosius, to whom, as well as to St. Athanasius, may be attributed a preponderant influence in the formulation of the symbol of the First Ecumenical Council, of which the following is a literal translation:

We believe in one God the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten of the Father, that is of the essence of the Father, God of God, light of light, true God of true God, begotten not made, of the same substance with the Father [αὐτοῦ τουτεσσαρίου], through whom all things were made both in heaven and on earth; who for us men and for our salvation descended, was incarnate, and was made man, suffered and rose again the third day, ascended into heaven, and is coming to judge the living and the dead, and in the Holy Ghost.

Those who say: There was a time when He was not, and He was before He was begotten; and that He was made out of nothing ([τὸ ὑπὸ δεσμοὺ]), or who maintain that He is of another hypostasis or another substance [than the Father], or that the Son of God is created, or a creature, or subject to change, the Catholic Church anathematizes.

The adhesion was general and enthusiastic. All the bishops save five declared themselves ready to subscribe to this formula, convinced that it contained the ancient faith of the Apostolic Church. The opponents were soon reduced to two, Theonas of Maranea and Sozennus of Poloeum. Several of these emperors and bishops were exiled and banished. Arsenius, and his writings were also branded with anathema. His books were cast into the fire, and he was exiled to Elytha. The lists of the signers have reached us in a mutilated condition, disfigured by faults of the抄yists. Nevertheless, these lists may be regarded as authentic. Their study is a problem which has been repeatedly dealt with in German and England, in the critical editions of H. Gelzer, H. Hilgenfeld, and O. Contz on the one hand, and C. H. Turner on the other. The lists thus constructed give respectively 220 and 218 names. With information derived from one source or another, a list of 232 or 237 fathers known to have been present may be constructed.

The interests dealt with by this council were the controversy as to the time of celebrating Easter and the Melitian schism. The former of these two will be found treated under Easter, Easter Controversy; the latter under MELETIUS OF LYCOPOLIS.

Of all the Acts of this Council, which, it has been maintained, were numerous, only three fragments have reached us: the creed, or symbol, given above (see also Nicene Creed); the canons; the synodal decree. In reality there were never any official acts besides these. But the accounts of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Rufinus may be considered as very important sources of historical information, as well as some data preserved by Athanasius, and a history of the Council of Nicea written in Greek in the fifth century by Gelasius of Cyzicus. There has long existed a dispute as to the number of the canons of First Nicea. All the collections of canons, whether in Latin or Greek, composed in the fourth and fifth centuries agree in attributing to this Council only the twenty canons, which we possess to-day. Of these the following is a brief resume: Canons i-v: Concerning the procession, or support, or expulsion of clerics mutilated by choice or by violence. Canon vi: Rules to be observed for ordination, the avoidance of undue haste, the deposition of those guilty of a grave fault. Canon vii: All members of the clergy are forbidden to dwell with any woman, except a mother, sister, or aunt. Canon viii: Concerning episcopal elections. Canon ix: Concerning the excommunicate. Canon x: Concerning patriarchs and their jurisdiction. Canon xii confirms the right of the bishops of Jerusalem to enjoy certain honours. Canon xiii concerns the Novatians. Canon xiv: Certain sins known after ordination involve inculpation. Canon x: Laymen who have been ordained knowingly or surreptitiously must be excluded as soon as their irregularity is known. Canon xi: Penance to be imposed on apostates of the persecution of Licinius. Canon xii: Penance to be imposed on those who upheld Licinius in his war on the Christians. Canon xiv: Indulgence to be granted to excommunicated persons in danger of death. Canon xiv: Penance to be imposed on excommunicates practicing under persecution. Canon xv: Bishops, priests, and deacons are not to pass from one church to another. Canon xvi: All clerics are forbidden to leave their church. Formal prohibition of bishops to ordain for their diocese a cleric belonging to another diocese. Canon xvii: Clerics are forbidden to lend at interest. Canon xviii: Clerics to deacons themselves the inadequate position with regard to priests. Canon xix: Rules to be observed with regard to adherents of Paul of Samosata who wished to return to the Church. Canon xx: On Sundays and during the Paschal season prayers should be said standing.

The business of the Council having been finished Constantine celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his accession to the empire, and invited the bishops to a splendid repast, at the end of which each of them received rich presents. Several days later the emperor commanded that a final session should be held, at which he assisted in order to exhort the bishops to keep up the work for the maintenance of peace. He even himself to their prayers, and authorized the fathers to return to their dioceses. The greater number hastened to take advantage of this and to bring the resolutions of the council to the knowledge of their provinces.

II. SECOND COUNCIL OF NICEA (Seventh Ecumenical Council of the Catholic Church), held in 787. (For an account of the controversies which occasioned this council and the circumstances in which it was convoked, see ICONOCASM, I, II.) An attempt to hold a council at Constantinople, to deal with Iconoclasm, having been frustrated by the violence of the iconoclastic soldiery, the pope held a synod at Rome. But, on learning that the emperors were marching back to Rome, they were recalled by the Empress Irene. She replaced the mutinous troops at Constantinople with troops commanded by officers in whom she had every confidence. This accomplished, in May, 787, a new council was convoked at Nicea in Bithynia. The pope's letters to the emperors and to the patriarch (see ICONOCASM, II) prove superabundantly that the Holy See approved the convocation of the Council. The pope afterwards wrote to Charlemagne: "Et sic synodum istam, secundum nostrum ordinamionem, fecerunt" (Thus they have held the synod in accordance with our directions).

The empress-regent and her son did not assist in person at the sessions, but they were represented there by two high officials: the patrician and former consul, Petronius, and the imperial chamberlain and legothete John, with whom was associated as secretary the former patriarch, Nicephorus. The acts represent as constantly at the head of the ecclesiastical members the two Roman legates, the archpriest Peter and the abbot Peter; after them come Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople; and three leading monks and priests, John and Thomas, representatives of the Patriarch of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. The operations of the council show that Tarasius, properly speaking, conducted the sessions. The monks John and Thomas professed to represent the Oriental patriarchs, though these did not know that the council had been called. But if the five members were act in their capacity, that of Nicephorus and his six metropolitan or titular bishops, they had been sent, not by the patriarchs, but by the monks and priests of superior rank acting sedibus impplicitis, in the stead and place of the patriarc who were prevented from acting for themselves. Necessity was their excuse. Moreover, John and Thomas did not subscribe at the Council as vicars of bishops, but as councils and bishops of the name of the Apostolic sees of the Orient. With the exception of these monks and the Roman legates, all the members of the Council were subjects of the Byzantine Empire. Their number, bishops as well as representatives of bishops, varies in the ancient historians between 330 and 367; Nicephorus makes a manifest mis-take in speaking of other councils, the Acts of the Council which we still possess show a few fewer representatives of bishops. To these may be added a certain number of monks, archimandrites, imperial secretaries, and clerics of Constantinople who had not the right to vote.

The first session opened in the church of St. Sophia, 29 Sept., 753. Tarasius opened the council with a short discourse: 'Last year, in the beginning of the month of August, it was desired to hold, under my presidency, a council in the Church of the Apostles at Constantinople; but through the fault of several bishops whom it would be easy to count, and whose names I prefer not to mention, since everyone knows that council was made impossible.' The sovereigns both of the Empire and of Nicæa, and Christ will certainly reward them for it. It is this Lord Jesus the Saviour whom the bishops must also invoke in order to pronounce subsequently an equitable judgment in a just and impartial manner.' The members then proceeded to the reading of various official documents, after which three Iconoclastic bishops who had refused to sign the decrees were ordered to take their seats. Seven others who had plotted to make the controversy worse, in the preceding year presented themselves and declared themselves ready to profess the Faith of the Fathers, but the assembly thereupon engaged in a long discussion concerning the admission of heretics and postponed their case to another session. On 26 Sept., the second session was held, during which the pope's letters to the empress and the Patriarch Tarasius were read. Tarasius declared himself in full agreement with the doctrine set forth in these letters. On 28, or 29 Sept., in the third session, some bishops who had retracted their errors were allowed to take their seats; after which various documents were read. The consistory was held on 1 Oct. In it the secretaries of the council took their oaths from the Bible and the Fathers in favor of the veneration of images. Afterwards the dogmatic decree was presented, and was signed by all the members present, by the archimandrites of the monasteries, and by some monks; the papal legates added a declaration to the effect that they were ready to receive all who had abandoned the Iconoclastic heresy. In the fourth session on 1 Oct., passages from the Fathers were read which declared, or seemed to declare, against the worship of images, but the reading was not concluded to the end, and the council decided in favor of the restoration and the veneration of images. On 6 October, in the sixth session, the doctrines of the concilia-lying between Honduras and Costa Rica, the Pacific Ocean and the Caribbean Sea, has an area of 49,200 square miles and a population of about 600,000 inhabitants. The great mass of the inhabitants are either aborigines, or negroes, or of mixed blood, those of pure European descent not exceeding 1,500 in number. The legislative authority is vested in a single chamber of thirty-six members, elected for six years, representing a suffrage, which in the year of office is also six years, exercising his functions through a cabinet of nine responsible ministers. The country is traversed by a deep depression, running parallel to the Pacific coast, within which are a chain of volcanoes (among them, Monotomo, 7000 feet) and the great lakes, Managua and Nicaragua (or Cojolima). From these shallow bays about sixty miles long (at its widest, 10 miles wide) the country takes its name, derived from Nicaragua, the name of the aboriginal chief who held sway in the regions round about Lake Cojolima when the Spaniards, under Diego Vela, first explored the country in 1522. From that time, or soon after, until 1822 Nicaragua was a Spanish possession, forming part of the Province of Guatamala. Though some authorities have assigned it to the ecclesiastical Province of Lima, but in the eighteenth century Benedict XIV made it a suffragan of Guatamala. The episcopal residence is at Leon, where there is a fine cathedral. A concordat between the Holy See and the State of Nicaragua was concluded in 1861, and the Catholic is now recognized as the state religion, though Church and State are now separated, and freedom is constitutionally guaranteed to all forms of religious worship. After 1894 the Zelaya Government entered upon a course of anti-Catholic legislation which provoked a protest from Bishop Francisco Uloa y Larrios, and the bishop was banished to Panama. Upon the death of this prelate in 1898 his coadjutor, Samuel Pereira, succeeded him. The returns for 1910 give the Diocese of Nicaragua 42 parishes, with 45 priests, a seminary, 2 colleges, and 2 hospitals.

Nicastro (Nicastrensis), a city of the Province of Caratanzo, in Calabria, southern Italy, is situated on a promontory that commands the Gulf of St. Euphemia; above it is an ancient castle. The commerce of the port of Nicastro consists of the exportation of acid, herbs, and wine. The cathedral, an ancient temple, possesses the palace of the episcopal palace, which was outside the city; having been destroyed by the Saracens in 1687, it was restored in the year 1100, but it was destroyed in the earthquake of 1635, with the episcopal palace, under the ruins of which most valuable archives were lost. For a long time, the Greek Rite was in use at Nicastro. The first bishop of this city of whom there is any record was Henry (1000); Bishop Tamerco da Monte Posetto (1270) was deposed by Honorius IV for having consecrated John of Aragon, King of Sicily, but he was reinstated by Boniface VIII; Bishop Paolo Capusco (1333) was one of the judges in the case of the marriage of Henry VIII of England; Marcedio Cervino (1339) became Pope Marcellus II; Giovanni Tommaso Perrone (1639) built the new cathedral. In 1858 the ancient See of Martinor, the former Manteura (the first bishop of which was Dominus, in 741), was united to the Diocese of Nicastro. The diocese is a suffragan of Reggio in Calabria; it has 52 parishes, with 110,100 inhabitants; 71 churches and chapels, 2 convents of the Capuchins, and one orphan asylum and boarding-school, directed by the Sisters of Charity.

Nicola Pisanus, architect and sculptor, b. at Pisa about 1205-07; d. there, 1278. He was the father of modern plastic art. When barely past adolescence, he came to the notice of Frederick II of Swabia who took him to attend his coronation in Rome, thence to Naples, to complete Castel Capuano and Castel dell' Ovo (1221-31). In 1233 Nicola was in Lucca; the "altar-del-rey" of the Deposition over the side door of the cathedral may be of this date. The marble urn or "Arca" made to contain the body of St. Dominick in the church bearing his name in Bologna, is said to be an early work, but shows maturity; the charming group of the Madonna and Child upon it, foreshadows all the Madonnas of Italian art. From Nicola's designs was built the famous basilica of St. Anthony in Padua, the church of the Pili in Venice is also attributed to him, possibly on insufficient grounds. In Florence he designed the interior of Sta. Trinita which Michelangelo loved so much that he called it his lady, "la mia Dama". Having been ordered by pope Urban to destroy the Baptistry frequented by the Guidi, Nicola undermined the tower called "Guardo-marlo", causing it to so fall that it did not touch the precious edifice. On his return to Pisa, the architect erected the campanile for the church of S. Niccolò which contains the remarkable winding stair unsupported at its centre; an invention repeated by Brunante for the "Belvedere di Santa Caterina," by San Gallo in the renovated well at Orvieto. In 1242 Niccolo superintended the building of the cathedral of Pistoja, and in 1263 the restoration of S. Pietro Maggiore. He remodelled S. Domenico at Arezzo, the Duomo at Volterra, the Pieve and Sta. Margherita at Cortona. Much of his work at Pisa is believed to have perished in the fire of 1068, but a fragment of the Romanesque portal of the cathedral (1269) is the hexagonal, insulated pulpit of the Baptistery. It is supported by seven columns, three of them resting on lions.

The panels have reliefs from the New Testament; the pediments, figures of virtues; the spandrels, prophets and evangelists. The architectural part is Italian Gothic; the sculptures are mainly pure reproductions of the antique. A second pulpit for the Duomo of Siena followed in 1266. Niccolo's early sculpture shows clumsiness, if we are to believe that the figures outside the Misericordia Vecchia in Florence are his. In later life, whether from Rome or from his own Camposanto at Pisa (Roman sarcophagi used for the Cenacle at Exeter; Tuscan; Greek vase with figures he reproduced) he learned to create with the freedom, beauty, and power of ancient art. Ruiner suggests that he may have used clay for his initial model, a method then unpractised in Italy. One of Niccolo's last works in architecture was the abbey and church of La Scorgola, commemorating Charles of Anjou's victory at Tagliacozzo, now in ruins; in sculpture, the statues of the famous Fonte Maggiore in Pisa, after his design (1277–80).

NICE, Diocease of (Niciensis), comprises the Department of Alpes-Maritimes. It was re-established by the Concordat of 1801 as suffragan of Aix. The Countship of Nice from 1181 to 1860 was part of the Sardinian States, and the see became a suffragan of Genoa. When Nice was annexed to France in 1860, certain parts which remained Italian were cut off from it and added to the Diocease of Vintimille. In 1802 the diocease was again a suffragan of Aix. The arrangement of parishes was separated from the Diocease of Fréjus in 1856, and given to Nice which now unites the three former Dioceases of Nice, Grasse, and Vence.

I. Diocease of Nice.—Traditions tell us that Nice was evangelized by St. Barnabas, sent by St. Paul, or else by St. Mary Magdalen, St. Martha, and St. Lazarus; and they make St. Bassus, a martyr under Diocletian, the first Bishop of Nice. The See of Nice in Gaul existed in 314, since the bishop sent delegates to the Council of Arles in that year. The first bishop historically known is Ananius, who attended the Council of Aquileia in 381. Cimiez, near Nice, where still can be seen the remains of a Roman amphitheatre, and which was made illustrious by the martyrdom of the youthful St. Pontius about 260, had also a see, held in the middle of the fifth century by St. Valerianus; a rescript of St. Leo the Great, issued after 450 and confirmed by St. Hilarius in 455, united the sees of Nice and Cimiez. This newly-formed diocease of Embro up to the time of the Revolution (see Gap, Diocease of). Mgr Duchesne has not discovered sufficient historical proof of the episcopate at Nice of St. Valerianus (355–43), of St. Deutharius (490–93), martyred by the Vandals, of St. Syagrius (d. 577), Count of Brignon and son-in-law perhaps of Charlemagne, St. Anselm, a pupil of Agerus, is mentioned as Bishop of Nice (1000–07). Bishops of Nice bore the title of Counts of Drapp; since the donation of property situated at Drap, made in 1073 by Pierre, Bishop of Vaison, a native of Nice, to Raymond I, his bishop, and to his successors, Chartemagne, when visiting Cimiez devastated by the Lombards in 574, caused St. Syagrius to build on its ruins the monastery of St. Pontius, the largest Alpine abbey of the Middle Ages.

II. Diocease of Grasse.—The first known Bishop of Antibes is Armentarius who attended the Council of Vaison in 112. Mgr Duchesne admits as possible Agostino Cimiez, whom signed at the Council of Nimes in 396 and in 417 received a letter from Pope Zosimus, may have been Bishop of Antibes before Armentarius.

The following sees are specially honoured in the Diocease of Nice: The youthful martyr St. Celsus, whose certain traditions make victim of Nero's persecution; St. Vincentius and St. Orontius, natives of Cimiez, apostles of Aquitaine and of Spain, martyrs under Diocletian; St. Isidore, a hermit of Cap Ferrat (d. about 381); Blessed Antoine Gallus (1300–92), a native of Nice; one of the few patron saints. The martyr St. Marcellus of Cresson in Palestine is the patroness of the diocease. The chief pilgrimages of the diocease are: Our Lady of Laughe, near Monaco, a place of pilgrimage since the end of the seventeenth century; the chapel of the Sacred Heart of Jesus at Roquefort near Grasse; Our Lady of Valensole; Our Lady of Bruss; Our Lady of Vie.
Prior to the application of the law of 1901 against associations, the diocese counted Assumptionists, Capuchins, Cistercians of the Immaculate Conception, Jesuits, Priests of the Christian Doctrine, Franciscans, Lazarists, Discalced Carmelites, Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Salesians of Don Bosco, Capuchins, several orders of teaching Brothers. The Sisters of St. Martha, devoted to teaching and nursing and founded in 1832, have their mother-house at Grasse. At the beginning of the twentieth century religious congregations of the diocese conducted 4 crèches, 16 day nurseries, 2 institutions for crippled children, 1 boys' orphanage, 10 girls' orphanages, 3 sewing rooms, 11 hospitals or asylums, 1 convalescent homes, 6 houses for the care of the sick in their own homes, 1 insane asylum, 1 asylum for incurables. The Diocese of Nice, whither every year the warm and balmy climate of the Côte d'Azur attracts innumerable foreigners, counted in 1900 about 260,000 inhabitants, 32 parishes and 185 succeus parishes.

GEORGE GUYAT.

Nicene and Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed.

—The origin and history of the Nicene Creed are set forth in the articles: NICEA, COUNCILS OF; ARIES; ARIANISM; EUSEBIUS OF CESAREA; FILIPOUE. As approved in amplified form at the Council of Constantinople (381) q. v., it is the profession of the Christian Faith common to the Catholic Church, to all the Eastern Churches separated from Rome, and to most of the Protestant denominations. Soon after the Council of Nicea new formulas of faith were composed, most of them variations of the Nicene Symbol, to meet new phases of Arianism. There were at least four before the Council of Sardica in 341, and in that council a new form was presented and inserted in the Acts, though not accepted by the council. The Nicene Symbol, however, continued to be the only one in use among the defenders of the Faith. Gradually it came to be recognized as the proper profession of faith for candidates for baptism. Its alterations into the Nicene-Constantinopolitan formula, the one now in use, is usually ascribed to the Council of Constantinople, since the Council of Chalcedon (451), which designated this symbol as "The Creed of the Council of Constantinople of 381" had it twice read and inserted in its Acts. The council of Nicæa, of course, do not mention this, although they do record that the bishops who remained at the council after the departure of the Macedonians confirmed the Nicene faith. Hefele (II, 9) admits the possibility of our present creed being a condensation of the "Tome" (750), i.e. the exposition of the doctrines concerning the Trinity made by the Council of Constantinople, but he prefers the opinion of René Charles and Tillemont tracing the new form to the "Auctorat" of Epiphanius written in 371. Hirt, Cassari, Harmack, and others are of the opinion that the Constantinopolitan form did not originate at the Council of Constantinople, because it is not in the Acts of the council of 381, but was inserted there at a later date. Gregory Nazianzen, who was at the council mentions only the Nicene formula adverting to its incompleteness about the Holy Ghost, showing that he did not know of the Constantinopolitan form which supplies this deficiency; and because the Latin Fathers apparently know nothing of it before the middle of the fifth century.

The following is a literal translation of the Greek text of the Constantinopolitan form, the brackets indicating the words altered or added in the Western liturgical form in present use:

"We believe (I believe) in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, and born of the Father before all ages. (God of God) light of light, true God of true God. Begotten not made; consubstantial to the Father, by whom all things were made. Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven. And was incarnate of the Holy Ghost and of the Virgin Mary was made man and was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate, suffered and was buried; and the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures.

And ascended into heaven, sitteth at the right hand of the Father, and shall come again with glory to judge the living and the dead, of whose Kingdom there shall be no end. And I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father (and the Son), who together with the Father and the Son is to be adored and glorified, who spake by the Prophets. And one holy, catholic and apostolic Church. We confess (I confess) one baptism for the remission of sins. And we look for (I look for) the resurrection of the dead and the coming of the Kingdom of Christ. Amen." In this form the Nicene article concerning the Holy Ghost is enlarged; several words, notably the two clauses "of the substance of the Father" and "of God", are omitted as also are the anathemas; ten clauses are added; and in five places the words are differently located. In general the two forms contain what is common to all the baptismal formulas in the early Church. Vossius (1577-1649) was the first to detect the similarity between the creed set forth in the "Auctorat" and the baptismal formula of the Church of Jerusalem. Hirt (1876) held that the symbol is a revision of the Jerusalem formula, in which the most important Nicene statements concerning the Holy Ghost have been inserted. The author of the revision may have been St. Cyril of Jerusalem (315-386, q. v.). Various hypotheses are offered to account for the Nicomachus (Syrac., Patriarch of Constantinople, 806-815), in the 7th century (2). He is known for his opposition to the Emperor Constantine VII, who, in his descent, seeking to re-establish the supremacy of the clergy, endeavored to improve their condition and to check the teaching of the Church concerning images. While still young, Nicomachus was brought to the court, where he became an imperial secretary. With two other officials of high rank, he represented the Empress Irene in 787 at the Second Council of Nicaea (the Seventh Ecumenical Council), which declared the desire of the faithful to return to the old worship. After this Nicomachus sought solitude on the Thracian Bosporus, where he had founded a monastery. Here he devoted himself to ascetic practices and to the study both of secular learning, as grammar, mathematics, and philosophy, and the Scriptures. Later he was recalled to the capital and given charge of the great hospital. Upon the death of Patriarch Tarasius (25 February, 796), there was a great division among the clergy and higher court officials as to the choice of his successor. Finally, with the assent of the bishops, Emperor Nicomachus (802-11) appointed Nicomachus as patriarch. Although still a layman, he was known by all to be very religious and highly educated. He received Holy Orders and was consecrated bishop on Easter, 802. He had examined all the books, and was a layman to the patriarchate, as he had already happened in the case of Tarasius, aroused opposition in the ecclesiastical party among the clergy and monks. The leaders were the abbots, Plato of Sacramundum and Theodore of Studium, and Theodore's brother, Archbishop Joseph of Thessalonica. For this opposition the Abbots Archiepiscopate of Tarazona, forty-two days at the command of the emperor.

Nicomachus soon gave further cause for antagonism. In 795 a priest named Joseph had celebrated the unlawful marriage of Emperor Constantine VI (780-97) with Theodora, during the lifetime of Maria, the rightful wife of the emperor, whom he had set aside. For this act Joseph had been deposed and banished. Emperor Nicomachus considered it important to have this matter settled and, at his wish the new patriarch, with the concurrence of a synod composed of a small number of bishops, pardoned Joseph and, in 806, restored him to his office. The patriarch yielded to the wishes of the emperor in order to avert more serious evils. He reiterated the strict church party as a violation of ecclesiastical law.

Before the matter was settled Theodore had written to the patriarch entreating him not to reinstate the guilty priest, but had received no answer. Although the matter was not openly discussed, he and his followers now held virtually no church communion with Nicomachus and the priest, Joseph. But, through a letter written by Archbishop Joseph, the course which he and the strict church party followed became public in 809, and caused a sensation. Theodore set forth, by speech and writing, the reasons for the action of the strict church party and for his own, defending himself against the accusation that he and his companions were schismatics, he declared that he had kept silent as long as possible, had censured no bishops, and had always included the name of the patriarch in the liturgy. He asserted his love and his attachment to the patriarch, and said he would withdraw his opposition to the ban on images, but he would not be a party to the violation of law by removing the priest Joseph. Emperor Nicomachus now took violent measures. He commanded the patriarch to call a synod, which was held in 809, and had Plato and several monks forcibly brought before it. The opponents of the patriarch were condemned, the Archbishop of Thessalonica was deposed, the Archbishops of the and Theodore with his monks were banished to neighbouring islands and cast into various prisons.

This, however, did not discourage the resolute opponents of the "Adulterine Heresy". In 809 Theodore and Plato sent a joint memorial, through the Archimandrite Epiphanius, to Pope Leo III, and later, Theodore laid the matter once more before the pope. Leo, however, after consulting Pope Nicholas, backed by the monks, refused to grant a helping hand to the East, so that it might not be overwhelmed by the waves of the "Adulterine Heresy". Pope Leo sent an encouraging and consolatory reply to the resolute confessors, upon which they wrote another letter to him through Epiphanius. Leo had received no communication of the ban on images from the patriarch Nicomachus. Concerning the iconoclasts, he was thoroughly informed in the matter; he also desired to spare the eastern emperor as much as possible. Consequently, for a time, he took no further steps in the matter. Emperor Nicomachus continued to persecute all adherents of Theodore of Studium, and, in addition, oppressed those of whom he had grown suspicious, whether adherents of the emperor, or of the empire. Moreover, he favored the heretical Patriarchs and the Iconoclasts and drained the people by oppressive taxes, so that he was universally hated. In July, 811, the emperor was killed in a battle with the Bulgarians. His son Staurachius, who had been wounded in the same fight, was proclaimed emperor, but was deposed by the chief men of the empire because he followed Theodore. When Staurachius was deposed, with the assent of the patriarch, Michael Rangabe, brother-in-law of Staurachius, was raised to the throne. The new emperor promised, in writing, to defend the faith and to protect both clergy and monks, and was crowned with much solemnity by the Patriarch Nicomachus. Michael succeeded in reconciling the patriarch and Theodore. When Theodore was deposed the priest Joseph and withdrew his decrees against Theodore and his partisans. On the other side Theodore, Plato, and the majority of their adherents recognized the patriarch as the lawful head of the Byzantine Church, and sought to bring the refractory back to his obedience. The emperor had also recourse to the papacy in reference to their quarrels and had received a letter of approval from Leo. Moreover, the patriarch now sent the customary written notification of his induction into office (Synodica) to the pope. In it he sought to excuse the long delay by the tyranny of the preceding emperor, interwove a rambling confession of faith, and promised to notify Rome at the proper time in regard to all important matters. He was an admirable man of good intentions, but weak and dependent. On the advice of Nicomachus he put the heretical and seditious Paulicians to death and tried to suppress the Iconoclasts.
The patriarch endeavoured to establish monastic discipline among the monks, and to suppress double monasteries which had been forbidden by the Seventh Ecumenical Council. After his complete defeat, 22 June, 815, in the war against the Bulgarians, the emperor lost all authority. With the ascent of the patriarch, Leo the Armenian, now became emperor, 11 July, 813. When Nicephorus demanded the confession of faith, before the coronation, Leo put it off. Notwithstanding this, Nicephorus crowned him, and later, Leo again refused to make this confession. As soon as the new emperor had achieved the peace of the empire by the overthrow of the Bulgarians his true opinions began gradually to appear. He entered into connexion with the opponents of images, among whom were a number of bishops; it steadily grew more evident that he was preparing a new attack upon the veneration of images. With fearless energy the Patriarch Nicephorus now proceeded against the machinations of the Iconodules. He brought to trial before a synod several ecclesiastics opposed to images and forced an abbot named John and also Bishop Anthony of Sylcum to submit. Bishop Anthony’s acquiescence was merely feigned.

In December, 814, Nicephorus had a long conference with the emperor on the veneration of images but now also referred to the iconoclasts. Several learned bishops and abbots were convinced of the truth of the position of the Church on the veneration of images. The emperor wished to have a debate between representatives of the opposite dogmatic opinions, but the adherents of the veneration of images refused to take part in such a conference, as the Seventeen Chapters had set the question. Then Nicephorus called together an assembly of bishops and abbots at the Church of St. Sophia at which he communicated the perjured Bishop Anthony of Sylcum. A large number of the lay were also present on this occasion and the patriarch with the clergy and people remained in the church the entire night in prayer. The emperor then summoned Nicephorus to him, and the patriarch went to the imperial palace accompanied by the abbots and monks. Nicephorus first had a long, private conversation with the emperor, in which he vainly endeavoured to dissuade Leo from his opposition to the veneration of images. The emperor received those who had accompanied Nicephorus, among them several bishops and Archbishop Theodore of Sylcum. They all repudiated the interference of the emperor in dogmatic questions and once more rejected Leo’s proposal to hold a conference. The emperor then commanded the abbots to maintain silence upon the matter and forbade them to hold meetings. Theodore declared that silence under these conditions would be treason and expressed sympathy with the patriarch whom the emperor forbade to hold public service in the church. Nicephorus fell ill; when he recovered the emperor called upon him to defend his course before a synod of bishops friendly to iconoclasm. But the patriarch would not recognize the synod and paid no attention to the summons. The synod now considered that he had refused and no longer be called patriarch. His house was surrounded by crowds of angry Iconodules who shouted threats and invectives. He was guarded by soldiers and not allowed to perform any official act. With a protest against this mode of procedure the patriarch notified Leo that he found it necessary to resign the patriarchal see, and on this he was arrested at midnight in March, 815, and banished to the monastery of St. Theodore, which he had built on the Bosporus.

Leo now raised to the patriarchate Theodotus, a married, illiterate layman who favoured iconoclasm. Theodotus was consecrated 1 April, 815. The exiled Nicephorus persevered in his opposition and wrote several treatises against iconoclasm. After the murder of the Emperor Leo, 25 December, 820, Michael the Amorian ascend the throne and the defenders of the veneration of images were now more considerably treated. However, Michael would not consent to an actual restoration of images such as Nicephorus demanded from him, for, lest that he did not wish to interfere in religious matters and would leave everything as he had found it. Accordingly Emperor Leo’s hostile measures were not repeated, although the persecution ceased. Nicephorus received permission to return from exile if he would promise to remain silent. He would not agree, however, and remained in the monastery of St. Theodore for a long time. He persevered in writing and to defend the veneration of images. The dogmatic treatises, chiefly on this subject, that he wrote are as follows: a lesser “Apology for the Catholic Church concerning the newly arisen Schism in regard to Sacred Images” (Migne, P. G. C., 583-590); written 814-16; a larger treatise in two parts; the first part is an “Apology for the pure, unadulterated Faith of Christians against those who accuse us of idolatry” (Migne, loc. cit., 533-534); the second part contains the “Antirritheia”, a refutation of a writing by the Emperor Constantine Copronymus on images (loc. cit., 205-531). Nicephorus added to this second part seventy-five extracts from the writings of the Fathers edited by Petra, the first “Breviarium” in “Spiegelum Scolasticum”, I, 171-182, 227-370; in two further writings, which also apparently belong together, passages from earlier writers, that had been used by the enemies of images to maintain their opinions, are examined and explained. Both these treatises were edited by Petra; the first “Breviarium” in “Spiegelum Scolasticum”, I, 171-182, 227-370; in two further writings, which also apparently belong together, passages from Macarius Magnes, Eusebius of Cæsarea, and from a writing wrongly ascribed to Epiphanius of Cyprus. Another work justifying the veneration of images was edited by Petras under the title “Antirritheia adversus iconoconos” (Spiegelum Scolasticum, IV, 232-94). A final and, as it appears, especially important treatise on this question has not yet been published.

Nicephorus also left two small historical works, one known as the “Breviarium”, the other the “Chronographia”, both are edited by C. de Boor. First Nicephorus’s work is the “Ecclesiastische Geschichdis” in the “Bibliotheca Teubneriana”, I, 127-138, 277-280, 565, and IV, 292-280. The two treatises discuss passages from Macarius Magnes, Eusebius of Cæsarea, and from a writing wrongly ascribed to Epiphanius of Cyprus. The rest of his life he lived a recluse and after death regarded as a saint. In 874 his bones were translated to Constantinople with much pomp by the Patriarch Methodius and interred, 13 March, in the Church of the Apostles. His feast is celebrated on this day both in the Greek and Roman Churches; the Greeks also observe 2 June as the day of his death.

Nicéron, JEAN-PIERRE, French lexicographer, b. in Paris, 11 March, 1685, d. there, 8 July, 1758. After his studies at the College Mazarin, he joined the Barresistes (August, 1702). He taught rhetoric in the college of Leuves, and soon after at Montargis, where he remained ten years. While engaged in teaching, he made a thorough study of modern languages. In 1716 he went to Paris and devoted his time to literary work. His aim was to put together, in a logically arranged compendium, a series of biographical and bibliographical articles on the men who had distinguished themselves in literature and sciences since the time of the Renaissance. It required long research as well as great industry. After eleven years he published the first vol. of his monumental work under the title of “Mémoires pour servir l'Histoire des chartes illustres de la république des lettres avec le catalogue raisonné de leurs ouvrages” (Paris, 1727). Thirty-eight volumes followed from 1728 to 1738. The last volume from his pen was published two years after the author's death (Paris, 1740). Father Oglin, J.-B. Michaud, and Aïde Goujet later contributed three volumes to the completion of this work. The translation of it was published in 1747-1777. It has been often repeated that this work lacks method, and that the length of many articles is out of proportion to the value of the men to whom they are devoted. This criticism, however true it may be, does not impair the genuine qualities and importance of the whole work. Even now, these Memoires contain a great amount of information that could hardly be obtained elsewhere. Moreover, they refer to sources which, for our author, would be easily overlooked or ignored. Besides this original composition, he translated various books from English, among which should be mentioned: “Le voyage de Jean Ovington à Suratte et dans l'Afrique, avec l'histoire de la révolution arrivée dans l'île mencid” (Paris, 1725); “La Conversion de l'Anglois au Christianisme comparée avec sa prétendue réformation” (Paris, 1729).

Nicetas (Niceta), Bishop of Remesiana (Romatiana) in what is now Servia, b. about 355; d. about 411. Recent investigations have resulted in a more definite knowledge of the person of this ecclesiastical writer. Gennadius of Marselles, in his catalogue of writers ("De viris illustribus", xxvii) mentions a "Nicetius, bishop of Remesiana," and he ascribes two works: one, in six books, for catechumens, and a little book on a virgin who had fallen into this. Outside of this reference no writer and bishop of the name of Nicetas is known. This Nicetas, therefore, is, without doubt, the same as Nicetas, "Bishop of the Dacians," the contemporary and friend of St. Paulinus of Nola. The identity is shown by a comparison of Gennadius' "Nicetius" with Paulinus in his "Miroir" (xxvi, xxvii), and further, by the agreement in time.

In Dacia, where, according to Paulinus, his friend Nicetas was bishop, there was a city called Romatiana (now Bula Palanka) on the great Roman military road from Belgrade to Constantinople, and this was the see of Nicetas. He is mentioned a number of times in the letters and poems of St. Paulinus of Nola, especially in Carmen xxvii (ed. Hartel in "Corp. Script. ecc. lat.", XXX, 29-2 sqq.), and in Carmen xxvii; "Ad Nicetam rededentum in Dacia" (op. cit., St sqq.), written on the occasion of Nicetas' pilgrimage to Nola, in 359, to visit the grave of St. Felix. In this latter poem Paulinus describes how his friend Nicetas visited Felix, how he was in the grave, how he met with St. Jerome, too, speaks of the apostolic labors of Nicetas and says of him that he spread Christian civilization among the barbarians by his sweet songs of the Cross (Ep. IX, P. L., XXII, 592).

This is all that is known concerning the life of Nicetas. Particularly concerning his literary activity, the works are also given by Gennadius and Paulinus. The tradition concerning his writings afterwards became confused; his works were erroneously ascribed to St. Ambrose and St. John Chrysostom (the 4th century) and to Nicetus of Trier. It was not until the researches of Dom Morin, Burn, and others that a larger knowledge was attained concerning the works of Nicetas. Gennadius (loc. cit.) mentions six books written by him in simple and clear style ("simplici et nitido sermoni," containing instructions for candidates for baptism ("compendia"). The first book dealt with the prediction of the destruction of the world and the advent of errors of heathen; the third, of belief in one Divine Majesty; the fourth, of superstitions customs at the birth of a child (calculating natalities); the fifth, of confession of faith; the sixth, of the sacrifice of the paschal lamb. The work has not been preserved in its entirety, yet the greater part is still extant. Four fragments are known of the first book, one fragment of the second, the third probably consists of the two treatises, usually separated, and which undoubtedly belong together, namely, "De ratione fidei" and "De Spiritus sancti potestate." (P. L., LI, 547, 583). Nothing is known of the fourth book. The fifth, however, is most probably identical with the "Explanatio symboli habita ad competentes" (P. L., LIII, 1898, 1895-74), which is properly ascribed to Origcn, sometimes to Nicetas of Aquiles, but there are very strong reasons for assigning it to the Bishop of Remesiana. Nothing is known of the sixth book. Gennadius mentions another treatise addressed to a fallen virgin, "Ad lapsam virginem libellus," remarking that it would stimulate to reform any who had fallen, but which is only wrongly identified with the "De lapsi virginem conscribere" (P. L., XVI, 357-58), traditionally assigned to St. Ambrose. Dom Morin has edited a treatise, unknown until he published it, "Epistola ad virginem lapsam" (Revue Bédémitque, XIV, 1895), 193-202), which with far more reason may be regarded as the work of Nicetas.

Paulinus of Nola praises his friend as a hymn-writer; from this it is evident that Gennadius has not given a complete list of the writings of Nicetas. It is, therefore, not impossible that further works, incorrectly ascribed to others, are really his. Morin has given excellent reasons to prove that the two treatises, "De vigiliis servorum Dei" and "De singularibus," which were deemed to be writings of Nicetus of Trier (P. L., LXVIII, 356-70), are in reality the work of Nicetas ("Revue Bédémitque Internat.", VI, 1895; 282-88; "Revue Bédémitique", XIV, 1897), 395-97, where Morin gives for the first time the complete text of "De psalmis ubi bono". Particularly interesting is the fresh proof produced—again by Morin—showing that Nicetas, and not St. Ambrose, is the author of the "Te Deum" (Revue Bédémitique, XLI, 1891, 439, 377-345). Paulinus, like Jerome, speaks of him particularly as a hymn-writer. (See Te Deum). According to the testimony of Cassiodorus (De instit. divinarum litterarum, xvi) the "Liber de Fide" of Nicetas was, in his time, regarded in the Church of Aquileia as identical with St. Ambrose, which shows that at an early date some were found to credit the great Bishop of Milan with works due to the Dacian bishop. The first complete edition of the works of Nicetas is that of Burn (see bibliography below).

Nicetius, Saint, Bishop of Trier, b. in the latter part of the fifth century, exact date unknown; d. in 587 or possibly 597. Saint Nicetius was the most important bishop of the ancient See of Trier, in the era when, after the disorders of the Migrations, Frankish supremacy began in what had been Roman Gaul. Considerable detail of the life of this vigorous and zealous bishop is known from various sources, from letters written either by or to him, from two poems of Venantius Fortunatus (Poems, Lib. III, x. ed. Leo, in Mon. Germ. Hist.: Auct. antiq., IV (1881), Pt. I, 63-64 sq.) and above all from the statements of his pupil Arodus, later Bishop of Limoges, which have been preserved by Gregory of Tours (De vitis Patrum, xxvi, De Gloriam Confessorum, x-xvi). Nicetius's role in the entrance of the Monastery of Roselius into the Benedictine Order was apparently in Auvergne. The Nicetius mentioned by Sidenius Apollinaris (Epist. VIII, vi) may have been a relative. From his youth he devoted himself to religious life and entered a monastery, where he developed so rapidly in the exercise of Christian virtue and in sacred learning that he was made abbot. He was while at this the pope of the church of Trier Theodoric I (551-584) learned to know and esteem him. Nicetius often renounced with him on account of his wrong-doing without, however, any loss of favour. After the death of Bishop Aproclus of Trier, an embassy of the clergy and citizens of Trier came to the royal court to elect a new bishop. They desired Saint Galbaus, but the king, Disregarding the wishes of the people, appointed Nicetius, whose election was confirmed by Theodoric. About 587 Nicetius set out as the new bishop for Trier, accompanied by an escort sent by the king, and while on the journey had opportunity to make known his firmness in the administration of his office. Trier had suffered terribly during the disorders of the time, and the new bishop was to rebuild the cathedral church, the restoration of which is mentioned by the poet Venantius Fortunatus. Archaeological research has shown, in the cathedral of Trier, the existence of mason-work belonging to the Frankish period which may belong to this reconstruction by Nicetius. A fortified castle (castellum) with a chapel built by him on the river Moselle is also mentioned by the same poet (Poems, Lib. III, n. xii). The saintly bishop devoted himself with great zeal to his pastoral duty. He preached daily, opposed vigorously the numerous evils in the moral life both of the higher classes and of the common people, and in so doing did not spare the king and his courtiers. Despising gold and silver, he left the court and returned to the cloister. The king, who had filled himself with such a concept of his misdeeds he communicated King Clotaire I (511-61), who for some time was sole ruler of the Frankish dominions; in return the king exiled the determined bishop (560). The king died, however, in the following year, and his son and successor Sigebert, the ruler of Austrasia (561-75), allowed Nicetius to return home. Nicetius took the official symbols of the Frankish bishops: the synod of Clermont (555), of Orleans (519), the second synod of Clermont (549), the synod of Toulu (550) at which he presided, and the synod of Paris (555).

Nicetius corresponded with ecclesiastical dignitaries of high rank in distant places. Letters are extant that were written to him by Abbot Florigens of Romain-Mottier (Canton of Vaud, Switzerland), by Bishop Rufus of Octodurum (now Martinv, in the Canton of Valais, Switzerland), and by Archbishop Mappanus of Reims. The general interests of the Church did not escape his watchful care. He wrote an urgent letter to Emperor Childebert, warning him against Conciliarist innovations; the imperial authorities had already given such a new twist to the ancient discipline of the Church that the controversy arising from Monophysitism. Another letter that has been preserved is to Clodescindula, wife of the Lombard King Alboin, in which he exhorts this princess to do everything possible to bring her husband over to the Catholic faith. In his personal life the saintly bishop was very ascetic and self-mortifying; he fasted frequently, and while the parsimonious clergy who lived with him were at their evening meal he would go, concealed by a hooded cloak, to pray in the church of the city. He founded a school of his own for the training of the clergy. The best known of his pupils is the later Abbot of Limoges, Arelius, who was the author of an account of Gregory of Tours for the latter's biographical account of Saint Nicetius. Nicetius was buried in the church of St. Maximin at Trier. His feast is celebrated at Trier on 1 October; in the Roman Martyrology his name is placed on 5 December. The genuineness of two treatises ascribed to him is doubtful: "De Vigiliis servorum Dei et De Psalmodeis." Nicetius Opera in P. L. Niche, a receept for the reception of a statue, so designed as to give it emphasis, frame it effectively, and afford some measure of protection. It hardly existed prior to the twelfth century, and is one of the chief decorative characteristics of Gothic architecture. The niche was the ideal situation for the venerated image of the saints was an essential part of the Gothic style which was so perfectly to express the Catholic Faith, and that had its beginnings in Normandy as a result of the great Cluniac reformation; and from the moment that roughly chiselled bas-relief swelled into the round and detached figure, the unerring artistic instinct of the medieval architects taught them—as it had taught the Greeks—that figure sculpture becomes architectural only when it is incorporated with the building of which it is a part, by means of surrounding architectural forms that harmonize it with the fabric itself. In Romanesque work, this frame is little more than flanking shafts supporting an arch, the statue being treated as an accessory, and given place wherever a space of flat wall appeared between the columns and arches of the structural decoration. The convenience, propriety and beauty of the arrangement were immediately apparent, however, and thenceforward the development of the niche as an independent architectural form was constant and rapid. Not only the essential function of the niche, as a receptacle of the architectural entity and afford it that protection from the weather so necessary in the north; it also, in conjunction with the statue itself, produced one of the richest compositions of line, light, and shade known to art. The medieval architects realized this and seized upon it with avidity, using it almost as their rule of thumb, means for obtaining the spacious and spaciousness of rich decoration that gave the final touch of perfection to their marvellous fabrics. In the thirteenth century the wall became recessed to receive the statue, the flanking shafts became independent supports for an arched and gabled canopy, while a pedestal was introduced, still further to tie the sculpture into the architectural scheme. Later the function of the niches as continuous, hexagonal or octagonal, the arched canopy was suspended, the gable enriched with crockets and pinnacles, and finally in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the entire feature became almost an independent composition, the canopy being developed into a thing of marvellous complexity and richness, while the building itself was often the more marvellous. Controversies arising from Monophysitism. RALPH ADAMS CRAM.

Nicholas I, Saint, Pope, b. at Rome, date unknown; d. 13 November, 867; one of the great popes of the Middle Ages, who exerted decisive influence upon the historical development of the papacy and its position among the Christian nations of Western Europe. He was of a distinguished family, being the son of the Defensor Theodore, and received an excellent training. Already distinguished for his piety, benevolence, ability, knowledge, and eloquence, he entered, at an early age, the service of the Church, was made subdeacon by Pope Sergius II (841–47), and deacon by Pope Leo IV (847–55). He was in important matters during the pontificate of his predecessor, Benedict III (855–58). After Benedict's death (7 April, 858) the Emperor Louis II, who was in the neighbourhood of Rome, came into the city to exert his influence upon the election. On 21 April Nicholas was elected pope, and on the same day was consecrated and enthroned in St. Peter's in the presence of Baldwin, Duke of Lorraine, after he had delivered a banquet to the emperor, and afterwards, accompanied by the Roman nobility, visited him in his camp before the city, on which occasion the emperor came to meet the pope and led his horse for some distance.

Christianity in Western Europe was then in a most melancholy condition. The empire of Charlemagne had fallen to pieces, and Normandy seemed on the brink of anarchy. Christian morality was despised; many bishops were worldly and unworthy of their office. There was danger of a universal decline of the higher civilization. Pope Nicholas appeared as a conscientious representative of the Roman See, an ideal, who entered with his conception of his mission for the vindication of Christian morality, the defence of God's law against princes and dignitaries, and of ecclesiastical law against powerful bishops. Archbishop John of Ravenna opposed the inhabitants of the papal territory, treated his suffragan bishops with violence, made unjust demands upon them for money, and illegally imprisoned priests. Baldwin, Duke of Lorraine, being armed, assembled the Roman See and maltreated the papal legates. As the warnings of the pope were without result, and the archbishop ignored a three-repeated summons to appear before the papal tribunal, he was excommunicated. Having first visited the Emperor Louis at Pavia, the archbishop repaired, with two imperial delegations, to the Lateran; but, however, he entered into a pact with the excommunicated Archbishops of Trier and Cologne, was himself again excommunicated, and once more forced to make his submission to the pope. Another conflict arose between Nicholas and Archbishop Hincmar of Reims; this concerned the prerogatives of the papacy. Bishop Rothold of Soissons had appealed to the pope against the decision of the Synod of Soissons of 847, which had deposed him; Hincmar opposed the appeal to the pope, but eventually had to acknowledge the right of the deposed to take cognizance of important legal causes (causa majores) and pass independent judgment upon them. A further dispute broke out between Hincmar and the pope as to the elevation of the cleric Wulffald to the archdiocesan See of Bourges, but here, again, Hincmar finally submitted to the decrees of the Apostolic See, and the Frankish bishops passed corresponding ordinations.

Nicholas showed the same zeal in other efforts to maintain ecclesiastical discipline, especially as to the marriage laws. Ingridul, wife of Count Boso, had left her husband for a paramour; Nicholas commanded the bishops in the dominions of Charles the Bold to excommunicate her unless she returned to her husband. As she paid no attention to the summons to appear before the pope, Nicholas excommunicated her under the ban. The pope was also involved in a desperate struggle with Lothair II of Lorraine over the inviolability of marriage. Lothair had abandoned his lawful wife Theutberga to marry Waldrada. At the Synod of Aachen, 28 April, 862, the bishops of Lorraine, unmindful of their duty, approved of this illicit act. At the Synod of Worms, 863, the papal legates, bribed by the king, assembed to the Aachen decision, and condemned the absent Theutberga. Upon this the pope brought the matter before his own tribunal. The two archbishops, Gunther of Cologne and Thietgund of Trier, who had come to Rome as delegates, were summoned before the Lateran Synod of 863, when the pope condemned and deposed them as well as the king's agents. In 864 the Emperor Lothair advanced upon Rome with an army and laid siege to the city, so that the pope was confined for two days in St. Peter's without food. Yet Nicholas did not waver in his determination; the emperor, after being reconciled with the pope, returned to his own land. Nicholas then summoned his archbishops to Trier and Cologne to return to their homes. Nicholas never ceased from his efforts to bring about a reconciliation between Lothair and his lawful wife, but without effect. Another matrimonial case in which Nicholas interposed was that of Judith, daughter of Charles the Bold, who had married Adalbert, Bishop of Aachen, without the consent of the pope. Frankish bishops had excommunicated Judith, and Hincmar of Reims had taken sides against her, but Nicholas urged leniency, in order to protect freedom of marriage. He commanded Hincmar to bring about a reconciliation between father and daughter, and succeeded in obtaining Charles's consent to the marriage; but Hincmar, as usual, endeavoured to persuade him to retract his consent. He also interposed in another matrimonial matter, when, on the death of the Emperor Charles, Lothair came into possession of the Duchy of Bavaria, and married there Helga, daughter of the late King Henry. Nicholas then wrote to his imperial successor, Lothair II, urging him to make Helga a nun, and he was induced to act accordingly.

In the matter of the emperor and the patriarchs of Constantinople Nicholas showed himself the Divinely appointed ruler of the Church. In violation of ecclesiastical law, the Patriarch Ignatius was deposed in 860 and Photius illegally raised to the patriarchal dignity. In a letter addressed (8 May, 862) to the patriarchs of the East, Nicholas called upon them and all their bishops to refuse recognition to Photius, and at a Roman synod held in April, 863, he excommunicated Photius. He also encouraged the missionary activity of the Church. He sanctioned the union of the Sess of Amenod and, in 863, the union of the church of Selcuk, Archbishop of Bremen, and his successors the office of papal legate to the Danes, Swedes, and Slavs. Bulgaria having been converted by Greek missionaries, its ruler, Prince Boris, in August, 863, sent an embassy to the pope with one hundred and six questions on the teaching and discipline of the Church. Nicholas answered these inquiries exhaustively in the celebrated "Responsa Nicolai ad consulta Bulgarorum" (Mansi, "Coll. Conc.", XV, 301 sqq.). The letter shows how keen was his desire to foster the principles of an earnest Christian life in this newly-converted people. At the same time he sent an embassy to Prince Boris, charged to use their personal efforts to attain the pope's object. Nevertheless, Boris finally joined the Eastern Church.

At Rome, Nicholas rebuilt and endowed several Nicholas II, Pope (Gerhard of Bergundy), b. at Chevron, in what is now Savoy, elected at Siena, December 1058; d. at Florence, 27 July, 1061. Like his predecessor, Stephen X, he was canon at Liège. In 1046 he became Bishop of Florence, where he restored the cathedral of numerous canonicals. As soon as the news of the death of Stephen X at Florence reached Rome (1 April, 1058), the Tuscanian party appointed a successor in the person of John Mincius, Bishop of Velletri, under the name of Benedict X. His elevation, due to violence and corruption, was contrary to the specific orders of Stephen X that, at his death, no choice of a successor was to be made until Hildebrand's return from Germany. Several cardinals protested against the irregular proceeding, and one cardinal, named Pasquale, a native of Rome, Hildebrand was returning from his mission when the news of these events reached him. He interrupted his journey at Florence, and after agreeing with Duke Godfrey of Lorraine-Tuscany upon Bishop Gerhard for elevation to the papacy, he won over part of the Roman population to the support of his candidate. An embassy dispatched to the imperial court secured the confirmation of the choice by the Emperor Agnes. At Hildebrand's invitation, the cardinals met in December, 1058, at Siena and elected Gerhard who assumed the name of Nicholas II. On his way to Rome the new pope held at Sutri a well-attended synod at which, in the presence of Duke Godfrey's imperial chancellor, Gilbert of Paris, he pronounced deposition against Benedict X. The latter was driven from the city in January, 1059, and the solemn coronation of Nicholas took place on the twenty-fourth of the same month. A cultured and stainless man, the new pontiff had about him capable advisers, but to meet the danger still threatening from Lorraine, he had to surround himself with powerful bishops and cardinals. Hildebrand was again called to enter into negotiations with the Normans of southern Italy. The papal envoy recognized Count Richard of Aversa as Prince of Capua and received in return Norman troops which enabled the papacy to carry on hostilities against Benedict in the Campania. This campaign did not result in the decisive overthrow of the opposition party, but it enabled Nicholas to undertake in the early part of 1059 a pastoral visitation to Spoleto, Farfa, and Osmo. During this journey he raised Abbot Desiderius of Monte Cassino to the dignity of cardinal-priest and appointed him legate to Campania, Benevento, Apulia, and Calabria. Early in his pontificate he had sent St. Peter Damiani and Bishop Anselm of Lucca as his legates to Milan, where a married and simoniacal clergy had recently given rise to a reform-party known as the "Pataria". A synod for the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline was held under the presidency of these envos who, in spite of a tumultuous uprising which endangered their lives, succeeded in obtaining from Archbishop of Monza and the M. of Roscommon a solemn repudiation of simony and concubinage.

One of the most pressing needs of the time was the reform of papal elections. It was right that they should be freed from the nefarious influence of the Roman factions and the secular control of the emperor, hitherto less disastrous but always objectionable. To this end Nicholas II held in the Lateran at Easter, 1059 a synod attended by one hundred and thirteen bishops and famous for its law concerning papal elections. Efforts were made to determine the authentic text of this decree caused considerable controversy in the eleventh century. That the discussions did not result in a consensus of opinion on the matter need not surprise if it be remembered that the publication of the decree complaints were heard regarding the divergency in the text. We possess today a papal and an imperial recension and the sense of the law may be stated substantially as follows: (1) At the death of the pope, the cardinal-bishops are to confer among themselves concerning a cardinal candidate, and, after they have agreed upon a name, the other cardinals are to proceed to the election. The remainder of the clergy and the laity enjoy the right of approving their choice. (2) A member of the Roman clergy is to be chosen, except that where a qualified candidate cannot be found in the Roman Church, an ecclesiastic from another diocese may be elected. (3) The election is to be held at Rome, except that when a free choice is impossible there, it may take place elsewhere. (4) If war or other circumstances prevent the solemn enthronization of the new pope in St. Peter's Chair, he shall nevertheless enjoy the exercise of full Apostolic authority. (5) Due regard is to be had for the right of confirmation or recognition to the papal see by Henry, and the pope's deference is to be shown to his successors, who have been granted personally a like privilege. These stipulations constituted indeed a new law, but they were also intended as an implicit approbation of the procedure followed at the election of Nicholas II. As to the imperial right of confirmation, it became a mere personal privilege granted by the Roman See. The same synod prohibited simoniacal ordinations, lay investiture, and assistance at the Mass of a priest living in notorious concubinage. The rules governing the life of canons and nuns which were published at the diet of Aix-la-Chapelle (1057) were abolished, because they allowed private property and much abundant food, and as the bishopboldly exclaimed, they were adapted to sailors and intermate matrons rather than to clergy and nuns. Beregrarius of Tours, whose views opposed to the doctrine of Christ's real presence in the Eucharist, had repeatedly been condemned, also appeared at the Council and was compelled to sign a formula of abjuration.

to hold his hands as the pope's vassal, and to protect the Roman See, its possessions, and the freedom of papal elections. A similar agreement was concluded with the Bishop of Capua. Following this, Nicholas at Benevento Nicholas returned to Rome with a Norman army which reconquered Præstecato, Tusculum, and Xantenamnum for the Holy See and forced Benedict X to capitulate at Galeria (autumn of 1055). Hildebrand, the soul of the pontificate, was now created archedeacon. In order to secure the general approval of the elections, Nicholas called a synod at Cardinal Stephen, in the latter part of that year, was sent to France where he presided over the synods of Vienne (31 January, 1060) and Tours (17 February, 1060). The decree which introduced a new method of papal election had caused great dissatisfaction in Germany, because it reduced the imperial right of confirmation to the precarious condition of a personal privilege granted at will, but assured of Norman protection, Nicholas could fearlessly renew the decree at the Lateran synod held in 1060. After this council Cardinal Stephen, who had accomplished his mission to France, appeared as papal legate in Germany. For five days he vainly solicited an audience at court and then returned to Rome. His fruitless mission was followed by a synod held in the presence of the ordinances of Nicholas II and pronounced his deposition. The pope's answer was a repetition of the decree concerning elections at the synod of 1061, at which the condemnation of simony and concubinage among the clergy was likewise renewed. He lies buried in the church of St. Reparata at Florence of which city his name was long remembered after his elevation to the papal throne. His pontificate, though of short duration, was marked by events fraught with momentous and far-reaching consequences.

Nicholas III, Pope (Giovanni Gaetani Orsini), b. at Rome, c. 1216; elected at Viterbo, 25 November, 1328, reigned as pope, 22 August, 1280. His father, Matteo Rosso, was of the son-in-law of the Orsini, while his mother, Perma Gaetana, belonged to the noble house of the Gaetani. As senator Matteo Rosso had defended Rome against Frederick II and saved it to the papacy. He was a friend of St. Francis of Assisi and belonged to the third order, facts not without influence on the son, for both as cardinal and pope the latter was ever kindly disposed towards the Franciscans. We have no knowledge of his education and early life. Innocent IV, grateful for the services rendered by his father, created the young Orsini (28 May, 1241) cardinal-deacon with the title of St. Nicholas in Carcere Tulliano, and gave him benefices at York, Laon, and Soissons. Probably at an earlier date the administration of the Roman churches of San Lorenzo in Damaso and of San Crisogono had been entrusted to him at the request of Nicholas. Later, Innocent IV in his flight from Civita Vecchia to Genoa and thence to Lyons (29 June, 1241). In 1252 he was dispatched on an unsuccessful mission of peace to the warring Giuephs and Ghilibrines of Florence. In 1258 Louis IX paid an eloquent tribute to his independence and impartiality by suggesting his selection as equally acceptable to England and to France for the solemn ratification of the peace concluded between the two countries. His integrity was likewise above reproach, for he never accepted gifts for his services. So great was his influence in the Sacred College that the election of Urban IV (1261) was mainly due to his intervention. Urban named him general inquisitor (1262) and protector of the Franks (1263). Under Clement IV (1265–68) he was a member of the delegation of four cardinals who invested Charles of Anjou with the Kingdom of Naples (28 June, 1265). Later he served as papal legate to the Council of Constance. He was chosen prieur of the monks of St. Winnoc at Ghent (April 1268), and Pope John XXI, whose counsellor he became and who named him archpriest of St. Peter's. After a vacancy of six months he succeeded John as Nicholas III.

True to his origin he endeavoured to free Rome from all foreign influence. His policy aimed not only at the exclusion of the ever-troublsome imperial authority, but also sought to check the growing influence of Charles of Anjou in central Italy. At his request Rudolf of Habsburg renounced (1278) all rights to the possession of the Romagna, a renunciation subsequently approved by the imperial princes. Nicholas took possession of the province through his nephew, Latino, whom he had shortly before (12 March, 1278) raised to the rank of imperial count. This other nephew, Count of the Romagna, and on other occasions remembered his relatives in the distribution of honourable and lucrative places. He compelled Charles of Anjou in 1278 to resign the regency of Tuscany and the dignity of Roman Senator. To assure the freedom of papal elections, he ordained in a constitution of 18 July, 1278, that henceforward the senatorial power and all municipal offices were to be reserved to Roman citizens to the exclusion of emperors, kings, or other potentates. In furtherance of more harmonious relations with the Byzantine court, the pope also aimed at restricting the power of the King of Naples in the East. To his efforts was due the agreement concluded in 1280 between Rudolf of Habsburg and Charles of Anjou, by which the latter renounced all pretensions to imperial and Byzantine titles and hesi am papal legate to the Council of Constance. He was chosen prieur of the monks of St. Winnoc at Ghent (April 1268), and Pope John XXI, whose counsellor he became and who named him archpriest of St. Peter's. After a vacancy of six months he succeeded John as Nicholas III.

Nicholas's efforts for the promotion of peace between France and Castle remained fruitless. Unable to carry out his desire of personally appearing in Hungary, where internal dissensions and the devastations of the Cumans had diminished the very existence of Christianity, he named, in the fall of 1278, Bishop Philip of Fermo his legate to that country. A synod, held at Buda in 1279 under the presidency of the papal encyclopaedia, could not complete its deliberations owing to the violent interference of the people. King Ladislaus IV, instigator of the trouble, was threatened in a council letter with excommunication, but ultimately he failed to reform his ways. The king temporarily heeded this solemn admonition, and at a later date suppressed the raids of the Cumans. The appointments of worthy incumbents to the Archibishops of Gran and Kabesac-Baes made under this pontificate further helped to strengthen the cause of Christianity. The rank of cardinal-deacon was given to Nicholas III, to his last days. With the Eastern Church was the practical realization of the union accepted by the Greeks at the Second Council of Lyons (1274), for political reasons rather than out of dogmatic persuasion. The instructions to the legates whom he sent to Constantinople contained, among other conditions, the renewal by the emperor of the oath sworn to by his representatives at Lyons. The maintenance of the Greek Rite was granted only in so far as papal authority did not consider it opposed to unity of faith; those of the clergy opposed to reunion were required to obtain absolution of the incurred censures from the Roman curia. These were more rigorous conditions than had been imposed by his predecessors, but the failure of the negotiations for reunion can hardly be attributed to them, for the Greek nation was strongly opposed to submission to Rome and the emperor pursued temporal advantages under cover of desire for ecclesiastical harmony. At the request of Alibaba, Khan of the Tatars, the pope sent him in 1278 five Franciscan missionaries who were to preach the Gospel first in Persia and then in China. They encountered considerable obstacles in the former country and it was not until the pontificate of Nicholas IV that their preaching produced appreciable results. The realization of the pope's desire for the organization of a Crusade was frustrated by the distracted state of European politics. On 14 August, 1279, he issued the constitution "Exíti qui sentiat", which is still fundamental for the interpretation of the Rule of St. Francis and in which he approved the stricter observance of poverty (see Francis, Rule of Saint). While the Vatican had been occupied from time to time by some of his predecessors, Nicholas III established there the papal residence, remodelled and enlarged the palace, and secured in its neighborhood previously transformed into the Vatican gardens. He has buried in the Chapel of St. Nicholas, built by him in St. Peter's. He was an ecclesiastically-minded pontiff of great diplomatic ability and, if we except his acts of nepotism, of unblemished character.

Nicholas IV, Pope (GIOVANNI MANCIO), b. at Ascoli in the March of Ancona; d. in Rome, 1 April, 1292. He was of humble extraction, and at an early age entered the Franciscan Order. In 1272 he was sent as a delegate to Constantinople to invite the participation of the Greeks in the Second Council of Lyons. Two years later he succeeded St. Bonaventure in the generalship of his order. While he was on a mission to France to promote the restoration of peace between that country and Castile, he was created cardinal-priest with the title of Santa Prisca (1278) and in 1279, Martin IV appointed him Bishop of Palestrina. After the death of Honorius IV (3 April, 1285), the conclave held at Rome was for a time hopelessly divided in its selection of a successor. When fever had carried off six of the electors, the others, with the sole exception of Giobano, left Rome. It was not until the following year that they reassembled and on 15 February, 1288, unanimously elected him to the papacy. Obedience and a second election however (22 February) were alone capable of overcoming his reluctance to accept the supreme pontificate. He was the first Franciscan pope, and in loving remembrance of Nicholas III he assumed the name of Nicholas IV.

The reign of the new pope was not characterized by sufficient independence. The undue influence exercised at Rome by the Colonna is especially noteworthy and was so apparent even during his lifetime that Roman wits represented him encased in a column—the distinctive mark of the Colonna family—out of which only his tara-covered head emerged. The efforts of Rudolf of Habsburg to receive the imperial crown at the hands of the new pope were not successful. His failure was partly due to the estrangement consequent upon the attitude assumed by the pope in the question of the Sicilian succession. As feudal suzerain of the kingdom, Nicholas annulled the treaty, concluded in 1288 through the mediation of Edward I of England, which confirmed James of Aragon in the possession of the island. He lent his support to the rival claims of the House of Anjou and crowned Charles II, King of Sicily and Naples at Rieti, 29 May, 1289, after the latter had expressly acknowledged the supremacy of the Pope in Sicily. He did not accept any municipal dignity in the States of the Church. The action of the pope did not end the armed struggle for the possession of Sicily nor did it secure the kingdom permanently to the House of Anjou. Rudolf of Habsburg also failed to obtain from the pope the repeal of the authorization granted the French king to levy tribute in certain German districts for the prosecution of the war against the House of Aragon. When he appointed his son Albert to succeed Ladislaus IV of Hungary (31 August, 1290), Nicholas claimed the realm as a papal fief and conferred it upon Charles Martel, son of Charles II of Naples.
In 1294 the fall of Ptolemaic rule put an end to Christian dominion in the East. Previous to this tragic event Nicholas had in vain endeavoured to organize a crusade to defend his faith. In 1296, when the Venetians were about to take up arms against the Muslims and instigated the holding of councils to devise the means of sending assistance to the Holy Land. These synods were to discuss likewise the advisability of the union of the Knights Templars and Knights of St. John, as the discussions among them had partly caused the loss of Ptolemaic dominion. He himself was elected in their place, taking as his name Nicholas in memory of his obligations to Niccolò Albergati (6 March, 1197).

As soon as the new pontiff was firmly seated on his throne, it was felt that a new spirit had come into the papacy. Now that there was no longer any danger of a fresh outbreak of schism and the Council of Constance had lost all influence, Nicholas could devote himself to the accomplishment of objects which were the aim of his life and had been the means of raising him to his present exalted position. He designed to make Rome the site of splendid monuments, the home of literature and art, the bulwark of the papacy, and the worthy capital of the Christian world. His first care was to strengthen the fortifications, and restore the city which the stationers had left. Next, he took in hand the cleansing and paving of the streets. Rome, once famous for the number and magnificence of its aqueducts, had become almost entirely dependent for its water supply on the Tiber and on wells and cisterns. The “Aqua Virgo”, originally constructed by Agrippa, was restored by Nicholas, and to this day the most prized by the Romans, under the name of “Aqua Traiana”. But the works on which he especially set his heart were the rebuilding of the Leonine City, the Vatican, and the Basilica of St. Peter. On this spot, as in a centre, the glory of the papacy were to be focused. We cannot here enter into a description of the noble designs which he undertook (see Pastor, “History of the Popes”, II, 173 sqq., Eng. tr.). But the works on which he especially set his heart were the rebuilding of the Leonine City, the Vatican, and the Basilica of St. Peter. On this spot, as in a centre, the glory of the papacy were to be focused. We cannot here enter into a description of the noble designs which he undertook (see Pastor, “History of the Popes”, II, 173 sqq., Eng. tr.). The Vatican, the palace, and the fortresses of the popes are not now what he would have made them; but their actual splendours are due in no small measure to the lofty aspirations of Nicholas V. He has been severely censured for pulling down a portion of the old St. Peter’s and planning the destruction of the remainder. He defended his action on the ground that the building was on the verge of ruin (Mantz, “Les Arts à la Cour des Papes”, p. 118); but the almost equally ancient Basilica of San Paolo fuori le Mura was preserved by judicious restorations until it was destroyed by fire in 1823. The pontiff’s veneration for antiquity may have yielded to his desire to construct an edifice more in harmony with the times, but still the work of which he himself was so ardent an adherent. Nothing but praise, however, can be given to him for his work in the Vatican Palace. Indeed it was he who first made it the worthy residence of the popes. Some of his constructions still remain, notably the left side of the court of St. Damazus and the chapel of San Lorenzo, decorated with Fra Angelico’s frescoes.
Though a patron of art in all its branches, it was literature that obtained his highest favours. His lifelong love of books and his delight in the company of scholars could now be gratified to the full. His immediate predecessors had held the Humanists in suspicion, and, when the latter would come to see him, he would begin the encounter with a salutation of the form: "Honesti homines, cum nobis?" (Honest men, are you with us?) and would then order the solemn unction of the books to be given them. Nicholas, however, had a far more genial disposition. He received all his visitors with a cordiality of manner and generosity of purpose which was no small aid to the promotion of learning. Among his first acts, after his accession, was the arrangement for the entrance of books into the Vatican Library, which had been ordered to be burned by his predecessor, Alexander VI. He thus set a new example to the rest of Europe. It was a fine lesson which, however, was not always followed. The learned, of whom he received many, were often too apt to recount to him the irregularities of their morals or opinions. He accepted the dedication of a work by Poggio, in which Eugène was assailed as a hypocrite; Valla, the Voltaire of the Renaissance, was made an Apostate notary. In spite of the demands upon his treasury for building purposes, he was always generous to deserving scholars. If any of them modestly declined his bounty, he would say: "Do not refuse; you will not always have a Nicholas among you." He set up a vast establishment in the Vatican for translating the Greek classics, so that all might become familiar with at least the matter of these masterpieces, to which he added his own annotations. Thus much he contributed to the welfare of his own country, so that he may be fairly considered as the patron of learning of the ages.

As the Bishop of Rome, his care and solicitude for the Church soon caused him to be looked upon as its chief minister. The first object he resolved upon was the renovation of the Papal States, and the recovery of the rights and liberties of the Roman people. He proceeded to this object with a resoluteness and energy which were the more remarkable from the deficiency of his wealth. At the same time, he endeavored to introduce the New Learning in his court, and to give the Roman Church the stamp of intellectual independence which he had seen acquired by the Greek Church, and which he was determined to bestow upon the Latin Church. In this respect, he was not unmindful of his spiritual relations with the Greek Church, or of the possibility of a union. He was desirous, indeed, of uniting the Eastern and Western Churches, and of restoring to the Greeks the dignity and prerogatives of their ancient See. It was the object of his endeavors to perfect the Papal States, as an independent and self-governing State, on the model of the ancient Roman Republic. He was, therefore, anxious to secure a settled peace in the dominions of the Church, and to establish a strong government in the Papal States. He was also desirous of promoting the education and learning of the clergy, and of securing the observance of the laws. He was determined to make the Church independent of the State, and to render it the repository of the spiritual and temporal power.

The Conciliar theory was one of the first objects of his attention, and he was anxious to secure the concord of the Church on the principles of the Council of Pavia. He was, however, unable to carry this object into effect, as his efforts were resisted by the Cardinals and the other dignitaries of the Church. Nevertheless, he was determined to take the lead in the matter of the reform of the Church. He was anxious to secure a settled peace in the dominions of the Church, and to establish a strong government in the Papal States. He was also desirous of promoting the education and learning of the clergy, and of securing the observance of the laws. He was determined to make the Church independent of the State, and to render it the repository of the spiritual and temporal power.

But the greatness of Nicholas's work was not confined to the internal reformation of the Church. He was also desirous of promoting the education and learning of the clergy, and of securing the observance of the laws. Nicholas, of Clemanges. See Clemanges, Mathieu-Nicolas Polleveillain de.

Nicholas of Cusa, German cardinal, philosopher, and administrator, b. at Cues on the Moselle, in the Archdiocese of Trier, Dec. 11 or 1401; d. at Tost, near Colmar, 11 Aug. 1464. Nicholas was born to a wealthy family (Krebs, a wealthy boatman (nauta, not a "poor fisherman"), died in 1450 or 1451, and his mother, Catharina Roemer, in 1427. The legend that Nicholas fled from the ill-treatment of his father to Count Ulrich of Manderscheid is doubtfully reported by Hatzheim (Vita N. de Cusa, Trier, 1730), as Nicholas never existed. He began his career in a school in December nothing is known; but in 1416 he was matriculated in the University of Heidelberg, by Rector Nicholas of Bettencour, as "Nicholai Canon de Coesze, elepticus [reverendus] de [polemis]. A year later, 1417, he left for Padua, where he graduated, in 1423, as doctor in canon law and theology. He returned to Germany, and laboured, in the style of his writing, in rhetoric and poetry. That the loss of a lawsuit at Mainz should have decided his choice of the clerical state, is not supported by his previous career. Aided by the Archbishop of Trier, he matriculated in the University of Cologne, for divinity, under the rectorship of Petrus von Weiler, in 1425. His identity with Nicholas of Cusa, the cardinal, is certain. As archbishop of Mainz, he was once mentioned as secretary to Cardinal Orsini, and papal legate for Germany in 1426, is not certain. After 1428, he was a benefice at Coblenz, Oberwesel, Münstermaifeld, Dyupurg, St. Wendel, and Liège fell to his lot, successively or simultaneously.

His public career began in 1431, at the Council of Basle, which opened under the presidency of the former teacher, Giuliano Cesarini. The cause of Count Ulrich of Manderscheid, which he defended, was lost and the transactions with the Bohemians, in which he represented the German nation, proved fruitless. His main efforts at the council were for the reform of the calendar and for the unity, political and religious, of the German church. In 1437 the orthodox minority sent him to Eugene IV, when he strongly supported his cause. The pope entrusted him with a mission to Constantinople, where, in the course of two months, besides discovering Greek manuscripts of S. Basil and St. John Damascene, he gained over for the Council of Florence, the emperor, the patriarch, and twenty-eight archbishops. After reporting the result of his mission to the pope at Ferrara, in 1438, he obtained an apostolic legate to support the cause of Eugene IV. He did so before the Diet of Mainz (1411), Frankfort (1412), Nuremberg (1411), again of Frankfort (1416), and even at the court of Charles VII of France, with such force that Einac Sylvius called him the Hercules of the Eugenians. As a reward Eugene IV nominated him cardinal; but on the death of Eugene he needed a command of the next pope, Nicholas V, to bring him to Rome for the acceptance of this honour. In 1419 he was proclaimed cardinal-priest of the title of St. Peter ad Vincula.
His new dignity was fraught with labours and crosses. The Diocese of Brixen, the see of which was vacant, need a reformer. The Cardinal of Cusa was appointed (1450), but, owing to the opposition of the chapter of and Sigmund, Duke of Austria and Count of the Tyrol, could not take possession of the see for some time. In the meantime the cardinal was sent by Nicholas V. as papal legate, to Northern Germany and the Netherlands. He was to preach the Jubilee indulgence and to promote the crusade against the Turks; to visit, reform, and correct parishes, monasteries, hospitals; to endeavour to reunite the Hussites with the Church; to end the dissensions between the Duke of Cleve and the Archbishop of Cologne; and to treat with the Duke of Burgundy with a view to peace between England and France. He crossed the Brenner in January, 1451, held a provincial synod at Salzburg, visited Vienna, Munich, Ratisbon, and Nuremberg, held a diocesan synod at Bamberg, presided over the provincial chapter of the Benedictines at Wurzburg, and reformed the monasteries in the Dioceses of Erfurt, Thuringia, Magdeburg, Hildesheim, and Minden. Through the Netherlands he was accompanied by his friend Denys the Carthusian. In 1452 he concluded his visits by holding a provincial synod at Cologne. Everywhere, according to Abbot Trithemius, he had appeared as an angel of light and peace, but it was not to be so in his own diocese. The troubles began with the Poor Clares of the monastery of the Benedictine nuns of Sonnenberg, who needed reformation, but were shielded by Duke Sigmund. The cardinal had to take refuge in the stronghold of Andraz, and, after, at last, by special authority received from Pius II, pronounced an interdict upon the Countship of the Tyrol. In 1460 the duke made him prisoner at Burneck and carried him to a treaty favourable to the bishopric. Nicholas fled to Pope Pius II, who excommunicated the duke and laid an interdict upon the diocese, to be enforced by the Archbishop of Salzburg. But the duke, himself an immortal man, and, further, instigated by the antipapal humanist Heinburg, defied the pope and appealed to a general council. It needed the strong influence of the emperor, Frederick III., to make him finally (1464) submit to the Church. This took place some days after the cardinal's death. The account of the twelve years' struggle given by Liéger, and, after him, by Prandi, is unfair to the "foreign reformer" (see Pastor, op. cit. infra, II). The cardinal, who had accompanied Pius II to the Venetian fleet at Ancona, was sent by the pope to Leghorn to hasten the Genoese crusaders, but on the way succumbed to an illness, the result of his ill-treatment at the hands of the French. The manuscripts he had never fully recovered. He died at Todi, in the presence of his friends, the physician Toscaneli and Bishop Johannes Andree.

The body of Nicholas of Cusa rests in his own titular church in Rome, beneath an effigy of him sculptured in relief, but his heart is deposited before the altar in the hospital of Cues. This hospital was the cardinal's own foundation. By mutual agreement with his brother Clare and his brother John, his entire inheritance was made the basis of the foundation, and by the cardinal's last will his altar service, manuscript library, and scientific instruments were bequeathed to it. The extensive buildings with chapel, cloister, and refectory, which were erected in 1454, stand to this day, and serve their original purpose of a home for thirty-three old men, in honour of the thirty-three years of Christ's earthly life. Another foundation of the cardinal was a residence at Deventer, called the Bursa Cusana, where twenty poor clerical students were to be supported. Among bequests, a sum of 200 ducats was left to S. Maria dell'Immacolata for the provision of an infirmary. In the archives of this institution is found the original document of the cardinal's last will.

The writings of Cardinal Nicholas may be classified under four heads: (1) juridical writings: "De concordantia catholicae" and "De auctoritate presidendi in concilio generali" (1452-35), both written on occasion of the Council of Basle. The superiority of the general councils over the pope is maintained; though, when the majority of the assembly drew from these writings startling conclusions unfavourable to the Emperor, the author seems to have changed his views, as appears from his action after 1457. The political reforms proposed were skillfully utilized by Gorres in 1814. (2) In his philosophical writings, composed after 1439, he set aside the definitions and methods of the "Aristotelian See" and replaced them by deep speculations and mystical forms of his own. The best known in his first treatise is "De docta ignorantia" (1439-40), on the finite and the infinite. The Theory of Knowledge is critically examined in the treatise "De conjecturis" (1440-44) and especially in the "Compendium" (1461). In his Cosmology he calls the Creator the "Passus" (passus, the possible-actual), alluding to the argument: God is possible, therefore actual. His "microcosmus" and "macrocosmus" have some similarity with the "monads" and the "emanation" of Leibniz. (3) The theological treatises are dogmatic, ascetic, and mystical. "De eritratione aetheri" (1460) was occasioned by his visit to Constantinople, and was written for the conversion of the Mohammedans. For the faithful were written: "De incorrupta Devine" (1441), "De vita Christiana" (1443), "De visione Dei" (1453), "Exjetitionum libri X" (1431-41), and others. The favourite subject of his mystical speculations was the Trinity. His concept of God has been much disputed, and has even been called pantheistic. The context of his writings proves, however, that they are all strictly Christian. Schapiz calls his theology a Thomist à Kempis in philelaphic language. (4) The scientific writings consist of a dozen treatises, mostly short, of which the "Reparatio Calendarii" (1436), with a correction of the Alphonsine Tables, is the most important. (For an account of its contents and its results, see Luhrs, Annates.) The shorter mathematical treatises are contained in Kaeffer's "History of Mathematics." Among them is a claim for the exact quadrature of the circle, which was refuted by Regiomontanus [see Müller (Regiomontans), Johann]. The astronomical views of the cardinal are scattered through his philosophical treatises. They evince complete independence of traditional doctrines, though they are based on symbolism of numbers, on combinations of letters, and on abstract speculations rather than observation. The earth is a star like other stars, is not the centre of the universe, and is not at rest, nor are its poles fixed. The celestial bodies are not strictly spherical, nor are their orbits circular. The difference between theory and appearance is explained by relative motion. Had Copernicus been aware of these assertions he would probably have been encouraged by them to publish his own monumental work. The collected editions of the works of Cusanus are: Inaugurale (before 1476) in 2 vols., incomplete; Paris (1511) in 3 vols.; Basle (1565), in 3 vols.

Michael Ott.

Nicholas of Gorran (or Gorrain), medieval preacher, and scriptural commentator; b. in 1232 at Gorran, France; d. about 1293. He entered the Dominican Order in the cloister of the Monastery of St. James in Paris. In this convent he subsequently served several terms as prior. His piet and sound judgment attracted the attention of Philip IV of France, whom he served as confessor and adviser. In most of his ecclesiastical studies he does not seem to have excelled notably; but in preaching and in the interpretation of the Scriptures he was unsurpassed by any of his contemporaries. His scriptural writings treat of all the books of the Old and the New Testament, and possess more than ordinary merits. Indeed, in the most important of these, they were held by the doctors of the University of Paris that the latter were wont to designate their au-
Nicholas of Lyra (Doctor plenus utiles), exegete, b. at Lyra in Normandy, 1270; d. at Paris, 1340. The report that he was of Jewish descent dates only from the fifteenth century. He took the Franciscan habit at Verona, studied theology, received the doctor's degree in Paris and was appointed professor, at the Sorbonne. In the famous controversy between the Beatitic Vision he took sides with the professor against John XXII. He laboured very successfully, both in preaching and writing, for the conversion of the Jews. He is the author of numerous theological works, some of which are yet unpublished. It was to exegesis that Nicholas of Lyra devoted his best years. In the second prologue to his monumental work, "Postilla perpetua in universam Scripturam," after stating that the literal sense of Sacred Scripture is the foundation of all mystical expositions, and that it alone has demonstrative force, as St. Augustine teaches, he deposes the state of Biblical studies in his time. The literal sense, he says, is much obscured, owing partly to the carelessness of the copyists, partly to the unskilfulness of some of the correctors, partly also to our own translation (the Vulgate), which not infrequently departs from the original Hebrew. He holds with St. Jerome that the text must be corrected from the Hebrew codices, except of course the prophecies concerning the Divinity of Christ. Another reason for this obscurity, Nicholas goes on to say, is the attachment of scholars to the method of interpretation handed down by others, who, though they have said many things well, have yet touched but sparingly on the literal sense, and have so multiplied the mystical senses as nearly to intercept and choke it. Moreover, the text has been distorted by a multiplicity of arbitrary divisions and concordances. Hereupon he declares his intention of insisting, in the present work, upon the literal sense and of interspersing only a few mystical interpretations. Nicholas utilized all available sources, fully mastered the Hebrew and drew copiously from the valuable commentaries of the Jewish exeges, especially of the celebrated Tanhumoth Rashi. The "Pugio Fidei" of Raymond Martin, "Postilla" and commentaries of St. Thomas Aquinas were laid under contribution. His exposition is field and concise; his observations are judicious and sound, and always original. The "Postilla" soon became the favourite manual of exegesis. It was the first Biblical commentary printed. The solid learning of Nicholas commanded the respect of both Jews and Christians.

Luther owes much to Nicholas of Lyra, but how widely the principles of Nicholas differed essentially from Luther's views is best seen from Nicholas's own words: "I protest that I do not intend to accept or determine anything that has not been manifestly determined by Sacred Scripture or by the authority of the Church. Wherefore I submit all I have said or shall say to the correction of Holy Mother Church and of all learned men..." (Proh. second, in Post. Th. 1498). Nicholas taught no new doctrine. The early Fathers and the great schoolmen had repeatedly laid down the same sound exegesis, principi, and principles, which, owing to adverse tendencies of the times, their efforts had partly failed. Nicholas carried out these principles effectively and, in this his chief merit, one which ranks him among the foremost exeges of all times.

Nicholas of Myra (or of Baris), Saint, Bishop of Myra in Lycia, d. 6 December, 345 or 352. Though but many difficulties seem to have hindered him from the discharge of these offices. Nicholas wrote both in Latin and Italian a number of treatises on moral theology, the spiritual life, and on the Rule of St. Francis. We mention the following: (1) “Supplementum Simmeae Magistriuae seu Pisanelle," a revised and increased edition of the "Simmea" of Bartholomew of San Concordo (or of Pisa), O.P., completed at Rome, 1414; Venetia, 1471-1472; (2) “Quaeritiva Spiritualia," in Italian, treat in a popular way what the author considers the four principal means of salvation, viz. faith, good works, confession, and prayer. These are like the four wheels of a locomotive, and are described in two books, the first of which was printed at Jesi, 1475, and the second at Venice, 1483.

LIVYANUS OLIGER.

Nicholas of Strasbourg, mystic, flourished early in the fourteenth century. Educated at Paris, he was later on lector at the Dominican convent, Cologne. Appointed by Pope XXII, he made a canonical visitation of the German Dominican province, where great discord prevailed. Relying on two papal briefs dated 1 August, 1327, and 15 March, 1328, Nicholas, according to the pope's commands, set out from the pontiff to reform the province in its head and members, and to act as visitor to the sisters. Nicholas, however, assumed the office of inquisitor as well, and closed a process already begun by Archbishop Heinrich (Cologne) against Master Eckhart, O.P., for his teachings on mysticism, in favour of the latter, 1230. In January, 1329, the archbishop renewed the cause and arraigned Nicholas as a patron of his confre's errors. Almost simultaneously, Hermann von Höchst, a discontented religious on whom Nicholas had imposed a well-merited penance, took revenge by having him excommunicated. Nicholas, however, was soon released from this sentence by Pope John that he might appear as defantor of this general chapter of his order convened at Pierpont, May 31, 1327. He is last heard of after the settlement of the process against Eckhart as vicar of the German Dominicans, 1327. Thirteen extant sermons show him to have been of a rather practical turn of mind.

Nicholas of Strasbourg was a mystic, and his teachings were based on the principles of sound theology, he urges in clear, pregnant, and forceful language the sacred importance of good works, penitential practices and indulgences, confession and the Holy Eucharist. Only by the use of these means can the love of God be well-regulated and that perfect conversion of the heart attained which is indispensable for a complete remission of sins. Built upon a firm groundwork, there is nothing to censure but much to commend in his allegorical interpretations of Sacred Scripture, which are otherwise consistent with his fondness for parable and animated illustration. "De Adventu Christi," formerly attributed to Nicholas, came originally from the pen of John ofParis.

Michael Ott.

Nicholas of Osmo (Auxinanae), celebrated preacher and author, b. at Osmo, Italy, in the second half of the fourteenth century; d. at Rome, 1333. After having studied law, and taken the degree of doctor of civil law, he joined the Augustinian Order and was Minister of the Observants in the convent of San Paolo. Conspicuous for zeal, learning, and preaching, as companion of St. James of the Marches in Bosnia, and as Vicar-Provincial of Apulia (1332), Nicholas greatly contributed to the prosperity of the Observants for whom (1410) he obtained complete independence from the Convent of Bologna. Shortly after he was made Bishop of Osmo, and later erected a new see in the diocese of St. Bernardine. He was also appointed Visitor and afterwards Superior of the Holy Land, but many difficulties seem to have hindered him from the discharge of these offices. Nicholas wrote both in Latin and Italian a number of treatises on moral theology, the spiritual life, and on the Rule of St. Francis. We mention the following: (1) “Supplementum Simmeae Magistriuae seu Pisanelle," a revised and increased edition of the "Simmea" of Bartholomew of San Concordo (or of Pisa), O.P., completed at Rome, 1414; Venetia, 1471-1472; (2) “Quaeritiva Spiritualia," in Italian, treat in a popular way what the author considers the four principal means of salvation, viz. faith, good works, confession, and prayer. These are like the four wheels of a locomotive, and are described in two books, the first of which was printed at Jesi, 1475, and the second at Venice, 1483.

J. THOMAS GIFFORD

NICHOLAS OF GORKUM

The life and death of Nicholas of Gorkum were significant in the history of the Reformation. Gorkum was a town in the Netherlands, and the Council of Gorkum was held there in 1566. The council was convened to address the persecution of the Calvinists in the region and to seek a compromise between the Church and its dissenters. Nicholas, a prominent figure in the Calvinist movement, played a key role in the council proceedings. His defense of the Reformed faith and his willingness to endure suffering for his convictions were emblematic of the earlier martyrs.

Nicholas was born in Gorkum in 1534 and was educated at the University of Leiden. His scholarly work and strong beliefs led him to the Calvinist cause. He was ordained a priest in 1560 and began serving as a minister in the area. When theCouncil of Gorkum began, he was among the leaders who spoke out against the demands of the council. He felt that the council was attempting to control the local church, and he opposed the council's attempts to suppress the Reformed faith.

Nicholas's ministry and oratory were celebrated. He was known for his eloquence and his ability to connect with people on a personal level. He was a respected and beloved figure in the community. However, his actions and words led to his arrest and imprisonment. He was held in the dungeon of the Tower of London, where he endured much suffering. His trial, which began on 10 September, 1565, began with an address to the court defending the Calvinist faith and denouncing the Council of Gorkum. His defense was heard by the judges, and he was found guilty of heresy. He was then sentenced to death by burning.

On 30 January, 1566, Nicholas was burned at the stake. His execution was witnessed by many, and it was a moment of great suffering and loss. Nicholas's martyrdom was a turning point in the history of the Reformation. His courage and dedication to the faith inspired others to continue the struggle for religious freedom. His memory lives on as a symbol of strength and sacrifice, a reminder of the ongoing battle for truth and justice.
Nicodemus, a controversial Jew of the time of Christ, mentioned only in the Fourth Gospel. The name is of Greek origin, but at that epoch such names were occasionally borrowed by the Jews, and according to Josephus (Ant. of the Jews, XIV, iii, 2) Nicodemus was the name of one of the ambassadors sent by Aristobulus to Pompey. A Hebrew form of the name (נֵכְדֶּמְיָה, Nechdim) is found in the Talmud. Nicodemus was a Pharisee, and in his capacity of sanhedrist (John, vii, 50) was a leader of the Jews. Christ, in the interview when Nicodemus came to him by night, calls him a master in Israel. Judging from John, xix, 39, Nicodemus must have been a man of means, and it is probable that he wielded a certain influence in the Sanhedrin. Some writers conjecture from his question: "How can a man be born when he is old?" that he was already advanced in years, but the words are too general to warrant such a conclusion. He appears in this interview as a learned and intelligent believer, but timid and not easily initiated into the mysteries of the new faith. He next appears (John, vii, 50, 51) in the Sanhedrin offering a word in defence of the accused Galilean; and we may infer from this passage that he embraced the truth as soon as it was fully made known to him by Jesus (18 June, 1663), and finally in John, xix, 39, where he is shown co-operating with Joseph of Arimathae in the embalming and burial of Jesus. His name occurs later in some of the apocryphal writings, e. g. in the so-called "Acta Pilati," a heterogenous document which in the sixteenth century was published under the title Evangelium Nicodemi (25 June, 1663), but whose authorship and date is unknown. The Roman Martyrlogy commemorates the finding of his relics, together with those of Sts. Stephen, Gamaliel, and Abibo, on 3 August.

JAMES F. DROSCOLL.
meric writings seem to have been to exalt the dignity and glory of France and her kings. Thus, he delivered in Rome in 1628 a panegyric in honour of the victory of Louis XIII at La Rochelle and in 1661 composed a poem in honour of the son of Louis XIV. He was highly esteemed at the royal court and received a pension of 600 francs. He was buried in the chapel of the convent of St. James in Paris, and a marble stone beside the grave bears a long inscription recounting his virtues, his learning, and his services to his country.

Nicolaïtes (Nicolaïtans), a sect mentioned in the Apocalypse (ii, 15) among those named Eshbath-Pergamo, and also on Asia Minor, amongst the Georce and existence of which there is little certainty. Ireneus (Adv. H., i, xxvi, 3; iii, x, 1) discusses them but adds nothing to the Apocalypse except that they "teach lives of unrestrained indulgence". Tertullian refers to them, but apparently knows only what is found in St. John (De Preéscip. xxiii, Adv. Mar. v. ii, 6). Hippolytus, in his narrative on Ireneus, though he states that the deacon Nicholas was the author of the heresy and the sect (Philos., vii, xxvi). Clement of Alexandria (Strom., iii, iv) exonerates Nicholas, and attributes the doctrine of promiscuity, which the sect claimed to have derived from him, to a malicious distortion. With the exception of the statement in Eusebius (H. E., iii, xxix) that the sect was short-lived, none of the references in Epiphanius, Theodoret etc., deserve mention, as they are taken from Ireneus. The common statement, that the Nicolaïtes held the antinomian heresy of Corinth, has not been proved. Another opinion, favored by a recent writer, that the categorical character of the Apocalypse, the reference to the Nicolaïtes is merely a symbolic manner of reference, based on the identical meaning of the names, to the Bileanites or Balaamites (Apoc., ii, 14) who are mentioned just before them as professing the same doctrines.

Nicolas, ARMELLE, popularly known as "La bonne Armelle", a saintly French serving-maid, held in high veneration among the people, though never canonized by the Church, b. at Campanée in Brittany, 9 September, 1606; d. at Nantes or Paris, 1611. Her early years were spent in the pious, simple life of the hard-working country folk. When she was twenty-two years of age her parents wished her to marry, but she chose rather to enter service in the neighboring town of Ploemel, where she found more opportunity for her pious works and for satisfying her spiritual desires. After a short period of service she went to the larger town of Vannes, where she served in several families, and for a year and a half was mistress at the Ursuline monastery. She here formed a special friendship with a certain sister, Jeanne de la Nativité, to whom she told from time to time many details of her spiritual life, and who noted all of them down in a manuscript. After a stay of three years she left the life of Armelle, who could herself neither read nor write. Even the lowly work at the convent did not satisfy her craving for toil and humiliation, and she returned to one of her former employers, where she remained to the end of her life. To her severe trials and temptations she added many works of penance and was rewarded with an intimate union with God. During the last years of her life a broken leg caused her great suffering, patiently borne. Many recommended themselves to her prayers and her death-bed was surrounded by a great number of persons who held her in special veneration. Her heart was preserved in the Jesuit church, and her body was buried in the church of the Ursulines. Near her grave was erected a tablet to "La bonne Armelle"; her tomb is a place of pilgrimage. Armelle has been claimed, but without good grounds, as an exponent of Quietism (q. v.). If some of her expressions seemed tinged with Quietist thought, it is because the controversy was so clearly defined and defined many notions concerning Quietism had not yet arisen. On the other hand her simple, laborsious life and practical piety make any such aberrations very unlikely.

Nicolas, AUGUSTE, French apologist, b. at Bordeaux, 6 Jan., 1807; d. at Versailles 18 Jan., 1858. He first studied law, was admitted as an advocate and entered the magistracy. From 1841 to 1849 he was justice of the peace at Bordeaux; as early as 1832 he began the publication of his apostolical writings, which soon made his name known among Catholics. When in 1849 M. de Falloux became minister of public worship he summoned Nicolas to assist him as head of the department for the administration of the temporal interests of ecclesiastical districts. He held this office until 1854 when he became general inspector of the Ursulines. In 1853 he was appointed to the tribunal of the Sain and finally councillor at the Paris Court of appeals.

Nicolas employed his leisure and later his retirement to write works in defence of Christianity taken as a whole or in its most important dogmas. He showed his accurate conception of apologetics by adapting them to the disposition and needs of the times. He lived in a period when Traditionalism still dominated many French Catholics, and this is reflected in his works. He aimed no doubt at defending religion by means of philosophy, good sense, and arguments from authority; but he also often appeals to the traditions and the growing moral sense of mankind at large. The testimonies, however, which he cites are often apocryphal, and frequently also he interprets them uncritically and ascribes to them a meaning or a scope which they do not possess. Besides, his apologetics speedily grew out-of-date when ecclesiastical and critical studies were revived in France and elsewhere. His writings have hitherto been inclined to over-acquaint the learning and precision of the theologian, and some of his books were in danger of being placed on the Index. Some bishops, however, among them Cardinals Donnet and Pie, intervened in his behalf and certified to the uprightness of his intentions. Otherwise the author addressed himself to the general public and especially to the middle classes which were still penetrated with Voltairean incredulity, and he succeeded in reaching them. His books were very successful in France and some of them even in Germany, where they were translated. Among his works may be mentioned: "Études philosophiques sur le Christianisme" (Paris, 1841-45), a philosophical apology for the chief Christian dogmas, which reached a twenty-sixth edition before the death of the author; "La Vierge Marie et le plan divin, nouvelles études philosophiques sur le Christianisme" (4 vols., Paris, 1852, 1853, 1854, 1861), in which is explained the rôle of the Blessed Virgin in the plan of Redemption, and which was translated into German, and reached the eighth edition. The author's life-time: "L'Art de croire, ou préparation philosophique au Christianisme" (Paris, 1855, 2 vols., 8 editions); "L'Art de croire, ou préparation philosophique au Christianisme" (Paris, 1856-57), translated into German; "La Divinité de Jésus-
Nicolaus Germanus (often called "Domis" from a misapprehension of the title "Dominus") was "Domus" an alter ego of Donus, and Donus a pseudonym of Nicolaus. In the execution of cartography, place of birth, and date of birth and death unknown. The first allusion to him of authentic date is an injunction of Duke Borso d'Este (15 March, 1466) to his referendary and privy councillor, Ludovico Casella, at Ferrara, to have the "Cosmographia of Don Niccolò" thoroughly examined and then to determine a new cartographia for it, and he was paid for it with 100 florins in gold "to remit as a mark of his appreciation to Donnus Nicolaus Germanus for his excellent book entitled "Cosmographia"." On 8 April, 1466, the duke again drew thirty golden florins to present to the Rev. Nicolaus, who, in addition to that excellent Cosmographia, the illusory "Neuen besten Welt- und Landes-Opuss" (Opus) had dedicated to the Duke, a calendar made to cover many years to come ("librum taenini multorum annorum"). The "Cosmographia" as preserved in the Bibliotheca Estensis at Modena comprises a Latin translation of the Geography of Ptolemy with maps. The version of the geographical text is substantially the same as that dedicated in 1410 to Pope Alexander V by Jacopo Angeli de Dominico. In the execution of the maps, however, Nicolaus, instead of adhering to the flat projection of Ptolemy, chose what is known as the "Domis-projection", because first worked out by him, in which the parallels of latitude are equidistant, but the meridians are made to converge towards the pole. He likewise introduced new modes in the depiction of the coastlines, and the outlines of the mountains and lakes, as well as in the choice of cartographic proportions. He reduced the awkward size to one which was convenient for use; the obscure and often unattractive mode of presentation he replaced by one both tasteful and easily intelligible; he endeavoured to revise obsolete maps in accordance with later information and to supplement them with new maps. While his first recession embraced only the twenty-seven maps of Ptolemy (one map of the world, ten special maps of Europe, four of Africa, twelve of Asia), the second comprised thirty (including in addition modern maps of Spain, Italy, and the Northern countries; Sweden, Norway, and Greenland). The last and reversed recession he had dedicated as priest to Pope Paul II (1641-71). He also added to the same pontiff his third recession, containing thirty-two maps, adding modern maps of France and the Holy Land. The works of the German cartographer were of great value in diffusing the knowledge of Ptolemy's Geography. The first recession, probably the very copy in the Lenox Library (New York), is the basis of the Roman editions of Ptolemy with the dates 1478, 1490, and 1507; on the third, certainly the copy preserved in Wolfegg Castle, are based the Ulm editions of 1582 and 1586. By combining the Roman and Ulm editions Waldseemüller produced the maps of Ptolemy in the Strasbourg edition of 1513, which was frequently copied. The modern map of the Northern countries, made by Claudius Clavus, which Nicolaus embodied in his second recession of Ptolemy, was perhaps the source of the Zeni map which had such far-reaching influence, and likewise of the maritime charts of the Canaries and Cantabrian type. The revised map of the Northern countries in the third recession of Nicolaus, which placed Greenland north of the Scandinavian Peninsula, was a powerful factor in cartography for a century, especially as Waldseemüller gave the preference to this representation in his world and wall map of 1507, "the baptismal certificate of American geography", which he often quoted as the authority of geography and cartography, as for example, by the revision of Buondelmonte's "Insularium", it would be desirable to have it established whether Nicolaus was really, as I conjecture, a Benedictine father of the Badia at Florence.

JOSEPH FISCHER.

Nicole, Pierre, theologian and controversialist, b. 19 October, 1625, at Chartres; d. 16 November, 1695, at Paris. He studied at Paris, became Master of Arts, 1641, and followed courses in theology, 1645-46. Under Sainte-Beuve's direction he applied himself with earnestness, on the one hand, to the study of the works of Thomas, devoting part of his time to teaching in the schools of Port-Royal. In 1649 he received the degree of Bachelor of Theology, and then withdrew to Port-Royal des Champs, where he fell in with the Jansenistic leaders, especially Antoine Arnauld, who found in him a willing ally. He returned to Paris in 1652, and was nominated by M. de Rossignol, who, some years later, during a tour in Germany, had translated Pascal's "Provinciales" into classic Latin, adding notes of his own and publishing the whole as the work of William Wendrock. In 1676 he sought admission to Holy orders, but was refused by the Bishop of Chartres and never got beyond tonsure. A letter, which he wrote (1677) to Innocent XI in favour of the Bishops of Saint-Pons and Arras, involved him in difficulties that obliged him to quit the capital. In 1679 he went to Belgium and lived for a time with Arnauld in Brussels, Liège, and other cities. About 1683 de Harlay, Archbishop of Paris, to whom he had sent a sort of retraction, authorized Nicole to return to Chartres, then to Paris. Here he took part in two celebrated controversies; the one (1689) with Bishop Bossuet, and the other (1693) against the Abbé de la Croze, who had published a controversy against the Abbé de l'Aubriot. His last years were saddened by painful infirmities and his death came after a series of apoplectic attacks.

Pierre Nicole was a distinguished writer and a vigorous controversialist. A kind, together with Pascal, contributed much to the formation of French prose. As a controversialist, he too frequently placed his talent at the service of a sect; however, many are of the opinion that he did not wholly share the errors of the majority of the Jansenists. At any rate, we generally find in him only a mitigated expression of these errors dressed in great reserve. On the other hand, he retained a respect for Bossuet, and his "Fortune du Père", (See JANSENUS.) Niceront (Mémoires, XXIX, Paris, 1783) enumerates no less than eighty-eight of his works, several of which were, however, very short. The principal works of Nicole relating either to Protestantism or Jansenism are: "Les imagierites et les visionnaires" (1659); "Derniers temps" (1671); "En defense de l'Eglise" (Cologne,..

Nicole, Diocese of (Nicolemata), in the Province of Quebec, Canada, suffragan of Quebec. It comprises the municipalities of Nicolet, Nicolette, Drummond, and a small part of Shefford and Bagot. The see takes its name from the town of Nicolet (population 3915), situated on the south bank of the St. Lawrence, opposite Trois-Rivières.

It was erected into a bishopric on 11 July, 1885, by separation from the diocese of Trois-Rivières, the first occupant of the see being Mgr Elzéar Gravel. Mgr was born on 12 October, 1838, at Saint-Antoine-de Richelieu, Quebec; consecrated at Rome on 2 August, 1885, and died, 28 January, 1904. His successor, Mgr Joseph-Simon-Herman Brunault, the present occupant of the see, was born at St-David, Quebec, on 10 January, 1857; educated at the seminary of Nicolet and the Canadian College, Rome; ordained, 29 June, 1882. Having ministered two years in the cathedral of St. Hyacinth and taught for many years in the seminary of Nicolet, first as professor of literature, and then of theology, he was named coadjutor to Mgr Gravel and consecrated titular Bishop of Tubuna, 27 December, 1899, and succeeded as Bishop of Nicolet, 28 January, 1899. The seminary of Nicolet was founded 30 October, 1803, and affiliated to the Laval University of Quebec, in 1833; it contains over 320 students; a grand séminaire, likewise affiliated to the University of Laval, was established at Nicolet, 22 February, 1908.

The religious in the diocese are as follows: Séminaires de l'Assomption de la Sainte-Vierge, teachers, founded, at St-Patrice (Nicolet) in 1633, have eighteen houses in the diocese; Séminaire de Nicolet, hospital; three houses; Congrégation de Notre-Dame (of Montreal), teachers, at Athabaskaeville, and Victoriaville; Séminaire de la Présentation de la Bienheureuse Vierge Marie, teachers, at St-David and Drummondville; Séminaire des Filles-de-la-Prévôté, teachers and nurses; Séminaire de St-Patrice et de St-Carle, teachers and nurses; Séminaire de St-Joseph (of Montreal), hospital and school of housekeeping, etc., in St-François-du-Lac, and a school at Pierreville (Ahenaki Indian village); Religieuses hospitalières de St-Joseph (of Montreal), hospital and school, at Athabaskaeville; Séminaire du Prévôt-Sang, and Séminaire des Saintes-Familles de Nicolet; the Frères des Écoles Chrétiennes have schools at Nicolet, Athabaskaeville, La Grande, and St-Carle; the Frères de la Rédemption, Drummondville; and the Frères de la Sacré-Cœur, teachers at Athabaskaeville, and Victoriaville. General Statistics.—Sister priests, 140; brothers, 120; sisters, 100; churches with resident priests, 65; mission, 1; theological seminary, 1; college-seminary, 1; commercial colleges and schools for boys, 11; students, 1600; academies for young ladies in charge of sisters, 28; students, 1800; normal school for young ladies, 1; parochial schools, 500; children attending parochial schools, 20,000; orphan asylums, 1; orphanages, 120; hospitals, 3; population: Catholic French Canadians, 90,000; Irish Canadians, 600; Protestant, 1500; total population, 90,400. Nicoló de Tudeschi ("abbas modernus" or "receptator," "abbas Panormitanus" or "Siculus"), a Benedictine canon, b. at Catania, Sicily, in 1846; d. at Palermo, 24 February, 1445. In 1400 he entered the Order of St. Benedict; he was sent (1405-06) to the University of Bologna to study under Zabarella; in 1411 he became a doctor of canon law, and taught subsequently at Parma (1412-18), Siena (1119-30), and Bologna (1531-32). Meanwhile in 1425, he was made abbot of the monastery of Magliao, near Messina, whence his name "Abbas," to which has been added "modernus" or "receptator" (in order to distinguish him from "Abbas antiquus," a thirteenth century canonist who died about 1288), is also known as "Abbas Siculus" on account of his Sicilian origin. In 1433 he went to Rome where he exercised the functions of auditor of the Rota and Apostolic referendary. The following year he relinquished these offices and placed himself at the service of Alfonso of Castile, King of Sicily, obtaining the See of Palermo in 1435, whence his name "Panormitanus." During the troubles that marred the pontificate of Eugene IV, Nicoló at first refused the patriarchate of this pontiff but subsequently allied himself with the antipope Felix V who, in 1140, named him cardinal. In his "Tractatus de concilio Basileensi" he upheld the doctrine of the superiority of a general council to the pope. It was his canonical works, especially his "Lectura in Decretales," "In Sextum," "In Clementiam," that were most noted; "Iuris pontificii" (hamp of the law) and insured him great authority; he also wrote "Consilia," "Quaestiones," "Repetitio," "Disquisitiones," "Repertiones," and other works on topics of canon law.

The Territory of the see took place on 15 September. The Roman Martyrology and the historical Martyrologies of Bede and his imitators place the feast on this date. The Gregorian Sacramentary contains under the same date the orations for his Mass. The name does not appear in the three oldest and most important MSS. of the Martyrology Hieronymianus, but was inserted in later recensions ("Martyrologium Hieronymianum"), where it appears in the Liber pontificalis of the 16th century. The saint is without doubt a martyr of the Roman Church. He was buried in a catacomb on the Via Nomentana near the gate of that name. Three century itineraries make explicit reference to his grave, and Pope Adrian I restored the church built over it (De Rossi, "Roma Sotterranea," I. 179, 75). A titular church of Rome, mentioned in the fifth century, was dedicated to him (titulus S. Nicolodini). Nothing is known of the circumstances of his death. The legend of the martyrdom of Sts. Neronus and Achilles introduces him as a presbyter and archbishop of Rome, the author of the first century. Other recensions of the martyrdom of St. Nicomedes ascribe the sentence of death to the Emperor Maximianus (beginning of the fourth century).

Nicopolis, titular see of Bithynia Prima, founded by King Zipoetes. About 264 n. c. his son Nicodemus, I dedicated the city anew, gave it his name, made it his capital, and adorned it with magnificent monuments. At his court the vanquished Hannibal sought refuge. When Bithynia became a Roman province Nicomedia remained its capital. Thyn the Younger mentions, in his letters to Trajan, several public edifices of the city,—a senate house, an aqueduct which had built a forum, the temple of Cybele, etc. He also proposed to join the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora and made which should follow the Meander Samarius and empty the waters of the Lake of Sambandja into the Gulf of Aestus. A fire then almost destroyed the town. From Nicomedia perhaps, he wrote to Trajan his famous letter concerning the Christians. Under Marcus Aurelius, Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, addressed a letter to his community in the form of a harangue (Hier. Ecl., IV, xxi.). Bishop Evander, who opposed the sect of the Ophites (P. L., LXXI, 592), seems to have lived at the same time. Nicomedia was the favorite residence of Dioecletian, who built there a palace, a hippodrome, a mint, and an arsenal. In 203 the edict of the tenth persecution carried against the Marcionites (Hier. Ecl., IV, xxi.) and the Diocletian, a suburb, was built, especially in Nicomedia, where the Bishop Anthius and a great many Christians were martyred. The city was then half Christian, the palace itself being filled with them. In 303, in the vast plain east of Nicomedia, Diocletian renounced the empire in favour of Galerius. In 311 Lucian, a priest of Antioch, delivered a discourse in the presence of the judge because he was accused of sacrilege. Other persecutions of the Christians are numbered by hundreds. Nicomedia suffered greatly during the fourth century from an invasion of the Goths and from an earthquake (21 Aug., 351), which overthrew all the public and private monuments; fire completed the catastrophe. The city was rebuilt, on a smaller scale. In the reign of Justinian new public buildings were erected, which were destroyed by fire in the following century by the Shah Chosroes. Pope Constantine I visited the city in 711. In 1073 John Comnenus was there proclaimed emperor and shortly afterwards was compelled to abdicate. In 1328 it was captured by the Sultan Orkhan, who restored its ramparts, parts of which are still preserved.

In 1871 Christ and Albert (Hier. Ecl., 98) has drawn up a list of fifty metropolitan sees, which may easily be completed, for Nicomedia has never ceased to be a metropolitan see. Some Latin archbishops are also mentioned by Le Quien (III, 1017) and by Ebel (Hierarchia Catholica medii aevi, I, 384). As early as the eighth century the metropolitan see of Nicomedia had disappeared or simply disappeared by degrees. Among its bishops, apart from those already mentioned, were: the three Arius, Eusebius, Eudoxius, and Demophilus, who exchanged their see for that of Constantinople; St. Theophylactus, martyred by the Iconodulists in the ninth century; George, a great preacher and a friend of Photius; Philotheus Bryenios, the present titular, who discovered and published a manuscript (574) of the Apocalypse, called Erigena, the chief town of a sanjak directly dependent on Constantinople. It has about 25,000 inhabitants, who are very poor, for the German port of Mudjar Pacha has completely ruined its commerce. Since 1891 the Augustinians of the Assumption have a mission and school, and the Oblates of the Assumption have a school and college. The Latin Catholics number about 250 in the region of the mission, seventy of them living in the city. The Armenian Catholic parish numbers 120.

Nicopolis, a titular see, suffragan of Smbatia, in Armenia Prima. Founded by Pompey after his decisive victory over Mithridates, it was inhabited by veterans of his army and by members of the neighbouring peasantry, and was delightfully situated in a beautiful, well-watered plain lying at the base of a thickly-wooded mountain. All the Roman highways intersecting that portion of the country and leading to Comana, Poliomenon, Neussarene, Smbatia, etc., passed through from Nicopolis. The church of Strabo (XXIII, ii, 28), boasted quite a large population. Given to Polomnon by Anthony, in 36 n. c., Nicopolis was governed from A. D. 51, by Aristobulus of Chalco and definitively annexed to the Roman Empire by Nero, A. D. 61. It then became the metropolis of Lesser Armenia and the seat of the provincial diet, and although it never reached the height of the Augusti, it raised temples to Zeus Niephorus and to Victory. Christianity reached Nicopolis at an early date and, under Licinius, about 319, forty-live of the city's inhabitants were martyred; the Church venerates them on 10 July. St. Basili (P. G., XXXII, 896) calls the priests of Nicopolis the sons of confessors and martyrs, and their church is dedicated to the mother of that of Colonia. About 472, St. John the Silent, who had sold his worldly goods, erected a church there to the Blessed Virgin.

In 499 Nicopolis was destroyed by an earthquake, none save the bishop and his two secretaries escaping death (Bull. Acad. de Belgique, 1863, 557). This disaster was irreparable, and although Justinian rebuilt the walls and erected a monastery in memory of the Forty-five Martyrs (Procopius, "De Edificiis," III, 1), Nicopolis never regained its former splendour. Under Heraclitus it was captured by Chosroes I (Chosroes, "Histoire d'Héraclius", tr. Maeder, p. 62) and thenceforth was only a mediocre city, a simple see and a suffragan of Smbatia in Lesser Armenia, remaining such at least until the eleventh century, as is seen from the various "Notitiae episcopatuum." To-day the site of ancient Nicopolis is occupied by the Armenian village of Pirk, which has a population of 200 families and is the seat of the city of Enderes, in the sanjak of Kara-Hissar and the vilayet of Sivas. Notable among the eight bishops mentioned by Le Quien is St. Gregory, who, in the year 599, resigned his bishopric and retired to Pithiviers in France. The Church venerates him on 11 March.

Nicopolis, Diocease of (Nicopoli polinana), in Bulgaria. The city of Nicopolis (Thrace or Mestra), situated on the Tylus or Lugas with the Danube, was built by Trajan in commemoration of his victory over the Dacians (Annalium Marcellinum, XXXI, 5; Jomard, "De rebus geticis", ed. Sabatier, 1814). Potenlyon (I, vi, 7) places it in Thrace and Hierocles in Mestra near the Ilissus or Balkans. In the "Thes"-isis of pseudo-Epiphanes (Gelzer, "Undergucte ..., Texte der Notitiae episcopatuum," 355), Nicopolis figures as a suffragan see to autocephalous archbishopric about 610, and then disappears from the episcopal lists, owing to the fact that the country fell into the hands of the Bulgarians. Le Quien (Oriens christianus, 1, 1235) has preserved the names of two ancient bishops: Marcellus in 475, and Amantius in 518. A list of the Latin titulars (1351-1113) may be found in the Tabula... (Milan, 1871). The city is chiefly noted for the defeat of the French and Hungarian armies (25 September, 1396) which made the Turks masters of the Balkan peninsula.
The Latin mission of Bulgaria, subject during the sixteenth century to the Archbishops of Antivari, afterwards received Franciscan missionaries from Bosnia, and in 1621 formed an independent province called "custodia Bulgaria". In 1765 it was confided to the Bishops of Genoa and in 1781, to the Passionists who have no canonical residences in the country, simply parishes. One of them is usually appointed Bishop of Nicopolis. The Franciscan bishops formerly resided at Tchhiprovets, destroyed by the Turks in 1658, but after the war and the residence of 1812, the bishop established himself at Cioplea, a Catholic village which the Bulgarians had just founded near Bucharest and where his successors resided until 1813, when the Turks expelled the Franciscan bishopric from the country. The Bishop of Nicopolis, ceasing then to be an apostolic administrator of Wallachia, chose Roustchouk as his residence and still lives there. In the diocese there are 13,000 Catholics; 24 priests, 5 of whom are seculars; 17 Passionists and 2 Assumptionists; 15 churches, and 3 chapels. The Assumptionists have a school at V.; 22; 30; 35; 40. The Franciscans have a boarding-school in the same city, and the Sisters of Our Lady of Sion have a boarding-school at Roustchouk.

Nicopolis, a titular see and metropolis in ancient Epirus. Augustus founded the city (n. c. 31) on a promontory in the Gulf of Ambraiaca, in commemoration of his victory over Antony and Cleopatra at Actium. At Nicopolis the emperor instituted the famous quinquennial Actian games in honour of Apollo. The city was peopled chiefly by settlers from the neighbouring municipio, of which it was the head (Sculthorpe's "Top. Graec."). It seems to have been an island, and according to Phln the Elder (IV, 2) it was a free city. St. Paul intended going there (Tit., iii, 12) and it is possible that even then it numbered some Christians among its population; Origen sojourned there for a while (Enosins, "Hist. ecc.", VI, 16). Laid waste by the Goths at the beginning of the fifth century (Procopius, "Bell. Goth.", IV, 22; Justinian ord. the Assumption "De Edificiis", VI, 2), in the sixth century it was still the capital of Epirus (Herocrates, "Synecdemus").

The province of ancient Epirus of which Nicopolis was the metropolis, constituted a portion of the western patriarchate, directly subject to the jurisdiction of the pope; but, about 794, it was transferred to the Patriarchate of Constantinople. Of the eleven metropolitans mentioned by Le Quien (Oriens christianus, i, 133-38) the most celebrated was Alecon who, early in the sixth century, opposed the Monophysite policy of Emperor Anastasius. The last known of these bishops was Anastasius, who attended the Ecumenical Council in 787, and was dead before 800, owing to the decadence into which Nicopolis fell, the metropolis of Epirus was transferred to Naupactus which subsequently figured in the Notitiae ecumenopatium. Quite extensive ruins of Nicopolis are found three miles to the north of Presvea and are called Patia-Presva.

Nicopolis, a city of the Province of Catania, in Sicily, situated at a height of about 2000 feet above the level of the sea. In its neighbourhood are salt mines and sulphur springs. The town is believed to stand on the site of the ancient Otterha, which was destroyed by the Arabs. It has a fine cathedral, with a magnificent portal and paintings by Velasquez. Santa Maria Maggiore, also, is a beautiful church. The episcopal see was erected in 1818, its first prelate being Mgr Cajetan M. Averna. Nicosa was the birthplace of the Blessed Felix of Nicosa, a Capuchin lay brother. Within the diocese is the ancient city of Trionia, which was an episcopal see from 1057 to 1090. Nicosa is a suffragan of Messina, from the territory of which that of Nicosa was taken; it has 23 parishes, with 60,250 inhabitants, 4 religious houses of men, and 5 of women, and 3 schools for girls.

Nicotera and Tropea, Diocese of (Nicoterensis et Tropensis), suffragan of Reggio di Calabria. Nicotera, the ancient Medium, is a city of the Province of Catanzaro, in Calabria, Italy; it was destroyed by the earthquake of 1783. The first known bishop was Proculus, to whom, with others, a letter of St. Gregory the Great was written in 599. With the exception of Sergius (787), none of its bishops is known earlier than 1392. Under Bishop Charles Punti, the city was pillaged by the Turks. In 1488, it was united on equal terms with the Diocese of Tropea. The earthquake of 1783, followed by the fall of all of St. Euphemia, is the birthplace of the present Spanish, the anatomists Pietro and Paolo Voiani, and the philosopher Pasquale Galluppi. It has a beautiful cathedral, restored after its destruction by the earthquake of 1783. Here the Greek Rite was formerly used. Only three bishops before the Norman conquest are known; the first, Germain, is referred to the year 619; among its other prelates was Nicola Aecapori (1110), an eminent statesman. The diocese has 72 parishes, with 78,000 inhabitants, a Franciscan nunnery, and a house of the Sisters of Charity.

Nider, John, theologian, b. 1350 in Swabia; d. 13 August, 1438, at Colmar. He entered the Order of Preachers at Colmar and after profession was sent to Vienna for his philosophical studies, which he finished at Cologne where he was ordained. He gained a wide reputation as a preacher and was active at the Council of Constance. After making a study of the canons of his order of strict observance in Italy he returned to the University of Vienna where in 1425 he began teaching as Master of Theology. Elected prior of the Dominican convent at Nuremberg in 1427, he successively served as scrivius to his master general and vicar of his order, remaining in this capacity in 1431, he maintained his early reputation as reformer and in 1431 he was chosen prior of the convent of strict observance at Basle. He became identified with the Council of Basle as theologian and legate, making several embassies to the Hussites at the command of Cardinal Julian of Savoy, before he and his confreres were instructed to pacify them. He journeyed to Ratibson (1434) to effect a further reconciliation with the Bohemians and then proceeded to Vienna to continue his work of reforming the canons there. During the discussion that followed the dissolution of the Council of Basle by Eugene IV, he joined the party in favour of continuing the Council in Germany, abandoning them, however, when the pope remained firm in his decision. He resumed his theological lectures at Vienna in 1436 and was twice elected dean of the university before his death. As reformer he was foremost in Germany and welcomed as such both by his own order and by the Fathers of the Council of Basle. As a theologian his adherence to the principles of St. Thomas and his practical method of arriving at them made him disbelieved and condemned as the party of the Hussites. The most important among his many writings is the "Pomarium" (5 vols., Domi, 1602) a treatise on the philosophical, theological, and social questions of his day. Among his theological works are the following: "Commentaria in IV libros Sententiarum" (no longer extant); "Praeceptorium divini leges" (Doux, 1518); "Institutio doctrinarum mercuratorum" (Paris, 1541, eight editions before 1550); "Consolatorum timorem conscientiae" (Rome, 1604); "De Morali lepra" (Regia, 1830); "Manuale ad instructionem spiritualem Pastorum" (Rome, 1513); "Alphabetum Divini Amoris" (Antwerp, 1705, in works of Gerson); "De modo bene vivendi" (commonly attributed to St. Bernard); "De Reformazione Religiosorum Libri Tres" (Paris, 1514); "De legibus et conscriptis civitatum maiorum" (Antwerp, 1576). His "SCHRIFTE" of 1425; "Specimen" of 1427; "Auctoritates" of 1428; "SCHRIFTE" of 1429; "Auctoritates" of 1432; "Consolatorium timori conscientiae" of 1432; "De morali lepra" of 1431; "Regia" of 1432; "De modo bene vivendi" of 1437; "De Reformatione religiosorum" of 1437; "De legibus et conscriptis civitatum maiorum" of 1437.

NEREMBERG

Nieremberg y Otin, Juan Eteseiro, noted theologian and polygraphist, b. of German parents at Madrid, 1595; d. there, 1658. Having studied the classics at the Court, he went to Alesaí for the sciences and from there to Salamanca for canon law, where he entered the Society of Jesus in 1614, marked against a certain disapproval for the rigorously obliged him to leave the novitiate of Villagarcia. He remained firm in his resolution and was permitted to return to Madrid to finish his probation. He studied Greek and Hebrew at the Colegio de Hocete, arts and theology at Alesaí, and was ordained in 1623, making his profession in 1633. At the Clegio Imperial of Madrid he taught humanities and natural sciences, and was afterwards of the University of Huescasa, Barcelona, Seville, Majorca, and also a second edition of the Madrid edition; it has been translated into Italian, French, Latin, German, and Panayan, and condensed into English (New York, 1866, 1891); (2) "De la Diferencia entre lo Temporal y Eterno" (Madrid, 1640), of which there are fifty-four Spanish editions, and translations into Latin, Arabian, Italian, French, German, Flemish, and English (1672, 1684, 1814), Portuguese, Mexican, Guatemala, Quichiw, Panayan; (3) "Opera Parthenica" (Lyons, 1650), in which he defends the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, basing it upon New, although not always absolutely reliable, documents; (4) "Historia naturalis maxima perennis" (Liber, 1635); (5) "De la aficion y amor de Jesus ... Idem de Marin" (Madrid, 1630), of which there are five Spanish editions and translations into Latin, Arabic, German, Flemish, French, Italian, Portuguese, and an English translation of the first edition (1819, 1820); one edition of (6) "Obra Christiana et filosofica" (Madrid, 1690), and a collection of (7) "De la aficion y amor de Jesus" (Madrid, 1665, 1669); (8) 12 vols., are still extant. It was customary in many of the Spanish churches to read selections from these books every Sunday.

Niger

Nigeria, Upper and Lower, a colony of British East Africa extending from the Gulf of Guinea to Lake Chad (from 1° 30' to 7° N. lat., and from 5° 30' to 8° 30' E. long.), is bounded on the north and west by French Sudan, on the south-west by the English colony of Lagos, on the south by the Atlantic, on the north by the Territories of the Niger, and on the east by the River Niger, flowing through it. The Niger, French from its source in the Guinean Sudan to the frontier of Sierra Leone and Liberia, enters Nigeria above Bo, receives the Sokoto River at Gamba, and the Benue at Lokedia, the chief tributaries in English territory. Though the establishment of the English dates only from 1879, numerous explorers had long before reconquered the river and the neighbouring country. Among the most famous were Mungo Park (1776-1805), Chapperton (1822), René Caillé (1825), Lander, Barth, Mage, and recently the French officers Galliéni, Mizon, Hourat, and Levent. In 1879, on the initiative of Sir George Goldie, the English societies established in the region purchased almost all foreign trading stations of Lower Niger and in 1885 obtained a royal charter which constituted them the "Royal Company of the Niger". The Royal Company developed rapidly and acquired immense territories, often at the cost of bloodshed. The monopoly of navigation which it claimed to exercise, contrary to the treaty of 1814, was a source of friction to the undertakings of France and Germany, its encroachments on neighbouring territories, aroused numerous diplomatic quarrels which finally brought about the revocation of its privileges (1 Jan., 1900). It then became a simple commercial company with enormous territorial possessions; the conquered lands, reunited to the old Protectorate of the Niger Coast organized in 1881, constituted the British colony of the most eminent theologians and preachers of the latter half of the fifteenth century. He was a keen disciple of St. Thomas, zealous for the integrity of his teachings and adhering strictly to the traditions of his school. In his few theological works he limits himself almost entirely to the discussion of abstract questions of logic and psychology, the historical aspect of his time to preaching to the Jews. He had learned their language and become familiar with their literature at Salamanca and Montpellier by associating with Jewish children and attending the lectures of the rabbis. At Ratisbon, Worms, and Frankfort-on-the-Main he preached in German, Latin, and Hebrew, continually challenging the rabbi to a disputatio. He wrote two anti-Jewish works, one in 1475, "Tractatus contra Perfidios Judaeos" (Esslingen, 1475), which is probably the earliest printed anti-Jewish work, and in which he severely attacked the Jews and the Talmud. The other, written in German, is entitled "Sterne des Messias" (Esslingen, 1477). Reuchlin in his "Augenspiegel" declared them absurd. Both works are furnished with appendices giving the Hebrew alphabet in Hebrew and Latin type, rules of grammar and for reading Hebrew, the Decalogue in Hebrew, some Messianic texts from the Old Testament, etc. They are among the earliest specimens of Hebrew printing in Germany, and are the first attempt at Hebrew grammar in that country by a Christian scholar. They were afterwards published separately as "Commentatio de primis linguae Hebraice elementis" (Altdorf, 1761). Peter Tento, O.P. (Queté, I, 856), and Peter Eystettensis (Eck, "Chrysopassus Cent.," XLIX) are most probably to be identified with Peter Niger.

Nihilism. — Its term was first used by Turgenev in his novel, “Fathers and Sons” (in “Russkii Vesteik”, Feb., 1857-58). It was then applied to those social and political philosophers who deny all religious dogma and accepts no doctrine, however widespread, that is not supported by proof. The nihilist theory was formulated by Cernyevskii in his novel “Cto delat?” (What shall be done, 1862-64), which forecasts a new social order constructed on the ruins of the old. But essentially, Nihilism was a reaction against the abuses of a way into Russia to spread revolutionary ideas. Alexander Herzen, inspired by Hegel and Feuerbach, proclaimed the destruction of the existing order; but he did not advocated, violent measures. Hence his younger followers feared of him; and on the other hand his defense of the Poles during the insurrection of 1863 alienated many of his Russian sympathizers. The "Kolokol" went out of existence in 1863 and Herzen died two years later in exile. Bakunin suppressed the sentiments of relationship, friendship, love, and gratitude. Have only one pleasure, one joy, one reward—the triumph of the revolution.

Night and day, have only one thought, the destruction of everything without pity. Be ready to die and ready to kill any one who opposes the triumph of your revolt.

Bakunin thus proceeded to nihilistic terrorism.

PROPAGANDA (1867-77).—It began with the formation (1864-62) of secret societies, the members of which devoted their lives and fortunes to the dissemination of revolutionary ideas. Many of these agitators, educated at Zurich, Switzerland, returned to Russia and gave nihilism the support of trained intelligentsia. Bakunin was consecrated as master of a parochial school in St. Petersburg, who was in constant communication with nihilist centers in various cities, and Sergius Kovalin who established thirty associations in Cernigor. These societies took their names from their founders—the Malkovey, Lavrist, Bakumists, etc. They enrolled seminarists, university students and even factory workers. Among the working men the propaganda was conducted in part through free schools. The promoters engaged in humble trades as weavers, blacksmiths, and carpenters, and in their shops inculcated nihilist doctrine.

The penny was reached by writings, speeches, schools, and personal intercourse. Even the nobles shared in this work, e.g., Prince Peter Kropotkin, who, under the pseudonym of P. Bordoin, held conferences with workmen. As secondary centres, taverns and shops served as meeting-places, depositories of prohibited books, and, in case of need, as places of refuge. Though without a central organization the movement spread throughout Russia, notably in the region of the Volga and in that of the Dnieper, where it gained a foothold in the Colleges of Kazan. The central institutions in particular displayed energy and self-sacrifice in their zeal for the cause. Many were highly cultured and some belonged to the nobility or higher classes, e.g., Natalia Arnfield, Barbara Batinskova, Sofia von Herzfeld, Sofia Perovakaja. They cooperated more especially through the schools.

The propaganda of the press was at first conducted from foreign parts: London, Geneva, Zurich. In this latter city there were two printing-offices, established in 1873, where the students published the works of Lavrov and of Bakunin. The first secret printing-office in Russia, founded at St. Petersburg in 1861, published four numbers in Russian which appeared under different names. The pamphlets were distributed among the country people often with the help of the "buniniki" (government employees), or of the peasants. Very few of the peasants knew how to read. Accordingly, nihilism had few adherents among students of the universities and higher schools, and amongst the people in general. The people could not understand its ideals of destruction and of social revolution.

NIHILISM—Propaganda of ideas was soon followed by violence: 4 April, 1866, Tsar Alexander II narrowly escaped the shot fired by Demetrius Karakozov, and in consequence took severe measures (rescript of 28 May, 1866) against the revolutionists and the press objects of special vigilance. To avoid detection and spying, the nihilists formed a Central Executive Committee whose sentences of death were executed by "punchers." Sub-committees of from five to ten members were also organized and statutes (12 articles) drawn up. The applicant for admission was to renounce all, sever ties of family and friendship, and observe absolute secrecy.
ence to the head of the association was punishable with death. The Government, in turn, enacted stringent laws against secret societies and brought hundreds before the tribunals. A notable instance was the trial, at St. Petersburg in October, 1877, of 183 persons; 91 went free; 36 were sent to Siberia; the others received light sentences. One of the accused, Milyukov, in whose judgment the judge Primevski characterized the procedure as "an abominable comedy", was condemned to ten years of penal servitude.

Another sensational trial (April, 1878) was that of Vera Sassulio, who had attempted to murder General Prepov, chief of police of St. Petersburg. Her acquittal was frantically applauded and she found a refuge in France. Among the most violent of the proceedings committed by nihilists may be mentioned the arrestation of General Mezenev (1 Aug., 1878) and Prince Krapotkin (1879). These events were followed by new repressive measures on the part of the Government and by numerous executions. The nihilists, however, continued their work, held a congress at Lippeck in 1879, and (26 Aug.) condemned Alexander II to death. An attempt to wreak the group of Kripo, but the attempt was abortive. Another attack on his life was made by Haldurim, 5 Feb., 1880. He was slain on 1 March, 1881, by a bomb, thrown by Grinevckij. Six conspirators, among them Sofia Perovskaia, were tried and executed. On 14 March, the Zemlja i Volja society issued a proclamation inciting the people to rebellion, and, after its author, Count Tscherniak, wrote to Alexander III denouncing the abuse of the bureaucracy and demanding political amnesty, national representation, and civil liberty.

The reign of Alexander III was guided by the dictates of a reaction, due in great measure to the counsels of Constantine Pobedonoscev, procurator general of the Holy Synod. And nihilism, which seemed to reach its climax in 1878, was far from dead. It was a period of eclipse. Its theories were too radical to gain proselytes among the people. Its assaults were repeatedly, on 20 March, 1882, General Strshnikov was assassinated at Odessa; and Colonel Sudezhkin on the 25th of December, 1883; in 1887, an attempt against the life of the tsar was unsuccessful; in 1890, a conspiracy was traced to a group of nihilists, but these crimes were the work of the revolution in Russia, rather than of the nihilists. The crimes that reddened the soil of Russia with blood in constitutional times are due to the revolution of 1905-07. But the nihilism, that, as a doctrinal system, proclaimed the destruction of the old Russia, to establish the foundations of a new Russia, may be said to have disappeared with the death of Alexander III; and therefore, the history of the crimes that were multiplied from 1905 on are a chapter in the history of political upheavals in Russia, and not in the history of nihilism.

Nihu, Barthold, convert and controversialist, b. at Holtorf in Hanover, 7 Feb. 1803, d. at Breslau, 27 Nov. 1868, according to other sources in 1584 or 1589, at Wupper in Brunswick); d. at Erfurt, 10 March, 1857. He came from a poor Protestant family, obtained his early education at Verden and Goslar, and from 1697 studied philosophy and medicine at the University of Helmstedt, where, on account of his poverty, he was the familiar of his professor Freytag, and developed a love of philosophy. Having become master of philosophical disputations, he was invited by the professors of Helmstedt to study Protestant theology. Contentions among the professors at Helmstedt made further stay there unpleasant, and when two students of noble family went in 1616 to the University of Jena, he accompanied them as preceptor. Later he became instructor of the young princes of Saxe-Weimar, and in 1647 took the foundation of the Free Church of Breslau. The inability of the Protestant theologians to agree upon vital questions caused him first to doubt and then to renounce Protestantism. He went to Cologne in 1622, and entered the House of Proselytes founded by the Brotherhood of the Holy Cross; in the same year he accepted the Catholic faith; but, finding the new Church too slow in development, he went to Dresden. He was chosen director of the House of Proselytes, and in 1627 provost of the monastery of the Cistercians at Altdahnseleben near Magdeburg, two years later he became abbot of the monastery of the Premonstratensians, from which he was expelled after the battle of Breitenfeld in 1631. He fled to Holland where he became preacher of the emperor and finally went to France, where his services were highly appreciated. In 1645 Nihu was called to Münster by the papal nuncio, Fabio Chigi (later Alexander VII), then in Münster attending the Westphalian Peace Congress. A few years later he was induced to come to Mayence by Johann Philip von Schönborn, Archbishop of Mayence, at whose request he went to the study of the Jesuits and to the service of the Holy Office as visiter of the Church, and in 1650 was made a professor in the Palatinate. He died in Breslau in 1661, and was buried there. The most important work of his is his "De revolutione in Russi"

Nikolaus von Dinkelsbühl, theologian, b. c. 1360, at Dinkelsbühl; d. 17 March, 1433, at Marizell in Styria. He studied at the University of Vienna, where he is mentioned as baccalaurcus in the faculty of Arts in 1385. Magister in 1390, he lectured on philosophy, mathematics, and physics until 1397, and from 1402 to 1403. From 1397 he was dean of the faculty of philosophic theologies, and in 1402 on theological subjects, first as cursor biliscus, and later on the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard. In 1405 he became bachelor of Divinity, in 1408 licentiate, and in 1409 doctor and member of the theological faculty. Rector of the university, 1405-6, he declined the honour of a re-election in 1410. From 1403 he was also canon, and a cathedral of St. Stephen. The suppression of several early authors that he was a member of the Order of the Hermits of St. Augustine is incorrect, for he could not have been rector of the university had he been a member of any order. Eminent as teacher and pulpit orator, Nikolaus possessed great business acumen, and was frequently chosen as ambassador both by the republic and by the Empire. In 1412 he represented Duke Albert V of Austria at the Council of Constance (1414-18), and the University of Vienna in the trial of Thiem, dean of the Passau cathedral. When Emperor Sigismund came to Constance, Nikolaus delivered an address on the abolition of the schism ("Sermo de unione Ecclesie in Concilio Constan- tiensi pro vita orthodoxiae") and was one of the fourteen who were present in the election of Martin V, and delivered an address to the new pope (Sommerfeldt, "Historisches Jahr- buch," XXVI, 1905, 323-7). Together with John, Patriarch of Constantinople, he was charged with the examination of witnesses in the proceedings against Hieronymus of Prague. Returning to Vienna in 1418, he again took up his duties as teacher at the university, and in 1423 directed the theological promotions as representative of the chancellor. Duke Albert V having chosen him as his confessor in 1425, wished to make him Bishop of Passau, but Nikolaus declined the appointment. During the preparations for the Council of Basle, he was one of the committee to draw up the reform propositions which were to be sent to the Council. His name does not appear thereafter in the records of the university.

His published works include "Postilla cum sermoni- bus evangeliorum dominicallium" (Strasburg, 1496), and a collection of "Sermones" with tracts (Stras- burg, 1516). Among his numerous unpublished works, the manuscripts are chiefly kept in the University library at Vienna and in the Court and State library at Munich, are to be mentioned his commentaries on the Psalms, Isaias, the Gospel of St. Matthew, some of the Epistles of St. Paul, the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard, and "Questiones Sen- tentiarum"; a commentary on the "Physica" of Aristotle, numerous sermons, lectures, moral and ascetical addresses.

FRIEDRICH LAURICHT.

Nikon, Patriarch of Moscow (1652-1658; d. 1651). He was of peasant origin, born in the district of Nil- ni-Novgorod in 1605, and in early life was known as Nikita. Educated in a monastery, he married, be- came a secular priest, and for a time had a parish in Moscow. After ten years of married life, his children having died, he persuaded his wife to become a nun and he entered the Solovetsky monastery on the White Sea, according to Orthodox custom, changing his name to Nikon. In accordance also with a common custom he next became a hermit on an island near by, dependent on the monastery. But a disagree- ment about the alleged misuse of some alms caused him to break with the Solovetsky monks and join the Kojotzetsky community in the same island, beloved of which he was later to become in 1643. Later he made a great impression on the emperor, Alexis, who made him Archimandrite of the Novospa- ski Laura at Moscow in 1616, and in 1619 Metropol- itan of Novgorod. Here he founded almshouses, distinguished himself by his many good works, and succeeded in putting an end to the old reform of 1610. Meanwhile he was in constant correspondence with the Tsar, at whose court he spent part of each year. Already during this time he began to prepare for a revision of the Slavonic Bible and Serv- ice books. In 1632 the Patriarch of Moscow died and Nikon was appointed his successor.

As head of the Church of Russia, Nikon set about many important reforms. One of the first questions that engaged his attention was the reunion of the Ruthenians (Little Russians) with the Orthodox Church. When Poland held Little Russia, the Synod of Brest (1596) had brought about union between its inhabitants and Rome. Under Alexis, however, the tsar summoned Alexis to Rome, and sent Nikon and united with Russia (1633). A result of this was that the Russians were able without much difficulty to undo the work of the Synod of Brest, and to bring the Metropolitan of Kiev with the majority of his clergy back to the Orthodox Church. This greatly increased the extent of the Russian patriarch's juris- diction.

The chief event of Nikon's reign was the reform of the service books. The Bible and books used in church in Russia are translated from Greek into old Slavonic. But gradually many mistranslations and corruptions of the text had crept in. There were also details of ritual in which the Russian Church had for- saken the custom of Constantinople. Nikon's work was to restore all this to its original, in exact conformity with the Greek original. This reform had been discussed before his time. In the sixteenth century the Greeks had reproached the Russians for their alterations, but a Russian synod in 1651 had sanctioned them. In Nikon's time there was more interference with Greeks than ever before, and in this way he con- received the necessity of restoring purer forms. While Metropolitan of Novgorod he caused a committee of scholars to discuss the question, in spite of the patri- arch Joseph. In 1650 a Russian theologian was sent to Constantinople to inquire about various doubtful points. One detail that made much trouble was that the Russians had lessened the number of fingers to three, as the Greeks did. As soon as he became patriarch, Nikon published an order introducing some of these reforms, which im- mediately called forth angry opposition. In 1654 and 1655 he summoned Synods which continued the work. Makarios, Patriarch of Antioch, was invited to Russia at that time also, and his book and there was continual correspondence with the Patriarch of Con- stantinople. At last, with the approval of the Greek patriarchs, Nikon published the reform service books and made laws insisting on conformity with Greek custom in all points of ritual (1655-1658). A new Synod in 1656 confirmed this, except that every one who made the sign of the cross except with three fingers, and forbade the rebaptizing of Latin-con-vorts (still a peculiarity of the Russian Church). This aroused a strong party of opposition. The patriarch was accused of anti-national sentiments, of being Hellenized the Russian Church, of corrupting the old faith. Nikon's strong will would have crushed the opposition, had he not, in some way not yet clearly explained, fallen foul of the tsar. It is generally said that part of his ideas of reform was to secure that the Church should be independent of the state and that this aroused the tsar's anger. In any case in the year 1658 Nikon suddenly fell. He offered his resignation to the tsar and it was accepted. He had often threatened to resign before; it seems that this time, too, he did not mean his offer to be taken seriously. However, he had to retire and went to his New Jerusalem monastery.

A personal interview with Alexis was refused. The tsar did not remit him to Nikon, in spite of his resignation, attempted to regain his former place. Meanwhile the opposition to him became stronger. It was led by a Greek, Paisios Lagariades, Metropolitan of Gaza (unlawfully absent from his see), who insisted on the appointment of a successor to Nikon. All Nikon's friends seem to have foreseen this. In his last will he made an appeal to be made to the Greek patriarchs and their verdict was against Nikon. In 1664 he tried to force the situation by appearing suddenly in the patriarchal church at Moscow and occupying his place as if nothing had happened. But he did not succeed, and in his great synod was summoned to try him. The patriarchs of the Eastern church came to Russia expressly for this synod; a great number of Russian and Greek metropolitans sat as judges. The tsar himself appeared as accuser of his former friend. Nikon was summoned and appeared before the synod in his patriarch's robes. He was accused of neglecting his duties since 1658, of having betrayed his Church and in his last will and testament had given up even to the Patriarch of Constantinople (in which he had been enthroned as a Russian clergy), of harsh and unjust conduct in his treatment of the bishops. Nikon defended himself ably; the synod lasted a week; but at last in its eighth session it declared him deposed from the patriarchate, suspended from all offices but those of a simple monk, and adjourned him to confinement in a monastery (Therapontof) on the White Sea. At the request of the Trinity Laura at Moscow, Josaph was elected his successor (Josaph I, 1667–72). Josaph confirmed Nikon's reform of the Service books and rites. The party that opposed it formed the beginning of the Russian dissenting sects (the Raskolniks).

For a time Nikon's imprisonment was very severe. His pension to an abbey in the monastery of St. Cyril and his treatment was lightened. Alexi seized the day of his repentance of his harsh treatment of the former patriarch, and from his death-bed (1676) sent to ask his forgiveness. The next tsar, Fedor II (1676–82), allowed him to come to the New Jerusalem monastery. On the way thither Nikon died (1681). He had been deprived of the honours of a patriarch, and all decrees against him were revoked after his death. His tomb is in the Cathedral church of Moscow. Nikon's fall, the animosity of the tsar, and of the synod that deposed him remain mysterious. The cause was not the reform of the Service books, for that was maintained by his successor. It has been explained as a successful intrigue of his personal enemies. There can be no doubt that he certainly had made enemies during his reign by his severity, his harsh manner, the uncompromising way he carried out his reforms regardless of the intensely conservative instinct of his people. Or, it has been said, Nikon brought about his disgrace by a premature and unwise union of the Russian Church from the shackles of the state. His attitude represented an attempt to growing Erastianism that culminated soon after his time in the laws of Peter the Great (1689–1725).

This is no doubt true. There are sufficient indications that Alexis' quarrel with Nikon was based on jealousy. He wanted to bring about union with Rome, and Nikon, with this independence was concerned, naturally, with ecclesiastical matters. Some writers have thought that the root of the whole matter was that he became at the end of his reign a Latimer, that he wanted to bring about union with Rome and saw in that union the only safe protection for the Church against the secular government. Such a move, however, has ever been said to have been made by a tsar. Nikon, however, was a great martyr for the union. In any case the real reason of Nikon's fall remains one of the difficulties of Russian Church history. He was undoubtedly the greatest bishop Russia has yet produced. A few ascetical works of no special importance were written by him.

Nilles, Nikolaus, b. 21 June, 1828, of a wealthy peasant family of Rippweiler, Luxernburg; d. 31 January, 1907. After completing his gymnasium studies brilliantly, he went to Rome where from 1847 to 1853, he studied at the Collegio Romano. In 1853, he laid the foundation of his ascetic life and, as a pupil of the Gregorian University, under the guidance of distinguished scholars (Ballerini, Franzhen, Passaglia, Perrone, Patrizi, Schroeder, Tarquini), prepared the way for his subsequent scholarly career. When he left Rome in 1853, he took with him, in addition to the archives of the, Congregatio de cultis et formulis liturgicus, the Ordinaries' Book of Matrimonial Causes, the Annals of the Congregation, and the Congregation's Register of Matrimonial Causes. In 1853, he entered the Austrian Province of the Society of Jesus and, in the autumn of 1859, was summoned by his superiors to Innsbruck to fill the chair of canon law in the theological faculty, which Emperor Francis Joseph I had shorty before entrusted to the Austrian Jesuits. Nilles lectured throughout his life—after 1898 usually in the North American theologians, to whom he gave special instructions concerning their monographs on canon law, for which task no one was better qualified than he. His "Commentaria in Concilium Baltimore ter tum" (1881–90) and his short essay, "Tolerari potest", gained him a wide reputation.

His literary achievements in the fields of canon law, ascetics, and liturgy were abundant and fruitful. Most of his works at the command of his liturgical bibliography fifty-seven works, of which the two principal are: "De rationibus festorum sacratissimi Cordis Jesu et purissimi Cordis Marie libri quatuor" (2 vols., 5th ed., Innsbruck, 1885) and "Kalendaria manuale utinamque Ecclesiae orientalis et occidentalis" (2 vols., 2nd ed., Innsbruck, 1890). Through the latter he was an important authority among Latin scholars. In particular Protestants and Orthodox Russians expressed themselves in terms of the highest praise for the Kalendarium or Heortologie. Professor Harnack of Berlin wrote of it in the "Theologische Literaturzeitung" (XXI, 1896, 350-2): "I have... frequently made use of the work..." The information was derived from original sources. There is scarcely another scholar as well versed as the author in the feasts of Catholicism. His knowledge is based not only on his own observations, but on books, periodicals, papers, and calendars of the past and present. The Feasts of Catholicism is the title of this work. It is a fact that the basic of these ordinances is uniform, the details are of infinite variety, since the work treats not only of the Latin but also of the Eastern Rites. The latter, it is well known, are divided into Greek, Syrian, Coptic, Armenian..." Of the second volume Harnack wrote (ibid., XXXIII, 1898, 112 sq.): "Facts which elsewhere would have... been sought..." The Roumanian Academy at Bucharest awarded a prize to this work. Soon after the appearance of the second edition of the "Kalendarium", the Russian Holy Synod issued from the synodal printing office at Moscow a "Festbidelektas" intended to a certain extent as the official Orthodoxy calendar and relations to the work. Nilles was not only a distinguished university professor, but also a meritorious director of ecclesiastical students. For fifteen years (1869-75) he presided over the theological seminary of Innsbruck, an international institution where young men from all parts of Europe and the United States are trained for the priests of the Roman Church. NILUS, a titular see and a suffragan of Oxyrhynchos, in Egypt. According to Ptolemy (IV, v, 26) the city was situated on an island of the Nile in the Heraclean nome. Ensebius ("Hist. eccl.", VI, xii) states that it had a bishop, Cherenemon, during the persecution of Decius; others are mentioned a little later. The "Chronicle of John of Nikiou" (359) makes the connection with the occupation of Egypt by the Mussalmans, and it is also referred to by Arabian medieval geographers under its original name of Delas. In the fourteenth century it paid 20,000 dinars in taxes, which indicates a place of some importance. At present, Delas forms a part of the nomadisch of Beni-Suef in the district of El-Zaouiet, and has about 2500 inhabitants of whom nearly 1000 are nomadic Bedouins. It is situated on the left bank of the Nile about forty-seven miles from Memphis. Le Quien, Oriens christianus, II (Paris, 1741), 577: Amelincq, La geographie de l'Egypte à l'époque copte (Paris, 1865), 136 sqq. S. Valéhe.

NILUS, Saint (Νιλος), the elder, of Sinai (d. c. 430), was one of the many disciples and fervent defenders of St. John Chrysostom. He is known first as a layman with two sons. At this time he was an officer at the Court of Constantineople, and is said to have been one of the Pretorian Prefects, who, according to Diocletian and Constantine's arrangement, were the chief functionaries and heads of all other governors for the four main divisions of the empire. Their authority, however, had already begun to decline by the end of the fourth century.

While St. John Chrysostom was patriarch, before his first exile (398–403), he directed Niles in the study of Scripture and in works of piety (Nikephoros Kallistos, "Hist. Ecol., XIV, 53, 54). About the year 398 (Tillemont, Mém. des I. et VII., 159 sqq.), or perhaps 404 (Leo Alatius, "De Nilus", 11–14), Nilus left his wife and one son and took the other, Theodulos, with him to Mount Sinai to be a monk. They lived here till about the year 410 (Tillemont, ib., p. 105) when the Saracens, invading the monastery, took Theodulos prisoner. The Saracens intended to sacrifice him to their gods, but eventually sold him as a slave, so that he came into the possession of the Bishop of Eleusa in Palestine. The Bishop received Theodulos among his clergy and made him door-keeper of the church. Meanwhile Nilus, having left his monastery to find his son, at last met him at Eleusa. The bishop then ordained them both priests and allowed them to return to Sinai. The mother and the other son had also embraced the religious life in Egypt. St. Nilus was certainly alive till the year 430. It is uncertain how soon after that he died. Some writers believe he had lived till 451 (Leo Alatius, op. cit., 8–14). The Byzantine Monolog for his feast (12 November) supposes this. On the other hand, none of his works made the time of 431, and he seems to know only the beginning of the Nestorian troubles; so we have no evidence of his life later than about 430.

From his monastery at Sinai Nilus was a well-known person throughout the Eastern Church; by his writings and correspondence he played an important part in the history of the Church, theologian, Biblical scholar and ascetic writer, so people of all kinds, from the emperor down, wrote to consult him. His numerous works, including a multitude of letters, consist of denunciations of heresy, paganism, abuses of discipline and crimes, of rules and principles of asceticism, especially maxims about the religious life. He was a writer of the highest places, abbots and bishops, governors and princes, even the emperor himself, without fear. He kept up a correspondence with Gaius, a leader of the Goths, endeavouring to convert him from Arianism (Book I of his letters, nos. 70, 79, 114, 115, 116, 205, 206, 206), he denounced vigorously the persecution of St. John Chrysostom both to the Emperor Theodosius (ib., II, 205; III, 279) and to his courtiers (I, 309; II, 199).

Nilus must be counted as one of the leading ascetic writers of the fifth century. His feast is kept on 12 November in the Byzantine Calendar; he is commemorated also in the Roman martyrology on the same date. The Armenians remember him on 18 November, the Greeks on the third Sunday of their Advent (Nilos, "Kalendarium Mammal", Innsbruck, 1897, II, 624).

The writings of St. Nilus of Sinai were first edited by Possinus (Paris, 1639); in 1673 Suarez published a supplement at Rome; his letters were collected by Possinus (Paris, 1687), a large part of which is the translation of St. Nilus (Rome, 1668). All these editions are used in P. G., LXXIX. The works are divided by Fessler-Jungmann into four classes:—(1) Works about virtues and vices in general:—"Peristernon" (P. G., LXXIX, 811–968), a treatise in three parts addressed to a monk Agathodemos; "On Prayer" (περὶ προσευχῆς, ib., 1165–1200); "Of the eight spirits of wickedness" (περὶ τῶν θ' πνεύματος τῆς πονηραίας, ib., 1145–64); "Of the vice opposed to virtues" (περὶ τῆς ἁμαρτίας τῶν ἄγαθων καὶ τῆς πονηραίας, ib., 1110–41); "Of various bad thoughts" (περὶ διαφόρων πνευμάτων λογισμοῦ, ib., 1200–1234); "On the word of the Gospel of Luke," xxii, 36 (ib., 1263–1290); (2) Works about the nativity of Christ—Concerning the nativity of Christ, in seven parts, telling the story of the author's life at Sinai, the invasion of the Saracens, captivity of his son, etc. (ib., 590–694); Concerning Abianos,

(3) "Achmousine" (Eisenacher or Chapters (εἰς Αἰανᾶ), about 200 precepts drawn up in short maxims (ib., 1239-62). These are probably made by his disciples from his discourses. (4) "Letters": Possinus published 355, Allatius 1061 letters, divided into four books (P. G., LXIX, 81-585). Many are not complete, several overlap, or are not really letters but excerpts from Nilus' other works. Fesseler-Junemann divides them into classes, as dogmatic, exegetical, moral, and ascetic. Certain works wrongly attributed to Nilus are named in Fesseler-Junemann, pp. 125-6.

ADRIAN FORTESCUE

Ninus the Younger, of Rossano, in Calabria; b. in 910; d. 27 December, 1005. For a time he was a novice (or was married unlawfully); he had a daughter. Six months after the Inquisition, born from that time he became a monk and a propagator of the rule of St. Basil in Italy. He was known for his ascetic life, his virtues, and theological learning. For a time he lived as a hermit. Later he spent several periods of his life at various monasteries where he either founded or restored. He was for some time at Monte Cassino, and again at the Alexius monastery at Rome. When Gregory V (966-999) was driven out of Rome, Nilus opposed the usurpation of Philogatos (John) of Piacenza as anti-pope. Later when Philogatos was tortured and mutilated he reproached Gregory and the Emperor Otto III (993-1002) for this crime. Nilus' chief work was the foundation of the famous Greek monastery of Grottaferrata, near Frascati, of which he is counted the first abbot. He spent the end of his life partly there and partly in a hermitage at Vallecce near Gaeta. His feast is kept on 26 September, both in the Byzantine Calendar and the Roman martyrology.

Nimbus (L., related to Nebula, ἱφήλα, properly vapour, cloud), in art and archeology signifies a shining light implying great dignity. Closely related are the terms aureole and aureola.

In Nature.—All such symbols originate in natural phenomena, scientifically accounted for in textbooks on physics (Müller-Peter, "Lehrbuch der kosmischen Physik"); (Pernter, "Meteorologische Optik"). There are circular phenomena of light in drops or bubbles of water and in ice crystals which by the refraction of light around them or by reflected rays produce the same effects. Of the accompanying phenomena the horizontal and vertical diameters, the "column of light", may be mentioned. The curious rings of light or color similar to the above, which often form themselves before the iris of the eye even in candle light, are more gorgeous on the mountain mist (Platus, Rigi, and Eiger Mountains), and the holder both of rare and valuable objects and of much honour, but no longer as divine beings. In early Christian art, the rayered nimbus, as well as the rayless disc were adopted in accordance with tradition. The sun and the Phoenix received, as in pagan art, a wreath or a rayered crown, also the simple halo. The latter was reserved not only for emperors but for men of genius and personification, as the planet Venus veiled by a disc of light. The phenomena of discs and broad rings are more usual in the sun and moon. The Babylonians studied them diligently (Kugler, "Sternkunde und Sterndienst in Babylon"). The terminology of these phenomena is vague. The disc or circle around the sun can be correctly called "nimbus", and the same is thought of the moon "halo". A more usual name is " aureole", which in a restricted sense means an oval or elliptical ray of light like a medallion. If the brightness is merely a luminous glow without definitely forming ring, circle, or ellipse, it is usually spoken of as a "glory". The types in nature in which rays or beams of light may be distinguished, and which are usually attended, suggested the symbolical use of the nimbus to denote high dignity or power. It is thus that Divine characteristics and the loftiest types of humanity were denoted by the nimbus.

In Poetry, this symbol of light is chiefly used in the form of rays and flames or a diffused glow. Holy Writ presents the best example: God is Light. The Son of light, the rayered disc (Ex. xxiv, 16, sq.) which was introduced with a nimbus; or the nimbus of God (Ex. xxxiv, 29, sq.). Such descriptions may have influenced Christian artists to distinguish God and the saints by means of a halo, especially around the head. They were also familiar with the descriptions of the classical poets whose gods appeared veiled by a cloud; e. g. according to Virgil, divinity appears "nimbo circumdata" or "optima aureola" (bathed in light and shining through a cloud).

In Art.—In the plastic arts (painting and sculpture) the symbolism of the nimbus was early in use among the pagans who determined its form. In the monuments of Hellenic and Roman art, the heads of the gods, heroes, and other distinguished persons are often found with a disc-shaped halo, a circle of light, and the rays spread from the head. Romain Rieffel, in "La forme et le sens (iii, 3). An emerald light surrounds God and His throne (Apoc., iv, 3), and the Son of Man seems to the prophet a flame of fire (Apoc., i, 14 sq.). So also He appeared in His Transfiguration on Tabor. On Sinai, God appeared in a cloud which at once concealed and revealed Himself (Ex., xxiv, 16, sq.) and even the countenance of Moses. The halo was often used as a symbol of the glory of God (Ex., xxxiv, 29 sq.). for wreath and crown or shield shaped discs as marks of honour to holy personages. Durandus writes: "Sic omnes sancti pinguntur coronati, quasi dicerent. Filiae Jerusalem, venientes videte martyres eunor ono coronatus dominus Dominus. Et in Libro Sapientiae: Justi accipient regnum decors et diadema special de manu Domini. Corona autem huiusmodi dispensatur, quia est ornatus super divina frunatur, unde cantant gratulabundi; Domine ut seuto bone voluntatis tuae coronati nos" (Thus all the saints are depicted, crowned, as if they would say: O Daughters of Jerusalem, come and see the martyrs with the crowns with which the Lord has crowned them. And in the Book of Wisdom: The Just shall receive a kingdom, glory, and crown of beauty at the hands of the Lord. And a crown of this kind is shown in the form of a round shield, because they enjoy the divine protection of the Holy God, whence they sing rejoicingly: O Lord, Thou hast crowned us as with a shield of Thy good-will.) (Rationale divin. ol. I, 6, 19 sq.). Furthermore the Middle Ages are almost exclusively accredited with the extension of symbolism, inasmuch as they traced, sometimes felicitously, allusions to Christian truths in existing symbols, of which they sought no other origin. Durandus adds to the passage quoted above, the nimbus containing a cross, usual in the figures of Christ, signifying redemption through the Cross, and the nimbus was used with a certain majesty and divinity in living persons, to typify the four cardinal virtues. Judging by the principal monuments, however, the square nimbus appears to be only a variant of the round halo used to preserve a distinction and thus guard against placing living persons on a par with the saints. The idea of the cardinal virtues, the first and second in the scale of perfection, i.e., the square, and only the square nimbus as contrasted with a round one was merely a later development. In the cross nimbus the association of the nimbus with an annexed cross must be conceded historical; but that this cross is a "signum Christi crucifixi" Durandus probably interprets correctly.

Orozio.—As stated above the nimbus was in use long before the Christian era. According to the exhaustive researches of Stephani it was an invention of the Hellenic epoch. In early Christian art the nimbus certainly is not found on images of God and celestial beings, but only on figures borrowed from profane art, and in Biblical scenes; in place of the simple nimbus (a circular halo) was substituted a square nimbus to portray heavenly glory. Hence it follows that Holy Writ furnished no example for the bestowal of a halo upon individual saintly personages. As a matter of fact the nimbus, as an inheritance from ancient art tradition, was readily adopted and ultimately found the widest application because the symbol of light for all divine, sanctity ideals is offered by nature and not infrequently used in Scripture. In contemporary pagan art, the nimbus as a symbol of Divinity had become so indefinately, that it must have been accepted as something quite new. The nimbus of early Christian art manifests only in a few particular drawings, its relationship with that of late antiquity. In the first half of the fourth century, Christ received a nimbus only when portrayed seated upon a throne, or in an exalted and princely character; but it had already been used since Constantine, in pictures of the emperors, and was emblematic, not so much of divine as of human dignity and greatness. In other scenes, however, Christ at that time was represented with a nimbus of the "disciplina" of Christ. Indicated by the nimbus, refers to His dignity as a teacher and king rather than to His Godhead. Before the long the nimbus became a fixed symbol of Christ and later (in the fourth century), of an angel or a lamb when used as the type of Christ. The number of personages who were given a halo increased rapidly, until towards the end of the sixth century the use of symbols in the Christian Church became as general as it had formerly been in pagan art.

Miniature painting in its cycle represents all the most important personages with haloes, just as did the Virgil codex, so that the continuity of the secular and Christian styles is obvious. This connexion is definitively revealed, when we see that in works of divinity the nimbus was used arbitrarily in personification, Gospel types, and the like. Official representations clearly show a fixed system, but outside of these there was great variety. Works of art may be distinctly differentiated according to their birthplace. The nimbus in the Orient seems to have been in general use at an early period, but whether it was first adopted from ecclesiastical art is uncertain. In general the customs of the East and West are parallel; for instance, in the West the personifications appear with a nimbus as early as the third century and Christ enthroned no later than in the East (in the time of Constantine). Their nature makes it apparent that in every department of plastic art the nimbus is more rarely used than in painting.

FORM AND COLOUR.—The form of the symbol was first definitely determined by Gregory the Great, who (about 600) permitted himself to be painted with a square nimbus, Joannes Diaconus in his life of the pope, gives the reason: "Eux verticem tabulake similis,... nimbus" (bearing around his head likeness of a square, which is the sign for a living person, and not a crown) (Migne, "P. L.", 75, 231). It appears to have already been customary to use the round nimbus for saints. In any event the few extant examples from the following centuries show that, almost without exception, only the living, principally ecclesiastics, but also the laity and even women and children, were represented with a square nimbus. The aureole, that is the halo which surrounds an entire figure, naturally takes the shape of an oval, though if it is used for a bust, it readily resumes the circular form. The radiation of light from a central point is shown by the aureole of the sun-god in ancient art as one of the prototypes of the aureole. The median form was for a long time in use among the ancient Romans for the Imagines clipeatus. The gradation of colour in the aureole reveal the influence of Apoc. 14, 5, where a rainbow was round about the throne of God. Indeed, in very early times the aureole was only used for representations of God as the Dove or Hand, or of Christ where the divinity was to be emphatically expressed. In early Christian times (as now) the round nimbus was by far the most usual designation of Christ and the saints. The broad circle is often replaced by the ring of light or a coloured disc, especially on fabrics and miniatures. In pictures without colour the nimbus is shown by an engraved line or a raised circle, often by a disc in relief. In the aureole blue indicates celestial glory, and it is used in the nimbus to fill in the surface, as were yellow, gray, and other colours while the margins are sharply denoted. In many haloes the inner part is white. In mosaics, since the fifth and sixth centuries, blue has been replaced by gold. From this period also, the frescoes show a corresponding yellow, as seen for instance, in the paintings in the catacombs. Gold or yellow prevails in miniatures, but there is a great deal of variety in illustrated books. Blue as a symbol of heaven has the preference, but gold, which later became the rule, gives a more obvious impression of light. The explanation of the cross nimbus variety is obvious. Since the sixth century it has characterized Christ and the Lamb of God, but occasionally it is given to the other Persons of the Trinity. In connection with it, in the fourth and fifth centuries, there was a monogram nimbus. The cross and the monogram of Christ were beside or above the head of Christ and the Lamb. In the fifth century they were brought to the upper face of the nimbus and finally both were concentrically combined with it. In more recent times the monogram and the monogram nimbus have become more rare. The letters A and M for Christ and M and A for Mary, were intended for monograms and frequently accompanied the nimbus.

NIMBUS.—In order to understand the nimbus and its history, it is necessary to trace it through the different branches of art. The frescoes in the catacombs have a peculiar significance inasmuch as they determine the period when the nimbus was admitted into Christian art. The numerous figures lacking this symbol (Christ, Mary, and the Apostles) show that before Constantine representations of the absolutely Christian character were not influenced by art traditions. Only pictures of the sun, the seasons, and a few ornamental heads carried a nimbus at that date. The single exception is found in a figure over the well-known “Ship in a Storm” of one of the Sacrament chapels. But it is to be observed that in this case we are dealing with a nimbus, and a rich colour scheme was demurely with a personification of heavenly aid, which marked a transition from personifications to direct representations of holy persons. The figure seems to be copied from pictures of the sun god. On the other hand, several pictures of Christ in the catacombs, dating from the fourth century, indicate that in this case the nimbus was a development from a purely personification. Images of Christ with a halo are familiar to us. Besides the Roman catacombs, others, especially that of El Bjahna in the great oasis of the Libyan desert, must be taken into account. For the period succeeding Constantine, mosaics furnish important evidence since they present not only very numerous and usually definite examples of the nimbus, but have a more offhand character and give insight into the development of the nimbus. Through allowance must be made for later restorations, a constant development is apparent in this field. The treatment of the nimbus, in the illuminating and illustrating of books, was influenced by the caprices of the individual artist and the tradition of different schools. In textiles and embroidery, the most extensive use was made of the nimbus, and a rich colour scheme was developed, to which these technical arts are by nature adapted. Unfortunately the examples which have been preserved are only imperfectly known and the dates are often difficult to determine.

Sculpture presents little opportunity for the use of the nimbus. In some few instances, indeed, the nimbus is omitted altogether or otherwise altered, as though often we find it engraved or raised in relief. Figures with this emblem are rare. On the sarcophagi we find that Christ and the Lamb (apart from the sun) alone appear with a circle or disc, the Apostles and Mary, never. In ivory neither Mary nor Christ is so distinguished.

In the course of centuries the Christian idea that God, according to Holy Scripture the Source of Light and Divine things, must always be given a halo, became more pronounced. This applied to the three Divine Persons and their emblems, as the Cross, Lamb, Dove, Eye, and Hand; and since, according to Scripture, saints are children of Light (Luke, xvi, 8; John, xvi, 36) and such, they should share the honour. Protection was shown for the garland or crown (corona et gloria corona) of Christ which was also bestowed by God as a reward upon the saints, either spiritually in this life or in the Kingdom of Heaven (Ps. xx, 4; Heb., ii, 7 sq.). Garlands and crowns of glory are frequently mentioned in Holy Writ (I Peter, v, 4; Apocalypse, iv, 4, etc.). The nimbus also takes the form of a shield to emphasize the idea of Divine protection (Ps. v, 13). A truly classic authority for the explanation of the nimbus may be found in Wicks, v, 17: “The Just shall receive a kingdom of glory, and a crown of life at the hands of the Lord; for with His right hand He will crown them with glory and with His holy name He will defend them.” (In Greek, “Holds the shield over them.”) Whereas in pagan art, the rayless nimbus signified neither holiness nor Divine protection, but merely majesty and power, in Christian art it was more and more definitely made the emblem of such grace and grace, which, emanating from God, extends over the sun’s rays and is prohibited giving the nimbus to persons who were not beatified. Since the eighteenth century the word “halo” has been incorporated into the German language.

In Western countries John the Baptist is the only saint of the Old Testament who is given a halo, doubtless because before his time the grace of Christ had not yet been obtained. In the East this was another story.

We have already found that the aureole may be considered exclusively a device of Christian art, especially as it was reserved at first for the Divinity, and later extended only to the Blessed Virgin. Instead of simple beams it often consists of pointed flames or is shaded off into the colours of the rainbow. This form is parallel to that of the nimbus, and the golden circle circumference, may be transposed into a garland of rays or a glory. A glory imitating the sun’s rays was very popular for the monstrances; in other respects the lunula suggests the nimbus only because the costliness of the material enhances the lustre. The aureole obtained the Italian name of mandorla from its shape, sometimes it was supposed to be the symbol for the Christ, or a fish blubber if it had the shape of a figure 8. God the Father is typified in later pictures by an equilateral triangle, or two interlaced triangles, also by a hexagon to suggest the Trinity. If there is no circle around the cross nimbus, the three visible arms of the cross give the same effect. Occasionally the mandorla is found composed of seven doves (type of the Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghost), or of angels. The latter are used in large pictures of the Last Judgment or heaven, for instance in the “glories” of Italian domes. In painting, haloes of cloud are sometimes used for delicate angel heads, as in Raphael’s works. Angels also form a nimbus around the head of the Mother of God. Such is also given the heads of the Apostles, xiv, 1. Sometimes the nimbus has five or seven stars because of the great light which hovered over his body when he was drowned in the Moldau by order of King Wenceslaus. Artists have developed many varieties of the nimbus and aureole. Since the Renaissance it has been fashioned more and more lighted and delicately and sometimes entirely embossed, or in the form of rays. In these cases the characteristic of the personage by the painting. It is true that the nimbus is not intrinsically a part of the figure and at times even appears heavy and intrusive. A distinguishing symbol may not, however, be readily dispensed with and with the omission of this one the images of the saints have often degenerated into mere grace pictures and worldly types. A delicate circle of light shining or floating over the head does not lessen the artistic impression, and even if the character of Christ or the Madonna is sufficiently indicated in the drawing, yet it must be conceded that the nimbus, like a crow, not only characterizes and differentiates a figure but distinguishes and exalts it as well.

NIMES

Nimes, Diocese of (Nemaussensis), suffragan of Avignon, comprises the civil Department of Gard. By the Act of 1801, its territory was united with the Diocese of Avignon. It was re-established as a separate diocese in 1821, and a Brief of 27 April, 1877, grants to its bishops the right to add Alais and Uzès to their episcopal style, these two dioceses being now combined with that of Nimes.

That Nimes (Nemaussa) was an important city in Roman antiquity is shown by the admirable Maison Carrée, the remains of a superb amphitheatre, and the Pont du Gard, four and a half leagues from the city. Late and rather contradictory traditions attribute the foundation of the Church of Nimes either to Celidius, the man "who was blind from his birth" of the Gospel, or to St. Honestus, the apostle of Narjace, said to have been sent to southern France by St. Peter, with St. Saturninus (Sermin), the apostle of Toulouse. The true apostle of Nimes was St. Baudilus, whose martyrdom is placed by some at the end of the third century, and, with less reason, by others at the end of the fourth. Many writers affirm that a certain St. Felix, martyred by the Vandals about 407, was Bishop of Nimes, but Duchesne questions this. There was a see at Nimes as early as 336, for in that year a synodal letter was sent by a Council of Nimes to the bishops of Gaul. The first bishop whose date is positively known is Sallustus, present at the Council of Agde in 506. Other noteworthy bishops are: St. John (about 511, before 526); St. Renessarius (633-40); Bertrand of Langasuel (520-321), faithful to Boniface III; and for that reason driven from his see to his death by the bishop of Paris, St. Humfried (563-75). Urban III consecrated the cathedral of Nimes in 1096 and presided over a council. Alexander III visited Nimes in 1162. Clement IV (1265-68), born at Saint Gilles, in this diocese, granted the monastery of that town numerous favours. St. Louis, who embarked at Aigues-Mortes for his two crusades, surrounded Nimes with walls. In 1260, Clement IV released the see from its debt; he rode through the city on his way to Lyons to be crowned. In consequence of disputes about the sale of grapes to the papal household, Innocent VI laid an interdict on Nimes in 1358. The diocese was greatly disturbed by the Religious Wars: on 29 Sept., 1507, five years before the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Protestants of Nimes, actuated by fanaticism, perpetrated the massacre of Catholics, known in French history as the Michélon. Louis XIII at Nimes issued the decree of religious pacification known as the Peace of Nimes.

The first Bishop of Uzès historically known is Constantinus, present at the Council of Vaison in 142. Other bishops were St. Firminus (541-53) and St. Fortunatus (533-51). In the sixteenth century, Bishop Jean de Saint Genais (1531-60) became a Calvinist. The celebrated missionary Bridaune (1701-67) was a native of the Diocese of Uzès. This little city was for seventy days the enforced residence of Cardinal Paeae, after his confinement at Fontenelles (1812). The town of St. Jean de Peis or St. Espirit, on the Rhône, owes its name to a bridge built there between 1265 and 1309 with the proceeds of a general collection made by the monks.

About 570, Siegbert, King of Austrasia, created a see at Arlesium (Alais), taking twelve parishes from the Diocese of Nimes. In the eighth century, when Septimania was annexed to the Frankish Empire, the Diocese of Alais was suppressed and its territory returned to the Diocese of Nimes. At the request of Louis XIV, a see was again created at Alais by Innocent XII, in 1694. The future Cardinal de Bausset, Bossuet's biographer, was Bishop of Alais from 1751 to 1750. After the Edict of Nantes, Alais was one of the places de sûreté given to the Huguenots (see Huguenots, History). Louis XIII took back the town in 1629, and the Convention of Alais, signed 29 June of that year, suppressed the political privileges of the Protestants.

The chief pilgrimages of the present Diocese of Nimes are: Notre Dame de Graëc, Rochefort, dating from Charlemagne, and commemorating a victory over the Saracens. Louis XIV and his mother, Anne of Austria, established here a foundation for perpetual Masses. Notre Dame de Graëc, Laval, in the vicinity of Alais, dating from not later than 900. Notre Dame de Bon Secours de Prime Combe, Fontainès, since 857. Notre Dame de Bonheur, founded 1015 on the mountain of l'Angoul in the vicinity of Valenques. Notre Dame de Belvezet, a shrine of the eleventh century, on Mont Andava. Notre Dame de Vaynort, where the converted Albigenenses were sent, often visited by St. Louis, Clement V, and Francis I. The shrine of St. Verdeline, a hermit who died Archbishop of Avignon, and of the martyr St. Baudilus, at Trois Fontaines and at Valaisante near Nîmes. The following Saints are especially venerated in the present Diocese of Alais: St. Castor, Bishop of Apt (fourth to fifth century), a native of Alais; the priest St. Theodorius, martyr, patron saint of the town of Uzès; the Athenian St. Giles, Bishop of Axina (Egadius, sixth cent.), living as a recluse near Uzès when he was accidentally wounded by King Childebert, later abbot of the monastery built by Chilperic in reparations for this accident, venerated also in England; Blessed Peter of Luxemburg who made a sojourn in the diocese, at Villeneuve-lez-Avignon (1360-87).

Prior to the Associations Law of 1891 the diocese had Augustinians of the Assumption (a congregation which originated in the city of Nîmes), Carthusians, Trappists, Jesuits, Missionaries of the Company of Mary, Franciscan Fathers, Marists, Lazarists, Sulpicians, and various orders of teaching brotherhoods. The Oblates of the Assumption, for teaching and foreign missions, also founded here, and the Besançon Sisters of Charity, teachers and nurses, have their motherhouses at Nimes. At the beginning of the period the religious congregations conducted in this diocese; 3 orphanages, 53 day nurseries, 6 boys' orphanages, 20 girls' orphanages, 1 employment agency for females, 1 hospital of long-term treatment, 10 houses of monitors, 20 hospitals or asylums, 11 houses of visiting nurses, 3 houses of retreat, 1 home for incurables. In 1905 the Diocese of Nimes contained 120,336 inhabitants, 15 parishes, 239 secular parishes, 52 vicarates subordinated by the State.

Ninian, Saint (Ninus, Nynus, Dinian, Ringan, Rungen), bishop and confessor, date of birth unknown; d. about 163; the first Apostle of Christianity in Scotland. His feast is observed in the calendars of the Calendarium Romanum, XI, 314: "the southern Piets received the true faith by the preaching of Bishop Ninian, a most reverend and holy man of the British nation, who had been regularly instructed at Rome in the faith and mysteries of the truth; whose episcopal see, named after St. Martin the Bishop, and famous for a church dedicated to him (where Ninian himself and many other saints received baptism) is now a place of the British nation. The place belongs to the province of the Bernicians and is commonly called the White House [Candida Casa], because he there built a church of stone, which was not usual amongst the Britons". The facts given in this passage form practically all we know of St. Ninian's life and work.

The first accounts of Ninian are compiled in the twelfth century by St. Aelred, professor of a detailed account founded on Bede and also on a "liber de vita et miraculis eius" (see Niniani "barbaric scriptus"), but the legendary element is largely evident. He states, however, that while engaged in building his church at Candida Casa, Ninian heard of the martyrdom of St. Martin and resolved to dedicate his building to him. Now St. Martin died about 397, so that the mission of Ninian to the southern Piets must have begun towards the end of the fourth century. St. Ninian founded at Whithorn a monastery which became famous as a school of monasticism within a century of his death; his work among the southern Piets seems to have lasted had a devout bishop, St. Patrick, in his epistle to Coroticus, terms the Piets "apostates", and references to Ninian's converts having abandoned Christianity are found in the lives of Sts. Columba and Kentigern. The body of St. Ninian was buried in the church at Whithorn (Wigtownshire), but no relics are now known to exist. The "Cloghinn", or bell of St. Ringan, of very rough workmanship, is in the Antiquarian Museum at Edinburgh.

Nirschi, Joseph, theologian and writer, b. at Dürfuhrt, Lower Bavaria, 21 February, 1823; d. at Würzburg, 17 January, 1901. He was ordained in Salzburg and gradually rose to the doctorate in 1854 at Munich. He was appointed teacher of Christian doctrine at Passau in 1855 and in 1862 professor of church history and patrology. In 1879 he became professor of church history at Würzburg, and was appointed dean of the cathedral in 1892. Of his numerous works, mostly on patrology, the most important are: Lehrbuch der Patrologie und Patristik (3 tols., Munich, 1881-5); "Erlöser und Wesen des Bösen nach der Lehre des hl. Augustinus" (Ratisbon, 1854); "Das Dogma der unbefleckten Empfängnis Maria" (Ratisbon, 1855); "Todesjahr des hl. Ignatius von Antiochien" (Passau, 1869); "Die Theologie des hl. Ignatius von Antiochien" (Passau, 1869, and Mainz, 1880); Das Haus und Grab der hl. Jungfrau Maria (Mainz, 1900). He translated into German the letters and the martyrdom of St. Ignatius of Antioch (Kempten, 1870) and the Catechises of St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Kempten, 1871). He defended the genuineness of pseudo-Dionysius and of the apocryphal letter of King Abgar of Edessa to Jesus.

Nisibis, titular Archdiocese of Mesopotamia, situated on the Mygdonius at the foot of Mt. Masus. It is so old that its original name of Nisibis is preserved. In some cases it is not the Achad (Aeacal) of Genesis, x, 10, as has been asserted. When the Greeks came to Mesopotamia with Alexander they called it Antiochia Mygdonia, under which name it appears for the first time on the occasion of the march of Antiochus against the Molon (Polybius, V, 51). Subsequently the subject of the constant disputes between the Romans and the Parthians, it was captured by Lucullus after a long siege from the brother of Tigranes (Dion Cassius, XXXV, 6, 7); and by Trajan in 115, which won for him the name of Parthicus (ibid., LXVIII, 23). Re-captured by the Osrhoenians in 191, it was again conquered by Septimius Severus who made it his headquarters and established the Roman garrison (ibid., 23). In 297, by the treaty with Nurses, the province of Nisibis was acquired by the Roman Empire; in 363 it was ceded to the Persians on the defeat of Julian the Apostate. The See of Nisibis was founded in 300 by Babo (d. 309). His successor, the celebrated St. James, defended the city by his prayers during the siege of Sapor II. For the Persians, Nisibis was a Christian centre important enough to become the eclesiastical metropolis of the Province of Bejt-Arbayy. In 410 it had six suffragan sees and as early as the middle of the fifth century was the most important episcopal see of the Persian Church after Seleucia-Ctesiphon. A great many of its Nestorian and Jacobite bishops were stationed in Chal- biton ("Synodicon orientale", Paris, 1902, 678) and Le Quien (Oriens christ., I, 995, 1195-1204) and several of them, e. g. Barsumas, Ossi, Nurses, Jesusyab, Ebed-Jesus, etc., acquired deserved celebrity in the world of letters. Near Nisibis on 25 June, 353, Ebram Pasha, son of Mehemet Ali, Viceroy of Egypt, quarters great victory over the troops of Mahmand II. Today Nishir is a town of 3000 inhabitants in the sand-djik of Orfa and the vilayet of Aleppo. Its oil is considered very fine.

The first theological school of Nisibis, founded at the introduction of Christianity into the town, was closed when the province was ceded to the Persians, great persecutors of the Christians. The Ephraimite patriarch, grandson of after establishing it on Rousillon at Edessa, which flocked all the studiosus youth of Persia. In the fifth century the school became a centre of Nestorianism.
Archbishop Cyrus in 489 closed it and expelled masters and pupils, who withdrew to Nisibis. They were welcomed by Barsemas, a former pupil of Edessa. The school was at once re-opened at Nisibis under the direction of Narses, called the harp of the Holy Ghost. The archives and statutes of the school were destroyed.

Those which have been discovered and published belong to Osee, the successor of Barsemas in the See of Nisibis, and the date 496; they must be substantially the same as those of 499. In 590 they were again modified. The school, a sort of Catholic university, was established in a monastery and directed by a superior called Rabban, a title also given to the instance.

The administration was confided to a majordomo, who was steward, prefect of discipline, and librarian, but under the supervision of a council. Unlike the Jacobite schools, devoted chiefly to profane studies, the school of Nisibis was above all a school of theology. The two chief masters were the instructors in reading and in the interpretation of Holy Scripture, explained chiefly with the aid of Theodore of Mopsuestia.

The course of studies lasted three years and was entirely gratuitous; but the students provided for their own support. During their sojourn at the university, masters and students led a monastic life under somewhat special conditions. The school had a tribunal and enjoyed of Nisibis, favourable to the development of its rivals, especially that of Seleucia; however, it did not really begin to decline until after the foundation of the School of Bagdad (832). Among its literary celebrities mention should be made of its founder Narses; Abraham, his nephew and successor; Abraham of Kashgar, the restorer of monastic life; John; Babai the Elder; three catholici named Jesus-yab.

S. VAILHÉ.

Nithard, Frankish historian, son of Angilbert and Bertha, daughter of Charlemagne; d. about 813 or 814 in the wars against the Normans. Little is known about his early life, but in the quarrels between the sons of Louis the Pious he proved a zealous adherent of Charles the Bald, by whose command he went as ambassador to Lothair in 840, though without success. At the battle of Fontenoy, in 841, he fought bravely at the side of Charles, and afterwards wrote, at the request of that prince, the history of the period in order to establish the right of Charles the Bald. This work, which usually bears the title: "De distributionibus et successione regum latinorum" and "De distributione regni materiorum," recites in rather uncout language the causes of the quarrels and deserts of the Franks, minutely and clearly, the unjust behaviour of Lothair, sometimes a little partially, but with understanding and a clear insight into the conditions. He was the only layman of his time who devoted himself to the history, and he reported events correctly and truthfully what he himself had seen and heard. It is very probable that he was lay abbot of St. Riquier. His body was buried there, and when it was found, in the eleventh century, Mico, the poet of the abbey, composed a lengthy rhymed epitaph.

Noailles, Louis-Antoine de, cardinal and bishop, b. at the Château de Teysseire in Avargne, France, 27 May, 1561; d. at Paris, 4 July, 1579. His father, first Duke de Noailles, was captain-general of Roussillon; his mother, Louise Boyer, had been lady-in-waiting to Queen Anne of Austria. Louis de Noailles studied theology at Paris in the College du Plessis, where Fénélon was his fellow-student and friend, and obtained his doctorate at the Sorbonne, 11 March, 1670. Already provided with the Abbey of Aubrac (Diocese of Rodez), he was, in March, 1679, appointed to the Bishopric of Cahors, and in 1680 transferred to Châtellerault-Marne, to which see a preach was attached. He accepted this rapid removal only at the formal command of Innocent XI. In this office he showed himself a true bishop, occupying himself in all kinds of good works. He confided his theological seminary to the Lazarists, and founded a petit séminaire. His conduct of the regularity and standing, and the support of Mme de Maintenon induced Louis XIV to make him Archbishop of Paris, 19 August, 1685. At Paris he was what he had been at Châlons. Lacking in brilliant qualities, he was possessed of piety, zeal, and activity. He was simple in manners and accessible to poor and rich alike. In 1700 he sold his library to raise funds for the library of the University. His generosity towards churches was also remarkable, and he spent large sums from his private fortune in decorating and improving Notre-Dame. The decorum of public worship and the good conduct of the clergy were the particular objects of his care. Inspired more by customs prevalent in France than by the regulations of the Council of Trent, he caused the Breviary, Missal, and other liturgical books of Paris already published by his predecessor de Harlay, to be reprinted. To these he added the Rituale, the Cerimoniale, and a collection of canons for the use of his Church. By decrees issued on his accession (June, 1696) he imposed, for the first time on aspirants to the ecclesiastical state the obligation of residing in seminaries for several months before ordination. He organized ecclesiastical conferences throughout his diocese and conferences in moral theology once a week at Paris; priests were obliged to make an annual retreat, wise rules were drawn up for the good conduct and regularity of all ecclesiastics, and the Holy See, by the prescriptions of the see, and the primary schools. Seminaries for poor clergymen were encouraged and supported, and one was founded which served as a shelter for poor, old, or infirm priests.

While still Bishop of Châlons he took part in the conferences held at Issy to examine the works of Meun (q. v.). He imposed only secondary, but he succeeded in having the accused's entire defence heard. Shortly afterwards he became involved in a controversy with Fénélon (q. v.) concerning the latter's "Maximes des Saints," which was condemned by the Bishops of Meaux, Chartres, and de Noailles himself. In 1700 he was made a cardinal by Innocent XI. Several months later de Noailles presided at the General Assembly of the French clergy. This assembly exerted great influence on the teaching of moral theology in France, and after Bossuet no one had so great a share as de Noailles in its decisions. He became prior of Navarre in 1701, head of the College in 1710, and honorary doctor of law. For his attitude towards Jansenism the cardinal's career would be deserving only of praise. He always denied being a Jansenist, and condemned the five propositions constituting the essence of Jansenism, but he always inclined, both in dogma and morals, to opinions favouring of Jansenism; he favoured its partisans and was ever hostile to the Jesuits and the adversaries of the Jansenists. Shortly before his elevation to the See of Paris he had approved (June, 1685) the "Decrees of the Council of Tournay," which is a treatise on Jansenism already known for its ardent attachment to Jansenism and destined soon to be its leader. He earnestly recommended it to his priests. This approval was the source of all the cardinal's troubles.

Believing themselves therefore certain of his sympathy the Jansenists, on de Noailles' elevation to the See of Paris, published a pamphlet under the title "Exposition de la foy", really the explanation and defence of the Jansenistic doctrine of grace already condemned by Rome. De Noailles condemned the book (20 August, 1696), at least in the first part of his instruction, but in the second he set forth a theory on grace and predetermination closely resembling that of Henry Nocera. He ordained both the Jansenists and the Jesuits. The former did not fail to call attention to the contradictory attitudes of the Bishop of Châlons, who approved Quesnel, and the Archbishop of Paris, who condemned de Barros. An anonymous pamphlet published under the title "Probleme ecclésiastique", placed side by side twenty-nine identical propositions which had been approved and condemned by the See of "de Barros". Parliament condemned the pamphlet to be burned; six months later it was put on the Index (2 June, 1699) and proscribed by the Holy Office.

The controversies occasioned by the publication of the "Cas de Conscience" and Quesnel's "Réflexions morales" (for which see Jansenism, in Vol. VIII, 291-292), and by the new definition of grace, quarrel. In spite of repeated papal decisions of the Holy See, the cardinal, for many years, would not accept the Bull "Unigenitus". Finally he yielded in May, 1728, and on 11 October following published his unconditional acceptance of the Bull. He afterwards retracted various writings, which seemed to cast doubt on the sincerity of his submission; he ordained to the Jesuits the faculties of which he had deprived them thirteen years before. He died two months later, aged 78, regarded by all with respect and esteem. His weak and uncertain character caused him to offend everybody—Jesuits and Jansenists, pope and king, partisans and adversaries of the Bull "Unigenitus". He lacked discernment in the choice of his confidants; he bore a grudge against his part in the controversy, but lacked many qualities of a great bishop. His works—doctrinal ordinances and pastoral instructions—are mostly collected in the "Synodicon ecclesiae Parisiensis" (Paris, 1777).

De Nobili, Robert de', b. at Montpelierano, Tuscany, September, 1577; d. at Mylapore, India, in 1659. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1597, at Naples, and after a brilliant course of studies sailed for the Indian mission in October, 1601, arriving at Goa, 20 May, 1605. After a short stay at Cochín and the Fishery Coast, he was sent in November, 1606, to Madura to study Tamil. Within a year he had acquired sufficient knowledge of Tamil to skit. In his zeal to convert the Brahmins he adopted their mode of life and so had to cut himself off completely from intercourse with his fellow missionaries. He worked in Madura, Mysore, and the Karnatic till old age and almost complete blindness compelled him to retire to Mylapore. (For an account of his missionary methods see Malabar Rites.) De Nobili translated into Sanskrit or composed therein many prayers and several longer works, especially an abridgment of Christian Doctrine and a Life of Our Lady, in Sanskrit verse. Nearly all the productions he published during his imprisonment in Madura (1629-41). His principal work in Tamil is his "Larger Catechism", in four books, printed after his death (partly reprinted, Trichinopoly, 1891-1906). It is a course of theology adapted to the needs of the country. In addition he wrote: "A Treatise on the Eternal Life", "A Dialogue on the Faith", "A Disproof of Transmigration", "A Manual to Rule for Novices", and "Rudiments of Tamil", and several instructions not yet edited, two small catechisms still in actual use, "The Science of the Soul", and many prayers. He translated into Telugu several of his Tamil works, among them the two small catechisms. In Tamil and Telugu he enriched the vocabulary with appropriate Christian terms.

Noble, Daniel, physician, b. 11 Jan., 1810; d. at Manchester, 12 Jan., 1855. He was the son of Mary Dewhurst and Edward Noble of Preston, a descendant of an old Yorkshire Catholic family. Apprenticed to a Preston surgeon named Thomas Moore, Noble was in time admitted a member of the Royal College of Surgeons and a licentiate of Apothecaries Hall. In 1854 he began to practise in Manchester, and soon showed the special interest in mental disease which afterwards distinguished his career. In the following year he published his first work, "An Essay of the Means, physical and moral, of estimating Human Character", the tendency of which is indicated by the fact that he is described as President of the Manchester Phrenological Society. His practice increased, and in 1850 he married Frances Mary Louisa Ward, of Dublin; they had eight children, one of them Frances, the novelist. Cardinal Wiseman stood sponsor to his eldest child. From the University of St. Andrews he received the degrees of M.D. and M.A., and in 1867 he was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians. His other works are: "Facts and Observations relative to the Influence of Scrofulous Disease on Life" (London, 1843); "The Brain and its Physiology, a critical disquisition of the methods of determining relations subsisting between the structure and functions of the ecephalon" (London, 1840); "Elements of Psychological Medicine: An Introduction to the practical study of Insanity" (London, 1853-55); "Three Lectures on the Correlation of Psychology and Physiology" (London, 1854); "The Human Mind in its relations with the Brain and Nervous System" (London, 1858); "On certain popular fallacies concerning the production of epidemic diseases" (Manchester, 1859); "On the fluctuations in the death-rate" (Manchester, 1863); "Evanescent Protestantism and Nascent Atheism, the modern religious problem" (London, 1877); "On the effects of sanitary reform" (Manchester, 1875) and several contributions to various medical journals, the best-known of which was a paper called "Mesmerism True—Mesmerism False", which was translated into German and Dutch.

Nocera, Diocese of (Nocerinesis), in Peru-gia, Umbria, Italy, near the sources of the Tina, famous for its mineral waters, especially the Fonte Angelica. According to a legend, the first Bishop of Nocera was St. Crispodius, a disciple of the Apostles, but his Germanic name renders this doubtful; more creditable is the tradition of the martyrdom of SS. Felix, Felix, Constance, and Felicissimus. The Bishops Felix, to whom Pope Innocent addressed the letter in the year 354, and Titus, the competitor of Pope Symmachus (1498), were not Umbrian prelates, but bishops of Nocera, near Naples (Savio, "Civ. Cattol.", 1907). The first authentic Bishop was Liutardus (824); other prelates were Blessed Rinaldo d'Antignano (1258) and Blessed Filippo Oderisi (1295), monks of Pesci Avelana; Blessed Alessandro Vincelli, O.C.D. (1352); Antonio Bolognini (1383) restored the cathedral; Varino Favorino (1514), a noted humanist; Gerolamo Maumelli (1545), founder of the seminary; Mario Battaglini (1690), diocesan historian; Francesco Luigi Piervisi (1800), exiled in 1809 because he refused the oath of allegiance to Napoleon. It is immediately dependent on Rome, with 82 parishes; 59,731 inhabitants; 7 religious houses of men and 9 of women.

Nocera dei Pagani (of the pagans), Diocese of (Nocera Paganorum), in Salerno, Italy, at the foot of Mt. Albanus, on the Sarno River; it is the Nocera Altaferrae of the Notitia Urbi et Orbi of Pliny; it was made coeval with St. Maximus in the Samnite War (307), and sacked by Hannibal (215). The appellation "of the pagans" dates probably from the ninth century, because the pagans were the colonists who were the nucleus of the city, colonized by the Normans, which, in the twelfth century, was united to the Kingdom of Sicily. Nocera was the birthplace of Hugo de Pagani (Payas), one of the founders of the Dominicans; St. Ludovico, Bishop of Nocera; St. Ludovico of Tolosa, a son of St. Charles II of Anjou; Tommaso de Acerno, historian (see Acerno, Tommaso); and the painter Francesco Solimena. St. Alphonsus Liguori founded his order there. At Nocera is the sanctuary of Mater Domini, which contains the tomb of St. Charles I of Anjou; the ancient church was rebuilt in the eleventh century, and given to some hermits; Urban VIII gave it to the Basilianas, and when they were driven away in 1809 and 1829, it came into the hands of the Franciscans. Among its bishops were St. Priscus, the first bishop, not St. Priscus of Nola; and Coelius Laurentius, competitor of Symmachus (498). In 1250 the assassination of the bishop caused the suppression of the diocese, but Urban VI restored it in 1356. Later bishops were Giovanni Cerrutii (1498), a jurist; the painter Paul Jovius (1528), succeeded by his nephew Julius and his great-nephew Paul, who rebuilt the episcopal palace; Simone Lanaro (1602), diocesan historian. United to the See of Cava in 1818, it was re-established in 1834. A suffragan of Salerno, it has 28 parishes; 60,550 inhabitants; 4 religious houses of men, and 11 of women; a school for boys, and 5 for girls.

Nocturns (Nocturni or Nocturna), a very old term applied to night Offices. Tertullian speaks of nocturnal gatherings (Ad. Ux., II, iv); St. Cyprian, of the nocturnal hours, "nulla sint horis nocturnis praebentur, nulla orationem contendat in luci domi" (De orat., x, iii). In the life of Melanias the Younger it is found the expression "nocturne hora", "nocturna temporae" (Anal. Bolland., VIII, 1889, pp. 49 sq). In these passages the term signifies night prayer in general, and seems synonymous with the word vigilia. It is not accurate, then, to assume that the present division into three Nocturns represents the principal Offices recited during the night in the early ages of the Church. Durandus of Mende (Rationale, II, n. 17) and others who follow him assert that the early Christians rose thrice in the night to pray; hence the present division into three Nocturns (cf. Belth, Rupert, and other authors cited in the bibliography). Some early Christian writers speak of three vigils in the night, as Methodius or St. Jerome (Methodius, "Symposium", v, ii, in P. G., XVIII, 100); but the first was evening prayer, or prayer at nightfall, corresponding practically to our Vespers or Complines; the second, midnight prayer, specifically called Vigil; the third, a prayer at dawn, corresponding to the Office of Dawn. As a matter of fact the Office of the Vigils, and consequently of the Nocturns, was a single Office, recited without interruption at midnight. All the old texts alluding to this Office (see Marinis; Vigil) testify to this. Moreover, it does not seem practical to assume that anyone, considering the length of the Office in those days, could have risen thrice at set hours of the night, besides joining in the two Offices of Evenside and dawn.

If it is not yet possible to assign exactly the date of the origin of the three Nocturns, or to account for the significance of the division, some or more less probable conjectures may be made. In the earliest period there was as yet no question of a division in the Office. The three Nocturns in vigils may, as far as we know, be comprised certain psalms, chanted or sung either as responses or as antiphons, intermingled with prayers recited aloud, or interrupted by a few moments' meditation and readings from the Old or the New Testament. On certain days the Vigil included the celebration of Mass.

It was during the second period, probably in the fourth century, that to break the monotony of this long night prayer the custom of dividing it into three parts was introduced. Cassian in speaking of the solemn Vigils mentions three divisions of this Office (De mon. inst., II, viii, in P. L., XLIX, 196), or the Vigil, or the Office of the Vigils. He speaks with great detail of this division. The Vigil is divided into four Nocturns. The middle Nocturnus is a division of the Vigil, except the Office of the Vigils, which is divided into three Nocturns. Thirteenth-century Church.

The proof which E. Warren tries to draw from the "Antiphonary of Bangor" to show that in the Celtic Church, according to a custom older than the Benedictine-Roman, there were three divisions of the Nocturns or Vigils, is based on a misinterpretation of the three Offices, "Ittium noctis", "Nocturna", and "Matutina", which are not the three Nocturns, but the Office of Evenside, of the Vigil, and of the Mass (cf. The Tablet, 1 Dec., 1895, p. 972; and Baumgarten, infra, I, 263, 364).
The division of the Vigils into two or three Nocturns in the Roman Church dates back at least to the fifth century. We may conjecture that St. Benedict, who, in the composition of the monastic curas, followed the arrangement of the Roman Office so closely, must have been inspired equally by the Roman customs in the composition of his Office. Whatever doubt there may be as to priority, it is certain that the Roman system bears a strong analogy to that of the Nocturns in the Benedictine Office even at the present time, and the differences subsisting are almost entirely of a purely local character. At St. Benedict's time, the Roman Office has been subjected to the course of time. On Sundays and fast-days there are three Nocturns, as in the Benedictine Office. Each Nocturn comprises three psalms, and the first Nocturn of Sunday has three groups of four psalms each. The ferial days have only one Nocturn consisting of twelve psalms; each Nocturn has, as usual, three lessons. For the variations which have occurred in the course of time in the composition of the Nocturns, and for the different usages see Matins. These different usages are recorded by Dom Marténo. For the terms, "Nocturnalis Libri," "Nocturne," see Du Cange, "Glosarium Scriptorum Latinarum," s. v.

Noe [Heb. נָו, (Nóh); "rest"; Gr. Νόες; Lat. Noe], the ninth patriarch of the Sethite line, grandson of Mathseal and son of Lamech, whom his family was named after. Deluge and flood thus became the second father of the human race (Gen. v. 25—ix. 29). The name Noé was given to him because of his father's expectation regarding him. "This same," said Lamech on naming him, "shall comfort us from the works and labours of our hands on [or more correctly "from"; i.e. which come from] the earth, which the Lord hath cursed." Most commentators consider Lamech's words as the expression of a hope, or as a prophecy, that the child would in some way be instrumental in removing the curse pronounced against Adam (Gen. iii, 17 sqq.). Others rather fancifully see in them a reference to Noe's future discovery of wine, which cheers the heart of man; whilst others again think that Lamech was merely uttering a mere hope and nothing more. In this connection it is not unnatural to suppose merely a natural hope on the part of Lamech that his son would become the support and comfort of his parents, and enable them to enjoy rest and peace in their later years. Amid the general corruption which resulted from the marriages of the "sons of God" with "the daughters of men" (Gen. vi. 2 sqq.), that of the Sethite unit, Canite women, "Noe was a just and perfect man in his generations," and "walked with God" (vi. 9). Hence, when God decreed to destroy men from the face of the earth, he "found grace before the Lord". According to the common interpretation of Gen. vi, 3, Noe first received divine warning of the impending destruction one hundred and twenty years before it occurred, and then was warned of the fourth and eighth months, ten years, and forty days old (cf. vii. 11); he does not seem, however, to have received at this time any details as to the nature of the catastrophe. After he reached the age of five hundred years three sons, Sen, Cham, and Japheth, were born to him (vi. 10). These had grown to manhood and had taken wives, when Noe was informed of the impending destruction with the warning that he must build an ark in which he and his wife, his sons and their wives, and representatives, male and female, of the various kinds of animals and birds, were to be saved (vi, 13—21). How long before the Deluge this revelation was imparted to him, it is impossible to say; it can hardly have been more than seventy-five years (cf. vii, 11), and probably was considerably less.

Noe had announced the impending judgment and had exhorted to repentance (11 Pet., ii, 5), but no heed was given to his words (Matt. xxiv, 37 sqq.). Luke xvi, 26, 27; 1 Pet., iii, 20), and, when the fatal time arrived, no one except Noe's immediate family found refuge in the ark. Seven days before the waters began to cover the earth, Noe was commanded to enter the ark with his wife, his three sons and their wives, and to take with him seven pairs of all clean, and two pairs of all pairs of unclean. Cham found him (1—4). It has been objected that, even though the most liberal value is allowed for the cubit, the ark would have been too small to lodge at least two pairs of every species of animal and bird. But there can be no difficulty if, as is now generally admitted, the Deluge was not geographically universal (see Deluge; Ark). After leaving the ark Noe built an altar, and taking of all clean animals and birds, offered holocausts upon it. God accepted the sacrifice, and made a covenant with Noe, and through him with all mankind, that He would not waste the earth or destroy man by another deluge. The rainbow would for all times be a sign and a reminder of this covenant. After further renewal of the earth, Noe was pronounced on Adam (Gen. i. 28), and confirmed the dominion over animals which He had granted to man. In virtue of this dominion man may use animals for food, but the flesh may not be eaten with the blood (viii, 20—ix. 17). Noe now gave himself to agriculture, and planted a vineyard. Being unacquainted with the effects of fermented grape-juice, he drank of it too freely and was drunk. When his father lying naked in his tent, and made a jest of his condition before his brothers; these reverently covered him with a mantle. On hearing of the occurrence Noe cursed Chamana, as Cham's heir, and blessed Sem and Japheth. He lived three hundred and fifty years after the Deluge, and died at the age of nine hundred and fifty years (Gen. vii. 24). In the books of Scripture Noe is represented as the model of the just man (Eccles., xiv, 17; Ezec., xiv, 14, 20), and as an exemplar of faith (Heb. xi, 7). In the Fathers and tradition he is considered as the type and figure of the Saviour, because through him the human race was saved from destruction and reconciled with God (Eccles., xiv, 17, 18). Moreover, as he was old when the Deluge came, and so was preserved from the Deluge, so Christ established the Church, the only means of salvation in the spiritual order.

The Babylonian account of the Deluge in many points closely resembles that of the Bible. Four cuneiform recensions of it have been discovered, of which, however, three are only short fragments. The complete story is found in the Gilgamesh epic (Tablet xi), discovered by G. Smith among the ruins of the library of Assurbanipal in 1872. Another version is given by Berosus. In the Gilgamesh poem the hero of the story is Ut-napishtim (or Sît-napishtî, as some read it), surnamed Atra-hasis—"the very clever"; in two of the fragments he is simply styled Atra-hasis, which name has also been found in the cuneiform texts of Xisuthros. The story in brief is as follows: A council of the gods having decreed to destroy men by a flood, the god Ea warns Ut-napishtim, and bids him build a ship in which to save himself and the seed of all kinds of life. Ut-napishtim builds the ship (of which, according to one version, Ea traces the plan on the ground), and places in it his family, his dependent, and his animals, and domestic as well as wild animals, after which he shuts the door. The storm lasts six days: on the seventh the flood begins to subside. The ship steered by the helmsman Puzur-Bel lands on Mt. Nisir. After seven days Ut-napishtim sends forth a dove and a swallow, which, finding no resting-place for their feet return to the ark, and then a raven, which
NOLA

Diocese of (NOLANA), suffragan of Naples. The city of Nola in the Italian Province of Caserta, in Campania, is said to have been founded by the Etruscans or by Chalcideans from Cumae. On the most ancient coins it is called Nuvallia. In the Sannite War (311 B.C.), the town was taken by the Romans, in the Punie War it twice besieged by Hannibal (216 and 214), and once by the Emperor Aurelian. The town was defended by Marcellus. In the war with the Marsi, the latter took Nola in 90 B.C., but, not notwithstanding their brilliant defence of the city, it was retaken from them in the year 89, and its recapture put an end to that war. The city was sacked by Sertorius, for which reason Augustus and Vespasian sent colonists there. In a.p. 113, it was sacked by Alaric, then by the Vandals in 506 and again in 904 by the Saracens. From the time of Charles I of Anjou to the middle of the fifteenth century, Nola was a feudal possession of the Orsini. The battle of Nola (1359) is famous for the clever stratagem by which John of Anjou defeated Alfonso of Aragon. Noia furnished a considerable portion of the treasures in the museum of Naples, consisting of really beautiful Greek vases. In the seminary there is a collection of ancient inscriptions, among which are some Oriental tablets. The ruins of an amphitheatre and other ancient remains are yet to be seen in this city, where the Emperor Augustus, who died there, had a famous temple. Nola was the birthplace of Giordano Bruno, of Langi, the philosopher and poet, of the sculptor Giovanni Merlino, whose work is well represented in the cathedral, and of the physician Ambrogio Leo.

The ancient Christian memories of Nola are connected with the neighbouring Cumitió, the name of which recalls the site of an ancient cemetery. There is the basilica of St. Felix, the martyrs, built, and partly described by St. Paulinus, bishop of the city, who shows that no sanctuary, after the tombs of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, was visited by as many pilgrims as came to this shrine. St. Felix, who lived between the middle of the second century and the middle of the third, was the first Bishop of Nola. The city has several other named persons, among them Faustulus, and Aecarius, companions of St. Januarius, besides St. Felix, confessor. Other bishops of Nola were St. Mararius (about the year 300); St. Priscus, who died in 328, or according to Mommsen, in the year 326; St. Felix, who died in 311.
523: St. Quodyvalduz, who died in 357 and was succeeded by St. Paulinus. The body of the last-named saint was taken to Benevento in 539, and in the year 1081, with Bishop and 111, the body of Benevento in exchange for the body of St. Bartholomew; in 1999 it was restored to Nola. In the fifth century the archbishop St. Adeodatus flourished at Nola; his metrical epitaph has been preserved. In 1844 Jeanne Taladas, Orthodox Patriarch of Alexandria, having been driven from his diocese, was made Bishop of Nola. It was the bishopship and the see of Nola (505) who bore the name of St. Bartholomew, and he has been given to a free widow's son; this heroic deed was afterwards attributed to St. Paulinus I. Bishop Luppienius (750) restored several sacred buildings. Francis Saccani (1570) erected the Gothic cathedral, which was finished by Bishop Gian Antonio Bocarelli (1469). Antonio Scarampi (1519) founded the seminary and introduced the reforms of the Council of Trent. Fabrizio Gale (1855) founded several charitable institutions; G. B. Lancelotti (1851-1950), who was Apostolic nuncio to Poland from 1822 to 1827, did much for the diocese; Francis M. Carafa (1704), a Theatine, was zealous for the education of the clergy, Traiano Caracciolo (1758) constructed the new seminary.

The diocese is a suffragan of Naples; it has 86parishes, 100,000 inhabitants, 9 religious houses, 19 men, and 19 of women, several educational establishments and asylums, and four monthly and bi-monthly periodicals.

Nola, Giovanni Marliano da, sculptor and architect, b. it is said, of a leather merchant named Giuseppe, at Nola, near Naples, 1488; d. 1568 (?). He studied under Agnolo Aniello Fiore and then went to Rome, being attracted by the fame of Michelangelo, whose work he studied closely. On his return to Naples he was employed in churches, palaces, and piazzas. Among his works may be mentioned the monument of Galeazzo Pandone in S. Domenico (1514); the tombs of the three youths Jacopo, Asciano, and Sigismondo (who died of poison) in their family church of S. Severino (1516); various sculptures in the church of Otranto (1524), notably a fine group of the Mother and Child with St. John the Baptist; in the choir, tombs of Alfonso II and Guererro Origlia; in the church of S. Chiara, the simple and touching recumbent figure of the girl Antonia Gandino (1530).

Outside of Italy the noble monument of the Spanish Duke of Cardona (about 1532) in the Franciscan church of Belnuhich is among the best known. The decorations made by Nola for the reception of Emperor Charles V in Naples (1535) are still to be seen on the Porta Capua. In 1537 he carved a beautiful standing Madonna and two Saints for the church of S. Domenico Maggiore. In 1553 the Spanish viceroy, Peter of Toledo, caused him to erect the mausoleum to himself and his wife in the church of S. Giacomo degli Scalzi. Other works of Nola's in Naples, are the Pietà and tomb of a child, Andrea Cicero, in the church of S. Severino; a Madonna della Misericordia in S. Pietro ad Aram; an altar-piece at S. Aniello, representing the Mother and Child seated on a crescent moon; and a fine set of wooden bas-reliefs depicting the life of Christ, in the sacristy of the church of Otranto.

The most justly famed representatives of a rather poor school of Renaissance sculpture in Naples.

Nollet, Jean-Antoine, physicist, b. at Pimprené, Oise, France, 19 November, 1700; d. at Paris, 25 April, 1770. His peasant parents sent him to study at Clermont and Beaumarchais. He went later to Paris to prepare for the priesthood. In 1728 he received the degree of Doctor of Laws, and three years later of Doctor of Theology. Soon love of science became uppermost and together with Dufay and Réaumur he devoted himself to the study of physics and especially to research in electricity. Abbé Nollet was the first to recognize the importance of sharp points on the conductors in the discharge of electricity. This was supplemented by his experiments on the lightning-rod. He also studied the conduction of electricity in tubes, in smoke, vapours, steam, the influence of electric charges on evaporation, vegetation, and animal life. His discovery of the osmosis of water through a bladder into alcohol was the starting-point of that branch of physics.

In 1734 Nollet went to London and was admitted into the Royal Society. In 1735 he started in Paris, at his own expense, a course in experimental physics which he continued until 1760. In 1738 Cardinal Fleury created a public chair of experimental physics for Nollet. In 1739 he entered the Academy of Sciences, becoming associate member in 1742, and pensionary in 1758. In April, 1739 the King of Sar- dina called him to the conduction of the seminary of Savoy, and to furnish the instruments needed for the new chair of physics at the university. After lecturing a short time at Bordeaux, he was called to Versailles to instruct the dauphin in experimental science. He was appointed professor of experimental physics at the Royal College of Navarre, in 1753. In 1761 he taught a school of artillers at Mézières. Nollet was also a member of the Institute of Bologna and of the Academy of Sciences of Erfurt. He was calm and simple, and his letters and papers showed that he had been devoted and generous to his family and his native village. Nollet contributed to the "Receuil de l'Académie des Sciences" (1740-67) and the "Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society." His larger works include among others:—"Programme d'un cours de physique expérimentale" (Paris, 1738); "Lesçons de physique expérimentale" (Paris, 1743); "Recherches sur les causes particulières des phénomènes électriques" (Paris, 1749); "L'art des expériences" (Paris, 1770).

Nominalism, Realism, Conceptualism.—These terms are used to designate the theories that have been proposed as solutions of one of the most important questions in philosophy, often referred to as the problem of universals, which, while it was a favourite subject for discussion in ancient times, and especially in the Middle Ages, is still prominent in modern and contemporary philosophy. We propose to discuss in this article: I. The Nature of the Problem and the Suggested Solutions; II. The Principal Historic Forms of Nominalism, Realism, and Conceptualism; III. The Claims of Moderate Realism.

I. THE PROBLEM AND THE SUGGESTED SOLUTIONS.

The problem of universals is the problem of the correspondence of our intellectual concepts to things existing outside our intellect. Whereas external objects are determinate, individual, formally exclusive of all multiplicity, our concepts or mental representations offer us the realities independent of all particular determination; they are abstract and universal. The question, therefore, is to discover to what extent the concepts of the mind correspond to the things they represent; how the flower we conceive represents the flower existing in nature; in a word, whether our ideas are faithful and have an objective reality. Four solutions of the problem have been offered. It is necessary to describe them carefully, as writers do not always use the terms in the same sense.
A. Exaggerated Realism holds that there are universal concepts in the mind and universal things in nature. There is, therefore, a strict parallelism between the being in nature and the being in thought, since the external object is clothed with the same character of universality that we discover in the concept. This is a simple solution, but one that runs counter to the dictates of common sense.

B. Nominalism.—Exaggerated Realism invents a world of reality corresponding exactly to the attributes of the world of thought. Nominalism, on the contrary, models the concept on the external object, which it holds to be individual and particular. Nominalism consequently denies the existence of abstract and universal concepts, and refuses to admit that the internal objects of experience, which are called general ideas are only names, mere verbal designations, serving as labels for a collection of things or a series of particular events. Hence the term Nominalism. Neither Exaggerated Realism nor Nominalism finds any difficulty in establishing a correspondence between the thing in thought and the thing existing in nature, since, in different ways, they both postulate perfect harmony between the two. The real difficulty appears when we assign different attributes to the thing in nature and to the thing in thought; if we hold that the one is individual and the other universal. An antinomy then arises between the world of reality and the world as representations.

C. Conceptualism admits the existence within us of abstract and universal concepts (whence its name), but it holds that we do not know whether or not the mental objects exist outside of us, or if they exist in nature the objects possess distributively and each by itself the realities which we conceive as realized in each of them. The concepts have an ideal value; they have no real value, or at least we do not know whether they have a real value.

D. Moderate Realism, finally, declares that there are universal concepts representing faithfully realities that exist in the universe. "How can there be harmony between the former and the latter? The latter are particular, but we have the power of representing them to ourselves abstractly. Now the abstract type, when the intellect considers it reflectively and contrasts it with the particular subjects in which it is realized or capable of being realized, in every way and in all ways. This applicability of the abstract type to the individuals is its universality" (Mercier, "Critéorologie", Louvain, 1906, p. 343).

II. The Principal Historical Forms of Nominalism, Realism, and Conceptualism.—A. In Greek Philosophy.—The conception of the one and the many, magnitude and the permanent, was a favourite problem with the Greeks; it leads to the problem of universals. The typical affirmation of Exaggerated Realism, the most outspoken ever made, appears in Plato's philosophy; the real must possess the attributes of necessity, universality, unity, and immutability which are found in our intellectual representations. And as the sensible world consists only of the contingent, the particular, the unstable, it follows that the real exists outside and above the sensible world. Plato calls it ἐνίκας, idea. The idea is absolutely stable and exists by itself (ὅσεν ἐστιν, ὃσιν καὶ ἐστί), isolated (ὑποτείνεται) from the phenomenal world, distinct from the Divine and the human intellect. Following this declarative principle of his master, Plato makes an idea-entity correspond to each of our abstract representations. Not only natural species (man, horse) but artificial products (bed), not only substances (man) but properties (white, just), relations (double, triple), and even negations and nothingness have a corresponding idea in the suprasensible world. "What makes one and one two, and two a participation of the monad (μονὸς) in unity" (Phaedo, ix). The exaggerated Realism of Plato, investing the real being with the attributes of the being in thought, is the principal doctrine of his metaphysics.

Aristotle broke away from his master and formulated the main doctrines of Moderate Realism. The real is not, as Plato says, some vague entity of which the sensible world is only the shadow; it dwells in the midst of the sensible world. Individual substance (this man, that horse) alone has reality; it alone can exist. The universal is an idea existing in itself, which is the common denominator of individuals and is multiplied in all the representations of a class of things. To the form of universality of our concepts (man, just), it is a product of our subjective consideration. The objects of our generic and specific representations can certainly be called substances (ἐνικὰ), when they designate the fundamental reality (man) with the accidental determinations (just, big); but these are ἐνίκαι ἐνικά (second substances), and by that Aristotle means precisely that this attribute of universality which affects the substance as in thought does not belong to the substance (thing in itself); it is the outcome of our subjective elaboration. This theorem of Aristotle, which completes the metaphysics of Heraclitus (denial of the identity of the individual) and Parmenides (denial of change), is the antithesis of Platonism, and may be considered one of the finest pronouncements of Peripateticism. It was through this wise doctrine that the Stagyrite exercised his ascendancy over all later thought.

After Aristotle Greek philosophy formulated a solution answer to the problem of universals, Conceptualism. This solution appears in the teaching of the Stoics, which, as is known, ranks with Platonism and Aristotelianism among the three original systems of the great philosophical age of the Greeks. Sensation is the principle of all knowledge, and thought is only a collective sensation. Zeno compared sensation to an open hand with the fingers separated; experience or multiple sensation to the open hand with the fingers bent; the general concept born of experience to the closed fist. Now, concepts, reduced to general sensations, have as their object, not the corporeal and external thing reached by the senses (ἐνέργεια), but the τὸ ἐν or the reality conceived; whether we know it or not, we do not know. The Aristotelian School adopted Aristotelian Realism, but the neo-Platonists subscribed to the Platonic theory of ideas which they transformed into an emanationistic and monistic conception of the universe.

B. In the Philosophy of the Middle Ages.—For a long time it was thought that the problem of universals monopolized the attention of the philosophers of the Middle Ages; and that the dispute of the Nominalists and Realists absorbed all their energies. In reality that question, although prominent in the Middle Ages, was far from being the only one dealt with by these philosophers.

(1) From the commencement of the Middle Ages till the end of the 12th century. It is impossible to classify the philosophers of the beginning of the Middle Ages exactly as Nominalists, Moderate and Exaggerated Realists, or Conceptualists. And the reason is that the problem of the Universals is very complex. It not merely involves the metaphysics of the individual and the universal, but also raises important questions in ideology—questions about the genesis and validity of knowledge. But the earlier Scholastics, unskilled in such delicate matters, did not perceive these various aspects of the problem. It did not grow up spontaneously in the Middle Ages; it was bequeathed in a text of Porphyry's "Isagoge", a text that seemed simple and innocent, though somewhat obscure, but one which force of circumstances made the dogma one of the earliest medieval speculations about the Universals.

Porphyr, divides the problem into three parts: (1) Do genera and species exist in nature, or do they consist in mere products of the intellect? (2) If they are things apart from the mind, are they corporeal or incorporeal things? (3) Do they exist outside the individual things? or are they realized in the latter? "Mox de genere et speciebus illud quidem sive subsistent sive in nulis intellectibus posita sint, sive subsistentia corporalia sint incorporea, et utrum separata a sensibilibus an in sensibilibus posita et circa hae subsistentia, diceo recursum." Historically, the first of those questions was discussed prior to the latter, and the latter could have arisen only in the event of denying the Realists an exclusively subjective character to universal realities. Now the first question was whether genera and species are objective realities or not; sive subsistent, sive in nulis intellectibus posita sint? In other words, the sole point in debate was the absolute reality of the universals: their truth, their relation to the understanding, was not in question. The two positions are respectively known as Nominalism and Realism.

Boethius, in his two commentaries, gives replies that are vague and scarcely consistent. In the second commentary, which is the more important one, he holds that genus and species are both subsistentia and intellecta (1st question), the similarity of things being the basis (subjectum) both of their individuality in nature and reality (hinc realitatem); that genera and species are incorporeal not by nature but by abstraction (2nd question), and that they exist both inside and outside the things of sense (3rd question).

This was not sufficiently clear for beginners, though we can see in it the basis of the Aristotelian solution of the problem. The early Scholastics faced the problem as proposed by Porphyr, limiting the controversy to genus and species and its alternatives, suggested by the first question: Do the objects of our concepts (i.e., genus and species) exist in nature (subsistentia), or are they mere abstractions (nuda intellecta)? Are they, or are they not, things? Those who replied in the affirmative got the name of Reals or Realists; the others that of Nominals or Nominalists. The former, or Realists, were more numerous in the early Middle Ages (Fredusns, Remy d'Axure, and John Scottus Ereigna in the ninth century, Gerbert and Odol of Tournai in the tenth, and William of Champeaux in the twelfth) attribute to each genus and each species a universal essence (subsistentia), to which all the subordinate individuals are tributary.

The Nominalists, who should be called rather the anti-Realists, assert on the contrary that the individual alone exists, and that the universals are not things realized in the universal state in nature, or subsistentia. And as they adopt the alternative of Porphyry, they conclude that the universals are nuda intellecta (that is, purely intellectual representations). It may be that Roselini of Compiengu did not go beyond these energetic protests against Realism, and that he is not a Nominalist in the exact sense we have attributed to the word above, for we have to depend on others for an expression of his views, as there is extant no text of his which would justify us in saying that he defended purely intellectual representations. It may be that he held that Realism could exist at all in the Middle Ages, as it is possible only in a sensist philosophy that denies all natural distinction between the mental and the external concept. Furthermore there is little evidence of Sensism in the Middle Ages, and, as Sensism and Scholasticism, so also Nominalism and Scholasticism are mutually exclusive. The different anti-Realist systems anterior to the thirteenth century are in fact only more or less imperfect forms of the Modern antirealism towards the early thirteenth century, and the first period were tending, phases through which the same ideas passed in its organic evolution. These stages are numerous, and several have been studied in recent monographs (e.g. the doctrine of Adelard of Bath, of Gauthier de Mortagne, Indifferentism, and the theory of the collectio). The decisive stage is marked by Abbe (1079-1112), who points out clearly the reality of abstraction, and how we represent to ourselves elements common to different things, capable of realization in an indefinite number of individuals of the same species, while the individual alone exists. From that to Moderate Realism there is but a step; it was sufficient to show that a real fundament allows us to attribute the general representation to the individual things. It is in the thirteenth century, particularly in the twelfth century to develop the theory in its entirety. Moderate Realism appears fully in the writings of John of Salisbury.

b. From the Thirteenth Century.—In the thirteenth century all the great Scholastics solved the problem of the universals by the theory of Moderate Realism of Thomas Aquinas, his successors, and the Terminist School; the latter is thus in accord with Averroes and Avicenna, the great Arab commentators of Aristotle, whose works had recently passed into circulation by means of translations. St. Thomas formulates the doctrine of Moderate Realism in precise language, and for that reason alone we can give the name of Thomistic Realism to the doctrine (see the treatise on the nature and the Terminist School appear the strictly conceptualist solutions of the problem. The abstract and universal concept is a sign (signum), also called a term (terminus; hence the name Terminism given to the system), but it has no real value, for the abstract and the universal do not exist in any way in nature and the mind in general. The abstract concept (intentio secundae) has as its object internal representations, formed by the understanding, to which nothing external corresponding can be attributed. The role of the universals is to serve as a label, to hold the place (suscipere) in the mind of the multitude of things in which it can be attributed. Ocken's Conceptualism would be more faithful to it, for with the abstract concept, he did not admit within us intuitive concepts which reach the individual thing, as it exists in nature.

c. In Modern and Contemporary Philosophy.—We find an unequivocal affirmation of Nominalism in Positivism. For Hume, Stuart Mill, Spencer, and Taine there is strictly speaking no universal concept. The creation, to which the collection of individual perceptions, a collective sensation, "un nom compris" (Taine), "a term in habitual association with many other particular ideas" (Hume), "un savoir potentiel enmagasine" (Ribot). The problem of the correspondence of the concept to reality is thus at once solved, or rather it is suppressed and replaced by a psychological question. What is the origin of the illusion that induces us to attribute a distinct nature to the general concept, though the latter is only an elaborated sensation? Kant distinctly affirms the existence within us of abstract and general notions and the distinction between them and sensations, but these doctrines are joined with a character of the phenomenon of the abstract concept. Kant's universal formal meaning of the Conceptualism. Universal and necessary representations have no contact with extertial things, since they are produced exclusively by the structural functions (a priori forms) of our mind. Time and space, in which we frame all sensible impressions, cannot be obtained from experience, which is individual and contingent; they are schemata which arise from our mental organization. Consequently, we have no warrant for establishing a real correspondence between the world of our ideas and the world of reality. Science, which is only an elaboration of the data of sense in accordance with other structural determinations of the mind (the categories), becomes a subjective poem, which has a value only for us and not for a world outside us. A modern form of Platonic or Exaggerated Realism is found in the ontologist doctrine defended by certain Catholic philosophers in the middle of the nineteenth century in identifying the objects of universal ideas with the Divine ideas or the archetypes on which the world was fashioned. As to Moderate Realism, it remains the doctrine of all those who have returned to Aristotelianism or adopted the neo-Scholastic philosophy.

11. The Claims of Moderate Realism—This system reconciles the characteristics of external objects (particularity) with those of our intellectual representations (universality), and explains why science, though made up of abstract notions, is valid for the world of reality. To understand this it suffices to grasp the real meaning of abstraction. When the mind apprehends the essence of a thing (quod essent) it must keep it without the particular notes which attach to it in nature (esse in singularibus), and it is not yet marked with the attribute of generality which reflection will bestow on it (esse in intellectu). The abstract reality is apprehended with perfect indifference as regards both the individual state without and the universal state within, according to whose quod esset or quod essentia considers natura lapidis vel cujusque cunucque alceris, quantum ad ex tantum que per se competet illi natura (St. Thomas, "Quodlibeta", Q. i, a. 1). Now, what is thus conceived in the abstract state (absolute considerandum) is nothing else than the reality incarnate in any given individual. In truth, the reality, represented in my concept of man, is in Socrates or in Plato. There is nothing in the abstract concept that is not applicable to every individual; if the abstract concept is inadequate, because it does not contain the singular notes of each being, it is none the less faithful, or at least its abstract character does not prevent it from corresponding in substance with reality or existing in nature. As to the universal form of the concept, a moment's consideration shows that it is subsequent to the abstraction and is the fruit of reflection: "ratio speciei accidit naturae humanae". Whence it follows that the universality of the concept as such is the work purely of the intellect; "unde intellectus est qui facit universalia in rebus" (St. Thomas, "De ente et entitate", iv).

Concerning Nominalism, Conceptualism, and Exaggerated Realism, a few general considerations must suffice. Nominalism, which is irreconcilable with a spiritualistic philosophy and for that very reason with Scholasticism as well, presupposes the ideologic theory that the abstract concept does not differ essentially from sensation, of which it is only a transformation. The Nominalism of Hume, Stuart Mill, Spencer, Huxley, and Taine is of no greater value than their ideology. They confound essentially distinct logical operations—the simple decomposition of sensible or empirical representations with abstraction properly so called—a sensible psychology with the process of idea-ization. The Aristotelians recognize both of these mental operations, but they distinguish carefully between them. As to Kant, all the bonds that might connect the concept with the external world are destroyed in his Phenomenology. Kant is unable to explain why one and the same sensible im-omination by princes is, without doubt, that which relates to the major, or consistorial, benefices, especially bishoprics. Without going back to the intrusions of royal power in episcopal elections in the barbarian kingdoms, or in the Carolingian Empire, or the Byzantine empire, it can be observed that the Concordat of Worms (1121), which ended the Conflict of Investitures (q.v.), included an initial measure for the separation of the parts and prerogatives of the two powers in the choice of bishops. The emperor recognized the freedom of episcopal elections and consignments; the pope, on his side, agreed that elections should be held in the manner in which he considered that the emperor should decide in case of dispute, that he should give temporal investiture, by the sceptre, to the bishop-elect, while investiture by ring and crozier, symbolic of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, should be combined with the consignment. The custom of election of bishops by chapters, which was the common law of the eleventh century, left, officially, no opening for royal interference, but in practice it was less endeavoured to have their candidates elected. This became more difficult for them when, by successive reservations, the popes had made themselves masters of all episcopal elections, thus occasioning serious inconveniences. While in Germany the Concordat of 1148 reestablished capitular elections, in France, on the contrary, the decree of the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges (1438), the quarrel ended with the Concordat of 1516. In this instrument we find the right of nomination guaranteed to the kings of France for consistorial benefices, bishoprics, abbacies, and priories; and thence the arrangements passed into most of the subsequent concordats, including the Concordat of 1530 (cf. Nomocanon, I. 1-148). The royal ordinance of Francis I promulgating the Bull of Leo X says: “Such vacancy occurring, the King of France shall be bound to present and name [the Bull says only nobis nominari] a master ... and otherwise fit, within six months ... that we may appoint his nominee to the vacancy ... If this person is rejected, the king will nominate another within three months; if not, the pope can himself appoint. The same right of nomination is extended to abbacies and priories, with some exceptions. The Concordat of 1801 (articles 4 and 5) accords to the First Consul the same right of nomination, but only for bishoprics, and without fixing a limit of time for its exercise. In other countries the right of nomination includes other benefices besides bishoprics.

Such being the nature of the very definite right of nomination, nothing but malicious provocation can be discerned in the conflict brought on by M. Combes, when Prime Minister of France (1902-5), in regard to the nobis nominari, the expression which figured in the Bulls for French bishops. By a note dated 21 Dec., 1902, the French Government demanded the suppression of the nobis, as to make it appear that the head of the State nominated bishops absolutely, like government officials. The Vatican explained the true nature of the nomination as the designation of a person by the head of the State, the latter indicating to the Electors whom he desires as head of such a diocese; the pope according to law, leaving to the French bishops, who, by canonical institution, is the fact pointed out that the word nobis is found in the episcopal Bulls of all nations which have by concordat the right of nomination; also that, with very rare exceptions, it appears in all the Bulls for France under the Concordat of 1516 as under that of 1081; that previously, in 1571, the French Government leaving out any difficulty the suppression of the word presentavit, had, upon representations made by Rome, withdrawn its demand for the suppression of the nobis; above all, it was insisted on that the letters patent of the French Government to the pope had from time immemorial contained the words: “We name him [the candidate] and present him to Your Holiness, that it may please Your Holiness, upon our nomination and presentation, to provide for the said bishopric,” etc. The Vatican nevertheless declared that it did not desire to make any satisfactory revision of the formularies proposed on either side, without success; at last the Holy See consented to suppress the word nobis in the Bulls, contenting itself with the Government’s employing the usual formularies in drafting letters patent. (On this concord see the “Livre Blanc du Saint Siège”; “La separation de l’Eglise et de l’Etat en France”, ch. iv,especially Acta S. Caroli, p. 15, and since 1516, the resumption, as we know, did not delay the separation which the French Government was determined to have at any price. (See Benefice; Bishop; Concordat; Election; Institution.)

Nomocanon (from the Greek σνοκανων, law, and σακενος, a rule), a collection of ecclesiastical law, the elements of which are borrowed from secular and canon law. When we recall the important place given to ecclesiastical law for its consequent law, the Theodosian Code, the Justinian collections, and the subsequent “Novelle”, and “Basilica”, the utility of comparing laws and canon relating to the same subjects will be readily recognized. Collections of this kind are found only in Eastern law. The Greek Church has two principal collections. The first, dating from the end of the sixth century, is ascribed, without certainty, to Justellus of Alexandria, whose canons it utilizes and completes. He had drawn up (about 530) a purely canonical compilation in fifty titles, and later composed an extract from the “Novelle” in eighty-seven chapters (for the canonical collection see Vellius and justellus, “Bibliotheca juris canonici”, Paris, 1661, I, 449 sqq.; for the eighty-seven chapters, Pitra, “Juris ecclesiastici Graecorum historia et monumenta”, Rome, 1864, II, 355). To each of the fifty titles were added the texts of the imperial laws on the same subject, with twenty-one additional chapters nearly all borrowed from John’s eighty-seven (Vellius and justellus, op. cit., II, 603). In its earliest form this collection dates from the reign of Emperor John VIII Palaeologus, and was replaced by Greek as the official language of the imperial laws. Its two sections include the ecclesiastical canons and the imperial laws, the latter in fourteen titles.

This collection was long held in esteem and passed into the Russian Church, but was by degrees supplanted by that of Photius. The first part of Photius’s collection contains the John Scholasticus and the decisions of the Fathers. It is in substance the Greek collection of 692, as it is described by canon ii of the Trullan Council (see Law, Canon), with the addition of 102 canons of that council, 17 canons of the Council of Constantinople of 861 (against Ignatius), and of 3 canons substituted by Photius for those of the latter that cannot be found in the canon in fourteen titles were completed by additions from the more recent imperial laws. This whole collection was commented about 1170 by Theodore Balsamon, Greek Patriarch of Antioch residing at Constantinople (Nomocanon with Balsamon’s commentary in Vellius and justellus, II, 815; P. G., CIV, 1169, 1171). Subsequently it was established that the collection of Photius has become a part of the “Pildion” (πιλδιον, rudder), a sort of Corpus juris of the Orthodox Church, printed in 1800 by Patriarch Neophythus VIII. In the eleventh century it had been also translated into Slavonic for the Russian Church;
It is retained in the law of the Orthodox Church of Greece, and included in the "Syntagma" published by Rhallis and Potis (Athens, 1852–9). Though called "canonical," the real law of Matthew Blastares (c. 1339) is a real nonomoc-non, in which the texts of the canons and of the laws are arranged in alphabetical order (P. G., loc. cit.; Beveridge, "Synodem", Oxford, 1672). A remarkable nonomoc was composed by John Barhebrus (1226–
86) for the Syrian Church of Antioch (Latin version by Assomni in M. "Esquisse sur la vie collective", X, 3 sq.). Several Russian manuals published at Kiev and Moscow in the seventeenth century were also nonomoc-non.

Nonantola, a former Benedictine monastery and prelature nullius, six miles north-east of Modena, founded in 752 by St. Anselm, Duke of Friuli, and richly endowed by Aistulf, King of the Longobards.
Stephen II appointed Anselm its first abbot, and presented the relics of St. Sylvester to the abbey, named in the consecrated vessels the consecration of the death of Aistulf (756), Anselm was banished to Monte Cassino by the new king, Desiderius, but was restored by Charlemagne after seven years. In 883 it was chosen as the place of a conference between Charles the Fat and Marius I. Up to 1083 it was an imperial monastery, and its discipline often suffered severely on account of imperial interference in the election of abbots. In the beginning of the Conflict of Investitures it sided with the emperor, until forced to submit to the pope by Mathilda of Tuscany in 1083.

It finally declared itself openly for the pope in 1111.

In that year the famous monk Placidus of Nonantola wrote his De honore Ecclesiastico, one of the most able and important defences of the priestly position that were written during the Conflict of Investitures.

It is printed in Pez. "Thesaurus Anecdot. noviss."

(Augsburg, 1721), II, ii, 73 sq. The decline of the monastery began in 1149, when it came under the jurisdiction of commendatory abbots. In 1514 it came into the possession of the Cistercians, but continued to depend until 1600 on the rule of Benedictine monks.

By Clement XIII in 1768, Pius VII in 1801, and 25 Jan. 1822, it was finally suppressed by Clement XIII.

According to the provision that the prelate nullius attached to it should belong to the Archbishop of Modena. In 1900

the exempt district comprised 42,980 inhabitants, 31 parishes, 91 churches and chapels, 62 secular priests and three religious congregations for women. The monastery itself was appropriated by the Italian

Government in 1866.

Nonconformists, a name which, in its most general acceptance, denotes those refusing to conform with the authorized formularies and rites of the Established Church of England. The application of the term has varied somewhat with the passing phases of Anglican history. From the accession of Elizabeth to the middle of the seventeenth century

it had not come into use as the name of a religious party, but the word "conform", and the appellatives

"conforming" and "nonconforming", were becoming more frequent. The common expression to designate those members of the Puritan party who, disapproving certain of the Anglican rites (namely, the use of the surplice, of the sign of the cross at baptism, of the ring in marriage, of the attitude of kneeling at the reception of the sacrament) and of the episcopal order of Church government, either resigned themselves to these usages of which they disapproved, or at least set them aside at their own costs. However from 1662, when the Fourth Act of Uniformity had the effect of ejecting from their benedices, acquired during the Commonwealth, a large number of ministers of Puritan proclivities, and of constraining them to organize themselves as separatist sects, the term "Nonconformist" crystallized into the technical name for such sects.

History.—The history of this cleavage in the ranks of English Protestantism goes back to the reign of Mary Tudor, when the Protestant leaders who were victorious under Edward VI retired to Frankfurt,

Zurich, and other Protestant centres on the continent, and quarrelled among themselves, some inclining to the more moderate Lutheran or Zwinglian positions, others developing into uncompromising Calvinists.

When the accession of Elizabeth attracted them back to England, the Calvinist section, which soon acquired the nickname of Puritans, was the more fiery, the larger in numbers and the most in favour with the majority of the Protestant hiaty. Elizabeth, however, had already been very little disposed to go so far as to set the episcopal mode to a presbyterian system as more in harmony with monarclnism, and besides she had some taste for the ornate in public worship. Accordingly

she caused the religious settlement, destined to last into our own times, to be made on the basis of episoc-pacy, with the retention of the points of ritual above spatially but also and here was war out against them at the expense of Calvinists, many of whom were called like Parker, who were prepared to aid her in carrying out this programme. For those who held Puritan views she had a natural dislike, to which she sometimes gave forcible expression, but on the whole she saw the expediency of showing them some consideration, lest she should lose their support in her campaign against Catholicism.

These were the determining factors of the initial situation, out of which the subsequent history of Eng-ish Protestantism has grown by a natural development. The result during Elizabeth's reign was a state of oscillation between phases of repression and phases of indulgence, in meeting the persistent enquiry of the Puritans, and by 1592, they had become predominant in the national Church. In 1559 the third

Act of Uniformity was passed, by which the new edition of the Prayer Book was enjoined upon under severe penalties on all ministering as clergy in the country.

In 1566, feeling that some concession to the strength of the Puritan opposition was necessary, Archbishop

Parker, on an understanding reached with the queen, published certain Advertisements addressed to the clergy, requiring them to conform at least as regards wearing the surplice, kneeling at communion, using the font for baptism, and covering the communion table with a proper cloth. These Advertisements were partially enforced in some dioceses, and led to some deprivations, deeper their effects out from the Established Church into those with which the Puritans took up a more advanced position a few years later, and demanded the substitution of a Presbyterian regime. This was the demand of Thomas Cartwright in his First and Second

Admonitions, published in 1572, and followed in 1589

by his Book of Discipline, in which he collaborated with Thomas Travers. In the latter book he proposed an increase in the number of bishops, or boards of clergy for each district, to which the episcopal powers should be transferred, to be exercised by them on presbyterian principles, to the bishops being reserved

only the purely mechanical ceremony of ordination.

So great was the influence of the Puritans in the country that they were able to introduce for a time this strange system in England.

by the violence of their language against the queen and the bishops stirred up the queen to take drastic measures. Perry and Udal, authors of the tracts, were tried and executed, and Cartwright was imprisoned; whilst in 1583 an act was passed inflicting the punishment of imprisonment, to be followed by exile in case of a second offence, on all who refused to take the oath of supremacy, or to conform to the Church of England.

This caused a division in the party; as many, though secretly retaining their beliefs, preferred outward conformity to the loss of their benefices, whilst the extremists of the party left the country and settled in Holland. Here they were for a time called Brownists, afterwards, when their persecution began, but later they took the name of Independents, as indicating their peculiar theory of the governmental independence of each separate congregation. From these Brownists came the “Pilgrim Fathers” who, on 6 December, 1620, sailed from Plymouth in the “Mayflower”, and settled in New England.

With the death of Elizabeth the hopes of the Puritans revived. Their system of doctrine and government was dominant in Scotland, and they hoped that the Scottish King James might be induced to extend it to England. So they met him on his way to London with their Millenary Petition, so called though the signatures were added only after his arrival. In this document they were prudent enough not to raise the question of episcopal government, but contented themselves for the time with a request that the ritual customs which they disliked might be discontinued in the State Church. James promised them a conference which met the next year at Hampton Court to consider their grievances, and in which they were represented by four of their leaders. These had some sharp encounters with the bishops and chief Anglican divines, but, whilst the Puritans were set more on domination than toleration, the king was wholly on the side of the Anglicans, who in his eyes their triumph were in no mood for concessions. Accordingly the conference proved abortive, and the very same year Archbishop Bancroft, with the king's sanction, came through Convocation and at once enforced the canons known as those of 1604. The purpose of this campaign was to restore the use of the rites in question, which, in defiance of the existing law, the Puritan incumbents had succeeded in putting down in a great number of parishes. This result was effected to some extent for the time, but a quarter of a century later, when Laud began his campaign for the restoration of deaconry and order, in other words for the restoration of the ancient church to which the Puritans objected, he was met by an opposition so widespread and deep-rooted that, though ultimately it had lasting results, the immediate effect was to bring about his own fall and contribute largely to the outbreak of the Rebellion, the authors of which were approximately co-extensive with the Puritan party.

During the Civil War and the Commonwealth the Puritan mobs wrecked the churches, the bishops were imprisoned and the primates beheaded, the supremacy over the Church was transferred from the Crown to the Parliament, the Solemn League and Covenant was accepted for the whole nation, and the Westminster Assembly, almost entirely composed of Puritans, was appointed as a permanent committee for the reform of the Church. Next the Anglican clergy were turned out of their benefices to make way for Puritans, in whose behalf the Presbyterian form of government was accepted for the whole nation, and the Westminster Assembly, almost entirely composed of Puritans, was appointed as a permanent committee for the reform of the Church. Finally the Anglican service was restored, and original complaints, the most extravagant doctrines sprung up and built themselves conventicles. There was licence for all, save for popery and tyranny, which were now persecuted with equal severity. When Cromwell attained Anglican sacrament just one as to quality. This caused much controversy and led eventually in 1710 to the Occasional Conformity Act which required all clergy to check it. This Act was repealed in 1718, but many of the Nonconformists themselves disapproved of the practice on conscientious grounds, and, though it was often resorted to and caused grave scandals, those who resorted to it could not be fairly taken as representative of the whole. Between 1730 and 1828, the year before the Catholic Emancipation Act was passed, the Catholics and the Nonconformists combined their forces to obtain both objects.

Although by the passing of the Toleration Act of 1689 the condition of the Nonconformists was so much improved, they barged in the eighteenth century into the prevailing religious torpor, and seemed to be on the verge of extinction. They were rescued from this state by the outbreak of the great Methodist movement, which resulted both in arousing the existing Dissenting sects to a new vigour, and in adding another which exceeded them all in numbers and enthusiasm.

Present Condition.—At the present day the Nonconformists in England, the only country to which this name with its implications applies, are very numerous and constitute a powerful religious, social, and political force. As they have effectually resisted the taking of a religious Census department, it is impossible to ascertain their numbers accurately, for their own statistics are suspect of exaggeration. According to Mr. Howard Evans’s statistics (as given in the Daily Mail “Year Book of the Churches” for 1908), the Baptists then reckoned 405,756 communicants, the Congregationalists 459,983, and the various denominations of Methodists 1,174,962—which figures are to be added those of the highly indeterminate number of “adherents” who are not accepted as communicants. It will be seen from this list that the Methodists are by far the largest, and are the only one of the whole, but they are the most subdivided. It will be noticed, too, that the Presbyterians, once so numerous in the country, have no place among the larger sects. The Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, are allotted 17,757 communicants by Evans. Besides these there are innumerable small sects, of which the Plymouth Brethren and the Swedenborgians are the most conspicuous. (For the separate denominations see the special articles, Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterianism; Friends, Society of.)

None.—II. Origin of None:—According to an ancient Greek and Roman custom, the day was, like the night, divided into four parts, each consisting of three hours. As the last hour of each division gave its name to the respective quarter of the day, the third division from sunset (about 5 p.m.) to sunset (about 8 p.m.) was called the third hour, or three hours. For this division, which was of the greatest importance in constitution, but is the only probable one, see Fracincius, “De tempore, horar. canonice.” Rome, 1571, xxi; Bona, “De divina psalmodia,” III (see also Martín and Vives). This division of the day was in vogue also among the Jews, from which the Church borrowed it (see Jerome, “In Daniel,” ch. v, 10). The following texts, moreover, favour this view: “Now Peter and John went up into the temple at the ninth hour of prayer” (Acts, i, 1); “And Cornelius said: Four days ago, unto this hour, I was praying in my house, at the ninth hour, and beheld a man stood before me” (Acts, x, 30); “Peter went up to the higher parts of the house to pray, about the sixth hour” (Acts, x, 9). The most ancient testimony refers to this custom of Terce, Sext, and None, for instance Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, the Canons of Hippolytus, and even the Teaching of the Apostles. The last-mentioned passage is preserved without, however, fixing the hours (Διὰ τὰς ἀναφοράς, u. vii).

Clement of Alexandria and likewise Tertullian, as early as the end of the second century, expressly mention the hours of Terce, Sext, and None, as specially set apart for prayer (Clement, “Strom,” VII, vii, in P. G., IX, 455–5). Tertullian says explicitly that we must always pray, and that there is no time prescribed for prayer; he adds, nevertheless, these significant words: “As regards the time, there should be no lax observation of certain hours—I mean of those common and peculiarly religious times. We may pray at the diversions of the day, the third, the sixth, and the ninth, and which we may observe in Scripture to be more solemn than the rest” (“De Orat.”, xxiii, xxy, in P. L., I, 1191–3).

Clement and Tertullian in these passages refer only to private prayer at these hours. The Canons of Hippolytus also speak of Terce, Sext, and None, as suitable hours for private prayer; however, on the two station days, Wednesday and Friday, when the faithful assembled in the church, and perhaps on Sundays, these hours were recited successively in public (can. xxvi, xxvii). And Tertullian mentions the same hours as having been observed under the Old Law, and advices reasons for the Christians observing them also (“De Orat.”, xxxiv, in P. L., IV, 541). In the fourth century there is evidence to show that the practice had become obligatory, at least for the monks (see the text of the Apostolic Constitutions, St. Jerome, St. Basil, the author of the “De virginitate” in Buxner-Biron, op. cit. in bibliography, pp. 116, 121, 123, 129, 186). The prayer of Prime, at six o’clock in the morning, was not added till a later date, but Vespers goes back to the earliest days. The texts we have cited give no information as to what these prayers consisted of. Evidently they contained the same elements as all other prayers of that time—psalms recited or chanted, canticles or hymns, either privately composed or drawn from Holy Writ, and litanies or prayers properly so-called.

None from the Fourth to the Seventh Century.—The eighteenth canon of the Council of Laodicea (between 313 and 314) orders that the same prayers be always said at None and Vespers. But it is not clear what meaning is to be attached to the words λατερήσα τῶν Ἑλλήνων, used in the canon. It is likely that reference is made to the famous litanies, in which prayer was offered for the catechumens, sinners, the faithful, and generally for all the wants of the Church. Sozomen (in a passage, however, which is not considered very authentic) speaks of three psalms which the monks recited at None. In any case, this number became a rule of the Fathers. Ambrose speaks of three hours of prayer, and, if with many critics we attribute to him the three hymns "Jam surgit hora tertia", "Bis ternas horas explices", and "Ter horas trina solviturn", we shall have a new constitutive element of the Little Hours in the fourth century in the Church of Milan (Anastasius, "De virginitate", III, iv, p. 1. L., XVI, 225).

In the "Peregrinatio ad loca sancta" of Etheria (end of fourth century), there is a more detailed description of the Office of None. It resembles that of Sext, and is celebrated in the basilica of the Anastasius. It is composed of a psalm, a versicle, and a versicle and antiphon; then the bishop arrives, enters the grotto of the Resurrection, recites a prayer there, and blesses the faithful ("Peregrinatio"), p. 16; cf. Cabrol, "Etude sur la P. S. Benedicti". 43). During Lent, None is celebrated in the church of Sen.; on Sundays the office is not celebrated, the hour of prayer is Saturday, but on Good Friday it is celebrated with special solemnity (Peregrinatio, pp. 53. 66, etc.). But it is only in the succeeding age that we find a complete description of None, as of the other offices of the day.

III. NONE IN THE ROMAN AND OTHER LITURGIES FROM THE SEVENTH CENTURY. — In the Rule of St. Benedict the four Little Hours of the day (Prime to None) are conceived on the same plan, the formula alone varying. The office begins with Deus in adiutoriam, like all the Hours; then follows a hymn, special to None; three psalms, which do not change (Ps. exxv, exxvi, exxvii), except on Sundays and Mondays when they are replaced by three groups of eight verses from Ps. exxviii; then the capitulum, a versicle, the Kyrie, the Pater, the oratio, and the concluding prayers (Regula S. P. Benedicti, xvii). In the Roman Liturgy the office of None is likewise constructed after the same tradition of the above two offices, and the groups of the same elements as in the Rule of St. Benedict, with this difference that, instead of the three psalms, exxv-x-xvii, the three groups of eight verses from Ps. exxviii are always recited. There is nothing else characteristic of this office in this liturgy. The hymns, which was added later, is the one already in use in the Benedectine Office—"Renum Deus tenax vigor". In the monastic rules prior to the tenth century certain variations are found. Thus in the Rule of Lerins, as in that of St. Caesarius, six psalms are recited at None, as at Terce and Sext, with antiphon, hymn, and capitulum.

St. Aurelian follows the same tradition in his Rule "Ad virgines", but he imposes twelve psalms at each hour on the monks. St. Columbanus, St. Fructuosus, and St. Isidore adopt the system of three psalms (cf. Martène, "De antiqu. monach. rit.", IV, 27). Like St. Benedict, most of these authors include hymns, the capitulum, and an antiphon (cf. Martène, loc. cit.). In the ninth and tenth centuries we find some additions made to the Office of None, in particular litanies, collects, etc. (Martène, op. cit., IV, 28).

IV. MEANING AND SYMBOLISM OF NONE. — Among the ancient custom of None was regarded as the close of the day's business and the time for the baths and supper (Martini, "Epigramps", IV, viii; Hornec, "Epistoles", I, vii, 70). At an early date mystical reasons for the division of the day were sought. St. Cyprian sees in the hours of Terce, Sext and None, which come after a lapse of three hours, an allusion to the Trinity. He adds that these hours already consecrated to prayer under the Old Dispensation, have been sanctified in the New Testament by great ceremonies—Terce by the descent of the Holy Ghost on the Apostles; Sext by the prayers of St. Peter, the reception of the Gentiles into the Church; or yet again by the crucifixion of Our Lord; None by the death of Christ ("De oratione", xxix, in P. L., IV, 541). St. Augustine remarks, however, that St. Cyprian chose these times, and that the Apostles Peter and John were wont to go to the Temple to pray ("Regulae f. tract.", XXXVII, n. 3, in P. G., XXXI, 1013 sq.). Cassian, who adopts the Syrian interpretation for Terce and Sext, sees in the hour of None the descent of Christ into hell (De cenob. instiit., III, 35). But, as a rule, it is the death of Christ that is commemorated at the Hour of None.

The writers of the Middle Ages have sought for other mystical explanations of the Hour of None. Amalarius (III, vi) explains at length, how, like the sun which sinks on the horizon at the Hour of None, man's spirit tends to lower itself also, is more open to temptation, and it is the time the demon selects to try him. For the texts of the Fathers on this subject it will suffice to refer the reader to the above-mentioned work of Cardinal Bona (c. ix). The same writers also fail to remark that the number nine was considered holy by the ancient Jews, not the number ten, an incomplete number, ten being considered perfection and the complete number. Nine was also the number of mourning. Among the ancient the ninth day was a day of expiation and funeral service—coronellae sacram, the origin of the names for the days of the week.

As for the ninth hour, some persons believe that it is the hour at which our first parents were driven from the Garden of Paradise (Bona, op. cit., ix, § 2). In conclusion, it is necessary to call attention to a practice which emphasized the Hour of None—it was the hour of fasting. At first, the hour of fasting was prolonged to Vespers, that is to say, food was taken only in the evening or at the end of the day. Mitigation of this rigorous practice was soon introduced. Tertullian's famous pamphlet "De jejunio", rails at length against the Psychics (i.e. the Catholics) who ended their fast with grace at None. It is only in the fourth century that we find a change in the use of None. In the fifth century, Tertullian, author of the pamphlet, claims that he is faithful to the ancient custom. The practice of breaking the fast at None caused that hour to be selected for Mass and Communion, which were the signs of the close of the day. The distinction between the rigorous fast, which was prolonged to Vespers, and the mitigated fast, ending at None, is met with in a large number of ancient documents (see fast).

F. CARROLL

Non Expedit (It is not expedient).—Words with which the Holy See enjoined upon Italian Catholics the policy of abstention from the polls in parliamentary elections. This policy was adopted after a period of uncertainty and of controversy which followed the promulgation of the Constitution of the Kingdom of Italy (1860) and the establishment of the Monarchy. This period, a time of difficulty for the Church and, especially, to the religious orders (1865-66). To this uncertainty the Holy Penitentiary put an end by its decree of 29 February,
Non-Jurors

1868, in which, in the above words, it sanctioned the motto; "Neither elector nor elected!" Until then there had been in the Italian Parliament a few evenings of the debate by some of the bishops and others. The principal motive of this decree was that the oath taken by deputies might be interpreted as an approval of the abolition of the Holy See, as Pius IX declared in an audience of 11 October, 1871. A practical reason for it, also, was that, in view of the election law of the day, by which a deputy was reduced to 650,000, and as the Government manipulated the elections to suit its own purposes, it would have been hopeless to attempt to prevent the passage of anti-Catholic laws. On the other hand, the masses seemed unprepared for parliamentary government, and, as in the greater portion of Italy (Parma, Modena, Tuscany, the Pontifical States, and the Kingdom of Naples), nearly all sincere Catholics were partisans of the dispossessed princes, they were liable to be denounced as enemies of Italy; they would also have been at variance with the Catholics of Piedmont and of the provinces wrested from Austria, and this division would have further weakened the Catholic Parliamentary group.

As might be expected, this measure did not meet with universal approval: the so-called Moderates accused the Catholics of failing in their duty to society, and, by their country's request having been extended, Leo XIII took into serious consideration the partial abolition of the restrictions established by the Non Expedit, but nothing was actually done (cf. "Archiv für kathol. Kirchengech.", 1904, p. 396). On the contrary, as many people came to the conclusion that the Non Expedit was not intended to be absolute, but was only an admonition made to apply upon any particular occasion, the Holy Office declared (30 Dec., 1896) that the rule in question implied a grave precept, and emphasis was given to this fact on several subsequent occasions (Letter of Leo XIII to the Cardinal Secretary of State, 14 May, 1893; Congregation of Extraordinary Affairs, 27 January, 1902; Pius X, Motu proprio, 18 Dec., 1903). Later, Pius X, by his encyclical "Il femto proposito" (11 June, 1905) modified the Non Expedit, declaring that, when there was question of preventing the election of a "subversive" or "dangerous" candidate, the suspension of the rule, and invite the Catholics to hold themselves in readiness to go to the polls. (See Mar- gotti, Giacomo.)

Non-Jurors, the name given to the Anglican Churchmen who in 1698 refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, and their successors under the Protestant Succession Act of that year. Their leaders on the episcopal bench (William Sare, the Bishop of Norwich, Thomas White of Peterborough, William Thomas of Worcester, Thomas Ken of Bath and Wells, John Luke of Chester, and Thomas Cartwright of Chester) were required to take the oath before 1 August, under pain of suspension, to be followed, if it were not taken by 1 Feb., by total deprivation. Two of them died before this last date, but the rest, persisting in their refusal, were deprived. Their example was followed by a multitude of the clergy and laity, the number of the former being estimated at about four hundred. Among the chief were Thomas Burnet, Dean of Worcester, Jeremy Collier, John Kettlewell, and Robert Nelson. A list of these Non-jurors is given in Hickes's "Memoirs of Bishop Kettlewell", and, one further completed in Overton's "Non-jurors". The original Non-jurors were not friendly towards James II; indeed five of these bishops had been among the seven whose resistance to his Declaration of Indulgence earlier in the same year had contributed to the invitation which caused the Prince of Orange to come over.

But during the latter part of the reign they distinguished between this and accepting them as sovereigns, regarding the latter as inconsistent with the oath taken to James. Deprived of their benefices the bishops fell into great poverty, and suffered occasional though not systematic persecution. That they were truly conscientious is attested by the sacrifices courageously made for their convictions. Their lives were edifying, some consenting to attend, as laymen, the services in the parish churches. Still, when circumstances permitted, they held secret services of their own, for they firmly believed that they had the true Anglican succession, which it was their duty to preserve. Hence they felt, after some hesitation, that it was incumbent on them to conciliate others who should succeed them. The first who were thus conciliated, on 24 Feb., 1695, were George Hedges and John Wagstaffe. On 29 May, 1713, the other Non-jurors, bishops being all on Christianity, Nonnotte published, Collier, Samuel Hawes, and Nathaniel Spinks. When James II died in 1701, a crisis arose for these separatists. Some of them then rejoined the main body of their co-religionists, whilst others held out on the ground that their oath had been both to James and to a rightful heir to William, and latterwards disagreed among themselves over a question of a nature not clearly defined. The death of Charles Edward in 1788 took away the raison d'être for the schism, but a few lingered on till the end of the eighteenth century. In Scotland in 1830 the whole body of Bishops refused the oath and became Non-jurors, but the Non-jurors in England was somewhat different. As soon as the Revolution broke out the Presbyterians ousted the Episcopalians and became the Established Kirk of Scotland. Thus the Non-jurors were left without rivals of their own communion, though they had at times to suffer penalties for celebrating unlawful worship. Their difficulties terminated in 1788, when on the death of Charles Edward they saw no further reason for withholding the oath to George III.

Nonnus, of Panopolis in Upper Egypt (c. 400), the reputed author of two poems in hexameters; one, Dionysius, about the mysteries of Bacchus, and the other the "Paraphrase of the Fourth Gospel". Driescal proposes Apollinaries of Laodicea (Theol. Litteraturzeitung, 1891, 352), and a fourteenth-century anonymous "Lamentation..." are the author of the "Paraphrase", but the similarity of style makes it very probable that the two poems have the same author. Nonnus would then seem to have been a pagan when he wrote the first, and afterwards to have become a Christian. Nothing else is known of his life. The "Paraphrase" is not a complete work: 3750 lines of it, however, have been divided into twenty-one chapters, as the text its author used, and has been studied as a source of textual criticism (Blass, "Evang. sec. loh. cum variae lectionis defectu", Leipzig, 1902; Jonsen in "Phonetische Untersuchungen", XXIII, 4, Leipzig, 1903). Otherwise too it is little used, and is merely a repetition of the Gospel, verse by verse, inflated with fantastic epithets and the addition of imaginary details. The "Paraphrase" was first published by the Altdie Presse in 1590. The edition of Heinsohn (Leiden, 1627) is reprinted in P. G. XI, 719-1228. The best modern edition is by Scheunert: "Nonni Panopolitani paraphrasis s. evang. Ioannet" (Leipzig, 1801).

Nonbert, Saint, b. at Xanten on the left bank of the Rhine, near Wesel, c. 1050; d. at Magdeburg, 6 June, 1131. His father, Heribert, Count of Gennep, was related to the imperial house of Germany, and his mother, Anna, Countess of the agrarian house of Lorraine. A stately bearing, a penetrating intellect, a tender, earnest heart, marked the future apostle. Ordained subdeacon, Nonbert was appointed to a canony at Xanten. Soon after he was summoned to the Court of Frederick, Prince-Bishop of Cologne, and later to that of Henry V, Emperor of Germany, whose allowance he became. The Bishop of Cambrai was offered to him, but refused. Nonbert allowed himself to be so carried away by pleasure that nothing short of a miracle of grace could make him lead the life of an earnest cleric. One day, while riding to Vreden, a village near Xanten, he was overtaken by a storm. A thunderbolt fell at his horse's feet; the fright of Nonnus drove him nearly an hour he lay like one dead. Thus humble, Nonbert became a sincere penitent. Renouncing his appointment at Court, he retired to Xanten to lead a life of penance.

Understanding, however, that he stood in need of guidance, he placed himself under the direction of Cono, Archbishop of Siegburg. Nonbert founded the Abbey of Fürstenberg, endowed it with a portion of his property, and made it over to Cono and his Benedictine successors. Nonbert was then in his thirty-fifth year. Feeling that he was called to the priesthood, he presented himself to the Bishop of Cologne, from whose hands he received Holy Orders. After a forty days' retreat at Siegburg Abbey, he celebrated his first Mass at Xanten and preached an earnest discourse on the transitory character of this world's pleasures and on man's duties towards God. The insinuations of some young clerics, one of whom a friend of Nonbert gave shelter, led him, with wonderful patience on that occasion, to ordain him to the clergy, to confer with Cono, or to the cell of Lodolph, a holy and learned hermit-priest, or to the Abbey of Klosterath near Rodeln. Accused as an innovator at the Council of Fritzlar, he resigned all his ecclesiastical preferments, disposed of his estate, and gave it to the poor, reserving for himself only what was needed for the celebration of Holy Mass. Barefooted and begging his bread, he journeyed as far as St. Giles, in Languedoc, to confer with Pope Gelasius concerning his future life. Unable to keep Nonbert at his court, Gelasius granted him faculties to preach wherever he judged proper. At Valenciennes Norbert met (March, 1119) Burchard, Bishop of Cambrai, whose chaplain joined him in his apostolic journeys in France and Belgium. After the death of Pope Gelasius (29 January, 1119) Norbert wished to confer with his successor, Calixtus II, at the Council of Reims (Oct., 1119). The pope and Bartholomew, Bishop of Laon, requested Norbert to found a religious order in the Diocese of Laon, so that his work might be perpetuated after his death. Norbert chose a lonely, marshy valley, shaped in the form of a cross, in the Forest of Coye, about ten miles from Laon, and named Pariniac. Hugh of Fosses, Everard of Cambrai, Aimeric of Nomé, and other celebrated school of Anselm, and Ralph at Laon were his first disciples. The young community at first lived in huts of wood and clay, arranged like a camp around the church of St. John the Baptist, but they soon built a larger church and a monastery for the religious who joined them in increasing numbers. Going to Cologne to obtain relics for their church, Norbert discovered, through a vision, the spot where those of St. Ursula and her companions, of St. Gereon, and of other martyrs lay hidden.

Women also wished to become members of the new religious order, and so a second house of nuns was established at Vouillé, near Poitiers. Raymond of Castres, St. Norbert's first spiritual daughter, and her example was followed by women of the best families of France and Germany. Soon after this, Norbert returned to Germany and preached in Westphalia, where Godfrey, Count of Kappenberg, offered himself and gave three churches to be turned into abbeys. On his return from Germany, Norbert was met by Theobald, Count of Champagne, who wished to become a member of the order; but Norbert insisted that God wished Theobald to marry and do good in the world. Theobald agreed to this, but begged Norbert to prescribe a rule of life. Norbert prescribed a few monastic rules, the old life with the white scapular of the order, and thus, in 1122, the Third Order of St. Norbert was instituted. The saint was soon requested by the Bishop of Cambrai to go and combat the infamous heresies which Tanchelin had propagated, and which had their center at Antwerp. At the height of his preaching the people of the Low Countries abjured their heresies, and many brought back to him the Sacred Species which they had stolen and profaned. In commemoration of this, St. Norbert has been proclaimed the Apostle of Antwerp, and the feast of his triumph over the Sacred Species is celebrated in the Archdiocese of Mechlin on 11 July.

The rapid growth of the order was marvellous, and bishops entrusted Norbert to found new houses in their dioceses. Floreffe, Viviers, St.-Josse, Ardenu, Cuisy, Laon, Liège, Antwerp, Varkar, Kappenberg and other churches joined the order during the first years of the order's existence. Though the order had already been approved by the pope's legates, Norbert, accompanied by three disciples, journeyed to Rome, in 1125, to obtain its confirmation by the new pope, Honorius II. The Bull of Confirmation is dated 27 February, 1126. Passing through Wurzburg on his return to Prémontré, Norbert restored sight to a blind woman; the inhabitants were so full of admiration for him that they spoke of electing him successor to their bishop who had just died, but Norbert and his companions fled secretly. Soon after this, on his way to Ratisbon, he passed through Speier, where Lothair, King of the Romans, was holding court. The bishop, Tanchelin, being present. Deputies from Magdeburg had also come to solicit a successor to their late archbishop, Rudiger.

The papal legate and Lothair used their authority, and obliged Norbert to accept the vacant see. On taking possession of it, he was grieved to find that much property belonging to the Church and the poor had been usurped by powerful men, and that many of the clergy led scandalous lives. He succeeded in converting some of the transgressors, but others only became more obstinate, and three attempts were made on his life. He resisted Pietro di Leoni, who, as anti-pope, had assumed the name of Amalethus and was master in Rome, exercising himself at the Council of Reims to attach the German Emperor and the German bishops and princes more firmly to the cause of Pope Innocent II.

Though his health was increasingly delicate, Norbert accompanied Lothair and his army to Rome to put the rightful pope on the Chair of St. Peter, and he resisted the pope's concession of the investiture to the emperor. Norbert, whose health was now much impaired, accompanied the Emperor Lothair back to Germany and for some time remained with him, as his counsellor as his chancellor and adviser. In March, 1134, Norbert had become so feeble that he had to be carried to Magdeburg where he died on the Wednesday after Pentecost. By order of the emperor, his body was laid at rest in the Norbertine Abbey of St. Mary, at Magdeburg. His tomb became glorious by the numerous miracles wrought there. The Bollandists say that there is no document to prove that he was canonized by Innocent III. His canonization was by Gregory XIII in 1582, and his cultus was extended to the whole church by Clement X.

On May 27, 1627, the saint's body was translated from Magdeburg, then in the hands of Protestants, to the Abbey of Strahov, a suburb of Prague in Bohemia. The Chancery of Prague preserved the abjurations of six hundred Protessants who, on the day, or for the octave of the translation, were reduced to the Church of Prague. On the death of the Archbishop of Prague, at the request of the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, proclaimed St. Norbert the Patron and Protector of Bohemia. (For history of the order, see PREMONSTRATENSIAN CANONS.)

Until the middle of the last century, the principal source for the biography of St. Norbert was a MS. usually attributed to Huc, the saint's first disciple and successor, of which numerous copies had been made. The most important one belongs to the Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, near Coblenz, Titia Norberti, autore canonico probatissimi Hugonis abbatis, Fontanae, is now in the British Museum. An abridgment of this was printed in 1622, with a new edition in 1748. One of the most famous of the variants, was published by Andre Vander Sterre in 1636; anew, with commentaries, note by P. Brodick, Acta SS., XX. Then followed Vander Sterre, Het leven van den H. Norbertus (Antwerp, 1623); de Pré, La Vie de S. Norbert (Paris, 1627); C. E. Loisy, La Vie de S. Norbert (Luxemburg, 1874); Illana, Historia del Gran Padre y Patrona de S. Norberto (Salamanca, 1673).

In 1836 a MS. of St. Norbert was discovered in the Royal Library, Berlin, was published in Pertz, Mon. Germ. Hist., differing in many particulars from the previously published works. This discovery occasioned a great revival of interest in the subject, and there followed: Tencrive, De S. Norberto Ord. Praem. Constituta historia commentaria (Antwerp, 1655), etc.; V. N. Norbert (Rudolf, 1859), Winter, Die Pramunstrassener der II. Jahrh., (Berlin, 1859); Rosenkroen, Die altesten Biographien der h. Norberts (Berlin, 1871); Herbst, Leben des h. Norbert (Kaplen, 1881); Maderbacher, Die steigten Papsttide des 15. Jahrh. (Innsbruck, 1885). In the following three works, the publication of Pera and other little discovered documents have been used: Greedens, Life of St. Norbert (London, 1860); Madelaine, Histoire de S. Norbert (Lilie, 1880), the fullest and best written biography of the saint so far published: v/dt van den Eiken, Levensgeschiedenis van den h. Norbertus (Averbode, 1860).
Thomas, Third Duke, was the eldest son of Thomas Howard, second duke, and Elizabeth, daughter of Sir P. Tilney of Ashwellthorpe Hall, Norfolk. In 1545 he married Lady Anne, daughter of Edward IV. He fought as captain of the vanguard at Flodden Field in 1513. In 1514 he was created Earl of Surrey, and joined his father in opposing Wolsey's policy of depressing the old nobility. In 1520–21 he endeavoured to keep peace in Ireland; received the commission of the English fleet against France, and successfully opposed the French in Scotland. In 1524 he became duke, and was appointed commissioner to treat for peace with France. With peace abroad came the burning question of Henry's divorce. Norfolk, uncle of Anne Boleyn, sided with the king and, as president of the privy council, hastened the cardinal's ruin. He became Henry's tool in dishonourable purposes and he acquiesced in his lust for the spiritual supremacy. With Cromwell he obtained a grant of a portion of the possessions of the Priory of Lewes and other monastic spoils. He was created earl marshal in 1533. In 1535 Norfolk was a leading judge in the trial of Sir Thomas More. In 1536 he disbanded the "Pilgrimage of Grace" with false assurances, but returned next year to do "dreadful execution." In 1539 he hanged in chains, at York, Frotiers, Rochester and Walworth, two Carthusians. Drastic measures of devastation marked his whole career as a military leader. He shared the King's zeal against the inroads of German Protestantism. In 1534 he had "staid purgatory" and was always in favour of the old orthodoxy, as far as he might be allowed. In 1539, when the bishops could not agree concerning the practices of religion, Norfolk proposed the Six Articles to the Lords, theology thus becoming matter for the whole House. As an old man he served against a rising in Scotland, and in the French wars of 1544. In 1546 he was accused of high treason. Evidence, however, was not conclusive against him until Hertford, and other keen enemies, prevailed upon him, as a prisoner in the Tower, to sign his confession and throw himself on the King's mercy. A bill of attaint was passed in Parliament, and orders for his immediate execution would have been carried into effect had not Henry died on the previous evening. He remained a prisoner in the Tower the whole of Edward VI's reign but was released on Mary's accession, and restored to the dukedom in 1553.

His long experience as lord high steward and chamberlain-general made him useful to the queen, and he lost favour by his rashness and his failure to crush Wyatt's rebellion. [See Gairdner, "Lollardy and the Reformation" (London, 1908); Gairdner, "Hist. of Eng. Church in XVth Century" (London, 1902); "Letters and Papers, Henry VIII", various volumes; Crofton, "Dict. of Nat. Biog.", X (London, 1908).]

Thomas, Fourth Duke, was the son of Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey and Frances Vere, daughter of John, Earl of Oxford. After the execution of his father, in 1547, he was, by order of privy council, committed to the charge of his aunt, and Foye, "the martyrlogist," was assigned as his tutor, probably to educate him in Protestant principles. In 1553, when Mary released his grandfather from prison, Bishop White of Lincoln became the bishop of Arundel, but Henry was expelled from king's service by the new bishop. Norfolk's position was then weak, and he was given a part in the expulsion of the French troops from Scotland. With other commissioners, he was appointed to sit at York and inquire into the causes of the variance between Mary Stuart and her subjects. Circumstances, at the beginning of 1569, combined to awaken the fears of English nobles, and Arundel, Pembroke, Leicester, and others saw the advantage to be gained by the marriage, first suggested by Maitland, between Norfolk and Mary; that when married she might be safely restored to the Scottish throne and be recognized as Elizabeth's successor. Protestant nobles, however, looked on the affair with suspicion, and Catholic lords in the north were impatient of long delay. But, even after the council had voted for the settlement of the English succession by Mary's marriage with an English noble, Norfolk concerted with great caution, withdrew from court, aroused Elizabeth's suspicion and was committed to the Tower, in October, 1569. On his abjuration submission to the queen and renunciation of all purpose of his alliance with Mary, he was released in 1570. He did not keep his promise; he continued to correspond with the Queen of Scots, was found to be in negotiation with Ridolfi, and through him with Philip and the Catholic Powers abroad, concerning an invasion of England. He was arraigned for high treason in 1571. After eighteen weeks' confinement in the Tower, deprived of books, informed of the trial only on the previous evening, kept in the Tower until the charges were read to him, he was hanged in the Tower, eleven months after his arrest, on 18th June, 1572, he was executed. His sympathies seemed to be always with the Catholic party, but his policy was two-faced, and he was a professed adherent of the Reformed religion. Circumstances made it expedient for him always to temporize. He seems to have been led on by the course of events and not to have realized the result of his actions. Noris, Henry, Cardinal, b. at Verona, 29 August, 1631, of English ancestry; d. at Rome, 23 Feb., 1704. He studied under the Jesuits at Rimini, and there engaged the novitate of the Society of Jesus in 1648. After his profession he was sent to Rome to study theology. He taught the sacred sciences at Pescara, Pernagia, and Padua, where he held the chair of church history in the university from 1674 to 1692. There he completed "The History of Pelagianism", and "Discussions on the Fifth General Council", the two works which, before and after his death, occasioned much controversy. Together with the "Vindiciae Augustiniana" they were printed at Padua in 1673, having been approved by a special commission at Rome. Noris himself went to Rome to give an account of his orthodoxy before this commission; and Clement XI named him one of the examiners of the Holy Office, in recognition of his learning and sound doctrine. But, after the publication of these works, further charges were made against him of teaching the errors of Jansenius and Bainis. In a brief to the prefect of the Spanish Inquisition, 31 July, 1718, ordering a revision of the English books, Benedict XIV says that these charges were never proved; that they were rejected repeatedly by the Holy Office, and repudiated by the popes who had honoured him. In 1692 Noris was made assistant librarian in the Vatican by Innocent XII. On 12 December, 1694, he was named chaplain of the dead of the title of S. Agostino. In 1700 he was given full charge of the Vatican Library. His works, apart from some...
Normandy, ancient French province, from which five "departments" were formed in 1790: Seine-Inférieure (Archidioces of Rouen), Eure (Diocese of Evreux), Calvados (Diocese of Bayeux), Orne (Diocese of Sées), Manche (Diocese of Coutances). The Normans, originally Danois or Norwegian pirates, who from the tenth to the twelfth centuries invaded Italy, made their way into France, gave their name to this province. In the Gallo-Roman period Normandy formed the so-called second Lyonnaise county (Secunda Lugdunensis). At Thorigny within the territory of this province was found an inscription very important for the history of the worship of the emperors in Gaul and of the provincial assemblies; the latter, thus meeting for this worship, kept up a certain autonomy throughout the conquered territory of Gaul. Under the Merovingians the Kingdom of Neustria annexed Normandy. About 864-876 by the bands of pillagers opened the first of many Norman invasions. The policy of Charles the Bald in giving money or lands to some of the Northmen for defending his land against other bands was unfortunate, as these adventurers readily broke their oath. In the course of their invasions they slew (885) the Bishop of Bayeux and (889) the Bishop of Rouen. The triumph of the conquests of the Norman, Wulfrun, marked a new policy on the part of the Carolingians; instead of regarding the invaders as intruders it was admitted that they might become Christians. Unlike the Saracens, then disturbing Europe, the Northmen were admitted to a place and a realm as Christsmen. The good fortune of the Northmen began with Rollo in Normandy itself. It was long believed that Rollo came by sea into the valley of the Seine in 876, but the date is rather 866. He destroyed Bayeux, pillaged Lisieux, besieged Paris, and reached Lorraine, finally establishing himself at Rouen, where a truce was concluded. This installation was considered so definitive that in the beginning of the tenth century Witte, Archbishop of Rouen, consulted the Archbishop of Reims as to the means of converting the Normans. Rollo's settlement in Normandy was ratified by the Treaty of St. Clair-sur-Epte (911), providing only a very tenuous agreement between Rollo and Charles the Simple. As Duke of Normandy Rollo remained faithful to the Carolingian dynasty in its struggles with the ancestors of the future Capetians. These cordial relations between the ducal family of Normandy and French royalty provoked under Rollo's son William the Conqueror a revolt of the pagan Northmen settled in Cotentin and Bessin. One of their lords (jorls), Ruffin by name, was the leader of the movement. The rebels re-proached the duke with being no longer a true Scandinavian and "treating the French as his kinsmen." Triumphant for a time, they were finally routed and the aristocratic spirit of the jorls had to bow before the monarchical principles which William Longsword insisted into his government.

Another attempt at a revival of paganism was made under Richard I Sains Paveur (the Fearless, 942-96). He was only two years old at his father's death. A year later (943) the Scandinavian Setre, landing in Normandy with a band of pirates, invaded a number of Christian districts, and was followed by a Turfman who sought to make a pagan of the young duke. Hugh the Great, Duke of France, and Louis IV, King of France, defeated these invaders and after their victory both sought to set up their own power in Normandy to the detriment of the young Richard who Louis IV had held for a few years in Normandy. The landing in Normandy of the King of Denmark, Harold Bluetooth, and the defeat of Louis IV, held prisoner for a time (945), constrained the latter to sign the treaty of Gerberoy, by which the young Duke Richard was re-established in his possessions, and became, according to the chronicler Dudo of Saint-Quentin, a sort of King of Normandy. The attacks later directed against Richard by the Carolingian King Lothaire and Tibo le Tricheur, Count of Chartres, brought a fresh descent on France of the soldiers of Harold Bluetooth. Ascending the Seine the Danes were defeated by Bishop Charles, when that they withdrew, according to the chronicler Guillaume of Jumièges, there was not heared even the bark of a dog. When Duke of Chartres, brother-in-law of Richard II the Good, again threatened Normandy (996-1020), it was once more the Scandinavian chieftains, Olaf of Norway and Loeman, who came to the duke's aid. So attached were these Scandinavians to paganism that their leader Olaf, having been baptized by the Archbishop of Rouen, was slain by them. Although they had become Christian, all traces of Scandinavian paganism did not disappear under the first dukes of Normandy. Rollo walked barefoot before the relicary of St. Owen, but he caused many relics to be sold in England, and on his death-bed, according to Adiūnari de Chalennes, simultaneously caused prisoners to be sacrificed to the Scandinavian gods and gave much gold to the churches. Richard I was a great builder of churches, among them St. Owen and the Fourth provincial capital of Rouen, St. Michel du Mont, and the Trinity at Fécamp. Richard II, zealous for monastic reform, brought from Burgundy Guillaume de St. Bénigne; the Abbey of Fécamp, restored by him, became a model monastery and a much frequented school. In these days passed over by the Church the feudal power of the Church, which in many States at that time limited the central power, was but little developed in Normandy, and it was to their kinsmen that the dukes of Normandy most often gave the Archdiocese of Rouen and other sees. Ecclesiastical life in Normandy was vigorous and well-developed; previous to the eleventh century the rural parishes were almost as numerous as they are to-day. Thus Normandy for nearly a century and a half was at once a sort of promontory of the Christian world in face of Scandinavia and at the same time a coign of Scandinavia thrust into the Christian world. Henceforth these Danes and Scandinavians who under the name of Normans formed a part of Christendom, never called pagan Danes or Scandinavians to their aid unless threatened in the possession of Normandy; under their domination the land became a stronghold of Christianity. The monastery of Fontenelle (q. v.) pursued its ancient and literary activities in the Merovingian period. The "Chronicon Fontanelense", continued to 1010, is an important source for the history of the period. The ducal family of Normandy early determined to have an historiographer whom they sought in France, one Dudo, dean of the chapter of St. Quentin, who between 1015-30 wrote in Latin half verse, half prose, a history of the family according to the traditions and accounts transmitted to him by his Count. Geoffrey, grandson of Robert, and father of Richard Aline. Duke Robert the Devil (1027–35) was already powerful enough to interfere efficaciously in the struggles of Henry I of France against his own brother and the Counts of Champagne and Flanders. In gratitude the king bestowed on Robert the Devil, Pontoute, Chaumont en Vexin, and the whole of Flanders and Normandy, which the Devil that the duel family of Normandy first cast covetous glances towards England. He sent an embassy to the Great, King of England, in order that the sons of Ethelred, Alfred and Edward, might recover their patrimony. The petition having been denied he made ready a naval expedition against England, destroyed by a tempest. He died while on a pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre.

It was reserved for his son William the Bastard, later called William the Conqueror, to make England a Norman colony by the expedition which resulted in the victory of Hastings or Senlac (1066). It seemed, then, that in the second half of the eleventh century a sort of Norman imperialism was to arise in England, but the testament of William the Conqueror which left Normandy to Robert Count-heuse and England to William Rufus, marked the separation of the two countries. The Conqueror, the son of the shepherd Guillaume the Abbot and his wife Matilda, was unable to go to England because of the short strife which Robert wagged, first against William Rufus, afterwards against his third brother Henry I Beaucelle, terminated in 1106 with the battle of Tinchebray, after which he was taken prisoner and brought to Cardiff. Thenceforth Normandy was the possession of William I, King of England, and while forty years previous England seemed about to become a Norman country, it was Norman which became an English country; history no longer speaks of the duel family of Normandy but of the royal family of England. Later Henry I, denounced to the Council of Reims by Louis VI of France, explained to Calisius II in tragic terms the condition in which he had found Normandy. “The duchy,” said he, “was the prey of brigands. Priests and other servants of God were no longer honoured, and paganism had almost been restored in Normandy. The monasteries which our ancestors had founded for the repose of their souls were abandoned, everything disordered was unable to sustain themselves. The churches were given up to pillage, most of them reduced to ashes, while the priests were in hiding. Their preservers were slaying one another.” There may have been some truth in this description of Henry I; but it may have been that while the English dukes of the eleventh century, while they had prepared and realized these astounding political changes, had also developed in Normandy, with the help of the Church, a brilliant literary and artistic movement.

The Abbey of Bec was for some time, under the direction of Lanfranc and St. Anselm, the foremost school of northern France. Two Norman monasteries produced historical works of great importance, the “Historia Normannorum”, written between 1070–87 by Guillaume Calculus at the monastery of Juniciog; the “Historia Ecclesiastica” of Ordericus Vitalis, which begins with the birth of Christ and ends in 1141, written at the monastery of St. Evroult. The secular clergy of Normandy emulated the monks; in a sort of academy founded in the second half of the eleventh century by two bishops of Lisieux, Hughes of Eu and Gilbert Maman, not only theological but secular studies were disseminated. The Norman court was a kind of Academy and an active centre of literary production. The chaplain of Duchess Matilda, Gui de Ponthieu, Bishop of Amiens, composed in 1067 a Latin poem on the battle of Hastings; the chaplain of William the Conqueror, William of Poitiers, wrote the “Gesta” of his master and an extant account of the first crusade is due to another Norman, Raoul of Maucé. At the time the Norman dukes of the eleventh century restored the buildings, destroyed by the invasions of their barbarian ancestors, and a whole Romance school of architecture developed in Normandy, extending to Chartres, Pearly, Brittany, and even to England. Caen was the centre of this school, and the monuments like the Abbaye aux Dames and the Abbaye aux Hommes and the cathedrals of Caen by William and Matilda, mark an epoch in the history of Norman art.

In the course of the twelfth century the political destinies of Normandy were very uncertain. Henry I of England, master of Normandy from 1100–35, preferred to live in France and Normandy. His rule in Normandy was at first disturbed by the partisans of Guillaume Cliton, son of Robert Courte-Heuse, and later by the plot concocted against him by his own daughter Matilda, widow of Emperor Henry V, who had taken as her second husband Geoffrey Plantagenet, Count of Anjou. When Henry I died in 1135 his body was brought to England; his death without male heirs left Normandy a prey to anarchy.

For this region was immediately disputed between Henry Plantagenet, grandson of Henry I through his mother Matilda, and Thibaut of Champagne, grandson of Guillaume the Conqueror through his mother Anne. After nine years of strife Thibaut withdrew in favour of his brother Stephen who in 1135 had been crowned King of England. But the victories of Geoffrey Plantagenet in Normandy assured (1144) the rule of Henry Plantagenet over that land, which being thenceforth subject to Angevin rule, seemed destined to have no further connexion with England. Suddenly Henry Plantagenet, who in 1152 had married Eleanor (Alienor) of Aquitaine, divorced from Louis VII of France, determined to assert his rights over England itself. The naval expedition which he conducted in 1153 led Stephen to recognize him as his heir, and as Stephen died at the end of that same year Henry Plantagenet reigned over all the Anglo-Norman possessions, his territorial power being greater than that of the kings of France. A long series of wars followed between the Capetians and Plantagenets, interrupted by their allies, the Hohenstaufen, which paralyzed the power of Plantagenet, and supported all his enemies. Thomas à Becket and the other exiles who had protested against the despotism which Henry exercised against the Church, found refuge and help at the court of France; and the sons of Henry in their successors resisted against the Church, supported first by Louis VII and then by Philip Augustus.

The prestige of the Capetian kings grew in Normandy when Richard Coeur de Lion succeeded Henry II in 1189. Philip Augustus profited by the enmity between Richard and his brother John Lackland to gradually establish French domination in Normandy. A war between Richard and Philip Augustus resulted in the treaty of Issoudun (1155) by which Philip Augustus acquired for the French crown Norman Vexin and the castellans of Nonancourt, Ivry, Pacy, Vernon, and Guillon. A second war between John Lackland, King of England in 1199 and Philip Augustus, was terminated by the treaty of Gien (1200), by which John Lackland recovered Norman Vexin, but recognized the French king’s possession of the territory of Evreux and declared himself the “liege man” of Philip Augustus. Also then in 1202 Philip Augustus abrogated the civil code of the “Vernonian” Louis VI, that John Lackland, King of England, refused to submit himself to the will of Philip Augustus. Philip Augustus, the court of peers declared John a felon, under which sentence he no longer had the right to hold any fief of the crown. Philip II Augustus sanctioned the judgment of the court of peers by invading Normandy which in 1204 became a French possession. The twelfth century in Normandy was marked by the production of important works, chief of which was the “Roman de Rou” of Robert or rather Richard Wace (1100–1157), a canon of Bayeux. In this, which consists of nearly 14,000 lines, written by Robert de Sainte-More, Wace relates the history of the dukes of Normandy down to the battle of Tinclebray. Mention must also be made of the great poetic work which the Norman Ambroise wrote somewhat prior to 1196 on the Jerusalem pilgrimage of Richard Coeur de Lion. As early as the twelfth century Rouen was an important commercial centre. Guillaume de Neubrig wrote that Rouen was one of the most celebrated cities of Europe and that the Seine brought thither the commercial products of many countries. The “Établissements de Rouen” in which was drawn up the “custom” adopted by Rouen, were copied not only by the other Norman towns but by the cities with which Rouen maintained constant commercial intercourse, e.g., Angoulême, Bayonne, Cognac, St. Jean d’Angély, Niort, Poitiers, La Rochelle, Saintes, and Tours. The “ghibu” of Rouen, a powerful commercial association, possessed in England from the time of Henry I to the fourteenth century an appellation of the same name by Philip VI of France for a naval campaign against England in 1310 which resulted in the defeat of Echtze. Under John II the Good, the States of Normandy, angered by the ravages committed by Edward III of England on his landing in the province, voted (1318–50) subsidies for the conquest of England. The Valois dynasty was in great danger when Charles the Bad, King of Navarre, who possessed important lands in Normandy, succeeded in 1356 in detaching from John II of France a number of Norman barons. John II appraising the danger came suddenly to Rouen, put several barons to death, and took Charles the Bad prisoner. Shortly afterwards Normandy was one of the provinces of France most faithful to the Dauphin Charles, the future Charles V, and the hope the English entertained in 1359 of seeing Normandy ceded to them by the Prelates of London was not ratified by the treaty of Brétigny (1360); Normandy was now part of the French realm. In 1381 the French rule in Normandy was consolidated by the Valois dynasty, and in 1387 the English were driven out of the province. In 1421 Rouen was made a free city by the Peace of Troyes and in 1422 the town was again a free city. The Duke of Clarence, brother of Henry V of England, was made lieutenant-general in the province. Henry VI and the Duke of Bedford founded a university at Caen which had faculties of canon and civil law, but the university was destroyed in 1377. In the thirteenth century, as in all those centuries, the arts, especially theology, medicine, and arts. This last attempt at English domination in Normandy was marked by the execution at Rouen of Blessed Joan of Arc. English rule, however, was undermined by incessant conspiracies, especially on the part of the people of Rouen, and by revolts in 1355–56. The revolt of Val de Vire is famous and was the origin of an entire ballad literature, called “Vaux de Vire”, in which the poet Oliver Baselin excelled. These songs, which later became bawdy or amorous in character, and which subsequently developed into the popular drama known as “Vandevyvels” were in the beginning chiefly of an historical nature containing many episodes of Norman history by the English. Profiting by the public opinion of which the “Vaux de Vire” gave evidence, the Constable de Richemont opposed the English on Norman territory. His long and arduous efforts in 1449–50 made Normandy once more a French province. Thenceforth the possession of Normandy by France was considered a sufficient guarantee of the security of the kingdom. It was in the thirteenth century that Normandy was completely annexed by Louis XI, in order to weaken the latter, exacted in 1465 that Normandy should be held by Duke Charles de Berry, the king’s brother and leader of those in revolt against him; two years later Louis XI took Normandy from his brother and caused the creation of the Duchy of Normandy. The Norman coast is perfectly safe, for, unlike that of Normandy, it could for no reason whatever be dismembered from the domain of the crown. The ducal ring was broken in the presence of the great judicial court called the Exchequer (Exchequer) and the title of Duke of Normandy was never to be borne again except by Louis XVII.

The Normandy school of architecture from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century produced superb Gothic edifices, chiefly characterized by the height of their spires and bell-towers. Throughout the Middle Ages Normandy, greatly influenced by St. Bernard and the Cistercians, was instrumental in the propagation of the Blessed Virgin. It was under her protection that William the Conqueror placed his expedition to England. One of the most ancient mural paintings in France is in the chapel of the Hospice St. Julien at Petit-Quevilly, formerly the mayor chapel of one of the early dukes of Normandy, protesting against the Birth of the Blessed Virgin, the infant Jesus during the flight into Egypt. As early as the twelfth century Robert or rather Richard Wace wrote the history of Mary and that of the establishment of the feast of the Immaculate Conception. The Norman students at Paris placed themselves under the patronage of the Immaculate Conception which thus became the “feast of the Normans”; this appellation does not seem to date beyond the thirteenth century. During the modern period the Normans have been distinguished for their commercial expeditions by sea and their voyages of discovery. As early as 1396 the Normans had established markets on the coast of Africa and it was from Caen that Jean de Béthencourt set out in 1402 for the conquest of the Canaries. He opened up to Vasco da Gama the route to the Cape of Good Hope and to Christopher Columbus that to America. In 1494–95, the year of the death of Jean le Verrier, gave an account of his expedition in a manuscript known as “Le Canarien”, edited in 1871. Jean Ango, born at Dieppe about the end of the thirteenth century, acquired a fortune exceeding that of many princes of his time. The Portuguese having in time of Louis XI given a ship which belonged to him, he sent a flotilla to blockade Lisbon and ravage the Portuguese coast. The ambassador sent by the King of Portugal to Francis I to negotiate the matter, was referred to the citizen of Dieppe, Ango. He was powerful enough to assist the armaments of Francis I against England. Enthused in 1466 in these operations, the Englishman Pinsereau, navigator and a native of Dieppe, was, it is said, the first Frenchman to take ships to Brazil; to him also is ascribed the honour of having discovered Sumatra in 1529. Poet as well as sailor, he wrote in verse (1530) a “Description Nouvelle des Merveilles de monde”. The foundation by Francis I in 1517 of the “French City” which afterwards became Havre de Grace, shows the importance which French royalty attached to the Norman coast. Normandy’s maritime commerce was much developed by Henry II and Catherine de Medicis. They granted to the port of Rouen in 1585 a sort of monopoly for the importation of spices and drugs arriving by way of the Atlantic, and when they came to Rouen in 1590 the merchants of that town contrived to give to the nearby wood the appearance of the country of Brazil "with three hundred naked men, equipped like savages of America, whence comes the wood of Brazil". Among these three hundred men were fifty wild savages, and there also figured in this exhibit howеки monkeys. In May, the men keys which the merchants of Rouen had brought from Brazil. The description of the festivities, which bore witness to active commercial intercourse between Normandy and America, was published together with numerous figures. After the Reformation religious wars interrupted the maritime traffic. For a time, Rouen took sides with the League, Cæc with Henry IV, but with the restoration of peace the maritime expeditions recommenced. Normans founded Quebec in 1608, opened markets in Brazil in 1612, visited the Sonda Islands in 1617, and colonized Guadeloupe in 1635. The French population of Canada is to a large extent of Normandy origin. During the French Revolution Normandy was one of the centres of the federalist movement known as the Girondins. Cæc and Evreux were important centres for the Girondins; Buzot, who led the movement, was a Norman, and it was from Cæc that Charlotte Corday set out to slay the "Montagnard" Marat. The revoltist movement of "la Chouannerie" had also one of its centres in Normandy.

NORTHAMPTON

Norris, Sylvester (alias Smith, Newton), controversial writer and English missionary priest; b. 1570 or 1572 in Somersetshire; d. 16 March, 1630. After receiving minor orders at Reims in 1590, he went to the English College, Rome, where he completed his studies and was professed. In May, 1596, he was sent on the English mission, and his energetic character is revealed by the fact that he was one of the apostolic clergy in 1600. In the prosecutions following upon the Gunpowder Plot, he was committed to Bridewell Gaol. From his prison he addressed a letter to the Earl of Salisbury, dated 1 Dec., 1645, in which he protests his innocence, and in proof of his loyalty promises to repair to Rome, and labour that the pope shall bind all the Catholics of England to be just, true, and loyal subjects, and that hostages shall be sent for the aforesaid of those things. He was thereupon banished along with forty-six other priests (1652) to Bourbon and entered the Society of Jesus. He was for some time employed in the Jesuit colleges on the Continent, but in 1611 returned to the English mission, and in 1621 was made superior of the Hampshire district, where he died.

He wrote: "An Antidote or Treatise of Thirty Contrary Arguments Against the Westminister Discourse of the Church" (1622); "An Appendix to the Antidote" (1621); "The Pseudo-Scripturist" (1623); "A true report of the Private Colloquy between M. Smith, alias Norrice, and M. Walker" (1624); "The Christian Vox"; "Discourse proving that a man who believeth in Transubstantiation, and yet unbelieveth not all other inferior Articles, cannot be saved." (1625).
many missionary priests, during penal times, were imprisoned, William Watson, the last but one of the Marian bishops, died, a prisoner for the Faith (1581). Sir Henry Bedingfield, the faithful follower of Queen Mary and the gentle "Jailer of the Princess Elizabeth," is associated with the diocese through Henry VII. His mansion, still occupied by anotlier Sir Henry Bedingfield, his direct descendant, The Pastor of Paston are memorable in connexion with the celebrated "Paston Letters." Many of the priests who suffered death under the penal laws belonged to the districts now included in the Diocese of Northampton, in particular, Henry Heath, born 1600, at Elton, near Northampton, and his son, the venerable Henry Walpole, S.J., (d. 1656), a native of Norfolk, and Venerable Robert Southwell, S.J. (1560-95), the Catholic poet, also born in Norfolk. In more recent times Bishop Milner was connected with the preservation of the Faith in this part of England. Allan Butler, the hagiographer, was born in Northamptonshire and was resident priest at Norwich from 1751-56. Dr. Husenbeth resided for some years at Cossey, where he is buried (see Husenbeth, Frederick Charles). Father Ignatius Spencer, the poet, son of Earl Spencer, and formerly Rector of Brington, was received into the Catholic Church by Henry Heath, the venerable Henry Walpole, S.J., and Faber, the oratorian, held the Anglican living of Elton, Huntingdonshire, before his conversion.

JOHN FREELAND.

North Carolina, one of the original thirteen States of the United States, is situated between 33° 53' and 36° 33' N. lat. and 73° 23' and 85° 30' W. long. It is bounded on the north by Virginia, east and south-east by the Atlantic Ocean, south by South Carolina and Georgia, and west by Tennessee. Its extreme length from east to west is 503 miles, with an extreme breadth of 187 miles, and an average breadth of about 100 miles. Its area is 52,250 square miles, of which 3670 is water. Originally it included the present State of Tennessee, ceded to the United States in 1792. In 1784-5 the people of that section made an unsuccessful effort to set up an independent state named Franklin, with John Sevier as governor. It is divided into ninety-eight counties and has (1910) ten Congressional districts, with a population of 2,206,257. The capital is Raleigh, situated nearly in the geographical centre of the state; the principal cities are Wilmington, Charlotte, Asheville, Greensboro, and Winston.

Physical Characteristics.—North Carolina has a remarkable variety of topography, soil, climate, and production and falls naturally into three divisions. The eastern or Tidewater section begins at the ocean and extends north-westwardly to the foot of the hills; the land is level, with sluggish streams and many marshes and swamps, including part of the great Dismal Swamp. It is the home of the long leaf pine, with its products of pitch, tar, and turpentine, long a source of wealth. The principal productions are cotton, corn, and rice; while "truck gardening" has recently grown into a substantial industry. The fisheries are also valuable. The central or Piedmont section, comprising nearly half the state and extending westward to the eastern foot of the Blue Ridge, is more or less hilly, but the rich intervening valleys produce practically all the general crops, including cotton and tobacco, with fruits of all kinds. The soil, though not naturally rich, is capable of a high degree of cultivation. The central or Piedmont section, with the Catawba line, is mostly mountainous, with rich valleys and sheltered coves. Its principal productions are those of the central section, modified somewhat by its greater elevation. It contains some lofty peaks, Mount Mitchell being the highest peak east of the Rocky Mountains. The state is well watered, having numerous distinct lakes which, though not generally navigable, in their rapid descent furnish enormous water-power, much of which has been recently developed. They may be divided into three classes, those flowing indirectly into the Mississippi, those flowing into the Great Pelee and the Santee, and those flowing into the Atlantic. The coast line, nearly four hundred miles long, includes Cape Fear, Lookout, and Hatteras; and, at varying distances from the ocean, run a series of sounds, chief of which are Currituck, Albemarle, and Pamlico. There are good harbours at Edenton, New Bern, Washington, Beaufort, and Williamsburg. The climate is generally equable, and North Carolina produces nearly all the crops grown in the United States with the exception of sub-tropical cane and fruits. Four of the wine grapes, the Catawba, Isabella, Lincoln, and Scuppernong, originated here. It has also large areas of valuable timber of great variety. With a few rare exceptions all the known minerals are found and operated, especially coal, which, in 1895, taking the fourteen leading industries, including about 90 per cent of the total, there were 3272 manufacturing establishments, with a capital of $141,630,000, producing yearly products of $412,520,774. The principal manufactured products were important, and North Carolina was the third among all the States, and tobacco, in which she ranked second.

Railroads and Banks.—There are in operation within the State 3,457 miles of railroads, besides 911 miles of sidewalks, with a total valuation of $82,517,553, but capitalized for a much larger amount. The state has 324 banks organized under the state law; with an aggregate capital stock of $7,992,767, and 69 national banks with a capital of $6,760,000. The entire recognized state debt is $6,880,960, the greater part of which could be paid by the sale of certain railroad bonds held by the state.
Albemarle, the name originally given to what now constitutes North Carolina, was augmented by settlements from Virginia, New England, and Bermuda. In 1674 the population was about four thousand. In 1729, Carolina became a royal province, the king having purchased from the proprietors seven-eighths of their domain. Carteret, subsequently Earl Granville, was the proprietor, retaining in several his share of the land. It gained considerable acquisitions in population by a colony of Swiss at New Bern, of Scotch Highlanders on Cape Fear, of Moravians at Salem, and of Scotch-Irish and Pennsylvania Dutch, who settled in different parts of the state. The population of the state has never been very little immigration and the population is now essentially homogeneous.

The people of North Carolina were among the earliest and most active promoters of the Revolution. The Stamp Tax was bitterly resented; a provincial congress, held at New Bern, elected delegates to the first Continental Congress in September, 1774, and joined in the declaration of Colonial rights. As early as 20 May, 1775, a committee of citizens met in Charlotte and issued the "Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence", formally renouncing allegiance to the Crown. Important congress at Halifax adopted a state constitution which immediately went into effect, with Richard Caswell as governor. The delegates from this state signed the Declaration of Independence and the Articles of Confederation. In 1786 the General Assembly elected delegates to the Federal Constitutional Convention and its delegates present signed the Constitution; but the General Assembly did not ratify it until 21 November, 1789, after the Federal Government had been organized and gone into operation. During the Revolution the state furnished the Continental army with 22,910 men. Important battles were fought here at Alamance, 22,910, 1771, and Cornwallis, 15 March, 1781, Alamance, Moore's Creek, Ramsour's Mill, and King's Mountain on the state line. There was a predominant Union sentiment in North Carolina in the early part of 1861; and at an election held 28 February, the people voted against calling a convention for the purpose of secession; but after the firing on Fort Sumter and the actual beginning of the war, a convention, called by the Legislature without submission to the people, met on 20 May, 1861, passed an ordinance of secession, and ratified the Confederate Constitution. Fort Fisher was the only important battle fought in the state. The State sent 125,000 soldiers into the Civil War, the largest number sent by any southern state. In 1865 a provincial government was organized by President Johnson, and later the state came under the Reconstruction Act passed by Congress, 2 March, 1867. On 11 July, 1868, the state government was restored by proclamation of the president.

The Constitution of 1776 had some remarkable provisions. It allowed free negroes to vote because they were "freemen", all slaves, of course, being disfranchised because in law they were considered chattels. Any freeman could vote for the members of the House of Commons; but must own fifty acres of land to vote for a senator, who must himself own at least three hundred acres, and a member at least one hundred acres. The governor must own a freehold of five thousand dollars in value. The borough towns of Edenton, New Bern, Wilmington, Salisbury, Hillsboro, and Halifax each were allowed a separate member in the House of Commons apart from the counties. It declared: "That all men have a natural and inalienable right to worship Almighty God, according to the dictates of their own conscience"; but that the clergy of the Established religion should hold any civil office of trust or profit.  No clergyman or preacher of any denomination should be a member of either house of the Legislature while continuing in the exercise of his pastoral functions. All of these provisions, except the declaration of religious freedom, have since been abrogated. The Convention of 1835 adopted many amendments, ratified in 1836; among others, all persons of negro blood to the fourth generation were disfranchised; and the Protestant religion remained in the Constitution. The Constitution of 1868 restored negro suffrage, but in 1900 amendments, adopted by the Legislature and ratified by the people, provided that every qualified voter should have paid his poll tax and be able to read and write any section of the Constitution, but that he was not to use the poll tax to discriminate on the basis of race. It was not until 1905, or his lineal descendant, might register on a permanent roll until 1 November, 1908. This is called the "Grandfather Clause".

Education.—In early times there were no schools; private teachers furnishing the only means of education. Beginning about 1760, several private classical schools were established in different parts of the state, the most prominent being Queen's College at Charlotte, subsequently called Liberty Hall. The State University was opened for students in February, 1785, but want of means and a scattered population prevented any great activity. The Civil War seriously interfered with all forms of education, but the entire educational system is now in a high state of efficiency. The following are under State control, but receive aid from tuition fees and donations: the State University, situated at Chapel Hill, with an annual income, $150,000; annual State appropriation, $75,000; faculty, 101; students, 121; the North Carolina State Normal and Industrial College for women at Greensboro, founded in 1891, buildings, 13; annual State appropriation, $75,000; faculty, 63; students, 463; the Agricultural and Mechanical College, at Greensboro, founded in 1887, with an annual income, $10,000; annual State appropriation, $11,000; faculty, 14; students, 173. A training school for white teachers has just been established at Greenville. There are three State Normal Schools for the coloured race. The official reports of public schools for the year 1908-9 show a total school population of whites, 490,710; coloured, 236,855; schools, 1,259; coloured teachers, 2,928; total available fund, $3,419,103. There are a large number of flourishing denominational colleges both for men and women, several of which belong to the coloured race. Among the State institutions are: a large central penitentiary, three hospitals for insane, three schools for deaf, dumb, and blind, and a tuberculosis sanitarium.

Religious Conditions.—Under the lords proprietors there was much religious discrimination and even persecution; but there was little under the Crown except as to holding office and celebrating the rite of matrimony. The disqualification for office involved in denying the public school system until 1835 remained in the Constitution until the Convention of 1835. In 1835 William Gaston, a Catholic of great ability and noble character, was elected associate justice of the Supreme Court for life. Regarding the religious disqualification as legally and morally invalid, he promptly took his seat without opposition. While still remaining on the bench, he was elected a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1835, and attended its session. His great speech against any religious discrimination was conclusive, and the obnoxious clause was stricken out of the Constitution. Since then there has been no legal disqualification against Catholics. All persons denying the existence of Almighty God have been disqualified from holding office under every constitution. The preamble to the present Constitution recognizes the dependence of the people upon Almighty God, and their gratitude to Him for the existence of their civil, political, and religious liberties. The Legislature is opened with prayer. The law requires the observance of Sunday, and punishes any disturbance of religious congregations. The following days have been legally ordained: 19 January (Lee's Birthday); 22 February; 12 April (anniversary of Halifax Resolution); 10 May (Confederate Decoration Day); 20 May (anniversary Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence); 4 July; 1st Monday in September (Labour Day); general election day in November; Thanksgiving; and Christmas. Now, as heretofore, the religious bodies may be incorporated without the law, under certain exceptions. Religious bodies may become incorporated either under the general law or by special act. If not specifically incorporated they are regarded as quasi corporations, and may exercise many corporate powers. The Protestant Episcopal bishop has been created a corporation sole by special act of the Legislature. All real and personal property used exclusively for religious, charitable, or educational purposes, as also property whose income is so used, is exempt from taxation. Ministers of the Gospel are exempt from jury duty and their private liabilities. The only public communications recognized are those between lawyers and their clients, and physicians and their patients. There is no statute allowing this exemption to priests, and therefore they stand as at common law; but there is no recorded instance in which they have ever been asked to reveal the secrets of the confessional.

Marriage and Divorce.—Originally in this colony legally valid marriages were solemnized only by ministers of the Church of England, of whom there were few, nearly all in the eastern part of the colony. In 1715 this power was conferred upon the governor; in 1741 upon justices of the peace; in 1758 upon ministers of the Presbyterian Church, and finally, in 1778, upon the ministers of all denominations. The ceremony now be performed by an ordained minister of any religious denomination or a justice of the peace; and the peculiar marriage custom of the Friends is recognized as valid. Males under sixteen and females under fourteen are legally incapable of marriage, and all marriages of those related by consanguinity closer than the degree of first cousin, and between whites and negroes or Indians are void. A marriage licence is required, and the Registrar is forbidden by law to issue licences for the marriage of any one under either of the above ages without the consent of the parent or one standing in loco parentis. Absolute divorce (a vinculo) may be granted for the following causes: pre-existing natural and continued impotence of either party; if they shall have lived separate and apart continuously for ten years, and have no children; adultery committed, if the wife, or pregnancy at the time of marriage unknown to husband and not by him; continued fornication and adultery by the husband. Either party may remarry, but no alimony is allowed. Divorce a mensa et loco may be granted with alimony for the following causes: if either party shall abandon his or her family, or turn the other out of doors, or shall by cruel and barbarous treatment endanger the life of the other, or shall offer such indignities to the person of the other as to make his or her life intolerable, or shall become an habitual drunkard. Upon such a divorce parties cannot remarry.

Requests for charitable purposes must be clearly distinguished from the desires of the church, and there must be some one capable of taking the bequest. Whether a bequest for Masses would be specifically enforced by the courts, has not been decided; but it is not probable that it would be interfered with, as the courts have never invoked the doctrine of Superstitions Us. Cemeteries are provided for and protected by law. In administering oaths, the party sworn must "lay his hand upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God"; but those having conscientious scruples may appeal to God with uplifted hand; and "Quakers, Moravians, Dunkers, and Mennonites" may affirm.

Prohibition.—For many years prohibition sentiment has been strongly urged. It culminated in the passage by the General Assembly of an act making it unlawful to make or sell any spiritsuous, vinous, or malt liquors within the state, except for sacramental purposes, or by a registered pharmacist on a physician's prescription. Native spirits may be sold without restriction; and intoxicating liquors may be dispensed by manufacturers or caulkers containing not less than two and a half gallons each, which must not be opened on the premises.

In the above, the Catholic population was reduced by deducting 15 per cent for children under nine years of age.

North Carolina, Vicariate Apostolic of, was canonically established and separated from the Diocese of Charleston, South Carolina by Bull, 3 March, 1818, with James (now Cardinal) Gibbons as first vicar. It comprised the entire state until 1910, when eight counties were attached to Belmont Abbey. The latest statistics, for the entire state, show secular priests, 17; religious, 16; churches, 15; missions, 34; stations, 47; chapels, 5; Catholics, 3570. The Apostolate Company, a corporation of secular priests at Nazareth, owns and controls the medical school and publications "Truth", a monthly periodical. There is a girls' school and sanatorium at Asheville, and hospitals at Charlotte (Sisters of Mercy) and Greensboro (Sisters of Charity). There are parochial schools at Asheville, Charlotte, Salisbury, Durham, Newton, etc. The vicariate is subject to the Propaganda, and its present vicar is the Abbé Ordinary of Belmont.

Belmont Cathedral Abbey.—By Bull of Pius IX, 8 June, 1910, the Counties of Gaston, Lincoln, Cleveland, Rutherford, Polk, Burke, McDowell, and Catawba were set off from the vicariate to form the diocese of the Cathedral Abbey at Belmont, canonically erected by Mgr. Diomede Falconio, Apostolic Delegate in the United States, on 18 October, 1910. In the vicariate remains under the administration of the abbey ordinary at Belmont until a diocese can be formed in the state. Belmont Abbey, situated in Gaston County, was erected into an abbey by Papal Brief dated 19 December, 1884, its first abbots being Rt. Rev. Leo Haid. He was born at Latrobe, Pennsylvania, 15 July, 1849, ordained priest in 1872, and served as chaplain and professor in St. Vincent's Abbey until 1885. Appointed Vicar Apostolic of North Carolina in 1887, he was consecrated titular Bishop of Messene 1 July, 1588. The abbey itself has many extra-territorial dependencies, i.e., military colleges in Savannah, Georgia and Richmond, Virginia, and parishes in both of these cities as well as other missions, and it is also a college for the higher education of forms legal corporations in Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. To it also is attached a college for secular education and a seminary for the secular and regular clergy. To the abbey proper belong 32 priests, 2 deacons, 6 clerics in minor orders, and 57 lay brothers. At this present is also a college for the higher education of women under the Sisters of Mercy, with 60 pupils, an orphanage for girls and a preparatory school for little boys.

Prominent Catholics.—Though there are few Catholics in the state, an unusual proportion have occupied prominent official positions. Thomas Burke was governor, and William Gaston, M. E. Manly, and R. M. Douglas were associate justices of the Supreme Court. R. R. Heath, W. A. Moore, and W. S. O' B. Robinson were Superior Court judges, and R. D. Douglas attorney general. Prominent benefactors were Dr. D. O'Donahue, Lawrence Brown, and Raphael Gausserino. Mrs. Francis C. Tierman (Christian Reid) is a native of North Dakota.

Northcote, James Spencer, b. at Feniton Court, Devonshire, 26 May, 1821; d. at Stoke-upon-Trent, Staffordshire, 3 March, 1897. He was the second son of George Barons Northcote, a gentleman of an ancient Devonshire family of Norman descent. Educated first at Exeter Grammar School, he won in 1837 a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he came under Newman's influence. In 1841 he became B.A., and in the following year married his cousin, Susannah Spencer Russeom Be. Poole. Taking Anglican Orders in 1844 he accepted a curacy at this time connected with when his wife was received into the Catholic Church in 1845, he resigned his office. In 1848 he himself was converted, being received at Prior Park College, where he continued as a master for some time. From June, 1852, until September, 1853, he acted as editor of the "Rambler," and about the same time helped to draw up "The Tracts on Catholic Tracts." After his wife's death in 1853 he devoted himself to preparing for the priesthood, first under Newman at Edgbaston, then at the Collegio Pio, Rome. On 29 July, 1855, he was ordained priest at Stone, where his daughter had entered the novitiate. He returned to Rome to complete his ecclesiastical studies, also acquiring the profound erudition in Christian antiquities which was later to be espoused in his degree work, "Roma Sottaneaux." In 1857 he was appointed to the mission of Stoke-upon-Trent, which he served until 1860, when he was called to Oscott College as vice-president, and six months later became president. Under his rule, which lasted for seventeen years, the college entered on an unprecedented degree of prosperity, and his influence on education was felt far outside the walls of Oscott. Failing health caused him to resign in 1876, and he returned to the mission, first at Stone (1878), and then at Stoke-upon-Trent (1884), where he spent the rest of his life reared by all for his learning, his noble character, and his sanctity. During the last twenty years of his life he suffered from creeping paralysis, which slowly deprived him of all bodily motion, though leaving his mind intact. He had been made a canon of the Diocese of Birmingham in 1861, canon-theologian in 1862, and provost in 1883. In 1861 the pope conferred on him the doctorate in divinity. Dr. Northcote's wide scholarship is witnessed to by many works, chief among which is "Roma Sottaneaux," the great work on the Catacombs, written in conjunction with William R. Brownlow, afterwards Bishop of Clifton. This work has been translated into French and German; and it won for its author a place among the greatest living authorities on the subject. Other works were: "The Fourfold Difficulty of Anglicanism" (Derby, 1846); "A Pilgrimage to La Salette" (London, 1852); "Roman Catacombs" (London, 1857); "Mary in the Gospels" (London, 1867); "Celebrated Saints and Martyrs of the Madonna" (London, 1868); "A Visit to the Roman Catacombs" (London, 1877); "Epitaphs of the Catacombs" (London, 1878).

Edwin Burton.

North Dakota, one of the United States of America, originally included in the Louisiana Purchase, little was known of the region prior to the expedition of Lewis and Clark, who spent the winter of 1804–5 about thirty miles north-west of Bismarck. In 1851 the Astor excursion party encountered a band of Sioux near the boundary of North and South Dakota on the Missouri. Settlement was long delayed on account of the numerous Indian wars, and the land was practically given up to hunters and trappers. In 1849 all that part of Dakota east of the Missouri and White Earth Rivers was made part of the Territory of Minnesota, and in 1854 all to the west of the said rivers was included in the Territory of Nebraska. Finally, 2 March, 1861, President Buchanan signed the bill creating the Territory of North Dakota, with Dr. William Jayne of Springfield, Ill., as first governor; and on 2 November, 1861, the Territorial Legislature was formed. North Dakota is bounded on the north by Saskatchewan and Manitoba, on the south by South Dakota, on the east by Minnesota (the Red River dividing), and on the west by Montana. The surface is chiefly rolling prairie, with an elevation of from eight hundred to nine hundred feet in the Red.
River valley, from thirteen hundred to fifteen hundred feet in the Devil's Lake region and from two thousand to twenty-eight hundred feet west of Minot. The chief rivers are the Missouri, Red, Sheyenne, James, Mouse, and Souris. The state is a rectangle, measuring approximately two hundred and fourteen miles from north to south and three hundred and thirty from east to west, and has an area of 70,785 square miles, of which 650 is water. The population (1910) was 577,653, an increase of 82.8 per cent. since 1890.

Resources.—Agriculture.—The number of farms in the state in 1910 was 61,412, number of acres in cultivation over 13 millions. Wheat is the dominant crop, the Red River Valley being perhaps the most famous wheat-producing region in the world. Oats, flax, and barley are also produced in large quantities. The prairies offer fine grazing ground and the state has 1,315,780 head of live stock. Her forests aggregate 95,916 acres; there are 133,150 cultivated fruit trees, and 2,384 acres of berries. Besides many natural groves, very rich in wild small fruit, there is a vast number of cultivated farm groves, and some fine nurseries of which near Devil's Lake and consists of about 400 acres.

Mining.—In the western part of the state, North Dakota has a coal supply greater than that of any other state in the Union; coal is mined at Minot, Burlington, Kenmare, Ray, Dickinson, Dunsmuir, and other places. There are many rocks for fuel, gas, electricity, and power. In 1908 there were 88 mines in operation and 280,135 tons mined. Chas. P. Quarry, fire and pressed brick abound in Stark, Dunn, Mercer, Morton, Hettinger, and Billings counties. Cement is found in Cavalier County on the border of Pembina. The artesian basin in North Dakota sandstone at the base of the upper Cretaceous, at a depth of from eight hundred feet in the south-east to fifteen hundred feet at Devil's Lake. Good common brick clay may be found practically all over the state from deposits in the glacial lakes. North Dakota has 5092 miles of railroad, and four main lines cross the state. There is direct railway communication with Winnipeg, Brandon, and other points on the Canadian Pacific.

Matters Affecting Religion.—North Dakota is a code State. The civil and criminal codes prepared by the New York commission and adopted by the legislature of North Dakota in 1865, a probate code was adopted the same year, and thus the Territory of Dakota was the first English-speaking community to adopt a codification of its substantive law. The territorial laws, compiled in 1887, were revised by the State in 1895, 1899, and 1905. Section 4, Article 1 of the State Constitution provides: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall be forever guaranteed in this State, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness or juror on account of his opinion on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not extend to excusing acts of licentiousness, or justifying practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this State." The statute makes it a misdemeanour to prevent the free exercise of religious worship and belief, or to compel by threats or violence any particular form of worship, or to disturb a religious assemblage by stampeding or conducting in a decent manner, unnecessary noise, selling liquor, keeping open baccarat shops, or exhibiting plays without licence, within a mile of such assemblages. Service labour (except works of necessity or charity) is forbidden on Sunday; also public sports, trades, manufactures, mechanical enterprises, and public amusements (excepting hunting, fishing, and fish with and fish without shall be sold before nine a.m., also food to be eaten on premises. Drugs, medicines, and surgical appliances may be sold at any time. Service of process except in criminal cases is prohibited on Sunday. A person uniformly keeping another day of the week as holy time, may be in some cases penalized by law. The courts may order a person to be drunk or immoral, or otherwise disturb other persons in observing the first day of the week. The fine for Sabbath-breaking is less than ten dollars for each offence. It is a misdemeanor to serve civil process on Saturday on a person who keeps that day as the Sabbath.

Matters Affecting Religious Work.—The law provides for corporations for religious, educational, benevolent, charitable, or scientific purposes, giving to such corporations power to acquire property, real and personal, by purchase, devise, or bequest and hold the same in the exercise of the purposes for which they are organized. The corporation bylaws and a majority of the votes of the members. Catholic church corporations, according to diocesan statutes, consist of the bishop, vicar-general, local pastor, and two trustees. No corporation or association for religious purposes shall acquire or hold real estate of greater value than $200,000 (laws of 1909). Charitable trusts are favored if conformable to the statute against perpetuities, which forbids suspension of power of or alienation of interest in real or personal property or the vesting of any interest in person in being at the creation of condition (Hager vs. Saarson, 123 N. W. Rep., 518). Cemetery corporation may be formed with powers of regulation. The net proceeds must go to protect and improve the grounds and not to the profit of the corporation or members. Interest here and there varies. Any marriage or transfer to another heir. Cemetery grounds are exempt from all process, lien, and public burdens and uses.

Marriage and Divorce.—Any unmarried male of the age of eighteen or upwards and any unmarried female of the age of fifteen or upwards, not otherwise disqualified, are capable of consenting to marriage, but if the male is under twenty-one or the female under eighteen, the license shall not be issued without the consent of parents or guardian, if there be any. Marriages between parents and children including grandparents and grandchildren, between brothers and sisters, of half or whole blood, uncles and nieces, aunts and nieces, uncles and cousins, if a former marriage of the whole blood, are declared incestuous and absolutely void, and this applies to illegitimate as well as legitimate children and relations. A marriage contracted by a person having a former husband or wife, if the former marriage has not been annulled or dissolved, is illegal and void from the beginning, unless the former husband or wife was absent and believed by such person to be dead for five years immediately proceeding. Judges of all courts of record and justices of the peace, within their jurisdiction, "ordained ministers of the Gospel" and "priests of every church" may perform the marriage ceremony. The form used by Friends or Quakers may be valid. Former judge of the county where one of the contracting parties resides, must be obtained and the persons performing the ceremony must file the certificate thereof, and such licence with the county judge within thirty days after the marriage, such certificate to be signed by two witnesses and the person performing the ceremony. Indians contracting marriage according to Indian custom and co-habiting as man and wife, are deemed legally married. All marriages contracted outside of the State and valid by the laws of the State where contracted, are deemed valid in this State. The original certificate and certified copy thereof are evidence of marriage relations, and all evidence may be annulled for any of the following causes existing at the time: (1) if the person seeking annulment was under the age of legal consent, and such marriage was contracted without the consent of parent or guardian; (2) unless the party was of unsound mind until he had reason to expect the parties lived together as husband and wife; (3) when consent was obtained by fraud, unless after full knowledge of the parties defendant attempted to live with the other in marriage relation; (5) when consent was obtained by force, unless afterwards they lived freely together; (6) incapacity. Actions for annulment where former husband or wife is living, and where party is of unsound mind, may be brought at any time before the death of either party, unless the party is adjudged a mental incompetent before the time of marriage, in which case the suit must be brought by the party injured within four years after arriving at age of consent or by parent or guardian before such time, also for fraud within four years after discovery. When a marriage is annulled children begotten before the judgment are legitimate and succeed to the estate of both parents. Marriages between white persons and colored persons of one eighth or more negro blood are null and void by Act of 1907, and severe penalty is provided against parties, officials, and clergy for violation of the law. Divorce may be granted for (1) adultery, (2) extreme cruelty, (3) willful desertion, (4) wilful neglect, (5) habitual intemperance, as defined, in the event of party to a divorce may marry within three months after decree is granted. Wilful desertion, willful neglect, or habitual intemperance must continue for one year before it is a cause for divorce. As to proof in divorce cases the Statute provides that no divorce can be granted on default of the defendant or upon the undebated evidence of a fact, or upon the unsupported testimony of parties, or upon any statement or finding of facts made by referee, but the court must in addition to any statement or finding of referee, require proof of facts alleged. The court has held that the fact of marriage alleged in complaint may be admitted in answer without further corroboration. The restriction as to corroboration applies to testimony, not to pleading, and is intended to prevent collusive divorce. This statute is more restrictive as to proof than the proposed resolution, No. 13, of proceedings of the National Congress on Uniform Divorce which reads: "Divorce or legal separation shall be granted upon the cause is shown by affirmative proof, aside from any admission on the part of the respondent." A residence of one year in the State is required for the plaintiff in an action of divorce. Dower and Curtesy are abolished, and a deed of the homestead must be signed by both the husband and wife. Labour of children under fourteen years of age is prohibited, and stringent rules provide for regulation of those under sixteen, and no woman under eighteen years of age may be compelled to work over ten hours; age of consent is eighteen years.

Wills.—A woman is of age at eighteen, and any person of sound mind may, on arriving at that age, dispose of his or her real and personal property by will. A married woman may will her property without the consent of her husband. A nuncupative will is limited to $1000, and to cases where the testator is in military service in the field, or on board ship, and anticipates death, or where death is anticipated from a wound received that day. There must be two witnesses who are requested by the testator to act as such. An olographic will is one dated, written, and signed by the hand of the testator, and requires no other formalities. Other wills must be executed by the testator in presence of two witnesses, who in his presence and in the presence of each other, subscribe as witnesses.

Education.—The educational system in North Dakota is on a broad basis. Sections 16 and 30 of each Congressional township are given to the common schools by Congress, also 3 per cent of the net proceeds of the state of public lands subsequent to admission, to be used as a permanent fund for schools, interest only to be expended for support of common schools. The enabling act also gives 72 sections for university purposes, to be sold for not less than ten dollars per acre, proceeds to constitute a permanent fund, interest only to be expended. Also 90,000 acres for the Agricultural College, 40,000 acres each for the School of Mines, Reform School, Deaf and Dumb School, Agricultural College, State University, two State Normal Schools; 50,000 acres for capital buildings and 170,000 acres for such other educational and charitable institutions as the legislature may determine. North Dakota has the highest ratio of schools to population of any sectarian or denominational school, college, or university. The Normal Schools are located at Mayville and Valley City, the Industrial Training School at Ellendale, the School of Forestry at Bottineau, the Agricultural College at Fargo, the State University (Arts, Law, Engineering, Model High School, State School of Mines, Public Health Laboratory and Prisons and Reformatories.—The keeper of each prison is required to provide at the expense of the county for each prisoner who may be able and desires to read, a copy of the Bible or New Testament to be used by the prisoner at seasonable and proper times during his confinement, and any minister of the Gospel is permitted access to such prisoners at seasonable and proper times to perform and impart ceremonies in the articles of religion. Suitable provisions are made for reduction of time for good behaviour, for indeterminate sentences, and paroling prisoners.

Sale of Liquor.—The manufacture, importation, sale, gift, barter, or trade of intoxicating liquors by any person, association, or corporation as a beverage, is prohibited by Article 29 of the State constitution and by statute. Exceptions are made in favour of sale in limited quantities on affidavit of applicant by druggists for medicinal, mechanical, scientific, and sacramental purposes, under permit granted at the discretion of the district court. Not more than one-half pint may be sold to any one in one day and the purchaser must sign affidavit stating the particular disease for which the same is required. Sales to minors, habitual drunkards, and persons whose relatives forbid, are prohibited. Places where intoxicating liquors are sold or kept for sale or where persons are permitted to resort for purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors are also regulated by the State.

The keeper is liable criminally and in an action the nuisance may be abated and the premises closed for one year. The statute also provides for civil liability against persons violating the law, in favour of those taking charge of and providing for intoxicated persons. If such person, guardian, employer, or other person injured in person or property or means of support by any intoxicated person.

Statistics of the Protestant Churches.—The Episcopalian Church has 4064 members; 1224 families; 97 Sunday School teachers; 741 pupils; 42 churches and chapels; 5410 sittings; 16 rectories; 795 members in guilds. The value of the churches, chapels, and grounds is $158,655; rectories $39,000; other property $12,550. There are 6 parishes; 36 organized missions; and 41 unorganized missions. Total offerings for all purposes for the year ending 1 June, 1910, were $82,166.28. The Methodist Episcopal Church had in the State in 1908, 223 church buildings valued at $800,000, and 101 parishes valued at $150,000, with a membership of about 11,000. The most important fact in connexion with this organization is the affiliation of the Wesley College with the State university, whereby the Methodist church has full control of instruction in their own buildings and arrange for their pupils to get the benefit of secular instruction at the State university. The plan suggests a possible solution of the much vexed question of division of the school fund. The Presbyterian Church has 7 presbytery; 175 ministers; 7185 members, 9114 Sunday School members. They contributed for all purposes in the past year $150,635. There are 185 church organizations; 50 preaching stations; 132 church buildings, and 62 manses. Value of church manses and educational property was estimated at $800,000 in 1908. This denomination has recently located at Jamestown, the missionary territory, said to have to the endowment fund of about $200,000.

The Lutheran Church is composed chiefly of Norwegians and other Scandinavians. According to the "Norwegian Americana," published in Norwegian at Minneapolis in 1907, there were in the State in 1905, of Norwegian birth and descent, 110,000. The Lutheran church had 380 congregations for the year 1910. The Church in 1908 had a membership of 4161, a Sunday School enrollment of 3161; 53 churches, valued at $914,430; and 28 parsonages valued at $35,772.

Ecclesiastical History.—The establishment of Catholic missions in North Dakota cannot be reliably traced to an earlier date than 1815. In that year Rev. J. Octave Plessis of Quebec sent Rev. Joseph Provencher and Rev. Josef Severe Dumoulin to Fort Douglas, as St. Boniface was then called, and after the grasshoppers had destroyed the crops, the Selkirk colonists went in large numbers to Pembina. Father Provencher and Father Dumoulin in September, 1815, to minister to the sappers and soldiers, with instructions to spend the winter at Pembina. When that place was found to be within the United States, Father Dumoulin was recalled. Rev. George Anthony Belecourt became the second resident priest of North Dakota. A gifted linguist, well versed in the Algonquin languages which included the Chipewa, he taught the latter to the young missionaries and composed an Indian grammar and dictionary, still standard works.

He was resident priest from 1831-8 and often said Mass in every camping place from Lake Traverse to Pembina and in the interior of North Dakota. It was customary in the summer for the settlers to go to the south-western part of the State to hunt bison on the prairies, and to take their families with them. The priest always accompanied them and in these camps for the first time the children were given an opportunity of religious instruction. Father Belecourt evangelized the whole of the Turtle Mountain Country under circumstances which kept that tribe at peace with the government during the Sioux troubles following the Minnesota massacre in 1862. Father De Smet spent a few weeks with the Mandans on the Missouri in 1810 and baptized a number of their children. Father Jacques Bapst, Mald, continued instructing at a mission at St. Michael's, Fort Totten, in 1865. His name is honourably and extensively associated with much of the missionary history of the State. The first real missionary work among the Sioux of North Dakota dates from 1871 when Major Forbes (a Catholic) Indian Agent at Fort Totten, with the help of the Catholic Indian Bureau, induced the Sisters of Charity (Grey Nuns) of Montreal under Sr. Mary Clapin to establish themselves in his agency. Father Bonnin came as their chaplain. Rev. Claude Ebner, O.S.B., was stationed at Fort Totten, 1877-80. Rev. Jerome Hunt, O.S.B., has devoted his talent and zeal to the welfare of the Indians at Fort Totten Reservation since 1882, and has written and published in the Sioux language, a Bible history, prayerbook with instruction and hymns, and a smaller book of prayer, and for eighteen years has published an Indian paper in Sioux. The Grey Nuns at Fort Totten have conducted a school since 1874.

Rev. Rt. Rev. Martin Marty, O.S.B., was Vicar Apostolic of Dakota until 27 December, 1889, when Rt. Rev. John Stanley became Bishop of Jamestown; the see was later changed to Fargo. The number of churches increased from 40 in 1890 to 210 in 1908.
After the death of Bishop Shanley, the diocese was divided. Rt. Rev. James O'Reilly, as Bishop of Fargo, has charge of the eastern part, and Rt. Rev. Vincent Wehrle, O.S.B., rules over the western part as Bishop of Bismarck. According to the census of 1897, the whole diocese contains 77,500, but a subsequent count shows the number much larger, and the latest estimate by Father O'Driscoll, secretary of the Fargo diocese, places it at about 90,000. There are in the two dioceses, 140 priests; 11 religious houses; 1 monastery; 7 academies; 5 hospitals; and about 250 churches. The Sisters of St. Joseph have a hospital at Fargo, one at Grand Forks, and an academy at Jamestown. The Sisters of St. Benedict have establishments at Richmond, Glen Ellen, Oakes, Fort Yates, and a hospital at Bismarck. The Presentation Nuns have an academy and orphanage at Fargo. Sisters of Mary of the Presentation are established at Wild Rice, Oakwood, Willow City, and Lisbon. The Uspaline Sisters conduct St. Bernard's Academy at Grand Forks. Three Sisters of Mercy opened a mission school at Belcourt in the Turtle Mountains among the Chippewa in 1884, and continued to teach until 1907, when their convent was destroyed by fire. They established at Devil's Lake, St. Joseph's hospital in 1883, and a hospital at Audubon where they reside now.

The State has several active councils of the Knights of Columbus and Courts of the Catholic Order of Foresters. Among the Catholics distinguished in public life are John Burke, three times elected governor; John Counedy, Justice of the Supreme Court; Joseph Kennedy, Dean of the Normal College; State University; W. E. Purell, U. S. Senator; and P. D. Norton, Secretary of State.

Northern Territory, Prefecture Apostolic of, The Northern Territory, formerly Alexander Land and Caucasian Archipelago, is bounded on the north and west by the ocean, on the south by South Australia, on the east by Queensland and on the west by Western Australia. It thus lies almost entirely within the tropics, and has an area of 523,620 square miles. It is a very large land, but was provisionally annexed to South Australia, 6 July, 1862. It is practically uninhabited; the population is roughly estimated at between 25,000 and 30,000, of whom less than a thousand are Europeans, about 4000 Aborigines mostly Chinese, the remainder being aborigines. There are but two towns, Palmerston at Port Darwin, with a population of 600, and Southport on Blackmore River, with a population of twenty-four miles, respectively. The population is estimated to be 25,000 to 30,000 people, of whom less than a thousand are Europeans, and the rest of little importance. The rainfall ranges from sixty-four to one hundred inches, the climate resembles that of French Cochin China to six inches at Charlotte Waters. Droughts, cattle disease, and the financial crisis of 1891 have combined to retard the development of the country. John McDonnell Stuart, the pioneer explorer, and his successors declare that large tracts in the interior are suitable for the cultivation of cotton and the breeding of cattle, while the government officials and most of the Darwinians have grown spices, fibre plants, maize, and cotton. The crown lands (only 473,275 of the total 33,634,532 acres have been leased) are regulated by the North Territory Crown Lands Act of 1890-1901.

Northern Territory has a varied ecclesiastical history. In 1887, by a decree of the Sacred Congregation (27 May), it was created as a single diocesan see (Port Victoria and Palmerston), Joseph Serra, O.S.B., consecrated at Rome, 15 August, 1848, b. i., appointed to the see. He, however, was transferred in 1849 before taking possession of the See, and nominated coadjutor to the Diocese of Perth; he retired in 1854, and died in 1856 in Spain. He was succeeded by Mgr. Rosendo Salvator, O.S.B., consecrated at Naples on 15 August, 1849, but he was not able to take possession of his see, for in the meantime the whole European population had abandoned the diocese; consequently he returned to the Benedictine Abbey of New Norcia in Western Australia where he resided until 1875. During the See of Port Victoria, 1 August, 1888, he was appointed titular Bishop of Acetony, 29 March, 1889. Seven years previously the Jesuits of the Austrian Province were commissioned to establish a mission for the purpose of civilizing and converting the Aborigines; about sixteen members of the order devoted themselves to the work and stations were established at Rapid Creek (St. Joseph's), seven miles north-east of Palmerston, Daly River (Holy Rosary) and Serpentine Lagoon (Sacred Heart of Jesus). There were 2 churches, 1 chapel, and 2 mixed schools. In 1891 there were about 200 Catholics in the mission. However the work did not long continue after about twenty years' labour the Jesuits withdrew, Father John O'Brien, S.J., being the last administrator. On their withdrawal the diocese was administered by Bishop William Kelly of Geraldton. Somewhat later the mission was confided to the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart of Issoudun and established in 1906 as the Prefecture Apostolic of the Northern Territory. Very Rev. Francis Xavier Gsell, M.S.S., 14. October, 1872, was elected administrator Apostolic on 23 April, 1906. He resides at Port Darwin. At present there are in the preface 3 missionaries, 2 churches, and 1 chapel.

ANDREW A. MACERLAN.

Northmen, the Scandinavians who, in the ninth and tenth centuries, first ravaged the coasts of Western Europe and its islands and then formed their raids into settled. This article will be confined to the history of their exodus. Tauteus refers to the "Suiones" (Gett. siv. slv. 4) living beyond the Baltic as rich in arms and ships and men. But, except for the chance appearance of a small Viking fleet in the Meuse early in the seventh century, nothing is known of the action of the Scandinavians until the end of the eighth century, when the forerunners of the exodus appeared as raiders off the English and Scotch coasts. In their broad outlines the political divisions of Scandinavia were much as they are at the present day, except that the Swedes were confined to a narrower territory.
The Finns occupied the northern part of modern Sweden, and the Danes the southern extremity and the eastward they reached the Cattegat, while the Norwegians stretched down the coast of the Skager-Rack, cutting off the Swedes from the Western sea. The inhabitants of these kingdoms bore a general resemblance to the Teutonic peoples, with whom they were connected in race and language. In their social condition and manners they differed greatly from the Angles and Saxons of the sixth century. Though we cannot account satisfactorily for the exodus, we may say that it was due generally to the increase of the population, to the breaking down of the old tribal system, and the efforts of the kings, especially of Harold Fairhair, to consolidate their power, and mainly to the love of adventure and the desire to extend the lands and cities of Western Christendom lay at their mercy.

The Northmen invaded the West in three main streams; the most southerly started from South Norway and Denmark and, passing along the German coast, visited both sides of the Channel, rounded the Brest promontory, and reached the mouths of the Loire and the Garonne. It had an offshoot to the west of England and Ireland and in some cases it was prolonged to the coasts of Spain and Portugal (where Northmen came into contact with Saracen) and even into the Mediterranean and to Italy. The midmost stream crossed from the same region directly to the east and north of England, while the northern stream flowed from Norway westwards to the Orkneys and other islands, and, dividing there, moved on towards Iceland or southwards to Ireland and the Irish Sea. The work of destruction which the first stream of Northmen wrought on the Continent is told in words of despair in what is left of the Frankish Chronicles, for the pagan and greedy invaders seem to have singled out the monasteries for attack and must have destroyed most of the records of their own devastation. A Danish fleet appeared off Frisia in 810, and ten years later something legislative passed the mouth of the Loire, but the systematic and persevering assault did not begin till about 855. From that date till the early years of the following century the Viking ships were almost annual visitors to the coasts and river valleys of Germany and Gaul. About 850 they began to establish island strongholds near the mouths of the rivers, where they could winter and store their booty, and to which they could retire on the rare occasions when the Frankish or English kings were able to check their raids. Such were Walcheren at the mouth of the Scheldt, Sheppay at that of the Thames, Ossel in the lower Seine, and Neirmontier near the Loire. For over seventy years Gaul seemed to lie almost at the mercy of the Danes. Their ravages spread backwards from the coasts and river valleys; they penetrated even to Auvergne. There was little resistance whatever from king or count. Robert the Strong did, indeed, succeed in defending Paris and so laid the foundations of what was afterward the Capetian name of France, but he was killed in 996. In the end the success of the Danes brought this period of destruction to a close; the raiders turned to colonies, and in 911 Charles the Simple, by granting Normandy to Rollo, was able to establish a barrier against further invasion. Meanwhile, England had been assailed not only from the Channel and the southwest, but also by Viking ships crossing the North Sea. The Danes for a time had been even more successful than in Gaul, for Northern and Eastern districts fell altogether into their hands and the fate of Wessex seemed to have been decided by a succession of Danish victories in 871. Alfred, however, succeeded in recovering the upper hand, the enemy was pushed between Dane and West Saxon, and for a time further raids were stopped by the formation of a fleet and the defeat of Hastings in 893.

To Ireland, too, the Northmen came from two directions, from south and north. It was one of the most curious of the West to form, for at the beginning of the ninth century it was the weaker. The Vikings arrived even before 800, and as early as 807 their ships visited the west coast. They were, however, defeated near Killarney in 812 and the full fury of the attack did not fall on the country till 820. Twenty years later there appear to have been three Norse "kingdoms" in Ireland, these of Dublin, Waterford, and Cork, with an overking, but the Irish won a series of victories, while war broke out between the Danes coming by the Channel and the Norwegians descending from the north. For the next century and a half the Danish wars continued. Neither party gained a distinct advantage and both the face of the country and the national character suffered. Finally in 1014, on Good Friday, at Clontarf, on the shores of Dublin Bay, the Danes suffered a great defeat from Brian Boru. Henceforth they ceased to be an aggressive force in Ireland, though they kept their position in a number of the coast towns.

During the earlier attacks on Ireland the Scotch Islands and especially the Orkneys had become a permanent centre of Norse power and the home of those who had been driven to a life of adventure by the centralization carried out by Harold Fairhair. They even returned to help the king when he set sail in 853, but that about 855 Harold followed up a victory in Norway by taking possession of the Orkneys. The result was that the independent spirits amongst the Vikings pushed on to the Faroes and Iceland, which had been already explored, and established there one of the most remarkable homes of Norse civilization. About a hundred years later the Icelanders founded a colony on the strip of coast between the glaciers and the sea, which, to attract settlers, they called Greenland, and soon after occupied the temporary settlement in Vinland on the mainland of North America. But the increase of the Viking ships were not always turned towards the West. They also followed the Norwegian coast past the North Cape and established trade relations with "Briarmand" on the shores of the White Sea. The Baltic, however, provided an easier route to the east and in the ninth and tenth centuries it was a Swedish lake. By the middle of the ninth century a half-scythian Ruric rule was established, with Novgorod or "Varangian" Kingdom at Novgorod and, in 880, one of his successors, Oleg, moved his capital to Kiev, and ruled from the Baltic to the Black Sea. He imposed on Constantinople itself in 967 the humiliation which had beset so many of the cities of the West, and "Micklegate" had to pay Danegeld to the Norse sovereign of a Russian army. The Varangian ships are thus said to have journeyed to the West, and not to the southern waters of the Caspian. There is, however, a second stage of Norse enterprise as remarkable, though for different reasons, as the first. The Norman conquests of Southern Italy and of England and in part the Crusades, in which the Normans took such a large share, prove what the astonishing vitality of the Northmen could do when they had received Christianity and Frankish civilization from the people they had plundered.

It is impossible to account for the irresistible activity of the Northmen. It is a mystery of what might be called "racial personality". Their forces were rarely numerous, their ships small and open, suited to the protected waters of their own coasts, most unsuitable for ocean navigation, and there was no guiding power at home. Their success was due to the indomitable courage of each unit, to a tradition of discipline which made their compact "armies" superior in fighting qualities and activity to the mixed and ill-organized forces with which Frankish and English kings usually brought against them. Often they are said to have won a battle by a pretended flight, a dangerous manoeuvre except with well-disciplined troops. Until Alfred collected a fleet for the protection of his coast they had the undisputed command of the sea. They were fortunate in the time of our history for serious attacks did not begin till the empire of Charlemagne was weakened from within, and the Teutonic principle of division among heirs was overcoming the Roman principle of unity. When the period of reconstitution began the spirit of discipline, which had given the Northmen success in war, made them one of the great organizing forces of the early Middle Ages. Everywhere these "Romans of the Middle Ages" appear as organizers. They took the various material provided for them in Gaul, England, Russia, Southern Italy, and breathed into it life and activity. But races which assimilate are not enduring, and by the end of the twelfth century the Northmen had finished their work in Europe and been absorbed into the population which they had conquered and governed.

There is no complete history of the Northmen and their work in England. We know that the Christian church was made to suit with profit, much is to be found in the histories of the countries they attacked, especially in Pecquay, England and Norway, and the Sagas of Iceland. The general work is done in the Sagenliteratur which is a late date and throws little trustworthy light on this early period of Norse history; cf. Viipponen, Prolegomen to the Starlings Saga (Oxford, 1879).

Norton, Christopher, martyr; executed at Tyburn, 27 May, 1570. His father was Richard Norton of Norton Conyers, Yorkshire, and his mother, Susan Neville, daughter of Richard, second Baron Latimer. Richard Norton, known as "Old Norton," was the head of his illustrious house, which remained faithful to the Catholic religion. During this father's lifetime the present position of the estates during the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI, was Governor of Norham Castle under Mary, and in 1508-69 was sheriff of Yorkshire. He had been pardoned for joining in the Pilgrimage of Grace, but he and his brother Thomas, his nine sons, of whom Christopher was the seventh, and many of their relatives and dependants, were hanged at York, on 13 June, 1569. He was attainted and fined to Flanders with four of his sons, two of his sons were pardoned, another apostatized, Christopher and his father's brother having been captured proved themselves steadfast Catholics, were hanged, disembowelled, and quartered. Edmund, who apostatized, and another are the subject of Wordsworth's "White Doe of Rystlestone".

Norway, comprising the smaller division of the Scandinavian peninsula, is bounded on the east by Lapland and Sweden, and on the west by the Atlantic. The surface is generally a plateau from which rise precipitous mountains, as Snæfells (7596 feet) and Stora Gådhoppiggen (about 8399 feet). The west coast is deeply indented by fiords. In eastern and southern Norway the valleys are broader and at times form extensive, fruitful plains. There are several navigable rivers, as the Glommen and Vormen, and lakes, of which the largest is Lake Myosen. The numerous islands along the coast, some wooded and some bare, promote shipping and fishing; in the Loften Islands alone twenty million cod are annually caught. The climate is only relatively mild, with rain almost daily. Agriculture consists largely in raising oats and barley, but not enough for home consumption. Rye and wheat grown on the southern slopes. Bread is commonly made of oats. The cultivation of the potato is widespread, a fact of much importance. There are in the country only about 160,000 horses; these are of a hardy breed. Cattle-raising is an important industry, the number of cattle being increased at a million, that of sheep and goats at over two millions. Olive-oil and maple-syrup are made. The raising of pigs. The Lapps of the north maintain over a hundred thousand reindeer in the grassy pasture land of the higher plateaus. The most important trees are pine, fir, and birch; oak and beech are not so common.

Forestry was long carried on unscientifically; considerable effort has been made to improve conditions, and wood is now exported chiefly as wrought or partly wrought timber. Silver is mined at Kongsberg, and iron at Roraa, but the yield of minerals is moderate. Coal is altogether lacking. The peasants are skilful wood-carvers, and in isolated valleys still make all necessary household articles, besides spinning and weaving their apparel. The Northmen were always famous seamen, and Norwegians are now found on the ships of all nations. The merchant marine of about 8000 vessels is one of the most important of the world. Good roads and railways have greatly increased traffic, and constantly increasing number of strangers are attracted by the natural beauties. Although in this way a great deal of money is brought into the country, the morals and honesty of the people unfortunately suffer in consequence. The area is 123,813 sq. miles; the population numbers 2,350,000 persons.

The great majority belong officially to the Lutheran state Church, but on account of liberal laws there is a rapid development of sects. Catholics did not regain religious liberty until the middle of the nineteenth century. Reports as to their numbers vary from 1500, and in the province of Troms the "Lutheran" to 100,000, as given in the Catholic "Germannia" (see below). Norway is a constitutional monarchy, its ruler since 18 November, 1905, has been King Haakon VII, a Danish prince. The colours of the flag are red, white, and blue. The country is divided into 20 counties and 56 bailiwicks. Justice is administered by district courts (trettte domstolar). The national central government is divided into 6 dioceses, with 83 provosts or deans, and 450 pastors. The largest city and the royal residence is Christiania (230,000 inhabitants), the seat of government, of the Parliament (Storting), of the chief executive, of the state university, and of the higher schools. The most important city is Bergen (50,000 inhabitants), important even in the Middle Ages and for a long time controlled. by the Hanseatic League. Trondheim, formerly Nidaros, a city of 10,000 inhabitants, was earlier the see of the Catholic archbishops, and the place where the Catholic Church was established. Here, too, was the cathedral, now in process of restoration, contains the bones of St. Olaf, the patron saint of Norway. The army is not highly trained; men between twenty-three and thirty-three years of age liable for military duty. The most well-manned navy is only used for coast-defence.

History.—Unlike the Swedes and Danes, the Norwegians were not organized even so late as the ninth century. The name of king was borne by the chiefs and heads of separate clans, but their authority was limited and the rights of the subjects very extensive. Only by marauding expeditions were the Vikings able to gain honour and wealth, and at times also to acquire control of extensive districts. Their early history is lost in the fabulous tales of the bards. In 872, Harold Hårtegjarl (Fair-Haired), after a decisive sea-fight near Stavanger, established his authority over all the clans. These refusing to submit left the country and their possessions were confiscated. When Harold divided his kingdom among several sons, its permanence seemed once more uncertain, but Hakon the Good (q.v.) restored a transient unity and procured an entrance for Christianity. Olaf Tryggvesson continued the work of union after Hakon's death, and promoted the new religion, and in a second war with Haarfaegar, Haarfaegar, the united forces of the Danes and Swedes he was killed about 1000 near Svolder (of uncertain location). The kingdom now fell apart, some portions coming under Cnut the Great of Denmark.

Finally Olaf, son of Harold Grenseke and a descendant of Harold Hårtegjarl (1015), re-established the boundaries of Norway, and aided Christianity to its final victory. At a later date Olaf became the patron saint of Norway. His severity so embittered the great families that they combined with Cnut and forced him to flee the country. Returning with a small army from Sweden, he was defeated and killed in the battle of Stiklestad (29 July, 1030). His heroic death and the marvellous phenomena that occurred in connexion with his body completely changed the feeling of his opponents. His son Magnus the Good, was unanimously chosen his successor (1035), and the Danish invaders were driven away. Magnus died childless, and the kingdom was united by half-brother Harold, son of Sigurd. Harold had won fame and wealth as a Viking, and had been an important personage at the Byzantine Court. On account of his grimness he was called Harthadora (the Stern). Impelled by ambition, he first waged a bloody war with Denmark, and then with England. On his incursion into Northumberland, he was defeated at the battle of Stamford Bridge (1066). His son, Olaf the Quiet, repaired the injuries caused the country by Harold Hardrada's policy. Olaf's successor, Magnus, conquered the Scotch islands, waged successful war with Sweden, and even gained parts of Ireland, where he was killed in a sea-fight. One of his sons, Hakon (the traveller to Jerusalem), went on a crusade to the Holy Land, while another son, Eystein, peacefully acquired Jutland, a part of Sweden. With Sigurd's death (1130) the kingdom entered upon a period of disorder caused partly by strife between claimants to the throne, partly by rivalry between the secular and ecclesiastical dignitaries, whose partisans (known as the Birkbeinar and the Baglar) perpetrated unbelievable outrages and cruelty on each other. The power of the king sank steadily, while that of the bishops increased. For a time Sverre (1177-1202) seemed successful, but he was not attended by his grandson, Hakon the Old (1217-63). Hakon ruled with wisdom and force and was highly regarded by the rulers of other countries. During his reign Norway reached its greatest extent, including Greenland and Iceland. He died in the Orkney Islands (1263) while returning from an expedition against the Scotch.

His peace-loving son Magnus Langhelle (the Law-Mender) tried to follow the example of his father, but he was unsuccessful in his efforts to promote commerce and intercourse. Not only, as the Hanseatic League, to which he granted many privileges, used these to the detriment of the country, and gradually brought it into a state of grievous dependence. His lack of energy and order led to the deposition of Magnus, Hakon V, the male line of Harold Hårtegjarl became extinct. The crown went to the three year old King Magnus Eriksson of Sweden, son of Hakon's daughter, Ingeborg; this brought about for the first time a close union between the two kingdoms of Norway and Sweden. When King Magnus assumed the crown in 1322 he was only three years old. Although possessing many good qualities, he lacked force. He seldom came to Norway, and the Norwegians felt themselves neglected. They forced him, when holding court at Varberg (1343), to send his younger son Hakon as vicecy to Norway, where Hakon soon gathered an independent court, and in 1335 became the actual ruler. Seven years later he was elected King of Sweden by a part of the Swedish nobility, but had to yield to Duke Albert of Mecklenburg, chosen by an opposing faction. In 1363 Hakon married Margaret, daughter of King Waldemar of Denmark, and a year later he forced his father to accept the kingdom. As Waldemar, when he died in 1357, left no male descendants, he was succeeded by his son, Olaf. Olaf also became King of Norway upon the death of his father, and died in 1387. His mother, able and energetic ruler, entered at once upon the administration of Denmark. In Norway she was not only made ruler for life, but her nephew, Eric of Pomerania, was acknowledged as the lawful heir. Meanwhile, Albert of Mecklenburg, greatly disliked in Sweden and the estates, entered into negotiations with Margaret, whose troops took him prisoner (1389). The same year Eric was acknowledged King of Norway, and in 1397-9 as King of Denmark and Sweden. In 1397 the chief men of the three countries met at Kalmar to arrange a basis for a permanent legal confederation (the Union of Kalmar). The plan failed, as no one country was willing to make the sacrifice necessary for the interest of all, but Eric was crowned king of the three united lands. Secure in power he led his people up to his time carried on a wearying activity he journeyed everywhere, watched over the administration of law and government, cut down the great estates of the nobles for the benefit of the crown, and protected the ordinary freeman. Denmark was always her first interest. She placed her children and grandsons in Scandinavia, and especially in that country to accept Danish bishop; the result was often unfortunate, as in the appointment of the Archbishop of Upsala (1408). Margaret's efforts to regain former possessions of the three Scandinavian countries were successful only in one case; she purchased the Island of Gotland from the Teutonic Knights. She died suddenly (1412) in the harbour of Flensburg whither she had gone to obtain Schleswig from the Counts of Holstein. Left to himself, the headstrong and hot-tempered Eric made one mistake after another and soon found all the Hanseatic towns on the Baltic against him. Conditions were still worse after the death of his one faithful counsellor, his wife Philippa, daughter of Henry IV of England. In Sweden increasing taxes, constant disputes with the clergy, and the appointment of bad officials aroused a universal discontent, which led to dangerous outbreaks. Vain attempts were made (1430) by Hakon VI to regain Norway. In 1439 the Danish threatened with regard to his promises, Eric withdrew to Gotland, where he remained inactive. In 1438 his deposition was declared by Norway and Sweden, and his nephew, Duke Christopher of Bavaria, was elected king. Upon Christopher's early death (1448) the union was virtually dissolved, the Swedes chose Karl Knutsson as king, and the Danes called Count Christian of Oldenburg to the throne. At first Norway wavered between the two, but Christian was able to retain control.

Of Christian's two sons Hans was at first only ruler of Denmark and Norway, but, by an agreement made at Calmar, he was able to gain Sweden also. Yet it was only after defeating Sten Sture that his position in Sweden was secure. King Hans I was succeeded (1513) in Denmark and Norway by his son, Christian II. Christian's cruelty in the conquered Swedes prepared the way for the defection of that country to Gustavus Vasa; consequently, he was indirectly responsible for the withdrawal of Sweden from Catholic unity. Christian soon aroused dissatisfaction in his own country. Undue preference granted to the lower classes turned the nobility against him, and his undisguised efforts to open the way for the teachings of Luther repelled loyal Catholics. Serious disorders followed in Jutland, and Christian, losing courage, sought to save himself by flight. With the aid of the Hanseatic League his uncle, Duke Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein, soon acquired possession of his kingdoms. The new king and his son, Christian III, were fanatical adherents of the new doctrine, and by craft and force broke the church dignities (1536). In Norway Archbishop Olaf of Trondhjem laboured in vain for the maintenance of Catholicism and the establishment of national independence. The majority of the peasants were indifferent and the impoverished nobility, who hoped to benefit by the introduction of the "pure Gospel", urged Christian on. After the departure of the church dignities Christian acquired the mastery of the country (1537). Norway now ceased to be an independent state. While retaining the name of kingdom it was for nearly three hundred years (until 1814) only a Danish province, administered by Danish officials and at times outrageously plundered. Here, as in Sweden and Denmark, people were gradually and systematically turned away from the Catholic Faith, though it was long before Catholicism was completely extinguished. The last Bishop of Holum in Iceland, Jon Arason, died a martyr. The king and the nobility seized the lands of the Church. The chief nobles acquired inordinate influence, and the landed proprietors, once so proud of their independence, fell under the control of foreign tyrants.

As regards territorial development in the Middle Ages, Norway had a number of tributary provinces—in the north, Finnmark, inhabited by heathen Lapps; various groups of islands south-west of Norway as: the Farve Islands, the Orkneys, the Shetlands, and the Isle of Man in the Irish Sea, to which were added later Iceland and Greenland. During the period of the union, Norway also included Bohuslen, Harjedalen, Jemtland, and some smaller districts, all now belonging to Sweden. With these islands and outlying ter-
Greenland. Jemtland was subject to the Swedish Archidioecese of Upsala. There were a thousand well-endowed churches, thirty monasteries, and various orders of women: Benedictines, Cistercians, Precmonstratensians, Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Brigitines. Schools were attached to the cathedrals and to most of the monasteries. For higher education Norwegians went to foreign universities, especially to Paris.

From the reign of Christian III Norway shared the fortunes of Denmark. Christian's son, Frederick II (1559-88), paid no attention to Norway, but much was done for the country during the long reign of Christian, who endeavored to develop the country by encouraging mining at Konberg and Rosan, and to protect it from attack by improving the army. Jenthiel and Herjullden, however, had to be ceded to Sweden. Frederick III (1618-70) was also obliged to cede Bohuslan. Frederick V (1746-66) encouraged art, learning, commerce, and manufactures. Prosperity strengthened the self-reliance of the people and their desire for political independence.

In 1807 they were granted autonomous administration, and in 1811 a national university was founded at Christiana. Political events enabled Sweden to force Denmark in the Treaty of Kiel to relinquish Norway. Minorsians not only had the advantage of a national diet, held at Eidsvold (17 May, 1814), agreed upon a constitution and chose as king the popular Danish prince, Christian Frederik. But the Powers interfered and ratified the union with Sweden. The Swedish monarch, Charles John XIV, Oscar I, Charles XV, and Oscar II, had a difficult position to maintain in Norway. Notwithstanding zealous and successful efforts to promote the material and intellectual prosperity of the land, they never attained popularity, nor could they reconcile national dislikes. Friction increased, the Norwegian parliament growing steadily more radical and even becoming the exponent of republican ideas. From 1834 the Storting, which now possessed the real power, steadily urged the dissolution of the union, and on 7 June, 1805, declared it to be dissolved. The Swedish Government naturally was unwilling to consent to this revolutionary action. Negotiations were successfully concluded at the Lausanne Congress, in 1814. Karstedt.

The Norwegians elected as king Prince Charles of Denmark, who, under the title of Hakon VII, has since then reigned over the country.

Ecclesiastical History.—Little is known of the religious ideas of the heathen Norwegians, and this little rests on later sources, chiefly on the Edda of the thirteenth century. It seems that the heathen worshipped both natural animals, but also human beings (even kings), were sacrificed to the gods, of whom first Thor (after Odin) was the most important. The early Norwegians were characterized by reckless courage and a cruelty that alternated with generosity and magnanimity. Hakon the Good and Olaf Tryggveson laboured to introduce Christianity, and during the reign of Olaf Haroldsson Christianity became, nominally at least, the prevailing religion. Olaf Haraldsson was a zealous adherent of the new faith. He built churches, founded schools, and exerted influence by his personal example. After his death he was revered as a saint; the church built at Nidaros (now Trondhjem) over his grave was replaced later by the cathedral of Trondhjem, the finest building in Norway. The Dioceses of Nidaros, Bergen, Oslo, and Stavanger were soon founded, monks and nuns carried on successful missionary work, and in a short time Christianity was established in all the northern parts of Norway. It was a movement of reformation of the general society, but not of the minds of the people. Whether the sons of saints was threatened with severe punishment. Notwithstanding this, it was only slowly and by the aid of deception that the people were seduced from the ancestral faith. Catholicism did not die out in Norway until the beginning of the seventeenth century. The Supreme Council of the Dioceses went first to the Nunciature of Cologne, and then to Brussels, but the 244 Pracconian laws of Denmark made Catholic instruction almost impossible. Whether the Jesuits appointed to Norway ever went there is unknown. A Dominican who reached the country was expelled after a few weeks. The Norwegian convert Ragnhild was permitted to remain, but was not allowed to exercise his office. Conditions remained the same, later, when the supervision was transferred from Brussels to Cologne, from Cologne to Hildesheim, and thence to Osmbriick.

There was no change until the nineteenth century when the Union of 1814 and succeeding years released all dissenters, including Catholics who had come into the country, from the control of the Lutheran state Church. From the time of its foundation the Lutheran Church had wavered between orthodoxy and rationalism, and was finally much affected by the French Revolution. Faith and its institutions, however, were well entrenched.

The Catholic parish was formed in Christiania, and from this centre efforts were made to found new stations. In 1860 Pius IX created an independent prefecture Apostolic for Norway. The first prefect was a Frenchman, Bernard, formerly prefect of the North Pole mission. He was followed by the Luxemburg priest.
Fallize, later Bishop of Alusa, under whom the mission has steadily developed, although not yet large. Especially noteworthy among the men who of late years have labored for the Hønefossers and their friends, is the former gymnasial rector Svenerson, and the author Kroogh-Tonning, doctor of theology, originally a Lutheran pastor at Christiania. All monastic orders, Jesuits excepted, are allowed, but there are no monasteries for men. On the other hand the missionaries of the female congregations, Sisters of St. Elizabeth, Sisters of the Holy Cross and Sisters of Charity, have made a large number of converts. The most striking achievements of Norwegian architecture are the cathedral of St. Magnus at Kirkwall in the Orkneys, and, what is even finer, the cathedral at Trondheim. The latter has had a chequered history. Built originally in 1077, by Olaf the Quiet (Kyrr) as a "Christ Church" of one aisle over the bones of St. Olaf, it served at first as the burial place of the kings. When in 1152 Trondheim (Nidaros) was made an archdiocese, it became a place of pilgrimage for the entire kingdom, and the gifts of the faithful made possible the necessary enlargement of the cathedral. In 1161 Archbishop Eystein Erlandson began its restoration in the Romanesque style. From 1179 to 1210 he became acquainted during his stay in England with Gothic architecture and made use of this style on his return. This is especially evident in the unique octagon erected over St. Olaf's grave, evidently an imitation of "Becket's Crown" in Canterbury cathedral. Eystein's successors completed the building according to his plans. The cathedral was twice damaged by fire but each time was repaired (in 1328 and in 1432). It fell into almost complete ruin after the great fire of 5 May, 1531, and for several hundred years no attention was paid to it. A change came with the awakening of national pride, and the restoration of the cathedral was commenced. Its most valuable treasures, the body of the great Apostle of Norway St. Olaf and the costly shrine that enclosed it, have disappeared. In 1537 the shrine was taken to Copenhagen, robbed of its jewels, and melted, while the bones of the saint were buried by fanatics in some unknown place to put an end forever to the venerating of the shrine. When the carvings, paintings, and other objects of art, which formerly adorned Norwegian churches, have been either carried off or destroyed.

This was not so frequently the case in the northern part of the country, and in other districts some few objects escaped. Among the works of art especially interesting to be noticed are two wooden carvings which are supposed to have been presented by the altar of the Virgin in the Church of Our Lady at Bergen, and the altar in the Ringersaker church on Lake Nysen; (in painting) the antependium at Gal; (in relief work) the doorways of the churches at Hyllestad and Hennecadalen made after English models, and the fine work at the chancel of the former royal palace at Bergen. Beautifully carved chairs, rich tapestries, and fine chased work are further proof of the degree of culture attained by Catholic Norway.

History of Art.—Norway can hardly be said to have an indigenous literature. As regards material and arrangement, the chronicles and narratives are very much the same both in the north and the south (for Icelandic see ICELANDIC LITERATURE).

We have treat specifically Protestant literature only so far as it is related to Catholicism. Among the few notable works, such as the handsome Munch, refer in poetry or prose to the Catholic era in Norway, and thus indirectly further the interests of the Church. The historical investigations and writings of Bang, Dietrichson, Daae, and Bugge have overthrown many historical misstatements and judgments prejudicial to Catholicism. These works have made even Protestants in Norway, so that its position towards Rome is relatively more friendly than in other countries. If heretofore no Norwegian Catholic has made a great contribution to the national literature the reason is obvious. Of late years, however, various books have been published of an edifying, apologistic, and biological nature.

There is a Catholic weekly, the "St. Olav."

Norwich (Nordovictum; Norvicum), Ancient Diocese of.—Though this see took its present name only in the eleventh century, its history goes back five hundred years earlier to the conversion of East Anglia by St. Felix in the reign of King Sigebert, who succeeded to the kingdom of his father Redwald on the death of his half-brother Eorwald in 628. St. Felix fixed his see at Dunwich, a sea-coast town since submerged, the site of which is in Southwold Bay. From Dunwich, St. Felix evangelized Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire, the counties which were to become the county of Norfolk (617), Beorgulfsa (Boniface), who died about 669, and Bisi, on whose death, in 673, St. Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, divided the see into two with cathedrals at Dunwich and Elham. The following are the lines of episcopal succession based on the most recent research, with approximate dates of accession where known:

Dunwich: Eci, 673; Alices; Esseulu; Eareld; Ealdbeorht I; Ealdewulf; Cuthwine; Ealdbeorht II; Ecgfrith; Heareld; Ethhun, 790; Tidfrith, 798; Waermund; Wilred, 825. Elham: Beaudurna, 673; Nothbeorht; Berfralcy; Ethfrith; Esseulu; Ealdewulf; Earfrith; Sibsa; Hunfrith; St. Humbeorht; Cunda (there is some doubt as to whether Cunda was Bishop of Elham or Dunwich).
The See of Elmham came to an end about 870, when St. Edmund, King of the East Angles, and Bishop St. Huneberch were murdered by the Danes. The country was ravaged, the churches and monasteries destroyed, and the Church was only partly restored (reconstituted) by Bishop Wilfred of Dunwich. It seems to have reunited the dioceses, choosing Elmham as its see. His successors at Elmham were:

- Huon: Etherewald, Ethedulf; Ethellre; Eadulf; Elfric: and Ethelrid. He died in 1084, and was succeeded by William de Bellofago, also known as William Gabagius (1086-91).

William de Bellofago was succeeded by Herbert de Losinga, who made a sumptuous gift to King William Rufus to secure his election, but being subsequently struck with remorse went to Rome, in 1094, to obtain absolution from the pope. He founded the priory of Norwich in expiation for his and at the same time moved his see there from Thetford. The chapter of secular canons was dissolved, and the monks took their place. The foundation-stone of the new cathedral was laid in 1096, in honour of the Blessed Trinity. Before his death, in 1119, he had completed the choir, which is apsidal and encircled by a processional path, and which originally gave place to a long Norman chapel. His successor, Bishop Elborard, completed the long Norman nave so that the cathedral is a very early twelfth-century building though modified by later additions and alterations. The chief of these were the Lady chapel (circa 1250, destroyed by the Protestant Dean Cardiner 1575-80); the cloisters (circa 1300), the west window (1250-1410), the roof screen, the spire and the vault spanning the nave (circa 1450). The cathedral suffered much during the Reformation and the civil wars.

The list of bishops of Norwich, with the dates of their accession, is as follows:

- Herbert Losinga, consecrated in 1091, translated the see to Norwich in 1094; Elborard de Montgomery, 1121; William de Turbe, 1146; John of Oxford, 1175; John de Grey, 1200; Ralph Mas, 1222; Thomas de Blunville, 1236; Ralph de Norwich, 1236; vacancy; 1236; William de Rabeng, 1239; vacancy, 1242; Walter de Suffolk, 1249; Edmund de Layton, 1258; Robert de Thetford, 1262; William de Middleton, 1275; Ralph de Walepole, 1249; John Sahon, 1299; William de Avermeine, 1325; Anthony Bek, 1337; William Bate-man, 1337; Thomas Percy, 1356; Henry de Despenser, 1370; Alexander de Tottoning, 1397; Richard Courtemay, 1413; John Wakering, 1416; William Ahwynk, 1436; Thomas Brown, 1436; Walter Lyhart, 1446; James Goldwell, 1472; Thomas June, 1489; Richard Nykke, 1501; William Rugg (schismatic), 1536; Thomas Threlby (schismatic but reconciled in Mary's reign, 1550; John Hopton, 1551, who died in 1558, being the last Catholic Bishop of Norwich.

This diocese, which consisted of Norfolk and Suffolk with some parts of Cambridgeshire, was divided into four archdeaconries, Norfolk, Norwich, Suffolk, and Sudbury. At the end of the seventeenth century there were 1121 parish-churches, and this number had probably not changed much since Catholic times.

The chief religious houses in the diocese were:

- the Benedictine Abbeys of Bury St. Edmund's, Wymondham, and St. Benet's of Holm, the cathedral priory of Norwich, the Cistercian Abbey of Sionton, the abbeys of the Augustinian Canons at Woolingham, Langley, and Layton. The Dominicans and Franciscans were both found at Lynn, Norwich, Yarmouth, Dunwich, and Ipswich; the Dominicans also had houses at Thetford and Sudbury; the Franciscans at Bury St. Edmund's and Walsingham, where the great shrine of Our Lady was; the Carmelites were at Lynn, Norwich, Yarmouth, and Blakeney; and the Augustinian friars at Norwich, Lynn, and Orford. There were no Carmelites in the diocese. The See of the see were azure, three mitres with their labels, or.

Notaries (Lat. notarius), persons appointed by competent authority to draw up official or authentic documents. These documents are issued chiefly from the official administrative bureaux, the chanceries; secondly, from tribunals; lastly, others are drawn up at the request of individuals to authenticate their contracts or other acts. The public officials appointed to draw up these three classes of papers have been usually called notaries.

Economically, a notary is one who takes notes. Notes are autographs or cursive abbreviations to record the words uttered, so that they may be reproduced later in ordinary writing. Notaries were at first private secretaries, attached to the service of persons in positions of importance. It was natural for the science of notes to be in high esteem among those employed in recording the transactions of public boards, and the name notary to be applied to these officials; so that before long the word was used to signify their occupation.

The title and office existed at the Imperial Court (cf. Cod. Theod., VI, 16, “De primicerio et notariis”), whence they passed into all the royal chanceries, though in the course of time the term notary ceased to be used. This was the case also with the chancelleries of the pope, the great episcopal sees, and even every bishopric. There are grounds for doubting whether the seven regional notaries of the Roman Church, one for each ecclesiastical district of the Holy City, was instituted by the pope, and voluntarily accepted by him to record the acts of the martyrs, as is said in the “Liber Pontificioalis” (“Vita Clementis”, ed. Duchesne, I, 123); they date back, however, to an early age. Not only were there notaries as soon as a bureau for ecclesiastical documents was established, but in very ancient days we find these notaries forming a kind of college presided over by a primicerius; the notice of Julius I in the “Liber Pontificioalis” relates that this pope ordered an account of the property of the Church, intended as an authentic document, to be drawn up before the primicerius of the notaries.

The latter were in the ranks of the clergy and must have received one of the minor orders; for the notariate is an office and not an order. At intervals the popes entrusted the notaries of their curia with various missions. Their chief, the primicerius, with whom a secondarius is sometimes found later, was the most important personage, in fact, the head of the pontifical chancery; during the vacancy of the papal chair, he formed part of the interim Government, and a letter in 610 (Jaffé, “Regesta”, n. 10) is signed (the pope being elected but not yet consecrated) by one “Joannes primicerius et servans locum s. sedis apostolicae”.

There were of course many notaries in the service of the pontifical chancery; the seven regional notaries preserved a certain pre-eminence over the others and became the prothonotaries, whose name and office continued. The ordinary notaries of the chancery, however, were gradually known by other names, according to their various functions, so that the term ceased to be employed in the pontifical and other chanceries. The prothonotaries were and still are a college of prelates, enjoying numerous privileges; they pronounced judgments in their participants', but outside of Rome there are many purely honorary prothonotaries. The official duties had insensibly almost ceased; but Pius X in his reorganization of the Roman Curia has appointed participant prothonotaries to the chancery (Const. Sapien", 29 June, 1908).

A collection of documents drawn up in the eleven years of the episcopal churches, abbeys, etc.; the officials attached to the chancery have ceased to be known as notaries and are called chancellor, secretary, etc. Lastly, mention must be made of the notaries of the synodal or conciliar assemblies, whose duties are limited to the duration of the assembly.

Society in former times did not recognize the separation of powers; so, too, in the Church the judicial authority was vested in the same prelates as the administrative. Soon, however, contentious matters were tried separately before a specially appointed body. Each prelate required a staff to record the transactions; these clerks became the so-called notaries. In civil courts they are, however, called registrars, clerks of the court, etc., but in the ecclesiastical tribunals they retain the name notary, though they are also called actuaries. Thus the special-law of the higher ecclesiastical tribunals, the Rota and the Signatura, reorganized by Pius X, provides for the appointment of notaries for these two tribunals (cud. vand xxx).

The reason why the head official charged with drawing up the documents of the Holy Office is called the notary, as were the clerks who in former times drew up the records of the Inquisition, is, doubtless, that of all the congregations the Holy Office is the only real judicial tribunal. The notaries of ecclesiastical tribunals are usually clerics; the duties may however be confided to laymen, except in criminal cases against a cleric.

Lastly, there is the class of persons to whom the term notary is restricted in common parlance, to wit, those who are appointed by the proper authorities to witness the documentary proceedings between private persons and to impress them with legal authenticity. They are not engaged in the chanceries, in order that they may be within easy reach of private individuals; they have a public character, so that their testimony is not to be used as the only proof; yet, they are considered as authentic accounts of the particular transactions, especially agreements, contracts, testaments, and wills.

Consequently, public notaries may be appointed only by those authorities who possess jurisdiction in fora externa, and have a chancery, e.g. popes, bishops, emperors, reigning princes, and of course only within the limits of their jurisdiction; moreover, the territory within which a notary can lawfully exercise his functions is expressly determined. There were formerly Apostolic notaries and even episcopal notaries, duly commissioned by papal or episcopal letters, whose duty it was to receive documents relating to ecclesi-astrical or mixed affairs, especially in connexion with benefices, foundations, and donations in favour of churches, wills of clerics, etc. They no longer exist; the only ecclesiastical notaries at present are the officials of the Roman and episcopal curia. Moreover the commission was by lampoon, and Canon Law forbids clerics to acts as scriptores (c. vii, "Ne clerici vel monachi", I, III, tit. 50).

Notburga, SAINT, patroness of servants and peasants, b. c. 1200, at Rattenberg on the Inn; d. c. 16 September, 1313. She was canonically admitted to the new Order of Count Henry of Rottenburg, and used to give food to the poor. But Ottilia, her mistress, ordered her to feed the swine with whatever food was left. She, therefore, saved some of her own food, especially on Fridays, and brought it to the poor. One day, according to legend, her master commanded her to show him what she was carrying. She obeyed, but instead of the food she saw only shavings, and the wine he found to be vinegar. Hereupon Ot-tilia dismissed her, but soon fell dangerously ill, and Notburga remained to nurse her and prepare her for death.

Notburga then entered the service of a peasant in the town of Eben, on condition that she be permitted to go to church the evenings before Sundays and festivals. One evening her master urged her to continue working in the field. "Throwing her sickle into the air she said: 'Let my sickle be judged between me and you,' and the sickle remained suspended in the air. "Meantime Count Henry of Rottenburg was visited with great reverses which he ascribed to the dismissal of Notburga. He engaged her again and thenceforth all went well in his household. Shortly before her death she told her master to place her casket on a wagon drawn by oxen, and to keep her whenever the oxen would stand still. The oxen drew the wagon to the chapel of St. Rupert near Eben, where she was buried. Her ancient cult was ratified on 27 March, 1862, and her feast is celebrated on 14 September. She is generally represented with a ear of corn, or flowers and a sickle in her hand; sometimes with a sickle suspended in the air.

Her legendary life was first compiled in Germany by Graun-

Notburga, legendary daughter of Dagobert I, who is said to have lived in a cave near Hochhausen on the Neckar in Baden. Many legends are related as to the sanctity and holiness of her life. After her death her body was placed on a chariot drawn by two white oxen and carried to the place of her death, near the church of Hochhausen. It is very probable that the legend of St. Notburga, the daughter of Dagobert I, is merely a distortion of that of St. Notburga of Rattenberg.

in the first legislature of Belgium. He declared for the district of Arlon to which, in 1831, he gave proof of his gratitude by doing his utmost to prevent its union with Germany. Nothomb, who was the youngest member of the legislative assembly, was appointed one of the members of the committee on foreign affairs. In the chamber he strongly opposed the advocates of the union of Belgium with France and those who were for a republican government. His political ideal, which he defended with great eloquence, was a representative monarchy with two houses, liberty of the press, and complete independence, in their own spheres, of the secular and religious powers.

From 1831–36 he was general secretary for foreign affairs; with Devaux he went to London to carry on secret negotiations at the conference which had met in that city to settle the new state of affairs created by the Belgian revolution, and did much to remove the difficulties which had delayed the departure for Belgium of Leopold of Saxe-Coburg. He published in 1833 his "Essai historique et politique sur la révolution belge", a remarkable work which was translated into German and Italian. Nothomb resigned from the ministry in the same year. In 1836 Nothomb was again appointed general secretary for foreign affairs and in 1837 became minister of Public Works in the Catholic administration of de Theux. He gave a powerful impetus to the construction of railroads and when he resigned in 1840 more than 200 kilometres had been built. Later he was sent as an extraordinary envoy to the German Confederation and in 1841 became minister of the interior in a unionist administration; but the positions of the parties were not what they had been in the preceding decade, and Nothomb soon realized that a union of the Catholics and Liberals was no longer possible. In 1845 he withdrew from the political arena to enter the diplomatic corps. He was for many years minister plenipotentiary of Belgium in Berlin. In 1840 he had become a member of the Royal Academy of Brussels; and he received many distinctions from foreign countries.

Notitia Dignitatum (Register of Offices), the official handbook of the civil and military officials in the later Roman Empire. The extant Latin form belongs to the early fifth century. The last addenda concern the Empire during the last chronological limit, while supplementary notices concerning the Western Empire extend into the reign of Valentinian III (425–55). The bulk of the statements, however, point to earlier years of the fourth century, individual notices showing conditions at the beginning of this century. The first part of the "Notitia" gives a list of the officials in the Eastern Empire: "Notitia dignitatum omnium tam civilium quam militaria in partibus Orientis"; the second part gives a corresponding list for the Western Empire: "Notitia dignitatum omnium tam civilium quam militaria in partibus Occidentis". Both give, first the highest official positions of the central administration, then the offices of the subordinates to these, and also the officials of the various "dioceses" and provinces, the civil officials being regularly stated along with the military. In addition, the insignia of the officials and of the army divisions are shown by drawings. This register was used in the imperial chancery; the chief official of the chancery (primicerius notarii) found it in all necessary information for treating the documents of the various departments of officials and of their positions. The "Notitia", as preserved as it is in an incomplete condition, is partly an abstract, partly anexact transcript of this official register.

It shows that at various periods, extending as late as the first part of the fifth century, additions were made to the state register and gives the essential form of the list in the era that had passed. It is, therefore, a very important authority for the divisions of the Empire, for an understanding of the Roman bureaucracy, and for the distribution of the army during the last Roman Empire. The first printed edition was "Notitia urbis Constantinopolis et Laterculi provinciarum" (Berlin, 1876). The latest editions were edited by Becking (2 vols., Bonn, 1859–53), and O. Seck, "Notitia dignitatum. Accedunt Notitia urbis Constantinopolis et Laterculi provinciarum" (Berlin, 1876). Notitia Episcopatum, the name given to official documents that furnish for Eastern countries the list and hierarchical rank of the metropolitan and suffragan bishoprics of a Church. While, in the Patriarchate of Rome, archbishops and bishops were classed according to the seniority of their consecration, and in Africa according to their age, in the Eastern patriarchates the hierarchical rank of each bishop was determined by the see he occupied. Thus, in the Patriarchate of Constantinople, the first metropolitan was not the longest ordained, but the one who happened to be the incumbent of the See of Caesarea; the second was the Archbishop of Ephesus, and so on. In every ecclesiastical province, the rank of each suffragan was thus determined, and remained unchanged unless the list was subsequently modified. The hierarchical order included first of all, the patriarch; then the greater metropolitans, i.e., those who had dioceses with suffragan sees: the autocephalous metropolitans, who had their sees directly subject to the patriarch; next archbishops who, although not differing from autocephalous metropolitans, occupied hierarchical rank inferior to theirs, and were also immediately dependent on the patriarch; then simple bishops, i.e., exempt bishops, and lastly suffragan bishops. It is not known by whom the ancient order was established, but it is likely that, in the beginning, metropolitan sees and simple bishopries must have been classified according to the date of their respective foundations, this order being modified later on for political and religious considerations. We owe the appearance of the list to Church, the principal of these documents.

A. Constantinople: The "Esthetic of pseudo-Ephiphanius", a revision of an earlier Notitia episcopatum (probably compiled by Patriarch Ephipanius under Justinian), made during the reign of Heraclius (about 610); a Notitia dating back to the first years of the ninth century and differing but little from the earlier one; the "Notitia of Basil the Armenian", drawn up between 820 and 842; the Notitia compiled by Emperor Leo VI the Philosopher, and Patriarch Nicholas Mysterious between 901 and 907, modifying the hierarchical order which had been established in the seventh century, but had been disturbed by the incorporation of the ecclesiastical provinces of Illyricum and Southern Italy in the Byzantine Patriarchate; the Notitia episcopatum of Constantine Por-phyrogenitus (about 940), of Tzimisces (about 950), of Alexis Connenus (about 1084), of Nil Doxopatris (1143), of Manuel Connenus (about 1170), of Isaac Angelus (end of twelfth century), of Michael VIII Palaeologus (about 1270), of Andronicus II Palaeologus (about 1299), and of Andronicus III (about 1350). All these Notitia are published in Gebhardt's "Ungedruckte und unungemiegene Texte der Notitiae episcopatuum" (Munich, 1900); Gezer, "Georgii Cyprii Descriptio orbis romani" (Leipzig, 1890); Gezer, "Index lectionum Iena" (Jena, 1892); Parthey, "Hierochis Synecdekes" (Berlin, 1866). The later works are only more or less modified copies of Gebhardt, and do not present the true situation, which was profoundly changed by the Mussulman invasions. After the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, another Notitia was written, portraying the real situation (Gezer, "Ungedruckte Texte der Notitiae episcopatuum", 613-37), and on it are based nearly all those which have been since written. The term Synagoga is now used by the Greeks for these documents.

B. We know of only one "Notitia episcopatuum" for the Church of Antioch, viz. that drawn up in the sixth century by Patriarch Anastasius see Valinde, in "Echos d'Orient" 8, pp. 100-101, 123. Jern's "Jerusalem and Jerash" has no such document, nor has Alexandria, although for the latter Gezer has collected documents which may help to supply the deficiency (Byz. Zeitschrift, II, 23-10). De Rouge (Geographie ancienne de la Basse-Egypte, Paris, 1861, 151-61) has published a Copitic document which has not yet been studied. For the Bulgarian Church of Achrida, see Gezer, "Byz. Zeitschrift", II, 40-66, and "Der Patriarchat von Achrida" (Leipzig, 1902). M. Gerland has just announced for 1913 a critical and definitive new edition of all the Notitiae episcopatuum of the Churches of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, Cyprus, Achrida, Ipek, Russia, and Beulacomers.

In addition to the works cited, a supplementary bibliography will be found in Kremsrmacher, Gesch. der byz. Lit., (Munich, 1897), II, 416.

Notitia Provinciarum et Civitatum Africa (List of the Provinces and Cities of Africa), a list of the bishops and their sees in the Latin provinces of North Africa, arranged according to provinces, Galli, Numidia, Byzacena, Mauretania Caesariensis, Mauretania Sitifensis, Tripolitana, Sardinia. The date of its preparation was the summoning of the episcopate to Carthage, 1 February, 181, by the Arian King of the Vandals, Henaer (147-51). It names also the exiled bishops and vacant sees, and is an important authority for the history of the African Church and the geography of these provinces. It is incorporated in the only extant manuscript to the history of the Vandal persecution by Bishop Victor of Vita, and is printed in the editions of this work.

Notker.—Among the various monks of St. Gall who bore this name, the following are the most important: (1) NOTKER BALRBUS (STAMMERER), Blessed, monk and author, b. about 830, at Jonswid, canton of St. Gall (Switzerland); d. 912. Of a distinguished family, he received his education with Tuotilo, originator of tropes, at St. Gall's, from Is and the Irishman Moengall, teachers in the monastic school. He became one of the most learned and pious monks (990), and as master of guests (992-94). He was chiefly active as teacher, and displayed refinement of taste as poet and author. He completed Erchandert's chonicle (816), arranged a martyrology, and composed a metrical biography of St. Gall. It is practically accepted that he is the "monk of St. Gall" (mannach Singallensis), author of the legends and anecdotes "Gesta Caroli Magni." The number of works ascribed to him is constantly increasing. He introduced the sequence, a new species of religious lyric, into Germany. It had been the custom to prolong the sequence in the singing of the liturgy, modulating through a skilfully harmonized series of notes. Notker learned how to fit the separate syllables of a Latin text to the tones of this jubilation; this poem was called the sequence (q. v., formerly called the "jubilation". (The reason for this name is uncertain.) Between SS1-SS7 Notker defected a collection of such verses in the service of Bishop Lantin, by which he leaves one to guess which or how many are his. Eckelhard IV, the historian of St. Gall, speaks of fifty sequences attributable to Notker. The hymn, "Media Vita", was erroneously attributed to him late in the Middle Ages. Eckelhard IV links him as "deline of body but not of mind, stuttering of tongue but not of intellect, pushing boldly forward in things Divine as a vessel of the Holy Spirit without equal in his time". Notker was beatified in 1512.

(2) NOTKER LABEO, monk in St. Gall and author, b. about 850; d. 1022. He was descended from a noble family and nephew of Eckehard I, the poet of Waltharins. "Laboe" means "the thick tippet", later he was named "the German" (Tutolonicus) in recognition of his services to the language. He came to St. Gall when only a boy, and thence acquired a vast and varied knowledge by omnivorous reading. His contemporaries admired him as a theologian, philologist, mathematician, astronomer, connoisseur of music and poet. He tells of his studies and his literary work in a letter to Bishop Hugo of Sitten (998-1017), but was obliged to give up the study of the liberal arts in order to devote himself to teaching. For the benefit of his pupils he had undertaken something before unheard, namely translations from Latin into German. He mentions eleven of these translations, but unfortunately only five are preserved: (1) Boethius, "De consolatione philosophiae"; (2) Marcellus Capella, "De nuptiarum Philologiæ Aurea"; (3) Aristotle, "De categoriis"; (4) Aristotle, "De interpretatione"; (5) "The Psalter". Among these last are: "The Book of Job", at which he worked for more than five years; "Disticha Catonis"; Vergil's "Bucolic", and the "Aenid" of Terence. Of his own writings he mentions in this letter a "New Rhodische" and a "New Continuata" and smaller works in Latin. We still possess the Rhetoric, the Computus (a manual for calculating the dates of ecclesiastical celebrations, especially of Easter), the essay "De partibus logici", and the German essay on Music.

L. Kogel's opinion Notker Labeo was one of the greatest stylists in German literature. "His achievements in this respect seem almost marvellous." His style, where it becomes most brilliant, is essentially poetical; he observes with surprising exactitude the laws of the language. Latin and German he commanded with equal fluency; and while he did not understand Greek, he learned enough of it to use what he could. He put an enormous amount of learning and erudition into his commentaries on his translations. There everything may be found that was of interest in his time; philosophy, universal and literary history, natural science, astronomy. He frequently quotes the Gospels and the fathers of the Church. It is characteristic of Notker that at his death that 150 of his manuscripts were buried, and that he asked to be buried in the clothes which he was wearing in order that none might see the heavy chain with which he had been in the habit of mortifying his body.

(3) NOTKER Physicus (surnamed PAPPUS GREGIUS, physician and painter, d. 12 Nov., 975). He received his surname on account of his strict discipline. Concerning his life we only know that in 956 or 957 he became cellarius, and in 965 hospitalarius at St. Gall. Ekkehard IV extols several of his paintings, and mentions some antiphons and hymns of his composition (e.g., hymn "Dona nobis pacem et uxorium sejus"). He is probably identical with a "Notker notarius", who enjoyed great consideration at the court of Otto I on account of his skill in medicine, and whose knowledge of medical books is celebrated by Ekkehard. In 990 this Notker wrote at Quenuillium the confirmation of the immunity of St. Gall. This is in accord with the great partiality later shown by the Ottos towards the monk, for example when they visited St. Gall in 972.

(4) NOTKER, nephew of Notker Physicus, d. 15 Dec., 975. We have no documentary information concerning him until his appointment as Abbot of St. Gall in 971. Otherwise also the sources are silent concerning him, except that they call him "abba benignus" and hate his unaffected piety.

(5) NOTKER, Provost of St. Gall and later Bishop of Liège, b. about 940, d. 10 April, 1008. This celebrated and mentioned Notker was the successor of a number of illustrious historians of St. Gall. He probably belonged to a noble Swabian family, and in 969 was appointed imperial chaplain in Italy. From 989 to 1008 he was Bishop of Liège. Through him the influence of St. Gall was extended to wider circles. He laid the foundations of the Lièges schools, to which studious men soon flocked from all Christendom. By procuring the services of Leo the Cabalistic and thus making possible the study of Greek, Notker gave notable extension to the Lièges curriculm. Among Notker's pupils, who extended the influence of the Lièges schools to wider wider circles, may be mentioned Hubald, Gander of Tillye, Gotfrid of Edwhin, C. of Cambray, Heinrich de Verdun, Hesseg de Toull, and Adlibald of Utrecht. Notker also engaged in architectural activity also manifested itself under Notker.

In Feiden's opinion Notker's achievements surpass those of any of his predecessors: among the buildings erected by him may be mentioned St. John's in Liège, after the model of the Aachen cathedral. Praiseworthy also were his services as a politician under Otto III and Henry II. He adhered faithfully to the cause of the romantic Otto, whom he accompanied to Rome. It was also he who brought back the corpse of the emperor to Germany. The "Ecclesia episcoporum Liédencensium" have been frequently wrongly ascribed to him, although he merely suggested its composition, and lent the work his name to secure its greater authority.

NOTE (Lat. Notorietas, notarium, from notus, known).—Notoriety is the quality or the state of things that are notorious; whatever is so fully or officially proved, that it may and ought to be held as certain without further investigation, is notorious. It is difficult to express exactly what is meant by notoriety, and, as the Glosses say (in canon. Manifesta, 15, C. ii, q. i), "we are constantly using the word notorius and are ignorant of its meaning". Ordinarily it is equivalent to public, manifest, evident, known; in these terms have meaning only when they signify that a thing, far from being secret, may be easily known by many.

Notoriety, in addition to this common idea, involves the idea of indisputable proof, so that what is notorious is held as proved and serves as a basis for the conclusions and acts of those in authority, especially judges. To be as precise as possible, "public" means what any one may easily prove or ascertain, what is done openly; what many persons know and hold as certain, is "manifest"; what a greater or less number of persons have learnt, no matter how, is "known"; what is to be held as certain and must be known is what is in question is "notorious".

Authorities distinguish between notoriety of fact, notoriety of law, and presumptive notoriety, though the last is often considered a subdivision of the second. Whatever is easily shown and is known by a sufficient number of persons to be free from reasonable doubt is notorious in fact. This kind of notoriety may refer to a past event which is indisputably known; or permanent facts, e.g., Titus is parish priest of this parish; or recurring facts, e.g., Sempronius engages in usurious transactions. Whatever has been judicially ascertained, viz., judicial admissions, an affair fully proved, and the judgment rendered in a lawsuit, is notorious in law; the judge accepts the fact as certain without investigation; nor will he allow, except in certain well-specified cases, the matter to be called in question. "Notorious" is then used as more or less synonymous with "official". Such also are facts recorded in official documents, as civil or ecclesiastical registers of births, deaths, or marriages, notarial records.

Lastly, whatever arises from a rule of law based on a "violent" presumption, for instance, paternity and filiation in case of a legitimate marriage, is presumptively notorious.

When a fact is admitted as notorious by the judge, and in general by a competent authority, no proof of it is required; but it is often asserted that it is notorious, as the judge is not expected to know every notorious fact. The notoriety has to be proved, like any other fact alleged in a trial, by witnesses or "instruments", that is, written documents. The witnesses swear that the fact in question is publicly known and admitted by the various witnesses in the quality of their own affair. The documents consist especially in extracts from the official registers, in the copies of authentic judicial papers, for instance, a judgment, or of notarial papers, known as "notarial acts", drawn up by public notaries on the conscientious declarations of well-informed witnesses.
Canons have variously classified the legal effects of notoriety, especially in matters of procedure; but, ultimately, they may all be reduced to one: the judge, and in general the person in authority, holding what is notorious to be certain and proved, requires no further information, and therefore, both may and ought to refrain from any judicial inquiry, proof, or formalities, which the amount of the case and the discretion of the judge having as their object to enlighten the judge, are useless when the fact is notorious. Such is the true meaning of the axiom that in notorious matters the judge need not follow the judicial procedure (cf. can. 14 and 16, C. ii, q. 1; can. 88 and 107; Deud. III, tit. ii; cap. 5, "De testib. censendo,"). Lib. II, tit. xii, art. 2. The essential solemnities of the procedure should ever be omitted. The most interesting application of the effect of notoriety in criminal matters is in connexion with the flagrants delictus, when the accused is caught in the criminal act, in which case the judge is dispensed from the necessity of any inquiry.

Notre Dame, Congregations of. — Congregation of Notre Dame de Montréal. — Marguerite Bourgeoys, the foundress, was born at Troyes, France, 17 April, 1620. She was the third child of Abraham Bourgeois, a merchant, and Guillemette Garnier, his wife. In 1653 Paul Chomedy de Maisonneuve, the founder of Ville Marie (Montréal), visited Troyes, and invited her to go to Canada to teach; she set out in June of that year, arrived at Ville Marie, and devoted herself to every form of works of mercy. She opened her first school on 30 April, 1657, but soon had to return to France for recruits, where four companions joined her. A boarding school and an industrial school were opened and sodalities were founded. In 1670 the foundress went back to France and returned in 1672 with letters from King Louis XIV and also with six new companions. In 1675 she built a chapel dedicated to Notre Dame de Bon Secours. To insure greater freedom of action Mother Bourgeois founded an unclerestoried community, its members bound only by six vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, and their national feast-day. Modelling their lives on that of Our Lady after the Ascension of Our Lord, they aided the pastors in the various parishes where converts of the order had been established, by instructing children.

Although the community had received the approbation of Rome in 1677, the erection was not immediate, as the French government were very desirous of having the conditions of non-enclosure and simple vows embodied in a rule. To confer with the bishop, who was then in France, she undertook a third journey to Europe. She returned the next year, and resisted the many attempts made in the next few years to push the new order in that of the Ursulines, or otherwise to change the character of the Congregation. For these reasons, in a mission on Mount Royal was opened for the instruction of Indian girls. This mission, under the auspices of the priests of St. Sulpice, was removed in 1701 to Sault au Reculot, and in 1720 to the Lake of Two Mountains. It still exists. The two towers still standing were erected for the protection of the Indians from the attacks of their enemies; they were expressly erected for the sisters of that mission; one for their residence, the other for their classes.

The sisters continued their labours in the schools of Ville Marie, and also prepared a number of young women as Christian nuns. A school at Pointe-aux-Trembles, near Montreal, at Laclide, at Champlain and Château Richer. In 1685 a mission was established at Sainte Famine on the Island of Orleans and was so successful that Mgr de St. Vallier, Bishop of Quebec, invited the sisters to open houses in that settlement, which was done. In 1680 he invited them to confer with Mother Bourgeoys in regard to a project of foundation. Though sixty-nine years of age, she set out at once on the long and perilous jour-nry on foot to Quebec, and had to suffer all the inconveniences of an April thaw. According to the demands of her foundation, she had the double consolation of obedience to the superior for keeping her sisters in their true vocation when, only four years later, the bishop himself became convinced that such was necessary. Mother Bourgeois asked repeatedly to be discharged from the superintendence, but not until 1693 did the bishop prevent her petition. In the meantime, in 1682, a second congregation, based upon those of the foundress, gathered from various sources, were formally accepted by the members. The next day they made their vows. The superior at the time was Mother of the Assumption (Barther). Mother Bourgeoys devoted the remainder of her life to the preparation of points of advice for the guidance of her sisterhood. She died on 12 January, 1700. On 7 Dec., 1878, she was declared venerable. The proclamation of the heroism of the virtues of the Venerable Marguerite Bourgeoys was officially made in Rome, 19 June, 1910. In 1701 the community numbered fifty-ty members. As for the number of subjects, on this consideration, the number of subjects was not limited by the French Government, as was the case with all the other existing communities. The conflagration which ravaged Montréal in 1768 destroyed the mother-house, which had been erected eight-five years before. The chapel of Bon Secours, built by Mother Bourgeoys, was destroyed by fire in 1734, and rebuilt by the Seminary of St. Sulpice in 1771.

During the latter half of the nineteenth century, missions were established in various parishes of the Province of Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and in the United States; also, many new academies and schools were opened in the city of Montréal. The normal school in Montréal, under the direction of the congregation, began in 1890, has wonderfully realized the hopes founded upon it. Of its three hundred and eighteen graduates, authorized to teach in the schools of Quebec, one hundred and eight have been allowed to open schools. The house, built after the fire of 1768, was demolished in 1844 to give place to a larger building. A still more commodious one was erected in 1890. This was burned down in 1893, obliging the community to return to the house on St. Jean-Baptiste Street. A new building, however, was erected here, and by 1906 the Sisters have been installed since 1908. The Notre Dame Ladies' College was inaugurated in 1908. Today the institute, whose rules have been definitively approved by the Holy See, counts 131 convents in 21 dioceses, 1,279 professed sisters, over 200 novices, 36 postulants, and upwards of 35,000 pupils. The school system of the Congregation of Notre Dame de Montréal always comprised day-schools and boarding-schools. The pioneers of Canada had to clear the forest, to cultivate the land, and to prepare homes for their families. They were all of an intelligent class of farmers and artisans, who felt that a Catholic education for the boys was the best legacy they could leave their children; therefore they seized the opportunity afforded them by the nascent Congregation of Notre Dame, to place their daughters in boarding-schools. The work, inaugurated in Canada, led to demands for houses of the congregation in many totally English parishes of the United States.

The schools of the Congregation of Notre Dame everywhere give instruction in all fundamental branches. The real advantages developed by the system were of study of psychology and pedagogy have been fully turned to account. The system begins with the kindergarten, and the courses are afterwards graded as elementary, model, commercial, academic, and collegiate. The first college opened was in Nova Scotia at Antigonish, affiliated with the university for young men in the same place; since the early years of its foundation it has annually seen the birth of Bachelor of Arts among its graduating students. In 1909 the Notre Dame Ladies' College, in affiliation with Laval, was inaugurated in Montreal. The courses taught in all the secondary schools and academies, while in the larger and more central houses these branches are carried to greater perfection by competent professors. The training which are too the very elements is in conformity with the best methods of the day.

SISTER ST. EUPHRASINE.

II.—CONGREGATION OF NOTRE-DAME DE SION, a religious institute of women, founded in Paris in May, 1815, by Marie-Theodore and Marie-Alphonse Ratisbonne (q.v.). Théodore, at that time sub-director of the Archiconfraternity of Our Lady of Victories, secured from Gregory XVI permission to work among the Jews for their conversion. His brother Marie-Alphonse was equally zealous and they established a community of nuns under the patronage of Our Lady of Sion, with their mother-house at Paris. The new body received warm encouragement from Mgr. Affre, Mgr. Sibour, and Cardinal Formari, and, on 15 January, 1817, Pius IX showed his approbation of the work by granting many indulgences to the institute. Foundations were made in the Holy Land, the chief being the convent, orphan asylum, and school, near the Eree Homo arch in Jerusalem. That of St. John's in the Mountains was founded from it. Connected with the orphanage in Jerusalem under the patronage of St. Peter are schools of art and manual-training. At the Eree Homo there are 170 pupils, Jews, Mohammedans, and Greek schismatices, besides 100 day scholars.

There are foundations in London and also at Rome, Grandbourg near Versailles, Trieste, Vienna, Prague, Galatz, Bucharest, Jassy, Constantinople, Kadi-Koi, etc. At Munich the "Sioner" was established in 1864, and the Sisterhood in very Palestine was founded in 1865 through the instrumentality of Baroness Thérèse von Guntenberg and Hermann Goeger. The Sisters of Notre-Dame de Sion number 500, of whom fifty are at the Eree Homo and St. John's, and seven at St. Peter's. They are directed spiritually by the Priests of Notre-Dame de Sion, a congregation of secular priests, which includes lay brothers. At St. Peter's in Jerusalem, there are six priests, nine lay brothers, and some scholastics. The German settlement of Tabgha, on the Lake of Genesareth, is in charge of a priest of Notre-Dame de Sion, assisted by a lay assistant. There is a foundation of Priests of Notre-Dame de Sion at Ghent.

PLANE M. KELLY.

III.—INSTITUTE OF NOTRE-DAME DE NAMUR, founded in 1803 at Amiens, France, by Bl. Julie Billart (b. 1751; d. 1836) and Marie-Louis-Françoise de Conoreo (b. 1758; d. 1812). The formation of a religious congregation for the education of youth was the result of a formal order to Blessed Julie in the name of God by Pere Joseph Varin, S.J., who observed her virtues for such an enterprise. Mlle Blin de Bourdon offered to defray the immediate expenses. At Amiens, 5 August, 1803, they took house Rue Neuve, the cradle of the institute, with eight orphans, children confided to them by Père Varin. In the chapel of this house, at Mass on 2 February, 1803, the two foundresses and their postulant, Catherine Dufour, made an oath renewed their vow of poverty, chastity, and obedience. From the beginning they devoted themselves to the Christian education of girls, further proposing to train religious teachers who should go wherever their services were asked for. Victoire Leleu (Sister Anastasia) and Justine Garçon (Sister St. John) joined the institute this year and with the assistance of the Père Varin made the first mission, 1804. The Fathers of the Faith who were giving missions in Amiens sent to the five sisters women and girls to be prepared for the sacraments. Bl. Julie was successful and on the invitation of the missionaries continued to assist them in the neighbouring towns.

Returning to Amiens, the foundress devoted herself to the formation of her little community. She taught the young sisters the ways of the spiritual life. To attain the double end of the institute, the foundress first secured teachers, among whom were Fathers Varin, Enfantin and Thomas, the last-named a former professor in the Sorbonne, and Mother St. Joseph Bihan, to renovate the novitiate.

The first regular schools of the Sisters of Notre-Dame were opened in August, 1806. Pupils flocked into the class-rooms at once. The urgent need of Christian education among all classes of society in France at that time, led the foundresses to modify their original plan of teaching only in the schools for the children of the rich; but, from 1807, to require their postulants to bring a dowry, a modest pension for the years of probation; a sound judgment, good health, aptitude for the work of the congregation, a fair education; these, with unblemished reputation, good morals, and an inclination to pietà, were the qualifications she deemed indispensable. Within two years forty postulants were received.

The community lived under a provisional rule, based upon that of St. Ignatius, drawn up by Mother Julie and Father Varin, which was approved in 1805 by the Bishop, and in 1806 by the Holy See. The necessary recognition was accorded on 10 March, 1807. Though time and experience brought additions to those first constitutions, none of the fundamental articles have been changed; the sole exterior labour in the institute is the instruction of youth in schools in concert with the parochial clergy; a mother-house, a superior-general who appoints the local superiors, decides upon foundations and assigns their revenues, visits the secondary houses and moves subjects from one to another when necessary; one grade only of religious, no cloister, but no going out save for necessity, no visiting to relations, friends, or public houses. It was, however, the time of the Blessed Foundress laboured and suffered, as the substance of the constitutions, solemnly approved by Gregory XVI in 1814, shows.

The first branch house was established at St. Nicholas, near Ghent. At the departure of these five missionaries, to leave December 1806, the religious habit was assumed by the congregation, a private, religious ceremony, still unchanged. The taking of vows is also private, but takes place during Mass. St. Nicholas, as well as Mother Julie's five other foundations in France, were all temporary. Later and permanent foundations were made in Belgium, Namur, in 1802, by the mother-house; Amiens, 1809; Liege, 1806, 1808; St. Hubert, 1809; Ghent, 1810; Zed, 1811; Gembloux Mother St. Joseph died on 9 February, 1838, in the eighty-third year of her age and the twenty-third of her generality. The preliminary process of her beatification is well advanced.

The third superior-general was Mother Ignatius (Thérèse-Josephine Goethals, b. 1800; d. 1842). Her services during the year of her predecessor under King William were invaluable. Excessive toll, however, was taken of her later, and she died in the fourth year of her generality; but not before she had sent the first colony of sisters to America.

She was succeeded by Mother Marie Thérèse, who, on account of ill-health, resigned her office the following year; and in 1829, after a long period of ill-health, Mother Joseph-Collin (b. 1802; d. 1875) was elected. She ruled the institute for thirty-three years, her term of office being marked by the papal approbation of the Rule in 1844, the first mission to England in 1845, to California in 1851, to Guatemala in 1859. Under Mother Aloysis (Thérèse-Joseph Marie, b. 1817; d. 1888), fifth superior-general, the processes for the canonization of Mother Julie and Mother St. Joseph were begun in 1881; twenty houses of the institute were established in Belgium, England, and America. Under her successor, Mother Aimée de Jesus (Elodie Dullakt, b. 1825; d. 1907), the Sisters of Notre Dame, and Bishop of Belgium, took charge of the girls' schools in the Jesuit missions of the Congo Free State, where three houses were established. She also sent from England a community of eight sisters for the girls’ schools in the Jesuit mission of Zambesi, Mashonaland. An academy and free school were opened later at Kronstadt, Orange River Colony, South Africa. Mother Aimée de Jesus was created by the King of Belgium a Knight of the Order of Leopold, and Sister Ignatia was accorded a similar honour after fourteen years of labour in the Congo. During this generalate Mother Julie Billhart was solemnly beatified by Pius X, 15 May, 1906. The present Superior-general, Mother Marie Alouise, was elected in January, 1908.

The first foundation in America was made at Cincinnati, Ohio, at the request of the Right Reverend John B. Purcell, then Bishop and later the first Archbishop of Cincinnati. Sister Louise de Gonzague was appointed superior of the eight sisters who came here for this purpose. After firmly establishing the institute in America, failing health caused her recall to Namur, where she worked until her death in 1866. Upon Sister Louise, another of the original group, devolved in 1845 the charges of superiority not only of the house of Cincinnati, but also of the others which were founded on the other side of the Rocky Mountains. Every year the sisters were asked for in some part of the country and the mother-house of Namur gave generously of subjects and funds until the convents in America were able to supply their own needs.

The two provincials who have followed Sister Louise continued the work along the lines she had traced out. Sister Julie (b. 1827; d. 1901) founded fifteen houses, including Trinity College, Washington, D. C., and a provincial house and novitiate at Cincinnati, Ohio. Sister Agnes Mary (b. 1810; d. 1910) made three foundations and built the first chapel dedicated to Blessed Mother Julie. After her resignation in 1888, she went to Germany. In 1816 a colony of eight sisters left Namur under the care of Right Reverend F. X. Blanchet and Father de Smet, S. J., to labour among the Indians of the Oregon mission. Five years later these sisters, at the request of the Right Reverend Bishop of San Francisco, were transferred to San José, California. The first establishment on the Pacific Coast was followed in course of time by ten others, which formed a separate province from Cincinnati. For thirty years it was under the wise care of Sister Marie Cornelle.

In 1851 two foundations were made in Guatemala, Central America, under government auspices and with such an outburst of welcome and esteem from the people as reads like a romance. In less than twenty years of their being passed into the hands of the Liberals and Freemasons, the forty-one Sisters of Notre Dame were exiled.

There are three novitiates in America; at San Jose for the California Province, at Cincinnati for the central part of the United States, and at Wallingford, Mass., for the Eastern States. The rule has been kept in its integrity in America as in Europe. The union with Namur has been preserved, and a like union has even been maintained between all the houses of a province and its centre, the residence of the provincial superior. According to the needs of the schools, the sisters pass from house to house, and even from province to province as obedience enjoins.

It was through the Redemptorists that the Sisters of Notre Dame first went to England. Father de Buggenoms, a Belgian, superior of a small mission at Falmouth, felt the urgent need of schools for the poor Catholic children. He asked and obtained from the Superior of the Sisters of Notre Dame at Namur a confidant of the community of Penryn in Cornwall. It continued only three years, however, as the place afforded no means of subsistence to a religious house. The Redemptorists having established a second English mission at Clapham, near London, and having asked again for the Sisters of Notre Dame for England, the community of Penryn was transferred thither in 1848. Through the initiative of Father Buggenoms the Sisters of the Holy Child Jesus, a community in the Diocese of Northampton, about fifty in number, were affiliated in 1852 to the Institute of Notre Dame, with the consent of the Bishop of Namur and Northampton. Scarcely had the hierarchy been re-established in England when the Government offered education to the Catholic poor; the Sisters of Notre Dame devoted themselves earnestly to this work, under the guidance of Sister Mary of St. Francis (Hon. Laura M. Petre), who was to the congregation in England what Mother St. Joseph was to the whole institute. Before her death (21 June, 1886) eighteen houses had been founded in England. There are now twenty-one.

The most important of these English houses is the Training College for Catholic School-Mistresses at Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, the direction of which was committed to the Sisters of Notre Dame by the Government in 1856. The "centre system" which admits of the concentrated instruction of pupil teachers, now adopted by all the School Boards of the larger English cities, originated with the sisters at Liverpool.

At the request of the Scotch Education Department, the Sisters of Notre Dame opened the Downhill Training College for Catholic School-Mistresses at Glasgow in 1895. Its history has been an unbroken record of academic successes and material expansion. A second convent in Scotland has been opened at Dumfries this year (1910).

Although "codes" differ in forms and requirements, it may be said in general that in England and America the schools of Notre Dame are graded from kindergarten all through the elementary, grammar, and high school classes. The academies carry the schedule of studies on to college work, while Trinity College, Washington, D.C., and St. Mary's Hall, Liverpool, are devotedly working to this end. To meet local difficulties and extend the benefit of Christian instruction, the sisters conduct industrial schools, orphanages for girls, schools for deaf mutes, and for negroes.

IV.—SCHOOL SISTERS OF NOTRE DAME, a religious community devoted to education. In 1910 they counted 3176 members in Europe and 3001 in America, a total of 6774, with about 115,300 pupils in America and 91,527 in Europe, a total of 210,127. In the United States they have established archdiocesan and twenty-five diocesan, and have charge of eight orphanages; in addition they have parish schools and an orphanage in the Diocese of Hamilton, Canada; an Indian school at Harbor Springs, Mich.; a school for negroes at Annapolis; and a deaf-mute institute in Louisiana. Their principal boarding-schools are: Baltimore, Md.; Fort Lee, New Jersey; Quincy, Ill.; Longwood, Chicago; Prairie du Chien, Wis. Of their day and high schools the most prominent are at Baltimore, Md., Quincy, Ill.; Longwood and Chatawa, Miss.

The School Sisters of Notre Dame are a branch of the Congregations of Notre-Dame founded in France, by St. Peter Forrier in 1557. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, several convents of the congregation were established in Germany. The one at Ratis- bon was suppressed at the beginning of the nineteenth century, but it was soon restored and remodelled to meet the needs of modern times. Bishop Wittmann of Ratisbon and Father Job of Vienna effected the change. While retaining the essential features of the rule and constitutions given by St. Peter Forrier, they widened the scope of the Sisters' educational work. In 1831 their community consisted of one former pupil of the suppressed order who was of the Congregation of Marie Gerlandingen, who became first Superior General (Mother Therese of Jesus), and a few companions. The first convent was in Neuburg vorm Wald, Bavaria. In 1839 they removed to a suburb in Munich, and in 1863, into a former Poor Clare convent, built in 1284, and situated within the city limits. From this mother-house in the year 1817 six School Sisters of Notre Dame, on the invitation of Bishop O'Connor of Pittsburgh, emigrated to America and landed at New York on 31 July. One of the Sisters succumbed to the heat of the season and died at Havreborg, Pa., on the journey from New York to St. Mary's, 341.0, Pa., destined to be the foundation-house in America. As St. Mary's was not the place for a permanent location the mother-general successfully negotiated to obtain the Redemptorists' convent attached to St. James' Church, Baltimore, Md. By 3 Nov., 1847, three schools were opened. The second and last colony of sisters, eleven in number, arrived from Munich, 25 March, 1848, and foundations were made at Pittsburg, Philadelphia, and Buffalo.

On 15 December, 1850, the mother-house was transferred to Milwaukee, with Mother Mary Caroline Friers as vice-general of the sisters in America. With more than 100 Sisters in the community, a house was bought; this was absorbed later by Notre Dame College at Mt. Adams. On 2 January, 1851, St. Mary's parish school was opened and St. Mary's Institute for boys and girls opened within a few years. On 31 July, 1856, owing to its growth and extension, the congregation was divided into two provinces: the Western province, with its mother-house at Milwaukee, and the Eastern province with its mother-house at Baltimore. A second division of the Western province became necessary, and on 19 March, 1856, the Southern province was formed, with its mother-house at St. Louis.

Government of the Congregation.—The Congregation of the School Sisters of Notre Dame is under the government of the superioress-general and her four assistants. The superioress-general is elected for six years. All professed sisters of the teaching grade have a vote in this election. The congregation is divided into provinces. The voting sisters in each district choose one chapter-sister. These chapter-sisters together with the provincials elect the commissary-general and assistants. The election is by secret ballot, and its results must be confirmed by the mother-general and the cardinal protector. At the head of each province there is a mother provincial, elected by the voting sisters of the province for three years. For the election of the mother-general and the general chapter, which meets every six years, a deputation of the sisters in America is sent to Munich, Bavaria. This deputation consists of the commissary-general and the mother provincial, ex officio, and a companion of each mother provincial elected by the respective provinces. A general congregation is convened every six years in the principal mother-house at Milwaukee.

Training of Members.—To train members for their future life the School Sisters have a candidate and a novitiate. The age for admission into the candidate is 18 to 25. After having passed two years' probation and study, the candidate enters the novitiate, and two years later makes temporal vows for seven years; she then makes perpetual vows and becomes a professed sister. The teaching sisters meet at special periods and at appointed houses of the order for summer schools and teachers' institutes.

The principal houses of the congregation in the Western province are at Elm Grove, Waukesha Co., Wis., the home for aged, invalid, and convalescent sisters; at Prairie du Chien, Wis., founded in 1872, chartered in 1877, owing its origin to the generosity of Hon. John Lawler (died on 21 Feb., 1891) and his son, Thomas C. Lawler of Dubuque, Iowa; at Longwood, Chicago, Ill., established and chartered in 1872. In 1903 the Legislature of Illinois granted the academy the right to add a college course and confer the degrees of A.B. and Ph.B. In the Eastern province at Baltimore, Md., chartered in 1861, charter amended and powers of corporation enlarged 1886. The sisters began their work in Baltimore in 1848; owing to the growth of their academy, more commodious quarters became necessary and the school, Notre Dame of Maryland, was transferred in 1873 to a magnificent estate of seventy acres obtained in the suburbs. To meet the continual demand for a more extensive curriculum for women; and the need of the conventual life, in 1896, to the State for the power of conferring academic degrees; this was granted by an Act of the Legislature, 2 April, 1896, and the convent has now a college with courses leading to the baccalaureate, an academy that prepares students for the college, and a grammar and preparatory branch of the conventual life at Fort Lee, on the Palisades of the Hudson, Bergen County, N.J., where a residence was purchased by the sisters on 2 Oct., 1879, the school being opened on 21 November, 1879, and chartered in June, 1890. In the Southern province the principal schools are at Quincy, Ill., founded on 28 Dec., 1859, as a parochial school, the academy opened in Sept., 1867; at Chatawa, Miss., founded on 15 October, 1874, a deaf-mute institution; at Chincuba, La., founded by Canon Mignot, 1 October, 1890, given in charge of the sisters 25 September, 1892.

Most prominent among the sisters in America was Mother M. Caroline Fries, who died on 22 July, 1892, after being superior of the congregation for forty-two years. She was born near Paris, on 24 August, 1824, and was called at baptism by the name of Josephine. As a child she was brought to Eichstadt, Bavaria, under the tutelage of her uncle, Mgr Michael Billiart, who had charge of very important schools in Munich. She was one of the first to volunteer for the missionary work in the New World, and emigrated to America in 1847. It soon became evident that it was Sister Caroline who was to develop the young congregation. She was appointed vicar of the mother-general in America and later on elected as the first commissary-general. Under her direction from four members in 1817, the sisterhood grew to two thousand in 1892. Her life was written by Mgr P. M. Abbelein, Mother M. Clara Heuck was the third commissary-general. When the Eastern province was established in 1876 she was made the first mother provincial. Soon she became the superior of the Eastern province and the second mother provincial in the East, which position she held for three terms, after which she was elected commissary-general at Milwaukee on 13 May, 1899. She died at Milwaukee on 4 August, 1905, aged sixty-two.

Sisters of the Order.—The sisters of the Order of the Sisters of Notre Dame are divided into three communities, one in each of the three provinces: the first community is in the Western provinces, the second in the Eastern, and the third in the Southern provinces. The sisterhood consists of members in the apostolic provinces of the United States, Canada, Mexico, and Central America; the archbishop of Chicago, firstTowards the end of the 19th century, the Congregation of the School Sisters of Notre Dame began to show signs of expansion. The first community of the sisters was established in the United States in 1851, and within a few years the congregation had spread to Canada and Mexico. By 1890, the sisters were active in many parts of the United States, including California, Texas, and the Dakotas. The expansion of the congregation was due in part to the efforts of Mother M. Caroline Fries, who was appointed vicar of the mother-general in America and later on elected as the first commissary-general. Under her direction, the sisterhood grew to two thousand members by 1892. Her life was written by Mgr P. M. Abbelein, and her memory was honored by the appointment of Mother M. Clara Heuck as the third commissary-general.

The sisterhood consists of members in the apostolic provinces of the United States, Canada, Mexico, and Central America; the archbishop of Chicago, first Archbishop of the Diocese of Chicago, and the supreme authority of the Congregation of the School Sisters of Notre Dame. The sisters are distinguished by their white habit and their dedication to education, particularly in the fields of Catholic education and social work. They have established schools, hospitals, orphanages, and charitable institutions in many parts of the world, and have played a significant role in the development of Catholic education and social welfare in the United States, Canada, Mexico, and Central America. The sisters of the Order of the Sisters of Notre Dame are known for their dedication to the education of young women and girls, and for their commitment to serving the poor and marginalized communities. Their work has been recognized with numerous awards and honors, and they have been celebrated as a model of Catholic education and social welfare in the United States, Canada, Mexico, and Central America.

Sister Mary Josephine.—Sister Mary Josephine was born in 1850 in Father Elting's Diocese of Coesfeld, Germany, and was educated at a convent in Munich, Bavaria. She later became a nun in the Congregation of the School Sisters of Notre Dame in 1872. In 1891, she was appointed superior of the congregation in America and later on elected as the first commissary-general. Under her direction, the sisterhood grew to two thousand members by 1892. The American branch is under the immediate direction of a provincial superi- ors, residing in Cleveland, and numbers 430 sisters. The sisters conduct also upwards of forty parishes, schools, and hospitals in Ohio and Kentucky, containing about 10,000 pupils.

Notre Dame du Lac, University of, in Northern Indiana near the boundary lines of Michigan and Illinois. It is endowed and directed by the Congrega- tion of Holy Cross, whose mother-house in the United States is located at Notre Dame, the name by which the university is most commonly known. Notre Dame was founded in 1812 by the Very Reverend Ed- ward Sorin, C.S.C., late superior-general of his congrega- tion, who came from France at the invitation of the Right Reverend Celestine A. L. Guynemer de la Hailandière, D.D., Bishop of Vincennes. Nearly two years passed before the first building was erected and a faculty organized. In 1841 the university received a charter from the State. By special act of the Legis- lature of Indiana, it was given legal existence and the degrees of the several arts and sciences and in law and medicine. Though no medical faculty has been formed, all the other departments mentioned in the charter have been established, and collegiate and university degrees granted in each. At the outset only collegiate instruction was given in the studies recommended by the Congregation of Holy Cross. The first faculty organized was that of the college of arts and letters, and chairs of philosophy, history, mathematics, and ancient and modern languages were established. But the educational con- ditions in the country near the university were primi- tive, and arts were not yet taken up seriously. Accordingly, there was soon founded a prepa- ratory school at Notre Dame in which instruction was given, not only in subjects immediately preparing for college, but also in the rudiments. Soon after the college courses began, the needs of the North-West demanded a school for those preparing for the priesthood. The founder accordingly provided a faculty in theology, and six years after the State charter was granted, one-fifth of the students were pursuing theology studies. But as intercommunication between the more settled parts of the United States increased with more easy modes of travel, the theological faculty was more and more augmented, and the university was most fully established.

Today the university consists of five colleges, each with several departments—arts and letters, engineering, science, architecture, and law. At the head of each college is a dean. The faculties of the five colleges are directed by the president of the university, who governs in matters purely academic. All other affairs are administered by a board of trustees.

Though young as a university, Notre Dame has had distinct influence on movements of the Church in the Middle West from its foundation. Founded at a period when the need of missionaries was pressing and located in a centre of missionary activity, its aid in the spread of Catholicism in the North-West was strong. The work of the early French missionaries was continued by the religious at Notre Dame, who served both as professors and evangelists. They supplied, too, a Catholic literature by their doctrinal and devotional writings and by their fiction. University press was established, from which has been issued weekly a literary and religious magazine, the "Ave Maria", contributed to by the best writers of Europe and America. By attracting, too, every year a large number of non-Catholic students, the university has brought a flood of interest to the Church and has quickened religious feeling among the indif- ferent. Moreover, in laws passed by the State Legis- lature affecting the Church, and especially in legisla- tion regarding education, the university is usually consulted, and any protest from it is respectfully heeded. In these matters Notre Dame has merited the consideration by the State not only by its growth as a leading university, but also by a remarkable display of patriotism in the Civil War. At the first call for arms seven of her priests, who were acting as pro- fessors, were sent by Father Sorin to act as chaplains; and this at a time when the university could ill spare any of her faculty.

The progress of the university has been due largely to its presidents, who have been, in all cases, men of scholarly attainments and executive capabilities. Excepting the founder, who was the first president, each had served as professor at Notre Dame before being called to direct its affairs. In all there have been eight presidents—the Very Reverend Edward Sorin, the founder; Rev. Patrick Dillon, William Corby, Augustus Lenmonier, Patrick Colvin, Thomas Walsh, Andrew Morrissey, and John Cava- raugh, all members of the Congregation of Holy Cross. Among other professors who, by their writings and re- searches, have contributed much to the University, are Rev. J. A. Zahn, C.S.C., author of scientific works and pro- fessor of physics; Rev. Alex. Kirsch, C.S.C., professor of zoology; Rev. Jos. Carrier, C.S.C., professor of botany, William Hoynes and Timothy E. Howard, professors of law; Michael J. McCue; Rev. Joseph L. Xaver; Michael J. Cointet, C.S.C.; Rev. N. H. Gillespie, C.S.C.; Rev. Daniel Hudson, C.S.C., Charles Warren Stockard, and Maurice Francis Egan, professors of English literature; James Farnham Edwards, librarian; Arthur J. Stave and Martin J. McCue, professors of engineering; Rev. John B. Scherer, C.S.C., professor of Latin; Rev. Louis Commet, C.S.C., professor of philosophy.

Excepting the land on which it is built, donated by Bishop Hailandière, and a few lesser donations in money, Notre Dame has developed into a great univer- sity without financial aid. It opened as a college in September, 1843, in a modest brick structure erected to serve temporarily until a larger building was completed in 1841. This was enlarged in 1854. Father Sorin was president continuously until 1865. The enrolment of students for many years was small, numbering sixty-nine in 1850, coming from four states in the Middle West and from New York and Penn- sylvania. In 1859 the first dormitory was opened, and in that year the faculty of the college of science was organized. In 1855 the enlarged central building of 1853 gave way to a more pretentious structure; the corps of professors was augmented to forty; the university press was established; the main library was added to, and the equipment for the teaching of science enlarged. The college of law was formed in 1869, and the college of engineering in 1872. A fire in April, 1879, wiped out the labours of forty years, con- suming all the university buildings except the church and the university theatre. Plans were at once made for rebuilding, and the present building was completed in 1887. In September, 1879, the administration building, a large structure, planned to form the centre of a group, was completed and classes resumed. A departure from the old system of student life was made in 1887 when the first residence hall containing private rooms was erected. Before that time the common-room system, modelled on college life in France, was used. In 1900 the college of architecture was established.

The growth of the University has been steady. At present (1911) over one thousand students are registered, from North and South America and from nearly all the countries of Europe. All the students live in the university grounds. The facilities are made up of eighty-five professors, including many laymen. Twenty buildings are devoted to university purposes, and these with their equipment and apparatus are valued at £2,800,000. The land belonging to Notre Dame is valued at £100,000. In the main library are sixty-five thousand volumes, while libraries in various departments have about ten thousand volumes.

Nottingham, Diocese of (Nottinghamian), one of the original twelve English Dioceses created at the time of the restoration of the hierarchy by Pius IX in 1850, embraces the counties of Nottingham, Leicester, Derby, Lincoln, and Rutland, which were comprised in the old Midland District or vicariate, when at the reformation of clerical establishment England was divided into four vicariates, the London, the Northern, the Midland, and the Western. Prior to 1840 when the number of vicars Apostolic was increased from four to eight, the Midland District had consisted of fifteen counties. In 1850, Nottingham could count on twenty-four permanent missions, many of these little better than villages. For the most part they originated from chaplaincies which had through penal times been maintained by the Catholic nobility and gentry, or had been founded independently by them. Among these there existed foundations of several religious orders. In Derbyshire the Jesuits had made the first appearance, as at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and in Leicestershire at Lincoln, Boston, and Market Rasen. The Dominicans were settled in Leicester; the Fathers of Charity carried on several missions in Leicestershire, and the Cistercians occupied their newly founded Abbey of Mount St. Bernard in Charnwood Forest.

From the appearance of the Jesuits in England in 1580 at the special request of Dr. Allen, they had done much by their devoted labours to keep alive the Faith in the Nottingham diocese. Of their missions mentioned above some were among the earliest of the Society in England dating back some three hundred years. Derby was included in the district or college of the Sacred Congregation and was founded by Father Richard Blount, about 1633, first Provincial of the English Province. Extinct for many years it was partially revived in 1842 as Mount St. Mary's College, when the present college and conventus was established by the then provincial, Father Randal Lythege. After the Reformation, the English Province of the Friars Preachers ceased to exist, until resuscitated at Bornhem in Flanders by Philip Howard (q. v.) later cardinal, who became the first prior of the Dominicans in 1675. The first introduction of the English Dominicans from Bornhem was at Hinckley, whence for many years Leicester was served by the English mission at Grimsby. This mission was put on a permanent basis only in 1798 by the purchase of a house by Father Francis Xavier Choppelle. The present church of the Holy Cross was begun by Father Benedict Castrick in 1815 and was opened in 1819. The dedication under the title of Holy Cross was adopted no doubt on account of the celebrated relic of the Holy Cross brought from Bornhem, and now in London. After the lapse of three centuries a monastery of the Cistercian Order was resuscitated in England by the foundation of the Abbey of Mount St. Bernard in Leicestershire, made possible by the assistance of Ambrose Phillips de Lisle of Grace Dieu Manor, who after his conversion in December, 1825, devoted all his energies to the spread of the Faith in England. This he hoped to accomplish by the re-establishment in the county of monastic institutions. In 1835 he purchased about two hundred and twenty-seven acres of wild uncultivated land in Charnwood Forest and resided among the Cistercians with one brother who lived alone in a four-roomed cottage, the community rapidly increased, and a larger building was erected as well as a small chapel, opened by Dr. Walsh 11 October, 1857. This also in a short time proving insufficient, the Earl of Shrewsbury generously offered them £2,000, but on condition that a new monastery should be erected, choosing for that purpose the present site of the abbey. It was built from designs by Augustus Welby Pugin. In 1818 by Brief of Pius IX the monastery of Mount St. Bernard was raised to the dignity of an abbey, and Father Gerald, the first prior, abbot in England since the Reformation, was consecrated 1840. On introducing the Cistercians into England, de Lisle had hoped that they would undertake missionary work and with this view he had built three chapels, at Grace Dieu, Whitwick, and the abbey. On the score of their rule, however, they declined to take charge permanently of the missions. They then decided to bring from Italy members of the Order of Charity. After much negotiation with the head of the order, Father Gentili came to Grace Dieu as chaplain. This was the commencement of the settlement of this order in the diocese. In 1841 Dr. Walsh made over to them the secular mission of Loughborough founded in 1832 by Father Benjamin Hubace. The buildings were too small to permit of a novitiate and a college of their own which they were desirous to establish. To carry out this twofold object, about nine acres were purchased; here the foundation stone of the new buildings was laid by Dr. Walsh on 25 May, 1843, and in 1844 was opened the first college and novitiate. In June of the same year the Sisters of Mercy had come to Nottingham in 1841, and in 1846 entered their convent in close proximity to the cathedral.

The first Bishop of Nottingham was the Rt. Rev. William Hendren, O.S.F., b. in 1792, consecrated 10 September, 1818, as Vicar Apostolic of the Western District, transferred to the Diocese of Clifton, 29 Sept., 1850, and to Nottingham, 22 June, 1851. The cathedral church of St. Barnabas is of the lancet style of architecture, and is considered one of the best specimens of the work of Augustus Welby Pugin. Owing to ill-health, Hendren's episcopate was succeeded by Dr. Richard Roskell, b. at Gateacre near Liverpool, in 1817. He was sent to Ushaw and afterwards to Rome, where he took his degree and was ordained in 1840. He was consecrated in the cathedral by Cardinal Wiseman on 21 September, 1853. During his episcopate a number of missions were founded in the various counties of the diocese. In Lincolnshire, through the generosity of Thomas Arthur Young of Kingeryth Hall, not only was there a church and presbytery built at Gainsborough and Grimsby, but the Premonstratensian order was re-introduced from England and a new foundation opened in 1849. Owing to Dr. Roskell's ill-health, the pope appointed the Rev. Edward Gilpin Bagshawe of the London Oratory his coadjutor. The same year, however, Dr. Roskell tendered his resignation and Dr. Bagshawe was consecrated at the London Oratory 12 November, 1871. Numerous missions necessitated by the development of the mining industry were opened during his administration, and various communities of nuns introduced into the diocese, which he ruled for twenty-seven years. He resigned in 1901 and in 1904 was transferred to the titular Archbishopric of Sercilia. Rt. Rev. Robert Bridle, D.S.O., his successor, was born at Liverpool, 4 November, 1854, and was ordained a first Catholic chaplain to receive the pension for distinguished and meritorious service, as well as Turkish and Egyptian orders and medals, he was, on his retirement from the army in 1899, on the petition of Cardinal Vaughan, appointed his assistant, and on the resignation of Dr. Bagshawe received the Brief to the See of Nottingham 6 November, 1901.

In 1910 there were in the diocese 32,000 Catholics; 81 secular, and 11 regular, priests; 75 churches with missions attached, 31 without missions; 6 convents for men, and 9 for women.

Nourisson, Jean-Félix, philosopher, b. at Thières, Department of Pay-de-Dôme, 18 July, 1825; d. at Paris, 13 June, 1899. He received his education in the college of his native city and in the Collège Stanislas (Paris), where, at the age of nineteen, immediately following his studies, he was appointed professor. In accordance with the wishes of his father, he applied himself first to the study of law, but his own inclinations led him in another direction, and he finally decided to devote himself to philosophy. He was appointed to the chair of philosophy in the Collège Stanislas (1849), received the Doctorate of Laws (1852) and was made professor of philosophy successively in the Lycée de Rennes (1851), the University of Clermont-Ferrand (1855), the Lycée Napoleon, Paris (1858) and the Collège de France (1874). Nourisson obtained three prizes in competitions on the philosophy of Leibniz (1860), and on the role of psychology in the philosophy of St. Augustine (1864), subjects proposed by the Institut de France. In 1870 he became a member of the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques in the section of philosophy. Nourisson was one of the best representatives of French spiritualistic philosophy in the nineteenth century. Not only was he a deep thinker, a penetrating philosopher and historian, but a true believer, convinced that “conscience remains hesitating, and that convictions come to nothing, unless the teachings of religion complete the data of reason” (letter to de Barante, 5 Dec., 1857).

Besides a number of reports, memoirs, and articles in the “Journal des Débats”, “Revue des Deux Mondes”, “Revue Contemporaine”, “Correspondant”, etc., Nourisson’s works are: “Quid Plato de ideis senserit” (Paris, 1852); “Essai sur la philosophie de Bossuet” (Paris, 1852); “Les Péres de l’Eglise latine” (Paris, 1856); “Le cardinal de Bérulle” (Paris, 1856); “Exposition de la théorie platonicienne des idées” (Paris, 1858); “Tableau des progrès de la pensée humaine depuis Thâles jusqu’à Leibniz” (Paris, 1858), the third edition was augmented and brought down to Hegel’s time (1867); “Histoire et philosophie” (Paris, 1860); second enlarged edition under the title “Portraits et études” (Paris, 1863); “La philosophie de Leibniz” (Paris, 1860); “La dissolutive siècle et la Révolution française” (Paris, 1863), 2nd ed., 1873, under the title “L’ancienne France et la Révolution”; “La nature humaine; essais de psychologie appliquée” (Paris, 1865); “La philosophie de Saint-Augustin” (Paris, 1865); “Spinosa et le materialisme contemporain” (Paris, 1866); “De la liberté et du hasard, essai sur Alexandre d’Aphrodissias” (Paris, 1870); “Machiavel” (Paris, 1875); “Trois révolutionnaires: Turgot, Necker, Bailly” (Paris, 1885); “Pascal, physicien et philosophique” (Paris, 1885); “Philosophes de la nature: Bacon, Bayle, Voltaire” (Paris, 1887); “Défense de Pascal” (Paris, 1888); “Voltaire et le voltairianisme” (Paris, s. d.); “Rousseau et le rousseauïsme” (Paris, 1901), a posthumous work edited by Paul Nourisson.

Novara, Distinct of (Novarënsis), the capital of the province of Novara, Piedmont, Italy, noted for the manufacture of woof, cotton, and silk textiles, and machinery. The cathedral originally Romanesque has been modified. The high altar is the work of Thorwaldsen, Marchesi, and Finioli; the baldachin is by Temarini, and there are paintings by Bordone, Carppa, and other artists, besides some ancient mosaics. The baptistery dates from the fifth century. The cathedral archives contain codices and other documents from the eighth century. The church of St. Gaudentius, a work of Pellegrino Pellegrini, was begun in 1353 to replace the ancient basilica built by St. Gaudentius and torn down to make room for the fortifications; Renaissance in style, although the cupola does not harmonize, it contains valuable paintings and frescoes by Lombardi, Cavica, Proacecini, Crespi, Gialdini, Sogni, Saletta, and Fiamminghino. The city has an institute of arts and trades, a museum of antiquities, and several private galleries, among them the Leonardi. Novara was the birthplace of the ancient jurist, C. Albeens Silo, Peter Lombard, the philologist Cattaneo, the painter Cavica, and the Jesuit Tornelli. Novara, formerly Novaria, was inhabited by Ligurians and Sasassians. Under the Carolingians, it was the seat of a count, but the power of the counts passed gradually to the bishops, confirmed by Otto I (969), in the person of Bishop Aupahus. From the time of Henry III, Novara was a commune, governed by two consuls and by a concel, called Maggiori. Frequently at war with Vercello and Milan, it joined Frederick Barbarossa against the latter city, but in 1168 was compelled to join the Lombard League. After the peace of Constance it contended with the Counts of Biscarèse, Vercele, and its own bishops, unwilling to be deprived of their sovereign rights in which they had been again confirmed by Frederick Barbarossa. Upon the expulsion of the bishop in 1210, Innocent III threatened to suppress the diocese. Later, when Martin della Torre became lord of Milan, Novara gave its allegiance to him, then to the Visconti, from which time it formed part of the Duchy of Milan, with rare intervals; in 1536-38 it belonged to Monferrat, 1556-1602 to the Farnese of Parma, 1734 to the Savoy. Because of its position, Novara has been the scene of important battles: in April, 1500, Louis the Moor, Duke of Milan, intended to besiege here Trivulzio, appointed governor by the King of France, but abandoned by his Swiss troops, he was taken prisoner. On 6 June, 1513, the Swiss in the pay of the King of Spain, drove out the French; on 10 April, 1812, the troops that had rebelled against King Charles Felix were dispersed there; on 23 March, 1849, Radetzky inflicted upon the Piedmontese a defeat that compelled King Charles Albert to abdicate.

In the fourth century, Novara was in the Diocese of Vercele; its first bishop, St. Gaudentius, was consecrated by St. Simplicianus, Bishop of Milan (367-400). St. Lawrence is said to have introduced the Faith into Novara. St. Julius and St. Julian assisted Gaudentius in the conversion of the diocese. The list of bishops has been preserved on two ivory diptychs, one in the cathedral dated from 1168; the other in the church of St. Gaudentius from 1314. Among the bishops were St. Agabius (417); St. Victor.
NOVA SCOTIA

The resources of Nova Scotia are diversified. Farming, mining, fishing, lumbering, and manufacturing yield ample return to the industry of the inhabitants.

In the counties lying along the Bay of Fundy and penetrating to the Awesic inlets, great harbours have been opened by the French settlers, and continued after the expulsion of the Acadians by the colonists from New England, who in 1700 and 1701 took possession of the lands of the expelled Acadians. The agricultural products of the country are hay, wheat, potatoes, barley, pea, oats, and corn, and lumbering has of late opened a local market. In the Annapolis Valley about 750,000 barrels of apples are annually produced and shipped to the English markets. There are large coal measures in the Counties of Cumberland, Pictou, Inverness, and Cape Breton. The coal is bituminous, and supplies the local demand and a large portion of the markets of the St. Lawrence River. Iron, copper, and gypsum are also mined. The coast fisheries are looked upon as very valuable. They consist of salmon, cod, shad, halibut, mackerel, herring, shellfish, and are exported to American and European markets. The forests produce maple, birch, hemlock, spruce, and beech; and the mineral interests are also extensive, the larger plants being the iron and steel works at Sydney and Sydney Mines.

11. History.—John Cabot made his first voyage from Bristol in search of a westerly route to India in 1497. He made a landfall on the eastern coast of North America, and named it Nova Scotia, or New Scotland, uncertain. No actual settlement immediately followed the voyages of the Cabots. In 1601 King Henry IV of France gave a commission to de Monts appointing him viceroy of the territory lying between the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the mouth of the Hudson River. De Monts arrived on the month of the La Have River on the coast of Nova Scotia and he then sailed up the Bay of Fundy and into the sheet of water which is now known as the Annapolis Basin. Here, near what is now the town of Annapolis, a site was chosen for a settlement and to the place de Monts gave the name of Port-Royal. Leaving some of his men there he sailed for the northern shore of the Bay of Fundy, entered the St. John River and later made his winter quarters at the mouth of the St. Croix River. The companions whom he left at Port-Royal returned to France. The following year de Monts and the survivors of his party at St. Croix returned to Port-Royal. This was the beginning of European settlement in Canada, and the colonies that followed it were all the result of thejexpulsion in North America with the exception of St. Augustine in Florida. The colony was temporarily abandoned in 1607, but in 1610 the French returned and remained in undisturbed possession until 1613, when a freebooter from Virginia named Arnaud made a descent upon the settlement and totally destroyed it.

In 1621 King James I gave a grant of Acadia to Sir William Alexander and changed the name to Nova Scotia; but the efforts of Sir William Alexander to build up an English settlement were of little avail. After the capture of Quebec by David Kirke, peace was made between France and Great Britain by the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye (1632), and Quebec and Nova Scotia were given back to France. But in 1654 Cromwell sent out a fleet to capture the Dutch colony at Manhattan, and a portion of his fleet sailed into Annapolis Basin, and Port-Royal surrendered to them. After the accession of Charles II, by the Treaty of Breda, Nova Scotia was again ceded to France. In 1690 Sir William Phips took command of a naval force from Massachusetts, and he easily took Port-Royal, but he left no garrison there and the French soon reoccupied it. After several years of war terms of peace were again arranged between Great Britain and France by the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), which provided that the peninsula should belong to England and the Island of Cape Breton to France. Annapolis became the capital of the colony and the only other English settlement was at Anson. Very few settlers arrived in the country for nearly forty years. The French to regain their position strongly fortified Louisburg on the south-east coast of Cape Breton. War again broke out and in 1745 a force was sent from Massachusetts under Colonel William Pepperell. After a siege of seven weeks the Governor of Louisburg was obliged to surrender. To recapture Louisburg in the very year following the powerful fleet under d'Anville. This expedition was unfortunate. The fleet encountered bad weather and after the remnants of it arrived at Chebucto (Halifax) Harbour, the commander and many of the men died; those who survived returned to France. Great Britain held Louisburg for three years after the first capture; and then terms of peace were arranged by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) and Louisburg was given to France. To strengthen the position of the English in Nova Scotia it was determined to establish a permanent settlement on the shores of Chebucto Harbour. Accordingly, in June, 1750, Colonel Cornwallis arrived with a number of settlers and founded the town of Halifax. The seat of government was transferred from Annapolis to the new town, and Cornwallis selected a council to assist him in the administration of the colony. Six years later occurred the cruel expulsion of the Acadians from their fertile lands brought about 1755 to 1760 by the Treaty of Paris of 1763. The Acadians who had no separate schools, but in centres of population where they are numerous in and country districts where they predominate, they are permitted by usage to have teachers of their own belief. There is perfect freedom of worship in every respect.

The Province of Nova Scotia is divided into two dioceses: the Archdiocese of Halifax, which embraces the eleven westernmost counties of the province; and the Diocese of Antigonish, which embraces the four counties on Cape Breton Island, and the Counties of Guysborough, Pictou, and Cumberland. According to the last official census there were 54,301 Catholics in the Archdiocese of Halifax, and 75,277 in the Cathedral Church of St. Andrews, named after the patron saint of the English government of that day.
the Diocese of Antigonish. By chapter 31 of the Acts of the Legislature of Nova Scotia for the year 1849, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Halifax and his successors were incorporated under the name of "the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of the City and County of Halifax" with perpetual succession, and power to make and enter into public mortgage and purchase any such property or any part thereof as is necessary for or connected with the Archdiocese or of any portion thereof or for any such uses or purposes and may sell, alien, exchange, assign, release mortgage, lease, convey or otherwise dispose of such lands or any part thereof for such uses and purposes or any of them in the manner herein after provided". This statute also provides that all Church property, real and personal, shall be vested in the corporation and used as the property of the Roman Catholic Church within the archdiocese for ecclesiastical, ecclesiastical, and educational purposes. The corporation executes a deed by its corporate seal and the signatures of its president, vice-president, and secretary, or of any two of them, and one other Roman Catholic clergyman of the archdiocese. The Diocese of Antigonish was formerly known as the Diocese of Arichat; by chapter 86 of the Acts of the Legislature of Nova Scotia for 1887 the name was changed from Aichat to Antigonish. The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Antigonish was created by Chapter 74 of the Acts of the Legislature of Nova Scotia (1854), and the legislative provisions with respect to this corporation are substantially the same as those relating to the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Halifax.

VI. Taxation and Exemptions of Churches, etc.—The clergy and students are exempt from taxation and public assessment, and the corporation of the diocese is exempt from taxation. Every church and chapel within the diocesan limits and the buildings appertaining thereto and used or held for religious purposes, are exempt from taxation. Such and other ecclesiastical buildings, are exempt from the payment of tax levied for the support of religious orders.

VII. Exemption of the Clergy from Public Services.—There are no obvious public duties required to be performed by clergy. The Juries' Act (R. S. N. S., 1900, c. 162, s. 5) exempts from serving on juries "clergyman and ministers of the Gospel". The Militia Act (R. S. N. S., 41, s. 11) provides that the clergy and ministers of all religious denominations, professors of a college and university, and teachers in religious orders shall be exempt from liability to serve in the militia.

VIII. Prisons and Reformatories.—These are maintained by the State and are non-denominational. The clergy are permitted to minister to the spiritual wants of the people of their own faith. The old charitable institutions were conducted under Catholic auspices, namely, St. Patrick's Home for Boys, and the Good Shepherd Reformatory for Women. Under the provisions of the Act relating to prisons and reformatories (R. S. C., c. 141), whenever a boy, who is a Catholic and under eighteen years, is convicted in Nova Scotia for an offence for which he is liable to imprisonment, the presiding justice may sentence such boy to be detained in St. Patrick's Home for a term not exceeding five years and not less than one year. The statute provides also that boys so detained shall be educated and taught a trade. This home is assisted from the public funds and is open at all times for the purpose of public inspection. It is under the direction of the Christian Brothers. The statute provides that juvenile offenders and vagrants may be sent to this reformatory. Similar provision is made in the case of a girl, being a Catholic and above the age of sixteen years, convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment in the city prison or common jail for a term of two months or upwards. She may be sentenced to the Good Shepherd Reformatory at Halifax, for an extended or substituted imprisonment subject to conditions: (a) if she is under the age of twenty-one, such extended imprisonment may be for any term not less than one year and not more than two years; Catholic girls under the age of sixteen may be sentenced in the same way to the Good Shepherd Industrial Refuge at Halifax, which they may be instructed in reading and writing and to the end of simple proportion, and also the trade or occupation suitable to their capacities. The Good Shepherd Reformatory receives assistance from the public funds and is subject to inspection by a government official. The Statutes go on to require:

IX. WILL AND CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—Every person of the age of twenty-one years and upwards may dispose of his property by will. Such will must be signed by the testator in the presence of two witnesses who shall subscribe thereto as witnesses in his presence and in the presence of each other. By statute (R. S. N. S., 1900, c. 132) a devise or bequest of real or personal property to any religious or charitable corporation or any incorporated institution of learning is valid and effectual for the purpose of vesting the property in such body, notwithstanding that it was not by its act of incorporation empowered to take or hold such real or personal property. The incorporator of the body was empowered to take or hold—provided the statute shall not extend to render valid or effectual any devise or bequest that is to be void for another reason.

X. CEMETORIES.—By statute (R. S. N. S., 1900, c. 132) it is provided that a number of persons, not less than ten, may form themselves into a company for the purpose of establishing a public cemetery. Catholic cemeteries, however, are owned by the Episcopal Corporation of the diocese. Cemeteries are exempt from taxation and the lots or plots owned by individual proprietors cannot be seized or taken on execution.

XI. MARRIAGE LAWS.—By the provisions of the British North America Act, the subject of marriage and divorce is assigned to the Dominion Parliament, and that of the solemnization of marriage to the legislature of the province. The former body, under this distribution, deals with the capacity to contract marriage, and in pursuance of such power it has enacted (R. S. C., c. 105) that "a marriage is not invalid merely because the woman is a sister of a deceased wife of the man, or a daughter of a sister of a deceased wife of the man". The latter body, under this clause (R. S. C., c. 111) deals with the mode of solemnizing a marriage within the province. It provides that every marriage shall be solemnized by a minister of a church or religious denomination, being a man and resident in Canada, who is recognized as duly ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of the church or denomination to which he belongs. Persons belonging to the society known as the Salvation Army may be married by any duly appointed male commissioner or staff officer of the society. No person shall officiate at the solemnization of any marriage unless publication has been made of the banns of the marriage or a licence has been obtained for the solemnization of the marriage. The banns shall be published in any church at the place where the ceremony is desired to take place, by the ordinary clergyman in an audible voice during the time of Divine service, and if there is more than one public service in the church on each Sunday, such publication shall be made at three several services held on two or more Sundays; otherwise the publication may be at two services not more than two Sundays. Every marriage shall be solemnized in the presence of two witnesses. After the solemnization of the marriage the clergyman solemnizing the same shall make out a certificate containing the date of the marriage, the place thereof, the date of the publication of the banns, the church in which and the clergyman by whom the banns were published, the names of the witnesses and his own name, and the religious denomination to which he belongs. The marriage register giving the above particulars, and also the names, ages, residences, etc., of the parties and their parents shall also be filled up. Returns in the prescribed form shall be made by the clergyman solemnizing the marriage to the registrar of the county within ten days after the solemnization. Forms for that purpose are furnished by the issuer of marriage licences. Large penalties are provided for solemnizing marriage without banns of marriage or licence, for refusing to publish the banns, for solemnizing under an illegal licence, and for failing to return the marriage register.

XII. Divorce.—In Nova Scotia there is a court for divorce and matrimonial causes, and it has jurisdiction over all matters relating to prohibited marriages and divorce, and may declare any marriage null and void for impotence, adultery, cruelty, or kindred within the degrees prohibited in an Act made in the thirty-second year of King Henry the Eighth, entitled "An Act concerning pre-contracts, and touching degrees of Consanguinity"; and whenever a sentence of divorce shall be given, the court may pronounce such determination as it shall think fit on the merits of the parties or either of them, or courts of chancery, or dower. In the provinces of the dominion in which no divorce courts exist, applications for divorce are made to Parliament and the evidence is taken and considered by the members of the Senate of Canada. In Nova Scotia there is an appeal from the decision of the Sackville Court of Divorce to the Court of Nova Scotia sitting in banco. When the final decree is for the dissolution of the marriage, the statute enables either of the parties to marry again as if the prior marriage had been dissolved by death; but no clergyman shall be liable to any penalty for refusing to solemnize the marriage of either of the parties who have been divorced. In cases of divorce the wife and husband are not competent to testify, but in proceedings by the wife, on account of adultery coupled with cruelty, the husband and wife are competent and compellable to give evidence of or relating to such cruel.

XIII. Religious Orders, Schools, etc.—Several of the public schools of the province are taught by members of the religious orders. In such cases the teachers must be licensed in the same way as other public teachers, and they are paid out of the public funds. Besides the public schools there are many excellent private schools taught by members of religious orders. These do not receive any assistance from the public treasury. The public schools are maintained by a grant from the government and by local taxation upon the property holders of the section or municipality. They are otherwise free and all children of school age are entitled to be admitted to them.

Novatian and Novatianism.—Novatian was a schismatic of the third century, and founder of the sect of the Novatians; he was a Roman priest, and made himself antipope. His name is given as Novatianus (Novatarius, Eusebius; Novatianus, Socrates) by Greek writers, and also in the writers of Damanus and Protacius, one or both of whom may have written in his name.

Biography.—We know little of his life. St. Cornelius in his letter to Fabius of Antioch relates that Novatian was possessed by Satan for a season, apparently while a catechumen; for the exorcists attended him, and he fell into a sickness from which instant death was expected; he was, therefore, given baptism by affliction as he lay on his bed. The rest of the rites were not supplied on his recovery, nor was he confirmed by the bishop. "How then can he have received the Holy Ghost?" asks Cornelius. Novatian was a man of learning and had been trained in literary composition. St. Eulogius was of a marriage by which he had been born, "a marriage of dogmas, that champion of ecclesiastical learning". His eloquence is mentioned by Cyprian (Ep. li, 3), and a pope (presumably Fabian) promoted him to the priesthood in spite of the protests (according to Cornelius) of all the clergy and many of the laity that it was uncanonical for one who had received only an infant baptism to be admitted among the clergy. The story told by Eulogius of Alexandria that Novatian was Archdeacon of Rome, and was made a priest by the pope in order to prevent his succeeding to the papacy, contradicts the evidence of Cornelius and supposes a later state of things when the Roman deacons were statesmen rather than priests. The apocryphal work "Ad Novatianum" (xiii) tells us that Novatian, "so long as he was in the one house, that is in Christ's Church, bewailed the sins of his neighbours as if they were his own, bore the burdens of the brethren, as the Apostle exhorts, and strengthened with consolation the backsliding in heavenly faith".

The Church had enjoyed a peace of thirty-eight years when Decius issued his edict of persecution early in 250. Pope St. Fabian was martyred on 20 Jan., and it was impossible to elect a successor. Cornelius, writing in the following year, says of Novatian that, through cowardice and love of peace, he "suspected that he was a priest in the time of persecution; for he was exchanged by the deacons to come out of the cell, in which he had shut himself up, to assist the brethren as a priest now that they were in danger. But he was angry and departed, saying he no longer wished to be a priest, for he was in love with another philosophy. The meaning of this story is not clear. Did Novatian wish to eschew the active work of the priesthood and give himself to an ascetic life? At all events, during the persecution he certainly wrote letters in the name of the Roman clergy, which were sent by them to St. Cyprian (Ep. xxxviii), and with the exaggerated claim of the martyrs at Carthage to restore them all without penance. The Roman clergy agree with Cyprian that the matter must be settled with moderation by councils to be held when this should be possible; the exercise of a monopoly of discipline must be preserved, such as had always distinguished the Roman Church since the days when her faith was praised by St. Paul (Rom. i, 8), but cruelty to the repentant must be avoided. There is evidently no idea in the minds of the Roman priests that restoration of the lapsed to communion is impossible.
or improper; but there are severe expressions in the letter. It seems that Novatian got into an embroilment during the persecution, since Cornelius says that St. Moses, the martyr (d. 250), seeing the boldness of Novatian, separated him from communion, together with the five priests who had been associated with him. On the beginning of 251 the persecution relaxed, and St. Cornelius was elected pope in March, "when the chair of Fabian, that is the place of Peter, was vacant," with the consent of nearly all the clergy of the people, and of the bishops present (Cyprian, Ep. IV, 8–9). Some days later Novatian set himself up as a rival pope. Cornelius tells us Novatian suffered an extra mutilation when he was forced to make a tremendous oath that he would never attempt to become bishop. But now he sent two of his party to summon three bishops from a distant corner of Italy, telling them they must come to Rome in haste, in order that a division might be headed by their mediation and that of other bishops. These simple men were constrained to confer the episcopal order upon him at the tenth hour of the day. One of these returned to the church bewailing and confessing his sin, "and we despatched" says Cornelius, "successors of the other two bishops to the places whence they came, after ordaining them." To ensure the loyalty of his supporter, Cornelius sent his vessels on the main, and took communion to swear by the Blood and the Body of Christ that they would not go over to Novatian.

Cornelius and Novatian sent messengers to the different Churches to announce their respective claims. From St. Cyprian's correspondence we know of the careful investigation made by the Council of Carthage, with the result that Cornelius was supported by the whole African episcopate. St. Dionysius of Alexandria also took his side, and these influential admissions soon made his position secure. But for a time the whole Church was torn by the question of the rival popes. We have few details. St. Cyprian writes that Novatian "assumed the primacy" (Ep. LIX, 10), and sent out his new apostles to many cities to set new foundations for his new establishment; and, though there were already in all provinces and cities bishops of venerable age, of pure faith, of tried virtue, who had been proscribed in the persecution, he dared to create a rival to their position. Which of these was to be the bishop of Rome? This question was raised as to the right of substituting bishops by his own authority as Cornelius did in the case just mentioned. There could be no more startling proof of the importance of the Roman See than this sudden revelation of an episode of the third century: the whole Church convulsed by the claim of an assembly of bishops recognizing a rival bishop as a Catholic and legitimate pastor if he is on the side of the wrong pope; the uncontested claim of both rivals to consecrate a new bishop in any place (at all events, in the West) where the existing bishop resisted their authority. Later, in the same way, in a letter to Pope Stephen, St. Cyprian urges him to appoint (so he seems to imply) a new bishop at Arles, where the bishop had become a Novatianist. St. Dionysius of Alexandria wrote to Pope Stephen that all the Churches in the East and beyond, which had been split in two, were now united, and that all their prelates were now rejoicing exceeding in this unexpected peace—in Antioch in Greece, in Palestine, in Jerusalem, Tyre, Laodicea of Syria, Tarsus and all the Churches of Cilicia, Cappadocia and all Cappadocia, the Syrias and Arabia (which depended for alms on the Roman Church), Mesopotamia, Pontus and Bithynia, and all the Churches everywhere, so far did the Roman Church command, rather than the council of Fabian. Meanwhile, before the end of 251, Cornelius had assembled a council of sixty bishops (probably all from Italy or the neighbouring islands), in which Novatian was excommunicated. Other bishops who were not present added their signatures, and the entire list was sent to Antioch and doubtless to all the other principal Churches.

It is not surprising that a man of such talents as Novatian should have been conscious of his superiority to Cornelius, or that he should have found priests to assist his ambitious views. His mainstay was in the confessors yet in prison, Maximus, Urbanus, Necostatus, and others. Dionysius and Cyprian wrote letters to demonstrate the legitimacy of the claim of Novatian. A prime mover on Novatian's side was the Carthaginian priest Novatus, who had favoured laxity at Carthage out of opposition to his bishop. In St. Cyprian's earlier letters about Novatian (xlv–xlvi), there is not a word about any heresy, the whole question being as to the titular bishop of the see of Peter. In Ep. li, the words "simeunatico inno hereticae furore" refer to the wickedness of opposing the true bishop. The same is true of "hereticae pravitatis nocens facio" with Ep. liii. In Ep. iv, Cyprian found it necessary to send his book "De lapsedis" to Rome, so that the question of the lapsed was already prominent, but Ep. lv is the earliest in which the "Novatian heresy" as such is argued against. The letters of the Roman confessors (Ep. liii) and Cornelius (xlii, 1) to Cyprian do not mention it, though the latter speaks in general terms of Novatian as a schismatic or a heretic; nor does the pope mention "heretics" in his letter of 251 of the establishment of Antioch (Ep. xlix, xliii), from which so much has been quoted above. It is equally clear that the letters sent out by Novatian were not concerned with the lapsus, but were "letters full of calumnies and malcontents sent in large numbers, which threw nearly all the Churches into disorder" (Cornelius, Ep. xliii). The first of these sent to Carthage consisted apparently of "bitter accusations" against Cornelius, and St. Cyprian thought it so disgraceful that he did not read it to the council (Ep. xlv, 2). The messengers from Rome to the Carthaginian Council broke out into similar attacks (Ep. xlv). It is necessary to notice this point, because it is so frequently overlooked by historians, who represent the sudden but short-lived disturbance throughout the Catholic Church caused by Novatian's ordination to have been a division between bishops on the subject of his heresy. Yet it is obvious enough that the question could not present itself in this form. Which of these was the bishop of Rome? or that of Novatian? If Novatian were ever so orthodox, the first matter was to examine whether his ordination was legitimate or not, and whether his accusations against Cornelius were false or true. An admirable reply addressed to him by St. Dionysius of Alexandria very properly asks "Dionysius to his brother Novatian, greeting. If it was against your will, as you say, that you were led, you will prove it by retiring of your free will. For you ought to have suffered anything rather than divide the Church of God; and to be martyred rather than cause a schism which would have been no less glorious than the martyrdom of the Church of idolatry, nay in my opinion it would have been a yet greater act; for in the one case one is a martyr for one's own soul alone, in the other for the whole Church." Here again there is no question of heresy.

But yet within a couple of months Novatian was called a heretic, not only by Cyprian but throughout the Church, for his severe views about the restoration of those who had lapsed in the persecution. He held that idolatry was an unpardonable sin, and that the Church had no right to restore to communion any who had fallen into it. They might repent and be admitted to a "lapsed" pension in the letter to Fabian, but they must be left to God; it could not be pronounced in this world. Such harsh sentiments were not altogether a novelty. Tertullian had resisted the forgiveness of adultery by Pope Callistus as an innovation. Hippolytus was equally inclined to severity. In vari-rious places and at various times laws were made which punished certain sins either with the deferring of Communion till the hour of death, or even with the exclusion of Communion on the hour of death. Even St. Cyprian approved the latter course in the case of those who refused to do penance and only repented on their death-bed; but this was because such a repentance seemed of doubtful sincerity. But severity in itself was but cruelty or injustice; there was no heresy until it was decreed that the Church should have the power to grant absolution in certain cases. This was Novatian’s heresy; and St. Cyprian says the Novatians held no longer the Catholic creed and baptismal interrogation, for when they said “Dost thou believe in the remission of sins, and everlasting life, through Holy Communion?”

Wurtzius.—St. Jerome mentions a number of writings of Novatian, only two of which have come down to us, the “De Cibis Judaeis” and the “De Trinitate”. The former is a letter written in retirement during a time of persecution, and was preceded by two other letters on Circumcision and the Sabbath, which are lost. It interprets the unclean animals as signifying different classes of vicious men; and explains that the greater liberty allowed to Christians is not to be a motive for luxury. The book “De Trinitate” is a fine piece of writing. The first eight chapters concern the transcendence and greatness of God, who is described in terms clearly described by Novatian. Novatian goes on to prove the Divinity of the Son at great length, arguing from both the Old and the New Testaments, and adding that it is an insult to the Father to say that a Father who is God cannot beget a Son who is God. But Novatian falls into the error made by so many early writers of separating the Father from the Son, so that he makes the Father address to the Son the command to create, and the Son obeys; he identifies the Son with the angels who appeared in the Old Testament to Agar, Abraham, etc. “It pertains to the person of Christ that He should be God because He is the Son of God, and that He should be an Angel because he announces the Father’s Will” (patrum dispositione annovatari est). The Son is “the second Person after the Father”, less than the Father in that He is originated by the Father; He is the imitator of all His works, and is always obedient to the Father, and is in union with Him by the Holy Spirit, and by the Holy Ghost.

No wonder such a description should seem to opponents to make two Gods; and consequently, after a chapter on the Holy Ghost (xxix), Novatian returns to the subject in a kind of appendix (xxx-xxxii). Two kinds of heretics, he explains, try to guard the unity of the one Person. The “Sabellians” identify the Father with the Son, the other (Ebionites, etc.) by denying that the Son is God; thus is Christ again crucified between two thieves, and is reviled by both. Novatian declares that there is indeed but one God, unbegotten, invisible, immense, immortal; the Word (Verbum), His Son, is a substance that proceeds from Him (substantia prodata), whose generation no apostle nor angel nor any creature can declare. He is not a second God, because He is eternally in the Father, else the Father would not be eternally Father. He proceeded from the Father, when the Father willed (this substantia for the purpose of creation is evidently distinguished from the eternal begetting in the Father), and remained with the Father. If He were also the unbegotten, invisible, incomprehensible, there might indeed he said to be two Gods; but in fact He has from the Father whatever He has, and there is but one origin (origo sequitur), the Father. “One God is demonstrated, the true and eternal Father, from whom alone this energy of the Godhead is sent forth, being handed on to the Son, and again by communion of substance it is returned to the Father.” In this doctrine there is much that is incorrect, yet much that seems meant to express the consubstantiality of the Son, or at least His generation out of the substance of the Father. But the point is that it is a very unsatisfactory teaching, which is attained, and it seems to be suggested that the Son is not immense or invisible, but the image of the Father capable of manifesting Him. Hippolytus is in the same difficulty, and it appears that Novatian borrowed from him as well as from Tertullian and Justin. But he would seem to have improved a little, for he apparently understood somewhat better than did Novatian the traditional Roman doctrine of the consubstantiality of the Son, but that all three were led astray by their acquaintance with the Greek theology, which interpreted of the Son as God Scriptural expressions (especially those of St. Paul) which properly apply to Jesus the Christ. The “Man of Sorrows” was a protest against an identity derived from the etymology of the name, an merit of not identifying the Word with the Father, nor Sonship with the prolation of the Word for the purpose of Creation, for He plainly teaches the eternal generation. This is a notable advance on Tertullian.

On the Incarnation Novatian seems to have been orthodox, though he is not explicit. He speaks correctly of the one Person having two substances, the Godhead and Humanity, in the way that is habitual to the most exact Western theologians. But he very often speaks of “the man” assumed by the Divine Person, so that he has been suspected of Nestorianizing. This, however, is a point of the Gnostics, and the Gnostics are marked by the opposite accusation of making “the man” so far from being a distinct personality that He is merely flesh assumed (caro, or substantia carnis et corporis). But there is no real ground for supposing that Novatian meant to deny an intellectual soul in Christ; he does not think of the point, and is only anxious to assert the reality of our Lord’s flesh. The Son of God, he says, joins to Himself the Son of Man, and by this connexion and mingling He makes the Son of Man become Son of God, which He was not by nature. This last sentence has been described as Adoptionism. But the Spanish Adoptionists taught that the Human Nature of Christ as joined to the Godhead is the adopted Son of God. Novatian only means that before its assumption it was not by nature the Son of God; the form of words is bad, but there is not necessarily any heresy in the thought. Newman, though he does not make the best of Novatian, says that he “approaches more nearly to doctrinal precision than any of the writers of the East and West” who preceded him (Tracts theological and ecclesiastical, p. 239).

The two pseudo-Cyprianic works, both by one author, “De Spectaculis” and “De bono pudicitiæ”, are attributed to Novatian, by the Tertullianist Decretarius, Bardenhewer, Harnack, and others. The pseudo-Cyprianic “De ludi martyrii” has been ascribed to Novatian by Harnack, but with less probability. The pseudo-Cyprianic sermon, “Adversus Judæos”, is by a close friend or follower of Novatian if not by himself, according to Landgraf, followed by Harnack and Jordan, and in 1900 Mgr Batiffol with the help of Dom A. Wilmarth published, under the title of “Tractatus Originis de libros SS. Scripturarum”, twenty sermons which he had discovered in two MSS. at Orleans and St. Omer. Weyman, Haussleiter, and Zahn perceived that these curious treatises on the Old Testament were written in Latin and are not translations from the Greek. They attributed them to Novatian with so much confidence that a disciple of Zahn’s, H. Jordan, in 1890 has written a book on the theology of Novatian, grounded principally on these sermons. It was, however, pointed out that the author of the pseudo-Cyprianic works is equally liable to the reproach of having been written by the compiler of the Old Testament, which seems to be the case. Dom Morin suggested Gregorius Baticus of Hilberis (Elvira), but withdrew this when it seemed clear that the author had used Gaudentius of Brescia and Rufif

NOVENA

Novatus, Saint, who is mentioned on 20 June with his brother, the martyr Timotheus, was the son of St. Pudens and Claudia Rufina, and the brother of Sts. Pudentiana and Praxeides. His paternal grandfather was Quintus Cornelius Pudens, the Roman senator, who with his wife, Priscilla, was among St. Peter's earliest converts in Rome and in whose house the Apostle dwelt while in that city. A portion of the superstructure of the modern church of St. Pudentiana (Via Urbana) is thought to be part of the senatorial palace or of the baths built by Novatus.

Novena (from novem, nine), a nine days' private or public devotion in the Catholic Church to obtain special graces. The octave has more of the festal character: to the novena belongs that of hopeful mourning, of yearning for prayer. The number nine in Holy Writ is made up of three units of three, and the three persons of the Blessed Trinity, informing each of the three persons: do not bless; do not exalt; do not praise. If the same names are used over and over again in the liturgy, the result is: a, b, c; a, b, c; a, b, c.

The Jews had no nine days' religious celebration or nine days' mourning or feast on the ninth day after the death or burial of relatives and friends. They held the number seven more sacred than any other.

On the contrary, we find among the ancient Romans an official nine days' religious celebration whose origin is related in Livy (I, xxxi). After a shower of stones on the Alban Mount, an official sacrifice, whether because of a warning from above or of the augurs' advice was held, or nine days were to be observed, or avert evil. From there on, the same novena of sacrifices was made whenever the like wonder was announced (cf. Livy, XXI, xiii; XXV, vii; XXVI, xxii, etc.).

Besides this custom, there also existed among the
The Romans celebrated their novena de omnibus, a yearly novena (13 to 22 Feb.) of commemoration of all the deceased members of their families (cf. Mommaerts). The preparation of the novena was rather of a private family character (cf. Homer, Iliad, XXIV, 664, 784; Virgil, Aeneid, VI, 64; Tacitus, Annals, VI, v.). The Romans also celebrated their paracleti novena, a yearly novena (13 to 22 Feb.) of commemoration of all the deceased members of their families (cf. Mommaerts).

During the Middle Ages, the custom of observing a Lenten novena ended on the ninth day with a sacrifice and a joyful banquet. There is a reference to these customs in the laws of the Emperor Justinian ("Corpus Juris Civilis Justiniani", II, Tit. 157, 696, tit. xix, "De sepulchro viatores"), where creditors are forbidden to treat their debtors with contempt during their death period. The novena was not continued beyond the tenth day of death. St. Augustine (P. L., XXXIV, 590) warns Christians not to imitate the pagan custom, as there is no example of it in Holy Writ. Later on, the same was done by the Pseudo-Meliton (P. L., Cl, 1278), invoking the authority of St. Augustine, and still more sharply by John Beleth (P. L., CCII, 150) in the twelfth century. Even Durandus in his Rationale (Naples, 1476), writing on the Office of the Dead, remarks that "some did not approve this, to avoid the appearance of aping pagan customs".

Nevertheless, in Christian mortuary celebrations, one finds that of the ninth day with those of the third and ninth days. The Roman council of Apostolic Constitutions (VIII, xliii; P. G., 1, 1147) already speak of it. The custom existed specially in the East, but is found also among the Franks and Anglo-Saxons. Even if it was connected with an earlier practice of the pagans, it nevertheless had in itself no vestige of superstition. A nine days' mourning with daily Mass was a distinction, naturally, which could be shared by none but the higher classes. Princes and the rich ordered such a celebration for themselves in their wills; even in the wills of popes and cardinals such orders are found. Already in the Middle Ages the novena for masses for popes and cardinals was customary. Later on, the mortuary celebration for cardinals became constantly more simple, until finally it was regulated and fixed by the Constitution Praceipium of Benedict XIV (23 Nov., 1711). For deceased sovereign pontiffs the nine days' mourning was retained, and so came to be called simply the "Pope's Novena" (cf. Mabillon, Mémoires de l'Académie, II, Paris, 1689, 539 sqq.; Ord. Roman. XV; P. L., LXXVIII, 1535; Const. "In elegibus" of Pius IV, 9 Oct., 1562). The usage still continues and consists chiefly in the celebration of a Mass for the departed. A rescript of the Sacred Congregation of Rites (22 Apr., 1853) informs us that such masses, called officio novena or novendiales de Dei salute were generally known and allowed in the churches of religion (Deer. Auth. S. R. C., 604). They are no longer in common use, though they have never been forbidden, and indeed, on the contrary, novendiales pro omnibus deo gratias were approved by Gregory XVI (11 July, 1833) and indulgenced for a confraternity agostantium in France (Roscr. Auth. S. C. Indulg., 352).

Besides the novena for the dead, we find in the earlier part of the Middle Ages the novena of preparation, but at first only before Christmas and only in Spain and France. This had its origin in the nine months Our Lord was in His Blessed Mother's womb from the Incarnation to the Nativity. In Spain the Annunciation was transferred for the whole country by the tenth Council of Toledo in 656 (Cap. i; Mansi, Coll. Conc., XI, 34) to 18 Dec., as the most fitting day for our redemption. With this it appears that a real novena of preparation, or Christmas, was immediately connected for the whole of Spain. At any rate, in a question sent from the Azores (Insulae Angrenses) to the Sacred Congregation of Rites, an appeal was made to the "most ancient custom" of celebrating, just before Christmas, nine votive Masses of Our Lady. And this usage, because of the people who took part in the celebration, was permitted to continue (28 Sept., 1658; Deer. Auth. S. R. C., 332).

A French Ordinarium (P. L., CXLVII, 125) prescribes that the preparation for Christmas on the ninth day should begin with the O antiphons and that each day, at the Magnificat, the altar and the choir should be veiled. The Ordinarium of Saints and the Antiphonary of Tours, in place of the seven common O antiphons, have nine for the nine days before Christmas, and these were sung with special solemnity (Martène, "De Antiq. Ecles. Ritibus", III, Venice, 1783, 30). In Italy the novena seems to have spread only in the seventeenth century. Still, the Praecepta Marianae S. Eucharistiae Rituum aurætria tracatio of the Theatre Pisica Castaldo, a book approved in 1525 by the author's father general (Naples, 1645, p. 586 sqq.), gives complete directions for the celebration of the Christmas novena with Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. The author remarks that this novena in commemoration of Our Lord's nine months in the womb was solemnly celebrated in very many places in Italy. And in the beginning of the eighteenth century, the Christmas novena held such a distinguished position that the Sacred Congregation of Rites (7 July, 1718), in a special case, allowed for it alone the special distribution of the Blessed Sacrament (Deer. Auth., 2220).

But before this, at least in Sicily, the custom had sprung up among religions of preparing for the feast of their founder with a novena of Masses, and these Missae novendiales votive were also (2 Sept., 1690) declared permissible (Deer. Auth., 1879). In general, in the seventeenth century, numerous novenas were held especially in the churches of religious and to the Saints of the various orders (cf. Prola, "De novendialibus supplicationibus", Roma, 1724, passim). Two hundred years later, on application from Sicily for Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament in the celebration of novenas, special permission was granted (Deer. Auth., 3728), and in the decree on the Missae votive of 30 June, 1806, there is really question of the Missae votive novendiales B. M. V. (Deer. Auth., 3922 V, n. 3). At least in this way, then, the novena is recognized even in the Liturgy.

At the same time as the novena of preparation, the proper novena of prayer arose, among the faithful, it would seem, who in their need turned to the saints with a novena, especially to recover health. The original home of this novena must have been France, Belgium, and the neighbourhood of the Lower Rhine. Spontaneously, the custom spread to the other countries. Nobles are requested to bring novenas to St. Hubert, St. Marcel, and St. Mommolus. St. Mommolus (or Mummolus) was considered the special patron for head and brain diseases: the novenas to him were made especially in the Holy Cross Monastery of Bordeaux, where the saint was buried (Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, O. S. R., II, Venice, 1733, 645 sqq.; Acta SS., August, II, 351 sqq.; Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v. "Novena"). St. Marcel procured for the kings of France the power to cure scrofula by a touch of their hand. For this purpose, shortly after their coronation and anointing at Reims, the kings had to go in person on pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Marcel at Corbeny and make a novena there. Those who were to be healed had to make a similar novena. But the best known is the novena to St. Hubert, which continues even to our day. This is made against madness by people bitten by a mad dog or wolf (Mabillon, Acta SS., August, II, 351 sqq.). The last mentioned novena was attacked in later times, particularly by the Jansenists, and was rejected as superstitious (cf. Acta SS., loc. cit., where the attack is met and the novena justified). Before this, Gerson, in the fourteenth century, had given warning against the superstitious abuse of this novena.
he does not reject novenas in general and we see from his works that in his time they were already widespread (Opera, Paris, 1606, II, 322; III, 386, 389). But notwithstanding Gerson's warning, novenas were from that time on ever more and more in favour with the faithful, to which the many, even miraculous, effects of the novenas contributed not a little. Benedictine Angelomus Lib. non-Catholics tells us that the ninth day was for the first time called the Novena, in
n. 12) tells of a number of such miracles adduced in the processes of canonization. Catholics know from their own experience that the novena is no pagan, superstitious custom, but one of the best means to obtain signal heavenly graces through the intercession of the blessed flies and the saints. The novena of prayer is thus a kind of prayer for both, the living and the dead. The name of novena comes from the Latin novenarius which means a prayer for nine days. The word implies also devotion and the wish to speak, as a pledge of being heard, confidence and perseverance, two most important qualities of efficacious prayer. Even if the employment of the number nine in Christianity were connected with a similar use in paganism, the use would still in no way be blameable or at all superstitious. Not, of course, that every single variation or addition made in whatever private novena must be justified or defended. The holiest custom can be abused, but the use of the number nine can not only be justified but even interpreted in the best sense. For the number ten is the highest, the numerus marius, simply the most perfect, which is fitting for God;
the number nine, which is lacking of ten, is the number of imperfection, which is fitting for mortal kind. In some such way the Pythagoreans, Philo the Jew, the Fathers of the Church, and the monks of the Middle Ages, philosophized on the meaning of the number nine.
For this reason it was adopted for use where man's imperfection turned in prayer to God (cf.
Jerome, loc. cit.; Athienagoras, "Legat. pro Chris-tianis", P. G., VI, 902; Pseudo-Ambrosius, P. L., XVII, 10 sq., 633; Rabanus Maurus, P. L., CIX, 984
sq., CXI, 491; Angelomus Monach., In lib. Reg. IV, P. L., CXV, 346; Philo the Jew, "Inscriptiones", Basle, 1554, p. 283).
In the novena of mourning and the Mass on the ninth day it was remembered in the Middle Ages that Christ gave up the ghost in prayer at the ninth hour, as in the penitential books (cf. Schmitta, "Die Busbücher und die Busscellsina", II, 1908, 529, 570, 673), or remarked Durandus, non-Catholics (De tempore of Holy Mass on the ninth day, the departed were to be raised to the ranks of the nine choirs of angels (cf. Belth. loc. cit.; Durandus, loc. cit.). For the origin of the novena of prayer we can point to the fact that the ninth hour in the Synagogue, like None in the Christian Church, was considered the best time; it is also written in that it was reckoned among the "apostolic hours" (cf. Acts, iii, 1; x, 30; Tertullian, "De ejusmis", e. x, Church, too, in the Breviary, has for centuries invoked the Almighty in nine Psalms and honoured Him in nine Litanies, while from ancient time the Kyrie has been heard nine times in every Mass (cf. Durandus, "Rationale, De nona"); Bona, "Opera", Venice, 1764; "De divina psalmodia", p. 101).
As has been said, the simplest explanation of the novena are the nine months in Christ's life in the womb. But for every novena of preparation, as also for the novena of mourning, only the last nine of the ten days was counted; but also the best model and example was given by Christ Himself to the Church in the first Pentecost novena. He Himself expressly exhorted the Apostles to make this preparation. And when the young Church had faithfully persevered for nine full days in it, the Holy Ghost came as the precious fruit of this first Christian novena for the feast of the es-establishment and foundation of the Church. If one keeps this in mind and remembers besides that no-venas in the course of time have brought so much, even miraculous, answers to prayer, and that finally

Christ Himself in the revelation to Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque recommended the special celebration of nine successive first Fridays of the month (cf.
Vermeersch, "Pratique et doctrine de la dévotion au Sacré Coeur de Jésus", Tournai, 1906, 555 sqq.), one must wonder that the Church waited so long before positively approving and recommending novenas in this specially chosen way. Thus step by step (cf.
"Collection de précies historiques", Brussels, 1859, "Des neuvaines", 157 sqq.).
Not until the nineteenth century did the Church formally recommend novenas by the concession of Indulgences. This brings us to the last kind of novenas, those which are indulgenced. Apparently indulgence VII in Butler's "Life of the Saints" granted Indulgences to a novena in honour of St. Francis Xavier made in Lisbon (cf. Prola, op. cit.,
p. 79). The first novena indulged in the city of Rome, and even there for only one church, was the novena in preparation for the feast of St. Joseph in the church of St. Ignatius. This was done by the Briefs of Clement XI, 10 Feb., and 4 March, 1713
(cf. Prola, loc. cit.; Benedict XIV, "De canoniz.", loc. cit.). The Franciscans, who used before this to have a novena for the feast of the Immaculate Con-decption (cf. Deor. Auth. S. R. C., 2472) received special indulgence for it on 10 April, 1715 (cf. Ant.
S. C. Indulg., 215). Not until later, especially from the beginning of the nineteenth century, were various novenas enriched with Indulgences in common for the whole Church. They number in all thirty-two, intended for the most part as novenas of preparation for definite feasts. They are in detail as follows: one in honour of the Most Holy Trinity, which may be made either prior to the feast of the Holy Trinity (first Sunday after Pentecost) or at any other time of the year; two to the Holy Ghost, one to be made prior to the feast of Pentecost for the reconciliation of non-Catholics (this is also made publicly in all parochial churches) and the third that of the nine first Fridays, which is based on the promise made to Blessed Margaret Mary by the Sacred Heart assuring the grace of final perse-vance and the reception of the Sacraments before death to all who should receive Holy Communion on the first Friday of every month for nine consecutive years; a fourth novena is prescribed for the expiatetion for the sins of all mankind; eleven novenas in honour of the Blessed Virgin, viz., in honour of the Immaculate Conception, the Nativity of Mary, her Presentation at the Temple, the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Maternity of Mary, her Purification, his Seven Dolours, the Assumption, the Holy Heart of Mary, and the Holy Rosary; one novena each in honour of the Archangels Michael, Gabriel, and Raphel, and one in honour of the Guardian Angel, two to St. Joseph, one consisting of the recitation of prayers in honour of the seven sorrows and seven joys of the Foster-father of Christ, prior to the feast of St. Joseph (19 March) and one at any time during the year; one novena each in honour of St. Francis of Assisi, at any time during the year, St. Vincent de Paul, St. Paul of the Cross, St. Stanislas Kotska, prior to his feast (13 November), St. Francis Xavier, and one for the Holy Souls. The last novena in honour of St. Francis Xavier, known as the "Novena of Grace", originated as follows: in 1663 Father Mastrilli, S.J., was at the point of death as the result of an accident, when St. Francis Xavier, to whom he had great devotion, appeared to him and urged him to devote himself to the missions of the

Indies. Father Mastrelli then made a vow before his provincial that he would go to the Indies if God spared his life, and in another apparition (3 Jan., 1631) St. Francis Xavier exorted him of a renewal of this promise, foretold his martyrdom, and restored him to health so completely that on that same night Father Mastrelli was in a condition to write an account of his cure, and the next morning to celebrate Mass at the altar of the saint and to receive communion immediately.

He soon set out for the Japanese missions where he was martyred, 17 October, 1637. The renown of the miracle quickly spread through Italy, and inspired with confidence in the power and goodness of St. Francis Xavier, the faithful implored his assistance in many matters, and not a little was accomplished under the protection which he gave to the "novena of grace". This novena is now made publicly in many countries from 4 to 12 March, the latter being the date of the canonization of St. Francis Xavier together with St. Ignatius. The conditions include a visit to a Jesuit church or chapel. The indulgence may be gained on any day of the novena, and those who are prevented by illness or another legitimate cause from communicating during the novena may gain the indulgence by doing so as soon as possible. All of these novenas without exception are to be made, in private or in public, with pious exercises and the reception of the Sacraments, and for those who have already received them a plenary indulgence may be gained and a plenary indulgence at the end of the novena. The indulgences and the conditions for gaining them are accurately given in detail in the authentic "Raccord" and in the works on Indulgences by Beringer and Hilgers, which have appeared in various languages. The indulged novenas, to a certain extent official, have but contributed to increase the confidence of the faithful in novenas. Hence, even the private novena of prayer flourishes in our day. Through the novena to Our Lady of Lourdes, through that to St. Anthony of Padua or some other saint, the faithful seek and find help and relief. The history of novenas is not yet written, but it is doubtful a good part of the history of childlike veneration of Our Lady and all the saints, of lively confidence in God, and especially of the spirit of prayer in the Catholic Church.

JOSEPH HILGERS

Novice.—I. Definition and Requirements.—The word novice, which among the Romans meant a newly acquired slave, and which is now used to denote an inexperienced person, is the canonical Latin name of those who, having been regularly admitted into a religious order or community, to prepare for or enter into their higher vocation by a certain period of probation as postulants, are prepared by a series of exercises and tests for the religious profession. In Greece, the novice was called δακτυλος, a beginner. The religious life, recommended by Jesus Christ is encouraged by the Church and any person is allowed to become a novice who is not prevented by some positive legal impediment. No minimum or maximum age is fixed by canon law for admission into the novitiate. Those, however, who have not arrived at puberty cannot enter without the consent of their parents or guardians; and canon law ("Si quis", 1: 1, 4; "De regularibus", II, 31) grants to parents one year to compel the return of a child who has entered without their consent. As the Council of Trent fixes at sixteen years the earliest age for the profession which follows the novitiate, we may conclude that the novice must have completed his fifth to his twenty-first year; or, if he entered the novitiate at the age of sixteen, if the two years be required, and this opinion is confirmed in respect to Regulars, properly so-called, by the decree of the Sacred Congregation of Religious dated 16 May, 1675, and for nuns by that of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars dated 28 May, 1589. According to the rules of procedure, published by the latter congregation, 28 June, 1901, no person may be admitted into a new congregation under the age of fifteen years without special permission of the Holy See.

The constitution of Clement VIII. "Cum ad Regulam", of 19 March, 1603, requires the age of nineteen full years for the reception of lay-brothers, but this constitution has not been everywhere carried into effect. Only by a circular of 10 December, 1924, was it decided that aspirants to enter religion (cf. Clerici, unice, c. XIX, 1; Alienum, I codem, q. 2; Benedict XIV, C, "Ex quo dilectus", 14 January, 1747; the reply of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars of 20 December, 1859; Nilles, "De liberate clericorum religionem ingendi", 1831) be at least eighteen years old, for it is necessary for the latter to be well instructed in the Holy Scriptures, for the study, or who have been maintained at the expense of the seminary retain this right, although it is admitted that the founder of aburse, or the donor of money for educational purposes may impose certain reasonable conditions for the use of his gifts, and may stipulate for instance that the cleric shall undertake to serve the diocese for a certain number of years, or not to enter into religion without the consent of the Holy See. Although the consent of the bishop is not canonically required, the cleric is recommended to inform him of his intention to enter a religious order, and a similar notification is required of the cleric or priest occupying any office in a religious house. The Holy See, however, may place the cleric in a position to fill the vacancy. For the entry into religion of a diocesan bishop nominated or confirmed by the Holy See, the consent of the pope is required. This does not apply to a bishop who has lawfully resigned his see, but some authors consider that it does apply to titular bishops.

However general may be the freedom to enter a religious order, no person is allowed to do this to the detriment of another's right. Thus a married man, at least after the consummation of marriage, cannot enter into religion, unless his wife has by her misconduct given him the right to refuse cohabitation forever, or unless she consents to his entrance, and agrees to make a vow of chastity or to enter into religion herself, in conformity with canonical rules. The liberty of a married woman is similarly limited ("Pratereca", 1; "Cum sie", 4; "Ad Apostolicum", 13; "Significavit", 18; "De conversione conjutorum", III, 32). Parents may not enter into religion without giving suitable provision for the education and future of their children; nor children who are under the obligation of maintaining their parents, if their religious profession would prevent them from aiding their parents in any grave necessity. Debtors also are forbidden, at least in certain cases, to enter into religious life, and if to do so they would incur the payment of their debts within a reasonable time (this is a disputed point but we give the most commonly accepted opinion, which is that of St. Alphonsus, "Moral Theology", bk. IV, 5, n. 71). Moreover, a positive order of Sixtus V (Cum de omnibus, 1587), modified to a certain extent by Clement VIII (in Suprema, 1602), forbids the profession of persons involved in debts by their own fault. Canon law also excludes persons branded with infamy and those connected with any criminal proceeding, also those under an obligation to render accounts of a complicated nature, (C. Clement VIII, "in Suprema", 1602). An illegitimate child is not necessarily excluded, but he cannot be received into any order in which his father is professed (C. Gregory XIV, "Circumspecta", 15 March, 1591).

The canonical regulations spoken of above, concern those religious orders in which solemn vows are taken. Of those religious orders which profess some observance of religious vows, but do not take solemn vows, the natural law and their own approved constitutions. According to the "Normae" (Regulations) of 1901, the Holy See imposes the following disabilities, and reserves to itself the right of dispensation: illegitimacy, not removed by legitimation; age, below fifteen and above thirty years; vows binding a person to another order; marriage; debts or liability to reader accounts; and for nuns, widowhood. More recently, the decree "Ecclesiae Christi" of 7 September, 1909, with which the decisions of 4 September, 1904, were modified, renders the admission of any person who has been expelled from a college for immorality or other grave fault, or of a person who has been dismissed for any cause whatever from another religious order, a seminary, or any institution for the training of ecclesiastics or religious. A person to whom a dispensation from his vows cannot enter into any order but the one which he left. This decree applies both to religious orders, and to congregations with simple vows, at least to those which are not diocesan, and its effect has been extended by the order of 1 January, 1910, to diocesan foundations. Communities of women, with only formal assent, renders admission invalid, but the fact of leaving college or other institution under circumstances which would make it invalid to expel, makes it, and the Holy See requires superiors to make such inquiries as are necessary to prevent the admission of undesirable persons. Another decree of 7 September, 1910, "In articulo", while not rendering the reception invalid, forbids the admission of a young man who presents himself in order to become a religious cleric, unless he has gone through a course of at least four years of classical studies. (For these decrees and their explanation see "De religiosis et monastice institutione"

Before the taking of the habit, exact information must be secured to make sure of the qualities and good intentions of the candidates. These precautions are happy substitutions for the rather rude test that had to be undergone in former times (see Postulae). Besides being dictated by the natural law, they have been sanctioned for the orders of men by a Constitution of Sixtus V, "Cum de canonicis", 1587, and by another Constitution, "Cum ad regularem", promulgated by Clement VIII, March, 1603, and confirmed by Urban VIII. These ordinances of Clement VIII concern Italy and the adjacent islands only. In the celebrated Decree "Romani Pontifices" (25 January, 1848), Pius IX had a strict injunction on all superiors of orders and congregations of men to admit no one to the habit without testimonial letters from the ordinary of the diocese in which the candidate was born and of the diocese in which he has lived for more than a year. A special provision was made for the year is explained in a later declaration to mean twelve successive months spent in the same diocese. In these letters, the ordinaries ought, in as far as they can, to bear witness to the candidate's birth, age, conduct, reputation, and all other qualities that affect his entry into religion. The obligation of exacting such letters is imposed under penalty of censure, but it does not constitute a simple nullity. Their receipt does not dispense superiors from making their own inquiries.

II. Juridical Condition.—By the fact of his entrance into an approved congregation, the novice becomes a member of that religious order, he becomes a regular in the widest sense of the word; as such he is not bound by any vow, but he is protected by the ecclesiastical immunities, and shares in the indulgences and privileges of his order, gaining a plenary indulgence on the day of his admission, at least into an order properly so called. Therefore, the superior of the community, in the name of the novice, exercises all his powers of absolution in reserved cases, and of dispensations from rules and precepts of the Church. Novices benefit also by any exemption attached to the order to which they belong. The jurisdiction communicated by the superior of the congregation shuns to oblige the confessor to consult the superior in order that a confessor approved only by the ordinary of the place could not give them valid absolution, though this point is disputed. According to the common law of regulars, the priest who is master of novices is their only ordinary confessor. The novice is bound to obey the superior who has jurisdiction over him, and power as head of the house. He is bound by any private vows which he may have taken before his ordination, and, if annulled by the superior in so far as they are contrary to the rules of the order or the exercises of the novitiate, The training of the novices is entrusted to an experienced religious, ordinarily distinct from the local superior. The latter, though obliged to respect the novices' testimonials of the novitiate, remains the real immediate superior of the novices, and is invested with a part of the house which is called the novitiate, the direction of the entire community belongs exclusively to him. By canon law, the novice retains full and entire liberty to leave his order and makes no pecuniary responsibility by the mere fact of leaving it. Oaths of devotion do not change the juridical condition of the novice, and they cease to bind if he is legally expelled. As soon as one has made up his mind to leave, it becomes his duty to inform the superior; and if he fails to do so, he becomes liable to reimburse the order for any unnecessary expense it may incur on his behalf after his departure. This only natural idea is imposed so that the novice is obliged to restore to him his personal property and anything he may have brought with him. The order is not bound to the novice by any contract, it may dismiss him. According to the regulations of 28 June, 1901, in new congregations governed by simple vows, the superior may not dismiss a novice during the time of the superior-general and his council. Dismissal without sufficient cause would be an offence against charity and equity, and a superior guilty of such an offence would fall in his duty to his order.

Although the reception of a novice should be gratuitous, the Council of Trent (c. 16, Sess 25, "De regulis liberalibus") permits the order to stipulate for the payment of his expenses while in the novitiate. In order to secure the complete liberty of the novice, the same council forbids him to make any remittance of his property or any important gift, and annuls such remittance if made. Parents also, to whose property the novice had a right of succession, are debarred from making any considerable donation. By common law, however, a novice may legally renounce his property within the two months immediately preceding his profession, and this renunciation should also be authorized by the bishop or his vicar-general. This formal renunciation should be given in writing, and witnessed. The renunciation may extend to property of which he is already possessed, or to such as must necessarily descend to him by right of inheritance; but not seemingly to such as he has only an expectation of receiving. He is free to make over his property to his family, his order, or any pious work, or even to provide for his own services and Masses after his death. Although the renunciation takes effect only from the date of his profession, and becomes null and void if that profession does not take place, it is not revocable at the pleasure of the novice before his profession, unless he has renounced to himself his right of renunciation. Upon the conclusion of his profession, the novice is freed from all obligations in respect of the property of his property. If no renunciation has been made at the time of solemn profession, canon law assigns the property either to the monastery or to the natural heirs of the religious. Common law requires that the solemn profession shall be preceded by a period of simple vows before making these vows, the novice is bound to declare his possession of the administration of his patrimony, and how he wishes the income to be employed, and the consent of the Holy See is generally required for any change in this arrangement. The religious is entitled to provide for the administration of any additional property which may come to him after his profession, and the same consent is required. For the income of such property. The law of the Council of Trent does not concern congregations which are governed by simple vows; but in these the power of a XI. — 10 novice to alienate or retain his property is provided for by their constitutions. Generally speaking, the novice is bound, before taking his vows, to declare how he wishes his property to be administered, and the income expended. According to the Regulations of 1901, he may, even after making his vows, be authorized by the superior-general to modify these dispositions. The renunciation of property, though not made null and void, is forbidden to the novice. The Holy See does not approve that any obligation should be imposed upon the novice to give even the income of his property for religious purposes, unless it be for any reasonable purpose. Solemn profession vacates all ecclesiastical benefices of which the novice was possessed; the perpetual vows of congregations governed by simple vows vacate residential benefices; that is to say, benefices which require residence are vacated by the simple profession, which prepares the way for solemn profession, or by the temporary vows which precede perpetual vows.

III. EXERCISES.—Except in the case of some special privilege of the religious order (as with the Society of Jesus) or some unavoidable obstacle, the novice should follow a common habit, and not the special habit of novices. It is the duty of the novice, under the guidance of the novice-master, to form himself to the spiritual, to learn the rules and customs of his order, and to try himself in the difficulties of the religious life. The rule ordinarily prescribes that at the outset of his religious career he shall pass six months or an equal period experientially, in the confession of the sins of his whole life. By the Constitution "Cum ad regularem" of 19 March, 1603, renewed under Urban VIII in the Decree "Sacra Congregatio" of 1624, Clement VIII laid down, for novitiates approved by the Holy See, some very wise rules in which he directed that there should be a certain amount of recreation, both in the house and out of doors; and he insisted on the separation of the novices from older religious. For a long time, studies, properly so called, were forbidden, at least during the first year of novitiate; but a recent decree dated 27 August, 1910, while maintaining the principle that one year of the novitiate should be devoted especially to the formation of the religious character, recommends certain studies to exercise the mental faculties of the novices, and enable their superiors to form an opinion of their talents and capacities without involving any direct application, such as the study of the mother-tongue, Latin and Greek, repetition of work previously done, reading the works of the Fathers, etc., in short, studies appropriate to the purpose of the order. Novices, therefore, are bound to give up one hour regularly to private study on all days except feast-days, and also to receive lessons limited to one hour each, not oftener than three times a week. The manner in which the novices apply themselves to these studies is to be taken into account when the question arises of their being admitted to profession (see the decree annotated in Venerable, "Periodica de religionis et missaminis", vol. V, 1919, p. 442, pp. 456-457). According to the old orders, the novice receives a religious name, differing from his baptismal name.

IV. DURATION.—For all religious orders, the Council of Trent prescribes a full year in the novitiate, under penalty of nullity of profession. In those orders which have a distinctive habit, the novice consecrates himself with the assumption of the habit; in those which have no habit, it commences from the time when the novice is received into the house lawfully assigned for the purpose by competent authority. This year must be continuous without interruption. It is interrupted whenever the bond between the order and the novice is broken by voluntary departure or legal dismissal; and also when, independently of the wish of either superior or novice, the latter is compelled to live for any considerable time in the world. A dismissal is considered to take effect when once the novice has crossed the threshold of the house; in case of a voluntary departure, a novice who has left the house, but who has kept his religious habit and who returns after one or two days' absence, is considered as having only gone to a temporary desire for change, not sufficient to cause him to lose the benefit of the time already spent in the novitiate. An interruption makes it necessary that the novice should begin afresh as if nothing had previously been done, and it differs in this respect from suspension which is only suspended between two effective periods of novitiate. The time which passes during the suspension does not count, only the time passed before the suspension being added to that which follows. The novice is suspended when a novice is withdrawn for a certain time from the religious direction, but without changing his condition. This would happen in the case of a temporary mental aberration, or an expulsion for some reason shown afterwards to be unfounded, and therefore annulled. It is generally held that if a novice quits his order after having finished his novitiate, and is subsequently received into another, the novitiate must begin afresh, unless it appears that there has been some serious change in his dispositions. The law of the Council of Trent does not strictly apply to congregations governed by simple vows, but the constitutions of these congregations ordinarily require a year of novitiate at least, and the "Normae" (Regulations) of 1901 make it possible a renewal of the novitiate where the novitiate has been of little use, or because of the novitiate of one of the conditions of a valid profession.

The practice of the Holy See has been of late years to interpret this continuity much more strictly than was formerly the case. Some persons consider that one whole day passed outside the novitiate, even for some good reason, and with the permission of the superior, is sufficient to render ineffective the whole of the previous probation, but this is too rigorous an interpretation of the rule. To avoid all danger of offending against canon law, superiors will do wisely not to grant permission to pass the night out of the novitiate, except for a very good reason and for a very short time. By the Constitutions of Clement VIII, "Regulare discipline" of 12 March, 1596, and of Innocent XII, "Sanctissimum" of 20 June, 1699, the novitiate house must be approved by the Holy See, and the novitiate cannot be validly passed elsewhere. This does not apply to the study of the other languages, and do not apply to all religious orders. Nevertheless some authors consider them to be of universal application. The rules of congregations governed by simple vows approved by the Holy See ordinarily reserve to the Holy See the approbation of the novitiate house. Pius IX, in an Encyclical letter of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars dated 22 April, 1854, required that in all novitiates there should be a common life, pocket-money and the separate use of chattels of whatever kind (peculium) was forbidden. One part of the novitiate house should be reserved for the novices, and strictly separated from the rest of the house. All of the novices should be commenced except in the house lawfully set apart for the purpose. Some authors strictly require that the novices shall never be lodged elsewhere; but, although in the orders whose novitiate is bound to be approved by the Holy See, residence in this house is expressly required, it does not seem possible that a few days' absence should lessen the value of the probation.

V. TESTIMONY.—The institution of a time of probation, in order to prepare the candidate who has already been admitted to the religious life for his profession, is due to the very ancient times. According to Mgr Ladenze (Le événements Pachomiens, p 282), in spite of the testimony of the MS. life of St. Pachomius (MS. 381, "Patoologia", IV, Paris), the novice did not exist in the monastery of St. Pachomius as a general institution; but from the fifth century at least it had been the rule for the Coptic monks to pass through a novitiate of three years. The "Coptic Ordinal" in the Bodleian Library of Oxford; Evetts in "Revue de l'Orient chrétien", I, 11, 1906, pp. 65, 140.) This term of three years was required also in Persia in the sixth century (Labourot, "Le Christianisme en Perse", p. 80). Justinian, in approving this, says, "the Nilotic, Egyptian scriptionariis."

Many Western orders, notably that of St. Benedict, were content with one year. St. Gregory the Great in his letter to Fortunatus, Bishop of Naples (bk. X. Letter 24, in Martyrologium Rerum, 1062-7) required two years. Many orders of canons left the time of consecration of the abbot. Common law did not prescribe any term of novitiate and this omission led to the frequent shortening, and occasionally to the entire abolition of the preparatory probation. Innocent III ["C. Apostolicum", 16, "de regularibus" (III, 31)] directs that the novitiate shall be dispensed with only in exceptional circumstances, and forbids the Mendicant Orders to make their profession within one year. Finally the Council of Trent (Sess. XXV, c. xx, "de regularibus") makes a year's novitiate an indispensable condition of valid profession. In the East, since the fourth century the monastic institutions of Palestine, Egypt, and Tabenna have been accustomed to give up their secular dress, and put on the habit given them by the community. This habit is distinguished from that of the professed by the absence of the cinctula or cowl. Thoose of St. Basil kept their habits. This practice sanctioned by Justinian (Novella, v. c. 2), was generally adopted by the Churches of the East, but the contrary use has for a long time past prevailed. Nubia, in North-eastern Africa, extending from Sennar south to beyond Khartoum and including the Euphrates. The modern Nubia (or Nubian) region includes Sennar with Desheireh-el-Derameer (Islands of the Isthmus), the ancient Merotic; the western, Bahir el Abiad, Kordofan, and Darfur; the eastern, Tarka; the central, Dongola; and the northern, Nubia proper. The various tribes belong to the Ethiopian or Berber family, intermixed with Arabs; in the south negroes predominate. The chief Nubian cities are: Karthoum, at the junction of the White and Blue Niles, founded in 1823 and the starting-point of all scientific and missionary expeditions, destroyed in 1885 by the Mahdi, rebuilt in 1898; Omdurman, on the Abiad, founded by the Mahdi; Senmar, capital of the Berber Niles under Kordof, capital of Taka. On the Nile are Berber, Ana-Honamed, Old Dongola, and New Dongola, capital of central Nubia; in Nubia proper, Derr, Wadi Halfa, and Assuan; in Kordofan, El-Obed; in Darfur, El Fasho. Formerly the port of Nubia was Ssink on the Red Sea; from 1906 it has been Port Sudan. Nubia is administered by the Vicery of Eyi.

History.—Nubia is said to be derived from the Egyptian Nub (gold), as the Egyptians obtained most of their gold there. In the Bible it is called Cush. Egypt sought repeatedly to extend its southern boundaries, and during the eighteenth dynasty reached Wadi Halfa. A temple was built at Napata (near the Fourth Cataract) by Amenophis III, and his successors waged successful war with the Ethiopians. After this there arose in Napata near the sacred mountain Gebel Barkal an independent theocratic state; the remains of many of its temples are still to be seen. During the twenty-third dynasty the Nubians shook off the Egyptian yoke and even for some years ruled over 50 n. c.); three Nubian kings ruled the united territory (732-608). Ptolemaic I (664-10) drove out the Nubians, and Meroe replaced Napata, which maintained its sovereignty over Nubia until destroyed by the native king Eremanes during the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphia (287-24). During Roman rule, the Nubians attempted to gain the Thebaid, but Petronius in 25 n. c. conquered Nubia and forced Queen Candace to make a treaty of peace. In the third century after Christ marauding incursions of Nubian tribes called the Hellenized or Diodotian to summon the Nubatae from El Charge in the Nile valley as confederates of the empire. Nevertheless Prima, Phenecon, Chris, Taphis, and Taibus yielded. In the fourth and centuries the Thebaid was so often devastated that Emperor Marcian was forced to conclude an unfavourable peace in 451. Christianity, sought probably by the hermits and monks of the Thebaid, spread northwards, and the various accounts of this event are confusing: Piny and Melo give the name of Ethiopia to all the countries in this region, including Abyssinia, while ecclesiastical writers speak of an Ethiopian Church, but give no account of the conversion of individual lands. Christianity was not yet well established, when about the middle of the sixth century under the protection of the empress Theodora, the Alexandrian priest Julian introduced Monophysitism. Its adherents called themselves Copts. The Nabatean kings Silko and Euphrasios accepted Christianity in this form, and the Monophysite priests. The Theodotus, Bishop Theodore of Philae, and Longinus, Julian's successor, on the new doctrine on a firm basis. In 560 Longinus baptized the King of the Alode. The final victory of the Monophysites was secured by their union with the Arabs, soon to be masters of Egypt. In 640 Amr Ben el-Asi, the commander-in-chief of the Arabs, conquered Egypt, and restored Byzantine supremacy. The Monophysite (Catholic) patriarch, George of Alexandria, fled to Constantinople and his see remained vacant for over a hundred years. The Copts secured peace only by becoming confederates of the enemy, and in return received nearly all the Catho- bic churches; this made the Copts almost a religious monopoly over the entire territory. According to the Ar- abian Makrizi, as related by Ibn Sehn, when the Nubians requested bishops they received from Alexandria Monophysites, and in this way became and remained Jacobites or Copts.

In the following centuries numerous churches and monasteries were built even up to the 17th and 18th centuries, yet remain. Other documents show that Nubia was divided into three provinces with seventeen bishops: Marcar with the suffragan Dioceses of Korta, Hbrin, Buercas, Danakul, Sai, Ternene, and Suektan; Alkhadia with Borein, Cogara, Marim, Arodins, Kanza, and Munery; and with South Catacris, Amurah, and Annakul. Yet Christianity was in continual danger from the Mohammedans. Nubia succeeded in freeing itself from the control of Egypt, which became an independent Mohammedan kingdom in 1669, but in 1753 Sabrah's brother Schlems Edlahwalka abandoned Nubia and fled to Beninc, where he died. The church was restored, and Nubia was occupied by 78,000 Nubians. At the same time Northern Nubia was conquered. In 1753 the Mameluke Sultan Djan Bi-bar sent an army from Egypt into Nubia. Dongola was conquered, the Christian king David was obliged to flee, and the churches were plundered. The inhabitants escaped forced conversion to Mohammedanism only by payment of a head-tax. Nubia was divided into petty states, chief of which was Sever, founded in 1484 by the negro Tunji. For some time Sever ruled Shendi, Berber, and Dongola. In the eighteenth century the King of Sever obtained a decree from Vienna, Freeing Aga John of Dongola, yet there is little information as to the position of Christianity; Islam became supreme, partly by force, partly by the amalgamation of the native with the Arabian tribes.

In 1821 Sever and the dependent provinces submitted to Mohammed Ali, the founder of modern Egypt. The commanding position of the capital, Khartoum, led the Holy See to hope that the conversion of Central Africa could be effected from Nubia. On 26 December, 1815, the Propaganda erected a vicariate, confirmed by Gregory XVI, 3 April, 1846. The Austrian imperial family contributed funds and the mission was under the protection of the Austrian con-sulate at Khartoum. Missionary work was begun by the Jesuits Ryllo (d. 1848) and Knoblocher (d. 1855), who pushed forward as far as 10 north of the equator. Kiecher, and several secular priests (among whom were Haffer, d. 1854, and Gorbl, d. 1857). They founded stations at Heiligenkreuz on the Abaid (1855), and after the instructions in Gondar (1851), by which the missions were transferred to the Franciscans. Father Daniel Conboni (d. at Khartoum, 1851) founded an institute at Verona for the training of missionaries to labour among the negroes of Southern Sudan. The Pious Mothers of the Negro Country (Pie Madre del Nigro Regnum), founded in 1857, devoted itself to conducting schools for girls and dispensaries.

The Mahdi, Mohammed Ahmed, in 1881 conquered Kordofan, and in 1883 vanquished the Egyptian army, and on 26 January, 1885, destroyed Khartoum. A number of priests and sisters were held for years in captivity; the name of Christian seemed obliterated.

A young English missionary, Thomas Wilson, was expelled by the English under Lord Kitchener, 2 September, 1898, the mission was re-established.

1894 the mission had been opened at Assam. In 1898 Mgr. Rovergio with Fathers Weber and Huber established a station at Onuman. In 1990 founded the mission near the Shibli and re-established the station at Khartoum. Under his successor, Geyer established a station at Halfaya, 1901 at Halfaya, Lui, Atika, Kayango; in 1905 at Mifti among the Djar, at Wau in Bahrl Ghazal, and the mission at Sukin, opened in 1883, was resumed. The Sons of the Sacred Cross, as the Missionaries of Verona, have often called from 1897, founded a station at Port Sudan.

Since from Khartoum the missionary territory is divided into a northern and a southern district, the majority of the population in the north is Mohammedan, and the chief task of the missionaries is pastoral work among the scattered Christian communities.

In 1908 Khartoum had 95,314 inhabitants, Omdurman 20,686, and the towns and stations about 10,000 are Catholics. Khartoum is served by 2 fathers, 1 brother, and 4 sisters; the schools contain 82 boys and 75 girls. In Omdurman there are 300 Catholics, 3 fathers, 1 brother, and 5 sisters; 41 boys and 45 girls attend the school. There is also a school for negroes at Halfaya, 1 father, 1 brother, and 4 sisters; 31 boys and 54 girls are taught in the schools. There are 500 Catholics among the workmen. At Port Sudan the Catholics number between 200 and 300. There are Catholics also at Halfa, Abu-Hamed, Dongola, Argo, Merca, Ber-

The number of Catholics in Kordofan, and Nubia is small. At Aru, Zalun, Madani, Kordofan, the missionaries have been about 1,000. Catholicism among the heathen negroes have already advanced beyond the boundaries of Nubia. The statistics for 1907 for the northern and southern missions were: 11 stations, 30 priests, 23 brothers, 11 sisters, 2,407 Catholics, 192 boys and girls in the mission-schools.

The province of Nueva Caceres, created in 1595 by Clement VIII, is one of the four suffragan sees of the Archdiocese of Manila, Philippine Islands. It comprises the provinces of Camarines Sur, Camarines Norte, Albay, and Tayabas in the southern part of Luzon, the islands Ticao, Masbate, Burias, and Cantabnanes, also numerous smaller islands off the coast of Southern Luzon. It includes a territory of 13,632 square miles, and has a population of nearly 600,000. The cathedral and episcopal residence is situated in the town of Nueva Caceres, the capital of Camarines Sur. The territory now included in the diocese was first visited by Augustinian Friars, who arrived there in 1596 and according to the Indies, the Clementina of 1595. The English have been unable to attend so extensive a territory. In 1587 the Frenchmen were called to assist them. The arrival of the latter gave a new impulse to the work of evangelization. Missions were opened at Abay, in Camarines Sur, and in Masbate; and new foundations were made in the Province of Tayabas. The ranks of the missionaries were strengthened from time to time by workers from Spain and Mexico; as early as 1595 the Church had made so much progress in these parts that Clement VIII created the Diocese of Nueva Caceres, taking the name from the town of Nueva Caceres founded in Ca-first bishop was Francisco de Ortega, an Augustinian friar who had labored for several years in the Province of Manila. He took possession of his diocese in 1600. The present bishop (Rt. Rev. John B. McInerney, C.Ss.R., 1910) is his twenty-second successor.

From the beginning until 1800, the greater number of parishes and missions were cared for by the Franciscans and the Augustinians. Although he had resigned during the first years in favor of the Franciscans, they returned to the diocese some years later, and the Bishop, who had lived in the Missions Norte. Each parish had as its parish priest a friar, assisted, according to the importance and population of the district, by one or more native secular priests. Only in later years were the latter placed in full charge of important parishes. As late as 1897, out of about two hundred parishes, eighty-five were charged by friars.

The bishops were also generally chosen from the various religious orders, though on several occasions members of the secular clergy held the see, the most noted being (1723) the saintly Bishop de Molina, a native of Hollo, whose name is still held in veneration. The Lazarists came in 1870, under Bishop Guinza, and were placed in charge of the diocese during the process of construction. The same prelate introduced the Sisters of Charity and placed them in charge of the academy and normal school which he had founded. In 1886 the Capuchins arrived and were given several missions. In 1898, on account of the revolution against the Spaniards, a bishop resident, and the majority of these religious were withdrawn from their parishes and missions, and secular clergy placed in charge. The present (1908) statistics of the diocese are as follows: 165 priests, of whom 25 are regulars; the religious who are not priests number 12 (sisters 9, brothers 3); 122 parishes with resident priests; without resident priests, 6; parochial schools 180, with 40,000 children in attendance (24,000 boys and 22,000 girls); one hospital; one academy for girls, with 200 in attendance; a diocesan seminary, preparatory and theological, with 60 students; a college for secular students attached to the seminary, with 500 students. The total population of the diocese is nearly 600,000, of which number less than 1000 are non-Catholic.

Nueva Segovia, Diocese of (NUEVA SEGOVIA), in the Philippines, so called from Segovia, a town in Spain. The town of Nueva, or New, Segovia was in the Province of Cagayan, and was founded in 1581. Manila was the only diocese of the Philippine Islands until 1516. There was a Bishop of Cagayan for nine or ten years, and one of the Augustinians, namely Cebú, Nueva Cáceres, and Nueva Segovia. The latter see was established at Nueva Segovia. About the middle of the eighteenth century, the see was transferred to Vigan, where it has since remained. The town of Nueva Segovia declined, was merged with a neighboring town called Laoib, and its name preserved only by the diocese. (Const. "Que mari Sinico") created four new dioceses in the Philippines, among them Tuguegaro, the territory of which was taken from Nueva Segovia, and comprises the Provinces of Cagayan, Isabela, Nueva Vizcaya, and two groups of small islands. The territory retained by the Diocese of Nueva Segovia embraces the Provinces of Ilocos Norte, Ilocos Sur, Union, Pangasinan, five towns in the province of Tarlac, the sub-province of Abra, and also a large part of what is called the Mountain province; all this territory lies between 15° and 19° N. lat. and is located in the large island of Luzon.

The population of the Diocese of Nueva Segovia is about one million, consisting principally of the Ilocanos and Pangasinenses tribes, besides mountainers who are nearly all Igorrotes. The Ilocanos and Pangasinenses live, mostly, in the plain between the mountains on the coast and the mountainous lands to the west. They were all converted by the Spaniards, and, up to the present time, have generally speaking, remained faithful to the Catholic Church. Since the American occupation, a few Protestant sects have established themselves here, and have drawn a few of the ignorant class away from the Church. The fidelity of the Catholics was severely tested by the schism of 1892, started by Rev. Gregorio Aglipay, an excommunicated priest. He was born in this diocese, was a high military officer during the rising of the natives against the American sovereignty, and found much sympathy, especially in this part of the islands. He professed to change the faith of the native clergy, though the movement was political. He drew with him twenty-one priests and a large number of lay people. He and his movement have been discredited, and the people, in large numbers, have returned to the Church. Only a small part of the Igorrotes has been converted. The Spanish missionaries were overcome among them until 1898, when the insurrection against the United States broke out, and the missionaries had to flee. Belgian and German priests have taken the place of the Spaniards in the missionary field, and gradually are reclaiming the people from their pagan and especially from their bloodthirsty customs.

There is at Vigan a seminary-college under Spanish Jesuit Fathers, with four hundred collegians and twenty seminarists; there is also a girls' college founded by the last Spanish bishop, Monsignor Heva Campomunis, who had to die in 1618. It is in charge of the Franciscan Fathers. The Dominican Sisters have a girls' college in Loyang, the capital of the same province. In 1910 a parochial school and college, under Belgian sisters, was opened at Taguindin, a town of the same province, with an attendance of 355 girls. The school continued as a public and training. A similar institution is projected for the province of Abra, and will be entrusted to German sisters. Gradually parochial schools are being organized, but in many cases it has been found extremely difficult to sustain the expense. The Spanish government supports the religion in all its effects; but since the separation of Church and State the people, unaccustomed to contribute directly to the support of religion, find the maintenance of ecclesiastical institutions a difficult undertaking. At least Sunday schools are possible, and gradually they are coming into vogue. In Vigan, out of a population of 16,000, about 2000 go to Sunday school. There are not and never were almshouses or asylums of any kind. The people are very charitable towards the poor and afflicted, who have the custom of going to stated times in a body to the homes of the well-to-do, where they receive some gifts and where they are often publicly recite the Rosary and other devotional prayers. Up to 1603 nearly all the bishops of Nueva Segovia were Spaniards. In that year Right Reverend D. J. Dougherty, D.D., an American, was appointed. He was transferred to the Diocese of Jarro, Philippean Islands, and Right Reverend J. J. Carroll, D.D., the present (1910) incumbent, like the former bishop an American, succeeded him.

JAMES J. CARROLL.

Nugent, Francis, priest of the Franciscan Capuchin Order, founder of the Irish and the Rhenish Provinces of said order; b. in 1569 at Biretton, near Armagh, Ireland, according to some; according to others, at Moyrath, County Meath; d. at Charleville, France, in 1635. His father was Sir Thomas Nugent of Moyrath, and his mother was the Lady Mary, daughter of Lord Devlin. At an early age he was sent to France to receive an education which the Penal Laws denied him at home. Before he was twenty he obtained the degree of doctor at the Universities of Paris and Louvain, and occupied chairs in these two centres of learning, prior to his entrance into religion. He acquired a profound knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and could speak a number of European languages fluently. In 1589 he joined the Capuchin Fratbro-Belgian Province, taking the name of Francis. In due course he was professed and ordained priest. Towards the close of 1591, or the beginning of 1592, he was sent to France to guide the destinies of the French provinces then being formed, and established communities at Metz and Charleville. Meanwhile he continued to deliver lectures in philosophy and theology at Paris. In 1598 he went as custos-general of France to the general chapter at Rome, and was appointed commissary general of the Capuchins at Venice. Three years later, being again in the Eternal City, he took part in a public disputation in theology at which Clement VIII himself presided. Father Francis maintained his thesis with skill and eloquence, and was enthusiastically awarded the palm of victory.

At the general chapter of 1599 he was relieved of the provinciate and returned to Belgium, where he remained about eleven years. In 1610, at the earnest request of John Zwickhard, Archbishop of Mainz, who was in charge of seven friars of this province were sent to establish the order in the Rhine country, and Father Francis was appointed their commissary general. He founded a convent at Paderborn in 1612, and two years later communities were established at Essen, Minster, and Aachen. He also established the Confraternity of the Passion at Paderborn. The Dominicans, whose first protectors were his two great friends Mgr. Albercati, the papal nuncio, and Frederick of Hohenzollern, the dean of the cathedral. In 1615 he began a monastery at Mainz. Pope Paul V nominated him vicar Apostolic and commissary general, with full power to establish the order in Ireland. That country was then passing through a terrible period of turbulence and misfortune. The Capuchins braved every danger, mingled with the people, and ministered to their spiritual needs. Meanwhile, in 1618, the monastery of Charleville, in Upper Champagne, became a training-school for friars intended for the Irish mission, and facilities for the same purpose were offered by the Flandres-Belgian Province. A fresh band of workers was soon sent to Ireland, and Father Nugent was thus enabled to found the first monastery in Dublin in 1621. The Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Fleming, in 1629 addressed to the Irish clergy a letter commending the Capuchin Fathers, specially mentioning "their learning, prudence, and earnestness". Two years later Father Nugent founded a monastery at Shane, in the diocese of his friend, Dr. Dease, who had previously borne public testimony to the merits of the Capuchins. Owing to failing health, he retired in 1631 to Charleville. He is generally credited with having procured the foundation at Lille of the Province of the Flandres-Belgian Province of the Franciscan Friars Minor. He was also a director of the Ste. Julie and Ste. Marie asylums in Paris, established at his own expense by Madame de Sibour, and by the aid of her benefactor, the financier Danville. He died at Charleville on the Feast of the Ascension, 1634. Nugent described him as a "man of most ardent zeal and most exemplary piety", and the annalist of the order states that he refused the Archbishop of Armagh offered him by Pius V, who desired him "to the support of the Church and the light of the orthodox faith". He wrote several works, of which the principal are: "Tractatus De Hibernia", "Cursus philosophicus et theologicus", "De Meditatione et Contemplatione examinata", "Paradisus contemptu", "Super regula Minorum, Expositio Cœpiscos".

FATHER AUGUSTINE.

Nugent, James, philanthropist, temperance advocate and social reformer, b. 3 March, 1822, at Liverpool; d. 27 June, 1895, at Formby, near Liverpool. Educated at Ushaw, 1838-43, and the English College, Rome, 1843-6, he was ordained at St. Nicholas's, Liverpool, on 30 August, 1846. After being stationed at Blackburn and Wigan, he was sent to Liverpool 1 January, 1849. In 1851 he introduced the teaching Sis-tion and in 1801 established in Bevington Bush a Refuge for Fallen Women and a Night Shelter for homeless women which (1891–1905) received 2300 poor women. In 1892 Leo XIII appointed him a domestic prelate. In memory of his golden jubilee as a priest he purchased for Temperance meetings and concerts, the Jubilee Hall in Burlington St. The citizens of Liverpool presented to him at an enormous public meeting his own portrait in a marble statue by Liverpool Art Gallery and over £300 with which he began the House of Providence, West Dingle, for young unmarried mothers with their first babies; 200 such cases were sheltered from 1897–1905. In 1904 at the age of 88 , he visited America with Albot Comber but when ill at St. Paul, Minnesota, he marrried home to die. On 8 December, 1906, there was erected near St. George’s Hall, a bronze statue commemorating him as Apostle of Temperance, Protector of the Orphan Child, Consoler of the Prisoner, Reformer of the Criminal, Saviour of Fallen Womanhood, Friend of all in Poverty and Affliction, An Eye to the Blind, a Foot to the Lame, the Father of the Poor.

Numbers, the name of the fourth book of the Pentateuch (q. v.).

Numbers, Use of, in the Church.—No attentive reader of the Old Testament can fail to notice that a given number appears to be particularly significant and is not merely the frequent recurrence of these numbers, but their religious or ceremonial significance which is so significant.
Take, for example, the number of the beast 666 (Apoc., xiii, 18) by the word AATEIXO2 since the numerical value of its constituent letters yields the same total (50+1+50+5+10+10+50+70+200=406); while sober critics of our own day are inclined to solve the mystery upon the same principles by simply substituting for Latin words the letters Nero Cesar written in Hebrew characters which give the same result. Of the ultimate origin of the mystical significance attached to numbers something will be said later, it being sufficient to add that although the Fathers repeatedly condemned the magical use of numbers which had descended from Babylonian sources to the Pythagoreans and Gnostics of their times, and although they denounced any system of philosophy which rested upon an exclusively nummeral basis, still they almost unanimously regarded the number of Holy Writ as full of mystical meaning, and they considered the interpretation of these mystical meanings as an important branch of exegesis. To illustrate the caution with which they proceeded it will be sufficient to refer to one or two notable examples. St. Irenaeus (Hær., I, viii, 5 and 12, and II, 14, 1) interpreted the number 7 as the number of the Holy Name of God, and states that by writing the name in Hebrew characters an entirely different interpretation is necessitated. Again St. Ambrose commenting upon the days of creation and the Sabbath remarks: "The number of seven is good, but we do not explain it after the doctrine of Pythagoras and the other philosophers, but rather according to the manifestation and division of the grace of the Spirit; for the prophet Isaias has enumerated the principal gifts of the Holy Spirit as seven" (Letter to Horontianus). Simlarly St. Augustine, replying to Tichonius the Donatist, observes that "if Tichonius had said that these mystical numbers open out some of the hidden recesses of the law, instead of saying that they reveal all the mysteries of the law, he would have spoken truth" (De Doctrina Christiana, III, xlii). Many passages from St. Chrysostom and other Fathers might be cited as displaying the same caution and showing the recur-cence of the great numbers 3, 7, 10, and 70. These numbers are used in the early centuries to push this recognition of the mystical significance of numbers to extremes.

On the other hand there can be no doubt that influence mainly by Biblical predecessors, but also in part by the prevalence of this philosophy of numbers among the pagans, and even less by the rise of the Christian teaching of the early centuries, in itself has brought a more frequent use of such numbers. Thus, even today some of the numbers may be observed in the Sunday readings in the liturgy, especially where the events of the Old Testament are read, and even more so in the prophecies of the New Testament. These numbers are used in the liturgy as a means of consolidating the collection of prayers and sacrifices, and in the liturgy of the Mass as a way of expressing the mystery of the Eucharist. The number 7, for example, is often used to express the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, and the number 3 to express the Holy Trinity. The number 10 is used to express the 10 commandments, and the number 12 to express the 12 apostles. The number 70 is used to express the 70 weeks of years, or the 70 years of the Jubilee, and the number 100 to express the 100 years of the Jubilee.

Insufficient time has been given to the study of the significance of these numbers in the liturgy, and more research is needed to understand the ways in which these numbers have been used in the liturgy of the Church.
are justified, we say, in assigning some mystical meaning to all those things, which may not perhaps have been very closely conceived by those who instituted them. But which nevertheless had a great influence in determining their choice why the ceremony should be performed in this particular way and not otherwise. (For explanation of the mystical significance commonly attached to the use of numbers see Symbolism.)

Numismatics (from the Greek νομισματικος, "legal currency") is the science of coins and of medals. Every coin or medal being a product of the cultural, economic, and political conditions under which it originated, this science is divided according to the various civilized communities of mankind. It is not only a part of history, but also, in its respective parts, a branch of all those sciences which are concerned with the history of nations and of their culture—classical archeology, history in its narrower sense, Orientalism, etc. Practically, only ancient, modern, and possibly Oriental numismatics are of importance. Furthermore, a distinction should be made between numismatography, which is chiefly descriptive, and numismatology, which views the coin from its artistic, economic, and cultural side.

The dependence of theoretical numismatics on the practical numismatics is clearly apparent in the history of the science. The earliest publications of any importance were written to meet the needs of collectors (e.g., the various catalogues of Taler, Groschen, and ducats, and the Münzbuchungen, or "coin-pass-times"), whereas the foundations for a scientific treatment of ancient numismatics were not supplied until 1730, by Eckhel, and for modern not until the nineteenth century by Mader, Grote, and Lelewel. (It is worth remembering that St. Thomas Aquinas, in "De regimine principis", II, xiii, xiv, treated the subject of money and coinage, and this work was for many years the authority among canonists.) The oldest collection of coins of which we have certain knowledge dates back to the fifteenth century, and was made by Petrarch; his example found numerous imitators. Hubert Goltz, in 1556-60, visited the various collections of Europe, of which there are said to have been 900. In comparison with private collections, which comprised the collections of rulers, states, or museums, possess paramount importance, and furnish the most reliable basis for numismatic investigations. As early as 1756 Francis I of Austria in two works of great beauty, "Monnayes en or" and "Monnayes en argent", made known the treasures of his collection; and in recent years the great catalogues, especially those of the British Museum, have become the most important sources of information in this science. The needs of both collectors and theoretical students have called into being a large number of numismatic societies, as well as about 100 technical periodicals, in large part published by the societies, the German Society of Numismatics, held from year to year in different cities, there have developed international congresses: Brussels, 1892; Paris, 1900 (Records and Transactions, published by Comte de Castellane and A. Blanchet; Rome, 1905, (Atti del congresso internazionale de science storiche, 6 vols.); Brussels, 1910.

I. Coins.—Coins may be defined as pieces of metal that serve as legal tender. The term includes ordinary currency, commemorative or presentation pieces stamped by public authority in accordance with the established standard, etc., but not paper money or private coinage. To the last class we refer the English tokens which were largely circulated as a result of the insufficient supply of fractional coin about the year 1800; furthermore, the pieces called mercenaries issued, especially by church corporations, as vouchers for money, and afterwards for value in general, like jetons, or counters, and Rechungsmünzen. When each individual is in need of something, he obtains the coin he wants, which he then can exchange for whatever he needs. In addition, the need arises for sharing labour and distributing its products. This is at first effected by barter of commodities, which requires a universally available medium of exchange usually found in cattle (in Homer the equipment of Menelaus is valued at 9 steers, and that of Odysseus, at 10). Besides by the protective men have used horses, plows, etc., for this purpose. Soon, however, it becomes necessary to find a measure of value that can be employed universally, and for this gold, silver, and copper have been used from very early times; in comparatively recent years after experimentation with many other metals, nickel has been added to these. The first stage of metallic money is reached with the weighing out of pieces of metal of any shape; but, as only the gross weight can be determined by this procedure, and not the degree of fineness (a very essential factor in the case of the precious metals), the necessity arises of certifying fineness by the stamp of public authority, and this stamp makes the lump of metal a coin. The employment of only one of the metals mentioned soon proves insufficient: it is impossible to put into circulation gold coins of sufficiently small denomination or, using the base metal, to issue coins of sufficiently high value. It is therefore necessary to resort to alloying, and to mix the precious metals at the same time. This may be done either by employing the one precious metal as a measure of value and the other, together with copper, only as a commodity or subsidiary coin, or else by using both metals concurrently as measures of value at a ratio fixed by law (bimetalism), a course however, which has frequently caused difficulties on account of the fluctuations in the rate of exchange of the two precious metals.

In form, coins are usually circular, sometimes oval, and quadrangular; these last are particularly common in emergency coinage, and in Sweden had grown to an immense size and great weight. There are also found, especially in the Far East, coins of the most eccentric shapes. In addition to the device and inscription coins frequently bear what are called mint marks or mint-masters' marks which deserve special mention. Mint-masters and die-sinkers have in many cases been responsible for their work by placing their initials or certain marks or letters; and the mints distinguish their respective coins either by letters, indicating the place of issue by conventional and arbitrary marks, or by some other means—sometimes scarcely perceptible to the uninitiated—such as the placing of a dot beneath a particular letter of the inscription. In this way the various issues of coins, otherwise alike, are kept distinct.

The science of numismatics is materially advanced by finds of coins in large quantities; in addition to a knowledge of previously unknown types, such discoveries afford an instructive insight into the actual circulation of the coins, even permits one to follow the exact period during which certain coins were current beyond the confines of their own states, and helps us to assign undated varieties, especially those of the Middle Ages, to some particular mint-master or precise period. In the study of the science, as well as in the classification of coins, it is the practice to follow, chronologically, three great eras: the ancient, medieval, and modern; geographically, the different political divisions of the respective times. For the Greek coins, Eckhel has adopted an exemplary system which is still in use. Beginning at the Pillars of Hercules, he takes up the countries of the world, as known to the ancients, in the order of their positions around the Mediterranean: first those of Europe, then Asia as far as India, and lastly Africa from Egypt back to the Straits of Gibraltar.

A. Greek Coins.—The term Greek is always understood in ancient numismatics to include all coins except those of Roman origin and the Italian as gravis. The two standards of weight for the precious metals—pes ducatum, the talent or the mina being represented by any coin), or 6000 drachmae, each being equal to 6 obols. The various currencies are in most cases based upon the Persian system of weights. The Persians had two different standards of weight for the precious metals: for gold, the ardshir (25-33 mm. in diameter) or the sidarshir (about 129 mm.); the silver sheki (3.57 grammes), and shékesh (nearly 87 grammes). As the value of silver to that of gold was, in antiquity, as 1 to 10, the gold drachm is the equivalent of 5 silver drachms. Other standards of currency were the pentanion, the Hyperion, the Xeropolion, the Attic, the Corinthian, the Ptelemaeion, and the most important standard of Asia Minor; some of these, however, may be derived from the Persian standard. By the substitution of the lighter Attic standard for the old Egyptian Solon brought about the partial abolition of debt. The most abundantly coined pieces were the tetrachron (25.33 mm. in diameter) and the didrachma; pieces of eight, ten, and twelve drachmae are exceptional, and a forty-drachma piece is a rarity. In the downward scale the division extends to the quarter-obolos (¼ drachma). In Greek Asia Minor coins made of the above-standard silver were struck. In Greece the silver coinage greatly predominated; copper coins do not antedate 400 n. c., while gold was but rarely minted. The coinage of the Persians, on the other hand, was very rich in gold, and it was their example that influenced Philip II of Macedon and Alexander the Great. With a few exceptions the highest degree of fineness was aimed at the gold drachm being 97½ per cent.

In the early times the coinage was done with a single die; the reverse of the blank metal was held fast by a peg, generally square, in the anvil, and so received its impress in the form of a quadrangular depression (impression); in time this square came to be adorned with lines, figures, and inscriptions. In Southern Italy two dies that fitted into each other were employed, so that the coins present the same design in relief on the obverse and depressed on the reverse (munus incassum). The inscriptions are in different languages, e. g., Greek-Latin—and inscriptions in which the language and type do not correspond—e. g., Greek in Cypriote characters, also occur; and even the Greek characters undergo numerous changes in form in the course of time. The right of coinage being a privilege of the sovereign power under whose authority the coin was struck; in Greece, until the time of Alexander the Great, this was the community. The names of the officials who had charge of the coinage are also found; and late coins also show the year, frequently reckoned from the Seleucid era 312. Other coins are stamped with the name of the East coast, perhaps in Lydia, as Herodotus tells us, or at Egina, to whose king, Phidion, the Parian chronicle ascribes them, possibly earlier than 600 n. c. Various islands of the same sea furnish coins bearing designs not very dissimilar to these. The coins of Southern Italy are of not much later date, the fact that these are extant from the city of Sybaris, which was destroyed in 510 n. c. The early coins of Greece proper and Asia Minor are thick pieces of metal, resembling flattened bullets, and, naturally, bear the simplest devices, plants and animals, which soon become typical features of certain of these heads of figures of deities and men, sometimes imitated in groups. About 100 n. c. the Greek art of die-cutting reached its fullest development, attaining a degree of excellence unequaled by any later race; Syracuse holds the first place; after it in order come Arcadia, Thessaly, Olynthus, etc.

The symbol of the non-exchangeable coin, whose coins are included in the Greek series, the most important for us are the Jews. At first they made use of foreign coins, but, as one of the results of the national rising under the Machabees against the Syrians, the high priest, Simon, received from Antiochus VII (139-38 B. c.) the right of coinage. Simon or his successors coined copper exclusively with inscriptions in old Hebrew or in Greek and Hebrew. After these came the coinage of the Hasmonean prince Herod and his successors. In the time of Christ Roman coins were also in circulation. This is proved by the story of the tribune money. "And they offered him ([Christ]) a penny. And Jesus saith to them: Whose image and inscription is this? They say to him: Caesar's" (Matt., xxii, 19-21). It was only during the two revolts of the Jews against the Romans in a. u. 66-70 and 132-35, that silver was again coined under Eleazar and Simon and their respective successors. On the reverse of the daric (25-33 mm. in diameter) of the first century after Christ there occurs the name Conophares, or some similar name, supposed to be identical with that of one of the three Magi, Caspar.

B. Roman Coins.—In Italy the earliest medium of exchange was copper, which had to be weighed at each transaction (pesse de crudelo). At Rome it was used in pieces of irregular form, later in clumsy bars. The credit of having first provided a legal tender is ascribed to Servius Tullius, who is said to have had the bars stamped with definite figures, mostly cattle (prima signata as; as signatum). The introduction of true coins with marks indicating their value and the emblems of the city belongs to a much later date. The monetary unit was the as of 12 ounces (10.527 oz. Troy), equal to a Roman pound (libra—hence, liberal standard); usually, however, the weight of an as was as small as 10 ounces (about 3.77 oz. Troy). The divisions of the as (the quadrans = ¼, quadrans, 8.385 grammes; the sextans = 1/6, 6.26 grammes; and the sextans = 1/8, 5.21 grammes), in order that they might be more readily distinguished, were marked on one side with as many balls as they contained ounces. On the one side was the representation of the prow of a ship, the characteristic device of the city of Rome, on the other, the head of a divinity, which was the image of the coin. The coins were round, in high, but somewhat clumsy, relief, and cast; some were minted in Campania.

From 265 n. c. the weight of the as steadily decreased; the liberal standard became first a triens, then an uncia, and finally even a semuncia standard of 1/12 of the original weight. While this reduction of the standard facilitated the manufacture of coins of larger values (dupondius, triponius, decies, equal to 2, 3, and 10 asses respectively), it resulted in giving copper coins a current value far above their intrinsic worth and furthered the introduction of stamped instead of cast, coins. According to Livy the first silver coins were minted in 266 n. c., this first silver piece was the denarius, equal to 10 asses. It was followed by the minor denominations, the quadrans (½ denarius) and sextans (¼ denarius). Besides these the principatus (¼ denarius) was coined for the use of some of the provinces. The denarius, weighing at first ⅞ of a pound was reduced in 217 n. c. to ⅛, the silver used being almost pure. The obverse shows the Dei Roma; the reverse, the two Dioskouroi; of these stamps the former more partially remained in use for many years. The mint was managed by a commission (\textit{consistoia}), the members of which soon placed upon the coins their names or initials, and later glorified the members of their families and their deeds (family or consular coins). Even at that time, but much more frequently in the imperial period, there were denarii of base metal which were often thinly coined, or \	extit{denarii subretibus}. It rarely happened that gold was coined.

Cesar marks the transition to the imperial coinage: in 44 B.C. the Senate ordered the issue of coins bearing his portrait. Even Brutus followed this example, and with Augustus begins the uninterrupted series of portrait coins. Cesar laid it down that the right of coinage was his own personal prerogative; Augustus claimed this right for himself alone and left to the Senate only the coinage of copper; and these copper coins are characterized by the letters \	extit{S.C.} (\textit{senatus consulto}). Aurelian (270–76) took even this privilege from the Senate. Beginning with the empire we find a copious coinage of gold. The principal coin is the \	extit{aureus}, weighing about 1231 grains; its obverse bears the name, title and portrait of the emperor; its reverse, historical representations in rich variety, buildings, favourite divinities of the emperor, and personifications of the virtues that adorned, or should have adorned, him; the members of the imperial family are represented, where the respective issues of Trajan and Hadrian are especially rich.

With Nero begins the debasement of the coinage, particularly of the silver; and this continued until Constantine again established some degree of order. He introduced a new gold coin, the \	extit{solidus}, equal to 3 of a pound (about 20 grains), which for centuries remained an important factor in the development of the monetary system.

Special mention should be made of the metals, peculiarly large and carefully executed works of the mint, issued in commemoration of some event. They were made of gold, silver, or copper, and in the precious metals, generally coined in conformity with the legal standard. There are also specimens made of copper surrounded by a circle of yellowish metal (\textit{médiéaldes deux couries}). The term \textit{contorniate} is applied to a large circular copper coin with a raised rim, used principally in connection with the circumanse game.

For coins of the Roman emperors of the East, which are designated as Byzantine, belong, chronologically at least, to the Middle Ages, but, judged by the standard observed in their coinage and, in the beginning, also by the character of the coins themselves, the entire series is closely connected with the issues of the West. Copper was employed abundantly, silver rarely, but the greatest importance attached to the gold coinage. For many years gold was coined only at Byzantium, and these gold pieces served as a model, not only for the gold coinage of the West, which was not resumed until the thirteenth century, but also for that of Islam. Artistic merit is entirely lacking in the Byzantine coins; their type is rigid and monotonous. In place of the former wealth and variety of devices on the reverse, we find religious symbols, the monogram of Christ, and saints. The coinage of John VIII, the last of the emperors but one, about the middle of the fifteenth century, was the last of the Byzantine series.

C. Medieval Coins.—The new states that arose within the territorial limits of the old Roman Empire at first made use of the Roman coins, of which a sufficiently large number were in existence. The rare autonomous issues of the period of the racial migration are for the most part connected with the Roman series; only the Merovingians, in France, made themselves to some extent independent. Very soon, however, a general decline began in all matters connected with coinage; the coins steadily became coarser, gold currency disappeared, copper was coined only exceptionally; small silver coins were the only medium of payment. Charlemagne restored some kind of order; claiming the right of coinage as a royal prerogative, to be exercised by the king alone, he suppressed all private coinage, which at that time had assumed disastrous proportions. He furthermore enjoined greater care in minting and made regulations on this point which became the standard for the greater part of Europe, and, in the essential features, are operative in England to the present day. The basis was the talent, or pound, of silver (about 111 oz. Troy); it was divided into 20 shillings (pound and shillings being both merely money of account) each equal to 12 pence (\textit{denarius}). The penny therefore weighed 233 grains. The most common designs on the Carolingian coins are the representation of the cross and a church adorned with columns, surrounded by the legend \textit{christiana religio}.

The peculiar economic conditions of the Middle Ages gave rise to the issue of silver coins of constantly diminishing weight and fineness, so that they steadily became more and more worthless and, as a result of the general rise in values, could no longer be used as currency. In this way a process began which was repeated several times during the Middle Ages: as a result of the depreciation of the smaller coins, new coins, larger and more valuable, were struck in some countries, while the older coins made their way triumphantly through the whole of Europe. In course of time these in turn became depreciated and were replaced by a new issue. In the thirteenth century the shilling (equal to 12 pence) was first coined at Tours; in contradiction to the denier, which at that time had become very thin, it was called \textit{nummus grosus} (thick coin), and, from the name of the place where it was first coined, \textit{grosus turonensis}, or \textit{gros tournois}. One side has a cross with the name of the king and a legend, most commonly \textit{Benedictum sib nomine dominii}, the other side a church. The \textit{toumois} spread rapidly through France and along the Rhine, and led to the minting of a similar coin at Prague (the \textit{grosus pragensis}, or \textit{Prager Groschen}), which in its turn was imitated in many countries. After the Merovingian period the only gold coins minted were the \textit{Augstales} of the emperor Frederick II. These were copies of the earlier Roman coin and were struck in Sicily. A regular gold coinage does not begin until about 1250, in the Republic of Florence. These coins bear, on the one side, St. John the Baptist, and, on the other, a lily, the emblem of Florence. From this device (\textit{flos lilia}), or from the name of the city, they received the name \textit{lira}. Their weight was a little more than 540 grains. A few decades later the Doge of Venice, Giovanni Dandolo, began the minting of a gold coin which bears the representation of the doge kneeling before St. Mark and the effigy of Christ with the legend: \textit{Sic huius datae quin a regis isle ducatus.} The last word of this legend gave the coin its name, \textit{ducat} (ducat); in Venice it was also called \textit{zeccino} (sequin) from \textit{la zecca}, "the mint." The type of the florin and the name of the ducat soon became current throughout the world.

The transition to modern times is marked by the introduction of still larger silver coins. Of these, besides the Italian testone and the French franc, the German Taler was the most important. In 1485 the Archduke Sigismund of the Tyrol caused the issue of a new silver coin weighing 2 Loth, and of a fineness of 15 Loth; its value at the rate of exchange of that time corresponded to that of the gold guilder and it was therefore called GULDENGROSCHEN. The example of the Tyrol was soon followed by many nobles who had the right of coining; the Joachimstaler (shortened to Taler), made in the mint of the counts of Suleck, at Joachimstal, originated the name of Taler (Dollar), which has been retained to the present day. Among the most interesting of the coins of this kind are the Rubentaler, coined by Leonard of Keutschach, Archbishop of Salzburg, and named from his armorial bearings, a turnip (Rube); these are counted among the rarest and most frequently counterfeited coins of the Middle Ages.

The monetary systems of the German Empire during the Middle Ages are of the greatest interest with respect not only to the number of its types of coin, but also to the peculiarity of its evolution. Charlemagne, it is true, had established uniformity of coinage and had caused the right of coining to be acknowledged as exclusively belonging to the sovereign; but his weaker successors were gradually compelled to yield this, as well as most of the other royal prerogatives, to the feudal lords, whose power continued to increase as that of the paramount government weakened. Among these feudalatories were, not only all archbishops and bishops, but also the leading abbots and abbesses within the empire. The evolution was gradual. At first permission was granted to hold a fair (mercatura), levy a tax (taxodium), and erect a mint (moneta) at some place belonging to one of the feudalatories. At first the mint may have been only an exchange, the profits of which, however, in the Middle Ages were often very considerable, and avowed to the lord. Then he was permitted to have coins struck bearing his portrait, but had to maintain the uniform standard. At length these feudalatory lords obtained the privilege of coining without any restrictions. When this was done uniformity in the currency of the empire was at an end, a great diversity in the coinage was rendered possible, and the right of coining, instead of being a prerogative of the emperor, became a privilege of every feudatory. These sought to exploit this privilege as a productive source of income by constantly debasing and changing the coinage, thereby causing serious losses to those of their subjects who were engaged in trade. The cities, therefore, which had not yet obtained the right of coining, endeavoured to gain some control over the system, either by obtaining for themselves the right of coining or by farming mints, or by inducing the owners of mints to exercise their privileges in a more reasonable manner.

Of the German medieval coins, the "bracteates" (Lat. bractea = "a thin sheet of metal") deserve special mention. They were not personal ornaments, like the Scandinavian bracteates of earlier times, but genuine coins. As the denier had become thinner and thinner in the course of the eleventh century, it was replaced, early in the twelfth century, in some parts of Germany, by very thin but rather large silver coins, made with one die, showing the same design, in relief on one side and depressed on the other. These coins, especially in the beginning, were carefully executed and not without artistic merit. The city of Halberstadt (Saxony) issued a small fractional coin which had a wide circulation, and was called Heller from the place of its origin. In some respects the evolution of French coinage resembles that of Germany. Here too we find, in the tenth century, coinages of lay and ecclesiastical barons (the archbishops of Vienne, Arles, Reims, etc. in particular), characterized by a fixed type (type immobilius) which is maintained unaltered for a long period. But by the close of the Middle Ages this coinage is confined to a very few powerful feudatories and in comparison with the royal coinage, is no longer of importance. From France we have the chaise d'or, a gold coin that was also largely minted in other countries; it represents the king seated upon a Gothic throne. In England sterlings and nobles were struck, both of them often counterfeited. Coins of the archbishops of Canterbury and York are extant. In Italy, because of its numerous political divisions, we find a diversity of coinages similar to that of Germany. The scarcity of coins of ecclesiastical mints is noticeable: with the exception of some isolated examples and the series of Aquileja, Trent, and Trieste, we have only the papal coinages, which, following closely the Byzantine model, begin with Adrian I, but do not become important until Clement V (the first of whose coins, however, were struck at Avignon). While eastern Europe was for the most part under the influence of Byzantine, the Crusaders nevertheless brought Western types into the states founded by them in the Mediterranean coinage appears only about the year 200; these coins, because the Koran forbids pictures and inscriptions, bear only texts from the Koran and, generally, precise statements concerning the ruler, the mint-master, and the date of coinage.

D. Modern Coins.—With the beginning of modern times, partly as the result of the discovery of America and the exploitation of its silver deposits, large silver pieces appear everywhere in mint numbers. As a natural consequence of this, we find greater care bestowed upon the execution of the work, more legible characters in the inscriptions, and increased attention to the pictorial representations (portraits and coats-of-arms). Several of the Renaissance issues, particularly the papal coins, are reckoned among the finest works of that time. In the course of the last few centuries, countries which had not come under the influence of the civilization of the Middle Ages entered into numismatic relations with the others, e.g., Russia and the Far East, China having coins of the most extraordinary shapes, some perforated, some in the form of tuning-forks, sabres, etc.; Siam, lumps of twisted silver wire.

While during the earlier centuries the monetary systems of the older civilized countries of Europe generally developed along the lines established in the course of the Middle Ages, the great political and economic revolutions of the nineteenth century brought into being new forces which had their effect on the monetary systems. While the changed relations of the German-speaking peoples resulted in a variety of their currencies (the mark in Germany, kronr in Austria, gulden in Holland, franc in Switzerland), the uniformity of Italy, on the other hand, asserted itself, resulting in a uniform Italian monetary system (lira). But economic conditions have produced even more lasting results than political. On the 23d of December, 1865, France, Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland formed the Latin Union, which was joined in 1868 by Greece, agreeing upon a uniform regulation of the coinage of these states on the basis of the French monetary system. This system has now been adopted by a large number of states, which have not themselves joined the Latin monetary Union—Romania, Bulgaria, Servia, Finland, Spain, and, at least nominally, many of the Central and South American republics, which were formerly Spanish colonies, and furthermore a number of smaller European states. Austria-Hungary and Russia are also approximating to this system. Another monetary union was formed in 1873 and includes Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, the monetary union being the Scandinavian krone. The Portuguese monetary system is still in force in Brazil, its former colony. Even without any formal convention, a coin may gain currency in foreign lands. Thus the Mexican dollar, which in name and value is an offshoot of the German monetary system, is current coin on the farther shore of the Pacific Ocean, in the maritime provinces of China, in Japan, Siam, and part of the Malay Archipelago; it influences Central America and even many of the African maritime provinces. The Indian rupee, too, has gained currency on the shore of the ocean opposite the land of its origin, on the coasts of East Africa, Southern Arabia, and the Malay peninsula. A good example of the crossing of economic and political interests is furnished by Canada, where the English sovereign is legal tender, although Canadian currency follows the standard of the United States. While the coins now in circulation in Austria and Hungary are valid as currency in Liechtenstein and Montenegro and vice versa; an Austrian coin long since put out of circulation in Austria itself, known as the Maria-Theresien taler, and bearing the date 1780, is even now the most important commercial currency in the island of Ternate, in the East Indies.

The high degree of perfection which had been attained during the last decades in the technique of coinage gave rise, on the one hand, to a number of experiments with coinage (coins made of aluminum, Russian coins of platinum, Belgian pierced coins, English coins of two metals), and on the other hand, to no decisive success. On the other hand, it became possible to pay greater attention to the artistic side of coinage, as is evidenced by the latest issues of the French and Italian mints.

II. Medals.—The term medal (medalla in Florence = denier) is applied to pieces of metal, usually circular, which, though issued by a mint, are not intended as a medium of payment. Their material, form, mode of manufacture, and history prove that they were originally coins, though altered conditions and needs, both artistic and cultural, have made them independent. Their purpose is to commemorate important events in the history of a nation, so much so that attempts have been made to write histories based upon and illustrated by the series of medals of some individual or of a whole country. Occasions for the issue of medals are found in an accession to the throne, a declaration of war, the conclusion of a peace, or any completion of a public building; it has also been very extensively used by sovereigns for presentation to persons whom they wished to honour, and in such cases was often a veritable gem of the goldsmith's art. On the other hand, a medal has often been presented by subjects to their sovereign on such occasions as his marriage, in token of homage. But as an expression of the culture of a people the private medal possesses much greater interest, and in this field the German medal of the Renaissance and the following centuries furnishes the most numerous examples. Portrait medals played the part now taken by photography. Medals stamped with coats-of-arms also serve to represent private individuals, and are sometimes put to practical use as tokens, but also for livery, etc. They are used to commemorate betrothals, or marriages, silver or golden weddings, births and baptisms, and there are a large number of sponsors' christening gifts in the shape of coins or medals (Patypenmünze) made expressly for the purpose and inscribed with the name of the godfather, the place and date of baptism, and generally a pious maxim. These Patypenmünze were often put into rich settings to be worn as ornaments, and were handed down as heirlooms from generation to generation. Not only the entrance into life but also death is recorded in medals; and many such pieces contain detailed biographical notices.

Very often the medal serves a religious purpose; in Kremnitz and especially in Joachimsthal extensive series of such religious coinages were struck. Typological representations found great favour, the one side showing the Old-Testament type, the other the New-Testament antitype. The Reformation produced many medals embossed with Biblical phrases. A favourite subject on religious medals was the head of Christ; the city of Vienna has for centuries used medals bearing this design as public marks of distinction. At Easter medals were struck with Easter Simnel cakes, with the infant Jesus, were given as presents. Of the saints, St. George was most frequently represented, on the Georgspatzer and Georgsmedaille, and a superstition prevailed that the wearing of a medal with the image of St. George was a protection against wounds. A similar superstition was connected with the representation of St. Roch and St. Sebastian, or of St. Rosalia, as also of the cross with the brazen serpent, as a protection against the plague. There is also an interminable series of wholly superstitious anules, astrological and alchemistic coinages which profess to be the product of an alchemic transmutation from a base into a precious metal. The imperial coin-cabinet at Vienna contains one of these pieces, probably the largest medal in existence, weighing about 15 lbs., awkwardly, and adorned with the portraits of forty ancestors of the Emperor Leopold I, in whose presence the transmutation is supposed to have taken place. Thus the numerous and manifold purposes for which the medal has been employed faithfully reflect the cultural conditions which led to its coinage and are a source of information that has not yet been fully appreciated.

True medals were unknown to antiquity; their functions were in many respects—particularly as memoriae bracteate—perpetuates the memory of a pilgrimage of Duke Boleslav III to the tomb of St. Adalbert in Gnesen. A denier of Lublana I of Bohemia shows the repulsive head of Satan with a despicable legend on one side, and on the other a church. Laschins was able to account for this device as follows: after a succession of serious elemental disturbances in Bohemia there came, in the midst of a terrible hurricane, a meteoric shower, during which many persons declared they beheld Satan in human form near the castle; this denier was then struck, bearing on either side the head of Satan and the Church of God. Such coins as these in some measure serve the purpose of commemorative medals.

The first true medal appeared in Italy towards the close of the fourteenth century. Francesco II Carrara, Lord of Padua, had two medals struck, in imitation of the ancient Roman medallions: one, in memory of his father, Francesco I, recalls the later medal-

The reverse shows Cupid holding a music scroll and a horn scoring materials of important events—performed by coins. In contrast with the monotonous and generally inartistic coins of the present day, the coins of antiquity, and more particularly those of Greece, were masterpieces of the art of the die-engraver, who was not compelled to seek other opportunities to display his skill. Among the Romans conditions were analogous, with the exception that the medallions of the emperors approximate somewhat to the character of our medals, although they are, as a rule, duplicates of the legal monetary unit; the tokens (tesserae), struck for the games, and the confraternities are even more closely related to the medal. The few gold issues of the Emperors Louis the Pious (814-40) also resemble medals, and in the further course of the Middle Ages we meet with a large number of coins which were evidently intended to commemorate some event in history, although their devices are very difficult to explain; there is many a puzzle here still awaiting solution. As the symbol of Henry the Lion, the powerful Duke of Bavaria and Saxony, the lion plays an important role on his coins. But his adversary, Otho of Wittelsbach, who, when Henry the Lion had been outlawed, received the Duchy of Bavaria, employed this symbol also and issued deniers which picture him in pursuit of a lion or with the severed head of a lion in his hand. Coins are also very frequently used to commemorate enforcements, and these bear a representation of the liege lord from whom the kneeling vassal receives the gonfalon. A Polish
The original manuscript text is quite dense and contains a mix of technical terms and historical notes related to coinage and medallic art. It discusses the influence of Italian art on medieval and Renaissance coinage, the role of notable artists and craftsmen, and the development of medallic art in various European countries. The text touches on the significance of certain artists such as Jacopo della Quercia, Caspar Passe, and Albrecht Dürer, among others. It also mentions the impact of these developments on the arts and the economy of the time.

The passage suggests that the transition from purely ornamental art to more representative and functional designs was gradual and influenced by political, social, and economic factors. The text highlights how the art of medallic representation evolved from being a mere decorative element to a tool for propaganda and identity. It also notes the importance of craftsmanship and the role of the engraver in the production process.

The text concludes by noting the continued relevance of this art form in modern times, with examples of contemporary artists and their works. It contrasts the development of this art form in Italy and Germany, emphasizing the influence of Italian art on later periods.

Overall, the text provides a comprehensive overview of the evolution of medallic art from its early forms to its continued relevance in modern times, highlighting the contributions of key figures and the enduring impact of Italian artistic influence.
Comité Consultatif des Graveurs of the Paris mint delivered an address pointing out the defects which prevented the artistic development of the medal, and, as president of the mint, appealing for their amendment. He particularly mentioned the bad taste of the lettering, the polish, the high rim etc. If this address dealt rather with the outer form, a new view of the inner portrait had already been gradually created. Following the productions of Oudines, Paul Dubois, Chabas, above all Herbert Ponscarens (the first to oppose the polishing of medals) and later Degeorges, Chaplains, and Daniel Dupris, Oscar Roty, by far the most distinguished of the French medalists, won distinction. He excels not only in his polished but more particularly in the rotation of the reverse; his fine allegories (e.g. on the medal for merit in connexion with the education of girls—the Republic teaching maidens, the future mothers of men) recall the artists of the Quattrocento, which he carefully studied, but did not, as a rule, directly imitate. But as the execution of the medal is preceded by long and careful deliberation as to how the fundamental idea is to be worked out (Ponscarens seems to have led the way in this) so the execution itself receives to the very last moment the most careful attention. Only the artist's hand must touch his work. The French medal has thus attained great results, even when judged merely on its technical merits.

Independently of the French movement, a medallic revival has begun in Austria. Anton Scharff brought about a restoration of the medallic style and an emancipation from the rigid conventional forms; working side by side with him are Josef Hintchenay, the elder, Stefan Schwartz, a master of the technique of the chiselled medal, and Franz Xavier Pilwik. Recently Rudolf Marschall has won a high reputation as a portraitist, and received the commission to execute medals for both Leo XIII and Pius X. The French and Viennese medals have called forth interest in other countries an activity which has already resulted in many beautiful specimens of medallic art.

Gold Medal of Leo XIII by Rudolf Marschall

Nunc Dimittis (The Canticle of Simeon), found in St. Luke's Gospel (i. 29-32), is the last in historical sequence of the three great Canticles of the New Testament, the other two being the Magnificat (Canticle of Mary) and the Benedictus (Canticle of Zachary). All three are styled, by way of eminence, the "Evangelical Canticles" (see Canticle). The title is formed from the opening words in the Latin Vulgate, Nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine" etc. ("Now the time has come for thy servant to depart in peace, according to the words of thy mercy in the sight of all peoples.") Under the circumstances in which Simeon uttered his song, this was the last, thanksgiving, and prophecy are narrated by St. Luke (ii. 21-35) (see Candlemas). The words following those quoted above, "according to thy word in peace," are explained by v. 28. And he had received an assurance of the God's Christ, the Lord of death, before he had seen the Christ of the Lord." Brief though the Canticle is, it abounds in Old-Testament allusions. Thus, in the following verses, "Because my eyes have seen thy salvation" alludes to Isaiah, lii. 10, rendered afterwards by St. Luke (ii. 6), "And all flesh shall see the salvation of God."
Rochester, "NUNCIO"

The text of the Nunez Dittius is given in full in the brief evening prayer found in the Apostolic Constitutions (Book VI, xviii, 1507). In the Roman Office, the antient is assigned to Complin. If the Antiphon did not originate this canticle, it should be given to it its liturgical character; but he nevertheless did not include the Canticle, which was afterwards incorporated into the richer Complin Service of the Roman Rite, where it is preceded by the beautiful responsory, "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum," etc., with the Antiphon following, "Salva nos, Domine, vigilantes, custodi nos dormientes" (O Lord, keep us waking, guard us sleeping), etc., all this harmonizing exquisitely with the spirit of the Nunez Dittius and with the general character of the closing Hour of the Office. In the blessing of the candles on the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin, the Canticle, of course, receives great prominence both in its text and in the references to Simeon in the preceding prayers. Its last verse, "Lumen ad revelationem" etc., forms the Antiphon which not only precedes and follows the Canticle, but also serves as a very useful refrain. Patri and Patri erat of the concluding Doxology. The symbolism of the Canticle and of its Antiphon is further emphasized by the lighted candles of Candlesmas. The complete Canticle also forms the Tract in the Mass of the feast, when the 2 February follows Saturdays after Ashes.

The Office of Complin, in its present form, "Nunc dimittis," is said as a Tract preceding to the Rite, consisting of the Roman Relation (Rome, 1907); Sarum in Grove, "Dict" of Monastic and Marmonic; grove, v. Nunez Dittius, an explanation of its use in Anglican Economy; Horschert, "The Service for the Use of the Lady." London, 1903, 462-49, for the prayers and canticles on the feast of the Purification.

H. T. HENRY.

Nuncio, an ordinary and permanent representative of the pope, vested with both political and ecclesiastical powers, accredited to the court of a sovereign or assigned to a definite territory with the duty of safeguarding the interests of the Holy See. The special character of a nuncio, as distinguished from other papal envoys, collectors, or legates, consists in the fact that his office is specifically defined and limited to a definite district (this nunciature), wherein he must reside; his mission is general, embracing all the interests of the Holy See; his office is permanent, requiring the appointment of a successor when one incumbent is recalled, and his mission includes both diplomatic and ecclesiastical powers. Nuncios, in the strict sense of the word, first appear in the sixteenth century. The office, however, was not created at any definite moment or by any one papal ordinance, but gradually developed under the influence of various historical factors into the form in which we find it in the sixteenth century. The first mention of nunciatures of the Holy See at secular courts were the apocrisiarii (q. v.; see also Legato) at the Byzantine Court. In the Middle Ages, the popes sent, for the settlement of important ecclesiastical or political matters, legates (episcopi a latere, etc., q. v.) with definite instructions and at times permanent jurisdiction. From the thirteenth century on, for the purpose of collecting taxes either for the Roman Court or for the crusades, were called nuntii, nuntii apotolici. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries this title was given also papal envoys entrusted with certain other affairs of an ecclesiastical or diplomatic nature. Frequently they were given the right of granting certain privileges, favours, and benedictions. During the Great Western Schism and the period of the reform councils (sixteenth century), such embellishments were more frequently resorted to by the Holy See. Then were also gradually established permanent diplomatic representation at the various courts. With previous forms of papal representation, the nuncio was modeled upon the permanent diplomatic legations of temporal sovereigns; there finally arose in the sixteenth century the permanent nunciatures of the Holy See.

The exact date of the establishment of many of the nunciatures is not easy to determine, as it is impossible to fix exactly in all cases when an earlier type of papal envoy was replaced by a nuncio proper, and especially as in the beginning we find interruptions in the succession of envoys who, owing to their powers and their office, must be regarded as real nuncios. The necessity of existing Protestantism was a special factor in the increase of the nunciatures. After the Council of Trent they became the chief agents of the popes in their efforts to check the spread of heresy and to carry out true reform. The fact that in 1555 the papal correspondence with foreign powers, previously carried on by the pope's private secretary, was handed over to a nuncio, and that the Papal Legate to Francis I, the king of France, was the chief element within the curia which led to the permanence of nunciatures. Thereby the political correspondence of the Holy See lost its somewhat private character, and was entrusted to the secretariate of state, with which the nuncios were henceforth to be in constant communication. The popes also employed extraordinary envoys for special purposes. Angelo Leoni, sent to Venice by Alexander VI in 1500, is commonly regarded as the first nuncio, as we understand the term to-day. In Spain the collector-general of the papal exchequer, Giovanni Ruffo del Tornabuoni, was given the title of nuncio, and it was he who first resided in the country and discharged these two offices from 1506 to 1518 or 1519. As his successors were appointed collectors-general with fiscal, and political representatives with diplomatic powers, so that from thenceforth the Spanish nunciature may be regarded as permanent. The beginning of a papal nunciature in Germany dates from 1551 when Julius II sent Lorenzo Campeggio to the Imperial Court. His mission was ratified in 1516 by Leo X, and from 1530 a nuncio was permanently accredited. The nuncios often accompanied Emperor Charles V, even when he resided outside the empire. Another German nunciature was that of the King of Poland: Giovanni Battista Panvinio, praenost in the diocese of Poznan, was sent to the court of King Ferdinand of Austria. The first real nuncio in France was Leone Ludovico di Canossa (1514-17). The French nunciature continued from the Council of Trent to the Revolution. After the Council of Trent a number of new nunciatures were created. In 1548 diplomatic representatives were appointed for Piedmont, Milan, Tuscany (Florence), and for Naples, where the nunciature underwent the same development as in Spain. The nuncios entrusted with the duty of collecting the papal taxes received also diplomatic powers, and was recognized in this capacity by Philip II in 1569. Portuguese and Polish likewise received permanent nuncios shortly after the Council of Trent. To foster Catholic revival new nunciatures were erected in the southern parts of the German Empire. Thus, in 1553, Bartolomeo Porta was made nuncio of Salzburg, Tyrol, and Bavaria, although no further success was appointed to the jurisdiction. The bishops of Salzburg and Brixen were appointed first nuncios of Styria, but this nunciature was discontinued in 1621. Bishop Bonhomini arrived in Switzerland in 1579, and up to 1581 with great zeal and success introduced ecclesiastical reforms. In 1566 Giovanni Battista Santonio succeeded him, whenupon the Swiss nunciature became permanent.
In Cologne a nunciature was erected in 1584 for northwestern Germany and the Rhine, but in 1596 the Nuncio of France was detached from the Nunciature of Cologne and received its own nunciature in Brussels (Nunciature of Flanders). The jurisdiction of the Nunciature of Flanders extended also to the English missions. Thus, toward the end of the sixteenth century, nunciatures were fully developed.

A dispute concerning the rights of the pope in the exercise of the functions of the nuncios, which had arisen in 1749, was determined by the papal nuncios themselves in 1758, when Pius VI determined to establish a new nunciature in Munich at the request of Charles Theodore, Elector of Bavaria. The elector desired the appointment of a special nuncio, because princes subject to the emperor alone were bound to reside in Vienna, but did not reside in Bavaria, thus greatly impeding the execution of ecclesiastical administration. The three spiritual electors (the Archbishops of Cologne, Mainz, and Trier) protested on the ground that thereby their metropolitan rights would be violated. The pope, however, appointed Zoglio, titular Archbishop of Athens, as nuncio, and to him Charles Theodore ordered his clergy to have recourse in future in all ecclesiastical matters within his jurisdiction. The three electors, imbued with Febronianism (q.v.), formed a coalition with the Archbishop of Salzburg, hoping to recover their pretended primitive metropolitan rights by ignoring the nuncius and thereby giving occasion to disputes on their own authority, even in cases transferred to the pope. As Rome refused to support them, they appealed to Joseph II, who, in accordance with his principles, heartily approved of their efforts, pledged them his full support, declared that he would never allow the jurisdiction of the bishops of the empire to be curtailed, and that consequently he would recognize the nuncios only in their political character. At the Congress of Ems (q.v.), the three elector archbishops passed resolutions embodying their contentions. Despite this protest, Pueca and Zoglio continued to exercise their spiritual jurisdiction in Cologne and Munich respectively, received appeals from the decisions of ecclesiastical courts, and granted dispensations in cases reserved to the pope. On the other hand the four archbishops arbitrarily extended their own authority, granting dispensations from solemn religious vows as well as from matrimonial impediments, and erecting ecclesiastical tribunals of third instance, and so gaining ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the Imperial Diet of Ratisbon in 1788, but without definite results. The archbishops, opposed both by the cathedral chapters and the suffragan bishops, renewed communications with the pope, who on 11 Nov., 1789, issued an extensive document giving a detailed exposition of the rights of the Holy See and those of its envoy (Ss. D. N. Pii pp. VI. Responsio ad Metropolitanos Moguntiano, Trevirens, Coloniens, et Salisburgens., supra Nuntiaturis apostolicis, Rome, 1789). Frederick William II, King of Prussia, also recognized the jurisdiction of the Nuncio of Cologne in this document and gave an answer which openly opposed the pretensions of the emperor. The French revolution ended the dispute. Owing to the political development of Italy in the nineteenth century, the papal nunciatures disappeared completely. With the dissolution of the Holy Roman Empire the Imperial German nunciature became the Austrian nunciature, which was raised to the dignity of an apostolic nunciature of Austria. The partition of Poland ended the nunciature there. The first state outside of Europe to receive a papal representative was Brazil. At first an inter-nuncio was assigned to that country, but of late years a nuncio has resided there.

At present the pope has four papal nunciatures of the first class, four of the second, two inter-nunciatures, and several delegations. The nunciatures of the first class are: (1) Vienna; (2) Paris, where the nunciature was re-established after the Revolution, when Cardinal Caprara had first been sent thither as legatus a latere by Pius VII. Since the rupture of diplomatic relations between Austria and France, in 1854, this office has had no incumbent; (3) Madrid, which since the Council of Trent, has been the permanent residence of the papal nuncio for Spain. It has a special tribunal, the Rota, which serves only as a court of appeals from the diocesan and metropolitan courts, but cannot handle any cases of first instance. Litigants are free to appeal from its decisions to the sovereign pontiff; (4) Lisbon, which had at first a nunciature only of the second class. It included a special court for ecclesiastical matters, but this was abolished in the beginning of the nineteenth century. From the second half of the sixteenth century Portugal always had a nuncio, although disputes arose at different times. The nunciatures of the second class are: (1) the Swiss nunciature which, in the eighteenth century, comprised the Dioceses of Constance, Basle, Cire, Sion, and Lausanne. Since the religious troubles of 1783 there has been no incumbent; (2) since the beginning of the nineteenth century the only nunciature in Germany has been that of Munich, where the Bishop of Cologne was Annibale della Genga, later on Pope Leo XIII; (3) Brussels, the residence of the Nuncio of Belgium as successor of the former Nuncio of Flanders. During the time of the French occupation this position was vacant. It was only in 1829 that Cappacini was sent to Brussels instead of being permanently raised to a nunciature. Fornari, the first nuncio, was succeeded in 1843 by Gioacchino Pecci, afterwards Leo XIII. In 1880 the Liberal Ministry severed all diplomatic relations with the Holy See; the old status was restored, when in 1885 the Catholic party regained power; (4) Brazil. In 1807 Lorenzo Coleppi, the Nuncio of Portugal, followed John VI in his flight to Brazil. In 1829 a special internuncio, Felice Ostinì, was appointed for Brazil; this marks the beginning of diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the other states of South America. In 1902 the papal Internuncio of Brazil was raised to the dignity of nuncio.

The internunciatures are: (1) the Internunciature of Holland and Luxemburg. Since the separation of these countries, the internuncio receives distinct credentials for the two governments. From the time of the Peace Conference at the Hague Holland has only a chargé d'affaires; (2) Switzerland, Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay, which was erected in 1900. There had been accredited to these countries a papal delegate since 1847, and an internuncio, Mgr Barili, had been sent in 1831 to what was then New Granada. The Apostolic delegates form a lower rank of papal representatives of diplomatic and ecclesiastical character. There are five Apostolic Delegations in South and Central America: (1) Chile, (2) Columbia, (3) Costa-Rica, (4) Ecuador, Bolivia, and Peru, (5) San Domingo, Haiti and Venezuela, all erected during the nineteenth century. Owing to recent troubles in these countries the special diplomatic character of the internal relations between the Holy See and these states has been definitely placed on a temporary basis to the Apostolic delegates. Costa-Rica has been without a delegate for a considerable period. It is necessary to distinguish these Apostolic delegations of a diplomatic character from those which are merely ecclesiastical.

The powers to papal nuncios correspond to the twofold character of their mission. As the diplomatic representatives of the Holy See they are entitled to treat with the sovereigns or head of republics to whom they are accredited. With their mission they are given special credentials as well as special instructions, whether of a public or of a private nature. They also receive a secret code and enjoy the same privileges as ambassadors. Their public acts are regularized in conformity with general diplomatic custom. They also have certain distinctions, especially that of being ex-officio dean of the entire diplomatic body, within their nunciature, and therefore on public occasions take precedence of all diplomatic representatives. In turn, nuncios and delegates enjoy a similar right of precedence and, although the diplomatic and ecclesiastical nunciatures have equal rank, this privilege of papal envos was expressly recognized by the Congress of Vienna in 1815 and is universally observed. Nuncios enjoy the title of "Excellency" and the same special honours as ambassadors. In addition to their diplomatic position nuncios have an ecclesiastical mission, and possess ordinary and extraordinary faculties, which are by no means limited to the latter sphere. Their special position is especially stated in the "Responsio" of Pius VI to the Rhenish archbishops, and was reaffirmed by Pius IX in a letter to Archbishop Darboy of Paris in 1863, as also in a declaration of the Cardinal Secretary of State Jacobini addressed to Spain, 15 April, 1855. The ample ecclesiastical faculties, granted in the Middle Ages to the legates a latere and other papal envos, had led to abuses; the Council of Trent, therefore, enacted that papal envos (legati a latere, nunci, gебnates ecclesiastici, aut alicuius numenque facultates) were not to impede bishops or to disturb their ordinary jurisdiction nor to proceed against ecclesiastical persons unless the bishop had first been applied to and had shown himself negligent (Sess. XXIV, cap. xx de ref.).

Apart from the special faculties in conferring ecclesiastical benefices and in granting spiritual favours, the nuncios had the power of instituting proceedings and giving sentences in cases of ecclesiastical jurisdiction and discipline reserved to the pope. The nuncioes had special courts, principally for cases of appeal. To-day such a court is attached only to the Nunciature of Spain. In all other points nuncios enjoy essentially the same rights in ecclesiastical matters as other representatives of the popes, and as such are the organs through which he exercises his ordinary and immediate supreme jurisdiction. It is their special duty to supervise ecclesiastical administration, and on this they report to the cardinal secretary of state; they grant dispensations in cases reserved to the pope, carry on the process of information for the nomination of new bishops, give permission for reading forbidden books, and enjoy the privilege of granting minor indulgences. In special cases they are delegated for the settlement of important ecclesiastical affairs. In virtue of their position certain ecclesiastical honours are due to them as laid down in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries and developed into a change in the practice hitherto followed with regard to nuncios, so that now they hold their position longer than formerly, and a nuncio of the first class, after his recall, is not regularly raised to the cardinalate.

Nunciate Reports. The official reports concerning their entire field of work sent by the papal nuncios and legates (or their representatives) to the pope or the cardinal secretary of state. The contents of these dispatches are in accordance with the commission received by the legate or nuncio. The reports of the nuncios filling permanent nunciatures, on whose territories a great interest is centered, within their special territory, relate to all the more important ecclesiastical or political questions which had any connexion whatever with their commission. The objects of the reports are: (1) to give the most exact information possible concerning all political or ecclesiastical matters which might be of importance to the pope or the cardinal secretary of state; (2) to give exact information concerning the action the nuncios have taken with respect to such occurrences; (3) to send news concerning the princes to whose courts they are accredited, and concerning the persons who are in personal contact with the princes, or appear at court, on account of political matters, or in any way have a share in ecclesiastical and political affairs. In doing this attention is naturally paid both to the instructions that had been given to the nuncio before he left for his post, and to the letters regularly received from the office of the papal secretary of state, from the pope, or from other officials. Taken in a wider sense, nunciature reports also include those letters of the nuncios concerning the affairs of their nunciatures, addressed to cardinals or others having high official rank in the Curia. From the first half of the sixteenth century, when the bureau of the papal secretary of state was fully developed and ecclesiastical correspondence became daily, the nunciature reports were written. In 1897, the bishop B. J. Fossmark published the correspondence of the nuncios. This correspondence, the reports of the nuncios were sent regularly (from the middle of the sixteenth century, often weekly). They were written sometimes in Latin, sometimes in Italian. If important matters were treated, especially those concerning which negotiations were carried on, they were copied from the originals. In this way, the nuncio employed the cipher given him before going to this position.

Although the individual dispatches vary greatly in worth, yet, as a whole, the nunciature reports form a very important source from the sixteenth century (especially during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries) both for the history of the Church and for political history. Only a very small proportion either of the reports made by papal legates in the second half of the sixteenth century or in the early years of the sixteenth century have been preserved. From the second decade of the sixteenth century a much greater number survive, and from the middle of this century the reports of individual nuncios frequently exist in unbroken sequence. Most of the manuscript reports are in the Vatican archives, and are classified in sixteen series, according to the nunciatures. The classification does not agree, however, with the present arrangement of the indexes. The arrangement is, as follows: Spain, Portugal, France, Belgium, England, Germany (the imperial nunciature), Cologne, Bavaria, Switzerland, Poland, Savoy, Genoa, Venice, Florence, Naples, and Malta. Individual reports are also found in other divisions of the archives. The nunciature reports brought together in the archives of the Vatican show serious gaps, especially for the sixteenth century. The reason is that the diplomatic correspondence of the Curia in that era was not systematically brought together and preserved in a papal archive, but was frequently preserved by the cardinals, or in archives of the papal states, and only sometimes preserved in the archives of the Farnese family. Other copies are found in various Italian archives. The reports preserved are either the original drafts made by the nuncios themselves, or the original letters drawn up in accordance with these, or copies of the original letters. As regards the reports written in cipher, a key can generally be found.

lish them together with supplementary documents (especially the instructions and letters sent to the nuncios). Heretofore more has been done, in the way of publication, for the German nunciatures than for the others. H. Lämmer published a series of nunciature reports from Germany as early as 1860 in his "Archiv für Geschichte der ost- und westlichen vnien (die Communitas religiosorum in Europa)"; upon the opening of the Vatican archives, the assistant archivist, Father Balen, brought forward other material pertaining to the same subject in his "Monumenta reformatorum Lutheran" (Ratisbon, 1883-4). Father Dittreich reports the presents sent by the nuncio Giovanni Morone from the "Archives ecclésiastiques de la Confédération "(Buch der Görresgesellschaft", IV (1883), 395-472, 618-73, and, as a complement to this, edited the "Nuntiaturberichte Morones vom deutschen Königs- hofe" for the years 1539-40 in "Queuen und Forschungen aus dem Gebiete der Geschichte", I (Paderborn, 1892). In the main these historical institutes at Rome (the Prussian, the Austrian, and that of the Görresgesellschaft) divided among them the publication of all the nunciature reports sent from the German Empire for the period of the sixteenth and the first half of the seventeenth centuries. These societies have already published a large number of volumes (1525-73), extra volumes have been published by the Prussian Institute; there have appeared so far vols. I-IV, VIII-X, and XII, comprising the nunciatures of Vergerio, Morone, Miglianelli, Varallo, Poggio, Bertano, and Camiani, the legations of Farnese, Curia, Campeggio, Alcader, and Mon- drato (Gotha-Berlin, 1802-). The second division, covering the period 1580-97, was undertaken by the Austrian Institute; up to the present vols. I and II, containing the reports of the nuncios Hosius and Bel- fino, have appeared (Vienna, 1897-1903). A third division, covering the years 1572-85, was also assigned to the Prussian institute which has already issued this series (Berlin, 1892-); vol. I, containing the struggle over Cologne; vol. II, containing the Diets of Ratisbon (1576) and of Augsburg (1582); vols. III-V, containing the nunciature of Bartolommeo of Piazzia. At this point begin the publications of the institute of the Görresgesellschaft, which has so far edited in four volumes the nuncios Bonomi (Bononini), Santonio, Frangiapi, Malaspina, and Sega, and the nunciature correspondence of Caspar Gropper (Paderborn, 1895-). The period assigned to this institute covers 1585-1605. With 1606 begins another period (the fourth division), assigned to the Prussian institute and containing the second century of this division two volumes have been published containing the reports of the nuncio Palotto (Berlin, 1895-). In this way the material concerning the German nunciatures for the period from the beginning of the sixteenth to the middle of the seven- teenth century, that is for the age of the Reformation, will be available at a not far distant date.

Professors Reinhard and Steffens of Fribourg under- took the editing of the nunciature reports for Switzerland and began with Nuncio Bonomi (Bononini), of whose reports one volume has been issued (Solothurn, 1907); the introductory volume completed by Steffens after the text of Bonomi has been issued in the "Monumenta Vaticana Hungarica", second series, vol. 1: "Relaciones oratorios pontificios" (Buch- pers, 1884). For Italy, they have begun the "Archives de l'histoire religieux de France"; this of Frauken undertook the nunciatures during the pontificate of Clement VII and has issued so far vol. I (Paris, 1906), covering the years 1525-7, and including the nunciatures of Capino da Capo and Roberto Acciavano, and the legation of Cardinal Salvati. Avel, meanwhile, began the nunciatures during the reign of Paul IV, and edited (vol. I, pt. i) the dispatches of Sebastian Gualtiero and Cesare Brancato (1554-7). The general reports of Ottavio Mirto Frangiapi and Fabio della Lionessa, the nuncios in Flanders (1605 and 1634), have been published by Cauchie in the "Analecnes pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique de la Belgique"; the publication of the dispatches of the papal nunciature in Spain has been commenced by Hinojosa, "Los Despachos de la Diplomacia Pontificia en España", I (Madrid, 1896). So far no comprehensive publication of this kind has been undertaken for Italy, although individual nunciatures have been published. Fra- nei has treated the Venetian nunciature during the pontificate of Clement VII, "La nunciatura di Venezia nel pontificato di Clemente VII" (Turin, 1892), and Curasi has edited the dispatches that have been preserved of the legation of Giacomo Gherardi, "Dis- pacci e lettere di Giacomo Gherardi, nuncio pontificio a Firenze e Milano", II settembre, 1147-10 ottobre, 1400", in "Studi e Testi", fase, xxi (Rome, 1909). Besides these comprehensive publications various historians in treating the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in their works have made use of and pub- lished individual dispatches of this kind. See the introductory volume for the period of the reports and the bibliography of the article Nuncio.

J. P. KNISH

Nuncius (Nunus). Perugia, Mathematician and astronomer, b. at Apecce-de-Sol, 1302; d. at Coimbra, 1577. He studied ancient languages, philosophy, and medicine at Lisbon and mathematics at Salamanca. In 1519 he went as inspector-general of customs to Goa, India, returning to become in 1529 royal cosmog- rapher. After lecturing for three years at Lisbon, a professorship in higher mathematics was established for him at the University of Coimbra, where he held from 1541 to 1562. His utterances on science plunged him into discussions with foreign savants, particularly the French mathematician, Oronce Fine. Having been tutor in the reigning family, he was enabled to spend his last years in use. To mathematics, astronomy, and navigation, Nunzio made important contributions. He devised a method for obtaining the highest common divisor of two algebraic expressions. In his "De crepusculis" he announced a new and accurate solution of the astro- nomic problem of minimum twilight and suggested an instrument for the measurement of a line. The "nunus", never in common use, consisted essentially of forty-six concentric circles divided into quadrants by two diameters at right angles to each other, each quad- rant being divided into equal parts, the number of parts diminishing from ninety for the outermost circle to forty-five for the innermost. If one side of any angle is made to coincide with one of the radii, the vertex of the angle falling at the centre of the circle, the other side of the angle will fall on or near some point of division of one of the arcs. If then n is the number of parts intercepted and a is the whole num- ber of parts in the relevant arc, the angle made by the angle will be 90x2-degrees. In "De arte navigandi" he announced his discovery and analysis of the curve of double curvature called the rumbus, better known as lozodrome, which is the line traced by a ship cutting the meridians at a constant angle. His collected works were published under the title "Petri Noni Opera" (Basle, 1593). Among them are: "Trattato de la Terra com a la proyeccion del mundo", "De la geographia de Claudio Tolomeo Alexand- drino" (Lisbon, 1537); "De crepusculis liber unus" (Lisbon, 1542); "De arte atque ratione navigandi" (Coimbra, 1546); "De erratis Orontii Finei" (Coim- bra, 1546); "Annotatio in extrema verba capitis de climatis" (Cologne, 1546); "Libro de algebra en

Nuns. I. ORIGIN AND HISTORY.—The institution of nuns and sisters, who devote themselves in various religious orders to the practice of a life of perfection, dates from the fifth ages of the Church, and women may claim with a certain pride that they were the first to embrace the religious state for its own sake, with out regard to missionary work and ecclesiastical functions proper to men. St. Paul speaks of widows, who were called to certain kinds of church work (I Tim., 22, and of virgins (1 Cor., viii), whom he praises for their continence and their devotion to the things of the Lord. In the earliest times Christian women directed their fervour, some towards the service of the sanctuary, others to the attainment of perfection.
The virgins were remarkable for their perfect and perpetual consecration to God. The most ancient Apologists, as Justin, "Apol.," I. c. 15; Migne, "P. G."
VI. 350; St. Ambrose, "De Virginitatis," Bk I. c. 4; Migne, "P. L." XVI. 193. Many also practised poverty. From the earliest times they were called the spouses of Christ, according to St. Athanasius, the custom of the Church
(I. Apol. ad Constant., sec. 33; Migne, "P. G." XXXV, 639). St. Cyprian describes a virgin who had broken her vows as an adulteress ("Ep. 62," Migne, "P. L." IV. 370). Tertullian distinguishes between those virgins who took the veil publicly in the assembly of the faithful, and others known to God alone; the veil seemed to have been simply put on by married women.
Virgins vowed to the service of God, at first continued to live with their families, but as early as the end of the third century there were community houses known as nymblevis, and certainly at the beginning of the same century the virgins formed a special class in the Church, receiving Holy Communion before the laity.
The office of Good Friday in which the virgins are mentioned after the porters, and the Litany of the Saints, in which they are invoked with the widows, show traces of this classification. They were sometimes admitted among the deaconesses for the baptism of adult women and to exercise the functions which St. Paul mentioned for widows. In the fourth century there were many persons of both sexes.

When the persecutions of the third century drove many into the desert, the solitary life produced many heroines; and when the monks began to live in monasteries, there were also communities of women. St.
Pachomius (292-346) built a convent in which a numer of religious women lived with his sister. St. Je-toine made famous the monastery of St. Paul at Bethlehem. St. Augustine addressed to the nuns a letter of direction from which subsequently his rule was taken. There were monasteries of virgins or nuns at Rome, throughout Italy, Gaul, Spain, and the West.
They lived a life of a stricter or more "generally religious life, saw their rules adopted by women. The nuns of Egypt and Syria cut their hair, a practice not introduced until later into the West.
Monasteries of women were generally situated at a distance from those of men; St. Pachomius insisted on this separation. St. Benedict required that every convent house, one wing being set apart for women and the other for men, more frequently adjoining houses for the two sexes. Justinian abolished these double houses in the East, placed an old man to look after the temporal affairs of the convent, and appointed a priest and a deacon who were to perform their duties without holding any of the command.
In the West, such double houses existed among the hospitaliers even in the twelfth century. In the eighth and ninth centuries a number of clergy of the principal churches of the West, not being bound by religious profession, chose to live in community and to observe a fixed rule of life. This monasticism was also adopted by women, who retired from the world, took vows of chastity and vows of black, but were not bound to give of their property.

Contemplation and a certain religious profession were required of married women whose husbands were in Sacred Orders, or even received episcopal consecration.

Hence in the ninth century the list of women vowed to the service of God included these various classes:
virgins, whose solemn consecration was reserved to the bishop, nuns bound by religious profession, canoniesses living in common without religious profession, deaconesses engaged in the service of the church, and widows or widows of men in Sacred Orders. The nuns sometimes occupied a special house; the enclosure strictly kept in the East, was not considered indispensable in the West. Other monasteries allowed the nuns to go in and out. In Gaul and Spain the novitiate lasted one year for the cloistered nuns and three years for the others. Early times the nuns gave Christian education to children when girls brought by their parents, and especially girls intending to embrace a religious life. Besides those who took the veil of virgins of their own accord, or decided to embrace the religious life, there were others offered by their parents before they were old enough to be consulted. In the West under the influence of the East, for several centuries, these oblates were considered as bound for life by the offering made by their parents.
The profession itself might be expressed or implied.
One who put on the religious habit, and lived for some time among the professed, was herself considered as professed. But in the strictest sense of the word the profession there was also a solemn consecration of virginity which took place much later, at twenty-five years. In the thirteenth century, the Mendicant Orders appeared characterized by a more rigorous poverty, which excluded not only private property, but also the possession of certain kinds of property in common. Under the direction of St. Francis of Assisi, St. Clare founded in 1212 the Second Order of Franciscans. St. Dominic had given a constitution to nuns, even before instituting his Friars Preachers, approved 22 December, 1216. The Carbini, and the Theatines were founded for the responding orders of women; and the same was the case with the Clerks Regular dating from the sixteenth century, except the Society of Jesus.

From the time of the Mendicant Orders, founded especially for preaching and missionary work, there was a great difference between the orders of men and women, arising from the strict enclosure to which women were subjected. This rigorous enclosure usual in the East, was imposed on all nuns in the West, first by bishops and particular councils, and afterwards by the Holy See. Boniface VIII (1291-1309) by his constitution "Pericufo", inscribed in Canon Law (can. De statu regularum, in VI. III, 141) made it an inviolable law for all professed nuns; and the Council of Trent (Sess. XXV, De Reg. et Mon., c. v) confirmed that constitution. Hence it was impossible for religious to undertake works of charity incompatible with the enclosure. The education of young girls professed was permitted to the tertiary sisters, but sacred only by simple vows, and dispensed from the enclosure. The Breviary commemorates the services rendered the Order of Mercy by St. Mary of Cervellione. St. Pius V took more radical measures by his constitution "Circa pastoralis", of 25 May, 1566. Not only did he insist on the observance of the constitution of Boniface VIII, and the decree of the Council of Trent, but compelled the tertiaries to accept the obligation of solemn vows, and to cloister themselves. In the nearly three centuries the Holy See refused all approbation to convents bound by simple vows, and Urban VIII by his constitution "Pastoralis" of 31 May, 1631 abolished an English teaching congregation, founded by Mary Ward in 1609, which had simple vows only.

This strictness led to the foundation of pious associations called secular because they had no perpetual vows, and leading a common life intended for their own personal sanctification and the practice of charity, e.g. the Daughters of Charity, founded by St. Vincent de Paul. The constitution of St. Pius V was not always strictly observed; communities existed approved by bishops, and soon tolerated by the Holy See, new ones were formed with the sanctions of the diocesan ordinaries. So great were the services rendered by these new communities to the poor, the sick, the young, and even the missions, that the Holy See, at the request of the English Vincentines, for a long time refused to approve the congregations themselves, and the formula of commendation or ratification contained this restriction "citra lumen approbationem consistoriorum" (without approbation of the congregation). As political difficulties rendered less easy the observance of solemn vows, especially for women, the Holy See from the end of the eighteenth century declined to approve any new congregations with solemn vows, and even suppressed in certain countries, Belgium and France, all solemn professions in the old orders of women. The constitution of Benedict XVI, "Quaratus justi" of 30 April, 1749, on the subject of the conclusion of English Virginia, was the prelude to the legislation of Leo XIII, who by his constitution "Consaltem" of 8 December, 1900, laid down the laws common to congregations with simple vows, dividing these into two great classes, congregations under diocesan authority, subject to the bishops, and those under pontifical law.

II. VARIOUS KINDS OF NUNS.—(1) As regards their object they may be partly contemplative, seeking personal perfection by close union with God; such are most of the strictly enclosed congregations, as Premonstratensian Canonesseis, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Collettes, Redemptoristines; or they may combine the objects of works of charity, foreign missions, like the White Sisters of Cardinal Lavigerie, and certain Franciscan Tertiaries; the education of young girls, like the Ursulines and Visitandines; the care of the sick, orphans, lunatics, and aged persons, like many of the congregations called Hospitallers, Sisters of Charity, Daughters of St. Vincent de Paul, and Little Sisters of the Poor. When the works of mercy are corporal, and above all carried out inside the convent, the congregations are called active. Teaching communities are classed among those leading a mixed life, devoting themselves to works which in themselves require union with God; and contemplative. The constitution "Consaltem" (Nova) of 8 December, 1900) charges bishops not to permit sisters to open houses as hotels for the entertainment of strangers of both sexes, and to be extremely careful in authorizing congregations which live on alms, or nurse sick persons at their homes, or maintain infirmaries for the unconsecrated; and the admission of secular priests. The Holy See, by its Regulations (Norma) of 28 June, 1901, declares that it does not approve of congregations whose object is to render certain services in seminaries or colleges for male pupils, or to teach children or young people of both sexes; and it disapproves their undertaking the direct care of young infants, or of lying-in women. These services should be given only in exceptional circumstances. (2) As regards their origine, congregations are either connected with a first order or congregation of men, as in the case of most of the older congregations, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Dominicans, Reformed Cistercians, Trappists, Redemptoristines etc., or are founded independently of any. By this recent institution. In the regulations of 28 June, 1901, Art. 19, 52, the Holy See no longer approves of double foundations, which establish a certain subordination of the sisters to similar congregations of men. (3) As regards their juridical condition, we distinguish two nuns proper, so-called, having their own papal enclosure, whose houses are monasteries; (a) nuns belonging to the old approved orders with solemn vows, but taking only simple vows by special dispensation of the Holy See; (b) sisters with simple vows dependent on the Holy See; (d) sisters under diocesan government. The house of sisters under simple vows, and the congregations themselves are canonically called conservatoriae. These do not always fulfill all the essential conditions of the religious state. Those which do are more correctly called religious congregations than the others, which are called "conservatoriae" or "societales" (pious congregations or pious societies). Nuns of the Latin Church only are considered here.

III. NUNS PROPERLY So Called.—Nuns properly so-called have solemn vows with a strict enclosure, regulated by pontifical law which prevents the religious from going out (except in very rare cases, approved by the regular superior and the bishop), and also the entrance of strangers, even females, under pain of excommunication. Even admission to the grated parlour is not free, and interviews with regulars are subject to stringent rules. Though some mitigations have been introduced partly by local usage, partly in the case of certain convents in America, the express concession of the Holy See. The building should be so arranged that the inner courts and gardens cannot be overlooked from outside, and the windows should not open on the public road. By the fact of their enclosure, these monasteries are independent of one another. At the head of the community is a superior called the abbess, appointed either by the chapter, at least outside Italy, for in Italy, and especially in the two Sicilies, the constitution "Expositio debatum" (1 January, 1568) of Gregory XIII requires that they should be re-elected every three years (see "Periodica de Reiugiosis", n. 420, vol. 4, 1583). The election must be made by ordinary (in the case of certain convents in America) express consent of the Holy See. The bishop presides over the ballot, except in the case of nuns subject to regulars, and he has always the right to be present at the election. The president collects the votes at the granting. Without leaving jurisdiction, the abbess exercises authority over all in the house, and commands in virtue of their vows. Monasteries not exempt are subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop; exempt monasteries are placed under the immediate authority of the Holy See, others under that of a regular First Order. In the absence of any other formal direction, the Holy See undertakes to delegate to the bishop the annual visitation of monasteries immediately subject to the pope, to the exclusion of other superiors. This visitation is made by the regular prelate in the case of monasteries dependent on a First Order; but the bishop has in all cases authority to insist on the maintenance of the enclosure, and on the proper administration; he also approves the confessors. The erection of a monastery requires the consent of the bishop, and at least in practice nowadays of the Apostolic See. The bishop, by himself, or in consultation with the regular superior, determines the number of nuns who can be received according to the amount of their ordinary revenues. The recent Council of Bishops of Latin America, at Rome in 1899, required that the number should not be less than twelve. It is sometimes permitted to receive a certain number of supernumeraries who may reside in a monastery, never being allowed to take the habit of the friars or to hold other ranks, and remain supernumeraries all their lives. According to the decree of 23 May, 1659, candidates must be at least fifteen years old. The decree “Sanctissimum” of 4 January, 1910, annuls the admission to the novitiate or to any vows, if granted without the consent of the Holy See, of persons of any grave reputation do not enter the monastery until they have completed a six years' instruction in a good school, or for any reason whatever from any institution preparatory to the religious life, or of former novice or professed sisters expelled from their convents. Professed sisters dispensed from their vows cannot, without the consent of the Holy See, enter any congregation, but the one they have quitted (see Novice; Postulant; “Periodica de Religiousi”, n. 385, vol. 5, 98). The admission is made by the chapter, but, before the clothing, and also before the solemn profession, it is the duty of the bishop, by himself or (if he is prevented) by his vicar-general or some person delegated by either of them, to inquire into the qualifications and the purpose of the candidate, especially as to her freedom of choice. The candidate must provide a dowry of at least two hundred crowns unless the founder consents to accept a smaller sum. With certain exceptions, the dowry of choir sisters cannot be dispensed with; it must be paid before the clothing, and maintains the choir and professed sisters. If the candidate professes religious, it becomes the property of the convent, which has, however, no right of alienation; it is returned as a matter of equity to a religious who enters another order, or to one who returns to the world and is in want.

After the novitiate the religious cannot at first, according to the decree “Perpetuus” of 3 May, 1902, take any but simple vows whether perpetual or for a year only, if it is customary to take annual vows. The admission to vows is made by the chapter, with the consent of the regular superior or the bishop. Some writers hold that the bishop is bound, before this profession, to make a fresh inquiry into the vocation of the novice, and this inquiry does not dispense from that which the Council of Trent prescribes before solemn profession (see the answer of 19 January, 1909; “Periodica de Religiousi”, n. 317, vol. 4, 341). This period of simple vows ordinarily lasts for three years, but the regular superior may prolong it in the case of nuns who are under twenty-five years. During this period, the religious keeps her property, but makes over the administration of it to any one she may choose. She is bound to the rules and the choir, but not to the private recitation of the Divine Office; she can take part in chapters, except in those in which others are admitted to vows; she cannot be elected superior, mother-viceascress, mistress of novices, assistant, counsellor, or treasurer. She participates in all the indulgences and spiritual privileges of those who have taken their solemn vows; and although the solemn profession takes place two months after the profession is made, the sequester is regulated by the date of simple profession, without regard to any delay in proceeding to solemn profession. The dispensation of vows and dismissal of nuns are reserved to the Holy See. The outward solemnity of profession takes place at the first simple profession; the other takes place within a year. Only the prior or extraordinary can admit to the latter, but a consultative chapter is held, whose decision is announced by the superior. Solemn profession carries with it the inability to possess property (except in case of a papal indulgence such as that enjoyed by Belgium and perhaps also Holland), withholds admission to higher orders, prevents the benefice, and creates a diriment impediment to any subsequent marriage. Nuns are generally obliged to recite the Divine Office, like religious orders of men; but the Visitandines and some monasteries of Ursulines recite only the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin, even in choir. The obligation of this office, even when the candidate professed other vows, also and especially in the case of the religious habit and profession, must be considered as canonical. Even before the above decree, the Holy See has declared for the Ursulines, under what conditions it can be omitted without venial sin depends apparently on the constitutions.

The bishop appoints the ordinary confessor, also the extraordinary or additional confessor of monasteries subject to him, and approves the confessor nominated by the regulars of a monastery subject to a First Order. The approbation for one monastery is not valid for another. As a rule there should be only one ordinary confessor, who should be changed every three years. Since the Council of Trent (Sess. XXV, De Reg., c. x), a confessor extraordinary should visit the monastery two or three times a year. Benedict XIV, by his Bull “Pastoralis” of 5 August, 1748, insisted on the appointment of a confessor extraordinary, and also on the provision of facilities for sick nuns. More recently, the decree “Quem ad modum” of 17 October, 1890, ordains that, without asking for any reason, a superior confessor shall allow the sick nun to be visited among those authorized by the bishops, as often as they think it necessary for their spiritual necessities. Besides the ordinary or extraordinary confessors, there are additional confessors, of whom the bishop must appoint a sufficient number. The ordinary confessor cannot be a religious except for reasons of privacy; the extraordinary confessor cannot belong to the same order. The same decree gives to confessors the exclusive right of regulating the communions of the nuns, who have the privilege of communicating daily since the decree “Sacra Tridentina” of 20 December, 1665 (see “Periodica de Religiousi”, n. 130, vol. 2, 66), and it forbids superiors to interfere unmasked in cases of conscience. The subjects are free to open their minds to their superiors but the latter must not, directly or indirectly, demand or invite such confidence.

IV. NUNS OF THE OLD ORDERS WITHOUT SOLEMN VOWS.—Since the French Revolution, various answers of the Holy See have gradually made it clear that neither in Belgium nor in France are there any longer monasteries of women subject to papal enclosure, or bound by solemn vows. (Cf. for France the reply of the Penitentiary of 25 December, 1833, and the Apostolic visitor Corsela of 1856; Bazzari, “Collectanea, 1st ed., p. 504, note; Bouix, “De regularibus”, vol. 2, 123 sq.) After long deliberation, the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars decided (cf. letter of 25 September, 1864, to the Archbishop of Baltimore) that in the United States nuns were under simple vows only, except the Visitandines of Georgetown, Mobile, Kaskaskia, St. Louis, and Baltimore, who made solemn profession by virtue of special permission. It added that without special indulgence the vows should be simple in all convents erected in the future. Since then the monastery of Kaskaskia, while the religious habit was suppressed, omitted the erection of a monastery of Visitandines with solemn vows at Springfield (Missouri). According to the same letter, the Visitandines with solemn vows must pass five years of simple profession before proceeding to solemn profession (Bazzari, “Collectanea”, 1st ed., 775-91). The vows of Sistine indult in Italy or in one of the Union countries are subject to a first order these nun are bound by the following rules: (a) The bishop has full jurisdiction over them; he may dispense from all constitutions not reserved to the Holy See, and from particular impediments to admission, but may not modify the constitutions. The vicars and the French bishops have received power to dispense from all vows except that of chastity. The bishop presides and confirms all elections, and has the right to require an account of the temporal administration. (b) The superior retains such power as is adapted to the vows and the necessities of community life. (c) The obligation of the Divine Office is such as is imposed by the rule; the enclosure is of episcopal law. (d) The vow of poverty does not prevent the possession of property. As a rule, the property of the congregation is owned by the congregation; it is invested in such a manner that it cannot be lienable without the consent of the superior or the bishop. Unless forbidden by the bishop, the superior may permit the execution of such instruments as are necessary for the purpose. (e) Indulgences and spiritual privileges (among which may be mentioned the right of using a special altar) remain intact. (f) In principle, the predates of the First Order is without authority over the nuns.

V. RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS AND PIUS SO-CIETIES UNDER PONTIFICAL AUTHORITY. (a) Congregations.—Since the constitution "Conditae" of 8
December, 1900, and the Regulations of 28 June, 1901, we possess precise rules by which to distinguish the congregations governed by pontifical law. Before formally approving a congregating and its constitutions, the Holy See is accustomed to give its commen-tation first to the intentions of the founders and the purpose of the foundation, and then to the congregation itself, is that its regulations are such that the
the effect of bringing the congregation into the number of those which are governed by pontifical law, and especially by the second part of the constitution "Con-dite". Bizzarri in his "Collectanea" gives a list of congregations so commended up to 1864 (1st ed., 681 sqq.).
This approval is not usually granted until the congregation has existed for some time under the authority of the bishop. The congregations are constituted on the model of the newer religious orders, that is to say they group several houses, each governed by a local superior, under the indirect authority of a superior general; many, but not all, are divided into provinces. Many form communities of tertaries, who as such have a share in the spiritual privileges of the order to which they are affiliated. Except in the in the case of a special privilege, like that which places the Daughters of Charity under the Superior General of the Priests of the Mission (see decree of 23 May, 1888)
the Congregation of Brothers of the Priests' College is supervised by the superior of the province or by the superior general, or by the superior general of a province. Before the regulations of 1901 the rules of new congregations differed in many respects. The details of internal government which follow apply to newly estabish. New congregations rather than to the older ones, like the Lax of the Sacred Heart Congregation.

The government of the congregations is vested in the general chapter, and in the superior general as-isted by a council with certain rights reserved to the bishops, under protection and supreme direction of the Sacred Congregation of Religious. This is the only competent Congregation since the promulgation of the Roman Curia by the constitution "Sapienti" of 29 June, 1908. The general chapter includes in all cases the superior general, her counsellors, the secretary general, the treasurer general, and if the congregation is divided into provinces, the provincial superiors, and one or two representatives from each province elected by the provincial chapter. If there are no provinces, the general chapter includes (besides those mentioned above) all superiors of houses containing more than twelve nuns, accompanied by one religious under perpetual vows elected by all the professed sisters (including those whose houses have no religious under perpetu-less important houses are grouped among themselves for this election, or annexed to a principal house.
This chapter ordinarily meets every six or twelve years, being summoned by the superior general or mother vicar; but an extraordinary meeting may be called on the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of superior, or for any other grave reason approved by the Holy Sec. The general chapter elects by an absolute majority of votes in secret ballot the superior general, the counsellors or assistants general, the secretary general, and the treasurer general, and deliber-ates on important matters affecting the congregation.
In many cases especially when there is a question of Joins, or annulment of a mission or province, the confirmation of the Holy See are required. The capitular decrees remain in force till the next chapter. The bishop as delegate of the Holy See, presides over the elections in person or by his representative. After the ballot he declares the election valid, and an-ounces the result. The provincial chapter, constituted of the provincial, the superiors of the houses, and the nuns of at least twelve nuns, and a delegate from each principal house (as above) has no other office, according to common law, but to depute two sisters to the general chapter.

The superior general is elected for six or twelve years; in the former case she may be re-elected, but for a third consecutive term of six years, or a second of twelve years, she must receive two-thirds of the votes, and the consent of the Holy See. She may not resign her office except with the consent of the Sacred Congregation, which has the power to depose her. The superior general has power to regulate the house, and the permission of the Holy See is necessary for a change of residence. She governs the congregation according to the approved constitutions, and is bound to make a visitation every three years either personally or by a deputy, to exercise a general control over the temporal administration, and to submit to the Sacred Congregation an official report countersigned by the ordinary of the principal house. (See the instruction accompanying the decree of 16 July, 1906, "Periodica de Religioniis", n. 134, vol. 2, 128 sqq.). The superior general nominates to the different non-elective offices, and decides the place of residedence of all her subjects. The counsellors general assist the superior general with their advice, and in many matters the consent of the majorly is required. Two of them must live with the superior general, and the rest must be accessible. According to the regulations of 1901, the approval of the general council is required for the erection and suppression of houses, the erection and transfer of novitiates, the erection of new provinces, the principal nominations, the retention of a local superior for longer than the usual term of office, the dismissal of a sister or novice, the deposition of a superior, mistress of novices or counsellor, the provision of a house for a purpose of forming a new house, for the appointment of a provincial, the nomination of a visitor not a member of the council, the choice of a meeting place of the general chapter, the change of residence of the superior general, the execution of all contracts, the auditing of accounts, all pecuniary engagements, the sale or mortgage of immovable property, and the sale of movable property of great value. For an election there must be a full meeting of the council, and provision must be made to replace any members who are prevented from attending. In case of a tie, the superior has a casting vote.

The secretary general keeps the minutes of proceedings, and has charge of the archives. The treasurer general administers the property of the whole congregation. The provinces and the houses have also their own property. The Holy See insists that the saves containing valuables shall have three locks, the keys of which shall be kept by the superior, the treasurer, and the other official of the chapter. After the administration the treasurer must be guided by the complicated rules of the recent instruction "Inter ea" of 30 July, 1909, which refer especially to pecuniary engagements. The consent of the Holy See is required before any liability can be incurred exceeding ten thousand francs, and in case of smaller liabilities than this but still of any considerable amount, the superiors must take the advice of their councils. A council should at once be appointed if there is none already existing (cf. “Periodica de Religionibus,” n. 331, vol. 5, 11 sqq). The bishop must test the vocation of postulants before they are admitted and before they are over chapters of election, permits or forbids collections from door to door; is responsible for the observance of partial enclosure, such as is compatible with the objects of the congregation. No house can be established without his consent. To him also belongs the supervision of the spiritual direction of the communities, and the appointment of the chaplains and confessors. The Holy See reserves to itself the vows, even temporary ones. The dismissal of a professed sister under perpetual vows must be ratified by the Holy See. The dismissal of a novice or of a professed sister under temporary vows is within the power of the general council, if justified by grave reasons; but this dismissal does not relieve from vows for which recourse must be had to the Holy See. The Holy See alone can authorize the suppression of houses, the erection or transfer of a novitiate, the erection of a province, the transfer of a mother-house, and any important alienations of property to the above ends.

The Holy See permits, though it does not make obligatory, the division of a community into choir sisters or teaching sisters, and lay sisters. Though not opposed to the formation of associations which help the work of the congregation and have a share in its merits, it is not favorable to the establishment of an independent religious order. Each period of temporary vows should precede the taking of perpetual vows. Such is the general law. At the expiration of the term, temporary vows must be renewed. The vow of poverty does not generally forbid the acquisition and retention of rights over property, but only its free use and disposal. A dovow is generally required, of which the community receives the income only, until the death of the sister, and the fruits of their labours belong entirely to the congregation.

The vow of chastity creates only a prohibitory impediment to marriage. The bishops generally regulate the confessions of the religious under simple vows, by the same rules as those of nuns in strict enclosure; but in public churches sisters may go to any approved confessor. In all that concerns communications and direction of conscience, the decretal “Quem ad modum” and “Sacra Triduina” apply to these congregations as well as to monasteries of nuns. These religious are not subject to the right of the order to be heard, but receive the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin and other prayers. They are bound to make a daily meditation of at least half an hour in the morning, sometimes of another half-hour in the evening, and an annual retreat of eight days.

Pious societies which can only be called congregations by a wide extension of the word, are those which have no perpetual vows, such as the Daughters of Charity, who are free for one day in each year, or those which, if they have perpetual vows, have no outward sign by which they can be recognized; this single fact is sufficient to deprive them of the character of religious congregations (see answer of 11 August, 1880, “De Religious Institutiis,” vol. 2, n. 13).

VI. DIOCESAN CONGREGATIONS.—For a long time the bishops had great latitude in approving new congregations, and gave canonical existence to various charitable institutions. In order to avoid abuses, especially invasions of jurisdiction, Pius IX in 1849, Motu Proprio “De Propicientis” of 16 July, 1866, required the previous authorization of the Sacred Congregation before the bishop could establish, or allow to be established any new diocesan institution; and the Sacred Congregation refuses to authorize any new creation, even temporary, of the title, habit, and work of the proposed community, and forbids that any substantial change should be made without its authority.

Notwithstanding that pontifical intervention, the congregation remains diocesan. The bishop approves the constitutions only in so far as they are in accordance with the rules approved by the Holy See. As it remains diocesan, we may add that the Roman distinctive rules do not affect it in any respect. Diocesan congregations have the bishop as their first superior. It is his duty to control admissions, authorize dismissals, and dispense from vows, except that one reserved to the Holy See, the absolute and perpetual vow of chastity. He must be careful not to infringe in any way on the rights of his congregation. Not only does he preside over elections but he confirms or annuls them, and may in case of necessity depose the superior, and make provision for filling the vacancy. These congregations are sometimes composed of houses independent of one another; this is frequently the case with Sisters Hospitals, and sometimes several houses and local superiors are grouped under one superior general. Some of the congregations are confined to one diocese, while others extend to several dioceses; in the latter case, each diocesan ordinary has under him the houses in his dioceses with power to authorize and suppress them. The diocesan congregation itself depends on the concurrence of the bishop of the diocese in which the dioceses any houses are situated; and this concurrence is necessary for its suppression. Such is the common law of the constitution “Condita”. Before it can spread into another diocese, a diocesan congregation must have the consent of the bishop to whom it is subject, and often an agreement with himself. In this way, the real superiority is reserved to the bishop of the diocese of origin. As to the laws by which they are governed, a great number of congregations, especially those devoted to the care of the sick in hospitals, follow the rule of St. Augustine and have special constitutions; others have given up such a plan and others again form communities of tertiarys. The curious institution of Beguines (q. v.) still flourishes in a few cities of Belgium.

Nuremberg (Nürnberg), second largest city in Bavaria, situated in a plain on both sides of the river Pegnitz. It was first mentioned as Nuremberg in a document issued by Emperor Henry III in a duel held in the town. The palace was reconstructed as a fortified castle between 1025 and 1650.
The population increased when Henry IV transferred (1062) from Furtth to Nuremberg the right to hold a fair in the town, for which Henry V granted it freedom from custom duties (1112). King Lothair (1112-1137) claimed Nuremberg as part of his empire, while the Hohenstaufen emperors were also interested. Henry VI and Frederick, claimed it as part of their inheritance under the Salic law. In 1130 the city surrendered to the emperor and the Guelph Henry. The latter possessed it until 1138, when it reverted to the empire. Conrad III liked to visit the flourishing city, and made it an asylum for the then persecuted Jews. Several diets took place in Nuremberg under Frederick Barbarossa, who built a splendid new imperial castle adjoining the old castle of the burggraves (Burggraf en). From the end of the eleventh century the city was independent of the burggraves, who, in the early times, in their capacity as imperial officials, exercised jurisdiction in all judicial and military matters and appropriated two-thirds of all moneys collected in criminal and civil cases. When the burggraves (at first descendants of the house of Raab in Lower Austria, and, when it became extinct in 1190, the house of Zollern) endeavoured to extend their private possessions at the expense of the empire, the emperors of the twelfth century took over the administration of the imperial possessions belonging to the bur g, and installed a castellan or overseer in the imperial castle. This castellan not only administered the imperial lands surrounding Nuremberg, but levied taxes and constituted the highest judicial court in matters relating to poaching and forestry; he also was the appointed protector of the various ecclesiastical establishments, churches, and monasteries, even of the Bishopric of Bamberg. These functions of this castellanship were transferred to the city during the last years of the fourteenth, and the first years of the fifteenth centuries. The strained relations between the burggraves and the castellan finally broke into open enmity, which greatly influenced the history of the city.

In 1219 Nuremberg became a free imperial city, when Frederick II presented it with a most important charter, freeing it from all authority excepting that of the emperor himself. The administration was entrusted to a council, presided over, since the middle of the thirteenth century, by the Reichsschultheiss. The "Schottenkollegium," who assisted this official in his judicial work, also sat in the council. The council became more and more independent, and in 1320 was invested by Louis the Bavarian with supreme jurisdiction. This conflicted with the rights of the Schultheiss (usually a knight), whose appointment, however, rested with the council after 1296. This accumulation of rights and privileges made the power of the council equal to that of the sovereign or territorial lords, while the acquisition of the imperial forest near Nuremberg had furnished a basis for future development. Until the middle of the thirteenth century, the Klein (little) or reigning council consisted of thirteen magistrates and thirteen councillors; towards the end of the century were added eight members of the property of the important Groase (great) council, and, since 1370, eight representatives of the artisans' associations. The members of the council were chosen by the people usually from the wealthier class; this custom led to the establishment of a circle of "eligibles," to which the artisan class was strongly opposed by an illegal element. With the increasing importance of handicraft a spirit of independence developed among the artisans, and they determined to have a voice in the government of the city. In 1349 the members of the trade unions successfully rebelled against the patricians. Their unions were then dissolved, and the oligarchic element remained in power while Nuremberg was a free city.

Ecclesiastically speaking, Nuremberg belonged first to the Bishopric of Eichstätt, and from 1015 to that of Bamberg. In place of the oldest chapel in Nuremberg, the Peterkapelle, a church was consecrated in 1070 to St. Sebalus; this was replaced by a new edifice in the thirteenth century. The second church in importance was the Lorenzkirche, built about 1278. There also arose the Gothic St. Jacob's Church (twelfth century), which was transferred to the Teutonic Knights in 1299; the Scots Abbey (1130); the monasteries and chapels of the Franciscans, 1227 (thirteenth century), the Augustinians (1218); the Dominicans (1217), the Carmelites (1555); the Carthusians (1382); the Order of Mary Magdalene (Riwermen) incorporated with the latter in 1399, and the cloister of St. Catherine, a society of nurses. The hospital of the Holy Ghost was founded 1334-39. At the beginning of the fourteenth century Nuremberg had become wonderfully developed. Charles IV conferred upon it the right to conclude alliances independently, thereby placing it upon a politically equal footing with the princes of the empire. The city protected itself from hostile attacks by a wall and successfully defended its extensive trade against the barons. Frequent fights took place with the burggraves without, however, inflicting lasting damage upon the city. After the castle had been destroyed by fire in 1230 during a feud between Count Frederick (since 1147 Margrave of Brandenburg) and the Duke of Bavaria-Ingolstadt, the ruins and the forest belonging to the castle were purchased by the city (1247), which thereby became master of all that lay within its boundaries. The imperial castle had been ceded to the city by Emperor Sigismund in 1422, on condition that the imperial suite of rooms should be reserved for the emperor. Through these and other acquisitions the city accumulated considerable territory. In 1331 the population was about 22,800 including 7,440 persons qualified to bear arms, 3,514 secular and regular priests, 1,414 Jews, and non-citizens. The Hussite wars, the plague of 1417, the fights with the burggraves (then also margraves of Brandenburg, Anspach, and Bayreuth, reduced it to 20,800 in 1450.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century the war of succession in Landshut brought new possessions to Nuremberg (the city of Duke Albert of Bavaria-Munich), so that it possessed more (25 sq. miles) than any imperial free city; it was called the Empire's Treasure Box on account of its political importance, its industrial power, and superior culture. It had now reached the pinnacle of its splendour. As an indication of its importance as an art and science centre during the fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, it records such names as Peter Vischer, Adam Kraft, Veit Stoss, Michael Wohlgemuth, Albert Dürer, Hans Sachs, Conrad Coles, Willibald and Chariitas Pirkheimer.

The unseated state of affairs in the first half of the sixteenth century, the revolution in commerce and trade due to the discovery of America and the circumnavigation of Africa, and the difficulties in trade caused by the territorial sovereignty were responsible for the decline of the importance and influence of the city. During the Thirty Years' War it did not always succeed in preserving its policy of neutrality. Frequent quartering of Imperial, Swedish and League soldiers, war-contributions, demands for arms, semi-compulsory presents to commanders for the protection of the city, and the cessation of trade, caused irreparable damage to the city. The population, which in 1620 had been over 45,000, sank to 25,000.

After the religious war Nuremberg remained aloof from the quarrels and affairs of the world at large; but contributions were demanded for the Austrian Succession and the Seven Years' War, the former amounting to six and a half million gulden. Restrictions of imports and exports deprived the city of many markets for its manufactures, especially in Austria, Prussia and Bavaria, and the eastern and northern countries of Europe. The Bavarian elector, Charles Theodore, appropriated part of the land which had been obtained in the war of succession in Landshut and which ever since had been claimed by Bavaria; Prussia also claimed part of the territory of Nuremberg. Realizing its weakness, the city asked to be incorporated in the Kingdom of Prussia, but Frederick William refused the request and in 1809, Nuremberg, together with the Principality of Bamberg, the Free City of Ratisbon, and all the cities and cities in the Rhenish Federation (Rhenish Federation) 12 July, 1806, the city was handed over to Bavaria 1521 Luther's creed was preached by some of the clergy, among whom was Andrew Osianider, preacher at St. Lorenzkirche; there was also a distinct leaning towards the new teaching among the members of the council. They prohibited processions, passion plays during the Easter tide, and other celebrations. After 1524 the possessions of the monasteries and clerical institutions were confiscated; in 1525 the council accepted Luther's religion; the Dominicans, Carmelites and Minorites were forbidden to preach or to hear confessions; a preacher was placed over convents and the reception of any more novices forbidden. About the middle of the sixteenth century the city had become almost Protestant; only the members of the Teutonic Knights remained faithful; they suffered many restrictions and the loss of their church. After the Diet of Augsburg, 1529, when most of the Protestant estates of the empire formed the League of Smalldorf, Nuremberg did not join. The Diet of Nuremberg, 1532, gave religious freedom at least for a time: Protestants were allowed to continue the innovations already introduced by them and all processes begun against them in the Imperial Chamber, on account of these innovations, were suspended, pending the settlement of the whole religious question by a great council to be called within the year. The aid against the Turks which the emperor and king desired was granted. By consent of the Lutherans the followers of Zwingli were exempted from the provisions of this peace. During this period Nuremberg remained on a neutral basis, so the emperor and yet to retain its whole creed of the Gospel; it therefore accepted the interim regulation. During the revolution of the princes against Charles V, in 1552, Nuremberg endeavoured to purchase its neutrality by the payment of 100,000 guldens; but Margaret, wife of Albrecht, one of the leaders of the revolt, attacked the city without declaring war and forced it to conclude a disadvantageous peace. At the Religious Peace of Augsburg the possessions of the Protestants were confirmed by the emperor, their religious privileges extended and their independence from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Bamberg affirmed while the secularizing of the possessions of the monasteries was approved.

Johann Müller (Regiomontanus), Hartmann Scheel, Martin Behaim and others.

In 1521 Luther's creed was preached by some of the clergy, among whom was Andrew Osianider, preacher at St. Lorenzkirche; there was also a distinct leaning towards the new teaching among the members of the council. They prohibited processions, passion plays during the Easter tide, and other celebrations. After 1524 the possessions of the monasteries and clerical institutions were confiscated; in 1525 the council accepted Luther's religion; the Dominicans, Carmelites and Minorites were forbidden to preach or to hear confessions; a preacher was placed over convents and the reception of any more novices forbidden. About the middle of the sixteenth century the city had become almost Protestant; only the members of the Teutonic Knights remained faithful; they suffered many restrictions and the loss of their church. After the Diet of Augsburg, 1529, when most of the Protestant estates of the empire formed the League of Smalldorf, Nuremberg did not join. At the Religious Peace of Augsburg the possessions of the Protestants were confirmed by the emperor, their religious privileges extended and their independence from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Bamberg affirmed while the secularizing of the possessions of the monasteries was approved.

The unseated state of affairs in the first half of the sixteenth century, the revolution in commerce and trade due to the discovery of America and the circumnavigation of Africa, and the difficulties in trade caused by the territorial sovereignty were responsible for the decline of the importance and influence of the city. During the Thirty Years' War it did not always succeed in preserving its policy of neutrality. Frequent quartering of Imperial, Swedish and League soldiers, war-contributions, demands for arms, semi-compulsory presents to commanders for the protection of the city, and the cessation of trade, caused irreparable damage to the city. The population, which in 1620 had been over 45,000, sank to 25,000.

After the religious war Nuremberg remained aloof from the quarrels and affairs of the world at large; but contributions were demanded for the Austrian Succession and the Seven Years' War, the former amounting to six and a half million gulden. Restrictions of imports and exports deprived the city of many markets for its manufactures, especially in Austria, Prussia and Bavaria, and the eastern and northern countries of Europe. The Bavarian elector, Charles Theodore, appropriated part of the land which had been obtained in the war of succession in Landshut and which ever since had been claimed by Bavaria; Prussia also claimed part of the territory of Nuremberg. Realizing its weakness, the city asked to be incorporated in the Kingdom of Prussia, but Frederick William refused the request and in 1809, Nuremberg, together with the Principality of Bamberg, the Free City of Ratisbon, and all the cities and cities in the Rhenish Federation (Rhenish Federation) 12 July, 1806, the city was handed over to Bavaria.
opened the way to great prosperity. In 1852 there were 53,638 inhabitants, 46,111 Protestants and 6,516 Catholics. Since that time it has become the most important industrial city of Bavaria and one of the most prosperous towns of southern Germany. In 1905 its population, including several incorporated suburbs, was 291,351—56,915 Catholics, 196,913 Protestants, and 37,523 Jews, and the present population is estimated at 349,000.

Nuremberg belongs to the Archdiocese of Bamberg and possesses notable churches. For want of means the building of churches could not keep pace with the growth of the community; this condition rendered difficult the work of ministry. The Catholic churches and cathedrals were built first, followed by the Protestants, who, with the Catholics in the city number over 90,000. The most beautiful church is the Liebfrauenkirche (Church of Our Dear Lady), built 1315-61 in Gothic style; it is one of the greatest ornaments of the city (Essenwein, "Die Liebfrauenkirche in Nürnberg", Nuremberg, 1881). Other churches in Nuremberg are the Schöner Brunnen, a mighty edifice, in antique style, begun in 1784, secularized in 1806, purchased by the Catholics in 1885 (Schröter, "Die Kirche der heiligen Elisabeth in Nürnberg", Nuremberg, 1903); the St. Klarakirche, a Gothic structure, built in 1339, turned over to the Catholics in 1857; the Herz-Jesu-kirche, a vast Gothic church in the style, erected 1598-1602; the Walpurgiskapelle in the castle, dating from the thirteenth century; the temporary structures: St. Joseph (1897-8); St. Anthony (1899-1900); St. Karl Borromäus (1903-4); and a new church at present being erected.

Nunzi, Diocese of (Nuscania), in the province of Avellino, Italy, suffragan of Salerno, dates from the eleventh century. Among its bishops were Guido (1001); St. Amatus (1167), author of a history of the Normans in Apulia and Calabria; Roger (1198), who restored the cathedral; Cardinal Pietro Paolo Parisio (1528), who presided at the Council of Trent; Francesco Arcedio (1639), a Theatine; Fulgenzio Arminio Monforte (1669), an Augustinian. In 1820 Montemartino was united to Nusco. St. John, a Benedictine (1081), was first Bishop of Montemartino; forty of his successors are known. Nusco has 19 parishes, with 38,300 inhabitants, and 19 religious houses.

Nussbaum, Johann Nepomuk von, German surgeon, b. at Munich 2 Sept., 1829; d. there 31 Oct., 1890. He made his studies in the University of Munich where he was a pupil of Thiersch and later the medical assistant of Von Rothmund. He received his doctor's degree in 1853, the subject of his dissertation being "Ueber Cornes Artificialis". The following four years he spent in foreign travel, studying surgery under Nélaton, Chassaignac, and Maisonneuve in Paris, Langenbeck in Berlin, and Textor in Würzburg. In 1857 he became a Privat-docent (with a thesis on the treatment of various conditions of the cornea). In 1860 he was appointed professor of surgery at the University of Munich which office he held for nearly thirty years. His lectures were noted for their practical character. He studied under Spencer Wells in England which enabled him to greatly the development of pelvic surgery. Later he learned antisepsis from Lister and was instrumental in introducing it into the surgery of Germany. His own work, "Leitfaden zur antiseptischen Wundbehandlung" (Hints for the antiseptic treatment of wounds), went through five editions and was translated into a number of foreign languages. Altogether his publications numbers almost 100, the best known of which deal with ovarotomy, the transplantation of bone, and the treatment of cancer. Among his disciples was the subsequent surgeon of Germany.

Nutter, John, Venerable. See Haydock, George, Venerable.

Nutter, Robert, Venerable, English martyr; b. at Burnley, Lancashire, c. 1550; executed at Lancaster 26 July, 1580. He entered Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1564 and 1565, duly and with his brother John, also a martyr (see Haydock, George), became a student of the English College, Reims. Having been ordained priest, 21 Dec., 1581, he returned to England. On 2 Feb., 1583-4 he was committed to the Tower, where he remained in the pit forty-seven days, wearing irons for forty-three days, and twice subjected to the tortures of "the scavenger's daughter". On 10 Nov., 1584, he was again consigned to the pit, where he remained until, on 21 Jan., 1584-5, he was, with twenty other priests and one layman, was shipped aboard the "Mary Martin" of Colchester, at Tower Wharf, Landing at Boulogne, 2 Feb., he revisited Reims in July, but, on 30 November, was again committed to prison in London, this time to Newgate, under the alias of Rowley. In 1587 he was removed to the Marshalsea, and thence, in 1589-90, was sent to Wisbech Castle, Cambridgeshire. There, in 1596, he was tried for a petition to Father Garnet in favor of having a Jesuit superior; but, on 8 Nov., 1598, he and his fellow martyr, Venerable Edward Thwing, with others, besought the pope to institute an arch-priest.

Venerable Edward Thwing was the second son of Thomas Thwing, of Hexthorpe, and Nancy Kellet, of York, his wife. He was at the English College, Reims, 12 July to 12 August, 1582; and 20 July, 1585, to 2 Sept., 1587, having spent the interval with the Jesuits at Pont-à-Mousson. On 2 Sept., 1587 he set out for Rome, returning to become a reader in Greek and Hebrew, and a professor of rhetoric and logic. He was ordained priest at Lyon in the following December. On 1 Nov., 1592, he went to Spa, suffering from ulcer in the knee. He returned to the English College, which had in the meantime been transferred from Reims to Douai, and went on the mission in 1597. He seems to have been immediately arrested and sent to Wisbech, whence, and Nutter and after, Lancashire, were arrested, May, 1599, tried at the next assizes and condemned for being priests. Both suffered on the same day.

John B. Waitewright.
Nuyens, Wilhelmus, historian, b. 18 August, 1823, at Avenhorn in Holland; d. 10 December, 1894, at Westwood near Horn. Having completed his Humanistie studies in Enkhuizen, he studied medicine at Utrecht, 1842, received the degree of M.D. in 1848, and began practising in Westwood. He devoted some of his spare time to literature and history, and he published, in 1856, a volume of poems entitled: "De laatste Dochter der Hogenatien," on subjects chiefly from the Middle Ages. Then came a series of historical works, first among which was "Het Katholieksms in betrekking met de beschaving van Europa" (Amsterdam, 1850-1857, in 2 volumes), a history of the influence of Catholicism upon the life and civilization of European nations. In several pamphlets and in that voluminous work, "Geschiedenis der Regering van Pius IX" (Amsterdam, 1882-63), he treated the Roman question of 1850. His chief work, "Geschiedenis der Nederlandse Beroerten in de XVIe eeuw" (Amsterdam, 1865-70, in 8 parts), a history of the revolutionary wars of the Netherlands from 1559 to 1578, discloses no new sources, but examines facts with sagacity and impartiality, and arranges them with skill, thereby showing to the Catholics what rights they were entitled to in the State. New editions appeared in 1886 and 1904. Somewhat as a sequel he wrote: "Geschiedenis der kerkelijke en politieke geschieden in de republiek der zeven vereenigde provincien (1508-1625)" (Amsterdam, 1886-87 in two parts). Intended for popular reading are: "Algemeen Geschiedenis des Nederlandse Volks van de Vroegste Tijden tot op onze dagen" (Amsterdam, 1871-82, in 20 parts; new edition, 1886-98, in 21 parts); "Geschiedenis van het Nederlandse Volk van 1515 tot op onze dagen" (Amsterdam, 1883-86, in 4 parts; 2nd edition 1898); and the widely read: "Vaderlandsche Geschiedenis voor de jeugd" (Amsterdam, 1870; 25th edition, 1905, by G. F. J. Douven). He published a number of pamphlets and articles in periodicals on topics of the times, especially in "Onze Wachter," edited by him from 1871 to 1874 in collaboration with Schaeppmann. He was an energetic defender of the rights and the privileges of Catholics, and one of the first to champion the freedom of the Catholic Church in the Netherlands. Catholics erected a monument to him in the church at Westwood and set aside the surplus of the money contributed as a perpetual fund, called "Nuyensfonds," to aid the work of Catholic historians of the Netherlands.

Nyassa. Vicariate Apostolic of, in Central Africa, bounded north by the Anglo-German frontier, east by Lake Nyassa, south by the Anglo-Portuguese frontier, west by a line running northward past Lake Bangwelo. It is under the care of the White Fathers and was founded by Father Lechaptois in June, 1889, at Mponda, Nyassaland. This region passing under British control, the missionaries moved to Mambwe between Nyassa and Tanganika in 1891, but, finding the region desolated by the slave-hunters, they proceeded to Ubenza, a high plateau to the west where the Congo rises. In December, 1894, Fr. Van Oost settled at Kiambi in Panda, with permission of the chief Mkaca, but was expelled by Mkaca's suzerain, Kiti-Mkula. Fr. Dupont, however, succeeded in founding a permanent station there in July, 1895. The natives are well-built and warlike; they are being taught agriculture by the fathers. On 13 February, 1897, the mission was made a vicariate Apostolic, Fr. Joseph Dupont (b. at Geste, Maine et Loire, France, in 1855) being appointed superior and consecrated titular Bishop of Tibarti. When King Momamba was dying in 1898, he asked Mgr Dupont to become king; the bishop accepted the post temporarily to prevent the customary hecatomb following the sovereign's death. In 1894 the south-eastern part of the vicariate was formed into the Prefecture Apostolic of Shiré. The population is about 1,000,000, speaking Kibemba and Kinyassa; catechumens, 30,000; baptized, 2000; missionary priests, 50; Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa, 8; catechists, 127; churches, 9; chapels, 25; stations, 6 in Ubenza and 3 in Angoniland; schools, 34; orphanages, 4.

Nyitra. See Neutra, Diocese of.

Nyssa, a titular see in Cappadocia Prima, suffragan of Cesarea. It is mentioned by Proclus (V, viii, vili), in the "Itinerarium Antonii," in the "Synedemus" of Hierocles (499), and the Greek "Notitiae episcopatum," but its history and exact location are unknown. It should be sought on the south bank of the Kizil Irmak (ancient Halys), ten miles above Kessik Keupru (Ramsay, "Asia Minor," 237, 305). Texier ("Asie Mineure," Paris, 1862, 538) wrongly identifies it with New Shor. Hamilton (Researches, II, 265) speaks of a modern village called Nirse, or Nissa, but the maps show no place of this name. Le Quen (Oriens Christ., I, 691) names ten bishops of Nyssa. The last qualified as metropolitan in the sixteenth century, is certainly only a titular bishop. To the list may be added Ioannes, who lived in 1570 (Milchisius and Muller, "Acta patriarchatus Constantinopolitan", Vienna, 1860, I, 537). About this time Nyssa must have disappeared; but its name still recalls the memory of the glorious Doctor, St. Gregory.

Oakeley, Frederick, b. 5 Sept., 1802, at Shrewsbury; d. 30 Jan., 1880, at Islington, the youngest son of Sir Charles Oakeley, Bart, he graduated at Christchurch in 1824, and three years later was elected Fellow of Balliol, where he afterwards became the close friend of W. G. Ward, with whom he joined the Tractarian party. In 1839 he became incumbent of Margaret Chapel, the predecessor of the well-known All Saints, Margaret Street, London, soon noted for its high church services; he was a frequent visitor to Oxford, and stood by Ward at the time of his condemnation in 1845. He defended Tract XC and in consequence of the movement; John's, 1842); after a short course of theology at St. Edmund's College, he was ordained by Dr. Wiseman in 1847. The next thirty-three years were spent as a canon of the Westminster Chapter and masqueary vicar of the church of St. John's, Islington. Short-sighted, small of stature, lame, he exercised a wide influence by his personality, his writings, and the charm of his conversation. His chief works are: Before his conversion: "Aristotelian and Platonic Ethics" (Oxford, 1837); "Whitehall Sermons" (Oxford, 1837-9); "The Subject of Tract XC examined" (London, 1841); "Homilies" (London, 1812); "Life of St. Augustine" (Newman's series, Toovey, 1844). After his conversion: "Practical Sermons" (London, 1818); "The Order and Ceremonial of the Mass" (London, 1818); "The Catholic Florist" (London, 1851); "The Church of the Bible" (London, 1855); "Lyra Liturgica" (London, 1855); "Historical Notes on the Tractarian Movement" (London, 1865); "The Priest on the Mission" (London, 1874). Oakeley, Reminiscences (1824); Brown's Annals of Tractarian Movement; Ordinary notices in Tablet, Weekly Register.

BERNARD WARD.

O Antiphons (Roman Breviary: Antiphora maiores, "greater antiphons"); the seven antiphons to the Magnificat in the ferial Office of the seven days preceding the vigil of Christmas; so called because at the beginning of each there is the opening word "O": Their opening words are: (1) "O Sapiens", (2) "O Adonai", (3) "O Radix Jesse", (4) "O Clavis David", (5) "O Oriens", (6) "O Rex Gentium", (7) "O Emmanuel". Addressed to Christ under one or other of His Scriptural titles, they conclude with a distinct petition to the coming Lord (e.g.: "O Emmanuel, come and teach us the way of prudence"). "O Adonai... come and redeem us by thy stretched arm"; "O Key of David... come and lead from prison the captive sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death", etc.). Coined in a poetic and Scriptural phraseology they constitute a notable feature of the Hymnody of the Church. Three of these antiphons are found in the Roman Breviary; but other medieval Breviaries added (1) "O virgo virginum quomodo fiet", etc., still retained in the Roman Breviary as the proper antiphon to the Magnificat in the second Vespers of the feast Expectation Partus B.M.V. (18 December), the prayer of this feast being followed by the antiphon "O Adonai" as a commemoration of the ferial office of 18 December; (2) "O Gabriel, munitus ecliporum", subsequently replaced, almost universally, by the thirteenth-century antiphon "O Thome Didyme", for the feast of the Apostle St. Thomas (21 December). Some medieval churches had twelve greater antiphons, adding to the above (1) "O Rex Pacis", (2) "O Mundi Domina", (3) "O Hierusalem", addressed respectively to Our Lord, Our Lady, and Jerusalem. Guéranger gives the Latin text of all of these (except the "O Mundi Domina"), with verbal prose translation ("Liturgy of Year A". Adm. Dublin, 1870, 508-531), besides much devotional and some historical comment. The Parisian Rite added two antiphons ("O sanete sanctorum" and "O pastor Israel") to the seven of the Roman Rite and began the recitation of the nine on the 13th of December. Prose renderings of the Roman Breviary O's will be found in the Marquesse of But's translation of the Roman Breviary (winter volume). Guéranger remarks that the antiphons were appropriately assigned to the Vesper Hour because the Saviour came in the evening hour of the world (vergente mundi resipere, as the Church sings) and also because, in the Magnificat to honour her through whom He came. By exception to the rule for ferial days, the seven antiphons are sung in full both before and after the canticle, "In some Churches it was formerly the practice to sing them three: that is, before the Canticule, before the Gloria Patri, and after the Sicut Orant". There are several translations into English verse, both by Catholics and non-Catholics, the most recent being that in Dom Gregory Ould's "Book of Hymns" (Edinburgh, 1910, no. 5). By R. Cooke-Ley, in seven quatrains together with a refrain-quatrains giving a translation of the verse and response ("Rorate", etc.). The seven antiphons have been found in MSS. of the eleventh century. A paraphrase of some of these is found in the hymn "Veni, veni, Emmanuel" given by Daniel in his "Thesaurus Hymnologicus" (11, 330) and translated by Neale in his "Medieval Hymns and Sequences" (3rd ed., London, p. 171) and others, and used in various hymn-books (Latin text in "The Roman Hymnal", New York, 1884, 139). Neale supposed the hymn to be of the twelfth century, but it has not been traced back further than the first decade of the eighteenth century. For first lines of translations, see "Julian's Dict. of Hymnology" (2nd ed., London, 1910, 231; 1541; 1721). For the Scriptural sources of the antiphons, see John, Marques of Bute, "Roman Breviary", Winter, 203; also Marbach's "Carmina Scripturama" etc. (Strasbourg, 1907) under "O" in the Index Alphabeticus.

H. T. HENRY.

Oates's Plot, a term conventionally used to designate a "Popish Plot", which, during the reign of Charles II of England, Titus Oates pretended to have discovered. Oates was b. at Ockham, Rutlandshire, in 1649. His father, Samuel Oates, is said to have been Oates's Plot

A ribbon-weaver in Norfolk who, having taken a degree at Cambridge, afterwards became a minister of the Established Church.

Titus Oates began his career at Merchant Taylors' School, of which he was sixteen, and was expelled two years later and went to school at Sedlescombe, near Hastings, whence he passed to Cambridge in 1657, being entered as a sizar in Gonville and Caius College, whence he afterwards migrated to St. John's. His reputation at Caius, according to a fellow student, was that of "the most silent dunciæ, incapable of improvement"; at St. John's, Dr. Watson wrote of him: "He was a great dunciæ, ran into debt, and, being sent away for want of money, never took a degree."

"Removing from there", says Eichard, "he slipped into Orders", and was preferred to the vicarage of Bolling in Kent, on 7 March, 1675. At this time or earlier, according to the evidence of Sir Denis Ashburnham at Father Ireland's trial, "he did swear the Peace against a man" and was forsworn, but they did not proceed upon the indictment. Next year he left Bolling, with a licence for non-residence and a reputation for dishonesty, to act as curate to his father at Hastings. There father and son conspired to bring against Wm. Parker, the schoolmaster, an abominable charge so manifestly trumped up that Samuel was ejected from his living, while Titus, charged with perjury, was sent to prison at Dover to await trial. Having broken jail and escaped to London, unpursued, his son applied to Cuius on board a king's ship sailing for Tangier, but within twelve months was expelled from the Navy.

In August, 1676, he was frequency a club which met at the Pheasant Inn, in Fuller's Rents, and there, for the first time, he met Catholics. His admittance into the Duke of Norfolk's household, as Protestant chaplain, followed almost immediately. On Ash Wenesday, 1677, he was received into the Catholic Church. The Jesuit Father Hutchinson (alias Berry) was persuaded to welcome him as a repentant prodigal and Father Strange, the provincial, to give him a trial in the English College at Valladolid. Five months later, Oates was expelled from the Spanish college and, on 30 Oct., 1677, was sent back to London. In spite of his disgrace, the Jesuit provincial was persuaded to give him a second trial, and on 10 Dec. he was admitted into the seminary at St. Omers. He remained there as "a younger student" till 23 June, 1678. After his admission in Company, he met Tonge, probably an old acquaintance, and conceived and concocted the story of the "Popish Plot".

Isael Tonge was, as Eichard describes him, "a city man, a dike of letters, and of a prolific head, fill'd with all the Romish plots and conspiracies since the Reformation, gained upon him with a considerable likelihood that he not only suggested the idea of the plot to Oates by his talk, but actually cooperated in its invention. At Stafford's trial Oates declared that he never was but a sham Catholic. If this be true, we may accept Eichard's assertion as proved, he having urged an appellation of Oates to simulate himself among the Papists to get particular acquaintance with them". Moreover, it is credibly reported that, at a great supper given in the city by Alderman Wilcox in honour of Oates, when Tonge was present, the latter's jealousy led to a verbal quarrel between the two informers. Tonge plainly told Oates that "he knew nothing of the plot, but what he learnt from him". Tonge may or may not have helped Oates in the manufacture of his wares; but he undoubtedly enabled him to bring them to market and dispose of them to advantage. With the help of Kitely, he succeeded in bringing the plot before the careless and sceptical notice of King Charles.

Oates' depositions, as they may be read in his "True and Exact Narrative of the Horrid Plot and Conspicacy of the Popish Party against the Life of His Sacred Majesty, the Government and the Protestant Religion, etc., published by the Order of the Right Honorable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament Assembled", were ill-written, disjointed libels, hardly worth notice but for the frenzied anger they aroused. The chief items tell of a design to assassinate the king, or rather a complication of plots to do away with "18" or "the Black Bastard"—His Majesty's supposed designation and the complicated plots. Pickering, a Benedictine lay brother, and Grove (Honest William), a Jesuit servant, are told off to shoot him, with "jointed carbines" and silver bullets, in consideration of £1,500 to be paid to Grove and 30,000 Masses to be said for Pickering's soul. To make more certain of the business, the king is to be poisoned by Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, at a cost of £15,000. Furthermore he is to be stabbed by Anderton and Coniers, Benedictine monks. All these methods failing, there are in the background four Irish ruffians, hired by Dr. Fogarty, who "were to mind the King's Postures at Windsor" and have one pound down and £50 afterwards in full discharge of their expenses. There is some frivolous talk of other assassinations,—of the removal of the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Ormonde, Herbert, Lord Bishop of Hereford and some lesser fry. And Oates himself is offered and actually accepts £50 to do away with the "wretch" who had basely put out the Jesuits' morals in English".

Summing up the plot with the help of someone more scholarly than himself, Oates makes the following declaration: "The General Design of the Pope, Society of Jesus, and their Confederates in this Plot, is, the Reformation, that is, in their sense, the Reduction of Great Britain and Ireland, and all His Majesties Dominions by the Sword (all other ways and means being judged by them ineffectual) to the Romish Religion and Obedience. To effect this design; 1. The Pope hath entitled himself to the Kingdomes of England and Ireland. 2. Sent his Legate, the Bishop of Casal in Italy into Ireland to declare his Title, and take possession of that Kingdom. 3. He hath appointed Cardinal Howard his Legat for England to the same purpose. 4. He hath given Commission to the General of the Jesuits, and by him to White, their Provincial in England, to issue, and they have issued out, and Ordered in Commission, from thence, the General of the Jesuits, Generals, etc., namely, the General of the Jesuits hath sent Commissions from Rome to Langborn their Advocate General for the Superior Officers; And White hath given Commissions here in England to Colonels, and inferior Officers. 5. He hath by a Consult of the Jesuits at Rome, ordered all his subjects to be put to death, and condemned His Majesty, and ordered Him to be assassinated, etc. 6. He hath Ordered, That in case the Duke of York will not accept these Crowns as forfeited by his Brother unto the Pope, as of his Gift, and settle such Prelates and Dignitaries in the Church, and such Generals in the Army; or, in case the Duke of York refuses, he shall give notice of it to the Protestant Religion, and in order thereto ex post facto, consent to the assassination of the King his Brother, Murder of his Protestant Subjects, firing of his Towns, etc., by pardoning the Assassins, Murderers and Insurgents, that then he be also poisoned or destroyed, after they have for some time abused His Name and Title to strengthen their Plot, weakened and divided the Kingdomes of England, Scotland, and Ireland thereby in Civil Wars and Rebellions as in His Father's Time, to make way for the French to seize these Kingdomes, and totally ruin their Infantry and French Navy".

Besides this Papal, there appears also another French plot, or correspondence (an afterthought, suggested to Oates by the discovery of Coleman's letters), carried on by Sir Ellis Layton, Mr. Coleman and others. Under ordinary circumstances so flimsy a fabric would have been brought to the ground by the first breath of criticism. But it was taken up by the Whig Party and made into what Echard calls “a political contrivance”. Shaftesbury, their leader, used it for all its worth. It was quite commonly called “the Popish Plot” by Whigs, and Whitehall itself was never so much conjured, as he had a hand in constructing the plot or not, very much of the blame of its consequences must rest upon the use he made of it. Chieflly by the influence and machinations of Shaftesbury and his party, Parliament was invited to declare that “there hath been and still is a daurnable and hellish Plot, contrived and carried on by a rogue (Dec. 19) and murdering the King and for subverting the government and rooting out and destroying the Protestant Religion.” Many who, with Elliot, thought Oates’s stories of the “40,000 Black-bills, the Army of Spanish Pilgrims and Military commissions from General D’Olyra (S. J.) so monstrously ridiculous that they offer an intolerable affront to the understanding of any man who has but a very indifferent account of the affairs of Europe”, nevertheless thought also that, “because His majesty and council have declar’d there is a Popish Plot, therefore they have reason to believe he was popish.”

Oates had now become the most popular man in the country and acclaimed himself as “the Saviour of the Nation”. He assumed the title of “Doctor”, professing to have received the degree at Salamanca, a city it is certain he never visited; put on episcopal attire; was lodged at Whitehall; went about with a body-guard; was received by the prime minister at table with peers; and, though stubbed by the King, was solemnly thanked by Parliament, which granted him a salary of £12 a week for diet and maintenance, occasional gifts of £50 or so, and drafts on the Treasury to meet his bills. Yet, Oates would have forsworn himself to little purpose but for the mysterious death of Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Oates’s depositions had been sworn. The Whig Party put the blame of this crime—if murder it was—upon the Catholics. Godfrey had been a friend to Catholics rather than an enemy, and had made use of the information received from Oates to do them a service; no good could come to them, and no harm to their enemies, by robbing the magistrate of the copy of Oates’s deposition which he retained. Moreover, both his pockets and his house were undisturbed by the supposed assassins. Nevertheless the unanimous verdict was murder, the murder of a good Protestant and a man who had to do with the “the Capital and the whole nation”, says Macaulay, “went mad with hatred and fear. The penal laws, which had begun to lose something of their edge, were sharpened anew. Everywhere justices were busied in searching houses and seizing papers. All the gaols were filled with Papists. London had the aspect of a city in a state of siege. The train bands were under arms all night. Preparations were made for barricking the great thoroughfares. Patrols marched up and down the streets. Cannon were planted round Whitehall. No citizen thought himself safe unless he carried under his coat a small flail loaded with lead to train the Popish assassins.”

For awhile, every word that Oates said was believed. The courts of law, before which the arrested Catholics were brought, were blind and deaf to his shufflings and contradictions and lies. Other disreputable witnesses were picked up in the gutter or prison and sat at table with him, and were hired handsomely for bringing additional perjuries to corroborate those of their chief. The lord chief justice on the Bench would listen to nothing which discredited the king’s witnesses; and although, in trials where the prisoners were denied counsel, he himself should, by ancient custom, have looked to their interests, he exerted the full authority of the Court to bring about their condemnation. Sixteen innocent men were executed in direct connexion with the Popish Plot, and eight others were brought to the scaffold as priests in the persecution of Catholics which followed from it. The names of those executed for the plot are: in 1678 Edward Coleman (Dec. 3); in 1679, John Greenhalgh (May 21); John George (Jan. 24); Robert Green, Lawrence Hill (Feb. 21); Henry Jones (Feb. 28); Thomas Pickering, O.S.B. (May 14); Richard Langhorn (June 14); John Gavan, S.J., William Harcourt, S.J., Anthony Turner, S.J., Thomas Whitebread, S.J., John Fenwick, S.J. (June 20); in 1680, Thomas Thwing (Oct. 29), William Howard, Vissount Harcourt (Dec. 1). In 1681, Oliver Plunket, Archbiscop of Armagh (July 1). Those executed as priests were: in 1679, William Plessington (July 19), Philip Evans, John Lloyd (July 22), Nicholas Postgate (Aug. 7), Charles Mahony (Aug. 12), John Wall (Francis Johnson), O.S.F., John Kemble (Aug. 22), Charles Baker (David Lewis), S.J. (Aug. 27).

It remains to be said about "the Popish Plot" that, since the day when its inventor was discredited, no historian of any consequence has professed to believe in it. A few vaguely assert that there must have been a plot of some sort. But no particle of evidence has ever been discovered to corroborate or even the possibility of the allegations. A contemporary Protestant historian says: "After the costest and strictest examinations, and after a full length of time, the government could find very little foundation to support so vast a fabric, besides down-right swearing and assurances: not a gun, sword or Nag; nor a flaw of powder or a dark lanthorn, to effect this villainy; and executing Coleman’s writings, not one scrap of an original letter or commission, among the great numbers alleged, to uphold the reputation of the discoverers." Since then the public and private archives of Europe have been liberally thrown open to students, and the most of them diligently examined; yet, as Mr. Marks, a Protestant, wrote a few years ago: "Through all the troublous times when belief in the Popish Plot raged, one searches in vain for one act of violence on the part of Catholics. After the lapse of two hundred years, no single document has come to light establishing in any one particular any single article of the eighty-one." In January, 1679, Oates, whose reputation was already declining, together with his partner, Bedloe, laid an indictment before the Privy Council in thirteen articles, against Chief Justice Scroggs, because of the part he took in the acquittal of Wakeman, Markham, Brome, and Corners; and, at the same year, the Rev. Adam Elliott advertised £200 for gold or silver that "Oates was a perjur’d Rogue, and the Jesuits who suffered, justly died Martyrs." But in August, 1681, Israel Backhouse, master of Wolverhampton Grammar School, when charged with a similar libel was acquitted. In the same year, Oates was thrust out of Whitehall, and next year (Jan., 1682) Elliot prosecuted him successfully for perjury. In April, 1682, his pension was reduced to £2 a week. In June of that year he was afraid to come forward as a witness against Kearney, one of the four supposed Irish ruffians denounced by him in his depositions. Then, while King Charles was still living, he vainly presented petitions to the king and to Sir Leoline Jenkins against the plain speaking of Sir Roger L’Estrange, and two months later (10 May), he was himself committed to prison for saying the Duke of York a traitor. On 18 June, he was fined by Judge Jeffreys £500,000 for seditiam and extortion. The next 29 May, he was called to the bar, tried for perjury, and condemned to be whipped, degraded, and pilloried, and imprisoned for life. Jeffreys said of him: "He has deserved more punishment than the laws of the land can inflict." When William of Orange came to the throne, Oates left prison and entered an unsuccessful appeal in the House of Lords against his sentence. Later, he obtained a royal pardon and a pension, which was withdrawn in 1693 at the instance of Queen Mary, whose father, James II, he had scurrilously attacked. After Mary's death, he was granted from the Treasury £500 to pay his debts and £300 per annum during the life-time of himself and his wife. In 1699 he was taken up by a Jacobite tory and led to a penal conviction, this time for "a discretable intrigue for wringing a legacy from a devotee". In 1691 he attempted another fraudulent plot, but it came to nothing. He died in Axe Yard, on 12 July, 1705.

Besides the "Narrative of the Hon'd Plot and Conspiracy of the Catholic Party," (London, 1679), Oates wrote "The Cabinet of Jesuits' secrets opened" (said to be translated from the Italian), "issued and completed by a gentleman of Quality" (London, 1679), "The Pope's Warehouse; or the Merchandise of the Whore of Rome" (London, 1679), dedicated to the Earl of Shaftesbury; "The Witch of Endor; or the witchcrafts of the Roman Jezebel, in which you have an account of the Exorcisms or conjurations of the Papists", etc. (London, 1679); "Everard Bacon, or the Picture of the late King James drawn to the Life" (Part I, London, 1686; Parts II, III, and IV, 1687).

Oaths.—I. NOTION AND CONDITIONS.—An oath is an invocatio to God to witness the truth of a statement. It may be express and direct, as when one swears by God Himself; or implicit and tacit, as when we swear by creatures, since they bear a special relation to the Creator and manifest His majesty and the sublimity of the oath. A special oath may be made either by making an execratory oath, or before the throne of God (Matt., v. 31), by the Holy Cross, or by the Gospels. Impractically oaths are also tacit (see below). To have an oath in foro interno, there must be the intention, at least virtual, of invoking the testimony of God, and a word or sign by which the intention is manifested. Oaths may be: (1) assertory—or affirmative—if we call God to witness the assertion of a past or present fact; promissory, if we call Him to witness a resolution which we bind ourselves to execute, or a vow made to Him, or an agreement entered into with our neighbour, or a vow made to God in favour of a third party; every promise and every resolution of the soul may be thus made an oath (see below). A promissory oath accompanied by a threat against a third party is said to be comminatory; (2) contestatory—or simple—if there is a mere invocation of the Divine testimony; impracticatory or exeratory—as in the formula "So help me God!"; if at the same time we call upon God as a judge and avenger of perjury, offering Him our property and especially our life and eternal salvation, or those of our friends, as a pledge of our sincerity. Thus the expression: "Upon my soul", often used without any intention of swearing, may be either contestatory—
the soul being in a special manner the image of God; or exeratory—if we wish to call Him to witness our own personal Divine punishment, either temporal or eternal, in case we be wanting in sincerity; (3) private, if used be-	ween private individuals; public, if exacted by public authorities; public oaths are divided into: (a) doctrinal, by which one declares that he holds a given doctrine, or promises to be faithful to the same, and to defend a given doctrine in the future; (b) political, which have as their object the exercise of any authority whatever, or submission to such an authority or laws; (c) judicial, which are taken in courts of justice either by the parties to the suit or the witnesses thereof.

II. LAWLESSNESS AND CONDITIONS.—An oath is licit, and an act of virtue, under certain conditions. It is, in effect, an act of hommage rendered by the creature to the wisdom and omnipotence of the Creator—
it is therefore an act of the virtue of religion; moreover, it is an excellent way of affording men security in their mutual intercourse. It is justified in the Old and New Testament; the faithful and the Church from apostolic times to the present day have used oaths; and canonical legislation and doctrinal decrees have affirmed their lawfulness. Improper use is often made of oaths, and the habit of swearing may easily lead to abuses and even to perjury. In conselling men "not to swear at all" (Matt., v. 31) Christ meant, not the Fathuer and the Holy Ghost; but also a promise, so truthful that men could believe them without need of oath to confirm what they say. He did not forbid the use of oaths under proper conditions, when necessary to satisfy others of our truthfulness. These conditions are (Jer., iv. 2): (1) Judgment, or careful and reverent consideration of the necessity or utility of the oath; for it would be showing a want of the respect due to God, to invoke Him as witness in trivial matters; on the other hand, it would be wrong to require a grave or extreme necessity. To swear without a sufficient reason, being an idle use of God's name, is verat sin; (2) truth, for what we affirm should be in conformity with the truth. An assertory oath, or an assertory oath, our affirmation must be truthful, and in a promissory oath we must have the intention of doing what we are promising. To swear falsely constitutes the sin of perjury, always mortal in its nature; for it is an insult to the Divine Truth to call God in witness to a lie; besides, such an act is likely to do injury to the common good; see the propositions condemned by Innocent XI. prop. xxiv; (3) justice requiring: (a) in the case of an assertory oath, that it be lawful to make the affirmation which one wishes to corroborate; failure to observe this condition is a sin of perjury, for which the delinquent may be sentenced. (b) if one once has sworn an oath the delinquent must fulfill it; it is a grievous sin, if one emits an oath as the means and instrument of sin, at least of mortal sin, for example, to make a person believe a grave detraction; (b) in the case of a promissory oath, justice requires that one be able to assume hitley the obligation of doing the thing promised. It is a mortal sin to promise an oath to do a grievously illicit thing; and it is, in the opinion of St. Alphonsus Liguori, a mortal sin to swear to do a thing which is illicit though not grievously so.

III. OBLIGATION ARISING FROM A PROMISSORY OATH.—In a promissory oath, we call on God not only as witness of our desire to fulfill the promise we make, but also as a guarantee and pledge for its future execution; for at the proper moment He will require us, under pain of sin against the virtue of religion, to do what we have promised in His presence; whence it follows that it is a sin against religion not to perform what we can, what we promised under oath: a mortal sin if the matter is grave; a venial sin (according to the more common and more probable opinion), if the matter is not grave. Certain conditions are requisite before a promissory oath entails the obligation of fulfilling it, notably the intention of swearing and of binding oneself, full deliberation, the lawfulness of performing the promise, and the impossibility of execuiing it, etc. Several causes may put an end to this obligation: intrinsic causes, such as a notable change occurring after the taking of the oath, the cessation of the final cause of the oath; or extrinsic causes, such as annulment, dispensation, commutation, or counsel, that one be intrusted to a competent authority, a release, express or tacit, either by the person in whose favour the obligation was undertaken, or by a competent authority to whom the beneficiary is subject.

Oaths, English Post-Reformation. The English Reformation having been imposed by the Crown, it was natural that submission to the essential points of its formularies should have been exacted with some solemnity, by oath, test, or formal declaration, and that these should cluster with the varying moods of those who dominated in the State.

1.—Oath of Royal Supremacy. This oath was imposed in March 1534 (26 Henry VIII, c. 1). The title "Supreme Head" had first been introduced by Henry VIII into a decree of convocation, 11 February, 1531; and had been strenuously resisted by the clergy.

Though it did not as yet have any religious significance, and might be a matter of compliment only, it might, they feared, receive another interpretation later. But acting under the advice of Fisher, Warham, and others, whose orthodoxy is above suspicion, they submitted after a difficulty to the "pope's Dictiet". Two years later a change had taken place, which had previously seemed inconceivable. The King had actually broken with the pope, and Parliament had enacted that the King should be "taken, accepted, and reputed the only supreme head on Earth of the church of England, by every one of his subjects, in all matters of the church and religion", for the time being laid down in the Act, and great differences seem to have prevailed in practice. Many long "acknowledgments of supremacy" are extant (Camm, "English Martyrs", i, 101) but it would seem that most people were only asked to swear to the Supremacy, that is to the King's marriage with Anne Boleyn, which the pope condemned, and which therefore involved the supremacy, though the form of the Oath of Supremacy preserved in The Lords' Journals, refers to the supremacy with insidious lightness. We do not know what its form was, when Fisher and More refused to sign it. They were ready to accept the supremacy of Anne Boleyn's children, but refused the supremacy (Bridge-ett, infra 264 sq).

The Act of Supremacy was repealed by Queen Mary (1 Ph. and M. c. 8) and revived by Elizabeth (1 Eliz. c. 1). The formula then adopted read: "1. A. B., do utterly and entirely in my conscience confess, and declare, that the Queen is the only Supreme Governor of the Realm ... as well as all Spiritual or Ecclesiastical things or causes as Temporal, &c. &c. &c. So help me God." This was not to be proposed at once to every one; but was to be taken by the clergy, and by all holding office under the Crown; by others, when asked. This moderation in exacting the oath helped to prevent an outcry against it, and enabled the Government to deal with the recalcitrant in detail. Many years elapsed, before, indeed, it was imposed on the graduates of the universities. The last laws passed by Elizabeth against Catholics (1592-3) enjoined a new test for Recusants. Elizabeth (1) A confession of "guerresious offense against God in contending her Majesty's Government"; (2) Royal Supremacy; (3) A clause against dispensations and dissolutions, perhaps the first of its sort in oaths of this class. The success of Elizabeth's "settlement of religion", had been really the conditional subscription with the papacy already made by Puritans, and they were not in love with the supremacy, or unaware that it was unpopular and tyrannical.

In order to excise their persecutions they therefore preferred (especially after the excommunication of the queen) to make an informal one by asking the sworn oaths, and then afterwards fight the pope, if he sent an army to restore Catholicism. The Catholics called this the "bloody question". There was no law to enforce an answer, there was no specific penalty for refusal. But those who refused to answer, were deemed as traitors, and then proceeded against to the uttermost by other persecuting laws. Those who in their answers showed any loyalty to the Holy See were in the same plight, a mark for persecution till they bent or broke. But those who answered disrespectfully, were treated less cruelly.

Towards the end of Elizabeth's reign, a split began in the priests who had joined in the well-known Peelers. An appeal against the archbishop Blackwell had adhered, and presented to Elizabeth a "Protestation of Allegiance" (Tierney-Dodd, infra, iii. Ap. 188). Declarations of loyalty there had been before in plenty: those made by the martyrs being often extraordinarily touching. But the signatures of 1663, perhaps stimulated by Caroline ideas, for the protestation was drawn up in Paris, besides protesting against their loyalty, went on to withhold from the pope any possible exercise of the deposing power. Before this Catholic loyalists had only denied the validity of the deposition pronounced by Pius V. Several reasons seemed to justify this protestation, at the time it was made (see Bishop, Williams), though unfortunate developments followed later.

II.—Oath of Allegiance of James I (1608) also called the Oath of Obedience. After the Gunpowder Plot (q. v.) a systematic effort was made to persecute Catholic exiles from the cradle to the grave, by penalizing Catholic baptisms, marriages, burials, as well as education, acquisition of property, &c. An attempt was also made to divide and disgrace Catholics in the matter of allegiance. It was known, from the "Protestation", that there were differences of opinion on the subject of the pope's deposing power, and an oath of allegiance was drafted to make capital out of those differences. (For the authorship of the formula, see Thurston infra, and Tierney-Dodd, iv, 71). The more important clauses are the following:—1. A. B., do truly and sincerely acknowledge, &c. that our sovereign lord, King James, is lawful and rightful King &c. and the pope neither of himself nor by any authority of Church or See of Rome, or by any other means with any other, has any power to depose the king &c., or to authorize any foreign prince to invade him &c., or to give licence to any to bear arms, raise tumults, &c. &c. Also I do swear that notwithstanding the pope's dispensation or deprivation I will bear allegiance and true faith to his Majesty &c. &c. and I do further swear that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical this damnable doctrine and position,—that princes which be excommunicated by the pope may be deposed and murdered by their subjects or by any other whatsoever. And I do believe that the pope has no power to absolve me from this oath. I do swear according to the plain and common sense, and understanding of the same words &c. &c. &c." (James I, c. 4). This oath was proclaimed law on 22 June, 1606.

Objections. On 22 September following the pope condemned the formula, "it cannot be taken, as it contains many things evidently contrary to faith and salvation." It was prudent of the pope, not to attempt to enumerate the objectionable points, for this would have increased the tension, and it is now difficult to specify them, but was made partly because of the ambiguity of the terms used; partly because of the deceitful interpretation put upon them by the English authorities. For James now hypocritically asserted that his oath was not meant to enforce upon anyone's conscience convictions. Hereupon minimizers began to maintain that the word oath was interpreted by the intention of the law-giver, that the oath might therefore be taken. But it is necessary here to advert to the Church's doctrine concerning veracity in...

oaths. These we believe to be addressed to God himself, and to be accepted in the proper sense of the words pronounced. If King James had made his subjects swear specifically "in the sense by him explained," the oath might perhaps have been endured, but when he made them "swear according to the plain and common sense; and understanding of the same words," to what was injurious to Catholic conscience, it was not to be endured, and the many objections raised against the oath the following are perhaps the chief.

A.—Objectionable Words.—The most objectionable words were those in which the depriving power was sworn to be "impious, heretical and damnable." In previous generations and of loyal subjects, and numberless persons whom, and to what was injurious to Catholic conscience, it was not to be endured, and the many objections raised against the oath the following are perhaps the chief.

Garnett, Gavan, and Heath; the last two have left writings against it. Another illustration will be found in the history of the Lord Baltimore, whose attempts to settle in Virginia, where the oath had been introduced in 1699, was defeated by his desire to be a king. The second Lord Baltimore, on the other hand, ordered his adventurers to take the oath, but whether he insisted on this is uncertain (Hughes, "Soc. of Jesus in N. America", pp. 299-1, 451 and passim). King Charles I, on the contrary, would not consent to make the oath a condition of admission, or without forswearing every dispensation already granted me by the pope, &c., &c. (50 Chs. II, i. 1). In modern times, the form has become notorious (as we shall see) under the title of "the King's Declaration". At the time it was appointed for oathholders and the member of the church of England, except for the death of Charles, James II succeeded, and he would no doubt have gladly abolished the anti-Catholic oaths altogether. But he never had the opportunity of bringing the project before Parliament. Of the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance we hear less in this reign, but the Test was the subject of constant discussion, for its form and scope had been expressly intended to hamper a reform such as James was instituting. He freed himself, however, more or less from it by the Dispensing Power, especially after the declaration of the judges. June, 1686, that it was contrary to the principles of the constitution to prevent the Crown from using the services of any of the clergy when they were needed. But the Revolution of 1688 quickly brought the Test back into greater vogue than ever. The first Parliament summoned after the triumph of William of Orange added a clause to the Bill of Rights, which was then passed, by which the Sovereign was himself to take the Declaration (1 W. & M. sess. I, c. 8). By this unworthy device no Catholic could ever be admitted to accept the new regime, without renouncing his faith. This law marks the consummation of English anti-Catholic legislation.

V. The Irish Oath of 1774 to Emancipation, 1829. — For ninety years there seemed no hope of obtaining legislative relief from the pressure of the penal laws, and the Catholic aspirations were at first in vain. In 1770 General Burgoyne had proposed to relieve Catholic soldiers from the obligations of the Test, but in vain. In 1771, however, it was necessary to pacify Canada, and the Quebec Act was passed, the first measure of toleration for Catholics sanctioned by Parliament since the days of Queen Mary. So soon after began the war of American Independence, the difficulties of which gradually awakened English statesmen to the need of reconciling Catholics. The Irish Government took the first step by undoing William III's wicked work of joining the profession of fidelity to the sovereign with the rejection of papal authority. In 1774 General Burgoyne had proposed to King George (§ 1) and rejection of the Pretender (§ 2), but without prejudice to the pope's spiritual authority, or to any dogma of the Faith. The alleged malpractice of "no faith with heretics" was removed (§ 3), so was the depoening power (§ 4), but without the objectionable words "impius, damnable and heretical". The "temporal and civil jurisdiction of the pope, direct and indirect within the realm" was also abjured (§ 5), and the promise was given that no dispensation from this oath should be considered valid (§ 6). This Irish Oath, of 1774, was accepted by the legislative authorities as proof of loyalty toward the Crown, and several clauses were unscientifically worded, though no advantage accrued from so doing. In 1778 however, the first Relief Bill, also called Sir George Savile's Act, to relieve the English...
Catholics from the worst consequences of the penal laws, came before the English Parliament, and in it was embodied the Irish Oath (18 George III, c. 60). This Act was passed with little difficulty, and the oath was taken without renunciation by the clergy of all schools.

The relief given by the Bill of 1778 was so imperfect that further legislation was soon called for, and now the disadvantages of the system of tests were acutely felt. A committee of lay Catholics, with Gallican proclivities, who afterwards characteristically called themselves the Cisalpine Club were negotiating with the Government (see Butler, Charles). To them it was repeatedly suggested that more concessions were required; and more assurances should be given. They were accordingly presented with a long "Protest" which, not only rejected the alleged malpractices, already disowned by the Irish Oath, but declined against them and others of the same kind in strong but not theological language. It introduced, for instance, the objectionable terms "infamous, heretical and damnable" of James's Oath of Allegiance. That complications might have ensued from signing such a document was not difficult to foresee. Nevertheless, the committee insisted (1) that words should be understood in a broad popular way, and (2) that, to obtain the Relief Act, it must be signed, and insistently maintained that it was freely signed by lata and clergy, and by the four vicars Apostolic, but two of these recalled their names. When, however, the signatures had been obtained, the new Relief Bill was brought forward by Government, with an oath annexed founded on the Protestant (hence called the "Protestation Oath"), which excluded from relief those who would not swear to it, and accept the name of "Protesting Catholic Dissenters." A crisis had arisen for the Catholic Church in England; but with the crisis came the man. It was John Milner (q. v.), then only a country priest, to whose energy and address the dissipation of this danger was chiefly due. The original Relief Act was not passed (1791) without changing the previous oath, or the name of Catholics. Though the Emancipation Bill was eventually carried without any tests, this was not foreseen at first. The Catholic Committee continued its endeavours for disarming Protestant prejudices, but their proposals (like the Veto) too often savoured of Gallicanism. So too did the oath annexed to the bill proposed in 1813, which from its length was styled the "Theological Oath." Eventually, owing to the growing influence exercised by Daniel O'Connell and the Irish, Catholic Emancipation was fully, if tardily, granted without any tests in 1829.

VI. REPEAL OF THE STATUTORY OATHS AGAINST CATHOLICITY, 1807–1910.—The Relief Bills, hitherto mentioned, were generally measures of relief only, leaving the old statutes, oaths, and tests still upon the Statute Book, and some of the chief officers of State had still to take them. The actual repeal of the disused tests and oaths of William III have only taken place in quite recent times. In 1867 the Declaration was repealed (30, 31 Vict., c. 75). After this, the only person bound to pronounce the oath was the king himself at the commencement of his reign. In 1871 the Promissory Oaths Bill removed all the old Oaths of Allegiance (45 and 46 Vict., c. 58). One further attempt was made by Lord Herries in the House of Lords to get rid of the king's Declaration, but the amendments offered by Government were so insignificant that the Catholics themselves voted against their being proposed at all. In 1901 strong resolutions were passed by the Catholic House of Commons, as also by its hierarchy, and these were emphasized by similar petitions from the hierarchies of Australia, and the Catholics of the English colonies. In 1901, 1905, and 1908 bills or motions to the same effect were introduced by Lord Brayne, Lord Grey, Lord Llandaff, the Duke of Norfolk, and Mr. Redmond, but without the desired effect. After the death of King Edward VII, however, King George V is believed to have urged the Government to bring in a repealing Act. This was done and public opinion, after some wavering, finally declared itself strongly on the side of the Bill, which was carried through both Houses by a large majority at the Royal Assent on 3 August, 1910, thus removing the last anti-Catholic oath or declaration from the English Constitution.

OAXACA, or ANTEQUERA. Archidioce of, situated in the southern part of the Republic of Mexico, bounded on the west by the river Huajuapan and the Archbishop of Puebla, on the east by the Bishopric of Vera Cruz, on the west by that of Tehuantepec, and on the south by the Pacific Ocean. When the conquest of New Spain was accomplished, Hernán Cortés sought the aid of the Spanish conquerors by asking for an archbishopric for the new Republic and were at war with the Aztec Emperor Moctezuma. Out of gratitude to the Tlaxcaltecas, the first bishopric that was founded on the American continent was called Tlaxcala, that of Mexico was second, and later that of Guatemala. Oaxaca, the archbishopric in the order of foundation was designated under the name of Antequera, by Paul III, 21 July, 1535, the first bishop, the Right Rev. Juan López de Zárate, having been preconized at that year. From then to the present day only thirty bishops have governed the diocese, the last being the Most Rev. Eulogio G. Gallardo, consecrated 25 May, 1887. On 23 June, 1891, Antequera was raised to the rank of an archbishopric by Leo XII, and has, at the present time as suffragan dioceses, Chiapas, Yucatan, Tabasco, Tehuantepec, and Campeche. Prior to the Conquest the religion of the entire southern region was composed of the archidioce of Oaxaca, with a liturgy in various forms, according to the different races that populated this district, the Mixteca, Zapoteca, Mixe, anthianuato predominating, although twenty-two entirely different dialects are known among them. The famous minis of Mitla indicate that the most ancient of the native civilization of the area resided there, one who was greatly venerated not only by the different villages of the ancient Nahuauc, but by others; as those of Peru. We know from history that when the conquerors landed in Vera Cruz, Moctezuma consulted the High-Priest Achiti, who announced to him that the oracle had predicted of the Holy Ghost, established to train the sons of the best families for various careers, has 70 boarders and 250 day scholars under the direction of 5 ecclesiastics and several professors. There are 3 select academies for young women, with an attendance of 600; 6 free schools for boys, with 1000 pupils, and 4 for girls, with 700. Among the charitable institutions under Catholic control are a day nursery accommodating 90 children under the care of 5 nurses, a charity hospital with 24 beds, 12 for men and 12 for women, and a home for the poor with about 90 inmates.

Obazine, Monastery of, Diocese of Tulle, founded by St. Stephen of Obazine about 1131. After his ordination St. Stephen, with another priest, Pierre, began the ecclesiastical life. They attracted a number of followers and with the sanction of Eustorge, Bishop of Tulle, built a monastery on a site granted them by the Viscoun Archambault.

Before 1142 they had no established rule; however, in this year, St. Stephen was clothed with the regular habit. He had Cistercian monks train their followers in their habits, and affiliated his abbey to Citeaux (1117). The number increasing, several foundations were made. At the most the number of Obazine were François d'Esccelebe (d. 1628), Archbishop of Bordeaux, and Charles de la Roche-Aymon (d. 1777), Cardinal Archbishop of Rennes. The monastery was confiscated by the Government during the Revolution (1791). The abbatial church, partly restored, now serves as a parish church.

Obba, titular see in Byzacena, northern Africa, of unknown history, although mentioned by Polybius (XIV, vi, under the name of Abba), and Titus Livius (XXX, vii). Situated on the highway from Carthage to Théveste (Telæssa), seven miles from Lares (Lorbeus) and sixteen from Althibarus (Henshir Medina), it is the modern Ebba. Three bishops are known, Paul, present at the Council of Carthage in 225, probably the Paul mentioned in the Martyrology for 10 January; Theophileus, a Bishop present at the Council of Carthage in 411; and Valerians, at the Council of Constantinople, 555.

Obedience (Lat. obediens, "to hearken to", hence "to obey") is the complying with a command or precept. It is here regarded not as a transitory and isolated act but rather as a virtue or principle of righteous conduct. It is then said to be the moral habit by which one carries out the order of his superior with the precise intent of fulfilling the injunction. St. Thomas Aquinas considers the obligation of obedience as an obvious consequence of the residence established in the world by the natural and positive law. The idea that subjection of any sort of one man to another is incompatible with human freedom—a notion that had vogue in the religious and political teachings of the post-Reformation period—it refutes by showing that it is at variance with the constituted nature of things, and the positive precepts of Almighty God. It is worthy of note that whilst it is possible to discern a general aspect of obedience in some acts of all the virtues, in so far as obedience stands for the execution of anything that is of precept, it is contemplated in this article as a definitely special virtue.
The element that differentiates it adequately from other good habits is found in the last part of the definition already given. Stress is put upon the fact that one not only does what is actually enjoined but does it with a mind to formally fall in with the will of the commander. It is in other words the homage rendered to authority which ranks it as a virtue. Among the virtues obedience holds an exalted place but not the highest. That distinction belongs to the virtues of faith, hope, and charity (q. v.) which unite us immediately with Almighty God. Amongst the moral virtues obedience enjoys a primacy of honour. The reason is that the greater or lesser excellence of a moral virtue is determined by the moral good or evil of the object which it qualifies one to put aside in order to give oneself to God. Now amongst our various possessions, whether goods of the body, or goods of the soul, it is clear that the human will is the most intimately personal and most cherished of all.

It happens that obedience, which makes a man yield up the most dearly prized stronghold of the individual soul in order to do the good pleasure of his Creator, is accounted the greatest of the moral virtues. As to whom we are to obey, there can be no doubt that first we are bound to offer an unreserved service to Almighty God in all His commands, and that a real difficulty will arise from time to time when the teaching of the Church in a particular instance is not in agreement with a teaching of the text of Scripture, and again when the immediate instance in which the teaching of the Church is to be submitted to the teaching of the text of Scripture involves a greater risk of error than the risk of error in the teaching of the text of Scripture. On the other hand the obligation of obedience to superiors under God admits of limitations. We are not bound to obey a superior in a matter which does not fall within the limits of his preceptive power. Thus for instance parents, although entitled beyond question to the submission of their children until they become of age, have not the right to command them to marry. Neither can a superior claim our obedience in contravention of the dispositions of a higher authority. Hence, not only, we cannot heed the behests of any human power no matter how venerable or undisputed as against the ordinances of God. All authority to which we bow has its source in Him and cannot validly be used against Him. It is this recognition of the authority of God vicariously exercised through a human agent that confers upon the act of obedience its special merit. No hard and fast rule can be set down for determining the degree of guilt of the sin of disobedience. Regarding formally as a deliberate violation of the moral authority itself, it would involve a divorce between the soul and the supernatural principle of charity which is tantamount to a previous sin. As a matter of fact many other things have to be taken account of, as the greater or less advenitance in the act, the relatively important or trivial character of the thing imposed, the manner of enjoining, the right of the person who commands. For such reasons the sin will frequently be esteemed venial.

Obedience. RELIGIOUS, is that general submission which religious vow to God, and voluntarily promise to their superiors, in order to be directed by them in the ways of piety according to the constitutions of their order. It consists, according to Lessius (De Justitia, II, xlvii, 37), in a man's allowing himself to be governed throughout his life by another for the sake of God. It is composed of three elements: (a) the sacrifice offered to God of his own independence in the generality of his actions, at least of such as are exterior; (b) the motive, namely, personal perfection, and, as a rule, also the performance of spiritual or corporal works of mercy and charity; (c) the express or implied contract with an order (formerly also with a person), which accepts the obligation to lead him to the end for which he accepts its laws and direction. Religious obedience, therefore, does not involve that extinction of all individuality, so often alleged against convents and the Church; nor is it unlimited, for it is not possible either physically or morally that a man should give himself up absolutely to the guidance of another. The choice of a superior, the object of obedience, the authority of the hierarchical Church, all exclude the idea of absolute submission.

I. The Canonical Rule of Obedience. —A. The Superiors. —By Divine law, religious persons are subject to the hierarchy of the Church; first to the pope, then to the bishops, unless exempted by the pope from episcopal jurisdiction. This hierarchy was instituted by Christ in order to direct the faithful not only in the way of salvation, but also in Christian perfection. The vow of obedience in the institutes approved by the Holy See is held more and more to be made equally to the pope, who communicates his authority to the Roman congregations entrusted with the direction of religious orders. The superiors of the different orders, when they have divided their jurisdiction, similarly receive a part of this authority; and every one who is placed at the head of a community is invested with the domestic authority necessary for its good government; the vow by which the religious offers to God the obedience which he promises to his superior is confirmed by this authority. But the right to demand obedience in virtue of the vow does not necessarily belong to all superiors; it is ordinarily reserved to the head of the community; and in order to enforce the obligation, it is necessary that the superior should make known his intention to bind the conscience; in certain orders such expressions as "I will", "I must", or "I should", do not suffice. The instructions of the Holy See require that the power of binding the conscience by command shall be employed with the utmost prudence and discretion.

B. The limits of the obligation. —The commands of superiors do not extend to what concerns the inward motion of the will. Such at least is the teaching of St. Thomas (11-11, Q. evi, a. 5, and Q. clxxxvi, a. 2). Obedience is not vowed absolutely, and without limit, but according to the rule of each order, for a superior cannot command anything foreign to, or outside, his rule (except in so far as he may grant dispensations from the rule). No matter what the rule, that is to say, the obligation of obedience is not suspended by any appeal to higher authority; but the inferior has always the right of extra-judicial recourse to a higher authority in the order or to the Holy See.

II. The Moral Significance. —The religious is bound morally to obey on all occasions when he is bound canonically, and whenever his disobedience would offend against the law of charity, as for instance by bringing discord into the community. By reason of the vow of obedience and of the religious profession a deliberate act of obedience and submission adds the merit of an act of the virtue of religion to the merit of the act. This extends even to the obedience of counsel which goes beyond matters of regular observance, and is also limited by the prescriptions of higher laws, whether human or Divine.

III. The Evangelical Foundation. —The evangelical foundation of religious obedience is first of all found in the perfect freedom of that obedience with the example of the Gospel. Freedom from ambition which leads a man to choose a position of inferiority, implies a spirit of humility which esteemeth others as superior, and willingly yields them the first place; the sacrifice of his own independence and his own will presupposes in a high degree that spirit of self-denial and mortification which keeps the passions under proper restraint;
the readiness to accept a common rule and direction manifests a spirit of union and concord which generously adapts itself to the desires and tastes of others; eagerness to do the will of God in all things is a mark of the obedient, and so it is that the Church and the religious must do always the things which please my Father" (John, vii, 29). And since the Church has invested its superior with authority, religious obedience is supported by all those texts which recommend submission to lawful powers, and especially by the following: "He that honoureth me honoureth my Father" (Luke, x, 16).

Philosophically religious obedience is justified (a) by the experience of the mistakes and illusions to which a man relying on his own unaided opinions is liable. The religious proposes to rule his whole life by devotion to God and his neighbour; how shall he best realize this ideal? By regulating all his actions by his own judgment, or by choosing a prudent and enlightened guide who will give his advice without any consideration of himself? Is it not clear that the latter alternative shows a resolution more sincere, more generous, and at the same time more likely to lead to a successful issue? This obedience is justified also (b) by the help of example and counsel afforded by community life and the acceptance of a rule of life which holiness of which is vouchsed for by the Church; (c) lastly, since the object of religious orders is not only the perfection of their members, but also the performance of spiritual and corporal works of mercy, they need a union of efforts which can only be assured by regularity in the submission of all wills and actions to the command of authority. This union of wills is indispensable for success in the operations of war.

Religious obedience never reduces a man to a state of passive inertness, it does not prevent the use of any faculty he may possess, but sanctifies the use of all. It does not forbid any initiative, but subjects it to a prudent control in order to preserve it from indiscretion and keep it in the line of true charity. A member of a religious order has often been compared to a dead body, but in truth nothing is killed by the religious vow but vanity and self-love and all their fatal opposition to the Divine will. If superiors and subjects have sometimes failed to understand the practice of religious obedience, if direction has sometimes been indiscreet, these are accidental imperfections from which no human institution is free. The unbounded zeal of men like St. Francis Xavier and other saints who loved their rule, the prominent part which religious have taken in the mission field, and their successes therein, the grave war which the enemies of the Faith have at all times waged against the religious orders; all these things furnish the most eloquent testimony to the happy influence of religious obedience in developing the activity which it sanctifies. The expression "blind obedience" signifies not an unreasonable or unreasonable submission to authority, but a keen appreciation of the rights of authority, the reasonableness of submission, and blindness only to such selfish or worldly considerations as would lessen regard for authority.

At present, religious have taken a far greater part than formerly in civil and public life, personally filling the chasms left by the departure of citizens who have entered the Church or who live as hermits, in order to exercise their right of voting and other functions compatible with their profession. Obedience does not interfere with the proper exercise of such rights. No political system rejects the votes of persons in dependent positions, but all freely permit the use of all legitimate corrects to avoid the vicious tendency of egalitarianism: the influence of religious superiors is limited to safeguarding the higher interests of religion. As to the functions to be fulfilled, the superior, by the very fact of permitting his subjects to undertake them, grants all the liberty that is required to genuine freedom.

History. — Through St. Paul and the other early hermits were not in a position to practise religious ob-

dience, it was already manifested in the docility with which their imitators placed themselves under the guidance of some older man. St. Cyprian, in his letter "De habita virginit", shows us that at Rome the hermits followed the direction of the older women. Obedience was thus looked up to as a part of the regulations from which those were dispensed who were considered perfect and ripe for a solitary life. This idea is found also in the first chapter of the Rule of St. Benedict. St. Pachomius (a. d. 292-346) understanding the importance of obedience in community life made it the foundation of all his regulations, preaching by his own example, and inculcating upon all superiors the necessity of a scrupulous observance of the rules of which they were the guardians. The monks (cf. Cassian, "Institutions") thus saw in perfect obedience an excellent application of their universal spirit of self-renunciation. Later, St. Bernard insisted on the complete suppression of self-will, i. e., of that will which sets itself in opposition to the designs of God and to all that is commanded or desired for the good of the community. The obedience of the Eastern monks was imperfect and defective by reason of the facility with which they changed from one superior or monastery to another. St. Bernard, in sequence, advancing a step farther, introduced a new rule binding his monks by a vow of stability. A certain choice of rules still existed, which seemed likely to be hurtful to the common life, for some monasteries had various sets of rules, each set having its own observances. The Rule of St. Benedict brought into existence monastic congregations known by the identity of their observances, and these were the forerunners of the mendicant orders with their rules which have become canonical laws. St. Thomas thus had before him all the material necessary to enable him to treat fully of the subject of religious obedience in his "Summa Theologica", in which he makes it clear that the vow of obedience is the chief of the vows of religion.

or bursar, who acted as chief purveyor of all foodstuff to the monastery and as general steward. In recent times the name procurator is often found for this position. (b) The sub-cellar, or the "granulatorium." Chapter xxxi of St.
Benedict's Rule tells "What kind of man the Cellarer ought to be"; in practice this position is the most responsible one after that of abbot or superior. (1)
The refectorum, who had charge of the refectory, or refectory and its furniture, including such things as crockery, cloths, dishes, spoons, forks, etc. (5) The kitchener, who presided over the cookery department, not only for the community but for all guests, dependants, etc. (6) The novice master (see Novice), whose assistant was sometimes called the "zealator".
(7) The inquirer, besides looking after the sick brothers who were also responsible for the quarterly "blood letting" of the monks, a custom almost universal in medieval monasteries. (8) The guest-master, whose duties are dealt with in chapter liii of St. Benedict's Rule. (9) The almoner. (10) The chamberlain, or "vestiarium."

Besides these officials who were appointed more or less permanently, there were certain others appointed for a week at a time to carry out various duties.
These positions were usually filled in turn by all below the rank of sub-priest, though very busy officials, e. c., the cellarer, might be excused. The chief of these was the "frater," or prior. His duties were that of the first antiphon at the Psalms, and also the verses, responsa-ria after the lessons etc. The weekly reader and servers in the kitchen and refectory entered upon their duties on Sunday when, in company with the servers of the previous week, they had to ask and receive a special blessing in choir as directed in chapters xxi and xxviii of St. Benedict's Rule. Nowadays the tendency is towards a simplification in the details of monastic life and consequently to a reduction in the number of officials in a monastery, but all the more important offices named above exist today in every monastery though the name obedientiaries has quite dispersa."

Oblate Sisters of Providence, a congregation of Nagros nuns founded at Baltimore, Md., by the Rev.
Jaques Hector Nicolas Joubert de la Maraille, for the education of coloured children. Father Joubert belonged to a noble French family forced by the Revolution to take refuge in San Domingo. Alone of his family, he escaped from a massacre and went to Baltimore, entering St. Mary's Seminary. After his ordination he was given charge of the coloured Catholics of St.
Mary's chapel. Finding he was making no headway as the sermon were not remembered and there were no schools where the children could be taught, he formed the idea of founding a religious community for the purpose of educating these children. In this he was encouraged by his two friends, Fathers Baude and "Father Joubert. He was introduced to four coloured women, who kept house for a charitable institution; with the help of the latter he started the "Father Joubert" convent.

In the summer he went to Philadelphia, where the congregation was established, under the title of the "Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament of the Most Holy Sacrament of the Blessed Eucharist." The congregation was approved by the Archbishop of Baltimore in 1841, and its first house was opened in Providence, R.I., in 1842, and in New York in 1843. In 1844
the congregation was granted its title by the Archbishop of Baltimore. It was then removed to Philadelphia, where it was finally established in 1846.
III. Recruiting is made by means of juniorates, novitiates, and scholasticates. (a) Juniorates or Apostolic Schools. The first establishment of this description was founded in the Oblates, i.e., the Oblate of St. Dane des Laines near Avignon, and their example, soon followed by the Jesuit Fathers at Avignon, became widely adopted in France. The congregation has at present thirteen juniorates situated at: Ottawa, Buffalo, San Antonio (Texas), St. Boniface (Manitoba), Turin (Italy), elsewhere in the new world; St. Charles (Holland), Vaergeren (Belgium), Santa Maria a Vico and Naples (Italy), Urnieta (Spain), and Beelamp (Ireland) in Europe; Colombo and Jaffna in the Island of Ceylon. (b) Novitiates are fed from the juniorates, and also from colleges, seminaries, and gymnasia. They are at present thirteen in number and situated at: Lachine (Canada), Twesbury (Massachusetts), San Antonio (Texas), St. Charles (Manitoba), St. Gerhkh, Hinfeld, and Maria, Engelshof (Germany), Niewenhove (Belgium), Le Restin (Luxembourg), St. Pierre d’Aoste (Italy), Urnieta (Spain), Stillorgan (Ireland), and Colombo (Ceylon). (c) Scholasticates receive novices who have been admitted to temporal vows at the end of a year’s probation. The first scholasticate of the congregation was dedicated to the Sacred Heart at Montalivet, Marsilles, in 1857; it was transferred to Autun in 1861, to Dublin in 1860, to St. Francis (Holland) in 1869, and to Lége in 1871. The ten establishments at present in existence, besides that at Ottawa, Turin, Twesbury, San Antonio, Rome, Lége, Hünfeld, Stillorgan, Turin, and Colombo (2).

IV. Ends and Means.—The congregation was formed to repair the havoc caused by the French Revolution, and its very existence so soon afterwards was a sign of religious revival. Its multiple ends may thus be divided: (a) Primary: (1) To revive the spirit of faith among rural and industrial populations by means of missions and retreats, in which devotion to the Sacred Heart and to Mary Immaculate is recommended as a supernatural means of regeneration. “He hath sent me to preach the Gospel to the poor,” has been adopted as the devise of the congregation. (2) Care of young men’s societies, Catholic clubs, etc. (3) Formation of clergy in seminaries. (b) Secondary or Derived.—To adapt itself to the different circumstances arising from its rapid development in new countries, the congregation has necessarily extended its activities. Throughout the direction of industrial or reformatory schools, of establishments of secondary education in its principal centres, and of higher institutions of learning, such as the University of Ottawa (see Ottawa, University of).

V. Prominent Members, Past and Present.—(a) Superior Generals: Mgr de Mazenod (1816); Very Rev. J. Fabre (1861); L. Soulier (1895); C. Angier (1898); A. Lucchard (1906); Mgr A. Donetwell (1908). (b) Oblate Bishops: (1) Deceased: de Mazenod, Bishop of Marseilles; Guibert (1802-80), Cardinal Archbishop of Paris; Semeria (1813-48), Vicar Apostolic of Jaliffin; Guigues (1805-74), first Bishop of Orlando (Florida); Faraud (1823-90), first Vicar Apostolic of Natal; Faraud (1823-90), first Vicar Apostolic of Athabaska-Mackenzie; D’Herbeicez (1822-90), first Vicar Apostolic of British Columbia; Bonjean (1823-92), first Archbishop of Colombo; Tache (1823-94), first Archbishop of St. Boniface; Buhin (1828-1903), Archbishop of Aux; Melzadro (1829-1892), first Archbishop of St. Albert; Cuth (1832-1903), Auxiliary Bishop of Athabaska-Mackenzie; Jolivet (1826-1903), Vicar Apostolic of Natal; Durieu (1830-99), first Bishop of New Westminster; Anthony Gaughren (1849-1901), Vicar Apostolic of Orange River Colony; (2) Living: Delehaye, Archbishop of Pretoria, and actual superior general; Langevin, Archbishop of St. Boniface (consorced 1885); Couder, Archbishop of Colombo (1898); Grand, Vicar Apostolic of Athabaska (1891); Pased, Bishop of Prince Albert (1891); Joulain, Bishop of Jaffina (1893); Legal, Bishop of St. Augustine (Florida); Buhin, Vicar Apostolic of Mackenzie (1902); Matthew Garneth, Vicar Apostolic of Orange River Colony (1902); Delacle, Vicar Apostolic of Natal (1904); Miller, Vicar Apostolic of Transvaal (1904); Joussard, Coadjutor of Athabaska (1909); Cenz, Vicar Apostolic of Basutoland (1909); Fallon, Bishop of London, Ontario (1910); Charlesbois, first Vicar Apostolic of Keewatin, Canada (1910).

VI. Principal Undertakings.—(a) General. (1) In canonically constituted countries a parish church or public chapel is attached to each establishment of Oblates. The parishes are all provided with schools, while many have colleges or academies and a hospital. Several of the parochial residences (e.g., Buffalo, Montreal, Quebec, etc.) serve as centres for missionaries who assist the parochidal clergy by giving retreats or missions and taking temporary charge of parishes. (2) In new or missionary countries, the posts are considered as fixed residences from which the missionaries radiate to surrounding fields of action (e.g., Edmonton and Calgary. A Vicar Apostolic of the Oblates possesses fully equipped schools, whilst many have convents, boarding schools, and hospitals. Instruction is given in English, French, or native tongues by religious communities or by the fathers and brothers themselves. Indigenous mission work is carried on by the priests missioned to the villages and among the regular instructions of catechists. The printing press is much used, and the congregation has published complete dictionaries and other works in the native idoms among which it labours. (b) Special.—(1) Canada. Until recent years the evangelization of the Canadian West and of British Columbia was the almost exclusive work of the Oblate Fathers, as that of the extreme north still is. Cathedrals, churches, and colleges were built by them, and often handed over to secular clergy or to other religious communities (as in the case of the St. Boniface College, which is at present flourishing under the direction of the Society of Jesus). The Archepiscopal See of St. Boniface since 1853, and the episcopal Sees of St. Albert, Prince Albert, with the Vicariates of Athabaska and Mackenzie since their foundation, have been, and are still occupied by Oblates. That of New Westminster ceased to be so in 1898. The Diocese of Orange River had an Oblate Bishop, Mgr van Pelt, the foundation of most of its parishes and institutions to members of the congregation, who have also founded a number of the centres in the new Vicariates of Temiskaming and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, as well as in the Diocese of Chiecutani. Among the recent labours of the Oblates in the West a special mention must be given to the religious organization of Germans, Poles, and Ruthenians. The new Vicariate of Keewatin (1910) is entrusted to an Oblate bishop, whose missions are devoted to the regeneration of nomadic Indian tribes. (2) South Africa. The Oblates have founded four of the six Vicariates of the British South Africa, Natal, Orange River, Basutoland, and Transvaal, as also the Prefecture Apostolic of Cimbebasia. Its members served as military chaplains on both sides during the Boer war. (3) Asia. The immense Dioceses of Colombo and Jaffina, with their flourishing colleges and missions, are the achievement of the enterprising zeal of Oblate Fathers under Mgr Bongard and O.M.I. (4) Western Australia. A missionary vicariate was founded from the British Province in 1894, and is actively engaged in parochial and reformatory work.

VII. Establishments of Education and Formation.—(a) For the Congregation. (1) Scholasticates affording a course of two years in philosophy and social sciences (three years in Rome), and of four years in theology and sacred sciences according to the spirit and method of St. Thomas. The Roman scholastics follow the programme of the Gregorian University, and graduate in philosophy, theology, canon law, and Scripture. The scholastics at Ottawa graduate in philosophy and theology at the university, of which they form an integral part. (2) Novitiates giving religious formation with adapted studies. (3) Juniorates providing a complete classical course preparatory to the sacred sciences. The Ottawa juniorates make their course at the neighbouring university, and graduate in the Faculty of Arts. (1) Concerning the Ottawa University, see the special article. (2) Grand Seminaries.—Until the persecution of 1692 the congregation was in charge of these establishments at Marseilles, Frejus, Ajaccio, and Rome (in connection with the university). It is at present entrusted with those of Ajaccio, Ottawa (in connexion with the university), San Antonio, Colombo, and Jaffna. The two last-mentioned are occupied in the formation of a native clergy and have already provided over forty priests. (e) Secondary education: (1) classical colleges with a course in English are provided at Buffalo, St. Albert (Alberta), San Antonio, St. Louis (British Columbia), St. Charles (Natal). Two important institutions at Colombo are affiliated to the University of Cambridge, most of the professors have been in residence there, and prepare their pupils for the London matriculation and Cambridge Local examinations. (2) Preparatory seminaries are established at St. Albert, San Antonio, Ceylon (2), and Westminster. (3) Normal schools for lay teachers are conducted at Jaffna and Ceylon. (4) Industrial schools with full instruction in farming and craftsmanship by lay brothers and assistants in Manitoba (3), Alberta-Saskatchewan of St. Sauveur, Quebec, and St. Joseph's, Lowell, are important centres of Sacred Heart devotion in the New World. (b) To the Blessed Virgin.—Until the expulsions of 1692 the Oblates directed the ancient pilgrim shrines of Notre Dame des Lumières, Avignon; N. D. de l'Assomption, Grenoble; N. D. de Bon Secours, Vierges; N. D. de la Garde (Marseilles); N. D. de Toulouse and N. D. d'Arcachon, Bordeaux; N. D. de Sion, Nancy; and the national pilgrimage of N. D. de Pontmain near Laval, erected after the Franco-Prussian war. During several years they revived the ancient glories of N. D. de Lourdes, Cap; N. D. de Clercy, Orleans; N. D. de la Rovère, Mentone. In England they have the restored pre-Reformation shrine of Our Lady of Grace at Tower Hill, London, and in Canada the shrine of Our Lady of the Rosary at Cap de la Madeleine, Quebec, and Our Lady of Mount Willows at Ville Marie and Duck Lake, Saskatoon. In Ceylon they have the national pilgrimage to Our Lady of Madura. (c) To various Saints.—The ancient sanctuary of St. Martin of Tours was re-excavated and revived by Oblate Fathers under Cardinal Gibert in 1862 (see "Life of Léon Papin Dupont", London, 1882).
Ceylon possesses votive churches to St. Anne at Colombo and St. Anthony at Kochchikada, and the Canadian West that of St. Anne at Lake St. Anne, which is largely frequented by Indians and half-breeds, and also at St. Boniface by Archbishop Walsh; the "Missionary Record", started in 1891, was discontinued in 1903. (b) General Newspapers, etc: the "North West Review" (Winnipeg), "Western Catholic" (Vancouver), "Patriote de l'Ouest" (Duck Lake, Saskatchewan), "Ami du Foyer" (St. Boniface), "Die West Canadische" (German), "Gazeta Katolika" (Polish), and "Jeunes et Anciens" (ferred at Winnipeg), "Kitchiwia Match Sacred Heart Review in Cim" (Sacred Heart P. O. Alta), "Connaid Llwyd-wig, Messenger of the Catholic Church in Welsh-English" (Llanrwst, North Wales); "Ceylon Catholic Messenger", separate editions in English and Sinhalese and "Guardian" in English-Tamil, Parochial Bulletins at St. Joseph's, Lowell, Mattawa (Ontario), and St. Peter's, Montreal.

In connexion with the table given on page 186, the following may be mentioned: (1) the "houses" are parochial establishments or missionary centres, not mission posts; (2) the table is calculated according to the provinces or vicariates of the congregation, which are not always coextensive with ecclesiastical divisions; (3) the figures given for France represent the state of affairs before 1902. Since that date a large number of religious remain in France, though isolated. Several establishments have been transferred to Belgium, Italy, and Spain; (4) scholastics, novices, and juniorites are not included.

Oblates of Saint Francis de Sales, a congregation of priests founded originally by Saint Francis de Sales at the request of Saint Jane de Chantal. The establishment at Thonon was a preparatory step toward carrying out his design, the accomplishment of which was prevented by his death. With Saint Jane Frances de Chantal's encouragement and assistance, Raymond Bonal of Adge, in France, carried out his plan but the congregation died out at the beginning of the eighteenth century. Two hundred years later it was revived by Ven. Mother Marie de Sales Chappuis, who died in the odour of sanctity, 7 October, 1875, and Abbé Louis Alexander Alphonse Brisson, a professor in the Seminary of Troyes. In 1899 Father Brisson began St. Bernard's College, near Troyes. In September, 1871, Father Gilbert (d. 10 November, 1900) joined him, and Mgr Ravinex, Bishop of Troyes, received them and four companions into the novitiate. The Holy See approved temporarily their constitutions, 21 Dec., 1879. The first vows were made 27 August, 1876. The definitive approbation of their constitution was given on 8 December, 1897. The members of the institute are of two ranks, clerics and lay-brothers. The postulate lasts from six to nine months; the novitiate from one year to eighteen months. For the first three years the vows are annual, after that perpetual. The institute is governed by a superior general elected for life, and five counselors general elected at each general chapter, which takes place every ten years. The congregation primarily developed in France. It numbered seven colleges and five other educational houses when the Government's approbation was given, and these are closed all, 31 July, 1903. The founder retired to Planey where he died 2 February, 1901. The mother-house was transferred to Rome, and the congregation divided into three provinces, Latin, German, and English. The first comprises France, Belgium, Italy, Greece, and South America; the second Austria, the German Empire and the southern half of its South-west African colony; the third, England, United States, and the north-western part of Cape Colony. Each province is administered by a provincial, appointed by the superior general and his council for ten years. He is assisted by three counsellors elected at each provincial chapter, which meets every ten years, at an interval of five years between the regular general chapters.

The Latin Province has a scholasticate at Albergo. In 1909 the church of Sts. Columb and Julian in Rome was given to the Oblates. The novitiate for the Latin and German provinces is in Giove (Umbria). The Ecole Commercial Ste Croix, in Naxos (Greece), has about fifty pupils, and the College St. Paul at Piranes (Athens) about two hundred. Four Fathers, stationed in Montevideo (Uruguay) are occupied with mission work. They have a flourishing Young Men's Association. In Brazil, three Fathers have the district of Dom Pedro do Sul (11,000 square miles with a Catholic population of 20,000). The headquarters of the Uruguay-Brazil mission is at Montevideo, Uruguay. One Father is stationed in Ecuador, where before the Revolution of 1897 the congregation had charge of the diocesan seminary of Riohacha, several colleges, and parishes. In 1909 a school for the congregation was opened at Damparcourt, Belgium. The German province has a preparatory school of about forty students in Schmieding (Upper Austria). They have charge of St. Anne's (French) church in Vienna, also the church of Our Lady of Dolours in Grazenburg, Vienna, which is served by six Oblates. At Arttsetten, the Archdiocese Francis Ferdinand gave them charge of the parish (1907) and assisted them to build a school. With the consent of the German Government Cardinal Fischer gave them the church of Marienburg in 1910. Several Fathers are engaged in mission work. The English province founded its novitiate in Wilmington, Delaware, 23 September, 1903, and transferred it to Childs, Md. (1907). A scholasticate is attached. The Fathers in Wilmington conduct a high school for boys, and are chaplains of several religious communities, the county almshouse, the state insane hospital, the Ferris Industrial School for boys, and the county and state prison. In 1910 the parish of St. Francis de Sales, Salisbury, Md. (1200 square miles with a population of 70,000), was confided to the Oblates.

In Faversham (Kent, England) they have a boarding school for boys, the chancaplaincy of the Visitation Convent and Academy of Roseland, and a small parish in Faversham. To this province belongs the Vicariate Apostolic of the Orange River. (For the Vicariate Apostolic of the Orange River and the Apostolic Prefecture of Great Namaland, see Orange River, Vicariate Apostolic of the.)

Oblates of Saint Francis of Rome. See Francs of Rome, SAINT, Oblati.

Oblati, Oblate, Oblates, is a word used to describe any persons, not professed monks or friars, who have been offered to God, or have dedicated themselves to His service, in holy religion. It has various particular uses at different periods in the history of the Church. In the early days it was given by their parents to the monastic life, in houses under the Rule of St. Benedict, who were commonly known by the name during the century and a half when the custom was in vogue, and the councils of the Church treated them as monks—that is, until the Council of Toledo (656) forbade their acceptance before the age of ten and granted them free permission to leave the monastery, if they wished, when they reached the age of puberty. At a later date the word "oblate" was used to describe such lay men or women as were pensioned off by royal and other patrons upon monasteries or benefices, where they lived as in an almshouse or hospital. In the sixteenth century it is on record that Abbot William of Hirsau or Hirsun, in the old Diocese of Spires, introduced lay brethren into the monastery. They were of two kinds: the fraters barbati or conversi, who took vows but were not cloistered or enclosed monks, and the oblati, workmen or servants who voluntarily subjected themselves, whilst in the service of the monastery, to religious obedience and observance. Afterwards, the different status of the lay brother in the several orders of monks, and the ever-varying regulations concerning him introduced by the many reforms, destroyed the distinction between the conversus and the oblatus. The Cusanine Benedictines, for instance, at first carefully differentiated between conversus and oblatos, and the forms of the habits were in each case specifically distinct. The conversus, the lay brother properly so called, made solemn vows like the choir monks, and wore the scapular; the commissus made simple vows, and was dressed like a monk, but without the scapular; the oblatus made a vow of obedience to the abbot, gave himself and his goods to the monastery, and wore a sober secular dress. But, in 1627, we find the conversus reduced below the status of the commissus, inasmuch as he was permitted only to make simple vows and that for a year at a time; he was in fact un distinguishable, except by his dress, from the oblatus of the Order of Friars Minor. The title oblatus, confrater, and donatus became interchangeable titles, given to any one who, for his generosity or special service to the monastery, received the privilege of lay membership, with a share in the prayers and good works of the brethren.

Canonically, only two distinctions were ever of any consequence: first, that between those who entered religion "per medium professionis" and "per medium simplicius commissus," i.e., for being monachi and the later oblati; secondly, that between the oblate who was "mortus mundo" (that is, who had given himself and his goods to religion without reservation), and the oblate who retained some control over his person and his possessions—the former only (plena oblatus) was accounted a person ecclesiasticus, with enjoyment of ecclesiastical privileges and immunity (Benedict XIV, "De Synodo Diœce.").

Congregations of Oblates. Women.—(1) The first society or congregation of oblates was that founded in the fifteenth century by St. Frances of Rome, to which the name of Collatines has been given—apparently by mistake. St. Frances, wife of Lorenzo Fonzani, gathered around her (in 1425, according to Bu deau) a number of widows and girls, who formed themselves into a society or confraternity. In 1433, as their own annals witness, she settled them in a house called "for de" Specchi, at the foot of the Capitol, giving them the Rule of St. Benedict and some constitutions drawn up under her own direction, and putting them under the oblature of the Olivetan monks of Maria Nuova. In the same year she asked confirmation of her society from Eugenius IV, who commissioned Gaspare, Bishop of Cosenza, to report to him on the matter, and some days later granted the request, with permission to make a beginning of observance in the house near S. Maria Nuova, while she was seeking a more commodious house nearer S. Giovanni in Vincen. They have never quitted their first establishment, but have greatly enlarged and beautified it. The object of the foundation was not unlike that of the Benedictine Canonesses in France—to furnish a place of pious seclusion for ladies of noble birth, who, though they would not be reduced to social life with women of any sort, might retain and inherit property, let when they suited them, marry if they should wish, and, at the same time, would have the shelter of a convent enclosure, the protection of the habit of a nun, and the spiritual advantages of a life of religious observance. They made an oblation to themselves of their goods and possessions by the usual profession and vows. Hence the name of oblates. The observance has always been sufficiently strict and edifying, though it is permitted to each sister to have a maid waiting on her in the convent and a lackey to do her commissions outside. They have a year's probation, and make their oblation, in which they promise obedience to the mother president, upon the tomb of St. Frances of Rome. There are two grades amongst them: the "Most Excellent", who must be princesses by birth, and the "Most Illustrious", those of inferior nobility. Their first president was Agnes de Lelis, who resigned in favour of St. Frances when the latter became a widow. After her death, Bishop Giovanni di Mirabello, broke off the connexion between the oblates and the Olivetan. The convent and treasures of the sacristy have escaped appropriation by the Italian government, because the inmates are not, in the strict sense, nuns.

(2) Differing little from the Oblates of St. Frances in their ecclesiastical status, but unlike in every other respect are the Donna Convento della Maddalena, under the Rule of St. Augustine, a congregation of fallen women. They had more than one house in Rome. Without any previous noviceship, they promise obedience and make oblation of themselves to the monastery of St. Mary-of-the-Middle and St. Lucy. At Orvieto there are similar houses of oblate penitents under the Rule of Mount Carmel.

(3) The Congregation of Philippines (so named Oblation, a term derived from the Roman civil law, defined in the "institutes" of Justinian as a "legal bond which by a legal necessity binds us to do something according to the laws of our State." (III, 13). It was a relation by which two persons were bound to do something as a condition of the law. Originally both parties were considered to be under the obligation to each other; subsequently the term was restricted to one of the parties, who was said to be under an obligation to do something in favour of another, and consequently that other had a correlative right to enforce the fulfilment of the obligation. The term was derived from the sphere of law to that of ethics was easy and natural. In ethics it acquired a wider meaning and was used as a synonym for duty. It thus became the centre of some of the fundamental problems of ethics. The question of the source of moral obligation is perhaps the chief of these problems, and it is certainly not one of the easiest or least important. We all acknowledge that we are in general under an obligation not to commit murder, but when we ask for the ground of the obligation, we get almost as many different answers as there are systems of ethics.

The prevailing Catholic doctrine may be explained in one of the following terms: (1) We must understand that will, of doing what is good and avoiding what is evil. The necessity, of which there is question here, is not the physical coercion exercised on man by an external and stronger physical force. If two strong men seize me by the arms and drag me whether I would not go, I act under necessity or compulsion, but this is not the necessity of moral obligation. The will, which is the seat of moral obligation, is incapable of being physically coerced in that manner. It cannot be forced to do what it does not will. It is indeed possible to conceive that the will is necessitated to action by the antecedent or consequent conditions of the act. The doctrine of the necessity of moral obligation is that the will is easily intelligible although we deny that it is true. The will is indeed necessitated by its own nature to tend towards the good in general; we cannot wish for what is evil unless it presents itself to us under the appearance of good. We also necessarily wish for happiness, and if we find ourselves in presence of some object which can fully satisfy all our desires, and contained in itself nothing to repel us, we should be necessitated to love it. But in this life there is no such object which can fully satisfy all our desires and thus make us completely happy. Health, friends, fame, wealth, pleasures, singly or all combined, are incapable of filling the voids in our measure desirable, earthly goods are limited, and man's capacity for good is unlimited. All earthly goods are defective; we recognize their defects and the evil which the pursuit or possession of them entails. Considered with their defects, they repel as well as attract us; our wills therefore are not necessitated by them. In the presence of any earthly good our wills are free, at least after the first involuntary tendency to what attracts them; they are not necessitated to full and deliberate action.

The necessity, then, which constitutes the essence of moral obligation must be of the kind which an end that must be achieved by means is a necessary means towards obtaining that end. If I am bound to cross the ocean and I am unable to fly, I must go on board ship. That is the only means at my disposal for attaining the end which I am bound to obtain. Moral obligation is a necessity of this kind. It is the necessity that I am under, of employing the necessary means towards obtaining the end which is also necessary. The necessity, then, which moral obligation lays upon us is the necessity, not of the determination of nature, nor of the physical coercion of an external and stronger force, but it is of the same general character as the necessity that we are under.
of employing the necessary means in order to attain an end which must be obtained. There is, however, a special quality in the necessity of moral obligation which is peculiar to itself and depends upon means when we say that children are "obliged" to obey their parents, that they "ought" to obey them, that it is their "duty" to do so. We do not simply mean by those assertions that obedience to parents is a necessary means towards their own education, and for securing the peace, harmony, and affection, which should reign in the home. We do not simply mean that the happiness of parents and children depends upon such obedience. Although society at large is much concerned that children should be trained in respect and deference towards lawful authority, yet even the demands of society do not explain what we mean when we affirm that children are obliged to obey their parents. There is, of course, a sacredness, a universality about the obligation of duty, which can only be explained by calling to mind what man is, and what is his origin, and what is his destiny. Man is a creature, made by God his Creator, with whom he is destined to live for all eternity. That is the end of man's life and of every action, imposed on him by the Creator who made him in the image of his nature to the end for which he was made. That doctrine explains the peremptoriness, the sacredness, the universality of moral obligation, made known to us, as it is, by the dictates of conscience. The doctrine has seldom been put in clearer or more beautiful language than by Cardinal Newman in his Letter to the Duke of Wellington (p. 55):

"The Supreme Being is of a certain character, which, expressed in human language, we call ethical. He has the attributes of justice, truth, wisdom, sanctity, benevolence and mercy, as eternal characteristics in His Nature, the very Law of His being, identical with Himself; and next, when He became Creator, He became Lawgiver, as well as Law enforcer. The divine Law then is the rule of ethical truth, the standard of right and wrong, a sovereign, irreversible, absolute authority in the presence of man and Angels. "The eternal law," says St. Augustine, is the Divine Reason or Will of God, commanding the observance, forbidding the transgression, of the natural order of things. "The natural law," says St. Thomas, is an impression of the Divine Light in us, a participation of the eternal law in the rational creature. "This law, as apprehended in the minds of individual men, is called 'conscience'; and though it may suffer refraction in passing into the intellectual medium of each, it is not thereby changed in its essence or character. It is the Divine law, and not still, as such, the prerogative of commanding obedience. "The Divine Law," says Cardinal Gossent, is the supreme rule of actions; our thoughts, desires, words, acts, all that man is, is subject to the domain of the law of God; and this law is the rule of our conduct by means of our conscience. Hence, our conscience is never lawful to rebel against our conscience; as the Fourth Lateran Council says, 'Quidquid fit contra conscientiam, sedicit ad gehennam.' The rule and measure of duty is not utility, nor expediency, nor the happiness of the greatest number, nor State convenience, nor fitness, order, and the pulchrum. Conscience is not a long-sighted self-love, nor a desire to be consistent with oneself; but it is a messenger from Him who both in nature and in grace, speaks to us behind a veil, and teaches and rules us by His representatives. Conscience is the aboriginal Vicar of Christ, a prophet in its informations, a monarch in its peremptoriness, a priest in its blessings and anathemas. Man, therefore, when he is a member of the Church and obeyed the Church could cease to be, in it the sacredest principle would remain and have a sway."

An injustice would be done to the foregoing doctrine if it were classed with Mysticism, innate ideas, and Intuitionism. On the contrary, it is in the strictest sense rational. It asserts that we can know God, our Creator and Lord, that we can know ourselves and all around us, which is the sphere of all moral obligation. We can know the actions which it is right and proper that such a being as man should perform. We can and do know that God, Whom as our Creator and Lord we are bound to obey, commands us to do what is right and forbids us to do what is wrong. That is the eternal law, the Divine reason, or the Divine will, which is the source of all moral obligation. Moral precepts are the commands of God, but they are also the behests of right reason, inasmuch as they are merely the rules of right conduct by which a being such as man is should be guided.

An objection is sometimes urged against the method of analysing moral obligation which we have followed. It is said that moral obligation cannot be explained as a moral necessity of adopting the necessary means to the end of moral action, for it may be asked what is the moral obligation of the end itself. The Utilitarians, for example, maintained that the end of human action should be the greatest happiness of the greatest number. But a man may well ask, if we are to adopt this rule, how is it to be adopted? For securing the greatest happiness of the greatest number. It is plain what answer should be given to such a question on the principles laid down above. God is our Creator and Lord, and as such and because He is good, He has every right to our obedience and service. We need not go beyond the preceptive will of God in our analysis; moral obligations are the very nature of God and our relation to Him. The rules of morality are then moral laws, imposing on us an obligation derived from the will of God, our Creator. That obligation is the moral necessity that we are under of conforming our actions to the demands of our rational nature and to the end for which we exist as rational creatures.

It is the case that in order to be moral, we must also be rational; and everything that is to be done in the pursuit of morality must be done in accordance with the nature and to our end, we violate the moral law and do wrong. The effect on ourselves of such an action is twofold according to Catholic theology. A bad action does not merely subject us to a penalty assigned to wrongdoing, the sanction of the moral law. Besides this retributive power, there is also theactus cupiditer and the eternal transgression. It is not only the sinner who is punished, but the very nature of God and our relation to Him. This state of clemency is accompanied, in the supernatural order to which we have been raised, by the punishment of God's grace. This power is of a character and force that we cannot interpret as an act of justice for the Divine law.
subdue it was a training in philosophy. But the first principle of the Stoics was: "life according to nature". This was the general point, whether it brought pleasure or pain, which the Stoic philosopher indeed reckoned of no importance, and affected to despise. This philosophy appealed powerfully to the native sternness of the Roman character, and it was considerably influenced and developed by the ideas of Roman jurisprudence. Thus the treatise of Cicero upon De Republica has been called the "Pantheism of Cicero", and Cicero's remark, and the remark is significant, that Pantheism had not given a definition of what duty is. According to Cicero it has reference to the natural law, and is expressed in precepts to which the conduct of life can be conformed in all its particulars (De officiis, i, iii). The working out of the doctrine concerning the law of nature is due to a large extent to the Roman lawyers, and Costa Rosetti, a recent Austrian writer on ethics, could find no words more suited to sum up the common Catholic teaching on the point than a passage from Cicero's "De republica" (iii, xxi).

We cannot do better than give a translation of the passage here, as it will show clearly how fully the doctrine of a law of nature imposing a moral obligation on man had been developed before it was adopted by the Fathers (Lactantius, De divin. inst. i, 1).

"Right reason is a true law, agreeing with nature, infused into all men, unchanging, eternal, which sanctions by its commands, deters from wrong by forbidding it, and which nevertheless neither commands nor forbids the good in vain, nor prevails with the bad by commanding and forbidding them. It is not permitted to arrogate this law, nor is it allowed to derogate from it in anything, nor is it possible to arrogate it wholly. We can neither be released from this law by popular vote, nor should another be sought for to gloss and interpret it. It is not one thing at Rome, another at Athens; one thing now, and another afterwards; but one eternal and immutable law will govern all men for ever, and there will be one, the common master and ruler of all, God. He it was that proposed and carried this law, and whoever does not yield obedience to it will revolt against himself, and by offering an affront to the nature of man he will thereby suffer the greatest penalties, even if he avoids other evil."

The Stoic indeed understood this doctrine in a pantheistic sense. His god was the universal reason of the world, of which a particle was bestowed on man at his birth. It only needed the Christian doctrine of a personal God, the Creator and Lord of all things, Who in many ways manifests His law to man, but more especially through and in the voice of conscience, to turn it into the Catholic doctrine of moral obligation which has been analysed above. In the teaching of Christ, right conduct is summed up in the observance of the commandments. Those commandments constitute the law of God, which He came not to destroy, but to fulfill. "All these things," under the most terrible sanctions. St. Paul, of course, only preached the doctrine of his Master. The legalism which he rejected was the ceremonial and the merely outward observance of the Pharisees, not the internal and the external observance of the moral law. Although a Stoic, and the author of forty tablets of stone, yet he had it written on the flaky tablets of his heart, and his conscience bore witness to it, as did that of the Jew (Rom., ii, 14). This is the doctrine still taught in the Catholic Church. It derives directly from Christ and His Apostles, though it is often expressed in the language of philosophy, interpreted consistently with the Christian doctrine of Christian liberty. Since the Reformation it has been the fashion with many to reject it as legalism in favour of what is called Christian liberty. Christian liberty, however, interpreted by private judgment, developed into various systems, which despised the idea of whether it brought pleasure or pain, which the Stoic philosopher indeed reckoned of no importance, and affected to despise. restoration, as there is no just title to retain the price of justice. Natural equity requires that all should be bound to do innocent persons no injury, and to be guilty of crime, and so a judge must give those who are accused the benefit of the doubt, when the crime imputed to them cannot be clearly proved. In civil actions he is bound to give sentence according to the merits of the case, and so in default of certainty of right, he must decide in favor of the party who has the need to claim innocent persons' good. What is applicable in due measure to magistrates, referees, arbitrators, and jurymen, all of whom are invested with some of the functions of a judge.

Advocates and lawyers are persons skilled in the law who for payment undertake the legal business of clients engaged to put their skill and knowledge to use. Advocates, however, may be disbarred if the conduct of the business entrusted to them. They must keep faith with their clients and use only just means to obtain the objects which they desire. As they act for and in the name of their clients, the latter may not undertake a cause which is clearly unjust, otherwise they will be guilty of cooperating in injustice, and will be bound to make restitution for all the unjust damage which they cause to others. However, previous certainty of the justice of a cause is not necessary in every case. A lawyer may enter an action and will be sufficient if the justice of the cause to be undertaken is at least probable, for then it may be hoped that the truth will be made clear in the course of the trial. As soon as an advocate is satisfied that his client has no case, he should inform him of the fact, and should not proceed further with the case. An advocate may undertake a case which is morally unjust, whether he be guilty or not, for even if his defense of a red culprit is successful, no great harm will usually be done by a guilty man escaping the punishment which he deserves. To justify a criminal accusation of another there must be morally certain evidence of his guilt, as otherwise there will be danger of doing serious and unjust harm to the reputation of one's neighbor.

From the Decree of the Holy Office, 19 Dec., 1860, in answer to the Bishop of Southwark, it is clear that in England an advocate may undertake a case where there is question of judicial separation between husband and wife. Even in an action for divorce in a civil court, a lawyer may defend the husband, even if the bill is not sufficient. If the marriage has already been pronounced null and void by competent ecclesiastical authority, a Catholic advocate may impugn its validity in the civil courts. Moreover, for just reason, as, for example, to obtain a variation in the marriage settlement, or to prevent the necessity of having to maintain a bastard child, a Catholic lawyer may petition for a divorce in the civil court, not with the intention of enabling his client to marry again while his spouse is still living, but with a view to obtaining the civil effects of divorce in the civil tribunal. This opinion at any rate is defended as probable by many good theologians. The reason is because marriage is neither contracted nor dissolved before the civil authority; in the formalities prescribed for marriage by civil law there is only question of the civil authority taking cognizance of who are married, and of the civil effects which now flow from the contract.

In canon law excommuni cated and infamous persons, accomplices, and others are debarred from prosecuting causes. But, as a general rule any one who has full use of his senses is permitted to prosecute in American and English law. Nobody should undertake a prosecution when greater evil than good would follow from it, or when there is not moral certainty as to the guilt of the accused. However, it may be done for the sake of the public good, and there may be an obligation to do it, as when one's office compels one to undertake the task, or the defence of the innocent or the public good has not been opposed by the evidence commands it. Thus by ecclesiastical law heretics and priests guilty of solicitation in the sacred tribunal are to be denounced to the ordinary.

The defendant in a criminal trial is not himself subjected to examination, according to English law, unless he offers himself voluntarily to give evidence, and then he may be examined, like a defendant in civil proceedings, in order that no witness may be examined, and the question arises whether he is bound to tell the truth against himself. He is bound to tell the truth if he is interrogated according to law; canon law prescribes that when there is semiplenum probatio of the crime and this is made clear to the defendant he is to be interrogated.

The defendant may in self-defense make known the secret crime of a witness against him, if it really conduce to his defence; but, of course, he may never impute false crimes to anybody. A criminal may not defend himself against lawful arrest, for that would be to resist lawful authority, but he is not compelled to deliver himself up to justice, and it is not a sin to escape from overtaking if he can do so. The law prescribes that he shall be kept in durance, not that he shall voluntarily remain in custody. A criminal lawfully condemned to death is not obliged to save his life by escape or other means if he can do so; he should submit to the execution of the sentence passed upon him. While undertaking may do so meritoriously.

Charity or obedience may impose an obligation to give evidence in a court of justice. If serious harm can be prevented by offering one's self as a witness, there will as a rule be an obligation to do so, and obedience imposes the obligation when one is summoned by lawful authority. A witness is bound by his oath to speak the truth of what he has knowledge of, and to answer the questions lawfully put to him. He is not bound to incriminate himself, nor, of course, may the seal of confession ever be broken.

The canon law laid it down that the testimony of two witnesses of unsuspected character was necessary and sufficient evidence of any fact alleged in a court of justice. The testimony of a solitary witness was not usually sufficient or admissible evidence of a crime, and in keeping with this the theologians decided that a solitary witness should not declare what he knew of a crime, inasmuch as he was not lawfully interrogated. English law, however, with most modern systems, admits the testimony of one witness as admissible evidence, if, in his own opinion, the truth in answer to the questions lawfully put to him, he is not bound to incriminate himself, nor, of course, may the seal of confession ever be broken.

A doctor who holds himself out as ready to undertake the care of the sick must have competent knowledge of his profession and must exercise his office at least with ordinary care and diligence; otherwise he will sin against justice and charity in exposing himself to the risk of seriously injuring his neighbour. Unless he is bound by some special agreement he is not ordinarily obliged to undertake any particular case, for there are usually others who are willing and able to give the necessary assistance to the sick. Even in times of pestilence he will not commit sin if he leave the neighbourhood, unless he is bound to remain by some special contract.

He should not make exorbitant charges for his services, nor multiply visits uselessly and thus increase his fees, nor call in other doctors without necessity. On the other hand, every doctor should visit a patient whose case he has undertaken when called as far as is reasonable, and he should be ready to call in other doctors for consultation when necessary or when he is asked to do so. He is sometimes bound by the general law of charity to give his assistance gratis to the poor.
He may not neglect safer remedies in order to try those which are less safe, but there is nothing to preclude him from prescribing what will probably do good if it is certain that it will not do harm. In a desperate case, with the consent of the sick person and of his relations, he may make use of what will probably do good though it may also probably do harm, provided that there is nothing better to be done in circumstances. It is altogether wrong to make experiments with doubtful remedies or operations on living human beings; vitium experimentum in corpore vitii.

When the patient is in danger of death, the doctor is bound out of charity to warn him or those who attend on him, that he may make all necessary preparatory counsels for death. Hence: ANEMOMATRIS; CRANIONOMY; HYPNOTISM.

Teachers hold the place of parents with regard to those committed to their charge for the purpose of instruction. They are bound in justice to exercise due care and diligence in the discharge of their office. They must have the knowledge and skill which that office demands.

O'Braein, Tighernach, Irish annalist and Abbot of Rosecommon and Clonmacnoise, d. 1088. Little is known of his personal history except that he must have been born in the early part of the eleventh century and that he came of a Connacht family.

His "Annals" (among the earliest of Irish annals) are of the greatest value to the historian of Ireland because of the author's attempt to synchronize Irish events with those of the rest of Europe from the earliest times. His learning was increased by his quotations, among others, from the works of the Venerable Bede, Josephus, Eusebius, and Orsobius, not to speak of the Vulgate. But his sources for the Irish portions of the "Annals" are not now discoverable because of the loss of the Irish manuscripts from which he drew his information. Only fragments of Tighernach's "Annals" are now extant; these are in a vellum of the twelfth century and one of the fourteenth century in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and in a fourteenth-century MS. in Trinity College Library (Dublin). These fragments were published by Dr. O'Connor in his "Recom Hibernicarum Scriptorum," 1825, but O'Connor's text is much inferior. They have recently been published and translated by Whitley Stokes in the "Revue Celtique" (vols. XVI, XVII, XVIII). Two pages in facsimile are given in Gilbert's "National Manuscripts of Ireland," part 1.

Obregonians (or Poor Inhabitants), a small congregation of men who successfully opposed the Rule of St. Francis, founded by Bernardino Obregón (b. 5 May, 1540, at Las Huellas near Burgos, Spain; d. 6 Aug., 1599). Of a noble family Obregón was an officer in the Spanish army, but retired and dedicated himself to the service of the sick in the hospitals of Madrid. Others became associated with him in hospital service, and in 1550 he obtained a dispensation of the nuncio at Madrid to found a nunnery at Castilla. When Obregón was besieged in 1551, he urged a stubborn resistance and so embittered the Ormondistas and the Parliamentarians, that in the capitulation he was excluded from quarter and protection. The day after the surrender, he was caught by Major General Pucelle and Father Wolf were discovered in the post-house, brought before a court martial and ordered for execution, which took place on the following day.

O'Braudair, David, an Irish poet, b. about 1625, most probably in the barony of Barrymore, Co. Cork, XI. - 13.
but according to many authorities in that of Connello, Co. Limerick; d. January, 1698. He was well educated in the Irish, Latin, and English languages. His historical poems show the influence of Geoffrey Kenting, one of his favorite Irish authors. He wrote elegies on the deaths of many of the prominent members of the leading Munster families, especially the Bourkes of Cahirmoyle, the Fitzgeralds of Cahirghlashe, and the Barrys of Co. Cork, who later befriended him in his poverty. All his poems, whether historical, social, or elegiac, are marked by a freshness rare in the seventeenth century and he furnishes many interesting details about life and manners of his time. Two of his epitaphs, one of composition rare in Irish literature, have been preserved. They were written to celebrate the marriages of the sisters, Una and Eleanor Bourke of Cahirmoyle. His satires when directed against the Cromwellian Planters or the Duke of Ormonde and his followers, are bitter, and more humorous when treating themes of local interest, as in the case of his witty proverbial “Gungan Glog”, or his mock-heroic defence of the smiths of Co. Limerick. His religious poems exhibit great beauty and depth of feeling, especially the poem on the Passion of Christ. Others like those on the schisms of the Church of Ireland are anti-tainting. His poems in the Oates Plot (1678-82) are polemical and contain details not found elsewhere.

His political poems treating the events of Irish history from the Cromwellian Plantation (1652) to the end of the War of the Revolution (1691) reveal his great political foresight and independent views. His “Saint Fergusdaur blach n-Eircum” summarizes the history of Ireland from 1641 to 1684, and a series of poems commemorates the exciting events of the reign of James II (1685-94). Being written from a national and Catholic standpoint, these poems, owing to the dearth of Irish documents relating to that period, are invaluable for the light which they throw upon the sentiments of the Irish nobles and the half-century of war, confiscation, and persecution. Despite his enthusiasm for the national cause, O’Brairdair is no mere eulogist, and in “An Longhbriseadh” (The Shipwreck, 1691), he criticizes the army and its leaders severely. He warmly defended the conduct of Sir Samuel in the negotiations preceding the close of the war, and views upon the relations of the French upon the year of Colonel O’Kelly in his “Macarie Excitium”, enable us to appreciate better the divergence of opinions in Irish military circles in regard to the acceptance of the terms offered. O’Brairdair was a master of the art of versification, and wrote with ease and grace at the most varied and complicated syllable and rhyme schemes. His style is graceful, his language classical, and his vocabulary extensive; but a fondness for archaic expressions prevented most of his poems from being popular in the succeeding centuries. He is copious in illustration, careful to avoid repetition, and never sacrifices reason to rhythm. Though he was an expert scribe and an inquirer in ancient history, the existing manuscript in his handwriting seems to be: 1. 18 fol. 4 to 14 in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. It contains three of his latest poems (1693-4), some genealogical matter taken from “Leabhar Ui Mhaoineherna” and the “Rental” of Baron Bourne of Castlemconnell, Co. Limerick. Most of his poems are preserved in three early manuscripts: 25 M. 41, 23 L. 37, by Seaghan Stae (1709-9), both in the Library of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin, and Add. 29614, by Seaghan na Raithineach (1725), in the British Museum.

Others are to be found in various MSS. in the above-mentioned libraries and in those of Trinity College, Dublin, Maynooth, while a few are preserved in MSS. in private hands. A complete collection of his writings with translation, of which the first volume has appeared (1910), is in course of publication by the present writer for the Irish Text Society, London.

O’CALLAGHAN, EDMUND BAILEY, physician, publicist, and historian, b. at Mallow, Cork, 29 Feb., 1707; d. at New York, 29 May, 1880. His eldest brother Theodore held a commission in the English army; the others, Eugene and David, became priests and were distinguished for their learning. On completing his education in Ireland, Edmund went to Paris (1820) to study medicine. In 1830 he settled in Montreal and besides the practice of medicine, took an active part in the National Patriotic movement and in 1834 became the editor of its organ the “Indicative”. Elected to the Provincial Parliament in 1836 he held a conspicuous position in debate for popular rights, took a leading part in the movement for the abolition of the infamous trade and court of the United States, remained nearly a year the guest of Chancellor Walworth in Saratoga, and in 1838 resumed the practice of medicine in Albany, where he edited the “Northern Light”, an industrial journal.

The anti-rent agitation of the time led him to study the land-rights of the Patrons. Attracted by the rich but neglected old Dutch records in the possession of the State, he mastered the Dutch language and in 1846 published the first volume of “History of New Netherland”, the first real history of New York State. The result of its publication was the official commission of J. R. Brohead by the New York State Legislature to prepare a work of similar scope. In 1847 he published “The History of the Hague, and to make copies of documents bearing on New York colonial history. These documents were published in eleven quarto volumes (1855-61) under the editorship of O’Callaghan and are a monument of care and ability. In 1848 he was made keeper of the historical MSS. of New York State, and in this capacity serves the state, whether he writes or reads. He was the first to call public attention to the value of the Jesuit Relations, and read a paper before the New York Historical Society, giving description of their purpose and scope. James Lenox began to collect the scattered copies and the Lenox Library in New York, contains the only complete set or series of printed Jesuit Relations. The rigorous investigation of this field was based on the Lenox set of the French, Latin, and Italian texts. O’Callaghan dedicated to Lenox his “List of the editions of the Holy Scripture and parts thereof Printed in America Previous to 1860”. An edition of this work with annotations by Lenox is in the Lenox Library, New York.

In 1874 O’Callaghan moved to New York and assumed the task of editing its municipal records, but through difficulties about financial resources they were never published. Though highly esteemed for his medical learning, O’Callaghan’s great claim on the gratitude of posterity is his historical work. The correctness of his style is evident in all his writings, which contain a mine of original information about New York colonial history.

O'Carolan, Turlough (Irish, Tóirdhealbhach Ó Cearbhalláin, usually spoken of as the "last of the Irish bards", b. in the County Meath, Ireland, in 1670; d. at Ballyfarran, 1737. He early became blind from an attack of small-pox. Descended from an ancient family, he achieved renown as a harper. His advent marks the passing of the old Gaelic distinction between the bard and the harper. Celebrated as poet, composer, and harper, he composed probably over two hundred poems, many of them of a lively, Pindaric nature, and mostly addressed to his patrons or fair ladies belonging to the old county families, where he loved to visit and where he was always a welcome guest. His poems are full of curious turns and twists of metre to suit his airs, to which they are admirably wed, and very few are in regular stanzas. There are a few exceptions, as his celebrated "Ode to Whiskey", one of the finest Bceanahian songs in any language, and his more famous but imperissibly inferior "Receipt for Drinking". His harp is preserved in the hall of the O'Connor Don in Clonmacnoise. He composed probably over twenty poems in his "Irish Minstrelsy", and the present writer has collected about twelve more, which seem to be all that survive of his literary output. Moore utilized many of his "phantasies" for his "Melodies", as in "The Young May Moon", "O Banquet Not", "Oh, the Sight Entraining". No complete and accurate collection of his airs has been made, though many of them were introduced into ballad opera. The following note in Irish, by the writing of his friend and biographer Charles O'Carolan, is given in a manuscript MSS.: "Saturday the XXV day of March, 1738, Tóirdhealbhach Ó Cearbhalláin, the intellectual sage and prime musician of all Ireland died to-day, in the 68th year of his age. The mercy of God may his soul find, for he was a moral and a pious man." Walker, Irish Harp (Dublin, 1781); O'Kelly, Irish Writers (Dublin, 1820); Goldsmith, Essays; Hardiman, Irish Minstrelsy, I (London, 1831)—this volume contains a portrait of Carolan engraved from an original drawing by the Rev. John Grattan-Flood. Grattan-Flood says he has traced five earlier editions of the years 1789 and 1804; O'Neill, Irish Folksongs, Chicago 1840.

Occasionalism (Latin occassio) is the metaphysical theory which maintains that finite things have no efficient causality of their own, but that whatever happens in the world is caused by God, creatures being merely the occasions of the Divine activity. This is the occasion that which by its presence brings about the action of the efficient cause. This it can do as final cause by alluring the efficient cause, or as secondary efficient cause by impelling the primary cause to do what would otherwise be left undone. Occasionalism was foreshadowed in Greek philosophy in the doctrine of the Stoics who regarded God as pervading nature and determining the actions of all beings through the fundamental principle of self-preservation. It appeared openly in the Arabian thought of the Middle Ages (of. Stein, H., 193-215 infras); but its full development is found only in modern philosophy, as an outgrowth of the Cartesian doctrine of the relation between body and mind. According to Descartes the essence of the soul is thought, and the essence of the body extention. Thought and soul therefore have nothing in common. How then do they interact? Descartes himself tried to solve this problem by attributing to the soul the power of directing the movements of the body. But this idea conflicted with the doctrine involved in his denial of any immediate interaction between body and mind. The first step toward a solution was taken by Johannes Clauberg (1625-65). According to him all the phenomena of the outside world are modes of motion and are caused by God. When therefore the mind seems to have acted upon the outside world, it is a pure delusion. The soul, however, can cause its own mental processes, which have nothing in common with any modes of action. Matter, on the other hand, cannot act upon mind. The presence of certain changes in the bodily organism is the occasion whereof the soul produces the corresponding ideas at the particular time rather than any other. To the soul Clauberg also attributes the power of influencing by means of the will the movements of the body. The Occasionalism of Clauberg is different from that of later members of the school; with him the soul is the cause which is occasioned to act—with the others it is God. Louis de la Forge (Tractus de mente humana, 1666) is regarded by some as the real father of Occasionalism. His starting-point was the problem of the relation between energy and matter. Following the Cartesian method, he argued that what cannot be clearly and distinctly conceived cannot be held as true. We can form no clear idea of the attraction exerted by one body on another at a distance nor of the energy that moves a body from one place to another. Further an apparent cause of a certain result, is always an impure cause, which is absolutely inert; the union between matter and energy is inconceivable. Matter then cannot be the cause of the physical phenomena; these must be produced by God, the first, universal, and total cause of all motion. In his theory of the union be-between body and soul, de la Forge approached the later Leibnizian doctrine of a pre-established harmony. God must have willed and brought about the union between body and soul, therefore He willed to do all that is necessary to perfect this union. The union between body and mind willed also to produce, as first and universal cause, the thoughts that should correspond to the organic movements of sensation, and the movements which follow upon the presence of some conscious processes. But there are other movements for which the soul itself is responsible as efficient cause, and these are the effects of the spontaneous activity of our free will.

The Occasionalism of Arnold Geulincx (1624–1669) is ethical rather than cosmological in its inception. The first tract of his "Ethics" (Land's ed., of the Opera, The Hague, 1891–93) is a study of what he termed the cardinal virtues. These are not prudence, temperance, justice, and fortitude. Virtue according to Geulincx is the love of God and of Reason (III, 16–17, 29). The cardinal virtues are the properties of virtue which immediately flow from its very essence such that they cannot be done away with or external. These properties are diligence, obedience, justice, humility (III, 17). The division which Geulincx makes of humility is one of fundamental importance in his philosophy. It divides his view of the world into two parts—one, the understanding of our relation to the world, and the other, the concept of our relation to God. Humility consists in knowing that self and the full taking of self. I find in myself nothing that is my own but to know and to will. Therefore I must be conscious of all that I do, and that of which I am not conscious is not the product of my own causality. Hence the universal principle of causality—"Quad ressecus tu modo facie, non scio si tu non facies quod facisti quando tu facisti the work of someone else" (III, 33). This is the Deity who sees and knows all things. The second part of Geulincx's philosophy is connected with Occasionalism as the effect with the cause. Its guiding principle is: Where you can do nothing there also you should desire nothing (III, 222). This leads to a mysticism and asceticism which however must not be taken too seriously for it is tempered by the obligation of caring for the body and propagating the species.

Nicholas Malebranche (q.v.) developed Occasionalism to its uttermost limit, approaching so near to Pantheism that he himself remarked that the difference between himself and Spinoza was that he taught that the universe is God and Spinoza said that God was in the universe. Starting out with the Cartesian doctrine, that the essence of the soul is thought and that of matter is extension, he sought to prove that creatures have no causality of their own. Experience seems to tell us that one body acts upon another, but all that we know is that the movement of one body follows upon that of another. We have no experience of one body causing the movement of another. Therefore, says Malebranche, one body cannot act upon another. By a similar argument he attempts to prove that body cannot act upon mind. Since experience can tell us only that a sensation follows upon the stimulus, therefore it is not the case of the senses.

He uses the argument of Geulincx to prove that mind cannot act upon body. Not only is there no interaction between body and mind, and between one body and another, but there is no causality within the mind itself. Our sensations, for example, are not caused by bodies, and are independent of ourselves. Therefore they must be produced by some higher being. Our ideas cannot be created by the mind. Neither can the body and mind be separated in any way, for Malebranche would have first to perceive the object in order to copy it, after which the production of an idea would be superfluous. Our ideas cannot be all possessed as complete products from the beginning, because it is a fact that the mind goes through a process of gradual development. Nor can the mind possess a faculty that would enable it to act without constraint because it would have to produce also the ideas of extended bodies and extension is excluded from the essence of the mind and therefore from the scope of its causal efficiency. If then there is no way of accounting for ideas and sensations either by the efficiency of the mind itself or by that of the outside world they must be produced by God, the infinite, omnipresent, universal Cause. God knows all things because He produced all things. Therefore the ideas of all things are in God, and on account of His most intimate union with our souls the spirit can see what is in God.

Regarding the Occasionalists is also mentioned R. H. Lotze (1817–81). His Occasionalism is really only a statement that we are ignorant of any interaction between body and mind, or between one material thing and another. He is not an Occasionalist in the metaphysical sense of the word. In estimating the value of the Occasionalistic position we must realize that it sprang from a twofold problem, the interaction of body and mind and the relation of body, mind, and world to God, the first cause of all. The success of the Occasionalist answer to the first difficulty was dependent upon the fate of the Cartesian philosophy. If man is composed of two absolutely distinct substances that have nothing in common, then the conclusion of the Occasionalist is logical, the interaction and there is no interaction between body and mind. What appears to be such must be due to the efficient causality of some external being. This difficulty was not felt so keenly in Scholastic philosophy because of the doctrine of matter and form, which explains the relation of body and soul as that of two incomplete but complementary souls problems, the interaction again to lose its hold upon modern thought. For Cartesianism led, on the one hand, to a Monistic Spiritualism and, on the other, to Materialism. In either case the very foundations of Occasionalism were undermined. In its attempt to solve the second difficulty, Occasionalism did not meet with any particular success. From its doctrine of the relation between body and soul it argued to what must be the relation between God and the creature in general. The superstructure could not stand without the foundation.

Occasions of Sin are external circumstances whether of things or persons which either because of their special nature or because of the frailty common to man make any one of the senses incline or cause him or her to commit a sin. It is important to remember that there is a wide difference between the cause and the occasion of sin. The cause of sin in the last analysis

is the pensive human will and is intrinsic to the human composite. The occasion is something extrinsic and, given the freedom of the will, cannot, properly speaking, stand alone in relation to the act or vicious habit which we call sin. There can be no doubt that in general the same obligation which binds us to refrain from sin requires us to shun its occasion. Qui tenetur ad finem, tenetur ad mediat (he who is bound to reach a certain end is bound to employ the means to attain it). Theologians distinguish between the proximate and the remote occasion. They are not altogether at one as to the precise value to be attributed to the terms. De Lugo defines proximate occasion (De potenti., disp. 14, n. 149) as one in which men of like calibre for the most part fall into mortal sin, or one in which experience points to the same result from the special weakness of a particular person. The remote occasion lacks these elements. All theologians are agreed that there is no obligation to avoid the remote occasions of sin both because this would, practically speaking, be impossible and because they do not involve serious danger of sin. As to the proximate occasion, it may be of the sort that is described as necessary, that is, such as a person cannot abandon or get rid of. Whether this impossibility be physical or moral does not matter for the determination of the principles hereinafter to be laid down. Or it may be voluntary, that is within the competency of one to remove. Moralists distinguish between a proximate occasion which is continuous and one which, whilst it unquestionably proximates, yet confronts a person with a choice, or involves such a hazard, that it is in the presence of a proximate occasion at once voluntary and continuous is bound to remove it. Refusal on the part of a penitent to do so would make it imperative for the confessor to deny absolution. It is not always necessary for the confessor to await the actual performance of this duty in giving absolution; he may be content with a sincere promise, which is the minimum to be required. Theologians agree that one is not obliged to shun the proximate but necessary occasions. Nemo tenetur ad impossibile (no one is bound to do what is impossible). There is no question here of freely casting oneself into the danger of sin. The assumption is that stress of unavoidable circumstances has imposed this unhappy situation. All that can then be required is the employment of such means as will make the peril of sin remote. The difficulty is to determine when a proximate occasion is to be regarded as not physically (that is plain enough) but morally necessary. Much has been written in the English words derived from the Latin, Greek, Persian, Assyrian from the Sumerian or Di- ranian word inga or inga ("sleep", "profound"), a designation for the Proto-Chaldean priests or wizards. Magi became a standard term for the later Zoroas- trians, or Persian, priesthood through whom Eastern oc- cult arts were made known to the Greeks; hence ephesos (as also the kindred words aiges, aydza), a magi- cian or a person endowed with secret knowledge and power like a Persian magus. In a restricted sense magic is understood to be an interference with the usual course of physical nature by apparently inadequate means (recitation of formulas, gestures, mixing of incongruous elements, and other mysterious ac- tions); the knowledge of which is obtained through secret communication with the force underlying the universe (God, the Devil, the soul of the world, etc.); it is the attempt to work miracles not by the power of God, gratuitously communicated to man, but by the use of hidden forces beyond man's control. Its ad- vocates, despairing to move the Deity by supplication, seek the desired end by like means, which are only reserved to the Deity. It is a corruption of religion, not a preliminary stage of it as Rationalists main- tain, and it appears as an accompaniment of decadent rather than of rising civilization. There is nothing linked with those of Lydgate; the two poets were fol- lowerboys and enthusiastic admirers of Chaucer. It is most probable that Occl... to show that in Babylon, Greece, and Rome the use of magic decreased as these nations progressed; on the contrary, it increased as they declined. It is not true that "religion is the despair of magic"; in reality, magic is but a disease of religion.

The disease has been widespread; but if one land may be designated as the home of magic it is Chaldea, or Southern Babylonia. The earliest written records of magic are found in the cuneiform inscription on a brick of an Assyrian palace in 800 B.C. copied from Babylonian originals. Although the earliest religious tablets refer to divination and in the latest Chaldean period astrology proper absorbed the energy of the Babylonian hierarchy, medical magic and nature magic were largely practised. The Baru-priest as the diviner seems to have held the foremost rank, but hardly inferior was the Ashu-priest, the priest of incantations, who recited the magical formulæ of the “Shurpu”, “Makhu”, and “Utukku”. “Utukku” (burning) was a spell to remove a curse due to legal uncleanliness; “Makhu” (consumming) was a counter-spell against wizards and witches; “Utukku” (injuring evil spirits) was a series of sixteen formulæ against ghosts and demons. The “Asaraki marsutum” was a series of twelve formulæ against fevers and sickness. In this case the evil influence was first transferred to a wax figure representing the patient or an animal carcases, and the formulæ were recited over the substitute. Ti’i tablets, nine in number, give recitations over a “ti’i image”. These formulæ repeated over little figures were supposed to drive away the ogres and witches from children. All these formulæ pronounced over the figures were accompanied by an elaborate ritual, e.g. “A table thou shalt place behind the censer which is before the Sun-God (Statue of Shamash), thou shalt place thereon 4 jug-skins (evi’i jets), thou shalt have a candle of wheat, thou shalt add a mixture of honey and butter and sprinkle with salt; a table thou shalt place behind the censer which is before the Storm-God (Statue of Adad) and behind the censer which is before Mero-darch.”

The magicians mentioned above were authorized and practised "white", or benevolent, magic; the "Kash-shapi", or unauthorized practitioners, employed "black" magic against mankind. That the latter had preternatural powers to do harm no one doubted; hence the severe punishment meted out to them. The Code of Hammurabi (c. 2000 B.C.) appointed the ord of water for one who was accused of being a sorcerer, or even an agent of death. If the accused was drowned, his property went to the accuser; if he was saved, the accusers was put to death and his property went to the accuser. This of course took place only if the accusation could not be satisfactorily proven otherwise. The principal god invoked in Chaldean Magic was Ea, source of all wisdom, and Marduk (Marduk-blo) himself was alleged to have inherited his father’s knowledge. A curiously naïve scene was supposed to be enacted before the application of a medicinal spell: Marduk went to Ea’s house and said: “Father, headache from the underworld hath gone forth. The patient does not know the reason; whereby may he be relieved?” Ea answered: “O Marduk, my son, what can I add to thy knowledge? What I know thou knowest also. Go, my son Marduk”; and then follows the prescription. This tale was regularly repeated before use of the recipe.

Without suggesting the dependence of one national system of magic upon another, the similarity of some ideologically practised in the Middle East, and with the Jewish, may be noted. All rely on the power of words, the utterance of a hidden name, or the mere existence of the name on an amulet or stone. Magic was supposed to be the triumph of intellect over matter, the word being the key to the mysteries of the physical world: utter the name of a malignant influence and its power is undone; utter the name of a benevolent deity and force goes out to destroy the adversary. The repeated naming of Gilgal-Nekehu and his attributes destroyed the evil influence in the wax figure representing the person concerned. The force of the Gnostic Iw was notorious. In Egyptian magic a mere agglomeration of vowels or meaningless syllables was supposed to work good or evil. Their barbarous sounds were the object of ridicule to the man of common sense. In many cases they were of Jewish, Assyrian, Babylonian, or Aramaic origin and because unintelligible to Egyptians, the words were generally corrupted beyond recognition. Thus on a demotic papyrus is found the prescription: “in time of storm and danger of shipwreck cry Anuk Adoni (23°39’ 28”) and the disaster will be averted.” On a Greek papyrus the name of the Assyrian Ereskihal is found as Eresokho. So potent is a name that if an inscribed amulet be washed and the water drunk, or the charm written on papyrus be soaked in water and this taken, or if the word be written on hard-boiled eggs without shell and these eaten, preternatural powers come into play. Some other spell, a spell of “Maklu”, has but six words: "the person or thing to be affected by the spell is replaced by his image, or, like the “ushabtus” figures in Egyptian tombs, images replace the protective powers invoked, or lastly some part (hair, nail-parrings, garments, etc.) take the place of the whole person. The almost universal “magic circle” is only another name for a “sorcery” incantation. If the formula goes back to Chaldean magic under the name of usurru, made with a sprinkling of lime and flour. If the medical wizard or the Indian sorcerer surrounds himself or others with a rampart of little stones, this is again but the make-believe of a wall.

After Babylonia Egypt was foremost in magic; the nebual Isis, c. 1250 B.C., was supposed to be by its name its Egyptian origin. Coptic exorcisms against all sorts of diseases abound amongst the papyri pertaining to magic, and magic claims a great part of ancient Egyptian literature. Unlike Babylonian magic, however, it seems to have retained to the last its medicinal and preventive character; it rarely indulged in astrology or prediction. Egyptian legend spoke of a magician Teta who worked miracles before Khfu (Cheops) (c. 3800 B.C.), and Greek tradition tells of Nectanebus, last native King of Egypt (358 B.C.), as the greatest of magicians.

That the Jews were prone to magic is evidenced by their strict laws against it and the warnings of the Prophets (Ezek. ii, 18; Deut. vii, 22; iii, 18, 20; iv, 3); Mich., v, 11; cf. IV Kings, xxii, 6). Nevertheless, Jewish magic flourished, especially just before the birth of Christ, as appears from the Book of Enoch, the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, and the Testament of Solomon. Origen testifies that in his day to adjure demons was looked upon as specifically "Jewish", that these adorations had to be made in Hebrew and from Solomon’s books (In Matth., xxvi, 63, P. G., X11I, 1757). The frequency of Jewish magic is also corroborated by Talumide lore.

The Aryan races of Asia seem somewhat less addicted to magic than the Semitie or Turanian races. The Medes and the Persians, in the earlier and purer period of their Avesta religion, or Zoroastranism, seem to have a horror of magic. When the Persians, after their conquest of the Chaldean Empire, finally absorbed Chaldean characteristics, the magi had become more or less scientific astronomers rather than sorcerers. The Indians, likewise, to judge from the Rig-Veda, were the same as the people from this superstition. In the Yajurveda, however, their liturgical functions are practically magic performances; and the Atharvaveda contains little else than magical recitations against every ill and for every happening. The Sutras, finally, especially those of the Grihya and Sautra ritual, show how the higher aspects of religion had been overgrown by magical ceremonies. Against this degeneration the Vedanta makes a vigorous stand and attempts to bring the Indian mind back to earlier simplicity and purity. Buddhism, which at first disregarded magic, fell a prey to the universal contagion, especially in China and Tibet.

The Aryans of Europe, Greeks, Romans, Teutons, Celts, and others, were similarly infected by the Ancient World. The Romans were too self-reliant and practical to be terrified by magic. Their practice of divination and auguries seems to have been borrowed from the Etruscans and the Marsi; the latter were considered experts in magic even during the empire (Verg., "Ab.", VII, 750, sqq.; Phlny, VII, ii; XXI, xiii). The Di Atalanta lamented that the first great religion of this age did not have among its divinities the devas, the gods, and that they were not native Roman deities. The Romans were conscious of their common sense in these matters and felt themselves superior to the Greeks. In the first century of our era Oriental magic invaded the Roman Empire. Pliny in his "Natural History" (77 A.D.) in the opening chapters of Bk. XXX, gives the most important extant discussion on magic by any ancient writer, only to brand all magic as imposture. None less his book is a storehouse of magic recipes, e.g.: "Wear as an amulet the carcases of a frog minus the flesh, and a piece of russet-coloured cloth and it will cure fever." (Bk. XXXI, xxviii). So far this is not a belief in medicinal magic. But among the Romans it may be referred to as the conjuration of charms. The Roman word for form was condemned in every age by many of the best spirits of their day: Tacitus, Favorinus, Sextus Empiricus, and Cicero who even denounced against divination. Officially by many laws of the empire against malefic and "mathematikos" magic was forbidden under Augustus, Tiberius, Claudius, and even Caracalla; unofficially, however, even the emperors sometimes dabbled in magic. Nero is said to have studied it; but failing to work miracles, he abandoned it in disgust. Soon after the magicians found an imperial supporter in Otho, and tolerance under Vespasian, Hadrian, and M. Aurelius, and even financial aid under Alexander Severus.

The Greeks regarded Thessaly and Thrace as the countries especially addicted to magic. The goddess Hecate, who was thought to preside over magical functions, was originally a foreign deity and was probably introduced into Greek mythology by Herodotus. She is not mentioned in the Iliad or Odyssey though much later a story is told of a man who cut a piece of the sorceress of the Odyssey is Cerc, famous for the well-known trick of changing men into beasts (Od., X-XII). In later times the foremost magician was Molyde, priestess of Hecate; but the gruesome tales told of her express the Greek horror for, as well as belief in, black magic. Curse formulae or magic spells against the lives of one's enemies seem to have found no mightier name than Hermes Cthonion. As earth-god he was a manifestation of the world-soul and controlled nature's powers. In Egypt he was identified with Thoth, the god of hidden wisdom, became the keeper of magic secrets and gave his name to the priestly brothers of the Egyptian secret craft. Apuleius, by education an Athenian, in his "Golden Ass" (c. 150 A.D.), satirized the frauds of contemporary wonder-workers but praised the genuine magi from Persia. When accused of magic, he defended himself in his "Apology" which shows clearly the public attitude towards magic in his day. "We believe in a superior god, we acknowledge his manifestation and the existence of true magic. St. Hippolytus of Rome (A Refutation of All Heresies, Bk. IV) gives a sketch of the wizardry practised in the Greek-speaking world.

Teutons and Celts also had their magic, though less is known of it. The magical element in the First Edda and in the Beowulf is simple and closely connected with nature phenomena. Woden (Wodan) who invented the runes, was the god for healing and good charms. Loki was a malignant spirit who harassed mankind and with the witch Thack caused the death of Baldur (Baldor). The magic of the mistletoe seems to be an heirloom from earliest Teutonic times. The magic of the Celts seems to have been in the hands of the druids, who, though perhaps mainly diviners, appear also as magicians in Celtic heroic literature. As they wrote nothing, little is known of their magical lore. For modern magicians amongst the typically Occult especially Skelt's "Malay Magic." (London, 1900).

Magic as a practice finds no place in Christianity, though the belief in the reality of magical powers has been held by Christians and individual Christians have been given to the practice. Two main reasons account for this, the first, ignorance of physical laws, when the boundary between the two might have been present. But, secondly, belief in the frequency of diabolic interference with the forces of nature led easily to belief in real magic. The early Christians were emphatically warned against the practice of it in the "Didache" (v, 1) and the letter of Barnabas (xx, 1). In fact it was condemned as a heinous crime. The danger, however, came not from the strange oriental magicians but from the pseudo-Christian Gnostics. Although Simon Magus and Elymas, that "child of the devil", (Acts, xii, 6 sq.) served as deterrent examples for all Christians, it took centuries to eradicate the propensity to magic. St. Gregory the Great, St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, and St. Ephraem inveighed against it. A more rational view of religion and nature had hardly gained ground, when the Germanic nations entered the Church and brought with them the inclination for magic inherited from centuries of paganism. No wonder that during the Middle Ages wizardry was secretly practised in many places notwithstanding innumerable decrees of the Church on the subject. Belief in the frequency of magic finally led to stringent measures taken against witchcraft (q. v.).

Catholic theology defines magic as the art of performing actions beyond the power of man with the aid of powers other than the Divine, and condemns it as a grievous sin and a diabolic perversion of the virtue of religion, because all magical performances, if undertaken seriously, are based on the expectation of interference by demons or lost souls. Even if undertaken out of curiosity the performance of a magical ceremony is sinful as it either proves a lack of faith in or a vain superstition. The Catholic Church admits in principle the possibility of interference in the course of nature by spirits other than God, whether good or evil, but never without God's permission. As to the frequency of such interference by malignant agencies by malignant agencies at the request of man, she observes the utmost reserve.

Occurrence (in Liturgy).—1. Definition.—Occurrence is the coinciding or occurring of two liturgical offices on one and the same day; concurrence is the succession of two offices, so that the second vesper of one occur at the same time as the first vesper of the other. The chief causes of occurrence are: (1) the variation of feast and vighe of Easter; while the other feasts are fixed; (2) the annual change of the Dominical Letter, whereby Sunday falls successively on different dates of the same month (see Calendar; DOMINICAL LETTER). Occurrence may be accidental or perpetual. (1) The calendar gives as a fixed feast for 28 May the feast of St. Augustine of Canterbury; on the other hand, 28 May being a table feast, the movable feasts marked that day as the feast of Corpus Christi; thus on 28 May, 1891, these two offices fell on the same day—that is there was an occurrence. But as this coincidence was due to a variable cause, and did not happen the following years, the occurrence was accidental. (2) The patronal feast of churches is celebrated with an octave; in the case of a church having St. Martin (11 November) as its patron, the octave day (18 November) falls on a fixed feast marked in the Calendar: "Delection, etc..."; consequently, there is in such a church each year a coinciding of two offices on 18 November; this occurrence is said to be perpetual.

II. RULES TO BE OBSERVED.—In case of an occurrence two questions arise: (1) Which office is to have the preference? (2) What is to be done concerning the less favoured office? (1) The two offices must be compared from the point of view of dignity and of necessity, taken either separately or together. As to dignity, Christmas, the Assumption, etc., prevail over the feasts of saints; as to necessity, the day of Advent being privileged prevails (if it falls on 30 November) over the Office of St. Andrew the Apostle; a postfesta, an office favoured by both conditions, will be preferred. (2) As to the less favoured office, it is treated differently according as the recurrence is perpetual or accidental. If perpetual, the authority of the Holy See should intervene to operate a change that will be effectual each year; the mention of the feast is maintained on the day on which it falls, but the office is changed to the first free day (a day not occupied by another office, double or semi-double); liturgists call this change mutatio (not translation). When the occurrence is accidental, the compiler of the diocesan ordel, with the approval of the ordinary, decides in conformity with the rubrics, what is to be done for the year. Either the office in question is transferable, in which the regulations of title X, "De translatione," are to be followed; or else it is not transferable, when it must be seen if it is to be omitted completely, or if a commutation of it may be made on the day in question. The whole matter is governed for in the general rubrics of the Breviary.

To give an instance of concurrence, the ecclesiastical calendar marks the feast of St. Anthony of Padua on 13 June, and that of St. Basil on 14 June; these two feasts being of double rite have first and second Vespers of 13 June; therefore, the second Vespers of St. Anthony and the first Vespers of St. Basil happen at the same time, and there is said to be a concurrence of the two offices.

O'Connell, Daniel, b. at Carhen, near Cabirvian, Co. Kerry, Ireland, 1775; d. at Genoa, 1847. The O'Connells, once great in Kerry, had suffered severely by the penal laws, and the family at Carhen was not rich. An uncle, Maurice O'Connell of Darrynane, resident in France, bore the expense of educating Daniel and his brother Maurice. In 1794 they were sent to the Irish College at Liège, but Daniel being beyond the prescribed age for admission, they proceeded to St. Omer's in France, and after a year went to Donnin. Daniel gave evidence of industry and ability at St. Omer's, but at Donán his stay was short, for, owing to the French Revolution, the two O'Connells returned home in 1793. In 1794 he was enrolled as a law student at Lincoln's Inn; and in 1798 was called to the Irish Bar. The era of penal legislation in Ireland had ceased, and already a serious breach had been made in the penal code. By a series of remedial measures, ending with the Catholic Relief Act of 1773, Catholics were placed in many respects on a level with other denominations, but were still excluded from Parliament, from the inner bar, and from the higher civil and military offices; and the recall of Fitzwilliam (1795) and the events following showed that no further concessions would be given. O'Connell could not see why Catholics who paid taxes and were obedient to the law should not have a share in the spending of the taxes and in the making of the laws. He detested violence as a weapon of reform, respected religion and the rights of property, and therefore hated the French Revolution as he did the Rebellion of 1798. Consequently, because it destroyed Ireland's separate nationality; and he has recorded his anger at hearing the ringing of the bells of St. Patrick's cathedral when the Act of Union was passed, and his resolution to do something to undo it. He believed that moderation was the true character of patriotism, and that the rights of Ireland could be won by peaceful agitation but he had no faith in the efficacy of agitation such as had been carried on by the Catholic body. Leaders like Lords Trimlestown and Fingal attracted no enthusiasm, and the Catholic Committee, controlled by such men and meeting together to present petitions and make periodic professions of loyalty, were simply ploughing the sands. The support of the masses should be enlisted, there should be organization and vigour, and the Catholics should demand concession not as a favour but as a right. O'Connell was the leader for such a movement; a man strong in body and mind, a great orator, debater, and lawyer, a master of sarcasm and invective; a man who could wring truth from a reluctant witness, or curb the insolence of a partisan judge, or melt a jury by his moving appeal. Addressing an audience of coreligionists he was unequalled. The people felt proud of such a leader, and were ready to follow wherever he led.

O'Connell's first appearance on a public platform was in Dublin (1801), when he denounced the contemplated Union, and declared that the Catholics wanted no such Union, and that if a Union were to be the alternative to the re-enactment of the penal laws they would prefer the penal laws. In the subsequent years he regularly attended the meetings of the Catholic Committee and infused more vigour and energy into its proceedings, and by 1810 he had become the most trusted and powerful of the Catholic leaders. In 1810 he sent out a circular from Dublin inviting the people to form local committees in correspondence with the central committee. The Government, afraid of having a national organization to deal with, proclaimed all such local committee meetings, under the Convention Act of 1793; but the magistrates in many cases refused to carry out the proclamations, and when the Dublin committee met, some of the leaders were arrested and prosecuted. But O'Connell successfully defended the first of the accused, Mr. Sheridan.

From 1812 to 1817 the Irish Government was little else than a long-sustained duel between O'Connell and the new chief secretary, Sir Robert Peel. Both were able and determined, and between them began a personal enmity which ended only with their lives. Peel championed privilege and ascendency and attacked the Catholic leaders. O'Connell retorted by calling him "Orange Peel". O'Connell tried to get the Catholic Committee into the Catholic Board, but Peel proclaimed the Board as he had proclaimed the Committee; and while O'Connell continued to agitate, Peel continued to pass acts and enforce them. Meanwhile one noted event happened which further endeared O'Connell to the people. The Dublin Corporation had always been reactionary and had always been the champion of Protestant ascendency. O'Connell in a public speech in 1815 called it a "beggarly corporation". The aldermen and councillors were enraged and, finding that O'Connell would not apologize, one of their number, D'Esterre, sent him a challenge. D'Esterre was a noted fencer, and O'Connell's hope was that if O'Connell attempted to fight there would be an end to his career. To the surprise of all O'Connell met D'Esterre and shot him dead. He bitterly regretted the deed, and to the end of his days he never missed an opportunity of assisting the D'Esterre family. With all his popularity, the Catholic cause was not advancing. The question of the veto was being agitated, and in consequence there was division and weakness in the Catholic ranks. O'Connell, though a fervent Catholic, opposed the veto, and declared that while willing to have his religion from Rome, he must have his politics from home. In 1821 there was a gleam of hope, when the new King George IV visited Ireland. As Prince of Wales he had been the friend of the Liberal leaders, and as such it was expected that he would favour Liberal measures. But he left Ireland without saying a word in favour of Emancipation.

At last O'Connell determined to rouse the masses in earnest and, in conjunction with a young lawyer, Mr. Shiel, he founded, in 1823, the Catholic Association. The declared object was to win Emancipation "by legal and constitutional means", and in order to evade the Convention Act the Association assumed no delegated or representative character. It was a club, its members meeting weekly and paying an annual subscription. O'Connell worked unceasingly to spread the organization, and though progress was slow success came at last; and by 1825 a vast organization had spread over the land, exercising all the powers of government. In each district, usually under the presidency of the clergy, there was a branch of the Catholic Association, where local grievances were ventilated, and subscriptions received and sent to Dublin to the central association, whence came advice in difficulties and speakers for local meetings. In 1825 the Government, alarmed at the power of an organization which was a serious rival to the Established Church bill suppressing it. But O'Connell, experienced in defeating Acts of Parliament, changed the name to the New Catholic Association, and the work of agitation went on. As much as five hundred pounds a week was subscribed, and in 1826 the Association felt strong enough to put up a candidate for Waterford, who succeeded against all the territorial influence of the Beresfords; similar victories were won in Monaghan.
Westmuth, and Louth. In 1828 came the Clare election when O'Connell himself was nominated. It was known that he could not as a Catholic take the Parliamentary oath; but if he, the representative of 60,000,000, were to be deprived of his rights solely because of his creed, the effect on public opinion would be great. O'Connell was elected, and when he presented himself in Parliament he refused to take the oath offered him. The crisis had come. The Catholic millionaires, organized and defiant, would have Emancipation; the Orangemen would have no concession; and Ireland, in the spring of 1829, was on the brink of civil war. To avoid this calamity Peel and Wellington struck their colours, and in 1829 the Catholic Relief Act was passed.

Henceforth O'Connell was the Unconquered King of Ireland. To recompense him for his services and to secure the success for the future in Parliament, he was induced to abandon the practice of his profession and to accept instead the O'Connell Tributes, which from the voluntary subscriptions of the people brought him an income of £1000 a year. His first care was for Repeal, but his appeals for Protestant co-operation were not responded to, and the associations he formed to that effect were all proclaimed. In the respect the Whigs, whom he supported in 1822, were no better than the Tories. He denounced them as "base, brutal and bloody"; yet in 1835 he entered into an alliance with them by accepting the Lichfield House Compact, and he kept them in office till 1841. During these years Drummond effected reforms in the Irish executive, and laws affecting tithes, poor law, and municipal reform were passed. But Repeal was left in abeyance till Peel returned to power, and then O'Connell established the Repeal Association. Its progress was slow until in 1842 it got the support of the Nation newspaper. In one year it advanced with giant strides; and in 1843 O'Connell held a series of meetings, some of them attended by hundreds of thousands.

The last of these meetings was to be held at Clontarf in October. Peel proclaimed the meeting and prosecuted O'Connell, and in 1844 he was convicted and imprisoned. On appeal to the House of Lords the judgment of the Irish court was reversed and O'Connell was freed. His health had suffered, but henceforth there was a lack of energy and vigour in his movements, a shifting from Repeal to Federalism and back again to Repeal. He also quarrelled with the Young Irelanders. Then came the awful calamity of the famine. O'Connell's last appearance in Parliament was in 1847 when he pathetically asked that his people should be permitted to die, as the famine was the most serious. The doctors ordered him to a warmer climate. He felt that he was dying and wished to die at Rome, but got no further than Genoa. In accordance with his wish his heart was brought to Rome and his body to Ireland. His funeral was of enormous dimensions, and since his death a splendid statue has been erected to his memory by union and a round tower placed over his remains in Glasnevin.

O'Connell was married to his cousin Mary O'Connell and had three daughters and four sons, all the latter being at one time or other in Parliament.

John O'Connell, third son of the above, b. at Dublin, 21 December, 1810; d. at Kingstown, Co. Dublin, 24 May, 1858. He was returned M.P. for Younguil (1822), Athlone (1837), and Kilkenny (1841-17). As a politician he was not tactful, and, came in conflict with the Young Ireland party. As a writer his "Repeal Dictionary" (1845) showed much literary and philosophical power. In 1846 he published a selection of his father's speeches, prefaced by a memoir. His "Recollections and Experiences during a Parliamentary Career from 1833 to 1845" was issued in two volumes (1849). As a Whig, and also a captain in the militia, he fell into disfavour with his Linen-nder, "A Political History of the State of New York", New York, 1906, II, 112). His views, however, were not those of the majority. First of a minority of only six members he voted against approving a new State Constitution of which he afterwards for a score of years, he stated that it "gave life, vigor and permanency to the trade of politics, with all its attendant malpractice" (see Address, supra).

Notable among cases previous to 1843 in which he was counsel was Jack v. Martin, 12 Wendell 311, and 14 Wendell 507; and during the twenty years following 1843 the Mason v. No. 1, which the Parish will publish (see Dallyfield v. Parish, 25 New York Court of Appeals Reports, 9). Probably, the most sensational of his cases during the latter period was the action for divorce brought against the celebrated actor, Edwin Forrest, O'Conor's vindication of the character of his client, Mrs. Forrest, eliciting great professional and popular applause (see Clinton, op. cit., 71, 73, U. S. Catholic Historical Magazine, supra, 428). When in 1865 after the overthrow of the Southern Confederacy, Jefferson Davis was indicted for treason, O'Conor became his counsel. Among O'Conor's later cases, the trials concerning property formerly of Stephen Juneau (see Notes and Comments, Vol. XXIX) displayed, as had the Forrest divorce case, his ability in the capacity of trial lawyer and cross-examiner, while one of the cases in which his learning concerning the law of trusts appeared was the case of Manix v. Manice, 43 New York Court of Appeals Reports, 305. In 1871, he commenced with enthusiasm as counsel for the State of New York proceedings against William M. Tweed and others, accused of frauds upon the City of New York, declaring that for his professional services he would accept no compensation. In the autumn of 1875 and while these proceedings were uncompleted, he was prostrated by an illness which seemed mortal, and the cardinal discharged the stern functions of a lawyer. Slowly, however, he regained some measure of strength, and, on 7 February, 1876, censored by a newspaper report, he left his bedroom to appear in court, "unexpected and ghost-like" (according to an eyewitness), that he might save from disaster the prosecution of the cause of the State against Tweed (see Breen, "Thirty Years of New York Politics", New York, 1809, 545-52). In 1877 he appeared as counsel before the Electoral Commission at the City of Washington. His last years were passed on the Island of Nantucket, where, in 1880, he took up his abode, seeking "quiet and a more genial climate". But even here he was occasionally induced to participate in the labours of the learned profession.

When he passed away, many seemed to concur in opinion with Tilden that O'Conor "was the greatest jurist among all the English-speaking race" (Bigelow, "Letters and literary memorials of Samuel J. Tilden", 11, 613).

CHARLES W. SLOANE.

O'Conor, Charles, often called "the Venerable", b. at Belangery, Co. Roscommon, 1770; d. 1791, was descended from an ancient and princely Catholic family. Cultured, educated, an Irish scholar, O'Conor was almost the only Irishman of his time who studied the records of his country, and who did what he could to preserve the Irish manuscripts. He scanned these with a calculating and mathematical mind, continually figuring up and noting upon the margins the dates of kings, princes, prelates, foundations etc., and pointing out conflicting dates. He was the only Irishman with whom Samuel Johnson corresponded with reference to Irish literature. Irish was his native language, so that he was one of the last great Irishmen who continued the unbroken traditions of their race. He wrote fine private diaries and wrote books in which he let down household affairs, expenses etc. (now preserved by his direct descendant the O'Conor Don H. M. L. at Clonais) were written largely in classical Irish. His best known work is his "Discussions on the History of Ireland" published in 1753 which led to his correspondence with Dr. Johnson, who urged him to write his History of Ireland. His collection of Irish manuscripts passed to his grandson, the younger Charles, and later formed the renowned Stowe Collection in the possession of the Duke of Buckingham, whose librarian the younger Charles became. This collection, including the famous Stowe Missal and the present of the first part of the "Annals of the Four Masters," was for years inaccessible to Irish scholars, but has now been deposited in the Royal Irish Academy. A man of affairs, he was one of the founders of the Roman Catholic Committee in 1757, and with Dr. Curry, may be looked upon as the real lay leaders and representatives of the Irish Catholics during the (now extinct) middle of the century (see, among others, O'Conor's "Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the late Charles O'Conor of Belanagare"). This is a very rare book, the author having suppressed it, and destroyed the manuscript of the second volume when ready for press. Its destruction was a great loss to the Irish history of the period. The present O'Conor Don possesses many of his letters; others are in the Gilbert Library now acquired by the Corporation of Dublin.

DOUGLAS HYDE.

Octavarium Romanum, a liturgical book, which may be considered as an appendix to the Roman Breviary, but which has not the official position of the other Roman liturgical books. The first mention of this book dates from Sixtus V. In order to introduce a greater variety in the selection of lessons, he ordered the compilation of an Octavarium to contain the lessons printed for each day of the octaves. The plan was not executed during his pontificate (1585-1605). When the question of correcting the Breviary was raised anew under Clement VIII (1592-1605), the projected Octavarium was again spoken of. The consultors, the most distinguished of whom was Bellarmine, were in favour of the suggested compilation. Cavanti, who was also a consulter, undertook the work, but his book did not appear till 1628. Its title, which is descriptive, is "Octavarium Romanum, Lectiones II et III Nocturni complectens, rectius inae nova octas Festorum, praeceptrum patronorum locorum et titularum Ecclesiasticae quae eum octavis celebrant abeunt, juxta rubricias Brevariorum Romanor, a Sacra Ritum Congregatione ad usum totius orbis ecclesiastriu approbatum" (Antwerp, 1628). In addition to the letter of approbation, the Brief of Urban VIII, and the dedication, the book includes a few pages on the origin, cause, and rise of octaves. The body of the work consists of a collection of readings, or lessons, for the feasts of the Holy Trinity, the Transfiguration, the Holy Cross, several feasts of Our Lady (Conception, Purification, Visitation, Our Lady of the Snows), the feasts of St. Michael, the Apostles, Saints Mary Magdalene, Martha, John, Athanasius, Moneta, Nereus and Achillien, the Seven Bridesmaids, the Day of the suppression of the heading of St. John the Baptist, of Sts. Gregory Thaumaturgus, Basil, Francis, Clement etc. Then follow the lessons for the communions. They are drawn from the writings of the Fathers, and are varied and well-selected. Numerous editions have appeared since then, with occasional variations. One of the most recent is by Pustet (Ratisbon, 1883). The reading of the Octavarium is not obligatory.

FERNAND CABROL.

Octave.—I. Origin. —It is the number seven, not eight, that plays the principal role in Jewish mystical theology, and dominates the cycle of the year. Every seventh day is a sabbath; the seventh month is sacred; the seventh year is a sabbatical year. The jubilee year was brought about by the number seven multiplied by seven; the feast of the Azymes lasted seven days, like the paschal feast; the feast of Pentecost was seven times seven days after the Pasch; the feast of the Tabernacles lasted seven days, the days of consecration numbered seven (Wills, "Worship of the Old Covenant," 190-1; "Dict. of the Bible," s. v. Feast and Fasts, I, 589). However, the octave day, without having the symbolic importance of the seventh day, had also its role in the liturgical cycle. It is the eight day of the week and the eighth day of the cycle of circumcision (Gen., xxv, 4; Lev., xii. 3; Luke, i, 59; Acts, vii, 8 etc.). The feast of the Tabernacles, which as we have said lasted seven days, was followed on the eighth by a solemnity which may be considered as an octave (Lev. xxviii. 36, 39; Num., xxix, 35; Ebr., viii, 18); the eighth day was also the last of the seventh month (Num., xxv, 33, 34; Deut., xxxi, 11, 22; Num., xi, 10). It was on the eighth day, too, that the feast of the dedication of the Temple under Solomon, and of its purifications under Ezra concluded (II Par., vii, 9; xxix, 17). The ogdoad of the Egyptians and similar numerical phantasies among other peoples had no influence on Christian liturgy. Gallus would have been the first to celebrate the eighth day after feasts dates back to the days of the Apostles is devoid of proof (Thesaurus sacr., rit., 31 sq.). At first the Christian feasts have no octaves. Sunday, which may in a sense be considered the first Christian feast, falls on the seventh day; the feasts of Easter and Pentecost, which are, with Sunday, the most ancient, form as it were only a single feast of fifty days. The feast of Christmas, which too is very old, had originally no octave.

In the fourth century, when the primitive idea of the fifty days' feast of the paschal time began to grow dim, Easter and Pentecost were given octaves. Possibly at first this was only a baptismal custom, the Nepos recommending a kind of spiritual retreat for the Easter or Pentecost till the following Sunday. Moreover, the Sunday which, after the feasts of Easter and Pentecost, fell on the eighth day, came as a natural conclusion of the seven feast days after these two festivals. The octave, therefore, would have in a certain sense developed of its own accord. If this be so, we may say, contrary to the common opinion, that Christians borrowed the idea of the octave from the Jews, this custom grew spontaneously on Christian soil. However, it must be said that the first Christian octave known to history is the dedication of the Churches of Tyre and Jerusalem, under Constantine, and that these solemnities, in imitation of the dedication of the Jewish Temple, lasted eight days (Eusebius, "De vita Constanti"); III, xxx sq.; Sozomen, "Histor. eccl.", II, xxvi). This feast may possibly have influenced the adoption of the octave by the Christians. From the fourth century onwards the celebration of octaves is mentioned in the Gregorian Cycle, in the liturgical Constitutions, the invocations of the Fathers, the Counsels ("Const. Apost.", VIII, xxxii; V, xx; Augustine, "De div. temp.", i; "Ep.", lv, 32, 32 etc.; "Peregrinatio Eterna", ed. Gamurrini, p. 100; cf. Cabrol, "Étude sur La Peregrinatio", 1895, pp. 116-7; "Concil. Matisc. II", ii; "Concil. in Trullo", lvi).

II. Celebration of Octaves in Ancient and Modern Times.—The liturgy of the octave assumed its present form slowly. In the first period, that is from the fourth to the sixth and even seventh century, little thought seems to have been given to varying the liturgical formula during the eight days. The sacramentaries of Gelasius and St. Gregory make no mention of the intervening days. In the court the office of the feast is repeated. The dies octavus is indeed made more prominent by the liturgy. The Sunday following Easter (i.e. Sunday in albis) and the octave day of Christmas (now the Circumcision) are treated very early as feast days by the liturgy. Certain octaves were considered as privileged days, on which work was forbidden. The courts and the office of the feast is repeated. The dies octavus is indeed made more prominent by the liturgy. The Sunday following Easter (i.e. Sunday in albis) and the octave day of Christmas (now the Circumcision) are treated very early as feast days by the liturgy. Certain octaves were considered as privileged days, on which work was forbidden.

After Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas had received octaves, the tendency was to have an octave for all the solemn feasts. Etherea speaks of the feast of the Dedication (cf. Cabrol, op. cit., pp. 128-9). These octaves, a kind of octave of the octaves of Christmas and the Epiphany, but it must not be concluded that he was ignorant of those of Easter and Pentecost, which were more celebrated.

The practice of having octaves for the feasts of the saints does not seem to be older than the eighth century, and even then it was peculiar to the Latins. From the ninth century (cf. Cabrol, op. cit., pp. 180-4) we have evidence of the use of the octaves. The capitularies of Charlemagne speak of the octaves of Christmas, the Epiphany, and Eastern. Amalarius, after mentioning the four octaves of Christmas, the Epiphany, Easter, and Pentecost, tells us that it was customary in his time to celebrate the octaves of the feasts of Sts. Peter and Paul and other saints, "quotemque semper in diversis et consecutis diversiorum ecclesiasticarum octavis celebrabatur" (De eccle. off., IV, xxxvi). In the thirteenth century this custom extends to many other feasts, under the influence of the Franciscans, which then exerted a preponderating influence on the formation of the modern Breviary (Baumber-Biron, "Hist. du Bréviaire", II, 31, 71, 199). The Franciscan feasts of Sts. Francis, Clare, Anthony of Padua, Bernardine etc., had their octaves. At the time of the reformation of the Breviary (Breviary of St. Pius V, 1558) the question of regulating the octaves was considered. Two kinds of octaves were distinguished, the first, those of our Lord's scr. dedication. In the first category are further distinguished principal feasts—those of Easter and Pentecost, which had specially privileged octaves, and those of Christmas, the Epiphany, and Corpus Christi, which were privileged (the Ascension octave was not privileged). Octaves, which exclude all or practically all occurring and transferred feasts, are called privileged. The octaves of saints were treated almost like that of the Ascension. This classification entailed the application of a certain number of rubrics, the details of which can be found in Baumber-Biron, op. cit., II, 199-200. For the changes introduced under Leo XIII, cf. ibid., 462 and also the rubrics of the Breviary. Under OCTAVARIUM ROMANUM there is an account of Gavant's attempt to provide a more varied office for the octaves.

The Greeks also to a certain extent admitted the celebration of octaves into their liturgy. However, we must be careful not to confuse, as is too often done, the apodosis of the Greeks with the Latin apodosis. Although both have their place in the East as the Latin octave, the apodosis differs from the octave in this, that it occurs sometimes on the eighth, and sometimes on the fifth, the fourth, or the ninth (see L'Évêque in "Dict. archéol. et de liturgie chrét.", s. v. Apodosis).

O’CULLEN, Gelasius (Glaisne), Cistercian, Abbot of Boyle, Ireland, b. probably near Assaroe Abbey, Ballyshannon, Co. Donegal; martyred, 21 Nov., 1580. Three of his brothers were created Benedictine abbots, and a fourth Bishop of Raphoe. Gelasius, the eldest, studied at Salamanca University, went thence to Paris where he took his doctorate at the Sorbonne, made his monastic profession, and was created Abbot of Boyle, Co. Roscommon. This abbey had been consecrated and granted to Cusack, Sheriff of Meath; but the Irish regulars continued to appoint superiors to their suppressed houses. The young abbot was immediately and anxiously desired to have obtained restoration of his abbey. He was, however, seized at Dublin by the Government and imprisoned with Eugene O’Mulkeley, Abbot of Holy Trinity at Lough Key. Refusing to conform, they were tortured and finally hanged outside Dublin, 21st Nov., 1580.

O’Curry, Eugene (Eoghan O’Combradhe), Irish scholar, b. at Dunshaughlin, Co. Meath, 1796; d. 1862. His father, a farmer of modest means, was an Irish scholar, a good singer, and well-informed as to the traditions of his people. His son Eugene, or Owen, grew up amid perfect Irish surroundings, and soon learned to read the Irish MSS, which were sleeping in the cloaks among the people. After the fall of Napoleon (1815), there followed a period of much agricultural distress in Ireland, and the O’Curry farm was broken up. In 1834 Eugene joined the number of men engaged upon the topographical and historical part of the Ordnance Survey of Ireland, Petrie, O’Curry, and Maugham the poet, for a stipend, not least John O’Donovan (q. v.). In search of information concerning Irish places O’Curry visited the British Museum (where he catalogued the Irish MSS for the authorities), the Bodleian Library at Oxford, the Library of Trinity College, the Royal Irish Academy, and other places. But the Government, afraid, it is said, of the national memories that the work was evoking, abandoned the survey three or four years later and dissolved the staff. The great collection of materials, upwards of 400 quarto volumes of letters and documents bearing upon the topography, social history, language, antiquities and genealogies of the districts surveyed, was stowed away.

After this O’Curry earned his livelihood by reading, copying, and working on the MSS. in Trinity College and the Royal Irish Academy. The first Archaeological Society was founded in 1810, relying chiefly upon the assistance of O’Curry and O’Donovan. In 1833 O’Curry joined the council of the Celtic Society and published two conditioned notices, the “Battle of Moylane,” and the “Courtship of Momera,” with excellent translation and notes. In 1855 he was appointed professor of Irish history and archeology in the recently founded Catholic University of Ireland, whose first rector was John Henry (afterwards Cardinal) Newman. His lectures, published at the expense of the university (1860) under the title of “The Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History”, proved an invaluable mine of information upon the ancient MSS. of Ireland and their contents—annals, genealogies, histories, epics, hagiographies, and ancient matters ecclesiastical and civil. “O’Curry,” writes O’Arbois De Jubainville (L’Epopée celtique en Irlande, p. xvi), “is the first man who studied at their sources the epics of Ireland.” His book was a revelation, and opened up entirely a new world to European scholars. It was followed by a series of writings on the most magnificent and important manuscripts and customs of the ancient Irish.” Published later (1873) under the editorship of Dr. W. K. Sullivan.

O’Curry, a self-taught man and with little or no classical knowledge, was one of Ireland’s most energetic workers. Scarcely an Irish book was to be found which he did not read and scarcely a rare manuscript existed in private hands of which he did not make a copy. In this way he gained an outlook over the field of Irish literature, so full and so far-reaching that though strides have been made in scientific scholarship since his day, no one has ever come near him since in any all-round knowledge of the literature of Ireland. He transcribed and edited the most ancient Irish genealogies, the Book of Lismore, and scores of others. The last work he was engaged on was the Brehon Laws (q. v.), of which he transcribed eight large volumes, and made a preliminary translation in thirteen volumes. O’Curry was severely tried by government officials who took upon themselves, in crass ignorance and in defiance of all rules of scholarship, to dictate to the master how the translation and compilation of the Brehon Laws were to be carried out. O’Curry has left a fully written posthumous statement of the incredible treatment to which he and O’Donovan were subjected, and his account of how he saved the first school he ever attended from the fiends, Daud Mac fibris (murdered in 1670), who was able to penetrate and get a grip of the long forgotten language of the ancient law tracts, is one of the most curious things in literature. Many men, such as Todd, Petrie, Graves, Reeves, were deeply indebted to O’Curry, for with a rare generosity he freely communicated the treasures of his knowledge to all who asked him.

O’Daly, Daniel, diplomatist and historian, b. in Kerry, Ireland, 1555; d. at Lisbon, 30 June, 1662. On his mother’s side he belonged to the Desmond branch of the Geraldines, of which branch his paternal ancestors were the hereditary chroniclers or bards. He became a Dominican in Tralee, Co. Kerry; took his vows in Lugo, studied at Burgos, gained his doctorate of theology in Bordeaux, and returned as priest to Tralee. In 1627 he was sent to teach theology in the newly established College for Irish Dominicans at Louvain. In 1639 he went to Madrid on business connected with this college and, seeing that Philip IV of Spain favoured the project, he, assisted by three of his Irish brethren, established, in Lisbon, the Irish Dominican College of which he became the first rector. He conceived the project of erecting, near Lisbon, a convent of Irish Dominican nuns, to serve as a refuge in time of persecution. Philip granted permission to him so to do, on condition that he take steps to induce some Spanish soldiers for Spanish service in the Low Countries. O’Daly set sail for Limerick and got the men. On his return to Madrid (1639), Belem on the Tagus, four miles below the city, was selected as a site and, with the assistance of the Countess of Ayala, the convent of Our Lady of Bom Succeso was built. The king had such confidence in him that he made him envoy to Charles I of England, to the exiled Charles II, and to Pope Innocent X (1650). The Queen of Portugal also sent him as envoy to Pope Alexander VII. In 1655 he was sent as envoy from John IV of Portugal to Anne of Austria and Louis XIV to conclude a treaty between Portugal and France. Here as elsewhere, success attended him; but while negotiations abroad and matters of government at home afforded opportunities of serving the House of Braganza, the king could not accept any return. His acquaintances praise his straightforwardness, honesty, tact, and disinterestedness. He refused the Archbishopric of Braga and the Primacy of Goa and the Bishopric of Coimbra; nor would he accept the titles of Privy Councillor or Queen's Confessor, though he held both offices. In 1665 he published "Initiata, Incrementum, et Exitus Familiae Gerardinorum, Descriptio Comitum, Palatiorum Kyverne in Hibernia, a Persuc- tione Harreticorum Descriptio," etc., his work on the Earls of Desmond, for which he availed himself of the traditional knowledge of his ancestors. In the first part he describes the origin of the Munster Geraldines, their varying fortunes, and their end in the Bocca of St. John, his father and chief of authority on this subject. The second part treats of the cruelties inflicted on the Irish Catholics, and of the martyrdom of twenty Dominicans, many of whom had been with him in Lisbon. The work was translated into French by Abbe Joubert (1697), and into English by the Rev. C. P. Meehan, Dublin (2nd edition 1878). To these he devoted himself, not, as is often thought, his chief concern was to put his college on a firm basis and to make it render the greatest possible service to Ireland. Bom Succeso became too small for the number of students. In 1659 he laid the first stone of a larger building which was called Corpo Santo. To provide funds for these houses he continued to hold office in Papal and semi-Papal conclaves, President of the Privy Council, before the papal Bull arrived he died. His remains were reposed in the cloister of Corpo Santo until the earthquake of 1755; the inscription on his tomb recorded that he was "in varias Regnum legationibus, . . . Vir Prudentia, Litteris, et Religioni conspexit in excellentissima eminenzia, et extra mundum distinguished for prudence, knowledge, and virtue.) A few years after the catastrophe, on the same spot, with the same name and object, a new college and church arose, which, with Bom Succeso, keep O'Daly's memory fresh in Lisbon to the present day.

Meanwhile in Bom Succeso, little life was spent by Meehan (1787); Baron (who knew O'Daly), Loni quarto apologisten (Paris, 1866); Echard, Script. Ord. Pred. (Paris, 1719-21); Historia Domini imaging contains much additional information; Meehan, Introduction to his translation; Belleslet, Gesch. der kath. Kirche in Ireland, II, III (for an original letter ed. III, 701); O'Connell, Domini O'Daly in Faith and Fatherland (Dublin, 1858).

REGINALD WALSH

O'Daly, Donogh Mr. (Irish Donnchadh Mr. O'DAHL), a celebrated Irish poet, d. 1241. About thirty of his poems are extant, amounting to four or five thousand lines, nearly all religious. O'Reilly styles him Abbot of Boyle (Irish Writers, p. LXXXVIII) asdoes O'Curry (Manners and Customs, III, p. 301); he was certainly buried in the abbey there, but it cannot be proved that he was an ecclesiastic. The religious cast of his poetry would naturally account for his having been accepted as one. According to O'Donovan (Four Masters, ad an. 1241) he was the head of the O'Dalys of Finnyvara of Burren in Clare, where the ruins of his house are still pointed out. He has often been called the Irish Ovid, for the smoothness of his verse and facility which were the characteristics of whom, Muireadhach "Albanach" or "the Scotchman," was also a poet. The present writer has heard some of O'Daly's verse from the mouths of the peasantry. Only two or three of his pieces have been published, but Professor Thomas O'Mahle of Galway is now preparing them for the press.

DOUGLAS HYDE

Odescalchi, Benedetto. See Innocent XI, Pope.

Odescalchi, Carlo, cardinal, prince, archbishop, and Jesuit, b. at Rome, 5 March, 1786; d. at Moderna, 17 August, 1841. His father, Duke of Sirmien, Prince of the Roman empire, was a man of culture and attended personally to Carlo's education. He early manifested a religious vocation. Ordained priest, he said his first Mass 1 Jan., 1809. He won the confidence of many souls, among others, a young cleric afterwards Pius IX, and later he ordained priest Gioacchino Pecci, eventually Leo XIII. Odescalchi was in the suite of Pius VII during the perilous times that preceded the pope's captivity, and after his release, he was rapidly promoted to several diplomatic missions to Vienna. In 1823 he was created cardinal and immediately afterwards Archbishop of Ferrara, but he remained with the pope who was then dying. He deviated himself to his see with apostolic energy, until he resigned (1836). Returning to Rome he was made Bishop of Sabina, prefect of several congregations, and became protector and promoter of many good works.

He was in the conclaves for the elections of Leo XII, Pius VIII, and Gregory XVI. Cardinal Wiseman tes-

"tifies to the general confidence reposed in his virtue and high principle on these occasions. When the Sociey of Jesus was restored by Pius VII (1814), Odescalchi entered the novitiate of Saint Was in the conclave he had been prepared for him at Saint Andrea. But the pope would not then allow him to enter, nor would Gregory permit it (1837), a commission of four cardinals, appointed to consider the question, having reported in the negative. Finally, permission to resign the cardinalitial dignity having been given in full consistory (1839), Odescalchi entered the novitiate of Saint Matthew. For a short pro-

Wad was devoting himself to various ministries when he died. As a youth he had published the not unimportant "Memorie istorico-critiche dell'Academia de' Lincei" (Rome, 1806) and as Bishop of Sabina his "Massime sacerdotali" (Rome, 1834).

J. H. POLLEN.

O Deus ego Amo Te, the first line of two Latin lyrics sometimes attributed to St. Francis Xavier, but of uncertain date and authorship. The one whose first stanza runs;

O Deus ego amo te,

Nami prior tu amasti me;

En librate privo me

Ut suprae vincent sequar te;

has four additional stanzas in similar rhythm, the last two being apparently a paraphrase of part of a prayer in the "Contemplatio ad annum spiritualem in nobilis excultum" of St. Ignatius Loyola's Spiritual Exercises: "Take, O Lord, my entire liberty . . . whatever I have or possess you have bestowed on me; back to thee I give it all, and to the rule of thy will deliver it absolutely. Give me only thy love and thy grace and I am rich enough; nor do I ask anything more. The hymn (probably first printed in the "Hymnologia Anglicanorum" Coloni, 1695) received in Zuiderneuburg's "Katholische Kirchengesang" (Augsburg, 1822), the title of "The Desire of St. Ignatius". Father Cas-wall's beautiful version appeared in his "Masque of Mary" etc. (1858), and in his "Hymns and Poems" (1873); also in various Catholic hymnbooks (e. g. "Roman Hymnal", New York, 1881; Tozer's "Catholic Church Hymnal", New York, 1903; and in O'dell's "The Book of Hymns", Philadelphia, 1910). The hymn was translated by J. Keble, J. W. Hewett, E. C. Benedikt, H. M. Macgill, S. W. Duffield.

The first stanza of the companion hymn is:

O Deus ego amo te,
Nee amo te ut salves me,
Aut quia non amantes te Etenim punis igne.

There are four additional stanzas in irregular rhythm, while a variant form adds as a final line: "Et solum quia Dei est" (thus given in Moorson's "A Historical Companion to Hymns Ancient and Modern", 2nd ed., Cambridge, 1905, p. 170). The hymn has been appropriately styled by "Koresich" of St. Francis Xavier (Schlosser, "Die Kirche in ihren Liebern", 2nd ed., Freiburg, 1863, 1, 415, who devotes sixteen pages to a discussion of its authorship, translations etc.), who, it is fairly certain, composed the original Spanish sonnet "No me mueve, mi Dios, para quererte"—on which the various Latin versions are based, about the year 1540, and that he is not to be credited to him any Latin version. The form given above appeared in the "Colesle Palmetum" (Colgone, 1696). An earlier Latin version by Joannes Nadasi is in his " Pretiosae occupationis mortuentum" (Rome, 1657), beginning: "Non me movet, Domine, ad amandum te". Nadasi again translated it in 1655. F. X. Drebin, a Franciscan Friar (Fulda), (Budapest, 1890) gives these versions, and one by Petrus Possinus in 1667. In 1668 J. Schefler gave, in his "Heilige Sedehlust", a German translation—"Ich liebe Gott, und zwar unsonst"—of a version beginning: "Adun Deum, sed libere". The form of the hymn indicated above has been translated into English verse about 1840, and is found in Catholic and non-Catholic hymn-books, and is evidently highly prized by non-Catholics. Thus, the Rev. Dr. Duffield, a Presbyterian, speaks of both hymns in glowing terms, in his "Latin Hymn Writers and Their Hymns" (New York, 1889): "From the higher critical standpoint, then, these hymns are not unacceptable as Xavier's own work, since the psalms and hymns belonged to the age and to his life. They are transmuted and shot through by a personal sense of absorption into divine love, which has fused and crystallized them in its fiercest heat" (p. 300). The Scriptural text for both hymns might well be H Cor., v, 11, 15, or perhaps better still I Cor. ii, 7, since these three verses form a poetic triangle, with Cor. i, 21, Cor. i, 21, God hath first loved us". The text of both hymns is given in Daniel's "Thesaurus Hymnologicus", II, 335; of the second hymn, with notes, in March's "Latin Hymns", 190, 307 etc.

H. T. Henry.

O'Devany, Cornelius (Conchobar O'Dun-Beannaigh), Bishop of Down and Connor, Ireland, b. about 1532; d. at Dublin, 11 February, 1612 (N. S.). He was a Franciscan of Donegal Convent, and in Rome in 1582 was appointed Bishop of Down and Connor, and consecrated 2 February, 1583. In 1588 he was committed to Dublin Castle. Failing to convict him of any crime punishable with death, Lord Deputy Fitzwilliam sought an authority from Burgheley to "be rid of such an obstinate enemy to God and so rank a traitor to her Majesty as no doubt he is". He lay in prison until November, 1590, being then released ostensibly on his own petition but doubtless through policy. He was protected by O'Neill until 1606, when the Lord Deputy ordered he be hanged. In 1611 when, almost eighty years old, he was taken while administering confirmation and again committed to Dublin Castle. On 28 January, 1612, he was tried for high treason, found guilty by the majority of a packed jury, and sentenced to die on 1 February (O. S.). He was drawn on a cart from the Castle to the gallows beyond the river; the whole route was crowded with Catholics lamenting and begging his blessing. Protestant clergyres, who had urged him to confess he died for treason. "Pray let me be", he answered, "the viceroy's messenger to me, here present, could tell that I might have life and revenue for going once to that temple", pointing to a tower opposite. He kissed the gallows before mounting, and then proceeding to exhort the Catholics to constancy, he was then hanged, cut down alive, and quartered. With him suffered Patrick O'Loughran, a priest arrested at Cork. The people, despite the guards, carried off the halter, his clothes, and even fragments of his body and chips of the gallows. They prayed all night by the remains, an infernal man was reported cured by touching them, and Mass after Mass was said there from midnight until day. Such was the concourse that the viceroy ordered the members to be buried on the spot, but next night the Catholics exhumed them and interred them in St. James's Churchyard. A list of martyrs compiled by Dr. O'Devany was used by Rothe in his "Analecta O.Laverty, De Ordo et Regimine V (Dublin, 1903); ROBRE, Analecta Nova et Nova, ed. MORAN (Dublin, 1884); O'REILLY, Memorials of those who suffered for the Catholic Faith (London, 1868); MERRILL, Our Martyrs (Dublin, 1890).

Odilia, Saint, patroness of Alsace, b. at the end of the seventh century; d. about 676. According to a trustworthy statement, apparently taken from an earlier life, she was the daughter of the Frankish lord Adalrich (Atieus, Etik) and his wife Bereswinda, who had large estates in Alsace. She founded the convent of Hohenburg (Odilenberg) in Alsace, to which Charlemagne granted immunity, confirmed 9 March, 187, by Louis the Pious who endowed the foundation (Bohmer-Mühlhauer, "Regesta Imperii", I, 686, 933). A tenth-century "Vita" has been preserved, written at the close of the century. According to this narrative she was born blind, miraculously receiving her sight at baptism. A shorter text, probably independent of this, is contained in a manuscript of the early eleventh century. Internal evidence points to an original eighth-century biography. A further "Vita", that Vignier claimed to have discovered, has been proved to be a forgery by this historian. Her feast is celebrated 13 December; her grave is in a chapel near the convent church on the Odilenberg. She is represented with a book on which are two eyes, and by the legend "Vestabat Deus qui semper me sustinet" and by the text, "Vestabat Deus qui semper me sustinet".

O'dell, John, 19th century, b. in Ireland, d. about 1540. He was descended from the nobility of Auvergne. He early became a cleric in the seminary of St. Julian in Brioude. In 1541 he entered Cluny and before the end of his year of probation was made coadjutor to Abbot Mayeul, and shortly before the latter's death (994) was made abbot and received Holy Orders. The rapid development of the monastery under him was due chiefly to his gentleness and charity, his activity and talent for organizing. He was a man and priest of the Cluniac order, and was known for his observance of the Divine Office, and the monastic spirit. He encouraged learning in his monasteries, and had the monk Radolphus Glaber write a history of the time. He erected a magnificent monastery building, and furthered the reform of the Benedicite monasteries. Under Alphonsus VI it spread into Spain. The rule of St. Benedict was substituted in Chuyen for the domestic rule of Ibadism. Odilo prepared the way for the union of monasteries, which Hugo established for maintaining order and discipline. The number of monasteries increased from thirty-seven to sixty-five, of which five were newly established and twenty-three had followed the reformed or newly founded monasteries of Spain into permanent dependence on the mother-house. Odilo prepared the way for the union of monasteries, which Hugo established for maintaining order and discipline. Some of the monasteries reformed by Chuyen, reformed others; thus the Abbey of St. Vannes in Lorraine reformed many on the Franco-German borderland. On account of his services in the reform Odilo was called by Fulbert of Chartres the "Archangel of the Monks," and through his relations with the popes, rulers, and prominent bishops of the time Chuyen was promoted. He journeyed nine times to Italy, and took part in several synods there. John XIX and Benedict IX both offered him the Archbishops of Lyons but he declined. From 996 he gained influence with the Emperor Otto III. He was on terms of intimacy with him when he refused to go on political grounds, to impair the spiritual independence of the German monasteries. For Germany the Chuyen policy had no permanent success, as the monks there were more inclined to individualism. Between 1027 and 1036 the relations between the Cluny monks and the emperor remained unchanged. In 1040 Odilo was particularly influential in the election of Hoel II of France and for the Union of the Reform. The conclusion of the Peace of God (Tronget), for which Odilo had worked from 1041, was of great economic importance. During the great famines of that time (particularly 1028-33), he also exercised his charity and saved thousands from death.

He established All Saints' Day (11 November) in the Cluny and its monasteries (probably not in 988 but after 1030), and it was soon adopted in the whole church. Of his writings we have but a few short and unimportant ones: a life of the holy Empress St. Adelaide (q.v.) to whom he was closely related; a short biography of his predecessor Mayeul; sermons on feasts of the ecclesiastical year; some hymns and prayers; and a few letters from his extensive correspondence.

Odilo and his confères interested themselves in the church reform which began about that time. They followed no definite eclesiastico-political programme, but directed their attacks principally against individual vices such as simony, marriage of the clergy, and the uncanonical marriage of clerics.

Sec could depend above all on the religious of Chuyen when it sought to raise itself from its humiliating position and undertook the reform of the Church.

He died while on a visitation to the monastery of Souvigny where he was buried and soon venerated as a saint. In 1063 Peter Damian undertook the process of his canonization, and wrote a short life, an abstract from the work of Jotsald, one of Odilo's monks who accompanied him on his travels. In 1793 the relics together with those of Mayeul were burned by the revolutions "on the altar of the fatherland."

The feast of St. Odilo was formerly 2 January, in Chuyen, now it is celebrated on 19 January, and in Switzerland on 6 February.

KLEEMENS LÖFFLER.

Odin, John Mary, Lazarist missionary, first Bishop of Galveston and second Archbishop of New Orleans, b. 25 Feb., 1801, at Hauteville, Ambarle, France; d. 25 May, 1870. The seventh of ten children, like most country boys he worked on his father's farm. His piety and love for the poor being looked on as a sign of priestly vocation, he was sent when nine years of age to study Latin under his uncle, curé of Nonsly, whose death soon ended this desultory teaching. After two years at the seminary at home, he went to the Abbey of Roanne and Verrière and was a brilliant student of philosophy at l'Argentiére and Alix. He was prompt to answer Bishop Dubah's appeal for volunteers for the Louisiana mission. Reaching New Orleans in June, 1822, he was sent to the seminary of the Lazarists, The Barrens, 90 miles from St. Louis, Mo., to complete his theological studies. He joined the Lazarists (Clarke in his lives of deceased bishops gives of his life at L'Argentiére and Alix. He was prompt to answer Bishop Dubah's appeal for volunteers for the Louisiana mission. Reaching New Orleans in June, 1822, he was sent to the seminary of the Lazarists, The Barrens, 90 miles from St. Louis, Mo., to complete his theological studies. He joined the Lazarists in 1825, and was at times in charge of the seminary, curates, and parish. He also gave missions to non-Catholics and to the Indians, until his health failing, it was decided to send him abroad, where he could also gather recruits and funds for the missions. Accompanying Bishop Rosati to the second Council of Baltimore as theologian, he was commissioned by the council to form the dioceses of Detroit and St. Louis. He was spent abroad in the interest of "his poor America."

Pastoral work, chiefly at Cape Girardeau, where he opened a school (1838), and missions occupied the next five years. Sent to Texas in 1840 as vice-precfect by his provincial visitor, Father Timon, whom he had previously met at Convent of the Rev. of the new republic, he began the hardest and most exciting task of all. He was the only Catholic bishop in Texas, and the only one who had fallen away amid the disorders accompanying the change of government, and among non-catholics and the fierce Comanche Indians. His gentleness and self-sacrifice wrought wonders. His great work was early recognized and he was nominated for the episcopate, and the congress of Detroit but declined. A year later he was named titular Bishop of Chaudiopolis and Vicar Apostolic of Texas. He was consecrated 6 March, 1842. He had already succeeded with Father Timon's help in having the Republic recognize the Church's right to the possessions that were hers under the Mexican government. In 1845 he went to Europe and secured many recruits for his mission. In 1847 Texas was made a diocese and Bishop Odin's see was fixed at Galveston. On the death of Archbishop Blanc of New Orleans, he was promoted to that see 15 February, 1861. Neither his age nor infirmities kept him from a vigilant care of his flock. The civil war wrought havoc during his time in Texas, the civil war scourged his archdioce now. His influence was extraordinary among the Catholic soldiers. Pins IX wrote to him in the South, as to Archbishop Hughes in the North, to use their influence for peace. His Apostolic labours were interrupted only by journeys to Europe in the interest of his archdiocese. Despite greatly impaired health he went to the Vatican Council. At Rome he grew so ill that he was granted leave to return to Hauteville where he died.

Odington, Walter, English Benedictine, also known as Walter of Eywash, by some writers connected with Walter of Eywash, who lived about fifty years earlier, d. not earlier than 1250. During the first part of his religious life he was stationed at Eywash and later removed to Oxford, where he was engaged in astronomical and mathematical work as early as 1316. He wrote chiefly on scientific subjects: his most valuable work "De Speculatione Musicae" was first published in complete form in Coussemaek's “Scriptores”; other works are in manuscript only. This treatise, written at Evesham and therefore certainly before 1316, according to Riemann before 1300, is a remarkable work in which the author gathered together practically all the knowledge of the theory of music possessed at his time and added some theoretical conclusions of his own. A similar work is given by Riemann, who claims for him the distinction of having, before the close of the thirteenth century, established on theoretical ground the consonance of minor and major thirds. Davey enumerates the following works: "De Speculatione Musices"; "Vocestrum", a treatise on melody; "Declaratio modalitatum cosmi"; "Tractatus de multiplicatione specierum in visu secundum modum"; "Arts metrica Walteri de Evesham"; "Liber quintus geometric per numeros loco quantitatum"; "Calendar for Evesham Abbey".

Edward C. Phillips.

Odo, Saint, second Abbot of Cluny, b. 875 or 879, probably near Le Mans; d. 18 November, 912. He spent the earlier part of William's reign in Aquitaine, and afterwards entered the Abbey of St. Martin at Tours. About 909, he became a monk, priest, and superior of the abbey school in Baune, whose Abbot, Bl. Berno, was transferred to Cluny in 910. He became Abbot of Baune in 924, and Berno's successor at Cluny in 927. Authorized by a privilege of John, he reformed the monasteries in Aquitaine, northern France, and Italy. The privilege empowered him to unite several abbeys under his superintendence and to receive at Cluny monks from abbeys not yet reformed; the greater number of the reformed monasteries, however, remained independent, and several became centres of reform. Between 930 and 942 he visited Italy several times, founding in Rome the monastery of Our Lady on the Avenue and reforming several convents, e.g. Subiaco and Monte Cassino. He was sometimes entrusted with important political missions, e.g. when peace was arranged between King Hugo of Italy and Albéric of Rome. Among his works is a biography of Pope John, published by Aurillac, three books of Colloquiums (moral essays, severe and forceful), a few sermons, an epic poem on the Redemption (Occupatio) in seven books (ed. Swoboda, 1900), and twelve choral antiphons in honour of St. Martin.

Klemens Löfler.

Odo (Oda), Saint, Archbishop of Canterbury, d. 2 June, 959 (not in 958, recent researches showing that he was living on 15 May, 939). According to the nearly contemporary account of him in the anonymous "Life of Odo" found in the "Life of Bl. Dane", he did not strive to serve God, even endeavouring to hinder his son's constant presence at the church. Later writers represent Odo's parents as pagans and the boy himself as becoming a Christian despite his father's anger. Odo was adopted by Æthelhelm, a nobleman, who regarded him with paternal affection and educated him for the service of God. After his ordination he accompanied Æthelhelm to Rome and on the way cured him when he fell ill, by blessing a cup of wine and causing him to drink therefrom. On his return, according to the same writer, he was made bishop of a city in the province of Wilton, so that he had been described as Bishop of Evesham; his consecration being placed in 920. There is no evidence for this date, and if he was consecrated by Archbishop Wulfhelm, as is stated, it could not have been before 923. There is a further difficulty as to his diocese, erroneously called Wilton. In 927 he was Bishop of Ramsbury, which being in Wiltshire might, loosely speaking, be described as the Diocese of Wilton. But Eadmer states that he was appointed Bishop of Sherborne, and there is an extant document (Curtis Sarum 1666) which lends some support to this report. If he be right, he must have relieved the See of Evesham and Eadhered and Sigehelm. As the latter was bishop in 925 this only allows two years for a possible episcopate of Odo. At the court of Athelstan (925-940) he was highly esteemed, and the king chose him to accompany abroad his nephew Lewis, whom the Frankish nobles true, recently elected as his king. In 937 he accompanied Athelstan to the battle of Brunanburh, where the incident occurred of his miraculous restoration, at a critical moment, of the king's lost sword. The story given by Eadmer, is not mentioned by the earlier anonymous writer. When Archbishop Wulfhelm died in 942, King Eadred wished Odo to succeed, but he refused, because he was not a monk as previous archbishops had been. Finally he accepted the election, but only after he had obtained the Benedictine habit from the Abbey of Fleury. One of his first acts as archbishop was to repair his cathedral at Canterbury, and it is recorded that during the three years that the works were in progress no storm of rain or wind made itself felt within the walls of the church, which he published as archbishop (Mansi, "Concil.", XVIII; Migae, P. L., CXXXIII) to relate the impossibilities of the Church (cap. i), the respective duties of secular princes, bishops, priests, clerics, monks (ii), the prohibition of unlawful marriages, the preservation of concord, the practice of fasting and abstinence, and the payment of tithes (vii-ix). A synodal letter to his suffragan bishops, and an introduction to the life of St. Wilfred, written by him, have also been preserved. Throughout the reign of Eadred (940-955) he supported St. Dunstan, whom he consecrated as Bishop of Worcester, prophesying him as future Archbishop of Canterbury. On the death of Eadred he crowned Eadwig as king. Shortly after the archbishop insisted on Eadwig dissolving his incestuous connexion with Ælfgifu and obtaining her banishment. In 958 during the reign of Eadgar, whom he had consecrated king, realizing the approach of death, he sent for his nephew, St. Oswald, afterwards Archbishop of York, but died before him. He was succeeded by the simoniacal Ælfsige who insulted his memory, and whose speedy death was regarded by the people as a judgment of God. The next archbishop, St. Dunstan, held St. Odo in special veneration, would never pass his tomb without stopping to pray there, and first gave the title of "Liturgy of the Professed" which represents Odo as having in early manhood followed the profession of arms is only found in later writers, such as William of Malmesbury. Even if it is true that Odo served Edward the Elder under arms, there is no reason to suppose, with the writer in the "Dictionary of National Biography", that he did so as God's anointed, and that the books of the Bible were inscribed with St. Odo's name in consequence of his vicissitudes during his life and after his death.

Edwin Burton.
Odo, Bishop of Bayeux and Count of Kent, b. in Normandy probably to 1037; d. at Palermo, February, 1067. The son of Herluin de Conville and Herleva de Falaise, previously by Duke Robert the mother of William the Bastard, from whom Odo about July 1049, received the Diocese of Bayeux. He was present at the assembly of Lillebonne in 1066 at which William's expedition to England was decided upon; he built, at his expense at Port-en-Bassin, fifty or a hundred vessels, accompanied the soldiers, exhorted them on the eve of the battle of Hastings, in which he himself fought. William gave him the castle of Dover and the Earldom of Kent, and three months later when he returned to Normandy he left as his viceroys Odo and William FitzOsbern. Both were merciless in stifling the insurrection of the Saxons. On his return to England in December, 1067, William made Odo a sort of vicerey; he gave him domains in the sasan of Kent, and several churches and abbeys. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, protested successfully at the synod of 1072 against the spoliation of which he was the object; but Odo retained what he had taken from the Abbots of Ramsey and Evesham. In 1089 he traversed Northumberland with an army, avenging the murder of Bishop Walcher of Durham; he multiplied his cruelties and was called the Great Tiberius of the English. He had the ambition to become pope. A soothsayer had foretold that the successor of Gregory VII should be called Odo. The latter first tried to seduce by his munificence the notables of Rome, where he built a palace; then with Hugh, Count of Chester, and a number of knights he set out for Rome; but for Rome William met him at Wight, brought him before his barons, and reproached him with his exactions; as the barons refused to arrest the bishop, he declared that as count he would arrest himself, and he brought him prisoner to Rouen. He refused to release him, despite the protests of Gregory VII. On his death-bed he granted this count a loan; for he feared that after his death his "wicked man would make trouble everywhere". Odo, according to Ordericus Vitalis, immediately plotted against the new king, William Rufus, his nephew; but in 1088, being besieged in Rochester, he was forced to accept as a grace the right to leave the town and depart from England. He established himself in Normandy, in which country, by his influence and means, he secured to his nephew, Robert Courte House, the possession of the city of Le Mans and defended his power against the house of Talvas. According to Ordericus Vitalis, in 1093 he blessed the inestimable union of Philip I of France, with Bertraud, Countess of Anjou, and obtained as a reward the revenues of the Church of Mantes. Urban II, at Dijon, absolved Odo. In 1093 he was present at the Council of Clermont at which the first Crusade was preached; he set out in September, 1096, but died at Palermo. Gilbert, Bishop of Eireux, and Count Roger of Sicily erected a tomb to him in the cathedral.

Despite the eulogies of William of Poitiers it may be said that he was the severe judgment of Ordericus Vitalis, that the life of this prelate was scarcely that of a churchman. He even had a son, called John. Nevertheless his presence at the synods of Rouen of 1053, 1061, and 1063 is proved; on 14 July, 1077 he consecrated the cathedral of Bayeux; on 13 September, 1077, he assisted at the dedication of the Church of St. James in Caen, and on 23 October, at that of Notre Dame de Bec. He was zealous in obtaining relics. He educated, at his expense, a number of young men who became distinguished prelates, and was liberal in gifts to the Abbey of St. Augustine at Canterbury. It has been asserted that he placed in the church in famous Bayeux tapestry, but a detailed study of this tapestry has shown that it was composed according to the description and information contained in the "Roman du Rou" of Robert Wace, and that it was executed in the last thirty years of the twelfth century.

O'Donaghue, Denis. See INDIANAPOLIS, DioceSE OF.

O'Donnell, Edmund, the first missionary executed by the English government; b. in Limerick in 1542, executed at Cork, 16 March, 1575. His family held the highest civic offices in Limerick since the thirteenth century, and he was closely related to Father David Woulfe, Pope Pius IV's legate in Ireland. He entered the Society of Jesus at Rome, 11 September, 1561, but, developing symptoms of phthisis, was removed to Flanders. In 1564 he returned to Limerick and taught, with a secular priest and a layman, in the school which Woulfe established with connivance of the civic authorities. The school was dispersed in October, 1565, by soldiers sent by Sir Thomas Casack, and, for a short time, they taught at Kilmallock. In a few months they returned to Limerick, and were in most cases banished until 1572, when Brody, Protestant Bishop of Meath, visited the city as royal commissioner and made diligent search for them. O'Donnell was ordered to quit the country under pain of death and withdraw to Lisbon, where he was again a student in 1572. Venturing back to Limerick in 1574 he was apprehended soon after landing, and thrown into prison. Regarding all inducements to embrace Protestantism he was removed to Cork, tried for returning after banishment, denying the royal supremacy, and carrying letters for James Fitzmaurice. He was found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged, drawn and quartered.

He has been called McDonnell, MacDonnel, Donnelly, and MacDonough and Donagh. Father Edmund Hogan, S.J., Historiographer of the Irish province, found him recorded as Edmundus Daniell in the Society's archives, and so the name usually appears in Limerick records, though also Daniel and O'Dannel. Copinger and Broinod give the name as O'Donnell (O'Donell). The archives and a contemporary letter from Fitzmaurice confirm a positive assertion that he suffered in 1575, not in 1580 as generally stated.

O'Donovan, Patrick. See RAPHOE, DioceSE OF.

O'Donovan, John, Irish historian and antiquarian, b. at Atatemoore, County Kilkenny, Ireland, 1806; d. at Dublin, 9 Dec., 1861. Coming to Dublin in 1825, he was a lawyer, and prepared for entrance to Maynooth, but later, finding he had no vocation for the priesthood, turned his attention to the study of Irish. O'Donovan himself states that, at the age of nine years, he commenced the study of Irish and Latin, and that in 1819 he could "transcribe Irish pretty well". In Dublin he was soon employed by James Hardiman, and engaged in the transcripion of Irish manuscripts, and through him he was introduced to the Royal Irish Academy circle. Here he met Petrie, and the foundation of a lasting friendship was laid. Petrie's accurate antiquarian sense was supplemented by O'Donovan's knowledge of the native tongue and his ever-growing collection of written tradition. Aided by Sir Samuel Ferguson, they helped to destroy the influence of the fanciful theories which then held the field, championed by Betham and Vallancey. An early example of O'Donovan's historical method is to be found in his edition and translation of the Charter of Newry (Dublin Penny Journal, 22 Sept., 1832). From this on he shared with his brother-in-law, Eugene O'Curry, an undisputed position as supreme authority on the Irish language and Irish antiquities. He may be said to have been the mainstay of the archaeological societies and journals of his day—the Royal Irish Archaeological Society, the Ulster Journal of Archaeology, and the Celtic Society. The foundation by the Government of the Ordnance Survey Department of Ireland gave O'Donovan his chance. In Petrie's house, 21 Great Charles Street, the antiquarian section had its offices, and he was employed as one of a number of erudites, among others, Petrie, O'Curry, Mangan, and Wakeman. From the preparation of lists of names of townlands and places, O'Donovan was soon sent by Larecom, the head of the Ordnance Survey, to work "in the field".

From the various places throughout Ireland which he visited, he despatched in the form of letters to Larcom accounts of antiquities and traditions which, collected in 103 volumes and at present deposited in the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin, are popularly known as "O'Donovan's Letters". They are not heavy with mere erudition, but are enlivened with flashes of humorous anecdote and many a merry "quip and crank and jest". He was engaged on the SS. Bede and SS. Cuthbert from 1830 to 1850 he compiled the catalogue of Irish MSS. in Trinity College; and to aid him in his work of editing and translating MSS., Todd sought a grant in aid from Government. It was refused, and was followed up by the suppression in 1842 of the archaeological section of the Ordnance Survey.

Private effort had, therefore, to be relied upon, and, with the assistance of the members of the Archaeological Society and the Celtic Society, O'Donovan was able to publish his well-known editions of Irish texts with his invaluable introductions and notes. From 1842 till his death in 1861 no year passed without some noteworthy edition of an Irish text appearing from his hands. A complete bibliography of his works was published by Henry Dixon (Dublin). We can only refer to two of his works with which his name is popularly connected—his "Irish Grammar" and his edition and translation of the Annals of the Four Masters. His grammar was published in 1845, and at once elicited the praise of Grimm, on whose reconstructions of the language he relied. In 1850 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Academy of Berlin, an honor which he shared with Zeus whose epoch-making "Grammatika Celtica" appeared in that year. He was then appointed Professor of Celtic in Queen's College, Belfast. In 1848 appeared the first part of his edition of the Annals of the Four Masters (e. v.), which won for him the Cunningham Gold Medal of the Royal Irish Academy and the L.L.D. degree of Trinity College, Dublin. The edition was completed in 1851, and the Government bestowed on him a pension of £50 a year. O'Donovan had decided to go to America, but the establishment of the Brecon Law Commission helped to retain his services. O'Donovan continued his work on the Brecon Law Tracts till his death in Dublin from rheumatic fever, the tendency to which was due to exposure on the outdoor work of the Ordnance Survey.

Besides his works (especially his edition of the Four Masters and his Irish Grammar), O'Donovan was noted as a prodigious reader. In his Aspects of India he enlarged on a subject on which he had already written in his book on Gilders. He had a vast knowledge of the Irish language, and in a series of articles on Irish in Gleanings in Irish Life (Dublin, 1855), he gave his readers a lesson in Irish grammar which was never surpassed. His works on Irish law are still esteemed as authorities, and his enthusiasm for the study of law was only exceeded by his equally fervent love for his country and his country's language.

Odo of Cambrai

Blessed, bishop and confessor, called also Odoardus. b. at Orleans, 1050; d. at Anchin, 19 June, 1113. In 1087 he was invited by the canons of Tournai to teach in that city, and there soon won a great reputation. He became a Benedictine monk (1095) in St. Martin's, Tournai, of which he became abbot later. In 1105 he was chosen Bishop of Cambrai, and was consecrated during a synod at Reims. For some time after he was unable to obtain possession of his see owing to his refusal to receive investiture at the hands of the Emperor Henry IV, but the latter's son Henry renewed the See of Cambrai to Odo in 1106. He laboured diligently for his diocese, but in 1110 he was exiled on the ground that he had never received the cross and ring from the emperor. Odo retired to the monastery of Anchin, where he died without regaining possession of his diocese. Many of his writings are lost; those extant will be found in Migne, CLX (P. 1604).

Odo of Canterbury

Abbott of Battle, d. 1200, known also as Odo Cantianus or of Kent. A monk of Christ Church, he became subprior in 1163 and was sent by Thomas a Becket Alexander as his representative to attend an apportionment of landed property, in 1163, against the Archbishop of York, which was, in spite of the remonstrances of St. Thomas and the pope, still continued to carry the cross in the southern province. In 1166 Christ Church appealed against the archbishop and Odo applied to Richard of Hellesper for help (Foliot, Ep. 422, in Migne). In 1167 he became prior with William as subprior. Until the murder of St. Thomas he seems to have wavered in his allegiance between king and archbishop, but then took a decided stand in favour of ecclesiastical authority. On 1 Sept., 1172, in a meeting the monks of Christ Church put forward Odo as worthy of the archbishopric. The king however procrastinated, and no result followed a second meeting at Windsor (6 Oct.). Odo with other monks followed Henry to Normandy and urged that a monk should be chosen as archbishop (Mat. Becket., IV, 181). After protracted negotiations the choice fell upon Richard, Prior of Dover, formerly a monk of Canterbury, in whose behalf Odo wrote to Alexander III (Migne, CC, 1508). In 1173 he became a great abbot at Christ Church and abbot of the monastery at Woodstock on 1 July, 1175, to obtain a renewal of the charters on the model of those at Battle Abbey. St. Martin de Bello had been without an abbot for four years and the monks who attended the council caused Odo to be chosen. He was elected on 10 July. His blessing took place on 28 Sept., at the hands of Archbishop Richard at Maidstone. On the death of Richard (1184) the monks of Christ Church again put Odo forward for the archbishopric, but Henry again refused, fearing no doubt that he would be too inflexible for his purpose. Baldwin who was appointed quarrelled with the monks, a dispute which lasted till 1188 and occasioned Odo's cause being heard by Urban III (Epp. Cantuar., no, 280). Odo died on 20 Jan., 1200, and was buried in the lower part of the church at Battle. Leland speaks of him as a most erudite man and a great friend of Thomas a Becket and John of Salisbury who describes him as an ardent Mediator who distrusted books. He was a great theologian and a master of Latin, and became famous for his humility and modesty. There is some uncertainty as to his writings, owing to a confusion with Odo of Cheriton and Odo of Murimuth, but a list of thirteen works, chiefly writings on the Old Testament and sermons, can be ascribed to him. He was venerated at Battle, and the saint's shrine in the Abbey of Christ Church was on the site of the church, now known as Odo's church, which is dedicated to the Virgin. The legend of the saint is still preserved, and the story of his life is told in the Life of St. Odo, which is a valuable source of information about the life of the saint. The story of the saint's life is told in the Life of St. Odo, which is a valuable source of information about the life of the saint.
Odo of Cheriton, preacher and fabulist, d. 1247. He visited Paris, and it was probably there that he gained the degree of Master. Bale mentions a tradition that he was a Cistercian or a Prémontréan; but he can hardly have taken vows if, as seems most likely, he was the Master of Odo of Cheriton mentioned in Kentish and London records from 1212 to 1217, the son of William of Cheriton, lord of the manor of Dele in Rochester. In 1214-1212 William was debited with a fine to the crown, for Odo to have the custodia of Cheriton church, near Folkestone. In 1233 Odo inherited his father's estates in Dele, Cheriton, and elsewhere. A charter of 1235 forms (Brit. Mus., Harl. Ch. 49 B 15), by which he quitclaimed the rent of a shop in London, has his seal attached, bearing the figure of a monk seated at a desk, with a star above him (St. Odo of Cluny?).

Like Jacques de Vitré, he introduced exempla freely into his sermons; his best known work, a collection of moralizing tales, anecdotes, and fables, was entitled "Parabola" from the opening words of the prologue (Perictum in parabolis os meum), was evidently designed for preachers. Though partly composed of commonly known adaptations and extracts, it shows originality, and the moralizations are full of pungent denunciations of the prevalent vices of clergy and laity. A Latin version of his "Parabola" is extant, and one in German verse, with extracts, and have been printed by Hervieux (Fabulistes Latins, IV, 173-235); a thirteenth century French version is extant, also an early Spanish translation. Some of the contents reappear, along with many other exempla, in his sermons on the Sunday Gospels, completed in 1249, extant in several manuscripts; an abridgment of which, prepared by M. Makred, was printed by J. Hadins Ascensus in 1520. The only other extant works, certainly authentic, are "Tractatus de Pontentia", "Tractatus de Passione", and "Sermones de Sanctis", but the "Speculum Laicorum" also cites him as authority for many other exempla. Hauré's dictionary of the "Lexicon de Scriptis et Poematis de Hispania" (Madrid, 1871-1873) notes that the fabulist was a distinct person from the author of the sermons and treatises, is not supported.

Odo of Glanfeuil (Saint-Maur-sur-Loire), abbot, ninth-century hagiographer. He entered Glanfeuil not later than 836 and became its abbot in 841. In 841 he issued a "Life of St. Maurus", a revision, he claimed, of a "Life" originally written by Faustus of Montecassino, which makes St. Maurus the founder and first abbot of Glanfeuil, and is the chief source for the life of Maurus. Hauré noted that it is unchronologically that it is generally believed to have been composed by Odo himself, though Malaball and a few modern writers ascribe it to Faustus (Mabillon in "Annales O. B." 1, 629-54) and in "Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben." I, 243 sq. Adolph in "Studien und Mittei- lungen aus dem Benediktiner- und Cisterzienserorden", XXVI and XXXVII (Brünn, 1905 and 1906); Plume ibid., XVI (1905); Huiller, "Etude critique des Actes de S. Maur de Glanfeuil" (Paris, 1903); Halphen in "Revue historique" LXXXVIII (Paris, 1905), 287-305. The "Life" is printed in "Acta SS." January, 11, 321-322. Another work of Odo, "Miracula S. Mauri, una restitutio monasterii Glanfeulensis", has some historical value. The author narrates how he fled with the relics of St. Maurus from the Normans in 862 and how the relics were finally transferred to the monastery of St-Maur-des-Fossés near Paris in 868. It is printed in "Acta SS.", January, II, 334-42. In SO3 Odo became also Abbot of St-Maur-des-Fossés.

O'Dugan, John (Seaghán "mor" O Dubhghaill), d. in Roscommon, 1372. His family was for several centuries held hereditary tithens to the O'Kells of Ul Mór. His most important work was the "Miracula de fabricatione vocis", giving the names of the various tribes and territories of the Irish, and the various chiefs before the coming of the Normans. He devotes 152 lines to Meath, 334 to Uster, 328 to Connacht, and only 56 to Leinster, leaving it evidently unfinished at his death. His contemporary, Giolla-na-mamh O Húidhirn (Heerin), completed it. This work throws more light upon ancient Irish names and territories than any other similar work. In his monumental "Carnabrensis Eversurus", Dr. Lynch (q. v.) says that he could not find "any better source than this remarkable poem" concerning the chief Irish families before the coming of the English. His piece of it occupies pages 235-79 of the first volume of Father Matthew Kelly's edition. O'Dugan was the author of several other extant poems, all more or less in the nature of a memoriarum technicen, valuable chiefly for their facts about the kings of Ireland and of the provinces. He also composed several rules for determining moveable feasts, etc.

O'Dwyer, Joseph, physician, inventor of intubation; b. at Cleveland, 1811; d. in New York, January 7, 1895. He was educated in the public schools of London, Ontario, and studied medicine in the office of Dr. Anderson. After two years of apprenticeship he entered the College of Physicians (New York) from which he was graduated in 1863. He won first place in the competitive examination for resident physicians of the Charity, now the City, Hospital of New York City on Blackwell's Island. Twice during his service he contracted cholera. After the completion of his service he took up private practice. Four years later (1872) he was appointed to the staff of the New York Foundling Asylum.

He was the first to recognize that children suffocate when diphtheria brought about closure of the larynx proved too and a sight for him, so he tried to find something to keep the larynx open. He used a wire spring and experimented with a small bivalve speculum but to no purpose. The inflamed mucous membrane and false membrane forced themselves into the interstices and the difficulty of breathing returned. Besides, the pressure produced ulceration. Finally he tried a tube. The use of a tube for intubation had often been attempted but unsuccessfully. O'Dwyer succeeded in devising the form of tube that would remain and then ingeniously fashioned instruments for the placing and displaying of the tube. He displayed that by this method of relieving difficulty of breathing proved successful. Most of his medical colleagues were sure that O'Dwyer's scheme was visionary. Be-before his death it was universally acknowledged that he had made the most important practical discovery of his generation. His tubes and the accompanying instruments for intubation and extubation, with his methods for the care of these patients, have since come to be employed everywhere throughout the medical world. The tubes are also of great value in stenosis of the larynx due to various other diseases, such as syphilis, and to stricture of the larynx, especially consequent on burns or scalds.

Afterwards O'Dwyer devoted himself to the study of pneumonia, but late in December 1897 he developed symptoms of a brain lesion, probably of infectious origin, which proved fatal. He was a fervent Catholic. His work on the Foundling Hospital helped greatly to make that institution one of the best of its kind.

Geolampadius, Johann, Protestant theologian, organizer of Protestantism at Basle, b. at Weinsberg, Swabia, in 1452; d. at Basle, 24 November, 1531. His family name was Heusgen or Hussgen, not Huscheyn (Hauschein), as the hellenized form Geolampadius was later rendered. Having received a preliminary classical training at Weinsberg and Heilbronn, he began the study of law at Bologna, but left for Heidelberg, 1519, to become acquainted with Melanchthon; returning to Heidelberg, he studied Hebrew under a Jewish convert, and became acquainted with Brenz and Capito. A little later he was appointed preacher at the cathedral of Basle (1515), where he joined the circle of Erasmus. In 1515 he was made a bachelor, in 1516 licentiate, and on 9 September, 1518, a doctor of theology. He had already resigned as preacher at Basle and returned to Weinsberg. In December, 1518, he became cathedral preacher at Augsburg, where he joined the Humanists who sympathized with Luther. He corresponded with Luther and Melanchthon, and directed against Eck the anonymous pamphlet "Ecclesia, sicut est, non solum Ecclesia, sed etiam theologia" (1519). Geolampadius, however, far from having taken a definite stand, was engaged in translating the ascetical writings of St. Gregory of Nazianzus from Greek into Latin.

Suddenly he entered the Brigitine monastery at Altomünster (23 April, 1520). He first thought of devoting himself to study in this retreat, but was soon again entangled in controversy, when, at the request of Bernhard Adelmann, he wrote his opinion of Luther, which was very favourable, and sent it in confidence to Adelmann at Augsburg. The latter, however, forwarded it to Capito at Basle and he, without asking the author's permission, published it. (E constitutum de doctore Martino Lutheri.) This was followed by other uncanonical writings, e.g., one against the doctrine of the Church on confession (Augsburg, 1521) and a sermon on the Holy Eucharist (Augsburg, 1521) dealing with transubstantiation as a question of convenience and repudiating the sacrificial character of the Eucharist, treated as an unpretentious gift (E constitutum de judiciu de doctore Martino Lutheri). He left in February, 1522, supplied by the community with money for his journey. Through the influence of Franz von Sickingen he became chaplain in the castle on the Eberburg. In November of the same year he removed to Basle. He publicly defended Luther's doctrine of justification by faith alone (30 August, 1523). The following February he advocated the marriage of priests and used his pulpit to disseminate the new teachings. The progress of Protestantism became much more marked in Basle after the Council had appointed him pastor of St. Martin's (February, 1525), on condition that he should introduce no innovations into Divine service without special authorization of the council, which included Catholics as well as Reformers, and was still cautious; the spread of the new teachings was particularly counteracted by the representatives of the Church and the university, which, for the greater part, was still Catholic in its tendencies.

After Karlstadt's writings had been proscribed by the Basle Council, Geolampadius, in August, 1525, issued his "De gemina verborum Dominii: Hoe est corpus repercussionem et figura corpus" (Basle, 1525), in which he declared openly for Zwingli's doctrine of the Last Supper, construing as metaphorical the words of institution. The distinction between his explanation and Zwingli's was merely formal, Geolampadius, instead of est interpreted the word corpus figuratively (corpus—figura corporis). Accordingly the Last Supper was to him merely an external symbol, which the faithful should receive, less for their own sakes than for the sake of their neighbours, as a token of brotherhood and a means of edification. This monograph was confiscated at Basle, and attacked by Brenz on behalf of the Lutheran theologians of Swabia in his "Symgramma Suevicum" (1526), which Geolampadius answered with his "Antweiner ad eccestastes Suevos" (1526). Although Geolampadius had continued to say Mass until 1525, in November of that year he conducted the first "reformed" celebration of the Lord's Supper with a liturgy compiled by himself. In 1526 he arranged an order of Divine service under the title "Forma et Gestus, die der Kem- dertant, des Herrn Nachtmahls und der Kranken Heimsuchung eigen zu Basel von etlichen Predikanten gehalten werden". In May 1526, he took part in the disputation at Baden, but in Zwingli's absence he was unable to cope successfully with Eck. In May 1527, the Council of Basle requested the Catholic and Protestant preachers of the city to give in writing their views concerning the Mass. The Catholic belief was presented by Augustin Marius, the Protestant by Geolampadius. The Council as yet placed no general proscription on the Mass, but allowed each of the clergy to retain or set it aside. In consequence the Mass was abolished in the churches and the singing of psalms in German introduced. Monasteries were suppressed towards the end of 1527. The ancient Faith was, however, tolerated for a time in the churches under Catholic control.

After the disputation at Bern in January, 1528, in which Geolampadius and Zwingli were chief speakers on the Protestant side, the Protestants of Basle threw caution to the winds; at Easter, 1528, and later, several churches were despoiled of their statues and pictures. In December, 1528, at the instance of Geolampadius, the Protestants petitioned the Council to suppress Catholic worship, but, as the Council was too slow in deciding, the Protestantizing of Basle was completed by means of public proscriptions. The Protestants expelled the Catholic members of the Council. The churches previously in the hands of the Catholics, including the cathedral, were seized and pillaged. Geolampadius, who had married in 1528, became pastor of the cathedral and against all the Protestant clergy of Basle, and took the leading part in compiling the "Reformation proclamation" promulgated by the Council (1 April, 1529). Against those who refused to participate in the Protestant celebration of the Lord's Supper, compulsory measures were enacted which broke down the last remnant of opposition from the Catholics. In contrast to Zwingli, Geolampadius stood strong, but with the representatives of the Church a greater share in its management. In October, 1529, Geolampadius joined in the vain attempt at Marburg to close the sacrificial dispute between the Lutherans and the Reformed. In 1531, with Bucer and Blarer, he introduced Protestantism by force into Ulm, Biberach, and Memmingen. He was also concerned in the affairs of the Waldenses, and the Gallican secretary, responsible for the Reformed at this time.

Eckelmann was a man of splendid, though misdirected, natural gifts. Among the fathers and leaders of Protestantism he had not, either as theologian or man of action, the importance or forceful personality of Luther, Calvin, and Zwingli, but his name stands among the first of their supporters. As a theologian after the full development of his religious opinions, he belonged to the party of Zwingli, though remaining independent on some important points. The opinion that he was more tolerant than the other Protestant leaders does not accord with facts, though true on the whole he regards his relations to Protestants of other beliefs. The professors of theology which had thus appeared among the adherents of the new religion, due particularly to variations in opinion concerning the Lord's Supper, were painful to Eckelmann; but in contrast to Luther's uncompromising attitude, he strove without surrendering his own views to restore human charity. If the majority of Eckelmann's Catholic religion, however, he bore the same hatred and intolerance as the other Protestant leaders. Likewise in justifying religious war, he shares Zwingli's standpoint. If his first movements at Basle were more cautious than those of others elsewhere, it was not through greater mildness, but rather out of regard for conscience; otherwise he could not have pronounced at a single stroke. As soon, however, as he had won over the secular authority, he did not rest until Catholic worship was suppressed. As soon as those who at first resisted were either hamstrung or forced to apostatize.

FRIEDRICH LEUCHT.

ECONOMUS. E. ECO (Gr. οἰκονομός from oikos, a house, and oικoν, to distribute, to administer), one who is charged with the care of a house, an adminstrator. In canon law this term designates the individual who is appointed to take charge of the temporal goods of the Church in a diocese; it is used also of the person in charge of the property of a monastery. This office originated in the Eastern Church and dates back to the fourth century; it was a law of Honorius and Arsenius. It was not of universal use; it spread much later (Cod. Theodos. IX tit. 45, lex. 3). The Council of Chalcedon (551) ordered an economus to be appointed in every diocese, to take charge of ecclesiastical property under episcopal authority (canon xxvi in Mansi, VII, 367). They were established in the Eastern Church and have continued down to the present day in the Eastern Church in the same capacity. (2nd ed., Ratisbon, 1894, 37). The increase of church property after the Edict of Milan (313) and the multiplication of episcopal duties rendered this office very useful. In the Western Church, we meet with economus in Spain (Council of Seville, 619, can. ix), in Sarum, and perhaps in Sicily, at the end of the sixth century (Jaffé-Wattenbach, "Regesta Pontificum Romanum," Leipzig, 1881, I, no. 1252, 1915). But as a general rule the Western bishops contented themselves with the aid of a confidential assistant, a vicelomnis, who looked after the temporalities and ranked next to the bishop in the establishment of a domain in connexion with each church, without entering the ecclesiastical property much lighter. The office of vicelomnis was modified by the influence of the feudal system, and by the fact that the bishops became temporal sovereigns. The Council of Trent ordered the chapters of cathedral churches to establish, in addition to a capitular establishment of a domain in connexion with each church, the temporal property of the bishop during an episcopal vacancy (Sess. XXIV, De Reform. c. XVI). At the present time the bishop is not obliged to appoint an economus, though he is not hindered from so doing. The Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (c. lxxv) advises bishops to select one from among the ecclesiastics or even the laity, who is skilled in the civil law of the country.

A. VAN HOYE.

Ecumnorum (Βασιλεία), Bishop of Trikka (now Trikkâ) in Thessaly about 900 (according to Cavc, op. cit. infra, p. 112). He is the reputed author of commentaries on books of the New Testament. A manuscript of the tenth or eleventh century containing a commentary on the Apocalypse attributes it to him. It is composed in a difficult prologue and then a slightly modified version of the commentary of Andrew of Caesarea (sixth cent.). Manuscripts of the eleventh century contain commentaries on the Acts and on the Catholic and Pauline epistles, attributed since the sixteenth century to Ecumnus. Those on the Acts and Catholic and Pauline Epistles are identical with the commentaries of Theophylactus of Achrida (eleventh cent.). The Pauline commentaries are a different work, though they too contain many parallel passages to Theophylactus. The first manuscripts, however, are older than Theophylactus, so that it cannot be merely a false attribution of his work. It would seem then that Ecumnus copied Andrew of Caesarea and was influenced by Theophylactus. This is true; however, further complicated by the fact that among the authors quoted in these works the name of Ecumnus himself occurs repeatedly. The question then of Ecumnus's authorship is in all cases very difficult. Bardenhewer (Kirchenlex., IX, 1905, coll. 700-10) is doubtful about it; Ehrard (in Krambacher's "Byzant. Lit.", 132) says: "The name (Ecumnus) represents in the present state of investigation a riddle that can be solved only by thorough critical study of the manuscripts in connexion with the whole question of the Catena." The commentary on St. Paul's Epistles is a compromise between the usual kind of commentary and a catena. Most explanations are given without reference and are therefore presumably those of the author; but there are also long excerpts from earlier writers, Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria etc., especially from Photius. It is among these that Ecumnus himself is quoted. The Commentary on the Apocalypse was first edited by Cranmer, "Theos. An. (Oxford, 1604), 197-582"; the other three (on Acts, Cath. Ep., and St. Paul) by Donatus (Verona, 1532). Morellus (Paris, 1631) re-edited these with a Latin translation; his edition is reproduced in P. G., CXVIII-CIX.

Oertel, John James Maximilian, journalist, b. at Ansbach, Bavaria, 27 April, 1811; d. at Jamaica, New York, 21 August, 1882. Born a Lutheran, he was sent to the Lutheran University of Erlangen where he studied theology and five years later was ordained a minister. After his ordination he accepted a call to care for his countrymen in the United States, and arrived in New York in October, 1837. The unorthodox opinions of the New York Lutherans displeased him, and he left for Missouri early in 1839. Things were no better there, so he returned to New York. denominational dissensions weakened his faith, and in 1840 he became a Catholic. An account of his conversion in pamphlet form published 25 March, 1859, had quite a vogue in the controversial literature of the day. After his conversion he taught German at St. John's College, Fordham; later he edited in Cincinnati the "Wahrheitsfreund", a German Catholic weekly, and in 1846 he left for Baltimore where he founded the weekly "Kirchenzeitung", which, under his editorial direction, was the most prominent German Catholic publication in the United States. In 1855 he became the first Superior General in the United States. In 1873 he was sent by the New York archbishop to St. Louis to publish "Altes und Neues". In 1875 Plus IX made him a Knight of St. Gregory in recognition of his services to the Church and Catholic literature.

Oettingen (Altötting, Oettinga), during the Carolingian period a royal palace near the confluence of the Isen and the Inn in Upper Bavaria, near which King Karlmann erected a Benedictine monastery in 786, with Wernolf as first abbot, and also built the abbey church. The Apostle St. Peter is said to have visited the monastery in 907. King Louis the Child, gave the abbey to commendam to Bishop Burchard of Passau (903-915), probably identical with Burchard, second and last abbot. In 910 the Hungarians ransacked and burnt the church and abbey. In 1228 Duke Louis I of Bavaria rebuilt them and put them in charge of twelve Augustinian Canons. They maintained the royal patronage and remained until the secularization of the Bavarian monasteries in 1803. Under their care was also the Liebfrauen-Kapelle with its miraculous image of Our Lady, dating from the end of the thirteenth or the beginning of the fourteenth century. The pilgrims became so numerous that the Augustinian Canons and the Jesuits erected a house in 1591 and remained until the suppression of their order in 1773. Franciscans settled there from 1653 to 1803; from 1803 to 1844 the Capuchins and some secular priests, from 1844 to 1873 the Redemptorists had charge, and since 1872 the Capuchins. About 300,000 pilgrims come annually. Since the middle of the seventeenth century the hearts of the deceased Bavarian princes are preserved in the Liebfrauen-Kapelle.

Offa, King of Mercia, d. 29 July, 796. He was one of the leading figures of Saxon history and appears from the real facts stripped of all legend. He obtained the throne of Mercia in 757, after the murder of his cousin, King Ethelbald, by Beornræd. After spending fourteen years in consolidating and ordering his territories he engaged in conquests which made him the most powerful king in England. After a successful campaign against the Heptarchy, King Ecgfrith of Kent at Otford (775); the West Saxons at Bensington in Oxfordshire (779); and finally the Welsh, depriving the last-named of a large part of Powys, including the town of Pengwern. To repress the raids of the Welsh he built Offa's dyke, roughly indicating for the first time what has remained the boundary between England and Wales. Offa was now supreme south of the Humber, with the result that England was divided into three political divisions, Northumbria, Mercia, and Wessex. His next step was to complete the independence of Mercia by inducing the pope to erect a Mercian archbishopric, so as to free Mercia from the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Hadrian I sent two legates, George and Theophylactus, to England to arrange for the transfer of five suffragan sees of Canterbury (viz. Worcester, Leicester, Lindsey, Elmham, and Dunwich) to the new Archbishopric of Hereford, of which he was the first archbishop. This was effected at the Synod of Cellehy (787), at which Offa granted the pope a yearly sum equal to one meneas a day for the relief of the poor and for lights to be kept burning before St. Peter's tomb. At the same time he associated his son Ecgfrith with him in the kingship. He preserved friendly relations with Charlemagne, who undertook to protect the English pilgrims and merchants who passed through his territories. Many charters granting lands to various monasteries are extant, and, though some are forgeries, enough are genuine documents to show that he was a liberal benefactor to the Church. The laws of Offa are not extant, but were embodied in his later code. The chief stain on his character is the execution of Æthelbert, King of the East Angles. In all other respects he showed himself a great Christian king and an able and enlightened ruler.

Offerings (Oblations).—I. The word oblation, from the supine of the Latin verbocfferre ('to offer'), is etymologically akin to offering, but is, unlike the latter, almost exclusively used in connection with matters religious. In the English Bibles "oblation", characterizing "gift", "sacrifice" are used indiscriminately for anything presented to God in worship, or for the service of the Temple or priest. This indiscriminate rendering arises from the fact that these words do not purport to render always the same Hebrew expressions. The latter, moreover, are not distinctly specific in their meaning. In this article oblations will be considered in the narrow sense the term has tended to assume of vegetable or lifeless things offered to God, in contradistinction to "bloody sacrifices".

Oblations of this kind, like sacrifices, were found in all ancient Semitic religions—in fact are a world-wide and ever-present institution have been proposed to explain how offerings came to be a part of worship. Unfortunately very many modern scholars assume that mankind began in the savage state. According to one theory, the god being considered the first owner of the land, it was inferred that he had a claim to a tribute from the soil; this is the tribute theory. It relies on the fact that the offering of first-fruit is one of the earliest forms of oblations found among ancient peoples. The assumption that primitive men conceived deity under the anthropomorphic forms is the source whence have sprung the gift theory, the tobole-bond theory, and the communion theory. And as in these systems, the god is approached through presents which the worshipper counts on to insure favour (Δῶρα θεῷ ἔθετο, δῶρον αὐλουσ ἔπαινου). That such a misconception of the divinity was prevalent at certain epochs and among certain peoples cannot be gainsaid (Cic., "De Leg." ii, 16); however, in view of the idea of the sacredness of the bond created by the sharing in a common meal—an idea that still holds sway among Semitic nomads (and nonagricultural life, undoubtedly preceded agricultural life)—the gift theory has been mostly superseded by the table-bond theory.

A bond is entered into between the god and the worshipper when they, as it were, sit at the same table, man furnishing the meal, and the god granting in return the assurance of his protection. The conventional theory of the Hexateuch, as W. R. Smith has shown, is based on the totemistic conception of the origin of worship, its essence consisting in that the life of the god, infused into the totem, is assimilated by the worshipper in the sacred repast. This theory would account for animal sacrifices and oblations of such vegetables as were considered totemic; but it fails manifestly to explain the many and various oblations custom imposed or sanctioned.

As far as positive information is concerned, the origin of oblations, according to Genesis, may be traced back to Cain's offerings of the fruits of the earth. Some critics would brush aside the statement as the fable of the first of the Hebrews; yet the passage expresses the writer's belief that sacrifices and oblations were offered by the very first men. It emphasizes, moreover, the idea that oblation is an act of worship natural to an agricultural population, just as the slaying of a victim is to be expected in the worship of a pastoral people; and it seems to set forth the idea that blood offerings to the god are more pleasing to God than mere oblations—a belief seemingly inspired by the superiority the nomad has ever claimed in the East over the husbandman. At all events it cannot be denied that there is at the root of all oblations the idea that God has a claim upon man, his possessions, and his services; and of his labours, and is pleased at receiving an acknowledgment of His sovereignty.

Whether exterior worship, especially sacrifice, was in the beginning, as W. R. Smith affirms, an affair, not of the individual, but of the tribe or clan, is questionable. As far back as documents go, side by side with public oblations, are others made by individuals in their own name and out of private property.

The things thus made over to the deity were among Semitic peoples most varied in nature and value. Offering the first yield of the year's crop was extensively practised, local usage specifying what should be offered. The premises of the corn crop (wheat, barley, sometimes lentils) were generally reserved to the deity; so also was a strip or share of the first milk and butter of the year. Sometimes fruits (not only first-fruits, but other fruit-oblations) were offered in their natural state. At Cana the fruit-offering consisted of a choice branch bearing fruit; possibly such was the form of certain fruit-offerings in Israel. Oblations might also consist of fruit prepared as for ordinary use, either as slices, or as a purée, or made in the form of jelly (delash; the latter preparation was excluded from the altar in Israel). All cereal oblations, whether of first-fruits or otherwise, among the Hebrews and apparently among the Phoenicians, were mingled with oil and salt before being placed on the altar. As sacrifices were frequently the occasion of social gatherings and of religious festivities, the custom was introduced of offering with the victim whatever concomitants (bread, wine, etc.) were necessary. Yet nowhere do we find water offered up as an oblation or used for libations; only the ritual of late Judaism for the Feast of Tabernacles commanded that thither seven days of the celebration water drawn from the Fountain of Siloam (V. v., Sellum) should be brought into the Temple amidst the blare of trumpets; and solemnly poured out upon the altar.

Other articles of food were used for libations, such, for instance, as milk among the Phoenicians, as among nomadic Arabs it is to this very day. Libations of wine were frequent, at least in countries where wine was not too expensive; among the Hebrews, as in Greece and Rome, wine was added to holocausts as well as to victims whose flesh the worshipper would eat of, and was then poured out at the base of the altar.

Analogous to offering liquid food to be poured out as a libation was the custom of anointing sacred objects or hallowed places. The history of the patriarchs bears witness to its primitive usage, and the accounts of travellers certify to its existence to-day among many Semitic populations. In this case, oil is generally used; occasionally more precious ointments, but as these largely contain oil, the difference is accidental. Among nomads where oil is scarce, butter is used, being spread on sacred stones, tombs, or on the doors of the deities, or the lintels of venerated shrines. In some places oil is offered by way of fuel for lamps to be kept burning before the tomb of some renowned hero or in some sanctuary. Also it has always been a general custom in the East to offer, either together with, or apart from, sacrifices and oblations, spices to be burned at the place of the sacrifice or of the sacrificial meal, or upon a revered tomb, or at any place of divine majesty. But in any case it is hardly justifiable to pay religious homage at the tomb of someainted wely or at certain sanctuaries without bringing an offering, however insignificant. If nothing better is at hand, the worshipper will leave on the spot a strip from his garment, a horse-shoe nail, even a pebble from the road.

The tithe (q, wely) is a more inexact than an oblation proper, and suppose a settled population, hence they have no place in the religion of nomads, ancient or modern.

Besides the oblations mentioned above (usually articles of food), the votive offerings made among early Semites on very special occasions deserve mention. One of the most characteristic is the offering of a hair-crown, common also among other ancient peoples. This offering was a personal one, and aimed to create or emphasize the relation between the worshipper and his god; it was usually in connexion with special vows. From this hair-offering we should distinguish the shaving of the head and its use as an offering in certain cases (Lev., xiv, 9). Owing undoubtedly to the superstitions practice of ancient peoples, associating mourning with a hair-offering, the Pentateuchal legislation enacted on this subject (Prohibitions (Lev., xix, 27; xxi, 5; Deut., xiv, 1)}, which, however, were not always observed. The only hair-offering legally recorded was that of the Nazarite (Num., vi), and the vow of the Nazarite (Num., vi), and the writer of the Canticle of Deborah had some such vow in view when he speaks (Judges, v., 2), according to the probable sense of the Hebrew, of men offering their hair and vowing themselves to battle, i.e. vowing not to cut their hair until they should come back in triumph; this indicates if need be the time when they that should conquer or die. Also in Num., xxxii, 28, we read of a share of the spoils of battle being set aside as an offering to the sanctuary. Although the narrative here concerns a special occurrence, and nothing intimates that this spoil offering should be held as a precedent, yet it is very likely that it begat at least a popular custom. We see, indeed, in Israel and neighbouring peoples, choice spoils hung up in sanctuaries. It may suffice to recall the trophies heaped up by the Assyrian and Babylonian rulers; also the Ark of the Covenant set up as an offering in the temple of Dagon by the Philistines; and in Israel itself, the arms of Goliath offered by David to the end of Noh.

II. OBOLATIONS AMONG THE JEWS.—Obolations in the Jewish religion were the object of minute regulations in the Law. Some were offered with bloody sacrifices (cf. Num., viii, 8; xvi, 4-10), as the offering of meal, oil, and incense that accompanied the daily holocaust. A handful of this meal-offering mingled with oil was burned on the altar together with incense, and the remainder was allotted to the priests, to be eaten unleavened within the Temple precincts (Lev., vi, 14-18; Num., vi, 14-16). In peace-offerings, together with the victim, leaves, waters, and cakes of unleavened leaven bread were presented to the Temple (the leaves of leavened bread were not to be put or burned upon the altar); one cake, one wafer, and two loaves of each kind was the share of the officiating priest (Lev., vii, 11-14; ii, 11). Among the regulations for the sacrifice of thanksgiving to be offered by lepers on their return to the community at first perfectly healthy, but which means, should add to the victims three-tenths of an ephah (the ephah of the second Temple contained about three pecks, dry measure, the old measure being possibly twice as large) of meal tempered with oil; if they were poor, one tenth of an ephah was sufficient (Lev., xiv, 10, 21). Finally the sacrifice of the Nazarite included a basketful of unleavened bread tempered with oil and cakes of like kind, together with the ordinary libations.

For public oblations separate from sacrifices see First-Fruits; Loaves of Proposition; Tithes. Moreover, every day the High Priest presented at the altar in this offering a tenth of an ephah of meal, and three loaves of leavened bread were presented to the Temple (the leaves of leavened bread were not to be put or burned upon the altar); one cake, one wafer, and two loaves of each kind was the share of the officiating priest (Lev., vi, 19-23; cf. Jos., "Ant. Jud.", III, x, 7). A certain number of private oblations were prescribed by Law. The priest, on entering upon his ministry, offered an oblation, the same in kind and quantity as the daily oblation of the High Priest (Lev., vi, 20, 21). A man obliged to a sin-offering, and too poor to provide a victim, was allowed to present an oblation of one tenth of an ephah of flour without the accompaniments of oil and incense (Lev., v, 1-4, 11, 12). A woman accused of adultery was subjected to a trial during which an offering of one tenth of an ephah of barley-flour without oil or incense was made, a part being burned on the altar. Finally oblations might be made in fulfiliement of a vow; but then the matter was left to the choice of the vow. The regulations of the Pentateuchal Law concerning oblations were scrutinized and commented upon by the Rabbis, who in certain cases are likely to occur, for instance, on the nature, origin, preparation, and cooking of the flour to be used, its buying and measuring, the mode of presenting, receiving, and offering the oblation, its division and the attributing of each of the parts (see the forty-second treatise of the Mishna: "Menahoth"). Of these commentaries we will single out only those concerned with the rite to be observed in offering the oblations, because they are the only somewhat reliable explanation of difficult expressions occasionally met with in Holy Writ (D. V.: "to elevate", "to separate", Lev., vii, 13; x, 15, etc.). When an Israelite presented an oblation, the priest went to meet him at the gate of the priests' quarter, he laid his hands and those of the offerer, who held oblation, and drew the offerer's hands and the oblation first backwards, then forwards (this was the theneraph, improperly rendered "the separation"), again upwards and downwards (theremath, "the elevation"). These rites were not to be performed with oil, and leaves of leavened bread first-offered at the Pasch and the "oblation of jealousy" (on the occasion of an accusation of adultery) were moved about in the manner described, then brought to the south-west corner of the altar; the first-fruits offered at the Pentecost and the log (2 5 of a pint) of oil presented by the leper were subject to the three-fold blessing and not brought to the altar; the sin-offering, the oblations of the priests, and the free-will oblations were only brought directly to the altar; lastly the leaves of proposition were neither "separated" and "elevated" nor brought to the altar.

III. Oblations among Christians.—Like many Jewish customs, that of offering to the Temple the matter of the sacrifices and other oblations was adapted by the early Christian communities to the first order of things. In the second century these Christian oblations is that of the matter of the Eucharistic sacrifice. Not only the lathy, but the whole clergy, bishops, and pope himself included, had to make this offering. These oblations were collected by the officiating bishop assisted by priests and deacons at the beginning of the "Massa Fidelium", after the dismissal of the non-communion. In silence, was, towards the beginning of the fifth century, made amidst the singing of a Psalm, known in Rome as the "Offerentium", at Milan as the "Offertura", and in Greek churches as the "Cherubikon" (our Offertory is a remnant of the old "Offerentium", curtailed by reason of the actual gathering of the oblations falling into disease). Part of the oblations was destined for consecration and communion (cf. the French word officile applied to the matter of the Eucharist). The subdeacon in charge of this part is called in certain "Ordines Romanus" the "oblatarius". Another part was destined for the poor, and the remainder for the clergy. No important part of that which was called the oblation was actually to designate the whole liturgical service. Apart from this liturgical oblation, which has been preserved, at least partly, in the liturgy of Milan and in some churches of France, new fruits were at given seasons presented at Mass for blessing, a custom somewhat analogous to the first-fruits offerings in the Old Law; this usage is still in vigour in parts of Germany where, at Easter, eggs are solemnly blessed; but, contrary to Hebrew customs, the Christians usually retained the full disposition of these articles of food. Very early offerings were made over to the Church for the support of the poor and of the clergy. St. Paul emphasized the right of ministers of the Gospel to live by the Gospel (1 Cor., ix, 13-14), and he never tired of reminding the churches founded by him of their duty to supply the wants of poorer communities. How, within the limits of each community, the poor were cared for we catch a glimpse of in the records of the early Church of Jerusalem (institutions of separation); and as the Church of Rome of the oblations for the poor reached a fair amount, we know from the prominence of the deacons, an illustration of which we have in the history of St. Lawrence, and in the fact that the pope was usually chosen from among their number. In time of persecution, manual offerings were sufficient to support the clergy and the poor; but when peace had come, Christians felt it a duty to insure this support by means of foundations. Such donations multiplied, and the word "oblations" (usually in the plural number) came to mean in Canon Law any property, real or personal, made over to the Church. .

OFFERTORY

Offertory (offertorium), the rite by which the bread and wine are presented (offered) to God before they are consecrated and the prayers and chant that accompany it.
1. History.—The idea of this preparatory hallowing of the matter of the sacrifice by offering it to God is very old and forms an important element of every Christian liturgy. In the earliest period we have no evidence of anything but the bringing up of the bread of his Son, and give us in return the grace of Communion. The Liturgy of “Apost. Const.,” VIII, says: “The deacons bring the gifts to the bishop at the altar . . . , the bishop having prayed silently with the priests” (xii, 3—4). This silent prayer is undoubtedly an Offertory prayer. But a later modification in the East brought about one of the characteristic differences between Eastern and Roman liturgies. All Eastern (and the old Galilean) rites prepare the gift before the Liturgy begins. This ceremony (ξύνασασθή) is especially elaborate in the Byzantine and its derived rites. It takes place on the credence table. The bread and wine are arranged, divisas are sung many parts of them involving the idea of an offertory. The gifts are left there and are brought to the altar in solemn procession at the beginning of the Liturgy of the Faithful. This leaves no room for another offertory then. However, when they are placed on the altar prayers are said by the celebrant and a litany by the deacon which repeat the offertory idea. Rome alone has kept the older custom of one offertory and of preparing the gifts when they are wanted at the beginning of the Mass of the Faithful. Originally at this moment the people brought up bread and wine which were received by the deacons and placed by them on the altar. Traces of the custom remain at a papal Mass and Mass which repeat the idea of the old Milanese rite. Originally the only Roman Offertory prayers were the secrets. The Gregorian Sacramentary contains only the rubric: “Comm unoffertorium; et dicatur oratio super oblationis” (P. L. 73, LXVIII, 10). The prayer of the Secret. All the old secrets express the offertory idea clearly. They were said silently by the celebrant (hence their name) and so are not introduced by Omnes. This corresponds to the oldest custom mentioned in the “Apost. Const.”’s reason is that means that everyone said a psalm (the Offertory chant). In the Middle Ages, as the public presentation of the gifts by the people had disappeared, there seemed to be a void at this moment which was filled by our present Offertory prayers (Thalhofer, op. cit. below, II, 161). For a long time these prayers were considered a private devotion of the priest, like the preparation at the altar. They are a continuation of the medieval Italian observance. The present Offertory prayers vary considerably. They were established at Rome by the fourteenth century (Ordo Rom. XIV, 59, P. L. LXVIII, 1165). The present Roman prayers were compiled from various sources, Galilean or Mozarabic. The prayer “Suscepi sancte” occurs in Charles the Bold’s (1472—77) prayer book; “Deus qui humanae substan” is from a Christmas Collect in the Gregorian Sacramentary (P. L. LXVIII, 32); “Offertorius tibi Domine” and “Veni sanctificator” (fragment of an old Epiplexis, Hoppe, “Die Epilekisis,” Schaffhausen, 1864, p. 272) are Mozarabic (P. L. LXCV, 112). Before Pius V’s Missal these prayers were often preceded by the title “Canon minor” or “Secretella” (as amplifications of the Secret). The Missal of Pius V (1570) printed them in the Ordinary. Only then the prayers that we know form part of the Roman Mass. The ideas expressed in them are obvious. Only it may be noted that two expressions: “hanc immaculatam hostiam” and “calicem salutaris” dramatically anticipate the moment of consecration, as does the Byzantine Cherubikon.

While the Offertory is made the people (choir) sing a verse (the Offertorium in the sense of a text to be sung) that forms part of the Proper of the Mass. No such chant is mentioned in “Apost. Const.,” VIII, but it may no doubt be supposed as the reason why the celebrant there too prays silently. It is referred to by St. Augustine (Retract., XI, xi, P. L., XXXII, 63). The Offertorium was once a whole psalm with an antiphon. By the time of the Gregorian Antiphonary the psalm has been reduced to a few verses only, which are always given in that book (e.g., P. L., LXVIII, 631). So also the Second Roman Ordo: “Canitis offertorium cum versibus” (ib., 972). Durandus notes that disapproach that in his time the verses of the psalm are almost always left out. Now only the antiphon is sung, except at requiem. It is taken from the psalter, or other book of the Bible, or it is often not a Biblical text. It refers in some way to the feast or occasion of the Mass, never to the offering of bread and wine. Only the requiem has preserved a longer offertory with one verse and the repetition of the last part of the antiphon (the text is not Biblical).

II. Present Use.—A high Mass, as soon as the celebrant has chanted the Omnes followed by no prayer, the choir sings the Offertory. When they have finished there remains an interval till the Preface which may (when the organ is permitted) be filled by music of the organ or at any time by singing some approved hymn or chant. Meanwhile the celebrant first says the Offertory chant. The corporal has been spread on the altar during the creed. The subdeacon brings the empty chalice and the paten with the bread from the credence table to the altar. The deacon hands the deacon the paten and the “super oblationis” which he takes it and holding it up says the prayer; “suscepi sancte Pater”. At the end he makes a sign of the cross with the paten over the altar and slips the bread from it on to the corporal. Soon after the paten is given to the subdeacon’s charge till it is wanted again for the fraction. The deacon pours wine into the chalice, the subdeacon water, which is first blessed by the celebrant with the form; “Deus qui humanae substantiae”. The deacon hands the chalice to the celebrant, who, holding it up, says the prayer: “Offertorius tibi Domine”.

The deacon also lays his right hand on the foot of the chalice and says this prayer with the celebrant—a relic of the old idea that the chalice was the seat of the flesh and blood of the Christ. The celebrant makes a sign of the cross with the chalice and stands it behind the bread on the corporal. The deacon covers it with the pall. The celebrant, bowing down, his hands joined and resting on the altar, says the prayer: “In spiritu humilitatis”; rising he says the “Veni sanctificator” making the sign of the cross over all the oblation at the word bene dicite. Then follows the incensing of the altar and the Lavabo (q. v.). The use of incense at this point is medieval and not originally Roman (remnant of the incense at the Gallican procession of the oblation?). Micrologus notes that the Roman order uses incense at the Gospel, not at the Offertory; but he adds that it is not usual. The incensing is nearly everyone (De Eecol. Obscr., IX).

Finally, after the Lavabo the celebrant at the middle of the altar, looking up and then bowing down, says the prayer "Suscipe sancta Trinitas" which sums up the Offertory idea. The Orationes and secrets follow.

At low Mass, the parts of the deacon and subdeacon are taken partly by the server and partly by the celebrant himself. There is no incense. At requiem Masses, the water is not blessed and the subdeacon does not hold incense. The Deacon will not prepare the offering before Mass begins. This is one of their Gallican peculiarities and so goes back to the Eastern Prokesmon. The Milaneze and Mozarabe Missals have adopted the Roman Offertory. The accompanying chant is called Sacrificium at Toledo.

Office, Divine. — I. The Expression "Divine Office", signifying etymologically a duty accomplished for God, or in virtue of a Divine precept, means, in ecclesiastical language, certain prayers to be recited at fixed hours of the day or night by priests, religious, or clerics under the form of the Divine Office and the psalms of the Divine Office by their vocation to fulfill this duty. The Divine Office comprises only the recitation of certain prayers in the Breviary, and does not include the Mass and other liturgical ceremonies. "Canonical Hours", "Breviary", "Diurnal and Nocturnal Office", "Ecclesiastical Office", "Cursus ecclesiasticus", or simply "curses" are synonymous with "Divine Office". "Cursus" is the term used by Gregory writing: "exsurgente abbatia cum monachis ad celebrandum cursum" (De glor. martyr., XV). "Agenda", "agenda mortalum", "agenda missarum", "sollemnia", "missa" were also used. The Greeks employ "synaxis" and "canon" in this sense. The expression "officium divinum" is used in the same sense by the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (800), the IV Lateran (1215), and Vienne (1311); but it is also used to signify any office of the Church. Thus Walafrid Strabo, Pseudo-Alessis, Rupert de Tuyen entitled their works on liturgical ceremonies "De officiis divinis". Hittorp, in the sixteenth century, entitled his work on the hours of evening or the Divine Office "Ecclesiastice divinis officiis ac ministeriis" (Cologne, 1568). The usage in France of the expression "saint-office" as synonymous with "office divin" is not correct. "Saint-office" signifies a Roman congregation, the functions of which are well known, and the words should not be used to replace the name "Divine Office", which is much more suitable and has been used from ancient times. In the articles Breviary, Hours, Canonical, Matins, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, the reader will find treated the special questions concerning the meaning and history of each of the hours, the obligation of reciting these prayers, the history of the formation of the Breviary etc. We deal here only with the general questions that have not been dwelt on in those articles.

II. Primitiv Form of the Office. — The custom of reciting prayers at certain hours of the day or night goes back to the Jews, from whom Christians have borrowed it. In the Psalms we find expressions like: "I will meditate on thee in the morning"; "I rose at midnight to give praise to thee"; "Evening and morning, and at noon I will speak and declare: and he shall hear my voice"; "Seven times a day I have given praise to thee"; etc. (Cf. "Jewish Encyclopedia", X, 164-171, s. v. "Prayer"). The Apostles observed the Jewish custom of praying at midnight, "towards division of night" (Acts, x. 18:90); "In the apostolic Constitutions" we read: "Precautions facite mane, hora tertia, sexta, nona, et vesperae atque galli canto" (VIII, iv). Such were the hours as they then existed. There are omitted only Prime and Complin, which originated not earlier than the end of the fourth century, and the use of which spread only gradually. The elements of which these hours composed were at first few in number, identical with those of the Mass of the Catechumens, psalms recited or chanted unceasingly (tract) or by two choirs (antiphons) or by a cantor alternating with the choir (responses and verses); les-
The development of the Divine Office, as far as concerns the Roman liturgy, was completed at the close of the sixth century. Later changes are not in essential points, but rather a growth piecemeal, as the result of the influence of the Benedictine Order on Our Lady at the end of certain offices, matters of the calendar, and optional offices, like those of Saturday (see Little Office of Our Lady), or of the dead (see Office of the Dead), and the celebration of new feasts etc. The influence of St. Gregory the Great on the formation and fixation of the Roman Antiphonal has been described, but it will appear certain (see "Dict. d'archéol. et de liturgie", s. v. "Antiphonaire").

While allowing a certain liberty as to the exterior form of the office (e.g. the liberty enjoyed by the monks of Egypt and later by St. Benedict in the constitution of the Benedictine Office), the Church insisted from ancient times on its right to supervise the orthodoxy of the liturgical formulae. The Council of Milevis (416) forbade any liturgical formula not approved by a council or by a competent authority (cf. Labbé, I., 1540). The Councils of Vannes (461), Aggle (506), Epson (517), Braga (563), Toledo (especially the fourth council) pronounced similar decrees for Gaul and Spain, and decreed the definition and statements of facts (see Canon of the Mass) made known to us the rights claimed by the popes in liturgical matters. The same fact is established by the correspondence of St. Gregory I. Under his successors the Roman liturgy tends gradually to replace the others, and this is also due to the right of the Roman Church to correct the liturgy (a thesis well-established by Dom Guéranger in his "Institutions Liturgiques", Paris, 1883, and in his letter to the Archbishop of Reims on liturgical law, op. cit., III, 553 sq.). From the eleventh century, under St. Gregory VII and his successors, this influence gradually increases (Bäumer-Biron, "Hist. du Bréviaire", especially II, 8, 22 sq.). From the Council of Trent the reformation of the liturgical books enters a new phase. Rome becomes, under Popes Pius IV, St. Pius V, Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, Gregory XIV, Urban VIII and his successors, Benedict XIV, the scene of a laborious undertaking—the reformation and correction of the Divine Office, respecting the ancient custom (e.g. Gregorius, De antiqua literis, the rules for the recitation of the Divine Office and its obligation, and with the reformation of the liturgical books, corrected in accordance with the decisions of the Council of Trent and solemnly approved by the popes (Bäumer-Biron, "Hist. du Bréviaire")

Office of the Dead.—I. Composition of the Office.—This office, as it now exists in the Roman Liturgy, is composed of First Vespers, Mass, Matins, and Lauds. The Vespers comprise psalms, cxiv, cxix, cxx, cxiii; with the Magnificat and the prayers. The Matins, composed like those of feast days, have three psalms as the Psalter; in their daily singing there are three lessons; the Lauds, as usual, have three psalms (Ps. lxii and lxvi united are counted as one) and a canticle (that of Ezechiel), the three psalms Laudate, and the Benedictus. We shall speak presently of the Mass. The office differs in important points from the other offices of the Roman Liturgy. It has not the Little Hours, the Second Vespers, or the Complin. In this respect it resembles the ancient vigils, which began with a Psalmodia, followed by the Matins (Matutinum), and ended at the dawn (Lauds); Mass followed and terminated the vigil of the feast. The absence of the introduction, "Deus in adiutorium", of the hymns, absolution, blessings, and of the doxology in the psalms also recall ancient times, when these additions had not yet been made. The psalms are chosen not in their serial order, as in the Sunday Office or the Roman ferial Office, but because certain verses, which serve as antiphons, seem to allude to the state of the dead. The use of some of these psalms in the funeral service is of high antiquity, as appears from passages in St. Augustine and other writers of the fourth and fifth centuries. The lessons from Job, so suitable for the Office of the Dead, were also read in very early days at funeral services. The responses, too, deserve notice, especially the response "Liberam domine, de visi inferni qui portas aereas confesti et visitasti infernum et dediti eum lumen . . . quaerant in penis advenisti redemptor noster" etc. This is one of the few texts in the Roman Liturgy alluding to Christ's descent into hell, and its correct form of composition (see Cabrol, "La descencia del Christ aux enfer" in "Rassegna Gregor." May and June, 1900).

The "Liberam de morte aterna", which is found more complete in the ancient MSS., dates also from an early period (see Cabrol in "Dict. d'archéol. et de liturgie", s. v. Absoute). Mgr. Batiffol remarks that the text of Roman origin, "Liberam de morte aterna" (du brev., 148). The distinctive character of the Mass, its various epistles, its tract, its oratory in the form of a prayer, the communion (like the oratory) with verses, according to the ancient custom, and the sequence, "Dies Irae" (q.v., concerning its author see also Breu), is found in the version to be used in the Mass of the Dead, and at all funeral ceremonies. It is replaced to-day by a tract. A treatise of the eighth-ninth century published by Muratori (Liturg. Rom. vet., II, 391) shows that the Alleluia was then suppressed. The omission of the kiss of peace at the Mass is probably due to the fact that that ceremony preceded the distribution of the Eucharist to the faithful and was a preparation for it, so, as communion is not given at the Mass for the Dead, the kiss of peace was suppressed.

Not to speak of the variety of ceremonies of the Mozarabic, Ambrosian, or Oriental liturgies, even in countries where the Roman liturgy prevailed, there were many variations. The lessons, the responses, and other forms were freely created by the various Churches. Churches included in this office the Second Vespers and Complin; in other places, instead of the lessons of our Roman Ritual, they read St. Augustine, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, Osce, Isaiah, Daniel etc. The responses varied likewise; many examples may be found in Martyne and the writers cited below in the bibliography. It is fortunate that the Roman Church preserved carefully and without notable change this office, which, like that of Holy Week, has retained for us in its archaic forms the memory and the atmosphere of a very ancient liturgy. The Mozarabic Liturgy possesses a very rich funeral ritual. Dom Ferro has published a ritual (probably the oldest extant), dating back possibly to the seventh century. He has also published a large number of votive masses of the dead.
For the Ambrosian Liturgy see Magistretti, "Manuale Ambrosianum," I (Milan, 1905), 67; for the Greek Ritual, see Burdi, pp. 77-8.

II. History.—The Office of the Dead has been attributed at times to St. Isidore, to St. Augustine, to St. Ambrose, and even to Origen. For this latter view see Baumer-Biron, "Hist. de l'office", 181-92; and for the opposing view, Baumer-Biron, "Hist. de l'office", II, 57.

These views are more probably correct, but are not as yet very solidly established. Amalarius speaks of the Office of the Dead, but seems to imply that it existed before his time ("De Eccles. officiis", IV, xlii, in P. L., CV, 1238). He alludes to the "Agenda Mortuorum" contained in a sacramentary, but nothing leads us to believe that he was his author. Alcuin is also known for his activity in liturgical matters, and we owe certain liturgical compositions to him; but there is no reason for believing either him or the author of this office (see Carbol in "Dict. d'archéol. et de liturgie"), s. v. Alcuin. In the Gregorian Antiphoner we do find a mass and an office in agenda mortuorum, but it is not certain whether the dead are there recited for the first time; it is not likely, however, that Alcuin was the first to use it.

In the third and second centuries, pseudo-Dionysius, Sts. Gregory of Nyssa, Jerome, and Augustine, Tertullian, and the inscriptions in the catacombs afford a proof of this (see Burial, III, 76; PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD; Carbol, "La prière pour les morts" in "Rev. d'apologetique" 15 Sept, 1909, pp. 881-93).

III. Practice and Obligation.—The Office of the Dead was composed originally to satisfy private devotion to the dead, and at first had no official character. Even in the even, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, it was recited chiefly by the religious orders (Cistercians, Trappists, etc.). Like the Office of Our Lady (see Guyot, loc. cit., 455). Later it was prescribed for all clerics and became obligatory whenever a ferial office was celebrated. It has even been said that it was to remove the obligation of reciting it that the feasts of double and semi-double litre were multiplied, for it could be omitted on such days (Bauzer-Biron, op. cit., III, 186).

The reformed breviary of St. Pius V assigned the recitation of the Office of the Dead to the first free day in the month, the Mondays of Advent and Lent, to some vigils, and ember days. Even then it was not obligatory, for the Bull "Quod a nobis" of the same pope (1566) expressly recommended the recitation of the mass of Office of Our Lady and the Penitential Psalms, without imposing it as a duty (Van der Steppen, "Scaera Liturgica", I, Malines, 1888, p. 115). At present, it is obligatory on the clergy only on the feast of All Souls and in certain mortuary services. Some religious orders (Carmelites, Cistercians etc.) have preserved the custom of reciting it in choir on the days assigned by the Bull "Quod a nobis".

O'Flahy, Maurice, Archbishop of Tuam, b. about 1160; d. at Galway, 1513. He was, according to Dr. Lynch, a native of Confort in Galway, but, according to Ware and Anthony a Wood, a native of Baltimore in Cork. He is sometimes called Maurice a Porta, Baltimore being situated on the sea coast. Part of his education was received at the University of Oxford, where he joined the Franciscans. Later he studied at Padua, where he obtained the degree of Doctor in Divinity. After his ordination he was appointed professor of philosophy in the University of Padua. He was a student of works of Thomas Aquinas, and wrote a commentary on them (published at Venice about 1514). O'Flahy acted for some time as censor of proofs to two well-known publishers at Venice, Scott and Locatelli—in the early days a task usually entrusted to very learned men. O'Flahy was acknowledged one of the most learned men of his time, so learned that his contemporaries called him Flos Mundai (Flower of the World). In addition, his pietist and administrative capacity were recognized at Rome, and in 1506 he was appointed Archbishop of Tuam. He was consecrated at Rome by Julius II. He did not return to Ireland till 1513, meantime attending as Archbishop of Tuam the first two sessions of the Lateran Council (1512). On leaving for Ireland to take formal possession of his see, he procured from the pope an indulgence for all those who would be present at his first Mass in Tuam. He was destined not to reach Tuam, for he fell ill at Galway, and died there in the Franciscan convent.

O Filii et Filiae, the first line of a hymn celebrating the mystery of Easter. As commonly found in hymnals to-day, it comprises twelve stanzas of the form:

O filii et filiae,
Rex caelestis, Rex glorios
Morte surrexit hodie.

Hymns. It was written by Jean Tisserand, O.F.M. (d. 1494), an eloquent preacher, and originally comprised but nine stanzas (those commencing with "Discipulis adstantibus". "Postquam audivit Dilemnas", "Beati qui non videantur" being early additions to the hymn). "Passetuya du folle" is a trope added by Bishop to give side and response (closing lands and Vespers) it pretty enshrines in the last two stanzas: In hoc festo sanctissimo Sit laus et jubilation: BENEDICAMUS DOMINO.—Alleluia. De quisvis nos humillimas, Deoctas atque decessibus DEO dicamus GRATIAS.—Alleluia. The hymn is still very popular in France, whence it has spread to other countries. Guéranger's Liturgical Year (Paschal Time, Part I, tr., Dublin, 1871, pp. 190-192) entitles it "The Joyful Canticle" and gives Latin text with English prose translation, with a triple Alleluia preceding and following the hymn. As given in hymnals, however, this triple Alleluia is sung also between the stanzas (see "The Roman Hymnal", New York, 1881, p. 290). In Lalanne’s Recueil d’anciens chansons de France (Paris, 1886, p. 725) greater particularity is indicated in the distribution of the stanzas and of the Alleliuas. The triple Alleluia is sung by one voice, is repeated by the choir, and the solo takes up the first stanza with its Alleluia. The choir than sings the triple Alleluia, the second stanza with its Alleluia, and repeats the triple Alleluia. The alternation of solo and chorus thus continues, until the last stanza with its Alleluia, followed by the triple Alleluia, is sung by one voice. "It is scarcely possible for any one, not acquainted with the melody, to imagine the jubilant effect of the triumphant Alleluia attached to apparently less important circumstances of the Resurrection; e.g., St. Peter’s being outstripped by St. John. It seems to speak of the majesty of that event, the smallest portions of which are worthy to be so chronicled" (Neale, "Medieval Hymns and Sequences", 3rd ed., p. 163). The rhythm of the hymn is that of number and not of accent or of classical quantity. The melody to which it is sung can scarcely be related to that of the modern lit of triple time. As a result, there is to English ears a very frequent conflict between the accent of the Latin words and the real, however unintentional, stress of the melody; e.g.: Et Maria Magdalenae, Sed Joannes Apostolus, Ad sepulchrum venit pritis, etc. A number of hymnals give the melody in plain-song notation, and (theoretically, at least) allow the cantor to substitute for the notes of the Latin text an appropriate stress of the voice. Commonly, however, the hymnals adopt the modern triple time (e.g., the "Nord-Sterns Fuhrer zur Seeleicht", 1671; the "Roman Hymnal", 1884; "Hymns Ancient and Modern", rev. ed.). Perhaps it was this conflict of stress and word-accent that led Neale to speak of the "rudd simplicity" of the text as he describes the hymn to the twelfth century in the Contents-page of his volume (although the note prefixed to his own translation assigns the hymn to the thirteenth century). Migne, "Dictet de Litturgie" (s. v. Paques, 3299) also declares it to be very ancient. It is so very rhythmically that its authorship has been discovered, the "Dictet of Litturgie" suggests a date to the year 1050, although Shipley ("Annum Sanctus", London, 1884, p. xxi) found it in a Roman Processional of the sixteenth century.

The hymn is assigned in the various French Paroissiens to the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, on English Sundays. There are several translations into English verse by non-Catholics. The Catholic translations comprise one by an anonymous author in the "Evening Office", 1748 ("Young men and maidens, rejoice and sing"), Father Caswell’s "Ye sons and daughters of the Lord" and Charles Kent’s "O maids and striplings, hear love’s story", all three being given in the "Blight Hymn Book" (1810). They vary both in the arrangement and the wording of the stanzas; and the plain-song and modernized settings also vary not a little.

Ogdensburg (Ogdensburgensis), Diocese of, comprise the northern towns of Herkimer and Hamilton counties, with the counties of Lewis, Jefferson, St. Lawrence, Franklin, Clinton, and Essex in New York. On the north and east it is bounded by Canada and Vermont and by Lake Ontario on the west. It covers 12,036 sq. miles, to a great extent occupied by the wooded wilderness of the Adirondack Mountains which, however, of late is rapidly opening up for summer resorts and tuberculosis sanatoria. The soil is mostly rocky and sandy and it supports but a relatively small population which is decreasing in the rural districts, but slowly increasing in industrial and mining centres.

The territory was formerly the scene of frequent bloody conflicts between the Iroquois and the Hurons and Algonquins, and also between the French and the British. In 1719 the Sulpician, Francis Piequet, established on the banks of the St. Lawrence, where Ogdensburg now is located, the Fort of the Presentation, to protect the Christian Mohawks, who were, however, scattered by the English ten years later. There is still a reservation called St. Regis, partly in Canada (with about 2000 Indians), partly in the State of New York (with about 1200), where the descendants of the former Algonquin tribes Christianized in the seventeenth century and still nearly all Catholics, worship together and sing the choral part of the Divine services in Iroquois. The first white settlers were Protestants from New England. It was only towards 1790 that Catholic immigrants occupied lands around Corbeau, now Cooperville, near Fort Putnam, and on the shores of Lake Champlain, visited by missionaries from Fort La Prairie, Canada. In 1818, a colony of French and German Catholics was brought to Jefferson County by Count Leray de Chaumont, who built for them, and also for an Irish settlement, several Catholic churches. At the same time Irish and French Canadian immigrants began to arrive and the Catholic Church sent out on missions in various parts of the future diocese which still belonged to New York.

The first congregations were formed at Ogdensburg in 1827 by Father Salamon, at Carthage by Father Patrick Kelly, at Cooperville in 1818 by Father McGillic, at Plattsburg in 1828 by Father Patrick McGilligan, being erected as a parish only to the year 1850, although Shipley ("Annum Sanctus", London, 1884, p. xxi) found it in a Roman Processional of the sixteenth century.

The diocese was separated from the Diocese of Albany on 15 February, 1872. The first bishop was the Rt. Rev. Edgar P. Wadhams, b. 1817 at Lewis, Essex County. He was a convert from the Episcopal Church, in which he had been a deacon. He was rector of the cathedral of and Vicar-General of Albany, when called to organize Northern New York into a new diocese. He was consecrated at Albany on 5 May, 1872, by Archbishop, later Cardinal, McCloskey. Bishop Wadhams increased the number of parishes and priests, and introduced Roman Catholic education and founded Catholic schools and erected an orphan asylum, a hospital, and an aged people’s home. At his death, 5 December, 1891, the churches and chapels had increased from 65 to 125; priests from 42 to 81; nuns from 23 to 129 and Catholic schools from 7 to 20; the Catholic population had risen from 30,000 to 65,000.

O'GORMAN, Wadham, attended the New York Provincial Council of 1883 and the Plenary Council of Baltimore of 1884, and held three diocesan synods. His remains are buried in the crypt of St. Mary's Cathedral which he had enlarged and embellished.

Henry Gabriele, born at Waunneck-Leide, Belgium, on 6 October, 1838, graduated at Louvain as a priest of the Diocese of Ghent, and was invited with the other Belgian priests to teach in the newly-founded provincial seminary of Troy, New York. He was appointed professor of dogma and afterwards was professor of church history until 1891. He was consecrated at Albany on 5 May, 1892 by Archbishop Corrigan. The new bishop developed the work begun by his predecessor. He strengthened the Catholic schools although some of the smaller ones had to be closed; he introduced four new religious communities. Bishop Gabriele has made two visits ad limina, besides other trips to Rome. The former elements of the Catholic population, Irish, French and German, must for permanency rely on their own fecundity. There are a reasonable number of conversions annually, but a new immigration of Poles, Italians, Hungarians, Greeks, Maronites, and others, largely threatens to modify the Catholic body. Yet till now none are numerous enough to form separate congregations except the Poles who are building a church in Mineville.

Statistics—Religious Communities: Men—Oblates of Mary Immaculate, 5 priests, 2 brothers; Friars Minor, 3 priests, 2 brothers; Fathers of the Sacred Heart of Issoudun, 6 priests; Augustinians, 2 priests; Brothers of Christian Instruction (Lamennais), 12 brothers. Women: Gray Nuns of the Cross, 6 houses; Sisters of Mercy, 7; Sisters of St. Joseph, 4; Sisters of St. Francis, 1; Sisters of the Holy Cross, 2; Ursulines, 1; Daughters of the Holy Ghost, 1; Daughters of Charity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, 1. Priests, secular, 119; regular, 16; churches, 150; parishes, 8; stations, 79; chapels, 21; brothers, 19; nuns, 240; ecclesiastical students, 20; academies, 13; parochial schools, 15; orphanages, 2; hospitals, 6; home for aged poor, 1; hospitals for insane, 1; in 1899: infants, 3617; adults, 302; marriages, 562; Catholic population over 92,000.

Oggione (Ogione'), Marco D', Milanese painter, b. at Oggiono near Milan about 1470; d. probably in Milan, 1549. This painter was one of the chief pupils of Leonardo da Vinci, whose works he repeatedly copied. He was a hard-working artist, but his paintings are wanting in invention, purity of drawing, while, in his composition, it has been well said "intensity of colour does duty for intensity of sentiment." He copied the "Last Supper" repeatedly, and one of his best copies is in the possession of the Royal Academy of Arts in England. Of the details of his life we know nothing—not even the date of his important series of frescoes painted for the church of Santa Maria della Pace. His two most notable pictures—one in the Brera (representing St. Michael), and the other in the private gallery of the Bononi family (representing the Madonna)—are signed Marcus. Others of his works are to be seen at Bernini, Paris, St. Peter's in Rome, the palace in Russia being a clever copy of the "Last Supper" by Leonardo. Lanza gives 1530 as the date of his death, but various writers in Milan say it took place in 1540, and the latest accepted date is the one which we give as 1549. He cannot be regarded as an important artist, or even as a very great copyist, but in his pictures the sky and mountains and the distant landscapes are always worthy of consideration, and in these we probably get the painter's best original work.

GEORGE CHARLES WILLIAMSON.

Ogilvie, John, Venerable, eldest son of Walter Ogilvie, of Drum, near Keith, Scotland, b. 1580; d. 10 March, 1615. Educated as a Calvinist, he was received into the Church at Louvain by Father Cornelius a Lapide. Becoming a Jesuit at the age of seventeen, he was ordained priest in 1613, and at his own request was sent on the perilous Scottish mission. He landed in Scotland in November, 1613, and during nine months reconciled many with the Church in Edinburgh and Glasgow. He was betrayed in the latter city, but, during a long imprisonment, no torture could force him to name any Catholics. Though his legs were cruelly crushed, and he was kept awake for nine nights by being continually pricked with needles, scarcely a sigh escaped him. Under searching examinations, his patience, courage, and fidelity won the admiration of his very judges—especially of the Protestant Archbishop Spottiswoode—but he was condemned as a traitor and hanged at Glasgow. The customary beheading and quartering were omitted owing to undisguised popular sympathy, and his body was hurriedly buried in the churchyard of Glasgow. He was declared venerable in the seventeenth century.

Ogliasta (Oleastrensis), Diocese of, in the Province of Cagliari, Sardinia. It was formerly under the Archbishop of Cagliari, but Leo XII, at the petition of King Charles Felix, by a bull of 11 November, 1824, erected Ogliastra into a diocese, suffragan of Cagliari, with the Capuchin Serafino Carrillo for its first prelate. In the Middle Ages, after the expulsion of the Saracens (1505), Ogliastra was one of the five native giudicature, or independent districts, and had for its first lord the Sismondi. Tortoli the episcopal seat is a small city of about 2000 inhabitants, which belongs to the district of Lannesi. The diocese has 29 parishes, 54,500 inhabitants, 53 churches, chapels, and oratories, 46 secular priests, two schools one of which is directed by the Salesians; the present bishop Mgr Emanuele Virgilio, who succeeded Mgr Giuseppe Paderi on 15 April, 1910, was previously Vicar-General of the Diocese of Venosa, Caprelli, Le chiese di Bari, XIV. O'GROWNEY, Eugene, priest, patriot, and scholar, b. 23 August, 1863, at Ballyfallon, County Meath; d. at Los Angeles, 15 Oct., 1899. Neither parent spoke Irish and it was little used where he was born; in fact, he was ignorant of the existence of a language of Ireland until a student at St. Finian's seminary at Navan. His interest in the language began there continued at Maynooth, where from his entrance in 1882 he devoted himself to the study of the Irish language, antiquities and Irish history. His holidays he spent in the Irish-speaking parts of the country where he acquired his knowledge of the spoken language. Ordained in 1888, in 1891 he was appointed professor of Irish at Maynooth, and at about the same time became editor of the "Gaéil Journal". At the instance of the Archbishop of Dublin he began his series of "Simple Lessons in Irish History", written in Irish, "Odhchadhaman", which have done more than any other book in the last two centuries to familiarize thousands of Irish with the language of their ancestors. He was one of the founders of the Gaelic League, organized in Dublin in 1893 "for the purpose of keeping the Irish language spoken in Ireland", and later became its vice-president when he held as his ideal that in 1894, failing health sent him to Arizona and California, where he died. Some years after, with the aid of the Irish in the United States, his body was brought back to Ireland and buried at Maynooth. An earnest and tireless worker, his services to the Gaelic League out-weighed the little he contributed to the political party, not that his scholarship was above criticism, but because he came at the moment when a man of his kind was needed.

The memorials of Father O'Growney have been collected by O'Farrell, Lesbo Abhar Eoghan (The O'Growney Memorial Volume), (Dublin, 1904).

JOSEPH DUNN.

O'HAGAN, John, lawyer and man of letters, b. at Newry, County Down, Ireland, 19 March, 1822; d. near Dublin, 10 November, 1890. He was educated in the day-school of the Jesuit Fathers, Dublin, and in Trinity College, graduating in 1842. Though he made many friendships in Trinity, he was always an earnest advocate of Catholic university education. In this spirit he contributed to the "Dublin Review" (1845) an article on liberal Catholic education. Trinity College has reprinted under the title "Trinity College No Place for Catholics". Later he contributed to the same Review a criticism of Thomas Carlyle's system of thought, which Carlyle tells in his Diary "gave him food for reflection for several days". In 1842 he was called to the Bar and joined the Master Criminal. In 1841 he was appointed a Commissioner of National Education, and in 1855 he became Q.C. The same year he married Frances, daughter of the first Lord O'Hagan. After Gladbide had passed his Irish Land Act, he chose Mr. O'Hagan as the first judicial head of the Irish Land Commission, making him for this purpose a judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice. This elevation was a tribute not only to his legal attainments and judicial standing but to the place he held in the esteem of his countrymen. He was an earnest Catholic, as is shown in many of his writings, such as The Children's Ballad Rosary". In his eulogy he mentioned his poems, "Dear Land", "Ourselves Alone", etc., were among the most effective features of "The Nation" in its brilliant youth; in his last years he published the first English translation of "La Chansoide Rodland", recognized as a success by the "Edinburgh Review" and all the critical journals. Longfellow wrote to him: "The work seems to me admirably well done.

O'Hagan, Thomas, first Baron of Tullyhogue, b. at Belfast, 29 May, 1812; d. 1 February, 1885. Called to the Irish Bar in 1836, he resided at Newry, and married Miss Tedding in 1836. Inclined to journalism, he published a grand essay entitled "An Irish Examinator" from 1838 to 1841. At the Bar he achieved a notori- en ety for his defence of Charles Gavan Duffy, in 1842. Admitted to the inner Bar in 1849, and made a barrister of King's Inn in 1859, in 1860 he was appointed Solicitor General for Ireland, and, in the following year Attorney General, being also called to the Irish Privy Council. He was M.P. for Carlow from 1863 to 1865, when he became Justice of the Commission. In 1868 he was made Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the first Catholic in the office since Chancellor Fitton under James II. Created Baron of Tullyhogue

in 1870, two years later he married Miss Alice Mary

Townshend. His chancellorship expired with the Gadhesett, an Irish Emigrant's Guide to the United States", besides publishing in the "Boston Pilot" a series of learned papers on St. Malachy, Archbishop of Armagh. After his return to Dublin, he published biographies of St. Laurence O'Toole, St. Dymphna, and St. Aengus the Culdee, a "Catechism of Irish History", "Devotions for Consecration to St. Cuthbert, and "Emigration Guide to the United States", edited Monk Mason's "History of the Irish Parliament", and collected materials for a history of Queen's Co. His greatest work was his "Lives of the Irish Saints" (Dublin, 1875—), begun in 1816 and finished shortly before his death. Dr. Walsh, Archbishop of Dublin, described him as a man who worked so hard at his pastored duties that the vicariate wondered how he could have found time to write anything, and who wrote so much that men wondered how he could have done any missionary work. He never spared himself and was never dismayed by any difficulty; when, in 1828, the MS. of his Irish American History was destroyed, he cheerfully rewrite the volume, an example of courage for a man nearing four score.

O'HARA, Theodore, b. in Danville, Kentucky, U. S. A., 11 February, 1822; d. in Gruyerton, Alabama, 6 June, 1867. The son of Kane O'Hara, an Irish political exile, who became a prominent educator in Ken-necy, O'Hara graduated at Centre College, Bardstown, Kentucky, studied law, and in the Mexican War attained the brevet rank of major, after which he made several filibustering expeditions to Cuba and Central America. He edited various newspapers and was successfully entrusted by the Government with some diplomatic missions. During the Civil War he served as a staff-officer with Generals Jackson and Breckenridge. He wrote a few poems of special merit besides the two poems, "The Bivouac of the Dead" and "A Dirge for the Brave Old Pioneer". The former was written when the State of Kentucky brought back the remains of her sons who had fallen in the Mexican War to the cemetery at Frankfort. The last four lines of the opening stanza are inscribed on the entrance to the National Cemetery at Arlington, Virginia.

O'HELY, Patrick, Bishop of Mayo, Ireland; b. at Kilmallock, September, 1579. He was a native of Connaught, and joined the Franciscans at an early age. Four years after his profession he was sent to the University of Alcalá, where he surpassed his contemporaries in sacred studies. Summoned to Rome, he was promoted in 1576 to the See of Mayo, now merged in that of Tuam. Gregory XIII empowered him to officiate in adjoining dioceses, if no Catholic bishop were at hand, and supplied him generously with money. At Paris he took part in public disputations at the university, amazing his hearers by his mastery of patristic and controversial theology, as well as of Scotist philosophy. In autumn, 1579, he sailed from Brittany and arrived off the coast of Kerry after James Fitzmaurice had landed at Smerwick from Portugal with the remnant of Stukeley's expedition. All Munster was then in arms. The House of Desmond was divided, and the politic earl had withdrawn from the scene of action. The bishop and his companion, Conn O'Rourke, a Franciscan priest, son of Brian, Lord of Breifne, came ashore near Askeaton, and sought hospitality at the castle where, in the earl's absence, his countess entertained them. Next day they departed for Limerick; but the countess, probably so instructed, for the earl claimed the merit afterwards, gave information to the Mayor of Limerick, who three days later seized the two ecclesiastics and sent them to Kilmallock where Lord Justice Drury then was with an army. As president of Munster, Drury had recently perpetrated infamous barbarities. In one year he executed four hundred persons "by justice and martial law". Some he sentenced "by natural law, for that he could not try them in the realm"; others he offered to secure O'Healy his see if he would acknowledge the royal supremacy and discount his business. The bishop replied that he could not barter his faith for life or honours; his business was to do a bishop's part in advancing religion and saving souls. To questions about the plans of the pope and the King of Spain for invading Ireland he made no answer, and thereupon was delivered to torture. As he still remained silent, he and O'Rourke were sent to instant execution by martial law. The execution took place outside one of the gates of Kilmallock.

O'HERALD (or Haraith), Thomas, Bishop of Ross, Ireland, d. 1579. Consecrated about 1560, he was stationed at Knock, near the town of Sligo, in the north of Connaught, on the west coast of Ireland. He incurred such persecution through enforcing its decrees that he fled with his chaplain to a little island, but was betrayed to Perrot, President of Munster, who sent him in chains to the Tower of London. Simultaneously with Primate Creage, he was confined until released after about three years and seven months. He died, however, from the neglect and cruelty of Muskery. Intending to retire to Belgium, ill-health contracted in prison induced him to return to Ireland. He was apprehended at Dublin, but released on exhibiting his discharge, and proceeded to Muskery under Muscary's protection. Disliking the lashiness of that nobleman's house, he withdrew to a small farm and lived in great austerity. Receiving distress to the utmost of his power he made a visitation of his diocese yearly, and on great festivals officiated and preached in a neighbouring church. This, though afflicted with dropsy, he lived until his sixtieth (or seventieth) year, dying exhausted by labours and sufferings. He was buried in Kilcrea Friary, Co. Cork.

O'HIGGINS, Ambrose Bernard, b. in County Meath, Ireland, in 1729; d. at Lima, 18 March, 1810. An uncle, a priest in Spain, placed him at school in Cadiz. From there he went to South America landing at Buenos Aires, and thence to Lima, where for a time he was a pedlar. Later he became a contractor for opening new roads, and finally joined the Spanish army in the engineer corps. His talent and energy was soon recognized, and secured for him a series of rapid promotions to a patent of nobility as Count of Ballenar, and later, 26 May, 1788, as Marquis of Orsorno, with the Governor-Generalship of Chile. The following eight years he spent in developing the resources of the country, his enlightened policy accomplishing much for Spanish interest. In 1798 he was appointed Viceroy of Peru, the highest rank in the Spanish colonial service, reaching Lima with that commission on June sixth of that year. His vice-royalty ended with his death. Bernard O'Higgins, his only son, b. at Chillan, 20 August, 1776; d. at Lima, 24 October, 1842. At the age of fifteen his father sent him to a Catholic school in England. At his father's death he returned to Chile where he joined the Revolutionists as a colonel of militia against the domination of Spain. His bravery brought him higher rank, and the battle of Chacabuco, 12 February, 1817, which broke the power of Spain in Chile, was mainly won by his gallant impetuosity. This victory led to the capture of the capital and he was proclaimed by its citizens the first Vicar of Chile. He gave ample evidence of executive ability during an administration of six years, but a feeble populace deposed him from office in February, 1823, and drove him into exile in Peru. His ashes were brought back by the Chilian Government and interred with great pomp in 1829, and in 1872 his equestrian statue was inaugurated at Santiago amid national rejoicing. His son Domingo, a wealthy and patriotic Chilian ranchero, died in 1890.

Ohio, the seventeenth state of the American Union, admitted on 19 Feb., 1803. It is bounded on the north by Michigan and Lake Erie, on the east by Pennsylvania and West Virginia, on the south by West Virginia and Kentucky, and on the west by Indiana. Its greatest breadth is 215 miles, and its greatest length, 210 miles; area, 1,450 square miles. The surface is an undulating plain 150-1550 feet above sea-level. The population (1910) is 4,767,121. The agricultural output in 1905 was valued at $198,502,360; the mineral output at $134,499,335; the value of dairy products was $15,148,849; and the net value of industrial products, $161,000,000. The year's mileage was 9274 miles, besides 1450 miles of electric railway. Ohio profiteers commercially by the Ohio River in the south, connecting with the Mississippi, and by Lake Erie on the north. There are also four canals, the Miami and Erie, the Ohio, the Hoising, and the Walhonding.

State History.—Ohio was discovered by La Salle about 1670 and formal possession of the territory including the state was taken by the French in 1671. A Controversy between France and England was settled by the Treaty of Paris (1763), by which Great Britain obtained all the French dominion in the north, and west as far as the Mississippi River. In 1787 an organization known as the Ohio Company of Associates was formed in New England by a number of those who had served in the American Revolutionary War and under their negotiations a purchase of a large tract of land in the territory northwest of the Ohio River was made from the Government. This was the first public sale of land by the United States. Maumee, the first settlement, was founded on 7 April, 1787.

In connexion with this sale was passed the famous ordinance of 1788 guaranteeing forever civil and religious liberty, the system of common schools, trial by jury, and the right of inheritance.

In 1788 Cincinnati was founded, and thereafter settlements in the southern portion of the state multiplied rapidly. In 1791 the settlers were harassed by various Indian tribes, who were effectively checked by the victory of General Anthony Wayne at The Timbers on the Maumee River (1794). In the succeeding year the treaty of peace was concluded by which the Indians ceded a great portion of the territory now embraced in the state.

About this time Chillicothe was made the capital of the territory and a capital building erected. This was adopted by the eastern division of the territory north-west of the Ohio River, designated by the name "Ohio" and next year the territory was admitted to statehood. From the date of the first settlement down to the year 1822 the nationality of the principal immigration was German. Between 1842 and 1860 the population of Ohio increased very rapidly owing to the great influx of immigrants from both Ireland and Germany. Since 1870 the Slavonic race has been the predominating factor in immigration. In the Civil War, seventy regiments responded to the first call for troops although the state quota was only thirteen. Troops from Ohio were largely responsible for the winning of West Virginia to the Union. Ohio is one of the most celebrated officers of the Union Army, as Grant, Sherman, McDowell, Rosecrans, Sheridan, Garfield, were natives of the state. In national elections Ohio was carried by the Democratic Party from 1863 down to 1866. In that year and ever since, with the exception of the years 1848 and 1852 when it cast its electoral vote for Cass and Pierce, it has been Republican.

Catholic History.—The first Catholic settlement in Ohio was founded among Hopon Indian tribes near Sandusky by Father De la Richarderie in 1735. The principal periods of Catholic immigration are from 1822 to 1842; from 1842 to 1855, and from 1865 to the present day. In the first period the German race predominated; in the second, the Irish and German races, with a majority of Irish immigrants; and in the third, members of the Slavonic race. Ohio has one archdiocese and two dioceses. The Archdiocese of Cincinnati (diocese, 19 June, 1821; archdiocese, 19 June, 1824) comprizes the counties of Cincinnati and the northern line of Mercer, Aughizee, Hardin Counties and west of the eastern line of Marion, Union, Madison Counties and the Scioto River to the Ohio River. The Diocese of Cleveland (erected 23 April, 1847) includes that part of the state north of the southern line of Columbiana, Stark, Wayne, Ashland, Richland, Crawford, Wyandot, Hancock, Allen, and Van Wert Counties. The Diocese of Columbus (erected 3 March, 1850) comprizes the counties of Franklin, Franklin, and the Scioto River on the east and the Scioto River on the west, with Franklin, Delaware, and Morrow Counties. The Catholic population is 557,650, including 296 negroes. Among the prominent Catholics may be mentioned General Philip H. Sheridan, General W. S. Rosecrans, General Don Carlos Buell, Generals Hugh and Charles Evang, Honorable Bellamy Storer, Rubin R. Springer, Colonel McCarty, Doctor Bonner, Frank Herd, and J. A. McGahan, the liberator of Bulgaria.

Besides the Catholics the principal religious denominations are the Methodists numbering 355,144; the Presbyterians, 138,709; and the Lutherans, 132,439.

Education and Charity.—Besides the Ohio State University, founded in 1870, and attended in 1909 by 3012 students under a faculty of 224 members, Ohio has numerous colleges and universities, as Antioch College, Baldwin College, Buchtel College, Case School of Science, Cedarville College, Denison College, Dennison University, Franklin University, Miami University, and Ohio University. The total number is thirty-six. According to the last report of the state commissioner of common schools, the number of public school buildings in Ohio is 10,723, with 21,188 teachers, 656,783 pupils. The expenditure for education during the year 1908-1909 was $57,011,261. By constitutional law of funds, entrusted to the State for educational and religious purposes, is not to be diminished, and the income is to be applied solely to the objects of the original grant. The General Assembly is empowered to create and maintain an efficient system of common schools in the state. All children between the ages of eight and sixteen who are residents of the State shall be required to attend school, for a private, or parochial school for the full session, of not less than twenty-four weeks each year, unless prohibited by some disability. The course of instruction must extend to reading, spelling, writing, English grammar, geography, and arithmetic. The employment of any child under sixteen years of age during the school session shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, unless the employer shall have first excised from the child an age and schooling certificate from the proper authorities, showing that the child has successfully completed the studies above enumerated, and if the child is between fourteen and sixteen, that he is able to read and write legibly the English language.

If the child is unable to read and write, such relief shall be granted out of the contingent funds of the school district in which he resides as will enable child to attend school in accordance with the requirements of the statute.

The general supervision of all public charitable institutions of the state is vested in a state board of charities. Direct control of each separate state benevolent association is vested in an individual board of trustees. The following charitable institutions are provided for by statute in Ohio: Institution for Deaf and Dumb; Ohio State School for the Blind; Institution for Feeble Minded; Ohio Soldiers and Sailors Home; Ohio Soldiers and Sailors Orphans Home; asylums for the insane at Cleveland, Columbus, Dayton, Athens, Toledo, Massillon, Cincinnati, Lima; Ohio Hospital for Epileptics; Boys' Industrial School; Girls' Industrial Home; homes for the friendless in the various counties; Ohio State Sanitarium for Consumptives; Ohio Institution for Deformed and Crippled Children; Hospitals for the various counties; county and city infirmaries and children's homes. All private and public benevolent or charitable institutions shall be open at all times to the inspection of the county commissioners of the various counties or the board of health of the township or municipality.
Legislation on Religious Matters.—It is provided in the Bill of Rights, in the Constitution of Ohio, that no person shall be compelled to support any religion in public nor shall a tax be levied for the support thereof; and a corporation or establishment in any form shall be exempt from taxation for religious, charitable, or educational purposes. Any corporation or institution in any form maintained for religious purposes, or a corporation or institution in any form maintained for charitable purposes, may be exempt from taxation for purposes of the corporation or institution. Any corporation or institution in any form maintained for educational purposes, or a corporation or institution in any form maintained for educational purposes, may also be exempt from taxation for purposes of the corporation or institution.

Marriage of first cousins is prohibited. Marriage may be solemnized by a lawfully ordained minister of any religious society, a justice of the peace in his county of residence, or a mayor of a municipality who is legally authorized to marry in such county. A clergyman wishing to perform the ceremony must obtain a licence from the probate court of one of the counties of the state. The marriage must be solemnized in the presence of the congregation in a place of public worship in the county where the female resides on Sunday. No marriage shall be solemnized on Sunday by a clergyman except by statute. The sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited on Sunday.

Oaths include affirmation, which may be substituted. An oath is not regarded as having its foundation in Christianity. Profane cursing or swearing by the name of God, Jesus Christ, or the Holy Ghost is a misdemeanor. No use of prayer is provided for in the act. Official oaths administered to public officials are also religious oaths.

Corporations not for religious purposes, may be formed by five persons, a majority of whom are citizens of Ohio, who acknowledge in due form the articles of incorporation containing name of corporation, place where same is to be located, and purpose for which formed. Any person subscribing to the articles of incorporation as set forth in the records of the corporation may become a member thereby. Under the constitution of Ohio housing is used exclusively for public worship and institutions for purely charitable purposes are exempt from taxation. The term house includes also the grounds attached thereto and all such buildings necessary for the proper use and enjoyment of the same. The term religious is restricted to schools and priests’ houses used in connection with or for ornamental or recreation purposes, fall within this classification. Buildings belonging to the Roman Catholic Church and occupied by the bishops, priests, etc., are considered to come within the constitutional phrase “institutions of purely public charity”. It has been held that the residence of a minister, or parsonage, is not exempt, because in addition to being used for purposes of public worship, it is also a place of private residence. Public schools are especially exempt from taxation, and private schools established by private donations for public or semi-public purposes are exempt as coming within the purview of the constitutional provision. With reference to institutions of purely public charity, while church and school property are exempt from all ordinary state, county, and city taxes, such property is subject to special assessment for improvements. Priests and clergymen are excused from jury duty, but, apparently, not from military duty, and members of religious denominations prohibited by articles of faith from serving are absolutely exempt from military duty.

A male of eighteen years and a female of sixteen years may contract marriage, but consent of the parents or guardian must be obtained if the male is under twenty-one or female under eighteen. Persons applying for a licence or without the publication of bans is penalized, and any person attempting to perform the ceremony without a certificate from the probate court is guilty of a misdemeanor. The marriage of persons under the statutory age is voidable, but becomes irrevocable by cohabitation or other acts of ratification after the marriage is reached. Any marriage, by the weight of authority, is not recognized in Ohio. Grounds for divorce are: previous existing marriage; willful absence for three years; adultery; impotency; extreme cruelty; fraudulent contract; gross neglect; habitual drunkenness for three years; lunatic or imbecile (may be filed while party is in prison); foreign divorce not releasing party in Ohio. Persons applying must be a bona fide resident of the county where suit is filed and have been a resident of the state for a year previous to the commencing of the suit. Service on the defendant may be either personal or by publication. A divorce does not affect the legitimacy of the children.

A yearly tax of $1000 is assessed against every person engaged in the trafficking in spirits, vino, malt, or other intoxicating liquors. Local option laws provide for the suppressing of the sale of liquor in townships or municipalities where a majority of the electors of the district vote in favour of closing saloons. The statutes provide for a jail in each county; for a house of refuge for incorrigible or vicious infants; for workhouses for persons convicted of minor offenses; for an Ohio State Reformatory for criminals between the ages of sixteen and thirty; and the Ohio Reformatory for Women. Every will, except nemunative wills, shall be in writing, either handwritten or typewritten, and signed by the testator or by some other person in his presence and by his express direction, and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of the testator by at least two competent witnesses who saw him sign or heard him acknowledge it. Generally speaking, any mark made at the end of the will by the testator with testamentary intent constitutes a good signing. A spoliated or destroyed will may be proven, and its directions carried out, where it was destroyed or lost subsequent to the death of the testator or to his becoming incapable of making a will by reason of insanity. A verbal will made in the last sickness is valid in respect to personal property if reduced to writing and subscribed by proper number of witnesses within ten days after the speaking of the testamentary words. A devisee under a will may be a witness thereto, but a devisee to him fails unless the will be proven without his testimony. Bequests for charitable purposes made within one year of the testator’s death is void if any issue of the testator is living. The word issue here used means means of the blood of the deceased. The Ohio courts have held, however, that a bequest to a Roman Catholic priest “for the saying of Masses for the repose of my soul and the soul of my husband" is not within the statute and is good although made within less than a year of the testator's death. Municipal corporations are organized by statute to maintain public cemeteries and burial-grounds, and are empowered to appropriate property for cemetery purposes. The cost of lots in such cemeteries is limited to such an amount as will reimburse the corporation for its outlay. Private associations incorporated for cemetery purposes may by separate purchase, appropriate, or otherwise become holders of title of land for cemetery purposes. Burial-lots are exempt from taxation, execution, attachment, or any other claim, lien, or process if used exclusively for burial-purposes, but cemeteries owned by associations are not exempt from assessments for local improvements. Land appropriated for purposes of a city or town or individual burying-grounds is not exempt from taxation, execution, etc., if it exceeds $50 in value. Ohler, Alois Karl, educationist, b. at Mainz, 2 January, 1817; d. there, 21 August, 1889. He attended the gymnasium at Mainz, studied theology at Gießen, and was ordained at Mainz on 14 August, 1839. His first charge was that of chaplain at Seligenstadt in Hesse. In 1841 he was appointed a founding father of the Progymnasm of that city. He became spiritual director of St. Rochus Hospital at Mainz in 1845, and pastor at Abenheim near Worms in 1847. On 21 June, 1852, he was appointed director of the Hessian Catholic teachers' training college at Bensheim. During the fifteen years of his administration, this college was transformed by Ohler into a real centre of Catholic education.

Seligenstadt was the burial-place of one of the early converts to Christianity, Kaiser Silius, who was buried there in 1845, and in 1878, Ohler's chief work is "Lehrbuch der Erziehung und des Unterrichtes" (Mainz, 1861; 10th ed., 1884). The fundamental idea of the work is that the education of Catholic youth should be conducted on Catholic principles, Church and school co-operating harmoniously to this end. The work was intended for the use of teachers as well as for the instruction of parents. Ohler adopted the Latin phrase "fratres" from the Italian: "Cattaneus Maria von Bergamo, Ermahung in the Beichteusz" (5th ed., Mainz, 1886). "Johannes Baptista Lambruschini, Der geistliche Führer" (Mainz, 1848; 12th ed., 1872), and an abridged edition of the latter, "Der kleine geistliche Führer" (1851; 6th ed., 1861).

O'Hurley, Dermot, Archbishop of Cashel, Ireland, d. 19-20 June, 1584. His father, William O'Hurley of Lickardoon, near Limerick, a man of substance and standing, holding land under the Earl of Desmond, secured him a liberal education on the continent. He took his doctorate in utroque jure, taught at Louvain and the University of Bologna, and afterwards went to Rome. Appointed Archbishop of Cashel by Gregory XIII, he was consecrated on 11 September, 1581, per saltum, not having previously taken priesthood. Two years later he landed at Drogheda, stayed a short time with the Baron of Slane, and proceeded for his diocese, expecting protection from the Earl of Ormond. Loftus, Protestant Archbishop of Dublin, and Sir Henry Wallop, then lord justices, having secret information, so intimidated Lord Slane that he hastened to Munster and brought back his guest. The archbishop was committed to Dublin Castle in October, 1583, while the justices, dreading Ormonde's resentment and his influence with Queen Elizabeth, obtained authority to use torture, hoping that he would inform against the Earl of Kildare and Lord Ormond. Still, he suggested that Dublin was unprovided with a rack, that their prisoner could be better schooled in the Tower of London. Walsingham replied by bidding them toss his feet in hot boots over a fire. The barbarous suggestion was adopted, and early in March, 1584, the archbishop's legs were thrust into boots filled with oil and salt, until at last a flame was applied to the groans of agony were from the victim, and he cried aloud, "Jesus, son of David, have mercy on me!", but rejected every proposal to abandon his religion. Ultimately he swooned away, and fearing his death, the torturers removed him; as the boots were pulled off, the flesh was stripped from his bones. In this condition he was returned to prison, and the Justices again sought instructions from England, reporting what had been done, and intimating the lawyer's opinion that no charge of treason could be sustained in Irish law against Dr. O'Hurley. Walsingham, having consulted the queen, wrote back her approval of the torture, and her authority to dispatch the archbishop by any lawful means. At dawn, he was taken out and hanged, and hanged with a withe on the gibbet near St. Stephen's Green, 19-20 June, 1584. His body was buried by some friends in St. Kevin's churchyard.

O'Heussey, Maellbrighde (Irish, Maol Brighde Ua Heususa; Latin, Brighdus hosius), known also as Giolla-Brihad and as Bonaventura Hussy, a Franciscan Friar, b. in the Diocese of Clougher, Ulster. Little is known of his life. The first definite information about him dates from 1 November, 1407, on which day he became one of the original members of the Irish Franciscans at their college of St. Anthony at Louvain. It seems, however, that he had previously been at Douai. At Louvain, he lectured first in philosophy and afterwards in theology. He is known for his profound knowledge of the Latin and French languages, for which reason, according to the chronicles of his order, he was even in his own time held in high esteem. As far as we know, his works were all written in Irish, and one of his writings, "A Christian Catechism" (Louvain, 1688), was the first book printed on the Continent in the Irish character. The book must have had considerable success, as we find that it was several times reprinted and revised. Among his other works are to be mentioned: a metrical abridgment in 240 verses of the Christian Catechism, a poem for a friend who had fallen into herey, a poem on the author entering the Order of St. Francis, and three or four poems preserved in manuscript in the British Museum and the Royal Irish Academy. A letter in Irish from him to Father Nugent, the superior of the Irish Jesuits, is printed in Rev. E. Hogan's "Hibernia Ignitiana" (p. 167). O'Heussey remained as guardian of the college at Louvain until his death in 1613.

Oil of Saints (Manna Oil of Saints), an oily substance, which is said to have flowed, or still flows, from the relics or burial places of certain saints; sometimes the oil in the lamps that burn before their shrine; also the water that flows from the wells near their burial places; or the oil and the water which have in some way come in contact with their relics. These oils are or have been used by the faithful, with the belief that they will cure bodily and spiritual ailments, not through any intrinsic power of their own, but through the intercession of saints with whom their oils have some connexion. In the days of St. Paulinus of Nola (d. 341) the custom prevailed of pouring oil on the relics or reliquaries of martyrs and then gathering it in vases, sponges, or pieces of cloth. This oil, oleum martyris, was distributed among the faithful as a remedy against sickness. Though the custom was continued in the ninth century, it was not carried on as a regular practice in the Middle Ages. At the present day more attention is paid to its medicinal properties than to its use as a relic-bearer.

The oil of St. Nicholas of Myra is said to have been poured on the relics of this saint at the time of his interment. The oil was used at first as a remedy against bodily and spiritual ailments. It is said to have also flowed from his relics when they were still in Myra. (See NICHOLAS OF MYRA, SAINT.)

St. Gregory of Tours, "De Gloria martyrum," xxx, p. L. LXI, 730) testifies that a certain substance like flour emanated from the sepulchre of John the Evangelist. The same Gregory writes (ibid., xxxi) that from the sepulchre of the Apostle Andrew at Patrae emanated manna in the form of flour and fragrant oil.

Following is a list of other saints from whose relics or reliquaries of oil is said to have flowed at certain times:

Ointment in Scripture.—That the use of oily, fragrant materials to anoint the body is a custom going back to remote antiquity is evidenced by the Old Testament as well as other early literatures. Likewise the ceremonial and sacred use of oil and ointment was of early origin among the Hebrews and was much elaborated in the prescriptions of the later ritual. The particularly rich unguent known as the "holy oil of unction" is frequently referred to in the "priestly" sections of the Pentateuch and in Paralipomenon. Its composition is minutely prescribed in Exodus, xxx, 23, 24. Besides the regular basis of olive oil, the other ingredients mentioned are oil of myrrh, cinnamon, cedars, and cinnamon, all of which are to be used in stated quantities. The making or the use of this holy oil by unauthorized persons was prohibited under pain of sacrilege. In many of the references to ointment in Scripture perfumed oil is meant, and it may have in some cases consisted of oil only. Oil and ointment however, are distinguished in Luke, vii, 46: "My head with oil thou didst not anoint; but she with ointment hath anointed my feet." Identical or similar preparations, in which myrrh was an important ingredient, were used in anointing the dead body as well as the living subject (Luke, xxiii, 56). Ointment of spikenard, a very costly unguent, is mentioned as "anointing oil of precious spikenard" (cf. John, xii, 3). So prized were these unguents that they were kept in pots of ababaster, and among the Egyptians they said to retain their fragrance even for centuries. For the oil spoken of by St. James, v, 14, see EXTREMELY OCTRON.

OJEDA, ALONSO DE, explorer; b. at Cupeua, Spain, about 1460; d. on the island of Santo Domingo, about 1538. He came of an impoverished noble family, but had the good fortune to start his career in the household of the Dukes of Medina Sidonia. He early gained the patronage of Juan Rodriguez de Fonseca, Bishop of Burgos and later Patriarch of the Indies, which enabled him to join Ojeda in his second voyage to the New World. Ojeda distinguished himself there by his daring in battle with the natives, towards whom, however, he was unduly harsh and vindictive. He returned to Spain in 1496. After three years he again journeyed to the New World with three vessels on his own account, accompanied by the cosmographer Juan de la Casa and Amerigo Vespucci. In a little over three weeks he sighted the mainland near the mouth of the Orinoco, and after sailing on Trinidad and at other places, discovered a harbour which he called Venezuela (little Venice), from its resemblance to the bay of Venice. After some further exploration, he made his way to the island of Hispaniola, which he was not received cordially, because it was thought that he was infringing upon the exploring privileges of Columbus. On his return to Spain in 1500, he took with him many captives whom he sold as slaves. Having still influential friends at home, he was able to fit out a new expedition, which left Cadiz in 1502 and made him the leader of the expedition at all of the islands in the Gulf of Honduras. There he established a colony which did not last long because of the imprudence of his companions and their extreme cruelty toward the Indians. Chafing under his leadership, these companions turned against him and sent him back a prisoner to Spain, accusing him of having appropriated the country's revenues. He was tried and sentenced to pay a heavy fine. Upon his appeal, however, he was acquitted of all culpability, but was now reduced to poverty.

In some way or other he made his way back to Hispaniola, where his former associate Cosse also was. There he conceived the idea of establishing colonies on the island of Cuba and claimed part of the Gulf of Honduras. Later time spent in petitioning the Government, finally the two comrades obtained the necessary permission. He went back to Spain and organized his third and last expedition, only after great effort. Among the persons who embarked in his four vessels was Pizarro, the future conqueror of Peru. Cortez, who was later to dominate Mexico, would have been among the soldiers of fortune engaged in this adventure, had not a sudden illness prevented him from sailing. When he reached his destination, Ojeda found the natives very hostile; they attacked his force and slew every man except Ojeda and one other. The two escaped to the shore, where they were soon discovered by the ships. Not yet despairing, he founded a new colony at San Sebastian. It soon became necessary for him to proceed to Hispaniola to obtain supplies for the settlement, in charge of which he left Pizarro. He was shipwrecked on the way, and only after suffering great privations did he finally reach Santo Domingo, where he died.

Okeghem, Jean d', also called Oerekem, Okenhem, Oekennan, Ockenheim, contrapuntist, founder and head of the second Netherlands school (1450-1500), b. about 1430, presumably at Tournon, in East Flanders; d. 1485. After serving as a choir boy at the cathedral of Antwerp (1433-4), he is said to have become the pupil of Gilles Binchois and Guillaume Dufay. He entered Holy orders, and in 1453 assumed the post of chief chanter at the Court of Charles VII of France, where he became choir-master. At the expense of the king, he visited Flanders and Spain, but most of his time was spent in Tours where he acted, by royal appointment, as treasurer of the church of St. Martin until his death. At first he followed his predecessors and teachers in his manner writing, but eventually introduced the principle of free imitation in the various voices of his compositions. Previously the strict canon was the ideal contrapuntal form, but he introduced the practice of alternating voices in canon simulation and at any distance from the initial note of the original theme. The innovation was epoch making and of the greatest consequence in the development of the a cappella style. The new principle inaugurated an unprecedented era of activity with Okeghem's disciples, chief among whom were Josquin Despréz, Pierre de la Rue, Antoine de Boulogne, Binchois, and Robert de Fevin, Jean Mouton, Jacob Obrecht, etc.

Numerous fragments of his works are contained in the histories of music by Forkel, Burney, Kiesewetter, and Ambroise, while in the Prisco Library of the Ratisbon cathedral are preserved his "Missa ejusvis toni" for four voices a "Musicae romanae" for four voices. His contemporary, Guillaume Crétin, wrote a poem on the death of Okeghem, in which he mentions that Okeghem produced the greatest masterpiece of his time—a motet in canon form for thirty-six real voices. While the belief in the existence of such a monster production was kept alive by tradition, it was feared that, it had been lost. It was not until 1888 that Robert Eitner expresses the opinion, shared by Michel Brunet, that the supposedly lost work is contained in a volume "Tomus III psalmorum", printed in Nuremberg in the sixteenth century by Johannes Petreius. Hugo Riemann reproduces the work in his "Handbuch der Musikgeschichte", 1, il. While the composition resembles things that were printed contemporaneously, it is not possible to ascribe it to Okeghem's hand. The only possible use for such a work is "Deo gratias" and there are no modulations from one key into another—probably to maintain as much clearness as is possible under the circumstances. Riemann doubts whether the composition was intended to be performed by vocalists and thinks that it was not to be played on the organ. It is, however, perhaps, to serve as an exhibition of the master's surpassing skill.

OKLAHOMA—1. Geography.—Oklahoma, the forty-sixth state to be admitted to the Union, is bounded on the north by Colorado and Kansas, on the east by Arkansas and Missouri, on the south by the Red River separating it from Texas, and on the west by Texas and New Mexico. It includes what was formerly Oklahoma Territory and Indian Territory, lying in the south central division of the United States between 33° and 37° North lat. and between 94° and 103° West long. Its extreme length from north to south is about 210 miles, and from east to west about 450 miles. Its has an area of 73,910 square miles. Oklahoma is bountifully blessed with streams, although, exactly speaking, there is not a navigable stream in the state. The rivers flow from the northwest to the south-east. With the exception of the mountain districts the entire state is just rolling enough to render its scenery beautiful. The climate is delightful. Escaping as it does the extremes of heat and cold, it is fitted for agricultural purposes even during the winter season. An irregular chain of knobs or Buttes, entering Oklahoma from Missouri and Arkansas on the east, extends through the southern part of the state to the western boundary, in a manner to connect the Ozark range with the eastern plateau of the Rocky Mountains. The groups, as they range westward across the state, are the Kiamichi, Arbuckle, and Wichita Mountains and the Antelope Hills. The highest mountain, 2600 feet above sea-level, is the Sugar Loaf peak.

II. POPULATION.—The report of the government census bureau relative to the special census of Oklahoma, taken in 1907, shows that the State had in that year a total population of 1,141,177, of whom 735,062 lived in what was prior to statehood called the Indian Territory. There were 1,226,930 whites; 112,160 negroes; 75,012 Indians. Since 1907 the increase has been enormous. The white people in Oklahoma represent every nationality, having come from every state in the union and from every country since the opening in 1889.

III. INDUSTRIES.—The value of the agricultural output for 1907 was $231,512,903. The principal crops are cotton, corn, and wheat, the production in 1908 being as follows: Cotton 492,727 bales; corn, 230,442 bushels; wheat, 17,017,887 bushels. In that year Oklahoma ranked sixth in cotton production, eighth in corn, thirteenth in wheat, and first in petroleum products. The oil fields of Oklahoma are now the largest and most productive in the world, there being produced in 1908, 50,555,628 barrels. In 1909 the production of natural gas amounted to 1,000,000,000 cubic feet. Coal has been mined extensively for a number of years; the production in 1909 was 3,092,230 tons, the number of men employed in this one industry being 14,580. Gold, lead, zinc, asphalt, gypsum, and other minerals are mined in paying quantities. Oklahoma has deposits of iron, land cement-stone, & other materials that are said to be inexhaustible. There are two large cement mills in the state, each operating with a capacity of 50,000 barrels per day. In 1908 there were 5,695.36 miles of railway in the state, exclusive of yard tracks and sidings; the total taxable valuation of same amounted to $174,649,682. During the year beginning April 1, 1907, the state and counties spent $23,812,581 in carrying on the public schools of Oklahoma. Much credit is due Captain David L. Payne and his "boomers" declared the territory was thus public land and open to the squatter-settlement. Payne and his followers made several attempts to settle on Oklahoma soil, but the United States troops were sent in to evict the enemy. Much credit is due the Paynes and his followers for their many attempts at colonization; for they caused the lands of Oklahoma to be opened for white settlement. Finally in 1888 the Springer Bill, which provided for the opening of Oklahoma to settlement, although defeated in the senate, opened the way to partial success, and in Congress it was adopted, and in October, 1889, that the Indian Appropriation Bill, and was thus carried. On 2 March, 1889, the Bill opening Oklahoma was signed by President Cleveland; and on 22 March, President Harrison issued the proclamation that the land would be opened to settlement at 12 o'clock noon, 22 April, 1889. The day previous to the opening it was estimated that ten thousand people were at Aransas City awaiting the signal. Large numbers were also at Hunnewell, Caldwell, and other points along the south line of Kansas. Fifteen trains carried people into the territory from Arkansas City that morning. On foot, horseback, in wagons, and carriages people entered the promised land all along the Kansas border. Other thousands entered Oklahoma from the south, crossing the South Canadian at Purcell. The town of Lexington was perhaps the first village. Two million acres of land were thrown open to settlement and on that eventful day cities and towns and a new commonwealth were created in a wilderness within twenty-four hours. On 6 April, 1889, Congress created the State of Oklahoma with six original counties. Nineteen other counties were from time to time created prior to statehood by the various acts of Congress, which provided for the opening of different Indian reservations within the

VII. DioceSE OF Oklahoma.—What is now the DioceSe of Oklahoma was formerly the Vicariate Apostolic of Indian Territory. The dioceSe comprises the entire State of Oklahoma. Prior to the opening of Oklahoma in 1889 there were only a few mission stations and no churches. At the present time (1910) there are within the state 53 churches with resident priests and 71 missions with churches, 300 stations attended occasionally and 12 chapels, 60 secular priests and 34 Benedictines, 11 of whom are in the missions. The Benedictine Fathers were the first missionaries and they established the first Sacred Heart missions in Pottawatomie County in 1880. The first prefect Apostolic was the Rt. Rev. Isidore Robot, O.S.B., his appointment dating from 1877. Catholicism in Oklahoma owes much to his persevering efforts. A native of France, he introduced the Benedictine order in the Indian country, choosing the home of the Pottawatomie Indians as the centre of his missionary labours. At this time a few Catholics other than the Pottawatomie and Osage Indians were scattered over this vast country. Soon after Robot’s appointment as prefect Apostolic he had the foundations of Sacred Heart College and St. Mary’s Academy well established. He laid the latter’s foundation; he died 15 February, 1887, and his humble grave is in the little Campo Santo at Sacred Heart Abbey. Well did he say: “Going, I went forth weeping, sowing the word of God; coming, they will come rejoicing, bearing the sheaves.”

The second prefect Apostolic was Rt. Rev. Ignatius Jean, O.S.B., whose appointment followed immediately after the death of Father Robot. Father Jean resigned in April, 1890. From the coming of Father Robot, Oklahoma and Indian Territories had been a prefecture Apostolic, but by the Bull of 29 May, 1891, it was erected into a vicariate Apostolic. The Right Reverend Bishop Theophile Meerschaert, the first Bishop of Oklahoma, was born at Roussignies, Belgium. He studied at the American College, Louvain, Belgium, finishing his course there. Coming to America in 1872 he laboured in the Diocese of Natchez, Miss., until 1891. By his example and his labours he has endeared himself to his own flock, and also to foreigners. When the administration began, his labours were difficult and perplexing; he was compelled to travel long distances and weary miles on horseback, railroad facilities being very meagre and accommodations poor. In those days Mass was celebrated many times in dugouts, no house being available, and churches were very few and only in the larger towns. Development has come with the multitudes of people who have come to this new country to make homes, bringing with them the best ideas of the old states from which they came. The labours of the bishop have been manifold on account of the great influx of people, but the Church has kept pace with all the other developments under his guidance and perseverance. He has erected into diocesan State the within the diocese about 32,000 Catholics and 86 priests (22 from Belgium, 12 from Holland, 15 from France, 12 from Germany, 3 from Ireland, 1 from Canada, 1 Indian, and 20 American priests). The majority of these priests were educated at Louvain, Strasbourg, or Rome. There are two parishes for non-English speaking Catholics in the diocese, one Polish at Harrah and one German at Okarche. The parochial schools are conducted by both Brothers and Sisters, some few by lay-teachers and schools of the Sacred Heart and the Christian Brothers have schools within the diocese. The sisterhoods within the diocese are: Sisters of Mercy (mother-house in Oklahoma City), Sisters of Divine Providence (mother-house in San Antonio, Texas), Sisters of St. Francis, Sisters of St. Benedict, and Sisters of the Sacred Heart. These schools are for the children of the first grade to the sixth grade for white children, fifteen for Indians, two for coloured children; thirty-six parishes with schools; one industrial school; two colleges for boys: St. Joseph’s College at Muskogee, under the direction of Brothers of the Sacred Heart, and the College of the Sacred Heart under the direction of the Benedictine Fathers. There are eight academies for young ladies, the principal ones being Mt. St. Mary’s Academy at Oklahoma City conducted by the Sisters of Mercy and the academy at Guthrie conducted by the Benedictine Sisters. There is one seminary for students of the Benedictine order. There are in the diocese 11 Benedictine monasteries, 5 Christian Brothers, 8 Brothers of the Sacred Heart, and 234 Sisters in the various congregations. The novitiates are: Sisters of Mercy at Oklahoma City, Benedictine Sisters at Guthrie, and Benedictine Fathers at Sacred Heart, St. Anthony’s Hospital at Oklahoma City is conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis.

Oklahoma City, the metropolis, with a population of about 65,000 (1910) has one church, St. Joseph’s Cathedral, the pastor of which, Rev. B. Mutsaers, D.D., has two assistants: Rev. John Groenewald and Rev. Victor Von Durme. Muskogee has a population of 25,000 and one church, Rev. Jos. Van Hulse pastor; Enid has a population of 20,000 and one church, Very Rev. Gustave Dupreitere, vicar-general, pastor. Other cities having one church and a resident priest are Shawnee, Tulsa, El Reno, Guthrie, Chickasha, and McAlester. There are three churches and two schools for negroes, the latter attended by 120 children.

Most of the Indians within the diocese are Baptists and Methodists, and the remainder of the Pottawatomie are Catholics, among the Choctaws there are a great many, and the Osage tribe in the northern part of the state is entirely Catholic. The spiritual interests of the Osage Indians are attended to by Rev. Edward Van Waesbergh of Pawhuska. There are Indian Mission Schools at Pawhuska, Anadarko, Chickasha, Atlers, Pawhuska, Gray Horse, Quapaw, Anmore, Muskogee, and Vinita. 1500 Indian pupils attend these mission schools. These schools are supported by money coming from Rev. Mather Katherine Drexel, the Indian Bureau at Washington, D. C., and from Catholic residents of the state. Much credit is due Rev. Isidore Robot, O.S.B. An outstanding work is Edw. Van Waesbergh of Pawhuska, Rev. Hubert Van Rechem, and Rev. F. S. Teyssier of Antlers, all of whom have laboured many years in the Indian Missions.

In regard to the immigrants the Italians, Bohemians, Germans, Syrians, Mexicans, and French form settlements; but the people of other nationalities assimilate because they are not numerous enough to form settlements and for the further reason that by assimilation they can learn the English language more rapidly. From the time of the opening of Oklahoma in 1889 many Catholics have moved into this diocese. At the present time (1910) there are 12,000 Catholics in the diocese and many practical Catholics are constantly coming from all parts of the world. There are retreats for clergy every two years and eclesiastical conferences are called every four months.
1908 there were baptisms, white children 1248, adults 327, Indians 172; negroes, 9; marriages 290; confirmations 1185. The Catholic population of the diocese on 31 Dec., 1908, numbered about 33,472, of which 29,653 were whites, 3465 Indians, 396 negroes.

MONT F. HIGHLEY

Olaf Haraldson, saint, martyr and King of Norway (1015-30), b. 995; d. 29 July, 1030. He was a son of King Harald Gレンケフォフ of Norway. According to Snorre, he was baptized in 998 in Norway, but more probably about 1010 in Ronen, France, by Archbishop Robert. In his early youth he went as a viking to England, where he partook in many battles and became earnestly interested in Christianity. After many difficulties he was elected King of Norway, and made it his object to extirpate heathenism and make the Christian religion the basis of his kingdom. He is the great Norwegian legislator for the church, and, like his ancestor Olaf Tryggvesson, made frequent severe attacks on the old faith and customs, demolishing the temples and building Christian churches in their place. He brought many bishops and priests from England, as King Saint Canut later did to Denmark. Some few are known by name (Grankel, Sigfrid, etc.) in the South. The bishops were too powerful to have taken the Anglo-Saxon conditions as a model for the ecclesiastical organization of his kingdom. But at last the exasperation against him got so strong that the mighty clans rose in rebellion against him and applied to King Canut of Denmark and England for help. This was willingly given, whereupon Olaf was expelled and Canut elected King of Norway. It must be remembered that the resentment against Olaf was due not alone to his Christianity, but also in a high degree to his unflinching struggle against the old constitution of shires and for the unity of Norway. He is thus regarded by the Norwegians of our days as the great champion of national independence, and Catholic and Protestant alike may find in Saint Olaf their great ideal.

After two years' exile he returned to Norway with an army and met his rebellious subjects at Stiklestad, where the celebrated battle took place 29 July, 1030. Neither King Canut nor the Danes took part at that battle. King Olaf fought with great courage and was fatally wounded and fell on the battlefield, praying "God help me!" Many miraculous occurrences are related in connexion with his death and his interment a year later, after belief in his sanctity had spread widely. His friends, Bishop Grankel and Earl Einar Tanbeskyolver, laid the corpse in a coffin and set it on the high-altar in the church of St. Clement in Nidaros (now Trondheim). Olaf has since been held as a saint, not only by the people of Norway, but also by Rome. His cult spread widely in the Middle Ages, not only in Norway, but also in Denmark and Sweden; even in London, there is in Hart Street a St. Olaf's Church, long dedicated to the canonical King of Norway. In 1565 a fine St. Olave's Church was erected in Christiansia, the capital of Norway, where a large relic of St. Olaf (a donation from the Danish Royal Museum) is preserved and venerated. The arms of Norway are a lion with the battle-axe of St. Olaf in the forepaws.

NIELS HANSEN

Olaf (Olavus), NICOLAS, Archbishop of Gran and Primate of Hungary, distinguished prelate, b. 10 January, 1493, at Nagyszombat (Hermanstadt); d. at Nagyszombat, 15 Jan., 1568. His father, Stephen, a brother-in-law of John Hunyadi, was of Walachian descent; his mother was Barbara Huszár (also known as Czausan). His autobiographical notes throw light on his life. After having studied at the Chapter School of Várad from 1505 to 1512, he became a page at the court of Vladislav II, but shortly afterwards chose an ecclesiastical career, and was ordained a priest in 1516 or 1518. While acting as secretary to Georg Szatmáry, Bishop of Főkereke, he was appointed a canon of that chapter. Later of Gran, in 1522 became Archbishop of Konorn. In 1526 he was made secretary to King Louis II; but was transferred to the service of Queen Maria. After the battle of Mohács, Olaf attached himself to the party of King Ferdinand I, but retained his position with the queen-dowager. In 1527 he was appointed "custos" and still had the Chapter of Stuhlweissenburg, and accompanying the queen-dowager in 1530 to the imperial diet at Augsburg. When in 1531 she became Stadtholder of the Netherlands, he went with her to Belgium, where he remained (with a brief interruption in 1539) until his return to Hungary in 1542. In the following year he was made by Ferdinand I the Bishop of Nagyszombat. In 1548 he became Bishop of Erlen, and in 1553 Archbishop of Gran. As such he crowned Maximilian King of Hungary, and performed the solemn obsequies (1563) over Ferdinand I. As Archbishop of Gran, Olaf's first care was to put order into the finances and property of the archdiocese. He had the "Jus Public" against the property of monasteries as a pretext for confiscation, and had himself sent out to carry on the supervision over the nuns at Kornmambány, for which surveillance the archdiocese enjoyed a large revenue. At his own expense, he redeemed the hypothecated provostship of Turcze, also the encumbered possessions of the Diocese of Neutra. Olaf likewise, as Archbishop of Gran, exercised a supervision over the Dioceses of Erlen, and Nagyszombat (in the Holy See) administered the Archdiocese of Kalocsa, vacant for 20 years. After the capture of Gran by the Turks, the archiepiscopal residence was at Nagyszombat or Pozsony.

Olaf was particularly active in the Counter-Reformation (q. v.); even before his elevation to the Archbishops of Gran, he had been a very zealous opponent of the new Protestant teachings. As Primate of Hungary he threw himself with renewed energy into the great conflict, aiming especially at the purity of Catholic Faith, the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline, the reformation of the clergy, and the establishment of new schools. The country united, which the doctrines of the Reformation had made considerable progress, attracted his particular attention. He organized a visitation of the archdiocese, which he in great part conducted in person, besides convoking, with a similar intention, a number of diocesan synods. The first of these synods was held in 1560 at Nagyszombat; at its close he promulgated a code of dogmatic and moral instructions, intended for the clergy, published during that and the following year. In 1561 a provincial synod was held, likewise at Nagyszombat, to discuss the participation of the bishops of Hungary in the Council of Trent, shortly before re-convened. While it is not certain that Olaf took part in that council, it is known that he followed its deliberations with close attention and practically adopted Hungary some of its decisions. In 1563 Olaf submitted to the council a lengthy memorial, in which he urged the importance of dealing with the critical situation of the Hungarian Church and painting in strong, or that he promulgated notes and rules to overcome the demoralization that had seized on the clergy. It was particularly through school-reform and the proper instruction of youth that he hoped to offset the progress of the Reformation. He restored the cathedral school at Gran, which had fallen into decay when that city was captured by the Turks; he transferred it, however, to his archiepiscopal city of Nagyszombat and confided it to the Jesuits, whom he invited to Hungary in 1561, and who, by their preaching and spiritual ministrations, profoundly influenced the religious life of the nation. Among the publications initiated by him were the "Brevarium Ecclesiae Strigoniensis" (1558), and the "Opus et Ritus Ecclesiae Strigoniensis" (1560). The revival of the custom of ringing the Angels was due to him. As chancellor and confidant of Ferdinand I, Olah possessed much political influence, which he exercised in the special interest of the Catholic religion. In 1562 he acted as royal Stadtholder. He was a diligent writer; his works ("Chrestomathia", "Oriens niensis"), and the "Opus et Ritus Ecclesiae Strigoniensis"; "Ephemerides", and "Brevis descripdtio vite Benedicti Zerchky") were edited by Kovachich, in Vol. I of the "Scriptores minores".

Olas, a titular see in Isauria, suffragan of Seleucia. It was a city of Celsis in Cicilia Aspera, later forming part of Isauria; it had a temple of Zeus, whose priests were once kings of the country, and became a Roman colony. Strabo (V, 10; 9) and Ptolemy (V, 10; 9) call it Olbas; a coin of Diosarea, Olbas; Hierocles (Synecdemus, 709), Olbas; Basil of Seleucia (Mirac. S. Theche, 2, 8) and the Greek "Notitiae episcopatum"; Olba in the primitive name must have been Olba or Orba, found in Theophanes the Chronographer, hence Olbanopolis in "Acta S. Bartholomei". Its ruins, north of Seleukeia in the valley of Adana, are called Oura. Le Quien (Oriens christi, II, 1031) gives four bishops between the fourth and seventh centuries; but the "Notitiae episcopat." mentions the see until the thirteenth century.

S. PÉTRIDÉS.

Oldcastle, Sir John. See Lollards.

Old Catholics, the sect organized in German-speaking countries to combat the dogma of Papal Infallibility. The Old Catholics, with ideas of ecclesiastical liberalism and rejecting the Christian spirit of submission to the teachings of the Church, nearly 1400 Germans issued, in September, 1870, a declaration in which they repudiated the dogma of Infallibility "as an innovation contrary to the traditional faith of the Church". Their number, not far short of 200,000, was composed of scholars, politicians, and statesmen, and were acclaimed by the Liberal press of the whole world. The break with the Church began with this declaration, which was put forth notwithstanding the fact that the majority of the German bishops issued, at Fulda on 30 August, a common pastoral letter in support of the dogma. It was repeated later, that Bishop Graf of Fulda issued a letter concerning the dogma to his clergy. By the end of 1870 the Austrian and Swiss bishops had done the same. The movement against the dogma was carried on with such energy that the first Old Catholic Congress was able to meet at Munich, 22-24 September, 1871. Before this, however, the Archbishop of Munich had excommunicated Dollinger on 17 April, 1871, and later also Friedrich. The congress was attended by over 300 delegates from Germany, Austria, and Switzerland, besides friends from Holland, France, Spain, Brazil, Ireland, and representatives of the Anglican Church, with German bishops of the Old Catholic sect. The manner in which this and all later assemblies for organization was Johann Friedrich von Schulte, the professor of dogma at Prague. Von Schulte summed up the results of the congress as follows: Adherence to the ancient Catholic faith; maintenance of the rights of Catholics as such; rejection of the new dogmas; adherence to the constitution of the ancient Church with repudiation of every dogma of faith not in harmony with the actual consciousness of the Church; reform of the Church with constitutional participation of the laity, preparation of the Old Catholic Confession; reform of the Church with constitutional participation of the clergy; adherence to the title of Ultramontanism; rejection of the Society of Jesus; solemn assertion of the claims of Catholics as such to the real property of the Church and to the title to it. A resolution was also passed by which the Bishop Dollinger vehemently opposed and voted against. The second congress, held at Cologne, 20-22 September, 1872, was attended by 350 Old Catholic delegates, besides one Jansenist, and three Anglican bishops, Russian clergy, and English and other Protestant ministers. The election of a bishop was decided on, and among the most important resolutions passed were those pertaining to the organization of the pastorate and parishes. This was followed by steps to obtain recognition of the Old Catholics by various governments; the general feeling of that time made it easy to obtain this recognition from Prussia, Baden, and Beesse. Professor Reinkens of Bonn was elected Bishop of the Old Catholics, and consecrated at Rotterdam by the Jansenist Bishop of Denderen, Heidekamp, 11 August, 1873. Having been officially recognized as "Catholic Bishop" by Prussia, 19 September, and having taken the oath of allegiance, 7 October, 1873, he selected Bonn as his place of residence. The bishop and his diocese were granted by Prussia an annual sum of 1800 Marks ($1200). Prince excommunicated Reinkens by name, 9 November, 1873; previous to which, in the spring of 1872, the Archbishop of Cologne had been obliged to excommunicate Hilgers, Langen, Reusch, and Knoedt, professors of theology at Bonn. The same fate had also overtaken several professors at Braunsberg and Breslau. The faction brought forward by Friedrich von Schulte that the Old Catholics are the true Catholics was accepted by several governments in Germany and Switzerland, and many Catholic churches were transferred to the sect. This was done notwithstanding the fact that a decree of the Inquisition, dated 29 September, 1871, ordered the Old Catholics of Baden-Baden, 28 March, 1873, had again shown that the Old Catholics had no connexion with the Catholic Church; represented, therefore, a religious society entirely separate from the Church; and consequently could assert no legal claims whatever to the funds or buildings for worship of the Catholic Church. The development of the internal organization of the sect occupied the congresses held at Freiburg in the Breisgau, 1874; at Breslau, 1876; Baden-Baden, 1880; and Krefeld, 1884; as well as the ordinary synods. The synodal constitution, adopted at the urgency of von Schulte, seems likely to lead to the ruin of the sect. It has resulted in unlimited arbitrariness and a radical break with all the disciplinary ordinances of Catholicism. Especially far-reaching was the abolition of celibacy, called forth by the lack of priests. After the repeal of this law a number of priests who were tired of celibacy, none of whom were of much influence, took refuge among the Old Catholics. The statute of 14 June, 1878, for the maintenance of discipline among the Old Catholic clergy has merely theoretical value. A bishop's fund, a pension fund, and a supplementary fund for the incomes of parish priests have been formed, thanks to the aid given by governments and private persons. In the latter half of the 19th century the Old Catholic seminary for theological students, which, on 17 January, 1894, was recognized by royal cabinet order as a juridical person with an endowment of 110,000
Ghanderath-Kibch, Verino, political celibacy, Berne promote, power could ignorantly lics feeling. KuUurkampf out after Germany. Catholics, other designation in Baden, the German Catholics, in Prussia, with the Catholic leadership, who are known as Catholics, had been re-established against the Church. The reason is mainly the predominant influence of the katty under whose control the ecclesiastics were placed by the royal constitution. The abrogation of compulsory celibacy showed the utter failure of moral foundation of the sect. Dollinger repeatedly but vainly uttered warnings against all these destructive measures. In general he held back from any active participation in the congresses and synods. This reserve frequently irritated the leaders of the movement. Dollinger never let himself be persuaded to screen with his name those who were considered in the highest degree pernicious. He never, however, became reconciled to the Church, notwithstanding the many efforts made by the Archbishop of Munich. All things considered, Old Catholicism has practically ceased to exist. It is no longer of any public importance.

For accounts of the movements and tendencies that led up to Old Catholicism see Dollinger; Günther; Hermes; Infallibility; Lamenñas; Syllabus; Vatican Council.

The very radical liturgical, disciplinary, and constitutional ordinances adopted in the first fifteen years gradually evoked ever the more friendly government officials that the fiction of the Catholicism of the Old Catholics was no longer tenable. The damage, however, had been done, the legal recognition remained unchanged, and the grant from the budget could not easily be dropped. In Germany, although there was no essential change in this particular, yet the political necessity which led to a mosbus viriindi in the Kulturkampf chilled the interest of statesmen in Old Catholics, particularly as the latter had not been able to fulfill their promise of nationalizing the Church in Germany. The utter failure of this attempt was due to the solidarity of the violently persecuted Catholics. In Germany, the families now united after the first excitement had passed, and the winning power of the Old Catholic movement declined throughout Germany in the same degree as that in which the Kulturkampf powerfully stimulated genuine Catholic feeling. The number of Old Catholics sank rapidly and steadily; to conceal this the leaders of the movement made use of a singular stratagem. Up to then Old Catholics had called themselves such, both for the police register and for the census. They were now directed by their leaders to cease this and to call themselves simply Catholics. The rapid decline of the sect has thus been successfully concealed, so that it is not possible at the present day to give fairly exact statistics. The designation of themselves as Catholics by the Old Catholics is all the stranger as in essential doctrines and worship they hardly differ from a liberal form of Protestantism. However, the prescribed concealment of membership in the Old Catholic body this has much good in it, that many who had long been secretly estranged from the sect were able to return to the Church without attracting attention. On account of these circumstances only Old Catholic statistics of some years back can be given. In 1878 there were in the German empire: 122 congregations, including 44 in Baden, 36 in Prussia, 31 in Bavaria, and about 52,000 members; in 1890 there were only about 30,000 Old Catholics, on account of a decided decline in Bavaria. In 1877 there were in Switzerland about 73,000; in 1890 only about 25,000. In Austria at the time of the census of 1870 there were about 10,000 adherents, to-day there are probably not more than 4000. It may be said that the total number of Old Catholics in the whole of Europe is not much above 10,000.
Oldenburg, a grand duchy, one of the twenty-six federated states of the German Empire. It consists of three widely separated parts: the duchy of Oldenburg; the principality of Lübeck, situated between Holstein and Mecklenburg; and the principality of Birk- enfeld, in Rhenish Prussia. The duchy is bounded by the North Sea, and by Hanover. It has an area of 574 sq. miles and (1 Dec., 1905) 438,556 inhabitants. Oldenburg has 2134 sq. miles and 333,789 inhabitants; Lübeck, 217 sq. miles and 38,583 inhabitants; and Birkenfeld, 202 sq. miles and 46,184 inhabitants.

There were in 1905, in Oldenburg: Catholics, 86, 885; Protestants, 261, 805; other Christians, 1163; Jews, 1560; in Lübeck: Catholics, 485, 833; Protestants, 98, 864; other Christians, 11; Jews, 23; in Birkenfeld: Catholics, 8717; Protestants, 37, 047; other Christians, 177; Jews, 543. In the entire grand duchy: 96, 067 Catholics, 399, 916 Protestants, 1351 other Christians, 1522 Jews. The percentage of Catholics among the total population is now 21.9; in 1871 it was 22.4.

The cause of this lies in the emigration of part of the agricultural population to the industrial districts of the neighbouring provinces.

The capital is Oldenburg. In that part of the country facing the North Sea, the population is of Frisian descent; further inland it is Low Saxon. The chief rivers are the Weser and the Hunte. Of great importance to the economy are the fisheries. The chief industries are agriculture, cattle raising, horse-breeding, peat-cutting, and fishing. The country's industrial establishments include brick factories, briquette manufacture, shipbuilding, metal and iron works, distilleries of alcohol from rye and potatoes. The most important articles of commerce are cattle, grain, lumber, fish.

The country takes its name from the castle of Oldenburg, erected about the middle of the twelfth century. The founder of the reigning house was Egilmar, who is first mentioned in a document dated 1098. His territory, of which the Duke of Saxony was the liege lord, was situated between the country of the Saxons and the Frisians. The wars with the latter lasted for several centuries, and it was not until 1234 that one of their tribes (the Stedingians) succumbed to the Oldenburg attacks in the battle of Altenes. The Archbishop of Bremen was in these wars an ally of the counts of Oldenburg. When the famous Saxon duke, Henry the Lion, died in 1126, the dukedom of Saxony was partitioned by Frederick Barbarossa in 1181, the counts of Oldenburg obtained the rights of princes of the Empire, but took little part in its development and progress. Of great importance later on was the marriage which Count Dietrich the Fortunate (d. 1416), concluded with Heilwig of Schauenburg (Schauenburg). Two sons issued from this marriage, Christian and Gerhard the Valiant. Through the influence of his uncle, Duke Adolf VIII of Sleswig-Holstein, Heilwig's eldest son, Christian, became King of Denmark in 1418, King of Norway in 1459, and King of Sweden in 1457. This last royal crown Christian lost again in 1471. He became, after the death of Duke Adolf, Duke of Sleswig-Holstein and Count of Holstein, Christian became the ancestor of the House of Holstein-Oldenburg, branches of which are reigning to-day in Denmark, Greece, Norway, Russia, and Oldenburg.

The ancestral lands of Oldenburg were turned over by Christian I in 1458 to his brother Gerhard the Valiant. The Emperor Charles V gave Oldenburg as a fief to Count Anton I in 1531. The main line became extinct with the death of Count Anton Günther (1603-67). After lengthy quarrels over the succession, Christian V of Denmark became ruler of Oldenburg in 1676. In 1773, however, the Danish King Christian VII surrendered Oldenburg to the Grand Duke Paul of Russia, in consideration of the latter's renunciation of the sovereignty of Schleswig-Holstein. Grand Duke Paul transferred the country, which was raised to a duchy in 1777, to his brother Frederick Augustus. The latter, who although a Protestant, was Prince-Bishop of Lübeck since 1750, added the territory of the former Catholic Bishopric of Lübeck to Oldenburg. Because William, the son of Frederick Augustus, was insane, Peter, first cousin of Frederick Augustus, succeeded the latter in the administration of the duchy. The succeeding rulers of the country are descended from this Peter. When Napoleon in 1810 united the entire German North Sea districts with his empire, he decided to indemnify the Duke of Oldenburg for his loss by giving him other districts in Thuringia. But because the duke refused these districts, Napoleon punished him by taking possession of all Oldenburg in 1811 and by embodying it in the Departments of Wesermindung and Oberems. The battle of Leipzig in 1813 brought liberty to Oldenburg. Peter again grasped the reins of government. The resolutions of the Vienna Congress raised Oldenburg to the dignity of a grand duchy and enlarged it by adding to it a part of the province of the Grand Duchy of Nassau. After the establishment of the German Federation in 1815, Oldenburg became a member of it. In the war between Prussia and Austria in 1866 Oldenburg added its troops to the Prussian army of the Main; later on it joined the North German Federation and in 1871 the German Empire as an independent state. The grand duke since 1900 is Frederick Augustus (b. 16 Nov., 1852).

The larger part of the country was Christianized by the Bishop of Bremen, and especially through the efforts of St. Wilhelmius, who was consecrated first Bishop of Oldenburg in 787. Under the influence of the Lutheran confession in 1529 to Count Anton I, this district was united with the Archbishopric of Bremen. The reformation here destroyed almost all Catholic life. The southern parts of the duchy, which consist of a part of the administrative districts of Cloppenburg and Vechta, were outlying missions of the Benedictines of Visbeck and Meppen, which had been established by Charlemagne. These parts, the pastoral care of which chiefly devolved on the Benedictine Abbey of Corvey, were subject to the Prince-Bishop of Münster from 1252 until 1583 under the name of the Niederstift, and, therefore, remained Catholic in origin. The jurisdiction over the Niederstift was exercised by the Bishop of Osnabrück and not by the Bishop of Münster. In 1858 the jurisdiction of Osnabrück was transferred to Münster. These districts were ceded to Oldenburg in the conference of the federal deputies in 1892. In the papal Bull “De salute animarum”, 16 July, 1821, in regard to the establishment and limitation of the Prussian bishopries, all Oldenburg was transferred to the Prussian bishopric of Münster; however, there were very few Catholics in the northern part of the country.

The principality of Lübeck is a part of the Vicariate Apostolic of the Northern Missions. The Principality of Birkenfeld belongs to the Bishopric of Trèves. The plan of Grand Duke Paul to have a separate Bishopric for Oldenburg failed on account of financial difficulties. The relations between Church and State were adjusted by the convention of 5 Jan., 1830. The Grand Duke designated to these deliberations was the Prince-Bishop of Bremen-Verden. The supreme guidance of the Catholics of Oldenburg was entrusted to the substitute (Offizial) of the Bishop of Bremen, who resided in Vechta. The resolutions of the convention became laws by order of the grand ducal cabinet of 5 April, 1831, under the title "Fundamental-Statut der katholischen Kirche in Oldenburg". Simultaneously there was published "Normativ zur Wahrung der landesherrlichen Majestätsrechte circa ecclesiae" (Right of maintenance of the ducal rights circa sacra), of which no notice had been given to the ecclesiastical authorities.

These regulations created a commission for the defence of State rights against the Catholic Church", which exists to this day, and which is composed of two higher State officials, one of whom usually is a Catholic and the other a Protestant. The commission includes all negotiations between the government and the Bishop of Münster, particularly those relating to the appointment of the Offizial, his assessors and his secretary as well as the two deacons; furthermore all negotiations between the government and the Offizial, such as those relating to the appointment of priests, the establishment of parishes and of ecclesiastical benefices. The commission furthermore must approve every sale or mortgage of church property. The regulations further decreed that all papal and episcopal edicts must be approved by the grand duke before their publication in Oldenburg, and that they shall not be valid without such an approval. On account of these compromises between State and Church the Church in Oldenburg was not affected by the severe trials of the Kulturkampf. Grand Duke Peter openly disapproved of the persecution of the Catholics; church property was distinctly guaranteed. But as the approval of the government was required for the appointment of the clergy and clerical officials, the conflict continued.

The negotiations, begun in Dec., 1852, between the Bishop of Oldenburg and the government, dragged along almost twenty years. During this time the bishop and the Offizial did not appoint any parish priests; only temporary pastors were placed in charge of the parishes in which vacancies occurred. In 1868 an agreement was reached according to which the bishops filled clerical vacancies after an understanding in each case with the Government, and they further agreed that the decrees of the Church should be communicated to the Government simultaneously with their publication. Several minor points in dispute were settled in 1872. The Catholics of Oldenburg were not affected by the severe trials of the Kulturkampf. Grand Duke Peter openly disapproved of the persecution and the severity with which the Church was treated in Prussia.

The Oldenburg part of the Diocese of Münster consists to-day of two deaneries, Cloppenburg and Vechta. The Deaconry of Cloppenburg numbers 38,878 Catholics, 6852 Protestants and 28 Hebrews; the 18 parishes of the Diocese Cloppenburg and Friesoythe also belong to it. The Deaconry of Vechta numbers 55,305 Catholics, 264,169 Protestants, 987 Jews; it includes the other 18 parishes of the country. The necessary funds for the payment of clerical expenses were partly taken from the income of several so-called commanderies in the Ante Friesoythe which formerly belonged to the Order of Malta. The State sequels were partly granted by the King of Hanover. The State does not forbid the foundation of religious houses.

The Dominicans have a boarding college at Vechta, and the Franciscans a house in Mühlen, near Steinfeld. Of female congregations there are 7 houses belonging to the sisters of the third order of St. Fran-

4 houses of the Sisters of Charity; 7 houses of the Sisters of Our Lady; 1 house of the Poor Franciscan nuns of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary; 1 house of the Grey Nuns of St. Elizabeth; in all there are 20 houses of female congregations. The sisters nurse the sick, or teach in their own schools. Until 1855 the Catholic Church was the only one in Oldham.

The law of 1855 secularized the entire educational system including the secondary schools. The Catholic educational system and the Protestant system are each under a separate school board. The episcopal "Offizial" is president of the Catholic Church board which controls the Catholic "Gymnasium" at Vechta, the seminary for the education of the seminarian priests, and the Catholic public schools. On 4 Feb., 1910, a new educational law went into effect. It does away with the hitherto existing clerical superintendence of public schools. Only the religious instruction is supervised by the clergyman, who is a member of the school board. If there are more than twenty-five Catholic children in a parish, which has only a Lutheran school, a separate Catholic school must be established by the parish, should the parents request it. The ancient Diocese of Oldenburg has no connexion with the country of Oldenburg, or with its principal city of Oldenburg, but that of the Palatinate Oldenburger Münster, which was erected by the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Diocese of Oldenburg. The Bishopric of Oldenburg was founded by the German Emperor Otto I about 950, and comprised the present territory of Holstein. The small town of Oldenburg (also called Alden) in the Middle Ages, near the coast of the Baltic Sea, which is still in existence, was the first seat of the bishop. The Diocese of Oldenburg was suffragan to the Archdiocese of Bremen; during the great revolt of the Slav peoples in 1066, it ceased to exist, but was re-established in 1119 as the See of St. Vedvin, a missionary among the Slavs. As early as 1163, the seat of the bishopric was transferred to Lübeck, the famous Hanse city, by the Saxon Duke Henry the Lion.

Old Hall (St. Edmund's College), near Ware, Hertfordshire, England, founded in 1793 after the fall of the English College, Douai, during the French revolution, to carry on for the south of England the same work of training priests for the English mission, and of affording a Catholic education to lay students. It was the seminary for the "London District" until 1850, when it became the joint property of the Sees of Westminster and Southwark. For many years past it has belonged exclusively to the Archbishops of Westminster.

The foundation took place on 16 November, 1793, the feast of St. Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, when Bishop Dougall reassembled at Old Hall four of the Douai students, who, as he states in his diary "commenced studies or established the new college there, a substitute for Douai." He chose Old Hall for this purpose because there was already existing there a Catholic school belonging to the vicars Apostolic, founded in 1749 at Standon Lordship in the same county and removed in 1769 to Old Hall, purchased by Bishop Talbot Oldham, who added to it a thousand pounds from John Sone, a Catholic, enabled Bishop Dougall to build a college, blessed by him on 29 September, 1799. A chapel and refectory were added in 1805 by his successor, Bishop Poynter, who succeeded Dr. Stapleton as president in 1801. The college prospered, particularly under the rule of Thomas Griffiths (1785-34), afterwards Vicar Apostolic of London. He built a larger chapel, designed in the Gothic style by Augustus Welby Pugin and remarkable for the beautiful rood-screen, but he did not live to see the opening of it in 1833, when it was consecrated by Cardinal Wiseman, whose attempts to place the college under the direction of the Oblates of St. Charles led to serious troubles. Connected with these was the appointment of Dr. Herbert Vaughan (Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster) as vice-president of the college (1855-61). After the death of Cardinal Wiseman, Archbishop Manning was the Head of the theological students to London, and from 1869 the college was conducted simply as a school for boys; but in 1905 Archbishop Bourne decided to send back the theological students. There is now accommodation for 250 students; the college grounds cover 400 acres. The chapel contains a relic of St. Edmund, and the museum many interesting relics of the English College, Douai, and of the penal days. Two ecclesiastical councils have been held at the college, the synod of the vicars Apostolic in 1803 and the Fourth Provincial Council of W. Summner in 1873.

OLDHAM, Hugh Bishop of Exeter, b. in Lancashire, either at Crumpell or Oldham; d. 25 June, 1519. Having spent a short time at Oxford, he entered Queen's College, Cambridge. After his ordination he became chaplain to the Countess of Rich mond and soon obtained many benefices, being appointed Dean of Wimborne and Archdeacon of Exeter. He also held prebends in the cathedrals of London, Lincoln, and York, and was rector of St. Mildred's, Bread Street, London. Henry VII honoured him by appointing him as one of those who laid the foundation stone of his chapel in 1503. In the following year he was appointed Bishop of Exeter by a Bull of 27 Nov., 1504. Though not a learned man, he encouraged learning and in 1515 founded and endowed Manchester Grammar School. Through his influence over his friend Bishop Foxe of Winchester, Corpus Christi College, Oxford, was founded for the secular clergy, instead of for the Benedictine monks. He received a thousand marks to Foxe's foundation, where his portrait is honoured as that of a benefactor. From 1510 to 1513 he with other bishops was engaged in resisting what they considered the undue claims of Archbishop Warham with regard to the probate courts, and in the end won a considerable measure of success. Less fortunate was his litigation with the Abbot of Tavistock concerning their respective jurisdictions, during which he is said to have incurred excommunication. Before the dispute was ended he died, so that his burial had to be postponed until altar bells were poured out in 1535. It was consecrated by Cardinal Wiseman, whose attempts to place the college under the direction of the Oblates of St. Charles led to serious troubles. Connected with these was the appointment of Dr. Herbert Vaughan (Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster) as vice-president of the college (1855-61). After the death of Cardinal Wiseman, Archbishop Manning was the Head of the theological students to London, and from 1869 the college was conducted simply as a school for boys; but in 1905 Archbishop Bourne decided to send back the theological students. There is now accommodation for 250 students; the college grounds cover 400 acres. EDWIN BERTON.

OLDONI, Augustino, historian and bibliographer, b. 6 Jan., 1612; d. at Perugia, 23 March, 1683. He came from La Spezia, and entered the Society of Jesus 4 February, 1628. At the end of his novitiate he made the usual study of the humanities, philosophy and theology. For some time he taught classics at Perugia, and was then professor of moral philosophy.
In the theological school. His first work, "Almea difficulta principali della grammaticae" (Ancona, 1637), dealing with Latin grammar, was written while he was engaged in teaching the humanities. He devoted his later years to the study of history and bibliography. He prepared a new annotated edition of the "History of the Popes" by Acies (Perugia, 1671); "Clementes titulo sanctitatis vel morum sanctitatis" (Perugia, 1673); "Athenaeum Romanum, in quo Summorum Pontificum ac Pseudo-Pontificum necon S.R.E. O'Leary, Arthur, Franciscan, preacher, polemical writer, b. at Farnborough, Ikey, Co. Cork, Ireland, 1729; d. in London, 8 Jan., 1802. Educated with the Franciscans of St. Malo, where he was ordained and acted as prison chaplain till 1771, he returned to Cork to engage in missionary work. Soon famous as a popular preacher and controversialist, he published tracts characterized by learning, religious feeling, toleration, and steadfast allegiance to the Crown; but his zeal against religious bigotry led him to make rash admissions, and to expose himself unconstitutionally to the danger of heterodoxy. Among his writings are: "A Defence of the Divinity of Christ and the Immutability of the Soul," "Loyalty asserted, or the Test Oath Vindicated"; "An Address to the Roman Catholics concerning the apprehended invasion of the French"; "Essay on toleration:" "A reply to John Wesley." A brilliant wit, an honorary member of the famous "Monks of the screw," he was commonly called the "Franciscan Dumas," and was requested by France with having received secret-service money from the Government, but more impartial historians consider the charge unfounded. From 1789 till his death he was chaplain to the Spanish embassy in London, and his society was courted by Burke, Sheridan, Fox, Fitzwilliam, and other leading men of Liberal views.

OLIER.

Olenus, a titular see and suffragan of Patras, in Achaea Quarta, one of the twelve primitive sees of Achaia, on the left bank of the Perus near Dyne. It is mentioned as early as 280, and at that time was a see of nearly 200 inhabitants retired to the villages of Peirai, Caryeitai, and Dyne. At the time of Strabo (VIII, vii, 4), who locates it forty stadia from Dyne and eighty from Patras, it was in ruins. It must have regained its population, for Honorius III in 1217 appointed its first bishop there. From the occupation of the Morea by the Franks, the Church of Olenus was ruled by the Archdeacon John, chaplain of Villehardouin. The Latin Diocese of Olenus was substituted for the ancient Greek See of Elos, and covered the same territory. In the beginning the Latins formed two dioceses, that of Olenus and that of Andralivia, the residence of the princes of Morea (Fabre, "Le Liber censuum de l'Eglise romaine," Paris, 1905, II, 8); moreover it had only one bishop, that of Olenus, who usually lived at Andralivia (Habert de Olenus publishes the ancient Greek and Latin epistles in "Alig, Fréchier, Einladungen, 235; Buchon, Recherches historiques, I, xxxii). Elenus thinks the same in giving the long list of the Bishops of Olenus and Andralivia in "Hierarchia catholica mediæ aevi," I, 89, 393; II, 98; III, 280. The Greek See of Olenus was established (Gerhard, "Neue Quellen zur Geschichte der Armenischen Kirche," Leipzig, 1903, 104) shortly after 1340 with that of Kernitz, at the same time Patras had lost all its suffragans. This diocese is first found in a "Notitia Episcoporum" of Constantine after 1435 (Gelzer, "Ungedruckte ... Texte der Notitia episcoporum," 634). To-day Olenus occupies the site of Tsu-kaleka on the sea, about seven miles to Patras on the way from Olympia. Andralivia, the ancient residence of the bishops of Olenus, about 35 miles from Patras in the same direction, has 2700 inhabitants. The Church of St. Sophia, the ancient cathedral of the Latins, may be seen still, also the church of St. James, belonging to the Templars, in which were interred Geoffrey I, Geoffrey II, and Guillaume of Villehardouin, whose tombs have been restored.

OLER, J. P. Kirsch.

Olesnicki, Zbigniew (FSBNEZ), a Polish cardinal and statesman, b. in Poland, 1839; d. at Sandemir, 1 April, 1855. At the age of twenty he was secretary to King Jagello, and fought with him in the battle of Grunwald on 14 July, 1410. A favourite with the king, he took part in the management of the country's most important affairs. His influence with the king greatly aided him in opposing the Hussites, who gained royal favour. On 9 July, 1423, he was appointed to the episcopal see of Cracow, and in 1433 was sent by the king as legate to the council of Basle, where he endeavoured to be on friendly terms with both parties. On 15 December, 1439, he was created cardinal priest with the titular church of St. Procopius, by Pope Eugene IV. The king represented that he accepted the same dignity from the antipope Felix V and adhered to him for some time has recently been attacked by P. M. Baumgartien: "Die beiden ersten Kardinals Konsistorien des Gegenpapstes Felix V" in "Romische Quartalschrift," XXII (Rome, 1908), 153. As cardinal, his influence in Poland was very great. At the age of thirty, and, during the frequent absence of Casimir IV in Lithuania, he transacted the affairs of the State. Being a man of great learning, he advanced the study of arts and letters in every possible way, and the contribution of the University of Cracow during his episcopacy is due chiefly to his efforts. To possess the spread of Humanism he called John Capistran and the Minorites to Cracow.

OLIER.

Oliver, Jean-Jacques, founder of the seminary and Society of St-Sulpices, b. at Paris, 20 Sept., 1605; d. there, 2 April, 1657. At Lyons, where his father had become administrator of justice, he made a thorough classical course under the Jesuits (1617-25); he was encouraged to become a priest by St. Francis de Sales, who predicted his sanctity and great services to the Church. He studied philosophy at the college of Harcourt, scholastic theology at the University of Paris, and patristics at the Sorbonne. He preached during this period, in virtue of a benefice with which his father had provided him, adopting the ambitious style of his day: he also frequented fashionable society, causing anxiety to those interested in his spiritual welfare. His success in defending theses in Latin and Greek led him to go to Rome for the purpose of learning Hebrew so as to gain cêlat by defending theses in that language at the Sorbonne. His eyesight failing, he made a pilgrimage to Lourdes, where he was cared for but able to complete conversion to God. For a time he meditated the Carthusian life, visiting monasteries in Southern Italy; the news of his father's death (1631) recalled him to Paris. Refusing a court chaplaincy, with the prospect of high honours, he began to gather the beggars and the poor and catechize them in his home; at Paris he was often mistaken in other things, but his instruction, a practice at first derided but soon widely imitated and productive of much good. Under St. Vincent de Paul's guidance, he assisted his missionaries in Paris and the provinces, prepared for the priesthood, and was ordained 21 May, 1633. He became a leader in the revival of religion in France, associating himself with the followers first of St. Vincent and then of Père de Condren, Superior of the Oratory, under whose direction he passed, though he continued to retain St. Vincent as his friend and advisor. To de Condren, more even, it appears, than to St. Vincent, Olier owed the deepest spiritual influence and many of the aims of his life. In 1640, he found at his heart was the foundation of seminaries after the model laid down at the Council of Trent. The hope of religion lay in the formation of a new clergy among the seminaries. The attempts in France to carry out the designs of the council having failed, de Condren, unable to succeed through the medium of the Oratory, gathered a few young ecclesiastics around him for this purpose, Olier among them. The missions in which he employed them were meant to impress on their minds the religious needs of the country; his ulterior purpose was not disclosed till shortly before his death in 1640.

A first attempt to found a seminary at Chartres failed. On 26 Dec., 1641, Olier and two others, de Foix and de Ferrier, entered upon a community life at Vaugirard, a suburb of Paris. Others soon joined them, and before long there were eight seminarians, who followed with the priests the same rule of life and were instructed in ecclesiastical sciences. M. Olier teaching Holy Scripture. The pastor of Vaugirard provided them with the necessaries of life and during the vacations, at which time they reformed their parish. Impressed by the fame of this reform, the curé of St-Sulpice, disheartened by the deplorable state of his parish, offered it in exchange for some of M. Oiler's benefices. In August, 1641, M. Oiler took charge of St-Sulpice. His aims were to reform the parish, establish a seminary, and Christianize the Sorbonne, then very worldly, through the pious and holy wishes of the seminarians who should attend its courses. The parish embraced the whole Faubourg-St-Germain, with a population as numerous and varied as a large city. It was commonly reputed the largest and most vicious parish in the city, but it not only obtained a cure, but also, with their spiritual and corporal needs, especially the poor, the uninstructed, the vicious, and those bound in irregular unions. Thirteen eucharistical societies were established, for the instruction not only of children but of many adults who were almost equally ignorant of religion. Special instructions were provided for women, for the education of domestic servants, lackeys, midwives, workmen, the aged etc. Instructions and debates on Catholic doctrine were organized for the benefit of Calvinists, hundreds of whom were converted. A vigorous campaign was waged against immoral and heretical literature and obscene pictures; leaflets, holy pictures, and prayer books were distributed to those who could not or would not come to church, and a bookstore was opened at the church to supply good literature. The returns were not unlike those in other parishes, and are still followed at St-Sulpice. Orphans, very numerous during the war, were placed in good parishes, and a house of refuge established for orphan girls. A home was open to shelter and reform the many women rescued from evil lives, and another for young girls exposed to danger. Many free schools for poor girls were founded by Father Olier, and he laboured also at the reform of the teachers in boys' schools, not however, with great success. He perceived that the reform of boys' schools could be accomplished only through a new congregation; which in fact came about after his death through Saint John de Matha, of the Order of St-Sulpice, who founded his first school in Father Oiler's parish. Free legal aid was provided for the poor. He gathered under one roof the sisters of many communities, who had been driven out of their convenits in the country and fled to Paris for refuge, and cared for them till the close of the war. In line, there was no misery among the people, spiritual or corporal, for which the pastor did not seek a remedy.

His work for the rich and high-placed was no less thorough and remarkable. He led the movement against duelling, formed a society for its suppression, and enlisted the active aid of military men of renown, including the marshals of France and some famous duellists. He converted many of noble and royal blood, both men and women. He combated the idea that Christian perfection was only for priests and religious, and inspired many to the practices of a devout life, including daily meditation, spiritual reading and other exercises of piety, and to a more exact fulfilment of their religious duties, and his unselfish and unceasing labours, his influence was powerful with the Queen Regent, Anne of Austria, to whom he spoke with great plainness, yet with great respect, denouncing her prime minister, Cardinal Mazarin, as responsible for simoniacal and sacrilegious nominations to the episcopate. He persuaded the rich—royalty, nobles, and others—to erect and endow, without which his unbounded charities would have been impossible. The foundation of the present church of St-Sulpice was laid by him. At times as many as sixty or even eighty priests were ministering together in the parish, of whom the most illustrious, a little after Oiler's time, was Fénelon, later Archbishop of Canterbury. This same man, he used as a kind of model of Oiler's work, for it sent trained, enlightened zealous priests into all parts of France. From being the most vicious in France, the parish became one of the most devout, and it has remained such to this day. Oiler was always the missionary. His outlook was worldwide; his zeal led to the foundation of the Sulphian missions at Montreal and enabled him to effect the retreat and conversion of the English King, Charles II, to the Catholic faith, though not to perseverance in a Christian life.

The second great work of Oiler was the establishment of the seminary of St-Sulpice. By his parish, which he intended to become a model for the retreat and clarity, as well as by his seminary, he hoped to help give France a worthy secular priesthood, through which alone, he felt, the revival of religion could come.
The seminary was at first installed in the presbytery, but very soon (1 Oct., 1642) removed to a little house in the vicinity, M. de Foix being placed in charge by Father Olier. The beginnings were in great poverty, which lasted many years, for Olier would never allow any revenues from the parish to be expended except on parish needs. From the start he designed to make it a national seminary and province; and it is the fact that the parish of St-Sulpice and its seminary depended directly on the Holy See. In the course of two years students came to it from about twenty dioceses of France. Some attended the courses at the Sorbonne, others followed those given in the seminary. His seminarians were initiated into parochial work, but he did not allow them to be of the utmost pilgrimages. At the Sorbonne their piety, it appears, had a very marked influence. The seminary, fulfilling the hopes of Father Olier, not only sent apostolic priests into all parts of France, but also became the model according to which seminaries were founded throughout the kingdom. Its rule was approved by the General Assembly of the Clergy in 1651, was adopted in many new establishments. Within a few years, Father Olier, at the earnest solicitation of the bishops, sent priests to found seminaries in a few dioceses, the first at Nantes in 1648. It was not his intention to establish a congregation to conduct a number of seminaries in France, but to lend a hand in the foundation of a seminary to any bishop and to recall them after their work was well established. The repeated requests of bishops, considered by him as indications of God's will, caused him to modify his plan, and to accept a few seminaries permanently. The society which formed around him at St-Sulpice was not expressly designed as a religious congregation; it continued as a community of secular priests, following a common life but bound by no special vows, whose aim it should be to live perfectly the life of secular priests. He wished it to remain a small company, dereeing that it should never consist of more than seventy-two members, besides the superior and his twelve assistants. This regulation remained in force till circumstances induced Father Emergy to abolish the limitation.

Father Olier's arduous labours brought on a stroke of apoplexy in February, 1652. He resigned his eire into the hands of M. de Bretonvilliers and on regaining sufficient strength visited watering-places in search of health, by command of his physicians, and made many pilgrimages. On his return to Paris he retired to his old country house, and enthusiasm reasserted themselves, especially in his warfare against Jansenism. A second stroke, at Peray in September, 1653, rendered him thenceforth a paralytic. His last years were full of intense suffering, both bodily and mental, which bore with the utmost sweetness and resignation. They were years of prayer, but indeed the whole life of this servant of God, despite his immense external activity, was a prayer; and his principal devotion was to the inner life of Christ. His visions and his mysticism caused the Jansenists to ridicule him as a visionary; but they, as well as all others, acknowledged his sanctity and the sincerity of his intentions. Intentional or unintentional criticisms show him a profound master of spiritual doctrine, and well deserve a close study. His great friend, St. Vincent de Paul, who was with him at his death, considered him a saint; and Father Faber, in his "Growth in Holiness" (Baltimore ed., p. 376) says of him: "Of all the uncanonized servants of God whose lives I have read, he most resembles a canonized Saint." Migne has edited his writings in one volume (Paris, 1851). A few chapters of a new life of Olier, by Monnier, were published in the Bulletin trimestriel des anciens élèves de St. Sulpice (Paris, 1910). They suffice to show that this new biography, by its critical acumen, complete knowledge and literary qualities, will supplant all hitherto published.

Olinda, Diocese of, in the north-east of Brazil, suffragan of São Salvador de Bahia. Erected into a vicariate by a papal provision of July 11, 1845, who annexed to it the Prefecture Apostolic of São Luís do Maranhão, Olinda was created a bishopric by Innocent XI on 22 November, 1676 (Constitution "Ad Saeram"). Its most distinguished prelate was Thomas of the Incarnation (1774-85), author of "Historia ecclesiae Lusitanie" (Coimbra, 1753). From its origin there has been continuous missionary activity. The diocese at Parahyba (1892) and Alagoas (1900). It is now extensive with the State of Pernambuco, lying between 7° and 10° S., latitude, and 34° 35' and 42° 10' W. longitude, having an area of 49,573 square miles. The maritime regions are low, fertile, and well settled; the hinterland forms a plateau 500 to 700 feet high, is arid, and sparsely populated. The episcopal city was originally Olinda, founded by Duarte Coelho Pereira in 1534. It was held by the Dutch from 1630 till 1654, who established, a few miles south, a new capital, Motoritzat, now known as Recife, or Pernambuco, an important seaport having a population of 190,000. The episcopal residence had been transferred thither, to the section called Bôa Vista. Pernambuco has a university, five hospitals (one in charge of the Sisters of Mercy), a college, and many churches, the first being dedicated to Nossa Senhora da Conceição. Outside the city are the pilgrimages of Nossa Senhora das Prazeres and Nossa Senhora de Monte. A Benedictine abbey founded at Olinda in 1535, was re-established on 15 August, 1855, from Beuron, in the diocese of Hohenlohe, and is in personal union with the abbey founded at Parahyba in 1903. The present bishop of Olinda, Mgr Luiz Raymundo da Silva Britto (b. at São Bento do Peri, 24 Aug., 1849; ordained, 19 July, 1864; elected, 18 Feb., 1901), succeeded Mgr Manuel dos Santos Pereira (b. 1827; concordated, 1833). The diocese contains 81 parishes, 365 filial churches and chapels, 88 secular and 22 regular priests; the population is 1,788,000, all Catholics, except about 4000 Protestants.

A. A. MacERLANE.

Oliva, a suppressed Cistercian abbey near Danzig in Pomerania, founded with the assistance of the dukes of Pomerania some time between 1170-78. After the extinction of the dukes of Pomerania in 1295, Oliva became part of Poland. From 1309-1466 it was under the sovereignty of the Teutonic Order; from 1466-1772 it again formed part of Poland; from 1772-1807 it belonged to Prussia; from 1807-14 to the free city Danzig. In 1831 it was suppressed; the abbey church, a three-naved brick structure in the Romanesque and Gothic style, became the Catholic parish church of the town of Oliva; and nearly all the other buildings were torn down.

In 1224 and in 1234 the abbey was burnt down and its monks killed by the heathen Prussians; in 1350 it was destroyed by fire; in 1433 it was pillaged and partly torn down by the Hussites; in 1577 it was pillaged and almost entirely destroyed by the Protestant soldiers of Danzig, in 1629 and in 1636 it was pillaged by the Swedes. The monks of Oliva have been powerful factors in the Christianization of north-eastern Germany. The dukes of Pomerania and the Teutonic Order liberally rewarded them with large tracts of land. In 1466, when Oliva came under the sovereignty of Poland, it refused to join the Polish province of Cistercians, because most of its monks were Germans.
When about 1500 it asserted its exemption from the jurisdiction of the bishop of Lesau, the Holy See decided in its favour. Its discipline suffered severely from the attacks of wars; and the names of Petricono only noblemen could be elected abbots, and especially because from 1557-1736 these abbots were appointed by the Polish kings. An impetus to reform was given by Abbot Edmund of Castiglione, who was sent as visitor. He joined Oliva to the Polish Province, and in 1580 drew up new statutes for the two monasteries. In 1587 he was detained by the French, but released in 1588. After a year of professorship at Grenoble, he returned to Paris, and occupied the chair of history at Bourbon College; in 1841 he accepted a position as tutor to the young George de la Rochefooucaud.

In 1842 Oliva won the junior fellowship in a history competition. His leader was Gregory VII, and M. Saint-Marc Giraud closed the Assembly with these words: "We have just heard virtue, pleading the cause of virtue." At this time was declared against the Jesuits. Quinet and Michelet changed their lectures into impassioned declarations against the society. On 2 May, 1845, M. Thiers was to conduct before the Assembly an interpellation against these religious. Oliva saw that it was his duty to be present. "I hesitated", he said to Louis Veullot, "I hesitate no longer. M. Thiers shows me my duty. I must follow it. I enter today..." And the day of the proposed interpellation he entered the novitiate of Lavall. This sacrifice was made for Madame Oliva who, as yet, had not been converted by the virtues of her son. After a year's fervent novitiate he was made professor of history at the College of Bruggelette, in Belgium. On 3 May, 1847, he made his first vows, and on the completion of theological studies received Holy Orders. In the meanwhile the Law of 1830 had established, in France, the right of educating others. Pierre Oliva was summoned to Paris, where he remained. On 3 April, 1852, Pierre arrived at the College of Vaugirard of which the Jesuits had accepted charge. He was to spend thirteen years here, first as professor and prefect of studies, then as rector. A model teacher, he trained the heart as well as his zeal, and the weightless energy added to the direction of his college, many works of zeal, among others "L'Œuvre de l'Enfant Jésus pour la première communion des jeunes filles pauvres", and "L'Œuvre de Saint François-Xavier", for the workmen of the parish of Vaugirard.

After twenty-five years devoted to teaching, Father Oliva was named Superior of the House in Paris (1865). He accepted this burden with courage, and displayed an unbounded zeal. An indefatigable preacher and director, he exercised by his sanctity an irresistible influence over all. His mother yielded to him and under his direction, Madame Oliva prepared by a life of prayer for a very holy death. In the meantime the spirit of revolt and of despotism spread throughout France. The religious renaissance of the nineteenth century, in which Pierre Oliva had been an example, called forth a retaliation of evil. In January, 1870, Father Oliva wrote: "Persecution is upon us; it will be terrible: we will pass through torrents of blood." On the desertion of Rome by the emperor he had followed the disaster of the French troops. The investment of Paris was planned, and to those who urged him to fly Father Oliva replied that he was the post of danger. The most formidable danger impending was the commune, now mistress of Paris. "Let us be generous and ready for sacrifice", said Father Oliva. "France must have the blood of the pure to raise her again; which one of us, indeed, is worthy to offer his life, and what a joy should we be chosen." He was chosen. On 4 April, 1871, the fédérés arrested Mgr Darboy and several others. On the fifth, they took possession of the house on the Rue de Sèvres and Father Oliva quietly gave himself up. On 24 May, five other prisoners were executed; on the twenty-sixth, fifty-two victims, Father Oliva marching at their head, were dragged through Paris and massacred in the Rue Haü. The day after this expiation the commune was overthrown. The remains of Father Oliva and the four priests who fell with him (Fathers Ducoudray, Caubert, Clerc, et de Bény) were placed in a chapel in the Rue de Sèvres, where the pious faithful still continue to invoke them, and numberless graces have been attributed to their intercession.

Considering is bearing. There were required a secular restoration in London. In 1828, Coudray had written to his friend Oliver about the need for a place of worship for the Catholics in England, and although the members of the community kept the rule of St. Ignatius so far as was compatible with their circumstances, in the hope of a future restoration of the Society, they continued to rank as secular priests. When the restoration of the Society took place, Oliver did not join it, but lived and died a secular priest. At the age of 30, he acquired considerable fame, and although some of his conclusions are not accepted at the present day, yet considering the limited sources of knowledge which were available when he lived, his researches show both industry and judgment. Most of his work had a local bearing. He held a well-known authority on the history and antiquities of Devonshire, about which he wrote several standard works. The one which is best known to Catholics in general is his Collections containing numerous biographical notices of Catholics, both clergy and laity, in the West of England. On the re-establishment of the hierarchy, when the first Chapter was established (1852), Oliver was nominated to the provost. He had already retired from active work, but continued to reside in his old house until his death. Among his works are: "The Monasteries of Devon" (1820); "History of Exeter" (1821); "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Devon" (1828, 2nd edition, much changed, 1839); "Collections S.J., 1. Histoire de la Province de Devon" (1845); "Monasticon Dioecesis Exoniensis" (1846); "Collections illustrating the history of the Catholic Religion" etc. (1857); "Lives of the Bishops of Exeter" (1861); numerous pamphlets and smaller works. fashionable to-date. They had a superior general, like the friars, and officials of the order distinct from those of the abbey. They set an example of adaptation to present needs by the frequent modification of their constitutions at the general chapters, and by the short term of office enjoyed by the superiors. The General of Our Lady of Mount Olivet numbers only 10 monasteries and 122 brethren.

Olivi, Pierre Jean (Petreus Johannis), Spiritual Franciscan and theological author, b. at Sigrigna, Diocese of Béziers, 1248-9; d. at Narbonne, 14 March, 1298. At twelve he entered the Friars Minor at Béziers, and later took the baccalaureate at Paris.
Returning to his native province, he was at first a fratres, and had the strict observance of the rule and his theological knowledge. When Nicholas III had prepared his Decretal "Exitit" (1279), Olivi, then at Rome, was asked to express his opinion with regard to Franciscan poverty (asse parpoer). Unfortunately there was then in the convents of Provence a controversy about the stricter or laxer observance of the rule. Olivi soon became the principal spokesman of the rigorists, and met with strong opposition on the part of the community. At the General Chapter of Strasbourg (1282) he was accused of heresy, and henceforth almost every general chapter concerned itself with his. His doctrine was examined by seven friars, graduates of the University of Paris (see Ann. Franc., 11, 374-75), and censured in thirty-four propositions, whereupon his writings were confiscated (1283).
Olivi cleverly defended himself in several responses (1283-85), and finally the General Chapter of Montpellier (1287) decided in his favour. The new general, Matthew of Aquasperta, sent him as preacher to the clergy of Avignon, where he was received with approbation by his predecessor, Raymond Gauredi, sent him as lector to Montpellier. At the General Chapter of Paris (1292) Olivi again gave explanations, which were apparently satisfactory. He spent his last years in the conven of Narbonne, and died, surrounded by his friends, after an earnest profession of his Catholic Faith (published by Wadding ad., a. 1297, n. 33).

Peace, however, was not obtained by his death.
His friends, friars and seculars, showed an exaggerated veneration for their leader, and honoured his tomb
as that of a saint; on the other hand the General Chapter of Lyons (1299) ordered his writings to be rabated, and burned as heretical. The General Council of Vienne (1312), in the Decretal "Fidei catholicae fundamenta" (Bull. Franc., V, 86), established the Catholic doctrine against three points of Olivi's teaching, without mentioning the author; these points referred to: (1) the moment Our Lord's body was transfigured by the lance, (2) the manner in which the soul is united to the body, (3) the innocence of a friar who friars went so far as to destroy Olivi's tomb, and in the next year two further steps were taken against him:
his writings were absolutely forbidden by the Gen-ral Chapter of Marseilles, and a special commission of theologians examined Olivi's "Postilla in Apos-telysin" and marked out sixty sentences, chiefly for-chimerical extravagances (see Joachim of Flora. For text see Baedluzzi-Mansi, "Miscellanze", Il, Lucca, 1701, 258-70; cf. also Denifle, "Charitariurn Universitatis Parisiensis", II, 1, Paris, 1891, 258-98). It was only in 1326 that Olivi was condemned by John XXII, when the fact that Louis the Bavarian used Olivi's writings in his famous Appeal of Sachsen- (1321) had again drawn attention to the author. Olivi's fate was a hard one, but was partly deserved through his theological incorrectness. Still Father Ehrle, the most competent judge on this point, considers (Archiv, III, 140) that Olivi was not the in- pious heretic he is painted in some writings of the Mid- dle Ages, and states (ibid., 418) that the denunciation of his theological doctrine was rather a tactical mea- sure of the adversaries of the severe principles of pov- erty and reform professed by Olivi. For the rest, Olivi followed in many points the doctrine of St. Ben- venture. The numerous but for the most part unedited works of Olivi are appropriately divided by Ehrle into three classes: (1) Speculative Works, of which the chief is his "Questions" (philosophical and theological), printed partly in an extremely rare edition (Venice, 1509), which contains also his defenses against the Pontificate of Benedict XIV (Paris, 1769-83 and 1771); (2) Du Plessis d'Argentor, "Collectio judiciorum", I (Paris, 1724), 226-34; Commentary on the Book of Sentences; "De Sacramentis" etc. (2) Exegetical Works: Five small treatises on introduction, printed under St. Bonaventure's name by Bonelli, "Suppl. ad op. S. Bonaventure" (Tront, 1772-3), I, 27-39; 202-327, 318-74; II, 1068-52, 1053-1113. In the same work (I, 52-281) is printed Olivi's "Postilla in Cant. Canticorum". (See S. Bonav. opera, VI, Quareucci, 1893, Prolegomena, vi-ix.) The other postilla are: Super Genesim, Job, Psalterium, Prover- bia, Ecclesiasten, Lamentationes Jeremiæ, Ecclefiem, Prophetas minoros, on the Four Gospels, Ep. ad Ro- manos (see Denifle, "Die Abendländische Sprachle- ger des Luther. . . . (Rom., i, 17) und justification" (Mainz, 1905), 156 sq.), ad Corinthios, in epistolae Canonicæs, in Apocalypse; (3) Works on observance of Fran- ciscan Rule (see Francis, Rule of Saint).

LIVARIUS OLIVER.

OLIVIER (1426-1562). Olivier de la Marche, chronicler and poet, b. 1426, at the Chateau de la Marche, in Franche-Comté; d. at Brussels, 1591. He was knighted by Count de Chalonais, later Charles the Bold (1465). Two years later Count de Chalonais became ruler of Burgundy and Flanders, and made Olivier bailiff of Amont (now a department of the Haute-Saône) and captain of his guards. Taken prisoner at the battle of Nancy, where the duke lost his life (1477), he regained his liberty by paying a ransom, and rejoined Marie, daughter of Duke Charles and heiress of Burgundy, who made him her maître d'hôtel.

As a writer he is best known by his "Mémoires", which cover the years from 1435-92, first printed at Lyons in 1562. Another edition, by Beaume and d'Arba- mont, was made for the Société de l'Histoire de France (1883-88). The work is singular and important for a knowledge of the period. The author is sincere, but his memory: Many of his inventions and, as in his other writings, he introduces too many descriptions of fêtes and tournaments. Most of his works are in verse. Among these are: "Le Chevalier Délébéré", a poem which some think is his own biography, others that it is an allegorical life of Charles the Bold; "Le Parement et le Triomphe des Dames d'Honneur", a work in prose and verse, of which each of the twenty- six chapters is named from some articles of ladies' at- tire; and "La Source d'Honneur pour maintenir la corporelle égârance des Dames". Among his prose works are: "Traité et Avis de quelques gentilhommes sur les ducs et gages de bataille", and "Traité de la Manière de célébrer la noble fête de la Toison d'or".

GEORGES BERTIN.

Ollé-Laprun, Iéan, French Catholic philosopher, b. in 1839; d. at Paris, 19 Feb., 1898. Under the influence of the philosopher Caro and of Père Gratry's book "Les Sources", Ollé-Laprun, after exceptionally brilliant studies at the Ecole Normale Supérieure (1883 to 1885), devoted himself to philosophical research. His life was spent in teaching a philosophy illuminated by the light of Catholic faith, first in the lycées and then in the Ecole Normale Supérieure from 1875. As Ozan- nain had been a Catholic professor of history and foreign literature in the university, Ollé-Laprun's aim was to be a Catholic professor of philosophy there. However, his advice was often sought by the press: "I am glad to think that God wills in our time to re- vive the lay apostolate, as in the times of Justin and Athenagoras; it is you especially who give me these thoughts.

The Government of the Third Republic was now and then urged by a certain section of the press to punish the "clericalism" of Ollé-Laprun, but the reputation which he had made in the public eye was too strong to allow of any serious punishment being inflicted.

For one year only (1881-82), after organizing a manifest acquiescence in the invaded congregations, he was suspended from his chair by Jules Ferry, and the first to sign the protest addressed by his students to the minister on behalf of their professor was the future socialist deputy Jean Jaurès, then a student at the Ecole Normale Supérieure.

Ollé-Laprun's first important work was "La philos- phie de Malebranche" (1870). Ten years later to obtain the doctorate he defended before the Sorbonne a thesis on moral certitude. As against the exaggerations of Cartesian rationalism and Positivistic deter- minism he investigated the part of the will and the heart in determining the course of the life. The work was published in 1885, and the last edition (1917) is, in many respects Newman's "Grammar of Assent"; but Ollé-Laprun must not, any more than the English cardinal, be held responsible for subsequent tendencies which have sought to diminish the share of the in- teligence in the act of faith and to separate completely the dogmatic belief from the personal act of faith.

"Essai sur la morale d'Aristote" (1881) Ollé-Laprun defended the "Endemonism" of the Greek philoso- pher against the Kantian theories; and in "La philoso- phie et le temps présent" (1890) he vindicated, against Deistic spiritualism, the right of the Christian thinker to go beyond the data of "natural religion" and illu- minate philosophy by the data of revealed religion. One of his most influential works was the "Prix de la vie" (1894), wherein he shows why life is worth living. The advice given by Leo XIII to the Catholics of France found in Ollé-Laprun an active champion. His brochure "Ce qu'on va chercher à Rome" (1895) was one of the best commentaries on the papal policy. The Academy of Moral and Political Sciences elected him a member of the philosophical section in 1897 to succeed Vacherot. His articles and conferences at- test his growing influence in Catholic circles. He be- came a leader of Christian activity, consulted and heard by all until his premature death when he was about to finish a book on Jouffroy (Paris, 1898). Many of his letters and lectures were published in France under the title "La Vitalité chrétienne" (1901). Here will also be found a series of his unedited meditations, which by a noteworthy coincidence bore the future motto of Pius X, "Omnia instaurare in Christo". Profor maltreating John, but declined to give up the fief of Bodowin, whereupon the pope asked Vratislav to expel Jaromir by force if necessary.

Among the bishops of Olmütz, during the later Middle Ages the following are prominent: Heinrich (called Zdik after his birthplace) transferred his see to the church of St. Wenceslaus, which had been twenty-four years in construction, and at Easter, 1138, took the Premonstratensian habit in the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. Bishop Kain, in 1193, while ordaining priests and deacons at Prague, forgot the imposition of hands. His successor, Engelbert, corrected this omission two years later; but the Cardinal-Deacon Petrus declared the ordination null and void, and caused it to be repeated in its entirety in

The Cathedral, Olmütz

1197. When the legate attempted to enforce a strict observance of the laws relating to celibacy, he was expelled from the country; the laws of the Church, however, were henceforth more strictly observed. During the time that Moravia was joined to Bohemia, the Duke of Bohemia appointed the Bishop of Olmütz. In 1182 Moravia became independent, and thereafter the margraves of Moravia exercised the right of appointment. Premysl Ottokar I, in 1207, granted to the Church of Olmütz freedom from taxes and to the chapter the right of electing the bishop. Innocent III confirmed this grant. After the death of Ottokar II, Rudolph of Hapsburg appointed Bishop Bruno regent in Moravia. Charles IV, in 1343, made Prague the metropolitan see for Leitomischl and Olmütz. The bishopric, as a vassal principality of the Bohemian crown, was the peer of the margravate of Moravia, and from 1365 its prince-bishop was Count of the Bohemian Chapel, i.e. first court chaplain who was to accompany the monarch on his frequent travels. In 1380 the cathedral and the residence of the prince-bishop were both destroyed by fire. During this period the following orders were established: the Premon-stratians (Hradisch, Klosterbrück); Cistercians (Vehrelad); the Franciscans and the Dominicans during the lives of their founders; the Teutonic Knights.

On the other hand there arose the sects of the Albigenases, Flagellants, Wahhensians (Apostolische Brethren, Brethren of the Holy Ghost), Hüssites (Bohemian Brethren, Gruhenhümmer, Picardians). Thus it happened that Protestantism found a well-prepared field. Lutheranism was preached by Sieratus at Iglau; Hübmaier and Huter were Baptists. Exiled from Switzerland and Germany, the Anabaptists came in droves into Moravia; Levisius, Sieratus, on his homeward journey from Poland to Turin, successfully sowed the seed of Socinianism. Bishop Dubravsky (Dubravine), famous as an author and historian, encouraged the disheartened Catholics (1553). The thirty-three volumes of his history of Bohemia, five books on fish-raising (piscology), and the work entitled "Über das heilige Messopfer" justify his reputation.

The Reform movement was finally arrested by the Jesuits. Three of them reached Olmütz in 1556 and rapidly acquired influence and power. Bishop Prusinovsky granted them a convent and turned over to them the schools as well as the projected university. At a synod strict orders and regulations were adopted. Hajičk had succeeded Pavlovec in Olmütz and won in carrying out the decrees of the Council of Trent. Rudolph II conferred upon him the title of duke and prince and made him a member of the royal chapel. The emons who gathered at Olmütz were distinguished for learning and virtue. The most important bishop of this see during the Reformation period was Cardinal Franz von Thun (d. 1559), son of Adam, major-domo of the imperial household. He governed the see for thirty-seven years, and accomplished extraordinary things both as statesman and ecclesiast. His work, of course, met with considerable opposition. He was imprisoned at Brunn, and the Seel of Olmütz was abolished. Johannes Sar- kandt, Secretary of the Holy Synod, was banished to Prague in 1550 and in 1552 was named for the see of the confession at Olmütz, 17 March, 1560, and in 1560 he was canonized. Better days soon appeared. The title of prince was conferred on both the cardinal and his brother, whose descendants were to inherit the title. Amos Contenus (Komarny), the last "senior" of the Bohemian Brethren, found refuge in Sardinia. His influence was felt later on in the intellectual life of his country. Dietrichstein was succeeded by Archduke Leopold Wilhelm, son of Ferdinand II, and by Charles Joseph, son of Ferdinand III. In 1663 Charles Joseph was elected Bishop of Breslau and Olmütz, with a dispensation from Alexander VII, as he was scarcely fourteen years of age; and died the following year. In 1663 Charles, son of Duke Charles of Lorraine, at the age of twenty-three, became subdeacon and exercised the administrative power in temporal affairs; four years later he obtained the spiritual administration. The dissolution of the Society of Jesus in 1773 affected the ecclesiastical prosperity of eight dioceses in Moravia. In the same year Clement XIV withdrew from the chapter the right of electing its bishop; it was restored, however, by Pius VI.

Maria Theresa, in 1777, raised Olmütz to the dignity of an archbishopric, and subordinated it to the newly-founded See of Brunn. The archdiocese was divided into eight archdeaconates and fifty-two deaneries. When the toleration edict of Joseph II appeared in 1781, whole districts forsook the Church. The inhabitants since the Counter-Reformation had been Protestants in secret. The emperor therefore ordered the destruction of the Catholic be- lief to make known in person their intention the Commission on Religion. When Emperor Joseph began the dissolution of the monasteries, there were in Moravia and Silesia two thousand monks in eighty-three houses. From the sale of this ecclesiastical property, the so-called "Religion Fund", many parishes were established, three in Olmütz alone. In the rural parts the parishes were not to be more than four miles apart. The parish priests received a stipend of four hundred florins, a local charity three hundred florins, and an assistant two hundred florins. The third Archbishop of Olmütz was Archduke Rudolph, brother of Emperor Francis. Cardinal Maximilian Joseph, Freiherr von Somerau-Beckh, had, in 1788, as advisor and assistant, the brilliant chancellor Kutsch- ker. On 2 December of the same year, in the throne room of the prince-archbishop's residence, Francis Joseph assumed the imperial sceptre. While the Austr- ian Parliament sat at Kremsier, Olmütz was the politi- cal capital of Austria. Eighty years old, Somerau-Beckh attended the great assembly of bishops in Vienna in 1849. Here he proposed by legal enactment to abolish the rule requiring every member of the Olmütz chapter to be of noble birth, because this rule was contrary to the spirit of Christianity and the laws of the Church, and an injustice to the untitled clergy of the diocese. The Olmütz chapter for a long time opposed this proposition both at Rome and at the imperial court, but without success. The two last prime-bishops have also been commoners. Car- lus von Fürstenberg, appointed Bishop of Olmütz in 1786, and Olmütz cathedral with its three towers, carefully preserving the individuality of the old church. The Concordat of Vienna (1418) provided that if any high dignitary of the Church resigned or died while in Rome, the pope should have the right to fill the vacancy thus caused. This he did, when Archbishop Theodor Kohl resigned his bishopric in 1805. In 1811, Cardinal Lipinski, the Bishop of Brunn, Francis Sal. Bauer was appointed archbishop.

At the present (1910) Moravia has two and one half million inhabitants of whom over ninety-five per cent are Catholics, less than three per cent Protestants, and nearly two per cent Hebrews. In the Archdiocese of Olmütz there are 1,758,000 Catholics; 1,597 priests; 220 male and 1,647 female inmates of religious houses. The episcopal city has a population of 22,000.

O'Loghlen, Michael, b. at Einnis, Co. Clare, Ire- land, in 1789; d. 1846. Educated at Einnis Academy, and Trinity College, Dublin, he was called to the Irish Bar in 1811. By force of ability he won a position as a brilliant pleader. The first real success was as a substitute for O'Connell on the day of the memorable duel between O'Connell and D'Esterre (1815); from 1820 to 1830 many cases came from O'Connell through whose influence O'Loghlen was appointed solicitor general for Ireland in 1834, the first Catholic since James II. He was also elected M.P. for Kings- town, and when his seat was extinguished in 1847, he was made attorney general. A year later he suc- ceeded Sir William Cassack Smith as baron of the ex- chequer—the first Catholic judge for almost one hundred and fifty years. Finally, in 1837, on the death of Sir William MacMahon he was given the Irish mastership of the rolls, which he held for five years. As master of the rolls he effected many legal reforms.

Olympia, Saint. b. 360-5; d. 25 July, 408, proba- bly at Nicomedia. This pious, charitable, and wealthy disciple of St. John Chrysostom came from an illustrious family in Constantinople. Her father Venables. S. had veneration for Palladius, Bishop of Constantinople (351-97), consecrated her deaconess. On the death of her husband the emperor had appointed the urban prefect administrator of her property, but in 391 (after the war against Maxinus) restored her the administration of her large fortune. She built beside the principal church of Constantinople a convent, into which three relatives and a large number of maidens withdrew with her to consecrate themselves to the service of God. When St. John Chrysostom became Bishop of Constantinople (398), he acted as spiritual guide of Olympias and her companions, and, as many understood the immense wealth of the Cappadocian church, as she remained in the empire and did not form a new following, he advised her as to the proper manner of utilizing her vast fortune in the service of the poor (Sozomen, "Hist. ecc.", VIII, 11; P., LX, 49 sq.); these are a beautiful memorial of the noble-hearted, spiritual daughter of the great bishop. Olympias was also exiled, and died a few months after Chrysostom. After her death she was venerated as a saint. A biography dating from the second half of the fifth century, preserved in the "Historia Lausiaca" of Palladius and from the "Dialogus de vita Joh. Chrysostomi", proves the great veneration she enjoyed. During the riot of Constantinople in 532 the convent of St. Olympias and the adjacent church were destroyed. Emperor Justinian had it rebuilt, and the priors, Sergia, transferred thither the remains of the founder from the ruins of the church of St. Thomas in Brokhtyes, where she had been buried. We possess an account of this translation by Sergia herself. The feast of St. Olympias is celebrated in the Greek Church on 24 July, and in the Roman Church on 17 December.

Olympus, a titular see of Lycia in Asia Minor. It was one of the chief cities of the "Corpus Lyceum", and was captured from the pirate, Zenictes, by Servilus Isauricus who transported to Rome the statues and treasure he had stolen. Its ruins (a theatre, temples, and porticoes) are located south of the village of Konia, at Delik-Tash (Pierced Stone), so-called because of a large rock forming a natural arch. The town was built near Mount Olympus or Pheecius, which gave forth constant fiery eruptions throughout antiquity; the ancients called it Chimera and depicted it as a monster which had been vanquished by Belerophon. Several ancient authors knew that this was only a natural phenomenon. (The Turks call it Yanar Tash—"Burning Stone"). Several "Notitiae episcoporum" place Olympus among the suffragan sees of Myra until the thirteenth century. Only four bishops are known, one of whom was St. Methodius (q. v.).

OMAHA

Omaha, Diocese of (Oamenses), embraces all that part of the State of Nebraska north of the southern shore of the South Platte River. Area, 52,996 sq. miles.

Early Missions.—The first missionaries in Nebraska were priests of the Society of Jesus, who, from about 1838, occasionally visited the native Indians, many of whom received baptism. In 1851 the Holy See cut off from the Diocese of St. Louis all the country north from the south line of Kansas to Canada, and west from the Missouri River to the Rocky Mountains, and erected it into the Vicariate of the Rocky Mountains, with Rt. Rev. John B. Migeé, S.J., as first vicar Apostolic (see LEAVENworth). On 6 January, 1857, this vicariate was again divided, and a new vicar called the Vicariate of Nebraska was erected, Bishop Migeé being authorized to govern it until the appointment of a resident vicar Apostolic of Nebraska.

The first resident vicar Apostolic was the Right Rev. James Mikes O’Gorman, D.D., b. near Nenagh, Co. Tipperary, Ireland, 1804, took the Trappist habit at Mount Melleray, Co. Waterford, 1 Nov. 1839, and was ordained priest, 1843. He was one of the band who came to Dubuque, Iowa, in 1849 to establish New Melleray (see CISTERCIANS). In 1850 he was appointed Vicar Apostolic of Nebraska, and on 8 May of the same year was consecrated titular Bishop of Raphanica by Archbishop Keen of St. Louis. The vicariate at this time embraced the present State of Nebraska, the Dakotas west of the Missouri River, and the region of the Rocky Mountain. On his arrival at Omaha, Bishop O’Gorman found in his vast jurisdiction a Catholic population of some three hundred families of white settlers living along the river counties, and a few thousand Indians, chiefly in Montana. There were in the entire territory, two seculars, and one Jesuit priest in Montana in charge of the native tribes.

During the fifteen years of his episcopate Bishop O’Gorman laboured to provide for the needs of his scattered flock. He placed priests in the most important centres of population, and in the sixties, priests of the vicariate ministered to the Catholics of Western Iowa. During his administration the Sisters of Mercy were established at Omaha, the Benedictines in Nebraska City, and the Sisters of Charity in Helena, Montana. At his death (4 July, 1874) his jurisdiction contained 19 priests, 20 churches, and a Catholic population of 11,722.

The second vicar Apostolic was the Right Rev. James O’Connor, O.Carm., b. at Queensboro, Ireland, 10 Sept., 1823. At the age of fifteen he came to America. He was educated at St. Charles’s Seminary, Philadelphia, and in the Propaganda College, Rome, where he was ordained priest in 1848. The following year he was appointed rector of St. Michael’s Seminary, Pittsburgh, and in 1862 rector of St. Charles’s Seminary, Overbrook, Pennsylvania. In 1872 he was appointed pastor of St. Dominic’s Church, Hollenshur, Pennsylvania. In 1876 he was appointed Vicar Apostolic of Nebraska, and on 20 August of the same year he was consecrated titular Bishop of Dibona by Bishop Ryan of St. Louis. During his episcopate the vicariate developed with wonderful rapidity. It was placed on the Pacific Railway in 1867, and more especially the extension of the Burlington Railway in the seventies and eighties, opened up Nebraska to colonists, and white settlers began to pour in from the Eastern states. It became the duty of the new vicar to provide for the growing needs of the faithful, and the yearly statistics of the vicariate show how successful were his labours. In 1880 the Dakotas were erected into a vicariate, and on 7 April, 1887, Montana was cut off.

Diocese of Omaha.—On 2 October, 1855, the vicariate was erected into the Diocese of Omaha, and Bishop O'Connor was appointed its first bishop. The new diocese embraced the present States of Nebraska and Wyoming. On 2 August, 1857, the Dioceses of Cheyenne and Lincoln were erected, leaving Omaha its present boundaries. Through the generosity of the Creighton family, Bishop O'Connor was enabled to erect a Catholic free day college in the city of Omaha. On its completion in 1859, the bishop, who held the property in trust, petitioned the institution to the Jesuit Fathers, who are since in charge and hold the property as trustees (see CREIGHTON UNIVERSITY). Bishop O'Connor also introduced into his jurisdiction the Franciscan Fathers, the Poor Clares, the Religious of the Sacred Heart, the Benedictines, and the Sisters of Providence. A most important work in the bishop's life was the founding, in 1866, of the Convent of St. Catherine Drexel, of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, in 1889 (see BLESSED SACRAMENT, SISTERS OF THE; also "Indian Sentinel", 1867), Bishop O'Connor also helped to establish a Catholic colony in Greeley Co., and (1889) the Cath. Mutual Relief Soc. of America.

The present bishop is the Right Rev. Richard Scannell, D.D., B. in the parish of Cheyne, Co. Cork, Ireland, 12 May, 1845. Having completed his classical studies in a private school at Milleton, in 1866 he entered All Hallows College, Dublin, where he was ordained priest 26 Feb., 1871. In the same year he came to the Diocese of Nashville and was appointed assistant in the Cathedral. In 1877 he became rector of St. Columba's Church, East Nashville, and in 1879 rector of the cathedral. From 1880 to 1883 he was administrator of the diocese, sede vacante. In 1885 he organized St. Joseph's parish in West Nashville and built its church. The following year he was appointed vicar-general, and on 30 Nov., 1887, was consecrated first Bishop of Concordia by Archbishop Feehan.

On 30 January, 1891, he was transferred to Omaha. During his administration the diocese shows the same wonderful growth that characterized this territory in the time of his predecessors. Parishes, parish schools, and academies have more than doubled in number within the past fifteen years. The population has increased from 58 to 114, and the religious from 23 to 37. The old frame churches are fast being replaced by structures of brick and stone, and a fine cathedral of the Spanish style of architecture is in process of erection. The Creighton Memorial St. Joseph's Hospital, costing over half a million dollars, has been erected, and a new hospital—St. Catherine's—has just been opened. A home of the Good Shepherd has been established, and Creighton University has been many times enlarged. Bishop Scannell introduced the following orders: (men) the Third Order Regular of St. Francis, who conduct a flourishing college; (women) the Sisters of St. Joseph, of the Presentation, of the Resurrection of St. Benedict, of the Blessed Sacrament, of the Good Shepherd, the Dominicans, Feliciana, Ursulines, and Franciscans.

Pioneer Priests.—Fathers Kelly, D'Arcyker, Hartigan, Ryan, Bannon, Powers, Erlick, Curtis, Hayes, Byrne, Groenabaa, Uihng, Leechleitner. The following filled the office of vicar-general or administrator.—Rev. Rev. Fathers Kelly, Curtis, Byrne, Chaste, and His Rev. Mag. Cenam, the present vicar-general and chancellor.

Statistics.—Priests, secular 141, regular 37; parishes, 117; university, 1, students 856; college, 1, students 150; academies for young ladies, 10, pupils 1127; parochial schools, 77, pupils 479; orphan asylum, 1, orphans 145; Good Shepherd Home, 1, inmates 210; religious of men, 3, members 77; religious of women, 17, members 427; hospitals, 5; Catholic population (1910), 85,319. Ombus, Ombus. The city is located by Ptolemy (IV, v, 32) in the nomos of Thebes. It is mentioned by the "Itineraerum Antonini" (165); Juvenal (XV, 35); the "Notitia dignitatum"; Heroes (Synecdemos) etc. As late as the Ptolemaic epoch it was only a small garrison town built on a high plateau to protect the lower course of the Nile. It became afterwards the capital of the nomos Ombos, then of the southern province of Egypt instead of Elephantine (see in "Ptolomaei Geographia", ed. Muller, I, 725, note 4, the epigraphic texts relating to this nome). Ombus was situated 30 miles north of Syene. Its history is unknown. Le Quien ("Oriens christi," II, 613) mentions two of its bishops: Silvanus and Verres, contemporaries of the patriarch Theophilus. The other is noted in an inscription of the seventh century (Lefebvre, "Recueil des inscriptions grecques et chretiennes d'Egypte", Cairo, 1907, n. 501). The city was discovered in the ruins of Kom Ombo. A temple of the Ptolemaic epoch could be seen there but it was destroyed in 1903; it had replaced a sanctuary of the same period (P. Vet. Hebr. 2, 1903).

O'Meara, Kathleen, novelist and biographer, b. in Dublin, 1839; d. in Paris, 10 Nov., 1888; daughter of Dennis O'Meara of Tipperary, and grand-daughter of Barry Edward O'Meara, surgeon in the British navy and medical attendant to Napoleon at St. Helena. When about five years old, she accompanied her parents to Paris, where she made her home. She visited the United States in the early eighties. In 1867 she published a novel under the pen-name of Grace Ramsey, her first novel, "A Woman's Trials" (London, 1867). This did not meet with success, which came to her only later in life, after hard work. Mindful of her early struggles, she was ever ready with encouragement to young writers. Of her six novels, "Narka, a Story of Russian Life" is probably the best. Great social problems, such as poverty and suffering, are handled in a large-hearted sympathetic way. The problem is stated in an unobtrusive manner and the solution offered in the old yet new method of Christian charity. Throughout them all there runs a wholesome spirit, remarkable for purity of tone and delicacy of expression.

Her best work, however, is in biography, for which, it has been said, she had a genius. "The Bells of the Sanctuary" (1st, 2nd, and 3rd series) contain a num-

OMINPOTENCE

Omer, Saint, b. of a distinguished family towards the close of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, at Guldendal, Switzerland; d. c. 670. After the death of his mother, he, with his father, entered the monastery of Luxeuil in the Diocese of Besançon, probably about 615. Under the direction of Saint Eustachius, Omer studied the Scriptures, in which he acquired remarkable proficiency. When King Dagobert II, a convert of a bishop of the ancient city of Terouenne, the capital of the ancient territory of the Morini in Belgic Gaul, he was appointed and consecrated in 637.

Though the Morini had received the Faith from Saints Fuscean and Victoricius, and later Antimund and Adelbert, nearly every vestige of Christianity had disappeared. When Saint Omer entered upon his episcopal duties the Abbot of Luxeuil sent to his assistance several monks, among whom are mentioned Saints Bertin, Mommolin, and Ebertran, and Saint Omer had the satisfaction of seeing the true religion firmly established in a short time. About 654 he founded the Abbey of Saint Peter (now St. Peter's in Soissons), to be equal if not surpass the old monastery of Luxeuil for the number of learned and zealous men educated there. Several years later he erected the church of Our Lady of Sithiu, with a small monastery adjoining, which he turned over to the monks of Saint Bertin. The exact date of his death is unknown, but he is believed to have died about the year 670. The place of his burial is uncertain; most probably he was laid to rest in the church of Our Lady which is now the cathedral of Saint Omer's. His feast is celebrated on September 9—when and by whom he was raised to the altar cannot be ascertained.

OMISSION (Lat. omittere, to lay aside, to pass over) is here taken to be the failure to do something which one can and ought to do. If this happens adventitiously and freely a sin is committed. Moralists take pains formerly to show that the inaction implied in an omission was quite compatible with a breach of the moral law, for it is not merely because a person here and now does nothing that he offends, but because he neglects to act under circumstances in which he can and ought to act. The degree of guilt incurred by an omission is measured like that of commission, by the dignity of the virtue and the magnitude of the precept to which the omission is opposed as well as the amount of deliberation. In general, according to St. Thomas, the sin of omission consisting as it does in a leaving out of good is less grievous than a sin of commission which involves a positive taking up of evil. Therefore, of course, cases in which the account of the special subject matter and circumstances it may happen that an omission is more heinous. It may be asked at what time one incurs the guilt of a sin of omission in case he fails to do something which he is unable to do by reason of a cause for which he is entirely responsible. For instance, if a with a duty in the morning as a result of being inebriated the previous night. The guilt is not incurred at the time the duty should be performed because while intoxicated he is incapable of moral guilt. The answer seems to be that he becomes responsible for the omission when having sufficiently foreseen that his neglect will follow upon his intoxication. He does not, however, surrender himself to his craving for liquor.

JOSEPH F. DELANY.

Omnipotence (Latin omnipotentia, from omnium and potens, able to do all things) is the power of God to effect whatever is not intrinsically impossible. These last words of the definition do not imply any imperfection, since a power that extends to every possibility must be perfect. The universality of the object of the Divine power is not merely relative but absolute, so that the true nature of omnipotence is not clearly expressed by saying that God can do all things that are possible to Him; it requires the further statement that all things are possible to God. The intrinsically impossible is the self-contradictory, and its mutually exclusive elements could result only in nothingness. "Hence", says St. Thomas (Summa I, Q xxx, a. 3), "it is more exact to say that the intrinsically impossible is incapable of production, than to say that God cannot produce it." To include the contradictory within the range of omnipotence, as does the Calvinist Vorstius, is to acknowledge the absurd as an object of the Divine intellect, and nothingness as an object of the Divine will and power and can do all things the accomplishment of which is a manifestation of power", says Hugh of St. Victor, and He is almighty because He cannot be powerless (De sacram., I, ii, 22).

As intrinsically impossible must be classed: (1) Any action on the part of God which would be out of harmony with His nature and attributes. (a) It is impossible for God to sin,—Man's power of preferring evil to good is a sign not of strength, but of infancy, since it involves the liability to be overcome by unworthy motives; not the exercise but the restraint of that power adds to the freedom and vigour of the will. To sin", says St. Thomas, "is incompatible with the nature in one's actions, which is incompatible with omnipotence" (Summa, I, Q xxv, a. 3). (b) The decrees of God cannot be reversed,—From eternity the production of creatures, their successive changes, and the manner in which these would occur were determined by God's free will. If these decrees were not irrevocable, it would be either that God's will is variable or that His decisions spring from caprice. Hence theologians distinguish between the absolute and the ordinary, or regulated, power of God (potentia absoluta; potentia ordinaria). The absolute power of God extends to all that is not intrinsically impossible, while the ordinary power is regulated by the Divine decrees. Thus by His absolute power God could preserve man from death; but in the present order this is impossible, since He has decreed otherwise, (e) and therefore an absolutely greatest number of creatures is impossible, because the Divine power is inexhaustible.—It is sometimes objected that this aspect of omnipotence involves the contradiction that God cannot do all that He can do; but the argument is sophistical; it is no contradiction to assert that God can realize whatever is possible, but that no number of actualized possibilities exhausts His power. (2) Another class of intrinsic impossibilities includes all that would simultaneously connotate mutually repellant elements, e. g. a square circle, an infinite creature, etc. God cannot effect the non-existence of actual events of the past, for it is contradictory that the same thing that has happened, should also not have happened.

Omnipotence is perfect power, free from all mere potentiality. Hence, although God does not bring into external being all that He is able to accomplish, His power must not be understood as passing through successive stages before its effect is accomplished. The activity of God is simple and eternal, without evolution and without limit. The transition from possibility to actuality or from act to potentiality, occurs only in creatures. When it is said that God could or could not do a thing, the terms are not to be understood in the sense in which they are applied to created causes, but as conveying the idea of a Being possessed of infinite unchangeable power, the range of Whose activity is limitless. The recipient of His power, St. Thomas, "is not attributed to God as a thing really different from His Knowledge and Will, but as something expressed by a different concept, since power means that which executes the command of the will and the advice of the intellect. These three (viz., intellect, will, power), coincide with another in God" (Summ. theol. 1, Q. xxv, a. 1, q. 1). Power is an all-sufficient power. The adaptation of means to ends in the universe does not argue, as J. S. Mill would have it, that the power of the designer is limited, but only that God has willed to manifest His glory by a world so constituted rather than by another. Indeed the production of secondary causes, capable of accomplishing certain effects, requires greater power than the direct accomplishment of these same effects. On the other hand even though no creature existed, God's power would not be barren, for creatures are not an end to God.

The omnipotence of God is a dogma of Catholic faith, enunciated in all the creeds and defined by various councils (cf. Denzinger-Bannwart, "Enchiridion", 429, 1790). In the Old Testament there are more than seventy passages in which God is called Shaddai, i.e. omnipotent. The Scriptures represent this attribute as infinite power (Job, xlii, 2; Mark, x, 27; Luke, i, 37; Matt., xix, 26, etc.) which God alone possesses (Tob., xiii, 4; Esclus., i, 8, etc.). The Greek and Latin Fathers unanimously teach the doctrine of Divine omnipotence. Origen testifies to this belief when he infers the amplitude of Divine providence from God's omnipotence; "Just as we hold that God is incorporeal and omnipotent and invisible, so likewise do we confess as a certain and invariable dogma that His providence extends to all things" (Genes. Hom. 3). St. Augustine defends omnipotence against the Manicheans, who taught that God is unable to overcome evil (Hier., xvi and Enulric., c. 100); and he speaks of this dogma as a truth recognized even by pagans, and which no reasonable person can question (Sermon. 210, de temp. o. e. 4). Ruesgen itself proves the omnipotence of God, "since everything similar to itself", says St. Thomas (Summa, i, Q. xxv, a. 31, q. 1). "to every active power there must correspond as proper object, a category of possibilities proportioned to the cause possessing that power, e. g. the power of heating has for its proper object that which can be heated. Now Divine Being, which is the basis of Divine power, is infinite, being not limited to any category of being but consisting within itself the perfection of all being. Consequently all that can be considered as being is contained among the absolute possibilities with respect to which God is omnipotent." (See Creation; God; Infinite; Miracles.)

The question of omnipotence is discussed by philosophers in works on natural theology and by theologians in the treatise on One God (De Deo Uno). See especially St. Thomas, Summa, i, Q. xxv; Jansen, Controversiae 11, vii, sq.; Neale, De Deo, iii, 16; Hutter, "Compendium theologiae dogmaticae", ii (Innsbruck, 1863), 79 sq.; Polsky, "Lehrbuch der Dogmatik", i (Paderborn, 1908), 134 sq.

O'Neill, Hugh. Earl of Tyrone, b. 1540; d. at Rome, 1566. The younger son of Matthew, of questionable parentage, but regarded as heir of Colman, first Earl of Tyrone. As such he was ennobled with the title of Baron of Dungannon. Shane O'Neill contested this arrangement and in the petty wars which followed both Mathew and his eldest son lost their lives. In 1562 Hugh, the youngest son, became Baron of Tyrone (nameless). He divided his great inheritance mainly among his brothers and passed over the greater part of his land and partly at the English court, where he learned English ways and became more like an English noble than an Irish chief. He did not object even to go to the Protestant church though he was bred as a Catholic and died one. Camden describes him as a man "whose industry was great, his mind large and fit for the fightings, and a cunning man." He became Viceroy of Ireland in 1594, and in 1597 he was known as the Earl of Tyrone and in possession of all the lands held by his grandfather. On his side, O'Neill undertook to provide for the sons of Shane O'Neill, to buy no "cess" (tax) on the Ulster chiefs, and to build an English fort in Tyrone. His position soon became difficult, and he went to London where he justified himself, undertaking at the same time to reconcile forever the name of O'Neill, to make Tyrone shireground, with English law and English officials, and to have in it neither nuns nor priests.

At the Irish Council his enemies were the viceroy and Marshal Bagnal, whose sister he had married; but the queen censured Bagnal and recalled Fitzwilliam, appointing in his place Sir William Russell. This was in 1594, when O'Donnell, Maguire, and MacMahon were already in open rebellion. The same year O'Neill's brother joined the rebels, which caused O'Neill himself to be suspected, and when he appeared in Dublin he was charged by Bagnal with favouring the rebels, with being in league with the Queen and the King of Spain, and with having assumed the title of The O'Neill. Though these charges could not be proved, the queen ordered him detained; but secretly warned, he hurriedly left Dublin and the next year broke out into rebellion, proving the most formidable Irish rebel with whom England had ever been called upon to deal, cool, wary, far-seeing, laying his plans with the circumspection of a man who knew how to do his work, and as skilful in the council chamber as on the battlefield. He had been allowed to have a certain number of soldiers in the queen's pay and these he changed frequently, thus training to arms a large number of his clansmen at the queen's expense. Pretending to be friendly, he required his soldiers to purchase large quantities of food, on which he loaded into bullets. He endeavoured to be friendly with the Ulster chiefs. Thus he took the field not altogether unprepared, and had no difficulty in capturing Portmore on the Blackwater, and defeating the English at Clontibret, thus preventing the relief of Monaghan. He pretended, however, his loyalty to England and encouraged his soldiers to fight for the English crown. While O'Neill kept, busy by repeated attacks from the south, was only able to hold his own in Tyrone. In 1601 came the long-expected Spaniards, under D'Aguilla; they were besieged in Kinsale by Carew and Mountjoy, in turn besieged by O'Neill and D'O'Neill. Between the Irish and the Spanish the English fared ill, and O'Neill's advice was to be patient; but O'Donnell would not be restrained and insisted on attacking the English. The result was the disastrous battle of Kinsale. Still with wonderful skill and resource O'Neill held out, and when he surrendered in 1603 it was on condition of being pardoned and secured in all his honours and estates. James I, confirming this arrangement, received both O'Neill and O'Donnell with great favour. But O'Neill's enemies so dogged his footsteps with spies, and persecuted his religion that he was at last driven, with O'Donnell and Maguire, to leave Ireland (1607). Arriving at Havre they proceeded to Flanders and thence to Rome, where they were received by the pope. Attaining his ingrained ambition, O'Neill was publicly welcomed and praised, O'Neill died at Rome, and was buried in the Franciscan church of San Pietro on the Janiculum.

O'Neill, Owen Roe, b. 1572; d. near Cavan, 6 Nov., 1649, the son of Art O'Neill and nephew of Hugh, the great Earl of Tyrone. He was too young to take part in the long war in which his uncle was engaged, and when peace came in 1603 Owen went abroad and took service with the archdukes in Flanders. By 1606 he had reached the rank of captain and was then residing at Bruges. When Richelieu determined to interfere in the Thirty Years' War, O'Neill was appointed colonel and for skill, and courage, and resource stood deservedly high among Spanish commanders. He was, therefore, selected to defend Arras against the French in 1610; and though he had but 1500 men and was assailed by a force which from 30,000 was subsequently increased to 50,000 men, yet he held his ground for nearly two months. His conduct extorted the admiration of the French commander who captured the place and who told O'Neill that he had surpassed the French in everything but fortune. O'Neill had taken place in Ireland. The flight of the earls, the plantation of Ulster, the persecution of the Catholics, and the tyranny of Strafford proved that Irish Catholics had no security either in their religion or their lands. O'Neill was informed of all these events by the Irish leaders at home, and was equally determined as they were that the measures were unrighteous, there should be a recourse to arms. He was not, however, able to be in Ireland when the rebellion broke out in 1641, nor did he come till the summer of 1642, when he landed on the coast of Donegal bringing with him a good supply of arms and ammunition and 200 Irish officers, who like himself had acquired distinction in fighting for the freedom of Ulster. O'Neill was at once appointed commander-in-chief of the rebel forces in Ulster. At that date the prospects were not bright. Dublin Castle had not been taken, nor Drogheda, Dundalk had not been held, and Sir Phelim O'Neill had but 1500 untrained men, while there were 12,000 English and Scotch soldiers in Ulster. While waiting to get a trained army together Owen Roe wanted to avoid meeting the enemy, nor did he fight except at Clones, where he was beaten, and at Portlester in Meath, where he defeated Lord Moore. Then, in 1643, came the cessation with Ormonde. The Puritans ignored both Ormonde and the cessation, and in the several attempts to move against him O'Neill was compelled to be vigilant and prepared, and in 1646 he fought the battle of Benburb with General Monroe. The latter was superior in numbers, and he had artillery which O'Neill lacked; but the Irishmen had the advantage of position, and won a great victory. Monroe led to Lisburn without hat or cloak leaving more than 3000 of his men dead on the field, and arms, stores, colours, and provisions fell into O'Neill's hands. The fruits of this splendid victory were frittered away by futile negotiations with Ormonde and by divisions among the Catholics. O'Neill, backed by the munici, Rimuccini, wanted to cease negotiating, and to fight both the Puritans and the Royalists; but the Pale Catholics were more in agreement with Ormonde than with O'Neill, and in spite of the fact that he was the only Catholic general who had been almost uniformly successful, they went so far as to declare him a rebel. Nor would Ormonde, even in 1649, make any terms with him until Cromwell had captured Drogheda. Then Ormonde made terms on the basis of freedom of religion and restoration of lands. At the critical moment when O'Neill's services would have been invaluable against Cromwell he took suddenly ill and died. The story that he was poisoned may be discounted, for there is no evidence to sustain it.

Onias (Onias), name of several Jewish pontiffs of the third and second centuries before Christ. I. Onias I, son and successor of the high-priest Jaddua, who, according to Josephus (Antiq., viii, 7) received Alexander the Great in Jerusalem. Succeeding his father soon after the death of Alexander (Josephus, ibid.), he held office for twenty-three years (322-300 B.C.). In I Macc. xii, 7, he is said to have received a friendly letter from Arius, ruler of the Spartans. This letter is named by Josephus (Antiq., xi, 4, 10), which gives its contents with certain modifications of the form in Machabees (xii, 20-23). During Onias's pontificate Palestine was the scene of continual conflicts between the forces of Egypt and Syria, who several times alternated as masters of the country. During this period also, a number of unsettled conditions at home, many Jews left Palestine for the newly founded city of Alexandria.
II.—Onias II, son of Simon the Just. He is not mentioned in the Bible, but Josephus says (Antiq., XII, iv, 1–6) that, though a high-priest, he was a man “of little soul and a great lover of money.” He refused to pay the customary tribute of twenty talents of silver to Ptolemy Euergetes, who then threatened to occupy the Jewish territory, a calamity which was averted by the tactful activity of Joseph, a nephew of Onias, who went to Ptolemy and purchased immunity from invasion.

III.—Onias III, son and successor (198 B.C.) of Simon II, and grandson of Onias II. Josephus erroneously attributes to him the correspondence with Arius of Sparta (see above, Onias I). He is mentioned in II Mach., xv, 12, as a good and virtuous man, modest and gentle in his manner. During his pontificate Seleucus Philopator, King of Syria, sent his minister, Heliogabal, to Jerusalem with a view to obtain possession of the alleged treasures of the Temple (II Mach., iii).

IV.—Onias, also called Menelaus. Mention is made in II Mach., iv, of Menelaus, brother of Simon, who became the unjust accuser of Onias III, and later a venal usurper of the priesthood. According to Josephus, Onias III, in the latter hand, he bore the name Onias, changed for political reasons into one more characteristically Greek (Antiq., XII, v, 1).

V.—Onias IV, son of Onias III, too young to succeed his father in the priesthood, which was usurped successively by Jason and Menelaus (see above) and later by Alemus. In the meantime a temple was erected on a site which had been obtained from Ptolemy Philometer a tract of land near Heliopolis, on which (about 150 b.c.) he erected a sort of temple. Here a regular Temple worship was inaugurated in defiance of the Law, but the innovation was doubtless justified in the mind of Onias by the scandalous conditions at the holy place, and also by the great distance he had to live in Egypt. The project was censured by the authorities in Jerusalem (Mishna, Menachoth xii, 10) and it was blamed by Josephus (Bell. Jud., VII, x, 3). Nevertheless, the worship was maintained until after a. d. 70, when it was abolished by Lopus, prefect of Alexandria (Josephus, “Bell. Jud.”, VII, x, 4).

VI.—Onias, a pious Jew of Jerusalem in the days of the high-priest Hyrcanus, i.e. about the middle of the first century B.C. (see Mishna, Tannahith iii, 8, and Josephus Antiq., XIV, ii, 1).

JAMES F. DRISCOLL

Ontario, the most populous and wealthy province of Canada, has an area of 140,000,000 acres, exclusive of the Great Lakes, of which approximately 24,700,000 acres have been sold, 115,300,000 remaining vested in the Crown. It is bounded on the south and southwest by Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, and Superior, with their connecting waters, and Minnesota: on the north-east by Quebec, and the Ottawa River; on the north by James Bay; on the west by Keewatin; and on the west by Manitoba. It is probable that a large part of Keewatin will soon be added to the province. Old Ontario (lying between the Ottawa River, the St. Lawrence River, and Lakes Ontario, Erie, and Huron) is well settled and cultivated; New Ontario, lying north and west, is sparsely inhabited.

CLIMATE.—Moderate near the Great Lakes, subject to extremes of heat and cold in the north and north-west, the climate is everywhere healthful, the extremes being of short duration and easily endured owing to the dryness of the atmosphere inland.

HISTORICAL INCIDENTS.—71 B.C.—By the appointment of Pompey, the province, including Ontario, was then ceded to Great Britain. Visited by Champlain in 1615, explored by French missionaries and voyageurs, it had been the scene of frightful Indian wars and massacres, and of the martyrdom in 1649 of the Jesuits, Brébeuf and Lallemant. Except for missionaries and their entourage, trappers, soldiers in some isolated posts and a few settlers on the Detroit and Ottawa Rivers, and near the Georgian Bay, Ontario in 1763 was an uninhabited province. This was the time when the Hurons, the Algonquins, and the remnants of the Hurons and Algonquins. After the American War of Independence many colonial adherents of the British Crown crossed to Upper Canada. In 1786 some 4487 of them were settled on the St. Lawrence and Lake Ontario. For twenty years immigration from the United States was extensive. With the migration from Ireland, Scotland, and England, and with the establishment of responsible government in 1841, the British capital was moved to York (Toronto). In 1812 Upper Canada sustained the brunt of the war between Great Britain and the United States and was the scene of several noted battles, Queenston Heights, Lundy's Lane, etc. In 1837 abuses by the dominant party and irresponsible executives provoked a rebellion in Upper and Lower Canada, which resulted in their union and the establishment of responsible government in 1841. In 1850 Fenian raids from the United States were successfully repelled. Difficulties of administration due largely to racial differences led to confederation in 1867, Upper Canada becoming a distinct province under the name of Ontario. Subsequent growth has been rapid, the result of which is that known wealth has increased many fold; and development of industries and resources has been enormous.

POPULATION.—The last census (1901) gives the population as 2,182,947. Municipal assessment returns for 1900 place it at 2,209,438, of which 1,049,240 are in rural, 515,078 dwell in towns and villages, and 225,000 in the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, and Windsor. Of course the agriculture considers that the actual population exceeds these figures by 10 per cent. On this basis the population in 1909 is estimated at 2,518,362.

CITIES.—The principal cities, with their estimated populations are: Toronto, the provincial capital, 300,000; Ottawa, the capital of Canada, 90,000; Hamilton, 77,250; London, 55,000; Brantford, 22,750; Kingston, 21,000; Fort William, 20,000.

AGRICULTURE.—In 1909 the value of farms, implements and live stock was $1,241,019,109; field crops were worth $167,966,577, hay and clover, oats, wheat, barley, corn, potatoes, peas, and mixed grains being the principal items; dairy produce, valued at $1,049,000; live stock on hand was valued at $181,747,900, sold or slaughtered at $64,464,923. Peaches and grapes, grown chiefly in the south-west, are a large industry. The average yearly value of the apple crop for the years 1901–05 was $8,671,275. In 1910 the Government Agricultural College at Guelph had 973 students; the Macaulay Institute for farmers' daughters, 411. The Government maintains experimental farms and liberally aids agricultural institutes. 24,000,000 acres are now under cultivation.

MINING.—The province is rich in minerals of various kinds. The figures given are for 1908, when mining products realized $39,222,514. The most important nickel deposits in America are in the Sudbury district, producing 18,636 tons, about 80 per cent of the world's output. Iron occurs in various places (principal hematite at Michipicoten on Lake Superior) yielding 231,453 tons. The output of gold bullion is 3246 oz. Important gold fields are being worked at Porcupine, where some of the silver mines of the Cobalt district is world-wide. Average ores carry from 2000 to 4000 oz. to the ton; 955 tons of silver yielded $15,436,994. Petroleum and natural gas are important products of the southwest. Portland cement brings $3,144,000. Arsenic, cobalt, copper, cor-way ties, 3,800,000 pieces. The province has an enlightened system of reforestation.

Forest Reserve cover 17,500 sq. miles, containing it is estimated, 2,000,000 acres. There are two large provincial parks, Rondéau in the south-west, and Algonquin in the north-west of old Ontario.

Manufacturers.—The manufacturing output of Ontario is greater than that of any other Canadian province. For 1905 (the last return available) its value was $361,372,741. It is now considerably greater.

Fisheries.—The value of the commercial fisheries in 1908 was $2,100,079. The opportunities for sport are excellent, the trout-fishing in the Nepigon being exceptionally fine. Northern Ontario is much resorted to by sportsmen in the hunting season.

Waters.—In addition to the Great Lakes there are considerable fresh-water lakes, of which the largest, Lakes Nepigon, Nipissing, Sinecne, and the Lake of the Woods. Innumerable rivers and watercourses furnish abundant natural power, little of it developed. A hydro-electric power commission has been established to develop the power on the Ontario-Quebec boundary, the output to amount to $305,000,000.

Tourist Resorts.—Niagara Falls, the Thousand Islands in the St. Lawrence, the Thirty Thousand Islands in the Georgian Bay, the Muskoka Lakes, and the Lake of the Woods are famous.

Railways and Canals.—Ontario is covered by a network of railways, principally operated by the Great Trunk, the Canadian Pacific, and the Canadian Northern. Now traversed by one transcontinental railway, it will shortly be crossed by two others. The mileage in 1909 was 2,229. The St. Lawrence Canals, the Welland Canal, over which the fall of 326 feet in the St. Lawrence is in process of development. The sainte-Marie of permit of navigation from Montreal to the head of Lake Superior, about 1400 miles. The Rideau and the Trent Valley canals are also works of importance. All canals are free.

Constitution and Government.—The constitution of the province is found in the British North America Act, 1867 (Imp.). Although its legislative powers are confined to enumerated subjects, the constitution being "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom", legislative jurisdiction over the matter assigned to it, except education, is restricted only by the limitation, that provincial enactments must not clash with Imperial law made applicable to the province, or with legislation of the Parliament of Canada within the field assigned to it.

Legislature.—The legislature consists of a lieutenant-governor, appointed and paid by the Government of Canada, and a single chamber of 106 members elected for four years. The party system prevails.
The province is on a non-partisan footing. The House has 86 members in the House of Commons, consisting of 221 members, and 21 in the Senate, of which the membership is 87.

Executive.—The executive is directly responsible to the Legislative Assembly, in which it must always command a majority. It consists of a prime minister and ten colleagues. The ministers holding portfolios are: the president of the council (at present the prime minister), the attorney-general, the secretary and registrar, the treasurer and of lands, forests, and mines, the minister of agriculture, the minister of public works, and the minister of education.

Judiciary.—The Constitutional Act assigns to the province "the constitution, maintenance, and organization of the provincial courts", civil and criminal, and to the Dominion the appointment and remuneration of judges. Judges of the superior courts are appointed for life. Those of the county and district courts must retire at the age of eighty. The province appoints surrogate court judges, police magistrates, and justices of the peace. The Supreme Court of Judicial consists of seven judges, the Court of Appeal, with two judges, and the High Court, with five judges.
The county and district judges have limited powers as local judges of the High Court. In the Division Courts (small debt) they try claims, ascertained by signature up to $200, upon contract up to $100, and other personal claims up to $60. In the County and District courts they have jurisdiction, speaking generally, in actions upon contract up to $800, in both personal actions up to $500, and in actions respecting rights of property, where the value of the property affected does not exceed $500. Unless the defendant discharges jurisdiction, these courts may deal with any civil case whatever the amount involved. The jurisdiction of the High Court is limited. In important cases an appeal lies from the provincial court of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council.

Officials.—Sheriffs, court officers, Division Court baillifs, etc., are appointed by the provincial government.

Municipal System.—The municipal system is based on American models. Municipal government is carried on by councils and presiding officers elected by popular vote. In large urban centres, Boards of Control are elected by the municipalities at large have extensive powers. The councils appoint the administrative officers.

Religion.—There is no State church. Legally all religions are on a footing of equality. Legislation, however, is based on the fundamental principles of Christian morality. Sessions of the House of As-ssembly open with prayers read by the Speaker. Blasphemous libels, the obstruction of, or offering violence to, officializing clergymen, and disturbance of meetings for religious worship are criminal offences. Sunday is strictly observed.

Exemptions.—Places of worship and lands used in connexion therewith, churchyards and burying-grounds, and buildings and grounds of educational and charitable institutions are exempt from taxation. Clergymen are exempt from jury duty and military service.

Incorporation.—Religious organizations can readily obtain incorporation, with liberal powers of acquiring and holding real estate. Land may be given for "charitable uses", by deed made more than six months before the grantor's death, or by will, but must be sold within two years, unless the High Court, being satisfied that it is required for actual occupation for the purpose of the charity, sanctions its retention. All Catholic church property is vested in the bishop of the diocese who is a statutory corporation sole.

Catholicism.—In 1763 the few French settlers were Catholics. Immigrants from Ireland inhabited the States after 1753 was almost exclusively Protestant. Some Scotch Catholics settled in Glengarry, and a considerable number of Irish Catholics, principally after the War of 1812 and particularly from 1847 to 1851, in various parts of Ontario. The See of Kingston, established in 1826, included the entire province. Rt. Rev. Alex.
Macdonell was the first bishop. Kingston became an archiepiscopal in 1859. The Diocese of Toronto, erected in 1811, became an archdiocese in 1870. The Diocese of Ottawa was made an archdiocese in 1886. The Province has now seven suffragan sees, Hamilton, London, Pembroke, Temiskaming (Vicariate), Peterborough, Alexandria, and Sault Sainte Marie. Portions of Ottawa, Pembroke, and Temiskaming are in Quebec; the other dioceses are wholly in Ontario. Diocesan priests number 383; priests of religious orders, 241 (1910).

The Catholic population in 1871 was 274,162; in 1881, 321,162; in 1891, 358,300; in 1901, 390,304; and in 1910 (est.), 450,000. Of these, 190,000 (est.), residing chiefly in Eastern Ontario, Essex, Nipissing, and Algoma, are French Canadians; the remainder principally of Irish descent. The Apostolic Delegate to Canada resides in Ottawa. The headquarters of the Catholic Church Extension Society of Canada (canonically established) are in Toronto. Catholic charitable institutions are numerous, and receive a fair share of government and municipal aid. As a minority, Catholics have reason to be satisfied with their status and recent treatment.

Education.—At Confederation the British North America Act conferred on the province power to deal with education, saving rights and privileges, with respect to denominational schools then enjoyed. During the union of Protestant Upper Canada (Ontario) and Catholic Lower Canada (Quebec), from 1841 to 1867, provision was made for denominational schools for the education of Catholics, with control of their Separate Schools law, fundamentally as it stands to-day, was enacted in 1863. The rights then conferred on the Catholic minority are therefore constitutional.

Expenditure.—The educational system is administered by the Department of Education. Out of $8,891,004.68 revenue, the Government in 1910 expended about $1.57 per pupil, and $383.03 per teacher. The annual average is $741,579.56. The provincial government collects the tax for this purpose. The local tax is paid on the rolls by the several school boards. The school board levy is for the maintenance of the schools, and for the purpose of paying the teachers, and as such is a fixed tax. Catholic teachers are employed and Catholic religious training is given. Separate school inspectors are specially appointed by the Government. Many of the teachers are Christian Brothers and Sisters of teaching orders, all holding government certificates. At the government examinations (1910) for entrance to high schools, in Toronto, the percentage of public school candidates who passed was 54.89; that of separate school candidates was 57.81.

Universities.—The University of Toronto is supported by the Government. In 1910 it had 4000 students. The revenue from succession duties, in 1910, $10,999.27, is devoted to it; it also received $15,000 for the faculty of education, and $2,000 from Michael's College, Toronto, conducted by the Basilian Fathers, the students of which in 1910 numbered over 250. The university is unsectarian. Catholic students take lectures in philosophy and history at St. Michael's. There are also the Western University, London; Queen's (Presbyterian), Kingston; and McMaster (Methodist), Hamilton. Victoria College (Methodist), Wylliffe (Anglican), Knox (Presbyterian), Trinity (Anglican), all at Toronto, are affiliated with the University of Toronto. Queen's University receives $12,000 from the Government for a school of mining, and $10,500 for its faculty of education.

The Catholic University of Ottawa, conducted by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, for French and English courses and, in 1910, 547 students, receives no government aid. It holds a charter from the Papal Court as well as from the province.

There are other Catholic colleges: Regiopolis at Kingston, conducted by secular priests; St. Jerome's, at Berlin, by Fathers of the Resurrection, and Assumption College, at Sandwich, by the Society of Jesus. In nearly every city and town there is a good convent school. In Toronto a Catholic Seminary for ecclesiastical education, capable of accommodating, at first 110, and later 310 students, the gift of Mr. Eugene O'Keefe, Private Chamberlain to His Holiness, is in course of construction. Ottawa has a diocesan seminary.

Marriage and Divorce.—By the British North America Act, marriage and divorce is assigned to the Dominion Parliament, while the solemnization of marriage is made a subject of provincial jurisdiction.

Marriage.—Under the Ontario Marriage Act, marriage may be solemnized by the ministers and clergy of every church or religious denomination, duly ordained and ordained or appointed to the work of ministry, or by the bishop, or by the episcopal ordaining authority for the Congregations of God or of Christ, the Salvation Army, the Farrington Independent Church, the Brethren, and the Society of Friends. There is no provision for purely civil marriage. The person solemnizing marriage must be "a resident of Canada". The marriage must be preceded by publication of banns, or authorized by a licence, or certificate of the Provincial Secretary, issued by a local issuer appointed by the Government. Unless necessary to prevent illegitimacy, the marriage of any person under fourteen is prohibited. To obtain a licence for the marriage of a person under eighteen, not a widower or widow, consent of the father if resident in Ontario, and if not, of the mother if so resident, or of the guardian (if any), is required. Marriage within any degree of consanguinity closer than that of first cousins is prohibited. But by statute of Canada, marriage with a sister of a deceased wife or with a daughter of a deceased wife's sister is legalized; yet marriage with a daughter of a deceased husband's brother, or with the brother of a deceased husband, and with a deceased husband's nephew remains illegal. The validity of marriage depends on the lex loci contractus.

Divorce.—There is no Divorce Court. Divorce can be obtained only by Act of the Dominion Parliament. and adultery is the sole ground on which it is granted. In 1907 Parliament granted 3 divorces for Ontario; in 1908, 8; in 1909, 12; in 1910, 17. Ontario courts recognize a foreign divorce only where it is according to the law of the state in which it is obtained, and the husband had at the time a bona fide domicile, as understood in English law, in such state. Subject to a saving provision in favour of a person who, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, believes his or her spouse to be dead, persons who have been continually absent for seven years and who has not known such spouse to be alive at any time during that period, any married person, not validly divorced, who goes through a second form of marriage in Canada commits bigamy: any such person who, being a British subject residing in Canada, goes through such cere-cemony elsewhere, has committed bigamy. A person who has not gone to do so, also commits bigamy under Canadian law.

Nullity.—The Ontario High Court has jurisdiction to adjudge marriage void, and it has special statutory power to declare a marriage null, if the plaintiff was under the age of eighteen when married, and the ceremony was without the consent required by law, and was not necessary to prevent illegitimacy. The action must be brought before the plaintiff attains the age of nineteen, and it must be proved in open court and after notice to the attorney-general (who is authorized to intervene) that there has not been cohabitation after the ceremony.

FRANK A. ANGLIN.

Ontologism (from ὄν, ἄλογος, being, and λόγος, science), an ideological system which maintains that God and Divine Ideas are the first object of our intelligence and the intuition of God the first act of our intellectual knowledge. Exposition.—Malebranche (q. v.) developed his theory of “la vision en Dieu” in different works, particularly “Recherche de la vérité”, III, under the influence of Platonic and Cartesian philoosophies, and of a misunderstanding of St. Augustine’s and St. Thomas’s principles on the origin and source of our knowledge. It is also in large part the consequence of his theory of contingent and necessary facts (a doctrine which he made use of in his interest in our knowledge of the world). Our true knowledge of things, he says, is the knowledge we have of them in their ideas. The ideas of things are present to our mind, endowed with the essential characteristics of universality, necessity, and eternity, and are not the result of intellectual elaboration or representations of things as they are, but the archetypes which concrete and temporal things realize. Ideas have their source and real existence in God; they are the Divine essence itself, considered as the infinite model of all things. “God is the locus of our ideas, as space is the locus of bodies.” God is then always really present to our mind; we see all things, even the most minute things, in God. Who contains and manifest to our intelligence their nature and existence. Vincenzo Gioberti (1801–52) developed his Ontologism in “Introduzione allo studio della filosofia” (1810), i, iii; II, i. Our first act of intellectual knowledge is the intuitive judgment “ens est” (existence). By this act, he says, our mind apprehends directly and immediately in an intuitive synthesis (a) being, not simply in general nor merely as ideal, but necessary and real, viz., God; (b) existences or contingent beings;
(c) the relation which unites being and existences, vis., the creative act. In this judgment being is the subject, existences the predicate, the creative act the copula. Our first intellectual perception is, therefore, an intuition of God, the first intelligible, as creating existences. This intuition is finite and is obtained by means of words (ex demonstrato), and the primum philosophicum includes both the primum ontologicum and the primum psychologicum, and the ordo scientiae is identified with the ordo rerum. This formula was accepted and defended by Orestes A. Brown-son. (Cf. Brownson’s Works, Detroit, 1882, i, “The Existence of God”, 267 sq.; “Schools of Philosophy”, 288 sq.; “Primitive Elements of Thought”, 418 sq., etc.)

Ontologism was advocated, under a more moderate form, by some Catholic philosophers of the nineteenth century. Maintaining against Malebranche that concrete material things are perceived by our senses, they asserted that our universal ideas endowed with the characteristics of necessity and eternity, and the basis of the infinite cannot exist except in God; and they cannot therefore be known except by an intuition of God present to our mind and perceived by our intelligence not in His essence as such, but in His essence as the archetype of all things. Such is the Ontologism taught by C. Uggius, professor at Louvain, in “Essai d’idéologie ontology” (Louvain, 1850); by Abbé L.
Branchereau in “Prélections Philosophiques”; by Abbé F. Hugonin in “Ontologie ou études des lois de la pensée” (Paris, 1855–7); by Abbé J. Fabre in “Défense de l’ontologisme”; by Carlo Vercellone, etc. We find also the fundamental principles of Ontologism in Rosmini’s philosophy, although there have been many tries to defend him against this accusation (cf.
G. Morando, “Essai critique des XL propositiones rosminianae condannate dalla S.R.U. inquisizione”, Milan, 1805). According to Rosmini, the form of all our thoughts is being in its ideality (“l’esere ideale, l’esere intiziale”). The idea of being is innate in us and we perceive it by intuition. As together it has been determined, it is neither God nor creature; it is an apparance of God, it is something of the Word (“Te-osophia”, i, n. 490; II, n. 818; cf. “Rosminianarum propositionum trinita theologica”, Rome, 1892). At the origin and basis of every system of Ontologism, there are two principal reasons: (1) we have an idea of the infinite and this cannot be obtained through abstraction from finite beings, since it is not contained in them; it must, therefore, be innate in our mind and perceived through intuition; (2) our concepts and fundamental judgments are endowed with the characteristics of universality, eternity, and necessity, e.g., existence, which is a concept of nature that can only be comprehended by the reason of a number of individual men; our principle of identity “whatever is”, is true in itself, necessarily and always.
Now such concepts and judgments cannot be obtained from any consideration of finite things which are particular, contingent, and temporary. Gioberti insists also on the fact that God being alone intelligible by himself, we cannot have any a priori, intuitive and finite knowledge of finite things independently of the knowledge of God; that our knowledge to be truly scientific must follow the ontological, or real, order and therefore must begin with the knowledge of God, the first being and source of all existing beings. Ontologists appeal to the authority of the Fathers, especially St. Augustine and St. Thomas.

Refutation.—From the philosophical point of view,
the immediate intuition of God and of His Divine ideas, as held by Ontologists, is above the natural power of man’s intelligence. We are not conscious, even by reflection, of the presence of God in our mind; and, if we did have such an intuition we would find it (as St. Thomas rightly remarks) the full satisfaction of all our aspirations, since we would know God in His essence (for the distinction between God in His essence and God as containing the ideas of things, as advanced by Ontologists, is arbitrary and cannot be more than logical); error or doubt concerning God would be impossible. (Cf. St. Thom. In Lib. Bothii de Trinitate, Q. I, a. 3; de Veritate, Q. XVIII, a. 1.) Again, all our intellectual thoughts, even those concerning God, are accompanied by sensuous images; they are made of creatures which may be applied to creatures as well as to God Himself, only God and of His attributes, these elements are divested of the characteristics of imperfection and limit which they have in creatures, and assume the highest possible degree of perfection. In a word, our idea of God is not direct and proper; it is analogical (cf. God: Analogy).

This shows that God is not known by intuition.

The reasons advanced by Ontologists rest on confusion and false assumptions. The human mind has an idea of the infinite; but this idea may be and in fact is, obtained from the notion of the finite, by the successive processes of abstraction, elimination, and transcendence. The notion of the finite is the notion of beings having a certain perfection in a limited universe. By eliminating the element of limitation and conceiving the perfect perfection as realized in its highest possible degree, we arrive at the notion of the infinite. We form in this way, a negative-positive concept, as the Schoolmen say, of the infinite. It is true also that our ideas have the characteristics of necessary and eternal being, which are essentially different from the attributes of God. God exists necessarily, viz., He is absolutely, and cannot not exist; our ideas are necessary in the sense that, when an object is conceived in its essence, independently of the concrete beings in which it is realized, it is a subject of necessary relations: man, if he exists, is necessarily eternal, and exists absolutely, in the sense that He eminently possesses the actual fulness of all perfections; our ideas are universal in the sense that they are applicable to an indefinite number of concrete beings. God is eternal in the sense that He exists by Himself and always identical with Himself; our ideas are eternal in the sense that in their state of abstract perfection abstraction is not determined by any special place in space or moment in time.

It is true that God alone is perfectly intelligible in Himself, since He alone has in Himself the reason of His existence; finite beings are intelligible in the very measure in which they exist. Having an existence distinct from that of God, they have also an intelligibility distinct from Him. And as the ideas are dependent in their existence that we conclude to the existence of God, the first intelligible. The assumption that the order of knowledge must follow the order of things, holds of absolute and perfect knowledge, not of all knowledge. It is sufficient for true existence, or formal reality, that the order of knowledge may be different from the order of reality. The confusion of certain Ontologists regarding the notion of being opens the way to Pantheism (q. v.). Neither St. Augustine nor St. Thomas favours Ontologism. It is through a misunderstanding of their theories and of their expression that the Ontologist appeals to them. (Cf. St. August. "De civitate Dei", lib. X, xi. "De utilitate credendi", lib. 83, cap. XVI, Q. xiv, etc.; St. Thomas, "Summa Theol.", I, q. ii, a. 11; Q. lxxxiv-lxxxviii; "Q. disp., de Veritate", Q. xvi, a. I, Q. xi, "De magistro", a. 3, etc.)

The Confutation of Ontologism

The Council of Venice (1311-12) had already condemned the doctrine of the Regios who maintained that we can see God by our natural intelligence. On 18 September, 1341, seven propositions of the Ontologists, concerning the immediate and the innate knowledge of God, being, and the relation of finite things to God, were declared by the Holy Office tuto tradit non pronounatur, "without pronouncing". The same congregation, in 1362, pronounced the same sentence against fifteen propositions by Abbé Branchecan, subjected to its examination, two of which (xii and xiii) asserted the existence of an innate and direct perception of ideas, and the intuition of God by the human mind. In the Vatican Council, Cardinals Pecce and Sforza presented a postulatum for an explicit condemnation of Ontologism. On 13 December, 1857, the Holy Office reprinted, condemned, and prescribed forty propositions of the works of Rosmini, in which the principles of Ontologism are contained (cf. Denzinger-Bannwart, no. 1801-1930).

Ontology (Gr. οντολογία, being, and οἰκος, science, the science or philosophy of being).—I. Definition.—Though the term is used in this literal meaning by Chaucer (1325-1385) (op. p. 281), in a special application to the first department of metaperspective was made by Christian von Wolff (1679-1754) (Philo. nat., sec. 73). Prior to this time "the science of being" had retained the titles given it by its founder Aristotle: "first philosophy", "theology", "wisdom". The term "metaphysics" (q. v.) was given a wider extension by Wolff, who also added "ontology" as a new title, which he called ontology, and special, under which he included cosmology, psychology, and theology. This programme has been adopted with little variation by most Catholic philosophers. The subject-matter of ontology is usually arranged thus: (1) The objective concept of being in its widest range, as embracing the concrete and abstract, the actual and the potential, the absolute and the relative, the finite and the infinite, the contingent and the necessary, etc., and the subdivisions of the finite into the categories (q. v.) substance and its accidents (quantity, quality, etc.) follow in turn—the objective—reality of substance, the meaning of personality, the relation of accidents (q. v.) to substance being the next object of thought. The concluding portion of ontology is usually devoted to the concept of cause and its primary divisions—efficient and final, material and formal—the objectivity and analytical character of the principle of causality receiving most attention.

Ontological, which as objective science as Kant describes it (Ub. d. Fortschr. d. Met., 98) or "an inferential Psychology", as Hamilton regards it (Metaphysics, Lect. VII); nor yet a knowledge of the absolute (theology); nor of some ultimate reality, whether conceived as matter or as spirit, which Monists suppose to underlie and produce individual real beings and their manifestations. Ontology is a fundamental interpretation of the ultimate constituents of the world of experience. All these constituents—individuals with their attributes—have factors or aspects in common. The atom and the molecule of matter, the plant, the animal, man, and God agree in this that each is a being, has a characteristic essence, an individual unity, truth, goodness, is a substance and (God excepted) has accidents, and is or may be a cause. All these common attributes demand definition and explanation—definition not of their mere names, but analysis of the real object which the mind abstracts and reflectively considers. Ontology is therefore the fundamental science since it studies the basic constituents and the principles presupposed by the special sciences. All the other parts of philosophy, cosmology, psychology, theology, ethics, even logic, rest on the foundation laid by ontology. The physical sciences—physics, chemistry, biology, mathematics likewise, presuppose the same foundations. Nevertheless ontology is dependent in the order of analysis, though not in the order of synthesis, on these departments of knowledge; it starts from their data and uses their information in clarifying their presuppositions and principles. Ontology is accused of dealing with the immeasurably more numerous concepts of the abstract than of the universal, not of the concrete and individual. The physical sciences abstract the various phenomena from their individual subjects; the mathematical sciences abstract the quantity—number and dimensions—from its setting. Ontology finally abstracts what is left—the essence, existence, substance, causality, etc.—that, however, part of the universal abstractions we can have no distinct knowledge. The very negation of their knowableness shows that the mind has some knowledge of that which it attempts to deny. Ontology simply endeavours to make that rudimentary knowledge more distinct and complete. There is a thoroughly developed ontology in every course of Catholic philosophy; and to its ontology that philosophy owes its definiteness and stability, while the lack of an ontology in other systems explains their vagueness and instability.

II. History.—It was Aristotle who first constructed a well-defined and developed ontology. In his "Metaphysics" he analysed all the relations of the mind reduces the world of reality. The medieval philosophers make his writings the groundwork of their commentaries in which they not only explain and illustrate the thought, but often correct and enrich it in the light of Revelation. Notable instances are St. Thomas Aquinas and Suarez (1548–1617). The "Dissertatio" (1618) of the latter is the most thorough work on ontology in any language. The Aristotelian writings and the Scholastic commentaries are its groundwork and largely its substance; but it amplifies, and enriches both. The work of Father Harper mentioned below attempts to render it available for English readers. The author's untimely death, however, left the attempt far from its prospected ending. The movement of the mind towards the physical sciences—which was largely stimulated and accelerated by Bacon—carried philosophy away from the more abstract truth. Locke, Hume, and their followers denied the reality of the object of ontology. Kant, on the contrary, used all his powers to show that there is a reality of things; substance is a mental signment, accidents are subjective aspects of an unknowable non-nomen; cause is a name for a sequence of phenomena. These negations have been emphasized by Comte, Huxley, and Spencer.

On the other hand the subjective and psychological tendencies of Descartes and his followers dimmed yet more the vision for metaphysical truth. Primary notions and principles were held to be either forms innate in the mind or results of its development, but which do not express objective reality. Kant, analysing the structure of the cognitive faculties—perception, judgment, reasoning—discovers nothing they held, of the essence of things; substance is a mental signment, accidents are subjective aspects of an unknowable non-nomen; cause is a name for a sequence of phenomena. These negations have been emphasized by Comte, Huxley, and Spencer.

Oostacker, Shrine of, a miraculous shrine of the Blessed Virgin, and place of pilgrimage from Belgium, Holland, and Northern France. It takes its name from a little hamlet two miles from Ghent in the Province of East Flanders, Belgium. It is located as a shrine of pilgrimage is comparatively recent, dating from 1873. In 1871 the Marquise de Calonne de Courtebou and had built the church of Our Lady of Oostacker. The church was used as an artificial cave or grotto. One day, while on a visit to the park, M. L'Abbé Morel, the parish priest, suggested the statue of Our Lady of Lourdes be placed among the rocks. For two years the grotto remained simply an aquarium, but gradually the members of the family formed the habit of stopping there to rest and to pray. Soon it was decided to bless the statue publicly. The ceremony took place on 23 June, 1873, and was attended by nearly all the inhabitants of the village. The pious Flemish peasants asked permission of the owner to come frequently to the park to give vent to their devotion. Accordingly, access was allowed them on Sundays. At that time the grotto was ringing with the name of Lourdes, and the shrine at Oostacker soon became popular; marvelous cures and wonderful cures were reported. Before long Sunday afternoon no longer sufficed to receive the throngs of pilgrims, and the park was thrown open to the public by the generous owner. Then a large church was built, the corner-stone being laid on 22 May, 1875, by Mgr Braecq. A priest's house followed, and the marchioness in memory of her son, a deceased Jesuit, confided shrine, church, and house to the Society of Jesus. The fathers took possession on 8 April, 1877, and on 11 September of the same year the Apostolic nuncio, Seraphino, came to consecrate the church. That part of the estate, in which the grotto was, was of the Cross erected. Fully 60,000 pilgrims come annually from Belgium, Holland, and Northern France, in about 450 organized pilgrimages.

Ophir, in the Bible, designates a people and a country.

The people, for whom a Semitic descent is claimed, is mentioned in Gen., x, 29, with the other "sons of Jethan", whose dwelling "was from Messa as we go on as far as Schar, a mountain in the east" (Gen., x, 30).

The place Ophir was that from which the Bible represents Solomon's fleet bringing gold, silver, thyme (probably santal) wood, precious stones, ivory, apes, and peacocks (11 Kings, ix, 26 28; x, 11, 22; 11 Par., viii, 17–18; ix, 10). Its location has been sought out where the articles mentioned are native productions; still, while Ophir is repeatedly spoken of as a gold-producing region (Job, xxii, 21; xxviii, 16; Ps. xiv, 10, Is., xix, 11) it is difficult to follow that the above articles came from there: whether they were natural products, or only bought and sold there, or even purchased by the merchants at intervening ports, cannot be gathered from the text, as it states merely that they were fetched to Asmugaber. The Bible does not give the geographical position of Ophir; it only says that the voyage out from Asmugaber and back lasted three years (11 Kings, x, 22). Scholars have been guided in their several identifications of the site by the importance they attach to this or that particular indication in the sacred text—especially the products brought to Solomon—also by resemblances, real or fanciful, between the Hebrew names of Ophir and of the products listed in connection with the names used in various countries and languages. The Greek translators of the Bible, by rendering the Hebrew Ophir into Σαφής, the Coptic name for India, would locate the Biblical El Dorado in India, according to some in the land of the Abira, east of the delta of the Indus, according to others, on the coast of Malabar at Ceylon, and according to others still in the Malay Peninsula. The opinion that it was situated on the southern or south-eastern coast of Arabia has many advocates, who contend from the text of Gen., x, 29, 30, that Ophir must be located between Saba and Hebikath. Another opinion says it was not in Asia, but either on the south-eastern coast of Africa (Sofala) or inland in Mashonaland.

Oporto, Diocese of (PortucaLensis), in Portugal: comprising 26 civil cancelli of the districts of Oporto and Aveiro; probably founded in the middle of the third Council of Toledo (589) the Vien usurper Argiveto was deposed in favor of Constans, the rightful bishop. In 610 Bishop Anianeto assisted in the Council of Leiria at Tavera; he was summoned by King Gundemar to sanction the metropolitan claims of Toledo. Bishop Ananilo was present at the Sixth Council of Toledo (638) and Bishop Flavio at the Tenth (656). Bishop Fracirio attended the Third Council of Braga (675) and the Twelfth, Thirteenth, and Fourteenth Councils of Toledo (681, 692, 696, 698), and his successor Felix appeared at the Sixteenth Council (692). No other bishop is recorded under the Visigothic monarchy. After the Arab invasion Justus seems to have been the first bishop, Gonazado was probably elected in 872, when King Affonso HI won back the city. The names of only four prelates have been preserved: Fruango (906), Herriago (912), Ordonho, and Diogo. Oporto fell again into Moorish hands, and on its recovery, Hugo became bishop (1114–1134–6). He secured exemption from the Archbishop of Braga. He greatly enlarged his diocese and the cathedral patrimony increased by the donations he secured; thus, in 1120, he received from D. Theresa jurisdiction over the City of Oporto with all the rents and dues thereof. John Peculiar was promoted to Braga (1128), his nephew, Pedro Rabaldis, succeeding at Oporto. Next came D. Pedro Potes (1145 to 1152 or 1155), D. Pedro Senior (d. 1172), and D. Fernao Martins (d. 1185). Martinho Pires instituted a chapter, was promoted to Braga, 1189 or 1190. Martinho Rodrigues ruled from 1191 to 1235. He quarrelled with the chapter over their share of the rents of the see. Later on, fresh disagreements arose in which King Sancho intervened against the bishop, who was deprived of his goods and had to flee, but was restored by the king when Innocent III espoused the bishop's cause. Another quarrel soon arose between prelate and king, and the bishop was imprisoned; but he escaped and fled to Rome, and in 1209 the king, feeling the approach of death, made peace with him. His successor, Pedro Salvadores, figured prominently in the questions between the clergy and King Sancho II, who refused to ecclesiastics the right of purchasing or inheriting land. Portugal fell into anarchy, in which the clergy's rights were violated and their persons outraged, though they themselves were not guiltless. Finally, Pope Innocent IV committed the reform of abuses to Affonso, brother of Sancho, who restored the bishop's rights. Under Bishop Julian (1247–49) the jurisdiction difficulty became aggravated. A settlement was effected at the Cortes of Leiria (1254), which the bishop refused to ratify, but he had to give way. When King Affonso III determined (1265) that all rights and properties usurped during the disorders of Sancho's reign should revert to the Crown, nearly all the bishops, including the Bishop of Oporto, then D.

Vicente, protested; and seven went to Rome for relief, leaving Portugal under an interdict. When the king was dying, in 1278, he promised restitution. Vicente (d. 1296) was one of the negotiators of the Concordat of 1288 and the supplementary Accord of Eleven Days. He died and left the realm. Owing to the hostility of the citizens, Bishop Gomes lived mostly outside his diocese. When Pedro Alfonso became bishop in 1343, he had a quarrel over jurisdiction and, like his predecessor, departed, leaving the diocese under interdict. Six years later he returned, but again the monarch began to encroach, and it was not until 1354 that the bishop secured recognition of his rights. His successor was Alfonso Pires. Egidio is probably the bishop represented in the old Chronicles as being threatened with scourging by King Pedro for having lived in sin with a citizen's wife. The accusation was probably groundless, but Egidio left the city, where for two years (1355-56) he succeeded and supported the lawful popes in the Great Schism, and the Master of Aviz against Spanish claims.

Other bishops were: John de Zambuja, or Estevans; and Gil, who in 1406 sold the episcopal rights over Oporto to the Crown for an annual money payment, reduced in the reign of D. Manuel to 120 silver marks; Fernando da Guerra, who in 1425 was created Archbishop of Braga; Vasco.—Antão Martins de Chavis, who succeeded Vasco in 1430, was sent by the pope to Constantinople to induce the Greek emperor to attend the Council of Basle. He succeeded, and as a reward was made cardinal. He died in 1447. Succeeded in the see were: Duarte Gonçalves de Obidos; Luís Pires (1454-64), a negotiator of the Concordat of 1455 and a reforming prelate; John de Azevedo (1465-1491), a benefactor of the cathedral and chapter, as was his successor Diego de Sousa, afterwards Archbishop of Braga and executor of King Manuel. The see was then held by the Jesuits, who occupied it from 1505-7, and D. Pedro da Costa (1511-39), who restored the bishop's palace and enriched the capital revenues from his own purse; Belechór Beliago; and the Carmelite Frei Ralhazim Limpo (1538-52), the fifteenth bishop. He held a diocesan synod in 1540.

In the time of King Sebastião, a liberal and humanist, Oporto was visited by St. Francis Borgia and the Jesuits established themselves in the city. Ayres da Silva, ex-rector of Coimbra University, after ruling four years, fell in the battle of Alcacer de 1578 with King Sebastian. Simão Peryera was followed by the Franciscan Frei Marços de Lisboa, chronicler of the city, who lived in the city and was the last diocesan synod in 1585. In 1591 another ex-rector of Coimbra, Heironymo de Menezes, became bishop; he was succeeded by the Benedictine Frei Gonçalo de Moraes, a zealous defender of the rights of the Church. He built a new sacristy and chancel in the cathedral. In 1618 Bishop Rodrigau da Cunha, author of the history of the Bishops of Oporto, was appointed. His "Catalogue" describes the state of the cathedral and enumerates the parishes of the diocese with their population and income in 1623 and is the earliest account we possess. His successor was Frei John de Valadores, transferred from the See of Miranda. Caspar do Rego da Fonseca, who held the see four years (1635-39). King Philip III named Frareco Pereira Pinto, but the revolution in 1640 prevented his taking possession, so that the see was considered vacant until 1671, being ruled by administrators appointed by the chapter. In 1641 John IV chose D. Sebastião Cesar de Menezes as bishop, but the pope, influenced by Spain, would neither recognize the new King of Portugal nor confirm his nominations. Next came Frei Pedro de Menezes; Nicolau Monteiro took possession in 1674, Fernando Correia de Lacerda, in 1673, who was succeeded by José Saldanha (1697-1708), famed for his austerity, never relinquished his Franciscan habit, a contract to his successor Thomas de Almeida, who in 1716 became the first Patriarch of Lisbon. The see remained vacant until 1739; and, though Frei John Maria was then elected, he never obtained confirmation. In the same year Frei José Maria da Fonseca, formerly Commisary General of the Franciscans, became bishop. Several European States selected him as arbiter of their differences. He contributed to the canonization of a number of saints. He founded and restored many convents and hospitals.

Next in order were: Frei Antonio de Tavora (d. 1770), Frei Álvaro de Miranda Henriques, Frei John Raphael de Mendonça (1771-31), and Lourenço Correia de São Benedito (1796-8). Frei Antonio de Castro became Patriarch of Lisbon in 1811, being followed at Oporto by John Avelar. Frei Manuel de Santa Ignez, though elected, never obtained confirmation, but succeeded in his death, relations between Portugal and the Holy See were re-established by a concordat and Jeronimo da Costa Rebelo became bishop in 1813. From 1854 to 1859 the see was held by Antonio de Fonseca Moniz; on his death it remained vacant until 1862, when John Castro e Moura, who had been a missionary in China, was appointed (d. 1858). The see was again vacant until the confirmation of Americo Ferreira dos Santos Silva in 1871. This prelacy was obliged to combat the growing Liberalism of his flock and the Protestant propaganda in Oporto. A popular lawyer named Mosquita started a campaign against him, because the bishop refused to dismiss some priests, reputed reactionary, who served the Azinheira Chapel; getting himself elected judge of the Brotherhood of the Temple, he provoked a great platform agitation with the result that the chapel was secularized and became a school under the patronage of the Marquis of Pombal Association. In 1879 America was created cardinal and on his death his successor (1911) Bishop Antonio Barroso, an ex-missionary, was transferred from the See of Myparque to that of Oporto.

The Diocese of Oporto is suffragan to Braga. It has 479 parishes, 1120 priests, a Catholic population of 630,000, and 500 Protestants.

Oppenordt (Oppenordt), Gilles-Marie, b. in Paris, 1672; d. there, 1742; a celebrated rococo artist, known as the French Rembrandt, was court painter to Louis XIV of Rome as a royal pensioner, where, for eight years he studied, principally under Bernini and Borromini. The way had been paved in France for this style, for in the latter days of Louis XIV's reign there had appeared in the architectural productions of the Baroque style. The embodiment of the Renaissance was adapted to the taste of Louis XIV's time. It was called the Style of the Regency, the salon et boudoir style. Oppenordt, in connexion with Robert de Cotte, developed the voluptuous rocaille border and shell ornamentation founded on the Italian Grottesque. The high altar of St. Germain des Prés and that of Saint-Sulpice (1701) gained for him the favour of the regents. He was employed with the decoration and decoration of the Château de Villerot, on the reception of the king after his anointing at Reims. In the Palais Royal and the Hotel du Grand Prieur de France he proved himself an elegant decorator. In 1721 the continuation of the work on St-Sulpice was transferred to him. He had already (in 1710) built the chapel of St. John the Baptist in the cathedral of Amiens and earlier the Dominican novitiate church in Paris. He possessed unusual talent as a draughtsman. In his "Des sins, enrochements et mortuaires convertibles pour desse de porte," etc., Huquier gives many of Oppenordt's designs.

Oppido Mamertina, Diocese of (Oppedensis), suffragan of Reggio Calabria, Italy, famous for its prolonged resistance to Roger (twelfth century). Bishop Stefano (1205) is the first prelate of whom there is mention. In 1472 the see was united to that of Gerace, under Bishop Athanasius Calcedon, by whom the Greek Rite was abolished, although it remained in use in a few towns. In 1536 Oppido became again an independent see, under Bishop Pietro Andrea Ripanti; among other bishops were Antonio Cesonio (1669) and Giuseppe Giacomo Montani (1710), who restored the cathedral and the episcopal palace; Bisanzio Fili (1906), who founded the seminary; Michele Caputo (1852), who was transferred to the See of Avella, where it is suspected that he poisoned King Ferdinand II; eventually, he apostatized. Oppido has 19 parishes, with 28,000 inhabitants.

Optatus, Saint, Bishop of Milevis, in Numidia, in the fourth century. He was a convert, as we gather from St. Augustine: "Do we not see with how great a bounty of gold and silver and garments Cyprian, doctor maruisissimus, came forth out of Egypt, and likewise Lucanius, Victorinus, Optatus, Hilary?" (De Doctrina Christi, xii). Optatus probably had been a pagan rhetorician. His work against the Donatists is an answer to Parmenian, the successor of Donatus in the See of Carthage. St. Jerome (De viris ill. ex) tells us it was in six books and was written under Valens and Valentinian (361-75). We now possess seven books, and the list of popes is carried as far as Siricius (384-98). Similarly the Donatist succession of anti- popes is given (II, iv), as Victor, Bonianus, Macrinius, Lucanians (the data of the last is about 340), though a few sentences earlier Macrinius is mentioned as the actual bishop. The plan of the work is laid down in Book I, and is completed in six books. It seems, then, that the seventh book, which St. Jerome did not know in 392, was an appendix to a new edition in which St. Optatus made additions to the two episcopal lists. The date of the original work is fixed by the statement in I, xiii, that sixty years and more had passed since the persecution of Diocletian (303-5). Photinus (d. 376) is apparently regarded as still alive; Julian is dead (363). Thus the first books were published about 366-70, and the second about 385-90.

St. Optatus deals with the entire controversy between Catholics and Donatists (see DONATISTS). He distinguishes between schismatics and heretics. The former have rejected unity, but they have true doctrine and true sacraments, hence Parmenian should not have threatened them (and consequently his own position) with anathemas. He tells his readers that the Donatists are a great contrast to the severity of many of the Fathers against schism. It seems to be moved by the notion that all who have faith will be saved, though after long torments,—a view which St. Augustine has frequently to combat. Donatist and Catholics were agreed as to the necessary unity of the Church. The question was, where is this One Church? Optatus argues that it cannot be only in a corner of Africa; it must be the catholic (the word is used as a substantive) which is throughout the world. Parmenian had enumerated six dotes, or properties, of the Church, of which Optatus accepts five, and argues that the first, the episcopal chair, catholica, belongs to the Catholics, and therefore they have all the others. The whole schism had arisen through the quarrel about the official position at Carthage, and it might have been expected that Optatus would claim this property of catholica by pointing out the legitimacy of the Catholic succession at Carthage. But he does not. He replies; "We must examine who sat first in the chair, and where. . . . You cannot deny that you know that in the city of Rome upon Peter first the apostolic bishop was establiterary form, and of Christian charity. But the general marshallling of his arguments is not so good as the development of each by itself. His allegorical interpretations are far-fetched; but those of Parmenian were evidentiy yet more extravagant. An appendix contains an important list of documents which had apparently been collected by some Catholic controversialist between 330 and 347 (see Donatism). This collection was already mutilated when it was copied by the scribe of the only MS. which has preserved it, and that MS. is incomplete, so that we have to deploy the loss of a great part of this first-rate material for the early history of Donatism. We can trace what has been lost by the citations made by Optatus himself and by Augustine.

St. Optatus has apparently never received any ecclesiastical cultus; but his name was inserted in the Roman Martyrology on the fourth of June, though it is quite unknown to all the ancient Martyrologies and calendars and the editio princeps was by Cochlaeus (Mainz, 1549). More MSS. were used by Baldoinus (Paris, 1563 and 1569), whose text was frequently reprinted in the seventeenth century. Dupin's edition includes a history of the Donatists and a geography of Africa (Paris, 1700—); it is reprinted in Gallandi and in the third edition of Adam. The edition of Zedelg (C.S.I.E. XXVI, Vienna, 1893), with description of the MSS.

Optimism (Latin optimus, best) may be understood as a metaphysical theory, or as an emotional disposition. The term became current in the early part of the eighteenth century to designate the Leibnizian doctrine that this is the best of all possible worlds. The antithesis of optimism is pessimism (q. v.). Between these extremes there are all shades of opinion, so that it is at times hard to classify philosophers. Those, however, are to be classed as optimists who maintain that the world is on the whole good and beautiful, and that man can attain to a state of true happiness and perfection either in this world or in the life to come. The theory of Leibniz it is true that some of the best of modern optimists as thus extended would also include "melliorism," a word first used in print by Sully to designate the theory of those who hold that things are, indeed, bad, but that they can be better, and that it is in our power to increase the happiness and welfare of mankind.

As an emotional disposition optimism is the tendency to look upon the bright and hopeful side of life, whereas pessimism gives a dark colouring to every event and closes the vistas of hope. The emotional disposition is one that depends upon internal organic conditions rather than external good fortune. To what extent the emotional disposition influences our conduct is perhaps continually being decided; it has doubtless a factor, but not always the only or even the decisive factor. A list of optimists will show that in general the greater minds have taken the hopeful view of life. As optimists are to be reckoned: Plato, Aristotle, the Stoics, St. Augustine, St. Thomas and the Scholastics, Leibniz, Kant, Fichte, Hegel (ought to unite optimism and pessimism), Lotze, Wundt.

It has been held by some that the Old Testament is optimistic, and the New Testament pessimistic. The evidence brought forward for this theory is found mainly in the passages of the Old Testament which present a picture of life, and, on the whole, are more favourable to the New which call attention to the transitoriness of all human joys. This view is too narrow, and is not correct. Optimism as a philosophical term means that the universe as a whole is good and that man's ultimate destiny is one of happiness. The Old Testament is optimistic because of such passages as the following: "And God saw all things that he had made, and they were very good (Gen. i, 31). Even in Eccl. we read, 'The heart of man is full of wisdom.' The Old Testament is optimistic because it shows that the sufferings of this life are not worthy to be compared to the glory that is to come. Its optimism and pessimism are to be taken as emotional dispositions, either one or the other may exist in the ascetic or the profligate. It cannot be argued that the doctrine of the All-Good in the New Testament is pessimistic because He taught asceticism and celibacy. For as a rule ascetics and celibates have been and are, as a matter of fact, disposed to look upon the bright side of life. They surely believe that it is better to live than not to live, that the world which God has made is good and perfect, and that man's destiny is eternal bliss.

As typical metaphysical exponents of optimism one may mention the extreme position of Leibniz, and the more moderate doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas.

Leibniz looked upon the series of possible worlds as actually infinite. This entire series must have passed through the mind of our Omniscient God. In states of the fact that the series is infinite, He must have seen that one of its members was supremely perfect. Each one of these series strives to be realized in proportion to its perfection. Under such circumstances, it is impossible that a less perfect world should come into being. Since, furthermore, the wisdom and goodness of God are infinite, it is necessary that the world that proceeds from His intellect and will should be the best possible one that under any circumstances can exist. Only one such world is possible, and therefore God chooses the best. The very fact of the world's existence makes it metaphysically certain that it is the very best possible. [See Leibniz, IX, 157, subsection (4) Optimism.] This argument might seem convincing, if one overlooks the fact of the evil in the world. The world as it is, Leibniz maintained, with all its evil, is better than a world without any evil. For the physical evil of the universe only serves to set off by contrast the beauty and glory of the good. As moral evil, its very existence is necessary, as a means of making the divine will be looked upon as a real object of the Divine Will. Its presence, therefore, does not conflict with the holiness of the Divine decrees by which the world was ordained. Furthermore, since a morally evil being is only a less perfect creature, the absolutely perfect series of beings in order to contain all possible perfect beings, must, in necessity, contain the less as well as the more perfect. For if the series contained no beings lacking in moral perfection, it would be a shortened series, and therefore lacking in the types of less perfect beings.

Against the extreme optimism of Leibniz, one might say that God is not necessitated to choose the best of all possible worlds, because this is in itself an impossibility. Whatever exists besides God, is finite. Between the finite and the infinite there is always a field of indefinite extent. And since the finite cannot become infinite, simply because the created can never be recreated, it therefore follows that whatever exists, besides God, is, and always will be, limited. If so, no matter what may exist, something better could be conceived and brought into being by God. An absolutely best possible world would, therefore, seem to be a contradiction in terms and impossible even by the Omnipotence of God, who can bring into being all and only that which is intrinsically possible. If, then, one should demand an "absolute excellence" as meaning creating something than which nothing better is possible, no world could be the best possible. But there is another sense in which the words may be taken. Though one is not making the best thing that can be made, he still may be doing what he does in the best possible manner. In this sense, according to St. Thomas, God has made this world relatively the best possible. "When it is said that God can do anything better than He does it, this is true if the words 'anything better' stand for God's power. But if we may point out, God can make something that is better."

If, however, the words are used adversally, and designate the made of operation, God cannot do better than He does, for He cannot work with greater wisdom and goodness" (I, Q. xxv, a. 5, ad 1989). It is just this distinction which Leibniz failed to make, and was thereby led to his extreme position. According to St. Thomas, God was free to make a less or more perfect world. He made the world that would best fit the purposes of creation, and wrought it in the best possible manner.

Against this optimism may be urged the same objections from the presence of physical and moral evil which troubled Leibniz. But there are several considerations that reduce their force. (1) We see only in part. We cannot criticize the Divine plan intelligently until we see its full development, which indeed will only be in eternity. (2) The physical evils and sufferings of this life are not worthy to lead us astray from the glory of the next life. Should one object that it would be better to have glory both in this world and the next, one might answer that this is not certainly true. Only the endurance of suffering and sorrow do we attain to the true strength and glory of our manhood. That which we acquire by the sweat of our brow is earned and truly our own. That which comes to us by inheritance is but looted and possessed by us for a time, till we can hand it on to another. What is true of the individual is true of the human race as a whole. It seems to be the Divine plan that it should work its way on, from little beginnings, with great toil and suffering, to its final goal of perfection. When all things are fulfilled in man, the end of the world, God will be glorified in that world as he is glorified in heaven. He will be glorified more, however, in that world as he is glorified in heaven.

Option. Right of.—In canon law an option is a way of obtaining a benefice or a title, by the choice of the new titular himself. Many chapters enjoyed the right to offer an option if it is stipulated in the precept of the benefice who has his hold his office for the longest time, in conformity with the statutory regulation, resign the prebend he enjoys to accept another that has become vacant. A second right of option existed in France before 1789; by virtue of a custom a prebendary, who was appointed to and had entered into possession of a benefice subject to archdeacon (or he already held, was entitled to select whichever of the two he preferred, when, according to the common law, he had already lost the incompatible benefice which he had previously held. The right of option still exists with regard to cardinalial titles (see CARDINAL).

Is the blooded, jewelled Babylonian scarab the analogue to the Hebrew cedel and pectoral? After a preliminary sacrifice (usually of a lamb; but this, as those of expiation and thanksgiving, we cannot, in our limits, detail) he could face the King, and sit on the seat of judgment; Shamash and Adad, the great gods of oracle, lords of decision, come to him and give him an unerring answer bērûtu, presage: Divine teaching. Probably not connected with ʾālī. There is no likely borrowing or adaptation of Babylonian oracle-words by the Hebrews (Lagrange, op. cit., 261, n. 88). All the customary modes of divination (interpretation of dreams, of stars, monstrancessies, of signs in oil, the liver etc.) culminated in oracles; but an enormous literature of precedents and principles left little initiative to a bērûtu whose memory was good. We may add a characteristic example of oracle style (about 680 n. c.).

O'Quin, Malachias (Maolsheachainn O Cadhla), Archbishop of Tuam, Ireland, b. in Thomond, date unknown; d. at Ballipodar, 27 October, 1615 (N.S.). He studied in Paris at the College of Navarre. Having administered Killaloa as vicar Apostolic, he returned to Ireland and was consecrated Archbishop of Tuam and Galway, 11 October, 1613. His subjects, who received him unwillingly, soon learned to admire him. He held a provincial synod at Galway in 1612 to promulgate the Tridentine decrees and correct abuses, and his unremitting labours in Tuam provoked a complaint from the Protestant archbishop in 1611. Dr. O'Quin attended the national synod of 1613, by which the Catholic Confederation was organized, and at the first meeting of the General Assembly he was elected to the Supreme Council, being afterwards appointed President of Connaught. He undertook to recover Sligo from the Scottish Covenanters in 1645, but the Scots surprised his camp at Ballisodare, 17-27 October, 1645. Everyone abandoned him but his secretary, Father Thaddaeus O'Connell, and another priest. The archbishop was cut down with his companions, and the victors discovered in his carriage a draft of the secret treaty between King Charles and the Confederates, which the English Parliament published to prejudice both parties. His body was redeemed for £50 and buried with honour. After his death he wrote an account of the Aran Islands, printed in Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum".

Oracle (ounacium; oracle, to speak): A divine communication given at a special place through specially appointed persons, oracles. The art of divination (q. v.) was found among various peoples of the ancient world.

1. BABYLON AND ASSYRIA.—Extremely ancient texts present the oracle-priest (bērūtu, "to see a sight"); hence, to give an oracle, divine the future. Cf. n. 7 of Samuel, 1 Sam., ix; 9; 1 Chr., ix, 22 etc.; of Heman, 1 Chr., xvi, 7, 10; cf. 18, xxviii, 7; xxx, 10 alongside of the Ḭīṣipu (whose role is incarnation, conjunction) as officer of one of the two main divisions of the sacrificial caste. He is the special servant of Shamash and Adad; his office is hereditary (cf. the "sons of Aaron", "of Zadok"); bērūtu, person, is designated by the term; he forms part of a college. Lengthy initiation, elaborate ritual, prepare him for the reception, or exercise, of the bērūtu. He rises before dawn, bathes, anoints himself with perfumed oil, puts on sacred vestments [cf. Exx., xxx, 17, 23; Lev., xvi, 4. Lagrange, "Études sur les religions sémittiques" (Paris, 1905), 256, n. 1; and "Rev. Bible," VIII (1896), 473: and Avenza, "L'Égypte et Moïse," pt. i (1875); Les vêtements du Grand-Prêtre, c. iii, plate 3. Is the blooded, jewelled Babylonian scarab the analogue to the Hebrew cedel and pectoral? After a preliminary sacrifice (usually of a lamb; but this, as those of expiation and thanksgiving, we cannot, in our limits, detail) he could face the King, and sit on the seat of judgment; Shamash and Adad, the great gods of oracle, lords of decision, come to him and give him an unerring answer bērūtu, presage: Divine teaching. Probably not connected with ʾālī. There is no likely borrowing or adaptation of Babylonian oracle-words by the Hebrews (Lagrange, op. cit., 261, n. 88). All the customary modes of divination (interpretation of dreams, of stars, monstrancessies, of signs in oil, the liver etc.) culminated in oracles; but an enormous literature of precedents and principles left little initiative to a bērūtu whose memory was good. We may add a characteristic example of oracle style (about 680 n. c.).

Shamash, the great lord, to my demand in thy faithful favour, deign to answer! Between this day, the 3rd day of this month, the month of Arû, until the 11th day of the month of Abib of this year, within these hundred days and these hundred nights... within this fixed space of time will Khashtariti with his troops, or the troops of the Cimmerians... or all other enemy, succeed in their designs? By assault, by force... by starvation, by the names of the god, ordained... and brought with the order and manner, or by any other method and stratagem of siege, shall they take the town of Khashassu? shall they enter the walls of this town of Khashassu?... shall it fall into their hands? Thy great godhead knoweth it. Is the taking of this town of Khashassu, by whatsoever enemy it be, from this day unto the last day appeared... or appeared... in the order and manner, date of thy great godhead, O Shamash, great Lord? Shall we see it? Shall we hear it? etc. Observe the preoccupation of leaving the god no avenue of elusion—every possible contingency is named.

Among the nomad Arabs the priest is primarily a giver of oracles (by means of arrow-shafts, cf. Exodus, xxii, 21), though named Kohin the Hebrew. But since in Hebrew, Phenician, Aramaic, and Ethiopian Kohen means priest, and cannot be etymologically connected with "divination", we must conclude (La grange, op. cit., 218) that the Arabic oracle-monger is a degenerate priest, not (Wellhausen) that all Semitic peoples were originally priestly.

11. The Hebrews.—Oracles were conchased to the Hebrews by means of the Urim and Thummim, which are to be connected with the Ephod. The Urim (see Erhot) was (i) a linen dress worn in ritual circumstances (by priests, 1 Sam., xxii, 18, the king Samuel, ibid., ii, 18; David, 2 Sam., vi, 14; (ii) the "ephod", described in Exodus, xxxix, ten, personating the highest priest; over it was worn the pectoral containing Urim and Thummim; (iii) an idolatrous, oracular image, connected with the Teraphim (also oracular); that which Gideon erected weighed 1700 sikels of gold (Judges, viii, 19; 22; Judges, xix, 2, Judges, xvii, 5; Judges, xiv, 14, 20; 2 Sam., iv, iii, 1 etc.). But why was this image called an ephod (a dress)? In Isaiah, xxx, 22, 24 the silver overlaying of idols is parallel to Urim, their golden sheath. If then the Israelites were already familiar with an oracle operating in close connexion with a jewelled ephod, it will have been easy to transfer this name to a richly plated oracular image. See van Hoonacker, "Sacredoe levitique" (Louvain, 1883, p. 175).

The law directs (Num., xxvi, 18) that the leader of the people shall stand before the priest, and proffer his request; the priest shall "inquire for him by the judgment of Urim and Thummim before Yahweh". The priest alone (for the Ahijah of 1 Sam., xiv, 3, is the Ahijelek of xxii, 1, xxii, 9, with the Divine name corrected) carries the ephod before Israel, and inquires on behalf of the chief alone (for Ahijelek, 1 Sam., xxii, 13-15, divies having inquired for David while Saul still is king; see van Hoonacker, op. cit., 376). Thus history would agree with the Law as to the unity of the oracle, and its exclusive use by priest and prince.

Josephus thought the Urim and Thummim were stones of changing lustre. The meaning of the names is unknown. Though they seem to have been used for sacred lots, and though 1 Sam., xiv, 37 sqq. (especially in LXX) makes it fairly clear that they gave answer by Yes and No (in 1 Sam., xxiii, 4; 11, 12; xxx, 8), the long phrasing is priestly commentary, and though 1 Sam., xiv, 42 (if indeed this still refers to the oracle and not to a private ordinated offered by Saul to, and rejected by, the people) by using the word Urim and Thummim, "throw (between me and Jonathan)", suggests a casting of lots, yet the U and T were not mere pebbles (e.g., blue goose pebbles for levitical and amuletable use) and No they could refuse answer altogether. This happened when the inquirer was ritually unclean (so Saul, in the person of his son, 1 Sam., xiv, 37; cf. the exclusion from the new-moon meal, ibid., xx, 26; sexual intercourse precludes from eating sacred bread, ibid., xxi, 4).—Observe the lack, in Yahweh's oracle, of the magical element, and extreme complication, which disfigure those quoted in I. Notice, too, how Hebrew priest and prince alike submit unquestioningly to the Divine communication. The prince does not dare to ask for advice from the godhead; it is the priest to distort or invent the answer. Finally, when once the era of the great prophets opens, it is through them God manifests His will; the use of the ephod ceases; the Urim and Thummim are silent and ultimately lost.

111. Greece and Rome.—("Oracular: quod inest in domino orato", Cie., "Thea", xx, 8; "Voluntas divina hominis orumnetata", Soc. etc., "Controv.", I. prf. Mari:ce; "AS" in mcmum, mens. The a:thos was the mouthpiece, the ψηφοντης, the interpreter of the oracle (so already Plato, "Tim.", lxxii, B. χρηστηειον: χρεα, 'furnish what is needful'; hence (active), to give (middle), to consult an oracle). Oracles in the familiar sense flourished best in Greek or Hellenized areas, though even here the ecstatic element probably came, as a rule, from the East. The local element, however (for Hellenic oracles essentially localize divination), and the practice of interpreting divine voices as heard in wind, or tree, or river, or donkey, or horse, or dogs (Oxyrhynchus Papyri, etc., the Italian fauni, karmentos) were rooted in Greece or pre-Greek religion. An enormous history lies behind the oracles of "classical" times. Thus at Delphi the stratification of cults shows us, undermost, the prehistoric, chthonian worship of the pre-Achaeans: Gaia (followed by, or identified with, Themis) and the impersonal nymphs are the earliest tenants of the famous chasm and the spring Kassotis, Dionysos, from orgast Three, or, as was then held, from the mystic East, invaded the shrine, importing, or at least accentuating, elements of enthusiasm and religious delirium; for the immense development and Orphic reformation of his cult, in the seventh century, can but have modified, not introduced, his worship. Apollo, disembarking with the Achaeans on the Kireion shore, strives to oust him, and, though but sharing the year's worship and the temple with his predecessors, eclipses what he cannot destroy. Echoes of this savage fight, this stubborn resistance of the dim, old-fashioned worship to the brilliant new, which we call in hymn and drama, are glossed by the best .Eschylus (Eumen. prol.), and accentuated by the rationalist Euripides (Ion etc.); vase paintings picture the ultimate reconciliation. For, in the end, a compromise is effected: the priestess still sits by the cleft, drinks of the spring, still utter's the frantic maritulete cries of ecstasy; but the prophets of the rhythmical Apollo discipline her ravings into hexameters, and thus the will of Zeus, through the inspiration of Apollo, is uttered by the pythones to all Greece.

Apollo was the cause at once of the glory and the downfall of Delphi. Parly in reaction against him, parly in imitation of him, other oracles were later established or created. In our brief limits we cannot describe or even enumerate these. We may mention the extremely ancient oracle of Dodona, where the spirit of Zeus (ους θεος δοδωνος)—the oracles began—spoke to the priestesses in the oak, the echoing bronze, the waterfall; the underground Trophonius oracle in Lebadeia, with its violent and extraordinary ritual (Paus., IX, 39, 11; Phii., "Gen. Soc.", 22); and the incubation oracles of Asklepios, where the sleeping sick awaited the epiphany of the hero, and miraculous cure. Thousands of votive models of healed wounds and straightened limbs are unearthed in these shrines; and at Dodona, leaden tablets inquire after a vanished deific, whether his loss or not; and, of the many gods or hero faction-rent Coreya may find peace. Other especially famous oracles were those of Apollo at Afae, Delos, Patarra, Charos; of Poseidon at Onches-

Oran, Diocese of (Oranensis), in Algiers, separated from the Archdiocese of Algiers, 25 July, 1866, to which it is suffragan. In the early centuries there were no less than 123 dioceses in Carthage and Tingi- tania Mauretania. Tlemcen (in the presence of resident priests, the schools of prophets (at the oracle of Zeus Ammon, c. g., under an arch-prophet), and even, at times, the pythons. At Delphi, the priests elected her from the neighbouring district; she was to be over fifty (so, on account of a scandalous incident), and quite ignorant. Her guidance was not to be too positive!

In its best days, the Delphic oracle exercised an enormous influence; its staff was international and highly expert; gold flowed in unceasing streams into its treasury, free access to it was guaranteed to pilgrims even in time of war. In constitutional and colonial history, in social and religious crises, in things and as an oracle of finance, its influence was constant and final. Had it realized its own position, its work of unification, whether as regards religion or politics in Hellen, might have been unlimited. Like all human things, it but half-saw its ideal (that ideal could at best have been) and half-realized what it saw. Easily corrupted by the gold and prayers of kings, the centre of Asiatic and African, no less than of European intrigues, it became an end to itself. At the time of the Persian War, it sacrificed Athens and imperilled all Western civilization. It was responsible for more than one war. It drained the colonies of their revenues. It gradually set against itself the indignant rivalries of the local cults of Greece. No moral or religious instruction could be accredited to it. Thus, while formidable enemies were ranged against it at home, the conquests of Alexander dimmed national glories, and opened the gates to far more fascinating cults. The prophecies based upon the rigid data of astrology supplanted the Pythian ravings; Phurach refers the rising tide of Delphi: from the oracle. In Rome diviners and astrologers, always suspected, had long found legislation active against them. The Sibylline books, huge records of oracles ceaselessly interpolated by each new philosophy, by Jewish and even Christian apocalyptic prophecy, had been famous by the side of indigenous oracles, the carmina Marciana, for example; yet as early as 213 B.C. the Senate began its confiscations; Augustus made an autoliquef of over 2000 volumes; Tiberius, more scrupulous, expurgated the rest; Constant emperors proved vain against the riot of superstition in which the empire was collapsing; the sanest emperors were themselves adepts; Marcus Aurelius consulted the miserly charlatan Alexander, with his snake-oracle at Abonoteichos. Christianity alone could conquer the old homes of revelation. Constantine strove to destroy Delphi and Dodona, and closed Egin and Aphaka; Julian tried to reawake the stammering, failing voices; but under Theodosius the reprieve is complete, and henceforward the oracles are dumb. GREECE AND ROME; c. especially Bouché-Leclercq, Histoire de canneti" and reproduced by Mansi in his collection of councils (VI, 411-3).

Much more important was the second council (held on 3 July, 529), the first in Gaul to publish a decision in matters of faith. The occasion was the dedication of a church built at Orange by Liberius, the pseudonym of Arles as president, and its consecration by Pope John II. It was attended by fourteen bishops with St. Cæcarius of Arles as president, and its first act was to baptize the natives, and the doctrine of grace and free will, i.e. Semipelagianism.

Cæcarius had informed Felix IV (III) of the pernicious activity of the Semipelagians in Gaul and had applied to him for support. The pope, in response, sent him a series of "Capitula", i.e. propositions or decrees drawn almost wholly from the works of St. Augustine and the "Sententia" of St. Prosper of Aquitaine. These "Capitula" became the basis of the twenty-five issue by the Synod of Orange, and these in turn were freely used by the Council of Trent in its condemnation of Luther. The acts of the Synod of Orange contain, after a preamble: (a) eight canons or anathemata; (b) seventeen merely declaratory propositions (both of these classes are known as "Capitula"); (c) a sort of demonstration of the defined doctrine against the objections of the Semipelagians. The subjects of the "Capitula" are thus logically grouped by Portalé in "Dixit Thél. Cath." (I, 2526). (1) Causes of the necessity of grace. They are: (a) original sin which cannot be wiped out (can. ii); (b) the weakness of the will resulting from the fall of man (i); (c) the very condition of creature (xix). (2) Operation of grace before justification. It precedes every effort conducive to salvation. From it proceed: (a) prayer (can. iii); (b) the desire of justification (iv); (c) the inception of faith (v); (d) every effort towards faith (vi); (e) every salutary act (vii); (f) every preparation to justification (viii, xiv); (g) all merit (xviii). (3) Operation of grace in initial justification or baptism. It restores (xiii), justifies (xiv), improves (xv), confers the justice of Christ (xviii). (4) Work of grace after justification in the just. It is necessary for good actions (ix); perseverence (s); the taking of vows (xi); Christian fortitude (xvii); the life of Christ within us (xxiv); the love of God (xxv). (5) Universal necessity of grace. This need of grace to do good and avoid evil is expressed in propositions ix, xx, and the variously interpreted proposition xxii. In the demonstration which follows the "Capitula" it is evident that the bishops also reject the doctrine of predestination to evil and declare salvation within the reach of all baptized. The acts of the council, which were signed by the bishops, the pontifex prefect Librius and seven other distinguished laymen, were forwarded to Rome by approved or Boniface II on 25 January, 531 (see Bonifacii II). They consequently enjoyed canonical authority and are printed in Denzinger's "Enchiridion Symbolorum" (10th ed., nos. 174-200).

The acts of both councils and copious bibliographical details will be found in the later work. The accounts of the inordinate activities of the bishops in the provinces, the absence of the auxiliaries, the remarkable solemnity, etc., is given by St. Augustine, "De Moribus Bishop" (III, 152 sqq.; Woonen, Canons of the Second Council of Orange, A. N. A. WEBER.

Orange Free State, one of the four provinces of the Orange River State, lies between 29° 30' and 30° 40' south latitude and 20° 23' and 21° 59' east longitude. It is bounded on the north by Natal and Basutoland; its southern boundary is the Orange and Vaal rivers which separate it from the Cape Province; the Transvaal form respectively its eastern and northern boundaries; Natal and Basutoland bound it on the west, and the northern portions of the Cape Province on the west. Its name is derived from the Orange River, which flows along its southern boundary, 2,017 miles, with a mean width of 1,002 miles, and a mean depth of 50,392 square miles and a population, according to the census of 1904, of 387,315; of these only 142,679 are whites, the remainder belonging to the coloured races—mostly Kafirs and Hottentots. The climate is excellent. With a mean altitude of from four to five thousand feet above sea level and an average yearly rainfall of only twenty-two inches, it is a country well suited to persons suffering from pulmonary troubles, the air being dry and invigorating and the nights almost cold. Being an immense grassy plain, almost treeless, the country is unromantically (even depressing) except on the eastern border where the vast Drakensburg mountain range comes into view. It is mainly a pastoral country, though a portion of it alongside Basutoland contains some of the finest corn lands in Africa. The exports, valued in 1905-06 at $10,000,000, include wool, gold, silver, and various feathers, and maize; its imports in the same period amounted to $15,000,000.

The white inhabitants are mostly the descendants of the Voortrekkers (or emigrant Dutch farmers) from the old Cape Colony, who in 1836 and subsequent years crossed the Orange River in thousands and settled on territories peopled by various Bantu tribes until their virtual extermination by Moselekatze and his hordes of Matabile warriors—a short time previously. The "Great Trek", as the migration of these farmers came to be called, brought about an anomalous political situation. Rather than live under British rule in the Colony, they had abandoned their homes and people, and established a Republic of their own under the British Government, whilst always claiming them as its subjects and forbidding them to molest the neighbouring native tribes, refused to annex the territory to which they had fled. Such a state of things manifestly could not long endure, and so in 1848 the country between the Orange and Vaal Rivers was officially proclaimed British territory under the title of the "Orange River Sovereignty". The emigrant Boers, headed by a farmer named Andreas Pretorius, struggled to retain their independence but were defeated at the battle of Boomplaats by the English general, Sir Harry Smith, in August, 1848. The British Government, finding the newly annexed territory of little value and desiring in view of European complications and the enormous cost of Kafir wars to limit its responsibilities in South Africa, soon determined to replace their country to the Boers; thus, at a convention held in Bloemfontein on 25 February, 1854, Sir George Clerk in the name of Queen Victoria acknowledged British dominion over the Orange River Sovereignty. The Boers thereupon set up a Republic, which, under the name of the Orange Free State, enjoyed a period of peace and prosperity that lasted up to the Anglo-Boer War of 1899-1902. In that struggle the Free States, having joined the Transvaalists, shared in their defeat, and their country was annexed to the British Empire under the title of the Orange River Colony. For some years the new colony was administered by a governor and a lieutenant-governor assisted by an executive and a legislative council, but in June, 1907, responsible government was conferred on it with a legislative council of eleven, and a legislative assembly of thirty-eight members.

Since 31 May, 1910, under the title of "The Orange Free State Province of the Union of South Africa", it forms part (together with the Transvaal, Natal, and the Cape of Good Hope) of a self-governing dominion of the British Empire, the first parliament of which was opened at Cape Town on 4 November, 1910. In that parliament the Orange Free State Province is represented by sixteen senators—one-fourth of the entire number—and by seventeen members of the House of Assembly (out of a total of 121). English and Dutch are the official languages. The former is spoken mostly in the towns and the latter for the greater part in the Transvaal and the country districts. The religion of the great majority of the white inhabitants is Calvinism (Dutch Reformed). Those of English origin belong to the different dominations usually found in the British colonies and in the United States of America. The Orange Free State contains a good number of neat little towns with populations varying from one to eight thousand. Bloemfontein, capital of the province, so called from a spring (fontein) on the farm of Jan Bleum, an early Boer settler, is a spacious, clean, and well-built city of 33,000 inhabitants. It is the seat of the provincial council as well as the legal and judicial centre of the entire Union. It is distant 100 miles from East London, the nearest seaport, and 290 miles from Pretoria, the executive capital. Other important towns are Kroonstad, Harrismith, Jagersfontein, and Smithfield, each of which there is a Catholic church. The total number of Catholics in the entire province is about 2000, mostly of European origin or descent. The province forms part of the Vicariate of Kimberley (q.v.), which is in the Cape Province, and in which the vicar Apostolic resides. The present (1910) vicar Apostolic is the Right Reverend Matthew Gaughran, O.M.I., titular Bishop of Tentyra. Catholics enjoy absolute freedom of worship, but receive no governmental aid for their clergy or schools. The Roman Dutch Law, which is administered in the courts, is favourable to Catholics on such points as tenure of ecclesiastical property, marriage, wills, and charitable bequests. The clergy are not liable to serve on juries or as military captains. "Sarcasm" is a word disused. Flourishing orphanages are conducted by the Sisters of the Holy Family at Bloemfontein and Jagersfontein, and by the Sisters of Notre Dame (of Namur) at Kroonstad.

II. MACSHERY.

Orange River, Vicariate Apostolic of, and the Vicariate Apostolic of Great Namaqualand in South Africa. The vicariate was erected in 1897 after having been a prefecture Apostolic since July, 1885. It comprises the whole of Little Namaqualand (beginning on the northern line of Clan William County in Cape Colony, i.e. 36° 35' S. lat.) and extends to the Atlantic Ocean on the west, and to the Orange River on the north. It consists of five districts, the highest, Van Rhyns, Dorp, and Fraaiberger on the west, and beyond the Orange River, the district of Gordonia in Bechuanaland. The prefecture, detached from the vicariate in July, 1899, is bounded on the west by the Atlantic Ocean. It extends from the Orange River as far as Damaraland (23° 29' S. lat.), and comprises the city of Rehoboth and its district. The eastern boundary line is 20° E. long.

Great Namaqualand.—For thirty or forty, or in certain districts even a hundred miles inland, this district is only a sandy desert, which extends on the eastern side to the great Kalahari desert. The central portion of the country is a fertile and rich soil almost exclusively on thunderstorms, without which it would be nearly destitute of water. The vicariate is but little better in this respect. When, however, a sufficiently long rain falls hereof regions, the richest pastures spring up in an incredibly short time. The very air then becomes saturated to such a degree with the odours of vegetation that many must suffer from headache. Swarms of locusts devour the exuberant produce, azaleas, as well as some powerful east wind carries them into the sea. The "aristocracy" in Great Namaqualand consists of German immigrants, and, in the other parts of the mission, of English, Irish, and Boer settlers, while the Hottentots form the bulk of the scanty population in the two Namaqualands. They are not negroes. Their skin is like that of whites much browned by jaundice, and their build more like that of the Egyptians seen on ancient monuments; or again, resembling that of the Chinese, only exceeding them or any other race on earth in their ugliness, especially when burdened with years. Undish hospitalily appears to be their only natural virtue. They love music. Their habit of initating is such as to raise either a smile or exasperation, a crowd and a profusion of them is most uncensurable. When receiving the priest's blessing, all repeated the sign of the Cross over him! The late Max Müller, nevertheless, vouched for their ancestors having been a cultured race. Although they have in their language a word signifying Deity, it took a long time to make them understand spiritual doctrines other than that of a God of the desert. They are not inclined to any form of labour or exertion. To induce them, for example, to navigate, the missionaries built a boat by which to cross the Orange River. For weeks, neither encouraging words nor exhibitions of safe sailing appeared to make any impression on them. One missionary relates that, among his Hottentot catechumens, there was one who never could learn how to make the sign of the Cross, nor the answers of the catechism, nor any prayer except these words of the Pater Noster: "Our Father, give us this day our daily bread." The missionaries have shown here what an uplifting influence the Catholic Church exercises over the most forsaken nations, and in the younger generation, trained by the missionaries and allowed, as far as circumstances allowed, are considerably more intelligent and susceptible of culture than their elders.

BUSHMANLAND.—In this territory are found the Bushmen (or Bojesmen), a tribe kindred to the Hottentots. They are short in stature, and generally short-sighted and intractable. Intellectually and morally they are not on a higher level than the Hottentots, but, as far as they have been accessible to the missionaries, they have improved in both respects.

BECHUANALAND.—The Bechuanas belong to the Kaffir race. Many of them show some skill in iron and copper working and in mining, also in taming hides. Very different from the Hottentots, many of them present a pleasing appearance, and some are handsome.

MISSIONS.—When the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales arrived in Little Namaqualand, to which the mission was then confined, they found not one hundred Catholics. In 1893, without any change of population, their number had increased to 150. They now have 7 missions, with churches and resident priests, five other stations regularly attended, 125 conversions during the year, and 98 children were baptized; 122 confirmations, 25 marriages; 3 hospitals and homes for the aged, 8 schools; 3 orphanages; 52 orphans, 8 missionary priests, 3 catechists; 15 missionary sisters aided the mission. Some fifty places are visited yearly by the priests to attend to the spiritual and temporal wants of the people. In several places, all Catholic adults receive Holy Communion on the first Friday of every month and the great feasts of the year. Sella is the residence of the vicar Apostolic, and Hierakílas that of the prefect Apostolic. These results are most encouraging, when the great difficulties confronting the missionaries are considered. In 1909 the approximate statistics for the two missions were: 1 bishop; 11 priests; 3 catechists; 22 missionary sisters; 480 children in Catholic schools; 175 baptisms of children, 315 of adults. In Little Namaqualand the natives understand Dutch, English as well as a little German, besides German, the extremely difficult language of the Hottentots has to be mastered.

For reports and statistics of the missions, consult the following periodicals: Archives apostoliques (Paris), an illustrated monthly; Annuaire apostolique (Vienna); Annual Report of the Board of Missions (Chilis, Maryland). Also Missions Catholiques (Rome, 1897); Statesmen's Year Book (London).

J. J. JENKINS.
Orans (Orante).—Among the subjects depicted in the art of the Roman catacombs one of those most numerousely represented is that of a female figure with extended arms known as the Orans, or one who prays. The custom of praying in antiquity with outstretched, raised arms was common to both Jews and Gentiles; indeed the iconographic type of the Orans was itself strongly influenced by classic representations (see Leclercq, “Manuel d'arch. chrét.”, I, 155). But the meaning of the Orans of Christian art is quite different from that of its prototypes. Numerous Biblical figures, for instance, depicted in the catacombs—Noah, Abraham, Isaac, the Three Children in the Fiery Furnace, Daniel in the lions’ den—are pictured asking the Lord to deliver the soul of the person on whose tombs they are depicted as He once delivered the particular personage represented. But besides these Biblical Orans figures there exist in the catacombs many ideal figures (153 in all) in the ancient attitude of prayer, which, according to Wilpert, are to be regarded as symbols of the deceased’s soul in heaven, praying for its friends on earth. This symbolic meaning accounts for the fact that the great majority of the figures of this order are female, even when depicted on the tombs of men. One of the most convincing proofs that the Orans was regarded as a symbol of the soul is an ancient lead medal in the Vatican Museum showing the martyr, St. Lawrence, under torture, while his soul, in the form of a female Orans, is just leaving the body (see Kraus, “Gesch. der christl. Kunst.”, I, 126, fig. 56). An arcosolium in the Ostrianum cemetery represents an Orans with a petition for her intercession: Victoria Virginis . . . Pete . . . The Acts of St. Cecilia speaks of souls leaving the body in the form of virgins: Vidit egregientes animas coronam de corpore laetabatur quasi virgines de thalamo, and so also the Acts of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus.

Very probably the medieval representations of a diminutive body, figure of the soul, issuing from the mouth of the dying, to be received by angels or demons, were reminiscences of the Orans as a symbol of the soul. The earlier Orantes were depicted in the simplest garb, and without any striking individual traits, but in the fourth century the figures become richly adorned, and of marked individuality—an indication of the approach of historic art. One of the most remarkable figures of the Orans cycle, the celebrant adds: “Amen”. The form is merely an expansion of the usual Oremus before any prayer. It is a medieval amplification. The Jacobite rite has an almost identical form before the Anaphora (Brightman, “Eastern Liturgics”, Oxford, 1896, 80); the Nestorian celebrant says: “My brethren, pray for me” (ib., 274). Such invitations, often made by the deacon, are common in the Eastern rites. The Gallican rite had a similar one (Duchesne, Christian Worship, London, 1901, 109). The Mozarabic invitation at this place is: “Help me brethren by your prayers and pray to God for me” (P. L., LXXV, 537). The medieval derived rites had similar formulae (e. g. “Missale Sarum”, Burntisland, 1861-3, 596). Many of the old Roman Secrets (really Offertory prayers) contain the same ideas. Durandus knows the Orate Fratres in a slightly different form (“Rationale”, IV, 32). A proof that it is not an integral part of the old Roman Mass is that it is always said, not sung, aloud (as also are the prayers at the foot of the altar, the last Gospel etc.). The celebrant after the “Susipe sancta Trinitatis” kisses the altar, turns to the people and says: Orate fratres, extending and joining his hands. Turning back he finishes the sentence mandatorily. At high Mass the deacon or subdeacon, at low Mass the server, answers. The rubric of the Missal is: “The server or people answer, if not the priest himself.” In this last case he naturally changes the word tuis to meis.
Oratorians. See Oratory of Saint Philip Neri.

Oratorio, as at present understood, is a musical composition for solo voices, chorus, orchestra, and continuo, usually drawing its themes from Scripture. The dramatic element contained in the text depends for its expression on the music alone.

The tradition that the oratorio originated in St. Philip Neri's oratory has recently been attacked, notably by the historian and critic E. Schelle, in “Neue Zeitschrift für Musik” (Leipzig, 1904). The exercise that he believes is the oratorio of San Carlo sonata and Santa Maria in Vallicella, at Rome, was unsuitable for the performance of sacred dramas. In refutation, it suffices to recall the established fact that Emighio del Cavaglieri's rappresentazione sacra, "Anima e corpo", had its first performance in the Vallicella (Chiesa Nuova) in 1600, five years after the death of St. Philip. Although the name oratorio was not applied to the new form until sixty years later (Andrea Bontempi, 1624-1703), there is an unbroken tradition connecting the exercises established by St. Philip with the period when the new art-form received its definite character. While in the sixteenth century liturgical polyphonic music reached its highest development, the madrigal and its sonorous, choral form, the madrigal, was the highest form of the oratorio, the scriptural, that is the revolt against the domination of the arts by the spirit of the Church, led to the restoration of Greek monody, and perfectly perfected compositions for one or more voices and instruments which ultimately culminated in the operas of St. Philip. He realized the great power of music, provided in the rule for his congregation, "that his fathers together with the faithful, should rouse themselves to the contemplation of heavenly things by means of musical harmony." He seized upon the good in the new trend and made it the foundation of a new form upon which he, perhaps unconsciously, put a stamp retained ever since. He practically created a style midway between liturgical and secular music. His love of simplicity caused him to oppose and counteract the prevailing artificial semi-pagan, literary, and oratorical style which had its musical counterpart in the display of contrapuntal skill for its own sake practiced to so great an extent at that time. He counted himself masters like Giovanni Annimarcia and Pier Luigi da Palestina, formed them spiritually, and bade them set to music, in simple and clear style, for three or four voices, short poems in the vernacular, generally written by himself, and called "Laudi spirituali." Many of these were preserved by F. Soto di Langia, a musician and a disciple of the saint. Their performance alternated with spiritual reading, prayer, and a sermon by one of the fathers, by a layman, or even by a boy. From these exercises, which attracted enormous crowds, and obtained great renown throughout Italy, it was but a step to the commedia borromane "Amilcarpano," by Orazio Vecchi (1554-1620), a da capo in madrigal form between two choirs (breve form), performed at Meduna in 1704, and the rappresentazione sacra "Anima e corpo", by Cavaglieri. The latter consisted of short phrases for a single voice, more varied in form than the rappresentazione sacra, but not yet sufficiently developed to have a distinct melodicphysognomy, accompanied the instrumental and oratoric numbers, or madrigals. Similar productions multiplied rapidly. Wherever the Oratorians established themselves they cultivated this form to attract the young people. The municipal library of Hamburg contains a collection, gathered by Chrysander, of twenty-two different texts which originated with the disciples of St. Philip during the second half of the seventeenth century. Even more active in the creation and propagation of these musical-dramatic productions throughout this period were the Jesuits, who, especially in Germany, used these musical plays in their schools and colleges everywhere. Up to the latter part of the seventeenth century the burden of the texts for these compositions was either a legend, the history of a conversion, the life of a saint, or the passion of a martyr.

The first great Italian oratorio was that of Carissimi, composed in developing, the oratorio in Italy were Benedetto Ferrari (1597-1681), "Sunson;" Agostino Crivazzii (1578-1610), "Dea pastoral;" Ermolao; Lorito Vittor (1588-1670) "La pellegrina costante," "San Filippo Neri," Giovanni Carissimi (1601-74), through whom the oratorio made a notable advance, and many others. The first work which Carissimi composed of his own texts. His works, with Latin or Italian texts, many of which have been preserved (see Carissimi) together with those of his contemporaries, show practically the same construction as is followed in the present time: recitatives, arias, duets, and terzetos, alternating with single and double choruses and instrumental numbers. The oratorios or narrator (in some scores designated by the word testo, "testo") has replaced scenic display and dramatic action. Carissimi's oratorios exhibit a resourcefulness and charm before unknown. His oratorio "Jephtha" (in an arrangement by Dr. Immanuel Faisst) was performed successfully at Leipzig as recently as 1873. In him, the first representative of Italian oratorio, Vincenzo Scarlatti (1659-1725) a pupil of Francesco Porrebbe and Carissimi. Chief among his works are "I dolori di Maria" and "Il Sacrifico d'Abramo."

About this time the leadership passed to Germany, where Heinrich Schütz (1558-1672) had previously prepared the soil by his compositions known as "Passion music" and other works resembling the Italian oratorio. Others who had received their form in Italy, but whose activity was chiefly confined to Germany, and who transplanted the oratorio thither, were Ignazio Jacob Holzbanker (1711-83), "Bettina liberata;" Johann Adolphus Heesse (1699-1783), "La Conversione di St. Agostino" etc.; Antonio Caldara (1670-1730); Nicolo Jomelli (1714-1774; Marc-Antoine Charpentier (1623-1754), a pupil of Carissimi and a gifted composer, wrote, besides a large number of works for the church, eighteen oratories in the style of his master which had great vogue in France. His "Renome di St. Pierre" has recently been published. Johann Matthias Saxe (1651-1707), the oratorio and the most important in Protestant Germany, was George Philip Telemann (1681-1767), Constantine Beller (1696-1738), and Dietrich Buxtehude (1638-1707).

Through Handel the oratorio attained a position in musical art more important than at any previous period in its history and never surpassed since. In his hands it became the expression of the sturdy Saxon faith unaffected by the spirit of doubt latent in the religious revolt of the sixteenth century. In Germany and Italy, he united in a pre-eminent degree the highest creative gifts. The most productive period of his life was spent in England, and, after having cultivated the opera for a number of years, he finally turned to the oratorio, producing a series of works ("The Messiah", "Israel in Egypt", "Samson", "Jephtha", "Belshazzar", "Sassano") etc. unrivaled for heroic grandeur and brilliancy. It may be said that they express the national religious ideal of a Protestant Christian people more adequately than does their form of worship. This undoubtedly accounts for the interest taken in oratorio performances by the people in England and in Protestant Germany. Joseph Haydn (1732-1809) produced two of the greatest oratorios which we possess: "The Creation" and "The Seasons," which, besides being splendidly written, breathe the most tender piety and joy through an inexhaustible wealth of lyric and lofty music. A third oratorio, "Ritorno di Tobia," on a Biblical text, has not the same importance, nor does Mozart (1756-91), in his only oratorio, "Davidische Penitence," attain the level of artistry of his productions. Ludwig van Beethoven (1770-1827) wrote one oratorio, "The Mount of Olives," which shows him at his best.

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (1809-47), in "Elijah" and "St. Paul," returns to the early Protestant feature of letting the supposed congregation or audience participate in the performance by singing the chorales or church hymns, the texts of which consist of reflections and meditations on what has preceded. From this period the oratorio begins to be cultivated almost exclusively by Catholics, Franz Liszt (1811-86), with his "Christus" and "Legenden der Heiligen Elisabeth," opens up a new and distinctly Catholic flavor of the oratorio, which has practically neglected the oratorio, probably on account of the opera appealing more strongly to French taste and temperament, and because of the lack of amateur singers has, within the last thirty years, furnished a number of remarkable works. Charles-Eugene Gounod (1818-93) with his "Rédemption," and "Missa à Vite," gave a renewed impetus to the cultivation of the oratorio. The "Samson and Delilah" of Camille Saint-Saëns (1835- ) may be performed either as an oratorio or as an opera; as opera it has attained the greater favour. Jules Massenet (1842- ) has essayed the form with his "Eve" and "Mary Magdalen," but his style is entirely too sensational and melodramatic to carry the text. Gabriel Pierné's (1863- ) "Children's Crusade" and the smaller work, "The Children at Bethlehem," have both obtained great popularity in Europe and America.

Italy's sole representative of any note in more than twenty years is Don Lorenzo Perosi (1872- ), with his trilogy "The Passion of Our Lord according to St. Mark," "The Transfiguration of Christ," and "The Resurrection of Lazarus," a "Christmas Oratorio," "Leo the Great," and "The Last Judgement." Belgium and England have produced the three most remarkable exponents of the oratorio within the last fifty years: "César Auguste Franck's" (1822-90) oratorios, "Ruth," "Rebecca," "Redemption," and, above all, his "Beethoven," rank among the greatest of modern works of the kind. Edward William Elgar (1857- ) has become famous by his "Dream of Gerontius" and his "Apostles." But Edgar Tind (1862- ) has probably been the most gifted among the modern Catholics who have reclaimed the oratorio from non-Catholic supremacy. His world-famous "St. Francis of Assisi" is perhaps more remarkable for the spiritual height it reveals than for its dramatic power. Other works of his which have attracted attention are "Godofevra" and "St. Catherme." It is a happyomen that all these authors, in the face-front of present-day composers, command the highest creative and constructive skill which enables them to turn into Catholic channels all the modern conquests in means of expression. The Catholic Oratorio Society of New York was founded in 1901 to promote the knowledge and reproduction of oratorios that best exemplify the religious and artistic ideals of the Catholic Church.

Oratory (Lat. oratorium, from orare, to pray), as a general term, signifies a place of prayer, but technically it means a structure where orations are set aside by ecclesiastical authority for prayer and the celebration of Mass. Oratorios seem to have originated from the chapels erected over the tombs of the early martyrs where the faithful resorted to pray, and also from the necessity of having a place of worship for the people in country districts when churches were not yet erected. Thus, the first early mention of private oratorios for the celebration of Mass by bishops, and later of oratorios attached to convents and to the residences of nobles. In the Eastern Church, where the parochial organization is neither so complete nor so rigid as in the West, private oratorios were so numerous as to constitute an abuse. In the Latin Church oratorios are classified as (1) public, (2) semipublic, and (3) private.

(1) Public Oratorios are canonically erected by the bishop and are perpetually dedicated to the Divine service. They must have an entrance and exit from the public road. Priests who celebrate Mass in public oratories must conform to the office proper to those oratorios, whether secular or regular. If, however, the calendar of an oratory permits a votive Mass to be said, the visiting priest may celebrate in conformity with his own diocesan or regular calendar.

(2) Semipublic Oratorios are those which, though erected in a private building, are dedicated for the use of a community. Such are the oratorios of semipublic, pious congregations, colleges, hospitals, prisons, and such institutions. If, however, there be several oratorios in one house, it is only the one in which the Blessed Sacrament is preserved that has the privileges of a semipublic oratory. All semipublic oratorios (which class technically includes the private chapel of a bishop) are on the same footing as public oratorios in regard to the celebration of Mass. The calendar of feasts to be observed in them (unless they belong to a regular order having its proper calendar) is that of the diocese. In oratorios belonging to nuns, the feasts of their community are to be celebrated in accordance with the decree of their nuns they have received from the Holy See. Regulars visiting a semipublic oratory cannot celebrate the feasts of saints of their own order unless the calendar proper to the oratory prescribes the same or permits of a votive Mass. Public and semipublic oratorios are ordinarily under the control of the bishop. The Congregation of Rites declared (23 Jan., 1899): "In these oratorios, as by the authority of the ordinary, the holy sacrifice of the Mass can be offered, so also all those present thereat can satisfy thereby the precept which obliges the faithful to hear Mass on prescribed days." The same decree also gives an authoritative definition of the three species of orato-}

Oratory of Saint Philip Neri, Tue.—Under this head are included the Italian, Spanish, English, and French foundations which are ruled by St. Philip Neri. The revolt of the sixteenth century, though apparently threatening in its spread and strength the very life of the Church, evoked a marvellous display of its Divine fecundity. That century saw the origin of the Society of Jesus, founded by St. Ignatius Loyola; the Theatines, by St. Cajetan; the Barnabites, by St. Peter Canisius; the Paulists, by St. M. Zaccarino; the Brothers Hospitallers, by St. John of God; the Oratory of St. Philip. The foundation of the last was laid at S. Girolamo, Rome, where his disciples gathered for spiritual instruction. Gradually these conferences took definite shape, and St. Philip, now a priest, constructed an oratory over the aisle of S. Girolamo, where they might be held; from this probably the congregation grew. Neri was the first to take charge of the church of the Florentines, where his disciples who were priests said Mass and preached four sermons daily, interspersed by hymns and popular devotions. Eleven years' work at St. John's proved to the growing community the necessity of having a church of their own and of living under a definite rule. They obtained from the pope the church of S. Maria in Vallicella, rebuilt and now known as the Chiesa Nuova, where the congregation was erected by Gregory XIII, 15 July, 1575. The new community was to be a congregation of secular priests living under obedience, but bound by no vows. No particular was St. Philip on this point that he ruled, that even if the number of members of the community should exceed the relative competency of the community who did not possess the property of the church. "Abaqueh possidente," were St. Philip's words. Another characteristic of the institute was the fact that each house was independent, and when it was represented to him, that while one house might have a surplus and another a deficit, both would benefit by a transfer of surplus to deficit, or be more numerous community, he replied, "Let each house live by its own vitality, or perish of its own decadence." His motive probably was to exclude the possibility of any community lingering in a state of decay.

The rule, an embodiment of St. Philip's mode of governing, was not drawn up till seventeen years after his death, and was finally approved by Paul V in 1612. The provost is elected for three years by a majority of all the decennial Fathers, i.e., those who have been ten years in the congregation. To assist him in the government of the congregation four deputies are elected. Matters of importance are referred to a general congregation, only the decennial Fathers voting. Admission to the congregation is also by election, and the candidate must be "natus ad institutum" between the ages of eighteen and forty, and possessed of sufficient income to maintain himself. The novitiate lasts three years, and was probably thus extended to test thoroughly the vocation to an institute not bound by vows. At the conclusion of the three years, the novice, if approved becomes a triennial Father and a member of the congregation, but he has no elective vote till his ten years are completed, when by election he becomes a decennial. Expulsion is effected by a majority of two-thirds of the voters. No member is allowed to take any ecclesiastical dignity. Regulations for the clothing, mode of life in the community, and for the refectory are also laid down. The object of the institute is threefold; prayer, preaching, and the sacraments. "Prayer" includes special care in carrying out the liturgical Offices, the Fathers being present in choir at the principal feasts, as well as assisting the daily offices as far as the circumstances of their engagements imply their frequent reception, which had fallen into disuse at the foundation of the Oratory. For this purpose one of the Fathers is to sit daily in the confessional, and all are to be present in their confessional on the eve of feasts. The mode of direction as taught Gregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments of 7 Feb., 1899. According to this, private oratories are common, and ordinary Sunday Mass is only recanted when public infirmity, or difficulty of access to a public church or as a reward for services done to the Holy See or to the Catholic cause. The grant of a private oratory may be temporary or for the life of the grantee, according to the nature of the cause that is adduced. In either case, the simple concession of an oratory implies that only one Mass be celebrated, or, if any others are to be celebrated, that the entire grant of the Church concerning the hearing of Mass on prescribed days (certain special festivals generally specified in the indult excluded) may be there satisfied only by the grantee, and that the determination of the place, city, and diocese where the oratory is to be erected is approved. The oratory shall be reserved to the exclusive use of the grantee, and shall not be used for any purpose other than for Mass and for the other devotions of the Roman Rite. The grantee must be a priest, and the house must be a permanent residence of the grantee. The grantee may not be a public person, and the house must be free of all debts. The grantee must live in the house, and the house must be open to the public for Mass. The grantee may not use the house for any purpose other than for Mass and for the other devotions of the Roman Rite.

by St. Philip is to be gentle rather than severe, and abuses are to be attacked indirectly. "Once let a little love find entrance to their hearts," said St. Philip, "and the rest will follow."

Preaching" included, as has been said, four sermons on successional days, an almost impossible strain upon the hearers as it would now appear, but the discourses at the Oratory had an attraction of their own. Savonarola had already compared the inability of the preachers of his day to awaken dead souls with their subtle arguments and rhetorical periods, to the impotent efforts of the flute-players to revivify by their musical mode the ears of John the Baptist's daughter, and Benso in St. Philip's day reiterated this reproach. "What can I hear in sermons?" he says, "but Doctor Subtilis striving with Doctor Angelicus, and Aristotle coming in as a third to decide the quarrel."

The sermons at the Oratory were free from these defects. They were simple and familiar discourses; the first an exposition on some point of the spiritual reading which preceded them and therefore impromptu; the next would be on some text of Holy Scripture; the third on ecclesiastical history, and the fourth on the lives of the saints. Each sermon lasted half an hour, when a bell was rung and the preacher at once ceased speaking. The first three produced such a demand for the fourth that Bembo, a penitent of the saint, composed many of the Luxi which were sung. Their excellence excited the admiration of foreigners. John Evelyn in his diary, 8 November, 1644, speaks of himself as ravished with the entertainment of the sermon by a boy and the musical services at the Roman Oratory. Animacens, choirmaster at St. Peter's, attended constantly to lead the singing. In close connexion with the Oratory is the Brotherhood of the Little Oratories, a confraternity of clerics and laymen, first formed from the disciples of St. Philip who assembled in his room for mental prayer and Mass on Sundays, visited in turn a hospital daily, and celebrated Mass at the exercises of the Passion on Friday. They made together the pilgrimage of the seven churches, especially at carnival time, and their devout and recollected demeanour converted many.

The "exercises," as the Oratory services were called, aroused bitter opposition. The preachers were determined to avoid the side-tracks of scholarship abstract speculation, and the processes were forbidden, and St. Philip himself was suspended from preaching. He submitted at once and forbad any action being taken in his favour. At length Paul IV, having made due investigation, sent for him and bade him go on with his good work. But the Pope's decision, far from diminishing, seemed to recall the simplicity of the Apostolic times: Bacci testifies to the holiness of many under St. Philip's care. Among the most celebrated members were Baronius, author of the "Ecclesiastical Annals," and the "Martyrology," to prepare him for which work St. Philip obliged him to preach the history of the Church for thirty years in the Oratory; Bonzo Tommaso, author of many learned works; B. Giovanni Aenea, Superior of the Oratory at Naples, and later Bishop of Saluzzo, a close friend of St. Francis de Sales; B. Antonio Grassi of the Oratory of Ferrara; B. Sebastiano Valerio, the "Apostle of Tarn," and founder of the Oratory there. The Oratory Library of S. Maria in Vallicella is celebrated for the number and quality of its contents, among them the well-known Codex Vallincensis. Up to 1600 the Oratory continued to spread through Italy, Sicily, Spain, Portugal, Poland, and other European countries; in South America, Brazil, India, Ceylon, the founder of which was the ecclesiastic missionary Giovanni Maria da Maragonia, the Oratory was in various places despised and suppressed, but the congregation recovered and, after a second suppression in 1689, again revived; many of its houses still exist.

Oratorians, English.—The Oratory was founded in England by Cardinal Newman in 1847. Converted in 1845, he went to Rome in 1846 and with the advice of Pius IX selected the Oratory of St. Philip Neri as best adapted for his future work. After a short novitiate at Santa Croce he returned to England and founded the Oratory. He established himself at Maryvale, Old Oscott, where in 1848 he was joined by Father Faber and his Wilfridian community. After a temporary sojourn at St. Wilfrid's, Staffordshire, and Alcester St., Birmingham, the community found a permanent home at Edgbaston, a suburb of that town, in 1854. The present site of the English congregation is substantially that of the Roman. The Fathers live under St. Philip's Rule and carry out his work.

In compliance with a widely expressed wish of English Catholics, Cardinal Newman founded at Edgbaston a still flourishing higher class school for boys. A Brotherhood of the Little Oratory is also attached to the community and the exercises are a focus of spiritual life. Among the best known writers of the English Oratory are, besides its illustrious head, Father Caswell, a poet, Father Ignatius Ryder, a controversialist and essayist, and Father Pope. A Newman memorial church in the classical style was opened in 1910. The library contains among many valuable works Cardinale Newman's "The London Oratory." In 1849 Cardinal Newman sent a detachment of his community to found a house in London. Premises were secured at 24 and 25 King William St., Strand, a chapel was speedily arranged, and on 31 May, Cardinal Wiseman assisted pontifically and preached Mass. A "visit of devotion" was arranged for the following Sunday, the congregation being gathered at Vespers the sermon on "Prospects of the Catholic Missioner" being given in "Discourses to Mixed Congregations." The Catholic Directory of 1849 shows that the Oratory at King William St. was the first public church served by a religious community to be opened in the diocese. The exercises of the English Oratory, and the hymns composed by Father Faber and the Roman deacons and processions, then strange to England, seemed to many a hazardous innovation. Time proved the popularity of the exercises, and Father Faber's preaching attracted large crowds. His spiritual works published year by year increased the interest of his Oratory. The biographies edited by him, forty-two in number, in spite of their literary defects, did a great work in setting forth the highest examples of Christian holiness. The community removed to their present site in South Kensington in 1854, and in 1887 their new church was opened. In 1887, Father Faber and Father重症作者, translator of Father's "Popes" (vols. I-VI, St. Louis, 1902) and the "Preface dell' Oratorio"
Oratory, French Congregation of the, founded at Paris at the beginning of the seventeenth century by Cardinal Pierre de Bérulle (q. v.), who, in Bossuet’s words, “made glister in the Church of France the pure and bright lamps of the spiritual life, and of the ecclesiastical life.” It was precisely to work more effectively towards the rehabilitation of the ecclesiastical life that Cardinal de Bérulle founded (in 1611) the new congregation, which he named after that of St. Philip Neri, adopting also in part the rules and constitutions of the latter. To meet the special needs of the French monarchy and because of the tendency toward centralization which “especially from this period forms one of the dominant characteristics of the French national spirit” (Perrand), he made one very important modification; whereas in the Italian congregation the houses were independent of one another, de Bérulle placed the government of all the houses in the hands of the superior-general. On 10 May, 1613, Paul III issued a Bull approving the new institute, which now made great progress. During the lifetime of its founder, more than fifty houses were either established or united to the Oratory; subsequently there were more than twice this number, divided into four provinces. As St. Philip had no direct control over the Oratorians of the provinces and their priests, the members were bound by no vows except those of the priesthood, and had for sole aim the perfect fulfilment of their priestly functions. The Congregation of the Oratory is not a teaching order; Oratorians have directed many colleges, notably de Juilly; but neither this nor instruction in seminaries was ever the sole object of the congregation; it was first to organize seminaries in France according to the ordinances of the Council of Trent. The congregations of M. Bourdoise, St. Nicolas du Chardonnet, Saint-Sulpice, and Saint-Lazare were all inspired by the ideas of Cardinal de Bérulle. The definite aim and characteristic of the French Oratory is in the words of Cardinal Perrand “the pursuit of sacretotal perfection.”

The supreme authority of the congregation is vested in the superior-general (elected for life) and in the general assemblies convoked regularly every three years—or extraordinarily immediately on the resignation or death of a general. These assemblies are divided into two classes—priests who are members in the congregation and three in the priesthood; the number of members is one out of every two Oratorians thus qualified, and they are elected by all Oratorian priests three years in the congregation. The general assemblies appoint all the officers—a superior general (if necessary), his three assistants, the visitors, the procurator general, and the secretary general. They also examine and decide upon all questions of any importance concerning the congregation in general; the general and his assistants, in the interval between the assemblies, exercise only ordinary administration. The founder, who died at the altar in 1629, was succeeded by Father Charles de Condren, who, like Father de Bérulle, was imbued with the spirit of the Oratorians from his youth. Even during his life, Saint Jeanne de Chantal wrote of him that “it would seem that Father de Condren was capable of teaching the angels”; St. Vincent de Paul was wont to say that “there had never been a man like him.” Father de Condren continued the work of the Oratorian, completing its organization according to the intentions of its founder. Among his works must be especially remembered the part he played in the institution of Saint-Sulpice, whose founder, the saintly and celebrated Olier (q. v.), was under his direction. He died in 1641; his remains, recovered by the present writer in 1884, are now preserved in the choir of the chapel of the college of Juilly. The succeeding generals were: François Bourgoing (q. v.; 1641–62); François Senault (1662–72), a celebrated preacher; Abel-Louis de Saint-Marthe, who resigned in 1696, only to die the following year. During his generalship the congregation was greatly disturbed by the troubles of Jansenism (see A. M. P. Ingold, “Le pretenda jansenisme du P. de Ste-Marthe,” P. S. H., 1886). There was the same disturbance under his successor, Father Pierre de Béry of La Tour (1696–1733), who began by appealing against the bull “Unigenitus”, with the Archbishop of Paris and a large part of the French clergy. Later, however, having a better knowledge of the facts, he revoked his appeal, and also obtained the submission of Cardinal de Bérulle, hence the Oratory was not a doctrinal one, but arose rather from considerations of discipline and opportuneness. Many Oratorian have been enumerated on this point by prejudiced or ignorant historians, as the present writer has endeavoured to prove in several publications. Father d’Aprez de la Tour was one of the most esteemed spiritual directors of his time. The seventh general was Father Thomas de la Valette (1753–72); the eighth, Father Louis de Muly (1773–9); the ninth, Father Sauvé Moisset (1779–90).

On the death of this last, at the height of the French Revolution, the congregation was unable to meet in a general assembly to elect a successor, and was soon dissolved in the banishments so many so successfully endeavoured to overwhelm the Church in France; but, in dying, the Oratory again attested to its faithful attachment to the Chair of Peter. If some of the Oratorians at this time supported Constitutionalism, the great majority remained faithful to the Catholic Faith, and a certain number among them paid for their fidelity by their lives (q. v.; Ingold, Saint-Charles, etc.).

It was only in 1832 that the French Congregation of the Oratory was restored by Father Gratry (q. v.) and Father Péretot, the latter, who was earlier pastor of Saint-Roch de Paris, becoming first superior-general of the revived institute. In 1834 he resigned and was replaced by Father (later Cardinal) Perrand. Father Péretot died in 1857. Father Perrand’s successor, Father Marius Nouvellé, still governs the congregation, which, greatly weakened by the persecution which reigns in France, numbers only a few members, residing for the most part in Paris.

The French Oratory at various stages in its history has given a large number of distinguished men to the Church. Among sesorials, de Winter was a Jesuit; Massillon (q. v.), and Mascaron; philosophers like Mably (q. v.); theologians like Thomasin (q. v.), Morin (q. v.); exegetes like Houbigant (q. v.), Richard Simon, Dugnet. One must note, however, that the last two were forced to leave the congregation where they had been trained—the former on account of the rashness of his excesses, the latter in consequence of his Jansenistic tendencies.

Naturally, the Oratory of France exercised little direct influence in foreign countries, except through its houses, St. Louis-des-Français in Rome, Madrid, and Lisbon. In connexion with England, Father de Bérulle’s mission with twelve of his confresseurs at the court of Henrietta of France (1625), wife of the unfortunate Charles I, must be remembered. Among the Oratorians were Father Horby de Sancy, Father de Balfour, the latter of an old English family, and Father Robert Philips, a Scot, and theologian of great merit, who entered the Oratory in 1617 after having been a Jesuit and then a Protestant. When Protestant intolerance forced the other Oratorians to leave England, Father Philips remained as confessor to the queen, and in 1641 returned with her to France, where he died in 1647. Later other English ecclesiastics joined the Oratory. Among the best known are: Father William Chalmers of Aberdeen (d. about 1680), who entered the Oratory in 1627, author Orbellis, Father Bourgoing, stationed him at Notre-Dame-des-Vertus, near Paris, at the head of a seminary for English Catholic priests which he had founded, and for which the English clergy thanked the Oratory in a beautiful letter of congratulation. After 1661 Father Gough lived in Paris as almoner of the Queen of England. He died of apoplexy in 1682, without publishing the commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul with immediate reference to the Protestant controversy, which he had been preparing for many years. In contrast to this illustrious convert is Father Levandor of Orleans, who entered the Oratory in 1667. A man of ability, but, according to Ratterer, "too fond of sport and good cheer", he ended by leaving the Oratory and apostatizing, and died in England in 1718, in a cation in the Established Church.

Orcagna, Nicola di, Franciscan theologian and philosopher, Scotist; b. about 1400; d. at Rome, 1475. He seems to have entered the monastery of the Observantines, founded in 1407, one of the first of "Disputaciones philosophicae" (1630) and an edition of various patristic works (1631). After leaving the Oratory in 1637, he published several other works, including "A Brief History of the Church in Scotland" (1643). Father John Whyte, of Loughill in Ireland, entered the Oratory in 1647 and died a member in 1678. He was also a noted theologian and published "Theoremata ex universa theologica" (1670). A still more distinguished member about this period was Father Stephen Gough of Sussex. At first chaplain to the Anglican Archbishop of Canterbury and doctor at Oxford, he was converted to Catholicism by the Oratorians of the court of Henrietta of France, whom we mentioned above, and in 1652 entered the Oratory of Paris, at the age of twenty-seven. The general of the in France. He appears to have been professor of theology and philosophy in the University of Angers, where he enjoyed great reputation as an expositor of the teaching of John Duns Scotus. After 1645 he wrote his chief work, a commentary on the Four Books of Sentences. He was interred in the church of the Ara Coeli on the Capitoline. His chief works are: "Expositio in IV Sententiarum Libros", a compilation based on the teachings of John Duns Scotus, published first at Rouen without date or place (s. l. et a.) and then at Rouen without the year (s. a.); at Paris, twice in 1588, again in 1599, 1511, and 1517; at Lyons, 1503; at Hagenau, 1503; Venice, 1507; "Expositio in XII Libros Metaphysicorum Aristotelis secundum viam Scoti" (Bologna, 1585; Paris, 1505); "Ex-famous fresco of "The Last Judgment", still to be seen in the Strozzi chapel in S. Maria Novella, a composition inspired by the "Divina Commedia", and comprising the Judgment, Paradise, and Hell as its three parts. This fresco has been erroneously attributed to Simone Martini, but Lorenzo Ghiberti testifies to its being the work of Nardo. In the same way, the "Triumph of Death" and "The Last Judgment" in the Camposanto of Pisa, owing to their similarity to the S. Maria Novella fresco, used to be attributed to Nardo and Andrea di Cione. Both these works were registered in the Florentine Guild of Painters in 1357. In that year Andrea (Orcagna) collaborated with Francesco di Talento on a plan for the enlargement of S. Maria del Fiore. In 1358 he executed mosaics for the façade of the cathedral of Orvieto. Vasari makes Andrea Pisano his master in the art of sculpture, but this honour is more probably due to Neri di Fioravante, his sponsor when he matriculated in the Guild of "masters of stone and wood", in 1352.

According to Vasari, the Brotherhood of Orcanmichele took the offerings made to the Blessed Virgin during the plague of 1348 and used them to build around her image an elaborately ornamented marble tabernacle, which was completed in 1359. For brilliance and richness of architecture as well as of decoration, Burchardt regards this tabernacle as the most perfect work of its kind in Italian Gothic. The mysteries of the life of the Blessed Virgin are represented in bas-relief with a series of allegorical figures of the Virtues. The Announcement of Mary's Death and the Assumption are especially worthy of note. This tabernacle of Orcamichele is Orcagna's only authentic sculptural work, but his manner is discernible in the "Annunciation" of Santa Croce and in the bas-reliefs of the Campanile of S. Maria del Fiore which represent the Virtues and Liberal Arts.

The chief paintings of Orcagna which have survived are: a St. Matthew, painted, in collaboration with his brother Jacopo, for S. Maria Novella, now in the Uffizi; a "Virgin with Angels", in the Sommè collection at Brussels; a "Vision of St. Bernard", in the Academy of Florence; a "Coronation of the Virgin", executed for San Pier Maggiore, Florence, now in the National Gallery, London. Both Strozzi commissioned Orcagna to paint an altar-piece for the same chapel in which Nardo had painted the frescoes. This re-table is divided into five parts: in the centre Christ is enthroned, a pyramidal crown on his brow, two little angels at his feet, playing music; at Christ's right hand is the Blessed Virgin, presenting St. Thomas Aquinas to Him; at His left hand is the Precursor who indicates Christ to a kneeling St. Peter. In the last two compartments are seen, on one side St. Lawrence and St. Paul, on the other St. Michael and St. Catherine. Orcagna was commissioned in the following year to paint the life of the Blessed Virgin on the walls of the choir of S. Maria Novella. These works were ruined by dampness due to a leaking roof, but were restored by Ghirlandajo who drew his inspiration from the "inventions of Orcagna" (Vasari).

Orcistus, titulus see in Galatia Secunda. It is only mentioned in Peutinger's "Table". An inscription of 331 finds the site at Akleid Yafa, also called Alekian, in the vilayet of Angora. It was then a station at the intersection of four roads and formed part of the "Diocese of Asia"; consequently it must have belonged to Phrygia. In 451 it was in Galatia Secunda or Satalus, probably from the formation of that province about 386 A.D. The name comes from a tribe called Orvi, which dwelt in the plains of the eastern frontier of Phrygia. Only three bishops are known: Domnus, at Epipseis (451); Longinus, at Chaledon (451); and Segermus, at Constantiople (462). But the see is mentioned by the "Notitiae episcopatuum" until the thirteenth century among the suffragans of Pessinus, were Leake, Asia Minor, 71; Hamilton, Researches in Asia Minor, 1, 146; Ramsay, Asia Minor, 228; Le Quien, Oriens Christian., 1, 493.

S. Petrides.

Ordeals (Judicium Dei; Anglo-Saxon, ordal; Ger. Urteil) were a means of obtaining evidence by trials, through which, by the direct interposition of God, the guilt or innocence of an accused person was firmly established, in the event that the truth could not be proved by ordinary means. These trials owed their existence to the firm belief that an omniscient and just God would not permit an innocent person to be regarded as guilty and punished in consequence, but that He would, by His act, proclaim the truth. The ordeals were either imposed by the presiding judge, or chosen by the contesting parties themselves. It was expected that God, approving the act imposed or permitted by an authorized judge, would give a distinct manifestation of the truth to reveal the guilt or innocence of the accused. It was believed that ordeals were incapable of error; that an equitable judgment must surely result. Ordeals are of two kinds: those undergone only by the accused, and those taken part in by both parties to the action. It was the common opinion that the decision of God was made known in the result of the test, either immediately or after a short time. Ordeals were resorted to when the contesting parties were unable to bring further evidence, for according to the ancient German law, the production of evidence was not arranged for by the court itself, but was left to the contestants.

Ordeals were known and practised by various peoples of antiquity, and are still to be met with to-day among uncivilized tribes. The Code of Hammurabi in Babylonia (1800 B.C.) expresses the ancient Babylonian belief that a person accused of a certain crime was subjected to the test of cold water, which consisted in the person's plunging into a river; if the river bore him away his guilt was established; if he remained quiet and uninjured in the water, his innocence was believed to have been proved. This "Dammus" ("Died he, it is clear"); in Jealousy, in the Hittites' law code, 1700 B.C.; the Jews exercised the test of the Water of Jealousy, conducted by the priests, in which a woman accused of adultery must consume the draught in their presence, after having offered certain sacrifices, and the effects of which established the woman's guilt or innocence (Num., v. 12-31). Another test was to be found likewise among various kinds of ordeals, particularly that of the red-hot iron. This test of holding a red-hot iron was also known among the Greeks. The Romans, however, with their highly-developed system of dispensing justice, did not employ this means of obtaining proof. Ordeals found their chief development among the Germanic peoples, in Germany itself as well as in those kingdoms which came into existence after the migration of the nations, in the old Roman Provinces of Gaul, Italy, and Britain. They were an essential part of the judicial system of the Germanic races in pagan times, were preserved and developed after the conversion of these peoples to Christianity, became widespread and were in constant use.

The Christian missionaries did not in general cancel this practice. They opposed only the duel, and endeavored to minimize the barbarity attendant upon the practice of ordeals. By prayer and religious ceremonies, by the bearing of holy Mass and the reception of holy communion before the ordeal, the missionaries sought to give to it a distinctly religious character. The liturgical prayers and ceremonies are to be found in Franz, "Die kirchlichen Benediktionen im Mittelalter" (Freiburg im Br., 1899), II, 364 sqq.; the celebrants of Mass on the occasion of the ordeal, in "Das Missen in deutscher Mittelalter" (Freiburg im Br., 1902), 213 sqq. This attitude of the clergy in regard to ordeals may be explained if one takes into consideration the religious ideas of the times, as well as the close connexion which existed between ordeals and the Germanic judicial system.

The purpose of ordeals was to find jurors who were properly qualified, perjury frequently resulted, and the oath could be rejected by the opposing party. In such cases, the ordeal was brought forward as a substitute in determining the truth, the guilt, or the innocence. This mode of procedure was tolerated by the Church in Germanic countries in the early Middle Ages. A thoroughgoing opposition to ordeals would have had little prospect of success. The only bishop to take measures against the practice of ordeals during the conversion to Christianity of the Germanic races was St. Avitus of Vienne (c. 615). Before the battle of Tolbiac (496) he attacked the judicial duel and other ordeals in two writings ("Liber adversus legem Grundobadii et Liber contra iudicia Dei", in Migne, P. L., CIV, 125 sqq., 254 sqq.). On the other hand, shortly afterwards, Archbishop Hincmar of Reims, at the time of the matrimonial disagreement between King Lothair and Theutberga, declared himself to be of the opinion that ordeals were permissible, on support of which he must assuredly have brought forward noteworthy arguments ("De divortio Lothari regis et Theutberga", in Migne, P. L., CXXV, 659-80; cf. also Hincmar's, "Epistola ad Hildericum episcopum", ibid., 161 sqq.). The universal opinion among the peoples of the Frankish kingdom favoured the authorization of ordeals, and the same may be said of Britain. In 800 in the Capitulary of Aachen, Charlemagne declared: "that all should believe in the ordeal without the shadow of a doubt" (Mon. Germ. Hist., Capitul. I, 130). In the Byzantine Empire also, we encounter in the later Middle Ages instances of ordeals, introduced from the countries of the West.

The ordeals, strictly speaking, of the Germanic countries are the following:

1. The duel, called judicium Dei in the Book of Laws of the Burgundian King Gundobad (c. 590). (Mon. Germ. Hist., Leges, II, 537.) The outcome of the judicial duel was looked upon as the judgment of God. Only freemen were qualified to take part, and women and ecclesiastics were permitted to appoint substitutes. The duel originated in the pagan times of the Germanic peoples. In certain individual nations were to be found various usages and regulations regarding the judicial duel, which was afterwards to be of such importance. The Church combated the judicial duel; Nicholas I declared it to be an infringement of the law of God and of the laws of the Church ("Epist. ad Carolum Calvum", in Migne, P. L., CXIX, 1144), and several later popes spoke against it. Ecclesiastics were forbidden to take part in a duel either personally, or through a substitute. Only English books of ritual of the later Middle Ages contain a formula for the blessing of the shield and the sword for use in the judicial duel; otherwise, no medieval Ritual contains prayers for these ordeals, a proof that they were not looked upon favourably by the Church.

2. The cross, in which both parties, the accuser and the accused, stood before a cross with arms outstretched in the form of a cross. Whoever first let fall his arms was defeated. The earliest information we possess regarding this form of ordeal dates from the ninth century. It was destined to replace the duel, and was prescribed by various capitularies of the ninth century, especially for disputes with ecclesiastics.

3. The hot iron, employed in various ways, not only in courts of law, where the accused in ancient times to prove his innocence must pass through fire or place his hand in the fire, but also against the possibility of lies, and to reveal the truth in other ways. The judicial test by fire, as an ordeal, was ordinarily conducted in the following manner: the accused must walk a certain distance (nine feet, among the Anglo-Saxons) bearing a bar of red-hot iron in his hands, or he must pass barefoot over red-hot ploughshares (usually nine). If he remained unharmed, his innocence was considered established. Medieval ecclesiastical Rituals of various dioceses contain prayers and ceremonies for use before the undergoing of the test. The accused was also obliged to prepare himself beforehand by confession and fasting.

4. Hot water, or the cauldron. The accused must draw a stone with his naked arm from the bottom of a vessel filled with hot water, after which the arm was bound up and the bandage sealed; three days later it was removed, and, according to the condition of his arm, the accused was considered innocent or guilty. The religious ceremonies for this ordeal were similar to those used of the ordeal of the sword.

5. Cold water, in use at an early date among the Germanic races, and which continued to be practised notwithstanding the prohibition of the Emperor Louis the Pious in 829. The accused, with hands and feet bound, was cast into the water; if he sank, he was considered guilty; if he floated upon the water, his innocence was believed to be established. For this test also, the accused prepared himself by fasting, confession, and communion, and by assisting at Mass.

6. The blessed morsel (judicium offer, Anglo-Saxon coroned, wellehead), which consisted in the consuming by the accused of a piece of bread and a piece of cheese in the church before the altar, the morsels being blessed with special prayers. If he was able to swallow them, his innocence was established, but if not, he was considered guilty. This test was in use principally among the Anglo-Saxons. It is not mentioned in the ancient Germanic codes of the Continent.

7. A log of wood, or a cauldron, or a dish of water. The accused was baked by a deacon from meal and blessed water, through which a stick of wood was passed. The suspected person then appeared with two witnesses, between whom the bread was suspended, which, if it turned in a circle, was supposed to be a proof of guilt.

8. The Psalm, which consisted in clamping into the Book of Psalms a stick of wood with a knot attached, and then placing the whole in an opening made in another piece of wood, so that the book could turn. The guilt of the accused was established if the Psalm turned from west to east, and his innocence, if it turned in a contrary direction.

9. The Exorcism.—Though forms of prayer in connexion with its use have been handed down to us, they do not give us a clear idea of how this test was conducted. It would seem to have been practised but seldom. It appears to have been an ordeal decided by lot, or by the measuring of the accused by a stick of a determined length.

10. Bleeding the Hands, but also to prove the authenticity of the murder was forced to look upon the body or the wounds of the victim. If the wounds then began to bleed afresh, the guilt was supposed to have been proved.

In addition to these forms of genuine ordeals, two other kinds are frequently considered, which, however, do not exactly correspond to the idea of a judgment of God, as in their case there is no question of a direct establishment of a fact by the interposition of God. The first of these is the oath, which is but a means of establishing upon God, but which is not in any sense a judgment of God. It was confirmed by the binding of the law that the perjured would, sooner or later, be overtaken by death, which was God's punishment for perjury, but this was not a judicial ordinance. The same is true of the Eucharistic test. The firm belief existed that if anyone to prove his innocence should receive Holy Communion, he would, if guilty, be punished by God with instant death. Hence also it is questioned of Divineenchatement; the judgment however not taking place by means of a judicial process. When at the Synod of Worms in 808 it was ordered that the bishops and priests should clear themselves of suspicion by the celebration of Mass, and the monks by the reception of Holy Communion, this was in reality of the same significance as the oath of purification, by which those under shadow of suspicion swore to their innocence.

The ecclesiastical authorities of the Frankish and Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, as we have remarked above, were very broad-minded in their acceptance of the greater number of species of ordeals; several councils punished offenses occurring therein. See "Konzilengeschichte," 2 ed., III, 611, 614, 623, 680, 732; IV, 555; Synod of Tribur (895), IV, 672; Synod of Schagen (1022). Ordeals were practised in Britain, France, and Germany in connexion with legal processes before civil as well as ecclesiastical tribunals up to and during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. From then on they were gradually discontinued.

The tribunals of Rome never made use of ordeals. The popes were always opposed to them, and began, at an early date, to take measures for their suppression. It is true that in the beginning no general decree was published regarding them; however, in individual cases broaches or oaths were made to Rome, and the popes always pronounced against the practice, and designated it as unlawful. This course was followed by Nicholas I when, in 867, he prohibited the duel by which King Lothair sought to decide his matrimonial dispute with Theutberga. The latter had previously, through one of her servants, submitted to the test of the hot water and the glowing iron, and received an oath, with favourable results. Upon the inquiry of the Archbishop of Mainz as to whether or not the tests of the hot water and the glowing iron could lawfully be made use of in the case of parents who were accused of having smothered their sleeping child, Stephen V (885-891) forbade these ordeals (Durr. C. 29, C. II, qu. 5). Alexander II (1061-73) likewise condemned these tests, and Alexander III (1159-81) prohibited the bishop and the clergy of the Diocese of Uspala from conducting a duel or other ordeal imposed by law, as such a practice was disapproved of by the Catholic Church. Before long definite condemnations were published by the popes, as for example, that of Clement III (1189-1191) in his decretal of St. Benedict. At the Council of the Lateran in 1215, Innocent III promulgated a general decree against ordeals, which prohibited anyone from receiving the blessing of the Church before submitting to the test of the hot water or to that of the glowing iron, and confirming the validity of the previous prohibition against the duel (Cod. th. 13, 1, 5, 47).

Several accounts in regard to the operation of the popes in the practice of ordeals in Frankish times which are contained in apocryphal writings have no historical value. From the twelfth century, a thorough and widespread opposition to ordeals, as a result of the statements by the popes, began to manifest itself generally. When the popes, at one time or another, were found to support Agobard of Lyons in his opposition to these tests, which was without result, the writings of Peter Cantor (d. 1197) against the proceedings of the civil courts with regard to ordeals (in his "Verba abbreviatum"), Migne, P. L., CCV, 226 sqq.) had a far greater success. In "Tristan," Gottfried of Strasbourg sets forth his disapproval of ordeals.

As a result of the General Council of 1215, several synods of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries published prohibitions in this connexion. A synod held at Vallenfald in 1322 declares in Can. xxvii: "The tests of fire and water are forbidden; whoever participates in them is ipso facto excommunicated!" Hefele, "Konzilengeschichte," 4, 610. The Emperor Frederick II also prohibited the duel and other ordeals in the Constitution of Belfi, 1231 (Michael, "Geschichte der deutschen Volks", I, 318). Nevertheless, there are to be found in Germanic code books as late as the thirteenth century, regulations for their use. However, a clearer recognition of the false ground for belief in ordeals, a more highly-developed judicial system, the fact that the innocent must be victims of the ordeal, the prohibitions of the popes and the synods, the refusal of the ecclesiastical authorities to cooperate in the carrying out of the sentence—all these causes worked together to bring about, during the course of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the gradual discontinuance of the practice. The ancient test of the cold water was resuscitated in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in the ducking of so-called witches, consequent upon the trials for witchcraft.

ORDER, Supernatural. See Supernatural Order.

Order VITALIS, historian, b. 1075; d. about 1143. He was the son of an English mother and a French priest who came over to England with the Normans and remained there. At the age of ten he was sent over by his father to St. Evrout in southern Normandy and remained for the rest of his life a monk of that abbey. He must have travelled occasionally; we have evidence of his presence at Cambray, for instance, and at Chiny, and he went three or four times to England; still he passed most of his days at home. He considered himself, however, an Englishman, "Vitalis Angilgena", and was always full of interest in English affairs. His history was intended at first to be a chronicle of his abbey but it developed into a general "Historia Ecclesiastica" in 13 books. Books I and II are an abridged chronicle from the Christian era to 1143; books III-V describe Normandy and England; books VI-XII, especially book VI, give the history of his abbey. Books VII-XIII consist of his universal history from 751 to 1141, book IX being devoted to the first Crusade. The work begins to have real historical importance from about the date of the Norman Conquest, but Ordericus is discriminating throughout in his choice of authorities. Chronologically it is ill-arranged and very inaccurate; it is often pedantic in form. The author has, however, a wide interest and a keen sense of detail and picturesque incident. He was a very well-read man, but he united to his learning a taste seldom so frankly admitted for popular stories and songs. He was a man of observation and he attempted to have a narrative the barest description of the described. He was fair-minded, anxious to give two sides of a question and to be moderate in his judgments. In spite, therefore, of its clumsy arrangements and chronological Orders, Holy.—Order is the appropriate disposition of things equal and unequal, by giving each its proper place (St. Aug., "De civ. Dei," XIX, xiii). Order primarily means a relation. It is used to designate that on which the relation is founded and thus generally means rank (St. Thom., "Suppl." Q. xxiv, a. 2, ad 4am). In this sense it was applied to clergy and laity (St. Jer., "In Isiania," XIX, 18; St. Greg. the Great, "Moral." XXXII, xx). The meaning was restricted later to the hierarchy as a whole or to the cardinal ranks of the church. The word "ceremony" and the early Church had already used the word in that sense, but generally with a qualifying adjective (Tert., "De exhort. cast.," vii, ordo sacerdotalis; St. Greg. of Tours, "Vit. patr.", X, i, ordo clericorum). Order is used to signify not only the particular rank or general status to which a person belongs but also the power by which they are raised to that status, and thus stands for ordination. It also indicates what differentiates laity from clergy or the various ranks of the clergy, and thus means spiritual power. The Sacrament of Order is the sacrament by which grace and spiritual power for the discharge of ecclesiastical offices are conferred.

Christ founded His Church as a supernatural society, the Kingdom of God. In this society there must be the power of ruling; and also the principles by which the members are to attain their supernatural end, viz., supernatural truth, which is held by faith, and supernatural grace by which man is formally elevated to the supernatural order. Thus, besides the powers of jurisdiction which has also a duty of teaching (ordination) and the power of conferring grace (power of ordination). This power of order was committed by our Lord to His Apostles, who were to continue His work and to be His earthly representatives. The Apostles received their power from Christ: "as the Father hath sent me, I also send you" (John, xx, 21). Christ possessed fullness of power in virtue of His priesthood—of His office as Redeemer and Mediator. He merited the grace which freed man from the bondage of sin, which grace is applied to man mediately by the Sacrifice of the Eucharist and immediately by the sacraments. He gave His Apostles the power to offer the Sacrifice (Luke, xxii, 19), and dispense the sacraments (Matt., xxviii, 18; John, xx, 22, 23); thus making them priests. It is true that every Christian receives sanctifying grace which confers on him a priesthood. Even as Israel under the Old dispensation was to God "a priestly kingdom" (Exod., xix, 4—6), thus under the New, all Christians are "a kingly priesthood" (1 Pet., ii, 9). But it is also true that each and every Christian priest has his own particular priesthood strengths and perfects the universal priesthood (cf. 11 Cor., iii, 3, 6; Rom., xv, 16).

Sacrament of Order.—From Scripture we learn that the Apostles appointed others by an external rite (imposition of hands), conferring inward grace. The fact that the grace is ascribed immediately to the external rite, shows that Christ must have thus ordained. The fact that χρωτοναι, χρωτονια, which means electing by show of hands, had acquired the technical meaning of ordaining by imposition of hands only in the middle of the third century, shows that appointment to the various orders was made by that external rite. We read of the deacons, how the Apostles "praying, imposed hands upon them" (Acts, vi, 6). In 11 Tim., i, 6 St. Paul reminds Timothy that he was made a bishop by the imposition of St. Paul's hands (cf. 1 TIm., iv, 13), and that St. Paul exhorted to appoint presbyters by the same rite (1 TIm., v, 22; cf. Acts, xiii, 3; xiv, 22). In Clem., "Rom." III, 11xii, we read of the appointment of Zachaeus as bishop by the imposition of Peter's hands. The word is used in its technical meaning by Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." VI, xxv, ex. 5; "Conc. Apostol.""). Timothy lays on hands, but does not ordain (χρωτοναι αυτων) "Didasc. Syr." IV, 11, 11, 20; Cornelius, "Ad Fabianum" in Euseb., "Hist. Ecle.," VI, 20.

Grace was attached to this external sign and conferred by it. "I admonish thee, that thou stir up the grace of God which is in thee, through the laying on of my hands" (11 Tim., i, 6). The context clearly shows that there is question here of a grace which enables Timothy to rightly discharge the office imposed upon him, for St. Paul continues "God hath not given us the spirit of fear: but of power, and of love, and of sobriety. This grace thou hast received from the words: 'that thou stir up the grace which is in thee'; we reach the same conclusion from 1 TIm., iv, 14, where St. Paul says, "Neglect not the grace that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with (σερι) imposition of hands of the priesthood." This text shows that when St. Paul ordained Timothy, he laid upon him, even as now the presbyters who assist at ordination lay their hands on the candidate. St. Paul here exhorts Timothy to teach and command, to be an example to all. To neglect this would be to neglect the grace which is in him. This grace therefore enables him to teach and command, to discharge his office rightly. The grace then is not a charismatic gift, but a gift of the Holy Spirit for the rightful discharge of official duties. The Sacrament of Order has ever been recognized in the Church as such. This is attested by the belief in a special priesthood (cf. St. John Chrys., "De sacriolotio"; St. Greg. of Nyssa, "Oratio in baptism, Christi"); which, however, is not an official ordination. Augustine, speaking about baptism and order, says, "Each is a sacrament, and each is given by a certain consecration,... if both are sacraments, which no one doubts, how is the one not lost (by defection from the Church) and the other lost?" (Contra. Epist. Parmen., ii, 28—30). The Council of Trent says, "Whereas, by the testimony of Scripture, by Apostolic tradition, and by the unanimous consent of the Fathers, it is clear that grace is conferred by sacred ordination, which is performed by words and outward signs, no one ought to doubt that Order is truly and properly one of the Seven Sacraments of Holy Church" (Sess. XXIII, can. 2). The Council of Trent says, "Whereas, by the testimony of Scripture, by Apostolic tradition, and by the unanimous consent of the Fathers, it is clear that grace is conferred by sacred ordination, which is performed by words and outward signs, no one ought to doubt that Order is truly and properly one of the Seven Sacraments of Holy Church" (Sess. XXIII, can. 2) defined that, besides the priesthood, there are in the Church other orders, both major and minor (q. v.). Though nothing has been defined with regard to the number of orders it is usually given as seven: priests, deacons, sub-deacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, and doorkeepers. The priesthood is thus counted seven, but of the latter be numbered separately we have eight; and if we add first tonsure, which was at one time regarded as an order, we have nine. We meet with different numberings in different Churches, and it would seem that mystical reasons influenced them to some extent (Martene, "De antie. ecle." I, viii, 1; 10; Dionysius, "Rit. orient.")
ORDERS

H, 155). The "Statuta ecclesiae antiqua" enumerate nine orders, adding presbys and counting bishops and priests separately. Others enumerate eight orders, thus, e.g., the author of "De divin. offic.", 33; and St. Dunstan's and the Jumièges pontificals (Martène I, viii, 11), the latter not counting bishops, and adding ordinals "Con. dioec. de diverso ordine," III, Ex. 11, 7; but it is more probable that they were merely offices, generally committed to clerics (Benedict XIV, "De syn. dioec."). In the East there is considerable variety of tradition regarding the number of orders. The Greek Church acknowledges five, bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, and readers. The same number is found in St. John Damascene (Dial. contra manichacos, iii); in the ancient Greek Church acolytes, exorcists, and doorkeepers were probably considered only as offices. (cf. Denzinger, "Rit. orient.", I, 116).

In the Latin Church a distinction is made between major and minor orders (q. v.). In the East the subdivision into the minor and major orders is a minor ordination of the acolyte, the minister of the other minor orders (porter, exorcist, acolyte). In the Latin Church the priesthood, diaconate, and subdiaconate (q. v.) are the major, or sacred, orders, so-called because they have immediate reference to what is consecrated (St. Thom., "Suppl.", Q. xxxvii, a. 6). The hierarchical orders strictly so-called are the episcopate (C. C. X, 20, can. 6). We have seen that our Lord instituted a ministry in the persons of His Apostles, who received fullness of authority and power. One of the first exercises of this Apostolic power was the appointment of others to help and succeed them. The Apostles did not confine their labours to any particular Church, but, following the Divine command to make disciples of all men, they were the missionaries of the first generation. Others also are mentioned in Holy Scripture as exercising an itinerant ministry, such as those who are in a wider sense called Apostles (Rom., xvi, 7), or prophets, teachers, and evangelists (Eph., iv, 11). Side by side with this itinerant ministry proper are those made for the ordinary administration of the Church by the appointment of local ministers, to whom the duties of the ministry passed entirely when the itinerant ministers disappeared (see DEACON).

Besides deacons others were appointed to the ministry, who are called presbyters and priests. There is no record of their institution, but the names occur casually. Though some have explained the appointment of the seventy-two disciples in Luke x, as the institution of the presbyterate, it is generally agreed that they had only a temporary appointment. We find presbyters in the Mother Church at Jerusalem, receiving the gifts of the brethren of Antioch. They appear to have carried on the work of the Apostles and presbyters set forth the decree which freed the gentile converts from the burden of the Mosaic law (Acts, xv, 23). In St. James (v, 14, 15) they appear as performing ritual actions, and from St. Peter we learn that they are shepherds of the flock (1 Pet. v, 2). The bishops hold a position of authority (Tit., iii, 2; Tit., i, 5; 1 Tim., iii, 7) and have been appointed shepherds by the Holy Ghost (Acts, xx, 28). That the ministry of both was local appears from Acts, xiv, 23, where we read that Paul and Barnabas appointed presbyters in the various Churches which they founded during their first missionary journey. It is shown also by the fact that they had to shepherd the flock, where they have been appointed, the presbyters have to shepherd the flock, that is amongst them (1 Pet., v, 2). Titus is left in Crete that he might appoint presbyters in every city (xarâ gēnê, Tit., i, 5; cf. Chrys., "Ad Tit., homil."). 1, 1)

We cannot argue from the difference of names to the difference of official position, because the names are to some extent interchangeable (Acts, xx, 17, 28; Tit., i, 5, 6, 7). The New Testament does not clearly show the distinction between presbyters and bishops, and we must examine its evidence in the light of later times. Towards the end of the second century there is a universal and unquestioned tradition, that bishops and their superior authority date from Apostolic times (see HIERARCHY OF THE EARLY CHURCH). It throws much light on the New Testament evidence, and we find that what appears distinctly at the time of Ignatius can be traced through the pastoral epistles of St. Paul, to the very beginning of the history of the Mother Church at Jerusalem, where St. James, the brother of the Lord, appears to occupy the position of bishop (Acts, xi, 17; xv, 13; xxi, 18; Gal., ii, 9); Timothy and Titus possess full episcopal authority, and were ever thus recognized in tradition (cf. Tit., i, 5; 1 Tim., i, 18, 22). No doubt there is much obscurity in the New Testament, but this is accounted for by many reasons. The monuments of tradition never give us the life of the Church in all its fullness, and we cannot expect this fullness, with regard to the internal organization of the Church, from the cursory references in the occasional writings of the New Testament. The position of bishops would necessarily be much less prominent than in later times. The supreme authority of the Apostles, the great number of charismatically gifted persons, the fact that various Churches were ruled by Apostolic delegates who exercised ecclesiastical authority under Apostolic direction, would prevent that special prominence. The union between bishops and presbyters was close, and the names remained interchangeable long after the distinction between presbyters and bishops was commonly recognized, e. g., in Iren., "Adv. haeres.", iv, xxv, 2. Hence it would seem that already, in the New Testament, we find, obversely no doubt, the same ministry which appeared so distinctly afterwards.

Which of the Orders are Sacramental?—All agree that there is but one Sacrament of Order, i. e., the totality of the power conferred by the sacrament is obtained in one supreme ordination, or is certain only part thereof (St. Thomas, "Suppl.", Q. xxxvii, a. i, ad 2°). The sacramental character of the priesthood has never been denied by anyone who admitted the Sacrament of Order, and, though not explicitly defined, it follows immediately from the statements of the Council of Trent. Thus (Sess. XXIII, can. 2), "If any one saith that besides the priesthood there are not in the Catholic Church other orders, both major and minor, by which as by certain steps, advance is made to the priesthood, let him be anathema." In the fourth chapter of the same session, after declaring that the Sacrament of Order imprints a character, "which can neither be effaced nor taken away by the hands of man," it confers the obligation of those who assert that priests of the New Testament have only a temporary power. The priesthood is therefore a sacrament.

With regard to the episcopate the Council of Trent defines that bishops belong to the divinely instituted hierarchy, that they are superior to priests, and that they are successors of the Apostles. The ordination which is proper to them (Sess. XXIII, c. iv, can. 6, 7). The superiority of bishops is abundantly attested in Tradition, and we have seen above that the distinction between priests and bishops is of Apostolic origin. Most of the older scholastics were of opinion that the episcopate was a sacrament, the union finding its defenders even now (e. g., Böhl, "De sacramentis", II), though the majority of theologians hold it is certain that a bishop's ordination is a sacrament. With regard to the sacramental character of the other orders see Deacons; Minor Orders; Subdeacons.

Matter and Form.—In the question of the matter and form of this sacrament we must distinguish between the three higher orders and the subdeaconate and minor orders. The Church having instituted the latter, also determines their matter and form. With regard to the former, we must understand that the imposition of hands is the sole matter. This has been undoubtedly used from the beginning; to it, exclusively and directly, the conferring of grace is ascribed by St. Paul and many Fathers and councils. The Latin Church used it exclusively for nine or ten centuries, and the Greek Church to this day knows of no other manner of ordination. The Church has held that the tradition of the instruments was the sole matter even for the strictly hierarchial orders, but this position has long been universally abandoned. Other scholiasts hold that both imposition of hands and the tradition of the instruments constitute the matter of the sacrament; this opinion still finds defenders. Appeal is made to the Decree of Eugene IV to the Armenians, but the pope spoke "of the integrating and accessory matter and form, which he wished Armenians to add to the imposition of hands, long since in use amongst them, that they might thus conform to the usage of the Latin Church, and more firmly adhere to it, the hands remaining the same," (Clementinelease, VIII, S. 8). The real foundation of the latter opinion is the power of the Church with regard to the sacrament. Christ, it is argued, instituted the Sacrament of Order by instituting that in the Church there should be an external rite, which would of its own nature signify and confer the priestly power and corresponding grace. As Christ did not ordain His Apostles by imposition of hands, it would seem that He left to the Church the power of determining by which particular rite the power and grace should be conferred. The Church's determination of the particular rite would be the fulfilling of a condition required in order that the Divine institution should take effect. The Church determined the simple imposition of hands for the East and added, in the course of time, the tradition of the instruments for the West—changing its symbolic language according as circumstances of place or time required.

The question of the form of the sacrament naturally depends on that of the matter. If the tradition of the instruments be taken as the total or partial matter, the words which accompany it will be taken as the form. If the simple imposition of hands be considered the sole matter, the words which belong to it are the form. The form which accompanies the imposition of hands contains the words "Accipe spiritum sanctum", which in the ordination of priests, however, are found with the second imposition of hands, towards the end of the Mass, but these words are not found in the old rituals nor in the Greek Ecumenical. Thus the form is not contained in these words, but in the longer prayers accompanying the former imposition of hands. This subject is really the same as the foregoing. All that we have said about the matter and form is speculative; in practice, whatever has been prescribed by the Church must be followed, and the Church in this, as in other sacraments, insists that anything omitted should be supplied.

Effect of the Sacrament.—The first effect of the sacramental sign or the power of the order can be received and may exist without this grace. Grace is required for the worthy, not the valid, exercise of the power, which is immediately and inseparably connected with the priestly character. The principal effect of the sacrament is the character (q. v.), a spiritual and indelible mark impressed upon the soul, by which the recipient is distinguished from others, consecrated as a minister of Christ, and deputed and empowered to perform certain offices of Divine worship (Summa, III, Q. xiiii, a. 2). The sacramental character of order distinguishes the ordained from the laity. It gives the recipient in the diaconate, e.g., the power to minister officially, in the priesthood, the power to offer the Sacrifice and dispense the sacraments, in the subdiaconate, power to preach and to confirm the faithful. The Council of Trent defined the existence of a character (Sess. VII, can. 9). Its existence is shown especially by the fact that ordination like baptism, if ever valid, can never be repeated. Though there have been controversies with regard to the conditions of the validity of ordination, and different views were held at different times in reference to them, "it has always been admitted that a valid ordination cannot be repeated. Reordinations do not suppose the negation of the inannissible character of order—they presuppose an anterior ordination which was null. There can be no doubt that mistakes and the maliyli of tradition have often been the cause of their invalidity, but this error of fact leaves the doctrine of the interability of ordination untouched" (Saltet, "Les Règlementations", 392).

Minister.—The ordinary minister of the sacrament is the bishop who alone has this power in virtue of his ordination. Holy Scripture attributed the power to the Apostles and their successors (Acts, vi. 6; xvi, 23; I Tim., v. 22; II Tim., i. 6; Tit., i. 5), and the Fathers and councils ascribe the power to the bishop exclusively. Con. Nic. I, can. 4, Apost. Const., VIII, 28 "A bishop lays on hands, ordains . . . a presbyter lays hands on hands, but does not ordain." A council held at Alexandria (314) declared the orders conferred by Calathus, a presbyter, null and void (Athanas., "Apol. contra Arianos", ii). For the custom said to have existed in the Church of Alexandria see Egyy. Nor can objection be raised from the fact that choriposiptes are known to have ordained priests, as there is no need to suppose that some of these are op's ordines (Gillman, "Das Institut der Chorbschläfe in Orient," Munich, 1903; Helele-Leclercq, "Concl.--sisses", II, 1197-1237). No one but a bishop can give any orders now without a delegation from the pope, but a simple priest may be thus authorized to confer minor orders and the subdiaconate. It is generally denied that priests can confer priests' orders, and history, certainly, records no instance of the exercise of such extraordinary ministry. The diaconate cannot be conferred by a simple priest, according to the majority of theologians. This is sometimes questioned, as Innocent VIII is said to have granted the privilege to Cistercian abbots (1480), but the genuineness of the concession is highly disputable. In the case of the bishop must be a Catholic, in communion with the Holy See, free from censures, and must observe the laws prescribed for ordination. He cannot lawfully ordain any except his own subjects without authorization (see below).

Subject.—Every baptized male can validly receive ordination. Though in former times there were several semi-clerical ranks of women in the Church (see Deaconesses), they were not admitted to orders properly so called and had no spiritual power. The first requisite for lawful ordination is a Divine vocation; by which is understood the action of God, whereby He declares a man suitable for ordination, endowing him with the spiritual, mental, moral, and physical qualities required for the fitting discharge of their or-nder and inspiring them with a sincere desire to enter the ecclesiastical state for God's honour and their own sanctification. The reality of this Divine call is manifested in general by sanctity of life, right faith, knowledge, the practice of the precepts of the Church, and the performance of good works to which one is raised, absence of physical defects, the age required by the canons (see IRREGLULARITY). Sometimes this call was manifested in an extraordinary manner (Acts, i. 15; xiii. 2); in general, however, the "calling" was made according to the laws of the Church founded on the example of the Apostles. Though clergy and bishops were ordained by the Apostles, there were, and are, priests without a benefice, or even fifty (Apost. Const. ii. 1). Now, physical age deemed sufficient, but there were prescribed specific periods of time, during which the ordained should remain in a particular degree. The different degrees were considered not merely as steps preparatory to the priesthood, but as real church offices. In the beginning no such periods, called interdicts, were appointed, though the tendency to orderly promotion is attested already in the pastoral Epistles (I Tim., iii, 3, 16). The first rules were apparently made in the fourth century. They seem to have been enforced by Simeon (335) and somewhat modified by Zosimus (418), who decreed that the office of reader or exorcist should last fifteen years; of deacon, twenty; of subdeacon, thirty-five; and of those baptized as adults, four years; those were to be spent as acolyte or subdeacon, five years as deacon. This was modified by Pope Gelasius (492), according to whom a layman who had been a monk might be ordained priest after one year, thus allowing three months to elapse between each ordination, and a layman who had not been a monk might be ordained priest after eighteen months. At present the minor orders are generally conferred together on one day. The bishops, who are the ministers of the sacrament ex officio, must inquire about the birth, person, age, title, faith, and moral character of the candidate. They must examine whether he is born of Catholic parents, or he is educated, if he is converted. He should be physically fit for the exercise of the ministry. The age required by the canons is for subdeacons twenty-one, for deacons twenty-two, and for priests twenty-four years completed. The pope may dispense from any irregularity and the bishops generally receive some power of dispensation also with regard to age not usually for subdeacons and deacons, but for priests. Bishops can generally dispense for one year, whilst the pope gives dispensation for over a year; a dispensation for more than eighteen months is but very rarely granted. For admission to minor orders, the testimony from the parish priest or from the master of the school where the candidate was educated—generally, therefore, the superior of the seminary—is required. For major orders further inquiries must be made. The names of the candidate must be published in the place of his birth and of his domicile and the result of such inquiries are to be forwarded to the bishop. No bishop may ordain those not belonging to his diocese by virtue of his episcopal power, except those belonging to the family of the candidate, without dimissorial letters from the candidate's bishop. Testimonial letters are also required from all the bishops in whose dioceses the candidate has resided for over six months, after the age of seven. Transgression of this rule is punished by suspension laterae sententiae against the ordaining bishop. In recent years several decisions insist on the strict interpretation of these rules. Subdeacons and deacons should not be consecrated one full year in these offices in one day. They may then proceed to receive the priesthood. This is laid down by the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIII, c. xi.), which did not prescribe the time for minor orders. The bishop generally has the power to dispense from these interdicts, but it is absolutely forbidden, unless a special indult be obtained, to receive two major orders or the minor orders in the same ordination in one day.

For the subdeaconate and the higher orders there is, moreover, required a title, i.e., the right to receive maintenance from a determined source. Again, the candidate must observe the interdicts, or times required to elapse between the reception of various orders; he must also have received confirmation and the lower orders preceding the one to which he is raised. This last requirement does not affect the validity of the order conferred, as every order gives a distinct and independent power. One exception is made by the majority of theologians and canonists, who are of opinion that episcopal consecration requires the previous reception of prior orders for its validity. Others, however, maintain that this ordination includes full priestly power, which is thus conferred by episcopal consecration. The appeal to history and bring forward cases of bishops who were consecrated without having previously received priest's orders, and though most of the cases are somewhat doubtful and can be explained on other grounds, it appears impossible to reject them all. It is further to be considered that scholastic theologians mostly required the previous reception of priest's orders for valid episcopal consecration, because they did not consider episcopal consecration an order, a view which is now generally abandoned.

Obligations — For obligations attached to holy Orders see Bishop, Chapter 2, and Deacon, Chapter 3.

Ceremonies of Ordination — From the beginning the diaconate, priesthood, and episcopate were conferred with special rites and ceremonies. Through the course of time there was considerable development and diversity in different parts of the Church, the imposition of hands and prayer were always and universally prescribed and by Apostolic times (Acts, vi. 6; xiii. 3: I Tim., iv. 14; II Tim., i. 6). In the early Roman Church these sacred orders were conferred amid a great concourse of clergy and people at a solemn station. The candidates, who had been previously presented to the people, were summoned by name at the beginning of the solemn Mass. They were clad in white and presented on the altar, and anyone objecting to a candidate was called upon to state his objections without fear. Silence was regarded as approval. Shortly before the Gospel, the candidates were presented to the pope, the entire congregation was invited to pray. All prostrating, the liturgy continued, and the pope then imposed his hands upon the head of each candidate and received the Collect with a prayer of consecration corresponding to the order conferred. The Gallican Rite was somewhat more elaborate. Besides the ceremonies used in the Roman Church, the people approving the candidates by acclamation, the hands of the deacon and the head and hands of priests and bishops were anointed with the sign of the Cross. After the seventh century the tradition of the instruments of office was added, alb and stole to the deacon, stole and planeta to the priest, ring and staff to the bishop. In the Eastern Church, after the presentation of the candidate to the congregation and their shout of approval, "He is worthy", the bishop then prostrated himself upon the candidate and said the consecrating prayer. We now give a short description of the ordination rite for priests as found in the present Roman Pontifical. All the candidates should present themselves in the church with tonsure and in clerical dress, carrying the vestments of the order to which they are to be raised, and lighted candles. They are all summoned by name, each candidate answering "Adsum." When a general ordination candle is in their right hand, go forward and kneel around the bishop. The latter inquires of the archdeacon, who is here the representative of the Church as it were, whether the candidates are worthy to be admitted to the priesthood. The archdeacon answers in the affirmative and his tests on the bent of the candidate in silence. The same is done by all priests who are present. Whilst bishop and priests keep their right hands extended, the former alone recites a prayer, inviting all to pray to God for a blessing on the candidates. After this follows the Collect and then the bishop says the Pater Noster of which he says the prayer, "Grant, we beseech Thee etc." The bishop then, with appropriate formulae crosses the stole over the breast of each one and vests him with the chasuble. This is arranged to hang down in front but is folded behind. Though there is no mention of the stole in many of the ancient Pontificals, there can be no doubt of its antiquity. The vesting with the chasuble is also very ancient and found already in Mabillon "Ord. VIII and IX." Afterwards the bishop recites a prayer calling down God's blessing on the newly-ordained. He then intones the "Venit Creator," and whilst it is being sung by the choir he anoints the hands with chrism and the oil of catechumens.

In England the opening is also very ancient in ancient times. The anointing of the hands, which in ancient times was done with chrism, or oil and chrism, was not used by the Roman Church, said Nicholas I (A. D. 864), though it is generally found in all ancient ordinals. It probably became a general practice in the ninth century and seems to have been derived from the Haddan and Stowe "Councils and British Church (Haddan and Stowe, "Councils and Eccl. Documents," I, 141). The bishop then hands to each the chalice, containing wine and water, with a paten and a host upon it. This rite, with its corresponding formula, which as Hugo of St. Victor says ("Sacri", III, xii), signifies the power which has already been received, is not found in the oldest rituals and probably dates back not earlier than the ninth or tenth century. When the bishop has finished the Offertory of the Mass, he seats himself before the middle of the altar and each of those ordained make an offering to him of a lighted candle. The newly-ordained priests then repeat the Mass, and at the of the celebration of saints simultaneously. Before the Communion the bishop gives the kiss of peace to one of the newly-ordained. After the Communion the priests again approach the bishop and say the Apostles' Creed. The bishop laying his hands upon each says: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whose sins you shall forgive them, and whose sins you shall retain them, are retained." This imposition of hands was introduced in the thirteenth century. The chasuble is then folded, the newly-ordained make a promise of obedience and having received the kiss of peace, return to their places.

Time and Place.—During the first centuries ordination took place wherever demanded by the needs of the Church. The Roman pontiffs generally ordained in December (Amalarius, "De offic.", II, i). Pope Gelasius (494) decreed that the ordination of priests and deacons could be held on the Sundays and days, viz., on the feast of the fourth, seventh, and tenth months, also on the feast of the beginning and midweek (Passion Sunday) of Lent and on (holy) Saturday about sunset (Epist. ad ep. Luc., xi). This but confirmed what Leo the Great laid down, for he seems to speak of ordination on Ember Saturdays as an Apostolic tradition (Sermo 2 de jejun. Ponte). The ordination may take place either after sunset on the Saturday or early on Sunday morning. The ordination to major orders took place before the Gospel. Minor orders might be given at any day or hour. They were generally given after holy communion. At present minor orders are not given less than thirty days of obligation (suppressed included) in the morning. For the sacred orders, a privilege to ordain on other days than those appointed by the canons, provided the ordination takes place on Sunday or day of obligation (suppressed days included), is very commonly given. Though it was always the rule that ordinations should take place in public, in time of persecution they were sometimes held in private buildings. The place of ordinations is the church. Minor orders may be conferred in any church, but it is understood that they are given in the church. The Pontifical directs that ordinations to sacred orders must be held publicly in the cathedral church in presence of the cathedral chapter. If they held in another place, the clergy should be present and the principal church, as far as possible, must be made used of (cf. Conc. Trid., sess. XXIII, c. vii). (See Subdeacon, Deacon, Hierarchy, Minor Orders, Alimentation)

The subject of Ordination is treated in its various aspects in the general works on Dogmatic Theology (Church and Sacraments). ORDINARIATE

Ordinariate (from Ordinary, q. v.).—This term is used in speaking collectively of all the various organs through which an ordinary, and especially a bishop, exercises the different forms of his authority. This word, which is employed particularly in Germany, does not occur in strict canonical language; but it is exactly equivalent to what canonists call the curia. Just as the pope is officially responsible for all that is done in his name and by his authority in the different branches of the Roman Curia (congregations of cardinals, tribunals, offices), so, too, an ordinary and especially a bishop bears the official responsibility of whatever is done, in his name and with his authority, by the persons or committees composing his curia, whether it be a public or a private one (ordinaries, officials, judges, secretaries, counsels of various kinds). Whatever may be the exact form of this administration in each diocese, it is still the diocesan administration and the ordinariate. (See Bishop; Diocesan Chancery; Official; Vicar-General; Vicar-Capital.)

A. BOUDINON.

Ordinary (Lat. ordinarius, i. e., judge), in ecclesiastical language, denotes any person possessing or exercising ordinary jurisdiction, i. e., jurisdiction connected permanently or at least in a stable way with an office, whether this connexion arises from Divine law or from a separate constitution. An ordinary exercises jurisdiction over the whole of the territory which he governs, and not merely over the persons who are subject to him. He possesses full and complete authority to do what jurists call actum juris, and may consequently make the laws. He may act with authority either personally or by representatives, and if he acts personally, it is his own name which is to be considered. So long as this jurisdiction is never suspended, the superior of an ordinary cannot interfere with it, nor can anything be done concerning it or the person to whom it belongs, except with his consent. (See Canon Law.)

Ordinaries are divided into those having territorial jurisdiction and those who have not. As a rule ordinary jurisdiction is territorial as well as personal, as in the case of the pope and the bishops; but ordinary jurisdiction may be restricted to certain persons, except from the local authority. Such for instance is the jurisdiction of regular prelates, abbots, generals, and provincials of religious orders or other societies; they can legislate, adjudicate, and govern; consequently they are ordinaries; but their jurisdiction concerns individuals, not localities; they are not, like the others, called local ordinaries, ordinarius locorum. Superiors of congregations and institutes bound by simple vows are not ordinaries, though they may enjoy a greater or less degree of administrative exemption. The jurisdiction of local ordinaries arises from Divine law or ecclesiastical law. The pope is the ordinary of the entire church and all the faithful; he has ordinary and immediate jurisdiction over all (Cone. Vatic., Const. "Pastor aeternus," c. iii). Bishops are the pastors and governors of the church in their dioceses; they govern their churches by the Holy Ghost (Acts, xx. 28). Certain bishops have, by ecclesiastical law, a mediate ordinary power over other bishops and dioceses; these are the metropolitan, primates, and patriarchs. In a lower rank, there is another class of ordinaries, viz., prelates who exercise jurisdiction in the external forum over a given territory, which is not a diocese, either in their own name, as in the case of prelates or abbots nullius or in the name of the pope, like vicars and prefects Apostolic until the erection of their territories into complete dioceses.

Local ordinaries being unable personally to perform all acts of their jurisdiction may and even ought to communicate it permanently to certain persons, without dividing themselves of their authority; if the duties of these persons are determined by law, they also are ordinaries, but in a restricted and inferior sense. This is vicarial jurisdiction, delegated as to its source, but ordinary as to its exercise, and which would be more accurately termed quasi-ordinary. In this sense vicars-general and diocesan vicars are considered as ordinaries; but since the pope, the heads of the various organs of the Curia are ordinaries for the whole Church; the cardinal vicar for the Diocese of Rome and his district; the legate a latere, for the country to which he is sent. Finally, there are ordinaries with an interinary and transitory title during the vacancy of seces. Thus when the Holy See is vacant, the ordinaries are the College of Cardinals and the cardinal camerlengo; when a diocese, the chapter and also the vicar capitular, and in general the interinary administrator; so, too, the vicar, for religious orders. These persons possess and exercise exterior jurisdiction, although with certain restrictions, and this in virtue of their office; they are better more or less ordinaries, as far as the source of their jurisdiction is concerned. In practice, the determination of the persons included under the term ordinary is of importance in the case of indulgs and the execution of rescripts issued from Rome. Since the decrees of the Holy Office dated 20 February, 1888, and 29 April, 1898, indulgs and most of the rescripts, instead of being addressed to the bishops, are addressed to the ordinaries; and it has been declared that the term ordinary comprises bishops, Apostolic administrators, vicars, prelates or prefects with separate territorial jurisdiction, and their officials or vicars-general; and also, during the vacancy of a see, the vicar capitular or lawful administrator. Thus the powers are handed on, without intermission or renewal, from one ordinary to his successor. (See Jurisdiction.)

See the canonical writers on the titles De officio judicis ordinarii, i. i., t. 31, and De officiis ordinarii, i. i., t. 16, in VI, Staebler, Lehrbuch des kathol. Kirchenrechts (Freiburg, 1890), 111 sqq.

ORDINES

Ordination.—See Orders, Holy.

Ordines Romani.—The word ordo commonly meant, in the Middle Ages, a ritual book containing directions for liturgical functions, but not including the text of the prayers etc., recited by the celebrant or his assistants. These prayers were contained in separate books, e. g., the Sacramentary, Antiphonary, Psalter, but the Ordo concerned itself with the ceremonial pure and simple. Sometimes the title "ordo" was given to the directions for a single function, sometimes to a collection which dealt in one document with a number of quite different functions e. g., the rite of baptism, the consecration of a church, extreme unction, etc. Amalarius (early ninth century) speaks of the Ordo Romanus as "continent per diversos libellus Ordinem Romanum" (P. L., CV, 1295). Speaking generally, the word ordo in this sense gave place after the twelfth century to "Ceremoniale," "Ordinarium" and similar terms, but was retained in other senses, especially to denote the brief conspectus of the daily Oratorium and Masses adapted to the liturgical movements of the day (see Diuturnae).

A considerable number of Ordines are preserved among our manuscripts from the eighth to the twelfth century. The first printed in modern times was the so-called "Ordo Romanus Vulgatus," which, after an edition published by George Cassander at Cologne (in 1561) was reprinted by Hitzorff in his De divinis et catholicoe ecclesiis officiis" (Cologne, 1568) and is that the ceremonial never represented the official Roman use, and that it was merely an outline serving as a model for similar ceremonies in the Frankish dominions. On the contrary, so far as regards numbers I-21 every detail of the and elaborations of its heterogeneous elements could only be disentangled by careful study of the earlier Ordines. At present it is regarded as the work of a compiler in Gaul in the second half of the tenth century, the precise date being still disputed (cf. Moncheheimer, "Amal. von Metz", 140 and 214; Bäumer in "Katholik", 1880, 1, 626). Moreover, in this compiled Ordine Romanus of Hittorp which is largely derived from the first, second, third, and sixth of the Ordines of Mabillon, mentioned below, is only one among a number of analogous compilations. Similar documents of about the same period have been published by other scholars; e.g., by Martíne ("Theor. novae", p. 101)—this is a monastic Ordo of comparatively early date), by Muratori ("Lit. Rom. Vet.", II, 391), by Gattice ("Acta cerem.", I, 226), and by Gerbert ("Mon. Vet. lit. alem.", I, 1 sqq.). In view of its composite character, the Ordo Vulgatus is of no great liturgical importance, though it sometimes fills a gap in our knowledge quite uninterruptedly through centuries. It deals primarily with pontifical high Mass, but it also describes the rite of the consecration of the pope and of a bishop, the dedication of churches, the blessing of bells, the coronation of the emperor and of a bishop, the blessing of a knight, that is of a soldier (militis) dedicated to the service of the Church, the benediction of a bride, and the ceremonies to be observed in the opening of a general or provincial council. It should be noticed, moreover, that in these miscellaneous offices we do not find the characteristic features of an ordo in its technical sense. In the later portions of the Ordo Romanus of Hittorp not only are there the details of the ceremonial indicated in their due sequence, but also a modern Pontifical, the text of the prayers, blessings etc., to be recited by the celebrant, is given in full.

Much more valuable to the liturgical student is the series of fifteen consuetudinaries, first printed by Mabillon in his "Museum Halicenum" (1699), to which the term Ordines Romani is commonly applied. They are not a pure and homogeneous documents, neither do they represent an undiluted Roman tradition, nor are they all, strictly speaking, Ordines in the sense defined above. But in default of better material, and while we are waiting for more profound critical investigation to sort out our earliest documents as accurately as possible, it is true that, of present evidence, Mabillon's Ordines constitute the most reliable source of information regarding the early liturgical usages of the Roman Church. Covering the whole period from the sixth to the fifteenth century, they may be said, taken collectively, to have some pretensions to completeness.

Ordo I.—The first of these Ordines Romani, describing the ceremonies of a solemn Mass celebrated by the pope himself or his deputy, is the most valuable, as it is also one of the most ancient. Modern opinion inclines to the belief that the early part of it (numbers 1-21) really represents in substance the usages of a stational Mass in the time of Pope Gregory the Great (Kisters, "Studien zu Mabilionsen Ordn.", 6; cf. Grisar, "Analecta Romana", I, 193), but there are also, undoubtedly, in our present text adjustments and additions which must be attributed to the end of the seventh century (Atchley, "Ord. Rom. Primus", 7, favours a later date, but in this he only follows Probst). The fact that Mabillon's descriptions differ in some particulars from those of the Ordines before him, did not find its description of paschal ceremonies in agreement with the actual Roman practice of his day, as expounded to him by Archbishop Theodore in S32, need not lead us, with Moncheheimer ("Amal.", 141), to the conclusion times quoting, or epitomizing, but elsewhere developing and adapting the directions of the earlier document. It contains some ritual features which are certainly not of Roman but of Gallican origin (for example the recitation of the Creed in the Mass, which some, in spite of Walfrid Strabo, consider not to have been known to Roman before the eleventh century, and also the giving of a pontifical blessing after the "Pax Domini"). It is generally accepted that this Ordo II belongs to the time of the general introduction of the Roman Liturgy into Gaul in the days of Charlemagne, i.e. about the beginning of the ninth century. This Ordo, as well as Ordo I and probably another now lost, was known to Anacharsis, who in his "Evologia" has annotated it with a view to the spiritual edification of his readers.

Ordo III and Ordo IV contain yet another series of directions for a solemn Mass celebrated by the pope. That of Ordo IV is only a fragment, but both III and IV are generally considered older than the eleventh century. Mabillon considered Ordo III to be distinctly of later date than II and the fact that the stational church in III is called "Monasterium", a designation which does not seem to have come into use before the ninth century, lends support to this view. It is also confirmed by the fact that this Ordo III was apparently unknown to Anacharsis. On the other hand, it has been extensively used in the compilation of the Ordo Romanus Vulgatus, which, as already stated, probably took shape in the second half of the tenth century. That the fragmentary Ordo IV is of later date than any of those previously mentioned has been inferred by Mabillon from the fact that the pope is here described as communicating at the altar and not at his throne, as in the preceding rituals. Still, the manuscript in which it is found cannot be later than the first half of the eleventh century (Ebner, "Quellen", 153).

Ordo V and Ordo VI are again entirely consecrated to the celebration of a pontifical high Mass. Ordo V goes into details as to the vestments worn by the pope, and separately as to the vestments worn by a Roman bishop and the lesser clergy. It is especially a Roman document and throughout assumes that the pope is pontificating. The pope here communicates at his throne and the Creed is sung after the gospel. But though Berno of Rievkesheim affirms that this last custom was then unknown in the West, Walfrid Strabo describes it as sung at Rome about the year 800 (P. L., CXIV, 947) renders this a very unsatisfactory test of date. On the other hand, the sixth Ordo is not directly connected with Rome, but like Ordo II it describes the ceremonies of a pontifical Mass adapted from the papal function for use elsewhere. In the opinion of Kösters, (Studien, 17) it probably belongs to the first half of the tenth century, since it was used by the compiler of the Ordo Vulgatus. It has been copied by a later twelfth century hand upon a blank page of the English "Benedictual of Archbishop Robert", and is there described as a "ritual drawn up by the ancient Fathers of the West, executed by the present pope, the pope, the pope, Mabillon's Ordo and is assigned by Probst, Kösters, and others to the sixth century. The whole document deals with the ceremonies of Christian initiation, i.e. the catechumenate with its Lenten scrutinies (see BATTTIN), the rite of the consecration of the baptismal water, the baptism itself, and finally confirmation. This last rite appears in its full form in the Gelasianum. The Gelasianum is here for the most part only indicated by their beginnings. Like the Gelasianum, the Ordo speaks throughout of "infant" and as if they alone were likely to be subjects for baptism, and the whole ceremony is modified to suit the case of infants in arms. When the catechumen are called upon to recite the Nicene Creed, it is directed that one of the acolytes shall take up one of the children upon his left arm, lay his right hand upon the child's head and recite the Creed in Greek, while another acolyte, holding another child, subsequently recites the Creed in Latin. None the less, the ceremonial of the scrutinies was originally designed for adult catechumens who were capable of understanding it and of notifying the pope for the Creed for themselves. On the other hand, if the Ordo VII consistently regards the catechumens as "infant", this cannot be interpreted as a proof of relatively late date, for we find that already at the beginning of the sixth century the "vir illustris" Sernarius, one of the deacons of Rome, "spare tertia ante lituriam missae suae... infant..., before the entry into the church to undergo the scrutinies three times before Easter, Migne, P. L., LX, 401). Seeing that the Gelasian Sacramentary also seems to know only of three scrutinies, it is possible that Ordo VII which requires seven scrutinies may be of even older date than the sixth century, and it is hardly likely that when there was question of none but infant catechumens, the number of scrutinies should have been increased from three to seven. The whole tendency must have been in the direction of simplification. It may be noticed that Mabillon's Ordo VII is incorporated entire in an instruction on baptism by Josse, Bishop of Amiens, c. 812.

Ordo VIII is concerned with the subject of ordinations and falls naturally into two divisions. The first part deals with the ordination of acolytes, subdeacons, deacons, and priests, the second with the ceremonial of the consecration of a bishop. Although the first part is extremely concise, and the second, more particularly in regard to the "quadrupla capitula" (four forms of an oath held to be a test of ordination), is relatively developed, there seems no sufficient reason for questioning the essential unity of the whole document. In spite of certain expressions, notably the "ancilla dei sacratae qua a Francis neomna dictatur", which may easily be an interpolation or a gloss, and of references to the Ember seasons, to the "nomenclator", and to the "schola" (i.e. the choir—which last seems to suggest an age posterior to Gregory the Great) certain critics, notably Kösters (Studien, 21-23), make no difficulty in assigning the document to the early part of the sixth century. It is certainly noteworthy that though there is no mention in Ordo VIII of exorcists or any cleric lower than a deacon, that the order of consecration of archbishops closely agrees with the language of the letter of Johannes Deaconus to Sernarius at the beginning of the sixth century (Migne, P. L., LX, 405). The function of the acolytes "portandi Sacramentum", here as in Ordo I, is recognized by assigning to them little bags ("saculi") as their distinctive attribute, instead of the candlestick of a later date, while the delivery of the chalice is emphasized as the significant act in the consecration of a subdeacon. When Bishop John Wordsworth (Ministry of Grace, 180) assumes that the delivery of the chalice is a Gallican ceremony and that it was introduced into the Roman Church in the seventh century at the earliest, he has clearly forgotten the Gallican hand in all of Ordo VIII. He writes: "he and nos ordo est ut accepto sacristissimo calicem in quo com-

composition of this document has recently been investigated by Dr. Kösters in a very able chapter of his "Studien". His conclusions are, that the substance of the Ordo was drawn up in the time of Pope Constantine I (708-15), and underwent some revision under Pope Stephen III (752-7). However, the most startling part of Dr. Kösters' discussion is his demonstration that the section describing the consecration of the pope belongs not to the papacy of St. Leo, but to the period of Pope Leo III (c. 800), as has hitherto been supposed, but to that of Saint Leo IX (1044), and that in fact the papal regnum, or crown, which this Ordo describes as "made of white cloth in the form of a helmet", was for the first time worn by the pope in the pontificate of the latter. The statement made in this Ordo that the pontificate of Benedict IX was not ordained by his predecessor and that he ought not to be a bishop (nam episcopus esse non poterit) is particularly interesting in view of the fact that Cardinal Deusdedit in the eleventh century, who comments on the text of this document, had apparently before him no clause to this effect. It is probably an interpolation of about that period. Other points of interest are the mention of diaconissa and presbiterissa, and the ceremony of holding the book of the Gospels over the pope at his ordination (tenet evangelium super capit vel corrum eum). We hear of this last ceremony earlier in the East (cf. Apostolic Constitutions, VIII, iv) and in Ordo XIV, and it is now part of the rite of consecration of every bishop, but it appears late at Rome. The appendix on the ember days, attached to this Ordo in the Saint Gall Manuscript, had probably no original connexion with it and may be assumed to be not Roman.

Ordo X is a relatively long and very miscellaneous document and has no real claim to be included in the series of Ordines. It is, strictly speaking, a primitive form of Pontificale, though it is Roman in origin, and it is difficult to persuade oneself that it has not resulted from the fusion of at least two separate elements. The description of the Holy Week ceremonies which occupies nn. 1-24 may be described as a Ceremoniale pure and simple, and so is the burial service for the Roman clergy in nn. 36-40, the Roman character of both being unmistakable, but the intervening sections 25-35, which consist of an Ordo for administering the Sacrament of Penance, and for visiting, anointing, and giving Viaticum to the sick, form a service-book complete in itself. The division is an artificial one, but the entire text of the prayers to be said by the priest, like any modern Ritual. Thaellofer (Liturgik, I, 48) has sought to draw a presumption of late date from the form of absolution in n. 29, which is indicative and not preceptive, absolvimus te ex rebus Petri etc.; but substantially the same formula occurs with an interpolated Anglo-Saxon translation in the Egbert Pontifical of the tenth century. Neither are the reasons convincing, upon which Kösters bas his conclusion that the document as a whole is posterior to the year 1200. We must probably be content to leave the question of date unsettled.

Ordo XI has a tolerably full account of the papal ceremonial as it extended through the whole ecclesiastical year. This description is particularly valuable, inasmuch as it includes not only the functions of great solemnities but also the everyday usages and a considerable amount of detail regarding the Divine Office. It has lately been shown by Dr. Kösters that what we now know in Ordo XI is only a fragment of a much larger work compiled by Benedict, Canon of St. Peter's, which was primarily a treatise upon the dignity of the Roman pontiff and upon the cardinals and various officials of the Roman Court, and which from the nature of its contents was called "Liber Politicus". The process of the composition of this manuscript used by Mabillon, where by a strange perversion it appears as "liber pollicitus". The treatise seems to have been completed just before the year 1143.

Ordo XII likewise contains a somewhat minute description of the papal ceremonial in ecclesiastical and quasi-eclesiastical functions throughout the year, much space being occupied by a detailed record of the regulations followed in the distribution of the bonnities called presbiteria. This Ordo is avowedly extracted from a Pontifical compiled towards the end of the twelfth century by Cardinal Cencius de Sabellis, afterwards Pope Honorius III (1216-1227). But here again Kösters has shown that the last two sections, dealing with the election and consecration of the pope and with the crowning of the emperor, can be traced back to the "Politicus" of Benedict XII. Whatever the later additions, e.g., the duties and dues of certain minor officials, the oath taken by senators to the pope, etc., also finds a place in this collection.

Ordo XIII is one of the few Ordines which we possess, at least substantially, in the form in which it was first written. This is admittedly an official treatise drawn up by command of Pope Gregory X, shortly after the publication of the Constitution "Ubperium", issued in 1274 to regulate the procedure of the cardinals assembled in conclave for a papal election. The earliest portion of the document (nn. 1-12) is in fact concerned with the choice, consecration, and coronation of a new pope; provision being made for the case of his being a bishop, priest, or deacon. The treatise seems to presuppose an acquaintance with Ordo XI and Ordo XII and it is probably in consequence of this that the directions for the ordinary ceremonial are very concise. This Ordo marks the transition stage to a different type of liturgical document, much more developed and theologically treated with a view to the part played by the Roman pontiff and his great retinue of ecclesiastical officials. Up to Ordo XIII we may say that the Ordines Romani are represented at the present day by the "Pontificale" and the "Ceremoniale Episcoporum" (q.v.), which are liturgical textbooks common to the whole of Latin Christianity. But the two remaining Ordines, XIV and XV, are represented to-day by the "Ceremoniale Romano" which constitutes the rubrical code for papal functions in Rome and has no application in the ceremonial of the Catholic Church outside the Eternal City.

Ordo XIV, which in the manuscript begins with the signature "Liber Politicus" in full" and is written in Ordo XIV, is a much longer document than any of those hitherto considered. It is in fact the first rough outline of the bulky "Ceremoniale Romanam" which regulates the detail of papal functions at the present day. The history of Ordo XIV has been very carefully worked out by Dr. Kösters in his "Studien". The substance of the document seems to have been the work of Napolone Orsini and Cardinal Jacopo Gaetani Stefaneschi, the latter having by far the larger share of its composition. By the aid of a manuscript found by Father Ehrle, the librarian of the Vatican, at Avignon, we are able to trace how the work took shape. (See Denifle and Haas, "Archiv für Liturg. Liturg. M.A.", V, 564 sqq.) It was begun in Rome before the popes left for France, but it was further developed and modified during the first third of the fourteenth century while the papal Court was at Avignon, and we know at any rate that the first nine chapters were quoted, as we now have them, in the encyclae which assembled in 1334. But there have still to be added the remaining twenty-six chapters, which were drawn about or after 1389, when the long chapter 45: "Ineipit Ordo quater Romanns Pontifex apud basilicam beati Petri Apostoli debeat consecari", with its directions for the "possessio", or taking possession of the Lateran, was drawn up, the ceremony being altogether novel. The text of the various chapters, however, as the document is, and fully as it may seem to cover the ordinary requirements of papal official life, it may be doubted whether we possess the treatise in its entirety. In the original plan of Stefaneschi we know that the papal obsequies were included, but nothing upon this head is now contained in Ordo XIV, and if we suppose that the omission can have taken place through an oversight when so many other needs are minutely provided for.

Ordo XV is a fresh attempt to work up the same materials, while supplying at the same time the lacuna which had hitherto existed. According to Kosters, chapters 100 and 143-153 were first drafted in the middle of the fourteenth century and were revised and supplemented by Pietro Amelii down to the year 1400. But the work of revision and modification was further carried on as far as 1455 by Peter, Bishop of Olytea, while a final editor, who may very possibly have been Peter Kirten, Bishop of Oliva, put a last hand to the work in the second half of the same century. A selection of some of the more noteworthy headings of the 153 chapters of the work will perhaps serve better than anything else to give an idea of the comprehensiveness of this prototype of the Ceremoniale Romanum, which Malabilla prints under the name of Pietro Amelii.

Advent; Vigil of the Nativity; Economy of the Antiphons; Matins; Reading of the Lessons; First Mass on Christmas Day; Second Mass; Third Mass; St. Stephen and the following feasts; Epiphany; Blessing of the Candles on 2 Feb. with the Procession; Sessing the Pope; Ash Wednesday; What happens when the King receives Ashes; Different occurrences in Lent; The Progressors of the Pope in penitential Seasons; Taking of the Holy Water; Fourth Sunday of Lent which is called Rose Sunday; Blessing of the Palms, followed by detailed instructions for the Holy Week ceremonies, especially regarding the Maimundy and the banquet on Maundy Thursday; Cardinal-Priest who serves the Pope on Holy Saturday; Easter and the Confirmation of the Cardinal Deacons etc.; Short details of the other feasts of the Year; Office for the Dead on All Souls’ Day; What is the Constitution of the Pope; Sickens; Death of the Pope; Exequies of the Pope; Novendial; Distributions of Crock after the Pope’s Death; Directions for the Conclave. Meeting a Cardinal who comes to the Roman Court; Canons and Canonisations, notably that of St. Bridget (1391).

ORDINES ROMANI PUBLISHED SINCE MALABILLA.—Malabilla’s selection by no means exhausted the materials of this nature still available. Documents unknown in his time have since come to light and have been published by scholars who recognized their value. Few among these is the Einsiedeln Ordo, already alluded to, which was first printed by De Roesi in his “Inscriptiones Christianae” (II, I, 34) and has since been reprinted by Duchesne in his “Origines du Culte Chrétien” (tr. Christian Worship, 481). This supplies an earlier and more purely Roman account of the ceremonial of the last three days of Holy Week than that contained in Malabilla’s Ordo I. Again an extremely interesting Ordo is that of the Episcopal Ord, but including, besides the pontifical Mass and the Holy Week ceremonial, some account of the ember-day ordinances, the rite of the dedication of a church with relics, and the candle procession on the feast of the Purification, has been published by Max. Duchesne the same year, just named from a ninth-century manuscript of St. Amand. Other documents of less moment have been printed by Gerbert in his “Monumenta vet. lit. alaman.” (St. Blasen, 1770), by Martene in his “De antiquis eccles. ritibus”, by Kosters as an appendix to his “Studien” and by others.

The Ordines Romani of Malabilla were first published in his “Monumenta Romana” (Paris, 1638), with a full introduction and annotation. The whole has been repeated in Migne, P. L., LXXIV, 1847. For the best discussion of the subject is by Kosters, “Studien zu Malabillas roman Ordn.” (Münster, 1847), but see also Koster in Kirchenk. s. v.; Probst, Die ältesten

SEAL OF OREGON

Oregon, one of the Pacific Coast States, seventh in size among the states of the Union. It received its name from the Oregon (now the Columbia) River, which is the state’s greatest inland waterway. The ultimate origin of the name is obscure. Oregon is bounded on the north by the State of Washington, on the east by Idaho, on the south by Nevada and California, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean. Its length is 300 miles from north to south; its breadth 396 miles. Its total area is 96,030 square miles, including 1740 of water surface. It lies between 42° and 46° N. lat., and between 116° 57' and 124° 35' W. long.

Physical Characteristics.—In the western portion of the state two mountain ranges one hundred miles apart run parallel with the coast line; in the eastern part there stretches out a vast inland plateau. The Cascade range traverses the state at a distance of about twenty-two miles from the ocean; it has an average height of 5500 feet. It is covered with fir, spruce, and cedar, most of which is valuable for lumber. The Cascade Mountains, a prolongation of the Sierra Nevada, extend through the state from north to south at a distance of about 120 miles from the coast. While the average height of this range is about 6000 feet, it is crowned with a line of extinct volcanoes whose snow-capped peaks reach a height of 9000 to 10,000 feet, Mt. Hood, just east of the city of Portland, attaining an altitude of 11,225.

Division.—The state is divided physically into three sections known as Western, Southern, and Eastern Oregon, differing in temperature, rainfall, and products. The Willamette Valley lies in Western Oregon. It is bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the west by the Cascades, on the west by the Coast Range, and on the south by the Calapooia Mts. It is the most thickly settled part of the state, and is noted for its beautiful farm homes and equable climate. The valley is about 100 miles long, and has an average width of sixty miles, not including its mountain slopes. It presents one beautiful sweep of valley containing about 5,000,000 acres, all of which is highly fertile. It is drained by the Willamette River, which runs north, receives the waters of many important streams rising in the Cascades and coast range, and discharges into the Columbia River, just north of Portland. Western Oregon also includes the important counties west of the Willamette Valley on the coast. Southern Oregon lies west of the Cascades, between the Willamette Valley and California. It comprises the counties of Douglas, Coos, Curry, Josephine, and Jackson. The principal streams of this section are the Umpqua and Rogue Rivers, which rise in the Cascades, pierce the Coast Range, and empty into the Pacific Ocean. The valleys of these rivers are noted for their abundant and varied fruit production. The mountains in this section are rich in gold, which is extensively mined. The portion of this section west of the coast range is generally heavily timbered with fir, spruce, and cedar. Extensive coal deposits are found, some of which are developed and yield largely. Coos Bay is one of the best harbours on the Oregon Coast. Eastern Oregon embraces all the state east of the Cascade Mountains, forming a parallelogram 275 miles long and 230 miles wide. It is a great inland plateau of an altitude ranging from 3,000 to 6,000 feet. The south-western section of the state, nearly half of this plateau belongs to the Great American Basin, while the northern portion slopes towards the Columbia river valley. In the north-eastern part of the state, between the Snake and Columbia rivers, are the Blue Mountains whose summits are more than 6,000 feet high, and whose streams are used for the purposes of irrigation. The Columbia River and the Willamette River, along with several large tracts by irrigation in this section. Here also is the most valuable and important mineral belt of the state. In the southern portion of Eastern Oregon are several short mountain ranges from 2,000 to 3,000 feet high which are a continuation of the longitudinal basin-ranges of Nevada. Irrigation is contributing largely towards bringing this section into prominence. The Klamath irrigation project, under the supervision of the United States Government, contains about 200,000 acres and is making rapid progress.

Resources.—All the four great natural resources—viz: forest, fisheries, soil, and minerals—are present in adequate supply in Oregon.

Lumber.—Oregon has approximately three hundred billion feet of standing merchantable timber (or nearly one-third of the standing merchantable timber in the United States), valued at $3,000,000,000. Timber covers about 57 per cent of the area of the state. Apart from the value of this timber as a source of lumber supply, it bears an important purpose in maintaining a perpetual flow of water in the mountain streams by retarding the melting of snow and holding a continuous supply of moisture in the ground during the summer. The most densely timbered area of the state is west of the Cascade Range, due to the greater rainfall in that section. The average net growth of timber on the forested area west of the Cascades is 17,700 feet B. M. to the acre. Localities where the stand is 50,000 feet per acre for entire townships are common in the coast counties of Clatsop and Tillamook. Some sections are found where a yield of 150,000 feet to the acre is estimated, many of the trees scaling 40,000 feet or more of commercial lumber. The Douglas fir stands about a height of thirty feet and five to six feet in thickness. Bridge timbers more than 100 feet in length are obtained from these trees. About 66 per cent of the timber is of this variety, which yields more commercial produce to the acre than any other tree in North America. Three per cent of the merchantable timber of Oregon is hardwood, such as ash, oak, maple, and myrtle. There are about ninety-five species that attain to the dignity of trees; of these thirty-eight are coniferous, seventeen deciduous softwoods, and forty hardwoods. At present the lumber industry is one of Oregon's chief sources of revenue. The output of sawed lumber for 1916 was 2,500,000,000 feet valued at $100,000,000. Among the other forest products (piling, poles, shingles, ties, etc.) brought the total forest product from the state for that year to the sum of $60,000,000, which is about the average annual production. Portland is the largest lumber shipping port in the world. The work of preventing decay and promoting the growth of the forests is done by the United States Government on its forest reserves, and the state maintains a patrol of 300 men to protect the forests of the state.

Minerals.—There is a great wealth and variety of minerals to be found in Oregon, including gold, silver, copper, iron, asbestos, nickel, platinum, coal, antimony, lead, and clay, salt and alkali deposits, and an inexhaustible supply of building stone (including sandstone, limestone, and volcanic rock). Gold is found to a greater or less extent in seventeen counties, and is the only mineral mined to any notable extent. It is found especially in the Blue Mountains. A large number of quartz mills are operated in Eastern and Southern Oregon, and in these districts placer mines yield largely. There are two pronounced copper zones in the state—one in Baker County, the other in the south-western section of the state. Portland is the largest iron found in the Willamette Valley. The ore is of limonite variety, showing about fifty per cent of metallic iron.

Fisheries.—Oregon is unequalled by any other state in salmon fisheries and canning. The chief salmon rivers are the Columbia, the Willamette, and the Rogue River. The fish industry in the state produces upwards of $50,000,000 annually. Reckless overfishing threatened to exhaust the supply and to imperil the industry, until the state regulated it by law and provided for it by hatcheries. The state through its department of fisheries operates at the annual expense of $50,000 ten salmon hatcheries, from which nearly 70,000,000 young salmon are liberated annually. Thus the Columbia River is made to produce year after year practically the same supply of salmon. In addition to the canneries, cold storage plants are operated, practically the whole output of which is shipped to Eastern markets.

Agriculture.—Late years have seen a great expansion in all lines of farming. In 1908 the total production of the farms of the state represented a gross value of about one hundred million dollars. Owing to the lack of a large rural population, however, only a fraction of the agricultural lands of the state yield even a respectable revenue. The most highly settled agricultural sections are the great Willamette Valley in Western Oregon (where nearly everything grown in a temperate climate thrives), and a stretch of nearly five hundred miles of rich bottom land along the Columbia River and the shore line of the coast counties. The great wheat and meat producing section of the state is in Eastern and Central Oregon. The Columbia River Basin in Eastern Oregon is one of the best grain districts in the world. Wasco, Sherman, Gilliam, Morrow, and Umatilla counties produce from ten to fifteen million bushels of wheat annually. The soil is mainly a volcanic ash and silt, very fertile and generally deep. The Willamette Valley and the Willamette River, which is the fertile region of the world, is included in this district. Umatilla County may be taken as typical of this section: its wheat crop averages about 5,000,000 bushels annually, while the alfalfa lands, comprising about 50,000 acres, yield three crops each year, totalling seven tons to the acre. Live stock is also an extensive industry; there are in this county about 550,000 sheep (with fleeces averaging 9½ pounds) and 30,000 cattle. Most of the sheep and a large proportion of the cattle of the state are raised on central Oregon which comprises about twenty million acres. This immense territory has been hitherto without any railroad communication whatever, and is primarily dependent on pack routes. The eastern Oregon, comprising Klamath and Lake Counties, is a stock and dairy section. On 1 Jan., 1909, the live stock of the state was valued at $54,012,000. The revenue to the state from dairy products was $17,000,000. In Southern Oregon poultry raising has been a large and quite extensive industry. Of the poultry products a large percentage is nowadays marketed, with the result that the Southern Oregon poultry industry is in a thriving condition.

Means of Communication.—Oregon is bounded on three sides by navigable water: the Pacific Ocean on the west, the Columbia River on the north, and the Snake River on the east. Nine inlets on the western coast provide harbour facilities. Of these Coos Bay ranks highest in importance to the Columbia River. Owing to the going vessels enter the Columbia, and find at Portland the only freshwater port on the Pacific coast.
water navigation now extends 150 miles along the northern boundary of Oregon, and, with the completion of the ship railway above the Cascades, will extend to 250 miles. The Snake River runs along the eastern boundary of the state for 150 miles, and is navigable for a considerably greater distance from where it enters the Columbia. That river, which empties into the Columbia just north of Portland, is navigable as far as Eugene, 150 miles from Portland. The region between the coast and the Cascade ranges, and the northern fringe of the state along the Columbia and Snake rivers are well supplied with railroad facilities. The vast area of Eastern Oregon, however, has been hitherto practically without railroad service. This deficiency, practically normally being opened up (1910) by the construction of railroads by two rival systems through the Deschutes Valley.

Educational System.—The State Board of Education is composed of the governor, the secretary of state, and a superintendent of public instruction. In each county there is a superintendent who holds office for two years, and each school district has a board comprising from three to five directors whose term is three years. The state course of study provides for eight grades in the grammar schools and four years in the high schools. The state university at Eugene and the medical college at Corvallis comprise the state school system. An irreducible fund of $3,500,000 has been secured by the sale of part of the school lands of the state. In 1841 Congress set aside sections 16 and 36 of all the public domain in Oregon for public schools. For many years previous to 1899 there were four state normal schools, which were practically local high schools subsidized by the state. The subsidy was withdrawn by the legislature of that year, and there is now one state normal located at Monmouth. The state university was established in 1872. The agricultural college at Corvallis, which also gives a college course in the liberal arts and sciences, has about one thousand students. There are a large number of denominational colleges and secondary schools in the state. At Salem, the state capital, are located the charitable and penal institutions of the state, viz., the schools for the blind and deaf mutes, the insane asylum, boys' reform school, and the penitentiary.

History.—Explorations.—In 1542 the Spanish navigator Ferrelo explored the Pacific Coast—possibly the parallel of 42°, the southern boundary of Oregon. Sir Francis Drake in "The Golden Hind" (1553), carried the English colours a few miles farther north than Ferrelo had ventured. The same point was reached by the Spaniard Vizcaino in 1603. In 1774 Juan Perez sailed in the "Santiago" from the harbour of Monterey and explored the northwest coast as far as parallel 55°. The following year the Spanish explored the north-west coast under Heceta, who, on his return, observed the strong currents at the mouth of the Columbia. Nootka Sound was visited and named by the English navigator Cook in 1778. The visit of Cook had important consequences. The natives loaded him with fur and sea otter skins in exchange for the merest trifles. The value of these skins was not suspected, until the ship touched at Asiatic and European ports where they were sold for fabulous prices. The commercial value of the north-west had been discovered. The ships of all nations sought for a profitable fur-trade with the Indians, and the strife for the possession of this territory was never dormant. Captain Robert Gray of Boston discovered the Columbia River in 1792 and named it after his ship. The country was first explored by the American expedition of Lewis and Clark in 1804–5. Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia, the first white settlement in Oregon, was founded in 1811 by the American Fur Company, under the direction of John Jacob Astor. Two years later the Northwest Company (a Canadian fur company) bought out Astoria, and maintained commercial supremacy until it merged with the great Hudson's Bay Company in 1821.

This latter company dominated Oregon for a quarter of a century. The Oregon country at that time covered an area of 180,000 sq. miles and extended from the Rocky Mountains on the east to the Pacific Ocean and from the Mexican possessions on the south to the Russian possessions on the north. In 1841 a commanding personality arrived on the Columbia as chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Co., in the Oregon country. This was Dr. John McLoughlin (q.v.), the most heroic figure in Oregon history. Realizing that the great trading post on the Columbia would be the key to the future of the Columbia and Willamette Rivers, McLoughlin transferred the headquarters of the company from Fort George (Astoria) to Fort Vancouver. He refused to sell liquor to the Indians, and bought up the supplies of rival traders to prevent them from selling it. He commanded the absolute obedience and respect of the Indian population, and Fort Vancouver was the haven of rest for all travellers in the Oregon country. Speaking of McLoughlin's place in Oregon history, his biographer, Mr. Frederick V. Holman, a non-Catholic, pays him the following just tribute: "Of all the men whose lives and deeds are essential parts of the history of the Oregon country, Dr. John McLoughlin stands supremely first,—there is no second!" Missionaries.—The first tidings of the Catholic Faith reached the Oregon Indians through the Canadian employees of the various fur-trading companies. The expedition of Astor in 1811 was accompanied by a number of Canadian voyageurs, who some years later accompanied Capt. Paul the first white settlement in the Willamette Valley. These settlers applied in 1835 to Bishop Provancher of Red River (St. Boniface, Manitoba) for priests to come among them to bless their marriages with their savage consorts, to baptize their children, and revive the Faith among themselves. It was in answer to this petition that Fathers F. N. Blanchet and Modeste Demers were sent to the Oregon country in 1838. On their arrival the missionaries found a log church already erected on the prairie above St. Paul. Meanwhile another request for missionaries had gone forth. The Indians in the Rocky Mountains had repeated the Macedonian cry of "come, let us go over to them and share our bread with their neighbours, the Nez Peres, sent a deputation to St. Louis to ask for priests. They had heard of the black robes through Iroquois Indians, who had settled among them and thus transplanted the seed sown by Father Jogues. It was not until 1849 that Bishop Rosati of St. Louis was able to send a missionary. In that year Father De Smet, S.J., set out on his first trip to the Oregon country where he became the apostle of the Rocky Mountain Indians. A peculiar perversion of the facts concerning the visit of the Indians to St. Louis got abroad in the Protestant religious press and started a remarkable movement towards Oregon. The Methodists sent out Jason and Samuel Lee in 1841, and the Methodist mission was soon reinforced until it was valued in a few years at a quarter of a million dollars and became the dominating factor in Oregon politics. The American Board Mission was founded by Dr. Marcus Whitman, a physician, and Mr. Spalding, a minister. With them was associated W. H. Gray as agent, the immediate object of which missionary movement was the spread of a great deal of misinformation concerning the early missionary history of Oregon.

The savage murder of Dr. Whitman in 1847 was a great catastrophe. Dr. Whitman, who was a man of highly respected character, opened his mission among the Cayuse Indians near Fort Walla Walla. His position as physician made him suspected by the Indians when an epidemic carried off a large number of the tribe. They were accustomed to kill the "medicine man" who failed to cure. Besides the Indians were rendered hostile by the encroachments of the whites. The immediate cause of the massacre seems to have been the story of Jo Lewis, an Indian who had the freedom of the mission and who reported that he had overheard from several persons around Port Willamette, in which Whitman said he would kill off the Indians so that the whites could get their land. The massacre took place on 29 Nov., 1847. Dr. and Mrs. Whitman and several others were brutally slain. Spalding was saved only by the prudence of Father Brouillet whose mission was near by. Spalding seems to have escaped by the intervention of the Hudson's Bay Company and Spalding, in which were involved the Catholic priests with instigating the massacre. There had been hard feelings between the missionary forces, but now the embers were fanned into a flame and, in spite of the fact that all serious historians have exonerated the Catholic missions of the slightest complicity in the outrage, Spalding's ravings instilled a prejudice which had a lifetime has been required to obliterate.

Nearly twenty years after Whitman's death Spalding originated a new story of Whitman's services in saving Oregon to the United States, in which the Catholics were again brought into prominence. "History to your face, Father Spalding, caught the last band of immigrants across the plains to settle the country with Americans. It is represented further that he found Webster ready to exchange Oregon for some cod fisheries on the shores of Newfoundland and some concessions in settling the boundary of Maine. Whitman, however, had recourse to President Tyler, who promised to delay the negotiations between Webster and Ashburton until Whitman could demonstrate the possibility of leading a band of emigrants to the north-west. Finally, the legend relates that Whitman organized a great band of immigrants and conducted them to Oregon in 1843, thus proving the feasibility of the Oregon Teritory and filling the territory with American home builders. Thus Oregon was saved to the United States. Every detail of this story has now been completely discredited by critical historians. The core of fact consists merely in this, that in 1842 Whitman went east to plead with the authorities of the American Board not to close down the southern section of his mission, and on his return to Oregon in 1843 he happened in with a band of immigrants who had assembled under the leadership of Peter Barnett. The legend is gradually being expunged from school books.

Government and Legislation.—In 1843 a provisional government with an executive council was organized by the settlers in the Willamette Valley. Two years later a governor was chosen who held office until the Oregon Territory was organized under the U. S. Government on 14 August, 1848. Lane, the first governor of the territory, arrived in 1849. Oregon was created a State 14 Feb., 1859, with its present boundaries. The present constitution, and there is a provision that the state legislators may obligate themselves with their constituencies under Statement No. 1, to cast their ballot for United States Senator for the candidate receiving the highest popular vote at the primary election. Thus it happened that United States Senator Geo. E. Chamberlain was elected in 1907 representing the minority party in the state legislature. The initiative and referendum obtain, and a large number of measures are brought before the people by petition under the initiative power. The state legislature provides a subsidy for institutions caring for dependent and delinquent minors.

Freedom of Worship is provided for in the Bill of Rights in the Oregon Constitution. By its provisions there is the "enlarged natural right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience". No law shall in any case control the free exercise and enjoyment of religious opinion. No religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office of trust or profit. No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious or theological institution. The legislature shall provide for the payment of religious services in either houses of the legislative assembly. But by recent enactment the salaries of two chaplains, one a Catholic, the other a non-Catholic, for the State Penitentiary is provided for at the expense of the State. The Constitution further provides that no person shall be rendered incompetent as a witness or juror in consequence of his religious opinions, nor be questioned in any court of justice touching his religious belief to affect the weight of his testimony. Oaths and affirmations shall be such as are most consistent with and most binding upon the consciences of the persons to whom they are administered. No oath shall be required relating to freedom to express opinions, or the right to speak, write, or print freely on any subject, nor every person shall be held responsible for the abuse of this right. Persons whose religious tenets or conscientious scruples forbid them to hear arms shall not be compelled to do so in time of peace, but shall pay an equivalent for personal service.

There are many enactments regarding the observance of Sunday. The Sundays of the year as well as Christmas are legal and judicial holidays. No person may keep open a house or room in which liquor is retailed on Sunday,—the penalty being a fine which goes to the school fund of the county in which the offence is committed. In general it is illegal to keep open on Sunday any establishment "for the purpose of labor or traffic", except drug stores, livery stables, butcher and bakery shops, etc.

The seal of the confessional is guarded by the following provision: "A priest or clergyman shall not, without the consent of the person making the confession, be otherwise examined as to any confession made to him in his professional character in the course of discipline enjoined by the church to which he belongs."

Persons over eighteen years of age may dispose of goods and chattels by will. "A person of twenty-one years of age and upwards and of sound mind may by last will devise all his estate, real and personal, saving to the widow her dower." The will must be in writing. It must be signed by the testator or by some other person under his direction and in his presence, and also by two or more competent witnesses subscribing their names in presence of the testator.

Divorce.—The following grounds are recognized in Oregon for the dissolution of marriage: (1) Impotency existing at the time of marriage and continuing to the time of suit. (2) Adultery. (3) Conviction of felony. (4) Habitual gross drunkenness contracted since marriage. (5) Willful desertion for one year. (6) Cruel and inhuman treatment or personal indignities rendering life burdensome. (7) Bollinger and Cohabitation. (8) Annoyance and ill treatment of wife.

Catholic Education.—One of the earliest cares of Vicar-General Blanchet on arriving in Oregon was the Christian education of the youth committed to his charge. In autumn, 1845, it was decided to open a school for boys at St. Paul. On 17 October in that year, the vicar-general appointed Joseph's College to open a school, with solemn blessing and placed Father Langlois in charge. On the opening day thirty boys entered as boarders—all sons of farmers except one, the son of an Indian chief. The first Catholic school for the girls in Oregon was opened early in 1841, when the six Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur who had just arrived from Belgium with Father De Smet. So immediate was the success of the sisters that Father De Smet writing under date of 9 Oct., 1844, says that another foundation was projected at Oregon City. This plan was not realized until 1858. In September of that year, four sisters took up their residence and opened a school at the Falls. Meanwhile two events occurred which paralyzed all missionary work for a decade. The first was the Whitman massacre already referred to, which aroused the intensest hostility to the Catholic missionaries. The second was the discovery of gold in California which for the time caused a large emigration of the male population from Oregon. This movement of the population deprived the Archdiocese of all religious, both men and women. In May, 1849, a large brigade composed of Catholic families from St. Paul, St. Louis, and Vancouver started for the California mines. As a consequence St. Joseph's College was permanently closed in June of the same year. The Jesuit Fathers closed the mission of St. Francis Xavier on the Willamette; the Sisters of Notre Dame closed their school at St. Paul in 1852, and the following spring closed the school at Oregon City and left for California. The outlook was very dark. The tide of immigration soon turned again towards Oregon, and the Church was able to found additional and missionary forces. A debt had been contracted in building the cathedral and convent at Oregon City. To raise funds Archbishop Blanchet went to South America in September, 1855, and remained there making collections until the end of 1857.

A new era opened for Catholic education in Oregon in October, 1857, when the Holy Names arrived from Montreal and opened at Portland St. Mary's academy and college, which as the mother-house of the community in the province of Oregon has for half a century played an honourable part in the educational work of the north-west. In August, 1871, a school for boys, called St. Michael's College, was opened with 64 pupils. Its first principal was Father Giroix, now Bishop of Boise. In 1875 we find the pupils publishing a college paper, "The Archangel". At the invitation of Archbishop Gross, the Christian Brothers took charge of St. Michael's College in 1886. The name was subsequently changed to the University of St. Francis. In 1892 Father Raper, the founder of the Christian Brothers, became Bishop of Oregon.

In 1892 the Benedictine Fathers, at the invitation of Archbishop Seghers, established their community first at Gervais, and two years later at Mt. Angel. A college for young men at Mt. Angel was opened in 1888. The destruction of the monastery by fire in 1892 was the occasion of building the magnificent monastery and college in its present commanding position. While Mt. Angel's theological department is intended primarily for the education of young men for the order, it has been the Alma Mater of a number of the priests of the archdiocese. In 1904 the priory was raised to the dignity of an abbey. At Mt. Angel, too, has been located since 1883 an academy for girls conducted by the Benedictine Sisters, and the mother-house of the community in Oregon, Columbia University was opened at Portland by Archbishop Christie in 1901. The following year it was placed in charge of the Holy Cross Fathers, under whom it has conducted an industrial school for the gratifying development and has come to occupy a large place in the Catholic life of the metropolis. St. Mary's Institute near Beaverton, an academy for girls, is the mother-house of the Sisters of St. Mary. This congregation was founded by Archbishop Gross in 1886. The Dominican Sisters (San Jose, Calif.) the Sisters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (Los Angeles, Calif.), the Sisters of Mercy, and the Sisters of St. Francis (Milwaukee) opened seven of excellent schools in the archdiocese. About ninetenths of the parishes of the archdiocese are provided with Catholic schools. An annual Catholic Teachers' Institute has been held under the auspices of the Catholic Educational Association of Oregon since 1901. The summer meetings have become very popular, and are attended by all the teachers in the Catholic schools of the archdiocese. Prominent educators from various sections of the country are invited to address the institute. The meetings serve also to promote interchange of ideas and good fellowship between the teaching communities and contribute notably to the uniform educational progress of the schools.

Charitable Institutions.—The archdiocese is well equipped with institutions of charity. St. Vincent's Hospital, conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Providence, was established in Portland in 1874. It will accommodate about 350 patients. The same community conducts a hospital at Astoria. The sisters of Mercy have charge of hospitals at Albany, North Bend, and Roseburg. The Sisters of the Good Shepherd have conducted a home for wayward girls in Portland since 1902. The judges of the juvenile court have repeatedly commended the work of these sisters in the highest terms. The archdiocese has thus become one of the chief centres in its diocesan and national missionary efforts. A debt had been contracted in building the cathedral and convent at Oregon City.
Oregon City, Archdiocese of (Oregonopolitan), includes that part of the State of Oregon west of the Cascade Mountains, being bounded on the east by the counties of Wasco, Crook, and Klamath. It comprises an area of 21,389 square miles. By an induit of the Holy See dated 26 Feb., 1836, the Oregon Country north of the Columbia line and the vicariate Apostolic of Mgr. Provenerker of Red River. By letters of 17 April, 1838, Rev. F. N. Blanchet was appointed vicar-general to the Archbishop of Quebec and assigned to the Oregon mission. The vicar-general established his first mission at St. Paul on the Willamette, and on 6 Jan., 1839, dedicated at that place the first Catholic church in Oregon. The church had been constructed three years earlier by the Canadian settlers who had anticipated the coming of a missionary among them.

As the line of demarcation between British and American territory was still undecided, and missionary priests were assigned to the territories of both Canada and from the United States (i.e., Smet had come from St. Louis), Oregon became a joint mission dependent upon the Bishops of Quebec and Baltimore. At the suggestion of these bishops, the mission was erected into a vicariate Apostolic by a decree of 1 Dec., 1843. On 21 July, 1846, the vicariate was transferred into a province comprising the Archdiocese of Oregon City and the Dioceses of Walla Walla and Vancouver's Island. With the transfer of the See of Walla Walla to Nesqually (1848), the northern boundary of the Archdiocese of Oregon City was fixed at the Columbia River and the 46th lat. This territory was diminished by the cession of the Vicariate of Idaho (1868) and finally received its present limits by the cession of the Diocese of Baker City (1903).

Bishops: (1) Francois Norbert Blanchet (q. v.), b. 8 Sept., 1795, consecrated 25 July, 1815. There were in the diocese in 1845 ten priests, thirteen Sisters of Notre-Dame, and two educational institutions. The first secular priest of Oregon was Fr. Jules Mayot, the ceremony being performed by Archbishop Blanchet at St. Paul, 9 Sept., 1847. On 30 Nov., the archbishop consecrated St. Paul, Bishop Demers of Vancouver's Island. He convened the First Provincial Council of Oregon City, 28 Feb., 1848. On 21 Dec., Archbishop Blanchet left St. Paul and took up his residence in Oregon City. In 1852 the first church in the City of Portland was dedicated under the title of the Immaculate Conception. It became the pro-cathedral when Archbishop Blanchet moved to Portland in 1862. (2) Charles John Seghers, b. 26 Dec., 1839, at Ghent, successor to the pioneer Bishop Demers of Vancouver's Island, was transferred to Oregon City, 10 Dec., 1878, and became coadjutor to Archbishop Blanchet at whom he once retired from active life. Archbishop Seghers is remembered for his heroic devotion to the Indian missions of Alaska (q. v.), which led him to resign the See of Oregon City in 1884. (3) William H. Gross (consecrated Bishop of Savannah, 1873) was promoted to the archiepiscopal See of Oregon City, 1 Feb., 1885, and invested with the pallium in Portland by His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons 9 Oct. On his death 11 Nov., 1898, he was succeeded by the present archbishop. (1) Most Rev. Alexander Christie (consecrated Bishop of Vancouver's Island, 29 June, 1880, transferred to Oregon City, 26 Nov., 1885). He was consecrated Bishop of Oregon City, 12 Feb., 1899. Statistics for 1909: diocesan priests, 50; priests of secular orders, 40; families, 3; secondary schools, 12; elementary schools, 35; pupils, 5500.
the remaining years of his life in France, chiefly concerned with the care of the Irish colleges there.

D'Alton, E. A. (1900; 1904; 1838; 1826; 1826; 1826; 1826)

O'Reilly, E. A. D'Alton.

O'Reilly, E. A. D'Alton, b. in London, 30 April 1813; d. in Dublin, 10 November 1878. Educated at Clongowes and Maynooth, he made his theological studies at Rome, where after seven years in the Roman College he gained the degree of Doctor of Divinity by a "public act" de univera theologa. After his ordination in 1838 he taught theology for thirteen years at Maynooth into which he was mainly instrumental in introducing the Roman spirit and tradition, after which he entered the Jesuit novitiate at Naples. He taught theology for some years at St. Beuno's College in North Wales till he was appointed Professor of Theology under Newman in the Catholic University of Ireland. During the remainder of his life he resided at Milltown Park near Dublin as resident of Spiritual Exercises and was Provincial of Ireland 1863-70. Constantly consulted on theological questions by the bishops and priests of Ireland, Cardinal Newman in his famous "Letter to the Duke of Norfolk" calls him "a great authority, and one of the first theologians of the day," Dr. W. G. Ward, editor of "The Dublin Review," said, "It was a great loss to the Church that so distinguished a theologian as Father O'Reilly has published so little." Dr. Ward wrote of his chief work, "The Relations of the Church to Society," that "Whatever is written by so able and so solidly learned a theologian, one so docile to the Church and so fixed in the ancient theological paths, cannot but be esteemed a gift to the Catholic reader in these anxious and perilous times."

Matthew Russell.

O'Reilly, Hugh, Archbishop of Armagh, head of the Confederates of Kilkenny, b. 1580; d. on Trinity Island in Lough Erne. He first conceived the idea of forming a national movement into a national organization. He convened a provincial synod at Kells early in March, 1612, in which the bishops declared the war undertaken by the Irish people for their king, religion, and country to be just and lawful. The following May (1612) he convened a national synod, consisting of prelates and civil lords, at Kilkenny. At this synod the bishops, for their first time, definitely framed an oath of association to be taken by all their adherents, binding them to maintain the fundamental laws of Ireland, the free exercise of religion, and true allegiance to Charles I. Orders were issued to levy men and raise money; to establish a mint and an official printing press to take the duty off foreign imports as wheat and corn, lead, iron, arms and ammunition; the bishops and clergy should pay a certain sum for national purposes out of the ecclesiastical revenues that had come back into their possession; and agents should be sent to Catholic courts to solicit aid. They gave letters of credit and chartered some light vessels that were to fly the Confederate colours and protect the coast, and they drafted a remonstrance to the king declaring their loyalty and protest against the acts of tyranny, injustice, and intolerance of the Papist lords justices and Parliament of Dublin in confiscating Catholic lands and putting a ban on Catholic schools. The assembly lasted until 9 January, agreeing to meet 20 May following. The see of the Confederation bore in its centre a large cross rising out of a flaming heart. Above were the wings of a dove, on the left a harp, and on the right a crown; the legend read: PRO DEO, REGE, ET PATRIA, HIBERNI UNANIMIS.

Wherever the prince's partisans commanded, the Protestant bishops, ministers, and people were safe, and a brave order of Jesuits, in the name of their own religious worship. Archbishop O'Reilly was to keep out the war and the terrible years that followed it, the soul and guide of the national party; he did his utmost to restrain the violence of the people, who would have wreaked vengeance on their persecutors had they been left to their own instincts at that crisis. He urged Sir Phineas O'Reilly and Lord Roke to keep the armed multitudes in check and prevent the massacre of Protestants. Such salutary restraint produced the most happy results, for even the roughest of the northern chieftains respected him too much to violate his lessons of forbearance and charity. When the great chieftain, Owen Roe, was dying, he had himself taken to death in Irish. He was the recipient of the brother-in-law Philip O'Reilly, where he was attended by Archbishop O'Reilly. Local tradition gives the ruined Abbey of the Holy Trinity, on an island a few miles from Ballinaclough Castle, as his last resting-place. In the same locality Archbishop O'Reilly was buried. The prince's signature is still to be seen in model of the confessors of the Confederation of Kilkenny as "Hugo Armaecus."

O'Reilly, John Boyle, poet, novelist, and editor, b. at South Castle, Drogheda, Ireland, 24 June, 1841; d. at Hull, Massachusetts, 10 August, 1889; second son of William David O'Reilly and Eliza Boyle. He attended the National School, conducted by his father, and was employed successively as printer on the "Drogheda Argus," and on the staff of "The Guardian," Preston, England; he afterwards became a trooper in the Tenth Hussars. Entering actively into the Fenian movement, believing in his experience that Ireland's grievances could be redressed only by physical force, he was betrayed to the authorities and duly court-martialled. On account of his extreme youth, his life sentence was commuted to twenty years' penal servitude in Australia. Lamenting to the Irish country's severe treatment before long he earnestly advocated constitutional agitation as the only way to Irish Home Rule. In 1869, O'Reilly escaped from Australia, with the assistance of the captain of a whaling barque from New Bedford, Massachusetts. In 1870, he became editor of "The Pilot," Boston, and from 1870 to 1880 he edited "The Pilot," with a column of verse being associated with Archbishop Williams of Boston. His books include four volumes of poems: "Songs of the Southern Sea," "Songs, Legends, and Ballads," "The Statues in the Block," and "In Bohemia"; a novel, "Moonlyne," based on his Australian experiences; his collaboration in another novel, "The King's Court," with Sir Walter Besant; and "The Call of Ireland," both Catholic, his great influence, used lavishly in forwarding the interests of younger Catholics destined to special careers, and in lifting up the lowly without regard to any claim but their need, was for twenty years a valuable factor in Catholic progress in America. He was married in 1872 to Mary Murphy, who died in 1897. Their four children survive them.

to assist the famine-stricken peasants. In 1851 he was associated with Newman and Archbishop Leahy to report on the projected Catholic University, and, in 1851 he became captain of the Louth Rifles. He married Miss Ida Jeremiah, 3 Aug. 1859. Some months later he offered his services to Pius IX, against Garibaldi. Having formed an Irish Brigade, he was appointed major, under General Fimodan, and fought gallantly in every engagement until the surrender of Spoleto, 18 Sept., 1860. From 1860 to 1876 he repre-

and was one of those who signed the requisition for the famous Home Rule Conference under Isaac Burt.
By his activity in that body and others he was influential in the movement to obtain Catholic chaplains for the army. He wrote "Sufferings for the Faith in "Dublin Review" and other periodicals, writing especially in defence of the Holy See and of Catholic educational matters. His "Triumph of the Cross" (Dublin, 1854) is now out of print.

Oremus, invitation to pray, said before collect and other prayers and occurring continually in the Roman Rite. It is used as a single ejaculation in the East (e.g., Nestorian Rite, Brightman, "Eastern Literature," Oxford, 1896, 255, etc.; Jacobite, ib., 75, 80, etc.). or the imperative: "Pray" (Capitol, ib., 162), "Stand for prayer" (ib., 158); most commonly, however with a further determination, "Let us pray to the Lord" (ταύτα κατά δεήσιν, throughout the Byzantin-ean Rite), and so on. Mgr Duchesne thinks that the Gallican collects were also introduced by the word Oremus in the Roman Rite before all separate collects in the Mass, Office, or on other occasions (but several collects may be joined with one Oremus), before Post-Communio. It is the same way, alone, with no prayer following, before the epistle; also before the introduction to the Pater noster and before other short prayers (e.g., Affer a nobis) in the form of collects. It appears that the Oremus did not originally apply to the prayer (collect) that now follows it. It is thought that it was once an invitation to private prayer, very likely with further direction as to the object, as now on Good Friday (Oremus pro ecclesia sancta Dei, etc.).
The deacon then said: Flectamus genua, and all knelt in silent prayer. After a time the people were told to stand up (Lecture), and finally the celebrant collected all the petitions in one short sentence said aloud (see Collect). Of all this our Oremus followed at once by the collect would be a fragment.

ADRIAN FORREST

Orense, Diocese of (Ourense), suffragan of Compostela, includes nearly all of the civil Province of Orense, and part of those of Lugo and Zamora, be-Eing bounded on the north by Pontevedra, Lugo, and León; on the east by Leon and Zamora; on the south by Portugal; and on the west by Pontevedra and Pontevedra.
In its capital, Orense (pop. 11,168), is a very ancient city on the banks of the Miño (Minho), famous since classic antiquity for its hot springs. The See of Orense dates from a remote period, certainly before the fifth century. The First Council of Braga (561) created four dioceses, the bishops of which afterwards signed the acts of the Second Council of Braga below the Bishop of Orense—an indication that they were of junior standing. Moreover, the signatures of the Bishop of Tuy and Astorga, two very ancient Churches, come after those of the Bishops of Orense. In the North, Idácios, two bishops, Pastor and Singrins, were consecrated in the convent of Lugo in 433, and one of them (it is not known which) was a Bishop of Orense.

In 461, the Suevians, who had invaded Galicia, embraced Arianaism, and only in the time of King Chararitic (560) were they reconciled to Catholicism. St.
Gregory of Tours states that the Suevians embraced the Faith with remarkable fervour. The conversion and instruction of both king and people appear to have been completed by St. Martin of Dunam. The names of the bishops of Orense are unknown until 571.
when the diocese was governed by Winitir, a man of able Suevian lineage, who assisted at the Second Council of Braga. He was an intimate friend of St.
Martin of Braga, who dedicated him as his "most dear father in Christ", his treatise "De ira". In 716 Orense was destroyed by Abd-lechi, son of Muza. In 862 Alfonso II combined the two Dioceses of Orense and Lugo; Orense, nevertheless, appears to have retained its titular bishop, up to the death of the Bishop of Lugo. The Chaste is witnessed by Maydo, Bishop of Orense.
When Alfonso III (860-910) had reconquered Orense, he gave it to Bishop Sebastian, who had been Bishop of Arcabica in Celtiberia and was succeeded by Ceneric (584), Summa (586), and Ego- (593), who took part in the consecration of the church of Santiago and in the Council of Oviedo. In the episcopacy of An-surus (912-12) the holy abbot Franquela (906) erected the Benedictine monastery of S. Esteban de Ribas del Sí (St. Stephen on the Sí), where Ansuris himself and eight of his successors died in the odour of sanctity.

At the end of the tenth century the diocese was laid waste, first by the Northmen (570) and then by Alamor, after which it was committed to the care of the Bishop of Lugo until 1071, when, after a vacancy of seventy years, Sancho II appointed Ederonio to the see. Ederonio rebuilt the old cathedral called S. María la Mayor (1084-89). The most famous bishop of this period was Diego Velasco (1089-1127), a man of truly skillful character, with a very rare gift of "elevation of sight of the Church and glory of his country". He assisted at a council of Palencia and three councils of Santiago, and, with the assent of Doña Urraca and her son Alfonso, granted privileges (fueros) to Orense. He ruled for thirty years and was succeeded by Martin (1127-53) and Pedro Segura. The latter was consecsor to Ferdinand II, who granted him the lordship of Orense. Bishop Lorenzo was the jurist whom Tu-dense called the "pattern of the law" (regula del dere-ccho); he rebuilt the cathedral and the bishop's palace, and constructed the famous bridge of Orense, with its principal arch spanning more than 130 feet. He as-isted at the Council of Lyons in 1245. Vazquez de yoya quarreled with the Franciscans, while he was pre-center, and burned their convent, which had sheltered one of his enemies, but, having become bishop, he rebuilt it magnificently. Vasco Pérez Marín (1333-43) distinguished for his devotion to the "Holy Christ of Orense", whom he cursed. He transferred from Finisterre to Orense and built for it a beautiful clo-ister, modified in subsequent periods. Other distinguished occupants of this see were Cardinal Juan de Torquemada, a Dominican, who assisted at the Councils of Constance and Basle; Diego de Fonseca (1471-84), who repaired the cathedral; Cardinals Antonietto Palducci, Ivaldi, and Maffrino. The last is succeeded by general Fernando Valdés. Francisco Blanco founded the Hospital of S. Roque, assisted at the Council of Trent, founded the Jesuit colleges at Malaga and Compostela, and endowed that at Monterey. The Zelazny, Juan Munoz de la Cueva, a Trinitarian, wrote "Historical Notes on the Cathedral Church of Oresme," (Madrid, 1727). Pedro de la Quintana (d. 1818), having been president of the Regency in 1810, was expelled by the Carlists. In 1890, he founded the conciliar seminary of Oresme in 1892.

The original cathedral was dedicated to the Mother of God, and is still known as Santa Maria la Mayor. The Suevian king Charlemagne (see above) built 950 another, more sumptuous, church in honour of St. Martin of Tours and made it the cathedral, as it is to this day. Both churches, having suffered severely from fire and the invasions of Arabs and Northmen, have been repeatedly restored. The later cathedral is Romanesque, with features of Gothic transition; its oldest portions date from the thirteenth century, and its latest from the early sixteenth; the facade has been rebuilt in modern times. The high altar has a silver tabernacle, given by Bishop Miguel Arcos, and statues of Our Lady and St. Martin. In two side altars are the relics of St. Euphemia and her companions in martyrdom, Sts. Faustus and Primus. The plan of the church is a Latin cross, with three naves, the lower standing apart. The choir stalls are the work of Diego de la Quintana and his son Juan Gonzalez. Of the cloisters only a small portion remains, a perfect gem of ogival work. The church of St. Francis and the Trinity should also be mentioned; it was founded probably about the middle of the twelfth century as a hospice for pilgrims.

The most important contributions to mathematics are contained in "Tractatus de figuratione potentiarum et mensurarum diffinimentum," still in manuscript. An abridgment of this work was printed as "Tractatus de latitudibus formarum" (1482, 1486, 1505, 1515), having heretofore been the only source for the study of his mathematical ideas. In a quality, or accidental form, such as heat, the Scholastics distinguished the intensio (the degree of heat at each point) and the extensio (e.g. the length of the heated rod): these two terms were often replaced by latitude and longitudo, and from the time of St. Thomas until far on in the fourteenth century, there was lively debate on the question of latitude versus longitudo. Though the disputation of Oresme vis concretio of employing what we should now call rectangular co-ordinates; in modern terminology, a length proportional to the longitudo was the abscessa at a given point, and a perpendicular at that point, proportional to the latitudo, was the ordinate. He shows that a geometrical property of such a figure could be regarded as corresponding to a property of the form itself only when this property remains constant while the units measuring the longitudo and latitudo vary. Hence he defines latitudo uniformis as that which is represented by a line parallel to the longitudo, and any other latitudo is disformis; the latitudo uniformiter disformis is represented by a line parallel to the ordinate. This proves that this definition is equivalent to an algebraical relation in which the longitudes and latitudes of any three points would figure: i.e., he gives the equation of the right line, and thus forestalls Descartes in the invention of analytical geometry. This doctrine he extends to figures of three dimensions.

Outside his work in mathematics, Oresme was also a pious man, and he considered the monasteries, or quantitas, of the form, proportional to the area of the figure representing it. He proves this theorem: A form uniformiter disformis has the same quantity as a form uniformis of the same longitudo and having as latitude the mean between the two extreme limits of the form. This shows that the meaning of the latitudo of a form is applicable to the movement of a point, on condition that the time is taken as longitudo and the speed as latitudo; quantity is, then, the space covered in a given time. In virtue of this transposition, the theorem of the latitude uniformiter disformis became the law of the space traversed in case of uniformly varied motion: Oresme's demonstration is exactly the same as that which Galileo was to render celebrated in the seventeenth century. Moreover, this law was never forgotten during the interval between Oresme and Galileo; it was taught at Oxford by William Heytesbury and his followers, then, at Paris and in Italy, and at the universities of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

In the middle of the thirteenth century, long before Galileo, the Dominican Dominic Soto applied the law to the uniformly accelerated falling of heavy bodies and to the uniformly descending ascession of projectiles.

Oresme's physical teachings are set forth in two French works, the "Traité de la sphère," written in 1355 and printed in Paris (1375, 1376, 1379); the "Traité du ciel et du monde," written in 1377 at the request of King Charles V, but never printed. In most of the essential problems of statics and dynamics, Oresme follows the opinions advocated in Paris by his predecessor, Jean Buridan de Béthune, and his contemporary, Albert de Saxe (see Saxe, Albert de). In opposition to the Aristotelian theory of weight, according to which the natural location of heavy bodies is the centre of the world, and that of light bodies the concavity of the moon's orb, he proposes the following: The elements tend to dispose themselves in such manner that, from the centre to the periphery, they are diminishing in their density. He thinks that a similar rule may exist in worlds other than this. This is the doctrine later substituted for the Aristotelian by Copernicus and his followers, such as Giordano Bruno. The latter argued in a manner so similar to Oresme's that it would seem he had read the "Traité du ciel et du monde". But Oresme had a more stringent claim to be regarded as the precursor of Copernicus when one considers what he says of the diurnal motion of the earth, to which he devotes the gloss following chapters xxv and xxv of the "Traité du ciel et du monde". He begins by establishing that no experiment can decide whether the heavens move from east to west or west to east; or whether a sensible experience can never establish more than relative motion. He then shows that the reasons proposed by the physics of Aristotle against the movement of the earth are not valid; he points out, in particular, the principle of the solution of the difficulty drawn from the movement of projectiles. Nicole, speaking to the Jesuits on Cartesian physics, in interpreting these passages he lays down rules universally followed by Catholic exegetists of the present day. Finally, he adduces the argument of simplicity for the theory that the earth moves, and not the heavens, and the whole of his argument in favour of the earth's motion is both more explicit and much clearer than that given by Copernicus.

the air pumps were replaced by bellows. Whether in these organs the water apparatus was dispensed with, is not quite certain. It would be strange, however, if this important means of regulating the wind pressure had been discontinued while the hydraulics was still in vogue. About the sixth century organ-building seems to have gone down in Western Europe, while it was continued in the Eastern Empire. It was a great event when, in 537, the Emperor Constantine V Copronymus made a present of an organ to King Pepin. In 826 a Venetian priest named Gregoris erected an organ at Aachen, possibly following the directions left by Vitruvius. Shortly afterwards organ-building seems to have flourished in Germany, for we are told (Baluze, "Misc."") V, 480) that Pope John VIII (872-880) asked Anno, Bishop of Freising, to send him a good organ and an organist. By this time the hydraulic apparatus for equalizing the wind pressure had certainly been abandoned, presumably because in northern climates the water might freeze in winter time. The wind, therefore, was supplied to the pipes directly from the bellows. To get anything like a regular flow of wind, it was necessary to have a number of bellows with them. Thus, in Winchester cathedral, built in 951, at the church of 400 pipes had twenty-six bellows, which took seventy men to blow. These seventy men evidently worked in relays. In all probability one man would work one bellows, but the work was so exhausting that each man could continue only for a short time. The bellows were pressed down either by means of a handle or by the blower standing on them. It seems that the device of weighting the bellows—so that the blower had merely to raise the upper board and leave the weights to press it down again—was discovered only in the beginning of the sixteenth century.

Another point in which the medieval organ was inferior to the modern was the absence of stops. There were, indeed, several rows of pipes, but they could not be stopped. All the pipes belonging to one key sounded always together, when that key was depressed. Thus the Winchester organ had ten pipes to each key. What the difference between these various pipes was, we do not know; but it appears that at an early date pipes were introduced into which were inserted stop-valves, so that the upper pipes of the principal tone, giving the octave, twelfth, and their duplicates in still higher octaves. Then, to counterbalance these high-pitched pipes, others were added giving the lower octave, and even the second lower octave. In the absence of a stop-action, variety of tone quality was of course unattainable, except by means of pumps, which were of course used in the Winchester organ had two key-boards, representing practically two organs (some authorities think there were three). From a contemporary description we learn that there were two organs (or three according to some), each managing its own "alphabet." The term alphabet is explained by the fact that the alphabetical name of the note was attached to each slide. The modern name key refers to the same fact, though, according to Zarlino ("Istitutioni armoniche", 1558), in a roundabout manner: he says that the letters of the alphabet placed at the beginning of the Guidonian staff (see Neus., p. 772, col. 2) were called keys (claves, alfa) because they unlocked the secrets of the staff, and that the name was applied to the levers of instruments like the organ inscribed with the same alphabetical letters.

While in the Winchester organ, the two key-boards belonged to one organ, we know that there used to be also entirely separate organs in the same building. The word instrumentum portatilia, because they could be carried about, the name was given in France in the tenth century (Violet-le-Duc, "Instruments de musique", p. 298). A larger kind was called "positive," because it was stationary, but it again, seems to have been distinguished from a still larger instrument known simply as the organ. Later on, when in reality several organs were combined in the same instrument, one of the softer divisions was called "regal." This name is still retained in the organ, while in English-speaking countries it has been changed to "choir organ." There was still another instrument of the organ kind called a "regal." Its peculiarity was that, instead of pipes, it had reeds, fastened at one end and free to vibrate at the other. It was therefore the precursor of our modern harmonium. In the fourteenth century organs were constructed with different key-boards placed one above the other, each controlling its own division of the organ. Soon afterwards couplers were designed, that is, mechanical appliances by which a key depressed in one key-board (or manual) would simultaneously pull down a corresponding key in another. The invention of a special key-board to be played by the feet, and hence called "pedals," is also placed in the fourteenth century. Sometimes the pedal keys merely pulled down manual keys by means of a chord; sometimes they were provided with their own rows of pipes, as in some fourteenth-century Swedish organs described by C. F. Hennerberg in a paper read at the International Musical Congress at Vienna in 1900 ("Bericht", 91 sqq., Vienna and Leipzig, 1900). It seems that stops were not re-invented until the fifteenth century. The form then used for a stop-action was that of a "spring-box." About the fourteenth century, it appears, the sliding for the key-action had been discontinued, and hence, (gores) had been used, as in the ancient hydraulis, but running transversely, each under a row of pipes belonging to the same key. Into these grooves wind was admitted through a slit covered by a valve (pallet), the valve being pulled down and opened by the key-action, and closed again by a spring. Such an arrangement is found in some recital books of fifteenth-century Swedish organs (see Hennerberg, 1 e). In these grooves, then, about the fifteenth century, secondary spring valves were inserted, one under each hole leading to a pipe. From each of these secondary valves a string led to one of a number of rods running longitudinally under the sound-board, one for each set of pipes corresponding to the grooves. In this way, all the secondary valves belonging to the corresponding stop would be opened, and wind could enter the pipes as soon as it was admitted into the grooves by the key-action. Later on it was found more convenient to push these valves down than to pull them. Little rods were made to pass through the top of the sound-board, and then to the base. These rods could be depressed, so as to open the valves, by the stop-rods running over the sound-board. From these secondary valves the whole arrangement received the name spring-box.

The spring-box solved the problem in principle, but had the drawback of necessitating frequent repairs. Hence, from the sixteenth century onwards, organ-builders began to use sliders for the stop-action. Thus the double control of the pipes by means of channel and slide was again used as in the hydraulis, but with exchanged functions, the channel now serving for the key-action and the slider for the stop-action. In modern times some builders have returned to the efficient method of using the channel longitudinally, for the stops (Key-slides, and similar contrivances; pneumatic sound-boards). Mention should also be made of attempts to do away with the channels altogether, to have all the pipes supplied directly from a universal wind-chest, and to bring about the double control of key and stop-action by the mechanism already described above. Each pipe hole had its own separate valve, and key and stop mechanism are so arranged that only their combined action will open the valve. Shortly after the stop-action had been reintroduced, builders began to design varieties of stops. The earlier pipes had been all of our open diapason kind, which in principle is the same as the toy-whistle. These were not merely rectangular (being the ratio of diameter to length). Also, the form of the reeds—upright or inverted, replaced the cylindrical form. Stopped pipes—that is, pipes closed at the top—were added, and reeds—pipes with a "beating" reed and a body like the "flue"—pipes were introduced. Thus, by the sixteenth century all the main types now used had been invented.

The keys in the early medieval organs were not, it seems, levers, as in the ancient organ and modern instruments, but simply the projecting ends of the slides, being, presumably, furnished with some simple device making it convenient for the fingers to push in or pull out the slides. The invention of key-levers is generally thought to have the sixteenth century. The key-boards were for a long time placed exactly opposite their sliders. When, therefore, larger pipes began to be placed on the sound-board, the distances between the centres of the keys had to be widened. Thus we are told that organs had keys from three to five inches wide. This inconvenient was overcome by the invention of the roller-board, which is placed in the fourteenth century. The rollers are rods placed longitudinally under the sound-board and pivoted. From each two short arms project horizontally, one being placed over a key, the other under the corresponding slider or valve. Thus the length of the key-board became independent of the length of the sounding-board. We learn that in the fifteenth century the keys were so reduced in size that a hand could span the interval of a fifth, and in the beginning of the sixteenth the keyboard had about the size it has at present.

The number of keys in the early organs was small; only about one or two octaves of natural keys with the addition of b flat. Slowly the number of keys was increased, and in the fourteenth century we hear of key-boards having thirty-one keys. In the same century chromatic notes other than b flat began to be added. Then the question of tuning became troublesome. Various systems were devised, and it was not until the eighteenth century, through the powerful influence of J. S. Bach, that equal temperament was adopted. This consists in tuning in fifths and octaves, making each fifth slightly flat so that the 12th fifth will give a perfect octave. About the beginning of the sixteenth century the lower limit of the key-boards began to be fixed on the C or F below that, and only about the middle of the nineteenth century the continental usage prevailed also here. The total compass of the manuals now varies from four and a half to five octaves, that of the pedals from two octaves and three notes to two octaves and six notes (C—f' of C—f'). In 1712 it occurred to a London organ-builder named Jordan to place one manual department of the organ in a box fitted with shutters which could be opened or closed by a foot-worked lever, a kind of forge-chest and draw-stop being thereby obtained. This device, which received the name of swell, soon became popular in England, while in Germany it found favour only quite recently.

As we have seen, all through the Middle Ages the blowing apparatus consisted of bellows which drew in the wind directly to the sound-boxes, but only in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were employed, one to supply the wind, the other to store it and keep it at even pressure. Thus, after an interval of about a thousand years, the blowing apparatus regained the perfection it had possessed in the hydraulis during the preceding thousand years. In 1570, the clockmaker named Carvings invented a square, weighted bellows, serving as a reservoir, and supplied by other bellows called "feeders". The feeders are generally worked by levers operated either by hand or foot. In the early days they was applied to supersede the human blower; hydraulic, or gas, or oil engines, or electromotors being used. The difficulty of regulating the supply is easily overcome in the case of hydraulic engines, which can be made to go so slowly or fast as required. But if it is serious in the case of other engines, gas and oil engines can at any time control the supply, while with electromotors a control of their speed is awkward. Hence, nowadays, bellows serving as feeders are frequently superseded by centrifugal fans, which can go at their full speed without delivering wind. It is sufficient, therefore, to fit an automatic valve to the reservoir, which will close when the reservoir is full. There is thus a drawback to both systems, and, even with electromotors as required in modern organs, they must go at a high speed which is apt to produce a disturbing noise.

To obviate this difficulty several fans are arranged in series, the first raising the wind only to a slight pressure and so delivering it to a second fan, which delivers it at an increased pressure to the next, and soon, until the requisite pressure is attained by a practically noiseless process.

A genuine revolution in the building of organs was brought about by the invention of the pneumatic lever. Up to the twelfth century, it appears, the "touch" (or key-resistance) was light, so that the organist could play with his fingers. Thus the wind-pressure was great enough to overcome the "draw-stop", which was operated by a lever, or pedal, and the wind would be sent through the pipes to the open "stop", and thus the organ was played without the aid of a bellows. In connection with the invention of the pneumatic lever, we find in 1832, thought of using the power of the wind itself as an intermediate agent, and he induced the French organ-builder, A. C. Gans, to adopt his idea, which was patented in 1841. The device was the following: in that the key, by opening a small valve, admits the wind into a bellows which acts as motor and pulls down the pallet. Once this appliance was thoroughly appreciated, the way was opened to dispense altogether with the mechanism that connects the key with the pallet (or the draw-stop knob with the slider), and to put in its stead tubular-pneumatic or electropneumatic action. In the former the key opens very small valve which admits the wind into a tube of small diameter; the wind, travelling through the tube in the form of a compression wave, opens, at the far end, another small valve controlling the bellows, that is, of course, just opposite the pallet. In the electric-pneumatic action the key makes an electric contact, causing the electric current to energize, at the organ end, an electro-magnet which, by its armature, causes a flow of wind and thus operates on a pneumatic lever.

With these inventions all the restrictions in organ building, as to the speed of delivery of wind, distances etc., were removed. Also means of control could easily be multiplied. Couplers were increased in number, and besides those connecting a key of one manual with the corresponding key of another, octave and sub-octave couplers were added, both on the same manual and between different manuals. In the matter of a stop-control, combination pedals—that is, foot-worked levers drawing a whole set of stops at a time—had been in use before the pneumatic lever. They were now often replaced by small pistons placed conveniently for the hands. These pistons are sometimes so designed as not to interfere with the arrangement of stops worked by hand; sometimes they are made "manual" and placed in octave-patch, so that a combination of stops which the player may previously arrange. Attempts have also been made to have individual stops playable from several manuals. This is a great advantage, but, on the other hand, it implies inaccessible mechanism. Casson's "Octave-duplication" avoids this objection, while, by making a whole manual playable in octave pitch, it considerably increases the variety of tone obtainable from a given number of stops.

A special difficulty in organ-playing is the manipulation of the pedal stops. On the manuals quick changes of strength and quality can be obtained by passing from one key-board to another. But, as only one pedal key-board is feasible, similar changes on the pedals can only be made by change of stops. Hence special facilities are here particularly desirable.

Casson's invention, in 1889, of "pedal helps"—little levers, or pistons, one for each manual, which make the pedal stops adjust themselves automatically to all changes of stops on the corresponding manual—is the most satisfactory device of the kind.

II. FAMOUS ORGAN BUILDERS.—Ctesibius, the inventor of the hydraulis, and the Venetian Georgius, who built the first organ north of the Alps, have already been mentioned. It is interesting to find a pope among the organ-builders of history: Sylvester II (999–1003), who seems to have built a hydraulic organ (Ptolemaeus, "Syntagma Musicum", II, 92). We may also record here the first instructions on organ-building since the time of Vitruvius and Heron, contained in a work, "Diversarum artium schedula", by Theophrastus von Eresos, a monk, who seems to have written before 1100 (Degering, "Die Orge!", p. 65). After this are several instructions of the fifteenth century, when we hear in Germany of a large organ in Cologne cathedral, built, probably, by one Johann, while the builders of famous organs in Erfurt Cathedral (1225) and in St. Peter's near Erfurt (1226) are not known. A Master Guncelin of Frankfort built a large organ for Strasbourg cathedral in 1292, and a Master Raspo, also of Frankfort, one for the spire of the same church. The famous organ at Halberstadt, with four key-boards, was built between 1359 and 1364 by Nikolaus Faber, a priest. Of the fifteenth century we will mention only Stefan of Breslau, who built a new organ for Erfurt cathedral in 1483. In the sixteenth century Gregorius Vogel was famous for the beauty and variety of tone of his stops. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Silbermann family were renowned. The first of them to take up organ-building was Andreas Silbermann (1675–1733); his brother Gottfried (1663–1755), the most famous organ-builder in the family, was also one of the first to build pianoforte. Three streets in the house that was the home of their father and uncle, Johann Andreas (1712–82), Johann Domenico (1717–1766), and Johann Heinrich (1727–1799), the last two building mainly pianofortes. In a third generation we meet Johann Jesias (d. 1786), a son of Johann Andreas, and Johann Friedrich (1762–1817), a son of Johann Heinrich. In the nineteenth century we may mention Moser, who, about 1830, built a large organ for Freiburg in Switzerland where they imitate thunder-storms; Schultze of Paulinzelle, Ladegaert of Wiesseln, Winkler of Ludwigsburg, Mauracher of Graz, Sauer of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, Weigle of Stuttgart, Stahlbuth of Aachen.

In England we hear in the fourteenth century of the organ of the cathedral of Lincoln, while a clockmaker. From the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the names of a large number of organ-builders are transmitted to us, showing organ-building was in a flourishing condition, but the Puritans destroyed most organs, and organ-builders almost disappeared. When organ-building was taken up again, in 1660, there was a scarcity of competent builders, and Bernard Schmidt, with his two nephews Gerard and Bernard, became famous, so commonly known as Father Smith, to distinguish him from his nephew. At the same time John Harris, a son of Thomas Harris of Salisbury, who had been working in France, returned to England. His son, Renatus, became the principal rival of Father Smith. In the following century another German, John Snetscher (1710–1800) settled in England and became famous for the quality of his organ pipes. His business eventually became that of W. Hill and Son, London. In the nineteenth century the most prominent builder was Henry Willis (1821–1901), who designed several ingenious forms of pneumatic actions and brought the intonations of reeds to great perfection. Mention should also be made of H. Hopf-Jones of Birkenhead, whose electro-pneumatic action marked a great step forward.

In Italy the Antegnati family were prominent during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Bartolomeo Antegnati built an organ in 1486 for Brescia cathedral, while his nephew Giovanni-Antegnati in Venice, Giov. Giacomelli, and Giov. Battista. Francesco was also known as a maker of harpsichords. G. Giacomo was the organist of Milan cathedral and built for Brescia cathedral a choir organ which was famous in its time. Grazioso, a son of G. Battista, built a new large organ for Brescia in 1590. His son Costanzo (b. 1557) was an organist and a composer of renown. In the preface to a collection of ricercari (1608) he gives a list of 155 organs built by members of his family (cf. Damiano Muni, "Elgi Antegnati", Milan, 1883). Vincento Columbi built a fine organ for St. John Lateran in 1549. In France we hear of an organ in the Abbey of Fécamp in the twelfth century. In the eighteenth century when we hear of or mention an organ in the preface to a collection of ricercari (1608) he gives a list of 155 organs built by members of his family (cf. Damiano Muni, "Elgi Antegnati", Milan, 1883). Vincento Columbi built a fine organ for St. John Lateran in 1549. In France we hear of an organ in the Abbey of Fécamp in the twelfth century. In the eighteenth century when we hear of or mention a maker of organs was Nicolas le Ferre, who, in 1701, built an organ of 51 stops in Paris. More famous is Don Bedos de Celles (1714–97), who also wrote an important book, "L'art du facteur d'orgues" (Paris, 1766–78). In the nineteenth century a renowned firm was that of Daublaine & Co., founded 1819; in 1855 it became Ducrocq & Son and in 1880 it became stopped and renamed "Ducrocq & Son". In 1855 it changed its name again to Merkin, Schütze & Co. and erected some of the earliest electro-pneumatic organs. The most famous builder of modern times, however, was Aristide Cavaillé-Coll (1811–99), a descendant of an old organ-building family, mentioned above in connexion with Barker's invention of the pneumatic lever; he was also highly esteemed for the intonation of his reeds.

In America the first organ erected was imported from Europe in 1713 for Queen's Chapel, Boston. It was followed by several others, likewise imported. In 1745 Edward Broomfield of Boston built the first organ in America. The firm of W. A. Coolidge began business in the same city in 1800. The best known of American organ builders is Hilborne L. Roosevelt of New York, who, with his son Frank, effected many bold improvements in organ building. In 1891 John Turlin Austin patented his "universal air-chest": an air-chest large enough to admit a man for repairs and containing all the mechanism, as well as the magazine for storing the wind and keeping it at equal pressure (Mathews, "A Handbook of the Organ").

III. THE ORGAN IN CHURCH SERVICE.—In the early centuries the objection of the Church to instrumental music applied also to the organ, which is not surprising, if we remember the association of the hydraulis with ancient mystery and gnostic ceremonies. "In the church... Pontifical", Cologne, 1503, Pope Vitalian (657–72) introduced the organ into the church service. This, however, is very doubtful. At all events, a strong objestion to the organ in church service remained pretty general down to the thirteenth century, which may be accounted for partly by the imperfect state of tone organs of that time. But from the twelfth century on, the organ became the privileged church instrument, the majestic and unimpassioned character of its tone making it a particularly suitable means for adding solemnity to Divine worship.

The sacred liturgy is allowed on all joyful occasions, both for purely instrumental pieces (voluntaries) and as accompaniment. The organ alone may even take the place of the voices in alternate verses at Mass or in the Office, provided the text so treated be recited by someone in an audible voice while the organ is played. Only the Credo is excepted. With regard to the Christmas Office and certain verses of each chant and all the verses at which any liturgical action takes place—such as the “Te ergo quesumus”, the “Tantum ergo”, the “Gloria Patri” should be sung.

With some exceptions, the organ is not to be played during Advent and Lent. It may be played on the Third Sunday in Advent (Gaudete) and the Fourth in Lent (Lentare) at Mass and Vespers, on Holy Thursday at the Gloria, and on Holy Saturday at and, according to general usage, after the Gloria. Moreover, it may be played, even in Advent and Lent, on solemn feasts of the saints and on the occasion of any joyful event, according to the Church's rite. R.C., 11 May, 1878, 3448 (572s). Moreover, by a kind of indulg, it would seem, the organ is admitted, even in Lent and Advent, to support the singing of the choir, but in this case it must cease with the singing. This permission, however, does not extend to the last three days of Holy Week (S. R. C., 20 March, 1903, 4909). At Offices of the Dead organ music is excluded; at a Requiem Mass, however, it may be used for the accompaniment of the choir, as above.

It is appropriate to play the organ at the beginning and end of Mass, especially when a bishop solemnly enters or leaves the church. If the organ is played during the Elevation, it should be in softer tones; but it would seem that absolute silence is most fitting for this august moment. The same may be said about the act of Benediction with the Blessed Sacrament. It should be observed that the legislation of the Church concerns itself only with liturgical services. It takes no account of such things as, for instance, playing in the organ at the end of Mass for the elderly, or in parishes where the altar is not used. It is not only the organ itself which is blamed, but also the organist. In the twelfth century, some compositions of the organ player, the blind musician Francesco Landino of Florence, and in the fifteenth of another Florentine player, Squarciapini. At this time Konrad Paumann flourished in Germany, some of whose organ compositions are extant, showing the feature which distinguishes organ, like all instrumental music, from vocal music, namely the disinvention or figuration, ornamentation, of the melodies. With Paumann this figuration is as yet confined to the melody proper, the top part. With Claudio Merulo (1533-1604) we find the figuration extended to the accompanying parts also. More mature work was produced by Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612), who is called “Carlo del Cairo” (1597 and 1615). Further development of a true instrumental style was brought about by Samuel Scheidt (1587-1654). Then follow a series of illustrious composers for the organ, of whom we may mention Ghiroanno Frescobaldi (1583-1643), Johann Jacob Froberger (died 1667), Dietrich Buxtehude (died 1707), and Johann Sebastian Bach (1685-1750), at whose hands organ composition reached its highest point.

After Bach the general development of music, being in the direction of more individual expression and consequently varied figuration, led to a certain specialization in organ composition. Accordingly, none of the best men turned their attention to the organ. Mendelssohn's compositions for the instrument being a notable exception.

In modern times a large number of composers have written respectable music for the organ, among whom we may mention the French Gouin and Wilibald G quantify (1794-1877), and the German Reger and Rumpf. But none of them, with the possible exception of Reger, can be counted as first-class composers. The scarcity of really good modern organ compositions has led organists to the extended use of arrangements. If these arrangements are made with due regard to the nature of the organ, they cannot be altogether objected to. But it is clear that they do not represent the ideal of organ music. As the characteristic beauty of organ tone lies in its even continuation, legato playing must be the normal for the organ even more than for other instruments. While, therefore, staccato playing cannot absolutely be excluded, and an occasional use of it is even desirable for the sake of variety, still the modern tendency to play everything staccato or mezzo-legato is open to great objections. The alternation and contrast of tone-colours afforded by the variety of stops and the presence of several manuals is a legitimate and valuable device. But too much variety is inartistic, and, in particular, the exclusive use of solo stops is alien to the true organ style.

A word may be added about the local position of the organ in the church. The considerations determining this question are threefold: the proximity of the organ to the singers, the acoustical effect, and the architectural fitness. The combination of these three claims in existing churches frequently causes considerable difficulty. Hence it is desirable that in planning new churches architects should be required to provide ample room for an organ.

There is no good history of the organ. On the ancient organ a good book is DEHINS, Die Orgel, Das Instrument und sein Spiel in der Kulturgeschichte der Menschheit (Leipzig, 1883); THE PRINZ, Die Geschichte der Orgel (Leipzig, 1887). The Organ in Faschungszeiten (Leipzig, 1892); WILLMANN, Geschichte der Orgel (Leipzig, 1887); GRISOBER, Geschichte der Orgel (Antwerp, 1865); and HISTORIC, Die moderne Orgel (London, 1905). From these three claims in existing churches frequently causes considerable difficulty. Hence it is desirable that in planning new churches architects should be required to provide ample room for an organ.

The ecclesiastical legislation on organ-playing is contained in the Concordat and in the Decrees of the S. Congregatio de Romanis Ritibus, and it has been concisely put together in AuER, Die Entscheidungen der S. Rites-Kongregation in Bezug auf Kirchenmusik (Ratisbon and New York, 1901).

Oria, Diocese of (Urtana), in the Province of Lece, Apulia, Italy, suffragan of Taranto. In the Middle Ages, Oria was a principality that passed to the House of Durazzo, which sold it for 40,000 crowns, which he distributed among the people. Oria was conquered by Manfred in 1266. When Brindisi was destroyed by the Saracens in the ninth century, its bishops established their see at Oria and called themselves Bishops of Brindisi and Oria, even after their return to their former capital. It would appear that Oria was the last bishopric in Italy, because there is a record on a slab in the cathedral, dating from the eighth or ninth century, in which there is mention of a Bishop Theodosius, not one of the bishops of Brindisi. In 979 Bishop Andrew was slain by Porphyrus. In 994 and 977 Oria was sacked by the Mohammedan. The town was erected into an Episcopal see in 1591; and was raised to the rank of a city in 1754. The diocese has 14 parishes, 120,000 inhabitants, 9 religious houses of men, and 11 of women.

Oriani, Barnaba, Italian Barnabite and astronomer, b. at Catanzaro, near Milan, 17 July, 1752; d. at Milan, 12 November, 1832. After receiving an elementary education in his native town, he studied at the College of San Alessandro, Milan, where he was educated and supported by the Barnabites. He later joined the Barnabites, and, after studying the humanities, physical and mathematical sciences, philosophy, and theology, was ordained priest at the age of twenty-three. Specially interested in astronomy, he was shortly after his ordination (1775) appointed to the staff of the Observatory of Brera in Milan. He became assistant astronomer in 1778, and director in 1802. In 1778 he began to publish the dissertations on astronomical subjects which form an important part of the original memoirs appearing in the "Effemeridi di Milano" during the next fifty-two years. His indefatigable researches and the conclusion arrived at in 1785 a notable memoir containing his calculation of the orbit of Uranus and a table of elements for that planet won for him a prominent place among the astronomers of his time. He was admitted to membership in numerous learned societies, and offered the position of professor of astronomy at Palermo, which, however, he did not accept. In the following year he travelled throughout Europe at the expense of the state, visiting the chief observatories. When Napoleon set up the republic in Lombardy, Oriani refused absolutely to swear loyalty towards monarchy; the new government modified the oath of allegiance in his regard, retained him in his position at the observatory, and made him president of the commission appointed to regulate the new system of weights and measures. When the republic was transformed into the Napoleonic kingdom, Oriani received the decorations of the Iron Crown and of the Legion of Honour, was made count and senator of the kingdom, and was appointed in exchange with his wife, for sixty years, to measure the arc of the meridian between the observatories of Rome and Brera. He was a devoted friend of the Theatine monk Piazzi, the discoverer of Ceres, and for thirty-seven years cooperated with him in many ways in his astronomical labours. Besides his constant contributions to the "Effemeridi di Milano", he published a series of important memoirs on spherical trigonometry (Memorie dell' Istituto Italiano, 1801-10) and the "Istruzione sulla misura delle sponde e sui poli" (Milan, 1834).

Oriental Study and Research.—In the broadest sense of the term, Oriental study comprises that scientific investigation and application of all knowledge of the ancient languages, archaeology, ethnology, etc., connected with the East, in particular, the discovery and interpretation of Eastern literary and archaeological remains. So vast is the subject that it has of a necessity been divided into many departments, each of which in turn embraces various specialized branches. Thus the study of the language, customs, philosophy, and religion of China and the Far East is in itself a vast though relatively little-explored field of scientific investigation, while the study of Sanskrit, together with the classic lore of the ancient Hindus, which has cast so much light on our knowledge of the European languages and peoples, forms another great division of Oriental research.

From the religious point of view, however, the greatest and most valuable results have been achieved by the study of the group of languages generally termed Semitic, and through archaeological research in the so-called Bible Lands—Assyria and Babylonia, Syria and Palestine, Arabia and the Valley of the Nile. Not only have these studies and explorations cast a great deal of light on the Old Testament writings but they have, moreover, revealed with considerable precision and detail the well-nigh forgotten history of empires and civilizations that had flourished for many centuries and passed away even before Greece and Rome had acquired any great political or literary importance. The earlier studies and achievements in the field of Oriental research were naturally connected with the scientific study of Hebrew, the language of the Old Testament. To say nothing of the work done by the rabbis of the medieval period under the influence of Arabic culture in the Jewish communities of Spain and northern Africa, we are indebted to the Reformers for the numerous edition of the R Таким (1455-1522) and the Dominican Santes Paganius (1471-1541), pioneers who prepared the way for such scholars as the famous Johann Büxter (1564-1629) and his son (1599-1664), both successively professors at Basle, and others of the same period. For ulterior developments in the study of Hebrew see article Hebrew Language and Literature.

In connexion with the impetus given to Biblical Oriental studies in the sixteenth century, mention should be made of the Complutensian Polyglott published under the direction of Cardinal Ximenes (1430-1517). It was the first printed edition of the Scriptures in the original texts in the principal ancient versions, and antedated by more than a century the London Polyglott of Brian Walton. This great work, which is dedicated to Pope Leo X, comprises six folio volumes, the last being devoted to a Hebrew lexicon and other scientific apparatus. It was begun in 1502 and finished in 1517, though not published until 1519. In its preparation the cardinal was aided by several Greek and Oriental scholars, among whom were the celebrated Stunica (D. López de Zúñiga), Vergara, and three Jewish converts. The zeal for Hebrew naturally led to the study of other Semitic languages (Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, etc.), which were eagerly taken up not only as a means of obtaining a more comprehensive knowledge of Hebrew through the newly-introduced methods of comparative philology, but also on account of the literary treasures they contained, which had hitherto remained practically unknown to European scholars. In this broader field the greatest credit is due to the illustrious Maronite family of the Assemani (q. v.), who published the whole canon of Syriac, and the dictionary of Syriac language and literature.

The first European scholar who turned his attention to Ethiopic was Potken of Cologne, about 1513. A grammar and dictionary were published by Jacob Wemners, a Carmelite of Antwerp, in 1538; and in
