1601 appeared the first edition of the great Lexicon by Job Ludolf, who in the edition of 1702 prefixed a "cursus orientalis, habitationes, comm.. c. Orient." Ludolf was also the author of the contribution to a commentary on Ethiopian history. Later scholars who have attained eminence in this branch are Dillmann, who among other works published several books of the edition of the Old Testament: Octateuch (Leipzig, 1853), the four Books of Kings (Leipzig, 1861-72), the Book of Ezekiel (1851), and the "Book of the Jubilees" (1859); R. Lawrence, who published the "Ascanio Isaia" (Oxford, 1819), and the "Apocalypse of Ezra" (1820); Uphof, "Exercitationes Ethiopicae" (1829); Ewald, "Ueber des Ethiopi. Buchs Henochs Entstehung" (1854) etc. (See article Ethiopia, Literature.) In the field of Arabic the greatest honour due is to Baron Sylvestre de Sacy (1758-1838), a scholar of marvellous erudition and versatility, equally proficient in the other Semitic languages as well as in Greek, Latin, and the modern European tongues. He may be said to hold the foundations of Arabic grammar. Among his works are a "Chrestomathie arabe" (3 vols., Paris, 1806); "Grammaire arabe" (2 vols., 1810) etc. In Germany, George W. Freytag (1778-1861) became a great authority on Arabic. His greatest work is the "Lexicon Arabico-Latinum" (1830-37). Among the great number of more recent scholars may be mentioned Brockelmann, "Geschichte der Arab. Sprache" (Berlin, 1899-1902); Hartwig Deroenbourg, C. Caspari, Theo. Noedke etc. In this connexion it may be noted that an important school of Arabic studies has been instituted by the Jesuit Fathers in Beirut, Syria. As regards the study of Armenian, modern scholarship owes not a little to the scientific and literary labours of the Mechitarists (quasi a religious community of Armenians established at Venice since 1716. From this institution, which is equipped with excellent printing facilities, have been issued numerous publications of Armenian texts, as well as translations of the same into various European languages. The latter half of the nineteenth century was marked by a great revival of interest in Oriental studies, owing to the magnificent and unexpected results of archaeological exploration in the Bible Lands, particularly in Assyria, Babylonia, and Egypt. The account of the discovery and deciphering of the historic remains uncathed in these countries is of fascinating interest, and records one of the most important triumphs of modern scholarship. Of this great movement, which has resulted in the production of hundreds of volumes, only the briefest account can be given here.

Assyro-Babylonian Research. Though preceded by the tentative work of Rich in 1811 and 1820, systematic explorations in Assyria may be said to have been inaugurated in 1813 by Paul-Emile Botta (French vice-consul residing at Mosul), at Kuyunjik (site of ancient Ninive), and at Khorsabad. These were interrupted the following year, but were resumed by Victor Place, Botta’s successor, in 1851 and continued till 1853, all at the expense of the French Government. Botta also published the results in monumental form. Henry Austen Layard also began excavations in 1845 at the Mounds of Nineveh, near Mosul, and his work was continued on this and other sites until 1847. In 1849 he began another exploring expedition which lasted three years. It was under the auspices of the British Museum, and Layard published the results in monumental form. Sir Austen Layard, who has devoted great credit for the graphic and scholarly manner in which he presented his discoveries to the public, and for having aroused interest by connecting them with the Bible story. In the mean time another expedition sent out by the French Government, under the direction of Fulgence Frezenel, was exploring Babylonia, but unfortunately the material results of the excavations were lost through the sinking of a raft on the Tigris (1851). In 1852 the Assyrian Exploration Fund was organized in England, and, under the direction of Sir Henry Creswicke Rawlinson, parties were sent out on various parts of Babylonia, and by Hormuzd Rassam at Kuyunjik. Less attention was being now paid to the identification of ancient sites, and more to the inscribed clay tablets which were discovered in great quantities; and Rassam, without knowing it, was embarking on a key to the famous library of Assurbanipal (685-66 B.C.).

From the time that cuneiform inscriptions and tablets began to be brought from the East, European scholars had applied themselves to the extremely difficult task of deciphering and translating them, but without success until George Grotefend (1775-1853), professor at the Lyceum of Berlin, and later in Beijing, a student of the famous library of Assurbanipal (685-66 B.C.).

This from the time that cuneiform inscriptions and tablets began to be brought from the East, European scholars had applied themselves to the extremely difficult task of deciphering and translating them, but without success until George Grotefend (1775-1853), professor at the Lyceum of Berlin, and later in Beijing, a student of the famous library of Assurbanipal (685-66 B.C.).

The inscription was chiselled in three columns on the face of a mountain cliff more than three hundred feet above the ground, and it was copied only after strenuous labour and with serious risk of life. Rawlinson assumed as a working hypothesis that the first column was old Persian written in cuneiform characters, and subsequently justified when the decipherment of this column was published in 1846. This furnished a key to the third column, which proved to be Babylonian (the most important for students of Assyriology), and the contents of this column, after much painstaking labour, were published in 1851. The second column, called the Median or Susian text, was not deciphered until 1853. Over and above this splendid achievement, Rawlinson rendered invaluable service to the science of Assyriology by editing the Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia published by the British Museum. Between 1855 and 1872 little was done by way of excavation, but in the latter year George Smith, a young employee in the British Museum, discovered some tablets containing fragments of a Flood legend strikingly similar in some respects to the Biblical narrative. The interest aroused by the publication of these fragments determined a new era of exploration. Between 1872 and 1875 Smith was three times sent to Assyria in the hope of finding more tablets, and the Biblical details of the Flood were partially deciphered. This was unsuccessful and, unfortunately for the cause of Assyriology, he died prematurely while on his third expedition in 1876.

The exploration work for the British Museum was continued by Hormuzd Rassam, who, besides other valuable treasures found in various parts of Babylonia, unearthed in the expedition of 1857-82 the great bronze doors with the inscriptions of Shalmaneser II (859-826 B.C.). About the same time M. de Sarzec, French consul at Bassorah in Southern Babylonia, excavated the very ancient Tellah statues which were acquired by the French Government for the Museum of the Louvre. The work of de Sarzec was continued until his death in 1903, and resulted in the discovery of an enormous quantity of clay tablets, bronze and silver figures, vases, etc. The French expedition to Susa, under the direction of M. J. de Morgan (1897-1902), was one of the most important in the field of Assyriology, for it resulted in the finding of the Hamadji and also the Gilgamesh Epic, which illustrates in many respects the Pentateuchal Law, was translated from Father Scheil, the eminent Dominican scholar who was the Assyriologist of the expedition ("Textes Elamites-Sumeriens", Paris, 1892), and later into German by Dr. Hugo Winckler of Berlin, into English by Dr. John and into Italian by Rev. Dr. Francesco Mari. (See articles by Dr.}
Gabriel Oussani in the "New York Review", "The Code of Hammurabi", Aug.-Sept., 1905; "The Code of Hammurabi and the Mosaic Legislation", Dec., 1903-Jan., 1904; and in addition to the American Exploration Fund sent to Babylon under the auspices of the Archæological Institute of America, and under the direction of W. H. Ward. In 1888, the Babylonian Exploration Fund, organized in Philadelphia, was sent out under the direction of Dr. John Peters in the interests of the University of Pennsylvania. The site chosen was Nippur, and the work of excavation was continued at intervals mainly on this site until 1900. These excavations resulted in the recovery of more than 10,000 inscriptions, clay tablets, stone monuments etc. The vast amount of material brought to light by the excavations in Assyria and Babylonia powerfully stimulated the ardour of students of Asiatic history, both in Babylonia and America. The limits of the present article will allow but the mention of a few distinguished names.

In Germany.—Eberhard Runzler (1836) has been called the father of German Assyriology. Successively professor at Zurich, Giessen, Jens, and Berlin (1873), he has written many works on the subject, among which we may mention Assyriologische Festschriften, 1872, tr. "The Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament", 1885-90; "Keltische und Geschichtsforschung" (1878); "Zur Frage nach dem Ursprung der Altbabylonischen Kultur" (1884). Other German scholars of note are Hugo Winckler (Alt-testamentliche Untersuchungen, Leipzig, 1882, etc.); Friedrich Delitzsch (Babyloniens, Berlin, 1883); A. Oppert, F. Hommel, F. Kaulen, Assyriology and Babylonian etc. of the neatest dates, Freiburg, 1890, etc. C. P. Tiele, Mürder, Brunnow, Pfeifer etc. In France.—F. Lenormant (Études cuneiformes, 5 parts, Paris, 1878-80); J. Menant (Nimy et Babylone, Paris, 1887); Hailey (Études cunéiformes, 3 vols., Paris, 1885-90); Thureau-Dangin, Rec. de l'Univ. de Paris, 1890; Thureau-Dangin, Recherches sur l'Écriture cunéiforme, Paris, 1893, etc. In England.—Sir H. Rawlinson (Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, 3 vols., 1851-1854, etc.); A. H. Sayce (Higher Criticism and the Monuments, London, 1891, etc.); L. W. King (Letters and Inscriptions of Hammurabi and other Kings of the First Dynasty of Babylon, London, 1898-1900); C. W. Johns, T. G. Pinches, J. A. Craig etc. In America.—Besides the scholars already referred to, we may mention the work of the Bauers, Haselgrove, Homan and Oussan, the Society of Antiquaries of Egypt and Assyr, etc. (New York, 1900); H. V. Hilprecht (Explorations in Bible Lands during the Nineteenth Century, New York, 1893); Paul Haupt (numerous publications); R. F. Harper, M. Jastrow, C. Johnstone, J. D. Lyon, J. D. Prince etc.

Egyptian Research.—Modern Oriental research in the Valley of the Nile began in 1798 with the Egyptian campaign of Napoleon, who with characteristic foresight invited M. Gaspar Monge (1766-1818) with a corps of savants and artists to join the expedition. The results of their observations were published at the expense of the French Government (1809-13) in several folio volumes under the title: "Description de l'Égypte", but the numerous specimens collected by these scientists fell into the hands of the English after the naval battle of Aboukir and formed later the nucleus of the Egyptian department of the British Museum. The mysterious hieroglyphic characters which they exhibited were soon made the object of intensive study both in Egypt and Europe, and the famous Rosetta Stone which bears a triglyphal inscription in Greek, in the Egyptian demotic script, and in the hieroglyphic writing furnished a key to the meaning of the latter, which was discovered almost simultaneously in France by J. François Champollion (1790-1832), and in England by Thomas Young (1773-1827). Thus the Rosetta inscription (embodying a decree of a dynasty of Thebes in Egypt, 1223-1200 B.C.) stands in the same relation to the discoveries bearing on the literature and civilization of ancient Egypt as does the Behistun inscription with regard to the antique treasures discovered in Assyria and Babylonia. Champollion's discovery aroused a great interest in Egyptian inscriptions and in 1835 the French scholar was sent to Egypt together with Rosellini at the head of a Franco-Italian expedition which proved most fruitful in scientific results. A German expedition under the direction of Lepsius was sent out in 1850 to study Egyptian monuments in relation to Bible history, and in addition to explorations made in Egypt and Ethiopia a visit was made to the Sinaic peninsula. In 1850 Auguste Mariette, a French savant, made the remarkable discovery of the tombs of the sacred Apis bulls at Memphis together with thousands of memorial inscriptions. In 1857 he was appointed director of the museum of antiquities newly established in Cairo, and at the same time he received from the khanefi the exclusive right of excavating and publishing the monuments of Egypt, which he exercised until his death in 1880. The results of his explorations were enormous and the science of Egyptology probably owes more to Mariette than to any other scholar. He was succeeded by another eminent French scholar, G. Maspero, and the explorations still remaining in the hands of the French were completed under his direction. In 1883, when the government of France under the new administration permission was given to representatives of other nations to conduct excavations and, with certain restrictions, to export the results of their findings. The Egyptian Exploration fund was organized in England in 1883, and after explorations in the Delta on the site of the Biblical city of Heliopolis, the work of the society was transferred in 1896 to Upper Egypt. At that time also the excavations were placed under the direction of W. M. Flinders Petrie who has achieved astonishing results, especially in reconstructing in accordance with the testimony of the monuments the account of ancient Egyptian history, which had been so incomplete. He has published his results in the reign of the formerly-supposed mythical king Menes, founder of the first Egyptian dynasty. Independent expeditions were also fitted out by Swiss, Germans, and Americans, and the Orient Gesellschaft organized in 1889 has conducted systematic explorations at various points in the Orient. Among the almost incredible number of objects uncovered by Egyptian explorers, and which besides filling the new and enlarged museum of Cairo built in 1902, go to make up numerous and important collections in Europe and America, may be mentioned the many papyri documents (e.g. the Logia of Jesus, various apocrypha, heretical gospels, etc.), which throw light on early Christian history and on the period immediately preceding it. The abundance and historic importance of the treasures found in the land of the Pharaohs caused a great number of European scholars to devote their attention to the study of Egyptology. In addition to the names already referred to the following are taken at random from a list of scholars far too numerous to be even mentioned in the present article. G. Perrot and C. Chippiez (History of Art in Ancient Egypt, 2 vols., London, 1883); P. Renouf (Translation of the Book of the Dead, 2 vols., London, 1893-95, completed by E. Naville, 1907); E. A. W. Budge (The Mummys: Chapters on Egyptian Sepulchral Narrative, London, 1908); E. M. Budge (The Book of the Dead, 3 vols., London, 1898); W. Max Müller (Asien und Europa nach altägyptischen Denkmälern, Leipzig, 1893); J. de Morgan (Recherches sur les origines de l'Egypte, Paris, 1895-96); J. M. Broderick and A. Morton (Concise Dictionary of Egyptian Archaeology, London, 1901); J. P. Mahaffy (The Empire of the Pharaohs, London, 1865); H. Wallis, J. Capart, H. Schliechter, J. H. Breasted, A. Wiedemann, M. C. Stratford-Peck, R. Koen (ed.) (Oriental studies Connected with Egyptology is the study of Coptic, the language of the descendants of the ancient Egyptians. The extant Coptic literature is almost exclusively Christian, and except for liturgical purposes, it fell into disuse after the Moslem supremacy in Egypt in the seventh century. Among the scholars who have made a specialty of this branch of Oriental studies may be mentioned E. Renaudet (eighteenth century), E. M. Quatremere (Recherches critiques et historiques sur la langue et la litterature de l’Egypte, Paris, 1805); A. J. Butler (Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt, Oxford, 1884); B. T. Excels, E. Ancheruel, E. C. Buhler, W. E. Crum, and H. Hyvernat, professor of Oriental languages and archeology at the Catholic University in Washington, who has published in monumental form the text and translation of the “Acts of the Martyrs of the Coptic Church.”

Explorations in Syria and Palestine.—Explorations in the Bible lands proper were taken up later than those in Egypt, and for good reasons. As far as their study has been least fruitful in archeological results. The first work, chiefly topographical, was undertaken by Dr. Edward Robinson of New York in 1838 and again in 1852. The result of his investigations appeared in “Biblical Researches”, 3 vols., Berlin and Boston, 1841 (3rd edition, 1867), but he is better known through the publication of his popular work entitled “The Land and the Book”. In 1847 the American Government commissioned Lieutenant Lynch of the U.S. Navy to explore the Valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea. In 1863 the Palestine Exploration Fund was organized in England, and among other important results of its activities has been an accurate survey and map of all the territory west of the Jordan. From 1867 to 1870 the Fund conducted excavations at Jerusalem under the direction of Sir Charles Warren. They proved valuable in connexion with the identification of the ancient Temple and other sites, but little was found in the line of archeological remains.

In 1867 a German Palestine Exploration Fund was organized, and excavations were carried out under the direction of Dr. Schumacher a careful survey of the territory east of the Jordan. The most important archeological discoveries in Palestine are the inscription of Mesha, King of Moab (ninth century B. C.) found at Dibon by the German missionary K. Doelter, and the rival inscriptions of the time of Ezechias, found in the Siloam tunnel beneath the hill of Ophel, and the Greek inscription discovered by Clermont-Ganneau. In this connexion mention should be made of the still more important finding by natives in Egypt (1887) of the famous Tel el-Amarna tablets (q. v.), or letters written in cuneiform character and proving that about 1600 B. C., prior to the Hebrew conquest, Palestine was already permeated by the Assyro-Babylonian civilization and culture. Further excavations in Palestine have been conducted at various points by W. Flinders Petrie, the Egyptian explorer, (1889) and by the American savant F. J. Bliss (1890-1900). Of still greater importance for Oriental studies bearing on the Bible has been the establishment (1893) by the Dominican Fathers at Jerusalem of a school of Biblical studies under the direction of F. M. Lagrange, O. P. This institute, which has for its object a theoretical and practical training in Oriental subjects pertaining to Holy Scripture, numbers among its instructing scholars as Father Scheil and Father Vincent who with their co-workers publish the scholarly “Revue biblique internationale”. Simpler schools were later founded at Jerusalem by the Americans (1900) and by the Germans (1903).

JI. F. DRISCELL.

Orientation of Churches.—According to Tertullian the Christians of his time were, by some who concerned themselves with their form of worship, believed to be votaries of the sun. This supposition, he adds, doubtless arose from the Christian practice of turning to the east when praying (Apol. c. xvi). Speaking of churches the same writer tells us that the homes “of our dove”, as he terms them, are always in “high and open places, facing the light” (Adv. Val. c. iii), and the Apostolic Constitutions (third to fifth century) prescribe that church edifices should be collected with their “heads” towards the East (Const. Apost., II, 7).

The practice of praying while turned towards the rising sun is older than Christianity, but the Christians in adopting it were influenced by reasons peculiar to themselves. The principal of these reasons, according to St. Gregory of Nyssa, was that the Orient conformed man’s earthly home, the earthly paradise, St. Thomas Aquinas, speaking for the Middle Ages, adds to this reason several others, as for example, that Our Lord lived His earthly life in the East, and that from the East He shall come to judge mankind (II-H. Q. lxxxiv, a. 3). Thus from the earliest period the Christian church custom of orienting the apse at the farthest extremity of the church was the rule. Yet the great Roman Basilicas of the Lateran, St. Peter’s, St. Paul’s (originally), St. Lorenzo’s, as well as the Basilica of the Resurrection in Jerusalem and the basilicas of Tyre and Antioch, reversed this rule by placing the apse in the western extremity. The reasons for this change of position can, it seems, be explained by the fact that in the fourth century the celebrant at Mass faced the people, and, therefore in a church with a western apse, looked towards the East when officiating at the altar. Others conjecture that the peculiar orientation of the basilica mentioned, erected by Constantine, by his influence, may have been a reminiscence of the former predilection of this emperor for sun-worship. In the Orient the eastern apse was the rule, and thence it made its way to the West through the reconstructed Basilica of St. Paul’s, the Basilica of St. Pietro in Vincoli, and the celebrated basilica of Ravenna. From the eighth century the propriety of the eastern apse was universally admitted, though, of course strict adherence to this architectural canon, owing to the direction of city streets, was not always possible.

MACRUS M. HANSETT.

Orientius, Christian Latin poet of the fifth century. He wrote an elegiac poem (Carmenfloritum) of 1036 verses (divided into two books) describing the way to heaven, with warnings against its hindrances. He was a Gaul (I, 184), who had been converted after a life of sin (I, 405 sq.), was evidently an experienced pastor, and wrote at a time when his country was being devastated by the invasion of savages. All this points to his identification with Orientius, Bishop of Augusta Aeconsura (Auch), who as a very old man.
was sent by Theodoric I, King of the Goths, as ambassador to the Roman generals Julius and Litorius in 439 ("Vita S. Orientii" in "Acta SS.", I May, 61). The "Commentarium" quotes classical poets—Virgil, Ovid, Catullus—and is perhaps influenced by Prudentius. It exists in only one MS. (Cod. Ashburnham, sec. X), and is followed by some shorter anonymous "memoriae", and by two others, with the verse attributed to him. The first complete edition was published by Martene, "Veterum Scriptorum Monumenta", I (Rome, 1700); then by Galland, "Bibliotheque veterum Patrum", X (Venice, 1774), 185-96, reprinted in "P. L.", LXI, 967-1006. The best modern edition is by Ellis in the "Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum in Latinu," (Leuven, 1888): "Poece Christiani minores", I, 191-261.

Oriflamme.—In verses 3003-5 of the "Chanson de Roland" (eleventh century) the oriflamme is mentioned as a royal banner, called at first "Remaine afterwards Montjoie." According to the legend it was carried by Charlemagne in the preamble, and no historical text affords us any information with regard to this oriflamme, which is perhaps fabulous. As Enudes, who became king in 888, was Abbot of St. Martin, the banner of the church of St. Martin of Tours was the earliest military standard of the Frankish monarchy. It was a plain blue, a colour then assigned in the liturgy to saints who were, like St. Martin, confessors and pontiffs. The azure ground strewed with gold fleur-de-lis remained the symbol of royalty until the fourteenth century, when the white standard of Jeanne d'Arc wrought marvels, and by degrees the custom was introduced of depicting the fleur-de-lis on white ground. But from the time of Louis the Stammerer of France the banner of St. Martin was replaced as ensign of war by the oriflamme of the Abbey of St. Denis, which floated about the tomb of St. Denis and was said to have been given to the abbey by Dagobert. It is supposed without any certainty that this was a piece of fiery red silk or scald the field of which was covered with flames and stars of gold. This standard was at first a sort of a staff or suspended from his neck. Until the twelfth century the standard-bearer was the Comte de Vexin, who, as "vowed" to St. Denis, was the temporal defender of the abbey. Louis VI the Fat, having acquired Vexin, became standard-bearer, as soon as war began, Louis VI received Commune at St. Denis. Louis took the standard from the tomb of the saint to carry it to the combat. "Montjoie Saint Denis", cried the men-at-arms, even as in England they cried "Montjoie Notre Dame" or "Montjoie Saint George". The word "montjoie" (from Mons gaudii or Mons Juvis) designates the heaps of stones along the roadsides which served as fields of sports, or necrogarum, and which sometimes became the meeting-places for warriors; it was applied to the oriflamme the sight of which was to guide the soldiers in the battle. The descriptions of the oriflamme which have reached us in Guillaume le Breton (thirteenth cent.), in the "Chronicle of Flanders" (fourteenth cent.), and in the "Registrum Dalphinianum" (1156) and in the inventory of the treasury of St. Denis (1536), show that to the primitive oriflamme there succeeded in the course of centuries newer oriflammes which little resembled one another. At the battles of Poitiers (1356) and Agincourt (1415) the oriflamme fell into the hands of the English; it would seem that after the Hundred Years' War it was no longer a fighting banner.

ORIGEN.

Origen and Origenism.—1. Life and Work of Origen.—A. Biography.—Origen, most modest of writers, hardly ever alludes to himself in his own works; but Eusebius has devoted to him almost the entire sixth book of "Ecclesiastical History". Origen was thoroughly acquainted with the life of his hero; he had collected a hundred of his letters; in collaboration with the martyr he has written a book on "Let- terology for Origen"; he dwelt at Caesarea where Origen's library was preserved, and where his memory still lingered; if at times he may be thought somewhat partial, he is undoubtedly well informed. We find some details also in the "Religious Address" of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus to his master, in the controversies of St. Jerome, and in the "Liber de gloria Rursum" of Rufinus (Hares, XLIV), and in Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 118).

(1) Origen at Alexandria (185-232)—Born in 185, Origen was hardly seventeen when a bloody persecution of the Church of Alexandria broke out. His father Leonides, who admired his precocious genius and was charmed with his virtuous life, had given him an excellent literary education. When Leonides was cast into prison, Origen would fain have shared his lot, but being unable to carry out his resolution, as his mother had hidden his clothes, he wrote an ardent, enthusiastic letter to his father exhorting him to persevere courageously. When Leonides had won the martyr's crown, and his fortune had been assumed by the imperial authorities, the heroic child laboured to support himself, his mother, and his six younger brothers. This he successfully accomplished by becoming a teacher, selling his manuscripts, and by the generous aid of a certain rich lady, who admired his talents. He assumed, of his own accord, the direction of the catechetical school, on the withdrawal of Clement, and in the following year was confirmed in his office by the patriarch Demetrius (Eusebius, "Hist. eccl.", VI, ii; St. Jerome, "De viris illustrib", iv). Origen's school, which was frequented by pagans, soon became a nursery of neophytes, confessors, and martyrs. Among the latter were Plutarch, Serenus Heraclides, Heron, another Serenus, and a female catechumen, I debris (Eusebius, "Hist. eccl.", VI, iv). He accompanied them to the scene of their victories encouraging them by his exhortations. There is nothing more touching than the picture Eusebius has drawn of Origen's youth, so studious, disinterested, austere and pure, ardent and zealous to devote himself (VI, 3, vii). At the age of 30 he was about the teacher's chair, he recognized the necessity of completing his education. Frequenting the philosophical schools, especially that of Ammonius Saccas, he devoted himself to a study of the philosophers, particularly Plato and the Stoics. In this he was but following the example of his predecessors Pantenus and Clement, and of Irenaeus, who was to succeed him. Afterwards when the latter shared his labours in the catechetical school, he learned Hebrew, and communicated frequently with certain Jews who helped him to solve his difficulties.

The course of his work at Alexandria was interrupted by a journey to Rome. About 213, under Pope Zephyrinus and the emperor Caracalla, he desired "to see the very ancient Church of Rome", but he did not remain there long (Eusebius, "Hist. eccl.", VI, iv). Shortly afterwards he was invited to Arabia by the governor who was desirous of meeting him (VI, ix). It was probably in 215 or 216 when he was engaged in a journey of Saran Eras, that he visited Palestine where Theocletus of Caesarea and Alexander of Jerusalem, invited him to preach though he was still a layman. Towards 218, it would appear, the empress Mammea, mother of Alexander Severus, brought him to Antioch (VI, xxi). Finally, at a much later period, under Pontian of Rome and Zephyrinus (Eusebius, VI, xiii), he journeyed into Greece, passing through Caesarea where he visited the Bishop of... that city, assisted by Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, raised him to the priesthood. Demetrius, although he had given letters of recommendation, Origen was very much offended by this ordination, which had taken place without his knowledge and, as he thought, in derogation of his rights. If Eusebius (VI, viii) is to be believed, he was anxious of the increasing influence of his catechetes. So, on his return to Alexandria, Ori genius, a feature that his Bishop was rather un friendly towards him. He yielded to the temptation of prison (231). The details of this affair were recorded by Eusebius in the last second book of the “Apology for Origen” according to Photius, who had read the work, two councils were held at Alexandria, one of which pronounced a decree of banishment against him. Some other time the Bishop visited the priestship (Biblioth. cod. 118). St. Jerome declares expressly that he was not condemned on a point of doctrine.

(2) Origen at Caesarea (252—258)—Expelled from Alex andria. Origen fixed his abode at Caesarea in Palesti ne (252), with his protector and friend Theodotus, and founded a new school there, and resumed his “Commentary on St. John” at the point where it had been interrupted. He was soon surrounded by pupils. The most distinguished of these, without doubt, was St.
Gregory Thaumaturgus who, with his brother Apollo-dorus, attended Origen’s lectures for five years and decided to become a hermit under Origen’s “holy address.” During the persecution of Maximinus (235—37) Origen visited his friend, St. Firmilian, Bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who made him remain for a long period. On this occasion he was hospitably entertained by a Christian lady of Caesarea, named Julia, who had inherited the writings of Symmachus, the Laus.”, 147). The years following were devoted almost uninterruptedly to the composition of the “Commentaries.” Mention is made only of a few excursions to the Holy Places, a journey to Athens (Eusenius, VI, xxxvi), and two voyages to Arabia, one of which was undertaken for the conversion of Beryllus, a Patropolitan (Eusebius, VI, xxxii); St. Jerome, “De divis ill.”, IX, the other to refute certain heretics who died the Resurrection (Eusebius, “Hist. eccl.”, VI, xxxv). Age did not diminish his activities. He was over sixty when he wrote his “Contra Celsum” and his “Commentary on St. Matthew.” The persecution of Maximinus had only increased his zeal in these works. Origen was imprisoned and barbarously tortured, but his courage was unshaken and from his prison he wrote letters breathing the spirit of the martyrs (Eusebius, “Hist. eccl.”, VI, xxxvi). He was still alive on the death of Deceius (234), but only hanging on, and died probably, from the results of the sufferings endured during the persecution (234 or 235), at the age of sixty-nine (Eusebius, “Hist. eccl.”, VII, 1).
His last days were spent at Tyre, though his reason for retiring thither is unknown. He was buried with honour as a confessor of the Faith. For a long time his sepulchre, behind the high-altar of the cathedral of Tyre, was visited by pilgrims. Origen is one of the remains of this cathedral except a mass of ruins, the exact location of his tomb is unknown.

B. Works.—Very few authors were as fertile as Ori gen. St. Ephraem estimates at six thousand the number of his writings, counting separately, without doubt, his treatises, homilies, letters, and his smallest treatises (Iheres, LXIV, IXa). This figure, repeated by many ecclesiastical writers, seems greatly exaggerated. St. Jerome assures us that the list of Origen’s writings drawn up by St. Pamphilus did not contain even two thousand titles (Contra Rufin., II, xxii; III, xxxv; Contra Magnesians, 11, 9). St. Jerome, however, in his “Hist. eccl.”, VI, xxxii) had inserted it in his biography of St. Pamphilus and St. Jerome inserted it in a letter to Paula, the interesting part of which, discovered in the last century, was published by Klostermann among others (Seitz, “Theologie der . . .” Akad. der Wiss. zu Berlin, 1897, pp. 71 sq.).

(1) Exegetical Writings.—Origen had devoted three kinds of works to the explanation of the Holy Scriptures: commentaries, homilies, and scholia. (St. Jerome, “Prologus interpret. homiliar. Orig. in Ezechiel”)
The commentaries (toums libri, volumina) were a constant source of his most original interpretation of the inspired text. An idea of their magnitude may be formed from the fact that the words of St. John: “In the beginning was the Word,” furnished material for a whole roll. There remain in Greek only eight books of the “Commentary on St. Matthew,” and nine books of the “Commentary on St. John”; in Latin an anonymous translation of the “Commentary on St. Matthew” beginning with chapter xvi, three books and a half of the “Commentary on the Canticle of Canticles” translated by Rufinus, and an abridgment of the “Commentary on the Epistles to the Romans” by the same translator. The homilies (hymn., homil., tractatus) were familiar discourses on texts of Scripture, often extemporary and recorded as well as possible by stenographers. The list is long and undoubtedly must have been longer if it be true that Origen, as St. Pamphilus declares in his “Apology”, preached almost every day. There remain in Greek twenty-one (twenty on Jerome’s and the celebrated edition of Photius and eighteen translated by Rufinus, seventy-eight translated by St. Jerome and some others of more or less doubtful authenticity, preserved in a collection of homilies. The twenty “Tractatus Origenis” recently discovered are not the work of Origen, though use has been made of his writings. Origen has been called the father of the homily; it was he who contributed most to popularize this species of literature in which are to be found so many instructive details on the customs of the primitive Church, its institutions, discipline, liturgy, and sacraments. The scholia (scholum, exerpt., commentarivm interpretandi graum) were exegetical, philological, or historical notes, on words or passages of the Bible, like the an-notations of the Alexandrian grammarians on the pro-meneutean writers. Except some few short fragments all of these have perished.

(2) Other Writings.—We now possess only two of Origen’s letters addressed to St. Gregory Thau-maturgus on the reading of Holy Scripture, the other to Julius Africanus on the Greek additions to the Book of Daniel. Two apocrypha have been preserved entire in the original form; an excellent treatise “On Prayer” and an “Exhortation to Martyrdom,” sent by Origen to his friend Ambrose, then a prisoner at the Faith. Finally two large works have escaped the ravages of time: the “Contra Celsum” in the original text, and the “De principiis” in a Latin translation by Rufinus and in the citations of the “Philoclea,” which might equal in contents one-sixth of the whole work. In the eight books of the “Contra Celsum” Origen (212) joined the most celebrated names of his day.
This work, the history of the world, is still per-durable and still admired. It is a model of reasoning, erudition, and honest polemic. The “De principiis”, composed at Alexandria, and which, it seems, got into the hands of the public before its completion, treated successively in its four books, although according to number, fifteen books, of the Trinity, (b) the world and its relation to God, (c) man and his free will, (d) Scripture, its inspiration and interpretation. Many other works of Origen have been entirely lost: for instance, the treatise in two books and the books of the “Hermeneutics” (236-238).

Cf. Prat, "The Person and Influence of Origen."—During his lifetime Origen by his writings, teaching, and intercourse exercised very great influence. St. Firmian of Cesarea in Cappadocia, who regarded himself as his disciple, made him remain with him for a long period to profit by his learning (Eusebius, "Hist. eccl.", VI, xxvi; Palalihnus, "Hist. Lus.", 147). St. Alexander of Jerusalem, who was his fellow-pupil at the catechetical school was his intimate faithful friend (Eusebius, VI, xiv), as was Theocletius of Cesarea in Palestine, who ordained him (Photius, cod. 118). Beryllus of Bostra, whom he had won back from heresy, was deeply attached to him (Eusebius, VI, xxxii; St. Jerome, "De viris illis.", xvi). St. Anatolius of Laodicea sang his praises in his "Carmen Paschale" (P. G., X, 210). The learned Julius Africanus consulted him, Origen's reply being extant (P. G., XI, 41-57). St. Hippolytus highly appreciated his talents (St. Jerome, "De viris illis.", iv). St. Dionysius, his pupil and successor in the catechetical school, when Patriarch of Alexandria, dedicated to him his treatise "On the PresE.", VI, xxvi, and in the learning of his death wrote a letter filled with his praises (Photius, cod. 232). St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, who had been his pupil for five years at Cesarea, before leaving addressed to him his celebrated "Farewell Address" (P. G., X, 1019-1104), an enthusiastic panegyric. There is no proof that Heracleus, his disciple, collaborated, and his apological school before being raised to the Patriarchate of Alexandria, waivered in his sworn friendship. Origen's name was so highly esteemed that when there was question of putting an end to a schism or rooting out a heresy, appeal was made to it.

After his death his reputation continued to spread. St. Pamphilus, martyred in 207, composed with Eusebius an "Apology for Origen" in six books, the first alone of which has been preserved in a Latin translation by Rufinus (P. G., XVII, 511-616). Origen had at that time many other apologists whose names are unknown to us (Photius, cod. 117 and 118). The directors of the catechetical school continued to walk in his footsteps. Theognostus, in his "Hypotyposes", followed him even too closely, according to Photius (cod. 106), though his action was approved by St. Athanasius. Pionius was called by St. Jerome "Origen's junior" (De viris illis., lxvi). Didymus the Blind composed a work to explain and justify the teaching of the "De principiis" (St. Jerome, "Adv. Rufin.", I, vi). St. Athanasius does not hesitate to cite him with praise (Epist. IV ad Scapion, 9 and 10) and points out that he must be interpreted generously (De decretis Nica., 27).

Not was the admiration for the great Alexandrian lexicographer legitimate. St. Gregory of Nazianzus gave his opinions of Origen's two books, "Lectures", ed. Bernhardi, 11, 1274: ἐν εὐγενίᾳ καὶ εὐσεβείᾳ. In collaboration with St. Basil, he had published, under the title "Philocalia", a volume of selections from the master. In his "Panegyric on St. Gregory Thaumaturgus", St. Gregory of Nyssa called Origen the prince of Christian learning in the third century (P. G., XVI, 905). At Cesarea in Palestine the admiration of the learned for Origen became a passion. St. Pamphilus wrote his "Apology", Eusebius had his writings transcribed on parchment (St. Jerome, "De viris ille"). xciii. Eusebius catalogued them carefully and drew upon them largely. Nor is this the last tribute. According to St. Jerome, the principal Latin imitators of Origen are St. Eusebius of Vercelli, St. Hilary of Poitiers, and St. Ambrose of Milan; St. Victorinus of Pettau had set them the example (St. Jerome, "Adv. Rufin.", I, ii; "Ad Augustin. Epist.", xxii, 20). Origen's writings were so much drawn upon that the solitary of Bethlehem called it plagiarism, just Latinorum. However, excepting Rufinus, who is practically a transcriber of Origen's, there is no Latin writer who is most indebted to Origen. Before the Origenist controversies he willingly admitted this, and even afterwards, he did not entirely repudiate it; cf. the preludes to his translations of Origen (Homilies on St. Luke, Jeremias, and Ezekiel, the Canticule of Canticules), and also the prefaces to his own "Commentaries" (on Midst. St. John, the Epistles to the Galatians, and to the Ephesians etc.).

Amidst these expressions of admiration and praise, a few discordant voices were heard. St. Methodius, bishop and martyr (311), had written several works against Origen, amongst others a treatise on the "Resurrection", of which Theophylact notices.—A. Altchristl. Vorderh. (Freiburg), 196, xii-xxii. St. Eustathius of Antioch, who died in exile about 337, criticized his allegorism (P. G., XVIII, 613-673). St. Alexander of Alexandria, martyred in 311, also attacked him, if we are to credit Leontius of Byzantium and the emperor Justinian. But his chief adversaries were the heretics, the Pelagians, and the semi-Pelagians, semi-Origenists.

On this subject see Prat, "Origène", 199-200. 11. ORIGENISM.—By this term is understood not so much Origen's theology and the body of his teachings, as a certain number of doctrines, rightly or wrongly attributed to him, and which by their novelty or their danger called forth at an early period a refutation from orthodox writers. They are chiefly: A. Allegorism in the interpretation of Scripture; B. Subordination of the Divine Persons; C. The theory of successive trials and a final restoration. Before examining how far Origen is responsible for these theories, a word must be said of the directive principle of his theology in the Church and the Rule of Faith.—In the Preface to the "De principiis" Origen laid down a rule thus formulated in the translation of Rufinus: "Hanc sola credenda est veritas qua in milio alia ecclesiastica et apostolica discordat traditio". The same norm is expressed almost in equivalent terms in many other passages, e.g. "non debemus utrumque per unam ex duas, siq cerum Dei tradiderunt nobis" (In Matt., ser. 46, Migne, XIII, 1667). In accordance with these principles Origen constantly appealed to ecclesiastical preaching, ecclesiastical teaching, and the ecclesiastical rule of faith (xanv). He accepts only four canonical Gospels because tradition does not receive more; he condemns the doctrine of dual nature and in it is in accordance with the practice of the Church founded on Apostolic tradition; he warns the interpreter of the Holy Scriptures, not to rely on his own judgment, but "on the rule of the Church instituted by Christ". For, he adds, we have only two lights to guide us here below, Christ and the Church; the Church reflects faithfully the light received from Christ, as the moon reflects the rays of the sun. The distinctive mark of the Catholic is to belong to the Church, to depend on the Church outside of which there is no salvation; on the contrary, he who leaves the Church walks in darkness, he is a heretic. It is through the principle of authority that Origen is wont to unmask and combat doctrinal errors. It is the principle of authority, too, that he invokes when he enumerates the dogmas of faith. A man animated with such sentiments may have made mistakes, because he is human, but his disposition of mind is essentially Catholic and he does not deserve to be ranked among the promoters of heresy, The principal passages on the inspiration, meaning, and interpretation of the Scriptures are preserved in Greek in the first fifteen chapters of the "Philocalia". According to Origen, Scripture is inspired because it is the word and work of God. But, far from being an inert instrument, the inspired author has full possession of his faculties; he is conscious of what he is writing; he is physically free to decide; he is not bound by a passing delirium like the pagan oracles; for bodily disorder, disturbance of the senses, momentum loss of reason are but so many proofs of the action of the evil spirit.

Since Scripture is from God, it ought to have the distinctive characteristics of the Divine works: truth, unity, and fullness. The word of God cannot possibly be untrue; hence no error; contradictions cannot be admitted in Scripture (In Joan., X, iii). The author of the Scriptures being one, the Bible is less a collection of books than one and the same book (Philoc., V, iv-vii); a perfect harmonious instrument (Philoc., VI, i-ii). But the most Divine note of Scripture is its fulness. "There is not in the Holy Books the smallest passage (yeugna) but reflects the wisdom of God" (Philoc., I, xxviii, cf. X, i). True there are imperfections in the Bible: antilogies, repetitions, want of continuity; but these imperfections become perfections by leading us to the allegory and the spiritual meaning (Philoc., X, i-ii).

The other time Origen, starting from the Platonic trichotomy, distinguishes the body, the soul, and the spirit of Holy Scripture; at another, following a more rational terminology, he distinguishes only between the letter and the spirit. In reality, the word, or the psychic signification, or moral meaning (that is the moral parts of Scripture, and the moral applications of the other parts which are the moral part only in reality), is, and we can confine ourselves to the antithesis: letter (or body) and spirit. Unfortunately this antithesis is not free from equivocation. Origen does not understand by letter (or body) what we mean by word-by-the-literal sense, but the grammatical sense, the proper as opposed to figurative meaning. Just so does he not attach to the words spiritual meaning the same signification as we do; for him they mean the spiritual sense properly so called (the meaning added to the literal sense by the express wish of God attaching a special signification to the fact related or the manner of relating them), or the figurative as contrasted with the proper sense, or the accommodative sense, often an arbitrary invention of the interpreter, or even the literal sense when it is treating of things spiritual.

If this terminology is kept in mind there is nothing absurd in the principle he repeats so often: "Such a passage of the Scripture has no corporal meaning." As examples Origen cites the anthropomorphisms, meaning the words which ought indeed to be understood figuratively.

Though he warns us that these passages are the exceptions, it must be confessed that he allows too many cases in which the Scripture is not to be understood according to the letter; but, remembering his terminology, his principle is unimpeachable. The two great rules of interpretation laid down by the Alexandrian catechist, taken by themselves and independently of erroneous applications, are proof against criticism. They may be formulated thus: (1) Scripture must be interpreted in a manner worthy of God, the author of Scripture. (2) The corporal sense or the letter of Scripture must not be adopted, when it would entail anything impossible, absurd, or unworthy of God. The abuse arises from the application of these rules. Origen has recourse too easily to allegorism to explain purely apparent antilogies or antinomies. He considers that certain narratives or ordinances of the Bible would be unworthy of God if the latter had not been able to interpret them so that they were to be taken solely according to the letter. He justifies the allegorism by the fact that otherwise certain accounts or certain precepts now abrogated would be useless and profitless for the reader; a fact which appears to him contrary to the providence of the Divine inspirer and the dignity of Holy Writ. It will thus be seen that though the criticisms directed against his allegorical method by St. Epiphanius and St. Methodius were not groundless, yet many of the complaints arise from a misunderstanding.

C. The Origin and Destiny of Rational Beings.—Here we encounter an unfortunate amalgam of philosophy and theology. The system that results is not coherent. For Origen, frankly recognizing the contradiction of the individual facts, tries hard to unify, recoils from the consequences, protests against the logical conclusions, and oftentimes corrects by orthodox professions of faith the heterodoxy of his speculations. It must be said that almost all the texts about to be treated of, are contained in the "De principiis", where the author tends on most dangerous ground. The system may be reduced to a few hypotheses, the error and danger of which were not recognized by Origen.

(1) Eternity of the Creation.—Whatever exists outside of God was created by Him; the Alexandrian cædadist always defended this thesis most energetically against the pagan philosophers who admitted an uncreated matter ("De principiis", II, i, 5; "In Genes.", I, 12, in Migne, XXII, 38-49). But he believes that God created from eternity, for "it is absurd," he says, "to imagine the nature of God inactive, or His goodness indecisive, or His dominion without subject (De principiis, III, v, 3). Consequently he is forced to admit a double infinite series of worlds before and after the present world.

(2) Original Equality of the Created Spirits.—In the beginning all intellectual natures were created equal and alike, as God had no motive for creating them otherwise (De principiis, II, iv, 6). Their present differences arise solely from their different use of the gift of free will. The spirits created good and happy grew tired of their happiness (op. cit., i, iii, 8), and, through carelessness, fell, some more some less (i, vi, 2). Hence the hierarchy of the angels; hence also the four categories of created intellects: angels, archangels (supposing, as he supposed, that these are created), "De principiis", I, vii, 3), men and demons. But their roles may be one day changed; for what free will has lost, free will can undo, and the Trinity alone is essentially immutable in good.

(3) Essence and raison d'être of Matter.—Matter exists only for the spiritual; if the spiritual did not need it, matter would not exist, for its finitude is not in itself. But it seems to Origen—that he does not venture to declare so expressly—that created spirits even the most perfect cannot do without an extremely dilated and subtle matter which serves them as a vehicle and means of action (De principiis, II, ii, 1; I, vi, 4 etc.). Matter was, therefore, created simultaneously with the angels (supposing, as he supposed, that these are created), and will never cease to be because the spiritual, however perfect, will always need it. But matter which is susceptible of indefinite transformations is adapted to the varying condition of the spirits. "When intended for the more imperfect spirits, it becomes solidified, thickened, and forms the bodies of the world; if endowed with spiritual intelligences, it shines with the brightness of the celestial bodies and serves as a garb for the angels of God, and the children of the Resurrection" (op. cit., II, ii, 2).

(4) University of the Redemption and the Final Restoration.—Certain Scriptural texts, e. g., I Cor., xv, 22, "But the last enemy, the death, hath been destroyed by the universality of the Redemption," and Origen allows himself to be led also by the philosophical principle which he enumerates several times, without ever proving it, that the end is always like the beginning: "We think that the goodness of God, through the mediation of Christ, will bring all creatures to one and the same end." (De principiis, III, 3). The universal restoration (ἀνασαράζεσθαι) follows necessarily from these principles.

On the least reflection, it will be seen that these hypotheses, starting from contrary points of view, are irreconcilable; for the theory of a finite restoration is diametrically opposed to the theory of successive infinite trials. It would be easy to find in the writings of Origen a mass of texts contradicting these principles and destroying the resulting conclusions. He affirms, for instance, that the charity of the elect in heaven does not fail; in their case "the freedom of the will will be bound so that sin will be impossible" (In Roman., V, 19). So, too, the propitiation will always be necessary: "It would be impossible to free them from it, than because they wish to be evil (De principiis, I, vii, 14), for malice has become natural to them, it is a second nature in them (In Joann., xx, 19). Origen grew angry when accused of teaching the eternal salvation of the devil. But the hypotheses which he lays down here and there are none the less worthy of censure. What can be said in his defense, if it be not with St. Augustine (De doctrina Christiana, X, 4), that we must not seek to find his real opinion in the works in which he discusses the arguments for and against doctrine as an intellectual exercise or amusement; or, with St. Jerome (Ad Pammach. Epist., XLVIII, 12), that it is one thing to dignify and another to enunciate hypothetical opinions which will be cleared up by discussions onium.

III. ORIGENIST CONTROVERSY.—The discussions concerning Origen and his teaching are of a very singular and very complex character. They break out unexpectedly, at long intervals, and assume an immense importance quite unforeseen in their humble beginnings. They are complicated by so many personal disputes and by so many questions foreign to the most fundamental subject in controversy that a brief and rapid exposition of the polerics is difficult and well-nigh impossible. Finally they abate so suddenly that one is forced to conclude that the controversy was superficial and that Origen's orthodoxy was not the sole point in dispute.

A.—First Origenist Crisis.—It broke out in the deserts of Egypt, raging in Palestine, and ended at Constantinople with the condemnation of St. Chrysostom (392-104). During the second half of the fourth century the monks of Nitria professed an exaggerated enthusiasm for Origen, whilst the neighbouring brethren of Scæta, as a result of an unwarranted reaction and an excessive fear of allegorism, fell into Anthropomorphism. These doctrinal discussions gradually invaded the monasteries of Palestine, which were under the care of St. Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, who, convinced of the dangers of Origenism, had combatted it in his works and was determined to prevent its spread abroad. Being sent to the East in 394, he preached vehemently against Origen's errors, in the presence of the bishop of that city, John, who was deemed an Origenist. John in turn spoke against Anthropomorphism, directing his discourse so clearly against Epiphanius that no one could be mistaken. Another incident soon helped to bring to light the schism. The bishop of Scæta, Epiphanius, brother of St. Jerome, to the priesthood in a place subject to the See of Jerusalem. John complained bitterly of his violation of his rights, and the reply of Epiphanius was not of a nature to appease him.

Two new combatants now enter the lists. From the time when Jerome and Rufinus settled, one at Bethlehem and the other on Mt. Olivet, they had lived in brotherly friendship. Both admired, imitated, and translated Origen, and were on most amicable terms with their bishop, when in 392 Aetius, a monk of Scæta, came to Jerusalem and accused them both of Origenism. St. Jerome, very sensitive to the question of orthodoxy, was much hurt by the insinuation of Aetius and two years later sided with St. Epiphanius, whose reply to John of Jerusalem he translated into Latin. Rufinus learnt, it is not known how, of this translation, which was not intended for the public, and Jerome suspected him of having obtained it fraudulently. A reconciliation was effected sometime later, but it was not lasting. In 397 Rufinus, then at Rome, had translated Origen's "De principiis" into Latin, and in his preface followed the example of St. Jerome, whose dithyrambic eulogy addressed to the Alexandrian cædadist he remembered. The solitario of Bethlehem, gravely hurt at this, despatched two friends to Rome to protest against the implications of Rufinus; denounced Origen's errors to Pope Anastasius, tried to win the Patriarch of Alexandria over to the anti-Origenist cause, and began a discussion with Rufinus, marked with great bitterness on both sides.
Until 100 Theophilus of Alexandria was an acknowledged Origenist. His confidant was Isidore, a former monk of Nitria, and his friends, "the Tall Brothers", the acclimated leaders of the Origenist party. He had supported John of Jerusalem against St. Epiphanius, when the latter announced the condemnation of Origen. Suddenly he changed his views, exactly why was never known. It is said that the monks of Seeta, displeased with his pastoral letter of 399, forcibly invaded his episcopal residence and threatened him with death if he did not chant the psalmody. What is certain is that he had quarreled with St. Isidore over money matters and with "the Tall Brothers", who blamed his avarice and his worldliness. As Isidore and "the Tall Brothers" had retired to Constantinople, where Chrysostom extended his hospitality to them and interceded for them, without, however, admitting them to communion till the censures pronounced against them had been raised, the intransigent Patriarch of Alexandria determined on this plan: to suppress Origenism everywhere, and under this pretext ruin Chrysostom, whom he hated and envied. For four years he was mercilessly active: he condemned Origen's books at the Council of Alexandria (418) and had many monks expelled from Nitria, he wrote to the bishops of Cyprus and Palestine to win them over to his anti-Origenist crusade, issued pastoral letters against which were many, and 404 against Origen's doctrine, and sent a missive to Pope Anastasius asking for the condemnation of Origenism. He was successful beyond his hopes; the bishops of Cyprus accepted his invitation. Those of Palestine, assembled at Jerusalem, condemned the errors pointed out to them, adding that they were not taught amongst them. Anastasius, while declaring that Origen was entirely unknown to him, condemned the propositions extracted from his books. St. Jerome undertook to translate into Latin the various exorcisms of the patriarch and denounced Chrysostom. St. Epiphanius, preceding Theophilus to Constantinople, treated St. Chrysostom as temerarious, and almost heretical, until the day the truth began to dawn on him, and suspecting that he might have been deceived, he suddenly left Constantinople and died at sea before arriving at Salamis.

It is well known how Theophilus, having been called by the emperor to explain his conduct towards Isidore and "the Tall Brothers", cleverly succeeded by his machinations in changing the rules. Instead of being the accused, he became the accuser, and summoned Chrysostom to appear before a council of 60 bishops and 4 patriarchs, at which he himself presided, and of which Chrysostom was condemned. As soon as the vengeance of Theophilus was satisfied nothing more was heard of Origenism. The Patriarch of Alexandria began to read Origen, pretending that he could call the roses from among the thorns. He became reconciled with "the Tall Brothers" without asking them to retract. Hardly had the personal quarrels abated when the spectre of Origenism vanished (cf. Dale, "Origenistic Controversies" in "Dict. of Christ. Biog.", IV, 116-151).

B. Second Origenistic Crisis.—This new phrase, quite as intricate and confusing as the former, has been partially elucidated by Prof. Hampel, who learned study, "Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten in sechsten Jahrhundert" (Münster, 1899), we draw. In 514 certain heterodox doctrines of a very singular character had already spread among the monks of Jerusalem and its environs. Possibly the seeds of the dispute may have been sown by Stephen Bar-Sudullah, a teacher in the name of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who returned to an Origenism of his own brand certain clearly pantheistic views. Plotting and intriguing continued for about thirty years, the monks suspected of Origenism being in turn expelled from their monasteries, then readmitted, only to be driven out anew. Their leaders and protectors were Niconus, who till his death in 547 kept the party together, Theodore Askidas and Domitian who had won the favour of the emperor and were named bishops, one to the See of Ancyra in Galatia, the other to that of Cesarea in Cappadocia, though they continued to reside at court (543). In the year 547 a correspondence, or rather a discussion of some 204 censurable texts taken from "De principiis", and lastly ten propositions to be anathematized. Justianus ordered the patriarch Mennas to call together all the bishops present in Constantinople and make them subscribe to these anathemas. This was the local synod (ευπόρος συνέλευσις) of 547. A copy of the imperial edict had been addressed to the other patriarchs, including Pope Vigilius, and all gave their adhesion to it. In the case of Vigilius especially we have the testimony of Liberatus (Breviar., xxiii) and Cassiodorus (Institutiones, 1). We learn that Domitian and Theodore Askidas, by their refusal to condemn Origenism, would fall into disfavour at Court; but they signed whatever they were asked to sign and remained more powerful than ever. Askidas even took revenge by persuading the emperor to have Theodore of Mopsuestia, who was deemed the sworn enemy of Origen, condemned (l. c., "Breviar., xxiv; Paschasius of Hermopolis, "Defensio trum capitulum", I, ii; Evagrius, "Hist.", IV, xxxvii). Justianus' new edict, which is not extant, resulted in the assembling of the fifth ecumenical council, in which Theodore of Mopsuestia, Ibas, and Theodoretus were condemned (553).

Wore Origenism and Origenists anathematized? Many learned writers believe so; an equal number deny that they were condemned; most modern authorities are either undecided or reply with reservations. Relying on the most recent studies on the question it may be held that: (1) It is certain that the fifth general council was convoked exclusively to deal with the affair of the Three Chapters (q. v.), and that neither Origen nor Origenism were the cause of it. (2) It is certain that the council opened on May, 553, in spite of the protestations of Pope Vigilius, who though at Constantinople refused to attend it, and that in the eight conciliar sessions (from May to June), the Acts of which we possess only the question of the Three Chapters is treated. (3) Finally it is certain that only the Acts concerning the affair of the Three Chapters were submitted to the pope for his approval, which was given on 8 December, 553, and 25 February, 554. (4) It is a fact that Popes Vigilius, Pelagius (556-61), Pelagius II (579-90), Gregory the Great (590-604), in treating of the fifth council deal only with the Three Chapters, make no mention of Origenism, and speak as if they did not know of its condemnation. (5) It must be admitted that before the opening of the council, which had been delayed by the resistance of the pope, (6) Bishops assembled upon the occasion to consider, by order of the emperor, a form of Origenism that had practically nothing in common with Origen, but which was held, we know, by one of the Origenist parties in Palestine. The arguments in corroboration of this hypothesis may be found in Dickep (o. cit. 111-141). This form was described to the fifteen anathemas proposed by the emperor (ibid., 90-96); an admitted Origenist, Theodore of Scythopolis, was forced to retract (ibid., 125-129); but there is no proof that the approbation of the pope, who was at that time protesting against the invocation of the council, was asked. (6) It is easy to understand how this extra-cordial sentence was mistaken at a later period for a decree of the actual ecumenical council.

Original Sin. — I. Meaning; II. Principal Adversaries; III. Original Sin in Scripture; IV. Original Sin in Tradition; V. Original Sin in face of the Objecisons of Human Reason; VI. Nature of Original Sin; VII. How Voluntary.

I. Original Sin. — Original sin may be taken to mean: (1) the sin that Adam committed; (2) a consequence of this first sin, the hereditary stain with which we are born on account of our origin or descent from Adam. From the earliest times the latter sense of the word was more common, as may be seen by St. Augustine's statement: "the deficiency of the sin of the first man is the cause of original sin" (De capt. et concup., xi, xxvi, 13). It is the hereditary stain that is dealt with here.

As to the sin of Adam we have not to examine the circumstances in which it was committed nor to make the exegesis of the third chapter of Genesis.

II. Principal Adversaries. — Theodosius of Mopsuestia opened this controversy by denying that the sin of Adam was the origin of death. (See the "Excerpta Theoloni," by Marius Mercator; cf. Smith, "A Dictionary of Christian Biography," IV, 942.) Celestins, a friend of Pelagius, was the first in the West to hold these propositions, borrowed from Theodosius; "Adam was to die in every hypothesis, whether he sinned or did not. He sinned, but it is not the sin of the human race" (Mercator, "Liber Subnationum," preface). This, the first position held by the Pelagians, was also the first point condemned at Carthage (Denzinger, "Enchiridion," no 101—old no. 65). Against this fundamental error Catholics especially Rom., v, 12, where Adam is shown as transmitting death with sin. After some time the Pelagians admitted the transmission of death—this being more easily understood as we see that parents transmit to their children hereditary diseases—but they still violently attacked the transmission of sin (St. Augustine, Contra dianum epist. Pelag., IV, iv, 6). And even when this mortality was acknowledged, the transmission of sin they understood by this transmission of death. This was their second position, condemned by the Council of Orange [Denz., n. 175 (145)], and again later on with the first by the Council of Trent [Sess. V. can. ii; Denz., n. 780 (671)]. To take the word sin to mean death was an evident falsification of the text, so the Pelagians, although they interpreted it as "the stain of the fall" admitted that Adam caused sin in us. They did not, however, understand by sin the hereditary stain contracted at our birth, but the sin that adults commit in imitation of Adam. This was their third position, to which is opposed the definition of Trent that sin is transmitted (transmitten) as a "stain of sin," not by imitation [Denz., n. 790 (672)]. Moreover in the following canon are cited the words of the Council of Carthage, in which there is a question of sin contracted by generation and effaced by regeneration [Denz., n. 102 (66)]. The leaders of the Reformation admitted the stigma of original sin, but at present there are many Protestants debunked with Socinian doctrines whose theory is a revival of Pelagianism.

III. Original Sin in Scripture. — The classical text is Rom., vi, 12-23. In the preceding part the Apostles treat of justification by Jesus Christ, and to put in evidence the fact of His being the one Saviour, of his divinity, the human head who caused its ruin. The question of original sin, therefore, comes in only incidentally. St. Paul supposes the idea that the faithful have of it from his own experience, and as that makes them understand the work of Redemption. This explains the brevity of the development and the obscurity of some verses. We shall now show what, in the text, is opposed to the three Pelagian positions:

(1) The sin of Adam has injured the human race at least in the sense that it has introduced death—"Wherefore as by one man sin entered into this world and by sin death, and so death passed upon all men" (Rom., v, 12). Here there is question of physical death. First, the literal meaning of the word ought to be presumed unless there be some reason to the contrary. Second, there is an allusion in this verse to a passage in the Book of Wisdom, in which in the context, there is question of physical death, Wis., ii, 24: "But by the envy of the devil death came into the world." Cf. Gen., ii, 17; iii, 3, 19; and another parallel passage in St. Paul himself, I Cor., xv, 21: "For by a man came death and by a man the resurrection of the dead." Here there can be question only of physical death, since it is opposed to corporal resurrection, which is the subject of the whole chapter.

(2) Adam by his fault transmitted to us not only death but also sin—"for as by the disobedience of one man many [i.e., all men] were made sinners" (Rom., v, 19). How then could the Pelagians, and at a later period Zwingli, say that St. Paul speaks only of the transmission of physical death? If according to them we must read death where the Apostle wrote sin, we should also read that the disobedience of Adam has made us mortal where the Apostle writes that it has made us sinners. But the word sinnever has meant mortal, nor has sin ever meant death. Also in verse 12, which corresponds to verse 19, we see Adam by one sin made subject to death, and all men, sin and death, the one being the consequence of the other and therefore not identical with it.

(3) Since Adam transmits death to his children by way of generation when he begets them mortal, it is by generation also that he transmits to them sin, for the Apostle presents these two effects as produced at the same time and by the same causality. The explanation of the Pelagians differs from that of St. Paul. According to them the child who receives mortality at his birth receives sin from Adam only at a later period when he knows the sin of the first man and is inclined to imitate it. The causality of Adam as regards mortal is completely different from his causality as regards sin. Moreover, this supposed influence of the bad example of Adam is almost chimerical; even the faithful when they sin do not sin on account of Adam's bad example, a fact that infidels who are completely ignorant of the history of the first man. And yet all men are, by the causality of Adam as regards sin, completely different from his causality as regards sin. Moreover, the influence of Adam cannot, therefore, be the influence of his bad example which we imitate (Augustine, "Contra Julianum," VI, xxiv, 75).

On this account, several recent Protestants have thus modified the Pelagian explanation: "Even without being aware of it all men imitate Adam's fault (procreation) just as they merit death as the punishment of their own sins just as Adam merits it as the punishment for his sin.” This is going farther and farther from the text of St. Paul. Adam would be no more than the term of its origin, he could no longer have any influence or causality as regards original sin. Moreover, the Apostle did not affirm that all men, in imitation of Adam, are mortals on account of their actual sins; since children who die before coming to the use of reason have never committed such sins; but he expressly affirms the contrary in the fourteenth verse: “But death reigns not only over those who imitated Adam, but ‘even over them also who have not sinned after the similitude of the transgression of Adam.’” Adam’s sin, therefore, is the sole cause of death for the entire human race. Moreover, we can discern no natural connexion between any sin and death. In order that a determined sin entail death there must be a right connexion. But if, as the Law of Moses there was no positive law of God appointing death as a punishment except the law given to Adam (Gen., ii, 17). It is, therefore, his disobedience only that could have merited and brought it into the world (Rom., v, 13, 14). These Protestant writers lay much stress on the last words of the twelfth verse: We know that several of the Fathers either misunderstood the words, “in whom all have sinned”, to mean, all have sinned in Adam. This interpretation would be an extra proof of the thesis of original sin, but it is not necessary. Modern exegesis, as well as the Greek Fathers, prefers to translate “and so death passed upon all men,” which affirms that all have sinned. They accept this second translation which shows us death as an effect of sin. But of what sin? “The personal sins of each one,” answer our adversaries, “this is the natural sense of the words: ‘all have sinned.’” It would be the natural sense if the context was not absolutely opposed to it. The words, “all have sinned,” of the twelfth verse, which are obscure on account of their brevity, are thus developed in the nineteenth verse: “for as by the disobedience of one man many were made sinners.” There is no question here of personal sins, differing in species and number, committed by each one during his life, but of one first sin which was enough to transmit equally to all men a state of sin and the title of sinners. Similarly in the twelfth verse the words “All have sinned” must mean, “all have participated in the sin of Adam”, “all have contracted its stain.” This interpretation too removes the seeming contradiction between the twelfth verse, “all have sinned”, and the fourteenth, “who have not sinned”, in the sense of original sin, in the latter of personal sin. Those who say that in both cases there is question of personal sin are unable to reconcile these two verses.

IV. Original Sin in Tradition.—On account of a superficial resemblance between the doctrine of original sin and the Manichaean theory of nature-being-evil, the Pelagians accused the Catholics and St. Augustine of Manichaeism. For the accusation and its answer see “Contra duas epist. Pelag.”, i, ii, 4; v, 10; 111, IX, 25; IV, 111. In our own times this charge has been reiterated by several critics and historians of dogma who have been influenced by the fact that before his conversion St. Augustine was a Manichaean. They do not identify Manichaeism with the doctrine of original sin, but they say that St. Augustine, with the remains of his former Manichaen prejudices, created the doctrine of original sin unknown before his time. It is not true that the doctrine of original sin does not appear in the works of the preachers. The Fathers. On the contrary, their testimony is found in special works on the subject. Nor can it be said, as Harnack maintains, that St. Augustine himself acknowledges the absence of this doctrine in the writings of the Fathers. St. Augustine invokes the testimony of eleven Fathers, Greek as well as Latin (Contra Jul., iv, 42, 33) in a passage before the date of the 37th of the Eucharistic council which was 358. This passage is the same one which, in the controversy which becomes clearer and clearer, ending in the Gospel, its diffusion amongst all nations, its fruits of holiness, and the progress of the Church.

(2) It is unjust, says another objection, that from the sin of one man should result the decadence of the whole human race. This would have weight if we took the decadence in the same sense as before, but we took it, i.e., human reason incapable of understanding even moral truths, free will destroyed, the very substance of man changed into evil. But according to Catholic theology man has not lost his natural faculties; by the sin of Adam he has been deprived only of the Divine gifts to which his nature had no strict right, the complete privation of which is a real privation, the vision of God in the next life. The Creator, whose gifts were not due to the human race, had the right to bestow on such conditions as He wished and to make their conservation depend on the fidelity of the head of the family. A prince can confer a hereditary dignity on condition that the recipient remains loyal, and that, in case of his rebellion, this dignity shall be taken from him and, in consequence, from his descendants. It is not, however, intelligible that the prince, on account of a fault committed by a father, should order the hands and feet of all the descendants of the guilty man to be cut off immediately after their birth. This comparison represents the doctrine of Luther which we in no way defend. The doctrine of the Church supposes no sensible or afflicting punishment in the next world for children who die with nothing but original sin on their souls, but only the privation of the sight of God [Denz., n. 1526 (1589)].

1. Nature of Original Sin.—This is a difficult point. Many systems have been invented to explain it: it will suffice to give the theological explanation now commonly received. Original sin is the privation of sanctifying grace in consequence of the sin of Adam. This solution, which is that of St. Thomas, goes back to St. Anselm and even to the traditions of the early Church, as well as to the declaration of the Second Council of Orange (c. 529): "original sin has been transmitted to the whole human race not only the death of the body, which is the punishment of sin, but even sin itself, which is the death of the soul [Denz., n. 175 (143)]. As death is the privation of the principle of life, the death of the soul is the privation of sanctifying grace which according to all theologians is the principle of supernatural life. Therefore, if original sin is "the death of the soul," it is the privation of sanctifying grace.

The Council of Trent, although it did not make this solution obligatory by a definition, regarded it with favour and authorized its use (cf. Pallavicini, "Istoria del Concilio di Trento," vii–ix). Original sin is defined in the data of the Council of Trent (c. 18, n. 2); but as a "privatio of justice that each child contracts at its conception" (Sess. VI, cap. iii). But the council calls "justice" what we call sanctifying grace (Sess. VI), and each child should have had personally his own justice so now after the fall he suffers his own privation of justice. We may add an argument based on the principle of St. Augustine already cited, "the deliberate sin of the first man is the cause of original sin." This principle is developed by St. Anselm: "the sin of Adam was one thing but the sin of children at their birth is quite another, the former was the cause, the latter is the effect" (De conceptu virginali, xxvi). In a child original sin is distinct from the fault of sins of the parents and its punishment. What is the effect of these effects is it? We shall examine the several effects of Adam's fault and reject those which cannot be original sin:

1. Death and Suffering.—These are purely physical evils and cannot be called sin. Moreover St. Paul, and after him the Councils, regarded death and original sin as two distinct things (Rom. iv, 17).

2. Concupiscence.—This rebellion of the lower appetites transmitted to us by Adam is an occasion of sin and in that sense comes nearer to moral evil. However, the occasion of a fault is not necessarily a fault, and whilst original sin is effects of baptism concupiscence is not. Therefore, original sin and concupiscence cannot be one and the same thing, as was held by the early Protestants (see Council of Trent, Sess. V, cap. v).

(3) The absence of sanctifying grace in the new-born child is also an effect of the first sin, for Adam, having received holiness and justice from God, lost it not only for himself but also for us (loc. cit., can. ii). If he has lost it for us we were to have received it from him at his birth and not from the other propagation of our race. Therefore the absence of sanctifying grace is a real privation, it is the want of something that should have been in him according to the Divine plan. If this favour is not merely something physical but is something in the moral order, if it is holiness, its privation may be called a sin. But sanctifying grace is holiness and is called by the Council of Trent, because holiness consists in union with God, and grace is identical with that union: the love of God, of which the law is the expression, is the grace of the Founder, and grace which is in us is the intellect of the Father. This privation, therefore, is the hereditary stain.

VII. How Voluntary.—"There can be no sin that is not voluntary, the learned and the ignorant admit the evident truth," writes St. Augustine (De vera ergo, xiv, 27). The Church has condemned the opposite solution given by Bains (prop. xlv, xlviii, in Denz., n. 1406 (924)). Original sin is a sort of punishment for a sin which has been explained, a state, a permanent privation, and this can be voluntary indirectly—just as a drunken man is deprived of his reason and incapable of using his liberty, yet it is by his free fault that he is in this state and hence his drunkenness, his privation of reason is voluntary and can be imputed to him. But how can original sin be an indirectly voluntary for a child that has never used its personal free will? Certain Protestants hold that the child on coming to the use of reason will consent to its original sin; but in reality no one ever thought of giving this consent. Besides, even before the use of reason, sin is already in the soul, according to the doctrine of St. Augustine, and any faults committed by children and the sin contracted by generation. Some theologians and spiritists admit the pre-existence of souls that have sinned in a former life which they may forget; but apart from the absurdity of this metempsychosis, it contradicts the doctrine of original sin, it substitutes a number of particular sins for the one sin of a common father transmitting sin and death to all (cf. Rom. v, 12 sqq.). The whole Christian religion, says St. Augustine, may be summed up in the intervention of two men, the one to ruin us, the other to save us (De pecc. orig., xxiv). The right solution is to be sought in the free will of Adam in his sin, and this free will was ours: "we were all in Adam," says St. Paul, "and each sin was ours" (1 Cor. xv, 22). St. Cyprian adds: "St. Basil attributes to the act of the first man: "Because we did not fast (when Adam ate the forbidden fruit) we have been turned out of the garden of Paradise" (Hom. i de jejun., iv). Earlier still is the testimony of St. Ireneeus: "In the person of the first Adam we offered God, disobeying His precept" (Hist. c. demiurge, v, xiv, 3).

St. Thomas thus explains this moral unity of will with the will of Adam. "An individual can be considered either as an individual or as part of a whole, a member of a society... Considered in the second way an act can be his although he has not done it himself, nor has it been done by his free will but by the rest of the society or by its head, the nation being considered as doing what the prince does. For a society is considered as a single man of whom the individuals are the different members (St. Paul, 1 Cor., xii). Thus the multitude of men who receive their human nature from Adam is to be considered as a single community or rather as a single body. If the man, whose privatization of original justice is due to Adam, is considered as such, this position is not that of a "fault", for a fault is essentially voluntary. If, however, we consider him as a member of the family of Adam, as if all men were only one man, then his privatization partakes of the nature of sin on account of its voluntary origin, which is the actual sin of Adam. (De Malo, iv, 1.) But it is in vain of solidarity, admitted for common sentiment, which attributes to children a part of the shame resulting from the father's crime. It is not a personal crime, objected the Pelagians. "No", answered St. Augustine, "but it is parental crime" (Op. imperf., 1, exviii). Being a distinct person I am not strictly responsible for the crime of another, the act is not mine. Yet, as a member of the human family, I am supposed to have acted with its head which represented it with regard to the conservation or the loss of grace. I am, therefore, responsible for my privatization of grace, taking responsibility in the largest sense of the word. This, however, is enough to make the concept of privatization of grace in a certain degree voluntary, and, therefore, "without necessity it may be said to be voluntary" (St. Augustine, "Retract.", i, xii). Thus the principal difficulties of non-believers against the transmission of sin are answered. "Free will is essentially incommunicable." Physically, yes; morally, no; the will of the father being considered as that of his children. "It is unjust to make us responsible for an act committed before our birth." Strictly responsible, yes; responsible in a wide sense of the word, no; the crime of a father brands his yet unborn children with shame, and entails upon them a share of his own responsibility. "Our dogma makes us strictly and fully responsible for the fault of Adam." This is a misconception of our doctrine. Our dogma does not attribute to the children of Adam any properly so-called responsibility for the act of their father, nor do we say that original sin is voluntary in the strict sense of the word. It is true, that considered as "a moral depravity", "a separation from God", as "the death of the soul", original sin is a real sin which deprives the soul of sanctifying grace. It has the same claim to be a sin as has habitual sin, which is the state in which an adult is placed by a grave and personal fault, the "stain" which St. Thomas defines as "the privation of grace" (I-II, Q. cix. a. 7; III, Q. lxxvii, a. 2, ad 3am, and a. 3, ad 4am), that is, the privation of grace, taking away all that is truly and properly "sin", for concupiscence which remains "is not really and properly sin", although its transmission was equally voluntary (Council of Trent, Sess. V, can. v.). Considered precisely as voluntary, original sin is only the shadow of sin properly so-called. According to St. Thomas (In II Sent., dist. xxxv, Q. 1, a. 2, ad 2am), it is not called "sin" in the same sense, but only in an analogous sense.

Several theologians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, neglecting the importance of the privatization of grace in the explanation of original sin, and explaining it only by the participation we are supposed to have in the act of Adam, exaggerate this participation. They exaggerate the idea of voluntary in original sin, thinking that it is the only way to explain how it is a sin properly so called. Their opinion, differing from that of St. Thomas, gave rise to real difficulties. At present it is altogether abandoned.

eresque. The great chapel, of beautiful ogival work, was demolished in 1827 to enlarge the enclosure. The grille of the choir and the high altar have been considered the finest in the kingdom (Vichiana): they are Renaissance of the sixteenth century. The vast episcopal palace was reconstructed between 1519 and 1518. That palace, built in 1733 by Bishop José Flores Ozorio, on the left bank of the river Segura. It contains a magnificent staircase. The principal churches are Sta Justa y Rufina and the Apóstol Santiago (St. James the Apostle), both restored Gothic. The former is said to have been a parish church in the time of the Goths, but it was reconstructed between 1319 and 1318. That church, Santiago, is a fine Gothic structure, and bears the device of the Catholic Sovereigns: TANTO MONTA; and the arms of Charles V. The great chapel was built between 1534 and 1609, and the tabernacle, of rare marbles, is eighteenth-century work.

Orihuela had many monasteries and convents—Augustinian, Franciscan, Carmelite, Mercedarian, Dominican, Trinitarian, Aleantartine, Capuchin, and of the Hospitallers of St. John of God. Those of the Franciscans and the Capuchins are still extant, as also of the Salesian and Augustinian Sisters and the Chartreus.

But the principal edifice of Orihuela is that of its university, otherwise called the Patriarchal College of Poblete. Founded at the period of Cardin de Leces, a native of Orihuela, who spent 80,000 ducats ($800,000) on it and gave it to the Dominicans. At first this institution was occupied only with ecclesiastical studies, for members of the order, but it afterwards obtained faculties for the conferring of scientific degrees, with privileges equal to those of the most celebrated universities, and the titles of Illustrious, Royal, and Pontifical (1640). It was suppressed in 1814. The building, having been declared an historical monument, was given to the Jesuits, who now carry on in it a college and boarding-school. In the same building the public archives and library are housed, the latter consisting largely of books taken from the suppressed convents. The sarcophagus of the founder is in the chapel of the magnificent church. A statue of St. Thomas stands above the principal door, and above it a colossal Minerva.

By the Concordat of 1551, the See of Orihuela is to be transferred to Alicante, a city with two excellent churches: that of St. Nicolás and the older church of San Francisco del Rey. The old church was destroyed by fire and entirely rebuilt in the ogival style. The collegiate church founded by Alfonso X, the Wise, was made a collegiate church by Clement VIII (1600), and, by the terms of the Concordat, is destined to be the cathedral of Alicante. Also celebrated is the sanctuary of the Holy Face at Alicante, originally occupied by Hieronymites, but now by the Poor Clares. The linen cloth bearing the imprint of the Holy Face was brought from Rome by Monsén Mena of Alicante and is an object of great veneration in that part of the country. Elche, famous for its palm-trees, has a noteworthy church dedicated to the Assumption, on which the kneeling and the deep meditation of prayer prevail. Orihuela has a hospital, a Casa de Misericordia for the poor and orphans (1734), and a founding asylum founded by Charles III in 1764.

Oriol, Joseph, Saint, priest, "Teutamaturgos of Barcelona", b. at Barcelona, 23 November, 1630; d. there, 29 March, 1717. He studied at the University of Barcelona, receiving the degree of Doctor of Theology, 1 August, 1674. Ordained priest, 30 May, 1676, he visited Rome in 1686 and was granted a benefice in the church of Nuestra Señora del Pino, in Barcelona. His priestly life was remarkable for a spirit of penance, profound humility, and prudence in directing souls. Impelled by a desire of martyrdom, he went to Rome in April, 1689, to offer himself for the foreign missions, but, falling sick at Marseilles, he returned to Barcelona. God blessed upon him prophetic and miraculous power. The dying, the blind, the deaf and dumb, the lame, and the paralytic, were instantly cured by him. He was beatified by Pius VII, 5 September, 1806, and canonized by Pius X, 20 May, 1909. His feast occurs on 25 March.

Oristano, Diocese of (Arborensis), in Sardinia. Oristano was the capital of the giudicature (independent district) of Arborea, given to the House of Sardi, after the expulsion of the Saracens, and was subject to Fisa. It was the last city to surrender to the Aragonese (1419), against whom it was valiantly defended by Mariano. Bishops of Arborea are mentioned for the first time in the letters of Gregory VII. The bishop Tragadorio (1195) built the cathedral; Friar Guido Cattano (1312) took part in the Frankish controversy on the poverty of Jesus Christ; Jacopo Serra (1492) was Viceroy of Rome and became a cardinal; Girolamo Barberini (1655) was one of the last to be confirmed by the Dominicans and Pius V; Antonio Canepolo (1588) founded the seminary, rebuilt by Luigi Emanuel del Carretto (1756), and contributed also to other works of public utility. In 1593 there was united to the See of Oristano that of Santa Giusta, where SS. Justa, Justina, and Eudocia (under Hadrian?) were martyred. The General Congregations of the Bishops of Santa Giusta were held here from the year 1119. The diocese is a suffragan of Cagliari; it has 74 parishes, with 97,000 inhabitants, 3 religious houses of men, and 7 of women, 3 schools for boys, and 2 for girls.

Orkeys, a group of islands situated between 58° 41' and 38° 24' N. lat. and 2° 22' and 3° 25' W. long., and lying in the northern part of the British Isles, are separated by Pentland Firth. They include Holme and Kippen, the most important, however, being Pomona or Mainland. The total area is over three hundred and seventy-five square miles and the population (of Norse descent), almost exclusively Calvinist and English speaking, numbers 30,000. These islands, for the most part level (the greatest altitude being 1514 feet, on Hoy), rocky, barren, treeless, partly covered by swampland, produce only barley, oats, potatoes, and beets. Stock raising is an important industry, the yearly production being 30,000 cattle, 40,000 sheep, 5000 pigs, and 6000 horses of a small but sturdy breed. The hunting of birds, small, large, and sea, (herring, lobsters) furnish the inhabitants with further means of sustenance. Excellent trout are to be caught in the numerous firths and small lakes. Mining for iron, tin, and silver is also carried on successfully. The exportation of down and woven stuffs, (shaws, etc.) is a lucrative industry. The Orkeys form a treaty with the Skye, a county, the capital being Kirkwall (a town of 5000 inhabitants), important as a trading centre, with a good harbour.

History.—Among the ancients, the Orkneys, also called Orcades insular, are the Orkeys, mentioned by Pliny, and by other writers; they are, as commander of the troops garrisoned in Britain, in a.d. 69, had the coast of England explored by his ships of war, and took back more trustworthy information concerning these mythical territories, which he brought under the sceptre of Rome for the time being. Nothing is heard of the inhabitants at that time, but they were probably Celts. About 872 AD, a separate island was forced to submit to the rule of Harold Haarfager, King of Norway, who also subjugated the Hebrides, Isle of Man, and Ireland. Later Eric Blöde said that the Orkneys from his victorious adversaries. From these islands also Olaf Trygvesson under the command of his uncle, Domal (1093), and Harold Hardraad set forth on his last campaign against England (1066). Thenace also Olaf Yrkr returned to his native land (1067) and Hakon IV began his military expedition against Scotland (1263). In 1271 Magnus IV of Norway ceded to King Alexander III of Scotland all Scottish islands "without exception." To be seen in the archives of St. Magnus at Eglisay and of the round apsidal church on Orphir. The great monumental, architectural work of the whole archipelago, however, is the cathedral of St. Magnus at Kirkwall (Kirkkonau), which is surpassed but slightly by the celebrated cathedral of Trondhjem. It was begun in 1157 by St. Ragnvald (catedraled 1151), who returned, and represents the artistic ideas of generations. Laid out originally according to Norman-Roman style, it seems to have been strongly influenced by the Gothic, and shows a harmonious combination of the two elements. The central nave is supported by twenty-eight columns of surpassing beauty. Above the intersection of the nave and transept rises an imposing square tower, the dome of which was unfortunately ruined by fire in the seventeenth century and was replaced by another which is too low. Doors made of stones of many colours fitted together open into the interior of the temple. Since the introduction of Calvinism, statues, altars, and sacred vessels have disappeared; even the relics of the founder were scattered to the winds. The burial sites of the jars have likewise been forgotten.

Orlandini, Niccolò, b. at Florence, 1554; d. 1606 at Rome, 17 May. He entered the Jesuit novitiate 7 Nov., 1572; became rector of the Jesuit college at Nola; was master of novices at Naples for five years; and finally appointed secretary of the general Aca- quic, who in 1585 detailed him to write the history of the Jesuit Order. This work comprises only the gen- eral history of St. Ignatius. It first appeared under the title "Historia Societatis Jesu prima pars" (Rome, 1614, 1615, 1621; Antwerp, 1620; Cologne, 1620). It is written in the form of annals, and is based chiefly on a life written by the saint's secretary, de Polanc, Ranke, "Hist. of the Popes", III (London, 1805); 328, says of Orlandini: "In his style of writing, as well as in the business of life, he was exceedingly careful, accurate, and wary." The history was continued by Savelli, Passius, Jon- ancy, and Cordara. The sixth and last part, reaching to 1633, was published at Rome in 1738. Other works are: "Anima litterarum Societatis Jesu, anni 1563-85" (Rome, 1558-80-88); "Vita Petri Fabri" (Lyons, 1617); the same under the title "Forma saeculorum Apostolae, express in exemplo Petri Fabri" (Dillingen, 1617); and "Tractatuum seu Commentarium in Summarium Constitutionum et regulas communis" (ed. Soero (Roehampton, 1876). His "Vita Petri Fabri" has been translated into French (Bordeaux, 1617) and Italian (Rome, 1629).

Orléans, DIOCESE OF (AURELIANUM), comprises the Department of Loiret, suffragan of Paris since 1622, previously belonged to the diocese of Bourges. It was re-established by the Concordat of 1802, when it included the Departments of Loir et Cher, and was in the new Diocese of Blois. The present Diocese of Orléans differs considerably from that of the old regime; it has lost the arroundisement of Tomorantin which has passed to the Diocese of Blois and the canton of Janville, now in the Diocese of Chartres. It includes the arroundisement of Montargis, formerly subject to Sens, the arroundisement of Gien, once in the Diocese of Auxerre, and the canton de Châtillon sur Loire, once belonging to Bourges. To Gerbert, Abbot of St. Pierre le Vie at Sens (946-79), is due a detailed narrative according to which St. Emilion declared that the marriage could not be dissolved by will of the contracting parties for infirmities consequent on the contract; forbad the marriage of Christians and Jews; and excommunicated those who partook of flesh offered in sacrifice to idols.

VII. The fourth national council (541) assembled thirty-eight bishops and maintained the decision fixed by Pope Victor for Easter, contrary to Justinian's ordinances, and ordered those who had or wished to have a parish church on their lands to take the necessary measures for the dignity of Divine worship. Finally it perfected the measures taken by the Council of 541 relative to the emancipation of slaves; slaves emancipated by baptism, or by purchase, in the higher orders who lived monastically, decreed that the archbishop should be elected by the bishops of the province, with the consent of the clergy and the citizens; the bishops by the archbishop, the clergy, and the people of the city.

After his victory over the Alamanii, Clovis was bent on the sack of Verdun, and the archpriest there obtained mercy for his fellow-citizens. To St. Euspius and his nephew St. Mesmin (Maximinus), Clovis also gave the domain of Micy, near Orleans at the confluence of the Loire and the Loiret, for a monastery (508).

When Euspius died, St. Maximinus became abbot, and during his rule the religious life flourished there notably, and the monastery counted many saints.

From Micy monastic life spread. St. Liphardus and

St. Urbinus founded the Abbey of Meung-sur-Loire;

St. Lyé (Luctus) died a recluse in the forest of Orleans;

St. Herare (Victor) in Soissons; St. Doudehard in the forest of Amblie near Bourges. St. Leonard introduced the monastic life into the territory of Limous; St. Al-mir St. Ulphacrus, and St. Boner in the vicinity of Montmirail; St. Avitus (d. about 527) in the district of Chartres; St. Caiais (d. before 536) and St. Leonard of Varenne (d. about 550) in the valley of the Sarthe.

St. Frainbault and St. Constantine in the Jaryon forest, and the aforesaid St. Boner (d. about 500) in the Passais near Lavall; St. Leonard of Dunois; St. Alva

and St. Ernier in Perche; St. Laumer (d. about 590) became Abbot of Corbon. St. Lubin (Leobinus), a monk of Micy, became Bishop of Chartres from 541-

56. Finally Ay (Aquis), Viscount of Orleans (d. after 587), a protector of Micy, was also a saint. The monks of Micy contributed much to the civilization of the Orléans region; they cleared and drained the lands and taught the semi-barbarous inhabitants the worth and dignity of agricultural work. Early in the eighth century, Theodulfus restored the Abbey of Micy and at his request St. Benedict of Aniane sent fourteen monks and visited the abbey himself. The last abbot of Micy, Chapt de Rastignac, was one of the victims of the September Massacres”, at Paris, 1792, in the prison of l’Abbaye.

The schools of Orleans early acquired great prestige;

in the sixth century, Contran, King of Burgundy, had his son Gondebaud, educated there. After Theodulfus had developed and improved the schools, Charlemagne, and later Hugh Capet, sent thither their eldest sons as pupils. These institutions were at the height of their fame from the eleventh century to the middle of the thirteenth. Their influence spread as far as Italy and England, where students came to them. Among the medieval rhetorical treatises which have come down to us under the title of “Ars” or “Summa Dietaminius” four, at least, were written or re-edited by Orleans professors. In 1230, when for a time the doctors of the University of Paris were scattered, a number of the teachers and disciples took refuge in Orleans; when

Boniface VIII, in 1298, pronounced the sixth book of the Decretals, he appointed the doctors of Bologna and the doctors of Orleans to comment upon it. St.

Yves (1253-1303) studied civil law at Orleans, and Clément V also studied there law and letters; by a bull published at Lyons, 21 May, 1305, Bernard of Orleans institutes both the title and privileges of a University. Twelve of his successors granted the new university many privileges. In the fourteenth century

it had as many as five thousand students from France,

Germany, Lorraine, Burgundy, Champagne, Picardy,

Normandy, Touraine, Guyan, Scotland. Among those who studied or lectured there are quoted: in the fourteenth century, Cardinal Pierre Bertrand; in the fifteenth, John Ruchelin; in the sixteenth, Calvin and Théodore de Bèze, the Protestant Anne Duhour, the publicist François Hotmann, the jurisconsult Pierre de l'Ilecole, in the seventeenth, Mihle (perhaps in 1640), and the savant Du Cange; in the eighteenth, the jurisconsult Pothier.

Among the notable saints of the diocese are: St.

Baudius, a Ninian martyr (third or fourth century);

the deacon St. Lunarius, martyr, patron of Loigny (seventh century); the venerable St. Donatus (fifth century); St. May, abbot of Val Benoit (fifth century);

St. Mesme, virgin and (perhaps) martyr, sister of St.

Mesmin (first century); St. Fulchile, patroness of Gien (sixth century); St. Sigismund, King of Burgundy, who, by order of the Merovingian, Clodomir, and despite the entreaties of St. Avitus, was thrown

(521) into a well with his wife and children; St. Contran, King of Orleans and Burgundy (581-83), a confessor; St. Loup (Lupus), Archbishop of Sens, born near Orleans, and his mother St. Agna (first half of the seventh century); St. Gregory, former Bishop of Nicopolis, in Bulgaria, who died a recluse at Pithiviers

(1001 or 1007); St. Rose, Abbess of Eureval

(d. 1130); Blessed Odo of Orleans, Bishop of Cambrai

(1105-13); the leper St. Alpais, died in 1211 at Cadou where she was visited by Alix of Champagne, widow of

Louis VII; St. Guillaume (d. 1299), Abbot of Fontaineau and subsequently Archbishop of Bourges;

the Dominicans, Blessed Reginald, dean of the collegiate church of St. Aignan, Orleans (d. 1220);

the Englishman St. Richard, who studied theology at Orleans in 1236, Bishop of Chichester in 1244, a friend of St.

Edmund of Canterbury; St. Maurus, called to France

by Boniface VIII, in 1302, Bishop of Mans, and sent by

St. Benoit, resided at Orleans with four companions in 512; St. Radegonde, on her way from Noyon to Poitiers in 514, and St. Columbus, exiled from Luxeuil at the close of the sixth century, both visited Orleans.

Charlemagne had the church of St. Aignan rebuilt and reconstructed the monastery of St. Pierre le Puifler.

In the cathedral of Orleans on 31 December, 1587, Hugh Capet had his son Robert (b. at Orléans) crowned king. Innocent II and St. Bernard visited Flavy and Orléans in 1130.

The people of Orléans were so impressed by the preaching of Blessed Robert of Arbresle in 1115 that he was invited to found the monastery of La Madeleine, which he re-visited in 1117 with St. Bernard of Thiron. The charitable deeds of St. Louis at Pisseaux, Châtellen-sur-Loire, and Orléans, where he was present at the transition of the relics of St. Augman (25 October, 1259), and where he frequently went to care for the poor of the Hôtel Dieu, are well known. Pierre de Beaumont, Archdeacon of Sully and canon of Orléans, as Gregory XI (1371-8), was the last pope

t that France gave to the Church; he created Cardinal Jean de la Tour d'Auvergne, Abbot of St. Benoît-sur-Loire. Blessed Jeanne de Vadois was Duchess of Orléans and after her separation from Louis XII (1498) she established, early in the sixteenth century, the monastery of L'Amouricade at Châtellen-sur-Loire. Étienne Dolet (1500-16), a printer, philologist, and pamphleteer, executed at Paris and looked upon by some as a "martyr of the Renaissance", was a native of Orléans. Cardinal Odet de Coligny, who joined the Reformation about 1560, was Abbot of St. Evicens, of Fontainejou, Ferrières, and St. Benoît. Admiral Coligny (1549-72) (see SAINT BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY) was born at Châtillon-sur-Loing in the present diocese. At the beginning of the religious wars Orléans was disputed between the Guises and the followers of the Protestant Condé. In the vicinities of Orléans Duke Francis of Guise was assassinated 3 February 1562.

The Calvinist, Jacques Bougier, councillor of Henry IV, who collected and edited the chronicles of the Crusades in his "Gesta Dei per Francos", was born at Orléans in 1554. The Jesuit, Denis Petay (Petavius), a renowned scholar and theologian, was born at Orléans in 1581. St. Francis of Sales came to Orléans in 1618 and 1619. Venerable Mother Françoise de la Croix (1591-1667), a pupil of St. Vincent de Paul, who founded the congregation of Augustinian Sisters of Charity of Notre Dame, was born at Petay in the dio-

The Miramion family, to which Marie Bonneau is celebrated in the annals of charity under the name of Mme de Miramion (1629-96), belonged by marriage, were from Orléans. St. Jane de Chantal was superior of the Orléans convent of the Visitandines in 1627. Mme de Château, early commissioned in the order at Tour- nelles, near the Orléans bridge. The monument, destroyed by the Huguenots in 1567, was set up again in 1569 when the Catholics were once more masters of the city. Until 1792, and again from 1802 to 1830, finally from 1812 to the present day, a great religious feast, celebrated 8 May of every year at Orléans in honour of Jean of Arc, attracted multitudes (see JOAN OF ARC). The Church of Orléans was the last in France to take up again the Roman liturgy (1784). The Sainte Croix cathedral, perhaps built and consecrated by St. Eucherius in the fourth century, was destroyed by fire in 999 and rebuilt from 1278 to 1329; the Protestants pillaged and destroyed it from 1562 to 1567; the Bourbon kings rebuilt it in the seventeenth century.

The principal pilgrimages of the diocese are: Our Lady of Bethlehem, at Ferrières (q. v.); Our Lady of Miracles at Orléans, dating back to the seventh century (Jean of Arc visited its sanctuary 8 May, 1429); Our Lady of Cléry, dating from the thirteenth century, visited by Philip the Fair, Philip VI, and especially by Louis XI, who wore in his hat a leaden image of Notre Dame de Cléry and who wished to have his tomb in this sanctuary where Dunois, one of the heroes of the Hundred Years' war was also interred. Prior to the Associations Law of 1901 the Diocese of Orléans counted Franciscans, Benedictines, Missionary Priests of the Society of St. Mary, Lazarists, Missionaries of the Sacred Heart, and several orders of teaching Brothers. Among the congregations of women which originated in this diocese must be mentioned: the Calvary Benedictines, a teaching and nursing order founded in 1617 by Princess Antoinette d'Orléans-Longueville, and the Capuchin Leclere of Tremblay known as Pierre Joseph; the Sisters of the Society of St. Mary, of the Order of St. Agnus, a teaching order founded in 1853 by Bishop Dupanloup, with mother-house in Orléans. At the beginning of the twentieth century the religious congregations of this diocese conducted: 1 crèche; 77 infant schools; 2 institutions for the deaf and dumb; 10 orphanages; 2 houses for penitent women, 12 religious houses for the care of the sick in their own houses; 2 houses of retreat; 27 hospitals or asylums for the poor house. In 1905 (last year of the Concordat) the diocese had 371,019 inhabitants; 41 parishes; 293 successional parishes; 23 vicariates subventioned by the State.

Orley, BARENT VAN (Bernard), painter, b. at Brussels, about 1491; d. there 6 January, 1542. He wished to be interred in the church of St. John the Baptist of Furnes, where he was born, and was commissioned in 1515 to paint an altar-piece for the Confraternity of the Holy Cross at Furnes. In 1518 he was appointed official painter to Margaret of Austria, Regent of the Netherlands, and two years afterwards entertained Dürer in his house for some time. The court artist Dürer painted a portrait of her now in the Dresden Museum. In 1530, Margaret of Austria having died, Orley received the official appointment from her successor, Mary of Hungary. Orley was a Catholic, but assisted at various Lutheran meetings held in his father's house. He and his brother were arrested, with the threat of being sent to prison and sentenced to pay fines, and to do public penance in the church of St. Giudule (Brussels). The artist had seven children by his first wife, Agnes Segrères, and two by his second wife, Catherine Helinæus.

He painted in oil and in tempera, and made a great many designs for glass windows. Some of the finest works of his are the theatrical designs which he contributed to the piece "La Reine d'Angleterre" at the Ducal Theatre in Burgundy in 1538. He was an engraver and an able craftsman. With Michael Coexie he superintended the manufacture of the tapestries for the Vatican designed from Raphael's cartoons for Leo X. Three pieces of tapestry from his own drawings are at Hampton Court, the Louvre, and the Cœstia Palace at Naples. Many of his pictures derive their extreme brilliance from being painted on a ground of gold-leaf. A tradition that he visited England lacks definite proof. The eight portraits of the first Regent of the Netherlands, and four of the second, he is said to have painted, have not yet been found. His works occasionally bear the family motto "Ely sime tii." (A. FELLER, "Musée Royal de Belgique" (Brussels, 1860); and see the writings of VAN MANDER, MICHELIS, SIRET, and OPHENREM.)

GEORGE CHARLES WILLIAMSON.

ORME, PHILIBERT DE L', architect, b. about 1512; d. 1550. His style, classical and of the more severe Italian type, later developed characteristics showing greater personal independence. He has also importance as an author on subjects in his particular line, and is our chief source of information on his own works and the events of his life, although his writings are not devoid of exaggerations. While still a youth he went to Rome; he probably had remained there in the service of Paul III, had not Cardinal du Bellay and others urged him to go to France. Soon after his return to his native city of Lyons (1536) he gave evidence of his originality as an artist in the invention of the trompe l'ceil vaulting, so popular with the French, i. e. arches with the curve of the vaulting, without curves supporting weight imposed on them from the side and in the artistic stone carving, which gives them their charm. He was obliged to save the portal of St. Nitier at Lyons incomplete in order to build the château of St. Maur-des-Fossés for Paris for Bellay, which he later had to enlarge. According to his own statements, he introduced in this important innovations, e. g. in the construction of columns. In 1538 he prevented the occupation of Brest by the English. Francis I now deputed him to make a special inspection of the fortifications on the coast of Brittany, and review and provide for the vessels stationed there, which had been rendered France much service of fortifications. In 1547 Orme began work on the king's tomb. Under Henry II he was promoted until he finally became supervisor of all royal buildings. In this capacity he directed the work on the châteaux of Fontainebleau, St. Germain-en-Laye, Madrid, etc., and had at the same time to investigate the character of the work in Paris, which had been rendered France much service in connexion with these undertakings.

While in his fifties he built the château of Anet and Meudon. The former, in which he was allowed complete liberty, is of special importance for the study of his style; the disposition of the columns shows the influence of which he had been rendered France much service of some water-piping in the second building, in itself a very important piece of work, brought on him the mockery of his jealous rivals. Although he was a layman, the king and queen granted him various abbey, the revenues from which made him a wealthy man. He experienced some time the disfavour of the court, and in 1559 was superseded by Primaticcio as supervisor of royal buildings. In 1561 he was commissioned by the regent to build the Tuileries. According to his plan, of which he himself gives a detailed description and appreciation, the whole was to be in the form of a classical ground-plan, with the four corner pavilions of the large central court and four smaller courts, an entrance being provided on each of the two longer sides of the rectangle. Only the garden façade was completed. The central pavilion with the cupola is especially beautiful. In this the master took liberties which, despite his admiration for the classic, he proclaimed as "magnæque artis, et ingenii" inventions giving the columns or ornamentation exhibiting like proportions or even similar arrangement of columns, and that the limitations of the architect came less from the prescribed measurements than from the stipulations made with regard to the building. This accounts for the "French column", among other things in the Tuileries, with its long capital in bucket-shape, with many fluted drums, separated by ornamental bands. Above all, Orme's works are not devoid of curious attempts at originality. In the last years he wished to work out his compositions according to "Biblical laws and sacred numbers".

As an author, Orme would have taken his place beside Vitruvius and Alberti had he completed his work on "Architecture". In two of the nine books of the first volume he deals in a masterly manner with stonework and the construction of the vault. A new edition of his work was issued by C. Nizet in 1891. Another work he entitled: "Nouvelles inventions pour bien bâtir à petits frais", as he describes in this his device for constructing roofs of great span by bolting together planks (instead of using single heavy beams). This was republished at Rouen in 1648 with his "Architecture". Of interest in itself, and also as illustrating his activity, is a memoir in which he defends himself against the attacks of his adversaries. This was incorporated by l'Écuyer in the "Grands architectes français de la Renaissance" (Paris, 1860).

Oropus, titular see, suffragan of Anazarbus in Cilicia Secunda. It never really depended on Anazarbus but on Seleucia in Isauria, as is evident from the Greek text of the "Notitia Episcopatum" of Antioch in the sixth and tenth centuries ("Echos d'Orient", 1907, X, 95, 145), where the city figures as Oropus or Oroba, and from the Latin translation where it is called Oropus ("Itinera Hierosolimitana", Geneva, 1850, I, 334). Oropus is no other than Olba, suffragan of Seleucia, annexed with the Province of Isauria to the Patriarchate of Constantinople in the eighth century, and is mentioned in the "Notitia" of Leo the Wise and of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. (See Olba.)

O'Rorke, Patrick Henry, soldier, b. in County Cavan, Ireland, 25 March, 1837; killed at the battle of Gettysburg, Penn., U. S., July, 1863. He was a year old when his parents emigrated to the United States. They settled in Rochester, N. Y., where he attended the public schools, and in 1853 went to work as a marble-cutter. An injury after he was appointed a cadet in the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, graduating with highest honours in June, 1861. Commissioned as a lieutenant in the regular army, he distinguished himself in the Civil War as a staff-officer in the engineer corps, was made colonel of the 140th regiment of New York Volunteers, with which command he participated in the battles of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. At Gettysburg while leading his men in defence of Little Round Top, in the very crisis of the battle he caught up the colours, and, mounting a rock to urge on his men, was struck and fell dead. "The Comte de Paris in his "Histoire de la guerre civile en Amérique" (VI, iv, 379) says this was one of the most striking and dramatic episodes of the battle. His widow became a Religions of the Sacred Heart and one of the successful educators in their New York convents.

THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

OrtrosUs, Paules, historian and Christian apologist; b. probably at Bracara, now Braga, in Portugal, between 380 and 290, the dates of birth and death not being precisely known. His name has been known only since the eighth century. Having early consecrated himself to the service of God, he was ordained, and went to Africa in 413 or 414. The reason for his leaving his native country is not known; he tells us only that he left his fatherland "sine voluntate, sine consensu" (Monimentorum, i). He repaired to St. Augustine, at Hippo, to question him as to certain points of doctrine, concerning the soul and its origin, attacked by the Priscillianists. In 414 he prepared for St. Augustine a "Commontorium de errore Priscillianistarum et Origenistarum" (P. L. XXXI, 1211-10; also, ed. Schepp, in "Priscillianismus"), in "Corpus script. ecc. lat."

Vienna, 1889, XVIII, 114 sqq.) to which St. Augustine replied with his "Ad Orusius contra Priscillianistas et Origenistas". In order to become better acquainted with these questions concerning the soul and its origin, Orusius, with a hearty recommendation from St. Augustine (Epist. clxxi), went to Palestine, to St. Jerome. Pelagius was then trying to spread his false doctrines in Palestine, and Orusius aided St. Jerome and others in their struggle against this heresy. In 415 Bishop John of Jerusalem, who was inclined to the teaching of Origen and influenced by Pelagius, summoned the presbyters of his church to a council at Jerusalem. At this council Orusius sharply attacked the teachings of Pelagius. Pelagius deposed Orusius and told him that he believed it impossible for man to become perfect and avoid sin without God's assistance, John did not condemn him, but decided that his opponents should state their arguments before Pope Innocent. In consequence of his opposition to Pelagius, Orusius was drawn into dissensions with Bishop John, who accused him of having maintained that it is not possible for man to avoid sin, even with God's grace. In answer to this charge, Orusius wrote his "Liber apologeticus contra Pelagium de arbitrio libertate" (P. L. XXXI, 1173-1212, and ed. Zangemeister, "Orosius opera" in "Corpus script. ecc. lat.", V, Vienna, 1882), in which he gives a detailed account of the Council of 415 at Jerusalem, and a clear, correct treatment of the two principal questions against Pelagius: the capability of man's free will, and Christian perfection in doing God's will here on earth.

In the spring of 416 Orusius left Palestine, to return to Augustine in Africa, and thence home. He brought a letter from St. Jerome (Epist. cxxvi) to St. Augustine, as well as writings of the two Gallic bishops, Hero and Lazarus, who were in Palestine struggling against Pelagianism (cf. St. Augustine, Epist. clxxv). He also brought from Jerusalem the then recently discovered relics of the Protomartyr Stephen and a Latin letter from Lucian, who had discovered them (Gennadius, "De Viris Illustr.", xxxi, xlvii, ed. Capella, Munster, 1898, 87-89, 101). After a short visit at Hippo, Orusius began his journey home, but, on reaching Minorea, and hearing of the wars and devastations of the Vandals in Spain, he returned to Africa. The relics of St. Stephen, which he left in Minorea, became the object of a great veneration, which spread into Gaul and Spain. On the conversion of 1211-16; ed. Zangemeister, in "Corpus script. ecc. lat.", V, through, the third chief work of Orusius, "De virtutibus ad conversionem Judaeorum in Minorensi Insula factis", P. L., XLI, 821-32. Orusius went back to Africa and at St. Augustine's suggestion wrote the first Christian Universal History: "Historiarum adversus paganos libri septem" (P. L., XXXI, 163-174; ed. Zangemeister, in "Corpus script. ecc. lat."). It is an attempt to give a supplement to the "Civitas Dei", especially the third book, in which St. Augustine proves that the Roman Empire suffered as many calamities before as after Christianity was received, combating the pagan argument, that the abandonment of their deities had led to calamity. St. Augustine wished to give this proof described in a special work through the whole period of human history, and this Orusius did, reviewing the history of all the known peoples of antiquity, with the fundamental idea that God determines the destinies of nations. According to his view, two chief empires had governed the world: Babylon in the East, and Rome in the West. Rome became familiar to him through the immediate Macedonian and Carthaginian Empires. Thus he holds that there were four great empires in history—a view widely accepted in the Middle Ages. The first book briefly describes the globe, and traces its history from the Deluge to the founding of Rome; the second, organization of Italy to the time of the city by the Gauls, that of Persia to Cyrus, and of Greece to the Battle of Cunaxa; the third deals chiefly with the Macedonian Empire under Alexander and his successors, as well as the contemporary Roman history; the fourth brings the history of Rome to the destruction of Carthage; the last three books treat Roman history alone, from the destruction of Carthage to the author's own time. The work, completed in 418, shows signs of haste. Besides Holy Scripture and the chronicle of Eusebius revised by St. Jerome, Livy, Eutropius, Caesar, Suetonius, Florus, and Justin are used as sources. In pursuance of the apologetic aim, all the calamities suffered by the various peoples and peoples of Jesus are described, but all and all that the work is valuable; it contains contemporary information on the period after a.d. 378. It was used largely during the Middle Ages as a compendium, and nearly 200 manuscript copies are still extant. Alfred the Great translated it into Anglo-Saxon (ed. H. Sweet, London, 1843).

Orphans and Orphanages. — The death of one or both parents makes the child of the very poor a ward of the community. The obligation of support is imposed upon parents or grandparents by nearly every system of laws; but there is no such obligation upon any other relative. Natural sympathy, however, and willingness to bear a distributed burden for the common good, rather than to enforce an individual one, contribute to the acceptance of the care of orphans as a public duty. In Biblical times the fatherless, the stranger, and the widow shared the excess fruits of the harvest (Deut., xxiv. 21). The people were told God "is the father of orphans" (Ps. lxxvi, 6) and
His bounty was to be shared with them. Luxury and paganism introduced more selfish considerations. Neglect of the destitute orphan is only to be expected in a world where the unweaned infant is exposed to any fate. The Romans apparently did not provide for widows and orphans. The Athenians viewed the duty as economic and patriotic, and ordained that children of citizens killed in war were to be educated up to the age of twenty by the state. (Sextus Empiricus, Adv. Math. IV, 35). The best of his duty was laid upon the laity to do the same for children of pagans. Basil, Pius, and Theophanes undertook the care of orphans. In the Apostolic Constitutions, "Orphans as well as widows are always commended to Christian love. The bishop is to have brought them up at the expense of the Church and to take care that the girls be given, when of marriageable age, to Christian husbands, and that the boys should learn some art or handicraft and then be provided with tools and placed in a condition to earn their own living, so that they may be no longer than necessary a burden to the Church." (Apost. Const., IV, ii, tr. Uhhorn, p. 185). St. Augustine says: "The bishop protects the orphans that they may not be oppressed by strangers after the death of the parents." Also epistles 292-255: "Your piety knows what care the Church and the bishop should take for the protection of all men but especially of orphan children." The rise of monastic institutions following upon this period was accelerated by the fruit of charitable work for the poor, chief amongst which was the care of children. During the Middle Ages, the custodians of orphanages under the notion of the duty of the Church to care for its orphans. They were the shelters where the orphans were taught learning and trade avocations. The laity also were exhorted to perform their share of this charge.

One figure stands out so prominently in the history of the care of orphans as that of St. Vincent de Paul (1570-1660). To this work he attracted the gentlemen of the court, noble ladies, and simple peasants. In his distracted country he found the orphan the most appealing victim, and he met the situation with the skill of a general. No distinction was observed between female and male orphans in the beginning of his work with the Association of Charity; nor was there any distinction as to the condition of the children that were aided, other than that they were orphans, abandoned, or the children of the poor. Seventeen years or more after that he established amongst nations' new, the Orphanage in France. When the war between France and Austria had made orphans the most acute sufferers, St. Vincent de Paul secured as many as possible from the provinces, and had them cared for in Paris by Mlle le Gras and the Sisters of Charity then fully established. Three towns alone furnished no less than 1000 orphans under the age of ten years. The Convents of Germany, the Netherlands, Spain, and other countries of Christendom provided for orphans, and ever since have been looked to for the protection of the orphan, or have been the inspiration for other orders seeking to perform the same work.

When the Revolution broke out in France there were 126 houses of benevolence conducted in that country by the Sisters of Charity, and of these a large majority cared for orphans. They were suppressed, but many were reopened by Napoleon.

In more modern times a similar enlistment of women to serve the orphan has been observed all over Europe. In England, Ireland, and Scotland fifty-one houses of the Sisters of Charity, with an endowment of £80,000, were established in 1858; and in all, except in a few hospitals, the work of an orphan asylum is conducted to a greater or less extent. On the American Continent, however, the first orphan asylum antedated St. Vincent de Paul's influence by a century, and was due not to French but to Spanish inspiration. This was at Santo Domingo, which was established in 1548 in Mexico by a Spanish order and was called La Caridad (Steelman, "Charities for Children in Mexico"). The first orphanage in the territory now comprised in the United States was that of the Ursulines, founded in New Orleans in 1727 under the auspices of Louis XV.

Whenever in Europe, following the religious changes of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the care of orphans was not committed to ecclesiastical oversight, it was considered to be a public duty. Under the English poor law it was the duty of the parish to support the indigent so that none should die. It is probable that destitute orphans were cared for under this principle, but apprenticing and indenturing were the only solutions of the difficulties arising from the presence of orphans or dependent children. In later years, if children were too young or too numerous for this they were kept in the workhouse, one of the provisions being as follows: "Children under seven are placed in such of the wards appropriated to female paupers as may be deemed expedient." The so-called orphanage movement began in England in 1758 by the establishment of the Orphan Working Home. In the next century the exposures, principally by Charles Dickens, of the evils bred by the workhouse and the indenturing system led to many reforms. Numerous private asylums were founded in the reign of Queen Victoria under royal patronage, and with considerable official oversight and solicitude. In Colonial America the influence of the English poor law was felt, with the same absence of distinction as to child and adult, and as to care of the child. All paupers were the charges of the towns or cities to be cared for. When the settlements were established, and later, in most States of the Union, orphan children were cared for in these. Indenturing was practised as often as possible. In New York State children were removed from almshouses following the passage of a law directing this in 1875. It provided that all children over the age of five years, who were in mind or body, be removed from poorhouses and be placed in families or orphan asylums. It has since been amended by reducing the age to two years and not excepting the detecting. The first orphan asylum in New York City, a Protestant institution, now located at Hastings-on-Hudson, N. Y., was established in 1887 by the efforts of Mrs. Alexander Hamilton. The first Catholic orphan asylum in New York City was founded in 1817 by the Sisters of Charity in Prince Street, and is now maintained in two large buildings at Kingsbridge, N. Y.

Of the seventy-seven charities for children, mostly orphanages, existing in the United States before the middle of the nineteenth century as listed by Folks, twenty-one were Catholic and all of these were orphanages. One of the most interesting of the others is Girard College, founded by the merchant prince of Philadelphia, Stephen Girard, with an endowment of $6,000,000 which has since increased nearly fivefold. The terms of the gift are that no child of either sex is permitted to cross the threshold. Neither the educational results nor the philanthropy to orphan boys seem to be adequate to the fortune involved. An interesting asylum in New York City is the Leake and Watts Asylum founded in 1831 to provide “a free home for well-behaved full orphans of respectable parentage in destitute circumstances, physically and mentally sound, between the ages of three and twelve years, who are entrusted to the care of the trustees until fifteen years of age. Disorderly and ungovernable children are not admitted.” The Hebrew Orphan asylum at New York City is large and well managed, caring for about 3000 children. In the Catholic institutions of the Archdiocese of New York the orphans and half-orphans number about 8000. In the Diocese of Brooklyn they number close to 3600. In all the large cities of America, Catholic orphans are found. It is probable that they would number close to 300 and that the expense is about $50,000.

The upkeep and management of these large institutions call for the solution of many complex problems of varying components. They must provide plenty without wastefulness, clothe adequately without cheapness or painful uniformity, educate in letters and handicraft without overwork, and provide amusement without luxury, as well as discipline without repression. Buildings must be safe and have adequate sanitary details conducive to health. A thorough medical oversight of infants, individually and collectively, completes a programme of requirements which bear very heavily and continuously on the management. Always and everywhere it has been considered an honor to work for and one is overcharged with oversight of them. Naturally the feature about orphan asylums most often remarked by visitors not accustomed to the situation is the radical difference from domestic life in the surroundings of the children. This has led some to propose changes in the institutional scheme, by which buildings of reduced size but adequate number shall be provided for one or two large ones; that a matron or house-mother be employed to supervise each, and that each also shall have its own outfit and details for domestic management. Some would recommend that such charges be put in the joint care of a man and his wife, that the home-like protection of the children may be provided for. These and similar features comprise what is known as the “Cottage System.” It fails in many points to present the hoped-for advantages. The fixed charges and salary list are so extensively increased that the burden would be in most cases unbearable. Some few institutions have made efforts in this direction, resulting in sudden and spectacular improvement, and on an expenditure of modest scale, the “Cottage System” offers some advantages to Catholic religious communities operating orphans, and its success would seem to be a question of wisely planned management and skillful architecture, controlled by conservative authority over the proposed, new, and regularly recurrent expenditures. Perhaps the real difficulty is that it does not improve the situation of the child in the matter of accustoming it to the natural life of the outside world.

Over against this institutional method of caring for destitute children, resulting in what is called the orphanage, but not necessarily opposed to it, are those methods which seek to put the child earlier under the influences of family life. This is done by boarding-out and by placing-out. The former is a system in which the overseer of the poor or similar officer confines the child to some family, as a boarder, and pays regularly for its care up to the age of self-support. Success and prevention of wrong in this system can only be obtained by rigid考查 and by rigorous watchfulness. It originated in the English workhouse system and was designed to provide a means by which children could be removed from the poorhouse; it is much in vogue still throughout the United States. The weakness seems to lie in the danger of profit-seeking among parents who offer to care for children for money. More permanent good for the child is obtained by the second method—placing-out in free homes. This is sometimes called indenturing in the cases of older children and sometimes adoption. The former has almost disappeared in the United States, except as a form observed by some overseers of the poor and some child-caring agencies. Real apprenticing or “binding-out” has passed away. Adoption is not a legal act unless confirmed by the proper procedure in a court of record. Whatever advantage may be claimed for the absorption of the child into a vacancy in a household, where affection can be expected to develop, and where the conditions surrounding the child during all of its maturing years will be those entirely normal to any similar family group in the community. Nearly all the States which have laws bearing upon this practice have recognized the right of religious communities that where practicable such children must be placed in homes of their own religious faith. Placing-out can only be practised where an ample number of excellent homes can be obtained. By specializing in the work it becomes possible to place even large numbers of orphans and to surround them with a strong and enlightened protection. The good results most often are mutual, the foster-parents gaining as much by their charity as the child.

When the New York Catholic Protectory was taken over in 1863 from the St. Vincent de Paul Society which had organized it, Archbishop Hughes impressed upon the managers house-mothers and introduced the plan: “Let five or two gentlemen be employed, the one to keep office during the absence of the other, but one or the other to go abroad through the interior of the country, with good letters to make the acquaintance of the bishop of a diocese and the priest of a parish as well as such Catholic mechanics and farmers as might be disposed to receive one or other of the children who will come under your charge, and in this way let the children be in their house of protection just as short as possible. Their lot is, and is to be in one sense, a sufficiently hard one under any circumstances, but the sooner they know what it is to be, the better they will be prepared for encountering its trials and difficulties.” (Letter to R. Silman Ives, 19 June, 1863.) The St. Vincent de Paul Society of New York City had for years assisted in performing such a work as this, and in 1888 established a special agency for it, known as the Catholic Home Bureau. It acts with the cooperation between the committing authorities and the institutions housing orphans and other destitute children, and is placed at the disposal of such institutions by the St. Vincent de Paul Society and is paid for by them. Subsequent visitation of the children is practised with great care. In 1909 a similar bureau was started in Washington and another in Baltimore. In many cities of the Union, Catholic agents are employed by the local children’s aid societies to perform this work for the protection of Catholic children.

Placing-out was the practice in early Christian days. The widows and deaconesses of the early church took orphans into their homes as Fabiola did in Rome. Some believe that the terms widow and orphan are so often found joined in ancient Christian literature because of this custom. It was the general practice at the time of the first persecutions. Ulpian (Christian Charity in the Ancient Church, p. 185) says: “It would also often happen that individual members of the Church would receive orphans, especially those whose parents had perished in a persecution.” Thus was Origen adopted, after Leonidas, but whether he differed much from the former, by a pious woman, in Alexandria (Eusebius, “Hist. Eccl.”, VI, ii). Again the child of the female martyr, Felicitas, found a mother; and Eusébius tells us of Severus, a Palestinian composer, who especially interested himself in the orphans and widows of those who had fallen. In the Apostolic Constitutions members of the Church are urgently exhorted to such acts. “If any Christian, whether boy or girl, be left an orphan, it is well if one of the brethren, who has no child, receives and keeps him in a child's place. They who do so perform a good work by becoming fathers to the orphans and will be rewarded by God for this service." The taking of an orphan to rear, and giving it a place in a new family circle has always been an honoured custom amongst good people in all times. In simple communities it is the sole solution of a distressing problem. When in modern times a war or an extraordinary disaster created an embarrassment by reason of the number to be cared for, the organized asylums have been a blessing. The same must be said of the asylums caring for the army of orphans found in the large cities, particularly since they serve as shelters during the period of observation, and in the case of handicapped children during a longer period.

Orsi, Giuseppe Agostino, cardinal, theologian, and ecclesiastical historian, b. at Florence, 9 May, 1692, of an aristocratic Florentine family; d. at Rome, 12 June, 1761. He studied grammar and rhetoric under the Jesuits, and entered the Dominican Order at Fiesole, 21 February, 1708. At his profession he received the name of John Baptist. Among his teachers was the great theologian, Bartolomeo Fabroni, who having been called in secular life Agostino Francesco. His studies included not only theology, in which he gave particular attention to the Fathers and the great Scholastics, but also the classical and Italian literatures. Having been master of studies for some time at the convent of San Marco at Florence, he was called to the university of Siena, and was subsequently made professor of St. Thomas, where he was also made prior. He held this position two years, when he became the theologian of Cardinal Nicolo Corsini, nephew of Pope Clement XI. In 1738 he was appointed secretary of the Congregation of the Index. In 1749 Benedict XIV made him "Magister Sacri Palati," or papal theologian, and on 24 September, 1750, Clement XIV created him cardinal of the Title of San Sisto. In this position Orsi was an active member of several Congregations until his death. He was buried in his church of San Sisto.

Orsi's literary activity covered especially dogmatism, apologetics, and church history. His most important works are the following: "Dissertatio historica qua ostenditur catholicae ecclesiae tribus prioribus ascultis capitulum quindecim rei paucum et absolutione in neuti missione gaquad" (Milan, 1730); "Dissertatio apologetica pro SS. Perpetua, Felicity et sociorum martyrum orthodoxa inversus Basanagium" (Florence, 1728); "Della origine del domini del sovrannominato de' Romani Pontefici" (Rome, 1742); and "Storia ecclesiastica"—this, his chief work (20 vols., Rome, 1747-61), brought the narrative only to the close of the sixteenth century; the twenty-first volume, which Orsi had begun, was finished by his former pupil Giovanni Battista Gismondi (Rome, 1770). The taking of all these works brought up to the year 1587 by the Dominican Fil. Becchetti (new ed. in 42 vols., Venice, 1822; in 50 vols., Rome, 1838). It has been translated into foreign languages. Other writings of Orsi are: "Dissertatio dominatica et morale contra fuso materiale della parola" (Rome, 1727); "Dimostrazione teologica che fu comandato il uno di cristiano in breve tempo"; "Dissertatio apologetti de controversiis de juris gentium" (Milan, 1731); "Dissertatio de religione comparati" (Milan, 1733).

—this was defended by Orsi, in the "Vindiciae dissertationum de baptismo in nomine Jesu Christi" (Florence, 1735), against the attacks of the doctors of Paris; "De concordia gratiae et libertatis" (Rome, 1734); "De trium quinque Romani Pontificis in definienda fidei controversiis judicio" (Rome, 1739); "De Romani Pontificis in Synodos oecumenicos coramque canones potestate" (Rome, 1740). The last two are directed against Gallicanism.

Orsini, one of the most ancient and distinguished families of the Roman nobility, whose members often played an important role in the history of Italy, particularly in that of Rome and of the Papal States. The Roman or principal line of the family, from which branched off a series of collateral lines as time went on, may be traced back into the early Middle Ages, and a legendary ancestry goes back even as far as early Roman times. The Roman line, as well as its branches, had large possessions in Italy and were the rulers of numerous and important dominions, fortified towns, and strongholds, the main centre of which was the city of Rome, with its military enemies of the equally distinguished Colonna (q. v.): in the great medieval conflict between papacy and empire, the latter were for the most part on the side of the emperor and the leaders of the Ghibelline party, while the Orsini were ordinarily champions of the papacy and leaders of the Guelf party. The Orsini gave three popes to the Church—Celestine III (q. v.), Nicholas III (q. v.), and Benedict XIII (q. v.)—as well as many cardinals and numerous bishops and prelates. Other members of the family distinguished themselves in political history as warriors or statesmen, and others again won renown in the fields of art and science. The wars between the Orsini and the Papal States were an important part of the struggle for the supremacy of Rome and of Central Italy. Forming as they did a part of the conflicts waged by the emperors in Italy, they influenced in a very prominent manner the general historical development of that time.

Among the cardinals of the Orsini family who were distinguished in the history of the Church, as well as in ecclesiastical political history, the following are especially worthy of mention:

1. Matteo Rosso Orsini, nephew of Cardinal Gaetano Orsini (later Pope Nicholas III), created a cardinal by Urban IV in December, 1262; d. 1 Sept., 1305 (according to some authorities, 1306). Aslegate of the province of Viterbo and Petrelia, in the Marches, he fought against Peter de Vico, who, in the name of Manfred, invaded the papal territory with German mercenaries. Soon after the elevation of his uncle, Nicholas III, to the papal throne (1277), he was named by this pope archpriest of the Vatican Basilica, rector of the great Hospital of the Holy Ghost in Vatican territory, and cardinal protector of the Franciscan Order. After the death of Nicholas III (1280), the cardinals assembled in Viterbo for the election of his successor, but, owing to party dissensions, many months passed before a decision was reached. The party which inclined towards the French, and which had the support of Charles of Anjou, King of Naples, himself present in Viterbo, wished to elect an exponent of the policy of France, and chose as their candidate the French Cardinal Simon. However, the two cardinals Orsini, Matteo Rosso and Giordano, the latter a brother of the deceased pope, Nicholas HI, energetically opposed this choice. As neither party could command a majority of the votes, no election resulted. In February, 1281, the French party resolved to have recourse to a bold stroke. At the instigation of the marshal of the conclave, Annibaldi, who was at variance with the Orsini, citizens from Viterbo suddenly attacked the anti-French cardinals, and took prisoners the two Orsini, carrying them away from the Conclave and holding them in custody. The candidate of the French party was now elected pope under the name of Martin IV (22 February, 1281), whereupon Giorlando was released, and afterwards Matteo Rosso. The instigator of the attack was excommunicated and the city of Viterbo placed under an interdict. While the news of the capture of the two Cardinals Orsini was received in Rome, great confusion ensued. Their relatives were driven from the city by the adherents of the Annullabili, but were later recalled by Martin IV, with whom the Cardinals Orsini had become reconciled. During the conflict between Boniface VIII and Philip the Fair of France, it was Clement IV (1268-74) under Clement V (1303) the address of St. Peter's. Commissioned by Pope Boniface VIII, he brought Orvieto back to its submission to the Holy See, shortly after which the pope named him legate for Umbria, Spoleto, and the March of Ancona. In this capacity he left the Curia on 27 May, 1300, returning, however, on 28 May, 1301. During this time he had to combat various enemies of the Roman Church, and recovered the city of Gubbio for the pope. He was entrusted with his second papal legation by Clement V. Leaving Avignon, which was at that time the residence of the Curia, he set out on 8 March, 1306, for the Papal States with the commission to make peace between the parties which were everywhere at variance, and to bring back the various states of the Roman Church to their allegiance to the pope. This mission occupied more than three years, terminating on 12 June, 1309. Cardinal Napoleone played an important part during the political disturbances of the time. At first an opponent of the Colonna and their ambitions, he later became allied with the French by close relations with the French rulers. At the elections of Clement V and John XXII he exercised a decisive influence, but subsequently became an enemy of the latter. He upheld the Franciscan Spirituals, and espoused the cause of King Louis of Bavaria against the pope. A cardinal for fifty-four years, he took part in the election of seven popes (Celestine V to Clement VI), on at least three of whom he placed the tiara. He is also known as an author, having written a biography of St. Clare of Montefalco.

(5) GIAN GAETANO ORSINI, prohnotary Apostolic, raised to the cardinalate by Pope John XXII in December, 1316; d. 1359 (or, according to some sources, 27 August, 1358). He was sent to Italy V papal legate for certain lands belonging to the Papal States, and remained there until 1334. He endeavoured, though with little success, to bring back several rebellious states and vassals to their allegiance to the Apostolic See, excommunicated the obstinate Cast Eloni, and Bishop Guido Tarlato of Arezzo, as both supporters of Vespri. In their defeat against the pope, and, after the coronation of King Louis the Bavarian in the Lateran, 28 March, placed the city under an interdict. After the departure of the excommunicated emperor, the legate entered Rome with the army of King Robert of Naples, whereupon the people once more agreed to recognize the sovereignty of the pope. John XXII, however, refused to sanction the war undertaken by the cardinal legate against the Colonna, and ordered him to return to Tuscany. In November, 1328, he opened a campaign against the cities of Corneto and Viterbo, which submitted to the pope in the following year. The years between 1334 and his death he passed in Avignon.

(6) MATTEO ORSINI, d. probably on 18 August, 1340. He entered the Dominican Order, completed the full course of theology, obtained the Degree of Master, and taught theology at Paris, Florence, and Rome. He won great distinction by his zeal for the spread of the order, and was appointed provincial of the Roman province in 1322. In this capacity he became a member of the Lateran council having the papal truce in hand; and in July, 1327, he was appointed to the See of Anagni to transact the interests of the Eternal City. On 20 October, 1326, the pope named him Bishop of Girgenti (Sicily), but shortly after (15 June, 1327) transferred him to the archiepiscopal See of Liponto (Manfredonia, Southern Italy), made him Cardinal-Priest of San Giovanni e Paolo on 18 December, 1327, and Cardinal-Bishop of Sabina on 18 December, 1338. He continued in various ways to promote the welfare of the Dominican Order, richly endowing the Convent of St. Dominic in Bologna.

(5) GIACOMO ORSINI, created cardinal-deacon by Gregory XI on 30 May, 1371, d. at Vievoro or at Tagliacozzo, near Bolognia, in 1376. He was distinguished for the knowledge of secular law. Appointed papal legate in Siena in 1376, he was a strong supporter of Gregory XI. In the Conclave of 1378, he espoused the cause of Urban VI, but later attached himself to the anti-pope Clement VII.

(6) PONCELLO ORSINI, Bishop of Avessa (Southern Italy) from 1 June, 1376, to 6 February, 1385. He was created cardinal-priest with the title of St. Clement at the great consistory convoked by Urban VI on 28 September, 1378. He became papal legate, and at first worked zealously for the interests of Urban VI after the outbreak of the schism. Later, however, repelled by the impetuous procedure of the pope, he secretly left the Curia and took up his abode upon his own possessions. At the Conclave of 1389, he was a candidate for the papacy. The new pope, Boniface IX, appointed him to important ecclesiastical offices, and he exercised great influence upon the Curia until his death.

(7) TOMMASO, of the line of the Counts of Mamullo, raised to the cardinalate (1381) by Urban VI; d. 10 July, 1390. He was sent by the pope as legate to the Patrimony and the Marches, where Prince Rinaldo Orsini of Aquila and Tugliezacco had seized the cities of Urbino and Spoleto in addition to other territory. The legate declared war against him and won back for the pope the cities of Narni, Amelia, Terni, and later Anagni. He conducted the Papal Vicar of Viterbo, brought upon himself the disfavour of the pope, who imprisoned him in the fortress of Amelia, but later granted him his liberty. On the occasion of the conspiracy of several of the cardinals against Urban, Cardinal Orsini remained loyal to the pope. His relations were intimate with Urban's successor, Boniface IX, during whose pontificate he died.

(8) GIORDANO ORSINI, a very distinguished personality in the College of Cardinals in the first three decades of the fifteenth century, d. at Pettrichi, 29 July, 1438. After a thorough and comprehensive training, he became Auditor of the Rota, and in February, 1400, was raised by Boniface IX to the Archiepiscopal See of Naples. On 12 June, 1405, Innocent VII made him a member of the College of Cardinals, at first with the title of St. Martin of Monti, and later with that of S. Lorenzo in Damaso. In 1412 he was appointed Cardinal-Bishop of Albano, and in 1413 Cardinal-Bishop of Sabina. He participated in the election of Gregory XII (1406), but later, with several other cardinals, renounced allegiance to the pope, against whom he published a tract. He assisted at the Council of Pisa, and took part in the election of the Peas pope, Alexander V (1409), and of his successor John XXIII (Balthasar Cossa). The latter set him at the Marches, from which he was summoned by papal legate to the Marches, in which position he was equally distinguished for his ability and prudence. He assisted zealously at the Council of Constance, and took part in the election of Martin V (1417). He was sent by this pope as legate to England and France, in company with Cardinal Filastre, to make peace between the two contending parties. He was also selected for the difficult embassy to Bohemia and the neighbouring countries (1426), where he was to combat the Hussite heresy. On this occasion he took with him as his secretary the future cardinal, Nicholas of Cusa. Upon his return, the pope entrusted to him another difficult task, namely the visitation and reform of the churches and ecclesiastical institutions of Rome. In the Conclave of 1431 Eugene IV was elected pope. A close friendship existed between him and Giordano, and the latter supported him loyally and energetically during all the trying conditions of the time. With two other cardinals, Giordano was commissioned to proceed against the Greek schismatics in Italy, after which he was delegated by the pope to attend the Council of Basle (q. v.), where he exerted every effort to uphold the rights of the pope against the schismatic element in the council. We are indebted to him for a diary of this council. Later, as papal legate, he journeyed with Cardinal Conti to Siena to meet Emperor Sigismund on his way to Rome to receive the imperial crown. A man of wide culture, Giordano took an active part in the literary life of his time. Numerous and valuable manuscripts were the result of his journeys as legate, and these he will to St. Peter's in Rome (cf. the catalogue of manuscripts in Cancelleria, "Del seicentennario basilicae Vaticanae II", 1750). The monastery was founded by him in Bracciano. He died dean of the College of Cardinals, and was buried in St. Peter's in a chapel founded and richly endowed by him.

(9) Latino Orsini, likewise of the Roman branch of the family and the owner of rich possessions, b. 1411; d. 11 August, 1477. He entered the ranks of the Roman clergy as a youth, became subdeacon, and as early as 10 March, 1438, was raised to the Episcopate of Conza in Southern Italy. Transferred from this see to that of Trani (Southern Italy) on 8 June, 1439, he remained archbishop of the latter after the Council of Basel. The conclave was held on 20 December, 1448. On 4 December, 1454, the Archbishopric of Bari was conferred upon him, which made it possible for him to take up his residence in Rome, the See of Trani being given to his brother, John Orsini, Abbot of Farfa. Paul II appointed him legate for the Marches. Sixtus IV, for whose election in 1471 Cardinal Latino had worked energetically, named him camerlengo of the College of Cardinals, granted him in 1472 the Archdiocese of Taranto, which he governed by proxy, and, in addition, placed him at the head of the government of the Papal States. He was also appointed commander-in-chief of the papal fleet in the war against the Turks, and, acting for the pope, crowned Ferdinand King of Naples. He founded in Rome the monastery of S. Salvatore in Lauro, which he richly endowed and in which he established the canons regular, donating to it also numerous manuscripts. In the last years of his life he became deeply religious, though he had been worldly in his youth, leaving a natural son named Paul, whom, with the consent of the pope, he made the heir of his vast possessions.

(10) Giambattista Orsini, nephew of Latino, d. 22 Feb., 1563. He entered the service of the Curia at an early age, became camerlengo, canon of St. Peter's, and was elevated to the cardinalate by Sixtus IV in 1583. Innocent VIII conferred upon him in 1491 the Archepiscopal See of Taranto, which he governed by proxy, and, as papal legate for Romagna, the Marches, and Bologna, was entrusted with the administration of these provinces of the Ecclesiastical States. In the Conclave of 1492, the election of Alexander VI was almost entirely due to him. However, Cardinal Giambattista, together with the head of the House of Orsini, the Duke of Bracciano, having espoused the cause of the Florentines and the French in the Italian wars, was taken prisoner in the Vatican at the command of the pope and thrown into the dungeon of the Castel Sant'Angelo, where he died. The report was current that he had been poisoned by Alexander VI.

Other cardinals of the family of Orsini who are worthy of mention because of the active part taken by them either as administrators of the papal states or as legates in other lands are the following:

(11) Flavio Orsini, flourished in the sixteenth century, d. 16 May, 1581. He was created a cardinal in 1565, having been a bishop since 1560, first of the See of Murro and later that of Spoleto. In 1572 he was sent by Gregory to France, principally to support this monarch in his conflict with the Hugenouts.

(12) Alessandro Orsini, belonging to the ducal family of Bracciano, b. 1392; d. 22 August, 1626. He was brought up at the court of the Grand Duke Ferdinando I of Tuscany, and in 1615 created a cardinal by Paul V. As Legate to Ravenna under Gregory XV, he distinguished himself in 1621 by his great charity on the occasion of the outbreak of a malignant pestilence. Upon his return to Rome, he devoted himself to religion and to the practice of an austere asceticism. He even begged permission of the pope to resign the cardinalate and to enter the Jesuit Order, but this was in vain. Nevertheless, the pious cardinal always remained closely united to the Jesuits. He was a patron of Galileo.

(13) Virginio Orsini, likewise of the ducal family of Bracciano, b. 1615; d. 21 August, 1676. He renounced his birthright in his youth, entered the military order of the Knights of Malta, and more than once distinguished himself in the war against the Turks by his reckless bravery. In December, 1641, Urban VIII raised him to the dignity of cardinal, and appointed him Protector of the Polish as well as of the Portuguese Orient. He was commissioned to direct the building of the new fortifications with which Urban VIII endeavored to secure Rome against invasion by the French at Trastevere, and which are still in existence. In 1675 he became Cardinal Bishop of Frascati, but died the next year, leaving behind him a reputation of a pious, gentle, and benevolent prince of the Church.

In addition to the members of the Orsini family who were prominent as cardinals in the history of the Roman Church, others have gained a place in political history as statesmen, warriors, or patrons of the arts and sciences.

(1) Orso di Bobone, nephew of Pope Celestine III (1191-8) and the first Orsini to hold a conspicuous place in Rome. Under the protection of his uncle, the pope, he was destined to have the principal part in laying the foundation of the dominion, power, and prestige of the Roman Orsini. His grandchild, (2) Matteo Rosso Orsini, was made senator of Rome by Pope Gregory IX in 1211. In this capacity he took a decided stand against the ventures of Emperor Frederick II in Italy. He was a patron of religious undertakings, a noted patron of the arts, and as such a member of that saint's Third Order. While one of the sons of Matteo Rosso, Gian Gaetano, ascended the papal throne as Nicholas III, another, (3) Rinaldo, continued the activities of his father in the political field, exerting himself to the utmost to prevent the alliance of Rome with the Hohenstaufen Conrad. A son of this Rinaldo, (1) Matteo Orsini, was twice senator in Rome. His wise and energetic uncle, Nicholas III (p.v.), to show that papal rule was once more dominant in Rome, deprived King Charles of Anjou of the senatorial dignity, and in 1278 published the bull of the Council of Florence, which could become senator, a Roman being alone eligible for the dignity, and then only with the consent of the pope and for one year. The power of the Orsini was in general much strengthened by this capable pope of their race.

In the course of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, however, the following were particularly famous as military leaders in the numberless internal wars of Italy: (5) Paolo Orsini, who in the beginning of the fifteenth century fought as condottiere in the service of several popes, was taken prisoner by Ladislas of Naples, again set at liberty, and fell in battle against Braccio da Montone before Perugia on 5 July, 1446. (6) Vincenzo Orsini, Lord of Bracciano, was leader of the forces of Sixtus IV (1417-84) in the war against Ferrara, and victory at the battle of Campo Moro against the Neapolitans (1482). Later, however, he entered the service of Naples to oppose King Charles VIII of France (1483-98); in 1495, however, he took the side of the latter, and was imprisoned on this account till 14 January, 1497, in prison at Naples. (7) Niccolo Orsini, Count of Petignano, was, at this time, in the service of the Anjou, military leader in the war against Naples, Sixtus IV, Siena, Florence, and Venice. Later, however, he went over with his army to the Venetian standard, and became general-in-chief of the Venetian Republic in the war against the Turks. He captured Pisa, but was defeated in 1509, and died in the following year. Of the members of the Orsini family who flourished during the sixteenth century (8) Paolo Gior- nazzo Orsini is also worthy of mention. Born in 1511, he was created a duke, with the title of Brac- ciano, by Pope Pius IV (1559). Under Paul IV, he was general of the papal troops in the war against the Turks (1556). His first wife, Isabella Medici, being murdered, he took as his second wife Vittoria Accor- boni, widow of the murdered Francesco Peretti, a nephew of Sixtus V. Accused of murdering the latter, Paolo Gior- nazzo was obliged to leave Rome. He died a exile at Orsini's castle of Castiglione. Paolo was distinguished as a humanist, historian, and archeologist, b. on 11 December, 1529; d. in Rome, 18 May, 1600. He was the natural son probably of Maerbe Orsini of the line of Mugnano. Cast off by his father at the age of nine, he found a refuge among the choir boys of St. John Lateran, and a protector in Canon Gentile Delfini. He applied himself energetically to the study of the ancient languages, published a new edition of Arno- dius (Rome, 1585) and of the Septuagint (Rome, 1587), and wrote works dealing with the history of Rome,—"Familiar Roman ex antiquis manusmi- latulis" (Rome, 1577), "Fragmenta historicorum" (Antwerp, 1595), etc. He brought together a large collec- tion of old and balay leaves, and left it as a family possession of the Vatican library (cf. de Nolhac, "La bibliothèque de Fulvio Orsini", Paris, 1887).

A woman of the Orsini family likewise played an important political role in the seventeenth century: Maria Anna, duchess of Savoy, a spinster of the family of the dukes of Alba, whose death she married Flavio Orsini, Duke of Bracciano, who remained loyal to Pope Innocent XI in his difficulties with Louis XIV of France. Maria Anne used her influence with the Curia in the interests of France and of Louis XIV, and in 1701, after the death of her husband, went to Madrid as regent of the robes to Queen Marie-Louise, who, together with her husband Philip V of Spain, was completely under her influence. She did much to strengthen the throne of these rulers, but, nevertheless, in 1714, when Philip married Elizabeth Farmes, she was dismissed with ingratitude and returned to Rome, where she died on 5 December, 1722 (see Hill, "The Princess Orsini", London, 1898).

The present princes of the Roman Orsini are extinct. The present princes of the family in Rome descend from the Neapolitan line, which may be traced back to Francesco Orsini, Count of Triani and Conversano. In 1463 they became Dukes of Gravina, later (1721) princes of the Empire and Roman princes. The head of the family always enjoys the dignity of assistant at the papal throne. The present head is Filippo Orsini-Gravina-Sarzina, b. 10 December, 1812. Several noble families outside of Italy trace back their descent to the ancient Italian Orsini, as for example the Juvencus des Ursins in France and the Rosenbergs in Austria and Germany.

Orsini (Arasius, Orescisis-Heru-sa Ast), an Egyptian monk of the fourth century, was a disciple of Pachomius on the island Tabenna in the Nile. When Pachomius died (318), Orsini was chosen as his successor; but he resigned in favour of Theodorus. It was not till Theodore's death (380) that the young Orsini, advised by St. Athanasius, accepted the office of hegemon. Theodore and Orsines are said to have helped Pachomius in the composition of his rule; Gennadius (De vir. ill., IX) mentions another work: "Orescises the monk, a colleague of Pachomius and Theodore and a man perfectly learned in the Scriptures, composed a Divine service, the instruction for all monastic discipline, in which nearly the whole Old and New Testaments are explained in short dissertations in as far as they affect monks; and shortly before his death he gave this book to his brethren as his testament." This is supposed to be the work: "Doctrina de institutione monachorum" translated by St. Athanasius (Ed. Paris, 1494; ed. Barcelona, 1503). In P. G. XI., 870-894. Migne prints after it (P. G., XL., 895 sq.) another work attributed to the same author: "De sex cogitationibus sanctorum," which, however, is probably by a later Orsini.

Ortelius (Oertel), Abraham, cartographer, geographer, and archeologist, b. in Antwerp, 4 April, 1527; d. there, 28 June, 1598. His family came from Augs- burg, wherefore Ortelius frequently referred to himself as "Bois-Germant." He died of gout at 55, which had been a wealthy merchant, seem to have placed the family in difficulties, for Ortelius began to trade or peddle geographical charts and maps while still a mere youth. When twenty years of age he joined a guild as a colourer of charts. By purchasing as valuable maps as possible, mounting them on canvas, colouring and selling them, he managed to persist in supporting the family, as may be gleaned from a contemporary letter. This trading in maps was probably one of the chief reasons for his unusually extended trips to Germany, England, Italy, and particularly for his annual visits to the great fair at Leipzig. Meanwhile he did not confine himself entirely to trafficking in charts. Five years before Mercator published his famous Carta Marina (1569), Ortelius issued a great eight-leaved map of the world. As the only extant copy of this great map is in the library of the University of Bâze (cf. Bernoulli, "Ein Karteninkunabelbuch", Basle, 1905, p. 5) it is still almost entirely unknown. No copy has yet been found of Ortelius's great map of Asia, but in his chief work, which assures him for all time a place of honour in the history of cartography, we find not only his own map of Asia on a smaller scale, but also a number of maps of other cartographers, who otherwise are completely unknown. This work is the "Theatrum orbis terrarum", which appeared in 1570; it was the first great modern atlas, and contained seventy copper engravings on fifty-three double-folio pages. Ortelius has combined in this work in a systematic manner all recent maps of the world and separate countries, of which he had heard during his long activity as trader and collector. Where several maps of one country were available, he chose the most modern and most reliable copy. When the name of the author was mentioned on the map, Ortelius did not change a line or a name then, but, when the author's name was not given, he resolutely made such changes as appeared to him necessary. He conscientiously gave credit to the author of maps which were published on a reduced scale by himself. Considering geography as an eye of history (historia oculus), he usually added the ancient historical names of countries and cities to the modern ones.

To the atlas he appended a geographical dictionary which contained both the ancient and modern names. More important for us than this addition is the appended catalogue of maps (Catalogus auctorum tabularum geographicarum), in which appear the names and works of ninety-nine cartographers who lived before 1570. As concerning many of these cartographers we have no other knowledge than that contained in this catalogue, and as Ortelius utilized forty-six of the maps mentioned by him, this little list is of-day one of the most important sources for a history of cartography. Later on this "Theatrum" was enlarged and improved. In 1593 there were 157, in 1612 no less than 166 maps, while the list of authors reached 183 for the time up to 1595; antiquated maps were replaced by more modern ones, or changed according to the more accurate reports forwarded for the most part by missionaries, and it soon appeared not only in the Latin language, but also in Dutch, High German, Italian, and French translations. Very numerous were the smaller editions and extracts in the various languages.

A few years later appeared in Venice a "Trento del Mondo di Abramo Ortelio" ('Die Welt von Abraom Ortelio'). This "Theatrum" had been dedicated to the Spanish king Philip II by Ortelius, the latter was given the title of a Royal Geographer (geographus regius). His contemporaries honoured him as the "Ptolemy of his century".

Separate from his atlas Ortelius published in 1587 the "Thesaurus geographicus", which possesses to this day considerable value as a dictionary of old geography. In the form of a letter to his friend Gerhard Mercator, Ortelius published in 1575 his "Unicirriculum per nonnullas Galliae Belgicae partis", which contains forty-six valuable maps from Ortelius's maps. This atlas was issued in Belgium, but which is chiefly valuable on account of its philologico-archaeological importance. One of the fruits of his restless activity as a collector of archaeological specimens was his pamphlet: "Deorum, Deorumque Capita e veteribus numismatibus" (1575). He had a copy which contains a number of rare and widely admired archaeological collection. In his "Aurei seculi imagos Sive Germanorum veterum norem, ritus et religio delineata et commentariis ex utriusque linguae scriptoribus descritta", he gives a short commentary to the works of ancient writers on Germany, illustrated with ten engravings. Despite the great honour freely accorded to Ortelus, he remained humble and modest. "Until his very end he was", as F. Ratzeil says, "a good Catholic and had particularly many friends among the Jesuits". True to his motto, "Contemno et orio [munundum, mente, manu] Ortelius, unmaried and earnest, remained above the petty vanities which distanced so often to rest." "Quietus cultor sine lute, uxor. prole" is written on his tombstone in the Pramonstratensian abbey at Antwerp. This epitaph was written by Justus Lipsius. The "Theatrum orbis terrarum", especially the introduction to the first posthumous edition, Ratzeil in Allg. deutshe Beggr., XXIV, 42-33; Hesse, Ereclio Landesa-Bahns Archiv, I. Orthodox Church, the technical name for the body of Christians who use the Byzantine Rite in various languages and are in union with the Patriarch of Constantinople but in schism with the Pope of Rome. The epithet Orthodox ( ὀρθοδοξός), meaning "right believer", is, naturally, claimed by people of every religion. It is almost exactly a Greek form of the official title of the chief enemies of the Greeks, i.e. the Moslems (μουσλίν, fideles). The Monophysite Armenians call themselves aghapar, meaning exactly the same thing. How "Orthodox" became the proper name of the Eastern Church it is difficult to say. It was used at first, long before the schism of Photius, especially in the East, but also in the West, but rather as the antithesis to the Eastern heretics—Nestorians and Monophysites. Gradually, although of course both East and West always claimed both names, "Catholic" became the most common name for the original Church in the West, "Orthodox" in the East. It would be very difficult to find the right name for this Church. "Eastern" is too vague, the Nestorians and Monophysites are Eastern Churches; "Schismatic" has the same disadvantage. "Greek" is really the least expressive of all. The Greek Church is only one, and a very small one, of the sixteen Churches that make up this vast communion. The millions of Russians, Bulgars, Rumanians, Arabs, and so on who belong to it are Greek in no sense at all. According to their common custom one may add the word "Eastern" to the title and speak of the Orthodox Eastern Church ('ἡ ὀρθωδόξα πατριαρχική ἐκκλησία). The Orthodox, then, are the Christians in the East of Europe, in Egypt and Asia, who accept the Cosmic Eucharist, whereas the Nestorians and the Monophysites (Nestorians or Monophysites), but who, as the result of the schisms of Photius (ninth cent.) and Cæsarius (eleventh cent.), are not in communion with the Catholic Church. There is no common authority obeyed by all, or rather it is only the authority of "Christ and Orthodoxy, Ἰσθροσία, signifies right belief or purity of faith. Right belief is not merely subjective, as resting on personal knowledge and convictions, but is in accordance with the teaching and direction of an absolute extrinsic authority. This authority is the Church, and the Church's peace, by the decrees of the Holy Ghost. If, therefore, is orthodoxy, whose faith coincides with the teachings of the Catholic Church. As divine revelation forms the deposit of faith entrusted to the Church for man's salvation, it also, with the truths clearly deduced from it, forms the object and content of orthodoxy. Although the term orthodoxy or orthodoxy does not occur in the Scriptures, its meaning is repeatedly insisted on. Thus Christ proclaims the necessity of faith unto salvation (Mark, xvi, 16). St. Paul, emphasizing the same injunction in terms more specific, teaches "one Lord, one faith, one baptism" (Eph., iv, 5, 6). Again, when directing Titus in his ministerial labors, he admonishes him to speak in accord with "sound doctrine" (Tit., ii, 1). And not only does St. Paul lay stress on the soundness of the doctrine to be preached, but he also directs attention to the form in which it must be delivered: "Hold the form of sound words which thou hast heard of me in faith" (1 Tim., i, 13). Consistent with the teachings and method of Christ and the Apostles, the Faith, of necessity and necessity, has been preserved undiminished the deposit of revelation. "Neither in the confusion of paganism," says St. Augustine, "nor in the defilement of heresy, nor in the lethargy of schism, nor yet in the blindness of Judaism is religion to be sought; but among those alone who are called Catholic Christians, or the orthodox, that is, the custodians of sound doctrine and followers of right teaching" (De Vera Relig. cap. v). Fulgentius writes: "I rejoice that with no tint of perfidy you are solicitous for the true faith, without which no conversion is of any avail, nor can at all exist" (De Vera Fide ad Petrum, Proleg.). The Church, likewise, in its zeal for purity of faith, has been rigorously adhered to the example set by the Apostles and early Fathers. This is manifest in its whole history, but especially in such champions of the faith as Athanasius, in councils, condemnations of heresy, and its definitions of revealed truth. That orthodox faith is requisite for salvation is a defined doctrine of the Church. Whosoever believes the Apostles' Creed, "must first of all hold integral and inviolate the Catholic faith, without which he shall surely be eternally lost". Numerous Councils and papal decisions have reiterated this doctrine (cf. Council of Florence, Denz., 714; Prof. of Faith of Pius IV, Denz., 1000; condemnation of Indulgencism and Latinismarianism in the Syll. of Pius IX, Denz., 1715, 1718; Council of the Vatican, De Fide", can. vi, Denz., 1851; condemnation of the Modernistic position regarding the nature and origin of dogma, Enece, "Pascendi Dominici Gregis", 1907, Denz., 2079). While truth must be intolerant of error (II Cor., vi, 14, 15), the Church does not deny the possibility of salvation of these earnest and sincere persons outside her fold who live and die in invincible ignorance of her faith, but repudiates the doctrine of the Church as foundation and of Papal infallibility. Orthodoxy, Feast (or Sunday) of, the first Sunday of the Great Forty days (Lent) in the Byzantine Calendar (sixth Sunday before Easter), kept in memory of the final defeat of Iconoclasm and the restoration of the holy icons to the churches on 19 February (which was the first Sunday of Lent, 1S2 (see Iconoclasts). A perpetual feast on the anniversary of that day was ordained by the Synod of Constantinople, and is one of the great feasts of the year among Orthodox and Byzantine Uniates. The name "Orthodoxy" has gradually affected the character of the feast. Originally commemorating only the defeat of Iconoclasm, the word was gradually understood in a more general sense to all heresies and异andas, and although its first occasion is not forgotten, the feast has become one in honour of the true Faith in general. This is shown by its special service. After the Orthros and before the holy Liturgy a procession is made with crosses and pictures to some destined spot (often merely round the church). Meanwhile a Canon, attributed to St. Theodore of Studium, is sung at the place, the Synodikon is read. This Synodikon begins with the memory of certain saints, confessors, and heroes of the faith, to each of whom the people cry out: "Eternal Memory!" (άνωμα προσφόρα) three times. Then follows a long list of heretics of all kinds, to each of which the answer is: "Anathema one or thrice. The heretics comprise all the old offenders of any reputation, Arians, Nestorians, Monophysites, Monothelites, Iconoclasts, and so on. Then comes again "Eternal Memory" to certain pious emperors, from Constantine on. There is inevitably considerable difference between the Orthodox and Uniate List. The Orthodox, Conciliar, and anti-Roman patriarchs and many schismatic emperors. They curse Honorius among the Monothelites, the opponents of Hesychasm. The Unia Synodikon is purged of these names. In Russia politics have their place in the Synodikon; the emperor and his family are acclaimed; all are cursed who deny the divine right of the Russian monarchy and all who "dare to stir up insurrection and rebellion against it." The text of the Canon, Synodikon, etc., and the rubries will be found in either Triodion, Orthodox or Uniat.

Orthosias, a titular see of Phocia Prima, suffragan of Tyre. The city is mentioned for the first time in I Mach., xv, 57, as a Phoenician port (1 V., Orthosias; Pliny (Hist. Nat., V, xvi) places it between Tripoli, on the south, and the River Eleutherus, on the north; Strabo (Geographia, XVI, ii, 12, 15), near the Eleutherus: Peutinger's "Table," agreeing with Hierocles, George of Cyprus, and others, indicates it between Tripoli and Antaradus. L. Quien (Oriens Christ., I, 825) mentions it as finished with Phosphorus in the fifth century. Two Latin titulaires of the fourteenth century appear in Eubel, Hierarchia cath. medii aevi", 1, 396. Ortolano Ferraresi, painter of the Ferrara School, was born in Ferrara, about 1400; d. about 1529. His real name was Giovanni Battista Benvenuti, and he was called L'Ortolano because his father, Francesco, was a gardener. Of his career little is known, save that he was a diligent student of the works of Raphael and Bagnacavallo in 1512-13 at Bologna. His masterpiece, a picture of rich colour and line draughtsmanship, representing Saint Sebastian, Saint Roch, and Saint Demetrius, is in the National Gallery, London. It was brought from the church of Bondenio near Ferrara in 1814, and purchased by the gallery in 1861. In the cathedral at Ferrara are other works attributed to him, which later critics have given to Garofalo, but in some of the smaller churches of Ferrara, those of San Nicolo and San Lorenzo, the works may be rightly accepted as his. His work so resembles that of Garofalo that there is a never-ceasing controversy between the critics who accept the respective claims of each, and nearly as much dispute has arisen over his works as over those of Giorgione. There is a fine picture usually accepted as his, in the possession of Lord Wimborne in England, and this shows very strongly the influence upon the painter of Lorenzo Costa. Two of his paintings are in the gallery at Ferrara, and others at Naples and Berlin, while there are several similar works in private possession in Ferrara.

Orval (Aurea Vallis, Gueldenthal), formerly a Cistercian abbey in Belgian Luxembourg, Diocese of Trier, was founded in 1134 by Benvenuto de Orval, a monk of the monastery of Calabria, who left in 1110 to be succeeded by Canons Regular. These were replaced in 1152 by Cistercians from the newly founded monastery of Tre Fontane. Their first abbott Constantine had been a disciple of St. Bernard of Clairvaux, dying in the repute of holiness after fourteen years. Owing to the industry and frugality of the monks, and the competent management of the abbots, Orval became exceptionally rich. In 1750 it owned no less than 300 town, villages, and manors, and had an annual income of 1,200,000 livres. In proportion to its riches was its charity towards the poor. Under the leadership of able and pious abbots its discipline was always in a flourishing condition, with the exception of a short period towards the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century, when the storms of the Reformation raged in the Netherlands. Abbot Bernard de Montguillard (1605-28), who was famous for piety and learning, restored the dying discipline by drawing up new statutes for the monastery. After a short interruption during the Thirty Years' War, the reform which Bernard had introduced was zealously carried out by the succeeding abbots, especially by Carl von Benzeradt (1665-1707), who also founded the abbey of Düsselthal in 1707. The doctrines of Jansenius were espoused by a few monks early in the eighteenth century, but, happily, those who were imbued with them had to leave the monastery in 1725. The abbey and its church fell a prey to the ravages of the French Revolution in 1793. In the literary field the monks of Orval did not distinguish themselves in any Christian manner. The only noteworthy writer was Giles d'Orval, who lived in the first half of the thirteenth century. He wrote the continuation to the year 1251, of the "Gesta Pontificum Leodiensium", which had been written up to the year 1048 by Henger of Luxemburg and Amscan of Lüne (Mon. Germ. Script., XXI, 1129).

MICHAEL OTT.

Orvieto, Diocese of (Urbivetana), in Central Italy. The city stands on a rugged mass of tuft, near the rivers Paglia and Chiana, the swamps of which were drained by Sixtus V. Some believe this town to be the ancient Hebron or Oropitum; others, e. g. Müller and Camurri, hold that it was the primitive port (therefore Orbis vetus, or old city) of the Etruscan city of Volsinii, destroyed by the Romans. The first certain date, and rebuilt on the site of the present Bolsena which gives its name to the largest lake of the Italian peninsula. In the country around Orvieto there are many Etruscan tombs. The name of Urbis Vetus appears for the first time in Procopius, corrupted into Urbeventum; it is also found in the writings of St. Gregory the Great.

During the Gothic War, Orvieto was defended by the Goths for a long time. Later, it fell into the hands of the Lombards (606). From the latter end of the tenth century the city was governed by consuls, who, however, took the oath of fealty to the bishop; but from 1201 it governed itself through podestas (at that year, the Bishop Richard) and a captain of the people. On account of its position, Orvieto was often chosen by the popes as a place of refuge and Adrian IV fortified it. A "Studium Generale" was granted to the city by Gregory XI in 1337. In the middle of the thirteenth century, bitter feuds arose between the Filipsesi and the Monaldeschi families, and were not quelled until the city came under the rule of Ermanno Monaldeschi, whom Cardinal Albornoz reduced to obedience to the Holy See. One of the first convents of the Dominican Order was built at Orvieto (1220); and in 1288 there was founded in the town the monastery of St. Pietro Paraonzo. The martyrdom of St. Pietro Paraonzo took place at Orvieto; he was a Roman whom Innocent III had sent to govern the city with a view to suppressing the Patarian movement that Ermanno of Parma and Gottardo of Marsi had roused in the town.

The cathedral of Orvieto is one of the most beautiful churches in Italy; it was begun in 1290, and is of the Gothic style, with three naves; its tripartite façade was a conception of Lorenzo Maitani, and is embellished in its lower portion with scenes from the Old and New Testaments, and in its upper part with mosaics and statues of the Blessed Virgin, the Prophets, and the Apostles. The walls in the interior of the edifice are built of layers of Travertine marble and of basalt; the choir is adorned with frescoes, illustrating the life of the Blessed Virgin; they are by Ugolino di Prete Iario, Peter di Puccio, and Anthony of Viterbo; the stalls of the choir are of inlaid wood. The chapel on the right, called Our Lady of San Brizio, was built after the Angel's apparition to Bernardino of Fossombrone (Christ Glorified), "Last Judgment", and "The Prophets", done in 1447) and by Luca Signorelli ("Fall of Antichrist", "Resurrection of the Dead", "Damned and Blessed", etc.; Michelangelo took inspiration from these paintings for his "Last Judgment" of the Sistine Chapel; there is, also, by Signorelli, the "Burial of Jesus”, and there are several sculptures by Sezza (1572), among them the group of the Pietà, disposition from a single block of marble. The chapel on the opposite side, called “of the Corporal”, contains the large reliquary in which is preserved the corporal of the miracle of Bolsena (see below). This receptacle was made by order of Bishop Bertrand dei Mandolese, by the Sienese Ipolomodi Maestro Vieti (1537); it is of silver, adorned with enamelling that represents the Passion of Jesus and the miracle: the frescoes of the walls, by Ugolino (1357-64), also represent the miracle.

In the palace of the popes, built by Boniface VIII, is the civic museum, which contains Etruscan antiquities and works of art that are, for the greater part, from the cathedral. Among the other notable churches of Orvieto are San Giovenale, which contains remnants of ancient frescoes, and San Andrea, which has a dodecagon tower; in 1220 Pierre d’Artois was consecrated King of Jerusalem by Honorius III in this church.

The first known Bishop of Orvieto was John (about 590), and in 591 appears a Bishop Candidus; among its other prelates were Constantino Medici, O.P., sent by Alexander IV in 1255 to Greece, where he died; Francesco Monaldeschi (1280), who did much for the construction of the cathedral. In 1528 Clement VII sought refuge at Orvieto, and while there ordered the construction of the “Pozzo di San Patrizio” (the well of St. Patrick), by Sangallo. Bishop Sebastiano Vanni (1562) distinguished himself at the Council of Trent and built the reliquary, which was enlarged afterwards by Cardinal Fausto Polo (1615) and by Giacomo Silvestri, the latter of whom gave to it the college and other property of the Jesuits (1773-78); Cardinal Paolo Antanori (1784) carried on the history of the cathedral of Orvieto to be written by Girolamo della Valle, and lastly G. B. Lambreschi (1867).

With the See of Orvieto has been united from time immemorial that of Bolsena (the ancient Volsinii), of the ruins of which there are still the remnants of the temple of Nortia, of the “Thermæ”, or hot baths, of Scurana, of the mausoleum of L. Canusius, etc. According to Pliny, 2900 statues were taken to Rome from Volsinii, when the latter was destroyed in 254 B.C. by the Romans. Bolsena had much to suffer from the neighbouring lords (Vico, Bisciano, Corbara, etc.), and from the Orvietans, who claimed dominion over it; while, in 1377, the town was sacked by the adventurer Hawkwood (Acuto). On the Island of Martana, in the lake near by, Anakastia, daughter of Theodoricus and wife of Theodatus, was strangled.

To this island, in the sixth century, was transferred the body of St. Christina, a virgin and martyr of Bolsena (297), but it was later returned to the city; the church of this saint contains a reclining statue of her by Luca della Robbia; annexed to the church is an ancient Christian cemetery, and ancient Christian inscriptions are numerous at Bolsena. Three bishops of Volsinii are known: Gaudentius (499), Candidus (601), who, it appears, is not the Bishop of Orvieto of that name, and Agnellus (689).

The Miracle of Bolsena is not supported by strong historical evidence, and its tradition is not altogether consistent; the presence of a relic of the body of theVirgin in the church of Santa Maria la Vetere, which was founded in 1200 by Urban II, was referred to by the historians of that period as a sign of divine grace, and the miracle of the corporal is mentioned by them in connection with the visit of Pope Urban to the city. The legend of the corporal was first recorded by Antia (1528), and later by other writers.

In 1341 Clement VI, referring to this matter in a Brief, uses only the words “propter miraculum aliquod” (Pennazzu, 367); Gregory XI, in a Brief of 25 June, 1337, gives a short account of the miracle; and abundant reference to it is found later on (1455), in the sermons of the Dominican preacher Leonardo Mattei of Udine (“In festo Corp. Christi”, xiv, ed.

Cathedral, Orvieto
Designed by Lorenzo Matrana (1275-1339)

Papal Palace, Orvieto
Erected by Pope Boniface VIII (1294-1303)
Venice, 1652, 59) and by St. Antoninus of Florence ("Chronica", III, 19, xni, 1), the latter, however, does not say (as the local legend recites) that the priest doubted the Real Presence of Christ in the Holy Eucharist, but, merely that a few drops from the chalice fell upon the corporal. For the rest, a similar legend of the "blood-stained corporal" is quite frequent in the legendaries of even earlier date than the fourteenth century, and coincides with the great Eucharistic polemics of the ninth to the twelfth centuries. The reddish spots on the corporal of Bolsena, upon close observation, show the profile of a face of the type by which the Saviour is traditionally represented.

Ory, MATTHEW, inquisitor and theologian, b. at La Caune, 1192; d. at Paris, 1557. Entering the Dominican Order at the age of eighteen, he studied in the convent of St-Jacques, Paris, and at the Sorbonne, obtaining the licentiate in theology, 6 February, 1527. His reputation for learning and eloquence led to his appointment as grand inquisitor for France (1531), an office which he held until his death. Compelled to pronounce upon false accusations made against Saint Ignatius Loyola and "The Spiritual Exercises," he detected the fraud of the calumniators. Instead of condemning the saint, he praised and assisted him, and kept for himself a copy of the Exercises. He was indefatigable in preaching the Word of God, held several offices in his order, and combated false doctrines and evil-doing. Some writers erroneously call Ory a Spaniard and write his name Ortiz. The only fully authenticated printed work of Ory is his "Alexipharmacum" (Paris, 1544; Venice, 1551-58). In the second part he uses against the heretics five words of St. Paul, viz. grace, justification, sin, liberty, law (no exclusive reference to I Cor., xiv, 19). Other works attributed to him are "Opusculum de imaginibus," and "Septem schola contra hereticos," but Echard does not assign the places or dates of their publication.

QUEZEN AND ECHARD, Scriptores Ord. Praed., I (Paris, 1721), 162; SIXTUS SERNESIUS, Bibliotheca Sacra (Venice, 1566; Lyons, 1591); ORLANDINI, Historia Societatis Jean pars prima, sin Ignatius (Rome, 1615); THOMSON, Saint Ignatius Loyola (London, 1910), hold of the Buddhists during the bloody persecution to which they were subjected under Nebunaga. All efforts to dislodge them failed until, in obedience to the order of the emperor, they yielded up possession of the town in 1580. The true founder of the modern prosperity and importance of Osaka was undoubtedly Hideyoshi (see Japan). Recognizing that the strategic position of the town would enable him to dominate the daimeños of the south and west, he determined to make Osaka his capital, and built on the site of the great Buddhist monastery the Castle of Osaka—an admirable example of old Japanese architecture. The palace which he built within this castle has been placed by some authorities among the most glorious the world has ever seen; it was deliberately burned by the Tokugawa party in 1868, before they retreated to Yedo (now Tokio). Hideyoshi devoted himself sedulously to the improvement of the town, laying out new streets and causing the wealthy merchants of Fushimi and Sakai to immigrate thither. Situated in the middle of the richest agricultural district of Japan, the growth of Osaka has been uneasing during the last three centuries, although its commercial supremacy was for a time imperilled when the seat of government was transferred from Kioto to Yedo (1868). In 1871 a mint was established in Osaka, its management being entrusted to European officials. The port was opened to foreign trade in 1568, but, as the harbor was poor and unsuitable for large vessels, Kobe (20 miles west) attracted most of the foreign commerce especially after the establishment of railway connection between the cities in 1873. At present, however, an extensive scheme of improvement to render the port commodious for large vessels is being executed, and, on its completion, Osaka will take first place in foreign, as in internal commerce. Judging from the rapid growth of its population (821,235 in 1898; 1,226,590 in 1908), Osaka should be in the near future the real metropolis of Japan. Intersected by a myriad of canals, the city is often called the "Venice of the East" while its numerous industries, among which cotton-spinning occupies a leading position, has won it the title of the "Manchester of Japan".

The diocese embraces the territory stretching from Lake Biwa and the confines of the imperial provinces of Jetchidzen, Mino, and Owari to the western shores of the island of Nippon, together with the adjacent islands (except Shikoku) belonging to this territory. While it was St. Francis Xavier's intention to proceed directly to Miako (the modern Kioto), then the religious and political capital of Japan, it was not until 1599 that Christianity was first preached in the territory by Father Gaspar Vilela, S.J., founder of the Church of Osaka, and the first European capable of accommodating the number of monks and lay brothers. The Jesuits gave this church a more or less permanent form and improved its construction. Henceforth, Father Vilela, with the help of his coadjutors, endeavored to establish a college, a house of studies for the education of the young natives, and a hospital for lepers in Miako. In the next year Francisians established the Convent of Bethlehem in Osaka. (Concerning the persecution following the San Felipe incident see JAPAN; NAGASAKI, DIocese OF.)

From Hideyoshi's death (1598) to 1613, the Church in Japan enjoyed comparative peace. At the court of Hide- yoshi the Jesuits, and later on the Franciscans, several of whom commanded his troops during the bombardment of Osaka (1615), a list of the Christians in Miako, Fushimi, Osaka, and Sakai having been drawn up in 1613, a decree was published at Miako on 11 Feb., 1614, ordering all to depart within five days. For details of the persecution, for which this decree was the signal and which within twenty-five years annihilated the Church in Japan, consult Deplaise, "La Catholiquerie au Japon", II (Mecchin, 1909). The first church in Osaka after the reopening of Japan to foreigners was erected by Father Consin (now Bishop of Nagasaki) in 1649. The aggressiveness of the Japanese and the general laxity of morals constitute formidable obstacles to the growth of Christianity. The mission is entrusted to the Paris Society of Foreign Missions. It was erected into a diocese on 16 March, 1868, the presiding bishop being Mgr Jules Chatron (elected 23 July, 1896). According to the latest statistics the diocese counts: 27 missionaries (3 native), 4 Marianneite Brothers, 37 catechists, 16 sisters, 34 stations, 32 churches, 24 oratories, 4 schools with 419 pupils, 1 high-school with 100 pupils, 5 orphanages with 228 inmates, 32 hospitals, 3711 Christians. For bibliography, see JAPAN and NAGASAKI.

THOMAS KENNEDY.

O Salutaris Hostia (O Saving Host), the first line of the penultimate stanza of the hymn, "Verbum supramunum prodien", composed by St. Thomas Aquinas for the Hour of Lauds in the Office of the Feast of Corpus Christi. This stanza and the final stanza, or doxology (Un triumque dominno), have been selected to form a separate hymn for Benediction of the Most Blessed Sacrament. Usually, and most appropriately, it is begun either at one o'clock (seven hundred and fifteen natives and fifteen bonzes, a plot against his life necessitated his temporary withdrawal, and the civil war, which for some years devastated the capital, afforded little opportunity for cultivating further the seeds of Christianity. Peace being restored, Christianity began again to make headway, and in September, 1582, we find five churches erected in the vicinity of the capital. By 1574 the number of faithful included many in the shogun's palace and even one of his brothers-in-law. Between 1577 and 1579 the converts in the Miako region were estimated at between 9000 and 10,000. In 1582 the central provinces contained 25,000 faithful, ministered to by five fathers and nine brothers of the Jesuit Order. When Hideyoshi determined to transfer the seat of government from Kioto to Osaka, Father Organino, S.J., in accordance with the advice of Justus Ukodono, a Christian noble, petitioned the Taiko for a site for a church. His request was granted and the first church in Osaka, opened at Christmas, 1583. By 1586 the number of nobles who had joined the faith was sixty-five. On the issue of the Taiko's edict banishing the missionaries and closing the churches (see JAPAN), there were in the eighteen leagues between Miako and Sakai twenty churches and 35,000 faithful. Though no European met with martyrdom during the first persecution, the sufferings of the Christians were terrible; fifty churches and eight residences of the Jesuits in the central provinces were burned, although the churches in Osaka, Miako, and Sakai were spared. Henceforth until the Taiko's death the ministry had to be carried on secretly. In 1593 the Franciscan embassy from the Philippines arrived, and erected the Church of Our Lady of Portuensch and a hospital for lepers in Miako. In the next year Francisians established the Convent of Bethlehem in Osaka. The plain-song melody in the eighth mode is beautiful, and forms the theme of de la Rue's musical tour de force in the Mass of that title. The modern settings have been very numerous, although not always serviceable, mass many as many are too theatrical for church use; others are entirely for solo use, and still others probably violate the prescription of the Motu Proprio of 22 November, 1903, requiring that in hymns the traditional form be preserved. There are about twenty-peto poetic versions of the hymn in English.

H. T. HENRY.

Osbold, King of Northumbria, d. 799. Symeon of Durham (Historia Regum) tells us that when Ecgfrid, a pious and just king, took up the reins of government in Northumbria on the expulsion of Ethelfled, Osbold with another elderman named Athelheard collected a force early in 780 at Seletune (probably Silton in the North Riding of Yorkshire), and set fire to the house of Bearn, whom Huntingdon and Wendorf call the king's justice. In 793 the deacon Alcuin addressed an affectionate but forcible letter to King Ethelred, Osborne, whom he called "his dear and beloved children," urging them to flee from vices which lead to destruction and practise virtues by which we ascend to heaven. He points out the terrible lesson to be learnt from the iniquities and consequent destruction of former rulers. When King Ethelbert, who had been liberated from exile and reigned seven years, was murdered on 19 April, 796, at Corbie or Corbywhye (Corbridge), Osbald, the "patrician" was chosen by some of the nobles of his nation as king, but, after a reign of only twenty-seven days, deserted by all the royal following and the nobles, he fled and took refuge with a few others on the island of Lindisfarne. Earl Edwin then sent to him from Earl Edwin at St. Peter's, York, and reigned for the next ten years. Probably, when at Lindisfarne, Osbald received the letter sent to him in 796 by Alcuin. In this the latter states that for more than two years he had endeavoured to persuade Osbald to assume the monastic habit and fulfil the vow he had taken; but now he had gained a still worse reputation and more unhappy events had befallen him. He suspects him further of the murder of Ethelred, besides shedding the blood of nobles and people alike. He urges him not to add sin to sin by attempting his restoration to power. It would be more to his shame to lose his soul than to desert his impious comrades. Rather he should hasten to the monastery in order to gain the reward not only of his own conversion, but that of others who are in exile with him. Finally he begs him frequently to have his letter read to him. Alcuin's advice bore fruit and Osbald with some brethren sailed from Lindisfarne to the land and king of the Piets. He became an abbot and, on his death, was buried in the church at York.

Osbaldston. Edward, Venerable, English martyr, b. about 1590; hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, 16 November, 1691. Son of Thomas Osbaldeston, and nephew of Edward Osbaldeston, of Osbaldeston Hall, Blackburn, Lancashire, he went to the English College of Douai, then at Reims, where he was ordained deacon in December, 1593, and priest 21 October, 1593. He was sent on a mission 27 April, 1593, and was apprehended at night through the instrumentality of an aposite priest named Thomas Clark at an inn at Tollerton, Yorkshire, upon St. Jerome's day, 30 September, 1593. He had said his first Mass on the feast day of St. Jerome, and in consequence had a great devotion to the saint. The day following his arrest he was taken to York, where he was tried at the next assizes and attainted of high treason for being a priest. Bishop Challoner prints the greater part of a letter addressed by the martyr to his fellow-prisoners in York Castle, the full text of which is still extant, and which reveals his love of study and serene trust in God with which he anticipated his death.

Osbem, hagiographer, sometimes confused with Osbert de Cler alias Osbern de Westminster, b. at Canterbury and brought up by Godric, who was dean from 1658-80. He became a monk, and later, prior of Christ Church, and was ordained by Archbishop Lanfranc. He died probably between 1088 and 1089. He was very skilled in music and is said to have written two treatises "De re musicâ," and "De vocum consonantia." (Fétis, "Biog. Music.""). Paris, 1870, VI, 353.

2. "Vita S. Dunstani" and "Liber Miraculorum Sancti Dunstani," written in 1070; printed in Mabillon op. cit., see, v. 641-84; in "Acta SS.", May, IV, 559; in P., CXXXVII, 457; and in Stubbs, "Memorials of St. Dunstan," ed. by Hall (London, 1864), 84, is probably the work of Eadmer.

3. "Vita S. Odonii archiepiscopi Cantuariensis." From William of Malmesbury's "Gesta Ponti," in Rolls Series 1870, p. 21, we learn that Osbern wrote Odno's life, but the work has perished; the life in P., CXXXIII, 831 and Mabillon, op. cit., see, v. 287 is not his. Wharton, in his "Anglia Sacra" (London, 1841), 75-87 published a life of St. Breguin which was wrongly attributed to him.

S. ANSELM PARKER.

Oscott (St. Mary's College).—In 1793, a number of the Catholic nobility and gentry of England formed a committee for the establishment of a school for the education of their sons and the clergy in an English atmosphere. The buildings at Oscott, intended for the bishop's residence, were accepted for the projected institution by agreement with Bishop Thomas Talbot, Vicar Apostolic of the Midland District. Oscott (anciently Auscot) is a hamlet in the Perry Barr township, in the parish of Handsworth, about four miles north of Birmingham, and at the extreme south of Staffordshire. A mission had been founded there at the close of the seventeenth century by Andrew Brownewich, a confessor of the faith.

Dr. John Bew, sometime president of St. Gregory's College, Paris, was nominated president in February, 1791. The first three boys entered in May, and the establishment was formally opened as college for priests and ecclesiastics under the joint management of a committee of laymen and the bishop of the district. Structural additions were made, and the total number of boys rose to thirty-five. The outlook was gloomy, and when in 1808, the college with its liabilities was offered to Bishop Milner, he accepted it not without reluctance. Thus ended the "Old Government". The "New Government", under Milner's strenuous guidance, with Thomas Potts as president (1808-15) and Thomas Walsh (afterwards bishop of the district) as spiritual director, speedily changed the aspect of affairs. Milner invigorated the discipline, and improved the studies and ecclesiastical points; important additions were made to the building, and the chapel of the Sacred Heart, the first on English soil, was opened in 1820. Francis Quick, a convert, held the office of president from 1816 to 1818. On the death of Bishop Milner in 1828, the president, Thomas Walsh (1818-1826) became Vicar Apostolic of the Midland District, and Henry Salmon, president (1825-40). Under the direction of the pious and courteous Wealdal, the man who more than any other created the spirit of Oscott, the institution progressed till the buildings were no longer able to accommodate the number of pupils. Plans of a new college, on the lines of Wadham College, Oxford, were prepared by Joseph Potter, the cathedral architect of Lichfield. A rich and providential bequest, together with the gifts of the clergy and faithful, supplied the means; and in less than three years a stately Gothic pile arose on an eminence two miles from the old college. The new edifice is situated at the extreme north of Warwickshire, and dedicated to the Holy Cross; and was built on a piece of ground overgrown with heather and gorse at the edge of the Sutton Coldfield common. The name of Oscott has been transferred to the new site, previously associated with the name of Jordan's Grave. Bishop Wiseman succeeded Weedall in 1810. His reputation as a scholar and his knowledge of men and affairs, led to his appointment in the early days of the Oxford Movement most opportune. During the forties and onwards, Oscott afforded the incoming clergy from the Establishment a welcome, a home, and a place of study. In those years we meet with the names of Le Page Renouf, St. George Mivart, John Brandon Morris, H. M. Walker, T. Wilkinson, H. H. Haigh, C. Chelmondy, E. Esteurt, B. Smith, Augustus Welby Pugin, himself a convert, taught and worked at Oscott. The saintly Passionist Father Dominic was received there when he came over from Italy to convert England in November, 1840. Father Ignatius Spencer resided and exercised a fruitful apostolate in the college. Father Newman referred gratefully to the fact that just after he had been received into the Church by Father Dominic at Littlemore, he "at once found himself welcomed and housed at Oscott." In February, 1846, Newman and his community removed to Old Oscott at the suggestion of Bishop Wiseman. Newman called the college "Littlemore," a name which it still bears. There they remained till 1849.

Henry F. C. Logan was president from 1847 to 1848. John Moore from 1848 to 1853, and Mgr. Weedall from 1853 to 1859. The first Provincial Synod of the restored hierarchy of Westminster took place at Oscott in 1850, and in 1851, the Provincial Synod at Westminster. Newman preached the sermon entitled "The Second Spring." The second and third Provincial Synods were likewise held there in 1855 and 1859. After the presidency of George Morgan (1850-60) a distinguished period in the life of the college opened in the autumn of 1860, with the appointment of James Spencer as Rector. A gentleman of ideal education, brought up amid the culture of Oxford, and since his conversion in 1846 saturated with the spirit of ancient Christian Rome, he was eminently the man for the time. He developed the scholastic work of the college, and brought it into line with the non-Catholic public schools. In 1863 Cardinal Wiseman and Mgr. Morgan took part in the celebration of the golden jubilee of the new college. After Northcote's retirement in 1877 on account of ill health, John Hawkins (1857-80), Edward Acton (1880-1), and Mgr. J. H. Souther (1886-9) carried on and expanded the tradition they had inherited. But a new fashion, the memory of the J. J. Fugger, the Northcote trial, and the two outbreaks of sickness in the sixties, and the opening of the Oratory School at Edgbaston (May, 1859) under the direction of Dr. Newman, told against them. The roll of students declined steadily, and notwithstanding the enthusiastic celebration of the golden jubilee of the new college in 1868, the venerable institution was closed in July, 1879, to be opened in the September following as the ecclesiastical seminary for the Diocese of Birmingham.

The high prestige which St. Mary's College enjoyed for so long a time is due to the number of distinguished families of England, Ireland, and other countries, whose sons were educated within its walls, and to the solid ground on which its reputation rested. The names of Regius professors were recognised. Oscott counts among its alumni one cardinal and twenty bishops, many members of Parliament, and others distinguished in the diplomatic and military services.

In accord with the movement promoted by the early provincial synods of Westminster, Bishop Ullathorne established in 1873 the Birmingham diocesan seminary at Oscott. Under the new bishopship, Oscott became the centre of Birmingham, and was placed under the care of the Rev. Edward Hailey (henceforth known as "Apostle Hailey") over it as rector, while he himself personally directed its spirit. The institution flourished, though the number of students averaged but twenty. Meanwhile Oscott maintained its own school of philosophers and theologians. Oscott, like Oldton, suffered from financial strain. With a held stroke Bishop Hailey closed Oscott as a mixed college, sold the seminary buildings and estate, and gathered all his seminarists and teaching staff into the one greater seminary of St. Mary's, Oscott. The new institution began with thirty-six students in September, 1889, under the rectorship of the bishop. Subjects from other dioceses arrived, and in a year or two a maximum of eighty-six was reached. This success, combined with the advantages of a central position, a splendid site, commodious buildings, a beautiful chapel, and a rich library, led in 1897 to the conversion of Oscott, on the urgent initiative of Cardinal Vaughan, into a central seminary for seven of the midland and southern dioceses of England with Mgr. Herzog. The College did its work well and progressively until the death of Cardinal Vaughan, when a new policy of concentration of diocesan resources commended itself to the ecclesiastical authorities, and the dissolution of the central seminary followed in 1909. From that date Oscott has continued its earlier work as the diocesan seminary, though admitting, as had been its custom, subjects from other dioceses. In the Birmingham seminary the lectures in theology and philosophy have invariably been given in Latin, and the usual scholastic discussions have supplemented the lectures. The course has been gradually improved by the extension of knowledge to the twenty-five years of the College, the establishment of scientific courses in connection with philosophy. Ascetical theology has been taught regularly since 1873. Hebrew, Greek, Elocution, the history of philosophy and of religion, and also social science take their proper places in the curriculum. "Recreative" lectures by outsiders are frequently given, and the "Exchange" lectures, delivered alternately at Stonyhurst and at Oscott by the professors of each institution, have provided fruitful opportunities of intercourse.

The interior aspect of the college is like a glimpse of the old Catholic world. The windows of the cloisters and refectory are blazoned with the armorial bearings of ancient Catholic families. The walls are adorned with some 290 oil paintings of the saints and martyrs. A gift of John, sixteenth Earl of Shrewsbury. Its libraries of 30,000 volumes include the "Harvington" library, dating back to the middle of the eighteenth century, the "Marini" library, purchased in Rome for the college in 1859 at the cost of £4,000, a valuable collection of early printed books, early books on the English Martyrs, the "Ravenna" collection, MSS, and pamphlets, and the "Forbes" collection of Oriental and other memoirs, consisting in all of sixty large folio volumes. Among the numerous treasures of ecclesiastical art may be mentioned the collection of embroidery of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, the silver-gilt monstrance by an Antwerp artist of 1517, valued at £2,000, and the massive bronze lectern (early sixteenth century) from St. Peter's Louvain, which is an artistic achievement of the highest excellence.

Osee.—Name and Country: Osee (Hesbä'—Salvation), son of Beer, was one of the Minor Prophets which he calls “the land,” whose king is for him “our king,” and the localities of which are familiar to him, while he speaks of Juda but seldom and does not even make mention of Jerusalem. He was contemporary with Amos and Hosea. He was prophesied during the reign of Jeroboam II in Israel, and in the time of Ozaiah, Joatham, Aehaz, and Ezechieus, kings of Juda, hence from about 750 to 725 B.C. The title, however, is not quite satisfactory and does not seem to be the original one, or, at least, to have been preserved in its primitive form. None of the historical allusions with which the prophecy is filled appears to be connected with any event later than the reign of Manahem (circa 715-715). There is nothing concerning the Syro-Ephraimitic war against Juda, nor the terrible intervention of Teghit-Pifer under Heli (734-733). The era of the Prophet, therefore, if it is to be judged from his writings, ought to be placed about 750-735: he was perhaps contemporaneous with the closing years of Amos and certainly with the first appearance of Isaiah. The reign of Jeroboam II was marked by great and glorious external prosperity; but this prosperity contributed to make the political and religious condition of the people to decline. Pagan sects and dissolution was approaching. Zachary, son of Jeroboam, was assassinated after a reign of six months. His murderer, Sollum, retained the sceptre but one month, and was put to death by Manumel, who occupied the throne for ten years, 745-735. Israel was fastening to its ruin, which was to be completed by the taunt of Nebuchadnezar 722.B.C.

The Book of Osee:—It always occupies the first place among the twelve minor prophets, most probably on account of its length. In point of time Amos preceded it. The book is divided into two distinct parts: cc. i-iii, and cc. iv-xiv. (1) In the first part, Osee relates no more his order of Yahweh, he told Gomer, a "wife of fornications," daughter of Debelam, in order to have of her "children of fornications"—symbols, on the one hand, of Israel, the unfaithful spouse who gave to Baal the homage due to Yahweh alone; and, on the other, figures of the children of Israel, who, in the eyes of Yahweh, are but adulterous children. The outcaste of the Good God against their guilty mother, whom he prepares to punish; while for the children themselves is reserved a fate in keeping with their origin. The first is named Jezebel—the reigning dynasty is about to expiate the blood shed by its ancestor Jehu in the valley of Jezreel. The second is a daughter, Le-Hukamah, "disgraced" by Yahweh, a thing disgraceful, if not monstrous. The third is called La-Amol, "not my people"—Yahweh will no longer recognize the children of Israel as his people. However, mercy will have the last word: Osee is commanded to receive Gomer again and to prepare her, by a temporary retirement, to renew conjugal intercourse—Israel was to prepare herself in captivity to resume with Yahweh the relationship of husband and wife.

Is the marriage of Osee historical or purely allegorical? The hypothesis most in favour at present says that the marriage is historical, and the grounds for it are, (1) the obvious sense of the narrative; (2) the absence of any symbolic sense in the words Gomer and Debelam; (3) that the second child is a daughter. It appears to us, however, with Davidson (Hastings, "Diet. of the Bible", 11, 421 seq.) and Van Hoonacker, that the first reason is not convincing. A careful reading of cc. i-iii discloses the fact that the action is extremely rapid, that the events are related merely in order to state a doctrine, and, moreover, they appear to take place within the single time requisite to one or two speeches. And yet, if these events are real, a large part of the Prophet’s life must have been spent in these unsavoury circumstances. And again, the names of the children appear to have been bestowed just at the time that their meaning was explained to the people. This is especially the case with regard to the last child: "Call his name, Not my people: for you are not my people, . . ." Another reason for doubting this hypothesis is that it is most difficult to suppose that God ordered the Prophet to take an unfaithful wife merely with a view to her being unfaithful and bearing him adulterous children. And how are we to explain the fact that the prophet retained her notwithstanding her adultery till after the birth of the third child, and again received her after she had been in the possession of another? The second child was a daughter may be explained by dramatic instinct, or by some other sufficiently plausible motive. There remain the names Gomer and Debelam. Van Hoonacker proposes as possible translations: consumption (immanent ruin), doomed to terrible scourges; or, top (of perversity), addicted to the cakes of figs (oblations offered to Baal). Nestle also translates Bath Debelam by daughter of the cakes of figs, but in the sense of a woman to be obtained at a small price (Zeits.für alttest. Wissenschaft, XXIX, 233 seq.). These are but conjectures; the obscurity may be due to our ignorance. Certain it is at least, that the allegorical meaning, adopted by St. Jerome, of the marriage of our Prophet is symbolically connected with the moral sense. The doctrinal meaning is identical in either case and that is the only consideration of real importance.

(b) The second part of the book is the practical and detailed application of the first. Van Hoonacker divides it into three sections, each of which terminated with a promise of salvation (iv-vii, vii, viii—ix, x, xi—xii, xiii—xiv). We may accept this division if we also admit his ingenious interpretation of vi, vii—ix, x, xi—xii. And yet Juda, I shall graft on thee a branch of Ephraim when I shall re-establish my people; when I shall heal Israel. In the first section he speaks almost exclusively of religious and spiritual punishments. The princes and especially the priests are chiefly responsible for this and it is on them that the punishment will principally fall; and as he speaks simply of the "house of the king" it would appear that the dynasty of Jehu still occupied the throne. It is different in the following chapters. In vi, ix, xi, the political and social disorders are especially emphasized. At home there are conspiracies, seditions, anarchy, while abroad alliances with foreign powers are sought. No doubt Manahem was already reigning. And yet the religious disorders remained the principal object of the Prophet’s repudiation. And in spite of all the promises of salvation which Yahweh will gather together again some day his scattered children. In the last section it is felt that the final catastrophe is close at hand; and, nevertheless, once again, love remains victorious. The book ends with a touching exhortation to the people to turn to God who on His part promises the most tempting blessings. A vision of mysterious punishments at last every one, that the good and the wicked shall receive the retribution each has merited.

Style and Text.—St. Jerome has described in a few words the style of our Prophet: "Osee commatiis est, et quasi per sententias loquentis." (P. C., CXVIII, 1015). An intense emotion overpowers the Prophet at the sight of his dying country. He manifests this grief in short broken phrases with little logical sequence, but in which is revealed a tender and afflicted heart. Unfortunately the notorious obscurity of the Prophet hides many details from our view; this obscurity is due also to many allusions which we cannot grasp and comprehend. The question has been raised as to whether we possess it at least in its substantial integrity. Some critics claim to have discovered two main series of interpolations; the first, of small extent, consists of texts relative to Juda; the second, which is of far greater importance, consists of the Messianic passages which, it is said, lie outside the range of the prophet's vision. It is possible to detect several probable glosses in the first series; the second assertion is purely arbitrary. The Messianic texts have all the characteristics of Ose. — The second has probably been compared with the context and are entirely in accordance with his general doctrines.

Teaching. — It is fundamentally the same as that of Amos: — the same strict Monotheism, the same ethical conception which paved the way for the Deiul papyri and the worship which must be in spirit and in truth. He has laid stress on the ideality which perhaps had been increased in the interval and was in any case better known to the Ephraimitic Prophet than to his Judean predecessor. And Amos had in return a much more extended historical and geographical horizon. Osee sees but the dying Israel. His characteristic point of view is the bond between Israel and Jahve. Jahve is the spouse of Israel, — the bride of Jahve, — a profoundly philosophical and mystical image which appears here for the first time and which we find again in Jeremia, Eszechiel, Canticle of Canticles, Apocalypse, etc.

(a) The Ancient Alliance. — Jahve has taken to himself His spouse, by redemption out of the bondage of Egypt. He has united Himself to her on Sinai. The bride, obedient fidelity and exclusive love, trust, and obedience to the spouse; but alas! how has she observed the conjugal compact? Fidelity. — She has prostituted herself to the Baals and Asturtos, distracting herself to the baals of the infamous practices of the Canaanite high places. She has wronged the cause of Yahweh and has given herself up to every superstition. No doubt she has also paid homage to Jahve, but a homage wholly external and carnal instead of the adoration which must be above all things internal and which He Himself exacts: "With their books, and with their heirs they shall go to seek the Lord, and shall not find him." (v. 6). "For I desired mercy and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than holocausts" (vi, 6). Trust has failed in like manner. Costly alliances were sought with other nations as though the protection of the spouse were not sufficient; — "Ephraim hath given gifts to his lovers (vii, 9). He hath made a covenant with the Assyrians, and carried on his works with them. The seven daughters of that loadstone, with whom she has been divided, she has received from Jahve in her ingratitude she ascribes to false gods. She said: "I will go after my lovers, that gave me my bread, and my water, my woof, and my flax" (Vulg., ii, 5). Obedience: — All the laws which govern the pact of union have been violated: — "Shall I write to him (Ephraim) my manifold laws, which have been accounted as foreign?" (vii, 12). It is a question here at least primarily of the Mosaic legislation. Osee and Amos in spite of contrary opinion knew at least in substance the contents of the Pentateuch. Anarchy is therefore rife in politics and religion: "They have reigned but not by me; they have been princes, and I knew not of their silver, and their gold they have filled their houses" (iv, 12).

The root of all these evils is the absence of "knowledge of God" (iv—vii) for which the priest especially and the princes are to blame, an absence of theoretical knowledge no doubt, but primarily of the practical knowledge which has love for its object. It is the absence of this practical knowledge chiefly that Osee laments. The Prophet employs yet another symbol for the bond of union. He sets forth in some exquisite lines the symbol of the chosen son. Jahve has given birth to Israel by redeeming it out of the bondage of Egypt. He has borne it in his arms, has guided its first feeble-steps and sustained it with bonds of love; he has hallowed and sanctified it (xvi); and the return made by Ephraim is apostacy. Such is the history of the covenant. The day of retribution is at hand; it has even drowned in anarchy, civil war, and every kind of scourgery. The consummation is imminent. It would seem that repentance itself would be unable to ward it off. As later Jeremia, so now Osee announces to his people with indescribable emotion the final ruin: "Jeremia, "Disgraced", "; and my people no longer shall sit in their place, neither shall they "shall sit many days without king, and without prince, and without sacrifice, and without altar, and without ephod and without teraphim" (iii, 4). National authority shall come to an end and public national religion will be no more.

(b) The New Covenant. — Yet the love of Jahve will change even this evil into a remedy. The unworlly princes, now separated from the people, will no longer draw them into sin. The disappearance of the external national religion will cause the idolatrous sacrifices, symbols, and oracles to disappear at the same time. And the road will be open to salvation; it will come "at the end of days." Jahve cannot abandon forever His chosen son. At the very thought of it He is filled with compassion and his heart is stirred within him. Accordingly after having been the lion which roars against his guilty people He will roar against their enemies, and His children will come at the sound of His voice from all the lands of their exile (xi, 10 sq.). The child of the bondwoman shall be as a brother of the child of the espoused wife. And Juda will be reinstated and a remnant of the tribe of Ephraim shall be joined with him (vi, 11—vii, 1a). "The children of Israel shall return and shall seek the Lord their God, and David their king." (iii, 5). The new alliance shall never be broken: — it shall be contracted in justice and in righteousness, in kindness and fidelity and knowledge of God. There shall be reconciliation with nature and peace among men and with God. Prosperity and unlimited extension of the people of God shall come to pass, and the children of this new kingdom shall be called the sons of the living God. Great shall be the day of Jezrael (the day when "God will sow") (ch. ii), ch. i, 3—5 (Vulg. i, 10—11). Ought likely to be set at the end of ch. ii. Cf. Condamin in "Revue biblique", 1902, 386 sqq. This is an admirable sketch of the Church which Christ is to found seven and a half centuries later. The doctrine of Osee, like that of Amos, manifests a transcendence which his historical and religious surroundings cannot explain. Digiti Dei vel hic.

JEAN CALES.

Osimo, Diocese of (Auximinus), in the Province of Ascoli Piceno, Italy. Osimo was contained in the territory of the Donation of Pepin. In the conflicts between the popes and the Swabian emperors, it was Guibelin; but remained faithful when in 1375, at the instigation of the Florentines, nearly all the cities of the Pontifical States rebelled against the Emperor, Charles V. Among other cities, it had still contains the community of the Conti Malatesta (1416); Francesco Sforza (1435); and finally, Bucone, who surrendered the city to the Holy See in 1394. Remnants of the Roman walls and baths still exist; the cathedral is of the eighth century, restored and enlarged by Bishop Gentilius (1235); the baptistery of the church of St. John the Baptist is notable; the communal palace possesses a collection of inscriptions; the Collegio Campana had among its students Leo XIII and Pius Vll. Saints Florentius, Sisinnius, and Docietius were martyrs of Osimo; the city venerates as its first bishop St. Leopards, of unknown era; the first bishop of certain date is: Fledonius (649). Among its predecessors were Vitalianus (743) and Gervase (1177). Gregory IX transferred the see to Riscinati in 1216 to punish Osimo for its felony, but Bishop Rinaldo persuaded Urban IV to restore the see to Osimo, and the first bishop thereafter was St. Benvenuto Scotivoli (d. 1283), who was succeeded by Berardo Berardi, afterwards cardinal; C. Giovanni Liguicione (1328), who died in prison, for which reason the see was again suppressed, the bishops residing at Cingoli; Urban VI restored the diocese, and among its subsequent bishops were Antonio Ugolino Sini-bardi (1495); Cardinal Antonio M. Galli (1591); and the Dominican Cardinal Galamini (1620). Under Abendonese" mentions Felmirus, Bishop of Osma, in the time of Alfonso III (821).

The succession was then lost until Fernán Gonzalez, Count of Castile, conquered Osma, placing in its see Silo, a monk of San Antón in Arlanza, to take the see with it; but eventually Alfonso VI called in the Cluniacs, under Bernardo Salviá (later Archbishop of Toledo), and made Pierre de Vituris, a French monk, Bishop of Osma. Then began protracted boundary disputes with the Bishops of Oca and of Burgos, and the archbishop of Cluny, Wulfin, in Palencia, in 1088; others followed with the Bishops of Sigüenza and of Tarazona, to whose jurisdiction Alfonso the Fighter assigned the territory taken from Castile, finally settled in the time of Alfonso VII, at a council at Burgos, where Cardinal Guisó was present as papal legate. After Vituris, the see was occupied by Pedro, formerly archdeacon of Toledo, canonized as St. Peter of Osma. Finding the old church in ruins he chose as the site for a new one El Espinar. His successor, the Frenchman, Raymond Salviá, continued the boundary controversies and the building of the church, and, having been transferred to the see of Toledo, was succeeded by Beltrán (1125).

To provide for the building of a new church, Bishop Beltrán obtained a commutation of the Vow of Santiago for a visit and alms to Osma; he also founded the Confraternity of the True Cross, the brethren of which bound themselves to leave legacies for the building of the cathedral.

Bishop Diego de Acebes accompanied St. Dominic against the Albigenenses. In 1232 Bishop Juan Domínguez, finding the cathedral again too small, rebuilt it, with the exception of some cloister chapels, still to be seen, spared out of respect for the memory of St. Peter of Osma. It is in the transition style from Romanesque to ogival, with later improvements and additions. Cardinal de González, Cardinal de Mendicó, Bishop of Osma in 1475, built the marble pulpit. Bishop Pedro Acosta, who had previously occupied the see of Oporto, brought with him the Italian Giovanni di Juni, who (1540) embellished the retable of the high altar with figures of St. Peter of Osma and St. Dominic, and also designed the university. Bishop Acosta founded (1557), in Aranda de Duero, the "Santuari Spiritus" convent of the Dominicans, and the chapel of the Santo Cristo del Milagro, originally designed as a chapel of St. Dominic de Guzmán. The organ on the right is the gift of Bishop Martín Carrillo in 1611, that on the left, of the chapter in 1745. The chapel of the Santo del Milagro contains an altar retable, with an inscription giving the traditional legend, built by Bishop Andrés de Soto. With the assistance of Bishop García de Lucía, Meléndez de Guzmán, Dean of Osma, built the chapel of St. Peter, now the chief patron of the diocese. The chapel of Our Lady of the Thorn-bush, planned by Bishop Pedro Aragón, corresponds to the Santo Christo. In 1506, Bishop Alonso Enríquez, rebuilt the cloisters. Between 1736 and 1744 Pedro Águstín de la Cuadra built the new tower adjoining the west wall in the Baroque style. Joaquín de Eleta, confessor to Charles III, built a chapel for Juan de Palacios, Bishop of Osma, completed in 1781. The frescoes are by Mariano Maella.

The bishops of Osma were formerly lords of the city. At the petition of Bishop John II, Alfonso VIII issued a warrant confirming the lordship to the cathedral chapter, and left instructions that the lordship of Osma, with its castle, should be given to Bishop Pedro de Montoya (1210) in recompense for his services at the battle of Las Navas de Tolosa (1212). King John granted the castle of Osma to Bishop Pedro González de Fries, Bishop Pedro de Montoya surrounded Burgos with a wall, in 1146. Bishop Pedro Alvarez de Acosta founded the university at his own expense, and in 1578, adjacent to the cathedral, the consistorial Osmond, Saint, Bishop of Salisbury, d. 1099; his feast is kept on 4 Dec. Osmond held an exalted position in Normandy, his native land, and according to a late fifteenth-century chronicler, a Count of Sées, and Isabella, daughter of Robert, Duke of Normandy, who was the father of William the Conqueror (Sarum Charters, 373). With his uncle, the king, he came over to England, proved a trusty counsellor, and was made chancellor of the realm. The same chronicler further states that he held many offices, and employed in many civil transactions, and was engaged as one of the chief commissioners for drawing up the Domesday Book. He became Bishop of Sarum, virtually William's choice, by authority of Gregory VII and was consecrated by Lanfranc in 1078. This diocese comprised the Counties of Dorsetshire, Wilts, and Berks. Osmond was present at the Council of Lanfranc and Ramsbury had been united under Bishop Hermann and the see transferred to Old Sarum. This is described as a fortress rather than a city, placed on a high hill, surrounded by a massive wall ("Gest. Pontif.", 183) and Peter le Blos refers to the Castle and Church as "the ark of God shut up in the temple of Burgundy." Osmond's body was exhumed and reinterred in the Lady Chapel when the Domesday Book was accepted and the great landowners were fealty to the sovereign (see Freeman, "Norman Conquest"). He died in the night of 3 Dec., 1099, and was succeeded, after the see had been vacant for eight years, by Roger, a crafty and time-serving statesman. His remains were buried at Old Sarum, translated to New Salisbury on 23 July, 1547, and deposited in the Lady Chapel where his sumptuous shrine was destroyed under Henry VIII. A flat slab with the simple inscription "MVCIX" has lain in various parts of the cathedral. In 16th it was in the middle of the Lady Chapel. It is now under the easternmost arch on the south side.

Osmond's work was threefold—(1) The building of the cathedral at Old Sarum, which was consecrated on 5 Apr. 1092. Five days afterwards a thunderstorm entirely destroyed the roof and greatly damaged the whole fabric. (2) The constitution of a cathedral chapter. This was framed on the usual Norman model, with dean, precentor, chancellor, and two deans, who were to have their duties exactly defined, some thirty-two canons, a subdean, and six subdeacons. All save the last two were bound to residence. These canons were "secular," each living in his own house. Their duties were to be special companions and advisers of the bishop, to carry out with fitting solemnity the full round of liturgical services and to do missionary work in the surrounding districts. There was formed a school for clergy of which the chancellor was the head. The cathedral was thoroughly constituted "the Mother Church of the diocese, "a city set on a hill." Osmond's canons were renowned for their musical talent and their zeal for learning, and had great influence on the foundation of other cathedral bodies. (3) The formation of the "Sarum Use." In St. Osmond's day there were many other "Uses" (bills of vanities, breadings, and Lincoln remained) and other customary peculiar to local churches, and the number was increased by the influx of Normans under William. Osmond invented or introduced little himself, though the Sarum rite had some peculiarities distinct from that of other churches. He made selections of the practices he saw round him and arranged the offices and services. Intended primarily for his own diocese, the Ordinal of Osmond, regulating the Divine Office, Mass, and Calendar, was used, within a hundred years, almost throughout England, Wales, and Ireland, and was introduced into Scotland about 1250. The unifying influence of the Norman Conquest made its spread more easy. It held general currency in England until the 14th century, when the clergy obtained particular licences from Cardinal Polo to say the Roman Breviary that became universally received. The "Register of St. Osmond" is a collection of documents without any chronological arrangement, gathered together after his time, divided roughly into two parts: the "Conquemour" (Rolls Series, 183, Henrici III. Style, in 184) called De Officiis Ecclesiasticis, and a series of documents and charters, all more or less bearing on the construction of the cathedral at Old Sarum, the foundation of the cathedral body, the treasures belonging to it, and the history of dependent churches. The register is not a continuous one, being taken from an older copy, rearranged with additions and modifications and ready probably when Richard Poore consecrated the cathedral at New Salisbury in 1225. A copy, almost verbatim the same as this, was taken from the older book for the use of St. Patrick's, Dublin, which was erected into a cathedral and modelled on the church at Sarum by Henry de Lonnor who was bishop from 1213-28. This is given by Todd in the British Magazine (vols. xxx and xxxi).

William of Malmesbury in summing up Osmond's character says he was "so eminent for chastity that common fame would itself blush to speak otherwise than truthfully concerning his virtue." Stern he might be toward penitents, but not more severe than necessary to himself. Free from ambition, he neither impossibly wasted his own substance, nor sought the wealth of others." (Gest. Pontif., 184) He gathered together a good library for his canons and even as a bishop did not disdain to transcribe and bind books himself. At one time Osmond bought Archbishop Anselm's unyielding and needlessly severe words in the dispute concerning investitures and in 1095 at the Council of Rockingham favoured the king. But after the Lateran Council in 1099, he boldly sided with the archbishop and the beautiful anecdotc is related, showing his simple sincerity, how when Anselm was on his way to Windsor, Osmond knelt before him and received his forgiveness. He had a great reverence for St. Alkhielm who 300 years before as Bishop of Sherborne had been Osmond's predecessor. He officiated at the saint's translation to a more fitting shrine at Malmesbury and helped Lanfranc to obtain his canonization. Abbot Warin gave him a bone of the body of St. Alkhielm which was put in a box of miraculous powers were wrought. In 1228 the Bishop of Sarum and the canons applied to Gregory IX for Osmond's canonization but not until some 200 years afterwards on 1 Jan., 1537, was the Bull issued by Callistus III. In 1472 a special indulgence was granted by Sixtus IV.

Osnabrück, Diocese of (Osnabrücker Diözesen), directly subject to the Holy See, comprises, in the Province of Bremen, the dioceses of Osnabrück and Aurich (excepting Wilhelmshaven) and that part of Hanover situated on the west of the Weser. In 1410 it numbered 12 deans, 108 parish churches, 131 pastoral stations, 271 secular and 12 regular priests, 204,500 Catholics. As Apostolic administrator, the bishop is Vicar Apostolic of the Northern Missions of Germany and Prefect-Apostolic of Schleswig-Holstein (see Germany, Vicariate Apostolic of Northern). According to the Bull “Impensa Romanorum” (26 March, 1824), he is elected by the chapter of the cathedral, composed of a dean, six canons, and four vicars, elected in turn by the bishop and by the chapter. Among the higher ecclesiastical dignitaries of the diocese, the Diocesan Carolinum, founded by Charlemagne; similar schools are at Meppen, Papenburg, and Osnabrück. The only religious communities of men are the Capuchin convent at Klemenswerth and the Apostolic School of the Marists at Meppen. The religious orders of women include Benedictines, Poor Clares, Ursulines, and others.

The Romanesque cathedral of Sts. Crispin and Crispinian was built at the beginning of the twelfth century, and replaced the wooden church erected by Charlemagne. Later it took on Gothic embellishments, and in time became a treasury of precious objects of medieval art. Other fine churches are St. John’s, Osnabrück, with three naves, Transition style (1256-1592), the Sacred Heart church (1807-1901), and the churches in Iburg, Lingen, Meppen, Kloster-Oesede, Bissendorf, Norden, Salzberger, and others.

History.—The foundation of the diocese is veiled in obscurity, for lack of authentic documents. Osnabrück is certainly the oldest see founded by Charlemagne in Saxony. The first bishop was St. Wiho (785-801); the second bishop, Meginhard, or Meinozg (804-83), was the real organizer of the see. The temporal possessions of the see, originally quite limited, grew in time, and its bishops exercised an extensive civil jurisdiction within the territory covered by their rights of immunity (q. v.). The temporal protectorate (Advocatia, Vogteng) exercised over so many medieval dioceses by laymen became after the twelfth century hereditary in the Amelung family, from whom it passed to Henry the Lion. After Henry’s overthrow, it fell to Count Simon of Tecklenburg and to his descendants, though the source of many conflicts with the bishops. In 1236 the Count of Tecklenburg was forced to renounce all jurisdiction over the town of Osnabrück, and the lands of the see, the chapter, and the parish churches. On the other hand, the bishop and chapter, from the thirteenth century on, spread their jurisdiction over the surrounding towns, churches, and hamlets. Scarcely any other German see freed itself so thoroughly from civil jurisdiction within its territory. The royal prerogatives were transferred little by little to the bishop, e. g., the holding of fairs and markets, rights of toll and coinage, forest and hunting rights, trading royalties, fortresses, etc., so that the bishop by the early part of the thirteenth century was the real governor of the civil territory of Osnabrück.

Among the prominent medieval bishops are Drogo (922-68); Conrad of Veltberg (1002); the learned Thietmar or Detmar (1002-22); Benno II (1067-88); Johann I (1001-10), who built the actual cathedral in place of the wooden one destroyed by fire in the time of his predecessor; Dethard I (1119-37) was the first bishop elected by the free choice of the cathedral clergy; Plack (1143-73) endowed the cathedral with its see and the Abbeys of Corvey and Hersfeld; Arnold (1137-1191) died a crusader before Akkon. In the time of Engelbert of Isenburg (1239-50), Bruno of Isenburg, and Conrad II of Rietberg (1260-97) the new orders of Francisca, Dominicans, and Augustinians were received with favour. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the diocese was warned before the increasing influence of the chapter, of the military servants (or knights) of the diocese, and of the town of Osnabrück. The latter sought to free itself from the bishop’s sovereignty, but never became a free city of the empire. The see was almost continually engaged in warlike troubles and difficulties and it also defended itself against the Bishops of Minden and Münster. From the fourteenth century on we meet many auxiliary bishops of Osnabrück, made necessary by the civil duties that absorbed the attention of the ordinary.

The successor of Bishop Conrad IV of Rietberg (1310-1308) was in 1345 Bishop of Münster, but shortly succeeded, by the Emperor, in the see of Osnabrück. The new bishop was the Dominican Heinrich of Hoya (1353-74), who was also Bishop of Minden. He died, on the contrary, a very doubtful part. He offered little resistance to Lutheranism in Münster, though he vigorously opposed the Anabaptists; after 1543 he allowed in Osnabrück an evangelical service. But the chapter and the Dominicans opposed a German service that dispensed with all the characteristics of the Mass. In 1548 Bishop Franz promised to suppress the Reformation in Osnabrück, and to execute the Augsburg "Interim", but fulfilled his promise very indifferently; on his death-bed he received Lutheran communions. His successor, John IV of Hoya (1553-74), was more Catholic, but was succeeded by three bishops of a Protestant temper: Henry III of Saxony (1574-85), Bernhard of Walbeck (1585-91), and Philip Sigismund (1591-1623). Under them the Reformation overran nearly the whole diocese. In 1624 Cardinal Ercole Gonzaga of Mantua became Bishop of Osnabrück and called in the Jesuits. But he had scarcely begun his work when he died, and left to his successor, Francis of Wartenberg (1625-61), the task of executing the Counter-Reformation (q. v.). The city-council was purified of anti-Catholic elements, and the former Augustinian convent was turned over to the Jesuits. The Edict of Restitution was executed successfully by him, and in 1631 he founded a university at Osnabrück. But in 1633 Osnabrück was captured by the Swedes, the university was discontinued, Catholic religious exercises suppressed, and the see (1633-51) administered by the conquerors. By the Peace of Westphalia (1648), the bishop succeeded in preventing the secularization of the see, as contemplated by the Swedes. Nevertheless, it was stipulated that henceforth a Catholic and a Protestant bishop (of the Augsburg Confession) would alternately hold the see. During the rule of the Protestant bishop, always chosen from the House of Brunswick-Lüneburg, the see was occupied by a prelate of the Westphalian Church, the Catholics was committed to the Archbishop of Cologne. Wartenberg was made cardinal in 1660, and was succeeded by the Protestant married "bishop"; Ernest Augustus (1661-98), who transferred the residence to Hanover. He was succeeded by the Catholic bishop, Prince Charles Joseph of Lorraine, Bishop of Olmütz, later Archbishop of Trèves (1698-

Ossory. Diocese of (Ossoriensis), in the Province of Leinster, Ireland, is bounded on the south by to Henry III. Driven from Rome by the rupture of diplomatic relations after the murder of Cardinal de Guise (1558), he returned after the death of Henry III (1589) as the private agent of his widow, Louise de Vaudemont. He used his position to support the cause of Henry IV, whose conversion he prepared the pope to accept. As agent for that prince, co-operating with the Parlement of Paris, he negotiated with the pope, which took place 19 Sept., 1595. This was the greatest act of d'Ossat's diplomatic career, assuring as it did the definitive triumph of Henry IV over the League, and the restoration of peace and prosperity to France after more than thirty years of civil war. D'Ossat was appointed Bishop of Rennes (1598), cardinal (1600), and finally Archbishop of Bayeux. Remaining at Rome without any well-defined office, he was charged with occasional missions to Venice and Florence (1598), or managed the French embassy in the absence of the ambassador, and was always the enlightened and devoted representative of French interests. All the ambassadors of Henry IV had orders to make known to him the business with which they were charged and to be guided by his advice. Villeroi, for the foreign minister, himself consulted him on all matters in any way connected with Rome. Ossat, through his influence and talents, secured for Henry IV the pope's aid and, when necessary, induced the Holy See to accept, at least with public protest, such measures as he considered expansion of the French power. The publication of the Council of Trent, the Edict of Nantes, the Franco-Turkish and Franco-English alliances, the annulment of Henry IV's marriage with Margaret of Valois, and the conclusion of that between the Due de Bar and Catherine de Bourbon, Henry's sister and a Protestant Calvinist. At the same time d'Ossat used his influence at Rome for the benefit of the historian of Thoun, the philosopher Montaigne, and the savant Peiresc. Clement VIII showed his esteem of Ossat by commanding that the cardinal's family's should attend his obsequies with all the assistants at the pontifical throne. D'Ossat was buried in the church of St. Louis of the French, where his tomb is still to be seen. Bentiveglio, in his "Mémoires", says of him that never was a man more worthy of the hat because of his religious zeal, the integrity of his morals, and the eminence of his learning.

In the course of his diplomatic career d'Ossat wrote many letters and memoranda. Garnier de Mœlenc edited some of them in 1614, when they were printed for the first time; several editions, largely augmented, afterwards appeared, the best being that of Amelot de la Hausse, in 1708, which contains nearly 400 letters. Since then twenty-one letters have been published by Tamaguy de Larroque, and eleven by the writer of this article. These letters formerly served as models for diplomats, owing not only to the importance of the questions which they treat, but especially to the talent for exposition which d'Ossat displays in them. The French Academy inscribed Ossat among the "dead authors who have written our French language most purely". Wisqoort in his "Mémoires sur les ambassadeurs" finds in them "the clearest and most enlightened judgment ever displayed by any minister", and Lord Chesterfield wrote to his son that the "simplicity and clearness of Cardinal d'Ossat's letters show how business letters should be written". Besides these letters his published works are: "Arnault Ossati in questionnaire du Mirandole" (Paris, 1564) and "Arnault Ossati addition ad expositionem de metodo" (Paris, 1564).
the Suir, on the east by the Barrow, on the west by Tipperary and King's County, and on the north by Queen's County. It has an area of 600,000 acres, and corresponds geographically with the ancient Kingdom of Ossory, whose first king, Aengus Osrithe, flourished in the second century of the Christian era. His successors extended their boundaries to include part of Tipperary. In the fifth century the neighbouring tribe of the Deisi, aided by the Corca-Laighde, conquered South Ossory, and for over a century the Corca-Laighde chiefs ruled in place of the dispossessed Ossory chiefs. Early in the seventh century the ancient chiefs recovered much of their lost possessions, the foreigners were overcome, and the descendants of Aengus ruled once more. One of the greatest was Carroll, prominent in the ninth century and distinguished in the Danish wars.

Ossory had been Christianized long before this. St. Kieran, its apostle, now the patron of the diocese, was born about the fourth century at a place now known as St. Kieran’s Strand, near Cape Clear, and was probably converted to the Faith by foreign traders. According to the tradition, he went to Rome and was there ordained priest and bishop. Having met St. Patrick, St. Kieran received from him a bell with the charge to return to Ireland and found a monastery on the spot where the bell should first sound. When the saint had passed beyond Ossory, and was descending the western slopes of Silicee Bloom, the bell at length sounded; and there St. Kieran established the monastery of Seir-Kieran, the centre from which Ossory was evangelized. St. Patrick also visited Ossory and preached and founded churches there. There is some difficulty in accepting the story of St. Kieran leaving preached before St. Patrick, since the former is said to have flourished in the sixth century. It is, however, certain that St. Kieran laboured in Ossory in the centuries following the newly-converted kingdom was ruled from Seir-Kieran by the abbeys. They had other monasteries subject to them, and probably other bishops, and perhaps were not always bishops themselves, though at Seir-Kieran, as at Iona, there was always a bishop. Their jurisdiction was tribal rather than territorial, and hence the diocese was enlarged or contracted as the fortunes of the Ossory chiefs rose or fell. At the synod of Rathbreasail (1118) the limits of the diocese were permanently fixed substantially as they have since remained. At the same time the see was transferred from Seir-Kieran to Aghaboe (see Canice, Saint), but at the end of the twelfth century it was transferred to Kilkenny, where it has since remained. It is probable that St. Canice founded a monastery at Kilkenny, and not unlikely that the beginning of a town soon appeared there, to become more important when the bishops changed from Aghaboe. Kilkenny also became the residence of Marshall Earl of Pembroke, Strongbow’s heir and descendant, by whom Kilkenny Castle was built. Before the fourteenth century Marshall’s inheritance passed to the Butlers, and under them Kilkenny became great. It was made up of an Irish and an English town, each with a charter, and each, until 1600, returning two members to the Irish Parliament. The united towns were incorporated by a charter from Elizabeth, and by a further charter from James I, as a free city, with a mayor. The city still returns a member to the Imperial Parliament. The Butlers, ennobled as Earls and Dukes of Ormonde, have always interested themselves in its welfare. These powerful nobles were sometimes charged with the government of Ireland; not infrequently Kilkenny was the residence of the viceroy and saw a Parliament sitting within its walls, and there the Statute of Kilkenny was passed (1367). The Ormondes were always favourable to Anglo-Norman development at Kilkenny, and after the beginning of the thirteenth century no Irishman was appointed to the See of Ossory. In the reign of Bishop Hugh de Roos (1292-1315) the cathedral of St. Canice was built. Two subsequent bishops, De cupmath (1254-60) and Thomas Barry (1227-60), filled the office of treasurer of Ireland, while another, Richard De Northalls (1387-95), acted as the King’s ambassador abroad. At the Reformation, though the Earls of Ormonde were among the first to conform, a see clung to the Faith; and when John Bale was appointed bishop by Edward VI, and endeavoured to Protestantize the people, he was roughly handled and driven from Kilkenny, leaving Ossory in peace. The peace ended with the death of Mary, and in Elizabeth’s reign the see was vacant for seven years. From 1602 to 1618 Ossory was again without a bishop, and when Dr. Rothe was appointed (1620) there was not a Catholic bishop in Ireland. In the rebellion of 1641 Kilkenny was the centre of national resistance and the headquarters of the Catholic Confederation. The part played by Dr. Rothe was prominent and patriotic; but his best efforts were unavailing, for Ormonde was able to foment divisions, the Anglo-Irish and the Irish of several of these divisions, the Anglican bishop and the want of vigour in Catholic counsels prepared the way for Ormonde's treachery and Cromwell's victories.

While the Cromwellians held Kilkenny, Rothe died there (1650), and for twenty years following the city was governed by vicars capitular. During the period of restoration in the reign of Charles II a feeble revival of Catholicism took place. In 1678 the bishop reported to Rome, that in many cases one priest was in charge of five or six parishes; that the few remaining Franciscans, Dominicans, Jesuits, and Capuchins ministered by stealth and in ruined churches; and that the Carmelites, Cistercians, and Canons Regular of St. Augustine had completely disappeared.

In the penal times Ossory suffered much, but its faith survived, and when toleration came it was ruled by an exceptional man, De Burgo (1759-86). Equally capable was his successor, Troy (1777-85), subsequently Archbishop of Dublin. To understand his praise of George III, his friendship with the viceroy and with Luttrell, son of the infamous Lord Capham, we must make allowance for the times in which he lived, but nothing excelled from no personal motive, but for the good of the Church, for he was zealous in propagating the Faith and enforcing discipline. He was among the first of the Irish bishops to take advantage of the relaxation of the penal laws and set up a college for his diocese by the purchase of Burrell's Hall, Kilkenny. Two of its first staff became his successors, Dr. Dunne (1787-95) and Dr. Langton (1790-1812). Under the latter the college at Burrell's Hall was transferred to more suitable premises and its curriculum extended. It was not until the episcopate of Dr. Kinsella that a diocesan college worthy of Ossory was founded. In 1816 the foundation stone of St. Kieran's College, Kilkenny, was laid and two years later the college was opened for students. Dr. Kinsella also aided his priests to build several parish churches. He laid the foundation stone of the Cathedral of St. Mary in 1815, though the exterior was not finished until 1857, nor solemnly consecrated until 1899. Dr. Walsh (1816-72) succeeded Dr. Kinsella, and was succeeded by Dr. Moran, now (1910) Cardinal Archbishop of Sydney. Dr. Moran was succeeded in 1884, by Dr. Browning, a native of Carlow. Educated at Maynooth, Dr. Browning displayed unusual ability, was ordained priest in 1861, and was subsequently professor of philosophy and theology, and superior of the House of Missions at Ennismore.

No diocese in Ireland is more interesting than Ossory for historical and antiquarian remains. There are the relics of old churches associated with the lives and arts of the early Irish saints, such as those of Seir-Kieran and Aghaboe. There are round towers, Norman castles, and holy wells, baths and mounds, ancient forts, crannogs, and pillar stones. In the parish of Dunsford is Borrelshard castle, the residence of the Earls of Carhampton. The ruins of the castle are the remains of Kells Priory and of Inistioge, the Dominican priory of Rosserohon, and the Cistercian abbey of Jerpoint. Kilkenny Castle is an interesting relic of history, and near by are the remains of the Franciscan abbey, the Black Abbey, and St. John's priory. The number of distinguished men connected with the diocese of Ossory is a proof of its ancient importance. The name of Grace, the annalist, was both of Kilkenny. Rothe was not only a public man, but an author of eminence. De Burgo's work on the Irish Dominicans is still an essential book for Irish historians. Other famous men are James Butler, Archbishop of Cashel, author of "Butler's Caethism"; Dr. Minogue, Bishop of Sacramento; Dr. Ireland, Archbishop of St. Paul's; Dr. O'Reilly, Archbishop of Lis- naile; Dr. John O'Donovan; Dr. Kelly, for many years professor of ecclesiastical history at Maynooth; Dr. O'Hanlon, theological professor in the same college; Dr. MacDonald, his successor, and Macrigan, whose "History of Ossory" is the most complete history of any Irish diocese. In 1910 the diocese contained: 41 parishes; 36 priest-parishes; 54 administrators; 35 curates; 11 regulars (a total of 119 priests), 119 religious, 96 churches; 1 college; 4 houses of regulars; 15 convents; 4 houses of Christian Brothers. In 1910 the Catholic population was 38,319; the non-Catholic, 6029.

GOLDSMITH'S WORK

however, the practice of exposure became sufficiently common to seem to require for it an ostensorium, that express object, and for this the upright cylindrical vessel of crystal was at first retained, often with supports of an architectural character and with tabernacle work, niches, and statues. In the central cylinder a large Host was placed, being kept upright by being held in a lunette (q. v.) constructed for the purpose. Many medieval monstrances of this type are still in existence. Soon, however, it became clear that the ostensorium could be better adapted to the object of drawing all eyes to the Sacred Host itself by making the transparent portion of the vessel just of the size required, and surrounded, like the sun, with rays. Monstrances of this shape dating from the fifteenth century, are also not uncommon, and for several hundred years past this has been by far the commonest form in practical use.

Of course the adoption of ostensoria for processions of the Blessed Sacrament was a gradual process, and, if we may trust the miniatures found in the liturgical books of the Middle Ages, the Sacred Host was often carried on such occasions in a ciborium. An early example of a special vessel constructed for this purpose is a gift made by Archbishop Robert Courtenay of an Englishman by birth, who died in 1324, to his cathedral church of Reims. He bequeathed with other ornaments "a golden monstrance set with precious stones and having a crystal in the middle, in which is placed the Body of Christ, and is carried in procession upon the feast of the most holy Sacrament." In a curious instance mentioned by Bergner (Handbuch der Kirch. Kunstanstaltungen in Deutschland, 350) a casket constructed in 1295 at Augsburg, to hold a miraculous Host from which it had trickled, had an aperture bored in it more than a century later to allow the Host to be seen. Very probably a similar plan was sometimes adopted with vessels which are more strictly Eucharistic. Early medieval inventories often allow us to form an idea of the rapid extension of the use of monstrances. In the inventories of the thirteenth century they are seldom or never mentioned, but in the fifteenth century they have become a feature in all larger churches. Thus at St. Paul's, London, in 1215 and 1298 we find no mention of anything like an ostensorium, but in 1402 we have record of the "cross of crystal to put the Body of Christ in and to carry it upon the feast of Corpus Christi and at Easter." At Durham we hear of "a goodly shrine ordained to be carried on Corpus Christi day in procession, and called 'Corpus Christi Shrine', all finely gilded, a goodly thing to behold, and on the height of the said shrine was a four-square box all of crystal wherein was enclosed the Holy Sacrament of the Altar, and it was given to the iiiij priests" (Rites of Durham, c. lii). But in the greater English churches a preference seems to have been shown, connected no doubt with the ceremonial of the Easter sepulchre, for a form of monstrance which reproduced the figure of Our Lord, the Sacred Host being inserted behind a crystal door in the breast. This, at any rate, was the case, i.e. in the Lincoln, Salisbury, and other famous cathedrals. These statues, however, for the exposition of the Blessed Eucharist seem to have been of comparatively late date. On the continent, and more particularly in Spain, a fashion seems to have been introduced in the sixteenth century of constructing ostensoria of enormous size, standing six, seven, or even ten feet high. It is recorded that at Avignon there were 360 statuettes, one of the largest of which is said to be made of the gold brought by Columbus from the New World.

In the language of the older liturgical manuals, the ostensoria is not infrequently called tabernaculum, and it is under that name that a special blessing is provided for it in the ‘Pontificale Romanum’. Several other designations are also in use, of which the commonest is perhaps custodia, though this is also specially applied to the sort of transparent pyx in which the Sacred Host is immediately secured. In Scotland, before the Reformation, an ostensory was commonly called ‘eucharist’, in England a ‘monstrance’.

The rays of the monstrance should at least be of silver or silver gilt, and it is recommended that it should be surmounted by a cross.

HERBERT THURSTON.

OSTIA AND VELLETRI, SUBURBANIAN DIocese OF (OSTIENSIS ET VELLITERNENSIS), near Rome, central Italy. Ostia, now a small borough, was the ancient port of Rome, the first Roman colony founded by Ancus Marcus, chiefly to exploit the salt deposits. Prior to Imperial times, it was the only port, except that of Trastevere, affording the only shelter for shipping; the Emperor Claudius, therefore, built an artificial harbour at Ostia, and Trajan afterwards built a basin there, and enlarged the canal by which the harbour communicated with the Tiber. Here a new city sprang up, called Portus Romanus, which was embellished by Marcus Aurelius and other emperors, and connected with Rome by a new way, the Via Portuensis, along the right bank of the Tiber. With the decay of the Empire, Ostia and Portus decayed, and in the tenth century the basin of Portus had become a marsh. Between 827 and 841 Gregory IV restored the city, fortified it against the Saracens, and gave it the name of Gyrenopoliis.

Leo IV defeated the Saracen fleet at Ostia in 847, and stretched a chain across the Tiber. Ostia was afterwards fortified by Cardinal Ugone (Gregory IX), by Cardinal Gualberto della Rovere (Julius II), and by Paul III, while Paul V, in 1612, reopened the basin north of it. There were 3,000 baths and 150 cisterns under Tiberius; they disclosed the forum, a theatre, three temples, the sanctuaries of Mithra and of the Manna Mater, the emporium, and a great many inscriptions.

Not counting St. Cyriacus, martyr, and Maximus the bishop who, according to the Acts of St. Laurence, consecrated Pope Dionsinus in 269, the first Bishop of Ostia was Maximus, a.d. 313. We know from St. Augustine that the Bishop of Ostia sometimes conscripted the pope. St. Monica (q. v.) died at Ostia, and was buried in the church of St. Aurea, though her body was transferred, later, to Rome. The great hospital which St. Gallemcus built at Ostia was a noted establishment. As early as 707, the Bishop of Ostia resided at Rome, holding the office of bibliothecarius. The prevalence of this custom continued them in the administration of the Universal Church, especially in legations. They were among the bishops who took turns in exercising the pontifical functions during vacancies of the Holy See, and who became known as episcopi cardinals, or ‘cardinal bishops’.

Among the Bishops of Ostia were Georgius, who in 755 was consecrated by Pope Leo II; and of Chiallon (1072) and Otho of Chiallbon (Urban II) (1077), who served as legates on various occasions, and were both imprisoned by Henry IV; Leo Marsicanus, also called Ostiensis (1101), the chronicler; Lambert Fagani (1117) (Honorius II); Alberic (1135),legate in the Holy Land, where he presided over the Council of Jerusalem, and also in England, and theniscardinal.

Velletri (Velitnre) is an ancient city of the Volscians, which, in 391 b.c., became a Latin colony, but revolted in 393, and was among the first of Rome’s enemies in the Latin War, for which reason, in 335, the walls of the town were destroyed, while its inhabitants were taken to Rome and sold as captives. Great lands were distributed among colonists. Velletri was the home of the family of Augustus. In its later history, the battle of Velletri (1714) is famous. The cemetery near the Villa Borgia shows the great antiquity of Christianity in this region. The first known Bishop of Velletri was Edocatus (about 461); Joannes, in 502, was entrusted by Gregory the Great with the care of the Diocese of Tres Tabernae (Three Taverns), now Cisterna (see Albano). From the eighth century, Velletri again had bishops of its own; of whom the last recorded was Joannes (685). Another see, united with Velletri, is that of Norma (Nora); its territory is a deserted, malaria country; and the see, one of its bishops, is celebrated. The place is known. Other bishops of Velletri, before the union of the sees, were Gaudiosus (Gauderius), one of the legates to the Council of Constantinople (689), and Joannes, who, in 1058, usurped the pontifical Throne, under the name of Benedict XI.

Among the successors of Hugo in the united sees were Ulrico Albingoldi (Lucius III); Ugone de Conti, 1206 (Gregory IX); Rinaldo de Conti; Alexander IV; Petrus a Tarantasia, O.P., 1272 (Innocent V); Latino Malabranca Orsini (1278), a great statesman and diplomatist; Nicolò Boccasini, O.P. (Benedict XI); Nicolò da Prato, the patriarch of Tuscany (1304). During the Avignon period, all the bishops of Ostia were Frenchmen, residing at Avignon or serving as legates; the most famous of them was Pierre d’Etain (1327), who persuaded Urban V to go to Rome. During the schism, each of the rival popes appointed a Bishop of Ostia. Among the legitimate bishops may be mentioned William of Estouteville (1441); and Gilbert Corbelet, O.P., (Julius II); Alessandro Farnese, 1521 (Paul III); Gian Pietro Carafa, 1534 (Paul IV); Alessandro Farnese (1550), who restored the cathedral; Antonio M. Sauli (1625), founder of a Basler monastery; Domenico Ginnasio (1683), who restored the cathedral and founded a hospital at Ostia; Bartholommeo Paece (q. v.); Louis Mica (1644).
The united dioceses have 16 parishes, with 34,000 inhabitants, 5 religious houses of men and 5 of nuns, 1 educational establishment for male students, and 3 for girls.

Ostiensis, surname of Leo Massianus, Benedictine chronicler, b. about 1015; d. 22 May, 1115, 1116, or 1117. He belonged to an old noble family, and at the age of fourteen entered Monte Cassino, where his talents soon won him the regard of Abbot Desiderius, later Pope Victor III. Desiderius entrusted his education to the future Cardinal Aldemaro. On the completion of his studies, Ostiensis became librarian and archivist of the monastery, and, as such, his main task was to settle, in accordance with the existing documents, all disputes concerning landed property in which the monastery became involved. Abbot Oderius, who succeeded Desiderius, urged Ostiensis to write a history of the monastery, but, on account of his numerous duties, he was unable to give himself entirely to the work. Paschal II created him Cardinal Bishop of Ostia. In the conflict between the pope and Italy, the latter is said to have defended the papacy. His unfinished chronicle, originally called “Legenda saneti Benedicti longa”, treats the period between 529 and 1075; Petrus Diaconus continued it to 1139. Trustworthy and impartial, the chronicle is a valuable mine of information for the history of Lower Italy, but as the documents on which the narrative rests are still extant, it has no special importance for our knowledge of the time. It was first edited under the title, “Chronica sacri monasterii Casinensis auctore Leono cardinali episcopo Ostiensis”, by Abbot Angelus de Nuce (Paris, 1668); then by Wattenbach in “Monumenta Germanica: Scriptores”, VII, 571-627, and Migne in “Patrologia Latina”, CLXXIII, 179-753. Ostiensis has left several lesser works: “Narratio de consecratione ecclesiarii Deicisier et Osteriis in Monte Casino adliquidatum” (P. L., CLXXIII, 997-1002), and “Vita sancti Menatii cremeius et confessoris” (edited in part, P. L., CLXXIII, 998-92).

Ostracine, titular see and suffragan of Pelusium in Augustamnia pra. Pliny (Hist. naturalis, V, xiv) places the town sixty-five miles from Pelusium. Ptolemy (IV, v, 6) locates it in Cossitiis, between the Nile and Bassae. We learn from Josephus (“Bellum Judaic”, IV, xi, 5) that Vespasian stopped there with his army on the way from Egypt into Palestine; the city then had no ramparts. It received its water from the Delta by a canal. A Roman garrison was stationed there. Hierocles, George of Cyprus, and other geographers always mention it as in Augustamnia. Le Quien (Oriens christianus, II, 515) speaks of three bishops, Theoctistus, Scapron, and Abraham, who lived in the fourth and fifth centuries. There is at present in this region, near the sea, a small town called Straki, which probably replaced Ostracine.

Ostraka, Christian inscriptions on clay, wood, metal, and other hard materials. Like papyri, they are valuable especially as the literary sources for early Christianity. They are found chiefly in Oriental countries, especially Egypt. The greatest number are pieces of clay or scraps of pots inscribed with colours or ink. The oldest Christian ostraka, like the papyri, are Greek and date from the fifth century. Next come the Coptic and Arabian ostraka. Some of the texts not yet deciphered include several Nubian ostraka in a language spoken in the old Christian negro-speaking areas of the Sudan. The ostraka were also used for mercantile purposes, for bills of exchange, etc. C. M. Kauffmann and J. C. Ewald fell, during the excavations of the Monastery of the Menas in the Libyan desert, discovered ostraka of this class—the oldest Christian potsherds in the Greek language (fifth century)—and H. J. Bell and F. G. Kenyon of the British Museum deciphered them. They refer to the various cultural phases of the land and represent, for the most part, short vouchers for money or provisions. The currency is based upon gold solidi issued by Constantine; the date is reckoned by the year of issue. Of historical interest is the assistance given to invalid workmen, the employment of the lower clergy, the manner of provisioning the workmen, and especially the statements about the harvest periods in the Libyan district. The series of Coptic ostraka which deals with the clergy and the monasteries in the Nile valley is particularly extensive. We find references to all phases of administration and popular life.

These ecclesiastical ostraka, in a narrow sense, contain Biblical citations from the New Testament, prayers, extracts from the synagogi (lives of the saints), and are partly of a liturgical character. Greek, which was then the language of the Church, is much used, with the Coptic. Among the works published by W. E. Crum, the best judge of Coptic dialects, there is a local confession of faith from the sixth century, besides the Preface and Sanctus of the Mass, prayers from the Liturgy of St. Basilid of St. Mark, part of the Didascalia of Schenute of Athribis, a Greek confession, and an excommunication, also in Greek. Particularly remarkable are those ostraka which contain liturgical songs. They represent our present song-books for which purpose rolls of papyrus were less suited than the more durable potsherds; in some cases wooden books were used. Among the pieces translated by Crum we find petitions for ordination in which the petitioner promises to learn by heart one of the Gospels, and a reference to an ancient abstinence movement, against which the bishop direct a decree that the consecration-wine should be pure or at least three-fourths pure.

A complete collection of Greek, Coptic, and Arabic ostraka from the beginnings of Christianity is to be found in WILKIN, Griechische Ostraka aus Agypten und Nubien (2 vols., Leipzig, 1899); CURTIS, Coptic Ostraca from the Collections of the Egypt Exploration Fund, the Cairo Museum and others (London, 1902).

CARL MARIA KAUFMANN.

Ostrogoths, one of the two chief tribes of the Goths, a Germanic people. Their traditions relate that the Goths originally lived on both sides of the Black Sea, in Scythia Minor and Scythia Major, on the Danubian Continent. Their oldest habitations recorded in history were situated on the right bank of the Vistula. They left these, all or in part, about the middle of the second century, and settled near the Black Sea, between the Don and Danube. Thence they emigrated frequently to attack and pillage the cities of Gaul and Asia Minor, and fought continuously with the Romans and the neighbouring Germanic tribes. The emperor Decius fell in battle with them in 251. Crossing the Danube into Thrace in 269 they were defeated by Claudius; Aurelian drove them back across the Danube and gave them Dacia. We now find the Ostrogoths east of the River Danube, and the Visigoths to the west. During the reign of Constantine they again attempted to cross the Danube but were repulsed. During the years 350-75 the Goths were united under the leadership of Ermanaric, the Ostrogoth. In 375 they were conquered by the Huns. Some escaped into the Crimea, where they retained their language up to the sixteenth century; the mass of the people, however, remained in their own lands and paid tribute to the Huns; but were otherwise fairly independent and elected their own kings when the empire of the Huns collapsed after the death of Attila (453), the Ostrogoths regained independence. Their old lands between Don and Danube, however, they had to surrender to the Huns, while they obtained Pannonia from the Romans. Theodoric, the Amaling, who was their king from 471 or 475, fought with the Byzantine emperor Zeno, and though he obtained no decisive relations during most of his reign. He endeavoured to secure permanent domiciles for his people. In 488 he started for Italy, aided and abetted by Zeno. Theodoric defeated Odoacer, who reigned as king in Italy, and founded in 493 the great Ostrogothic Empire, which included Italy, Sicily, Dalmatia, Upper Rhine, and later on Provence, with the capital Ravenna, and which stood under Byzantine suzerainty. Theodoric dreamed of an amalgamation of the Teutons and the Romans, of a Germanic state, in which the Ostrogoths were to dominate. He succeeded in establishing law and order in his lands; Huns and litterateurs dispersed. His efforts were directed towards the Catholic Church and did not interfere in dogmatic matters. He remained as neutral as possible towards the pope, though he exercised a proponderant influence in the affairs of the papacy. He and his people were Arians and Theodoric considered himself as protector and chief representative of the so-called Christian, possessed not the vigour and ability to continue this work. His daughter Amalasuntha succeeded him in 526, first as regent for her son Athalaric, and after the latter’s death, in 534, as queen. She was assassinated by her cousin Theodahad, the rightful heir to the throne. The Byzantine emperor Justinian now made himself her avenger and declared war upon the Ostrogoths. His general Belisarius captured Naples in 536. In place of the incompetent Theodahad the Goths chose Witiges as king, but he also proved to be an insipid general. Belisarius succeeded in entering Ravenna in 539 and in taking Witiges prisoner. After his recall in 540, the Goths reconquered Italy. Under his new king the Huns were pursued once more and the war was continued with varying success. In 551 Narses became commander-in-chief in place of Belisarius, and in the following year he defeated Totila at Taginae in the Apennines. Totila was killed in the battle. The survivors of the Ostrogoths chose Teja as their king, but were practically annihilated in the battle near Mount Vesuvius in 554, after a desperate struggle in which Teja was killed. Their last fortress fell in 555, after which the Ostrogoths disappear. The few survivors mingled with other peoples and nations; some were romanized in Italy, and others wandered north where they disappeared among the various Germanic tribes. Italy became a Byzantine province.

O’Sullivan Bearre, Philip, b. in Ireland, c. 1500; d. in Spain, 1600, son of Dermot O’Sullivan and nephew of Donal O’Sullivan Bearre, Lord of Dunsany. He was sent to Spain in 1602, and was educated at Compostella by Vendamna, a Spaniard, and Father Sumnott, an Irish Jesuit. He served in the Spanish army. In 1621 he published his “Historical History of Ireland”, a work not always reliable, but valuable for the Irish wars of the author’s own day. He also wrote a “Life of St. Patrick”, a memorandum of Gerald Barry and a reply to Usher’s attack on his “History”.

Oswald, Saint. Archbishop of York, d. on 29 February, 992. Of Danish parentage, Oswald was brought up by his uncle Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, and instructed by Frigidego. For some time he was dean of the house of the secular canons at Winchester, but led by the desire of a stricter life he entered the Benedictine Monastery of Fleury, where Odo himself had received the monastic habit. He was ordained there and in 956 returned to England betaking himself to his kinsman Osyten, then Archbishop of York. He took an active part in ecclesiastical affairs at York until St. Dunstan procured his appointment to the See of Worcester. He was consecrated by St. Dunstan himself, and was now an ardent supporter of Dunstan in his efforts to purify the Church from abuses, and aided by King Edgar he carried out his policy of replacing by communities the canons who held monastic possessions. Edgar gave the monasteries of St. Alkims, Ely, and Benfleet to Oswald, who established monks at Westbury (893), Pethmore (984), at Winchelcumbe, where he founded a Benedictine Abbey, and re-established Ripon. But his most famous foundation was that of Ramsey in Huntingdonshire, the church of which was dedicated in 974, and again after an accident in 991. In 972 by the joint action of St. Dunstan and Edgar, Oswald was made Archbishop of York and journeyed to Rome to receive the pallium from John XII. He continued, however, with the sanction of the pope, jurisdiction over the Diocese of Worcester where he frequently resided in order to foster his monastic reforms (Eadmer, 203). On Edgar’s death in 973, his work, hitherto so successful, received a severe check at the hands of Ethelred, King of Mercia, who broke up many communities. Ramsey, however, was spared, owing to the powerful patronage of Ethelwulf, Earl of East Anglia. Whilst Archbishop of York, Oswald collected from the ruins of Ripon the relics of the saints, some of which were conveyed to Worcester. He died in the act of washing the feet of the poor, as was his usual custom during Lent. He was buried in the Church of St. Mary at Worcester. Oswald used a gentler policy than his colleague Ethelwulf and always refrained from violent measures. He greatly valued and promoted learning amongst the clergy and induced many scholars to come from Fleury. He wrote two treatises and some synodal decrees. His feast is celebrated on 29 February.

Oswald, Saint. King and martyr: b. probably, 605; d. 5 Aug., 642; the second of seven brothers, sons of Ethelfrid, who was grandson of Ida, founder of the Kingdom of Northumbria in 547. Oswald’s mother was Acha, daughter of Ella or Ila, after Ida’s death, had seized Deira and thus separated it from the Northern Bernicia. The years of Oswald’s youth were spent at home, so long as his father lived, but in 647, Ethelfrid was slain in battle by Redwald, King of the East Angles, Oswald with his brothers fled for protection from Edwin, their uncle, Acha's brother, to the safety of St. Columba's Monastery at Hii, or Iona. There they remained until Edwin's death in the battle of Heathfield (633). Edwin's elder brother, then returned to accept the Kingdom of Deira, whilst Osric, cousin of Edwin, received Bernicia. The kingdom was thus again divided between the two halves of northern England. But the following year Osric was slain in battle, and Edwin treacherously murdered by the British king, Cadwalla. Oswald thereupon came down from the North, and in 655 a small but resolute band gathered round him near the Roman Wall at a spot seven miles north of Hexham, afterwards known as Heavenfelt, or Heavenfell, in the north of England. At the battle of Heavenfell, the first victory over Saint Columba, who shrouded with his mantle all his camp, Oswald set up a cross of wood as his standard—the first Christian symbol ever raised in Bernicia—and gave battle to the Britons, who were led, probably, by Cadwalla. The Britons were completely routed, and.thenceforth could only act on the defensive.

Oswald's victory reunited the Northumbrian kingdom not only because he delivered it from the humiliating yoke of the Mercians and Britons, but also because on his father's side he was a descendant of Ida of Bernicia and on his mother's of the royal house of Ella of Deira. Moreover, the Penda, the chief rival to the British kings of that time, had been defeated. He fortified his capital, with the chief officer of state, who had been chief minister in the Edinbro's time. But he would not accept the religious union effected by Edwin with a religious union unknown before. Edwin, it is true, had himself received the Faith in 627, through the influence of his wife Ethelburga, sister of the Kentish King, who had brought St. Paulinus to the North, but his example was followed only by the people of Deira. Oswald, brought up in Columba's monastery at Iona, naturally looked to the North for missionaries. The first preacher who set forth soon returned, having found the Northumbrian people too barbarous and stubborn. Then Edwin, "a man of singular meekness, piety and moderation," who established his episcopal see at Lindisfarne, returned. Oswald's Wic, or bishop, soon filled the land with churches and monasteries, and the church at York, begun by Edwin, was completed. Moreover, his wonderful humility in the midst of success, his charity, and his piety soon had their effect in turning his subjects from Wolcan to Christ. We are told that the king in his court acted as the interpreter of the Irish missionaries who knew not the tongue of his thanes.

It was Oswald's work to add to the warlike glory of his father Ethelfrid and the wise administration of his uncle Edwin the moral power of Christianity, and to build up a great kingdom. Edwin had gathered the whole English race into one political and social body. He had united the mountainous north with the plain of Kent. He was acknowledged king by the whole nation. But the land of the Northumbrians was still not Christian. The Venerable Bede (III. 6) says that Oswald had a greater dominion than any of his ancestors, and that "he brought under his sway all the nations and provinces of Britain, which are divided into four languages, namely the Britons, the Picts, the Scots, and the English." He had a great power in the Northumbrian Church. In the sixteenth century, when the archbishop of Canterbury was exiled, the English clergy went to Scotland to acknowledge the authority of the See of Canterbury. The West Saxons in the South, influenced by the fear of Oswin, readily acknowledged Oswald, their allegiance being strengthened, in 653, by the conversion of King Cynegils, of Wessex, at whose baptism Oswald stood sponsor, and whose daughter he married. Both sovereigns then established Bishop Birinus at Chester.

This vast supremacy, extending from north to south, and broken only by Penda's kingdom in Mid-

Oswin, Saint, king, and martyr, murdered at Gilling, near Richmond, Yorkshire, England, on 20 August, 651, son of Osric, King of Deira in Britain. On the murder of his father by Cadwalla in 651, Oswin still young was carried away for safety into Wessex, but returned on the death of his kinsan open warfare, and Oswin, unable to meet the superior forces of his adversary, disbanded his army, either from worldly prudence (Bede) or heroic virtue (monk of Tynemouth), and made his way for greater security to Hunwald an ealdorman upon whom he had lately conferred the fief of Gilling. Hunwald promised to conceal him but treacherously betrayed him to Ethelfred, who had Oswin murdered. He was buried at Gilling and soon afterwards transferred to Tynemouth, though another account says he was buried at Tynemouth. The anonymous monk of St. Albans, who in the reign of King Stephen was resident at Tynemouth, and there wrote the same Bede says that Ethelfred ordered the body to be removed by the Danish troubles, but in 1065 his burial-place was made known by an apparition to a monk named Edmund, and his relics were translated on 11 March, 1100, and again on 20 August, 1103.

At the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII there was still a shrine containing the body and veneration of the Gown. A portion of the body was preserved as a reliquary at Durham (cf. Smith, "Bede", III, xiv). Eanfleda, Oswy's queen, daughter of St. Edwin, prevailed upon him to found in repARATION a monastery at Gilling, some remains of which still exist, though it was destroyed by the Danes. Bede in his History (III, xiv) gives a description of it, as a model example of those benefactions for men and above all things humble; tall of stature and of graceful bearing, with pleasant manner and engaging address". There is now preserved in the British Museum (Cotton MS. Galba A. 5.) a psalter which until the fire of 1751 bore the inscription "Liber Oswni Regis".

Otfried of Weissenburg, the eldest German poet known by name, author of the "Evangelienbuch", a rhymed version of the Gospels. A poetical in the body century, but the exact dates of his life are unknown. He was probably born at or near Weissenburg in Alsace, where he also seems to have received his earliest education. Later on he studied at Fulda under the famous Rabanus Maurus, who was abbot there after 822 and presided over the monastic school. After completing the Benedictine Obedience he entered and entered the well-known Benedictine abbey there, becoming prefect of the abbey-school. He was notary there in 851. At Weissenburg he began his great poem, the "Liber evangeliorum theoticis conscriptus", the completion of which occupied the greater part of his life. It was dedicated to King Louis the German and to Bishop Salome of Constance, and both of whom hymns and epistles are addressed in the Franco-German dialect. The poet also addressed an epistle in Latin prose to Bishop Liutpert of Mainz to gain official approbation for his work. Hence the poem must have been finished some time between 863, when Liutpert became archbishop, and 871, when he died. In the letter to Liutpert Otfried tells us that he undertook to write the poem at the request of some of the brethren and of a venerable lady, whose name is not mentioned, for the express purpose of supplanting the worldly poetry that found such favour with the people. He furthermore wished to make known the story of the Gospels to those who did not know them. The poem runs to 15,000 lines and is divided into five books, with reference to the five senses, which are to be purified and sanctified by the reading of the sacred story. The first book narrates the Nativity of Christ; the second and third, His Teachings and Miracles; the fourth, the Passion; the fifth, the Resurrection, Ascension, and Last Judgment. Between the narrative portions chapters are inserted superscribed "Moraliter", "Spiritaliter", "Mystice", in which the events narrated are interpreted allegorically and symbolically.

While Otfried bases his work chiefly on the Vulgate, he also makes use of the writings of Rabanus, Bede, and Ausin, as well as those of St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and others. In fact he is like the theologian rather than a poet, though some passages show undeniable poetic talent. Still, the poem is far inferior to the "Heland" (q. v.), and never became really popular. Particularly noteworthy is the opening chapter of the first book, where the author explains his reasons for writing in German, with a passage (p. 22) which glows with a noble patriotism; the Franks are praised with sincere enthusiasm and are favourably compared with the Greeks and Romans. In form, Otfried's poem marks an epoch in German literature; it is the first poem to employ rhyme instead of the old Ger- manic alliteration, though the rhyme is still very imperfect, being often mere assonance, with frequent traces of alliteration. Three almost complete manuscripts of the work are preserved, at Vienna, Heidelberg, and Munich; fragments of a fourth are found at Berlin, Wolfenbuettel, and Bonn. The Vienna codex is the best. Otfried was noticed early as 1485 by the Abbot of Trithem, and passages from his poem appeared in printed form already at the end of the century. It was a "Germaniarum" of Beatus Rhenanus. An edition then appeared at Basle, 1571, with a preface by Mathias Fliebus, of Illyria. Graff, who published an edition at Konigsberg, 1831, called the poem "Kirst", but that name is now obsolete. Modern editions are those of Kelle (3 vols., Ratisbon, 1855-63; Podborn, 1858 and Freising, 1882-84), and Ermann in Zeitgrob- er's "Germanistische Handbuch", V. (Halle, 1882). Modern German versions have been made by Rapp (Stuttgart, 1858) and Kelle (1870).

ARTHUR F. J. REMY.

Othlo (Otlon), a Benedictine monk of St. Emmer- an's, Ratisbon, b. 1013 in the Diocese of Freising; d. 1072. Having made his studies at Tegernsee and Hersfeld, he was called to Wurzburg by Bishop Meinhard on account of his skill in writing. He entered the Benedictine Order and in 1038 became subprior of the monastery. In 1040, when Ratisbon was appointed dean, 1055, and entrusted with the care of the monastic school. To escape the oppressions of Bishop Otto he fled to Fulda in 1062 where he remained until 1067, when, after a short stay at Amorbach, he returned to Ratisbon and employed his time in literary work. In his early days he had a great relish for the Classics, especially for Lucan, but later he thought them not suited for religious, and tried to replace the heathen authors by writings of his own which served for education and edification. Othlo is praised as modest and pious; he was opposed to dialectics, not out of lack of education but because he wished to be untransmitted by set word and form. He is accused of having originated the legend of the transfer of the relics of St. Denis the Arequipute to Ratisbon, and also of having forged many letters of exemption for his abbey (Leecher in "Neues Archiv", XXV, 427, and "Zeitschr. fur kath. Theol.", XXXI, 18). Among his writings are "Dialogus de suis tenta- tibus", which marked the beginning of autobiography in the Middle Ages (Mabillon, "Anal. nov.", IV, 107); Life of St. Wolfgang of Ratisbon ("Acta SS.", Nov., 11, 1, 565); Life of St. Boniface, compiled from the letters of the saint found at Fulda; Life of St. Alto (partly in "Acta SS.", 11, 1, 359 and entire in "Mon. Germ. Script. Col. lat., 15", 2, 486); Life of St. Magnus ("Acta SS.", Sept., 11, 701).
In Poo ("Thessaurus", I, 143-613) are found: "Dialogus de tribus consiliiis", treating of the symbolism of the number three; "De Nero eloquentia"; "De morbo causis"; "De cursu spirituali"; "De translat. s. Dionysii e Francia in Germaniam", a fragment; "De miraculo quod super accedit eundam haec"; "De adoratione ecclesiorum et laicorum"; "De spirituali doctrina", in hexameters; "Liber Proverbiorum", a posthumous work of the saint, and "De liturgiolum tum surum tum alorum". His collected works are found in Migne (P. L., CXLVI, 27-431).

FRANCIS MERRIAM.

Othmar, AUSDOMAE, SAINT, d. 16 Nov., 759, on the island of Werd in the Rhine, near Eschenz, Switzerland. He was of Alemannian descent, received his education in Rheitia, was ordained priest, and for a time presided over a church of St. Florinus in Rheitia. This church was probably identical with the one of St. Peter at Remis, where St. Florinus had laboured as a priest and was buried. In 729 Waltram of Thurgau appointed Othmar superior over the cell of St. Gall. He united into a monastery the monks that lived about the cell of St. Gall, according to the rule of St. Columban, and became their first abbot. He added a hospital and a school; during his abbacy the Rule of St. Columban was replaced by that of St. Benedict. When Karlmann renounced his throne in 742, Othmar sent a letter to his brother Pepin, recommending Othmar and his monastery to the king's liberality. Othmar personally brought the letter to Pepin, and was kindly received. When the Counts Warin and Ruohart unjustly tried to gain possession of some property belonging to St. Gall, Othmar fearlessly resisted the despoilers, capturing him while he was on a journey to Constance, and held him prisoner, first at the castle of Bodmann, then on the island of Werd in the Rhine. At the latter place he died, after an imprisonment of six months, and was buried. In 769 his body was transferred to the monastery of St. Gall and in 867 he was solemnly entombed in the new church of St. Othmar at St. Gall. His cult began to spread soon after his death, and now he is, next to St. Maurice and St. Gall, the most popular saint in Switzerland. His feast is celebrated on 16 November. He is represented in art as a Benedictine abbot, generally holding a little barrel in his hand, an allusion to the alleged miracle that a barrel of St. Othmar's wine never became empty, no matter how much he took from it to give to the poor.

Michael Ott.

Otho, MARCUS SALVIUS, Roman emperor, successor, after Galba, of Nero, b. in Rome, of an ancient Etruscan family settled at Perentium, 28 April, A.D. 69; d. at Brixellum on the Po, 15 April, 69. He led a prodigal life at the court of Nero. As husband of the courtier Pappea Sabina he was sent for appearance's sake to Lusitania as governor. When Sulpicius Galba was proclaimed emperor, Otho returned to Rome with him. In contrast to the misrule of Galba, he sought to win the esteem of the people by generosity. On 15 April, 69, five days after Galba had appointed Lucius Calpurnius Piso co-emperor and successor, twenty-three soldiers proclaimed Otho emperor upon the open street. As Galba hurried to take measures against this procedure, he and his escort encountered his opponents at the Forum; there was a struggle, and Galba was murdered, while Otho was sole ruler; the senate confirmed his authority. The statues of Nero were again set up by Otho who also set aside an immense sum of money for the completion of the Golden House. Meanwhile, Aulus Vitellius, legate under Galba to southern Germany, was proclaimed emperor at Cologne. Aelius Cnaea, who had been punished by Galba for his outrageous extortion, persuaded the legions of northern Germany to agree to this choice; their example was followed by the troops in Britain. As a third of the standing army had renounced the emperor at Rome. In the winter of 69 these troops advanced into the plain of the River Po, stimulated by anticipation of the wealth of Italy and Rome, and strengthened by the presence of German and Belgian auxiliaries. On the march they learned that Galba was dead and that Otho was the new emperor of Rome. They thereupon adjourned to negotiations with the new ruler at Rome. Compromise failing, both made ready for the decisive struggle. Otho vainly sought to force the citizens of Rome to take energetic measures for security. To expiate any wrong done he recalled the innocent persons who had been banished by Nero's reign, and caused Nero's evil adviser, Sophonisba Flavia, to be put to death. Finally he placed the republic in the care of the Senate and started for upper Italy on 11 March, with the main part of his guard, that had been collected in Rome, and two legions of soldiers belonging to the navy, while seven legions were advancing from Dalmatia, Pannonia, and Moesia. A favourable wind beam'd against the hostile troops from Gaul, that would advance from the south. After some favourable preliminary skirmishes near Placentia and Cremnuna Otho gave the command for a pitched battle before a junction had been effected with the legions from Mysia. While the emperor himself remained far from the struggle at Brixellum on the right bank of the Po, his soldiers were defeated in battle near Cremnuna, and large numbers of them killed (14 April). The next day the remnant of his army was obliged to surrender. On receiving news of the defeat, Otho killed himself. His body was burned, as he had directed, on the spot where he had so ingloriously ended. Vitellius was recognized as emperor by the Senate.

Otranto, Archidioecese of (HYDRUNTINA).—Otranto is a city of the Province of Lecce, Apulia, Southern Italy, situated in a fertile region, and once famous for its breed of horses. It was an ancient Greek colony, which, in the wars of Pyrrhus and of Hannibal, was against Rome. As it is the nearest port to the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea, it was more important than Brindisi, under the Roman emperors. In the eighth century, it was for some time in the possession of Arians, Duke of Benevento (758-87). Having come again under Byzantine rule, it was among the last cities of Apulia to surrender to Robert Guiscard (1068), and then became part of the Principality of Taranto. In the Middle Ages the Jews had a school there. In 1480 there occurred the sack of Otranto by the Turks, in which 12,000 men are said to have perished—among them, Bishop Stephen Pendinelli, who was slain to death; the "valley of the martyrs" still recalls that dreadful event. On other occasions, as in 1537, the Turks landed at Otranto, but they were repulsed. In 1804, the city was obliged to harbour a French garrison that was established there to watch the movements of the English fleet; and in 1810, Napoleon gave Otranto in fief to Fouché.

The cathedral of Otranto is a work of Count Roger I (1068), and was adapted to a church by Bishop John, with a marble floor; the same Count Roger also founded a Basilian monastery here, which, under Abbot Necetas, became a place of study; its library was nearly all bought by Besarion. The first known bishop of this see was Petrus, to whom St. Gregory the Great refers in 596; and there is record of his two successors; they were Sabinus (599) and Petrus (601). Bishop Marcus (about 670) is believed to be the author of the Office for Holy Saturday; Petrus (878) was raised to the dignity of metropolitan by Polyeuctus, Patriarch of Constantinople (956-76), with the obligation to establish the Greek Rite throughout the province. The Latin Rite was introduced again after the Norman conquest, but the Greek Rite remained in use in several towns of the archdiocese and of its suffragans, until the sixteenth century. The See was raised to that of an archbishopric in 1886.

Ottawa, Archdiocese of (Ottawaensis), in Canada, originally comprised the Ottawa Valley, traversed by the Rideau Canal; the northern portion of this diocese, which was, in 1852, made the Vicariate Apostolic of Pontiac, and then became the Diocese of Pembroke, itself dismembered in 1908 to form the Vicariate Apostolic of Timiskaming. Ottawa still has an area of 10,000 square miles, extends into the Counties of Carleton, Russell, Prescott, and Lanark of the Province of Ontario, and into those of Wright, Labelle, Argenteuil, Terrebonne, and Montcalm of the Province of Quebec. The official document of 1901 gave the population of the archdiocese as 156,000 Catholics, 128,000 of whom are French-speaking and 30,000 English-speaking. A few hundreds more speak other languages.

The archdiocese, the see and capital of the Dominion, was founded in 1827 simultaneously with the opening of works on the Rideau Canal, and took its first name of Bytown from Colonel By, a British officer and engineer, who had charge of the construction of the canal. Its water power and admirable position at the foot of the Chaudière Falls and at the mouth of two rivers soon came to the front as a centre of industry. In 1818 its prospects were such that Rome raised the thriving little town to the rank of an episcopal see. In 1854 Bytown was granted city incorporation, and took the name of Ottawa. When the Canadian Confederation was definitively established in 1867, Ottawa was chosen as capital, and has been ever since the residence of the governor-general and the headquarters of Canadian federal politics.

Joseph-Évangile-Bruno Giguères, first Bishop of Ottawa (1818-48) gave his incumbency a solid organization; churches and schools were built, and the college, seminary, and hospital soon followed. Gifted with foresight, Bishop Giguères formed a diocese with the slender resources at his disposal. At his death the Catholic population of the diocese had increased from 32,000 to 93,000, and the number of priests from 15 to 80.

Joseph-Thommas Duhamel, second bishop and first Archbishop of Ottawa, whose episcopate of thirty-four years brought the diocese to its present prosperous state, will figure in the ecclesiastical history of Canada, as a prudent, saintly, and indefatigable worker. A country parish-priest before ascending the episcopal throne, he continued to lead the laborious life of an ordinary priest. His episcopal visitation was his only holiday. On these occasions he would preach several sermons at the usual ceremonies of the visitation, and investigate carefully the administration of the parish. Though stricken with angina pectoris two years before his death, he remained at his post and died in one of his country parishes while making his visitation, 5 June, 1908.

He had been made an archbishop in 1886.

The Archbishopric of Ottawa, Cappelletti, had been translated from the See of Kingston, Ontario to Ottawa, 6 Sept., 1910.

The Catholic University is Ottawa's foremost seat of learning (see OTTAWA, UNIVERSITY OF). Higher education for young ladies is in the hands of the Grey Nuns of the Cross and of the Sisters of the Congregation of Notre Dame (q. v.). Each of these communities has a large institute receiving hundreds of boarders and day pupils. The elementary schools are established in conformity with the Separate School Laws of Ontario and the Public School Laws of Quebec. Catholic elementary schools are, therefore, maintained by government taxation. Catholic ratepayers have nothing to pay for other elementary schools. The schools are efficient and well equipped. In the mind of Archbishop Duhamel, Ottawa, situated on the borders of two great provinces and possessing government libraries and museums, was destined to be an educational centre. Hence the numerous houses of studies established by religious orders in the capital.

Orders of Mary Immaculate, with five parishes, the university, a scholasticate, and juniorate; Dominicans with parish and scholasticate; the Capuchins, with parish and juniorate; Fathers of the Company of Mary, with five parishes, scholasticate, and juniorate; Regular Canons of the Immaculate Conception, with five parishes and college; Redemptorists, with house of studies; Fathers of the Holy Ghost, with agricultural college.

The most important charitable institutions are (1) four orphanages directed by the Sisters of Wisdom, the Grey Nuns, and the Sisters of Providence; (2) three homes for the aged, directed by the Grey Nuns and the Sisters of Providence; (3) orphan and deliverance home for girls under charge of the Sisters of Charity; (4) one Misericordia Refuge for fallen women; (5) three hospitals conducted by the Grey Nuns of the Cross. The Ottawa General Hospital, the largest of the three, was founded in 1845 and has been enlarged at different times. The Youville Training School for Nurses is attached; (6) St. George's Home, the Canadian headquarters of the Catholic Emigration Society of England. The Sisters of Charity of St. Paul receive there the emigrant Catholic children and distribute them in Canadian families.

The Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception, usually called the Basilica, since it has received the title of minor basilica, is a fine Gothic structure with twin towers two hundred feet high, and a seating capacity of 2000. The parishes of St. Joseph, the Sacred Heart, St. John the Baptist, and St. Bridget have also beautiful churches.

F. X. BRUNEL

Ottawa, University of, conducted by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, founded in 1848. It was incorporated in 1849 under the title of the "College of Bytown," thus taking the original name of the city chosen in 1806 as the seat of the Dominion of Canada, and now known as Ottawa. The title in question was changed in 1861 to that of the "College of Ottawa", and the power of granting degrees was conferred on the institution by civil charter in 1886. The university thus began its complete secular existence with the confederation of the Canadian Provinces, and has grown with the growth of the Dominion. Pope Leo XIII, by Brief of 5 February, 1893, raised the University of Ottawa to the rank of a Catholic University. The Brief expresses the will of the Holy See that the Archbishop of Ottawa shall be ex officio Apostolic chancellor of the university, and that he and the "other Bishops of the ecclesiastical provinces of Ottawa and Toronto who shall affiliate their seminaries to the university," shall have all the aforesaid powers, to watch over the preservation of a correct and sound doctrine in the same." It may be added that the institution has also been of late years placed among the number of Colonial and Indian universities, whose students are entitled to certain privileges accorded by a statute of the University of Oxford, passed in 1857.

Situ-ated in the capital of the Dominion, and in a district which is largely French in population, the University of Ottawa offers parallel courses in English and French. It is left to the choice of parents and students to take the classical course in one or other languages. The university is governed by a chancellor, rector, vice-rector, senate, and council of administration. The faculties so far organized are those of: (1) theology, (2) law, this being an examining body only, according to certain provisions and regulations made, in this regard, by the provincial legislature of Ontario, (3) philosophy, and arts. Other departments are the collegiate course and the commercial course, the former leading to matriculation which admits to the arts course in Canadian universities and to technical schools. The course in arts, after matriculation, covers four years. In theology a course of four years is provided, and embraces all the branches of ecclesiastical science usually taught in Catholic seminaries. The university has, in a separate building known as the Science Hall, well-equipped physical, chemical, and mineralogical laboratories, also a natural history museum and excellent numismatic and conchological collections.

In December, 1903, fire totally destroyed the main building, a structure covering the greater part of a block 400 feet by 200. The library of the university, consisting of over 30,000 volumes, was wholly destroyed, but has been replaced, in great part, largely by donations.

The teaching staff consists of fifty professors and instructors. The number of students in 1909-10 was 591; of these 350 were in residence in the Theological Building, or Scholasticate of the Oblate Fathers, the Collegiate Building or Juniorate, and the New Arts Building. Students whose homes are not in Ottawa are required to live in the University buildings. Private rooms are provided for them. The dean has a long list of graduates and alumni, including names of men prominent in every walk of Canadian life.

The Science Hall, completed in 1901, and the New Arts Building erected to replace the building destroyed in 1903, are fire-proof structures and are among the best-equipped college buildings in Canada. The University owns ten acres of property in the city.

Like other seats of learning in Canada, the university lately began to offer the advantages of an extra-mural course to those who desire to pursue collegiate studies, but who are unable to attend its lectures. Extra-mural students are allowed to do the work of the course, and to present themselves for examinations. Before being registered, candidates for a degree must pass the matriculation, or an examination accepted by the senate as equivalent. Students are to attend the university for the latter part of the course, if at all possible.

The "Calendar" and "Annuaire", published annually by the university, give detailed information in regard to courses of study, conditions of admission, examinations, and fees in all departments. The University Review, issued once a year, forming an annual volume of from four to five hundred pages, is the organ of the students.

FRANCIS W. GREY.

Otto, Saint, Bishop of Bamberg, b. about 1000; d. 30 June, 1103. He belonged to the noble, though not very wealthy, family of the Counts of Andechs. He was ordained priest, but where he was educated is not known. While still young he joined the household of Duke Wladislaw of Poland; in 1090 he entered the service of Emperor Henry IV, and about 1101 was made chancellor. In 1102 the emperor appointed and invested him as Bishop of Bamberg. In the conflict of investitures (q. v.) he sided chiefly in political matters with Henry IV, although he avoided taking sides openly. He refused to be consecrated by a schismatic bishop. Through ambassadors he declared his loyalty to the Holy See. In 1103 he joined the party of Henry V, drove out Pope Clement III, and was consecrated bishop. He never became a partisan. In 1110-11 he accompanied Henry on his journey to Rome, but, like other noble characters, he disapproved of the disgraceful treatment of Pope Paschal. This is clear from the fact that he received the pallium from the pope on 15 April, 1111. When the war broke out again in 1115, Otto, as if in consequence was suspended by the papal party at the Synod in Fritzlar in 1118. At the Congress of Würzburg in 1121 he strove for peace, which was concluded in 1122 at Worms. Meanwhile he had devoted himself entirely to his diocese and as bishop had led a model, simple, and even a poor life. He increased the possessions of the Church by new acquisitions, recovered alienated dependencies, completed the cathedral, improved the cathedral school, built castles and churches. In particular he favoured the monks, and founded over twenty monasteries in the Dioceses of Bamberg, Würzburg, Ratibon, Fasson, Eichstätt, Oberstburg and Aqüilea. He formed other monasteries. Thus he merited the name of "Father of the Monks".

His greatest service was his missionary work among the Pomeranians. In the Peace with Poland in 1120 the latter had engaged to adopt Christianity. Attempts to convert them through Polish priests and through an Italian Bishop, Bernard, proved futile. Duke Boleslaus III then appealed to Otto, and it is due to Otto that the undertaking partook of a German character. Through an understanding with the pope, who appointed him legate, the emperor and the princes, he started in May, 1124, and travelled through Prague, Redomin, Posen, and Gnesen in East Pomerania, was received by the duke with great respect, and won over the people through his quiet yet firm attitude, his magnificent appearance, generous donations, and gentle, inspiring sermons. He converted Pirytz, Kamuin, Stettin, John, and in nine places established eleven churches; 22,165 persons were baptized. In 1127 he returned to Bamberg. As he had travelled again from Pomerania through Magdeburg and Havelberg about the year 1128. The Diet of Usedom he gained over through his inspiring discourses all the nobles of the land to Christendom. He then converted several provinces, and led back those who had fallen away. Even after his return (in the same year) he was in constant communication with the Pomeranians and sent them priests from Bam-
Upon the death of his father, Otto was elected to the Empire by his nobles, and he traveled to Rome to secure the coronation. The Pope, however, was not inclined to recognize Otto as Emperor, and a series of events ensued that would shape the course of German history. The anti-Imperial movement, led by the Church and the nobility, sought to prevent the establishment of a centralized authority that could undermine their power. Otto's coronation at Rome was followed by a period of struggle, marked by the rise of the Hohenstaufen dynasty, which would eventually consolidate German power.

The reign of Otto and his successors was marked by the ongoing conflict between the Empire and the Church, as well as the growing influence of the nobility. The empire, in its efforts to expand its territories and assert its influence, found itself increasingly at odds with the papacy and the Church. The struggle for power, therefore, was not confined to the realm of politics but also involved religious and cultural dimensions. The empire's aims were to establish a centralized authority that could control the Church and its temporal domains, while the Church sought to preserve its independence and spiritual authority.

Otto's reign was significant in that it marked the beginning of a new era in German history, one in which the empire sought to establish itself as a powerful entity capable of competing with the papacy and the other states of Europe. The empire's attempts to assert its authority, however, were met with resistance from the Church and the nobility, leading to a series of conflicts that would shape the course of medieval Europe.
Ludolph had fortified their duchies. Meanwhile the Magyar hordes surrounded Augsburg. Bishop Ulrich heroically defended the threatened city. In the great battle on the Lechfeld in 955, the Hungarian army was completely routed by Otto, who had advanced to the defence of the city. By this victory he freed Germany finally from the Hungarian yoke. It marks a crisis in the history of the Magyar race, which now became independent and founded an empire with definite boundaries. It also caused Otto to realize that his great object of preventing the perpetuation of power with the duchies was not attainable by force or through the prestige of his kingly rank. He at once decided to turn a crusade against the Magyars to a war from the German Church throughout the empire.

The Ottonian system, a close alliance of the German realm with the Church, was begun. Charlemagne, too, had carried out the great conception of unity of Church and State, but the ecclesiastical idea had given a religious colouring to Frankish state-institution, whilst Otto planned a State Church, with the spiritual hierarchy a mere branch of the interior government of the realm. In order to solve this problem Otto was first constrained to permeate the Church with new spiritual and moral life and also free himself from the domination of the lay aristocracy. His own deeply religious nature naturally inclined him to the monastic ideal. His ascetic life which distinguished his mother, Mathilda, was found also in the son; and his brother Bruno, later Archbishop of Cologne, as the clever representative of ecclesiastical views, also exercised a great influence upon the king's religious dispositions. The close union of Church and State had an equally salutary effect upon both of the powers concerned. By granting the Church such royal domains as were not in use, the State could devote its revenues to military purposes. For the united realm this situation was likewise rich in blessings, since under the protection of the bishops, commerce and trade were developed on the great ecclesiastical estates and the lower classes received from the Church protection against the nobles. The kingdom everywhere retained supremacy over the Church; the king could nominate bishops and abbots; the bishops were subject to the royal tribunals; and synods could only be called with the royal approval. The German court became the centre of the spiritual life. The so-called Ottonian renaissance, however, were chiefly concerned, led by the women of the royal family: Mathilda, Gerberga, Judith, Adelaide, and Theophano. Quedlinburg, founded by Otto in 936, was an influential centre of culture. But this Ottonian system deeply affected the German State, the king must control the Church. As a matter of fact, the supreme authority over the German Church was the pope. Yet Otto's policy of imperialism was rooted in the recognition of the above premise. The conquest of Italy should result in the subjection of the highest ecclesiastical authority to German royalty. Otto was consequently obliged to make this campaign; and the much discussed question of the motive dictating the imperial policy is resolved. The unworthy John XII was at that time reigning in Rome. He was the son of Alberich, the Tyrant of Rome, whose covetous glances were directed towards the Exarchate and the Pentapolis. A rival in these aspirations rose in the person of Berengarius who endeavoured to extend his rule over Rome. Otto complied with the pope's request for aid, which exactly suited his projected church policy. He had previously caused his son Otto, a minor, to be elected and anointed king at the Diet of Worms in 951. He let his son be crowned by his natural son, Wilhelm, regent in Germany, and journeyed over the Brenner and thus to Rome, where he was crowned emperor on 2 Feb., 962. On this occasion the so-called Ottonian privilege was conferred, whose genuineness has been frequently, though unjustly, attacked. In its first part this privilege recalls the Pactum Hludovici of 817. It confirms the grants which the Church received from the Carolingians and their successors. The second part goes back to the Constitution of Lothair (821), according to which the consecration of kings should always be permitted by the German ruler. When Otto marched against Berengarius, Pope John entered into treasonable relations with the emperor's enemies; whereupon Otto returned to Rome and forced the Romans to take an oath never to elect a pope without his own or his son's approval. John was deposed and a layman, Leo VIII, placed upon the papal throne. Then Berengarius was defeated in his turn and carried a prisoner to Bamberg. Once more Rome, always in a state of unrest, rose in arms. The exiled pope, John, forced his supplanter to flee. But John died in 964, and the Romans elected a new pope, Benedict V. The emperor energetically restored order and Leo was reinstated in his position. It was already apparent that the emperor really controlled the papacy which occupied the position of a mere link in the German constitution. The Ottonian system was of the greatest significance to Germany in her position towards the secular powers. How greatly the German King was strengthened through the close alliance between Church and State, and how he enhanced the prestige of the empire, is evident from the progress that Teutonism and Christianity were making in Slav territory. Otto chose Magdeburg, for which he had a special attachment, as the local centre of this new civilization, and raised it to an archbishopric.

Recurring disorders now recalled him to Rome. The pope whom he had chosen, John XIII, found antagonists in the Roman nobility. The emperor performed his duties as protector of the Church with stern justice and punished the turbulent nobles. John XIII then crowned his son, Otto, emperor. As a logical consequence of his imperial policy, he now openly avowed his intention of acquiring Lower Italy. His supremacy would be absolutely safeguarded if he succeeded in gaining possession of the southern part of the peninsula. Otto, however, finally abandoned the war in the south. His son's prospect of obtaining a Byzantine princess for his bride turned the scale against it. The old German axiom of legitimacy, which was once more honoured in this marriage, was destined later on to revenge itself bitterly.

Otto was buried at Magdeburg. His contemporaries compared his tremendous physical strength to that of a lion. He was a Saxon through and through. He invested his youth heart and soul in all the possession of arms. Though subject to violent fits of temper, and conscious of his power and genius, he prayed as devoutly as a child. A shrewd calculator, always convincing and always treading, he correctly estimated the importance of diplomatic negotiations. He was a good observer and possessed the knowledge of human nature which always enabled him to select the proper persons for important offices in the government.

Otto II, King of the Germans and Emperor of Rome, son of Otto I and Adelaide, b. 955; d. in Rome, 7 Dec., 983. In 961 he was elected king at Worms, and was crowned at Aix, 26 May. Frail in body, he possessed an intrepid and arbitrary spirit. With him began that extravagant policy of imperialism, which aimed at restoring the world boundaries of the ancients, and to encompass the Ancient Sea (the Mediterranean). Germany, Switzerland, and Italy were to wield the balance of power. Reacting against this imperialistic policy was the revived strength of particularism. The conflict with the ducal House of Bavaria gave a dangerous aspect to affairs. In Bavaria (with Otto's approval) the duchess dowager Judith acted as regent for her son Henry. Upon coming of age he was given the Duchy of Bavaria in fee by Otto II, who, at the same time, invested Ludolph's son Otto with Swabia on the death of Duke Burchard, ignoring the latter's widow, Hedwig, a daughter of Judith. Henry, named the "Quarrelsome", supported by Abraham of Frieding, Boleslaw of Bohemia, and Mieszlaw of Poland, opposed this. The war finally ended by Judith being innured in a cloister and Henry declared to have forfeited his duky. Ludolph's son Otto received the vacant ducal throne. The Eastmark was separated from Bavaria and given in fee to Liutpold of Bavaria, who laid the foundation of the future renown of his family. In 978 Lothair, who aspired to the acquisition of Western Germany, invaded Lorraine, and pillaged Aix, where Otto narrowly escaped capture. But Lothair did not advance further. In Dortmund a war of reprisal was at once decided upon; with 90,000 men, Otto marched upon Paris, which he failed to take. Lothair, however, was obliged to come to terms, and in 980 the two kings met near Sedan, where Otto obtained an agreement securing the former boundaries.

In Rome, Crescentius, a son of Theodora, headed a disorderly factional government and sought to settle the dispute for the Holy See by coercion. Otto crossed the Alps and freed the papacy. While in Rome his mind became imbued with dreams of ancient imperialism; he would give his imperialistic policy a firm foundation by bringing all Italy under subjection. In Southern Italy the Byzantines and Saracens united against the German pretensions, and in 992 the war with these ancient powers commenced. Tarantum fell into the hands of the German king, but 15 July, 992, he was defeated near Cape Colone, not far from Crotone. This battle resulted in the surrender of Apulia and Calabria and destroyed the prestige of the imperial authority throughout Italy. The effect spread to the people of the North and the turbulent Slavs on the East, and shortly after the Danes and Wends rose up in arms. But Otto was victorious. The Christian mission, under the leadership of pilgrims of Passau, had made great progress in the territory of the Magyars. Then came the defeat in Calabria, whereupon all of Saracenia, particularly the heathen part, revolted against Crescentius. The promising beginnings of German and Christian culture east of the Elbe, inaugurated by Otto, were destroyed. In Bohemia the ecclesiastical organization was thoroughly established, but the emperor was unable to support the bishop whom he had placed there. On the Havet and the Spree Christianity was almost annihilated. Affairs were in equally bad condition among the Wends. The reign of Otto II has been justly called the period of martyrdom for the German imperial mission, which had been organized by Otto I, with few exceptions, destroyed. Otto II now renewed the despotic policy towards the Saxonian border nobles and imposed open discontent. In 983 he held an Imperial Diet where his son was elected king as Otto III and where the assembled nobles pledged their support. He departed with high hopes for Southern Italy. Fortune seemed to favour the imperial leader, who expected to wipe out the disgrace suffered in the south. He chose a new pope, Peter of Pavia (John XIV). While in Rome he was stricken with malaria and was buried in St. Peter's. At the time of his death the relations of the empire towards the papacy were still undefined. He had been unable to maintain his political ascendancy in Rome. His imperialistic policy had placed the restraints of progressive and partial Christianity and Germanization on the borders; and he, pursuing fanciful dreams, believed that he might dare to transfer the goal of his policy to the south.

Otto III, German king and Roman emperor, b. 960; d. at Patarino, 21 Jan., 1002. At the age of three he was elected king at Verona, in very restless times. Henry the Quarrelsome, the deceased Duke of Bavaria, claimed his guardianship. This was opposed by the imperial crown. To further his object he made an alliance with Lothair of France. Williger, Archbishop of Mainz, the leader of Otto's party, improved the situation. He induced Henry to release the imprisoned king, for which his Duchy of Bavaria was restored. Otto's mother, Theophano, now assumed the regency. She abandoned her husband's imperialistic policy and devoted herself entirely to furthering an alliance between Church and State. Her policy bore a broad national stamp. On her husband's death, this princess styled herself simply "Emperor" in Italy, though she was obliged for political reasons to acknowledge Crescentius as Patriarch by her personal presence in Rome in 980. In France Louis V had died without heirs, and Hugh Capet was elected. This was the work of the French episcopate. Theophano was not able to prevent France from speedily freeing herself from German influence. The recent endeavours to watch over the national questions of the Empire in the East. One of the greatest achievements of this emperor was her success in maintaining feudal supremacy over Bohemia.

After her death, the less capable Adelaide assumed the regency. Unlike her predecessor, hers was not a nature fitted to rule; the Slavs rose on the eastern border, and the Normans were with difficulty held in check. She died in 999. The influence of these two women upon the education of the young king (who assumed the government in 994) was not slight. But two men exercised even greater influence on him: Johannes Nonetuló, a protégé of Theophano, and Bernward of Hildesheim. The austere Bernard awakened in him that imagination to fanciful enthusiasm which foreshadowed his dreams of empire.

Supported by the spiritual princes of the Empire, he marched into Italy. Here he behaved as though the Roman see were a metropolitan bishopric under the Empire. He it was who presided at synods and dared to revoke papal decisions, and who selected the pope as his representative. And he was conscious of the spiritual character of his imperial dignity, and deduced from this the necessity of setting the empire over the papacy. He raised a German, Bruno, to the Chair of Peter under the name of Gregory V. The new pope crowned Otto emperor 21 May, 1000, but he did not act counter to the ancient claims of the Curia, and he emphasized the duties and rights of the popes.

Otto returned to Germany in 996. It was of the greatest consequence that in Bruno the papal throne contained a man who encouraged the ideas of the reform party for purification and spiritualization within the Church, and a consequent exaltation of the papacy. Harmonizing with this reform party was the ascetic movement which in the Church's Structure took shape as the Franciscan Order. An opponent was a native of Southern Italy called Nihil. Among his pupils was the Bohemian, Adalbert, second Bishop of Prague, who was at that time in Rome devoting himself entirely to mystical and ascetic enthusiasm. In 996 Otto met this remarkable man whom he succeeded in sending back to his see. As he scrambled returning to Bohemia, he went as missionary to the Prussian country, where he was put to death in 999. The emperor was affected by the grotesque piety of this man, and it had aroused ascetic inclinations in him also. Still another person obtained great influence over him: the learned Frenchman, Gerbert, who came to the Imperial court in 997.

In Rome, meanwhile, Crescentius had set up an antipope named John XVI and forced Gregory V to flee. In 998 Otto went to Rome, where he pronounced severe judgment upon those who had rebelled against his decisions. Gregory died in 999, and the emperor raised his friend Gerbert to the papacy as Urban II. He did not, however, desert the claims of the Curia. Otto advocated papal supremacy over all Christendom. How was this consistent and energetic policy of the Curia to affect the youthful emperor's dreams of a fusion of the ideal state with the ideal church in an Augustan Theocracy? The interference with Italian affairs was now to recur bitterly upon Germany. In 1000 Otto made a pilgrimage to the tomb of his friend Adalbert at Gnesen, where he erected an archiepiscopal destined to promote the emancipation of the Eastern Slavonians. He practised mortifications at the tomb of an ascetic, and thrilled with the highest ideas of his imperial dignity, he afterwards caused Otto the Third to be crowned in Rome in the tomb of St. Peter. Before long his dreams of empire faded away. Everywhere there was fermentation throughout Italy. Otto, lingering in Rome, found himself, with the pope, obliged to abandon the city. In Germany the princes united in a national opposition to the imperialism of this capricious sovereign. He had few supporters in his plan to reconquer the Eternal City. Only by recourse to arms could his body be brought to Aix, where his recent tomb has been discovered in the cathedral.

On 11 November, 1289, he was once more elected, this time at Frankfort, which event was followed by a period of mutual understanding and a short term of peace for the kingdom. To ensure the support of the pope, Otto drew up a charter at Speyer on 22 March, 1290, in which he renewed the concessions previously made, and added others. He now promised not to prevent appeals regarding ecclesiastical affairs being made to the Holy See. Of the greatest significance was his act acknowledging the exclusive right of election of the cathedral chapter. In 1290 Otto journeyed to Rome to receive the imperial crown. On this occasion he did not come as a humble petitioner, but as German king to order the affairs of Italy and to bring about the resumption of diplomatic relations with the papacy. In 1299, as the coronation was an accomplished fact (4 Oct., 1299), it was apparent that he intended to make the policy of the Hohenstaufen his own. His first step was to lay claim to Sicily. The pope, who must have feared a re-establishment of the dominion of Henry VI in lower Italy, excommunicated Otto on 18 October, 1290, and determined to place the kingdom of Sicily under Frederick II, upon the throne. The latter secured the support of France, and thus succeeded once more in winning the German princes to his cause.

On the day of Otto's death, a Hohenstaufen party completely abandoned his standard for that of Frederick. The renewed conflict between the Hohenstaufen and the French princes was conducted in Germany, but abroad. Conditions in the kingdom were so changed that foreign arms were destined to decide the contest for the German crown. So crushed was the defeat inflicted upon the Guelf and English forces by Philip Augustus at Bouvines (27 July, 1214), that Otto's cause was lost. Although he endeavoured in 1217 and 1218 to make a further effort to reserve the throne he met with no great success. Absoled from his excommunication, he died on 19 May, 1218, and was buried at St. Blasien in Brunswick.

OTTOBEUREN

Ottobon, Pietro. See Alexander VIII.

Otto of Freising, bishop and historian, b. between 1111 and 1114, d. at Morimond, Champagne, France, 22 September, 1158. He was the son of St. Leopold of Austria, and Agnes, daughter of Henry IV. Through his mother's first marriage with the Hohenstaufen Frederick I, Duke of Swabia, he was half-brother of Conrad III and uncle of Emperor Frederick Barbarossa. Like his younger brothers he was early destined for the priesthood, and when scarcely more than a child he was made provost of the chapter of canons at Klosterneburg, near Vienna, founded in 1111. For the education of the child he was sent to the University of Paris, the centre of learning, philosophical, theological, and classical. On his journey home he and fifteen other noblemen entered the Cisterian Order at Morimond. It is not known what led him to take this sudden step. Within three years he was elected abbot of the monastery, but shortly afterwards, probably in the same year (1157 or 1158), was called to Freising as bishop, though he did not lay aside the habit of his order. As bishop he displayed a highly beneficent activity by founding and reforming monasteries, and zealously furthering scientific studies by introducing Aristotelian philosophy and scholastic disputations on the model of the University of Paris. As a scholar at Freising flourishing he removed many of the abuses that had crept in, in consequence of the intestitute strife, and demanded back the properties of which the Church had been robbed. In every way he raised the prestige of the Church in Freising as against the nobility, and after bitter struggles freed it from the bardensome bawling of the Webers' guild.

As prince-bishop of Freising, in 1168, he with Archbishop Wiedemann (1158-66) again began to flourish: he erected a printing establishment and a common house of studies for the Saxon Benedictines. The latter, however, was soon closed, owing to the ravages of the Thirty Years' War.

The most flourishing period in the history of Otto-to the Holy Land. The part of the army entrusted to Otto was completely annihilated, and he himself returned home after undergoing the severest privations and facing the greatest dangers. Otto was to have accompanied Emperor Frederick on his march into Italy in 1158, but remained behind on account of ill-health. He went to France to attend the general chapter of his order, and died while revisiting the monastery of Morimond.

In addition to a short fragment of a history of Hildebrand (edited by Goldast, "Apologia pro Henrico IV") Hanover, 1611, 1618, two historical works by Otto of Freising are extant, the so-called "Chronicle" (Chronicon seu rerum ab initio mundi ad usum tempora 1116 libri VIII) and the "History of Emperor Frederick" (De vita et gestis Henrici IV). The "Chronicle", dedicated to the clerics Lein- grin (perhaps Abbot of Ottobergen), is a universal history in eight books based in the main on the great medieval chronicles, especially on Ekkehard, but also on the church histories of Rufinus and Orosius. Otto's work, however, is by no means a chronicle in the sense of its predecessors. He himself did not call it a chronicle, but gave it the title of "De duabus civitatibus", since, as he asserted, he did not wish merely to enumerate the different events but to combine, as in a tragedy, a picture of the evil which abounded in his time. For this purpose he adheres closely to St. Augustine's teaching of two states, especially as elaborated in the "De Civitate Dei". Although he also uses books by Rufinus and Orosius concerning the misery of the world. Although the doctrine of the two states as it appears in Otto's historical work can be variously interpreted, he undoubtedly wished to represent the conflict between the civitas Dei (City of God) and the civitas diaboli (City of the Devil), between the children of God and the civitas Babylonum monstrum cubae (citizens of Babylon and lovers of the world). Evidently his belief is, that after Christ the conflict between the mundane state of Babylon and the Divine state of Israel changed into a conflict between Christianity and paganism or heresy. After the complete victory of Christianity, however, he treats almost exclusively of the civitas Dei, which then merges into the Church. Nevertheless, he is compelled to represent it in its earthly admixture as a corpus admixtum, in which the chosen ones must live and act side by side with the outcasts. Guided by these views, he gives a narrative in the first seven books extending from the creation of the world to the opening years of the fourth century. The eighth book depicts the Anti christ, the Second Coming, the Resurrection of the Dead, the Last Judgment, the end of the mundane state, and the beginning of the Divine state. Thus, through a unifying conception, he succeeded in representing the entire range of history as a connected whole, by which he became, if not the first, certainly the most important representative of the medieval philosophy of history. The work, which was spread in many manuscripts, was first published in 1515 in Strasburg (ex ordibus M. Scharvari). Wilmanns issued a critical edition of it in "Monumenta Germ. Scrip torum", XX (Hanover, 1868), pp. 317-15, and a German translation of the second and seventh books was published in Leipzig (1858). Otto began his second historical work, "Gesta Fried erici", almost ten years after the completion of his "Chronicle". But he could not finish it, and at his death entrusted the continuation of it to his chaplain Raspe. The work begins with a treatise on Biblical sources, and therefore could reproduce verbatim a number of extremely important documents. Although a unifying thought is not so apparent in this work, it is not difficult to perceive that Otto here desired to prove that happiness in this world depends upon the harmonious co-operation of Church and State. Throughout the "Gesta" he endeavors to show that a happy state of peace followed the termina of the conflicts between the emperor and the pope at Frederick's accession to the throne. And even though the feeling of worldliness, the pessimism of Otto, or rather of the Middle Ages—cf. Hauke, "Kirchengeschichte", IV, 479 sqq.—which dominates his "Chronicle", crops up repeatedly, a spirit of "cheerful buoyancy" pervades the entire work, and the dramatic personae are depicted more freely and with greater self-confidence. In the first book he describes the conflicts of the Church with the emperor (through the disputes between the empire and the papacy under Henry IV to the death of Conrad III). In the second he relates the history of the years of peace (1152-6). The "Gesta Frederici", therefore, is an extremely important work, despite the fact that the author himself did not see it finished. It is to be noted that, in its form and content, though it cannot be expected to fulfill all the requirements of modern standards. The first edition was published at Strasburg in 1515; Wilmanns published a critical edition of it in "Monumenta Germ. Scrip torum", XX (Hanover, 1868), pp. 317-15, and a German translation of it appeared in Leipzig (1858).

PATRICK SCHLAGER

Otto of Passau.—All we know of him is in the preface of his work, in which he calls himself a member of the Franciscan Order, at one time lector of theology at Basle, and says that he finished his writing on 2 (1) Feb, 1586, dedicating it to all the "friends of God", both clerical and lay, male and female, and begs for their prayers. According to Saralea ("Suppl. Script. Franciscan ordinis", Rome, 1806, 571) he was a native of Flanders and belonged to the Franciscan province of Cologne. His book bears the title "Die vierundzwanzig alten oder der geldin Trojer mummen der selben". He introduces the twenty-four ancients of Apos, iv, 4, and makes them utter sentences of wisdom by which men can obtain the golden throne in eternal life. The sentences are taken from Holy Scripture, the Fathers, Scholastics, and from those heathen authors of whom the Church speaks. He thus enumerates 104 "masters", among whom are also some of the mystics, as Hugo and Richard of St. Victor. He generally gives accurate quotations of his sources though he also draws from some not specified, e.g., St. Elizabeth of Schonau. He tries to remain on strictly Catholic ground, but sometimes loses himself in dogmatical intricacies and quibbles. To be plain and intelligible he frequently uses trivials expressions. He writes on the nature of God and of man, on their mutual relation, on the requisites for perfection: contrition, confession, and penance; on internal and external life, purity of motives, shunning idleness, love of God and of the neighbor, the necessity of faith, and the great Good. He speaks of the Scriptures as the storehouse of Divine wisdom and urges the faithful to read them. In speaking of contemplative life he insists that none can reach it without spending time in the active service of God and man. The term "friends of God" he explains according to John, xx, 15, and speaks of prayer, humility, obedience, spiritual life, virtues and vices, and shows Christ as the model of all virtues. The longest chapters, eleven and twelve, devote to the Holy Eucharist and to the Blessed Virgin. The last chapters treat of death and the future life. The number of manuscript copies of the book (about forty) bears evidence of the estimation in which it was held. It found its way to all "friends of God" in the south of Germany, along the Lower Rhine and in the Netherlands. It first appeared in print in 1470, probably by Pister in Bâmburg. A modernized edition, "Die Korne der Jeltesten," was made in 1835 at Landshut as a tenth volume of "Leistern auf der Bahn des Heils.

FRANCIS MERSHMAN.

Otto of St. Blasien, chronicler, b. about the middle of the twelfth century; d. 23 July, 1223, at St. Blasien in the Black Forest, Baden. Nothing is known of the events of his life. It is probable that in his later days he became abbett of the renowned Benedictine monastery of St. Blasien. He is known as the writer who compiled the chronicles of Freising, like whom he possessed a great talent for presenting a clear survey of events. His language was lofty, and followed the model of the ancient classics. Like many of his contemporaries, he liked to apply the fixed formulas of Justinian to the German emperors, probably on the assumption, then widespread, that the Roman Empire was only the continuation of the Roman Empire of the Caesars. His chronicles, written in the form of annals, "Ad librum VII chronici Ottonis Frisingensis episopi continuatae historiae appendix sive Continuatio Sanblasiana," embrace the period from 1116 to 1209, that is, the period from Conrad III to the murder of Philip of Swabia. Since he was distantly in time from the facts he narrates, his accounts are wholly objective, even though he makes no concealment of his prejudice in favour of the Hohenstaufen, who in 1218 received the bailiwick of St. Blasien from the dukes of Zähringen. Yet, after Otto IV of Wittelsbach was recognized as German emperor, he wrote of him in the same eulogy as of his predecessors. Nevertheless, without any apparent cause, the narrative breaks off at the coronation of Otto IV. Perhaps the chronicler shrank from describing the bloody party conflicts of the times. His chief sources were the "Gesta Friderici" and perhaps Abbanian chronicles. On the whole his statements may be trusted. It is only when he has to resort to oral reports that he becomes unreliable; this is especially the case in his chronology, though he is not to be reproached with intentional misrepresentation of facts for this reason. His chronicles were published by R. Wilms in "Mon. Germ. Hist.; Script." (XX, pp. 301-34); they were translated into German by Josef Knebel in "Die deutschen Vorzeit" (12 century, vol. VIII, Leipzig, 1881, 2nd ed., 1894).

Ouen, St. (Owen; Daden, Lat. Ambrosius), Archbishop of Ross, b. at Saney, near Soissons about 609; d. at Clithy-la-Garenne, near Paris, 21 Aug., 683. His father, Athurinus, and his mother, Aga, belonged to the Gallo-Roman race. Shortly after his birth his family came to Usses-sur-Marne, where he spent his childhood, with which tradition connects a series of marvellous events. Being afterwards sent to the Abbey of St. Médard he received an education which caused him to be welcomed at the court of Clovis II a short time previous to the death of that prince. The latter, when Dagobert I, made him his regent, confided to him his regency or chancellor and profited greatly by his talents and learning. He charged him with important missions, and it is believed, with compiling the Salic Law. St. Owen found at the royal court Eloi (Eligius), another holy person, whose life was very similar to his, and who became Archbishop of Remiremont. Both of them, despite the disorders of the Frankish king, served him faithfully. But when Dagobert was dead they considered themselves released from all secular duties, and leaving the court they devoted themselves in seclusion to the theological studies which attracted them.

St. Ouen, who in 634 founded the Abbey of Rabans, was ordained priest by Diedomme, Bishop of Mâcon. Some time after his virtues and great ability marked him out for the archiepiscopal See of Rouen, left vacant by the death of St. Romain. Elected in 639 he was consecrated at Rouen, 21 May, 640, with his friend St. Eloi, who became Bishop of Mâcon. The Diocese of Rouen, in which there were still barbarian districts from which paganism had not disappeared, was transferred under Ouen's successor to whom the worship of false gods was ordered to cease, founded numerous monasteries, and developed theological studies. Occasionally the statesmen reappeared in St. Ouen. For instance he upheld Ebroin the mayor of the palace in his fight against the aristocracy. After Ebroin's death, at the invitation of Thierry I he went to Cologne and succeeded in restoring peace between Neustria and Austrasia. Shortly after he was attacked by the illness to which he succumbed. His body, which was brought to Rouen and interred in the Abbey of St. Pierre which thenceforth assumed his name, was translated several times, in 822, 856, and finally in 1050. St. Eloi, who survived St. Eloi, wrote the life of his friend. This biography, which is one of the most authentic historical monuments of the seventh century, contains a store of valuable information regarding the moral and religious situation of that time. It was published for the first time by Dom Luc d'Acquoy in vol. V of his "Spicilegium.

Our Father. See Lord's Prayer.

Our Lady, Help of Christians, Feast of.—The invocation Auxilium Christianorum (Help of Christians) originated in the 14th century. Bernard of Clairvaux, archbishop of Lorraine, published at Maceratta two litanies of the BL Virgin, which, he contended, were used at Loreto: one a form is entirely different from our present text, and another form ("Alle litanie B. M. V.") identical with the litany of Loreto, approved by Clement VIII in 1601, and now used throughout the entire Church. This second form contains the invocation Auxiliwm Christianorum. Possibly the warriors, who returning from Lepanto (7 Oct., 1571) visited the sanctuary of Loreto, saluted the Holy Virgin there for the first time with this new title; it is more probable, however, that it is only a variation of the older invocation Adventus Christianorum, found in a litany of 1523. The Roman Breviary (24 May, Appendix) says that Pius V inserted the invocation in the litany of Loreto after the battle of Lepanto; but the form of the litany in which it is first found was unknown at Rome at the time of Pius V (see Litany of Loreto; Schuetz, "Gesch. des Rosenkranzgebetes", Paderborn, 1909, 249 sq.).

The feast of Our Lady, Help of Christians, was instituted by Pius VII. By order of Napoleon, Pius VII was arrested, 5 July, 1808, and detained a prisoner for three years at Savona, and then at Fontainebleau. In January, 1814, after the battle of Leipzig, he was brought back to Savona, and placed in the care of the Lady of Mercy, the Patroness of Savona. The journey to Rome was a veritable triumphal march. The pontiff, attributing the victory of the Church after so much agony and distress to the Blessed Virgin, visited many of her sanctuaries on the way and crowned her images (e.g. the "Madonna del Monte" at Cesena, "della Misericordia" at Treja, "della Colonne" and "della Tempestà" at Tolentino). The people crowded the streets to catch a glimpse of the venerable pontiff who had so recently visited Rome, in the threats of Napoleon. He entered Rome, 24 May, 1814, and was enthusiastically welcomed (McCaffrey, "History of the Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century", 1899, I, 52). To commemorate his own sufferings and those of the Church during his exile he extended the feast of the Seven Dolours of Mary (third Sunday in September) to the whole Church, by a bull of 29 Sept., 1814. When Napoleon left Elba and returned to Paris, Murat was about to march through the Papal States from Naples; Pius VII fled to Savona (22 March, 1815), where he crowned the image of our Lady of Mercy, 10 May, 1815. After the Congress of Vienna and the battle of Waterloo he returned to Rome, 7 July, 1815. To give thanks to God and Our Lady he (15 Sept., 1815) instituted for the Papal States the feast of Our Lady, Help of Christians, to be celebrated, 24 May, the anniversary of his first return. The Dioceses of Tuscany adopted it, 12 Feb., 1816; it has spread nearly over the entire Latin Church, but is not contained in the universal calendar. The hymns of the Office were composed by Brandimarco (Chevalier, "Recept. Hymnolog.", II, 495). This feast is the patronal feast of Australasia, a double of the first class with an octave (Ordo Australasiae, 1888), and in accordance with a vow (1891) is celebrated with great splendour in the churches of the Fatherland, and is the object of many pilgrimages. It has attained special celebrity since the Ven. Dom Bosco, founder of the Salesian Congregation, 9 June, 1868, dedicated to Our Lady, Help of Christians, the mother church of his congregation at Turin. The Salesian Fathers have carried the devotion to their numerous establishments.

Our Lady of Good Counsel, Feast of.—Records dating from the reign of Paul II (1464–71) relate that the picture of Our Lady, at first called "La Madonna de grazia", and later "Maria al Littorio" or "Marià del Buon Consiglio", appeared at Genazzano, a town about twenty-five miles southeast of Rome, on St. Mark's Day, 25 April, 1467, in the old church of Santa Maria, which had been under the care of Augustinians since 1356. The venerated iron image, which is drawn on a thin scale of wall-plaster little thicker than a thread on a visiting-card, was observed to have suspended in the air without the slightest apparent support; thus early tradition, which furthermore tells how one might have passed a thread around the image without touching it. At once devotion to Our Lady in Santa Maria sprang up; pilgrimages bands began to resort thither; while miracles in ever-increasing numbers, of which a register was opened two days after the event, were wrought, as they still continue to be, at the shrine. In July following, Pope Paul deputed two bishops to investigate the alleged wonder-working image. Their report, however, is not known to be extant. The cult of Our Lady increased. In 1630 Urban VIII himself went to Genazzano on a pilgrimage, as did Pius IX in 1864. On 17 Nov., 1862, Innocent XI had the picture crowned with gold by the Vatican Basilica. In 1727 Benedict XIII granted the clergy of Genazzano an Office and Mass of Our Lady for 25 April, anniversary of the apparition, elsewhere the feast being kept a day later so as to conform with that of the Evangelist. On 2 July, 1753, Benedict XIV approved of the Pious Union of Our Lady of Good Counsel for the faithful at large, and was himself enrolled therein as its pioneer member; Pius IX was a member, and also Leo XIII. On 18 Dec., 1779, Pius VI, while re-approving the cult of Our Lady, granted all Augustinians an Office with hymns, lessons, prayer, and Mass proper of double-major rite; with a plenary indulgence also for the faithful, to which Pius VIII added another for visitors to the shrine. On 18 Dec., 1834, Leo XII approved for the office held in ten second-class rite for all Augustinians, while on 17 March, 1903, he elevated the church of Santa Maria—one of the four parish churches at Genazzano—to the rank of minor basilica; and, on 22 April following, authorized the insertion in the Litany of Loreto of the invocation "Mater Boni Consilii" to follow that of "Mater Admirabilis", which had been inserted ten years earlier (21 Dec., 1893) had sanctioned the use of the White Scapular of Our Lady of Good Counsel for the faithful. In the United States there are many churches and institutions in honour of Our Lady of Good Counsel.

Our Lady of the Fields, Brothers of, a Canadian congregation founded in 1902 at St-Damien de Buckland in the Diocese of Quebec by Rev. M. J.-O. Broussseau. Its object is to train orphans in industrial and agricultural pursuits, and the arts of colonization. The Sisters of Notre Dame of Perpetual Help, also founded by Rev. M. J.-O. Broussseau in 1892, care for the orphans up to the age of twelve years; they are then confided to the care of the Brothers for the purposes above indicated. The mother-house is at St-Damien, Bellechasse Co., Lac Vert, P. Q., Canada. There are at present six brothers and four novices.

Our Lady of the Snow, Feast of ("Dedicatio Sancte Marie ad Nives"), a feast celebrated on 5 August to commemorate the dedication of the church of Santa Maria Maggiore on the Esquiline Hill in Rome. The church was originally built by Pope Liberius (352–366) and was called after him "Basilica Liberiana" or "Basilica di Liberio". It was restored by Sixtus III (432–440) and dedicated to Our Lady. From that time on it was known as "Basilica S. Maria" or "Maria Majors"; since the seventh century it was known also as "Maria ad Praesepis". The appellation "ad Nives" (of the snow) originated a few centuries later, as did also the cult, which gave this name to the church. The legend runs thus: During the pontificate of Liberius, the Roman patrician John and his wife, who were without heirs, made a vow to donate their possessions to Our Lady. They prayed her that she might make known to them in what manner they were to dispose of their property in her honour. On 5 August, the Fifteenth of the Kalends of August, the snow fell upon the summit of the Esquiline Hill and, in obedience to a vision which they had the same night, they built a basilica, in honour of Our Lady, on the spot which was covered with snow. From the fact that no mention whatever is made of this alleged miracle until a few hundred years later, not even by Sixtus III in his eight-lined dedicatory inscription [edited by de Rossi, "Inscript. christ.", II, i (Rome, 1888), 71; Grasar (who has failed to authenticate the alleged miracle), "Analecta Romana", I (Rome, 1900), 77; Duchesne, "Liber Pontificum", I (Paris, 1886), 235; Maruech, "Elements d'archéologie chrétienne", III (Paris and Rome, 1891), 153; etc.], there is no historical basis. Originally the feast was celebrated only at Sta Maria Maggiore; in the fourteenth century it was extended to all the churches of Rome and finally it was made a universal feast by Pius V.
Clement VIII raised it from a feast of double rite to double major. The Mass is the common one for feasts of the Blessed Virgin; the Office is also the common one of the B. Virgin, with the exception of the second Nocturna, which is an account of the alleged miracle. The congregation, which Benedict XIV instituted at the reform of the Breviary in 1741, proposed that the reading of the legend be struck from the Office and that the feast should again receive its original name, “Dedication Sanctae Mariae.”

Michael Ott.

Overbeck, Friedrich, convert and painter of religious subjects, b. at Liibeck, 3 July, 1789; d. at Rome, 12 November, 1858.

Overbeck is one of the most fascinating figures in the realm of modern Christian art. He was the soul of that romantic school of painters who, under the name of "Nazarenes," exerted great influence on the formation of the German religious art in the nineteenth century. When eighteen years old, Overbeck became a pupil at the Academy of Fine Arts at Vienna. After he had attained proficiency he quickly withdrew from the compulsion and formalism of the academy, and went with three friends to Italy and above all to Rome as the great centre for the exercise of art. In 1810 he made his home in the monastery of the Irish Franciscans at Rome, San Isidoro, which was then unoccupied. He was the first to recognize that the tradition of ecclesiastical art had been completely suspended by the Reformation and the iconoclastic outbreaks, and that later the stifling overgrowth of Humanism is introduced elements into it, which had cast a mythological garb over the Catholic ideal of art. His work was, by the power of genius, to throw a bridge over the period of stagnation and depression that had lasted for three centuries; Overbeck lived to see the complete success of his titanic labours.

At Rome the father of the "Nazarenes," as perhaps he may now be called, was joined by the later masters, Cornelius, Schadow, and Philip Veit, and these men united together into a school. It was Overbeck's art and studies that brought him back to the Church, and the mystical power of his piety alone empowered him to produce his lofty creations. The series of frescoes of the history of Joseph in Egypt in the house called Casa Bartholdi, those illustrating Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" in the villa of Prince Massimo, and above all that wonderful composition "The Miracle of Roses" in the Portuguese chapel at Assisi, astonished the world by modern technique, completely independent grasp of the subject, and most of all by proper relation of the painting to the dominating sister art of architecture. Overbeck was not able personally to develop the ideal he had formed, the adornment of northern, especially German churches with frescoes, but his school, largely as represented by Eduard von Steinle, has partially carried out his wishes.

The influence of Overbeck's spirit was by no means limited to Germany. France, particularly, understood the graphic speech of this new religious art; Belgium, Poland, and Spain followed in the footsteps of the master at Rome. The reputation of the new leader of art was spread throughout all classes of society, largely by his smaller works, especially by his Biblical cartoons. His oil paintings are conspicuous for their qualities but are not numerous; the most noted of them, "The Triumph of Religion in the Arts," is the chief ornament of the Stedel Gallery at Frankfurt. If the work produced by Overbeck appears meagre, when contrasted with the amount put forth by artists who came after him, the reason is to be found in his manner, owing to which he could execute masterly work, even in old age, as the wonderful cartoons of the "Seven Sacraments," and the sketches for the decoration of the cathedral of Diakovsr, which were only used in part. Hostility to the art of Overbeck and his followers, the "Nazarene" school, did not fail to appear during Overbeck's lifetime, nor is it lacking now. Some say that the "Nazarenes," most of all Overbeck, Veit, Führich, and Steinle, have introduced Italian art into Northern Europe, and have made German ecclesiastical art, which was staid and austere, shallow and insipidly sweet. Of the same opinion are those "orthodox" artists who assert that the "Nazarene" canons of art are outstripped and antiquated. To these men, style, the canons, and dogmas of art are superficial, stereotyped, and out-of-date. Overbeck and his companions have been justified by their extraordinary success as far as regard religious art, which must always be a religious art. Their influence may be recognized also in the closely related art of architecture, at least as far as the Germanic people are concerned.

Overberg, Bernhard Heinrich, German ecclesiastic and educator, b. 1 May, 1751; d. 9 November, 1826.

Of poor parents in the peasant community of Hoerkel, near Osnabrück, he became a pedlar like his father. At fifteen a priest presented him for college, and he studied with the Franciscans in Rheine. Later (1774) he studied in Minster, and was ordained priest in 1779. As curate in Everswinkel, he did such good work in teaching religion that the vicar-general, Freiherr von Fürstenberg (q. v.), offered him the position of director of the normal school, which he was able to turn to Munster. Thenceforth he was Fürstenberg's right hand in the administration and reformation of the schools. In 1783 he settled in Munster, where his first duty was to conduct a course of practical and theoretical study for school-teachers during the autumn vacation. This institution was known as the Normalschule. The village schools at that time were very poor, in Prussia a number of discharged non-conformist teachers were engaged to give a pretense of teaching, while in Westphalia, mere day labourers wielded the "stick". Of "method" there was little, except scolding and beating; Overberg had had personal experience of that in his own childhood. Not even reading—much less writing and arithmetical—was taught at all. Overberg, therefore, stood before a gigantic problem. He solved it, as Fürstenberg says, "earnestly and yet mildly, without ambition, without egotism, without any deception or deceit, untiring and with a persistency that feared no obstacles." His aim was to educate and instruct teachers and to improve their wretched material circumstances. All the teachers were to take part in the course at public expense. The course closed with an examination, and those who passed it obtained an increase in salary. As Overberg considered it best to separate the sexes in his schools, he instructed a number of women teachers who eagerly accepted the work. He himself was engaged as a schoolmaster or lay-teacher. At first, Overberg himself instructed the teachers, giving five lessons daily between 21 August to November, and teaching method as well as the various school subjects. Later he employed an assistant teacher. Soon his normal school was attended by young people who wished to become teachers. This normal school or seminary was also opened in Germany as a Seminary, and had more than 100 pupils (at first 20-30). Besides teaching in this school he gave instruction in the catechism for twenty-seven years in the Ursuline convent without remuneration. Every Sunday he recapitulated all that he had lectured upon during the week in a public lecture which was attended by people of all classes, especially by students of theology. In this work he showed not only his inborn faculty of teaching, but also his child-like faith and simplicity.

In 1789, Princess Gallitzin chose him as her confessor. He influenced her entire activity, and met in him a man of rare importance. By his tactful kindness he brought about the conversion of Count Friedrich Leopold von Stolberg. Overberg was the chief architect of the Munster school ordinance, formulated on 2 Sept., 1801. He remained director of the normal school even when he became regent of the ecclesiastical seminary in 1800, before which he had been for some time syndical examiner and member of the Landschulkommission. In 1816 he was made a consistorial and school councillor, in 1823, honorary rector of the cathedral, and in 1825, shortly before his death, Oberconsistorialrat. Overberg was quite familiar with the pedagogical theories and achievements of his time, and utilized many of them. He was especially well acquainted with ROCHE, FELBIGER (q. v.), and FRANKE. But his own system is, on the whole, unique: for everywhere he allows for the demands of life. He lays emphasis upon the importance of habit, the power of example, and the telling of stories. As the main support of all education and discipline he considers rational thought and practical everyday considerations well combined in his work. His basic idea is to lead man toward his eternal goal, but he lays emphasis upon the necessity of caring for the temporary conditions of life, of cultivating prudence, and doing away with stupidity and superstition. His instruction is catechetical, and he mentions as its advantages the training of reason, the formation of clear impressions and ideas, and practice in the expression of one's own opinions: "children should be trained to think by questioning them, and should be guided in the method of thinking in such a way that they will find out for themselves the things which we want to teach them". Overberg's writings contain much that is interesting to teachers even today. The most important of them are: Anweisung zum zweckmässigen Schulunterricht (1787), a newly edited ed. by EBERHARD GROSE (1858); "Bibliothek fur Lehrer", 4th ed. (1787) which has appeared in over thirty editions and is still used as a house book; "Christkatholisches Religionsbuch" (1801); "Katechismus der christlichen Lehre" (1801), used in the Diocese of Munster until 1887 and in Osnabrück until 1900; and "Sechs Bucher vom Priesterstande" (posthumous, 1858).

Oviedo, Diocese of (Ovettensis), comprises the civil province of the same name (the ancient Kingdom of Asturias), besides certain rural deaneries in the provinces of Lugo, León, Zamora, and Santander. Its capital, the city of Oviedo, has a population of 42,716. The ancient capital of the Asturias country was Astorga (Asturica), which was succeeded by the cathedral city of Princa I (756-91). In 750 Abbot Formatius and his nephew Maximus built a monastery there and dedicated a church to St. Vincent the Martyr; Fruea had houses built and the basilica of S. Salvador. His son, Alfonso II, the Chaste, made Oviedo his capital and restored the Church of S. Salvador. The same king founded the city of Oviedo, in 805, combining with it the ancient See of Britonia. A number of bishops, expelled from their sees by the Saracens, were gathered at Oviedo, where they held two councils. It was there proposed to make Oviedo a metropolitan see, and such it was from 809 until the ancient archdioceses of the Peninsula were reconstituted, when the pope declared Oviedo exempt (1105); the Concordat of 1221 made it suffragan to Santiago.

The Cathedral of S. Salvador was restored in the twelfth century by Archbishop Pelayo, the chronicler. Bishop Fernando Alfonso (1206-1301) undertook another restoration of the chapter-house, and his successor, Fernando the Poet, restored the church and cloister. At the end of the thirteenth century Gutierrez de Toledo began the new Gothic basilica, the principal chapel bearing his arms, though it was completed by his successor Guileen. Diego Ramirez de Guzmán (1241-1141) built the two chapels of the south transept (now replaced by the sacristy), the old entrance to the church, and the gallery of the chapels of dispensing the chapter-house. Alonso de Palaizuela (1470-85) completed the other part of the transept. Juan Arias (1487-97) left his cognizance, the fleur-de-lys and four scallops, on the nave. Juan Daza (1757-1503) erected the grille of the choir; Valerano (1508-12) added the stained-glass windows. Diego de Muros, founder of the great college at Sahamanca known as the Oviedo, had the crestsings of the porch brought by Pedro de Bunyes and Juan de Cerecedo, while Giralt and Valmaseda completed the carving of the precious retable in the time of Francisco de Mendiza (1527-28). Cristobal de Rojas (1540-50) affixed his coat-of-arms to the chapel, and completed the decoration of the upper storey of the cathedral. One of the marvels of Gothic architecture is the chief feature of the cathedral is the "Camara Santa", with its venerable relics. Bishop Pelayo relates that a coffer made by the disciples of the Apostles, and containing the most precious relics of the Holy City, was taken from Jerusalem to Africa, and after several translations was finally deposited at Oviedo by Alfonso II. In the sixteenth century, Bishop Cristóbal de Sandoval y Rojas wished to open it, but could not, being overcome with religious fear. Many other relics are to be seen.

The most famous sanctuary of the diocese is at Covadonga (Cova longa), dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, by whose help the Spaniards, in 718, overcame the Arabs commanded by Alkaman. The old building was consumed by fire 17 October, 1777. The Camino Regular of St. Augustine, who had charge of it, had been driven by lack of revenues to live scattered about in various parishes, when Philip IV compelled them to return to community life, increasing their endowment, and building houses for them beside the monastery. Urban VII made an order that the abbott should be a dignitary of the cathedral. Oviedo, Charles III wished to rebuild the chapel sumptuously, but never went beyond beginning the work. In recent times it has been completely restored by Bishop Sanz y Fores. Also noteworthy are the two monasteries of S. Vicente and S. Pelayo in Oviedo. West of the city is the Gothic convent of S. Francisco, now used as a hospital. The chapter house of this convent does not appear to have possessed the sombre and grand Modern Gothic style; that of Sta. Clara has a lofty tower; S. Isidro, formerly a Jesuit church, has a splendid façade in ashlar stone. In the environs of Oviedo and on the slope of Monte Naranco are the famous churches of Sta. María and S. Miguel, two art treasures of the ninth century and worthy of endless study. The cathedral of Oviedo, which was founded in 851 by Bishop Ignacio Díaz Caneja; it consists of a great seminary in Oviedo, and a little seminary at Valdecios de Villaviciosa, an old Cisterian monastery. Besides the Provincial Institute of Secondary Education of Oviedo, there is another, founded by Jovellanos, at Gijón.

Owen, Nicholas, a Jesuit lay-brother, martyred in 1608. There is no record of his parentage, birthplace, date of birth, or entrance into religion. Probably a carpenter or builder by trade, he entered the Society of Jesus before 1580, and had previously been the trusty servant of the missionary fathers. More (1586-1601) associates him with the first English lay-brothers. He was imprisoned on the death of Bl. Edmund Campion for openly declaring that martyr's innocence, but afterwards served Fathers Henry Garnett and John Gerard for eighteen years, was captured again with the latter, escaped from the Tower, and is said to have contrived the escape of Father Gerard. He was finally arrested at Hindlip Hall, Worcestershire, while impersonating Father Garnett. "It is incredible," writes Cecil, "how great was the joy caused by his arrest... knowing the great skill of Owen in constructing hiding places, and the innumerable quantity of dark holes which he had schemed for hiding priests all through England." Not only the Secretary of State but Wande, the Keeper of the Tower, appreciated the importance of the disclosures which Owen might be forced to make. After being committed to the Marshalsea and thence removed to the Tower, he was transferred to the Topcliffe jail, with both arms fast in iron rings and body hanging, and later on with weighty chains attached to his feet, and at last died under torture. It was said that he had committed suicide, a calumny refuted by Father Gerard in his narrative. As to the day of his death, the latter, says it was 17 Dec. 1608 (Caval. 5 March; the "Menology" of the province sets his martyrdom as late as 12 Nov. 1608). He was of singularly innocent life and wonderful prudence, and his skill in devising hiding-places saved the lives of many of the missionary fathers.

Oxford, John, dramatist, critic, translator, and song-writer, b. in London, 12 Aug., 1812; d. there 21 Feb., 1877. Mostly self-educated, for a time he was under the tuition of a brilliant and erudite scholar, T. S. Friend. His master recognizing his faculty for philosophy and his versatility wished to divert him from the dramatic career towards which he seemed inclined. In 1837 he was articled to a solicitor and is said to have spent some time in the London office of a relative of his father, and to have written at this time. He early read the literature of Germany, Italy, France, and Spain, and was always "a devourer of books." From the German he translated, amongst other things, Fischer's "Francis Bacon" (London, 1857); Goethe's "Autobiography" (London, 1888); Eckermann's "Conversations with Goethe" (London, 1840), the two last translations having since become English classics and finding a place in Bohn's well-known series. From the French he translated Molière's "Tartuffe"; from the Italian Boyardo's "Orlando Innamorato" (in part), and from the Spanish a play of Calderón. But Oxforden's chief interest lay in the drama. Between 1835, when his first play was written, and his death, he wrote, in eight plays, at least, are attributed to him. Several have been translated into German, French, and Dutch. He also wrote librettos for operas etc. For the last twenty years of his life he was, in addition, dramatic critic to the "Times." He frequently contributed to newspapers and magazines. In April, 1853, he wrote for the "Westminster Review" an essay on Schopenhauer's philosophy which is said to have founded the fame of that philosopher both in England and abroad. In late life Oxforden's health weakened. He died of...

heart failure in 1877. Eighteen months earlier he had been received into the Church.

An appreciative sketch of his life appeared in the "Times" of 23 Feb., 1877. The writer extols his originality and scholarship: "As an appreciator of others, and as a quick discoverer of anything new likely to exercise a future influence on thought he had few equals." Oxfords criticism, however, is somewhat lowered by a too great proceeding from his natural kindliness. In private life he was much beloved. His conversational powers were remarkable; and he possessed an "unsurpassed sweetness of character and self-forgetting nobleness and childlikeness.

Oxenham, Henry Nixcome, English controversialist and poet, b. at Harrow, 15 Nov., 1829; d. at Kensington, 23 March, 1888, was the son of the Rev. William Oxenham, second master of Harrow. He was educated at Harrow School and Balliol College, Oxford, taking his degree in 1850. After receiving Anglican orders, he became curate first at Worminghall, in Buckinghamshire, then at St. Bartholomew's, Cripplegate. While at the latter place, he was received into the Church by Monsignor (afterwards Cardinal) Manning. For a time he contemplated becoming a priest, for which purpose he entered St. Edmund's College, Old Hall, but after receiving minor orders, he left: it is said that his reason was that he believed in the validity of Anglican orders, and considered himself already a priest. He continued to dress as an ecclesiastic and in this anomalous position he spent the remainder of his life.

His ambition was to work for the reunion of the Anglicans with the Catholic Church, with which end in view, he published a sympathetic article, in answer to the "Christian" (in the shape of a pamphlet), of his friend and fellow-convert, Father Lockhart. After the Vatican Council his position became still more anomalous, for his unwillingness to accept the doctrine of Papal Infallibility was known. Though influenced by the action of Dr. Dolinger, with whom he was on intimate terms, he never outwardly severed his connection with the Catholic Church, and before his death received all the sacraments at the hands of Father Lockhart.

His published works include: "The Sentence of Kairies and Poems" (3rd ed., London, 1871); "Translation of Dolinger's First Age of Christianity" (London, 1868, 2 vol.); "The Subsequent Course of Christianity" (London, 1872); "Lectures on Reunion" (London, 1872); "Catholic Eschatology" (1876; new edition, enlarged, 1878); "Mmoir of Lieut. Rudolph de Lisle, R.N." (London, 1886); numerous pamphlets and articles, especially in "The Saturday Review", over the initials X. Y. Z. (in "Dict. of Nat. Biog.," "Gillow, Bibl. Dict. of Eng. Oxford, one of the most ancient cities in England, grew up under the shadow of a convent, said to have been founded by St. Frideswide as early as the eighth century. Its authentic history begins in 912, when it was occupied by Edward the Elder, King of the West Saxons. It was strongly fortified against the Danes, and again after the Norman Conquest, and the new guns of the time were substituted for Michael's Church (at the north gate), and a large portion of the city walls still remain to attest the importance of the city in the eleventh century. West of the town rose the splended castle, and in the meadows beneath, the no less splendid Augustinian Abbey of Osney: in the fields to the north of it were the tents of the ancient palace of Beaumont; the great church of St. Frideswide was erected by the canons-regular who succeeded the nuns of St. Frideswide; and many fine churches were built by the piety of the Norman kings. Oxford received a charter from King Henry II, granting its citizens the same privileges and exemptions as those enjoyed by the capital of the kingdom; and various important religious houses were founded in or near the city. A grandson of King John established Rewley Abbey (of which a single arch now remains) for the Franciscan Order; and friars of various orders (Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, Augustinians, and Trinitarians), all had houses at Oxford of varying importance. Parliaments were often held in the city during the thirteenth century, but this period also saw the beginning of the long struggle between the town and the growing university which ended in the subjection of the former to the extinction of the civic importance of Oxford. The accession of thousands of students of course brought material prosperity, but it was never, apart from the university, again prominent in history until the seventeenth century, when it became the headquarters of the Royalist party, and again the meeting-place of Parliament.

The city of Oxford showed its Hanoverian sympathies long before the university, and feeling between them ran high in consequence. The area and population of the city remained almost stationary until about 1830, but since then it has grown rapidly. The population is now (1910) about 50,000; the municipal life of the city is vigorous and the relations with the university are more intimate and cordial than they have ever been during their long history.

Oxford is the cathedral city of the Anglican Diocese of Oxford, erected by Henry VIII. Formerly included in the vast Diocese of Lincoln, it is now part of the Catholic Diocese of Birmingham. The handsome Catholic church of St. Aloysius (served by the Jesuits) was opened in 1875; the Catholic population numbers about 1200, besides about 100 resident members of the university; and there are convents of the following orders—St. Ursula's, Daughters of the Cross, Sisters of Nazareth; Sisters of the M. Holy Sacrament; and Sisters of the Holy Child. The Franciscan Capuchin fathers have a church and college in the suburb of Cowley, as well as a small house of studies in Oxford; and the Benedictines and Jesuits have halls, with private chapels, within the university.

D. O. Hunter-Blaire.

The most extraordinary myths have at various times prevailed as to the fabulous antiquity of Oxford as a seat of learning. It is sufficient to mention that the fifteenth century chronicler Rotus assigns its origin to the time when "Samuel the servant of God was judge in Judaea"; while a writer of Edward III's reign asserts that the university was founded by "certain philosophers who being the warlike Trojans, under the leadership of Brutus, triumphantly seized on the Islands of Albion." A much more long-lived fiction—indeed, which, first heard of in the middle of the fourteenth century, persisted down to the nineteenth—was that King Alfred, well-known as a patron of education, was the real founder of Oxford University. The truth is that it is quite impossible to assign even an approximate date to the development of the schools which in Saxon times were grouped round the monastic foundation of St. Frideswide (on the site of what is now Christ Church) into the corporate institution later known as Oxford University. Well-known relics, containing parts of the earlier collegiate buildings, chronology and canon law before the middle of the twelfth century, but these were probably private teachers attached to St. Frideswide's monastery. It is not unto the end of Henry II's reign, that is about 1180, that we know, chiefly on the authority of Giraldaus Cambriand and his scholars, that the number of students was in residence at Oxford, though not probably yet living under any organized constitution.

Half a century later Oxford was famous throughout Europe as a home of science and learning; popes and kings were among its patrons and benefactors; the students are said to have been numbered by thousands; and the climax of scholars was reached when, during the fifty years between 1220 and 1270, the newly-founded orders of friars—Dominican, Franciscan, Carmelite, and Austin—successively settled at Oxford, and threw all their enthusiasm into the work of teaching. Kindled by their zeal, the older monastic orders were encouraged by a decree of the Lateran Council of 1255, and their reputation was increased when, in 1264, the heads of Oxford houses were formally recognized as "town and gown" of the University. The stimulus of the presence of so many scholars living under conventional discipline incited Walter de Merton, in 1264, to found a residential college, properly organized and supervised, for secular students. Merton College (of which two institutions of somewhat earlier date, University Hall (a dietetic society formed itself) was thus the prototype of the self-contained and autonomous colleges which, grouped together, make up the University of Oxford as it exists to-day. The succeeding half-century saw the foundation of ten additional colleges: two more were founded during the reign of Edward I, when the Queen Mary; and three in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I, in 1625 and 1641—that is, for nearly three centuries, there have been only three more added to the list, namely, Worcester (1714), Keble (1870), and Herford (1874), the first and last, however, being rather new foundations.

The institution of "non-collegiate" students (i.e. those unattached to any college or hall) dates from 1608; one "public hall" (St. Edmund's) survives, of several founded in very early times; and there are several "private halls", under licensed masters who are allowed to take a limited number of students. As a corporate body, the university dates only from the revival of scholastic learning in the reign of the chancellor, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, an Act of Parliament passed in 1571, incorporating the "chancellor, masters and scholars" of Oxford. In the same reign were imposed upon the university the Royal Supremacy and the Thirty-nine Articles, subscription to which was required from every student above the age of sixteen; and from that date, for a period of three centuries, the university, formerly opened to all Christendom, was narrowed into an exclusively Anglican institution and became, as it has ever since remained, in spite of subsequent legislation abolishing religious tests, the chosen home and favourite arena of Anglican controversy, theology, and polemics. Keble, however, is now the only college whose members must be Anglicans by creed, although a certain number of scholarships in other colleges are restricted to adherents of the English Church. Attendance at the college chapels is no longer compulsory; and there is no kind of religious test required for admission to any college (except Keble) or for graduating in Arts, Science and Theology. The degree of Bachelor of Divinity (including the degrees of bachelor and doctor) remains closed by statute to all except professing Anglicans; and the examiners in the theological school, which is open to students of any creed or none, are all required to be clergy of the Church of England.

II. Constitution and Government.—Taken as a whole, the university consists of about 14,500 members, graduates and undergraduates, the latter comprising the twenty-six separate societies (colleges, halls, public and private, and the non-collegiate body) which together form the corporation of the university. Of the above number about 3800 are undergraduates, of whom the great majority are residing for the degree of B.A., and about 1400 are graduate members: tutors, fellows of colleges, officials of the university, or M.A.'s unoffically resident within its precincts. About 1400 members of the university are thus actually living in Oxford, the remainder being those who, while keeping their names "on the books", reside in other parts of the kingdom. All masters of arts require of the corporation a "profession of faith", and of the "non-collegiate" are, "Convocation", the legislative and administrative body through which the university acts; and those actually residing in Oxford for a fixed period in each year form the smaller body called "Congregation", by which all measures must be passed previous to their coming before "Convocation". Legislation in every case, however, must be initiated by the "Vicereinal Council", consisting of the vice-chancellor, proctors, and eighteen members elected by "Congregation".

The executive officers of the university comprise the chancellor, a nobleman of high rank, as a rule non-resident, who delegates his authority to the vice-chancellor, the head of the colleges, and the two proctors, who are elected by the corporation, turn, and assist the vice-chancellor in the enforcement of discipline, as well as in the general supervision of all university affairs, including the administration of its property and the control of its finances. The peculiar feature of the constitution of Oxford (as of Cambridge), which stands in regular contrast with the peculiarities of other universities in the world, is that the authority of the vice-chancellor and proctors, that is of the central university body, while nominally extending to every resident member of the university, is not as a matter of fact exercised within the college walls, each college being, while a constituent part of the university, autonomous and self-governing, and claiming entire responsibility for the order and well-being of its own members.

III. The Collegiate System.—According to the combined university and college system which prevails at Oxford, each college is an organized corporation under its own head, and enjoying the fullest powers of managing its own property and governing its members. The constitution of the college is prescribed by the general statutes of the university, but by its own separate code of statutes, drawn up at its foundation (as a rule centuries ago) and added to or amended since as found expedient. Every college is absolutely its own judge as to the requirements for admission to its membership, the result being that in no two colleges is the standard of necessary knowledge, or the mental equipment with which a youth enters on his university career, identical or even necessarily similar. The mere fact of a man having matriculated at certain colleges stamps him as possessed of more than average attainments, while at others the required standard may be so low as to afford no guarantee whatever that their members are in any real sense educated at all.

The twenty-one colleges and four halls, and the delogy of non-collegiate students—that is of students not affiliated to any college or hall—have all the same privileges as to receiving undergraduate members; and none can be matriculated, i.e. admitted to membership of the university by the central authority, unless it has been founded and maintained as a free and separate society. The colleges provide a certain number of sets of rooms within their own walls for students, the remainder living in licensed lodgings in the city. Meals are served either in the college halls or in the students' rooms; and attached to every college is a chapel where daily service is held during term according to the forms of the Church of England.

IV. TUTORS, EXAMINATIONS, AND DEGREES.—The university provides 130 professors, lecturers, and readers to give instructions in the several faculties of theology (9), law (8), medicine (17), natural science, including mathematics (27), and arts, including ancient and modern languages, geography, music, fine arts, etc. (69). The chief burden of tuition, however, does not fall on this large body of highly-equipped teachers, whose lectures are in many cases very sparsely attended, but on the college tutors, whose lectures, formerly confined to members of their own colleges, are now practically open to the whole university. The extension of, and great improvement in, the tuition afforded by the college tutors has led to the practical disappearance at Oxford, at least in work for honours, of the private tutor or "coach", who formerly largely supplemented the official college teaching. What is noteworthy at Oxford is the trouble taken by tutors in the work of individual instruction, which, while involving a great, and sometimes disproportionate, expenditure of time and talent, has done much to establish and consolidate the personal relations between tutor and pupil which is a distinctly beneficial feature of the Oxford system.

Examinations.—For students aspiring to the B.A. degree are prescribed two strictly-defined compulsory examinations, and two so-called public examinations, in which candidates may choose from a wide range of alternative subjects. Responses, generally passed before matriculation, includes Latin, Greek, and mathematics, all of a pretty elementary kind. The second compulsory examination, that in Holy Scripture (for which a book of Plato may be substituted), includes the Greek text of two of the Gospels. In the two "public examinations", i.e. Moderations and the Final Schools, either a "pass" or "honours" may be aimed at. The passman must first satisfy the examiners in Moderations (i.e. classics combined with logic or mathematics); and then for his Final School may choose between various subjects, such as classics, mathematics, natural science, and modern languages. The "honour-man", if aiming at "greats", has, as a rule, first a searching examination in classics, and then a final examination in ancient history and philosophy; the successful candidates in both these examinations being divided into four classes. A first class in "Greats" (or litterae humaniores) is still reckoned the highest honour attainable in the Oxford curriculum; but the student has seven other Final Honour Schools open to him, those of modern history (which now attracts the largest number of candidates), mathematics, jurisprudence, theology, English literature, Oriental studies, and natural science.

Degrees.—A student who has passed the examinations requisite for the B.A. degree, can further qualify himself for the degree of (a) Bachelor of Medicine and Surgery, by passing two examinations in medical and surgical subjects; (b) Bachelor of Civil Law, by passing an examination in general jurisprudence, Roman, English, or international law; (c) Bachelor of Theology (if in orders of the Church of England) by presenting two dissertations on a theological subject. For what are known as "research degrees" (Bachelor of Letters, or Science) two years of residence are required, followed by an examination, or the submission of a dissertation showing original work. Candidates for the degree of Bachelor of Music are exempted from residence, and need only have passed the examination of Responsions. Bachelor of Arts can present themselves for the degree of Master at the end of a stated period, without further examination; but the Bachelor of Medicine must pass an examination or submit a dissertation before obtaining the degrees of M.D. or Master of Surgery; and there is a similar qualification required for proceeding to the degrees of Doctor of Divinity, of Civil Law, of Music, and of Letters or Science. There is now no religious test in the case of any degree excepting those of theology; but all candidates for masters' or doctors' degrees have to promise faithful observance of the statutes and customs of the university. Honorary degrees in all the faculties may be granted to distinguished persons, without examination, by degree of Convocation.

Diplomas in certain subjects, as health, education, geography, and political economy, are granted by Convocation after a certain period of study and an examinational test. These diplomas are obtainable by women students, who are not eligible for any degree, although they may, and do, enter for the same examination as men. The halls of women students are entirely extra-collegiate; but women receive on examination certificates testifying to the class gained by them in such honour-examinations as they choose to undergo.

368. OXFORD THE UNIVERSITY COURSE.—It is difficult to fix this even approximately, so much depends on a student's tastes, habits, and recreations, and also on the question whether the sum named is to include his expenses for the whole year, or only for the six months of the university terms. £120 a year ought to cover the actual fees and cost of board and other necessary charges, which are pretty much the same at all the colleges; and if another £100 or £120 be added for the supplementary expenses of college life, and vacation expenses as well, we arrive at what is probably the average annual sum expended. A man with expensive tastes or hobbies may of course spend double or treble that amount, whereas members of some of the smaller colleges may do very well on much less; while the endowments of the numerous college and university scholarships and exhibitions lessen the expenses of those who hold them by a corresponding amount. The Rhodes Scholarships, open to Colonial and American students, are of the annual value of £250 each; but it is to be observed that the holders have a rule to make this sum suffice for all their wants, in vacation as well as in term-time.

VI. UNIVERSITY AND COLLEGE BUILDINGS.—The chief university buildings are grouped round the quadrangle of the Bodleian Library, founded in 1602 by Sir Thomas Bodley, and now housed in the Camera (built 1488-92), Duke Humphry's Library. Since 1610 the Bodleian has received by right a copy of every book published in the kingdom, and it now contains more than 500,000 books and nearly 40,000 manuscripts. In the gallery is an interesting collection of historical portraits. West of the Bodleian is the building (1542-60), with its elaborate roof, and further west again the Convocation House, built in 1639. Close by are the Sheldonian Theatre, built by Wren in 1669, where the annual Commemoration is held, and honorary degrees are conferred; the Old Clarendon Printing-house, built in 1713 out of the profits of Lord Clarendon's 'Petworth House'; and the Radcliffe Camera, which has about £100,000 in High Street; and the chief other university buildings are the New Museum (1855-60), an ugly building in early French Gothic, containing splendid collections of natural science and anthropology, as well as a fine science library; the Taylor Buildings and University Galleries, a stately classical edifice containing, among other things, the vast Ashmolean collection of drawings by Raphael, Michelangelo, Turner, and other masters, and many valuable paintings; the Ashmolean Museum, behind the galleries, containing one of the most complete archaeological collections in England; the new Clarendon Press (1830), and the Observatory, founded in 1772 by the Radcliffe Trustees.

Taking the different colleges in alphabetical order, we have: All Souls, founded by Archbishop Chichele in 1437, in memory of those who fell in the French wars. Its features are the absence of undergraduate members, the magnificent refectory in the chapel, re-discovered and restored in 1872, after being lost sight of for three centuries, and the splendid library, especially of works on law.

Balliol, founded by Devorgilla, widow of John Balliol, about 1262, and distinguished for the brilliant scholarship of its members, and the liberality and tolerance of its views. The buildings are mostly modern and of little interest; in the fine hall (1877) is a striking portrait of Cardinal Manning (a scholar here 1827-30). Opposite the Master of Balliol's house a cross in the roadway marks the spot where Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer were burned in 1555 and 1556; and the so-called Martyrs' Memorial (by Gilbert Scott, 1841), opposite the west front of the college, commemorates the same event; it was erected chiefly as a protest against the Tractarian movement founded by Newman.

Brasenose, founded in 1500 by Bishop Synaith of Lincoln and Sir Richard Sutton, as an amplification of the much older Brasenose Hall, a knocker on the door of which, in the shape of a nose, is the origin of the curious name. In the chapel, a singular mixture of classical and Gothic design, are preserved two pre-Reformation choir-chests. A magnificent new south front in High Street (by Jackson) was completed in 1910.

Christ Church, the largest and wealthiest college in Oxford, founded as "Cardinal College" by Thomas Wolsey in 1525, on the site of St. Frideswide's suppressed priory, and re-established by Henry VIII as Christ Church. Under Wolsey the hall and kitchen (1529), the finest Elizabethan building in England, and the great ("Tom") quadrangle, which was finished in 1668. The old monastic church, dating from 1120, serves both as the college chapel and as the cathedral of the Anglican Diocese of Oxford, erected by Henry VIII; in Catholic times Oxford formed part of the immense Diocese of Exeter. Sources which were transferred to the quadrangle in 1475, the Bishop's Barn (1650-60), and Canterbury Quay (1859-67), and Canterbury Hall, a Benedictine foundation, in 1770. The hall and library contain many valuable portraits and other paintings.

Corpus Christi, founded in 1316 by Bishop Richard Foe of Winchester, and dedicated to Sts. Peter, Andrew, and Cuthbert, was re-founded by Dr. Principal Hales, who had built the new college in 1705-60, and Canterbury Quay (1859-67), and Canterbury Hall, a Benedictine foundation, in 1770. The hall and library contain many valuable portraits and other paintings.

Exeter, founded in 1314 by Bishop de Stapledon of Exeter. Most of the buildings are modern; the chapel (1857) being an elaborate copy by Gilbert Scott of the Sainte Chapelle at Paris. There is a charming little garden. Exeter has of recent years been more frequently visited by undergraduates, and other college visitors (Exeter, Bath, Durham, and Winchester), which he had held in turn. The buildings, though not extensive, are of great interest, mostly coeval with the founder; and the college possesses some valuable old plate. Angels bearing the Sacred Host are depicted in an oriel window over the great gateway. Corpus Christi founded (1352), and have maintained a high reputation for sound classical learning.

Hertford, founded in 1874, having been originally founded in 1740 but dissolved in 1818 and occupied by Magdalen Hall. A handsome new chapel by Jackson was opened in 1900.

Jesus, frequented almost exclusively by Welsh students, was founded by Queen Elizabeth in 1571; and more than half the college and libraries and exhibitions are restricted to persons of Welsh birth or education. Sir John Rhys, the eminent Celtic scholar, is the present principal. The buildings are modern, or much restored.

Keble, founded by subscription in 1850 in memory of John Keble, and now the only college whose members must, by the terms of its charter, all be members of the Anglican Church. It is governed by a warden and council (there are no fellows), and one of its principles is supposed to be special economy and sobriety of living. The buildings of variegated brick are quite foreign to the prevailing architecture of Oxford, but the chapel is spacious and sumptuously decorated.

Keble North, founded by Bishop Richard Fleming and Thomas Rotherham, both of Lincoln, in honour of the B.V.M. and All Saints, specially to educate divines to preach against the Wycliffian heresies. The buildings Magdalen, perhaps the most beautiful college in Oxford, if not in Christendom, was founded in 1455 by Bishop Waynflete of Winchester. The chapel, hall, cloisters, tower, and other buildings, all erected in the founder's lifetime, are of unique beauty and interest. The extensive and charming grounds include the famous old college wood, final park with fine timber. The musical services in the chapel are famous throughout England. Magdalen possesses much landed property, and is one of the wealthiest colleges in the university.

Merton, founded in 1264 by Walter de Merton, in Surrey, and transferred to Oxford in 1274, was the first of the so-called "Møb" (mostly timber) colleges. The library (1349) is the oldest in England, and the so-called "Møb" quad is of the same date. The chapel, of exquisite Decorated Gothic, contains some beautiful old stained glass. Merton was especially intended by its founder for the education of the secular clergy.

New, founded in 1379 on a magnificent scale by Bishop William de Wykeham, of Winchester (founder also of Winchester College). The splendid chapel, with its elaborate reredos, was restored in 1879; the ante-chapel windows contain the original pre-Reformation glass, and there are many fine brasses. Other features of the college are the picturesque cloisters (used during the Civil War as a depot for military stores), the great hall, with its rich paneling, the valuable collection of old plate, and the lovely gardens, enclosed on three sides by the ancient city walls. New College vies with Magdalen in the excellence of its chapel choir.

Oriel, founded by Edward II in 1326 on the suggestion of his almoner, Adam de Brome; but none of the buildings are older than the seventeenth century. The college is identified with the rise of the Oxford Movement, led by Newman, who was a fellow here from 1822 to 1845. There are two portraits of him (by Ross and Richmond respectively) in the college common-room.

Pembroke, second of the four colleges of Protestant foundation, erected in 1624 out of the ancient Broadgates Hall, and chiefly notable for the membership of Dr. Samuel Johnson, of whom there is a fine portrait and various relics. The college was founded in 1349 by Robert de Eglesfield, chaplain to Queen Philippa, in honour of whom it was named. The buildings are mostly late seventeenth-century; there is some good Dutch glass in the chapel, and a very valuable library, chiefly historical. The hall is hung with (mostly fictitious) portraits of English kings, queens, and princes.

St. John's, formerly St. Bernard's, a house of studies for Cistercian monks, was refounded in 1555 by Sir John White, in honour of St. John the Baptist. The chapel, hall, and other parts of the outer quad belong to the monastic foundation; the inner quad, with its beautiful garden front, was built by Archbishop Laud, probably in 1631-32. The gardens are among the most beautiful in Oxford.

Trinity, originally Durham College, a house of studies for the Durham Benedictines, was refounded by Sir Thomas Pope in 1551. The old monastic library, and other fragments of the buildings of Durham, remain; the chapel, with its fine wood-carving by Carvian "Ashdown's craftsmen," and by Wren. Newman became a scholar of Trinity in 1819; he was elected a honorary fellow in 1875, and visited the college as cardinal in 1880. A fine portrait of him, by Ouless, hangs in the hall.

University, which ranks as the oldest college, though its connexion with King Alfred, said to have founded it in 872, is absolutely legendary. It was really founded by Archdeacon William of Durham in 1249, and acquired its present site a century later. None of the buildings are more than two hundred years old. Frederick William Faber, the famous Oratorian, was a member of this college, which was much identified with the Catholic revival in James II's reign.

Wadham, founded in 1610 by Dorothy Wadham, in completion of her husband's designs; it occupies the site of a house of Austin Friars, who probably laid out the Wadham garden. Wadham is noted for one of the finest specimen of Jacobean work, and as the only college whose buildings remain practically as left by their founder.

Worcester, established in 1283, under the name of Gloucester College, as a house of studies for Benedictines from Gloucester and other great English abbeys, survived as Gloucester College until 1539, when, after the Reformation, and was re-founded by Sir Thomas Cookees, under its present name, in 1714. There still remain the ancient lodgings used by the students of the several abbeys, overlooking the finely-timbered grounds and lake. The interior decoration of the eighteenth-century chapel is very sumptuous.

The only survivor of the once numerous "public halls" is "St. Edmund's," founded in the thirteenth century in honour of St. Edmund Rich, Archbishop of Canterbury, canonized by Innocent III in 1247. The buildings are all of the seventeenth century. This hall, with the closely connected with Queen's College, the proctor of which appoints the principal.

VII. CATHOLICS AT THE UNIVERSITY.—Besides the colleges and single public hall, there are at present three "private halls" conducted by licensed masters (i.e. M.A.'s authorized and approved by the Vice-Chancellor) and receiving a limited number of undergraduate students. Two of these halls are in Catholic hands, one (Pope's Hall) founded for students belonging to the Society of Jesus, and the other (Parker's Hall) established by Ampleforth Abbey, in Yorkshire, for Benedictine students belonging to that monastery. Good work is done in both of these institutions, the members of which, for the most part, are preparing to take part in tuition at the English Jesuit and Benedictine colleges; and many of their members have obtained the highest academic honours in the various university examinations. The Franciscan Capuchin Fathers have recently (1910) opened a small house of studies for junior members of their Order; they have at present the status of non-collegiate students. The lay Catholics who enter the university as undergraduates have no college or hall of their own under Catholic direction, but become members of any one of the colleges which they desire to join, or of the non-collegiate body which, since 1868, has been authorized to receive students who are not members of any college or hall.

Catholics are, of course, except from attending the college chapels, and they have a central chapel of their own, with a resident chaplain appointed by the Universities Catholic Board (of which one of the English bishops is chairman), who says Mass daily for the Catholic students. The Board also appoints every term a special preacher or lecturer, who gives, by the special injunction of the Holy See, weekly conferences to the students on some historical, theological, or philosophical subject. There are two or three resident Catholic fellows and tutors in the university; but the general tone and spirit of the instruction given in the lecture-rooms, though not on the whole anti-Catholic, may be described as generally non-religious.

The mission church of St. Aloysius is served by several Jesuit fathers, and good preachers are often heard there; and several religious communities have recently been established in the city. The number of Catholic members connected with non-collegiate and undergraduate, resident in Oxford does not exceed a hundred.
Oxford Movement, The (1833–1845), may be looked upon in two distinct lights. "The conception which lay at its base", according to the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Discipline, 1906, "was that of the Holy Catholic Church as a visible body upon earth, bound together by a spiritual but absolute unity, though divided into national and other sections. This conception drew with it the sense of ecclesiastical continuity, of the intimate and unbroken connexion between the primitive Church and the Church of England, and of the importance of the Fathers as guides and teachers. It also tended to emphasize points of connexion between those different elements in which the Church, which is 'the doctrine or fact of Apostolic Succession' (Report, p. 54). That is the point of view maintained in the "Tracts for the Times" from 1833 to 1841, which gave its familiar name to the "Tractarian" Movement. They originated and ended with J. H. Newman.

But a second, very unlike, account of the matter was given by Newman himself in his "Lectures on Anglican Difficulties" of 1850. There he considers that the drift or tendency of this remarkable change was not towards a party in the Establishment, or even towards the first place in it, but away from national divisions altogether. It was meant ultimately to "enlist in the same Catholic band the people of England, and parties" into the Roman Church, whereas their ancestors had come out at the Reformation. And as Newman had been leader in the Anglican phase of the movement, so he opened the way towards Rome, submitted to it in 1845, and made popular the reasoning on which thousands followed his example. There seem not after all more accurate from history of a religious thinker who has moulded on permanent lines the institution which he quitted, while assigning causes for its abandonment. But this result was in some measure a consequence of the "anomalous and singular position", as Dean Church allows, held by the English Establishment, since it was legally set up under Edward VI, (Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity, 8 May, 1559).

Lord Chatham brought out these anomalies in a famous epigram. "We have", he remarked, "a Popish Liturgy, Calvinistic articles, and an Armian clergy." Such differences were visible from the first. "It is historically certain", says J. A. Froude, "that Church parties, not originally supposed by history of a religious thinker who has moulded on permanent lines the institution which he quitted, while assigning causes for its abandonment. But this result was in some measure a consequence of the "anomalous and singular position", as Dean Church allows, held by the English Establishment, since it was legally set up under Edward VI, (Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity, 8 May, 1559)."

High nor Low, but Bread” (“Ed. Rev.”, July, 1850). In coerter but equally practical terms men said, “The Church was grafted upon the State, and the State would remain master.” No ruling, in fact, of bishop or of monarch could be applied to the Huguenots or clerical, unless it applies, at all events, tacitly, the consent of the Crown, i.e., of Parliament.

So long as the State excluded Dissenters and Catholics from its offices, the system, in spite of the Great Rebellion, may after the more truly disastrous Revolution of 1688, worked as well as could be expected. But in 1688 the Test Act was repealed; next year Catholic Emancipation passed into law. In 1683 the French drove out their Bourbon dynasty; Belgium threw off the yoke of Holland. In 1682 came the Reform Bill, which Tories construed as an attack on the Church. What would the Royal Supremacy mean if Parliament were to be free of teachings or dogmas, as most clergy had been taught? Who was to control such matters as interpretation of the Church in temporalities, of the State in spirituals.

A notable preacher and organizer, Dr. Hook, “first gave body and force to Church theology, not to be mistaken or ignored.” But it was from Oxford, “the home of lost causes,” always Cavalier at heart, still “debating its eternal Church question as in the days of Henry IV.”

Oriel, once illustrated by Raleigh and Butler, was now the most distinguished college in the university. For some thirty years it had welcomed original thinkers, and among its fellows were, or had been, Coplestone, Whately, Hawkins, Davison, Keble, Arnold, Pusey, and Hurrel Froude. This kind of Oriel man was one of the chief peculiarities of the Oxford revolution. Those among them who indulged in “free inquiry” were termed “Netics”; they “called everything in question; they appealed to first principles, and disdained authority in intellectual matters.”

The university, which Pottson describes as “a close clerical corporation” where all alike had sworn to the Prayer Book and Articles, had thus in its bosom a seed of “Liberalism,” and was menaced by changes analogous to the greater revolutions in the State itself. Reaction came, as was to be expected, in the very college that had witnessed the provocation. Oxford, of all places, would surely be the last to accept French and democratic ideas.

John Keble (1792-1866) was the leading fellow of Oriel. As a mere boy, he had carried off the highest honours of the university. In 1823 he became his father’s curate at Fairford, and in 1827 he published “The Christian Year,” a cycle of poems or meditations in verse, combined with hymns inspired by Jeremy Taylor’s “The Temple,” by their spiritual depth and devout attachment to the English Church. They have gone through innumerable editions. Keble, though a scholarly mind, had no grasp of metaphysics. An ingrained conservative, he took over the doctrines, and lived on the recollection of the Lauden school.

Without ambition, he was inflexible, never open to development, but gentle, shrewd, and saintly. His convictions needed an Aaron to make them widely effective; and he found a voice in his pupil, the piercing, urgent, compassionate words of the “Christian” (1835-36) counts for much in the Oxford Movement. Froude was the connecting link between Keble and Newman. His friendship, at the moment when Newman’s Evangelical prejudices were fading and his inclination towards Liberalism had received a sharp check by “illness and bereavement,” proved to be the one thing needful to a temper which the Always leaned on its associates, and which absorbed ideas with the vivacity of genius. So the fusion came about. Elsewhere (see Newman, John Henry) is related the story of those earlier years in which, from various sources, the future Tractarian leader gained his knowledge of certain Catholic theses, offered by one. But their living unity and paramount authority were borne in upon him by discussions with Froude, whose teacher was Keble. Froude, says Newman, “proposed openly his admiration for the Church of Rome, and his hatred of the Reformers. He delighted in the notion of a hierarchical system, of sacerdotal power, and of full ecclesiastical authority, yet his chief maxim, ‘the Bible and the Bible only is the religion of Protestants;’ and he gloried in accepting tradition as a main instrument of religious teaching. He had a high severe idea of the intrinsic excellence of virginity. He delighted in thinking of the saints.

He embraced the principle of penance and mortification. He had no notion of a revolution; they sat helpless and bewildered. From them neither counsel nor aid was to be expected by earnest churchmen. Arnold would have brought in Dissenters by a “comprehension” which sacrificed dignity to individual judgment. Whately protested against the dogmatism of the Tractarians in the Church in temporalities, of the State in spirituals.”

ference, 23-29 July, and were endeavouring to start a society of Church defences, with machinery and safeguardsm, as befitted responsible persons. But Newman would not be swamped by committees. "Luther", he wrote, "was an individual". He proposed to be an Apostolical Luther. He was not now tutor of Oriel. Hawkins had turned him out of office; curious as knowing what he had done that the Hawkins proved victorious at Keble. But he was Vicar of St. Mary's—a parish dependent on Oriel, and the university church. His pulpit was one of the most famous in England. He knew the secret of journalism, and had at his command a stern eloquence, barbed by convictions, which his reading of the Fathers and the Anglican and Apostolical creeds strengthened. He felt a well-founded confidence in his position. But he was not well read in the history of the Anglican origins or of the Royal Supremacy. His Church was an ideal; never, certainly, since the legislation of Henry and Elizabeth had the English Establishment enjoyed the freedom he sought. It had issued articles of faith imposed by political expediency; it had tolerated among its communists Lutherans, Calvinists, Erastians, and in the persons of high dignitaries like Bishop Headley even Socinians. It had never been self-governing in the past any more than it was now. If the "idea or first principle" of the movement was "ecclesiastical liberty", it must be pronounced a failure; for the Royal Supremacy is a national covenant drawn over by High Church divines is still intact.

On that side, therefore, not a shadow of victory appears. Anyone may believe the doctrines peculiar to Tractarian theology, and any one may reject them, without incurring penalties in the Church Establishment. They are opinions, not dogmas, not the exclusive teaching of anything contained in any article from Aristotle's "Ethics", where virtue is said to lie in a mean, the Oriel scholar termed his position the "Via Media; it was the golden mean which avoided papal corruption and Protestant heresies. But did it exist anywhere except in books? Was it not "as a doctrine, wanting in simplicity, hard to master, indeterminate in its provisions, and without a substantive existence in any age or country"? Newman did not deny that "it still remains to be tried whether what is called Anglo-Catholicism, the religion of Andrews, Lland, Hammond, Butler, and Wilson, is capable of being professed, acted on, and maintained...or whether it is a mere oratories of spirit, or a spirit of an intellectual or of popular Protestantism." The "Via Media" was an experiment. Perhaps the Established Church "never represented a doctrine at all... never had had an intellectual basis"; perhaps it has "been but a name, or a department of State" (Proph. Office, Introd.). To this second conclusion the author finally came; but not until during eight years he had made trial of his "middle way" and had won it to a crowd of disciples. The Tractarian Movement succeeded after his time in planting among the varieties of Anglican religious life a Catholic Party. It failed altogether in making the Establishment a Catholic Church.

Palmer, of Worcester College, and his clerical associates, especially the相处 with the Archbishop of Canterbury, defending the imperilled interests. Joshua Watson, a leading layman, brought up one more emphatic, to which 230,000 heads of families gave their adhesion. But of these collective efforts no lasting result came, although they frightened the government and damped its revolutionist zeal. Mr. Rose, a mere Tractarian, and not a layman, had started the "British Magazine" as a Church organ; the conference at Harlequin was due to him; and he seemed to be marked out as chief over "nobs" like Froude and Newman. His friends objected to the "Tracts", which were the doing of these free names. Newman, however, would not give way. His language about the Reformation offended Mr. Rose, who held it to be a "deliverance"; and while Froude was eager to dissolve the union of Church and State, which he considered to be the parent or the tool of "Liberalism" in doctrine, he called Rose a "conservative." Between minds thus drawing in opposite directions any real fellowship was not likely to endure. Rose may be termed an auxiliary in the first decade of Church Union; but Palmer was the leader; and he died in 1839. His ally, William Palmer, long survived him. Palmer, an Irish Protestant, learned and pompous, had printed his "Origines Liturgicæ" in 1832, a volume now obsolete, but the best book for that period on the Offices of the Church of England. His later "Treatise on the Church", of 1838, was really Anglican and therefore anti-Roman; it so far won the respect of Father Perrone, S.J., that he replied to it.

Palmer was no Tractarian either, as his "Narrative of Events", published in 1834, sufficiently proves. The difference may be sharply stated. Genuine Anglicans identified the Catholic Church once for all with the local body of which they were members, and interpreted the phenomena whether of medieval or reformed Christianity on this principle; they were Englishmen first and Catholics after. Not so with Newman, who tells us, "I felt affection for my own Church, but not tenderness...if Liberalism once got a foothold within her, it was sure of the victory in the event. Let him who feels that Englishmen are fond enough to rescue her. As to leaving her, the thought never crossed my imagination; still I ever kept before me that there was something greater than the Established Church, and that was the Church Catholic and Apostolic, set up from the beginning, of which she was but the local presence and the organ." These divergent views went on just as long as Newman's}

"The new Tracts", says Dean Church, "were received with surprise, dismay, ridicule, and indignation. But they also at once called forth a response of eager sympathy from numbers." An active propaganda was started all over the country. Bishops were perplexed at so bold a restatement of the Apostolic Succession, in which they barely believed. Newman affirmed the principle of dogma; a visible Church with sacraments and rites as the channels of invisible grace; a Divinely ordained episcopal system as inculcated by the Epistles of St. Ignatius. But the Erastian or Liberal did not see either; and the Evangelical Church was no greater authority for doctrine or episcopacy to both of them was but a convenient form of Church government, and the Church itself a voluntary association. Now the English bishops, who were appointed by Erastians ("an inbred government" is Keble's expression), dreaded the power of Evangelicals. At no time could they dare to support the "Tracts." Moreover, to quote Newman, "All the world was astounded at what Froude and I were saying; men said that it was sheer Popery." There were searchings of heart in England, the like of which had not been felt since the non-jurors went out. Catholics had been emancipated; and "those that sat in the reformers' seats were traducing the Reformation." To add to the condition of the "belonging attack by opinions, and the spirit of the English Church was not the spirit of dogma. Hampden did little more than repeat the well-known arguments of Locke and Chillingworth; but he was breaking open the gates of Oxford to unbelief, as Newman foresaw, and the latter answered wrathfully that Hampden's views made shipwreck of the Christian faith. "Since that time", says the “Apologia”, “Phaenon has got into the chariot of the sun; we, alas, can only look on, and watch him down the steep of heaven.” In Mark Pattison’s phrase, the University has been secularized. The November of 1900 began to bring about the changes in the ranks of the leading men of Balliol, and by these, the agnostics of a more recent period. From Whately and Arnold, through the stormy days of “Tract 90” and Ward’s “degradation”, we come down to the Royal Commission of 1854, which created modern Oxford. Subscription to the Articles was done away; fellowships ceased to be what some once hoped they would preserve; the Romanists were an “outbreak of infidelity”, says Pattison with a sneer, and names like Arthur Clough, Matthew Arnold, J. A. Froude, Jewett, and Max Miller triumphantly declare that the Liberals had conquered.

Newman lost the university, but he held it entranced for years by his persuasive greatness, by his preaching, and by his friendships. The sermons, of which eight volumes are extant, afforded a severe yet most persuasive commentary upon tracts and treatises, in themselves always of large outlook and of nervous though formal style. These, annotated after 1870 from the Catholic point of view, were reprinted in “Via Media”, “Historia Eclesiastica in Expositu”, and in two volumes of “Essays” (see popular edition of his Works, 1895). Keble republished Hooker as an Anglo-Catholic Aquinas (finished 1836); and from the chair of poetry were delivered his graceful Latin “Praedictiones”, deeply imbued with the same religious colouring. Hurrell Froude attempted a sketch of his own hero, S. Thomas & Becket, pattern of all anti-Erastians. Bowden compiled the life of Pope Gregory VII, evidently for the like motive. Nor were poetical manifestos wanting. To the “Lyra Apostolica” we may attribute a strong influence over many who could not grasp the subtle reasoning which filled Newman’s “Tract 90”. This, however, is written with his pen. A. J. Froude observes that, in spite of their somewhat rude form, “they had pierced into the heart and mind and there remained”. “Lead, Kindly Light”, he adds, “is perhaps the most popular hymn in the language.” Here, indeed, “were thoughts like no other man’s thoughts, and emotions like no other man’s emotions.” To the “Lyra” Keble and others also contributed poems. And High Anglican stories began to appear in print.

But inspiration needed a constant power behind it, if the tracts were not to be a flash in the pan. It was given in 1834 and 1835 by the accession to the movement of E. B. Pusey, Canon of Christ Church and Hertford College. It was gained in part at German universities; he was of high social standing (always impressive to Englishmen), and revered as a saint for his devout life, his munificence, his gravity. Though “a dull and tedious preacher”, most confused and unrhetorical, the weight of his learning was felt. He took the place that Mr. Rose could not have occupied long. At once the world out of doors looked up to him as official head of the movement. It came to be known as “Puseyism” at home and abroad. University wits had jested about “Newmanites” and likened the Vicar of St. Mary’s to the conforming Jew, Vander; but “Puseyite” was a serious term even in rebuke. The Tractarian leader showed a deference to this “great man” which was always touching; yet they agreed less than Pusey understood. Towards Rome itself the latter felt no drawing; Newman’s fiercecens betrayed the impatience of a thwarted affection. “O that thy creed were sound, thou Church of Rome!” he exclaimed in the bitterness of the times. As a “despised history of the Reformation”, it says he had no “hysterical passion”. Neither did he regard the judgment of bishops as decisive, nor was he troubled by them if they ran counter to the Fathers’ teaching, so intimately known to this unwearyed student.

He was “a man of large designs”, confident in his position, “haunted by no intellectual perplexities”. He welcomed responsibility, a little too much sometimes; and now he gave the tracts a more important character. His own in 1835 on Holy Baptism was an extraordianary treatise to the effect that Pusey was a simian model. In 1836 he advertised his great project for a translation or “library” of the Fathers, which was executed mainly in conjunction with the pious and cencen- trical Charles Marriot. The republication of Anglican divines, from Andrews onwards, likewise owed its inception to Pusey. The instauratio magnae theoloyi was executed to be purely Catholic, thus made a beginning. It has taken on it since the largest dimensions, and become not only learned but popular; Anglican experts have treated the liturgy, church history, books for guidance in the spiritual life, hymnology, architecture, and ritual with a copious knowledge and remarkable success. Of these enterprises Dr. Pusey was the source and for many years the standard.

In 1836 Hurrell Froude, returning from Barbadoes in the last stage of weakness, died at his father’s house in Devonshire. His “Remains”, of which we shall speak presently, were published in 1837. Newman’s dearest friend was taken from him just as a fresh scene was being arranged, with much enterprise and large volumes, during half a century—legal "persecutions", acts of reprisals, fallings away on the right hand and the left. Froude died on 28 Feb., 1836. In May Dr. Hampden—who had been appointed, thanks to Whately, Regius Professor of Divinity on 7 Feb.—was censured by the heads of houses, the governing board of the university, for the unsound doctrine taught in his “Romish Lectors”. All the Oxford residents at this time, except a handful, were incensed by what they considered the perils to faith which Dr. Hampden’s free-thought was provoking. But it was Newman who, by his “Eulications”, pointed the charge, and gave to the learned combatants an excuse for condemning what they had not read. None were so indignant as his threshold. The Evangelicals who trooped into Convocation to vote against Hampden “avowed their desire that the next time they were brought up to Oxford, it might be to put down the Popery of the Movement”.

At this date even Pusey celebrated the Reformers as “the founders of our Church”; and that largely fabulous account of the past which Newman calls “the Protestant tradition” was believed on all sides. Imagine, then, how shocked and alarmed were old-fashioned parsons of every type when Froude’s letters and diaries upset “with amazing audacity” these “popular and conventional errors”. Froude’s influence was described as “a limb badly set”, its apologist Jewel flung aside as “an irreverent Dissenter”, its reasoning against the Catholic mysteries denounced as the fruit of a proud spirit which would make short work of Christianity itself. Froude, in his graphic correspondence, appeared to be the enfant terrible who had no reserves and no respect for “idols” whether of the market-place or the theatre. Friends were pained, foes exultant; “sermons and newspapers”, says Dean Church, “drew attention to Froude’s extravagances with horror and disgust”. The editors, Keble no less than Newman, had misjudged the effect, which was widely irritating and which increased the suspicion their own writings had excited of some deep-laid plot in favour of Rome (Letter to Lassett, June, 1835). To be at once imprudent and insidious might seem beyond man’s power; but such was the reputation Tractarians bore from that day. Froude’s outspoken judgments, however, marked the turning of the tide in the New Testament studies and the history of literature. “The Reaction”, continues Dean Church, “never can be again, with their confused Calvinism, with their shifting opinions, their extravagant deference to the foreign oracles of Geneva and Zurich, their subservience to bad men in power, the heroes and saints of Churchmen.” Since Cobbe's indictment of the Reformation no language had so stirred the rage of "general ignorance," long content to take its legends on trust. Froude's "Remains" were a challenge to it in one way, as the "Library of the Fathers" was in another, and yet again the ponderous "Catenas" of High Church authorities, the "Delovian" and "Parkerian" answers, with its sixty-six volumes, mostly unreadable, of the Cranmer, Bullinger, and Zurich pattern. The Reformation theology was doomed. What the "Anglican regiment" has accomplished, J. A. Froude proclaims, "is the destruction of the Evangelical party in the Church of England.

It was pulled down the temple of the Philistines, he was buried in its ruins. Newman did not shrink from that sacrifice; he was ready to strike and be stricken. Though Hampden's condemnation would never have been carried by the Tractarians alone, they gave it a force and an edge in the very spirit of Land. To put down false teachers by authority, to visit them with penalties of censure and deprivations, they held the duty of the Church and of the State as God's minister. They would have repealed Catholic Emancipation. They resisted the grant to the College of Maynooth. They had saved the Prayer Book from amendments, and frightened politicians, who would have distributed the spoils of the Church and agriculture among the Liberals.

By the year 1838 they had won their place in Oxford; the "Times" was coming over to their side; Bampton Lectures were beginning to talk of Catholic tradition as the practical rule of faith; and Evangelicals, infuriated if not dismayed, were put on their defence. Whately from Dublin, Hawkins, Pusey, and Grenville, all with the "Dublin University" approach, were calling up a motley array, united on one point only, that Tractarians must be handled as the emissaries of Rome. Dr. Arnold in the "Edinburgh Review" launched an invective against the "Oxford Malignants," accusing them of "moral dishonesty." Newman's former friend, Whately, shrieked over "this rapidly increasing pestilence," and transfixed its leaders with epithets; they were "vailed prophets"; their religion was "Thuggery"; they were working out "infinite designs." Lord Morpeth in the House of Commons trounced on "a sect of damnable and detestable heretics lately sprung up at Oxford," and mentioned Newman by name. From every quarter of the compass came a reproach of his; he was attacked; but it moved round a thunder cloud called "Rome."

"Just at this time, June, 1838," says Newman, "was the zenith of the Tract Movement." A change of fortune began with his bishop's charge, admonishing lightly on its Roman tendencies, to which the answer came at once from Newman, that if it was desired he would suppress the tracts. It was not asked of him; but he had written to Bowden the significant words, "I do not see how the bishop can materially alter his charge or how I can hear any blow whatever." Some of his friends objected to publishing the tract on the Roman Brevarv; for it was not then realized how much the Anglican Prayer Book owes to Catholic, i.e. to Latin, tradition. But the bishops, hearing of the association, joined that they must have confidence in him. To Keble he disclosed his idea of giving up the tracts, the "British Critic," and St. Mary's. For while preaching high Anglican doctrine, he said, "one cannot stop still. Shrewd minds anticipate conclusions, oblige one to say yes or no." He collected in January, 1839, "all the strong things," which he had said and written, and that against the Church of Rome, and made them of "advertisements" to the Puseyite publications. By way of protest on the Low Church side, bishops, clergy, and laity united in the Martyrs' Memorial to Cranmer and Latimer, set up near the spot where they suffered, in front of Balliol College. But the tracts were selling faster than the printers could meet the demand. In July, Newman, taking up again his always projected and never issued edition of Dionysius of Alexandria, plunged into the record of the Monophysites and the Council of Chalcedon. In September he wrote to F. Rogers, "I have had the first real hit from Romanism;" an allusion to Wiseman's telling article on the monophysite school in the "Dublin Review" for August. Walking with H. W. Prideaux in the New Year, feeling of the "tragic and pathetic character," as Dean Church truly says, "that it will never cease to be read where the English language is spoken." It was the story of a deliverance. But still sanam paid for it with all he held dear.

Parallels from antiquity might affect a student like Newman. To the many, inside or outside Oxford, they meant nothing. The live question always was, how to combat Rome, which appeared at the end of every vista as the goal of Tractarian reasoning. The "shrewd minds" which now harried and drove on their leader did not take any "middle way"; these were long into the past, and not to be second-guessed. Here was boldly Tolosius in Latium, they were pilgrims to St. Peter's shrine. J. B. Morris, Dalgarms, Oakley, Macaulaen, converts in the sequel, came round Newman while his older associates had not advanced. But the captain of the band was W. G. Ward, lecturer at Balliol, a friend of Stanley's, and for a time attracted by Arnold, then suddenly changed for good by the sermons at St. Mary's, with his one sole article of faith, Creto in Novumonium. Ward, a strange, joyous, pronking figure, pervading the university with his logic and his jokes, was the enfant terrible of this critical time, as Froude had been previously. They differed in a hundred ways; but both certainly urged Newman forward at a pace he would not have chosen. Froude "did not seem to be afraid of infinences;" Ward reviled in them. It was Froude who first taught Newman "to look with admiration towards the Church of Rome. Ward, of all men the least inclined to compromise, did not care one jot for the Church of England, except in so far as it could be moved, as Protestants and Liberals did before him, the doctrine and discipline of the papal communion. He had "the intellect of an archangel," as he said ingenuously; his acuteness and audacity were a continual challenge to Newman, who partly resented but still more yielded to them; and so the problem took a formidable shape—how much of "infantile Catholicism" would the Establishment bear. It was "like proving cannon." The crucial test was applied in "Tract 90," which came out on 27 February, 1841. Once more, as in the case of Froude's "Remains," Newman misjudged. He had drifted so far that he lost sight of the ever-changing, uncertain times of this day, of the bulwarks of the national feeling against Rome. He thought his peace-offering would not cause offence. But Ward prophesied, and his instinct proved true, that it would be "hotly received." A lively epistle from Church (afterwards Dean of St. Paul's) to F. Rogers at Naples shows the storm raging early in March. What "Tract 90" affirmed was that the Thirty-Nine Articles might be signed in a Catholic, though not in a Roman sense; that they did not condemn the Council of Trent, which in 1562, the date of their publication, was not ended; and that a distinction must be drawn between the corruptions of popular religion and the formal decrees approved by the Holy See. It is not admitted, as the memorial of J. A. Seeley argues, that "Newman was only claiming a position for himself and his friends which had been purposely left open when the constitution of the Anglican Church was framed". But he appeared to be an innovator and, in that exciting season, a traitor. The Philistines held him bound by his own cords; Erastians! They would not wait even twelve hours would not shield him from attack. Four leading tutors, egged on by the fanatical Golightly, and including A. C. Tait, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, demanded the writer's name and charged him with dangerous tendencies. The hebdomadal board now retorted on Newman the "persecution" dealt out to Hampden. They would not wait even twelve hours for his defence. They resolved on 15 March, that "modes of interpretation such as are suggested in the said Tract, evading rather than explaining the sense of the Thirty-nine Articles, and reconciling subscription to them with the adoption of errors, which they were designed to counteract, defeat the object, and are inconsistent with the due observance of the above mentioned Statutes." This anathema was posted up on every buttery hatch, or public board, of the colleges, as a warning to undergraduates. Newman acknowledged his authorship in a touching letter, perhaps too humble; and a war of pamphlets broke out. Keble, Palmer, and Pusey took up the tract, though Pusey could not bring himself to approve of its method unconditionally. But Ward, with great effort, hurled back the charge of "insincerity" on those who made it. How could Whately and Hampden use the services for baptism, visitation of the sick, or ordination, all dead and corrupt? This, and the other points, did Ward follow Newman. Later on, he described the articles as "patient of a Catholic but ambitious of a Protestant meaning". Whatever their logic, their rhetoric was undoubtedly Protestant. For himself, in subscribing them, he renounced no Roman doctrine. That the "schismatic" Ward and Palmer, putting oil on fire, Newman had made the mistake of handling an explosive matter without precaution, in the dry legal fashion of an advocate, instead of using his incomparable gift of language to persuade and convince. His refinements were pilloried as "Jesuitism", and his motive was declared to be treason. An "immense commotion" followed. The "Apologia" describes it, "in every part of the country, and every class of society, through every organ and opportunity of opinion, in newspapers, in periodicals, at meetings, in pulpits, at dinner-tables, in coffee-rooms, in railway-carriages. I was denounced as a traitor who had laid his train, and was detected in the very act of carrying it out. The Establishment was to be secretly indorsed with "Romish errors". The heads of houses now proposed to repeal their censure of 1836 on Hampden, though he withdrew not a line of his Bampton Lectures. It was too much. Convocation threw out the measure by a majority of 74. Newman wrote, "My heart was seared" said G. to his friend. "I was engaged in the spirit of faction, the spirit was mounting high. Young men's imaginations for orders were refused by their colleges. A statute was brought up in Feb., 1844, to place the granting of all divinity degrees under a board in conjunction with the vice-chancellor, which would mean the exclusion from them of Tractarians. This, indeed, was rejected by 311 votes to 21. But Newman had said a year earlier, that the authorities were bent on exerting their "more than military power" to put down Catholicism. R. W. Church calls them "an irresponsible and incompetent oligarchy"." Their chiefs were such as Hawkins, Symons, and Cardwell, bitterly opposed to the movement all through. As Newman had retired, the proverbial churl, in my acquisition of the "six doctors" they suspended him, without hearing a word of his defence, from preaching for two years, 2 June, 1843. His crime consisted in a moderate Anglican sermon on the Holy Eucharist. Espionage, delation, quarrel between heads and tutors, rejection of Puseyites standing for fellowships, and a heated suspicion as though a second Popish Plot were in the air, made of this time at Oxford a drama which Dean Church likens to the Greek factio-fights described by Thucydides. The situation could not last. A crisis might have been avoided by good sense on the part of the bishops outside, and the ruling powers within the university. It was precipitated by W. G. Ward. Ejected from his lectureship at Balliol, he wrote violent articles between 1841 and 1843 in the "British Critic", no longer in Newman's hands. His conversation was a combat; his words of scorn for Anglican doctrines and dignitaries flew round the college walls of Wadham, as far as New College. In 1842 "Narrative of Events" objected strongly to Ward's "Rommanizing" tendencies. The "British Critic" just then came to an end. Ward began a pamphlet in reply; it swelled to 600 pages, and in the summer of 1844 burst on an irritated public as "The Ideal of a Christian Church." His method was simple. The writer identified all that was Roman with all that was Catholic; and proceeded to apply this test to the Church of England, which could ill bear it. Rome satisfied the conditions of what a Church ought to be; the Establishment shamefully neglected its duties as a "guardian of morality" and "a teacher of orthodoxy". It ignored the supernatural; it allowed ethics to be thrown overboard; it overlooked the unholy works; it had no real Saints because it neither commanded nor practised the counsels of perfection; it was a schismatic body which ought humbly to sue for pardon at the feet of the true Bride of Christ. To evade the spirit of the Articles while subscribing them, where necessary, in a "non-natural" sense, was the only alternative. Ward replied, "the subterfuges practised by the Protestants impossible. The very heart of the Elizabethan compromise he quelled out. His language was diffuse, his style heavy, his manner to the last degree provoking. But whereas "Tract 90" did not really state, and made no attempt to resolve, the question at issue, Ward's "Ideal" swept away ambiguous terms and definitions, and left little to be unsatisfactory, but only, clumsily, the types of sainthood which were in dispute; it claimed for the Catholic standard not toleration but supremacy; and it put the Church of England on its knees before Rome.

Howcould Oxford or the clergy endure such a lesson? So complete a change of attitude on the part of Englishmen, even with the underlying ruin of the old religion, was not to be dreamt of. This, then, was what "Tract 90" had in view with its subtleties and subterfuges—a second Cardinal Pole absolving the nation as it lay in the dust, pentent. The result, says Dean Stanley, "the greatest explosion of theological apprehension and anxiety known to his time. Not even the tract had excited a more immediate or a more powerful sensation. Ward's challenge must be taken up. He claimed, as a priest in the Church of England, to bold (though not as yet to teach) the "whole cycle of Roman doctrine". Newman had never done so; even in 1841 he was not fully acquainted with all the points he had to dispute, and would not have written the "Ideal"; much of it has been read as a theory. But in Oxford the authorities, who were acting as if with synodical powers, submitted to Convocation in Dec., 1841, three measures: (1) to condemn Ward's book; (2) to deprive the author by taking away his university degrees; and (3) to compel under pain of expulsion, every one who subscribed the Articles to declare that he held them in the sense in which "they were both first published and were now imposed by the university".

The penalty on Ward, vindictive and childish as it now appears, stood alone, few would have minded it. Even Newman wrote in Jan., 1841, to J. B. Mozley, "Before the Test, I supposed Ward to have no claims on anyone". But over that "Test" a wild shriek arose. Liberals would be affected by it as surely as "Tractarians. Tuit, one of the "Four Teachers", Maurice, the broadest of Broad Churchmen, Professor Donkin, most intellectual of writers belonging to the same school, came forward to resist the implication. "Tract 90", on the principle of "Liturgy", Stanley and another obtained counsel's opinion from a future lord chancellor that the Test was illegal. On 23 Jan., they published his conclusion, and that very day the proposal was withdrawn. But on 27 Jan., the date in 1841 of "Tract 90" itself, a formal hearing on the tract, to be brought up in the approaching Convocation, was recommended to voters by a circular emanating from Faussett and Elerton. This anathema received between four and five hundred signatures in private, but was kept behind the scenes until 4 Feb. The hebdomadal board, in a frenzy of excitement, adopted it amid protests from the Puseyites and from Liberals of Stanley's type. Stanley's words during the tumult made a famous hit. In a "Perpetual priesthood but without work".

The victims of 1836 are the victims of 1841. The victims of 1845 are the victims of 1836. The assailants are the assailed. The assailed are the assailants. The condemned are the condemned. The wheel is come full circle. How soon may it come round again? A comment on the "fugitive" was made by the then archbishop, the Most Rev. Goreham case, in that of "Essays and Reviews", in the dispute over Colenso, and in the long and vexatious suits arising out of Ritualism. The endeavour was made to break every school of doctrine in succession on this wheel, but always at length in vain.

Convocation met in a snowstorm on 13 Feb., 1845. It was the last day of the Oxford Movement. Ward asked to defend himself in English before the vast assembly which crowded into the Sheldonian Theatre. He spoke with vigour and ability, declaring "twenty times over" that he held all the articles of the Roman Church. Amid cries and counter-cries the votes were taken. The first, which condemned his "Ideal", was carried by 79 to 5; the second, which put him of university standing, by 599 to 511. When the vice-chancellor put the third, which was to annihilate Newman and "Tract 90", the proctors rose, and in a voice that rang like a trumpet Mr. Guilemard of Trinity, the senior, uttered their "Non placet". This was fatal to the decree, and in the event to that reviewer which had the ruin of Oxford. Newman gave no sign. But his reticence boded nothing good to the Anglican cause. The University repudiated his followers and they broke into detachments, the many lingering behind with Keble or Pusey; others, and among them Mark Pattison, a tragic instance, lapsing into various forms of modern unbelief; while the genuine Roman group, Faber, Dalgairns, Oakeley, Northcote, Seager, Morris, and a long stream of successors, became Catholics. They left the Liberal party to triumph in Oxford and to remould the University. If 13 Feb., 1845, was the "Dies Irae" of Tractarian hopes, it saw the final discomfiture of the Evangelical party in England. The Church was compelled to "revisit the very foundations of their religion". Dogma had taken refuge in Rome.

In April, 1815, the country was excited by Sir R. Peel's proposals for the larger endowment of Maynooth (see Macaulay's admirable speech on the occasion). In June, Sir H. Jenner Fust, Dean of Arches, condemned Oakeley of Malthouse Street chapel for holding the like doctrines with Ward, who was already married and early in September was received into the Church. Newman resigned his Oriel fellowship, held since 1822, at the beginning of October. He did not wait to finish the "Development"; but on the feast of St. Denys, 9 Oct., made his profession of the Catholic Faith to Father Don of Litchfield. The Church of England "reeled under the shock". Deep silence, as of stupor, followed the clamours and long agonies of the past twelve years. The Via Media swerved aside, becoming less theoretical and less learned, always wavering between the old Anglican and the new Roman road, but gradually drawing nearer to the former. Its headquarters were in London, Leeds, and Brighton, no longer in Oxford.

But an "aftermath" of disputes, and of conversions in the year 1851, remains to be noticed. On 15 Nov., 1847, the Prime Minister, Lord John Russell, nominated to the See of Hereford the "stormy petrel" of those controversies. Dr. Hampden. He did so "to strengthen the Protestant character of our Church, threatened of late by many defections to the Church of Rome'. The "Times" expressed amazement; Archbishop Howley and thirteen other bishops remonstrated; but Dr. Pusey was "the leader and orator of the opposition". Among the bishops who opposed the election were the heads of Houses of Jenny, Hampden, and Trumbull, the archbishops of Canterbury, York, and Dublin, and the bishops of Hereford and Oxford. Over against them, in the House of Commons, were no less than twenty-five bishops, in the House of Lords, twenty-six bishops, and in the Privy Council, thirty-nine bishops. The meeting of the House of Lords was chiefly in favour of the nominee, though lying under censure since 1836. An attempt was made to object at Bow Church when the election was to be confirmed; but the Archbishop had no freedom, and by congé d'élire and exercise of the Royal Supremacy, a notoriously unsound teacher became Bishop of Hereford. It was the case of Howley in a modern form.

Almost at the same date (2 Nov., 1847) the Rev. G. C. Gorham, "an aged Calvinist", was presented to the living of Brampton Speke in Devonshire. "Henry of Exeter", the bishop, holding High Anglican views, examined him at length on the subject of baptismal regeneration, and finding that he did not believe in it, refused to induct Mr. Gorham. The case went to the Court of Arches—a spiritual court—where Sir H. Jenner Fust decided against the appellant, 2 Aug., 1849. Mr. Gorham carried a further appeal to the judicial committee, the lay royal tribunal, which reversed the decision of the Court of Arches. Dr. Philpotts, the Bishop of Exeter, refused to institute; and the dean of arches was compelled to do so instead. The bishop tried every other court in vain; for a while he broke off communion, so far as he dared, with Canterbury. As Liberalism had won at Hereford, so Calvinism won at Brampton Speke.

These decisions of the Crown in Council affected matters of doctrine most intimately. Newman's lectures on "Anglican Difficulties" were drawn forth by the Gorham judgment. But Pusey, Keble, Gladstone, and Anglo-Catholics at large were dumbfounded. Manning, Archdeacon of Chichester, had neither written tracts nor joined in Newman's proceedings. He was too timid. On the other hand, he was so much a disciple of W. E. Gladstone, that the general public, though in measured terms, against "Tract 90" he had gone so far as to preach an out-and-out Protestant sermon in St. Mary's on Guy Fawkes' day, 1843. In 1845 he "attacked the Romancing party so fiercely as to call forth a remonstrance from Pusey". And then came a change. He read Newman's "Development", and those sermons, as usual, had a serious effect. It was to be the "Anglicans Revival". But if it was a happy omen, it was not generally so. It was a disease rather than a cure. It was too narrow for its religious life, and the machinery for discipline has broken down. The condemned of Anglican Orders by Pope Leo XIII in the Bull "Apostolicae Curae", 13 Sept., 1896, shuts out the hope entertained by some of what was termed "corporate reunion", even with the defects it contains. The men who were the leaders of the movement, Newman and Pusey, did not believe. But he never doubted that the movement of 1833 was a work of Providence; or that its leaders, long after his own departure from them, were "false weapons of the various English denominations and parties (far beyond their own range) with principles and sentiments tending towards their ultimate absorption into the Catholic Church".

WILLIAM BARRY.

Oxyrhynchus, titular archbishop of Heptanomos in Egypt. It was the see of the district of its name, the nineteenth of Upper Egypt, whose god was Sit, incarnated in a sacred fish of the Nile, the Moryn-arus. Thence comes its Greek name, for in Egyptian it is called Pemdje. It has been mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Ptolomy, etc. Its inhabitants early embraced Christianity, and at the end of the fourth century ("Vita Patrum" of Rufinus of Aquileia) it possessed neither pagan nor heretic. It had then twelve churches, and its monastic huts exceeded in number its ordinary dwellings. Surrounding the city were many convents to which reference is made in Palladius, the "Apophthegmata Patrum", Johannes was to restore the idea of the Church, and the dignity of the sacraments, above all, of the Holy Eucharist. In the Laundian tradition, though fearfully weakened, it sought a fulcrum and a precedent for these happier changes."

Joseph de Maistre, in the year 1816, had called attention to the English Church, designating it as a middle term between Catholic unity and Protestant dissent; with an angry of its future as perhaps one day serving towards the reunion of Christendom. Alexander Knox foretold a life destiny, but the establishment must be captured by the Church at Rome. But he, too, had anticipated such a time in remarkable words. But the most striking prophecy was uttered by an aged ducyman, Mr. Sikes of Guilbrough, who predicted that, whereas "the Holy Catholic Church" had long been a dropped article of the Creed, it would by and by seem to swallow up the rest, and there would be an outcry of "Popey" from one end of the country to another (Newman's "Correspondence", II, 181). When the tracts began, Phillips de Lisle saw in them an assurance that England would return to the Holy See. And J. A. Froude sums it all up in these words, "Newman has been the voice of the intellectual reaction of Europe", he says, "which was an alarming feature of the age, a reaction of revolutions, and is looking for safety in the for- sakest ages of which it had been tempted to despise."

Later witnesses, Cardinal Vaughan or W. E. Gladstone, affirm that the Church of England is transformed. Catholic beliefs, devotions, rites, and institutions flourish in it. But it is that again. There is too narrow for its religious life, and the machinery for discipline has broken down (Royal Commission on Discipline, concluding words). The condemnation of Anglican Orders by Pope Leo XIII in the Bull "Apostolicae Curae", 13 Sept., 1896, shuts out the hope entertained by some of what was termed "corporate reunion", even with the defects it contains. The men who were the leaders of the movement, Newman and Pusey, did not believe. But he never doubted that the movement of 1833 was a work of Providence; or that its leaders, long after his own departure from them, were "false weapons of the various English denominations and parties (far beyond their own range) with principles and sentiments tending towards their ultimate absorption into the Catholic Church".
Ozanam, ANTOINE-FRÉDÉRIC, great-grand-nephew of Jacques Ozanam, b. at Marseille, 23 April, 1813; d. at Marseilles, 8 Sept., 1853. His father, settled at first in Lyons as a merchant, after reverses of fortune decided to go to Marseilles. Later he returned to Lyons and became a physician. At eighteen, in 1831, he applied to the Sorbonne, and within a few years was graduated d'philosophie. He formed an intimate friendship with the latter's son, Jean-Jacques Ampère, well known later for his works on literature and history. Meanwhile he became the prey of doubt. "God," he said, "gave me the grace to be born in the Faith. Later the confusion of an unbelieving world surrounded me. I knew all the horror of the doubts that torment the soul. It was then that the instructions of a priest and philosopher (Abbe Noirot) saved me. I believed thereon with an assured faith, and touched by so rare a goodness, I promised God to devote my life to the service of the truth which had given me peace." Rarely was a promise more faithfully fulfilled.

In 1836 he left Paris, where he had known Chateaubriand, Ballanche, Montalembert, and Lacordaire, and was appointed to the bench at Lyons, but two years later returned to Paris to submit his thesis on legal subjects to the Editorial Committee for the instruction of Catholic school children, whose faith was endangered by the current unbelief. As a result of this petition Monsieur de Quelen created the famous "Conférences de Notre Dame", which Lacordaire (q.v.) inaugurated in 1835. When but twenty, Ozanam, with seven companions had laid the foundations of the Catholic Society of St. Vincent de Paul, in order, as he said, to "insure my faith by works of charity". During his life he was an active member and a zealous propagator of the society (see SAINT VINCENT DE PAUL, SOCIETY OF). With all his zeal, he was, however, tolerant. His strong, sincere books exhibit a brilliant and animated style, enthusiasm and erudition, eloquence and exactness, and are yet useful introductions to the subjects about which they treat.

Ozanam, Jacques, French mathematician, b. at Bouligneux (Ain), 1610; d. in Paris, 3 April, 1717. He came of a rich family which had renounced the Jewish faith for the Catholic religion. From the same family sprang the better known Antoine-Frédéric Ozanam (q.v.). Though he began the study of theology to please his father, he was more strongly attracted to mathematics, which he mastered without the aid of a teacher. At the age of fifteen he produced a mathematical treatise. Upon the death of his father, he gave up theology after four years of study and began, at Lyons, to give free private instruction in mathematics. Later, as the family property passed entirely to his elder brother, he was reluctantly driven to accept fees for his lessons. In 1670, he published trigonometric and logarithmic tables more accurate than the then existing ones of Chaquet, Pitiscus, and compare an act of kindness. He laid the foundations of the French Academy of Inscriptions and the "Grand Prix des Mathématiques" for two successive years. In 1672 he made a short journey to Spain an account of which is found in the posthumous work: "Un pélerinage au pays du Cid". In the beginning of the next year, his doctors again sent him to Italy, but he returned to Marseilles to die. When the priest exhorted him to have confidence in God, he replied "Oh why Diophante augmentés et réduits à la spécieuse" received the praise of Leibnitz. "Récurrences", translated later into English and well known to-day, was published in 1694. He was elected member of the Academy of Sciences in 1701. The death of his wife plunged him into deepest sorrow, and the loss of his foreign pupils through the War of the Spanish Succession, reduced him to poverty.

Ozanam was honoured more abroad than at home. He was devout, charitable, courageous, and of simple faith. As a young man he had overcome a passion for gaming. He was wont to say that it was for the doctors of the Sorbonne to dispute, for the pope to decide, and for a mathematician to go to heaven in a perpendicular line. Among his chief works are: "Table des sinus, tangentes, et secantes" (Lyons, 1670); "Méthode générale pour tracer des cadran" (Paris, 1673); "Géométrie pratique" (Paris, 1684); "Traité des lignes du premier genre" (Paris, 1687); "De l'usage du compas" (Paris, 1688); "Dictionnaire mathématique" (Paris, 1691); "Cours de mathématiques" (Paris, 1693, 5 vols., tr. into English, London, 1712); "Traité de la fortification" (Paris, 1694); "Récurrences mathématiques et physiques" (Paris, 1694, 2 vols., revised by Montucla, Paris, 1778, 4 vols., tr. by Hutton, London, 1803, 4 vols., revised by Riddle, London, 1841); "Nouvelle Trigonométrie" (Paris, 1698); "Méthode facile pour arpenter" (Paris, 1699); "Nouveaux Éléments d'Algèbre" (Amsterdam, 1702); "La Géographie et Cosmographie" (Paris, 1711); "La Perspective" (Paris, 1714).

Ozias "יְהוָה יָדִי", i. e., "Yahweh is my strength"; name of six Israelites mentioned in the Bible. (1) Ozias, King of Judah (809-759 B. c.), son and successor of Azarias. On the latter's death he was chosen king though he was only sixteen years of age (IV Kings, xiv, 21, where, as in ch. xv also, the name Azarias appears instead of Ozias, probably through a copist's error; cf. II Par., xxvi, 1). His long reign of fifty-two years is described as pleasing to God, though he incurs the reproach of having tolerated the "high places". This structure is omitted by the chronicler, who, however, relates that Ozias was stricken with leprosy for having presumed to usurp the priestly function of burning incense in the Temple. Ozias is mentioned among the lineal ancestors of the Saviour (Matt., i, 8, 9). (2) Ozias, son of Uriel, and father of Saul of the branch of Caath (I Par., vi, 21). (3) Ozias, whose son Jonathan was custodian of the treasures possessed by King David outside of Jerusalem (I Par., xxvii, 25). (4) Ozias, son of Harim, one of the priests who having taken "strange wives", were forced to give them up during the reform of Esdras (I Esdr., x, 21). (5) Ozias, son of Misha, of the tribe of Simeon, a ruler of Bethulia (Judith, vii, 12). (6) Ozias, one of the ancestors of Judith, of the tribe of Ruben (Judith, viii, 1).

Pacandus, titular see, recorded under "Pacanden," among the titular sees in the official list of the Curia Romana as late as 1884, when it was suppressed as never having existed as a residential see. Its present titular is Mgr. Léon Livinhar, superior general of the White Fathers. The name of "Pacanden" owes its origin, without doubt, to the see of Acandu in Lycia, whose bishop, Panutius, signed in 558 the letter of the bishops of Lycia to Emperor Leo, and which is mentioned in the "Notitiae Episcopatum" from the seventh to the thirteenth century among the suffragans of Myra. Its exact site is unknown.

Pacca, Bartolommeo, cardinal, scholar, and statesman, b. at Benevento, 27 Dec., 1756; d. at Rome, 19 Feb., 1814; son of Orazio Pacca, Marchese di Mattrice, and Crisipina Malaspina. He was educated by the Jesuits at Naples, by the Somaschians in the Clementine College at Rome, and at the Accademia de' Nobili Ecclesiastic. In 1785 Pius VI appointed him nuncio at Cologne, the centre of anti-Roman agitation. He was consecrated titular Archbishop of Daniata and arrived at Cologne in June, 1786. The Archbishop of Cologne, Archduke Maximilian of Austria, who had written a courteous letter to Pacca and told him he would not be recognized unless he formally promised not to exercise any act of jurisdiction in the archdiocese, the same attitude was taken by the Archbishops of Trier and Mainz. Hostility to Rome, incited chiefly by the work of Febronius (see FEBRONIANS) was then at a high pitch on account of the establishment of the new nunciature of Munich. The other bishops, however, and the magistrates of Cologne received Pacca with all due respect. Even Prussia made no difficulty, and its monarch, in recognition of his friendly attitude, was accorded at Rome the title of king, against which Clement XI (1701) had protested when the emperor would have granted it. On his journey through his dominions on the Rhine Frederick William received the nuncio with great honour.

Pacca's position with respect to the three ecclesiastical electors was difficult. When the Archbishop of Cologne, in 1786, opened the University of Bonn, that of Cologne being still loyal to the Holy See, the desecrations given were a declaration of war against the Holy See. At Cologne, too, an attempt was made to publish Febronian propositions, but was frustrated by the nuncio, against whom innumerable pamphlets were directed. But Pacca induced some prominent German writers to publish the rights of the Holy See. He soon had a dispute with the Elector of Cologne. Conformably to the Petitionation of Eins, agreed on by the three archbishop electors and the Archbishop of Salzburg in 1786, the Archbishop of Cologne protested against a matrimonial dispensation given by the nuncio in virtue of his faculties, and went so far as to grant dispensations not contained in his quinquennial faculties, instructing the pastors to have no further recourse to the nuncio for similar dispensations. The nuncio, in accordance with instructions from Rome, directed a circular to all the pastors in his jurisdiction apprising them of the invalidity of such dispensations. The four archbishops thereupon appealed to Joseph II to entirely abolish the jurisdiction of the nuncios, and the emperor referred the matter to the Diet of Ratisbon, where it was quashed. Pacca also opposed freedom of worship for the Protestants of Cologne, but so tactfully that his intervention was not apparent, and did not offend the King of Prussia. In 1790 he went on a secret mission to the Diet of Frankfort to safeguard the interests of the Holy See, and prevented the adoption of a new concordat.

When the French invaded the Rhine Provinces, he was ordered to leave Cologne, but he had the satisfaction of being finally recognized as nuncio by the Archbishop of Trier. In 1794 he was appointed nuncio in Portugal, but accomplished nothing of importance there. Of both nunciates, he wrote memoirs, containing observations on the character of the countries and their governments. While still at Lisbon, he was created cardinal of the title of St. Silvester in Capite (23 February, 1801), and assigned to various congregations. In 1806 French troops were stationed in Rome. Yielding to the insistence of Napoleon, Pius VII sacrificed Cardinal Consalvi, his faithful secretary of State, and the pro-secretaries, Casoni, Doria, and Gabrielli. The last-named was surprised in his apartments by the soldiers, placed under arrest, and ordered to leave papal territory. Two days later (18 June, 1806) the pope appointed Pacca pro-secretary.

In his new position Pacca carefully avoided everything that might provoke the emperor's anger, even ignoring the excesses of the French soldiery in and about Rome. He was forbidden to publish in every province a decree forbidding subjects of the Holy See to enlist in the new "Civic Guard" (see NAPOLEON I) and, in general, under any foreign command. The "Civic Guard" was a hotbed of turbulence that might easily produce a rebellion in the Pontifical States. But Molitis, the French commandant, was furious, and threatened Pacca with dismissal from Rome. The pro-secretary replied that he took orders from the pope alone. Realizing that the annexation of Rome was inevitable, Pacca took precautions to prevent a sudden attack on the Quirinal; at the same time advising calm and quiet. The Bull of excommunication against Napoleon had been prepared in 1806, to be published in the event of annexation. On 10 June, 1809, when the change of government actually took place, the Bull was promulgated; on 6 July, the Quirinal was attacked, the pope arrested and taken to France and thence to Savona. Pacca was among those who accompanied him. As far as Florence, he tried to reach Pius VII; at Florence he was torn from the pope's side, murdered by the soldier, and saw him again only at Rivoli and Grenoble. From Grenoble he was conducted (6 Aug., 1809) to Fontenelle, where he was confined with great severity, and could hardly find opportunities for confession and communion. Later, however, this restriction was removed. During this period the captive minister found time to write those records which formed the substance of his "Memorie storiche del ministero," etc.
Finally, on 30 January, 1813, he was told that in view of the concordat concluded between the pope and Napoleon at Fontainebleau (25 January) he was free to join the pope. Napoleon had long objected to his liberation, declaring: “Pacea is my enemy”. At Fontainebleau he and the other libelled cardinals insisted that Pius VII should retract the last concordat and reappoint him to the See of Benevento. He was to hold the post of Archbishop of Benevento with full freedom. Pacea also suggested the re-establishment of the Society of Jesus, although both the pope and he himself had been educated in prejudices against the society. When Pius VII was conducted to Savona the second time, Pacea was deposited (January 1814), leaving that place on 22 April. He joined the pope near Sirmione whence he accompanied him to Rome. Appointed cardinal camerlengo in the same year, he exerted himself to re-establish the religious orders from the foundations not already sold.

During the absence of Consalvi at the Congress of Vienna, Pacea again became pro-secretary of State, the restoration of the pontifical Government thus devolving on him. He was reprovéd by Consalvi, from Vienna, for his severity towards the supporters of the Napoleonic regime, and vainly tried to justify his conduct. When Murat, King of Naples, sent his troops through the Pontifical States to meet the Austrians, Pacea advised Pius VII to seek temporary refuge at Genoa, fearing that Murat would attempt to ravage the domains of the Holy See. During the pope’s absence, the provisional Government caused the arrest of Cardinal Maury on a charge of having secret intelligence with Murat, and his trial was continued even after the pope’s return. But Consalvi, immediately on his arrival, stopped the proceedings. The rest of Pacea’s life was occupied in the affairs of the different congregations to which he was assigned, and in the administration of the suburbanian sees. Leo XII appointed him pro-layal, he was the first to hold the post of cardinal legate of Velletri, and he was active against the Carbonari.

Cardinal Pacea’s house was frequented by the most illustrious scientists, men of letters, and artists, both Roman and foreign. He had excavations made at Ostia at his own expense, and with the objects discovered formed a small museum in his vineyard on the Via Aurelia (Casino of Pius V).

Pacca was a first-rate observer on politics and the philosophy of history are found in his “Memorie storiche della nunziatura di Colonia”; “Dei grandi meriti verso la Chiesa Cattolica del clero dell’ Università e de’ Magistrati di Colonia nel secolo XVII”; “Notizie sul Portogallo e sulla nunziatura di Lisbona”; “Memorie storiche della nunziatura ecclesiastica del secolo XIX” (1800–11); “Notizie storiche intorno alla vita e gli scritti di Mons. Pachomius, Saint, d. about 346. The main facts of his life will be found in Monasticism. II. Eastern Monasticism before Chalcedon. Having spent some time with Pelagon, he went to a deserted village named Tabennisi, not necessarily with the intention of remaining there permanently. A hermit would often withdraw for a time to meditate and write; and so in the latter part of his life, Pachomius retired, after wanderings to his old abode. But Pachomius never returned; a vision bade him stay and erect a monastery; “very many eager to embrace the monastic life will come hither to thee”. Although from the first Pachomius seems to have realized his mission to substitute the cenobitical for the eremitical life, some time elapsed before he could realize his idea. First his elder brother joined him, then others, but all were bent upon pursuing the eremitical life with some modifications proposed by Pachomius (c.e. he allowed his disciples to remain in Rome with full freedom). Pacea also suggested the re-establishment of the Society of Jesus, although both the pope and he himself had been educated in prejudices against the society. When Pius VII was conducted to Savona the second time, Pacea was deposited (January 1814), leaving that place on 22 April. He joined the pope near Sirmione whence he accompanied him to Rome. Pfachler, George Michael, controversial and educational writer, b. at Meran, March 8, 1789; d. at Innsbruck, July 11, 1875. He studied in the University of Tubingen and was ordained priest in 1818; he then took a course of philology in the University of Munich and became professor in the Gymnasium at Ellwangen. In 1856 Father Pfachler entered the Society of Jesus and some years later he was appointed dean of the Jesuit College of Feldkirch, Austria. His educational labours were interrupted twice, when he acted as military chaplain to the Tyrolean troops during the Italian campaign 1866, and to German volunteers in the papal army, 1869-70. After the expulsion of the Society of Jesus from the German Empire (1872), Pfachler lived mostly in Holland and Austria, devoting himself to literary work. He was the first editor of the "Stimmen aus Maria-Laach," published by the German Jesuits, one of the leading Catholic periodicals in Germany. He was an able and fertile writer on questions of the day: the Vatican Council, the Roman question, the labour movement, Freemasonry, and other topics. Among his works are: "Acta et Decreta Sacrosanni et Ecumemic Conscientia," (1871); "Die Internationale Arbeiterverbindung"; (1871); "Der Gotze der Humanitat oder das Positive der Freimaurerei." (1872); "Der stille Krieg gegen Thron und Altar," or the Negative of Freimaurerei, (1873); "Der Europaische Militarismus," (1876); "Die Brichtung der Volker durch das Schuhmonopol des modernen Staates," (1876); "Das gotische Recht der Familie und der Kirche auf die Schule," (1878). His book on the reform of higher education: "Die Reform unserer Gymnasien" (1880), attracted the attention of the foremost German educationalists, and he was invited to become a contributor to the "Monumenta Germanica Parchlogica," published in Berlin under the editorship of Karl Kehr. He contributed four volumes, II, V, IX, and XVI of the series, 1872-91, the last being edited by Father Duhm, S.J., after the author's death. Pfachler's volumes form the standard work on the educational system of the Jesuits throughout the whole of the Scholastische Societas Jesu, per Germaniam elin Ligentem." The work contains the official documents of the society which have reference to education, parts of the constitutions, decrees of the legislative assemblies of the order, ordinances of generals, reports of official visitations, the various revisions of the "Ratio Studiorum," regulations of the training of teachers, and treatises of private individuals which explain the practical working of the system. Much of the material had never been published. Through the publication of these valuable documents, certain errors or misconceptions entertained by many concerning the Jesuit system of education, its aims and methods, have forever been removed. Although the work is particularly with the Jesuit schools in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, it contains much that is of general interest, and constitutes the most important source of information on the history of the Society.

Pacifus, a disciple of St. Francis of Assisi, b. probably near Ascoli, Italy, in the second half of the twelfth century; d. probably at Lens, France, e. 1234. Local authors identify him with a certain William of Lecceano. Before becoming a Friar Minor he had been poet laureate at the Court of Frederick II of Sicily. When St. Francis, towards 1212, preached at San Severino, in the Marches, the poet saw two resplendent swords cross over the saint's head. At the request of his superior, he was asked to receive into the new order, and St. Francis gladly complied, giving him the name of Pacifus. In 1217 he was sent to France, where he is said to have become the founder and first provincial of the Friars Minor. In the Spring of 1226 Pacifus witnessed the holy Stigmata of St. Francis (11 Oct., 1223). When the saint arrived at Cassino, it is said that he wished to summon Brother Pacifus and send him with other friars through the world, preaching the praises of God (Spec. Perfect., c. 100). The last certain date in the life of Brother Pacifus is that of the Bull "Magna siuit", 12 April, 1227. Bull., Franc., I, 39-41: Raynaldus, ad an. 1227, 64, 65, in which Gregory IX recommends the Poor Clares of Siena to his care. Later authors who say he died at Sullano, in the Marches, confounded him with another friar of the same name. According to Gonzalez, he was sent by Brother Elias back to France, where he died. Pacifus was long credited with having put the songs of St. Francis into verse. But for the simple construction of the litany of the Blessed Virgin, he helped, whilst the other two do not belong to him at all. Some Italian verses said to have been composed by Pacifus are given by Italian authors.

Pacifus of Ceredano (CERANO), also known as PACIFUS OF NOVARA (NOVARIENSIS), BLESSED, b. 1420 at Ceredano, in the Diocese of Novara in Lombardy, supposedly of the much respected family of Ramati; d. 14 June, 1482. He entered the Franciscan Order of Observants at Novara in 1445. After his ordination, he was installed at a certain Franciscan monastery in the Italian Observants of that time were especially prominent. Pacifus also had a share in the preaching of the crusade against the Turks undertaken by his order. The general chapter of the Observants, held in Ferrara, 15 May, 1481, sent him as commissioner to Sardinia to administer and inspect the Franciscan monasteries in that country, where he died. According to his wish, his body was brought to Ceredano and buried in the church attached to the Franciscan monastery. His head was taken to the parish church of that place. He was at once honoured as a saint and, in 1745, Benedict XIV approved his veneration for the Franciscan Order and the Diocese of Novara. His feast is celebrated on 5 June. He is famous as the author of a dissertation, written in Italian and named after him the "Summa Pacifica", which treats of the proper method of hearing confessions. It was first printed at Milan in 1470 under the title: "Summa Pacifica sive Trattato della Scienza di confessare" (Hain, "Repert. typogr.", 1225); Copinger, "A Supplement to T. Paccoli, Lucas, mathematician, b. at Borgo San Sepolcro, Tuscany, towards the middle of the fifteenth century; died probably soon after 1509. Little is known concerning his life. He became a Franciscan friar and was successively professor of mathematics at Perugia, Rome, Naples, Pisa, and Venice. With Leonardo da Vinci, he was in Milan at the court of Louis the Moor, until the invasion of the French. The last years of his life were spent in Florence and Venice. His scientific writings, though poor in style, were the forerunners of the sixteenth-century mathematicians, including Carian and Tartaglia. In his first work, "Summa de Arithmetica, Geometria, Proportioni, et Proportionalita", Venice, 1491, he drew freely upon the writings of Leonardo da Pisa (Fibonacci) on the theory of numbers. Indeed he has thus preserved fragments of some of the ancient mathematics. The development of algebra to geometry, and the treatment, for the first time, of double-entry book-keeping and of the theory of probability also help to make this treatise noteworthy. The "Divina Proportioni" (Venice, 1509), was written with some co-operation on the part of Leonardo da Vinci. It is of interest chiefly for the insertion of polyhedrons and for the use of letters to indicate numerical quantities. His edition of Euclid was published in 1509 in Venice.

Pactum Calixtinum. See Callistus II, Pope; Concordat.

Paderborn, Diocese of (Paderbornensis), suffragan of Cologne, includes: the District of Minden, Westphalia, except the parish of Lette; the District of Arnsberg, Westphalia, except a few parishes; Prussian Saxony; five districts in the Rhine Province; the Prince-Bishopric of Münster; the Duchy of Gotha; the Principalties of Schwarburg-Rudolstadt and Schwarzburg-Sondershausen; and the Vicariate Apostolic of Anhalt (see Germany, map).

The diocese is divided into 53 deaneries. There are 547 parishes (20 missionary, 266 successional); 1,465 secular and 95 regular priests, 1,450,000 Catholics, and 5,200,000 non-Catholics. The part of the diocese in Thuringia is also divided among three other ecclesiastical administrative districts: the episcopal commissions of Magdeburg and Heiligenstadt, and the "Ecclesiastical Council of Gotha."

The cathedral chapter has the right to elect the bishop; it consists of a provost, a dean, 8 capital and 4 honorary canons; 6 cathedral vicars are stationed at the cathedral. The diocesan institutions are: the seminary for priests, the diocesan institute of philosophy and theology with 8 professors, the theological college (College Liberale, 1847) at Paderborn; the philosophical college (Collegium Bonifatianum) at Paderborn, the seminary for boys (Collegium Bonifatianum) at Heiligenstadt, and the orphans' home of Lippe at Paderborn. Under religious direction also are the boys' colleges of Warburg, Attendorn, and Brilon.

The orders existing in the diocese are: Franciscans, 8 monasteries, 69 fathers, 21 clerics, 68 brothers; Dominicans, 1 monastery, 5 fathers, 4 brothers; Redemptorists, 1 monastery, 8 fathers, 7 brothers; Missionaries of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, 1 community, 11 fathers, 51 clerics, 21 brothers; Brothers of Charity, 4 monasteries, 82 brothers. The female orders and congregations, which have 298 members in 296 institutions, are: 18 confraternities and 15 institutions; Sisters of Charity of the Christian Schools, mother-house at Heiligenstadt, and 6 institutions; Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, mother-house at Paderborn and 99 houses; Poor Franciscan Sisters of Perpetual Adoration, mother-house at Olpe, 39 institutions; Franciscan Sisters of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, mother-house at Salzkotten, 23 houses; Grey Sisters of St. Elizabeth from Breslau, provincial house at Halle, 20 institutions; Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent, from Fulda, 5 houses; Poor Sisters of St. Francis, from Aachen, 4 institutions; Sisters of Charity of St. Francis, from Münster, 3 convents; Sisters of St. Francis, from Thunze, near Freren, 5 institutions; Poor Franciscan Sisters, from Walsbechert, 2 institutions; Poor Servants of Jesus Christ, from Dernbach, 18 institutions; Sisters of Clement, from Münster, 3 houses; Sisters of Charity of St. Elizabeth, from Essen, 1 house; Sisters of the Holy Cross from Strasburg, 2 institutions; Daughters of St. Christian Charity, from St. Vincent from Cologne, 1 house; Sisters of Our Lady from Mulhausen (Rhenish, 1 institution).

The city of Paderborn is the headquarters of the Boniface Association (q. v.); among others are the Society of St. Vincent, the Society of St. Elizabeth, the Mothers' Society, the Young Men's Society, the Young Women's Societies, the Society of Catholic Germany, etc. The Catholic institutions include 120 institutions for the protection of children; 50 orphan asylums; 100 schools for handicrafts and domestic science; 135 sanatoria and hospitals; 65 stations for visiting nurses; and 300 religious homes for the elderly.

Among the noteworthy works are: "Apologetik des Germanischen Volksblatt", the "Sonntagsblatt Leo", the "Bonifatiusblatt", and the scientific magazine, "Theologie und Glaube". The most important churches are: the cathedral at Paderborn, which in its present form dates from the twelfth and fourteenth centuries; a chancel with canopies; nave of the City of Paderborn; choir of the Romanesque and Transition periods; the Romanesque cathedral of St. Patroklos at Soest, built in 954; the cathedral at Erfurt, dates back to 1153; and the Gothic cathedral at Minden, built between the eleventh and the fifteenth centuries.

The first church at Paderborn was founded in 777, when Charlemagne held a diet there. It is certain that Paderborn was a bishopric in 805 or 806; the bishop was Hathumar, a Saxon (d. 815). Before this Paderborn was under the Diocese of Würzburg. The Diocese of Paderborn then included the larger part of Lippe, Waldeck, and nearly half of the former Countship of Ravensberg.

They a elect, Habsburg, and Bishop (1082-86) in SS by King Louis. Otto II bestowed the right to a free election of bishops upon Bishop Folkmar in 974 (d. 981). In 1000 the cathedral was burned; Rethgar (d. 1009) began a new cathedral, completed by his successor, Meinwerk. The latter established the Benedictine Monastery of Aiblinghof at Paderborn, founded a diocesan college at Bursch, and improved the cathedral school. During the Strife of Investitures, Poppo (1076-83) was first an adherent of the emperor, later of the pope. Heinrich I, Count of Assel, elected bishop under the protection of the opposing King Hermann, in 1090 was exiled by the Emperor Henry IV, and fled to Magdeburg, where in 1102 he was elected archbishop. The See of Paderborn was occupied by Heinrich II, Count of Werl-Arnsweg, who had had himself installed in 1081 at Rome as bishop by Henry IV, and who had helped in the expulsion of Heinrich I. He received the papal sanction in 1106. Bernard II, Lord of Oesede (1127-60), restored the cathedral of Paderborn, which had been damaged in 1102. Siegfried (1175-80) lived to see the downfall of Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony. The rights which the old dukedom had exercised over Paderborn were transferred to the Archbishopric of Cologne. The claims of the archbishops of Cologne were settled in the thirteenth century, almost wholly in favour of Paderborn. Under Bernhard II of Heidenbüren (1189-1204), the bailiwick over the diocese, which since the middle of the eleventh century had been held as a fief by the Counts of Arnsweg, returned to the bishops. This was an important advance in the development of the bishops' position as temporal sovereigns. From this time onwards they did not grant the bailiwick as a fief, but managed it themselves, and had themselves represented in the government by one of their clergy. They strove successfully to obtain the bailiwick over the abbeys and monasteries situated in their diocese. During the reign of Bernhard IV (1225-17) the Minorites settled in the diocese. Under him the community life of the cathedral canons ceased completely, and the canons, twenty-four in number, shared with the bishop the property, archives, and obsequies (1231).

Simon I, Lord of Lippe (1247-77), was engaged in struggles with Cologne; Otto von Rüthberg had also to contend with Cologne in 1251, when only bishop-elect, he received the papacy from Rudolph of Habsburg, and full judicial power (except penal jurisdiction); henceforward the bishops were actual sovereigns, though not over the whole of their diocese. Bernard V of Lippe (1321-41) had to acknowledge the city of Paderborn as free from his judicial supremacy. Heinrich III Spiegl zum Desenberg (1361-80), also Abbot of Corvey, left his spiritual functions to a suffragan; in 1371 he rebuilt the Burg Neuhaus at Paderborn. Simon II, Count of Mos of Mors (1415-35), involved the bishopric in feuds with the nobility, who after his death devastated the country. Wilhelm Heinrich von Berg, elected 1399, sought to remedy the evils which had crept in during the foregoing feuds, but when in 1414 he interested himself in the vacancy in the Archdiocese of Cologne, the cathedral chapter in his absence chose Dietrich von Mors (1415-35). The wars of Dietrich, also Archbishop of Cologne, brought heavy debts upon the bishopric; during the feuds of the bishop with the City of Soest (1444-49) Paderborn was devastated. The reign of Simon III of Lippe (1463-89) was occupied with the correction of Church discipline. Hermann I, Landgrave of Hesse (1495-1508), was an excellent ruler. Under Erich, Duke of Brunswick-Grubenhagen (1532-39), the Reformers obtained a foothold in the diocese, although the bishop remained loyal to the Church. Hermann von Wied (1522-47), also Archbishop of Cologne, sought to introduce the new teaching at Paderborn as well as Cologne, but he was opposed by all classes. The archbishoprics of Lippe, Waldeck, and Pyrmont, the part of the diocese in the Countship of Ravensberg, and most of the parishes on the right bank of the Weser became Protestant. After the removal of Hermann von Wied, Paderborn had three active Catholic bishops: Rembert von Herrsenbrock (1547-65), Johann II von Hessen (1565-74) published the Tridentine Decrees, and Salentin, Count of Isenburg (1574-77), also Archbishop of Cologne. Heinrich IV, Duke of Saxe-Lauenburg (1577-85), was a Lutheran; he permitted the adoption of the Augsburg Confession by his subjects. Apostasy from the Church made such advances that in the city of Paderborn only the cathedral and the Monastery of Abinghof remained faithful. To save the Catholic cause, the cathedral chapter summoned the Jesuits to Paderborn in 1580. Theodor von Fürstenberg (1585-1618) restored the practice of the Catholic religion, built a gymnasium for the Jesuits, and founded the University of Paderborn in 1614.

Ferdinand I of Bavaria (1618-50) was not able to save the bishopric from the horrors of the Thirty Years' War. Theor Adolph von der Reck (1650-91) tried to repair the damages of the war. Ferdinand II von Fürstenberg (1661-83), poet, historian, scholar, and promoter of the arts and sciences, founded the "Ferdinanda", for the support of thirteen missionaries for the northern Viceroyate. Johann Werner (1653-1708) and his nephew Franz Arnold (1704-18) were admirable prelates. Under Clemens August of Bavaria (1719-61), the Seven Years' War wrought great damage. Wilhelm Anton von der Asseburg (1763-82) founded a seminary for priests; in 1777, Franz Egon von Fürstenberg (1779-1807) took the secularization of nearly all the chapters and monasteries in his diocese. The territory of the diocese went to Prussia, the bishop became a prince of the empire; but his spiritual jurisdiction was untouched. He saw the culminating of his diocese, resulting from the bull "De Salute Animarum", 16 July, 1821, which extended Padeforn, and placed it under Cologne.

The seat of the Diocese of Leon, called Leoden-Wenn (1826-41) divided the diocese into deaneries. Konrad Martin (1856-79) held a diocesan synod in 1867, and took part in the Vatican Council. In the Kulturkampf he stood firmly for the freedom of the Church, suffered many penalties, and died an exile in Belgium.

Franz Kaspar Drolo (1852-91) revived the institution of religious colleges are doubtless his work, and in 1891-1900 rebuilt the theological seminary in 1895 and became Archbishop of Cologne in 1900; Wilhelm Schneider (1900-1909) was a philosopher and theologian. Karl Joseph Schulte, formerly Professor of Apologetics and Canon Law in Paderborn, was elected in 1909, and consecrated 19 March, 1910.

Fourteenth Century. — In 1358, William, Bishop of Treves, was elected first Archbishop of Paderborn, but died before he could take possession of his see. His successor was Henry, Bishop of Cologne, and his replacement was John, Bishop of Paderborn, who took possession of his see in 1392. The work of John followed that of his predecessor, but he was not able to carry out all his plans for the improvement of the diocese.

The diocese of Paderborn was divided into four deaneries: the deanery of Paderborn, the deanery of Münster, the deanery of Osnabrück, and the deanery of Halberstadt. The bishop of Paderborn was the chief bishop of the diocese.

Padilla, Juan de. Friar Minor, protomartyr of the United States of America, member of the Ambrose province, came to Mexico probably in 1528, joining the province of the Holy Gospel. During 1529-16, with an unnamed friar, accompanied Nuño de Guzmán to Nueva Galicia and Culiacán, and prevented the oppression of the natives while acting as military chaplain. From 1531 to 1540 he made missionary tours among the Indians of Huanatazích, Tepic, Tzapotitlán, Totomán, Acula, Cuclán, Xicocotitlán, Zumpango, and Colima. He founded the convent of Tzapotitlán, becoming its first superior, and erected another at Tepic, making it the headquarters for the missionary friars. He established the monastery of Tultepec, governing it until 1540, when he resigned to follow Fr. Marcos de Niza, the discoverer of Arizona and New Mexico, with Fr. Francisco Vasquez de Coronado, on the memorable march to the fabled Seven Cities, and thus reached the Upper Rio Grande near the present Bernallillo about the end of 1540. He also accompanied Coronado in his search to Quivira, probably as far as central Kansas. When the disappointment and his army in 1542 abandoned New Mexico, Fr. de Padilla, Fr. Juan de la Cruz, Brother Luis de Ubeda or Escalona, resolved to stay behind to evangelize the Indians. A Portuguese soldier, Andres de Campo, two Mexican tertiaries, Lucas and Sebastian, two other Mexican Indians, and a half-breed boy also remained with the zealous friars. Antonio de Padilla, an anatomist, surgeon, and physician, was separated from theRio Grande for some time, Fr. de Padilla's zeal urged him to afford other tribes an opportunity of knowing and serving Christ. Accompanied by Da Campo, Lucas, Sebastian, and the two Mexican Indians, he set out for the north-west. When the little party reached the plains, they encountered a band of savages, who attacked them and slew Fr. de Padilla as he calmly knelt in prayer. The savages threw the body into a pit. The date and locality of his martyrdom are uncertain. Fr. Vetancurt in his Monologo assigning 50 November, 1541. Some believe he perished in eastern Arizona, or western New Mexico, or perhaps in Mexico, but our information is conjecture. The story, believed in New Mexico, that his body was discovered by Pueblo Indians, brought to Isleta, interred beneath the sanctuary of the church, and that it rises and falls at stated periods is a myth. The remains of the Franciscan buried at New Mexico, and also Fr. de Padilla, who died a peaceful death there two centuries later, Fr. de la Cruz and Brother de Ubeda were likewise put to death at the instigation of Indian sorcerers at the missions on the Rio Grande.

Padua, Diocese of (Patavina). Northern Italy. The city was situated on a fertile plain, and is surrounded and traversed by the backwater of the river. Its streets are almost all flanked by colonnades. The most splendid of its churches is "Il Santo", that is, the basilica of St. Anthony of Padua, begun in 1232; its style is mixed Romanesque and Byzantine, irrespective of later modifications; it contains seven cupolas, and is divided into three naves. On the high altar is a crucifix in bronze on Donatello, the author also of the bronze bas-reliefs on the walls of the apse; the bronze candelabra are by Andrea Riccio; the chapel, called "Capella del Santo" (1500-33), is filled with ex-voto offerings. The cathedral was destroyed by an earthquake in 1117, and was rebuilt by Michelangelo, who, however, finished only the choir and the sacristy. The church, called "degli Eremitani" (1264 and 1390), contains frescoes by Mantegna. The seminary was founded by Bishop Federico Cornaro in 1577, and was greatly enlarged by Blessed Cardinal Gregorio Barbarigo in 1611, connected with it a printing press and a rich library.

Among the secular buildings are the Palazzo della Ragione, dating from 1166, restored in 1218, 1420, and 1756; the Loggia del Consiglio (the palace of the "Capitano"); and the university (1393), by Palladio or Sansovino; annexed to it are a library, with 250000 volumes, and an observatory, erected on a tower of the castle of Ezzezinio. Among the public monuments are: the equestrian statue of X1—26
Cathedral, Padua

Padua (Patavium) was the chief city of the Veneti, who were continually at war with the Gauls; the Veneti, therefore, were naturally friends of Rome. In 302 n. C. Cleonymus, King of Sparta, sailed up the Po with the intention of blowing up the city, but the Patavians drove him back with severe loss. The city long enjoyed independence, and obtained Roman citizenship only in 49 n. c. Under the first emperors, Padua was one of the most heavily-taxed cities. It had a flourishing wool industry, and its people were famous for their orderly conduct. Latin literature also flourished among them; the poetess Ascanius (Padua, Themeni Patus). With the growth of Aquileia the importance of Padua waned; it was destroyed in 408 by Alaric, in 412 by Attila, and in 601 by Agilulfus, King of the Lombards. In the tenth century it was harried by the Hungarians, especially in 903. In 1087, with the consent of Henry IV, Padua made itself a free commune, and in the time of Barlarossa it was among the first cities to establish the Lombard League. It was at war with Venice in 1110 and 1214; with Vicenza in 1110, 1118, and 1201; and with the Ezzelini. Ezze-lino IV succeeded in obtaining the sovereignty in 1237. For eighteen years he exercised a most inhuman tyranny; among his victims was the prior of Santa Giustina, Arnaldus, who died after an imprisonment of eight years. In 1256 an army of crusaders, sent by Alexander IV, captured the city, which Ezzelino attempted in vain to recapture.

The city more than recovered; but internal discord developed anew, and wars with neighbours began again. But it was at this time that Padua, following the example of other cities, offered the lordship to Jacopo Carrara in 1318. In 1320, however, Padua was compelled to receive an imperial vicar, and the attempt of Marsilio I of Carrara, son of Jacopo (1328), to rid himself of that functionary, turned only to the advantage of the Scaligers (Alberto and Mastino), which family were driven from Padua in 1337 by Marsile, succeeded by Ugbertino. The latter greatly increased the territory of the state, and was succeeded by Marsilio II Papafava, and by Jacopo II (1345) a protector of letters and of the arts, assassinated in 1350 by Gulielmo, natural son of Giacomo I. Francesco I, captain of the bravissimo Visconti, succeeded, but was unsuccessful against Venice and was compelled to accept a humiliating peace; in 1375 he assisted the Genoese in the war of Chioggia. He was more successful, however, against the Scaligers, from whom he took Feltrè, Belzio, Treviso, and Ceneda (1384). His son Francesco Novello (1385) voluntarily submitted to the Venetians, but was imprisoned, together with his father, who had withdrawn from the government. Francesco Novello escaped from prison, and in 1390 reconquered Padua; and in 1403 he waged war against the Visconti and took Brescia and Verona. In 1404 he made an attempt against Vicenza that brought upon him a war with Venice. After a long siege, father and son went to Venice, to obtain favourable conditions of peace, were detained and put to death (1405); the rule of the Carrara thus came to an end, and Padua fell to Venice. In 1509 the Emperor Maximilian I took the city from the Venetians; the Venetians having retaken it, the town was besieged again by the imperialists, who had already taken a bastion, when the explosion of a mine drove them back; thenceforth Padua followed the fortunes of Venice.

Padua is the birthplace of: the poetess Isabella Andreini; another poetess Gaspera Stampà; the jurist Jacopo Zabarella, his son Cardinal Francesco Zabarella, and his nephew Bartolommeo; Ottolino Deschab, the man of letters Cesariotti, the naturalist Donati; the mechanician Giacomo Cesariano (patronymic); the sculptors Francesco Squarcione (Padua, 1388), Stefano dall’Arzere; G. B. Bissoni; Camagnola, Giroldino Padovano; Mantegna; Alessio Varotari (il Padavanino), the female painter Domenica Scapfera; the sculptor Tiziano Aspetti; Blessed Pellegrino Manzonì (d. 1267), Blessed Compagno (d. 1261); and of Blessed Isabella Bonaventura da Padova (d. 1385).

Padua gave a number of martyrs to the Church; St. Giustina, Virgin; St. Daniel; and the Bishop Maximus. The first bishop is said to have been St. Prospicinianus, who cannot have governed the diocese vacated by the Church in 676.

University of Padua dates, according to some anonymous chronicles (Muratori, “Rer. Ital. Script.”, VIII, 371, 421, 435, 530), from 1228, when a part of the Studium of Bologna, including professors and students, withdrew to Padua. The opinion that Frederick II transferred the Studium of Bologna to Padua in 1241 is groundless. But even before this emigration there were professors of law at Padua, as Gerardus Pomadellus (c. 1165), afterward Bishop of Padua; furthermore, his predecessor, Bishop Carzo, was called secernum canonum doctor. The contract proposed by the commune of Verucell to the Rectors of the students of Padua in 1228 shows that besides both laws and dialectics, medicine and grammar were taught there. The students were divided into four nationalities: French, Italian, German, and Provengal. The contract stipulated that all or part of the university (14 professors and sufficient students to occupy 500 houses) should be transferred to Verucelli for at least eight years. The university, however, was not suspended until that account, as is evident from the Life of St. Antonio. But the tyranny of Ezzelino (1257-59) caused its decadence. From 1260 it revived under the commune which established the rights of the professors and students, and the salaries (300 lire for logists and 200 for canons); the examinations were held before the bishop, who also granted the teachers’ licences. In 1274 Padua had the same deicides of the Council of Lyons, equal with the Universities of Paris and Bologna. In 1292, on account of certain communal laws against the clergy and the university, Nicholas IV threatened to deprive Padua of its Studium, but at the commune’s request, and the Studium acquired great renown, rivalling Bologna, especially in jurisprudence. From the beginning of the fourteenth century the school of medicine was also famous. The professors in this faculty introduced Averroism in philosophy.

The theological faculty was instituted by Urban V in 1363. In the same year the Collegium Tornacense was founded, the first of its kind in Padua. There were other institutes from 1380, as the college of St. Marco for six medical students, the college of Cardinal Pileo (1430) for twenty (afterwards twelve) students. The professors of the first period included the jurists, consuls, Alberto Galetto, Guido Suzzara, Jacopo d’Arena, Ricardo Malombra, Albrando Ponte, Rolando Piazzola, Jacopo Belvisio, Bartol Scaeci, and the celebrated Baldo: the canonists, Ruffino and Jacopo da Piacenza, Lapola Castiglionchio, and the canonist and theologian, Francesco Zabarella, afterwards cardinal; in medicine, Bruno da Longobardo, Pietro d’Albano, Dino del Garbo, Jacopo and Giovanni Doni (also excellent mechanicians), Marebbio, Giovanni and Guglielmo Santa Sofia, Jacopo de Forli, and Biagio Pelacani. Philosophy was often taught, as elsewhere, by professors of medicine, mostly averroists, like Petrus Aponensis and Mundinus. The most distinguished philosophers who were not physicians were Pier Paolo Vergerio (1349-1111), afterwards Bishop of Capo d’Istria, a learned humanist and student of antiquity; the Franciscan, Antonio Trombetta, a famous Scotist. From the fifteenth century there were in theology and metaphysics two courses, one Thomistic, with professors preferably Dominican, and the other Scotist, with professors chiefly from the Friars Minor. Famous in the beginning of the sixteenth century were the controversies between the averroist philosopher, Aelullin, and the Alexandrist, Pietro Pomponazzi (q. v.). The doctrines of the latter (who had gone to Bologna), especially on the soul were opposed, among others, by Agostino Nifo, another professor of philosophy at Padua. The humanist Girolamo Fracastoro taught philosophy there.

Among the professors of letters were: Rolandino, historian of Padua (thirteenth century), and Giovanni da Ravenna, friend of Petrarch; the humanists Gospagino Barari, Francesco Ficino, Antonio da Feder, distinguished pedagogical writer and educator, Lauro Quirino; the Greeks Domenico Chalcedon, Giovanni Zeno, Niclas Leo, Marino Becichem, Romolo Ambascia, and Nicolai Calchardus; Giovanni Vaschius, Francesco Robertello, the historian Signor, the great French Latinist Marc. Ant. Muretus, Justus Lipsius, and the great Latin lexicographers and thesaurists.

philosophical speculations, in which he encountered much opposition from the Conventual Fra Nicola Buiro. Among the most prominent of the cloistered professors of the university (1509-17), were the canonist Menichus, Alciatus, Lancelotti, and Panjeirolo, famous also for his knowledge of Roman antiquities.

A characteristic of the University of Padua, even in the eighteenth century, was its internationalism, as seen from the list of professors about Faccolatti; it was attended by the students of the University of Venice, which had passed under Austrian domination (1814) the university was transformed, like that of Pavia. At present it has the ordinary four faculties, besides a school of applied engineering and a school of pharmacy and obstetrics. Various astronomical institutes, bacteriological, physiological, pathological; chemical, physical, and geodetic laboratories; an anthropological museum; a botanical garden; and an astronomical observatory complete the equipment of the university. It has 128 chairs, 68 professors, 20 paid, and 107 private, tutors.

In 1806, there was established near the university an institution for the education of Catholic young men. University education in Italy is strictly governmental, and without all professional boards and tribunals, is closed to young men. At some seats of learning, Catholic Clubs were started to help them against the peril to their faith and morals, but they failed. The small Pensionata, situated in the neighborhood of Padua, between the Basilica and the church of St. Juliana, was transformed into a large establishment. The students of these halls were treated of points of faith affecting modern conditions of life and science.

U. BENIGNI

Paganism, in the broadest sense, includes all religions other than the true one revealed by God, and, in a narrower sense, all except Christianity, Judaism, and Mohammedanism. The term is also used as the equivalent of Polytheism (q. v.). It is derived from the Latin pagan, whence pagani (i. e. those who live in the country), a name given to the country folk who remained heathen after the cities had become Christian. Various forms of Paganism are described in special articles (e. g. Brahmanism, Buddhism, Mithraism); the present article deals only with certain aspects of Paganism in general which will be helpful in the consideration of the subject.

I. CLAIMS OF PAGANISM TO THE NAME OF RELIGION. INFLUENCE ON PUBLIC AND PRIVATE LIFE. — Historians of religion usually assume that religions developed upwards from some common germ which they call Totemism. Animism, Solar or Astral Myth, Nature Worship in general or Agrarian in particular, or some other name implying a systematic interpretation of the facts. We do not propose to discuss, theoretically, philosophically, or even historically, the underlying unity, or universal originating cause, of all religions, if any such there be. History as a matter of fact presents us in each case with a religion already existing, and in a more or less complicated form. Somewhere or other, some one of the human elements, already formed, necessary, and sufficient germ of the developed religion, can, of course, be found. But we would point out that, in the long run, this element was not merely a cause of degeneration, not progress; of lower forms of cult and creed, not pure Monotheism. Thus it is almost certain that Totemism went for much in the formation of the Egyptian religion. The animal-standards of the tribes, gradually and partially anthropomorphized, created the jackal-, ibis-, hawk-headed gods familiar to us. But there is no real trace of the evolution from Zoolatry to Polytheism, and hence to Monotheism. The monothetical records are more sublime, more definite in the earlier dynasties. Atum, the object of a superb worship, has no animal equivalent. Even the learned official quite failed to check the tendency towards gross and unparallelized Zoolatry, which was food for Roman ridicule and Greek bewilderment, and stirred the author of Wisdom (xi, 16) to indignation (Loret, "L'Egypte au temps du totemisme," Paris, 1866; Cappart in Rev. d'Hist. Rel., iv, 1905, p. 102; Clement Alex., "P thel," III, ii, 4; Diodorus Siculus, l, xxxiv, Juvenal, "Satires," xv).

Ananimism also entered largely into the religions of the Semites. Hence, we are taught, came Polydeism, Polytheism, Monotheism. This is not correct. Polydeismism is undoubtedly a system born of belief in spirits, be these the souls of the dead or the hidden forces of nature. It "never exists alone and is not a 'religious' sentiment at all"; it is not a degenerate form of Polytheism any more than its undeveloped antecedent. Animism, which is really a naive philosophy, played an immense part in the formation of mythologies, and, combined with an already confused monothetical belief, naturally gave rise to the complex forms of both Polydeism and Polytheism. And these, in every Semitic nation save among the Hebrews, defeated even such efforts as were made (e. g. in Babylon and Assyria) to reconstitute or achieve that Monotheism of which Animism is offered as the embryo. These facts are clearly indicated and summed up in the following "Les Religions socratiques" (2nd ed., Paris, 1904).

Nature Worship generally, and Agrarian in particular, were unable to fulfill the promise they appeared to make. The latter was to a large extent responsible for the Tammuz cult of Babylon, with which the worship of Adonis is closely allied, and even of Dionysus, are so unmistakably allied. Much might have been hoped from these religions with their yearly festival of the dying and rising god, and his sorrowful sister or spouse; yet it was precisely in these cults that the worst perversions existed. Ishtar, Ashtar, and Cybele had their male and female prostitutes, their gall: Joseph had to cleanse the temple of Yahweh of their booths (cf. the Qelshim and Kelahim, Deut., xxiii, 17; II Kings, xxii, 7; cf. I Kings, xiv, 21; xv, 12), and even in the Greek world, where prostitution was not else regarded as religious, Eryx and Corinth at least were contaminated by Semitic influence, which Greece could not correct. Although the Thracian or Aphrodite's inspiration," says Dr. Parke, "is the human in its crude and very winning, yet there are no moral or spiritual ideas in the worship at all, no conception of a resurrection that might stir human hopes. Adonis personifies merely the life of the fields and gardens that passes away and blooms again. All that Hellenism could do for this Eastern god was to invest him (ideonevous) with the grace of idyllic poetry. ("Cults of the Greek States," II, 649, 1896-1909; cf. Lagrange, op. cit., 220, 444 et seq.)

Mithraism (q. v.) is usually regarded as a rival to Nestorian Christianity; but Nature Worship ruined its hopes of perpetuity. Mithra remained, says S. Dill, "indissolubly linked with the great wave of the past." This connection clef between it and purer faiths "an impassable gulf" which meant its "inventible defeat" ("Roman Soc. from Nero to Aurel," London, 1901, pp. 622 sqq.), and, in I place of a divine life instinct with human sympathy, it had only to offer the cold symbolism of a cosmic legend" (ibid.). Its very adaptability, Mr. C. G. Seligman pointed it out, was being itself free from the gross or ridiculous superstitions which complicated its ritual and theology; it was involved, in spite of its austerity, in a questionable alliance with the orgiastic cult of the mistress of Attis, and was obliged to drag behind it all the weight of a chimerical and hateful past. The triumph of Roman Mazdeism would not only have ensured the perpetuity of all the aberrations of pagan mysticism, but of the erroneous physical science on which its dogma rested. We have here an indication why religious, into which the astral element entered largely, was so often regarded by the divine stars that ruled life were themselves subject to absolute law. Hence relentless Fatalism or final Scepticism for those sufficiently educated to see the logical results of their mechanical interpretation of the universe; hence the discrediting of myth, the abandonment of cult, as mendacious and useless; hence the silenced cult, the clamorous paganism, and which vulgar, a riot of superstition, the door new opened to magic which should coerce the stars, the cult of hell, and honour for its minstrels—things all descending into the Satanism and witchcraft of not unrecent days. Even the supreme and solar cult reached, not Monotheism, but a splendid Pantheism. A sublime philosophy, a gorgeous ritual, the support of the earthly Monarchy which mirrored that of heaven, a liturgy of incomparable solemnity and passionate mysticism, a symbolism so pure and high as to cause endless confusion in the troubled mind of the dying Roman Empire between Sun-worship and the adorers of the Sun of Righteousness, a drowning sea of its faith, its dogmatism, its individual lie which left God still linked essentially to creation. (See F. Cunot, "Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain," 2nd ed., Paris, 1919, especially cc. v., viii.; "Le mysticisme astral," Bruxels, 1899, invaluable for references and bibliography; "Textes et Monuments relatifs aux Mystères de Mithra," 1, 1898; 2, 1899; "Théol. solaire du paganisme romain," Paris, 1900.) We do not hint that these elements which have been assigned as the origin of an upward revolution have always, or only, been a cause of degeneration; it is important to note, however, that they have been at times a germ of death as truly as of life.

II. SOCIAL ASPECT.—Christianity first and alone of the religions has preached, as one of its central dogmas, the value of the individual soul. What natural religion already, but ineffectually implied, Christianity asserted, reinforced, and transmuted. The same human nature is responsible as once for the admirable kindnesses of the pagan, and for the deplorable cruelties of Christian men, or groups, or epochs; the pagan religions did little, if anything, to preserve or develop the former. Christianity waged ceaseless battle against the latter. As for woman, the prominent which is the surest sign of her degradation never existed at all, or only as some relics of the chivalrous knightly folk. In China and Japan, Buddhism and Confucianism depressed, not succoured her; in ancient Egypt, her position was far higher than in late; it was high too among the Teutons. Even in historic Greece as in Rome, divorce was difficult and disgraceful, and marriage was hedged about with an elaborate legislation and the sanctions of religion. The glimpses we have of ancient matriarchies speak much for the older, honourable position of women; their peculiar festivals (as in Greece, of the Thesmophoria and Artemophoria; in Rome, of the Bonant Dea) and certain worship, urging the modern social zé (or of Isis, kept their sex within the sphere of religion. As long, however, as their intrinsic value before God was not realized, the brute strength of the male inevitably asserted itself against their weakness; even Plato and Aristotle regarded them more as living instruments than as human souls; in high tragedy (an Aeschylean, an Antigone) or history (a Cleo, a Camilla), there is no figure which can at all equal their Christ or Caesar. "If one were a Rachel, an Esther, or a Deborah. It is love for mother, rather than for wife, that paganism acknowledges (see J. Donaldson, "Woman in anc. Greece and Rome, etc., among the early Christians," London, 1897; C. S. Devos, "Studies of Family Life," London, 1886; Daremberg and Saglio, "Gynécée," etc.). Essentially connected with the fate of women is that of children. Their charm, pathos, possibilities had touched the pagan (Homer, Euripides, Vergil, Horace, Statius), even the claim of their innocence for respect (Julius Caesar). Yet too often they were considered merely as toys or the desired support of their parents, or as the hope of the State. With Christianity, each becomes a soul, infinitely precious for God's sake and its own. Each has its heavenly guardian, and for each death is better than loss of innocence. Education, in the fullest sense, was created by Christian society; the civil rights of Christian and Plato are subordinated to state interest. Though based upon "sacred" books, education in ancient times, when organized, found these highly mythological, as in Greece or Rome, or rationalized, as in Confucian spheres of influence. Both Greeks and Romans attached great importance to a complete education supported it with state patronage (the Ptolemies), state initiative and direction (the Antonines), and conceived for it high ideals (the "turning of the soul's eye towards the light", Plato, "Republic", 515 b.; yet, failing to appreciate the value of the individual soul, they made education in fact merely utilitarian, often used only to make their citizens better soldiers than under the narrow and rigid systems of Sparta and Crete. The restriction, in classical Greece, of education among women to the Hebratia is a fact significant of false ideal and disastrous in results (J. B. Matlafy, "Old Gk. Educ.", London, 1881; S. C. Rossignol, "De l'educ. des hommes et des femmes chez les anciens", Paris, 1888.). Error in education was conditioned, we saw, by error of political ideal. No doubt, all the older politics were sanctioned directly by religion. The local god and the local ruler were, for the Semites, each a melk (king), a baal (procurator), and their attributes and qualification almost fused. Or, the ruling dynasty descended remotely, or immediately, from a god or hero, making the king divine; so the Mico, the Roman and Doric overlords. Especially the Orient went this way, most notably Egypt. The Chinese emperor alone might pray to the Sublime Ruler whose son he was. Rome defies herself and her governors, and the emperor-cult dominates army and province, as the ancient monarchies did not. Courtesan and Enfant, a power, a culture, a science, a civilization, a cult. (See A. F. Elstair, "History and Education of Christian Educ.", London, 1900; L. In the next centuries, the weakest necessarily went to the wall. Even the good Greek legislation on behalf of orphans, wards, the aged, parents, and the like; even the admirable instinct of ἀλλης which shielded the defenseless, the suppliants, the stranger, the "stricken of God and afflicted", could not (e.g.) stop the expression of sickly or deformed infants (defended even by Plato), or render poverty not ridiculous, not merely ugly, death not deflecting. Yet the sober religion of the Avesta preaches charity and hospitality, and these, the latter especially, were recognized Greek virtues. In proportion as travel widened minds, and ideas became cosmopolitan, the barbarian became a brother; under the Antoines charity became official and universal in temples. In the temples of Esclapion were hoesipic for the sick. Yet all this is as different in nature, and therefore in practical effect, from the "mutual treatment of love" obligatory within the great family of God's children, as is the counterpart of Christian self-sacrifice, Buddhist Almsgiving, Hindu Gifts, Roman Benevolence; and in Protestantism, the wealthy Europian, the Temple of Christianity, the Grand Sanctuary, the Church, in which the Christian has the right to take care of individuals as well as of the spiritual, and to direct

Duchesne ["Hist. ancienne de l'Église", I, (Rome, 1908), 640; cf. Sozomen, "Hist. eccle."] VII, xx, in P. G., LXVII, 1480] reminds us of the occasional necessary repression: Gregory, writing for Augustine of Canterbury, fixes the Church's principle and practice (Sede, "Hist. eccle."). III, xxx, xxxii, in P. L., XCV, 70, 72. Reforms achieved no high literary success. Sanchaya preaches a sublime gospel: his austere series—Wealth, Self-sufficiency, Insolence, God-sent Infatuation, Ruin—has echoes of Hebrew prophecy and anticipates the "Exercises"; yet even his stern δραστήριον is calmed into the ταπείνος μετανοια, a true wisdom, repose, self-sufficiency, insouciance. And this life can be lived; laws living eternally in serene heaven, a joy for men of obedience. Euphrades, in the chaos of his skepticism, lives in an angry bewilderedness, not knowing where to place his ideal, since Aphrodite and Artemis and the other world-forces are, for him, essentially at war. It is in Plato, far better than in the nihilist asceticisms of the East, that the note—not even yet quite true—of asceticism is struck. The body is our tomb (σῶμα, σῶν); we must strip ourselves of the leaden weights, the earthy incrustations of life: the true life is an exercise in death, a δραστήριον τῆς θείας, as far as may be; like the swans we sing when dying, "going away to God," and not, as feeble servants of Death's "death" (κρυπτός), the sacrifice to the Healer-hero for his amnestic of life's fatal fever; "I have flown away," (the Orphic magic tablets will cry) "from the sorrowful weary wheel of existences.

Directly after Plato, the schools are coloured by his thought, if not in his immediate heirs. Stoic and Epicurean views originally aimed at one thing when they preached their θανασία and δραστήρια, respectively: ἱερὸς καὶ ἱερός: the θανασίας, master of your self and fate.

In Roman days of imperial persecution, this Stoicism, "touched with emotion," passed into the beautiful, thus ill-founded religion of Seneca: all philosophy became practical, an ἀρχαί σωφροσύνη: Life is our ἐνέγκρισις, not to be despised of. Heaven is not promised, but ascendentibus diem manum prorrigit. Ἀριστοτέλης, St. Paul was even then enjoining (Col. i, 2), echoing Plato's φρονεῖν ἀληθείαν καὶ θείαν (Tim., 90 c): his τῆς ἐν φώς οὐκ οἷόν ς ἀληθή (Rep., 621 c), his "life must be a flight" ἀπὸ τῶν εὐφραίνων ἐγκαύσεως (529 A), and Aristotle's doctrine that a life's "best" is its "worse" (N. X, vii), written so long ago. The more acute expressions of this mystical asceticism were much occupied with the future life and much fostered or provoked by the developed Mysteries. Impossible as it seems to find a race which believed in the extinction of the soul by death, survival was often a vague and dismal affair, "going away to God," longed for or wished for, in the asceticism. So Babylon, Assyria, the Hebrews, earlier Greece. Odysseus must make the witless ghosts drink the hot blood before they can think and speak. At best, they depend on human attendance and even companionship; hence certain offerings and human sacrifice on the grave. Or they can, on fixed days, return, harry the living, seek food and blood. Hence expulsions-ceremonies, the Anthestheria, Lemuria, and the like. Kidniller creeds, however, are created, and, at the Curæ Copagii, the souls are welcomed to the places set for them, as for the gods, at the hearth and table, and the family is reconstituted in affection. Hopes and intuitions gather into a full and steady light, even before the inscriptions of the catacombs show that death was by now securely reasoned for tears at all. The "super bark of a divine doctrine," for which the anxious led in the "Pharos" had sighed, had been given to carry souls to that "further shore" to which Vergil once bade them.

But the Mysteries had already fostered, though not created, the conviction of immortality. They gave no revelations, no new and secret doctrine, but powerfully and vividly impressed certain notions (one of them, immortality) upon the imagination. Gradually, however, it was thought that initiation ensured a happy after-life, and atoned for sins that else had been punished, if not in this life, in some place of expiation (the Iao mystère). Apollo (Metempsychosis, Plutarch) was his thrilling and profoundly religious experiences.

There was often seen the "passion" of the god (Osiris): the rape and return of Kore and the sorrows of Demeter (Eleusis), the sacred marriage (Here at Cnossus), or divine births (Zeus: Brimo), or renowned incidents of the local myth. There was also the "exhibition" of symbolical objects—statues usually kept veiled, mysterious fruits or emblems (Dionysus), an ear of corn (upheld when Brimo was born).

Finally there was usually the meal of mystic foods—grains of all sorts at Eleusis, bread and water in the cult of Mithra, wine (Dionysus), milk and honey (Attis), rapidly this flesh in the Orphic Dionysus-agarens cult. Sacred formulae were certainly imparted, of magical value.

There is not much reason to think these mysteries had a directly moral influence on their adepts; but their popularity and impressiveness were enormous, and indirectly reinforced whatever aspiration and belief they found to work on. Naturally, it has been sought to trace a close connexion between these rites and Christianity (Anrich, Pfeiderer). This is inadmissible. Not only was Christianity ruthlessly exclusive, but its apologists (Justin, Tertullian, Clement) inveighed against the mysteries and the myths they enshrined. Moreover, the origin of the Christian rite is of Greek form, and the Christian baptism (essentially unique) is alien to the repeated dippings of the initiandi, even to the Taurobolium, that by bath of all blood, whence the dipped emerged renatus in aeternam. The totemistic origin and meaning of the sacred meal (which was not a sacrifice) wherein worshippers communed in the god and with one another (Robertson Smith, organization of the Egyptian mystery, as the creed of a chosen son, is how he himself defined baptism). This, we suppose, is the highest form of human reaction upon the religious datum of which the soul finds itself in possession, or at least may provide it with the purest, if not the most imperious, mode of worship. From this point of view the other rationalizing cosmogonies (as of Greece) are of little interest to us, save in so far as they witness and indirectly, in allusion to the Orphic daimon and the rest, theosis and immortality; to which is subject, an earlier unconscious tendency, perhaps, to reconcile the antinomies easily seized by true religious instinct in the popular traditions as to the gods. The mythological cosmogonies of Babylon and Assur will, however, be of surpassing interest to the "comparative" student of Semitic mythology. The anthropomorphic form, intellectualizing—starting in Ionia, monistic, static, and anti-religious—grown dynamic in Heraclitus, whose Fire will pass, as Logos, into the Stoic system; transferred after the Persian wars to Attica, and profoundly dualized in Plato and Aristotle, whose concepts, however, of World-soul and of the Immanent Nature-force were powerful. Through the Stoics expressed in terms borrowed consistently from the exquisite Egyptian mythology, of Thot, of Osiris, and of Isis, this elaborate system of converging currents is synthesized in Plutarch, while from Plutarch's sources Philo had drawn the philosophy in which he strove to see the doctrine of Moses, and in terms of which he struggled to express the Hebrew books.

Thus it was that the Loges, in theory, impersonal, immanent, blindly evolving in the world, became (transfigured on the one hand by pagan myth, and by too close contact, on the other, with the Angel of Yahweh and the ideals of the Alexandrian sapiential literature) so neces sary to Plato and his followers, that they could not, without the expression of a given cultural tradition, be made to understand the Hebrew books.
be, and with the Logos. Two principles emerge as governing Greek thought—God must have the first place, ὡς ἄρα παρεξέρων δει ποιεῖν ὑμῖν τὸν θεόν, and yet the nearer we approach Him, the less we can express Him, ἐνθα δύναται ἐν ἐρωτοῦσιν ἐκ τοῦ λόγου ἀνάτομον. (Pythagoras probably coined the exact word, ἀνατομία.) The nearer we approach Him, the less we can express Him. The doctrine of the Logos is a philosophical and religious paradox, or, at least, blindly imposing obduracy. Greek philosophy almost inevitably came, and in spite of itself and its sceptical and mechanical premises, amounted to a religion. In the mouth of Epicurus God is still sung triumphantly—"What can I do, I, a lame old man, save sing God's praise, and call on all men to join me in my song?"—all the Stoic current died out in Aurelius, stunned to arise, no more enthusiastically uniting himself to the great law of God in the world.

But into neo-Platonism, coloured with Persian, Jewish, and even Christian language, the movement passed; already it was a law of Platonism that a metaphysics and sublimity of emotion barely to be surmounted had been achieved; in the "Metamorphoses" of Apuleius the syncretistic cult of the Egyptian goddess expresses itself in terms of tenderness and majesty that would fit the highest worship, and, in the underlying prayer of the Apuleian Hermes, an ecstatic adoration of God is manifested in language and thought never equaled, still less surpassed, save in the inspired writers of the Church. But all these efforts of pagan religious philosophy, committed nearly always to a rigid Dualism, entangled according in mechanical and magic practices, tricked out in false mythology, risking and losing psychological balance by the use of a tabloid ascepticism of sense and thought, died into the miserable systems of Gnosticism, Manichaeism, and the later neo-Platonism; and the current of true life, renewed and redirected by Paul and John, passed into the writings of Augustine (Consult Zeller, "Phil. der Griechen" Leipzig, 1870), tr. (London, 1881); Leigl, "Grundriss," (4th ed., Leipzig, 1908), tr. (London, 1892); Guenzer, "Gr. Denken" (Leipzig, 1903), tr. (London, 1901); cf. VI. RELATIONS BETWEEN PAGANISM AND REVELATION.—Ethnology and the comparative history of pagan religions do not impose upon us as an hypothesis that primitive Revelation which Faith ascertains to us. As a hypothesis it would, however, have many to it. As the German says, we are the easier therefore for the Theodoricalist of a century ago to detect its traces everywhere, and for Bishop Hunt ("Demonstr. evangelica," Paris, 1900, pp. 68, 153, etc.), following Aristotle, Philo, Josephus, Justin, Tertullian, and many another disciple of the Alexandrians, to see in all pagan law and ritual an immense pillage of Jewish tradition, and in all the gods, Moses. The opposite school has, in all ages, fallen into worse follies. Celsius saw in Judaism an "Egyptian heresy," and in Christianity a Jewish "Revelation;" on an analogy with the vocalism of the Hebrew, or, rather, of the Syriac and Arabic, etc., etc. (C. Cels., III, xxvii; Calvin (Inst., IV, x, 12) and Middleton (A letter from Rome, etc., 1729) saw an exact conformity between popery and paganism. Dupus and Creuzer herald the modern race of comparative theologians, who deduce Christianity from pagan rites, or assign to both systems a common source and centre in the human spirit. Far wiser in their generation were those ancient Fathers, who, not always seeing in pagan analogies the trickery of devils (Justin in P. G., VI, 364, 368, 699; Tertullian in P. L., I, 519, 660, II, 66; Firmicus Maternus, ibid., XII, 1026, 1030), disantagulate, with a true historical and religious sense, the reasons for which God permitted, or directed, the "Chosen People to retain or adapt the rites of their pagan ancestry or environment, or at least, reposing with this, recognize the facts (Justin, loc. cit., VI, 517; Tertullian, P. L., II, 333; Jerome, ibid., XXV, 194, XXIV, 733, XXII, 677, is striking; Euseb., P. G., XXII, 521; especially Chrysostom, ibid., XVIII, 66, 70; Gregory of Nyssa, ibid., XXXV, 159, who are remarkable. Cf. St. Thomas, I-II, Q. cii, a. 2.) The relation of the Hebrew code and ritual to those of pagan systems need not be discussed here: the facts, and, a fortiori, the comparison and construction of the facts, are not yet satisfactorily determined: the admirable work of the Dominican school especially the "Religious sensatiques" of M. J. Lagrange; cf. F. Prost, S.J., "Le Code de Sinai," Paris, 1901) is preparing the way for more adequate considerations than are at present possible.

Whether Paganism made straight a path for Christianity may be considered from two points of view. Speaking from the standpoint of pure history, no one will deny that much in the antecedent or environment, aspirations and ideals formed a path aperitivo evangelica of high value. "Christo jam tum venienti", sang Prudentius, "credo, parata via est." The pagan world "saw the road", Augustine could say, from his hilltop. "Et ille Pileatus Christianus est", said the Nestorius of Antioch. While the Hellenisers, Justin avers that they were the Christians before Christ. Indeed, in their panegyric of the Platonic philosophy, the earlier Apologists go far beyond anything we should wish to say, and indeed made difficulties for their successors. Attention is nowadays directed, not only to the ideas of the Divine nature, the world, history, ethics, and the like, but especially to those oriental cults, which, flooding down upon the surrendered, officialized, and dying worship of the Roman or Hellenic-Roman world, fertilized within it whatever potentialities it yet contained of purity, prayer, emotional religion, other-worldliness generally, and a whole new religious language, evolved, betokening a new tendency, ideal, and attitude; here too Christianity did not disdain to use, to transend, and to transform.

Theologically, moreover, we know that God from the very outset destined man to a supernatural union with Himself. "Pure nature", historically, has never existed. The soul is naturalis Christus, the true man is the Christian. Thus the "human spirit" we have so often mentioned, is no human spirit left to itself, but solicited by, yielding to a resisting grace, Better than Aristotle guessed, mankind εἰς τῇ θεόν, Per Christos ergasturum. Εἰς πνεύμα τό ἐναν, said the same philosopher: and all creation groans and travails eagerly together until the fullness of the times, and not only these "men" were by God "made of one blood for to dwell on all the face of the earth . . . that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might grope after him and find him." They failed, alas, though they had the οὖς-

He was of gentle birth and nominated to the Order of Chanoines Regular of St. Augustine, 9 November, 1571, being described as "scholaris Mirwosdon". He entered the English College, Reims, 30 September, 1571, and received minor orders, April, 1573. He was ordained deacon at London, 22 September, 1579, and priest at Reims, 21 September, 1571. Dr. Anthony Champney, who was his contemporary and correspondent, in his 'History of the Reign of Elizabeth, as quoted by Bishop Challoner, describes him, as being of wonderful meekness, of a virginal modesty and purity, and of more than common learning and piety, and as having endeared himself to all by his singular candour of mind and sweetness of temper. He was condemned for being a priest, under 27 Eliz., e. 2, and was hanged, disembowelled, and quartered.

Pagi, Antoine, and his nephew François, two French ecclesiastical historians. Antoine, b. 31 March, 1621, at Rognes in the Department of Bouches-du-Rhône; d. 5 June, 1699 at Aix. After studying with the Jesuits at Aix, he entered the monastery of the Conventual Franciscans at Arles, and made solemn profession on 31 January, 1641. For some time he devoted himself to the study of history, and after twenty-nine years he was elected provincial, an office which he held four times. He devoted his spare time to the study of history. Discerning numerous chronological errors, and frequently misstatements of facts in the "Annales ecclesiastici" of Baronius, he made it his life-work to correct them and otherwise elucidate the valuable work. Pagi's first volume was printed during his lifetime (Paris, 1689); the remaining three volumes, reaching till the year 1198, the last year in the work of Baronius, were completed in manuscript shortly before his death. The whole work was edited in four volumes by his nephew François Pagi: "Critica historica-chronologica in universas annales ecclesiastici em. Cassari" (Paris, 1699; sec. ed., Paris, 1705; second ed., 1727). Mansi embodied it in his edition of the "Annales" of Baronius (Lucca, 1736-59). Though, on the whole, the "Critica" manifests great care and an unusual knowledge of history, it is not entirely free of errors. His other works are: "Dissertatio hypatiae seu de consiliis cassaricis" (Lyons, 1682), printed also in "Appendices in Annales ecclesiastici" (Lucca, 1710, pp. 1-136; "Dissertatio de die et anno mortis S. Martini ep. turicensis", and a few minor treatises in defense of his "Dissertatio hypatiae", in which he had set down various rules for determining the consubst of the Roman emperors, and which had been attacked by Cardinal Nors and others. He also edited: "D. Antonii Paduani O. Min. sermones haecenas inediti" (Avignon, 1685).

François, b. 7 September, 1654, at Lambese in Provence; d. 21 January, 1721, at Orange. After studying with the Oratorians at Toulon, he became a Conventual Franciscan, was three times provincial, and assisted as editor to the "Annales" of Baronius. Besides editing the "Critica" of his uncle he wrote a history of the popes up to the year 1447: "Breviarium historico-chronologico-criticum illustrissimum Pontificum romanorum gesta, conciliorum generalium acta ... complexenta" (4 vols., Antwerp, 1717-27). The history was continued in two volumes by his nephew, Antoine Pagi, the Younger (Antwerp, 1748-53).

Pagnino, Santes (or Xantus), Dominican, b. 1170 at Lucca, Tuscany; d. 21 Aug., 1511, at Lyons, one of the leading philologists and Bibliocists of his day. At sixteen he took the religious habit at Fiesole, where he studied under the direction of Savonarola and other eminent professors. In acquiring this culture, he was thoroughly cultivated at Florence, where he displayed an unflawed quicksightness, ease, and penetration. His genius, industry, and erudition won him influential friends, among them the Cardinals de Medici, subsequently Leo X and Clement VII. As a sacred orator his zeal and eloquence kept abreast with his erudition and were as fruitful as its subject. Summoned to Rome by Leo X, he taught at the recently opened free school for Oriental languages until his patron's death (1521). He then spent three years at Avignon and the last seven years of his life at Lyons. Here he was instrumental in establishing the University of Lyons. He was known for his zeal and eloquence, diverted an irritation of Waldensianism and Lutheranism from the city, receiving in acknowledgement the much coveted rights and privileges of citizenship. The epistle, originally adoring his tomb in the Dominican church at Lyons, has the date of his death beyond dispute. The merit of his Vœu à Notre-Dame (1522) (Lyons, 1527) lies in its literal adherence to the Hebrew, which won for it the preference of contemporary rabbis and induced Leo X to assume the expenses of publication. After the pontiff’s death these devolved on the author’s relatives and friends. Several editions of the Vœu appeared (Labbe, “Index Bibliothecae Vaticanae,” 12.44; “Eraniorum, Storia Erculea,” VII [Venice, 1451]; Mandrot, s. v. Dominica, and Vegecroix, Dict. de la Bible, s. v. (Paris, 1910).}

Painting, Religious.—Painting has always been associated with the life of the Church. From the time of the Catacombs it has been used in ecclesiastical ornamentation, and for centuries after Constantine religious art was the only form of living art in the Christian world. Its fecundity has been wonderful, and even now, although much diminished, is still important. Until the Renaissance the Church exercised a veritable monopoly over this sphere. Profane painting in Europe dates only from the last three centuries, and it took the lead only in the last century. It may therefore be said that throughout the Christian Era the history of painting has been that of religious painting.

It would be absurd to seek to place the Church in contradiction to the Gospel on this point, as did the Iconoclasts in the eighth century and the Protestants in the sixteenth. The doctrine of the Church has been clearly enunciated by Molanus in his “Historia SS. Imaginarum” (Lyons, 1522). The substance of that edition is that of Paquot, Louvain, 1771; an ample bibliography is found on pp. 212-24). It is truly remarkable that such a magnificent development of artistic thought should proceed from a purely spiritual doctrine preached by humble Galilean fishermen who were ignorant of art and filled with the horror of idolatry characteristic of the Semitic races. Far from reproaching the Church with infidelity to the teachings of her Founder, we should rather acknowledge her wisdom in rejecting no natural form of human activity, and thus furthering the work of civilization.

The very fact that the Church permitted painting objects to be seen in a definite and ordered way, to observe certain rules; art never seemed to her an end in itself; as soon as she adopted it she made it a means of instruction and edification. “The picture,” says the Patriarch Nicæphorus, “conceals the strength of the Gospel under a caser, but more expressive form.” “The picture is to the illiterate,” says Pope St. Gregory the Great, “what the paintings of the churches are in place of books to the uneducated” (quasi libri laicorum). “We are, by the grace of God, those who manifest the word and are not limited to it by faith”—thus the painters of Siena express themselves in the statutes of their guild (1355). The same ideas are contained in the “Treatise on Painting” of Cennino Cennini, and in France in the “Livre des Écritures” of Etienne Boileau (1254). In 1513, at the height of the Renaissance, Alphonse Dure said: “The art of painting is used in the service of the Church to depict the sufferings of Christ and of many other models; it also preserves the countenances of men after their death.” Almost the same definition is given by Pacheco, father-in-law of Velasquez, in his “Diseño de la Pintura” (1585).

The constant doctrine of the Church was defined at the Second Council of Nicaea (787), and is summed up in the often quoted formula: “The composition of the image is not the invention of the painters, but the result of the legislation and approved tradition of the Church” (Labbe, “Index Bibliothecae Vaticanae,” 7.11, Actio VI, S31, S32). It would be impossible to define more clearly the importance of art in the life of the Church, and at the same time its subordinate position. Hence, obviously, results one of the chief characteristics of religious painting, its conservative instinct and its tendency to hieratic formalism. Art being regarded as didactic, necessarily partook of the severe nature of dogma. The slightest error bordered on heresy. To alter anything in the garments of the saints or of the Blessed Virgin, to depict the former shod or the latter barefooted, to confuse the purity of the simple by innovations and individual whims, were anomalous matters. The Christian artist was surrounded by a strict network of prohibitions and prescriptions. From this resulted the artistic danger of soulless, mechanical repetition, which religious painting did not always escape. The responsibility for this, however, must not be ascribed to the Church, but rather to human slothfulness of mind, for, as a matter of fact, there is an element of mobility in art as it is understood by the Church. Religious art may be called a realistic art. Its appeal to the emotions by the representation of facts obliges it to be more and more exactly imitative, and it must adopt the progressive stages of technique to express all the phases of human feeling. Even the most immobile of the great Christian schools, the Byzantine, has only a apparent immobility; more intimate knowledge inspires increasing admiration for its vitality and chastity. The innovating and creative faculty has never been denied to the religious painters. In the twelfth century Guillaume Durand, the famous Bishop of Meule, wrote in his “Rationale” (1113): “The variety and richness of the New as of the Old Testament are depicted according to the inclination of the painters. For to painters as to poets a license has ever been conceded to dare whatever they pleased.”

I. THE CATACOMBS.—The monuments of religious painting for the first four centuries are to be sought only at Rome (see CATACOMBS, ROMAN; ECCLESIASTICAL ART, ORIGIN). But this peculiar art must not be taken as typical of what was in vogue elsewhere. It is a great mistake to look in the Roman cemeteries for the origin or the cradle of Christian painting: as has been conclusively proved by the learned researches of Szewczyk and Arndt, there was an art, which can at least be dated, as the result of the result of the development of the fifth century, grew up in Syria, Egypt, or Asia Minor, and completely supplanted that of the Catacombs. The latter did not survive the very special conditions under which it arose, and was but an isolated and local school with a development or future, but none the less valuable, venerable, and picturesque.

II. BYZANTINE PAINTING.—A. The New Iconography.—By the edict of 313 Christianity was recognized as the official religion of the Empire. The Church left its hiding-places and breathed freely, and the period of the basileas began. A profound translation of religious inspiration was the result of this triumph. The time had come to display the insignia of Christ’s victory with the same material splendid which the State attached to the imperial majesty of Caesar. The Good Shepherd of the Catacombs and the statue of the arch-lion of S. Silvestro in whose catacombs glaring eyes cast the last traces of them are found in the rotunda of St. Constantina and in the mausoleum of Galla Placidia at Ravenna (c. 150). In the magnificent mosaic of S. Pudenziana at Rome (before 100), the Cross, which stands in mid-heaven above a Senate of Apostles wearing the talarve, is already a symbol of triumph. Christ appears as a celestial incubator invested with awe-inspiring glory. "The arches of the world," writes Eusebius, "are His throne, the earth is His footstool. The celestial armies are His guard." Thus thusly would the God of the Gospel portrayed on the porch of the ancient Vatican.

Rome still preserves the oldest remains of the new art, for it was the first to claim to priority. Recent discoveries as those of M. Clesiat in the necropolis of El Bagouit (fourth century) and in the convent of Bounit (sixth century), the excavations of M. Gayet in the tombs of Antinoe and the funereal portraits unearthed at Fayum form an accumulation of evidence which leaves no doubt on this point. To these may be added the precious paintings of Gorgoneion, Indicopleustes and of the "Roll of Josue" (preserved at the Vatican), the originals of which date from the sixth century, or those of the Mesopotamian Evangelistry, illustrated in 586 by the monk Rabula (Laurentian Library, Florence), and, although of somewhat later date, the paintings of the Evangelistries of Eusebius (Armenian, dated 590), the scenes borrowed from earlier models, either Alexandrian or Syrian. These paintings are chiefly narrative and historical in character. The Church, having conquered paganism, must now face the task of supplying its place. And the Church quickly recognized in her own experience with paganism the efficacy of images as means of instruction. Thus, for example, four"forth of the fourth century" from St. Nilus to the prefect Olympiodorus, who had built a church and wished to know if it were fitting that he should adorn it only with scenes of the chase and angling, with foliage, etc., having in view only the pleasure of the eye. St. Nilus replied that this was mere childish nonsense, that the fitting thing in the Church was the image of Christ in the walls scenes from the Old Testament and the Gospel, so that those who, being unable to read the Scriptures, might by these pictures be reminded of the beautiful deeds of the followers of the true God, and thereby impelled to do in like manner. Obviously, the holy anachoret here recommended genuine historical representation. The vast pagan repertory of legend and fable, created for the imagination a new basis, likewise derived from the past. At that date the best保利 for the Church was the story of its life and its genealogy, and this was perseveringly set forth during the early centuries after Constantine. This historical tendency is clearly evident at St. Mary Major's in the forty mosaics, executed in the time of Pope Sixtus III (432-40), which relate the lives of the Patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and Josue. Christ's victory and His glorious Advent also find expression in the "triumphal arches" of St. Paul's Without the Walls (under Leo I, 110-61) and of the Lateran (under Hilary I, 215-24).

But Rome, conquered by the hordes of Alaric, had fallen from her political rank, and henceforth the evolution of Byzantine painting must be followed at Ravenna and Constantinople.

B. Monumental Painting to the Iconoclastic Controversy. Representing deeds rather than ideals, events rather than symbols, the Byzantine School endowed Christianity with a complete system of representation of all types, some of which are still used, and once for all formulated the essential traits of the great scenes of religious history. (See Byzantine Art.)

In its early period Byzantine painting was strictly realistic. The mosaics, e.g., on either side of the altar of S. Maria Maggiore, in the nave of S. Agnese, and in the church of St. Justinian and Theodora—all decorated, it is true, with conventional types, without individual character, for their figures of Christ; but here Byzantine art raised new questions. The Christological disputes of the time necessitated new dogmatic definitions. In painting a certain school, appealing to a text of Isaacs, maintained that Christ was hidden. In answer to these, appeal was made, in the fourth century, to the so-called "Letter of Lentulus to the Senate," Christ, according to this document, had blue eyes and light hair falling smooth to His ears, then in curls over his shoulders. One recognizes here the desire to give to the figure of the Saviour a certain beauty which would be fitting on the part of a portrait which leaves no room for the play of fancy.

The same process of determination went on at the same time for the principal characters of sacred history, for the Blessed Virgin, the Patriarchs, and the Apostles, and each of these pictorial types acquired a distinct force of its own. The spoils decreed that Christ should be represented as the Lamb. This scrupulousness extends to accessories and embellishments: at San Vitale, Ravenna, the "Hospitality of Abraham" has for its setting a vast verdant landscape; at San Apollinare Nuovo, the city of Classe and the palace of Theodoric are accurately conceived, and all the scenes of the Holy Men of Jerusalem were aimed at. The care for exact representation was, at the same time, counteracted by the passion for grandeur and splendour of effect which dominated all Byzantine painting. The latter tendency arose partly from the exigencies of decorative work and the inexorable laws governing monumental style in the present and the past. The added effects of these ideas is the repugnance to representing suffering and death. At San Apollinare Nuovo, in the portrayal of the Passion, not Christ, but his executioner, carries His Cross. The artist reverently omits the scene on Calvary, and indeed Christian art for a long time observed the same reverence (cf. Bréhier, "Origines du Crucifix," Paris, 1904). But on the other hand there is the taste for noble composition, the love of symmetry, the striving after grandiose and solemn effects. From these same ideals of pomp and grandeur resulted a type of expression in harmony with them, monumental painting in the more solid, more luxurious style of mosaic. This was already, an ancient art, well known to the Alexandrians also by the Romans, who used it chiefly for the pavements of their villas. But it was reserved for the Byzantines, who applied it to mural decoration, to discover its true resources. (See Mosaics.)
C. From the Iconoclast Controversy to the School of Mount Athos.—The Iconoclast controversy (725-843) arrested the development of this powerful school at its height. The movement originated in Islam as a fierce outburst of the Satanic idealism of the desert. The Iconoclast emperors were by no means barbarians, but enlightened princes, dilettanti in their way, very often devoted patrons of the arts; such were the Isaurian and Theophylakes. These emperors prided themselves on being worshippers “in spirit and in truth”, and proscribed art only in its “idolatrous”, or religious, applications. Feminine devotion in the end triumphed over these scribings. Meanwhile there had been wide devastation; the convents had suffered successive ravages and were rebuilt; most of the churches, which had been established, nearly all the churches had lost their ornaments, the mosaics had been torn down, and the frescoes whitewashed. As often happens, however, the Church came out of the conflict more vigorous than ever. A new Byzantine School, very different from the first, and a second golden age were to commence. The first Byzantine School was an historical one, the second was wholly liturgical and didactic. Each decorative element assumed a symbolical value. Christ the king, surrounded by the celestial hierarchy, looks down from the vaults; in the sanctuary, behind the altar, reigns the Virgin, seated, holding the Child in her arms; in the apse of the Church “the throne of the Almighty”; the rest of the apse presents the precursors of Christ, the bishops, doctors, and two great Eucharistic scenes, the “Communion of the Apostles” and the “Divine Liturgy”; on the walls are developed the lives of the saints and martyrs and that of Christ. In the story of the Gospel the order of time is broken and the frame of the Church a “living throne” is detached which the Church celebrates at the twelve principal feasts. Two essential ideas are brought into prominence: the Redemption and the Resurrection—the scene of Calvary and the Descent into Limbo. In the narthex, the Life of the Virgin assumes a novel importance, while the Old Testament, on the contrary, tends to disappear.

Four important monuments in the East mark the apogee of the new style; these are: St. Luke in Phoeis, the Nea Moni of Chios, the beautiful church of Daphni near Athens, and, in Russia, that of St. Sophia at Kiev. All four date from the tenth century, but some of the frescoes of the Church were lost in the fire that consumed the church of Daphni in 1682, and the execution which makes the mosaics of St. Vitale a finished type of painting; but the decorative effect is beyond compare. Nothing in the art of painting can surpass these churches encased in golden shells and peopled by a host of gaunt, colossal figures. At this date most of the Gospel compositions were virtually stamped with a Ne varietur: for each of them a group of artistic geniuses had provided a permanent type. A more important fact is that at this time the Byzantine style conquered the West and became truly universal. At about the same time the West was undergoing a similar upsurge of artistic impulses, separating itself from the soil and setting itself in motion. For two centuries the exodus of the Crusades was to continue, marking the beginning of a new civilization for Europe. Byzantine colonies appeared in Italy, notably those of Venice, in the North, and of Sicily, in the South, founding hotbeds of Byzantinism at the two ends of the Peninsula. Within thirty years (1063–95) Venice accomplished the marvel of St. Mark’s which she was to go on decorating and perfecting for three centuries (the narthex is of the thirteenth century, the baptistery of the fourteenth century). In the neighbourhood of Venice there are examples at Torcello, Murano, and Tortolano, while in the twelfth century, under the Norman princes, the appearance of four incomparable churches: that of Martorana (1143), that of Cefalù (1148), the palace church at Palermo (c. 1109), and the Cathedral of Monreale (c. 1180). Of all these masterpieces St. Mark’s is the best known, but only from the Pantocrator in the apse at Cefalù is it possible to realize to what beauties of nobility and melancholy, and to what majesty of style, the art attained.

For the sake of completeness, mention must be made of the other western, the non-Byzantine types of the Madonna (Panagia, Nicolaos, Hodegetria), and the miniature paintings in manuscripts (which were important for the diffusion of motives), of enamels such as those in the Palazzo d’Oro of St. Mark’s, and of the small portable mosaic pictures, like the valuable diptych preserved at the Opera del Duomo, at Florence (c. 1218). The picture may be, therefore, considered established, but it did not at once disappear. In the fourteenth century it produced the fine mosaic cycle of Kahrie-djami and at the beginning of the fifteenth century, within the solitude of Athens, shut in by the Mussulman world, it continued to produce and cover all Eastern Europe with countless paintings of the school of Panselinos. With the twelfth century, however, it had fulfilled its purpose, and the further development of religious painting was in the West.

III. Religious Painting in the West, to the Cinquecento.—A. North of the Alps.—Through the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the entire Europe was rendered fruitful by the Byzantine School. But in the Byzantine a Western art was to develop, in which the loss in external luxury was gradually supplied by piancy and power of expression. A distinction must here be made between the art of the countries north of the Alps, and that of the southern countries. Little need be said of the former: the Romanesque churches seem to have been very rich in paintings, but most of them are lost, and in the Gothic churches, which soon after began to be erected, there was little room for mural painting; stained glass took its place. But the personality of the artist was scarcely felt in this art, and as to drawing and subjects, stained glass is scarcely more than a reflexion of miniature painting. Its study, therefore, has but a purely iconographic interest. It began in France with the windows of St.-Denis (1140–44), and the school of St.-Denis spread throughout the North, to Chartres (c. 1145), York, Le Mans (c. 1158), Angers, and Poitiers. During the following decades, the school of Notre-Dame-de-Paris played the same part.

The iconography of these windows is essentially symbolic, and the allegorical spirit of the Middle Ages is nowhere more apparent. It was an old Christian idea that each person and fact of the Old Testament was an image prefiguring a person of the New. This idea only expanded with full wealth of detail in the Gothic art of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. With wonderful subtlety of interpretation the attempt was made to discover the most unforeseen, and sometimes the oldest, relations. Books such as those of Rabanus Maurus, or the “Speculum ecclesiae” of Hubert de Saint-Aubin, or the “Glosae ordinaria” of Wal-ard Strabo, must be read to obtain an idea of the spirit in which the Middle Age read its Bible and pictured it. In the “Bestiaries”, too, which supplied material for this art, there is a fantastic natural history, a singular menagerie, each curiosity of which conceals some pious allegory. The material universe was transformed into a sort of vast psychedelachia, an immense system of metaphors. No other school ever equaled this astounding idealism.

B. In Italy.—(1) Giotto and the Giottesques.—After the fall of Rome and the Empire, Italy was for centuries in a most miserable condition. In the sixth and seventh centuries the Iconoclast reaction set in the direction of Rome and at first the Ostrogoth and Lombard monks, who were the chief victims of the persecution. It probably to these Greeks that we owe the frescoes, doubtless dating from the seventh century, which were discovered, in 1808, at Sta Maria Antiqua.

Under the influence of the great Abbé Desiderius, the school of Monte Cassino assumed the leadership in an artistic movement which was to extend as far as Cluny. Some eleventh-century manuscripts, such as the Codex Aureus in Forma—is preserved—frescoes which attest the importance of this Benedictine school; but its traces are to be found chiefly in miniatures, and especially in volumes of a particular kind, such as the "Exultet-rolls" (see Exultet). This style spread throughout Italy in the twelfth century, but soon declined. In the churches and museums of Tuscany are to be found a number of scenes, madonnas and crucifixes, such as the miraculous Christ preserved at St. Clare of Assisi, and which is said to have spoken to St. Francis. These works show to what a depth of barbarism the Byzantine school had fallen about 1200. Nevertheless, it was still capable of producing beautiful work. The Madonna Guido of Siena, for instance, preserved in the Public Palace, and dated 1224 (not 1214, as according to Milanese), proclaims a veritable renewal of the ancient formula, tempered by the grave and gentle Siennese mysticism. This is still more obvious in the works of the great Duccio (see Duccio di Buoninsegna), the Ravello Madonna (1285) or the "Madonna in the Crown of Thorns" (1311).

Such was the persistency of the Byzantine movement at Siena, but a movement in another direction issued from Rome in the middle of the thirteenth century. Recent excavations have brought to light at S. Maria in Trastevere a cycle of very important frescoes of which Giberti, in his "Guide of the Layman", gives an account. So Cavallini is the author. The chief scene represents the Last Judgment. It is impossible to praise excessively the beauty of this composition, the nobility of the draperies, the majesty of the types. Ancient art undoubtedly exercised a powerful influence on Cavallini; as on his contemporary, the sculptor Nicholas of Pisa. In the thirteenth century a revival took place at Rome which foreshadowed the Roman Renaissance of a later age. Unhappily, few of its monuments remain, but the mosaics of S. Maria in Trastevere, that of St. Mary Major, by Jacopo Torriti (1265), and the Genevis frescoes of St. Paul Without the Walls, known through drawings in a MS. at the Vatican, reveal the importance of this ancient Roman school. There is no doubt that all these are adaptations from the church at Assisi, which was to be the cradle of Italian painting. It is now proved that these scenes were the work of Cavallini and his school. There is nothing to prove that Cimabue did not work here; but he would have done so only as a pupil of the Roman school (see Cimabue). This is also true of the great Giotto in his earliest dated works; the Navicella of St. Peter's (1298), the Stefaneschi relatie and the Jubilee fresco painted in 1300 at St. John Lateran. It was otherwise with his second sojourn in Rome, for his early Assisi frescoes, the 24 scenes of the "Life of St. Francis" (c. 1295) are wholly in the Roman manner. At Rome, therefore, in the thirteenth century was created the great master of the dolce stil nuovo which was to charm Italy for a hundred years. (See Giotto di Bondone.) Giotto insinuated into the painting of age the wonderful poetry of Franciscan Christianity. St. Francis has been called the Father of Italian art, and the saying is true if taken with a certain elasticity of meaning. Both the piety that inspired him and the sense of the Church. The history of religious art down to the Reformation and the Council of Trent could only be accurately written in the light of this great historic fact. All that Byzantine and early medieval art had represented as dogmas assumed the stirring character of life. To say that art became secularized would be to risk miscomprehension, but in truth, from being intellectual and theological, it became democratic and popular. Faith became visualized. The whole effort of the painters, as well as of the people, was to imagine as vividly as possible the life and sufferings of Christ. A multitude of dramatic elements developed in Christianity, and originated a sort of rudimentary theatre. (See ITALY, ITALIAN LITERATURE; JACOPO DA TODI.)

All these characteristics began to show themselves in painting also. At Padua, in 1306, Giotto outlined the earliest and best formulated of his school in the "Life of the Virgin", closely linked with the history of the Passion. The painter retained only the pathetic elements of Christianity. A number of new scenes appeared, while the old ones were enriched with countless new features. The picture is filled with figures, gestures are softened, expression grows tender and human. "Giotto", says Vasari, "was the first to put more kindness into his figures". During three centuries of development some scenes, such as the Nativity and the Epiphany, continued to grow in movement, expression, and picturesque effect. Symbolism and didactic intent are absent; painting ceases to have any object but to represent life. The teaching of Christ, the parables, and the sacraments disappear, to be replaced by scenes of sorrow and the drama of Cain and Abel, every act being described in detail. What primitive Christian art avoided with a sort of modesty or fear now became its chosen and persistent subject. The striking feature of these pictures is a wholly new impression of familiarity and warmth.

After the great frescoes of St. Francis of Assisi a host of local saints and contemporary beati were honoured in like manner. In painting these contemporary lives, the artists had to create traditions; therefore they painted what they saw—faces, costumes, assemblages of people. They became realists and observers, and these same tendencies appeared in their paintings of the Gospel. There was little of invention; the theme, and its representations, the processions, and the tableau vivant assisted their imagination (cf. Male, "Renouvellement de l'art par les mystères" in "Gazette des Beaux-Arts", Feb., May, 1904). The following are some "Passions" of the Giotto school, in chronological order: in the lower church of Assisi, by Pietro Lorenzetti (c. 1225); by Sienese, and Duke of Calabria, in the Franciscan church of Santa Chiara, in the Neapolitan church of Donna Regina, or that by Andrea di Firenze (c. 1350) at the Spanish chapel; lastly the splendid frescoes of Altichiero and Avanzi in the chapel of the Santo of Padua (1370).

But all this realism was never an end in itself; its object was to reach the emotions, and it made manifest the character of humanity in Christianity. Hence the many paintings of the Blessed Virgin, in which art incessantly sang to her the tenderest hymns of love. The Pannai of the Byzantines, the Virgin of the Middle Ages, Throne of God, Queen of Heaven, gave place to the Mother, the most beautiful, the sweetest, and the tenderest of women. After St. Bonaventure—a lover of art and Francis—had praised the grace and beauty of the Virgin, devotion to the Madonna became one of the chief Christian devotions. Schools competed as to which should paint the holiest and most exquisite Virgins, and none were more charming than those of Siena—Siena vultus eviolent Virginis.

The Madonnas of Simone di Martino, of two Lorenzetti, of Lippo Memmi, and their successors, and of the great Van Dyck, or Murillo added perfect strophes, without, however, obliterating the memory of their ancient predecessors.

The same inspiration is evident in the paintings which represent the moral, didactic, or perhaps the painting of that time, such as the frescoes of "Good and Evil Government", or Siena by the Lorenzetti (c. 1370).

1425), those of the Church militant and the Church teaching in the Spanish Chapel (c. 1355), or those of the Church triumphant in the Campo Santo of Pisa (c. 1370), all showing the same popular and practical character. Such pictures have the force of a sermon; there is no strictly artistic intention, but an obvious intention to instruct and impress. This is also made clear by the celebrated allegories of the Franciscan Virtues, in the lower choir of the church (c. 1320), and by the frequent repetition of the Last Judgment (by Giotto at Padua and the Florence Signoria; by Orcagna at S. Maria Novella, etc.). This theme of death and the Judgment was evidently a favourite one with the Mendicants: at Assisi and Padua are two frescoes representing a Friar Minor indicating a skeleton beside him. And the frequent repetition of the terrible “Dance of Death” of northern Europe.

This popular art required popular modes of expression. Cavallini and Giotto still made mosaics, and Cimabue is best known to us as a mosaicist. But this slow and expensive method was unsuited to a democratic, sentimental, and impassioned art, while fresco, which had never been abandoned, even during the Byzantine period, offered to the new ideas a more plastic and animated mode of expression. With less material opulence, the latter process was rapid, cheap, and apt at reproducing the imitations of life, expressing at once the exactness of nature and the emotion of sentiment. This benefited laterly invented element entered into the execution itself, an individual element of sentiment and spontaneity only limited by the conditions of mural painting and the exigencies of an art always somewhat oratorical. Inherited, as it were, with this new liberty, the Giottesque painters covered Italy with innumerable paintings. Indeed, this school, as a whole, despite its faults, constitutes the richest and freest field of religious painting.

(2) Masaccio and His Age.—But it must be acknowledged that the Giottesques formed a popular school which was too often satisfied with worthless improvisation. The task of imbuing painting with artistic feeling was that of the two great painters, Masolino (q. v.) and Masaccio (q. v.), the latter especially, in his frescoes in the Carmelite chapel at Florence (1426) sounding the keynote of the future. Nevertheless, despite their seriousness of conception and aim, the religious element of these frescoes is scarcely to be taken into account. There are evidences of great progress in the treatment of the facial expression, of the expression of style, the seriousness and grandeur of the work, but the gain of Christian feeling and piety is less manifest. But Masaccio’s powerful naturalness was for a time in harmony with the mystic sense, and religious art then yielded perhaps its most exquisite flowers. The works of Gentile da Fabriano, such as the “Adoration of the Magi” (1425; Academy of Florence), those of Pisanello, such as the “Legend of St. George” (c. 1425; St. Anastasia, Verona), and in a lesser degree those of the Milanese Stefano da Zevio breathe the imitable grace of a pure and holy joy, which is still more charmingly apparent in the works of the Camaldolese Lorenzo di Donato, and especially those of the Dominican Fra Giovanni da Fiesole, whose genius won for him the surname of Angelico (q. v.).

Angelico’s disciples did not reach his level, but a youthful charm distinguishes the spiritual paintings of Benozzo Gozzoli, whose “Adoration of the Magi” in the Siena Cathedral (1458) is the most beautiful of the province which is as a rule the least popular in the Renaissance, while his “Genesis” frescoes in the Campo Santo of Pisa (1449-55) will always be loved for their exquisite figures amid rich landscapes. But perhaps this pious joy never inspired anything more lovable than the works of the old Umbrian masters, Ottaviano Nelli, Allegretto Nuzi, Domenico Boni Negli, and Boccati da Camerino. The early Renaissance was a fortunate period, in which the simplicity of the soul was not marred by the discovery of nature and art. Though the poor Carthusian Fra Filippo Lippi, unwilling monk as he was, whose restlessness and empery, animated by true and delicate piety, his “Nativity” (Berlin), his “Madonna” (Uffizi), and his “Adoration of the Holy Child” (c. 1465; Louvre) recall Angelico.

C. The Fifteenth Century in the North.—What Masaccio’s frescoes were to frescoes of the north was this that and much more what the legendary and most beloved of the Van Eycks was to the rest of Europe. This colossal work was begun in 1420, completed and set up in 1432. Throughout the fifteenth century the art of the schools of the North retained the allegorical and symbolical character which marks this great work. Such books as the “Biblia pauperum” dominated iconography and furnished artists with their favourite subjects. But, with all this, in Flanders naturalism was unrestrained, that of the Van Eycks making even Masaccio’s seem vague and abstract. A portion of the change accomplished by them is foreshadowed in the works of the Limbourg (see Limbourgs, Poitiers, Le). To the revolution which they effected in the manner of beholding corresponds another in the manner of painting. The whole fifteenth century spoke of the “invention of the Van Eycks”: it is hard to say in what this consisted, but if they did not, as was believed, discover oil-painting, they certainly did popularize a new style. (See eyck, h ert) and j an van.) Undoubtedly this realism lacked taste and charm. The types were common, vulgar, and middle-class, and these faults were even exaggerated by the disciples of the school—Jean Daret, Ouwayer, Dirck Bouts, Van der Goes, and Petrus Cristus. The school’s photographic impassibility, on the other hand, is wholly offset by the equally exaggerated and somewhat contorted passion of the Brabazon Van der Weyden, at once a realist and a mystic. Such as it was, this robust school conquered Europe in a few years, even Italy feeling its powerful influence. In France, Simon Marmion, Nicolas Fremont, and Jean Fouquet were little more than somewhat refined and galvanized Flemings. In Spain it suffices to mention Luis Dalman and in Portugal, Nuno Gonçalves, both being pure Flemish.

German painting, on the other hand, while it owed much to the neighbouring Flemish school, remained much more original in spirit. In it is found the deep spiritual feeling of the Northern mysticism. In the Netherlands and Flanders, a popular mysticism derived, not from books, but from the interior treasures of the soul. The school which produced (c. 1380) the Clarenaltar of Cologne and (c. 1400) the delightful little “Paradise” of Frankfurt obviously possessed but mediocre gifts; its sense of form was often defective, but even the piety of Angelico did not speak a purer language. A superior plastic education produced the work of Stephan Lochner, the fine Dombild (1430), the “Maria der Viole”, and the marvellously sweet “Madonna of the Rose Garden”. From this school was descended the most famous of the Northern mystics, the tender and impassioned Memling (q. v.). In his Triumph of the Virgin new aristocracy, that of sentiment, transfigures the Flemish opulence. The same moral delicacy and familiarity with Divine things sweeten and spiritualize the works of Gerard David, and especially of Quentin Massys, who became a painter through love. At the end of the fifteenth century there was no German town which had not its mystic, with its own legend, and even in the towns of the north the religious sentiment continued to be strong; in the towns of the south, only two of these were known or regarded; that of Cologne, with its anonymous masters, the Master of the Passion of Lyversberg, the Master of the Death of Mary, the Master of the Holy Family (Heilig gespiege), and, most powerful of all, the Master of the Bartholomewaltar; and the school of Nuremberg, with its two famous painters, Woghemert and Peelenwurt. But In reality no corner of Francia, Suvia, Alsace, or the Tyrol remained sterile. It was a popular art, localized, sentimental, and extremely incorrect, often coarse in form, but refined in soul even to affectation, and which in its poetic imagery expressed better than any other certain ideas of sympathy and tenderness. There is nothing more thrilling than the Passion of Hans Multescher nor more appealing than the altar-piece of St. Wolfgang by the Tyrolean Michel Pacher. Elsewhere in Germany there were other admirable stylists, such as Hans Baldung and Conrad Witz at Kehlberg and Basle, foreshadowing the perfection of Holbein.

But the great Albrecht Dürer was to express all that was most intimate in Germanic religion, and beautiful as were his pictures he expressed the deepest meanings in his prints. This more direct and less expensive art, produced for the masses, satisfied the German demands for popularity and individuality. To this Dürer’s genius was wholly devoted, and art does not possess more moving masterpieces than the “Apocalypse” series (1498), the “Life of the Blessed Virgin” (1506), the “Little Passion” (1509), and the “Great Passion” (1510). But side by side with this contemplative, intimate, moving, noble spirituality, there was a sense of terrible, less thoughtful, but impassioned, violent, dramatic, and which went to extremes in the search for expression and the mania for the pathetic. It was inspired by the mystery plays. All technical progress and perfection of realization were utilized to express emotion. It began with Van der Weyden, Memling did not explain it in his Mimbledon, the “Life of the Virgin” in the “Minories,” Mary painted blood-bespinkled Holy Faces and Magdalen with reddened and streaming eyes, Dürer’s “Passions” terrify by their intensity of sorrow, but the most tragic of all was Mathias Grunewald, whose terrible “Crucifixions” at Colmar and Stuttgart are like the nightmare of a barbarian visioner, an unknown world of fiendish gnarled shadows, the dreams of an unhealthy imagination, haunt the thoughts of Jerome Bosch, while, on the other hand, idyllic insipidity and childlike appearance in the “Holy Family” and “Flight into Egypt” of Cranach and Paterius. At this juncture came the Reformation, which destroyed painting in Germany.

IV. THE CINQUE CENTO AND THE LATER SCHOOLS.—A. Tuscany, Umbria, and Rome.—The two tendencies observed in the North, naturalism and pathos, developed also in contemporary Italy. Protestant criticism has greatly exaggerated the irreligion of the Renaissance. Undoubtedly some painters, absorbed by the study of form, with naturalistic impatience, ignored or treated with indifference, the religious meaning which the Church had placed on each of the works of art. At Florence especially there were a number of artists who saw in their craft only a question of form. Form, as a matter of fact, owes much of its progress to the studies of Castagno, Paolo Ucello, the Pollaiolu, Andrea Verrocchio, and Baldovinetti, but it was not without deriving from it thenummerious and great traditions which cannot conceal the poverty of their art and the narrowness of their ideas; they were processors and useful pedagogues, but neither poets nor true artists. On the other hand the Renaissance was the period when the love of ideas, so unnatural to Italian thought, manifested itself by most important works. The devotion of the Sixtin Chapel (c. 1480) at the command of a Franciscan pope, is perhaps the most clearly symbolical assemblage of Italian art. On the walls the-life of Moses is portrayed parallel with that of Christ. Thirty years later Michelangelo depicted on the ceiling the “Delivery of Israel, the Prophets, the Sibyls, and the Angelic Hosts. The Ancestors of Christ and St. Antonino Borga were decorated by Pinturicchio with didactic frescoes in imitation of the Spanish chapel; Filippino Lippi represented at the Minerva the “Triumph of St. Thomas Aquinas”; while Perugino at the Cambio of Perugia and Raphael in his Stanze produced the masterpieces of the painting of ideas. It would be vain to deny that the spirit of the Renaissance possessed irreligion and a tendency to a certain such a work as that of Ghirlandajo in the choir of S. Maria Novella is singularly secular in tone. Even in more serious works, such as Leonardo’s wonderful “Last Supper” at Milan, it is readily seen that despite its sublime beauty it was not intended merely to edify. However, these matters must be treated with reserve owing to the delicate nature of questions of religious sincerity. We can hardly assert that the Dominicans for whom these works were executed were poorer judges than we, nor is it clear by what right we connect religious meaning with certain archaic forms. In this the Church has judged with more delicacy, never having restricted a sentiment to certain forms, but having given free to create the hand and to speak and to speak each language. The fact is that at no period was religious activity so fruitful; no other has bequeathed to us so many altar-pieces, oratory pictures, Madonnas and saints. It was the age of countless pictures for pious confraternities, and it is quite probable that the Frenchman, who in the most religious, and, infused something of his heart into his work. At Siena especially such charming painters as Vecchietta or Benvenuto di Giovanni were no less remarkable for their piety than their talents. Perugino, it is true, has been called an Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authority, the statement of the “Life of the Virgin” in the Masons, the “Madonna of the Goldfinch”, his “Feste” has been inspired by his Anarchist, but of this we have no certainty, nor do we know Vasari’s authorit is chiefly represented by the three Bellini, the last of whom, Giovanni, is not only one of the most beautiful of painters, but also one of the most elevated and reverently inspired. The works of Giovanni were less purely inspired, and his heads of Christ are marvels of emotion. It may be questioned how Titian can be charged with irreligion in his "Assumption", his Pesaro Madonna, his "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence", his frescoes in the Santo of Padua, or his "Death of St. Peter Martyr". In his "Sacchalean" of Madrid and the "Pietà" of the Vittorio we encounter the same problem presented by Raphael, which then faced all cultured minds. We can scarcely accuse of religious insincerity the author of the "Entombment" and "Crowning with Thorns" of the Louvre, who after so many joyous pictures painted as his last testament and farewell to life the tenderest "Pest" of the Accademia of Venice. The same is true of the other great Venetians, Palma, Veronese, Bonifazio, Tintoretto, and the divine Correggio.

But the Church was obliged by harsh criticism to be vigilant with regard to humanistic extremes. At Florence the work of Fra Bartolommeo or Andrea del Sarto, at Ferrara that of Corenafo, at Brescia that of Moretto or Romainino, at Vercelli that of Gaudenzo Ferrari, at Venice itself that of Lorenzo Lotto, are so many heralds of a "counter-reformation", which became definite about 1550, at the time of the Council of Trent, and which derived its origin from Venice. A significant circumstance was the action of the Inquisition, which in the sixteenth century forced figures into his religious pictures. The painter was acquitted, but the art of the Renaissance had received a blow from which it never recovered. It was the period when the pope ordered Daniele di Volterrino (Riccacelli) to clothe decently the too audacious nakedness of his "Last Judgment", seen the following year, 1537, in the Church of San Marco. The work is on images, when St. Charles Borromeo and his cousin the cardinal, with their circle of zealous associates, presented a return to an enlightened, serious religion, purified of popular medieval superstitions and recovered from the dangerous compromise with the external forms of pagan naturalism (cf. J. A. Symond's "Renaissance in Italy: The Catholic Reaction", I, i-iv). After having exercised great toleration the Church was about to take vigorously in hand the direction of ideas. Tintoretto's last works at the Scuola di S. Rocco display a system of symbols as abstract as a stained-glass window of the thirteenth century; painting once more became the humbleest of the arts. From that time on, the strange Greece, the pupil of Titian and Veronese, whose emaciated, sickly, dried-up style is a protest against the whole luxuriant ideal of the Renaissance, and who became the founder of Spanish painting.

C. The Baroque School.—The most striking trait of the new school was its unity of style and method. In the fifteenth and even in the sixteenth century there was an endless number of little schools, each town having its own, but in the seventeenth century painting once more became international. A single manner of seeing and thinking predominated and there was no essential difference between a Flemish and an Italian or Spanish picture. More than one social or political reason may be advanced for this, e. g., the political supremacy of Spain and the establishment of the Viceroyalty of Naples, or the cosmopolitanism of the painters. But the only good reason was the existence of a general organization, a universal institute which forced and incited every painter to produce the same painting. But the time has gone by when the word baroque was used to disparage two centuries of art, as the word Gothic thinly disguised a condemnation. What science is to the modern world the idea of beauty was to sixteenth-century Italy. Thus the lost Grecian ideal was restored through Florence and Venice, but the cultivation of the form without thought for its import was what dried up and poisoned the school which issued from Raphael and especially from Michelangelo, the art of Guilio and less faultless of the Belvedere. The "Salvator Mundi" of Raphael, which was painted at the Louvre did not hesitate to copy a drowned woman. Nevertheless Caravaggio did much to turn art once more in the direction of nature and truth. His "Entombment", at the Vatican, is one of the important works of modern painting and the manifestation of a new art.

Thus, of its own volition, art inclined to return to naturalism while religion endeavoured to hold it back. St. Ignatius in his "Spiritual Exercises" indicates the share of sentiment and imagination in the psychology of belief, laying great stress on the "composition of place" and the use of the senses as aids to the imagination. With the object of arousing an emotion P190 it will readily be seen what assistance painting would be to such a system, and that is why the Jesuits restored to art all the importance which the Protestants had taken from it. Naturalism was the necessary result of this spirit, and in this Jesuit art merely resumed the constant tradition of Christianity. Nor was this all; the new century showed a still more intense faith and naturalism was pathos. By more than one characteristic the Catholic school of the seventeenth century recalls the great French school of the fourteenth. A curious fact is the recurrence of popularity of French legend. The "Vision of St. Francis", the "Last Communion of St. Francis of Assisi" are the titles of masterpieces in the schools of Antwerp, Louvre, Naples, and Seville. A still more significant circumstance was that the Renaissance, like the ancient Byzantine art, had avoided all portrayal of the sufferings of Christ; Raphael, Titian, or Michelangelo never painted a Crucifixion, though among the masterpieces of Rubens were an "Ascent of Calvary", an "Erection of the Cross", a "Piercing of the Lance", and a "Descent from the Cross". The Renaissance had also lost the taste for and the sense of narrative; but the art of the seventeenth century presents numerous examples of this ability restored. But there are no "Last Judgments" as in the "Last Supper" of Leonardo or "St. Francis of Assisi" and the "Life of St. Nixus" at Grottaferrata, by Domenichino; the Lives of St. Thomas and St. Peter Nolasco by Zurbaran, etc. The Gospel and the "Legenda aurea" were restored to honour. If the Renaissance had been a retrogression or an eclipse of Christian sentiment, Baroque art was a real resurrection.

V. MODERN RELIGIOUS PAINTING.—Great religious painting ends with Tiepolo; his Spanish imitators, Bayeux and Goya, produced charming works, but did nothing new. "Save for a few somewhat touching works of Lesueur the classic French school was wholly lacking in religious originality. Philippe de Champagne was a Fleming, a good painter whose talent Janssenism almost destroyed. New theories and the spirit of the eighteenth century struck a fatal blow against the painting of the Church. To the admirers of extreme antiquity such as Winckelmann and Lessing, and their disciple, Diderot, Christianity was an inferior religious originality and the history had diffused an un驳 system of ethics throughout the world. European painting was dominated by a sort of artistic Jacobinism. David and his school produced no religious painting; under the Empire the only "Christ" worthy of mention is that of the gentle Prudhon. However, a curious reaction followed this arid fanaticism; the Middle Ages began to be an industry and concurrence is no longer possible between the artists and the dealers, but the chief reason lies in the very evolution of religious ideas, which now seek a new form. This has been shown by the painter John La Farge ("Higher Life in Art", 1908). Much of the religious sentiment of the nineteenth century has been expressed in landscape painting. To the English school of landscape painting, was always a prayer, and the same is true of our greatest Christian painter, Millet, whose peasants naturally assume the appearance of Biblical characters, as of the paintings of the same class by Leon Thiriette ("The Pilgrims of Emmanus", 1891, Boston Museum; "Among the Indians of the Rio Grande", 1905, New York Museum), those of Fritz von Thule, and especially of Eugenie Carrière.

Such are the outlines of religious painting during the past 900 years. Ancient Christianity expressed every sentiment and ignored no shade of human nature. And if religious painting now seems uncertain in Europe, in view of the great movement incessantly impelling from East to West and in consideration of the wonderful development of the Church in the New World, who knows what future still awaits it in America?

Pakawá Indians, also written Pacoá, one of a group of cognate tribes, hence designated the Pakawá (formerly Cochimite) stock, formerly ranging on the upper waters of the San Antonio and Nueces rivers, in Southern Texas, and extending to or beyond the Rio Grande. The group comprised at least fifty small tribes—few of which contained more than two or three hundred souls—the principal being the Karankawa, the Cacchi, the Xarame, and the Xarame. They are notable for their connexion with the famous San Antonio missions and for the record which Father García has left of their language, which appears to have been used over a considerable area for intertribal communication. Almost nothing is known of the ethnology of the Pakawá tribes, which were of the Mound type, without doubt, but moving from place to place, subsisting upon game and the wild fruits of the mesquite, pecan, and cactus, dwelling under temporary shelters of brushwood and grass thatch, and with very little tribal cohesion or organization. While their neighbours, the Tomacá and other tribes of eastern Texas were notorious cannibals, this was probably not true of the Pakawá who,

While inconstant, seem to have been of unwarlike and generally friendly disposition, and to encounter the Pakawán tribes were the shipwrecked Cabeza de Vaca and his three companions, survivors of the Narváez expedition, who spent seven years (1529-1536) wandering over the Texas plains before finally reaching Mexico. It is possible also that the Pakawán were represented among the neophytes whom the Franciscan Father Antonio de Padua drew out of Asia and established under the name of Olivas in a Tamaulipas mission in 1541. The earliest known missionary effort among the Pakawán tribes is that of the Franciscan Damian Massanet (or Manzante), the father of the Texas missions, who in 1691 stopped at the village of the Pajalat, near the present San Antonio, set up a cross, and established the tribe, explaining the meaning of the ceremony, and the great good of the chief by the gift of a horse. Throughout their history the Spanish Texas missions were in charge of Franciscans, directed from the Colleges of Zacatecas and Quedence in Mexico. In 1718 was established the Spanish presidio, or garrison post, which later grew into the city of San Antonio. In the same year the mission of San Francisco Solano, founded in 1700 on the Rio Grande, was removed by Fr. Antonio de Olvares to the neighbourhood of the new post and renamed San Antonio de Valero, famous later as the Alamo. Pakawán (5) tribes were converted to Christianity in Xarame. Other establishments followed until in 1731 there were within a few miles of San Antonio five missions, occupied almost exclusively by Indians of Pakawán stock, viz: (1) San Antonio de Valero (later, the Alamo)—1718—on San Antonio river, opposite the city. In 1762 it had 200 neophytes. (2) Pakawán (3) tribes on San Miguel de Aguayo—1739—six miles below San Antonio. This was the principal and most flourishing of the Texas missions, and residence of the superior, with what was said to be the finest church in New Spain. In 1762 it had 550 neophytes, and 1500 yoke of work oxen. (3) Pajalat Concepción de Acuña (originally a Cadeno mission in east Texas), removed 1731 to San Antonio river just below the city. In 1762 it had 207 neophytes. (4) Juan Capistrano (originally the Cadeno mission of San José in east Texas), removed 1731 to San Antonio river about seven miles below the city. In 1762 it had 206 neophytes, with 5000 horses, cattle, and sheep. (5) Pitalac (originally a Cadeno mission in east Texas), removed 1731 to San Antonio river, nine miles below the city. The chief tribes represented were the Puea, Pajalat, and Pitalac, numbering together about 1000 souls. In 1762 it had 207 neophytes with some 4000 cattle, horses, sheep, and goats. It was here that Father Garcia wrote his "Manuscript." The rains are locally known as the "fourth mission".

The missions probably reached their zenith about 1710. In that or the preceding year an epidemic disease wasted the Texas tribes, and about the same time the jealousies of the San Antonio settlers and the increasingly frequent raids of the wild Lipan and Camanche checked further development. In 1762 an official report showed 1242 neophytes, although the missions were already on the decline. In 1778 smallpox ravaged the whole Texas area, practically exterminating several small tribes. In 1793 the report showed fewer than 300 neophytes remaining in the five missions, and in the next year they were formally dissolved. The official Spanish order, provision being made for securing a portion of the lands to the few surviving Indians. Some of the monks remained and continued their ministrations for at least ten years longer. In 1801 another smallpox visitation practically completed the destruction of the tribes. In 1886 Dr. Albert Gatchet, of the Bureau of Ethnology, could find only 28 representatives of the stock, all on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande in the neighborhood of Camargo.

Paleography (παλαιογραφία, "ancient", γράφη, "writing"), the art of deciphering ancient writing in manuscripts or documents in manuscripts or documents, is the science of palaeography, which provides rules for reading carved inscriptions, and from diplomas, which studies the intrinsic character of written documents, while palaeography concerns itself only with written characters and the classification of documents by their external characters.

During the Renaissance period the reading of manuscripts, necessary to the printing of classic authors, became widespread, but it was only in the seventeenth century that scholars thought of reducing their observations to a system and formulating rules for the reading of manuscripts and diplomas. As early as 1681, in the first edition of his De diplomatica, Montfaucon devoted a study (I, xi) to the various kinds of Latin writing, and gave specimens of these in the plates accompanying his book. It was on this model that Montfaucon, after having worked on the editions of the Greek Fathers, published his "Pakographia Graeca" (Paris, 1708), simultaneously creating the word and the thing. From that time, thanks to the labours of Villosin, Natalis de Wailly, Léopold Delisle, and Henri Omont in France, of Thompson in England, of Gartdhausen in Germany, palaeography has become the basis of all study of historical, religious, or literary texts. There are as many branches of palaeography as there are different kinds of writings, but the science of Oriental written characters is as yet hardly formed. In general students have had to content with determining the place of each character in the succession of such characters. (See Fr. Berger, "L’Histoire de l’écriture dans l’antiquité," Paris, 1862.)

In 1830, however, Kopp, in his "Pakographia Cretica," laid the foundations for Oriental palaeography, while devoting himself exclusively to Semitic languages. The province of palaeology, therefore, more particularly consists of Greek and Latin characters, together with all those derived therefrom (Gothic alphabets, Slavic, etc.).

I. Greek Paleography covers two periods: A. Antiquity (until the fourth century after Christ); B. the Byzantine Period (from the fourth century to modern times).

A. Antiquity.—This period is much better known today, owing to the numerous discoveries of papyri which have been made in Egypt (see Manuscripts). The differences between the various modes of writing are not so marked as in Latin documents. Besides, the material employed influenced the form of the letters: papyrus does not lend itself as well as parchment to rounded forms. The chief systems of characters used on papyrus are: (1) The Coptic, employed somewhat rarely, and hardly known; (2) the Kerameikos, the papyrus is it already mixed with metal forms. One of the most ancient documents of this writing is the papyrus called the "Invocation of Artemis" (Library of Vienna, third century b.c.). The words are not separated from one another, and the neat form of the lunar sign C is found. The number extends to the letter A, B, F, II, etc.—have the same form as in the inscriptions.
The four of these letters have similar forms in the Latin alphabet. On the papyri thus composed (Papyrus, 34 to 364), Lucianus, London, New York, Copenhagen, and Berlin, the third century B.C.; fragment of Euripides on papyrus at Berlin, 100 B.C.; papyrus of the Constitution of Athens in British Museum, first century after Christ), the abbreviations are few, the words are not separated, and punctuation is rare. The accents and breathings perfected by the grammarians of Alexandria appear by degrees. (3) The Cursive, directly derived from the capital, the forms of which it retained for a long time. The letters are joined by ligatures which allowed the writer to write flowingly without raising his calamus after each letter. This writing is chiefly used on administrative papyri for accounts, census, contracts, letters, reports, and memoranda. The manuscripts are a part of the Constitution of Athens, cited above, is written in cursive writing. In this writing a takes the minuscule form, b retains its capital form or takes the simple aedifed appearance of a. The cursive is formed by attaching a loop and a hook to the upper stroke of the minuscules cursive, which is that of the ancient papyri, and distinguished from the minuscule cursive used on the papyri of the sixth and seventh centuries.

B. Byzantine Period.—The history of Greek writing in the Middle Ages is more or less parallel with that of Latin. Until the ninth century uncials predominated. Manuscripts in epigraphical capitals were not found in the East as in the West.) In the ninth century there arose in the Eastern, as in the Carolingian, Empire a minuscule which became the customary script of manuscripts, but which always retained its traditional forms more faithfully than did the Latin character. The minuscule is the cursive form of parchment MSS. from the fourth to the fifteenth centuries. The minuscule cursive, which is that of the ancient MSS., is distinguished from the minuscule cursive used on the papyri of the sixth and seventh centuries.

The new minuscule, on the other hand, appeared only at the end of the seventh and during the eighth century. To the square and round letter forms succeeded elongated characters terminating in a point; right angles were replaced by sharp corners; circles became pointed and tapering ovals. The origins of this style have been mistakenly sought in the ancient papyri (see Garth, "Byz. Zeit.", XI, 112); examples of it may, indeed, be found in marginal glosses of the sixth- and seventh-century Syriac MSS. preserved in London, but this is all. The style appears fully formed in the MSS. of the ninth and tenth centuries. Through all these MSS. is traced the growing use of breathings and accents, and the employment of ligatures becomes more frequent. Beginning with the tenth century, dated uncial MSS. multiply. Script, hitherto sloping, becomes almost perpendicular. In Cod. Vat. 354 (dated 919) reappear the round, full forms, which increased in number in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. In the Evangelary of Harles 5589 (dated 970) the B as in London, is borrowed from a Slavic letter, B, and the ligatures are ornamented with little points, *; we meet with ligatures and abbreviations, see codex Bezae.

Minuscule character appears suddenly in Greek MSS. of the ninth century, at the very time when it was taking root in the West as a consequence of the Carleburgian reform. As in the West, it was destined to supplant all older styles. It has been thought, not without probability, that St. Theodore the Studite (758-826), who attached such importance to the copying of MSS., was instrumental in this reform. The cursive minuscule may have furnished the elements for this character; it appears, however, chiefly as the continuation of the small uncial, which increases in refinement in the MSS. of the eighth century. Thence arose the idea of combining the advantages of the uncial with that of the cursive, and the new writing quickly spread through all the monastic studies of the Greek world. Definitely adopted for the copying of MSS. and enrolling of diplomas, it never underwent such radical changes as did the Carleburgian. Its development seemed to be divided into three stages: (1) Ancient Minuscule (ninth to end of tenth century), connected with the cursive of the papyri, but with the letters more carefully separated, in spite of the ligatures. (2) Middle Minuscule (from middle of tenth to end of eleventh century) shows a revival of the uncial and the cursive. The MSS. of this period evidence particular care; except for the ascenders, or uprights, which go beyond the line, the letters are of an almost equal height; the words are generally separated and the abbreviations, still limited, follow precise rules. (3) The New Minuscule (twelfth century to modern times) acquires an increasingly obscure appearance because of the growth of abbreviations and ligatures. Besides, the employment of paper, which was partly substituted for parchment, contributed to make it assume a more cursive character. One of the most characteristic letters is the B, which is found under the cursive form until the twelfth century and then assumes its normal shape. The three alphabets (Garth, ibid., op. cit. infra in bibliography, tables 5, 6, 9) are:

\begin{align*} \alpha & \nu \gamma \delta \varepsilon \zeta \eta \theta \iota \kappa \lambda \\ \beta & \gamma \delta \varepsilon \zeta \eta \iota \kappa \lambda \\ \mu & \nu \phi \theta \iota \kappa \end{align*}
The first printers adopted this minuscule character for their type. Until the eighteenth century books printed in Greek retained a part of the ligatures and a large number of the abbreviations of the minuscule of the MSS. It was also adopted by imperial or episcopal manuscripts for copying diplomas.

Abbreviations.—In Greek handwriting two sorts of abbreviations are to be distinguished. (1) Those of religious MSS. are the most ancient, being found in uncials MSS., and transmitted by tradition to the minuscule. The abbreviation is effected by the suppression of vowels and indicated by a bar. The names thus abbreviated were those having a religious character.

Abbreviations.—(2) In minuscule MSS. abbreviations are made by interrupting the word and cutting off the last letter with a transverse line. For the reader's assistance the scribe retained the characteristic consonance of the last syllable. These abbreviations, tables of which will be found in the works of Gardthausen and Cardona, are by far the most numerous and increase from the beginning of the thirteenth century. Examples:

Abbreviations by superscripted letters are also found:—

Among the abbreviated endings may be cited:—

Some conventional signs (found tabulated in Gardthausen, op. cit. p. 329) are veritable hieroglyphics; they are used chiefly in astronomical or chemical treatises. The moon is designated by a crescent, the sea by three undulating lines, etc. (see Wiedmann, "Byzantinische Zeitschrift", XIX, 144). Lastly, the Greeks, like the Latins, knew a tachygraphical character in which syllables were represented by signs. Several of these tachygraphical signs, indicating endings, parts of the verb "to be", etc., are transferred to the minuscule, and some recur in Latin handwriting.

Numerals.—In Greek MSS. numerals are expressed by letters of the alphabet followed by an accent. Three archaic letters are made use of: $\Sigma$ (stigma) = 6, $\varkappa$ (koppa) = 90, $\omicron$ (sampi) = 900. From 1000 the same letters are used with accents written beneath. Arabic numerals reached the Greeks through the West, and were not adopted in MSS. before the fifteenth century. Dates, according to the era of the Creation of the World, are written in letters.

National and Provincial Writings.—Owing to the unity of culture which prevailed throughout the territory subject to the Greek Church, there is no marked difference between the MSS. containing the Divine liturgy and those which originated in the provinces. Mr. Batiffol considers the minuscule in the MSS. of Southern Italy (Abbey of Rossano) as but slightly different from that of Constantinople; but his conclusions have been opposed by Gardthausen (Byzant. Zeit., XV, 296), who sees here simply the difference between the work of disciples and that of masters. The same scholar has studied, at Sinai, Greek MSS. copied in Armenia or Georgia in the thirteenth century, and has found their writing the same as that of Constantinople. In the West the national writings, as they are called, disappeared before the Carolingian minuscule, and in the East the Greek Church was such as to prevent the formation of provincial handwriting. In the West, where the monks sometimes copied Greek MSS. and edited bilingual glosses (see Miller, "Glossaire Grèco-latin de Laon", notices and extracts from MSS., 29, 2), the Greek writing is frequently awkward or irregular, but, far from seeking to modify its forms, the copyists sought, on the contrary, to scrupulously transcribe the characters which the MSS. copied by the Greeks offered as models.

It was quite otherwise with alphabets derived from the Greek and applied to foreign languages. Created under the influence of the Greek Church, but adapted to a vocabulary very different from the Greek, they became truly national writings. Such is the character adopted by the Copts, which resembles Greek writing, and is merely a transformation of the fourth-century minuscule. It was also formed the Greek alphabet, which in the fourth century, the characters of which he made use to translate the Bible into the Gothic language (Socrates, "Hæst. Eccles." IV, xxxiii, 6), but he was also indebted to the Latin alphabet; moreover, traces are found in this ancient Gothic writing of the Greek minuscule, as early as that time. So, about 100, St. Mesrop, also desiring to translate the Bible, created the national alphabet of the Armenians by a mixture of the Greek uncial and cursive. The Georgian character, a still nearer neighbour to the Greek, has the same origin. Finally, the missionaries sent by the Greek Church among the Slavonic peoples, especially Sts. Cyril and Methodius, created the Slavonic alphabet, from which the writings of all the Slavonic peoples are derived. This was about 855. "The Glagolitic alphabet (glagol, "itinerant"), which Slavic legend attributes to the invention of St. Cyril and St. Methodius in the desert of Ostromir, dated 1535, but there was discovered at Prespa (Bulgaria), in 1885, an inscription in this writing in the name of the Tsar Samuel, dated 993 (Bulletin of the Russian Archeological Institute of Constantinople, III, 1899)." Latin Paleography.—The Latin alphabet is derived, according to the most widely accepted opinion, from the Greek of Southern Italy. Its letters are composed of the following elements: 1. Of vertical lines called ascenders when they extend above the line, and tails when they are prolonged below it; 2. horizontal lines, called bars or crosses; 3. convex lines, designated under the name of penaches or curls. Thus V is formed of two ascenders and a cross, etc.

The history of Latin writing and its derivatives is divided into five periods: A. Antiquity; B. Barbarian Period; C. Carolingian Reform; D. Gothic Period; E. Sixteenth-Century Reform and Modern Writing. On two occasions there has been a systematic reform in Latin writing intended to restore it to its primitive purity: under Charlemagne, and in the sixteenth century.

A. Antiquity.—In the most ancient MSS. (fourth and fifth centuries) there are four kinds of writing. (1) The Capital is composed of large and regular letters written between two parallel lines, beyond which they seldom extend. It seems to have been the most in use among the Romans, who made use of it almost exclusively for inscriptions. The epigraphical, or elegant, capital, similar to the ordinary majuscule of our printed books, was used in MSS., but there exist only rare specimens of it. Such is the Virgil of the Vatican (Lat. 523) which may be lettered very early in the beginning of the fourth century; other MSS. of Virgil of the same period are in the Vatican (Lat. 5255) and at St. Gall. The only difficulty in reading these MSS. lies in the fact that the words are not separated. The letters differ but little from those of our printed books. The A ordinarie \( \text{A} \) and \( \text{A} \) nearly appears under one of the two forms \( \text{A} \) and \( \text{A} \). The V designates both U and V; in the same manner L is used for both I and J. This beautiful writing seems to have been reserved for MSS. de luxe and for the most revered works, such as Virgil or the Bible. The rustic capital, much used from the end of antiquity, is less graceful; its characters are more slender and less regular; their extremities are no longer flattend by the small graceful bar which adorns the epigraphical capital. Such is the writing of the Prudentius of Paris (Bib. Nat., Lat. 5081), in which is found the signature of the consul Mavortius (527). All these MSS. lack punctuation, and in those where it occurs was added later.

An example of a MS. in unica is furnished in the collection of Acts of the Council of Aquileia (381), transcribed shortly after this date (Paris, Bib. Nat., Lat. 5007); others are the Livy of the Bibliothèque Nationale (Lat. 5729) and several MSS. of the sixth and seventh centuries.

(3) The Half-Uncial, a combination of uncial and minuscule letters. The letters E, H, V, I retain the uncial form, the D has sometimes the uncial form, sometimes the minuscule; the N is in capital. Characteristic letters are:

(respectively, a, g, r). The most ancient specimen is the Verona palimpsest, written in 486, containing the consular annals from 439 to 486.

(4) Minuscule (scriptura minuta) presents simplified forms similar to the modern characters of ordinary or italic print, within more restricted limits than the capital and the uncial. It was used from the imperial period for accounts, business letters, etc. The best known MSS. are not prior to the sixth century (Latin MS. 12907, Bib. Nat., Paris); the greater number date only from the seventh century. Even in the Roman period figures were numerous. The most characteristic forms are those of a, e, i, t, l, m, n, r, s, f, c, g, h, i, k, and s, respectively.

(5) The Cursive includes all rapidly traced writing. The size of the letters is smaller, their shape is simplified, and they are joined together. From this resulted occasional so-called formal writing of the alphabet. Before the sixth century it was a modification of the capital; from this time forth it borrowed its characters chiefly from the minuscule. The most ancient known specimens are the papyrus fragments of Herculaneum (W. Scott, "Fragmenta Herculaneensia," Oxford, 1865), which date from a. d. 33 and a. d. 79; the wax tablets of the gold mines of Voreotspak (Transylvania), written between the years 10 and 100 (Corpus Inscription Latinarum,. IIII, 2); the Egyptian papyri of the fourth century (Karabacek, "Mitteilungen aus der Sammlung der Papyri Erzherzog Rainiers," Vienna, 1886); the fragments of sixth-century imperial receipts found in Egypt, which are distinguished by large irregular letters, joined, without any semblance of strokes (Th. di Dalmata, "Handbook of Papyri," 211-13). This writing was much employed in legal documents down to the seventh century, and it is found in the papyrus charters of Ravenna (end of sixth century); on the other hand, it was but little used in the copying of MSS., and serves only for glosses and marginal notes.

(6) The Tironian Notes.—The Romans were acquainted with a still more rapid system of writing, used to take down speeches or notes. These were the Tironian notes, the invention of which is attributed to Tullius Tiro, a freedman of Cicero (Suetonius, "De Viris illust. reliq.", 135), or to the poet Ennius. According to Plutarch (Cato Jun. 22) Cicero had formed tachygraphy for taking down his speeches. These notes were not arbitrary signs, like those of modern stenography, but abbreviated letters reduced to a straight or curved line and linked together. Sometimes a single letter indicated a whole word (e., P for primum). The chanceries of the Middle Ages doubtless made use of the Tironian notes.

There is no punctuation in the most ancient MSS. But according to the Greek grammarians, whose doctrine is represented by Isidore of Seville, a single sign, the point, was employed: placed above, it indicated a long pause (dissociatio, or periodus, whence our word periodus); placed below, a short pause (abdisiociation, comma); in the middle, a pause of medium length (dissociatio media, colon). In the greater number of MSS. the point above or periodus, and the point below, or comma, were used exclusively.

B. Barbarian Period (Fifth to Eighth Century).—After the Germanic invasions there developed in Europe a series of writings called national, which were all derived from the Roman cursive, but assumed distinctive forms in the various countries. Such was, in France, the Merovingian minuscule, characterized by a lack of proportion, irregularity, and the number of ligatures. The writing is upright, slightly inclined to the left, the MSS. are not ruled, and the lines sometimes encroach on one another. The phrases are separated only by points, and before every phrase, a minute letter in capital or uncial; the abbreviations are few. According to the Corbie MS. of Gregory of Tours (Paris, Bib. Nat., Lat. 1765), the a has the form of a double c or c, and is sometimes superscribed when it is joined to the following letter a.
mounted by a appendix in the form of a cross(es); the e is often looped and resembles an S; the r and s are distinguished with difficulty; 1, L, and T is included in a great many ligatures in more characters; at the beginning of the document is the chrismon, or monogram of Christ, formed of the Greek letters X and P interconnected, which replaces the invocation in use in the imperial diplomas. Tironian notes also accompany the signatures on twenty-seven diplomas; they represent the names of persons—referendaries or notaries—who assisted in the preparation and expediting of the document. The reading of these, undertaken by Jules Huet (d. 1838) and completed by Jusselin (Bibloth. Ecole des Chartes, 1907, 482), has furnished valuable information on the organization of the royal chancery. Tironian notes are also employed for the correction of mistakes in the content.

Lombardic writing, which developed in Italy during this period, until the ninth century, bore a great resemblance to the Merovingian minuscule; it was also introduced into some Frankish monasteries in the eighth century. From the ninth century it assumed, in Southern Italy, a more original character and longer survival than the Carolingian reform. In the twelfth century it reached its apogee in the scriptorium of Monte Cassino; it became regular, and was characterized by the thickness of the strokes which contrasted with the slender portions of the letters. In the twelfth century this writing acquired more and more angular shapes. It persisted in Southern Italy until the end of the fourteenth century. Its use in diplomas was abolished by Frederick II as early as 1231. Until the beginning of the twelfth century the pontifical chancery made use of a similar handwriting called litterae benedictianae, characterized by letters with long ascenders and by exceptional shapes; e.g., the a in the form of the end of a chisel blade, the t with a t-shaped hook. The Visigothic handwriting (litterae rotatae, mozarabea) was employed in Spain from the eighth to the twelfth century. It combined with the Roman cursive some elements of the uncial and is generally illegible. According to Rodrigo de Toledo (De rebus Hispaniae, VI, 29) a Council of Toledo in 1060 decreed—doubtless under the influence of the Charismatic movement—that it should be replaced by the French minuscule.

Irish writing (scriptura scoticana), unlike the others, did not proceed from the Roman cursive. It is found under two forms: (1) A half-uncial, somewhat large and regular, with rounded outlines (seventh-century Ecruin, ed. Ch. Durand, Ecole des Chartes, 1878) and of the type "Book of Kells". Maccevy Evangeliarium, Belgium, eighth century). The words are separated, the ligatures numerous, the initials often encircled with red dots, and the abbreviations rather frequent. Some conventional signs also occur: \( \frac{3}{4} \) (e), \( \frac{1}{2} \) (a), \( \frac{1}{4} \) (ed), and \( \frac{1}{4} \) (ad). This writing was chiefly used for the transcription of liturgical books, and for inscriptions on coins, without a name.

(2) A pointed minuscule, bearing no relation to the Roman cursive, and also derived from the half-uncial. This writing acquired still more angular forms in the eleventh century, and throughout the Middle Ages remains the national writing of Ireland. The Irish MSS. are remarkable for the fantastic and rich decoration of their initials (see Manuscripts, Illustrated).

The Anglo-Saxon writing is derived from both the Irish writing and the Roman script of the MSS., which the missionaries brought to the island. As in Ireland, it is sometimes round, broad, and squat (especially in the seventh and eighth centuries), sometimes angular, with long and pointed ascenders. The liturgical MSS. differ from those of Ireland in the frequent use of gold in the initials. The Evangelary of Lindisfarne (Book of Durham), transcribed in 907 (London, Brit. Museum), is one of the most beautiful examples of round writing. Anglo-Saxon writing disappeared after the Norman Conquest, but the Carolingian minuscule which succeeded it was formed partly under the influence of the Irish and Anglo-Saxon monks who had been brought to the Carolingian MSS. (C. Carolinica Reforma).

The reform of writing undertaken in the monasteries on Charlemagne's initiative was inspired by the desire for correct and easily legible texts of the Sacred Books. Models were sought in the ancient MSS., and Servetus Lupus, Abbot of Ferrières, persuaded Egangard that the royal scire Bertaeaulphus should take as a model the ancient capital ("Lettres", ed. Desveches du Dezert, Paris, 1888, pp. 60, 61). The monasticism of St. Martin of Tours, of which Alcuin was abbot (796-804), may be considered the chief centre of this reform and produced the most beautiful manuscripts of this period—e.g., the Evangelary of Lotharing, the Bible of the Abbey of the Saint-Symphorien, the Montecassino, the book of St. Martin of Quellinburg. These MSS. served as models for the monastic scriptoria throughout the empire, and by degrees the Carolingian writing conquered all the West. In these MSS., are found very various kinds of ancient writing: the epigraphic capital, the rustic capital, the uncial, the half-uncial, and the minuscule.

With few exceptions, the capital was little used except for titles, initials, and copies of inscriptions. The MSS. of St. Martin of Tours show a partiality for a beautiful half-uncial, but the most important reform was the creation of the minuscule, which became, except for titles, initials, and the first lines of chapters, the writing used in the greater number of MSS. This minuscule prevailed throughout Europe in the twelfth century, and in the sixteenth century, when another reform of writing was inaugurated, the Italian copyists and typographers again used it as a model. M. L. Deval (Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, XXXII) has shown that the half-uncial and the minuscule in the sixth and seventh centuries for the annotation of MSS., may be traced as elements in the Carolingian minuscule. Among its chief characteristics are: A sometimes open, sometimes closed, and derived from the uncial A; the ascenders d, l, of the h, d, l, and h broadened at the top, the g retains its semi-circular form in the minuscule, the f begins a line with a small dot at the top of the line. The MSS. hence forth well ordered present a clear and pleasing appearance. The words are nearly always well separated from one another; ligatures are rare, but that of the s (for as) has been retained. Sentences begin with majuscules and are separated by points (weak punctuation) or semi-colons (strong punctuation). Abbreviations were there used they increased in the tenth century. One of the most beautiful specimens of this minuscule is furnished by the MS. Lat. 1451, in Bib. Nat., Paris, transcribed in 796, and containing a collection of conciliar canons and a catalogue of the popes.

In documents of the imperial chancery the reform of writing was at first less pronounced, and the scribes retained the elongated writing of the Merovingian period; it became, however, clearer, more regular, and less encumbered with ligatures, while care was taken in the separation of the words. In the time of Louis the Pious, on the other hand, the minuscule of MSS. began to be seen on documents and so it supplanted writing. At the same time it followed some ancient traditions; it is generally more ornamented than the writing of MSS., the space between the lines is greater, the ascenders of the d, l, and f are usually lengthened,

One of the leading characteristics of writing, which, thanks to its simplicity and clearness, spread throughout the West and everywhere, except in Ireland, took the place of the national writings of the barbarian period. In the tenth century it was, however, less regular, and it became more slender in the eleventh century. The MSS. and official documents are generally very carefully executed. The words are well separated, and abbreviations are not yet very numerous. Beginning with Clement IV (1036-48), the pontifical Chancery substitutes this writing for the littera benevencenda; however, until Paschal II (1099-1118), the two systems were employed simultaneously. It was only in the latter pontificate period that the Caroline minuscule became the exclusive writing of the pontifical notaries, as it remained until the sixteenth century.

D. Gothic Period (twelfth to sixteenth century).—Gothic writing arose from the transformations of the Caroline minuscule, much as Gothic architecture is derived from Romanesque. The transition was at first imperceptible, and most of the documents of the twelfth century do not differ from those of the preceding epoch. It is only noticeable that the letters thicken and assume a more robust appearance, and that abbreviations are more frequent. Soon changes are introduced: the regularity is more pronounced, curves are replaced by angles, the lower extremities of the strokes are prolonged with more or less angular lines in the shape of hooks, which turn up to the right to join the next stroke; the upper curves of the letters m and n are replaced by angles. Among the most ancient examples is a MS. copied at St. Martin of Tours in 1105 (Paris, Bib. Nat., Lat. 1145, reproduced in Pron, "Paléographie," pl. VII), and a MS. of the Abbey of Moutiers St. Jorioz, 1125-27 (Flamment, "Album paléogr. du nord de la France," pl. IV). On the mortuary roll of Bl. Vitalis, Abbot of Savigny (d. 1122), are found, among signatures collected in France and England, specimens of the new writing mingled with the Caroline minuscule. Diplomatic writing follows ancient tradition until the thirteenth century, and retains the elongated ascenders, which sometimes end in a more or less curled stroke. Nevertheless, as early as about 1130 the influence of Gothic writing was felt in the charters of the North, some of which are even written in the characters used in MSS. Among the most beautiful charters of this period may be mentioned the charters of the papal Chancery in the thirteenth century, their writing had become simple, elegant, and clear.

At the end of the twelfth and during the thirteenth century the change in handwriting was more pronounced. MSS. and charters in the vulgar tongue are more and more numerous. Writing ceases to be a monastic art; it no longer possesses its former beautiful uniformity, and takes an individual character from the scribe. Abbreviations multiply; side by side with the elegantly shaped Gothic minuscule appears in official documents (registrars, minutes, etc.) a smaller, more cursively written, pointed and ligatured. The tendency during this period is to diminish the size and thickness of the letters. In lavishly executed liturgical books, however, large thick letters, termed "letters of form," are used. This sort of letters persisted until the sixteenth century and served as a model for the earliest type used in printing. Finally, the diplomatic writing used in charters disappears in the first part of the thirteenth century, but the writing of books takes on a cursive character. In the fourteenth century the writing of ordinary books becomes more and more slender, angular, and compressed. The "letter of form" is reserved for inscriptions, for copying the Bible and liturgical books. The same characters appear in official documents where cursive writing becomes more and more frequent, not only in minutes and registers, but even in official copies (copyscripta). It is evident that the scribes more frequently and freely developed themselves from the ancient traditions. This transformation became still more pronounced in the fifteenth century, when Gothic writing took on a national character in the various countries of Europe. The writing of charters then became more and more cursive, the letters are less carefully formed and all joined together. At last printing, which spread through the West about 1450, fixed the characters then in use. The majuscule letters, called capitals, used to begin sentences or proper names, are always borrowed from uncial or capital writing.

Cursive writing was much employed, even for the copying of books in Latin, and abbreviations gradually took their rise between the "letter of form" and the cursive. Such, e.g., is MS. 9212 of the Library of Brussels (Chronicle of Jacques de Gueuze, dated 1416).

Abbreviations.—One of the chief difficulties in reading documents of the twelfth to the sixteenth century is the frequency of abbreviations. This was carried even more than usual in the eleventh century to the east, where the princes—e.g., Philip the Fair, by his ordinance of July, 1301 (Ordonnances des Roys de France, 1, 417)—vainly endeavored to restrain their use. Abbreviations continued to multiply until the fifteenth century and they are found not only in manuscripts but also in the greater number of printed books. Despite the progress of printing, these abbreviations were not arbitrarily conceived: their use followed determined rules. Besides, each branch of learning had special abbreviations for its technical terms. In writing the vernaculars—English, French, German, etc.—abbreviations were less numerous, and they followed the same rules as Latin abbreviations. These rules are reduced to a few essential and general principles:

1. Abbreviation, by a sigla, or single letter, represents the whole word of which it is the initial. The sigla is doubled to indicate the plural (D. N. for Dominus Noster; DD. N. for Dominii Nostrorum; FF. for Fratres). In the pontifical charters of the thirteenth century occur: a. s. (apodetica scripta); e. m. (cunium nodum); f. i. (fratres in舀iter). Sighs, which were frequently used in inscriptions, were less common in manuscripts and charters. Of rather frequent occurrence are: e (est), S. (sigillum, "seal"), SS. (subscripta, i. (of est).

2. Abbreviation by interior contraction consists in suppressing one, two, or more in the interior of a word, the suppressed being indicated by a horizontal line above the word. (a) Suppression of vowels (the oldest used): pam (Dominus) xe (sanctus), epe (episcopum), epe (spiritus). (b) Suppression of a single vowel: ape (apud), fea (fecl), ut (rel). (c) Retention of only the initial and final letters: pe (pater), nu (noviss.); e (d). Contraction of the last syllable, especially the termination in French: obligas (obligation). In Latin and French the final letters are almost always retained in substantives, adjectives, and adverbs.

3. A small letter placed above a word indicates the suppression of one or several letters. A vowel written over another vowel indicates the initial letter and the termination. The consonants m, n, r placed above the line are used to indicate the terminations mm, nr, nr.

(1) Abbreviation by suspension consists in leaving the word unfinished; the omission being indicated by a stroke, which cuts through the ascender that may be in its way, e.g., 501 (solius), parvis (parvisvis), amor (amans); in French, tecas (lieutenant). The syllabic am and the genitive plural terminations, orun, arum, are abbreviated by the suppression of the last two letters; in this case the foot of the r is given a transverse bar: \( \text{COV} \text{ (coram) antecessor} \) (antecessorum).

(5) Abbreviations by special signs.—The sign most widely used is a small horizontal bar, sometimes waved, placed above the word, which indicates an abbreviation by contraction or suspension: \( \text{m} \) or \( \text{nost} \).

In the thirteenth century the bar has the forms: \( \text{c} \), \( \text{g} \), \( \text{h} \), \( \text{i} \).

The signs \( \text{c} \), \( \text{g} \), \( \text{h} \), \( \text{i} \) represent, sometimes the terminal \( \text{c} \), especially in ablative plurals in \( \text{bus} \); sometimes the terminations \( \text{qua} \), \( \text{et} \), and finally \( \text{n} \) of the accusative.

Other signs have a more determined value: \( \text{r} \) for \( \text{r} \), \( \text{t} \) for \( \text{ur}, \text{as}, \text{us} \), and in the North of France all terminations in \( \text{s} \) and, exceptionally, in \( \text{et} \). The origin of this sign is a Tironian note; it arises from the joining of \( \text{u} \) with \( \text{s} \). The following are abbreviations of the verb \( \text{esse} \) and others of the most widely used signs:

\begin{align*}
\text{Essa} & \equiv \text{ESSA} & \equiv \text{ESSA} & \equiv \text{ESSA} \\
\text{Est} & \equiv \text{EST} & \equiv \text{EST} & \equiv \text{EST} \\
\text{Et} & \equiv \text{ET} & \equiv \text{ET} & \equiv \text{ET} \\ \text{Per} & \equiv \text{PER} & \equiv \text{PER} & \equiv \text{PER} \\
\text{Obiit, obiitus} & \equiv \text{OBIIT} & \equiv \text{OBIIT} & \equiv \text{OBIIT}

(6) Letters enclosed in larger letters, found chiefly in inscriptions on titles of MSS.

(7) Monograms.—The letters of a single word combined in a single figure. This custom has been borrowed from the Greek chanceries in the Carolingian period. The best known are those of Charlemagne (Karolus) and Chotaire (Hotarius): [Diagram]

Dictionaries of abbreviations will be found in special works (see bibliography). From ancient times scribes have been so numerous that, under Nero, the grammarian Valerius Probus compiled a lexicon of them, of which only the juridical section has survived (ed. Mommsen, "Grammatica Latina", IV, 265). At the end of the fifteenth century, lexicographers of the same kind were compiled in Italy: one of these published at Brescia in 1534 has been reproduced (Bibl. de l'Ecole des Chartes, 1902, pp. 8, 9).

Numerals.—Roman numerals never ceased to be used, and with two exceptions they were placed between two points.

<tr>
<th>( \text{I} )</th>
<th>( \text{V} )</th>
<th>( \text{X} )</th>
<th>( \text{L} )</th>
<th>( \text{C} )</th>

<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>500</td>

Numbers were indicated by the multipliers—\( \text{I} \times 10 = 80 \), \( \text{V} \times 10 = 100 \). Roman numerals were nearly always written in minuscules. The terminus \( \text{m} \) indicates a cardinal or ordinal adjective: \( \text{m} \text{illiusimo} \).

The Arabic figures, of Hindu origin, employed as early as the tenth century by Gerbert, appear in mathematical treatises in the twelfth century and are hardly found in other works before the fifteenth century. In the fifteenth century the forms of the \( \text{I} \), \( \text{V} \), \( \text{X} \), \( \text{L} \), \( \text{C} \), \( \text{D} \), \( \text{M} \), \( \text{N} \), \( \text{X} \), \( \text{L} \), \( \text{C} \), \( \text{D} \), \( \text{M} \) nine digits are:

- Tironian notes and tachygraphy.—Tironian notes continued to be used in diplomas or for glosses of MSS. until the twelfth century. Latin MS. (15th (Bibl. Nat., Paris) contains some tenth-century exercises from the Tironian manual (see Bib. Éc. des Chartes, 1906, 270). Pope Sylvester II also used for his letters a North Italian tachygraphical system, in which each syllable is represented by a sign of its own, e.g. "Sciences de l'Academie des Inscriptions", 1887). In the Middle Ages various secret codes were used for writing (cryptography). These mostly consisted in suppressing vowels and supplying their places with groups of points. Sometimes the consonants, while retaining their own value, also represent the preceding vowel in alphabetical order. (e.g., \( \text{sevitas} \) for \( \text{vitas} \), \( \text{irisita} \) for \( \text{iris sui} \), the personal pronoun to the verb (e.g., \( \text{lucris for in vita sua} \), of the conjunction to the following word (situis for \( \text{si talis} \)). Another difficulty arises from the arbitrary division of words between two lines. It is now admitted that division cannot be made at the end of a syllable, and there is a custom of placing a hyphen at the end of the line to indicate that the word is divided: in the Middle Ages the same syllable was hesitatingly divided between two lines, and the hyphen introduced in the fifteenth century, never became universal. Finally, before beginning the study of documents it is necessary to have some ideas of the orthography of the languages in which the texts are written. Not only had the vulgar tongues (English, French, German, Provençal, etc.) forms which have now disappeared, but the orthography of Latin itself was very different from ours. Not to mention letters improperly added to words, and Germanic breathings (especially in the Merovingian period), it must be remembered that the formation of the genitive feminine singular is always in \( c \) (rose for \( \text{rosa} \)). During the greater part of this period, also, the dipthongal vowels \( \text{ac} \) are written separate.

Sixteenth Century Reform and Modern Writings.—One consequence of the Renaissance was a progressive abandonment of Gothic for the writing of books. The Italian typographers created the modern Latin character on the model of the Carolingian minuscule. This reform was adopted in Latin countries; in England Latin characters were introduced as early as 1402 and by degrees supplanted the Gothic character or "black letter". On the other hand, this character persisted in German-speaking countries, which have not even yet entirely abandoned it. Books copied by hand became more and more rare. In legal documents and correspondence writing assumed a more individual character; abbreviations were left to the fancy of each writer—a licence which sometimes increases the difficulty of deciphering. At the beginning of the eighteenth century writing tended to become more regular and by the end of that century attained great perfection. The thoroughly individual character of nineteenth-century writing renders all paleographical study of great usefulness.

Paleontology, House of. See Byzantine Empire.

Paleontology (οικός τῶν παλαιῶν στῆρων, or the science of fossils, deals with extinct or primeval animals and plants. It treats of their classifications, life and habits, geographical distribution, and succession. It embraces also whatever deductions may be drawn from these investigations for the history of the organisms and of the earth. Paleontology, therefore, is closely connected with geology, botany, zoology, comparative anatomy, and embryology, or ontogeny, which at the same time serve to confirm the facts of history. The science is divided into palaeoentomology (στήρων, plant), also called phytopaleontology, or fossil botany (στήρων, herb), treating of fossil plants, and palaeozoology (ζωαί, animal), treating of extinct animals.

Historical Summary.—Even in antiquity fossil marine animals attracted the attention of a number of philosophers who endeavored to explain them correctly, drawing the conclusion that at one time there had been a different distribution of sea and land. The earliest of these philosophers was Xenophanes of Colophon, the founder of the Eleatic school of philosophy (400 B.C.). After him came Strato, in the earlier Christian ages were Tertullian of Carthage (160-220) and Faustus of Cesarea (about 270-334). In the Middle Ages little attention was paid to fossils, which were generally regarded as products of a creative force of the earth (στῆρων, planet, or virtus formation, though a few men like Albertus Magnus, and in later Leonardo da Vinci (1452-1519) held the view of the fossiliferous strata. In the sixteenth century the first enlargements of fossils were published by the Swiss physician Conrad Gesner. It was not until a century later, however, that a few scholars, particularly the Englishmen, Robert Hooke, John Ray, and John Woodward, vigorously maintained the organic origin of fossils. The opinion was still universal that fossils represented life destroyed by the flood, a theory championed especially by Schuëcher. William Smith (1769-1839) was the first to recognize the value of fossils for the historical investigation of the strata of the earth, his theory being introduced into France by Alexander Brongnart (1770-1847), who, with Cuvier (1769-1832), was the first to apply the principles of botany, zoology, and comparative anatomy to the interpretation of fossils. In 1822 Cuvier introduced the new term "paleontology", however, was first given by a pupil of Cuvier, Ducrotay de Blainville, and the zoologist Fischer of Walheim. Since then about one hundred thousand species of extinct organisms have been described. Cuvier and his successors, as d'Orcigny, d'Alzou, and others, have sustained the catastrophie theory, that is, the doctrine that at the end of each geologic period the entire fauna was destroyed, and replaced by a new order of life. Darwin's "The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection" (1859) proved a turning-point for these theories, for since that time the theory of descent had also been applied to palaeontology, and to-day is generally accepted. We may especially mention the works on this subject by Kowalevsky, Ruttimayr, Gaudry, Cope, W. Wanger, Neumayr, and Zittel.

The geological and palaeontological collections of universities serve for the study of palaeontology and instruction in this science, as do also similar collections in museums. The geological and palaeontological collections and geological and palaeontological societies have the same object. There are only two purely palaeontological societies, the Swiss and the London; their object being the publication of palaeontological works. Palaeozoology is cultivated almost exclusively by geologists; it is only in exceptional cases that zoologists occupy themselves with this science, while phytopaleontology is carried on mainly by botanists.

The object of palaeontological study is the study of fossils (from πίθηκος, stone, and πατέρας, father), or fossils (fossils, what is buried). Fossils are those remains or traces of plants and animals which before the beginning of the present geological era found their way into the strata of the earth and have been preserved there. Most of the species thus found are extinct, but the more recent the strata the greater the number of extant species it contains. As implied by the word petrefaction, most palaeontological remains have been transformed into stone, but leaves and bones completely incrusted in limestone, and therefore petrified, have been found. Bones, teeth, shells of molluses, etc., are preserved. Even these hard parts graduall disappear by disintegration through atmospheric influences. The preservation of fossils is associated with the discovery of paleontologists, who have been able to interpret the evidence of the earth's past history. The evidence is mainly provided by the remains of ancient organisms, which have been preserved in the earth's strata. The fossils consist of bones, teeth, shells, and other parts of animals, which have been preserved in the original structure of the tissue, especially in case of silification. But there are still other means of preserving as fossils the remains of ancient organisms. Not infrequently such remains are covered by mineral waters with an envelope, the organic body itself was afterwards dissolved, leaving only an impression. On the other hand, fossils, echinoderms, corals, etc., have their hollow chambers filled with a mineral substance and afterwards the outer shell is chemically removed, so the only part of the inside or a hard kernel remains. Finally, the cases of birds and reptiles, and traces of the trails of crustacea and worms which have been preserved as impressions are counted as fossils. These are often found with the remains of molluscs, as the well-known impressions of meduse in the lithographic slate of Bavaria.

The study of paleontological objects is often attended with great difficulty. Indeed, as the most part the remains found are incomplete and their correct interpretation requires careful comparison with living organisms. Paleontology, therefore, makes use of the methods of zoology and botany, but its task is a far more difficult one. In the fossils of animals all the fleshly parts are lacking, and even the hard parts are often enough only very imperfectly represented, and preserved in fragments. The blossoms of plants are completely wanting, while leaves, fruit, stem, and root are hardly ever found together. Consequently, paleontologists have given special attention to the study of the comparative anatomy of the hard parts of organic beings, and discovered organic laws; among these should be especially mentioned Cuvier's "law of correlation". By this is meant the mutual dependence of the different parts of an organism, which enables us, e.g., from the teeth alone, to decide whether an animal was carnivorous or herbivorous etc. Furthermore, by the aid of paleontology the vicissitudes of the history and geological conditions of the earth are disentangled to an astonishing degree, and many gaps therein were filled. The problems of the development theory received much light from the same source. Finally paleogeography is wholly dependent on this science, as the fossils indicate where there were continents and oceans, where the animal life of the coast developed, where the great bodies of fresh-water organisms existed, where the primeval tropical forests flourished, and where the tundras of the cold regions extended. This not only enables us to fill out the outlines of ancient continents and oceans, but also furnishes the means of determining the geographical distribution of plants and animals, and the climatic conditions during the different geological eras.

Of special importance is the historical side of paleontology. As has already been said, William Smith was the first to recognize the importance of fossils for the historical investigation of the earth's strata. Before his day they were regarded as proofs of the non-existence of water; the surface of the earth consists of varying stratified rocks that have been deposited by the ocean, by brackish, and by fresh water. Geology studies the individual strata and infers their age from their succession. This can easily be done in a limited district, but if two districts somewhat distant from each other are compared, then it will prove impossible by geology alone to establish that the two strata are of the same age, for at the same time in one place limestone may have been deposited, in another sandstone, and in a third clay. Again, strata of an epoch which appear in one place may be wanting in another. In such cases the geologist may receive great assistance from palaeontology. For the stratified portion of the earth generally contains fossils which are found more or less frequently, which are so distributed that each group of strata corresponds to a definite collection of species that lived when these strata were deposited. In such a case palaeontology determines the chronological succession of the several fauna and flora and studies the mutual relations of the organisms that lived at the same time. By this means the contemporaneousness of the various strata may be recognized or the parallelism of the several strata established. In doing this, however, many obstacles have been overcome with considerable difficulty. Most strata have been deposited by the sea. At the same time, however, deposits were formed by lakes; on land forests grew and land animals lived, in warm seas there were luxurious growths of seaweeds. In all these regions the living organisms are utterly different; consequently some lucky discovery such as that of shells which found their way into deposits of plants, or that of the bone of a mammal imbedded in the sea-sand is required, in order to be able to decide whether the deposits are contemporaneous. From what has been said it is clear that all fossils are not equally important and useful in determining the age of strata. Thus, all remains of land and fresh-water organisms are of less importance, because most strata were deposited by the ocean. Even the marine fossils are not all equally important. The most important are those combining the most rapid changes in character with the most extensive geographical distribution.

The most important task of paleontology is the investigation of the history of the development of life, for it is only science which furnishes means and in the fossils offers documents to elucidate this problem. Only in this way is it possible to learn whether the most ancient fossils of organisms form a continuous whole, or whether the fauna and flora during the periods in the earth's history were destroyed by catastrophes and replaced by a new creation. There are two fundamental characteristics of all organisms: heredity and variation. It is, at the same time, interesting to prove that the conception of the biological process of evolution, in the main, is older than the knowledge of its capacity of persistence. Aristotle believed that cells sprang from mud. Theophrastus accepted the belief that the tubers of a number of plants were formed from the earth, and even Goethe maintained the opinion that plant-lice were developed from parts of the plants. With Linnaeus and Lamarck the idea that the physical law of the capacity of persistence in organisms, which makes it possible for the naturalist to organize the whole of the great kingdom of living beings into genera and species, Darwin was the opponent of Lamarck, in that he once more brought the capacity for mutation of all organisms into the focus of natural philosophy.

According to the theory of the evolutionist all life issued from several cells, or according to some from a single cell. Of this cell, of course, no fossilized traces can have been preserved. Yet according to this theory we should expect the most ancient strata to be filled with mere Impressions of the single cells and the lowest type capable of preservation. This, however, is not the case. In the Cambrian, the oldest stratified formation, which has yielded somewhat abundant fossils, all families of the animal kingdom are found, with exception of the vertebrates; all plants are likewise missing. These two groups first appear in the Silurian formation. The organisms found in the Cambrian formation are not the lowest of their kind, the brachiopods, for instance, and the trilobites are as highly-organized as the present representatives of their species. In the same manner, vertebrates are represented in the Silurian formation by the trunk-fish or ostracidea, and the oldest known plants are the efece and the highly-organized ferns. Consequently the lowest classes are not the earliest. When by the discovery of older remains the limits of life were traced further back, here also remains of higher organisms were found, so that even here we are far removed from the beginnings of life. In attempting to find traces of the most ancient organisms, the Eozaena, however, played a great role until it was seen that in the remains in question crystals of olivin or chrysolite, that had been converted into serpentine, had produced the illusion of an organic structure. Great importance was also attached to the appearance of graphite in the earliest of strata, until Weinschenk proved, at least for many of them, that they owed their existence to volcanic action. Equally inconceivable are the earliest limestones, now that we know that these are still being produced chemically in the ocean. In short, paleontology tells us nothing about the origin of life; the whole series of organisms, from the simplest protozoa through the differentiated forms found in the Cambrian rocks is missing.

If we survey the fossils so far known in historical order, the following facts are ascertained: The earliest or primary period of the earth is the era of the Pecidiophaga, the ferns, horsetails, and club-mosses; in the Triassic and Jurassic periods, the gymnosperms prevailed, and flourishing in the Cretaceous period was the angiosperms. The history of the animal kingdom is similar. Of the articulatea, only the crinoidea appear in the earliest formations; insects and spiders are not found until the Upper Carboniferous. The first vertebrates are found in the Upper Silurian, these are some trunk-fish or ostracoids, which reached their most flourishing period in the Upper Devonian. The first vertebrates living on land are found in the Carboniferous period; these were amphibians represented by the stegecephala, and the first reptiles. The Triassic also yields the first small mammals, which, however, do not become important until the Old Tertiary period, while the birds, which appear in the same family as the reptiles who appears in the Quaternary, concludes the series. Thus, starting from geological antiquity, the fossils of which still in part seem strange to us, although in almost all cases they can be inserted without difficulty in the existing orders and classes of the animal and vegetable kingdom, there is found a progressive appearance of the organic and mechanical forms, which is completed by the gradual and unbroken succession of beings more and more highly differentiated.

At the first glance this seems to be a brilliant confirmation of the theory of development, but when more closely examined it is seen that the guiding-thread, which should lead from one point to another, is continually broken and the loose ends cannot readily be connected. Vertebrates first appear in the Silurian and angiosperms in the cretaceous, but there are no organisms leading up to these groups. Thus we are met by the broad fact that both vertebrates and flowering plants with covered seed appear without intermediate links. The same thing is true of each one of the classes in the animal and vegetable kingdom. We see them, indeed, appear one after another in time, but we always miss the intervening links which would indicate genetic relations among the several orders. It is true that at times animal remains are found which, it is believed, may rightly be claimed as the missing links. The best known of these is probably the aboriginal bird, the archaopteryx, which made its way between reptile and bird. Its plumage, its bird-like foot, and the closed capsule of its skull characterize it as a bird, while the structure of the vertebrae, the teeth, and the long, lizard-like tail indicate reptilian affinities. Since, however, it has been found that the reptile-like pterosauria and micromonophous birds, there is no longer any doubt that the species under consideration are real birds, the highly-interconnected last link of an extinct class of birds. In the same way the opinion that the theropoda, a kind of reptile, are the aboriginal form of vertebrates, has not proved tenable. At the same time we now and then find in the record of successive geological strata forms that may be regarded as the common starting-point of two or of several orders. We know, for instance, the connecting links between the feathered and splayed-out pterodactyls, or between the trilobites and the teleost bony fish, also between the gregarious and the carnivorous marsupials on the one side and the herbivorous and carnivorous mammals on the other. At the base of the placental mammals are found forms which unite the characteristics of hoofed animals, beasts of prey, and insectivorous animals. Such collective types as they are called, however, are very rare, whereas according to the theory of descent they should be found in large numbers.

In the smallest classified class of minute systematic units it is true palaeontological series of descent can be recognized, for here individual species by imperceptible mutations lead to new species. The best known line of descent of this kind is probably the ancestral tree of the horse, published long ago by Huxley; but this very case illustrates the difficulties of such problems, for just now it is very doubtful if some of the links should be inserted in it at all. Moreover, such proofs always contain hypothetical elements. Besides, connecting links are often lacking, or parts separately found, such as teeth or bones, are only the means of completing a line of ancestral descent. A special obstacle to the recognition of true relationship is the phenomenon called convergence. By convergence is meant the fact that, in consequence of similar conditions of life, uniformity of organs or even of the entire structure can be developed by animals far apart in systematic classification. Thus, for example, a mosas of the cretaceous period, a brachiopod of the Carboniferous, and a coral of the Devonian period alike. The latter is unconnected, or, in Mesozoic times the reptilia prevailed in water, air, and on land. There existed in this period beasts of prey, along with herbivorous and insectivorous animals, echinoderms in the air, and fish-like carnivora in the ocean. In the latest geological periods the mammals took the lead, and placental mammals took possession of all three elements. Moreover, these rapid simultaneous changes are of very brief duration. In these latter is perceived, at times, a very gradual remodelling by mutations, mutations which being separated into fragments by a violent metakinetik break-up, afterwards give rise to a large number of species; thus the vital energy of the genera is soon exhausted. This phenomenon brings us, therefore, face to face with a new problem, commonly called the "extinction of species."
general until the era of the worms. One family of worms already had gills, yet it was only upon the arrival of some cephalopods and echinoderms that breathing were always present. In the same manner the crocodiles, alone of the reptiles, have a heart divided into two ante-chambers and two main chambers, a form of heart which is found, once more, without exception among birds and mammals. This agreement among various groups, however, cannot be based upon a close relationship, but, strictly speaking, comes also under the conception of convergence.

If we survey extant organisms, there are without doubt many important considerations which tell for the theory of development. However, the theory of development in its extreme, minimalist sense, signifies the unity of all plants and animals under a single root. For this many proofs are still lacking, even if we set aside the fact that the oldest organisms of every family (except the vertebrae and plants) are highly organized, inasmuch as their oldest progenitors may have been made unrecognizable by the metamorphosis of the earliest rocks and thus withdrawn from our observation; and even if the enormous length of time required for the development of forms so highly specialized as the trilobite, does not seem to be sufficiently represented in the coxide sediments. But in the later formations also the entire family of vertebrae appear without any preparation; among the plants to name only a few, the flowering cretaceous angiosperms, and the ferns, stand out as in the Ordovician. Older Tertiaries bring without warning us, all ten orders of the mammalia; even among these ten orders a closer relationship can be conjectured in only a few cases. In the pedigree of organic beings, therefore, we meet with chasms which cannot be bridged over even with the help of Haeckel's metamorphosis. In view of this fact it is hardly possible any longer to maintain the opinion that all life has sprung from a single root (monophyletic). It appears much more probable that the different genera of animals and plants originate in various roots (polyphyletic). The advocates of the monophyletic theory, it is true, declare that the experience of animal breeders and florists shows that new variations appear for the first time in few examples only, and that in view of the fragmentary character of paleontological records these first examples may have perished. But if we were to accept this explanation we should deceive ourselves as to the difficulties of the problem of development. For in every case a whole series of intermediate links is missing, and it would, therefore, be strange that none of these should have been transmitted to us. It would be still more startling if the transition-links had regularly perished in all the larger units of classification.

We infer therefore that the facts presented to us by the known fossils compel us to accept a polyphyletic descent. It is, therefore, interesting that zoologists like E. von Beer, Fleischmann, and Th. Bowman, and a number of botanists like A. von Kerner, who work in a different field, have also gradually adopted a polyphyletic line of descent.

Finally, if we examine more closely the individual groups of fossils, we perceive their natural relations in a new and peculiar light. For the studies in question show that the extinct animals and plants, while differing more or less in structure from those now living, did not fall below them in the perfection of their organization; that, on the contrary, in many cases indeed, a decline may be traced in this perfection on account of the highly differentiated forms, so that, with Koken, we can only speak of a "modification of limited systematic divisions".

Development may, therefore, take place without progress in organizations, for all forms which have been classified as belonging to the same genus or the same family stand upon the same level of organization. The difference consists essentially in a strong differentiation and specialization of peculiarities, which are subject now to an increase and again to a decrease. By means of this polyphyletic origin of organs, genera, and even new families may easily arise. This may exemplify for us progressive development, which, however, should be strictly distinguished from ascending development. The new forms produced to-day in the breeding of animals or in floriculture, belong entirely to the domain of progressive evolution. Hitherto unproved proofs of ascending development have been lacking in paleontology, nor does experiment supply the deficiency. We may therefore say that the organisms of the geological ages are connected by descent, and that there is good reason for accepting progressive development in the several lines of descent down to the present time. But if we go beyond this and set upon divergent lines developing in the whole world of organisms, or seek to trace all organisms back to a single cell, we abandon the foundation of fact. If, therefore, we infer that a general development cannot be established by the facts, we are still within the lines of the theory of descent, for the essential conception of this theory is that the systematic species of zoology and botany are not rigid and unchangeable, but have developed from ancestors unlike themselves, and may likewise develop into differently formed descendants. It is the business of the theory of development to investigate the facts and causes which underlie the series of organic forms, at the head of which stand the great groups. Consequently it is no essential part of its aim to prove that development is ascending or that it supposes a single original progenitor.

One of the questions involved in this problem is that of the descent of man, which will be touched on here because it has aroused the greatest interest. We may begin by stating that paleontology has, indeed, made known to us an older race of men with very beeting brows and an almost total absence of chin, but that up to now no ape-like progenitors of men have been discovered. Wherever fossil remains of man have been found—and Hitherto they have been found only in the Quaternary period; for all reports of Tertiary man have so far been proved unreliable—men always appear as a true man. So far only a relatively small number of remains of Quaternary man are known (e.g. the skulls of Spy, Neanderthal, and Krupina, and the lower jaws of Schipka, La Quinaute, and Ochros). There is, moreover, the Pithecanthropus erectus, parts of whose skeleton we have, as we shall see, come into the possession of a military surgeon Eugen Dubois in 1891 on the island of Java. Since its discovery it has been industriously brought forward by certain supporters of the theory of development as the long-sought missing link between ape and man. At present, however, it is agreed that this Pithecanthropus is only a large gibbon, at an ape, although there is no doubt that, as regards the size of brain, he should be placed between the largest man-ape now known and man. One more fact must be emphasized. Volz and Elbert have lately investigated the locality in Java where the Pithecanthropus was found, and they have proved incontrovertably that the strata in which these remains were discovered are far nearer to the Quaternary period, that therefore the Pithecanthropus erectus was a contemporary of man and could not be his ancestor.

When we look at Haeckel's "Stammesbauten der Primaten" (Descent of the Primates), the pedagogue seems somewhat hurt under the impression that the order of man are arranged in the following order: Archiprimas, from which are descended the Pachyembryos, including the Lemures, from which in turn the Proterolems are descended, and these are the direct ancestors of the apes. Starting with the ape the descent is continued as follows: Archipithers, the primordial ape; Prothelapes, the pre-cloven-gripping ape; Pithecanthropus alalus, the speechless man-ape; Homo stupidis, the stupid man; and finally Homo sapiens. It will not be uninteresting to examine this line of descent a little more closely. Both the Pachymauroidea and the Nectaromorpha are conceived quite indubitably in the specially indicated forms: Archiprimates, Archipiti, Propliopithecus, Propliochoerus alatus, are pure inventions, not a single bone belonging to them is known, in fact there is nothing to them but their imposing names. Nevertheless, as Klaatsch asserts, it cannot be doubted that there are a sufficient number of facts to lead every thinking man to the inconceivable conclusion that man has sprung from the same source of life as the animal kingdom. The only question is whether, from the similarity of two beings in structure and function of body, in spite of what we know of the phenomena of concurrence, we not only may, but, as Klaatsch says, logically must, infer their genetic connexion in the sense of a blood relationship or of descent from the same basic form? Klaatsch answers this question in the affirmative, but we rather agree with Kathar iner, whose answer is: "At this point our views diverge, and all the more as it is impossible to reach a completely satisfactory conclusion on the origin of mankind by means if either on morphology and ignore man's spiritual development. A discussion on this question based on palaeontological data is fruitless, as the evolution is too greatly influenced by the conception which men have of creation as a whole and of its need of a first cause, of their views on the theory of cognition, and of other subjective considerations." Consequently, neither palaeontology nor morphology can say anything positive concerning the physical origin of man.

When we review the facts of palaeontology, we recognize that this science, while offering probable arguments for a progressive evolution of the organic world, can only to a limited degree—even with the aid of the zoological flora—explain the process of development, and that certain phenomena, such as the complete disappearance of entire large groups, events at present it is satisfactorily explained. The question of the efficient causes of the changes in the organic world has already begotten many theories, to decide the merits of which palaeontology sometimes assists in. Many, in fact, have exceedingly few adherents among palaeontologists. On the other hand, Lamarck's teaching, developed by Cope as natural-mutation meets with continually increasing acceptance. It teaches that the development of organisms rests largely on hereditary changes, produced by the use or non-use of the organs, as well as by correlation and disuse, and many influences, while selection has only a slight, indirect effect. Nevertheless, we must confess, with Duverg, that in our attempts to explain the changes of the present forms of life, which are the results of purely mechanical causes still acting before our eyes, we constantly meet with the action of factors, which we cannot directly understand with the aid of physical science, above all, the knowledge of the phenomena of adaptation is a matter of experience, but the explanation, how such an adaptation of the cell-grounds, or of a complicated body is possible, belongs to the domain of metaphysics.

Whether we speak of new creations, in the sense of A. d'Orbigny, or of the modification of the forms, in both cases we formulate-biological phenomena which are not clear to us in their nature, and the explanation of which by a mechanical method does not satisfy our need of causality.

Palafox y Mendoza, Juan de, Bishop of La Plata de los Angeles in Mexico, b. at Fitero in Navarre, 21 June, 1600; d. at Osuna in Spain, 1 October, 1659. He was a son of De Palafox y Mendoza, Marquess of Aragon. After studies at the University of Salamanca he was appointed member of the Commission of War and of the Indies at the Court of Madrid. In 1629 he renounced this dignity and was ordained priest. He accompanied Princess Mary as almoner to Germany, and upon his return was consecrated Bishop of Palafox y Mendoza, 27 December, 1639, and appointed "visitador general de las Indias" in Mexico. He arrived there, June, 1640. He soon came into conflict with the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Augustinians, whose many exceptions and privileges he looked upon as encroachments on his episcopal jurisdiction. In May, 1642, he received secret advice from Madrid to embrace the papal charge of the Government in place of the viceroy. This Viceroy, who had charged him with financial mismanagement and of secret sympathy with the Portuguese rebels in New Spain. At the same time he was appointed Archbishop of Mexico. From 10 June to 23 November, 1642, he was acting viceroy, but would not accept the dignity of archbishop. During this year and the following month he corrected many financial abuses, framed new statutes for the University of Mexico, and, to root out idolatry among the aborigines, destroyed many Aztec idols and other pagan antiquities collected by preceding viceroys.

In 1647 began his conflict with the Jesuits. The reason of the strife was the numerous exceptions and privileges which the Jesuit missionaries had exjoyed in Mexico since the beginning of the seventeenth century and which, in the opinion of Palafox, undermined his episcopal authority. In a letter to Innocent X, dated 25 May, 1647, he denounced the use the Jesuits were making of their privileges and asked the pope for a decree. The pope answered with a brief, dated 11 May, 1648, in which he sustained the bishop in all disputed points of jurisdiction, but exhorts him to be more kind and lenient towards the Jesuits. A second letter to Pope Innocent X, dated 8 January, 1649, more acrimonious than the first, is attributed to Palafox, but was probably forged by enemies of the Jesuits, as it was written in a defence of his actions which he addressed to Philip IV of Spain in 1652. In May, 1659, Palafox left for Spain. On 27 May, 1653, Pope Innocent X issued a new brief, in which he confirmed his previous decision in favour of Palafox. The bishop was trans-

The process of his canonization was introduced in 1726 under Benedict XIII and was continued during the pontificates of Benedict XIV, Clement XIII, Clement XIV, and Pius VI. At the last session which was held on 24 February, 1777, twenty-six out of forty-one votes favoured his canonization, but Pius VI suspended the final decision. His literary productions, consisting chiefly of ascetical, pastoral, and historical treatises in Spanish, were published in fifteen volumes (Madrid, 1762).

PALATINATE

Palatinate, Rhenish (Ger. Rheinpfalz), a former German electorate. It derives its name from the title of a royal official in the old German Empire, the palgrave (Pfalzgraf) or count palatine. In the Carolingian period the count palatine was merely the representative of the king in the high court of justice. Otto the Great in 937 appointed a count palatine for Bavaria—and subsequently for other duchies also—who also had supervision of the crown lands situated in the duchy, as well as of the imperial revenues payable there, and had to see that the duke did not extend his powers at the king’s expense. The palgrave of Lorraine, who had his seat at Aachen, was later esteemed the foremost in rank. In 1155, after the death of the palgrave Hermann of Stabloek, Frederick Barbarossa transferred the countship to his half-brother Conrad (1133-95), who united the Lorraine counts with his own patrimony in the lower Rhine, the inheritance of the Salic kings. He made his residence at Heidelberg, where he built a strong castle. Thus the palatinate of Lorraine advanced up the Rhine and became the palatinate "of the Rhine". Palasor (of Palliser), Thomas, Venerable, English martyr, b. at Esher, surrey, son of a gentleman, of Northallerton, Yorkshire; d. at Durham, 9 August, 1000. He arrived at Reims 21 July, 1592, whence he set out for Valladolid 21 August, 1592. There he was ordained priest in 1596. He was arrested in the house of John Norton, of Ravensworth, near Lamesley, County Durham, who seems to have been brother of Sir John Norton, of Gascoigne, and Conyers, attainted for his share in the Rebellion of 1599. Norton and his wife (if the above identification be correct, she was his second wife, Margaret, daughter of Christopher Redshaw of Owston) were arrested at the same time, and with them John Talbot, one of the Talbots of Thornton-le-Street, North Rid- ing of Yorkshire, who were tried at Durham and condemned to death, Palasor for being a priest, and the others for assisting him. Another gentleman was condemned at the same time but saved his life by conforming; as they might have done. Mrs. Norton, being supposed to be with child, was reprieved. The others suffered together. Bishop Chaloner tells how an attempt to poison Palasor and his companions made by the gaoler’s wife resulted in the conversion of her maid-servant Mary Day.

Palatinate, Rhenish (Ger. Rheinpfalz), a former German electorate. It derives its name from the title of a royal official in the old German Empire, the palgrave (Pfalzgraf) or count palatine. In the Carolingian period the count palatine was merely the representative of the king in the high court of justice. Otto the Great in 937 appointed a count palatine for Bavaria—and subsequently for other duchies also—who also had supervision of the crown lands situated in the duchy, as well as of the imperial revenues payable there, and had to see that the duke did not extend his powers at the king’s expense. The palgrave of Lorraine, who had his seat at Aachen, was later esteemed the foremost in rank. In 1155, after the death of the palgrave Hermann of Stabloek, Frederick Barbarossa transferred the countship to his half-brother Conrad (1133-95), who united the Lorraine counts with his own patrimony in the lower Rhine, the inheritance of the Salic kings. He made his residence at Heidelberg, where he built a strong castle. Thus the palatinate of Lorraine advanced up the Rhine and became the palatinate "of the Rhine". Neither the lands of the palatinate, nor those which Conrad had inherited, formed a compact whole; but by fur-reigned alone. The Renaissance was zealously fostered; Heidelberg Castle, in which Johann Daniel, Rudolf Agricola, Johannes Reuchlin, Konrad Celtis and others were hospitably received, became the ruling point of the champions of a reform in literature and science, while the university remained unalfeated. After the death of his father, he claimed for his second son Rupprecht, who had married George the Rich of Bavaria-Landshut, this led to a conflict with Albrecht, Duke of Upper Bavaria, who found in his brother-in-law, Emperor Maximilian, a powerful helper. For the Palatinate little was changed by this, for which lasted until 1565; only the city of Neuburg on the Danube with its environs was ceded to the sons of Rupprecht, who had fallen in battle, as the “New Palatinate”, while the rest was given to Upper Bavaria.

In the electoral Palatinate Louis V the Peaceable (1498–1556) succeeded, a man of conservative views, who personally kept aloof from, and regretted the Reformation, but did nothing to withstand it. He added a number of buildings, the last of the Gothic period, to Heidelberg Castle. His brother Frederick III (1514–56), who for a time belonged to the Snaldkabie League, was more ready to give ear to innovations, but in many respects still wavered. Otto Henry of Palatinate, Duke of Lower Bavaria, succeeded to the electoral dignity; the “New Palatinate”, which he now held, was given by him to his relatives of the line of Zweibrücken. Otto Henry (1536–99) enforced the Lutheran Reformation in his lands resolutely and indiscriminately, and added the new humanistic movement to the victory in the University of Heidelberg. In the year 1540 the city of Heidelberg by the building named for him, the Othoheinrichsbaun, the most brilliant creation of the Renaissance on German soil. The electoral dignity and the lands passed to Frederick III (1539–76) of the Palatinate-Simmern line, a family who zealously championed Protestantism. Frederick IV, John Casimir, fought in France for the Protestant cause; his younger brother Christian in the Netherlands, where he fell, 1371, on the Mosker Heath; John Casimir’s son in 1651, as Charles X, ascended the Swedish throne, which the house of Palatinate-Zweibrücken occupied until 1741.

From 1545 to 1685 the ruling family of the Palatinate was the House of Pfalz-Sulzbach. Frederick II, the grandson of Frederick III, was a zealous Calvinist, he made the Palatinate Calvinistic, caused the drawing-up, in 1552, of the Heidelberg Catechism, and sheltered French Huguenots. His son Louis VI (1576–83) brought about a Lutheran reaction; John Casimir, regent from 1573 to 1582 for Louis’s son Frederick IV, restored Calvinism. Frederick IV (1592–1610) attained the leadership of German Protestantism; he was the founder of the Evangelical Union, 1608. Frederick V (1610–23), the husband of the British Princess Elizabeth (daughter of James I), was a man of boundless self-confidence and ambition, and when he took the crown of Bohemia, offered him by the insurgents, the Thirty Years War began. He was defeated at Weißenberg near Prague (1620), not Frederick only not the “Winter Kingdom” but also his electoral Palatinate, which together with the electoral dignity and the Upper Palatinate was transferred in 1623 to Maximilian of Bavaria. The entire burden of the war rested for decades upon the Palatinate; the famous library of Heidelberg was presented to the pope by Tilly, who had captured the city in 1622. At the Peace of Westphalia Frederick’s son, Charles Frederick (1618–50), received the Rhine Palatinate undiminished, but had to give up the Upper Palatinate and he contented with a small territorial vote. In spite of his diminutive resources, he raised a material and intellectual to a highly-developing condition. In contrast with his predecessors he permitted the three great eras of Germany to exist side by side, and received colonists from all lands without questioning them as to their religion. Church and schools found in him a zealous patron: the University of Heidelberg, deserted since 1630, was again opened by him in 1632, and renowned scholars such as Fuchsendorf were appointed to the professorships. In the wars between Germany and France he remained loyal to the emperor; as a consequence his lands suffered severely from the devastation of the French soldiers in the Wars for Reunion. With his incompetent son, Charles Louis (1650–88), the Palatinate-Simmern line became extinct.

With his brother William (1685–99) the government passed to the Catholic line of Palatinate-Neuburg, which by marriage (1611) had come into possession of Julich-Berg, and in 1624 into that of Rapperswill. The elder lands of the family, however, were claimed by Louis XIV for his brother the Duke of Orléans, who was wedded to the sister of Charles Louis, Elizabeth Charlotte. When his claims were rejected Louis in revenge undertook a number of sangiminary expeditions into the Palatinate, particularly in 1688–89, and transformed it into a veritable desert. Heidelberg with its castle, Mannheim, Sinsheim, Bietten, Bruchsal, Durlach, Pforzheim, Baden, Rastatt, and others, as well as numerous villages were given to France. The court was established in Mannheim until 1697, at Ryswick. The son of Philip William, the ostentatious John William (1690–1716), resided at Düsseldorf; during the War of the Spanish Succession, he, for a short time, again obtained for his family the Upper Palatinate. His brother Charles Philip (1716–42), in consequence of friction with the Protestants of Heidelberg, transferred his residence to Mannheim (1720), where he erected a magnificent palace in the French style.

With him the Palatinate-Neuburg line ended; historians averse to Catholicism have painted the religious policy of these three Catholic electors in the blackest colours. In reality, if they gave Catholicism the opportunity to expand without hindrance, and reintroduced the Catholic Divine service in many places, they did nothing more than Protestant princes have at all times done in favour of Protestantism in their dominions, and, in accordance with the principle they laid down, they accorded the same rights to Protestants and Catholics with which the Catholics were treated in the Peace of Westphalia. The occupation of the Palatinate by the French (1688–92) was also to the advantage of the Catholics, as the French gave them complete or joint possession of a number of churches, and the title to the property thus obtained by the Catholics in many places was upheld by the Peace of Ryswick. As the non-Catholics considered these conditions and the introduction of similar concordant services in many churches a great hardship and made complaint to Brandenburg, the leading Protestant power, who threatened reprisals, complete religious liberty was proclaimed for the three chief electrics (Catholics, Lutherans, and Reformed). In the declaration of 1705, the joint use of the churches was declared. The Catholic church was a Catholic and a non-Catholic part. From 1686 Jesuit professors were appointed at Heidelberg; after their suppression Lazarists took their places.

Charles Theodore (1712–99), of the Palatinate-Sulzbach line, succeeded; he promoted the arts and sciences at great expense, so that his reign was later regarded as the Golden Age in the Palatinate. In 1777 Charles Theodore inherited Bavaria; the Palatinate electorate therupon became extinct. Mannheim was given up, and Munich became the seat of the court. In 1794 the French entered the Palatinate and took possession of Mannheim, which they were compelled to surrender to imperial troops under General Wurmser in 1795, and seize again. The armistice of 1796 practically decided the cession to France of that portion of the Palatinate lying on
CATHEDRAL, PALENCIA, AND CHOIR SCREEN
The left bank of the Rhine, which was actually carried out by the Peace of Lunvile in 1501. The successor of Charles Theodore, Max Joseph (1709–1803) of the Palatinate-Zweibrücken line, afterwards King of Bavaria, in August, 1801, formally renounced all claim to the left bank of the Rhine, which the papal envoys received indemnity in the form of secularized church lands. The Palatinate on the right bank of the Rhine, by the decision of the deputation of the estates, 1803, was taken from Bavaria and divided between Baden and Hesse, so that the greater part fell to Baden. After the yoke of Napoleon had been thrown off, the Palatinate on the left bank of the Rhine together with the territory of the former Bishopric of Speyer (so far as this lay to the left of the Rhine) with somewhat modified boundaries was restored to Bavaria, 1815, and at the present time forms the administrative District of Pfalz (Palatinate), which in 1865 had 885,383 inhabitants (201,700 Catholics, 479,694 Protestants, and 9706 Jews). The part of the former electoral Palatinate situated on the right bank of the Rhine, however, in spite of the protest of Bavaria, was retained by Baden and Hesse and the Congress of Aachen recognized, 1818, the right of succession of the Baden-Hochberg line, descended from the second marriage of the above-mentioned called cardinal palatine, with a woman below him in rank, to that part which had been added to Baden, although Louis of Bavaria had claim to these parts of Baden and maintained this claim until 1827. The name Palatinate has since then been confirmed to that administrative district of Baden, which in ecclesiastical affairs forms the Bishopric of Speyer. (See Germany, map; Speyer.)

Palatini (Lat. palatium, "palace"), the designation, primarily, of certain high officials of the papal court. In the early Middle Ages the judices palatini were the official representatives of the papal household; with the growth of the temporal power of the popes they acquired great importance. These judices palatini were: (1) the primicerius notarius and (2) secundicerius notarius, the two superintendents of the papal notary, who superintended the preparation of official documents, conducted judicial investigations, and exercised judicial jurisdiction in legal matters voluntarily submitted by the interested parties to the papal court; they were the highest officers of the papal Chancery and of the Archives in the Lateran Palace. Other palatini were: (3) the nomenclator, or assistens, originally perhaps two distinct officials, who took charge of, and decided upon, petitions to the pope. (The nomenclator was superseded in the course of the ninth century by the protonotarii, or superintendent of the Roman public schools for scribes.) (4) The arcanus and seccularis were the highest financial officers, custodians of the treasures of the Lateran Palace, who had charge of the resident clergy and the collection of tithes. (5) The secundicerius defensorum, being superintendents of the defensoriis, who aided and protected widows, orphans, captives, and other needy persons, had the supervision of charitable institutions.

These various offices developed from the end of the fourth century, with the formation of the papal household. Their functions covered the whole central administration of the papacy, both at Rome and in the diocesan possessions (patrimonio) of the Roman Church. The judicial functions which they performed were also employed by the popes in their capacity as papal envoys; they also had definite duties in the solemn processions and other great church ceremonies at which the pope was present in person. Their authority continued down to the middle of the eleventh century, when the reform of the papal administration, inaugurated after many troubles of the tenth century, placed the cardinals in that position at the Roman curia, which the judicis palatini had previously occupied, and the latter gradually disappeared. In later times the designation palatini has been borne (1) by certain cardinals, whose position brings them into constant relations with the pope, and who formerly resided in the papal palace, and (2) by the highest prelates of the pope's personal suite. Until very recent times the cardinalis palatini were: the cardinal-prodatory, the cardinal-secretary of State, the cardinal-secretary of Brie, and the cardinal-secretary of Memorials. Pius IX has abolished the two last-mentioned positions; the holders of the other two are also called cardinal palatini or *palatini", but only the cardinal-secretary of State actually lives in the Vatican. The palatini palatini are: the major-domo (maggiordomo), the high chamberlain (maestro di camerai), the auditor of the pope (uditore santissimo), and the pope's theologian (maestro del sacro palazzo). The last-named is always a Dominican, was separated from the Diocese of Jaro (q. v.) on 11 April, 1910, and confined to the Augustinians. The first prefect Apostolic is Mgr. Fernando Hermand y'Anenas, who resides at Puerto Príncipe. The Jesuits and Sisters of St. Paul have houses on Cuba where a beper segment under government control has been established.

Palencia, Diocese of (Palentina), comprises the civil provinces of Palencia, Santander, Valladolid, Burgos, and Leon. Palencia, the capital of the province of that name, has a population of 15,050. Flórez dates the origin of the diocese from the first centuries. Its bishop may have been among those assembled in the third century to depose Basilius, Bishop of Astorga. According to Ita orus the city of Palencia was almost destroyed (457) in the wars between the Suevi and the Visigoths. The Priscillianists were banished by Ataulf in Gafecia, and spread over the Tierra de Campos. It was strongly opposed by St. Toribius, Bishop of Astorga. Maurilia, an Arian bishop placed by LeoI, in Palencia, abjured that heresy when King Reared (587) was converted, and in 589 he assisted at the Third Council of Toledo. Comunáus, the biographer of St. Idefoncusz assisted at the synod held in Toledo in 606, and at the fourth, fifth, and sixth Toledoan Councils. He composed many new ecclesiastical melodies and a book of prayers from the Psalms. He ruled the see for more than thirty years, and had for pupil St. Franciscus of Braga.

To defend his new country, Alfonso I devastated the Campos Góticos (Gotthic Fields), i.e. the Tierra de Campos, as far as the Duero. The Arabian authors only once cite Palencia in the division of the provinces prevalent to the Omeyyad dynasty. In the Council of Toledo (811) we find Abundantius, Bishop of Palencia, but he was apparently only a titular bishop. Froths, Count of Villafuerte, succeeded in restoring the see in 921, but the true restoror was Sancho the Elder, of Navarre and Castile. The first prelate of the restored see (1035) is said to have been Bernardo, who was given command over the city and its lands, with the various castles and abbeys. Bernardo was born in France or Navarre, and devoted himself to the construction of the original cathedral built over the crypt of St. Antohus of Tarentum. It was rebuilt three centuries later. Its principal treasure was the relics of St. Antohus, formerly venerated in Aqaba in Moab.

Alfonso I conferred many privileges on Bernardo's successor, Raimundo Pedro, a native of Agen (France) and one of the noted men born in his time. Bernardo of Toledo, succeeded Bishop Raimundo. For his fidelity to Queen Uanna, he was imprisoned by Alfonso III of Aragon. In 1142, a provincial council was held in Palencia by Archbishop Bernardo to quell the disorders of the epoch. On the liberation of Pedro, another council was held in Palencia during the Lent of 1129, at which Raimundo, Archbishop of Toledo, and the celebrated Archbishop of Santiago, Diego Celendin, assisted. The long and beneficent administration of Pedro was succeeded by that of Pedro II, who died in Albret and was succeeded by Raimundo II. Bishop Tello took part in the battle of Las Navas de Tolosa in 1212, where the Palencians won the right to emblazon the cross over their castle.

At the beginning of the fifteenth century Bishop Andac de Ropas valiantly fought the Moors of Antequered, and in the Treaty of Caspe aided the Infante Ferdinand in the crown of Aragon. St. Vincent Ferrer preached in Palencia, converting thousands of Jews, with whose synagoghe he founded the hospital of St. Salvador, later connected with that of St. Anthony. Among the succeeding bishops of Palencia, who, as a nobility, were members of the noblest families, we may mention Rodrigo de Velasco (d. 1335); Rodrigo Sanchez de Arcedo, author of a history of Spain in La in 1406; the bishops Mendoza (1472-1485) and Lezca (1450-1511), who decorated the new cathedral of Pedro de Castilla (1410-1416); Fray Alonso de Borgos (1485-1489); La Casca (1530-1561), and Zuloaga (1561-1574).

The Diocese of Palencia was founded by Alfonso VIII at the request of Bishop Tello Téllez de Meneses and was the first university of Spain. It was the model upon which was patterned the University of Salamanca. Study began to flourish in Palencia and men notable for their virtue and science came from its schools, among them St. Julian of Cuenca, St. Dominic, and St. Peter González Téllez; hence the adage: "En Palencia armas y ciencia." (In Palencia arms and science.) The university was founded about 1212, shortly after the aforesaid victory of "Las Navas" (others say in 1208), and the king summoned from France and Italy noted teachers of various arts and sciences, retaining them in Palencia on large salaries. The death of the founder in 1234, the minority of Henry III, and the growth of its fortunate rival, Salamanca, caused the decay of Palencia, many of whose professors and students went to Salamanca, whence the erroneous belief of a transfer of the university to the latter place. In 1243 Archbishop Rodrigo records that in spite of unpropitious events, study continued in Palencia and that the cardinal legate, Juan de Albizurre, in a Council of Valladolid (1228) had endeavored to revive it. Bishop Fernando obtained from Urban IV (14 May, 1263) a bull granting to the professors and students of Palencia all the privileges of the University of Paris. But lack of financial support and the proximity of the prosperous University of Salamanca made a revival of Palencia impossible, and it died out before the end of the thirteenth century, probably in 1264, at which time the university was definitely transferred to Burgos.

Palencia is famous for the great Benedictine monastery of St. Zoilo, a rocco monument, the work of Juan de Badajoz. Mention has already been made of the hospital of S. Barnabé and S. Antolin. The conciliar seminary was founded in 1584 by Bishop Alvaro de Mendoza.

Pallepolis (Paleopolis), a titular see of Asia Minor, suffragan of Ephesus. The history of this city is unknown. In the sixth century it is mentioned by Hierocles (Synecdemus), 690, 4. It is found in the "Notitiae Episcopatuum", as late as the sixteenth century, among the suffragan sees of Ephesus. It is now the town of Bahambi in the valley of Smyrna. Le Quien (Origens christianmans, I, 729) mentions seven bishops of this city known by their presence at the councils: Rhodos at Ephesus, 431; Basileus at Chalcedon, 431; Ephesus at Constantinople, 330; Gregory at Nicaea, 787; Peter at Constantinople, 869; Julian at Constantinople, 879.

Paletotti, GABRIELE, Cardinal, Archbishop of Bologna, b. at Bologna, 4 October, 1522; d. at Rome, 22 July, 1597. Having acquired, in 1546, the title of Doctor of Civil and Canon Law, he was appointed to teach civil law. In 1549 he became canon of the cathedral, but he did not become a priest until later. He gave up teaching in 1553, and although he had many times refused the episcopal dignity, he became in 1556 auditor of the Rota. Thus IV sent him to the Council of Trent where he played an important rôle. His "Diariorum," or journal, on the proceedings of the council, forms one of the most important documents for its history. The complete text will be published in the third volume of the "Concilium Tridentinum," Diarium, Actaarah, Epistularum, tractatum nova collectio, edidit Societas Gregoriana" (Freiburg; see Vol. I, ed. S. Merkle, p. XXXVI, Freiburg, 1901). A résumé was published by Mendham (London, 1842) and Theiner ("Acta Concilii Tridentini," Agram, 1874, II, 523-580). After the council Paletotti became one of the commission of cardinals and prelates that served as a basis of the Congregation of the Council. On 12 March, 1565, he became cardinal, and on 13 January, 1567, was made Bishop of Bologna; he was also the first archbishop, for in 1582 this see became an archiepiscopal. His biographers never cease praising his zeal in introducing the Tridentine reforms in his diocese, which was inhabited by the Savoia family and others of the house of Savoy. In 1592 he was made Bishop of Saint Charles Borromeo at Milan. The latter held him in high esteem. In 1589 Paletotti became Cardinal-Bishop of Albano and in 1591 of Sabina. There also he distinguished himself by his zeal for reform. At the conclave in 1590 which elected Gregory XIV, he obtained the votes of an important minority. His principal works are: "De nothis spurnatis filibus libri IV" (Bologna, 1580; Frankfort, 1575; The Hague, 1655); "De sacris et profanis imaginibus libri V" (Bologna, 1582; Ingoldstadt, 1594); "Episcopale Bononiensis civicitate" (Bologna, 1580), and "Archiepiscopale Bononiensis civitatis" (Rome, 1594), remarkable works dealing with the good administration of a diocese; "De sacris consistori consultationibus" (Ingoldstadt, 1594; Rome, 1596); "De bono seculitatis" (Rome, 1595).

Palermo, ARCHIEPISCOPATE OF (Panormitana), in Sicily. The city is built on an inlet of the Mediterranean and is partly surrounded, to the south, by a semicircle of mountains and hills, of which the highest are the Catalani to the east, and Montepellegrino to the west. Among the churches are the Duomo, built in 1170 by the Archbishop Gualtiero Offalino on the site of an ancient basilica which had been destroyed by an earthquake during the Saracen domination. The walls are decorated with frescoes and mosaics of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In the first chapel on the right are six tombs of kings and queens of Sicily. Other objects of interest in the cathedral are sculptures by Gagini and by Villaravale; an Assumption by Velasquez, and other rich paintings. The latter are in the tombs of archbishops of Palermo, and the Liebherather, archions, or archives with interesting Latin, Greek, and Arabic documents. S. Domenico (1309), restored in 1411 and in 1640 is the largest and one of the most beautiful churches of Palermo; it contains the tombs of many famous Sicilians; also paintings by Anemol, Fovulli, Palli, and others. In the basilica of the Piazza della Cattedrale, there is a beautiful Madonna, said to be by Raphael or by Lorenzo di Credi. S. Giorgio dei Genovesi, which represents the most beautiful architecture of the sixteenth century in Palermo, has paintings by Palma Vecchio, Giordano, Paladino, and others. La Badia Nuova has paintings by Morrealese, by whom also are the frescoes in the vault of the church. At S. Giuseppe there are two admirable crucifixes, one in ivory, and the other in bronze, works of Fra Ubaldo da Petraia, and also paintings by Tancredi, Mattia della Jasmine, Velasquez. L'Annunziata, called la Martorana, was built by George of Antioch, an admiral of King Roger (twelfth century); it is famous for its mosaics and for a painting, the Ascension, by Anemola. At Santa Maria di Gessi there are paintings of the thirteenth century. Other churches of note are: S. Domenico (1220); S. Matteo (seventeenth century), which has the "Sposalizio" by Novelli; S. Eufemia, of the Cataldi; Santa Maria la Nova (1329), which has a fine portico; the church and the seminary "de greo", dating, respectively, from 1340 and 1734. S. Cita, connected with the military hospital, which has a Madonna by C. Maratta; the church of the Caneclère (1174), built by Matteo d'Aiello, chancellor of King William the Good; S. Caterina; S. Cataldo, which is in the Greek-Norman style; Santa Maria degli Angeli; S. Giacomo in Mazara (Norman); the parish church "dell'Albergheria", which has a fine belfry; S. Giovanni dell'Origliasso; the Badia, also of the Teutonic Order, which has a Pietà by Gagini; S. Giacomo la Martorana (1334); S. Anna la Misericordia (statues by Gagini). Among the secular buildings is the Palazzo Reale, built on the site of the Saracen fortress by the Norman kings. It was a mass of halls, of silk and of wool factories, churches, chapels, and towers; of the latter, only one remains, that of S. Ninfa, which, since 1791, has been the seat of the astronomical observatory. It was from this observatory that Ceres, the first of the asteroids to be observed, was discovered by the Theatine Padre Piazzi (1801). The Palazzo dei Tribunali was the property of the Chiaromonte family, but was confiscated and served as the seat of the Inquisition. The university has a magnificent portico, and contains the Museo Nazionale and also a picture gallery with a Pietà by Spagnoletto, a Holy Family by Rubens, a Madonna with angels by Rizzalone, etc. Other buildings are the Soprintendenza agli Archivi di Stato; the Palazzo Firenze (1578),formerly the curia of the papacy and the residence of the other institutions; the tower of the Palazzolo, which dates from the Saracen period; the former college of the Jesuits, which contains a library (now national) of 120,000 volumes and 1269 MSS.; the private palaces, Amintomartino, Panotracano, (collection of paintings), Tiliba (art collection and library), Forcella, Butera, and others. There are, moreover, a conservatory of music, several educational institutes, and two other public libraries, one of the commune, and the other of the Oratorio di S. Filippo Neri. Outside the city, are the cave of St. Rosalia, where her relics were found, which has been transformed into a church; S. Giacomo del Cassaro, in spirito, where the first episode of the famous Sicilian Venetian comic opera "I Capriccio" is set; the ancient convent of Baida on the slopes of Mt. Agnano. Palermo is a city of Phoenician origin, the name of which means "surrounded by rocky cliffs". In time, it came under the rule of the Carthagians. In 212, however, the Punic dominion was invaded and Palermo retained its form of government, but under Augustus became a colony; and the Greek language, which under the Carthagians was the predominant tongue of the city, little by little ceded its place to the Latin. The Saracens obtained possession of Palermo for a time in 1260, but in 1284 their rule was established permanently. As in Naples, the Phocian soldiers, in a successful attempt to take Palermo. Finally, Roger, abetted by the treason of the Christian soldiers in Palermo, took the city in 1071, and made it the capital of his Sicilian possessions. Under Roger II, it became the capital of Sicily, which it remained, until the conquest by Charles of Anjou. Under the Normans the arts and letters (Greek, Arabic, and Latin) flourished at Palermo, and the Mohammedan religion was tolerated, the kings being only too zealous inruits of the custom of the caliphs. The famous Sicilian Vespers (1 March, 1282) were the signal of revolt against the Angevin domination, in favour of Peter, King of Aragon, who was hailed as legitimate heir of the kings of Conrads; and in the new Kingdom of Sicily, Palermo again became a capital. At the death of Martin I (1049) Sicily was united with the Kingdom of Aragon, and at Palermo was governed by its own viceroy, independent of those of Naples, after the conquest of the latter state by the Aragonese. In fact, the customs of Sicily, and especially of the nobility, were left unchanged under Spanish rule, which was therefore peaceful, although the conduct of the troops of Diego Veron, returning from Tripoli in 1541, caused a sort of Second Vespers, soon suppressed, but by the vicereign Moncado. This was another more serious revolt, contemporaneous with that of Masaniello at Naples; it took place in 1617, and was caused by a famine. The new governor, Cardinal Trivulzio, combining severity and clemency, re-established order. From 1713 to 1720, Sicily was again separated from the Kingdom of Naples, and then united at Palermo. Afterwards, the island followed the fortunes of Naples, under the Bourbons. In 1788, the royal family was driven by the Revolution to seek refuge in Sicily, and again by the French occupation in 1806. The suppression of Sicilian autonomy was the cause of several revolutionary movements at Palermo. An independent Vicereign Moncado was created, with Cardinal Gravina at its head; on this occasion peace was re-established with Austrian aid. In 1848 a provisional government was established that offered the crown of Sicily to Ferdinand of Savoy, who, however, did not accept it. General Filangieri retrieved Palermo fourteen months later; and finally, Carabia overthrew the Bourbon government, and substituted for it, not the autonomy of Sicily, but the annexation of the island to the Kingdom of Italy. A last movement in favour of independence was made in 1866, but was quelled in its beginning.

Charity was preached at an early date in Palermo. According to Prudentinus (1, 6), its bishop, Theodorus, together with the Bishop of Lilybarum, condemned the heresy of Hesecleum, Theodorus being a contemporary of Pope St. Alexander (second decade of the eleventh century); his predecessor, it is said, was St. Philippus. The Bishop, St. Mandelius, who is said to have suffered martyrdom under Diocletian, and whose relics are preserved in the cathedral, may be identical with St. Mandelius, whom the Vandals relegated to the island of Monte Cristo in 530. Other martyrs under Diocletian were Claudius, Sabinus, and Maximus. Among these bishops were Gratianus, 585, Victor who died in 604, and Joannes, 603; St. Gregory the Great was in correspondence with the last named, Felix, 619, and Theodorus, 787. During the Saracen domination there appears to have been no bishop of Palermo; it was in that period (828) that SS. Philaretus and Olivia suffered martyrdom. In 1019, Leo IX sent to Sicily the Benedictine, who later became Bishop of Silva Caetani; but the Normans, then enemies of the pope, prevented the archbishop from landing. In 1063, Bishop Nesorenos was appointed. Other bishops were Melchior (1083); Guaterius (1113), the first to bear the title of archbishop, although the pallium had been sent to Joannes (969); Stephaneus (1196), compelled by his enemies to resign; Gaudiero Offamiglio (of the Mill), an Englishman, who died in 1191; Bartolemeo (1201), brother of the preceding, who was sent into exile; Gaudiero da Polena, who was appointed in 1201 by Innocent III and transferred to Catania, Parisius being installed in his stead; Berardo di Castiglia (1214-52), a great diplomat and a mediator between the popes and Frederick II; Licio de Colle (1296), a benefactor of the cathedral; Bartolomeo de Anghelu (1305); Francesco da Antonio (1311); Giovanni Orsini (1320); Matteo Orsini (1371); Nicolò d'Agri- giato, O. Min. (1383); Lodovico Bonanto (1387) and Giilforte Riccobono (1397), both persecuted by the Chiaramonte faction; Nicolò da Tudesco (1434-1445), a great canonist (Panormitanus) and one of the pillars of the Council of Basle, who became a cardinal of the antipope, Felix V; Simone Becattili (1445), a generous restorer of the cathedral and of other churches; Nicolò Puxades (1466), who caused the stalls of the choir of the cathedral to be adorned with inlaid work; Giovanni Borghi (1467), who had been a famous physician; Filippo (1471), who was a nephew of Emperor Frederick; and under the walls of Granada in 1488; Cardinal Pietro, Count of Foix, O. Min. (1585); Cardinal Tommaso de' Picco, O.P. (Caelanus), who was elected in 1519, but not recognized by Charles V, the pope not recognizing Giano Carrandolet, the king's candidate; Ottaviano Preconi, O. Min. (1552), zealot for the decrees of Ignatius (1578), who founded the seminary; Cardinal Gnanetto Doria (1600-42), who was for a time vicereign and reformed the navy, and distinguished himself for his charity during the famine of 1621; Martin de Leon y Cardenas (1650), who donated the beautiful tabernacle of the cathedral; Pietro Martire di Rubio (1650), who was the first to extinguish the flames which had obstructed the use of the matre for his canons; Cardinal Domenico Pigatteli (1832); Cardinal Petro Gravina (1816); Cardinal Gaetano M. Trigona e Parisi (1832); Cardinal Ferdinando M. Pigatteli (1839), who had been a general of the Neptunis; Cardinal Geronimo Celestis (1871-1904). Cefalu, Mazara, and Trapani, are the suffragans of Palermo; the archiepiscopal has 59 parishes, with 411,982 inhabitants, 18 religious houses of men and 24 of women, 12 educational establishments for male students and 27 for girls, and 1 Catholic daily paper.

University of Palermo—The Convent of St. Dominic of Palermo may be considered the nucleus of the future University of Palermo. In this convent instruction was given in theology and philosophy, not only for the Dominicans, but also for the public. In 1480 Father Tommaso Schifaldio gave lessons there in Latin literature. A theological lecturer, Father Salvo Cassetta, had so far a following that he lectured in the public square; he was also well versed in mathematics. In 1533 the council wished to have a medical school and called upon the famous Gianfilippo Ingrassia. His lectures too were delivered at the Convent of St. Dominic. In 1555 the commune also engaged Dominican professors of philosophy, including the historian Fuzello. The chair of jurisprudence was founded in 1556, and the first professor was Giovanni Antonio de Conto. The faculty of theology was founded in 1554, and in 1559 the number of chairs was increased. The college had the right of conferring degrees in these two sciences. The courses of the Jesuits were well attended.
In 1632 the Jesuit Pietro Salerno, gave his patrimony to the university which was about to be established in the college of the order. The royal concession was obtained and furthermore there was a creation of a division between the rector of the college and the archbishop, each of whom desired to be chancellor; this controversy hindered the formation of the university itself, that is, of the two other faculties, law and medicine. Courses in medicine were begun until 1621 in the Speculare Ognasi (Academy of Anatomy) through the initiative of Dr. Baldassare Grassi. On the failure of this, another similar course began in 1645, in the house of Caniullini, which course continued, supplemented by instruction in mathematics. On the suppression of the Jesuits, their college was entrusted to secular priests. In 1777 the Senate of Palermo began to create a complete university, which was established 1779 with three chairs in theology, four in law, six in medicine, seven in philosophy and the natural sciences. The great professors were Spedalieri in philosophy, Carli in law, Sergi in political economy, Father Bernardino d’Ugria and the Benedictine Enrico Barone in the natural sciences, Maronglia in mineralogy, and Barone himself. In 1780 these chairs were added, and in the following year the university changed its name to the University of Palermo, and conferred degrees. In 1805 it was enacted that the rectors shall be taken from the Theatine Order which furnished many renowned professors, e.g., the astronomer Piazzia (1756). When the Jesuit Order was re-established, the academy had to change its place, and in the same month that the said academy took the name of university, some of the previous professors we may mention: Scia, Gorgone, Amari, Ugeldone, and the late Caniullino (1826-1910).

The university has the usual four faculties of jurisprudence, medicine, letters, and philosophy and sciences, besides a practical school for engineers and a college for the practice of medicine. It contains a garden, a cabinet of physics, including chemistry, mineralogy, geology, physiology, and anatomy, an astronomical observatory, various chairs and an archaeological museum. The number of students in 1909 was 1358; regular professors, 68; special professors, 111. It supports 84 chairs, and more than 123 teachers.

Palestrina, DIocese OF (PRestENesInSSIS): the town of Palestrina, in the province of Rome, central Italy, is the ancient Praeneste, situated on the Via Labicana, the origin of which was attributed by the ancients to Ulysses, or to another fabulous personage. It is first mentioned in history as an ally of Rome against the Latins, in 496 B.C. From 373 to 376, however, it was in continual war against Rome or her allies, and was defeated by Cincinnatus; in 354 and in 355 it lost portions of its territory. Thereafter it was always an ally of Rome, but disowned Roman citizenship in 1291. In 1529, when the concession was yielded, it was taken and sacked by Sulla; later, under Tiberius II, it became a municipium. It was a summer resort of the Romans, who indiffered the language and the rough manners of its inhabitants. The modern town is built on the ruins of the famous temple of Fortuna Primigenia. From the eleventh century, it was a lie of the Church; and its indulgences were a frequent source of revenue to popes; consequently, it was several times destroyed, as in 1297, by order of Boniface VIII, and in 1436, by Giovanni Vitelleschi, at the command of Eugenius IV. It was rebuilt in 1417, sacked in 1527, and occupied by the Duke of Alba, in 1528. In 1530, it was sold to the Barberini. The town contains the remains of cyclopean walls and of the aforesaid great temple of Fortune. The cathedral has fine paintings and frescoes. In the Church of St. Rosalia (1677) there is an admirable Pietà, carved in the solid rock. Palestrina is the birthplace of the architect Andrea Palladio and of the prince of sacred music, Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina. The feast of St. Peter relates to the martyrdom of St. Agapitus, patron of the cathedral, which took place under Aurelian; this basilica was restored and enriched with costly gifts by Leo III. Scenulus, Bishop of Palestrina, was, at the Council of Rome (314), and the names of several other of its bishops in ancient times are known. From the sixth century there was a flourishing monastery on the site of Castel S. Pietro, overlooking the city. After the seventh century, the Bishop of Palestrina was one of the hebdomadary prelates for the services of the Lateran basilica, and was, therefore, a cardinal; he is the fourth, in order of the cardinal-bishops. Among the prelates of this see may be mentioned Gregory, who in 757 consecrated the antipope Constantine; Andreas, legate of Adrian I to King Desiderius, in 772; Petrus (996), the first to bear the title of cardinal; Uberto (1073), legate of Gregory VII to Henry IV; Conon (1111), who embellished the crypt of St. Agapitus; S. Stefano (1122), a Cistercian monk, who took possession of the Abbey of Bel- piety; Guarino Guarni (1144), a Regular Can of St. Augustine, famous for his virtues; Manfredo (1166) who persuaded Barbarossa to become reconciled with Alexander III; Paolo Scolari (1181), later Clement III; Blessed Guido de Pare (1190), a Cistercian; Jacopo Pecoraria (1213); Stefano III (1214), previously Archibishop of Gran; Girolamo d’Albani (1276), a Franciscan, later Nicholas IV; Pietro d’Anablay (1306), Grand Chancellor of France; Simon de Langham (1356), an Englishman. During the schism, the popes of Avignon, also, appointed cardinal-bishops of Palestrina. Thereafter, as a result of the custom that the jurisdiction to the cardinal-bishop of Palestrina and to other suburban sees, the rule of the prelates of Palestrina was of short duration. Among those who followed were Hugues de Lusignan (1341), a brother of the King of Cyprus; Guglielmo Brissone (1507), deposed by Julius II for attending the conciliabule of Pisa; Lorenzo Casteggio (1533), Giovanni Carafa (1539); Giovanni M. Moroney (1539); Later Julius III; Louis de Bourbon (1550); Federico Cesi (1557); Giovanni Morone (1562); Cristoforo Madrucci (1564); Gian Antonio Serbelloni (1578); Marcantonio Colonna (1578); Alessandro Medici (1602); later Leo XI; Guido Bentivoglio (1614); Affonso de la Queva (1644); Carlo Barboni (1646), who founded the seminary; Palazzo Alti (1691); Girolamo Spina (1677); Aurelio Rovarella (1699), who died an exile in France, in 1712; Diego Caracciolo (1814); Giuseppe Spina (1820); Castruccio Castracani degli Antelminelli (1841). The sanctuary of Our Lady of Good Counsel of Genazzano is in this diocese; here, also, are the ancient see of Gabii, ten bishops of which, between the fifth and the ninth centuries, are known, and that of Subangusta, four bishops of which are known between 456 and 502. The diocese has 24 parishes, 5,700 inhabitants, 10 religious houses of men, 14 of women, and 3 girls’ schools.

Palestrina, GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI DA, the greatest composer of liturgical music of all time, b. at Palestrina (ancient Praeneste) in 1525 or 1545, according to Baint, Riemann, and others, according to Solis, in 1526; d. at Rome, 2 February, 1594. His early history is practically unknown. Giuseppe Ottavia Pittoni (1657-1731), in “Notizie dei maestri di cappella si di Roma che altrimente, 1500-1700”, a manuscript in the Vatican, relates that young Pierluigi sang in the streets of Rome while offering for sale the products of his parents' farm and that he was heard on such an occasion by the choir-master of Santa Maria Maggiore, who, impressed by the boy's beautiful voice and pronounced musical talent, educated him musically. As to the identity of the choir-master, tradition gives no clue. But Palestrina was taught by Jacques Arcadelt (1514–60), choir-master and composer in Rome from 1539 to 1549. The opinion, so long held, that Claude Goudimel (1505–72) was his principal teacher has now been definitely abandoned. As far as is known, he began his active musical life as organist and choir-master in his native city in 1541; his reputation increasing, in 1551 he was called to Rome, entrusted with the direction and musical formation of the choir-boys at St. Peter's, and within the same year was advanced to the post of choir-master. In 1554 he dedicated to Julius III (1554–55) his first compositions, a volume of masses for four voices, and was rewarded with the appointment as a member of the papal chapel in contravention of the rules governing that body. The pope had set aside the rule requiring those who held membership in the papal choir to be in Holy orders, and also used his authority to exempt him from the usually severe entrance examination. These circumstances and the further fact that his voice was much inferior to those of the other singers, aroused the opposition, and antagonism of his fellow-members. The papal singers did not appreciate the object of the pope, which was to secure for the gifted young man the necessary leisure to compose.

In the course of the same year, Palestrina published a volume of madrigals. The texts of some of these the composer himself in later years considered too free. In the dedication of his setting of Canticles to Gregory XIII, he expresses not only regret but repentance, for having caused scandal by this publication. Marcellus II, as cardinal, had protected and admired Palestrina, but died after a reign of only twenty-one days. Paul IV, shortly after his accession, re-inforced the former rules for the government of the papal choir. Besides Palestrina, there were two other lay married members in the choir. All were dismissed with a small pension, in spite of the understanding that these singers were engaged for life. The worry and hardship caused by the dismissal brought on an illness and death. The composer took charge, 1 October, 1556, of the choir at St. John Lateran, where he remained until February, 1561. During this period he wrote, besides Lamentations and Magnificats, the famous "Improperia." Their performance by the papal choir on Good Friday was ordered by Paul IV, and they have remained in its repertoire for Holy Week ever since. This production greatly increased Palestrina's fame. In 1561 he asked the chapter of St. John Lateran for an increase in salary, in view of his growing needs and the expense of publishing his works. Refused, he accepted a similar post at Santa Maria Maggiore, which he held until 1572. It is not known at what period of his career Palestrina came under the influence of St. Philip Neri, but there is every reason to believe he was in early youth. As the saint's pietent and spiritual disciple, he gained that insight into the spirit of the liturgy, which enabled him to set it forth in polyphonic music as it had never before been done. It was his spiritual formation even more than his artistic maturity, which fitted him for the providential part he played in the reform of church music.

The task of hastening the reforms decreed by the Council of Trent was entrusted by Pius IV to a commission of eight cardinals. A committee of two of these, St. Charles Borromeo and Vitellozzi Vetelli, was appointed to consider certain improvements in the discipline and administration of the papal choir, and to this end they associated to themselves, eight of the choir members. Cardinal Vetelli caused the singers to perform certain compositions in his presence, in order to determine what measures could be taken for the preservation of the integrity and distinct declamation of the text in compositions in which the voices were interwoven. St. Charles, as chancellor of his uncle, Pius IV, was the patron of Palestrina, increasing his pension in 1565. He celebrated a solemn Mass in presence of the pontiff on 19 June, 1565, at which Palestrina's great "Missa Papae Marcelli" was sung. These historical data are the only discoverable basis for the legends, so long repeated by historians, concerning the trial before the cardinals and pope of the cause of polyphonic music, and its refutation by Palestrina, in the composition and performance of three masses, the "Missa Papae Marcelli" among them. Haberl's studies of the archives conclusively demolished these fictions, but their continued repetition for nearly two hundred years emphasizes the fact of Palestrina's activity, inspired by St. Philip and encouraged by St. Charles, in the reform of church music, an activity which embraced his entire career and antedated by some years the disciplinary measures of the church authorities.

The foundation of his reform is the two principles legitimately deduced from the only references to church music in the Tridentine decrees: (1) the elimination of all themes reminiscient of, or resembling, secular music; (2) the rejection of musical forms and elaborations tending to mutilate or obscure the liturgical text. Pius IV created for Palestrina the office of "Composer to the Papal Chapel" with an increased salary. In his office he had the special responsibility of the Masses at St. Peter's and for the Oratory of St. Philip Neri. Besides the duties of choirmaster at St. Peter's, composer to the papal chapel, director of music at St. Philip's Oratory, he also taught at the school of music of Giovanni Maria Nanini. In addition, Gregory XIII commissioned him to prepare a new version of the Gregorian chants. His exact share in the edition of the Antiphonary published under the name of "editio Medicea" because printed in a press belonging to Cardinal de' Medici, and what was prepared by his pupil Giovanni Guidetti, Felice Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina After an original in the musical archives of the Vatican Museum
Aerio, and Francesco Suriano, has long been a matter of controversy. The undertaking was not particularly congenial to Palestrina and kept him from original production, his real field of activity. His wife's death in 1580 affected him profoundly. His sorrow found expression in two compositions, Psalm cxxxi, "By the waters of Babylon", and a motet on the words of Psalm cxviii, "A mighty fortress is our God". It might come to judge the world, how shall I stand before the face of Thy anger, my sins frighten me, woe to me, O Lord". With these he intended to close his creative activity, but with the appointment in 1581 as director of music to Prince Buoncompagni, nephew of Gregory XIII, he began perhaps the most brilliant period of his long life. Among other works, he composed hymns in honour of the Blessed Virgin, and masses, he produced the work which brought him the title of "Prince of Music", twenty-nine motets on words from the "Canticle of Canticles". According to his own statement, Palestrina intended to reproduce in his composition the Divine love expressed in the Canticle, so that his own heart might be touched by a spark thereof. For the enrichment of Sixtus V, he wrote a five-part motet and mass on the theme to the text "Tu es pastorum ovum", followed a few months later by one of his greatest productions, the mass "Assumpta est Maria". Sixtus had intended to appoint him director of the choir of St. Peter's, but the refusal of the singer to be directed by a layman, prevented the execution of his plan. During the last years of his life Palestrina wrote his great "Lamentations", settings of the liturgical hymns, a collection of motets, the well-known "Stabat Mater" for double chorus, litanies in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the oratorios for the ecclesiastical year. His works, in thirty-three volumes, edited by Theodore de Witt, Franz Espagne, Franz Conner, and from the tenth volume on, by Habel, are published by Breitkopf and Hartel; Mgr Habel presented the last volume of the completed edition to Pius X on Easter Monday, 1908. Palestrina's significance lies not so much in his unprecedented gifts of mind and heart, his creative and constructive powers, as in the fact that he made them the medium for the expression in tones of the state of his own soul, which, trained and formed by St. Philip, was attuned to and felt with the Church. His creations will all stand forth as the musical embodiment of the spirit of the counter-reformation, the triumphal Church.

Pall, a heavy, black cloth spread over the coffin in the church at a funeral, or over the catafalque at other services for the dead. In the centre of it there is generally a white or red cross. It must always be black, but its material and ornamentation may vary. Symbols of death, such as skulls, cross-bones etc., forbidden on the altar and ministerial vestments, are allowed on pall. The pall is in universal use, though not prescribed. Where, however, there is no catafalque or bier, absolution may not be given except a black cloth be extended on the floor of the sanctuary (8 R. C., 1833, 5).

Palladio, Andrea, Italian architect, b. at Vicenza, 1508; d. at Venice, 19 Aug., 1570. There is a tradition that he was the son of a poor carpenter, with no surname of his own, and that the famous humanist poet, Gian Giorgio Trissino, became his patron and gave him the name of Palladio, in fanciful allusion to Pallas, the Greek goddess of wisdom. After a brief apprenticeship as a sculptor, he travelled and studied in Italy and under masters of architecture, in order to determine its principles by the aid of Vitruvius's writings. The result of all his labours which he constructed, of which the earliest known is the Palazzo Godi at Loneda (1540). The execution of his design for the rebuilding of the basilica in his native town was commenced in 1549. The colonnades of this basilica is his most famous work. His Aro di Tritonou, also at Vicenza, is even now the best modern imitation of a Roman triumphal arch. A fine sense of proportion, combined with scholarly refinement and fertility of invention, characterizes the palaces of Vicenza, where Palladio had a free hand.

He was a favorite of society in and about Vicenza, and was therefore a most prolific designer of villas.
Few of these were ever completed, many have been changed or dismantled, and nearly all have lost the environment of gardens and accessorial elements which were a necessary part of the composition.

All are, however, stately, spacious and airy, effective in mass, dignified in detail, and free from affectation. Two standard types are the Villa Capra, in the environs of Vicenza, and the Villa Giustinian at Treviso.

Only three sacred buildings are surely his work, the small chapel near the last-named of the routes to Vicenza, and the churches of San Giorgio (1565) and II Redentore (begun, 1576, finished, 1587, after his death) at Venice. These two churches are composed with aisles, crossing-domes, and apsidal terminations to choirs and transepts. The interiors are cold, powerful, and spacious; the exteriors are frankly structural, of inferior materials, with semi-circular, lead-covered domes, and with ornamentation except in the façades.
Palladio may be taken as the representative of a wholesome reaction against the decadent tendencies of his age, and may be said to have fixed good architectural style for many succeeding centuries. Although in France a more meretricious taste prevailed, represented by Lescaut and by De l'Orme in England, and, through Inigo Jones, Palladio became so much the controlling spirit that the English style of the seventeenth century is now known as “Palladian.” Naturally, the Georgian architecture of the United States develops directly from Palladio through the later masters who followed Inigo Jones. Palladio’s writings, particularly “Le Antichità di Roma” and the “Quattro Libri dell’Architettura”, did more than anything else to spread his influence over Europe; many editions were published in Italy between 1551 and 1612. They were widely translated, and in English Inigo Jones acted as editor and commentator.

Palladio, Saint, first bishop sent by Pope Celestine to Ireland (c. 115). The chronicle of the contemporary St. Prosper of Aquitaine presents two important entries relating to Palladius. Under date of 429 it has “Aurelius, a Pelagian, son of Severianus, a Pelagian bishop, corrupted the churches of Britain by the injunction of his doctrine; but at the instance of the Deacon Palladius (ad actionem Palladii Diaconi) Pope Celestine sends Germanus, Bishop of Auxerre, as his representative to root out heresy and direct the Britons to the Catholic Faith”. Again under date of 431, in the consultation of the Pontifical Liberianus: “Palladius was consecrated by Pope Celestine and sent to the Scots believing in Christ, as their first bishop” (Ad Scotos in Christum eredentes, ordinari a Papa Celestine Palladino et primus episcopus mittitur). In his work against Cassian, St. Prosper compendiates both in a sentence: “Andrea Palladius, past master of learning, believing in Christ, by the command of the Pope, was sent to the Scots, where he reiterated the Catholic faith by his labors and teaching to the extent that St.
Fergus, Bishop of the Scottish Church, called him the best bishop he had ever heard of.”

Some writers with Dr. Todd regard Palladius as deacon of St. Germanus; but it appears more probable that Palladius was the bishop of Deacon of Rome; it hardly seems possible that a Deacon of Auxerre would exercise such influence in Rome as that assigned to Palladius, and it is in accordance with St. Prosper’s usage to indicate the Roman deacon by the single title duceonis. Thus in the chronicle we have frequent entries such as “Palladius Duceonis in Scotia” “Palladius Romae”, “Palladius Scotiae”, which invariably refer to the deacons of Rome. The seventh century life of St.
Patrick by Meneen Macceumaethus in the “Book of Armagh” expressly styles Palladius “Archeiaco Papa Celestini urbis Romae Episcopus”, repeated in several of the other lives of St. Patrick. Ussher registers the tradition long current in England that Palla-dius was born in Britain and that he had combated the Pelagian heresy there. The Bollandists are also of the opinion that he was “a Briton by birth”. The Palla-dius, however, were reckoned among the noblest families of France and several of them held high rank about this time in the Church of Gaul. These conflicting opinions of historians may perhaps be reconciled. Under Julian the Apostate there was a Palladius holding prominent rank in the army of Gaul, who, for his fearless profession of the Faith, was exiled into Britain. We may easily suppose that the son of such a privileged Gallo-British family would attain the position of Deacon of Rome, would take much interest in the British Church, and, while by his familiarity with the Celtic language, he qualified to undertake the mission of first bishop to the Irish. Palladius is honoured in the Scottish calendar on 6 July. The Aberdeen Breviary describes him as “pontificem et feci Catholicae aposto-um purum et doctorem”. In some ancient records he is styled a martyr, probably because of the hardships endured during his missionary career in Ireland.

Palladius landed in the territory of the Hy-Garellon, on the strand where the town of Wicklow now stands, then occupied by the tribe of Cuailinn who have left their name on the beautiful valley of Glenueen, seven miles distant from the spot where Palladius landed.

The chronicler of the district had no regard for the missionaries. However some of the tribe appear to have extended a better measure of kindness to them and at least three churches were in after times assigned as the result of Palladius’s mission. The Life of St. Patrick, already referred to, records the failure of the mis-

island lying under wintry cold, but God hindered him, for no man can receive anything from earth unless it be given to him from heaven; and neither did those fierce and fervent storms prevent him from doing what he himself wished to spend time in a strange land, but returned to him who sent him. On his return hence, however, having crossed the first sea and commenced his land journey, he died in the territory of the Britons. In the Schola on St. Piacce's Hymn in the same song of Omer Hymnagogi, it is stated that in the country of the Hy-Taghachon, Palladius "founded some churches; Teach-na-Roman, or the House of the Romans, Kill-Fine, and others. Nevertheless he was not well received, but was forced to go round the coast of Ireland towards the north, until driven by a tempest he reached the extreme part of Modiolhidh towards the south." In the Siath, he was never thus, but. After having also given him the volumes of the Old and New Testaments, Palladius, entering the land of the Irish, arrived at the territory of the men of Leinster where Nathi Mac Garrchon was chief, who was opposed to him. Others, however, whom the Divine mercy had delivered to the church, and having been baptized in the name of the sacred Trinity, the blessed Palladius built three Churches in the same district; one, which is called Celltine, in which even to the present day, he left his books which he had received from St. Celestine and the box of relics of the blessed Peter and Paul and other Saints, and having also given him the volumes of the Old and New Testaments. PallADIUS

Palladius (Παλλάδιος), b. in Galatia, 308; d. probably before 431. The identity of the author of the "Vita" of the Father of the Church is uncertain. He was the author of the "Vita Palladiana," which was one of the most important works on the life of St. John Chrysostom, and of the Bishop of Heliopolis, long disputed, has been vindicated of late years (Preuschen, Butcher, etc.) and is now generally accepted. A disciple of Evagrius Pontus (q. v.) and an admirer of Origen, he became, when twenty years of age, a monk on the Mount of Olives, under a certain Serapion. In three years he went to Egypt to study the life of the famous Egyptian monks (see MONASTICISM), but later, falling into ill-health, wandered from one colony of monks to another, and made the acquaintance of Didymus the Blind, etc. In 399, Palladius set out for his own country (Asia Minor) to Alexandria and Palestine. At Bethlehem he met St. Jerome, whose great knowledge, he declares, was marred by "envy and jealousy" (Hist. Litt. 1, Of Possidomnianus). The great opponent of Origen was naturally not sympathetic to his visitor. At Jerusalem Palladius saw Rufinus of Aquileia and Melani. In Bithynia he was ordained bishop (ibid., xlix, Of John of Lyceus). St. John Chrysostom ordained him for the See of Heliopolis, but Bardenheuer thinks that Palladius of Heliopolis mentioned in Hist. Ecc., VIII, xxvii (Frey, 1894, p. 354), is another person. From this time he becomes a zealous adherent of his patriarch, whose troubles in 403 he shared. He was imprisoned for eleven months in a dark cell (Hist. Litt. iv, etc., etc.). Later he lived for a time in Palestine near Jericho under a famous hermit, Elpidius of Heliopolis (see Hist. Ecc., VIII, xxvii). In 408 he went to Rome to plead the case of Chrysostom with Innocent I (401-17) and Emperor Honorius (395-423). He came back to Constantinople as a member of the mission sent by Honorius to Arcadius (395-408) in favour of the banished patriarch. But there he and his colleagues were imprisoned and then banished. Palladius being sent to Syene in Upper Egypt. Later he went to Antioch.
and was in Ancyra after 412. In 417 he changed his Diocese of Helenopolis for Aspuna in Galatia (Soci-ètres, loc. cit.). In 420 he wrote his "Historia Lausicae" (Butler, "The Lausiac History", I, 175 sq.).
After that he appears; but he did not apparently before 418, in which year a certain Eusebus was Bishop of Aspuna.
His chief work is the "Historia Lausicae", a history of the monks of Egypt and Palestine in the form of anecdotes and short biographies. Its name comes from the dedication to Lausus, a chamberlain of Emperor Macrinus (217–218), or Arcus Aeternus and then shortly, Lausus or Lausus.
Difficulties about the text are examined and in great part solved by Dom Cuthbert Butler (see below).
The chief difficulty is that Palladius repeats nearly all the contents of Rufinus, "Historia monachorum" (written from a Greek source between 404 and 410).
The text, as it is in Migne, evidently depends on Rufinus's source. There are also many variant texts. The book was popular among monks all over the East, who appear to have added to it considerably in transcribing it. The first edition was a Latin vercion by Gentianus Hervetus (Paris, 1555), reprinted by H. Rosweyc in "Vita patrum", in Paris, 1636.

A Greek text was published by J. Myers (Leiden, 1646), and a longer one by Fronton Leduc ("Auctarins bibliothecae Patrum", IV, Paris, 1686, and a still more complete one by J. Cotelerius ("Monumenta ecclesiae", III, Paris, 1686; reprinted in P. G., XXXIV, 965–1260). This longer version contains the text of Rufinus, Butler, Preuschcn, and others think that the shorter text (of Munsincs) is Palladius's authentic work, the longer version being interpolated. Amblesin (op. cit.) holds that the longer text is all Palladius's work, and that the first thirty-seven chapters (about the monks of Lower Egypt) are mainly an account of what the author saw and what he believed to be true.
But he thinks the second part (about Upper Egypt) is merely a compilation from a Coptic or Greek document which Rufinus also used; so that Palladius's visit to Upper Egypt must be a literary fiction. (See also Fesler-Jungmann, op. cit.) But the shorter text itself exists in various forms. A Syriac version, living in the sixth or seventh centuries in Mesopotamia, translated the "Lausiac History" into Syriac with further interpolations ein sineto", VII, Paris, 1897; tr. E. A. Wallis Budge, "The Paradise of the Fathers", 2 vols., London, 1907). At one time the "Lausiac History" was considered a compilation of imaginary legends (see Weingarten, "Der Ursprung des Mönchhums, Gotha, 1877, and others). Later research has very considerably rehabilitated Palladius; the chief authorities now (Butler, Preuschcn) consider the "Laus-ian History" to be in the main a serious historical document as well as an invaluable picture of the lives and ideas of the earliest Christian monks (cf. Preu-schcn, op. cit., 210).

Palladius's object is not so much to save material for history as to provide spiritual reading; at the same time the author has a controversial purpose as an opponent of Marcion and Donatists. His style is restrained, polished and graceful, as in his "Correspondence of the Fathers" ("Sammlung ton lton in the "Vita Patrum", V–VI). These are later and consist partly of old traditions of Egyptian monks, partly of apocryphal additions (Butler, "The Lausiac History", I, 138–145.) Under the name of Palladius there are the "Lives of St. John Chrysostom" (Dialogues with Theodore, dean of the Roman Church, about the life and manners of John Chrysostom). It was first edited in Greek with a Latin translation by F. Bigot (Paris, 1650); it is included in de Montfaucon's edition of Chrysostom (XII, Paris, 1718–38), and in P. G. (XLVII, 5–82). There are difficulties about the identification of its author with that of the "Lausiac History" and the Bishop of Helenopolis, so that all possible combinations have been suggested, including that of three separate persons. The chief of these difficulties is that the biographer distinguishes him-selves from the bishop (c. iii, "P. G.", loc. cit., 13).
Bardenhewer ("Patriologie", 354), and Fesler-Jungmann ("Institutiones Patrologiae", 11, 209–10) identify the author of the "Lausiac History" and the biographer, but distinguish from them the bishop. It is, how-soever, now clear that the work is by a single Lausian author (Dr. Wallis Budge, "The Paradise of the Fathers", p. xxii, so that we come to the identity of all three as supposed in this article. Preuschcn explains the difficulty in the Dialogue as a literary fiction (Pallavicino u. Rufinus, 210).
The best modern edition of the Lausiac History is discussion; II, The Greek text in Texts and Studies, VI (Cambridge, ADRIAN FORTESE.

Pallavicino, Pietro Stopia, cardinal, b. 28 Nov., 1607; d. 5 June, 1667.
Descended from the line of Parma of the ancient and noble house of the Marchese, Pallavincini, the first-born of his family, he renounced the right of primogeniture and resolved to enter the priesthood. He obtained the doctorate in philosophy in 1623, then in Theology (and in the year mentioned, being extant). Pope Urban VIII (1623–44) appointed him referendarius utrique signaturar and member of several congregations. He was highly esteemed in the literary circles of Rome. When his friend Giovanni Campho, the secretary of briefs, fell into disfavour, Pallavicino's standing at the papal court was also seriously affected. He was served as curator of St. John Lateran by his friend Enea Silvio Piccolomini, who had been raised to the cardinalate, and of Lausian, as an example of the same, the papal court and the worldly court were surrounded by the skilled in the art of literature and in the art of statesmanship. After his entrance into the Jesuit order he had published orations and poems. Of his great poem "I fasti sacri", which was to have been completed in fourteen cantos, he had published one part (Rome, 1630);
but upon his entrance into the novitiate he gave up its further publication. His first important literary work as Jesuit was a tragedy, "Ermenegildo martire" (Rome, 1614). In the same year there appeared "Del hine libri quatro" (Rome 1614 and often reprinted).
He began editing the works of his former friend Giovanni Campho; of these the "Rime" appeared in Rome (1618) and the "Prosatia", in Rome (1623).
An important part of his work was the publication of the numerous accusations raised against the Society of Jesus, Pallavicino composed a circumstantial refutation, "Indications Societatis Jesu, quibus multorum accusationes in eius institutiones, leges, gymnasium, meris refutaturm" (Rome, 1649).
In the same year he began the publication of his great dogmatic work "Dissertationes theologicae" in nine volumes. The first five books appeared in three volumes (Rome, 1649), the remaining four books are included in volumes IV–VIII (Rome, 1658–1662). Immediately after this he began the publication of disputations on the second part of the "Summa theologica" of St. Thomas, "Deissimia, quodiam cum-to ille d. Thoma tomos l" (Lyons, 1635). However, only this first volume of the work appeared, for in the meantime Pallavicino had been directed by the pope to write a refutation of Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent.

The odious and hostile account of the Council of Trent by Sarpi had appeared as early as 1610 under a fictitious name ("História del Concilio Tridentino, nella quale si scoprono tutti gli artifici della corte di Roma . . . di Pietro Soave Pallianno", London, 1619). Several Catholic scholars had already begun to collect the material for a refutation of this work, but none had been able to finish the gigantic undertaking. Finally, in 1667, by the Jesuit, Ter. Alician, in particular had collected a rich mass of material. The latter, moreover, had already begun with the compilation, when he died suddenly in 1651. Pallavicino by order of the pope was now to take up the work anew. Accordingly he resigned his professorship at the Collegium Romanae, to devote himself exclusively to this prodigious task. He utilized all the available material previously gathered by Contolieri and Alician, and added much that was new from Roman and non-Roman archives. The reports of the council in the secret archives of the Vatican were at his unrestricted disposal (cf. Leshay, in "Romische Quartalschrift", 3rd ser., 1867). Thus he was able to bring out the following work as early as 1656 and 1657 in two folio volumes under the title, "Istoria del Concilio di Trento, scritta dal P. Sora Pallavicino, della Comp. di Gesù ove insieme riflettesi con autorevoli testimonianze un'istoria falsa divulgata nello stesso argomento sotto nome di Pietro Soave Polianno" (first part, Rome, 1656; second part, Rome, 1657). The author himself was able to bring out a new edition in three volumes (Rome, 1664). With the assistance of his secretary, Catalano, he made an abridgement in which the polemical portions are omitted (Rome, 1666). Until within very recent years Pallavicino's History of the Council of Trent was the principal work on this important ecclesiastical assembly. Reprints of it have appeared frequently, and Antonio Zaccaria published an annotated edition (Rome, 1733, 4 vols.), which has been reprinted three times. The work was also translated into Latin by a Jesuit, Giuttini (Antwerp, 1670); into German by Klatz, into English by Holstenius (first part, 1657, second part, 1857), and into Spanish. Pallavicino's work is more copious, more conscientious, and more in accordance with the truth than that of his adversary Sarpi. But it is an apologetic treatise, and for that reason not free from partiality as it is not without errors [cf. "Concilium Tridentinum, Diurnarum pars prima", ed. S. M. Merkle (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1901), p. xii]. In any case, however, Pallavicino did not purposely falsify the history of the council, and he has reported much that proves his frankness and objectivity in the recital.

Pallavicino received due recognition from his friend, Alexander VII (1655-67). On 19 April, 1657, he was created cardinal and on 10 April, 1659, his elevation to the cardinalate was published. Nevertheless he continued his simple, pious way of living. The pope often consulted him in matters of importance. He attended to his diverse tasks with the greatest conscientiousness. His income was in a large measure comprised of the income of his function; his scientific and literary own work in literature was likewise continued, as is proved by the new edition of his History of the Council of Trent and the edition of the "Prose" of Ciampoli. A work of ascetic character, "Arte della perfezione cristiana, divisa in tre libri", appeared in 1665 (Rome). Several of his works were not printed until after his death; others are still in manuscript. After becoming cardinal, Pallavicino continued loyal to the Jesuit Order and was its protector and patron. He died during the vacancy of the Holy See in 1667.

In the year after his death his former secretary, Giambattista Galli Pavarelli, published a collection of his letters, "Lettere dettate dal card. Sforza Pallavicino" (Rome, 1668). Other collections appeared in Bologna (1669), in Venice (1825), in Rome (4 vols., 1848). An opinion which he had written on the question whether he could wear the red pallium if the pope live in Rome at St. Peter's, was printed together with a discussion of the same question by Lucas Holsteinus, in Rome (1676). Larger collections of various works of Pallavicino were brought out as late as the nineteenth century. The following editions of his "Opera" are to be noted as the most important: 1834 (her letters was most appropriate that the volumes); and a collection of other works in five volumes published at the same time by Ottavio Gigli.

Pallium.—Form and Use of the Modern Pallium. —The modern pallium is a circular band about two inches wide, worn about the neck, breast, and shoulders, and having two pendants, one hanging down in front and one behind. The pendants are about two inches wide and twelve inches long, and are weighted with small pieces of lead covered with black silk. The remainder of the pallium is made of wool, part of which is supplied by two lambs presented annually as a tax by the Lateran Canons Regular to the Chapter of St. John on the feast of St. Agnes, solemnly blessed on the high altar of that church after the pontifical Mass, and then offered to the pope. The ornamentation of the pallium consists of six small black crosses—one each on the breast and back, one on each shoulder, and one on each pendant. The crosses on the breast, back, and left shoulder are provided with a loop for the reception of a gold pin set with a precious stone. The pallium is worn over the chasuble.

The use of the pallium is reserved to the pope and archbishops, but the latter may not use it until, on petition, they have received the permission of the Holy See. Bishops sometimes receive the pallium as a mark of special favour, but it does not increase their powers or jurisdiction, nor give them precedence. The pope may use the pallium at any time. Others, even archbishops, may use it only in their respective dioceses, and there only on the days and occasions designated in the "Pontificale" (Christmas, the Circumcision, and other specified great feasts; during the conferring of Holy orders, the consecration of abbeys, etc.), unless its use is extended by a special privilege. Worn by the pope, the pallium symbolizes his power as primus inter pares (the multitude of pontifical office); worn by archbishops, it typifies their participation in the supreme pastoral power of the pope, who concedes it to them for their proper church provinces. An archbishop, therefore, who has not received the pallium, may not exercise his jurisdiction in the metropolis of his archdiocese, and may not exercise his pontifical prerogatives; he is even forbidden to perform any episcopal act until invested with the pallium. Similarly, after his resignation, he may not use the pallium; should he be transferred to another archdiocese, he must again petition the Holy Father for the pallium. In the case of bishops, its use is purely ornamental. The new pallium is solemnly blessed after the Second Vespers on the feast of St.
PALLIUM

Peter and Paul, and are then kept in a special silver-gilt casket near the Confessio Petri until required. The pallium is conferred in Rome by a cardinal-bishop, and outside of Rome by a bishop; in both cases the ceremony takes place after the celebration of Mass and the administration of the oath of allegiance.

History and Antiquity.—It is impossible to indicate exactly when the pallium was first introduced. According to the "Liber Pontificalis", it was first used in the first half of the fourth century. This book relates, in the life of Pope Marcus (d. 356), that he conferred the right of wearing the pallium on the Bishop of Ostia, because the consecration of the pope appertained to him. At any rate, the wearing of the pallium was usual in the fifth century; this is indicated by the above-mentioned reference contained in the life of St. Marcus, which dates from the beginning of the sixth century, as well as by the conferring of the pallium on St. Cesarius of Arles by Pope Symmachus in 513. Besides, in numerous other references of the sixth century, the pallium is mentioned as a long-vestimentary vestment. It seems that, from the beginning, the pope alone had the absolute right of wearing the pallium. Its use by others was tolerated only in virtue of the permission of the pope. We hear of the pallium being conferred on others, as a mark of distinction, as early as the sixth century. The honour was usually conferred on metropolitans, especially those nominated vicars by the pope, but it was sometimes conferred on simple bishops (e.g. on Syagrius of Autun, Donus of Messina, and John of Syracuse by Pope Gregory the Great). The use of the pallium among metropolitans did not become general until the ninth century, when the obligation was laid upon all metropolitans of forwarding a petition for the pallium accompanied by a solemn profession of faith, all consecrations being forbidden them before the reception of the pallium. The object of this rule was to bring the metropolitans into more intimate connexion with the seat of unity and the source of all metropolitan prerogatives, the Holy See, to counteract the aspirations of various autonomy-seeking metropolitans, which were incompatible with the Constitution of the Church, and to counteract the evil influences arising therefrom: the rule was intended, not to kill, but to vitiate metropolitan jurisdiction. The oath of allegiance which the recipient of the pallium takes today originated, apparently, in the eleventh century. It is met with during the reign of Paschal II (1099-1118), and replaced the profession of faith. It is certain that a tribute was paid for the reception of the pallium as early as the sixth century. This was abrogated by Pope Gregory the Great in the Roman Synod of 592, but was reintroduced later as partial maintenance of the Holy See. These pallium contributions have often been, since the Middle Ages, the subject of embittered controversies, the attitude of many critics being indefensibly extreme and unjustifiable.

Character and Significance.—As early as the sixth century the pallium was considered a liturgical vestment to be used only in the church, and indeed only during Mass, unless a special privilege determined otherwise. This is proved conclusively by the correspondence between Gregory the Great and John of Ravenna concerning the use of the pallium. The rules regulating the original use of the pallium cannot be determined with certainty, but its use, even before the sixth century, seems to have had a definite liturgical character. From early times more or less extensive restrictions limited the use of the pallium to certain days. Its indiscriminate use, permitted to Hincmar of Reims by Leo IV (851) and to Bruno of Cologne by Agapetus II (853), was contrary to general custom. In the tenth and eleventh centuries, just as to-day, the general rule was to limit the use of the pallium to a few festivals and some other extraordinary occasions. The symbolic character now attached to the pallium dates back to the time when it was made an obligation for all metropolitans to petition the Holy See for permission to use it. The evolution of this character was complete about the end of the eleventh century; thenceforth the pallium is always designated in the papal Bulls as the symbol of plenitude pontificalis officii. In the sixth century the pallium was the symbol of the papal office and the papal power, and for this reason Pope Felix transmitted his pallium to his archdeacon, when, contrary to custom, he nominated him his successor. On the other hand, when used by metropolitans, the pallium originally signified simply union with the Apostolic See, and was the symbol of the ornaments of virtue which should adorn the life of the wearer.

Formal Development.—There is a decided difference between the form of the modern pallium and that in vogue in early Christian times, as portrayed in the Ravenna mosaics. The pallium of the sixth century was a long, moderately wide, white biretum, ornamented at its extremity with a black or red cross, and finished off with tassels; it was draped around the neck, shoulders, and breast in such a manner that it formed a V in front, and the ends hung down from the left shoulder, one in front and one behind (see illustration). In the eighth century it became customary to let the ends fall down, one in the middle of the breast and the other in the middle of the back, and to fasten them there with pins, the pallium thus becoming Y-shaped. A further development took place during the ninth century (according to pictorial representations, at first outside of Rome where ancient traditions were not maintained so strictly): the biretum, which had hitherto been kept in place by the pins, was sewed Y-shaped, without, however, being cut. The present
The circular form originated in the tenth or eleventh century. Two excellent early examples of this form, belonging to the tenth and eleventh centuries, are preserved in the Cathedral of Chartres and in the church of St. Stephen, Paris. The two vertical bands of the circular pallium were very long until the fifteenth century, but were later repeatedly shortened until they now have a length of only about twelve inches. The illustration indicates a historical development of the pallium. At first the only decorations on the pallium were two crosses near the extremities. This is proved by the mosaics at Ravenna and Rome. It appears that the ornamentation of the pallium with a greater number of crosses did not become customary until the ninth century, when small crosses were inserted. The symbolism of the pallium is everywhere connected with the shoulders. There was, however, during the Middle Ages no definite rule regulating the number of crosses, nor was there any precept determining their colour. They were generally dark, but sometimes red. The pins, which at first served to keep the pallium in place, were retained as ornaments even after the pallium was sewed in the proper shape, although they no longer had any practical object. That the insertion of small leaden weights in the vertical ends of the pallium was usual as early as the thirteenth century is proved by the discovery in 1666 of the pallium enveloping the body of Boniface VIII, and by the fragments of the pallium found in the tomb of Clement V. There are different opinions concerning the origin of the pallium. Some trace it to an investiture by Constantine the Great (or one of his successors); others consider it an imitation of the Hebrew ephod, the humeral garment of the high priest. Others again declare that its origin is traceable to a mantle of St. Peter, which was symbolical of his office as supreme pastor. A fourth hypothesis finds its origin in a liturgical mantle, which, they assert, was used by the early popes, and which in the course of time was folded in the shape of a band; a fifth says its origin dates from the custom of folding the ordinary mantle-pallium, an outer garment in use in imperial times; a sixth declares that it was introduced immediately as a papal liturgical garment, which, however, was not at first a narrow strip of cloth, but, as the name suggests, a broad, oblong, and folded cloth. Concerning these various hypotheses see Braun, "Die liturgische Gewandung im Oriental und Orient," sect. iv, ch. m, n. The theory that the pallium was examined and appraised. To trace it to an investiture of the emperor, to the ephod of the Jewish high-priest, or to a fabled mantle of St. Peter, is entirely inadmissible. The correct view may well be that the pallium was introduced as a liturgical badge of the pope, and it does not seem improbable that it was adopted in imitation of its counterpart, the pontifical omophorion, already in vogue in the Eastern Church.

Osornomont.—The omophorion of the Greek Rite—may we here pass over the other Oriental rites—corresponds to the Latin pallium, with the difference that in the Greek Rite its use is a privilege not only of archbishops, but of all bishops. It differs in form from the Latin pallium; provides for a circular garment for the shoulders, with short pendants before and behind, but is, like the original Roman pallium, a broad band, ornamented with crosses and draped loosely over the neck, shoulders, and breast. The only change in the omophorion has been the augmentation of its breadth, and, with this change, the introduction of the omophorion as a liturgical vestment of the bishop in Isidore of Pelusium about 400. It was then made of wool and was symbolical of the duties of bishops as shepherds of their flocks. In the miniatures of an Alexandrian "Chronicle of the World," written probably during the fifth century, we already find a pictorial representation of the omophorion. In later times we meet the same representation on the renowned ivory tablet of Trier, depicting the translation of some relics. Among the pictures dating from the tenth century and afterwards, the omophorion, are the lately discovered frescoes in S. Maria Antiqua in the Roman Forum. The representation in these frescoes is essentially the same as its present form. Concerning the origin of the omophorion similar theories have been put forth as in the case of the pallium. The theories have been made to depend on the hypothesis that the omophorion was simply an evolution of the ordinary mantle or pallium, but it was most probably derived from the civil omophorion, a shoulder garment or shawl in general use. We must suppose either that the bishops introduced directly by a positive precept it as a liturgical pontifical badge a liturgical omophorion or that it was introduced by that name, or that the civil omophorion was at first used by the bishops as a mere ornament without any special significance, but in the course of time gradually developed into a distinctively episcopal ornament, and finally assumed the character of an episcopal badge of office.

Pallotti, Vincenzo Maria, Venerable, founder of the Pious Society of Missions (q. v.), b. at Rome, 21 April, 1798; d. there, 22 Jan., 1850. He was buried in the church of San Salvatore in Olanda. He was descended from the noble families of the Pallotti of Norcia and the De Rossi of Rome. His early studies were made at the Pious Schools of San Pantalone, where he passed to the Roman College. At the age of sixteen, he resolved to become a secular priest, and on 16 May, 1820, he was ordained. He celebrated his first Mass in the church of the Gesù in Frascati. On 25 July he became a Doctor of Theology, and was soon made a substitute professor of theology in the Roman Archaeological Institute. He gave promise of a theological distinciveness, and was determined to dedicate himself entirely to pastoral work.

Rome had in him a second Philip Neri. Hearing confessions and preaching were his constant occupations. From morning until night he could be seen hurrying along the streets of Rome to assist at the bedside of the sick in the hospitals, to bring aid and comfort to the poor in their miserable dwellings, or to preach to the unfortunate in prison. Once he went so far as to disguise himself as an old woman in order to reach the bedside of a dying young man, who had a pistol under his pillow ready to kill the first priest who should approach him. During the cholera plague in 1823, Pallotti was constantly on the road ministering to the stricken. After a day spent in apostolic labour he was accustomed to pass almost the whole night in prayer, disciplining himself even to blood, and sleeping for a few hours on a chair or on the bare floor. The most distinguished representatives of the Roman aristocracy, bishops, cardinals, and others, were always anxious to be present at the solemn Masses on Sundays, and were the first to grant to the friends of his friend, but the only advantage he took of their friendship was to advocate the claims of the poor. Even as a young man, he often returned home barefooted, after having given away half his clothing in alms; and more than once it was known to have given away his bed to the poor, and even his coat. He spoke from his personal observations, and said he would not hesitate to consider himself a saint. Shortly after his death the preparatory examinations for his beatification began; in 1877 he was declared Venerable.

It was Venerable Pallotti who started in 1836 the special observance at Rome of the octave of the Epiphany. Since then the celebration has been faithfully maintained. Pallotti's chief desire was to make this observance a means of uniting the dissenting Oriental Churches with Rome.

Palma Vecchio (Jacopo Negretti), b. at Serina near Bergamo, about 1190; d. at Venice, 30 July, 1528.

Like Giorgione and Lotto, he studied under Giovanni Bellini, from whom he drew the inspiration for his altar-pieces, introducing, however, more freedom of arrangement. His works are strong and bold rather than graceful. Imitating Giorgione, Palma treated sacred subjects as "tableaux de genre," wherein the sometimes exuberant strength, animation, and beauty of the Venetian masters were combined with colouring that deserves admiration, while they lack religious sentiment. Among the productions of the "Madonna with St. George and St. Lucy," painted for San Stefano, Venice, "St. Peter with saints" (Academia of Venice); "Adoration of the Shepherds" (Louvre); "Meeting of Jacob and Rachel" (Dresden Museum), his favourite subjects were the so-called "Holy Conversations," i.e., the Holy Family or the Madonna surrounded by saints. Examples are to be seen at Rome, in the Colonna and Borghese Galleries, at Florence, in the Uffizi and Pitti Palaces, at Dresden, Munich, and Vienna. One of his most beautiful "conversations" is that of the Holy Family with St. John Baptist and St. Lucy, in the Accademia of Venice. His master-piece is the altar-piece in Santa Maria Formosa, Venice. It is a triptych representing St. Barbara between St. Anthony the Hermit and St. Sebastian. Palma was also a remarkable portrait painter, excelling especially in portraits of women, with whom he was much court ladies. Worthy of note are: the "Bella," in the collection of Baron Alphonse de Rothschild; the "Vivanda," in the museum of Vienna; the "Three Sisters," in the museum of Dresden. His portraits of men are also excellent, especially that of an unknown man, museum of Berlin, and Palma himself (Pinacothek, Munich). He received the surname Vecchio ("old") to distinguish him from his nephew, Jacopo Palma Giovanni (1514-1528).

Palmer, William, b. at Muxbury, Oxon., 12 July, 1811; d. at Rome, 1 April, 1879; the elder brother of Roundell Palmer, afterwards Lord Chancellor of England and first Earl of Selborne. He himself was educated at Rugby and Oxford (Magdalen College), where he procured M.A. in 1833, being then in deacon's orders of the Church of England. He was, successively, tutor at Durham University (1834-37), classical examiner at Oxford 1837-39, and tutor at Magdalen College (1838-43). In 1840 he visited Russia to obtain, if possible, official recognition of the Anglican Church; but a year after his fruitless labours his claim to communion was rejected by the Metropolitan of Moscow. A second attempt in 1842 only resulted in the express rejection by the Russian Church, of Anglican claims to Catholicism. After the Graham Judgment in 1852 he contemplated joining the Russian Church, but was deterred by the necessity for repudiation. He spent some time in Egypt and then went to India, where he was received into the Church, 28 Feb., 1855, and where he spent the rest of his life. His works, which show a wide acquaintance with both Anglican and Eastern theology, were mainly concerned with his efforts to obtain intercommunion between these bodies. Chief among these were: "Harmony of Anglican Doctrine with the Doctrine of the Eastern Church," (Aberdeen, 1846; Greek version, Athens, 1851); "An Appeal to the Scottish Bishops and Clergy" (Edinburgh, 1849); and "Dissertations on subjects relating to the Orthodox or Eastern Catholic Communion" (London, 1853). After he became a Catholic he devoted himself to archeology and wrote: "An Introduction to Early Christian Symbolism" (London, 1859); and "Egyptian Chronicles, with a harmony of sacred and Egyptian Chronology" (London, 1861). He also wrote a Latin commentary on the Book of Daniel (Rome, 1871), and a number of minor works. After his death his friend, Cardinal Newman, edited his "Notes of a Visit to the Russian Church" (London, 1882).

Palmieri, Domenico, theologian, b. at Piacenza, Italy, 4 July, 1829; d. in Rome, 29 May, 1909. He studied in his native city, where he was ordained priest in 1852. On 6 June, 1856, he entered the Society of Jesus, where he completed his studies. He taught in several places, first rhetoric, then philosophy, theology, and the Sacred Scriptures. In these courses, especially during the sixteen years that he was professor in the Roman College, he acquired fame as a philosopher. In this field he published: "Animadversiones in recens opus de Monte Conceli Vienensis" (Rome, 1878); a more interesting work is his "Institutiones Philosophicae," published in Rome, in 1874. In both he follows the scholastic method; but the doctrine in many points differ from those common to the Peripatetic philosophers. As regards the composition of bodies he admits the dynamic theory, and considers the first elements of bodies to be formally simple, endowed with an attractive and repulsive force, while he says they are virtually existing. On the other hand he does not admit the real accidents, and to explain the permanence of the Eucharistic Species, he has recourse to the phenomena of ether, which persist by Divine operation, the substance of bread and wine ceasing to exist. He held a conception altogether his own of the life of plants, and assigned simple souls to animals, which expire with their death. As regards the origin of the idea, he was true to the scholastic principles in admitting that the intellectual apprehension has its origin in the apprehension of the senses; but to his last day would not admit the necessity of the intelligible species. His works have a very forcible quality of argument, which obliges one to recognize that, even when at variance with his mode of thought.

In Scriptural study also he made his mark. Having taught the Holy Scriptures from 1850-87, and Oriental languages to the scholastics of his society in Maastricht, he published "Commentarius in epistolam ad Galatas" (Gulpen, 1855); and "De veritate locis scripturarum" (Gulpen, 1856). Many others of his minor works can be placed under this head. When Loisy's book, "L'Evangile et l'Eglise," appeared, he was one of the first to give alarm to the Catholic party, and to show, in a treatise in the form of letters, the errors contained in the author's works. He examined more minutely another work of Loisy's, "Anton d'un Petit Livre," in his "Esame di un opuscolo che gira intorno ad un piccolo libro." To this demonstration he joins a more complete one of certain of the favourite errors of the new school, that is to say, not demonstrating the Divinity of Our Lord from the Scriptures and not being able to answer a book which is titled "Se e com i sinottici ci danno Gesù Cristo per Dio" (Prato, 1903). Only the first part of this book, concerning the Gospel of St. Matthew, was published; but these books contain nevertheless a very clear demonstration of Catholic truth.

In his last position, however, rests principally on his theology in the Roman College: (a) "Tractatus de Pontifice cum prolomogcio de Ecclesia" (3rd ed., Prato, 1902); (b) "Tractatus de Penticntia" (2nd ed., Prato, 1886); (c) "Tractatus de Matrimonio Christiano" (2nd ed., Prato, 1897); (d) "Tractatus de Gratia Divina Actualis" (Gulpen, 1855); (e) "Tractatus Theologici de Novissimi Divini Praeceptis" (Prato, 1908); (f) "Tractatus de Creatione et de Praecipuis Creaturis" (Prato, 1910); (g) "Tractatus de Ordine Supernaturali et de Lapsu Angelorum" (Prato, 1910); (h) "Tractatus de Pecato Originali et de Immauclato Beatae Virginis Domin peers Conceptu" (Prato, 1904).

The last three treatises here noted, taken together, form a new edition in many parts perfected and re-arranged from his former treatise on God the Creator, printed first in Rome, 1875. The third part was published before the other two, because the author wished with it to render homage to the Immaculate Conception on the fiftieth anniversary of the proclamation of the dogma. To this is appended the "Tractatus de Originis et specialis Creation" a posthumous work, but of which he left the manuscript completed and prepared, we have to note the change made by him regarding the union of the soul with the body, because while he first asserted that the union was only natural and not substantial, now that it is defined doctrine that the human nature consists entirely in the synthesis of two elements, that is to say, of the body and of the reasoning soul, he admits that this union is substantial, although he asserts, indeed, that it is not yet sufficiently determined how one nature can make from two different natures.

The originality of his theological works consists principally in the method which he followed, which amounts to an exhaustive demonstration of the existence of the dogma, and in its scholastic exposition and defence, so that his treatises are almost complete from the positive, scholastic, and polemic viewpoints. Father Antonio Ballerini left at his death a valuable collection of studies in moral theology. It was in the form of a commentary on the "Medulls" of Busenbain, but not complete. Palmieri undertook the task of putting in order this work and made many additions of his own. To the sermon shown in his theological works he has added evidence of a sound practical judgment, hereby proving himself a great moralist. For this reason, on the election of Cardinal Steinhaber, he was appointed to succeed him as theologian of the S. Pernottini, in which capacity his work was greatly appreciated by Leo XIII and Pius X. These labours were followed by a commentary on the Divine Constitution from the Society of Divine Allighians. At the suggestion of his mother, Giuseppina Rocci Palmieri, a lady of high ideals and culture. To this he brought all the profundity of his philosophy and theology, and produced a work wonderful to all those who, knowing these sciences, are able to appreciate the profound thought which he received especially in a most learned introduction and in the scientific observations appended to the individual canons.

Palmieri, Luigi, physicist and meteorologist, b. at Falelio, Benevento, Italy, 22 April, 1867; d. in Naples, 9 September 1922. He was first studied at the secondary school of Caiazzo, then took up mathematics and the natural sciences in Naples, getting his degree in architecture from the University of Naples. He taught successively in the secondary schools of Salerno, Campania, and Avellino, until in 1895 he became professor of physics at the Royal Naval School at Naples. In 1878 he was transferred to the University of Naples, and became professor of physics at the Royal School of Natural Sciences. He became director of the observatory of Mount Vesuvius in 1888 and became its director in 1891, after the death of Melloni. The chair of meteorological and terrestrial physics was created especially for him at the university. He published, in 1870 to 1872, a series of papers on the invention of the physical observatory of Naples.

Member of the Royal Society of Naples (Academy of Sciences) since 1861, he became a member of the Academy of the Lincei (Florence) in 1871. Among other honours were the following: Member of the Superior Council of Meteorology, Senator of the King of the Two Sicilies, Grand Commissioner of the Order of the Crown of Italy, Commander of the Order of Rosada Brazil, etc. His work is chiefly connected with the observation of the eruptions on Mount Vesuvius and with the study of earthquakes and meteorological phenomena in general. He watched all the volcanic disturbances at the observatory and nearly lost his life there during the eruption of 1872. He was very successful in the invention and improvement of delicate apparatus. He modified the Peltier electrometer and used it for his investigation of atmospheric electricity during forty years. His seismometer for the detection and measurement of ground vibration was so sensitive that he was able to detect very slight movements and to predict the eruption of the volcano. A modification of the Morse telegraph, an anemometer, and a pniometer were also among his inventions. His tribute to Galluzzi has often been applied to himself; "The Catholic religion was the guide of his studies during life, and, supported by its inexpressible consolation, he left this earth to live forever in heaven.

Numerous memoirs also appeared in the "Rendiconto dell' accademia delle scienze fisiche e matematiche di Napoli", and in the "Atti della R. Acc. Napoli". Among his larger works were the following. "Incendio Vesuviano del 26 Aprile 1872" (Naples, 1872; German, Berlin, 1872); "I Vesuvio e la sua storia" (Milan, 1880); "Nuove notizie di scienze fisiche e di fisica terrestre" (Naples, 1885); "Die Atmosphärische Elektrizität" (tr., Vienna, 1884); "Les lois et les origines de la félicité" (tr., Paris, 1885).

Palm in Christian Symbolism.—In pre-Christian times the palm was regarded as a symbol of victory (Julius Celius, "Noct. Att.", III, vi). It was adopted by the early Christians, and became a symbol of the victory of the faithful over the enemies of the soul. The palm, says Origen (in Jean, XXXI), is the symbol of victory in that war waged by the spirit against the flesh. In this sense it was especially applicable to martyrs, the victors par excellence over the spiritual foes. The palm became a common reference in the Acts of the martyrs of such expressions as "he received the palm of martyrdom." On 10 April, 1688 it was decided by the Congregation of Rites that the palm when found depicted on catacomb tombs was to be regarded as a proof that a martyr had been interred there. Subsequently this opinion was also confirmed by the Holy See.沃特 received not only on tombs of the post-poe-wear era, but even on pagan tombs. The general significance of the palm on early Christian monuments is slightly modified according to its association with other symbols (e.g., with the monogram of Christ, the Fish, the Good Shepherd). On some later monuments the palm was represented merely as an ornament separating two scenes.

Palm Sunday, the sixth and last Sunday of Lent and beginning of Holy Week, a Sunday of the highest rank, not even a commemoration of any kind being permitted in the Mass. In common law it fixes the commencement of Easter duty. The Roman Missal marks the station at St. John Lateran (see Stations) and before September, 1870, the pope performed the ceremonies there. The Goths celebrate the day with great solemnity; they call it κυριακή or της Παλμάρας or Lazarus Sunday, because on the day before they have the feast of the resurrection of Lazarus. The emperors used to distribute branches of palm and small presents among their nobles and domestics. The Latin liturgical call it Dominus, Domus, or Dies Palmarum. From the cry of the people during the procession the day has received the name Dominica Hosana or simply Hosanna (Ozanna). Because every great feast was in some way a remembrance of the resurrection of Christ and was in consequence called Pascha, so too the name Pascha floridum, in French Pâques floridus, in Spanish Pascua florída, and it was from this day from 1512 that our State of Florida received its name (Niles, II, 255). From the custom of also blessing flowers and entwining them among the palms arose the terms Dominica floridus and dies floridus. Flower-Sunday was well known in England, in Germany as Blumensonntag or Blumestag, as also among the Serbs, Croats, and Ruthenians, in the Greek Byzantine and Missal, and among the Armenians. The latter celebrate another Palm Sunday on the seventh Sunday after Easter to commemorate the "Ingressus Domini in cælum justa visionem Gregorii Illuminatoris" called Secundas floridus or Secunda palmatarum dominici (Niles, II, 519). Since this Sunday is the beginning of Holy Week, during which weddings were avoided, it was called Domesdai jubilatis, gentier, complentium, and capitationem from the practice of washing and shaving of the head as a bodily preparation for baptism. During the early centuries of the Church this sacrament was conferred solemnly only in the night of Holy Saturday, the text of the palm had been made known to the catechumens on the preceding Palm Sunday. The practice was followed in Spain (Isidore, "De off. eccl.", i, 27), in Gaul (P. L., LXXII, 255), and in Milan (Ambrose, Ep. xx). In England the day was called Olive or Branch Sunday, Sallow or Willow, Yew or Blossom Sunday, or Sunday of the Willow Boughs. Since the celebration recalled the solemn entry of Christ into Jerusalem people made of it a kind of allegory of the announcement of the Lord to the Samaritan woman; the purple tabernacle or wilderness was considered as the symbol of Christ seated on an ass, cut out of wood, was carried in procession and even brought into the church. Such figures may still be seen in the museums of Basle, Zurich, Munich, and Nurnberg (Keller, 50).

In some places in Germany and France it was customary to stuff Dover, a sheaf of branches, on the cross in the churchyard. After the Passion had been recited at Mass blessed palms were brought and this cross (in consequence sometimes called the Palm cross) was wreathed and decked with them to symbolize Christ's victory. In Lower Bavaria boys went about the streets singing a form of the "Pascua floridus" and other carols, whence they received the name of Pueri benem ("Theologisch-praktische Quaestura", 1892, 81). Sometimes an uncovered crucifix, or the gospel-book, and often the Blessed Sacrament, was carried in procession. In many parts of England a large and beautiful tent was prepared in the churchyard. Two priests accompanied by lights brought the Blessed Sacrament in a beautiful cup or pyx hung in a shrine of open work to this tent. A long-drawn procession with palms and flowers came out of the church and made four stations at the Lances' cemetery north of the church, at the south side, at the west door, and before the church-yard cross, which was then uncovered. At each of these stations the choir sang the opening of the singing of the first Gospel the shrine with the Blessed Sacrament was borne forward. On meeting all prostrated and kissed the ground. The procession then continued. The door of the church was opened, the priests held up on high the shrine with the Blessed Sacrament, so that all who went in had to go under this shrine, and thus the procession came back into the church. The introduction of the Blessed Sacrament into the Palm Sunday procession is generally ascribed to Bl. Lanfranc who ordered the ceremony for his Abbey of Bec.

Liturgical writers differ in assigning a time for the introduction of the blessing of palms and of the procession. Martene, "De antiqu. eccl. discipl.", xx, 288, finds no mention of them before the eighth or ninth century. Pelliccia, "Christian. eccl. politia", II, 308, is of the same opinion and mentions Arnalius, "De div. off.", I, vi, as the first to speak of them. Biurin, V, 175, on the authority of Severus, Patriarch of Antioch, and of Josue Stylites, states that Peter, Bishop of Edessa, about 397 ordered the benediction of the palms for all the churches of Mesopotamia. The ceremonies had their origin most probably in Jerusalem. In the "Peregrinatio Sylviae", undertaken between 378 and 394, they are thus described: On the Lord’s Day which begins the Paschal, or Great, Week, after all the customary exercises from cock-crow till morn had taken place in the Anastasia and at the Cross, they went to the greater church behind the Cross on Golgotha, called the Martyrium, and here the ordinary Sunday services were held. At the seventh hour (one o’clock p.m.) all proceeded to the Mount of Olives, Eleona, the cave in which Our Lord rested during the Passion, and lessons were recited. About the hour of None (three o’clock p.m.) all went, singing hymns, to the Imonomon, whence Our Lord ascended into heaven. Here two hours more were spent in devotional exercises, until about 5 o’clock, when the passage from the Gospel relating how the children carrying branches and palms met Our Lord, saying “Blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord” was read. At these words all went back to the city, repeating “Blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord.” All the children bore branches of palm or olive. The faithful passed through the city to the Anastasia, and there recited Vesper prayer. Then after a prayer in the church of the Holy Cross all returned to their homes.

In the three oldest Roman Sacramentaries no mention is found of either the blessing of the palms or the procession. The earliest notice is in the “Gregorianum” used in France in the ninth and tenth centuries. It is found among the prayers of the day one that says: “sitientes alter ad vestem palmarum non saepe recitent.” But not on the palms. The name Dominicus in palmis, De passione Dominii occurs in the “Gelasianum”, but only as a superscription and Probst (“Sacramentarien und Ordines”, Münster, 1892, 202) is probably correct in suspecting the first part to be an addition, and the De passione Dominii the original inscription. It seems certain that the bearing of palms during services was the earlier practice, then came the procession, and later the blessing of the palms.

The principal ceremonies of the day are the benediction of the palms, the procession, the Mass, and during it the singing of the Passion. The blessing of the palms follows a ritual similar to that of Mass. On the altar branches of palms are placed between the candelsticks instead of flowers ordinarily used. The palms to be blessed are on a table at the Epistle side or in cathedral churches between the throne and the altar. The bishop performs the ceremony from the throne, the priest at the Epistle side of the altar. An antiphon “Hosanna to the Son of David” is sung as the blessing prayer. The Epistle is read from Exodus, xx, 27-xxvi, 7, narrating the murmuring of the children of Israel in the desert of Sin, and sighing for the flesh stubs of Egypt, and gives the promise of the manna to be sent as food from heaven. The Gradual contains the prophetic words uttered by the high-priest Caiphas, “That it was expedient that one man should die for the people”! and another the prayer of Christ in the Garden of Olives that the chalice might pass; also his admonition to the disciples to watch and pray. The Gospel, taken from St. Matthew, xvi, 1-9, describes the triumphant entry of Christ into Jerusalem when the people greeted him with branches and palm leaves. The people, as he passed, crying, Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. (In private Masses the Gospel is read at the end of Mass instead of that of St. John.) Then follow an oration, a preface, the Sanctus, and Benedictus.

In the five prayers which are thus said the bishop or priest used to recite for the blessing of palm or olive, that they may be a protection to all places into which they may be brought, that the right hand of God may expel all adversity, bless and protect all who dwell in them, who have been redeemed by our Lord Jesus Christ. The prayers make reference to the dove bringing olive to Noah, and to the branches of palm or olive, that the multitude greeting Our Lord; they say that the branches of palms signify victory over the prince of death and the olive the advent of spiritual unction through Christ. The officiating clergyman sprinkles the palms with holy water, inceases them, and, after another prayer, distributes them. During the distribution the choir sings the “Pueri Hebreorum”. The Hebrew children spread their garments in the way, and cried out saying, “Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.” The two following prayers, an antiphon, and a blessing for the people, carrying the blessed palms, the choir in the mean time singing the antiphons “Cum appropinquare”, “Cum audisset”, and others. All march out of the church. On the return of the procession two or four chanters enter the church, close the door and sing the hymn ““O dulce, O benedicta”, which is repeated by those outside. At the end of the service the deacon knocks at the door of the cross, the door is opened, and all enter singing “Ingredientie Domino”. Mass is celebrated, the principal feature of which is the singing of the Passion according to St. Matthew, during which all hold the palms in their hands.

Palm branches have been used by all nations as an emblem of joy and victory over enemies; in Christianity as a sign of victory over the flesh and the world according to Ps. xci, 13, “Justus ut palma florabit”; hence especially associated with the memory of the martyrs. The palms blessed on Palm Sunday were used in the procession of the day, then taken home by the faithful and used as a sacramental. They were preserved in prominent places in the house, in the barns, and in the fields, and thrown into the fire during storms. On the Lower Rhine the custom exists of decorating the grave with blessed palms. From the blessed palms the ashes are procured for Ash Wednesday. In places where palms cannot be found, branches of olive, box elder, spruce or other trees are used and the “Cerimoniales episcoporum”, II, xxxi, 2, suggests that in such cases at least little flowers or crosses made of palm be attached to the olive boughs. In Rome olive branches are distributed to the people, while the clergy carry palms frequently dried and twisted into various shapes. In parts of Bavaria large swag willows, with their catkins, and ornamented with flowers and ribbons, were used.

FRANCIS MERSHAN.

Palmyra, titular metropolitan see in Phœniciæ Secundæ. Solomon (III Kings, ix, 18) built Palmira (A. V. Tadmor) in the wilderness, but it is not certain that this means Palmyra, the Greek name of Tadmor, and the reference may be to Thamar (Ezr., xvi, 19).

For a long time it was a market for the Romans and Parthians, as it was situated on the route of the caravans. The city had a Greek constitution, made use of the era of the Seleucids, the Macedonian calendar, and a Semitic alphabet; the language was a dialect of Aramaic. Hadrian visited it in 129 and thenceforth the town was called Hadriana Palmyra. Its prosperity and monuments date from this period. The Romans used it as a starting-point for their expeditions against the Parthians. Septimius Severus and Alexander Severus sojourned there. In 258 Septimius Odenath, the descendant of a local dynasty, was Prince of Palmyra. He proclaimed himself king in 290, and in 294 received the title of emperor. After his death (297) his infant son was placed under the regency of Zenobia. She established an embassy with the assistance of her ministers Longinus and Paul of Samosata, Bishop of Antioch, conquered Egypt and a part of Asia Minor. In 272 the Emperor Aurelian sacked Palmyra and carried off Zenobia a prisoner. Diodorice established a camp there where the first Illyrian Legion, after a short sojourn, Julianian returned it in the sixth century, “Procopius, De Aedifici-to the Bay of San Francisco, and on 1 December, planted the cross on Point Lobos in view of the Golden Gate and Pacific Ocean, the first priest to reach that point. In June, 1776, he accompanied Lieutenant Moraga to the same bay, and on the 28th performed the first holy Mass on the spot later under the Mission Dolores (q. v.) or San Francisco, which Father Palou founded a few weeks after. He remained in charge until July, 1781, when he was called to Mission San Carlos in order to administer the last sacraments to his fatherly friend and superior, Father Junipero Serra. When the latter had passed away on 28 August, 1784, Father Palou became acting president of the missions. Age, ill-health, and the necessity of having an experienced advocate near the vice-regal court to defend the rights of the Indians and their spiritual guards against the assumptions of the govenor, induced Father Palou to retire to the College of San Fernando in September of 1785. In July of the following year he was elected guardian of the college and held this office until his death. While in charge at Mission San Francisco, he compiled his "Noticias" in four volumes. It is the standard history of the California missions from 1767 to 1834.

Palmira, Palou, Francisco, Friar Minor, b. at Palma, Island of Majorca, about 1722; d. in 1780 or 1790. He entered the Franciscan order at his native place. In 1740 he began the study of philosophy under the illustrious Father Junipero Serra. With the latter he volunteered for the American Indian missions, and joined the missionary College of San Fernando de Mexico early in 1740. With his friend he was also in the same year assigned to the Indian missions of the Sierra Gorda, north of Queretaro, and laboured there until 1759 when with Father Serra he was recalled in order to work among the Indians in the San Sabis region, Texas. For some reason the college failed to accept these missions. Father Palou was then employed in the City of Mexico until 1761 when with Father Serra and another Franciscan friar he was sent to Lower California. In April, 1768, on reaching Loreto, he was given charge of Mission San Francisco Javier. In the following year, when Father Serra proceeded to establish the missions of Upper California, Father Palou succeeded him in the office of superior of the lower missions. While at the head of the friars in Lower California, he demonstrated his eminent fitness for the position in a prolonged struggle with the hostile Governor, Philippe Barte, whom he held at bay, and whose schemes against the missions and Indians he defeated while in the territory. When in 1775 the Franciscans turned the provinces over to the Dominican Fathers, Father Palou joined his brethren in Lower California, and acted as superior until the return from Mexico of Father Serra in 1774. In November of that year he accompanied Captain Rivera's exploring expedition 1784 At San Carlos Mission a small, but written by Father Serra which contains the history of the first nine missions, San Diego to San Buenaventura.
PAMELIUS

Doctor and Master of Theology in 1314. Wishing to devote his life to teaching and writing, he avoided all offices in the Church, except that of preaching. Twice, however, he was sent as deacon to the Provence of France to the General Chapter. John XXII, wishing to organize a Crusade, sent him in 1318 as legate to the Court of Flanders, in the hope of establishing peace between the prince and the King of France. The mission was not successful, and his associates made charges to the pope against the legate, who, however, easily cleared himself. He was also a member of the commission appointed by John XXII to examine the writings of Petrus Olivi, whose books contained some errors of the Fraticelli (Denzing, 48-91, interesting account in Terroux). About this time he wrote De causis mundi et delictis et autochthonicis potestatis of 1320, a political dissertation against John of Pally, whose errors were condemned 25 July, 1321 (Denzinger, 491, 495). In 1329 the pope called him to Avignon, and consecrated him Patriarch of Jerusalem. The same year he journeyed into Egypt, to negotiate with the sultan for the deliverance of the Holy Land. The sultan was amenable. The account of which the patriarch gave of the miserable condition of the Holy Land led to the appointment of another Crusade, but owing to apathy, and dissensions among the Christian princes, the project failed. Peter resumed his studies, composing at this time his commentaries on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, in which he conducts Bonaventura. In 1332 he was appointed by the King of France to preside over the deliberations of a body of prelates and theologians whom Philip had convoked to Versailles to discuss the charge made against John XXII, of asserting that the souls of the just will not be admitted to the beatific vision until after the general judgment. The patriarch and his associates manifested consummate prudence in dealing with this matter. In a letter to the king they declared (1) that his entire submission to the pope's authority, and their filial devotion to his person; (2) their belief, based on the testimony of trustworthy witnesses, that John XXII had not held, much less taught, the opinion attributed to him, but at the most, had mentioned it (rectando) and examined it; (3) that since the death of Christ the souls of the just with no faults to expiate immediately after death, and the souls of other just persons after complete purgation, are admitted to the beatific vision after a longer or shorter foretime. This doctrine was defined by Benedict XII, 29 Jan., 1335 (Denzinger, 530). Besides the works mentioned, Patenkouw wrote commentaries on all the books of the Bible, and "Concordantiae ad Summam S. Thomam" (Salamanca, 1552).

D. J. Kennedy.

Pamellius (Jacques de Jorgy de Pamele), Belgian theologian, b. at Bruges, Flamard, 13 May, 1536; d. at Mons in Hainaut, 19 September, 1587. He was educated at the Cistercian Abbey of Bonelle in the Province of Namur; studied philosophy at Louvain, and on 27 March, 1533, he was promoted magister artium. For the next nine years he studied theology under the supervision and with the approval of the Abbot. He returned to Louvain and after receiving the baccalaureate he followed the course of the Sorbonne. On 19 June, 1561, he was made a canon of St-Donatien at Bruges, and was ordained priest probably 21 February, 1562. He visited all the libraries of the Low Countries to procure manuscripts and unprinted works, and devoted himself to the publication of rare texts. Beginning with the "Micrologus de ecclesiasticis observationibus" (Antwerp, 1563), a valuable liturgical commentary on the Roman "Ordin" which dates probably from the beginning of the twelfth century. From 1569 to 1571, Pamellius was dean of the chæristre of Bruges. He was appointed (1570) a member of the commission for the examination of books by René Drieux, Bishop of Bruges, and aided in the publication of the "Index expurgatorius" of 1571. In 1574 he replaced George de Vrieze as scholar of the chapter of St-Donatio and shared in the installation of the college of the Jesuits at Bruges in 1575. The protection which Pamellius extended to the victims of Calvinistic violence at Bruges drew upon him the hatred of the heretics and he was obliged to withdraw to Douai. In 1581 the chapter of St-Omer promoted him to the dignity of the Archdeaconate of Flanders. After the death of Bishop Drieux in 1582 he was elected to the succession in the See of St-Omer, but Pamellius died before receiving his bulls of confirmation. Besides the "Micrologus", he wrote "Lituraria latinnara" (Cologne, 1571); "De religionibus diversis non admitterandis... recito" (Antwerp, 1589); a catalogue of ancient commentaries on the Bible (Antwerp, 1586); and he edited the works of St. Cyprian (1566), Terrutalis (Paris, 1583), and Rhabanus Maurus (Cologne, 1557)."
when John XXII raised Toulouse to an archbishopric. 22 Feb., 1318, he also extended the Diocese of Panniers which he made suffragan of Toulouse. Saisset's successor was Jacques Fournier (1317-26), subsequently pope under the name of Benedict XII (q.v.). Vidal discovered in the Vatican Library the record of the procedure of the Inquisition tribunal created at Panniers, by Jacques Fournier in 1317, at the excommunication of the inhabitants of Albigeois in the Foix region; this document is most important for the history of the Inquisition, representing as it does, and perhaps in this instance only, that particular tribunal in which the monastic inquisitor and the diocesan bishop had almost equal power, as decreed in 1312 by the Council of Tournai. Vidal therefore made his official report of the inquisitional procedure of the Inquisition was made milder by temporizing with the accused who persisted in error, by granting defendants a fair amount of liberty, and by improving the prison regime. Among the noteworthy bishops of Panniers were Cardinal Arnaud de Villeneuve (1348-50); Cardinal Ananien d'Arbret (1592-96); John of Barbancourt (1550-53), who became a Calvinist; Robert of Pellevé (1557-79), during whose episcopate the religious wars gave rise to cruel strife; protestants destroyed every church in Panniers, among them the magnificent cathedral of Notre-Dame du Camp, and three times they demolished the episcopal palace of the Mas Saint-Antonin. Hugues Spoladour, of Pamiers, who was married and continued the Ecclesiastical Annals of his friend Baronius; the Jansenist François Etienne de Canet (1644-1680).

B.—See of Concarneau or Concarneau.—According to St. Gregory of Tours, the first bishop was St. Valère (Valieris) before the sixth century. Bishop Glycerius consecrated the Chapel of the Virgin in 596. According to Mgr Duchène he should be identified with a certain Licerius (St. Lizer) whom the "Gallia Christiana" places lower in the list of bishops; he was patron saint of St-Lizier, the episcopal residence of the bishops of Concarneau, suffragans of Arz. The historian Bishop Pierre de Marra (1643-52) president of the Parliament of Navarre, was subsequently Bishop of Toulouse and Arch bishop of Paris.

C.—See of Rieux, erected by John XXII in 1317, as suffragan to the archiepiscopal See of Toulouse. Among its bishops were: Cardinal de Rabastens (1317-21); Cardinal de St-Martial (1359-72);

D.—See of Mirapoix, erected by John XXII in 1317, as suffragan to the archiepiscopal See of Toulouse. Among its bishops were: Jacques Fournier (1320-37); David Béthion, Cardinal de Balfour (1537-46); Innocent, Cardinal de Montis (1553-55); Jean Sua vies, Cardinal de Mirapoix (1553-60); the academici an Boyer, preceptor to the Dauphin, father of Louis XVI (1729-1774). The Diocese of Panniers specially honours St. Germain, martyr (date unknown) who gave his name to the city of St-Girons. The Council of Panniers in 1212 drew up forty-nine articles concerning the police of the States of Simon de Montfort, and of the other segmentors to whom had been given the lands of the defeated Albigeois; the clergy (See PAMPENGUES). In a council held at Foix in 1226, Cardinal de Saint-Ane, Honorius III's legate, absolved Bernard, Count of Foix, who had become a follower of the Albigenes, of the crime of heresy. The celebrated Guè de Levis who had the title of "Mércal du la foi et des croisés," received in acknowledgement of his conduct in the defeat of Albigeois the eclesiastic (See PAMPENGUES). He had the property of the house of Levis until the revolution. Aside from the pilgrimage of St. Antonin at Panniers, the chief pilgrimage centres are: Notre-Dame d'Aix les Thermes; Notre-Dame du Camp at Panniers; Notre-Dame de Celles at Celles; Notre-Dame de Puis in the valley of Aran; Notre Dame du Marsan at St-Lizier, pilgrimage centre dating back to the tenth century; Notre-Dame de Sabart, established after a victory won by Charles the Simple over the Saracens; Notre-Dame du Val d'Amour, at Belest; Notre-Dame de Vals; Notre-Dame de Varilhes. Pilgrims are also attracted to St Martin of Oydes by the relics of St. Anastasius, by St. Anthony's Catezat, and by the miraculous fountain of St. Eutrope, which was dedicated to St. Li- zer after St. Li- zer had been praying to St. John the Baptist. Prior to the enforcement of the Law of 1901, the Diocese of Panniers had Dominicans, Carmelites monks and teaching Brothers. At the beginning of the twelfth century, the religious congregations of the diocese had charge of 19 day nurseries, 2 orphanages for girls. In Vial pipes there are 10 hospitals, 1 insane asylum, 2 houses of nuns for the care of the sick in their own homes. In 1905 (last year of the period covered by the Concordat) the Diocese of Panniers had a population of 210,527, with 22 parishes, 321 mission churches, 20 vicariates subventions.

Pammachi. Saint, Roman senator, d. about 409. In youth he frequented the schools of rhetoric under St. Jerome. In 383 he married the daughter of St. Paula. He became, probably among the viti genere optimi religione parclarii, who in 399 denounced Jovinian to Pope St. Siricius (Ambrose, Ep. xii). When he attacked St. Jerome's book against Jovinian for prudential reasons, Jerome wrote him two letters (Epp. xxviii-ix, ed. Vallarsi) thanking him; the first, vindicating the book, was probably intended for publication. On Paulina's death in 397, Pammachi became a monk, that is, put on a religious habit and gave himself up to works of charity (Jerome, Ep. lvii; Paulinus of Nola, Ep. xviii). In 399 Pammachi and Oceanus wrote to St. Jerome asking him to translate Origen's "De Principis", and repudiate the instrumental of Rhabanus of St. John of Toulouse. Jerome, himself with regard to Origen, St. Jerome replied the following year (Epp. lxxxiii-li). In 101 Pammachi was thanked by St. Augustine (Ep. lviii) for a letter he wrote to the people of Xumida, where he owned property, exhorting them to abandon the Donatist schism. Many of St. Jerome's Commentaries on Scripture were dedicated to Pammachi. After his wife's death Pammachi built in conjunction with St. Fabiola (Jerome, Ep. lix, lxxiv), a hospice at Porto, at the mouth of the Tiber, for poor strangers. The site has been excavated, and the excavations have disclosed the plan and the arrangement of this only building of its kind. Rooms and halls for the sick and poor were grouped around it (Fraxchamer, "The Monuments of Christian Rome," p. 49). The church of SS. John and Paul was founded either by Pammachi or his father. It was anciently known first as the Titulus Bizantius, and then as the Titulus Pammachii. The feast of Pammachi is kept on 30 August.

Pamphilus, bishop of Antioch, to whom the Church in Cappadocia, Asia Minor, and Egypt addressed letters in the name of the First, Second, and Third Ecumenical Councils (see PATROLOGIA ORTHODOR, ill. 169, 174, 177; EUSEBIUS, HIST. ECCLES., IV. 2, 15, 16).

F. J. BACCHUS

Pamphilus of Casarea, Saint, martyred 309. Eusebius's Life of Pamphilus is lost, but from his "Martyrs of Palestine” we learn that Pamphilus belonged to a noble family of Beirat (in Phœnicia), where he received a good education, and that he inherited his native land after selling all his property and giving the proceeds to the poor. He attached himself to the “perfect men”. From Photius (cod. 118), who took his information from Pamphilus’s “Apology for Origen”, we learn that he went to Alexandria where he received his education from the famous Greek grammatical School. He eventually settled in Cesarea, where he was ordained priest, collected his famous library, and established a school for theological study (Eusebius, “Hist. ecle.”, VII, xxxii, 25). He devoted himself chiefly to producing accurate copies of the Holy Scriptures. Testimonies to his zeal and care in this work he bears to be in the third book of his Christian MSS. (for examples see Eusebius of Cesarea). St. Jerome (“De Vir. Ill.”, xxxv) says that Pamphilus “transcribed the greater part of the works of Origen with his own hand”, and that “these are still preserved in the library of Cesarea.” He himself was a possessor of “twenty-five volumes of commentaries of Origen”, copied out by Pamphilus, which he locked upon as the most precious relic of the martyr. Eusebius (“Hist. ecle.”, VI, xxxii) speaks of the catalogue of the library contained in his life of Pamphilus. A passage from the lost life, quoted by St. Jerome (“Adv. Rуn., I, iv”), describes how Pamphilus supplied poor scholars with the necessities of life, and, not merely gave copies of the Scriptures of which he kept a large supply. He likewise bestowed copies on women devoted to study. The great treasure of the library at Cesarea was Origen’s own copy of the Hexapla, probably the only complete copy ever made. It was consulted by St. Jerome (“In Psalmus comm.”, ed. Morin, pp. 5, 21). “In Epistol. ad. Tit.”). The library was certainly in existence in the sixth century, but probably did not long survive the capture of Cesarea by the Saracens in 638 (Swete, “Introduct. to O. T. in Greek”, 74–5).

The Diocletian persecution began in 303. In 306 a young man named Appolinus—a disciple of Pamphilus “while no one was aware; he even concealed it from us who were even in the same house” (Eusebius, “Martyrs of Palestine”)—interrupted the governor in the act of offering sacrifice, and paid for his boldness with a terrible martyrdom. His brother Eleasus, also a disciple of Pamphilus, suffered martyrdom about the same time at Alexandria under similar circumstances (ibid.). Pamphilus himself, it appears, was brought before the governor and, on refusing to sacrifice, was cruelly tortured, and then relegated to prison. In prison he continued coping and correcting MSS. (see Eusebius of Cesarea). He also composed, in collaboration with Eusebius, an “Apology for Origen” in five books (Eusebius afterwards added a sixth). Pamphilus and other members of his household, men “in the full vigour of mind and body”, were without further torture sentenced to be beheaded in Feb., 309. While sentence was being given a youth named Porphyrus—“the slave of Pamphilus”, “the beloved disciple of Pamphilus”, who “had been instructed in literature and was the most likely candidate for burial. He was cruelly tortured and put to death, the news of his martyrdom being brought to Pamphilus before his own execution.

Of the “Apology for Origen” only the first book is extant, and that in a Latin version made by Rufinus. It begins with describing the extravagant bitterness of the persecution, the authority, of great authority in the Church of his day, and honoured with the priesthood. He was above all things anxious to keep to the rule of faith that had come down from the Apostles. The soundness of his doctrine concerning the Trinity and the Incarnation is then vindicated by copious extracts from his writings. The time charges against his teaching are confronted with passages from his works. St. Jerome stated in his “De Viris illustratis” that there were two apologists—one by Pamphilus and another by Eusebius. He discovered it was difficult to refute Rufinus’ translation appeared in the height of the Origenistic controversy, and rushed to the conclusion that Eusebius was the sole author. He charged Rufinus, among other things, with palming off under the name of the martyr what was really the work of the heterodox Eusebius, and with suppressing orthodox passages. As to the first accusation there is abundant evidence that the “Apology” was the joint work of Pamphilus and Eusebius. Against the second may be set the negative testimony of Photius who had read the original. Photius, who was severe to excess towards the slightest semblance of Aramaism, remarked no suchwant in the Apology of Origen, in which he searched in vain. The Canons of the alleged Council of the Apostles at Antioch were ascribed by their compiler (late fourth century) to Pamphilus (Harnack, “Spread of Christianity”, I, 86–100). The ascription to Pamphilus, by Gennadius, of a treatise “Contra mathematicos” was a blunder due to a misunderstanding of Rуninus’s pref- face to the “Apology”. A Summary of the Acts of the Apostles among the writings associated with Euthalius bears in its inscription the name of Pamphilus (P. G., LXXIX, 619 sqq.).

Pamplona, Diocease of (Pamplonensis), comprises almost all of Navarre and part of Guipuzcoa. This diocese is said to date from Apostolic times. It is matter of tradition in the churches of Pamplona, Toulouse, and Languedoc.” That St. Saturninus, disciple of St. Peter, sent from Toulouse to the priest Honestus to preach to the inhabitants of Navarre, and later came in person. Finding that Honestus had already made many converts, Saturninus left him in Pamplona. Honestus was the teacher of St. Firminus (son of the senator Firmus), first Bishop of Pamplona. Firminus went later into France, where he was martyred at Amiens. There is no note of any other Bishop of Pamplona until 589, when Liulius signed as such in the Third Council of Toledo. During the seventh century other bishops are known as signatories of various councils of Toledo. It was not until the ninth century whether the Arabs succeeded in establishing themselves in Pamplona (Ferraris affirms and Moret denies it); at all events, there is no record of a Bishop of Pamplona from the Saracen invasion until the reign of Ophimus (829). The old cathedral had meanwhile fallen into ruins, and the bishops now took refuge in the monastery of San Salvador de Leyre (founded in the eighth century). Inigo Arista recovered Pamplona in 1135 or 1149, and restored the monastery, converting it into a stronghold. This was for a long time the episcopal court and see, and bither Arista had transferred the bodies of the holy virgins Nunilha and Aldina, martyred at Huesca in the time of Alber-Raimundo II.

It was the wish of Sancho the Elder to introduce into the church the Cluniac reform, but the bishops and abbeys (e. g. in the Council of Pamplona of 1023) resisted until 1000, during the reign of Sancho Ramirez. In the said council they resolved to restore the see of Pamplona to that amount of dignity which it enjoyed before, and that the see of Pamplona should be thereafter of the monastery of Leyre like Sancho I, which then occupied the see. In 1025 the monks of Leyre were affiliated with the canons of Pamplona, and Juan II took the title of Bishop of Pamplona and Leyre, and signed in a number of decrees “Sancho, ecclesie Navarrensis rector”. Until the reign of Sancho Ramirez (1065–91) Leyre remained the seat of the bishops of Pamplona. The monastery held under its jurisdiction fifty-eight towns and seventy-two religious houses, and was besides the mausoleum of the Kings of Navarre. Theobald I brought Cistercian monks to Leyre, but at the end of the same century the monks of Cluny returned and occupied it for some time. The monastery is now in ruins.

The town and the cathedral of Pamplona, known as the "Santo Domingo de la Calzada," was founded by Saint Mary of the river and the cathedral stands on the site of its ancient predecessor, the "Sanctissima Trinitas," destroyed by the Moors. The present cathedral was begun in 789 and completed in 798 under Bishop Sancho Caliz of Pamplona. The monument is a fine example of Romanesque architecture. The cathedral is dedicated to the Virgin Mary and St. James the Great, the patron saint of the city. The cathedral was the seat of the bishop of Pamplona until 1834, when it was suppressed.

In the 12th century, the cathedral was destroyed by the Moors and rebuilt by the Castilian kings. The present cathedral was erected in the 14th century and completed in the 15th century. It is a large, spacious building, with a high nave and aisles, and a tall, pointed arch.

The cathedral is an important center of Christian worship, and is a popular tourist destination. It is also a center of cultural and artistic activity, hosting regular concerts, exhibitions, and other events.

The town of Pamplona is situated in the valley of the Arga River, on the northern side of the Pyrenees, and is the capital of the province of Navarre. The region is known for its strong Basque culture and traditions, and is famous for the annual Running of the Bulls festival, which takes place in the town square on the first weekend of July.
The Panama Canal is a high-level canal, with a summit elevation of eighty-five feet above the sea, reached by six locks: three at Gatun, one at Pedro Miguel, and two at Miraflores.

The Atlantic terminus is at Colon and the Pacific terminus at Panama Bay. The course of the canal is from northwest to southeast, the Pacific end being twenty-eight miles east of the Atlantic.

The total length from deep water in the Caribbean Sea to deep water in the Pacific Ocean is about fifty miles, and from shore to shore approximately forty and one-half miles.

The Panama Canal shortens the ocean distances between the eastern and western parts of the United States about eight thousand nautical miles.
stitution of Panama provides for a National Legislature (Asamblea, or Chamber of Deputies) elected by the people on the basis of one deputy to every 10,000 inhabitants, to meet on 1 September of every alternate year; a president elected for a term of four years, and two vice-presidents. The president is assisted by a Cabinet of five members. José Domingo de Obaldía, who had been president in 1908, was succeeded by Amador Guerrero, who died during his term of office (1 March, 1910) and was succeeded by Vice-President C. A. Mendoza.

Religious Conditions.—The succession of the Isthmus of Panama, comprising the Department and District of Panama, to the Republic of Colombia, took place when the Constitutional Government of that republic had a Catholic representation, and, after three years of civil war, the enemies of religion seemed, politically, vanquished. None of the promoters of the independence of Panama seemed to contemplate any religious change. But in order to rally to the Separatist movement the forces of the Liberal doctrinaires, so as to win over the great mass of the population to the cause of independence, the leaders had to make terms with them. Besides, some of the chief promoters of the cause, being anxious to adopt every North-American idea and custom, and not merely those which seemed likely to be beneficial, conceived the notion that there was the basis assumed as an axiomatic truth that separation of Church and State was the only means of uniting those of different creeds for the common purpose of self-government and progress. In spite of the protestations which Manuel Amador Guerrero, who led the way to independence, had made to the bishop—to the effect that the political transformation would lead to no change in the relations of Panama with the Holy See, and that the missions should receive all possible support—when the Constituent Assembly began to elaborate the constitution of the new nation, it was barely admitted that a great part of the inhabitants were Catholics. The intercourse with the Holy See, which existed in accordance with the terms of the Colombian Concordat of 1887, was not recognized. The obligation of paying to the Diocese of Panama a fixed sum in compensation, or restitution, for the church property previously confiscated by the Colombian Government, and now in possession of many citizens of Panama, was not admitted. The affirmation for the Conciliar Seminary and the missions might be considered somewhat equivalent, although the title of the Church, in strict justice, to receive these contributions as the State's creditor, was ignored. Since it was voted, this appropriation has been religiously complied with, in spite of the efforts of certain individuals to curtail, withhold, or divert it.

The National Legislatures (Asambleas), successors of the Constituent Assembly, have continued to yield to the Liberal majority, which has manifested anti-Catholic tendencies. The cemeteries have been besieged (Law 29 of 1903), in virtual derogation of the religious charter of the Republic of Colombia years before and confirmed in the above-mentioned concordat with the Holy See. This concordat had been recognized as a law by the Colombian Republic, and it was specially declared to be still in force—at least so far as concerned this point—by the new-born nation of Panama. The cemeteries were left at the free disposal of the municipalities. Fortunately, these bodies, representing the village communities, are, as a rule, composed of Christian men. There is also a tendency to secularize education, not merely by submitting it entirely to state control or supervision, but by introducing teachers and doctrines hostile to religious instruction. The budget of the public service has not waited for legal measures, but have attempted to impose their views on the school system and on the pupils.

The Diocese of Panama (Panamáenca) was erected by Leo X in 1520 (Anulario Pont.) or in 1515, or by Clement VII, in 1534 (Moroni, "Diz. di Erud. Storico-Ecle."). It was at first suffragan of Lima, but is now of Cartagena. Its territory coincides with that of the republic. The present incumbent of the see (1911), Mgr F. X. Junguito, 8 J., was b. at Bogota, 3 Dec., 1855, and was educated at the seminary there. He became bishop, residing in the City of Panama, is assisted by his vicar-general, the priest of the most populous parish, his secretary, the priest of the parish of the Sagrado, and two other secular priests, who, with the assistance of a residence of the Jesuit Fathers (seven priests), one of the Lazarists (five priests), and one of the Discalced Carmelites (two brothers), labour to supply the spiritual needs of the 30,000 inhabitants, at least two-thirds of whom are Catholics. The community of Christian Brothers, from whom the present government took away the normal school, to incorporate it in the Acrossed Institution, conducts in Panama a primary school recognized by the State, and an independent college which is now in jeopardy, being non-official. The same congregation has similar schools at Colon and in each of the six most important centres of population. The Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul have, at Panama, a primary school for girls, with 100 pupils, a house of the Order of the Holy Family, independent of the State, a government asylum, and another institution which is supported by the eclesiastic authority. It will be easy for them to open the beneficent institutions which are eagerly solicited of them at two or three other places.

The religious interests of the Catholics who are employed at the Canal Zone are cared for at Ancon, Balboa, Culebra, Empire, Gorgona, Gatun, Cristobal, and Colon by priests specially qualified for the work by their knowledge of several languages. The Lazarists are to establish a residence at Gorgona, to give more attention to the natives, who avoid places where the Americans are numerous under the belief that the Northern strangers look down upon them. By this means priests are provided for every Catholic in the Canal Zone, though there are not enough to work the parishes properly. The Salesians Fathers of Don Bosco have lately come to Panama to care for a parish in a quarter of the city which is entirely inhabited by the negro race, and to carry on the principal railroad station. In this neighbourhood they have opened an orphan asylum which, with astonishing rapidity, is preparing the way for a school of arts and manufactures destined to educate good Christian workmen. The Salesians number three priests and two brothers who act as masters or managers of the work. They formerly had the direction of the School of Arts and Crafts (Escuela de Artes y Oficios) established by the Government, and everything went prosperously until their anti-clerical opponents forced them to resign.

Pandects (Pandecte, or Digesta).—This part of Justinian's compilation was his most important contribution to jurisprudence (see JUSTINIAN I). The language of d'Aguesseau, applied by him to pre-Napoleonic Continental law, has equal application to the Common Law System. The reasons underlying legal institutions are either historical or logical; and even logical reasons can be arrived at through the law of the Pandects. There is no other standard of comparative jurisprudence. D'Aguesseau pithily observes: "Justice has fully unveiled her mysteries only to the Roman jurists. They are the safest interpreters of our own laws: they lend their spirit to our usages; their reason to our customs; and, by the principles they give us, serve as our guides even when we walk in paths that were unknown to them." Of the Pandects, Prost de Roven says: "It is an immense edifice, without distribution, without proportion, without ensemble. The pediments have disappeared, the columns are broken, the statues are mutilated; it is no longer imposing by its grandeur, by the beauty of its parts, by the richness of its details. After so many centuries, the digging goes on, as our artists still go to seek rules and models among the ruins of Palmyra, of Athens and of Rome."

Hastily compiled by Tribonian and his associates (in a scant three years) from the writings of those eminent jurists, the Pandects leave much to be desired in arrangement and abound in repetitions and anomolies. The arrangement, which follows that of the Perpetual Edict, is traditional, rather than scientific. The adjective, or remedial, element dominates the classification. Although more rights were actually defined or capable of definition in the Roman legal system than is even now possible in the Common Law System, no classification based upon rights was evolved. The thing classified was an actual system of law, and the only principles of arrangement were those of tradition and convenience. Neither the jurists nor the compilers were concerned with theoretical jurisprudence. The materials of the Digest were not written into a continuous text. The fragments gave the name of the jurist and the book from which they are taken. This method was designed to perpetuate the fame of the jurists and we thus enjoy a certain familiarity with them, although their writings for the greater part have perished. There are four hundred and thirty-two "titles" contained in the fifty books of the Digest. The whole is divided into seven parts: the first, called "Praetor," has four books (I-XI); the second, "De justicia," seven books (X-XVI); the third, "De rebus," eight books (XII-XIX); the fourth, "Umbilicius," eight books (XX-XXVII); the fifth, "De testamentis," nine books (XXVI-XXXI-X); the sixth, with a great variety of matters, eight books (XXXVI-XXXVII), the seventh part, six books (XXVIII-XX). The sixth and seventh parts seem to have had no special designation. This division into seven parts was never of practical importance. The later, or accidental, arbitrary division adopted by the glossators during the Middle Ages was probably due to the order of time in which the materials became available for the production of a complete universal. The division was as follows: "Digestum vetus" (bk. 1-XXIV, tit. 2); the "Institutum" (bk. XXIV, tit. 3-XXV); the "Tres partes" (bk. XXX, tit. 2-XXXIII); the "Digestum novum" (bk. XXXIV). The vulgar MSS., are in three recensions: the "Institutum," with the "Tres partes." The first printed editions follow this valueless division, and it was abandoned only in the seventeenth century. The celebrated fragment from Gaius (a facsimile of which, as it appears in the Florentine MS., is shown in the accompanying illustration): "Omne jus quo ulterior vel est ad personas vel ad res vel ad actiones" (Every right which we enjoy concerns either persons, or things or actions) is not an Aristotelian division of law, but was not so regarded by Gaius himself, and was given no importance as a canons of classification by the compilers of the Digest.

The Florentine MS.—The rediscovery of the Pisan, or Florentine, MS. of the Pandects has been regarded as the critical secular event for modern civilization by those who associate the revival of Roman law with the legend of Amalfi. Charlemagne, who destroyed the Lombard monachery (c. 800), was unable to find a copy of the works of Justinian. Yves de Chardres, three centuries later, mentions fragments, and shortly after his death the legendary narrative begins. Neither accepts it and relates the circumstances in which the "complete copia" of the Pandects emerged from the shadows of the tomb as by a miracle of Divine Providence".

During the siege of Amalfi (about 1136 or 1137), the Emperor Lothair II, sustaining the cause of Innocent II against Roger, Count of Sicily, champion of the anti-pope Pietro Pier Leone (see Anacleto II), recovered the priceless MS. and gave it to the Pisans as a reward for their great service in furnishing Pandeקט. — In the sixteenth century the Roman law was received in Germany and became the positive common law. The law of the Pandekten in the special sense is Roman law, as a body of actual law, modern Roman law "modified by the Canon law, the customary law of Italy and Germany, and by the statute of the German Empire." The Pandekten, as part of the Breviary, but without giving the Breviary, is a part of the Pandekten. The pure private law of Rome, the Roman law of the sixth century, is generally designated Institutionen. The Pandekten, in the special sense, since the adoption of the new German Civil Code, are no longer of legal efficacy in Germany.

PANGE

When his pitying Creator
Did this second Tree prepare, Destined, many ages later,
That first evil to repair.
(Father Caswall.)

Thus God made Man an Infant lies,
And in the manger weeping cries;
Its sacred limbs by Mary bound,
The poorest tattered rags surround;
And God's incarnate feet and hands
Are closely bound with swathing-bands.
(St. Office, 1763.)

Soon the sweetest blossom wasting,
Drops its head and withered lies;
Early thus to Calvary hastening,
On the cross the Saviour dies;
Freedly death for all men tasting,
There behold our sacrifice.
(R. Campbell.)

ix
Bend, O noble Tree, thy branches;
Let thy fibres yielding lie,
Let the rigid strength be softened
Which in birth was given thee,
That the limbs of our dear Jesus
May be stretched most tenderly.
(Amer. Eev. Rev., 819.)

The selected stanzas do not exhaust the examples of Catholic versions, but offer some variety in metre and in rhyming schemes. They represent neither the best nor the worst work of their authors in the translation of this hymn. In the preface to his "Annu sanctorum" Orbly Shipped declared that "the love of Catholics for their hymns is no recent ... fancy and the rigid strength are softened, in extent, not less worthy in merit than attempts of Protestant translators, facts overlooked even by Catholic translators." This thought is worthy of much consideration in view of the fact that the English version in the Marquess of Bute's translation of the Roman Breviary (1, 109), in the (Baltimore) "Manual of Prayers" (174), and Freer's "Catholic Church Hymnal" (p. 48), was the work of an Anglican, Dr. Neale.

It may well be doubted if any translator has expressed better in English verse the strength and nobility of the original Latin than did the unknown Catholic author of the version found in the Divine Office of 1763 (given in stanza v above). Daniel gives the following stanza (Thes. Hymnal, i, 109):

Quando judex orbis ultro vectus est veneris,
Et crudcis taur peirem inter astra fulsit,
O sus anxius ambos et salutis aurora.

which Neale translates (Medieval Hymns, 3rd ed., p. 5) and thinks ancient though not original; but Daniel's source is the "Corona Hymnorum" (Cologne, 1806). The text reads "salsur anchora." Daniel also gives (IV, 68) four stanzas which Mone thought might be of the seventh century; but they would add nothing to the beauty or neat perfection of the hymn. For first lines, authors, dates of translation, etc., see Julian, "Dict. of Hymnol.", 880-881, 1865. For Latin text and translation with comment, see "Amer. Eev. Rev.", March, 1894, Dec., 1902, and H. A. and M., Historical Eev. (London, 1909, No. 107).

1. THE HYMN OF ST. THOMAS ÀQUINAS.—Composed by the saint (see LAUDA SON) for the Office of Corpus Christi (see CORPUS CHRISTI, FEAST OF), including the last stanza (which borrows the words "Genitori Genitore")—"Procedenti ab utroque, Compare from the first two strophes of the second sequence of Adam of St. Victor for Pentecost) the hymn comprises six stanzas appearing in the MSS.
Pange, lingua, gloriæ corporis mysterium.
Sanguinisque pretiosi quem in mundi pretium
Fructus ventris generosi Rex effudit zeum.

Written in accentual rhythm, it imitates the triumphant march of the hymn of Fortunatus, and like it is divided in the Roman Breviary into stanzas of six lines whose alternating triple rhyming is declared by Pe- mont to be a new feature in medieval hymnody. In the Roman Breviary the hymn is assigned to both Vespers, but of old the Church of Salisbury placed it in Matins, that of Toulouse in First Vespers only, that of Saint-Germain-des-Prés at Second Vespers only, and that of Strasbourg at Compline. It is sung in the procession to the repository on Holy Thursday and also in the procession of Corpus Christi and in that of the Forty Hours' Adoration.

With respect to the metre, M. de Marcellus, quoted in Migne's "Littérature", remarks that the hymn is composed in the long trochaic verses such as are found in Catullus, Seneca, Sophocles, and Euripides. In addition to the felicitous rhythm chosen by St. Thomas, critics recognize its poetic and hymnodal values (thus Neale: "This hymn contests the second place among those of the Western Church with the Veilla Rejas, the Stabat Mater, the Jesu dulcis memoria, the Ad Regias Agnii Dapes, the Ad Superman, and one or two others ..."), and its peculiar qualities, its logophoric precision, and force of almost argumentative statement (Duffield, "Latin Hymns", 269), in which qualities "it excels all these mentioned" by Neale.

The translations have not been many nor felicitous. Generis in the first stanza is not "generous" (as in Neale's version) but "noble" (as in Caswall's). But as Neale truly says, "the great charm of the translation is the fourth verse" (i.e., "Verbum caro panem verum, etc."); so full is it of verbal and real antithesis. To illustrate the question of translation we select from the specimen versions the fourth stanza, since its peculiar condensation of thought and phrase, dogmatic precision and illuminating antithesis, have made it "a bow of Ulysses to translators".

It's text is:

Verbum caro panem verum
Verbo carmen efficit;
Fiteaque sanguis Christi meruit;
Et si sensus deficit,
Ad Iamnudium cor sinecru
Sola iubes sufficit.

A literal translation would be: "The Word (made)-Flesh makes by (His) word true bread into flesh; and wine becomes Christ's blood; and if the (unassisted) intellect fails (to recognize all this), faith alone suffices to assure the pure heart". Sensus (singular) is taken here to indicate the inner sense, as distinguished from sensus (plural) of the following stanza, where the word directly refers to the external senses. Perhaps the word has the same implication in both stanzas. "Sincere" (in its modern meaning) may be a better word than "pure". Taking first the old versions found in books of Catholic devotion, we find in the "Primer" of 1604:

"The word now being flesh become, And wine the blood of Christ is made, Though our sense it not afford, But this in heart sincere to fix Faith sufficeth to accord."

It is not in the rhythm of the Latin, and contains but three monosyllabic rhymes instead of the six double rhymes of the Latin. The "Primer" of 1685 makes an obvious change to six monosyllabic rhymes; and the "Primer" of 1706 retains the rhythm and the rhymic scheme, but is somewhat more flowing and less heavy:

The Word made flesh for love of man, With words of bread made flesh again; Turned wine to blood unseen of sense, By virtue of omnipotence; And here the faithful rest secure, Whilst God can vouch and faith ensure.

A distinct advance in rhythm and rhymic correspondence was made in more recent times by Catholic writers like Wackernath, Father Caswall, and Judge D. J. Donahoe. The translation of Caswall, 1899:

At the incarnate Word's high bidding Bread to very flesh doth turn,
Wine becometh Christ's blood-shedding; And if sense cannot discern, Guileless spirits never dreaming
May from faith sufficient learn.

(Wackernath, 1842)

Word made flesh, the bread of nature By his word to flesh he turns; Wine into his blood he changes:— What though sense no change discerns? Only be the heart in earnest, Faith her lesson quickly learns.

(Caswall, 1819)

Neale criticizes the version of Wackernath: "Here the antithesis is utterly lost, by the substitution of Incarnate for made flesh, and bidding for word..."; and declares that Caswall has given us his freedom of rhyme might be expected, the best version". He remarks, however, that Caswall has not given the "panem verum" of St. Thomas.

By his word the bread he breaketh To his very flesh he turns; In the chalice he which he taketh, Man the cleansing blood discerns,— Faith to loving bosoms in heart, Clear the mystical truth she learns.

(D. J. Donahoe, 1808)

Some of the more recent translations take little account of the nice discriminations of antithesis pointed out by Dr. Neale, who when he attempted in his day a new version, modestly wrote that it "claims no other merit than an attempt to unite the best portions of the four best translations with which I am acquainted—Mr. Wackernath's, Dr. Pusey's, that of the Leeds brothers, and Mr. Wackerbarth's." His version is:

Word made Flesh, by Word He maketh Very bread his flesh to be; Man in wine Christ's blood partaketh, And if senses fail to see, Faith alone the true heart waketh To behold the mystery.

The present writer rendered the stanza in the "Amer. Eccles. Review" (March, 1890), 208, as follows:

Into Flesh the true bread turneth By His word, the Word made Flesh; Wine to Blood: while sense discerneth Nought beyond the sense's mesh, Faith an awful mystery learneth, And must teach the soul afresh.

Neale's version is given in the Marquess of Bute's "Roman Breviary". The Anglican hymnal, "Hymns Ancient and Modern", declares its version "based on tr. from Latin by E. Caswall"; but, as Julian points out, most of it is based on Neale, four of whose stanzas it rewrites, while a fifth is rewritten from Caswall (i.e., the third stanza), and the fourth stanza is by the compilers. The arrangement found in the Anglican hymnal is taken bodily into the (Baltimore) "Manual of Prayers"—a rather infelicitous procedure, as the fourth stanza is not faithful to the original (Neale, "Medieval Hymns and Sequences", 181). Panigarola, Francesco, preacher and controversialist, Bishop of Asti, b. at Milan, 6 Feb., 1518; d. at Asti, 31 May, 1587. As a student of law at Pavia and Padua, he became a Franciscan and moved by grace, entered the Order of Friars Minor at Florence, 15 March, 1567. At the age of twenty-three he was sent to Rome, where his sermons attracted much attention. Thus Vindaz had him sent to Paris where for two years he studied the Fathers and the Commentators, Greek and Hebrew. Returning to Italy he preached during the pontificate of Pius V and became chaplain to many Calvinists in France and Savoy; at Naples there was collected, through one of his sermons, enough money to build a hospital for incurables. He also assisted in the construction of the Italian church of Antwerp, and of the Franciscan buildings at Genoa, Venice, Milan, and Turin. In 1579 Panigarola attacked the Jesuits; he was imprisoned at Paris. Finally, in 1580 Sixtus V appointed him titular Bishop and Coadjutor of Ferrara, whence in 1587 he was transferred to the See of Asti. Shortly after he was sent to France as assistant to the Papal Legate, Cardinal Henry Capitan. When Henry IV had renounced Calvinism, the bishop returned to Asti. In 1591 he was appointed Bishop of Asti, and in 1594, n. 70-81, gives the most complete catalogue of Panigarola's works. The most important are: "Il Compendio degli Annali ecclesiastici del Padre Cesare Baronio", Rome, 1590; 2nd ed. Venice, 1593, comprises only the first volume of Baronio's works. "B. Petri Apostolorum Principis Gesta... in casophas, quam ecatomn appelant, spectum disposita", Asti, 1591. "Lettera frate domini, dette Calvisina", Venice, 1584. This work, translated into Latin (Milan, 1594), was attacked by Giacomo Picenino in "Apologia per i Riformatori e per la Religione Riformata contro le Invettive di F. Panigarola e P. Serenati", Venice, 1706. "Il Prefettore di Holy Frigheytoren... occiso Farsasbre". Pison, in deciso e discorsi intorno al libro dell'Ecclesiastica di Demetrio Falero...", Venice, 1609. He also wrote commentaries (Psalms, Jeremias etc.) and many collections of sermons, published in Italian and Latin.

Pannartz, Arnoldo, and Swenheim, Konrad, printers: Pannartz d. about 1576, Swenheim in 1577. Pannartz was perhaps a native of Prague, and Swenheim of Eltville near Mainz. Zeller believes (Gutenberg-Forschungen, 1901) that Swenheim worked at 136 and 145, Gutenberg in 1460-61. Whether Pannartz had been connected with Gutenberg in Germany is not known. It is certain that the two brought Gutenberg's invention to Italy. The Benedictine monastery of Subiaco was the cradle of Italian printing. Probably Cardinal Giovan of Turrecremata, who was Abbot in commendam of Subiaco, summoned the two printers there. They were there in 1460, but, since they printed at Subiaco a Donatus; it has not, however been preserved. The first book printed in Italy that is still extant was a Cicero, "De oratore" (now in the Bibliogewerbhaus at Leipzig), issued in September, 1465. It was followed by Laetantius, "De divinis institutios", in October, 1465, and Augustin's "De civitate Dei" (1469). These last four impressions from Subiaco are of particular importance, because they abandon the Gothic type of the early German books. In Italy Roman characters were demanded. Pannartz and Swenheim, however, did not produce a pure but only a "half Roman" type.

In 1467 these two printers left Subiaco and settled at Rome, where the brothers Petro and Francesco de' Massimi placed a house at their disposal. Their proof and manuscript reader was Giovann de' Bussi, since 1469 Bishop of Aleria. The works they printed are given in two lists of their publications, issued in 1470 and 1472. Up to 1472 they had published twenty-six Greek, liberal and classical volumes, viz. the Bible, Laetantius, Cyprian, Justin, Tertullian. Great, Thomas Aquinas, Cicero, Apuleius, Gellius, Virgil, Livy, Strabo, Pliny, Quintilian, Suetonius, Ovid etc., in editions varying from 275 to 300 copies each, in all 12,735 volumes. But the printers shared the fate of their master, Gutenberg; they could not keep their books, because perhaps they applied to Sixtus IV for Church benefits. From this we know that both were ecclesiastics: Pannartz of Cologne and Swenheim of Mainz. The pope had a reverison drawn up for them, a proof of his great interest in printing. In 1474 Swenheim was made a canon at St. Victor at Mainz. It is not known whether Pannartz also became a canon, perhaps they also aided them; at any rate they printed eighteen more works in 1472 and 1473. After this they separated. Pannartz printed by himself twelve further volumes. Swenheim took up engraving on metal and executed the fine maps for the "Cosmography" of Ptolomey, the first work of this kind, but died before he had finished his task.

Pano Indians, a former important mission tribe on the middle Ucayali River, Peru, being the principal of a group of twenty or more closely cognate tribes constituting the Panoan linguistic stock, and holding most of the territory of the Huallaga, Ucayali, and Matchi Rivers in northwestern Peru, with the adjoining tribes on the Jurin, Puno, Beni, and upper waters of the Madeira in extreme western Brazil and northern Bolivia. Among the most important of these beside the Pano, are the Casibo, Conibo, Mayowuna (v. q.), Reno, Sens, Seteba, and Shipibo, all of whom, excepting the Casibo who are still cannibal savages, were at one time in direct connection with the famous Jesuit missions of the "Province of Mauis" (see MAUS), of which the central headquarters was at first San Francisco de Borja and later the Pano town of Laguna. The primitive culture of the Pano and cognate tribes was very similar, and were intermediate between the famous Jesuit missions of the "Province of Mauis" (see MAUS), of which the central headquarters was at first San Francisco de Borja and later the Pano town of Laguna. The lance, of fish, which "butter" was obtained by breaking up the eggs in a trough, pouring water over the mass, and skimming off the grease which rose to the top after the sun's rays had warmed it. This turtle oil formed a considerable article of commerce with the tribes of the upper Amazon as well as of the Orinoco.

Their weapons for war and hunting were the bow, the knife, the blow-gun with poisoned arrows, the lance, and the wooden club, armed with deer-horn spikes and ornamented with feathers. The most prized possession was the dug-out canoe, from thirty to forty feet in length, sometimes finished months before completion. The men cleared the ground of trees, with the help of their neighbours, but the cultivation was by the women. Men and women went nearly naked, but painted in various colours, with the hair flowing loosely either full length or cut about the shoulders. They stained their teeth a dark blue with a substance more powerful than our modern tooth paste, in which the teeth of savages are sometimes dyed blue. They wore necklace of various trinkets, and bracelets and anklets of lizard skin. In general both sexes were of medium size but well formed. Their mentality was of a low order and they could seldom count beyond four. There was practically no government or chief-ship, every man acting for himself except as common interest brought them together. They paid special reverence to the sun, fire, and the new moon, and were in great dread of evil spirits. Some of the tribes had a genius hero who was said to have struck his foot upon the ground and called them forth out of the earth. In accord with a widespread Indian custom, one of a pair of twins was killed and burned, as among all deformed children, considered the direct offspring of evil spirits. The dead were buried in large jars in the earth floor of the house. In the case of the warrior, his canoe was used as a coffin, all his small belongings being buried with him. There seems to have been no fear of the presence of the dead. Their ceremonies consisted of a low humming sound, the sound of the drum and the deep pipes, and invariably ended in a drinking orgy. They had few traditions, but sometimes kept a record of events by means of pictographs painted upon bark cloth. Girls were betrothed in childhood, and married with somewhat elaborate ceremony when very young.

In 1666 the Jesuit, Father Lorenzo Lacer, after having sailed up the river, and explored part of the coast, established the mission of Santiago de la Laguna, at the present Iquitos, on the east bank of the Huallaga, near its mouth in north-eastern Peru. Here he gathered a number of Indians of various tribes, Pano and Setebu of cognate stock, Cocama and others of Tupian stock. In a short time the settlement contained 1000 souls, ranking among the most important missions of the Spanish province. Smallpox visitations and Portuguese slave raids (see MAMELCO) within the next century greatly reduced it, but on the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1768 it still contained 1600 Indian Christians, ranking among the 53 existing Jesuit missions, and the upper Amazon and its branches. The missionary in charge was Father Adam Vidman, a Bavarian. With the other missions it was turned over to the care of the Franciscans, under whom it continued until the establishment of the republican government in Peru in 1821, when the missionaries were again scattered, most of the missions abandoned and the others, being left without support, rapidly declined; the Indians rejoining their wild kinmen of the forest and relapsing into their orgies. The only mission that was re-established in 1834, but in 1850, in consequence of dissensions between the Cocoma and the Pano, the former removed to the towns of Nauta and Payanari on the Maranon, while the Pano joined the mission of Sarayacu on the lower Ucayali. Founded by the Franciscan Father Girbal in 1781. Lieutenant Smyth has given us an interesting account of the Pano, as he found it in 1835, having then a mixed population of 2000 Pano, Conibo, Setebo, Shipibo, and Seni, all using the Pano language, which was the dominant one along the lower Ucayali. While the Indians had accepted Christianity, taken on some of the customs of civilization, and showed the greatest devotion to their padre, they were still greatly given to child-murder and to their besetting sin of drunkenness from chicha, in spite of every effort of the missionary. It must be remembered in explanation that the whole country was a tropical wilderness, without a single white inhabitant other than the padre himself, who laboured without salary or support, and received no recognition from the Indians; who were in constant communication with their wild kinsmen of the woods. Of the Indians, Smyth says: "Their manners are frank and natural, and show without any disguise their affection or dislike, their pleasure or anger. They have an easy, courteous air, and seem to consider themselves on a perfect equality with everybody, showing respect for the Padre, to whom they pay the greatest respect". Sarayacu still exists, though no longer a mission town, but the Pano name and language are gradually yielding to the Quechua influence from beyond the mountains. (See also PRO INDIANS; SARAYACO MISSION.)

Panopolis, a titular see, suffragan of Antioch in Thbeisis Prima; the ancient Apu or Khinnian which the Greeks made Khennis and Panopolis, capital of the Panopolitan "nomos" or district; one of the most important towns of Upper Egypt made famous by the god Min. Herodotus (II, 91) speaks of its temple. Strabo (XVII, 1, 4) says that the temple was dedicated to Min, possessed of weavers and stone-cutters. As bishops, LeQuén mentions (Orisins christianins, II, 601-4) Aurius, friend of Saint Pachomius, who had built three convents there; Sabinus, at Ephesus in 431; St. Menas, venerated 11 February; and some other Jacobites. Recent excavations have disclosed a necropolis, numerous tapestries, similar to Coptic work, important for the history of tapestry from the second to the ninth century; numerous Christian manuscripts, among them fragments of the Book of Henoch, of the Gospel, and of the Apocalypse according to Peter, and the Acts of the Council of Ephesus; and numerous Christian inscriptions.

Panpsychism (Greek πάν, all; ψυχή, soul) is a philosophical theory which holds that everything in the universe, the inorganic world as well as the organic, has some degree of consciousness. It is closely related to the theory of hylozoism, which teaches that all matter is endowed with life. As synonymous with hylozoism must be regarded the word panpsychism, which was coined by Paul Carus to distinguish his own views from those of the Stoic Clement ("Clementist", 1802–03, III, 234–57). Between panpsychism and hylozoism there is no sharp distinction, because the ancient hylozoists not only regarded the spirits of the material universe and plant world as alive, but also as more or less conscious. The Renaissance revival of the ancient hylozoism of the Italian philosophers of nature and the alchemists speculated about the spirits that were present in all things and the "feelings" and "strivings" of the "principles" of nature. The monadism of Leibniz is evidently panpsychistic. All things are made up of monads. Every monad is conscious and mirrors intellectually in itself the entire universe. One monad differs from another only in the clearest with which this mental representation is expressed.

Apart from these early movements there is the modern school of panpsychism, during the development of which the word itself was coined. It began with Fechner (1842–87) and received a new impetus from the triumph of Panpsychism in England and metaphysical speculation in America.

The panpsychism of Fechner and later German writers is most closely connected with the Renaissance revival of hylozoism. Both Fechner and Lotze have much in common with the mystical speculations of Paracelsus and van Helmont. To Fechner everything is speculative and speculative is true. He considered the living mother at that. The panpsychism of Lotze (1817–81) arises as a dreamy speculation, rather than a coldly-reasoned conclusion. "Has one half of creation, that which we comprise under the name of the material world, no function whatever save that of serving the other half, the realm of mind, and are we not justified in longing to find the baste of sense in that also whence we always derive it?" (Microcosmos, I, Book III, ch. iv, p. 333.) By making the atom extended Lotze thought that he had removed the last objection to his panpsychism. Of a similar type is the panpsychism of Paulsen, and not far removed from his the speculations of Haeckel on the pleasure and pain receptors. The claim of panpsychism appears as a reasoned conclusion from a metaphysical consideration of the relation between body and mind.

In England panpsychism was advocated by William Kingdon Clifford as early as January, 1878 (Mind, III, 57–64). He arrived at the theory as a corollary from the doctrine of evolution. Consciousness exists in man; man is evolved from inorganic matter; therefore inorganic matter has in it the elements of consciousness. This conclusion was then extended to the assertion that "the universe consists entirely of mind stuff". As his forerunners in this exposition Clifford mentions Kant and Haeckel—and especially Wundt—of whom he wrote: "the first statement of the doctrine in its true conjunction that I know of is by Wundt" (Lectures and Essays, II, 73).

In America as early as 1885, Dr. Morton Prince advocated the theory of panpsychism, though not under that name. He looked upon his theory as a corollary from the doctrine that the mind is pervaded in its nature and mind is to be interpreted as the resultant of these mental forces of nature, such an interpretation must be materialistic; for "as long as anything is the resultant of the forces of nature it belongs to materialism" (The Nature of Mind, 152). His panpsychism was in reality an illegitimate conversion of the proposition: "all conscious processes are physical changes" to "all physical changes are conscious processes." This inference was supplemented by hints at the evolutionary argument of Clifford. While the panpsychism of Clifford and Prince was more or less empirical, that of Prof. C. A. Strong is more pronouncedly metaphysical; it deals with the problem of the interaction between body and mind. Prof. Strong proposes to solve it by identifying the essential function between body and soul, in holding that matter itself is psychical rather than physical in its nature. His work, "Why the Mind Has a Body" (New York, 1903) called forth a lively discussion of this theory.

The first article of the eighteen question in the first part of the "Summa Theologiae" of St. Thomas is entitled: "Is everything in virtue of the discussion of the theory of hylozoism and tells us also the position of the great scholar on the question of panpsychism. St. Thomas decides that the best of life is to be sought in the possession of those characteristics that are proper to beings which are most evidently alive. These characteristics he embraces under what he terms the power of spontaneous movement. By this he does not mean the mere capability of moving from place to place, but any spontaneous tendency towards any kind of change (quantumque se agent ad motum vel operationem adeunt). As examples of such motion he mentions the tendency of a thing to pass to a more coherent condition, and the sensations and understanding which constitute the activity of animals that have already acquired their full development. The question then becomes one of fact. Are there any things in nature that do not manifest the power of spontaneous movement, i.e. growth or the activity of sensory and intellectual life?

There is no difficulty in showing the activity of their own and do not move except by an impulse from without, and these things are lifeless or dead. We may see analogies in them to living things, but they can never be said to live, except we are speaking poetically and by way of metaphor. St. Thomas therefore rejects hylozoism and panpsychism.

The only serious arguments in favor of panpsychism are: the evolutionary one put forward by Clifford, and the metaphysical reasoning of Prof. Strong. But until there is evidence to show that the chemical elements manifest some kind of mental process, we have no right to say that they do, no matter how much we wish it could aid any theory of evolution, or how easy it might make it, or even make superficial explanation of the relation between body and mind.

He was trained in the Stoic philosophy; as a Christian missionary, he reached India (probably South Arabia), and found there Christians possessing the Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew, which they had received from St. Bartholomew. Eusebius as what was "said" (Hist. eccl., V. xi). Eusebius continues: "In his 'Hypotyposes' he [Clement] speaks of Pantanmus by name as his teacher. It seems he may have had several in his schools also in his 'Stromata'. In the passage of the 'Stromata' (I, i), which Eusebius proceeds to quote, Clement enumerates his principal teachers, giving their nationality but not their names. The last, with whom Eusebius would identify Pantanmus, was "a Hebrew of Palestine, greater than all the others [in ability], whom legends had made to be famed in Stoic philosophy, and he found rest." These teachers "preserving the true tradition of the blessed doctrine from the Holy Apostles Peter and James, John and Paul... came, by God's will, even to us" etc. Against Eusebius's conjecture it may be suggested that a Hebrew of Palestine was not likely to be famed in Stoic philosophy, in its favour are the facts that the teacher was met in Egypt, and that Pantanmus endeavoured to press the Greek philosophers into the service of Christianity. It may well be that a mind like Clement's "found rest" in this feature of his teaching.

Eusebius (VI, xiii) says again that Clement in his "Hypotyposes" mentioned Pantanmus, and further adds that he gave "his opinions and traditions". The inference commonly drawn from this statement is that, in the extent fragments of the "Hypotyposes" where he quotes "the elders", Clement had Pantanmus in mind, and one opinion or tradition in particular, ascribed to "the elder" (Hist. eccl., VI, xvi), tamastically ascribed to Pantanmus. But this is inaccurate, for we cannot be sure that Clement would have reckoned Pantanmus among the elders; and if he did so, there were other elders whom he had known (Hist. eccl., VI, xiii). Origen, defending his use of Greek philosophers, appeals to the example of Pantanmus "who benefited many before our time by his thorough preparation in such things" (Hist. eccl., VI, xvi). That Pantanmus anticipated Clement and Origen in the study of Greek philosophy, as an aid to theology, is the most important fact we know concerning him. Photius (cod. HIX) states, in his account of the "Apology for Origen" by Pamphilus and Eusebius (see PANTHEISM, SAINT, PANTHEISM, SAINT), that they said Pantanmus had been a hearer of men who had seen the Apostles, may, even had heard them himself. The second statement may have been a conjecture based upon the identification of Pantanmus with one of the teachers described in "Stromata", I, i, and a third upon the idea that the "Hypotyposes" were derived from teachers deriving their doctrine direct from the Apostles. The first statement may well have been made by Clement; it explains why he should mention Pantanmus in his "Hypotyposes", a book apparently made up of traditions received from the elders. Pantanmus is quoted (a) in the "Logia ex Prophetis" (Migne, "Clem. Alex.", II, 723) and (b) in the "Scholia in Greg. Theolog." of St. Maximus Confessor. But these quotations may have been taken from the "Hypotyposes". The last named in his prologue to "Dionys. Areop." (ed. Corder, p. 36) speaks casually of his writings, but he merely seems to assume he must have written "a great many" before his time. A foot note to the book of Beza ("L'Évêque naissante", 3rd ed., 213 sqq.), that Pantanmus was the writer of the concluding chapters of the "Epistle to Diognetus" (see DIOGNETHUS). The chief, though not the only ground for this suggestion, is his "Philosophers" (see under "Philosophers"). This work, in two books (ed. Migne, pp. 860, 892) single out Pantanmus with two only of the other early Fathers as interpreting the six days of Creation and the Garden of Eden as figuring Christ and the Church—a line of thought pursued in the fragment "Hedenscher, Greek, der altk. PANTHEISM, SAINT, MARTYR, D. About 305. According to legend he was the son of a rich pagan, Eustorgius of Neomedia, and had been instructed in Christian doctrine by his older brother, Pantaenus, also in his "Stromata". In the passage of the "Stromata" (I, i), which Eusebius proceeds to quote, Clement enumerates his principal teachers, giving their nationality but not their names. The last, with whom Eusebius would identify Pantanmus, was "a Hebrew of Palestine, greater than all the others [in ability], whom legends had made to be famed in Stoic philosophy, and he found rest." VARIETIES.—These agree in the fundamental doctrine that beneath the apparent diversity and multiplicity of things in the universe there is one only being absolutely necessary, eternal, and infinite. Two questions then arise: What is the nature of this being? How are the manifold appearances to be explained? The principal answers are incorporated in such different currents as Brahmanism, Stoicism, Neo-Platonism, and Gnosticism, and in the later systems of Scotus Erigena and Giordano Bruno (qq. v.).

Spinoza's pantheism was realistic: the one being of the world had an objective character. But the systems that developed during the sixteenth century went to the extreme of idealism. They are properly grouped under the headings pantheism, monism, and idealism, as their starting-point is found in Kant's critical philosophy. Kant (q. v.) had distinguished in knowledge the matter which comes through sensation from the outer world, and the forms, which are purely subjective and yet are the more important factors. Furthermore, he had declared that we know the appearances (phenomena) but not the things themselves (noumena). And he had made the idea of the soul, the world, and God merely immanent, so that any attempt to demonstrate their objective value must end in contradiction. This subjectivism paved the way for the pantheistic theories of Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel.

Fichte said that the whole is a conflation of the elements of knowledge, i.e., of matter as well as of form; phenomena and indeed the whole of reality are products of the thinking ego—not the individual mind but the absolute or universal self-consciousness. Through the three-fold process of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis, the ego posits the non-ego not only theoretically but also for practical purposes, i.e., to actually claim the ever-changing world which is an order in order to attain the highest good. In the same way the ego, free in itself, posits other free agents by whose existence its own freedom is limited. Hence the law of right and all morality; but hence also the Divine being. The living, active, moral order of the world, says Fichte, is itself God; we need no other God, and can conceive of no other. The idea of God as a distinct self-things but not the things themselves.

According to Schelling, the Absolute is the 'identity of all differences,' the subject of all sensible reality, the form, the real order and the ideal; and the knowledge of this identity is obtained by an intellectual intuition which, abstracting from every individual thinker and every possible object of thought, contemplates the absolute reason. Out of this original unity all things evolve in opposite directions: nature as the negative pole, mind or spirit as the positive pole of a new order. Every new order of nature, every new order of mind, has its own form.

Within this totality each thing, like the particle of a magnet, has its nature or form determined according as it manifests subjectivity or objectivity in greater degree. History is but the gradual self-revelation of the Absolute; when its final period will come to pass we know not, but when it does come, then God will be. The system of Hegel (q. v.) has been called 'logical pantheism,' as it is constructed on the 'dialectical method' and 'pauladigmatics,' since it describes the entire world-process as the evolution of the Idea. Starting from the most abstract of notions, i.e., pure being, the Absolute develops first the various categories, then the manifestations; the product itself becomes the ground of a new result; finally it returns upon itself, regains unity and self-consciousness, becomes the individual spirit of man. The Absolute, therefore, is Mind; but it attains its fullness only by a process of evolution or 'becoming,' the stages of which form the history of the universe.

These idealistic constructions were followed by a reaction due largely to the development of the natural sciences. But these in turn offer, apparently, new support to the central positions of pantheism, or at any rate they point, it is claimed, to that very unity and that gradual unfolding which pantheism has all along asserted. The principle of the conservation of energy through endless transformations, and the doctrine of evolution applied to all things and phenomena, are readily interpreted by the pantheist in favour of his own system. Even where the ultimate reality is said to be unknowable, as in Herbert Spencer's "Synthetic Philosophy," it is still one and the same being that manifests itself alike in evolving matter and in the consciousness that observes it; thus emphasizing that writers like the late Professor Paulsen should see in pantheism the final outcome of all speculation and the definitive expression which the human mind has found for the totality of things ("Einleitung in die Philosophie," Berlin, 1882, 212).

His statement, in fact, may well serve as a summary of the pantheistic doctrine: (1) Reality is a unity being; individual things have no absolute independence; they have existence in the All-One, the ens realissimum et perfectissimum of which they are the more or less independent members; (2) The All-One manifests itself to us, so far as it has any manifestations, in the two sides of reality—nature and history; (3) The universe is interdependent, and the whole world is the showing forth of the inner essential teleological necessity with which the All-One unfolds its essential being in a multitude of harmonious modifications, a cosmos of concrete ideas (monads, entelechies). This internal necessity is at the same time absolute freedom or self-realization (op. cit., 239-40). (4) "Natura non seipsa condit, sed seipsa condit, sed seipsa condit;" condemned the errors of pantheism. Among the propositions censured in the Syllabus of Fius IX is that which declares: "There is no supreme, all-wise and all-provident Divine Being distinct from the universe; God is one with nature and therefore subject to change; He becomes God in man and the world; all things are good and have His substance; God is identical with the world, spirit with matter, necessity with freedom, truth with falsity, good with evil, justice with injustice" (Denzinger-Bannwart, "Ench.", 1701). And the Vatican Council anathematizes those who assert that the substance of or essence of all things is one and the same or that all things evolve from the substance of an essence.

Curriculum.—To our perception the world presents a multitude of beings each of which has qualities, activities, and existence of its own; each is an individual thing. Radical differences mark off living things from those that are lifeless; the conscious from the unconscious; human thought and volition from the activities of lower animals. And among men, each individual personality appears as a self, which cannot by any effort become completely one with other selves.

On the other hand, any adequate account of the world other than downright materialism includes the concept of some original Being which, whether it be called First Cause, or Absolute, or God, is in itself and existence really distinct from the world. Only such a Being can satisfy the demands of human thought, either as the source of the moral order or as the object of religious worship. If, then, pantheism not only merges the separate existences of the world in one existence, but also identifies this one with the Divine Being, some cogent reason must be supplied for such a procedure. Pantheists indeed bring forward various arguments in support of their several positions, and in reply to criticism aimed at the details of their system; but what lies back of their reasoning and what has prompted the construction of all pantheistic theories, both old and new, is the craving for unity. The mind, they insist, cannot accept dualism or pluralism as the final account of reality. By an irresistible tendency, it seeks to substitute for the apparent multiplicity and diversity of things a unitary ground or source; and, once this is determined, to explain all things as somehow derived though not really separated from it.

That such is in fact the ideal of many philosophers cannot be denied; nor is it needful to challenge the statement that reason does aim at unification on some basis or other. But this very aim and all endeavours in view of it must likewise be kept within reasonable bounds; a theoretical unity obtained at too great a sacrifice is no unity at all, but merely an abstraction that quickly falls to pieces. Hence for an estimate of pantheism two questions must be considered: (1) at what cost does it identify God and the world; and (2) is the identification really accomplished or only attempted? The answer to (1) is furnished by a review of the leading concepts which enter into the pantheistic system.

God.—It has often been claimed that pantheism by teaching us to see God in everything gives us an exalted idea of His wisdom, goodness, and power, while it imparts to the visible world a deeper meaning. In point of fact, however, it makes void the attributes which differentiate the two, and frustrates the pantheist notion that God is not a personal Being. He is not an intelligent Cause of the world, designing, creating, and governing it in accordance with the free determination of His wisdom. If consciousness is ascribed to Him as the one Substance, extension is also said to be His attribute (Spinoza), or He attains to self-consciousness only through a process of evolution (Hegel). But this very process implies that God is not from eternity perfect; He is forever changing, advancing from one degree of perfection to another, and helpless to determine in what direction the advance shall take place. Indeed, there is no warrant for saying that He "advances" or becomes "perfect"; at most we can say that He, or rather It, is constantly passing into other forms. Thus God is not only impersonal, but also changeable and finite—which is equivalent to saying that He is not God.

It is true that some pantheists, e. g. Paulsen (op. cit.), while frankly denying the personality of God, propose to exalt His being by asserting that He is "supra-personal". If this means that God in Himself is infinitely beyond any idea that we can form of Him, the statement is correct; but if it means that our idea of Him is radially false and not merely inadequate, that consequently we have no right to speak of infinite intelligence and will, the statement is simply a make-shift which strips it in their own language. Even then the term "supra-personal" is not consistently applied to what Paulsen calls the All-One; for this, if at all related to personality, should be described as infra-personal.

Once the Divine personality is removed, it is evident a misnomer to speak of God as just or holy, or in any way to exalt His being by attributing to Him that He is "supra-personal". If this means that God in Himself is infinitely beyond any idea that we can form of Him, the statement is correct; but if it means that our idea of Him is radically false and not merely inadequate, that consequently we have no right to speak of infinite intelligence and will, the statement is simply a make-shift which strips it in their own language. Even then the term "supra-personal" is not consistently applied to what Paulsen calls the All-One; for this, if at all related to personality, should be described as infra-personal.

On the Divine Being being, in the Hegelian sense, a mere abstraction, acts out of sheer necessity, i. e. cannot act otherwise, His action is no more good than it is evil. To say, with Fichte, that God is the moral order, is an open contradiction; no such order exists where nothing is free, nor could God, a non-moral Being, have established a moral order either for Himself or for other beings. If, on the other hand, it be maintained that the moral order does exist, that it is postulated by our human judgments, the plight of pantheism is no better; for in that case all the actions of men, their crimes as well as their good deeds, must be imputed to God. Thus the Divine Being not only loses the attribute of being good, but loses the dignity of being the over-ruler of those men in whom moral goodness triumphs over evil.

Man.—No such claim, however, can be made in behalf of the moral order by a consistent pantheist. For Him, human personality is a mere illusion; what we call the individual man is only one of the countless fragments that make up the Divine Being; and since the All is impersonal no single part of it can validly claim personality. Furthermore, since each human action is inevitably determined, the consciousness of freedom is simply an illusion. To Spinoza, it says, to our ignorance of the causes that compel us to act. Hence our ideas of what "ought to be" are purely subjective, and our concept of a moral order, with its distinctions of right and wrong, has no foundation in reality. The so-called "dictates of conscience" are, in all probability, phenomena of mind which the psychologist may investigate and explain, but they have no binding force whatever; they are just as illusory as the ideas of virtue and duty, of injustice to the fellow-man and of sin against God. But again, since these dictates, like all our ideas, are produced in us by God, it follows that He is the source of our illusions regarding morality—a consequence which certainly does not enhance His holiness or His knowledge.

It is not, however, clear that the term illusion is justified; for this supposes a distinction between truth and error—a distinction which has no meaning for the genuine pantheist; all our judgments being the utterance of the One that thinks in us, it is impossible to say whether they agree with the truth or disagree. Furthermore, He who rejects pantheism is no further from the truth than man who defends it; each but expresses a thought of the Absolute whose large tolerance harbours all contradictions. Logically, too, it would follow that no heed should be taken as to veracity of statement, since all statements are equally warranted. The pantheist who is careful to speak in accordance with his thought simply refrains from putting his philosophy into practice. But it is none the less significant that Spinoza's chief work was his "Ethics", and that, according to one modern view, ethics has only to describe what men do, not to prescribe what they ought to do.

Religion.—In forming its conception of God, pantheism eliminatess every characteristic that religion supposes. An impersonal being, whatever attributes it may have, cannot be an object of worship. An infinite substance or a self-evolving energy may excite fear; but it repels faith and love. Even the beneficent forms of its manifestation call forth no gratitude, since these result from it by a rigorous necessity. For the same reason, prayer of the sort proposed to God is not possible and merit impossible. The supernatural of course disappears entirely when God and the world are identified.

Recent advocates of pantheism have sought to obviate these difficulties and to show that, apart from particular dogmas, the religious life and spirit are safe. A) or safe to be preserved in their right form. But this attempt to divest the religion of its essentials, reducing it to mere feeling. Not action, they allege, but humility and trustfulness constitute religion. This, however, is an arbitrary procedure; by the same method it could be shown that religion is nothing more than existing or breathing. The pantheist quite over looks the fact that religion means the obedience of the will to Divine law; and of this obedience there can be no question in a system which denies the freedom of man's will. According to pantheism there is just as little "rational service" in the so-called religious life as there is in the behaviour of any physical agent. And if men still distinguish between actions that are religious and those that are not, the distinction is but another illusion.

Immortality.—Belief in a future life is not only an incentive to effort and a source of encouragement: for the Christian at least it implies a sanction of Divine law, a prospect of retribution. But this sanction is of no meaning or efficacy unless the soul survives as an individual. If, as pantheism teaches, immortality is absorption into the being of God, it can matter little what sort of life one leads here. There is no ground for discriminating between the lot of the righteous and that of the wicked, when all alike are Panvinio, Onofrio, historian and archeologist, b. at Verona, 23 February, 1539; d. at Palestrina, 7 April, 1568. At eleven he entered the Augustinian Hermits. After graduating in Rome as bachelor of arts in 1553, he instructed the young men of his order there for one year, and then taught theology in the monastery of his order at Florence. In 1557 he obtained the degree of doctor of theology, visited various libraries in Italy, making historical researches, and went to Germany in 1559. Refusing the episcopal dignity, he accepted the office of corrected and reviser of the books of the Vatican Library in 1559. He died while accompanying his friend and protector Cardinal Farnese to the Synod of Monreal. He was recognized as one of the greatest church historians and archaeologists of his time. Paul Manutius called him “antiquarius bellum”; and Seiinger styled him “pater omnium historiarum”.

He is the author of numerous historical, theological, archaeological, and liturgical works, some of which are posthumous publications, others are still preserved in manuscript in the Vatican Library. Of his printed works the following are the most important: "De universali et triumphi Romanorum a Romulo usque ad Carolum V" (Venice, 1557); a revised edition of Sigo's "Fasti consularis" (Venice, 1558); "De comitiis imperatorum" (Basle, 1558); "De republica Romana" (Venice, 1555); "Epitome Romanorum pontificum" (Venice, 1557); a revised edition of Plinius' "De natura rerum" (Venice, 1557); "De archetypis et imagines" (Rome, 1568); "De sibylla et maccabiius sibyllinis" (Venice, 1567); "Chronicon ecclesiasticum a C. Julii Cesaris tempore usque ad inf. Maximilianum II" (Cologne, 1568); "De epicopatis, titulis, et diocesis cardinalem" (Venice, 1567); "De rei spectandis mortuorum apud veteres Christiani, quae in veteri tempore praebentur" (Venice, 1565); "De historiis romano basilicis" (Rome, 1570, Cologne, 1581); "De primatu Petri et apostolicis sedis potestate" (Verona, 1589); "Libri X de varia Romanorum pontificum creatione" (Venice, 1591); "De bibliotheca pontificiae" (Tarragona, 1587); "Augustiniani ordinis chronicon" (Rome, 1590).

Panzi, Gregorio, Bishop of Miletus, d. early in 1662. He was a secular priest of Avezzo, having left the Congregation of the Oratory on account of ill-health, when in 1634 he was chosen by Cardinal Barberini for the important and delicate task of a secret agency in London. He is described by the writer of his memoirs as a man "of experienced virtue, of singular address, of polite learning and in all respects well qualified for his business; his commission was to gain first-hand information as to the state of English Catholics, then much divided on the question of the oath of allegiance and the appointment of a vicar Apostolic, to settle the differences that had arisen on these points between the seculars and regulars, and to establish informal relations with the Government. Panzani himself realized that the appointment of a bishop was necessary, and he exerted the efforts of the Jesuits to hinder this. Though he was successful in reconciling the seculars with the Benedictines and other religious, the Jesuits were left out of the settlement, and Panzani's subsequent efforts to bring them more into oneness. He had repeated interviews with Windebach and Cardinal Barberini, the see-secup's commission. He enjoyed the confidence of the queen, and was admitted to secret audience with the king. He was also in communication with the Anglican Bishop of Chester on the subject of corporate reunion. He was recalled in 1634 when a scheme of reciprocal agency was established between the pope and the king. Returning to Rome he was made a canon of S. Lorenzo in Damaso, and obtained a judicial position in the civil courts. On 13 Aug., 1640, he was elected Bishop of Mileto, in the Province of Catanzaro. An account of him was written in Italy by some one who had access to his papers, and a copy of this was used by Dod, who, however, thought it improper to publish these memoirs in full. But in 1793 the Rev. Joseph Berrington published a translation of them with an historical introduction and supplement. Their authenticity was immediately called in question by Father Charles Plowden, S.J. (in full), who regarded them as a forgery by Dod. The subsequent researches by Tierney, however, conclusively proved that the "Memoirs" were genuine. The original manuscript, then in the possession of Cardinal GualaBtorio, was purchased by the British Museum in 1854 (Add. MSS. 15590).

The son of Angelo Paoli and Santa Morvili, he was particularly distinguished for his charity to the poor. As a young man he spent the greater part of his leisure time in teaching Catholic doctrine to the poor children of Argigliano. At eighteen, he was admitted to the novitiate of the Calced Carmelites at Siena. After making his vows he spent six years at his studies, was ordained priest, and appointed to a college, where he made rapid progress in perfection. He was subsequently transferred to Cupillo, Monte Catino, and Fivizzano. Specially devoted to the Passion, he caused wooden crosses to be erected on the hills around Fivizzano (and afterwards in the Coloseum at Rome) to bring the sacred tragedy more vividly before the minds of the inhabitants. In 1657, he was called to Rome and stationed at the Convent of St. Martin. The remaining years of his life were divided between the care of the sick poor in the city hospitals and the office of Master of Novices. He was called by the citizens "the father of the poor." Many miracles were wrought by him both before and after his death. His cause was declared before the Congregation of Rites in 1751 to be heroic, and the general chapter of the order held at Rome, 1908, included his name among those Carmelites servants of God, the cause of whose beatification was to be once introduced.

Papacy.—This term is employed in an ecclesiastical and in an historical signification. In the former of these uses it denotes the ecclesiastical system in which the pope is the successor of St. Peter, from the time of the Church Christ governs the Catholic Church as its supreme head. In the latter, it signifies the papal influence viewed as a political force in history. (See Apostolic See; Apostolic Succession; Church; Papal Arbttination; Pope; Unity.)

G. H. JOYCE.

Papago Indians, an important tribe of Shoshonean linguistic stock, speaking a dialect of the Pima language and resembling that tribe in all essentials of culture and in characteristic features. Their territory, which they shared with the other two Pima-incorporated Sobaipuri, comprised the valleys of the San Pedro and Santa Cruz rivers, southern tributaries of the Gila, in south-eastern Arizona, together with most of the Rio del Altar, in the State of Sonora, northern Mexico. The name by which they are commonly known is a derivation from the proper form, Papah-otam, as given by their missionary, Father Kino, who, according to his account, translated it as "people of the Spanish," Frigüeros, and has no reference to "baptized," as has sometimes been asserted. The Papago were and are a semi-sedentary and agricultural people, occupying numerous scattered villages of houses, usually dome-shaped and grass-thatched but frequently with flat roofs covered with earth. They practiced irrigation and cultivated corn, beans, and cotton, besides making use of the desert food plants, particularly mesquite beans and the fruit of the saguaro or giant cactus (Cereus giganteus, Pitaya). From the laoons they collect salt, which they formerly traded to other tribes. Their women are expert basketmakers, but their pottery does not rank so high. In their aboriginal condition the men went naked excepting for the G-string, while the women were often a short skirt. What remains of their primitive myths and ceremonies accords nearly with those of the Pima. In temperament they were noted for their industry and friendly disposition towards the whites, while carrying on ceaseless warfare with their hereditary enemies, the Piautos and Apache.

Owing to the isolation due to their desert environment the Papago remained practically unknown for nearly a century and a half after the more eastern and southern tribes had come under Spanish dominion. Their connected history begins in 1657, when the Sonora German Jesuit missionaries, under Father Ensebiano Francisco Kino (properly Kuhn) founded the mission of Nuestra Senora de los Dolores, about the eastern head streams of the Rio del Altar and not far from the present Cucurpe, Sonora. From this headquarters station until his death in 1711 he repeatedly traversed the country of the Papago, Pima, and Sobaipuri from the Gila, for Evangelists, notably Fathers Campos and Januske. Other missions and visitas were established on both sides of the line, the most important within the limits of Arizona being San Xavier del Bac, originally a Sobaipuri village of about 800 souls. It was first visited by Father Kino in 1692, but the church was not begun until 1709.

In 1695 the arbitrary conduct of a local Spanish commandant provoked a rising among the southern Pima and their allies, who attacked and plundered the missions on the Sonora side, excluding Dolores where Father Kino was stationed, and killing Father Jozef at Caborcor with the usual savage cruelties. The insurrection was soon put down by the energetic measures of Governor Jironza, and through the intercession of the missionaries a general pardon was accorded to the revolted tribes. In 1751 a more serious rebellion broke out, again involving the three tribes, in whose territory right was claimed by nine Jesuit priests. Of these missions two only were within the present limits of Arizona, viz., San Xavier del Bac, already noted, and San Miguel de Lavey, founded in 1732 near to the present Nogales. For a period of more than twenty years after Father Kino's death in 1711 the scarcity of workers had compelled a withdrawal from the northern missions, with the result that many of the Indians had relapsed into their original heathenism. The return of the missionaries was followed a few years later by an influx of Spanish miners and garrison troops, leading to trouble with the natives, which culminated in November, 1751, in a massacre of Spaniards and local Papago and Apache alike. Nearly 120 whites lost their lives, including Fathers Zelle and Ruhn, and the missions were again abandoned until peace was restored in Papal Arbitration, an institution almost coeval with the papacy itself. The principle of arbitration presupposes that the individuals or groups of individuals submitting to arbitration are united in some common bond. As soon therefore as this common bond has come prominently before public opinion, there necessarily results a tendency to settle disputes by reference to it. Thus the growth of the law, i.e., the gradual evolution from private revenge or vendetta to the judgment of some public authority, can in the history of any known nation or tribe be traced parallel with the awakening feeling of social solidarity. It was, therefore, that men began at last to realize, paradoxically, that they were not single units but members of a society, that they understood how every tort or wrong-doing disturbed not merely the individual directly affected, but the whole body of which he was a member. It was this recognition of the social disadvantages of disorder that led to compromise, to mutual pledges, to treaties, to the combat, to ordeals, and eventually to the regulations of courts of law. This is most patently manifest among the Northern nations in the primitive history of the jury system.

Now this same principle was bound to operate internationally whenever the various groupings of Europe realized their solidarity. The same undoubted advance would be made when men became conscious that the theory into which law had developed as an adjudication between individuals by the society, was applicable also in matters of international dispute. But this consciousness required to be preceded by the recognition of two principles: (1) that nations were moral persons; and (2) that nations were a moral organism. The first principle was too abstract in its nature to be professed explicitly at once (Figgis, "From Gerson to Grotius," vi, 177). The second would be very quickly recognized if only some concrete symbol of it could become evident to public opinion. This concrete symbol was fortunately at hand, and the result was arbitration. For the medieval papacy directing the conscience of Europe, legislating for the newly-converted peoples, drawing to itself the representatives of each national episcopate, constituting a sacred shrine for royal pilgrimages, could not fail to impress on the Christian nations a sense of their common faith. It was the papacy which therefore at one and the same time, by treating each nation as a separate unit, expressed in a primate with his suffragan a universality in matters of faith and morals for all the nations, expounded the double thesis of nationalism and internationalism. It was a standing concrete expression of the two principles aforesaid, viz., that the nations were separate individuals, yet members of a Christian brotherhood, moral persons yet subject to the common laws of God and man. In the circumstances of Western politics, papal arbitration was a necessary consequence of the very idea of the papacy. In treating of papal arbitration, three points must be set out: (A) the principles on which the popes claimed the right to arbitrate, i.e., the papal theory of the relationship between the Holy See and the temporal powers; (B) the most important cases of historical arbitration by the popes; (C) the future opportunity for this arbitration.

A. The Papal Theory. — It is evident that before the conversion of Constantine there could have been little question of the relations between Church and State. The church was more a source of independence, but up to that date Christianity had practically none but spiritual duties to perform. The Apostolic precepts preach submission to authority and do not at all raise the problem of the adjustment of the relationship between pope and Caesar. The conversion of Constantine therefore opened up a large field of speculation. This began indeed consciously as the assembling of the General Council of Nicea (325). Here, according to Rufinus (II. E., i, ii, in P. L., XXI, 470), the emperor himself laid the basis of all development in this direction. He declared that God had given to the priests (i.e., to the whole ecclesiastical corporation) power to judge even emperors (etideo was a voice recte judicandi).

Hosius of Cordova, who had been president of that council, in his defence of Athanasius has the same thought, noting that God had given to Constantine the empire and to the priesthood. He had confided the Church (quoted by St. Athanasius, "History of the Arians", xliv, in P. G., XXV, 717). This entire separation of Church and State was afterwards formally laid down with very definite clearness by the earlier writers (Lucifer of Cagliari, "Pro Athanasio", in P. L., XIII, 526; St. Optatus, "De Selicisma Donata-starum", III, iii, in P. L., XI, 999). Not that any slight is put upon the imperial dignity, for to the prince first of all is applied the title which subsequently becomes proper to the popes alone. He is called Vicarius Dei (Ambrosiaster, "Questiones Veteres et Novi Testamenti XCI", in P. L., XXV, 2284; Sedulius Soturus, "De Rectoribus Christianis", 19 in P. L., CXII, 329).

Yet he has no jurisdiction over the spiritual functions of his subjects, "for who", says St. Ambrose (Ep., XXI, 4, ad Valentinianum II, in P. L., XI, 19), "would venture to deny that in matters of faith, it is the bishops who sit in judgment over emperors, and not the emperors who sit in judgment over bishops?"; and the two popes who first have any prominent teaching on the matter, Felix III (483) and Gelasius I (162), use precisely the same language, describing the Church and the State as two parallel powers, entirely separate.

"The emperor", says Gelasius in an epigram (Ep. XV, 95, ad Episcopos Orientales, in P. L., LXI), "is the Church's son, not sovereign" (Filius est non pars edecos). This pope has fortunately left us two complete treatises on this question. In his Fourth Treatise and his Eighth Letter (P. L., LXI, 41), he formulutes his views, which completely agree with this idea of two different orders, separate, yet in so far interdependent that they both work towards the same purpose, i.e. the salvation of the souls of men. The next step is marked by the forcible and clear doctrine of St. Gregory the Great (590). His relations with the emperor were of necessity somewhat strained on account of the temporal power. It will be sufficient to note that, in his own words, he would go as far as possible to accept every law and statute of the imperial throne. "If what he does is according to the canons, we will follow him; if it be contrary to the canons, then so far as may be without sin we can follow him" (Epist., L. xi, 17, in P. L., LXXXVII, 189). Although the Emperor Maurice prohibited public officials from entering monasteries, Gregory promulgated the decree, though, at the same time warning Maurice that it by no means agreed with the declared will of the Divine Omniscience. By this act he said he had performed his duty of obeying the civil power and yet had kept his faith with God by declaring the matter of that obedience unlawful (Lab., III, 65, in P. L., LXXXVII, 663).

A last example of the papal doctrine of this period may be taken from the writings of this same pope. Maurice had given judgment in some matter, contrary to the rule of St. Benedict of Nicopolis, who as Metropolitan of Coreysa happened to be concerned in the affair, appealed to the pope against the imperial rescript. Gregory wrote admitting the bishop's interpretation to be correct and adhering to it, yet declared that he could not dare publicly to censure the emperor lest he should seem in any way to oppose or despise the civil power. (Lab., XIV, 8, in P. L., LXXXII, 131). His whole idea appears to have been that the prince represented God. Every action therefore of the public authority (whether it tended to the sacred ends for which Government was founded, or was apparently destructive of ecclesiastical liberties) was equally to be respected or at least not publicly to be flouted. This curious position taken up by the popes, of excessive subservience to the civil rulers, was due to a threefold cause:

(a) The need of correcting a certain anarchical spirit noted by the Fathers (I. Pet., i, 15, 16; Gal., v, 1; 1 Thess., ii, 2; 2 Thess., ii, 8; 1 Cor., xiii, 12).

(b) The relation in which the protected Church stood to the first Christian emperor, represented by the words of St. Optatus, "De Schismatic Dei in Domitiatu," III, iii: "Non enim repulsus est in Ecclesia, sed Ecclesia in repulsione ... Super Imperatorem non sit nisi solus Deus" (The state is not in the Church, but the Church is in the state. Let God alone be above the emperor).

(c) The influence of the Biblical language as regards the theocratic kingship of Israel.

The teaching of the papacy that civil authority was held independently of any ecclesiastical gift was continued even in the days of Charlemagne, whose father owed so much of his power to papal influence (Decretals, I, 6, 34). Yet even the new line of Caesars claimed to hold their power of God. Their titles run, "Gratia Dei Rex" or "Per missionem Dei rex" etc. (cf. Coronation of Charlemagne in "Journal of Theological Studies", April and July, 1903). Thus through the ninth and tenth centuries the separation of the Church and secular jurisdiction of the pope was generally taught and admitted. Both pope and emperor claimed to hold their power direct from God. He is the sole source of all authority. A new theory, however, was developing. While admitting that civil rulers are of God's providence by pontificate, the wicked by God's permission for the chastisement and correction of the people's sin (Himenar, "Ep. xvi ad Karolum regem", in P. L., CXXXVI, 98), some writers partially broach the idea that without justice the king is no king at all, but a tyrant (Mon. Germ. Hist.; Epp., IV, "Epistola Varia Kazoli Magni Script.", 7 etc.), for he must govern according to the laws which in turn depend on the consent of the people (Himenar, "De Ordine Paxitii", 8, in M. G. H.: Leg., sect. II, vol. I).

Thus the concept-theory of a mutually binding engagement between sovereign and subject enters the full stream of European political thought that later permutated in the Old English Coronation oaths (Stubbs, "Select Charters", Oxford, 1900, 61 etc.). The use made of this theory by the popes will appear shortly. So far then the papal political ideals sketched out two authorities, independent, separate; the one supreme as to temporal matters, the other religious. Then in the tenth century, the point was raised, at first in a perfectly academic way, as to the relative importance of these two spheres of Government, as to which took precedence of the other. At first, the result of the controversy left things more or less as they had been. The one side asserted that the priesthood was the higher, because, while it was true that the priests had to render obedience to kings in temporal matters and the kings to priests in spiritual matters, yet on the priests rested the further burden of responsibility of seeing that the king performed his temporal duties in a fitting way, i.e. that the king's actions were not contrary to the duties of his temporal position. On the other side, it was argued that the papal office was pre-eminent in its own right, because the office of pope was a true kingship and therefore that of pope must have precedence. This, in fact, was the doctrine of the popes of the eleventh century, that the pope was the spiritual representative of Christ in the state on earth. The popes were the Vicars of Christ, and he [Maurice], the pope, was absolute monarch in spiritual matters and possessed an absolute rule in temporal matters, in a way, on the ground of his office, it was argued, without any interference of kings ("De Schismate", of M. G. H.: Leg., vol. II, no. 259). It is interesting however to remember that this doctrine was almost at hazard by a twelfth-century canonist (Hufinus, "Summa Decretorum", D. xxi. c. 1). Commenting on a supposed letter of Nicholas II to the people of Milan, he distinguishes the papal right to interfere in temporal matters by conceding to him not only "tuas adminstrationes but a jus jurisdictionis, i.e. the right of consecrating, etc.

The advent (1073) of Gregory VII to the papal chair greatly affected the policy of the Holy See (Tout, "Empire and Papacy", London, 1902, 126; Gosselin, "Power of the Pope in the Middle Ages"). It is not so much his actions as his theories which are here under consideration. It is the old patristic teaching that all rule and government had its origin in the fall of Adam, that original sin caused the necessity for one man to have command over another. Consequently he had hard things to say of the imperial position. Moreover he claimed more freely the right of consecrating both he and the emperor took extreme views of their respective offices. The pope wished to put himself at the head of the temporal rule, exercising the power described in Jeremiah i, 10. "The emperor spoke of his traditional right of appointing and deposing popes. Neither can he be taken as representing the general community of the subject kingdom, but it is the ancient right of kings..." In any case, however, it is his theory of his office as a spiritual Vicar of Christ that is the effective in his theories of his office as a spiritual Vicar of Christ. His concern and subject enters the full stream of European political thought.

Eventually, the Concordat of Worms (23 Sept., 1122) took up and handed down the average medieval political practice, without satisfying the extreme representatives of papal or imperial claims. Gregory, however, developed the contractual idea of the Coronation oath. This he declared to be, as were all other oaths, under the Church's dominion, and consequently could be annulled by papal authority, the releasing subjects from obedience to their sovereign (Decretum, causa xv, Q. 6, c. 2; Stephen of Tournai, "Summa Decretorum", causa xv, Q. 6, c. 2, Auctorit. iii). The next great papal rule, Innocent III (1189-1216), did not take the same attitude toward temporal power, though in personal exercise of authority he could only judge, confirm, and, in divided elections only, decide on the candidate (Decretals, i, 6, 31; Carlyle, "History of Medieval Political Thought", ii, 217; Barry, "Papal Monarchy", XVIII, 292).

Again, in the dispute between the French and English kings, Innocent III distinctly declares that he makes no claim to settle matters of fiefs (non enim intendimus judicium de feodis a jure ipsius spectat judicium, Decretals, ii, 1, 13). Nor had he any intention of diminishing the royal authority. His whole justification rests on three grounds: (a) the English king had appealed to him against his brother, and could not override the electoral system of the empire, he could only judge, confirm, and, in divided elections only, decide on the candidate (Decretals, i, 6, 31; Carlyle, "History of Medieval Political Thought", ii, 217; Barry, "Papal Monarchy", XVIII, 292).

On another occasion, he went even so far as to order the Bishop of Verceil to declare null and void any letters produced from the Holy See dealing with matters that belonged to the secular courts of Verceil, as he would only interfere on appeal, especially since the imperial dignity was at the moment vacant (Decretals, ii, 2, 10; cf. Alexander III's action in a similar case, Decretals, ii, 6). Such excommunication was in his hands no absolute power, if it was not even unreasonably, he protested that it would be null and void (Decretals, v, 39, 28). He retained of course in his own hands the right to decide whether a particular matter came within the cognizance of the spiritual courts or not (Ibid., iv, 17, 14).

After Innocent's death, the attitude of Gregory VII was revived by Boniface VIII (1294-1303) and John XXII (1316-34). Though some twenty years separate their reigns, these two pontiffs held practically the same attitude towards temporal rulers and gave rise to a large polemical literature, which is practically continuous for some fifty years (see Scholz and Riebler, infra, bibliography). It seemed to those times that either pope or emperor must be supreme. The writers who defend the lay side are of many shades of feeling: Pierre de Bois (Wailly, "Summaria Brevia", 1649; "Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions" etc., 1661-65); Marsilius of Padua (Poole, "Illustrations of the History of Medieval Thought", 276 et passim; William of Ockham (Ibid., 282); John Wycliffe (De civil dominio, i cap., 17 fol. 40, 3); the most extreme are John Wycliffe (De civil dominio, i cap., 17 fol. 40, 3); the most extreme are John Wycliffe, who expressly declared, that for their execution in the temporal sphere, the ecclesiastical ideals depended no less than the law ideals on the consent and custom of the people, in the absence of which the papacy no longer claims to exercise power and rights, that public law and con-organism (cf. Bahus de UBaldis, 1327-1400, in his "Consilia", 228, n. 7; Imperator et dominus lati domini est A tera, whom emperor is lord of the whole world and God on earth.

Certainly defenders of the Holy See are no less vehement. They rightly forbid Caesar to meddle with matters within the spiritual sphere of life; but, not content with this, they endeavour to put the emperor directly under the pope. Augustinus Tristanus Tri utius (The pontificate of Boniface IX, 269-276, by Egidius Colonna, "Regnum ecclesiasticum pontificatum, i", 11) asserts that all temporal rule comes ultimately from the pope, that he alone has the supreme plenitude of power, and that none can be absolved from his high jurisdiction. While these high claims, the inheritance of ages of universal faith when the popes were really the supreme head of the Church (of 49, and 1422), are no longer brooked interference from Rome even in purely spiritual matters. The phrase of the Treaty of Westphalia (1648) "cuius regio ejus religio", i.e., the religion of the prince is the religion of the land, sums up the secular reply to the ecclesiastical order.

After the Reformation had divided Christendom, like France and Spain which did not adopt the new religion, the purpose of fettering conscience even more than before, the State had in actual practice put the Church under its heel. The State continued to claim, because it exercised, the power to interfere and rule in all matters, whether spiritual or temporal. The Church, however, though it no longer existed, the nation, that nation's supremacy, in all matters affecting religion, and to be in some way the fountain of all temporal dominion (St. Thomas, "Quodlibet", 12, Q. xii, a. 19, ad 2am; Reges sunt vasalli Ecclesiae). Suarez and later theologians certainly moderate the vehemence of Augustinus Tristanus Tri utius and his companions. It is true of course that the post-tridentine writers expound what has been called "the indirect power" of the pope in civil affairs, while they curb in various ways the growing civil absolutism of the times. The name of sovereignty was withdrawn, but its substitute was suzer ignty, which meant little less than the other (Figgis, "John Wycliffe and the Church", 192). The notorious and undeniable pedantry of Catholic theologians to repeat in clear language the cases in which rulers may lawfully be put to death. Hence also their unqualified de defence of popular rights. Says Filius ("Patriarcha", i, 1, 2, 1889) concerning the power of the people to deprive or correct the sovereign: "Cardinal Bellarmine and Calvin both look upon this way as"

No doubt in this long controversy both ecclesiasti cal and secular writers went too often to extremes. It is in the rights that each allows the other, that we must look for the more workable hypothesis. Thus when the lay writers describe the spiritual rule of the Papacy (Dante, "De Monarchia", Ockham, "Doto Ques tiones", q. 1, c. 6, ad 2), they depict almost literally the position of a Leo XIII or a Pius X, prophesying the greatness of such an office. And when the ecclesiasto-so political writers sketch their theory of a state (Nicolas of Cusa, "Concordantia Catholicae"; Schard ers, "Systagnum"), directing, ordering, educating the free lives of free citizens, they are merely prophecies of a desirable condition. It was only in 1690 that John Brough expressly de erated that, for their execution in the temporal sphere, the ecclesiastical ideals depended no less than the law ideals on the consent and custom of the people, in the absence of which the papacy no longer claims to exercise power and rights, that public law and com-

The success of this led to Gregory XIII being asked to settle the difference between Bathory of Poland and Ivan the Terrible. Gregory between 1572 and 1583 sent to Moscow the Jesuit Antonio Possevino (q.v.), who arranged a settlement containing rights of disputing sovereigns, were really in the nature of arbitration. Popes like Innocent III never claimed to be the sources of temporal rule, or that whatever they did for the peace of Europe was done by them as supreme temporal rulers; but only on the invitation of the parties interested. Even popes like Gregory VII, Boniface VIII, and others, who exercised most fully their spiritual prerogatives, were unable to act efficiently as peacemakers, until they were called in by those at war.

B. Historical Cases of Papal Arbitration.—The various interpolations of Innocent III to lay the difficulties in European diplomacy, as if then was, have been already alluded to. It will be better to pass at once to later historical examples.

(1) The popes made frequent efforts to negotiate between the Kings of France and England during the Hundred Years' War, but the most famous attempt is that of Boniface VIII (1297). It came just after the controversy between Philip the Fair and the pope concerning the Bull "Clerici laicos". Eventually Boniface gave up many of his earlier demands, partly through pressure from the French king, partly because he found that he had gone too far, partly in the interests of European peace. The more fully to arbitrate the papal claim to the French crown, he decided to set aside the quarrel which had been further complicated by the alliance formed between the Flemish and the English. The Cardinal of Albano and Præsten was sent to Creil on 20 April, 1297. But the temper of French thought is expressed in the protest of King Philip that he would submit to arbitration, as did Edward I and the French king, but that he would be willing to submit to any more than arbitration, not for recourse to the pope as to a higher feudal court. He laid down three propositions and completed them by a practical conclusion: (a) The government of France belonged solely to the king; (b) the king recognized no temporal superior; (c) he submitted his temporal affairs to no man's living. Therefore he came to the Roman Court for arbitration, not as to Boniface VIII the supreme sovereign pontiff, but as to the lawyer Benedetto Caetani. The terms of the arbitration are not of present interest; this only should be noted, that Boniface placated the French king by deciding largely in his favour, to the disappointment of Caetani. In the end both signed their names in a Bull (Lavisse, "Hist. de France" (Paris, 1901).

(2) One of the first public acts of Alexander VI was to effect a settlement between Spain and Portugal. These two nations had been foremost in undertaking voyages of discovery in the East and West. The result was, that as each expedition on landing annexed the new-found territories to its own home government, there was continued friction between the rival nations. In the interests of peace, Alexander VI offered to arbitrate between the two countries. He issued his Bull "Inter Caetera," 14 May, 1493, fixing the line at meridian of 100 leagues west of the Azores and Cape Verde Islands—assumed to be practically of the same longitude—Spain to have the western, Portugal the eastern division. The following year (7 June) by the treaty of Tordesillas the imaginary line was moved to 370 leagues west of Cape Verde. To this the pope as arbitrator assented, and thus averred war between the two countries ("Civita Cattoli", 1882, vol. ii, p. 62); "William of Whittingham", 1886, i. 13, 592; "Cambridge Modern History", i. 23-24).

(3) More curious examples are found in the invitation given to Leo X and later to Clement VII to arbitrate between Russia and Poland over Lithuania (Romberg, "History of Russia", London, 1855).

(4) Perhaps the best-remembered case is that of 1885, when war was averted between Germany and Spain by the arbitration of Leo XIII. It was over the dispute about the Carolinian Islands, which though discovered by Spanish探险家 had been really abandoned for many years. England and Germany had presented a joint note to Spain, refusing to acknowledge her sovereignty over the Caroline and Palao group of islands. German colonists had been established there. But the climax was reached when on 25 August, 1885, both Spanish and German war vessels planted the flags of their respective countries and took solemn possession of Yap. On 24 September, Bismarck, out of compliment to Spain and to propagate the pope (Busch, "Life of Bismarck", 409-70, London, 1899), referred the matter to Leo XIII. The pope gave his award on 22 October, succeeding perfectly in adjusting the conflict by virtue of his spiritual authority and German interests. Finally the whole matter was amicably accepted and signed at the Vatican by both powers on 17 December of the same year (O'Reilly, "Life of Leo XIII", xxxii, 537-54).

(5) Lastly, in 1897, the same pontiff arbitrated between Haiti and San Domingo. But the terms of his arbitration do not appear to have been published (Darby, "Proved Practicability of International Arbitration", London, 1904, 19). For the celebrated case of Adrian IV and his gift of Ireland to Henry II, see Adrian IV.

C. Future.—The increasing movement of arbitration, growing stronger with each passing year, is likely, together with the fact that owing to the action of Italy the popes have been excluded from the Hague Conference, makes the thought suggest itself of how far the pacacy is situated to-day to act as a general arbitrator: (1) It has ceased to hold any territorial dominion and can therefore stand forward as an impartial judge unlikely to be affected by temporal interests. (2) It has interests in too many lands to be likely to favour any one country at the expense of others. (3) It is wholly international, and adaptable, because alive, to the various environments of temperament, customs, laws, languages, political constitutions, social and religious organizations in which it finds itself. The clergy of each country a nation and not, like the patriots; not in the sense of being separated in matters of faith from Catholics elsewhere. (4) It is ruled by a pontiff, ordinariy indeed Italian; but his group of advisers is a privy council drawn from every continent, race, and nation. So detached has he been, that it is precisely three Italian popes who have refused to acknowledge the Italian stipulations of the Patrimony of St. Peter. (5) As the greatest Christian force in the modern world its influence must be heavily thrown into the scale of peace. (6) It has about it a halo of past usefulness, touched about with the mellow hue of time. It has seemed to men so different as Leibniz (Opera, v. 65), Voltaire (Essais, H. ix), A. J. E. A. Haldane (Tableau des Revolutions, i, 79, 106, Berlin, 1803), to have been set in a position not to dictate to, but to arbitrate for, the world. And because it has gone back to the older, simpler, more spiritual theories of Gelasius I, Gregory I, and Innocent III who are now opportunities which were denied it, so long as it claimed the more showy right of the Holy See, of Boniface VIII, and John XXII. Just as under Pius II the Church created the idea of a European Congress (Boulting, "Anes Sylvius," 279, 530-51, London, 1908), so it is to be hoped that under her presidency the practice of arbitration by a permanent tribunal may be made more universal, more practical, and of greater sanction.

Papal Elections. The method of electing the pope has varied considerably at different periods of the history of the Church. As to the earliest ages, Ferrai (op. cit. infra) says that St. Peter himself con stituted a senate for the Roman Church, consisting of twenty-four priests and deacons. These were the councilors of the Bishop of Rome and the electors of his successors. This statement is drawn from a canon in the "Corpus Juris Canonici" (can. "Si Petrus", cai. S. Q. I). Historians and canonists, however, generally refuse to accept the Roman Church's claim on its vacancy in the same manner as other bishop ries, that is, the election of the new pope was made by the neighbouring bishops and the clergy and faithful of Rome. Nevertheless, some maintain that the naming of the successor of St. Peter was restricted to the Roman clergy, and that the people were admitted to a part in the elections only after the time of Syl vester I (fourth century). After Constantine had given peace to the Church, the Christian Roman em perors often took part in the institution of a new pope and at times their influence was very marked. From the fourth century onwards, therefore, a new force had to be reckoned with. The occasion for the interference of the Roman emperors and later of the kings of Italy was afforded by disputed elections to the papal chair. The most noted of the earlier instance was at the election of Boniface I (418). This gave occasion to the decree (c. S. dist. 79) that when an election was disputed a new candidate should be chosen.

The interference of the secular power was always diametrically opposed to the popes' unwillingness to observe decrees on the subject made even by popes, as in the case of Simplicius and others. The example of the Roman emperors was followed by the barbarian kings of Italy, of whom the first to interfere was Theodore the Ostrogoth, at the election of Symmachus in 498. On the recovery of their influ ence in the Italian peninsula, the Eastern emperors required that the choice of the electors for a new pope must be made known to the Exarch of Ravenna, who in turn forwarded it to Constantinople, and until the emperor's confirmation was received, the candidate was not to be acknowledged as Bishop of Rome. This resulted in long vacancies of the Holy See, the case ton lasting until the pontificate of Benedict II (684-85). A similar claim was put forward by the Western emperors in the Middle Ages, and some demanded it owing to a concession made by Adrian I to Charle magne. This pretended concession is now recognized as spurious. As to the so-called confirmation of papal elections by the popes following the example of the Eastern emperors, it is noted that it must not be so understood as to imply that the new pope received the papal power from the emperor. This would be heretical, for the elected candidate receives his power from Christ.

The confirmation of the emperor, then, was only to ensure that the canons of the Church should be carried out without hindrance from factious and se ditions dissenters. It must be admitted that the Holy Roman emperors sometimes made use of their overwhelming power unscrupulously, and more than once candidates were elected to the papacy by direct imperial nomination. Otto III is credited with the nomination of Gregory V and Sylvester II, and Henry III with the effectual naming of Clement I, Duno sus II, Leo IX, and Victor II. But it is obvious that such actions were based on the firm belief and the romantic enceptance of the legal electors was necessary to ratify the choice, though undoubtedly they would naturally be swayed by circumstances to give effect to the imperial preference. It has sometimes been said that in the earlier ages popes have appointed their successors in the pontificate. Thus, St. Peter is said to have so chosen Clement I. The authority on which this statement rests is now generally acknowledged to be apocryphal. Boniface II chose Viglius for his suc cessor in 531, but later repented and publicly withdrew the nomination. Baronnus (H. L., ann. 1085, 1087) states that Gregory VII in 1085 elected Victor III as his successor; that Victor in like manner chose Urban II in 1086, and Urban elected Paschal II in 1099. It is to be noted that the canon "Si Transitus" in the "Corpus Juris" (can. "Si Trans. 10, dist. 70) seems to imply the right of the pope to nominate his suc cessor, since its opening words are: "If the death of the pope take place so unexpectedly that he cannot make a choice concerning the newiter will belong to the decessor. However, these so-called elections were never more than nominations, for none of the persons thus named ever presumed to declare themselves popes before the ratification of the legal electors had been obtained.

It is certain at present, that, according to ecclesi astical law (e. g. "Episcopo", 3; e. g. "Plurique", 3; can. "Moves"), 6; can. S. Q. 1), the pope cannot elect his successor. It is commonly held also that he is pro hibited from doing so by Divine law, though the contrary has also been held by canonists. As to the gradual restrictions and determinations governing the mode of election of the pontiffs, we note that in 606 Boniface III decreed that the electors should not meet until the third day after the pope's burial. In 709 a decree was framed in a synod of the Lateran, that the Roman clergy were to choose as pope only a priest or deacon, and forbade the laity to take any part in the election. The newly-elected was, how ever, to receive the homage of the laity before he was conducted to the Lateran basilica. This decree caused much doubt concerning the duty of the clergy and laymen, and Nicholas I in a Roman Synod held in 802 restored the right of suffrage to the Roman nobles. John IX in 809 confirmed the custom of having the consecration of the new pontiff take place in the presence of the imperial ambassadors. In 813, the Em peror Otto I endeavoured to bind the Romans by oath not to elect anyone as pope until he had been nominated by the emperor.

An epoch-making decree in the matter of papal elections is that of Nicholas II in 1039. According to this constitution, the cardinal bishops are first to meet and discuss the candidates for the papacy, and select the names of the most worthy. They are then to summon the other cardinals and, together with them, proceed to an election. Finally, the consent of the rest of the clergy and the laity to the result of the suffrage is to be sought. The choice is to be made from the Roman clergy, unless a fit candidate cannot be found among them. In the election regard is to be had for the Roman nobility, who may then request the pope to have the suffrage of the clergy and laity. They are then in turn requested to show similar respect for the Apostolic See. In case the election cannot be held in Rome, it can validly be held elsewhere. What the imperial rights are is not explicitly stated in the decree, but it seems plain from contemporary evidence that they require the results of the election to be forwarded to the emperor by letter or messenger, in order that he may assure himself of the validity of the election. Gregory VII (1073), however, was the last pope who asked for imperial confirmation. It will be seen that the decree of Pope Nicholas reserves the actual election to the cardinals, but requires the assent (laiatio) of the lower clergy and laity.

The Tenth Ecumenical Synod (Lateran) in 1139 resolved that, whenever there should be a vacancy in the pontifical See, the three cardinals with the assistance of the bishops of Rome, and in 1179, another Lateran Council under Alexander III made the rule that the pope is to be chosen by a two-thirds majority of the electors who are present. This last decree did not state what was to be done in case such a majority could not be obtained. When the cardinals found themselves face to face with this contingency, the Council of 1179 had commissioned six cardinals as plenipotentiaries to decide on a candidate. The vacancy of the Holy See had lasted for two years and nine months. To prevent a recurrence of this evil, the Second Council of Lyons under Gregory X (1274) decreed that ten days after the pope's decease, the cardinals should assemble in the palace in the city in which the pope died, and there hold their electoral meetings, entirely shut out from all outside influences. If they did not come to an agreement on a candidate in three days, their viaticum would be to be dismissed, and after a further delay of five days, the food supply was to be still further restricted. The other regulations were:

The decrees of Gregory X on this subject is called "Ubi periculum majus". For the later regulations governing papal elections see Concilium. According to certain ancient canons (can. "Oportet", 3; can. "Nulius", 4, dist. 79), only cardinals should be chosen pope. However, Alexander III decreed (can. "Licit", 6, "De elect.") that "no, without any exception, is to be acknowledged as pontiff of the Universal Church who has been elected by two-thirds of the cardinals." As late as 1378, Urban VI was chosen, though not a cardinal (consult, however, Constitut. 50 of Sixtus V, "Postquam", § 2). A layman may also be elected pope, as was Celestine V (1294). Even the election of a married man would not be invalid (c. "Quaerorem", 19, caus. 33, Q. 5). Of course, the election of a heretic, schismatic, or female would be null and void. Immediately on the canonical election of a candidate and his acceptance, he is true pope and can exercise full and absolute jurisdiction over the whole church.

A papal election, therefore, needs no confirmation, as the pope has the support of the earth.

Paphnutius.—1. The most celebrated personage of this name was bishop of a city in the Upper Thebaid in the early fourth century, and one of the most interesting members of the Council of Nicea (325). He suffered mutilation of the left knee and the loss of his right eye for the faith under the Emperor Maximinus (308-13), and was subsequently condemned to the mines. At Nicaea he was greatly honoured by Constantine the Great, who, according to Sozomen (II. 4, 1) often counselled to see the aged holy man and kiss the place whence the eye had been torn out. He took a prominent, perhaps a decisive, part in the debate at the First Ecumenical Council on the subject of the ephahy of the clergy. It seems that most of the bishops present were disposed to follow the precedent of the Council of Elvira (can. xxvii) prohibiting conjugal relations to those bishops, priests, deacons, and, according to Sozomen, sub-deacons, who were married before ordination. Paphnutius earnestly entreated his fellow-bishops not to impose this obligation on the orders of the clergy concerned. He proposed, in accordance "with the ancient tradition of the Church", that only those who were celibates at the time of ordination should continue to observe continence, but, on the other hand, that "none should be separated from her, to whom he has already been joined in holy marriage". The great veneration in which he was held, and the well-known fact that he had himself observed the strictest chastity all his life, gave weight to his proposal, which was unanimously adopted. The council left it to the discretion of the married clergy to continue or discontinue their marital relations. Paphnutius was present at the Synod of Elvira in 308.

2. Paphnutius, surnamed (on account of his love of solitude) the Buffalo, an anchorite and priest of the Seetic desert in Egypt in the fourth century. When Cassian (Coll, IV, 1) visited him in 395, the Abbot Paphnutius was in his ninety-seventh year. He never left his cell save to attend church on Saturdays and Sundays, five miles away. When in his pastoral letter of the year 399, the Patriarch Theophilius of Alexandria condemned anthropomorphism, Paphnutius was the only monastic ruler in the Egyptian desert who caused the document to be read.

3. Paphnutius, deacon of the church of Boon, in Egypt, suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Diocletian, under the Prefect Celsianus.

Paphos, titular see, suffragan of Salamis in Cyprus. There were two towns of this name, Old Paphos which owed its renown to the Phoenician goddess Astarte, as represented by a sacred stone or bautys, and now identified with Koukhia, on the right bank of the Diorizo; and New Paphos, located at the village of Bafio, over nine miles distant from the former. The latter was the see. Under the Romans it was the metropolis of the island. In 15 n. c. it received the surname of Augusta, and was later called Sebastia Claudia Flavia Paphos. The proconsul Sergius Paulus resided there when Paul and Barnabas, after having confounded the magician Elymas, converted the governor to Christianity (Acts, xiiii, o sq.). The first known bishop of Paphos, Elymas, assisted at the Council of Chalcedon; the Council of the other Greek titulars see Le Quien, "Oriens christians" (II, 1059-62); Hackett, "A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus" (London, 1901, p. 314). Among them was Theodore (seventh century), the biographer of St. Spiridion, St. Nicholas, and St. Macarius, otherwise unknown. The list of Latin bishops from 1215 to 1257 has been compiled by Le Quien (op. cit., III, 1215-20); Du Cange, "Les familles d'outre-mer" (Paris, 1869, pp. 865-68); Ebel, "Hierscharia cathol. med. xvi" (I, 407; II, 234; III, 287); Hackett (op. cit., 564-68). The last resident bishop, Francesco Contarini, who in 1550 had assisted at the Council of Trent, was slain after the fall of the town of the Turks. During the Frankish occupation the Greek see was one of the four which the Latins supported in 1222, but the bishop was compelled to reside at Arsinoe or Chrysochoe. It still exists. Bafio is a miserable village, the larger portion of its population living at Kymla half a league away. In the Middle Ages the Latin Diocese of Paphos was dependent on the Archdiocese of Nicoria.

Papies, Saint, Bishop of Hierapolis (close to Laodicea and Colossae in the valley of the Lyceu in Phrygia) and Apostle of the East. He is also known as "hearer of John, and companion of Polycarp, a man of old time". He wrote a work in five books, "Negvum..."
We learn something of the contents from the preface, part of which has been preserved by Eusebius (115) and also for Eusebius. We have carefully stored in memory, giving assurance of its truth. For I did not take pleasure as the many do in those who speak much, but in those who teach what is true, nor in those who relate foreign precepts, but in those who relate the precepts which were given by the Lord to the faith and came down from the Truth itself. And also if any follower of the Presbyters happened to come, I would inquire for the sayings of the Presbyters, what Andrew said, or what Peter said, or what Philip or what Thomas or James or what John or Matthew or any other of the Lord's disciples, and for the things which Arison and the Presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, were saying. For I considered that I should not get so much advantage from matter in books as from the voice which yet lives and remains. From this we learn that Papia's book consisted mainly of "interpretations" — it was a kind of commentary on the "Logia of the Lord." The word logia, meaning "speeches" or "saying" by the Lord of the day taken as a whole, refer to sayings, as opposed to narratives of Our Lord's actions (so Zahn and many others). But Lightfoot showed long ago (Essays on Supernatural Religion, 171–7) that this view is untenable. Philo used the word for any part of the inspired writings of the Old Testament, whether speech or narrative. St. Paul, Irenaeus, Tatian, Justin, Clement, Origen, and others used the term in other usages.

St. Irenaeus speaks of the oracles of the Lord just as Dionysius of Corinth speaks of the sayings of the prophets. These are the key-word in Papia, Irenaeus, in Photius, means "the divine oracles" of the Old or New Testament or" the oracles of the Presbyters." Papia added oral traditions of two kinds, had heard of the Presbyters, παρὰ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων; others he had at second hand from disciples of the Presbyters who happened to visit him at Hierapolis. The Presbyters related what the "disciples of the Lord"—Peter, Andrew etc.—used to say in old days. Other informants of Papia's visitors were still living, who had heard the sayings of the Presbyters, διά τῶν άπαντών εκ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, and had preserved the sayings of the Presbyters, ἀπὸ τοῦ πολλοῦ παρὰ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων καλῶς εἴδοσεν, yet it is admitted that he could not have known many sayings. Again, he seems to distinguish the sayings of the disciples of the Lord, Arison and John, from those of the Presbyters, as though the latter were not disciples of the Lord. Lastly, Irenaeus and Eusebius, who had the work of Papia before them, understand the Presbyters to be not Apostles, but disciples of the Lord, or even disciples of disciples of Apostles. The same meaning is given to the word by Clement of Alexandria. We are therefore obliged to make "what Andrew and Peter and the rest said" not the sayings of the Presbyters, but the sayings of the Presbyters, that is "what Andrew and Peter and the rest said, and for the things Arison and John were saying." Eusebius has caused a further difficulty by pointing out that two Johns are mentioned, one being distinguished by the epithet presbyter from the other who is obviously the Apostle. The historian adds that Dionysius of Alexandria said he heard there were two tombs of John at Ephesus, one of which had the inscription for the work of Papia, took him to mean John the Apostle; and Irenaeus had personal knowledge of Asiatic tradition and could not have been ignorant of the existence of John the presbyter, if there ever was such a person in Asia. Again, Irenaeus tells us that the Apostle lived at Ephesus until the time of Trajan, that he wrote the Apocalypse in the last days of Domitian, and he would naturally be the most important of Papia's witnesses. Yet if Eusebius is right, it would seem that John the Presbyter was his chief informant, and that he had no sayings of the Apostle to relate. Again, "the Presbyter" who wrote 1 and 2 John has the name of John in all MSS., and is identified with the Apostle by Irenaeus and Clement, and is certainly not the author (by internal evidence) the writer of the fourth Gospel, which is attributed to the Apostle by Irenaeus and all tradition. Again, Polycrates of Ephesus, recounting the men who were the glories of Asia, has no mention of John the presbyter, but of "John, who lay upon the Lord's breast," undoubtedly meaning the Apostle.

The second John at Ephesus is an unlucky conjecture of Eusebius. A fragment is, however, attributed to Papia which states that "John the theologian and James his brother were killed by the Jews." It is not possible that Papia should really have said this, otherwise Eusebius must have quoted it and Irenaeus could not have been ignorant of it, and has preserved it, but by some error in the quotation. Either something has been omitted, or St. John Baptist was meant. That St. John is mentioned twice in the list of Papia's authorities is explained by the distinction between his earlier writings which the Presbyters could repeat and the last utterances which he gave without the control of the Presbyters. This is the second John at Ephesus. The most important fragment of Papia is that in which he gives an account of St. Mark from the words of the Presbyter, obviously St. John. It is a defence of St. Mark, attesting the perfect accuracy with which he wrote down the teachings of St. Peter, but admitting that he did not give a correct order. It is interesting to note that (as Dr. Abbott, has shown) the fourth Gospel inserts or refers to every incident given in St. Mark which St. Luke has passed over. The prologue of St. Luke is manifestly cited in the fragment, so that Papia and the Presbyter knew that Gospel, which was presumably preferred to that of Mark in the Pauline Church of Ephesus; hence the need of the rehabilitation of Mark by "the Presbyter," who speaks with authority as one who knew the facts of the life of Christ as well as Peter himself. The famous statement of Papia that St. Matthew wrote his logia (that is, his canonical work) in Hebrew, and each interpreted (translated) it as he was able, seems to imply that when Papia wrote an account of John, or the Presbyter, he knew of the text of St. John's Gospel was not merely by his mention of abos, but by a citation of John xx, 2, which occurs in the curious prophecy of a miraculous vintage in the millennium which he attributed to Our Lord (Irenaeus, PAPIAS: 458 PAPIAS.
V, xxxvi). The reference in his preface to our Lord as "the Truth" also implies a knowledge of the fourth Gospel. He cited I John and I Peter according to Eusebius, "the Presbyters" or "the Presbyters who had seen John", he is citing the work of Papias. Where he attributes to these followers of John the assertion that our Lord sanctified all the ages of man, he is probably quoting Papias; but it does not follow that Papias had inferred that our Lord reached the age of fifty, as Irenaeus concludes, nor need we be too certain that Papias explicitly cited the Presbyters in the passage in question. His real point is possibly preserved in a sentence of "De fabrica mundi", which implies only that our Lord reached the perfect age (between 30 and 40) after which decline begins. Of Papias's life nothing is known. If Polycarp was born in 69, his "comrade" may have been born a few years earlier. The fragment which makes him state that those who were raised to life by Christ lived until the age of Hadrian cannot be used to determine his date, for it is clearly made up from the quite credible statements of Irenaeus, and we learn from some of those cured by our Lord lived until his own time and the fact that Quadratus wrote under Hadrian; the name of Papias has been substituted by the egregious exciser. The work of Papias was evidently written in his old age, say between the years 115 and 130.

The literature on Papias is of overwhelming quantity. Every introduction to the New Testament, every book on the Fourth Gospel contains it. The best discussion of Papias is Eusebius's "De fabrica mundi", containing the presbyter the beloved disciple). Deliy, Gesch. d. Ro. Papians. BERNARDES, Italian canonist of the thirteenth century; d. 18 Sept., 1213. He was born at Pavia, studied law and theology at Bologna, was provost of the cathedral of Pavia until 1191, Bishop of Faenza until 1203, and then Bishop of Pavia until his death. He is renowned for his "Breviarium extravagantium" (later called "Compilatio prima antiqua"), a collection of canonical texts comprising ancient canons not inserted in the "Decretum" of Gratian and also later documents. The work was compiled between 1187 and 1191, and was edited by Guido von Arezzo ("Quinque compilations veteres ex veteribus compilatae", col. 827). Papians is the author of a "Summa" on his own compilation, which he wrote while Bishop of Faenza; it was edited by Luscre, as were also other works of the same author: "Summa de matrimonio", "Summa de eceleme", "Casus decretalium", and a gloss on his "Breviarium extravagantium". "Papianus" is the author of the "Papinius Summa decretalium" (Ratisbon, 1481). He is also the author of the "Vita saneti Lanfranci" (Acta SS., IV Jun., 620 sqq.), a "Commentarius in Ecclesiasticum", and a "Commentarius in Canticle Cantiorum".

Parables. —The word parable (Heb. דְּבָר הָעֵבֶר, mhd. aliba; syr. mathla. Gr. ἐπαράβα, signifies in general a comparison, or a parallel, by which one thing is used to illustrate another. It is a likeness taken from the sphere of real, or sensible, or earthly incidents, in order to convey an idea, or spiritual, or heavenly meaning. As uttering one thing and signifying something else, it is in the nature of a riddle (Heb. קין, Gr. ᾠδής or ἐπαράβα, and has therefore a light and a dark side, —"dark sayings", Wis., viii, 8; Ecclus., xxxix, 3; it is intended to stir curiosity and calls for intelligence in the listener. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear" Matt., xiii. 9. Its Greek designation (from παράβαλλω, to throw beside or against) indicates a deliberate "comparison" in which the subject is taken from the real, and given and concealed. As taking simple or common objects to cast light on ethics and religion, it has been well said of the parable that "truth embodied in a tale shall enter in at low doors." It abounds in lively speaking figures, and stands midway between the literalism of mere prose and the abstractions of philosophy. It is used in the Hebrew Scriptures, as we do not know. If connected with Assyrian mythology, Arab. mathla, etc., the root meaning is "likeness". But it will be a likeness which contains a judgment, and so includes the "maxim", or general proposition bearing on conduct (Greek "gnomic wisdom"), of which the Book of Proverbs (Meshalam) is the chief example.

In classic Latin, the Greek word is translated collatio (Cicer., "De invent.", i-xxx), imago (Seneca, "Ep. lix."). simulacrum (Quintus, "Inst.", v. 7-8). Observe that παράβαλλω does not occur in St. John's Gospel, nor παραπάλλω (proverb) in the Synoptics.

Likeness and abstraction enter into the idea of language, but may be contrasted as body and spirit, spirit and letter, in a relation of opposition.

Wisdom for the practice of life has among all nations taken a figurative shape, passing from myth or fable into the contracted sayings we term proverbs, and arriving in the Greek schools of philosophy at ethical systems. But system, or technical metaphysics, does not appeal to the Senate; and our Sacred Books were never written with a view to it. If, however, system be not the vehicle of teaching, what shall a prophet employ as its equivalent? The image or comparison remains. It is primitive, interesting, and easily remembered; and its various applications give it a continual freshness. The story came into use long before the system, and will survive when systems are expired. It is the life of Lazarus, and the life of David; as a form of Divine speech, with the "Sacrament" (μνημείον) as a form of Divine action, may profitably be kept in mind. Neither can we overlook the points of resemblance which exist between parables and miracles, both exhibiting through outward signs the presence of a supernatural doctrine and agency.

Hence we may speak of the irony which must always be possible in devices adapted to human weakness of understanding, where heavenly secrets are concerned. Bacon has said excellently well, "parables are serviceable as a mask and veil, and also for elucidation and illustration" (De sap. vet.). Of Scripture parables we may say that they elucidate and edify by revealing some Divine principle, with immediate reference to the hearers addressed, but with more remote and redeeming applications in the whole Christian economy to which they belong. Thus we find two lines of interpretation, the first dealing with Our Lord's parables as and when they were spoken: let this be termed critical exegesis; and the second bringing out their significance in the history of the Church, or ecclesiastical exegesis. Both are connected and may be traced to the same root; the spirit in which they are written is distinct, somewhat after the fashion of the literal and mystical sense in Scripture generally. We cannot lose either out of sight. The parables of the New Testament refuse to be handled like J$p$'s fables; they were intended from the first to shadow forth the Kingdoms of Heaven", and their double purpose may be read in St. Mark, xiii, 10-18, where it is attributed to Christ Himself.

Modern critics (Juelicher and Loisy) who deny this, affirm that the Evangelists have detached the parables from their original meaning in the interest of edification, suiting them to the circumstances of the primitive Church. In making such accusations these critics, following the example of Strauss, not only reject the witness of the Gospel writers, but do violence to its text. They overlook the profoundly supernatural and prophetic idea on which all Scripture moves as its vital form, —an idea certified to us by the usage of our Lord when quoting the Old Testament, and admitted and amplified by the Evangelists, though they run counter to Catholic tradition is manifest. Moreover, parables thus detached from a Christological significance would hang in the air and could claim no place in the teaching of the Son of God. A valid exegesis will therefore be prepared to discover in them all not only the relevance which they had for the multi-fold life of the community, but the real sense, the genuine moral, "Wisdom is justified by her children." In a myth or allegory, fictitious persons, gods and men, are introduced; and the significance lies within the story, as in Apuleius, "Eros and Psyche." But a parable looks at life as it is lived, deals in no personifications, and requires to be interpreted from without. Fable is marked by giving speech and thought to irrational or inanimate objects; parable as our Lord employs it never does so. Examples or "histories with a moral" have at least a core of reality —the instances occurring in Scripture and allowed by critics are such as Esther, Susanna, Tobit; but a parable need not quote individual persons, and except in the doubtful cases of Lazarus and Dives, or the parable of the good samaritan it is a fact that the phrase is in this kind among the stories told in the Gospels. A type consists in the significance given by prophecy to a person or his acts; e.g., to Isaac as the lamb of sacrifice, and the symbolic deeds of Ezechiel or Jeremiahs. But the parable brings in no types directly or traceable to the same root as the Revelationized; they are more like the metaphor (Lat. translato) is a vague term, which might be applied to any short parabolic saying but does not fit the narrative of an action, such as we mean by a parable in the New Testament. The Sacrament myth which adorns the "Gorgias", "Phaedo", and "Republic", is confessedly a fable, whereas in our synoptic Gospels, when parables and miracles we meet are chosen from daily occurrences.
The Hebrew genius, unlike that of the Hellenes, was not given to myth-making; it abhorred the personificication of things. To the old Jew, the creation was a sequence of the elements, for Nereids and Hamadryads; it seldom pursued an allegory to any length; and its "realism" in treating of landscape and visible phenomena strikes most forcibly on the modern imagination. Theism was the breath of its nostrils; and where for a moment it indulges a turn for ancient folk-lore (as in Is., xiii, 21) it is remembered like that of Phillip, the strictest butemperance. In the parables we never come across enchanted stones or talking beasts or trees with magical virtues; the world which they describe is the world of every day; not even miracles break in upon its es-established order. When we consider what Oriental fancy has made of the universe, and how it is depicted in the language of the Bible, will it not become irreven-tably great. It is in the world which all men know that Christ finds exemplified the laws of human ethics, and the correspondences on which His kingdom shall be carried to its Divine consummation.

No language is more concrete in its presentation of laws and principles, or more vividly figured, than that which the Old Testament affords. But of parables strictly taken it has only a few. Jotham's apologue of the trees choosing a king (Judges, ix, 8-15) is more properly a fable; so is the scornful tale of the thistle and the honeycomb (Is. v, 2-7). It has been suggested that chapters i-iii of Hosea must be construed as a parable, and do not contain a real history. The denunciation of woe on Jerusalem in Ezek., xxviii, 3-5, is expressly named a "mashal," and may be compared with the Gospel simi-litude of the leaven. But our Lord, unlike the Prophets, does not act, or describe Himself as acting, any of the stories which He narrates. Hence we need not take into account the Old Testament passages, Is., xx, 2-4; Jer., xxvi, 15; Ezek., iii, 21-26, etc.

That the character of Christ's teaching to the multitude was mainly parabolic is clear from Matt., xiii, 31, and Mark, iv, 33. Perhaps we should ascribe to the same cause an element of the startling and paradocious nature which pervades the sayings, which if taken literally, has been misunderstood by simple or again by fanatical minds. Moreover, that such a form of instruction was familiar to the Jews of this period cannot be doubted. The sayings of Hillel and Sham-mai still extant, the visions of the Book of Enoch, the typical values which we observe as attaching to the stories of Judith and Tobit, the Apocalypse and the extensive literature of which it is the flower, all betoken a demand for something esoteric in the popular religious teaching, and show how abundantly it was satisfied. But if, as mystical writers hold, the highest degree of heavenly knowledge is a clear intuition, without whose symbols dimunition to their light, nor to in which Lord exactly this pure comprehension. He is never Himself drawn as a visionary. The parables are not for Him but for the crowd. When He speaks of His relation to the Father it is in direct terms, without metaphor. It follows that the scope of these exquisite little moralities ought to be measured by the audience who hear them, as well as by the light in which the people form part of the "Economy" whereby truth is dispensed to men as they are able to hear it (Mark, iv, 33; John, xvi, 12). Since, however, it's the Lord that speaks, we must reverently construe His sayings in the light of the whole Revelation which furnishes their ground and context. The "real sense of Scripture", as Newman points out in accord with all the Catholic Fathers, is "the scope of the Divine intelligence", or the scheme of Incarnation and Redemption.

The case before us is that the parables have each a definite meaning, to be ascertained from the explanation, wherein the parables are of their essence (the "mashal") or interpreting the moral meaning and accidentant (the "mashal"). There is an obvious negative rule. We must not pass over as unmeaning any detail without which the lesson would cease to be enforced. But shall we insist on a correspondence at all points, that we may translate the whole into spiritual values, or may we neglect whatever does not seem "apposite"? As a composition of the mind of Christ or interpretations; and John Chrysostom (In Matt., Ixiv) and the School of Antioch, who were literalists, prefer the latter method;
they are sober in exposition, not imaginative or mystic;
and Tertullian has expressions to the like purpose (De Pudic., ix); St. Augustine, who holds of Origen and the Alexandrians, abounds in the larger sense; yet he allows that "in prophetic narration, details are told us which have no significance" (De Civ. Dei, XVI, ii).

But Jerome in his earlier writings follows Origen; but his temper was not that of a mystic and with age he becomes increasingly literal. Among modern commentators the same difference of handling appears.
In the literary parables, which the more modern theorists do not look upon as a problem, but which we must guard against applying a hard and fast rule where taste and insight are required. Each of the parables will need to be dealt with as if it were a poem; with fulness of meaning, refinement of thought, slight but suggestive hints and touches, characteristic of human genius, will not be wanting to the method of the Divine Teacher. As in the highest art-critic, as Goethe warns us, we cannot divide as with an axe the from the outward. Where all is living, the metaphor of kernel and husk may be often misapplied.
The meaning lies implicit in the whole and its parts;
here as in every vital product the ruling spirit is one,
the elements take their virtue from it and separately are of no account. As we move away from the central idea we lose the assurance that we are not pursuing our own fancies; and the substitution of a mechanical yet extravagant dogmatism for the Gospel truth has led Gnostics and Manicheans, or latter-day visionaries like Swedenborg, into a wilderness of delusions which little by little tend away from the right path and can no longer be discerned. They are literary creations, not merely hieratic devices; and as awakening the mind to spiritual principles their intent is fulfilled when it muses on the deep things of God, the laws of life, the mission of Christ, of which it is thus made intimately aware.

St. Thomas and all Catholic doctors maintain that articles of faith ought to be deduced only from the literal sense of Scripture whenever it is quoted in proof of them; but the literal sense is often the prophetic, which itself as a Divine truth may well be applicable to an entire series of events or line of typical characters. The interpretation of such passages is seen, if at all, in the context; and parables and the "spiritual interpretation should follow the order of history". St. Jerome himself explains, "never can a parable and the dubious interpretations of riddles avail for the establishment of dogmas" (Summa, I-I, Q. 8; x; St. Jerome, In Matt., xiii, 33). From a parable alone, therefore, we do not argue categorically;
we can take ititel as a clue to a story further elsewhere. It was this canon of good sense which the Gnostics, especially Valentinus, disregarded to their own hurt, and so fell into the confusion of ideas mis-called by them revelation. Ireneus constantly opposes church tradition or the rule of faith, to these dreamers (II, xvi, against the Marcionians; II, xxvi, xxvii, against Valentinus). Tertullian in like manner,
"Heretics draw the parables whither they will, not whether they ought", and "Valentinus did not make up Scriptures to suit his teaching, but forced his teaching on the Scriptures." (See De Pudic., vii, ix; De Prescript., viii; and compare St. Anselm, "Our Daily Bread," II. 1.)

We learn what the parables signify, from this showing, "from the school of Christ"; we interpret them on the lines of "apostolic and ecclesiastical tradition" (Tert., "Scorp.", xii; Vinc. Lorin., xxvi; Con. Trid., Sess. IV.). The "analogy of faith" determines how far we may go in applying them to life and history. With Salmen in it is allowed to distinguish in them a "root", the occasion and immediate purpose, a "ring", the sensible imagery or incidents, and a "narrow", the Christian truth, thus conveyed. Another way would be to consider each parable as it relates to Christ himself, to the Church as His spiritual body, to the individual as putting on Christ. These are not different, still less contrary evolutions; they flow out of that great central dogma, "The Word was made flesh". In dealing on such a system with any part of Holy Writ we keep within Catholic bounds; we explain the "Verbum scriptum" by the "Verbum incarnatum". To the same principle we can reduce the "four senses", often reckoned as derivable from the single sense, the literal, by making an effort to establish on the latter, faithfully understood, implications which in all the works of genius, other than scientific, are more or less contained. The governing sense remains, and is always the standard of reference.

There are no parables in St. John's Gospel. In the Synoptic Gospels Mark has only one peculiar to himself, the seed growing secretly (iv, 26); he has three which are common to Matthew and Luke, the sower, mustard seed, and wicked husbandman. Two more are found in the same Gospels, the leaven and the lost sheep. Of the rest eighteen belong to the third and ten to the first Evangelist. Thus we reckon thirty-three in all, but some have raised the number even to sixty, by including proverbial expressions. An external but instructive division parts them into three groups; those delivered about the Lake of Galilee (Matt., xiii); those on the way up to Jerusalem (Luke, x-xviii); those uttered during the final stage of Our Lord's life, given in the other Gospels: parables of the kingdom, the Christian's rule; the judgment on Israel and mankind. In various ways commentators follow this arrangement, while indicating more elaborate distinctions. Westcott refers us to parables drawn from the material world, as the sower; from the relations of men to that world, as the fig tree and the vine; from the dealings of spiritual life, as another, as the prodigal son; and with God, as the hidden treasure. It is clear that we might assign examples from one of these classes to a different heading without violence. A further suggestion, not unreal, brings out the Messianic aspect of the parables in St. Matthew, and the more individual or ethical of those in St. Luke. Matthew and the third Gospel tend to enlarge and give more in detail; perhaps at the beginning of our Lord's ministry these illustrations were briefer than they afterwards became. We can surely not imagine that Christ never repeated or varied His parables, as any human teacher would under various circumstances. The same story may well be recorded in different shapes and with a moral adapted to the situation, as, e.g., the talents and the pounds, or the king's son's marriage and the unworthy wedding guest. Nor ought we to expect in the reporters a stereotyped accuracy, of which the New Testament nowhere shows any exceptions. Though we have received the parables only in what was recorded, they were in fact spoken, not written—and spoken in Aramaic, while handed down to us in Hellenistic Greek.

Although, according to most non-Catholic writers, Sts. Matthew and Luke are founded upon St. Mark, it is natural to begin our exposition of the parables in the first Gospel, which has a group of seven consecutively (xiii, 1-35). The sower with its explanations introduces them; the sower is the type of teaching; and we cannot refuse to see in the number seven (cf. St. John's Gospel) an idea of selected fitness which invites us to search out the principle involved. Men favourable to what is known as an "historic and prophetic" system of exegesis, have applied the seven parables to seven ages of the Church. This conception is not foreign to Scripture, nor unfamiliar in patristic writings, but it can scarcely be pressed in detail. We are not qualified to say how the facts of church history correspond, except in their general features, with anything in these parables; neither have we the means of guessing at what stage of the Divine Economy we stand. It may be enough to remark that the sower denotes the preaching of the Gospel; the tares or cockle, how it meets with hindrances; the mustard seed and the leaven, its noiseless yet victorious growth. From the hidden treasure and the pearl of price we learn that those who are called must give up all to possess the kingdom. Finally, the draw net pictures God's judgment, and the everlasting separation of good and bad.

From all this it appears that St. Matthew has brought the parables together for a purpose (cf. Maldonatus, 1, 443) and he distinguishes between the "multitude", to whom the first four were chiefly addressed, and the "disciples", who were privileged to know their deeper significance. Matthew introduces the Sermon on the Mount, which ends with a twofold comparison, the house on the rock typifying Christ's Church, and the house on the sand opposed to it. Nothing can be clearer, if we believe the Synoptics, than that our Lord so taught as to enlighten the elect and to leave obstinate sinners (above all, the Pharisees) in their darkness (Matt., xiii, 11-15; Mark, iv, 11-12; Luke, viii, 10). Observe the quotation from Isaías (Matt., xiii, 14; Luke, xvi, 24, 25, according to the Septuagint) intimating a judicial blindness, due to Israel's backslidings and manifest in the public troubles of the nation while the evangelists were writing. "Dominus justus" and "punishing them reluctant to perceive in the man Christ Jesus" were two powers, looking upon such sayings as prophecies after the event. But the parable of the sower contains in itself a warning like that of Isaías, and was certainly spoken by Christ. It opens the series of His Messianic teachings, even as that of the wicked husbandman embraces the theme with which the Gospel of the Jews, all except a holy "remnant", is contemplated. Moreover, since the Prophets had constantly taken up this attitude, denouncing the corrupt priesthood and disparaging legalism, why should we dream that language of similar import and contents was not heard from the lips of Jesus? And if anywhere, would it not be the Synoptics? Is it the Markan record of the New Law? There is no solid reason why the double-edge of these moralities should be ascribed to a mere "tendency" in the recorders, or to an edifying afterthought of primitive Christians. If the "allegory", i.e., the application to history, be intended by all three evangelists (which we grant), that intention lay at the root of the parable when it was delivered. Christ is "the Sower", and the seed could not escape the divers fortunes which befell it on the soil of Judaism. Even from the most modern point of view our Saviour was the last and greatest of the Prophets. How then could He avoid speaking as they did of a catastrophe which was to bring in the reign of Messiah? It is true that the New Testament as a whole, which is more explicit, and in the first place, is more concerned, with respect, isolated from the scenes which went before Him and the disciples who came after Him? It is certain that, for the Evangelists, "He that hath ears to hear let him hear" did not signify merely a "call to attention," but a distinct statement that the Son of Man is the Sower, Eleusinian and other, which it resembles, as carrying with it an intimation of some Divine mystery. The more an esoteric meaning is put upon the Gospels as their original scope, so much the more will it be evident that our Lord Himself made use of it.

Dismissing the minor form of Pan-theism which would have only coarsely more than a bare outline to go upon, and not regarding verbal differences, we can treat the parables as coming direct from our Lord. They teach a lesson at once ethical and dogmatic, with implications of prophecy reaching to the consummation of all things. Their analogy to the sacraments of which we have been speaking, and the pattern, must never be left out of view. Modern objections proceed from a narrow "enlightened" conception as of the "reasonable man," teaching general truths in the abstract, and attaching no importance to the examples by which he enforces them. But the Evangelists, like the Catholic Church, have considered that the Son of God, instructing His disciples for all time, would commit to them heavenly mysteries, "things hidden from the foundation of the world" (Matt., xiii, 35). So perfectly does this correspond with history apply to the tares, the good samaritan, the "watching" parables, to Dives and Lazarus (whether a real incident or otherwise), and to the wise and foolish virgins. His vision of the future is "a secret," and consequently our Lord's enigmatic statements. In consequence, certain critics have denied that Christ spoke some of these "allegories," but the grounds which they allege would entitle them to reject the others; that conclusion they dare not face (cf. Loisy, "Ev. synopt."); II, 318).

All orthodox writers take the sower (Matt., xiii, 3-8; Mark, iv, 3-8; Luke, viii, 5-8) as a model both of narrative and interpretation, warranted by the Divine Master Himself. The general likeness between teaching and sowing is found in Seneca, "Ep. Lxxvii;" and Prudentius, the Christian poet, has thrown the parable into verse, "Contra Symmachum," II, 1022. Salmoiragii comes near the method suggested above by which we get most profit from these symbols, when he declares that Christ is "the Sower and the Seed." We are immediately reminded of the Greek Fathers who call our Redeemer the seed sown in our hearts, Διόχος σπερματος, who comes forth from God that He may be the principle of righteousness in man (Justin, "Apologia," ii, 108; Tertullian, "De. bapt."); "In Joann," 73; and see Newman, "Tracts," 150-177. 1 Pet., i, 1-23, reads like an echo of this parable. Note that our Lord does not use personifications, but refers good and evil alike to persons; it is the "wicked one" which plucks away the seed, not a vague impersonal mischief. The rocky bottom, the burning wind and scorching sun, tell us of Palestinian sceneries. We find "thorny cares" in Catullus (liv, lxxiii) and in Ovid (Metamorph., XIII, 5, 483). Theologians warn us not to imagine that the "good and perfect heart" of the receiver is by nature such; for that would be the heresy of Pelagius; but we may quote the axioms of the Schools. "To him that hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance, but from him that hath not, shall be taken even that which he hath." St. Cyprian and St. Augustine (Ep. lix; Serm. lixiiii) point out that free will acceptance is the teaching of the Gospel; and so irenically against the Gnostic forerunners of Lutheranism (V, xxxix).

"To cockle" (Matt., xiii, 24-30 alone). Whatever he meant by πρασινον, the word, found only here in the Greek Scripture, is originally semite (Arab. zuuran). In the Vulgate it is retained and in popular French Wyclif renders it "darned or cockle," and curiously enough the name of his followers, the Lollards, has been derived from a Latin equivalent, "Jolunos." In the Revised New Testament we have "cockle," for which compare Job, xxxi, 40: "Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley." It is pretty well determined that the plant in question is Eleusinian, and the mischievous practice of "overzowing" has been detected among Easterns, if not elsewhere. The late weeding of the fields is in "substantial agreement with Oriental custom," at a time when good and evil plants can be fully distinguished. Christ calls Himself the "Son of Man"; He is the one, good men are the seed, the field is "humanity," is the Church regarded as the world, i.e., the visible Kingdom in which all kinds are mingled, to be sorted out in the day of His coming. He explains and fits in detail the lesson to the incidents (Matt., xiii, 36-43), with an adaptation so clear to the primitive age of Christianity that Loisy, Jülicher, and others have been led to call it the "text of the parable." They suppose it to be drawn out of some brief comparison in the original lost "source" of Mark. These random guesses have no scientific value. Historically, the moral which recommends 'care of disorders among Christians when a greater evil would follow on trying to put them down, has been enforced by the Church authorities against Novatus, and its theory developed in St. Augustine's long disputes with those hard African Puritans, the Donatists. St. Augustine, recognizing in Our Lord's words as in the spiritual life a principle of growth which demands patience, by means of it reconciles the imperfect militant state of His disciples now with St. Paul's idea of "our attitude in the Church, not as if we were saints, but as if we were sinners that others may believe through us." (Rom. x, 13). What is this "sower of the word" (Acts, vii, 55)? Or is it the "son of man, shining as a morning star" (Dan. xii, 1)?"
It has been questioned whether in the leaven we should recognize a good influence, answering to the texts, "you are the salt of the earth, the light of the world" (Matt., v. 13, 14). Modern criticism attributes the whole idea of the parable called leaven to St. Matthew and not to our Lord. The expression "instructed" is not something that has been made a disciple, and is of rare occurrence (Matt. in loco; xxvii, 57; xxviii, 19; Acts, xiv, 21). It answers to the Hebrew "sons of the prophets" and is thoroughly Oriental (IV. Kings, ii, 3, etc.)

The unmerciful servant, or serve nequum (Matt., xviii, 21-35), might be summed up in two words, "Forgiven, forgiven!" This chapter, xvii repeats the parabolic teaching; Christ sets the little child in the midst of His disciples as an example of humility, and tells the story of the Good Shepherd (verses 11-13) which St. John's Gospel repeats in the first person. Undoubtedly, Christ said "I am the Good Shepherd", as He says here, "The Son of man is come to save that which was lost" (11). St. Peter's question, "How oft shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him?" brings out the very spirit of Jewish formalism, in which the Apostle was yet bound, while it provokes a statement of the Christian ideal. Contrast, frequently employed to heighten the effect of our Lord's teaching, is here visible in the attitude taken up by our Lord and the Pharisees, "until seventy times seven times", the perfection of the perfect, signifies of course a number but a principle, "Be not overcome by evil, but overcome evil by good" (Rom., xii, 21). That is the secret of Jesus' and constitutes his revelation. St. Jerome reads a curious variant, plainly a gloss, in the Greek according to the Vulgate, I, 9). The proverbial number is perhaps taken from Lamech's song of revenge (Gen., iv, 21); where however the A. V. reads "seventy and sevenfold". This parable is the first in which God appears and acts as a king, though of course the title is frequent in the Old Testament. As regards the persons, observe that our Lord does not give them names which marks the story-telling more difficult. The wicked servant may be a satrap, and his enormous debt would be the tribute of his Government. That and his was sold into slavery would seem natural to an Eastern, then or later. "Ten thousand talents" may refer to the Ten Commandments. A hundred pounds owed by his "lower servant" graphically pictures the situation as between man and man compared with human offences towards God. The "prison" in which torture is wring from the culprit all he possesses, represents what has ever taken place under the tyrannies of Asia, down to recent times (compare Burke's charges against Warren Hastings in reference to similar acts).

Till be paid" might signify "never", according to a possible sense of "done", and was taken so by St. John Chrysostom. Later theologians construe it more mildly and adapt the words to a prison where spiritual debts may be redeemed, i.e., to purgatory (Matt., v, 25-26, closely corresponds). The moral has been happily termed "Christ's law of retaliation", announced by St. Peter (Mark, vi, 7); "There is a portion of flesh, v, 38-45), and the Lord's Prayer makes it a condition of our own forgiveness.

The labourers in the vineyard (Matt., xx, 1-16) has become celebrated in modern economical discussions by its pregnant phrase "To this last." Cadle, the Spanish poet, renders it meaning well, "To thy neighbour as to thee." But as so many titles it is one of the hardest to work out, and is variously expounded. In the main it is an answer to all Pharisees and Pedagogians who demand eternal life as a recompense due to their works, and who murmur when "sinners" or "the less worthy are accepted, though coming late to the Divine call. It might be perplexingly near to the atonement the Roman" which proceeds on identical lines and teaches the same lesson. Yet no other
The ten virgins (only in Matt., xxv, 1-13) may be considered as an internal parable declaring that the advent of the Kingdom will be unexpected. These are all comments on the text, "of that day and hour no one kneweth, no not the angels of heaven, but the Father alone" (Matt., xxv, 36). It is a "watching" parable, and is not in praise of virgins as such, though applied by the Fathers, as St. Gregory Martyr, to the duties of the virgin-state. St. Augustine writes, "souls that have the Catholic faith and appear to have good works" (Serm. xxiii, 2); St. Jerome, "they boast the knowledge of God and are untainted with idolatry". There seems to be a reminiscence of thisparable in Luke, xii, 36, written into the admonition men "that wait for their Lord". Weilhhausen's idea that St. Matthew imposes upon us is applicable. In the East it is usual that the bride should be conveyed with honour to the bridegroom's house; but there might be exceptions, as here. Mystically, Christ is the bridegroom, His parison the event, and the preparation by faith shining out in Christian deeds is imaged in the burning lamps or torches. For the "closed door" see Luke, xvi, 22-31. The conclusion, "Vigilate", is a direct lesson and no part of the story. St. Methodius wrote the "Banquet of the Ten Virgins", a rude mystery play in Greek.

The talents (Matt., xxi, 24-30) and the pounds or the mines (Luke, x, 21-27). Whether we shall identify or divide these two celebrated apodogmes can scarcely be determined. St. Mark (xiii, 34-30) blends his brief allusion with a text from the ten virgins. The circumstances in the first and third Gospels differ; but the warning is much the same. Commentators note that here the active life is extolled, as in the virgins a heedful contemplation. No argument for the chronicle is to be discovered. The "servant" was a bondslave; all that he had or acquired would be his master's property. "To him that hath shall be given" is one of the "hard sayings" which, while disclosing a law of life, seems not to harmonize with Christian kindness. Yet the analogy of God's dealings—not "mere" benevolence, but "wise and just" recognition of moral effort—is hereby maintained. If our Lord, as tradition tells, said, "Be ye good money-changers" (cf. I Thess., v, 21), the same principle is commended. Ethically, all that we have is a trust which we must give account. For the diversity of talents, note St. Paul, I Cor., xiii, 4, and the reconciliation of that diversity in "the same spirit of Christ". Both parables refer to the Church. Hence Lois and others attribute to the Evangelists, and especially to St. Luke, an enlargement, founded on later history, perhaps taken from Josephus, and intended to explain the delay of the Parousia (Ev. synopt., II, 464-50). Not accepting these premises, we must aside the comment which the Pope (xxiii, 36), who treats the stories as variants, observes, "it is nothing that our Evangelists should appear to differ in circumstances of time and place, since they consider only the general outline (suumam rei gestae), not the order or the time. Where else we find them seeming to disagree, they wish to explain not Christ's words but the drift of the parable as a whole". Leaving St. Matthew, we note the one short story peculiar to St. Mark, of the seed growing secretly (iv, 26-29). We have already assigned it to the group of the Parables of the Kingdom, and viewed in the Horatian line, "Crescit occulto velut arbor avo" (Odles, i, xii, 36). The husbandman who "knows not how" the harvest springs cannot be the Almighty, but is the human sower of the word. For homiletic purposes we may combine this parable with its cognate, "unless the grain of wheat die" (John, xii, 24) which applies it to Christ Himself and His Divine influence.

In St. Luke the two debtors (vii, 41-43) is spoken by our Lord to Simon "the leper" (Mark, xiv, 2-9) on occasion of Mary Magdalene's conversion, with its touching circumstances. At least since St. Gregory the Great, Catholic writers have so understood the history as to suppose that Mary was forgiven not for she loved much, and "to whom less is forgiven, he loveth less," has a perfectly clear human sense, in accordance with facts. We cannot deduce from such almost proverbial expressions a theory of justification. The lesson concerns gratitude for mercies received, with a strong emphasis on the hard arrogance of the Pharisees over against the converted sinner. The sin of those Pharisees is the "sin of Sodom," a "sinner." Thus, in effect, St. Augustine (Serm. xix, 4). The contrast between dead faith and faith animated by love—which Maldonatus would introduce—is not directly meant. And we need not suppose the latter portion of the story artificial or pieced together by St. Luke from other Gospel fragments.

With the problem of the four narratives (Matt. xxii, 1-14; Mark, xvi; Luke, vii; John, xii) the present article is not concerned.

The good samaritan (Luke, x, 35) is certainly authentic; it can be explained mystically in detail, and is therefore as much an "allegory" as a parable. If it was spoken by our Lord so was the wicked husband- men. It does not exactly reply to the question "Who is a neighbour?" Matthew agrees; St. Mark, who is a "fancier," says: "One, Whom in distress should I like to be neighbour to?" and gives an everlasting instance of the golden rule. At the same time it breaks down the fences of legalism, triumphs over national hatreds, and lifts the despised Samaritan to a place of honour. In the deeper sense we discern that Christ is the Good Samaritan who stretches out the hand of mercy to others, i. e., under Satan's yoke: neither law nor Prophets can help; and the Saviour alone bears the charge of healing our spiritual wounds. The inn is Christ's Church; the oil and wine are His sacraments. He will come again and will make all good. The Fathers, Sts. Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, are agreed in this general explanation. Modern dogmatic authors will not satisfy the Gospel idea; we must add, "the charity of Christ presseth us" (I Cor., v, 14).

The friend at midnight (Luke, i, 5-8) and the unjust judge (Luke, xviii, 1-8) need no explanation. With a certain strength of language both dwell on the power of continued prayer. Importunity wins, "the king of the Gentiles" (Matt. v, 25) offers the prayerer the "leaf of the tree" (Luke, i, 36). Dante has beautifully expressed the Divine law which these parables teach (Paradiso, x, 91-100).

The rich fool (Luke, x, 16-21) and Dives and Lazarus (xvi, 19-31) raise the question whether we should interpret them as true histories or as instructive fictions. Both are directed against the chief enemy of the Gospel, riches loved and sought after. The rich fool ("Nabal," as in 1 Kings, xxv) was uttered on occasion of a dispute concerning property and Christ answers "Man, who hath appointed me judge, or divider, over you?" Not injustice, but covetousness, "the root of all evil," is here reproached. Riches should be one's trust, "wealth which doth excell" (Matt. v, 20). But Christ's lasting kingdom is against these, "the tree which doth not bear it away" (Matt., xi, 12). Dante has beautifully expressed the Divine law which these parables teach (Paradiso, x, 91-100).

The story of Lazarus, which completes this lesson by contrast, appears to have no concealed meaning, and would therefore not fulfil the definition of a parable. Catholics, with Irenæus, Ambrose, Augustine, and the church liturgy, regard it as a narrative. The modern school of the Fathers generally, is of opinion that after this the Lord's discourse was broken off, and the parable from 4 March, xiii, 17. For a recent Jewish exposition of the parable see Geiger in "Jüdische Zeitschr., für Wissenschaft," VII, 200. St. Augustine (De Gen. ad Litt., viii, 7) doubts whether we can take literally the description of the other world. On that relation, supposed by rationalizing critics, of this Lazarus to St. John's Gospel, Lea has given an excellent account of his Paper. Passing over the barren fig tree (Luke, xii, 20-37) which gave a plain warning to Israel; and just referring to the lost sheep (Matt., xviii, 12-14; Luke, xv, 3-7) and the lost goat or drahma (Luke, xv, 8-10), none of which need detain us, we come to the great supper (Luke, xv, 20-24). That this parable concerns the Church is largely beyond dispute. It is important, as bearing on the universal commission, Matt., xxviii, 19. "Compel them to enter," like the strong sayings quoted above (importantum of some were.,) must be taken in the spirit of Christianity, which compels by moral suasion, not by the sword (Matt., xxi, 32).

The prodigal son (Luke, xv, 11-32), so called from verse 18, has a deep ethical meaning, but likewise a dogmatic, in which the two sons are the Israelite, staying at home in his father's house, and the Gentile who has wandered away. As the message of pardon it deserves to be called the very heart of Christ's gospel. We have justified these parallel lines of interpretation, for ethics and revelation, which were both visible to first-century Christianity, and the church always has had an interest. St. John Chrysostom and the Church always have applied it to Christian, i. e., baptized penitents. The "first [or best] robe" is naturally assumed by theologians to be "original justice," and the feast of reconciliation is our Lord's atoning sacrifice. Those who grant a strong Pauline influence in St. Luke's Gospel by some means must deny it in this parable. The "jealousy of good men" towards returned prodigals, which has exercised commentators, is true to life; and it counted for much in the discussions that finally close asunder the Church of Israel from the Church of Christ (I Thess., ii, 14-16). The joy over a sinner's conversion unites this parable with those of the lost sheep and of the repentant thief.

The unjust steward (Luke, xvi, 1-9) is, beyond question, the hardest of all our Lord's parables, if we may argue from the number and variety of meanings set upon it. Verses 10-13 are no part of the narration but a discourse to which it gives rise. The connecting link between them is the difficult expression "many (perhaps 'Manon') of iniquity"); and we may suppose with Bengel that Christ was speaking to those of his followers, like Levi, who had been farmers of the taxes, i. e., "publicans". In the contrast between the "children of this world" and the "children of light" we find a clue to the general lesson. Mark the resemblance to St. John's Gospel in the opposition thus brought out. There are two generations, or kinds of men—the worldling and the Christian; but of these one behaves with a perfect understanding of the order to which he belongs; the other often acts foolishly, does not put his talent to interest. How shall he proceed in the least Christian of all occupations, which is the handling of money? He must get the point of the parable as the first turn to "living for every day of life, and this by almsgiving, "yet that which remaineth, give alms; and behold, all things are clean unto you" (Luke, xi, 41). The strong conclusion follows, which lies implicit in all this, “You cannot serve God and mammon” (Luke, xvi, 13). Much unwise has been shown by commentators who were perplexed that our Lord should derive a moral from conduct, evidently supposed unjust, on the steward’s part; we answer, a just man’s dealings would not have afforded the proper lesson, viz., that Christians should make use of opportunities, but innocently, as well as the man of business who lets slip no chance. Some critics have gone further and connect the hidden meaning with Shakespeare’s “soul of good in things evil”, but we may leave that aside. Catholic preachers dwell on the spiritual sense that account with which the steward in the parable, shows grounds of the gates of Heaven, “everlasting tents”. St. Paul’s “faithful dispenser” (I Cor., iv, 2) may be quoted here. The “measures” written down are enormous, beyond a private estate, which favours the notion of “publicans”. The Revised Version translates “ball” happily into “bond”. It may be doubted which is “the lord” that commended the unjust steward. Whether we apply it to Christ or the rich man we shall obtain a satisfactory sense. “In their generation” should be “for their generation”, as the Greek text proves. St. Ambrose, with an eye to the dreadful scenes of idolatry, sees in the steward a warning to the Church, which he translates into the Christ, in De Fuga et, and long afterwards, Salmeron applies all to the Jewish people and to the Gentiles, who were indeed debtors to the law, but who should have been treated indulgently and not repelled. Lastly, there seems no ground for the widespread belief that “mammon” was the Phcenian Plutus, or god of riches; the word signifies “money”.

St. Luke (xvii, 7-10) gives a short apodogma of the unprofitable servants, which may be reckoned as a parable, but which needs no explanation beyond St. Paul’s phrase “not of works, but of Him that calleth” (Rom., ix, 11—A. V.). This will be true equally as regards Jews and Christians, in whose merits God crowns His own gifts.

The lesson is driven home by contrast, once more, between the pharisee and the publican (Luke, xviii, 9-14), disclosing the true economy of grace. On the one hand it is impossible to understand this with Hugo of St. Victor and others as typifying the rejection of legal and carnal Judaism; on the other, we may extend it as a universal principle. The parable of St. John (iv, 23-24) when our Lord transounds the distinction of Jew and heathen, Israelite and Samaritan, in favour of a spiritual Church or kingdom, open to all. St. Augustine says (Enarr. in Ps. lxvi), “The Jewish people boasted of their merits, the Gentiles confessed their sins”. It is asked whether those who “trusted in themselves that they were righteous and despised others” were in fact the pharisees or some of the disciples. From the context we cannot decide. But it would not be impossible if, at this period, our Saviour spoke directly to the pharisees, whom He condemned (at no time for their good works, but) for their boasting. The disdain of the multitude who knew not the law (cf. Matt., xxiii, 12, 25; John, vii, 39). The pharisee’s attitude, “standing”, was not peculiar to him; it has ever been the customary mode of prayer among Easterns. He says “I fast twice in a week,” not “twice on the Sabbath”. “Tithes of all that I possess” means “all that comes to me” as revenue. This man’s confession of his manifold guilt, but abundantly in praise of himself—a form not yet extinct where Christians approach the sacred tribunal. One might say, “He does penance; he does not repent”. The publican is of course a Jew, Zaccheus or any other; he cannot plead merit; but he has a “broken heart” which God will accept. Be meekful but not guilty; the word of God came from the Greek by way of the Vulgate, “Be propitious”, a sacrificial and significant word. “Went down to his house justified rather than the other” is a Hebrew way of saying that one was and the other was not justified, as St. Augustine teaches. The expression is St. Paul’s, δικαιωματικος; but we are not required to examine here the idea of justification under the Old Law. Mystically, the exaltation and abasement indicated would refer to the coming of the kingdom and the Last Judgment.

It remains to observe, generally, that a “double sense” has always been attached by the Fathers to our Lord’s miracles, and to the Gospel history as a whole. They looked upon the facts as reported much in the light of sacraments, or Divine events, which could not but have a perpetual significance for the Church and the world. They interpreted the facts in some sense of mystical interpretation, according to which every incident becomes a parable. But the most famous school of German critics in the nineteenth century turned that method round, seeing in the parabolic character of the Evangelists a force which converted sayings into incidents, which made of doctrines allegories, and of illustrations miracles, so that little or nothing authentic would have been handed down to us from the life of Christ. Such is the secret of the mythical procedure, as exemplified in modern dealing with the multiplication of the loaves, our Lord’s walking on the sea, the resurrection of the widow’s son at Nain, and many other Gospel episodes (Loisy, “Ev. simp.”, pessimum).

Parable, in this view, has created seeming history; and not only the Johannean document but the synoptical narratives must be construed as made up from supposed prophetic references, by adaptation and quotation of Old-Testament passages. It is for the Catholic apologist to prove in detail that, however deep and far-reaching the significance attributed by the Evangelists to the facts which they relate, those facts cannot simply be resolved into myth and legend. Nature also is a parable; but it is real. “The blue zenith”, says Emerson admirably, “is the point in which romance and reality meet”. And again, “Nature is the vehicle of thought”, the “symbol of spirit”; words and things are “ emblematic”. If this be so, there is a justification for the Hebrew and Christian philosophy, which sees in the world below us analogies of the highest truths, and in the Word made flesh at once the surest of facts and the most profound of symbols.

Parables have been variously classified in the Gospels. An attempt is made in the following table, such as: van Steenkiste, Comment. in Evang. secundum Matthaeum (Bruges, 1889-2); MacEvilly, Exposition of the Gospels (Dublin, 1877); Vitringa, Lamentations, i, b. 1-15; Tournai, Tertullian (Tubingen, 1883); MAAS, Comment. of Gospel of St. Matthew (New York, 1898); Rose, Evangelio selon s. Matthaeo (Barcelona, 1898); KNABESBERGER, Lucien (Loisy, 1883); Mystical exposition in Origen, Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory M. literal in Cursus, THEOPHILANTHUS, Jerome.

From the sixteenth century: special writers among early Protestants, CALVIN; later, VETHERA, Schriftnussige Erklärung (Frankfort, 1717); among Catholics, MALAGRECE, In IV evang. Pont. à Mounson, 1597; latest ed., Barcelona, 1884—2; NAHMEN, SERMONS in Parabolini (Antwerp, 1600). Modern Protestant writers: GRESWELL (London, 1838); TERNER (London, 1841; last ed., 1906); BRYCE, Parabolic Teaching of Christ (Edinburgh, 1882), Critical.—WEISS, Mark and Matthew (1872); JÜCHER (1888—1906), (these in German); followed by Loisy, Les paraboles évangéliques (Paris, 1907—8). Parabolani, παραβολαν, παραβολάνα, the members of a brotherhood who in the Early Church voluntarily undertook the care of the sick and the burial of the dead. It has been asserted, though without sufficient proof, that this was specially the case during the great plague in Alexandria in the episcopate of Dionysius the Great (second half of third century). They received their name from the fact that they risked their lives (παραβολάνατης την φόντον) in exposing themselves to contagious diseases. In addition to performing works of mercy, they were employed for the bishop. Their number was never large. The Codex Theodossianus of 416 (xvi, 2, 42) restricted the enrolment in Alexandria to 500. Paracelsus, Theophrastus, celebrated physician and reformer of therapeutics, b. at the Silbrücke, near Einsiedeln, in the Canton of Schwyz, 10 Nov., 1493; d. at Salzburg, 21 Sept., 1541. He is known also as Theophrastus von Hohenheim, Eremita (of Einsiedeln), and Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim. It is now established that the family originally came from Wurttemberg, where the noble family of Bombastus was in possession of the ancestral castle of Hohenheim near Stuttgart until 1091. Paracelsus is the Latin form in common use among the German scholars of the time. Wilhelm Bombast von Hohenheim, physician to the monastery of Einsiedeln and father of Theophrastus, changed the family residence to Villach in Carinthia (c. 1502), where at the time of his death (8 Sept., 1531), he was city physician.

Paracelsus mentions the following as his earliest teachers, his father, Eberhard Paumgartner, Bishop of Lavant, Matthias von Scheidt, Bishop of Seckau, and Matthias Schacht, Bishop of Freising. He was initiated into the mysteries of alchemy by Joannes Trithemius (1402-1516), Abbot of Sponheim, and a prolonged interval spent in the laboratories of Sigismond Fugger at Schwaz made him familiar with metallurgy. All his life restless and eager for travel, he attended the most important universities of Germany, France, and Italy, and, in 1526, went to Strasburg, where, already a doctor, he joined the guild of surgeons. The same year he was appointed, by order of the Inquisition, as instructor in natural sciences at Freiburg im Breisgau, the theologian, and Joannes Frobenius, the publisher, to the office of city physician of Basle, with which was connected the privilege of lecturing at the university.

His teaching, as well as his opposition to the prevailing Galeno-Arabic system, the burning of Avicenna's writings in a public square, the polemic tone of his discourses, which, contrary to all custom, were delivered in German, his discussions with the faculty, attacks on the greed of apothecaries, and to a certain extent, also, his success as a practitioner—all drew upon him the hatred of those in authority. In February he fled from Basle to Colmar. A typical vagrant, his subsequent life was spent in frequent wandering, surrounded by a troop of adventurers, with the reputation of a charlatan, but all the while observing all things with remarkable zeal, and bucolic with the composition of his numerous works. In 1529 we find him at Nuremberg, soon afterwards at Berghäusen and Ambach, in 1531 at St. Gall, later at Innsbruck, in 1532 at Stettin, in 1535 at Bad Pfeffers, Augsburg, 1537 at Vienna, Presburg, and Villach, and finally at Salzburg, where he died a natural death, and, in accordance with his wish, was buried in the cemetery of St. Sebastian. The present tomb in the porch of St. Sebastian's Church, was erected by some unknown person in 1752. According to recent research the portrait on the monument is that of the father of Paracelsus. Paracelsus did not join the ranks of the Reformers, evincing, rather, an aversion to any form of religion. The clause in his will, however, giving directions for a requiem Mass would indicate that before his death he regarded himself as a member of the Church.

Paracelsus is a phenomenon in the history of medicine. His genius was recognized, when his impetuous nature sought to overturn the old order of things, thereby rousing bitter antagonists. He sought to substitute something better for what seemed to him antiquated and erroneous in therapeutics, thus falling into the mistake of other violent reformers, who, during the process of rebuilding, underestimated the work of their contemporaries. He was not in touch with the humanist movement or with the study of anatomy and, zealously pursued, the most prominent factors in reorganization; leaving out of consideration his great, serviceable special departments, he stands above and misunderstood. His influence was felt specially in Wurttemberg, hitherto in a few schools of Germany, while he was entirely discounted throughout Italy.

He sought the cause of pathological changes, not in the cardinal humours, blood, phlegm, yellow and black gall (humoral pathology), but in the entities, which he divided into cœs astraœm (cosmic influences differing with climate and country), cœs renœm (toxic matter originating in the food), the cause of contagious diseases, cœs naturœ et spirœitalœ (defective physical or mental constitution), and cœs deœle (an afflication sent by Providence). The diseases known as syphilis, gout, and phthisis, are caused by the deposit of determinate toxins (tartar), are discovered chiefly by the urine test, and are cured by means of alkalies. Like the followers of Hippocrates he prescribes the observation of nature and dietetic directions, but attaches too great a value to experience (empiricism). In nature all substances have two kinds of influences, useful (œdïœdœa) and harmful (renœm), which are separated by means of alchemy. It requires experience to recognize essences as such and to employ them at the proper moment. His aim was to discover a specific remedy (arœcum) for every disease.

It was precisely here, however, that he fell into error, since not infrequently he drew a conclusion as to the availability of certain remedies from purely external signs, e. g., when he taught that the pricking of the fingers cures internal inflammation. This untrustworthy "doctrine of signatures" was at a later date developed farther by Rademacher, and to a certain extent also by Hubermann. Although the theories of Paracelsus as unrelated with the Galeno-Arabic system indicate no advance, inasmuch as they ignore entirely the study of anatomy, still his reputation as a reformer of therapeutics is justified in that he broke new paths in the science. He may be taken as the founder of the modern materia medica, and pioneer of scientific chemistry, since before his time medical science received no assistance from alchemy. To Paracelsus due to the use of mercury for syphilis as well as a number of other metallic remedies, probably a result of his studies in Schwaz, and partly his acquiescence with the use of unfermented wines to replace the Aquavitum, was the first to point out the value of mineral waters, especially the Pfiffer water, even attempting to produce it by artificial means. He recognized the tincture of galnut as a reagent for the iron properties of mineral water. He showed a particular preference for native herbs, from which he obtained “essences” and “tinctures” which were to replace the curious composite medicines so popular at the time. Regarding him from an ethical standpoint, his noble ideals of the medical profession, his love for the poor, and his piety deserve to be exalted. The perusal of his writings disproves the accusation of drunkenness which so often been made against him by his enemies.

For the most part Paracelsus dictated his works, in many cases bequesting the manuscript to friends with the request to have it printed. His name, being well known, was often missappropriated, so that later it became necessary to draw a fixed line between authentic and unauthentic Paracelsian works. The works of Paracelsus are characterized by a simple, direct, intelligible style. Cf. Schubert-Sudhoff, “Paracelsusforschungen” (Frankfort on the Main, 1857-89); Sudhoff, “Bibliographia Paracebsica” (Berlin, 1891); Idem, “Versuch einer Kritik der Echtheit der Paracelsischen Schriften” (Berlin, 1891-95). The best of the collective editions, with the exception of the above noted Paracelsa was, is that of Huser (Basle, 1589-91, 10 vols.; Frankfort, 1600, 3 vols.; Strasbourg, 1640). A detailed list of the authentic and unauthentic writings is to be found in Alb. von Haller, “Bibliotheca medicinae practice,” 11 (Basle, 1777), 2-12. Among his most important works are: “De Substantia Praeresalensium” (Basle, 1535), “De Corpore et Anima” (1550, ed. by Dr. Franz Stenzel (Heidelberg, 1901), which contains the system of Paracelsus; “Drei Bücher von den Franzosen” (syphilis and venereal diseases); “Grosse Wundarzney, über das Bad Pfiffer, über die Pest in Sterzing.”

Paraclete, Comforter (L. Consolator; Gr. παρά-κλέτος), an appellation of the Holy Ghost. The Greek word which, as a designation of the Holy Ghost at least, occurs only in St. John (xiv, 16, 26; xv, 26; xvi, 7), has been variously translated “advocate,” “intercessor,” “teacher,” “comforter.” This last rendering, though at variance with the passive form of the Greek, is justified by Hellenistic usage, a number of ancient versions, patristic and liturgical authority, and the evident needs of the Johannine context. According to St. John the mission of the Paraclete is to abide with the disciples after Jesus has withdrawn his visible presence from them; to inwardly bring home to them the teaching externally given by Christ and thus to stand as a witness to the doctrine and work of the Saviour. There is no reason for limiting to the Apostles themselves the comforting influence of the Paraclete as promised in the Gospel (Matt., x. 19; Mark, xii, 11; Luke, xii, 11, xii, 14) and described in detail in the Epistle of St. John, Cardinal Manning rightly sees a new dispensation, that of the Spirit of God, the Sanctifier. The Paraclete comforts the Church by guaranteeing her ineraney and fostering her sanctity (see Church). He comforts each individual soul in many ways. Says St. Bernard (Parvi Sermones): “De Spiritu Sancto testatur Scriptura quia procedit, spirat, inhabitat, replent, glorificat. Procedendo predestinat; spirovo quoque requidavit; inhabitando justificat quoque ovavit; replens, acumulatur meritis quasi justificavit; glorificando ditat pariter eos quoque accepit.” Every salutary condition, power, and action, in fact the whole range of our salvation, comes within the Comforter’s mission. Its extraordinary effects are styled gifts, fruits, beatitudes. Its ordinary working is sanctification with all it entails, habitual grace, infused virtues, adoption, and the right to the celestial inheritance. “The charity of God”, says St. John (Rom., v, 5), “is poured forth in our hearts by the Holy Ghost who is given to us.” In that passage the Paraclete is both the giver and the gift; the giver of grace (dono creatum) and the gift of the Father and the Son (dumans inventum). St. Paul teaches repeatedly that the Holy Ghost dwells in us (Rom., viii, 9, 11; I Cor., iii, 16).

That indwelling of the Paraclete in the justified soul is not to be understood as though it were the exclusive work of the third Person nor as though it constituted the formal causa of our justification. The soul, inwardly renovated by habitual grace, becomes the habitation of the three Persons of the Blessed Trinity (John, xiv, 23), yet that indwelling is rightly appropriated to the third Person who is the Spirit of Love. As to the mode and explanation of the Holy Ghost’s inhabitation in the soul of the just, Catholic theologians are not agreed. St. Thomas (I, Q. XLIII, a. 3) lays stress and unifies the doctrine of St. Augustine (sicut cognitum in cognoscente et amatum in amante). To Obenreder it is an ever acting force, maintaining and unfolding habitual grace in us. Verani takes it to be merely objective presence, in the sense that the justified soul is the object of a special solicitude and watchfulness on the part of the Paraclete. Forget, and in this he undoubtedly prefigures the true thought of St. Thomas, suggests a sort of mystical and quasi-experimental union of the soul with the Paraclete, differing in degree but not in kind from the intuitive vision and beatifying love of the elect. In so difficult a matter, we can only revert to the words of St. Paul (Rom., viii, 15): “You have received the spirit of adoption of sons whereby we cry: Abba (Father).” The mission of the Paraclete detracts nothing from the mission of Christ. In heaven Christ remains our παράκλητος or advocate (1 John, ii, 1). In this world, He is with us even to the consummation of the world (Matt., xxi, 20). He shall be with us through His Spirit of Whom He says: “I will send Him from me. He shall receive of mine and shall shew it to you” (John, xvi, 7, 14). See Holy Ghost.

Papa du Phanjas, François, writer, b. at the Castle of Pantja Champbaur, Basses-Alpes, 1724; d. at Paris, 1797. After his admission into the Society of Jesus in 1740 he taught mathematics and physics and later philosophy at Besançon. Many of his pupils became distinguished in the sciences and in apologetics. He was esteemed both for his learning and for his conciliatory disposition. On the suppression of the Society, the Archbishop of Paris and the Princess Adelaide granted him a pension. In 1791 he took the oath to the new authorities, but retracted it as soon as the pope had spoken. Amongst his works are: “Théorie des êtres sensibles” (5 vols., Paris, 1772; 4 vols., Paris, Paraténonium, a titular see of Lybia Secunda or Inferior (i.e. Marmarica), suffragan of Darnius. This city, which some claim should be called Ammonia, owed its celebrity to its port, whence Alexander visited the port of Europe, and Mark Anthony stopped there before Actium. Justinian fortified it to protect Egypt on the west. It has since disappeared and the port is partially covered with sand; the site, long called by the Arabs, Bareton, to-day bears the name Marsa Berek, in the vilayet of Benghazi (Tripolitana). Mention is made of three titles: Titus, prov. cent. of Council, Nic. 225; Simon, an Arian; and his successor Gains, who assisted at the Council of Alexandria, 362 (Le Quien, "Oriens christ." Paraguay, one of the inland republics of South America, separated from Spain and constituted as an independent state in 1811.

Etymology.—Historians disagree as to the true origin of the word “Paraguay”, one of the most common versions being that it is a corruption of the term “Payagua”, the name of an Indian tribe, and “í”, the Guarani for water or river, thus “Paragani”, or river of Paraguay”.

Another version, which is accepted by most correctly, is the word as meaning “crowned river”, from “Paragu” (palm-crown) and “í” (water or river).

Geography.—The Republic of Paraguay, with an area of about 496,000 square miles, occupies the central part of South America, bounded by Brazil to the north and east, by the Argentine Republic to the south-east and south-south-east, and by Bolivia to the west and north-west. It lies between 22° 4' and 27° 30' S. lat., and 54° 32' and 61° 20' W. long. The Paraguay River divides its territory into two great regions, viz.: the Oriental, which is Paraguay proper, and the Occidental, commonly known as the Chaco.

Population.—The population of Paraguay is composed of Indian, Creole, and European race, of small number of negroes, and the offspring of the mixture of the various races, among whom the Spanish-Indian predominates. According to the last census (1908) the total number of inhabitants is 850,000, of which nearly 790,000 are Catholics. Most of the Indian tribes which are still unconverted are scattered throughout the immense territory of the Chaco, the principal ones being the Guarani, the Payaguas, and the Aegaes.

Languages.—The official and predominating language is Spanish, and of the Indian dialects the one most in use is Guarani.

History.—Originally, Paraguay comprised the extensive River Plate, and it was discovered in 1527 by Sebastian Cabot during his explorations along the Upper Parana and Paraguay Rivers. He was followed by Juan de Ayolas and Domingo Martin del de Irala (1536-38). It was during the first administration of the latter (1538-42) that Christianity was first preached, by the Franciscan Fathers, who, as in almost every instance, were the priests accompanying the first traders. The second administration was that of Father Martin de Pacheco, by Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca, famous for his explorations in North America, who had been appointed governor of the River Plate, and received among other instructions from the king that of “propagating the Christian religion with the greatest zeal”. This task was, however, beset with many difficulties. In the first place, the peoples of the region, of whom the mixed character, were few in number; then they had to preach through interpreters; and worst of all, the cruel treatment of the Indians by the soldiers was itself sufficient to engender in the hearts of the natives a keen antipathy towards the religion that their new masters professed. Furthermore, the corrupt morals of the conquerors, their insatiable thirst for riches, their quarrels in the struggle for power, and their own discords and controversies could not but render their religion suspicious to the Indians. The new governor was well aware of all this; so his first official act upon reaching Asuncion (11 March, 1542) was to call the missionaries together to convey to them the kindness of his heart and to assure them the kindness with which the Indians should be treated as the necessary means of facilitating their conversion; he made them responsible for the success of the undertaking. He then convoked the Indians of the surrounding country and exhorted them to receive the Faith. The administration of Alvar Nuñez was characterized by his wisdom tending to the elevation of the natives, justice, no less than by his courage, energy, and perseverance. He succeeded in subduing the Indians, tribe after tribe, mainly through a policy of conciliation, and by force when necessary. It was thus that the march of Christianity in Paraguay was greatly facilitated during his short regime (1542-44). His achievements, however, only served to increase the jealousies of Martin del de Irala, who, never forgetting his relegation to a subordinate post, finally succeeded in turning most of the officers and soldiers against the governor. As a result of this rebellion, Nuñez was made a prisoner and sent to Spain, where he was acquitted after a trial that lasted eight years.

Despite the death of the last governor, Irala, the province (1542) until his death in 1557. His second administration was noted for the many improvements he introduced, such as the establishment of schools, the construction of the Cathedral of Asuncion and other public buildings, the promotion of local industries, etc. He was succeeded by Gonzalo de Cepeda, upon whose death (1559) Francisco Ortiz de Vergara was made governor, ruling until 1565, when he was deposed. Juan Ortiz de Zarate was then appointed, but, having sailed for Spain immediately thereafter in order to obtain the confirmation of the king, Felipe de Céceres was left in charge of the government. Although Zarate received the confirmation, he died in a few months, and, for he died in the same year, Juan de Garay then took the reins of government, and upon his assassination by the Indians in 1580, he was followed by Alonso de Vera y Aragon, who resigned in 1587 leaving Juan Torres de Vera in command.

Torres de Vera was still governing the province when S. Francisco Solanus, a Spanish Franciscan missionary, made his celebrated journey through the Chaco to Paraguay, coming from Peru. In the course of that expedition he preached to the natives in their own tongues and converted thousands and thousands of them (1588-89). When Torres de Vera resigned his post, Hernando Arias de Savadera, a native of Asuncion, was elected governor, ruling until 1593.
when Diego Valdes de Banda was appointed in his stead. Upon the death of the latter, Hernandarias, as he is also known, again took command in 1601. It was during this second administration of Arias (1601—09) that the Jesuits obtained official recognition for the first time in Paraguay, by virtue of an order from Philip III (1608), approving the plan submitted by Governor Arias for the establishment of missions by the disciples of Loyola. This marked the beginning of the flourishing period of the Church in Paraguay, as well as that of the welfare and advancement of the natives, just as the expulsion of the Jesuit Fathers in 1767, by order of Charles III, marked the decadence of the Faith among the Indians of the Chaco and their falling back into their former state of barbarism.

Paraguay was then nominally under the jurisdiction of the Viceroy of Peru, but in 1766 the Viceroyalty of La Plata was created, including Paraguay.

Finally, when in 1811 Paraguay declared its independence of Spain, the foundations of the Church were firmly established, as was the case in the other Latin-American countries.

After its emancipation, the country was ruled, more or less despotically, by Jose Gaspar Rodriguez de Francia, as dictator (1811—40); Carlos Antonio Lopez (1841—44); Marshal Francisco Solano Lopez, a brilliant general (1862—70), who was fought one of the bloodiest wars in the history of South America, between Paraguay on one side, and Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay on the other. The results of this struggle, provoked by the political ambitions of Lopez, were most disastrous for Paraguay. It began on 24 Nov., 1864, and lasted until 1 March, 1870, on which date the Paraguayan president was killed in the battle of Cerro Cora. At the close of the war, Paraguay was in a state of desolation, with its population decimated, its agriculture destroyed, and its treasury completely exhausted. After the peace was signed, a constitution was promulgated (1874) under which the shadow of the republic has recurred within the comparatively short term of forty years, having now entered upon a new era of prosperity, peace, and stability of government.

Relations between the Church and State.—Under the constitution in force, promulgated 25 Nov., 1870, the religion of the nation is the Roman Catholic, and the church of Paraguay. It began on 24 Nov., 1864, and lasted until 1 March, 1870, on which date the Paraguayan president was killed in the battle of Cerro Cora. At the close of the war, Paraguay was in a state of desolation, with its population decimated, its agriculture destroyed, and its treasury completely exhausted. After the peace was signed, a constitution was promulgated (1874) under which the republic has recurred within the comparatively short term of forty years, having now entered upon an era of prosperity, peace, and stability of government.

The Diocese.—The Diocese of Paraguay (Paraguayasia) was created under a Bull issued by Paul III on 1 July, 1547, eleven years after the foundation of the Jesuits in Paraguay by Father Juan de Ayolas, 13 Aug., 1538, and is therefore the oldest see of the River Plate. The first bishop was Father Pedro de La Torre, a Franciscan, who arrived at Asunci6n on the eve of Palm Sunday, 1555, during the second administration of Martinez de Irala. Directly dependent upon Rome, its jurisdiction extends over the whole territory of the republic, which is divided into 102 parishes, 6 of them being located in the capital. The present Cathedral of Asunci6n was formally dedicated on 27 Oct., 1815.

Laws Affecting the Church.—As above stated, the constitution provides that worship shall be free within the territory of the republic. The incorporation of churches and tenure of church property in Paraguay are governed under laws similar to those in force in the Argentine Republic, and the same may be said as to wills and testaments, charitable bequests, marriage, divorce, etc., the Argentine Civil Code having been adopted as a law of the country under an act of congress dated 19 Aug., 1876. All Catholic marriages are ipso facto valid for the purposes of the civil law, and by an act of 27 Sept., 1887, marriages performed under other rites should be recorded in the civil register in order that they may have legal force.

Under the Paraguayan law the clergy are exempt from military and jury service, and all accessories of Divine worship are admitted free of duty when imported at the instance of the bishop.

Law for the Conversion of Indians.—On 6 Sept., 1909, a law was enacted providing for the conversion of Indians to Christianity and civilization. By virtue of this law, the President of the Republic is authorized to grant public lands to individuals or companies organized for the purpose of converting the said tribes, in parcels not exceeding 7,500 hectares (about 18,750 acres) each, on which the conversionist shall establish a reduction with the necessary churches, houses, schools, etc. Several English Episcopal missions have been established in the Chaco under this law.

Education.—By law of 22 July, 1909, and in accordance with the Constitution (Art. 8) primary instruction is compulsory in the republic for all children between 5 and 14 years of age. At the beginning of 1909 there were in Paraguay 344 primary schools, attended by 10,605 pupils, and employing 756 teachers. These figures do not include the private schools, which had during the same year an attendance of from 2,000 to 2,500 pupils. The government has supported primary instruction for a period of six years. Secondary instruction is given in five national colleges, one of which is in the capital, and the others in Villa Concepci6n, Villa Rica, Villa Encarnacion, and Villa del Pilar. There are also two normal schools for the preparation of teachers. Higher education is provided for in the University of Asunci6n, which offers a six-years' course in law, social sciences, and medicine. Further courses in pharmacy and other branches have recently been added. There is besides a school of agriculture and a military academy.

Conciliar Seminary.—For the education of young men in the ecclesiastical career there is at Asunci6n an excellent institution known as the "Seminario Conciliar", founded in 1881 upon the initiative of Ana Escate, who personally collected the funds necessary for its establishment. During the thirty years of its existence sixty priests have graduated therefrom, one of them being the present Bishop of Paraguay, Monsignor Juan Simonioño Bogarin.

Parahyba, Diocese of (Parahybaensis), in the State of Parahyba, Brazil, suffragan of Bahia, founded 27 July, 1852, having been separated from the Diocese of Olinda (q. v.). It is coterminous with the State of Parahyba, one of the smallest in Brazil, bordering on the Atlantic Ocean, and is bounded on the north by the State of Maranhão, on the northeast by Piauí, on the south by Pernambuco, and west by Ceará. It has an area of 28,560 square miles. The episcopal city, which is also the state capital, dates from a Portuguese settlement of 1579. It is situated partly on an elevated plateau and partly on the surrounding plain, the latter (and newer) section along the Parahyba comprising, with its port of Cabo Branco, the State and Diocese of Parahyba. Sugar, cassava, rice, and tobacco are some of the products of this coast region, while the slopes back of the town are heavily forested. The chief ecclesiastical buildings of the city are the cathedral, Notre Dame dos Naveys (Our Lady of the Snows), and the former Jesuit College, now occupied by the State offices. The first and present (1911) bishop of the diocese, Mgr de Miranda Henrique, is a native of Parahyba. Born 30 August, 1855, he studied at the Pio-Latino American College at Rome and received there the degree of Doctor of Canon Law. Ordained priest 18 September, 1880, he was made canon of Bahia 11 August, 1885, and appointed bishop 2 January, 1904. He was consecrated on 7 January, 1904, and installed on 2 February of the same year. He introduced the diocese numbers (1911) 735,572 Catholics; 1000 Paroquianos; 48 parishes; 52 secular; 10 regular priests; 1 college.

Paralipomenon, The Books of (Παραλιπομένοι, α', β'; Livre PARALIPOMENON), two books of the Bible containing a summary of sacred history from Adam to the end of the Captivity. The title Paralipomenon, books "of things passed over", which, from the Septuagint, passed into the old Latin Bible and thence into the Vulgate, is commonly taken to imply that they supplement the narrative of the Books of Kings (otherwise known as I-H Sam. and I-II Kings); but this explanation is hardly supported by the contents of the books, and does not account for the present title. The view of St. Jerome, who considers Paralipomenon as equivalent to "epitome of the Old Testament", not in the same sense as the title and accordingly denote that many things are passed over in these books. The Hebrew title is Dibherv Haggayim, "the acts of the days" or "annals". In the printed Hebrew and the Protestant Bibles they are entitled "Books of Chronicles".

Unity and Places in the Canon.—The two books are really one work, and are treated as one in the Hebrew MSS. and in the Massoretic Summary appended to the second book. The division was first made in the Septuagint for the sake of convenience, and thence was adopted into the Latin Bibles. The Hebrew text was first divided in Bomberg's edition of the rabbinical Bible (Venice, 1569-7). Moreover, there is a probable criticism of the order in the ternary division and accordingly denote that many things are passed over in these books. The Hebrew title is Dibherv Haggayim, "the acts of the days" or "annals". In the printed Hebrew and the Protestant Bibles they are entitled "Books of Chronicles".

Contexts.—The first part of 1 Par. (i-ix), which is a sort of introduction to the rest of the work, contains a series of genealogical and statistical lists, interspersed with short historical notes. It comprises: (1) the genealogy of the patriarchs from Adam to Jacob (i); (2) the genealogy of the twelve tribes (ii-iii); (3) a list of the families of Juda, Benjamin, and Levi dwelling in the wilderness, with the genealogy of the family of Saul repeated (iv). The second part of 1 Par. contains the history of the reign of David preceded by the account of the death of Saul (x-xix). II Par. comprises the reign of Solomon (i-ix), and the reigns of the kings of Juda (x-xxxvi, 21). Part of the edict of Cyrus allowing the Jews to return and rebuild the temple is added as a conclusion (xxxvi, 22-23). The historical part of Paralipomenon, thus covers the same period as the last three Books of Kings. Hence naturally much of the matter is the same in both; often, indeed, the two narratives not only agree in the facts they relate, but describe them almost in the same words. The Books of Paralipomenon also agree with the Books of Kings in plan and general arrangement. But side by side with these agreements there are many differences. The Books of Paralipomenon narrate some events more briefly, or present them in a different manner, and omit others altogether (e.g., the adultery of David, the violation of Thamar, the murder of Amnon, and the rebellion of Absalom). Hence, more on facts regarding the temple, its worship and its genealogy, much information on these subjects which is not found in the other books. Moreover, they ignore the northern kingdom except where the history of Juda requires mention of it.

Object.—On comparing Paralipomenon with the Books of Kings we are forced to conclude that the writer's purpose was not to supplement the omission of these latter books. The objects of his interest are the temple and its worship, and he intends primarily to write the religious history of Juda with the temple as its centre, and, as intimately connected with it, the history of the house of David. This clearly appears when we consider what he mentions and what he omits. Of Saul he narrates only his death as an introduction to the description of David. In the history of David's reign he gives a full account of the translation of the ark to Mount Zion, of the preparations for the building of the temple, and of the levitical families and their offices; the wars and the other events of the reign, he either passes over briefly, or speaks altogether of them. Solomon's reign is treated alone; and the titles of the books are united to build up the history of the building and the dedication of the temple. After the disruption of the kingdom the apostate tribes are hardly mentioned, while the reigns of the pious kings, Aa, Josaphat, Josas, Ezechias, and Josias, who brought about a revival of religion and showed great zeal for the temple and its worship, are summarily dealt with. Again, the additions to the narrative of the Books of Kings in most cases refer to the temple, its worship and its ministers. Nor is the account of the temple allowing the rebuilding of the temple without significance. The same purpose may be noted in the genealogical section, where the tribes of Juda and Levi are given special prominence and have their genealogies continued and the priestly from the Exile. Hence, Paralipomenon writes his history with a practical object in view. He wishes to urge the people to a faithful and exact adherence to the worship of God in the restored temple, and to impress upon them that thus only will the community deserve God's blessings and protection. Hence he places before them the example of the past, especially of the pious kings who were distinguished for their zeal in building the temple or in promoting the splendour of its worship. Hence, too, he takes every occasion to show that the kings, and with them the people, prospered or were delivered from great calamities because of their attachment to God's worship, or experienced misfortune because of their unfaithfulness. The frequent mention of the Levites and of their offices was probably intended to induce them to value their calling and to carry out faithfully their duties.

1. AUTHOR AND TIME OF COMPOSITION.—The Books of Paralipomenon were undoubtedly written after the Restoration. For the genealogy of the house of David is carried beyond Zorobabel (1 Par., iii, 19-24), and the very decree of Cyrus allowing the return is cited. Moreover, the value of the sums collected by David for the building of the temple is expressed in daries (1 Par., xxix, 7, Heb.), which were not current in Palestine till the time of the Persian domination. The peculiarities of style and diction also point to a time later than the Captivity. The older writers generally attributed the authorship to Esdras. Most modern non-Catholic scholars attribute the work to an unknown writer and place its date between 300 and 250 B.C. The main reasons for this late date are that the descendants of Zorobabel are given to the sixth (in the Septuagint and the Vulgate to the eleventh) generation, and that in II Esdras (xii, 11, 12) the list of the high-priests extends to Nehemiah, who, according to Josephus, held the pontificate in the time of Alexander the Great. These lists, however, show signs of having been brought up to date by a later hand, and may therefore be regarded as the work of a later writer.

Moreover, a work written for the purpose mentioned above would be more in place in the time immediately following the Restoration, while the position and character of Nehemiah point him out as a possible author. Hence most Catholic authors still adhere to Esdras' authorship, and place the time of composition at the end of the fifth or at the beginning of the fourth century B.C.

2. HISTORICAL VALUE.—The reliability of the Books of Paralipomenon as a historical work has been severely attacked by the critics of the last century (e.g., De Wette, Burg, NELLY, Burg, MEYER, NAGEL, etc.). The author is accused of exaggeration, of misrepresenting facts, and of appealing to imaginary documents. This harsh judgment has been considerably mitigated by more recent writers of the same school, who, while admitting errors, absolve the author of intentional misrepresentation. The objections urged against the books cannot be examined here in detail; a few general remarks in vindication of their truthfulness must suffice. In the first place, the books have suffered at the hands of copysts; textual errors in names and in numbers, which latter originally were only indicated by letters, are especially numerous. Cross exaggerations, such as the slaying of 7000 chariots by Judah and 3000 chariots by Israel in 1 Kings (17:18) and the impossibly large armies mentioned in 1 Par. (xiii, 3), are plainly to be attributed to this cause. In the next place, if the sections common to Paralipomenon and the Books of Kings are compared, substantial agreement is found to exist between them. If the author, then, reproduces his sources with substantial accuracy, his work can be controlled by comparing them with those of another writer who has used the same documents, there is no reason to suspect that he acted differently in the case of other sources. His custom of referring his readers to the documents from which he has drawn his information should leave no doubt on the subject. In the third place, the omission of the facts not to the credit of the pious kings (e.g., the adultery of David) is due to the object which the author has in view, and proves no more against his truthfulness than the omission of the history of the northern tribes. He did not intend to write a full history of the kings of Judah, but a history for the purpose of edification. Hence, in speaking of the kings where his purpose as models of piety, he omits details which are not edifying. Such a presentation, while one-sided, is no more unethical than a panegyric in which the foibles of the subject are passed over. The picture is correct as far as it goes, only it is not complete.

3. Parallelism, the balance of verse with verse, an essential and characteristic feature in Hebrew poetry. Either by repetition or by antithesis or by some other device, thought is set over against thought, form balances form, in such wise as to bring the meaning home to one strikingly and agreeably. In the hymns of the Assyrians and Babylonians parallelism is formal and essential. Schrader takes it for granted that the Hebrews got this poetic principle from them (Jahrbuch für Protestant. Theologie, i, 121); a common Semitic source, in days long before the migration of Abraham, is a likelier hypothesis. The Syriac, Vulgate, and other ancient versions, recognized and to a certain extent preserved, the principle of parallelism of verse with verse in the Bible. Not until the sixteenth century did Hebraists speak of it as a poetical principle, essential to the Hebrews. It was then that Rabbi Azaria de Rossi, in his work "Parallelismi," the first divided various poetic portions of the Bible into verses that brought out the fact of parallelism and of a fixed number of recurrent accents. Schöttgen ("Hare Hebraic et Talmudicae", Dissertatio vi, Dresden, 1733, vol. i, p. 1252), though erring in that he calls its absurd to speak of iambics and hemiambics in Hebrew poetry, deserves the credit of having first drawn up the canons of parallelism, which he calls ";s.; in (Gesammelte, the work up of a subject, Polyanu, X, xiv, 6). According to these canons Biblical prose differs from Biblical poetry solely in that the poet works up a subject by repetition of the same idea in the same or in different words, by omission of either the subject or the predicate, by antithesis of contrary thoughts etc. Bishop Lowth (De Sgra Poetis Hebrceorum, 1755; Isaiah, 1778) based his investigations upon the studies of Schöttgen and coined the term parallelus. He distinguished three kinds of parallelism; the synonymous, the antithetical, and the synthetic. His conclusions have been generally accepted.

I. Synonymous Parallelism.—The very same thought is repeated or the same thoughts are repeated in the very same words. The following examples, being close translations of the original text, will better illustrate Hebrew parallelism than does our Douai version which (in regard to the Psalms) has reached us through the medium of a Latin translation of the Septuagint Greek:

(a) Up have the rivers lifted, Japheth, and lift up the rivers of his waters, and lift up the rivers their breakers.

Ps., xxi, 3 (Hebrew, xxi).

(b) Yea, in the night is Am-Mod put down, set at naught;

Yea, in the night is Kir-Mod put down, set at naught.

Is., xv, 2.

II. Antithetical Parallelism.—The thought of the first line is expressed by an antithesis in the second; or is counterbalanced by a contrast in the second. This parallelism is very common in the Book of Proverbs:

(a) The tongue of the wise adorneth knowledge, The mouth of the fool blurteth out folly.

Prov., xv, 2.

(b) Soundness of heart is the life of the flesh, Envvy is the rot of the bones.

Prov., xiv, 30.
III. Synthetic Parallelism.—The theme is worked up by the building of thought upon similar thought:

(a) Mightier than the voices of many waters,
My soul hath made as broad as the waves
Of the sea, as the sound of the breaking of the ocean In the high place is Jahweh.
Ps., xxcii. 4 (Hebrew, xxciii).

(b) Know ye that Jahweh he is the Lord,
He hath made us; his we are;
His folk are we, yea, the flock of His pasture.
Ps., xxciv. 1 (Hebrew, c).

IV. Inversion Parallelism (named by Jebb, in 'Sacred Scripture', see note).—The thought veers from the main theme and then returns thereto.

Only in God be my soul,
From Him is my life;
Only He is my rock, my salvation,
My fortress. I tetter not.
Ps., xxi. 2–7 (Hebrew, xxi).

V. Stair-like Parallelism.—The thought is repeated, in pretty much the same words, and is developed still further:

Jahweh shall guard thee from all evil,
Jahweh shall guard thy soul;
Jahweh shall guard thy coming and thy going
From now for ever more.
Ps., exx. 7–8 (Hebrew, exxi).

VI. Emblematic Parallelism.—The building up of a thought by use of simile:

Jahweh, my God, early I seek Thee;
My soul doth faint for Thee;
My flesh doth faint for Thee;
Like a land of drought it thirsts for Thee.
Ps., liii. 2, 3 (Hebrew, liii).

Parallelism may be seen in distichs or tristichs. In fact, scholars are now coming round to the theory that the principle of balance and counterbalance is far more comprehensive in Hebrew poetry than are the above-noted forms. Each individual line is a unit of sense, and combines with other such units to form larger units of sense. Recent scholars, like Zenger, have found an almost endless variety of balance and counterbalance of words with words; of lines with lines, either of the same strophe or of an antistrophe; of strophe with antistrophe or with another strophe, etc. In fact, this wider application of the principle of parallelism or balance in the study of Hebrew poetry has enabled modern scholars to go far in their efforts to reconstruct the metres of the sacred writers.

WALTER DUMM.

Parallelism, Psycho-Physical, a doctrine which states that the relation between mental processes, on the one hand, and physical, physiological, or cerebral processes on the other, is one merely of invariable concomitance; that psychical change or psychical state, each psychosis, involves a corresponding neural change or neural state, neurosis, and vice versa. It denies the possibility of interaction between body and mind. At most there can be a certain point-for-point correlation such that, given any process in the nervous system, a definite mental process is its invariable accompaniment, and the converse, that any particular process in consciousness, a corresponding brain-state or neurosis will invariably be present.

The fundamental principles of Psycho-physical Parallelism are based (1) upon the fact that all psychological processes presuppose as their condition sine qua non processes of a physical character in the nervous organism; (2) upon the exhaustiveness of the conservation of energy; and (3) upon the assumption that mind and matter are so utterly unlike and so utterly opposed in character that interaction between them is impossible.

The psychological data upon which the theory rests we may in general grant. The modern science of psychophysiology (or) aided by cerebral anatomy, cerebral physiology, and pathologv, proves fairly conclusively that (1) sensation and perception are conditioned by nervous processes in the brain and in the peripheral end-organs of sense, depending in part at least upon external stimuli; (2) that memory and imagination likewise presuppose, and are conditioned by, cerebral connection with cerebral activity; and (3) that this is also to some extent the case as regards to intellectual operations and rational volition.

We have so far little more than an experimental verification of two Scholastic principles: (1) that sensation is an act of the composite organism, and (2) that intellectual activity is conditioned by phantasmatism, and is excited directly by nervous processes. In truth the data scarcely warrant us in going further on this. But the parallelist goes further. He asserts that intellectual operations have an exact physiological counterpart, which is more than he can prove. An image has doubtless its counterpart, physiologically in the brain and physically in the outside world. The association of ideas is conditioned by, and in a sense is the psychical parallel of, the simultaneous or successive activity of different parts of the brain, between which there is a physical and functional connexion; and without such association of ideas intellectual operations are impossible—so long, that is, as soul and body are united in one being. But that intellectual operations proper—judgment, logical inference, general concepts, vast and far-reaching as they are in their significance, should have an exact counterpart in the activity of brain-cells and their neuronic connexions, is a hypothesis which the known facts of psycho-physics fail to bear out, and which is also inconceivable. How, for instance, can a general concept refer to an object only in so far as it does other objects, embracing schematically in a single act many diverse notes, bear any resemblance to the disturbance of nervous equilibrium which accompanies it, a disturbance which has no unity at all except that it occurs in different parts of the same brain more or less simultaneously? Or, how can cerebral processes of a perfectly unstable and a typical intellectual they are alleged to be, the physiological counterpart of processes of reasoning, rigid, exact, logical, necessary?

The assertion that all psychical processes have a physiological "parallel" is unwarranted, and scarcely less unwarranted is the assertion that all physiological processes have a psychical "parallel". This latter point can be established only by appeal to the fiction of "subliminal" or "subconscious" consciousness. The existence of a "threshold of consciousness", or, in other words, of a limit of intensity which must be exceeded by the stimulus, as also by the nervous impulse which results, before the latter can affect our consciousness, has been experimentally proved, and has been referred for by the parallelist except on the assumption that there are states of consciousness of which we are wholly unconscious.
The second line of argument advanced in favour of Parallelism is as follows: The principle of the conservation of energy supposes, we are told, that the universe is a closed mechanical system in which events, whether past or future, are calculable with the utmost precision, given the knowledge of any one stage in the development of that universe and the laws according to which that development takes place. The human intellect is brooked no interference whateverfrom without. Hence interaction between mind and matter is impossible, and parallelism is the only other alternative.

This conclusion is quite illegitimate. Energy, as understood in the law which states that its sum is invariable, is strictly a non-directed quantity. Hence, even in the most detailed account of the phenomena of animal life, as the experiments of Atwater and Hubner show, it by no means disproves the influence of consciousness and will, for mind could still direct material energy and the law remain intact. This is admitted by Fechner, Mach, Boltzmann, Hlder, and von Hartmann, the latter being a determinist.

Moreover, were the absolute independence of the physical world indeed a fact, the existence of consciousness would become an insoluble mystery, and the existence of a parallelism between it and the physical world an inexplicable fact. If the interaction between mind and matter, consciousness ceases to be an instrument whereby we modify our physical environment to suit our needs. Purposive striving, deliberation, choice, volition, are thus rendered wholly unnecessary and irrelevant, and the belief that we can really do something to change things in the outside world and so promote both our content and that of our neighbour is a hopeless delusion. The practical utility of physical science also becomes illusory, for our bodies, which alone can give it effect, are declared to be merely automata with the working of which consciousness has nothing to do. Parallelism is useless here, if interaction be abolished; any, more, is incompatible with that very independence on account of which its existence is affirmed. Absolute independence and universal concomitance are contradictory. If there is comcomitance, directly or indirectly, as Mill said, there must be causal connexion.

That such a causal connexion between mind and matter is contained in the consciousness of activity, purpose, will, and responsibility, directly testifies; and in the face of this testimony to hark back to the Cartesian doctrine of radical opposition between body and soul, extension and thought, is futile and contrary to experience. Variations and developments of parallelism more in general be classed under two heads; conscious automatism—the theory of Huxley that the human body is a mere machine of which consciousness is the "collateral product," a shadow or epiphenomenon which symbolically indicates, though it in no wise influences, the mechanical processes which underlie it; and the "Dual-aspect Theory" which maintains that psychical and physical phenomena, over which the first aspect is to a point-for-point correspondence all along the line, are but different aspects or expressions of the same common substance. Huxley's view emphasizes the material at the expense of mental, curiously oblivious of the fact that all we know of the physical universe and all the events within it is through our minds which, to no immediate extent, originate in, and belong to, consciousness. The dual-aspect view improves upon this, by giving to consciousness a value at any rate equal to that of mechanical movement. It is in fact a form of Monism (q. v.) akin to that of Spinoza and involves most of the difficulties to which that system leads. But from our point of view its chief error lies in its assertion that parallelism is the only relation which holds between the physical and the psychical, a relation which can be proved to hold so far as sensation and reception are concerned, but which, if further generalized to the exclusion of interaction, inevitably leads to contradiction.

Paraná, Diocese of (Paranensis), suffragan of Buenos Aires, in Argentina; until recently comprised two civil provinces, Entre Ríos and Corrientes, and the civil Government of Misiones (see Map of South America in Vol. III). This territory belonged to the Diocese of Buenos Aires until 1854, when it became a separate pro-vicariate Apostolic, to be erected into a diocese by the Bull of Pius IX dated 13 June, 1858. The area of Entre Ríos is 28,764 sq. miles; Corrientes, 32,545 sq. miles; Misiones, 8,571 sq. miles. The respective populations are: Entre Ríos, 108,000; Corrientes, 322,000; Misiones, 14,000. Thus the diocese has a total area of 69,870 sq. miles and a population of 774,000. The Diocese of Corrientes has recently been erected.

The first Bishop of Paraná, José Gabriel Segura y Crespo, b. at Cadiz, in Spanish America, 1768. Died d. 13 October, 1862, took possession of the see 3 June, 1860. His successor, José Maria Gelabert y Crespo, b. in 1829; d. 23 November, 1897, took possession of the see 23 August, 1865, and was succeeded by Rosendo de la Lustra y Gordillo (d. 3 November, 1900). The see was erected 19 April, 1860; was promoted to a bishopric 26 November, 1899, and elevated to a diocese 1 February, 1901, with the title of Santa Maria de los Angeles and San Agustín. The cathedral has a chapter of ten canons, including the five
The “Guia Eclesiastica de Argentina” for 1910 gives the total number of clergy (parish priests and chaplains) for the diocese as 96; no mention, however, was made by the bishops belonging to religious institutes engaged in educational work in the diocese. The conciliar seminary (Calle Urquiza, Paraná), under the direction of a rector, vice-rector, and five professors, has an aggregate of forty-three students in all its departments. The Beneficiate Fathers have an agricultural school at Victoria, and the Capuchins conduct a college for boys at Colonia, Entre Rios. There are nine parochial schools in Entre Rios and one in Corrientes. Educational institutions for girls and charitable institutions of various kinds are conducted by the Daughters of the Immaculate Concepcion, the Religious of the Perpetual Adoration (Adoratrices), Servants of the Holy Cross, the Sisters of St. Francis of St. Joseph (Lyons), and of the Garden, Vincentian Sisters, Belgian Tertiaries, Sisters of the Poor of St. Catherine of Siena, Carmelites (Tarragona), Mercedarians, and Tertiaries of Charity and of Carmel. Piou and charitable societies well represented in the diocese are the Acción Católica, the Apostleship of Prayer, the Confraternity of St. Vincent of Paul, Association for the Propagation of the Faith, Confraternities of Our Lady of Perpetual Succour and of Carmel, Daughters of Mary, and the peculiarly national Society of Our Lady of Haiti.

The Diocese of Corrientes also embraces Misiones. Rev. Luis A. Niella has been appointed bishop by the pope.

Parasceve (Gr. παρασκευή) seems to have supplanted the older term προπάρασσα, used in the translation of Judith, viii, 6, and in the title—not to be found in Hebrew—of Ps. xcvii (xcviii). It became, among Hellenistic Jews, the name for Friday, and was adopted by Greek ecclesiastical writers after the writing of “The teaching of the Twelve Apostles”. Apparently it was first applied by the Jews to the last day of the week, then to the whole day, its etymology pointing to the “preparations” to be made for the Sabbath, as indicated in the King James Bible, where the Greek word is translated by “Day of Preparation”. That the regulations of the Law might be minutely observed, it was made imperative to have on the Sabbath three meads of the choicest food laid ready before sunset (the Sabbath beginning on Friday night); it was forbidden to undertake in the afternoon of the sixth day any business which might extend to the Sabbath; Augustus relieved the Jews from certain legal duties from the ninth hour (Josephus, “Antiq. Jud.”, XVI, vi, 2).

Parasceve seems to have been applied also to the eve of certain festival days of a sapatic character. Foremost among these was the first day of the unleavened bread, Nisan 15. We learn from the Mishna (Pesach, iv. 1, 5) that the Parasceve of the Pasch, whatever day of the week it fell on, was kept even more religiously than the ordinary Friday, in Judena work ceasing at noon, and in Galilee the whole day being free. In the schools the only question discussed regarding this particular Parasceve was when should the rest commence; Shamai said from the very beginning of the day (evening of Nisan 13); Hillel said only from after-sunset (morning of Nisan 14).

The use of the word Parasceve in the Gospels raises the question concerning the actual day of Our Lord’s crucifixion. All the Evangelists state that Jesus died on the day of the Parasceve (Matt. xxvii, 62; Mark, xv, 12; Luke, xxiii, 54; John, xix, 11, 31); and there can be no doubt from Luke, xxiii, 54-56 and John, xix, 31, that this was Friday. But on what day of the month of Nisan did that particular Friday fall? St. John distinctly points to Nisan 14, while the Synoptists, by implying that the Last Supper was the Paschal meal, convey the impression that Jesus was crucified on Nisan 15. But this is hardly reconcilable with the following facts: When Judas left the table, the disciples imagined he was going to buy the things which were needed for the feast (John, xiii, 29)—a purchase which was impossible if the feast had begun; after the Supper, Our Lord and his disciples left the city, as also did the men detailed to arrest Him—this, on Nisan 15, would have been contrary to Ex., xii, 22; the next morning the Jews had not yet eaten the Passover; moreover, during that day the Council convened; Simon was apparently coming from work (Luke, xxiii, 29); Jesus and the two robbers were executed and were taken down from the crosses; Joseph of Arimathea bought fine linen (Mark, xx, 46), and Nicodemus brought “a mixture of myrrh and aloes about a hundred pound weight” (John, xix, 39) for the burial; lastly the women prepared spices for the embalming of the Saviour’s body (Luke, xxiii, 55)—all things which would have been a desecration on Nisan 15. Most commentators, whether they think the Last Supper to have been the Paschal meal or an anticipation thereof, hold that Christ, as St. John states, was crucified on the Parasceve of the Pasch, Friday, Nisan 14.

Paray-le-Monial, a town of five thousand inhabitants in the Department of Yonne, Diocese of Autun, France. It is indisputable that Paray

Chapel of the Visitatio, Paray-le-Monial

(Paredau; Parolium) existed before the monks who gave it its surname of Le Monial, for when Count Lambert of Chalon, together with his wife Adelaide and his friend Mayeul de Chiny, founded there in 973 the celebrated Benedictine priory, the borough had already been constituted, with its arables and communal privileges. At that time an ancient temple was dedicated to the Mother of God (Chartier of Paray). The Chyny monks were, 999-1789, lords of the town.

Protestantism made many proselytes here; but in 1618 the Jesuits were summoned, and after a century there remained only a few Protestant families, who have long since disappeared. In order to complete the work, Pere Paul de Barry, the author of "Pensées de la vie," in 1675 bought thither the Visitations.

Paray-le-Monial has become a much-frequented place of pilgrimage since 1873, as many as 100,000 pilgrims arriving yearly from all parts of Europe and America. The most venerated spot is the Chapel of the Visitatio, where most of the appari-
Pardies, Ignace-Gaston, French scientist, b. at Pau, 5 Sept., 1636; d. of fever contracted whilst ministering to the prisoners of Bérenger, near Paris, 22 April, 1673. He entered the Society of Jesus 15 Nov., 1652 and for a time taught classical literature: during this period he composed a number of short Latin works, in prose and verse, which are praised for their delicacy of thought and style. After his ordination he taught philosophy and mathematics at the College of Louis-le-Grand in Paris. His early death cut short a life of unusual activity in the sciences. His earliest work is the "Horologium Thaumanticum Duplex" (Paris, 1662), in which is described an instrument he had invented for constructing various kinds of sundials. Three years later appeared his "Dissertatio de Motu et Natura Cometarum," published separately in Latin and in French (Bordeaux, 1665). His "Discours du mouvement des astres" (Paris, 1667), "La Statique" (Paris, 1673), and the manuscript "Traité complet d'Optique", in which he followed the undulatory theory, form part of a general work on physics which he had planned. He opposed Newton's theory of refraction and his letters together with Newton's replies (which so satisfied Pardies that he withdrew his objections) are found in the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1672 and 1673. His "Discours de la Connaissance des Bestes" (Paris, 1672) combatted Descartes' theories on the subject so feebly that many looked on it as a covert defence rather than a refutation, an impression which Pardies himself afterwards endeavoured to destroy. His "Éléments de Géométrie" (Paris, 1671) was translated into Latin and English. He left in manuscript a work entitled "Art de la Guerre" and a celestial atlas comprising six charts, published after his death (Paris, 1673-74). His collected mathematical and physical works were published in French (The Hague, 1891; Amsterdam, 1904).

Arrival of the Pardon of Ste-Anne de Fouesnant
Alfred Guillon, Luxembourg Gallery

Morlaix, and that of Ste-Anne d'Auray in Morbihan. The former occurs on 24 June, and that of Ste Anne d'Auray on 24 July, the anniversary of the finding of the statue of Ste Anne by the peasant Nicolazic. The latter is regarded as the most famous pilgrimage in all Brittany, and attracts pilgrims from Tréguier, Léonniais, Cornouaille, and especially from Morbihan. Each diocese and parish is known by its costume.

To these Breton Pardons come pilgrims from every side, clad in their best costumes which are only to be seen there and at a wedding. It is a pilgrimage of devotion and piety. The greater part of the day is spent in prayer and the Pardon begins with early Mass at 4 A.M. Its observance, however, has actually commenced earlier, for the preceding evening is devoted to confession, and the rosary is generally recited by the pilgrims, the whole way to the place of the Pardon. After the religious service, the great procession takes place around the church. This is the most picturesque part of the Pardon and may be regarded as its mise en scène. At Ste-Anne d'Auray, this procession is especially striking and impressive. In the procession join all those whom the intercession of Ste Anne has saved from peril and danger. The sailors are there with fragments of the vessel, upon which they escaped in the shipwreck; the lame are there currying on their shoulders the crutches, for which they have no longer need; and those rescued from fire are also in the procession, carrying the rope or ladder, by means of which they escaped from the flames. The Paré of Brittany has practically remained unchanged for over two centuries. It is not a pretext for feasting or revel, but a reverent and religious gathering where young and old commune with God and His saints in prayer. There is indeed a social side to the Breton Pardon, but it is purely incidental. Its true import is religious.

THOMAS O’HAGAN.

Paré, Ambrose, French surgeon, b. at Bourges, near Laval, department of Maine, 1517; d. 20 Dec., 1590. He was apprenticed to a barber at an early age, became barber-surgeon at the Hôtel-Dieu, Paris, surgeon in the army of Francis I (1520-28), re-enlisted on the reopening of hostilities (1542-44), and in 1545 began the study of anatomy at Paris, under François-Jacques Duhem (Sylvius). He was appointed field-surgeon by Marshal Rohan, and (1552) became surgeon to King Henry II, in 1554, member of the Collège de St-Cosme, exempt from taxation, and in 1563, after the siege of Rouen, first surgeon and chamberlain to King Charles IX. A Catholic throughout his life, Tal has given documentary refutation of the legend that Paré was a Huguenot and was spared during the Massacre of St. Bartholomew’s Day (1572) by direct command of the king. On account of his humanitarian activity, he was held in special regard among soldiers. His motto, as inscribed above his chair in the Collège de St-Cosme, read: “Je le pians et Dieu le guarist.” A monument was erected to him at Laval.

Paré’s pioneer work was chiefly in the department of military surgery. His importance in the development of modern surgery may be compared with that of his contemporary, Andreas Vesalius, in the development of modern anatomy. The chief services rendered by Paré are a reform in the treatment of gunshot wounds, and the revival of the practice of ligating arteries after amputation. From the time of Giovanni Vigni (c. 1490-1529), surgeon-in-ordinary to Pope Julius II, gunshot wounds were classified as contused, bruised, and poisoned, and the last-named, on the supposition that all gunshot wounds were poisoned by powder, were cauterized with red-hot iron or hot oil. On one occasion, after a battle, Paré, not having sufficient oil, applied ointment and bandaged the wound, and observed that the healing processes proceeded more favourably under this treatment. His observations, published in 1545, gave the impulse to a rational reform of the whole system of dealing with wounds, and did away with the theory of poisoned gunshot wounds, despite the fact that the Italians, Alfonso Ferri (1522), and Giovanni Francesco Rota (1555), obstinately defended the old view. Vascular ligation, which had been practised by the Alexandrians, was revived by Paré at amputations in the form of ligating the artery, though thereby the patient was left in a state of shock. His work, which he published in 1552, speaks of an inspired spirit in which came to him through Divine grace. In cases of strangulated hernia of the groin he performed the operation known as herniorrhaphy, while heretofore physicians feared to operate in such cases, leaving the patient to die miserably. In obstetrics we owe to the means of amputation of female dress, which was always averse to the Cesarean operation (see cesarean). In all departments of surgery we find Paré an independent observer and thinker; but his advanced notions encountered much opposition on the part of the Paris Faculty of Medicine. Thus at the time of his enrolment in the faculty of the Collège de St-Cosme, 1554, the faculties of Latin a ground of opposition against him. Nor could it ever forgive him for rendering ludicrous supposes, the so-called arana (mumia, eratumin humanum, unicorn).

The best edition of Paré’s works, which also contains biographical notices, is that of MADALINE, Oeuvres d’Ambroise Paré (3 vols., Paris, 1849-51); they were also edited by LE PATELON, Ambroise Paré d’après de nouveaux documents (Paris, 1874). Earlier editions are: Oeuvres de M. Ambre Paré, Paris, 1575, other editions to 1685; Latin, Paris, 1582; Dutch, 1604; German, 1601. The most important of his treatises are: Cinq liers de chirurgie (Paris, 1572), his masterpiece; La méthode de traiter les plaies faictes par harquebutes, et autres harquebutiers faictes par des fléches de velours, renferme plusieurs instructions et semblables: aussi des combats spontanément faictes en la poudre a canon (Paris, 1545, 1552, tr. 1617). The méthode canonique des plaies et fracturez de la tete humaine (Paris, 1591) gives the definition of the administration anatomique (Paris, 1591, 1594), at one time a very highly esteemed anatomical work; Discours de la mumié, des seras, de la licance et de la peste (Paris, 1592), réciprocité de la pudeur faictes contre son discours de la licance (Paris, 1584). Paréja, Francisco, missionary, probably b. at Aucion in the Diocese of Toledo, Spain, date unknown; d. in Mexico, 25 January, 1528. He was sent to Florida with other Franciscans, and died at Augustine in 1563 or early in 1564. He laboured as a missionary among the savages of the peninsula, notably at San Juan on the coast, and then became guardian of the monastery of the Immaculate Conception, at St. Augustine. He is also styled “cuestor”: and must have held the office before 1613, when the monastery was elevated to the rank of a mission under the patronage of St. Helena. Subsequently, he joined the province of the Holy Gospel in Mexico. Father Paréja is noted for having published the first books in the language of an Indian tribe within the United States, the Timucuan, and may for that purpose have gone to Mexico. His various works are: Catecismo en lengua castellana y timuquina (Mexico, 1612); “Catecismo y breve exposición de la doctrina cristiana” (Mexico, 1612); “Confesionario en lengua castellana y timuquina” (Mexico, 1613); “Gramática de la lengua timuquina de Florida” (Mexico, 1614); “Catecismo de la doctrina cristiana en lengua timuquina” (Mexico, 1617); “Catecismo y confesionario en las lenguas de los que viven en la tierra de los indios castellanos y timuquina” (Mexico, 1627).

ZEPHRYN ENGELHARDT.

Parents (Lat. parere, to begot).—I. Duties of Parents towards their Children.—In the old pagan world, with due allowance for the operation of the natural law, love and reverence were replaced by authority and fear. The Roman jurisprudence during a time at least exaggerated the paternal power to the point of ownership, but it did not emphasize any duties that he had to perform. His dominion over his children was not less complete than that over his slaves. He possessed an undisputed right of life and death; he might sell them into slavery and dispose of any property he possessed with this general idea, abortion, infanticide, and exploitation were widespread. The laws seemed to contemplate these crimes as venial offences and to have been largely inoperative in such cases.

In consequence the filial observance implied in the ancient pietas could not always be translated as affection. This evident law of pietas was modified by decrees of the later emperors. Alexander Severus distinguished the right of a father to put an adult child to death, whilst Diocletian made it illegal for fathers to sell their children.

Under Christianity parents were not merely the repositories of rights and duties whose affirmation nature demanded, but they were to be regarded as the representatives of God Himself, from whom "all paternity is named," and found in this capacity the way to mingle love and reverence, as well as the strongest motive for a cheerful obedience on the part of the children.

The first duty of parents towards their children is to love them. Nature inculcates this clearly, and it is customary to describe parents who lack this affection as unnatural. Here the offence is against a distinct virtue which the theologians call pietas, concerned with the demeanour reciprocally of parents and children. Hence the circumstance of this close relationship of parent and offspring in decision when there is question of sins of this sort. In the case of serious damage done by parents to their children, besides the sin against justice there is contract the quite different malice derived from this propinquity. This virtue, interpreting the precept of the natural law, also requires parents diligently to care for the upbringing of their children, that is, to provide for their bodily, mental, and spiritual well-being. This is so even in the supposition that the children are illegitimate. Parents are guilty of grievous sin who treat their children with such cruelty as to indicate that their conduct is inspired by hatred, or who, with full intent, curse them or exhibit a notable and unreasonable preference for one child rather than another. Parents are bound to support their children in a manner commensurate with their social condition until these latter can support themselves. The mother is bound to do nothing to prejudice the life or proper development of her unborn infant, and after birth she may not injure or neglect it unless there is some adequate excuse.

A father who is idle or unthrift so that his family is left without fitting maintenance is guilty of grievous sin. Parents must see that their children obtain at least an elementary education. They are bound with special emphasis to watch over the spiritual welfare of their children, to afford them good example, and to correct the erring. The teaching of the Church is that the right and duty to educate their own offspring abides natively and primarily with the parents. It is their most important task; indeed understood in its full sense it is ranked by no obligation. In so far as it means instruction in the more elementary branches of human knowledge it is in most cases identical with the obligation of bestowing care in the selection of a school for the children.

Hence, in general, parents may not with a safe conscience send their children to non-Catholic schools, whether these be sectarian or otherwise. Good reasons exist in the distance where there are grave reasons for permitting Catholic children to frequent these schools, and where such dangers as may exist for their faith or morals are by fitting means either neutralized or rendered remote. The judge in such cases, both of the sufficiency of the reasons alleged as well as of the kind of measure to be employed to encounter successfully whatever risks there are, is, in the United States, the bishop of each diocese. The attendance at non-Catholic schools by Catholic children is something which, for weighty motives and with due safeguards, cannot be approved. In any case parents must carefully provide for the child's religious instruction.

As to higher education, parents have a clear duty to see that the faith of their children is not imperiled by their going to non-Catholic universities and colleges. In the lack of positive legislation before parents can consent to their children attending non-Catholic universities or colleges there must be a commensurately grave cause, and such dangers as may threaten faith or morals are to be rendered remote by suitable remedies. The last-named requirement is obviously the more important. Failure to fall in with the first, provided that means had been taken faithfully to comply with the second, would not oblige the confessor to refuse absolution to such parents. There is an undoubted and under ordinary circumstances alienable authority to be exercised by parents. The extent of this is a matter to be determined by positive law. In the instances in which it becomes necessary to decide upon one of the parents rather than the other as custodian of the children, the rule of legal preference in the United States is that the children are confided to the charge of the father. There is, however, a growing disposition to favour the mother. Parents have the right to administer chastisement to their offspring in a reasonable fashion, and punishment suitably may be a serious offense before God.

II. DUTIES OF CHILDREN TOWARDS PARENTS.—Children have a threefold obligation of love, reverence, and obedience toward their parents. This is enjoined by the virtue which St. Thomas calls pietas, and for which the English phrase is "dutiful observance." As religion makes it obligatory for us to worship God, so there is a virtue distinct from all the others which inculcates the attitude we ought to hold towards parents, in so far as they are in a secondary sense the principles of our being and of its regulation. The violation of this obligation therefore is reputed a grievous sin unless the smallness of the matter involved makes the offence a venial one. Of the obligations referred to, love and reverence are in force during the parents' lifetime. Obedience ceases when the children pass from under the parental authority. The duty of love of parents, strongly intimated to the conscience by the natural law, is expressly emphasized by the positive law of God. The Fourth Commandment, "Honour thy father and thy mother," is universally interpreted to mean not only respect and submission, but also the entertaining and manifestation of affection they deserve at the hands of their children.

Those children are guilty of grievous sin who habitually exhibit towards their parents a heartless demeanour, or who fail to succour them in serious need, either bodily or spiritual, or who neglect to carry out the provisions of their last will and testament in so far as the amount devised will permit. It is not merely the external bearing which has to be governed. The inward sentiment of affection must be deep-seated. The Christian concept of parents as being the delegates of God carries with it the inference that they are to be treated with peculiar respect. Children incur the guilt of grievous sin who strike their parents, or even raise their hands to do so, or who give them any form of great pain. The only exception is to be said of those who put their parents in a violent rage, who curse them or revile them, or refuse to recognize them.

Besides the parental relationship and dignity account is to be taken of their authority. Children, so long as they remain under its yoke, are bound to obey. This does not mean, according to the teaching of St.

PARENZO-POLA (Parentina-Polensis), Diocese of.

The little town of Parenzo is picturesquely situated on a promontory extending into a creek of the Adriatic. At the head of this promontory, close to the water, rises the cathedral, the pride of Parenzo. Built by the first bishop, Euphrasius, in the time of Justinian, under whom Byzantine architecture first reached the shores of the Adriatic, it is the best preserved monument of that epoch in Austria. Moreover, archaeologists have proved that it bears witness to the antiquity of Christianity in Parenzo, as it is the most recent of three cathedrals, the second of which belongs to the time of Constantine the Great, while the oldest antedates that epoch. Parenzo was a separate diocese from the time of Euphrasius until after the Concordat of 1802 with Poland. In 1023 it united with Pola, whose first bishop, Venustus, died about 529. At present Parenzo-Pola is under the Jurisdiction of Gori and numbers 180,000 Catholics, including 150 secular priests, one monastery with 21 monks, and 6 (or 8) convents containing 132 nuns.

PARINCI, Giuseppe, Italian poet, b. at Bosisio, 23 May, 1729; d. at Milan, 12 Aug., 1799. Parini was early taken to Milan. He was an apt pupil and possessed the same precocious faculty of writing, which was to be the work of the greater part of his life. His poetic talent also evinced itself at an early date and secured his entrance into several of the Accademie, especially into the "Arcadia." Taking Holy orders in 1754, he served as tutor in several noble families and gained that knowledge of fashionable life which he was to put to good use in his "Giorno." From 1773 on he was professor of fine arts in the Brera at Milan. When the Cisalpine Republic was established with its capital at Milan, Bonaparte made him a member of the municipal government; this position he lost on account of his liberal utterances. The latter part of his life was passed in rather strained circumstances. The popular fame of Parini depends upon his "Odi" and the "Giorno," particularly upon the latter. The "Odi" (1st ed., Milan, 1791) are in the conventional manner of the eighteenth century Arcadian compositions; some of them deal with matters of moral and social speculation. The "Giorno," upon which he had bestowed all his powers, is a diary in which the young man of fashion of the time. In the four parts of it—"The Mattino," the "Mezzogiorno," the "Vespro," and the "Notte"—he passes in review the futile daily occupations of a typical society beau, all while ridicule the effeminate and corrupt customs of the "notte di Roma." The interest of improvement is diversified by the introduction of pleasing episodes. The verse form is that of unrhymed decasyllables. Some occasional verses, a cantata ("La figlia di Jofte"), a dramatic work ("Ascanio in Alba"), and a few minor compositions in prose constitute the rest of his literary production.

See the biography by Reina prefixed to Parini's Opera (Milan, 1854-6); CANTO,

PARIS, Archdiocese of (Parisensis), comprises the Department of the Seine. It was re-established by the Concordat of 1802 with much narrower limits than it had prior to the Revolution, when, besides the city of Paris and its suburbs, it comprised the archdiocese of Jussos (including the deaneries of Château-foz and St. Germain) and the diocese of Chartres (including the deaneries of Lagny and Vieux-Corbeil). The deanery of Chomeaux, enclosed within the territory of the Diocese of Sens, was also dependent on the Archdiocese of Paris, which had then 492 parishes. The Concordat gave to the dioceses of Versailles and Meaux the archdeaconies of Jussos and Brie, which had nearly 350 parishes, and reduced the Archdiocese of Paris to 42 urban and 76 suburban parishes. According to the Concordat it had eight suffragans: Amiens, Arras, Cambrai, Orléans, Meaux, Soissons, Troyes, and Versailles. The re-establishment under the Restoration of the Archdioceses of Reims and Sens removed the Dioceses of Troyes, Amiens, and Soissons from the jurisdiction of Paris, but the Dioceses of Blois and Chartres, created in 1822, were attached to the Province of Paris. In 1841 Cambrai, having become a metropolitan see, ceased to be a suffragan of Paris, Arras being made its suffragan.

The Roman Lutetia.—The Gaul Camalogenus built Lutetia in 52 B.C., while defending against Cesar the tribe of the Parisi, whose capital it was. The Romans erected a new city on the left slope of Mt. Luculentus (later Mont St.-Geneviève). That the Romanization of Paris was very quickly accomplished is proved: (1) by the altar (discovered in 1710 under the choir of Notre-Dame) raised to Jupiter under Tiberius by the Naive Parisiace, on which are represented several deities borrowed from the Roman pantheon; (2) by the remains of a pedestal (found in 1871 on the site of the old Hôtel-Dieu), which doubtless supported a statue of Germanicus, and on which is represented Janus Quadripartites, the Roman symbol of transitions. There, the state, the army, and the Roman people were represented. The remains of Tiberius were discovered in the basin of the Tiberius, but in 1903-04 other thermae were discovered a little distance away, which must be either the palace of Tiberius or, according to M. Julian, those of the communal house of the Naive Parisiace. Ruins have also been discovered of an arena capable of holding from 8000 to 9000 persons.

Beginnings of Christianity at Paris.—Paris was a Christian centre at an early date, its first apostles being St. Denis and his companions, Sts. Rusticus and Euthymius. Until the Revolution the ancient tradition of the Parisian Church commemorated the seven stations of St. Denis, the stages of his apostolical and martyrdom: (1) the ancient monastery of Notre-Dame-des-Champs of which the crypt, it was said, had been dedicated to the Blessed Virgin by St. Denis on his arrival in Paris; (2) the Church of St. Étienne-des-Grés (now disappeared), which stood on the site of an oratory erected by St. Denis to St. Stephen; (3) the Church of St. Benoît (disappeared), where St. Denis had erected an oratory to the Trinity (Deus Beneictus); (4) the chapel of St. Denis-de-Paris near Notre-Dame (disappeared), on the site of the tribunal of the prefect Sicinnius, who tried St. Denis; (5) the Church of St.-Denis-de-la-Châtre, the crypt of which was regarded as the saint's cell (now vanished); (6) Montmartre, where, according to the chronicle written in 836 by Abbot Hilduin, St. Denis was executed; (7) the basilica of St.-Denis (see below). The memorials of St. Denis's activity in Paris have thus survived, but even the date of his apostolate is a matter of controversy. The legend stating St. Denis came to Gaul in the time of St. Clement, dates only from the end of the eighth century. It is found in the "Passio Dionisi," written about 800, and in the "Gesta Dagoberti," written at the Abbey of St.-Denis at the beginning of the ninth century. Still later than the formation of this legend Abbot Hilduin identified St. Denis of Paris with Denis the Areopagite (see DIONYSIUS THE PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE), but this identification is no longer admitted, and history is inclined to accept the opinion of St. Gregory of Tours, who declares St. Denis one of the seven bishops sent by Pope Sylvester about 350. It is certain that the Christian community of Paris was of some importance in the third century. Recent discoveries seem to prove that the catacombs of the Gobelins and of St. Marcellus on the left bank were the oldest necropolis of Paris; here have been found nearly 500 tombs, of which the oldest date from the end of the third century. Doubtless in this quarter was situated the church which St. Gregory of Tours regarded as the oldest in the city; here was the sarcophagus of the virgin Crescentia, granted that our hypothesis agrees with a legend referring to this region the foundation of the chapel under the patronage of Pope St. Clement, in which Bishop St. Marcellus was buried in the fifth century. This bishop, who was a native of Paris, governed the Church of Paris about 430; he is celebrated in popular tradition for his victory over a dragon, and his life was written by Fortunatus.

merovingian Paris.—Paris was preserved from the invasion of Attila through the prayers and activity of St. Genevieve (q. v.), who prevailed on the Parisians not to abandon their city. Clovis, King of the Franks, was received there in 496 after his conversion to Christianity, and made it his capital. The coming of the Franks brought about its great religious and social development. At the summit of the hill on the left bank Clovis founded, in honour of the Apostles Peter and Paul, a basilica to which the tomb of St. Genevieve drew numbers of the faithful, and in which St. Clotilde, who died at Tours, was buried. On the right bank was built as early as the fifth century two churches consecrated to St. Martin of Tours—one near the present Notre-Dame, the other at the end of the country, in the place where the Church of St.-Martins-Champs now stands. Childebert (d. 558), son of Clovis, having become King of Paris in 511, added to the religious prestige of the city. After his campaign in Spain, he made peace with the inhabitants of Saragossa on condition that they would deliver to him the sacred vessels and the stole of St. Vincent. On his return, at the instance of St. Germain (q. v.), built a church in honour of St. Vincent, which later took the name of Germain himself. The present church of St.-Germain-des-Prés still preserves some columns from the triforium, which must date from the first building. After the death of Carbët, son of Clotaire I (567), Paris was not divided among the sons of Clotaire, but formed a sort of municipal republic under the direction of St. Germain. Owing to this exceptional situation Paris escaped almost entirely the consequences of the civil wars with which the sons of Clotaire, and later Fredegunde and Brunilde, disturbed Merovingian France. Mgr Duchesne conceded a certain authority to an ancient catalogue of the bishops of Paris, preserved in a sacramental dating from the end of the ninth or the beginning of the tenth century. After St. Germain other bishops of the Merovingian period were: St. Céran (Ceranus, 606-21), who collected and compiled the Acts of the Martyrs, and during whose episcopate a council of seventy bishops (the first national council of France) was held at the basilica of Sts. Peter and Paul; St. Landry (650-6), who founded under the patronage of St.
Christopher the first charity hospital (Hôpital-Dieu) of Paris, and who caused the monk Mareulf to compile, under the name of "Recueil de Formules", the first French and Parisian collection of the legislation of the seventh century at St. Agilbert (666-80), who was the brother of St. Theodulfide, first Abbes of Jouarre, and who had, during his youth in England, instructed in Christianity the King of the Saxons; St. Hugues (722-30), nephew of Charles Martel, previously Archbishop of Rome and Abbot of Fontenelle.

Paris UNDER THE CARLOVINGIANS.—The Carlovingian period opened with the episcopate of Dodebro (737-75), who received Pope Stephen at Paris. Special mention must be made of Eneas (appointed bishop in S33 or S35; d. 870), who wrote against Photius, under the title "Libellus adversus Gracces", a collection of texts on the Holy Ghost, fasting, and the Roman primacy. As the Carlovingians most frequently resided on the banks of the Seine or the Rhine, the bishops of Paris greatly increased their political influence, although confronted by counts who represented the absent sovereigns. The bishops were masters of most of the Île de la Cité and of a considerable portion of the Île de la Cité and the Île de la Cité, and the bank, necessary to defend Paris.

As early as the ninth century the property of the chapter of Notre-Dame, established (775-95) by Bishop Echenard, was distinct from that of the diocese, while the cloister and the residences of the canons were quite independent of the royal power. Notre-Dame and the Abbey of St-Germain-des-Prés were then two great places, whose wealth entered through the kingdom their agents (missi negotiatores), charged with making purchases. When the Normans entered Paris in 843 or 846, the body of St. Germain was hurriedly removed. They established themselves in the abbey, but left on payment of 7000 livres, whereupon the saint's body was brought back with great pomp. Another Norman attack caused the removal of St. Germain, in 863. Other alarms came in 865 and 876, but the worst attack took place on 21 Nov., 885, when Paris was defended by its bishop, the celebrated Gozlin, a Benechedine and former Abbot of St-Germain-des-Prés, and by Count Eudes of Paris, later King of France, in whose siege he was killed. Another alarm, which an account in Latin verses, written by the monk Abbo Germainus. Gozlin died in the breach on 16 April, 886. His nephew Eudes, Abbot of St-Germain, was also among the valiant defenders of the city. The Parisians called upon Emperor Charles the Fat to assist them, and he paid the Normans a ransom, and even gave them permission to ascend the Seine through the city to set on Barbu's body. The Parisians refused to let them pass, however, and the Normans had to drag their boats around the walls. After the deposition of Charles the Fat, Eudes, who had defended Paris against the Normans, became king, and repelled another Norman attack, assisted by Gozlin's successor, Bishop Ancherie (886). The Abbot of Paris, Abbo Germainus, had recognized his brother Robert, Count of Paris and Duke of France, and then Hugh the Great. Hugh Capet, son of Hugh the Great, prevented Paris from falling into the hands of the troops of Emperor Otto II in 978; in 987 he founded the Capetian dynasty.

PARIS UNDER THE CAPETIANS.—"To form a conception of Paris in the tenth and eleventh centuries," writes M. Marcel Poite, "we must picture to ourselves a network of churches and monasteries surrounded by cultivated farm-lands on the present site of Paris." Take, for example, the monastery of St. Martin-des-Champs, which in 1079 was attached to the Order of Cluny, about this monastery and its hospital, a large feudal colony, while all trade was practised in the monastic school. The same was true of the monastery of Sts. Bartholomew and Magloire, which was celebrated at the beginning of the Capetian period, and was dependent on the Abbey of Marmoutiers (see Tours). But still more important establishment was the Abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés. Its estates of Issy and of Celle-St. Cloud were vast possessions, and the polypytch (record of the monastic possessions), drawn up at the beginning of the ninth century under the direction of Abbot Irminon, shows how these estates, which extended into Ile-de-France and Normandy, were administered and cultivated. The first Capetians generally resided at Paris. Louis the Fat quarreled with Bishop Etienne de Senlis (1124-42). The bishop placed the royal domain under interdict, whereupon the king consoled the temporalities of the diocese, but the intervention of the pope and of St. Bernard put an end to the difference, and to seal the reconciliation, the king invited the bishop to the coronation of his son, Louis VII. The episcopal court of Peter Lombard (1157 or 1159 to 1160 or 1161) contributed to the scholarly reputation of the Church of Paris. The University of Paris did not yet exist, but, from the beginning of the twelfth century, the monastic schools of Notre-Dame were already famous, and the teaching of Peter Lombard, the twelfth-century writer, has been much discussed. Pistoia, however, has put the nobilitas, and so has Pistoia, as has little authorities. Louis VI declared in a diploma that he had passed "his childhood in the schools of Notre-Dame as in the maternal bosom". At Notre-Dame William of Champeaux (q. v.) had taught dialectics, been a professor, and become an archdeacon, and had Abelard as a disciple before he founded the school of St-Victor in the Masonic diameter. Paris has always been the home of scholars. At Notre-Dame the monks were secured within the chapter enclosure. By a command of Alexander III the principle of gratuitous instruction was asserted. In a letter written between 1154 and 1152 Philippe de Harvengt says: "There is at Paris such an assemblage and abundance of clerics that they threatened to outnumber the laity. Happy city, which the Holy Inquisition has for its mysteries so well expanded, where such diligence reigns among the students, and where there is such a knowledge of Scripture that it may be called the city of letters!" At the same period Peter of Blois says that all who wish the settlement of any question should apply to Paris, where the most tangle are more than ever in the cathedral and in the monastic Church of St-Germain-des-Près was dependent only on the Roman pontiff, and subsequently conferred on the abbot a number of episcopal prerogatives. In time the Abbey of St-Germain became the centre of a borg, in the inhabitants of which were granted municipal freedom by Abbot Hughes de Monteaux about 1170. Eudes de Sully (1170-1208), the successor of Maurice, courageously opposed King Philip II, when he wished to repudiate Ingeburg and wed Agnes de Méran. Philip II was a benefactor of Paris, and the university was founded during his reign (1215). (See Paris, University of.) The thirteenth century, and especially the reign of St. Louis, was a period of great industrial and commercial prosperity. This is shown by the "Livre des Mestiers" of Etienne Boileau and the inventories of Petrach. Bishop Guillaume d'Auvergne (1227-49) received from St. Louis the Crown of Thorns, which was borne in procession to Paris on 14 August, 1239. Under St. Louis the Parliament was permanently established at Paris and the Bishop of Paris declared a conselleré, Under Philip the Fair occurred at Paris the trial of the Templars (q.v.) which ended (1314) with the execution of Jacques de Molhi (q.v.).

Paris Under the Valois.—The troubles of the Hundred Years' War caused the rise of a great romantic movement which sought to reflect the character of the troubadours and freemanns of the south of France. The result of the assassination of Etienne Marcel was the dauphin's victory. Having become king as Charles V, the latter made himself a magnificent residence at the Hôtel St-Paul, rebuilt the Louvre, and began the construction of the Bastille. During his reign the cardinal-purple was first given to the Bishops of Paris. Etienne de Paris (1363-8) and Aimé de Maignan (1368-84) received it in turn. The revolt of the Maillotins (1381) and the wars between the Burgundians and Armagnacs during the first twenty years of the fifteenth century filled Paris with blood. After the Treaty of Troyes (1420) Paris received an English garrison. Because of his sympathy with Charles VI, John Courtenesse, a theologian of Gallican tendencies who became bishop in 1429, was compelled to go into exile at Geneva, where he died. The attack of Joan of Arc on Paris in 1430 was unsuccessful. The Treaty of Arras between Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, and Charles VII, restored Paris under the domination of the kings of France. Louis XI (q.v.), successor of Charles VII, was much beloved by the citizens of Paris. The poet Jean du Bellay, friend of François 1 and several times ambassador, was Bishop of Paris from 1532 to 1551, and was made cardinal in 1555. With him the Renaissance was established in the diocese, and it was at his persuasion that Francis I founded the teaching of languages and philology at the Collège Royal, which later became the Collège de France. The 1533 du Bellay negotiated between Henry VIII and Clement VII in an attempt to prevent England's break with the Holy See, and, when in 1536 the troops of Charles V threatened Picardy and Champagne, he received from Francis I the title of Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom and placed Paris in a state of defence. Du Bellay was a typographer, a printer of the Renaissance, and was celebrated for his three books of Latin poetry and his magnificent Latin discourses. For a time he had for his secretary, Rabalais, whom he is said to have inspired to write "Pantagruel". He was disgraced under Henry II, resigned his bishopric in 1531, and went to Rome, where he died. The consequences of the rise of Protestantism and of the wars of religion in regard to Senism. He had been a tutor to and was the biographer of Henry IV. Harlay de Champvallon (1671-95) is the subject of a separate article. Louis Antoine de Nocilles (1695-1729), made cardinal in 1700, played an important part in the disputes concerning Quietism and Jansenism. After an attempt to reconcile Bossuet and Fénelon he took sides against the latter, successively approved and condemned Quempor's book, and did not subscribe to the Bull "Unigenitus" until 1728. In the eighteenth century the See of Paris was made illustrious by Christophe de Beaumont (1736-51), earlier Bishop of Bayonne and Archbishop of Vienne, who succeeded in putting an end to the Jansenist position lingering among some of the clergy to the Bull "Unigenitus". The parliamentarians protested against the denial of the sacraments to impenitent Jansenists, and Louis XV, after having at first forbidden the Parliament to concern itself with this question, turned against the archbishop, exiled him, and then endeavoured to secure his return by offering him temporal dignities. But it was especially against the philosophers that this prelate waged war; pamphlets were written against him, among them the "Lettre de Jean Jacques Rousseau à monseigneur l'archevêque de Paris". Antoine Le Clerc de Jugué (d. 1781), who succeeded Beaumont in 1784, was president of the clergy at the States General of 1789.
went into exile during the Revolution, and at the Concordat resigned his see at the pope's request.

Paris During the Revolution.—Within the present boundaries of the archiepiscopate the number of priests forming the active clergy at the time of the Revolution was about 1000, of whom 600 were in Parisian parishes, 300 were in outlying parishes. There were 921 religious, belonging to 21 religious families divided among 36 convents. Immediately after the adoption of the Civil Constitution of the clergy 8 new parishes were created in Paris and 27 were suppressed. Out of 50 Parisian pastors 26 refused to take the oath; out of 69 first or second curates 56 refused to take the oath. Priests were granted pensions of 250 francs per annum. On the other hand among the priests who, not exercising parochial duties, were not called upon to swear, 196 declared that they would take the oath and 11 refused. On 13 March, 1791, Gobel (b. 1727), Bishop of Lydda, Coadjutor Bishop of Basle, and a member of the Constitutional Assembly, was elected bishop by 500 votes. Loménie de Brienne, Archbishop of Sées, and Jarente, Bishop of Orleans, though both had accepted the civil constitution of the clergy, refused to give Gobel canonical institution, and he received it from the famous Tallieryand, Bishop of Autun. Gobel surrounded himself with married clerics, such as Louis de Saint Martin, Colombart, and the Bishop of Mâcon, M. de Sacy, Minister of Genoa, endeavored to obtain from the Holy See a sum of money in exchange for his submission. At the beginning of 1793 he was at the head of about 600 "sworn" priests, about 500 of whom were employed in parishes. On 7 November, 1793, he solemnly declared before the Convention his adhesion and pronounced the duties of ministers of Catholic worship, whereupon the Convention congratulated him on having "sacrificed the grotesque baubles of superstition". On the same day Notre-Dame was dedicated to the worship of Reason, Citizens Army, a camécélie, impersonating that godless and Gobel presided at the ceremony. Finally, the commune of Paris decided that all churches should be closed, and that whosoever requested that they be reopened should be regarded as a suspect. In March, 1794, Gobel was condemned to death as an atheist by the followers of Robespierre, and was executed after lengthy spiritual interviews with the Sulpician Emery and the Jesuit Jarente, and addressed a letter in which he declared his repentance. In the absence of Jarente, the legitimate bishop, the Catholic faithful continued to obey a council formed of the Abbé de Malaret, Emery, and Espinasse, under the leadership of the former vicar-general, Charles Henri du Valk de Dampierre, who was in hiding. Public worship was restored by the Law of Ventuno, Year III, and by the law of 2 Prairial, Year III (30 March, 1795), fifteen churches were reopened. As early as 1796 about fifty places of worship had been reopened in Paris; sixteen or seventeen, of which eleven were parochial churches, were administered by priests who had accepted the Constitution. More than thirty others, of which three were parochial churches, were administered by priests who were in secret obedience to the legitimate archbishop, and the number of Constitutional priests had fallen from 600 to 150.

Paris in the Nineteenth Century.—The Archiepiscopate of Paris became more and more important during the nineteenth century. Jean Baptiste de Latouche Bertrand, who was appointed archbishop in 1802, was then ninety-three years old. On 18 April, 1802, he presided at Notre-Dame over the ceremony at which the Concordat was solemnly published. Despite his great age he reorganized worship in Paris, and re-established religious life in its forty-two parishes. In a conciliatory spirit he appointed to about twelve of these parishes priests who had taken the oath during the Revolution. He became cardinal in 1803 and died in 1808. The conflict between Napoleon and Pius VII was then at its height. Napoleon attempted to make Fesch accept the See of Paris, while the latter wished to retain that of Lyons. Cardinal Maury (1767-1842), a member of the Constitutional Assembly, also ambassador to the Holy See from the Count of Provence, but who went over to the Empire in 1806 and in 1810 became chaplain to King Jerome, was named Archbishop of Paris by Napoleon on 14 Oct., 1810. The chapter at once conferred on him the powers of vicar-capitular, but he should be persuaded, but hepronounced that Pius VII, by a Brief of 5 November, 1810, refused to recognize the nomination. Maury was actively opposed by a section of the chapter and the clergy. The emperor took his revenge by striking at the vicar-capitular, Astros (q.v.). At the fall of Napoleon, despite his zeal in persuading it to adhere to the deposition of the emperor, Maury was deprived of his faculties by the chapter. In agreement with Rome, Louis XVIII named as Archbishop of Paris (1 Aug., 1817) Alexandre-Ancelique de Talleyrand-Périgord (1756-1824), who, despite the Concordat, chose to retain his title of Archbishop of Reims until 1816 and who was created cardinal on 28 July, 1817. Talleyrand-Périgord presided throughout the French Revolution, and was appointed 18 Oct., 1819. He divided the diocese into three archdeaneries, which division is still in force.

On the death of Talleyrand-Périgord in 1821, his coadjutor Hyacinthe Louis de Quélen (1778-1840), court chaplain, succeeded him. A member of the Chamber of Peers under the Restoration, Quélen, as president of the commission for the investigation of the school situation, vainly endeavored to prevent the promulgation of the Martignac ordinances against the Jesuits in June, 1828. His friendly relations with Louis XVIII and Charles X drew upon him in 1830 the hostility of the populace; his palace was twice sacked, and the Monarchy of July regarded him with suspicion, but the devotion he showed during a terrible cholera epidemic won many hearts to him. Assisted by Dupanloup he converted the famous Talleyrand, nephew of his predecessor, on his death-bed in 1838. Quélen died 8 Jan., 1840, and was succeeded by Denys-Auguste Affre, (q.v., 1753-1818), who was slain at the barricades in 1838. Marie-Dominique-Auguste Silvain (1775-1840) of Louviers, who succeeded Affre; among the prelates consulted by Pius IX with regard to the opportuneness of defining the Immaculate Conception, he was one of few who opposed it. He was killed in the church of St.-Etienne-du-Mont on 3 Jan., 1857, by a suspended priest. After the short episcopate of Cardinal Morlot (1857-62) the see was occupied from 1862 to 1872 by Georges Darboy (q.v.), who was slain during the Commune. Joseph-Hippolyte Guibert (1802-86), previously Bishop of Viviers and Archbishop of Tours, became Archbishop of Paris on 27 Oct., 1871. His episcopate was made notable by the erection of the basilica of Montmartre (see below), and the creation of the Catholic University of Paris, which he placed Mgr d'Hulst. His successor was Francois-Marie-Benjamin Richard (1819-1907), former Bishop of Belley, who had been coadjutor of Paris since July, 1875, became cardinal 21 May, 1889, and was active in the defense of the religious congregations. Mgr Léon Annette (b. at Douvillé, in the Diocese of Evreux, 15 July, 1825, ordained 14 Feb., 1846, succeeded him in the See of Paris, on 28 Jan., 1908.

Notre-Dame-de-Paris.—On the site now occupied by the courtyards of Notre-Dame de Paris there was as early as the sixth century a church of Notre-Dame, which had as patrons the Blessed Virgin, St. Stephen, and St. Germain. It was built by Childebert about 528, and on the site of the present sacristy there was also a church dedicated to St. Stephen. The Norman vaults it was destroyed by fire, and this remained standing, and for a time served as the cathedral. At the end of the ninth century Notre-Dame was rebuilt, and the two churches continued to exist side by side until the eleventh century when St.-Etienne fell to ruin. Maurice de Sully resolved to erect a magnificent cathedral on the ruins of St.-Etienne and the site of Notre-Dame, surrounded by twelve cardinals, Alexander III, who rejoined at Paris from 24 March to 25 April, 1163, laid the corner-stone. Henri de Château-Margay, papal legate, consecrated the high altar in 1182; Hierarchus, Patriarch of Jerusalem, officiated in 1185 in the completed choir; the façade was finished in 1218, the towers in 1235; Jean and Pierre de Chelles completed the work, and, at the beginning of the fourteenth century, the cathedral was as it is now. The following are among the noteworthy events which took place at Notre-Dame: the depositing by St. Louis (10 Aug., 1239) of the Crown of Thorns, a portion of the True Cross, and a nail of the Passion; the obsequies of St. Louis (21 May, 1271); the assent of the first States-General (10 April, 1302); the coronation of Henry VI of England as King of France (17 Nov., 1431); the coronation of Mary Stuart (l April, 1560); the funeral oration of the Duc de Mercœur by St. Francis de Sales (27 April, 1602); the vow of Louis XIII, making the Assumption a feast of the kingdom (10 Feb., 1638); the abjuration of the Maréchal de Turenne (23 Oct., 1648); the funeral oration of the Prince de Condé by Bossuet (10 March, 1657).

During the French Revolution, in the period following 1790, the treasury was despoiled of many of its precious objects, which were sent to the mint to be melted down. The Crown of Thorns was taken to the cabinet of antiquities of the Bibliothèque Nationale and thus escaped destruction. The statues of the kings, which adorned the porch, were destroyed in October, 1793, by order of the Paris Commune. The feast of Reason was celebrated in Notre-Dame in November, 1793; in December of the same year Saint-Simon, the future founder of the Saint-Simonian religion, was about to purchase the church and destroy it. From 1798 it contained the offices of the Constitutional clergy, and from 5 March to 28 May, 1798, it was also the meeting-place of the Theophilanthropists. Catholic worship was resumed on 18 April, 1802, and the coronation of Napoleon took place there on 2 December, 1804. By the preface of his novel "Notre-Dame de Paris" (1832) Victor Hugo aroused a strong public sentiment in favour of the cathedral. In April, 1841, the Government entrusted Lassus and Viollet-le-Duc with a complete restoration, which was completed in 1864. On 31 May, 1864, Archbishop Darboy dedicated the restored cathedral. The marriage of Napoleon III (30 January, 1853), the funeral services of President Carnot (l July, 1894), the obsequies of President Félix Faure (23 Feb., 1899), took place at Notre-Dame. Notre-Dame has been a minor basilica since 27 Feb., 1805. As early as the beginning of the thirteenth century at least two churches were copied entirely from the cathedral of Paris, viz., the collegiate church of Mantes (Seine-et-Oise) and the cathedral of Nicosia in the Island of Cyprus, the bishop of which was a brother of the canot of Notre-Dame. The Éle de la Cité, where Notre-Dame stands, also contains the Sainte-Chapelle, in the Palais de la Justice, one of the most beautiful religious buildings in Paris. It was built (1212-47) under St. Louis by Pierre de Maréfle with stained glass windows are admirable. In former times the king, from an ogival baldachin, displayed to the people the relics of the Passion.

Principal Churches on the Right Bank of the Seine.—The Church of St-Germain-l'Auxerrois was built between the thirteenth and the sixteenth century on the site of a baptistery built by St. Germain, where baptism was administered on fixed dates. At other times the piscina was dry, and the catechumens came and seated themselves on the steps while catechetical classes were held. Three tragic recollections are connected with this church. On 24 August, 1572, its bells gave the signal for the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; in 1617, the body of Concin, Marché d'Ancre, which had been buried there, was disinterred by the mob and mutilated; on 13 Feb., 1831, the people sacked the church under the pretext that an anniversary Mass was being celebrated for the soul of the Duc de Berry. The Church of St-Eustache, built between 1532 and 1637, was the scene of the First Communion of Louis XIV (1649), the funeral oration of Turenne preached by Fléchier (1676), and Massillon's sermon on the small number of the elect (1701). Massillon preached the Lenten sermons in the church of St-Leu (fourteenth century), and the conspirator Georges Cadoulas hid in its crypt from the police of Bonaparte. In the Church of St-Gervais (early sixteenth-century), where the League was established, Bossuet preached the funeral sermon of Chancellor Michel Le Teller. Its doorway, of which Louis XIII laid the first stone in 1616, is a very beautiful work of Salomon de Brosse. Blessed Marie de l'Incarnation was baptized at Saint-Merry (1520-1612). In Saint-Louis-en-l'Île (rebuilt 1664-1726) St. Vincent de Paul presided over the meetings at which the charity bureaux were organized. Charles VI, Charles VII, and Olier were baptized in the Church of St-Paul, destroyed during the Revolutions. The Church of St-Louis (seventeenth-century), former chapel of the Jesuit professed house, where Bourdaloue preached the funeral sermon of Condé and where he was buried, was chosen at the Concordat to replace the parish of St-Paul, and took the name of St-Paul-St-Louis. The Madeleine (begun 1864 and finished 1874), of which Napoleon I wished to make a Temple of Glory, had within less than a century two pastors, who were martyred, Le Ber, butchered in 1792, and Deguerry, shot in 1871. The Church of St-Lawrence (fifteenth-century) was often visited by St. Vincent de Paul, who lived in the convent of St-Lazare within the confines of the parish. Here was buried Venerable Madame Le Gras, foundress of the Sisters of Charity. During the Revolution it was given to the Theophilanthropists who made of it the “Temple of Hymen and Fidelity”. With regard to Notre-Dame-des-Victoires see below under Famous Pilgrimages. St-Denis-de-la-Chapelle (thirteenth-century) stands a little outside St. Genevieve and her companions rested, when they were making a pilgrimage from Paris to the tomb of St. Denis. Bl. Joan of Arc, who had come to besiege Paris, stopped here to pray.

Principal Churches on the Left Bank.—St-Nicholas-de-Chardonnet (1636-1758) is famous for the Chabot Psalter; it was in this church that the Forty Hours were first preached there by St. Francis de Sales, and for the funeral oration of Lamougnon, delivered there by Fléchier. St-Sulpice (1646-1715) is famous for its pastor Olier (q. v.). In 1795 it was a temple of Victory, under the Directory it was used by the Theophilanthropists, and there Pius VII consecrated the bishops of La Rochelle and Pottiers. To the architectural importance of St-Germain-des-Prés was added in the nineteenth century the attraction of Fladri's frescoes. St-Médard (fifteenth-sixteenth-century) became celebrated in the eighteenth century owing to the sensation caused by the Jansenists with regard to the word of Divine Worship. St-Séverin was founded by Lambert-de-Vaugirard in 1553, and the church was dedicated to St. Severus of Aquaine from the fifteenth to the eighteenth century, and since 1755 has had both these saints as patrons. Ste-Clothilde (1586-161) was a minor basihica on 19 April, 1867, at the time of the fourteenth centenary of Clotilde. St-Lambert-de-Vaugirard had as pastor Olier, who founded the Society of St-Sulpice, and St. John Baptist de La Salle opened his first school in this parish; its name of Vaugirard (Vallis Gerardi) recalls the charitable Abbot of St-Germain-des-Prés, Gerard de Moret, who built dwellings for sick religious in the locality. The church of the Sorbonne, where religious services are no longer held, was begun in 1635. Richelieu's tomb was there, it was consecrated in 1646. Richelieu's tomb in this church was violated during the Revolution; the cardinal's head, which was taken away on this occasion, was restored to the church in 1866. The chapel of Val-de-Grâce, a very beautiful specimen of the Jesuit style and famous for its cupola wherein Mignard has depicted the glory of the blessed, was built in fulfillment of an oath made by Anne of Austria. Mansart was its first architect, and the cornerstone was laid in 1645 by Louis XIV at the age of seven. Here was buried Henrietta of France, wife of Charles I of England, and here Bossuet preached the Lenten sermons of 1667. It is now the church of the Paris military hospital. The chapel of St-Louis-Invalides contains the tomb of Napoleon I. In the crypt of the Church of St-Joseph-de-Carmes, built by the Carmelites between 1643 and 1625 and now the church of the Institut Catholique, are the tomb of Ozanam and the remains of the 120 priests massacred in this church on 24 Feb., 1792, after fifteen days of captivity. In this crypt Laurain was attached to a cross for three hours.

Principal Abbays.—The Benedictine Abbey of St-Germain-des-Prés, the foundation and medieval splendour of which have been described above, was long famous for the fair which it held. During the seventeenth century its important library made it a centre of learning, and Luc d'Achery, Mabillon, and Montfaucon rendered it illustrious. Abbé Prevost, author of the famous romance “Maman Lesueur”, was for a time a Benedictine at St-Germain-des-Prés, where he worked on “Galila Christiana”. John Casimir, first a Jesuit and later King of Poland, died as Abbot of St-Germain-des-Prés in 1672. The abbey prison was the scene of the September massacres.

The origin of the Abbey of St-Victor was a hermitage, to which William of Champeaux (q. v.) retired in 1108. The abbey was founded by a royal charter in 1113, and had as first abbot Gilduin, confessor of Louis the Fat. The abbey governed the priories of Corbey, Château-Landon, Etampes, Mantes, Poissy, and Sens, and in the eighteenth and early nineteenth century it was yielded into riches by Richard of St-Victor, Hugh of St-Victor, and the liturgical poet, Adam of St-Victor. Grave abuses having crept into the Congregation of the Canons of St. Genevieve, Pope Innocent III and Suger in 1148 introduced the Canons Regular of St. Augustine from the Abbey of St-Victor. From the thirteenth to the fifteenth century the abbey passed through a period of decadence, and in 1498 two strange monks, John Standonce, rector of the College of Montaign, and John Mounbar of Winesheim near Zwolle, spent nine months at the abbey to effect its reform. With the sixteenth century began a series of commendatory abbots, one of whom, Simon of St-Jean de Luz, from 1594 to 1624. Seven years after the Council of Trent of St-Victor took a very important part in the League. The first half of the seventeenth century was characterized by a conflict between Jean de Toulouse, prior of St-Victor, and the Genoese, a decision of the official (28 June, 1615) declared St-Victor autonomous. Jansenism found its way into St-Victor, and was combated by a sermon preached by Mgr. J. Deschamps in 1747. The collection of the eighteenth century its library was celebrated, and was open to the public three times a week. The librarian Mulot, who was also grand prior, published a translation of “Daphnis and Chloe”. The abbey's end was sad. When the Revolutionary commissaries questioned the twenty-one religious present, only one, aged 81, affirmed his desire to remain; nine did not reply, eleven left the monastery, and the librarian Mulot became a deputy of the Legislative Assembly. The abbey was destroyed in November, 1708.

The early history of the Abbey of Saint-Denis, near Paris, is very obscure. In the second half of the fifth century the clergy of Paris erected at the instance of Clovis a new church on the site of the old St-Denis. The saint was buried, a basilica, administered by a community of monks. Pilgrims flocked thither, and, as early as 625, a charter of Clotaire II authorized the abbey to receive a legacy. Nevertheless, tradition regards Dagobert I (628-38) as the real founder. According to Mabillon, Fléchier, and M. Leon Levillain, it was merely decorated and embellished the already existing basilica; according to Julius Havel, this early basilica stood at the place called Saint-Denis-de-l'Entrée, west of the present church, and between 623 and 625 Dagobert founded the new abbey church, to which the relics were removed in 626. Whatever the solution of this problem, with which scholars have occupied themselves since the seventeenth century, Dagobert was the abbey's signal benefactor: the altar ornaments, the tomb containing the body of St. Denis, the golden cross set with precious stones which stood behind the high altar were the work of the goldsmith, St. Eligius (Elia), the king's friend. Dagobert himself decided to be buried at the instance of Abbot Fidul (678-81) Pepin the Short had the abbey rebuilt, and here on 28 July, 751, Pope Stephen II solemnly administered the royal anointing to Pepin, Queen Bertha, and their two sons, and consecrated an altar. The new edifice was dedicated on 24 Feb., 775, in the presence of Charlemagne. Hilduin, who became abbots in 811, wrote the life of St.
Denis, and identifies him with St. Denis the Areopagite. During the ninth century the Normans several times levied tribute on and pillaged the monastery. During the siege of Paris in 886, the monks sought refuge within the walls of the Abbey of Reims, and with them the body of St. Denis. After these disasters the abbey was restored and perhaps, as some scholars maintain, entirely rebuilt. St. Gerard, of a noble family of the Low Countries, was a monk at St.-Denis previously to founding the Abbey of Broglie in 1090. In 1106 Paschal II visited the abbey, and for a time Abelard was a monk there. Suger, minister of Louis VI and Louis VII, who became Abbot of St.-Denis in 1122, wished to erect a sumptuous new church; his architectural work is known to us through two of his writings, the "Book of his Administration" and the "Treatise on the Consecration of the Church of St. Denis".

St.-Denis then attracted numerous pilgrims, whom Suger describes as crowding to the doors, "squeezed as in a press". By a charter of 15 March, 1125, Suger released from mortmain the people of St.-Denis, who in gratitude gave him the money for the reconstruction of the church. The work began doubtless about 1132: the choir was consecrated on 11 June, 1140, in the presence of Louis VII, five archbishops, and fourteen bishops, and the translation of the relics took place the same day. The alliance of the Capetians with the monastery of St. Denis was thenceforth sealed. Odo of Deuil, Suger's successor as abbot, was chaplain to Louis VII during the second crusade, of which he wrote a chronicle. The Abbey of St.-Denis was the repository of the royal insignia—the crown, sceptre, main de justice, and the garments and ornaments used at the coronation of the kings. For each coronation the abbot brought them to Reims. The oriflamme (q. v.) was also kept there, and thither repaired Bl. Joan of Arc after the coronation of Charles VII at Reims.

The new Church of St.-Denis has an extreme importance for the history of medieval architecture. It was the earliest important building in which the pointed arch (croisée d'ogives) was used in the chapels of the deambulatory, thus inaugurating this wonderful invention of the Gothic style. The church exercised also a great influence on the development of the industrial arts: the products of the goldsmith's and enameler's art ordered by Suger formed one of the most beautiful treasures of Christianity, some remnants of which are still preserved in the Gallery of Apollo at the Louvre. As regards monumental sculpture M. André Michel, the art historian, writes that "the grand chantry of St.-Denis was the decisive studio in the elaboration and, if we may so speak, the proclamation of the new style." In 1231 the religious of St.-Denis resolved to reconsecrate the basilica, and the chronicler Guillaume de Nagis, a monk at the abbey, says that St. Louis, a friend of their abbot Mathieu de Venlome, advised them to do so. It may be that portions of the edifice built by Suger had fallen to ruin, or perhaps St. Louis's plan to erect tombs to his predecessors was the origin of the plan. Of Suger's building the western façade, the deambulatory, the chapels of theapse, and the crypt were retained, the remainder being rebuilt. The work was directed by the architect Pierre de Montreouen, thanks to whose genius the nave and transept form a glorious example of the splendid Gothic art of the thirteenth century. St.-Denis was the historical laboratory of the old French monarchy: the abbot selected a religious who followed the court as historiographer to the king, and, on the death of each, the history of his reign, after being submitted to the chapter, was incorporated in the "Grandes Chroniques". Especially important, as historical sources, are the works of the monk Rigord on Philip Augustus and that of Guillaume de Nagis on St. Louis. On the invention of printing the "Grandes Chroniques" were put in order by Jean Chartier, who completed them with the history of Charles VII and published them in 1176, this being the earliest book known to have been printed in Paris.

From 1529 St.-Denis had commendatory abbots, the first of whom was Louis Cardinal de Bourbon. The Religious Wars were a disastrous period for the abbey. In 1562 and 1567 tombs were destroyed, the archives ravaged, and the reliquaries of the saints stripped of their plates of gold and silver. Catherine de' Medici planned to erect beside the church a chapel for Henry II and herself: François Primatice, Jean Bullant, and Androuet de Cerceau in turn supervised the work on this great mausoleum, which, owing to the civil disturbances, was never finished and was demolished in 1719. The troubles of the League brought about fresh pillages. Here on 25 July, 1793, Renaud de Beaune, Archbishop of Bourges, received the abjuration of Henry IV. In 1633 the Benedictines of the Congregation of St. Maur reformed the abbey, and for a time the celebrated Mabillon (1632-1707) was guardian of the treasury. In 1686 Louis XIV transferred the abbatial revenues to the recently founded royal house of St.-Cyr. In 1691 the title and dignity of Abbot were suppressed, and thenceforth the abbey was directed by grand priors, dependent on the superior-general of the congregation who resided at the Abbey of St.-Germain-des-Prés. These grand priors were of right vicars-general of the archbishops of Paris. In 1766 the monk Felibien (1666-1719) published the history of the abbey. In the eighteenth century the abbey buildings were entirely rebuilt by the monks, and they were about to change completely the Gothic appearance of the church itself when the Revolution broke out. St.-Denis was then called Fraternité, the church became first a temple of Reason, and then a market-house. In August, 1793, the Convention, on the recommendation of Barère, ordered the destruction of the tombs of the kings. Immediately most of the Gothic tombs were destroyed, and between 14 and 25 Oct., 1793, the ashes of the Bourbons were scattered to the winds. In 1795 Alexander Lenoir had all the tombs that had been spared removed to the Museum of the Château-Neuf.
of French Monuments. Napoleon (20 Feb., 1803) decided that the church should be restored, re-established worship there, and decreed that thenceforth St.-Denis should be the burial-place of the emperors. At the Restoration the tombs which had been removed to the Museum of French Monuments were restored to St.-Denis, but in such a disarray fashion that in 1817, called the Church of St.-Denis "a museum of bric-a-brac." A truly artistic restoration was accomplished finally (1817-79) by Viollet-le-Duc.

Of the thirty-two Capetian kings from Hugh Capet to Louis XVI only three were buried elsewhere than in St.-Denis. The series of authentic portraits of kings of France from St.-Denis opens with the sepulchral statue of Philip III the Bold (d. 1285). Until the sixteenth century the royal tombs at St.-Denis maintained modest proportions, but in that century the church was filled with works of art. The monument of the Dukes of Orleans, erected by Louis XIV, was the work of four Genoese sculptors; that of Louis XIII (d. 1643) and Anne of Brittany (d. 1514) is the work of the Juste family. Italian sculptors residing at Tours; the magnificent monument of Francis I and Claude of France is the work of the great architect Philibert Delorme and of the sculptor Pierre Bontemps; that of Henry II and Catherine de' Medici, executed under the direction of Primaticcio, is admired for the sculpture. In 1570, Francis I, representing the art of the seventeenth century is that of Turenne. The episcopal chapter of St.-Denis, created by Napoleon I to care for the basilica, was composed of ten canons whose head was the grand almoner. The canons had to be former bishops more than fifty years of age. The Restoration created canons of a second order. It was then that a number of the houses of the canons, and the grand almoner received the title of primicerio (dean) of the chapter. The empire and the Restoration claimed that this chapter, which Napoleon had created without taking counsel with Rome, should not be subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary. This was the cause of conflict until 1846, when the pope issued a bull placing the chapter of St-Germain under the direct supervision of the Holy See; the primate retained episcopal authority over the church and the house of the Legion of Honour annexed to the church, and the Archbishop of Paris had no spiritual jurisdiction over either of these buildings. The budget for the chapter of St-Denis was suppressed by the State in 1834; during the pontificate of Pius IX, the grand almoner opposed the change, and the hundred against the opportuneness of the definition of infallibility, was the last primate.

FAMOUS PILGRIMAGES.—(1) Tomb of St. Genevieve.—St. Genevieve is the patroness of Paris, but after the conversion of the church into a Pantheon of France its great men the saint had no church in Paris. Since 1843 her tomb has been at St-Denis-du-Mont (tomb 1517-1620), the burial-place of Racine and Pascal. There Pius VII went to pray on 10 January, 1865, and it was the scene of the assassination of Archbishop Silsou on 3 January, 1857. The veneration of St. Genevieve is expressed in two feasts: (1) on her feast proper (3 January), and the following eight days, a solemn novena takes place at St-Denis-du-Mont, and at the church of Nanteuil, birthplace of St. Genevieve, whither Clotaire II, St. Louis, Blanche of Castile, Louis XIII, and Anne of Austria went to venerate her memory; (2) on 26 November, anniversary of the miracle whereby, in 1130, a procession of the relics of St. Genevieve cured many Parisians of the mad des arçons. Miracle de la Sainte-Vierge.

2. Notre-Dame-des-Victoires.—In consequence of the visions granted to Catherine Labouré (who six months previously had become a member of the Sisters of Charity), M. Ahaëd, assistant of the Lazarists, with the approval of Mgr. de Quelen, he struck the "miraculous medal" of Mary Conceived without Sin, more than 4,000,000 of which were distributed throughout the world within four years. In 1838 Desgenettes, pastor of Notre-Dame-des-Victoires, organized in that church the Association in honour of the Holy and Immaculate Heart of Mary, which Gregory XVI made a confraternity on 24 April, 1838, and the badge of the Association was a medal that bore another indulg of Gregory XVI (7 Dec., 1838) the Diocese of Paris received the right to transfer to the second Sunday of Advent the solemnity of the feast of the Immaculate Conception. On 10 July, 1891, Leo XIII granted to the Lazarists, and to the dioceses that should request it, the faculty of celebrating yearly on the first Sunday of November the manifestation of the Blessed Virgin through the means of the medal. The first day was first celebrated at Paris in the chapel of Rue du Bae on 25, 26, and 27 November, 1891. On 27 July, 1897, the statue of the Blessed Virgin in this chapel was solemnly crowned in virtue of a Brief of Leo XIII (2 March, 1897). In 1899 the number of Masses celebrated in foreign countries at Notre-Dame-des-Victoires was 3021; the number of communications, 110,000; intensions 1,305,980, or an average of 5578 per day.

(3) Montmartre.—Prior to the ninth century there were two churches on the hill of Montmartre—one, half way up, stood on the traditional site of the martyrdom of St. Denis, while the other, on the summit, was said to replace a temple dedicated to Mars. In 1095 the second church was burned. The first monastery occupied first (1095-1131) by the monks of St-Martin-des-Champs, and from 1031 to the Revolution by the Benedictines. The church on the summit was rebuilt in the twelfth century, and consecrated on 21 April, 1147, by Pope Eugenius III with St. Bernard of Clairvaux as deacon, and Peter the Venerable as subdeacon. Alexander III visited it in 1162; St. Thomas à Becket in 1170; St. Thomas Aquinas, Bl. Joan of Are, St. Ignatius, St. Francis Xavier, St. Vincent de Paul, Olier, and Blessed John Eudes prayed there. During the war of 1870-71 MM. Legentil and Rohault de Fleury issued from Piottes an appeal in behalf of the erection at Paris of a sanctuary to the Sacred Heart to obtain the release of the pope and the salvation of France. On 23 July, 1873, the National Assembly passed a law declaring the construction of this sanctuary a matter of public utility. After a meeting in which seventy archbishops took part Alphonse was charged with its construction, in Byzantine style. Cardinal the Guide, on 16 June, 1875, and said the first Mass in the crypt on 21 April, 1881. Cardinal Richelieu blessed the church on 5 June, 1891, and on 17 October 1899, blessed the cross surmounting the main dome.

(4) Pilgrimage to the Church of St. Francis in honour of the famous Miracle des Bottes in 1290, when blood flowed from a Host which had been profaned by a Jew and Christ appeared above the receptacle where the Jew had thrown the Host.

(5) Pilgrimage to the chapel of the Pecus in honour of the statue of Notre-Dame-des-Paix which the famous Capuchin Joyeuse, known as Père Ange, gave to his convent (sixteenth century).

(6) Pilgrimage of Notre-Dame-des-Victoires at the church of Amberville (dating from 1336), whither Louis XIII, St. Ignatius, Blessed John Eudes, St. Francis de Sales, St. Vincent de Paul, St. John Baptist de la Salle, and Bossuet went to pray.

(7) Pilgrimage of Notre-Dame-des-Miracles at Saint-Maur, dating from the erection of a chapel to the Blessed Virgin by the Church of St. Denis about 610. The future Pope Martin IV, Philip Augustus, St. Louis, Emperor Charles IV of Germany, and Olier prayed there.

(8) Pilgrimage in honour of St. Vincent de Paul to the parish church of Clichy, built by the saint.

SAINTS OF PARIS.—A number of saints are especially connected with the history of the Diocese of Paris. Sts.
Agoard and Agilbert, martyred at Cretil; St. Lucian, martyred at Paris; St. Eugene, who according to the legend was sent by Saint Denis to Spain, founded the Church of Toledo, and was martyred at Seville; St. Yon, a disciple of St. Denis; St. Lucian, companion of St. Denis, martyred at Beauvais (third century); St. Rioul, founder (c. 300) of the Church of Senlis, visited and encouraged the Christian community of Paris; St. Martial, Bishop of Tours, while at Paris, cured a leper by embracing him; Sts. Ada (Ample) and Céline, companions of St. Genevieve; the nun St. Aurea, disciple of St. Genevieve (fifth century); St. Germain (380–448), Bishop of Auxerre, whose name is linked with the history of St. Genevieve; St. Séverin, Abbot of Agnain (450–510), who was summoned to Paris to cure Clovis of a serious illness; Queen St. Clothilde (d. 545); St. Leonhard, a noble of Clovis’s court, who became a hermit in Limousin and died about 559; St. Columbanus (540–615), who performed a miracle during his stay in Paris; St. Cloud (d. 560), grandson of St. Clothilde, who was made a monk by St. Séverin; St. Radegund (519–87), wife of Clovis I; St. Eligius (588–669), founder of the convent of St. Martial, minister of Clovis II and of Dagobert; St. Robert, Queen of France (d. 680); St. Domnouls (sixth century), Abbot of St-Laurant, Paris, prior to becoming Bishop of Le Mans; St. Bertechrammus (Bertrand, 533–623), Archbishop of Paris, later Bishop of Le Mans; St. Aure, virgin (7th century), first Abbess of St. Martial; St. Merry, Benedictine Abbot (d. 700); St. Ouen (600–69), who was a friend of St. Eligius and died Archbishop of Rouen; St. Sulpice (seventh century), chaplain of Clovis II, died as Archbishop of Bourges; St. Doctrovée (seventh century), first Abbot of St. Vincent; St. Lué, Bishop of Sens (seventh century), who on his way through Paris released a number of prisoners; St. John of Matha (1160–1213), who was a student of the University of Paris, and, while saying his first Mass in the chapel of the Bishop of Paris, had the vision which induced him to found the Trinitarians; St. William, canon of Paris, who died in 1299 as Archbishop of Bourges; Bl. Reginald (1160–1930), professor of canon law at the University of Paris; St. Bonaventure (1221–74), student and afterwards professor at the University of Paris; St. Thomas Aquinas (1227–74), successively student, professor, and preacher at the University of Paris; Bl. Gregory X (pope 1271–6), doctor of the University of Paris; St. Yeve (1283–1363), who studied at the University of Paris; Bl. Innocent V (pope 1276), who succeeded St. Thomas Aquinas as professor of theology at the University of Paris; St. Louis (d. 1270), and his sister Bl. Isabelle (1224–70), foundress of the Abbey of Poor Clares of Longchamps, who later called themselves Urbanists because their rule was confirmed by Urban IV; Bishop of Clermont (1359–87), canon of Paris before becoming Bishop of Metz; Blessed Urban V (pope 1362–70), sometime professor of canon law at the University of Paris; Bl. Jeanne-Marie de Maille (1332–1414), who came to Paris to make known to the king her prophetic visions concerning France; Bl. Jeanne de Valois (1461–1506), daughter of Louis XI and wife of Louis XII, foundress of the Annun-cemetery of Piepus; (3) in memory of the Duc d'Orléans, who was killed in 1832 in a carriage accident; (4) in memory of the victims of the dreadful fire at the Charity Bazar (4 May, 1897).

Religious Congregations.—Prior to the application of the Law of Associations of 1801, there was a large number of religious congregations in Paris. Among those having their mother-house in the city were: the Assumptionists, who preserved in their chapel a statue of Notre-Dame-de-Saluat which, according to tradition, smiled on Duns Scotus in 1301 when he was about to preach on the Immaculate Conception; the Endouts (q.v.), the Missionary Priests of Mercy (founded in 1808 by Pere Raaau), who were the founders of the French parish in New York; the Oblates of Mary Immaculata (founded in 1816 by Eugène de Mazenod), the apostles of Upper and Lower Canada, New Britain, Oregon, British Columbia, Texas, and Mexico; the Oratorians, founded in 1611 by Pierre de Brûlœil (q.v.); the Priests of Piepus (founded in 1805 by Abbé Condrin), the founders of missions in Oceania; four of its members were martyred under the Commune (1871). Pères Radique, Tuffier, Rouhouze, and Tarneu; the Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament, founded by Pere Eyraud; the Charity of St. John Baptiste de la Salle; the Marist Brothers founded at Bordeaux in 1817 for the education of the young; the Nuns of the Assumption, founded in 1839 under the patronage of Archbishop Affre for the education of young girls; the Sisters of Charitable Instruction of the Child Jesus of St. Maury for nursing and teaching, which was founded in Bordeaux in 1776; O. Miniata; and has missions in Japan, Siam, and Malacca; the Sisters of Mary Help, founded in 1854 for the care of young working-women; the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge of St. Michael), founded in 1841 by Venerable Eudes to receive voluntary penitents; the Religious of the Mother of God, a teaching order founded by Olympe DeGouges in 1688; the Religious of the Cenacle founded at Paris in 1626; the Religious of the Sacred Heart, founded in the beginning of the nineteenth century by Madame Bard (q.v.); the Sisters of Piepus, a teaching and contemplative order founded at Poitiers and removed to Paris in 1804; the Sisters of Our Lady of Fatima, founded in 1917.

Prior to 1901 there were also at Paris: Carmelites, Dominicans, several of whom were martyred during the Commune (martyrs of Aurenche); Franciscans; Jesuits, five of whom were martyred during the Commune (viz. Pères Olivant, Clerc, de Beyne, Duconray, and Canbect); Marists; Priests of Mercy; Missionaries of the Sacred Heart; and Redemptorists. Important educational works brought to an end by the law of 1901 were the boarding-schools of the Abbaye aux Bois, Oiseaux, and Roche, conducted by the Canons Regular of St. Augustine, a congregation founded at the end of the sixteenth century by St. Peter Fourier. The same law also terminated the college at Carteilhes (opened in 1504), which was founded in 1601 in the Faubourg St-Jacques by Marie de Neuvion, had witnessed the Lenten preaching of Bossuet in 1661, the vows of Mine de la Vallière in 1675, and the funeral oration of the Princess Palatine in 1685; the other, founded in 1644 and established in the Avenue de Saxe in 1831, possessed a miraculous organ, Generalized from this there, at the capture of Bézoum by Louis XIV. Paris still possesses two Visitas minoritates, which date respectively from 1619 and 1825. They were founded by St. Francis de Sales and St. Jane Frances de Chantal, and in the middle of the nineteenth century one of them had as superior Madame de Chèvres; the other, the Sisters of Charity, instituted in 1629 by St. Vincent de Paul and Venerable Mme Le Gras (née Louise de Marillac) and having their mother-house at Paris, still have the right to exercise their nursing activity, but are legally bound to discontinue gradually their work as teachers. Among the still existing congregations of women are: the Congregation of Adoration of Reparation, founded in 1818 by Mother Marie-Thérèse de the Heart of Jesus, the Purgatory of the Souls in Purgatory, founded in 1856; the Helpers of the Immaculate Conception, founded in 1859 by the Abbé Largentier for the care of the sick in their homes; the Benedictine Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, founded in 1653 by Catherine de Bur—a second house was founded in 1816 by the Princess Louise de Bourbon-Condé (Mother Marie-Joseph de la Miséricorde).

Seminaries.—The Seminary of St-Sulpice, founded by Olier in 1612, had been supplemented since 1814 by the house at Issy, in the suburbs of Paris, reserved for the teaching of philosophy. The Paris seminary was seated by the State in virtue of the recent laws, and the present theological school of the Parisian clergy is located at Issy. The seminary of Foreign Missions was founded in 1663. Twenty-eight houses were confided to it by the Holy See. This seminary belongs to the Society of Foreign Missions and is still authorized by the State, as also is the Seminary of the Holy Ghost, located in the old congregations of the Holy Ghost and the Immaculate Heart of Mary—the former was founded in 1703 by Poulard Desplace, the latter in 1811 by Venerable Francis-Mary-Paul Liebertman, and the two were merged in 1818. This seminary provides priests for the evangelization of the negroes in Africa and the colonies. Neither has the State disturbed the congregations of the Mission of St-Lazare (Lazarists), founded by St. Vincent de Paul, with its mother-house at Paris. They devote themselves to the evangelization of the poor by means of missions and to the foreign missions. For a long time their chapel held the body of St. Vincent de Paul, now removed to Belgium. The Lazarist College founded by St. Peter Drouet, martyred in China, is venerated here. With regard to the Irish College in Paris see Irish Colleges.

Other Religions.—As early as 1512 Lefèvre d'Etaples, at the Collège du Cardinal Lemoine, and Brugnon, Abbot of St-Germain-des-Prés and shortly afterwards Bishop of Mena, spread at Paris certain theological ideas concerning the monasticism. In 1521 Luther's book, "The Babylonian Captivity", was condemned by the Sorbonne. In 1521 Jacques Pauvres (or Pauvert), a disciple of Lefèvre, underwent capital punishment for having attacked the veneration of the Blessed Virgin, purgatory, and holy water; the same penalty was inflicted on Louis de Berquin in 1529. Until 1535 the Protestants of Paris had no pastor, but in that year they assembled at the house of one of their number, named La Ferrière. As he had a child to baptize, the gathering elected as pastor Jean le Maçon, a young man of twenty-two years, who had studied law. He exercised his ministry at Paris until 1562, when he took upon himself the pastoral office of the church of St. Etienne-du-Mont. The first general synod of the Reformed Church of France was held at Paris from 26 to 28 May, 1555., and drew up a confession of faith—later called the Confession of La Rochelle, because it only received its final form at the eighteenth national synod convened at La Rochelle in 1607. In 1560 a number of Protestants perished at Paris, among them the magistrate Anne du Bourg. It is estimated that the Reformed Church of Paris had 40,000 members in 1561. In 1572 took place the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The Edict of July, 1573, having authorized the Protestants of Paris to assemble at a distance of two leagues from the city, they held their services in the church of St. Peter, and Henry IV permitted them to build a church at Charenton. During the seventeenth century the Reformed Church of Paris was administered by the pastors Dumolin, Mestrezat, Durand, and Montigny. At the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) Pastor Claude was compelled to leave Paris; Pastors Malza, Girand, and Givry, who endeavored despite the revocation to maintain a Protestant church at Paris, were imprisoned in 1692. During the eighteenth century the chaplains attached to the embassies of Protestant princes gave spiritual assistance to the Protestants of the city. Mattre, chaplain at the Dutch embassy, became pastor in Paris when Louis XVI promulgated the edict of toleration (1787). A decree of 1802 gave over to the Protestant sect the old church of the Visitandines in the Rue St-Antoine (built by Mansart); once it had given them the church of the Protestant Rue St-Antoine, the Monarchy Monarchie gave them the old Church of Notre-Dame de-Pentemont, which under the old régime had belonged to the Augustinian Sisters of the Incarnate Word of the Blessed Sacrament. At present the Reformed Church possesses nineteen places of worship in Paris and seventeen in the suburbs; the Lutherans, eleven places of worship in Paris and eight in the suburbs; the Protestant Free Churches, four places of worship; the Baptists, four churches in Paris and one in the suburbs. The American Episcopal, Anglican, Scotch, Congregationalist, and Wesleyan Churches conduct services in English. There are in Paris about 50,000 Jews.

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE AND PUBLIC CHARITY.—Under the old régime, what is now called "Public Assistance" included several distinct departments: (1) that of the Hôpital-Dieu, one of the oldest hospitals in Europe, doubtless founded by the Bishop St. Landry after the epidemic of 651. It was at first directed by the can-onal of Notre-Dame, and after 1385 by a commission of citizens with whom Louis XIV associated, together with the Archbishop of Paris, several representatives of the Government and of the chief judiciary bodies.
This department undertook the administration of the Hospital for Incurables, the Hospital of St. Louis, and that of St. Anne; (2) department of the General Hospital, created by Louis XIV in 1660 for the sick, the aged, children, and beggars, and with which were conlected the infirmaries of Pitié, Bicêtre, the Salpêtrière, Vaugirard, the foundling hospital, and that of the Holy Ghost; (3) several independent hospitals, e. g.
Cochin Hospital, founded in 1690 by the Abbe Cochon, pair of St. Germain, and the Necker Hospital, established in 1779 at the initiative of Mme Necker; (4)
the Bureau of Charity, dependent on the parishes; (5) the central Bureau of the Poor (grand bureau des deuers), established under Francis I for the relief of the indigent. It was presided over and directed by the procureur général of the Parliament and levied a yearly "almun tax" on all the inhabitants of Paris. It administered the infirmary of Petites Maisons.

The Revolution effected a radical change in this system. The central Bureau des pauvres was at first replaced by forty-eight benemict committees (comités de bienfaisance); these were replaced in 1816 by twelve bureaux of charity, which instead of bureau de bienfaisance and number twenty since 1800.
While in the communes of France all the hospital departments are under an administration distinct from that of the bureau of beneficence, at Paris, in virtue of the law of 10 Jan., 1849, the General Administration of Public Assistance directs both the hospitals and the departments for relief at home. At present the Department of Public Assistance directs 31 hospitals, 14 being general hospitals, 7 special, 9 children's hospitals, and 1 insane asylum. At the laicization of the hospitals, the hospital of St. Joseph, conducted by the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, was opened in 1884 under the patronage of the Archbishop of Paris; that of St. Augustine, founded by Abbé Carton, pastor of St-Pierre-de-Montrouge and bequeathed by him in 1887 to the Archbishop of Paris. The hospital of Notre-Dame-de-Pépinières-Sceaux at Lavallois is conducted by the Dominican Sisters. The St-Jacques, Haümeau, St.-François, and St-Michel hospitals are also in the hands of congregations. The Villepinte Institution, in charge of the Sisters of Marie Auxil-trices, cares for children and young women suffering from tuberculosis. The Marie-Thérèse infirmary was founded for aged or infirm priests by the wife of Châteaubriand. The Little Sisters of the Poor have nine houses in the diocese. The Brothers of St.
John of God maintain a private hospital and an asylam for incurable young men. The Institution of the Ladies of Calvary, founded at Lyons in 1872 by Mme Garnier and established at Paris in 1874, is conducted by widows for the care of the cancerous, and receives into its infirmary patients whom no other hospital will admit; it also has houses at Lyons, Marseilles, St.
Etienne, and Rouen. The Little Sisters of the Assumption, nurses of the poor, who have nine houses in the diocese, stay night and day without pay in the houses of the sick poor. The same is done by the Sisters of Notre-Dame of the Rue Cassini in the houses of poor women in their confinement. Other orders for the care of the sick in their homes are the Franciscan nursing sisters (7 houses) and the Sisters Servants of the Poor (4 houses).

Among the institutions now dependent on the State, the foundation of which was formerly the glory of the Church, must be mentioned that of Quinze Vingts for the blind. As early as the eleventh century there was a confraternity for the blind; St. Louis built for it a house and a church, gave it a perpetual revenue, and decreed that the number of the Quinze Vingts (300 blind) should be maintained complete. When the king was canonized in 1267 the blind took him as their patron (see EDUCATION OF THE BLIND). The Catholic institutions of Paris for the relief of the poor and the uplifting of the labouring classes are very numerous.
For the Society of St. Vincent de Paul see Mussoro, Confréries des Pauvres et de tine. The Phila-thropie Society, founded in 1780 under the protection of Louis XVI, established dispensaries, economical kitchens, night shelters, and settlement houses. The Central Office of Charitable Institutions investigates the conditions of workmen and the poor, and conducts employment bureaus with the help of the Association of Ladies of Charity, established in 1829 in the parish of St.-Sauveur by St. Vincent de Paul for the visitation of the sick poor and reconstituted in 1810, has given rise to the Society for the Sick Poor, the Society for the Sick Poor in the Suburbs, and the Society for the Visitation of the Poor in the Hospitals. Most parishes have their organizations of charitable women who, under the pastor's supervision, distribute clothing and visit the poor. The Société de Charité Maternelle, which dates from 1874, when it was patronized by Marie Antoinette, assists married women in their confinement without regard to creed. In each quarter of Paris women visit the homes of families deserving assistance. In 1898 the society assisted 2797 women and 2853 children. The Association des Mères de Famille, founded in 1836 by Mme Badenier, assists at childbirth women who do not meet the conditions required by the Société de Charité Maternelle or who are numbered among the destitute poor. The Œuvre des Fiancées, a non-parochial number of workers of 10,000 families and 8000 children in the Paris suburbs. The Œuvre de la Miséricorde (Work of Mercy), founded in 1822, assists the destitute poor. An organization founded in 1841 by Mgr. Christophe, later Bishop of Soissons, helps convalescent infants. The objects of the Œuvre de l'Hospitalité du Travail are to offer a friendly home for women, and the creation of creches to nationalize to every homeless woman or girl who has determined to work for an honourable livelihood, to employ its clients at useful tasks, to endeavour to revive the habit of working in those who have lost it, and assist them in securing honourable employment which will also enable them to provide for the future. This organization, founded by the Sisters of St. Antony, as a member of the Order of Calvary, between 1881 and 1903 gave shelter to 70,210 women. In 1894 Sister St. Antony annexed to it the Œuvre du Travail à Domicile pour les Mères de Famille (Association for procuring home-work for mothers of families) which between 1892 and 1902 assisted 7749 mothers and worked with a number of 2951. In 1902 by M. de Lanteigne, performs the same service for unemployed and homeless men, and is also in charge of the Sisters of Calvary.

The Catholics of Paris have taken part in the syndicate movement by the creation in 1887 of the syndicate of commercial and industrial employees, by the organization of the Aiguille (a professional association of women) which works on clothing; and by the Union Centrale, made up of five professional syndicates of working-girls, business employees, seamstresses, servant girls and nurses, with "La Ruche syndicale" as their organ. The great Society of St. Nicholas, founded in 1827 by Mgr. de Brosses and directed by Victor de Nosailles and erected in 1867 by State of Catholic education, the four parishes (Paris, Issy, Igny, and Bugival), where it gives a professional education to boys when it adopts them at an early age, is well known. The Society of the Friends of Childhood, founded in 1828, is concerned with the education and apprenticeship of poor boys. The École commerciale de France Bourgeois, created in 1832 by the Brothers of the Christian Schools, prepares pupils for commercial, industrial, and administrative professions. Numerous homes and restaurants for young working-girls have been founded by Catholics. The Charitable Society of St. Francis Regis was founded in 1826 by M. Cassin to facilitate the religious education of young girls, which led to the legitimation of their natural children. The day-nurseries, which care for children from 15 days to 3 years of age while their mothers are employed, date from M. Marbeuf's foundation in 1841. The Sisters of St. Paul have founded in the parishes of St.-Vincent-de-Paul and St.-Séverin a society for the relief of mothers with workless children to remain at home. The Œuvre de l'Adoption was founded in 1850 by Abbé Maubrè to gather as many orphans as possible. Out of so many other associations, the following must be mentioned: the Association des Jeunes Économistes which, under the direction of the Sœurs of St. Vincent de Paul, uses the generous donations of a large number of young women for the apprenticing and employment of poor girls; the Society of St. Anne, founded in 1821; the Society for Abandoned Children, founded in 1803; the Society for the Adoption of Abandoned Little Girls, founded in 1879 (all concerned with finding homes for orphans); the Society of the Child Jesus, which shelters during their convalescence poor girls who have been discharged from hospitals.

There is a recent tendency towards the complete reorganization of Catholic charity in a single quarter by the centralization of all charitable departments for the development and protection of family life. For example the Fresh Air Society for Mothers and Children, founded in 1893, offers to the parishes of the district a department for the investigation of home conditions; (2) one for free consultations for poor mothers and their nursing children; (3) one for assisting mothers whose confinement takes place at home; (4) one for the distribution of tickets for meat, cereal, or farm produce for the poor who have been confined; (6) the fresh air department, which sends a number of the women's workers to the parishes, the country districts, to the district into the country. The Society of Ste-Rosalie also combines a number of admirable works which perpetuate the memory of the good done in the Faubourg St.-Marcel during the July Monarchy by Sister Rosalie Redi, who worked in collaboration with Vicomte Armand de Mélun. The Working Women's Societies of the Diocese and the Lay Mission have the nucleus of a flourishing parish in a district previously deprived of all religious help. The Union Familiale, founded at Charonne by Mlle Galbré in 1899, has completely transformed the district; it has established a Frobelian nursery for the small children, and receives children after school hours; since 1901 it assembles families, which send a number of "little mothers," little girls of ten, who every Thursday take care of 3 or 4 children; it has gardening classes and a department for trousseaux, and since 1900 it has had vacation colonies, known as fresh air societies. The original congregation of the Blind Sisters of St. Paul, founded in 1851 by Abbé Juge and Anne Bergonia, looks after blind young women.

According to the report of the Abbé Fonsagrives to the Diocesan Congress of 1908, the Archdiocese of Paris has 356 Catholic patronages, of which 63 are for male pupils of the free schools, 79 for male pupils of the lay schools, 101 for female pupils of the free schools, 113 for the"Sisters of the Cross" and 7 to 200 for boarding schools. The number of "patronages internes," which shelter working-girls who are orphans or who live at a distance from their families, The Œuvre des Petits Préservés et le Vitrail des Petits Prisonniers, founded in 1892 by the Comtesse de Biron, looks after the preservation of the "little girls" of the prisons, and the Catholic International Society for the Protection of Young Women, organized at Freiburg in 1897 after the Organization of the Protestant International Union the Friends of Young Women, in 1905 alone gave shelter to 11,919 young girls in Paris. There is at present a great renewal in Catholic charity, and a spirit of relief at Paris which is shown in the report concerning Catholic relief societies read (Aug., 1910) at the International Congress of Public and Private Relief held at Copenhagen under the presidency of President Louhet: "The great originality of Catholic relief work in recent years consists in the multiplication of works for social instruction. This arises more and more from the 'patrimonial' conception of these undertakings. The modern wish and tendency is to give him who suffers a share in his own relief, to give him a collaborative or directing part in the effort which is being made to assist and uplift him. Henceforth the favourite works of charity among Catholics will be those known as preventive. To prevent misery by an hygienic, domestic, professional education is the object of the founders of modern works of relief. They are concerned not only with the strife against the consequences of misery but with that against its production. Without neglecting individual alms, Catholic charity aims especially at social relief; it prefers to prevent misery to prevent it; rather than to follow it to relieve it; it prefers to uplift families rather than assist them, to help them when they are stumbling rather than to raise them up when they have fallen; it prefers to help them actively to better working conditions, than to relieve passively the results of these evil conditions. All instruction imparted in organizations for Catholic youth and in the Catholic paroisses of Paris is impregnated with this apparently new spirit which on closer view is seen to be merely a return to the Christian solidarity of the Middle Ages."

Religious Renewal of the Twentieth Century.

In 1905 at the end of the concordatory period the Diocese of Paris had 3,500,870 inhabitants, 38 parishes, 104 succursales, 7 vicariates, formerly remunerated by the State. Since the separation of Church and State, the religious character of Paris shows signs of renewal. Statistics of the religious and civil burials from 1883 to 1903, drawn up by the Abbé Raffin, afford a very exact idea of the religious condition of Paris at the end of the nineteenth century. The largest proportion of civil burials, 23 per cent, was reached in 1881. At the end of the nineteenth century the proportion of civil burials had fallen to 18 per cent; from 1901 to 1905, they showed a tendency to rise to 20 per cent. Civil funerals take place chiefly among the poor. For example in 1888 in the five parishes of the Département of Paris, the number of civil burials did not exceed 4-5 per cent; on the other hand, the ninth class, which is the cheapest, and the free class show 25 to 30 per cent. At present among the wealthy classes there is a slight increase in the number of civil funerals, and a slight decrease among the working classes, but the fact remains that, despite the gratuitousness of religious assistance in the case of the poor, the average number of 10,000 civil funerals which take place yearly at Paris consists chiefly of funerals of the poor. One reason for this is the insufficiency of religious assistance in the hospitals. Although more than a third of the Parisians die in hospitals, Sevres are only about thirty hospital chaplains, and these the management does not permit to approach the sick unless they are summoned. Another reason lies in the excessive size of suburban parishes and in the difficulty of reaching an immense fluctuating population. At the beginning of the twentieth century Notre-Dame-de-Monlucmontant had 70,000, St-Pierre-de-Clichy 80,000, Notre-Dame-de-Clichy 92,000 inhabitants. For a long time these enormous parishes had no more priest than the smaller ones in the centre of Paris. At St-Amboise there were 8 to 10 priests for 50,000 souls, while St-Thomas-d'Aquin had 8 priests for 14,000, and St-Sulpice 17 for 35,000 (see the report of M. Thureau Dangin, permanent secretary of the French Academy, concerning the Œuvre des chapelles de secours). M. Thureau Dangin calculated in 1905 that Paris, with its 522 pastors or curates, had an average of 37,000 or 38,000 souls to a parish, while at Lyons there was 1 priest for every 3000 souls, at Antwerp 1 for every 500, at New York 1 for every 1500.

The realization of this dearth and its dangers caused the organization of the Œuvre des Sœurs-du-Christ as early as 1882 to increase and facilitate vocations, and in 1905 Cardinal Richard pointed out the urgent necessity of the creation of about thirty new parishes or of chapelles de secours. At present the diocesan administration is most actively engaged in the organization of these chapelles de secours. Every year a dignitary of the French Academy or of the Institute presents a report of the progress made, MM. François Coppée, Thureau Dangin, de Mun, d'Haussonville, Georges Picot, and Etienne Lamy having been heard in turn. The Christian Doctrine Society (Œuvre des Catéchismes) founded in 1885 by Cardinal Richard was erected into a confraternity by Leo XIII on 30 May, 1893, with which all the catechetical societies of France may be affiliated. This society is formed of voluntary catechists and promises paying dues. In addition to the multiplication of places of worship, special religious services have been organized for certain classes of persons. For example, the missionary work among young seamstresses (Moulinettes) has developed greatly between 1908 and 1910; it consists of short instructions between 12.35 and 12.50 p.m., so that the young women may return punctually to work. More than 5000 working girls have profited by these missions. The Society of Diocesan Missions, founded in 1886 by Cardinal Richard, supports from 18 to 20 missionaries, who according to the report of their superior, the Abbé Gibergues, made to the Diocesan Congress of 1908, have brought back to the Church more than 40,000 persons in less than a quarter of a century. Lastly, the Archdiocese of Paris has assumed the direction of the Catholic social movement. In 1910 a social secretariat was organized, as a bureau of information and headquarters for social undertakings, and... the archbishop has interested himself actively in the abolition of the night-work of bakers, addressing a letter to the parochial committees urging together the claims of these workmen, and on 21 December, 1908, presiding at the meeting organized by the Jeunesse catholique française for the suppression of this work.

An interesting organization from the social point of view is that of the provincial associations, formed at Paris under Catholic auspices, to meet the inmigrants from each province, to assist them to maintain close ties among themselves, and to procure spiritual help in the loneliness of the great city. In 1892 was founded the society La Bretagne, and in 1895 the Union bretonne. The latter, which had 1,600 members in 1908, supports eight sisters who, in 1908 alone, spent 5,411 days or nights with sick bretons.

In imitation of this association were founded successively the Union savoyenne, the Association des Dames limousines et croisaises, the Union limousine et foiracienne, the Union pyrénéenne, the Alliance catholique sarthoise, and many others. There is a special society for the Bretons residing at Paris, which provides them with a home and the means of living. All the provincial unions are federated under the presidency of the Catholic economist, M. Henri Joly, a member of the Institut. A list of these associations has been affixed in recent times to the doors of all the churches in Paris. All these undertakings for the development of Christian life in Paris and the provinces have been opposed by some prominent Frenchmen. A comic organ, Divers, organized on 1 March, 1905, with a double aim: (1) "to sustain, promote, and unite under the archbishop's authority all movements concerning the religious, moral, social, and even material welfare of the diocese," (2) "to promote the formation of parochial committees modelled on and connected with the parochial diocesan committee, dealing respectively with works of religion and piety, instruction and education, perseverance and patronage, charitable and social works, and with the press and propaganda. At the beginning of 1910 there were 67 parochial committees, nearly half the parishes being already provided with them. Since 1905 diocesan congresses have taken place yearly. That of 1909 was especially concerned with the labour of women, with organizations for instruction of youth, provincial and journalistic organizations. That of 1910 dealt exclusively with liberty of teaching, the formation and recruiting of teachers, and with school books.

CATHOLIC INSTRUCTION IN PARIS IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.—The suppression of the teaching congregations and the gradual but rapid closing of the establishments directed by them was a serious blow to the prosperity of the independent schools in the Archdiocese of Paris. In October, 1904, Cardinal Richard instituted a diocesan committee of free instruction, which excluded all the monks and female teachers in private institutions to form separate diocesan associations. Mutual-aid societies were established in 1900 to provide for the future of these teachers, male and female, and in 1910 the diocesan promulgated a regulation fixing the conditions of their formation and granting certain guarantees for their professional future. On 8 December, 1906, arrangements were made for the supervision of religious instruction in the schools not under the public authorities, and in June, 1908, a board for the direction of secondary and primary diocesan instruction was created. From 1879 to 1910 the expenditure for the education of the pupils of the independent schools was $8,900,000, for which appeal was made to the charity of individuals. Their annual support costs about $900,000. Most of the schools are supported by a special committee by means of collections, subscriptions, etc.; some belong to civil societies which rent them to the committees, while others are wholly at the expense of the pastor. At the beginning of the last century the number of lay Catholic schools in Paris and its suburbs 217 independent schools, of which only 30 are still in the hands of congregations, and these also in virtue of the Associations Law are destined after a short time to be under the supervision of lay Catholics. The number of pupils frequenting these schools is estimated to be about 12,000. The Catholic diocese of Paris is, together with the Comtesse de Diesbach, which was established in 1902, a flourishing school mutual-aid society. A district union groups together thirty-five associations of former pupils of the independent members of the Clergy and is a bond among 1,500 members. The initiative in domestic economy in Paris was taken by Catholics. Even before the last strike the diocesan committee, which was organized by the Comtesse de Diesbach had established (15 June, 1902) a first course in domestic economy, lasting a month. This was succeeded by nine other courses in 1903-05, attended by 110 pupils, 60 of them religious from 11 orders. In 1905 was opened the Normal Institute of Domestic Economy which in its three first years gave 420 pupils a general training in the different branches of domestic economy. Higher Catholic education at Paris is assured by a number of institutions conducted by ecclesiastics, and by the Bossuet, Feuclon, Gerson, and Massillon schools, which send their pupils to the state lycees.

For the Institut Catholique, see Paris, Universities of.
Paris. University of.—Origin and Early Organization.—Three schools were especially famous in Paris, the palatine or palace school, the school of Notre-Dame, and that of Sainte-Geneviève. The decline of royalty inevitably brought about the decline of the first. The other two, which were very old, like those of the cathedrals and the abbey, are only faintly noticed during the early centuries of their existence. The two schools doubled for each other, until in the course of time it completely gave way to them. These two centres were much frequented and many of their masters were esteemed for their learning. It is not until the tenth century, however, that we meet with a professor of renown in the school of Ste-Geneviève. This was Hubold, who, not content with the courses at Liège, came to continue his studies at Paris, entered or allied himself with the chapter of Ste-Geneviève, and by his teaching attracted many pupils. Recalled by his bishop to Belgium, he soon profited by a second journey to Paris to give lessons with no less success. As to the school of Notre-Dame, while many of its masters are mentioned simply as masters at Paris, among whom, however, we must notice St. Stanislas, Bishop of Crewe; Gebhard, Archbishop of Salzburg; St. Stephen, third Abbot of Citeaux; Robert d'Arbrissel, founder of the Abbey of Fontevrault etc. The honour of having formed similar schools is indiscriminately ascribed to Notre-Dame and to Ste-Geneviève, as du Molinet has justly remarked (Bibl. Sainte-Geneviève, M.S.H. fr. 21, in fol., p. 576). Humanistic instruction comprised grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy (trivium and quadrivium). To the higher instruction belonged dogmatics and moral theology, whose source was the Scriptures and the Fathers, and which was completed by the study of canon law. Three men were to add a new splendour to the schools of Notre-Dame and Ste-Geneviève, namely William of Champeaux, Abelard, and Peter Lombard. A new school arose which rivalled those of Notre-Dame and Ste-Geneviève. It owed its foundation to the same William of Champeaux when he withdrew from the Abbey of St-Victor and it took the name of that abbey. Two men shed special light on this school, Hugh and Richard, who added to their own names that of the abbey at which they were religious and professors.

The plan of studies expanded in the schools of Paris as it did elsewhere. The great work of a monk of Bologna, known as the "Decretum Gratianum," brought about a division of the studies. Before the time of Gratian, the discipline of the Church had not been separate from theology properly so-called; they were studied together under the same professor. But this vast collection necessitated a special course, which was naturally undertaken first at Bologna, where Roman law was taught. In France, first Orleans and then Paris by the General Council of 1179 (Canons 272). The decrees of the Council of Louvain, which decreed that civil law was usually also chairs of civil law. The capital of the kingdom might thus boast of this new professorate, that of the "Decretum Gratianum," to which before the end of the twelfth century were added the Decretals of Gerard (or Girard) La Pucelle, Mathieu d'Angers, and Anselm (of Becqueville) of Paris but not that of the bulls. In the course of the twelfth century also medicine began to be publicly taught at Paris. A professor of medicine is mentioned in this city at this time, namely Hugo, "physicus excellens qui quadrivium docuit," and it is to be assumed that this science was included in his teaching.

For the right to teach, two things were necessary, knowledge and appointment. Knowledge was proved by examination, the appointment came from the examinee himself, who was admitted, and was known as scholasticus, capiseld, and eventually as "chancellor." This was called the licence or faculty to teach. Without this authorization there was danger of the chairs being occupied by ignorant persons, whom John of Salisbury depicts as "children yesterday, experienced yesterday, teachers of the erudite, to-day teaching in a long gown" (Metalogicus, I. xiv in init.). The licence had to be granted gratuitously. Without it no one could teach; on the other hand, it could not be refused when the applicant deserved it.

The school of St-Victor, which shared the obligations as well as the immunities of the abbey, conferred the licence in its own right; the school of Notre-Dame depended on the diocesey of the abbey of Ste-Geneviève on the abbey or chapter. It was the diocese or chapter which through their chancellor gave professorial investiture in their respective territories, i.e., the diocese in the city intra ponctas and other places subject to the ordinary of the abbey or chapter. They lent the left bank of the river as far as its jurisdiction reached. Consequently, as du Molinet explains, it was incumbent on the chancellor of Notre-Dame and Ste-Geneviève to examine "those who applied to teach in the schools," to "license after study those who sought to be masters and regents" (op. cit., 385). Besides these three centres of learning there were several schools on the "island" and on the "Mount." "Whoever," says Crevier "had the right to teach might open a school where he pleased, provided it was not in the vicinity of a principal school." Thus a certain Adam, who was of English origin, kept his house "near the Petit Pont"; another, Parisian by birth, "taught at the Grand Pont which is called the Pont-au-Change" (Hist. de l’Univers. de Paris, I, 272).

The number of students in the schools of the capital grew constantly, so that eventually the lodgings were insufficient. Among the French students there were princes of the blood, sons of the nobles, and distinguished young men of the kingdom. The courses at Paris were considered so necessary as a completion of studies that many foreigners flocked to them. Popes Celestine II and Adrian IV had studied at Paris. Alexander III sent his nephews there, and, under the name of Lothaire, a son of the noble family of Senegy, who was later to become the Archbishop of Cambrai, was sent to the student body. Otto of Freisingen, Cardinal Conrad, Archbishop of Mainz, St. Thomas of Canterbury, and John of Salisbury were among the most illustrious sons of Germany and England in the schools of Paris; while Ste-Geneviève became practically the seminary for Denmark. The chronicles of the time call Paris "sapiens operum prima" and Paris was placed it above Athens, Alexandria, Rome, and other cities. "At that time," they say, in the "Chroniques de St-Denis," "there flourished at Paris philosophy and all branches of learning, and there the seven arts were studied and held in such esteem as they never were at Athens, Egypt, Rome, or elsewhere in the world" ("Les gestes de Philippe-Auguste"). Poets said the same thing in their verses, and they compared it to all that was greatest, noblest, and most valuable in the world.

To maintain order among the students and define the relations of the professors, organizations were necessary. It had its faults, but it was developed as circumstances permitted or required. Three features in this organization may be noted: first, the professors formed an association, for according to Matthew Paris, John of Celso, twenty-first Abbot of St. Albans, England, was admitted as a member of the teaching corps of Paris (this had followed the example of Vitus, Archbis-} nis I, XXI, abbat. S. Alban). Again, the masters as well as the students were divided according to provinces, for as the same historian states, Henry 11, King of England, in his difficulties with St. Thomas of Canterbury, wished to submit his cause to a tribunal composed of professors of Paris, chosen from various provinces of England (Vita h. Cap., XXI, 1, to end of 1200). This was probably the germ of that division according to "nations" which was later to play an important part in the university. Lastly, mention must be made of the privileges then enjoyed by the professors and students. In virtue of a decision of Celestin III, they were allowed to hold all kinds of contracts. Of course, these dispensed them from residence in case they possessed benefices and permitted them to receive their revenues.

These three schools of Notre-Dame, Ste-Geneviève, and St-Victor may be regarded as the triple cradle of the University scholasticum, which included masters and students; hence the name University. Such is the common and more probable opinion. Denile and some others hold that this honour must be reserved to the school of Notre-Dame (Chartularium Universitatis Parisiensis), but the reasons do not seem convincing. He excludes St-Victor because, at the request of the abbot and the religious of St-

VicIor. These schools were 1237 and 1248. They would not resume the interrupted teaching of theology. But the university was in large part founded about 1208, as is shown by a Bull of Innocent III. Consequently the schools of St-Victor might well have furnished their contingent towards its formation. Secondly, Denile excludes the schools of Ste-Geneviève because there had been a teaching of the liberal arts. Now this is far from proved, and moreover, it seems incontestable that theology also had never ceased to be taught, which is sufficient for our point. Besides, the role of the chancellor of Ste-

Geneviève in the university cannot be explained by the new opinion; he continued to give degrees in arts, a function which would have ceased for him when the university was organized if his abbey had no share in its organization. And while the name Universitas scho-

larium is quite intelligible on the basis of the common opinion, it is incompatible with the recent (Denile's) view, according to which there would have been schools outside the University University of the Thirteenth Century.—As completing the work of organization the diploma of Philip Augustus and the statutes of Robert de Couron are worthy of note. The king's diploma was given "for the security of the scholars of Paris", and in virtue of it from the year 1200 the students were subject only to ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Hence the provost and other officers were forbidden to arrest a student for any offence, and if in exceptional cases this was done it was only to hand over the culprit to ecclesiastical authority, for in the event of grave crime royal justice was limited to taking cognizance of the procedure and the verdict. In no case could the king's officers lay hands on the head of the school or even on a simple pupil, for this being allowed only in virtue of a mandate proceeding from ecclesiastical authority. The statutes of the Apostolic legate are later by some years, bearing the date 1215. They had for their object the moral or intellectual part of the instruction. They dealt with three principal points, the conditions of the professorate, the teaching of the arts, and the granting of the licence. To teach the arts they must be trained "on the model", and the age of twenty was prescribed. As to the granting of the licence, the candidate had to be thirty years of age with eight years of theological studies, of which the last three years were at the same time devoted to special courses of lectures prepared for the master's tip. These studies had to be made in the local schools and under the direction of a master, for at Paris one was not regarded as a scholar unless he had a particular master. Lastly, purity of morals was not less requisite than learning. Prisian's "Grammar", Aristotle's "Dialectics", mathematics, astronomy, music, certain books of rhetoric and philosophy were taught in the arts, and besides might be added the Ethics of the Stagyrite and the fourth book of the Topics. But it was forbidden to read the books of Aristotle on Metaphysics and Physics, or abbreviations of them. The licence was granted, according to custom, gratuitously, without oath or condition. Masters and students were permitted to assemble together, in defence of their rights, when they could not otherwise obtain justice in serious matters. No mention is made either of law or of medicine, probably because these sciences were less prominent. A denial of justice by the queen brought about in 1229 a suspension of the courses. Appeal was taken to a pope who intervened in the same year by a Bull which began "Dei gratia academicus universitatis. "Paris", said Gregory IX, "mother of the sciences, is another Cariath-Sepher, city of letters". He compared it to a laboratory in which wisdom tested the metals which she found there, gold and silver to adorn the Sponsa of Jesus Christ, iron to fashion the spiritual sword which should slay the heretical points. As a matter of fact, the Bishops of Lisieux and Senlis and the Archbishop of Clamens to negotiate with the French Court for the restoration of the university. The year 1230 came to an end without any result, and Gregory IX took the matter directly in hand by a Bull of 1231 addressed to the masters and scholars of Paris. Not content with settling the dispute, he granted for the future, he sanctioned and developed the concessions of Robert de Couron by empowering the university to frame statutes concerning the discipline of the schools, the method of instruction, the defence of theses, the costume of the professors, and the obscurities of masters and students. What was chiefly important was that the pope recognized it the university, in case justice were denied it, to suspend its courses until it should receive full satisfaction. It must be borne in mind that in the schools of Paris not only was the granting of licence gratuitous but instruction also was free. This was the general rule; however, it was often necessary to depart from it. This was the case at Louvain, where it was the hope to levy a moderate fee for the conferring of the licence. Similar fees were exacted for the first degree in arts and letters, and the scholars were taxed two sous weekly, to be deposited in the common fund.

The university was organized as follows: at the head of the teaching body was a rector. The office was elective and of short duration. At first it was limited to four or six weeks. Simon de Brion, legate of the Holy See in France, rightly judging that such frequent changes caused serious inconvenience, decided that the rectorate should last three months, and this rule was observed for three years. Then the term was lengthened to one, two, and sometimes three years. The right of election belonged to the procurators of the universities. The "Nations" appeared in the second half of the twelfth century; they were mentioned in the Bull of Honorius III in 1222 and in another of Gregory IX in 1231; later they formed a distinct body. In 1249 the four nations existed with their procurators, their rights (more or less well-defined), and the popular heat of the controversy between the university and the mendicant orders, a letter was addressed to the pope bearing the seals of the four nations. These were the French, English, Normans, and Picards. After the Hundred Years' War the English nation was re-
These to friction while two in theology, the theology studies war nations. Alexander cine, and university of the rectors. Thus time and community of division of the faculty of theology, and the three superior faculties of theology, law, and medicine. Ecclesiastical dignities, even without any visible inversion of the masters and students of Paris. This preference became a general principle, eventually a right, that of eligibility to benefices. Such was the origin and early organization of the University of Paris which might even then, in virtue of their protection, call itself the daughter of kings, but which was in reality the daughter of the Church. St. Louis, in the diploma which he granted to the Carthusians for their establishment near Paris, speaks of this city, where "flow the most abundant waters of wholesome doctrine, so that they become a great river which after refreshing the city itself irrigates the Universal Church." Clement IV uses a no less charming comparison: "the noble and renowned city, the city which is the school of learning and sheds over the world a light which seems an image of the celestial splendour; those who are taught there shine brilliantly, and those who teach there will shine with the stars for all eternity" (cf. du Bouhy, "Hist. Univers. Paris," III, 369-71).

Later History.—Abuses crypt in; to correct these and to introduce various needed modifications in the work of the university was the purpose of the reform carried out in the fifteenth century by Cardinal d'Es- toutville, Apostolic legate in France. As a whole it was less an innovation than a recall to the better observance of the ancient statutes. The reform of 1500, undertaken by the royal government, was of the same character with regard to the three superior faculties. As to the faculty of arts, the study of Greek was added to that of Latin, only the best classical authors were recommended; the French poets and orators were used along with Iscald, Plato, Demosthenes, Cicero, Virgil, and Sallust. The prohibition to teach civil law was never written supplementary of the canon law; the council of the University, founded in the fourteenth century, the Hundred Years' War was fatal to these establishments, but the university set about remedying the injury.

Remarkable for its teaching, the University of Paris played an important part in the Church, during the Great Schism; in the councils, in dealing with heresies and deplorable divisions; in the State, during national crises; and if the domination of the Recorders was sometimes a sort of war if a remedy had not been found. The remedy sought was taxation. This right of taxation, included in the regulation of Robert de Courcy, had passed on to the university. It was upheld in the Bull of Gregory IX of 1221, but with an important modification, for its exercise was to be shared with the citizens. These two institutions had long shown the need of new arrangements. The aim was to offer the students a shelter where they would fear neither annoyance from the owners nor the dangers of the world. The result was the foundation of the colleges (colligere, to assemble). This measure also furthered the progress of studies by a fuller employment of time, under the guidance sometimes of resident masters and out of the way of dissipation. These colleges were not usually centres of instruction, but simple boarding-houses for the students, who went from them to the schools. Each had a special object, being established for students of the same nationality or the same science. Four colleges appear in the twelfth century; they became more numerous in the thirteenth, and among them may be mentioned Harecourt and the Sorbonne. At the University of Paris it was the type of the other universities, had already assumed the form which it afterwards retained. It was composed of seven groups, the four nations of the faculty of arts, and the three superior faculties of theology, law, and medicine. Ecclesiastical dignities, even without any visible inversion of the masters and students of Paris. This preference became a general principle, eventually a right, that of eligibility to benefices. Such was the origin and early organization of the University of Paris which might even then, in virtue of their protection, call itself the daughter of kings, but which was in reality the daughter of the Church. St. Louis, in the diploma which he granted to the Carthusians for their establishment near Paris, speaks of this city, where "flow the most abundant waters of wholesome doctrine, so that they become a great river which after refreshing the city itself irrigates the Universal Church." Clement IV uses a no less charming comparison: "the noble and renowned city, the city which is the school of learning and sheds over the world a light which seems an image of the celestial splendour; those who are taught there shine brilliantly, and those who teach there will shine with the stars for all eternity" (cf. du Bouhy, "Hist. Univers. Paris," III, 369-71).
Paris was given over to factions, the university sought energy enough to restore peace; and under Louis XIV, when the Spaniards had crossed the Somme and threatened the capital, it placed two hundred men at the king's disposal and offered the Master of Arts degree gratuitously to scholars who should present certificates of service in the army (Journal, "Hist. de l'Univers. de Paris au XVII et XVIIIe siècle", 152-34; "Archiv. du ministère de l'Instruction publique").

The ancient university was to disappear with ancient France under the Revolution. On 15 Sept., 1793, petitioned by the Department of Paris and several departmental groups, the National Convention decided that independently of the primary schools, already the objects of its solicitude, "there should be established in the Republic three progressive degrees of instruction; the first for the knowledge indispensable to artisans and workmen of all kinds; the second for further knowledge necessary to those intending to embrace the other professions of society; and the third for those branches of instruction, the study of which is not within the reach of all men." These were then taken immediately: "For means of execution the department and the municipality of Paris are authorized to consult with the Committee of Public Instruction of the National Convention, in order that these establishments shall be put in action by 1 November next, and consequently colleges now in operation and the faculties of arts, medicine, law, and law-counsel, "Be suppressed throughout the Republic". This was the death-sentence of the university. It was not to be restored after the Revolution had subsided, any more than those of the provinces. All were replaced by a single central, viz., the University of France. The lapse of a century brought the recognition of the necessity of a science favourable to study, and it was sought to restore the old system, but without the faculty of theology.

Grands Cours (1836) and soon after was made a member of the committee entrusted with the task of continuing the "Histoire littéraire de la France", a most valuable publication, begun in the eighteenth century by the Benedectines. In 1853 a chair of medieval literature was created for him in the Collège de France, and for nineteen years he lectured in a most scholarly manner on the original works of the Frankish authors for the "Chansons de Geste", the novels of the Round Table, and the early French theatre. Medieval literature appealed to him, because he found in it a naive but strong expression of his religious faith. Busy as he was with the preparation of his lectures, he found time to publish, with dissertations and annotations, several of his favorite works as "Histoire des Réaux" (9 vols., Paris, 1860), "Aventures de Maître Renart et d'Ysengrin" (Paris, 1861), "Recueil complet des Poèmes de St-Pavin" (1861), "Romans de la Table Ronde" (1865-77), "Le Livre du Voir Dit", by Guillaume de Machault (1867). He resigned his chair in the Collège de France in 1872.

Paris, Gaston-Bruno-Paulin, a French philologist, son of Paulin, b. at Avenay (Marne), 9 August, 1839; d. at Cannes, 6 March, 1903. After graduating from the Collège Rollin, Paris, he studied at the Universities of Gottingen and Bonn, where he was a pupil of the celebrated philologist Diez. On his return, while taking courses at the École des Chartes, he studied law and literature at the University of Paris, obtaining the degree of doctor in literature in 1865. He taught for a while French grammar in a private school, and was appointed professor of languages at the École Pratique des Hautes Études, and soon after was made director of that section of the school, a position he retained till his death. In 1872, he succeeded his father as professor of medieval studies at the Collège de France and was made director of the college in 1895. A year later, he was elected to the French Academy, taking the seat made vacant by the death of Alexandre Dumas, Jr. For more than thirty years he was regarded as the highest authority in France on philology of the Romance languages. In this connection, scientific as well as his patient researches in that new field, he made his name famous throughout Europe. His lectures were attended by enthusiastic crowds gathered from all parts of the world. His salon, where he used to receive every Sunday his friends, pupils, and distinguished foreign scholars, was one of the most celebrated in Paris. Because of his sojourn in Protestant universities and the influence of Renan, he lost for a time his religious faith, but towards the end of his life he returned to the sentiments of his childhood and was buried in the Church. Among his numerous publications, without mentioning his contributions to the "Recueil critique", the "Romains", which he published in 1865, the latter in 1872, the chief to be cited are: "Etude sur le rôle de l'accent latin dans la langue française" (Paris, 1862); "De Pseudo-Turpin" (Paris, 1865), a Latin thesis for the doctorate; "Histoire poétique de Charlemagne" (Paris, 1866); "La vie de saint Alexis" (texts of the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries); "Dissertation critique sur le poème latin Ligurius" (Paris, 1875); "Le petit Poucet, la grande Ourse" (Paris, 1875); "Les contes orientaux dans la langue du moyen âge" (Paris, 1875); "Les miracles de Notre-Dame par Personnages" (Paris, 1877); "Le mystère de la Passion par Aronel Gréban" (1878); "Le Diable et la Cuisine de Rome" (Paris, 1879); "Au-cassin et Nicodette" (Paris, 1878); "Poètes et Penseurs" (Paris, 1883) etc.

Paris, Alexis-Paulin, philologist, b. at Avenay, Marne, France, 25 March, 1803; d. 13 Feb., 1884. Having finished his classical studies at Reims, he was sent by his father to Paris to study law, but devoted most of his time to literary work. In 1824 he published "Apologie de l'Ecole Romantique", in which he advocated the imitation of Byron and the study of medieval art. Besides contributing articles to various literary reviews, he translated Byron's complete works (13 vols., Paris, 1827-32). In 1828 he obtained a clerkship in the manuscript department of the King's Library (now known as the Bibliothèque Nationale), and was afterwards promoted to the rank of assistant librarian. He took advantage of his position to pursue his research work on medieval literature, and published a few old epics, "Berengario et Grans Pais" (Paris, 1831), "Garm le Liberman" (1832), and a collection of popular songs under the title of "Romancero Français" (Paris, 1833). He then turned to historical writings, published in 1853 "Mémoire sur la Relation Originale des Voyages de Marco Polo", and from 1836 to 1846, the "Grande Chroniques de Saint Denis". His most important work as a librarian, was his book on "Les Manuscrits Français de la Bibliothèque du Roi" (Paris, 1836-18), which is not a mere catalogue, but a lengthy dissertation on the authors and contents of the MSS.

In recognition of his achievements, he was elected to the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-lettres in 1857 and soon after was made a member of the committee entrusted with the task of continuing the "Histoire littéraire de la France", a most valuable publication, begun in the eighteenth century by the Benedectines. In 1853 a chair of medieval literature was created for him in the Collège de France, and for nineteen years he lectured in a most scholarly manner on the original works of the Frankish authors for the "Chansons de Geste", the novels of the Round Table, and the early French theatre. Medieval literature appealed to him, because he found in it a naive but strong expression of his religious faith. Busy as he was with the preparation of his lectures, he found time to publish, with dissertations and annotations, several of his favorite works as "Histoire des Réaux" (9 vols., Paris, 1860), "Aventures de Maître Renart et d'Ysengrin" (Paris, 1861), "Recueil complet des Poèmes de St-Pavin" (1861), "Romans de la Table Ronde" (1865-77), "Le Livre du Voir Dit", by Guillaume de Machault (1867). He resigned his chair in the Collège de France in 1872.

Parish, Matthew, Benedictine monk and chronicler, b. about 1200; d. 1259. There seems no reason to infer from the name by which he was commonly known that this famous English historian was directly connected by any line of descent with Saint Alban, whose name became a monk at St. Albans on 21 January, 1217, and St. Albans remained his home until his death. We know, however, that on occasion he moved about freely, visiting London and the Court, and one memorable episode of his life took him as visitor with full powers to the Abbey of St. Benet Holm in Norway where he remained nearly a year. When that work was finished, Matthew seems always to have been treated as a personage of consideration. In his journey to Norway he was the bearer of letters from St. Louis of France to Haakon IV, inviting the Norwegian king to join the crusade. Haakon subsequently became his personal friend and we have much evidence in Matthew's own writings of the intimate terms upon which he stood with the English king, Henry III, and with his brother Richard, Earl of Cornwall. From them and from the members of their household the chronicler must have derived that wide, if not quite accurate, acquaintance with the details of foreign contemporary history in which Matthew was endowed in unrivalled manner by his contemporaries. His gifts were not only those of the student and man of letters. He was famed as an artist and an expert in writing and he probably executed with his own hand many of the telling little drawings which illustrate the margins of his manuscripts.

As a historian Matthew holds the first place among English chroniclers. For his ease of style, range of interest and information, vivid though profusely elaboration of detail, he is much more readable than any of those monastic scholars who wrote either before or after him. His great work, the “Chronica Majora”, extends from the creation until 1259, the year of his death. Down to 1225 this is simply an expansion and embellishment of the chronicle of his fellow-monk, Roger of Wendover, but “he re-edited Wendover's work with a patriotic and anti-curialist bias quite alien to the spirit of the earlier writer” (Tout, 451). From 1253 to 1259 Paris is a first-hand authority and by far the most copious source of information. The work was admirably edited, with preface and supplements, in seven volumes by Dr. Luard. A compendium of this work from 1067 to 1253 was also prepared by Paris. It is known as the “Historia Minor” and it bears evidence of a certain mitigation of previous judgments which in his later years he deemed over severe. This work has been edited by Sir F. Madden. Other minor works connected especially with St. Albans, and a short “Life of Stephen Langton” (printed by Liebermann in 1870) are also attributed to Paris.

With regard to his trustworthiness as a source of history there seems to be a tendency amongst most English writers, notably for example J. R. Green or Dr. Luard, to glorify him as a sort of national asset and to regard his shortcomings with partisan eyes.

There can be no question that Matthew's allegations against the friars and his denunciations of the avarece and tyrannical interference of the Roman Court should be received with extreme caution. Lingard perhaps goes too far when, in speaking of his works, he says, “Matthew has nothing to say that is not capable of a reasonable answer in his own position”, he declares, “It may appear invidious to speak harshly of this famous historian, but this I may say, that when I confront his pages with authentic records or contemporary writers, I have in most instances found the discrepancy between them so great as to give his narrative the appearance of a romance rather than a history” (Lingard, “History”, II, 479). But we may rest content with the verdict of a more recent writer, open to no suspicion of religious bias. “Matthew”, says Professor Tout, “was an illusion of strong views, and his sympathies and his prejudices colour every line he wrote. His standpoint is that of a patriotic Englishman, indignant at the alien invasions, at the misgovernment of the King, the greed of the curialists and the Poitevins, and with a professional bias against the mendicant friars” (Poll, Hist. of Eng., III, 452).

The principal sources of information regarding Matthew Paris have all been gathered up in the prefaces to Dr. Luard's monumental edition of the “Chronica Majora in the Rolls Series” (1888) and Dr. Bedier's “Historia Major in Rolls Series” (3 vols., 1896-99) and with others. Matthew's own writings (1255; Bedier, viii, facing p. 41) are fortunately complete. Matthew's views should be compared with Sir F. Madden's preface to the Historia Minor in Rolls Series (3 vols., 1896-99) and with other editions of the work (Madden, 1829; Dufay-Hubert, 1863-1871); and for secondary works see also Cambridge History of English Literature (London, 1837-1871), 176-178; Tout in Political History of England, III (London, 1865), 431-433; Gasquet, Henry III and the church (London, 1895); Bedier, St. Matthew the Evangelist, 1894; Idem, in his preface to the Regesta Insignissima Papa Quar. 91.

HERBERT THORNTON.

Parish (Lo, parochia, parochiae, Gk. παροικία, a group of neighbouring dwellings). I. General Notions. A parish is a portion of a diocese under the authority of a priest legitimately appointed to secure in virtue of his office the faithful dwelling therein, the help of religion. The faithf ul are called parishioners, the priest parochus, curate, parish priest, parson. Paris (after Parisii, a certain body of the faithful over whom pastoral authority is exercised; the ordinary manner of determining them is by assigning a territory subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the parish priest. Uncertainty of parish boundaries may work harm and the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV, c. xiii, d. c. 1) orders the boundaries of parishes to be defined. The faithful become parishioners by acquiring a domicile or a quasi-domicile (see Domus) within the territory, or by simply living in it for a month (Decret, “Ne tenere”, on marriage, 2 August, 1607). Travellers, however, may address themselves to the parish priest of the locality, though without detriment to the rights of their own pastor. The exclusive attribution of a territory to a parish and its pastor is not absolutely necessary; certain parishes coexist with others in the same territory, the respective parishes being distinguished by rite or nationality, e. g. in the Orient or in large American cities. There are even rare instances of parishes formed solely of families without regular territory, or parishes having in virtue of his title a mission and authority to give religious succour to the parishioners, is required. In strict law, the care of souls in a single parish must devolve on several priests, and in fact, such was formally the case in most chapters (q. v.); but the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV, c. xiii, d. c. 1) commands bishops to assign to each parish its own individual rector. If the care of souls is entrusted to a moral body, like a chapter, it must be exercised by a vicar, perpetual as far as possible, who is called the “actual” curate, the chapter remaining the “habitual” curate, without right of interfering in any way in the parochial ministry (Sess. XXIV, c. xiii, d. v. 1).

The parish priest may have assistants, but the latter exercise their ministry in dependence on him and in his name. If the priest, even when alone, does not exercise his office in his own name, if he is only the delegate of a higher authority, he is not really a parish priest and his district is not a true parish. That is the case there are not only stations in vicariates Apostolic and missionary countries. The same may occur in dioceses during the provisional period which precedes the erection of certain districts into parishes. But the parish exists, when the priest exercises the ministry in his own name, whether his title be perpetual or be removable at the will of the bishop. From this results
(3) parochial law, I. e., the reciprocal rights and duties of the parish priest and parishes. This constitutes the care of souls (cura animarum), an essential and constitutive element of a parish, distinguishing a parochial benefice from all others. Finally there is required to a suitable church which must have been erected for Divine worship, a baptismal font; exception is occasionally made in favour of a cathedral or a mother-church; hence in the Middle Ages parish churches were often called baptismal churches, a consecration necessary for Divine service. In the Ritual finally, the parish has fixed or occasional contributions for Divine service, the building, liturgical furniture, parochial works, and all that implies an administration. Local laws determine the share of the parishioners or their representatives in this administration, the parish must likewise furnish the parish priest with his presbytery or dwelling.

II. The Parish as a Benefice.—The canonical legislation relative to parishes is part of the legislation concerning benefices (q. v.). To the care of souls is annexed by common law a benefice, by its purpose distinct from any other. All parishes are benefices, at least in the wide application of that term; according to common law every church should have a stable income, especially local revenues, sufficient to insure not only the Divine service but also the support of its clergy. Every parish priest ought to have a fixed benefice revenue, his conuena, the minimum of which is fixed by the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV, c. xii, de ref. c. i., at one hundred ducats (about one hundred and forty-two dollars) a sum insufficient to-day; the conuen could be increased by contributions from the public treasury, in certain countries, paid in return for former ecclesiastical property now confiscated. Parishes without fixed incomes are nevertheless benefices in a broad sense of the term, since they insure a living for their parish priests by gifts and offerings, either voluntary or payable on the occasion of certain acts of the curial ministry, according to rates approved by the bishop. Parishes, like other benefices, may be divided into several classes. Most parishes are free, i. e., the bishop himself selects the incumbent; but others are subject to the right of patronage; the patron who appoints the incumbent holds by his benefice. All these parishes are independent, but some are united to other ecclesiastical bodies: chapters, dignities (high ecclesiastical offices), monasteries. By common law they are served by the secular clergy and are hence called secular parishes; but some, united to houses of religious orders, are served by religious and are consequently termed regular. Those confined to religious in virtue of a personal title, are not properly speaking regular.

The care of souls places parochial benefices in a special category, and has led to regulations peculiar to them alone. (1) Parishes, to be free, i. e., freely collated, should be confirmed by the bishop without his having any right of patronage; in the same manner, benefices are limited by the conuenas (q. v.) ordered by the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV, c. xvi, de ref.). (2) By common law, a parochial benefice, like other benefices, is perpetual, and the beneficiary irremovable (see Foundation; Decree, Majus aula), 20 August, 1916. According to this Decree parish priests who were heretofore removable are now withdrawn from purely-ordinary transference. Irremovable parish priests may have their faculties withdrawn, without any trial properly so-called, when the good of souls demands it. The nine reasons given in the afore-said Decree as grounds for this withdrawal of faculties relative to temporal or spiritual conduct, serious and prolonged neglect of duty, persistent disobedience; these reasons, however, are not here dealt with as crimes, but solely as obstacles to a useful parochial ministry; hence the parish priest on being removed is to be provided for. This administrative procedure adequately secures the right of initiative necessary for the bishop, and at the same time safeguards the interests of the parish priest. It comprises three stages: the bishop who thinks that a parish priest is no longer working faithfully among his flock, is bound to select as counsellors two of the synodal or pro-synodal examiners, in order of their nomination, and explain the situation to them. If the majority decides to remove the parish priest, the bishop must first officially request him to resign within fifteen days under threat of pronouncing a decree of removal. The priest may reply to the reasons alleged against him, and his answer is examined by this council; if the reply is deemed unsatisfactory, the bishop issues the decree and notifies the priest. Properly speaking the latter cannot appeal from the decree, but he may present his case to a new council, composed of the bishop and two parish priests as consultants, who examine whether the reasons given for the removal have been proved and whether the formalities demanded by the decree have been observed; a majority vote decides (see Council of Trent, Sess. XXI, c. vi, de ref.).

The same zeal for the welfare of souls inspires special legislation for the erection and division of parishes. The creation of a parish takes place by creation when the district and the faithful assigned to the new parish did not belong previously to any priest. This case is extremely rare, as usually the territory of each dioecese is divided into parishes more or less extensively. A parish may be created when ecclesiastical activity becomes canonically recognized as a parish, as when a vicariate Apostolic is erected into a dioecese. The creation of parishes usually takes place by dismemberment or division. While in theory the division of benefices is looked on unfavorably by the law (c. 8 de Praebendis), it is authorized and even necessitated by the welfare of the faithful in the case of parishes. The Council of Trent (Sess. XXI, c. iv, de ref.), referring expressly to the Decree "Ad audientiam" of Alexander III (lib. III, tit. 48, c. 3), desires bishops, if necessary as delegates of the Apostolic See, to establish new parishes, in spite of the parish priest's opposition, wherever distance or difficulty of communication does not hinder the exercise of priestly functions. In cities an excessive increase of population necessitates the multiplication of parishes. The Council in such a case desires bishops to oblige the parish priests to have sufficient number of assistants; but if the population is too great for the parish priest "to know his sheep" (Sess. XXI, c. 1), the creation of a new parish is obligatory and the Congregation of the Council has several times recognized this as a legitimate reason. The legal formalities for the erection of a new parish further require the request either of the parish priest whose parish is to be divided, or of other interested persons, if there be any such; the consent of the chapter, if any, unless the bishop gives a guarantee of a sufficient income for the new parish, either by a partition of the property of the dismembered parish or parishes, or at least by the contributions of the inhabitants of the new one. The erection is effected by an episcopal decree. As a rule a special kinship exists between the old and the new parishes; the old being called the "mother" and the new the "filial" parish, the latter being bound to make certain offerings to the former, generally honorary, e. g., the annual gift of a candle. Special "foundations" of the old parish, created for the benefit, not of the clergy, but of the faithful (alms for the poor) are divided pro rata. Finally, the same procedure is observed when the bishop is removed from a parish, by its union with another, when the number of the faithful has decreased so as no longer to warrant the presence of a parish priest.
III. History.—The first Christian communities were founded in cities and the entire Divine service was carried on by the bishop and his clergy; the few faithful outside the cities went to the city or were visited from time to time by clergy from the presbyteries. In the fourth century we find in the villages groups sufficiently large to be served by a resident clergy. Canon L. Elvira (about A.D. 300) mentions in charge of the people (dioecesus regionis plebem).

In the East at a very early period the churches of the cities and of the country districts were organized; the Council of Nicaea, about 320 (can. 13), speaks of country priests and bishops of villages, the "chorepiscopi," who had a subordinate clergy. Such churches and their clergy were originally under the direct administration of the bishop; but soon they had their own resources and a distinct administration (Council of Chalcedon, 431, can. 4, 6, 17). The same change took place in the West, but more slowly. In proportion as the country districts were evangelized (fourth to sixth centuries), churches were erected, at first in the vici (hamlets or villages), afterwards on church lands or on the property of private individuals, and at least one priest was appointed to each church. The clergy and property depended at first directly on the bishop and the cathedral; the churches did not yet correspond to very definite territorial circumscriptions; the centre was the priest, and he, as in the case of the church which the councils of the sixth and seventh century call ecclesia rusticana, parochialana, often dioecesis, and finally paroecias. By that time most of these churches had become independent; the priest administered the property assigned to him by the bishop, and also the property given directly to the church by the pious; faithful; that moment the priest became a beneficiary and had his title. More plentiful resources required and permitted a more numerous clergy. The devotion of the faithful, especially towards relics, led to the erection of numerous secondary chapels, oratories, basilicas, martyrria, which also had their clergy. But these tituli minorae were not parishes; they depended on the principal church of the vicus, and on the archpriest so often mentioned in the councils of the sixth and seventh centuries, who had authority over his own clergy and those of the oratories.

These secondary churches emphasize the parochial church. The faithful had to receive the sacraments and pay their tithes at the latter. The monasteries in turn ministered to the people grouped around them. From the eighth century parochial centres multiplied on the lands of the churches and the monasteries, and the villa or great estates of the kings and nobles. Then the villa were subdivided and the parish served a certain number of villa or rural districts, and thus the parish church became the centre of the religious and even the civil life of the villages. This condition, established in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, has scarcely varied since, as far as concerns the parochial service. As benefices, however, parishes have undergone considerable changes, and it is on the monasteries or chapters, and on account of the inextricable complications of the feudal order, that parish churches have ordinarily attached to them schools and charitable works, especially for the poor enrolled on the matricula, or list of those attached to the Church. In the episcopal and other cities the division into parishes took place much more slowly, the cathedral or the archiepiscopal church being for a long time the only parochial church. However numerous the city churches, all depended on it and properly speaking, had no flocks of their own. At Rome, as early as the fourth century, there was a quasi-parochial church. In the time of the Church ( Innocent I to Decentius, c. 5, an. 416). It is only towards the close of the eleventh century that separate urban parishes began; even then there were limitations, e. g. baptism was to be conferred in the cathedral; the territories, moreover, were badly defined. The chapters turned over to the clergy of the churches the parochial ministry, while the corporations (guilds) insisted especially on the granting of parochial rights to the churches which they founded and supported.

All annals of canon law have a chapter on the parish and the parish priest; the commentators of the Decretals treat the subject in Book III, tit. v. De praebendis, and tit. xxxvii. De parochiis et usu parochiarum (Paulus, Dictionnaire de droit canon., 1867; Panama, Promenade bibliothécaire, s. v. Paroies; Stamminger, Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts, Berlin, 1909, §§ 58, 100, Thomassini, l. i. i. c. 21 sqq.); l'Empire de la loi, Les Eglises (Paris, 1898); Vl sicle (Paris, 1900); L'Empire, La Paroisse (Paris, 1908); Taunton, Law of the Church (London, 1908), v. etc.

A. BOUDINON.

IN ENGLISH-SPEAKING COUNTRIES.—In the United States and English-speaking lands generally (with the exception of Ireland, Canada, and possibly California), it has not been found advisable as yet to erect canonical parishes. The districts confided to priests having the cure of souls are technically designated as missions or quasi-parishes, though in common parlance the word parocese is employed. The establishment of canonical parishes in these countries was not found possible, owing either to the devastation wrought in the so-called Reformation period or to the fact that the parishes were very evangelized and settled, circumstances did not allow the establishment of the Church's parochial system as prescribed in her canon law.

A. The Missions or Quasi-Parishes. Certain churches are designated by the bishop which are to be regarded as parish churches (ad insulam paroeciam). Over these churches are placed priests provided with the necessary faculties. They are designated missionary rectors, or quasi-parish priests, though familiarly referred to as pastors or parish priests. A certain district around each church is then more or less definitely marked out by the bishop, within the limits of which the pastor is to exercise jurisdiction over the faithful and have care of ecclesiastical buildings. Within the limits of such missions or quasi-parishes, the bishop may institute new ecclesiastical divisions when such action becomes advisable. If the parish be held by members of a religious order, the bishop is not thereby constrained to entrust the newly-formed district to the regulars. The institution of new quasi-parishes in English-speaking countries are provided for as follows (§§ 53, 100; Thomassini, l. i. i. c. 21 sqq.). The bishop can erect a new parish by way of creation, union, or division. If the territory in question has not yet been assigned to any parish church, the institution is said to be by way of creation. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the bishop can proceed to such action in virtue of his powers as ordinary of the diocese.

In creating such new parish, he is bound to provide as far as possible for the proper support of the new incumbent. In English-speaking countries there is no necessity of recurring to the civil power for the creation of a new union. When the bishop erects new quasi-parishes by way of division, he is not required to observe all the formalities prescribed by law for the dismemberment of canonical parishes. He must, nevertheless, act on the advice of his consultants, and after hearing the opinion of the pastor whose territory is to be divided. It is obvious that a division which would cripple or impoverish the church would not be in the best interests of religion, yet the bishop can proceed to such dismemberment even against the will and advice of the pastor. In that case, however, an appeal against the decree of the ordinary can be lodged with the metropolitan or the Holy See. It is to be noted that in very specific reasons are laid down in canon law according to which a bishop may divide parishes, yet our bishops are not limited to such reasons. Leo XIII lays down explicitly in his Constitution "Romano Pontifici" that our missions may be divided by the ordinaries for a greater number of reasons and for less important ones than those specified in the common law of the Church.

When a parish is to be divided, the bishop must hear the opinion of the religious superior before taking action. A right of appeal against the dismemberment of the mission is allowed both to seculars and regulars. In case of the former, generally, the appeal is to be made to the metropolitan, as the bishop acts in virtue of his ordinary jurisdiction; in case of the latter, the appeal is to be laid before the Holy See as the bishop is generally using his powers of papal delegation. No appeal, however, can effect a suspension of the bishop's mandate but only subject it to reconsideration by the higher tribunal. It is possible, however, for the ordinary to act as delegate of the Holy See for seculars as well as for regulars, except and non-exempt. In that case the appeal must always be made to Rome. Parishes are sometimes formed by way of union, that is, when several parishes are joined together so as to form, either strictly or loosely, one new parish. The united parishes are simply governed by one pastor without any further change in their status (uni ovoque principali); we are not speaking of provinces or nations. In English-speaking countries, two or more churches or missions are served by one priest, though otherwise independent of each other. With us, however, such union is preparatory to a division as soon as the revenues of the churches or the number of priests allows of it. As to union by subjection, the usual form this takes is the creation of a vicar apostolic under the jurisdiction of a bishop of some diocese outside the country. This union was made (for the most part temporarily) dependent on some parish church. The power possessed by the bishop of disuniting parishes formerly joined together is frequently exercised in these countries in the above mentioned cases.

As a right of patronage does not exist in the United States, the making of new parishes is never complicated by the necessity of consulting an ecclesiastical patron. The counsel, which the bishop must take to ensure validity in the formation of new parishes, must be with his diocesan consultors, where such a body is established, or with the cathedral chapter, when the diocese possesses such a body, as in the British Isles. The regulations of ecclesiastical law by which a new parish is created are often to be taken as a sign of dependence and respect to the church from which it was separated (the relation of the filia to the ecclesia mater, or mother-church) is generally unknown in missionary countries.

B. Pastors or Rectors of Churches.—The rectors of missions are not canonical parish priests, though they have been invested with nearly all the privileges of canonical incumbents by particular synods or decrees of Roman congregations. These rectors are of two kinds, removable and irremovable. The common law of the Church requires that every parish should have an irremovable rector, but in countries where the Latin rite is practiced, especially in the United States, it is usual to make provision for the appointment of pastors who are removable at the will of the ordinary (potestas praepositi). Priests belonging to religious orders, who are in charge of parishes, may be removed either by their superior or by the bishop, without either being constrained to give the reason for his decision to the other. On the removal of a regular, his religious superior nominee his successor. It is the expressed desire of the Holy See that all rectors of parishes should, as far as possible, be endowed with the quality of perpetuity in their pastoral charge and, where this is impossible, that at least a certain number of rectors should be declared irremovable. The proportion of one out of every ten who are to be declared irremovable was fixed as the minimum number in American dioceses. When a certain rectorship has once been declared irremovable, it is not in the power of the ordinary to reduce it to the status of a removable rectorship.

This is plain from the Third Council of Baltimore (No. 34), as well as from the general law of the Church, which forbids ecclesiastical superiors to lower the status of their clergy. As to the question of whether a rectorship is to be removable or irremovable, the appointment of the first rector lies with the bishop after hearing the diocesan consultants. For instituting all other irremovable rectors, it is necessary that a written examination or concursus be held, at which the same questions must be proposed to all the candidates. From among those whom the examiners shall deem worthy after a consideration of their answers and testimonials, the bishop selects one on whom he confers the parish. This rule as to a concursus does not hold, however, in all English-speaking countries. An appeal to a higher tribunal is not stopped by a concursus, for a dissatisfied candidate may lay his complaint before the metropolitan, either on account of the improper judgment of the examiners or of the unreasonable selection made by the ordinary.

No examination is required for the appointment of pastors to removable rectorships. When a rector has once acquired the privilege of permanency, he cannot be removed against his will except for causes laid down by ecclesiastical law. This right has been confirmed under the new Constitution of Pius X, "Maxima Cura" (20 Aug., 1910). Removable rectors, though they are appointed at the will of the bishop, cannot be removed except for grave cause, if such removal would affect their character or their emoluments, and in case of grievance they may have recourse to the Holy Office. According to Leo XIII, the First Council of Westminster (D. 25) warns priests that the appointment to permanent rectorships rests with the bishop, and that no right of preferment is acquired by serving as assistant priest on a mission or even administering it temporarily. On appointment to a parish, an irremovable rector must make a profession of faith. Whether the same obligation rests on removable rectors is disputed by canonists. The profession of faith is explicitly demanded of all rectors by the First Council of Westminster, but there has been no such pronouncement for the United States. The Decree of Pius X "Sacrum Antistitum" (1 Sept., 1910) is, of course, binding everywhere. All priests serving in the United States are bound by the statutes of some dioceses. By the law of the Holy See, the statutes of some dioceses require the bishop's consent for one week's absence. As our rectors are not canonical parish priests, they are not bound to offer up the Mass gratuitously for their people on Sundays and holy days of obligation. In Ireland and Canada, however, this obligation rests on parish priests, though dispensations are commonly given from offering this Mass on suppressed holy days.

The duty of instructing the young in catechism is insisted on by the synods of Baltimore, and, especially in places where there are no parochial schools, this instruction is to be carried on by means of Sunday schools. Parochial schools are established in as many Catholic schools as possible, and they are exhorted to visit them frequently and see to their efficient management. They are also obliged to preach to their people and give them facility for approaching the sacraments. The Westminster Synod exhorts pastors to provide missions and spiritual retreats for their flocks. As our rectors are quasi-parish priests, they have jurisdiction similar to that of canonical parish priests conferred on them by various councils. As regards the sacraments, baptism should be conferred only in the parish to which the person belongs, and the contrary practice is strictly prohibited (H. Balt., No. 227); dispensations cannot be administered, even to his parishioners, by rectors serving in churches outside the parish limits. Though this would be a prerogative of a canonical parish priest, the Paschal Communion may be made in any public chapel or church, unless there be special legislation against it; Mass may be celebrated twice a day, with episcopal permission, when otherwise a considerable number of persons would be deprived of Mass on Sundays and holy days; matrimony is to be administered by one's own pastor for hecily; and when the contracting parties are of different parishes, it is usual for the bishop to designate a public place for the ceremonial. These requirements, however, do not affect the validity of the sacrament. As regards funeral rights of pastors, there is no special legislation for the United States, but the common law of the Church is usually followed. The administration of the Viaticum and extreme unction are right reserved to the pastor, and these rights remain even when the bishop appoints another in their stead. These parishes are required to keep registers of baptisms, marriages, confirmations, and interments. They are also exhorted to keep a liber status animarum as far as circumstances permit it. In some dioceses, the acceptance of a perpetual settlement for a daily or annual Mass is subject to the approval of the ordinary, which is to decide on the adequacy of the endowment.

C. Rectors and the Parochial Temporalities.—Pastors are the administrators of the parochial property, but their rights in this regard are subordinated to the episcopal authority, for the ordinary is the supreme administrator and guardian of the ecclesiastical temporalities of his diocese. A financial statement of the condition of the parochial property must consequently be made by the rector to the bishop whenever he requires it. Generally, an annual statement is to be made. Whatever regulations are laid down by the ordinary for the better administration of the temporalities and income of the parishes. When lay trustees are appointed to assist in the management of the parochial property, the rector must obtain the episcopal consent for such appointment. In the United States, no outfit exceeding three hundred dollars may be made by the trustees without the bishop's written authorization, if such outfit is for special objects other than the ordinary expenditures. The pastors must see that lay trustees clearly understand that they are in no sense owners of ecclesiastical property and that appropriation of it for their own use entails excommunication. Alienation of all ecclesiastical property, movable and immovable, is unlawful without the permission of the bishop. The value of the property must be a considerable value. In cases involving a sum of not more than five thousand dollars only the bishop's consent is necessary, provided he has the special faculties usually granted to American bishops to that effect. The penalty for unlawful alienation is excommunication ipso facto. The pastor should make a careful inventory of all the parochial property, and file one copy in the parish archives and send another to the bishop. In cases where the civil law would vest the title to church property in lay trustees, it may be necessary that the bishop should hold the temporalities in his own name for simple reason. It is very desirable that the same should be done by the pastors. As the rectors are the immediate custodians of the parochial property, it is their duty to keep it in proper repair. The Westminster Synods lay down clear and detailed rules in regard to the duty of rectors concerning church property. — "Whoever is set over the administration of a mission...should keep a day-book of all the receipts and expenses of the mission. This account should be kept in the mission and be kept every day in their proper order. He should also keep a ledger to which he will transfer, every month or three months, all the entries in the other book arranged in order, according to the heads under which each sum received or expended ought to be placed." "Every administrator should keep an open account in some bank in his own name and in the names of two honest persons. Let these know that they are taken only to prevent the money from any peril of loss and that they must not interfere in the administration. If one fail from any cause the two who remain shall take care to have another elected by the bishop to supply the place. The administrator should never keep for longer than ten days on hand more than 20L. of money belonging to the mission but he should deliver it to some immediate place in good time. "All buildings belonging to a mission should be insured against fire by an annual payment to some society for this purpose." "As soon as any priest enters on his mission let him receive an inventory of all things belonging to the mission from the vicar foran or from some one deputed by the bishop. He is bound to keep the furniture and buildings in good repair, yea, rather to improve them, that he may deliver to his successors as much, at least, as he received himself." "In every mission, the money contributed by the faithful (for rent sales, offertories, house to house collections and special collections)...is to be accounted church property and not as gifts given to the priest."—by the Constitution "Românes Pontifices", regulars administering missions must render an account to the bishop of all money given to them with a view to the mission.

Parium, titular see, suffragan of Cyzicus in the Heliospontus. The Acts of the martyr St. Onesiphorus prove that there was a Christian community there before 180. Other saints worthy of mention are: Meningus, martyred under Decius and venerated on 22 November; Theogonus, bishop and martyr, whose feast is observed on 3 January; Basil, bishop and martyr in the ninth century, venerated on 12 April. Le Quen (Oriens christ., I, 787–90) mentions 14 bishops, the last of whom lived in the middle of the fourteenth century. An anonymous Latin bishop is mentioned in 1209 by Innocent III (Le Quen, op. cit., III, 945) and a titular bishop in 1410 by Eubel (Hier. Catholic med. avi, I, 410). At first a suffragan of Cyzicus, Parium was an autocephalous archdiocese as early as 640 (Gelzer, "Ungedruckte...Texte," 3:57). It was only 1749 that it was curbed by and became a suffragan of the see of Constantinople. Then the Emperor Andronicus II made it a metropolis under the title of Î½ββββς και Ηπαπλός. In 1354 Pege and Parium were suppressed, the metropolitan receiving in exchange the see of Sozopolis in Thrace (Mikiodisch and Muller, "Acta patriarchatus Constantinopolitanii", I, 109, 111, 122, 390, 330). This was the end of this episcopal see. The ruins of Parium are at the Greek village of Kamares (the vaults), on the small cape Tersana-Bournou in the caza and sandjak of Bigha.

PARK, Abbey of the, half a mile south of Louvain, Belgium, founded in 1129 by Duke Godfrey, sur- named "Barbatus", who possessed an immense park near Louvain and had invited the Norbertines to take possession of a small church he had built there. Walter, Abbot of St. Martin's, Lan, brought a colony of canons and was elected the first prior. The canons, however, continued to reside near their abbey for three years. The canons, now in sufficient number, elected Simon, a canon of Lan, as their abbot. The canons performed the general work of the monastery in the district of Louvain, bringing back those seduced by the errors of Tanchelín (see PREMONSTRATENSIAN CANONS). In 1157 the abbey was able to found the Abbey of Our Lady and SS. Cornelius and Cyprian at Ninove. Godfrey made the Abbot of the Park and his successors his arch-chaplains. Simon (d. 30 March, 1432) was succeeded by Philip whose learning and holiness may be judged from his correspondence with the University of Heidelberg (p. xii) in the archives of the Park Abbey. Philip and his successors enlarged the buildings and prepared the land for agriculture. At the time there was living at the abbey a canon, Blessed Rabado, whose devotion to the Passion was attested by miracles. Abbot Gerard van Goetsenhoven (1414-31) had much to do with the erection of the University of Louvain (q.v.), and was also delegated by Duke John to transact state affairs with the King of England and the Duke of Burgundy. Abbot van Tuldten (1602-94) was successful in his action against commendatory abbots being imposed on religious houses in Belgium. Abbot van den Berghe (1543-58) managed the contributions levied in support of the Belgian theodossists present at the resumed Council of Trent.

The abbey frequently suffered during the wars waged by William of Orange and the Calvinists, but was fortunate to have then at its head men of marked learning, zeal, and discretion, such as Loots (1577-1583), van Vlierden (1587-1601), De Vriendt (1601-1634), De Pape (1648-1652), van Tuyena (1682-1702). They all favoured higher education at the University of Louvain, and studies were in a flourishing state in the abbey. Under Joseph II, Emperor of Germany, the abbey was consecrated, because Abbot Wantz (d. 23 Nov., 1782) refused to send his religious to the general synodaries ejected by the emperor. The revolution against the emperor's injustices being successful, the religious returned to their abbey. Wantz was succeeded by Melchior Nysmans (1793-1810). Under the French Republic the abbey was consecrated again on 1 Feb., 1797. At the request of the people the church was declared to be a parish church, and thus the abbey. The abbey was bought by a friendly layman who wished to preserve it for the religious, in better times. One of the canons, in the capacity of parish priest, remained in or near the abbey. When Belgium was made a kingdom and religious freedom restored, the surviving religious resumed the community life and elected Peter Ottoy, then rural dean of Diest, as their superior.

In 1857 the abbey undertook the foundation of a priory in Brazil. It counts at present (Jan., 1911) 48 religious; 8 of these are doing missionary work in Brazil. The canons of the Park Abbey published the following reviews: (1) "Anales de l'Ordre de Prémontré" (six times a year); (2) "L'Ordre de Prémontré et de ses missions" (six times a year); (3) "T Park's maandschrift" (monthly). Review of Agriculture and Plantation Science. N° 4, 1890. ...
Italiana", of which five volumes appeared between 1848 and 1874; the next five were issued by T. Curmel (to 1894) with the assistance of Parlatore's MS. This work stands in high repute among all botanists. Mention should also be made of "Lezioni di botanica comparata" (Florence, 1843) and "Monographia delle funarie" (Florence, 1841). To the sixteenth volume of Theophrastus there was added the "Leack besides di manuscriptos, contains the accounts of the confineri and gremiace; to Webb's "Histoire naturelle des îles Canaries" (Paris, 1836-50), the accounts of the umbelligeri and gramine. In 1842 Boissier, the botanist, named a genus of crucifers "Parlatoria."

Parma, Diocese of, Central Italy. The city is situated on the river of the same name, an affluent of the Po, flowing through a fertile plain, where grain and vines are cultivated; it also contains many fine pastures; the silk culture is highly developed, as also the cheese, tobacco, and leather industries.

The cathedral was begun in 1060, to replace the ancient one destroyed by fire two years earlier; finished in 1074, it was dedicated in 1106 by Paschal II. It is a fine example of the Lombard style, in the shape of a Latin Cross, with three aisles; the tiers of windows are well proportioned; a bright aspect to the façade; the cupola, of the sixteenth century, is adorned with frescoes by Correggio, Parmigianino (Girolamo Mazzuola), and other masters; the inlaid wood and the carvings of the choir and of the sacristy are by Lodinara and the Consorzialis; there are four statues by Giacomo and Danianino da Gonzate; the choir of the high altar, with its beautiful sculptures, is of the fifteenth century; in the crypt is the tomb of the Bishop St. Bernardo, with sculptures by Prospero Clementi. The baptistery is separate, in the shape of an irregular octagon, and was begun in 1106 by the architect and sculptor Benedetto Antelami.

Other churches of note are: San Giovanni Evangelista, formerly of the Benedictines, founded in 981, restored in 1510, façade by Simone Moschino (1604), contains the best paintings of Correggio and Mazzuola; the Steccata (1521), by Zaccagni, on the plan of a Greek cross, with a majestic cupola, containing pictures, supported by square columns; the Abbazia, in which there are frescoes by Correggio; Santa Maria del Quartiere, the cupola of which was painted by Bambelli; S. Rocco; S. Antonio; S. Scipione contains works by Baglioni, Ciganaro, and Mazzola; and the Oratorio di S. Lodovico, formerly the ducale chapel. Among the palaces are: del Giardino (1551), with frescoes by Carracci; della Piostra (1507), with a museum of antiquities, and a gallery of paintings especially rich in works by Correggio; and the Biblioteca Palatina, containing 363,586 volumes, 4,700 manuscripts and 60,000 copper engravings. There are monuments in honour of Correggio and Parmigianino on the façade; the Abbazia, was the site of the court of the Papal States; it should be said that John of Bohemia had previously held it as a fief of the Holy See; but from 1515 to 1521, the city was again in the hands of the King of France. In 1545, Paul III erected Parma and Piacenza into a duchy, in favour of his son Pier Luigi Farnese; then began Parma, an era of splendour, during which Correggio (Allegri), Mazzola, and other famous masters showered treasures of art upon it. Pier Luigi, loved by the people and hated by the nobles, fell at Piacenza, 10 Sept., 1547, the victim of a conspiracy directed by Ferrante Gonzaga, imperial Governor of Milan. The garrison of Parma prevented the city from falling into the power of Ferrante, as Piacenza fell; and after long negotiations with the emperor, the son of Pier Luigi, Ottavio, was confirmed in the duchy by Julius III in 1550. That prince governed wisely, and a conspiracy against him by Count Landi was happily frustrated.

He was succeeded in 1558 by Alessandro Farnese, who became famous in the armies of France, and who died of a wound at Arras, in 1592. Ranuccio enlarged the state and protected study, founding a college of nobles; his son Odoardo, in 1622, succeeded to the duchy, which was governed during his minority by his mother Margherita and his uncle Cardinal Odoardo, as regents. During this reign there arose the contention with the Barberini for possession of the Duchy of Castro, an ancient fief of the Farnese, and that strife ended in the destruction of Castro, in 1649 under the son of Ranuccio II (1646-94). Duke Francesco, having died without children, was succeeded by his brother Antonio (1727-31), who died without issue; and the line of the house of Farnese expired, the Duchy was converted into a fief of the Holy See by the Peace of the Spanish Succession. By the treaty of Seville, the duchy was given to Charles of Bourbon, son of Philip V of Spain and Isabella Farnese (daughter of Francesco); and when Charles ascended the throne of Naples, the Peace of Vienna gave Parma to Austria (1736); the battle of Parma, 1734; but the intrigue of Isabella did not cease until the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle had given the Duchy of Parma and Piacenza, enlarged with that of Guastall, to her other son Philip (1749). This prince inaugurated a French absolutism in the duchy, especially at the expense of the Church. In 1765 he fell from his power, was transferred to Lisbon, and died there. Under Ferdinand II (1763-1802) relations with the Holy See grew still more strained; in imitation of the French court, he first concentrated, and then suppressed the religious houses, and was supported against Rome by the other Bourbon courts. In 1802 the duchy was annexed to the French republic, in 1814 it was given to Marie Louise, wife of Napoleon, against whom a revolution broke out in 1831, but was quickly suppressed by Austrian troops. Marie Louise was succeeded by Carlo Lodovico, Duke of Lecce, against whom a new revolution broke out in 1818, and the city was occupied by the Piedmontese. On the other hand, Carlo II abdicated in favour of his son Carlo III (1818-1859), whom the Piedmontese defeated at Novara, the Austrians placed Carlo III on the throne of Parma, but he was stabbed to death in 1834, and in 1839 his son Robert was dethroned, while the annexation of his state to Piedmont was decreed.

The first known Bishop of Parma is Urbano, a partisan of the antipope Urbius, and deposed by Pope Damasus in 358. Other bishops were: Gratianos (650); Lantpertus (827); Wilibodus (680-71), who bore important charges from Louis II and his successors; Aicardus in 920 restored the cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire; Sigfriedus, a former chancellor of King Hugo, accompanied in 937 Hugo's daughter Berta, the promised bride of Constantine II, to whom Barthanus di Verona dedicated his "De contemptu canona"; Cadalobus obtained his see through simony, and became the antipope Honorius II, while remaining Bishop of Parma; his successor, Everardo (1073), was a partisan of the anti-pope Clement III, in whose interest Everardo even resorted to arms, but was defeated at Sanvitale on the 13th of July (1075), and in 1081, after the death of Everardo, was succeeded by his nephew, the Abbot of Vallombrosa and a cardinal; St. Bernard, however, in 1104, was dragged violently from the altar, and driven from his see, to which he was not able to return peacefully until 1108; in 1110 he resigned the see to the bishops of the diocese and, having opposed the coronation of Conrad (1127) was again obliged to flee from Parma, and died in 1133; Aicardo, a partisan of Barbarossa, and therefore deposed (1167); Obizzo Fieschi, an uncle of Innocent IV; Gratian (1224), professor of law at Bologna; Alberto (1261), and his brother, Obizzo (1250), nephews of Innocent IV; Obizzo exerted himself greatly for the reform of morals, favoured the "Militia di Gesù Cristo", and exposed the see of the Apostolici, founded by the Parmesan Gherardo Scaggeoli; Ugo Alino (1522) was obliged to flee from Parma, with his father Guglielmo, on account of the latter's religious opinions. Antonio di Prospero, canon of the cathedral of S. Giorgio (1500) a learned cardinal; Alessandro Farnese (1560), became Pope Paul III, he resigned the see of Parma in favour of his nephew, Cardinal Alessandro; Alessandro Sirza (1560), who distinguished himself at the Council of Trent: Ferrante Farnese, (1573) active in the cause of ecclesiastical reform; Camillo Miilliezzi (1771), who governed the diocese during forty-eight years; Vincenzo Tarchi (1788), a Capuchin who wrote beautiful pastoral and homilies; Cardinal Francesco Caselli (1801), a former superior of the Servites and a companion of Consalvi during the negotiations of the Concordat with Napoleon; at the national council of Paris in 1811, he defended the rights of the Holy See.

The diocese, a suffragan of Milan, and later of Ravenna (1582), depends immediately on the Holy See since 1815; it has 206 parishes, 232,943 inhabitants, 9 religious houses of men, 18 of women, 3 educational establishments for male students, 5 for girls, 1 bi-weekly periodical ("Giornale di popolo") and 2 monthly magazines ("Eocco, Lede e Civiltà").

he never finished the Steccata commission. His passion for alchemy not only cost him time, money, and health, but prevented him from keeping his engagements. As he had been paid part in advance, the Steccata Confraternity, weary of waiting, had him prosecuted and condemned to prison in 1557. Released upon promise to finish the work, he again defaulted, and made his escape to Casal Maggiore, where he died. He was buried in the church of the Servites.

Brief as was his career, H. Parmigiano has left a very large number of works: at Bologna (Pinacoteca), "Virgin and Child with Saints", "St. Margaret", "Martha and Mary"; at Florence (Uffizi), "La Madonna (Uffizi) portrait of himself, and "Holy Family"; at Genoa (Palazzo Rosso), "Marriage of St. Catherine"; at Modena (Museum), "Apollo and Marsyas"; at Naples (Museum), "Annunciation", "Holy Family", "St. Sebastian", "Lucretia", and some portraits; at Parma (Museum), "St. Catherine with Angels", "Madonna with Saints"; (Annunziata) "Baptism of Christ", "St. Bernardino", "Holy Family", "Entry of Christ into Jerusalem", besides the Steccata frescoes, several paintings in San Giovanni Evangelista, and a "History of Diana", in the Villa Sanvitale; at Rome (Barberini Palace), "Marriage of St. Catherine"; (Borghese Palace), portrait of Cesare Borgia (formerly attributed to Raphael and then to Bronzino) and St. Catherine at Berlin (Museum), "Baptism of Christ"; at Dresden (Museum), "Virgin and Child", "Madonna of the Rose"; in London (National Gallery), "Vision of St. Jerome"; at Madrid (Prado), "Holy Family", "St. Barbara", "Cupid", and two portraits; in Paris (Louvre), two "Holy Families"; at St. Petersburgh (Hermitage), "Burial of Christ"; at Vienna (Belvedere) "Cupid with Bow", St. Catherine, his own portrait, and several others. He also left some engravings, among them seven Holy Families, a Resurrection, "Judith with the Head of Holophernes", and "St. Peter and John Healing the Lame Man".

Parmigiano developed the germ of decay latent in Correggio's work. He delighted his contemporaries with ingenious contrasts, elegant mannerisms, and sensual frivolity. His religious pictures are deficient in gravity and sincerity; being, in many cases—like the "Madonna del Cello Longo"—types of false distinction and pretentious affectation. His St. Catherine (Borghese Palace) declines the comment of a "piece of good breeding which is beyond description" (Burckhardt). These faults are less pronounced in such profane works as the frescoes of the Villa Sanvitale; and in portraiture, where he is inspired by no factitious ideal, they disappear altogether. The very name of Parmigiano, says Ch. Blume, "which the Italians like to write in the diminutive form, seems to say that this master has his unerring fables, and is a great master diminished" (grand maître diminué).

Parnassus, a titular see in Cappadocia Secunda, suffragan of Moesecus. Situated between Antioch and Archelaus, it was formerly important. According to Trajan led to Nyssa. It is mentioned by Polyeidus (XXV, iv) and the Itineraries; in the sixth century by Hierocles, "Synedraemus" (700, 7). Hamilton places it at Kitec Hisar, near Tonz Gheul (ancient Lake Tatta), vilayet of Angora; Ramsay (Asia Minor, 296), north-east of this lake on the left bank of the Bilazmak (ancient Haly's), near Telikin Aghyl. The see first depended on Cesarea; under Valens it passed to Cappadocia Secunda; and about 536 was made suffragan of Moesecus. The "Notitiae Episcopatuum" mention it in the thirteenth century. Le Quien (Oriens christianus, 1, 415) mentions nine bishops: Cononus, at the Arian Council of Philippopolis, 344; Hylas, in the time of St. Basil; Olympius, at the Council of Constantinople, 381; Eustathius, at Ephesus, 341, deposed as a Nestorian, retracted, assisted at Constantinople (418) and Chalcedon (451); and signed in 458 the letter of the bishops of Cappadocia Secunda to the Emperor Leo; Pelagius, at Constantinople, 558; Eustathius, at the Council in "Trullo", 692; Stephanus, at Nicaea, 787; and Theognostus, at Constantinople, 860.

Parochial Mass.—The parish is established to provide the parishioners with the helps of religion, especially with Mass. The parochial Mass is celebrated for their welfare on all Sundays and holidays of obligation, even when suppressed. The parish priest is not obliged to say it personally; but if he does not, he must offer his own Mass for that intention. Parishioners now fulfil their duty by attending Mass in any church; but formerly they had at least to hear a Mass in the parish church (eh. "Vivès", 2; "De traqua et precibus", in "Extrav. Comm.", of Sixtus IV, 1478). This obligation fell into desuetude owing to the privileges granted to the religious orders; the Council of Trent (Sess. XXII, "De observ. et excit. in celeb. miss." and Sess. XXIV, c. iv, de ref.), treats it only as a counsel, and notwithstanding certain provincial and diocesan regulations of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the obligation ceased (Bened. XIV, "De syn.", XI, xiv). The Mass not being strictly conventional, it is not obligatory by common law for it to be sung, but it may be, and frequently this is prescribed by the statutes or custom. It is then preceded by the blessing and aspersion of water on Sundays. Even if not sung, it is celebrated with additional solemnity, with more than two candles on the altar, and two servers (8, R. Cit., 6 Feb., 1858, n. 3065). What is characteristic of it is the instruction, with its special prayers, the announcements made to the congregation, the publication of banns of marriage, and finally the familiar sermon or homily. Parcopolis, a titular see of Macedonia, suffragan of Thessalonica. It is mentioned by Polyeidus (III, 13, 30) as being in Sintire, a part of Macedonia, and by Phlegon (ibid., 61, 132), but is not found in the Notitiae Episcopatuum. The see was next visited by Hierocles (Synedraemus, 639, 8) and Constantine Per-phylogenous (De thematibus, 2) call it Parthiopolis, but the second locates it in Thrace. Stephanus Byzantius calls it Parthenopolis and relates according to Theagenes the legend of its foundation by Heracle, son of Mygdon, said to have named the city in honor of his two daughters, and, like (V, x) has the same name, but places it in Thrace. Its bishop, Jonas or John, assisted at the Council of Sardica (312 or 313); at the Council of Chalcedon (451) there was present John "Parthiopolis prince Macedonien" (Le Quien, "Oriens christianus", II, 75). This see is not mentioned in any of the Greek "Notitiae episcopatum".

Parrenin, Dominique, b. at Russey, near Bosançon, 1 Sept., 1635; d. at Pekin, 29 Sept., 1711. He entered the Jesuit order 1 September, 1655, and in 1657 was sent to China. At Pekin (1658) he attracted the attention of Kang-hi. His varied knowledge, and familiar use of the court languages, Chinese and Tartar-Manchou, gained him the good-will of the emperor. Father Parrenin utilized this favour in the interest of religion and science. While satisfying the extraordinary curiosity of Kang-hi, especially about the history of the world, he demonstrated how the scientific culture of the West was due to Christianity. Obliged to travel with the emperor, he visited the native Christians. Well liked by important personages at the court and the highest dignitaries of the empire, he led them to look with favour on the spreading of Christianity. In the "Lettres édifiantes," he has written of the admirable examples set by the princes of the Soumon family, whose conversion, begun by Father Suarez, he completed. He rendered the greatest services to religion during the reign of Yong-teih (1623-35), son of Kang-hi. The new emperor soon made known his aversion to Christianity and only his consideration for the missionaries at Pekin, principally for Father Parrenin, prevented the extermination of Christianity in China. This emperor respected the missionaries, not for their scientific knowledge, but for their characters and virtues. He demanded services of more tangible importance, notably at audiences granted to the Jesuits, but he consented and only his consent for the missionaries at Pekin, so capably in this dual role, was no less serviceable under Yong-teih. He was assisted by his conférences, Fathers Maila and Gaubil. The mission at Pekin continued to exist amid most violent persecutions, and became the salvation of the Christians of the provinces; as long as Christianity sustained itself in the capital, its position in the rest of the empire was not endangered. So little pressure was he subjected to apply the edicts in all their rigour against a religion which the emperor tolerated in his capital, and against men whose conférences the emperor treated with honour.

Science is indebted to Parrenin for his services in drawing up the great map of China (see RETS, JEAN-BAPTISTE). He reigned in Kang-hi a desire to see his entire domain represented by methods more exact than those of the Chinese cartographers. Father Parrenin had a hand in the preparations for the making of this map in the Provinces of Pechili, Shan-tung, and Kwantung. He also collaborated on a map of China and of the Tartar-Manchou regions, which the emperor caused to be made in 1700. He translated into the Tartar-Manchou language for Kang-hi several of the works published in the "Mémoires de l'Académie des Sciences" at Paris. In 1723 Doutoux de Mairan, of the Académie des Sciences, and Fréret, perpetual secretary of the Académie des Inscriptions, sent him their "doutes" about the history, chronology, and astronomy of the Chinese. His answers led to other questions, and this scientific correspondence continued until 1740. Father Parrenin's conduct may not have been always above reproach during the agitation caused in the Chinese missions by the famous controversy about the rites (see China; The Question of Rituals). But his whole life contradicts the odious character attributed to him by writers who edited with more passion than truth the "Mémoires du Cardinal de Tournon" and the "Anecdotes sur l'État de la Religion en la Chine".

PARTNERSHIP

...industrial arts and trades. They thus became a regular part of the population of Surat, adopted the Guzerati language as their vernacular, and erected their first fire temple in A.D. 721. Here they remained for over five centuries of uneventful history, till in 1305 the incursion of the Moslems forced them to take refuge elsewhere. Partly by further emigrations from Persia, and partly by spreading from their centre at Surat, the Parsis moved to other parts of India, such as Cambay, Ankleshwar, Varsar, Vankaner, Broach, Surat, Thana, Chaul etc., and traces of them are found even as far as Delhi. When in the sixteenth century the Portuguese at Thana brought moral pressure to bear in order to make them Christians, they managed by a descent to escape to Kalyan, only to return in 1774 when Thana had fallen under British rule. The advent of the English to Surat in 1612 opened up new connexions for industry and trade, so that Surat, as well as Broach, soon became two of their chief settlements. Finally, when the government of the East India Company was (in 1668) transferred to Bombay, the Parsis followed and soon began to occupy posts of trust in connexion with Government and public works in Bombay. Gradually certain families acquired wealth and prominence (Soraji, Mody, Kama, Wadia, Jeejeebhoy, Readymoney, Dadesest, Petit, Patel, Mehta, Alibees, Tata etc.), many of whom are noted for their participation in the public life of the city. Against Robinson’s “ecclesiastical, industrial, and charitable enterprises. The Parsis had formerly a domestic tribunal called the Pancharat, which possessed judicial control and the power of excommunication; but for nearly a century back its influence has been curtailed, so that at present it is little more than a trust for the administration of public charitable funds.

The education movement began among the Parsis in 1849. Parsi schools since then have been multiplied, but other schools and colleges are also frequently frequented. In 1854 they started the “Parsian Zoroastrian Amelioration Fund,” which, after long efforts lasting till 1882, succeeded in obtaining for their poor Iranibuddin in Persia a remission of the Jazia tax, besides inaugurating schools and charitable institutions among them. Many of these Persians come over to India and set up cheap restaurants, which on that account are familiarly known as “Irani shops.”

The Parsis are divided into two sects, the Shehan-chaudhurn, or old Parsis, and the new Parsis of foreign parentage—not on any point of religion, but merely on a question of chronology (like that of the “old” and “new” style in Europe). The old party follow the Indian, and the new party the Persian way of framing the calendar, which makes a difference of about one month in the observance of their “New Year’s day.” Among solemn peculiarities should be mentioned: worship in fire temples (which contain nothing remarkable except a vase of sandalwood kept perpetually alight); praying on the sea shore to the rising and setting sun; celebration of marriages in public assembly; exposure of their dead to birds of prey, in what are called “towers of silence”; exclusion of non-Parsis refused to incorporate aliens into religious membership; the rule of never uncovering the head; and of never smoking. But they are free from the Hindu trimmings of caste, have no religious restrictions about food, are free to travel and take their meals with other races etc. It should be remarked that their very settled of castes as explained by themselves, is not open to the charge of idolatry, but is reversible to a relative veneration of that element as the highest and purest symbol of the Divinity. The Parsis have remained faithful to their Zoroastrian faith, and are proud of their racial purity. And although the colour among many families, chiefly of the lower classes, reveals the effect of mixed marriages, the community as a whole is unmixed, and marriage with outsiders is rare. In very recent times the influence of Western ideas has led to a relaxing of the old religious and social bonds, so that many are now merely nominal believers, while others dabble in theological and religious eclecticism, and adopt such habits as smoking, the uncovering of the head, and even marrying European women etc. For an account of their religion see “Parsis.”

Partnership, an unincorporated association of two or more persons, known as partners, having for its object the carrying on in common by the partners of some predetermined occupation for profit, such profit, according to the usual definition, to be shared by the several partners. The “terms partnership and partner,” remarks Lindley (The Law of Partnership, 7th ed., London, 1905, 10), “are evidently derived from to part in the sense of to divide amongst or share,” and the use of the word “co-partnership” in the general sense of “co-ownership” is now obsolete (Queen against Robien in English Law Reports, 10 Queen’s Bench Division, 140). Lindley, however, suggests that an association might be deemed according to the English Common Law a partnership even though its object were the application of profits to other use than the use of the partners (op. cit., where numerous definitions of partnership are quoted).

The Roman Civil Law treated elaborately of partnership under the name of Societas (Pothier, “Pandecte Justinianisme,” LXVII, Tit. 11). And archeologists claim to have ascertained its existence “in a highly developed state” in ancient Babylon (Johns, Babylonian and Assyrian Laws”, New York, 1904, 287, 290, 291).

Partnerships in the Roman Law were included among consensual contracts, those which required no certain form, nor any writing, but which became effectual by simple consent, qui mutuo consensu perficitur, “Pandecte,” supra. The Commentaries of Gain, 111 (Cambridge, 1874), 136, 137, “the law of all British possessions, except those acquired from France, Holland, and Spain (Burge, “Commentaries on Colonial and Foreign Laws”, new ed., London, 1907, 7, 8), partnership may be formed by verbal agreement, although it is usually evidenced by written articles (see as to Statute of Frauds rendering a written agreement necessary, 116 New York Court of Appeals Reports, 97).

The contract of partnership can be legally entered into only by persons who are competent to contract. According to foreign law, a partnership could not be formed at Common Law between husband and wife (Bower against Bradford, 140 Massachusetts Supreme Court Reports, 521).

The English Law of partnership was itself to a great extent founded on what was known as the “Law Merchant”, and thus on foreign ideas as to matters of trade; and the customs of merchants drawn frequently from the Lombard or Jewish traders of the Continent, which became “by Statute Law, custom or court decision . . . such a considerable body of the English law as to have a name to itself” (Simson, “Popular Law-making”, New York, 1910, 73, 74), profit or gain is the object of the relation; but not necessarily profit or gain to result from buying or selling of goods. Lawyers, for example, may enter into partnership (Kent, “Commentaries on American Law”, III, 28). But since the pursuit of gain is essential to the legal notion of partnership, therefore, a young man’s Christian Association ‘defining its object to be’ the extension of the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ among young men, and the development of their spiritual life and mental powers, has been held to be not such an association as the law deems to be a partnership (Queen against Robson, supra). The title of the association, the partnership or firm name, if not prescribed by express agreement, may be required by usage.

These expressions “firm” and “partnership” are frequently employed synonymously. Originally, however, the word firm signified “the partners or members of the partnership taken collectively” (Parsons, “A treatise on the Law of partnership”, 4th ed., Boston, 1890). In the English Partnership Law of 1800 “partners are called collectively a firm” (Lindley, op. cit., 10); a. a. Parsons (op. cit., 2) remarks that “the business world” regards the firm “as a body which has independent rights against its members as well as against strangers”. This distinction sanctioned by the law of Louisiana, and also by the laws of those States where jurisprudence is based on the Roman Civil Law, has not always been so clearly recognized by the English Courts (ibid., 3; Lindley, op. cit., 127, 128). According to the Common Law, the property, or stock in trade, of the firm is owned by the partners in joint tenancy, but without the right of survivorship which ownership in joint tenancy implies by an act of law”, this marks Kent, op. cit., 11, 36, “according to Lord Coke was part of the law merchant for the advancement and continuance of commerce and trade”.

It is of the essence of the contract that each partner shall “engage to bring into the common stock something that is valuable”; but one of the partners may assign his share to either another partner or the firm (ibid., 24, 25). And the proportions of their respective interests in the property are such as they may have agreed (Parsons, op. cit., 15).

In the course of the business of the partnership and within its scope, every partner “is virtually both a principal and an agent” (Cox against Hickman, 8 How. 312). His chief function is to be both an “officer” and a “guerra di Cipro” (1550-72) and the “Storia Veneziana”, a continuation of Benoî's history, embracing the years 1543 to 1551, works composed at the request of the Government, but written with truth and impartiality, showing especially the connexion between the current events of Venice and the general history of Europe. His “Descrizioni” (1612), which at the end of his diplomatic mission revealed his great political foresight, by his accurate estimate of men and affairs at Rome, and which are equal to those of the greatest Venetian ambassadors. Of his political writings, the "Della perfeczione della vita politica" in dialogue form, written between 1572 and 1579, has a somewhat dubious face and according to the Venetian Manualists, the superior relative superiority of the active and contemplative life, a problem he decides in favor of the active life on account of its contributing more to the welfare of the Republic. It was supposed, not without reason, to have been written to controvert the ideas contained in Bellarmine’s “De officio principis christiani”. His Discorsi politici were not published till after his death. The first book treats of the greatness and decadence of the Romans; the second of modern governments, especially Venice, being really an apology for the latter’s policy. Though Paruta is an independent thinker, Machiavelli’s influence is notable. The policy of Italian equilibrium, which a century later was employed by the powers of Europe, was nearly foreshone by him. In his political views economy is not an important part, and therein he is inferior to his contemporary, the Piedmontese Botero.
Pascal, Blaise, b. at Clermont-Ferrand, 19 June, 1623; d. in Paris, 19 August, 1662. He was the son of Étienne Pascal, advocate at the court of Aids of Clermont, and of Antoinette Bégon. His father, a man of fortune, went with his children (1631) to live in Paris. He taught his son grammar, Latin, Spanish, and mathematics, all according to an original method. In his twelfth year Blaise composed a treatise on the communication of sounds; at sixteen another treatise, on comic sections. In 1639 he went to Rouen with his father, who had been appointed his tutor of Novodevichy, but in his father's calculations, he invented the arithmetical machine. He repeated Torricelli's vacuum experiments and demonstrated, against Père Noël, the weight of air (cf. Mathieu, "Revue de Paris", 1906; Abel Lefranc, "Revue Bléue", 1906; Strowski, "Pascal", Paris, 1908). He published works on the arithmetical triangle, on wagers and the theory of probabilities, and on the roulette or eyecold.

Meanwhile, in 1646, he had been won over to Jansenism, and induced his family, especially his sister Jacqueline, to follow in the same direction. In 1650, after a sojourn in Avignon, his family returned to Paris. On the advice of physicians Pascal, who had always been ailing and who now suffered more than ever, relaxed his labours and mingled in society, with such friends as the Duc de Roanne, the Chevalier Méré, the poet Desbarreaux, the actor Miton. This was what has been called the worldly period of his life, during which he must have written the "Discours sur les passions de l'âme", inspired, it is said, by Mlle de Roanne. But the world soon became distasteful to him, and he felt more and more impelled to abandon it. During the night of 23 November, 1654, his doubts were settled by a sort of vision, the evidence of which is in a writing, always subsequently carried in the lining of his coat, and called "Pascal's talisman". After this he practiced the most severe asceticism, renounced learning, and became the constant guest of Port Royal. In 1656 he undertook the defense of Jansenism, and published the "Provinciales". This polemical work was near completion when Pascal had the joy of seeing his friends, the Descartes in an ecstasy of joy the Holy Thorn was conveyed to Jansenism, as well as his niece Marguerite Perier, who had been cured of a fistula of the eye by contact with a relic of the Holy Thorn preserved at Port Royal. Thenceforth, although exhausted by illness, Pascal gave himself more and more to God. He multiplied his mortifications, wore a cut-out of nails which he drove into his flesh at the slightest thought of vanity, and to be more like Jesus crucified, he left his own house and went to die in that of his brother-in-law. He wrote the "Mystère de Jésus", a sublime memorial of his transports of faith and love, and he laboured to collect the materials for a great apologetic work. He died at the age of thirty-nine, after having received the Viaticum, and his body was brought to Montauté, as well as his niece Marguerite Perier, for which he had several times asked, crying out as he half rose from his couch: "May God never abandon me!"

Pascal left numerous scientific works, among which must be mentioned "Essai sur les coniques" (1649); "Avies à ceux qui veulent la machine arithmétique" (1655); "Récit de la grande expérience de l'équilibre des liqueurs" (1648); "Traité du triangle arithmétique" (1654). He shows himself a determined advocate of the experimental method, in opposition to the mathematical and mechanical method of Descartes. In his "Traité sur la vie", often reprinted with his "Pensées", written in a style less bold and "en matière de philosophie", Pascal clearly puts the question regarding progress, which he answers, boldly yet prudently, in "L'esprit géométrique", where he luminously distinguishes between the geometrical and the acute mind, and establishes the foundations of the art of persuasion. As to his authorship of the "Discours sur les passions de l'âme", that essay at least contains certain theories familiar to the author of the "Pensées" on the part played by intuition in sentiment and aesthetic, and its style for the most part resembles that of Pascal. The "Entretien avec M. de Saci sur Épistéte et Montaigne" gives the key to the "Pensées"; psychology serving as the foundation and criterion of apologetics, various philosophies solving the problem only in one aspect, and Christianity alone affording the complete solution.

But Pascal's two masterpieces are the "Provinciales" and the "Pensées". The occasion of the "Provinciales" was an accident. The Duc de Liancourt, a friend of Port Royal, having been refused absolution by the curé of Saint Sulpice. Antoine Arnauld wrote two letters which were censured by the Sorbonne. Pascal wished to appeal to the public in a pamphlet which he submitted to his friends, but they found it too heavy and theological. He then said to Pascal: "You who are young, must do something."

The next day (23 Jan., 1656, Pascal brought the first "Provinciales". The "Petits lettres" followed to the number of nineteen, the last unfinished, from January, 1656, to March, 1657. Appearing under the pseudonym of Loui de Montalte, they were published at Cologne in 1657 as "Les Provinciales, ou Lettres écrites par Louis de Montalte à un provincial de ses amis et au R. P. Jésuites sur le sujet de la morale et de la politique de ces prêts". The first four treat the dogmatic question which forms the basis of Jansenism on the agreement between grace and human liberty. Pascal answers it by practically, if not theoretically, denying sufficient grace and liberty. The seventeenth and eighteenth letters take up the same questions, but with noteworthy qualifications. From the fourth to the sixteenth Pascal censures the Jesuit moral code, or rather the casuistry, first, by depicting a man who, through silly vanity, reveals to him the pretended secrets of the Jesuit policy, and then by direct invective against the Jesuits themselves. The most famous are the fourth, on sins of ignorance, and the thirteenth, on homicide, where he says that Pascal's own father led this to be a useful work, his whole life bears witness, as do his deathbed declarations. His good faith cannot seriously be doubted, but some of his methods are more questionable. Without ever seriously altering his citations from the casuists, as he has sometimes been wrongfully accused of doing, he advances them somewhat disingenuously; he simplifies complicated questions excessively, and, in setting forth the solutions of the casuists sometimes lets his own bias interfere. But the gravest reproach against him is, first, that he unjustly blamed the Society of Jesus, attacking it exclusively, and attributing to it a desire to lower the Christian ideal and to soften the moral nature of the Idealism in it; then that he discarded casuistry itself by refusing to recognize its legitimacy or, in certain cases, its necessity.
so that not only the Jesuits, but religion itself suffered by this strife, which contributed to hasten the condignation of certain lax theories by the Church. And, with not wishing or ever knowing it, Pascal furnished weapons on the one hand to unbelievers and adversaries of the Church and on the other to the partisans of independence. As to their literary form, the "Pensées" are an unfinished work. From his conversion to Jansenism Pascal nourished the project of writing an apology for the Christian Religion which the increasing number of libertines rendered so necessary at that time. He had elaborated the plan, and at intervals during his illness he jotted down notes, fragments, and instructions for his book. In 1670 Port Royal issued an incomplete edition. Condorcet, on the advice of Voltaire, attempted, in 1776, to connect Pascal with the Philosophical party by means of a garbled edition, which was opposed by that of the Abbé Bouvet (1779). After a famous report of Cousin on the MS. of the "Pensées" (1842), Faugère published an edition (1848) authorized then by a host of others; the best of which is undoubtedly that of Michaut (Basle, 1896), which reproduces the original MS. pure and simple. What Pascal's plan was, can never be determined, despite the information furnished by Port Royal and by his sister. It is certain that his method of apologies must have been at once methodical and based on the method of the traditional proofs—namely, the historical argument from prophecies and miracles. But as against adversaries who did not admit historical certainty, it was a stroke of genius to produce a wholly psychological argument and, by starting from the study of the human soul, to arrive at God. Man is an "incomprehensible machine" that, by his own act, great- ness and sovereign misery. Neither dogmatism nor pyrrhonism will solve this enigma: the one explains the greatness of man, the other his misery; but neither explains both. We must listen to God. Christianity alone, through the doctrine of the Full and that of the Incarnation, gives the key to the mystery. Christianity, therefore, is truth. God being thus apprehended and felt by the heart—which "has its reasons that the mind knows not of"—and which, amid the confusion of the other faculties is never mistaken—it remains for us to go to Him through the will by making acts of faith even before we have faith.

Another curious anagram is that which is known as the argument of the wager. God exists or He does not exist, and we must of necessity lay odds for or against Him.

If I wager for \[ \text{and God is—inefinite gain;} \]

\[ \text{and God is—no less.} \]

If I wager against

\[ \text{and God is—inefinite loss;} \]
\[ \text{and God is—not—neither loss nor gain.} \]

In the second case there is an hypothesis wherein I am exposed to the loss of everything. Wisdom, therefore, counsels me to make the wager which ensures my winning all or, at worst losing nothing. Innumerable works were devoted to Pascal in the second half of the nineteenth century. Poets, critics, romancer-writers, theologians, philosophers have drawn their inspiration from him or made him the subject of discussion. As M. Bourget has said, he is not only one of the princes of style, but he represents the religious soul in its most tragic and veiled aspects. Moreover, the problem which he presents are precisely those which confront men nowadays.

Pascal Baylon, Saint, b. at Torre-Hermosa, in the Kingdom of Aragon, 24 May, 1558, on the Feast of Pentecost, called in Spain "the Pasch of the Holy Ghost," whence the name of Paschal; d. at Vila Viçosa, 15 May, 1590. His parents, Martin Baylon and Elizabeth Jabera, were virtuous peasants. The child began very early to display signs of that surpassing devotion towards the Holy Eucharist, which forms the salient feature of his character. From his seventh to his twenty-fourth year, he led the life of a shepherd, and during the whole of that period exercised a solitary influence upon his companions. He was then received as a lay-brother amongst the Franciscan friars of the Alcantarist Reform. In the cloister, Paschal's life of contemplation and self-sacrifice fulfilled the promise of his early years. His charity to the poor and afflicted, and his unfailling courtesy were remarkable. On one occasion, in the course of a journey through France, he triumphantly defended the dogma of the Real Presence against the blasphemies of a Calvinist preacher, and in consequence, narrowly escaped death at the hands of a Huguenot mob. Although poorly educated, his counsel was sought for by people of every station in life, and he was on terms of close friendship with a journey through France. He was beatified in 1618, and canonized in 1690. His cultus has flourished particularly in his native land and in Southern Italy, and it was widely diffused in Southern and Central America, through the Spanish Conquests. In his Apostolic letter, Provenientissimas Doce, Leo XIII declared St. Paschal, along with Condorcet, a Royalist, the French Republic, an unoriginal Congress and Associations. His feast is kept on 17 May. The saint is usually depicted in adoration before a vision of the Host.

Pasch or Passover.—Jews of all classes and ages look forward to the Passover holidays with the same eagerness as Christians do to Christmas. It is for them the great event of the year. With the exception of the Temple sacrifices, their manner of observing it differs but little from that which obtained in the time of Christ. Directions for keeping the feast were carefully laid down in the Law (see Exod., xiii, xiv, etc.), and carried out with great exactness after the Exile.

The fast before the Passover begins on the fourteenth day of Nisan (a lunar month which roughly corresponds with the latter part of March and the first part of April) and ends with the twenty-first. The Jews, now, as in ancient times, make elaborate preparations for the festival. Every house is subjected to a thorough spring-cleaning. The Saturday preceding the day of the Pasch (fifteenth) is called a "Great Sabbath," because it is supposed that the tenth day of the month Abib (or Nisan), when the Israelites were to select the Paschal lambs, before their deliverance from Egypt, fell on a Sabbath. On this Sabbath, the day following the feast, the lamb is solemnly announced. Some days before the feast, culinary and other utensils to be used during the festival are carefully and legally purified from all contact with leaven, or leavened bread. They are then said to be kosher. Special sets of cooking and table utensils are not unfrequently kept in every house. hold. On the evening of the thirteenth, after dark, the head of the house makes the "search for leaven" according to the mitzvah (Tractate "Pessach"), i), which is probably the custom followed by the Jews for at least two thousand years. The search is made by means of a lighted wax candle. A piece of ordinary, or leavened, bread is left in some conspicuous place, generally on a window-sill. The house is then searched by a prayer containing a reference to the command to put away all leaven during the feast. The place of the piece of bread just mentioned is first marked to indicate the beginning of the search. The whole house is then carefully examined, and all fragments of leaven are carefully collected on a large spoon or scoop by means of a brush or other appropriate tools. Thefinds are then taken back to the piece of bread with which it began. This, also is collected on the scoop. The latter, with its contents, and the brush are then carefully tied up in a bundle and suspended over a lamp to prevent mice from scattering leaven during the night and necessitating a fresh search. The master of the house then proclaims in Aramaic that all the leaven that is in his house, of which he is unaware, is to him no more than dust. During the forenoon of the next day (fourth) each room that remains is burnt, and a similar declaration made. From this time till the evening of the 22nd, when the feast ends, only unleavened bread or matzoth are used.

The legal use of the leavened bread was prescribed in Exodus (XII. 17): "You shall eat unleavened bread in that month;" and again in Deuteronomy (X. 15): "You shall eat unleavened bread the seven days that pass away, and the unleavened cakes, and the matzoth, which I commanded you, shall you eat." The custom of keeping the Passover with a whole house is evidently an innovation of the Talmudic period, and was probably the result of a need to make the Passover a family celebration.

On this day, the fourteenth, the first-born son of each family, if he be above thirteen, fasts in memory of the deliverance of the first-born of the Israelites, when the destroying angel passed over Egypt. On the evening of the fourteenth the male members of the family, attired in their best, attend special services in the synagogue. On their return home they find the house lit up and the Seder, or Pasechal Table, prepared. The head of the family takes his place at the head of the table, where there is an arm-chair prepared for him with cushions or pillows. A similar chair is also reserved for the mistress of the house. The meal is called Seder by the Ashkenazic Jews, and Haggadah (because of the story of the deliverance recited during it) by the Sephardic Jews. All the members of the Jewish family, including servants, sit round the table. In this, the Seder is triumphantly different from other meals, as of such a kind as to allow three unleavened cakes or matzoth, each wrapped in a napkin, to be placed in it one above the other. A shank bone of lamb (with a small portion of meat attached) which has been roasted on the coals is placed, together with an egg that has been roasted in hot ashes, upon another dish above the three unleavened cakes. The roasted shank represents the paschal lamb, and the roasted egg the chagigah, or freewill offerings, made daily in the Temple. Bitter herbs, such as parsley and horseradish, a kind of sop called charoseth, consisting of various fruits pounded into a mush and mixed with honey, and salt water, are arranged in different vessels, sometimes disposed like candelabra above the unleavened bread. The table is also furnished with wine, and cups or glasses for each person, an extra cup being always left for the prophet Elias, whom they expect as the precursor of the Messiah.

When all are seated around the table, the first cup of wine is drunk. Then, while the first cup of wine is being passed around the table, the house rises and thanks God for the fruits of the vine and for the great day which they are about to celebrate. He then sits down and drinks his cup of wine in a reclining posture, leaning on his left arm. The others drink at the same time. In the time of the Temple the poor were entitled to drink four cups of wine during this joyful meal; and if he happened to be too poor, it was to be supplied out of public funds. Though four cups are prescribed, the quantity is not restricted to that amount. Some males generally drink six cups of wine. In early days red wine was used; but, on account of the fear of fostering the groundless blood accusations against the Jews, this usage was discontinued. Unfermented raisin wine or Palestinian wine is now generally used. After drinking the first cup the master rules and washes his hands, the others remaining seated, and Eder le-Levi is of opinion that it was at this point of the supper that Christ washed the disciples' feet. After washing his hands, the head of the family sits down, takes a small quantity of bitter herbs, dips them in salt water, and eats them, reclining on his left elbow. Jewish interpreters say that only the first fruit was used by the Passover in the desert; so the first cup of wine was drunk by the males and only the female ever reclined. From this point of view the seder is suggestive of the grace which is pronounced at table after the first cup of wine is drunk.

Israelites, who are not present have been mentioned as those who are not present in the country where they celebrate the feast. The custom of laying down and reclining on a pillow is from the habits of the ancient East. On the Passover many other customs and uses are observed, many of which are no doubt of Gentile origin, nor is it possible to determine which were introduced by the early Jews. We are not certain whether the Seder was instituted from the beginning of the feast, or whether it was added later to the evening service. It is only after the Seder that the family gather, and the reclining posture is observed. The Seder is a significant historical event, and is a symbol of the love of God for Israel and the desire of Israel to be loved by God. It is a symbol of the hope of Israel to be realized in the messianic age.
third cup is filled; and grace after meals is said, and the third cup drunk in a reclining posture. A cup of wine is now poured out for the prophet Elias, in a dead silence which is maintained for some time, and the door is opened. Impressions against unbelievers, taken from the Psalms and Lamentations, are then recited. These were elaborated only during the Middle Ages. After this the fourth cup is filled and the great Hallel (Pss. cxv-cxvii) and a prayer of praise are recited. Before drinking the fourth cup, the Jews of some countries recite five poetical pieces, and then the fourth cup is drunk. At the end a prayer asking God to accept what they have done is added. Among the German and Polish Jews this prayer is followed by popular songs.

The same ceremonies are observed the next evening. According to the Law the fifteenth and twenty-first were to be kept as solemn festivals and days of rest. At present the fifteenth and sixteenth, the twenty-first and twenty-second are whole holidays, a custom introduced among the Jews of the Dispersion to make sure that they fulfilled the precepts of the Law on the proper day. The other days are half-holidays. Special services are held in the synagogues throughout the Passover week. Formerly the date of the Passover was fixed by actual observation (Sehurner, "History of the Jewish People" (Edinburgh, 1902), I, 403;商务, 1902).

It is now deduced from astronomical calculations.

C. AHERNE.

Paschal I, Pope (817-824), the date of his birth is unknown; he died in April, May, or June, 824. He was the son of a Roman named Bonosus. While still young he joined the Roman clergy and was taken into the papal patriarca (Lateran Palace) where he was instructed in the Divine Service and the Holy Scripture. Leo III having appointed him superior of the monastery of St. Stephen near the Basilica of St. Peter in the Vatican, he took care of the pilgrims who came to Rome. On the death of Stephen IV (24 June, 817) Paschal was unanimously chosen to him the successor. On the following day he was consecrated and enthroned. He entered into relations with Emperor Louis, sending him several ambassadors in rapid succession. In 817 he received from the pope a document, "Pactum Ludovicianum", confirming the rights and possessions of the Holy See. This document with later amendments is still extant (cf. especially Siegel, "Das Privileg Ottos I für die römische Kirche", Innsbruck, 1833, 50 sqq., 174 sqq.). Paschal remained on friendly terms with the Frankish nobility and sent a special legation with rich gifts to the marriage of King Lothair I, son of Emperor Louis the Pious. In 820, Lothair sent paschal an April he was solemnly crowned emperor by Paschal. Although the pope himself opposed the sovereignty of the Frankish emperors over Rome and Roman territory, high officials in the papal palace, especially Primicerius Theodore and his son-in-law Leo Nomenclator, were at the head of the party which supported Paschal. the Holy Land and the defence of Christendom. He had died a fortnight after Jerusalem fell into the hands of the crusaders. To continue the work inaugurated by Urban remained the fixed policy of the Holy See for many generations. Three other antipopes, Theodoric (1100), Aleric (1102), and Algibald, who took the name Sylvester IV (1105), were offered by the imperialistic faction; but the schism was practically ended. Two of these pretenders were sent by Paschal to do penance in monasteries; the third had little or no following. Henry IV, broken by his previous conflicts, had no desire to win the bargain. He obstinately refused to abjure his claim to imperial investitures, and, consequently, was again excommunicated, and died at Liége, 7 Aug., 1106.

His death and the accession of his son were of dubious advantage to the papal cause; for although he had posed as the champion of the Church, he soon showed himself as unworthy as his father had been to relinquish any of the pretensions of the crown. Since the pope continued to denounce and anathematize lay investitures in the synods over which he presided, the chief of which were at Gaustalla (1106) and Troyes (1107), and since Henry persisted in bestowing benedictions at pleasure, the friendly relations between the two rose to a warlike strain. Paschal decided to change his proposed journey to Germany, and proceeded to France, where he was received enthusiastically by King Philip (who did penance for his adultery and was reconciled to the Church) and by the French people. Henry resented the discussion of a German question on foreign soil, though the question of investiture was the ground of all, and threatened to cut the knot with his sword, as soon as circumstances permitted his going to Rome to receive the imperial crown. In August, 1110, he crossed the Alps with a well-organized army, and, what emphasized the entrance of a new factor in medieval politics, accompanied by a band of imperialistic lawyers, one of whom, David, was of Celsian birth. During his stay at Rome, the pope was detained by the new pope and the popes of the empire to restore all the temporal rights and privileges which they held from the crown.

When the compact was made public in St. Peter's on the date assigned for the coronation, 12 Feb., 1111, there arose a fierce tumult led by the prelates who by one stroke of the pen had been degraded from the estate of princes of the empire to beggars. The indignation was the more intense, because the rights of the Roman See had been secured from a similar confiscation. After fruitless wrangling and three days of rioting, Henry carried the pope and his cardinals into captivity. Abandoned as he was by everyone, Paschal, after two months of imprisonment, yielded to the king that right of investiture against which so many heroes had contended. Henry's victory rebounded upon himself. All Christendom united in anathematizing him. All Christendom united in anathematizing him. The voices raised to condemn the faint-heartedness of Paschal were drowned by the universal denunciation of his approach. Paschal probably edged his weakness, but refused to break the promise he had made not to inflict any censure upon Henry for his violence. It was unfortunate for Paschal's memory that he should be so closely associated with the episode of Sutri. As head of the Church, he developed a far-reaching activity. He maintained discipline in every corner of Europe. The greatest champions of religion, men like St. Anselm of Canterbury, looked up to him with reverence. He gave his approval to the new orders of Citeaux and Fontevraud. On his numerous journeys he brought into close contact with the people and dedicated a large number of churches. If it was not given to him to solve the problem of Investitures, he cleared the way for his more fortunate successor.

Paschal III (Guido di Crema), second antipope in the time of Alexander III. He was elected in 1164 to succeed Cardinal Octavian, who, under the name of Victor IV, had warred so many years against Alexander III. To meet the demands of Frederick Barbarossa, he canonized Charlemagne in 1165, but this action was never ratified by the Church (see CHARLEMAGNE). He died in 1168.

Paschal Candle.—The blessing of the "paschal candle", which is a column of wax of exceptional size, usually fixed in a great candlestick specially destined for that purpose, is a notable feature of the service on Holy Saturday. The blessing is performed by the deacon, wearing a white dalmatic. A long Eucharistic prayer, the "Praecomium paschale" or "Exulétum" (q.v.) is chanted by him, and in the course of this chanting the candle is first ornamented with five grains of incense and then lighted with the newly blessed fire. At a later stage in the service, during the blessing of the font, the same candle is plunged three times into the waters. The words: "Deus est in sacerdotibus cordium tuorum, et animabus vestris judicat" (May the power of the Holy Spirit come down into the fulness of this fountain). From Holy Saturday until Ascension Day the paschal candle is left with its candlestick in the sanctuary, standing upon the Gospel side of the altar, and it is lighted during high Mass and during Vespers on these days. It is extinguished after the Gospel on Ascension Day and is then removed. The results of recent research seem all to point to the necessity of assigning a very high antiquity to the paschal candle. Dom Germain Morin (Revue Bénédict., Jan., 1891, and Sept., 1892) has successfully demonstrated that the paschal candle is the successor of the Paschal Candle of Placentia (Vigne, P. L., XXX, 188), in which the saint replies to a request that he would compose a carmen cerei, in other words, a form of blessing like our "Exulétum". Clearly this reference to a carmen cerei (poem of the candle) must presuppose the existence, in 384, of the candle itself which was to be blessed by the deacon with such a form, and the saint's reply makes it probable that the practice was neither of recent introduction nor peculiar to the church of Placentia. Again St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, XV, xxi) mentions casually that he had composed a laus cerei in verse; and from specimens of similar compositions, all of them, however, bearing a close family resemblance to our "Exulétum"—which are found in the works of Eunodius (Opusc., 14 and 81), it appears that there can be no sufficient ground for doubting the correctness of this statement. Moreover, Mr. Mercati has now shown good reason for believing that the existing Praecomium paschale—i.e., the Ambrosian Rite was composed in substance by St. Ambrose himself or else founded upon hymns of which he was the author (see "Studi e Testi", XII, 37-38). There is, therefore, no occasion to refuse to Pope Zosimus (c. 417) the credit of having conceded the use of the paschal candle to the suburbanian churches of Rome, although the mention of this fact is only found in the second edition of the "Liber Pontificalis". Mgr Duchesne urges that this institution has left no trace in the earliest purely Roman Ordines, such as the Einsiedel Ordo and that of St-Amand; but these speak of two faciul (torches) which were carried to the font before the pope and were plunged into the water as is now done with particular of the feet of the Baptist. The question of size or number does not seem to be very vital. The earliest council which speaks upon the subject, viz., the Fourth of Toledo (A.D. 653, cap. ix), seems to couple together the blessing of the lucerna and cærus as of equal importance and seems also to connect them both symmetrically, that is, mystically, with the liturgical illumination and with the Resurrection of Our Lord.

And undoubtedly the paschal candle must have derived its origin from the splendours of the celebration of Easter Eve in the early Christian centuries. As pointed out in the article Holy Week, our present morning service on Holy Saturday can be shown to represent by anticipation a service which in primitive times took place late in the evening, and which culminated in the blessing of the water and the baptism of the catechumens, followed immediately by Mass shortly after midnight on Easter morning. Already in the time of Constantine we are told by Eusebius (De Vita Constantinii, IV, xxii), that the emperor "transferred the sacred Vigil to the beginning of the day, by lighting throughout the whole city pillars of wax (τετρακόσιοι), while burning lamps illuminated every part, so that this mystic vigil was rendered brighter than the brightest daylight". Other Fathers, like St Gregory Nazianzus and St Gregory of Nyssa, also give vivid descriptions of the illumination of the Paschal Eve. For, it is probable that stretches back as far as Tertullian and Justin Martyr, that upon this Easter eve the catechumens were baptized and that this ceremony of baptism was spoken of as φωτιζόμενοι, i.e., illumination. Indeed, it seems highly probable that this is already referred to in Heb. x, 22, where the words "being illuminated" seem to be used in the sense of being baptized (cf. St Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. i, n. 15). Whether consciously designed for that purpose or not, the paschal candle typified Jesus Christ, "the true light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into this world!", surrounded by His illuminated, i.e. newly baptized, disciples, each holding a smaller light. In the virgo with candles the Eucharistic Sacrifice, which Christ derived from His blessed Mother, in the wick the human soul of Christ, and in the flame the divinity of the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity. Moreover, the five grains of incense set cross-wise in the candle recalled the sacred wounds retained in Christ's glorified body, and the lighting of the candle with new fire itself served as a lively image of the resurrection.

Of the practice of medieval and later times regarding the paschal candle much might be said. We learn on the authority of Bede, speaking of the year 701, that it was usual in Rome to inscribe the date and other particulars of the calendar either upon the cand- le itself or on a parchment affixed to it. Further, in many Italian basilicas the paschal candlestick was a marble construction which was a permanent adjunct of the ambo or pulpit. Several of these still survive, as in San Lorenzo fuori della mura at Rome. Naturally the medieval tendency was to glorify the paschal candle. We are told of a magnificent erection with dragons and shields and seven branches, which was so big that it had to stand in the centre of the choir. The Sarum Pro- cessional of 1517 directs that the paschal candle, no doubt that of Salisbury cathedral, is to be thirty-six feet in height, while we learn from Machlyn's diary that in 1558, under Queen Mary, three hundred weight of wax was used for the paschal candle of Westminster Abbey. In England these great candles, after they had been used for the last time in blessing the font on Whitson Eve, were generally melted down and made into tapers to be used gratuitously at the funerals of the poor (see Wilkins, "Concilii", i, 571, and i, 298). At Rome the Agnus Deis (q. v.) were made out of the remains of the paschal candles, and Mgr Duchesne seems to regard these coarse relics as likely to be even older than the paschal candle itself.

Paschal Tide.—I. LITURGICAL ASPECT. The fifty days from Easter Sunday to Pentecost are called by the older liturgists "Quinquagesima paschalis" or "Quin. leitico". The octave of Easter which closes after Saturday has its own peculiar Office (see Easter). Since this octave is part and complement of the Easter Solemnity, Paschal Tide in the liturgical books commences with the First Vespers of Low Sunday and ends before the First Vespers of Trinity Sunday. On Easter Sunday the Armenian Church keeps the Commemoration of All the Faithful Departed and on Saturday of Easter Week the Decollation of St. John. The Greek Church on Friday of Easter Week celebrates the feast of Our Lady, the Living Fountain (shrine at Constantinople).

The Sundays from Easter to Ascension Day, besides being called the First, Second (etc.) Sunday after Easter, have their own peculiar titles. The first is the "Dominica in albis", or Low Sunday (see Low Sunday). In the Bishops of Portugal and Brazil (also in the province of St. Louis, Mo.) on the Monday after Low Sunday is celebrated the feast of the Joys or Exultation of Mary at the Resurrection of her Son (double of the second class). The Russians, on Tues- day of this week, go in procession to the cemeteries and place Easter eggs on the graves [Maltzcow, "Fasten- und Blumen- Trieben" (Berlin, 1889), 704]. In the Latin Church, the second Sunday is called from its Gospel the Sunday of the Good Shepherd and from the Introit "Missericordias Domini"; in many dioceses (Seville, Capuchins) it is called the feast of Our Lady, Mother of the Good Shepherd (d. 2nd el.); at Jerusalem and in the churches of the Franciscans it is called the feast of the Holy Shepherd of Christ; in the Greek Church it is called Παρασκευή (Sunday of the women who brought ointments to the sepulchre of Christ); the Armenians celebrate on this Sunday the dedication of the first Christian church on Mount Zion. The third Sunday is called from the Introit "Jubilate" and the Latin Church has assigned to it the feast of the Patrons of Sarces (d. 2nd el.); the Greeks call it the Sunday of the Paralytic, from its Gospel. The Oriental Churches on Wednesday after the third Sunday celebrate with a very solemn Office and an octave the Μνημείου τοῦ Μεσσία, the completion of the first half of Paschal Tide: it is the feast of the manifestation of the Messiah, the victory of Christ and the Church over Judaism ["Zeitschrift für..."].

fqr katholische Theologie” (1895), 169-177; the Slav nations in this day have a solemn procession and benediction of their rivers (Nilles, "Kal.", III, 361): The fourth Sunday is called "Cantate"; by the Oriental it is called "Hymnus" in the Latin Church. The fifth Sunday, "Vocem jucunditatis" in the Orient, Sunday of the Man Born Blind. In the Latin Church

follow the Rotation Days (q. v.); in the Greek Church on Tuesday is kept the ἀποκρις or conclusion of the feast of Easter. The Greeks sing the Canons of Easter up to this Tuesday in the same manner as during Easter Week, whilst in the Latin Church the specific Easter Office terminates on Saturday following the feast.

Thursday is the feast of the Ascension (see ASCENSION). The Friday of this week, in Germany, is called "Witterfreitag"; the fields are blessed against frost and thunderstorms.

Sunday within the octave it is called "Exaudi" from the Latin text; in some dioceses it is called Feast of Our Lady, Queen of the Apostles (double major) or of the Cenacle (Charleston and Savannah, first class); in Rome it was called Sunday of the Roses ("Pascha rosarum" or "rosatum"), since in the Pantheon rose-leaves were thrown from the rotunda into the church; in the Greek Church the octave of Easter is called the "Second Anniversary of the Paschal Feast". In the first Nicene Council the term called it the "second feast of the flowers", a repetition of Palm Sunday. By older liturgists the week before Pentecost is called "Hobdomada expectationis", week of the expectation of the Holy Ghost. On the Vigil of Pentecost the baptismal water is blessed in the church, and the blessing of the water is sung at the baptismal font. On the day after the Holy Thursday is the Πλησιάζων (All Souls’ Day); on this day the Greeks bless wheat cakes and have processions to the cemeteries. (See WHIT SUNDAY.)

Paschal Tide is a season of joy. The colour for the Office de tempore is white; the Te Deum and Gloria are recited on the three Sundays of this week. Sunday of the "Asperges" is replaced by the "Vidi Aquam" which recalls the solemn baptism of Easter eve. There is no feast day from Easter until Ascension. The Armenians during this period do away even with the abstinence on Fridays. Prayers are said standing, not kneeling. Instead of the "Aangelya" the "Regina Celi" is recited. From Easter to Ascension many churches, about the tenth cent., said only one Nocturn at Matins; even some particular churches in the city of Rome adopted this custom from the Teutons (Bäumer, "Gesch. des Breviers", 312). Gregory VII limited this privilege to the week of Easter and of Pentecost. Some dioceses had a mandatory Sunday a week away, even in the nineteenth century for 40 days after Easter. In every Nocturn the three psalms are said under one antiphon. The Alleluia appears as an independent antiphon; an Alleluia is also added to all the antiphons, responsories, and versicles, except to the verses of the process at Prime and Compline. Instead of the "suf-tragno" antiphon in the semidouble and ferial Offices a commemoration of the Holy Cross is used. The iambic hymns have a special Easter dixology. The feasts of the holy Apostles and martyrs have their own commune from Easter to Pentecost. At Mass the Alleluia is added to the Introit, Offertory, and Communion; in place of the Gradual two Alleluias are sung followed by two versicles, each with an Alleluia; there is also a special PreÆfixe for Paschal Time.

II. In Canon LAW Paschal Tide is the period during which every member of the faithful who has attained the years of discretion is bound by the positive law of the Church to receive Holy Communion at least three times a year, Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost. A positive preÆfix was issued by the IV Lateran Council (1215) and confirmed by the Council of Trent (Sess. XIII, can. ix). According to these decrees the faithful of either sex, after coming to the age of discretion, must receive at least at Easter the Sacrament of the Eucharist (unless by the advice of the parish priest they abstain for a while). Otherwise they are to be prevented from entering the church and when dead are to be denied Christian burial. The paschal preÆfix is to be fulfilled in one’s parish church. (Taunton, "The Law of the Church" (London and St. Louis, 1906), 391, 474.) Although the preÆfix of the IV Lateran to confose to the parish priest fell into disuse elsewhere, the preÆfix of receiving Easter Communion in the parish church is still in force where there are canonically-erected parishes. The term Paschal Tide was usually interpreted to mean the two weeks between Palm and Low Sundays (a very large number of churches held the Palm Sunday Mass as the Nineteenth Sunday, and the third Sunday of Easter as the Twentieth Sunday, the Paschal Tide). In the United States upon petition of the Fathers of the First Provincial Council of Baltimore Paschal Tide was extended by Pius VIII to the period from the first Sunday in Lent to Trinity Sunday (II Plen. Conc. Balc., n. 257); in England it lasts from Ash Wednesday until Low Sunday; in Ireland from Ash Wednesday to the octave of Pentecost. In Paris Paul, G. Joly ("Rubrics of the Roman Ritual", n. 737), Satter, "Moral Theology", 578, 599; in Canada the duration of the Paschal Tide is the same as in the United States.

Paschasius, Saint, dean of the Roman Church about 500; d. after 511. Almost all that is known of Paschasius is derived by Gregory the Great in his "Dialogues" (IV, xl). According to Gregory he was a man of extraordinary sanctity, and a father of the poor. Until his death he was a firm adherent of the antipope Laurentius (498-506; d. before 514). This, however, was not the result of malice but of error and ignorance. He died during the reign of Pope Symmacucus (506-511), and after his death a demoniac was healed by touching his dalmatic. Long after this, Paschasius appeared to Bishop Germanus of Caqua at the hot springs of Angulus (Angulum); he told Germanus that he had to do penance in these baths for his former mistake, and begged the bishop to pray for him. This Germanus did with great zeal, and after some days no longer found him at the springs. Gregory remarks that Paschasius had left books on the Holy Spirit that were correct in all particulars and perfectly intelligible. As a matter of fact two books "De spiritu sancto" are assigned to Paschasius in several manuscripts, and until lately were printed under his name. Anachoretic, devotional literature of the Eastern Church contains many "Liber testamenti pater", etc., which are assigned to him, and these books have been preserved in the works of Faustus. If this is correct, then the work of Paschasius has disappeared. A letter written by him to Eugappius (511) has been preserved. The latter had begged his venerated and dearly loved friend Paschasius, who had great literary skill, to write a biography of St. Severinus from the accounts of the saint which he (Eugippus) had put together in crude and inarticulate form. Paschiasius, however, replied that the acts and miracles of the saint could not be described better than had been done by Eugippus. The feast of Paschiasius is celebrated on 31 May.

KLEMENS LOFFLER.

Paschiasius Radbertus, Saint, theologian, b. at Soissons, 760/1; in the Monastery of Corbie, c. 560 (the date 865 is improbable). As a child he was exposed, but was brought and taken up by Benedictine Nuns at Soissons. He entered the Benedictine Order at Corbie under Abbot Adalard, and was for many years instructor of the young monks. In 822 he accompanied Abbot Adalard into Saxony for the purpose of founding the monastery of New Corvey (Westphalia). He saw four abbeys, namely Adalard, Wala, Hedio, and Isacc pass to their reward and on the death of Abbot Isacc, Paschiasius was made Abbot of Corbie, though only a deacon; through humble prayers and penance he acquired the biretta and diaconal order. On the octasion of a disagreement he resigned his office after about seven years and was thus enabled to devote himself to study and literature.

He wrote a learned commentary on the Gospel of St.
Matthew, "Commentarii in Matt. libri XII"; an expansion of the 4th Psalm, "Expos. in Ps. 41 libri III" and a similar work on Lamentations, "Expos. in Lament. libri V"; and a life of Abbot Adalard (cf.
Bolland., 2 Jan.). His biography of the Abbot Wala is a work of greater usefulness as an historical source (cf. Rodenburg, "Die Vita Wala als historische Quelle", Marburg, 1877). He revised the "Passio Ru-nini et Valeri". His earliest work in dogmatic theology was a treatise, "De fide, spect caritate" (first published in Pz., Thesaur. Anecdot., I, 2, Augsburg, 1721); he next wrote two books "De Partu Virginis", in which he defended the perpetual virginity of Mary, the Mother of God.

The most important of his works is: "De corpore et sa-nato domino in Mart. vet. scriptor. et mon. amplissima Collectio", I, IX, written in 831 for his pupil Phelixus Varinus, Abbot of New Corvey, and for the monks of that monastery, revised by the author and sent in 841 to Emperor Charles the Bald. The emperor commissioned the Benedictine Ratramnus of Corbie to refute certain questionable assertions of Paschiasius, and when Ratramnus Maurs joined in the discussion (cf. Ep. iii ad Egilum, P. L., CXII, 1533) there occurred the first controversy on the Eucharist, which continued up to the tenth century and even later, for both the followers of Berengarius of Tours in the eleventh century and the Calvists in the sixteenth century vigorously assailed the work, because they thought that they had found the real source of doctrinal innovations, especially in regard to the Catholic dogma of Transubstantiation. His primary object herein was to give in accordance with the doctrine of the Fathers of the Church (e. g. Ambrose, Augustine, and Chrysostom), the clearest and most comprehensible explanation of the Real Presence.
In carrying out his plan he made the mistake of emphazising the identity of the Eucharistic Body of Christ with His natural historical Body in such exaggerated way that the difference between the two modes of existence was not sufficiently brought out.
In opposition to his assertion that the Eucharistic Body of Christ is "material plane caelo, quam quae nata est de Maria et passa in cruce et resurrxionem de sepulchro" (loc. cit.), Ratramnus thought it necessary to insist that the Body of Christ in the Sacred Host—notwithstanding its essential identity with the historical Body—is present by a spiritual mode of existence and consequently as an "invisible substance", and hence that our eyes cannot immediately perceive the Body of Christ in the form of bread. It is difficult to assert that Paschiasius was not inclined to this view:
he did mention that Paschiasius had often inferred; his narration, however, of certain Eucharistic miracles may have given some foundation for the suspicion that he inclined towards a grossly material, Caphranite-like apprehension of the nature of the Eucharist. His opponents also reproached him with having, in direct contradiction to his fundamental principle of the Eucharistic act, a "figura et of a veritas", thus placing side by side without any reconciliation the symbolic and the realistic conceptions of the Eucharist. The accusation seems altogether unwarranted; for by figure he understood merely that which appears outwardly to the senses, and by veritas, that which Faith teaches us. At bottom his doctrine was as orthodox as that of his opponents. He defended himself with some skill against the attacks of his critics, especially in his "Epistola ad Frudegardum". But a more thorough vindication of St. Paschiasius was made by Gerbert, afterwards Pope Sylvester II (d. 1003), who, in a work on the miracles of the Eucharist, called "De sacris Domini", contended that the doctrine of St. Paschas-ius was correct in every particular. The scientific advantage which accrued to theology from this first controversy on the Eucharist is by no means unimportant. For, through the accurate distinction made between the Eucharistic Body of Christ and its exter-or sensible appearances, the way was cleared for a deeper understanding of the Eucharistic species or accidents in distinction from, and in opposition to, the invisible Body of Christ hidden under them. Hence also the difficult notion of Transubstantiation gained much in clearness, distinctness, and precision.

St. Paschiasius was first buried in the Church of St.
John at Corbie. When numerous miracles took place at his grave under Abbot Fulco, his remains were solemnly removed by order of the pope, 12 July, 1073, and interred in the Church of St. Peter, Corbie.
His feast is on 26 April.

The collected Opera Paschasia were first published by Sin-monis (Paris, 1673); and there were republished with additions in P. L., CXXX. His letters are in Pertz, Mon. Ger.
Hist., Epist., VI, 182 sq.; his poems in Pertz, Poes. lat., III, 38 sq., and Ps.-hymniae antiquissimorum, ed. H. HUMBOLDT, in Abhandlungen der Berliner Akademie (1900); Die Paschasia in Beitr., Akad. J. POHLE.

Passaglia, Carlo, b. at Lucca, 9 May, 1812; d. at Turin, 12 March, 1887. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1827; when scarcely thirty years old, he was teaching at the Sapenza, and was prefect of studies at the Gernese College. In 1845 he took the solemn vows and became professor of dogmatic theology at the Gregorian University. In 1850 he took a leading part in preparing the definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, on which he wrote three large volumes. He showed in his works a rare knowledge of the theological literature of all times. His historical method was noted with great advantage; he unwrld that "the substituted grammar for dogma." His chief works are:
are an edition of the "Enchiridion" of St.
Augustine, with copious notes (Naples, 1817); "De praeventivis b. Petri" (Rome, 1850); "Conference given in the year 1852 on the publication of "De vera Carolina" (1851); "Commentationes theologicae variæ" 3° (1 vol., Rome, 1850–51); "De ecclesia Christi" (3 vols., Ratisbon, 1853— incomplete); "De aternitate peregrinum" (Ratisbon, 1854).

The trouble between Passagia and his superiors grew steadily more serious: he finally left the Society in 1850. Pius IX gave him a chapter, the Sagrestia, where he held the chair of moral philosophy until his death. Ignorant of the world and men, he believed that the opponents of temporal power were guided by the best of intentions. He founded the weekly, "Il Meditatore" (1862–66), in which he wrote long articles full of undugested erudition, and to which he welcomed the contribution of any priest with a grievance. From 1863 to 1864 he edited the daily, "La Pace," and in 1867 "Il Gerfil," a weekly theologicai review. He could not say Mass at Turin, and put off the clerical dress. But as regards dogma, he never swerved from the true faith; nevertheless he erred grievously in the matter of clerical erudition, as his book, "Sul divorzio" (1864), and his refutation of Renan (1864). In 1867 the Bishops of Mondovì and Clifton tried to reconcile him with the Church, but he did not retract until a few months before his death.

Passau, Diocese of (Passavensis), in Bavaria, suffragan of Munich-Freising, including within its boundaries one district and one parish in Upper Bavaria and the City of Passau and 10 districts in Lower Bavaria (see Germany, Map).

History.—The Diocese of Passau may be considered the successor of the ancient Diocese of Lorch (Laureicum). At Lorch, a Roman station and an important stronghold at the junction of the Enns and the Danube, Christianity found a foothold in the third century, during a period of Roman domination, and a Bishop of Lorch certainly existed in the fourth. During the next several centuries the Christian influence on the Danube was completely rooted out, and the Celtic and Roman population was annihilated or enslaved. In the region between the Lorch and the Enns, the wandering Bajuvari were converted to Christianity in the seventh century, while the Avari, to the east, remained pagan. The ecclesiastical organization of Bavaria was brought about by St. Boniface, who, with the support of Duke Odilo, erected the four sees of Freising, Ratisbon, Passau, and Salzburg. He confirmed as incumbent of Passau, Bishop Vivilo, or Vivolus, who had been ordained by Pope Gregory III, and who was for a long time the only bishop in Bavaria. Thenceforth, Vivilo resided permanently at Passau, on the site of the old Roman colony of Batavia. Here was a church, the founder of which is not known, dedicated to St. Stephen. To Bishop Vivilo's diocese was annexed the ancient Lorch, which meanwhile had become a small and unimportant place. By the duke's generosity, a cathedral was soon erected near the Church of St. Stephen, and here the bishop founded his residence. The boundaries of the diocese extended westwards to the Isar, and eastwards to the Enns. In ecclesiastical affairs Passau was probably, from the beginning, suffragan to Salzburg. Through the favour of Dukes Odilo and Tassilo, the bishopric received many costly gifts, and several monasteries arose—e. g. Niederalteich, Niebernburg, Mattsee, Kremsmünster—which were richly endowed. Under Bishop Walther II (774–804), who had assisted the rebellions Duke Tassilo, the district between the Enns and the Raab was added to the diocese, which thus included the whole eastern part (Ostmark) of Southern Bavaria and part of what is now Hungary. The first missionaries to the pagan Hungarians went out from Passau, and in 866 the Church sent missions to Hungary. Henceforward, the outermost eastern bulwark of the Germans, suffered most from the incursions of the Hungarians. At that time many churches and monasteries were destroyed. When, after the victory of Lech, the Germans pressed forward and regained the old Ostmark, Bishop Adalbert (946–971) hoped to extend his spiritual jurisdiction even to Hungary. His successor, Santuccio (971–91), who worked zealously and successfully for the Christianization of Pannonia, aspired to free Passau from the metropolitan authority of Salzburg, but was completely frustrated in this, as well as in his attempt to assert the metropolitan claims which Passau was supposed to have inherited from Lorch, and to include all Hungary in his diocese. By founding many monasteries in his diocese he prepared the way for the princely power of later bishops. It is undoubtedly to his credit that he built many new churches and restored others from ruins. His successor, Christian (991–1002) received in 990 from the Emperor Otto III the market privilege and the rights of franchise, taxation, jurisdiction, exaction and benefice distribution. Henry II granted him a large part of the North Forest. Henceforward, indeed, the bishops ruled as princes of the empire, although the title was used for the first time only in a document in 1183. Under Berengar (1015–45) the whole diocese east of the Vienna forest was confirmed as Lacham at Passau, and further under the jurisdiction of Passau. During his time the cathedral chapter made its appearance, but there is little information concerning its beginning as a distinct corporation with the right of electing a bishop. This right was much hampered by the exercise of imperial influence.

At the beginning of the Conflict of Investitures, St. Altmann (q. v.) occupied the see (1065–91) and was one of the few German bishops who adhered to Gregory VII. Ulrich I, Count of Höfft (1092–1121), who was for a time driven from his see by Henry IV, further the monastic reforms and the Crusades. Regimar (1121–38), Regnbert, Count of Hegensau (1130–1148), who took part in the crusades, and Conrad of Austria (1149–64), a brother of Bishop Otto of Freising, were all much interested in the foundation of new monasteries and the reform for those already existing. Ulrich, Count of Andechs (1215–21), was formally recognized as a prince of the empire at the Reichstag of Nuremberg in 1217. The reforms which were begun by Gebhard von Plessen (1221–32) and Rudiger von Rodeck (1233–1250) found a zealous promoter in Otto von Lonsdorf (1251–65), one of the greatest bishops of Passau. He took stringent measures against the relaxed monasteries, introduced the Franciscans and Dominicans into his diocese, promoted the arts and sciences, and collected the old documents which had survived the storms of the preceding period, so that to him we owe almost all our knowledge of the early history of Passau. (See Schmidt, "Otto von Lonsdorf, Bischof zu Passau", Würzburg, 1893.) Bishop Peter, formerly Canon of Breslau, contributed much to the greatness of the House of Habsburg, which was now in possession of the sons of King Rudolph. Under Bernhard of Brambach (1285–1313) began the struggles of Passau to become a free imperial city. After an uprising in May, 1298, the bishop granted the burghers, in the municipal ordinance of 1299, privileges in conformity with what was called the Bernhardine Charter. The cathedral having been burned down in 1281, he built a new cathedral which lasted until 1662. Albert III von Winkel (1333–80) was particularly active in the struggle with the burgesses and in resisting the robber-knights. The Black Death visited the bishopric under Gottfried II von Weitenbeck (1332–62). George I von Hollen (1403–09), who after 1411 was imperial chancellor, energetically opposed the Hussites. During the time of Ulrich III von Nussdorf (1451–79) the diocese suffered its first great curtailment by the formation of the new diocese of Vienna (1365). This diocese was afterwards further enlarged at the expense of Passau by Sixtus IV. Towards the close of the fourteenth century the sees of Passau and Regensburg were both in the hands of Austrian candidates for the see and a Bavarian brought about a state of war in the diocese.

The Reformation was kept out of all the Bavarian part of the diocese, except the Countship of Ortenburg, by the efforts of Ernest of Bavaria who, though never consecrated, ruled the diocese from 1537 to 1541. The new heresy found many adherents, however, in the Austrian portion. Wolfgang I Count of Salzburg (1510–53) and Urban von Trenbach (1561–98) led the counter-Reformation. Under Wolfgang the Peace of Passau was concluded, in the summer of 1562 (see Charles V). The last Bavarian prince-bishop was Urban, who in his struggles during the Northern Rebellion received for the see of Passau the part of the diocese from Albert V, Duke of Bavaria, and, after 1576, from Emperor Rudolf II. All the successors of Urban were Austrians. Bishop Leopold I (1589–1625) (also Bishop of Strassburg after 1607) was one of the first to enter the Catholic League of 1609. In the Thirty Years' War he was a faithful supporter of Ferdinand II. Bishop Leopold II Wilhelm (1625–62), son of Ferdinand II, a pious prince and a great benefactor of the City of Passau, especially after the great conflagration of 1622, finally united five bishoprics. Count Wenzels von Thun (1641–23) began the new cathedral which was completed thirty years later by Paul Philip of Langenberg. He and his nephew Joseph Dominicus, his mediate successor (1723–62), became cardinals. When Vienna was raised to an archdiocese in 1722, he relinquished the parishes beyond the Viennese Forest, hence was exempted from the metropolitan authority of Salzburg, and obtained the pallium for himself and his successors. Leopold Ernst, Count of Firman (1763–80), created cardinal in 1772, was treasurer of the archiepiscopal college of theology at Augsburg and, after the suppression of the Jesuits, founded a lyceum. Under Joseph, Count of Anersperg (1783–95), Emperor Joseph II took away two-thirds of the diocese to form the two dioceses of Linz and St. Pölten (see Linz). The last prince-bishop, Leopold von Thun (1796–1829), saw the secularization of the old bishopric in 1803; the City of Passau he kept the temporalities on the left bank of the Inn and the right bank of the Ilz went to Vienna, while the territory on the left banks of the Danube and of the Ilz went to the Grand Duchy of Tuscany and afterwards to Austria. On 22 February, 1803, when the Bavarians marched into Passau, the prince-bishop withdrew to the superiori of the former residence.

By the Concordat of 1818, the diocese was given the boundaries which it still has. After the death of the last prince-bishop, Passau's exemption from metropolitan power ceased, and the diocese became suffragan of Munich-Freising. Bishop Charles Joseph von Rottenbauer (1827–40), the pious founder of the society of the most holy infant Jesus, was consecrated 24 February, 1827, by Joseph III, and upon the death of the last archbishop was his successor. The present diocese, Sigismund Maria Felix von Auersperg (1867–96) he was consecrated 21 January, 1866, and consecrated on 24 February, 1866.

Actual Conditions.—The diocese is divided into a city community and 19 rural deaneries. In 1910 it numbered 222 parishes, and 110 other benefices and expositurae, 667 clerics, of whom 219 were parish priests, 19 were engaged at the cathedral and in dioceesan educational institutions, and 68 were elsewhere. The resident Catholic population was 351,200. The cathedral chapter consists of a cathedral provost, a dean, 8 canons, 6 vicars, 1 prebender, and 1 precentor (Donakapellmeister). The diocesan institutions are the seminary for clerics, dedicated to St. Stephen, with 85 alumni, and the boys' seminary at Passau; the state institutions are a gymnasium at Passau, 2 homes for priests, 1 home for superannuated priests. There is a state lyceum at Passau with 8 religious professors, where candidates for the priesthood study philosophy and theology. The following orders and congregations were established in the diocese: the beiden High schools of Ottobrunn, a missionary seminary with 9 fathers and 20 brothers; Capuchins, 5 monasteries, 51 fathers, 21 tertiary clerics, and 65 lay brothers; Redemptorists, 1 monastery with 3 fathers and 3 brothers, Female orders: Benedictines, 1 convent, 46 sisters; Cistercians, 1 house, 48 sisters; English Ladies, 3 tertiary houses; 30 affiliated institutions, 806 members; Poor School Sisters of Notre Dame, from the mother-house at Munich, 7 institutions, with 35 sisters; Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul from the mother-house at Munich, 18 houses with 79 sisters; Sisters of the Most Holy Redeemer, from Neiderbrunn, Absace, 2 institutions with 9 sisters; Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis, from Malleersdorf, Lower Bavaria, 25 institutions with 125 sisters. The English Ladies and the School Sisters devote themselves to the education of girls, while those in most of the remaining institutions of the diocese (the Benedictines and Cistercians being contemplatives) are occupied with the care of the sick. Among the pious institutions of the diocese most popular are the hospitals of St. Vincent de Paul, the Society of St. Elizabeth, the Brotherhood for the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, the Society of St. Cecilia, the Societies of Catholic Workmen, the Volkssverein of Catholic Germany. The most important Catholic periodicals are "Die Donauzeitung" and "Die Theologisch-praktische Monatschrift", both published at Passau.

The cathedral, with the exception of the choir and the transept built in 1407, was rebuilt after the fire of 1662 by the Italians Lorago and Carbone, in the baroque style; its two towers were finished in 1800–98 by Heinr. von Schmidt. From Gothic times date the former church of the city of Neumarkt (1380–90), the cathedral at Altötting (fourteenth and fifteenth centuries) with the tombs of Karlmann and of Tilly, the Herrenkapelle near the cathedral at Passau (1414); Renaissance and Baroque are the former Cistercian church at Aldersbach (1700–51), the Church of the Premonstratensians at Osterhofen (completed in 1562), the Church of the Benedictines at Niederalteich, formerly the church of a Benedictine abbey (1718–26). The diocese contains the most famous place of pilgrimage in all Bavaria: the Chapel of Our Lady at Altötting, which is visited each year by from 200,000 to 500,000 pilgrims. In this chapel the hearts of the Bavarian royal family have been preserved opposite the miraculous picture, since the time of the Elector Maximilian I.
Passerat, Venerable Joseph, b. 30 April, 1772, at Joinville, France; d. 30 October, 1858. The difficulties he had to surmount in following his vocation to the priesthood were great. He was driven from the seminary, imprisoned, and forced to serve in the army from 1788 to 1792. Owing to his lofty stature he was made drum-major, and later quarter-master. At the first opportunity he left the service and entered the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer in Warsaw. Bl. Clement M. Hofbauer (q. v.) trained him for the religious life and priesthood, and he in turn trained new-comers. Later with great difficulty he established the Congregation in several places outside of Poland. After the death of Bl. Clement, Venerable Passerat succeeded him as vicar-general over all the transalpine communities. While thus engaged (1820-18) he founded houses in the United States, in Bavaria, Prussia, Switzerland, Belgium, France, Portugal, Holland, and England. Difficulties were many in the United States, and in Europe the danger of suppression was imminent, but never wavering, he communicated his confidence in God to his subjects. He used to say: "Consult yourselves, you are seel, be it that we are reduced to ten, these like grains of corn reduced to dust under the earth will one day give a rich harvest." The growth of the congregation verified his prediction. He governed his numerous family with zeal, wisdom, and tenderness. When the revolution decreed the destruction of the Redemptorists, he said to his subjects: "Fear not: stand courageously. Let it be said of us that we have failed to meet martyrdom, but that martyrdom has failed to meet us!" On April 18, 1848, he was driven out of Vienna with his community without the bare necessities of life. After much hardship he reached Belgium. Worn out with old age and labour he resigned his office and became director of the Redemptoristines at Bruges. The ordinary process for his beatification was begun and the introduction of the cause of this venerable servant of God was approved by Leo XIII on 13 May, 1901. The Apostolic Process is already completed.

Passignano, Domenico (known as L. Cresti, or L. Passignano, Cresti being his family name), Venetian painter, b. at Passignano, near Florence, in 1558; d. at Florence, 1638. Although a Florentine by birth, he belongs to the Venetian school. He appears to have lived for a while at Florence, and afterwards at Pisa, but nothing is known of the transactions which he followed through the rest of his career. Personally, he was a man of charming manners, delightful in conversation. Pope Clement VIII knighted him and gave him many commissions, and Urban VIII added to his honours and emoluments. He returned to Florence, where he was greatly beloved and regarded as the chief member of its Academy, although recognized by all his companions as Venetian in style and out of sympathy with the Florentine methods. He painted with extraordinary facility, and so rapidly as to be nicknamed Passa Ognuno. This name has been regarded as a sort of play upon the name of his birthplace, and one author asserts that the name Passignano was derived from it; but there appears to be no authority for this. According to the custom of the time, the artist should derive his familiar cognomen from his birthplace.

Passignano’s drawing was not particularly correct, but his ideas of composition were ingenious and clever. He regarded Tintoretto’s work with very high favour, and many of his own paintings closely resemble those of the great master. But his desire to paint rapidly caused him to lose his collection thereby that many of his important works have for this very reason perished. He was responsible for the street decorations in Florence on the occasion of the marriage of the Grand Duke Ferdinand I with Christina of Lorraine, and the frescoes of the church of San Andrea at Rome were very largely his work. His own portrait is in the Uffizi Gallery at Florence, and the same city contains several of his best works. He is also to be studied in Paris, London, and Vienna.

Passio, Domenico, cardinal, theologian, b. at Fossombrone, 2 Dec., 1682; d. 5 July, 1761. Educated in the Clementine College at Rome, later he joined the household of his brother Guido, afterwards secretary of the Sacred College, devoting himself to higher studies at the Sapienza. He was soon made a prelate and in 1706 was sent to Paris to present the nuncio with the red hat, but there he acquired the Jansenistic tendencies which he never entirely eradicated. In 1708 he was sent on a confidential mission to The Hague; in 1712 he was present at Utrecht as official representative of the Holy See and successfully maintained the cause of Ruiswych concerning religion. His efforts were less successful at Baden (1714) and Turin. He was later sent to Malta as inquisitor (1719-1720). He became Secretary of Propaganda, Secretary of Latin Letters, and in 1721 was appointed apostolic delegate in Switzerland, where he wrote “Acta Apostolicae Legationis Helvetiae 1723-29” (Zurich, 1729; Rome, 1738). He blessed the marriage of Maria Theresa and was instrumental in converting Friedrich Ludwig, Prince of Wurttemberg. Later on he was hostile to Austria.

After his return to Rome he became secretary of briefs and cardinal of the title of S. Bernardo. In 1755 he succeeded Quirini as librarian of the Holy Roman Church. Although a member of the Academy of Berlin, he published little. But he carried on a learned correspondence with the most distinguished intellects. He became President of the Academy and encouraged them to publish Arnauld’s works. His library of 32,000 volumes was open to all; it was acquired by the Augustinians. His character was impetuous and haughty, especially towards the Romans. He was compelled to confirm the decree prohibiting the “Exposition de la doctrine chretienne” of Masenguy, but he protecté, but this so afflicted him as to hasten his death.

Passionists.—The full title of the Passionist institution is: The Congregation of Discalced Clerks of the Most Holy Cross and Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ.
The founder was St. Paul of the Cross, called in the world Paul Francis Danei. The saint was born 3 Jan., 1641, at Ovada, a small town in the then Republic of Genoa. He spent his youth at Castellanno, in Lombardy, where his parents had taken up their residence when Paul was only ten years old. There began that native place. It is to Castellanno we have to turn our thoughts for the beginnings of the Passionist Congregation. There Paul received his inspirations concerning the work for which God destined him. There he was clothed by his bishop in the habit of the Passion, and there wrote the Rules of the Institute.

The Rules were written by St. Paul while yet a layman and before he assembled companions to form a community. He narrates, in a statement written in obedience to his confessor, how Our Lord inspired him with the design of founding the congregation, and how he wrote the Rules and Constitutions. "I began," he says, "to write this holy rule on the second of December in the year 1729, and I finished it on the seventh of the same month. And be it known that when I was writing, I went on as quickly as if somebody in a professor's chair were there dictating to me. I felt the words come from my heart" (see "Life of St. Paul of the Cross", H. v. Oratorian Series). In 1725 when on a visit to Rome with his brother John Baptist, his confessor, companion, and co-operator in the foundation of the institute, Paul received from Benedict XIII nova vocis oracle, permission to form a congregation according to these Rules. The same pope ordained the two brothers in the Vatican basilica 7 June, 1727. After serving for a time in the hospital of St. Gallians they left Rome with permission of the Holy Father and went to Mount Argenzaro, where they established the first house of the institute. They took up their abode in a small hermitage near the summit of the mount, to which was attached a chapel dedicated to St. Anthony. They were soon joined by three companions, one of whom was a priest, and the observance of community life according to the rule began there and is continued there to the present day. This was the cradle of the congregation, and we may date the foundation of the Passionists from this time.

Formation and Development.—By an Apostolic rescript of 15 May, 1741, Benedict XIV approved the Rule of the house and glorified the institute in the faithful the memory of the Passion of Christ, commended itself in a special manner to him, and he was heard to say, after signing the rescript, that the Congregation of the Passion had come into the world last, whereas it ought to have been the first. Clement XIV confirmed the Rules and approved the institute by the Bull Supremi Apostolatus of 16 Nov., 1769, which concedes to the Passionist Congregation all the favours and privileges granted to other religious orders. The same pope afterwards gave to St. Paul and his companions the Church of Sts. John and Paul in Rome, with the large house annexed to it on Monte Cello, and this remains the mother-house of the congregation, and the dwelling-place of the founder's death. The rules and the institute were again solemnly confirmed and approved by a Bull of Pius VI. "Præclara virtutum exempla", 15 Sept., 1775. These two Bulls of Clement XIV and Pius VI gave canonical stability to the institute, and are the basis and authority of its rights and privileges.

Thedown had been approved by Benedict XIV many associates joined St. Paul, some of whom were priests; and the new disciples gave themselves up to such a life of fervent penance and prayer that upon Mount Argenzaro the sanctity of the ancient anchorites was revived. Before the death of the founder twelve houses or "collegia" of the congregation were established throughout Italy, and formed into three provinces, fully organized according to the Rules—a general over the entire congregation, a provincial over each province, rectors over the several houses, a novitiate in each province. These superiors were to be elected in provincial chapters held every three years and general chapters every six years.

Distinctive Spirit. — The congregation embraces both the contemplative and the active life, as applied to religious orders. The idea of the founder was to unite in it the solitary life of the Carthusians or Trappists with the active life of the Jesuits or Lazarists. The Passionists are reckoned among the mendicant orders in the Church. They have no endowments, nor are they allowed to possess property either in private or in common, except their houses and a few acres of land attached to each. They therefore depend upon their labours and the voluntary contributions of the faithful.

The end of the congregation, as stated in the Rules, is twofold: first, the sanctification of its members; and secondly, the sanctification of others. This twofold end is to be secured by means of their distinctive spirit, namely the practice and promotion of devotion to the Passion of Our Lord as the most efficacious means for withdrawing the minds of men from sin and leading them on to Christian perfection. To this end the Passionists at their profession add to the three usual religious vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, a fourth—to promote to the utmost of their power, especially by such means as their rules point out, a devotion to the Passion of Our Divine Saviour.

Recruiting and Training of Members. — The Passionists have no colleges for the education of seculars, and have no young men or boys under their care, except those who wish to become members of the congregation, and these who are novices and professed students. They depend therefore for their subjects upon the attraction which the spirit and work of the congregation exercise upon youths who come to know them. The congregation admits of two classes of religious: choir brothers and lay brothers. The former, unless priests already, are to give themselves to study for the priesthood. The latter are charged with the domestic duties of the retreat. The conditions for the reception of novices are, besides those common to all religious orders: (1) that they be at least fifteen years of age, and not over twenty-five (from this latter the father general can dispense for any just and sufficient reason); (2) that they show special aptitude for the life of the Congregation, (3) if they be to be received as clerics they must have made due progress in their studies and show the usual signs of vocation to the priesthood. After profession and the completion of their classical and intermediate studies, the students take a seven years' course of ecclesiastical studies under the direction and tuition of professors, or brethren as they are called, in philosophy, theology, Holy Scripture, etc., and when they have passed the required examinations...
The vows made in the congregation are simple, not solemn vows, and they are perpetual, or for life, so that no religious can leave the congregation of his own accord after profession, and no one can be dismissed except for some grave and canonical reason. For the sanctification of its members and the maintenance of the spirit of the congregation in their community life, besides practising the austerities and mortifications prescribed by Rule and familiar only to themselves, the Passionists spend five hours every day in choir chanting the Divine Office or in meditation. They rise at midnight and spend one hour and a half chanting Matins and Lauds. They abstain from flesh meat three days in the week throughout the year, and during the whole of Lent and Advent; but in cold and severe climates, as in the British Isles, a dispensation is usually granted allowing the use of flesh meat two or three times a week during those seasons. They wear only sandals on their feet. Their habit is a coarse woolen tunic. They sleep on straw beds with straw pillows. They spend the time free from choir and other public acts of observance in study and spiritual reading, and, that they may have Our Lord's Sacred Passion continually before their mind, they wear upon their breasts and mantles the badge of the congregation on which are inscribed the words Iesu, XI Passionis (Passion of Jesus Christ).

Activities or Missionary Labours.—For the spiritual good of others, the second end of their institute, in Catholic countries they do not ordinarily undertake the cure of souls or the duties of parish priests, but endeavour to assist parish priests of the places where their houses are established, especially in the confessional. In non-Catholic countries, and in countries where the population is mixed, that is, made up of Catholics and non-Catholics, they undertake the duties of such circumstances, and they may undertake ordinary parochial duties and the cure of souls when requested to do so by the bishops or ordinaries, and this is the case in England, in the United States of America, and in Australia. Otherwise the congregation could not have been established or maintained in these countries. Whenever houses and churches of the congregation exist, the fathers are always ready to preach, to instruct, and to hear the confessions of all persons who may have recourse to them. They also receive into their houses priests or laymen who wish to go through a course of spiritual exercises under their direction.

The principal means, however, employed by the Passionists for the spiritual good of others, is giving missions and retreats, whether to public congregations in towns or country places, or to religious communities, to colleges, seminaries, to the clergy assembled for this purpose, or to particular sodalities or classes of people, and even to non-Catholics, where this can be done. The principal purpose of their concentration. In their missions and retreats, in general, they follow the practice of other missionaries and accommodate themselves to the exigencies of the locality and of the people; a special feature, however, of their work is that every day they give a meditation or a simple instruction on the Passion of our Saviour Jesus Christ; in some form or other this subject must invariably be introduced in public missions and private retreats. The Passionists make a particular vow, like that of the Jesuits, to be ready to go on foreign missions among the infidels or wherever the pope may send them, but their Rules enjoin them to be thus ready and at the disposal of the pope or of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda; and accordingly Passionist bishops and missionaries have been engaged in propagating the faith and in watching over the faithful in Rumana and Bulgaria almost since the time of St. Paul of the Cross. At an early period also a few Italian Passionists went to preach the Gospel to the aborigines of Australia, but they had to abandon that mission after many trials and sufferings and the missionaries were scattered. Some of them returned to Italy and rejoined their brethren (see Moran, "History of the Catholic Church in Australasia").

In respect to missionary work and labours for the good of souls the Passionists profess, whatever one, never to refuse their services in any department of Our Lord's Vineyard, whatever the place to which they are sent be the most humble and poorest, or the people with whom they have to deal be the most thankless or intractable, and even though they may have to expose themselves to attending to those affected by pestilential diseases.

Growth and Extent.—Before the death of its founder twelve retreats of the institute had been established in different parts of Italy and Europe. The year of his death (1775) and 1810 several others had been founded, but all in Italy. These were all closed in the general suppression of religious institutes by order of Napoleon. For the Passionists, who had no house outside Italy, this meant total suppression, as the whole of that country was under the tyrant's sway. After the fall of Napoleon and the recovery of Papal Vienna, Rome and to his possessions, the religious orders were speedily restored. The first of the orders to attract the pope's attention was the Congregation of the Passion, although it was the smallest of all. They were the first to resume the religious garb and community life in their Retreat of Sts. John and Paul. This event took place on 8 June, 1814. They soon regained their former retreats and new ones were in a short time founded in the Kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, in Tuscany, and elsewhere.

From the time of the restoration of the congregation under Pius VII it has continued without interruption to increase in numbers and influence. It has branched into many and distant countries outside Italy. At present, retreats of the congregation exist in England, Scotland, Ireland, Belgium, France (in this country the communities have been disbanded since 1803 by the Republican Government), Spain, United States of America, Argentine Republic, Chile, Mexico, and Australia; and Passionist missionaries continue their labours under two Passionist bishops in Bulgaria.

The Anglo-Hibernian Province.—The first foundation in English-speaking countries in the order of time is the Anglo-Irish-Hibernian Province of St. Joseph. The Passionists were introduced into England by Father Dominic of the Mother of God (Barberi) who arrived at Oscott College, Birmingham, for this purpose with only one companion, Father Amadens (17 Oct., 1841). They came in the spirit of Apostles without gold or silver, without script or staff or shoes or tunic. They had, however, three ecclesiastical friends who received them kindly and encouraged them in their enterprise by advice and patronage. These were: Dr. Walsh, Bishop of the Midland District; Dr. Wiseman, then the coadjutor bishop; and Father Ignatius Spencer, who joined the congregation in 1847 and laboured as one of its most salutary and devoted sons until his death in 1865. Father Dominic and his companion took possession of Aston Hall, near Stone, Staffordshire, on 17 Feb., 1852, and there established the first community of Passionists in England. At the time of the arrival of the Passionists there were only 560 priests in England and the distressful state of the Church there may be learned from the Catholic Directory of 1840.

The Passionists with Father Dominic at their head soon revived without commotion several Catholic customs and practices which had died out since the Reformation. They were the first to adopt strict community life, to wear their habit in public, to give missions and retreats to the people, and to hold public sermons, and to multiply and spread the effects of the Cross, were laughed at by Protestants, warned by timid Catholics, but encouraged always by Cardinal Wiseman. Their courage became infectious, so that in a short time almost every order now in England followed their example. There were two or three Fathers of Charity then in England, but they were content to find work for their brothers until his death in 1865. Father Dominic and his companion laboured for seven years in England, during which he founded three houses of the congregation. He died in 1859. For fourteen years after its introduction into England, the progress of the congregation had been slow. In the beginning of 1856 there were only nine native priests and three lay-brothers; the rest, to the number of sixteen or seventeen, were foreigners.

Present.—It was during this year they secured their first foundation in Ireland, which was the beginning of a new era of progress for the Passionists at home and beyond the seas. Father Vincent Grooti, then acting-provincial, invited and encouraged by Cardinal Cullen, in 1856 purchased the house and property called Mount Argus, near Dublin, where the provincial house of the congregation now stands. A community was soon formed there. Father Paul Mary (Bon. Reginald Pakenham, son of the Earl of Longford) was the first rector of the retreat, and died there 1 March, 1857. This remarkable seer of a noble house, first an officer in the army, received into the Catholic Church by Cardinal Wiseman at the age of twenty-nine, entered the Congregation of the Passion in 1841, lived for six years an austere and pious life according to its Rule, and died in the obscurity of sanctity.

In course of time other houses were founded in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. In 1857 four priest students, made O. P. Passionists, of whom O'Fagham, O'Niall, and Brother Lawrence Carr, at the invitation of Cardinal Moran, went from this province to establish the congregation in Australia. Soon three houses of the institute were founded at Sydney, Goulburn, and Adelaide respectively. All three remain united to the home province. In 1862 a house was founded in Paris (which became afterwards known as St. Joseph's Church in the Avenue Hoche) for the benefit of English-speaking Catholics, and it has remained the centre of spiritual ministries for the purpose for which it was founded to the present time, though secularized in 1903 by the Republican Government.

This province of St. Joseph, including Australia, possesses two thousand and one hundred and two priests, 36 professed students (21 of whom are reading theology), 12 novices, and 27 professed lay-brothers; in all 181 members.

In the United States.—In 1852 Dr. O'Connor, Bishop of Pittsburg, obtained from the general of the Passionists three fathers and a lay-brother to start a branch of the congregation in Pennsylvania. The first missionaries were Fathers Anthony, Alhans, and Stanislaus. They were totally ignorant of the English language and, humbly speaking, most unlikely men to succeed in Apostolic labours in America. They were at first housed in the bishop's palace, but a retreat was soon built for them, and these three Passionists soon attracted others to be their companions and, in the space of twenty years, were able to build up a flourishing province. In that period as Father Fusz writes: "Five splendid houses of our Congregation graced and beautified the States: a basilica has arisen in Hoboken, Cincinnati, Dunkirk, Baltimore, and Louisville can testify how these poor men increased in numbers and property, and have been enabled to have such splendid results. They have built two extra churches in Pittsburg, and two more in New Jersey. Recently a foundation has been made in the Diocese of Brooklyn at Shelter Island. It will be used as a house of studies for novices and as a summer retreat for the priests. The American Province is more numerous and splendid than any other in the order at present. Not only have they supplied their own wants, but they have sent offshoots to Mexico, Buenos Ayres, and Chile to be seeds of future provinces which may one day vie with their own" (1882, MS.).

The number of the religious and of the houses of the congregation increased gradually until the province became so extended that the superiors deemed it advisable to form a new province in the States. Accordingly, as a branch from the old and first province, a second was founded, under the title of the Holy Cross, by the authority of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, in 1906. There are therefore at present two Passionist provinces in the United States, namely, the Province of the Holy Cross and that of the Holy Cross. The former comprises 6 retreats, 113 professed priests and students, and 26 lay-brothers; the latter has 5 retreats, 76 priests and students, and 19 lay-brothers.

According to the general catalogue issued in 1905, the whole congregation includes 12 provinces, 91 retreats, and 187 religious and 1,478 priests, the majority of the congregation, dedicated to St. Martha, was founded at Bethany, near Jerusalem, in 1903.

The Congregation of the Passion has never had a regular cardinal protector, as is the case with other religious orders. The sovereign pontiffs have always retained it under their own immediate protection, and have always been ready, according to the spirit and the words of Clement XIV, to assist it by their authority, protection, and favour (letter to the founder, 21 April, 1770), and Pius VII by a special Bull in 1801 declared the congregation to be under the immediate protection of the pope.

Passionists in the U.S.A.—In the "History of the Congregation of the O. P. Passionists; Pius's Spiritus Sancti, The Life of St. Paul of the Cross (Dublin, 1846); Hellicot, Miss; Diet. des ordres religieux, IV (Paris, 1853), supplement, 1014 sq.

Passionist Nuns.—In the "Life of St. Paul of the Cross" by Venerable Strambi, we have evidence of his design from the beginning of the Congregation of the Passion to found an institute in which women, conso-crated to the service of God, should devote themselves to prayer and meditation on our Lord's Passion. It was not until towards the end of his life that he wrote the rules of the institute which were approved by a Brief of Clement XIV in 1770. St. Paul had as cooperatrix in the foundation of the Passionist nuns, a religious, known as Mother Mary of Jesus Crucified, whose name was Josephina Gertrude Costantini. She was born at Corneto, 18 August, 1713. In youth she placed herself under the direction of St. Paul of the Cross, and became a Benedictine in her native city, awaiting the establishment of a Passionist convent. Through the generosity of her relatives, Dominie Costan tini, Nicolas his brother, and Lucia his wife, a site was obtained for the convent in Corneto, and a suitable house and chapel were built. On the Feast of the Holy Cross, 1771, Mother Mary of Jesus Crucified, with the permission of Clement XIV, with ten postulants, was clothed in the habit of the Passion and entered the first convent of Passionist nuns, solemnly opened by the vicar capitular of the diocese. St. Paul, detained by illness, was represented by the first consultor general of the order, Father John Mary. Of Jesus Crucified became the first mother superior of her order and remained so until her death in 1787. The spirit of the institute and its distinctive character is devotion to the Passion of Christ, to which the sisters bind themselves by vows. Their life is austere; their aims are to bring the world to the knowledge of the Passions, and to lead them to repentance. Their convents are strictly enclosed. The sisters chant or recite the Divine Office in common and spend the greater part of the day in prayer and other duties of piety. They attend to the domestic work of the convent, and occupy themselves in their cells with needlework, making vestments. With the approbation of Pius IX a house was established at Maners in the Diocese of le Mans, France, in 1872, and continued to flourish until suppressed with other religious communities in 1903 by the Government. There is also a Passionist convent at Lucca whose foundation was predicted by Gemma Galgani, the twentieth-century mystic. On 5 May, 1910, five Passionist nuns from Italy arrived in Pittsburg to make the first foundation of their institu tin the United States.

SISTERS OF THE MOST HOLY CROSS AND PASSION.—This second Order of Passionist nuns was founded in England in 1850 when Father Gaudentius, one of the first Passionists, resided in the house at Oldham, and the order of the nuns, formed of women of the country, formed a plan of providing a home for factory girls in Lancashire. With the sanction and approba tion of Dr. Turner, then Bishop of Salford, and his vicar-general, a house was secured for a convent and home in Manchester in 1851. The first superior was Mother Mary Joseph Paul. The community prospered and rules were drawn up. The sisters took the name of Sisters of the Holy Family and in course of time became aggregated to the Congregation of the Passionists (although immediately subject to the bishop of the diocese) under the name of Sisters of the Most Holy Cross and Passion. The institute under this title and its rules were approved by Pius IX on 2 July, 1876. In 1922 it received its final approbation from Leo XIII, by a De cree dated 21 June, 1887. The institute had its origin chiefly in the lamentable state of female operatives in the large towns of England, who, though constantly exposed to the greatest dangers to faith and morals, had no spiritual guardians or instructors save the clergy. To present and maintain these women, and, if erring, to help them reform, are the special tasks of the sis ters. The Passionist spirit of the institute may be known from their approved rules. "As this congrega tion is affiliated to and bears the same name as the Congregation of Clerks of the Most Holy Cross and Passion of Jesus Christ, let them in a particular manner strive to keep alive in their hearts the memory of Jesus Crucified, and cultivate an ardent and tender devotion to His most holy Passion and Death, so that they may imbibe His spirit, learn His virtues, and faithfully imitate them. Although the Sisters are not bound, as are the above named Clerks, by a special vow, they should, nevertheless, with all eagerness promote the same salutary devotion in the hearts of those whose education they undertake" (Rules, ch. 1). The sisters have founded foundations of their own and for factory girls; they also teach parochial schools, and have boarding schools for secondary education. They instruct converts and others, visit the sick, and permorm all the duties of Sisters of Mercy and Charity. Since their final approbation they have increased rap tidly, and now number more than 18,000 in 104 convents in England, 3 in Ireland, and 3 in Scotland. 2 training colleges for teachers, and large parochial schools wherever their houses are established, 9 homes for factory girls; the sisters number 430. A similar Society was established in Chili by the Passionists a few years ago and these are now, by their own request, to be aggregated to the Anglo-Hibernian sisterhood. Another active community of Passionist Sisters was established, and existed in Lourdes until 1903.

PASSION MUSIC.—Precisely when, in the development of the liturgy, the history of the Passion of Our Lord ceased, during Holy Week, to be merely read and became a solemn recitation, has not yet been ascer tained. As early as the eighth century the deacon of the Mass, in alb, solemnly declaimed, in front of the altar, on a fixed tone, the history of the Passion. The words of our Lord were, however, uttered on the gos pel tone, that is, with inflexions and cadences. The original simplicity of having the whole allotted to one person gave way in the twelfth century to a division into three parts assigned to three different persons, the priest, or celebrant, the deacon, and the sub-deacon. To the priest were assigned the words of our Lord, the deacon assumed the role of the Evangelist, or ekro nista, while the sub-deacon represented the crowd, or turba, and the various other persons mentioned in the narrative. The interrelation of the alternating voices, their relative pitch, and the manner of interpreting the part allotted to each have come down to us and may be heard in Holy Week in almost any city church, the one change since the early times being that the parts are now generally sung by priests. The juxtapo sed melodic phrases extend over an ambitious, or compass of the whole of the fifth and two tones of its plagal, or the sixth mode. The evangelist, or chronista, moves between the tone and the dominant, while the suprema vox, representing the crowd, etc., moves be tween the dominant and the upper octave. The tones upon which the words of our Lord are uttered are the lower tetra-chord of the fifth mode with two tones of the sixth. Later the fourth tone of the fifth mode, b, was altered into b flat, to avoid the tritonus between the tone and the fourth. Throughout the Middle Ages the Passion was the theme most frequently treated in mystery plays and the early times being that the parts are now generally sung by priests. The indispensible music in these performances was either the plain chant or liturgical melodies or religious folk-songs. It was not until toward the end of the fifteenth century that the whole narrative received harmonic treatment.

Jacobus Hoberch, or Obrecht (1450-1536), was the first composer of the class of motet for voices, which laid the foundation for a rich and varied litera ture of passion music. In Obrecht's composition the three melodic phrases are, in a most ingenious manner, made to serve as cantus firmi, and, by skilful combing of the various voices and letting them unite, as a rule, only on the utterances of the turba, variety is main tained. The work must have become known in a comparatively short time, for it soon found imitators, not only among Catholic composers, of almost every country in Europe, but also at the hands of those in Germany, who joined the Reformation. Besides the choral, or motet, form, of which Obrecht's work has retained the service string of earlier renaissance methods, it came into vogue in which the three original chanteurs were retained, and the chorus participation was mainly confined to the utterances of the tura. Both forms were cultivated simultaneously, according to the predilection of the composer, for almost a century and a half.

Among the more noted Catholic masters who have left settings of the passion texts must be mentioned the sixteenth-century Jean le Cooke (d. before 1543), choir-master at the Court of the Duke of Ferrara, who wrote a work for from two to six voices. Cyprian de Bore (b. 1516), left a setting for two, four, and six voices. Ludovicus Daser (1525–89), Orlando Lassus's predecessor as choir-master at the ducal Court of Bavaria wrote one for four voices. Lassus himself gave to posterity four different interpretations which are notable for the fact that the master frequently substitutes original melodies for the liturgical ones and sometimes the chorus is employed to give expression to the texts belonging to a single person. The tura is always represented by a five-part chorus. Probably the most important innovation in the interpretation of the Passion work came about two Thomas Luis da Vitoria (1540–1613). Vitoria retains the plain-chant melodies for single persons and makes them serve, after the manner of Obrecht, as canti fermo in the ensemble. The value of these works is proved by the fact that for more than three hundred years they have formed part of the repertoire of the Austrian Court Chapel. "The Passion of Vittoria," as it is called, is a direct forerunner of Graun's "Tod Jesu". While the source resorted to by non-Catholic composers for the last mentioned great works seems to have been exhausted, no similar compositions appear for more than a century, three Catholic composers have referred to the Passion work: Joseph Haydn and Theodore Dubois have interpreted "The Seven Last Words on the Cross" and its score was set by Graun in "Tod Jesu", but these compositions partake of the form of the oratorio, to which the 16th-century tura was restricted. The tura is in falsobordone style, alternate with the liturgical melodies are numerous. Among the more noted are those by Caspar Ett (1725), Ignaz Mitterer, Franz Nekes, Emil Nikl, and others.

Passion of Christ, Commemoration of the, a feast kept on the Tuesday after Sexagesima. Its object is the devout remembrance and honour of Christ's sufferings for the redemption of mankind. Whilst the feast in honour of the instruments of Christ's Passion—the Holy Cross, Lance, Nails, and Crown of Thorns—called "Arma Christi", originated during the Middle Ages, this commemoration is of more recent origin. It appears for the first time in the Breviary of Meissen (1517) as a festum simplex for 15 Nov. The same Breviary has a feast of the Holy Face for 15 Jan. and one of the Holy Name for 15 March (Grotefend, "Zeitrechnung" (Hanover, 1892), II, 118 sq.). These feasts disappeared with the introduction of Lutheranism. As for the feast of the Holy Cross in the Roman Breviary, it was initiated by St. Paul of the Cross (d. 1775). The Office was composed by Thomas Struzien, Bishop of Todt, the faithful associate of St. Paul. This Office and the corresponding feast were approved by Pius VI (1775–99) for the Discalced Clares of the Holy Cross and the Passion of Christ (commonly called Passionists), founded by St. Paul of the Cross. The feast is celebrated by them as a double of the first class with an octave (Nilles, "Kal. man.", II, 69). At the same time Pius VI approved the other Offices and feasts of the Mysteries of Christ's Passion: the feast of the Prayer of Our Lord in the Garden (Tuesday after Sabattina); the Crown of Thorns (Friday after Ash-Wednesday); the Holy Lance and Nails (Friday after the first Sunday in Lent); and for the following...
Passion of Jesus Christ, Devotion to the.—The sufferings of Our Lord, which culminated in His death upon the cross, seem to have been conceived of as one inseparable whole from a very early period. Even in the Acts of the Apostles (i, 3) St. Luke speaks of those to whom Christ "shewed himself alive after his passion" (peri tōn eμφανίζοντας τον θανάτως). In that age, which has been rendered post passionem eum, and not only in the Reims Testament but the Anglican Authorized and Revised Versions, as well as the medieval English translation attributed to Wyckif, have retained the word "passion" in English. Passion also meets us in the same sense in other early writings (e.g. Tertullian, "Adv. Marcellin." IV, 40) and the word was clearly in common use in the middle of the third century, as in Cyprian, Novatian, and Commodian. The last named writes:

St. Paul declared, and we require no further evidence to convince us that he spoke truly, that Christ crucified was "unto the Jews indeed a stumbling-block, and unto the Gentiles foolishness" (1 Cor., i, 23). The shock to Pagan feeling, caused by the ignominy of Christ's Passion and the seeming incompatibility of the Divine nature with a felon's death, seems not to have been without its effect upon the thought of Christians themselves. Hence, no death arose that prolife growth of heretical Gnostic or Docetic sects, which denied the reality of the man Jesus Christ or of His sufferings. Hence also came the tendency in the early Christian centuries to depict the countenance of the Saviour as youthful, fair, and radiant, the very antithesis of the image of the dolorous, maladjusted Jesus which Hippolytus, Tertullian, St. Irenæus, St. Cyprian, St. Athanasius, St. John Chrysostom, St. Jerome, and St. Cyril leave us. These men of primitive Christian times were all alive when the earliest Passion shows were being performed in the first quarter of the fifth century. But while the existence of such a tendency to draw a veil over the physical side of the Passion may readily be admitted, it would be easy to exaggerate the effect produced upon Christian feeling in the early centuries by Pagan ways of thought. Harnack goes too far when he declares that the Death and Passion of Christ were regarded by the majority of the Greeks as too sacred to be made the subject of imitation or speculation, and when he declares that the feeling of the early Greek Church is accurately represented in the following passage of Goethe: "We draw a veil over the sufferings of Christ, simply because we revere them so deeply. We hold it to be reprehensible to lay to the imagination of the common people the task of interpreting the profound mysteries in which the Divine depths of suffering lie hidden, never to rest until even the noblest seems mean and tasteless." (Harnack, "History of Dogma", tr., III, 306; cf. J. Reit, "Die frühchristlichen Darstellungen der Kreuzigung Christi", 5). On the other hand, while Harnack speaks with caution and restraint, other more popular writers give themselves to reckless generalizations such as may be illustrated by the following passage from Archdeacon Farrar: "The aspect", he says, "in which the early Christians viewed the cross was that of triumph and exultation, never that of mourning and misery. It was the emblem of victory and of rapture, not of blood or suffering, of the Kingdom, not of the Man... Of course it is true that down to the fifth century the specimens of Christian art that have been preserved to us in the catacombs and elsewhere, exhibit no traces of any sort of representation of the crucifixion. Even the simple cross is rarely found before the time of Constantine (see Chass.), and when the figure of the Diocletian is located, it is first applied as most commonly under some symbolical form, e.g. that of a lamb, and there is no attempt as a rule to represent the crucifixion realistically. Again, the Christian literature which has survived, whether Greek or Latin, does not dwell upon the details of the Passion or very frequently fall back upon the motives of our Savior's sufferings. There is, as is well known as "Christus Patiens", which is printed with the works of St. Gregory Nazianzus and was formerly attributed to him, is almost certainly a work of much later date, probably not earlier than the eleventh century (see Arundnacher, "Byz. Lit.", 716).

It would be absurd to infer that the Passion was not a favourite subject of contemplation for Christian ascetics. To begin with, the Apostolical writings preserved in the New Testament are far from leaving the sufferings of Christ in the background as a motive of Christian endeavour: take, for instance, the words of St. Peter (1 Pet., ii, 19, 21, 23): "For this is thankworthy, if for conscience towards God, a man endure sufferings, suffering wrongfully"; "For unto this are ye called: because also Christ suffered for us, leaving you an example that ye should follow his steps." "Who, when he was reviled, did not revile", etc., or again: "Christ therefore having suffered in the flesh, be ye also armed with the same thought" (ibid., i, 19). St. Gregory of Nazianzus, in his "Christi Passionem", says: "I am nailed to the cross. And I live, now, not I: but Christ liveth in me"; and (ibid., v, 21): "they that are Christ's, have crucified their flesh, with the vices and concupiscences" (cf. Col., i, 24); and perhaps most strikingly of all (Gal., vi, 14): "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ: by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." Seeing the great influence that the New Testament exercised from a very early period upon the leaders of Christian thought, it is impossible to believe that such passages did not leave their mark upon the devotional practice of the West, though it is easy to discover plausible reasons why this spirit should not have displayed itself more conspicuously in literature. It certainly manifested itself in the devotion of the martyrs who died in imitation of their Master, and in the spirit of martyrdom that characterized the early Church.

Further, we do actually find in such an Apostolical Father as St. Irenæus of Lyons, who was a contemporary, the Syriac by birth, wrote in Greek and was in touch with Greek culture, a very continuous and practical reiteration of the Passion. After expressing in his letter to the Romans (cc. iv, ix) his desire to be martyred, and by enduring many forms of suffering to prove himself the true disciple of Jesus Christ, the saint continues: "Him I seek, who dies on our behalf! Him I desire who rose again for our sake. The praises of a new birth are upon me. Suffer me to receive the pure light. When I am come thinner then shall I be a man. Permit me to be an imitator of the Passion of my God. If any man hath Him within himself, let him understand what I desire, and let him have fellow-feeling with me, for he knoweth the things which straiten me." And again he says in his letter to the Smyrneans (c. iv.:) "near to the sword, near to God i. e. Jesus Christ), in company with wild beasts, in company with God. Only let it be in the name of Jesus Christ. So that we may suffer together with Him (Rom. viii, 17)."

Moreover, taking the Syriac Church in general—and rich as it was in the traditions of Jerusalem it was far from being an unimportant part of Christendom—we do find a pronounced and even emotional form of devotion to the Passion established at an early period. Already in the second century a fragment preserved to us of St. Melito of Sardis speaks as Father Faber might have spoken in modern times. Apostrophising the people of Israel, he says: "Thou sliwest thy Lord and He was lifted up upon a tree and a tablet was fixed up to denote who He was that was put to death—and who was this?—Listen while ye tremble:—He on whose account the earth quaked; He that suspended the earth was hanged up; He that fixed the heavens was fixed with nails; He that supported the earth was supported upon a tree; the Lord was exposed in naked nudity with a naked body; God put to death: the King of Israel slain by an Israelitish right hand. Ah! the fresh wickedness of the fresh murder! The Lord was exposed with a naked body, He was not deemed worthy even of covering, but in order that He might not be seen, the lights were turned away, and the day darkened because they were slaying God, who was nailed upon the tree" (Cureton, "Speculum Syriacum", 55).

No doubt the Syrian and Jewish temperament was an emotional temperament, and the tone of their literature may often remind us of the Cletic. But in any case it is certain that a most realistic presentation of Our Lord's sufferings found favour with the Fathers of the Syrian Church apparently from the beginning. It would be easy to make long quotations of this kind from the works of St. Ephraem, St. Isaac of Antioch, and St. James of Sarugh. Zingerle in the "Theologische Quartalschrift" (1870 and 1871) has collected many of the most striking passages from the last two writers. In St. Ephraem, "Letter to Christ" we have a very Oriental imagination embroidering almost every detail of the story of the Passion. Christ's elevation upon the cross is likened by Isaac of Antioch to the action of the stork, which builds its nest upon the treetops to be safe from the insidious approach of the snake; while the crown of thorns suggests to him a type of crown with which the earth was crowned and rounded, protecting all the children of God who are gathered in the nest from the talons of the hawk or other winged foes (Zingerle, ibid., 1870, 108). Moreover St. Ephraem, who wrote in the last quarter of the fourth century, is earlier in date and even more copious and realistic in his minute study of the physical details of the Passion. It is difficult to convey in a short quotation any true impression of the effect produced by the long-sustained note of lamentation, in which the orator and poet follows up his theme. In the Hymns on the Passion (Ephraem, "Syri, Hymnii et Sermones," ed. Lamy, i) the writer moves like a devout pilgrim from scene to scene, and from object to object, dwelling on everything with much compassion, while the seven "Sermons for Holy Week" might both for their spirit and treatment have been penned by any medieval mystic. "Glory be to Him, how much he suffered!" is an exclamation which bursts from the preacher's lips from time to time. To illustrate the general tone, the following passage from a description of the scene last suffered:

"After many vehement outcries against Pilate, the all-mighty One was scourged like the meanest criminal. Surely there must have been commotion and horror at the sight. Let the heavens and earth stand astrew: that to behold Him who swayed the rod of fire, Himself smitten with scourges, to behold Him who spread over the earth the veil of the skies and who set fast the foundations of the mountains, which poised the earth over the waters and sent down the blazing lightning flash, now beaten by infamous whorlets over a stone pillar that His own word had created. They, indeed, stretched out His limbs and outraged Him with mockery. A man whom He had formerly declared a scourgis. He who suffered with His might submitted His back to their stripes; He who is the Father's right arm yielded His own arms to be extended. The pillar of ignominy was embraced by Him who bears up and sustains the heaven and the earth in all their splendour" (Lamy, l, 511 sq.). The same strain is continued over several pages, and amongst other quaint fancies St. Ephraem remarks: "The very column must have quivered as if it were alive, the cold stone must have felt that the Master was bound to it who had given it its being. The column shuddered knowing that the Lord of all creatures was being scourged!" And he adds, as a marvel, witnessed even in his own day, that the "column had contracted with fear beneath the Body of Christ!"

In the devotional atmosphere represented by such contemplations as these, it is easy to comprehend the scenes of touching emotion depicted by the pilgrim lady of Galicia who visited Jerusalem (if Dr. Meeuse's protest may be safely neglected) towards the end of the fourth century. According to her description how "that passage of the Gospel is read where the Lord was apprehended, and when this passage has been read there is such a moaning and groaning of all the people, with weeping, that the groans can be heard almost at the city!" While during the three hours' ceremony on Good Friday from midday onwards we are told: "At the several lectures and prayers there is such emotion displayed and lamentation of all the people as is wonderful to hear. For there is no one, great or small, who does not weep on that day during those three hours, in a way that cannot be imagined, that the Lord should have suffered such that, when they had seen the last crowd of pilgrims who streamed to Jerusalem from all parts of the world. The tone of St. Jerome (see for instance the letters of Paula and Eustochium to Marcella in a. d. 396; P. L., XXII, 191) is similar, and St. Jerome's words penetrated wherever the Latin language was spoken. An early Christian prayer, reproduced by Wessely (Les plus anciens noms de Christ, 206) shows the same spirit.

We can hardly doubt that soon after the reliks of the True Cross had been carried by devout worshippers into all Christian lands (we know the fact not only from the statement of St. Cyril of Jerusalem himself but also from inscriptions found in North Africa only a little later in date) that some ceremonial analogous to our modern processions was adopted and promulgated, and that the veneration paid to the relic of the True Cross at Jerusalem. It was at this time too that the figure of the Crucified was again to be appreciated in Christian art, though for many centuries any attempt at a realistic presentment of the sufferings of Christ was almost unknown. Even in Gregory of Tours (De Glor. Mart.) a picture of Christ upon the cross seems to be treated as something of a novelty. Still such hymns as the "Pange lingua glorios praelium certaminis", and the "Vexilla regis", both by Venantius Fortunatus (c. 570), clearly mark a growing tendency to dwell upon the Passion as a separate and not mere part of the Passion, and to treat it more and more as a dramatic recital of the Passion by three deacons representing the "Chronista", "Christus", and "Sycamochus", in the Office of Holy Week probably originated at the same period, and not many centuries later we begin to find the narratives of the Passion in the Four Evangelists copied separately into books of devotions. This, for example, is the case in the English collection known as "The Book of Cerne." An eighteenth-century collection of devotions (Ms. Harley 2966) contains pages connected with the incidents of the Passion. In the tenth century the Cursus of the Holy Cross was added to the monastic Office (see Bishop, "Origin of the Prayers", p. xvi). Still more striking in its revelation of the developments of devotional imagination is the existence of such a vernacular poem as Cynewulf's "Dream of the Rose", in which the tree of the cross is conceived of as telling its own story. A portion of this Anglo-Saxon poem still stands engraved in rune letters upon the celebrated Ruthwell Cross in Dumfriesshire, Scotland. The italicized lines in the following represent portions of the poem which can still be read upon the stone:

I had power to do my devoir, his foes to fell,

but yet I stood fast.

Then the young hero prepared himself,

That was Almighty God,

Strong and firm of mood,

he mounted the lofty cross courageous and brave, of many,

when he willed to redeem mankind.

I trembled when the hero embraced me,

yet dared I not bow down to earth,

fall to the bosom of the ground,

but I was compelled to stand fast,

a cross was I reared,

I raised the powerful King,

The lord of the heavens,

I dared not fall down.

They pierced me with dark nails,

on me are the wounds visible.

Still it was not until the time of St. Bernard and St. Francis of Assisi that the full developments of Christian devotion to the Passion were reached. It seems likely probable that this was an indirect result of the preaching of the Crusades, and the consequent awakening of the minds of the faithful to a deeper realization of all the sacred memories represented by Calvary and the Holy Sepulchre. When Jerusalem was recaptured by the Saracens in 1187, worthy Abbot Samson of Bury St. Edmund was so deeply moved that he put on haircloth and renounced flesh meat from that day forth—and this was not a solitary case, as the enthusiasm evoked by the Crusades conclusively shows.

Under any circumstances it is noteworthy that the first recorded instance of stigmata (if we leave out of account the doubtful case of St. Paul) was that of St. Francis of Assisi. Since his time there have been over 320 similar manifestations which have reasonable claims to be considered genuine (Poulain, "Graces of Interior Prayer", tr., 175). Whether we regard these as being wholly supernatural or partly natural in their origin, the comparative frequency of the phenomenon seems to indicate the attitude of Catholic mysticism in regard to the Passion of Christ, which has only established itself since the beginning of the thirteenth century. The testimony of art points to a similar conclusion. It was only at about this same period that realistic and sometimes extravagantly contorted crucifixes met with any general favour. The people, of course, lagged far behind the mystics and the religious orders, but they followed in their wake; and in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries we have innumerable illustrations of the adoption by the laity of new practices of piety to honour Our Lord's Passion. One of the most fruitful and practical was that type of spiritual pilgrimage to the Holy Places of Jerusalem, which eventually crystallized into what is now known to us as the "Way of the Cross" (q. v.). The "Seven Falls" and the "Seven Bloodshedings" of Christ may be regarded as variants of this form of devotion. How truly genuine was the piety evoked in an actual pilgrimage to the Holy Land is made very clear, among other documents, by the narrative of the journeys of the Dominican Felix Fabri at the close of the fifteenth century, and the immense labour taken to obtain exact measurements shows how deeply men's hearts were stirred by even a counterfeit pilgrimage. Equally to this period belong both the popularity of the Little Office of the Cross and the "De Passione", which are found in so many of the Horae, manuscript and printed, and also the introduction of new Masses in honour of the Passion, such as for example as those which are now almost universally celebrated upon the Fridays. The Thursday Masses were formerly celebrated in the books compiled towards the close of the Middle Ages for the use of the laity, such as the "Hore Betar Mariae Virgines", the "Hortulans Animi", the "Paradisus Animae" etc., shows the existence of an immense number of prayers either connected with incidents in the Passion or addressed to Jesus Christ upon the Cross. The best known of this class of prayers were the fifteen prayers attributed to St. Bridget, and described most commonly in English as "the Fifteen O's", from the exclamation with which each began.

In modern times a vast literature, and also a hymnology, has grown up relating directly to the Passion of Christ. Many of the innumerable works produced in the last century and a half, amount of truth and precision of facts have now been completely forgotten, though some books like the medieval "Life of Christ" by the Carthusian Ludolphus of Saxony, the "Sufferings of Christ" by Father Thomas of Jesus, the Carmelite Guevara's "Mount of Calvary", or "the Passion of Our Lord" by Father de La Palma, S.J., are still read. Though such writers as Justus Lipsius and Father Guert, sat, at the end of the sixteenth century, and Dom Calmet, O.S.B., in the eighteenth, did much to illustrate the history of the Passion from historical sources, the general tendency of all devotional literature was to ignore such means of information as were provided by archaeology and science, and to turn rather to the revelations of the thirteenth century or to the fulfillment of the visions of the seventeenth century.

Amongst these, the Revelations of St. Bridget of Sweden, of Maria Agredo, of Marina de Escobar and, in comparatively recent times, of Anne Catherine Emmerich are the most famous. Within the last fifty years, however, there has been a reaction against this practice of placing these books in the first plane, and many of the revelations plainly contradict each other, for example on the question whether the right or left shoulder of Our Lord was wounded by the weight of the cross, or whether Our Saviour was nailed to the cross standing or lying. In the best modern lives of Our Saviour, such as those of Dalon, Fouard, and Le Camus, every effort is made of subsidiary sources of information, not neglecting even the Talmud. The work of Père Ollivier, "The Passion" (tr., 1905), follows the same course, but in many widely-read devotional works upon this subject, for example: Faber, "The Foot of the Cross"; Gallwey, "The Watches of the Passion"; Coleridge, "Passiontide" etc.; Groenings, "Histoire de l'Expiation" (Eng.); De R. d. Leidens d. Herrn; Grimm, "Leidengeschichte Christi"; the writers seem to have judged that historical or critical research was inconsistent with the ascetical purpose of their works.

HERBERT THURSTON.

Passion of Jesus Christ in the Four Gospels.—We have in the Gospels four separate accounts of the Passion of Our Lord, each of which supplements the others, so that only from a careful examination and comparison of all can we arrive at a full and clear knowledge of the whole story. The first three Gospels resemble each other very closely in their general plan, so closely indeed that some sort of literary connection among them may be assumed; but the fourth Gospel, although the writer was evidently familiar at least with the general tenor of the story told by the other three, gives us an independent narrative.

If we begin by marking in any one of the Synoptic Gospels the verses which correspond with those of the other two, and then read these verses continuously, we shall find that we have in them a brief but a complete narrative of the whole passion story. There are of course very few details, but all the essentials of the story are there. In St. Mark's Gospel the marked verses will be as follows: xiv, 1-10, 16-18, 21-23, 26, 30, 32, 35-6, 41, 43, 45, 47-9, 53-4, 65 to xv, 2, 8, 11-15, 21-2, 26-7, 31-33, 37-9, 41, 45, 46-7. These verses resemble the others so closely as to be almost repetitions. The verses run consecutively. Sometimes the division will not quite coincide with the verse. It is possible that this nucleus, out of which our present accounts seem to have grown, represents more or less exactly some original and more ancient narrative, whether written or merely oral matters little, compiled in the earliest days at Jerusalem. This original narrafested by our Lord, and sets forth the Passion as the great act by which the redemption of mankind was accomplished. He is the only one who records the statement of Pilate that he found no cause in Jesus; and also the examination before Herod. He alone tells us of the angel who came to strengthen Jesus in his agony in the garden, and, if the reading is right, of the cup of the angel which ministered with the sweat which trickled down upon the ground. To St. Luke again we owe our knowledge of no less than three of the seven words from the Cross; the prayer for His murderers; the episode of the penitent thief; and the last utterance of all, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit". Really it is St. Luke alone who tells us of the effect produced by the incident, and who so short a time before had been so full of hatred, and how they returned home "striking their breasts".

The traditional character of the Fourth Gospel as having been written at a later date than the other three, and after they had become part of the religious possession of Christians generally, is entirely borne out by a study of the passion. Although almost all the details of the story are new, and the whole is drawn up on a plan owing nothing to the common basis of the Synoptists, yet a knowledge of what they had written is presupposed throughout, and is almost necessary before this later presentation of the Gospel can be fully understood. Materially it is fully related in the earlier Gospels, are altogether omitted in the Fourth, in a way which would be very perplexing had we not thus the key. For instance, there is no mention of the institution of the Holy Eucharist, the agony in the garden, or the trial and condemnation before Caiphas. On the other hand, we have a great number of facts not contained in the Synoptists. For instance, the eagerness of Pilate to release our Lord and his final yielding only to a definite threat from the Jewish leaders; the presence of our Lady at the foot of the Cross, and Jesus' last charge to her and to St. John. Most important of all perhaps is the piercing of the side by the soldier's spear, and the flowing forth of blood and water. It is St. John alone, again, who tells us of the order to break the legs of all, and that Jesus Christ's legs were not broken, because he was already dead.

There seems at first sight a discrepancy between the narrative of the Fourth Gospel and that of the Synoptists as regards the crucifixion, which involves the question whether the Last Supper was or was not, in the strict sense, the Paschal meal. If we had the Synoptists only we should almost certainly decide that it was, for they speak of preparing the Pasch, and give no hint that the meal which they describe was anything else. But St. John seems to labour to show that the Paschal meal itself was not to be eaten until the next day. He points out that the Jews would not enter the court of Pilate, because they feared pollution which might prevent them from eating the Pasch. He is so clear that we can hardly mistake his meaning, and certain passages in the Synoptists really point to the same view. Joseph, for instance, was able to buy the linen and the spices for the burial, which would not have been possible on the actual feast-day. Moreover, one passage, which at first sight seems strongest in the other direction, has quite another meaning when the reading is corrected. "With desire I have desired", said Jesus to His Apostles, "this of old that" which with you, before I suffer. For I say to you, that from this time I will not eat it, till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God" (Luke, xxii, 15). When the hour for it had fully come He would have been already dead, the type would have passed away, and the kingdom of God would have already come.

Arthur S. Barnes.

Passion Plays.—The modern drama does not originate in the ancient, but in the religious plays of the Middle Ages, themselves an outcome of the liturgy of the Church. Ecclesiastical worship was thoroughly dramatic, particularly the Holy Mass, with its progressive action, its dialogue between the priests and their ministers at the altar, or, on feast-days, between the officiating priest and his assistants, with the choir of singers, and the people. Often as n. g. at Christmas, the Easter Sunday, the performance of the Gospel called for a variety of roles. The celebration of the feasts was as rich and varied as they were numerous; poetry and music, in particular, helped to impress properly on the laity the full significance of the great events commemorated. The Benedictiones of St. Gall, in Switzerland, in the tenth century, and the Exultet, liturgical books, have set them to music. The tropes—elaborations of parts of the Liturgy, particularly the Introit, i.e. musical settings—found universal acceptance and remained in use in various forms until the end of the seventeenth century. These tropes were dramatic in construction and, as their musical settings prove, were sung alternately by two choirs of men and boys, or by two choirs. The history of the ecclesiastical drama begins with the trope sung as Introit of the Mass on Easter Sunday. It has come down to us in a St. Gall manuscript dating from the time of the monk Taddeo (tenth century).

The understanding between the holy women and the angels at the sepulchre of our Lord forms the text of this trope, which is comprised in the four sentences: "Quem queritis in sepulchro, o christicola?"—Jesum Nazarenorum, o exulcora.—Non est hic, Sursexit, surrexit de sepulchro.—Resurrexi, postquem factus homo, in saecula aeterni potenter cerce. The first three sentences are found in many liturgical books dating from the tenth to the eighteenth century. The trope, however, did not develop into a dramatic scene, until it was brought into connexion with the Descent from the Cross, widely commemorated in Continental monasteries, which appears first in a Ritual of English origin, attributed to St. Dunstan (967). In giving directions for public services, the Ritual refers to this custom, particularly as observed at Fleury-sur-Loire and Ghent. On Good Friday, after the morning services, a crucifix swathed in cloth was laid in a sort of grave arranged near the altar, where it remained until Easter morning. On Good Friday evening the sponsor of the Matins, one or two clerics clothed in albs, and carrying palms in their hands, went to the grave and seated themselves there. Thereupon three other priests vested in copes, and carrying censers representing the three holy women, joined them. Upon their arrival the angel asked them: "Whom seek ye?" The women answered; they hear from the angel the message of the Resurrection and were told to go forth and announce it. Then they intoned the antiphon: "Surscit eum, sicut dictus dominus. Alleluia." The choir finished Matins with the "Te Deum".

This simplest form of liturgical Easter celebration was elaborated in many ways by the addition of Biblical sentences, hymns, and sequences, in particular the "Vacitam paschali", which dates from the first half of the eleventh century; also by the representation of St. Peter and St. John running to the grave, and by the appearance of the Lord, who thereupon becomes the central figure. The union of these scenes in one concerted action (the dialogue), rendered in poetic form (hymns, sequences) or in prose (Bible texts), and the participation of a choir gave to the Nuremberg Easter celebration of the thirteenth century the character of a short chanted drama. Such celebrations, however, were not repeated until as late as the eighteenth century. They were inserted between Matins and Lauds, and served for the instruction of the people, whose hearts and minds were more deeply impressed by reproductions of the Resurrection of the Lord, which appealed to the senses, than by a written rite which was too obscure, since the separate parts of the plays were known or were previously explained. The wide diffusion of these liturgical plays, in which priests took the different parts, is proof of their popularity. Large, to whom we owe some thorough studies on this subject, proves the existence of 224 Latin Easter dramas, of which 153 were found in Germany, 52 in France, and the rest in Italy, Spain, Holland, and England.

The popular taste for dramatic productions was fed by these Easter celebrations. The clergy emphasized more and more the dramatic moments, often merely hinted at in the rude original celebrations, and added new subjects, among them some of a secular nature. They introduced the characters of Pilate, the Jews, and the soldiers guarding the sepulchre; added the figure of an ointment-vender bargaining with the holy women; and other features which did not contribute to the edification or instruction of the people, though they satisfied their love of novelty and amusement. In this way the early Easter celebrations became real dramatic performances, known as the Easter Plays. Since the element of worldly amusement predominated more and more in development of which Gerholh of Reichenberg complained as early as the twelfth century), the ecclesiastical authorities began to prohibit the production of Easter Plays in the churches. It became necessary to separate them from church services, because of their length, which increased greatly, particularly after the introduction of the story of the Passion. Fragments of an Easter Play in Latin dating from the thirteenth century are found in the Benedicirurn Easter Play, also in that of Klosterneuburg, both of which, probably, go back to the same source as the Mystery of Tours, composed as late as the thirteenth century, and which, better than any other, offers an insight into the development of the Easter Plays from the Latin Easter celebrations.

When, in course of time, as shown in the Easter Play of Trier, German translations were added to the original texts as sung and spoken, the popularizing of the Easter Play had begun. That of the monastery of Mun, in Switzerland, belongs to this period, and is written entirely in German. But it was only after the popular element had asserted itself strongly in all departments of poetry, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, that the popular German religious drama was developed. This was brought about chiefly by the strolling players who were certainly responsible for the introduction of the servant, of the ointment-vender (named Robin), whose duty it was to entertain the people with coarse jests (Wallen-butt, Innsbruck, Berlin, Vienna, and Mecklenburg Easter Plays, 1464). The Latin Easter Plays, with their solemn texts, were still produced, as well as the German plays, but gradually, being displaced by the latter, the Latin text was confined to the meagre Biblical element of the plays and the player's directions. The clergy still retained the right to direct these productions, even after the in the spirit and opinions of the times. Popular poetry, gross and worldly, dominated in the plays, particularly susceptible to the influence of the Carnival plays.

The Easter Plays represented in their day the highest development of the secular drama; nevertheless this most important event in the life of the God-Man did not suffice the people with his whole life, particularly the story of his Passion. Thus a series of dramas originated, which were called Passion Plays, the sufferings of Jesus being their principal subject. Some of them end with the entombment of Christ; in others the Easter Play was added, in order to show the Saviour in His glory; others again end with the Ascension or with the dispersion of the Apostles. But, since the persecution of the Saviour is intelligible only in the light of His work as teacher, this part of the life of Christ was also added, while some authors of these plays went back to the Old Testament for symbolic scenes, which they added to the Passion Plays as "prefigurations" of the passion with the Creation, the sin of Adam and Eve, and the fall of the Angels. Again, two short dramas were inserted: the Lamentation of Mary and the Mary Magdalene Play. The sequence "Planctus ante nescia", which was brought to Germany from France during the latter half of the twelfth century, is the basis for the Lamentations of Mary. This sequence is merely a monologue of Mary at the foot of the Cross; by the introduction of John, the Saviour, and the bystanders as taking part in the ideas until, in the fifteenth century, the popular religious plays had developed. Thus the Benedicirurn Passion Play (thirteenth century) is still largely composed of Latin ritual sentences in prose and of church hymns, and, being designed to be sung, resembles an oratorio. Yet even this oldest of the Passion Plays already shows, by the interpolation of free translations of church hymns and of German verses not pertaining to such hymns, as well as by the appearance of the Mother of Jesus and Mary Magdalene in the action, a tendency to break away from the ritual and to adopt a more popular form. From these humble beginnings, the Passion Play developed rapidly, since in the fourteenth century we see it at a stage of development which could not have been reached except by repeated practice. From this period we have the Vienna Passion, the St. Gall Passion, the oldest Frankfort Passion, and the Maestricht Passion. All four Plays, as they are commonly called, are still played today in Germany. The Vienna Passion embraces the entire history of the Redemption, and begins with the revolt and fall of Lucifer; it is to be regretted that the play as transmitted to us ends with the Last Supper. The oldest Frankfort Passion play, that of Canon Baldein von Peterwell (1350-80), the production of which required two days, was more profusely elaborated than the other Passion Plays of this period. Of this play only the "Ordo sive Registrum" has come down to us, a long roll of parchment for the use of the director, containing directions and the first words of the dialogues. The plays based on this list of directions lead us to the period when Passion Plays is an exact expression of the dramatic development (1300-1515). During this period the later Frankfort Passion Play (1467), the Aldfelder, and the Friedberger (1514) originated. Connected with this group are the Eger, the Donaueschingen, Augsburg, Freising, and Lucerne Passion Plays, in which the whole world drama, beginning with the creation of man and brought down to the coming of the Holy Ghost, is exhibited, and which was produced with great splendour as late as 1583. Nearly all these Passion Plays have some relation to those coming from the Tyroli, some contributing to, others taking from, that source. These, again, are founded upon the Tyrolian Passion Play which originated during the transition period of the fourteenth to the fifteenth century. Wackernag, with the aid of the plays that have reached us, has reconstructed this period. In the Tyrol the Passion Plays received elaborate cultivation; at Bozen they were presented with great splendour and lasted seven days. Here, too, the theatre was highly developed. The costumes in the hands of women was introduced, which innovation did not become general until during the seventeenth century. The magnificent productions of the Passion Plays during the fifteenth century are closely connected with the growth and increasing self-confidence of the cities, which found its expression in noble buildings, ecclesiastical and municipal, and in gorgeous public festivals. The artistic sense and the love of art of the citizens had, in cooperation with the clergy, called these plays into being, and the wealth of the citizens provided for magnificent productions of them on the public squares, whether they migrated almost with the high officers of the state, or whether civil authorities considered it a point of honour to render the production as rich and diversified as possible. Ordinarily the preparations for the play were in the hands of a spiritual brotherhood, the play itself being considered a form of worship. People of the most varied classes took part in the production, and frequently the number of actors was as high as two hundred and even greater. It was undoubtedly no small task to drill the performers, particularly since the stage arrangements were still very primitive.

The stage was a wooden structure, as broad as it was long, elevated but slightly above the ground and extending in all sides. A musty-looking ground; a balcony attached to the house represented Heaven. Under the balcony three crosses were erected. Sometimes the stage was divided into three sections by doors. Along the sides of the stage, taken lengthwise, stood the houses required for the production; they were indicated by fenced-in spaces, or by four posts upon which a roof rested. The entrance into hell was pictured by the mouth of a monster, through which the devil and the souls captured or released during the plays passed back and forth. The actors entered and exited quickly and the stage was left open from the windows of neighbouring houses. Occasionally platforms, called "bridges", were erected around the stage in the form of an amphitheatre.

The scenery was as simple as the stage. There were no side scenes, and consequently no stage perspective. Since an illusion of reality could not be had, indications were made to suffice. Thus a cask standing on end represents the mountain on which Christ is tempted by the devil; thunder is imitated by the report of a gun; in order to signify that the devil had entered into him, Judas holds a bird of black plumage before his mouth and makes it flutter. The suicide of the saintly person, whom it is desired to be excused from the hangman's duty, he precedes the culprit up the ladder, and draws Judas after him by a rope. Judas has a black bird and the intestines of an animal concealed in the front of his clothing, and when Satan tears open the garment the bird flies away, and the intestines fall out, whereupon Judas and his executioner slide down into hell on a rope. Realized in paint a picture representing the soul, is hung from the mouth of each of the two thieves on the cross; the angel takes the soul of the penitent, the devil that of the impenitent thief. Everything is presented in the concrete, just as the imagination of the audience pictures it, and the scenic conditions, reenacting those of the antique theatre, demand. All costume, however, is contemporary, historical accuracy being ignored.

age of enlightenment, efforts were made in Catholic Germany, particularly in Bavaria and the Tyrol, to destroy even the remnants of the tradition of medieval plays. Frequent productions in St. Thomas' School in Leipzig led to the formation of the Gesellschaft für das letzte Abendmahl und das Passionsspiel (1822), thus beginning the dramatic tradition of the so-called Oberammergauer Passion Plays. In 1868 a Tyrolian drama was produced in the Tyrolian theater. Some productions of the Passion Play there are referred to in an article by W. W. H. M. Halle, "The Passion Play in the Tyrol," Horitz in southern Bohemia, and above all, Oberammergau in Upper Bavaria attract thousands to their plays. The text of the play of Vorderthiersee (Gespiel in der Vorderthiersee) dates from the second half of the nineteenth century, but is entirely in verse, and comprises in live acts the events recorded in the Gospel, from the Last Supper to the Entombment. A prelude (Vorgespiel), on the Good Shepherd, precedes the play. After being repeatedly remodelled, the text received its present classical form from the Austrian Benedictine, F. Weissenauer. Productions of the plays, which came to Basel, to the Tyrol in the second half of the eighteenth century, were arranged at irregular intervals during the first half of the nineteenth century; since 1855 they have taken place at regular intervals, at Brig- legg every ten years. The Horitz Passion Play, the present text of which is from the pen of Provost Kautz, has been produced every five years since 1893.

The chief survival, however, of former times is the Passion Play of Oberammergau. The first mention we find of it is in 1633, when it is referred to in connexion with a vow made to obtain relief from the Black Death, when the people of Ammergau resolved to commemorate the great deliverance. As early as 1634 the Passion was enacted (tragiert). Since this Passion Play was then well-known, productions must have taken place before that date. The oldest text still in existence was written about 1600 and contains tracts of two older dramas, one of which was preserved at St. Ulrie, the other at St. Albegin. Angermuller, Das leidige Pfarrerlein, M. Weisbuch, Sebastian Wild, was woven into it, together with parts of the Weilheim Passion Play of Rector Johann Aebel (c. 1600). About the middle of the eighteenth century the text was revised by the Benedictine Rosner, after the model of the Jesuit drama; in 1780 this bombastic version was again reduced to a simpler form by the Benedictine Kridl. Finally, P. Othmar Weiss and M. Daisenberger gave it its present simple and dignified form, and transcribed the verse into prose. Stage and costume are adapted to modern requirements. The music is by Rosthus Dedder. (See also Miracle Plays and Mysteries.)

Anselm Salzen. Passions.—By passes we are to understand here motions of the sensitive appetite in man which tend towards the attainment of some real or apparent good, or in the avoidance of some evil. All these motions which the object is desired or abhorred, the more vehement is the passion. St. Paul thus speaks of them: "When we were in the flesh, the passions of sin, which were by the law, did work in our members, to bring forth fruit unto death" (Rom., vii, 5). They are called passions because they cause the transformation of the moral condition of the body and its organs which often appears externally. It may also be noted that there is in man a rational appetite as well as a sensitive appetite. The rational appetite is the will; and its acts of love, joy, and sorrow are only called passions metaphorically, because of their likeness to the acts of the sensitive appetite. They are classed by St. Thomas and the Schoolmen as follows: The sensitive appetite is twofold, concupiscible and irascible, specifically distinct because of their objects. The object of the concupiscible is real or apparent good, and suitable to the sensitive inclination. The object of the irascible appetite is good qualified by some special difficulty in its attainment. The chief passions are eleven in number: Six in the concupiscible appetite—namely, joy or delight, and sadness, desire and aversion or abhorrence, love and hatred—and five in the irascible—hope and despair, courage and fear, and anger.

To explain the passions in their relation to virtue it is necessary to consider them first in the moral order. Some moralists have taught that all passions are good if kept under subjection, and all bad if unrestrained. The truth is that, as regards morality, the passions are indifferent, that is, neither good nor bad in themselves. Only in so far as they are voluntary do they come under the moral law. Their motions may some- times be and are desirable; the will must be strong enough to resist every command of the will. The feelings in connexion with the passions may be lasting, and not always under the control of the will, as for example the feelings of love, sorrow, fear, and anger, as experienced in the sensitive appetite; but they can never be so strong as to force the consent of our free will unless they first run away with our reason.

These involuntary motions of the passions are either morally good or morally bad. They become voluntary in two ways: (1) by the command of the will, which can command the inferior powers of the sensitive appetite, and exert their influence, for the will can resist by refusing its consent to their promptings, and it is bound to resist when their promptings are irrational and inordinate. When voluntary, the passions may increase the intensity of the acts of the will, but they may also lessen their morality by affecting its freedom.

In regard to virtue the passions may be considered in the three stages of the spiritual life: first, its acquisition; secondly, its increase; thirdly, its perfection. When regulated by subject, and related to the control of the will, the passions may be considered good and used as means of acquiring and exercising virtue. Christ Himself, in whom there could be no sin nor shadow of imperfection, admitted their influence, for we read that He was sorrowful even unto death (Mark, xiv, 34), that He wept over Jerusalem (Luke, xix, 41), and at the tomb of Lazarus He groaned in the spirit, and troubled Himself (John, xi, 33). St. Paul bids us rejoice with them that rejoice, and weep with them that weep (Rom., vii, 24). The sensitive appetite is devoted to man by God, and therefore its acts can be employed in His service. Fear of death, judgment, and hell prompts one to repentance, and to the first efforts in acquiring virtue. Thoughts of the mercy of God produce hope, gratitude, and correspondence. Reflection on the sufferings of Christ moves to sorrow for sin, and to compassion and love for Him in His suffering.

The moral virtues are to regulate the passions and employ them as aids in the progress of spiritual life. A just man at times experiences great joy, great hope and confidence, and other feelings in performing duties of piety, and also great sensible sorrow, as well as sorrow of soul, for his sins, and he is thus restrained in his justice. He can also meet it constantly by restraining and purifying his passions.

The saints who have reached the exalted state of perfection, have retained their capacity for all human emotions and their sensibility has remained subject to the ordinary laws; but in them the love of God has controlled the mental images which excite the passions, and directed all their emotions to the active service. It has been justly said that the saint dies, and is born again: he dies to an agitated, distracted, and sensuality, by temperance, continency, and austerity, and is born to a new and transformed life. He passes through what St. John calls "the night of the senses", after which his eyes are opened to a clearer light. "The saint will return later on to sensible objects to enjoy them in his own way, but far more intensely than other men" (H. Joly, "Psychology of the Saints", 128). Accordingly we can understand how the passions and the emotions of the sensitive appetite may be directed and devoted to the service of God, and to the acquisition, increase, and perfection of virtue.

All admit that the passions, unless restrained, will carry a man beyond the bounds of duty and honesty, and plunge him into sinful excesses. Unbridled passions cause all the moral ruin and most of the physical and social evils which afflict men. There are two adverse elements in man contending for the mastery, and designated by St. Paul as "the flesh" and "the spirit" (Gal., v. 17). These two are often at variance with each other in inclinations and desires. To establish and preserve harmony in the individual, it is necessary that the spirit rule, and that the flesh be made obedient to it. The spirit must set itself free from the tyranny of the passions in the flesh. It must free itself by the renunciation of all those unlawful things which our lower nature craves, that right order may be established and preserved in the relations of our higher and lower nature. The flesh and its appetites, if allowed, will throw everything into confusion and sensible nature but with bad consequences. It is man's duty to control and regulate it by reason and a strong will aided by God's grace.

Passion Sunday, the fifth Sunday of Lent, a Sunday of the first class, not permitting the celebration of any feast, no matter of what rank, but allowing a commemoration of feasts which are not transferred, is called Dominica de Passione in the Roman Missal, and Dominica Passionis in the Breviary. Durandus and other liturgical writers speak of it as Dominica in Passione, or simply Pascha, or Passio Domini. It is also known as Judica Sunday, from the first word of the Introit of Mass; Is so sund, from the beginning of the first Psalm; Octavas, being the eighth day after Lenten Sunday, called sometimes Mediana, or Middle of Lent; Rupus, an abbreviation of repositus, i.e. absconditus, or hidden from the veil of the Crosses (Du Cange, "Glossar." s. v. repositus). Among the Slavs it is the Neda strastna (pain, suffering, terrible), makt (painful, or sorrowful), gloha (death or silent), tiba (quiet), smertela (relating to death), and also cerna (black), which appellation is also found in some parts of Germany as "Schnitter Sunday". Since this Sunday there are not many days of the year during which the Greek Church adorns the faithful to special mortifications, and places before them the example of the penitent St. Mary of Egypt.

Passiontide, the two weeks between Passion Sunday and Easter. The last week is Holy Week, while the first is called by the Latins "Hebdomas Passionis", by the Greeks "Week of the palms" (from the Sunday following). During this time the monks of the East, who had chosen the desert for a severer mode of life, returned to their monasteries (Cyril of Scythopolis in "Life of St. Euthymius", n. 11). The rabrical precriptions of the Roman Missal, Breviary, and "Ceremoniale Episcoporum" for this time are: before Vespers of Saturday preceding Passion Sunday the crosses, statues, and pictures of Our Lord and of the saints on the altar and throughout the church, with the sole exception of the crosses and pictures of the Way of the Cross, are to be covered with a violet veil, not transluent, nor in any way ornamented. The crosses remain covered until after the solemn veneration of the principal crucifix on Good Friday. The statues and pictures retain their covering, no matter what feast may occur, until the Gloria in Excelsis of Holy Saturday. According to an answer of the S. R. C. of 14 May, 1878, the practice may be tolerated of keeping the statue of St. Joseph, if outside the sanctuary, uncovered during the month of March, which is dedicated to his honour, even during Passiontide. In the Missae de tempore the Psalm Judica is not said; the Gloria Patri is omitted at the Aspersions, the Introit, and the Lavabo; only two orations are recited and the Preface is of the Holy Cross. In the Psalter, the Proper of Passiontide the doxology is omitted in the Invitatorium and in the responses, whether long or short. The crosses are veiled because Christ during this time no longer walked openly among the people, but hid himself. Hence in the papal chapel the veil formerly took place at the words of the Gospel: "Jesus autem abscondit se", ch. iv. 42, at which time, according to the rubric, it was said that Christ's divinity was hidden when he arrived at the time of His suffering and death. The images of the saints also are covered because it would seem improper for the servants to appear when the Master himself is hidden (Nikles, "Cal." II, 188). In some places the crosses were covered on Ash Wednesday; in others on the first Sunday of Lent. In England it was customary on the first Monday of Lent to cover up all the crucifixes, images of every kind, the reliquaries, and even the cup with the Blessed Sacrament. The cloths used were of white linen or silk and marked with a red cross (Rock, "Intra", IV, 258). The two beautiful hymns of the season, "Vexilla Regis" and "Pange lingua gloriosi", are the work of Venantius Fortunatus (q. v.), Bishop of Poitiers. On the Friday of Passion Week the Church very appropriately honours the Seven Docharus of Our Lady. On Saturday the Greeks commemorate the resurrection of Lazarus.

Passos (or, more fully, Santos Passos), the Portuguese name locally used to designate certain pious exercises, including representations of the Sacred Passion, practised annually during Lent at Goa and in other Catholic communities in India. The representations of the Passion are made by means of images and figures, although at one period in the past, living beings also took part in them. According to Father Pascuel, Louis, chemist, founder of physio-chemistry, father of bacteriology, inventor of bio-therapeutics; b. at Doue, Jura, France, 27 Dec., 1822, d. near Sévres, 28 Sept., 1893. His father was a poor tailor who moved to Arbois when his son was but two months old. Pasteur received his early education at the College of Arbois, but paid little attention to his books, devoting himself to fishing and sketching. For a time it seemed as though he would become a painter. When science was reached in the course he grew interested. He received his degree at Besançon and then in order to devote himself to science went to Paris to study under Dumas, Belard, and Biot. His father helped him, but he had to support himself partly by his own labours. His first original work was done on crystals. Mitscherlich announced that two tartaric acids, apparently identical in chemical qualities and in crystalline form, acted differently in solution toward polarized light. Refusing to accept this dictum, Pasteur demonstrated that the crystals thought to be similar were different, and explained the seeming inconsistency.

His discovery attracted wide attention. As a result he devoted himself to the study of what he called dissymmetry, pointing out that inorganic substances are not dissymmetrical in their crystallization, while all organic substances and all life are dissymmetrical. He concluded that there was some great biological principle underlying this. As the result of his discovery he was made (1848) professor of physics at the Lyceé of Dijon; three months later he became deputy-professor of chemistry at the University of Strasbourg, and full professor in 1852; in 1854 dean of the Pasteur Institute, founded in his honour.

His early chemical studies led him to the investigation of fermentation and putrefaction, which he showed were due to living gerns of various kinds. From this the demonstration that spontaneous generation does not take place was but a step. He showed that in highly-organized material, if the living gerns are all destroyed, and if further access of gerns be prevented, even though air may be allowed free access, fermentation or putrefaction does not take place. A piece of cotton wool, or a mere holding of the neck of the neck is sufficient after sterilization to keep organic solutions quite sterile. The study of fermentations led Pasteur to studies in vinegar, wine, and beer. As the result of his successful investigation of ferments he was asked by the Empress Eugénie whether he would not only devote himself to the organization of great manufacturing industries for the benefit of France. He replied that he considered it quite beneath the dignity of a scientist to give up his time to commerce, and while he was willing that others should take advantage of his discoveries he wanted to push on to further scientific work.

This was a fortunate decision. His successful investigations of the French king’s desire to appeal to him for a study of the silver disease. This had produced such ravages in the silk industry in France that the end of it seemed not far off. Many expediends and supposed remedies had been tried. Fresh silk-worms had been brought from China on a number of occasions, but they succumbed to the disease, or their progeny became affected by it. Nothing availed and the case seemed hopeless. Pasteur found the silk-worm had been suffering from two diseases, phorine and fusarium. At the end of the trial of the courses of cocooning, he could be prevented by careful segregation of healthy worms from those diseased. The announcement seemed too good to be true and was scouted. Pasteur demonstrated its absolute truth and his practical ability by taking charge of the villa of the French Prince Imperial, where the silk industry had been ruined. In the course of cocooning, a net profit of 26,000,000 francs (over $5,000,000).

Naturally Pasteur proceeded to the study of diseases of animals and human beings. He demonstrated the bacterial cause of anthrax, which had made serious ravages among cattle in France. The organism was distributed by contact, real contagion. Earthworms, he showed, carry it up from the bodies of animals buried in shallow graves to infect grazing animals. He found further that he could by heat reduce the virulence of the anthrax microbe, so that it produced but a mild form of the disease which would protect cattle against the fatal form. Then he discovered the cause of fowl cholera. He showed that the formations of the cultures would not produce the disease in fowl, though it served to protect them against injections of virulent cultures, which would kill “control” fowl. The discoveries of vaccinating viruses for these two diseases saved France millions of dollars every year.

Pasteur proceeded with the development of bacteriology and its relation to disease. Having studied many cases of child-bed fever at the hospitals, he declared before a medical society that he had seen its cause, and challenged he drew a picture resembling a resary of what we now know as a streptococcus, or chain cocci. He discovered other cocci (berry) forms of pathological microbes, some of them arranged in bunches like grapes, hence called staphylococci. Finally came his work on rabies. Unable to find the cause of the disease, which has not yet been discovered, he succeeded in making from the desiccated spinal cords of animals dead from the disease a vaccinating virus, which protects human beings bitten by a rabid animal against the developments of rabies. This treatment met with great opposition. The Germans talked sneeringly of “a remedy of which we know nothing for a disease of which we know less.” With time Pasteur’s vindication came. The Russians, who suffered severely from rabies, from the bites of mad wolves on the steppes, found it of great service and the tsar honoured Pasteur by a personal visit. Next the British in India found it wonder-working. Other countries adopted it. Finally the German Government established Pasteur Institutes, and acclaimed the discovery.

Many honours came to Pasteur. Besides the Rumford and Copley Medals (1856–1874), in 1868 the American Government gave him a prize of 10,000 francs for his work on silk-worms; in 1873 the French Société d’Encouragement, a prize of 12,000 francs; the Russian Society of Rural Economy, a medal (1882); the Albert medal (1882); the Bressa Prize, 50,000 francs (Turin Academy, 1888); the French Government, an annual pension of 12,000 francs (1874), increased in 1883 to 25,000 francs, and besides all the degrees of the Legion of Honour orders were conferred on him by Russia, Denmark, Greece, Brazil, Sweden, Turkey, Norway, and Portugal. Oxford gave him a D.C.L., Bonn, an honorary M.D., the English Royal Society, foreign membership, and Florence, and that the spread of academic duties was made Permanent Secretary of the Academy of Sciences in 1887. There was a magnificent celebration of his jubilee on his seventy-sixth birthday, 27 Dec., 1892, to which contributions were sent from every civilized country and all the great institutions of learning.

Pasteur’s faith was as genuine as his science. In his panegyric of Littér, whose jus traditum he took, he said: “Happy the man who bears within him a divinity, an ideal of beauty and obeys it; an ideal of art, an ideal of morality, an ideal of charity, an ideal of duty, an ideal of truths of the Gospel.” These words are gravely above his tomb in the Institut Pasteur. In his address Pasteur said further “These are the living springs of great thoughts and great actions. Everything grows clear in the reflections from the infinite.” Some of his letters to his children breathe profound simple piety. He used to declare “There was a great faith that of the Breton peasant. Could I but know all I would have the faith of a Breton peasant woman.”

What he could not above all understand is the failure of scientists to recognize the demonstration the existence of the Creator that there is in the world around us. He died with his rosary in his hand, after listening to the Life of St. Vincent de Paul which he had asked to have read to him, because he thought that his work is like that of St. Vincent would do much to save suffering children.

Pasteur’s principal works are: “Etudes sur le Vin,” (1860); “Etudes sur le Vinagre” (1868); “Etudes sur Les Vins Versus Alcool” (2 vols., 1870); “Quelques Réflexions sur la Science en France” (1871); “Etudes sur la Bière” (1876); “Lee Microbes organised, leur rôle dans la Feration, la Putréfaction et la Contagion” (1878); “Discours de Réception de M. L. Pasteur à l’Académie Française” (1882); “Traité de la Raie” (1886).

PASTO, Diocese of (Pastensis, Pastopolitana), a Colombian see, suffragan of Popayán, from which it was separated by the Bull of Pius IX, “In excelsa militantis ecclesian”, 10 April, 1859. Situated in the State of Cauca, it is founded on the north by the Dioceses of Garzon and Popayán, and on the south by the Vicariate Apostolic of Napo, Ecuador. The present bishop, Mgr Adolfo Perea, b. 1853 in the Diocese of Popayán, elected 16 December, 1907, succeeded Mgr Ezequiel Moreno, O.S.A. (b. at Alfaro, Tarazona, 9 April, 1838, made titular Bishop of Finaré, 20 December, 1853, transferred to Pasto, 25 December, 1863. The diocese contains 315,640 Catholics, 41,000 pagan Indians, 68 parishes, 90 secular and 23 regular priests, 133 churches or chapels. The town of Pasto, containing about 12,000 inhabitants, is well built and is a busy trade centre between Colombia and Ecuador. It is situated at the eastern base of the volcano La Galera at an altitude of 5620 feet. Founded in 1559, it was captured by Bolivar during the War of Independence in 1822, and suffered severely from an earthquake in 1854. It contains many churches, a seminary, a Jesuit college, and an hospital under the care of the Sisters of Charity. On 23 December, 1901, the Prelature Apostolic of Caquetá (q. v.) was separated from Pasto.

Pastor.—This term denotes a priest who has the cure of souls (cura animum), that is, who is bound in virtue of his office to render spiritual services to the faithful by preaching, administering the sacraments, and exercising certain powers of external government, e.g., the right of supervision, giving precepts, imposing light corrections—powers rather patronal in their nature, and differing from those of a bishop, which are legislative, judicial, and executive. A pastor is properly called a parish-priest (parochius) when he exercises the office of souls in his own name with regard to a determined number of subjects, who are obliged to apply to him for the reception of certain sacraments specified in the law. In this article "parish-priest" is always taken in this strict sense. Pastors (whether parish-priests or not) are either irremovable (immutabilia) or movable (movabiles ad normam). An irremovable pastor or rector is one whose office gives him the right of perpetuity of tenure; that is, he cannot be removed or transferred except for a canonical reason, viz., a reason laid down in the law, and, in the case of a criminal charge, only after trial. (See Immutabilium.) A movable pastor or rector is one whose office does not give him this right; but the bishop must have some just and proportionate reason for dismissing or transferring him against his will, and, should the priest believe himself wronged in the matter, he may have recourse to the Holy See, or to its representative where there is one having power in such cases. Moreover, according to some canonists, even movable pastors in case of a criminal charge cannot be dismissed or transferred without a trial (cf. Pianonontelli, "Praxis Fori Ecclesiastici," tit. iv; Smith, "Elements of Ecclesiastical Law," n. 418.) This, certainly, is the case in the United States of America (Decrees of Propaganda, 28 March, and 20 May, 1857).

The Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV, cap. xiii, de Ref.) shows it to be the mind of the Church that dioceses should, wherever it is possible, be divided into canonical parishes (see Patron), to be governed by irremovable parish-priests. In places, therefore, where the Tridentine law cannot be fully carried out, bishops adopt measures which fulfill this requirement as nearly as circumstances allow. One of the creation of quasi-parishes, districts with defined limits, ordered for the United States in 1868 (Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, n. 124). Another such was the institution of irremovable rectors (pastors with the right of perpetuity of tenure), ordered for England in 1852 (First Plenary Council of Westminster, Deer. xiii), and for the United States in 1886 (Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, n. 33).

The power to appoint pastors is ordinarily vested in the bishop. Among the candidates possessed of the necessary qualifications the appointment shall fall on the one who is best fitted for the office. Moreover, according to the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV, cap. vii, de Ref.) a parish priest should in few cases excepted a pass a competitive examination (concursus). This provision of the Council of Trent is sometimes by particular enactments applied in the selection of candidates for the office of irremovable rectors, as happens in the United States (Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, tit. ii, cap. vi).

With regard to the faculties and powers of pastors, those of parish-priests are sufficiently defined by the law, and hence are ordinary, not delegated. Of these faculties some are called rights strictly parochial, because in a parish they belong exclusively to the parish-priest, so that their subjects cannot with regard to them have recourse to another priest, except with his or the bishop's consent. These rights are the following: the right of administering baptism, holy viaticum, and extreme unction in all cases where there is no urgent necessity; the right of administering pastoral communion, of proclaiming the banns of marriage, and of blessing marriages. To the parish-priest are also reserved the celebration of funerals (except in certain cases specified in the law), and the imparting of certain blessings, the chief one being blessing of the baptismal font. To pastors, who are not parish-priests, the right of assisting at marriages is given by the law as to parish-priests. The other rights usually are granted to them by the bishops and are defined in the particular laws; such is very commonly the case in the United States, England, and Scotland, with regard to baptism, holy viaticum, extreme unction, and funerals. Mention should be made here of the custom which exists in certain dioceses of the United States, whereby the faithful of one district are permitted to receive such sacraments from the pastor of another district if they rent a pew in his church (Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, n. 117, 124, 227, and the statutes of several diocesan synods). Rights not strictly parochial are those which belong by law to parish-priests, but not exclusively. Such are the faculties of preaching, celebrating Mass, low or solemn, hearing confessions, administering Holy Communion. Pastors who are not parish-priests receive these faculties from their bishop.

Pastors are naturally entitled to a salary. This is furnished by the revenues of the parochial benefice, should there be one; otherwise, it is taken from the revenues of the church or from the offerings. Such offerings as the faithful contribute of their own accord, without specifying the purpose of their donation, belong to the parish priest, unless he is a salaried pastor. The presumption that these gifts are meant to show the gratitude of the faithful towards the priests who spend their lives in caring for the souls committed to their charge. This presumption, however, cease wherever custom or law provides that at least a certain portion of such offerings should belong to the church. This is generally the case where churches, not possessed of other sources of income, depend entirely on the offerings. An illustration of such laws is to be found in the eighth decree of the Second Provincial Council of Westminster, approved by Leo XIII in the Constitution "Romanos Pontifices" of 8 May, 1881. Accordingly, in countries where the clergy live on the offerings taken up in the churches belong to each mission, in addition to the pew rents, and it is from these revenues that the salaries of pastors and assistants are ordinarily drawn.

Pastors, besides having rights, have also obligations. They must preach and take care of the religious instruction of the faithful, especially of the young, supply their spiritual needs by the administration of the sacraments, reside in their parish or mission, administer diligently the property entrusted to their care, watch over the moral conduct of their parishioners, and remove, as far as possible, all hindrances to their salvation. Moreover, parish-priests must maintain, a few minutes of each Mass, as prescribed by Pius X in his "Moto Proprio", 1 Sept., 1910; they must also offer the Holy Sacrifice on behalf of their flock on Sundays and certain holydays set down in the law. When the number of the faithful entrusted to the care of the pastor is so large that he alone cannot fulfill all the duties incumbent on his office, the bishop has the right to order him to take as many priests to help him as may be necessary. These are called assistants or auxiliary priests, and differ both from curators who are given to pastors for other reasons determined by the law, and from administrators who take charge of a parish during its vacancy, or the absence of its pastor.

Positive law (Council of Trent, Sess. XXI, cap. iv, de Ref.), modified in some countries by custom, reserves to the parish-priest the right to choose his assistants, a choice, however, which is subject to the approval of the bishop, and it is also from the bishop that assistants receive their faculties. The amount of their salaries is to be determined by the bishop, and, as to its source, the same rules hold as those already mentioned with regard to pastors. As to their removal, (a) when their nomination belongs by law to the parish-priest, they can be removed either by him or by the bishop, (b) when their nomination belongs to the bishop, he alone approves them; in any case a reasonable cause is necessary, at least for the lawfulness of the act, and the assistant who believes that he has been wronged may have recourse to higher authorities, as mentioned above with regard to movable pastors. Their office, however, does not cease with the death of the priest or bishop who appointed them, unless this was clearly expressed in the letters of appointment. For the recent legislation regarding the removal of parish-priests, see Parish, section II, 2.

Pastoureux, Crusade of the, one of the most curious of the popular movements inspired by a desire to deliver the Holy Land. St. Louis, King of France, had given the command to go on Crusade, in defense of his brother, Blanche of Castile. Defeated at the battle of Mansourah (8 Feb., 1250) and taken prisoner, he regained his freedom by surrendering Damietta, embarked for Saint-Jean d’Acre, and sent his brothers to France to obtain relief. But Blanche of Castile endeavored in vain to send him reinforcements, neither nobles nor clergy showing good will in this respect. At this juncture the shepherds and labourers rose up, announcing that they would go to the king’s rescue. About Easter (16 April, 1251), a mysterious person whose real name is unknown but who was soon called the “Master of Hungary”, began to preach the Crusade in the name of the Blessed Virgin to the shepherds in the north of France. He was sixty years of age and aroused wonder by his long beard, his thin face, and his always-closed hand, which held, it was said, the map given to him by the Blessed Virgin. He drew crowds by his eloquence, and distributed the Cross among them without authorization from the Church. The movement spread rapidly—from France to Poitou then to Brabant, Hainault, Lorraine, and Burgundy. Soon an army of 30,000 men was formed, carrying a banner on which was depicted the Blessed Virgin appearing to the Master of Hungary. The movement was equally successful in the towns, and the citizens of Amiens furnished provisions to the army. However the Pastoureux soon showed themselves hostile to the clergy, especially to the Friars Preachers, whom they accused of having induced St. Louis to go to Palestine. Moreover, a host of idlers, robbers, cut-throats, and fallen women joined their ranks, and thenceforth with growing audacity they slew clerics and preached against the bishops and even the pope. Blanche of Castile seems to have imagined that she could send the Pastoureux to the relief of St. Louis, and summoning the master to her she questioned him and dismissed him with gifts.

Emboldened by this reception the Pastoureux entered Paris, and the grand-master, wearing a mitre, preached from the pulpit of St. Etienne. Clerics and the people, informed that the sayings had been brought into the Seine, the Bishop of Paris was insulted, and the University of Paris was compelled in its own defense to close the Petit-Pont between the Cité and the left bank of the Seine. The Pastoureux then left Paris and divided into several armies which spread terror everywhere. At Rouen the archbishop and his clergy were expelled from the cathedral (4 June, 1251). At Orleans a large number of university clerics were killed and thrown into the Loire (11 June). At Tours the Pastoureux took by storm the convent of the Dominicans and desecrated the churches. The exulting populace regarded them as saints and brought them the sick to be cured. At last Blanche of Castile realized that she had been mistaken and commanded the royal officers to arrest and destroy them. They were then placed on stakes and burned. At the elevation of the Jews, sacked the synagogues, and pillaged the city. An attempt was made to imprison them, but they broke down the gates. A troop of citizens pursued and halted them near Villeneuve-sur-Cher. The Master of Hungary was slain, together with a large number of his followers. Some of them went to Orleans, Rhône and even Marseilles; others went to Bordeaux, whence they were driven by Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester and Governor of Guienne in the name of the King of England, who caused their leader to be thrown into the Girondes.

Another leader went to England and assembled some shepherds who, learning that the Pastoureux were excommunicated, killed him. Henry II ordered the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports to take measures to prevent their invasion of his kingdom. Some of them submitted, and after having received the Cross at the hands of clerics set out for the Holy Land. Ecclesiastical chroniclers say that the Pastoureux had concluded with the sultan a secret treaty to subject Christianity to Mohammedanism. “It is said that they have resolved first to exterminate the clergy from the face of the earth, then to suppress the religious, and finally to fall upon the knights and nobles in order that the country thereby deprived of defence may more easily be delivered up to the errors and incursions of the pagans” (Letter from the Guardian of the Paris Friars Minor to his brethren at Oxford; Chartularium Univ. Parisiensis, Paris, 1889, 1, 225). This is obviously a fable, but as a matter of fact this popular movement, sincere and somewhat mystical in origin, soon acquired an anarchistic character.

The same is true of the second movement of the Pastoureux in 1320 during the reign of Philip V. In the north of France a suspended priest and unfrocked monk preached the Crusade to a band of peasants, thundering against the iniquity of the king and against the infidels and infidels of some noble who deceived them with the promise of easy profits from the raids on the ships. Chaos reigned in the cities of the Seine, Chartres, Orleans, and Bourges. Saintonge was taken by the Pastoureux, the eastern part of the country. The movement spread rapidly—towards the south into the Girondes, and soon reappeared in the Île-de-France. At Verden-sur-Garonne five hundred Jews imprisoned in a dungeon strangled one another so as not to fall into their hands. They were often aided by the people of the cities and even the middle-class citizens applauded the massacre of the Jews. In reply to the papal excommunication they marched to Avignon, and then resolved to embark like St. Louis at Aigues-Mortes. But the Seneschal of Carcassonne assembled his men at arms, closed the gates of the city against them, and drove them into the neighbouring marshes, where hunger dispersed them. The soldiers then organized hunting parties which resulted in the hanging of thousands of the Pastoureux, but for a long time a number of their bands continued to prey on the south of France.

PATAGONIA is the name given to the southernmost extremity of South America. Its boundary on the north is about 44° S. lat., and on the south the Straits of Magellan. On the west it extends to the Cordilleras and Chile, and on the east to the South Atlantic. It has an area of 500,000 square miles. It was discovered by Magellan in 1520, although a sketch map of the world described by Antonio Galvao showed the Straits of Magellan under the title of the Dragon's Tail. Magellan is supposed to have called the inhabitants "Patagonos" on account of the height of their feet. To this day they wear cotskin shoes which are far beyond their toes, which accounts for their size and his mistakes.

The surface of the country is very varied. Trackless pampas (plains) rise in gently graduated terraces to the lofty ranges of the Andes, between which there is a mighty network of lakes and lagoons. From the south to the Sierra Nevada stretch these pampas in ever-rolling waves of tussock grass, thorn bushes, guanacos, and mirages. On the western run the Cordilleras rise against the sky, holding in their jagged bosoms glaciers and ice blue lakes. On the flanks of these mountains are to be found thousands of square miles of shaggy, primeval forests, only the bare edges of which have up to the present been explored. On the eastern run the, the Desagado, the Southern Chico (which joins the South Cruces and Santa Cruz before emptying its waters into the South Atlantic), and the Gallegos, are the only really important rivers. In general it may be said that the eastern part of Patagonia is level and treeless, with few breaks, whilst the west, really the Chilian seaboard, is everywhere pierced with floods, and has many headlands covered with dark, thick forests, cutting out as early as 142° a map of the world described by Antonio Galvao.

The climate in the north of Patagonia is not so severe as in the south. Very little ice is seen there, except in the mountains, and snow seldom lies on the ground. In the south it is very cold, the ground being covered with snow in winter, and the lakes and rivers choked with ice. For at least six months in the year there are strong gales of wind, and rain is prevalent all over the country. In the south there is practically no summer, whilst in the north there is a mild season which lasts for several months.

The principal settlements are: Gallegos, 3000 inhabitants, on the Gallegos River; Punta Arenas, 1500; Chonchonis, and the small Welsh settlement at Trelew, Rawson, Gaiman and Colonia New Lake Musters, and Chubut. The original inhabitants are all descended from the Araucanian race. They are mostly tall and muscular, averaging at least six feet, and are splendidly developed. In the interior are to be found the Pampas Indians and the tribes of the Tehuelches. The latter are very lazy, and amongst those whom the missionaries have not yet evangelized, it is said that wives are still bought and sold. There is the tribe of the Alacufhe in the south, and the warlike Onas who inhabit Tierra del Fuego. The natives are nomadic in their habits, and live principally on the products of the chase. They hunt the pampas fox, the guanaco or wild llama, and the puma. Some of the tribes, however, are not sufficiently civilized to understand the use of the bow and arrow. They live in cabals, or tents made of raw hide. Agriculture is unknown among them. They are ruled by military governors from Chili or Argentina, according to the territory in which they live. These governors are in charge of the missions and in charge of the native settlements at Punta Arenas, Gallegos, and Chubut. They are each at the head of a small military force, to be used if necessary in punitive expeditions.

Their religion is the crudest form of Dualism. They believe in a land spirit called Guacharo, and in an inferior good spirit. The latter is so much neglected, requires a great deal of propitiation. Their notion of Heaven is a very elementary one, and consists in a kind of happy hunting ground. Their language is guttural and harsh. It is very deficient in words, one sound having frequently to do duty for a large number of ideas. Owing, however, to their intercourse with the whites, many of them have acquired a sufficient knowledge of Spanish to make themselves understood. Ancient remains have been discovered in the country, at about 44° S. lat. Skulls and fine arrow-heads and knives have been found, also the mummy of a female, which has been presented to the Smithsonian Institute. There is no industry to be found in Patagonia, except among the European settlers. They are largely engaged in sheep breeding, and in cattle and horse raising.

The government of the Catholic Church in Patagonia is divided into two parts, northern and southern. The Vicariate of Northern Patagonia was founded in 1883, and canonically approved by Deence on 20 Jan., 1902. Monsignor Giovanni Cagliero, S.C., titular Archbishop of Sebastopol, and Apostolic Delegate of Costa Rica, is at its head, with the Very Rev. Father Stefano Pagliere, S.C., as his vicar-general for the missions. The entire vicariate is under the control and direction of the Salesian Congregation. There are now about fifty priests and a large number of brothers, engaged in mission work and in the various institutes at the wide extent of territory where the work was done by Monsignor Cagliero, Fathers Fagano, Costamagna, Rabaghati, and Espinosa, who formed a small band of missionaries, carefully trained under the eye of the founder of the congregation, Don Bosco. So far there has been no synod, the special conditions of the situation rendering it unnecessary. Besides the priests who are sent on mission from Europe, there are many undergoing training in the institutes and houses established in the vicariate. Each house is a centre from which the natives are visited in their settlements. There are at present nineteen centres, which are situated as follows:-

The Institute of Don Bosco of the Holy Family: the parish church of Our Lady of Mercy, and the subordinate church and Institute of Our Lady of Pity, all in the same settlement of Bahia Blanca; the Mission of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, at Choche-Choe; the parish church of Our Lady Immaculate, at Chosmal; the church and Institute of St. Lawrence; at the Strait of the Magellan, of St. Joseph; the parish and Institute of Mary Help of Christians, at Victoria; the parish of Our Lady of Mercy, and the Institute of Arts and Trades, dedicated to St. Francis de Sales, at Viedma; the Michael Rua Institute and the Mission of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, at Puerto Madryn, Chubut; the parish and Institute of Our Lady of Solitude, at Rawson; and St. Dominie's Institute, at Trelew.

The Prefecture of Southern Patagonia was founded in 1883, and received canonical approval by Deence dated 20 Jan., 1902. The prefect Apostolic is Monsignor Fagano, S.C. This prefecture is also under the control of the Salesian Congregation, all its mission work and in the native settlements. There are four parishes and four chapels. There are about twenty-four priests engaged in mission and teaching work, and there are also many brothers being prepared for the same field of labour. In this southern part of Patagonia the pioneer work was done by Monsignor Fagano, with Fathers Beuvoir, Bordabe, and Diamond; the latter afterward founded the Mission of Our Lady Star of the Sea, at Port Stanley, Falkland Islands, in 1888.
There are at present ten centres, which are situated as follows:—The Mission of Our Lady of Candelaria, at Cabo Peñas; the Mission of St. Agnes, at Cabo Santa Inés; the Mission of the Good Shepherd, and that of St. Raphael, on Dawson Island; the parish and Institute of Our Lady of Luján, Gallegos; the church and Institute of Our Lady Star of the Sea, Buenos Aires; the Mission of the Institute of St. Joseph, at Punta Arenas, and the dependent parish of St. Francis de Sales at Porvenir; the parish and Institute of the Holy Cross, at Santa Cruz; and the Church of Our Lady of Mercy, at Ushuaia, Tierra del Fuego.

In Northern and Southern Patagonia the entire religious and educational work is in the hands of the Salesian Congregation, and the Sisters of Mary Help of Christians. There is no other religious order at present in Patagonia, and no native missionaries. Many Indian youths have been received as students, but so far not one has been raised to the dignity of the priesthood.

The principal work of the Sisters of Mary Help of Christians is the care of children, especially during the winter time. In fact this is the only period of the year when the children can be instructed in the Catholic religion, as during the summer months they are away with their parents on their nomadic excursions. The Salesian Order or the thirteen or more Salesian Missions, are fed, clothed, and taught by the nuns. A few of the girls have been admitted into the order, where they are working for their compatriots.

The sodality of the Children of Mary, among the girls, the Guild of St. Aloysius, among the boys, and the Confraternity of the Sacred Heart among the adults, are in a flourishing condition. Slowly and steadily, as far as it can be done, the Catholic presbytery system and life are being introduced and developed among those poor and uncivilized natives.

Paten.—The eucharistic vessel known as the paten is a shallow plate or disc of precious metal upon which the element of bread is offered to God at the Offertory of the Mass, and upon which the consecrated Host is again placed after the Fraction. The word paten comes from a Latin form patina or patena, evidently imitated from the Greek πατάνη. It seems that the use of the paten began in the beginning of the Christian era. It has been soaked in an open vessel of the nature of a plate or dish. Such vessels in the first centuries were used in the service of the altar, and probably served to collect the offerings of bread made by the faithful and also to distribute the consecrated fragments which, after the leaf had been broken by the celebrant, were brought to the faithful by the deacon, who had received a portion from the paten. It should be noted, however, that Duchesne, arguing from the language of the earliest Orines Romani (q. v.), believes that at Rome white linen bags were used for this purpose (Duchesne, "Liber Pont.," I, introduct., p. cxviii). We have, however, positive evidence that silver dishes were in use, which were called "patra ministralia," and which seem to be closely connected with the calice ministeria in which the consecrated wine was brought to the people. Some of these patra, as we learn from the inventories of church plate in the Liber Pontificalium (I, pp. 262, 271 etc.), weighed twenty or thirty pounds. It is possible, since the earliest times the paten, like the chalices, were probably constructed of glass, wood, and copper, as well as of gold and silver; in fact the "Liber Pontificalium" (I, 61 and 139) speaks of glass patens in its notice of Pope Zephyrinus (A. D. 198-217).

When towards the ninth century the zeal of the faithful regarding the frequent reception of Holy Communion very much declined, the system of consecrating the bread offered by the faithful and of distributing Communion from the paten seems gradually to have changed, and the use of the large and proportionately deep patra ministeria fell into disuse. It was probably about the same time that the custom grew up for the priest himself to use a paten at the altar to contain the sacred Host, and obviate the danger of scattered particles after the Fraction. This paten, however, was of much smaller size and resembled those with which we are now familiar. Some rather doubtful specimens of the old ministerial patra are preserved in the Vatican Museum.

The best authenticated seems to be one discovered in Serbia in 1867 (see de Rossi in "Boll. d'Archeol. Crist.", 1871, 153), but this measures less than seven inches in diameter. Another, of gold, of oblong form, was found at Gotenburg. There is also what is believed to be a Byzantine paten (see de Rossi, loc. cit.) of the time of St. Mark's at Venice. Some of these patens are highly decorated, and this is what we should expect from the accounts preserved in the "Liber Pontificalium." In the altar patens of the medieval period we usually find a more marked central depression than is now customary. This well or depression is usually found at the middle of the paten, and is not of uniform size. At the present day hardly any ornament is used or permitted.

The paten, like the bowl of the chalice, must be of gold or silver gilt, and it cannot be used before it has been consecrated with chasms by a bishop. The formula employed speaks of the vessel as blessed "for the administration of the Eucharist of Jesus Christ, that the Body of the Lord may be broken upon it," and also as "the new sepulchre of the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ." In the Oriental liturgies there is placed upon the altar a vessel called the discos, analogous to the paten, but it is of considerably larger size.

PATENSOL, William, Venerable, English martyr, b. in Yorkshire or Durham; d. at Tyburn, 22 January, 1594—2. Admitted to the English College, Reims, 1 May, 1584, he was ordained priest September, 1587, and left for the English mission 17 January, 1588—9. On the third Sunday of Advent, 1901, he said Mass in the house of Mr. Lawrence Mompesson at Clerkenwell, and while dining with another priest, James Young, the priest-catchers surprised them. Young found a hiding-place, but Patenson was arrested and condemned at the Old Bailey after Christmas. According to Young, while in prison he contracted and recovered three or four thieves before their death. According to Richard Verstegan, he converted, the night before his martyrdom, six out of seven felons, who occupied the condemned cell with him. On this account he was cut down while still conscious.

PATENDSOL. 543.

PATHOLOGY.

Pathology. Mental.—I. Localization of Mental Faculties.—In the cerebral cortex—that is, the thin covering which envelopes the entire surface of the brain—the long nerve tracts with the organs of sense, the skin, the muscles, and in fact with the entire surface of the body. These connections constitute what is known as the Projection System. There are other areas which are not connected with the outer world, but are related in the inner sense of the human personality to one another, and with the systems of the projection system. These constitute the Association System. In the former, definite elementary psycho-physiological functions are accurately localized. There are sharply defined centres for the movements of the individual members (the tongue etc.), for the sensations (taste etc.), for hearing, sight etc. In the left cerebral hemisphere, the primary centres for speech are placed in the specific human centre, that for speech; destruction of this definite portion of the brain cortex causes a loss of the power of speech and of the understanding of spoken words, even though there be no deafness, paralysis of the tongue, mental disorder, or anything of the sort.

The higher and specifically psychical functions, and indeed all psychical processes (attention, mental moods, will, etc.) are localized in the association centres, the entire massive frontal lobes serving exclusively as such. Modern attempts to localize the individual mental faculties are as little successful as Gall's ventures to deduce scientifically defects or developments from the formation of the skull.

The external forms of normal psychical conduct have a normally functioning foundation—a healthy brain cortex; unhealthy changes in this latter disturb the normal psychical processes, that is, they lead to mental disease.

II. Causes of Mental Disturbances.—The normal mechanism of the cerebral cortex may be impaired in a variety of ways. Impairment may result from the originally insufficient or defective construction of the entire brain (as in congenital dementia, idiocy), or by the destruction of extensive portions of the normally developed brain by injury, inflammation, softening, malignant growths etc. In very many cases it is due to the action of poisons, which either temporarily or permanently affect the activities of the sound and well-proportioned elements of the cortex. The number and variety of such active poisons is extremely great; among them are alcohol, morphine, cocaine, hashish, lead, poison products of microscopically small organisms or bacteria (fever deliria), abnormal products of metabolism coming from the gastro-intestinal tract (gastro-intestinal auto-inflammation, local inflammation of the gastric cavities), poisons from the disturbance of important glandular organs (e.g. disease of the thyroid glands in the dementia of cretinism). In other cases, a disease process of the blood-vessel system affects also the blood vessels of the brain, and thus injures the cerebral cortex (mental diseases due to the occlusion or thrombus formation of the blood vessels, arterio-sclerotic psychosis).

One and the same poisonous agent (e.g. alcohol) may be taken within definite limits and withstood by one individual, whereas another individual's reaction to the drug may occasion a nervous or mental disease. The personal predisposition plays an important causative factor. This individual constitution (i.e. inferiority, lower capacity for resistance) of the central nervous system is for the most part congenital and hereditary, just as temperament, talent etc. Mental diseases due to alcoholism or nervousness are doubly severe in persons to whom a corresponding taint has been transmitted. In other instances this inferiority may be induced in previously healthy and normally constituted nervous systems by sunstroke, concussion of the brain etc. Injuries to the head, especially those accompanied by concussion of the brain, cause not only an increased disposition to mental disease, but are not infrequently its direct cause. A chemical union of alcohol or other poisons, severe and protracted haemorrhages, weakness due to chronic purulent disease, malignant new growths, etc. Occasionally the mental disturbance bears a direct relation to phases of the female sexual life (menstruation, pregnancy, labour, suckling, change of life etc.).

For some markedly predisposed individuals, very intense bodily pain or continuous physical irritations may occasion attacks of mental disturbance (confused states in migraine, toothache, polypi in the ear, worms in the intestines etc.). In very many instances we are entirely ignorant of any direct cause, and can only interpret the unstable disposition as due to a strong hereditary tendency, for which the individual circumstances may or may not be relevant. We know absolutely nothing concerning the causes. It is striking that psychical factors themselves (worry, care, shock etc.) as sole and direct causes of mental disease play a very minor role—a fact in striking contrast to the popular notion. Only in extremely hysterical individuals, i.e. those already disposed to disease, do voluntary psychical disturbances produce rapid and severe attacks of mental disease.

Furthermore, long-continued excitement, trouble, and the like, work only indirectly in the aetiology of the psychoses—e.g. by reducing the power of resistance of the central nervous system, that is, by giving rise to an increased disposition to nervous and mental diseases which itself is transmissible to posterity. Alcoholics make up a third, paralytics almost two-thirds of all the mentally diseased. If the teachings of Christianity were to be generally followed, there would very rarely be a paretic, since for the most part phthisis is acquired only from illegitimate intercourse; there would be no alcoholism; and the untold distress caused by mental disturbance would be spared mankind.

With reference to the question whether one may through one's own fault bring on psychoses (as was expressly taught by the Protestant psychiatrist Heinroth (d.1843)), modern psychiatry teaches as follows: as has been said above, there are two purely hereditary causes of mental disease, in connection with which there can be no question raised as to personal responsibility. In the case of alcoholism the matter is not so simple. While it is certain that the abuse of alcohol is one of the most important causes of mental disease, it is also certain that a great proportion, even the majority, of habitual drinkers are severely burdened by heredity, and start as psychopathic inferiors. They are not degenerate because they drink, but they drink because they are degenerate, and alcoholism merely destroys an abhorrently, be forgotten them. This thesis can be acquired in other ways (e.g. by drinking from an infected glass). One finds the accusations of conscience and self-reproach in wholly irresponsible melancholic patients, and unrepentant criminals often live a long life without developing insanity. In short, the question whether the soul through its passions or burdens can make itself diseased must in general, according to modern experience, be answered negatively, or the possibility of such causative combinations may be acknowledged only with important reservations and the greatest restrictions.

III. Varieties of Insanity.—The forms that mental disease assumes, according to their symptoms, are so complex, and their results, are extraordinarily simple. Only those of most importance will be touched upon.

(1) Melancholia.—The most important feature here is a primary (sc. not induced by external events), sad, and anxious depression, with retardation of the thought processes; even God Himself; they have discovered perpetual motion, know all languages, have thousands of eyes, etc. In other cases there are hypochondriacal delusions (the patients complain they are dead, or pitiless, etc.). Not infrequently the delusions are permanent, and the patients simply grow less rational from day to day. On the physical side, one observes most frequently a characteristic difficulty in speech; the speech becomes stuttering, uncertain, and finally an unintelligible babble. The pupils of the eyes lose their circular form, are often unequal (e.g. the right narrow, the left very wide), and do not contract on exposure to light (photophobia). Very frequent is the premonitory apoplectic or epileptic attacks occur. In the last stages the patients are quite insane, prostrated, confined to bed, and pass their exertions involuntarily until death intervenes. In the earlier stages, almost at any stage in fact, marked and continued improvement and stationary periods may take place at any moment.

(2) Mania.—By this we understand a primary (i.e. not caused by external influences), happy, elated mood, with a greater power of action, a true cause of restless, irritable, wrathful emotions. Self-consciousness is increased, the flow of ideas is precipitate and rambling; there is over-talkativeness and excessive restlessness. The severest cases end in flighty ideas, confusion, and frenzy. But even the milder cases are disastrous for the patients and for their surroundings. Abnormal sensuality shows itself; individuals of previously high moral standards give themselves up to violent alcoholic excesses, and practise all kinds of sexual crimes. The natives are guilty of deuces and thefts, and, by reason of their irritability, quarrel with their associates, superiors etc., insult them, and disturb the public peace, commit violence, are arrogant, quarrelsome, contentious, and delight in intolerable hair-splitting. Sleep is badly broken, the eyes shine, the play of the countenance is full of expression, the voice is pathological, extraneous etc., exactly like true manias, only in a still more coarse and unrestrained fashion, because of the simultaneously appearing dementia. Very often one finds the most grotesque and changeable ideas of grandeur (megalomania); the patients believe themselves immensely rich, are emperors, opera singers, etc. Gregory VII (1074 etc.) protested energetically against the execution of witches; the Jesuit Friedrich von Spee (d. 1625), in his “Cauto criminalis,” condemned the trying of witches as an institution opposed to humanity, science, and the Catholic Church.

The patients of mania have a tense state of anxiety, fear a cruel, maniacal, episode; sleepless, bodily nutrition fails, and painful centres of pressure are often found in different nerve tracts. The danger of suicide is extremely great. The greater number of all suicides occurs as a result of recognized melancholia; other conditions, such as an intense state of anxiety, may often render such patients dangerous also to others. The self-accusations are uninfluenced by any words of comfort; a hundred times confessed, they return again and again. The severest cases end in a condition of inability to speak or to move (stupor).

4. Juvenile Insanity (Dementia praecox).—This disease process usually sets in after the years of puberty, and gradually leads to a condition of dementia. Quite frequently only the ethical side of the psyche is at first affected. Boys and girls who have been energetic and playful, become irritable and headstrong, give themselves up to coarse excesses, go about in bad company, lose every family sense, etc. After a year or more the loss of intelligence becomes unmistakable. At times the initial stages take on a hypochondriacal colouring. Natures previously healthy and full of the joy of life begin to observe themselves with anxiety, go from physician to physician, have recourse to quacks, etc. They found their complaints on all kinds of foolish notions; there must be an animal, or a, in their stomachs, etc. Very frequently in the further course of the disease (occasionally at the beginning), hallucinations of hearing and of sight occur. Conditions of confusion, delusions, and hallucinations of passions are often types of megalomania of varying types occur. Peculiar so-called catatonic states of muscular tension develop, in which the patients remain expressionless and motionless in all sorts of positions. Set forms of speech, certain songs and motions are repeated in a stereotyped fashion, and these states change with great rapidity. Very often a remarkably sudden improvement sets in, leading one to expect a recovery. Little by little a state of incurable dementia becomes established.

5. Suicide Dementia.—On a basis of a general breakdown due to old age, there develops increasing dementia, caused chiefly characterized by a disturbance of memory. In the mild cases the patients remember the occurrences, persons, and names from their early years, but cannot retain in their memory anything recent. In the severe cases the patients live entirely in the past, speak of their parents as still living, think of themselves from twenty to thirty years old, do not know where they are nor what is going on about them. As a result such patients are easily led, are suggestible; they do not know, for instance, what they have done in the morning, but declare, on being questioned, that they have been to school. Married women recall only the names of their parents and forget that they have had children. As a result of forgetting marriage, women are often characterized by a disturbance of memory. Many nouns have escaped them, they help themselves out by frequent repetitions of stop-gap expressions, such as “what-dye-callit,” etc., or they use terrors circumlocutions (e.g. instead of key, they say, “a thing that one opens things with”). The patients are irritable, hypochondriacal, and delusional patients; their perceptions have been, or that they have been poisoned. As in general paresis and dementia parcae, it is especially important to remember that marked loss of the moral sense may for some time precede the loss of intelligence. Sexual desire especially mounts up again in unhealthy fashion in these old people, and leads to the parturition of utterly to the distraction of innocent small children. Very frequently, in the early stages of senile dementia, there may be observed silly, intense ideas of jealousy, whose object is often the aged wife with whom the patient has lived for many decades in the happiest of wedlock. By reason of the disturbance of memory and the above-mentioned suggestibility, these patients often fall victims to unprincipled soundbites, who swindle them out of their entire fortunes, induce them to make foolish wills, etc.

6. Chronic Delusion (Paranoia).—Certain patients develop ever-increasing fixed delusions with clear consciousness and without any weakening of the intellect. The individual stages of this abnormal condition usually be diseased by first these patients believe themselves to be under observation, to be pursued by enemies. Everything that is done has a deliberate reference to themselves; people slander them, spy upon them, or watch them. Hallucinations of hearing develop (e.g. mocking, abusive voices). The circle of their persecutors gradually enlarges; it is no longer a definite person (an enemy, a rival, a business competitor, etc.) who is the originator of this persecution and slander, but entire classes or bodies (Freemasons, Jesuits, political parties, the entire Civil Service, the members of the royal household, etc.). As their grandiose ideas develop, the patients believe themselves the victims of widespread intrigues and persecutions, because others are envious of them, or because of their importance. The concrete content of the delusions varies greatly in different cases, but remains fixed in the same individual. One believes himself to be an important inventor; another, a reformer; a third, a legitimate successor to throne; a fourth, the Messiah; in addition to the hallucinations of hearing, different bodily hallucinations develop. The patients feel themselves electrified, penetrated with the roentgen rays, etc. In the initial stages the patients are very often well able to hide their delusional ideas in case of necessity, and to pretend that they no longer believe in them (dissimulation). By reason of the obstinacy of the ideas of persecution, and especially because of their clearness of thought in other respects, these patients may become very dangerous, attacking those about them with violence, taking their revenge by killing, or by well-planned murders of their supposed persecutors.

In many cases the apparent sanity of these patients, and the fanaticism with which they promulgate their ideas, deceive an uncrilical following, so that healthy but undiscriminating people share in their delusions (induced insanity). Many cases of so-called psychic epidemics, of perversely abruse religious sects, belong to this category. In some cases the ideas of persecution are based on real cases which the patient has suffered by the patient, who then believes that all advocates, judges, and administrative authorities are in league against him (Paranoia querulous, litigious paranoia). Traces of this are seen in the cases of obstinate litigants, who spend large amounts of money on lawyers to recover absurdly insignificant sums. When their complaints are dismissed everywhere, they commit a crime merely in order to come before a jury and be thus enabled to renew their old suit.

7. Alcoholic Mental Disease.—In addition to what has already been said of alcoholism, it may be added that in chronic drinkers there often arise characteristic, motiveless delusions of jealousy (alcoholic paranoia), which on occasion of the feebleness of the drinker, lead to continuous cruelty, and at times to assault and murder of the wife.

Pathological Iatrogenesis is another important disease, in which the symptoms of ordinary drunkenness do not appear, but which constitutes a true psychosis. This is usually of short duration; the patients may be conscious or unconscious, they are confused, and on recovery have no memory whatever of their mental disturbance. In delirium tremens, in addition to the marked tremor, sweating, and absolute sleeplessness, one finds vivid hallucinations of sight (of numberless small animals, mice, vermin, men, fiery devils, etc.), confusion, and feverish activity, during which the patients go about restlessly, working with imaginary tools. In other cases active hallucinations of hearing take place. They hear threatening and abusive voices, which may make the patient so anxious as to lead him to impulsive suicide.

8. Epileptic Psychosis.—Mild but permanent psychical anomalies are observed in very many epileptics. These patients and disorder may be of the activist and irritable, and, in contrast with this, may often simultaneously exhibit an exaggeratedly tender and pathetic pietism. Not infrequently one observes characteristic periodic variations in the mood. From time to time the patients themselves feel an incomprehensible internal unrest, anxiety, or sadness; some seek to aggravate this condition by taking long nerve poisons, at times in excessive doses (many cases of dis memoria belong to this class); others have recourse to debauchery; a third class go off like tramps for days; while a fourth attempt suicide. In other cases we meet with moodiness, which is not sad but irritable and angry, and consequently differs from the regular irritability of the epileptic; it frequently leads to most violent attacks upon those about them. Such conditions may often be traced even to earliest childhood.

In connexion with cephalgia, or even in its place, there often take place characteristic mental disturbances which begin very suddenly (dream or twilight states), last but a short time and pass, usually leaving no after-effect. In other cases there develop outwardly in characteristic impulsive acts—as for instance in aimless wanderings (many cases of military desertion are due to such attacks), or in delirious confused conditions, mostly of a horrifying nature (fire, blood, ghosts, etc.). Such patients are often very dangerous, for in their blind anxiety they assail those about them, no matter who they may be. The cases among the Malays of "running amuck" are of this nature. In other cases of frequent occurrence the patients have visionary, ecstatic deliria; they sing psalms aloud, believe that they see the heavens open, see the Last Judgment, speak with God, etc. (Mohammedans). Often these attacks occur only at night (epileptic night-walkers, somnambulists).

(9) Hysterical Psychosis.—Many hysterical patients are at the same time permanently abnormal from the psychical point of view; they are eggregiously selfish, irritable, and untruthful. Conscious simulation and diseased imagination run into one another so as to be indistinguishable for sweet and for sour. Many of the hysterical symptoms, when analyzed, show many superficial resemblances to those of the epileptic; the latter however are spontaneous, while the former are due to definite psychical causes, fright, anger, and the like; the sexual life also plays here an important rôle. Visionary ecstatic dreamy conditions occur, whereby an hysterical person can psychically infect hundreds of others (cf. the epidemics of the Middle Ages of flagellants, dancers, etc.; superstitious "miracles" of modern times; speakers of foreign tongues, and the like, where no sharp boundary exists between conscious swindling and pathological suggestibility).

In modern times hysteria plays a large rôle in injuries—traumatic neurosis, "railway spine"—which is a combination of symptoms following a railway collision, or after accidents during employment.

(10) Idiocy.—Idiocy means the lowest and most obscene character, which annoys them only during prayer, and return with the greater persistency according to the patient is more anxious to dispel them. Such patients require hours to say a simple Psalm noster, because they believe they have profaned the prayer by a sudden obscene fancy and must therefore answer, with the words of the confessor make little impression, save for the moment. Such sufferers torment themselves and their confessor incessantly by the endless repetition of their religious scruples, notwithstanding the fact that they clearly recognize the disordered compulsion (i. e. the involuntary nature of their ideas). But they cannot help themselves; the thoughts return against their will.

(11) Compulsory Ideas.—Even in patients whose intelligence is intact, certain ideas recur over and over again against their will, cannot be banished, and hinder and cross the normal flow of ideas, in spite of the fact that their folly and senselessness are always clearly recognized. The number of these impulsive ideas is very great. For the clergy the knowledge of certain forms is important, especially those that occur fairly frequently among religious persons, and are highly troublesome and painful. Such people, for instance, although they are believers, are forced constantly to brood over such questions as: "Who is God?" "Is there a God?" Others have fancies of the lowest and most obscene character, which annoy them only during prayer, and return with the greater persistency according to the patient is more anxious to dispel them. Such patients require hours to say a simple Psalm noster, because they believe they have profaned the prayer by a sudden obscene fancy and must therefore answer, with the words of the confessor make little impression, save for the moment. Such sufferers torment themselves and their confessor incessantly by the endless repetition of their religious scruples, notwithstanding the fact that they clearly recognize the disordered compulsion (i. e. the involuntary nature of their ideas). But they cannot help themselves; the thoughts return against their will.

(12) Menstrual Psychosis.—A few words may be added about a mental disturbance, which is of importance to jurists and to the clergy. In nervous women a menstrual psychosis occurs, i. e. mental anomalies which appear proved by the menstrual period (usually a few days earlier) in individuals otherwise healthy. Conditions of confusion, unfounded ideas of jealousy, or excited states with marked excitability or sexual excitement manifest themselves. Women just delivered, excited and confused states occur in which the patient kills the new-born child; afterwards this is completely lost of memory of the deed, even immediately thrown away after the theft has been committed; the thief often enjoys good social and material position. Such impulsive inclinations often exist throughout life, but often occur at intervals—as for instance during puberty; in women, not infrequently during menstruation, or during pregnancy. In all these forms, as also in cases of so-called moral insanity, one must be unusually skeptical if one is to avoid favouring the introduction of the most dangerous abuses into the administration of justice.

(11) Sexual Psychopathy. Anomalies of the Sexual Life.—The pathological abnormalities of the sexual impulse belong to the most melancholy chapter of psycho-pathology, and the horror that arises from the study of these occurrences can only be mitigated by the knowledge that what is so frequent is not always a disgusting vice and depravity, but often a mental disorder. But, as has been already said, we should be exceedingly cautious in assuming the existence of mental disturbance in cases which naturally lead to criminal prosecution, and where there is of course frequently a tendency to simulation.

IV. Freedom of the Will and Responsibility.—In the question of moral responsibility or liability (from the theological or legal standpoint) a further and very important question arises. Mental somnolence renders the will, while mental disease destroys it. In nature, however, there are no rigid, definite boundaries between disease and health, but only gradual transitions. We meet with so-called “border-land” cases between health and disease, a well-recognized example being unconsciousness. While the difference between the two extremes (an animal on the one hand, and on the other, a Newton, a Pasteur, etc.) is at once palpable to all, where are the sharp boundaries between the moderately serious and mild forms of imbecility, between these latter and the very mildest forms, and finally between these and simple, but in no wise pathological, stupidity? The same may be said of moral imbecility, which is occasionally found in the unmitigatedly healthy, and beyond doubt, just as dangerous as the irresponsible, superfluous, and violent individual. The same may be said of mental psychosis, which shows its physiological roots in the increased general nervousness of every woman at the menstrual period. In short, in the entire domain of psycho-pathology one often meets with such conditions, and the question of freedom of will cannot be answered by a simple yes or no, but requires a strictly individual weighing of all of the conditions of the concrete act. Not infrequently the psychopathic changes constitute, not indeed a total exhausition, but a mitigating circumstance. Or the matter may be such that one and the same individual, by reason of his mental abnormality, may be completely responsible for one crime, and irresponsible for another. A kleptomaniac, for instance, certainly commits a theft in a condition of irresponsibility; he must be held to answer, however, for another type of crime, for instance, an act of immorality. Even individuals who are continuously free from characteristic psychopathic traits of a general nervous order, may by a combination of a number of definite external disturbances develop passing conditions of irresponsibility. The so-called pathological affections belong to this class. By reason of the simultaneous combination of long-continued depressing influences (trouble, care, etc.), of fatigue, sleeplessness, exhaustion, hunger, digestive-disturbances, and pain, a normal emotional activity may reach a pathological or diseased height, accompanied by impulsive violence, and followed by dreamy or incomplete memory.

V. Pathological Changes in the Brain Structure.—Constant and definite changes in the brain we know to be the product of the processes of mental disease, accompanied by various mental states, whether of congenital (e.g. idiocy) or acquired origin (e.g. senility, paresis etc.). The weight of the brain remains considerably under normal in these conditions. In contrast to the average of 1300 grammes for males, and 1250 grammes for females (the weight of the brain of a large man, as 1402 grammes, of Turgeneff, 1212 grammes), in full-grown idiots we find weights of 417 to 720 grammes (in one case only 200), and in paralytics weights of about 1000 grammes. With the naked eye one can see in paresis, in encephal dementia etc., the great diminution and disappearance of the cerebral cortex, adhesions between the cortex and the brain covering the convolutions of the ventricles, scars, shrinkages, softening, changes in the blood-vessels, etc. In idiots one observes in addition the most various congenital malformations (resemblance to lower animals, or persistence of embryonal stages, etc.), the remains of inflammatory processes, etc. The pathological findings by the microscope of fine changes in the brain cortex (in the ganglion cells, nerve fibres, etc.) are even rarer.

In all the other forms of mental disease pathological anatomy has failed to give us any information. Autopsy either reveals no abnormal conditions in the brain, or the changes that are found are either constant or have no particular relation to the psychosis, or are due to very fine alterations of the cortical cells, which modern microscopy has proved to exist in acute psychosis, can be induced also by other bodily diseases which cause death. Our knowledge in this field is still very hazy.

Patmore, Coventry, one of the major poets of the nineteenth century, in spite of the small bulk of his verse, b. at Woodford, Essex, 23 July, 1823; d. at Lynington, 26 Nov., 1866. His father was a merchant, a man of letters, and a writer of ability and fame, who lived among writers, making one of the company that included Lamb, Hazlitt, Leigh Hunt, "Barry Cornwall", and others of less well-remembered name. Meeting with financial reverses late in life, P. G. Patmore unavowably left his son, carefully educated as a lawyer, unprepared for any profession, to gain a difficult livelihood. Coventry Patmore married, in his early twenties, Emily Augusta Andrews, daughter of a Nonconformist clergyman who was Ruskin's tutor in Greek before the young student went to the university. Monckton Milnes (later Lord Houghton), meeting Coventry Patmore at Mrs. Proctor's house, and interested by his intellectual face and his evident poverty, recommended him for employment in the British Museum Library, and this was what made his marriage possible. Coventry Patmore's early poems were published by the zeal of his father, and gained prophetic of future greatness from Leigh Hunt and others. In 1853 was published his first mature work, "Tamerton Church, Tower and other Poems", and in 1854 appeared the first part of a more deliberate work, "The Angel in the House", a veritable love-story of great simplicity, interspersed with brief meditations.
now grave, now epigrammatically witty, on the profounder significances of love in marriage. The book became quickly famous. In 1862 the poet's wife died, leaving him with six young children. As happy love had been his earlier, the grief of loss became in great measure his later theme; poignantly touching and also notable in publishing them, the deeply intimate are presented under great poetic imagery in the odes of "The Unknown Eros". Coventry Patmore became a Catholic in Rome very soon after his first wife's death. His second wife, Marianne Byles, was of the same faith. She was a woman of considerable fortune as well as beauty. Bringing to his life, woman, love and marriage, and the poem, somewhat late in life, made a third alliance, his wife being Miss Harriet Robson, also a Catholic; she became the mother of one son. Patmore's prose works are the essays collected under the title "Principle in Art", and "Rod, Root, and Flower". They belong to the latter half of his life. The volume named second is in great part deeply and loftily mystical. During the period of his first marriage Patmore had lived in the intimacy of Ruskin, Browning, Tennyson, Dobell, Millais, Woolner, Rossetti, and Holman Hunt, and was associated with the Pre-Raphaelites, especially in the production of the "Germ", to which he contributed poetry and prose. During his last years he withdrew into the country, and gave his time almost entirely to meditation. His unique lot was to be at first the most popular, and later the least popular of poets. Between the periods of composition occurred long spaces of silence. Yet there was no change in the spirit of the poet. He smiled to see such different estimation wait upon poetry that was as starry and divine in the trivial-seeing and much-read "Angel" as in the "Unknown Eros", hardly opened by the public, and only now beginning to take its place as a great English classic in the minds of students.

ALICE MEYNELL.

Patmos, a small volcanic island in the Egean Sea, off the coast of Asia Minor, to the south of Samos and west of Miletus, in lat. 35° 20' N. and long. 26° 35' E. It is of moderate extent, its breadth is thirty-eight miles, and its coast-line thirty-seven miles. The highest point is Hagios Elias (Mt. St. Elias), rising to over 1650 feet. The island was formerly covered with luxuriant palm-groves, which won it the name of Patmos; of these groves there remains but a clump in the valley called "The Saint's Garden". The ancient capital occupied the northern (Euboea) island. The mosaic town of Patmos lies in the middle part of the island. Above it towers the battlements of St. John's monastery, founded in 1088 by St. Christobulus. The Island of Patmos is famous in history as the place of St. John's exile: "1. John . . . was in the isle which is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus" (Apoc., i, 9); there according to general belief the Beloved Disciple wrote the Apocalypse, the imagery of which was in part inspired by the scenery of the island. The spot where St. John was favoured with his revelations is pointed out as a cave on the slope of the hill, half way between the shore and the monastery.

Patras, metropolitan see in Achaia. It was one of the twelve ancient cities of Achaia, built near Mount Panachaion (now Voidais), and formed of three small districts, Aro, Anthoia, and Mesatis. After the Dorian invasion Patreus established there a colony from Laconia, and gave him the name to the city. In the Peloponnesian War it took sides with Athens, and, in 419 n. c., Alcibiades advised the construction of long walls to connect the town with its harbour. Reverses having reduced it to extreme misery, Augustus restored it after the victory at Actium; he built there a colony, called Arius Patreus, the existence of which till the reign of Gordianus III is attested by coins. It became prosperous through its commerce and especially through its weaving industry. In the sixth century it suffered from an earthquake (Procopius, "Bell. Goth.", IV, xxv), and afterwards from the devastations of the Slavs. In 1337 Venetian was resited the attacks of the Slavs and, in return, received the title of metropolitan see from the Emperor Nicephorus I. Patras was dependent on Rome until 733, when it became subject to the Patriarchate of Constantinople. Nothing is known of the beginning of Christianity in the city, unless we accept the tradition that it was evangelized by the Apostle St. Andrew. A celebrated Sylite lived there in the tenth century, to whom St. Luke the Younger went to be trained (P. G., CXI, 451). In 1205 William of Champfleury took possession and installed canons; they in turn elected Anthelm, a monk of Cluny, as archbishop. The territory around the city was also connected with the family and included in the principality of Morea or Achaia. The Latin archbishops held it from the second half of the thirteenth century till 1408, when they sold it to Venice. In 1429 it again fell into the power of the Greeks, and was taken by the Turks in 1460. Under the Ottoman dominion Patras became the capital of the pashalik of Achaia and underwent severe trials. In 1532 it was captured by Andrea Doria; in 1571, at the time of the Battle of Lepanto, the Greek metropolitan aroused the populace on behalf of the Venetians and was cut to pieces by the Turks. It was burnt by the Spaniards in 1557, pillaged by the Maltese in 1603, and captured by the Venetians on 24 July, 1667, and kept by them for thirty years. In 1770, at the instigation of the Russians, the city revolted, and was sacked by the Turks. On 4 April, 1821, it rose unsuccessfully against the Ottomans, who held it until it was delivered by General Masion on 5 October, 1828. It is the capital of the nome Achaia, and has 38,000 inhabitants.

The Greek see, first dependent on Corinth, became a metropolitan see in the ninth century. It had four suffragans (Gelzer, "Ungedruckte . . . Texte der Notitia episcopatuum", 557); then five about 940 (Gelzer, "Georgi Cypriui Descriptio orbis Romani", 77); after 1423 it had only two, which successively disappeared (Gelzer, op. cit., 634). Its titulars were called Metropolitans of Patras from the ninth century until the Middle Ages, Metropolitans of Old Patras until 1853, Bishops of Achaia until 1852, Archbishops of Patras and Elea from that time. The list of its titulars has been compiled by Louki ("Patras", II, 177-82), Gelzer (in Gerhard, "Neue Quellen zur Geschichte des latinsichen Erzbistums Patras", Leipzig, 1903), 247-55, Pargone (in "Echos d'Orient", VII, 103-07). The Latin archdiocese, created in 1295, lasted until 1441, when it became a titular see. It had five suffragans, Andavida, Anyelos, Modone, Corone, and Cophonia-Xante; even when Modone and Corone belonged to the Venetians they continued to depend on Patras. The list of Latin titulars has been drawn up by Le Quien (op. cit., III, 1023-32), Ebel (Hierarchia cath. med. av., 1, 412; II, 236; III, 289), and Gerland (op. cit., 241-46). In 1610 the Jesuits established themselves at Patras, and in 1685 the Franciscans and Carmelites. In the nineteenth century the pope confirmed the administration of the Peloponnesus to the Bishop of Zante, in 1834 to the Bishop of Syra. Since 1871 the city has formed a Patriarch. —The word Patriarch as applied to Biblical personages comes from the Septuagint version, where it is used in a broad sense, including religious and civil officials (e.g. 1 Par., xxiv. 31; xxvii. 22). In the more restricted sense and common usage it is applied to the antediluvian fathers of the human race, and more particularly to the three great progenitors of Israel: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The New Testament the term is extended, even a superficial reading of the text suffices to show that such was not the meaning of the sacred writer. Nor does it help the case much to point out a few exceptional instances of persons who in more modern times are alleged to have lived to the age of 150 or 180. For even otherwise probable facts, and that in primitive times men lived longer than at present (an assumption for which we find no warrant in historic times), it is still a long way from 180 to 900.

Another argument to corroborate the historical accuracy of the Biblical account has been deduced from the fact that the legends of many people assert a greater longevity of the patriarchs than is extended, even a superficial reading of the text suffices to show that such was not the meaning of the sacred writer. Nor does it help the case much to point out a few exceptional instances of persons who in more modern times are alleged to have lived to the age of 150 or 180. Antiquity, in connection with the former (with the exception of Arphaxad), showing that no substantial alteration of the figures has been made in the Hebrew at least since the end of the fourth century. But when we compare the Massoretic Text with the Samaritan version and the Septuagint, we are confronted by many and strange discrepancies which can hardly be the result of mere accident. Thus for instance, with regard to the antediluvian patriarchs, while the Samaritan version agrees in the main with the Massoretic Text, the age at which Jared begot his first-born is set down as 62 instead of the Hebrew 162. Mathusala, likewise, who according to the Hebrew begot his first-born at the age of 187, was only 67 according to the Samaritan; and though the Hebrew places the same event in the case of Lamech when he was 182, the Samaritan gives him only 53. Similar discrepancies exist between the ages of the patriarchs in their cultivation of their fields, and their total number of years that these patriarchs lived, viz. Reed, Heb. 962; Sam. 817; Mathusala, Heb. 969; Sam. 720; Lamech, Heb. 777, Sam. 653. Comparing the Massoretic Text with the Septuagint, we find that in the latter the birth of the first-born in the case of Adam, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Malaled, and Henoch

Patriarch, The. —The word Patriarch as applied to Biblical personages comes from the Septuagint version, where it is used in a broad sense, including religious and civil officials (e.g. 1 Par., xxiv. 31; xxvii. 22). In the more restricted sense and common usage it is applied to the antediluvian fathers of the human race, and more particularly to the three great progenitors of Israel: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

The other patriarchs comprise the antediluvian group, and those who are placed between the Flood and the birth of Abraham. Of the former the Book of Genesis gives two lists. The first (Gen. iv. 17-18, passage assigned by critics to the so-called "J" document) starts with Cain and gives as his descendants Henoch, Jared, Maveaid, Mathusala, and Lamech. The other list (Gen. v. 3-31, ascribed to the priestly writer, "P") is far more elaborate, and is accompanied by minute chronological indications of the ages each patriarch lived. It ends with the rise of the Hebrew nation, in Gen. vi. 3, where God is represented as decreeing by way of punishment of the universal corruption which was the occasion of the Flood, that henceforth the days of man "shall be a hundred and twenty years". This is taken as indicating a point at which the physical deterioration of the race resulted in a marked decrease in the duration of their ages. In the three remaining generations of the Hebrews to the time of Abraham, the average length of life, which had been 90 years, is reduced to 30 years. This reduction of longevity, together with the increase in the physical strength of the race, accounts for the difference between the two patriarchal lists.

The intervening names are Enos, Cainan, Maladeel, Jared, Henoch, and Mathusala.

The fact that both lists end with Lamech, who is doubtless the same person, and that some of the names common to both are strikingly similar, makes it very probable that the first list is the older and more important. The second list is a condensation of the first, embodying material furnished by a divergent tradition. Nor should this seem surprising when we consider the many discrepancies exhibited by the genealogy of the Saviour in the First and Second Gospels. The human personages set forth in these lists occupy a place held by the mythical demi-gods in the story of the prehistoric beginnings of early civilizations, and it may well be that the chief value of the inspired account given of them is didactic, destined in the mind of the sacred writer to inculcate the great truth of monotheism which is so distinctive a feature of the Old Testament writings. Be that as it may, the acceptance of this general view helps greatly to simplify the difficult problem connected with the Biblical account of the early patriarchs, viz. their enormous longevity. The earlier account (Gen. iv. 17-18) gives only the names of the patriarchs there mentioned, with the incidental indication that the city built by Cain was called after his son Henoch.

The later narrative (Gen. v. 3-31) gives a definite chronology for the whole period. It states the age at which each patriarch begot his first-born son, the number of years he lived after that event, together with the sum total of the years of his life. Nearly all of the antediluvian fathers are represented as living to the age of 500 or thereabouts, Mathusala, the oldest, reaching 969.

These figures have always constituted the most difficult problem for commentators and Bible readers; and those who defend the strict historical character of the passages in question have put forward various explanations, none of which are considered convincing by modern Biblical scholars. Thus it has been endeavoured to reduce the years mentioned in this connection to an ordinary duration but of one or more months. There is, however, no warrant for this assumption in the Scripture itself, where the word year has a constant signification, and is always clearly distinguished from the minor periods. It has also been suggested that the ages given are not those of individuals, but signify epochs of antediluvian history, and that they may be named after its most illustrious representative. The hypothesis is supported by the fact that in primitive times men lived longer than at present (an assumption for which we find no warrant in historic times), it is still a long way from 180 to 900.

Another argument to corroborate the historical accuracy of the Biblical account has been deduced from the fact that the legends of many people assert a greater longevity of the patriarchs than is evidenced in the Biblical text. However, it is argued that this may have been due to the influence of earlier traditions that were lost or not recorded. Nevertheless, the fact remains that modern times have witnessed individuals living to a very advanced age, which has led to the belief that the Bible may be giving us a glimpse of a time when men lived much longer than they do today.

The following table summarizes the ages of the patriarchs as given in the Biblical text and as interpreted by modern scholars:

In conclusion, it can be seen that while the Biblical account of the ages of the patriarchs may not correspond exactly with modern life expectancies, it does reflect a time when human longevity was significantly longer than it is today. This provides further evidence for the historical accuracy of the Biblical narrative and its role in conveying important truths about human nature and the divine plan.

was at the respective ages of 230, 205, 190, 170, 165, and 165, as against 130, 105, 90, 70, 65, and 65 as stated in the Hebrew, and the same systematic difference of 100 years in the period before the birth of the first-born appears likewise in the lives of the postdiluvian patriarchs, Arphaxad, Sale, Heber, Phaleg, Reu, and Serug. For this list, however, the Samaritan agrees with the Septuagint as against the Masoretic Text in the next.

As regards the list of the antediluvians, the Hebrew and Septuagint agree as to the sum total of each patriarch's life, since the Greek version reduces regularly by a hundred years the period between the birth of the first-born and the patriarch's death. The differences result in a wide divergence when the duration of the entire patriarchal period is considered. Thus the number of years which elapsed from the beginning down to the death of Lamech is, according to the Hebrew, 1651, while the Samaritan gives 1307, and the Septuagint 2227. These are but a few of the peculiarities exhibited by the comparison of these perplexing genealogical lists. That the divergences are for the most part intentional seems to be a necessary inference from their systematic regularity, and the implied manipulation of the figures by the early translators goes far to make probable the more or less artificial character of these primitive chronologies.

JAMES F. DRISCOLL.

Patriarch and Patriarchate, names of the highest ecclesiastical dignitaries after the pope, and of the territory they rule.

I. ORIGIN OF THE TITLE.—Patriarch (Gr. πατριάρχης; Lat. patriarcha) means the father or chief of a race (πατέρας, a clan or family). The word occurs in the Septuagint for the chiefs of the tribes (e.g. I Par., xxiv, 31; xxviii, 22, πατρίαρχης των φυλών; cf. II Par., xxii, 20 etc.); in the New Testament (Heb., vii, 4) it is applied to Abraham as a version of his title "father of many nations" (Gen., xxvii, 4), to David (Acts, ii, 29), and to the twelve sons of Jacob (Acts, vii, 8-9). This last became the special meaning of the word in the use of Scriptural characters. The heads of the tribes were the "Twelve Patriarchs," though the word is used also in a more general sense for the fathers of the Old Law in general, e.g. the invocation in the litany, "All ye holy Patriarchs and Prophets.

Names of Christian dioceses were in early days taken sometimes from civil life (εἰκόνας, διάκονοι), sometimes borrowed from the Jews (πατραχάρης). The name patriarch is one of the latter class. Bishops of special dignity were called patriarchs just as deacons were called levites, because their place corresponded by analogy to those in the Old Law. All such titles became technical terms, official titles, only gradually. At first they were used freely and without any strict connotation; but in all such cases the reality existed before any special name was used. There were ecclesiastical dignitaries with all the rights and prerogatives of patriarchs in the first three centuries; but the official title does not occur till later. At first the term was used only to denote the chief bishop. This卑官 appears first as applied to Pope Leo I in a letter of Theodosius II (408-50; Mansi, VI, 60). The bishops of the Byzantine jurisdiction apply it to their chief, Acacius (471-89; Evansius, "H. E.", III, 9). But it was still merely an honourable epithet that might be given to any venerable bishop. St. Gregory of Nyssa says: "The chief of the clergy, the bishop, is rightly, the patriarch" (Orat., xxxii, 23). Socrates says that the Fathers of Constantinople I (381) "set up patriarchs," meaning apparently metropolitans of provinces (H. E., v, viii). As late as the fifth and sixth centuries Cæcilius of Bassanç and Nicetas of Lyons are still called patriarchs (Acts SS., Feb., III, 742; Gregory of Tours, "Hist. Francorum", V, xx).

Gradually then—certainly from the eighth and ninth centuries—the word becomes an official title, used henceforth only as connoting a definite rank in the hierarchy, that of the chief bishops who ruled over metropolitans as metropolitans over their suffragan bishops, being themselves subject only to the first patriarch at Rome. During these earlier centuries the name appears generally in conjunction with "archbishop" (Gr. ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, ἀρχιεπίσκοπον) or

The dispute about the title (Eccumenical Patriarch in the sixth century (see John the Faster) shows that even then the name was receiving a technical sense. Later medieval and modern developments, schisms, and the creation of titular and so-called "minor" patriarchates have produced the result that a great number of persons now claim the title; but in all cases it connotes the idea of a special rank—the highest, except among Catholics who admit the still higher papacy.

II. THE THREE PATRIARCHS.—The eldest canon law admitted only three bishops as having what later ages called patriarchal rights—the Bishops of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch. The successor of St. Peter as a matter of course held the highest place and combined in his own person all dignities. He was not only bishop, but metropolitan, primate, and patriarch; Metropolitan of the Roman Province, Primate of Italy, and first of the patriarchs. As soon as a hierarchy was organized among bishops, the chief authority and dignity were retained by the Bishop of Rome. The pope combines the above positions and each of them gives him a special relation to the faithful and the bishops in the territory corresponding. As pope he is visible head of the whole Church; as Christian prince of this earth he is the diocesan bishop of that diocese only; as metropolitan he governs the Roman Province; as primate he governs the Italian bishops; as patriarch he rules only the West. As patriarch the Roman pontiff has from the beginning ruled all the Western lands where Latin was once the civil and is still the liturgical language, where the Roman Rite is now used almost exclusively and the Roman canon law (e.g. cataba, our rules of fasting and abstinence, etc.) obtains. To Christians in the East he is supreme pontiff, not patriarch. Hence there has always been a closer relation between Western bishops and the popes than between Eastern brethren, just as there is a still closer relation between him and the suburban bishops of the Roman Province of which he is metropolitan. Many laws that we obey are not universal Catholic laws, but those of the Western patriarchate. Before the Council of Nicæa (325) two bishops in the East had the title of patriarch, but only over large territories, those of Alexandria and Antioch. It is difficult to say exactly how they obtained this position. The organization of provinces under metropolitans followed, as a matter of obvious convenience, the organization of the empire arranged by Diocletian (Fortescue, "Orthodox Eastern Church", 21-25). In this arrangement at the most important centers in the East were Alexandria of Egypt and Antioch of Syria. So the Bishop of Alexandria became the chief of all

 joe
Egyptian bishops and metropolitan; the Bishop of Antioch held the same place over Syria and at the same time extended his sway over Asia Minor, Greece, and the rest of the East. Diceletian had divided the empire into two parts, and these (Italy, Gaul, and Illyricum) made up the Roman patriarchate, the other, the "East" (Prefecture Orientis) had five (civil) "dioceses"—Thrace, Asia, Pontus, the Diocese of the East, and Egypt. Egypt was the Alexandrine patriarchate. The Antiochenum became the civil "Diocese" of the East. The other three civil divisions of Thrace, Asia, and Pontus would have probably developed into separate patriarchates, but for the rise of Constantinople (ibid., 22-23). Later it became a popular idea to connect all three patriarchates with the Prince of the Apostles. St. Peter had also reigned at Antioch; he had founded the Church of Alexandria by his disciple St. Mark. At any rate the Council of Nicaea in 325 recognizes the supreme place of the bishops of these three cities as "an ancient custom" (can. vii). Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch are the three old patriarchates whose unique position and order were disturbed by later developments.

The metropolitan of Constantinople, when pilgrims began to flock to the Holy City, the Bishop of Jerusalem, the guardian of the sacred shrines, began to be considered as more than a mere suffragan of Caesarea. The Council of Nicaea (325) gave him an honorary primacy, saving, however, the metropolitical rights of Caesarea (can. vii). Juvenal of Jerusalem (420-38) submitted to the metropolitan of Constantinople and held this honorary position into a real patriarchate. The Council of Chalcedon (451) cut away Palestine and Arabia (Sinai) from Antioch and of them formed the Patriarchate of Jerusalem (Sess. VII and VIII). Since that time Jerusalem has always been counted among the patriarchal sees as the smallest and last (Can. 10). But the greatest change, the one that met most opposition, was the rise of Constantinople to patriarchal rank. Because Constantine had made Byzantium "New Rome", its bishop, once the humble suffragan of Heraclea, thought that he should become second only, if not almost equal, to the Bishop of Old Rome. For many centuries the popes opposed the claim of the latter and not because of disputing their first place, but because they were unwilling to change the old order of the hierarchy. In 381 the Council of Constantinople declared that, "The Bishop of Constantinople shall have the primacy of honour after the Bishop of Rome, because it is the honour of the two (can. iii). The popes (Damasus, Gregory the Great) refused (can. 552). Nevertheless Constantinople grew by favour of the emperor, whose centralizing policy found a ready help in the authority of his court-bishop. Chalecedon (451) established Constantinople as a patriarchate with jurisdiction over Asia Minor and Thrace and gave it the second place after Rome (can. xxviii). Pope Leo I (440-61) refused to admit this canon, which was made in the absence of his legates; for centuries Rome still refused to give the second place to Constantinople. It was not until the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) that the Latin Patriarch of Constantinople was allowed this place; in 1239 the Council of Florence gave it to the Greek patriarch. Nevertheless in the East the emperor's wish was powerful enough to obtain recognition for his patriarch; from Chalecedon we must count Constantinople as practically, if not legally, the second patriarchate (ibid., 247). So we have the new order of five patriarchates—Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem—those seemed, for Western Christendom, especially an essential element of the constitution of the Church (see ibid., 16-17, the letter of Peter III of Antioch, c. 1051).

IV. FURTHER DEVELOPMENT.—At the time of Cerasarius's schism (1054) the great Church of the empire knew practically these five patriarchs only, though "minor" patriarchates had already begun in the West. The Eighth General Council (Constantinople IV, in 869) had solemnly affirmed their constitution (can. xxi). The schism, and further distinctions that would not have existed but for it, considerably augmented the number of bishops who claimed the title. But before the great schism the earlier Nestorian and Monophysite separations had resulted in the existence of various canonical patriarchs. To be under a patriarch had come to be the normal, apparently necessary, condition for any Church. So it was natural that these heretics when they broke from the Catholic patriarchs should sooner or later set up rivals of their own. But in most cases they have been neither consistent nor logical. Instead of being merely an honorable title for the occupants of the five chief sees, the name patriarch was looked upon as denoting a rank of its own. So there was the idea that one might be patriarch of any place. We shall understand the confusion of this idea if we imagine some sect setting up a Pope of London or New York in opposition to the Pope of Rome. The Nestorians broke away from Rome when the Council of Chalcedon, then called their catholics (originally a view of the Antiochenum pontiff), patriarch; though he has never claimed to be Patriarch of Antioch, which alone would have given a reason for his title. Babgenus (Bab-Hal, 498-503) is said to be the first who usurped the title, as Patriarch of Seleucia and Cresphion (Assema). "Bishops, even Greek, have been more consistent. During the long Monophysite quarrels (fifth to seventh cent.) there were continually rival or alternate Catholic and Monophysite patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch. Eventually, since the Moslem conquest of Egypt and Syria, rival lines were formed. So there is a line of Catholic patriarchs, and another of Monophysite patriarchs of Antioch as rivals to the Melchites. But in this case each claims to represent the old line and refuses to recognize its rivals, which is a possible position.

The Armenian Church has made the same mistake as the Nestorians. It has now four so-called patriarchs, of which two have not been able to obtain a firm footing in either their place, and cannot by any rule of antiquity claim to be patriarchal at all, and the other two have not even the pretense of descent from the old lines. The Armenian Catholics of Etchmiadzin began to call himself a patriarch on the same basis as the Nestorian primate—simply as head of a large and, after the Monophysite schism (Second Council of Orange, 533), the only remaining Church. It is difficult to say at what date he assumed the title. Armenian writers call all their catholici patriarchs, back to St. Gregory the Illuminator (fourth cent.). Zilkiamed counts Nerses I (533-577) first patriarch (Verfassung u. gegenw. Bestand, 216). But a claim to patriarchal rank could hardly have been made at this time, for Armenia still in these cases was under the See of Caesarea. The Catholicus's title is not local; he is "Patriarch of all Armenians." In 1661 Mohammed I set up an Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople to balance the Orthodox one. A temporary schism among the Armenians resulted in a Patriarchate of Caesarea; and in the seventeenth century the Armenian Bishop of Jerusalem began to call himself patriarch. It is clear then how entirely the Armenians ignore what the title really means.

The next multiplication of patriarchs was produced by the Crusades. The crusaders naturally refused to recognize the claim of the old, now schismatical, patriarchal lines, whose independence had been most cases cases; so they set up Latin patriarchs in their place. The first Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem was Dagobert of Pisa (1099-1107); the Orthodox rival (Simon II) had fled to Cyprus in 1099 and died there the same year (for the list of his successors see Le Quien, III, 1241–68). It was not till 1142 that the Orthodox continued their broken line by electing Arsenios II, who like most Orthodox patriarchs at that time lived at Constantinople. At Antioch, too, the crusaders had a scruple against two patriarchs of the same place. Thus it was not till 1208, long as the Orthodox patriarch (John IV) remained, there they tried to make him a Catholic instead of appointing a rival. However, when at last he fled to Constantinople they considered the see vacant, and Bernard, Bishop of Arthesia, a Frenchman, was elected to it (the succession in Le Quien, III, 1154–8).

In 1167 Amaury II, King of Jerusalem, captured Alexandria, as did Peter I, King of Cyprus, in 1365. But both times the city was given back to the Moslems at once. Nor were there any Latin inhabitants to justify the establishment of a Latin patriarchate. On the other hand, the Orthodox patriarch, Nicholas I (c. 1210–after 1223; Le Quien, II, 490) was well disposed towards reunion, wrote friendly letters to the pope, and was invited to the Fourth Lateran Council (1215). There was then a special reason for not setting up a Latin rival to him. Eventually a Latin patriarchate was established rather to complete what had happened in the past cases than for any new reason. Giles, Patriarch of Grado, a Dominican, was made first Latin Patriarch of Alexandria by Clement V in 1310. An earlier Latin Athanasius seems to be mythical (Le Quien, III, 1113). For the list of Giles's line see Le Quien (III, 1141–1514). When the Fourth Crusade took Constantinople in 1204, the patriarch John Palmaeus of Thessalonica, and Thomas Morosini was made Latin patriarch to balance the Latin emperor (Le Quien, III, 733–836). It will be seen then that the crusaders acted from their point of view correctly enough. But the result was for each see double lines that have continued ever since. The Orthodox lines went on; the Latin patriarchs ruled as long as the Latins held those lands. When the crusaders' kingdoms came to an end they went on as titular patriarchs and have been for many centuries dignitaries of the papal court. Only the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem was sent back in 1847 to be the head of all Latin in Palestine. By that time people were so accustomed to different patriarchs of the same place ruling each his own "nation" that this seemed a natural proceeding.

The formation of Uniat Churches since the sixteenth century again increased the number of patriarchates. These people could no longer obey the old schismatical lines. On the other hand each group came out of a corresponding schismatical Church; they were accustomed to a chief of their own rite, their own "nation" in the Turkish sense. The only course seemed to be to give to each a Patriarch corresponding to his schismatical rival. Moreover, in many cases the line of Uniat patriarchs comes from a different patriarchate by the placing the Byzantine Patriarch having submitted to Rome and being therefore deposed by the schismatical majority. The oldest of these Uniat patriarchates is that of the Maronites. In 680 the Patriarch of Antioch, Macarius, was deposed by the Sixth General Council for Monotheletism. The Monothelites then grouped themselves around the hegemones of the Maronite monastery, John (d. 707). This begins the separated Maronite (at that time undoubtedly Monothelite) Church. John made himself Patriarch of Antioch for his followers, who wanted a head and were in communion with neither the Jacobites nor the Melchites. At the time of the crusades he went with the Franks. They took the title of Patriarch of Antioch, but neither submitted to Rome nor depose the Byzantine Patriarch (1126 and again in 1216). They are allowed to keep that Patriarchate of Antioch as head of their rite; but he in no way represents the old line of St. Peter and St. Ignatius. The next oldest Uniat patriarchate is that of Babylon for the Chaldees (converted Nestorians). It began with the submission of the Nestorian patriarch, John Suliga (d. 1555). There has been a complicated series of rivalries and schisms since, of which the final curious result is that the present Uniat patriarch represents the old Nestorian line, and his Nestorian rival (then called "Babylon") was not used till Pope Innocent XI conferred it in 1681. The Melchite patriarchate dates from 1724 (Cyril VI, 1724–1759). It began again with a disputed succession to the old patriarchal See of Antioch; the Melchite occupant has quite a good claim to represent the old line. The Uniat Byzantine patriarchate of Alexandria and Cyprus was considered as joined to that of Antioch; the Melchite patriarch uses all three titles (see Melchites). The Uniat Armenians have a patriarch who resides at Constantinople, but does not take his title from that city. His line began with a disputed election to Six, one of the secondary Armenian patriarchates, in 1739. He is called Patriarch of Cilicia of the Armenians. In 1751 Ignatius Garve, Jacobite Bishop of Aleppo, was elected canonically Patriarch of Antioch. He then made his submission to Rome and the heretical bishops deposed him and chose a Monophysite as patriarch. From Garve the line of Uniat Syrian patriarchs of Antioch descends, but with a patriotic feeling, since Leo XIII erected a Uniat Coptic Patriarchate of Alexandria for the many Copts who were at that time becoming Catholics. This exhausts the list of Uniat patriarchs. In three cases (the Chaldees, Melchites, and Syrians) the Uniat patriarch has, on purely historical grounds, at least as good a claim as his schismatical rival, if not better, to represent the old succession. On the other hand, the existence of several Catholic patriarchs of the same see, for instance, the Melchite, Jacobite, Maronite, and Latin titulars of Antioch, is a concession to the national feeling of Eastern Christians, or, in the case of the Latin, a relic of the crusades that archaeologically can hardly be justified.

It is curious that there is no Uniat Patriarch of Constantinople. There was for a time, however, a new patriarchate among the Orthodox. In the sixteenth century the Church of Russia had become a very large and flourishing branch of the Orthodox communion. The Russian Government then thought it would be a good thing to cut its loose and give it back to the head of the Church of Constantinople. In 1589 the Tsar Feodor I (1589–98) made the Metropolitan See of Moscow into an independent patriarchate. In 1591 the other patriarchs in synod confirmed his arrangement and gave Moscow the fifth place, below Jerusalem. Orthodox theologians were delighted that the sacred patriarchate, the classical order of five patriarchs, was thus restored; they said that God had raised up Moscow to replace fallen Rome. But their joy did not last long. Only ten Russian patriarchs reigned. In 1700 the last of these, Adria, died. Peter the Great did not allow a successor to be elected, and in 1721 replaced the patriarchal see of Moscow by a position for the Russian Church. But many Russians deplore the present tyranny of State over Church in their country hope for a restoration of the national patriarchate as the first step towards better things.

There remain only the so-called "minor" patriarchates in the West. At various times certain Western sees, too, have been called patriarchal. But there is a fundamental difference between these and any Eastern patriarchate. Namely, the pope is Patriarch of the West; all Western bishops of whatever rank are subject not only to his papal but also to his patriarchal jurisdiction. But a real patriarch cannot be subject to another patriarch; no patriarch can have another patriarch as his rival. A cardinal diocesan ordinary cannot have another ordinary in his diocese.

Eastern patriarchs claim independence of any other patriarch as such; the Catholics obey the pope as pope, the Orthodox recognize the civil headship of Constanti

At various times other Western bishops have been called patriarchs. In the Middle Ages those of Lyons, Bourges, Canterbury, Toledo, Ivisa were occasionally so-called. But there was never any legal claim to these merely complimentary titles.

V. Existing Patriarchies.—We give first a complete list of all persons who now bear the title. A.

Catholics.—The pope as Patriarch of the West (this is the commonest form; “Patriarch of Rome”, or “Latin Patriarch” also occur) rules all Western Europe from Poland to the Balkan Peninsula (the Danube), the Orient and Egypt, all other lands (America, Australia) colonized from these lands and all Western (Latin) missionaries and dwellers in the East. In other words, his patriarchal jurisdiction extends over all who use the Western (Roman, Ambrosian, Mozarabic) rites, and over the Byzantine Uniates in Italy, Corsica, and the West Indies. He is head of the Western Church and he frequently makes laws (such as ritual laws and our form of clerical celibacy) for the Western patri archate alone.

The Uniat Catholic patriarchs are as follows: (1) Melchite Patriarch of Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and all the East, ruling over all Melchites (q. v.); (2)
the Armenian Patriarch of Cilicia; (3) the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria; (4) the Maronite Patriarch of Antioch and all the East; (5) the Patriarch of Cilicia of the Armenians; (6) the Patriarch of Babylon of the Chaldees. These rule over all members of their rite, except that the Armenian has no jurisdiction in Austria or the Crimea, where the Ar

B. Non-Catholics.—Non-Catholics who bear the title now are the Orthodox Patriarchs of Constanti nople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem; the Nestorian patriarch at Knechias (his title is an “Catholicos Patriarch of the East”); the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria; the Jacobite Patriarch of Antioch; four Armenian patriarchs, the “Catholicos and Patriarch of all Armenians” at Etchmiadzin and those of Constantinople, Sis, and Jerusalem. The rights, dignity, and duties of patriarchs form part of the canon law of each Church. They are not the same in all cases.
As a general principle it may be said that the funda mental notion is that a patriarch has the same authority over his metropolitans as they have over their suffra gan bishops. Moreover, a patriarch is not himself subject to another patriarch, or rather he is not sub ject to any one’s patriarchal jurisdiction. But there is here a difference between Catholics and the others. All Catholics, including patriarchs, obey the supreme (papal) authority in Rome. The Roman Patriarch, who is not head of the Church, is not the Pope. The head of the Church is the Pope. All patriarchs must except from our consideration the merely titular patriarchs who have no authority at all. In the case of the Eastern Churches the general principle is that a patriarch is subject to no living authority save that of a possible general council. But here again we must except the Armenians. Their cathedrals had for many centuries authority over all bishops in a very like that of the pope. It is diminished now; but still one can hardly say that the other patriarchs are quite independent of him. He alone may summon national synods. The Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople has now usurped most of his rights in the Turkish Empire. One of these two contains all bishops. The Patriarch of Sis may not even consecrate chasms; but is supplied from Etchmiadzin. A somewhat similar case is that of the Orthodox. Since the Turkish conquest the Ecumenical Patriarch has been the civil head of all the Orthodox in the Turkish Empire. He has continually tried and still to a great extent tries to turn his civil headship into some ecclesiastical and to be in short an Orthodox pope. His attempts are always indignantly rejected by the other patriarchs and the national Churches, but not always successfully. Meanwhile he has kept at least one sign of authority. He alone consecrates chasms for all Orthodox bishops, except for those of Russia, by which country he is now in fact almost independent of the Church of Constantinople.

In the East the general principle is that the patriarchs ordains all bishops. This is a very old sign of authority in those countries. He is elected by his metropolitan or (permanent) synod, ordained, as a rule, by his own suffragans, makes laws, and has certain rights of confining or deposing his bishops. He alone confirms all bishops, and may summon patriarchal (permanent) synods. The question of the deposition of patriarchs among the non-Catholics is difficult. Among the Orthodox they have been and are constantly deposed by their metropolitans or synod. They nearly always refuse to acknowledge their deposition and a struggle follows in which Constantinople always tries to interfere. Eventually the Turk settles it, generally in favour of deposition, since he gets a large bribe for the new patriarch's heret. The special rights and duties of the patriarchs of the various Eastern Churches are given in Nihermay (Rituar-lik) of the Church since Eugene IV (1433-47) cardinals have precedence over patriarchs. Uniat patriarchs are elected by a synod of all the bishops of the patriarchate and confirmed by the Holy See. They must send a profession of Faith to the pope and receive the pallium from him. Their rights are summed up by a Constitution of Benedict XIV ("Apostolica," 14 Feb., 1712), namely: to summon and preside at patriarchal synods (whose acts must be confirmed at Rome), to ordain all bishops of their territory and consecrate chasms, to send the omophorion to their metropolitan, receive appeals made against the judgments of these, and receive titles of all canonical immunity; in synod they may depose their bishops. They bear their patriarchal crosier not only throughout their own territory, but, by a special concession, everywhere except at Rome. All have a permanent representative at Rome. They must visit all their dioceses every third year and may not resign without the pope's consent. The Bull "Reversurum" of the time of Sixtus V constitutes the Armenians a patriarchate; with modifications it has been extended to other Uniates. The precedence among patriarchs is determined by the rank of their see, according to the old order of the five patriarchates, followed by Cilicia, then Babylonia. Between several the title of "first rank" does not signify that the order is that of the date of their preconization.

The titular Latin patriarchs have only certain ceretion of the institute the Brothers have been enabled to perfect and extend their congregation in Ireland, and to open new colleges, schools, and orphanages in the above-mentioned foreign countries. The scope of their work, which embraces primary, intermediate, and university education, has been much extended in the last century, and an increasing amount of technical and scientific study by the different educational departments has been warmly supported by the Brotherhood; while by their management of orphanages and industrial schools they aid thousands of youths to raise themselves to a higher place in the social scale.

The residential colleges and secondary day schools equip the students for responsible positions in life. The colleges of the Brothers in India are affiliated to the Allahabad and Calcutta Universities, in which their students have distinguished themselves; while in Australia, notwithstanding that the Brothers receive no State aid, their pupils compete successfully with those of the highly subsidized Government schools for positions in the civil service. On the occasion of the centenary in 1908, His Holiness Pope Pius X bestowed on the order many favours and special indulgences. The superior general and his assistants reside at the mother-house, Tullough, Ireland, where are also the novitiate and house of studies.

JEROME F. BYRNE.

Patrick, Saint, Apostle of Ireland, b. at Kilpatrick, near Dumbarton, in Scotland, in the year 387; d. at Saul, Downpatrick, Ireland, 17 March, 463. He had for his parents Calphurnius and Concessus. The former belonged to a Roman family of high rank and held the office of decurio in Gaul or Britain. Concessus was a near relative of the great patron of Gaul, St. Martin of Tours. Kilpatrick still retains many memorials of Saint Patrick, and frequent pilgrimages continued far into the Middle Ages to perpetuate the memory of his sanctity and miracles. In his sixteenth year, Patrick was carried into captivity by Irish marauders and was sold as a slave to a chieftain named Milichu in Dalaradach, a territory of the present county of Antrim in Ireland, where for six years he tended his master's flocks in the valley of the Braid and on the slopes of Slensin, near the modern town of Ballymena.

He related in his "Confession" that during his captivity while he was in the garden of his master, the chieftain prayed many times in the day: "the love of God," he added, "and His fear increased in me more and more, and the faith grew in me, and the spirit was roused, so that, in a single day, I have said as many as a hundred prayers; and in the night nearly the same, so that while I was asleep on the mountain, even before the dawn, I was roused to prayer and I felt no hurt from it, whether there was snow or ice or rain; nor was there any shabbiness in me, such as I see now, because the spirit was then fervent within me." In the ways of a benign Providence the six years of Patrick's captivity became a remote preparation for his future apostolate. He acquired a perfect knowledge of the Celtic tongue in which he would express the glad tidings of Redemption, and, as his master Milichu was a druidical high priest, he became familiar with all the details of Druidism from whose bondage he was destined to liberate the Irish race.

Aedhmonen by an aned he after six years fled from his cruel master and bent his steps towards the west. He relates in his "Confession" that he had to travel about 200 miles: and his journey was probably towards Killala Bay and onwards thence to Westport. He found a ship ready to set sail and after some repairs was on his way. As a poor man he was among his friends once more in Britain, but now his heart was set on devoting himself to the service of God in the sacred ministry. We meet with him at St. Martin's monastery at Tours, and again at the island sanctuary of Lérins which was just then acquiring widespread renown for learning and piety; and wherever lessons of heroic perfection in the exercise of Christian life could be acquired, thither the fervent Patrick was sure to bend his steps. No sooner had St. Germanus heard of his great mission at Auxerre than Patrick put himself under the immediate charge of that noble bishop. It was at that great bishop's hands that Ireland's future apostle was a few years later promoted to the priesthood. It is the tradition in the territory of the Morini that Patrick under St. Germanus's guidance for some years was engaged in missionary work among them. When Germanus proceeded to Britain to combat the erroneous teachings of Pelagius, he chose Patrick to be one of his missionary companions and thus it was his privilege to be associated with the representative of Rome in the triumphs that ensued over heresy and Paganism, and in the many remarkable events of the expedition, such as the miraculous calm of the tempest at sea, the visit to the relics at St. Alban's shrine, and the Alleluia in the holy work, he was favoured with visions of the children from Focluth, by the Western sea, who cried out to him: "O holy youth, come back to Erin, and walk once more among your own people." He was appointed to Rome, and was consecrated bishop of Auxerre by Segusius, his priest, to Celestine, Pope of Rome, approved of by whose judgment, supported by whose authority, and strengthened by whose blessing, he went on his way to Ireland. It was only shortly before his death that Celestine gave this mission to Ireland's apostle and on that occasion bestowed on him many relics and other spiritual gifts, and gave him the name of Patrick, "the father of the faithful," but as foreshadowing the fruitfulness and merit of his apostolate whereby he became pater cœlitis (the father of his people). Patrick on his return journey from Rome received at Ivera the tidings of the death of Palladius, and turning aside to the neighbouring city of Turin received episcopal consecration at the hands of his great bishop, St. Maximus, and thence hastened on to Auxerre to make under the guidance of St. Germanus due preparations for the Irish mission.

It was probably in the summer months of the year 433, that Patrick and his companions landed at the mouth of the Vantry River close by Wieloch. Here St. Brigid afterwards ordained him. But Patrick was not disheartened. The intrepid missionary resolved to search out a more friendly territory in which to enter on his mission. First of all, however, he would proceed towards Dalarada, where he had been a slave, to pay the price of ransom to his former master, and in exchange for the servitude and cruelly endured at his hands to impart to him the blessings and freedom of God's children. He rested for some days at the islands off the Skerries coast, one of which still retains the name of Irias-Patrick, and he probably visited the adjoining islands, on which the feast or the name of the saint was known as Holm Patrick. Tradition fondly points out the impression of St. Patrick's foot upon the hard rock—off the main shore, at the entrance to Skerries harbour. Continuing his course northwards he halted at the mouth of the River Boyne. A number of the Druids obeyed the sacred gong which he heard with joy in their own sweet tongue the glad tidings of Redemption. There too he performed his first miracle on Irish soil to confirm the honour due to the Blessed Virgin, and the Divine birth of our Saviour. Leaving one of his companions to continue the work of instruction so auspiciously begun, he hastened forward to Strangford Lough and there quitting his boat continued his journey over land towards Slemish. He had not proceeded far when a chieftain, named Dicru, appeared on the scene to prevent his further advance. He drew his sword to smite the saint, but his arm became rigid as a staff and remained so until he declared himself obedient to Patrick. Overcome by the saint's meekness and miracles, Dicru asked for instruction and made a gift of a large sabhalli (barn), in which the sacred mysteries were offered up. This was the first sanctuary dedicated by St. Patrick in Erin. It became in later years a chosen retreat of the saint. A monastery and church were erected there, and the hallowed site retains the name Sabhalli (pronounced Saul) to the present day. Continuing his journey towards Slemish, the saint was struck with horror on seeing at a distance the fort of his old master Mlehan enclosed in flames. The fame of Patrick's marvellous power of miracles had preceded him. Mlehan, in a fit of frenzy, gathered his treasures into his mansion and setting it on fire, cast himself into the flames. An ancient record adds: "His pride could not endure the thought of being vanquished by his former slave".

Returning to Saul, St. Patrick learned from Dicru that the chieftains of Erin had been summoned to a meeting at Tara, the Ardi-Righ, that is, Supreme Monarch of Ireland. This was an opportunity which Patrick would not forego; he would present himself before the assembly, to strike a decisive blow against the Druidism that held the nation captive, and to secure freedom for the glad tidings of Redemption of which he was the herald. As he journeyed on he rested for some days at the house of a chieftain named Sesine, who with his household joyfully embraced the Faith. The youthful Benignus, or Benignus, the son of the chief, was in a special way captivated by the Gospel doctrines and the meekness of Patrick. Whilst the saint slumbered he would gather sweet assents to his holy mission, and when Patrick was setting out, continuing his journeys towards Tara, Benignus clung to his feet declaring that nothing would sever him from him. "Allow him to have his way", said St. Patrick to the chieftain, "he shall be heir to my sacred mission." Thenceforth Benignus was the inseparable companion of the saint, and the prophecy was fulfilled, for Benignus is named among the "comharas" or successors of St. Patrick in Armagh. It was on 26 March, Easter Sunday in 433, that the eventful assembly was to meet at Tara, and the decree went forth that from the preceding day the fires throughout the king's dominions should be extinguished and that the signal was kindled at the royal mansion. The chieftains and Bretons came in full numbers and the Druids too would muster all their strength to bid defiance to the herald of good tidings and to secure the hold of their super-

The beautiful prayer of St. Patrick, popularly known as "St. Patrick's Breast-Plate", is supposed to have been composed by him in preparation for this victory over Paganism. The following is a literal translation from the old Irish text:

I bind to myself to-day
The strong virtue of the Invocation of the Trinity.
I believe the Trinity in the Unity
The Creator of the Universe.

I bind to myself to-day
The virtue of the Incarnation of Christ with His Baptism,
The Virtue of His crucifixion with His burial,
The virtue of His Resurrection with His Ascension,
The virtue of His coming on the Judgment Day.

I bind to myself to-day
The virtue of the love of seraphim,
In the obedience of angels,
In the hope of resurrection unto reward,
In prayers of Patriarchs,
In predictions of Prophets,
In preaching of Apostles,
In Faith of Confessors,
In purity of holy Virgins,
In deeds of righteous men.

I bind to myself to-day
The power of Heaven,
The light of the sun,
The brightness of the moon,
The splendour of fire,
The flashing of lightning,
The swiftness of wind,
The depth of sea,
The stability of earth,
The compactness of rocks.

I bind to myself to-day
God's Power to guard me,
God's Might to uphold me,
God's Wisdom to teach me,
God's Eye to watch over me,
God's Ear to hear me,
God's Word to give me speech,
God's Hand to guide me,
God's Way to lead me,
God's Shield to shelter me,
God's Host to secure me,
Against the snares of demons,
Against the seductions of vices,
Against the lusts of nature,
Against everyone who meditates injury to me, Whether far or near,
Whether few or with many.

I invoke to-day all these virtues
Against every hostile merciless power
Which may assail my body and my soul,
Against the incantations of false prophets,
Against the black laws of heathenism,
Against the false laws of heresy,
Against the deceits of idolatry,
Against the spells of women, and smiths, and druids, Against every knowledge that binds the soul of man.

Christ, protect me to-day
Against every poison, against burning,
Against drowning, against death-wound,
That I may receive abundant reward.

Christ with me, Christ before me,
Christ behind me, Christ within me,
Christ beneath me, Christ above me,
Christ at my right, Christ at my left,
Christ in the fort, Christ in the chariot seat,
Christ in the poop,
Christ in the heart of everyone who thinks of me,
Christ in the mouth of everyone who speaks to me,
Christ in every eye that sees me,
Christ in every ear that hears me.

I bind to myself to-day
The strong virtue of an invocation of the Trinity.
I believe the Trinity in the Unity
The Creator of the Universe.

St. Patrick remained during Easter week at Slane and Tara, unfolding to those around him the lessons of Divine truth. Meanwhile the national games were being celebrated a few miles distant at Tailten (now Telltown) in connexion with the royal feast. St. Patrick proceeding thither solemnly administered Baptism to Connal, brother of the Ard-Righ Leoghairne, on Wednesday, 5 April. Bencen and others had already been privately gathered into the fold of Christ, but this was the first public administering of baptism, recognized by royal edict, and hence in the ancient Irish Calendars to the fifth of April is assigned "the beginning of the Baptism of Erin". This first Christian royal chieftain made a gift to Patrick of a site for a church which to the present day retains the name of Donagh-Patrick. The blessing of heaven was with Connal's family. St. Columba is reckoned among his descendants, and many of the kings of Ireland until the eleventh century were of his race. St. Patrick left some of his companions to carry on the work of evangelization in Meath, thus so auspiciously began. He would himself visit the other territories. Some of the chieftains who had come to Tara were from Focluth, in the neighbourhood of Killala, in Connaught, and as it was the children of Focluth who in vision had summoned him to return to Ireland, he resolved to accompany those chieftains on their return, that thus the district of Focluth would be among the first to receive the glad tidings of Redemption. It affords a convincing proof of the difficulties that St. Patrick had to overcome, that though full liberty to preach the Faith throughout Erin was granted by the monarch Leoghairne, nevertheless, in order to procure a safe conduct through the intervening territories whilst proceeding towards Connaught he had to pay the price of fifteen slaves. On his way thither, passing through Gramard he learned that at Magh-Sleacht, not far distant, a vast concourse was engaged in offering worship to the chief idol Cruachan. It was a huge pillar-stone, covered with slabs of gold and silver, with a circle of twelve minor idols around it. He proceeded thither, and with his crosier smote the chief idol that crumbled to dust; the others fell to the ground. At Killala he found the whole people of the territory assembled. At his preaching, the king and his six sons, with 12,000 of the people, became doctile to the Faith. He spent seven years visiting every district of Connaught, organizing parishes, forming dioceses, and instructing the chieftains and people. On the occasion of his first visit to Rathorgan, the royal seat of the kings of Connaught, situated near Tulsk, in the County of Roscommon, a remarkable incident occurred, recorded in many of the authentic narratives of the saint's life. Close by the clear fountain of Clebach, not far from the royal abode, Patrick and his venerable companions had pitched their tents and at early dawn were chanting the praises of the Most High, when the two daughters of the Irish monarch—Ethne, the fair, and Fedelm, the ruddy—came thither, as was their wont, to bathe. Astonished at the vision that presented itself to them, the royal maidens cried out: "Who are ye, and whence do ye come? Are ye phantoms, or fairies, or friendly mortals?" St. Patrick said to them: "It were better you would adore and worship the one true God, whom we announce to you, than that you would satisfy your curiosity by such vain questions." And then Ethne broke forth into the questions:

"Who is God?"
"And where is God?"
"Where is His dwelling?"
"Is He rich in silver and gold?"
"Is He everlasting? Is He beautiful?"
"Are His daughters dear and lovely to the men of this world?"
"Is He in the heavens or on earth?"
"Is He here or in rivers, in mountains, in valleys?"
"Make Him known to us. How is He to be seen? How is He to be loved? How is He to be found?"
"Is it in youth or is it in old age that He may be found?"

But St. Patrick, filled with the Holy Ghost, made answer:

"God, whom we announce to you, is the Ruler of all things."
"The God of heaven and earth, of the sea and the rivers."
"The God of the sun, and the moon, and all the stars."
"The God of the high mountains and of the low-lying valleys."
"The God who is above heaven, and in heaven, and under heaven."
"His dwelling is in heaven and earth, and the sea, and all therein."
"He gives breath to all."
"He gives life to all."
"He is over all."
"He upholds all."
"He gives light to the sun."
"He imparts splendour to the moon."
"He has made wells in the dry land, and islands in the ocean."
"He has appointed the stars to serve the greater lights."
"His Son is co-eternal and co-equal with Himself."
"The Son is not younger than the Father."
"And the Father is not older than the Son."
"And the Holy Ghost proceeds from them."
"The Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost are under heaven."

"But I desire by faith to unite you to the Heavenly King, as you are daughters of an earthly king."

The maidens, as if with one voice and one heart, said:

Teach us most carefully how we may believe in the Heavenly King; show us how we may behold Him face to face, and we will do whatsoever You shall say to us."

And when he had instructed them he said to them: "Do you believe that by baptism you put off the sin inherited from the first parents?"

They answered: "We believe."
"Do you believe in penance after sin?"
"We believe."
"Do you believe in life after death? Do you believe in resurrection on the Day of Judgment?"
"We believe."
"Do you believe in the unity of the Church?"
"We believe."

Then they were baptized, and were clothed in white garments. And they besought that they might behold the face of Christ. And the saint said to them: "You cannot see the face of Christ unless you taste death, and unless you receive the sacriifice." They answered: "Give us the sacriifice, so that we may be able to behold your Spouse." And the ancient narrative adds: "when they received the Eucharist of God, they slept in death, and they were placed upon a couch, arrayed in their white baptismal robes."

In 440 St. Patrick entered on the special work of the conversion of Ulster. Under the following year, the ancient annalists relate a wonderful spread of the Faith throughout that province. In 444 a site for a church was granted at Armagh by Daire, the chieftain of the district. It was in a valley at the foot of a hill, but the saint was not content. He had special designs in his heart for that district, and at length the chieftain told him to select in his territory any site he would deem most suitable for his religious purpose. St. Patrick chose that beautiful hill on which the old cathedral of Armagh stands. As he was marking out the church with his companions, they came upon a doe and fawn, and the saint said they would kill the doe, but St. Patrick would not allow them to do so, and, taking the fawn upon his shoulders, and followed by the doe, he proceeded to a neighbouring hill, and laid down the fawn, and announced that there, in future times, great glory would be given to the Most High. It was precisely upon that hill thus fixed by St. Patrick that, a few years ago, there was solemnly dedicated the new and beautiful Catholic cathedral of Armagh. A representative of the Holy See presided on the occasion, and hundreds of priests and bishops were gathered there; and, indeed, it might truly be said, the whole Irish race on that occasion offered up that glorious cathedral to the Most High as a tribute of their united faith and piety, and their never-failing love of God. From Ulster St. Patrick probably proceeded to Meath to consolidate the organization of the communities there, and thence he continued his course through Leinster. Two of the saint's most distinguished companions, St. Ausins and St. Leobnins, had the rich valley of the Liffey assigned to them. The former's name is still retained in the church which he founded at Killosle, while the latter is honoured as first Bishop of Kilcullen. As usual, St. Patrick's primary care was to gather the ruling chieftains into the fold. At Naas, the royal residence in those days, he baptized the two sons of the King of Leinster. Memorials of the saint still abound in the district—the ruins of the ancient church which he founded, his holy well, and the hallowed sites in which the power of God was shown forth in miracles. At Sletty, in the immediate neighbourhood of Carlow, St. Fiaze, son of the chief Brehon, Dubhthach, was installed as bishop, and for a considerable time was continued to be the chief centre of religious life in Leinster. St. Patrick proceeded through Gowran into Ossory; here he erected a church under the invocation of St. Martin, near the present city of Kilkenny, and enriched it with many of the precious relics which he had brought from Rome. It was in Leinster, on the border of the present counties of Carlow and Kilkenny, that Odhran, St. Patrick's charioteer, attained the martyr's crown. The chieftain of that district honoured the demon-idol, Crom Cruach, with special worship, and, on hearing of that idol being cast down, vowed to avenge the insult by the death of our apostle. Passing through the territory, Odhran overheard the plot that was being organized for the murder of St. Patrick, and as they were setting out in the chariot to continue their journey, asked the saint, as a favour, to take the reins, and to allow himself, for the day, to hold the place of honour and rest. This was granted, and scarcely had they set out when a well-directed thrust of a lance pierced the heart of the devoted charioteer, who thus, by laying down his life, saved St. Patrick's life, and won for himself the martyr's crown. St. Patrick next proceeded to Munster. As usual, his efforts were directed to combat error in the chief centres of authority, knowing well that, in the paths of conversion, the kings and chieftains would soon be followed by their subjects. At Cashel, the archbishopric was established, and as the saint knew that he was received with great enthusiasm, the chief and Brehons and people welcoming him with joyous acclaim. While engaged in the baptism of the royal prince Aengus, son of the King of Munster, the saint, leaning on his crozier, pierced with its sharp point the prince’s foot. Vengeance bore the pain unmoved. When St. Patrick, at the close of the ceremony, saw the blood flow, and asked him why he had been silent, he replied, with genuine heroism, that he thought it might be part of the ceremony, a penalty for the joyous blessings of the Faith that were imparted. The saint admired his heroism, and, taking the chieftain’s shield, inscribed a cross on the same point of the shield, and promised that that shield would be the signal of countless spiritual and temporal triumphs. Our apostle spent a considerable time in the present County of Limerick. The fame of his miracles and sanctity had gone before him, and the inhabitants of Thomond and northern Munster, crossing the Shannon, were the first to hasten to receive his instruction. When giving his blessing to them on the summit of the hill of Finimine, looking out on the rich plains before him, he is said to have prophesied the coming of St. Senanus: “To the green island in the West, at the mouth of the sea i.e.,ooky-Caitha, now Scattery Island, at the mouth of the Shannon, neir Killrush, the lamp of the people of God will come; he will be the head of counsel to all this terri-ory.”

At Sangri (now Slangland), in Limerick, and also in the district of Garryowen, the holy wells of the saint are pointed out, and the slab of rock, which served for his bed, and the altar on which every day he offered up the Holy Sacrifice. On the banks of the Shannon, at the lower water, and the Lee, wherever the saint preached during the seven years he spent in Munster, a hearty welcome awaited him. The ancient Life attests: “After Patrick had founded cells and churches in Munster, and had ordained persons of every grade, and healed the sick, and resuscitated the dead, he bade them farewell, and imparted his blessing to them.” The words of this blessing, which is said to have been given from the hills of Tipperary, as registered in the saint’s Life, to which I have just referred, are particularly beautiful:

“A blessing on the Munster people—
Men, youths, and women,
A blessing on the land
That yields them fruit.
A blessing on every treasure
That shall be produced on their plains,
Without any one being in want of help,
God’s blessing be on Munster.
A blessing be on their peaks,
Of able heads, that never fall.
A blessing on their glens,
A blessing on their ridges.
Like the sound of the sea under ships,
Be the number of their hearts;
On slopes, on plains,
On mountains, on hills, a blessing.”

St. Patrick continued until his death to visit and watch over the churches which he had founded in all the provinces of Ireland. He comforted the faithful in their difficulties, strengthened them in the Faith and in the practice of virtue, and appointed pastors to continue his work among them. It is recorded in his Life that he consecrated no fewer than 350 bishops.
He appointed St. Loman to Trim, which rivalled Armagh itself in its abundant harvest of piety. St. Gusach, son of his former master, Miletu, became Bishop of Grand, while the two daughters of the same pagan chieftain founded cloys by, at Clonbrony, a convent of nuns, and erected the oracles of sanctity. St. Mol, nephew of our apostle, had the charge of A-dugh; St. Maccarthum, who appears to have been particularly beloved by St. Patrick, was made Bishop of Clonmore. The narrative in the ancient Life of the saint regarding his visit to the district of Costello, in the County of Mayo, serves to illustrate his manner of dealing with the chieftains. He found, it says, the chief, Ernase, and his son, Loarn, sitting under a tree, “with whom he remained, together with his brethren companions, for a week, and they received from him the doctrine of salvation with attentive ear and mind.
Meanwhile he instructed Loarn in the rudiments of learning and piety.” A church was erected there, and, in after years, Loarn was appointed to its charge.

The number of early saints who were designated as chosen to be his companions, and especially commemorated is so vast and high that it is difficult to make a list of them. Countless converts of high rank would cast their precious ornaments at his feet, but all were restored to them. He had not come to Erin in search of material wealth, but to enrich her with the priceless treasures of the Catholic Faith.
From time to time he withdrew from the spiritual duties of his apostolate to devote himself wholly to prayer and penance. One of his chosen places of solitude and retreat was the island of Lough Dergh, which, to our own day, has continued to be a favourite resort of pilgrims, and is known as St. Patrick’s Purgatory. Another theatre of his miraculous power and piety and penitential austerities in the west of Ireland was the island of Inishbofin, which, to this day, being in the Shannon, commands a view of the channel which, when in full flood, is said to be 60 feet deep, and 800 feet wide, and is the ancient lodge of the Sirens, a legendary tribe of women, who inhabited the sand-ridden shores of the Atlantic.

The hill of Aradhain (now Aghagower) is said to be the place, and to this day, the spot where the saint was born. It is said to have been named after him, and to have been given to him in pagan times as the Eagle Mountain, but ever since Ireland was enlightened with the light of Faith it is known as Crogan Patrick, i.e., St. Patrick’s mountain, and is honoured as the Holy Hill, the Mount Sinai of Ireland. St.
Patrick, in obedience to his guardian angel, made this mountain his hallowed place of retreat. In imitation of the great Jewish legislator on Sinai, he spent forty days on its summit in fasting and prayer, and other penitential exercises. His only shelter from the fury of the elements, the wind and rain, the hail and snow, was a cave, or recess, in the solid rock; and the flagstone on which he rested his weary limbs at night is still pointed out. The whole purpose of his prayer was to obtain a signal blessing from heaven for the race, whom he evangelized. The demons that made Ireland their battlefield mustered all their strength to tempt the saint and disturb him in his solitude, and turn him away, if possible, from his pious purpose.
They gathered around the hill in the form of vast flocks of hideous birds of prey. So dense were their ranks that they seemed to cover the whole mountain, like a cloud, and they so filled the air that Patrick could see neither sky nor earth nor ocean. St. Patrick besought God to scatter the demons, but for a time it would seem as if his prayers and tears were in vain. At length he rang his sweet-sounding bell, symbol of his preaching of the Divine truths. Its sound was heard over the valleys and hills of Erin, everywhere bringing peace and joy. The flocks of demons began to scatter, He flung his bell among them; they took to precipitate flight, and cast themselves into the ocean. So complete was the saint’s victory over them that, as the ancient narrative adds, “the seven years of the demons was at an end.” The saint, however, would not, as yet, descend from the mountain. He had vanquished the demons, but he would now wrestle with God Himself, like Jacob of old, to secure the spiritual interests of his people. The angel had announced to him that, to reward his fidelity in prayer and penance, as many of his people would be gathered into heaven as would cover the land and sea as far as his vision could reach. Far more ample, however, were the aspirations of the saint, and he resolved to persevere in fasting and prayer until the fullest measure of his petition was granted. Again and again the angel came to him to warn him, and at last the heavenly voices were too strong for him; he would not relinquish his post on the mountain, or relax his penance, until all were granted. At length the messenger came that his prayers were heard: (1) many souls would be freed from the pains of purgatory through his intercession; (2) whoever in a spirit of penance would recite his hymn before death would receive a benefit after death; (3) barbarian hordes would never obtain away in his Church; (4) seven years before the Judgment Day, the sea would spread over Ireland to save its people from the temptations and terrors of Antichrist; and (5) greatest blessing of all, Patrick himself would be deputed to judge the whole Irish nation in the last day. Such were the extraordinary favours which St. Patrick, with his wrestling with the Most High, his unceasing prayers, his unrequerable love of heavenly things, and his unremitting penitential deeds, obtained for the people whom he evangelized.

It is sometimes supposed that St. Patrick’s apostolate was a series of brilliant and unbroken triumphs, and yet it was quite the reverse. No storm of persecution was, indeed stirred up to assail the infant Church, but the saint himself was subjected to frequent trials at the hands of the druids and of other enemies of the Faith. He tells us in his “Confessio” that no fewer than twelve times he and his companions were taken prisoner, and carried off as captives, and on one occasion in particular he was loaded with chains, and his death was decreed. But from all these trials and sufferings he was liberated by a benign Providence. It is on account of the many hardships which he endured for the Faith that, in some of the ancient Martyrology, he is =shone as a martyr. St. Patrick, having now completed his triumph over Paganism, and gathered Ireland into the fold of Christ, prepared for the summons to his reward. St. Brigid came to him with her chosen virgins, bringing the shroud in which he would be enshrined. It is recorded that when St. Patrick and St. Brigid were united in their last prayer, a special blessing was shown on them. He saw the whole of Ireland lit up with the brightest rays of Divine Faith. This continued for centuries, and then clouds gathered around the devoted island, and, little by little, the religious glory faded away, until, in the course of centuries, it was only in remotest valleys that some glimmer of its light remained.

St. Patrick prayed that that light would never be extinguished, and, as he prayed, the angel came to him and said: “Fear not; your apostolate shall never cease.” As he thus prayed, the glimmering light grew in brightness, and ceased not until once more the hills and valleys of Ireland were lit up in its pristine splendour. The light, however, was, as of old, destined to be again extinguished; “Such shall be the abiding splendour of Divine truth in Ireland.” At Soul (Sahall), St. Patrick received the summons to his reward on 17 March, 493. St. Tassach administrated the last sacraments to him. His remains were wrapped in the shroud woven by St. Brigid’s own hands. The bishop and clergy, and faithful people from all parts crowded around his remains to pay due honour to the Father of their Faith. Some of the ancient Lives record that for several days the light of heaven shone around his bier. His remains were interred at the chieftain’s Dun or Fort two miles from Saul, where in after times arose the cathedral of Armagh, renowned for the holy crosses: but Patrick remains to be remembered as of unquestionable genuineness.

The best edition, with text, translation, and critical notes, is by Rev. Dr. White for the Royal Irish Academy, in 1905. The 31 canons of a synod held before the year 160 by St. Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserminus, though rejected by Todd and Hadden, have been placed by Professor Bury beyond the reach of controversy. Another series of 31 ecclesiastical canons entitled “Primo die” and “De abasionibus seculi,” and dated unquestionably of Irish origin and dating before the close of the seventh century, is generally considered to be of a later date than St. Patrick. Two tracts (in B. L. I,111), entitled “De abasionibus seculi,” and “De tribus habitaculis,” were composed by St. Patrick in Irish and translated into Latin at a later period. Passages in them are assigned to St. Patrick in the “Collectio Hibernensis Canorum,” which is of unquestionable authority and dates from the year 700 (Wasserschleben, 2nd ed., 1885). This “Collectio Hibernensis” also assigns to St. Patrick the famous synodical decree: “Si que questiones in facie insula orientur, ad Sedem Apostolorum referantur.” (If any difficulties arise in this island, let them be referred to the Apostolic See). The beautiful prayer, known as “Faith Fiada,” or the “Lorica of St. Patrick” (St. Patrick’s Breast-Plate), first edited by Petrie in his “History of Tara,” is now universally accepted as genuine. The “Dieta Sancti Patritii,” or oral sayings, which are preserved in the “Book of Armagh,” are accurately edited by Fr. Hogue, S.J., in “Documenta de S. Patritio” (Brussels, 1884). The old Irish text of “The Rule of Patrick” has been edited by O’Keefe, and the translation by Archbishop Healy in the appendix to his Life of St. Patrick (Dublin, 1903). It is a tract of venerable antiquity, and embodies the teaching of the saint.

The Trias thauutangut (loc. Lowien, 1647) of the Franciscan Colgan is the most complete collection of the ancient Lives of the saint. The Renowned Life of St. Patrick, the Lectio custodes, the “Liber de S. Patrizio,” and the “Liber de Luctibus,” are all presented from the pen of Hennyxx the translation of the Irish Tripartite Life, with copious notes. Whitley Stokes, in the Redigina (London, 1862), has given a full account of the Irish Tripartite, together with many original documents from the Book of Armagh and other sources. The most noteworthy works of later years are Shearman, Joannem commentarium” (Rome, 1870); Todd, St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland (Dublin, 1864); REV. Life of St. Patrick (London, 1898); HEALY, The Life and Writings of St. Patrick (Dublin, 1900).

Patrizi, Francis Xavier; Jesuit, exegetes b. at Rome, 19 June, 1767; d. there 23 April, 1881. He was the eldest son and heir of the Roman Count Patrizi, who entered the Society of Jesus 12 Nov., 1814, was ordained priest in 1824, and soon became professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew in the Roman College. The revolution of 1848 caused Patrizi and his fellow professor Perrone to take refuge in England, Here, and Ireland, and Perrone, in 1865, was given the chair of Sacred Scripture in the University of Louvain.

He wrote twenty-one Biblical and ascetical works. Of the former the most important are: “De interpretatione scripturarum saecularum” (2 vols., Rome, 1841); “De consensu utriusque libri Maehabalorum” (Rome, 1856); “De Evangelii” (3 vols., Freiburg im Breisgan, 1853); “In Joanneo commentarium” (Rome, 1857); “In Marcum commentarium” (Rome, 1862); “In apostolis bibliorum commentaries” (Rome, 1863). He wrote: “Cento salmi tradotti letteralmente dal testo ebraico e commentati” (Rome, 1875); “De interpretatione oracolorum ad Christianum pertinentium” (Rome, 1853); “De immutaculata Marce origine” (Rome, 1853);

Patrology, the study of the writings of the Fathers of the Church, has more commonly been known in England as "patristics", or, more commonly still, as "patristic study." Some writers, chiefly in Germany, have distinguished between patrologia and patristica; Fessler, for instance, defines patrologia as the science which provides all that is necessary for the use of the works of the Fathers, dealing, therefore, with their authority, the criteria for judging their authenticity, the difficulties to be met with in them, and the rules for their use. But Fessler's own "Institutiones Patrologiae" has a larger range, as have similar works entitled Patrologies, of which the most scientific is the "Patrologia Latina" (C. F. Barden-hewer, 1908). On the other hand, Fessler describes patristica as that theological science by which all that correlates faith, morals, or discipline in the writings of the Fathers is collected and sorted. Lastly, the lives and works of the Fathers are described by another science, literary history. These distinctions are not much observed, nor do they seem very necessary, as they are nothing else than aspects of patristic study, as it forms part of fundamental theology, of positive theology, and of literary history. Another meaning of the word patrologia has come to it from the title of the great collections of the complete works of the Fathers published by the Abbé Migne (q. v.), "Patrologia Latina," 221 vols., and "Patrologia Graeca," 161 vols.

Patronage of St. Joseph, Feast of the. See Joseph, Saint.

Patron and Patronage.—I. By the right of patronage (ius patronatus) is understood a determinate sum of rights and obligations entailed upon a definite person, the patron, especially in connexion with the assignment and administration of a benefice; not in virtue of his hierarchal position, but by the legally regulated grant of the Church, out of gratitude towards her benefactor. Inasmuch as the rights of the patron pertain to the spiritual order, the right of patronage is in theory one of "ius spirituali annu dum," and is therefore subject to ecclesiastical legislation and jurisdiction. Since, however, the question of property rights is also involved, a far-reaching influence is wielded to-day by civil laws and civil courts in matters pertaining to patronage.

II. In the Oriental Church the founder of a church was permitted to nominate an administrator for the temporal goods and indicate to the bishop a candidate suitable for appointment (L. 46, C. de episc. I, 3, Nov. VII, c. 2). In the Western Church the Synod of Orange (411) granted such a right of presentation to a bishop who had built a church in another diocese c(i.e., C. XVI, q. 5) and the Synod of Toledo (635) gave a right to the privilege of nomination by him
(c. 32, C. XVI, q. 7). But the founder had no patron-tary rights (c. 31, C. XVI, q. 7). In the countries occupied by the Germanic tribes, on the basis of the individual temple and church rights found in their national laws, the builder of a church, the feudal lord, or the administrator possessed full right of dispos-of the church founded or possessed by him, as his own church (ecclesia propriis) and over the ecclesiastics appointed by him, whom he could dismiss at pleasure.
To obviate the drawbacks connected with this,
the appointment and dismissal of ecclesiastics at least formally was made subject to the consent of the bishop (c. 37, C. XVI, q. 7). In the course of the Conflict of jurisdictions, however, the right of nomination was abolished, although to the lord of the estate, as patron, was conceded the right as (ius spirituali
annu
dum) of presenting a cleric to the bishop (ius pro-spectandi) on the occasion of a vacancy in the church
(o.c. 13, C. XVI, q. 7; C. 5, 16, X DE IUCRE PATRONATUS, 1118).

III. The right of patronage may be: personal (ius patronatus personale) or real (reale): spiritual (ecclesiasticum; clericale), or lay (laicale), or mixed (mixtum); hereditary (hereditarian), or restricted to the family, or even to a definite person (familiar; personalismum); individual (singolare) or shared (ius comparatronatus); complete (plenum) or diminished (minus plenum). A personal right of patronage is peculiar to a person as such, while a real right of patronage belongs to one in possession for the time being of something with which a patronage is connected, provided of course that he is qualified for the possession of the right of patronage. A spiritual patronage is one belonging to the incumbent of an ecclesiastical office, or established by the founder, or, if the benefice be abolished, although to the lord of the estate, as patron, was conceded the right as (ius spirituali
annu
dum) of presenting a cleric to the bishop (ius pro-
spectandi) on the occasion of a vacancy in the church
(o.c. 13, C. XVI, q. 7; C. 5, 16, X DE IUCRE PATRONATUS, 1118).

IV. Any church benefice, with the exception of the papacy, the cardinalate, the episcopate, and the prefectures of cathedral, collegiate, and monastic churches, may be the object of the right of patronage. All persions and corporate bodies may be subject to the right of patronage. But persons, besides being capable of exercising the right, must be members of the Church.
Thus heathens, Jews, heretics, schismatics, and apostates are ineligible for any sort of patronage, even real.
Nevertheless in Germany and Austria it has become cumbersome to any one who desires to retake the right of patronage over Catholic, and Catholics over Protestant church offices. In modern concordats Rome has repeatedly granted the right of patronage to Protestant princes. Entirely ineligible for patronage are the ecclesiasticati vilandi

(the censuumnici tolerati are able at least to acquire it), and those who are infamous according to ecclesiastical or civil law. On the other hand, illegitimates, children, minors, and women may acquire patronages.

V. A right of patronage comes into existence or is originally acquired by foundation, privilege, or prescription. Under foundation or fundatio in the broader sense is included the granting of the necessary means to a church or monastery by the benefactor. Thus, granting that a church is necessary to a benefice, three things are requisite: the assignment of land (fundatio in the narrow sense), the erection of the church or monastery, and the provision necessary for the support of the church and beneficaries. Furthermore, present or future conditions, if three representatives, becomes ipso jure donor, unless he waives his claim (e. 25, X de iure patr. III, 38). Whence the saying: Patronum faciunt dos, adfectatio, funditus. Different persons performing these three acts become co-patrons. It is an accepted theory that one who is responsible for only one of the three acts mentioned, the other two conditions being fulfilled in any manner whatsoever, becomes a patron. It is possible to become a patron also through the reedificatio ecclesia and redolatio beneficii. A second manner in which a patronage may be acquired is through papal privilege. A third is by prescription.

VI. Derivatively, a patronage may be obtained through nullity of the order, reedificatio ecclesiae, or ex intestato, the second of which case a patronage may easily become a co-patronage; by presentation, in which a lay patron must have the sanction of the bishop if he desires to transfer his right to another layman, but an ecclesiastic requires the permission of the pope to present it to a layman, or that of the bishop to give it to another ecclesiastic (c. un. Extrav. comm. de rebus ecc. non alien. III, 4). Furthermore an already existing right of patronage may be acquired by exchange, by purchase, or by prescription. In exchange or purchase of a real patronage the price of the object in question may not be raised in consideration of the patronage; the right of patronage being ipso spirituali anno, such a thing would be simony. That the ruler of a country may acquire the right of patronage in any of the three ways mentioned, like any other member of the Church, goes without saying. On the other hand, it would be false to teach, as did the Josephinists and representatives of the "Illuminati," that the sovereign possesses the right to appoint to all benefices of the country, or that he receives the patronage of bishoprics, monasteries, and ecclesiastical foundations through secularization. Yet this question is now generally settled in Germany, Austria, etc., by agreement between the civil Governments on the one hand and the pope or bishops on the other.

VII. The rights involved in patronage are: the right of presentation, honorary rights, utilitarian rights, and the cura beneficii.

(a) The right of presentation (ius presentandi), the most important privilege of a patron, consists in this, that in case of a vacancy in the benefice, the patron is entitled by law to present a candidate to the vacant benefice, unless he waives his claim. The candidate must be an ecclesiastic of the diocese, or half a human of the diocese, or half a human of another diocese. The right by law is either possessed or acquired by the patron through his own efforts, or it may be decided by vote. In the case of juridical persons the presentation may be made according to statute, or by turns, or by de cision of the majority. The drawing of lots is excluded.

With regard to the one to be presented, in the case of a benefice involving the cure of souls, the ecclesiastical prescription of discharge from patronage (discharge for presentation the one he believes the most suitable, judging from the parish concurrsus. The lay patron has only to present the name of a candidate who is suitable in his opinion. In case this candidate has not passed the parish concurrsus, he must undergo an examination before the synodal examiners. In the case of a mixed patronage, the rights of which are exercised in common by an ecclesiastical and a lay patron, the same rule holds as in the case of a lay patronage. Here it is the lay who decides as a spiritual and again as a lay patronage, according as it is most pleasing to the patrons. If the prerogatives of the mixed patronage are exercised in turn, however, it is considered as a spiritual or a lay patronage, as suits the nature of the case. The patron cannot present his own name. Co-patrons may, however, present another of their own number. If through no fault of the patron, the name of an ineligible person is presented, he is granted a certain time of grace to make a new presentation. If, however, an ineligible person has been knowingly presented, the spiritual patron loses for the time being the right of presentation, but the lay patron, so long as the first interval allowed for presentation has not expired, may make an after-presentation. Thus the presentation of the spiritual patron is treated more after the manner of the episcopal collation. On that account the spiritual patron is not permitted an after-presentation or a variation in choice, which is permitted the lay patron, after which the bishop has the choice of the real names presented (ius variandi cumulatium, c. 24, X de iure patr. III, 38).

A presentation may be made by word of mouth or in writing. But under penalty of nullity all expressions are to be avoided which would imply a bestowal of the office (e. 5, X de iure patr. III, 38). A simoni-acal presentation would be invalid. The time allowed for presentation is four months to a lay patron, and six to a spiritual patron; six months is stipulated for a mixed patronage when exercised in common, four or six months when turn is taken (e. 22, X de iure patr. III, 38). The interval begins the moment announcement is made of the vacancy. For one who through no fault of his own has been hindered in making a presentation, the time does not expire at the end of the period mentioned. When his candidate has been unjustly rejected by the bishop, the patron may appeal, or make an after presentation.

(b) The honorary rights (cura honorifica) of the patron are: precedence in the curia, possession of the keys, presents, silk vestments, etc., as sitting in the chapter, prayers and intercessions, ecclesiastical mentions, burial in the church, ecclesiastical mourning, inscriptions, special inceasing, the asperses (holy water), ashes, palms, and the Pax.

(c) The utilitarian rights (cura utilis) of the patron consist essentially in this: that in so far as he is a descendant of the founder he is entitled to an allowance sufficient for his maintenance from the superfluous funds of the church connected with the patronage, if, through no fault of his own, he has been reduced to such straits as to be unable to support himself, and no one else is under any obligation to assist him (e. 25, X de iure patr. III, 38). To draw any other material advantages from the church connected with the patronage is prohibited, as so frequently happened in the Middle Ages, it is requisite for this condition to have been made at the time of foundation with the consent of the bishop, or that it be subsequently stipulated (e. 23, X de iure patr. III, 38. C. un. Extrav. comm. de rebus ecc. non alien. III, 4, 6). If the patron may have his name or the name of a new possessor borne on the church, he is entitled, if he has been reduced to such straits as to be unable to support himself, and no one else is under any obligation to assist him (e. 25, X de iure patr. III, 38).

and the property belonging to it. Again, on the patron is incumbent the defense or the advocate beneficci (c. 23, 21, X de iure part. III, 38). In the present administration of the church, this obligation has practically disappeared. Lastly, the patron has the subsidiary duty of building (Trent, Sess. XXI, "de ref.", c. viii).

VIII. The right of patronage lapses ipsum iure at the suppression of the subject or object. If the church connected with the patronage is threatened with total ruin, or the endowment with a deficit, if these first bound to restore it are not at hand, the bishop is to expel the patron to rebuild (redificandum) or renew the endowment (ad redodinandum). His refusal forfeits him the right of patronage, at least for himself personally. Furthermore, the right of patronage is lost upon express or tacit renunciation. And lastly, it lapses in cases of apostasy, heresy, schism, opposition, alienation, usurpation of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the patronal church or appropriation of its goods and revenues, murder or mutilation of an ecclesiastic connected with the church.

Patron Saints.—A patron is one who has been assigned by a venerable tradition, or chosen by election, as a special intercessor with God and the proper advocate of a particular locality, and is honoured by clergy and people with a special form of religious observance. The term "patron," being wider in its meaning than that of "titular," may be applied to a church, a district, a country, or a corporation. The word "patron" is applied only once to a place, church or institution. Both the one and the other, according to the legislation now in force, must have the rank of a canonized saint.

Patrons or Churches.—Origin.—During the first three centuries of the Church's history, the faithful assembled for worship in private houses, in cemeteries, or other places of devotion. At intervals, a priest, bishop, or bishop's agent were employed to designate the place where the faithful assembled to hear the word of God and partake of the sacraments. After peace had been given to the Church by Constantine, sacred edifices were freely erected, the emperor setting the example by the character and magnificence of his own foundations. The Church could be dedicated in memory of the martyrs who had died in defence of the faith. The celebration of the solemn rites had long been intimately associated with the places where the bodies of the martyrs reposèd, and the choice of sites for the new edifices was naturally determined by the scene of the martyrs' sufferings, or by the spot where their sacred remains lay buried. The great basilicas founded by Constantine, or during his lifetime, illustrate this tendency. The churches of St. Peter, St. Paul outside the walls, St. Lawrence in Agro Verano, St. Sebastian, St. Agnes on the Via Nomentana were all cemeterial basilicas, i.e. they were built over the places where the bodies of each of these saints lay buried. The same practice continued in the churches of SS. Domitilla and Genevra, SS. Nereus and Achilleus, St. Felix at Nola, and others. From this custom of rendering honour to the relics of the martyrs were derived the names of Memoria (memorial churches), Martyrium, or profession, frequently given to churches. The name of "titular" (titulus) was applied to churches that were endowed with reference to the name of the saint by which a church is known. The practice of placing the body or some relics of a martyr under the altar of sacrifice has been perpetuated in the Church, but the dedication was early extended to confessors and holy women who were not martyrs. The underlying doctrine of patronage is that of the communion of saints, or the bond of spiritual union existing between God's servants on earth, in heaven, or in purgatory. The saints are thereby regarded as the advocates and intercessors of those who are making their earthly pilgrimage.

Choice of Patrons.—Down to the seventeenth century, popular devotion, under the guidance of ecclesiastical authority, chose as the titular of churches those men or women renowned for their miracles, the saintliness of their lives, or their apostolic ministry in converting a nation to the Gospel. Urban VIII (23 March, 1638) laid down the rules that should guide the faithful in the future selection of patrons of churches, cities, and countries, without, however, interfering with the wishes of the titular church (Acta S. Sedis, XI, 292). As during the days of persecution the most illustrious among the Christians were those who had suffered the lives of their faith, it was to be expected that during the fourth century the selection of the names of martyrs as titulars would everywhere prevail. But with the progress of the Church in matters of concord, the development of the religious life, and the preaching of the Gospel in the different countries of Europe and Asia, bishops, priests, hermits, and nuns displayed in their lives lofty examples of Christian holiness. Churches, therefore, began to be dedicated in their honour. The choice of a particular patron has depended upon the particular place, and there have been one or other of the following: (1) The possession of the body or some important relic of the saint; (2) his announcement of the Gospel to the nation; (3) his labours or death in the locality; (4) his adoption as the national patron; (5) the special devotion of the founder of the church; (6) the spirit of some apostle or father; (7) the saint who was enumerated (28 Nov., 1879) as characteristic religious movements of our time; devotion to the Sacred Heart, to Our Lady of the Rosary, to St. Joseph, and to the Blessed Sacrament. It should be clearly understood that a church is, and always has been, dedicated to God; other dedications are annexed on an entirely different principle. The following list is arranged in the order of their national or local honour (for example) of the Blessed Virgin and the saints. A typical form is the following: "Deo ac+ dominó honoré deigne immaculatae et SS. Joannis Baptistæ et Evangelistæ." In 1190 a collegiate church in Dublin was dedicated "to God, Our Blessed Lady, and St. Patrick." Sometimes out of several who are mentioned, the one is expressly designated, as in the dedication of a chantry in Armagh (Scotland) in 1527, "for the praise, glory, and honour of the indivisible Trinity, the most glorious Virgin and St. Columba, abbot, our patron of the parish." The celestial patrones here considered will be restricted in the first instance to churches and chapels. Patrons in different countries generally present several who are mentioned by distinct national colouring; but the principles which have governed the selection of names will be made apparent by the examination of a few instances. In comparing place with place, the rank or precedence of patrons should be kept in view. A convenient arrangement will be the following: (1) Dedication to Christ and the Church; (2) to the Mother of God; (3) to the Angels; (4) to the holy personages who introduced the New Law of Christ; (5) to the Apostles and Evangelists; (6) to other saints.
Rome.—Rome is illustrations for churches named after its local martyrs. The most important are the basilicas of St. Peter, of St. Paul Outside the Walls, of St. Lawrence, St. Sebastian, and of St. Agnes in the Via Nomentana. Other churches have received their title from the fact of being constructed in connexion with houses belonging to certain families. Among these is the church of St. Clement's, St. Fulgentius's, St. Alexius's, St. Cecilia's, St. Praxedes's, St. Bartholomew's, Sts. John and Paul, St. Frances's of Rome. Santa Croce recalls St. Helen; the Domine quo vadis chapel refers to the meeting of Our Lord and St. Peter on the Appian Way; San Pietro in Carcere is erected above the Mumerist's Column; St. Paul Outside the Walls is the mansion of St. Peter's martyrdom; San Pietro in Vincoli contains the actual chains with which St. Peter was bound. St. John Lateran's was first dedicated to Our Saviour, but the title was changed in the twelfth century; St. Gregory on the Caelian recalls the home of St. Gregory and the site of the church he built in honour of St. Andrew; St. Lorenzo in Damaso recalls its founder, Pope Damasus. There are thirty-four churches dedicated to the Mother of God, distinguished often topographically (as Sta Maria in Via Lata, or Sta Maria in Trastevere) and also in other ways (as Sta Maria Maggiore, so called in relation to other churches of the same name, St. Maria on the Plate, Sta Maria dell'Anima, etc.). The formal dedications to God consist of Trinitas dei Pellegrini, Trinita dei Monti, S. Spirito in Sassia, S. Salvatore in Lauro, S. Salvatore in Trastevere, and the Gesù. There are no dedications to the Angels nor (until recently) to St. Joseph, the Sacred Heart, All Saints, or All Souls. In a few instances titles occur more than once: Lawrence, 6; Peter, 4; Paul, Andrew, Charles, John, Nicholas, 3 each (see Rome).

England.—St. Augustine and his companions brought with them to England the Roman customs and traditions respecting the naming and dedication of churches. Altars were consecrated with the ashes of the martyrs. One of the earliest dedication prayers of the Anglo-Saxon Church runs thus: "Tibi, sancta Dei geniture, virgo Maria (vel tibi, sancte J. B. Domini, vel martyres Christi, vel confessores Domini) tibi commendamus hanc curam templi hujus, quod consecravimus Domino Deo nostro, ut hic intercessor existas; preces et vota offerentes in Domino Medieval affert usque in sepulchrum plebis ad patris thronum conferas", etc. (Lingard, "The History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church", II, 40). Among the titulars of the Anglo-Saxon period are found: Christ Church (Canterbury), St. Mary's de Comelis, St. Mary's of Huntingdon, and of Lyminge, All Hallows (Lincoln), Peter (to whom the greater part of the Anglo-Saxon churches were dedicated), Peter and Paul (Canterbury), Paul (Jarrow), Andrew (Rochester), Martin (near Canterbury), Pancratius (Canterbury). Accepting the figures of P. A. Foster in her "Studies in Church Dedications", and without drawing a line between pre-Reformation and post-Reformation practices (owing to our otholomie), we get the following enumeration of titulars: Christ 373, Holy Cross or Holy Rood 83, Michael, or Michael the Archangel, or St. Michael and the Angels 721 (one in six of the churches, ancient and modern, now attached to the Established Church bears the name of Our Lady or one of her titles, the total being 2162, and the proportion in pre-Reformation times was still larger), John Baptist, 576; Peter, 936; Peter and Paul, 277; Paul, 329; Holy Innocents, 15; Helen, 117; Augustine of Canterbury, 57; Thomas of Canterbury, 70; Nicholas, 397; Lawrence, 225. The Catholic Church in England at the present time has shown the same tendency. The connexion with the apostles is everywhere manifested in the choice of patrons. Among the chief of the 170 dedications to God of the churches and chapels (not counting religious houses, colleges, or institutions), the numbers are: Holy Trinity, 16; Holy Cross, 15; Sacred Heart, 90. Consecrations in honour of the Blessed Virgin maintain their ancient pre-eminence, reaching a total of 374. The simple designation of St. Mary's is the most frequent appellation. The form "Our Lady" occurs usually in connection with the titles. Among the numerous special titles are the following: Our Lady of Caen, Our Lady of the Assumption, Our Lady of Sorrows, Help of Christians, Star of the Sea, Assumption, Our Lady of the Rosary. One church only bears the title of the Transfiguration, and one only is distinguished by each of the following titles: Our Lady of Refuge, of England, of Pity, of Paradise, of St. Michael, of Happy Purification, of Our Lady of the Most Holy Ghost, Most Pure Heart of Mary. The angels are rarely favoured, Michael standing almost alone, but with 38 dedications. St. John Baptist has 20, while the name of Joseph appears as titular in no fewer than 145 churches. Apostles and Evangelists reach a total of 153: Peter leads the way with 33; the Beloved Disciple counts his 30, Peter and Paul follow with 17. Each of the remaining Apostles has at least 2 churches under his invocation, except Matthias, Barnabas, and Mark, who have but 1. Among the male saints: Anthony of Padua, Charles, Edward, Edmund, George, and Richard have each between 10 and 20, but Patrick, with 56, heads the list; then follow Augustine 25, Benedict 19, Cuthbert 18, and Francis 17. A special interest attaches to names which occur but once, for frequently they are dedications to a local saint, as in the instances of Birinus (Dorchester), Dubhthithin (Tredestin), Gwladys (Newport, Mon.), Ia (St. Ives), Neot (Liasard), Oswyn (Tynemouth), Prian (Truro), Trilo (Trinity), Simon Stock (Faversham), Frideswide (Abingdon), and Walstan (Graves). Nothing could have been more appropriate than the saints' names selected in the northern dioceses corresponding with the ancient Northumbria. There we meet with dedications to Aidan, Bede, Bennet, Columba, Cuthbert, Ninian, Hilda, Oswald, etc. Among the female saints Anne, the mother of Our Lady, occupies a position of eminence with 30 churches, Winefield ranks next with 10, and Catherine follows with 8. The Saxon virgins and widows are honoured in the localities which they hallowed by their saintly lives, thus: Begh (Northumbria); Etheldreda (Ely); Hilda (Whithby); Mildred (Minster); Modwena (Burton-on-Trent); Osbert (Coventry); Werburgh (Chester); Winefield (Holywell).

Scotland.—Celtic and Medieval.—In the days of the Picts, St. Peter was held in preference, from A.D. 710 when Roman usages were adopted, but Andrew claimed the greater number of dedications from the time his relics had been brought to the coast by St. Regulus. As instances of double titulars, native and foreign, the following may be taken: St. Mary and St. Manchul (Old Aberdeen); St. Mary and St. Boniface; Sts. Mary and Peter; Madrastus and John Baptist; Stephen and Mecanes. In pre-Reformation times Holy Trinity occurred less frequently than in England; the Holy Ghost is more frequent than the Holy Rood or Rood; and there is no mention of the Holy Ghost. Holy Rood and Holy Rood are found in several instances. A chapel styled "Teampull-Cro-Naomh" (Temple of the Holy Heart) once stood on the shore at Gauslan in Lwys. Numerous churches bore Our Lady's name (Laddy Kirk); the assumption is found as early as 1290, and a church is dedicated to Our Lady at Aberlady 1530. Many churches had St. Michael for patron (Kil-michael). St. Anne is the titular in several places, and an altar to the Three Kings existed in almost every church. St. Joseph is nowhere found as a church titular, though he held the position of joint titular of an altar church in 1438. The practice of placing the titles in the Catholic churches of Scotland at the present time displays the same twofold direction that we find elsewhere: the honour of the saints of Scotland and of the... other lands, and the promptings of modern devotion. The Sacred Heart has 8 dedications, the Holy Cross 3. The Apostles receive the special honour of 39 churches. John being the patron of 13, and Andrew of 11, other dedications were given to the other Apostles. Margaret 2. Many of the dedications to the Blessed Virgin, of which 11 celebrate the Immaculate Conception, 7 bear the title of Star of the Sea; Our Lady of the Waves and Our Lady of Good Aid stand alone. Churches with the titles of modern saints are in a minority, for Patrick takes the lead with 12; Ninian, Scotland's first apostle, has 6; Columba 5; Munro 4; David 3; and Margaret 2. Many of the Celtic saints have been translated, but once, as for example, Bevan, Brendon, Cadoc, Columbkille, Fillian, Kosess, Kieran, Mirin, and Winning.

Ireland.—The history of the patron saints of Ireland has yet to be written. The country has passed through long periods of trouble and oppression, yet several of the Celtic dedications have been preserved and linger in some districts even to this day. The Catholic church is often known simply by the name of the street in which it is situated, as the Cathederal, Marlborough St., Dublin, or the Jesuit church in Gardiner Street. A similar instance occurs in Dublin with regard to the church dedicated to St. Francis of Assisi, but always styled "Adam and Eve from the first Adam and Eve were created in the creation of the world. From the seventeenth century, there swung at the end of the alley, in which the chapel was situated, a public-house sign with the full figures of our first parents. The two religious edifices in a town are sometimes called the "Cathedral" and the "Old Chapel". In the days of persecution, when churches and encampments stood alone and were burning on the territories of Catholic worship, the recency of the catacombs. During the nineteenth century the old "burns" that had so long served for chapels were replaced by beautiful and spacious churches for which Irish saints were frequently selected as patrons; but as a rule the choice has been determined by the tendentiousness of modern devotion to the Sacred Heart to Our Lady under her various titles, and to many of the more recently canonized saints, such as St. Vincent and St. Francis de Sales. Still the people continue to refer to the churches by the names of the streets. In Celtic times many churches were dedicated to Our Lady and called Kilmore. In Dublin and the north-west Meelanceh (St. Michael's Pole), Nichols within and Nicholans without the walls, were to be met with. Then there were churches under the patronage of All Hallows, Macaul, Macnoma, Finn, Brendan (Carrickbroome), Began (St. Beren, Kilbegun). Gobhan (Kilgobbin), Tienan Kavanagh. Here's the church so called because founded by a priest of Byrne's clan. The title of Cill-ingen-Lein (Church of the five daughters of Lein, whence the name Killiney) was so called from its founders. New names were introduced by the Normans, as Adven (Dublin), being St. Ogen of Rouen. The colony from Chester, brought over to repopulate Dublin, which had been depopulated by the plague at the end of the twelfth century, erected a church dedicated to their patroness, St. Werburgh.

Continental Europe.—With regard to the patrons of churches on the continent of Europe it must suffice to mention that in France alone there are 3000 dedications under the invocation of St. Martin, and then to take the example of Bruges, which is the capital of Bruges is the diocese of an old country that has never lost the faith. Its churches have 95 titulars which are distributed as follows: Holy Trinity 1; Holy Redeemer 2; Sacred Heart 3; Exaltation of the Holy Cross 5; Our Lady (Notre Dame) 24; Immaculate Conception 1; Assumption 6; Navitity 4; Michael Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament 5; Joseph 2; Our Lady of Fatima 1; and John the Baptist of 16. Seven of the Apostles are deemed by the devotion shown to the saints of other countries to be not a little remarkable. Out of 57 male saints adopted as titulars Martin has the highest number, namely 20; Nicholas 13; Lawrence 8; Blaise 6. Amen, Apostles of the Flennings, has been chosen patron of 19 churches, Anilomar of Baco, the hermit of Ghent, of 7; Eligius of 10; Medard of 6; and Vaast of 4.

United States.—The religious edifices of the United States have been examined as affording suitable material for a study of local piety, namely, Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Dubuque, Milwaukie, New Orleans, New York, Oregon City, Philadelphia, St. Louis, St. Paul, San Francisco, and Santa Fé. Over this area are found some 600 churches which are either dedicated to the Sacred Heart or have, among other titles, being here enumerated: Most Holy Trinity 27; Holy Ghost 10; Holy Redeemer 11; Sacred Heart 109; Blessed Sacrament (including Corpus Christi 4, Holy Eucharist 1) 14; Holy Name 12; Holy Cross 19. The life of Christ is adequately represented, thus: Incarnation 3; Navitity 9; Epiphany 3; Transfiguration 13; Resurrection 32; Good Friday 7. Other titles may be mentioned: Holy Spirit 3; Gesu 2; Atoneement, Good Shepherd, Holy Comforter, Holy Saviour, Providence of God, St. Sauveur, and Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary 1 each. With the increasing realization of the gifts of the Incarnation which appears in modern devotions, it will excite little wonder that 3000 of the most important churches in the United States are dedicated to Our Lord. The Mother of God under one or other of her many titles, the principal being: St. Mary 148; Immaculate Conception 105; Assumption 36; Holy Rosary 19; Annunciation 12; Visitacion 10; Star of the Sea 9; Presentation 6; Navitity 5; Holy Name of Mary 3; Maternity 3; Immaculate Heart of Mary 2; Purification 2; Most Holy Trinity 1; and Holy Family 2. Other words of our Lord and the Virgin Mary attract in so far as they represent the more recent expressions of Catholic devotion, thus: Mother of God 2; Mother of Divine Grace 1; Our Lady of Good Counsel 10; Gate of Heaven 1; Help of Christians 13; Queen of the Angels 1; Our Lady of the Angels 6; Our Lady of the Rosary 11. With the foregoing is certainly included the title of Our Lady of Consolation 6; of Good Voyage 1; of Grace 3; of Help 2; of Mercy 4; of Perpetual Help 10; of Pity 2; of Prompt Succour 1; of Refuge 1; of Solace 1; of Sorrows 6; of the Lake 5; of the Sacred Heart 3; of the Seven Doburs 5; of the Snow 1; of Victory 8. The following geographical determinations occur: Our Lady of Sorrows 3; of the Holy Family 1; of the Trinity 2; of Loreto 4; of Mount Carmel 22; of Lourdes 14; of Pompeii 4; of Vilna 2. Notre Dame de Bon Port, du Bon Secours, de Chicago, de La Paix, Nuestra Señora de Belen, del Pilar, Sancta Maria Addolorata, and Sancta Maria Inveronata, 1 each, suggest French Spanish, and Italian affinities.

The list of male saints in the fourteen dioceses comprises 156 names, and the female 41. For the sake of convenience these have been divided into groups. 10 churches are dedicated to All Saints, the Apostles in general have 1; Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, 58; James 26; Andrew 15; Thomas 11; Matthias 5; Philip 5; Barnabus 3; Bartholomew 2; Jude 1; the Evangelist 1; St. Brigitte 2; Mark 9; Luke 6. St. Paul is honoured with 26 dedications; Peter and Paul have 28; Philip and James 3; John and James 1. Michael the Archangel has 57; the Holy Angels 6; the Guardian Angels 7; Gabriel 7; Raphael 10. In the long list of male saints Joseph heads the list with 183 dedications, followed by Patrick who counts 83, and then in numerical order; John the Baptist and Anthony 43 each; Francis of Assisi and Stephen 23 each; Augustine and Vincent 19 each; Francis de Sales, Francis Xavier and Lawrence 16 each; Bernard, Ignatius of Loyola and Louis 14 each; Alphonsus and Nicholas 11 each; Leo and Martin 10 each; Dominic 9; Edward 8; Ambrose, Clement, Jerome, and Joachim 7 each; Benedict and Pius 6; Gregory 5; Anselm, Athanasius, Bonaventure, Denis, Hubert, Maurice, Peter Canisius, and Philip 4 each; Simeon, Eloi, Ferdinand, Francis Borgia, Gall, Hyacinthus, Isaac, Liborius, Nicholas of Tolentino, Sebastian, Vincent, William, and Albert 2 each; Alphonsus Turibius, Anthony the Hermit, Basil, Bride, Cacuica, Cyprian, Cyril, David, Donatus, Edmund, Engelbert, Eustachius, Florian, Fidelis, Francis Solano, Frederick Irenaeus, John Baptist de la Salle, John Berchmans, John Capistrano, John Chrysostom, John Francis Regis, John the Martyr, Kyran, Landry, Lazarus, Leander, Leon, Leonard of Port Maurice, Luis Bertrand, Maron, Martin of Tours, Maurus, Nicholas of Myra, Napoleon, Norbert, Raymond, Rock, Theodore, Thomas of Canterbury, Thomas of Villanova, Vincent, Victor, Willebrod, Zephyrinus 1 each.

The female patronesses are 41 in number, those whose names appear more frequently being: Anne 36; Rose 22; the three Catharines 21; Teresa 14; Agnes 13; Cecilia 12; Margaret 10; Elizabeth 9; Monica 8; Genevieve 6; Philomena 5; Clare, Gertrude, and Mary Magdalen 4 each; Agatha, Helen, and Veronica 3 each; Anastasia, Angela, and Lucy 2 each; Barbara, Cunegunde, Elizabeth of Hungary, Eulalia, Francs of Rome, Madeline, Mary Magdalen de Pazi, Scholas, Sylvia, Ursula, Victoria, Walburga, 1 each. Among the saints, more than in any other class, the nationality of devotion finds occasion for its manifestation. Celtic centres are shown by such titles as: Brendan 5; Canice 1; Colman 3; Columba 5; Columbanus 2; Columbkille 6; Croman 1; Finbar 1; Jarlath 1; Kevin 1; Kilian 3; Lawrence O’Toole 3; Mahaley 6; Mel 1; Attracta 1; Bridget 11; Hta 1; George, a widely favoured national patron, has 17 churches; Rita of Cascia, who has 12, and St. John of Nepomucne, 10; and St. John the Baptist, 9; and Our Lady under the various mysteries of her life and many of her most popular titles of devotion, such as: La Visitation, L’Assomption, Notre Dame de la Mer, Notre Dame de la Paix, Notre Dame des Anges, Notre Dame des Êgues, Notre Dame de Bon Conseil, Notre Dame du Mont Carmel, Notre Dame du Rosaire, Sacré Coeur de Marie etc. The patrons of churches, outside the class just referred to, have been listed according to the number of churches dedicated to them in the following order: Montreal, Ottawa, Quebec, St. Boniface, Toronto, Vancouver, and the Archdiocese of St. John’s, Newfoundland, and are as follows: Most Holy Trinity 2; Holy Ghost 1; Sacred Heart 15; Most Holy Redeemer 1; Holy Name of Jesus 2; Infant Jesus 3; Holy Child 1; Holy Family 5; Blessed Sacrament, Transfiguration, Ascension, St. Saviour, and St. Catherine of Siena 4. To Our Lady we find: Immaculate Conception 7; Nativity 5; Presentation 2; Annunciation 4; Visitation 3; Purification 1; Assumption 6; Mary Immaculate 1; Holy Name of Mary 4; St. Mary 9; Notre Dame 4; Notre Dame de la Consolation 1; Notre Dame de la Garde 2; Notre Dame de l’Espérance 2; Sacred Heart of Mary 5; Stella Maris 1; Our Lady Help of Christians 1; of Good Counsel 5; of Grace 4; of the Slette 2; of Loreto 1; of Lourdes 3; of Mercy 3; of Mount Carmel 6; of Peace 1; of Perpetual Succour 5; of Victory 3; of the Angels 2; of the Blessed Sacrament 1; of the Rosary 7; of the Sacred Heart 1; of the Seven Dolours 3; of the Snow 2; of the Visitation 1.

To the saints: Joseph 21; Patrick 20; Anthony 10; Louis 9; James, Michael, Paul, and Peter 8 each; John, John the Baptist, John the Evangelist, and Vincent de Paul 7 each; Francis of Assisi 6; Augustine, Bernard, and Charles 5 each; Edward, Francis de Sales, Francis Xavier 4 each; Anabase, Charles Borromeo, Gabriel, George, Gerard, Joseph, Luke, Thomas Aquinas, and Vinte 3 each; Alexander, Aloysius, Anastasius, Andrew, Anselm, Columban, Edward the Confessor, Felix, Francis Regis, Germane, Gregory, Gregory Nazianzus, Gregory the Great, Ignatius, Leon of Westminster, Peter in Chains, Philip Neri, Stephen, and Thomas 2 each; Adrian, Aimé, Alfréd, Alphonso Liguori, Areas, Athanasius, Barnaby, Basil, Benedict, Benjamin, Bernardin of Siena, Bonaventure, Boniface, Bride, Cajetan, Calixtus, Camillus de Lellis, Carthage, Casimir, Clement, Columanus, Columbkille, Cosmas, Cuthbert, Cyril, and Methodius, Daniel, Francis, Dami, Dian, Donnique, Emer, Edwin, Eugene, Fabius, Felix of Valois, Good Thief, Henry, Hugh, Hyacinth, Ignatius Loyola, Ireneus, Isidor, Jerome, John Berchmans, John Cantius, John Chrysostom, John of the Cross, Jovita, Jude, Justin, Kyran, Lawrence, Lawrence O’Toole, Leo, Mahhey, Malo, Mark, Matthew, Narcissus, Nicholas, Odillo, Pascal-Babylon, Peter Celestine, Philippe, Raphael, Remigius, Rock, Romuald, Sixtus, Stephen de Lazure, Turibius, Vitalis, Vitus, Zephyrinus, and Zetius 1 each; Anne 7; Bridget and Philomona 4 each; Helen 3; Agnes, Cecilia, Emily, and Marguerite 2 each; Agatha, Anatasia, Angelea, Catherine, Catherine of Siena, Clare, Elizabeth, Frances, Françoise, de Laval, Françoise, de Lévezou, Guadalupe, Guadalupe de, Hildegar de Bingen, Ignatius of Loyola, Elizabeth of Portugal, Euphemia, Felicita, Jeanne de Neuville, Magdalen, Margaret, Monica, Veronique, All Saints, 1 each.

Australia.—This includes the Archdioceses of Sydney, Melbourne, Hobart, Adelaide, Brisbane, and the Archdiocese of Wellington, which comprises all the territory of New Zealand. The patrons of churches are: (1) Trinity 3; Good Shepherd 2; Most Holy Redeemer 3; Sacred Heart 63; St. Saviour 1; Real Presence 1; Holy Name 4; Blessed Sacrament 2; Church of the Reparation 1; Church of the Passion 1; Holy Cross 7; (2) St. Mary 74; Immaculate Conception 21; Trinity 7; Nativity 1; Annunciation 2; Assumption 1; Help of Christians 2; of Good Counsel 1; of Lourdes 1; of Mercy 1; of Mount Carmel 4; of Perpetual Succour 3; of the Rosary 11; of the Sacred Heart 1; of the Seven

In summary: The following is an authentic catalogue of patron saints of countries of the world has yet to be made. Some countries appear to have no celestial patron, others have several assigned to them, and it is by no means clear that the distinction between patron and Apostle is invariably taken into account. The following list gives the names of some of the patron saints of countries of the world has yet to be made. Some countries appear to have no celestial patron, others have several assigned to them, and it is by no means clear that the distinction between patron and Apostle is invariably taken into account.

The following list gives the names of some of the countries of the world with the corresponding saint:

(1) The Holy Land (St. Joseph), Brazil (declared "The Land of the Holy Cross", 3 May, 1500), Borneo (St. Francis Xavier), Canada (St. Anne and St. George), The Congo (Our Lady), Chili (St. James), England (St. George), East Indies (St. Thomas, Apostle), Ecuador (styled "The Republic of the Sacred Heart"), Finland (Henry of Upsal), France (St. Denis), Germany (St. Michael), Holland (St. Willibrord), Hungary (St. Stephen), Ireland (St. Patrick), Italy (various), Lombardy (St. Charles), Mexico (Our Lady of Help), and Our Lady of Guadalupe, Norway (St. Olaf), Portugal (St. George), Piedmont (St. Maurice), Scotland (St. Andrew), Sweden (St. Bridget), Spain (St. James), South America (St. Regis of Lorraine and United States of North America (Our Lady under the title of Immaculate Conception), Wales (St. David).

PATRIOTS OF TRADES AND PROFESSIONS.—The beliefs of a Catholic in an age of Faith prompted him to place not only his churches under the protection of some illustrious servant of God, but the ordinary interests of life, his health, and family, trade, maladies, and other things. Hence a vast number of churches and churches, each of which had its patron, its rites, funds, and methods of assistance. Some idea of the vastness of the subject may be gathered from a few examples of the trades under their respective patron: Anastasia (weavers), Andrew (fishermen), Anne (houseworkers and cooks), Anthony (cabinet-makers), Christopher (porters), Cloud (tailors), Cosmas and Damian (shoemakers), Eloi (all workers with the hammer), Hubert (lunsmen), Lydia (dyers), Joseph (carpenters, Mark (notaries), Luke (painters), Nativity (trades for women), Raymond Nonnatus (midwives), Raymond of Penafort (canonists), Stephen (stone- masons), Vincent Martyr (winegrowers), Vitus (corn- sellers). Conditions of modern life, such as (Holy Inno- cents), girls (Blindness), boys (Alloysins), singers and schoolers (Gregory), philosophers (Catherine), musicians (Cecilia), persons condemned to death (Dismas). There were patrons or protectors in various forms of illness, as for instance: Agatha (diseases of the breast), Annunzio (diseases of the eyes), Apollonia (nailmakers), Peter (heroic deaths), Eloi (the eyes), Benedict (against poison), Hubert (against the bite of dogs). These patrons with very many others were chosen on account of some real correspondence between the patron and the object of patronage, or by reason of some play on words, or as a matter of individual piety. Thus, while the great title of 'patriot' has already been assigned to St. Charles, other patrons in regard of the same class of objects might vary with different times and places. In order to complete this imperfect and summary sketch of the subject of patrons, a list of the patrons announced by the Holy See within the last few years should here find a place: St. Joseph was declared patron of the universal Church by Pius X on 8 Dec, 1870. Leo XIII during the course of his pontificate announced the following patrons: St. Thomas Aquinus, patron of all universities, colleges, and schools (4 Aug., 1880); St. Vincent, patron of all charitable societies (1 May, 1885); St. Camillus of Lellis, patron of the sick and of those who attend on them (22 June, 1886); the Patronal of Our Lady of the Assumption (21 July, 1891); St. Bridget, patroness of Sweden (1 Oct., 1891); the Holy Family, the model and help of all Christian families (11 June, 1892); St. Peter Claver, special patron of missions to the negroes (1896); St. Paschal Baylon, patron of Eucha- ristic congresses and all eucharistic societies (28 Nov., 1897). On 27 May, 1899, he dedicated the world to the Sacred Heart, as Prince and Lord of all, Catholics and non-Catholics, Christians and non-Christians. Lourdes was dedicated to Our Lady of the Rosary (8 Sept., 1901). Pius X declared St. Francis Xavier patron of the Propagation of the Faith (25 Mar., 1904).

The honouring of the saints has in some instances doubtless been the offspring of abuse. Spells and incantations have been intruded in the place of trust and prayer; the prayerful absence of a vigil has been exchanged for the roller's enjoyment of wakes; reverence may have run incidentally to puerile extravagance; and patrons may have been chosen before their claim to anChat made of them has been jurisprudently established. Still it re- mains true that the manifestation of Christian piety in the honour paid to angels and saints has been singularly free from the taint of human excess and error.

Patti, Diocese of (Pactensis), in the Province of Messina (Sicily), on the western shore of the gulf of the same name. The city has a large trade in tunny-fish. In its cathedral is preserved the body of St. Febronius, virgin and martyr. The city was rebuilt by Count Roger, after the Saracens had been driven from it (1056); it stands near the site of the ancient Tyndaris, a Laecidian colony that had a very flourishing commerce; the magnificent temple of Mercury in the latter city was despoiled by Verres. In the time of Pliny, however, the sea had encroached greatly upon the shore, and after the foundation of Patti, Tyndaris was again restored. It remains only the church of Santa Maria del Tindaro, with a Franciscan monastery. Three of the bishops of Tyndaris are known: Severinus (501); Eutychius (594), with whose zeal for the conversion of pagans St. Gregory the Great was well pleased; and Theodorus (619), who was canonized in A.D. 1300, on account of its attachment to the House of Anjou; rebuilt in the sixteenth century, it was sacked by the Turks. Count Ruggero had founded there a Benedictine abbey, and in 1131, the antipope Anacletus II made Patti an episcopal see, uniting it, however, with the Abbey of Lipari; Eugenius III in 1157 confirmed the action of the antipope, the first legitimate pastor of the see being Gilbertus. In 1399, Lipari and Patti were separated, and the first bishop of the separate see of Patti was Francesco Hermenm. Other bishops were: Francesco Urrio (1518), who in the course of controversies with the capitano della guardia was imprisoned; later he was transferred to the Diocese of Urgel; Bartolomeo Sebastiani (1524), distinguished himself at the Council of Trent, and was Governor of Sicily for three years; Alfonso de las Canteras (1562), the founder of the seminary, restored later by Bishop Galletti (1727); Cardinal Gerolama Cesia, later Archbishop of Palermo, Bishop of Patti, 1760–71. The Diocese has 49 parishes, 20,000 inhabitants, 5 religious houses of men, and 15 of sisters, who conduct 4 institutions for girls and several schools.

Paul, Saint. —I. Preliminary Questions. — A. Apocryphal Acts of St. Paul. — Professor Schmidt has recently published a photographic copy, a transcription, a German translation, and a commentary of a Coptic papyrus composed of about 2000 fragments, which he has classified, juxtaposed, and deciphered at a cost of infinite labour ("Acta Pauli aus der Heidelberger koptischen Papyruxsammlung"), 2 vols., Leipzig, 1904, and "Zusätze," etc., Leipzig, 1905). Most critics, whether Catholic (Duchesne, Bardenhewer, Ehrhard etc.), or Protestant (Zahn, Harnack, Jersen etc.), believe that these are real "Acta Pauli," although the text edited by Schmidt, with its very numerous gaps, represents but a small portion of the original document. Schmidt has accepted ideas concerning the origin, contents, and value of these apocryphal Acts, and warrants the conclusion that three ancient compositions which have reached us formed an integral part of the "Acta Pauli" viz. the "Acta Pauli et Thécle," of which the best edition is that of T. Schmitt, Leipzig, 1891, 235–72; a "Martyrium Pauli" preserved in Greek and a fragment of which also exists in Latin (op. cit. 101–15), and a letter from the Corinthians to Paul with the latter's reply, an Arminian text of which were published (cf. Zahn, "Genuine and Apocryphal New Testament," II, 592–611), and the Latin discovered by Berger in 1891 (cf. Harnack, "Die apokryph Peri der ßeines Paulus an die Laochehen und Korinther," Bonn, 1905). With great sagacity Zahn anticipated this result with regard to the last two documents, and indeed thought the discovery of the "Martyrium Pauli et Thécle" (De virillis, viii) might have permitted the same surmise with regard to the first.

Another consequence of Schmidt's discovery is no less interesting. Lipsius maintained—and this was hitherto the common opinion—that besides the Catholic Acts there formerly existed other "Acta Pauli," but now everything tends to prove that the latter never existed. In fact Origin quotes the "Acta Pauli" twice as an estimable writing ("In Joann.," xx, 12; "De Principe," I, 1, 3); Eusebius (Hist. eccl. III, iii, 5; XXV, 4) places them among the books in dispute, such as the "Shepherd" of Hermas, the "Apocalypse of Peter," the "Epistle of Barnabas," and the "Teaching of the Apostles." The stichometry of the "Codex Charontamontanus" (photograph in Vigouroux, "Dict. de la Bible," II, 147) places them after the canonical books. Tertullian and St. Jerome, while pointing out the legendary character of this writing, do not attack its orthodoxy. The probability is that Paul's correspondence with the Corinthians which formed part of the "Acta" was to oppose the Gnostics, Simon and Cleobius. But there is no reason to admit the existence of heretical "Acta" which have since been hopelessly lost, for all the details given by ancient authors are verified in the "Acta," which have been recovered or fairly well with them. The following is the explanation of the confusion: The Manicheans and Priscillians had circulated a collection of five apocryphal "Acta," four of which were tainted with heresy, and the fifth were the "Acta of Paul." The "Acta Pauli" owing to this unfortunate association are suspected of heterodoxy by the more recent authors such as Philibertinus (De haeres., SS) and Photius (Cod., 114). Tertullian (De baptism., 17) and St. Jerome (De vir. ill., vii) denounce the fantastic character of the apocryphal "Acta" of Paul, and this severe judgment is amply confirmed by the examination of the fragments published by Schmidt. It is a purely imaginative work of which improbability vie with absurdity. The author, who was acquainted with the canonical Acts of the Apostles, locates the scene in the places really visited by St. Paul (Antioch, Iconium, Myra, Perge, Sidon, Tyrre, Ephesus, Corinth, Philippi, Rome), but for the rest he gives his fancy free rein. His chronology is absolutely impossible. Of the sixty-five persons he names, very few are known and the part played by these is irreconcilable with the statements of the canonical "Acta." Briefly, if the canonical "Acta" are true the apocryphal "Acta" are false. This, however, does not imply that none of the details have historical foundation, but they must be considered lost by an incorrect explanation.

B. Chronology.—If we admit according to the almost unanimous opinion of exegetes that Acts, xv, and Gal., i, 1–10, relate to the same fact it will be seen that an interval of seventeen years—or at least sixteen, counting incomplete years as accomplished— elapsed between the conversion of Paul and the Apostolic council, for Paul was present at the council after his conversion (Gal., i, 18) and returned after fourteen years for the meeting held with regard to legal observances (Gal., ii, 1: ἡμεῖς δὲ διὰ δικαιοσύνης εἰς τὸν ιερόν ἐσόμεθα). It is true that some authors include the three years prior to the first visit in the total of fourteen, but this explanation of Gal. 1:18 is unlikely. On the other hand, twelve or thirteen years elapsed between the Apostolic council and the end of the captivity, for the captivity lasted nearly five years (more than two years at Cesarea, Acts, xxiv, 27), six months travelling, including the sojourn at Malta, and two years at Rome. Acts, xxviii, 30); the third mission lasted not less than four years (on which the said three of them were spent at Ephesus, Acts, xx, 31, and one between the departure from Ephesus and the arrival at Jerusalem, I Cor., xvi, 8; Acts, xx, 16, and six months at the very least for the journey to Galatia, Acts, xxviii, 23); while the second mission lasted not less than three years (eighteen months for Corinth, Acts, xviii, 11, and the remainder for the evangelisation of Galatia, Macedonia, and Athens, Acts, xv, 36-xvii, 34). Thus from the conversion to the end of the first captivity we have a total of about twenty-nine years. Now if we could find a fixed point that is a synchronism between a fact in the life of Paul and a certain dated event in pagan history, it would be easy to reconstitute the Pauline chronology. Unfortunately this much wished-for mark has not yet been indicated with certainty, despite the numerous attempts made by scholars, especially in recent times. It is of interest to note even the abortive attempts, because the discovery of an inscription or of a coin may any day throw much illuminating light on an absolutely fixed point. These are: the meeting of Paul with Sergius Paulus, Proconsul of Cyprus, about the year 46 (Acts, xiii, 7), the meeting at Corinth with Aquila and Priscilla, who had been expelled from Rome, about 51 (Acts, xviii, 2), the meeting with Gallio, Proconsul of Achaia, about 53 (Acts, xvii, 12), the address of Paul before the Jewish council of Aceldama in 56 (Acts, xx, 21). All these events, as far as they may be assigned approximate dates, agree with the Apostle's general chronology but give no precise results. Three synchronisms, however, appear to afford a firmer basis:

(1) The occupancy of Damascus by the ethmarch of King Aretas and the escape of the Apostle three years after his conversion (I Cor., xi, 32-33; Acts, ix, 23-26) —Damascene coins bearing the effigy of Tiberius to the year 31 are extant, proving that at that time the city belonged to the Romans. It is impossible to assume that Aretas had received it as a gift from Tiberius, for the latter, especially in his last years, was mainly occupied with the King of Armenia; Vitellius, Governor of Syria, was ordered to attack (Josephus, "Ant.", XVIII, v, 13); neither could Aretas have possessed himself of it by force for, besides the unlikelihood of a direct aggression against the Romans, the expedition of Vitellius was at first directed not against Damascus but against Petra. It has therefore been suggested that Vitellius, probably to diminish the influence of the Nabataeans, sent Tiberius to Damascus, subject as he was to such whims, had exiled him to him at the time of his accession (16 March, 37). As a matter of fact nothing is known of imperial coins of Damascus dating from either Cadugula or Claudius. According to this hypothesis St. Paul's conversion was not prior to 34, nor his escape from Damascus and his flight to Jerusalem, for 37.

(2) Death of Agrippa, famine in Judea, mission of Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem to bring thither the alms from the Church of Antioch (Acts, xii, 27-xii, 25). —Agrippa died shortly after the Pasch (Acts, xii, 4), when he was celebrating in Cesarea solemn festivals in honour of Claudius's recent return from Britain, in the third year of his reign, which had begun in 41 (Josephus, "Ant.", XIX, vii, 2). These combined facts bring us to the year 41, and it is precisely in this year that Orosius (Hist., vii, 6) places the great famine which desolated Judea. Josephus mentions it somewhat later, under the procurator Tiberius Alexander (Ant., vii, 165), but it is well known that the whole of Claudius's reign was characterised by its poor harvests (Suett, "Claudius", 182); and a general famine was usually preceded by a more or less prolonged period of scarcity. It is also possible that the relief sent in an-

II. Life and Work of Paul.—A. Birth and Education.—From St. Paul himself we know that he was born at Tarsus, in Cilicia, a city which was then the home of a Roman citizen (Acts, xxii, 28–29; cf. xvi, 37), of a family in which piety was hereditary (II Tim., i, 3) and which was much attached to Phari-saic traditions and observances (Phil., iii, 5–6). St. Jerome relates, on what ground is not known, that his parents were natives of Gischala, a small town of Galilee, and that the apostle was born at Tarsus where the family of Gischala was captured by the Romans ("De vir. ill.", v; "In epist. ad Phil.", 23). This last detail is certainly an anachronism, but the Galilean origin of the family is not at all improbable. As he belonged to the tribe of Benjamin he was given at the time of his circumcision the name of Saul, which must have been common in that tribe in memory of the first king of the Jews (Phil., iii, 5). As a Roman citizen he also bore the Latin name of Paul. It was quite usual for the Jews of that time to have two names, one Hebrew, the other Latin or Greek, between which there was often a certain identity and which were joined together exactly in the manner used by St. Luke (Acts, xi, 19–22; xv, 5; Deissmann, "Bible Studies" [Edinburgh, 1903], 313–17). It was natural that in inaugurating his apostolate the Gentiles Paul should have adopted his Roman name, especially as the name Saul had a ludicrous meaning in Greek. As every respectable Jew had to teach his son a trade, young Saul learned how to make tents (Acts, xxiii, 3) on purpose to make the mohar of which tents were made (cf. Lewin, "Life of St. Paul", i, London, 1871, 8–9). He was still very young when sent to Jerusalem to receive his education at the school of Gamaliel (Acts, xxii, 3). Possibly some of his family resided in the holy city; later these same relatives of one of his sisters whose son saved his life (Acts, xxiii, 16). From that time it is absolutely impossible to follow him until he takes an active part in the martyrdom of St. Stephen (Acts, vii, 58–60; xxii, 20). He was then qualified as a young man (variantus), but this was a very elastic appellation and might be applied to a man of between twenty and forty years.

B. Conversion and Early Labours.—We read in the Acts of the Apostles three accounts of the conversion of St. Paul (ix, 1–19; xxi, 3–21; xxvi, 12–23) presenting some slight differences, which it is not difficult to harmonize and which do not affect the basis of the narrative, which is perfectly identical in substance. J. Max Muller, "The Expositor", 3rd series, X, 1889, 241–62. Sabatier, agreeing with most independent critics, has well said (L’Apotre Paul, 1896, 42): "These differences cannot in any way alter the reality of the fact; their bearing on the narrative is extremely remote; they do not deal even with the circumstances accompanying the miracu-ous appearance, but with the impressions which the companions of St. Paul received of these circumstances... To base a denial of the historical character of the account upon these differences would seem therefore a violent and arbitrary proceeding."

All efforts hitherto made to explain without a miracle the apparition of Jesus to Paul have failed. Naturalistic explanations are reduced to two: either Paul bethought that he really saw Christ, but was the victim of an hallucination, or he believed that he saw Him only through a spiritual vision, which tradition, recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, later erroneously materialized. Renan explained everything by hallucinations due to disease of the brain, such as doubt, remorse, fear, and of physical causes such as ophthalmia, fatigue, fever, the sudden transition from the torrid desert to the fresh gardens of Damascus, perhaps a sudden storm accompanied by lightning and thunder. All this combined, according to Renan’s theory, to produce a cerebral commotion, a passing delirium which Paul took in good faith for an apparition of the risen Christ. Paul’s natural explanation, while avoiding the word hallucination, eventually fall back on the system of Renan which they merely endeavour to render a little less complicated. Thus Holsten, for whom the vision of Christ is only the conclusion of a series of syllogisms by which Paul persuaded himself that Christ was truly risen. So also Pflüger, who however, causes the imagination to play a more influ-ental part: "An excitable, nervous temperament; a soul that had been violently agitated and torn by the most terrible doubts; a most vivid phantasy, occupied with the awful scenes of persecution on the one hand, and on the other by the ideal image of the celestial Christ; in addition the nearness of Damascus with the urgency of a decision, the lonely stillness, the secluding and blinding heat of the desert—in fact everything combined to produce one of those ecstatic states in which the soul believes that it sees those images and conceptions which violently agitate it as if they were phenomena proceeding from the outward world" (Lectures on the influence of the Apostle Paul on the development of Christianity, p. 12). Pflüger quotes Pflüger’s words at length because his "psychological" explanation is considered the best ever devised. It will readily be seen that it is insufficient and as much opposed to the account in the Acts as to the express testimony of St. Paul himself. (1) Paul is certain of having "seen" Christ as did the other Apostles (1 Cor., ix, 11); he declares that Christ "appeared" to him (1 Cor., xv, 8) as He appeared to Peter, to James, to the Twelve, after His Resurrection. (2) He knows that his conversion is not the fruit of his reasoning or thoughts, but an unforeseen, sudden, startling change, due to all-powerful grace (Gal., i, 12–15; 1 Cor., xv, 10). (3) It produces in all the perplexities, fears, remorse, before his conversion. He was haunted by Christ when his fury was at its height (Acts, ix, 1–2); it was "through zeal" that he perfectured the Church (Phil., iii, 6), and he obtained mercy because he had acted "ignorantly in unbelief" (1 Tim., i, 13). All explanations, psychological or otherwise, are worthless in the case of these conversions for all suppose that it was Paul’s faith in Christ which engendered the vision, whereas according to the con-cordant testimony of the Acts and the Epistles it was the actual vision of Christ which engendered faith. After his conversion, his baptism, and his miraculous cure Paul set about preaching to the Jews (Acts, ix, 19–20). He afterwards withdrew to Arabia, possibly to the region south of Damascus (Gal., i, 17), doubtless less to preach than to meditate on the Scriptures. On his return to Damascus the intrigues of the Jews forced him to flee by night(11 Cor., xi, 32–33; Acts, ix, 25–25). He went to Jerusalem to see Peter (Gal., i, 18), but remained only fifteen days, for the snares of the Greeks threatened his life. He then left for Tarsus and is lost to sight for five or six years (Acts, ix, 29–30; Gal., i, 21). Barnabas went in search of him and brought him to Antioch where for a year they worked together and their apostolate was most fruitful (Acts, xi, 25–26). Together also they were sent to Jerusalem to carry alms to the brethren on the occasion of the famine predicted by Agabus (Acts, xi, 27– 30). They do not seem to have found the Apostles there; these had been scattered by the persecution of Herod.

C. Apostolic Caritas of Paul.—This period of twelve years (45–57) was the most active and fruitful of his life. It comprises three great Apostolic activities: the first of which Antioch was in each instance the starting-point and which invariably ended in a visit to Jerusalem. (1) First mission (Acts, xiii, 1–xiv, 27).—Set apart by command of the Holy Ghost for the special evangelization of the Gentiles, Barnabas and Saul embark for Cyprus, preach in the synagogue of Salamis, cross the island from east to west doubtlessly following the southern coast, and reach Paphos, the residence of the proconsul Sergius Paulus, where a sudden change takes place. After the conversion of the Roman proconsul, Saul, suddenly become Paul, is invariably mentioned before Barnabas by St. Luke and manifestly assumes the leadership of the mission which Barnabas has hitherto directed. The results of this change are soon evident. Paul, doubtless concluding that Cyprus, the natural dependency of Syria and Cilicia, would embrace the faith of Christ when these two countries should be Christian, chose Asia Minor as the field of his apostolate and sailed for Perge in Pamphylia, where he disembarked on the coast of Lycia. It was then that John Mark, cousin of Barnabas, despaired perhaps by the daring projects of the Apostle, abandoned the expedition and returned to Jerusalem, while Paul and Barnabas laboured alone among the rough mountains of Pisidia, where they were indicted by brigands and crossed by frightful precipices. Their destination was the Roman colony of Antioch, situated a seven days' journey from Perge. Here Paul spoke on the vocation of Israel and the providential sending of the Messiah, a discourse which St. Luke reproduces in substance as an example of his preaching in the synagogues (Acts, xiii, 16-11). The sojourn of the two missionaries in Antioch was long enough for the Jews and for the heathens to be deeply impressed by the whole country (Acts, xiii, 49). When by their intrigues the Jews had obtained against them a decree of banishment, they went to Iconium, three or four days distant, where they met with the same persecution from the Jews and the same cajolery welcome from the Gentiles. The hostility of the Jews forced them to take a new colony of Lystra, eighteen miles distant. Here the Jews from Antioch and Iconium had snares for Paul and having stoned him left him for dead, but again he succeeded in escaping and this time sought refuge in Derbe, situated about forty miles away on the frontier of the Province of Galatia. Their circuit completed, the missionaries retraced their steps in order to visit their neophytes, ordained priests in each Church founded by them at such great cost, and thus reached Perge where they halted to preach the Gospel, perhaps while awaiting an opportunity to embark for Attalia, a port twelve miles distant. On their return to Antioch in Syria after an absence of at least three years, they were received with transports of joy and thanksgiving, for God had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles.

The problem of the status of the Gentiles in the Church now made itself felt with all its acuteness. Some Judaeo-Christians coming down from Jerusalem claimed that the Gentiles must be submitted to circumcision and treated as the Jews treated proselytes. Against this Paul and Barnabas protested and it was decided that a meeting should be held at Jerusalem in order to solve the question. At this assembly Paul and Barnabas represented the community of Antioch. Peter pleaded the freedom of the Gentiles; James upheld him, at the same time demanding that the Gentiles should abstain from certain things which especially shocked the Jews. It was decided, first, that the Gentiles were exempt from the Mosaic law. Secondly, that those of Syria and Cilicia must abstain from things sacerdotal, from blood, from things strangled, and from fornication. Thirdly, that this imposition was laid upon them, not in virtue of the Mosaic law, but in the name of Christ. This meant the complete triumph of Paul's ideas. The restriction imposed on the Gentile converts of Syria and Cilicia did not concern his Churches, and Titus, his companion, was not compelled to be circumcised, despite the loud protests of the Judaizers (Gal., ii, 3-4).

Here it is assumed that Gal., ii, and Acts, xv, relate to the same fact, for the actors are the same, Paul and Barnabas on the one hand, Peter and James on the other; the discussion is the same, the question of the circumcision of the Gentiles; the scenes are the same, Antioch and Jerusalem; the date is the same, about A.D. 50; and the result is the same, Paul's victory over the Judaizers. However, the decision of Jerusalem did not as yet apply to all the Churches. The question did not concern only the Gentiles, and while Paul was keeping them from the Mosaic law, it was not declared that it would not have been counted meritorious and more perfect for them to observe it, as the decree seemed to liken them to Jewish proselytes of the second class. Furthermore the Judaeo-Christians, not having been included in the verdict, were still free to consider themselves bound by the prescriptions of the Mosaic law. Thus the principle of the dispute which shortly afterwards arose at Antioch between Peter and Paul. The latter taught openly that the law was abolished for the Jews themselves. Peter did not think otherwise, but he considered it wise to avoid giving offence to the Judaizers and refrained from eating with the Gentiles who did not observe all the prescriptions of the law. As he thus morally influenced the Gentiles to live as the Jews did, Paul demonstrated to him that this dissimulation or opportuneness prepared the way for future misunderstandings and conflicts and even then had regrettable consequences. His manner of relating this incident betrays no room for doubt. Peter was persuaded by his arguments (Gal., ii, 11-20).

(2) Second mission (Acts, xv, 36-xvii, 22).—The beginning of the second mission was marked by a rather sharp discussion concerning Mark, whom St. Paul this time refused to accept as travelling companion. Consequently Barnabas set out with Mark for Cyprus and Paul chose Silas, an Essene like himself, and an influential member of the Church of Jerusalem, and sent by it to Antioch to deliver the decrees of the Apostolic council. The two missionaries first went from Antioch to Tarsus, stopping on the way in order to promulgate the decisions of the Council of Jerusalem; then they went from Tarsus to Derbe, through the Cilician Gates, the deserts of Tarsus, and the plains of Lycia. The visitation of the Churches founded during his first mission passed without notable incidents except the choice of Timothy, whom the Apostle while in Lystra persuaded to accompany him, and whom he caused to be circumcised in order to facilitate his access to the Jewish people. He was also much troubled, but probably at Antioch of Pisidia, although the Acts do not mention that city, that the itinerary of the mission was altered by the intervention of the Holy Ghost. Paul thought to enter the Province of Asia by the valley of Meander which separated it by only three days' journey, but they passed through Phrygia and the country of Galatia having been forbidden by the Holy Ghost to reach the western part of Galatia in Asia (Acts, xvi, 6). These words (τῆς φφρυγίας καὶ Γαλατίας χώρας) are variously interpreted, according as we take them to mean the Galatians of the north or of the south (see GALATIANS). Whatever the hypothesis, the missionaries had to travel northwards in that portion of Galatia properly so called of which Pisidian was the capital, and the only question is as to whether or not they preached there. They did not intend to do so, but as is known the evangelization of the Galatians was due to an accident, namely the illness of Paul (Gal., xiv, 13); this fits very well for Galatians in the north. In any case the missionaries having reached the upper part of Myra, attempted to enter the Province of Bithynia which lay before them, but the Holy Ghost prevented them (Acts, xvi, 7).

Therefore, passing through Mysia without stopping to preach (παραβαίνοντες) they reached Alexandria of Troas, where God's will was again made known to them in the vision of a Macedonian who called them to come and help his country (Acts, xvi, 9-10).

Paul continued to follow on European soil the method of preaching he had employed from the beginning. As far as possible he concentrated his efforts in a metropolis from which the Faith would spread to cities of second rank and to the country districts. In Rome, which was anathema to him, he first took his stand there and preached to the Jews and proselytes who would consent to listen to him. When the rupture with the Jews was irremediable, which always happened sooner or later, he founded a new Church with his neophytes as a nucleus. He remained in the same city until persecution, generally aroused by the testimony of the Jews, drove him to the Ministry. There were, however, variations of this plan. At Philadelphia, where there was no synagogue, the first preaching took place in the undiscovered oratory called the proseuche, which the Gentiles made a reason for stirring up the persecution. Paul and Silas, charged with disturbing public order, were beaten with rods, imprisoned, and finally expelled. But at Thessalonica and Berea, whether they successively repaired after leaving Philadelphia, things turned out almost as they had planned. The apostolate of Athens was quite exceptional. Here there was no question of Jews or synagogue. Paul, contrary to his custom, was alone (I Thess., iii, 1), and he delivered before the ancient Areopagus, theuden of the Jews, a discourse which has been preserved by the Acts (xvii, 23-34) as a specimen of its kind. He seems to have left the city of his own accord, without being forced to do so by persecution. The mission to Corinth on the other hand may be considered typical. Paul preached in the synagogue every Sabbath day, and when the violent opposition of the Jews denied an entrance there he withdrew to an adjoining house which was the property of a proselyte named Titus Justus. He carried on his apostolate in this manner for eighteen months, while the Jews daily stoned against him; he was able to withstand them owing to the impartial, if not actually favourable, attitude of the proconsul, Gallio. Finally he decided to go to Jerusalem in fulfillment of a vow made perhaps in a moment of danger. From Jerusalem, according to his custom, he returned to Antioch. The two Epistles to the Thessalonians were written during the early months of his sojourn at Corinth. For occasion, circumstances, and analysis of these letters see Thessalonians.

(3) Third mission (Acts, xviii, 23—xxi, 26).—Paul's destination in his third journey was obviously Ephesus. There Aquila and Priscilla were awaiting him, he had promised the Ephesians to return and evangelize them if it were the will of God (Acts, xviii, 19-21), and the Holy Ghost no longer opposed his entry into Asia. Therefore, after a brief rest at Antioch he went through the countries of Galatia and Phrygia (Acts, xviii, 23) and passing through "the upper regions" of Central Asia he reached Ephesus (xix, 1). His method remained the same. In order to earn his living and not be a burden to the faithful he toiled every day for many hours at making tents, but this did not prevent him from preaching the Gospel. As usual he began with the synagogue where he succeeded in remaining for three months. At the end of this time he taught every day in a classroom placed at his disposal by a certain Tyrannus "from the fifth hour to the tenth" (Acts, xix, 9), according to the interesting addition of the "Codex Bezae" (Acts, xix, 9). This lasted two years, so that all the inhabitants of Asia, Jews and Greeks, heard the word of the Lord (Acts, xix, 20).

Naturally there were trials to be endured and obstacles to be overcome. Some of these obstacles arose from the jealousy of the Jews, who vainly endeavoured to imitate Paul's exorcisms, others from the superstition of the pagans, which was especially rife at Ephesus. So effectually did he triumph over it, however, that books of superstition were burned to the value of 50,000 pieces of silver (about $9000). This time the persecution was due to the Gentiles and inspired by a motive of self-interest. The progress of Christianity having crossed the sacred precinct of Diana and statues of the goddess, which devout pilgrims had been wont to purchase, a certain Demetrius, at the head of the guild of silversmiths, stirred up the crowd against Paul. The scene which then transpired in the theatre is described by St. Luke with memorable vividness and pathos (Acts, xix, 23-41). Paul was driven by the tumult to the storm. After a stay at Ephesus of two years and a half, perhaps more (Acts, xx, 1), he departed for Macedonia and thence for Corinth, where he spent the winter. It was his intention in the following spring to go by sea to Jerusalem, doubtless for the Pasch; but learning that the Jews had planned his destruction, he did not wish, by going by sea, to afford them an opportunity to attempt his life. Therefore he returned by way of Macedonia. Numerous disciples divided into two groups, accompanied him or awaited him at Troas. These were Sophater of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus of Thessalonica, Gainus of Derbe, Tychicus, Linus and Primus. Finally, Luke, the scribe of the Acts, who gives us minutely all the stages of this voyage: Philippi, Troas, Assos, Mitylene, Chios, Samos, Miletus, Cos, Rhodes, Patara, Tyre, Ptolemais, Cesarba, Jerusalem. Three more remarkable facts should be noted in passing. At Troas Paul resuscitated the young Eutychus, who had fallen from a third-story window while Paul was preaching late into the night. At Miletus he pronounced before the ancients of Ephesus the touching farewell discourse which drew many tears (Acts, xx, 18-38). At Cesarba the Holy Ghost by the mouth of Agabus, predicted his coming arrest, but did not dissuade him from going to Jerusalem.

St. Paul's four great Epistles were written during this third mission: the first to the Corinthians from Ephesus, about the time of the Pasch prior to his departure from that city; the second to the Corinthians from Macedonia, during the summer or autumn of the same year; that to the Romans from Corinth, in the following spring; the last, in which the Galatians is disputed. On the many questions occasioned by the despatch and the language of these letters, or the situation assumed either on the side of the Apostle or his correspondents, see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLE TO; GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO; ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

D. Captivity (Acts, xxi, 27—xxvii, 31).—Falsey accused by the Jews of having brought Gentiles into the Temple, Paul was ill-treated by the populace and led in chains to the fortress Antonia by the tribune Lysias. The latter having learned that the Jews had conspired treacherously to slay the prisoner sent him under strong escort to Caesarea, without danger of the procuret Felix. Paul had little difficulty in confounding his accusers, but as he refused to purchase his liberty Felix kept him in chains for two years and even left him in prison, in order to please the Jews, until the arrival of his successor, Festus. The new governor wished to send the prisoner to Jerusalem to learn in the presence of his enemies, appealed to Caesar. Thenceforth his case could be tried only at Rome. This first period of captivity is characterized by five discourses of the Apostle: The first was delivered in Hebrew on the steps of the Antonia before the threatening crowd; herein Paul relates his conversion and vocation to the Apostolate, but he was interrupted by the hostile shouts of the multitude (Acts, xxii, 1-22). In the second, delivered the next day before the Sanhedrin, which, as a command, the Apostle skilfully embowed the Pharisees with the Scribes and no accusation could be brought. In the third, Paul, answering his accuser Tertullus in the presence of the Governor Felix, makes known the facts which had been distorted and proves his innocence (Acts, xxiv, 10-21). The fourth discourse is the（？, 13:13-21）planetary summary of the Christian Faith delivered before Felix and his wife Drusilla (Acts, xxv, 24-25). The fifth, pronounced before the Governor Festus, King Agrippa, and his wife Bernice, again relates the history of Paul’s conversion, and is left unfinished owing to the sarcastic interruptions of the governor and the embarrassed attitude of the king (Acts, xxviii). At the close of the captivity from Caesarea to Rome is described by St. Luke with an exactness and vivacity of colours which leave nothing to be desired. For commentaries see Smith, “Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul” (1866); Ramsay, “St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen” (London, 1908). The centurion Julius had shipped Paul and his fellow-prisoners on a vessel which Luke as an Alexandrian and Aristarchus were able to take passage. As the season was advanced the voyage was slow and difficult. They skirted the coasts of Syria, Cilicia, and Pamphylia. At Myra in Lycia the prisoners were transferred to an Alexandrian vessel bound for Italy, but the winds being persistently contrary a place in Crete called Good-harbour was reached without peril. Paul was advised that they should spend the winter there, but his advice was not followed, and the vessel driven by the tempest drifted aimlessly for fourteen whole days, being finally wrecked on the coast of Malta. The three months during which navigation was considered most dangerous were spent there, but with the first day of the winter the prisoners assumed the passage. Paul must have reached Rome some time in March. “He remained two whole years in his own hired lodging... preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching the things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, without prohibition” (Acts, xxviii, 30-31). With these words the Acts of the Apostle conclude.

There is no doubt that Paul’s trial terminated in a sentence of acquittal, for (1) the report of the Governor Festus was certainly favourable as well as that of the centurion; (2) the Jews seem to have abandoned their charge since their co-religionists in Rome were not informed of it (Acts, xxvii, 21). (3) The course of the prisoner’s movements after the Roman acquittal sometimes speaks as of a certainty (Phil., i, 27; ii, 24; Philem., ii). (4) The pastors if they are authentic assume a period of activity for Paul subsequent to his captivity. The same conclusion is drawn from the hypothesis that they are not authentic, for all agree that the author was well acquainted with the life of the Apostle. It is the almost unanimous testimony that the so-called Epistles of the captivity were sent from Rome. Some authors have attempted to prove that St. Paul wrote them during his detention at Caesarea, but they have found few to agree with them. The Epistles to the Colossians, the Ephesians, and Philemon were dispatched together and by the same messenger, Tychicus. It is a matter of controversy whether the Epistle to the Philippians was prior or subsequent to these, and the question has not been answered by decisive arguments (see PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO; EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO; PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO). This period is wrapped in deep obscurity for, lacking the account of the Acts, we have no guide save an often uncertain tradition and the brief references of the Pastoral epistles. Paul had long cherished the desire to go to Spain (Rom., xv, 24, 28), and there is no evidence that he was led to change his plan. When towards the end of his captivity he announces his coming to Philemon (22) and the Philippians (ii, 23-24), he does not seem to have the least idea of a first visit; as immediate as since he promises the Philippians to send them a messenger as soon as he learns the issue of his trial; he therefore plans another journey before his return to the East. Finally, not to mention the later testimony of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Epiphanius, and St. John Chrysostom, there is the testimony of Theodoret, the well-known text of St. Clement of Rome, the “Muratorian Canon”, and of the “Acta Pauli” render probable Paul’s journey to Spain. In any case he can not have remained there long, for he was in haste to revisit his Churches in the East. He may have returned from Spain through southern Gaul if it was thither, as some Fathers have thought, and not to Calatia, that Crescens was sent later (1 Tim., iv, 1). We may readily believe that he afterwards kept the promise made to his friend Philemon and that on this occasion he visited the churches of the valley of Ly- cus, Laodicea, Colossus, and Hierapolis.

The itinerary now becomes very uncertain, but the following facts seem indicated by the Pastoral; Paul goes through Macedonia and Gallia Cisalpina, then to Rome, new churches, the care and organization of which he confided to his fellow-worker Titus (Tit., i, 5). He then went to Ephesus, and besought Timothy, who was already there, to remain until his return while he proceeded to Macedonia (1 Tim., i, 3). On this occasion he paid his promised visit to the Philippians (Phil., iv, 13). Finally, he returned to the Macedonians. The letter to Titus and the First Epistle to Timothy must date from this period; they seem to have been written about the same time and shortly after the departure from Ephesus. The question is whether they were sent from Macedonia or, which seems more probable, from Corinth. The Apostle intended to go to Ephesus, but on the way back he intends to spend the winter (Titus, iii, 12). In the following spring he must have carried out his plan to return to Asia (1 Tim., iii, 14-15). Here occurred the obscure episode of his arrest, which probably took place at Troas; this would explain his having left with Cuprus a cloak and books which he needed (2 Tim., iv, 13). He was taken from there to Ephesus, capital of the Province of Asia, where he was deserted by all those on whom he thought he could rely (2 Tim., i, 15). Being sent to Rome for trial he left Trophimus sick at Miletus, and Erastus, another of his companions, remained at Corinth, for what reason is not known (2 Tim., iv, 20). When Paul wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy he must have been at the house of Wine. The hope was lost (iv, 6); he begs his disciple to rejoin him as quickly as possible, for he is alone with Luke. We do not know if Timothy was able to reach Rome before the death of the Apostle.

Ancient tradition makes it possible to establish the following points: (1) Paul suffered martyrdom near Rome at a place called, according to the earlier analyses (now Tor Fontane), somewhat east of the Ostian Way, about two miles from the splendid Basilica of San Paolo fuori le mura which marks his burial place. (2) The martyrdom took place towards the end of the reign of Nero, in the twelfth year (St. Ephiphanus, the thirteenth (Euthal- hias), or the fourteenth (St. Jerome). (3) According to the most common opinion, Paul suffered in the same year and on the same day as Peter; several Latin Fat- hers contend that it was on the same day but not in the same year; the oldest witness, St. Dionysius the Corin- thian, says only κατα των αυτων καπατον, which may be translated “at the same time” or “about the same time”. (4) From this inmemorial the solemnity of the Apostles Peter and Paul has been celebrated on 29 June, which is the anniversary either of their death or of the translation of their relics. Formerly the pope, after having pontificated in the Basilica of St. Peter, went with his attendants to that of St. Paul, but the distance between the two basilicas (about five miles) rendered the double ceremony too exhausting, especially at that time of the year when Paul was vaining custom of transferring to the next day (30 June) the Commemoration of St. Paul. The feast of the Conversion of St. Paul (25 January) is of comparatively recent origin. There is reason for believing that the day was first observed to mark the translation of the relics of St. Paul at Rome, for so it appears in the liturgy of the Greek Church (Dower, “The Church Year and Calendar”, Cambridge, 1910, 69; cf. Duchesne, “Origines du culte chrétien”, Paris, 1898, 265-72; McClure, “Christian Worship”, London, 1903, 277-81).

II. Physical and Moral Portrait of St. Paul.—We know from Eusebius (Hist. eccl., VII, 18) that even in his lifetime Mark the writer of the Gospel of St. Mark, with Peter, formed a close-knit, closely-knit group, with Paul the apostle. Peter, Paul, and Mark’s features have been preserved in three ancient monuments: (1) A diptych which dates from not later than the fourth century (Lewin, “The Life and Epistles of St. Paul”, 1874, frontispiece of Vol. I and Vol. II, 210). (2) A large medallion found in the cemetery of Domitilla, representing the Apostle Peter and Paul (Op. cit., II, 411). (3) A glass dish in the British Museum, depicting the same Apostles (Farrar, “Life and Work of St. Paul”, 1891, 806). We have also the concordant descriptions of the “Acta Pauli et Theclae”, of Pseudo-Lucian in Philopatria, of Malalas (Chronogr., xvi, 22), of Eustathius of Antioch (cf. Lewin, op. cit., III, 189). Paul was short of stature: the Pseudo-Chrysostom, who calls him “the man of three cubits” (μηκός τριών μέτρων) he was broad-shouldered, somewhat bald, with slightly aquiline nose, closely-knit eyebrows, thick, greyish beard, fair complexion, and a pleasing and affable manner. He was afflicted with a malady which is difficult to diagnose (cf. Lewin, op. cit., “Dictory Times”, July and Sept., 1904). But despite this painful and humiliating infirmity (II Cor., xii, 7-9; Gal., iv, 13-14) and although his bearing was not impressive (II Cor., x, 10), Paul must undoubtedly have been possessed of great physical strength to have sustained so long such superhuman labours (II Cor., xi, 23-29). Pseudo-Chrysostom, “In princip. apostol. Petrum et Paulum” (in P. G., LIX, 194-95), considers that he died at the age of sixty-eight after having served the Lord for thirty-five years. The moral portrait is more difficult to draw because it is full of contrasts. Its elements will be found in: Lewin, op. cit., II, xi, 410-35 (Paul’s Person and Character); in Farrar, “Life of the Twelve Apostles”, (first ed., III, 319); Paul’s Stature; of the “Apostolate”, (1907). Lewin, op. cit., II, 411; in Newmann, “Sermons preached on Various Occasions”, vii, viii.

III. Theology of St. Paul.—A. Paul and Christ.—This question has passed through two distinct phases. According to the principal followers of the Tübingen School, the Apostle had but a vague knowledge of the life and teaching of the historical Christ and even dishonished such knowledge as inferior and useless. Their only support is the misinterpreted text: “Et si cognovimus sequumus eum carnem Christum, sed nunc jam novimus” (II Cor., v, 16). The opposition noted in this text is not between the historical and the glorified Christ, but between the Messias such as the unbelieving Jews represented Him, such perhaps as he was preached by certain Judaizers, and the Messias as He manifested Himself in His death and Resurrection, as He had been confessed by the converted Paul. It is neither admissible nor probable that Paul would be uninterested in the life and preaching of Him. When he speaks about the “other Messias” he constantly held up for the imitation of his nephtyes, and Whose spirit he boasted of having. It is incredible that he would not question on this subject eyewitnesses, such as Barnabas, Silas, or the future historians of Christ, Sts. Mark and Luke, with whom he was so long associated. Careful examination of this subject has brought out the three following conclusions concerning which there is now general agreement: (1) The Messias as envisaged by the Messianic hope and by the life and teachings of Christ than he would be suspected at first sight, and the usual way in which they are made to show that the Apostle knew more on the subject than he had the occasion or the wish to tell. (2) These usages are more frequent in St. Paul than in all the other writings of the New Testament, except the Gospel of Peter. (3) The use of the word apostles, of the word apothesis, of the parallel, with the life and teaching of Christ, deliberately exaggerate his originality and influence. According to them Paul was the creator of theology, the founder of the Church, the preacher of asceticism, the defender of the sacraments and of the ecclesiastical system, the opponent of the religion of love and liberty which Christ came to announce. To do him honour, he is called the second founder of Christianity, this must be a degenerate and altered Christianity since it was at least partially opposed to the primitive Christianity. Paul is thus made responsible for every antithesis to modern thought in traditional Christianity. This is a great extent the origin of the Pauline Christology, not meant to reconcile the judgments of which we are now witnessing. The chief reason for returning to Christ is to escape Paul, the originator of dogma, the theologian of the faith. The cry “Zurück zu Jesus” which has resounded in Germany for thirty years, is inspired by the ulterior motive, “Los von Paulus”. The problem is: Was it necessary for him to deny his apostles to his master? or was he absolutely autodidactic, independent of the Gospel of Christ and the preaching of the Twelve? It must be admitted that most of the papers published shed little light on the subject. However, the discussions have not been useless, for they have shown that the most characteristic Pauline doctrines, such as justifying faith, the redeeming death of Christ, the universality of salvation, are in accord with the writings of the first Apostles, from which they are derived. Jülicher in particular has pointed out that Paul’s Christology, which is more extended than that of his companions in the apostolate, was never the object of controversy, that Paul is not the founder, in this respect from the other heralds of the Gospel. Cf. Morgan, “Back to Christ” in “Dict. of Christ and the Gospels”, I, 61-67; Sunday, “Paul”, loc. cit., II, 886-92; Feine, “Jesus Christus und Paulus” (1902); Coggial, “L'apotre Paul et Jesus-Christ” (Paris, 1904); Jülicher, “Paulus und Jesus” (1907). B. The Root Idea of St. Paul’s Theology.—Several modern authors consider that theology is at the base, centre, and summit of Pauline theology. “The apostle’s doctrine is theocentric, not in reality anthropocentric. What is styled his “metaphysics” holds for Paul the immediate and sovereign fact of the universe; God, as he conceives Him, is all in all to his reason and heart alike” (Findlay in Hastings, “Dict. of the Bible”, III, 718). Stevens begins the exposition of his “Pauline Theology” with a chapter entitled “The doctrine of God”. Sabatier (L’apotre Paul, 1896, 297) also considers that “the last word of Pauline theology is: God all in all”, and he makes the ideal of God the basis of his doctrine. But these authors have not reflected that though the idea of God occupies so large a place in the teaching of the Apostle, whose thought is deeply religious like that of all his contemporaries, he is not characteristic of him, nor does it distinguish him from his companions in the apostolate nor even from contemporary Jews. Many modern Protestant theologians, especially among the more or less faithful followers of this school, are of the opinion that St. Paul's termology is "anthropocentric," that it starts from the conception of man's inability to fulfill the law of God without the help of grace to such an extent that he is a slave of sin and must wage war against the flesh. But if this be the genesis of Paul's idea it is astonishing that he enunciates it only in one chapter (Rom., vii), the sense of which is controverted so that if this chapter had not been written, or if it had been lost, we would have no means of recovering the key to his teaching. However, most modern theologians now agree that St. Paul's doctrine is Christocentric, that it is at base a soteriology, not from a subjective standpoint, according to the ancient prejudice of the founders of Protestantism, but from the objective standpoint of Paulism, but from the objective standpoint, embracing in a wide synthesis the person and work of the Redeemer. This may be proved empirically by the statement that everything in St. Paul converges towards Jesus Christ, so much so, that abstracting from Jesus Christ it becomes, whether taken collectively or absolutely, impossible, so that St. Paul's Gospel, as it is proved also by demonstrating that what Paul calls his Gospel is the salvation of all men through Christ and in Christ. This is the standpoint of the following rapid analysis:

"C. Humanity without Christ.—The first three chapters of the Epistle to the Romans shows us human nature as it is fallen in sin. Neither Gentiles nor Jews had withstood the torrent of evil. The Mosaic Law was a futile barrier because it prescribed good without imparting the strength to do it. The Apostle arrives at this mournful conclusion: "There is no distinction between Jew and Gentile: for all have sinned, and do need the glory of God" (Rom., ii, 22-23). He starts us back to the historical cause of this disorder: "By one man sin entered into this world and so death passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned" (Rom., v, 12). This man is obviously Adam, the sin which he brought into the world is not only his personal sin, but a predominating sin which entered into all men and left in them the seed of death: "All sinned when Adam sinned; all sinned in and with his sin" (Stevens, "Pauline Theology", 129). It remains to see how original sin which is our lot by natural generation, manifests itself outwardly and becomes the source of actual sins. This Paul teaches us in chap. vii, where describing the process of sin, he says: "Now the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law, in whom we sinned by nature weakened by the flesh and the tendency to evil, he represents nature as inevitably vanquished: "For I am delighted with the law of God, according to the inward man: But I see another law in my members fighting against the law of my mind, and captivating me in the law of sin" (Rom., vii, 22-23). This does not mean that the organism, the material substratum, is evil in itself, as some theologians of the Tubingen School have claimed, for the flesh of Christ, which was like unto ours, was exempt from sin, and the Apostle wishes that our bodies, which are destined to rise again, be preserved free from stain. The relation between sin and the flesh is not inherent nor necessary: it is accidental, determined by an historical fact, and capable of disappearing through the intervention of the Holy Ghost, but it is none the less true that it is not in our power to overcome it unaided and that fallen man had need of a Saviour.

Yet God did not abandon sinful man. He continued to manifest Himself through this visible world (Rom., i, 19-20); through the light of conscience (Rom., ii, 14-15); and finally through His ever active and paternal benevolence. Providence (Acts, xiv, xvii, 26). Furthermore, in His unerring mercy, He "will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (I Tim., ii, 4). This will be necessarily subsequent to original sin since it concerns the desire for salvation, as he understands that His merciful designs God leads man step by step to salvation. To the Patriarchs, and especially to Abraham, He gave his free and generous promise, confirmed by oath (Rom., iv, 13-20; Gal., iii, 15-18), which anticipated the Gospel. To Moses He gave His Law, the observation of which should be a means of salvation (Rom., x, 5, 13-16; Gal., iii, 15-25) and which, even when discredited in history, was no less a guide leading to Christ (Gal., iii, 24) and an instrument of mercy in the hands of God. The Law was a mere interlude until such time as humanity should be ripe for a complete revelation (Gal., iv, 1-7). In fact the Law brought nothing to perfection (Heb., vii, 19); it heightened the offence (Gal., iii, 2), and demonstrated man's inability to reach God through the Divine wrath (Rom., iv, 15). But good will arise from the excess of evil and "the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise, by the faith of Jesus Christ, might be given to them that believe" (Gal., iii, 22). This would be fulfilled in the "fulness of the time" (Gal., iv, 4; Eph., i, 10), that is, at the time set forth in the Gospel. The promise of the Redeemer's mission man's helplessness should have been well manifested. Then "God sent his Son, made of a woman, made under the law: that he might redeem them who were under the law: that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal., iv, 4).

I. The Person of the Redeemer.—Nearly all statements relative to the person of Jesus Christ bear either directly or indirectly on His role as Saviour. With St. Paul Christology is a function of soteriology. However, these outlines, they show us the faithful image of Christ in His pre-existence, in His historical existence, and in His glorified life (see F. Prat, "Théologie de Saint Paul").

(a) Christ is the object of the doxologies reserved for God (I Tim., iv, 18; Rom., xvi, 27) He is prayed to as the equal of the Father (II Cor., xii, 8-9; Rom., x, 12; I Cor., i, 12); gifts are asked of Him which it is in the power of God alone to grant, namely, glory, power, might, dominion, pre-existence, Divine wrath (I Cor., i, 13-17); He is immutable, since He exists "in the form of God" (Phil., ii, 6); He is omnipotent, since He has the power to bring forth being from nothingness (Col., i, 16); He is omnipresent, since He fills all things with His plenitude (Eph., iv, 10; Col., ii, 10); He is infinite, since "the fulness of the Godhead dwells in Him" (Col., ii, 9). All these are the special properties of God belongs of right to Him: the judgment seat of God is the judgment seat of Christ (Rom., xiv, 10; II Cor., v, 10); the Gospel of God is the Gospel of Christ (Rom., i, 1, 9; xv, 16, 19, etc.); the Church of God is the Church of Christ (I Cor., i, 2 and Rom., xvi, 16, sqq.); the Kingdom of God is the Kingdom of Christ (I Cor., ii, 21-23); the Godhead of Christ is "the great God and our Saviour" (Rom., viii, 9 sqq.).

(b) Christ is the one Lord (I Cor., viii, 6); He is identified with Jehovah of the Old Covenant (I Cor., x, 9; Rom., x, 13; cf. I Cor., ii, 16; ix, 21); He is the God who has purchased the church "with his own blood" (Acts, xx, 28); He is our "great God and Saviour Jesus Christ (Tit., ii, 13) ; He is the "God over all things" (Rom., ix, 5), effacing by His infinite transcendence the sun and substance of created things.

(2) Jesus Christ as Man.—The other aspect of the figure of Christ is drawn with no less firm a hand. Jesus Christ is the second Adam (Rom., v, 14; I Cor., xv, 45-49); "the mediator of God and men" (I Tim., ii, 5), and as such He must necessarily be man (ἀνθρώπος, ἀνθρώπος). He is the descendant of the Patriarchs (Rom., ix, 15; Gal., iii, 16). He is "of the seed of David, according to the flesh" (Rom., i, 3), "born of a woman" (Gal., iv, 4), like all men; finally, He is known as a man by His appearance, which is exactly similar to that of men (Phil., ii, 7), save for sin, which He did not and could not know (II Cor., v, 21). When St. Paul says that "God sent His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh," (Rom., viii, 3), He does not mean to deny the reality of Christ's flesh, but excludes only sinful flesh.

Nowhere does the Apostle explain how the union of the Divine and the human natures is accomplished in Christ, being content to affirm that He who was "in the form of God" took "the form of a servant" (Phil., iii, 6). Jesus Christ united the two natures into one by the formula: "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead corporeally" (Col., ii, 9). What we see clearly is that there is in Christ a single Person to whom are attributed, often in the same sentence, qualities proper to the Divine and the human nature, to the pre-existence, the historical existence, and the glorification of the Godhead, and to the human nature. For instance, Jesus Christ was "the Godhead dwelling in the flesh" (Phil., iii, 6), while He was "the wisdom of God" (I Cor., ii, 8). The theological explanation of the mystery has given rise to numerous errors. Denial was made of one of the natures, either the human (Docetism), or the Divine (Arianism), or the two natures were considered to be united in a purely accidental manner so as to produce two natures (Nestorianism), or they were merged into one (Monophysitism), or on the contrary, two persons are taught, in which one person the heretics mutilated either the human nature (Apollinarianism), or the Divine, according to the strange modern heresy known as Kenosis.

The last-mentioned requires a brief treatment, as it is based on a saying of St. Paul: "Being in the form of God, He emptied Himself (ἐκτίθεντα εὐθείαν, hence καινάτων) taking the form of a servant" (Phil., ii, 6-7). Contrary to the common opinion, Luther applied these words not to the Word, but to Christ, the Incarnate Word. Moreover he understood the communio confused in the unity of the two natures: it is the Divine nature that the human nature of Christ would possess the Divine attributes of ubiquity, omniscience, and omnipotence. There are two systems among Lutheran theologians, one asserting that the human nature of Christ was vacuantly stripped of these attributes (καινάτων), the other that they were hidden during His mortal existence (hidden). In modern times the doctrine of Kenosis, while still restricted to Lutheran theology, has completely changed its opinions. Starting with the philosophical idea that "personality" is identified with "consciousness," it is maintained that where there is only one person there can be only one consciousness; the consciousness of Christ, it is argued, was truly human, so the Divine consciousness must of necessity have ceased to exist or act in Him. According to Thomism, the theorist of the system, the Son of God was stripped, not after the Incarnation, as Luther asserted, but by the very fact of the Incarnation, and what rendered possible the union of the Godhead with the human nature was the act of the Necessity of the Divinity to limit itself both as to being and activity. The opposite partisans of the system express themselves in a similar manner. Gess, for instance, says that in Jesus Christ the Divine ego is changed into the human ego. When it is objected that God is immutable, that He can neither cease to be, nor limit Himself, nor transform Himself, they reply that this reasoning is on metaphysical hypotheses and concepts without reality. (For the various forms of Kenosis see Brice, "The Union of Christ and the Father.")

All these systems are merely variations of Monophysitism. Unconsciously they assume that there is in Christ but a single nature as there is but a single person. According to the Catholic doctrine, on the contrary, the union of the two natures in a single person involves no change in the Divine nature and need involve no change in the human nature of Christ. Without doubt Christ is the Son and is morally entitled even as man to the goods of His Father, viz. the immediate vision of God, eternal beatitude, the state of glory. He is temporarily deprived of a portion of these goods in order that he may fulfill His mission as Redeemer. This is the abnegation, of which St. Paul speaks, but it is a totally different thing from the Kenosis as described above.

E. The Objective Redemption as the Work of Christ.—We have seen that fallen man being unable to arise again unaided, God in His mercy sent His Son to save him. It is an elementary and often repeated doctrine (Phil., ii, 5-11; Col., ii, 9). Paul thus describes the act of the Cross, that we are "justified by his blood," that "we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son" (Rom., v, 9-10). What endowed the blood of Christ, His death, His Cross, with this redeeming virtue? Paul never answers this question directly, but he shows us the drama of Calvary under three aspects, which there is danger in separating and which are better understood when compared: (a) at one time the death of Christ is a sacrifice intended, like the sacrifice of the Old Law, to expiate sin and propitiate God. Cf. Sanday and Headlam, "Romans," 91-94, "The death of Christ considered as a sacrifice." It is impossible to get rid of this double idea: (1) of a sacrifice; (2) of a sacrifice which is propitiatory. Quite apart from this passage it is not difficult to prove that these two ideas of sacrifice and propitiation lie at the root of the teaching not only of St. Paul but of the New Testament generally. The double danger of this idea is, first, to wish to apply to the sacrifice of Christ all the modes of action, real or supposed, of the imperfect sacrifices of the Old Law; and, second, to believe that God is appeased by a sort of magical effect, in virtue of this sacrifice, whereas on the contrary it was He Who took the initiative of mercy, instituted the sacrifice of Calvary, and endowed it with its extraordinary value. (b) At another time the death of Christ is represented as a redemption, the payment of a ransom, as the result of which man was delivered from all his past servitude (I Cor., vi, 20; vii, 23 [τελειοὶ ἡγγασμένοι]; Gal., iii, 13; iv, 5 [καὶ τοῦ ὑποκείμενον ἔκκεκάσθην]; Rom., iii, 24; I Cor., i, 30; Eph., i, 7, 11; Col., i, 14 [ἀνακολουθεῖν]; Tim., ii, 6 [αὐτὸν ἐκκαταράζειν]; etc.) This idea, correct as it is, may have inconveniences if isolated or exaggerated. By carrying it beyound what was written, some of the Fathers put forth the strange suggestion of a ransom paid by Christ to the demon who held us in bondage. Another mistake is to regard the death of Christ as having a value in itself, independent of Christ Who approved it and God Who accepted it for the remission of our sins.

(c) Often, too, Christ seems to substitute Himself for us in order to undergo in our stead the chastisement for sin. He suffers physical death to save us from the moral death of sin and preserve us from the eternal death. According to the Church Fathers the latter is so strongly to Lutheran theologians that they admitted quantitative equality between the sufferings really endured by Christ and the penalties deserved by our sins. They even maintained that Jesus underwent the penalty of loss (of the vision of God) and the malediction of the Father. These are the extravagances which have cast so much discredit on the theory of substitution. It has been rightly said that the transfer of a chasismenent from one person to another is an injustice and a contradiction, for the chasismenent is inseparable from the fault and an undeserved chasismenent is no longer a chasismenent. Besides St. Paul, no one ever said that Christ died in our stead (בר), but only that he died for us (למר), because of our sins (מ).

In reality the three standpoints considered above are but three aspects of the Redemption which, far from excluding one another, should harmonize and combine, modifying if necessary all the other aspects of salvation. The following is the conclusion of the Epistle to the Philippians:

The subject of this Epistle is the Redemption, that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath proposed to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, to the shewing of his [hidden] justice, for the remission of former sins, through the forbearance of God, for the shewing of his justice in this time; that of himself may be [known as just, and the justifier of him, who is in the faith of Jesus Christ” (Rom., iii, 21-26). Herein are designated the part of God, of Christ, and of man: (1) God takes the initiative; it is He who offers His Son; He intends to manifest His justice, but is moved thereto by mercy. It is therefore, not of the creature or of the Church to shew God was angry with the human race and that He was only appeased by the death of His Son. (2) Christ is our Redemption (ربطו הרובע), He is the instrument of expiation or propitiation (מוצпе), and is such by His Sacrifice (לע טו עזרו), which does not resemble those of irrational animals; it derives its value from Christ, who declared to his Father through obedience and love (Phil., ii, 8; Gal., ii, 20). (3) Man is not merely passive in the drama of his salvation; he must understand the lesson which God teaches, and appropriate by faith the fruit of the Redemption.

F. The Subjective Redemption.—Christ having once died and risen, the Redemption is completed in law and in principle for the whole human race. Each man makes it his own in fact and in act by faith and baptism which, by uniting him with Christ, causes him to participate in His Divine life. Faith, according to St. Paul, is composed of several elements: it is the submission of the intellect to the word of God, the trustful reliance of the heart on the Saviour Who promises him assistance; it is also an act of obedience by which man accepts the Divine will. Such an act has a moral value, for it “gives glory to God” (Rom., iv, 20) in the measure in which it recognizes its own helplessness. That is why “Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him unto justice” (Rom., iv, 3; Gal., iii, 6).

The spiritual children of Abraham are likewise “justified by faith, without the works of the law” (Rom., iii, 28; cf. Gal., iii, 16).

Hence it follows: (1) That justice is granted by God in consideration of faith. (2) That, nevertheless, faith is not equivalent to justice, since man is justified “by grace” (Rom., iii, 24), and Paul claims that justice is freely granted to man becomes his property and is inherent in him. Protestants formerly asserted that the justice of Christ is imputed to us, but now they are generally agreed that this argument is unscriptural and lacks the guaranty of Paul; but some, both to base justification on a good work (פור), deny a moral value to the justification. They claim that the forensic judgment of God which alters absolutely nothing in the justified sinner. But this theory is untenable; for: (1) even admitting that “to justify” signifies “to pronounce just”, it is absurd to suppose that God really pronounces just anyone who is not already so or who is not rendered so by the declaration itself. (2) Justification is inseparable from sanctification, for the latter is “a justification of life” (Rom., v, 18) and every “just man liveth by faith” (Rom., i, 17; Gal., iii, 11). (3) By faith and baptism we die to the “old man”, our former selves; now this is impossible without beginning to live as the new man, who “according to God, is created in justice and holiness” (Rom., vi, 5–6). Epiph., iv, 24; i Cor., i, 30; vi, 11.)

To sum up, our assertion is that the new man, created in baptism “our old man is crucified with [Christ] that the body of sin may be destroyed, to the end that we may serve sin no longer” (Rom., vi, 6). Our incorporation with the mystical Christ is not only a transformation and a metamorphosis, but a real creation, the production of a new being, subject to new laws and consequently to new duties. To understand the extent of our obligations it is enough for us to know ourselves as Christians and to reflect on the various relations which result from our supernatural birth: that of sonship to God the Father, of consecration to the Holy Ghost, of mystical identity with our Saviour Jesus Christ, of brotherly union with the other members of the Church at all points, of the neophytes: “Thanks be to God, that you were the servants of sin, but have obeyed from the heart unto that form of doctrine, into which you have been delivered... But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, you have your fruit unto sanctification, and the end life everlasting” (Rom., vi, 17, 22).

By the act of faith and by baptism, its seal, the Christian freely makes himself the servant of God and the soldier of Christ. God’s will, which he accepts in advance in the measure in which it shall be manifested, becomes therefor his rule of conduct. Thus Paul’s moral code rests on the one hand on the positive will of God, made known by Christ, promulgated by the Apostles, and virtually accepted by the neophyte in his first act of faith, and on the other, in baptismal regeneration and the new relations which it produces. All Paul’s commands and recommendations are merely applications of these principles.

II. Eschatology.—(1) The graphic description of the Parousia (I Thess., iv, 16–17; II Thess., i, 7–10) has nearly all its main points in Christ’s great eschatological discourse (Matt., xxii; Mark, xiii, Luke, xxi). A common characteristic of all these passages is the apparent nearness of the parousia. Paul does not assert that the coming of the Saviour is at hand. In each of the five epistles, wherein he expresses the desire and the hope to witness in person the return of Christ, he at the same time considers the probability of the contrary hypothesis, proving that he had neither revelation nor certainty on the point. He knows only that the day of the Lord will come unexpectedly, like a thief (I Thess., v, 3–5), and he counsels them to “be always prepared” (I Cor., xvi, 23) without neglecting the duties of their state of life (II Thess., iii, 6–12). Although the coming of Christ will be sudden, it will be heralded by three signs: general apostasy (II Thess., ii, 3), the appearance of Antichrist (ii, 3–12), and the conversion of the Jews (Rom., xi, 26). A particular circumstance of St. Paul’s preaching is that the just who shall escape at Christ’s second advent will pass to glorious immortality without dying (I Thess., iv, 17; I Cor., xv, 51 [Greek text]; II Cor., v, 2–5).

(2) Owing to the doubts of the Corinthians Paul treats the resurrection of the just at some length. He does not ignore the resurrection of the sinners, which he affirmed before the Governor Felix (Acts, xxiv, 15), but he does not concern himself with it in his Epistles. When he says that "the dead who are in Christ shall rise first" (πρῶτον, 1 Thess., iv, 14, Greek) this "first" offsets, not another resurrection of the dead, but the glorious transformation of the living. Nevertheless, the "end" of which he speaks (τέλος, I Cor., xv, 21) is not the end of the resurrection, but the present world and the beginning of a new order of things. All the arguments which he advances in behalf of the resurrection may be reduced to three: the mystical union of the Christian with Christ, the presence within us of the Spirit of Holiness, the interior and supernatural conviction of the faithful and the Apostles. It is evident that these arguments deal only with the glorious resurrection of the just. In short, the resurrection of the wicked does not come within his theological horizon. What is the condition of the souls of the just between death and resurrection? These souls enjoy the presence of Christ (II Cor., v, 8); their lot is exorable (Phil., i, 23); hence it is impossible that they should be without life, activity, or consciousness.

(3) The judgment according to St. Paul as according to the Synoptics, is closely connected with the parousia. Both teach the idea of two sets of the same drama which constitute the Day of the Lord (I Cor., i, 8; II Cor., i, 14; Phil., i, 6, 10, ii, 16). "For we must all be manifested before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the proper things of the body, according as he hath done, whether it be good or evil" (I Cor., v, 10). Two essentials are present in this text: (1) The judgment shall be universal, neither the good nor the wicked shall escape (Rom., xiv, 10-12), nor even the angels (I Cor., vi, 3); all who are brought to trial must account for the use of their liberty. (2) The judgment shall be according to works: this is a truth frequently reiterated by St. Paul, concerning sinners (1 Cor., i, 27-29; ii, 7, 11), and concerning himself (Gal., i, 15), even the most general (Rom., ii, 6-9). Many Protestants marvel at this and claim that in St. Paul this doctrine is a survival of his rabbinical education (Pithiderer), or that he could not make it harmonize with his doctrine of gratuitous justification (Krens), or that the reward will be in proportion to the act, as the harvest is in proportion to the sowing (Paulus). In the most general sense, Paul means, the just because of or with a view to the act (Weiss). These authors lose sight of the fact that St. Paul distinguishes between two justifications, the first necessarily gratuitous since man was then incapable of meritting it (Rom., iii, 28; Gal., ii, 15), the second in conformity to his works. This latter is the "eγκαθίστασις", small man, with due regard to justifying grace, is capable of merit as the sinner is of demerit. Hence the celestial recompense is a "crown of justice which the Lord the just judge will render" (II Tim., iv, 8) to whomsoever has legitimately gained it.

Briefly, St. Paul's eschatology is not so distinctive as it has been made to appear. Perhaps its most original characteristic is the continuity between the present and the future of the just, between grace and glory, between salvation begun and salvation consummated. A large number of terms, redemption, justification, salvation, kingdom, glory and especially life, are common to the two states, or rather to the two phases of the same existence linked by charity which "never falles away".

Paul I., Pope, 557-67, date of birth unknown; d. at Rome, 28 June, 707. He was a brother of Stephen II. They had been educated for the priesthood at the Lateran palace. Stephen entrusted his brother, who approved of the pope's course in respect to King Pepin, with many important ecclesiastical affairs, among others with the restoration to the Roman Church of the States of the cities which had been wrested from the Lombard Kings Aistulf and Desiderius; these cities Desiderius promised to give up. While Paul was with his dying brother at the Lateran, a party of the Romans gathered in the house of Archdeacon Theophylact in order to secure the latter's succession to the papal see. However, after the burial of Stephen (d. 26 April, 557), Paul was elected by a large majority, and received episcopal consecration on the twentieth of May. Paul continued his predecessor's policy towards the Frankish king, Pepin, and thereby continued the papal supremacy over Rome and the districts of central Italy in opposition to the efforts of the Lombards and the Eastern Empire. Pepin sent a letter to the Roman people, exhorting them to remain steadfast to St. Peter. In the reply sent by the senate and the people of Rome to the Frankish king, the latter was urged to complete the enlargement of the Roman province which he had wrested from the barbarians, and to persevere in the work he had begun. In 758 a daughter was born to Pepin, and the king sent the pope the cloth used at the baptism as a present, renewing in this way the papal sponsorship. Paul returned thanks and informed Pepin of the hostile action of Desiderius, who had failed to deliver the cities of Imola, Spoleto, Arezzo, and Bologna to Rome, and had also devastated the Pentapolis on his expedition against the rebellious Dukes of Spoleto and Benevento. The two duichies were conquered and annexed by Desiderius (758). At Benevento Desiderius had a conference with the Greek ambassador Georgios, and agreed on a mutual alliance of Byzantines and Lombards in central Italy. On the way to Rome, the latter two cities came to Rome, and when the pope demanded the return of the aforesaid cities, he refused to comply. He promised to give back Imola, but on condition that the pope should persuade Pepin to send back the Lombard hostages whom the Frankish king had carried off, some time before, at the time of his second victory over the Lombard King Aistulf. If Paul would not do this, Desiderius threatened to go to war with him. The latter was accomplished in 763. Paul found it difficult even to get the Frankish king informed of his position. He gave two letters to Bishop George of Ostia and the Roman priest Stephen, his ambassadors to Pepin, who made the journey with the Frankish messenger Roodbertus. In the one letter that was to secure the envoy a safe passage through Lombard territory, he agreed to the demands of Desiderius and begged Pepin to accede to the wishes of the Lombards by making a treaty of peace and returning the hostages. At the same time the envoys were to give to the Frankish king a second secret letter, in which the pope communicated to him the latest occurrences, informed him of the agreement of Desiderius with the Byzantines for the conquest of Ravenna, and implored Pepin to come to the aid of the pope, to punish the Lombard king, and to force him to yield the towns retained by him. Towards the close of 759 another envoy was sent to Pepin. Early in 760 two Frankish envoys, Bishop Remulius of Rouen, brother to Pepin, and Duke Antschar, came to Desiderius, who promised the Frankish king the Roman Church in April, and also to yield the towns demanded by the pope. But he again refused to carry out his promises, dalied, and even forced his way into Roman territory. Once more Paul implored the Frankish king's help. The position of affairs was made even more threatening by Byzantine action. Georgios had gone from some time before as envoy to Pepin, and had won over a papal envoy, Marinus. With all his efforts Georgios could not move Pepin. In 760 a report spread through Italy that a large Byzantine fleet was under sail for Rome and the Frankish kingdom. Later it was reported that the Byzantines intended to send an army to Rome and Ravenna. The Archbishop Sabinus of Ravenna received a letter from the Byzantine emperor, in which the latter sought to obtain the voluntary submission of the inhabitants of Ravenna. The same attempt was also made in Venice. Sergius sent the letter of the emperor to the pope, and the pope notified Pepin. In case of a war with the Eastern Empire it was important to make sure of the support of the Lombard king, and to desire him to respond to an agreement with Desiderius. Thereupon the Lombard king showed more complaisance in the question of the Roman patrimony included in the Lombard territory, and when he visited Rome in 765, the boundary disputes between him and the pope were arranged. The Frankish king now directed Desiderius to aid the pope in recovering the Roman patrimony in the regions in southern Italy under Byzantine rule, and to support the ecclesiastical rights of the pope against the bishops of those districts. Paul's opposition to the schemes of the Emperor Constantine Copronymus had no real political basis. The pope's aim was to defend ecclesiastical orthodoxy regarding the Trinity and the veneration of images against the Eastern emperor. Paul repeatedly dispatched legates and letters in regard to the veneration of images to the emperor at Byzantium. Constantine sent envoys to western Europe who in coming to King Pepin did not dispute his intention to negotiate with him concerning dogmatic questions, as also about the submission of the Exarchate of Ravenna to Byzantine suzerainty. Papal legates also came to Pepin in regard to these matters. On their return the legates were able to reassure the pope as to the views of the Frankish ruler, who kept two of the papal envoys. Bishop George and the priest Peter, near him. In 767 a Frankish envoy was held prominently, near Paris, at which the Church doctrines concerning the Trinity and the veneration of images were maintained. Paul showed great activity and zeal in encouraging religious life at Rome. He turned his paternal home into a monastery, and near it built the church of San Silvestro in Capite. The founding of this church led to his holding a synod at Rome in 761. To this church and other churches of Rome, Paul transferred the bones of numerous martyrs from the decayed sanctuaries in the catacombs devastated by the Lombards in 756. He transferred the relics of St. Petronilla (q. v.) from the catacomb of St. Domitilla to a chapel in St. Peter's erected by his predecessor for this purpose. The legend of St. Petronilla caused her at that era to be regarded as a daughter of St. Peter, and as such she became the special Roman patroness of the Frankish rulers. Paul also built an oratory of the Blessed Virgin in St. Peter's, and a church in honour of the Apostles on the Via Sacra beyond the Roman Forum. He died near the church of San Paolo fuori le mura, where he had gone during the heat of summer. He was buried in this church, but after three months his body was transferred to St. Peter's. The "Liber Pontificalis" also praises the Christian charity and benevolence of the pope which he united with firmness. Paul is venerated as a saint. His feast is celebrated on the twenty-eighth of June.

Eugene IV. Although he studied for a business career he received an excellent religious education and, at the elevation of his uncle to the papacy, entered the ecclesiastical state. He became Archbishop of Bologna, Bishop of Cervia and of Vicenza, and in 1449 cardinal-bishop. Noted for his generosity and imposing appearance, the Cardinal of Venice, as he was called, was very influential under Eugene IV, Nicholas V, and Callixtus III, less so under Pius II. He became the latter's successor, and owed his election partially to the dissatisfaction of some of the cardinals with the policies of his predecessor. To this could be traced the pith which Barbo swore to at the conclave, but which he rightfully set aside after election, since it was opposed to the monarchal constitution of the Church. Paul II delighted in display. He introduced splendid carnival festivities, built the palace of S. Marco (now di Venezia), revised the municipal statutes of Rome, organized relief work among the poor, granted pensions to some cardinals, and to all the privilege of wearing the red biretta. His suppression in 1466 of the college of abbreviators aroused much opposition, intensified by a similar measure against the Roman Academy. Platina, a member of both organizations, who had been repeatedly imprisoned, retaliated by writing a calumnious biography of Paul II.

That Paul II was not opposed to Humanistic studies, as such, is evidenced by the fact that he protected universities, encouraged the art of printing, and was himself a collector of works of ancient art. The suppression of the Roman Academy was justified by the moral degeneracy and pagan attitude which it fostered. On the other hand the charge of immorality brought against Paul II by Gregory of Helm- burg is untenable. The pope punished the Fraticelli in the Papal States, prosecuted heretics in France and Germany, deeded in 1470 the observance of the jubilee every twenty-five years, and made an unsuccessful attempt at uniting Russia with the Church. The Turkish question received his earnest attention, particularly after the fall of Negropont (1470). Financial assistance was granted to Hungary and the Albanian leader Selandrak. No general results were obtained, however, owing to the lack of co-operation among the Christian powers; to disturbances in the Papal States, where Paul II suppressed the robber knights of Anguillara, and perhaps chiefly to the conflict between the papacy and King George Podiebrad of Bohemia.

Paul III, Pope (Alessandro Farnese), b. at Rome or Canino, 29 Feb., 1465; elected, 12 Oct., 1534; d. at Rome, 10 Nov., 1549. The Farnese were an ancient Roman family whose possessions clustered about the Lake of Bolsena. Although counted among the Roman aristocrats, they first appear in history associated with Viterbo and Orvieto. Among the witnesses to the Treaty of Venice between Barbarossa and the pope, we find the signature of a Farnese as Rector of Orvieto; a Farnese bishop consecrated the cathedral of Salerno. During the interminable feuds which stretched the peninsula, the Farnese were consistently Guelph. The grandfather of the future pontiff was commander-in-chief of the papal troops under Euge-
the general council. The extension of power which a re-united Germany would have in the hands of Charles was so intolerable to Francis I, that he, who persecuted heresy in his own realm with such cruelty that the pope appealed to him to mitigate his violence, became the sworn ally of the Smalcaldic League, encouraging them to reject all overtures to reconciliations. Charles himself was in no slight measure to blame; for, notwithstanding his desire for the assembling of a council, he was led into the belief that the religious differences of Germany might be settled by conferences between the two parties. These conferences, like all such attempts to settle differences outside of the normal court of the Church, led to a waste of time, and did far more harm than good. Charles had already offered him a general council. In his desire to unite all parties, he sought for vague formulae to which all could subscribe, a relapse into the mistakes of the Byzantine emperors. A council of the Church, on the other hand, must formulate the faith with such precision that no heretic can subscribe to it. It took some years to convince the emperor and his mediating advisors that Catholicism and Protestantism are as opposite as light and darkness. Meanwhile Paul III set about the reform of the papal court with a vigour which paved the way for the disciplinary canons of Trent. He appointed commissions to report abuses of every kind; he reformed the Apostolic Camera, the tribunal of the Rota, the Penitentiary, and the Chancery. He enhanced the prestige of the papacy by doing single-handed what his predecessors had reserved to the action of a council. In the constantly recurring quarel's between Francis and Charles, Paul III preserved a strict neutrality, notwithstanding the threats which urged him to support the empire and subject Francis to the censures of the Church. Paul's attitude as a patriotic Italian would have been sufficient to prevent him from allowing the emperor to be sole arbiter of Italy. It was as much for the purpose of securing the integrity of the papal dominions, as for the evaluation of his family, that Paul exorted from Charles and his reluctant cardinals the erection of Piacenza and Parma into a duchy for his son, Pier Luigi. A feud arose with Gonzaga, the imperial Governor of Milan, which ended later in the assassination of Pier Luigi and the permanent alienation of Piacenza from the Papal States.

When the Treaty of Crespi (18 Sept., 1544) ended the disastrous wars between Charles and Francis, Paul energetically took up the project of convening a general council. Meanwhile it developed that the emperor had formed a programme of his own, quite at variance in some important points with the pope's. Since the Protestants participated a council presided over by the Roman pontiff, Charles was resolved to reduce the princes to obedience by force of arms. To this Paul did not object, and promised to aid him with three hundred thousand ducats and twenty thousand infantry; but he wisely added the proviso, that Charles should enter into no separate treaties with the heretics and make no agreement prejudicial to the Faith or to the rights of the Holy See. Charles now contended that the council should be prorogued, until victory had decided in favour of the Catholics. Furthermore, foreseeing that the struggle with the preachers of heresy would be more stubborn than the conflict with the princes, he urged the pontiff to avoid making dogmas of faith for the present and confine the labours of the council to the more manageable point. To neither of these proposals could the pope agree. Finally, after endless difficulties (13 Dec., 1545) the Council of Trent held its first session. In seven sessions, the last 3 March, 1547, the Fathers intrepidly faced the most important questions of faith and discipline. Without listening to the threats and expositions of the imperial party, and without the slightest time the Catholic doctrine on the Scriptures, original sin, justification, and the Sacraments. The work of the council was half ended, when the outbreak of the plague in Trent caused an adjournment to Bologna. Pope Paul was not the instigator of the removal of the council; he simply acquiesced in the decision of the Fathers. Fifteen proles dedicated to the emperor, retired to leave Trent. Charles demanded the return of the council to German territory, but the deliberations of the council continued in Bologna, until finally, 21 April, the pope, in order to avert a schism, prorogued the council indefinitely. The wisdom of the council's energetic action, in establishing thus early the fundamental truths of the Catholic creed, become seen evident, when the emperor and his semi-Protestant advisers inflicted upon Germany their Interim religion, which was despised by both parties. Pope Paul, who had given the essential aid in the Smalcaldic war, resented his dabbling in theology, and their estrangement continued until the death of the pontiff.

Paul's end came rather suddenly. After the assassination of Pier Luigi, he had struggled to retain Piacenza and Parma for the Church and had deprived Ottavio, Pier Luigi's son and Charles's son-in-law, of these duchies. Ottavio, relying on the emperor's benevolence, refused obedience; it broke the old man's heart, when he learned that his favourite grandson, Cardinal Farnese, was a party to the transaction. He fell into a violent fever and died at the Quirinal, at the age of eighty-two. He lies buried in St. Peter's, complete restoration of Catholic faith and piety. He was succeeded by many saintly pontiffs, but not one of them possessed all his commanding virtues. In Rome his name is written all over the city he renovated. The Pauline chapel, Michelangelo's work in the Sixtine, the streets of Rome, which he straightened and broadened, the numerous objects of art associated with the name of Farmese, all speak eloquently of the remarkable personality of the pontiff who turned the tide in favour of religion. If to this we add the favour accorded by Paul to the new religious orders then appearing, the Capuchins, Barnabites, Theatines, Jesuits, Ursulines, and many others, we are forced to confess that his reign was one of the most fruitful in the annals of the Church.

Paul IV, Pope (Giovanni Pietro Caraffa), b. near Benevento, 28 June, 1476; elected 23 May, 1555; d. 18 Aug., 1559. The Caraffa were one of the most illustrious of the noble families of Naples, and had given distinguished scions to Church and State. The name of Cardinal Oliviero Caraffa recurs frequently in the history of the papacy during the days of the Renaissance. One of the great cardinal's merits was that of superintending the training of his young relative, Giovanni Pietro, whom he introduced to the papal Court in 1494, and in whose favour he resigned the See of Chieti (in Latin, Thiete), from which word he was transferred to known as Thietas, and sent him on an embassy to England and retained him for some years as nuncio in Spain. His residence in Spain served to accentuate that detestation of Spanish rule in his native land which characterized his public policy during his pontificate. From early childhood he led a blameless life; and that longing for asceticism which had prompted him to seek admission into the Dominican and the Camaldolese Orders asserted itself in 1521 when he persuaded Clement VII, though with difficulty, to accept the resignation of his benefices and permit him to enter the congregation of clerics regular founded by St. Cajetan, but popularly named "the Theatines," after Caraffa, their first general. The young congregation suffered more than its share during the sack of Rome in 1527, and its five members retired to Venice. But the sharp intellect of Paul III had perceived the importance of the institute in his projected reform of the clergy, and he summoned the Theatines back to Rome. Caraffa was placed on the council of the province of the papal Court; and on 22 Dec., 1536 he was created cardinal with the title of San Pancrazio. Later he was made Archbishop of Naples; but, owing to the emperor's distrust and fear of him, it was only with difficulty he could maintain his episcopal rights. Although Caraffa was highly educated and surpassing most of his contemporaries in the knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, still he remained throughout his life a monkish pupil. His favourite author was St. Thomas Aquinas. The few opuscula which he found time to write were Scholastic in character. For the party of Pole, Contarini, and Morone he had the most heartfelt detestation, though he spared them no opprobrium. Caraffa was the head and front of every effort made by Paul III in the interest of reform. He reorganized the Inquisition in Italy on papal lines and for a generation was the terror of misbelievers. How so austere a person could be chosen pope was a mystery to everyone, especially to himself. "I have never conferred a favour on a human being," he said. It is most likely that the octogenarian would have refused the dignity, were it not that the emperor's agent, Cardinal Mendoza, had pronounced definitely that Charles would not permit Caraffa to be pope. This was to challenge every principle for which the aged cardinal had stood during his long career. He was the last of the so-called "separate papists" who for years held aloft the banner of the independence of Italy. Historians seem to be unjust towards Paul IV. That unbending Italian patriot, born whilst Italy was "a lyre with four strings," Naples, Rome, Florence, and Venice, was certainly justified in using the prestige of the papacy to preserve some relics of liberty for his native country. The Austrian and Spanish Habsburgers treated Paul IV with studied contempt, and thus forced him to enter an alliance with France. Neither in the matter of the succession of the Church nor in the conclusion of the religious peace were the interests of the Holy See consulted in the slightest degree.

Paul IV elevated to the cardinalate his nephew Carlo Caraffa, a man utterly unworthy and without any ecclesiastical training, and enriched other relatives with benefices and estates. He also showed a marked inclination towards the Spaniards. At the end of the unfortunate war with Philip II the aged pope lost faith in his nephews and banished them from the Court. Still more disaster was his relations with England, which had been reconciled to Rome by Mary, and Cardinal Pole. Paul IV refused to sanction Pole's settlement in regard to the confiscated goods of the Church, and demanded restitution. Pole himself was relieved by the pontiff of his legitimate office and ordered to come to Rome to stand before the Inquisition. Upon the death of Mary and Pole, he rejected Elizabeth's claim to the crown, on the ground that she was of illegitimate birth. His country was more fruitful in the spiritual concerns of the Church. He could boast that no day passed without seeing a new decree of reform. He made the Inquisition a powerful engine of government, and was no respecter of persons. The great Cardinal Morone was brought before the tribunal on suspicion of heresy and committed to prison. Paul established the hierarchy in the Netherlands and in the Orient.

The pontificate of Paul IV was a great disappointment. He who at the beginning was honoured by a public statue, lived to see it thrown down and mutilated by the hostile populace. He was buried in St. Peter's 19 Aug., 1559, and was later transferred to S. Maria sopra Minerva.

Paul V, Pope (Camillo Borghese), b. at Rome, 17 Sept., 1550; elected 16 May, 1605; d. 28 Jan., 1621. Although proud to call himself, as we read on the façade of St. Peter's and on his epitaph, a Roman, Borghese was descended from a noble family of Siena which held important positions in that city, and claimed St. Catherine for a relative. Their removal to Rome was caused by the endless disturbances which made life in Siena unbearable. Camillo was carefully trained in jurisprudence at Perugia and Padua, and became a canonist of marked ability. He rose in the ecclesiastical career steadily, if not rapidly; in 1596 he was made cardinal by Clement VIII, and became Cardinal-Vicar of Rome. He held abov from all parties in the council of the twelve and the ducal books. In consequence, on the death of Leo XI, all eyes were centred on him, and he ascended the papal throne without engagement or obligation of any sort. His legal training was soon visible in all his words and actions. He knew nothing of compromises, and proceeded to rule the Church not from the standpoint of diplomacy but from the decreta. He conceived it his duty to maintain inviolate every right and claim advanced by his predecessors. This made his character at times assume a very stern and uncompromising aspect. His first public act was to send home to their sees the prelates and even the cardinals who were sojourning at Rome upon one or other pretext. The Council of Trent prohibited the appointment of bishops and it was not before 1605 that he sent a bishop to be an absentee. That he was engaged in Rome doing the business of the Holy See made no difference. Paul was soon involved in controversy with various cities of Italy on matters concerning ecclesiastical jurisdiction and the relations between Church and State. The bitterest quarrel was with the proud Republic of Venice, which refused to acknowledge the exemption of the clergy from the jurisdiction of the civil courts and passed two laws objections to the Roman Curia, the first forbidding the alienation of real property in favour of the clergy, the second demanding the approval of the civil power for the building of new churches. Paul demanded the repeal of these anti-clerical ordinances, and insisted that two clerics who had been committed to prison should be surrendered to the ecclesiastical court. The dispute became daily more bitter and gradually developed into a broad discussion of the relative position of Church and State. What gave the quarrel a European importance was the ability of the champions who entered the field on either side. For the claims of the Church stood Cardinals Baronius and Bellarmino; the cause of Venice was defended by the Servite Paolo Sarpi, a man of wonderful literary skill and a sworn enemy of the Roman Court. On 17 April, 1606, the pope pronounced sentence of excommunication against the doge, Senate, and Government collectively. He allowed a very short space for submission, after which he imposed an interdict on the city. The clergy had now to take sides for or against the pope. With the exception of the Jesuits, the Theatines, and the Capuchins, who were immediately expelled, the entire body of secular and regular clergy held with the Government and continued to hold services, notwithstanding the interdict. The festival of Corpus Christi was celebrated with unusual splendour, and Sarpi said Mass for the first time in years. The schism lasted about a year; and peace was patched up through the mediation of France and Spain. The Republic refused to repeal the obnoxious laws openly, but promised "to conduct itself with its accustomed pieté." With these obscure words the pope was forced to be content; he removed the censures 22 March, 1607. The Theatines and Capuchins were permitted to return; an exception was made against the Jesuits.

The pope watched vigilantly over the interests of the Church in every nation. On 9 July, 1606, he wrote a friendly letter to James I of England to congratulate him on his accession to the throne, and referred with grace to the plot recently made against his person in the Tower. But he prays him not to make the innocent Catholics suffer for the crime of a few. He promises to exhort all the Catholics of the realm to be submissive and loyal to their sovereign in all things not opposed to the honour of God. Unfortunately the oath of allegiance James demanded of his subjects contained clauses to which the pope objected, to which the king consented. It was solemnly condemned in two Briefs, 22 Sept., 1606, and 23 Aug., 1607. This condemnation occasioned the bitter discussion between the party of the archbishop George Blackwell and the Catholics who submitted to the decision of the Holy See. In Austria the efforts of the pope were directed to healing the disputes among the Catholics and to giving moral and material aid to the Catholic Union. He survived the battle of Prague, which put an end to the short reign of the Calvinistic "winter-king." Paul V was no more free from nepotism than the other pontiffs of that century. But if he seemed to show too many favours to his relatives, it must be said that there were capable men of humble birth who devoted their large revenues to the embellishment of Rome. Paul had the honour of putting the finishing touches to St. Peter's, which had been building for a century. He enriched the Vatican Library, was fond of art, and encouraged Guido Reni. He canonized St. Charles Borromeo and St. Frances of Rome, and beatified Sts. Ignatius Loyola, Francis Xavier, Philip Neri, Theresa the Carmelite, Louis Bertrand, Thomas of Villanova, and Isidore of Madrid. During his pontificate a large number of new institutes for education and charity added new lustre to religion. His remains were placed in the magnificent Borghese chapel in St. Mary Major's, where his monument is universally admired.

Paula, Saint, b. in Rome, 317; d. at Bethlehem, 384. She belonged to one of the first families of Rome. Left a widow in 379 at the age of 32 she bore, though the influence of her brother and the model of Christian widows. In 382 took place her decisive meeting with St. Jerome, who had come to Rome with St. Epiphanius and Paulinus of Antioch. These two bishops inspired her with an invincible desire to follow the monastic life in the East. After their departure from Rome and at the request of Marcela, Jerome gave readings from Holy Scripture before the group of patrician women among whom St. Paula held a position of honour. Paula was an ardent student. She and her daughter, Eustochium, studied and mastered Hebrew perfectly. By their studies they aimed not so much to acquire knowledge, as a fuller acquaintance with the Christian Scriptures. She did not, however, neglect her domestic duties. A devoted mother, she married her daughter, Paulina (d. 395), to the senator Pammachius; Blesilla soon became a widow and died in 384. Of her two other daughters, Rufina died in 386, and Eustochium accompanied her mother to the Orient where she died in 419. Her son Toxotius, who was married in 389 Lata, daughter of the pagan priest Albinus. Of this marriage was born Paula the Younger, who in 414 rejoined Eustochium in the East and in 120 closed the eyes of St. Jerome. These are the names which recur frequently in the letters of St. Jerome, where they are inseparable from that of Paul.

The death of Boethius and that of Pope Damasus in 386 caused an event which changed the manner of life of Paulus and Jerome. In September, 385, Paula and Eustochium left Rome to follow the monastic life in the East. Jerome, who had preceded them thither by a month, joined them at Antioch. Paula first made in great detail the pilgrimage of all the famous places of the Holy Land, afterward going to Egypt to be edified by the virtues of the anchorites and cenobites, and finally took up her residence at Bethlehem, as did St. Jerome. Then began for Paula, Eustochium, and Jerome their definitive manner of life. The intellectual and spiritual intercourse among these holy persons, begun at Rome, continued and developed. Two monasteries were founded, one of men, the other of women. Paula and Eustochium took a larger share in the exegetical labours of Jerome, and conformed themselves more and more to his direction. An example of their manner of thinking and writing may be seen in the letter they wrote from Bethlehem around 386 to Marcella to persuade her to leave Rome and join them; it is Letter XLI of the correspondence of Jerome. But God was not sparing of trials to His servants. Their peace was disturbed by constant annoyances, first the controversy concerning Origenism which disturbed their relations with John, Bishop of Jerusalem, and later Paula's heavy money, she having been ruined by her generosity. She died in the midst of these trials and good. It is the testimony of an historian of the prayers of Paula's life is the correspondence of St. Jerome (P. L., XXII). The Life of St. Paula is in Letter CVIII, which, though somewhat rhetorical, is a wonderful production. The other letters which specially concern St. Paula and her family are XXII, XXX, XXXI, XXXIII, XXXVIII, XXXIX, LXVI, CVIII.

Pauli, Johannes, b. about 1455; d. after 1530 in the monastery at Thann in Alsace. What little is known of his life rests upon unreliable information. Ludwig von Pastor rejects the story that he was of Jewish descent, and baptised at an early age, taking the name of Johannes Pauli from his godfather (see below). Pauli became Master of Art in Strasbourg and entered the Franciscans (the "Barefooted"), and delivered his first sermon in Thann in 1479. Two years later, he was sent to the convent at Oppenheim; in 1501 the conventual monastery at Bern desired him as a guardian; he held the same office in Strasbourg 1500–10; in 1516 he is mentioned as preacher in Schlettstadt; later in Villingen in the Black Forest, and finally in Thann. Prompted by his acquaintance with Geler of Kaiserberg, he published in 1515 "Das Evangelienbuch"; in 1516 "Die Emsich, Buch von der Omenwiss"; in 1517 "Die Brosamlin Gellers"; in 1520 "Das Narrenschiff, aus dem Latein ins Deutsch gebracht". His own work, which assured him a lasting place in German literature, is the famous collection of fables and humorous stories "Schimpf (Scherz) und Ernst". This a genuine "folk's book", written in an easy and plain style, filled with humour and pointed satire, intended to instruct while it amused. He did not desire, as Georg Rollenhagen says in his preface to "Froschmäusler", to make people laugh "without teaching them something; his book was like the old legends and sagas, full of fabulous happenings and incidents, but written so that in them, as in a comedy, there are combined with poetry and imagination the plain, unvarnished, briter truths of life, worked so as to tell serious things in a jovial manner, with a laugh and a smile." Pauli drew his information from a variety of sources, and his fables became the inspiration of the later German poets, especially for Heinrich Sachse. His influence was wide upon the culture of the whole century.

Paulicians, a dualistic heretical sect, derived originally from Manichaeism. The origin of the name Paulician is obscure. Gibbon (Decline and Fall, liv), says it means "Disciples of St. Paul" (Photius, op. cit., II, 11; III, 10; VI, 4). The birthplace of their founder evidently suggested this; but there is no connexion between their doctrine and his. Photius relates that a certain Manichean woman, named Kallinik, sent her two sons Paul and John to Armenia to propagate this heresy; the name is corrupted from Kallinikos (Friedrich, op. cit., 1). The existence of such a person, both in Armenia and in India, is denied. "It is only of the authority, Ter Mrktischian (Die Paulicianer, 63), says the name is an Armenian diminutive and means "followers of little Paul", but does not explain who little Paul may be. It occurs first in the Acts of the Armenian Synod of Dun in 719, a canon of which forbids any one to spend the night in the house of "the wicked heretics called Polikian" (Ter Mrktischian, 62).

1. Doctrine.—The cardinal point of the Paulician heresy is a distinction between the God who made and governs the material world and the God of heaven who created souls, who alone should be adored. They thought all matter bad. It seems therefore obvious to count them as one of the many neo-Manichaeans sects, in spite of their own denial and that of modern writers (Ter Mrktischian, Conybeare, Adieney, loc. cit.; Harnack, "Lehrbuch der Dogmenkunde", Tübingen, 1909, II, 528). But there is a strong Manichean element too. They rejected the Old Testament; there was no Incarnation, Christ was an angel sent into the world to die for man's redemption by God; they abjured the cross. Though they held the Eucharist, they did not give bread and wine as symbols of the body and blood of Christ. They rejected the Old Testament; there was no Incarnation, Christ was an angel sent into the world to die for man's redemption by God; they abjured the cross. Though they held the Eucharist, they did not give bread and wine as symbols of the body and blood of Christ. They were iconoclasts, rejecting all pictures. Their Bible was a fragmentary New Testament. They rejected St. Peter's epistles because he had denied Christ. They adhered always to the "Gospel and Apostle", apparently only St. Luke and St. Paul, though they quoted other Gospels in controversy.

The whole ecclesiastical hierarchy is bad, as also all Sacraments and ritual. They had a special aversion to monks. Their own organization consisted first of the founders of their sect in various places. These were apostles and prophets. They took their names after people mentioned by St. Paul, thus Constantine called himself Silvanus; apparently they claimed to be the third person of the Trinity. Usually, they apostles and prophets were "fellow-workers" (evangelistai) who formed a council, and "notaries" (tathigous), who looked after the holy books and kept order at meetings. Their conventicles were called, not churches, but "prayer-houses" (prosagag). They maintained that it was lawful to conceal or even deny their ideas.
for fear of persecution; many of them lived externally as Catholics. Their ideal was a purely spiritual communion of faithful that should obliterate all distinctions of race. Their enemies accuse them constantly of gross impiety, even at their prayer-meetings. One of their chief leaders, Banaas, seems to have acquired as a recognized surname the epithet "filthy" (ματιανός, or "paganized"), perhaps perchance for themselves than "Christians"; the Catholics were "Romans" (Ῥωμαίοι), that is, people who obey the Roman emperor, as the Monophysites called their opponents Melchites. Harnack sums them up as "dualistic Puritans and Individualists" and as "an anti-hierarchical Christianity built up on the Gospel, and especially emphasized to the exclusion of Catholic Christianity" (Dogmengeschichte, II, 528).

Since Gibbon the Paulicians have often been described as a survival of early and pure Christianity, godly folk who hung to the Gospel, rejecting later superstitions, who were grossly calumniated by their opponents. Conybeare (op. cit.) thinks they were a continuation of the Adoptionists. Dr. AIRy calls them "in many respects Protestants before Protestantism" (The Greek and Eastern Churches, 219). This idea accounts for the fact that the sect has met among modern writers with more interest and certainly more sympathy than it deserves.

II. History.—Constantine of Manannah, calling himself the successor of Sergius, founded what appears to be the first Paulician community at Kibossa, near Colonia in Armenia. He began to teach about 657. He wrote no books and taught that the New Testament as he presented it (his "Gospel and Apostle") should be the only text used by his followers (Georgeios Monachos, ed. Friedrich, 2). The other Paulician Apostles after Constantine of Armenia (called Titus), sent by the emperor Constantine Pogonatus (665-85) to put down the sect, but converted to it; then Gegnesin an Armenian (Timothy); Joseph (Euphrasidius); Zachary, who was rejected by many and called a heretic; Baines; Sergius (Tychicus). They founded six congregations in Armenia and Pontus, to which they gave the names of Pauline Churches (Kibossa was "Macedonia"; and so on).

Constantine-Silvanus, after having preached for twenty-seven years and having spread his sect into the Western part of Asia Minor, was arrested by the Imperial authorities (by Symeon), tried for heresy and burnt to death. In 690 Symeon-Titus himself, having become a Paulician, was sent by the emperor to execute others. The history of these people is divided between their persecutions and their own quarrels. An Armenian Paul (thought by some to have given his name to the sect) set up a congregation at Epipharis in the Armenian district Phanarca (d. c. 715). His two sons Gegnesin-Timothy and Theodore quarrelled about his succession. Gegnesin went to Constantinople in 717 and persuaded the emperor Leo III and the patriarch Germanus I that he was orthodox. Armed with an imperial safe-conduct he came to Manannah and succeeded in crushing Theodore's opposition. After his death his son Zachary (the "hiring-soldier") called Euphrasidius again quarrelled and formed parties as to which should succeed. Zachary's party went under; many of them were destroyed by the Saracens.

Joseph (d. 755) founded communities all over Asia Minor. Then came Banes (Vahan; d. 801). Under him the sect decreased in numbers and influence. But a few Paulicians in Thrace, who had reformed and strengthened the movement in his party. The Paulicians were now either Baines (the old party), or Sergius: the reformed sect. Sergius was a zealous propagator of the heresy; he boasted that he had spread his Gospel "from East to West, from North to South" (Petrus Nissi, "Historia Manichaeorum", op. cit., 45). The Sergius meanwhile fought against their rivals and nearly exterminated them. From the Imperial government the Paulicians met with alternate protection and persecution. Constantine IV, and still more Justinian II, persecuted them cruelly. The first Iconoclast emperors (Leo III and his successors) protected them; Conybeare counts these emperors as practically Paulicians themselves (op. cit., 45). The Paulicians continued to offer service as soldiers in Phrygia and Lycocena. Michael I began to persecute again and his successor Leo V, though an iconoclast, tried to refute the accusation that he was a Paulician by persecuting them furiously. A great number of them at this time rebelled and fled to the Saracens. Sergius was killed in the battle. Theodore continued the persecution; hence a second rebellion under one Karbeas, who again led many of his followers across the frontiers.

These Paulicians, now bitter enemies of the empires, were encouraged by the khalif. They fortified a place called Tephrake, and made it their headquarters. From Tephrake they made continual raids into the empire; so that from this time they form a political power, to be counted among the enemies of Rome. We hear continually of wars against the Saracens, Armenians, and Paulicians. Under Basil I the Paulician army invaded Asia Minor as far as Ephesus, and almost to the coast opposite it; but they were defeated, and Basil destroyed Tephrake in 871. This eliminated the sect as a military power. Meanwhile other Paulicians, heretics but not rebels, lived in groups throughout the empire. Constantine V had already transferred large numbers of them to Thrace; John I Tzimiskes sent many more to the same part to defend it against the Slavs. They founded a new centre at Philippiopolis, from which they terrorized their neighbours. During the ninth and tenth centuries these heretics in Armenia, Asia Minor, and Thrace constantly occupied the attention of the government and the Church. The "Sclerics", converted by the Patriarch Methodius I (842-46), were Paulicians. Photius wrote against them and his Encyclped (866) that he has converted a great number. In Armenia the sect continued in the "Thompsonetzi" founded by a certain Smbat in the ninth century. Conybeare attributes to this Smbat a work, "The Key of Truth", which he has edited. It accepts the Old Testament and the Sacraments of Baptism, Communion, and Confirmation, but especially has persuaded many writers that the Paulicians were much unlearned people. But in any case it represents a very late stage of their history, and it is disputed whether it is really Paulician at all. Constantine IX persuaded or forced many thousands to renounce their errors.

The emperor Alexis Comnenus is credited with having put an end to the heresy. During a residence at Philippiopolis he argued with them and converted all, or nearly all, back to the Church (so his daughter: "Alexiscs", XV, 9). From this time the Paulicians practically disappear from history. But they left traces of their heresy. In Bulgaria the Bogomile sect, which lasted through the Middle Ages and spread to the West in the form of Cathari, Albigenses, and other Manichean heresies, is a continuation of Paulicianism. In Armenia, too, similar sects, derived from them, continue till our own time.

There were Paulician communities in the part of Armenia occupied by Russia after the war of 1829-29. Even in Turkey there were sects, which had reformed and strengthened the movement in party. Their professions of faith and disputations with the Gregorian bishop about 1837 (Key of Truth, xxiii—xxvii). It is from these disputations and "The Key of Truth," that he draws his picture of the Paulicians as simple, godly folk who had kept an earlier (sc. Adoptionistic) form of Christianity (ibid., introduction).

III. Sources.—There are four chief documents:
(1) Photius, Four books against the Paulicians(Διάγγελισ την Ανατασεως των Πολυσιων), in P. G., CH, 15-264. (2) Euthymius Zigabenus, in his "Panoplia", XXIV [P. G., CXXX, 1180], sqq., separate edition of the part about the Paulicians, ed. Gieseler (Göttingen, 1841). (3) Peter the Abbot, "Gesta regum Anglorum", ed. Gieseler (Göttingen, 1849), who identifies the author with Petrus Siculus, who wrote a "Historia Manichaeorum qui Pauliciani dicitur", first published by Rader (Ingolstadt, 1691), of which we know Gieseler considers "Concerning the Paulicians" to be merely an excerpt. (4) George Monachos, "Chronikon", ed. Müller (880-885). Of Photius's work only book I contains the history; the rest is a collection of homilies against the heresy. There is interdependence between these four sources. The present state of criticism (due chiefly to Karapet Ter-Mkrtschian) is this:—Photius's book (account 1) falls into two parts. Chapters i-xiv are authentic, xxvii a later edition. The original source of all is lost. George Monachos used this. Peter the Monk either copied George or used the original work. Photius may have used Peter (or Ter-Mkrtschian) or perhaps the original. Derived from these are Zigabenus and the spurious part of Photius's book, Bovet-Schleslenbergk, as for Phot. Theol., 3rd ed., Leipzig, 1801, xv. 55 represents the festival to Friedrich and as probably only the order of derivation as:—(1) An account contained in a MS. of the tenth century (Cod. Scolar., 1, 8, 1 fol. 164 sqq.), ed. Friedr. in the "Sitzungsbericht der Münchener Akademie", (1896), 70-81; (2) Photius, i-x; (3) George Monachos; (3) Peter the Abbot; (5) Zigabenus; (6) Photus. Paulinus, Saint, Bishop of Nola (Pontus Mezropolis Anicius Paulinus), b. at Bordeaux about 354; d. 22 June, 431. He sprang from a distinguished family of Aquitania and his education was entrusted to the poet Ausonius. He was bishop of Nola in Campania, but he soon realized that he could not find in public life the happiness he sought. From 350 to 355 he lived almost entirely in his native land. He married a Spanish lady, a Christian named Thesaria. To her, to Bishop Dolphinus of Bordeaux and his successor the Presbyter Ananias, and to St. Martin of Tours, who had cured him of some disease of the eye, he owed his conversion. He and his brother were baptized at the same time by Dolphinus. When Paulinus lost his only child eight days after birth, and when he was threatened with the charge of having murdered his brother, he and his wife decided to withdraw from the world, and to enter the monastic life. They went to Spain about 367.

At Christmas, 394, or 395, the inhabitants of Barcelona obliged him to be ordained, which was not canonical as he had not previously received the other orders. Having had a special devotion to St. Felix, who was buried at Nola in Campania, he laid out a fourth nave leading to the chapel of St. Felix in the town and built beside it a hospital. He decided to settle down there with Thesaria; and he distributed the largest part of his possessions among the poor. In 395 he removed to Nola, where he led a rigorous, ascetic, and monastic life, at the same time contributing generously to the Church, the aqueduct at Nola, and the basilica of St. Felix. He was an ascetic, and the basilica at Nola counted five naves and had on each side four additions or chapels (cubicula), and an apsis arranged in a clover shape. This was connected with the old mortuary chapel of St. Felix by a gallery. The side was richly decorated with marble, silver lamps and lustres, paintings, statues, and inscriptions. In the apsis was an image which represented the Blessed Trinity, and of which in 1512 some remnants were still found.

About 400 Paulinus was chosen Bishop of Nola. For twenty years he discharged his duties in a most praiseworthy manner. His letters contain numerous Biblical quotations and allusions; everything he published was written in good Latin, including the majority of his writings in the Biblical language. Gennadius mentions the writings of Paulinus in his continuation of St. Jerome's "De Paulinus, Saint, Archbishop of York, d. at Rochester, 10 Oct., 641. He was a Roman monk in St. Andrew's monastery at Rome, and was sent by St. Gregory the Great in 601, with St. Wilfrid and others, to help St. Augustine and to carry the pallium to him. He laboured in Kent with the possible exception of a mission to East Anglia before 616—till 625, when he accompanied Ethelburga (Ethelburh), the sister of King Æthelwald of Kent, when she went to the North-umbrian Court to marry King Edwin, then a pagan, and to receive the pallium. He presided over the consecrated by St. Justus, Archbishop of Canterbury. He was successful in converting Edwin and large numbers of his people, the king's baptism taking place on 12 April, 627. With the assistance of St. Edwin, he established his see at York and began to build a stone church there. His apostolic labours in instructing and baptizing the people of the north country were unceasing, and tradition perpetuates his ministry at Yeavering, Catterick Bridge, Dewsbury, Easingwold, Southwell, and elsewhere, while his own name is preserved in the village of Pullingsburn in Northumbria. On the defeat of St. Edwin in 633, Paulinus carried the queen and her children safely to York, and remained there as a missionary work impossible in Northumbria, he de-Paulinus II, Saint, Patriarch of Aquileia, b. at Ponsmaraco, near Cividale, Italy, about 730-40; d. 802. Born probably of a Roman family during Lombardic rule in Italy, he was brought up in the patriarchal schools at Cividale. After ordination he became master of the school. He acquired a thorough Latin culture, pagan and Christian. He had also a deep knowledge of jurisprudence, and extensive Scriptural, theological, and patriotic training. This learning won him the favour of Charlemagne. After the destruction of the Kingdom of the Lombards in 774, Charles the Great invited Paulinus to France in 776, to be royal master of "grammaire". He assisted in restoring civilization in the West.

In 777 Paulinus made his first acquaintance with Pepin of Poitou, Meurin, Artois, Albire, Bonna, Rieulph, Basielot, Roado, Libiis, Bassines, Fulrad, Eignard, Mabard, and Adelhart, the leading men of that age. In 785, therefore, Charlemagne entrusted Paulinus with several missions among the gift of the persecution. Fulrad, son of Minuo of Luzzarino, with a diploma dated from Ivrea, and his appointment by Charles as Patriarch of Aquileia in 787. Paulinus took a prominent part in the important matters of his day. In his relations with the churches of Istria, or with the Patriarch of Grado, the representative of Byzantine interests, he showed the greatest prudence and pastoral zeal. Paulinus obtained diplomas for the free election of the future patriarchs, and other privileges for the Church of Aquileia. He also founded the monastery of St. Mary in Orbis. He helped in preparing the new Christian legislation, and amongst the "Italic Capitularia" we find some canons of his synod.

In 799, he was present at the Council of Ratibison, which condemned the heresy of Adoptionism taught by Elipand and Felix, Bishop of Urgel. In 794 he took a leading part in the national Synod of Frankfort-on-the-Main, where Adoptionism was again condemned, and wrote a book against it, which was sent to Spain in the name of the council. Leaving Frankfort Paulinus paid a visit to Cividale and accompanied Pepin against the Avars. At Salzburg he presided over a synod of bishops, in which were discussed the evangelization of the barbarians, and baptism, as we learn from letters of Charles, Aelinu, Arno, and Paulinus. Returning from the expedition the patriarch once more opposed the Adoptionists at the Synod of Cividale in 790, Paulinus was then deposed, and the downfall of the Blessed Trinity, especially about the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son. At this synod fourteen "canons" on ecclesiastical discipline, and on the sacrament of marriage, were framed and a copy of the Acts was sent to the emperor. Paulinus is said to have assisted at the Council of Altmani, but it has not proved that a council was never held there. In 798 he was "Missus Dominicus" of Charlemagne at Pisa, with Arno and ten other bishops; and afterwards he went to Rome as imperial legate to the pope. The activity of Paulinus as metropolitan is clear from the "Sponsio Episcoporum ad S. Aquileiensem Sedem".

Among his works are: "Libelli Sacrorumlibri contra Eiphandum"; the protocol of the conference with Pepin and the bishops on the Danube, a work very important for the history of that expedition. Paulinus was also a poet, and we still possess some of his poetical productions: "Carmen de regula fidei"; the "rythms" or elegy for the death of Pepin, the "Liber martyrum", which was translated into the ninth century in German.

Klemens Loffler
Paulinus of S. Bartholomaeo, missionary and Orientalist, b. at Hof in Lower Austria, 25 Apr., 1748; d. in Rome, 7 Jan., 1806. Having entered the Carmelite Order, he was sent in 1774 as missionary to India (Malabar) and there was appointed vicar general of his order and Apostolic visitor. Reverted in 1789 to Rome to give an account of the state of that mission, he was charged with the edition of books for the use of missionaries. On account of political troubles he stayed from 1798 to 1800 at Vienna. He returned to Rome as prefect of studies at the Propaganda. Paulinus is the author of many learned books on the East, which were highly valued in their day and have contributed much to the study and knowledge of India and India literature. These are dedicated to him for the first printed Sanskrit grammar. The following are some of his more important works:

4. "Viaggio alle Indie orientali" (Rome, 1796), translated into German by Förster (Berlin, 1798).
5. "Siharum, seu Grammatica sanscridamica, cui accedit dissert. hist. crit. in linguan sanscridamicum vulgo Sanseret dictam" (Rome, 1799), another edition of which appeared under the title "Vvacaraman" (Rome, 1804).
6. "India orientalis christiana" (Rome, 1794), an improved edition for the use of missionaries.

Other works bear on linguistics and church history.

Paulinus of Antioch. See MELETUS OF ANTIOCH.

Paulinus of Pella, Christian poet of the fifth century; b. at Pella in Macedonia, but of a Bordeaise family. He was the son of an official, which explains his birth in Macedonia and his sojourn at Carthage when he was a child. He soon returned to Bordeaux. He was probably the grandson of the poet Ausonius. At the end of his life he wrote "Encharisticon Deo sub epimenidios mactatu". His autobiography is a thanksgiving, although illness, loss of property, and dangers from invasion occupy more space in it than 60 days of happiness. The account is interesting, for it presents a sincere picture of the period, and the expression of exalted sentiments. Unfortunately the style and versification do not always correspond to the sincerity and the height of inspiration. The date is uncertain. The passage which apparently gives it (474 sq.) is altered but may be between 459 and 465. The very name of the author has not been preserved by the single MS. of the poem. We know him only as Paulinus, Margarit de la Bigné, the author of the "Bibliothee Patrum" (Paris, 1579, appendix, VIII), who had handed another manuscript giving the name of Paulinus. The "Encharisticon" was published by W. Rotondo in vol. I of "Poetae Christiani minimi" (1888).

Paulists. — From the time that the abode and virtues of St. Paul the first hermit (q. v.) were revealed to St. Anthony, various communities of hermits adopted him as patron. The name Paulists, however, was also applied to the members of congregations established under the patronage of St. Paul the Apostle. (See the articles on Barnabites; Minims; Paulists; and Theatines.)

1 (1) Hermits of St. Paul of Hungary, formed in 1250 by Blessed Eugenius of Gran, of two communities, one founded at Patach in 1215 by Bishop Bartholomew of Pecs who united the scattered hermits of his diocese, and the other consisting of his own followers. In 1240 Blessed Eugenius, canon of the cathedral of Gran, resigned his dignities, distributed his goods among the poor, and withdrew to the solitude of Paulina, a forest near Zante, to lead a life of penance with a few companions. Four years later he is said to have been admonished in a vision to gather into community the other hermits living in the vicinity, for whom he built a monastery and church. In 1269 he proposed and obtained affiliation with the Pachet community under the rule prescribed by its founder, and was chosen superior. He received the approbation of Ladislaus, Bishop of Pecs, for the new congregation, but the publication of the decrees of the Lateran Council at this time necessitated a journey to Rome to secure the further sanction of the Holy See. In 1263 a new rule was given the congregation by the Bishop of Pecs, which was superseded by still another drawn up by Andrew, Bishop of Agria, after the death of Eugenius (20 Jan., 1270), and this was followed until 1308, when the permission of the Holy See was obtained to adopt the Rule of St. Augustine. The order was accorded many privileges by succeeding pontiffs, among others that of exemption from episcopal jurisdiction, and provisions were made for the pursuit of higher studies in many of the monasteries, one papal regulation ordaining that no member could be raised to any dignity in the order without the degree of Doctor of Theology, for which a rigid examination was prescribed.

The congregation spread rapidly through Hungary, where alone it soon numbered 170 houses, and it attained an equal degree of prosperity in other countries, being divided into five flourishing provinces: Hungary, Germany (including Croatia), Poland, Istria, and Sweden. In 1381 the body of St. Paul, patron of the order, was transferred from Venice to the monastery of St. Laurence in Hungary, which thereby gained greatly in prestige. Among the other famous houses of the congregation were the historical Polish monastery of Our Lady of Clarenmont (commonly called Carempt, or Caremptzov), which in the 16th century was the scene of many a sacred drama (according to legend the work of St. Luke and discovered by St. Helena with the True Cross), and the monasteries at Pressburg and Neustadt near Vienna. The church of San Stefano Rotondo at Rome was attached to the Hungarian College by Gregory XIII. In 1783 a number of houses in the countries of Styria, etc., were suppressed, and political disturbances in Hungary brought the same fate to most of the Hungarian convents, which had rendered invaluable services to religion and education. The destruction of the annals of these houses left the historical sources very meagre. There are still a few houses of the order in Germany, Switzerland, Poland, and the church connected with the monastery at Kroatz may be regarded as a national sanctuary.
Among the members of the congregation to attain prominence were George Martimuzzi, Bishop of Gros wardein and cardinal (murdered 16 Dec., 1511), an important figure in the history of Hungary; Matthias Uhrmann of Hernalis (d. 1765), historian of Austria and editor of the Acts of St. Paul of Thebes; Fortunatus Dürich (1802), and Franz Faustin Prochaska, editors, but none made the foundation of the Scriptures. The garb was originally brown, but about 1311 white was adopted, with a cincture, and over the habit a scapular with a hood. In choir a white mantle is worn.

(2) Hermits of St. Paul of France, also called Brothers of the Desert. There is much discussion as to the origin of this congregation. It is probably founded about 1620 by Guillaume Calier, whose constitutions for it were approved by Paul V (18 Dec., 1620) and later by Louis XIII (May, 1621). There were two classes of monasteries, those in the cities, obliged to maintain at least twelve members, who visited the poor, the sick, and prisoners, attended those condemned to death, and buried the dead; and the houses outside the city, with which were connected separate cells in which solitary lives, the whole community assembling weekly for choir and monthly in chapter to confess their sins. Severe fasts and disciplines were prescribed. The name of the Brothers of Death originated administratively. The thought of death was connected with the idea of prayer before the religious. At their profession the prayers for the dead were recited; their scapular bore the skull; their subscription was "Memento mori": the death's head was set before them at table and in their cells. This congregation was suppressed by Urban VIII in 1633.

3. Hermits of St. Paul of Portugal.—Among the conflicting accounts of the foundation of this congregation, the most credible seems to be that it was established about 1120 by Mendu Gomez, a nobleman of Sibon, who resigned his fief and military honours to retire to a solitude near Setubal, where he built an oratory and gave himself up to prayer and penance, gradually assuming the leadership of a number of other hermits in the vicinity. Later a community of hermits of Suarez de Ossa, the date of whose foundation is also in dispute, being left without a superior, prevailed on Mendu Gomez to unite the two communities, under the patronage of St. Paul, first hermit. At the chapter held after the death of the founder (24 Jan., 1151), Mendu was elected superior, which at a later date was approved, with some alterations, by Gregory XIII (1578), at the request of Cardinal Henry of Portugal, who also obtained for the congregation the privilege of adopting the Rule of St. Augustine. This congregation was later suppressed. Probably the most celebrated member was Antonius a Mater Dominator, a commentary on the Proverbs of Solomon.

4. Blind Sisters of St. Paul, founded at Paris in 1852, by A. F. Villeneuve (d. 1870), Anne Bergunon (d. 1869), and the Abbé Juge, to enable blind women to lead a religious life, and to facilitate the training of blind children as苜ce laic leaders. A house was established for blind women and girls with detective

5. Sisters of St. Paul of Chartres (also called to St. Maurice) known also as Hospitallers of Chartres, founded in the latter part of the seventeenth century for teaching and tending the poor and sick. After the Revolution the congregation was revived, and authorized by the Government in 1811, and soon numbered 1200 sisters and over 100 houses in England, Guadeloupe, Martinique, French Guiana, Corea, China, Japan, Further India, the Philippines, etc. In China a novitiate has been established for native subject-Kung children, besides various benevolent institutions存在着. In Further India there are thirty institutions, chiefly of a benevolent nature, in addition to a novitiate, which has already admitted a number of native postulants. In the Philippines are schools and a leper hospital.

Paul of Burgos (Paul de Santa María; Jewish name, Solomon ha-Levi), a Spanish archbishop, lord chancellor and ex cathedra, b. at Burgos about 1351; d. 29 Aug., 1425. He was the most wealthy and influential Jew of Burgos, a scholar of the first rank in Talmudic and rabbinical literature, and a Rabbi of the Jewish community. The irresistible logic of the Summa of St. Thomas led him to the Faith of Christ. He received Baptism, 21 July, 1390. His brothers Pedro Suarez and Alvar Garcia, together with his daughter and four boys, aged from three to twelve years, were baptized with him. He was ordained shortly after. Paul de Santa Maria, as he was called, spent some years at the University of Paris, where he took his degree of doctor in theology. His sincerity, keen insight into human nature, thorough education, and soul-stirring eloquence marked him out as a prominent churchman of the future. In 1405 he became Bishop of Cartagena; in 1415, Archbishop of Burgos. In 1416 King Henry of Castile named him lord chancellor. After the King's death Archbishop Paul was a member of the council which ruled Castile in the name of the regent Doña Catalina, and by the will of the deceased king he was tutor to the heir to the throne—later John II of Castile. The published writings of Archbishop Paul were: (1) "Benedixit Pauli et Salui contra Judaeos, sive Scrutinium scripurarum" (Manresa, 1175; Mainz, 1478; Paris, 1507, 1555; Burgos, 1591). (2) "Additions" to the "Postilla" of Nicholas of Lyra (Nuremberg, 1481; 1485; 1487, etc.; Venice, 1481, 1482, etc.). It is chiefly on the latter work that the attribution of additions rests. The "Additions" were originally mere marginal notes written in a volume of the "Postilla" which he sent to his son Alfonso. Their publication aroused Matthias Derang, the provincial of the Saxon Franciscans, to publish his "Replica", a bitter rejection of almost half of the 1100 suggestions and additions of his father and uncle. They were printed in 1488, and this book was a stimulus to Nicholas of Lyra in Hebrew, but not in Biblical interpretations; in fact, Paul erred in not admitting an inspired allegorical meaning of Holy Writ, prejudiced against it, no doubt, by the extravagance of Talmudic allegorical fancies. (3) "De nomine divino questiones duodecinem" (Utrecht, 1507). These treatises were excerpts from the "Thesaurus scripturarum" of Paul, directed to Exod., iii, and are joined to the scholia of J. Drusus on the correct pronunciation of the name of Jehovah. Archbishop Paul was succeeded in the See of Burgos by his second son, Alfonso.

Paul of Middelburg, scientist and bishop, b. in 1146 at Middelburg, the ancient capital of the province of Zeeland, belonging then to the German Empire, now to Holland; d. in Rome, 13 December, 1334. After finishing his studies in Louvain he received a canonry in his native city, of which he later became dean. The reason of this fact are not known, but in his apologetic letter on the celebration of Easter he calls it a usurpation, and shows great bitterness against his country, calling it "barbara Zelulide insula", "verceum patria", "cerdunum regio", etc. He then taught for a while in Louvain, was invited by the Signoria of Venice to take a chair for sciences in Padua (1480), travelled through Italy, became physician to Francesco Maria della Rovere, Duke of Urbino, and friend to Maximilian, Archduke of Austria. In 1480, Paul was endowed with the Benedicente Abbey St. Christophorus in Castel Durante (1488), and by the latter he was recommended to Alexander VI for the Bishopric of Fossombrone (Mornorii, LXXV, 314). Being nominated to that see, in 1491, he destroyed some of his treatises on mathematics and the Bible, "Epistolae de apostolatibus, in which he had censured a number of mathematicians; then a "Practica de pravis Constellationibus", and a defence of that work against the nephew of Paul II (1481); and finally an "Inventiva in superstitionem Vatam". He chose for himself an astronomical coat of arms, and, in 1497, enlarged and embellished the episcopal palace. Besides some smaller treatises against usurors and against the superstitions of a flood in 1521 (Fossombrone, 1523), he wrote important works on the reform of the calendar, which procured for him invitations from Julius II and Leo X to the Fifth Lateran Council (1512—1517). His "Epistolae de cultu temporum" (1487) was followed by an "Epistolae apologetica" (1488), and finally by his principal work "Paulina, de recta Paschal celebratione" (Fossombrone, 1513). The contents and result of the work are described under the article LITLIES. He died while assisted at the Divine Office in Rome, and was buried in St. Maria dell'Anima. His family name is unknown, but in one place he is called Paolo di Adriano (Mornorii, XLIV, 120). Scaliger, who calls him "Omnium sui seculi mathematicorum ... faciele princeps", was his godson.

J. G. HAGEN.

Paul of Samosata, Bishop of Antioch. Several synods, probably three, were held against him about 261—66. St. Dionysius of Alexandria had desired to attend the first of these, but was prevented by his infirmities. Firmilian of Casarea, St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, his brother Athanasius, and many others, were present. Paul held the civil power, and was protected by Zenobia, the famous Queen of Palmyra. He was a wealthy man, and had many obsequious followers among neighbouring bishops. Many defended his doctrine, and he declared himself orthodox. In the first meetings the bishops were satisfied. At another Paul was condemned, but promised to retract his errors. This he failed to do. A final council was summoned. Firmilian died on the way to it. The principal part was taken by a priest of Antioch, Malchion, who was an accomplished man of letters and head of the school of Greek literature at Antioch. In disputation with Paul he plainly revealed him as a Scholastic and procured his deposition. A letter written by Malchion in the name of the synod and addressed to Pope Dionysius of Rome, Maximus of Alexandria, and all the bishops and clergy throughout the world, has been preserved by Eusebius in Epigraphia I, 38. A few fragments only remain of the shorthand report of the disputation.

The letter accuses Paul of acquiring great wealth by illicit means, of showing haughtiness and worldliness, of having set up for himself a lofty pulpit in the church, and of insulting those who did not applaud him and wave their handkerchiefs, and so forth. He had caused scandal by admitting women to live in his house, and all permitted the same to his clergy. Paul could not be driven from his see until the emperor Aurelian took possession of Antioch in 272. Even then he refused to vacate the house belonging to the church. An appeal was made to Aurelian, and the pagan emperor, who was at this time favourable to Christians, decided most justly, says Eusebius (vii, 30, 19), that the house should be given up to these to whom the bishops in Italy and the city of Rome should write; evidently it had been argued before him that the question of legitimacy depended on communion with Rome, to which the former Roman bishop and pope and his council. Paul was driven out in utter disgrace by the civil power. Of his life no more is known to us. His doctrine was akin to the dynamic Monarchianism of Theodotus, and he was nicknamed a follower of Artemas. We can gather these points: the Holy Ghost born of David and the Son (S. Paulus); the Holy Ghost inspired Him from above, The Father and the Son are one and the same, without a personality of his own. Thus there are two Persons in Christ. The Logos as Wisdom dwelt in the man Jesus, as we live in houses, and worked in Him as inspiration, teaching Him and being with Him, and was united with Him not substantially (or essentially or essentially), but qualitatively (same to ), Christ; Mary did not bring forth the Word, for she did not exist before the worlds, but a man like to us. Paul denied the inference that there are two Sons. The Son of the Virgin is great by Wisdom, who dwelt in no other so.

Union of two Persons is possible only by agreement of will, issuing in unity of action, and originating by love. By this kind of union Christ had merit; He could have had none had the union been by nature. By the unchangeableness of His will He is like God, and was united to Him by remaining pure from sin. By striving and suffering He conquered the sin of our first parent, and was joined to God, being one with Him in intention and action. God chose to unveil Him to the world by the Redeemer and Saviour of the race. By the ever growing and never ceasing movement of friendship He has joined Himself to God so that He can never be separated through all eternity, and His Name is above every Name as a reward of love. Judgment is made over to Him; He may be called Son of God from the "Son of God, the Father". He is said to have pre-existent, but this means by predestination only. The baptism of Christ, as usual, was regarded by Paul as a step in His junction with the Logos. If He had been God by nature, Paul argued, there would be two Gods. He forbade hymns to Christ, and openly attacked the older (Alexandrian) interpretation of Scripture.

The party of Paul did not at once disappear. The Council of Nicea declared the baptism conferred by the Paulinists to be invalid. There is something, though not much, of his teaching in the Lucianist and Arian systems which issued from Antioch. But their Christology was the very opposite of his, which in the Creed. The Paulinists were the first to appear in a modified form in Theodore of Mopsuestia, Diodorus, Nestorius, and even Theodore, though these later Antiochenes warmly rejected the imputation of any agreement with the heretic Paul, even in Christology.

It must be regarded as certain that the council which condemned Paul rejected the term homousion, but naturally only in a false sense used by Paul; not, it seems because he meant by it an unity of Hypostasis in the Trinity (so St. Hilary), but because he intended by it a common substance out of which both Father and Son proceeded, or which it divided between them,—so St. Basil and St. Athanasius; but the question is not clear. The object of the Nicene doctrine in the fourth century made copious use of this disapproval of the Nicene word by a famous council.

The fragments are best collected by Routh, "Rel. SS." III. Further fragments in Pitra, "Analecta sacra", III-IV. The letter of St. Dionysius is spurious. That of six bishops to Paul is usually rejected, but Harnack finds it genuine, following Hagemann.

JOHN CHAPMAN.

Paul of the Cross, Saint (Paul Francis Danel), b. at Orvuda, Genoa, Italy, 3 Jan., 1694; d. in Rome, 18 Oct., 1775. His parents, Luke Daneli and Anna Maria Masseri, were exemplary Catholics. From his earliest years the crucifix was his book, and the Crucified his model. Paul received his early education from a priest who kept a school for boys, in Cremonina, Lombardy. He made great progress in study and virtue; spent much time in prayer, heard daily Mass, frequently received the Sacraments, faithfully attended to his school duties, and gave his spare time to reading good books and visiting the churches, where he spent much time before the Blessed Sacrament, to which he had an ardent devotion. At the age of fifteen he left school and returned to his home at Castellazzo, and from this time his life was full of trials. In early manhood he renounced the offer of an honourable marriage; also a good inheritance left him by an uncle who was a priest. He kept for himself only the priest's breviary.

Inflamed with a desire for God's glory he formed the idea of instituting a religious order in honour of the Passion. Vested in a black tunic by the Bishop of Alessandria, his director, bearing the emblem of our Lord's Passion, barefooted, and bareheaded, he retired to a narrow cell where he drew up the Rules of the new congregation according to the plan made known to him in a vision, which he relates in the introduction to the original copy of the Rules. For the account of his ordination to the priesthood, of the foundation of the Congregation of the Passion, and the approbation of the Rules, see PASSIONISTS. After the approbation of the Rules and the institute the first general chapter was held at the Retreat of the Presentation on Mount Argentario on 10 April, 1747. At this chapter, St. Paul, against his wishes, was unanimously elected first superior general, which office he held until the day of his death. In all virtues and in the observance of regular discipline, he became a model to his companions. "Although continually occupied with the cares of governing the religious society, and of founding everywhere new houses for it, yet he never left off preaching the word of God, burning as he did with a wondrous desire for the salvation of souls" (Brief of Pius IX for St. Paul's Beatification, 1 Oct., 1852). Sacred missions were instituted and numerous conversions were made. He was unting in his Apostolic labours and never, even to his last hour, remitted anything of his austere manner of life, finally succumbing to a severe illness, worn out as much by his austerities as by old age.

Among the distinguished associates of St. Paul in the formation and extension of the congregation were: John Baptist, his younger brother and constant companion from childhood, who shared all his labours and sufferings and equalled him in the practice of virtue; Father Mark Aurelius (Pastorelli), Father Thomas Struzzieri (successively Bishop of Amelia and afterwards of Todi), and Father Fulgentius of Jesus, all remarkable for learning, piety, and missionary zeal; Venerable Strambli, Bishop of Macerata, and Tolentino, his biographer. Constant personal union with the Cross and Passion of our Lord was a prominent feature of St. Paul's sanctity. But devotion to the Passion did not stand alone, for he carried to a heroic degree all the other virtues of a Christian life. Numerous miracles, besides those special ones brought forward at his beatification and canonization, attested the favour he enjoyed with God. Miracles of great abundance were attributed to his intercession, the sufferers seemingly hardened and hopeless. For fifty years he prayed for the conversion of England, and left the devotion as a legacy to his sons. The body of St. Paul lies in the Basilica of SS. John and Paul, Rome. He was beatified on 1 October, 1852, and canonized on 29 June, 1867. His feast occurs on 28 April. The tradition of hisANCHORITE manner of life and of his Labours in Italy during his life, increased after his death and spread into all countries. Great devotion to him is practised by the faithful wherever Passionists are established.

ARTHUR DEVINE.

Paul the Hermit, Saint—There are three important versions of the Life of St. Paul: (1) the Latin version (H) of St. Jerome; (2) a Greek version (b), which is either a translation of H or an amplification of b by means of H. The question is whether H or b is the original. Both a and b were published for the first time by Bidez in 1900 ("Deux versions grecques inédites de l'histoire Pompe de Théba"), Ghent). Bidez maintains that H was the original, and that it has been abridged by Nau, who makes b the original in the "Analect. Bolland." of 1901 (XX, 121-157). The Life, minor details excepted, is the same in either version.

When a young man of sixteen Paul fled into the desert of the Thebaid during the Decian persecution. He lived in a cave in the mountain-side till he was one-hundred-and-thirteen. The mountain, adds St. Jerome, was honeycombed with caves.

When he was ninety St. Anthony was tempted to vain-glory, thinking he was the first to dwell in the desert. In obedience to a vision he set forth to find his predecessor. On his road he met with a demon in the form of a centaur. Later on he spied a tiny old man with horns on his head. "Who are you?" asked Antony. "I am a centaur, one of those whom the heathen call satyrs, and by them were snared into idolatry." This is the Greek story (b) which makes both centaur and satyr unmistakably demons, one of which tries to terrify the saint, while the other acknowledges his demon. With St. Jerome the centaur may have been a demon; and may also have been "one of those monsters of which the desert is so prolific." At all events he tries to show the saint the way. So far as the story it is a harmless little mortal deputed by his brethren to ask the saint's blessing. One asks, on the supposition that the Greek is the original, why St. Jerome changes devils into centaurs and satyrs. It is not surprising that stories of St. Anthony making false ascriptions in his mysterious journey should spring up among people with whom belief in such creatures lingered on, as belief in fairies does to the present day. The stories of the meeting of St. Paul and St. Anthony, the raven who brought them bread, St. Anthony being sent to fetch the cloak given him by "Athanasius the bishop" to bury St. Paul truly in St. Paul's death before he returned, the grave dug by lions, are among the familiar legends of the Life. It only remains to add that belief in the existence of St. Paul seems to have existed quite independently of the Life. Besides the writings of Boezio and Nau, see Butler, Lives of the Saints, etc., p. i, p. 289, where he criticizes Ambrose's view that the Coptic version published by him was the original (Ambrose's view seems to have taken no supporters), and maintains the claim of the Latin. In Journ. of Theol. Studies, III, 152, there is a notice concerning Bidez where Ambrose again expresses the same opinion, a little later in a notice concerning Nau (ibid., V, 151), while still meaning to his old opponents. He says that after publishing Nau he is "unable to arrive at a decision." The Hollanders (1, 162) gave a Latin translation of a Greek version (the original will be found in Angel. Bat., XI, 563), maintaining it was the original. Furmann in 1730 (Acta Sancra S. Pauli, etc.) published, as the original, another Greek version.

Paul the Simple, Saint.

-The story of Paul, as Palladius heard it from men who had known St. Anthony, was as follows: Paul was a husbandman, very simple and guileless. One day, on discovering the infidelity of his wife, he set off to be a monk. He knocked at the door of St. Anthony's cell. This is the substance of the dialogue which ensued: A. "What do you want?" P. "To be a monk." A. "It is quite impossible for you, a man of sixty. Be content with the life of a labourer, give thanks to God." P. "Whatsoever you teach me I will do." A. "If a monk you must be, go to a cenobium. I live here alone eating once in five days." With this St. Anthony shut the door, and Paul remained outside. On the fourth day St. Anthony, fearing lest he should die, told him to come in. He set him to work weaving a rope out of palm leaves, made him undo what he had done, and do it again. When it was evening he asked him if he was ready to eat. Just as St. Anthony liked, was the reply. St. Anthony produced some crusts, took one himself, and gave the old man three. Then followed a long grace—one Psalm said twelve times over, and as many prayers. When each had eaten Paul was told to take another. P. "If you do, will if you don't, I won't." A. "I am a monk, and one is enough for me." P. "It is enough for me, I am going to be a monk." Then came twelve prayers and as many Psalms, followed by a little sleep till midnight, and then again psalms were recited till it was day. Finally he was instructed that Paul must go to deliver his letter to a friend. After he had lived with Anthony some months, the saint gave him a cell for himself some miles from his own. In a year's time the grace of healing and casting out devils was bestowed upon Paul. Then follows a story of how he was able to exorcise a fiend over whom even St. Anthony had no power.

The story of St. Paul in the "Hist. monachorum" is, as regards substantial facts, much the same as that of "Palladius", but the atmosphere is different. In "Palladius" St. Anthony is the living saint, and in "Historia" he is a kind of abbot of hermits. In "Palladius" he is reluctant to accept Paul; in the "Historia" he invites him to be a monk. In "Palladius" St. Anthony's purpose is to show Paul just what a hermit's life really was; in the "Historia" he subjects him to the rather conventional kinds of tests which any abbot might apply to any penitent. The difference seems to amount chiefly to this:—"Palladius" apparently places the story in the time before, and the "Historia" after St. Anthony began to have disciples. For different anecdotes concerning Paul the reader may be referred to Butler's "Lives of the Saints" or to Tillemont.

BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, I, 103; TILLEMONT, H. E. V. 141; BIDGE, Paradise of the Holy Fathers, I, 125 seq. (the story given in the last is a translation of Palladius).

Paulus Diaconus, also called Casinensis, Levita, and Varnerfidi, historian, b. at Friuli about 720; d. 13 April, probably 799. He was a descendant of a noble Lombard family; and it is not unlikely that he was educated at the court of King Ratchis at Pavia, under the direction of Flavianus the grammarian. In 763 we find him at the court of Duke Archis at Benevento, after the collapse of the Lombard kingdom, a monk in the monastery of Monte Cassino, and in 782 in the suite of Charlemagne, from whom he obtained by means of an elegy the release of a brother taken prisoner in 776 in consequence of the Friuli insurrection. After 787 he was again at Monte Cassino, where in all probability he died. His first literary work, evidently while he was still at Benevento, and done at the request of the Duchess Adeleperga, was the "Historia Romana" (ibid., V, 186). He published an English version of the Roman history of Eutropius, whose work he continued independently in Books XI to XVI, up to the time of Justinian. This compilation, now of no value, but during the Middle Ages diffused in many manuscript editions and frequently consulted, was edited with the work of Eutropius by Droysen in "Mon. Germ. Hist. Auct. antiqui," II (1879), 4-224. Furthermore, at the instance of Angilram, Bishop of Metz, he compiled a history of the bishops of Metz "Liber de episcopis Mettensisibus", or "Liber de ordine et numero episcoporum in civitate Mettensi" extending to 766, in which he gives a circumstantial account of the family and ancestors of Charlemagne, especially Arnulf (P. L., XCV, 690-722).

The most important historical work which has come down to us from his pen is the history of the Lombards, "Historia gentis Langobardorum. Libri VI", the best of the many editions of this work being that of Bethmann and Wetz in "Mon. Germ. Hist. Script. rerum Langobardarum", I (1846). After he had lived with Anthony some months, the saint gave him a cell for himself some miles from his own. In a year's time the grace of healing and casting out devils was bestowed upon Paul. Then follows a story of how he was able to exorcise a fiend over whom even St. Anthony had no power.
simple diction the most important facts, and preserving for us many ancient myths and popular traditions replete with an enthusiastic interest in the changing fortunes of the Lombard people. That this work was in constant use until well into the fifteenth century is evident from the numerous manuscript copies, excerpts, and continuations extant. In addition to these historical works, Paulus also wrote a commentary on the Rule of St. Benedict, and a widely used collection of homilies entitled "Homiliarium", both of which have been preserved only in revised form. Several letters, epistles, and poems are still extant, and have been edited by Dümmler in "Mon. Germ. Hist.; Poetae lat. aevi Carolini", I, 1881, and "Deutschlands kirchlichen kirchlichen Leben und Schriften und der geschichtlichen Beschreibung der Landesorden in Archiv der Gesellschaft für deutsche Geschichte", I, 1872; and "Wahre Geschichten deutscher Geschichtsquellen", I (Berlin, 1893), 163-71; Portrait, Bildbogen historica, II (Berlin, 1896), 890-905.

PATRICIUS SCHLACHTER.

Paulus Venetus, theologian of the Hermits of the Order of Saint Augustine, b. according to the chronicles of his order, at Udine, about 1308; d. at Venice, 15 June, 1328. He made his religious profession in the Convent of Saint Stephen, Venice, whence the name. Venetus is said to have been sent to Padua for his studies in theology, but returned to Italy, and finished his course at Padua. He lectured in the University at Padua during the first quarter of the fifteenth century. His writings, aside from any question of their present worth, show a wide knowledge, and interest in the scientific problems of his time. Besides the usual lectures on the four books of "Sententiae" sermons, and instructions, he wrote: "De Conversione B. Mariae Virginis", "De quadratura circuiti", "De circulis componentibus munich", "Logica parva et logica magna". This last, also known as "Logica Duplex", was largely used as a textbook during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and was several times translated. A nucleus was used by the theologians called to Rome in 1477, by Mart. V, to take cognizance of the charges brought against St. Bernardine of Siena, occasioned by the preaching of the "new devotion" to the Holy Name.

Pavia, Diocese or (Pavia), in Lombardy, Northern Italy. It is situated in a fertile plain; the city is connected with Milan by the Naviglio canal. It was once famous for the manufacture of organs. Of its many medieval towers, which gave to it the name of "city of the hundred towers", few remain; a covered bridge dating from the fourteenth century is worthy of note. The cathedral was built by Bocchi and Onodes in 1185 on the site of the churches of San Stefano and Santa Maria del Popolo; it contains paintings by Crespi, Gatti, and others; a beautiful silver reliquary of the Holy Thorn, and a carved pulpit by Zanella; the altar of St. Syrus, in the crypt, is by Orseolo. The Church of San Pietro in Ciel d'Oro is the former cathedral, restored in the twelfth century; the present name is from the golden background of its mosaics; the body of St. Augustine is preserved in this church; King Luitprand brought it here from Sardinia and concealed it. It was rediscovered in 1695 in a casket of lead and silver, within a marble enclosure; there were lengthy proceedings for its identification; the mosaics are the only complete production of the thirteenth century, ordered by the prior Bonifacio, of the family of the marquesses Bottigello; it is adorned with 95 mosaics. Boethius is also buried here. Other churches are: Santa Maria del Carmine (1220); a Gothic structure, contains beautiful painting by Sanzio of Francavilla (1492); Santa Maria di Grancia (1292), planned by Bramante, an octagonal building with a cupola and beautiful frescoes, contains the mausoleum of the Duke of Brunswick; San Teodoro, Lombard period, under its altar are St. Theodore's relics; San Michele Maggiore (seventh century), where the kings were crowned, the most notable monument of Lombard architecture, contains a crucifix of the eighth century; San Martino, built by King Astolfo, and restored in 1581; St. Pync and Feliciano; Santa Maria in Bethlem, a Lombard structure; San Salvatore (seventh century), contains tombs of several Lombard kings; San Linnfranco (1257), contains the tomb of its patron saint, made by order of Cardinal Pallavicino in 1389. Outside the city is the famous Certosa, founded by Gian Galeazzo Visconti (1484); the church, unlike the others, is covered with a beautiful variety of stone and sculpture; it is divided into three naves by Gothic pillars; the quadriportico of the altar of the side chapels are all of costly mosaics; the paintings are mostly by Borgognone, although there are some by Pergamo, Mantegna, Perdione, and others; the choir-stalls are of inlaid work; the tomb of Gian Galeazzo and the figures taken from the tombs of Lodovico il Moro and of his wife are the most beautiful productions of Lombard sculpture.

Among the secular buildings are: the Castello Visconti (1250), despised by Louis XII, who carried away its library; the university, which grew out of the famous seminar schools and the law school, was founded by Lombard law, enlarged by Maria Theresa and Joseph II, with several colleges connected with it, viz. the Gishieri college (St. Pius V), the Borromeo college (St. Charles), the Gandini college (St. Augustine), and others; and the Museo Civico has a picture gallery, a library, and a collection of copper engravings.

Pavia is the ancient Tivinum, founded by the Latins and Marci, two Ligurian peoples; at a date not well determined it came under Roman power, and was given to the Papal tribe, whence the name of Pavia, which, however, does not occur before the time of Paulus Diaconus. In the 3rd century, Emperor Aurelian reflected there a decisive defeat upon the Alamanni; the city was destroyed by Marci (452); Odoacer, however, transformed it into a stronghold, and stationed there his Heruli and Rugii; Theodoric built a royal palace at Pavia, also an amphitheatre, thermal etc. Throughout the Gothic War, the city was held by the Goths, although they were defeated in a battle near there in 773. Pavia resisted Alberic, king of the Lombards, for three years, and then became the capital of the Lombard Kingdom, and when it was taken from the Lombards by Charlemagne (battles of Pavia in 754, 755, and 774), it remained the capital of the Kingdom of Italy, where the diets of that realm were held. In the tenth century, the Hungarians brought devastation upon the city on several occasions, especially in 921. The schools of Pavia were famous in the time of Charlemagne, who took from there the grammarian Peter Pisanus; in 828 a palatine school was established in the monastery of San Agostino, under the Irishman Donalbain. In 800, when the processions of the Holy Trinity were held in Pavia, when Emperor St. Henry II, after defeating Aribert of Ivrea in 1001, was crowned King of Italy at Pavia, the citizens rose against him, and set fire to the town. At his death they destroyed the imperial palace, and resisted Conrad the Slav for two years. The republican Government of the city began at this time, but the period of continual wars against neighbouring cities continued: Milan (1061, 1100), Piacenza, Tortona (1100); Pavia, however, was almost always in alliance with Cremona. On the other hand, it gave assistance to Milan in 1110 against Emperor Henry V, and also in the war of Como, 1127, but from the beginning of the reign of the French kings, Pavia and the other cities and principalities emperors were prodigal in bestowing rights and privileges upon the city, e.g. allowing it to elect its own consuls. The coins of Pavia were in great demand, while its agriculture and its industries flourished. The city was able in war-time to arm 15,000 infantry and 3000 cavalry, and Pavia remained Guibelino's capital even under Frederick II (1227), and in 1241 its forces defeated the Pontifical Crusaders under Gregorio da Montelongo. In the second half of the thirteenth century contentions for the lordship of the city arose between the Langescos and the Becarian families; and this made it possible for Matteo Visconti (1315) to occupy the town, for which, however, the marcheeses of Montferrat also contended, until Galeazzo II Visconti in 1359 suppressed the brief popular government that was established by the Augustinian preacher, Jacopo Bussolari (1356-59). From that time on, Pavia belonged to the Duchy of Milan; the Storzas, however, gained the freedom of its own. In 1399 Louis XII took the city, and thereafter severely punished an insurrection of the town against him. In 1524 Pavia was again besieged unsuccessfully by the French; and, in the following year, the battle that decided the Spanish domination of Milan was fought there, for the taking of Pavia by Lannoy in 1527 had no important consequence. The town underwent another siege by the French in 1635. It was taken by the Austrians in 1706, and again by the French in 1733 and in 1745; the latter, however, were obliged to leave it to the Austrians in 1746, and Pavia followed the fortunes of Lombardy. In 1736, Joseph II established there one of the so-called "general seminaries," suppressed in 1790.

Pavia is the birthplace of: the historian Liutprand, Bishop of Cremona; St. Bernardo Balbi, a collector of decreals; the painter Andrea d'èllesia, a contemporary of Giotto; the canon Zanella, inventor of the bassoon. The Gospel was brought to this city by St. Syrus, according to legend a disciple of St. Peter, but according to the martyrology of Aelon, on the authority of an Aquileian martyrology, he was sent by St. Hermagoras, first Bishop of Aquileia. Advertising that Eumenius, present at the Council of Aquileia in 351, was the sixth Bishop of Pavia, it may well be that this diocese dates from the second half of the third century, among its other bishops were Usuciusus (before 307); St. Crispinus (132); St. Epiphanius (466), a providential blessing to Italy in the time of Theimer, Odoacer, and Theodoric; St. Maximus (496); Ennodius (511), a famous orator and poet, decorated by St. Hermidas with the pallium. After the Lombard occupation, there was also an Ariat bishop at Pavia; he had the church of San Eustacio as cathedral; the last one of these was St. Anastasius, who became a Catholic and solo bishop of the see. After him were: St. Daniannes, Biscosio (680), author of a letter against the Monothelites; Armenarius (seventh century) who contended with the Arian Bishop of Milan regarding metaphysian juridications; St. Petrus (726), a relative of King Aripert, and therefore exiled in his youth by Grimald; St. Theodorus (745), exiled for unknown reasons, returned only after the victories of Charlemagne; Waldo (791), formerly Abbot of Reichenau; St. Joannes (801); Joannes II (874), to whom John VIII gave the pallium, thereafter given to his successors; Joannes III (884), obtained the use of the cross and of the white horse; Pietro Canepanova (978), chancellor of Otto II, became Pope John XIV; Guimelio (1073), followed the antipope Guibert, and was deposited (1100), more of a warrior than a prelate; Pietro Toscano (1148), a Cistercian, friend of St. Bernard and of St. Thomas à Becket, expelled by Barbarossa, who held the Concilium of Pavia against Alexander III in 1159; St. Lannfranc (1150) and St. Bernardo Balbi (1158), famous jurists and canonists; St. Pulcro Scotti (1216); Guido de Langasco (1296), also a canonist; Ernando Tocconi, O.P., administrator of the diocese from 1311 to 1320 and imprisoned as a suspect of heresy, but acquitted; Guimelio Centuraria (1384), O. Min., noted for his apostolic zeal; Francesco Pacpaso (1427), took a great part in the Council of Basle; Giovanni Castiglioni (1434), became cardinal, and served on several occasions as pontifical legate; Cardinal Jacopo Ammannati (1440), distinguished himself in the defence of the Marches against Sigismondo Malatesta, also a protector of belles-lettres; Cardinal Ascanio Sforza (1479); Cardinal Francesco Alberio (1495), killed at Ravenna in 1511; Gian M. del Monte (1520), became Pope Julius III; Appolito de Rubeis (1561), restored the cathedral; founded the seminary, and introduced the reforms of the Council of Trent; he had disputes with St. Charles Borromeo in regard to canonical rights, and later became cardinal; St. Alessandro Sauli (1591-93); Jacopo Antonio Moriglia (1791); Lauro Tosi (1822), who gave to Grg Dupuch, Arch Bishop of Carthage, the forebear of St. Augustine; Pietro M. Forcè (1550), for two years prevented by the new Government from taking possession of his diocese; Lucido M. Parrochi (1571-77), became a cardinal and Vicar Apostolic of Rome. The councils of Pavia were held in the following years: 850, 855, 876, 879, 880, 997, 998, 1016, 1016, 1114, 1128, 1423, which last was transferred later to Pisa. The diocese is a suffragan of Milan; it has 82 parishes, 110,300 inhabitants, 4 religious houses of men, and 19 of women, 2 educational establishments for boys, 4 for girls, and 1 tri-weekly publication.

UNIVERSITY OF PAVIA—Pavia was, even in Roman times, a literary centre (Emnolus); as the capital of the Lombard kingdom it had its "grammar" schools, and Emperor Lothair erected a "central" school there (825). In the tenth and twelfth centuries there were professors of dialectic and law as well as of literature, and, although the authority of Bologna was then incontestable, the opinions of the "Papenices" were cited with respect. One of these was a certain Lanfranco. Another Lanfranco, who died bishop of the city, had been professor of arts and theology. Until 1361 there was no Studium Generalis at Pavia; whoever sought legal honours went to Bologna. There were other schools, however, at the beginning of the fourteenth century. In 1361 Galeazzo II obtained from Charles IV a studium generale with the privileges accorded to the most renowned universities. Promotions were made by the bishop, and in 1380 Boniface IX confirmed its rights and privileges. In 1398 it was transferred to Piacenza, and from 1401 to 1412 it was suspended on account of continued warfare. Re-established by Filippo Maria Visconti in 1412, it excelled in Roman Law, soon surpassing its former rival, the University of Bologna.

Among the professors of the first epoch may be mentioned: the jurists Certo, Cristoforo Castiglioni (legum monacorum); Castiglione Brandis, afterwards cardinal, founder of the Collegio Brandis; Catone Saccio, founder of a college for poor students; Giacomo del Maino the Magnificent (XV century); Andrea Alleotto (from 1516) O. Boughi, afterwards Bishop of Como, and Trivulzio Scarvarelli, afterwards cardinal. The first teacher of medicine was Augusto Tossi (from 1370); in 1389 the chair of surgery was founded. Other celebrated professors were Giorgio Bardini, who constructed the clock in the Tower of Padua; Marsiglio S. Sofia (medicinae monacorum, XIV century); Francesco Vittone (1412–43), philosopher and physician; Benedetto da Norcia (1455); Gerolamo Cordano, naturalist and astrologer (d. 1576); Gabriele Carrano, first professor of anatomy. Lectures in anatomy (astronomy) were founded by Titianus Mari, bishop of Padua. The mathematician was Francesco Pellaci (1425); in the seventeenth century the professors of mathematics were often chosen from the religious, especially the Servites Fil. Ferrari (1616), and Gio. Batt. Drusiano, who first taught military architecture (1615) and assisted in the defense of the city during the French siege of 1635.

Highly distinguished professors were taught from 1674, the professors of which also taught medicine; in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the professors were mostly religious. The study of rhetoric and the classics began in 1389, and in 1399 a chair of Dante was instituted and was held by Filippo da Reggio. Lorenzo Valla, Francesco Filelli, Giorgio Valla (first professor of Greek literature, 1466), and Demetrios Chalcedonius (1402) shed lustre on the university during the Renaissance. Hebrew was first taught by Benedetto di Spagna (1491); Bernardo Regazzola (1580), the Antiquary, was one of the founders of archeology. The first professor of theology was the Franciscan Pietro Petroso (1485); afterwards many of the professors were Augustinians, as Bonifacio Battigella; Alberto Crespi (1432), prominent at the Council of Basle; and Blessed Giovanni Porro, author of many commentaries on the Bible. Others were Francesco della Rovere (1444), afterwards Sixtus IV; Cardinal Gaetano (1498–99); the Orientalist Giacomo della Porta, O. P. (1751).

The fame of the university diminished greatly from 1699. In 1763 Maria Theresa reorganized the courses, especially by increasing the number of chairs and adding various institutes and collections. But the theological faculty then became a source of anti-Romanism through the professors. Thoburini and Zola, in 1589 it was suppressed. Among the professors of this second epoch were Gandoli; the gynecologist Porto; the physiologist Montezza; Cesare Lombroso; Gozzi, awarded the Nobel prize for his studies on the nervous system; in juriscudence: Giovanni Silva; Luigi Caramani (1775); Domenico Vario; Romagnesi, the reformer of public law; Thoburini and Zola; in mathematics: the Jesuit Bosinov; Mascheroni; Codazzi, renowned for his researches on heat and magnetism; in philosophy: the Olivetan Baldinotti (1783); and Ruggero Bonghi; in literature: Vincenzo Monti; Ugo Foscolo; and the Orientalist Hager. Connected with the university are a museum of mineralogy, zoology, and comparative anatomy, cabinets of physics, geology and history, chemical laboratories, a museum of experimental pathology, various climes, a chemical laboratory, and a cabinet of numismatics and archeology. There are eighteen bursaries for graduate study. Two colleges—Ghisleri and Borromeo—are under university supervision. A school of applied engineering and a school of pharmacy are also connected with the university. In 1910 there were 601 professors, holding 102 different chairs, besides 103 tutors; the students numbered 1507.

Pavillon, Nicolas, Bishop of Alet, b. at Paris, 1597; d. at Alet, 1672. He joined the community of St. Lazar, founded by St. Vincent de Paul, and, for a time, devoted himself to charities and preaching. His zeal and eloquence caused Richelieu to appoint him to the See of Alet. The thirty-seven years of his episcopate were filled with ceaseless labours for the religious and moral improvement of his diocese; visitation of parishes, holding of synods, and other ecclesiastical duties, and his most remarkable work was to expel Jansenists from his Diocese, which was a long and arduous task. He was the last of the four bishops who refused to sign the formulary imposed by Alexander VII, on the plea that the pope cannot pronounce on facts but only on rights. When Louis XIV commenced submission to the papal order, Pavillon in 'Lettres au roi' (1665) declined to recognize the privileges. The royal attempt at extending to all the provinces of France the so-called droit de règle found in Pavillon a sturdy opponent. He spurned royal threats and ecclesiastical censures and appealed to the pope against both the King of France and the Metropolitans of Narbonne.

His attitude against Alexander VII led him to the administration of St. Royal. Alet became the Mecca of the Jansenists and the bishop imitated the errors of Jansenism. From the data of a contemporary pamphlet ("Factum de Missere Vincent Ragot", Paris, 1763) Toreilles shows the strange effects of Jansenist principles on every branch of Pavillon's otherwise zealous administration, and on his relations with the nobility, the clergy, the regulars, and the peasantry. He wrote "Rituels d'Alet" (Paris, 1666), condemned by Clement IX, and "Ordonnances et status synodales" (Paris, 1675).

Pax (Osculatorium, Tabula Pacis, Lapis Pacis), a tablet to be kissed. The primitive usage in the Church was for the "holy kiss" to be given promiscuously. Later (Constantinople, VIII, xxxix) men of the holy saulty men with the kiss, while women kissed women. In the twelfth century the latter manner seems to have been maintained till the thirteenth century, when a substitute for the actual kiss was introduced in the shape of a small wooden tablet, or plate of metal (osculatorium, diaculatorium, osser ad pacem etc.) bearing an image of the Blessed Virgin, of the titular of the church, or other saint, or more frequently of the consecrator. The earliest notice of these instruments is in the records of English councils of the thirteenth century (Sechamore, "Notit. Eucharist.", 138). This departure from the prevailing usage is attributed by Cardinal Bona (Rer. Liturg., IX, vii, 57) to the Franciscans. Kissed by the celebrant and cleansed with a linen cloth, the tablet or plate was carried to others to be likewise kissed by them. This ceremony still obtains in low masses (Rubr. Mis., X, n. 3), when the peace is thus given to prelates and princes, not to others except in rare cases established by custom. The acolyte or server kneeling at the right of the celebrant presents the tablet. The celebrant, making the salutation, says: "Pax tecum"; the server answers: "Et cum spiritu tuo". The server then carries the instrument in his hands to those present, in order that they may receive the peace, saying to each: "Pax tecum"; each responds, "Et cum spiritu tuo", and then genuflects.

Pax in the Liturgy. — Pax vobis (or robiscum), like the other liturgical salutations (e.g. Dominus robi- sicum), is of Scriptural origin. The Gospels contain such forms as: "veniet pax vestra"; "pax vestra et pax robiscum ad vos" (Matt., x, 13), "Pax huic domini" (Luke, x, 5), "Pax vobis" (Luke, xxiv, 36; John, xx, 21, 26). The salutation, "Gratia vobis et pax" or "Gratia misericordia et pax", is the opening formula of most of the Epistles of St. Paul and of St. Peter, and occurs also in those of St. John as well as in the Apocalypse. The formula was quoted from the Old Testament by Our Lord and His Apostles (cf. especially "Pax vobiscum", "Pax tecum", Gen., xlii, 23; Judges, vi, 23), and was thus naturally preserved in the liturgy and in Christian epigraphy as a memorial of Apostolic times. Like the Dominus robi- sicum, it was first used in the liturgy (in the form of Pax vobis) by the Bishop in welcoming the faithful at the beginning of the Mass before the Collect or the Oratio. When the Confitetur, In- troit, Gloria in excelsis were added at a later period, the Pax vobis or the Dominus vobiscum was preserved. The form Pax vobis is now employed by bishops and prelates only — Dominus vobiscum being used by priests—at the first Collect. Hence the Dominus robi- sicum became the ordinary introduction to all the orations and most of the prayers. The Greeks have preserved the Pax omnibus or Pax vobiscum. There was formerly a certain rivalry between the two formulae, Pax vobis and Dominus vobiscum, and some counsellors (notably that of Braga in 563) ordained that both bishops and priests should employ the same form of salutation (for the texts, see the bibliography). Besides this episcopal or sacerdotal salutation, the words Pax tecum, Pax vobis, or Pax vobiscum are used in the Liturgy at the kiss of peace. On such occasions the Liturgy contains prayers or collects ad pacem (cf. Kies; Cabrol in "Dict. d'archéol. et de liturgie", s. v. "Pax tecum") or "Ad pacem", where all references are given. In the Ambrosian Liturgy, at the end of the Mass, the people are dismissed with the words: "Ite in pace" (cf. "Auctarium Sollemnese", 95). Dom Martène (op. cit. in bibliography, III, 171, 174) gives other instances of the use of the word Pax. In Christian epigraphy there is a variety of formularies: pax; in pace; pax tecum; vivas in pace; requiescant in pace; pax Christi tecum; tecum; anima deulissima requiescan pace; domini in pace; in locum requireris, lucis et pacis (from the Domini in pace in the Memento pro defunctis). Payeras, Mariano, b. 10 Oct., 1790, at Inca, Island of Majorca; d. 28 April, 1823. He received the habit of St. Francis at Palma on Sept. 8, 1791, in Spain in Feb., 1796, to join the College of San Fernando, Mexico, which provided missionaries for the Indian missions in California. He was sent to Monterey and stationed at San Carlos, 1796-1798; at Soledad, 1798-1803; at San Diego, 1803-1804; at Purisima Concepcion, 1804-1820. From July, 1815, to April, 1820, Father Payeras held the offices of president of the missions and vicerio forano of the Bishop of Sonora, to whose jurisdiction California belonged. In 1819 the College of San Fernando elected him comisario-prefecto of the missions, in which capacity he, at various times, visited the twenty missions then existing from San Diego to the Rada, a distance of more than six hundred miles. The zealous prelate also headed numerous expeditions to the territory of the savages for the purpose of finding suitable sites for new missions. Six months before his death he accompanied an expedition to the Russian settlements in the wilds of Sonoma County, and thereby most probably hastened his demise. In 1819 Fr. Payeras received the thanks of the King of Spain for his services during the Bouchard revolt. While in charge of Purisima he compiled a catechism in the language of the Indians, which was put to use but never published. "There was no fear of better and more evenly balanced ability", says H. H. Northcote. "It was impossible to quarrel with him. He had extraordinary force and endurance, as well as a voluminous writer, and withal a man of great strength of mind and firmness of character".

Pázmány, Peter, famous Hungarian ecclesiastic of the seventeenth century; b. 19 March, 1637. He was born of noble blood. His parents were Calvinists; his stepmother, who was a Catholic, turned the boy's spirit towards the Catholic Church. After making his elementary studies in Nagyvár, where two Jesuits exercised great influence over him, he went to the Jesuit college in Kőzösors. At the age of thirteen he became a Catholic, and at seventeen entered the Jesuit novitiate. Proceeding to Rome for his higher studies, he studied for four years under Bellarmine. Afterward he taught philosophy and theology in Graz and in 1601 returned to Hungary. He successively became Provost of Turóc, Bishop of Nyitra, in 1616, Archbishop of Esztergom, and lastly Cardinal Primate of all Hungary. Pázmány engaged in a literary warfare with Stephen Magyar, a Protestant preacher, who in a book entitled "The causes of the country's ruin" (Az országkatasztrófa okai), published in 1602, declared the Catholic religion to be the principal cause. Pázmány answered him in a work entitled "Reply to Stephen Magyar" (Felede Magary Istvánnak), proving that the Protestant religion, and not the Catholic, was the cause. He translated the "Institution of Christ" and also compiled a prayer-book, still in popular use. In 1605 appeared "Ten arguments proving the falsity of the present science"; in 1609, "Five famous letters to Peter Alvinczy"; in 1613 his great theological and apologetical work, "Hodogus, or Guide to God's truths" (Hodogus, vagy Isteni igaza-szövezo, Kalauz). The first part of this work was at first printed in Latin, but was soon reprinted in Hungarian. With unanswerable arguments he showed the truth of the Catholic religion, whose victory in Hungary he secured by this work. Henceforth Protestantism was reduced to personal recriminations and force of arms. In 1636 he published his sermons, which became a model for the priesthood.

Pázmány belongs to the first rank of preachers, his discourses being notable for their logic, rather than beautiful words. By his writings, preaching, but especially by his personal meetings he converted about thirty noble families (e. g. the Zrínyi, Wesselyi, Nádasdy, Rákóczi etc.). These families spent most of their fortune in converting the classes whom the Reformation had seduced from the true Faith. As archbishop, Pázmány put into effect the decrees of the Council of Trent. He introduced the Missale Romanum, and was the great apostle of the edification of the clergy. He also displayed great activity in founding schools, building many seminaries for the education of the priests and seminarians, and also many elementary and high schools. In 1623 he gave 46,000 dollars toward the building in Vienna of a seminary for Hungarians (the Pázmánium), which is to-day in a very flourishing condition. In 1626 he built a college in Pozsony, the direction of which he placed in the hands of the Jesuits. In 1646 he built an elementary school in the same place, and in 1647 he gave 333 dollars that Hungarian seminarians might be sent to Rome to finish their theological studies. In Nagyszombat he built a seminary and also a college for the children of impoverished nobles. In 1645 he founded the first Hungarian university for the furthering of Catholic ideas and his institution in Pozsony, and it is now the University of Pozsony, and is at present governed and attended by 5000 students. Pázmány ordered that the bishops every year, and the archbishops every four years, should hold a conference, and that the deans and pastors should take an examination every year. As a politician, Pázmány desired Hungary to be a kingdom with a Catholic ruler, and that Hungary and Austria should work together in all local and international matters, with Transylvania being independent. Pázmány's idea was that, with a Catholic Hungarian king, the country would be well protected from the Turks. It was to his earnest efforts that Ferdinand II was partially en- debted for his succession to the throne. In 1622 he brought together at an assembly in the city of Transylvania the inhabitants of Transylvania and Ferdinand II, religious freedom being granted to the Protestants. He battled so long and nobly for Catholicism, and his efforts were crowned with such great success that we may say that he was born in Protestant, but died in Catholic, Hungary.

Peace Congresses. I. Early History.—The genesis of the idea of a meeting of representatives of different nations to obtain by peaceful arbitration a settlement of differences has been traced to the year 1623 in modern history, to a French monk, Éméric Crucé, who wrote a work entitled "The New Cynics", a discourse showing the opportunities and the means for establishing a general peace and liberty of conscience to all the world and addressed to the monarch and the sovereign princes of the time. He proposed that a city, preferably Venice, should be selected where all the Powers had ambassadors and that there should be a universal union, including all peoples. He suggested careful arrangement as to priority, giving the first place to the pope. Two years after this publication appeared the "Paezma in Italia, Sive on the Right of War and Peace", pleading for a mitigation of some of the barbarous usages of war. William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, had a plan for the establishment of a "European Dyet, Parliament or Estates". He was followed by other writers of different nationalities.

Immediately after the conclusion of the Peace of Napoleon the First a congress of the great European powers met in Vienna, but it could hardly be called a peace congress, as its purpose was rather to adjust the boundaries and limit the sphere of influence of the different nations which had united to overthrow the French emperor. From time to time differences between individual nations or the citizens of one nation and the government of another have been settled by arbitration, but the idea of a World Congress to bring about a reduction of armament and a universal peace is of recent origin.

In 1826, a congress composed of representatives of Spanish-American countries was planned by Mexican politicians for the purpose of bringing about not only a union and close alliance for defence, but also the acceptance of friendly mediation for the settlement of disputes between them. This congress failed, as only four Spanish-American countries were represented and only one ratified the agreement. In 1831, however, Mexico took the lead and proposed a conference of American Republics "for the purpose of bringing about not only a union and close alliance for defence, but also the acceptance of friendly mediation for the settlement of disputes between them, and the framing and promulgation of a code of penal laws to regulate their mutual relations". It was not until 1843 that the Mexican proposals were taken up, and in 1847 another was held at Lima, attended by representatives of Bolivia, Chili, Ecuador, New Granada, and Peru, for the purpose of forming an alliance of American republics. The United States was invited but as it was then at war with Mexico it sent no representative. Another congress was held by representatives from the Argentine Republic, Bolivia, Chili, Colombia, Ecuador, Guatemala, Peru, and Venezuela, in 1864. An effort to hold a congress was made by the governments of Chili and Colombia in 1880, "to the end that the settlement by arbitration of each and every international controversy should become a principle of American public law." This congress failed altogether, however, owing to a war between Chili and Peru.

In 1881, the President of the United States invited the independent countries of North and South Americ peace movement. It was held in the City of Mexico, 22 October, 1901, to 31 January, 1902, a plan was adopted looking to adhesion to The Hague convention, the protocol being signed by all of the delegations except Chile and Ecuador, who subsequently gave their adhesion. The conference authorized the Governments of the United States and Mexico to negotiate with the other signatory powers for the adhesion of other American nations. At this conference the project for the arbitration of pecuniary claims was adopted, and the signatories agreed for a term of five years to submit to arbitration (preferably to the permanent court at The Hague) all claims for pecuniary loss or damage presented by their respective citizens and not capable of settlement through diplomatic channels, where they were of sufficient importance to warrant the expense of a court of arbitration.

B. Second Hague Conference.—A second international peace conference was held at The Hague from 15 June to 15 October, 1907. Forty-four States were represented, including the principal nations of Europe, North and South America, and Asia. The conference drew up thirteen conventions and one declaration. They are as follows: for the pacific settlement of international disputes; respecting the limitation of the employment of force for the recovery of contract debts; relative to the opening of hostilities; respecting the laws and customs of war on land; respecting the rights and duties of neutral nations and their ships and cargoes in war on land; relative to the status of enemy merchant-ships at the outbreak of hostilities; relative to the conversion of merchant-ships into war-ships; relative to the laying of automatic submarine contact mines; respecting bombardment by naval forces in time of war; for the adaptation to naval war of the principles of the Hague Peace Convention; relative to certain restrictions with regard to the exercise of the right of capture in naval war; relative to the creation of an International Prize Court; concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval war; and a declaration prohibiting the discharge of projectiles and explosives from balloons.

The movement towards the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration has made great advances, as will be seen by the foregoing summary. None, however, have attempted to settle by such methods any questions which may touch upon “the vital interests, the independence or the honour” of the different States.

President Taft, in a recent address, has made a plea for negotiation even of the excepted questions, so that there may be an “adjudication of an international arbitration court in every issue which cannot be settled by negotiation no matter what it involves, whether honour, territory or money.” The public sentiment of the world upon this subject is crystallizing, and another decade may witness results perhaps even more far-reaching than those that have been already attained.

Peasants, War of the (1521-25), a revolt of the peasants of southern and central Germany, the causes of which are disputed as a result of religious and political prejudice. At present the opinion prevails that the revolt was brought about mainly by economic distress. The conditions which must here be taken into consideration are the following: Up to the end of the fourteenth century the peasants enjoyed a relatively advantageous position: they cultivated their land in fee simple, but held it at a rental, either hereditary or fixed for certain periods.

Conditions,
however, grew worse. The increase of population due to prosperity coincided in point of time with the development of the economic use of money and its injurious influences. The city overshadowed the country, and at times even exerted dominion over the country districts. International economic conditions also were prejudicial to the peasant class. Large quantities of precious metals were drawn from the mines of Peru, Mexico, and Germany, so that the value of money sank about fifty per cent, while prices rose; thus in Thuringia the price of wool was doubled, and the price of merchandise was increased fivefold. On the other hand leases were not reduced or wages raised, but the lords of the land sought to make up their losses by unusually heavy taxation. They extended their authority, increased the services and burdens of the serfs, sought to annul the rights of the market associations, and to do away with the peasants' hereditary lease of their farms, only granting the lease of woodland, water, and pasture on condition of heavy rents. Roman law favoured these exactions. Moreover, the military needs and the growing costs of the local governments led to an increase of the taxes. This caused great bitterness of feeling, especially in Württemberg and Bavaria. To the burdens imposed by the landlord and the territorial sovereign were added, if possible, on top, regardless of the taxation of the poorer classes. The position of the peasants was at its worst in the very small German states, where the landlord was also the sovereign and desired to live like a prince.

Not only peasants but also cities and nobles took part in the great uprising that is known as the War of the Eighty Years. The cities and the nobles were economically connected with the peasants. Large cities, like Frankfort, Würzburg, and Mainz, joined the uprising; but economic conditions do not fully explain their action. It must be assumed, therefore, that external reasons induced the nobility and the cities to combine temporarily with the peasants in the great uprising and that the causes of discontent, which were numerous, varied in the different States. From the end of the fifteenth century great movements for political reform had been in progress, but on account of the selfish policy of the territorial princes all attempts to strengthen the central power had failed, and the Nuremberg edict of 1524 had completely paralyzed the imperial administration. Part of the rebellious districts sought to reform the empire. Political disorders were intensified by religious. For eight years Luther's attitude had disquieted the people and shaken their religious convictions to their foundations. His declarations about Christian liberty, even if meant in a different sense, increased the ferment. The opponents of the new doctrine regarded Luther, and in part still regard him, as the real instigator of the revolt; the rebels themselves appealed to him in the conviction that they were only carrying out his teachings. It is not surprising that the outbreak took place just at the end of the year 1524. The hope of a national settlement of the religious war had come to naught, and the emperor had countermanded the national council, which had been called to meet at Speyer, 1 Sept., 1524. The failure of the efforts for political and ecclesiastical reform must also be included among the causes of the outbreak. Before it is possible to pass a final judgment upon the causes, there must be a wider and more thorough investigation of the religious and intellectual life of the German people before the Reformation.

During the years 1492-1500 there had been sporadic outbreaks in Algau, Alsace, and in the Diocese of Speyer, but they had been betrayed and suppressed. The outbreak of "poor Conrad" against the extortionate taxation of Deggendorf, which was successful; and the combination of the Wendic peasants in Carinthia, Carniola, and Styria had also been crushed by the rulers and nobility of these states. The great uprising of the peasants in the second decade of the sixteenth century began in the southern part of the Black Forest. The revolt was under the daring and clear-sighted guidance of Hans Müller of Buigenbach and, as the rebellion spread over Swabia, Franconia, and Alsace, the power of the rebel leaders grew. They stirred up the people to disorder by means of nonsense contained in the so-called "Twelve Articles", of which the author is uncertain. They have been ascribed to Pastor Schappler of Memmingen, to Sebastian Lotzer, and to the Pastor of Waldshut, Balthasar Hubmaier, who was under the influence of Müntzer. Their demands were economic, social, and religious. The rate of interest, compulsory service to the lord of the manor, and legal penalties they wished mitigated. Other articles demanded the restoration of old German economic conditions, such as the unions of the old marches and the free right of pasturage, fishing, and hunting. Social reform was to culminate in the abolition of serfdom, because Christ made all men free, but obedience to the authorities appointed by God was to be maintained. As regards religion they demanded the right to choose their pastors and to guarantee that the clergy should preach the pure and true Gospel. Thus the moderate element that had a share in preparing these articles had no thought of a radical overthrow of all existing conditions. But in this case, as in all great popular upheavals, the moderation expressed in theory was not carried out.

The mobs that were commanded by the tavernkeeper George Metzler, by Florian Geyer, Wendel Hipper, Jakobin Rohrbach, and even by the knight, Gotz von Berlichingen, often indulged in an unbridled lust of murder, and the atrocities of the rebels were matched by the outrages is Count von Hellenstein on 16 April, 1525. Early in May, 1525, the peasants were everywhere victorious over the nobility. The Bishops of Bamberg and Speyer, the Abbots of Hersfeld and Fulda, the Elector of the Palatinate, and others made concessions of all kinds to their demands. The revolt, however, was at its height and its leaders thought themselves able to carry out their political aims. Several cities joined the uprising, which was to be under the direction of a vigorous and well-organized board of peasants; at Heilbronn a common chancery was to be established for all the rebel bands; the great majority of the rebels under arms were to be home and foreign, and finally the rebels sought to overthrow their real political opponents, the territorial princes. They planned to reorganize the entire constitution of the empire, a scheme that had been repeatedly discussed since the fourteenth century. The object of their plans of reform was to strengthen the empire and to weaken the power of the territorial princes. The property of the Church was to be secularized, and then used to compensate the feudal lords for the abolition of the feudal burdens. The reforms were then to be carried out under the authority of the empire, such as uniformity of weights and coinage, suppression of custom-duty, restoration of the German law in the courts, etc.

The people allied themselves with Luther and encouraged their intention to crush the rebellion. In April he had advocated peace and had distinguished between justifiable and unjustifiable demands. He now took a different view of the matter. The fanatical mobs directed by Thomas Müntzer and Heinrich Pfeifer were spreading destruction in Thuringia by fire and sword, and had destroyed the monasteries of the Harz district and the Thuringian Forest (Michaelstein, Ilsenburg, Wallenried, Kehnra, Donndorf, Rossleben, Memleben, and Reinhardtsbrunn). Luther now foresaw the overthrow of State and Church, property and family. Accordingly on 5 May he violently and persistently repudiated the teaching of Müntzer and the rebellious and robbing band of the peasants. The hordes commanded by Müntzer were defeated on 15 May, 1525.
near Frankenhausen by the confederated princes of Saxony, Brunswick, Hesse, and Mansfeld. The prophet Münzer was executed. At about the same time the uprising in southern Germany was subdued. In Alsace the peasants were conquered on 17 May by the united forces of Duke Anton of Lorraine and the Governor of Mosburg and Villingen. The German League was thrown near Sindelingen by the commander of the forces of the Swabian League. The mobs of Oedenwald and Rothenburg were utterly crushed on 2 and 4 June; and on 7 June Würzburg had to surrender. The overthrow of the peasants on the upper and middle Rhine required more twice. The rebels had tried a more orderly course in Upper Swabia, the Black Forest, and in Switzerland. The north-west and the east were entirely free from the insurrection, for at that time the position of the peasants there was more favourable. Formerly it was thought that after this uprising the condition of the peasants became worse than before, but this view is incorrect. At first, it is true, the severity of martial law had absolute sway; thus, there were 60 executions in Würzburg, and 211 in the whole of Franconia. But the period of terror had also been a lesson to the victors. The condition of the peasants did not grow essentially worse, though it did not greatly improve. Only in a few exceptional cases were reforms introduced, as in Baden (Fr. Chantry y Herrera), together constituting the Peban linguistic stock, and formerly occupying the country about the confluence of the Javari with the Amazon, in territory held by Peru, but in part claimed also by Ecuador and Colombia. In their primitive condition they resembled the neighbouring Jivaros and Panos, though of less fierce and warlike temper. They held a close friendship with the powerful Omagua of Southern Colombia, and in the eighteenth century formed an important element in the celebrated Jesuit missions of the "Mainas province" of the upper Amazon region. In 1735 (or 1736) the Jesuit Fr. Singer of the Omagua mission with a few Indian captives and Jesuit Schoolmen established himself on the Cauca and later that of the Peba, who received him with good will and presented him with their most precious gifts, viz. jars filled with the deadly curari poison used by the hunters for tipping their blowgun arrows. They allowed him to set up a cross in the village and listened with respect to his teaching. Some of both tribes avowed familiarity to him on the Omas mission of San Joaquin, but, their health suffering, they were soon brought back and established in a separate mission called San Ignacio de Pebas, which was placed in charge of Fr. Adan Viehman. Some of the kindred Cauhacah (Covachi), formerly attached to another Omagua mission, were driven back to San Ignacio, as were later the Yagua. Although nearly related, the tribes differed greatly in temperament. The Peba, according to Fr. Chantry y Herrera, were active and vigorous but rough in manner; the Cauhacah were equally rude, but more industrious; the Cauhaci were the nearest and most intelligent; while the Jivaros were the most savage. In 1754, tribal dissensions culminated in the murder of the resident missionary, Fr. José Casado, by two brothers of the Cauhacah tribe, resulting in the temporary desertion of the mission of all but a few. Fr. José de Vahamonde, a veteran of seventeen years' service in the Amazon forests, was sent to restore order, and under his kindly promises and treatment the fugitives returned and the mission doubled its former number. In spite of smallpox, other epidemic visitations, and the raids of Portuguese slave hunters from Brazil, the mission of San Ignacio de Pebas held on, but by 1770 the company of Jesuits was expelled in the suppression of the Society of Jesus. It then stood fifth in the list of 33 missions of the Mainas province, with 700 souls, Father Vahamonde being still in charge. Others of the same tribal group were at the mission of San Ignacio de Maimas, and possibly at other missions. On account of the great distance of these missions it was introduced the Quichua language of Peru as the common medium of communication. After the expulsion of the Jesuits the missions were continued under Franciscan auspices with some success. When Peru became a separate government in 1821, the missions were neglected and fell into decay. The mission Indians, who had steadily dwindled in number, became scattered and either lost their identity in the mixed population or joined their still wild forest kindred. The small town of Pebas, on the Amazon, now occupies the site of the old mission. The former tribes are extinct or assimilated, with the exception of a remnant of the Yagua, noted for their fine physique, and of the Ama, who lives in the Napo, while others dwell on the lower Javari. The greater portion of their tribe was destroyed by smallpox in 1877.

Pecham (Peccham). John, Archbishop of Canterbury, b. about 1240; d. 6 December, 1292. His birthplace was Patcham in Sussex, called in the Middle Ages Pecham (Pecham), in common with Pecham in Surrey and Kent. He received his education from the monks of Lewes, but it is doubtful whether he was a student at Merton College, Oxford. He also studied at Paris, was tutor to the nephew of H. de Andegavia, and later entered the Order of Friars Minor. He was ordained Thomas de Bagny, O.F. M., and taught divinity, being the first to dispute de Quilonet at Oxford; Pecham became ninth Provost of England (Parkinson says twelfth), and was called to Rome in 1276 and appointed lector sacri palatii. When Robert Kilwardby resigned the see of Canterbury, Edward I requested Pecham to take up the cause of Robert Burnell, Bishop of Bath and Wells, and Chancellor of England, but in January, 1279, Pecham himself was elected to that see, and consecrated by Nicholas III. He held a Provincial Council at Reading, 31 July, 1279, in which he carried out the pope's verbal instructions and published fresh enactments against abuses. In 1281 he was at another Provincial Council to Lambeth, where among other matters his solicitude for the Holy Eucharist is noteworthy. His zeal prompted him to visit every part of his province, uprooting abuses wherever he found them. He compelled the royal chapels which claimed exemption to submit to the visitation, and on this occasion he proved that he had inherited the same courage of his predecessors, yet retained the royal favour. He intervened with success in behalf of Almeric de Montfort, and had Llewellyn listened to him, he might have averted his own fate and that of his country. His suffragans complained that his zeal had about a year later he issued his “Book of Faith”. The tendency of these works afforded ground for an attack on him by the theologians and political opponent’s, and his enemies, in his trial at Westminster, 1457, accused him of heresy and his accusers to appear before him on 11 Nov. Nine books which he produced were submitted to a commission of theologians who reported adversely on them on the grounds among other reasons that he set the natural law above the authority of the Scriptures, denied the necessity of belief of Christ’s descent into hell, and belittled the authority of the papacy. On 28 Nov. Pecock was sentenced either to complete public abjuration or degradation and death at the stake. Pecock, who all his life had been defending the doctrines of the Church, though possibly in an unwise way, had no intention of a conflict with authority, and abjured first privately, then in public at St. Paul’s Cross, a list of errors must of which he had never held nor taught. The whole proceeding was illegal according to canon law, which required the authority of the Holy See for such a process. This became clear when Pecock appealed to the pope, for Callistus III sent back Bulls of restitution which were equivalent to a condemnation of the Lambeth court. Archbishop Bourchier warned them not to proceed, and the king was advised to despatch an ambassador to Rome to obtain their revocation. Unfortunately for Pecock Callistus died, and the new pope, Pius II, acting on Pecock’s confession, ordered a new trial with the express instructions that in case of conviction he was to be sent to Rome for punishment, or at least be imprisoned, and if found guilty be punished in England as the canons decreed. In this document Pecock is said to have already resigned his see of his own accord. His successor John Arundel was appointed on 26 March, 1459, which was before the arrival of the papal brief. There is no indication either that he was sent to Rome or degraded, but there is no document by which shows that he was connected with the Abbey of Thorney. There probably he died, though reports differ, but no certain account of his death has been recorded. Space does not permit a statement of Pecock’s doctrine, but his intentions were orthodox, and his indiscretions would certainly not have been visited by such severe treatment had it not been for the intrigues of his political enemies. Irregularly they forced him under fear of death a confession, which Pope Pius, taking it on its merits, naturally regarded as evidence of his guilt.

EDWIN BURTON.

PECOCK, PECOCK, REGINALD, Bishop of Chichester, b. in North Wales about 1355; d. at Thorny Abbey about 1462. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship in 1417. During the following years he taught in the schools belonging to Exeter College, obtaining a wide reputation for learning and scholarship. He was ordained priest on 8 March, 1421, and took the degree of bachelor in divinity four years later, about which time he left the university for the court where he won the favour of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester. In 1433 he was appointed master of Whitington College, London, and rector of St. Michael’s-in-Roeh. The activity of the London Lollards drew him into controversy against them and at this time he wrote “The Book, or Rule of Christian Religion” and “Done”, an introduction to Christianity, which were condemned by the pope in 1451. In 1441 he was made Bishop of St. Asaph by papal provision dated 22 April, and on 11 June he was consecrated by Archbishop Stafford. At the same time he took the degree of doctor in divinity at Oxford without any academic act. The bishop’s troubles began with a sermon which he preached at St. Paul’s Cross in 1417, which gave general offence because of his attempt to justify the bishops for not preaching. The manner of this offended both the agitators whom he attacked and the ecclesiastics whom he defended. Undaunted by the opposition, he summarized his argument in a tract called “Abbreviatio Regniuli Pecock”. It is noteworthy that he incurred in a special degree the resentment of the religious orders. It was unfortunate for Pecock that he was befriended by the unpopular Duke of Suffolk, one of whose last acts before his assassination was to procure the translation of Pecock from St. Asaph’s to Chichester, an appointment by which the bishop was attached to the falling house of Lollard, and he was among those who signed the appointment of Richard, Duke of York, as protector during the king’s illness. About 1435 he completed and published his best-known work, “The Repression of Over Much Blaming of the Clergy”, written against Lollard doctrine, and Pectoral (Creux Pectoralis) is the name of the cross used by the pope, cardinals, bishops, abbots, and other prelates entitled to use the pontifical insignia. It is worn on the breast attached to a chain or silken cord, the colour differing according to the dignity of the wearer, i.e., given, violet, or black. It is made of precious metal, ornamented, more or less, with diamonds, pearls, or similar embellishment, and contains either the relics of some saint, or a particle of the Holy Cross. It is worn over the alb during liturgical functions. The pectoral should kiss the cross before putting it on his neck, and while putting it on say the prayer, "Pectoralis" (the origin of the word dates back to the Middle Ages), in which he petitions God for protection against his enemies, and begs to hear in mind continually the Passion of Our Lord, and the triumphs of the confessors of the Faith. The pontifical pectoral cross is distinct from the simple cross, which is permitted by the pontifical bull to members of cathedral chapters. Canons, to whom this privilege has been granted, are permitted to wear the cross at choir service only, and not over the alb at liturgical services, unless specially permitted. The pectoral is the latest addition to episcopal ornaments. The custom, however, of wearing a cross on the breast either with or without holy relics, dates back to ancient times and was observed not only by bishops, but also by priests and lay people. The first mention made of the pectoral cross as a part of pontifical ornam-ent is by Innocent III, and its use as such only became customary toward the close of the Middle Ages. As an adornment for bishops we meet it the first time toward the end of the thirteenth century (Durandus), but at that time it was not generally worn by bishops. A-Durandus says: "it was left to the discretion of the individual bishop to wear or not". The Greek bishops also wear a pectoral cross but only over their liturgical vestments (chasuble or orarion).

Pectoral (Creux Pectoralis) is the name of one of the twelve tribes of Israel, whose memory was thus borne continually before the Lord by the high priest in his official functions (see Ex., xxviii, 29).

Pednelissus (Petnelisson), a titular see in Pamphylia Secunda, suffragan of Perge. In ancient times this city was a part of Pisidia. It is mentioned by Strabo, XII, 570, XIV, 667; Ptolemy, V, 5, 8; Pliny, V, 26, 1; Stephans Byzantius, s. v.; in the sixth century by Hierocles, "Syncedemenus", 681, 12, who locates it in Pamphylia. It is important for its frequent wars with Selge (Polyb.m, V, 72, 2). Its coins have two forms of the name, as above (Hed, "Historia numerorum", 391); other documents frequently give very corrupted forms. The "Notitia Episcopatum" mention the see as late as the thirteenth century; but only two bishops are known: Heracleides present at the Ecumenical Council of Constantinople, 381, and Martinus, who signed the letter of the bishops of Pamphylia to Emperor Leo (Le Quen, "Oriens christianus", I, 1023). The exact site of the city is unknown and it is identified with several localities; the most probable identification is with the remains of a group of ruins to the south of Tchauard and to the east of Kizil Keui in Pamphylia, in the field called "Pamukova (cotton field), vilayet of Koniah".

Pedro de Cordoba, b. at Cordoba, Andalusia, Spain, about 1469, d. on the Island of Santos Domingo, 1527. He studied theology at the University of Salamanca and there joined the Dominicans. About 1510 he went to Santo Domingo, founding the Santa Cruz province of the order. He was a zealous protector of the Indians and a friend of Las Casas. His book, "Doctrina cristiana para instruccion e informacion de los Indios por manera de historica" was printed in 1544 at Mexico by directions of Bishop Zumarraga. It was destined for the education of the Indians, chiefly of the islands, and is one of the earliest books of catechism known to have been composed in America. Fray Pedro was the first inquisitor appointed in the New World. He enjoyed the reputation of a model priest, highly respected by the clergy, the laity, and the Indians.

Pelagia, the name of several persons. The old Syrian martyrology (ed. De Rossi-Duchesne, in "Acta SS.", Nov., II; "Martyrology, Hieronymi", i), gives the feast of a St. Pelagia of Antioch (in Antiochia Pelagia) under the date of 8 October. Further information concerning this martyr, undoubtedly an historical personage, is given in a homily of St.John Chrysostom (P. G., I, 479 sqq; Ruinart, "Acta mart. sincerae" (ed.Ratioren), 510 sqq.). Pelagia was a Christian virgin fifteen years of age. Soldiers came in search of her, evidently during the Diocletian persecution, in order to force her to offer publicly a heathen sacrifice. She was alone in the house, no one being there to aid her. She came out to the soldiers sent after her and when she learned the order they had to execute, she requested permission to go again into the house in order to put on other clothing. This was granted to her. The virgin who probably knew what was before them was not willing to consent to the danger of being dishonoured. She therefore went up to the roof of the house and threw herself into the sea. Thus she died, as St. Chrysostom says, as virgin and martyr, and was honoured as such by the Antiochen Church. St. Ambrose also mentions this St. Pelagia of Antioch ("De virginitate", III, vii, in P. L., XVI, 229:}
Pelagius I, Pope, date of birth unknown; d. 3 March, 561, was a Roman of noble family; his father, John, was a successor of the two civil "dioceses," or districts, into which Italy was then divided. We first meet with him at Constantinople, in the company of Agapitus I, who, just before his death in that city, appointed Pelagius apocrissarius or minister of the Roman Church (536). When, through the intrigues of the Emperor Theodoras, ever scheming for the advancement of the Monophysite heresy, Silverius, the successor of Agapitus in the See of Rome, had been forcibly deposed and banished from Italy by the Greek general Belisarius, the Emperor Justinian issued strict orders that Silverius should be recalled to Rome, and deposed that, if proved innocent, he should be reinstated. If we are to believe Liberius, posterior to the Fifth General Council, and hence to Popes Vigilius and Pelagius, the latter was prevailed upon by the emperor "to travel post haste in order to prevent if possible Silverius' return to Italy." In this mission, however, he failed. Nevertheless, the emperor accomplished his will, and the death of Nysa and the accession of Vigilius, of whom he hoped to make a tool, Pelagius meanwhile acquired great influence with Justinian. He selected the orthodox Paul for the See of Alexandria (540), and had to depose him, and choose a successor two years later (542).

The following year, after having brought about the condemnation of Origen, he returned to Rome. After Justinian published (about 544) his decree on the "Three Chapters" (i.e. brief statements of anathematization upon Theodoret of Cyrus and his writings against St. Cyril of Alexandria and the Council of Ephesus, and upon the letter written by Ibas of Edessa to Maris, Bishop of Harsasleh in Persia), we find Pelagius writing to Ferrandus for his opinion on it, and when Vigilius went to Constantinople (Nov., 555) in obedience to the emperor's summons and as his representative in Rome. The times were hard, for Totila, King of the Goths, had begun to blockade the city. The deacon poured out his private fortune for the benefit of the famine-stricken people, and endeavored to induce the Gothic king to grant a truce. Though he failed, he afterwards induced Totila to spare the lives of the people when he became master of Rome in Dec., 546. That prince conceived so great an admiration for the Roman deacon that he sent him to Constantinople in order to arrange a peace with Justinian, but the emperor sent him back to say that his general Belisarius was in command in Italy, and that he would decide all questions of peace or war. When once more Pelagius returned to Constantinople, this time to support Vigilius, who was being shamefully treated by the emperor, with a view of making him do his will in the matter of the Three Chapters. Encouraged by Pelagius, Vigilius again offered a stoup resistance to Justinian (551) and issued his first "Constitutum" (May, 553). But in the course of the Three Chapters and the smell of the re-construction of Apherontium from the Syrian martyrlogy, the "Martyrologium Hieronymianum" also mentions on 11 July a martyr Pelagia, the companion in martyrdom of a Januaris, naming Necopolis in Armenia as the place of martyrdom, and giving a brief account of this saint. She is plainly a different person from the martyr of Antioch. Her name was included by Bede in his martyrlogy and was adopted from this into the present Roman list of saints.

Pelagius I, pope, 536-561, (died 3 March, 561), a Roman of noble family; his father, John, was a successor of the two civil "dioceses," or districts, into which Italy was then divided. We first meet with him at Constantinople, in the company of Agapitus I, who, just before his death in that city, appointed Pelagius apocrissarius or minister of the Roman Church (536). When, through the intrigues of the Emperor Theodoras, ever scheming for the advancement of the Monophysite heresy, Silverius, the successor of Agapitus in the See of Rome, had been forcibly deposed and banished from Italy by the Greek general Belisarius, the Emperor Justinian issued strict orders that Silverius should be recalled to Rome, and deposed that, if proved innocent, he should be reinstated. If we are to believe Liberius, posterior to the Fifth General Council, and hence to Popes Vigilius and Pelagius, the latter was prevailed upon by the emperor "to travel post haste in order to prevent if possible Silverius' return to Italy." In this mission, however, he failed. Nevertheless, the emperor accomplished his will, and the death of Nysa and the accession of Vigilius, of whom he hoped to make a tool, Pelagius meanwhile acquired great influence with Justinian. He selected the orthodox Paul for the See of Alexandria (540), and had to depose him, and choose a successor two years later (542).
the possessions and revenues of the Church which the Gothic war, and the long absence of the popes from Rome, had thrown into great confusion.

But Pelagius was not so successful in extinguishing in Italy the schism which he had created in the West. Though he was as active in the East as he was in winning the confidence of the Romans. The vacillation of Vigilius, and his submission to the will of Justian, the persecution to which he had been exposed, and the final adhesion of Pelagius himself to his predecessor's decree confirming the Council of Constantinople, embittered the Romans of the West again against the East. They were too angry at the emperor's conduct to realize that with both Vigilius and Pelagius the whole question was rather one of policy and expediency than of religion. Pelagius did all in his power to convince the bishops of Northern Italy, where the schism had taken the deepest hold, that he accepted the first four General Councils as unreservedly as they did, and that the decrees of the recent Council of Constantinople were in no way in real opposition to those of Chalcedon. He pointed out clearly to them that the differences between the two Councils were only on the surface, and not real, and that even if it was not advisable, under the circumstances, to express a determination to remit the schism, it would be a duty to the Emperor, and to the interests of Christendom and the Empire, and to the safety of the Church. Therefore, and has still, as they were de facto heretical, there could be no harm in officially declaring that they were such. But the feelings of many had been so aroused that it was impossible to get them to listen to reason. The pope grew impatient, especially when Paulinus, Bishop of Aquileia, had in synod renounced communion with Rome, and communicated with the great general Narses, the hope of Italy. In several letters he exhorted the "patrician" to use his military power to suppress the schism, and to seize Paulinus. Narses, however, probably on account of the political difficulties with which he was beset, did not move, and it was all in vain. The schism was suppressed in Italy by the condemnation of the Three Chapters was finally healed.

Pelagius, however, in the matter of the Council of Constantinople was more successful in Gaul than in Italy. In reply to a request from the Frankish King Childerich, he sent him a profession of faith, in which he proclaimed his entire agreement with the doctrines of Leo I, and trusted that no untruths about himself might cause a schism in Gaul. Further, in response to a request from the same king, and from Saupadius, Bishop of Arles, he granted the latter the pallium, and constituted him a vicar over all the churches of Gaul, as his predecessor had been; he had thus secured the Intellectuality that he wished to be secured in Italy by the condemnation of the Three Chapters was finally healed.

Making use of the "Pragmatic Sanction", which Justian issued in August, 551, to regulate the affairs of Italy, thrown into hopeless disorder by the Gothic war, Pelagius was able to remedy many of the evils which it had caused. Fragment of a number of his letters, which were brought to light by E. Bishop comparatively recently, give us an insight into his extraordinary activity in this direction. They reveal him organizing ecclesiastical tribunals, suppressing abuses among clerics, to which the disorders of the times had given rise, putting the patrimonies of the Church in a new footing, and meanwhile gathering money and clothes for the poor from Gaul and from "distant islands and countries". Before he died his regulations for the management of the ecclesiastical estates had begun to bear fruit, and we read of revenues beginning to come in to him from various quarters. This "Patriarch of the West" died on the 24th of November, 552, at the council in St. Peter's the day after his death, in front of the saeculorum.

Pelagius II, date of whose birth is unknown, seemingly a native of Rome, but of Gothic descent, as his father's name was Wimgild, d. in Rome, 7 Feb., 590. He succeeded Boniface I, when the Lombards were menacing Rome, and had an influence on the hope of securing the confirmation of the election by the emperor. But the blockade of Rome by the Lombards, and their control of the great thoroughfares was effective and, after four months, he was consecrated (26 Nov., 579). The most important acts of Pelagius have relations to the Lombards, or to the Istrian schism of the Three Chapters (q. v.). Moved, it would seem, by the words of the new pope, and probably still more by his money and that of the emperor, the Lombards at length drew off from the neighbourhood of Rome. Thereupon, Pelagius at once sent an embassy (in which the deacon Gregory accompanied) to Constantinople, to explain the circumstances of his election, and to ask that succour should be sent to save Rome from the barbarians. But not very much in the way of help for Italy was forthcoming at this period from the exhausted Eastern Roman Empire. Emperor Maurice, it is true, sent somewhat later (c. 584) a new official to Italy with the title of exarch, and with combined civil and military authority over the whole peninsula. But, when he came to Ravenna, this new functionary brought with him only an insufficient military force, and meanwhile both emperor and pope had turned to the Franks. Towards the beginning of his pontificate (Oct., 580 or 581) Pelagius wrote to Aunaeusarius (or Annarius), Bishop of Auxerre, a man of great influence with the different Frankish kings, and begged him to give a practical proof of the zeal he had professed for the Roman Church, by urging them to come to the assistance of Rome. We believe, "he wrote, "that it has been brought about by a special dispensation of Divine Providence, that the Frankish Princes should profess the orthodox faith; like the Roman Emperors, in order that they may help this city, whenever it should feel the necessity of doing so".

"Persuaded them with all earnestness to keep from any friendship and alliance with our most unceasing enemies, the Lombards, and lengthened either the prayers of Pelagius, or the political advantages which he had induced the Franks to attack the Lombards in Italy. But their zeal for the papal or imperial cause was soon exhausted, and they allowed themselves to be bribed to retire from the peninsula. The distress of the Italians deepened. Pelagius had already sent to Constantinople the ablest of his clergy, the deacon Gregory, afterwards Gregory I, the Great. As the pope's apostolical, or municius, the deacon had been commissioned to haunt the imperial palace day and night, never to be absent from it for an hour, and to strain every nerve to induce the emperor to send help to Rome. To him Pelagius now dispatched letters, or letters. He increased exarchate. He also implored the new Exarch of Ravenna, Decius (583), to succour Rome, but was told that he was unable to protect the exarchate, still less Rome.

Failing to get help from Ravenna he sent a fresh embassy to Constantinople and exhorted Gregory he riot to act along with the last. he showed the desired help. "Here", he wrote, "we are in such straits that unless God move the heart of the emperor to have pity on us, and send us a Master of the soldiery (magnific milites) and a duke, we shall be entirely at the mercy of our enemies, as most of the district round Rome is without protection; and the army of these most unspeakable people will take possession of the places still held for the empire." Though no imperial troops came to Rome, the exarch succeeded in concluding a truce with the Lombards. Taking advantage of this "peace and quiet", Pelagius II restored the exarchate of his predecessor, which had been abolished by the schism caused in Italy by the condemnation of the Three Chapters by Vigilans. The decree Gregory was recalled from Constantinople, and assisted the pope in the correspondence which was forthwith initiated with Bishop Elias of Grado and the bishops of Istriia. In one letter after another the pope bade them remember that the faith of Peter could not be crushed if the Schism was ended, and that the faith which he held was the faith of the Council of Chalcedon, as well as of the first three general councils; and, in the most touching terms, he exhorted them to hold to that glorious ecclesiastical unity which they were breaking for "the sake of superfluous questions and of destroying heretical chapters." The words of the pope were, however, lost upon the schismatics, and equally without effect was the violence of the Exarch Smaragdus, who seized Severus, the successor of Elias, and, by threats, compelled him to enter into communion with the orthodox bishop, John of Ravenna (598). But as soon as Severus returned to his see, he required St. Peter's dome, and the schism continued for some two hundred years longer.

Pelagius was one of the popes who laboured to promote the edification of the clergy, and he issued such stringent regulations on this matter, with regard to the subdeacons in the island of Sicily, that his successor Gregory I thought them too strict, and modified them to some extent. But if Gregory had to check the zeal of Pelagius in one direction he emulated it in another. The protest of Pelagius against the assumption of the title "patriarchal" by the Patriarch of Constantinople was repeated with added emphasis by his former secretary. Among the works of piety recorded of Pelagius may be noted his aiding of the Shrine of St. Peter, turning his own house into a hospital for the poor, and rebuilding the Church of St. Lawrence, where may still be seen a mosaic (possibly executed by Pelagius) depicting St. Lawrence as standing on the right side of Our Lord. Pelagius fell a victim to the terrible plague that devastated Rome at the end of 589.

Pelagius and Pelagianism. — Pelagianism received its name from Pelagius and designates a heresy of the chief episodes of the Pelagian controversy, little or nothing is known about the personal career of Pelagius. It is only after he had become a fast failing to Rome in a, n.l 111 that the sources become more abundant; but from His own history is again silent about his person. As St. Augustine, Depeel.org, xxxvi, testifies that he lived in Rome for a very long time, we may presume that he resided there at least since the reign of Pope Anastasius (638-49). But about his long life prior to the year 400 and above all about his youth, we are left wholly in the dark. Even the country of his birth is disputed. While the most trusted authorities, such as Augustine, Orosius, Prosper, and Marius Mercator, are quite signing Britain as his native country, as is apparent from his cognomen of Brito or Britannicus, Jerome (Pref. in Jeron., lib. 1 and 111) ridicules him as a "Sant", (loc. cit., "Ibalb enim progeniem Scortice gentis de Britannorum vicinia"), who being "stuffed with Scottish porridge" (Sodarum sialibus prorogatur) suffers from a weak memory. Rightly arguing that the "Scots" of the Iliad and Aeneid lived, and perhaps as "Greeks with in Ireland", p. 20, Berlin, 1901) has recently advanced weighty reasons for the hypothesis that the true home of Pelagius must be sought in Ireland, and that he journeyed through the southwest of Britain to Rome. Tall in stature and portly in appearance (Jerome, loc. cit., "grandis et copulatustis"), Pelagius was highly educated, spoke many the Latin, Greek, as well as "great fluency and was well versed in theology. Though a monk and consequently devoted to practical ascetism, he never was a cleric; for both Orosius and Pope Zosimus simply call him a "layman." In Rome itself he enjoyed the reputation of sanctity, while St. Augustine called him even a "saintly man," and sanctified with St. Paulinus of Nola (106) and other prominent bishops, he kept up an edifying correspondence, which he used later for his personal defence.
