During his sojourn in Rome he composed several works: "De fide Trinitatis libri III", now lost, but extolled by Gennadius as "indispensable reading" for every letter for the development, "elsiuris liberius", in the main collection of Bible passages based on Cyprian's "Testimoniornum libri III", of which St. Augustine has preserved a number of fragments: "Commentarii in epistolae S. Pauli", elaborated no doubt before the destruction of Rome by Alaric (410) and known to St. Augustine in 412. As well as "Gentilius" (loc. cit.) deserve credit for having rediscovered in this commentary on St. Paul the original work of Pelagius, which had, in the course of time, been attributed to St. Jerome (P. L., XXX, 645-902). A closer examination of this work, so suddenly become famous, brought to light the fact that it contained the fundamental ideas which the Church afterwards condemned as pestilential. Pelagius, according to his own interpretation, had the primitive state in paradise and original sin (cf. P. L., XXX, 678, "Insimnium, qui de Adam per trahunc assemint ad nos venire pecusatum"), insisted on the naturalness of concupiscence and the death of the body, and ascribed the actual existence and universality of sin to the bad example which Adam set by his sin. He held his idea of a universalization of pagan philosophy, especially in the popular system of the Stoics, rather than in Christianity, he regarded the moral strength of man's will (liberum arbitrium), which steered by asceticism, as sufficient in itself to desire and to attain the loftiest ideal of virtue. The value of Christ's redemption was, in his opinion, limited mainly to instruction (doctrina) and example (model), and which the Saviour threw into the balance as a counter-weight against Adam's wicked example, so that nature retains the ability to conquer sin and to gain eternal life even without the aid of grace. By justification we are indeed cleansed of our personal sins through faith alone (loc. cit., 683, "per solam fidem insitit Deus sanatem in justitiam merits") since sadism (contrarium) implies no interior renovation or sanctification of the soul. How far the sola-fide doctrine "had no stouter champion before Luther than Pelagius" and whether, in particular, the Protestant conception of fiducial faith dawned upon him many centuries before Luther, as Loofs, "ReaJenzyklopaedie fur prot. Theologie" Xv, 255, Leipzig, 1901 assumes, probably needs more careful investigation. For the rest, Pelagius would have announced nothing new by this doctrine, since the Antinomists of the early Apostolic Church were already familiar with "justification by faith alone" (cf. Justification); on the other hand, Luther's boast of having been the first to proclaim the doctrine of justification by faith in the face of all opposition. However, Pelagius insists expressly (loc. cit., ichtig. 812). "Ceterum sine operibus fidei, non legis, mortuus est fides." But the commentary on St. Paul is not the end of the story, for the doctrine of infant baptism was not yet contemplated. The Stoa and on which his vision was centred. We must also take into account that his intimacy with the Greeks developed in him, though unknown to himself, a one-sidedness, which at first sight appears paradoxable. The gravest error into which he and the rest of the Pelagians fell, was that they conceived of Saint Augustine "the chief of the Church, while the Latins had emphasized the guilt rather than its punishment, as the chief characteristic of original sin, the Greeks on the other hand (even Chrysostom) had greater stress on the punishment than on the guilt, Theodore of Mopsuestia even so far as to deny the possibility of original guilt and consequently the penal character of the death of the body. Besides, at that time, the doctrine of Christian grace was everywhere vague and undefined; even the West was convinced of nothing more than that some sort of assistance was necessary to salvation and was given gratuitously, while the nature of this assistance was not clearly defined. In the East, moreover, as an offset to widespread fatalism, the moral power and freedom of the will were at times very strong or even too strongly insisted on, assisting grace being spoken of more frequently than preventing grace (see Grace). It was due to the intervention of St. Augustine and the Church, that greater clearness was gradually reached in the disputed questions and that the first impulse was given towards a more careful development of the dogmas of original sin and grace (cf. Mansbäck, "Die Ethik des hl. Augustinus", II, 1 sqq., Freiburg, 1909). 8. PELAGIUS AND CELESTIVS (411-5).--Of far-reaching influence upon the further progress of Pelagianism was the friendship which Pelagius contracted in Rome with Celestivs, a lawyer of noble (probably Italian) descent. A curnch by birth, but endowed with no mean talents, Celestivs had been won over to ascetism by his enthusiasm for the monastic life, and in the capacity of a lay-monk he entered the monastery of the saint and was taught by him, as well as by Paulinus of Milan, into theoretical principles, which he successfully propagated in Rome. St. Augustine, while charging Pelagius with mysteriousness, murkiness, and shrewdness, calls Celestivs (De peccat. orig., xv) not only "incrédulique", but also open-hearted, obstinate, and free in social intercourse. Even if their secret or open intrigues did not escape notice, still the two friends were not molested by the official Roman circles. But matters changed when in 411 they left the hospitable soil of the metropolis, which had been sacked by Alaric (410), and set sail for North Africa. When they landed on the coast near Hippo, Augustine of Carthage was absent, being fully occupied in settling the Donis- tist disputes in Africa. Later, he met Pelagius in Carthage several times, without, however, coming into close contact with him. After a brief sojourn in North Africa, Pelagius travelled on to Palestine, while Celestivs tried to have himself made a presbyter in Carthage. But this plan was frustrated by the deacon Paulinus of Milan, who submitted to the bishop, Aurelius, a memorial in which six theses of Celestivs—perhaps literal extracts from his last work "Contra traditionem peccati"—were branded as heretical. These theses ran as follows: (1) Even if Adam had sinned, which he falsified; (2) Adam did not have only himself, not the human race. (3) Children just born are in the same state as Adam before his fall. (4) The whole human race neither dies through Adam's sin nor death, nor rises again through the predestination of Christ. (5) Pelagius' works would be a good guide to heaven as the Gospel. (6) Even before the advent of Christ there were men who were without sin. On account of these doctrines, which clearly contain the quintessence of Pelagianism, Celes- tivs was summoned to appear before a synod at Carthage (411). The synod, however, alleging that the inheritance of Adam's sin was an open question and hence its denial was no heresy. As a result he was not only excluded from ordination, but his six theses were condemned. He declared his intention of appealing to the pope in Rome, but without executing his design went to Ephesus in Asia Minor, where he resided under the protection of Marcellinus, Bishop of Ephesus. Meanwhile the Pelagian ideas had infected a wide area, especially around Carthage, so that Augustine and other bishops were compelled to take a resolute stand against them in sermons and private conversations. Urged by his friend Marcellinus, who "daily endured the most annoying debates with the erring brethren", St. Augustine in 412 wrote the two famous works: "De peccatorum meritis et remissionis libri III" (P. L., XLIV, 109 sqq.) and "De spiritu et litera" (ibid., 201 sqq.), in which he positively established the existence of original sin, the necessity of infant baptism, the impossibility of a life without sin, and the necessity of interior grace in the sacrament of the exterior grace of the law (litera). When in 414 disquieting rumours arrived from Sicily and the so-called "Definitiones Celestivi" (reconstructed in Carneri, "Marti Mercatoris Opera", I, 384 sqq., Paris, 1673), said to be the work of Celestivs, were sent to him, he at once (414 or 415) published the rejoinder, "De perfec- tione justitiae" (ibid., 415), in which he again demolished the illusion of the possibility of complete freedom from sin. Out of charity and in order to win back the erring the more effectually, Augustine, in all these writings, never mentioned the two authors of the heresy by name. Meanwhile Pelagius, who was sojourning in Pales- tine, did not remain idle: to a noble Roman virgin, named Demetrius, who at Alaric's coming had fled to Carthage, he wrote a letter which is still extant (in P. L., XXX, 15-45) and in which he again inculcated his Stoic principles of the unlimited energy of nature. Moreover, he published in 415 a work, now lost, "De antiqua reenact" in which he attempted to derive the Pelagian ideas from authorities, appealing not only to the writings of Hilary and Ambrose, but also to the earlier works of Jerome and Augustine, both of whom were still alive. The latter answered at once (415) by his treatise "De natura et gratia" (P. L., XLIV, 247 sqq.). Jerome, however, to whom Augustine's pupil Orosius, a Spanish priest, personally explained the danger of the new heresy, and who had been chagrined by the severity with which Pelagius had criticized his commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians, thought the time ripe to enter the lists; this he did by his letter to Ctesiphon (Ep. exilii) and by his graceful "Dialogus contra Pelagium et contra Paulinum" (P. L., XLV, 247 sqq.), which was assisted by Orosius, who, forthwith accused Pelagius in Jerusalem of heresy. Thereupon, Bishop John of Jerusalem "dearly loved" (St. Augustine, "Ep. clxix") and Pelagius and had him at the time as his guest. He con- voked in July, 415, a diocesan council for the investiga- tion of the charge. The proceedings were hampered by the fact that Pelagius, 11 of the 12 assemblies, did not understand Greek and had engaged a poor interpreter, while the defendant Pelagius was quite able to defend himself in Greek and uphold his orthodoxy. How- ever, according to the personal account (written at the close of 11A) of Orosius (Liber apolog. contra Pelag. clxvii, P. L., XLVI, 255 sqq.), Pelagius and Augustine at last agreed to leave the final judgment on all questions to the Latins, since both Pelagius and his adversa-
aries were Latins, and to invoke the decision of Innocent I; meanwhile silence was imposed on both parties. But Pelagius was granted only a short respite. For in the very same year, the Gallic bishops, Heros of Arles and Lazaurus of Aix, who, after the defeat of the usurper Constantine (111), had resigned their bishoprics

and gone to Palestine, brought the matter before

Bishop Eulogius of Cesarea, with the result that the latter summoned Pelagius in December, 415, before a synd of fourteen bishops, held in Diospolis, the ancient Lydda. But fortune again favoured the heresarch. About the proceedings and the issue we are exceptly well informed through the account of St.

Augustine, the greatest Pelagian (Ep. L., XLIX, 319 sqq.), who records that Pelagius, based on the precedents of Pelagius punctually obeyed the summons, but the principal complainants, Heros and Lazaurus, failed to make their appearance, one of them being prevented by ill-health. And as Orosius, too, did and persecut by Bishop John of Jerusalem, had departed, Pelagius met no personal plaintiff, while he found at the same time a skilful advocate in the deacon Vallarsi, 1, 1067. The principal points of the petition were translated by an interpreter into Greek and read only in an extract. Pelagius, having won the good-will of the assembly by reading to them some private letters of patrons-such, however, as were not read (Ep. cxliv)—began to explain away and disprove the various accusations. Thus from the charge that he made the possibility of a sinless life solely dependent on free will, he exonerated himself by saying that, on the contrary, he required the help of God (adjutatorium Dei) for it, though by this he meant nothing else than the grace of baptism (gracia bapsmatis). Of other doctrines with which he had been charged, he said that, formulated as they were in the complaint, they did not originate from him, but from Celestius, and that he also repudiated them. After this hearing there was nothing left for the synod but to discharge the defendant and to announce him as worthy of communion with the Church. The Orient had now spoken twice and had found nothing to blame in Pelagius, because he had hidden his real sentiments from his judges.

III. Continuation and End of the Controversy

(415-8).—The new acquittal of Pelagius did not fail to cause excitement and alarm in North Africa, whether Garthage, which was presided over by Aurelius, was fifty-nine bishops of the ecclesiastical province of Numidia, to which the see of Hippo, St. Augus tine sec., belonged, held a synod in Millete. In both places the doctrines of Pelagius and Celestius were again rejected as contradictory to the Catholic faith.

However, in order to secure for their decisions “the authority of the Apostolic See,” both synods wrote to Innocent I, requesting his supreme sanction. And in order to impress upon him more strongly the situation of the situation, five bishops (Aurelius, Aure-lus, Alpynus, Evodius, and Possidius) forwarded to him a joint letter, in which they detailed the doctrine of original sin, infant baptism, and Christian grace (St. Augustine, “Ep. lxxx vii”). In three separate letters of 27 Jan., 417, the pope answered the synodal letters of Sts. Augustine and Celestius, and also published two letters as that of the five bishops above cited. “Regest.,” 2nd ed., nn. 321-323, Leipzig, 1855. Starting from the principle that the resolutions of provincial synods have no binding force until they are confirmed by the supreme authority of the Apostolic See, the pope developed the Catholic teaching on original sin and grace, and excluded Pelagius and Celestius, who were reported to have rejected these doctrines, from communication with the Church until they should come to their senses (dono resipientem). In Africa, where the decision was received with unfeigned joy,

the whole controversy was now regarded as closed, and Augustine, on 23 September, 417, announced from the pulpit (Serm., xxi, 10, in P. L., XXXVIII, 734), that the dispute over concilia missa sunt ad Sedem apostolicae, indix etiam repetita, quae secundum limita est.” (Two synods have written to the Aptolic See about this matter; the replies have come back; the question is settled.) But he was mistaken;

the matter was not yet settled.

Innocent I died on 12 March, 417, and Zosimus, a Grammarian, who had succeeded him, before his trial the whole Pelagian case was rescripta venerate, causee more and discussed in all its bearings. The occasion for this was the statements which both Pelagius and Caelestius submitted to the Roman See in order to justify themselves. Though the previous decisions of Innocent I had removed all doubts about the matter itself, yet the question of the persons involved was unveiled, viz., Did Pelagius and Celestius really teach the theses condemned as heretical? Zosimus’ sense of justice forbade him to punish any one with excom-unication before he was duly convicted of his error.

And if the steps recently taken by the two defendants were considered, the doubts which might arise on this point, was the case of Augustine; where Pelagius had published a new work, now lost, “De libero arbit-trio libri IV,” which in its phraseology seemed to verge towards the Augustinian conception of grace and infant baptism, even if in principle it did not abandon the author’s earlier standpoint. Speaking of Christian grace, he admitted not only a Divine revelation, but also a human one, and even internal illumination of the mind (through sermons, reading of the Bible, etc.), adding, however, that the latter served not to make salutary works possible, but only to facilitate their performance. As to infant baptism he granted that it ought to be administered in the same form as in the case of adults, not in order to cleanse the children from a real original guilt, but to secure to them entrance into the “kingdom of God”. Unbaptized children, he thought, would after their death be excluded from the “kingdom of God”, but not from “eternal life”. This work, together with a still extant confession of faith, which bears witness to his childlike obedience, Pelagius sent to Rome, humbly begging at the hands of the Bishops from which he had been excommunicated by him who “holds the faith and the see of Peter”. All this was addressed to Innocent I, of whose death Pelagius had not yet heard. Celestius, also, who meanwhile had changed his residence from Epaphus to Constantinople, but had been banished thereby the anti-Pelagian Bishop Attius, took active steps towards his own rehabilitation. In 417 he went to Rome in person and laid at the feet of Zosimus a detailed confession of faith (Fragment. P. L., XIV, 1718), in which he affirmed his belief in all doctrines, “from the Trinity of one God to the resurrection of the dead” (cf. St. Augustine, “De peccatœorigine,” xxii).

Highly pleased with this Catholic faith and pacification, Zosimus sent two different letters (P. L., XIV, 1719 sqq.) to the African bishops, saying that in the case of Celestius Bishops Heros and Lazaurus had proceeded without due circumspection, and that Pelagius too, as was proved by his recent confession of faith, had not swerved from the Catholic truth. As he thought that the Africans either to revise their former sentence or to convict him of heresy in his own (the pope’s) presence within two months. The papal command struck Africa like a bomb-shell. In great haste a synod was convoked at Carthage in November, 417, and writing to Zosimus, they urgently begged him not to resubmit the sentence which his predecessor, Innocent I, had pronounced against Pelagius and Celestius, until both had confessed the necessity of interior grace for all salutary thoughts, words, and deeds. At last Zosimus came to a halt. By a rescript of 21 March, 418, he assured them that he had not yet pronounced decisively, and sent in a copy of the documents bearing Pelagianism in order to pave the way for a new, joint investigation. Pursuant to the papal command, there was held on 1 May, 418, in the presence of 200 bishops, the famous Council of Carthage, which again branded Pelagianism as a heresy in Might (or ") (denzinger's "Enchiridion," 10th ed 1908, 101-8). Owing to their importance they may be summarized: (1) Death did not come to Adam from a physical necessity, but through sin. (2) New-born children must be baptized on account of original sin. (3) Justifying grace not only avails for the forgiveness of past sins, but also gives assistance for the avoidance of future sins. (4) The grace of Christ not only discloses the knowledge of God's commandments, but also imparts strength to will and execute them. (5) Without God's grace it is not merely more difficult, but absolutely impossible to perform good works. (6) Not out of humility, but in truth must we confess ourselves to be sinners. (7) The saints refer the pettiness of their own vices to an order of God's will, not only to others, but also to themselves. (8) The saints pronounce the same supplication not from mere humility, but from truthfulness. Some codices contain a ninth canon (Denzinger, loc. cit, note 3): Children dying without baptism do not go to a middle place (inclusio locis), since the non-reception of baptism excludes both from "the kingdom of heaven" and from "eternal life". These clearly-worded canons, which (except the last-named) afterwards came to be articles of faith binding the universal Church, gave the death-blow to Pelagianism; sooner or later it would be brought to death.

Meanwhile urged by the Africans (probably through a certain Valerian, who as comes held an influential position in Ravenna), the secular power also took a hand in the dispute, the Emperor Honorius, by rescript of 30 April, 418, from Ravenna, banishing all Pelagians from the cities of Italy. Whether Celestius evaded the hearing before Zosimus, to which he was now bound, "by fleeing from Rome, (St. Augustine, "Contra duas epist. Pelag.", II, 5), or whether he was one of the first to fall a victim to the imperial decretal exile, cannot be satisfactorily settled from the sources. With regard to his later life, we are told that in 421 he again haunted Rome or its vicinity, but was deposed on the 25th by St. Martin of Tours (P. L., XIV, 1750). It is further related that in 425 his petition for an audience with Celestius I was answered by a third banishment (cf. P. L., LI, 274). He then sought refuge in the Orient, where we shall meet him later. Pelagius could not have been included in the imperial decretal of exile from Rome. For at that time he undoubtedly resided in the Orient, since, as late as the summer of 418, he communicated with Punicus and his wife Melania, who lived in Palestine (cf. Card. Rampolla, "Santa Melania giu- niore", Rome, 1905). But this is the last information we have about him; he probably died in the Orient. Having received the Acts of the Council of Carthage, Zosimus sent to all the bishops of the world his famous "Epistola tractoria" (418) of which unfortunately only fragments have come down to us. This papal encyclical, a lengthy document, gives a minute account of the entire "causa Celestii et Pelagii", from whose works it quotes, and gives the demand for the condemnation of Pelagianism as a heresy. The assertion that every bishop of the world was obliged to confirm this circular by his own signature, cannot be proved, it is more probable that the bishops were required to transmit to Rome a written agreement; if a bishop refused to sign, he was deposed from his office and banished. A second and harsher rescript, issued by the emperor on 9 June, 419, and addressed to Bishop Aurelius of Carthage (P. L., XIV, 1751), gave additional force to this measure. Augustine's triumph was complete. In 418, drawing strength from the balance, as Augustine wrote against the heresarchs his last great work, "De gratia Christi et de peccato originali" (P. L., XIV, 359 sqq.).

IV.—The Dispute of St. Augustine with Julian of Eclanum (419-28).—Through the vigorous measures adopted in 418, Pelagianism was indeed condemned, but not crushed. Among the eighteen bishops of Italy who were exiled on account of their refusal to sign the papal decretal, Julian, Bishop of Eclanum, a city of Apulia now deserted, was the first to protest against the "Tractoria" of Zosimus. Highly educated and skilled in philosophy and dialectics, he assumed the leadership among the Pelagians. But to fight for Pelagianism now meant to fight against Augustine. The literary feud set in at once. It was probably Julian himself who denounced St. Augustine as damna- tor nuptiarum to the influential comes Valerian in Ravenna, a nobleman, who was very happily married. To meet the accusation, Augustine composed his "De nuptiis et concupiscencia libri II" (P. L., XIV, 413 sqq.) and addressed it to Valerian. Immediately after (419 or 420), Julian published a reply which attacked the first book of Augustine's work and bore the title, "Libri IV ad Turbaentum". But Augustine replied in his famous reply, written in 421 or 422. "Contra Julianum libri VI" (P. L., XIV, 610 sqq.). When two Pelagian circulars, written by Julian and scoffing at the "Manichean views" of the Antipelagians, fell into his hands, he attacked them energetically (420 or 421) in a work, dedicated to Boniface I, "Contra duas Pelagianorum libri IV, 549 sqq.". Being driven from Rome, Julian had found (not later than 421) a place of refuge in Cilicia with Theode of Mopoeusia. Here he employed his leisure in elaborating an extensive work, "Libri VIII ad Florum", which was wholly devoted to refuting the second book of Augustine's "De nuptiis et concupiscencia". Though composed shortly after 421, it did not come to the notice of St. Augustine until 427. The latter's reply, which quotes Julian's arguments sentence for sentence and refutes them, was completed only as far as the sixth book, whence it is cited in patristic literature as "Opus imperfectum contra Julianum" (P. L., XIV, 1006-14). A complete edition of Pelagianus, which brings out into strong relief the diametrically opposed views of the author, was furnished by Augustine in 425 in the final chapter of his work, "De haeresibus" (P. L., XLI, 21 sqq.). Augustine's last writings published before his death (430) were no longer aimed against Pelagianism, but against Semipelagianism.

After the death of Theode of Mopoeusia (428), Julian of Eclanum left the hospitable city of Cilicia and in 429 we meet him unexpectedly in company with his fellow exiles Bishops Florus, Orontius, and Fabius, at the Court of the Patriarch Nesterius of Constantinople, who willingly supported the fugitives. It was here, too, in 429, that Celestius emerged again as the protege of the patriarch; this is his last appearance in history; for from now on all trace of him is lost. But the exiled bishops did not long enjoy the protection of Nesterius. When Marius Mercator, a layman and friend of St. Augustine, who was then present in Constantinople, he was driven by the orthodox Pelagians in the imperial city, he composed towards the end of 429 his "Communitorium super nomine Cele- stii" (P. L., XLIII, 63 sqq.), in which he expressed the shameful life and the heretical character of Nesto- rius' wards. The result was that the Emperor Theodosius II decreed their banishment in 430. When the Pelagianism and the origins of heresy.

In this article, the author describes how Pelagianism first emerged in the 4th century AD. The term "Pelagianism" comes from the name of Pelagius, a Roman Christian who lived in the late 4th century. Pelagianism was a religious movement that emphasized human free will and the ability of humans to achieve salvation through their own efforts, rather than through the grace of God as taught by Augustine of Hippo.

The author discusses the historical context in which Pelagianism arose, highlighting the tensions between various Christian factions and the political and social changes of the time.

The article also examines the writings of key figures such as John Cassian and Augustine of Hippos, who were instrumental in shaping the debate over Pelagianism.

Overall, the article provides a comprehensive overview of the development of Pelagianism and its role in the early Christian church.
mainly always a Greek town, and formed the northern boundary of Jewish Pareus ("Bel. Jud."). III, iii, 3. As a part of the kingdom of Agrippa it offered in a. d. 66 a safe refuge to the little Christian community of Mt. Sion. When the Roman armies were on the march, the Jews withdrew into their sanctuary, and in this place of refuge there during the revolt of the Jews, and the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans (Eusebius, "H. E.", III, v; Epiphanius, "Haer.", xxii, 7). When, after three years of war and massacres, the second Jewish revolt had been suppressed by Rome (132-35), and Emperor Adrian had rebuilt Jerusalem under the name of Sion, the community of St. Matthias lived in the house of Pella re-established themselves by order of the uncircumcised bishop, Mark, on Mount Sion. Nevertheless Christianity persevered at Pella, as testified by Ariston (born there in the second century, and author of the "Dialogue of Jason and Papæsus"), numerous Christian tombs and inscriptions ("Revue biblique", 1819, 111, 22). The Queen (Oriens christianis, III, 609-700) mentions only three bishops: Zebezinus in 419; Paul in 518; and Zachary in 552. The ruins of Pella may be seen at Tabakat-Fahil beyond the Jordan and opposite Scythopolis or Beisan; the necropolis and a Christian basilica with three naves are noteworthy.

Pelletier, Pierre-Joseph, b. in Paris, 22 March, 1788; d. there, 19 July, 1842. His father, Bertrand Pelletier, a pharmacist and a follower of Lavoisier, filled several government offices in France after the Revolution, dying at the early age of thirty-six. Like his father, the son showed precocity in science and followed in his steps in the doctrines of Lavoisier. The son's attention was directed to materia medica and to the vegetable alkaloids. He was associated with Caventou in the discovery of quinine in 1820 and without any thought of possible remuneration, if the discovery was kept secret, published his results to the world. It was in 1827 that the Montyon prize of 10,000 francs was awarded to him by the Paris Academy of Science for the discovery, this being the sole reward for so great an achievement. Strychnine was another of his discoveries and his memoir on the subject was published in Paris in 1818. He was professor in the Ecole de pharmacie in Paris and in 1832 became one of its adjunct directors. He was appointed a member of the Board of Paris and held other positions of honour. In 1840 he was elected to the Academy of Sciences. The natural alkaloid—peletierine—and three others were named after him by their discoverer, Tauret. Among his works may be cited: "Notice sur la matière verte des feuilles", in collaboration with Caventou (Paris, 1817); "Analyse chimique des quinquas" (Paris, 1821); "Notice sur les recherches chimiques" (Paris, 1820), etc. Pelletier, as Cauchy testifies, was a convinced Catholic.

T. O'CONNOR SIOANE

Pellico, Silvio, Italian author and patriot, b. at Saluzzo, Italy, 24 June, 1788; d. at Turin, 31 Jan., 1851. His father was a government employee, and Silvio spent his youth in different places in Italy, making also a four-years' sojourn in Lyons. At the age of twenty he was in Milan, where he made the acquaintance of several of the best Italian writers, among whom were Monti, Foscolo, and Manzoni. Here he taught French in a school, conducted by the Government, for some time. In 1812 he was arrested and deprived of this post, he served as a private tutor in different families, especially in that of Count Luigi Porro Lambertenghi, one of the leading opponents of Austrian dominion in the land. Lambertenghi founded in 1819 the periodical "Il Conciliatore", which, as a literary organ, voiced the doctrines of the Romantic writers as opposed to those of the Classicist school, and, as a political organ, combated all foreign domination in Italy. Pellico played an important part in the editing of this periodical. In his capacity of a fellow worker, Pietro Maroncelli, he incurred suspicion as a member of the Carbonari, and, having been arrested by order of the Austrians, was imprisoned first in the Piombi at Venice and next in the dungeon of San Michele di Murano. After a perfunctory trial he and Maroncelli were condemned to death, but this penalty was commuted to a fine of 1,000 francs and to three years' imprisonment with hard labour, and they were taken to the fortress of Spielberg in Moravia. After eight years of incarceration and much suffering, Pellico was released (1830). During the remainder of his life, broken down by the hardships of imprisonment, he remained entirely aloof from politics, and preferred a life of seclusion.

Pellico is not one of the great Italian authors of the nineteenth century; yet he is one who has endeared himself permanently to the Italian heart by a single document, his prison diary, "Le mie Prigioni". In this work, which rapidly became popular and passed into foreign languages, he relates in simple and unaffected prose his own sufferings and experiences in this whole period of his confinement. There is no tone of bitterness in his manner; his attitude throughout is that of the genuinely devout and resigned Catholic, and he records with infinite detail and often with profoundly pathetic effect his daily experience in his various prisons. His little account of the spider which he trained to eat from his hand is one of the best remembered passages of modern Italian prose. The very gentleness and homesickness of its narrative made his "Prigioni" the favourite that it is, and well has it been said that the book did more harm to Austria than any defeat on the field of battle. His other writings are: "Prigioni" full of delicate lyric poetry and patriotic fervour; "Cantico" or "Novelle poetiche", romantic in inspiration and concerned with medieval life and manners; twelve tragedies; the "Doveri degli uomini", a prose compilation of precepts and example, intended to teach right living to the young; his copious correspondence ("Epistolario"), and a prose version of Byron's "Manfred". Only eight of the tragedies have been published, the most famous of which, "Francesca da Rimini", dealing with the Dantesque tradition, was performed successfully in 1818; it engaged at once the attention of Byron and he translated it into English. The "Francesca" ranks next in importance among his works to the "Prigioni".

GUILAUME, b. at Meaulne in Languedoc, about 1490; d. at the castle of Montferrand, 1568. He made a brilliant course in law and theology and travelled in France and Italy. In 1527 he dedicated himself to the service of Magdeleine, appointed him canon and shortly afterwards his confessor. He became the next bishop in 1529. Francis I entrusted him with several important missions; in 1529 he accompanied Louise de Savoie to Cambrai and concluded peace with Charles V. In 1533 at Marseilles he arranged with Clement VII for the marriage of the Duc d'Orléans (Henri II) and Catherine de' Medici. He obtained permission for the translation of his episcopal see from Magdeleine to Montpellier from Paul III in 1556. Four years later he was sent as an ambassador to Venice, and brought back a large number of Greek, Syriac, and Hebrew MSS. An ardent Humanist, he was arrested on suspicion of heresy by order of the Parliament of Toulouse, and imprisoned in the castle of Bezaise, though he easily freed himself XI.—39.
from the charge and passed the remainder of his days combating the Protestant heresy. He was obliged more than once to quit Montpellier, for Aigues-Mortes, and Maguelonne. In 1567 the Protestants destroyed his cathedral. His correspondence was published at Paris (1800); his commentaries on Tacitus are unpublished.

Pelotias. Diocese of (Pelotiasensis), in Brazil. A suffragan to Porto Alegre. By a decree of Pius X, dated 14 May, 1917, the See of Pedro de Galán was created into an archbishopric under the title of Porto Alegre (q. v.) and given four suffragans, three of which were detached from the old diocese. One of these, Pelotias, was formed from twenty-four parishes in the southeastern portion of Rio Grande do Sul. It includes most of the territory lying near the Laguna Miri, and the lower half of the Lago dos Patos. The cathedral church of the new diocese, dedicated to St. Francis of Paula, is at Pelotias, a well-constructed, handsome city, situated on the São Gonçalo. Pelotias, a centre of commercial activity, especially in the cattle trade, contains about 25,000 inhabitants, and has a Jesuit college. Rio Grande, its seaport, twenty-six miles to the southeast, has about 90,000 inhabitants. Other chief centres of population are Bagé, São Lourenço, São José do Norte, and Boqueirão. The population is almost entirely Catholic.

Peloze, Théophile-Jules, scientist, b. at Volognes, La Manche, 26 Feb., 1807; d. in Paris, 31 May, 1867. He began his career as a pharmacist, studying at La Ferté. In 1827 he went to Paris and became a member of the society founded by Gay-Lussac and Loze-Lamy. At this period he also occupied a position in the hospital of La Salpêtrière, but resigned to get back to his researches. In 1830 he was a professor in the University of Lille; in 1833 assayer to the Mint, and on the staff of the Polytechnique School in Paris; and later was engaged in the College of France, holding the title of professor there until 1851. In 1836 he visited Germany and was associated in his work in organic chemistry with Liebig. In 1837 he succeeded Deymeux as a member of the Academy of Sciences of France. In 1841 he was made president of the Mint Commission, and in 1849 became a member of the Municipal Commission at Paris. He resigned his positions in 1850. His work with Liebig included investigations on oxanthon ether, tannic acid, stearim, sugar, etc., and with Frémy, Cahours, and Gédin, on ascorbic vegetable acids, including mallic and gallic acids, and on petroleum and butyric fermentation. He was the first to synthesize a fatty substance from glycerine and an acid; to isolate tannic acid; to identify beet-root and cane-sugars, and to make cotton and terebinthene in France. Other work by him was devoted to analytical chemistry and the determination of the atomic weights of several of the elements. Discovering a new class of salts (tinitosulphates) he laid thereon a new analytical method for the detection of copper. In 1830 he supplied the student chemist of the St. Gothain glass works he introduced sodium sulphate as a constituent in glass-making, producing artificial aventurine with chromium as a basis, studying the effect of sunlight on coloured glass, and working on enamels. Many of his papers have been published in the "Annales de Chimie et de Physique" and the "Annales des Sciences Naturelles." In 1837 he published works: "Traité de Chimie Générale, analytique, Industrielle et agricole" (3 vols., Paris, 1837), in collaboration with Frémy; "Abrégé de Chimie" (Paris, 1818); "Nouvelles générales de Chimie" (Paris, 1853). According to his friend, the Abbé Moigno, he died an effing Christian death.

Peloite, Madeleine de la, née Chauvigny, a French noblewoman, and foundress, b. at Auc, 1603; d. at Quebec, 18 November, 1671. In spite of her monastic inclinations, she was forced to wed, at seventeen, Charles de la Peltrie; she died five years later. After ten years of widowhood spent in piety and almsgiving, Lejeune’s “Relation” awakened in her soul an ardent desire for the Canadian mission, which she strove to accomplish notwithstanding fresh opposition from her father. To overcome this, while seemingly complying with her parents wish to see her re-married, it was arranged that the saintly de Bernières-Louvigny would ask her hand, leaving her free to pursue her generous design. Her father’s death intervening, the union was cancelled, though her friend espoused the realization of her plans, duly approved by de Condren and St. Vincent de Paul. She corresponding with the Venerable de Paul, who recognized her as the soul providentially destined to second her zeal. They reached Quebec, 1 August, 1639, and began together a life of privations and merits inseparable from the rude condition of the colony and the savage nature of their wards. Madame de la Peltrie’s charity exerted itself at Sillery, where she studied, sponsored, and finally accepted her marriage with Jeanne Mance, Maismenouve, and the other prospective founders of Ville Marie, during the first spent near Quebec (1641-42), prompted her to follow them to Montreal, where she was the first communicant at the first Mass celebrated by Father Vimont, S.J. (1642). Deterred from her apparently ecclesiastical career, she set out for France, but finally returned to Quebec after an absence of eighteen months, and devoted herself and her fortune wholly and irrecoverably to the work of Marie de l’Incarnation. In spite of her entreaties she was never formally admitted to the novitate, but led the humble and austere life of a true religious, scrupulously following every detail of the observances, and reaching a high degree of contemplative prayer. Governor Concelles, Intendant Talon, the Indians, and the poor attended her funeral. Besides contributing to the foundation of the Ursuline monastery, she had inaugurated in Quebec, the admirable mission of charity for Ilona.

Peluism, titular metropolitan see of Augustana Prima in Egypt, mentioned in Ezek., xxx, 15 sq., (A. V. Sin., as the strength or rampart of Egypt against his enemies from Asia, which clearly outlines the eastern frontier of the Delta. Sin in Chaldia, and Seky in Aramaic, means nile, like the Greek Nilos, which is a translation of it and which, according to Strabo (XXVII, i, 21), refers to the nile and the marshes which surrounded the town. The latter was very important, being on the route of the Egyptians from Africa to Asia, also because its harbour joined the sea to the branch of the Nile called Pelusiac. The Pharaohs put it in a good state of defence. Among its sieges or battles were: the expedition of Nabuchodonosor, 583 B.C.; that of Cambyses who stove it, 525 B.C. (Herod., III, 10-12); that of Nebuchadnezzar, 568 B.C.; that of Alexander; 333 B.C. and of him, 305 B.C. Antiochus Epiphanes triumphed under its walls over Ptolemy Philometor; in 235 B.C. Anthony captured it; and in 31 B.C. Augustus Pembroke, Diocese of (Pembrokeensiis), suffragan of Ottawa, in Canada. The town of Pembroke is situated in the Pembroke River, about one hundred miles west of the City of Ottawa, in the midst of a rich farming and lumbering district. The locality is mentioned in the early history of Indian missions in Upper Canada; Champlain, when on a voyage of exploration of the Upper Ottawa, pitched his tent where now stands the Pembroke court house. The names of the early missionaries are lost, the first known being those of Fathers Dupuis and Belleville, Sulpicians of Montreal, who preached to the Indians of this region in 1836. The foundation of the mission there is ascribed to Father Lynch, and the first resident priest was Father Gillie, under whose direction the first church was begun in 1847. This soon proved inadequate and a more extensive stone structure was erected on a new site. In 1852 when Pembroke was chosen as the see of the new vicariate, plans, eventually carried out, were prepared to transform this church into the Cathedral of St. Columbia. The diocese of Pembroke comprises the county of Renfrew, part of each of the counties of Renfrew, Carleton, Frontenac, Leeds, and Hastings, the district of Nipissing in the Province of Ontario, and the southern part of the county of Pontiac in the Province of Quebec. This territory was separated from the Diocese of Ottawa, Three Rivers, and St. Boniface, and erected into the Vicariate of Pembroke, 11 July, 1882. This immense region, greatest in the Province of Ontario and Quebec, extending as far north as Hudson Bay, and east to the district of Keewatin. The work of colonization and development progressed so rapidly that, 4 May, 1898, the vicariate was erected into the Diocese of Pembroke with episcopal see at Pembroke. The remarkable growth of the northern districts, principal cause of immense wealth of gold and silver in the now renowned cyclad region, led to the formation of a new vicariate at Timiskaming, 22 September, 1908.

Narcisse Zéphyrin Lorrain, first Bishop of Pembroke, was born at St. Martin, Laval County, Quebec, 13 June, 1832. His early education was obtained in his own parish school and in 1853 he began his classical studies in the College of St. Therese, from which he entered the Seminary of St. Therese. Ordained at Montreal, 4 August, 1867, by Bishop Bourget, for two years he filled the duties of professor and director of his Alma Mater. In 1869 with Bishop Bourget's consent, he was appointed parish priest of Redford then, in the Diocese of Albany, New York. He was recalled to Montreal in 1879 and in the following year was appointed vicar-general of that diocese. Two years later he was chosen vicar-general of the new Vicariate of Pembroke, and consecrated Bishop of Cythera, 21 September, 1882, in the church of Notre Dame, Montreal, and on the following day entered Pembroke, where he was to take his residence as Vicar Apostolic of Pembroke. When the vicariate was erected into a diocese he became its first bishop. The works and progress of the diocese under Bishop Lorrain's episcopate are proofs of his untiring energy, apostolic zeal, and keen business ability. He visited the Indian missions of the north five times. In 1884 he covered a distance of fifteen hundred miles to the missions of Abitibi, Moose Factory, and Albany, and in 1887 in visiting the missions of the St. Maurice he made a voyage of seven hundred miles, which, like the first and the other three, was for the most part made in canoe or on foot.

The diocese numbers: about 37,000 Catholics; 27 parishes with resident priests, and 15 assistant priests; missions, 34; stations, 17; chapels, 7. Of the clergy 38 are seculars and 4 Oblates of Mary Immaculate. Among the communities of women connected with works of charity and education are: the Grey Nuns of the Cross, Sisters of St. Joseph, Sisters of Providence, Sisters of the Holy Cross, Sisters of the Holy Family. Two large and well-equipped hospitals are conducted by the first mentioned community. The separate school system enjoyed throughout the diocese gives to all a good opportunity for primary and religious instruction, while the higher education of young men is obtained principally at the University of Ottawa. There are 5 academies with 1200 pupils; 71 parochial schools with 13,270 pupils.

Peña (Peña), Francisco, canonist, b. at Villarroya de los Pinares, near Saragossa, about 1540; d. at Rome, in 1612. He devoted himself to the study of law at Valencia. Later Philip II appointed him auditor of the Rota for Spain, and while at Rome he performed great services not only for his fellow-countrymen but also for the Holy See. He formed one of the commission charged with the preparation of the official edition of the "Corpus juris canonici," published in 1582, and the anonymous notes appended to the edition of the Decretals are attributed to him. He was also concerned in the canonization of several saints: Didacus, Hyeainch, Raymond, Charles Borromes, and Frances of Rome, publishing biographies of several. His principal works are: "In Directoriurn Inquisitorum a Nicolao Emerico conscriptum commentaria" (Rome, 1578); "De officio Inquisitionis" (Cremona, 1653); "In Ambrosii de Vignate tractatum de auctoribus commissae et de libris et extraeius romanae praeliberationis et eorum ponita nota" (Rome, 1561); "In Bernardi Concensi Dominicienorum inquisitorum praeliberationis et eorum tractationis de strigibus" (Rome, 1584); "Responsio canonic a scripturn editionem in causa Henrici Bordini quod illius fauntores persuadere nuntium episcopos in Francia jure illius absolvere potuisse" (Rome, 1595); "Censura in arrosturn Parlementale Curiae criminalis Parisiensis contra Jeannem Castellum et patres Societatis Jesu" (Rome, 1595); "De temporali regno Christi" (Rome, 1611). His "Decisiones sacre Rote" were published by I. lirrigiotti (2 vols., Saragossa, 1648–50).

Penal Laws.—This article treats of penal legislation affecting Catholics in English-speaking countries since the Reformation. Separate heads are devoted to the penal laws of: I. England; II. Ireland; III. In the American Colonies; IV. In England.—By a series of statutes successive sovereigns and Parliaments from Elizabeth to George III, sought to prevent the practice of the Catholic Faith in England. To the sanguinary laws passed by Elizabeth further measures, sometimes inflicting new disqualifications and penalties, sometimes reiterating previous enactments, were added, until this persecuting legislation made its effects felt in every department of private and public life. Catholics lost not only freedom of worship, but civil rights as well; their estates, property, and sometimes even lives were at the mercy of any informer. The fact that these laws were passed as political occasion demanded deprived them of any coherence or consistency; nor was any codification ever attempted, so that the task of piecing together the various acts and clauses of legislation is a difficult one. In his historical account of the penal laws, published at the time when partial relief had only just been granted (see bibliography at end of this section), the eminent lawyer, Charles Butler, the first Catholic to be called to the Bar after the Catholic Relief Act of 1791, and the first to be appointed King's Counsel after the Catholic Emancipation Act, thought it best to group these laws under five heads: (1) Those which subjected Catholics to penalties and punishments for practising their religious worship; (2) those which punished them for not conforming to the Established Church (Statutes of Lascivious); (3) those regulating the penalties of being named among their worst enemies (Act of Supremacy (1559; 1605; 1689)), the declarations against Transubstantiation (Test Act, 1673) and against Popery (1678); (4) the act passed with respect to receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; (5) statutes affecting landed property. For the present purpose, however, it seems preferable to adopt a chronological arrangement, which not only clearly exhibits the historical development of the code and the state of the law at any particular period.

The Penal Laws began with the two Statutes of Supremacy and Uniformity by which Queen Elizabeth, in 1559, initiated her religious settlement; and her legislation falls into three divisions corresponding to three definitely marked periods: (1) 1559-70, when the Government trusted to the policy of enforcing conformity by fines and deprivations; (2) 1570-90, from the date of the queen's excommunication to the time when the Government recognized the Catholic reaction due to the seminary priests and Jesuits; (3) from 1590 to the end of the reign. To the first period belong the Statute of Supremacy (26 Eliz. c. 1 and 2) and the amending statute (5 Eliz. c. 1). By the Act of Supremacy all who maintained the spiritual or ecclesiastical authority of any foreign prelate were to forfeit all goods and chattels, both real and personal, and all benefices for the first offence, or in case the value of these was below £20, to be imprisoned for one year; they were liable to the forfeitures of Præmunirium for the second offence, and to the penalties of high treason for the third offence. These penalties of Præmunirium were: exclusion from the sovereign's protection, forfeiture of all lands and goods, arrest to answer to the sovereign and Council. The penalties assigned for high treason were drawing blood, and quartering, with confiscation of goods, which heirs became incapable of inheriting honours and offices, and, lastly, forfeiture of all property. These first statutes were made stricter by the amending act (16 Eliz. c. 11), which declared that to maintain the authority of the pope in any way was punishable by penalties of Præmunirium for the first offence and of high treason for the second. All who refused the Oath of Supremacy were subjected to the like penalties. The Act of Uniformity, primarily designed to secure outward conformity in the use of the Anglican Book of Common Prayer, was in effect a penal statute, as it punished all clergymen who used any other service by deprivation and imprisonment, and everyone who refused to attend the Anglican service by a fine of twelve pence for each omission. It should be remembered that the amount of these fines must be multiplied by ten or more to give their modern equivalent.

Coming to the legislation of the second period, there are two acts directed against the Bull of Excommunication; 13 Eliz. c. 1, which made it high treason to affirm that the queen ought not to enjoy the Crown, or to declare her to be a heretic or schismatic, and 13 Eliz. c. 2, which made it high treason to put into effect any papal Bull of absolution, to absolve or reconcile any person to the Catholic Church, or to be so absolved or reconciled, or to procure or publish any papal Bull or writing whatsoever. The penalties of Præmunirium were enacted against all who brought into England or who gave to others Agenus Dei or articles blessed by the pope or by any one through faculties from him. A third act, 13 Eliz. c. 3, which was designed to stop Catholics from taking refuge abroad, declared that any subject departing the realm without the queen's licence, and not returning within six months, should forfeit the profits of his lands during life and all his goods and chattels. The third and most severe group of statutes begins with the "Act to retain the Queen's Majesty's subjects in her obedience" (23 Eliz. c. 1), passed in 1581. This made it high treason to reconcile any one to the Roman religion (Papal bulls), prohibited Mass under penalty of a fine of two hundred marks and imprisonment for one year for the celebrant, and a fine of one hundred marks and the same imprisonment for those who heard the Mass. This act also increased the penalty for not attending the Anglican service to the sum of twenty pounds a month, or imprisonment till the fine be paid, or till the offender went to the Protestant Church. A further penalty of ten pounds a month was inflicted on anyone keeping a schoolmaster who did not attend the Protestant service. The schoolmaster himself was to be imprisoned for one year.

The climax of Elizabeth's persecution was reached in 1586 by the "Act against Jesuits, Seminary priests and other such like disobedient persons" (27 Eliz. c. 2). This statute, under which most of the English martyrs suffered, made it high treason for any Jesuit or any seminary priest to be in England at all, and felony for any one to harbour or relieve them. The penalties of Præmunirium were based on the Act of Uniformity, and a fine of £100 for every offence on those who sent their children overseas without the royal licence.

So far as priests were concerned, the effect of all this legislation may be summed up as follows: For any priest ordained before the accession of Elizabeth it was high treason after 1563 to maintain the authority of the pope for the second time, or to refuse the oath of supremacy for the second time; after 1571, to receive or use any Bull or form of reconciliation; after 1581, to absolve or reconcile anyone to the Church or to be absolved or reconciled. For seminary priests it was high treason to be in England at all after 1555. Under this statute, over 150 Catholics were hanged on the scaffold between 1581 and 1603, exclusive of Elizabeth's earlier victims.

The last of Elizabeth's laws was the "Act for the better discovery of wicked and seditious persons turning themselves Catholics, but being rebellious and traitorous subjects" (35 Eliz. c. 2). Its effect was to prohibit and punish any person living within ten miles of a place of abode, and to order all persons suspected of being Jesuits or seminary priests, and not answering satisfactorily, to be imprisoned till they did so.

The hopes of the Catholics on the accession of James I were soon dispelled, and during his reign (1603-25) five very oppressive measures were added to the statute-book. In the first year of his reign there was passed the "Act for the due execution of the statutes against Jesuits, seminary priests, etc." (1 Jac. I, v), by which all Elizabeth's statutes were confirmed with additional aggravations. Thus persons going beyond seas to any Jesuit seminary were rendered incapacle of purchasing or retaining any lands or goods in England; the penalty of £100 on everyone sending a child or woman into the realm, which had been enacted only for Elizabeth's time, was made applicable to priests. Catholic schoolmasters not holding a licence from the Anglican bishop of the diocese were fined forty shillings a day, as were their employers. One slight relief was obtained in the exemption of one-third of the estate of a convicted recusant from liabilities to penaltyes against this must be set the provision that retained the recusant's personal estate after his death till all his previous fines had been paid. Even then these two-thirds were only to be restored to the heir provided he was not himself a recusant.

The carefully arranged "discovery" of the Gunpowder Plot in 1605 was followed by two statutes of particularly savage character. These were "An Act for the better discovering and repressing of Popish Re-cusants" (3 Jac. I, iv) and "An Act to prevent and avoid dangers which may grow by Popish Recusants" (3 Jac. I, v). The first of these two wicked laws enacted that all convicted recusants should communicate once a year in the Anglican church under penalty of £200 for the first, £500 for the second, and £600 for the third. Moreover the king was to be allowed to refuse the penalty of £20 per month for non-attendance at the Anglican church, and to take in its place all the personal property and two-thirds of the real property of the offender. But the main point of this Act was the new Oath of Allegiance which it prescribed, and which was subsequently confirmed by the Holy See. Yet all who refused it were to be subjected to the penalties of Preamunire, except married women, who were to be imprisoned in the common jail. Finally, every householder of whatever religion was liable to a fine of £10 a month for each guest or servant who failed to attend the Anglican church.

The second Act was even worse, and the Catholic historian Tierney justly says of it that it "exceeded in cruelty all that had hitherto been devised for the oppression of the devoted Catholics". It prohibited recusants from remaining within ten miles of the city of London, a provision which it was impossible to enforce in practice; and also fixed the usual place of residence till they had obtained licence from four magistrates and the bishop of the diocese or lieutenant of the county. They were disabled from practising as lawyers, physicians, apothecaries; from holding office in any court or corporation; from holding commissions in the army or navy, or any office of emolument under the State; from discharging the duties of executors, administrators, or guardians. Any married woman who had not received the sacrament in the Anglican church for a year before her husband's death forfeited two-thirds of her dowry, two-thirds of her jointure, and was debarred from acting as executrix to her husband's property; children part of his property; husbands and wives, if married otherwise than by a Protestant minister in a Protestant church, were each deprived of all interest in the lands or property of the other. They were fined £100 for omitting to have each of their children baptized by the Protestant minister within a month of birth. All Catholics going abroad, or keeping any school, were subject to the penalty of £100, introduced by the Discovery Act. A recusant who had been deprived of his licence from king or Privy Council were incapable of benefiting by gift, devise, or descent, till they returned and took the oath of allegiance; and in the meantime the property was to be held by the nearest Protestant heir. And, lastly, every convicted recusant was excommunicated, and if he persisted in refusing to take the oath, was subject to the result that they were debarred from maintaining or defending any personal action or suit in the civil courts. Their houses were liable to be searched at any time, their arms and ammunition to be seized, and any books or furniture which were deemed superstitions to be destroyed.

The two remaining statutes of James I were: "An Act to cause persons to be naturalized or restored in blood to conform and take the oath of allegiance and supremacy" (7 Jac. I, ii) and "An Act for the reformation of the Duty of Recusant Women, and administration of the oath of allegiance to all civil, military, ecclesiastical and professional persons" (7 Jac. I, vii). The chief effect of this latter Act was to cause the oath to be offered to all persons over eighteen, and to empower the committed to prison any recusant married woman, unless her husband paid £10 a month for her liberty.

During the reign of Charles I the only penal statute was a short "Act to restrain the passing or sending of any to be Popish bred beyond the Seas" (3 Car. I, iii), which re-enacted the provisions in 3 Jac. I, c. 5, adding that offenders should be disabled from prosecuting any civil actions in law or equity; from acting as guardian, executor, or administrator; receiving any legacy or deed of gift, or bearing any office within the realm. Moreover, such offender was to forfeit all his lands and personal property.

After the Restoration in 1660 an attempt was made by Charles II, not unmindful of the sacrifices Catholics had made in the Thirty Years' War, to obtain a repeal of the Penal Laws, and a committee of the House of Lords was appointed to examine and report on the question. The matter, however, was allowed to drop; and in the following year both Houses of Parliament joined in petitioning the king to issue a proclamation against the Catholics. Further efforts on the part of the king came to nothing, and matters remained on the same footing till the latter part of his reign, when new statutes of a harassing nature were passed. With the exception of the Corporation Act (13 Car. II, St. 2, c. 1), which was not aimed against Catholics directly, but which provided that no person could hold any municipal office without taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy and receiving the sacrament in the Protestant church, no new measures were introduced till 1673, when Parliament passed the Test Act (25 Car. II, ii). This required all officers, civil and military, to take the same oaths and to make the Declaration against Transubstantiation. Five years later another Act was passed (30 Car. II, c. 2), which debarred all Catholics from sitting or voting in Parliament, by requiring every member of either House to take the two oaths and to make the blasphemous Declaration against popery. From this statute, which was entitled "An Act for the more effectual preserving the King's person and government, by disabling Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament", a special exception was made in favour of the Duke of York, afterwards James II.

With the Revolution of 1688 began a new era of persecution. The "Act for further preventing the growth of Popery" (11 & 12 Geo. III, 1), passed in 1721, introduced a system of retaining the clergy by offering a reward of £100 for the apprehension of any priest, with the result that Catholics were placed at the mercy of common informers who harassed them for the sake of gain, even when the Government would have left them in peace. It was further enacted that any bishop or priest exercising episcopal or sacramental duties without due licence should be retained by the king, or keeping a school, should be imprisoned for life; that any Catholic over eighteen not taking the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, or making the Declaration against Popery, should be incapable of inheriting or purchasing any lands; and any lands devised to a Catholic who refused the oath could pass to the next of kin who happened to be a Protestant. A reward of £100 was also offered for the conviction of any Catholic sending children to be educated abroad.

The cruel operation of this Act, which made itself felt throughout the ensuing century, was extended by a measure passed under Queen Anne (12 Anne, St. 2, c. 11), though Catholics were not generally molested during her reign.

The last penal statutes to be enacted were those of George I. By I Geo. I, St. 2, c. 13, the Hanoverian Succession Oaths were to be taken by all Catholics to whom they were tendered, under penalty of all the forfeitures to which "popish recusant convicts" were liable. This was followed by another Act (I Geo. I, St. 2, c. 50) appointing commissioners to inquire into the estates of popish recusants with a view to confiscating two-thirds of each estate. The scope of "An Act to oblige Papists to register their names and real estates" (I Geo. I, St. 2, c. 55) is sufficiently indicated by its title. It added to the expense of all transactions in land, the more galling as Catholics were doubly taxed under the annual land-tax acts. (See also I Geo. III, c. 60.) In 1722 was passed "An Act for granting an aid to his Majesty by levying a Tax upon Papists" (9 Geo. I, c. 18), by which the sum of one hundred thousand pounds was wrung from the impoverished Catholics. Throughout the reign of George II the penal statutes and additions to the penal code and under his successor, George III (1760-1820), the work of repeal was begun.

Even this lengthy enumeration is not absolutely exhaustive, and the Acts here cited contain many minor enactments of a vexatious nature. The task of repeal was a long, slow, gradual, and complicated one, the chief measure taken from this period being the Catholic Relief Act of 1778, which enabled Catholics to inherit and purchase land and repealed the Act of William III, rewarding the conviction of priests (see Burton, Life and Times of Bishop Challoner, ch. xxii); the second Catholic Relief Act of 1791, which relented all Catholics who took the oath therein prescribed and substituted the Act of the Catholic Ward. "Dawn of the Catholic Revival", viii, xiv-xvi; and the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829. The only disqualifications against Catholics which appear to be still in force are those which prohibit the sovereign from being or marrying a Catholic, or any Catholic subject from holding the offices of Lord Chancellor, or President of Ireland.

II. IN SCOTLAND.—The first penal statutes were enacted by the Scottish Parliament of 1550, which, on 14 August, passed three statutes; the first abolishing the jurisdiction of the pope, the second repealing all former statutes in favour of the Catholic Church, the third providing that all who said or heard Mass should be deemed the first offence by the confiscation of their goods and by corporal penalties, for the second by banishment from Scotland, for the third by death. A temporary relaxation of these laws was due to Mary Queen of Scots, and a statute was even passed in 1567 giving liberty to every Scotman to live according to his own religion; but shortly after the Queen's marriage with Bothwell a proclamation was exported from her on 23 May, 1567, by which severe penalties were renewed against all who refused to conform to Protestantism. After Mary's deposition the Parliament of 1568 passed further acts ratifying the establishment of Protestantism, and prohibiting the exercise of any other ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Lomax's Parliament (1571) decreed the apprehension of all persons possessing papal Bulls or dispensations of gifts and provisions of benefices.

The persecution carried on under these statutes by the Privy Council and by the General Assembly was very severe. The Privy Council issued several proclamations during the next half-century; enforcing the law by seizing the lands of Romanists, compelling priests, ordering parents to withdraw their children from Catholic colleges abroad, and rendering husbands liable for the acts of their wives done in support of the Catholic cause. A commission issued in July, 1629, ordered that, should persecuted Catholics take refuge in fortified places, the commissioners should in all cases hunt them out, burn their books, and seize their goods. Though in Scotland there were fewer martyrs than in England or Ireland, yet the persecution fell even more heavily on the rank and file of Catholics, and in some respects they suffered outrages not paralleled in England, such as the simultaneous expulsion of all Catholics from their homes which was ordered to be carried out by the Lord Clerk of the Threestone Ward. "Dawn of the Catholic Revival", viii, xiv-xvi; and the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829. The only disqualifications against Catholics which appear to be still in force are those which prohibit the sovereign from being or marrying a Catholic, or any Catholic subject from holding the offices of Lord Chancellor, or President of Ireland.

At the close of the seventeenth century fresh statutes were passed. In May, 1700, an Act of Parliament offered a reward of five hundred marks for the conviction of any priest or Jesuit; the same statute enabled Catholics from abroad to reclaim their children. After the Act of Union, in 1707, the Penal Laws were still enforced. In addition to the provisions already recorded and other sufferings which they shared with English Catholics, there were galling restrictions peculiar to Scotland. The purchase or dissemination of Catholic books was forbidden under pain of banishment and forfeiture of personal property. They could not be governors, schoolmasters, guardians or factors, and any one who employed them as such was fined a thousand marks. They were fined five hundred marks for teaching "any art, science or exercise of any sort." Any Protestant who became a Catholic forfeited his whole heritable estate to the nearest Protestant.

The first repeal of the Penal Code was effected by the Act for the relief of Scottish Catholics, which received the royal assent in May, 1793, and practically complete liberty was granted to them under the provisions of the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829.

III. IN IRELAND.—Although the penal laws of Ireland were passed by a Protestant Parliament and aimed at depriving Catholics of their faith, such laws were not the outcome of religious motives only.
They often came from a desire to possess the lands of the Irish, from impatience at their long resistance, from the contempt of a ruling for a subject race. (See Ireland, The Anglo-Norman.) When Henry VIII broke with Rome sectarian rancour came to enthrall racial differences. The English Parliament passed the Act of Supremacy, making Henry head of the Church; but the Irish Parliament was less compliant. It did not recognise the supremacy of the powers of the representatives of the clergy had been taken away. And though the Act of Supremacy (1536) was accepted by so many Irish chiefs, they were not followed by the clergy or people in their apostasy. The suppression of monasteries followed, entailing the loss of so much property and even of many lives. It did not bring about the introduction of new doctrines either in Henry's reign or in that of his successor, and Mary's restoration of the Faith led the Protestant Elizabeth to again resort to penal laws. In 1559 the Irish Parliament passed both the Act of Supremacy and the Act of Uniformity, the former prescribing to all others the Oath of Supremacy, the latter prohibiting the Mass and commanding the public use of the Book of Common Prayer. Whoever refused the Oath of Supremacy was dismissed from office, and whoever refused to attend the Protestant service was fined 12 pence for each offence. A subsequent viceregal proclamation ordered all priests to return to their churches, and if they did not, they could be arrested, tried, and beheaded. For some time these Acts and proclamations were not rigorously enforced; but after 1570, when Elizabeth was excommunicated by the pope, toleration ceased; and the hunting down of the Earl of Desmond, the desolation of Munster, the torturing of O'Hurley and others, showed how merciless the persecution might be. Elizabeth disliked Parliaments and had but two in her reign in Ireland. She governed by proclamation, as did her successor James, and it was under a proclamation (1611) that the blood of O'Devany, Bishop of Down, was shed.

In the next reign there were periods of toleration followed by the false promises of Strafford and the attempted spoliation of Comnought, until at last the Catholics took up arms. Cromwell disliked Parliaments as much as Elizabeth or James, and when he had extinguished the Rebellion of 1641, he abolished the Irish Parliament, giving Ireland a small representation at Westminster.

The Protestant Westminster Parliament that the Cromwellian settlement was carried out, and so many Catholics were outlawed. As for ecclesiastics, no mercy was shown them under Cromwellian rule. They were ordered to leave Ireland, and put to death if they refused, or deported to the Arran Isles or to Barbadoes, and those who sheltered them at home were liable to the penalty of death. To such an extent was the persecution carried that the Catholic churches were soon in ruins, a thousand priests were driven into exile, and not a single bishop remained in Ireland but the old and helpless Bishop of Kilmore. With the accession of Charles II the Irish Catholics looked for a restoration of lands and liberties; but the measures of the Act of Settlement (1663) were finally dissipated by the Act of Explanation (1665), and the Catholics, plundered by the Cromwellians, were denied even the justice of a trial. The English Parliament at the same time prohibited the importation into England of Irish cattle, sheep, or pigs; and in 1669 they carried through the Act of Indemnity of Catholicity, but was overruled by the bigotry of the House. In England and of the viceregal, Ormond, in Ireland; and if the reign of Charles saw some toleration, it also saw the judicial murder of Venerable Oliver Plunkett and a proclamation by Ormond, in 1678, ordering that all priests should leave the country, and that all Catholic churches and convents should be closed.

The triumph of the Catholics under James II was short-lived. But even when William of Orange had triumphed, toleration of Catholicity was not restored. For the Treaty of Limerick (1691) gave the Catholics "such privileges as they enjoyed in the reign of Charles II"; and William was to obtain from the Irish Parliament a further relaxation of the penal laws in existence. The treaty was soon broken. The English Parliament, presuming to legislate for Ireland, and its provisions entailing the loss of the Oath of Supremacy and subscribing to a declaration against Transubstantiation; and the Irish Parliament, filled with slaves and bigots, accepted this legislation. Catholics were thus excluded; and in spite of the declared wishes of King William, the Irish Parliament not only refused to relax the penal laws but enacted new legislation. Session after session, for nearly fifty years, new and more galling fetters were forged, until at last the Penal Code was complete, and well merited the description of Burke: "as well fitted for the oppression, impoverishment and degradation of a feeble people and the debasement in them of human nature itself as ever proceeded from the perceived ingenuity of man". All bishops, deans, vicars-general, and friars were to leave the country and if they returned, to be put to death. Secular priests at home could remain if they were registered; in 1709, however, they were required to take an oath of abjuration which no Catholic could take, and the registration ceased to be a protection. They could not set up schools at home nor resort to Catholic schools abroad, nor could they receive legacies for Catholic charities, nor have on their churches steeple, cross, or bell.

The laws were no better off than the clergy in the matter of civil rights. They could not set up Catholic schools, nor teach in such, nor go abroad to Catholic schools. They were excluded from Parliament, from the corporations, from the army and navy, from the legal profession, and from all civil offices. They could not act as sheriffs, or under sheriffs, or as jurors, or even as constables. They could not have more than two Catholic apprentices in their trade; they could not carry arms, nor own a horse worth more than £5; they were excluded even from residence in the larger corporate towns. To bury their dead in an old ruined abbey or monastery involved a penalty of ten pounds. A Catholic workman refusing to work on Catholic holy days was to be whipped; and there was the same punishment for those who made pilgrimages to any well dedicated to the Virgin Mary, as guardian to an infant, nor as director of the Bank of Ireland; nor could he marry a Protestant, and the priest who performed such a marriage ceremony was to be put to death. A Catholic could not acquire land, nor buy it, nor hold a mortgage on it; and the Catholic landlord was bound at death to leave his estate to his children in equal shares. During life, if the wife or son of such became a Protestant, she or he at once obtained separate maintenance. The law presumed every Catholic to be faithless, disloyal, and untruthful, assumed him to exist only to be punished, and the ingenuity of the Legislature was exhausted in discovering new methods of repression. Victors were execrated to his friend. These Protestant legislators in possession of Catholic lands wished to make all Catholics helpless and poor. Without bishops they must soon be without priests, and without schools they must necessarily go to the Protestant schools. These hopes however proved vain. Students went to foreign colleges, and bishops came from abroad, facing in-prisonment and death. The schoolmaster taught under a sheltering hedge, and the priest said Mass by stealth, watched over by the people, and in spite of priest-hunter and penal laws. Nor were the Catholics won over by such Protestant ministers as they saw, men without zeal and often without faith, not unlike the bishops of Elizabeth's day—"of fleshy incontinency, greedy avarice and disorderly lives." In other respects the Penal Laws succeeded. They made the Catholics helpless, ignorant, and poor, without the strength to rebel, the hope of redress, or even the courage to complain.

At last the tide turned. The Catholics, too poor to excite the cupidity of their oppressors, too feeble to rebel, the Catholics had nevertheless shown that they would not become Protestants; and the repression of a feeble people, merely for the sake of repression, had tarnished the name of England, and alienated her friends among the Catholic nations. In these circumstances the Irish Parliament began to retrace its steps, and concessions were made, slowly and gradually. At first the Penal Laws ceased to be rigorously enforced, and then, in 1771, Catholics were allowed to take leases of unclaimed bog for sixty-one years. Three years later they were allowed to substitute an Oath of Allegiance for the Oath of Supremacy; and in 1778 Garrievil's Act allowed them to retain leases of land for 99 years, and allowed Catholic landlords to leave their estates to one son, instead of having, as hitherto, to divide between all. In 1782 a further Act enabled Catholics to set up schools, with the leave of the Protestant bishop of the place, enabling them also to own horses in the same way as Protestants, and further permitting bishops and priests to reside in Ireland. Catholics were also allowed to act as guardians to children. Gratton favoured complete equality between Catholics and Protestants, but the bigots in Parliament were too strong, and among them were the so-called patriot leaders, Charlemont and Flood. Not till 1792 was there another Act allowing Catholics to marry Protestants to profess at the same form of religion, and to set up Catholic schools without obtaining a licence from the Protestant bishop. These concessions were obtained by the Catholic Committee, long charged with the care of Catholic interests, and which had lately passed from the feeble leadership of Lord Kenmare to the more capable leadership of John Keogh. The newly elected Irish Representatives had also been pitted to the English, and English ministers dreaded having Ireland discontented. For these reasons the Catholic Relief Bill of 1793 became law. This gave Catholics the parliamentary and municipal franchise, enabled them to become jurors, magistrates, sheriffs, and officers in the army and navy. They might carry arms under certain conditions, and they were admitted to the degrees of Trinity College, though not to its emoluments or higher honours. Two years later the advent of Lord Fitzwilliam as viceroy was regarded as the herald of complete religious equality. But Pitt suddenly changed his mind, and, having resolved on a legislative union, it suited his purpose better to refer the question of Irish legislation to a Treaty Establishment. The Treaty Establishment, though the prejudice against Catholics in no wise diminished, persisted almost to the Revolution in the curious Act of 1755, "for Disarming Papists", during the French and Indian Wars. Other colonies maintaining the Establishment were North and South Carolina. Penalizing laws were here almost exclusively directed to the purpose of maintaining it upon a growing class of wealthy landowners whose religious-indifference to the Tory Church soon arrogated to itself political rather than spiritual independence. Intolerance of Catholics was legally expressed.

PENAL LAWS IN THE ENGLISH COLONIES IN AMERICA.

The first Anglican Charter in 1660 established the Anglican Church. The second, in 1669, repeated the terms of the establishment and prescribed the Oath of Supremacy. In support of the Establishment, the draconian laws of Governor Dale in 1611 were directed mainly against the moral laxity of the colonists and were soon abrogated. In 1629, Charles I ordered that the Assembly the Establishment was maintained, but penalizing laws were still directed towards the moral uplift of the church. Intolerance of dissent was latent and implicit. Lord Baltimore, refusing as a Catholic to acknowledge the ecclesiastical supremacy of the king, in 1628 was denied temporary residence in the colony. The practice of a new Act of Uniformity passed the Assembly, fining absentees from service. Another, in 1642, specifically disenfranchised Catholics and enforced the expulsion, within five days, of a priest coming to the colony. Under Governor Berkeley an Act, directed mainly against the Puritan influx, made mandatory the expulsion of Nonconformists; but Puritans remained, afflicting even the Anglican clergy, and gaining a first step toward disestablishment in coercing the Assembly of 1642 to pass a law concerning upon vestries the right of choosing ministers. Under Cromwell this law was confirmed. Toleration was further established, an exception being made against Quakers who, in 1659, had been allowed to return to England, and English ministers dreaded having Ireland discontented. For these reasons the Catholic Relief Bill of 1793 became law. This gave Catholics the parliamentary and municipal franchise, enabled them to become jurors, magistrates, sheriffs, and officers in the army and navy. They might carry arms under certain conditions, and they were admitted to the degrees of Trinity College, though not to its emoluments or higher honours. Two years later the advent of Lord Fitzwilliam as viceroy was regarded as the herald of complete religious equality. But Pitt suddenly changed his mind, and, having resolved on a legislative union, it suited his purpose better to refer the question of Irish legislation to a Treaty Establishment. The Treaty Establishment, though the prejudice against Catholics in no wise diminished, persisted almost to the Revolution in the curious Act of 1755, "for Disarming Papists", during the French and Indian Wars. Other colonies maintaining the Establishment were North and South Carolina. Penalizing laws were here almost exclusively directed to the purpose of maintaining it upon a growing class of wealthy landowners whose religious-indifference to the Tory Church soon arrogated to itself political rather than spiritual independence. Intolerance of Catholics was legally expressed.

Puritan Establishments. —Massachusetts's charter made no mention of religion, and the Puritans were free to construct their absolute theocracy. Episcopacy was repudiated and Congregationalism established. The franchise was limited to church members. Men making active profession of an alien faith were banished, and the Congregational General Church, popularly known as the Church of England, was deprived of its special tax—a privilege it had held for a century. In 1631 came the famous law admitting only church members to civic freedom. In 1635 the magistrates were given inquisitorial powers over the churches themselves. Congregationalism became law and Church and State were identical. Colonists were compelled to live within exercise of civil government. Hence was punished by banishment. Contempt toward ministers merited magisterial reproof, a fine, or standing placarded on a block. In 1656 denial of the Bible meant whipping or banishment, and as late as 1657 a law against "blasphemy and Atheism" was passed, making it a punishable crime of the highest magnitude, subjecting the person to whipping, and baring the tongue with red-hot irons. Catholics of course were not suffered to live in the colony, and Jews, if banished, were to be put to death on return. The latter law was never enforced, though latent intolerance may be detected in such an ordinance as that of 1659 making the observance of Christmas a punishable offense. The persecution of Quakers and the inflicting of the death penalty in four instances brought about a rebellion within the colony which, with the end of the Crown to force recognition of the Anglican Church, worked the initial movement in undermining the theocracy. With the appointment of a royal governor the franchise was broadened. Episcopalianism was established, and it was decreed in 1691 that "forever hereafter there shall be liberty of conscience allowed in the worship of God to all Christians (except Papists)."

In Connecticut, Congregationalism under its famous instrument, the Saybrook Platform, became the State religion. But toleration was unwittingly allowed to every other licensed religion. Even laws against Quakers, apparently unenforced, imposed penalties not upon them but upon the communities that harboured them; while the universal "except Papists" phrase is significantly lacking, though in 1745 a law allowed dissenters "being Protestants" to apply for relief.

The short-lived attempt of the settlement at New Haven to found a theocratic colony based upon the Mosaic Law is interesting only in its failure. The famous "Blue Laws," now known to be ironic forgeries, were not much more severe than the Mosaic perverted and enforced by the New Haven Legislature, according to their own records. The colony was soon incorporated with that of Connecticut, in which democratic tolerance it was speedily absorbed.

The first settlers of New Hampshire established a broadly tolerant congregationalism, which allowed civil privileges to be independent of religious belief, but the Puritan establishment was firmly planted throughout the years of the colony's union with Massachusetts. To the influence of this union, perhaps, may be traced the single example of persecution in the colony, that against three Quakers in 1659. In 1679 the union with Massachusetts was dissolved, and a separation from the New Haven was achieved by the colonial legislature in 1680. The establishment of the Anglican Church. The assembly of 1680 fixed the Congregational Establishment. The franchise was limited to Protestants, and subsequent laws, notably those of 1692, 1702, 1714, defined the union of Church and State, allowing the constable to collect the church tax—that from dissenters to go to the support of the Crown ministers. The Toleration Act of 1690 all citizens were obliged to make a declaration against the pope and the doctrines of the Catholic Church.

Charging Establishments. Under the Duke of York all churches were established with governmental rights, though those of power and induction were placed in the governor's hands. Persecution for conscience's sake seems unrecorded. Much of this tolerant attitude is due to the older Dutch foundation. It was renewed in the "Charter of Liberties", passed by the Assembly in 1694. When the Duke of York came to the throne a faint attempt was made to establish the Anglican Church. Later the council suspended "all Roman Catholics from Command and Places of Trust," and the franchise was soon confined to Protestants. This attitude was given universal royal warrant by the Great Toleration Act, and the Establishment. The Establishment. The establishment seized church property and banished Morailians, under the belief that they were "disguised Catholics"; though they began to be more than a century before the American Revolution.

The Palatinate of Maryland under the Baltimore furnishes, with the Colony of Rhode Island, the first example in history of a complete separation of Church and State with religious tolerance. Religious freedom was proclaimed in the famous Act for Church and Liberty, condemnatory and promulgated carried out. Under this Catholic toleration a Catholic was fined for "interfering with oprobrious proclamations with two Protestants," and Jesuits were refused the privileges of the canon law. The Toleration Act of 1690 denied toleration only to non-Christians and profane persons, but it did not disfranchise Catholics alone persecution endured. They were deprived of all civil and religious rights—the latter only in private houses; the Law of 1704 had a tax of twenty shillings on every Irish servant imported, while in 1715 it was enacted that children of a Protestant father and a Catholic mother could, in case of the father's death, be taken from the mother. However, the first Catholic church of Baltimore was erected without opposition in 1763, though the rights of the franchise were not extended to Catholics until the American Revolution put an end to all penal enactments.

The Presbyterian and Quaker settlers of the Jerseys, under their proprietors, were granted entire liberty of conscience. But with the assumption of the provinces, the Crown seems to have assumed that, per se, the Anglican Church was established, though no specific act to that effect seems to have been passed. At any rate, excepting troubles with Quakers in the French Wars, the annals of New Jersey are free from records of official persecution, though Catholics were disfranchised when Jersey became a royal province. Georgia with its twoscore years of provincial history excluded "Papists" from its confines. The Anglican Church entered with the Crown and was formally established by the colonial legislature in 1758, the settlement remaining from the beginning indifferent toward Dissent.

The Free Colonies. Two colonies, those of Rhode Island and Pennsylvania (with its offspring, Delaware) proclaimed absolute separation of Church and State. The former laboured for long under the accusation of Catholicism based on the prevailing civic religion, but this charge was probably based on an error of the committee that prepared the revised statutes for the public printer; while the Pennsylvania commonwealth departs from the principles of Rhode Island in restricting the right to hold office to Christians and those who believe in the existence of God. In the latter, despite the prevalence of a commonwealth, that part of the Test Oath required under the great Toleration Act, excluding Catholics from civil rights, was adopted by the colonial assembly in 1705 and endured until the Revolution, while the Disarming Act was passed, but never enforced. The only authentic and satisfactory sources for the religious polity of the various colonies are in their own records, many of which may be found in the various State Historical Societies' publications. Penalver y Cardenas, Luis Ignatius, Bishop of New Orleans, Archbishop of Guatemala, son of a wealthy and noble family, b. at Havana, 3 April, 1749; d. 7 Feb., 1820. After studying belles-lettres and philosophy in St. Ignatius College of his native city, he followed there the courses of the University of St. Jerome and in 1771 obtained the degree of Doctor of Theology. Having distinguished himself by his learning and charity, his bishop entrusted him with several missions of an administrative nature, and in 1773 was named provisor and vicar-general. When Pius VI, in deference to the wishes of Carlos IV, King of Spain, created Louisiana and the Floridas a diocese, distinct from that of Santiago de Cuba, the pope ordained him bishop of the new diocese. He was consecrated at Bi. Shop, Spain, 17 December, 1799, and arrived in New Orleans, 17 Jan., 1800. He was the first canon of the diocese, and became the first bishop of the Floridas. He was the last of that line of Bishops of the Floridas who were consecrated in Spain, created Louisiana and the Floridas a diocese, distinct from that of Santiago de Cuba. He was the first bishop of New Orleans, consecrated in New Orleans, and not in Spain. Having obtained permission from the Holy See to go to New Orleans, Bishop Penalver published an "Instructivo para el gobernador y provisor de la diocesis de la Louisiana," which was the first instruction given to the new diocese by a bishop resident in that country. Several years after he arrived in New Orleans, he proceeded to the establishment of a College at the city, and thus began the visitation of the new-created diocese, which then extended over the country known later as the Louisiana Purchase Territory. On 21 April, 1796, he was at Herculve, on 8 November of the same year at New Orleans, and at Pensacola on 7 May, 1798. Upon his return in 1799, he found that the clergy whom he had ordained bitterly of the ignorance, irreligion, and the want of discipline which then prevailed in Louisiana.

Bishop Penalver was promoted to the Archepiscopal See of Guatemala on 20 July, 1801, and by a Rescript from Rome was empowered to transfer his authority in Louisiana and the Floridas to Canon Thomas Hassett, his vicar-general, and to Rev. Patrick Walsh. After a chase by an English war- vessel, Archbishop Penalver arrived at Guatemala, where he so soon to prominence through the interest he manifested in questions that concerned education and the public good. At his own expense he built a hospital and various schools. He resigned his see on 1 March, 1803, and placed the remainder of his life in charitable works. At his death he bequeathed $200,000 to the poor and several important legacies to educational institutions.

JAMES H. BLEEK.

Penance (penitentia) designates (1) a virtue; (2) a sacrament of the New Law; (3) a canonical punishment inflicted according to the earlier discipline of the Church; (4) a work of satisfaction enjoined upon the recipient of the sacrament. These have as their common center the truth that he who sins must repent and as far as possible make reparation to Divine justice. Repentance, i.e., heartfelt sorrow with the firm purpose of sinning no more, is thus the prime condition on which depends the value of whatever the sinner may do or suffer by way of expiation.

I. The Virtue of Penance. Penance is a supernatural moral virtue whereby the sinner is disposed to hatred of his sin as an offence against God and to a firm purpose of amendment and satisfaction. The principal act in the exercise of this virtue is the detestation of sin, not of sin in general nor of that which others commit, but of one's own sin. The motive of this detestation is that sin offends God: to regret evil deeds on account of the mental or physical suffering, the social loss, or the action of human justice which they entail, is natural; but such sorrow does not suffice for expiation. On the other hand, the resolve to amend, while certainly necessary, is not sufficient of itself, i.e., without hatred for sin already committed; such a resolve, in fact, would be meaningless: it would profess obedience to God's law in the future while disregarding the claims of God's justice in the matter of past transgression. Be converted, and do penance for all your iniquities. Cast away from you all your transgressions . . . and make to yourselves a new heart, and a new spirit." (Ezek. xvi, 33-34; if. Joel, ii, 12; Jer.. viii. 6) In the same spirit St. John the Baptist exhorts his hearers: "Bring forth therefore that which is true in you, repentance." (Matt., iii. 9) Such too is the teaching of Christ as expressed in the parables of the Prodigal Son and of the Publican; while the Magdalen who "washed out her sins with her tears" of sorrow, has been for ages the type of the repentant sinner. Theologians, following the doctrine of St. Thomas (Summa, III, Q. lxxxv, a. 1), regard penance as truly a virtue, though they have disputed much regarding its place among the virtues. Penance is a virtue of charity, others with the virtue of religion, others again as a part of justice. Cajetan seems to have considered it as belonging to all three: but most theologians agree with St. Thomas (ibid., a. 2) that penance is a distinct virtue (virtus specialis). The root of this distinction is a praiseworthy act, and in penance this act is performed in a certain manner, i.e., because sin offends God (cf. De Luca, "De penitentiae virtute": Palmieri, "De penitentia", Rome, 1879; theses I-VII).

II. Accessory. — The Council of Trent expressly declares (Sess. XIV, c. 4) that penance was at all times necessary, both for the remission of grievous sin. Theologians have questioned whether or not penance is a virtue in virtue of the positive command of God or independently of such positive precept. The weight of authority is in favour of the latter opinion; moreover, theologians state that in the present order of Divine Providence God Himself cannot forgive sins, if there be no real repentance (St. Thomas, III, Q. lxxxvi, a. 2; Cajetan, ibid.; Palmieri, ibid., c. 1). In the Old Law (Ezek., xviii, 24) life is denied to the man who does impiety; even "his justices which he has done, shall not be remembered"; and Christ restates the doctrine of the Old Testament, saying (Luke, xxiii, 39): "except you do penance, you shall all likewise perish." The same reason that the Old Testament spoke of repentance as necessary as it was in the Old, repentance that includes reformation of life, grief for sin, and willingness to perform satisfaction. In the Christian Dispensation this act of repentance has been subjected by Christ to the judgment and jurisdiction of His Church, whenever there is question of sin committed after the reception of Baptism (Council of Trent, sess. XIV, c. 1), and the Church acting in the name of Christ not only declares that sins are forgiven, but actually and judicially forgives them, if the sinner already repentant subjects his sins to the "power of the keys," and is willing to make condition satisfaction for the wrong he has done.

III. The Sacrament of Penance. — Penance is a sacrament of the New Law instituted by Christ in which forgiveness of sins committed after baptism is granted through the priest's absolution to those who with true sorrow confess their sins and promise to satisfy for the same. It is called a "sacrament" not simply a function or ceremony, because it is an outward sign by which the grace of absolution is given to the soul. As an outward sign it comprises the actions of the penitent in presenting himself to the priest and accusing himself of his sins, and the actions of the priest in pronouncing absolution and imposing satisfaction. This whole procedure is usually called, from one of its parts, ‘confession’; and it is said to take place in the ‘tribunal of penance’, because it is a judicial process in which the penitent is at once the accuser, the person accused, and the witness, while the priest pronounces judgment and sentence. The grand object of penance is the guilt of sin and, in the case of mortal sin, from it complete remission; hence also reconciliation with God, justification. Finally, the confession is made not in the secrecy of the penitent’s heart nor to a layman as friend and advocate, nor to a representative of human authority, but to a duly ordained priest with requisite authority; and with the ‘power of the keys’, i.e., the power to forgive sins which Christ granted to His Church.

By way of further explanation it is needful to correct certain erroneous views regarding this sacrament which not only misrepresent the actual practice of the Church but also lead to a false interpretation of theological statement and historical evidence. From what has been said it should be clear: (1) that penance is not a mere human invention devised by the Church to secure power over consciences or to relieve the emotional strain of troubled souls; it is the ordinary means appointed by Christ for the remission of sin and the securing of forgiveness. Once he has sinned, he must seek pardon not on conditions of his own choosing but on those which God has determined, and these for the Christian are embodied in the Sacrament of Penance. (2) No Catholic believes that a priest simply as an individual man, however pious or learned, has power to forgive sins. This power belongs to God alone; but He can and does exercise it through the ministration of men. Since He has seen fit to exercise it by means of this sacrament, it cannot be said that the Church or the priest interferes between the soul and God; on the contrary, penance is the removal of the one obstacle that keeps the soul away from God. (3) It is not true that for the Catholic the mere “telling of one’s sins” suffices to obtain their forgiveness. Without sincere sorrow and purpose of amendment, confession avails nothing, the pronouncement of absolution is of no effect, and the guilt of the sinner is greater than before. (4) The sacra- ments of Divine mercy facilitates the pardoning of sin, it by no means renders sin less hateful or its consequences less dreadful to the Christian mind; much less does it imply permission to commit sin in the future. In paying ordinary debts, e.g., by monthly settlements, the intention of contracting new debts with the same bonds in order that he may live with similar intention on the part of him who confesses his sins would not only be wrong in itself but would nullify the sacrament and prevent the forgiveness of sins then and there confessed. (5) Strangely enough, the opposite charge is often heard, viz., that the confession of sin is intolerable and hard and therefore alien to the spirit of Christianity and the loving kindness of its Founder. But this view, in the first place, overlooks the fact that Christ, though merciful, is also just and exacting. Furthermore, however painful or humiliating confession may be, it is but a light penalty for the violation of God’s law. Finally, those who are in earnest about their salvation count no hardship too great whereby they can win back God’s friendship. Both these accusations, of too great leniency and too great severity, proceed as a rule from those who have no experience with the sacrament and only the vaguest ideas of what it means, or who have no power to forgive sins which the Church received from Christ.

Teaching of the Church.—The Council of Trent (1551) declares: “As a means of regaining grace and justice, penance was at all times necessary for those who had defiled their souls with any mortal sin. . . . Before the coming of Christ, penance was not a sacrament, nor is it since His coming a sacrament for those who are not baptized. But the Lord then principally instituted the Sacrament of Penance, when, being raised from the dead, He breathed upon His disciples saying: Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained” (John, xx, 22-23). By which action so signal and words so clear the consent of all the Fathers has ever understood that the power of forgiving and retaining sins was communicated to the Apostles and to their lawful successors, for the reconciliation of the faithful who have fallen into sin (see XV, 1). Farther on (v) the council expressly states that Christ “left priests, His own vicars, as judges (per- siders et juicetces), unto whom all the mortal crimes into which the faithful may have fallen should be revealed in order that, in accordance with the power of the keys, they may pronounce the sentence of forgiveness or retention of sins”. Power to Forgive Sins.—It is noteworthy that the fundamental objection so often urged against the Sacrament of Penance was first thought of by the Scriptures when Christ said to the sick man of the palsy: Thys sins are forgiven thee. And there were some of the scribes and of the Pharisees, sitting by, began to reason in themselves, saying: Why doth this man speak thus, blasphemy? Who can forgive sins, but God only? But Jesus seeing their thoughts, said to them: Which is easier to say to the sick of the palsy: Thy sins are forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, take up thy bed and walk? But that you may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (be saith to the sick of the palsy.) I say to thee: Arise, take up thy bed, and go into thy house” (Mark, ii, 5-11; Matt., ix, 2-7). Christ wrought a miracle to show that He had power to forgive sins and that this power could be exerted not only in heaven but also on earth. This power, moreover, He transmitted to Peter and the other Apostles. To Peter He says: And I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth, it shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven” (Matt., xvi, 19). In the apostolic age, the Apostles, with Peter’s consent, pronounced absolutions and pronounced the same with Peter’s full authority (see Acts, viii, 17). This was the right and proper exercise of the power given to Peter and his successors. Henceforward the Church, retaining this exercise of power as a part of her Petrine ministry, has been the one mediatrix of grace and salvation, and ever since the sacrifice of Christ on Calvary has been the one mediator for all men (see Rom. v, 1-19). Finally, this power has been delegated to the whole body of the Church, since the immediate possession of the keys is not a peculiar prerogative of the Bishop of Rome. However, it should be clearly understood that the Church in promulgating in Christ’s name the word of God believes that the gift of the Holy Spirit given at Pentecost has been entrusted to the Bishops and their successors. Hence, while the Church everywhere has popularly exercised this power, and while the Pope has been the ordinary leader of this exercise, the power is not vested in the Pope alone. But it is also necessary to recognize that the exercise of this power which is, after all, the expression of God’s forgiveness, is lived out only in the Body of Christ and, therefore, is developed in the Church. The power to forgive sins is given to the Church as a whole, and not to the Pope nor to the Bishop individually. This is the teaching of the great Church Father, St. Irenaeus (A.D. 135). When the Church was forced to give its teaching on this great matter, the Church of the East was more explicit than the Church of the West. Thus the church of Antioch was very explicit on this point in its Constitutions of the Holy Council of Chalcedon (451): “Even so, brothers, we believe that the surest rule of faith is, that Christ, Our Lord having said: ‘All power is given unto Me in heaven and on earth; therefore go to all nations and make them disciples of Mine, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and whatsoever you shall bind on earth, let it be done in heaven, and whatsoever you shall loose on earth, let it be loosed in heaven’ (Matt. xvi, 19), has given to the apostles the power to forgive sins only on condition that they be committed in their person or their authority, and that they shall remain in the power of man as the one power in the Church, so that the Church, acting through the power of the holy Spirit, may work the salvation of souls, and according to the grace of the Lord may perform the works of Christ. For in the will of God, which is to be done in the Church, there is no difference between the power of the Spirit and the power of the Redeemer, nor is there such a separation of persons as that within the Church there should be one who commandeth, another who acteth, and another who suffereth. For in the power of the Spirit no one parteth from the other, nor is there any other power than His. For who is that crafty man, who is he that would command again the power of the Holy Spirit or of the Holy Church? Who is he that would command the work of the First-born of the saints, stronger and more powerful than any man or angel? Who is he that would command the works which the Father hath willed for the salvation of man? . . . Therefore there is only one power in the Church, and that the power of the Redeemer. . . . But wherefore we have said: ‘that whatsoever you shall bind on earth’ . . .” (Constit)i. 60). From this it is clear that the Church has the power to forgive sins, and that this power has been transmitted to her through the apostles and their successors, the Popes. This power is exercised in accord with the teaching of the Church and the decrees of the councils of the Church. It is, therefore, the Church that forgives sins through the power of the keys which Christ granted to Her. But the Council of Trent declares, Christ principally instituted the Sacrament of Penance after His Resurrection, a miracle greater than that of healing the sick. “As the Father hath sent me, I also send you. When He had said this, He breathed on them; and He said to them: Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained” (John, xx, 22-23). While the sense of these words is quite obvious, the following points are to be considered: (a) Christ here reiterates in the plainest terms—“sins”, “forgive”, “retain”—what He had previously stated in figurative language, “bind” and
The sinner withhold declaration sin founding is are "loose", only effected merely after two often exercise the the death; and received them; therefore, apostles power shall be granted. Hence, it was not a concept of the reconciliation of the Christian sins by the authority of the Church, but the Church by very slow degrees only grew accustomed to this concept. Moreover, even after penance came to be recognized as an institution of the Church, it was not called by the name of sacrament, because it was regarded as an idiots salvation. It would need a special revelation in each case to make the declaration valid. (d) The power is twofold—to forgive or to retain, i.e., the Apostles are not told to grant or withhold forgiveness indiscriminately; they must act judicially, forgiving or retaining according as the sinner deserves. (e) The exercise of this power in granting or retaining forgiveness does not rest on any distinction is made or even suggested between one kind of sin and another, or between one class of sinners and all the rest: Christ simply says "whose sins your", (f) The sentence pronounced by the Apostles (remission or retention) is also God's sentence—"they are forgiven... they are retained" in fact was the words of Christ that the Apostles had power to forgive sins. But this was not a personal prerogative that was to cease at their death; it was granted to them in their official capacity and hence as a permanent institution in the Church—no less permanent than the mission to teach and baptize all nations. Christ foresaw that even those who were professedly baptized and had a lifetime of the Apostles or later, would fall into sin and therefore would need forgiveness in order to be saved. He must, then, have intended that the power to forgive should be transmitted from the Apostles to their successors and be used as long as there would be sinners in the Church, and that means to the end of time. It is true that in baptism sins are forgiven, but this does not warrant the view that the power to forgive is simply the power to baptize. In the first place, as appears from the texts cited above, the power to forgive is also the power to retain; its exercise involves a judicial act. But no such action is implied in the commission to baptize (Matt., xxviii, 19). In the succeeding generations, the Church does not pass judgment on those who are not yet members of the Church, and membership is obtained through baptism. Furthermore, baptism, because it is a new birth, cannot be repeated, whereas the power to forgive sins (penance) is to be used as often as the sinner may need it. Hence the condemnation, by the same Council, of any one who, confounding the sacraments, should say that baptism itself is the Sacrament of Penance, as though these two sacraments were not distinct and as though penance were not rightly called the second plunk after shipwreck (Sess., XIV, can. 2 de sac. porn.). These pronouncements were directed against the Protestant teaching which held that penance was merely a sort of repeated baptism; and as baptism effected no real forgiveness of sin but only an external covering over of sin through faith alone, the same, it was alleged, must be the case with penance. This, then, as a sacrament is superfluous; absolution is only a declaration that sin is forgiven through faith, and satisfaction is necessary because Christ has suffered once for all men. This was the first sweeping and radical denial of the Sacrament of Penance. Some of the earlier sects had claimed that only priests in the state of grace could validly absolve, but they had not denied the existence of the power to forgive. During all the preceding centuries, Catholic belief in the power to forgive thereby clarifying the former teaching that sin had to be set aside or to make the effort to strike at the very constitution of the Church and reject the whole content of Tradition.

Belief and Practice of the Early Church.—Among the modernistic propositions condemned by Pius X in the Decree Lamentabili sine (3 July, 1907) are the following: "In the apostolic Church there was no concept of the reconciliation of the Christian sinner by the authority of the Church, but the Church by very slow degrees only grew accustomed to this concept. Moreover, even after penance came to be recognized as an institution of the Church, it was not called by the name of sacrament, because it was regarded as an idiot's salvation. It would need a special revelation in each case to make the declaration valid. He must, then, have intended that the power to forgive should be transmitted from the Apostles to their successors and be used as long as there would be sinners in the Church, and that means to the end of time. It is true that in baptism sins are forgiven, but this does not warrant the view that the power to forgive is simply the power to baptize. This, then, as a sacrament is superfluous; absolution is only a declaration that sin is forgiven through faith, and satisfaction is necessary because Christ has suffered once for all men. This was the first sweeping and radical denial of the Sacrament of Penance. Some of the earlier sects had claimed that only priests in the state of grace could validly absolve, but they had not denied the existence of the power to forgive. During all the preceding centuries, Catholic belief in the power to forgive thereby clarifying the former teaching that sin had to be set aside or to make the effort to strike at the very constitution of the Church and reject the whole content of Tradition.
extends to all sins: “God makes no distinction; He promised mercy to all and to His priests He granted the authority to pardon without any exception” (op. cit., I, iii, 10). Against the same heretics St. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, in one of his letters: “This (forgiving sins), you say, only God can do. Quite true: but what He does through His priests is the doing of His own power” (Ep. I ad Sympon, 6 in P. L., XIII, 1057).

In the East during the same period we have the testimony of St. Cyril of Alexandria (d. 147): “Men_filled with the Holy Ghost? receive the power of forgiving sins, either by admitting to baptism those who are worthy or by pardoning the penitent children of the Church” (In Joan., 1, 12 in P. G., LXXIV, 722). St. John Chrysostom (d. 407) after declaring that neither angels nor the archangels have received such power, and after showing that earthly rulers can bind only the bodies of men, declares that the priest’s power of forgiving sins “penetrates to the soul and reaches up to heaven”. Wherefore, he concludes, “it were manifest folly to condemn so great a power without which we can neither obtain heaven nor come to the fulfillment of the promises. Not only when they (the priest) deny that they can forgive sins, do they draw the Church into birth, they can forgive us our sins” (De sacerd., III, 5 sq.). St. Athanasius (d. 373): “As the man whom the priest baptizes is enlightened by the grace of the Holy Ghost, so does he who in penance confesses his sins, receive through the priest’s forgiveness in virtue of the ‘baptism of Christ’ (frag. contra Novat. in P. G., XXVI, 1315).

These extracts show that the Fathers recognized in penance a power and a utility quite distinct from that of baptism. Repeatedly they compare in figurative language the two methods of obtaining pardon as two gates of the Church, two means of salvation; or, regarding baptism as spiritual birth, they describe penance as the remedy for the ills of the soul contracted after that birth. But a more important fact is that both in the West and in the East, the Fathers constantly appeal to the words of Christ and give them the same interpretation that was given eleven centuries later by the Council of Trent. In this respect they simply echoed the teachings of the earlier Fathers who had defended Catholic doctrine against the heretics of the third and second centuries. Thus St. Cyprian (q. v.) in his “De latais” (a. d. 251) rebukes those who had fallen away in time of persecution, but he also exhorts them to penance: “Let each confess his sins, and if he can say (who can say that he cannot) that his confession can be received, while satisfaction and the forgiveness granted by the priests is acceptable to God” (c. xix). (See LAETITIA.) The heretic Novatian, on the contrary, asserted that “it is unlawful to readmit apostates to the communion of the Church; their forgiveness must be left with God who alone can grant it” (Sozomen, “Hist. ecc.”, V, xxviii). Novatian and his party did not at first deny the power of the Church to absolve from sin; they affirmed that apostasy placed the sinner beyond the reach of that power—an error which was condemned by a synod at Rome in 231. (See NOVATIANISM.)

The distinction between sins that could be forgiven and others that could not, originated in the latter half of the second century as the doctrine of the Montanists (q. v.), and especially of Tertullian (q. v.). While still a Catholic, Tertullian wrote (a. d. 200-6) his “De penitentia” in which he distinguishes two kinds of penance, one as a preparation for baptism, the other (to be obtained by certain graves sins committed after baptism, i.e., apostasy, murder, and adultery. For these, however, he allows only one forgiveness: “Foreseeing these poisoms of the Evil One, God, although the gate of forgiveness has been shut and fastened up with the bar of baptism, has permitted it still to stand somewhat open. In the vestible He has stationed a second repentance for opening to such as knock; but now once for all, because now for the second time; but never more, because the last time it had been in vain... However, if any do mourn the debt of second repentance, and if his sins not to be forsworn cut down and undermined by despair. Let it be irksome to sin again, but let it not be irksome to repent again: let it be irksome to imperil oneself again, but let no one be ashamed to be set free again. Repeated sickness must have repeated medicine” (De pen., VII). Tertullian does not deny that the Church can free heretics who warn sinners against relapse, yet exhorts them to repent in case they should fall. His attitude at the time was not surprising, since in the early days the sins above mentioned were severely dealt with: this was done for disciplinary reasons, not because the Church lacked power to forgive.

In the minds, however, of some people the idea was developing that not only the exercise of the power but the power itself was limited. Against this false notion Pope Callistus (218-22) published his “peremptory edict” in which he declares: “I forgive the sins both of adultery and of fornication to those who have done them” (Tertullian, in his Apology, written “De paedieta” (a. d. 217-22). In this work he rejects without scruple what he had taught as a Catholic: “I blush not at an error which I have cast off because I am delighted at being rid of it; one is not ashamed of his own improvement.” The “peremptory edict” of which he computes to Callistus and the Catholics was that the Church could forgive all sins: this, therefore, was the orthodox doctrine which Tertullian the heretic denied. In place of it he sets up the distinction between lighter sins which the bishop could forgive and more grievous sins which God alone could forgive. Though in an earlier treatise, “Ad Hippolytum” (c. x), that “the Lord sent me here to Peter and through him to the Church the keys of heaven”, he now denies that the power granted to Peter had been transmitted to the Church, i.e., to the numerus episcoporum or body of bishops. Yet he claims this power for the “spirituals” (pneumatics), although these, for prudential reasons, do not make use of it. To the arguments of the “Psychiat”, as he termed the Catholics, he replies: “But the Church, you say, has the power to forgive sin. This I, even more than you, acknowledge and adjudge. I who in the new prophets have the Paraclete saying: ‘The Church can forgive sin, but I will not do that (forgive)” (De pen., XV, vii). Thus Tertullian, by the accession which he makes against the pope and by the restriction which he places upon the exercise of the power of forgiving sin, bears witness to the existence of that power in the Church which he had abandoned.

Not content with asseizing Callistus and his doctrine, Tertullian refers to the “Shepherd” (Pastor), a work written a. d. 110-51, and takes its author Hermas (q. v.) to task for favouring the pardon of adulterers. In the days of Hermes there was evidently a school of rigorists who insisted that there was no pardon for sin committed after baptism (Simp., VIII, vii). Against this school the author of the “Pastor” takes a resolute stand. He teaches that by penance the sinner may hope for reconciliation with God and with the Church. “Go and tell all to repent and they shall live unto God. Because the Lord having had compassion, has sent me to give repentance to all men, although not all are worthy of it on account of their works” (Simp., VIII, ii). Hermas, moreover, seems to think that one opportunity for such reconciliation, for in Mandate IV, i, he seems to state categorically that “there is but one repentance for the servants of God”, and further on in c. iii he says the Lord has had mercy on the work of his hands and hath set repentance for them; “and he has entrusted to me the power of this repenance. And therefore I say to you, if any one has sinned... he has opportunity to repent once". Repentance is therefore possible at least once in virtue of a power vested in the priest of God. That Hermes here intends to say that the sinner could be absolved only once in his whole life is by no means a necessary conclusion. His words may well be understood as referring to public penance (see below), and as thus understood they imply no limitation on the sacramental power itself. The same interpretation applies to the statement of Clement of Alexandria (d. circa A. D. 213): "For God being very merciful has vouchsafed in the case of those who, though in faith, have fallen into transgression, a second repentance, so that should anyone be tempted after his calling, he may still receive a penance not to be repented of" (Stromata, II, xiii).

The existence of a regular system of penance is also hinted at in the work of Clement, "Who is the rich man that shall be saved?", where he tells the story of the Apostle John and his journey after the young bandit. John pledged his word that the youthful robber would find forgiveness from the Saviour: but even then a long serious penance was necessary before he could be restored to the Church. And when Clement concludes that "he who welcomes the angel of penance... will not be ashamed when he sees the Saviour", most commentators think he alludes to the bishop or priest who presided over the ceremony of public penance. Even earlier, Dionysius of Corinth (d. circa A. D. 170), setting himself against certain growing Marcionistic traditions, taught not only that Christ has left to His Church the power of pardon, but that no sin is so great as to be excluded from the exercise of that power. For this we have the authority of Eusebius, who says (Hist. eccl., IV, xxiii): "And writing to the Church which is in Amastris, together with those in Pontus, he commands them to receive those who come back after any fall, whether it be delinquency or heresy".

The "Didache" (q. v.) written at the close of the first century or early in the second, in IV, xvi, and again in IV, i, commands an individual confession in the congregation: "In the congregation thou shalt confess thy transgressions"; or again: "On the Lord's Day come together and break bread... having confessed thy transgressions that your sacrifice may be peace" (Clement I, d. 99) in his epistle to the Corinthians not only exhorts to repentance, but begs the seducers to submit themselves to the presbyters and receive correction so as to repent" (c. liii), and Ignatius of Antioch at the close of the first century speaks of the mercy of God to sinners, provided they return "with one consent to the unity of Christ and the communion of the bishop". The clause "communion of the bishop" evidently means the bishop with his council of presbyters as assessors. He also says (Ad Philadelph.) "that the bishop presides over penance".

The transmission of this power is plainly expressed in the prayer used at the consecration of a bishop as recorded in the Canons of Hippolytus (q. v.): "Grant him, O Lord, the episcopate and the spirit of clernency and the power to forgive sins" (c. xvi). Still more explicit is the epistola cited in the "Apostolic Constitutions" (q. v.): "Grant him, O Lord almighty, through Thy Christ, the participation of Thy Holy Spirit, in order that he may have the power to remit sins according to Thy precept and Thy command, and to loosen every bond, whatsoever it be, according to the power which Thou hast granted to the Apostles." (Const. Apost., VIII, 5 in P. G., I, 1073). For the meaning of "episcopus", "sacerdos", "presbyter", as used in ancient documents, see Bishop; Hierarchy.

Exercise of the Power.— The granting by Christ of the power to forgive sins is the first essential of the Sacrament of Penance; in the actual exercise of this power are included the other essentials. The Sacrament as such and on its own account has a matter and a form and it produces certain effects; the power of the keys is exercised by a minister (confessor) who must possess the proper qualifications, and the effects are wrought in the soul of the recipient, i. e., the penitent who with the necessary dispositions must perform certain actions (confession, satisfaction).

Matter and Form.— According to St. Thomas (Summa, III, lxxiv, a. 2) "the acts of the penitent are the proximate matter of this sacrament". This is also the teaching of the Thomists in the "Decretum pro Armenis" (Council of Florence, 1439) which calls them the acts "quaestia materia" of penance and enumerates them as contrition, confession,

- The Thomists in general and other eminent theologians, e.g., Bellarmin, Toletus, Suarez, and De Lugo, hold the same opinion. According to Scotus (In IV Sent., d. 16, q. 1, n. 7) "the Sacrament of Penance is the absolution imparted with certain words" while the acts of the penitent are reserved for the worthy reception of the sacrament. The absolution as an external ceremony is the matter, and, as possessing significative force, the form. Among the advocates of this theory are St. Bonaventure, Capreolus, Andreas Vega, and Maldonatus. The Council of Trent (Sess., XIV, c. 3) declares: "the acts of the penitent, namely confession, correction, and satisfaction, are the quaestia materia of this sacrament". The Roman Catechism (II, v, 13) says: "These actions are called by the Council quaestia materiae not because they have not the nature of true matter, but because they are not the sort of matter which is employed externally as water in baptism and chrism in confirmation". For the theological discussion see Palmieri, op. cit., p. 144 sqq.; Pesch, "Practeiones..." dogmatice”, Freiburg, 1897; De San, “De penitentia”, Bruges, 1899; Pohle, “Lehrh. d. Dogmatik”.

Regarding the form of the sacrament, both the Council of Florence and the Council of Trent teach that it consists in the words of absolution. “The form of the Sacrament of Penance, wherein its force principally consists, is placed in those words of the minister: ‘I absolve thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost’” (Council of Trent, Session XIV, c. 3). Concerning these additional prayers, the use of the Eastern and Western Churches, and the question of whether they are necessary or not, see Absolution. Cf. also the writers referred to in the preceding paragraph.

Effect.—“The effect of this sacrament is deliverance from sin” (Council of Florence). The same definition in somewhat different terms is given by the Council of Trent (Session XIV, c. 3): “So far as pertains to its force and efficacy, the effect (crescit effectus) of this sacrament is reconciliation with God, upon which there sometimes follows, in pious and devout recipients, peace and calm of conscience with intense consolation of spirit.” This reconciliation implies first of all that the guilt of sin is remitted, and consequently also the eternal penalty. According to the Council of Trent declarations, penance requires the performance of satisfaction “not indeed for the eternal penalty which is remitted together with the guilt either by the sacrament or by the desire of receiving the sacrament, but for the temporal penalty which, as the Scriptures teach, is not always forgiven entirely as it is in baptism” (Session VI, c. 1). In other words baptism frees the soul not only from all sin but also from all indebtedness to Divine justice, whereas after the reception of absolution in penance, there may and usually does remain some temporal debt to be discharged by works of satisfaction (see below).

Veial sins by which we are not deprived of the grace of God and info which we very frequently fall are rightly and usefully declared in confession; but mention of them may, without any fault, be omitted and they can be expiated by many other remedies” (Council of Trent, Session XIV, c. 3). Thus, an act of contrition suffices to obtain forgiveness of venial sin, and the same effect is produced by the pious desire of the penitent. As is the case of all the sacraments, the minister of the sacrament grants absolution. Furthermore, the form of its administration is changed when the priest issues the absolution, as he may do “in the name of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost” (Council of Trent, Session XIV, c. 3). The vanishing of temporal merits, which is obtained and received through the intercession of the priest, is not the same as the vanishing of the guilt of sin; it is the Jesuit’s doctrine, moreover, that the minister of the sacrament can give absolution in the name of the Father alone.

The reconciliation of the sinner with God has as a further consequence the removal of those merits which he had obtained before committing grievous sin. Good works performed in the state of grace deserve a reward from God, but this is forfeited by mortal sin, so that if the sinner should die unforgiven his good deeds avail him nothing. So long as he remains in sin, he is incapable of merit: even works which are good in themselves are, in his case, worthless: they cannot revive, because they never were alive. But once his sin is cancelled by penance, he regains not only the state of grace but is also entitled to all the fruits of his good works, lost before. The Minister, i.e., the confessor. From the judicial character of this sacrament it follows that not every member of the Church is qualified to forgive sins; the administration of penance is reserved to those who are invested with authority. That this reserve does not apply to laymen is shown by the Bull of Martin V “Inter eumenas” (1418) which among other questions to be answered by the followers of Wycliff and Huss, has this: “whether he believes that the Christian . . . is bound as a necessary means of salvation to confess to a priest only and not to a layman or to laymen however good and devout” (De cunctis de laicalis ministris). For the authority, that “any Christian, even a woman or a child” could be in the presence of a priest absolve as well as pope or bishop, was condemned (1520) by Leo X in the Bull “Exurge Domine” (Enchir., 753). The Council of Trent (Session XIV, c. 6) condemns as false and as at variance with the truth of the Gospel all doctrines which extend the ministry of the keys to any others than bishops and priests, imagining that the words of the Lord (Matt., xviii, 18; John, xx, 23) were, contrary to the institution of this sacrament, addressed to all the faithful of Christ in such wise that each and every one has the power of remitting sin.

The Catholic doctrine, therefore, is that only bishops and priests can absolve the power to release sin.

These decrees moreover put an end, practically, to the usage, which had sprung up and lasted for some time in the Middle Ages, of confessing to a layman in case of necessity. This custom originated in the conviction that he who had sinned was obliged to make known his sin to some one—to a priest if possible—otherwise to a layman. In the work “On true penance and false” (De vera et falsa penitentia), erroneously ascribed to St. Augustine, the counsel is given: “So great is the power of confession that if a priest be not at hand, let him (the person desiring to confess) confess to his neighbour.” But in the same place the explanation is given: “although he to whom the confession is made has no power to absolve, nevertheless he who confesses to his fellow (socio) becomes worthy of pardon through his desire of confessing to a priest” (P. L., XL, 1113). Lea, who cites (1, 220) the assertion of the Pseudo-Augustine about confession to a layman, gives the precise passage and subsequently sets in a wrong light a series of incidents illustrating the practice and gives but an imperfect idea of the theological discussion which it aroused. Though Albertus Magnus (In IV Sent., dist. 17, art. 58) regarded as sacramental the absolution granted by a layman while St. Thomas (IV Sent., d. 17, q. 3, a. 3, col. 2) speaks of it as “quod namusculo sacramentalis” other great theologians took a quite different view. Alexander of Hales (Summa, Q. xix, De confessione membra, l. a. 1) says that it is an “implorium of absolution”; St. Bonaventure (“Opera”, VII, p. 345, Lyons, 1668) that such a confession even in cases of necessity is not of any real value; merely a sign of contrition; Scotus (IV Sent., d. 11, q. 3, a. 4) that except obliging one to confess to a layman and that this practice may be very detrimental; Durandus of St. Pouicain (IV Sent., d. 17, q. 12) that in the absence of a priest, who alone can absolve in the tribunal of penance, there is no obligation to confess; Prierias (Summa Sylvis, s. d. Confessor, l. 1) that if absolution is given by a layman, the confession is utterly repugnant whenever possible; this in fact was the general opinion. It is not then surprising that Dominicus Soto, writing in 1591, should find it difficult to believe that such a custom ever existed: “since (in confession to a layman) there was no sacrament. . . it is incredible that men, of their own accord, without being naturally inclined to others, should reveal to others the secrets of their conscience” (IV Sent., d. 18, q. 4, a. 1). Since, therefore, the weight of theological opinion gradually turned against the practice and since the practice never received the sanction of the Church, it cannot be urged as a proof that the power to forgive sins belonged at any time to the laity. What the practice does was to make it seem that on the authority of both those who had administered Holy Communion. Moreover, some of the earlier councils (Elvira, A. D. 300; Toledo, 400) and penitentials (Theodore) seemed to grant the power of penance to the deacon (in the priest’s absence). The Council of Tribrur (893) declared in regard to bandits that if, when captured or wounded, they confessed to a priest or a deacon, they should not be denied communion; and this expression “presbytero vel diacono” was incorporated in the Decree of Gratian and in many later documents from the tenth century to the thirteenth. The Council of York (1195) decreed that except in the gravest necessity the deacon should not baptize, give communion, or “impose penance,”--penitentia dura, impunire. It is generally the same enactments are found in the Councils of London (1200) and Rouen (1231), the constitutions of St. Edmund of Canterbury (1236), and those of Walter of Kirkham, Bishop of Durham (1255). All these enactments, though stringent enough as regards ordinary circumstances, make exception for urgent necessity. And certain provisions of the Decree of the Synod of Poitiers (1280): “desiring to root out an erroneous abuse which has grown up in our diocese through dangerous ignorance, we forbid deacons to hear confessions or to give absolution in the tribunal of penance: for it is certain and beyond doubt that they cannot absolve, since they have not the keys which are conferred only in the priest’s order”--This “abuse” probably disappeared in the fourteenth or fifteenth century; at all events no direct mention is made of it by the Council of Trent, though the reservation to bishops and priests of the absolving power shows plainly that the Council excluded deacons.

The authorization which the medieval councils gave the deacon was not sufficient to confer on him the power to forgive sins. In some of the decrees it is expressly stated that the deacon has not the keys—clavis non habet. In other enactments he is forbidden except in cases of necessity to “give” or “impose penance,” penitentia dura, imponere. His function then was limited to the forum externum: in the absence of a priest he could “reconcile” the sinner, i.e., restore him to the communion of the Church; but he did not and could not give the sacramental absolution which a priest would have given (Palmieri, Pesch). Another explanation emphasizes the fact that the deacon could lawfully administer the Holy Eucharist. The faithful were under a strict obligation to give the Eucharist to all who were in the spiritual need of death, and on the other hand the reception of this sacrament sufficed to blot out even mortal sin provided the communicant had the requisite dispositions. The deacon could hear their confession simply to assure himself that they were properly disposed, but not for the purpose of giving them absolution. If he went further and “imposed penance” in the stricter, sacramental sense, he exceeded his power, and any authorization to this effect granted by the bishop merely showed that the bishop was in error (Laurain, "De l’intervention des laïques, des diacres et des abbesses dans l’administration de la pénitence," Paris, 1897). In any case, the prohibitory enactments which finally abolished the practice of imposing penance in the stricter, sacramental sense, he exceeded his power, and any authorization to this effect granted by the bishop merely showed that the bishop was in error (Laurain, "De l’intervention des laïques, des diacres et des abbesses dans l’administration de la pénitence," Paris, 1897). In any case, the prohibitory enactments which finally abolished the practice of imposing penance in the stricter, sacramental sense, which was his by virtue of his office; but they brought into clearer light the traditional belief that only bishops and priests can administer the Sacrament of Penance. (See below under Confession.)

For valid administration, a twofold power is necessary: the power of order and the power of jurisdiction. The former is exercised by the bishop; the latter by ecclesiastical authority (see Jurisdiction). At his ordination a priest receives the power to consecrate the Holy Eucharist, and for valid consecration he needs no jurisdiction. As regards penance, the case is different: “because the nature and character of a judgment requires that sentence be pronounced only on those who are subjects (of the judge) the Church of God has always held, and this Council affirms it to be most true, that the absolution which a priest pronounces upon one whom he has not either ordinary or delegated jurisdiction, is of no effect” (Council of Trent, Sess. XIV, c. 7). Ordinary jurisdiction is that which one has by reason of his office as involving the care of souls; the pope has it over the whole Church, the bishop within his diocese, the pastor within his parish. Delegated jurisdiction is that which is granted by an ecclesiastical superior to one who does not possess it by virtue of his office. The need of jurisdiction for administering this sacrament is usually expressed by saying that a priest must have “familiaris curiae.” Hence it is a priest visiting in a diocese other than his own cannot hear confession without special authorization from the bishop. Every priest, however, can absolve any one who is at the point of death, because under those circumstances the Church gives all priests jurisdiction. As the bishop grants jurisdiction, he can also withdraw it in the case of the refusal of the penitent (see Reservation) and he can even withdraw it entirely.

Recipient, i.e., the penitent.—The Sacrament of Penance was instituted by Christ for the remission of sins committed after baptism. Hence, no unbaptized person, however deep and sincere his sorrow, can be validly absolved. Baptism, in other words, is the first essential requisite on the part of the penitent. This does not imply that in the sins committed by an unbaptized person there is a special enormity or any other element that places them beyond the power of the keys; but that one must first be a member of the Church before he can submit himself and his sins to the judicial process of sacramental Penance.

Contrition, Attraction. Without contrition, there is no forgiveness. Hence the Council of Trent (Sess. XIV, c. 4): “Contrition, which holds the first place among the acts of the penitent, is sorrow of heart and detestation for sin committed, with the resolve to sin no more.” The Council (ibid.) furthermore distinguishes perfect contrition from imperfect contrition, which is called attrition, and which arises from consideration of the turpitude of sin or from the fear of hell and punishment. See Attraction; Contrition, where these two kinds of sorrow are more fully explained and an account is given of the principal discussions and opinions. See also treatises by Pesch, Palmieri, Pohle. For the validity of attrition, with the Sacrament of Penance, suffices to obtain forgiveness of sin. The Council of Trent further teaches (ibid.): “though it sometimes happens that this contrition is perfect and that it reconciles man with God before the actual reception of this sacrament, still the reconciliation is not to be ascribed to the contrition itself apart from the desire of the sacrament which it (contrition) includes.”

In accordance with this teaching Pius V condemned (1567) the proposition of Baius asserting that even perfect contrition does not, except in case of necessity or of martyrdom, remit sin without the actual reception of the sacrament (Benzinger-Burnetti, "Enchiridion," 1911). It should be noted that the decree speaks of a perfect contrition of which the Council rejects is perfect in the sense that it includes the desire (voleo) to receive the necessity. Whoever, in fact, repents of his sin out of love for God must be willing to comply with the Divine ordinance regarding penance, i.e., he would confess if a confessor were accessible, and he realizes that he is obliged to confess when he has the opportunity. But if he cannot or does not want to confess, the only means of obtaining forgiveness is to make an act of contrition independent of the sacrament, the other by confession and absolution. This view was put forward by Peter Martinez (de Osma) in the proposition: "mortal sins as regards their guilt and their punishment in the other world, strictly...[182]."

Confession: Necessity.—"For those who after baptism have fallen into sin, the Sacrament of Penance is as necessary unto salvation as is baptism itself for those who have not yet been regenerated." (Council of Trent, Sess. XIV, c. 2.) "Penance, therefore, is not an institution of the Church, but a part of God's eternal plan of salvation. It is an act of faith and charity, whose purpose is the reparation of the voluntary offense and the restoration of the sinner to a state of grace."

Confession: Various Kinds.—Confession is the act of a sinner making a public, private, or secret statement to a priest of his sins. Public confession is made by a sinner in the presence of a priest and the faithful, while private confession is made in the presence of a priest alone. Secret confession is made in the presence of a priest and no one else."

Since the priest in the forgiving of sin exercises a strict judicial function, Christ must will that such tremendous power be used wisely and prudently. Moreover, in virtue of the grant of Christ the priest can absolve a sinner of all sins, but not of certain sins, except he be so directed by Christ. How can a wise and prudent judgment be rendered if the priest be in ignorance of the cause on which judgment is pronounced? And how can he obtain the requisite knowledge unless it come from the spontaneous acknowledgment of the sinner? This necessity of manifestation is all the clearer if satisfaction for sin, which from the beginning has been part of the penitential discipline, is to be imposed not only wisely but also justly. That there is a necessary connection between the prudent judgment of the confessor and the detailed knowledge of sins is evident from the nature of a judicial procedure and especially from a full analysis of the grant of Christ in the light of tradition. No judge may release or condemn without full knowledge of the case. And again the tradition of the earliest times sees in the words of Christ not only the office of the judge sitting in judgment, but also the power of giving absolution in a judicial sense to penitents who have not a sufficient knowledge of sins."

Clearly, therefore, the words of Christ imply the doctrine of the external manifestation of conscience to a priest in order to obtain pardon.

Confession: Various Kinds.—Confession is the act of a sinner making a public, private, or secret statement to a priest of his sins. Public confession is made by a sinner in the presence of a priest and the faithful, while private confession is made in the presence of a priest alone and is considered complete, if it is made in the presence of a priest. Secret confession is made in the presence of a priest and no one else. As regards the method of communicating secretly to the priest alone, though Christ did not forbid that any one, in punishment of his crimes and for his own humiliation as also to give others an example and to edify the Church, should confess his sins publicly, still, this has not been commanded by Divine precept nor would it be prudent to decree by any human law that sins, especially secret sins, should be publicly confessed. Since, then, secret sacramental confession, which from the beginning has been and even now is the usage of the Church, was always commanded with great and unanimous consent by the holiest and most ancient Fathers; this is in complete conformity to the will of the Church as expressed by the majority of those who make bold to teach that it (secret confession) is something foreign to the Divine command, a human invention devised by the Fathers assembled in the Lateran Council."

Traditional Belief and Practice.—How firmly rooted in the Catholic mind is the belief in the efficacy and necessity of confession, appears clearly from the fact that the Sacrament of Penance endures in the Church after the countless attacks to which it has been subjected during the last four centuries. If at the Reformation or since the Church could have surrendered a doctrine or abandoned a practice for the sake of peace and to soften a "hard saying," confession would have been the first to disappear. Yet it is precisely during this period that the Church has defined in the most explicit terms the nature of penance and insisted on the necessity of confession. It will not of course be denied that at the beginning of the sixteenth century confession was generally practiced throughout the Christian world. The Reformers themselves, not... ably Calvin, admitted that it had been in existence for three centuries when they attributed its origin to the Fourth Lateran Council (1215). At that time, according to Lea (op. cit., I, 228), the necessity of confession "became a new article of faith" and the canon, anno tria sigulicrere, "is perhaps the most important legislative act in the history of the Church" (Ibid., 220). But, as the Council of Trent affirms, "the Church did not through the Lateran Council prescribe that the faithful of Christ should confess—a thing which it knew to be by Divine right necessary and established—but that the precept of confessing at least once a year should be complied with by all and every one. "It was the age of discretion." (Sess. XIV, c. 5). The Lateran edict presupposed the necessity of confession as an article of Catholic belief and laid down a law as to the minimum frequency of confession—at least once a year.

In the Middle Ages.—In constructing their systems of theology, the medieval doctors discuss at length the various problems connected with the Sacrament of Penance. They are practically unanimous in holding that confession is obligatory; the only notable exception in the twelfth century is Gratian, who gives the arguments for and against the necessity of confessing to a priest and leaves the question open (Decretum, p. 11. De pen. d. 1, in P. L., CXXXVII, 1519–63). Peter Lombard (d. about 1150) takes up the authorities cited by Gratian and by means of them proves that "without confession there is no pardon ... no entrance into paradise.

TV Sent., d. XVII, i. in P. L., CXCH, 880–2. The principal debate, in which Hugh of St. Victor, Abelard, Robert Pullius, and Peter of Poitiers took the leading parts, concerned the origin and sanction of the obligation, and the value of the different Scriptural texts cited to prove the institution of penance. This question passed on to the thirteenth century and received its solution in very plain terms from St. Thomas Aquinas. Treating Contra Gentiles, IV, 72, of the necessity of penance and its parts, he shows that "the institution of confession was necessary because the sin of the penitent might be revealed to Christ's minister; hence the minister to whom the confession is made must have power as representing Christ, the Judge of the living and the dead. This power again requires two things: authority of knowledge and power to absolve or to condemn. These are called the two keys of the Church which the Lord entrusted to Peter (Matt., xvi, 19). But they were not given to Peter to be held by him alone, but to be handed on through him to others; else sufficient provision would not have been made for the salvation of the faithful. These keys derive their efficacy from the passion of Christ whereby He opened to us the gate of the heavenly kingdom." And he adds that "as no one can be saved without baptism either by actual reception or by desire, so they who sin after baptism cannot be saved unless they submit to the keys of the Church either by actually confessing or by the resolve to confess when opportunity permits. Furthermore, as the rulers of the Church cannot dispense any one from baptism as a means of salvation, neither can they give a dispensation whereby the sinner may be forgiven without confession and absolution. The same explanation and reasoning is urged by all the Scholastics of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. They were in practical agreement as to the necessity of jurisdiction in the confessor. Regarding the time at which confession had to be made, some held with William of Auvergne that one was obliged to confess as soon as possible after sinning; others, with Albertus Magnus and St. Thomas, thought that it sufficed to confess within the time limits prescribed by the Church (Paschal Time); and this more lenient view finally prevailed. Further subjects of discussion during this period were: the choice of confessor; the obligation of confessing before receiving other sacraments, especially the Eucharist; the integrity of confession; the obligation of secrecy on the part of the confessor, i.e., the seal of confession. The careful and minute treatment of these matters and the frank expression of divergent opinions were characteristic of the Scholastics, but they also brought out more clearly the central truths regarding penance and they opened the way to the conciliar pronouncements at Florence and Trent which gave to Catholic doctrine a more precise formulation. See Vacandard and Bernard in "Dict. de théol. cath.," s. v. Confession; Turmel, "Histoire de la théologie positive," Paris, 1904; Cambier, "De divina institutione confessionis sacramentalis," Louvain, 1884.

Not only was the obligation recognized in the Catholic Church throughout the Middle Ages, but the schismatic Greeks held the same belief and still hold it. They fell into schism under Photius (q. v.) in 869, but retained confession, which therefore must have been in use for some time previous to the ninth century. The practice, moreover, was regulated in detail by the Penitential Books (q. v.), which prescribed the canonical penance for each sin, and minute questions for the examination of the penitent. The number of these books among the Greeks were those attributed to John the Faster (q. v.) and to John the Monk. In the West similar works were written by the Irish monks St. Columbanus (d. 615) and Cumman, and by the Englishmen Ven. Bede (d. 735), Egbert (d. 767), and Theodore of Canterbury (d. 789). Besides the councils mentioned above (820), the obligation to confess were enacted at Worms (869), Paris (820), Châlons (813, 650), Tours (813), Reims (813). The Council of Chalcedon (785) says: "If any one (which God forbid) should depart this life without penance or confession he is not to be prayed for". The significant features about these enactments is that they do not introduce confession as a new prac-
The Fathers, knowing well that one great difficulty which the sinner has to overcome is shame, encourage him in spite of it to confess. "I appeal to you, my brethren," says St. Catan (d. 391), "...you are not ashamed to sit and yet are ashamed to confess. ...I deceive myself."
The wounded conscience. Sick people who are prudent do not fear the physician, though he cut and burn even the secret parts of the body." (Paracresis ad pontit., n. 6, 8.) St. John Chrysostom (d. 347) pleads eloquently with the sinner: "Be not ashamed to approach [the priest] because you have sinned, nor rather, for this very reason approach. A wise says: Because I have an ulcer, I will not go near a physician or take medicine; on the contrary, it is just this that makes it needful to call in physicians and apply remedies. We [priests] know well how to pardon, because we ourselves are liable to sin. This is why God did not give us angels to be our doctors, nor send down Gabriel to rule the flock, but from the fold itself he chooses the shepherds, from among the sheep He appoints the leader, in order that he may be inclined to pardon his followers and, keeping in mind his own frailty, may not set himself in hardness against the members of the flock." (Hom. "On Frequent Assemblies, in P., G., X., 111.)
Tertullian had already used the same argument with those who, for fear of exposing their sins, put off their confession from day to day—"mindful more of their shame than of their salvation, like those who hide from the physician the malady they suffer in the secret parts of the body, and perish through bashfulness." Because we hold any such knowledge of men, do we thereby conceal it from God?...Is it better to hide and be damned than to be openly absolved?" (De penit., x.) St. Cyprian (d. 258) pleads for greater mildness in the treatment of sinners, "since we find that no one ought to be forbidden that does not deserve to be forbidden. For we, as knowledge of men, do we thereby conceal it from God?...Is it better to hide and be damned than to be openly absolved?" (De penit., x.) St. Cyprian (d. 258) pleads for greater mildness in the treatment of sinners, "since we find that no one ought to be forbidden that does not deserve to be forbidden. For we, as knowledge of men, do we thereby conceal it from God?...Is it better to hide and be damned than to be openly absolved?" (De penit., x.)
This outline of the patristic teaching shows: (1) that the Fathers insisted on a manifestation of sin as the necessary means of unburdening the soul and regaining the friendship of God; (2) that the confession was to be made not to a layman but to priests; (3) that priests exercise the power of absolving in virtue of a Divine commission, i.e., as representatives of Christ; (4) that the sinner, if he would be saved, must overcome his shame and repugnance to confession. And since the series of witnesses goes back to the latter part of the first century, the practice of confession must have existed from the earliest days. St. Leo had good reason for appealing to the “Apostolic rule” which made secret confession to the priest sufficient without the necessity of a public declaration. Nor is it surprising that Laetantius (c. 330) should have pointed to the practice of confession as a characteristic of the true Church: “That is the true Church in which there is confession and penance, which applies a wholesome remedy to the sins and wounds whereunto the weakness of the flesh is subject” (“Div. Inst.”, IV, 30).

What Sins are to be Confessed.—Among the propositions condemned by the Council of Trent is the following: “That to obtain forgiveness of sins in the Sacrament of Penance, it is not necessary by Divine law to confess the whole extent and causes of the sin, as called to mind by due and careful examination, to confess even hidden sins and those that are against the last two precepts of the Decalogue, together with the circumstances that change the specific nature of the sin; such confession is only useful for the instruction and consolation of the penitent, and of old was prudently kept secret, in order to the “confession of satisfaction” (Can. de penit., vii). The Catholic teaching consequently is: that all mortal sins must be confessed of which the penitent is conscious, for these are so related that no one of them can be remitted unless all are remitted. Remission means that the soul is restored to the friendship of God; and this is obviously impossible if there remain unconfessed even a single mortal sin. Hence, the penitent, who in confession willfully conceals a mortal sin, derives no benefit whatever; on the contrary, he makes void the sacrament and thereby incurs the guilt of sacrilege. If, however, the sin be omitted, not through any fault of confession, but through forgetfulness, it is forgiven indirectly; but it must be remembered by confession and thus submitted to the power of the keys.

While mortal sin is the necessary matter of confession, venial sin is sufficient matter, as are also the mortal sins already forgiven in previous confessions. This is the common teaching of theologians, in accord with the condemnation pronounced by Leo X on Luther’s assertion, “By no means presume to confess venial sins... in the primitive Church, only manifest mortal sins were confessed!” (Bull. “Exurge Domine”; Denzinger, “Enchir.”, 749). In the constitution “Inter caetera” (17 Feb., 1541), Benedict Xiii (1602) declared that confessions made to a priest belonging to a religious order are not obliged to reiterate the confession to their own priest, ad loc.: “Though it is not necessary to confess the same sins over again, nevertheless we regard it as salutary to repeat the confession, because of the shame it involves, which is a great part of penance; hence we strictly enjoin the Brothers [Dominicans and Franciscans] to admonish their penitents and in sermons exhort them that they confess to their own priests at least once a year, assuring them that this will undoubtedly conduce to their spiritual welfare” (Denzinger, “Enchir.”, 470). St. Thomas gives the same reasons: the more, the more is the temporal penalty reduced; hence the penitent might confess over and over again until the whole penalty is cancelled, nor would he thereby offer any injury to the sacrament!” (IV Sent., d. xvii, q. 3, ad 5 ad 4).

Satisfaction.—As stated above, the absolution given by the priest to a penitent who confesses his sins with the proper dispositions renews both the guilt and the eternal punishment in the same measure of the power of God (see Purgatory). In order to have it cancelled here, the penitent receives from his confessor what is usually called his “penance”, usually in the form of certain prayers which he is to say, or of certain actions which he is to perform, such as visits to a church, the Stations of the Cross, etc. Almsgiving, fasting, and prayer are the chief means of satisfaction, but other penitential works may also be enjoined. The quality and extent of the penance is determined by the confessor according to the nature of the sins revealed, the special circumstances of the penitent, his liability to relapse, and the need of eradicating evil habits. Sometimes the penance is such that it may be performed at once; in other cases it may require a more or less considerable period, as, e.g., where it is prescribed for each day during a week or a month. But even then the penitent may receive another sacrament (e.g., Holy Communion) immediately after confession, since absolution restores the soul to the friendship of God, regardless of the need of satisfying the perpetually remaining temporal penalty. The remission of the latter depends on the further performance of other acts of piety, but the penitent may at once be reconciled to God and his concierge, without obligation to continue the performance of his penance until it is completed.

In theological language, this penance is called satisfaction and is defined, in the words of St. Thomas: “The payment of the temporal punishment due on account of the offence committed against God by sin”. In the council of Trent, the expression is: “penance, i.e., the crime whereby the injury done to the honour of God is required, so far at least as the sinner is able to make reparation (pena viciacativa); it is also a preventive remedy, as much as it is meant to hinder the further commission of sin (pena mediaevialis). Satisfaction is not, like contrition and confession, an essential part of the sacrament, because the primary effect—i.e., remission of guilt and temporal punishment—is obtained without satisfaction; but it is an integral part, because it is requisite for obtaining the secondary effect—i.e., remission of the temporal punishment. The Catholic doctrine on this point is set forth by the Council of Trent, which condemns the proposition: “In no way is the temporal punishment for sin paid by the act of the Church” (c. 25). The temporal punishment is heeded by God together with the guilt, and the satisfaction required of penitents is no other than faith whereby they believe that Christ has satisfied for them; and further the proposition: “That the keys were given to the Church for loosing only and not for binding as well; that therefore in ensuing penance on those who confess, priests act contrary to the purpose of the keys and the institution of Christ; that it is a fiction [to say] that after the eternal punishment has been remitted in virtue of the keys, there usually remains to be paid a temporal penalty.” (Can. “de Sac. potest.”, 12, 15; Denzinger, “Enchir.”, 922, 923).

Against the errors contained in these statements, the Council (Sess.XIV, c. viii) cites conspicuous examples from Holy Scripture. The most notable of these is the judgment pronounced upon David: “And Nathan said to David: The Lord also hath taken away thy sin: thou shalt not die. Nevertheless, because thou hast given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, for this thing, the child that is born to thee, shall surely die” (II Kings, xii, 13, 11; cf. Gen., iii, 17; Num., xx, 11 sqq.). David’s sin was forgiven and yet he had to suffer punishment in the loss of his child. The same truth is taught by St. Paul (1 Cor., xi, 32): “But whilst we are judged, we are chastised by the Lord, that we be not condemned with this world”. The chastisement here mentioned is a temporal punishment, but a punishment unto salvation.
we deere that he who dares to reveal a sin made known to him in the tribunal of penance shall not only be deposed from the priestly office, but shall moreover be subjected to close confinement in a monastery and the performance of perpetual penance

(Fourth Lateran Council, cap. xxii; Denzinger, Enchirid., 1831). The same sentence was promulgated at the Council of Trent (18 Nov., 1562). confessors are forbidden, even where there would be no revelation direct or indirect, to make any use of the knowledge obtained in confession that would displease the penitent, even though the non-use would occasion him greater displeasure.

These prohibitions, as well as the general obligation of secrecy, apply only to what the confessor learns through confession made as part of the sacrament. He is not bound by the seal as regards what may be told him by a person who, he is sure, has no intention of making a sacramental confession but merely speaks to him "in confidence"; prudence, however, may impose silence concerning what he learns in this way. Nor does the obligation of the seal prevent the confessors from speaking of things which he has learned outside confession, though the same things have also been told him in confession; here again, however, other reasons may oblige him to observe secrecy. The same obligation, with the limitations indicated, rests upon all those who are present or who learn anything in the fire of purgatory until our slightest sins are burned away like wood or straw" (Sermo civ. n. 4).

Among the motives for doing penance on which the Fathers most frequently insist is this: If you punish your own sin, God will spare you; but in any case the sin will not go unpunished. Or again they declare that God wants us to perform satisfaction works that we may clear off our indebtedness to His justice. It is therefore with good reason to be the earlier councils—e. g., Laodicea (a. d. 372) and Carthage IV (397)—teach that satisfaction is to be imposed on penitents; and the Council of Trent but reiterates the traditional belief and practice when it makes the giving of "penance" obligatory on the confessor. Hence, too, the practice of granting indulgences, whereby the Church comes to the penitent's assistance and places at his disposal the treasury of Christ's merits. Though closely connected with penance, indulgences are not a part of the sacrament; they presuppose confession and absolution, but they do not involve an extra sacramental remission of the temporal punishment incurred by sin. (See INDULGENCES.)

SEAL OF CONFESSIO...
First Epistle about A. D. 96, exhorting them:—"Be a subject in obedience to the priests [presbyteri] and receive discipline [correctionem] unto penance, bending the knees of repentance (Ep. I. "Ad Cor.", Ixiv.). At the close, therefore, of the first century, the performance of penance was required, and the nature of that penance was determined, not by the penitent himself, but by ecclesiastical authority. (See Excommunication.)

Three kinds of penance are to be distinguished: canonical, prescribed by councils or bishops in the form of "canons" for graver offences. This might be either private, i.e., performed secretly, or public, i.e., performed in the presence of bishop, clergy, and people. When accompanied by certain rites as prescribed in the Canons, it was solemn penance. The public penance was not necessarily canonical; it might be undertaken by the penitent of his own accord. Solemn penance, the most severe of all, was inflicted for the worst offences only, notably for adultery, murder, and idolatry, the "capital sins." The name of penitent was applied especially to those who performed public canonical penance. "There is a harder and more grievous penance, the doers of which are punished in the Church; these are excluded from participation in the sacraments of the altar, lest by unworthily receiving them eat and drink judgment unto themselves" (St. Augustine, "De utilitate agendae penit.," ser. ecexxiii, i. iii.).

The penitential process included a series of acts, the first of which was confession. Regarding this, Origines, in the writing of baptism, speaks of a yet more severe and arduous pardon of sins by penance, when the sinner washes his clothes with tears, and when he blushes not to disclose his sin to the priest of the Lord and seeks the remedy" (Homil. "In Levit.," ii. iv. in P. G., XII, 418). Again he says:—"They who have sinned, if they hide and retain their sin, God, who is subject to no one, grants if the sinner becomes his own accuser, while he does this, he discharges the cause of all his malady. Only let him carefully consider to whom he should confess his sin; what is the character of the physician; if he be one who will be weak with the weak, who will weep with the sorrowful, and who understands the discipline of penance, and fellow-feeling. So that when his skill shall be known and his pity felt, you may follow what he shall advise. Should he think your disease to be such that it should be declared in the assembly of the faithful—whereby others may be edified, and yourself easily reformed—this must be done with much deliberation and the skilful advice of a bishop" (Homil. "In Levit.," ii. vii. ib. in P. G., XII, 1386). Origen here states quite plainly the relation between confession and public penance. The sinner must first make known his sins to the priest, who will decide whether any further manifestation is called for.

Penance did not necessarily include a public avowal of sin. As St. Augustine also declares, "If his sin is not only grievous in itself, but involves scandal given to others, and if the bishop [antites] judges that it will be useful to the Church [to have the sin published], let not the sinner refuse to do penance in the sight of many or of the people at large, let him not resist, nor through shame add to his mortal wound a greater evil" (Sermo eii, n. 3). It was therefore the duty of the confessor to determine how far the process of penance should go beyond sacramental confession. It lay with him also to fix the quality and duration of the penance: "Satisfaction," says Tertullian, "is determined by confession; penance, by the confession and by the penance which God is pleased to impose." (De penit., viii.). In the East there existed from the earliest times (Sozomen, H. E., xvi.), or at least from the outbreak of the Novatianist schism (Socrates, H. E., V, xix.) a functionary known as presbyter penitentiarium, i.e., a priest specially appointed on account of his prudence and reserve to hear confessions and impose public penance. If the confessor, however, had obliged the penitent to appear before the bishop, and the bishop, before his council (presbytery), and these again decided whether the crime was of such a nature that it ought to be confessed in presence of the people. Then followed, usually on Ash Wednesday, the imposition of public penance whereby the sinner was excluded for a longer or shorter period from the communion of the Church and in addition was obliged to perform certain penitential exercises, the exomologesis. This term, however, had various meanings: it designated sometimes the entire process of penance (Tertullian), or again the avowal of sin at the beginning, or, finally, the public avowal which was made at the end—i.e., after the performance of the penitential exercises.

The nature of these exercises varied according to the sin for which they were prescribed. According to Tertullian (De penit., IX), "Exomologesis is the discipline which oblige a man to prostrate and humble himself and to adopt a manner of life that will draw down mercy. As regards dress and food, it prescribes that this man, with head cast down, body in rags, plunge his soul in sorrow, correct his faults by harsh treatment of himself, use the plainest meat and drink for the sake of his soul and not of his belly; usually he shall nourish prayer by fasting, whole days and nights together he shall moan, and weep, and wait to the Lord [as God, cast himself at the feet of the priests, fall on his knees before those who are dear to God, and beseech them to plead in his behalf]. At a very early period, the exomologesis was divided into four parts or "stations", and the penitents were grouped in as many different classes according to their progress in penance. The lower class, the flentes (weeping) remained outside the Church, to which were attached the godly; the next were the religious, to which were attached the faithful as these passed into the church. The audientes (hearers) were stationed in the narthex of the church behind the catechumens and were permitted to remain during the Mass of the Catechumens, i.e., until the end of the sermon. The substra potency stratostrato (prostrate), or genuflectentius (kneeling), occupied the space between the foot of the priests, roll on the ground, and beg of the faithful, to imitate the imposition of the bishop's hands or his blessing. Finally, the consistentes were so called because they were allowed to hear the whole Mass without communicating, or because they remained at their place while the faithful approached the Holy Table. This grouping into stations originated in the East, where at least three are there described, and the chief of them was used by Gregory Thaumaturgus, and the first or lowest group by St. Basil (Ep. ecevix, c. xxii; ccevix, l. vi.). In the West the classification did not exist, or at any rate the different stations were not so clearly marked; the penitents were treated pretty much as the catechumens.

The exomologesis terminated with the reconciliation, a solemn function which took place on Holy Thursday just before Mass. The bishop presided, assisted by his priests and deacons. A consultation (concilium) was held to determine which of the penitents deserved readmission; the Penitential Psalms and the litanies were recited at the foot of the altar; the bishop in a brief address reminded the penitents of their obligation to lead henceforth an upright life; the penitents, lighted candles in hand, were then led into the church prayers, antiphons, and responses were said, and finally, the public absolution was given. (See Schmitz, "Die Bussbücher u. die Bussdisziplin d. Alt.-Ostchristentums," Würzburg, 1895; Funk, "Bussdisziplin"; Pohle in "Kirchl. Handlex.," s. v. "Bussdisziplin"; Tieron, "Hist. des dogmes," Paris, 1905; Eng. tr., St. Louis, 1910.) Regarding the nature of this absolution given by the bishop, various

Opinions have been put forward. According to one view, it was the remission, not of guilt, but of the temporal punishment; the guilt had already been remitted by the absolution which the penitent received in confession before he entered on the public penance. This finds support in the fact that the reconciliation could be refused by a deacon in case of necessity and in the absence of a priest, as appears from St. Cyprian (Ep. xvi.).

Speaking of those who had received libelli from the martyrs he says: "If they are overtaken by illness, they need not wait for our coming, but may make the eunomologiea of their sin before any priest, or, if no possible, hand it, and, before, in the deacon, that thus, by the imposition of his hands unto penance, they may come to the Lord with the peace which the martyrs had besought us by letters to grant." On the other hand, the deacon could not give sacramental absolution; consequently, his function in such cases was to absolve the penitent from punishment; and, as he was authorized herein to do what the bishop did by the public absolution, this could not have been sacramental. There is the further consideration that the bishop did not necessarily hear the confessions of those whom he absolved at the time of reconciliation, and moreover the ancient forms had not come into existence. Hence the bishops shall hear anything for heavy by his penitential exercises, and exposed to the danger of sudden death (Pesch, op. cit., p. 119 sq. Cf. Palmaire, op. cit., p. 459; Pignataro, "De disciplina penitential", Rome, 1894, p. 100; D'Inario, "Il sacramento della penitenza nei primi secoli del cristianesimo", Naples, 1895, p. 81.)

The writers who hold that the final absolution was sacramental, insist that there is no documentary evidence of a secret confession; that if this had been in existence, the harder way of the public penance would have been abandoned; that the argument from prescriptio loses its force if the sacramental character of public penance be tacitly implied; that penance itself is unsacramental that is required in a sacrament. (Boudinon, "Sur l'histoire de la peinture" in "Revue d'histoire et de litterature religieuse", II, 1897, p. 396 sq. Cf. Hogan in "Am. Cath. Q. Rev.", July, 1900; Batiffol, "Etudes d'histoire et de theologie positive", Paris, 1902, p. 195 sq.; Vancanard in "Duc de theol.", s. v. "Absolution", 156-61; O'Donnell, "Penance in the Early Church", Dublin, 1907, p. 95 sq.) While this discussion concerns the practice under ordinary circumstances, it is commonly admitted that sacramental absolution was granted at the time of confession to those who were in danger of death. The Church, in fact did not, in her universal practice, refuse absolution, but the cases were few, as the number of those who had committed grievous sins. St. Leo, writing in 412 to Theodore, Bishop of Fréjus, says: "Neither satisfaction is to be forbidden nor reconciliation denied to those who in time of need and imminent danger implore the aid of penance and then of reconciliation." After pointing out that penance should not be delayed, he might say: "when there is hardly space either for the confession of the penitent or his reconciliation by the priest", he adds that even in these circumstances the action of penance and the grace of communion should not be denied if asked for by the penitent (Ep. xvi, c. iv, in P.L. LIV, 1140). St. Leo states expressly that he was bound by ecclesiastical rule (ecclesiastica regulida).

Shortly before, St. Celestine (428) had expressed his horror at learning that "penance was refused the dying and that the desire of those was not granted who in the hour of death sought this remedy for their soul"; this, he says, is "aiding death to death and killing with cruelty the soul that is not absolved" (Letter to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne and Narbonne, c. ii.). That such a refusal was not in accordance with the earlier practice is evident from the decision of the Council of Nicaea (325): "With respect to the dying, the ancient canonical law shall now also be observed, namely, that if any one depart from this life, he shall by no means be deprived of the last and most necessary viaticum" (can. xiii.). If the dying person could receive the Eucharist, absolution certainly could not be refused. The ancient practice, as is clearly shown, this consisted in the refusal, not of absolution, but of communion; such was the penalty prescribed by the Council of Elvira (306) for those who after baptism had fallen into idolatry. The same is true of the canon (22) of the Council of Arles (314) which enacts that communion shall not be given to those who apostatize, but never appear before the Church, nor ever seek to do penance, and yet afterwards, when attacked by illness, request communion. The council lays stress on the lack of proper disposition in such sinners, as does also St. Cyprian when he forbids that they who "do no penance nor manifest heartfelt sorrow be admitted to the communion of the Lord" and danger they ask for it; for what prompts them to ask [communion] is, not repentance for their sin, but the fear of approaching death" (Ep. ad Antoniamm, n. 23).

A further evidence of the severity with which public penance, and especially its solemn form, was administered is the fact that it could be performed only once. This is evident from some of the texts quoted above (Tertullian, Hermas). Origen also says: "For the graver crimes, there is only one opportunity of penance" (Hom. xx, "In Levit.", c. iii; and St. Ambrose: "As there is one baptism so there is one penance, which, however, is performed publically" (De pecc., II, c. x, n. 95). St. Augustine gives the reason: "Although, by a wise and salutary provision, opportunity for performing that humblest kind of penance is granted but once in the Church, lest the remedy, become common, should be less efficacious for the sick, yet who will dare to say to God: Wherefore dost thou once even this delicate penance has again bound himself in the letters of sin?" (Ep. clii, "Ad Macedonianum"). It may well be admitted that the discipline of the earliest days was rigorous, and that in some Churches or by individual bishops it was carried to extremes. This is plainly stated by Pope St. Innocent (405) in his letter (Ep. vi, c. 1) to Exuperius, Bishop of Toulouse. The question had been raised as to what should be done with those who, after a lifetime of licentious indulgence, begged at the end for penance and communion. Regarding these, writes the pope, "the earlier practice was more severe, the latter more tempered with mercy. The former custom was that penance should be granted, but communion denied; this the persecutions were frequent, hence, lest the easy admission to communion should fail to bring back from their evil ways men who were sure of reconciliation, very rightly communion was refused, while penance was granted in order that the refusal might not be total of communion. But after Our Lord had restored peace to his Churches, and terror had ceased, it was judged well that communion be given the dying lest we should seem to follow the harshness and sternness of the heretic Novatian in denying pardon. Communion, therefore, shall be given at the last along with penance, that these men, if only in the supreme moments of death, may not, not of Our Saviour, be rescued from eternal destruction."

The mitigation of public penance which this passage indicates continued throughout the subsequent period, especially the Middle Ages. The office of peniten-tarius had already (300) been abolished in the East by Xenophon, Patriarch of Constantinople, in conse-quency of which great numbers of people went to the desert. Soon afterwards, the four "stations" disappeared, and public penance fell into disuse. In the West it underwent a more gradual transformation. Excommunication continued in use, and the interdict (q. v.) was frequently resorted to. The performance of penance was left in large measure to the zeal and good will of the penitent; increasing severity was shown by allowing the reconciliation to take place somewhat before the prescribed time was completed; and the practice was introduced of commuting the enjoined penance into other exercises or works of piety, such as prayer and almsgiving. According to a decree of the Council of Clermont (1095), those who joined a crusade were freed from all oblations in the matter of penance. Finally it became customary to let the reconciliation follow immediately after confession.
With these modifications the ancient usage had practically disappeared by the middle of the sixteenth century. Some attempts were made to revive it after the Council of Trent, but these were isolated and of short duration.

In the British and Irish Churches.—The penitential system in these countries was established simultaneously with the introduction of Christianity, was rapidly developed by episcopal decrees and synodal enactments, and was reduced to definite form in the Pententials. These books exerted such an influence on the Christian world that, according to one opinion, they "first brought order and unity into ecclesiastical discipline in these matters" (Wass-schelbein, "Bussordnungen d. abendländischen Kirche", Halle, 1851, p. 4.—For a different view see Schatz, "Die Bussbriefe u. die Bussseelschriften d. Kirche", Mainz, 1883, p. 187). In any case, it is beyond dispute that the important religious bodies of Churches of Ireland, England, and Scotland were at one with Rome. The so-called Synod of St. Patrick decrees that a Christian who commits any of the cap-tal sins shall perform a year's penance for each offence and at the end shall "come with witnesses and be absolved by the priest" (Wilkins, "Concilia", I, p. 3).
And here we have the first penalty for mortal sins, the Confessio, which shall decide to whom the power of binding and loosing be committed, but forgiveness is more in keeping with the examples of Scripture; let penance be short, with weeping and humiliation and a mournful gait, rather than long and tempered with relaxations" (Wilkins, ibid., I, p. 4). For various opinions regarding the date and the conditions, see "Conciliorum libri selecti"
"Concilis", II, 331; Bury, "Life of St. Patrick", London, 1905. The confessor was called amemhara lannaearn, i.e., "soul's friend". St. Columba was annamhara to Aedán, Lord of Dalriada, A.D. 574 (Adamnu's "Life of St. Columba", ed. Reeves, p. lxxvi);
and Adamnan was "soul's friend" to Finnegan, Monarch of Ireland, a. d. 675 (ibid., p. xliii). The "Life of St. Columba" relates the coming of Finnegan to Iona, where, with weeping and humiliation, he fell at Columba's feet and "before all who were present confessed his sins. Then the Saint, weeping with him, said to him: "Arise, my son and be comforted; the sins which thou hast committed are forgiven; because, as it is written, a contrite and humble heart God doth not despise." (ibid., I.
39). The need and effects of confession are explained in the Leabhar Breac: "Penance frees from all the sins committed after baptism. Every one desires of a cure for his soul and happiness with the Lord; the soul desires that it shall be delivered and the confession with the prayers of the Church are as baptisms to him. As sickness injures the body, so sin injures the soul; and as there is a cure for the disease of the body, so there is balm for that of the soul.
And as the wounds of the body are shown to a physician, so, too, the sores of the soul must be exposed.
As he who takes poison is saved by a vomit, so, too, the soul is saved by the penitential and declaration of his sins with sorrow, and by the prayers of the Church, and a determination henceforth to observe the laws of the Church of God. . . . Because Christ left to His Apostles and Church, to the end of the world, the power of loosing and binding."

That confession was required before Communion is evident from the penitential and addressed to St. Columbaus, which orders (can. xxv, 1): "that confessions be given with all diligence, especially concerning con-motions of the mind, before going to Mass, lest perchance any one approach the altar unworthily, that is, if he have not a clean heart. For it is better to wait till the heart be sound and free from scandal and envy, that daringly to approach the judgment of the tri-unal; for the altar is the tribunal of Christ and His Body, even there with His Blood, judges those who approach unworthily. As, therefore, we must beware of capital sins before communicating, so, also, from the more uncertain defects and diseases of a languid soul, it is necessary for us to abstain and to be cleansed from them before going to the altar. . . . peace and a joining with eternal salvation". In the "Life of St. Maeloc of Ferns" it is said of the murdered King Brandubh: "And so he departed without confession and the communication of the Eucharist.
But the saint restored him to life for a while, and then, having made his confession and received absolution and the wafers, that is, the relic of the Eucharist, he went to heaven, and was interred in the city of St. Maeloc which is called Ferns, where the kings of that land are buried" (Acta SS. Hib., ed. 382).
The metrical "Rule of St. Cartlach", translated by Eugene O'Curry, gives this direction to the priest: "If you go to give communion to the awful point of death, you must give him that renewal and practical penance you must give him that renewal and practical penance in the prayer for giving communion to the sick (Corpus Christi Missal) we read: "O God, who has willed that sins should be forgiven by the imposition of the hands of the priest . . . ." and then follows the absolution: "We absolve thee as representatives of blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, to whom the Lord hath given the keys of the heavenly . . . ."
That confession was regularly a part of the preparation for death is attested by the Council of Cashel (1172) which commands the faithful in illness to make their will "in the presence of their confessor and neighbours", and prescribes that to those who die "with a good confession, an alms shall be paid in the form of Mass and burial (can. vi. 38, 41, 42).
The practice of public penance was regulated in great detail by the Pententials. That of St. Cuman prescribes that "if any priest refuses penance to the dying, he is guilty of the loss of their souls . . . .
for there can be true conversion at the last moment, when God has regard not of time alone, but of the heart also, and the thief gained Paradise in the last hour of his confession" (C. xiv, 2). Other Penitentials bear the names of St. Finnian, Sts. David and Gildas, St. Columbaus, Adamnan. The collection of canons known as the "Hibernensis" is especially important, as it cites, under the head of "Penance" (bk.
XIV), the teaching of St. Augustine, St. Jerome, and other Fathers, thus showing the continuity of the Irish faith and observance with that of the early Church. (See Lagan, "Ecc. Hist. of Ireland", Dublin, 1829; Moran, "Essays on the Early Irish Church", Dublin, 1864; Malone, "Church Hist. of Ireland", Dublin, 1850; Warren, "The Liturgy and rite of the Early Irish Church", Dublin, 1844; Salmon,
"The Ancient Irish Church", Dublin, 1897.)

In the Anglo-Saxon Church penance was called behreorung, from the verb hebrewan, whence our word
"to rue". The confessor was the sercf; confession, scit] or, and the parish itself was the scriptorium, i.e., "confection district"—a term which shows plainly the close relation between confession and the work of religion in general. The practice in England can be traced back to the times immediately following the country's conversion. Ven. Bede (II. E., IV, 23 [25]) gives the story of Adamnan, an Irish monk of the seventh century, who belonged to the monastery of Coutriuion, England. In his youth, having committed some sin, he went to a priest, confessed, and was given a penance to be performed until the priest should return. But the priest went to Ireland and died there, and Adamnan continued his penance to the end of his days. When St. Cuthbert (655-87) on being asked how many sins he could confess in one year, replied, "all confessed openly what they had done, . . . and what they confessed they expiated, as he commanded them, with worthy fruits of penance" (Bede, op. cit., IV, 25). Alcuin (755-804) declaresthat"without confession there is no pardon" (P. L., C, 357); that "he who accuses himself of his sins will not have the devil for an accuser in the day of judgment" (P. L., Cl, 621); that "he who conceals his sins and is ashamed to make wholesome confession, has God as witness now and will have him again as avenger" (ibid., 622). Lanfranc (1065-89) has a treatise, "De ecclesia confessione," i.e., on keeping confession secret, in which he reproves those who give the slightest intimation of what they have confessed (P. L., Cl, 626).

The penitentials were known as scriptores. The one attributed to Archbishop Theodore (602-90) says: "The deacon is not allowed to impose penance on a layman; this should be done by the bishops or priests" (bk. II, 2): and further,"According to the canons, penitents should not receive communion until their penance is completed; but we, for mercy's sake, allow them to receive at the end of a year or six months" (I, 12). An important statement is that "public reconciliation is not established in this province, for the reason that there is no public penance"—which shows that the minute prescriptions contained in the Penitential were meant for the guidance of the priest in giving penance privately, i.e., in confession. Among the excepctiones, or extracts, from the canons which bear the name of Archbishop Egbert of York (d. 766), canon xvi says that the bishop shall hear no cause without the presence of his clergy, in case of a minor confession (Wilkins, op. cit., I, 104). His Penitential prescribes (IX) that "a bishop or priest shall not refuse confession to those who desire it, though they be guilty of many sins" (ibid., 126). The Council of Chalcedon (A. d. 757): "If any one depart this life without penance or confession, he shall not be prayed for" (can. xx). The canons published under King Edgar (950) have a special section "On Confession" which begins: "When one wishes to confess his sins, let him act manfully, and not be ashamed to confess his misdeeds and crimes, accusing himself; because hence comes pardon, and because without confession there is no pardon; confession heals; confession justifies" (ibid., 229). The Council of Cambrai (1024) strictly keeps up the ancient canon of Christianity, accuses himself to frequent confession, fearlessly confess his sins, and carefully make amends according as he is directed" (can. xvii, Wilkins, ibid., 299). Among the ecclesiastical laws enacted (1053) by King Canute, we find this exhortation: "I have a faithful advice for thee, thou Christian; let us confess our sins, and let us each confess our sins to our confessor, and ever [after] refrain from evil-doing and mend our ways" (XVIII, Wilkins, ibid., 303).

The Council of Durham (c. 1220): "How necessary is the sacrament of penance, those words of the Gospel prove: Whose sins, etc." (ibid., 275). But since we obtain the same example of sins by true confession, which is prescribed in accordance with the canonical statutes that the priest in giving penance shall carefully consider the amount of the penance, the quality of the sin, the place, time, cause, duration and other circumstances of the sin; and especially the devotion of the penitent and the signs of contrition," Similar directions are given by the Council of Oxford (1222), which adds after various admonitions: "Let no priest dare, either out of anger or even through fear of death, to reveal the confession of anyone by word or sign . . . and should be feared, that the devoutly desirous to be degraded without hope of relaxation" (Wilkins, ibid., 595). The Scottish Council (c. 1227) repeats these injunctions and prescribes "that since a year the faithful shall confess all their sins either to their own [parish] priest or, with his permission, to another priest: for those who confess not the confessor are found in the statutes of Alexander, Bishop of Coventry (1237), especially in regard to the manner of questioning the penitent and enjoining penance. The Council of Lambeth (1261) declares: "Since the sacrament of confession and penance, the second plank after shipwreck, the last part of man's saving, the final refuge, is for every sinner most necessary unto salvation, we strictly forbid, under pain of excommunication, that anyone should presume to hinder the free administration of this sacrament to each who asks for it" (Wilkins, ibid., 751).

To give some idea of the ancient discipline, the penances attached to grave crimes are cited here from the English and Irish Penitentials. The Penitentials of Cummian prescribes that a layman shall do one year of penance; a cleric, two; a subdeacon, three; a deacon, four; a priest, five; a bishop, six. For murder or perjury, the penance lasted three, five, six, seven, ten, or twelve years according to the criminal's rank. Theodore commands that if any one leave the Catholic Church, join the heretics, and induce others to do the same, he shall, in case he repent, do penance for twelve years. For the perjurer who swears by the Church, the Gospel, or the relics of the saints, Egbert prescribes seven or eleven years of penance. Usury entailed three years; infanticide, fifteen; idolatry or demon-worship, ten. Violations of the penitarian commandment were punished with great severity, the penance varied, according to the nature of the sin, from three to fifteen years, the extreme penalty being prescribed for incest, i.e., fifteen to twenty-five years. Whatever its duration, the penance included fasting on bread and water, either for the whole period or for a specified portion. Those who could not fast instead recite daily a certain number of psalms, to give alms, take the discipline (scourging) or perform some other penitential exercise as determined by the confessor. (See Lingard, "Hist. and Antiq. of the Anglo-Saxon Church", London, 1845; Thurston, "Confession in England before the Confessant" in "The Tablet", Feb. and March, 1905.)

Confession in the Anglican Church.—In the Anglican Church, according to the rule laid down in the "Prayer Book", there is a general confession prescribed for morning and evening service, also for Holy Communion; this confession is followed by a general absolution. Let the one who has sinned in the Catholic Church. Also in the "Prayer Book" confession is counselled for the quelling of conscience and for the good that comes from absolution and the peace that arises from the fatherly direction of the minister of God. There is also mention of private confession in the discipline for those who move to make a special confession of his sins if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter. After which the priest shall absolve him (if he humbly and heartily desire it) after this sort: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, who has left the power to his Church etc." Since the beginning of the Oxford Movement confessions after the manner of the Confessors have become more frequent among those of the High Church party. In 1873 a petition was sent to the Convocation of the Archdiocese of Canterbury asking provision for the education and authorization of priests for the work of the confession. In the joint letter of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York disapproving of such course was marked by the decision not to encourage the practice of private confession openly avowed. The Puseyites refrained citing the authority of the "Prayer Book" as given above. In our time among the High Church folk one notices confessions in the churches, and one hears of discourses made to the people enjoining confession as a necessity to purity of life. The habitual confession makes use generally of the ruts and directions laid down in Catholic "Manuals", and especially popular is the "Manual" of the Abbé Gaume (A. G. Mortimer, "Confession and Absolution", London, 1906).

Utility of Confession.—Mr. Lea ("A History of Auricular Confession", Vol. II, p. 156) says: "No one can deny that there is truth in Cardinal Newman's argument: 'How many souls are there in distress and anxiety and loneliness, whose one need is to find a being to whom they can pour out their feelings unheard by the world. They want to tell them and not to tell them, they wish to tell them to one who is stronger than themselves for them, and as to despise them'; and then Mr. Lea adds: 'It is this weakness of humanity on which the Church has speculated, the weakness of those unable to bear their burdens, ... who find comfort in the system built up through the experience of the ages', etc. It has been made clear that the Church has simply carried out the mind of Christ. "Whatever you shall loose shall be loosed"; still we do not hesitate to accept Mr. Lea's reason, that this institution answers in large measure to the needs of men, who morally are indeed weak and in darkness. True Mr. Lea denies the probability of finding men capable of exercising aright this great ministry, and he prefers to confide the abuses which the work of priests has caused, rather than to listen to the millions who have found in the tribunal of penance a remedy for their anxieties of mind, and a peace and security of conscience the value of which is untold. The very abuses of which he speaks at such length have been the occasion of greater care, greater diligence, on the part of the Church. The few men of armonies appeal from the perversity of men, which the Church has met with admirable legislation, should not blind men to the great good that confession has brought, not only to the individual, but even to society.

Thinking men even outside the Church have acknowledged the usefulness to society of the tribunal of penance, these are the words of a recent unknown ('Systema theologicum', Paris, 1819, p. 270): "This whole work of sacramental penance is indeed worthy of the Divine wisdom and if aught else in the Christian dispensation is meritorious of praise, surely this wondrous institution. For the necessity of confessing one's sins deters a man from committing them. No man is more likely to be honest who may have sinned again after expiation. The pious and prudent confessor is in very deed a great instrument in the hands of God for man's regeneration. For the kindly advice of God's priest helps man to control his passions, to know the lurking places of sin, to avoid the occasions of evil doing, to restore ill-gotten goods, to have hope after depression and doubt, to have peace after affliction, in a word, to remove or at least lessen all evil, and if there is no pleasure on earth like unto a faithful friend, what must be the esteem a man must have for him, who is in very deed a friend in the hour of his direst need.'

Nor it little is alone in expressing this feeling of the great benefits that may come from the use of confession. Protestant theologians realize, not only the value of the Catholic theological position, but also the need of the confessional for the spiritual regeneration of their subjects. Dr. Martensen, in his "Christian Dogmaties" (Edinburgh, 1890), p. 443, thus outlines his views: "Absolution in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, derived from the bull of Indulgences and their expressions, is inherited from the apostles, is not unconditional, but depends on the same condition on which the gospel itself adjudges the forgiveness of sins, namely, change of heart and faith. If reform is to take place here, it must be effected either by endeavouring to revive private confession, or, as has been proposed, by doing away with the anathema of the confessor and the Lord's Supper, omitting, that is, the solemn absolution, because what it presupposes (personal confession of sin) has fallen into disuse, and retaining only the words of preparation, with the exhortation to self-examination, a testifying of the comfortable promises of the gospel, and a wish for a blessing upon the communicants."

Under the head of "Observations" he states: 'It cannot easily be denied that confession meets a deep need of human nature. There is a great psychological truth in the saying of Pascal, that a man often attains for the first time a true sense of sin, and a true stayedness in his good purpose, when he confesses his sin, and is heard to do so in a priest's ear. Catholicism has often been commended because by confession it affords an opportunity of depositing the confession of his sins in the breast of another man, where it remains kept under the seal of the most sacred secrecy, and whence the consolation of the forgiveness of sins is given him in the very name of the Lord.'

True, however you may carefully with the kind of confession practised in Lutheranism, but he does not hesitate to add: 'It is a matter of regret that private confession, as an institution, meeting as it does this want in a regular manner, has fallen into disuse; and that the objective point of union is wanting for the many, who desire to unburden their souls, and yet would rain their weaknesses with a fellow-man, and who feel their need of comfort and of forgiveness, which anyone indeed may draw for himself from the gospel, but which in many instances he may desire to hear spoken by a man, who speaks in virtue of the authority of his holy office.

Penleton, Henry, controversialist, b. at Manchester, d. in London, Sept., 1557; educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity, 18 July, 1552. Though he had preached against Lutheranism in Henry VIII’s reign, he conformed under Edward VI and was appointed by Lord Derby as an itinerant Protestant preacher.
 He was ordained in 1552 at St. Mary’s Church, and received the living of Blynhill, Staffordshire.
 He is described as “an able man, handsonde and athletic, possessed of a fine clear voice, of ready speech and powerful utterance” (Halley, “Lancashire”).
 On the accession of Mary he returned to the Catholic Church, and during 1554 received much prevarication.
 He was made chaplain of Lichfield Cathedral, and had the care of St. Stephen’s, Gloucester, and St. Martin’s Outwichin London; in 1556 he exchanged the latter living for St. Stephen Wallbrook.
 He was appointed chaplain to Bishop Bonner, for whom he wrote two homilies: “Of the Church
 what it is”, and “Of the Authority of the Church”.
 He also wrote “Declaration in his sickness of his faith or belief in all points as the Catholic Church teacheth against schismatical reports against him” (London, 1557). Foxe, who purports to record some of his discussions with persons charged with heresy, states that on his death-bed he repented of his conversion; but the authority of this writer can never be accepted without confirming evidence which, in this instance, as in so many others, is lacking.

Penelakut Indians, a small tribe of Salishan stock, speaking a dialect of the Cowichan language and occupying a limited territory on the Queen Charlotte Islands, B. C., with present reservations on Kuper, Tent, and Galliano Islands and at the mouth of the Che-minus River, included in the Cowichan agency.
 From disease and distruption introduced by the coasting vessels of early days, from changes consequent upon the influx of white immigration about 1850, and from the smallpox visitation upon Southern British Columbia in 1862, they are now reduced in number from 1000 of a century ago to about 250, of whom 140 live at the Penelakut village. They depended upon the sea for subsistence, and in their primitive customs, beliefs, and ceremonials resembled their kindred, the neighbouring Songish, and also those of the Nootka and of the Coast Salish tribes on the opposite coast.
 Some of them may have come under the teaching of Fr. Dempsey and the Jesuits as early as 1841, but regular mission work dates from the arrival of the secular priest, Fr. John Bolduc, who was brought over by the Hudson Bay Company in 1813 to minister to the Indians about the newly established post of Camosun, now Victoria. The mission work of the Oblate Fathers in the Vancouver and lower Fraser River region began with Fr. Paul Dunlu in 1851. Like most of the Salis-thian tribes of British Columbia, the Penelakut were Catholic and of exemplary morality. The Penelakut live by fishing, boat building, farming, labouring work, and hunting; have generally good health and sanitary conditions, fairly good houses, kept neatly, and well-cared-for stock and farm implements. They are an “industrious and law abiding people, who observe the ten commandments of God and the laws

on Good Friday it was the custom to bind one of the brethren to a cross, as in a crucifixion. At present no "crucifixions" take place, though previous to 1896 they were held in many places in New Mexico and Colorado. The Penitentes now confine themselves to secret flagellation and occasional visits to churches at night. Flagellation is also practised at the death of a Penitente or of a relative. The corpse is taken to the morada and kept there for a few hours; flagellation takes place at the morada and during the procession to any church in many places in New Mexico and Colorado.

II.—Origin and History.—Flagellation was introduced into Latin America during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, though no accurate records are found of any organized flagellant societies there until comparatively recent times. In some localities of Mexico, Central, and South America, flagellant organization, "love for less public in their practices, existed until very recently, and still exist in a few isolated places. All these later organizations were regulated and controlled by Leo XII. The origin of the New Mexican flagellants or hermanos penitentes is uncertain, but they seem to have been an outgrowth of the Third Order of St. Francis, introduced by Franciscan missionaries. Their practices consisted principally in flagellation, without inscriptions and without vows of blood, carrying small crosses, and marching in processions with bare feet while the church and join in long prayers. The barbarous customs of the New Mexico Penitentes are of a much later origin. The New Mexican flagellants call their society the "hersmanos" or "hazanas," and they were divided into three orders, the "yerno," the "padre," and the "pepe de San Francisco," and we know that when the last organization came into prominence in the early part of the nineteenth century, the older organization no longer existed in New Mexico. When their practices reached their worst stage (about 1850-90), the attention of the Church was directed towards them, and the so-called "hersmanos" were the very strong among all classes and the ecclesiastical authorities decided to use leniency. In a circular letter to the Penitentes of New Mexico and Colorado in 1888, Archbishop Salpointe of Santa Fe ordered them in the name of the Church to abolish flagellation, and the carrying of heavy crosses, and sent to the different hermanos mayores copies of the rules of the Third Order of St. Francis, advising them to reorganize in accordance therewith. His letter and orders were unheeded. He then ordered all the parish priests to see the Penitentes personally and induce them to follow his instructions, but they accomplished nothing. To make matters worse, a Protestant paper, "Las Hermanas," was published in Colorado, in 1889, which incited the Penitentes to resist the Church and follow their own practices. Archbishop Salpointe, in a circular letter of 1889, then ordered the Penitentes to disband. As a result the society, though not abolished, was very much weakened, and its further growth prevented. In Taos, Corral, San Mateo, and a few other places they are still numerous, and continue their barbarous practices, though more secretly.

Penitential Canons, rules laid down by councils or bishops concerning the penances to be done for various sins. These canons, collected, adapted to later practice, and compiled by suitable directions formed the nucleus of the Penitential Books (see: Tontngen: Moral: Penance). They all belong to the ancient penitential discipline and have now only an historic interest: if the writers of the classical period continue to cite them, it is only as examples, and to excite sinners to repentance by reminding them of earlier severity. In a certain sense they still survive, for the granting of indulgences (q.v.) is based on the rites of penance year, day, and quarantines. The penitential canons may be divided into three classes corresponding to the penitential discipline of the East, of Rome, or of the Anglo-Saxon Churches. (1) In the East, the prominent feature of penance was not the practice of mortification and pious works, though this was supposed; the penance imposed consisted in a longer or shorter period of exclusion from communion and the Mass, to which they were gradually admitted according to the different penitential "stations" or classes, three in number; for the "weepers" (ευπνομοιοι, ευπνομοιοι), mentioned occasionally, were not yet admitted to penance; they were great sinners who had to await their admission by the bishop. As soon as admitted, the penitents became "hersmanos" (έπομοντες, επομοντες), and assisted at the Divine service until after the lessons and the homily; then, the "prostrated" (επομοντες, επομοντες), because the bishop before excluding them, prayed over them while imposing his hands on them as they lay prostrate; finally the "hersmanos," or "sacerdotes," were admitted to the whole service, but did not receive communion. The penance ended with the admission to communion and complete equality with the rest of the faithful. These different periods amounted in all to three, five, ten, twelve, or fifteen years, according to the gravity of the sins. This discipline, which was rapidly mitigated, was renewed in the East by the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451). (2) The Roman penitential discipline did not recognize the various "stations", or classes; with this exception it was like the discipline of the East. The penitential exercises were not settled in detail and the punishment properly so called consisted in the exclusion from communion for a longer or shorter period. But the practice of admitting to penance only once, which kept the penitents in a fixed order, was maintained longer. The most ancient Western canons relate to the admission or exclusion from public penance; for instance, that the Pope and the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451, "Baptilos", 5) to admit adulterers, that of St. Callixtus and the Council of Carthage in 251 (Ep. 56) to admit the lapsi or apostates, although the Council of Elvira (about 300, Can. 1, 6, S., etc.) still refused to admit very great sinners. Other canons of this council ordained penances of several years' duration. After Elvira and Arles (314) the penitential canons are rather infrequent. They are more numerous in the conciliar and decretals of the popes after the close of the fourth century—Sireius, Innocent, and later St. Leo. They reduce the duration of the penance very much, and are more merciful towards the lapsi or apostates. These texts, with the translations of the Eastern councils, passed into the Western canonical collections. On the other hand, the more rigid in the penitential canons of Anglo-Saxon and Irish canons is the particular fixation of the penitential acts imposed on the sinner to insure reparation, and their duration in days, quarantines (cordina), and years; these consist in more or less rigorous fasts, prostrations, deprivation of things otherwise allowable; also alms, prayers, pilgrimages and so forth. These canons, of which we have in their original sources, are contained in the numerous Penitential Books (Libri Penitentiario) or collections made in, and in vogue from, the seventh century. These canons and the penitential discipline they represent were introduced to the Continent by Anglo-Saxon missionaries, and were at first received unfavourably (Council of Châlons, 513; Paris, 529); finally, however, they were adopted and gradually mitigated. (See CANONS, COLLECTIONS OF ANCIENT.)

Penitential Orders, a general name for religious congregations whose members are bound by stricter vows of penance or of voluntary poverty, and who are required to perform extraordinary works of penance, or to provide others with the means of atoning for grave faults. This class includes such congregations as the Angelicans, Capuchins, Carmelites, Daughters of the Holy Cross of Liége, Third Order of St. Dominic, Order of Fontevraud, Third Order of St. Francis, Daughters of the Good Shepherd, Sisters of the Good Shepherd, Sisters of St. Joseph of Lyons, Magdalens, Sacchetti, etc., which are treated under their separate titles. Likewise all eremitical foundations were, at least in their origin, penitential orders. Other congregations which come under this heading are—

(1) Congregation of St. John the Baptist: (a) A community near Pamplona in the Kingdom of Navarre, each of the five hermitages being occupied by eight hermits leading a life of mortification and silence, and assembling only for the chanting of the Divine Office. They received the approbation of Gregory XIII (c. 1515), who appointed a provincial for them. Over the light brown habit of rough material confined by a leather girdle was worn a short mantle, and about the neck a heavy wooden cross.

(b) A community founded in France about 1630 by Michel de Sabine for the reform of abuses among the hermits. Only those of the most edifying lives were chosen as members, and rules were drawn up which were approved for their dioceses by the Bishops of Metz and LePuy en Velay. The hermits were under the supervision of a visitor. A member was not permitted to make his final vows until his forty-fifth year, or until he had been a hermit for twenty-five years. The heavy brown habit and leathern belt with which were chased a number of communities existed in the Dioceses of Geneva and Vienne.

(2) Ordo penitentiarum ss. Martyrum, or Ordo Mariae de Metro de penitentia ss. Martyrum, a congregation which flourished in Poland and Bohemia in the sixteenth century. There are various opinions as to the period of foundation, some dating it back to the time of Pope Clement, but it is certain that the order was flourishing in Poland and Lithuania in the second half of the sixteenth century, the most important monastery being that of St. Mark at Cracow, where the religious lived under the Rule of St. Augustine. The prior bore the title prior ecclesia S. Mariae de Metro. The habit worn by the community was a white girdle, which was embroidered a red cross and heart. In a sixteenth-century document the members of this order are referred to as canons regular and mendicants.

(3) Penitents of Our Lady of Refuge, also called Nuns or Hospitallers of Our Lady of Nancy, founded at Nancy in 1663 by Ven. Marie-Elisabeth de la Croix de Saint-Pierre, who died in 1677. From the death of Jean-Leonard de Ranfain de Remiremont. After a childhood of singular innocence and mortification she was coerced into a marriage with an aged nobleman named Dubois, whose inhuman treatment of her ceased only with his conversion shortly before his death. Left a widow at the early age of twenty-four, she opened a refuge for fallen women, which she ministered, assisted by her three young daughters. Her success and the insistence of ecclesiastics encouraged her to ensure the perpetuation of the work by the institution of a religious community (1631), in which she was joined by her daughters and nine companions, including two lay sisters. The new congregation was formally approved by the Holy See in 1634 under the title of Our Lady of Refuge and the patronage of St. Ignatius Loyola, and under constitutions drawn largely from those of the Society of Jesus and in accordance with the Rule of St. Augustine.

(4) Sisters of the Consorciato di S. Croce della Penitenza or duatione Patrizia, founded in 1615 by the Carmelites Dominic of Gesù e Maria, who, with the assistance of Baltsassare Paluzzi, gathered into a small house (consocratorial) a number of women whose virtue was imperilled, and drew up for them a rule of life. Those desiring to become religious were placed under the Rule of St. Augustine, and, owing to the active interest of Maximilian, Elector of Bavaria, and Cardinal Antonio Barberini, a larger monastery and a church were built for them. External affairs were administered by a prelate known as the vice-proctor and his council, and the internal economy by a prioress, but in 1638 the institution was placed under the custody of the Good Shepherd. Later a house of training for abandoned girls and a house of correction for erring women were established in connexion with this institution, the latter being enlarged by Pius IX in 1851. The congregation has since been merged into that of the Good Shepherd.

(5) Ordo religiosus de penitentia, the members of which are called Scalzetti, founded in 1752 at Salamanca, by Juan Varella y Losada (b. 1724; d. at Ferrara, 24 May, 1769), who had resigned a military career for a life of voluntary humillation in a house of the Observants at Salamanca. Being urged to found a religious order, he assembled eight companions in community (8 March, 1752) under a rule which he had drawn up the previous year, and for which he obtained the authorization of Benedict XIV. The four foundations which he made in Hungary enjoyed but a brief existence, owing to the regulations of Joseph II, and those in Spain and Portugal did not survive the revolutions in those countries, so that the congregation eventually confined to Italy. The mother-house is in Rome, which he then possesses two convents, S. Maria delle Grazie, and S. Maria degli Angeli in Macello Martyrium. The constitutions were confirmed by Pius VI, who granted the congregation the privileges enjoyed by the Francisians, to which there is a close resemblance in organization and habit. Like the Scalzi, they are subject to a vow to defend the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, and, like all mendicant orders, they derive their means of subsistence entirely from contributions, and are forbidden the possession of landed property.

Penitents. Confraternities of, congregations, with statutes prescribing various penitential works, such as fasting, the use of the discipline, the wearing of a hair shirt, etc. The number of these confraternities increased to such a degree, Rome alone counting over a hundred, that the only care of establishing them is according to the colour of the garb worn for processions and devotional exercises. This consists of a heavy robe confined with a girdle, with a pointed hood concealing the face, the openings for the eyes permitting the wearer to see without being recognized. These confraternities have their own statutes, their own churches, and often their own cemeteries. Aspirants must serve a certain time of probation before being admitted.

1. White Penitents.—The most important group of these is the Archeconfraternity of the Gonfalone, established in 1261 at Rome. St. Bonaventure, at that time Inquisitor-general of the Holy Office, prescribed the rules, and the white habit, with the name Recommended B. V. M. This confraternity was erected in the Church of St. Mary Major by Clement IV in 1265, and four others having been erected in the Church of Ara Coeli, was raised to the rank of an archconfraternity, to which the rest were aggregated. The title of gonfalone, or standard-bearer was acquired during the pontificate of Innocent IV, when the members restored the violence of the Roman nobles and elected a governor of the capital to represent the pope, then at Avignon. Many privileges and churches were granted to this confraternity by succeeding pontiffs, the headquarters now being the Church of Santa Lucia del Gonfalone. The obligations of the members are to care for the sick, bury the dead, provide medical service for those unable to afford it, and give dowries to poor girls. What distinguishes these White Penitents from those of other confraternities is the girdle on the shoulder of the habit, within it a cross of red and white. Other confraternities of White Penitents are those of the Blessed Sacrament at St. John Lateran, the Blessed Sacrament and the Five Wounds at S. Lorenzo in Damaso, the Guardian Angel, etc.

2. Black Penitents.—The chief confraternity in this group is that of Misericordia, or of the Beholding of St. John, founded in 1488 to assist and console criminals condemned to death, accompany them to the scaffold, and provide for their funeral. The archives of this confraternity are in the church of St. John Lateran. The Archeconfraternity of Death provides burial and religious services for the poor and those found dead within the limits of the Roman Campagna. Other confraternities of Black Penitents are those of The Crucifix of St. Marcellus, and of Jesus and Mary of St. Giles.

3. Blue Penitents.—Among the confraternities of this group are those of St. Joseph, St. Julian in Monte Giordano, Madonna del Giardino, Santa Maria in Cucabberi, etc. A number of these confraternities were established in France under the patronage of St. Jerome.

4. Gray Penitents, including besides the Stigmati of St. Francis, the confraternities of St. Rose of Viterbo, The Holy Cross of Lucre, St. Rosalia of Palermo, St. Bartholomew, St. Alexander, etc.

5. Red Penitents, embracing the confraternities of St. Ursula and Catherine, the red robe being confined with a green cincture; St. Sebastian and St. Valentine, with a blue cincture; and the Quattro Coronati, with a white cincture.

6. Violet Penitents, the confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament at the Church of St. Andrea della Fratte, under the patronage of St. Francis of Paula.

7. Green Penitents, including the confraternity of St. Rosco and St. Martin at Ripetto, for the care of the sick.

There are many other confraternities which cannot be comprised within any of these groups, because of the combination of colours in their habits. The various confraternities were well represented in France from the thirteenth century on, reaching, perhaps, their most flourishing condition in the sixteenth century.

Penne and Atri, Diocese of (Pennesi et Atinensis).—Penne is a city in the Province of Ascoli, in the Abruzzi, central Italy; it has an important commerce in leather and in artificial flowers, and within its territory are several springs of medicinal waters, known to the ancients. It is the Pinna Vestina of antiquity, the chief city of the Vestini, distinguished for its fidelity to Rome, even in the war of the Marsi. Sulla destroyed the city during the civil war. After the Lombard invasion, it belonged to the Duchy of Benevento, with which it was annexed to the Kingdom of Sicily. In the ninth century it was sacked by the Saracens. According to legend Patrasus, one of the seventy disciples, was the first bishop of this city. The decrees St. Maximus is venerated at the cathedral. The united See of Penne and Atri was erected in 1152. Atri is the ancient Hadria, about which a Roman emperor about 282 n. c.; its ancient walls still remain. The cathedral is a fine specimen of the Italian Gothic, and has a campanile nearly 200 feet high. The first bishop of the united sees was Beroaldo; among his successors were: Blessed Anastasio, who died in 1215; the Cistercian Nicolo (1250), who founded the monastery now a convent of nuns; and Benedict XIII; the last of whom the confraternity phenomenon, suspected of having conspired against Pius IV, and therefore deposed; Paolo Odescalchi (1556), nuncio to Madrid and Vienna, built the episcopal palace of Atri. Within the territory of these sees is the famous Abbey of San Bartolomeo di Carpineto. The diocese is immediately subject to the Holy See; it has 95 parishes, 150,790 inhabitants, 4 religious houses of men, and 8 of women, and 4 educational establishments for girls.

It is 176 miles wide from north to south and about 303 miles long from east to west, containing 15,215 square miles, of which 230 are covered by water. It has a short line on Lake Erie 45 miles in length, and is bounded by New York on the north, New Jersey on the east, Ohio and West Virginia on the west, Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia on the south. It is the only one of the thirteen original states having no sea coast. About one-third of the state is occupied by parallel ranges and valleys. The mountains average from 1000 to 2000 feet in height. The river Susquehanna, which is broken by the north and west branches of the Susquehanna River, which flows through the centre of the state. The Delaware, which is 100 miles in total length, beginning from its origin in Otsego Lake, New York, is navigable for a distance of 130 miles from the sea, and forms the eastern boundary of the state. In the west, the Alleghany and Monongahela unite to form the Ohio. There is a wide range of climate within the geographical limits of the state.

I. History.—Although Captain John Smith, in 1608, was the first white man to meet natives of Pennsylvania, which he did when he ascended Chesapeake Bay, he never set foot within the limits of the present state. Henry Hudson, on 28 August, 1609, came within the Delaware Cades, but went no farther towards Pennsylvania. The first white man actually to enter the State appears to have been a trader named Daniel Jennoms, who came from Canada, Etienne Brulé, a companion of Champlain. He explored the valley of the Susquehanna from New York to Maryland in the winter of 1615-16, as is described by Champlain in an account of his voyages. In June, 1610, Captain Samuel Argall, coming from Virginia in search of provisions, entered the Delaware River and gave the name in honour of the then Governor of Virginia, Lord de la Warr. Captain Cornelius Mey came to the Delaware Cades in 1614 (see New Jersey). Another Dutch captain, Cornelius Hendrikse, came from Manhattan Island and probably navigated the Delaware River as far as the site of Philadelphia in 1631. David Pietersen de Vries established a post at Lewes, in Delaware, and later, in 1634, made voyages as far as Tinicum Island and Ridley Creek. For five years after this the Dutch traded on the Delaware River and in 1632 established a post called Fort Beversluyts near Philadelphia. The English Government had claimed to the territory in 1629, on the ground of first discovery, occupation, and possession, but in April, 1638, an expedition made up partly of Swedes and partly of Dutch, under Peter Minuit, established a post at Fort Christina on the Brandywine River. This was the first white settlement in the country of the Delaware made by the Swedish Government, and was against the protest of the Dutch Government of Manhattan. It was but a small colony and lasted only seventeen years. In 1643-44 permanent settlements were made at Tinicum, and in 1651 the Dutch Governor, Peter Stuyvesant, caused Fort Casimir to be built on the present site of New Castle, Delaware, to overawe the Swedes at Tinicum. Fort Casimir was occupied by the Swedes in 1651, but they were in their turn driven out by the Dutch. The territory remained in possession of the Delaware River country until the organization of Penn's colony in 1681.

When William Penn was thirty-six years old, in 1680, his father being dead, there was due him from the Crown the sum of £16,000 for services rendered by his father, Admiral Penn. This was cancelled in 1681 by a gift to him from the Crown of the largest tract of territory that had ever been given in America to a single individual, and in addition he received from the Duke of York all of the territory now included in the State of Delaware, for the sake of controlling the free navigation of the river of that name. This charter, or grant, gave him the right in fee simple to a vast tract of square miles of territory with the power of adopting any form of government, providing the majority of the colonists consented, and if the freemen could not assemble Penn had the right to make laws without their consent. The new colony was named Pennsylvania. Penn wished the name to be New Wales, or else Sylvania; possibly he endeavoured to avoid the special honour implied by prefixing his surname but the king insisted. It has been said, no doubt truthfully, that Penn was impelled by two principal motives in founding the colony: "The desire to found a free commonwealth on liberal and humane principles, and the desire to provide a safe home for persecuted Friends. He was strongly devoted to his religious faith, and warmly attached to those who professed it, but not the less was he an idealist in politics, and a generous and hopeful believer in the average good-natured quality of his fellow countrymen." (De Jone, 204). Penn himself, speaking of the grant by the king, says: "I eyed the Lord in obtaining it, and more was I drawn inward to look to Him, and to owe it to His land and power than to any other way. I have so obtained it and desire to keep it that I may not be unworthy of His love and do that which may answer to His law and prove the truth and prove that an example may be set to the nations. There may be room there but not here for such an holy experiment" (Jenkins, "Pennsylvania", I. 207). He had already shown ability as a colonizer, being concerned in the settlement of New Jersey, where the towns of New Bergen and New Brunswick were laid out before the charter of Pennsylvania was granted.

During practically all of the colonial period, Penn and his descendants governed Pennsylvania through agents or deputy governors. He was the feudal lord of the land, it being his plan to sell tracts from time to time, reserving a small quit-rent or selling outright. In 1685 the Amo's River was established as New London, and Penn and his sons held the proprietorship of the Province of Pennsylvania during a period of ninety-four years, excepting only about two years under William Ill. The colony was organized at the council held at Upland, 3 August, 1681, the deputy governor being William Penn. Penn, a captain in the English fleet, landed, 26 October, 1682, at New Castle, Philadelphia, had been laid out and a few houses had been built. After his landing Penn changed the name of Upland to Chester in honour of the English city. There he summoned the freeholders to meet, and they adopted the "Frame of Government" and ratified "The Laws agreed upon in England". The former instrument provided for a Provincial Council of seventy-two members to be elected by the people. This council was to propose laws to be submitted for the approval of the General Assembly, also to be elected by the people. This was formed the first Constitution of Pennsylvania. The laws accepted and reenacted with many additions became known as "The Great Law". It establishes religious liberty, allowing freedom of worship to all who acknowledge one God, and provides that all members of the Assembly, as well as those who voted for them, should be such as believed Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, and that no person held to be a slave or servant, or by force of unjust laws reduced to slavery, should be deprived of the rights of the citizen, including that, because they descend not with worldly inheritance, must be carefully propagated by a virtuous education of youth. For liberty without obedience is confusion, and obedience without liberty is slavery."

Penn was far in advance of his time in his views of the capacity of mankind for democratic government, and in the idea of government based on the rights and duties of religious belief. Indeed, it has been well said that the declaration of his final charter of privileges of 1701 was not alone "intended as the fundamental law of the Province and declaration of religious liberty on the broadest character and about which there could be no doubt of certainty. It is a declaration not of toleration but of religious equality and brought within its protection all who professed one Almighty God,—Roman Catholics, and Protestants, Unitarians, Trinitarians, Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans, and excluded only Atheists and Polytheists." At that time in no American colony did anything approach to toleration exist. When the provisions of "The Great Law" were submitted to the Privy Council of England for approval they were not allowed; but in 1706 a new law concerning liberty of conscience was passed, whereby religious liberty was restricted to Trinitarian Christians, and when the Constitution of 1776 was adopted, liberty of conscience and worship were extended even further by the declaration that "no human authority can in any case whatever control or interfere with the rights of conscience." It has been said: There never was in Pennsylvania such an individual period of any kind as was known in Pennsylvania where, no doubt, there was at some point in the colonial or the American period the mild dealings of the Quakers who controlled the province saved Pennsylvania from many of the ills that befell other colonies from the attacks of the aborigines. Prior to the French and Indian War, the Indians, who had been treated with careful consideration by Penn, were outraged at the unfairness and tyranny practiced by one of their allies, in obtaining title to land extending, on the eastern border of the state, to the region of the Delaware Water Gap, and known as "The Walking Purchase." This, added to the harsh treatment of the frontier settlers, who were for the most part North-of-Ireland immigrants (locally known as Scotch-Irish), resulted in bloody and persistent Indian wars which spread terror throughout the colony and were ended only after several campaigns. The defeat of the Indians by Bouquet and Forbes, and the destruction of the French stronghold, Fort Duquesne, broke the power of the Indians, and the colony was not troubled with them again until the Revolutionary War, when their alliance with the British received more encouragement.

When the contest with Great Britain arose, Philadelphia, the chief city of the American Colonies, was chosen as the place for assembling the first Continental Congress. There the Declaration of Independence was drafted and promulgated, and after the Revolution the Government of the United States was seated there until 1800 when the capital was moved to the new seat of Washington. Philadelphia remained the capital of the state under the Constitution of 1776 until 1812, when it was replaced by Harrisburg. The Convention which drafted the Constitution of the United States assembled at Philadelphia in May, 1787, and presented the draft to Congress on 17 September. On the following day it was submitted to the Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, by which body the Constitution was ratified on 12 December of the same year, Pennsylvania being the second to approve it. Again, Pennsylvania was the first state to respond to the appeal of President Lincoln for troops at the outbreak of the Civil War. Regiments were sent by Governor Curtin to the garrison at Washington and were largely responsible for the events of the first campaign by the Confederate forces after the first battle of Bull Run. In 1863 General Lee invaded the state, coming from the South by way of the Shenandoah Valley, and was signaly defeated in a three days' battle on the 1st.
2d, and 3rd of July at Gettysburg by the Union army under General George G. Meade. This battle has been recognized as the most important in the Civil War, as the success of the Confederate forces would have impelled Philadelphia and New York and might have led to the final triumph of the Confederacy.

11. Ethnology and Denominational Statistics.—It has been said of Pennsylvania that no other American colony had "such a mixture of languages, nationalities and religions. Dutch, Swedes, English, Germans, Scotch-Irish, Moravians, Pretzelarians, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Reformed, Methodists, Tunkers and Moravians all had a share in creating it" (Fisher). The eastern part of the state, especially the counties immediately adjoinig Philadelphia, was settled by the homogeneous population principally of English descent, though there was a large German settlement in the Counties of Philadelphia, Germantown, Westward, the County of Lancaster was largely settled by Germans, who brought with them a special knowledge of, and aptitude for, agriculture, with the result that a naturally rich county became one of the most productive in the United States, especially of tobacco and eereals. There is also a large German population in the outskirts of the city of Philadelphia. The Dutch language is very generally spoken. The first German settlements were made by the Tunkers, now known as Dunkers, or Dunkards, between 1720 and 1729. They were followed by the Schwenkfelders, from the Rhine Valley, Alsace, Silesia, Saxony, and the Palatinate. Members of the Lutheran Reformed Congregations came between 1732 and 1737. The Moravians at Bethlehem in 1730, and the so-called Scotch-Irish immigrants from the North of Ireland, settled in Lehigh, Bucks, and Lancaster Counties, and in the Cumberland Valley, between 1700 and 1750. The Welsh came to Pennsylvania previous to 1682, and were the most numerous class of immigrants up to that date. They were followed by the "5000 squatters" of 1796. The Delaware, known as "the Welsh Tract", where to this day their geographical names remain.

In 1890 the population of Pennsylvania was the second in size among the states of the Union, being estimated at 6,928,515. Of these 3,927,022 (or 43 per cent) were church members: 1,717,057 Protestants, and 2,210,965 Catholics. Of the total population (1910) for the entire state shows 1,494,766, of whom 38,235 were coloured. The Protestant denominations in 1900 were divided as follows: Methodists, 363,413; Lutherans, 335,643; Presbyterians, 322,512; Reformed, 181,550; Baptists, 111,694; Episcopalians, 99,021; United Brethren, 55,571; all others, 277,775. Of these, 3,457,999 (or 91 per cent) were classed as members of the Church of England, and 6,051,516 (or 77 per cent) were classed as members of the Roman Catholic Church.

III. Economic Conditions.—A. Population.—The United States Census of 1910 gives the population of Pennsylvania as 7,665,111 (a little more than 181.57 to the square mile). Of this number 1,549,008 belonged to Philadelphia and 539,905 to Pittsburg. Thus Philadelphia had maintained its position as the third largest city in the United States, while Pittsburg (with the accession of Allegheny, incorporated with it since the Census of 1900) stood eighth. The Census of 1910 shows an increase of more than 21.62 per cent in the population of the state during the first decade of the twentieth century. The Census report of the foreign-born white and of the coloured population for 1910 (respectively 879,383 and 136,945 in 1900) had not become accessible when this article was prepared. The German and Irish elements exceed by far all other nationalities among the foreign born. In 1910 the largest cities in the state, after Philadelphia and Pittsburg, were Harrisburg, the capital (pop. 64,186), Scranton (129,867), Reading (90,671), Wilkes-Barre (67,105), and Johnstown (55,852). Pennsylvania is entitled to thirty-two representatives in the Congress of the United States and thirty-four votes in the Presidential Electoral College. With the exception of a few cities, the distribution of the population is less dense than in most of the Eastern States. A comparatively small proportion of the population is engaged in agriculture, mining and manufacturing being the principal industries.

B. Material Resources.—Until 1880 Pennsylvania was pre-eminent as the lumber state, but its activity in this industry has since been far exceeded in the Southern and North-Western States. In 1900 about 2,313,367 million feet of lumber were cut in Pennsylvania, and 1,933,877 in Michigan. In the last ten years the output has decreased. The estimated product for the year 1907 amounted to 31,251,817, at the rate of $18.02 per million feet. Efforts towards conservation and systematic forestry have of late years received considerable impetus. The state is extremely rich in coal, petroleum, natural gas, iron ore, slate, and limestone. Anthracite coal was discovered in Pennsylvania as early as 1768, and the first regular shipments were made in 1820. The anthracite coal fields in the eastern portions of the state are about 500 square miles in area, while the bituminous coal and petroleum fields of the western and north-central sections cover an area of 2,000 square miles. The United States Ordnance Commission estimated, in 1910, that there were 117,593,000,000 tons of coal in Pennsylvania. The total output of bituminous coal in 1907 for the Pennsylvania mines was 149,759,089 American tons (of 2000 lbs. each); of anthracite, 86,279,719 Am. tons; so that the state contributed in that year 34.7 per cent of the bituminous coal and 13.9 per cent of the anthracite coal of the United States. In the following year (1908), owing to the general depression in industries, Pennsylvania produced only 118,313,525 tons of bituminous coal. The first oil well in Pennsylvania was discovered in 1860, and in the next following thirty years the operators produced 14,000,000 barrels of petroleum per annum. The state became a serious producer of coke, the output being normally more than half that of all the United States. The output of pig iron for 1908 was 6,573,021 gross tons, or 43.8 per cent of the entire product of the United States, valued at $1,109,957,846 (about $22,197,468). The Bessemer steel rails were rolled at Johnstown, Pennsylvania, in 1867. The annual product of iron and steel manufactures is over $200,000,000; they employ 54,000 persons, whose earnings amount to $34,000,000. Pennsylvania also stands first in the production of slate and limestone, contributing two-thirds of the whole output of slate of the United States. It ranks third in the production of sandstone. The total value of its output of quarried stone in 1908 was $1,400,000.

As a manufacturing state, Pennsylvania stands second in the United States. In 1904 it had an invested capital of $1,590,836,988 in manufactures, employing 763,282 wage earners receiving $367,960,850 per annum and producing $1,955,551,532 in value of finished goods, including, besides iron, coal, steel, and iron rails, various kinds, knitted goods, felt, etc. In 1908 there were 38,418 industrial establishments with a total capital of $1,126,406,558, employing 755,606 wage earners, of whom 126,000 were women. This state leads among the Middle States in cotton and exceeds all of the United States in woollen manufactures. The first cotton mill in the state was founded at Philadelphia in 1755. A sale of prints and linens took place in 1789. In 1830 Philadelphia was the leading city of the world in the number of its textile works. In 1819 there were 813 cotton and woollen factories, producing a value of $116,550,782. In 1907, 157 silk plants produced a value of $52,758,390. The agricultural wealth of the state is of considerable, although only 28 per cent of its land is under cultivation. The leading crops are hay, corn, oats, wheat, potatoes, and tobacco, aggregating for the year 1908 a value of $160,173,000. The value of farm animals in 1908 was $145,503,000. The dairy industry in that year, aside from the milk product, was valued at $41,250,000, with a total output of $62,214,000.

C. Communications.—In 1827 the first railroad in the state, nine miles in length, was opened between Mauch Chunk and Summit Hill. In 1842 the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad penetrated the coal regions, and in 1845 the Pennsylvania Railroad between Pittsburg and Philadelphia was opened for traffic. Pennsylvania has 22,96 miles of track for every hundred miles of area. The total assessment of steam railroads operating any portions of their lines within the state is $4,686,281,066—one third of the assets of all the railroads of the United States. The total earnings for the year ending 13 November, 1908, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, subject to taxation, were $824,215,593. During that year the Atlantic and Pacific route carried 2,562,570,580 passengers and $1,454,385,023 miles of freight. The street railways show a total capitalization of $841,515,694.

IV. Education.—A. General.—The common school system of education is universal throughout the Commonwealth, in every county, township, borough, and city. Each county is entitled to schools districts; new districts are formed as required under the direction of the Court of Quarter Sessions. School directors are elected annually in each district, two qualified citizens being chosen for a term of three years, there being six directors in all. School directors receive no pay, but are exempt from military duty and from serving in any borough or township office. They must hold at least one meeting in every three months and such other meetings as the circumstances of the district may require. It is their duty to establish a sufficient number of common schools for the education of every individual over the age of six years and under the age of twenty-one in their respective school districts. They appoint all teachers, fix their salaries, and dismiss them for cause; direct what branches of learning are to be taught in each school, and what books to be used; suspend or expel pupils for cause. They report to the county superintendent, setting forth the number and situation of the schools in their districts, the character of the teachers, amount of taxes, etc. Where land cannot be obtained for schools by agreement of the parties, school directors may enter and occupy such land as they deem fit not exceeding one acre. Free evening schools must be kept open on the application of twenty or more pupils or their parents, for the teaching of orthography, reading, writing, arithmetic, and other branches to pupils who are unable to attend the day schools, for a term of not less than four months in each year. Twenty days' actual teaching constitutes one school month. Schools are closed on Saturdays and legal holidays. High schools may be established in districts having a population of over 5,000.

In Penn's charter it was provided that the Government and councils should cruelty and order all public schools, and before Penn there had been a school taught by Swedes. In 1706 land to the extent of 60,000 acres was set aside for the support of schools. The Constitution of 1790 required the Legislature to provide by law for the establishment of schools throughout the state in such manner that the poor might be taught to read and write. The first law passed by the legislature for the support of public schools in Pennsylvania dates from the year 1740. The report of the superintendent of education for the year 1908 shows the number of schools to have been 33,171, taught by 7,888 male and 26,525 female teachers, the number of pupils amounting to 1,231,200 and in daily attendance 531,670. The total expenditure for school purposes in the state was stated that year was $8,316,214 with an estimated value of school property exceeded $90,000,000. There were in that year thirteen normal schools, seven theological seminaries, three medical colleges, one veterinary college, one college of pharmacy, four dental schools, two law schools, thirty-five colleges and universities, employing 1,014 instructors, with an attendance of 5,324,343.

B. Catholic.—Prior to the Revolution, and for some years after it, Philadelphia was the largest city, and St. Mary's the largest Catholic parish in the United States. A parochial school was established in that parish in 1782. This was an English school. Subsequently German schools were established at Goshenhoppen, Berks County, at Lancaster, Hanover, and other places under the auspices of the German Jesuits. In Western Pennsylvania the first Catholic school was established at Sportsman's Hall, Westmoreland County, some time after 1787, where subsequently the Benedictines built St. Vincent's Abbey and College. The another house of this religious order in the United States (q. v.) established a Catholic colony in Cambria County in 1799 and in 1800 opened a school at Loretto. The first Catholic church at Pittsburg was built in 1811, and in 1828 a community of the Order of St. Paul, coming from Belgium, established a convent and academy. In 1835 the sisters took charge of the schools in the district. Within a few years they had about 500 pupils. They opened a school at Harrisburg in 1832; one at McSherrytown in 1830; one at Pittsville in 1836. The Catholic educational system has been gradually developed since that date until now, in all the dioceses of Pennsylvania, there is a carefully graded system of parochial schools, there being in attendance in the various dioceses 225,224 pupils, who are taught by 2,956 religious and lay teachers in 143 schools, irrespective of those who are instructed in the various religious denominations and charitable institutions of the different churches. The course of instruction is graded in the Diocese of Philadelphia, varying in different districts, and includes the English language, arithmetic, algebra, geography, history, civics, government, vocal music (including Gregorian), drawing, elementary science. Institutions for higher education are, with a few exceptions, in the hands of the teaching orders and are not an integral part of the parochial school system. The cost of maintenance of the Catholic educational system is defrayed by voluntary contributions.

V. Religious Conditions.—A. Development of the Church.—The State of Pennsylvania historically coincides with the ecclesiastical Province of Philadelphia, composed of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia and the five suffragan Dioceses of Pittsburgh, Erie, Harrisburg, Scranton, and Altoona. (See the special articles on these dioceses respectively.) The Catholic population in Pennsylvania owes its existence mainly to early immigration from Ireland and Germany, though of recent years many Poles, Hungarians, and Italians have swelled its numbers. The first Catholic resident of Philadelphia, a German, came with Daniel Pastor to the founding of the American colony in 1682. In 1690 he applied with success to Governor of Pennsylvania, which he changed his name to John Tatham. In 1690 he was appointed Governor of West Jersey, but was unable to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. He seems to have been a friend of William Penn. The first priest who can be accurately traced in Pennsylvania was the Reverend John Pieron, of Canada, who in 1673-74 made a tour through Maryland, Virginia, and New England.

The orderly history of the Church in Pennsylvania begins in 1729, when the Rev. Joseph Wheaton, S.J., formed the first parish. The first church, St. Joseph's, was begun in 1733. Its congregation consisted of 22 Irish and 15 Germans, and in 1787 its membership had increased to about 3000. In 1727 there came to Philadelphia 115 Irish besides their servants. Later in the same year 5650 arrived, and 5655 in 1729. This migration resulted from the unjust laws which were then afflicting the Catholics and Dissenters in Ireland. The same laws drove from the North of Ireland, between 1700 and 1750, some 200,000 Presbyterians, most of whom came to America, and largely to Pennsylvania. In 1771, when Richard Penn succeeded John, in the government of Pennsylvania, the Catholics of Philadelphia, through their rector, the Rev. Robert Harding, presented their congratulations, which were most cordially received. When the Revolution broke out, the comparatively small body of Catholic inhabitants furnished a number of men who attained distinction in the military, naval, or political service of the country. For this contribution, the Rev. Thomas Fitzsimmons, Stephen Moylan, and George Meade. In 1780, on the occasion of the Requiem Mass for Don Juan de Miralles, the Spanish agent in Philadelphia, Congress assisted in a body together with several general officers and distinguished citizens. After the surrender at Yorktown a Mass of thanksgiving was celebrated in St. Mary's Church, a chaplain of the French Ambassador preaching the sermon.

Prior to the Revolution, as early as 1768, the German Catholics of Philadelphia had obtained property upon which subsequently was erected Holy Trinity Church, which was afterwards incorporated and, in 1780, dedicated. St. Mary's Church, from which Holy Trinity was an offshoot, was dedicated in 1788. The clergy of the United States was reinforced by a body of French priests who arrived at Philadelphia in 1792 and were distributed among various American churches. In 1793 a large number of fugitives came from the French Islands of the West Indies, and it was supposed that a wave of these refugees would break out soon after was brought by them. All the ministers of the various denominations zealously attended the sick, and many fell victims, including two of the Catholic clergy.

In 1788 Very Rev. John Carroll was elected Bishop of Baltimore with jurisdiction over all the American churches, including Philadelphia. He was consecrated on the 15th of August, 1790, at Lulworth, Dorchester, England.

In 1808 the Diocese of Philadelphia was separated from that of Baltimore (then ruled by Bishop John Carroll), the Dioceses of New York, Boston, and Baltimore being thus divided. At that time St. Michael's church, where Egan became the first Bishop of Philadelphia, the diocese included the entire State of Pennsylvania and the western and southern parts of New Jersey. In 1843 the Diocese of Pittsburg was established, and took away from Philadelphia a number of the western counties of the state. In 1853 the Diocese of Erie was erected out of the Diocese of Pittsburgh. In the same year the jurisdiction of Philadelphia over a part of New Jersey was transferred to the Diocese of Newark. In 1868 the two Dioceses of Scranton and Harrisburg were created. Philadelphia being left with a jurisdiction confined to the Counties of Berks, Bucks, Carbon, Chester, Delaware, Lehigh, Montgomery, Northampton, and Philadelphia. In all the Diocese of Altoona was constituted out of the Harrisburg territory together with part of that of Pittsburg. In 1875 Philadelphia was made a metropolitan see, Bishop Wood being appointed Archbishop. The first Provincial Council was held on 23 May, 1850.

B. Laws Relating to Religion.—By the Constitution of Pennsylvania (Art. 1., Sec. 3) it is declared that "All men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience; no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience, and no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishments or modes of worship." It has been held, however, that this liberty is a part of the general law of Pennsylvania; not Christianity founded on any particular tenets, but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men (11 S. & R., 394; 26 Pa., 342; 2 How., 199). This liberty does not include the right to carry out every scheme claimed to be part of a religious system. Thus, a Municipal Ordinance forbidding the use of drums by a religious body in the streets of a city is valid (11 Pa., 335). The constitution further provides that "no person who acknowledges the being of a God and a future state of rewards and punishments shall, on account of his religious sentiments, be disqualified to hold any office or place of trust or profit under the State." (Sec. 23.) Therefore, the exclusion of a Sister of Charity from employment as a teacher in the public schools, because she is a Roman Catholic, would be unlawful (164 Pa., 629); now, however, she cannot teach while wearing her religious garb. An Act of Assembly prohibiting the transaction of worldly business on Sunday does not enfranchise upon the liberty of conscience. It is therefore constitutional. Until a recent Act of Assembly, witnesses in Court were required to believe in a Supreme Being, although their religious opinions were not such as are generally accepted by orthodox Christians. Now, however, it is not necessary that witnesses should have any belief in the existence of God, their credibility being a question for the jury.

By an Act of Assembly blasphemy and profanity in the use of the names of the Almighty, Jesus Christ, the Holy Spirit, or the Scriptures of Truth, are criminal offences. This is a re-enactment of a provincial law as old as 1700. The sessions of the Legislature and the Christian holidays, of which the first and last Friday are among the legal holidays, Five or more persons may form a church corporation for the support of public worship. All churches, meeting houses, or other regular places of stated worship, with the grounds thereto annexed necessary for the occupancy and enjoyment of the same, all burial grounds not used or held for private or corporate profit, together with certain other specified kinds of property devoted to education and benevolence, are exempted from taxation of all sorts. Marriage cannot be solemnized without a licence. Under the Act of 1700, all marriages not forbidden by the law of God are encouraged; and the persons who, as aforesaid, can be first consulted, and the parties' freedom from all engagements established. Under the Act of 21 June, 1901 (P. L. 579, Sec. 1), the marriage of first cousins is prohibited, and such marriages are void. The subsequent marriage of parents legitimize their children under the Act of 11 May, 1857 (? T. L., Sec. 14). An Act of 1868 voids a marriage if the property belonging to women before marriage or accruing to them afterwards shall continue as their separate property after marriage. But a woman may not become accommodation indorser, maker, guarantor, or surety for another, nor may she execute or acknowledge a deed or writing, etc. of her real estate unless her husband joins in such mortgage or conveyance. (Act of 8 June, 1893). The separate earnings of a married woman are under her separate control and not liable for the debts or obligations of her husband.
Under certain circumstances, a married woman may bring a suit without the intervention of a trustee, but husband and wife cannot sue one another. A married woman may be money to, and take security from, her husband. A husband is not liable for the wife's debts incurred before her marriage. Absolute divorce may be granted for impotence, bigamy, adultery, cruelty, desertion, force, fraud, or coercion, and for conviction of forgery or infamous crime. The plaintiff must reside within the state for at least one whole year previous to the filing of the petition. A person divorced for adultery cannot marry the petitioner during the life of the former husband or wife. Divorces from bed and board are allowed for practically the same causes as absolute divorces. Marriages may be annulled for the usual causes, but proceedings must be taken under the Divorce Acts.

A Board of Public Charities, consisting of five commissioners, is appointed by the governor with the duty of visiting all charitable and correctional institutions at least once a year, examining the returns of the several counties, towns, and cities, and making an annual report as to the causes and best treatment of pauperism, and imprisonment, and giving all information concerning the industrial and material interests of the commonwealth bearing upon these subjects. They have the power of examining the various charitable, reformatory, and correctional institutions, including the city and county jails, prisons, and almshouses, and are required to submit an annual report to the legislature. These state aid are expected to be given notice to the Board, which is to inquire carefully into the grounds for the request and report its conclusions to the Legislature. Before any county prison or almshouse shall be erected the plans must be submitted to the Board.

Prisoners confined in any prison, reformatory, or other institution have the privilege of practising the religion of their choice, and are at liberty to procure the services of any minister connected with any religious denomination in the state, providing such service shall be personal and not interfere with the established order of the religious service in the institution. Establishment of religious character shall not be a basis for dismissal.

By an Act of Assembly passed in 1903, the active or visiting committee of any society, existing for the purpose of visiting and instructing prisoners, are constituted official visitors of jails and penitentiaries, and are permitted under reasonable rules and regulations to make visits accordingly.

It is a misdemeanor for any person engaged in the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors to employ an intemperate person to assist in such manufacture or sale, or by gift or sale to give intoxicating liquor to anyone kept in intemperate habits, or to minors, or insane persons. Disregard of a notice to furnish liquor to intemperate persons is issued by a relative renders the party so selling liable for damages.

Any judge, justice, or clergyman shall perform the marriage ceremony between parties when either is intoxicated shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Every person of sound mind who has attained the age of twenty-one years may dispose of his or her real and personal property by will. This includes married women, reserving to the husband his right as tenant by the courtesy and his right to take against the will, and to the wife her right to take against the husband in the event of a divorce at the end either by the testator himself or, in case he is prevented by the extremity of his last illness, by some person in his presence and by his express direction; and in all cases shall be proved by oaths or affirmations of two or more competent witnesses, who need not be testifying witnesses except in the case where the will makes a charitable devise or bequest. In the case of the extremity of the testator's last illness, he may make an oral will, and the testimony for the disposition of his personal property, such will to be made during the last illness in the house of his habitation, or where he has resided for the space of ten days before making his will, or any location where he has been surprised by sickness and dies before returning to his own house, or in real estate, real or personal, may be bequest, devise, or conveyed to any person in trust for any religious or charitable use, except by deed or will, attested by two credible, disinterested witnesses, at least one calendar month before the decease of the testator or alenon. No literary, religious, charitable, or beneficial society, congregation, or corporation may hold real and personal estate to a greater yearly value than $30,000 without express legislative sanction, or on deere of court in special circumstances.

WALTER GEORGE SMITH.

Penobscot Indians, the principal tribe of the famous Abnaki confederacy of Maine, and the only one still keeping its name, territory, and tribal identity. The Abnaki confederacy, to which the Penobscot belonged, consisted of a number of small tribes of Algonquian linguistic stock, holding the greater part of the present state of Maine, and closely connected with the French in the years 1604 to 1627. The Penobscot tribe in the fraction of the Abnaki nation known as the Abnaki of the Abanaki nation, of which the Penobscot was the abounding member.

The beginning of missionary work among the Abnaki was by the Jesuits Pierre Biard and Ennemond Massé, of the French post of Port-Royal (Annapolis, Nova Scotia), in 1611. Two years later a mission establishment was attempted, in connexion with a French post on Mount Desert island, Maine, but was destroyed by the English commander, Argall, before it was fairly completed. In 1654, the Jesuit Fr. Gabriel Drilletes, of the Montagnais Mission, spent much time with the Abnaki, establishing a temporary chapel on the Kennebec, and later drew off many of them to the mission settlements of Canada. In 1688 the Jesuit Fr. Jacques Bigot again took up the work on the Kennebec while in the same year Fr. Jean-Baptiste of the Society of Jesus established the first regular mission at Panawambesk ("it forks on the white rocks"—Vetromile) or Penobscot, at the falls near the present Oldtown. Here he laboured until his death in 1699, and was succeeded by other priests of the same seminary until 1703, when this mission, like that on the Kennebec, was transferred to Jesuit control, under which it continued, although under constantly greater difficulties, until the fall of Canada in 1760. The first mission of any importance in the earlier period was Fr. Etienne Lavreyn (1718-1729).

From the outbreak of King Philip's war in 1675 up until the close of the French period in 1763 the history of the Abnaki tribes was one of almost unceasing bloody struggle against the English advance. On the side of the English it was a war of extermination, while in the Indian land it was a war of salvage, beginning from five pounds in 1675 to forty pounds in 1703 for every scalp of a male above ten years, and at last in 1744 one hundred pounds for the scalp of every male above twelve years of age and fifty for that of a woman or child. The prizes were sold as slaves (see Williamson). In 1706 Governor Dudley reported that he had not left an Indian habitation or planting field undestroyed. Shortly afterward it was estimated that one-third of the Abnaki had been exterminated by war, disease, or exposure within seven years. In 1722 three hundred men were appointed to destroy the village at Penobscot, and four hundred others to ravage contiguous Indian settlements as far as Presque Isle. Shortly after this a treaty was concluded by which the Indians drew off the Indians from the French interest, efforts were twice made by the English authorities of Massachusetts to persuade them to receive Protestant missionaries, but the offer was rejected. Three times the mission at Norridgewock on the Kennebec, under the devoted Fr. Sebastian Rasles, was attacked and destroyed, and on the third time the missionary himself was among the slain. The final result was that the Abnaki who survived withdrew to St. Francis or other mission settlements in Canada, with the exception of the Penobscot, who made a separate treaty of peace in 1749, thus saving themselves and their territory, but forever extinguishing all affection of their kindred by whom they were therefore regarded as traitors to the confederacy.

On the outbreak of the Revolution in 1775 the Penobscot, under their chief, Orono, tendered their services to the American cause; at the same time asking that a priest be sent to them, they having then been for nearly six years without one. The English offer was accepted and they gave good service throughout the war, but the Massachusetts Government was not then able to find them a priest, owing to the fact that Jesuits and other missionaries had for years been outlawed from New England. When the war was ended the Penobscot made another appeal, this time by a delegation to Bishop Carroll of Maryland, to whom they presented the crucifix of the murdered Fr. Rasles, with the result that in 1783 the Penobscot mission at Oldtown was re-established under Fr. Francis Ciquard, a Frenchman, sent from France for that purpose. He continued with it until 1794, going then to the neighbouring Etchemin (Maliseet). Orono died at Oldtown in 1802. Of later missionaries the most noted is the Jesuit Fr. Eugene Vecrnonne, stationed at Oldtown from about 1855 to about 1880, author of a small history of the Abnaki and of several works in the language, the most important of which is a manuscript Abnaki Dictionary, now with the Bureau of American Ethnology. The other great dictionary of the language, that of Father Rasles and plundered from the mission in the second attack (1722), was deposited in Harvard University and published in the Memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences (Cambridge, 1835).

The principal existing Penobscot village, officially known as Oldtown, is on an island in Penobscot river, a few miles above Bangor, and, as indicated by the Indian name, about on the ancient site. The church, dedicated to Saint Anne, is served by a secular priest. In their aboriginal condition the Abnaki tribes were semi-sedentary, dwelling in villages of communal wigwams covered with bark or woven mats, each village having also a larger central town-house for public gatherings. They cultivated corn and other vegetables, and understood the use of munare. They had also the canoe and fish-net and had the chen system, with fourteen clans (Morgan). Polygamy was rare and tribal government simple. They buried their dead. In general character they were comparatively mild and tractable and not given to extreme cruelty as were the Iroquois. What remains of their mythology has been brought together in "A New Dictionary of the Penobscot Language of New England." The modern Penobscot are entirely Christianized and civilized in habit of living, deriving subsistence by lumbering, boating, hunting, some farming, and the making of Indian wares for sale. They are in friendly touch with their neighbours, the Passamaquoddy band of the Maliseet. See also Missions, Catholic Indian, of the U. S.; Maliseet Indians; Rasles; Saint Francis Mission.

JAMES MOONEY.

Pension, Ecclesiastical, the right to a certain sum of money to be paid yearly out of the revenues of a church or benefice to a cleric, on account of just reasons approved by an ecclesiastical superior. The term is derived, according to some, from the Latin word penda, "to depend"; according to others, from the word penda, "to pay". The term pension is sometimes used as synonymous with a certain species of benefice, as when the person, by the order of a superior, receives a perpetual vicarship in a church and is sustained by its revenues. This is looked on as the conferment of a real benefice. In its ordinary acceptation, however, it does not connote the bestowal of a benefice, but refers to the money paid, for a certain time, to a third person from the fruits of a benefice belonging to another and making the authorization of an ecclesiastical superior. The obligation to pay such a pension may be incumbent on either the holder of a benefice or on the benefice itself. If the first, then the burden does not pass to his successor; if the second, the obligation lasts as long as the pensioner lives.

As the pope has full power over all benefices, he may impose a pension on any benefice whatever, even though it belong to a patron. If, however, the patronage belongs to a royal person, the pope does not usually impose the pension without the patron's consent. For validity, it is not necessary that the pontiff give any cause for his act.

As to the bishop, or anyone inferior to the pope, he may not, generally speaking, impose a perpetual pension on a benefice or increase one already existing, nor may he, in conferring a benefice, make a reservation of a pension to be paid to a third party. It is within the bishop's power, however, to impose a pension, for a reasonable cause, to last for a certain time, even for the life of the holder of the benefice, if he himself consents. In this case, the pension is not imposed upon the benefice, but on its incumbent. The canons forbid the bishop to constitute a pension out of a certain quota of the fruits of a benefice, as a half or a third part, because this has the appearance of a division of the benefice. Just causes for the constitution of a pension by the bishop are: the want of a benefice for the minister; or the education of a poor student; for the utility of the Church; for the relief of poor men; for some pious object; for a reward of services rendered; and for the support of a person who resides a benefice, in which

fast case it should be in moderate proportion and not the result of a bargain. For the causes mentioned, a bishop may not impose a pension on a benefice itself, or to have effect after the decease of the incumbent, though some canonists have maintained the contrary. When necessary, a benefice may be burdened with a pension to be paid to himself, as this would be a simonia.

When two beneficiaries interchange benefices, they may not make a pact by which the one receiving the richer post is to pay a pension to the other, but the bishop may make such a stipulation of his own free will, as a part of the exchange of two benefices. In like manner, while it is simoniacal for an abbot to stipulate for a pension out of the benefice he resigns, yet he may, for grave cause, request the bishop to give him such a pension, and the bishop may bestow it upon him. Simoniacal pacts are those which are made without the intervention of the proper ecclesiastical authority.

Laymen are incapable of receiving ecclesiastical pensions, and the clerical recipient must not be excommunicated, suspended, or under interdict. Pensions may be transferred to another by the pensioner, if the proper authority sanctions it. The earliest mention of a pension in Church history is said to be that of Domnus of Antioch, who received one out of the revenues of the bishopric, which he had vacated at the time of the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Pentacmia, titular see of Palestine, suffragan of Areopolis or Rabbah. It was never a residential see; the Crusaders mistook the "Descriptio orbis romani" of George of Cyprus, where it is mentioned (ed. Gelzer, 53), for a "Notitia episcopatum", whereas it was nothing but a purely civil document. There is a locality of the same name in Arabia (op. cit., 54), and a third in Palestine Prima, now known as Fendacamich, near Samaria. Le Quen has made the same error ("Oriconi christians", III, 773), but without discovering the name of one bishop. The site of Pentacmia seems unknown.

Pentapolis.—The word, occurring in Wisdom, x, 6, designates the region where stood the five cities (πεντάς, ποιμα)—Sodom, Gomorrha, Seor (A. V., Zoar), Admah, Shcboom—which united to resist the invasion of Chosrahmonor (Gen., xiv), and of which four were destroyed and one preserved, region which marked the southern limit of the territory occupied by the Canaanites, was included in what was known in old Palestinian geography as the "Kikkar" (i.e. "round" or "oval"); Gen., xiii, 10, 11, 12, etc.; D. V. ("the country about the Jordan"); A. V. ("the plain"), that is to say probably the lower Jordan Valley and the land around the Dead Sea. The Kikkar was a very fertile country (Gen., xiii, 10). Its fertility caused Lot to settle there (Gen., xiii, 8-13). About the same epoch, or possibly a little earlier, the five kings of the Pentapolis had been defeated in a battle fought in the Valley of Sildum (D. V. ("the woodland Vale") by Amraphel (most probably Haremrah, q. v.), King of Sennaar, Arioch (Kum-Sin), King of Elam (Larsa), Chosrahmonor (Kudur-Lagamar), King of Elam and Thirid (Tidal) —"king of the nations" (probably countries in the neighbourhood of Elam and in its dependence), and made tributary. Twelve years later the fifth king revolting, the Pentapolis was once more invaded by the armies of the East, the territory plundered, and exile was caused among which were Lot and his household. We read in Gen., xiv, how Abraham came to the rescue of his nephew. The Pentapolis soon recovered from the effects of its defeats, and in its restored prosperity renewed the shameful vices which brought upon it the judgment of God. "The Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrha brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven, and he destroyed these cities and all the country about, all the inhabitants of the cities and all things that spring from the earth" (Gen., xix, 24-25).

The site of the Pentapolis has been sought in many places around the Dead Sea, even in its very bed. According to the holders of the latter opinion, we should see, in the Biblical description of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrha, the account of a great geological disturbance which caused a sinking of the soil and a level of the lake. Two explorers pointed out as a remnant of the submerged cities the "Rûjim el-Bâhr", a ledge of rock to the north of the sea, now entirely covered with water, but forming an island or even a peninsula at periods when the lake was considerably lower than now (as, for instance, from 1845 to 1892). Modern geologists, on the other hand, while admitting that disturbances of that character may have occurred in that region in the last fifty or forty centuries, yet with one accord hold that the origin of that body of water goes back to pre-historic times. The site must accordingly be sought elsewhere. There are some, among them Armstrong, Wilson, Conder, Tristram, and recently Dr. Huntington (American Journal of Science, etc., xiv, 1891), who, believing in a certain likeness in names, searched for the Pentapolis to the north of the Dead Sea. Clermont-Ganneau, on the contrary, thought Gomorrha was in the Arabah, about 60 miles south of the Dead Sea (Recueil d'Archéol. Orient., I, pp. 163 sqq.). Most geographers, however, think that the site of the Pentapolis should be sought partly in the shallow bed of the south end of the lake, and partly in its immediate neighbourhood. This view seems to be supported by two serious arguments. First, the name "Jebel Ulsdum", given to a conspicuous mountain of salt on the south-west shore, echoes apparently a long-standing tradition that Sodom was near by. Second, Seor, the only city that survived the ruin, was known throughout Biblical times (Is., xv, 5; Jer., xviii, 4) and in the early Christian centuries [Joseph, "Ant."], I, xi, 4; "Bellum jud.," IV, viii, 4; Ptolemy, V, xvii, 5; Euseb., "Onomast.," 231, 261; Madaba Mosaic Map; medieval Arabic geographers (cf. Le Strange, "Palestine under the Moslems", p. 292); crusaders (ARM., "Palestine and Syria", xxii, 185; "Voyage of Zoroa," was an episcopal see at the time of the Council of Chalcedon, 451); it was situated south-east of the Dead Sea, at a distance of 580 stadia (almost 66 miles) from the north shore of the same, and to all appearances should be looked for near the mouth of the Wady Qerabah. The other three cities were possibly north of Seor.

Pentateuch, in Greek πεντατέχνης, is the name of the first five books of the Old Testament. I. Name.—Though it is not certain whether the word originally was an adjective, qualifying the omitted noun παντός, "all", "all things", "all subjects", it appears to refer to the sheaths or boxes in which the separate five rolls or volumes were kept. At what precise time the first part of the Bible was divided into fives a question not yet finally settled. Some regard the division as anticipating the Septuagint translation; others attribute it to the author of this translation; St. Jerome was of opinion. Ep. 52, ad Paulin., 8; p. L. XXII, 545) that St. Paul alluded to such a division into five books in i Cor., xiv, 19; at any rate, Philo and Josephus are familiar with the division now in question ("De Abrahamo"). 1; "Cont. Apion.", 1, 8). However ancient may be the custom of dividing the initial portion of the Old Testament into five parts, the early Christians did not indicate the partition. They called this part of theible hâthorrh (the law), or tórah (law), or sèphér hâthorrh (book of the law), from the nature of its contents (Jos., viii, 31; i, 8; i Esdr., x, 3; ii Esdr., viii, 2, 3, 14; x, 35, 37; 11 Par., xxiv, 1); they named it tórah Moshe (law of Moses), sèphér Moshe (book of Moses), sèphér tórah Moshe (book of the law of Moses) on account of its authorship (Jos., viii, 31, 32; xxiii, 6; III Kings, ii, 3; IV Kings, xiv, 16; xxii, 25; Dan., ix, 11; i Esdr., iii, 2; vi, 18; i Esdr., vi, 11; xxii, 1; i, etc.); finally, the Divine origin of the Mosiac Law was implied in the names: law of Yahweh (i Esdr., vii, 10, etc.); law of God (i Esdr., viii, 11; etc.), book of the law of Yahweh (i Esdr., viii, 11; etc.), book of the law of Moses (Jos., xxiv, 26, etc.). The word law in the foregoing expressions has been rendered by ἱθήσ, with or without the article, in the Septuagint version. The New Testament refers to the Mosiac law in various ways; the law (Matt., v, 17; Rom., ii, 12; etc.), the law of Moses (Luke, ii, 22; xxv, 11; Acts, xvii, 23); the book of Moses (Mark, xii, 26); or simply, Moses (Luke, xxiv, 27; Acts, xv, 21). Even the Talmud and the older Rabbinc writings call the first part of the Bible the book of the law, while in Aramaic it is simply termed law (of Buxtorf, "Lexicon Chaldaicum Bibliorum Talmudicorum""). 791, 983; Levy, "Handbuch des Talmudes der Juden", x, 215). The book of the law or the law according to the Mosiac Law is called in the Talmud, Moshe (Mark, xii, 26); or simply, Moses (Luke, xxiv, 27; Acts, xv, 21). Even the Talmud and the older Rabbinc writings call the first part of the Bible the book of the law, while in Aramaic it is simply termed law (of Buxtorf, "Lexicon Chaldaicum Bibliorum Talmudicorum""). 791, 983; Levy, "Handbuch des Talmudes der Juden", x, 215). The book of the law or the law according to the Mosiac Law is called in the Talmud, Moshe (Mark, xii, 26); or simply, Moses (Luke, xxiv, 27; Acts, xv, 21). Even the Talmud and the older Rabbinc writings call the first part of the Bible the book of the law, while in Aramaic it is simply termed law (of Buxtorf, "Lexicon Chaldaicum Bibliorum Talmudicorum""). 791, 983; Levy, "Handbuch des Talmudes der Juden", x, 215). The book of the law or the law according to the Mosiac Law is called in the Talmud, Moshe (Mark, xii, 26); or simply, Moses (Luke, xxiv, 27; Acts, xv, 21).

The Greek name πανταταχος, implying a division into the law of five parts, occurs for the first time about A. p. 150-75 in the letter to Flora by the Valentinian Polemy (cf. St. Epiphanius, "Hær.", XXXIII, 14; P. G., XXI, 504). An earlier occurrence of the name was supposed to exist in a passage in the Hexameron of Heliodorus of Philus. Pauly is called σαλαντας ἀλλα πανταταχοιος (cf. edition of de Lagarde, Leipzig and London, 1885, p. 193); but the passage has been found to belong to Epiphanios (cf. "Hippolytus") in "Die griechischen Schriften der ersten drei Jahrhunderte", Leipzig, 1897, i, 113). From this passage a much used term is derived, Oatwin, "Handbuch der Oeder der Talmudischen Geschichet“, II, 11; P. G., IV, 192; cf. P. G., XVII, 441, St. Athanasius (Ep. ad Marcellinum, 5; P. G., XXVII, 12), and several times by St. Epiphanios (De menur. et ponderibus, 1, 6; P. G., XII, 214). In Latin, Tertullian uses the masculine form Pentateuchos (Adv. Marcion., I, 10; P. L. 11, 257), while St. Isidore of Seville prefers the neuter Pentateuchum (Etym. VI, ii, 1, 2; P. L., LXXII, 239). The analogous forms Oatuteuch, Oeptateuch, and Hexateuch have been used to refer to the first eight, seven, and six books of the Bible respectively. The Rabbinc writers adopted the expression "the five-fifths of the law" or simply "the five-fifths" to denote the five books of the Pentateuch.

Both the Palestinian and the Alexandrian Jews had distinct names for each of the five books of the Pentateuch. In Palestine, the opening words of the several books served as their titles; hence we have the names: bereshith, we'elhem shemôth or simply shemôth, wâyylêqû, wâyâhèlôbôr, and wélî èhéñôdôbôr or simply èhéñôbôr. Though these were the ordinary Hebrew titles of the successive Pentateuchal books, certain Rabbinc writers denote the last three according to their contents; they called the third book tórah kôhârûn, or law of priests; the fourth, hâmîsh häppâlîqîdûm, or book of census; the fifth, mishânhôrâh, or repetition of the law. The Alexandrian Jews derived their Greek names of the five books from the contents of either the whole or the beginning of each division. Thus the first book is called Téresâm àtômô or simply Pèteros; the second, Kôdôm òdô or 'Édôs; the third, Léšônik or Léšion; the fourth, 'Ådôphôl, and the fifth, 'Ådôphômân. These names passed from the Septuagint into the Latin Vulgate, and from this into most of the translations of the Vulgate. 'Ådôphômân however was replaced by the Latin equivalent Numéri, while the other names retained their form.

II. Analysis.—The contents of the Pentateuch are partly of an historical, partly of a legal character. They give us the history of the Chosen People from the creation of the world to the death of Moses, and acquaint us too with the civil and religious legislation given to them during the life of their great lawgiver. Genesis may be considered as the introduction to the other four books; it contains the early history down to the preparation of Israel's exit from Egypt. Deuteronomy, consisting mainly of discourses, is practically a summary repetition of the Mosaic legislation, and concludes also the history of the people under the theocracy of Numbers, or Conquest.

The Pentateuch exhibits both a literal unity and a division into five minor parts.

A. Genesis.—The Book of Genesis prepares the reader for the Pentateuchal legislation; it tells us how God chose a particular branch of the human race, the Chosen People, and how he trained the Chosen People to fulfill its mission. From the nature of its contents the division comprises two rather unequal parts; cc. i-xi present the features of a general history, while cc. xii-fi contain the particular history of the Chosen People. By a literary device, each of these parts is subdivided into four sections differing in length. Each section is introduced by the phrase "éhél thôdôth (these are the generations)" or its variant zîch sèphér toledôth (this is the book of the generations). "Generations", however, is only the etymological meaning of the Hebrew toledôth; in its context the formula can hardly signify a mere genealogical table, for it is either preceded or followed by something to keep it in its etymological meaning and the formula usually begins with genealogical records, and consists to a large extent of such records, one naturally interprets the above introductory formula and its variant as meaning, "this is the history" or "this is the book of the history". History in these phrases is not to be understood as a narrative resting on folklore, as Fr. von Hummelauer believes ("Exegetisches zur Inspirationsfrage, Biblische Studien"). Freiburg, 1901, IX, 4, pp. 26-32): but as a record based on genealogies. Moreover, the introductory formula often refers back to some principal feature of the preceding section, thus forming a transition and connexion between the successive parts. Gen., v, 1, e. g., refers back to Gen., ii, 7 sqq.; vi, 9 to v, 29 sqq. and vi, 5; x, 1 to i, 18, 19; etc. Finally, the sacred writer deals very briefly with the non-chosen families or tribes, and he always considers them before the chosen branch of the family. The treats of Cain before he speaks of Seth; similarly, Cham and Japhet precede Sem; the rise of Sem's posteriority precedes Abraham; Israel precedes Isaac; Esau precedes Jacob.

Bearing in mind these general outlines of the contents and the literary structure of Genesis, we shall easily understand the following analytical table.

Introduction, Gen., i, 1-11, 3, consists of the Hex-acumen; it teaches the power and goodness of God as manifested in the creation of the world, and also the dependence of creatures on the dominion of the Creator.

1. General History, ii, 4-xxi, 26.—Man did not acknowledge his dependence on God. Hence, leaving the disobedient to their own devices, God chose one special family or one individual as the depository of His Revelation.

(a) History of Heaven and Earth, ii, 4-iv, 26.—Here we have the story of the fall of our first parents, ii, 5-iii, 21: of the Expulsion of Cain, iv, 1-16; the posterity of Cain and its elimination, iv, 17-26.

(b) History of Adam, v, 1-vi, 8.—The writer enumerates the S chees, another line of Adam's descendants, v, 1-32, but shows that they too became so corrupt that only one among them found favour before God, vi, 1-8.

(c) History of Noe, vi, 9-ix, 29.—Neither the Deluge which destroyed the whole human race excepting Noe's family, vi, 11-viii, 19, nor God's covenant with Noe and his sons, viii, 20-ix, 17, brought about the amendment of the human family, and only one of Noe's sons was chosen as the bearer of the Divine blessings, ix, 18-29.

(d) History of the Sons of Noe, x, 1-xi, 9.—The posterity of the non-chosen sons, x, 1-32, brought a new punishment on the human race by its pride, xi, 1-9.

(e) History of Sem, xi, 10-26.—The posterity of Sem is enumerated down to Thare the father of Abraham, in whose seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed.

(2) Special History, xi, 27-1, 26.—Here the inspired writer describes the special Providence watching over Abraham and his offspring which developed in Egypt into a large nation. At the same time, he eliminates the sons of Abraham who were not children of God's promise. This teaches the Israelites that carnal descent of a man does not suffice to make him true son of Abraham.

(a) History of Thare, xi, 27-xv, 11.—This section tells of the call of Abraham, his transmigration into Chanaan, his covenant with God, and His promises.

(b) History of Israel, xxv, 12-18.—This section eliminates the tribes springing from Israel.

(c) History of Esau, xxxv, 1-xxxvii, 1.—Here we have the history of Isaac's sons, Esau and Jacob.

(d) History of Esau, xxxvi, 1-xxxvii, 1.—The sacred writer gives a list of Esau's posterity; it does not belong to the number of the Chosen People.

(c) History of Jacob, xxxvii, 2-1, 26.—This final portion of Genesis tells of the fate of Jacob's family down to the death of the Patriarch and of Joseph.

What has been said shows a uniform plan in the structure of Genesis, which some scholars prefer to call "schematism." (i) The whole book is divided into ten sections. (ii) Each section is introduced by the same formula. (iii) The sections are arranged according to a definite plan, the history of the different genealogies being presented in the corresponding part of the main line. (iv) Within the sections, the introductory formula or the title is usually followed by a brief repetition of some prominent feature of the preceding section, a fact duly noted and explained by as early a writer as Rhabanus Maurus a Commentario in Gen., ii, p. 18, L., xxii, 526, but misconstrued by our recent critics into an argument for a diversity of sources. (v) The history of each Patriarch tells of the development of his family during his lifetime, while the account of his life varies between a bare notice consisting of a few words or lines, and a more lengthy description. (vi) When the life of the Patriarch is given more in detail, the account usually ends in an almost uniform anticipation of the length of his life and his burial with his ancestors (cf. ix, 28; xi, 32; xxv, 7; xxxv, 22; xlvi, 23). Such a definite plan of the book shows that it was written with a definite end in view and according to preconceived arrangement. The critics attribute this to the final "redactor," i.e. of the book who adopted, according to their views, the genealogical framework and the "schematism" from the Priestly Code. The value of these views will be discussed later; for the present, it suffices to know that a striking unity prevails throughout the Book of Genesis (cf. Kurtz, "Die Einheit der Genesis", Berlin, 1846; Delattre, "Plan de la Genèse" in "Revue des Etudes juives", July, 1876; XX, pp. 5-17, Delattre, "Le plan de la Genèse et les générations du ciel et de la terre" in "La science catholique", 15 Oct., 1891, V, pp. 978-89; de Broglie, "Etude sur les généalogies bibliques" in "Le congrès scientif. internat. des catholiques de 1888", Paris, 1889, I, pp. 91-101; Julian, "Etude critique sur la composition de la Genèse" Paris, 1887, pp. 222-50).

B. Exodus.—After the death of Joseph, Israel had grown into a people, and its history deals no longer with mere genealogies, but with the people's national and religious development. The various laws are given and promulgated as occasion required them; hence they are intimately connected with the history of the people, and the Pentateuchal book in its present form is related and founded among the historical books of Scripture. Only the third book of the Pentateuch exhibits rather the features of a legal code. The Book of Exodus consists of a brief introduction and three main parts:

Introduction, i, 1-7.—A brief summary of the history of Jacob connects Genesis with Exodus, and serves to make the same time as transition from the former to the latter.

(1) First Part, i, 8-xiii, 16.—It treats of the events preceding and preparing the exit of Israel from Egypt.

(a) Ex, i, 8-x, 25: the Israelites are oppressed by the new Pharaoh "that knew not Joseph", but God prepares them a Liberator in Moses.

(b) Ex, i, 22-x, 17: Moses is called to free his people; his brother Aaron is given him as companion; their reception by the Israelites.

(c) v, 1-x, 20: Pharaoh refuses to listen to Moses and Aaron; God renews his promises; genealogies of Moses and Aaron; the heart of Pharaoh is not moved by the first nine plagues.

(d) x, 1-3, 20: The tenth plague consists in the death of the first-born; Pharaoh dismisses the people; law of the annual celebration of the pasch in memory of the liberation from Egypt.

(2) Second Part, xiii, 17-xviii, 27.—Journey of Israel to Mt. Sinai and miracles preparing the people for the Sinaitic Law.

(a) xiii, 17-xx, 21: The Israelites, led and protéted by a pillar of cloud and fire, cross the Red Sea, but the persecuting Egyptians perish in the waters.

(b) xv, 22-xvii, 16.—The route of Israel is passing through Sur, Mara, Elim, Sin, Raphidim. At Mara the bitter waters are made sweet; in the desert of Sin God sent quails and manna to the children of Israel; at Raphidim a great part of the Israelites are destroyed, and defeated Amalec through the prayers of Moses.

(c) xviii, 1-27.—Jethro visits his kinsmen, and at his suggestion Moses institutes the judges of the people.

(3) Third Part, xix, 1-xl, 38.—Conclusion of the Sinaitic covenant and its renewal. Here Exodus assumes more the character of a legal code.

(a) xix, 1-xx, 21.—The people journey to Sinai, prepare for the coming legislation, receive the decalogue, and ask to have the future laws promulgated through Moses.

(b) xx, 22-xxiv, 8.—Moses promulgates certain laws together with promises for their observance, and commits them to God and the people with a sacrifice. The portion xx, 1-xxxiii, 33, is also called the Book of the Covenant.
(c) xxiv, 9-xxxi, 18.—Moses alone remains with God on the mountain for forty days, and receives various instructions about the tabernacle and other points pertaining to Divine worship.

(d) xxxii, 1-xxxiv, 55.—The people adore the golden calf; at this sight, Moses breaks the divinely given tables of the law, punishes the idolaters, obtains pardon from God for the survivors, and, renewing the covenant, receives other tables of the law.

(e) xxxv, 1-xxi, 38.—The tabernacle with its aparellments is prepared, the priests are appointed, and the cloud of the Lord covers the tabernacle, thus showing that He had made the people His own.

C. Levities, called by Rabbinic writers "Law of the Priests" or "Law of the Sacrifices," contains nearly a complete collection of laws concerning the Levitical ministry. They are not codified in any logical order, but still we may discern certain groups of regulations touching the same subject. The Book of Exodus shows what God had done and was doing for His people; the Book of Leviticus prescribes what the people must do for God, and how they must render themselves worthy of His constant presence.

(1) First Part, i, 1-x, 20.—Duties of Israel towards God living in their midst.

(a) i, 1-vi, 7.—The different kinds of sacrifices are enumerated and the rites are described.

(b) vi, 8-vii, 36.—The duties and rights of the priests, the official officers of the sacrifices, are stated.

(c) viii, 1-xx, 20.—The first priests are consecrated and introduced into their office.

(2) Second Part, xi, 1-xxxvi, 34.—Legal cleanness demanded by the Divine presence.

(a) xi, 1-xvii, 37.—This section shows that people must be legally clean; the various ways in which cleanness must be kept; interior cleanness must be added to external cleanness.

(b) xxi, 1-xxii, 33.—Priests must excel in both internal and external cleanness; hence they have to keep special regulations.

(c) xxiii, 1-xxvii, 34.—The other laws, and the promises and threats made for the observance or the violation of the laws, belong to both priests and people.

D. Numbers, at times called "In the Desert" by certain Rabbinic writers because it covers practically the whole time of Israel's wanderings in the desert. The Israelites live in the desert, but interrupted by the Sinaitic legislation; Numbers takes up the account from the first month of the second year, and brings it down to the eleventh month of the fortieth year. But the period of 38 years is briefly treated, only its beginning and end being touched upon; for this span of time was occupied by the generation of Israelites that had been condemned by God.

(1) First Part, i, 1-xiv, 45.—Summary of the happenings before the rejection of the rebellious generation, especially during the first two months of the second year. The writer inverts the chronological order of these two months, in order not to interrupt the account of the wilderness wanderings, a description of the census, of the arrangement of the tribes, of the duties of the various families of the Levites, all of which occurrences or ordinances belong to the second month. Thus he first states what remained unchanged throughout the desert life of the people, and then returns to the account of the wanderings from the first month of the second year.

(a) i, 1-vi, 27.—The census is taken, the tribes are arranged in their proper order, the duties of the Levites are defined, the regulations concerning cleanness in the camp are promulgated.

(b) vii, 1-ix, 14.—Occurrences belonging to the first month: offerings of the princes at the dedication of the tabernacle, consecration of the Levites and duration of their ministry, celebration of the second pasch.

(e) ix, 15-xxv, 45.—Signals for breaking up the camp; the people leave Sinai on the twenty-second day of the second month, and journey towards Cades in the desert Pharan; they murmur against Moses on account of fatigue, want of flesh-meat, etc.; deceived by faithless spies, they refuse to enter into the Promised Land, and the whole living generation is rejected by God.

(2) Second Part, xv, 1-xiii, 22.—Events pertaining to the rejected generation.

(a) xv, 1-11.—Certain laws concerning sacrifices; Sabbath-breaking is punished with death; the law of fringes on the garments.

(b) xvi, 1-24.—The sibem of Core and his adherents: their punishment; the priesthood is confirmed to Aaron by the blooming rod which is kept for a remembrance in the tabernacle.

(c) xvi-xvii, 22.—The charges of the priests and Levites, and their portion; the law of the sacrifice of the red cow, and the water of expiation.

(3) Third Part, xx, 1-xxxvi, 13.—History of the journey from the first to the eleventh month of the fortieth year.

(a) xx, 1-xxi, 20.—Death of Mary, sister of Moses; God again gives the murmuring people water from the rock, but refuses Moses and Aaron entrance to the Promised Land on account of their doubt; Aaron dies while the people go to adore the Idumean mountains; the malcontents are punished with fiery serpents.

(b) xxii, 21-xxxvi, 18.—The land of the Amorrites is seized; the Moabitites vainly attempt to destroy Israel by the curse of Baalim; the Madianites lead the people into idolatry.

(c) xxvii, 1-xxxvii, 23.—A new census is taken with a view of dividing the land; the law of inheritance; Josue is appointed to succeed Moses.

(d) xxxviii, 1-xxxix, 17.—Certain laws concerning sacrifices, vows, and feasts are repeated and completed.

(e) xxxi, 1-xxxii, 40.—After the defeat of the Madianites, the country across Jordan is given to the tribes of Ruben and Gad, and to half of the tribe of Manasses.

(f) xxxiii, 1-19.—List of encampments of people of Israel during their wandering in the desert.

(g) xxxiv, 50-xxxvi, 13.—Command to destroy the Chanaanites; limits of the Promised Land and names of the men who are to divide it; Levitical cities, cities of refuge; laws concerning murder and manslaughter; ordinance concerning the marriage of heiressees.

E. Deuteronomy is a partial repetition and explanation of the foregoing legislation together with an urgent exhortation to be faithful to it. The main body of the book consists of three discourses delivered by Moses to the people in the eleventh month of the fortieth year; but the discourses are preceded by a short introduction, and they are followed by several appendices.

Introduction, i, 1-5.—Brief indication of the subject matter, the time, and the place of the following discourses.

(1) First Discourse, i, 6-iv, 40.—God's benefits are enumerated, and the people are exhorted to keep the law.

(a) i, 6-iii, 29.—The main occurrences during the time of the wandering in the desert are recalled as showing the goodness and justice of God.

(b) iv, 1-40.—Hence the covenant with God must be kept. By way of parenthesis, the sacred writer adds here (i) the appointment of three cities of refuge across the Jordan, iv, 41-43; (ii) an historical preamble, preparing us for the second discourse, iv, 44-49.

(2) Second Discourse, v, 1-xvii, 19.—This forms almost the bulk of Deuteronomy. It rehearsesthe whole economy of the covenant in two sections, the one general, the other particular.

(a) The General Repetition, v, 1-xi, 32.—Repetition of the dialogue, and reasons for the promulgation of the law through Moses: explanation of the first commandment, and prohibition of all intercourse with the gentiles; reminder of the Divine favours and punishments; promise of victory over the Canaanites; God's blessing on the observance of the Law, His curse on the transgressors.

(2) Anxiety, xii. 1-xxxvi, 19.—(i) Duties towards God: He is to be duly worshipped, never to be abandoned; distinction of clean and unclean meats; tithes and first-fruits; the three principal solemnities of the year. (ii) Duties towards God's representatives: towards the judges, the future kings, the priests, and Prophets. (iii) Duties towards the neighbour: to love one's neighbour as one's self; to judge justly; to act with mercy, kindness, patience, and truth; to love mercy, and to hate spite and malice.

(3) Third Discourse, xxvii. 1-xxx. 20.—A renewed exhortation to keep the law, based on diverse reasons.

(a) xxvii. 1-26.—Command to inscribe the law on stones after crossing the Jordan, and to promulgate the blessings and curses connected with the observance or non-observance of the law.

(b) xxviii. 1-65.—A more minute statement of the good or evil depending on the observance or violation of the law.

(c) xxix. 1-xxx. 20.—The goodness of God is ex-tollcd; all are urged to be faithful to God.

(d) xxx. 1-xxxii. 27.—Moses appoints Joshua as his successor, orders him to read the law to the people every seven years, and to place a copy of the same in the ark.

(e) xxxi. 28-xxxii. 47.—Moses calls an assembly of the Ancients and reites his canticle.

(f) xxxii. 18-52.—Moses views the Promised Land from a distance.

(g) xxxiii. 1-29.—He blesses the tribes of Israel.

(h) xxxiv. 1-12.—His death, burial, and special eulogium.

31. AUTHENTICITY.—The contents of the Pentateuch furnish the basis for the history, the law, the worship, and the life of the Chosen People of God, Hence the authorship of the work, the time and manner of its origin, and its historicity are of paramount importance. These are not merely literary problems, but questions belonging to the fields of history of religion and theology. The Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch is inseparably connected with the question of the origin of the Pentateuch. It supposes the author or intermediary of the Old Testament legislation, and the hearer of pre-Mosaic tradition. According to the trend of both Old and New Testament, and according to Jewish and Christian theology, the work of the great lawgiver Moses is the origin of the history of Israel and the basis of its development down to the time of Jesus Christ; but modern criticism sees in this only the result, or the precipitate, of a purely natural historical development. The question of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch leads us, therefore, to the alternative, revelation or historical evolution; it touches the historical and theological foundation of both the Jewish and the Christian dispensation. We shall consider the subject first in the light of Scripture; secondly, in the light of Jewish and Christian tradition; thirdly, in the light of internal evidence, furnished by the Pentateuch; finally, in the light of ecclesiastical decisions.

A. TESTIMONY OF SACRED SCRIPTURE.—It will be found convenient to divide the Biblical evidence for the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch into three parts:

(1) Testimony of the Pentateuch; (2) Testimony of the other Old Testament books; (3) Testimony of the New Testament.

(1) TESTIMONY OF THE PENTATEUCH.—The Pentateuch in its present form does not present itself as a complete literary production of Moses. It contains an account of Moses' death, it tells the story of his life in the third person and in an indirect form, and the last four books do not exhibit the literary form of memoirs of the great lawgiver; besides, the expression "God said to Moses" shows only the Divine origin of the Mosaic laws, but does not prove that Moses himself codified in the Pentateuch the various laws promulgated by him. On the other hand, the Pentateuch asserts to Moses the literary authorship at least of four sections, partly historical, partly legal, partly poetical.

(a) After Israel's victory over the Amalekites near Raphidim, the Lord said to Moses (Ex., xvii, 14): "Write this for a memorial in a book, and deliver it to the ears of Josue." This order is naturally referred to Moses as the lawgiver's successor, a benefit which God wished to keep alive in the memory of the people (Deut., xxv, 17-19). The present pointing of the Hebrew text reads "in the book", but the Septuagint version omits the definite article. Even if we suppose that the Massoretic pointing gives the original text, we can hardly prove that the book referred to is the Pentateuch, though this is highly probable (cf. von Hummelauer, "Exodus et Levitique", Paris, 1897, p. 152; Idem, "Deuteronomium", Paris, 1901, p. 152; Kley, "Die Pentateuchfrage", Münster, 1903, p. 217).

(b) Again, Ex., xxiv, 4: "And Moses wrote all the words of the Lord." The context does not allow us to understand these words in an absolute manner, but as referring to the words of the preceding or to the so-called "Book of the Covenant" (Ex., xx-xiii).

(c) Ex., xxxiv, 27: "And the Lord said to Moses: Write thee these words by which I have made a covenant both with thee and with Israel." The next verse adds: "and he wrote open these words the ten words of the covenant." Ex., xxxiv, 1, 4 shows how Moses had prepared the tables, and Ex., xxxiv, 10-26, gives us the contents of the ten words.

(d) Num., xxxiii, 1-2: "These are the mansions of the children of Israel, who went out of Egypt by their troops under the conduct of Moses and Aaron, which Moses wrote down according to the places of their encampings." Here we are informed that Moses wrote the list of the people's encampments in the desert; but where is this list to be found? Most probably it is given in Num., xxxii, 3-49, or the immediate context of the passage telling of Moses' literary activity; there are, however, scholars who understand this as referring to Moses' participation in the departure from Egypt written in the order of the people's encampments, so that it would be our present Book of Exodus. But this view is hardly probable; for its assumption that Num., xxxii, 3-49, is a summary of Exodus cannot be upheld, as the chapter of Numbers mentions several encampments not occurring in Exodus.

Besides these four passages there are certain indications in Deuteronomy which point to the literary activity of Moses. Deut., i, 5: "And Moses began to expand the law and to say": even if the "law" in this text refer to the whole of the Pentateuchal legislation, which is not very probable, it shows only that Moses promulgated the whole law, but not necessarily wrote it. Practically the entire Book of Deuteronomy claims to be a special legislation promulgated by Moses in the land of Moab: iv, 1-10; 44-9; v, 1 sqq.; xii, 1 sqq. But there is a suggestion of writing too: xvii, 18-9, enjoins that the future kings are to receive a copy of this law from the priests in a prison: xxvii, 1-8, commands that on the west side of the Jordan "all the words of this law" be written on stones set up in mount Haela: xxviii, 5 sq., speaks of "all the words of this law, that are written in this volume" after enumerating the blessings and curses which will come upon the observers and violators of the law respectively, and which are again referred to as written in a book in xxix, 20, 21, 27, and xxxii, 46, 47; now, the law repeatedly referred to as written in a book must be at least that which was promulgated in the Mosaic law, xxix, 9-13, states, “and Moses wrote this law,” and xxxi, 26, adds, “take this book, and put it in the side of the ark...that it may be there for a testimony against thee”; to explain these texts as fiction or as anachronisms is hardly compatible with the inerrancy of Sacred Scripture. Finally, xxxi, 19, commands Moses to write the whole law in a book. The Scriptural scholar will not complain that there are so few express indications in the Pentateuch of Moses’ literary activity; he will rather be surprised at their number. As far as explicit testimony for its own, at least partial, authorship is concerned, the Pentateuch compares rather favourably with many other books of the Old Testament.

(2) Witness of other Old Testament Books. (a) Josue.—The narrative of the Book of Josue presupposes not merely the facts and essential ordinances contained in the Pentateuch, but also the law given by Moses and written in the book of the law of Moses: Jos., 1, 7-8; vi, 31; xxxii, 3; Josue himself “wrote these things in the volume of the law of the Lord” (xxiv, 26). Prof. Hoberg maintains that this “volume of the law of the Lord” is the Pentateuch (“Über den Ursprung des Pentateuches” in “Biblische Zeitschrift”, 1906, IV, 310); Mangenot believes that it refers to the Deuteronomic code in the Bible, and that Josue was an actual witness of the Pentateuchal legislation and institutions. Thus Judges, xv, 8-10, recalls Israel’s delivery from Egypt and its conquest of the Promised Land; Judges, xi, 12-28, states incidents recorded in Num., xx, 14; xxxi, 24; Judges, xiii, 4, states a practice found on the law of the Nazarites in Num., vi, 1-21; Judges, xviii, 31, speaks of the tabernacle existing in the times when there was no king in Israel; Judges, xx, 26-8, mentions the ark of the covenant, the various kinds of sacrifices, and the Aaronic priesthood. The Pentateuchal history and laws are similarly presupposed in 1 Kings, x, 18; xx, 1-10; x, 25; xxvi, 1-6; xxxi, 5. However, 1 Kings, xxvii, 30, states that Josue hesitated to write the law, for a reason put forward by the writer himself: “the law in the book of Moses is written; and I was not able to write it” (xxvii, 8). Josue’s hesitation is compatible with the Pentateuchal writings, and he might have written it had he been able to. Thus it seems possible that Josue’s hesitation is due to the inappropriateness of the subject matter to his position as a leader of the people.

(b) Judges, 1, 2 Kings.—In the Book of Judges and the first two Books of Kings there is no explicit reference to Moses and the book of the law, but a number of incidents and statements presuppose the existence of the Pentateuchal legislation and institutions. Thus Judges, xv, 8-10, recalls Israel’s delivery from Egypt and its conquest of the Promised Land; Judges, xi, 12-28, states incidents recorded in Num., xx, 14; xxxi, 24; Judges, xiii, 4, states a practice found on the law of the Nazarites in Num., vi, 1-21; Judges, xviii, 31, speaks of the tabernacle existing in the times when there was no king in Israel; Judges, xx, 26-8, mentions the ark of the covenant, the various kinds of sacrifices, and the Aaronic priesthood. The Pentateuchal history and laws are similarly presupposed in 1 Kings, x, 18; xx, 1-10; x, 25; xxvi, 1-6; xxxi, 5. However, 1 Kings, xxvii, 30, states that Josue hesitated to write the law, for a reason put forward by the writer himself: “the law in the book of Moses is written; and I was not able to write it” (xxvii, 8). Josue’s hesitation is compatible with the Pentateuchal writings, and he might have written it had he been able to. Thus it seems possible that Josue’s hesitation is due to the inappropriateness of the subject matter to his position as a leader of the people.

(c) 1, 2 Esdras.—The Books of Esdras and Nehemiah, too, take their natural and commonly accepted sense, consider, the Pentateuch as the book of Moses, not merely as a book containing the law of Moses. This conception is based on the study of the following texts: 1 Esd., ii, 2 sqq.; vi, 18; vii, 11; 2 Esd., i, 7 sqq.; vii, 1, 8, 14; ix, 3; x, 34, 30; xiii, 1-4. Graf and his followers expressed the view that the book of Moses referred to in these texts is not the Pentateuch, but only the Priestly Code; but when we keep in mind that the book in question contained the laws of Lev., xxiii, and Deut., vii, 2-4; xv, 2, we perceive at once that the book of Moses cannot be restricted to the Priestly Code. To the witness of the historical books adds the definite statement of Neh., ii, 4; vii, 6; Judith, vii, 23; Eclesius, xxviii, 33; xv, 1-6; xlv, 18; and especially the Preface of Eclesius.

(f) Prophetic Books.—Express reference to the written law of Moses is found only in the later Prophets: Bar., ii, 2, 28; Dan., ix, 11, 13; Mal., iv, 4. Among these, Baruch knows that Moses has been commanded to write the law, and though his expressions run parallel to those of Deut., xviii, 15, 53, 62-4, his threats contain allusions to those contained in other parts of the Pentateuch. The other Prophets frequently refer to the law of the Lord guarded by the priests (cf. Deut., xxxi, 9), and they put it on the same level with Divine revelation itself and with the faith of the Lord. They appeal to God’s covenant, the sacrificial laws, the calendar of feasts, and other laws of the Pentateuch in such a way as to render it probable that a written legislation formed the basis of their prophetic admonitions (cf. Osee, viii, 12), and that they were acquainted with verbal expressions of the book of the law. Thus in the Prophecy of Isaiah (cf. xxv, 12, and that they were acquainted with verbal expressions of the book of the law. Thus in the Prophecy of Isaiah (cf. xxv, 12, 14; v, 22 sqq.) and Isaías in the south (i, 11 sqq.) employ expressions which are practically technical words for sacrifice occurring in Lev., i, ii; vii, 12, 16; and Deut., vii, 23.

(3) Witness of the New Testament.—We need not show that Jesus and the Apostle quoted the whole of the Pentateuch as written by Moses. If they attributed to Moses all the passages which they happen to cite, if they ascribe the Pentateuch to Moses whenever there is question of its authorship, even the most evidencing criteria must admit that they express their conviction that the work was indeed written by Moses. When the Sadducees quote against Jesus the marriage law of Deut., xxv, 5, as written by Moses (Matt., xxi, 21; Mark, xii, 19; Luke, xx, 28), Jesus does not deny the Mosaic authorship, but appeals to Ex., iii, 6, as equally written by Moses (Mark, xiii, 28; Matt., xxii, 37). Again, in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke, xvi, 29), He speaks of "Moses and the prophets", while on other occasions He speaks of "the law and the prophets" (Luke, xvi, 16), thus showing that in His mind the law, or the Pentateuch, and Moses are identical. The same expression occurs in the last discourse addressed by Christ to His disciples (Luke, xxiv, 44-6; cf. 27): "which are written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms concerning me". Finally, in John, v, 15-7, Jesus is more explicit in asserting the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch: "There is one thatareth you, Moses... for he wrote of me. But if you do not believe his writings, how will you believe my words?" Nor can it he maintained that Christ merely accommodated himself to the current beliefs of his contemporaries who considered Moses as the author of the Pentateuch not merely in a moral but also in the literary sense of authorship. Jesus did not need to enter into the critical study of the history of Moses and the Mosaic writings, but the authorship of the Pentateuch is expressly endorsed the popular belief, if it was erroneous.

The Apostles too felt convinced of, and testified to, the Mosaic authorship. "Philip findeth Nathanael... and saith unto him: We have found him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, do write," says St. Peter in introducing a quotation from Deut., vii, 9, in the words: "For Moses said" (Acts, iii, 22). St. James and St. Paul relate that Moses is read in the synagogues on the Sabbath (Acts, xv, 21; II Cor., iii, 15). The great Apostle speaks in other passages of the law of Moses (Acts, xiii, 36; I Cor., ix, 9), he preaches Jesus according to the law of Moses and the Prophets (Acts, xxviii, 29), and cites passages from the Pentateuch as words written by Moses (Rom., v, 8-19). St. John mentions the canticle of Moses (Apoc., xv, 3).

B. Witness of Tradition.—The voice of tradition, both Jewish and Christian, is so unanimous and constant in proclaiming the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch that down to the seventeenth century it did not admit of any exception. The following paragraphs are only a meagre outline of this living tradition.

(1) Jewish Tradition.—It has been seen that the books of the Old Testament, beginning with those of the Pentateuch, present Moses as the author of at least parts of the Pentateuch. The writer of the Books of Kings believes that Moses is the author of Deuteronomy at least. Esdras, Nehemiah, Malachi, the author of Paralipomena, and the Greek authors of the Septuagint Version consider Moses as the author of the whole Pentateuch. At the time of Jesus Christ and the Apostles friend and foe take the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch for granted; neither our Lord nor His enemies take exception to this assumption. In the first century of the Christian era, Josephus ascribes to Moses the authorship of the entire Pentateuch, not excepting the account of the lawgiver's death ("Antiq. Jud.", IV, viii, 3-48; cf. I Pronym., 1; Contra Apion., I, 8). The Alexandrian philosopher Philo is convinced that the entire Pentateuch is the work of Moses, and that he wrote a prophetic account of his death under the influence of a special Divine inspiration ("De vita Moses", II, III, III in "Opera", Geneva, 1613, pp. 501, 558). The Babylonian Talmud ("Baba-Batra", II, col. 140; "Makkoth", fol. 30a; cf. Vagné, "Histoire de la Bible et de l'Explication biblique jusqu'à nos jours", Paris, 1831, I, 214), the Talmud of Jerusalem (Sota, v, 5), the rabbis, and the doctors of Israel (cf. Fürst, "Der Kanon des Alten Testamentes nach den Überlieferungen im Talmud und Mihrasch", Leipzig, 1868, pp. 7-9) bear testimony to the continuance of this tradition for the first thousand years. Though Isaac ben Judah in the eleventh century and Meïr ben Or底盘on in the twelfth, advanced the view that post-Mosaic additions in the Pentateuch, still they as well as Maimonides upheld its Mosaic authorship, and did not substantially differ in this point from the teaching of R. Bechai (thirteenth cent.), Joseph Karo, and Abababa (fifteenth cent.; cf. Richard Simon, "Critique de la Bible des auteurs, ecclésiastiques de E. Dupin", Paris, 1721-31, addition of 1775). In the sixteenth century, Baruch Spinoza rejected the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, pointing out the possibility that the work might have been written by Esdras ("Tract. theologico-politicus", c. viii, ed. Tauchnitz, III, p. 125). Among the more recent Jewish writers several have adopted the results of the critics, thus abandoning the tradition of their forefathers.

(2) Christian Tradition.—The Jewish tradition concerning the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch was brought into the Christian Church by Christ Himself and the Apostles. No one will seriously deny the existence and continuance of such a tradition from the patristic period onward; one might indeed be forced to admit that the tradition of the Apostles and the beginning of the third century. For this period we may appeal to the "Épître de Barnabas" (x, 1-12; Funk, "Paters apostol.", 2nd ed., Tübingen, 1901, I, pp. 66-70; xii, 2-9; ibid., pp. 71-8), to St. Clement of Rome (I Cor., xii, 1; ibid., p. 152), St. Justin ("Apol. I", 39; P. G., VI, 416; I, 52, cf. II, 4, 8; 53, 365; cf. II, 4, 355; cf. I, 10, 3; II, 3; Acts, iv, 15; cf. Deut., xi, 20, 25), and to a "author of "Cohort. ad Grae." (9, 28, 30, 33, 34; ibid., 257, 293, 296-7, 361), to St. Theophilus ("Ad Autol.", III, 23; ibid., 1156; 11, 30; ibid., 1100), to St. Irenaeus (Cont. her., i, i, 6; P. G., VII, 154-6; to St. Hippolytus of Rome ("Comment. in Deut.", xxxi, 9, 31, 57; cf. Achelis, "Arabisches Fragment" etc., Leip- zig, 1897, I, 118; "Philosophena", VIII, 3; X, 23; P. G., XVI, 3350, 3418), to Tertullian of Carthage (Adv. Hermog., XIX, P. L., 214), to Origen of Alexandria (Contra Cels., III, 5-6; P. G., XII, 926; etc.), to St. Eustathius of Antioch (De engrastrmythia e. Orig., 21; P. G., XVIII, 638); for all these writers, and others might be added, bear witness to the continuance of the tradition concerning Moses, the author of the Pentateuch. A list of the later Fathers who bear witness to the same truth may be found in Mangenot's article in the "Dict. de la Bible" (V, 74 seq.). Hoberg (Moses und der Pentateuch, 72 seq.) has collected the testimony for the existence of the tradition during the Middle Ages and in more recent times.

But Catholic tradition necessarily maintains that Moses wrote every letter of the Pentateuch as it is to-day, and that the work has come down to us in an absolutely unchanged form. This rigid view of the Mosaic authorship began to develop in the eighteenth century, and practically gained the upper hand in the nineteenth. The arbitrary treatment of Scripture on the part of Protestants, and the succession of the various destructive systems advanced by Biblical criticism, caused this change of front in the Catholic camp. In the sixteenth century Card. Bellarmine, who may be considered as a reliable exponent of Catholic tradition, expressed the opinion that Esdras had collected, re-edited, and corrected the scattered fragments of Moses, and that the Mosaic authorship was necessary for the completion of the Pentateuchal history (De verbo Dei, II, i; cf. III, iv). The views of Genebrard, Pereira, Bonifaci, a Lapide, Masius, Janse, and of other notable Biblicalists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are equally elastic with regard to the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. Not that they agree with the contentions of our modern Biblical critics; but they show that to-day's Pentateuchal problems were not wholly unknown to Catholic scholars, and that the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, though contested by the Biblical Commission is no concession forced on the Church by unbelieving Bible students.

C. Voice of Internal Evidence.—The possibility of producing a written record at the time of Moses is no longer contested. The art of writing was known long before the time of the great lawgiver, and was extensively practised both in Egypt and Babylon. As to the Israelites, Flinders Petrie infers from certain Semitic inscriptions found in 1905 on the Sinaitic peninsula, that they kept written accounts of their national history from the time of their captivity under Rameses II. The Tell-el-Amarna tablets show that the language of Babylon was in a way the official language at the time of Moses, known in Western Asia, Palestine, and Egypt; the finds of Taanek have confirmed this fact. But it cannot be inferred from this that the Egyptians and Israelites employed this sacred or official language among themselves and in their religious documents (cf. Benzinger, "Hebräische Archäologie", 2nd ed. Stuttgart, 1915, pp. 72 sq.). It must be remembered that the possibility of writing at the time of Moses and the question of language that confronts us here; there is the further problem of the kind of written signs used in the Mosaic documents. The hieroglyphic and cuneiform signs were widely employed at that early date; the oldest inscriptions written in alphabetical characters date only from the ninth century B.C. But there can hardly be any doubt as to the higher antiquity of alphabetic writing, and there seems to be nothing to prevent our extending it back to the time of Moses. Finally, the Code of Hamurabi, discovered in Susa in 1901 by the French expedition funded by Mr. and Mrs. Dieulafoy, shows that even in pre-Mosaic times the laws were committed to, and preserved in, writing; for the Code antedates Moses some five centuries, and contains about 282 regulations concerning various contingencies in the civic life.

Thus far it has been shown negatively that an historical and legal document claiming to be written at the time of Moses is not in itself of any assistance to the question of its authenticity. But the internal characteristics of the Pentateuch show also positively that the work is at least probably Mosaic. It is true that the Pentateuch contains no express declaration of its entire Mosaic authorship; but even the most exacting of critics will hardly require a direct testimony from Moses himself. The indications in other books, whether sacred or profane. On the other hand, it has already been shown that four distinct passages of the Pentateuch are expressly ascribed to the authorship of Moses. Deut., xxxi, 24-9, is especially to be noted; for it knows that Moses wrote the "words of this law in a volume" and commanded it to be placed in the ark of the covenant as a testimony against the people who have been so rebellious during the lawgiver's life and will "do wickedly" after his death. Again, a number of legal sections, though not explicitly ascribed to the writing of Moses, are distinctly derived from Moses as the lawgiver. Besides, many of the Pentateuchal laws bear evidence of their origin in the desert; I need they too lay an indirect claim to Mosaic origin. What has been said of a number of Pentateuchal laws is equally true of several historical sections. These contain in the Book of Numbers, for instance, so many names and numbers that they must have been handed down in writing. Unless the critics can bring irrefutable evidence to show that these sections were only fiction, they must grant that these historical details were written down in contemporary documents, and not transmitted by mere oral tradition. Moreover, Hommel (Die altisraelitische Überlieferung in inschriftlicher Beleuchtung, p. 302) has shown that the names in the lists of the Book of Numbers bear the character of the Arabian names of the second millennium before Christ, and can have originated only in the time of Moses, though they must be admitted that the text of certain portions, e.g., Num., xiii, has suffered in its transmission. We need not remind the reader that numerous Pentateuchal laws and data imply the conditions of a nomadic life of Israel. Finally, both the author of the Pentateuch and its first readers must have been more familiar with the topography and the social condition of Egypt and with the Sinaitic peninsula than with the land of Canaan. Cf., e.g., Deut., viii, 7-10; xi, 9 sqq.

D. Ecclesiastical Decisions.—In accordance with the voice of the triple argument thus far advanced for the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, the Biblical Commission on 27 June, 1906, answered a series of questions concerning this subject in the following way:

(1) The arguments accumulated by the critics to impugn the Mosaic authenticity of the sacred books designated by the name Pentateuch are not of such weight as to give us the right, after setting aside numerous passages of both Testaments taken collectively, the continuous consensus of the Jewish people, the constant tradition of the Church, and internal indications from the text itself, to maintain that these books have not Moses as their author, but are compiled from sources for the greatest part later than the Mosaic age.

(2) The Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch does not necessarily require such a reduction of the whole work as to render it absolutely impertinent to maintain that Moses was either the author or the compiler of the content of the Pentateuch. The hypothesis that Moses wrote the entire Pentateuch in one grand act of inspiration, or that he wrote the entire Pentateuch, and then read it over to his secretaries; the hypothesis of those who can be admitted who believe that he entrusted the composition of the work itself, conceived by him under the influence of Divine inspiration, to others, but in such a way that they were to express faithfully and consistently the thoughts, the words, and the spirit, which he, as he would, were to omit nothing; and that finally the work thus produced should be approved by the same Moses, his principal and inspired author, and published under his name.

(3) It may be granted without prejudice to the Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch, that Moses employed sources in the production of his work, i.e., written documents or oral traditions, from which he may have drawn a number of things in accordance with the end he had in view and under the influence of Divine inspiration, and inserted them in his work either literally or according to their sense, in an abbreviated or amplified form.

(4) The substantial Mosaic authenticity and integrity of the Pentateuch remains intact if it be granted that in the long course of centuries the work has suffered several modifications, as: post-Mosaic additions either appended by an inspired author or inserted into the text as glosses and explanations; the translation of certain words or expressions out of an antiquated language into the recent form of speech; finally, wrong readings due to the fault of transcribers, which one may investigate and pass sentence on according to the laws of criticism.
The post-Mosaic additions and modifications allowed by the Biblical Commission in the Pentateuch without removing it from the range of substantial integrity and Mosaic authenticity are variously interpreted by Catholic scholars. (1) We should first of all understand them in a rather wide sense, if we were to defend the views of von Hлnnhauer or Vetter. This latter writer admits legal and historical documents based on Mosaic tradition, but written only in the times of the Judges; he places the first reduction of the Pentateuch in the time of the erection of Solomon’s temple, and the next restatement in the time of Esdras. Vetter died in 1906, the year in which the Biblical Commission issued the above Decree; it is an interesting question, whether and how the scholares would have modified his theory, if time had been granted him to do so. (2) A less liberal interpretation of the Decree is implied in the Pentateuchal hypothesis advanced by Hobeh (“Moses und der Pentateuch; Die Pentateuch Frage” in “Biblishe Studien”, X., 1, Freiburg, 1907, “Erkliirung der Genesis”, 1908, Freiburg, 1-1). Schefzer (Geschichte des Alten Testamentes, 4th ed., 226 sqq.); Höpfl (Die hohere Bibelkritik, 2nd ed., Faderborn, 1906); Brucker (“Einleitung”, Paris, 1907, 103 sqq.), and Selbst (Schunset and Holzmann’s “Handbuch zur Biblischen Geschichte”, 7th ed., Freiburg, 1910, 11, 94, 96). The last-named writer believes that Moses left a written law-book to which Josue and Samuel added supplementary sections and regulations, while David and Solomon supplied new statutes concerning the worship of the temple. Certain religious reforms, until Esdras promulgated the whole law and made it the basis of Israel’s restoration after the Exile. Our present Pentateuch is, therefore, an Esdrine edition of the work. Dr. Selbst feels convinced that his admission of both textual changes and material additions in the Pentateuch agrees with the results of recent historical research, and with the results of literary criticism. Historical development adapts laws and regulations to the religious, civil, and social conditions of successive ages, while literary criticism discovers in our actual Pentateuch peculiarities of words and phrases which can hardly have been original, and also historical additions or notices, legal modifications, and signs of more recent administration of justice and of later forms of worship. But Dr. Selbst believes that these peculiarities do not offer a sufficient basis for a distinction of different sources in the Pentateuch. (3) A strict interpretation of the words of the Decree is implied in the views of Kohn (Einleitung, n. 190 sqq.), Kley ("Pentateuchal Geschichte und die Geschichte der Synagoge", Munster, 1903); Flunk (Kirchenlexicon, IX, 1782 sqq.), and Mangenot ("L’authenticite mosaique du Pentateuque", Paris, 1907; Idem, "Dict. de la Biblie", V, 101-119). With the exception of those portions that belong to the time after the death of Moses, and of certain accidental changes of the text due to transcribers, the whole of the Pentateuch is the work of Moses who composed the work in one of the ways suggested by the Biblical Commission.

Finally, there is the question as to the theological certainty of the thesis maintaining the Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch. (1) Certain Catholic scholars who wrote between 1887 and 1906 expressed their opinion that the thesis in question is not revealed in Scripture nor taught by the Church; that it expresses a truth not contained in Revelation, but a tenet which may be freely contested and discussed. At that time, ecclesiastical authority had issued no pronouncement on the question. (2) Other writers granting the possibility of post-Mosaic modifications in the Pentateuch, held that it is not explicitly revealed, but they consider it as a truth revealed formally implicitly, being derived from the revealed formulae not by a syllogism in the strict sense of the word, but by a simple explanation of the terms. The denial of the Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch is an error, and the contradictory of the thesis maintaining the Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch is considered erroneous in fide (cf. Mohlen, "L’origine mosaique du Pentateuque", p. 34). (3) A third class of scholars considers the Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch neither as a freely debatable tenet, nor as a truth formally implicitly revealed; they believe it has been virtually revealed, or that it is inferred from revealed truth by truly syllogistic deduction. It is, therefore, a theologicaI certainty, and its truth is self-evident, or even erroneous proposition (cf. Brucker, “Authenticity des livres de Moise” in “Etudes”, March, 1888, p. 327; ibid., January, 1897, p. 122-3; Mangenot, “L’authenticite mosaique du Pentateuque”, pp. 267-310).

E. Opponents of the Mosaic Authorship of the Pentateuch.—A detailed account of the opposition to the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch is neither desirable nor necessary in this article. In itself it would form only a noiseless history of human errors; each little system has had its day, and its successors have tried their best to bury it in hushed oblivion. The actual difficulties we have to consider are those advanced by our actual opponents of to-day; only the fact that the systems of the past show us the fleeting and transitory character of the actual theories now in vogue can induce us to briefly enumerate the successive views upheld by the opponents of the Mosaic authorship.

1. Abandoned Theories.—The views advanced by the Biblical or Philological and Theological schools of the Nazarenians Abensura, Carlstadt, Isaac Peyrusse, Baruch Spinoza, Jean Leclerc are sporadic phenomena. Not all of them were wholly incompatible with the Mosaic authorship as now understood, and the others have found their answer in their own time.—With the work of John Astruc, published in 1755, began the so-called Hypothesis of Documents which was further developed by Eichhorn and Igen. But the works of the suspended priest, Alexander Geddes, published in 1792 and 1800, introduced the Hypothesis of Fragments, which in its day was elaborated and championed by Vater, de Wette (temporarily at least), Berthold, Hartmann, and von Bohlen. This theory was an adherent of a similar controversy in the Hypothesis of Complements or Interpolations which numbered among its patrons Kell, Ewald, Stähelin, Bleck, Tuch, de Wette, von Lengerke, and for a brief period also Franz Delitzsch. The theory of interpolations again had hardly found any adherents before Gramberg (1828), Stähelin (1830), and Bleck (1831) returned to the Hypothesis of Documents, proposing it in a somewhat modified form. Subsequently, Ewald, Knobel, Hupfeld, Noldeke, and Schrader advanced each a different explanation of the documentary hypothesis. But all of these are at present only of an historical interest.

2. The Hypothesis of Documents.—A course of religious development in Israel had been proposed by Reuss in 1830 and 1831, by Vatke in 1835, and by George in the same year. In 1863-66 Graf took up this idea and applied it to the literary criticism of the Hexateuch; for the critics had begun to consider the Book of Josue as belonging to the preceding five books, so that the collection formed a Hexateuch instead of a Pentateuch. The same application was made by Merx in 1869. Thus modified the documentary theory continued in its development until it reached the state described in the translation of the Bible by Kaufzach (3rd ed., with Introduction and Annotations, Tubingen, 1895 sqq.). In itself there is nothing against the assumption of documents by Moses; but we cannot ascribe with certainty anything of our literary remains to the hands of the Hebrew lawyer. The beginning of written accounts must be placed towards the end of the time of Judges; only then were fulfilled the conditions which must precede the origin of a literature properly so called, i.e., a general acquaintance with the art of writing and reading, stationary settlement of the people, and national prosperity. What then are the oldest literary remains of the Hebrews? They are the collections of the songs dating from the heroic time of the nation, e.g., the Book of the Wars of the Lord (Num., xxi, 14), the Book of the Just (Jos., x, 12 sqq.), the Book of Songs (III Kings, viii, 53; cf. Budde, "Geschichte der althebr. Literatur", Leipzig, 1906, 17). The Book of the Covenant (Ex. xxiv, 3-18) too must have existed before the other sources of the Pentateuch. The oldest historical work is probably the book of the Yahwist, designated by J., and ascribed to the priesthood of Judah, belonging most probably to the ninth century B.C.

Akin to this is the Elohim document, designated by E., and written probably in the northern kingdom (Ephraim) about a century after the production of the Yahweh document. These two sources were combined by a redactor into one work soon after the middle of the sixth century. Next follows the lawbook almost entirely embodied in our actual Book of Deuteronomy, discovered in the temple 621 B.C., and containing the precipitate of the prophetic teaching which advocated the abolition of the sacrifices in the so-called high places and the centralization of worship in the temple of Jerusalem. During the Exile originated the Priestly Code, P, based on the so-called law of holiness, Lev., xvii-xlvi, and the programme of Deuteronomy, xxv, part of the post-exilic community of Esdras about 444 B.C. (II Esd., viii-x), and was accepted by the multitude. History does not tell us when and how these divers historical and legal sources were combined into our present Pentateuch; but it is generally assumed that there was an urgent call for a compilation of the tradition and pre-exilic history of the people. The only indication of time may be found in the fact that the Samaritans accepted the Pentateuch as a sacred book probably in the fourth century B.C. Considering their hatred for the Jews, one must conclude that they would not have taken this step, unless they had felt certain of the Mosaic origin of the Pentateuch. Deuteronomy was considered time and again as the compendium of the Pentateuch and its acceptance by the Samaritans, so that the work of combining must be placed in the fifth century. It is quite generally agreed that the last redactor of the Pentateuch completed his task with great adroitness. Without altering the text of the older sources, he did within man's power to fuse the heterogeneous elements into one apparent (?) whole, with such success that not only the Jews after the fourth century B.C., but also the Christians for many centuries could maintain their conviction that the entire Pentateuch was written by Moses.

3. Deficiencies of the Critical Hypothesis.—As several Pentateuchal critics have endeavoured to assign the last redaction of the Pentateuch to more recent dates, its placement in the fifth century may be regarded as rather favourable to conservative views. But it is hard to understand why the patrons of this opinion should not agree in considering Esdras as the last editor. Again, it is quite certain that the last edition of the Pentateuch must have notably preceded its acceptance on the part of the Samaritans as a sacred book; but is it probable that the Samaritans would have accepted the Pentateuch as such in the fourth century B.C., when the national and religious opposition between them and Jews was well developed? Is it not more probable that the mixed nation of Samaria received the Pentateuch through the priest sent to them from Assyria? Cf. IV Kings, xvii, 27. Or again, as this priest instructed the Samaritan population in the law of the god of the country, is it not unreasonable to suppose that he taught them the Pentateuchal law which the ten tribes brought with them when they separated from Judah? At any rate, the fact that the Samaritans accepted as sacred only the Pentateuch, but not the Prophets, leads us to infer that the Pentateuch existed among the Jews before a collection of the prophetic writings was made, and that Samaria chose its sacred book before even Judah.
placed the works of the Prophets on the same level with the work of Moses. But this natural inference finds no favour among the critics; for it implies that the historical and legal traditions codified in the Pentateuch, described the beginning, and not the end, of Israel's religious development. The view of Israel's religious development prevalent among the critics implies that the Pentateuch is later than the Prophets, and that the Dvths are later than both. After these general considerations, we shall briefly examine the main principles, the methods, the results, and the arguments of the critical theory.

(a) Principles of the Critics.—Without pretending to review all the principles involved in the theories of the critics, we draw attention to two: the historical development of Israel, and, a comparative view of internal evidence and tradition.

The idea of development is not a purely modern discovery. Meyer ("Der Entwicklungsgedanke bei Aristoteles", Bonn, 1890) shows that Aristotle was already well aware of it. Kuhnke ("Religion", Munich, 1903, 68) maintains that its application to religion is as old as Christianity, and that St. Paul has enunciated this principle; Diezlet ("Geschichte des A. T. in der christlichen Kirche", Jena, 1889, 55 sqq.) and Willmann ("Geschichte des Idealismus", 2nd ed., II, 23 sqq.) and Schanz ("Apologie des Christentums", 4th ed., II, 17 sqq.), all take up the development in the writings of the Fathers, though Hoberg ("Die Forschungen der Bibl. Wissenschaften", Freiburg, 1902, 10) grants that the patristic writers often neglect the external forms which influenced the ideas of the Chosen People. The Fathers were not fully acquainted with profane history, and were more concerned about the contents of Revelation than about its historical development. Pesch ("Glaube, Dogmen und geschichtliche Thatsachen" in "Theol. Zeitschriften", IV, Freiburg, 1908, 183) discovers that St. Thomas, too, admits the principle of development in his "Summa" (II-11, Q. i, a. 9, 10; Q. ii, a. 3; cf. "Theol. Contra Gentiles") the religious conception of this principle avoids two extremes: (a) the theological degeneration based on the teaching of the early Lutheran theologians (cf. Gesbreter, "Die Degradationshypothese und die alt. Geschichte", Leipzig, 1905; Steude, "Entwicklung und Offenbarung", Stuttgart, 1903, 18 sqq.); (b) the theory of evolution which dissolves all truth and history into purely natural development to the exclusion of everything supernatural.

It is this latter extreme that is advocated by the Biblical critics. Their description of the early religion of Israel is contradicted by the testimony of the oldest Prophets whose authority is not questioned by them. These inspired seers know of the fall of Adam (Osee, vi. 7), the fall of Pharaoh (Ex. xvi. 11), the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Osee, x. 6, 9; Amos, iv, 11), the history of Jacob and his struggle with the angel (Os. xi. 2 sqq.), Israel's exodus from Egypt and dwelling in the desert (Os. xi. 2 sqq., vi, xiii, 14, xiv, 3; xii, 13, 5; Am., ii, 10; iii, 1; iv, 7), the activity of Moses (Os. xii, 13, xi, 17), Joshua (Os. xvi. 11, 12), and a number of particular statutes (cf. Kley, "Die Pentateuchfrage", Münster, 1903, 223 sqq.) Again, the theory of development is more and more contradicted by the results of historical investigation. Weber ("Theologie und Assyriologie im Streit um Bibel und Bibel", Leipzig, 1904, 17) points out that the recent historical results imply decadence rather than development in ancient oriental art, science, and religion; Winckler ("Religionsgeschichtl. und geschichtl. Orient", Leipzig, 1906, 33) considers the evolutionary view of the primitive state of man as false, and believes that the development theory has, at least, been badly shaken, if not actually destroyed by recent Oriental research (cf. Batsch, "Altorient.-Religion und israelit. Religion", 1906). Köberle ("Die Theologie der Gegenwart", Leipzig, 1907, 1, 2) says that the development theory has exhausted itself, reproducing only the thoughts of Wellhausen, and deciding particular questions not in the light of facts, but according to the postulates of the theory. Finally, even rationalistic writers have doubted the necessity of propounding the development theory by another more in agreement with historical facts. Hence Winckler ("Ex Oriente lux", Leipzig, 1905-6; Idem, "Der Alte Orient", III, 2-3; Idem, "Die babylonische Geisteskultur in ihren Beziehungen zur Kulturtwicklung der Menschheit" in "Wissenschaft und Bildung", Leipzig, 1907; cf. Landsdorfer in "Historisch-Politische Blätter", 1909, 141) has originated the theory of pan-Babylonism according to which Biblical religion is conceived as a conscious and express reaction against the Babylonian polytheistic state religion. It was not the common property of Israel, but of a religious sect which was supported in Babylon by certain monotheistic circles irrespective of the Babylonian literature (T. Mass.). These movements in Badde, Stade, Bezdol, Köberle, Kügler, Wilke, and others; but it has also a number of adherents. Though wholly untenable from a Christian point of view, it shows at least the weakness of the historical development theory.

(b) Another principle involved in the critical theory of the Pentateuch is the claim that the internal evidence of literary criticism is of higher value than the evidence of tradition. But thus far the results of excavations and historical research have been favourable to tradition rather than to internal evidence. Let the reader only remember the case of Troy, Tyrls, Myene, and Orelhomenos (in Greece); the excavations of the English explorer Evans in Crete have shown the historical character of King Minos and his labyrinth; Assyrian inscriptions have re-established the historical credit of King Midas of Phrygia; similarly, Menes of Thebes and Sargon of Agade have been shown to belong to history; in general, the more accurate have been the scientific investigations, the greater has been the reliability of even the most slender traditions. In the field of New-Testament criticism the call "back to tradition" has begun to be heeded, and has been endorsed by such authorities as Harnack and Deissmann. In the study of the Old Testament too there are unmistakable signs of a coming change. Hommel ("Die altisraelitische Theologie in inschichtlicher Beleuchtung", Münster, 1897) maintains that Old-Testament tradition, both as a whole and in its details, proves to be reliable, even in the light of critical research. Meyer ("Die Entstehung des Judentums", Halle, 1896) comes to the conclusion that the foundations of the critical Pentateuchal theory are destroyed, if it can be proved that even part of the impugned Hebrew tradition is reliable; the same writer proves the credibility of the sources of the Books of Esdras (cf. "Grundriss der Geographie und Geschichte des alten Orientes", Munich, 1904, 157 sqq.). S. A. Frey has been led by his critical studies, and without being influenced by the properties of the literature, to raise once more the question of the history of Israel. Cornill and Ottieri express the conviction that Israel's traditions concerning even its earliest history are reliable and will withstand the bitterest attacks of criticism; Dawson (cf. Fonck, "Kritik und Tradition im A. T." in "Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie", 1899, 262-81) and others apply to tradition the old principle which has been so frequently misapplied, "magna est veritas, et praebet eam in eadem usu." Criticism became more common in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; at the end of the eighteenth it was applied to classical antiquity, Bornheim ("Lehrbuch der historischen Methode"), Leipzig, 1903, 296) believes that this means alone history first became a science. In the application of criticism to the Bible there are limits, indeed, by the inspiration and the canonicity of its books; but there is an ample field left for our critical investigations (Pesch, "Theol. Zeitfragen," III, 48).

Some of the principal sins of the critics in their treatment of Sacred Scripture are the following: (i) They deny everything supernatural, so that they reject not only the inspiration and canonicity (as also prophesy and miracles of the person) of the Bible, but also a historical sequence of events in the ancient world, and an interpretation of the books; but there is an ample field left for our critical investigations (Pesch, "Theol. Zeitfragen," III, 48).

(ii) They seem to be convinced of the credibility of any Biblical historical documents, while they are prejudiced against the truthfulness of Biblical accounts of antiquity. (iii) But they are, at least, convinced that the sacred text has suffered in its transmission and may have received additions, in the form of either inspired appendices or exegetical glosses. If the critics, therefore, can succeed in determining the number and the limits of the documentary sources, and of the post-Mosaic additions, whether inspired or profane, they render an important service to the study of the Pentateuch authenticity. The same must be said with regard to the successive laws established by Moses, and the gradual fidelity of the Jewish people to the Mosaic law. Here again the certain or even probable results of some literary and historical criticism will aid greatly the conservative commentator of the Pentateuch. We do not quarrel with the legitimate conclusions of the critics, if the critics do not quarrel with each other. But they do quarrel with each other. According to Mery (loc. cit.) there is nothing certain in the field of criticism except its inexactitude; each critic proclaims his views with the greatest self-reliance, and never regard the consistency of the whole. Former views are simply killed, and even Reuss and Dillmann are junk-iron, and there is a noticeable lack of judgment as to what can or cannot be known.

Hence the critical results, in as far as they consist merely in the distinction of documentary sources, in the determination of post-Mosaic material, etc., textual changes, and profane or inspired additions, the description of various legal codes, are not at variance with the Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch. Nor can an anti-Mosaic character be pointed out in the facts or phenomena from which criticism legitimately infers the foregoing conclusions; such facts or phenomena are, for instance, the change of the Divine names in the text, the use of certain words, the difference of style, the so-called double accounts of really, not merely apparently, identical events; the truth or falsehood of these and similar details do not directly affect the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. Nor can the anti-Mosaic character of the Pentateuch results then does criticism clash with tradition? Criticism and tradition, when viewed as to the age and sequence of the documents, as to the age and sequence of the documentary sources, as to the origin of the various legal codes, and as to the time and manner of the reduction of the Pentateuch.

(i) Pentateuchal Documents.—As to the age and sequence of the various documents, the critics do not agree. Dillmann, Kittel, König, and Winckler place the Elohist, who is subdivided by several writers into the first, second, and third Elohist, before the Yahwistic; but Wellhausen and most critics believe that the Elohist is about a century younger than the Yahwist. At any rate, both are assigned to about the ninth and eighth centuries B.C.; both too incorporate earlier traditions or even documents.

All critics appear to agree as to the composite character of Deuteronomy; and even admit that a Deuteronomist school existed, though not inferior to those of the Priestly or of the post-Mosaic. But they differ as to the character of the Deuteronomist school. Still, the successive layers composing the whole book are briefly designated by D², D¹, D', etc. As to the character of these layers, the critics do not agree: Montet and Driver, for instance, assign to the first Deuteronomist cc. i-xvi; Kuenen, König, Reuss, Renan, Westphal assign it to a third Deuteronomist. Finally, the Yahwist, a third designated as D', reduces D² to xii, l-xvi, 19, allowing it a double edition; according to Wellhausen, the first edition contained i, l-iv, xi-xvi, xxvii, while the second comprised iv, 45-iv, 39; xi-xvi, xvi-xiii; both editions were combined by the redactor who inserted Deuteronomy into the Hexateuch. Cornill arranges the Deuteronomic material somewhat as follows: i-xvi, 19, in which he considers even cc. xii-xvi as a compilation of pre-existing elements, gathered together without order and often by chance. Wellhausen and his adherents do not wish to assign to D¹ a higher age than 621 B.C., Cornill and Bitholet consider the document as a summary of the prophetic teaching, Colenso and Renan ascribe it to Jeremiah, others place its origin in the reign of Ezechias or Manasses. Klostermann identifies the document with the book read before the people in the time of Josaphat, while Kleinert refers it back to the end of the time of the Judges. The Deuteronomist depends on the two preceding documents, J and E, both for his history and his legislation; the historical details not found in these may have been derived from other sources. Levis-vii, designated as D², is of post-Mosaic. The first documentary hypothesis considered P as the oldest part of the Pentateuch; Dusdon and Dillmann place it before the Deuteronomist code, but recent criticism regards it as more recent than the other parts of the Pentateuch, and even later than Ezech., xiv, 10-xxvi, 15; the latter was written so as to fit it for the special purpose of the Priestly Code; Dillmann and Driver maintain that facts have not been invented or falsified by P, but that the latter had at hand other historical documents besides J and E. As to the legal part of P, Wellhausen considers it as an appendix to the Moses after the return from the Babylonian Captivity, while Wildeboer places it either after or towards the end of the captivity. The historical parts of the Priestly Code depend on the Yahwistic and the Elohistic documents, but Wellhausen's adherents believe that the material of these documents has been manipulated so as to fit it for the special purpose of the Priestly Code; Dillmann and Driver maintain that facts have not been invented or falsified by P, but that the latter had at hand other historical documents besides J and E. As to the legal part of P, Wellhausen considers it as an appendix to the Moses after the return from the captivity, projected backwards into the past, and attributed to Moses; but other critics believe that P has systematized the pre-exilic customs of worship, developing them, and adapting them to the new circumstances.

What has been said clearly shows that the critics are at variance with and seek to establish the date at which they believe the authors of the post-Mosaic origin of the Pentateuch documents. What is the weight of the reasons on which they base their opinion? (a) The conditions laid down by the critics as prerequisites to literature do not prove that the sources of the Pentateuch must be post-Mosaic. The Hebrew people had lived, at least, two thousand years in Egypt; besides, most of the forty years spent in the desert were passed in the neighborhood of Cades, so that the Israelites were no longer a nomadic people. Whatever may be said of their material prosperity, or of their proficiency in writing and reading, the above-mentioned researches of Flinders Petrie show that they kept records of their national traditions at the time of Moses. (b) If the Hebrew contemporaries of Moses kept written records, should not the Pentateuchal sources be among these documents? It is true that in our actual Pentateuch we find non-Mosaic and post-Mosaic indications; but, then, the non-Mosaic, impersonal style may be due to a literary device, or to the pen of secretaries; the post-Mosaic geographical and historical indications are often the work of the glosses, or errors of the transcribers, or even inspired additions. The critics cannot reject these suggestions as mere subterfuges; for they should have to grant a continuous miracle in the preservation of the Pentateuch text, if they were to deny the moral certainty of the presence of such textual changes. (c) But would not the Pentateuch that have been known to the earlier Prophets, if it had been handed down from the time of Moses? This critical exception is really an argument ex silentio which is very apt to be fallacious, unless it be most carefully handled. Besides, if we keep in mind the labour involved in multiplying copies of the Pentateuch, we cannot be wrong in assuming that many, not contemporary with Moses, but contemporaries between Moses and the Prophets, so that few were able to read the actual text. Again, it has been pointed out that at least one of the earlier Prophets appeals to a written Mosaic law, and that all appeal to such a national conscience as presupposes the Pentateuchal history and law. Finally, some of the critics have been forced to admit that the Pentateuch agrees according to the religious and the moral ideas of the Prophets; if there be such an agreement, why not say that the Prophets write according to the religious and moral ideas of the Pentateuch? (d) The critics urge the fact that the Pentateuchal laws concerning the sabbath, the sacrifices, the feasts, and the priesthood agree with different stages of post-Mosaic history, as the result of development; that the second stage agrees with the reform of Josias, and the third with the enactments enforced after the time of the Babylonian Exile. But it must be kept in mind that the Mosaic law was intended for Israel as the Christian law is intended for the whole world; if then 1900 years after Christ the Christian Church can claim to be built on the Mosaic law, it is astonishing that the Mosaic law required centuries before it penetrated the whole nation. Besides, there were, no doubt, many violations of the law, just as the Ten Commandments are violated to-day without detriment to their legal promulgation. Again there were periods of religious reforms and disasters as there are periods of religious fervour and coldness in the history of the Christian Church; but such human frailties do not imply the non-existence of the law, either Mosaic or Christian. As to the particular laws in question, it will be found more satisfactory to examine them more in detail.

Pentateuchal Codes.—The critics endeavour to establish a triple Pentateuchal code: the Book of the Covenant, Deuteronomy, and the Priestly Code. Instead of regarding this legislation as applying to different phases in the forty years' wandering in the desert, they considered it as agreeing with three historical stages in the national history. As stated above, the main objects of this triple legislation are the sanctuary, the feasts, and the priesthood.

(a) The Sanctuary.—At first, so the critics say, sacrifices were to be offered in any place where the Lord had manifested his name (Ex. xx, 24-6); then the Lord's city was Jerusalem, which place was chosen by God (Deut., xii, 5); thirdly, the Priestly Code proposes the unity of sanctuary, and prescribes the proper religious rites to be observed. Moreover, the critics point out historical incidents showing that before the enforcement of the Deuteronomic law sacrifices were offered in various places quite distinct from the resting place of the Ark. Who is to say that the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch answers? First as to the triple law, it points to three different stages in Israel's desert life: before the erection of the tabernacle at the foot of Mt. Sinai, the people were allowed to erect altars and to offer sacrifices everywhere provided the name of the Lord had been manifested; next, after the people had adore the golden calf, and the tabernacle had been erected, sacrifice could be offered only before the tabernacle, and even the cattle killed for consumption had to be slaughtered in the same place, in order to prevent a relapse into idolatry; finally, when the people were about to enter the promised land, the last law was promulgated, being quite impossible, but the unity of sanctuary was kept in the place of worship which the critics would choose. Second, as to the historical facts urged by the critics, some of them are based on the Divine intervention, miracle or prophetic inspiration, and such are fully legitimate; others are evidently violations of the law, and are not sanctioned by the inspired writers; a third class of facts may be explained in one of three ways: (a) Pocci ("Le sanctuaire de Kirjath Jearim"); Louvain, 1894; "Examen critique de l'histoire du sanctuaire de l'Arche", Louvain, 1897) endeavors to prove that Gaazaon, Masiphath, and Kirjath-Jerim denote the same place, so that the multiplicity of sanctuaries is only apparent, not real. (b) Van Hoonacker ("Le lieu du culte dans la législation rituelle des Hebreux" in "Musée", April-Oct., 1894, xliii, 195-204; 299-320, 533-41; xiv, 17-38) distinguishes between private and public altars; the public and national worship is legally centralised in the sanctuary and around one altar, while private altars may be kept for domestic worship. (c) But more commonly it is admitted that before the conquest of the city of national sanctuary, it was not forbidden by law to sacrifice anywhere, even away from the place of the ark. After the building of the temple the law was not considered so stringent as to bind under all circumstances. Thus far then the argument of the critics is not conclusive.

(b) The Sacrifices.—According to the critics, the book of the covenant enjoined only the offering of the first-fruits and the first-born of animals, the redemption of the first-born of men, and a free-will offering on various occasions (Ex., xxii, 20-9; xxiii, 15, [Heb., xxiii, 19]); Deuteronomic legislation clearly defines some of these laws (xxv, 19-23; xxvi, 1-11), and imposes the law of tithes for the benefit of the poor, the widows, the orphans, and the Levites (xxvi, 12-5); the Priestly Code distinguishes different kinds of sacrifices, determines their rites, and introduces also incense offering. But history hardly bears out his view: as there existed a permanent priesthood in Silo, and only in or on the land of Jerusalem, we may safely infer that there existed a permanent sacrifice. The earliest prophets are acquainted with an excess of care bestowed on the sacrificial rites (cf. Amos, iv, 4, 5; v, 21-2, 25; Osee, xvi, 23); the renewed expressions of Jeremiah (vi, 21-5) may be explained in the same way. Sin offering was known long before the critics introduce their Priestly Code (Osee, iv, 8; Miche, vi, 7; Ps., xxxix [xli], 7; I Kings, iii, 14). Trespass offering is formally distinguished from sin offering in IV Kings, xiii, 16 (cf. I Kings, vi, 3-15; Is., lli, 10). Hence the distinction between the different kinds of sacrifice is due neither to Ezech., xlv, 22-5, nor to the Priestly Code.

(c) The Feasts.—The Book of the Covenant, so the critics tell us, knows only three feasts: the seven-days' feast of the Passover in memory of the exodus from Egypt, the feast of the harvest, and that of the end of the harvest (Ex., xxiii, 14-7; Deuteronomic ordinances). The keeping of the feasts at the central sanctuary, adds the Pasch to the feast of the new moons places the second feast seven weeks after the first, and calls the third, "feast of tabernacles", extending its duration to seven days (Deut., xvi, 1-17); the Priestly Code prescribes the exact rite for five feasts, adding the feast of ingatherings and of atonement, all of which must be kept at the central sanctuary. Moreover, history appears to endorse the contention of the critics: Judges, xxi, 19 knows of only one annual feast in Silo; I Kings, i, 7, 21 testifies that the parents of Samuel went every year to Silo to the sanctuary; Jeroboam I established in his kingdom one annual feast similar to that celebrated in Jerusalem (II Kings, xii, 32-3); the earliest Prophets do not mention the name of the religious feasts; the Pasch is celebrated for the first time before the Deuteronomistic discovery of Deuteronomy (IV Kings, xxiii, 21-3); Ezechiel knows only three feasts and a sin offering on the first day of the first and the seventh month. But here again, the critics use the argument a silentio which is not conclusive in their case. The feast of atonement, for instance, is not mentioned in the Old Testament outside the Pentateuch; only Josephus refers to its celebration in the time of John Hyrcanus or Herod. Will the critics infer from this, that the feast was not kept throughout the Old Testament? History does not record facts generally known. As to the annual feast mentioned in the Old Testament, weighty commentators are of opinion that after the battle of the people in the promised land, the custom was gradually introduced of going to the central sanctuary only once a year. This custom prevailed before the critics allow the existence of the Deuteronomic law (II Kings, xi, 25-31), so that the latter cannot have introduced it. Isaac (xxv, 11; xxx, 29) speaks of a cycle of feasts, but Osee, xii, 9 alludes already to the feast of tabernacles, so that its establishment cannot be due to the Priestly Code as the critics describe it. Ezechiel (xiv, 16-5) speaks only of the three feasts which had to be kept at the central sanctuary.

(3) The Priests.—The critics contend that the Book of the Covenant knows nothing of an Albicronal priesthood (Ex., xxiv, 5); that Deuteronomy mentions priests and Levites without any hierarchical distinction and without any high priest, determines their rights, and distinguishes only between the Levite living in the country and the Levite attached to the central sanctuary; finally, that the Priestly Code represents the priesthood as a social and hierarchical institution, with legally determined duties, rights, and revenues. This theory is said to be borne out by the evidence of history. But the testimony of history speaks against the opposition. At the time of Josue and the early Judges, Phineas and Aaron, the son and nephew of Aaron, were priests (Num., xxxvi, 1; Deut., x, 6; Jos., xiv, 1 sqq.; xxii, 13, 21; xxiv, 33; Judges, xx, 28). From the end of the time of Judges to Solomon, the priesthood was in the hands of Heli and his descendants (I Kings, i, 3 sqq.; xiv, 3; xx, 1; xx, 11; xvi, 1) and sprang from the family of the younger son of Aaron (I Par., xxiv, 3; cf. I Chr., xxiv, 20 sqq.; Ps., vi, 7 sqq.). Solomon raised Sadoc, the son of Ahitub, to the dignity of the high priesthood, and his descendants held the office down to the time of the Babylonian Captivity (II Kings, vii, 17; xx, 21 sqq.; xx, 25; 11 Kings, iii, 26, 27, 35; Ezech., xlv, 15); that Sadoc too was of Aaronic descent is attested by I Par., vi, 8.
Besides, the Books of Josue and Paralipomenon acknowledge the distinction between priests and Levites; according to 1 Kings, vi, 15, the Levites handied the ark, but the Bethsamites, the inhabitants of a pr DESTINITY city, xx, 15-6, offered sacrifices. Such a division is made in 11 Kings, xv, 21; 11 Kings, vili, 3 sq.; Is., lxvi, 21. Van Hoeacker (Les prêtres et les levites dans le livre d'Ezechiel, in "Revue biblique", 1899, viii, 180-189, 192-194) shows that Ezechiel did not create the distinction between priests and Levites, but that supposing the traditional distinction of the Levites, he suggested a division into these classes according to merit, and not according to birth (xliii, 15-xx, 5). Unless the critics simply set aside all this historical evidence, they must grant the existence of an Aaronite priesthood in Israel, and its division into priests and Levites, long before the D and P codes were promulgated according to the critical theory. It is true that in a number of passages persons are said to offer sacrifice who are not of Aaronic descent: Judges, vi, 25 sqq.; xiii, 9; 1 Kings, vii, 9; x, 8; xiii, 9; 11 Kings, vi, 17; xxv, 25; 11 Kings, xini, 5, 62; etc. But in the first place, the phrase "to offer sacrifice" means either to furnish the victim (Ex., i, 2-5) or to perform the sacrificial rite; the Levites were furnished with a priestly man; secondly, it would be hard to prove that God committed the priestly office in such a way to Aaron and his sons as not to reserve to himself the liberty of delegating in extraordinary cases a non-Aaronite to perform the priestly functions.

The Pentateuchal Redactors:—The four documentary sources of the Pentateuch thus far described were combined not by any one individual; critics require rather three different stages of combination: first, a Yahwistic redactor Re or Re combined J and E with a view of harmonizing them, and adapting them to Deuteronomic ideals; this happened either before or after the rejection of D. Secondly, after D had been completed and the other two were judiciously adapted, perhaps a school of redactors, imbued with the spirit of D combined the document with JE into Jed, introducing however the modifications necessary to secure consistence. Thirdly, a last redactor Re imbued with the letter and the spirit of P, combined this document with Jed, introducing again the necessary changes. This hypothesis is supported by Kuhn, who was according to Kuenen added by this last redactor.

At first sight, one is struck by the complex character of this theory; as a rule, truth is of a more simple texture. Secondly, one is impressed by the unique nature of the hypothesis; antiquity has nothing to equal it. Thirdly, if one reads or studies the Pentateuch, the historical and literary process is imposed upon one's whinsmical character of the redactor; he often retained what should have been omitted, and omitted what should have been retained. The critics themselves have to take refuge, time and time again, in the work of the redactor, in order to save their own views of the Pentateuch. A recent writer does not hesitate to call the complex redactor von genauer Art. Fourthly, a truth-loving, straightforward reader is naturally shocked by the literary fictions and forgeries, the editorial changes and subterfuges implied in the critical theory of the Pentateuchal documents and redaction. The more moderate critics endeavour to escape this incoherence; some appeal to the difference between the ancient and the modern standard of literary property and editorial accuracy; others practically sanctify the means by the end. Oetel considers the dilemma "either the work of Moses or the work of a redactor" as the expression of sheer impudence; Kuentz equally points to the depth of the wis- dom and the knavery of God's fathomless wisdom, but must admit. The wing of criticism openly acknowledges that there is no use in hushing up matters; it actually is the result of scientific re- search that both form and contents of a great part of the Old Testament are based on conscious fiction and forgery.

IV. Style of the Pentateuch.—In some general introductions to the Pentateuch its Messianic prophecies are specially considered, i.e., the so-called "prophetic element", Gen., iii, 15; the blessing of Sem, Gen., ix, 36-7; the patriarchal promises, Gen., xii, 2; xiii, 16; xv, 4; xvi, 1-6, 16; xviii, 10-15; xxii, 17; xxi, 1; xxvi, 14; the blessing of the dying Jacob, Gen., xix, 8; the Prophecy of Balaam, Num., xxiv, 15 sqq. and the Apocalyptic Prophet announced by Moses, Deut., xviii, 15-19. But these prophecies belong rather to the province of exegesis than introduction. Again, the text of the Pentateuch has been considered in some general introductions to the work. We have already seen that besides the Massoretic Text we have to take into account the earlier text followed by the Septuagint translators, and the still earlier readings of the Samaritan Pentateuch; a detailed investigation of this subject belongs to the field of textual or lower criticism. But the style of the Pentateuch can hardly be referred to any other department of Pentateuchal study.

As Moses employed no doubt pre-existent documents in the composition of his work, and as he must have made use too of the aid of secretaries, we expect antecedently a variety of style in the Pentateuch. It is no doubt due to the presence of this literary phenomenon that the critics have found so many points of support in their minute analysis. But in general, the style of the work is in keeping with its contents. There are three kinds of material in the Pentateuch: first, there are statistics, genealogies, and legal formalities; secondly, there are narrative portions; thirdly, there are parenthetic sections.

No reader will find fault with the writer's dry and simple style in his genealogical and ethnographic lists, in his table of encampments in the desert, or his legal maxims. A reader, however, will be struck out of place in records of this kind. The narrative style of the Pentateuch is simple and natural, but also lively and picturesque. It abounds in simple character sketches, dialogues, and anecdotes. The accounts of Abraham's purchase of a burying-ground, of the history of Joseph, and of the Egyptian plagues are not lost draughts. Deut., xvi, 13; xxi, 15; xxv, 1-3; xxv, 11-10; xvi, 2-7; xxiv, 1-1). Being necessarily a popular preacher, he is not lacking in repetitions. But his earnestness, persuasiveness, and emotion do not interfere with the clearness of his statements. He is not merely a rigid legislator, but he shows his love for the people, and in turn wins their love and confidence.

Many works referring to the Pentateuch have been cited throughout the course of this monograph, but the main body of biblical literature, works both ancient and modern, without attempting to give a complete catalogue.

Pentecost — See Whitsunday.

Pentecost (of the Jews). Feast of, the second in importance of the great Jewish feasts. The term, adopted from the Greek-speaking Jews (Tob, ii, 1; II Mac., xii, 32; Joseph. "Ant," III, x, 6; etc.) alludes to the fact that the feast, known in the Old Testament as the "feast of harvest of the firstfruits," is celebrated on the day following the harvest and of the Paschal season, fell on the fifth day from "the next day after the sabbath" of the Passover (Lev., xxiii, 11). The interpretation of this passage was early disputed and at the time of Jesus Christ two opinions touching the exact day of the harvest were held. The one was that "the firstfruits" were held by all the people (on the force of lev., xxiii, 7) the sabbath spoken of in verse 11 to be the first day of the unleavened bread, Nisan 15; whereas the Sadducees (later also the Karaites) held that the weekly sabbath falling during the Passover festivities was meant (Talm., Treat. Menahem., x, 1-5; Chagiga, ii, 4). Which opinion is more correct depends in some measure upon the natural meaning of the passage, we shall leave undecided; the dissent is long since over, all Jews celebrating the Pentecost on the fifth day after Nisan 16. As the offering of a sheaf of barley marked the beginning of the harvest season, so the offering of ears made from the new wheat marked its completion. This is no proof that Pentecost was originally a mere nature-festival; but it shows that the Mosaic legislation had in view an agricultural population, whose special needs and disposition it was perfectly adapted.

Since the close of Biblical times, an entirely new significance, never so much as hinted at in Scripture, has been attached to the Jewish Pentecost, as the symbol of the Church. It is held to commemorate the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai, which, according to Exod., xix, 1, took place on the fifth day after the departure from Egypt. This view, adopted by several Fathers of the Church (St. Jer., "Epist," CXVIII, 12, P. L., XXII, 707; St. August., "Cont. Faust," xxxii, 12, P. L., XLI, 503; St. Leo, "De Pentec.," XIV, 269), has passed into some modern Jewish liturgical books, where the feast is described as "the day of the giving of the Law" (Maimon. More Neb., i, 41). In accordance with this interpretation, modern Jews pass the eve in reading the Law and other appropriate Scriptures. Among them the feast lasts two days, a tradition dating from the difficulty which the Jews of the Diaspora found in ascertaining exactly what day the month begins in Palestine (Talmud, Treat. Pesach., i, 1; Rosh hashash, v, 1). On the day of Pentecost no service work was allowed (Lev., xxiii, 21). The obligation consisted of two loaves of the unleavened bread, a "wave offering" (offered by the Israelites for the first time, about seven quarters and a half) of flour from the new wheat (Lev., xxiii, 17; Exod., xxxiv, 22). The leavened bread could not be placed on the altar (Lev., ii, 11), and was merely waved (D. V., "liffted"; see Offerings); one loaf was given to the High Priest, the other was divided among the priests who ate it with the sacred bread. Pentecost was also offered as a peace-offering, and a buck-goat for sin, together with a holocaust of seven lambs without blemish, one calf, and two rams (Lev., xxiii, 18-19). According to Num., xxviii, 26-31, the number of victims to be offered in holocaust on that day differs from the above. The Jews of later times regarded the two loaves as representing the heads and hands of "Man," the "fourth of its kind" (Num., x, 6; Talmud, Treat. Menahem., iv, 2, 5). The feast was an occasion for social and joyful gatherings (Deut., xvi, 11) and we may infer from the New Testament that it was, like the Passover, attended at Jerusalem by a great home-coming of the Jews from all parts of the world (Act., vi, 5-11).

Peoria, Diocese of (Peoriossia), comprises that part of central Illinois south of the Counties of Whiteside, Lee, Dekalb, Grundy, Kankakee, and north of the Counties of Adams, Brown, Cass, Menard, Sangamon, Macon, Moultrie, Douglas, and Edgar. It was cut off from the Diocese of Chicago in 1875. Six years later it was enlarged by the addition of LaSalle, Bureau, Henry, Putnam, and Rock Island Counties. Catholics in this region dates from the days of Father Marquette, who rested at the Indian village of Peoria on his voyage to the Mississippi River in 1673. Opposite the present site of the episcopal city, La Salle and Ponti in 1680 built Fort Crevecoeur, in which Mass was celebrated and the Gospel preached by the Recollect Fathers, Gabriel Ribaud, Zenobius Membere, and Louis Hennepin. With some breaks in the succession, the line of missionaries extends to the present day. Many, and some of the first, were the pioneer Catholics whose descendants now constitute the strength of the Church. In more recent years Poles, Slavonians, Slovenians, Croatians, Lithuanians, and Italians have come in considerable numbers to work in the coal mines. They are organized in parishes looked after by priests of their own nationality. The first appointee to the see, Rev. Michael Hurley, requested to be spared the responsibility of organizing and governing the new dioceese. After many years of fruitful labour in Peoria, he died, vicar-general in 1898, and was mourned universally in the city and throughout the dioceese.

Rev. John Lancaster Spalding was consecrated first Bishop of Peoria, 1 May, 1867. Born of the distinguished Spalding family, in Lebanon, Kentucky, in 1810, and educated at Bardstown, Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Louvain, and Rome, his career as a priest in Louisville, Kentucky, as orator, and as author, had been marked by signal success. The period of his earlier life was more than fulfilled by the long years of arduous toil. In all the capacities successive new spirit in the Catholic life of the dioceese, which found expression in new churches, schools, and institutions of education and charity, he sought fields of larger efforts for his zeal. He laboured earnestly in the cause of Catholic colonization in the West. He preached the truths of life to an ever-increasing and deeply appreciative audience of American people. He ranks high among the educators of the country. The Catholic University of America owes its origin largely to his zeal. Spalding Institute, Peoria, a Catholic school for boys, built and equipped by his generosity, is another monument to his abiding faith in education. He regarded the capital of the state, as the centre of civil and religious influences by future generations. At the height of his usefulness he was stricken with paralysis on 6 Jan., 1905, and resigned the see, 11 Sept., 1906, residing in Peoria as Archbishop of Stetipolis, to which honour he was raised in 1899.

For eight Reverend Edmund M. Dunne, D.D., the second and present Bishop of Peoria was born Chicago, 2 Feb., 1861. He began his classical studies at St. Ignatius's College, Chicago, and finished at the Petit Seminaire at Amiens, France. Completing his theological course at Louvain, he was ordained priest, 24 June, 1887. Later studies in Rome prepared him for the Pontifical University, which was conferred by the Gregorian University in 1900. Eight years of parish work in St. Columbkille's church, Chicago, led to his appointment as pastor of Guardian Angels' Parish. His ministrations among the poor Italians of Chicago were remarkably successful. It was with profound regret that he saw him removed to the chancellorship of the archdioceese, after seven years of unselfish labour. He was consecrated Bishop of Peoria, 1 Sept., 1906.

Peoria Indians, a principal tribe of the confederated Illinois Indians (q. v.) having their chief residence, in the seventeenth century, on Illinois river, upon the lake, and about the site of the modern city that bears their name. The first white man ever known to the Illinois Indians was probably the Jesuit Claude Alouez, who met some of them as an emissary at his mission on Lake Superior at La Pointe (Bayfield), Wisconsin, in 1667. Six years later Marquette passed through their country, where he soon established a temporary mission. In 1680 the French commander, La Salle, built Fort Crevecoeur on Peoria lake, near the village of the tribe, about the present Rockfort. It was abandoned, but reoccupied in 1814, when a regular mission was begun among the Peoria by Fr. Alouez. His successor in 1687 was Fr. Jacques Gravier, to whom we owe the great manuscript "Dictionary of the Peoria Language", now at Harvard University, the principal literary monument of the extinct Illinois. The Peoria, however, proved obstinate in their old beliefs, and in 1765, at the instigation of the medicine men, Gravier was attacked and dangerously wounded. He narrowly escaped with his life, but died from the effects on 12 Feb., 1768, near Mobile, after having vainly sought a cure in France. The mission continued under other workers, but so late as 1721 the tribe was still almost entirely heathen, although the majority of the Illinois were then Christian. The Peoria shared in the general decline of the Illinois and in 1832 the remnant of the confederated tribes, hardly 300 souls in all, sold all their claims in Illinois and Missouri and removed to a small reservation on the Osage River, Kansas. In 1854 the remnant of the Wea and Pankishaw of Illinois were consolidated with them, and in 1863 the entire body removed to a tract in north-east Oklahoma, where they now reside, being officially designated as "Peoria and confederated tribes", and numbering altogether only about 200 souls, all mixed-bloods, and divided between Catholic and Methodist. Pepin the Short. Mayor of the Palace of the whole Frankish kingdom (both Austrasia and Neustria), and later King of the Franks; b. 714; d. at St. Denis, 24 Sept., 768. He was the son of Charles Martel. Pepin and his older brother Carloman were taught by the monks of St. Denis, and the impressions received during their monastic education had a controlling influence upon the relations of both princes to the Church. When the father died in 741 the two brothers began to Franz Oelsner, the ised of the authority on was crown of the elected Pepin of the Franks at rias proper? of things Pepin. The Lombards, Pope Zacharias welcomed this advance of the Franks which aimed at ending an intolerable condition of things, and at laying the constitutional foundations for the exercise of the royal power. The pope urged that such a state of things was not proper. After this decision the place Pepin desired to occupy was declared vacant. The crown was given him not by the pope but by the Franks. According to ancient custom Pepin was then elected king by the nation at Soissons in 751, and soon after this was anointed by Boniface. This consecration of the new kingdom by the head of the Church, was intended to remove any doubt as to its legitimacy. On the contrary, the consciousness of having saved the Christian world from the Saracens produced, among the Franks, the feeling that their kingdom owed its authority directly to God. Still this external condition of the Church of its existence to the Carolingians would necessarily enhance the importance of the Church. The relations between the two controlling powers of Christendom now rapidly developed. It was soon evident to what extent the alliance between Church and State was to check the decline of ecclesiastical and civil life; it made possible the conversion of the still heathen German tribes, and when that was accomplished provided an opportunity for both Church and State to recruit strength and to grow.

Ecclesiastical, political, and economic developments had made the popes lords of the duxus Romanus. The popes now advanced, through their possessions of Italy, which had belonged to them before Liutprand's conquest. When Stephen II had a conference with King Pepin at Ponthion in January, 754, the pope implored his assistance against his oppressor the Lombard King Aistulf, and begged for the same protection for the prerogatives of St. Peter which the Byzantine emperors had extended to them, to which the king agreed, and in the charter establishing the States of the Church, soon after given at Quercy, he promised to restore these prerogatives. The Frankish king received the title of the former representative of the Byzantine Empire in Italy, i. e. "Patriicus", and was also assigned the duty of protecting the privileges of the Holy See.

When Stephen II performed the ceremony of anointing Pepin and his son at St. Denis, it was St. Peter who was regarded as the mystical giver of the secular power, but the emphasis thus laid upon the religious character of political law left vague the legal relations between pope and king. After the acknowledgment of his territorial claims the pope was in reality a ruling sovereign, but he had placed himself under the protection of the Frankish king, and owed it that he and his people would be true to the king. Thus his sovereignty was limited from the very start as regards what was external to his domain. The connection between Rome and the Frankish kingdom involved Pepin during the years 754–56 in war with the Lombard King Aistulf, who was forced to return to the Church the territory which had been conquered by him. Pepin's one commanding position in the world of his time was permanently secured when he took Septimania from the Arabs. Another particularly important act was his renewed overthrow of the rebellion in Aquitaine which was once more made a part of the kingdom. He was not so fortunate in his campaigns against the Saxons and Bavarians. He could do no more than repeatedly attempt to protect the boundaries of the kingdom against the incessantly restless Saxons. Bavaria remained an entirely independent State and advanced in civilization under Duke Tassilo. Pepin's activity in war was accompanied by a widely extended activity in the internal affairs of the Frankish kingdom. The king, in addition to the organization of legislation and internal affairs, especially of ecclesiastical conditions. He continued the ecclesiastical reforms commenced by St. Boniface. In doing this Pepin demanded an unlimited authority over the Church. He himself wished to be the leader of the reforms. However, although St. Boniface changed nothing by his reforms in the relations and political relations that had developed in the Frankish kingdom upon the basis of the Germanic conception of the State, nevertheless he had placed the purified and unified Frankish Church more definitely under the control of the papal see than had hitherto been the case. From the time of St. Boniface the Church was more generally acknowledged by the Franks to be the mystical power appointed by God. When he deposed the last of the Merovingian Pepin was also obliged to acknowledge the increased authority of the Church by calling upon it for moral support. Consequently the ecclesiastical supremacy of the Frankish king over the Church was definitely established. Nevertheless by his life-work Pepin had powerfully aided the authority of the Church and with it the conception of ecclesiastical unity. He was buried at St. Denis where he died. He preserved the empire created by Clovis from the destruction that menaced it; he was able to overcome the great danger arising from social conditions that threatened the Frankish kingdom, by opposing to the unruly lay nobility the ecclesiastical aristocracy that had been strengthened by the general reform. When he died the means had been created by which his greater son could solve the problems of the empire. Pepin's policy marked out the limits to which Charlemagne developed himself; quelling the Saxons, the subjection of the duchies, and finally the organisation of the ecclesiastical question and with it that of Italy.

Percy, John (alias John Fisher), b. at Holmside, Durham, 27 Sept., 1569; d. at London, 3 Dec., 1611. Converted when only fourteen. He went first to Reims in 1586, then to the English College, Rome, 1589-91. Returning to Belgium, he entered the Jesuit novitiate, 2 May, 1594, and then set out for England in 1596. He was, however, arrested by the Dutch, tortured, and sent prisoner to London. He managed to escape, and became the companion of Father Gerard in several adventures. He was seized at Harrowden (November, 1605) at the time of the Gunpowder Plot, but was eventually banished at the request of the Spanish ambassador (1606). Retiring to Belgium he was for a time head of the English Jesuits, then professor of Scripture at Louvain, after which he returned again to England, and was again imprisoned and condemned to death (1610). He had already begun to write on current controversies, and when James I desired a series of disputations in 1622, Percy, who was then in a prison in London, was required to defend the Catholic side. In these disputations King James himself and Laud took a leading part. As a result of these disputations, Mary Countess of Buckingham, afterwards the Queen, became converted to the Church. These controversies were afterwards printed and discussed by Percy and Floyd on the Catholic side, and by Laud, Francis White, John White, Freley, and Wotton on the Protestant. Percy was eventually released in 1625 and ordered to banishment in 1635, but he was never to remain in London till his death.

Peregrinus. —The canons of Priscillian, prefixed to the Epistles of St. Paul in many (chiefly Spanish) MSS., are preceded by an introduction headed "Proemium saneti Peregrini episcopi in epistolas Pauli Apostoli," in which it is explained that the canons were not written by St. Jerome but by Priscillian, and that they are given in an expanded edition. The prologue of Priscillian himself to his canons follows; it shows none of the characteristics of style found in the tractates of Priscillian; it has presumably been rewritten by Peregrinus, if the tractates are genuine.

The Codex Gothicus of the cathedral of Leon contains a prayer in the words "et praeceps, o carissima vertice," The preface of St. Jerome to the translation of the Books of Solomon from the Septuagint occurs in some MSS., after his preface to translation of those books from the Hebrew; in most of these MSS. (Spanish, or under Spanish influence) a note is appended explaining that both prefaces are given because, to the Vulgate text which follows, there have been added in the margin the additions found in the Septuagint; then come the words "et ibi rectius lexis semper Peregrini mentem." The Stone codex of St. John also has a subscription, in which the writer describes himself as "Soni Peregrinus." Soni is said to be the Celtic for a warrior; it reminds us of "Vincentius" and St. Vincent of Lenin in fact wrote his Commentatorium under the pseudonym of Peregrinus. But he cannot be identified with the Spanish Peregrinus, as he was not a bishop. The latter has been identified by Scheps, Berger, Fritsche, and Künste with Barbareschius; a Spaniard who left his country, and is said of speaking of his peregrinatio; he was accused of Priscillianism, and many say it is a "simple" metaphor, but he was a monk, and we do not know that he ever became a bishop. It is however most probable that the Spanish Peregrinus lived at the beginning of the fifth century, and he cannot be later than the eighth. Künste is wrong in attributing to him the Pseudo-Jerome's Preface to the Catholic Epistles.

Pereira (Pereira, Pereira, Pererius), Benedict, philosopher, theologian, and exegete, b. about 1536, at Rizafa, near Valencia, in Spain, March, 1610, at Rome. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1552 and taught successively literature, philosophy, theology, and Sacred Scripture in Rome. He published eight works, and left a vast deal of manuscript. (Sommercogel, Infrac. mentions twelve sets.) The main difficulties of Genesis are met in "Commentarium et praebationem," published at Rome (1593-99). This is a mine of information in regard to the Deluge, ark of Noe, tower of Babel, etc., and is highly esteemed by Biblical scholars, even by men of the critical bias of Richard Simon (Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, III, xii). The "Commentationes in Danielem prophetam libri quatuor" (Rome, 1587) are much less diffuse, and evidence the critical acumen, untiring energy, and historical research of the author. Other writings of importance published by Pereira were five volumes of exegetical dissertations on: "Exodus," 157 dissertations (Ingolstadt, 1601); "The Epistle to the Romans," 188 dissertations (Ingolstadt, 1618); and 163 dissertations (Lyons, 1606); "The Gospel of St. John," 214 dissertations on the first nine chapters (Lyons, 1698); 144 dissertations on five following chapters (Lyons, 1610). To the fourth volume of the dissertations is appended a curious work of twenty-three dissertations to show that Mohammed was not the Antichrist of the Apocalypse (Ingolstadt, 1602). Perez, Jean, d. before 1513. At one time he held the office of contador or accountant to the Queen of Spain, showing he was of noble family. Later he entered the Franciscan Order and distinguished himself for piety and learning. Queen Isabella chose him for her confessor. Finding court life distracting he asked permission to retire to his monastery. Soon after he was elected guardian of the convent, half a league from Poles in Andalusia, La Rávida (Arabian for garden) to which name it has been given (Arabian place of retreat). In 1290 it came into the hands of the Knights Templar, who in 1221 ceded it to the Friars Minor. Father Francisco Gonzaga, Superior General of the Order (1579-87), declares that La Rávida became a Franciscan monastery in 1291, and that it belonged to the Franciscan Custody of Seville, which by Decree of Alexander VI, 21 Sept., 1492, was raised to the rank of a province. The convent remained in charge of the Friars Minor without interruption until the general confiscation of religious houses in 1835. It is now the property of the nation, and used as a museum.

Here Christopher Columbus in 1481 or 1485 made the acquaintance of Perez. Father Antonio de Mochena, a cosmographer of some note, lived here, and in him the navigator discovered a man bent on the project of discovering a new world. The historian Franceso Lopez Gomara (q. v.) in 1532 seems to have started the blunder, copied by almost every subsequent writer on the subject, of making the two names Perez and Mochena serve to describe one and the same person by speaking of the Father Guardian of La Rávida as Father Juan Perez de Mochena. Both fathers materially assisted Columbus, who acknowledges his obligation in one of his letters to the king and queen. He writes that everybody ridiculed him save two friars, who always remained faithful. Navarrete, indeed, claims that Columbus in this passage spoke of Pérez de Hita and Diego de Deza, the Dominican.

As the latter was Bishop of Palencia when the navigator wrote his letter, and Columbus on all other occasions speaks of him as Bishop of Palencia, or lord bishop, it would seem strange that in this one instance he should omit the title. Deza aided Columbus to the best of his ability among the scientists of Salamanca; but he could not prevent the adverse decision of the Spanish Court. It was Juan Perez who persuaded the navigator not to leave Spain without consulting Isabella, when, footsore and dispirited, he arrived at La Rábida, determined to submit his plan to the King of France. At the invitation of the queen, Perez made a journey to Santa Maria, a personal interview with her. As a result Columbus was recalled, and with the assistance of Cardinal Mendoza and others his demands were finally granted.

When the navigator at last on 3 August, 1492, set sail in the Santa Maria, Perez blessed him and his fleet. Some writers assert that Perez accompanied his illustrious friend on the first voyage, but the silence of Columbus on this point renders the claim improbable. In any case, however, that Perez joined his friend on the second voyage in 1493. The earliest and best writers also agree that when the second expedition reached Haiti, Father Perez celebrated the first Mass in the New World at Point Conception on 8 December, 1493, in a temporary structure; that this was the first church in America; and that Father Perez preserved the Blessed Sacrament there. He also became the guardian of the first convent which Columbus ordered to be erected at Santo Domingo. There all trace of him is lost. Whether he returned to La Rábida or died in America is uncertain. All we know is that in the legal dispute between Diego and Columbus, the royal fiscal, Dr. Garcia Hernandez, testified in 1513 that Father Perez was then dead.

Perez de Hita, Ginés, Spanish writer, b. at Murcia. Little is known of his life except that he lived during the second half of the sixteenth century, and probably took part in campaigns against the Moors in 1560 and following years. The work that has made him famous is his "Guerras civiles de Granada." It is in reality two separate works, dealing with events and persons separated in point of time by more than half a century. The first, when it was printed, contained the following note: "History of the Zegrres and Alencrages, Moorish bands of Granada; of the civil war which occurred at Vega between the Christians and the Moors, and was won by King Ferdinand V; now newly published in an Arabic book, the author of which is a Moor named Aben Alcazar and translated into Spanish by Ginés Pérez" (Zaragoza, 1585; Valencia, 1597). Not even the Arabic origin of this book is genuine nor is it a real history, but merely a novel founded upon fact. Perez de Hita did not live when the Moors were in the height of their power in Granada, but, as he served in campaigns against the Moors, he was enabled to study their customs and ideas, and witness the remains of their glory. The second work deals with the Moorish uprising, and was published at Barcelona in 1619. This part passed through many editions, among which the later ones are that published in Madrid, 1833, and the one forming part (vol. 111) of "La Biblioteca de Autores Españoles" of Rivadeneyra. It may be characterized as an historical novel, while the second may be called a history partaking of the nature of the novel. A striking peculiarity of Perez de Hita is that he uses the language of today, and we look almost in vain for an archaic form. This plan may be modern, and the fiction is pure, terse, and sonorous.

Perfection, Christian and Religious.—A thing is perfect in which nothing lacks the quality of its nature, purpose, or end. It may be perfect in nature, yet imperfect as much as it has not yet attained its end, whether this be in the same order as itself, or whether, by the will of God and His gratuitous liberality, it be entirely above its nature, i.e. in the supernatural order. From Revelation we learn that the ultimate end of man is supernatural, consisting in union with God here on earth by grace and eternal life by the beatific vision. Perfect union with God cannot be attained in this life, so man is imperfect in that he lacks the happiness for which he is destined and suffers many evils both of body and soul. Perfection therefore in its absolute sense is reserved for the kingdom of heaven.

Christian Perfection is the supernatural or spiritual union with God which is possible of attainment in this life, and which may be called relative perfection, compatible with the absence of beatitude, and the presence of human miseries, rebellious passions, and even venial sins to which a just man is liable without a special grace and privilege of God. This perfection consists in charity, in the degree in which it is attainable in this life (Matt., xxii, 36—40; Rom., xiii, 10; Gal., v, 14; I Cor., xii, 31, and xiii, 13). This is the universal teaching of the Fathers and of theologians. Charity unites the soul with God as its supernatural end, and removes from the soul all that is opposed to that union. "God is charity; and he that abideth in charity abideth in God, and God in him" (1 John, iv, 16). Suarez explains that perfection can be attributed to charity in three ways: (1) substantially or essentially, because the essence of union with God consists in charity for the habit as well as for the endeavour or pursuit of perfection; (2)

Eusebius, himself, for the precepts are applied in the XV, necessary object from charity, perfectly.

Christian perfection consists not only in the habit of charity, i.e. the possession of sanctifying grace and the constant will of preserving that grace, but also in the pursuit or practice of charity, which means the service of God and withdrawal of ourselves from those things which oppose or impede it. "Be it ever remembered," says Reginald Buckler, "that the perfection of man is determined by his actions, not by his habits as such. Thus a high degree of habitual charity will not suffice to perfect the soul if the habit pass not into act. That is, if it become not operative. For to what purpose does a man possess virtue if he uses it not? He is not virtuous because he can live virtuously, but because he does. (The Perfection of Man by Charity, Chi. viii, p. 77.)"

The perfection of the soul increases in proportion with the possession of charity. He who possesses the perfection which excludes mortal sin obtains salvation, is united to God, and is said to be just, holy, and perfect. The perfection of charity, which excludes also venial sins, is one in which the heart from God, signifies a state of faith and hope, and a series of frequent, fervent acts of the love of God. This is the perfect fulfillment of the law (Matt., xxi, 37), as God is the primary object of charity. The secondary object is our neighbour. This is not limited to necessary and obligatory duties, but extends to strangers, enemies, and may advance to a heroic degree, leading to the abandonment of God and the world. (See Love, THEOLOGICAL VIRTUE OF.)

Religious Perfection.—Christian perfection, or the perfection of charitast as taught by our Saviour, applies to all men, both secular and religious, yet there is also religious perfection. The religious is called a school (disciplina) of perfection and it imposes an obligation, more strict than that of the secular state, of striving after perfection. Seculars are obliged to perfection by the observance of the precepts or commandments only; while religious are obliged to observe also the evangelical counsels to which they freely bind themselves by the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. The counsels (see COUNSELS, EVANGELICAL) are the means or instruments of perfection in both a negative and positive sense. Negatively: the obstacles in the way of perfection (see John, i, 16) concupiscence of the eyes, concupiscence of the flesh, and pride of life, are removed by the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, respectively. Positively: the profession of the counsels tends to increase the love of God in the soul. The affections, freed from earthly ties, enable the soul to cling to God and to spiritual things more intensely and more willingly, and thus promote His glory and our own sanctification, placing us in a more secure state for attaining the perfection of charity.

It is true that seculars who also tend to perfection have to perform many things that are not of precept, but they do not bind themselves irreversibly to the evangelical counsels. It is, however, expedient only for those who are called by God to take upon themselves these obligations. In no state or condition of life is such a degree of perfection attainable that further progress is not possible. God on his part can always confer on man an increase of sanctifying grace, and man in turn by cooperating with it can increase in charity and grow more perfect by becoming more intimately and steadfastly united to God.

Pergamus, titulus see, suffragan of Ephesus. This city was situated on the banks of the Schius. It was at first a city of refuge, as its name indicates, for the people of the plain, and has been regarded as a colony of Arcadians. The Greek historians have reconstructed for it a complete history because they confined it with the distant Thraetania. It is mentioned for the first time by Xenophon (Hist., VII, viii, 8; "Hellen."); III, i, 6). Captured by Xenophanes in 499 and immediately recaptured by the Persians, it was severely punished in 362 after a revolt. It did not become important until Lysimachus, King of Thrace, took possession, 301 B.C. His lieutenant Philetairos freed the town, which in 281 he made the capital of the new kingdom which he founded. In 261 he bequeathed his possessions to his nephew Eumenus I (263-41 B.C.), who increased them greatly, leaving as heir his cousin Attalus I (214-197 B.C.).

Its highest prosperity was reached under his son Eumenus II (197-59 B.C.). He founded a school of sculpture, and in memory of his exploits a magnificent marble altar adorned with Doric statuary for the gods (Ampelius, "Miracula Mundi," 14); the splendid remains of which are in the museum of Berlin, and finally founded the celebrated library. Attalus III at his death in 133 B.C. bequeathed his kingdom to Rome. Antoninus, natural son of Eumenus II, endeavored to restore the monarchy, but he was captured in 129 B.C. by Perseus, and the kingdom was annexed to the Roman Empire under the name of Asia Propria. It is worthy of mention that parchment was discovered there, and that the physician Galen was a native.

The Apocalypse (xv, 12) mentions the martyr Antipas in connection with Pergamus. Gains, to whom was addressed the Third Epistle of St. John, was bishop of this city, according to the Apostolic Constitutions (vi, 46). Attalus, martyred at Lyons under Marcus Aurelius, was a native of Pergamus. Eusebius of Cesarea (Hist. eccl., IV, 14, 48), mentions the martyrs Carp us, Papylus, and Agathone, executed March 250. Out of a population of 120,000 inhabitants which Pergamus then possessed, a great many were Christians. Among its bishops may be mentioned: Theodotus who about 150 was active against the Gnostic sect of Colobarzianii; Eusebius, present at the Councils of Sardica and Philippopolis in 344; Druconius, deposèd in 360 at the Council of Constantinople; Philip, present at the Council of Ephesus in 431; Eutropius, at the Robber Synod of 449; John d. about 549; Theodore, at the Sixth Ecumenical Council in 681; Basil, at the Seventh in 757; Methodius at the Eighth in 878; George, living in 1256; Arsenius, 1306-16. Pergamus was a suffragan of Ephesus until the twelfth century, when it became a metropolitan see. Although long after the Turks the town was still a metropolis in 1387, when the title was removed and it became once more a dioce- cese (Miklosich and Müller, "Acta patriarcharum Constantinopolitanitum," 11, 103, 397). The diocese itself soon disappeared.
In 610 the body of Emperor Phocas was burned in a brazen ox brought from Pergamus. In the seventh century an Armenian colony, much attached to Monophysitism, and from which sprang the Byzantine Emperor Philippicus Bardanes (711-13), established itself there. In 716 the Arab general Maslama captured the town. From this period dates its decline. It is still possible to see the splendid and formal part of the theme of Thrakesion Constantine Porphyrogenitus, which still speaks of it (De themat., 1, 24, 5-13) as a brilliant city of Asia. In 1197 the French of the Second Crusade halted there. The town had already suffered from Turkish incursions. It then became the capital of the theme of Neoecastra, and a stronghold against the Crusaders. In 1306 the Franks captured it from the Greeks, but thirty years later Sultan Orkhan took it from him. Save for the temporary occupation of Timur-Leng in 1402, it has since belonged to the Ottomans. Under the name of Bergama it now forms a caiza of the vilayet of Smyrna and numbers 29,000 inhabitants, of whom 10,000 are Turks, 7,000 Jews, and 9,300 Christians (200 Armenians and 9,000 Greek schismatics). The latter have two schools for boys and girls, with about 800 pupils, and five churches. The remains of three ancient churches have been discovered, among them the magnificent basilica of St. John. The church of St. Sophia was converted into a mosque in 1453 (Berlin, 1883; Callicles, of the Apocalypse, 1817); Le Quen, Orient christian., 1, 713-16; Heck, 957-60; Van Capellen, De regibus et antiquitatis pagorum (1848); Baur, Geschichte der Geschichtsquellen (1857); Ueberweg, Geschichtsquellen und Kunst (Leipzig, 1863); Conze, History of the Roman Empire (Turin, 1890); Humann, Führer durch die Ruinen von Pergamon (Berlin, 1887); Altertümer von Pergamon (8 vols., Berlin); Conze, De Pergamon Liber (1883); Pergamon in Beuthner, Denkmäler der klassischen Alterthümer (Berlin, 1897); Eisinger, Jahrb. für die Alterth. Pergolesi, Giovanni Battista, b. at Naples, 3 Jan., 1710; d. 16 March, 1736, at Pozzuoli, near Naples. This young man of delicate and poetic musical gifts might have done great things for the music of the Church had he not lived when composers were trying to serve two masters. Of frail constitution, he shortened his career by irregular conduct. At an early age he entered the Conservatory of "dei poveri di Gesù Christo" in his native city, studied the violin under Domenico Matteis and afterwards enjoyed the guidance of composition of Gaetano Greco, Francesco Durante, and Francesco Feo. As a student he attracted attention by his sacred drama "San Giugliano d' Aquitania" but, following the trend of his time, he devoted the next few years to the theatre, producing with more or less success "La Sullustia," "Amor fa l' haucio cieco," and "Recitenti." He was not satisfied with these latter achievements, and when Naples was visited by an earthquake, Pergolesi was commissioned to write a mass for the solemn services of thanksgiving in the church of Santa Maria della Stella. Through this work for two five-part choirs and two orchestras, he became known as one of the most resourceful composers of the Neapolitan school. Shortly after his death, his works were revived and, and later a third and fourth. Then the young master once more yielded to the allurements of the theatre. The intermezzi, "Serva padrona," survived his more pretentious works of this period. Although requiring for performance but two singers and a quartette of instrumentalists, it had instantaneous and lasting success. The last two years of his life Pergolesi devoted almost entirely to the interpretation of liturgical texts (masses, a "Salve Regina," etc.), almost all of them for chorus and orchestra. The work, by which he is most remembered, is the "Stabat mater" for two-part choir and stringed orchestra and organ, which he wrote shortly before his death for the Minorit monastery of San Luigi in Naples. Requiring great flexibility of execution on the part of the vocalists, it especially displays the author's chief characteristic, namely, delicacy and tenderness of feeling and exquisite workmanship. Though of lasting artistic value, Pergolesi's compositions are not available for liturgical purposes because for the most part they partake of the nature and form of contemporaneous operatic productions. They are better suited for performance at sacred concerts. The latest arrangement of Pergolesi's "Stabat mater," for chorus and modern orchestra, is by Alexis Fowow.

Periculi, Indus, a rude and savage tribe, of unknown linguistic affinity, formerly occupying the extreme southern end of the island of Madagascar. With the neighbouring and allied tribe, the Cora, they numbered originally about 4000 souls. In general habit they closely resembled the Guierei (q. v.) as described by Baergt, but exceeded them in intractable savagery, being in chronic hostility, not only with the Spaniards, but with most of the other tribes of the adjacent region. In 1760 their town of Toratana was captured and Ugarte founded among them the mission of Nuestra Señora del Pilar, at La Paz, followed in a few years by several other Jesuit establishments. In 1734 under the leadership of two chiefs of negro origin, the two tribes revolted against the strictures of the missionaries upon polygamy and other immoralties, butchered Fathers Carranco and Tumalal, with a number of the mission followers, and plundered and burned the missions of Santiago, San José, Santa Rosa, and La Paz. For some time there was danger of an outbreak throughout the whole peninsula, but order was restored and mission work resumed. From 1742 to 1748, a series of epidemic visitations, probably smallpox, reduced them to one-sixth of their former number, and two of the four missions were abandoned. In 1769 another pestilential visitation wasted their numbers and provoked another outbreak, which was suppressed by Governor Gonzalez in person. By 1772 less than 400 remained alive and these were hopelessly dispersed from contact with the pearl fishers and Spanish soldiers, and those who were continued at San José and La Paz (Todas Santos) under Franciscan and Dominican auspices into the last century, but the tribe is long since extinct.

Périgueux, Diocese of (Petrocoricensis), comprises the Department of Dordogne and is suffragan to the Archbishopric of Bordeaux. By the Concordat of 1801, the Dioceses of Périgueux and Sarlat were united to the See of Angoulême; in 1821 Périgueux was again the seat of an archbishop which united the former Dioceses of Périgueux and Sarlat, excepting 60 parishes given to Agon and Angoulême and 49 parishes which had once belonged to Limoges, Cahors, and Tulle.

The Martyrology of Ado gives St. Front as the first Bishop of Périgueux; St. Peter is said to have sent him to this town with the St. George to whom later tradition assigns the foundation of the church of Le Puy (q. v.). Subsequent biographies, which appeared between the tenth and thirteenth centuries, make St. Front's life one with that of St. Front of Nîmes, thereby giving it an Egyptian colouring. At all events we know by the Chronicle of Subucipit Severus that a Bishop of Périgueux, Paternus, was deposited for heresy about 361. Among the bishops are: Raymond V. Cardinal of Pons (1220-1223); the future cardinal, Blessed Elie de Bourdiches (1147-1148); Claude de Longwy, Cardinal of Girvy (1540-1547); the future Cardinal Goussot (1536-1540), subsequently Archbishop of Reims.

The Abbey of Saint-Sauveur of Sarlat, later placed under the patronage of St. Sacerdos, Bishop of Limoges, seems to have existed before the reigns of Pepin the Short and Charlemagne who came there in pilgrimage and because of their munificence deserves to be called “founders” in a Bull of Eugene III (1153). About 938 St. Odo, Abbot of Cluny, was sent to reform the abbey. The abbey was made an episcopal see by John XXII, the founder of the Order of the Friars Minor in 1318.

Amoung the bishops of Sarlat were Cardinal Nicolas de Gachet (1555-1546) and the preacher Jean de Lingendes (1629-1650).

Venosa (subsequently Périgueux) was in the fifth century the site of an important school; it had distinguished professors: Paulinus the rhetorician; his son Paulinus the poet, who wrote (between 405 and 470) a poem on the life of St. Martin and another poem on the miraculous cure of his grandson by St. Martin; two named Anthelius; and Lupus, poet, rhetorician, and mathematician. Two provincial synods of Bordeaux were held at Périgueux in 1308 and 1356.

The history of the church of St. Front of Périgueux gave rise to numerous discussions between archeologists. Félix de Verneuil claims that St. Front was a copy of St. Mark's (Venice); Quichelet, that it was copied from the church of the Holy Apostles of Constantinople. M. Brutails is of opinion that if St. Front reveals an imitation of Oriental art, the construction differs altogether from Byzantine methods. The dates 984-1047, often given for the erection of St. Front, he considers too early; he thinks that the present church of St. Front was built about 1120-1173, in imitation of a foreign monument by a native local school of architecture which erected the other ruined buildings in the south-west of France.

St. Vincent de Paul was ordained priest 23 Sept., 1600, by Bourdeilles, Bishop of Périgueux. François (q. v.), born in the Diocese of Sarlat, was titular of the priory of Carinac which his uncle François de Salignac, Bishop of Sarlat, had given him. The Church of Périgueux is the only one in France to celebrate the feast of Charlemagne (28 Jan.). This Church has a special veneration for Saints Silanus, Severians, Severians, and Frontasius, martyrs, disciples of St. Front; St. Mundana, martyr, mother of St. Sacerdos, Bishop of Limoges (sixth century); the Benedictine St. Cyprian, Abbot of the Périgueux monastery (sixth century); St. Sour (Sorus), a hermit who died about 580, founder of the priory of Terrasson. The Carmelite monk St. Peter Thomas (1305-1366), a native of Safles in the Diocese and Patriarch of Constantinople, died in Cyprus during the crusade which for a short time gave Alexandria to the Christians.

The Diocese of Périgueux has a remarkable relic: Pierre Raoul or Gérard, a parish priest in Périgord, brought back after the first crusade the Holy Shroud of Christ, entrusted to him by a dying eclesiastic of Le Puy, who himself obtained this relic from the legate Adhémar de Monteill. The Cistercians who founded the monastery of Cadouin in 1115 had a church erected in honour of this relic; its cloister, a marvel of art, was consecrated in 1154. According to the strict rules of the order interdicting the use of gold vases, the Chapter of Citeaux permitted a gold reliquary for the Holy Shroud. As early as 1140, the Holy See instituted a confraternity in honour of the Holy Shroud, thought to be the oldest in France. St. Louis in 1270 venerated the Holy Shroud at Cadouin; Charles VI had it exposed for one month in Paris; Louis XI found at Cadouin in 1482 a daily Mass. Bishop Lingendes in 1141 held an official investigation which asserted the authenticity of the relic. The other chief places of pilgrimage are: at Belvès, a shrine of Notre-Dame de Capelou, mentioned in 1153 in a Bull of Eugene III; Notre-Dame du Grand Pouvoir at Périgueux, dating back to 1673; Notre-Dame des Vertus, dating Periodical Literature, Catholic.—The invention of printing, besides excreting a great influence or literature in general and on education, gave birth to a new species of literature: publications appearing at intervals either regular or irregular. These sheets, or broadsides, in which religious and political events, can be traced back to the year 1493. The oldest existing broadsides were published in Germany, the earliest Italian periodicals were the "Notizie scritte" of Florence, which were called "Gazzetta" from the coin paid for reading them. These early precursors of the modern newspaper were of course very rudimentary, and without any set form or scheme. From the first, however, religious interests found an echo in them. The broadsides were later succeeded by the "relations" and the title of the Jesuit "inoculation," which has become almost a household word in American history, shows how early the Church authorities appreciated the position of this noble auxiliary periodical. In the present article the reader will find not only a history of Catholic periodical literature in the most prominent countries of the western world, but also an account of its present status.

Our article treats of periodical literature whether annual, weekly, semi-weekly, monthly, quarterly, or annually. It includes not merely the political newspaper, of which the American daily is the most characteristic specimen, but also the weekly, of which the London "Tablet" and the New York "America" may serve as types; the monthly, dealing mostly with historical, scientific, religious, and literary subjects, for which the "American Monthly Review" may be cited as examples; the quarterly, of which there are two kinds, the one being more general in character, the other treating of special sciences and interests. Of the former class the "Dublin Review" may be adduced as an instance; of the latter there is a great variety extending from such publications as the "Revue des Questions Scientifiques" to the special reviews on dogmatic and moral theology, canon law, the history of religious orders, and even hagiography, like the "Analecta Bollandiana." It will be perceived at once that many periodicals are directed only to a very limited public and that in their case the circulation of 500 may be evidence of great merit and influence, though the number of their subscribers is small compared with the thousands of patrons of which our dailies and some of our magazines can boast.

In order to enable the reader to appreciate justly the information laid before him below, we submit the following general remarks:—(1) Prior to the middle of the eighteenth century and in fact almost up to the time of the French Revolution, all the periodicals published in a country reflected the spirit of the religion dominant in that country; in other words, in Catholic countries they were animated by the Catholic spirit and may be regarded as a part of Catholic literature.

(2) Even in the eighteenth century, and especially during its first half, the Press of the various countries of the western world largely represented the feelings and ideas of the majority of their inhabitants. Thus at the present time, the Spanish journals are largely written from the Catholic point of view. (3) The daily journals of continental Europe still differ markedly from the typical American daily. The latter aims above all at gathering and printing the political, social, including criminal and economical, news of the day, while art, literature, and religion occupy a secondary rank and the editors have grown gradually less important. In continental Europe, editorial articles, feuilletons, and varied essays often fill much more space than telegraphic and other news. This state of things accounts for the fact that the continental European Press is characterized by much greater animosity to the Church and why Catholic dailies are more easily established and supported in some of the European countries. (4) The European weekly Press hardly makes any effort to publish anything of a temporary nature, and never can be regarded as simply an effort to publish themselves for the most part to the discussion of topics, either purely religious or involving ecclesiastical interests.

The following articles have been written by men specially well-informed on the Press of their several countries, deserving of every confidence.

AUSTRIA.—The Catholic Press is represented in Austria by 110 newspapers and 152 other periodicals. Of the former, 79 are in German; 22 in the Czech, or Bohemian, language; 16 in Polish; 3 in Russian; 8 in Slovenian; 5 in Croatian; 7 in Italian. The 79 German newspapers are distributed as follows: Austria, 22; Upper Austria, 12; Salzburg, 3; Styria, 6; Tyrol, 13; Vorarlberg, 3; Bohemia, 9; Moravia, 5; Silesia, 1; Carinthia, 4; Carniola, 1. Of the Czech newspapers, 12 are published in Bohemia, 10 in Moravia; the Polish are published in Silesia (4), Galicia (11), and Bukowina (1); the Russian are all published in Galicia; the Slovenian, 1 in Carinthia, 4 in Carniola, 2 in Gorz, and 1 in Istria; the Croatian, 4 in Dalmatia and 1 in Istria; the Italian, 3 in the Tyrol, 2 in Gorz, and 2 in Istria. The other periodicals are distributed as follows: Lower Austria, 33; Upper Austria, 8; Salzburg, 5; Styria, 7; the Tyrol, 11; Vorarlberg, 4; Bohemia, 31; Moravia, 18; Silesia, 5; Galicia, 1; Bukowina, 1; Carinthia, 1; Carniola, 11; Gorz and Gradisca, 1; Istria, including Triest, 5; Dalmatia, 1.

follows: Lower Austria, 4, of which 2 appear twice daily. Of these the "Reichszeit" (Dr. Fundor, editor-in-chief) is issued twice daily, and prints 10,000 copies to each edition; "Vaterland" (P. Siebert, editor-in-chief), two editions daily of 2500 copies each; "Neugnoits-Weltblatt", August Kirsch, owner, 5000 copies to each edition; "Neue Zeitung", 30,000 copies to each edition. All these papers are published at Vienna. Upper Austria has the "Linzner Volksblatt", 4500 copies to each edition; in Salzburg, the "Salzburger Chronik", 3500 copies; in Styria, the "Grazer Volksblatt", 8500 copies; the "Kleine Zeitung", 26,000 copies to each edition, the last two published at Graz. In the Tyrol 3 daily papers are published; at Innsbruck the "Allgemeinen Tiroler Anzeiger", with an edition of 3000 copies, and the "Tiroler Zeitung" of 2000 copies, with an edition of 1500 copies; at Trent, the Italian "Trentino", with an edition of 5000 copies. At Bregenz in Vorarlberg is published the "Vorarlberger Volksblatt", with an edition of 3500 copies. Bohemia has only one daily in the Czech language, the "Czech" of Prague, with an edition of 8500 copies; in Moravia, the Czech "Hlas" is published at Brno, 2000 copies to an edition. Polish papers are the "Czas", published at Lemberg, 5000 copies twice daily; the "Gazeta Lwowska", 2000 copies to an edition; the "Gazeta Narodowa", published at Lemberg, 4500 copies; the "Glos narodu", published at Cracow, 8500 copies twice daily; two other papers at Lemberg, the "Rutyn-Zeitung", with an edition of 2000 copies, and the "Rutyn-Zeitung", with each 5000 copies to an edition. At Klagenfurt in Carinthia is published the "Karntner Tagblatt", edition of 2000 copies; at Laibach in Carniola, the Slovenian "Slovenec", edition of 3700 copies; at Triest, the Italian "Giornale". In Dalmatia the "Hrvatska kruna" is published in Croatian, with an edition of 8000 copies.

The local press, weekly and monthly, is very large; this is especially the case in the Alpine provinces and northern Bohemia. The learned periodicals show work of high quality. Among them should be mentioned: the "Kultur", published at Vienna by the Leo-Geisselwerk, and the "Allgemeines Literaturblatt", also the "Correspondentblatt fuer den Clerus", edition of 7000 copies, the "Theologischpraktische Quartschrift", published at Linz, edition of 12000 copies; "Anthropos" at Salzburg, "Christliche Kunstblatter" at Linz, "Kunstfreund" at Inn-bruck, "Immgerman" at Warnsdorf, "Vlast" at Prague. As regards illustrated family periodicals the non-Catholic Press is far behind the Catholic.

The actual condition of the Catholic Press in Austria is far from satisfactory, though by no means hopeless. Its defects are fully recognized by those who are best able to remedy them. The daily papers, in particular, suffer from the lack of funds. There is no wealthy Catholic middle class, the prosperous city population being to a great extent (politically at least) anti-Catholic, while most of the zealous Catholics are found among the rural population, who, in Austria, care little for newspapers. This state of things renders Catholic journalism an uninviting field for business investment, and the dearth of capital employed in Catholic journalism as business enterprise is only inadequately supplied by donations from the nobility and clergy, who have neither the inclination nor the experience to secure an advantageous employment of the funds subscribed by them. Subsisting on these slender contributions by supporters of the party, the Catholic papers are unable to make any effort for their own improvement or for a larger circulation by advertising; they are party institutions, not business enterprises, and have to be satisfied with keeping their expenditures down to the limits of the party contributions. At the same time, the conduct of the papers is in the hands of persons who, besides having no pecuniary interest in pushing them as enterprises, generally lack journalistic training. This technical inferiority, in itself, affects the whole working value of the Austrian Catholic Press through the influence of contributors, as well as of editors, being considerably below the standard of the Liberal Press, the best talent of the country avoids Catholic journalism and confines itself in the service of the opposition. Lastly, its financial weakness places the Catholic Press at a disadvantage in the regard to the supply of the scientific matter and foreign news, both of which are abundantly commanded by the affluent Liberal Press.

These enormous difficulties are to some extent counteracted, it is true, by Catholic zeal and self-sacrifice, but the strain of ceaseless effort necessarily results in a lack of effective force. External difficulties aggravated by the general economic depression of public affairs by a Liberal Press lasted so long that the whole reading public, good Catholics included, became habituated to it, and this acquiescence in a wrong state of things resulted in intellectual inertia. Only in the first decade of the present century did the more practically Catholic elements begin to realize that those aristocratic-conservative influences which are popularly regarded as reactionary are not necessarily the most favourable to Catholic interests. The Christian-Socialist popular party has taken up the Catholic programme and opened a way for it among the masses; a spirited agitation resulted in diminishing the political power of the Liberal Press; but, in spite of all this, the Catholic Press has been accustomed to the style of Liberal journalism, find Catholic periodicals lacking in piquancy.

One more external difficulty with which Catholic periodical literature in Austria—in contrast to the conditions of United Germany—has to contend, is the multiplicity of races and languages among the population of the empire. These national rivals are not always held in check by the profession of a common faith. The Catholics of each race insist upon maintaining distinct Catholic periodicals in their respective languages; hence a large number of periodicals each with a circulation far too small to ensure success. This difficulty has recently increased rather than diminished. The "Vaterland", e.g., a Vienna periodical, formerly read by Catholics throughout the Austrian crown lands, irrespective of their own national languages, has now had its circulation curtailed through this cause. And in general it may be said that no Catholic paper in Austria can count upon a circulation among all Catholics under the Austrian Crown; separate Press has to be organized for the Catholics of each language.

The result of all these internal and external difficulties is the present embattled position of the Catholic Press of Austria. Attempts have been made, with the best intentions, at various times, by individuals, corporate bodies, and congresses; all, however, have failed of lasting success, because they lacked system and organization. It is greatly to the credit of some that this defect was finally recognized, and an effort made to correct it, by the Pius-Verein. As attempts to obtain money for the Press from the few rich have failed, a constant appeal is made to the great mass of people of small means, and large sums are thus collected. In this way the question of means is to be settled. By constant agitation, or by frequent meetings, local groups, and confidential agents, the apathy of the people is to be ended.

Although the condition, taken as a whole, of the Catholic Press in Austria is not so poor as is still the case in the provinces of late years and are still making with ever-increasing zeal, at the present time, justify the hope that the apathy of large sections of the reading public may be overcome, an appreciation aroused of the importance of a Press that is honourable and steadfast in the Faith. Only when this is attained will the sacrifices in money and labour that have been made for many years for the sake of the Catholic Press bear fruit, and a powerful press will be the strongest protection against the opponents of the Church in Austria.

BELGIUM.—Historical Outline of the Press in Belgium.—Periodical literature in Belgium may be traced back to 1005, when the Archduke and Archduchess Albert and Isabella granted Abraham Verhoeven of Antwerp the privilege of publishing his newspaper "Nieuwe Tijdingen." But it is in the Dutch period of Belgian history that Catholic literature was particularly advanced. At that time appeared the "Spectateur Belge" of Father de Foere, which several times provoked the anger of William I; the "Concour de la Meuse", founded at Liège in 1820 by Kersten; the "Catholiche des Pays-Bas" and the "Vaderland", both founded at Ghent by de Ney; the "Politique Gand", the "Noord-Brabander", all showing remarkable zeal in defending the Catholic Church at a time when Catholic journalists were threatened with imprisonment. A few years after the establishment of Belgian independence the "Concour de la Meuse" was transferred from Liège to Brussels, and took the name of "Journal des Bruxelles". Long afterwards under the editorship of the Baron Prosper de Haulleville (d. 1899) it became the leading Catholic organ; but now it has lost its prominence.

Causes which stopped its Development.—The Revolution of 1830 brought Belgium the liberty of the press. The majority of the population and of the National Congress were Catholics, but the Catholic Press from 1830 to 1874 improved very slowly. The first cause of this was the disagreement between the Catholics and the Catholic Liberals; the next was the neglect of the old and the establishment of new publications. Among the new publications were the "Le nouveau conservateur belge", weekly and literary journal, founded in 1830 and discontinued in 1857; the "Messenger des sciences historiques et des arts de la Belgique", founded in 1833 and discontinued in 1860; the "Revue Belge" of 1854, which lasted only a few years; the "Revue catholique de Louvain", devoted to religious controversy, history, and apologues; from 1863 till 1881 it counted among its contributors the foremost professors of the University of Louvain. Another obstacle to the growth of the Catholic Press is the fact that the people of Belgium consist of two races with different languages, customs, and habits. Also the competition of French journals injured the growth of the Belgian press. French periodicals and newspapers were brought into the country at the same time as in Paris. Besides their intrinsic merits, they have the advantage of being fashionable. Moreover, many Belgian writers have contributed to French periodicals. As an instance we may name the "Mélanges théologiques", a review of moral theology and canon law founded by a society of Belgian eclesiastics at Brussels in 1847. This magazine removed to Paris in 1856, where it was styled "Revue Théologique", and was conducted by a committee of French and Belgian priests. In 1861 it settled at Louvain, and there continued many years.

Present State.—About the middle of the last century, the religious question became prominent in Belgium. Catholics felt the need of a vigorous defence against irreligion and Freemasonry. New life was infused into the Catholic Press and to-day its condition is more satisfactory.

(1) Dailies.—Out of a total of 86 political daily papers 38 are Catholic. In consequence of the constitutional equality all the important towns, even the suburbs of Brussels, have their local daily papers. Bruges has "La Patrie"; Charleroi, "Le Pays Walloon", a democratic journal of wide and vigorous efficiency; Liège, the "Gazette de Liège", which under editorship of Denmarck (1909) has reached a larger circulation than all the other Liège newspapers together. The "Bien Public", founded at Ghent in 1853 by Senator Lammens, Count de Hemptine, and others, circulates in all the provinces of Belgium, especially among the clergy. Its chief editor, Count Keverwynne, who just past sixty years as a journalist, has secured for it a well-deserved reputation on thoroughly Catholic lines. The most influential Catholic journal in Belgium is the "Patriote", founded in Brussels in 1883 by M. Jourdain, which with its local issue the "National" has a circulation of 180,000. Its bold and skilful attacks brought about the downfall of the Liberal Government in 1884. The "XXe Siècle", founded also in Brussels by the late Duke d'Ursel, the present minister Helleputte, de Broqueville, and others, is more democratic. In Brussels also is published "Het Nieuws van den Dag", the most popular newspaper among the Flemings.

(2) Weeklies.—Of the 1200 Belgian weeklies, the Catholics certainly control more than one-half. Each important locality has its political and illustrated weeklies. Many parishes have their "Bulletin paroissial". Each diocese publishes its "Sema". In Mechlin the organ of the archbishopric, which is styled "Le Moniteur de la province", receives contributions from Cardinal Mercier.

(3) Reviews and Magazines.—About a thousand reviews and magazines are published in Belgium, many of them by Catholics.

(a) Theology and Religion.—The "Revue théologique" mentioned above was replaced in 1867 by the "Nouvelle revue théologique", edited by Father Besson. Besides this small but useful review, about 150 periodicals of various descriptions treat of theology, apologetics, missions, special devotions etc. The Jesuits have their "Missions belges de la Compagnie de Jésus", a well-illustrated monthly magazine, which in 1899 took the place of the old "Précédits historiques" founded by Father Terwecore. The Fathers of Scheut (near Brussels) have their "Missions en Chine, au Congo et aux Philippines". Other religious congregations and some large monasteries issue reports of their pious works, or reviews of poetry, of liturgy, of hagiography, etc.

(b) Scientific Reviews.—The Catholic standard scientific review is the "Revue des questions scientifiques", a large quarterly which is joined by a smaller one of a more technical character. Both were founded in 1877 by Father Carbonnelle, S.J., and a Franco-Belgian committee of prominent Catholic scientists. It was then denoted by the motto " Nulla dissensio esse potest" (Conc. Vatican). Found a practical confirmation in the sound scientific character of the whole series. The present editors are Prof. Manson and Father Thirion. The "Revue néo-scolastique" was founded in 1894 by Cardinal Mercier, while directing his Institut de philosophic thomiste at Louvain, with which it is closely connected (quarterly; present editor, Prof. de Wulf). With the same institute is connected the "Revue catholique de droit", of Prof. Crahay of Liège, and the "Revue sociale catholique", of Mgr Deploge, Prof. Thierry, Prof. Deourain, and others. At Louvain also appear some special scientific reviews, such as the "Revue médicale" and the celebrated magazine of cytology entitled "La Cellule" of the late Canon Carnoy (present editor, Prof. Gilson). Also some philosophical reviews: "Le Musée" of the late Mgr de Harleze, continued by Prof. Colinet, Prof. Lefort, and others; "Le Musée belge" of Prof. Collard and Prof. Wauters (the latter of the Liège University), of Mgr de la Bigotte, and others (for Dutch philology), edited by Prof. Colinet, Leconte, and others. There is also the Belgian law review, "Revue pratique des sociétés civiles", founded by Prof. Nyssens, Minister of Labour, and continued by Prof. Corbijn. Outside of Louvain, we notice "Mathesis" (Prof. Mansion of Ghent); the "Courrier littéraire et mathématique", edited by Prof. H. Gehin and the present writer as a guide for preparing for public examinations.

9. Historical Reviews.—The largest is the important "Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique", a quarterly founded in 1900 by Canon Cauchie and Canon Ladeuze, now Mgr. Ladeuze, Rector of Louvain University. Others are: the "Revue bénédictine", which in 1895 took the place of the "Messager des frères", edited since 1881 by the Benedictine Abbey of Marcelsous by Dom Gerard van Caloen; the "Archives Belges" (Prof. G. Kurth, at Liège, since 1899); the "Analectes pour servir à l'histoire de l'Ordre de Prémontré", edited at the Park Abbey (Louvain) by Father van Waefleghem. Mention should also be made of the "Analecta Bollandiana" (see Bollandists).

10. Literature.—The "Revues littéraire", of M. Ch. Woeste, makes it the vehicle of his political views. M. Eng. Gilbert regularly contributes to it a most valuable literary chronicle. With this magazine we may mention the "Dietsche Warnade en Belfort". Other Catholic literary reviews are: "Le Magasin Littéraire", of Ghent; "La Latte" and "Le Journal du 18e siècle", a paper which has long been published for Catholic art, but have been succeeded by younger magazines such as "Durandal", a monthly illustrated review edited by Abbé Moeller, "Le Catholic", and "La Revue Jeune".

(e) Art Reviews.—Most of these literary reviews touch upon art questions, but there are also "Revue de l'art chrétien", a review of medieval archaeology; the "Gazette des Beiges" and "Monumenta" which aims at promoting the use of sound music in Church services; "Le Bulletin de la Société d'art et d'histoire du diocèse de Liège", of which Mgr. Rutten, now Bishop of Liège, was the president for a long time; "Le Bulletin des métiers d'art", which serves as the organ of the "L'Institute des beiges", founded by Brother Marie for teaching the technical arts on Christian principles. CANADA.—Under the French domination, periodical literature, still in its infancy in France even as late as the close of the eighteenth century, was totally unknown in Canada. The first newspapers founded in the colony, the "Quebec Gazette" (1764) and the "Montreal Gazette" (1775), both weeklies with a double-column page alternately in English and in French, without being professedly Catholic, were not unfriendly towards the Church.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC, OR LOWER CANADA.—The first periodical which was "Canadian", founded in Quebec (1856) by Pierre Bélard. Although essentially political and patriotic, nevertheless by its vindication of religious as well as civil liberty, and owing to the unexceptionable Catholicism of the French Canadian population whose interests it represented, "Le Canadien" may safely be styled a Catholic organ. This same principle applies to the greater number of French papers published in Canada. After a series of suppressions and interruptions, "Le Canadien" (first weekly, then daily) lasted for over fifty more years, during a long period of which its chief editor was St. Jean Parent, whose valiant pen ably defended the rights of his fellow-citizens and helped to maintain the conduct of a widely read and influential newspaper.

Next in order of importance, if not of date, follows "La Minerve" (first weekly, then daily), founded in Montreal (1826) by Augustin-Norbert Morin. It had a career of seventy years, and numbered among its ablest editors Antoine Ginier-Lajoie, Raphael Bellemare, and Joseph Fasé. The chief organ of the English-speaking Catholics was the "True Witness" (weekly), founded in Montreal (1850) by George E. Clerk, a convert from Anglicanism, who lovingly and generously served the cause of the True Faith during his prolonged editorship. The "True Witness" had been preceded by the short-lived "Irish Vindicator" of Montreal (1829), and still exists under the title "The Montreal Witness".

In 1857 was founded in Quebec, "Le Courrier du Canada" (first weekly, then daily). It had an honourable and fruitful career of forty-five years under the leadership of such learned, vigorous, and elegant writers and uncompromising Catholics as Doctor Joseph Charles Tache, Auguste-Eugène Aubry, and Thomas Chapais. Montreal gave birth to two entirely Catholic daily papers: "Le Nouveau-Monde" (1867–81) with the Honourable Alphonse Desjardins as chief editor, and "L'Étendard" (1883–) under the direction of the Honourable Senator Anselme Trudeau. A weekly, "Les Mélanges Religieux", founded in Montreal (1839) by Reverend J. C. Prince, lasted till 1902 and was the Catholic "La Province" of the province. Both were published in Montreal for fourteen years (1870–83) counted many brilliant littéraires among its contributors. Most noteworthy among the monthlies are, in order of date, "Le Journal de l'Instruction Publique", founded in Montreal (1857) by the Honourable Pierre-J.-O. Chauveau, a distinguished orator and writer; "Le Courrier des Canadiennes", founded in Quebec (1878); "Les Soirées Canadiennes". Quebec (1865–5); "Le Foyer Canadien", Quebec (1863–6); "La Revue Canadienne", Montreal (1864), still flourishing under the direction of the Montreal branch of the University of Laval, "Le Canada Français", semi-monthly, edited by the parent University of Quebec (1864). These five reviews form a collection replete with the best productions of French Canadian literature.

For divers reasons, the Catholic Press in Lower Canada, in fact throughout the whole Dominion, with the exception of a few short-lived ventures, cannot boast of a daily newspaper published in the English language, although "The Montreal Star", the first English daily, appeared in Montreal in 1864. The only French daily newspaper of the English-speaking Catholics is the above mentioned "Tribune" (weekly). Of the existing French Catholic dailies, "L'Action Sociale", founded in Quebec (1900) by Archbishop L.-N. Begin, is totally independent of politics, appreciating men and events from an exclusively Catholic and non-partisan viewpoint; it's chief editor was its chief editor until its cessation, in 1905, was Father of the Montreal Star. Another, "Le Devoir", advocating nationalism, founded in Montreal (1909) and directed by Henri Bourassa, has also a good circulation. The foremost weekly, still in existence, is "La Vérité", founded in Quebec in 1848 by Paul Duval, and directed from the first by Canadian Voillette. This paper, during the career of its founder, exerted a considerable influence on Catholic opinion, "Le Courrier de St-Iréninthe" (1853), "Le Journal de Waterloo" (1879), "Le Bien Public", Three-Rivers (1909), all weeklies still in operation, deserve a special mention for their soundness of judgment and truths submission to the guidance of the spiritual authority. Among the existing monthlies may be mentioned "Le Naturaliste Canadien", Quebec, founded by the Abbé Léon Provancher (1868), the only Catholic scientific review in Canada; "La Nouvelle-France", a high-class review with a comprehensive programme; "Le Bulletin de la France”, a biannual review of chiefly philological character, both founded in Quebec in 1902; "L’Enseignement Primaire", a pedagogical review, now in its thirty-second year, published in Quebec, and distributed by the Government to all the Catholic primary schools in the province, renders good service to the cause of elementary education. The outlook of the Catholic Press in the old French province seems very hopeful, thanks to the improvement of higher education, to the incitement of a more thorough Catholic spirit, and a more dutiful compliance with the direction enjoined by the Bishop in his last (1841) Address. The first Catholic paper published in Upper Canada was the "Catholic," founded and edited in Kingston (1830) by Rev. William Peter MacDonald, and published later in Hamilton (1841-44). In 1837 Toronto had its first Catholic organ, "The Mirror," which lasted till 1862. It was followed in 1846 by "The Extension," edited by H. H. Burke, (1846-63), under the editorship of J. J. Mallon and James G. Moylan; "The Irish Canadian," established by Patrick Boyle (1863-92; 1900-01); "The Tribune" (1874-85), with the Hon. Timothy Warren Anglin for its latest editor; "The Catholic Record," London (1878), is by far the most flourishing Catholic weekly in Canada, with its circulation of 27,000. Toronto likewise claims the following noteworthy Catholic periodicals: "The Catholic Weekly Review" (1877-93); its editors were successively F. W. G. Fitzgerald, H. F. McIntosh, P. DeGruchy, Revs. F. W. Flannery and J. D. McBride; in 1883 it was merged into the "Catholic Register," whose editors were, in order of date, Rev. J. P. Walsh, Rev. F. E. S. Reilly, and Rev. J. M. Cronin. In 1908, under the title of "Register-Ex tension," it became the organ of the Catholic Church Extension Society, under the editorship of Rev. A. E. Burke, D.D.

MARITIME PROVINCES.—New Scotia.—Though Halifax can boast of the first newspaper in Canada, now including the Maritime Provinces (the "Royal Gazette," 1752), the first Catholic periodical, "The Cross," was founded only in 1845, by the future Archbishop W. Walsh, and lasted till 1857. By far the most important Catholic organ of the province is "The Casket" (weekly), of Antigonish, founded in 1852 and still in full activity. Its editorial chair was successively filled by the learned theologians, Doctors M. McGregor, N. McNeil, and Alex. McDonald, the two last named since appointed respectively to the Sees of Vancouver and Victoria, British Columbia. Sueelessness of doctrine and vigilance in denouncing contemporary errors are its chief characteristics. A French Canadian political paper, was founded in St. John, 1851, with Hon. T. W. Anglin as editor. He was succeeded by W. R. Reynolds. Under the name of "The New Freeman" since 1902, its character is exclusively Catholic. While strongly advocating temperance and total abstinance, it strives to enlighten non-Catholics and to foster vocations for the priesthood. French Acadian journalism is chiefly represented by "Le Moniteur Acadien," founded at Shediac (1866), and "L'Evangeli

Prince Edward Island.—The first Catholic paper of the island was the "Paladin" (1843-5). It was followed by "The Examiner" (1847-67), both edited by Edward Whelan. Then came, "The Vindicator" (1862-4), strictly non-political, to be succeeded by "The Charlottetown Herald," still in existence.

WEST PROVINCES.—Catholic journalism in the north-west begins in 1871 with "Le Metis", the organ of the half-breeds, under the editorship of Hon. J. J. de Vittot. "Le Manitoba," a gallant champion of the Catholic schools, founded by Hon. J. Bernier, and now edited by his son. The first Catholic paper in English was "The North-West Review," begun in 1885, long edited by Rev. L. Drummond, S.J., and still fighting the good fight. The German Catholics have also their organ, "West Canada", and the Poles their "Gazeta Katolicka." These three papers are issued by the same printing-house in Winnipeg, under the patronage of the present Archbishop (1901). A Roman Catholic periodical, a paper will shortly appear under the same auspices. "Le Patriote" began publication in 1910, at Duck Lake, Sask. Edmonton, Alta, has "Le Courrier de l'Ouest," and Vancouver, British Columbia, "The Western Catholic". England.—Not until the toleration acts of the early nineteenth century and the Catholic revival incident upon the emancipation of the French clergy, were English Catholics in any position to found a periodical literature of their own, though occasional pamphlets on various questions of Catholic interest had been issued. With the agitation over the Veto and Emancipation, a beginning was made with a monthly review, the pioneer Catholic publication of the kind, "Andrews' Orthodox Journal," first issued in 1812 by Eusebius Andrews, a Catholic printer and bookseller of London. It had but a few years of chequered existence, as there was not a sufficiently large reading public to make it self-supporting. The real beginnings of Catholic periodical literature were made more than twenty years later, by which time the Catholic Church in England had made considerable progress in the field of education, and the interest excited by the Tractarian movement had all combined to supply a wider circle of readers. A great step was taken by Wiseman and O'Connell in the foundation of a quarterly, the "Dublin Review" (1836). The fame of the "Edinburgh" suggested a territorial title, and Dublin was chosen as the seat of the Catholic periodical. From the first it was edited and published in London. The review was intended to provide a record of current thought for educated Catholics and at the same time to be an exponent of Catholic views to non-Catholic inquirers. Beginning before the first stirrings of the Oxford Movement, it presents a record of the intellectual life of the century and produced articles which had an immense influence upon the religious thoughts of the time. It was in the August of 1839 that an article by Wiseman on the Anglican Claim caught the attention of Newman. Impressed by the application of the words of St. Augustine, "serius judicat orbis veterum," he rejected and later, in the course of ecclesiastical history, he saw the theory of the "Via media" "absolutely pulverized" (Apologia, 116-7). It was a turning point for Newman and for the whole course of the Oxford Movement, and the incident is worth remembering as an example of the power of a good Catholic Press. Gradually the Tractarian controversy appeared in the lists of contributors: Ward (q. v.), Oakeley, Marshall, Morris, Christie, Formby, Capes, Allies (q. v.), Anderson (q. v.), Manning (q. v.), and a glance through the volumes of the "Dublin" will reveal names prominent in the great religious, scientific, and literary movements of the century. During the sixties and seventies it was under the vigorous direction of Dr. W. G. Ward. After his retirement it was edited by Dr. Hesley, afterwards Bishop of Newport, and then acquired by Cardinal Manning, who appointed Canon Moyes editor. It is now the property and under the direction of Mr. Wilfrid Ward, son of its famous editor.

The first issue of the annual "Catholic Directory" appeared in 1837. Owing to the Oxford Movement, the forties were a time of marked literary activity. In 1840 two new enterprises were inaugurated. Mr. Dolman, a Catholic publisher in London who had issued a number of really important books including the writings of Langard and Hussebeth, produced in "Dolman's Magazine" a high class literary monthly, and on 16 XI.—43
May, 1810, Frederick Lucas (q.v.) became the pioneer of the Catholic newspaper Press in England by publishing the first number of "The Tablet", a weekly newspaper and review. Lucas was a strong man, and regarded his work as a sacred mission. He threw into it all his zeal and energy, realizing the enormous possibilities for good of the religious Press when many were hopelessly blind to such considerations. His uncompromising views led to difficulties with his financial supporters, but he emerged triumphant. For awhile after the crisis of 1818, Lucas opened "The Tablet" office to Irish Catholics, and moved "The Tablet" office to Dublin, but it was brought back to London by the new proprietors, into whose hands it passed when failing health compelled Lucas to give up the editorship. It was not easy to replace such a man. He had not been content to chronicle events; he had influenced them. For many years after his death, in 1855, "The Tablet" was a mere humdrum record of news. Among the distinguished editors was Cardinal Vaughan (q.v.) who conducted the "Tablet" during the stormy discussions on Papal Infallibility and the Vatican Council. When he became Bishop of Salford, he placed the editorship in the hands of Mr. Ellis Ranken, who was succeeded in 1856 by the present editor. "The Tablet", besides championing the Catholic cause, assists in the propagation of the Faith in far-off lands, as under the terms of the trust created by the late Cardinal Vaughan its profits go to the support of St. Joseph's Missionary College, of which he was the founder.

Two other newspapers were founded in the fifties. "The Lamp" was a sixpenny paper, reduced to its present price, five pence, on the abolition of the newspaper stamp duty. Its price put it beyond the reach of tens of thousands of Catholic workers. To supply them with a penny magazine Mr. Bradley in 1846 founded "The Lamp". It gave much of its space to Catholic fiction, descriptive and historical, and, at the same time, occasional illustrations, a portrait or a picture of a new church; but it also supplied news and reported in full Wiseman's lectures and other notable Catholic utterances. For years it struggled with lack of capital, and for awhile Bradley edited his paper from his room in the debtors' prison at York. His name during that period became a byword for the eccentricity of the Catholic Press. The other paper, "The Rambler", of which the first issue appeared on 1 January, 1818, was intended to be a high class weekly review of literature, art, and science. In 1829, Lord Acton (q.v.), who had then just returned from the Continent, succeeded Newman in the editorship. The price, sixpence, limited its circulation. It became a quarterly under the title of "The Home and Foreign Review". In its last years this review, which had once done good service, was a source of trouble and disillusionment, but its sale, which dwindled yearly, was largely among Anglicans and other non-Catholics. In the mid years of the nineteenth century the abolition of the monopoly of newspapers and the cheapening of the processes of production led to the coming of the penny newspapers. The first Catholic penny paper with permanent success was "The London Universe". Its origin was connected with the earlier activity of Lucas, who successively advocated the introduction of the Conferences of St. Vincent de Paul into England. It was a group of members of the London Congregation who produced "The Universe". Speaking to their president, Mr. George Blount, one evening in 1809, Cardinal Wiseman, after alluding to the flood of calumny then pouring out in the Press against the Holy See, said: "Cannot the Society of St. Vincent de Paul do something to rescue these bemangled, by publishing truths, as M. Louis Veuillot is doing in Paris, by the "L'Univers"? We want a penny paper, and now that the tax has been removed it should be possible." It was decided that, though the society, as such, could not found a newspaper, a committee of its members should undertake the task. It included George Blount, Stuart Knill (afterwards the first Catholic Lord Mayor of London), Vincent Fielding (Lord Denbigh), Mr. Count Campden (Lord Gainsborough), Sidney Lescher, Archibald Dunn, Arthur Beckett, and George J. Wigley, the London correspondent of the Paris "Univers". Wigley secured a foreign news service for the projected paper from M. Veuillot's Paris office, and at his suggestion the name of the "Univers" was chosen. Mr. Denis Lane, who had returned from the.oc., Dunn the editorship, and on 8 December, 1860, the first Catholic penny paper in England was started. At first it was strictly non-political. The editor and staff gave their services gratuitously, but even with this help expenses were greater than receipts. To meet this loss the circulation political articles were inserted, which led to the resignation of the greater part of the staff. Mr. Lane then took over the paper and conducted it for many years as a Catholic paper, giving a general support to the Liberals and the Irish national cause. He had always a priest as "theological editor"; amongst those who thus assisted him were Fr. F. J. Smith, B.S.C., Mr. Lucas, V.E.S., and Cardinal Manning. The movement for the establishment of Catholic churches in Dublin emerged in "The Universe" office. It has lately celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, and has amalgamated with another paper, "The Catholic Weekly", founded to give a record of Catholic news without any party politics. The Universe has been noted in its pages for its literary columns. "The Lamp" was reorganized about the same time and had for some years a prosperous existence as a popular magazine. Fathers Rawes and Caswall, Lady Georgiana Fullerton, Miss Drane, Cecilia Caddell were among its contributors. In 1864 Miss Taylor founded "The Monthly"; at first an illustrated magazine giving news of the Church and Catholic literature, and a little later, the Catholic literature. When she founded her first community of nuns (Poor Servants of the Mother of God), her magazine passed to the Jesuits, and under the able editorship of the late Father Henry J. Cliderige, "The Monthly" became a high-class review. It had many notable contributors, and in its pages Newman's "Dream of Gerontius" first appeared. Numerically, the main strength of English Catholicism has always been in the North, and after the foundation of "The Universe" several efforts were made to produce a Catholic penny paper in Lancashire. Three successive enterprises had a brief career. A fourth, a paper known as "The Northern Press" was barely existing, when in 1878, it was taken over by a remarkable man, the late Father James Nugent of Liverpool, who named it "The Catholic Times" and gradually made it the most widely circulated Catholic paper in England. Printed for many years by the boys of the refuge he had founded in Liverpool, when it became a profit-earning paper it helped support this work of charity. Officiating editor in Manchester and Lon- don, A. and W. Antique Edition was underwritten by it, and in 1878 a Christmas supplement issued under the title of "The Catholic Fireside" was so successful that it was continued as a monthly penny magazine; in 1893 it was made a weekly publication. "The Catholic Times" appeals largely to the Catholics of Irish descent in Great Britain, and has always cherished a wide correspondence to reviews and literary matter, and has a well organized service of correspondents. Mr. P. L. Beasley, the present editor, has directed it for twenty-seven years and is now the dean of Catholic journalism.

In the sixties other papers were founded, for awhile fairly prosperous, though they never reached the elevated position held by "The Times", and "The Tablet". "The Weekly Register" was a threepenny paper, of much the same character as "The Tablet", "The Catholic Times" and "The Tablet" and "The Tablet" of the Catholic papers.
but favouring the Liberals and Nationalists. Later, under the editorship of Charles Kent and then of Mr. Wilfrid Meynell, it had a marked literary quality, but in England it is found that no paper is a permanent success at any price between the popular penny and the sixpence that gives a margin of profit on a moderate circulation. "The Weekly Register" has ceased to exist and with it "The Westminster Gazette", whose name is now that of a London evening paper. The "Westminster" was founded and edited by Pursell, afterwards biographer of Manning. During the months of newspaper controversy that preceded the formation of Papal Infallibility the "Westminster" was "non-opportunist", and Cardinal Vaughan, while he avoided all controversy on the subject in "The Tablet", contributed, week after week, letters to the "Westminster", combating its editorial views. It Weather, and Vaughan, and continued, with a few years later to end its competition by buying and stopping it. The late Father Lockhart edited for some years "Catholic Opinion", a penny paper giving extracts from the Catholic Press at home and abroad. After his death it was amalgamated with "The Catholic Times". A remarkable development in connection with the "Catholic Field" was initiated by Mr. Charles S. Diamond, for some time a member of the Irish Parliamentary party, who started (1881) "The Irish Tribune" in Newcastle-on-Tyne. Shortly after, he purchased two other Catholic papers, the Glasgow "Observer" and the Preston "Catholic News", which were in difficulties, and united and extended to the number of several papers from a common centre, much of the matter being common to all, but each appearing under a local title and having several columns of special matter of local interest. He now issues "The Catholic Herald" from London, as the centre of the organization, and thirty-two other local weekly Catholic newspapers in various parts of England, Wales, and Scotland. He also produces on the same system ten different parish magazines and "The Catholic Home Journal", with which the old "Lamp" has been amalgamated.

There are a considerable number of minor Catholic monthlies, mostly founded in recent years to advocate and promote special objects. The "Annals of the Propagation of the Faith" and "Illustrated Catholic Missions" specialize on the news of the mission field. "Catholic Book Notes", a monthly issued by the Catholic Truth Society and edited by Mr. James Britten, is an admirable record of current literature and a model of scholarly and thoroughly honest reviewing. "Catholic School and College" has for its Editor, is a record of the work of the Ransom League for the conversion of England. "The Crucible" is a monthly review of social work for Catholic women. There are a number of devotional magazines issued by various religious orders, the most widely circulated of which is the "Messenger of the Sacred Heart", edited by the Jesuits. There are also several college magazines, some of which produce work of a high literary standard. It might be a gain if there were more concentration and fewer publications with larger circulation. Many of these have a comparatively small circle of readers; even the most widely circulated Catholic publication in England has an issue that falls far below that of its more powerful non-Catholic competitors. The result is that the scale of pay in Catholic journalism is below the ordinary press standards, and many Catholic writers in working for the Catholic Press are making a continual sacrifice; but the standard of work produced has steadily risen, and the Catholic Press in England to-day, with all its deficiencies and imperfections, is doing some useful work and exercises an ever growing influence.

Restoration, and at the same time a large section of the Monarchist press was hostile to the Church. In his book on the "Congregation" M. Geoffroy de Grandmougin has drawn up a list of eighteen antieclerical articles published by the "Constitutionnel" in the single month of September, 1826.

Under the Monarchy of July the first noteworthy incident was the appearance of the "Avenir" (see LAMÉLIEUX). The Legitimist Press, of Catholic tendencies, offered a vigorous opposition to the Monarchy of July, the chief organs being the "Quotidienne" (see LAURENTIN) and the old "Gazette", of which the Abbé de Genarde was long the principal writer. Créuteau-Joly (q.v.) issued a provincial journal, the "Gazette du Bocage", and contributed to Catholic and Legitimist propaganda. The first really serious attempt at Catholic journalism belongs to this period.

On Sunday, 3 Nov., 1833, appeared the first number of the "Univers religieux, politique, scientifique et littéraire". Its motto was: "Unity in what is certain, liberty in what is doubtful, charity, truth, and impartiality in all". It was founded by the Abbé Alighe.Offsetting the "Aim de la Religion" and the "Journal des villes et des campagnes", which were of Gallican tendencies, the "Univers", with which the "Tribune", founded by Bailly, was soon merged, represented the most distinctly Roman tendency.

Montalbemont became associated with the "Univers", an official organ of the Church, in 1837, and the latter appeared as the "Ligue illustrée" in 1839. The "Univers", as the centre of the Catholic campaigns for liberty of instruction, assured a widespread circulation to the claims of the bishops and the speeches of Montalbemont and Laclaudie.

The "Opinion Publique", founded in 1845 by Alfred Nettement, was a Royalist Catholic journal, which was suppressed by the revolution of July, 1830, but under the direction of Barbey d'Aurevilly and Armand de Pontmartin.

In the same year, at the instance of Ozanam and the Abbé Maret, Laclaudie founded the "Ere Nouvelle", which within three months received 3200 subscriptions, chiefly among the younger clergy, but which did not last long.

Under the Second Empire several very serious discussions occupied the attention of the Catholic Press: viz., the use of the psalm classes in secondary studies (see GATME); the controversy aroused by the baptism of the Jewish child Mortara, of Bologna, who had been baptized during a serious illness by a Christian servant without the knowledge of his parents, and subsequently refused by Christianity, was taken up by the Pontifical Government; and the discussions concerning the Roman question. In the course of the discussions on the last-named topic the "Univers" was suppressed by an imperial decree of 29 Jan., 1860, as being guilty of having "compromised public order, the independence of the State, the authority and the dignity of religion".

It reappeared 13 April, 1867, and played a very important part during the years preceding the Vatican Council.

The "Français", founded 1 April, 1868, by Augustin Cochin and Mgr Dupanloup, received contributions from the Due de Broglie, M. Thureau-Dangin (at present permanent secretary of the French Academy), and the future minister of foreign affairs, and was constantly engaged in controversy with the "Univers".

The law of 29 July, 1881, definitely established the complete freedom of the press, and submitted to juries formed of simple citizens the political suits brought by officials against newspapers. The law of 1868 established absolute freedom of religion; but this law is seldom enforced. The characteristic fact of the history of the Press under the Third Republic is the development of five-centime journals, inaugurated as early as 1836 by the foundation of the "Presse" under the auspices of Emile de Girardin.

At the present time the two Catholic journals of Paris are the "Univers" and the "Croix". For the former, see France. The "Croix" is published by the Maison de la Bonne Presse, which originated in the foundation in 1873 of the "Pélerin", a bulletin of societies and an organ of pilgrimages, which in 1867 became an illustrated journal, amusing and sometimes satirical; its present circulation is 300,000. In 1880 a monthly review, the "Croix" was founded, which became a daily in June, 1883, after the second matrimonial crusade to the Holy Places organized by the Associationists. After the Associations Law the Maison de la Bonne Presse was purchased in 1900 by M. Paul Férart-Vrau; it employs a staff of about 600 persons. For its great journal, the "Croix", it has a throughout annual circulation of about 90,000 copies and nearly 50,000 promoters. It has more direct subscriptions than any Parisian journal, and its circulation places it fourth in rank. It costs one sou (five centimes), and since 1 Jan., 1907, has had six large pages. For purposes of propaganda there is a smaller paper issued daily, which is delivered in quantities to the clergy for 8 or 9 centimes weekly. The "Croix du Dimanche", appearing weekly, besides the news of the week, gives agricultural information in a supplement called the "Laborateur". The "Croix illustrée" has appeared since 24 Dec., 1900, and soon reached a circulation of 50,000 copies. The Ligue de l'Ave Maria, founded Oct., 1888, under the inspiration of Cardinal Mercier, publishes the "Maison de l'Ave Maria" and the "Journal bleu", since 1897, with a circulation of over 100,000. Its direct subscription price is only 25 centimes yearly, and a number of copies for propaganda may be secured for a half-centime per copy.

The Maison de la Bonne Presse also publishes the "Action Catholique" (founded 1899), a monthly religious review; the "Catholic Contrebandier" (founded 1895), weekly, founded 25 April, 1900, to give information concerning the movement of ideas in the Press; the "Conférences", a semi-monthly review which supplies accounts of conferences; the "Fascinateur", which gives notes on photographic slides and views for Catholic conferences; the "Cosmos", a popular scientific review, founded by the Abbé Moigno in 1822; the "Contemporains", founded in 1852, which each week gives the biography of some celebrated person; "Échos d'Orient", founded in 1896 and devoted to Oriental and Byzantine questions; "Questions Actuelles", a weekly, founded in 1887, which publishes all recent documents bearing on political and religious questions; the "Gazette de France" (founded 1850), a semi-monthly review, which studies religious questions from a legal standpoint; the "Moi Littéraire et Pittoresque", a popular review founded in 1899; the "Vies des Saints", founded in 1880; "Nôel", for children, founded in 1895; and two reviews devoted to the two capitals of Chris- tianity: "Rome" (founded Dec. 1908); and "Jérusal- em", founded July, 1904. In a single year 550,000 letters reach the Maison de la Bonne Presse.

Another Parisian Catholic daily is the "Démocratie", founded by M. Sangnier, former president of the "Sillon". The first number appeared a few days previous to the Eucalyptic of Puy X on the "Sillon" (Aug., 1910), and the publication has continued with the authority of Cardinal Merry del Val. The "Libre Parole", an anti-Semitic journal founded in 1891 by M. Edouard Drumont, has since 1910 been marked by a Catholic tendency owing to the collaboration of several members of the Association Catholique de la Jeunesse Francaise. At Saint-Maixent (Deux-Sévre) has been founded the "Maison du Siècle", which publishes parochial bulletins and almanacs. The circulation of the bulletins equals (1908) nearly 100,000 monthly copies for 300 parishes, that of yearly almanacs nearly 200,000 copies for more than 800 parishes.

By means of fourteen combinations the "Croix" of Paris is transformed into a local journal, partly general in character, but always retaining its title of the "Croix". Under the title of "Liberté pour tous", the Maison de la Bonne Presse-de-l'Ouest publishes a four-page journal; two pages forming the common section figure in all the local journals which wish to borrow them, but others, such as "L'Éclair de France" and "Grenoble, the "Journal d'Amiens", the "Express de l'Ouest" at Nantes, the "Éclair de l'État" at Nancy, and the "Éclair Contois" at Besançon.

The "Nouvellistes", which are journals with Royalist tendencies, are all Catholic. Bordeaux, Rennes, and Rouen have such publications. The best known is the "Nouvelliste de Lyon", noted for its political news. In the north the Catholics have numerous local journals; the Lille "Dépêche", the "Journal de Roubaix", and the "Croix du Nord" have together about 170,000 subscribers. The "Ouest-Éclair" has a wide circulation in Catholic Britain. The departments of the South have no Catholic journal capable of equal circulation. "L'Éclair du Midi", a radical antieutheical journal and one of the most powerful political organs in France. The organization of the "Presse pour tous", founded in 1903 by Mme Taine, widow of the celebrated philosopher, collects subscriptions for the distribution of good papers among study circles or shops having many customers.

The Catholics of France founded in 1905 the "Agence de la Presse nouvelle", a telegraphic agency for Catholic news. It supplied the news for 1908 to about one hundred papers. There is also a religious and social information-bureau, the object of which is to centralize the religious news of various countries, and which as early as 1868 had peripatets in forty-two dioceses. The most important French Catholic review is the "Correspondant", issued on the 10th and 25th of every month. It was at first (March, 1829) a semi-weekly paper. Its founders were Carne, Cazales, and Augustin de Meaux, and its motto was Canning's words: "Civil and religious liberty throughout the world!". Its first number was issued at the request of the clergy. During the Monarchy of July it underwent various vicissitudes. In 1833 Montalembert wished to build it up in order to offset the influence of "Vieille Voix" and the "Univers", and he secured the co-operation of Albert de Broglie, Falloux, and Duquesnay. Its frequent praise of English parliamentary institutions aroused the suspicions of the empire. The "Correspondant" was at one time with the "Univers" in defending the temporal power of the pope, and also felt at times the harshness of the imperial police. During the Vatican Council there was sharp conflict between the "Univers"; which was for infallibility, and the "Correspondant", which was for free inquiry. Under the Third Republic the "Correspondant" was successively edited by MM. Léon Lavedan, Etienne Lamaze, of the French Academy, and Etienne Trogau, and endeavoured to show, according to the terms of its programme of 1829, that Catholicism "still holds within its fruitful breast the wherewithal to till all the needs, wishes, and hopes of humanity". The "Bulletin de la Semaine", published since 1905, gives weekly a number of documents and articles of present interest on religious questions. Founded by M. Imbert de La Tour, this paper, while not concerning itself with dogmatic questions, recalls in certain respects, by the spirit of its contents, the tenor of the "Correspondant" during the pontificate of Pius IX.

In 1856 the Jesuits Charles Daniel and Jean Gagarin founded the "Études de théologie, de philosophie et d'histoire", with the aim of furthering Russia's return to the Catholic Church. This soon became a semi-monthly, dealing with all important religious questions and entitled "Etudes religieuses, historiques et littéraires, publiées par des Pères de la Compagnie de Jésus". Consequent on the decrees of 1858 against congregations it was suspended, but resumed publication in 1882. In 1887 MM. Gasq and Pichon founded the "Revue de la Jeunesse" (1887), published in Belgium. Since 1882 the Daily Catholic and weekly "Revue du Clergé et de l'Église" (1890) has been published. The "Revue de l'Église et de la Société" (1894) is issued at Besançon.

There are two Catholic philosophical reviews: the "Revue de Philosophie", founded in 1900 by M. Peillaube, in connexion with the school of philosophy which is striving for a compromise between Thomism and contemporary results in physiology and psychology; and the "Années de philosophie" (thirty-four volumes) founded in 1905 by Augustin Bonalet. The chief editors of the latter are MM. Laberthonnière and Maurice Blondel, and its motto the saying of St. Augustine: "Let us seek as those who would find, and find as those who would still seek."

The "Revue des Questions Historiques", founded in 1866, does great credit to Catholic learning. Its present editor is M. Jean Guiraud, professor at the University of Besançon. Since 1897 the French Benedictines who have emigrated to Belgium have created the "Revue Mabilion", an important review of Benedictine history. The "Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France" (Anecdota Gallica) was founded in 1910. The two chief reviews for the clergy are the "Amitiés religieuses", published at Langres since 1878, and the "Revue du Clergé Français", published at Paris since 1891. The "Revue pratique d'Apologistique", founded in 1905, is edited by Mgr Baudrillart, rector of the Paris Institut Catholique. A characteristic of recent years is the increasing number of periodicals published by various female Catholic sodalities and intended for Catholic women. One of the chief reviews of the Catholic social movement is the "Chronique sociale de France" (formerly "Chronique du Sud-Est"), the organ of the group which organized the Semaines sociales. A powerful movement of Catholic social journalism is the bulletin of the Action populaire organized at Reims (see France). The periodical yellow pamphlets issued by the Action Populaire between 1903 and 1911 have reached the number of 236. Besides its annual "Guides sociaux" it publishes a theoretical review of social studies, founded in 1876 by the organization of Catholic workers and the "Action Catholique", now called the "Mouvement social, revue catholique internationale". It issues a popular social review called the "Revue verte", or "Revue de l’Action populaire". Finally, the Action populaire publishes "Brochures périodiques d’Action religieuse", which are unquestionably the most interesting sources of information with regard to the undertakings of the Church of France since its separation from the State.

GERMANY.—The Catholic periodical press of Germany is a product of the nineteenth century. It is only within the last forty years that it has become important by its circulation and its ability. A number of Catholic journals are, however, much older.
The oldest, the “Augsburg Postzeitung,” was founded in 1655, and five others were established in the eighteenth century. Of those which were founded in the early part of the nineteenth century the most important is the “Westfälischer Merkur,” established at Münster in 1822, which at first, it is true, had a life of but five years. Until 1846, it was not very successful. In this reactionary period the severe censorship of the government authorities was a drawback to the Press in general; Catholic journals were viewed in an even less friendly spirit than the others. In Wiierburg and Breslau no Catholic journals were allowed to be published. Up to the third decade of the nineteenth century, on the other hand, the Catholics themselves seemed to be in a condition of intellectual torpor. For the most part, the clergy were under the influence of Protestantism and the prevailing philosophy of the times. Cultured society, the Catholic no less than the Protestant, was under the influence of the “all-embracing religion of humanity,” which diluted Christianity.

The “Theologische Zeitschrift” of Bamberg, edited by J. J. Batz and Father Brenner, may be regarded as the oldest periodical, but its existence lasted only from 1809 to 1814. It was followed by the “Katholische Literaturzeitung,” first edited by Father K. F. F. von Schmidt and Anton von Besnard (1810-36). The oldest of the periodicals still in existence is the “Tübinger Theologische Quartalschrift,” founded in 1819, which has always had a high reputation on account of its genuinely scholarly spirit. Among its editors have been Hirscher, Möller, Kohlweg, of Hildesheim; Kerz, and Schanz, names of the highest repute in the history of theology. In 1821 the “Katholik” was founded by Andreas Rass and Nikolaus Weis, afterwards Bishops of Strasbourg and Speyer respectively. The purpose was stated to be “to offer the necessary opposition to the attacks, partly open, partly concealed, against the Church, by orthodox articles on the doctrines and morals, Church history and liturgy, the training of children, devotional exercises by the people, and all that belongs to the Catholic Faith.” The chief collaborator in 1824-26 was the great publicist Joseph von Görres, but the responsible editors were G. Scheiblin and Fr. J. J. Liederkranz. In 1827, Weis agreed to devote the journal to the ideas of Franz Xaver Döring (1811—43); Franz Sansen (1811-49); Johann Baptist Heinrich and Christoph Monfog (1850-90); Michael Raich (1890-1906); Joseph Becker and Joseph Selbst (from 1907). Since the appearance of the new Scholasticism the “Katholik” has had its exponent.

The Catholic movement was greatly aided by the arrest in 1837 of the Archbishops of Cologne and Posen-Gnesen, von Droste-Vösching and von Dumin. Connected with this is the founding of the “Historisch-politische Blätter,” by Georg Phillips and Guido Görres in 1838. This periodical, condemned against false views of the state, and liberal, and the writing of history from a Protestant point of view. Distinguished publicists such as Joseph Görres, father of Guido, and the convicted jurist Karl Ernst Jarek collaborated on the journal and gained for it a lasting influence. Up to 1871 it was the most prominent journalistic organ of the Catholics. Its position is evidence of the greatness of German Catholicism, for the death of Görres (1872), the chief editor was Edmund Jorg; the assistant editor from 1858 up to Jorg’s death in 1901 was Franz Binder. From 1893 Binder and Georg Jeckner have shared the editorial responsibility. Other periodicals were only short-lived, as the Hermannsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie und katholische Theologie” that existed from 1833 to 1852; the “Jahrbiicher für Theologie und christliche Phi- losophie” (1831-47), edited by the theological faculty of Giessen; the “Zeitschrift für Theologie,” edited at Freiburg in 1839-49; the “Archiv für theologische Literatur,” edited by Dollinger, Hamburg, etc., from 1812 to 1843; the “Katholische Zeitschrift für Wissenschaft und Kunst,” edited by Dieringer and Rump, in 1846-56. The first number of “Deutsche Katholische Volkszeitung” (1847-49). In addition there were various church weeklies.

The year 1818 and the political and religious emancipations which it brought were of much importance for Catholic life and the Catholic press. The freedom granted the journals enabled them to express public opinion. From this time on each important periodical became the advocate of some definite political idea. Moreover, another result of 1818 was freedom of association, of which the Catholics at once made use to the largest possible extent. An increase in the circulation of the journals already existing and the founding of new ones was very materially aided by the Catholic societies. A rich Catholic life arose and came into public notice with unexpected power. Thus in the years directly succeeding 1848 a large number of new periodicals appeared. Among them were, to mention only the more important, the “Echo der Gegenwart” of Aachen; the “Rheinische Volksblatt” (1847-51), and the journals of the name “Deutsche Volksblatt,” which, however, appeared after 1848;

the “Mainzer Journal,” edited by Franz Sansen: the “Deutsches Volksblatt” of Stuttgart; the “Niederrheinische Volkszeitung” of Krefeld; in 1849 the “Westfälisches Volksblatt” of Paderborn; in 1852 the “Münsterische Anzeiger”; in 1853 the “Rheinischen Volksblatter” of Cologne; in 1853 the “Vaterländische Journal” of Kassel; in 1856 the “Bayrisher Kurier” of Munich. In addition the conference of bishops held at Würzburg (November, 1848) expressed the wish that there should be founded in all dioceses Sunday papers containing edifying and instructive matter. Of such journals the one that attained the most importance was the “Frankfurter Katholisches Kirchenblatt.” The most important journals during the fifth decade of the nineteenth century were the “Deutsche Volksblatt” of Cologne, the “Mainzer Journal,” and the “Deutsches Volksblatt.” The “Deutsche Volksblatt” was suppressed 19 July, 1855, because its attitude towards the Government had not been friendly. In place of the Volksblatt became the “Deutschland,” the “Deutschland” of Frankfort, founded in 1855 by the city parish priest and well-known writer, Beda Weber. After two years it ceased, not from lack of vitality, but on account of bad financial management. The “Kolnische Blätter,” issued from 1 April, 1860, by J. P. Bachem of Cologne, had a more fortunate fate. From 1 Jan., 1869, this well-edited paper bore the name of “Kölner Volkszeitung.” Further, during the sixties appeared the “Freiburger Bote” (1865); the “Frankische Volksblatt” of Würzburg (1867); the “Essener Volksblatt” (1868); the “Osnabrücker Volkszeitung” (1869); and the “Bayerische Volkszeitung” (1869).

In 1862 the “Literarischer Handwerker” was founded at Münster by Franz Hulsckamp and Hermann Rump, to give information concerning the latest literary publications. From 1876, after Rump’s death, Hulsckamp edited it alone; from 1901 it has been edited by Edmund Niesert. The “Chilianeum,” a general review for “learning, art, and life,” was founded in 1876 and edited by J. B. Stammer; the review had excellent collaborators, but lived only from 1862 to 1869. During the sixties there was also established the organ of the German Jesuits, the “Stimmen aus Maria-Laach,” which originally (from 1858) appeared at irregular intervals as pamphlets on burning questions of Catholic principles. It was called into existence by the storm against the Syllabus and the Encyclical of 8 Dec., 1864. From 1871 it has been issued regularly and has included within the scope of its observation all important questions and events. Its circle of collaborators includes the most noted German Jesuits, as Alexander Baumgartner (now deceased), Stephan Boessel, Viktor Catharsius, Maximilian Döhr, and, in the last years, Augustin Lehmkühl, Christian and Tilman Pesch, etc. In 1866 the excellent "Theologisches Literaturblatt" of Bonn was founded, but after 1870 it became an organ of the Old Catholics.

The "Kulturkampf" now broke out, which consolidated the Catholics, and impressed on them most peculiarly the press of their own. Now subsequently the larger number of Catholic periodicals have appeared from the seventies on. Simultaneously with the occurrence of the "Kulturkampf" was the founding of the Centre Party (Dec., 1870). Since then a Catholic paper and a paper that is the organ of the Centre Party are with very few exceptions identical. During the exciting years of the ecclesiastico-political struggle small papers particularly, such as the "Kaplanpresse" (curate's press), shot up like mushrooms. On 1 Jan., 1871 the "Germania" newspaper appeared at Berlin, as the new and most important organ of the Centre Party; it was founded as a company by members of the Catholic societies of Berlin and its environs, and its first president was the embassy councillor Friedrich Kehler (d. 1901). Up to 1878 Paul Majunke (d. 1890) wrote for it articles that were exceedingly sharp and contentious in tone. He was followed as editor up to 1881 by the learned and more moderate Dr. Adolf Franz, who was succeeded by Theodor Stahl, Dr. Eduard Marroux, and, from 1894, Hermann ten Brink. Besides the "Germania" and the "Kölische Volkszeitung", which latter has been edited from 1876 by Dr. Hermann Cardanus with great skill and intelligence, there are important provincial periodicals that maintain Catholic interests. Of these should be mentioned: the "Deutsche Reichszeitung" founded at Bonn in 1872; the "Düsseldorfer Volksblatt", which developed greatly under the editorial guidance of Dr. Eduard Hügen; the "Niederländische Volkszeitung" of Krefeld; the "Essener Volkszeitung"; the "Triereische Landeszeitung", founded in 1873 by the energetic chaplain Georg Friedrich Dasbach (d. 1897); the "Westfälisches Volksblatt" of Westphalia, under Dr. J. C. von Bien and Chaplain Karl Böckhings, the "Tremonia" of Dortmund, founded in 1875; the "Münsterischer Anzeiger"; the "Westfälisches Volksblatt" of Paderborn; the "Schlesische Volkszeitung" of Breslau, edited by Dr. Arthur Hager, one of the "most dashing champions of the Centre Party"; the "Deutsches Volksblatt" of Stuttgart; the "Mainzer Journal"; the "Badischer Botebacht"; the "Augsburger Postzeitung"; the "Bayerischer Kurier" of Munich. The editors had to make great personal sacrifices, for the legal actions against them for violations of the press laws, the confiscations, fines, and imprisonments were almost endless. It must be acknowledged that the editors were editors whose speech and method of fighting did no honour to their cause. Among the weekly papers the "Katholisches Volksblatt" of Mainz had a large circulation (55,000), and great influence in Southern Germany; the "Schwarze Blatt" was published at Berlin as a paper of general scope for the colour people. It was in the era of the "Kulturkampf" (1875) that the first large illustrated family periodical "Der Deutsche Hanschutz" was founded at Ratisbon; it had a large circulation and was edited 1875-88 by Venanz Muller; 1888-98 by Heinrich Keiter; at present by Dr. Otto Denk. A new literary journal was also established in 1875 at the secular press house of the "Deutsche Rundschau für das katholische Deutschland". From this time on the Catholic Press has steadily grown. The number of political newspapers and ecclesiastico-political Sunday papers was: in 1880, 186; in 1890, 272; in 1900, 419; in 1908, 500. In Prussia alone the Catholic periodicals numbered in 1870, 49; in 1880, 109; in 1890, 149; in 1900, 270. The number of Catholic periodicals appearing in Germany in 1900 was 115. Since this date the number has more than doubled.

The present condition of the Catholic Press is as follows: (1) Daily political newspapers, 278; political newspapers appearing four times weekly, 14; three times weekly, 134; twice weekly, 83; once weekly, 64; in addition there are 19, the time of appearance of which is unknown, making altogether 392. In regard to the extent of the circulation of these newspapers, statements as to the issue have been given by the publishers of 338 of them. The total issue of all for one number amounts to 1,938,434. The issue printed by the remaining 55 can be averaged as 1500 for each number, altogether as 381,000. According to this all the political newspapers taken together issue a total edition of 2,319,434 for one number. In 1880 the number of subscribers to the Catholic papers was estimated at 596,000; in 1890 Keiter estimated it at over 1,000,000. The growth, therefore, was very large. Unfortunately, a comparison with the Protestant Press cannot be made, because comprehensive statistics are not available, and because the definition which was just what would be meant by a "Protestant newspaper". Yet it may be accepted that the Catholic Press would equal it in the number of its organs and subscribers.

An important Catholic newspaper is the "Kölnische Volkszeitung", which appears three times daily; the editor-in-chief from 1896 is Dr. Karl Kühner, the publisher J. P. Bachem of Cologne; circulation 26,500 copies. Its quiet, dignified, conciliatory tone, combined with firmness of principle, has gained for it the respect of all, especially the cultured circles, and its influence extends far beyond the limits of Germany. The "Germania" is next to its reputation; the editor-in-chief of the "Germania" is Hermann ten Brink, the publisher. Finanically it is less favourably situated than the Cologne journal, because being published in a Protestant city, it lacks advertisements. In 1882 its circulation was 7000 copies; its present circulation is unknown, but it is probably from 12,000 to 16,000. The other important newspapers are generally spoken of as "Westfälischen Merkur", which has declined somewhat. The one with the largest number of subscribers is the "Essener Volkszeitung" (34,500).

(2) There are published in the German Empire over 300 Catholic periodicals, which have about 5,000,000 subscribers. Among these are: (a) General reviews, 8. The most important, finest in tone, contents, and artistic execution is the monthly "Hochland", founded in 1903 and edited by Karl Muth; the publisher is J. Kösel of Munich, and an edition contains 10,000 copies. The list of collaborators contains the names of Baunier, Carl, Friedr. Godey, von Grauert, Mazzetti, von Herling, Kiehl, Mausbach, Pastor, Schanz (now deceased), Schell (now deceased), Schonbach, Spahn, Streitberg, Willmann. The monthly called "Der Aar", founded in 1910, seeks to compete with the "Hochland", but falls a little below the other; the editor is Dr. Otto Denk, the publisher is Postel of Ratisbon. The semi-monthly "Die Historisch-politische Blätter", published by Riedel at Munich, edition 3000 copies, and the "Stimmen aus Maria-Laach", published ten times a year by Herder at Freiburg, edition 5200 copies, are carried on, on the same lines as heretofore. The "Allgemeine Rundschau", a semi-monthly, published at Freiburg by Armin Kausen at Munich, devotes itself to the living questions of political and religious life. It especially combats immorality in life and art.
(b) Theological reviews, 10, dioecesan and parochial papers, about 20. A description has already been given of the "Theologische Quartalschrift", published by Lampp at Tubingen, edition 630 copies; and the "Katholisch", published by Kirchheim at Mainz, edition 100 copies. Three of the best periodicals for these reviews is the "Theologische Revue", edited by Prof. Dickamp, published by Aschendorff at Münster, edition 950 copies.

(c) Family and religious-popular periodicals, 90. The subscription list of the oldest and highest in repute of this class, the "Deutsche Hausschatz", has declined; it is published by Pastet at Ratisbon, and its edition in 1900 was 38,000 copies; in 1908, 28,000; the number of copies forming an edition at present is unknown. Large circulations are enjoyed by the "Stadt Gottes", edited by the Society of the Word of God, at Steyl, edition 110,000 copies; the "Christliche Familie", edited by Dr. Jos. Burg, published by Freiboeul and Koenen at Essen, edition 150,000 copies; the "Katholisches Sonntagsblatt" of Stuttgart, edition 75,000 copies.

(d) Legal, national, and socio-economic, 6; among these is the "Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht", founded by Ernst von May in 1857, edited later by Friedrich H. Vering, and at present by Franz Heiner, published by Aschendorff at Münster, edition 900 copies; (f) Educational periodicals, 2; (g) Historical periodicals, 10. Among these one of general importance is the "Historisches Jahrbuch für das katholische Deutschland", founded in 1880. Its former editor are: Huffer, Hermann Grauert, Joseph Weiss; its present editor is Max Janzen; it is published by Herder at Munich, edition about 750 copies.

(i) Periodicals for historical art, 6. Among these are the two illustrated monthly "Zeitschrift für christliche Kunst", edited by Prof. Dr. Schmugge, published by Schwann at Düsseldorf, edition 900 copies; and "Die christliche Kunst", edited by J. Staunthaler, published by the Society for Christian Art of Munich, edition 6400 copies; (j) Periodicals for church music, 8.

(k) Literary journals, 18. Among these are the "Literarische Rundschau", published by Theissius at Münster, and the "Literarische Rundschau für das katholische Deutschland", edited by Prof. Joseph Sauer, published by Herder at Freiburg; (m) Missionary periodicals, 14; (n) Periodicals for children and youth; 21; (p) Periodicals issued by Catholic associations, 24.

Up to the present time the growth of the Catholic Press of Germany has been both rapid and steady. As the Catholics in Germany number about 21,000,000, there is room for an increase in the sales of these periodicals, and their circulation will probably grow still larger. On the other hand an increase in the number of organs is less necessary and desirable. The effort should be made to obtain a decided harmony between quantity and quality. There are, perhaps, no more than a dozen Catholic dailies which have a really high value. Most of the others limit themselves to a systematic use of correspondence, the collection of notices, and polemics which are not always very skillful; they are also, in part, so monotonic that they can hardly be enjoyed by an amusing circle of readers. The relatively small subscription lists of the really important journals and the undue number of small periodicals show that the cultivated classes satisfy their need of reading in part with non-Catholic periodicals. The case is the same with the family papers. An issue of 10,000 copies is very small for so excellent a review as "Handbuch der katholischen Presse" over the growth of the Catholic press refers only to quantity. In regard to quality there is little choice.

KLEMENS LOFFLER.

HOLLAND.—Towards the end of the eighteenth century the grinding oppression, under which the Catholic Faith in the Northern Netherlands had laboured so long, began to grow less marked, and the Catholics, upon whose printing-presses the Government had always kept a vigilant eye, now ventured to assert themselves more in public life and even to issue periodicals in order to proclaim and uphold their religious principles. The first attempt was on a most modest scale and appeared under the title of "Kerkelijke Bibliotheek" (6 vols., 1791-96), followed by the "Mengelingen voor Roomsch-Catholicijen" (5 vols., 1807-14), edited by Prof. J. Schrant, Rev. J. W. A. Muller, and Prof. J. H. Louisa. But the man who inspired Catholic periodical literature with life and vigour and brought it to comparative perfection was Joschum George le Sage ten Broek (d. 1847), a convert from Protestantism (1806) and known in Holland as the "Father of the Roman Catholic Press". In 1818 he founded "De Godsdiensvriend" (102 vols., 1818-69), containing articles of local interest, recent ecclesiastical events, and news of the struggle against Protestant and Liberal pretensions, by which he united the efforts of the Catholics in their struggle for emancipation. Assisted by his adopted son, Josu6 Witz, Le Sage displayed a great and wonderful energy not only in his books, but also in several serials, edited by him or at least with his collaboration, viz., "De Levensgeschiedenis van de Korrekte Geschiedschrijver" (5 vols., 1821-6), the "Godsdienstige en zedekundige mengelingen" (1824-8), the "Bijdragen tot de Godsdiensvriend" (2 vols., 1824-7), "De Ultramontaan" (5 vols., 1826-30) with its sequels, "De Morgenstar" (2 vols., 1831-2) and "De Morgenstar der toekomst" (2 vols., 1832-3), etc. Witz continued the work of his father until 1833-4, and he was later succeeded by Josu Witz in the "Catholicijke Nederlandsche Stemmen" (22 vols., 1835-50), appearing under the title of "Kerkelijke Courant" from 1857 till 1873. Besides this in 1841 Witz started a popular magazine, "Uitspanningslezer" (10 vols., 1841-52). In the mean time other Catholics worked in the "Ultramontaan", the "Catholiek" (4 vols., 1830-4), "De Inquisitie" (6 vols., 1815-20), the "Katholiek" (3 vols., 1822-4), "Katholoon" (3 vols., 1828-30), "De Christelijke Mentor" (2 vols., 1828-9), "Magazijn voor R.-Katholieken" (9 vols., 1835-45), and "Godsdienstig geschied-en letterkundig Tijdschrift" (2 vols., 1838-39), but none of these survived. A new generation of Catholic writers soon arose, by whom the struggle for emancipation was continued on a more scientific basis.

In 1842 F. J. van Vreec, later Bishop of Haarlem, Th. Borret, C. Broere, J. F. Lecceberg, and others founded the best and oldest of the periodicals still existing, "De Katholieke" (158 vols., 1842-1910). This periodical in the course of time introduced many new features which have increased its usefulness, the most important being the admission of lengthier articles contributed by prominent Catholic scholars. A fresh impetus in the field of art and literature was given by Jos. Alberdingh Thijm's "Dieutsche Warende" (27 vols., 1855-90) and his more popular "Volksblad" (23 vols., 1852-1901), the latter issues being entitled "Jaarboekje" (7 vols., 1902-09), and finally consolidated with the "Annairium der Apodotische Vereeniging Petrus Canisius" (2 vols., 1900-10). Under Thijm's direction two eminent writers were formed: Dr. H. J. Schaeppen, poet and politician, and Dr. W. Nijpjes, the historian, who, having jointly founded the "Kath. Nederl. Brachtiernering" (27 brochures, 1869-70), transformed it. latter into the more scientific monthly "Onze Wacht" (23 vols., 1874-85), combined with "De Wacht" (6 vols., 1871-3), afterwards named "De Katholiek" in 1885. Meanwhile "De Wacht" (12 vols., 1871-85), more especially devoted to studies of Dante, continued to exist under the editorship of J. Bohl and was finally merged in the "Archief voor de Katholieke Nederlanden" in which the Rev. J. Brouwers published many interesting Essays (8 vols., 1881-90). Recently "De Katholiek" has found powerful competitors in "Van onzen tijd" (at first a monthly, 15 vols., 1900-10; then a weekly, 1 vol., 1910-1911) and in the "Annalen der vereniging tot het bevorderen der beroepen der onderwijzer", founded by J. Bohl (6 vols., 1907-10), which contain articles of a most scholarly character. In this country as elsewhere the Jesuits have edited a periodical of their own, the valuable "Studien. Tijdschrift voor godsdienst, wetenschap, letteren" (74 vols., 1868-1910), while in "De katholieke missie" (5 vols., 1876-1910) they have kept up a lively interest in the foreign missions, towards which Holland has always been so generous.

In the field of purely historical research there are the "Bijdragen voor de geschiedenis van het bisdom van Haarlem" (53 vols., 1873-1910) and the "Archief voor heb aanspraken Utrecht" (36 vols., 1873-1910), which are the most important historical contributions appearing in the other periodicals fully answer the existing interest; it was this that led to the early collapse of the "Geschiedkundige Bladen" (1 vols., 1905-6). No better fate awaited the only periodical on ecclesiastical art, "Het Gildeboek" (3 vols., 1873-81; "Verslagen", 11 vols., 1886-90) edited by Mgr van Henkelum, dean of St. Bernadus's Church; its work is still carried on in part by the Belgian-Dutch review "Sint Lucas" (2 vols., 1908-10). "De katholieke Gids" (20 vols., 1889-1908), a monthly, the contents of which were never of any great moment, met a similar fate; as did the weekly "Stemmen Onzer Eeuw" (1905-06), while the only educational paper, "Opvoedingen Onderwijs" (2 vols., 1908-10), recently founded, seems already to be on the wane. Among the apologetic papers there are some that deserve special mention: "Het Dompertje van een onden Valentijn" (32 vols., 1867-1900), succeeded by "Het nieuwe Dompertje" (4 vols., 1901-4), and "Het Dompertje" (6 vols., 1906-10), the works of the apologetic weekly "Vrijheidsblad" (1890-1906), the latterly "Geloof en Wetenschap" (30 booklets, 1901-10) as well as the publications issued by the "Apologetische vereniging Petrus Canisius" (some 10 booklets, 1900-10). Among the apologetic journals may also be reckoned "Boekenschoon" (5 vols., 1906-10; formerly called "Lectuur", 2 vols., 1904-5), a critical book review. The "Central Office for Social Action" at Leiden issues no fewer than four periodicals under the chief editorship of P. J. Anheuser: the excellent "Katholiek Social Weekblad" (9 vols., 1902-10), the "Volksbibliothek" (25 numbers, 1905-10), the "Politieke en Sociale studien", at first two separate series, one for February (4 vols., 1906-9), and one for February and July (4 vols., 1906-9), and the "Volksstijdschrift" (27 numbers, 1900-10). Sobrietas (1 vols., 1907-10) is the chief organ of the Catholic temperance movement.

In addition Holland possesses a flourishing exclusively theological monthly, "Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen" (10 vols., 1901-10), which is a continuation of an older ecclesiastical paper of the same name (22 vols., 1879-1900). The "Sint-Gregoriusblad" (35 vols., 1876-1910) is devoted to church music, while the "Koorbode" (5 vols., 1906-10) upholds the modern movements. The Catholic university students have their "Annuaireum der R. Kath. studenten" (8 vols., 1902-10), and recently the student body published a periodical "De Leieve" (1 vol., 1910-1). Finally Catholic ladies have the Belgian-Dutch magazine, "De Leibie" (2 vols., 1900-10). Besides those already mentioned there are some fifty other periodicals some of which supply entertainment literature, such as the "Katholieke Illustratie" (44 vols., 1867-1910) and the "Leesbibliothek voor christelijke huisgezinnen" (56 vols., 1856-1910), while others, mostly published for the benefit of the foreign missions, and of a devotional character, mention must be made of the annual Catholic directories of Holland. The first of these was the "Almanach du clergé catholique" (7 vols., 1822-29), issued when Holland and Belgium were politically united. Then came the "R-Kath. Jaarboek" (9 vols., 1835-41), succeeded by "Kerkelijk Nederland" (10 vols., 1847-56), together with the "Jesuits almanak" (12 vols., 1857-68). The "Opvoedingsboeck" was started in 1884. All these Dutch papers and periodicals are irreproachably orthodox. As to the circulation the dailies enjoy, no figures are available. But "De Voorhoede", a weekly paper established in 1897, is known to have an edition of 25,000 copies. In all, Holland has 15 Catholic dailies, of which only "De Maximode" issues a morning and an evening edition (since 1900). In addition to these there are 31 papers published more than once a week, with 76 weeklies and some 70 monthlies.

IRELAND.—Owing to the ferocity of the penal laws, such a thing as Catholic periodical literature was impossible in Ireland during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. It was not until 1793 that any notable relaxation was made in the disabilities under which Irish Catholics laboured, and the only form of literature, even in the first quarter of the nineteenth century, was polemical. "The Parnassus" was founded in 1801 by the leaders of the Catholic Committee, especially in regard to the veto question and the Querantottt recitert, can scarcely be regarded as periodical literature, nor yet the able series of "Letters of Hierophilus" (1820-23) by Bishop Doyle. After Catholic Emancipation (1829), Irish Catholics began to use the power of the press. In 1834 the "Catholic Penny Magazine" was started as a weekly, published by Caldwell of Dublin. The first number was issued in February, 1834, and the last in December, 1835. A new era opened with the foundation of the "Dublin Review" in May, 1836, a journal Irish in more than name, its founders being Dr. Nicholas Wiseman and Daniel O'Connell. Twice subsequently O'Connell made a valuable effort to secure the realisation of a periodical on national and legal behalf. The first editor, to whom Cardinal Wiseman gives the original credit of the project, was W. Michael Quin (q. v.). In a short time it came under the control of W. Henry R. Bagshawe, but he was rather sub-editor with ample authority under Dr. Wiseman. The history of the "Review" belongs to the English section of this article, but it will make a great share in this arduous enterprise. At least one-half, often much more, of the literary matter of the original series was produced in Ireland; and Irish topics, political, social, educational, or literary, constituted a large part of the contents. Dr. C. W. Russell of Maynooth was the chief support of O'Connell and can claim a great share in the enterprise. Dr. W. C. Frisch, the proprietor, the editorial work was done by another Irishman, John Cashel Hoey. An Irish editor of a later date was Mgr Moyles. A number of influential Ulster Catholics established the Belfast "Vindicator", in 1839, with Charles Gavan Duffy as editor, whose successor in 1842 was Kevin F. Buggy. This, though an able weekly, ceased soon after 1844. In 1840, a weekly, "The Irish Catholic" was established by W. J. Meehan, which commenced on the 18th of July, 1840. It was edited by Matthew Appleby, who devoted himself to the advancement of Catholic interests. It enjoyed a large circulation and was regarded as the leading Catholic weekly of the day. It was succeeded in 1843 by "The Catholic Advocate", which was published by W. J. McCann, and was issued weekly. It was continued until 1847, when it was transferred to London. The "Catholic Layman", a monthly periodical, was also published, and appeared in 1844.

In 1845, the "Irish Catholic Magazine", edited by W. J. O'Reilly, was founded. It was a monthly, and was continued until 1847. In 1846, the "Irish Catholic Review", edited by M. J. ITALY.—Without going back to the Acta Diurna, Acta Scalaius, or Acta publica, existing in Rome in Caesar's time, the modern newspaper had its birth in Venice. From the first years of the sixteenth century we learn of journals issued in that city every two or three days, sometimes even daily, under the surveillance of the Government. These sheets, called Avvisi, for the most part in manuscript, were distributed among the governors of provinces and the ambassadors to foreign courts; they were later read in public, and sold after the reading for a gazzetta (14.0 gazzettas = lira), hence the name "gazette". At first these journals had an official character; but in 1538, during the Turkish War, their publication was entrusted to private enterprise, though they continued to be supervised by the Government. Under these auspices journalism was carried on without serious competition up to the first decades of the eighteenth century.

It was a period that the example of Venice should be imitated elsewhere, but in Italy its functions were mainly confined to pandering to a scandal-loving public. In Rome this was carried to such a degree that in 1578 Gregory XIII issued a Bull of excommunication against the journalists who propagated the true and false scandals of society and the court. After Venice came the towns of Lombardy. In Milan the first permanent journal was "Il Giornale di Milano," published in 1716. In Turin the first permanent journal was "Il Diario di Torino," founded in 1785. In Genoa, in 1730, was published "Lo Specchio del genovese," and in Naples, in 1750, "Lo Specchio del Neapolitano." But the center of serious and literate journalism was Rome. The first permanent journal was "Il Corriere di Roma," founded by Father A. F. Puppi, in 1737. The "Gazzetta Romana" was founded in 1738, and the "Avviso di Roma" in 1742, both appearing thrice weekly. These journals were the precursors of the "Osservatore Romano" and "Il Messaggero Romano," which have kept up for over a century the tradition of Italy's literary and political journalism.

In Rome the first permanent journal was "Il Diario di Roma," begun in 1716 during the wars against the Turks in Hungary, printed by Luca and Giovanni Cracca, hence its familiar name "Il Cracca." After 1718 it was published twice a week, with a supplement. At the end of the eighteenth century, the subscription was 24 pezzi (12 lira) per annum. Towards the middle of the eighteenth century a more intense journalistic life became manifest in Venice. In 1700 another journal, the "Gazzetta Veneta," appeared, edited by Gaspare Cossi, who in the succeeding year founded a literary review called the "Osservatore Veneto." The "Osservatore Veneto," which was then assumed by the priest Chiari; this paper survived until 1798, though its title was changed a number of times.

The following papers also deserve mention: the "Diario Veneto" (1765); the "Gazzetta," with subtitle "Notizie del mondo" (1769); the "Novellisti Veneto" (1773, daily); "Avvisi Publihi di Venezia" (1783); the "Gazzetta delle Gazzette" (1786), the only one that also treated of political questions; the "Nuovo Postiglione" (1789). From 1768 to 1791 the "Gazzetta Fiorentina" was circulated at Florence. Besides the foregoing, a number of scientific and literary journals made their appearance. The first of these is the "Giornale dei letterati," founded in Rome by the learned Benedetto Becchini (1650-1700). In 1718 the "Giornale dei letterati d'Italia" of Apostolo Zeno appeared at Venice, where also in the same year Pawini translated from the French the "Mercure Storico." To these was added in 1724 the "Gazzetta Fabbriciana," founded by the linen manufacturers of Naples; the "Avviso di Roma," the "Inlussi di Pisa," the "Diario di Cristoforo Zane" (1735), and the "Giornale enciclopedico" (1777-87). The "Osservatore" of Gozzi, already mentioned, belongs to this category. The most famous literary journal of this epoch was the "Rivista" of Barretti at Turin, which unceasingly attacked the decadent literature of the times. Other literary and educational periodicals were: the "Annali ragionati dei libri nuovi," published in Naples, later changed its title to the "Giornale letterario," (1792-98); also the "raccolte" (collections) of various works and dissertations, which were published in a number of cities. Such was the "Raccolta Milanese," the "Opuscoli" of Calogera at Pisa, the "Simboli" by Gori, even the "Saggi," etc., of the various academies in the cities of Italy. Beginning with 1718, Creacă published a species of journal for "Theorie d'import," while the Roman "Calendario" was the precursor of the "Gerarchia Cattolica" of to-day.

With the French Revolution, other papers were founded throughout Italy to advocate the new regime. In Venice in 1797 was printed the "Monitore lombardo-veneto-traspadano," the "Letterario Veneto," the "Italiano rinnovato," and the "Raccolta delle carte pubbliche." When Venice became Austrian, these journals disappeared, and the former "Gazzetta Urbana" became the "Gazzetta Veneta privilegiata" (1799). The "Diario di Roma" was discontinued from the close of 1798 until October of the succeeding year, again from 1806 to 1814, and from this last date continued up to the middle of the century. During the first French occupation the "Monitore di Roma," the "Gazzetta Romana," founded in 1808 and edited in two languages, was followed in 1809 by the "Giornale del Camaldoli," and in 1812 by the "Giornale politico del dipartimento di Roma," which dealt with political and social questions, and the results of excavations, and other items of interest. Mention may also be made of the "Giornale patriottico della Repubblica Napoletana".

The pre-revolutionary journals were all Catholic. In the Reign of Terror the publication of Catholic churches became impossible. During the time of the Restoration the government of Italy held the censorship of the press in regard to all questions of political import; but journals were free to exert themselves in behalf of Catholicism. Foreign books, however, were circulated, propagating the political, social, and religious maxims of the Revolution. Thus the need of a conservative Catholic press made itself felt. The first to appear upon the field was in 1831, the "Voci della Verità" of Modena, founded under the auspices of Duke Francis V, and under the direction of Antonio Parenti and Professor Bartolommeo Veratti. These journals continued to appear only until 1841. In this year Ballerini founded the "Amico della Cattolica" at Modena; in 1848, Ceccoli founded the "Osservatore Romano," the "Gazzetta" of the "Pallade" and the satirical paper "Don Pirone"; at Piacenza, the "Eridano," representing the Provisional Government, the "Tribuno" representing the Opposition, made the necessity of good papers very urgent. On the return of Pius IX the "Giornale di Roma" was founded at Rome (1850-55), to which was added an evening paper, the "Osservatore Romano," which, when the "Giornale" was suspended, became the organ of the Pontifical Government.

At Turin the "Armonia" was founded in 1849, which fought strenuously for the cause of the Church. The "Unità Cattolica" appeared in 1862, directed by Margotti, and the "Armonia" was transferred to Rome; at Genoa the "Eco d'Italia" was established in 1849, an illustrated daily paper, still published under the name of "Liguria del Popolo." At Locarno, Canton of Ticino, Switzerland, the "Cre- denti Cattoliche d'Europa" was founded in 1857, later called the "Osservatore Bolognese," at Bologna founded by Magarelli, Casoni, Aciugnardi, etc., afterwards published in 1859 by the provisional Government; in Florence the "Contemporaneo" (1857), founded by Stefano San Pol; in Naples, beginning in 1869, was published the "Omnibus," directed by Vincenzo Torello. After the annexation of a large part of Italy to Sardinia,
When the influence of a Catholic Press was urgently needed, its freedom was continually hampered by all sorts of petty vexations. Papers that had been suppressed reappeared under other names. This persecution is explained either by the sectarian spirit of those in power, or by the impression then prevailing that the Catholic party was the declared enemy of the new Government. Thus there appeared at Bologna in 1814 the "Eco di Roma," and the "Avvenire di Bologna," and by the "Occupatore Bolognese," which in turn was suppressed in 1853 and succeeded by the "Patriotico Catolico," followed again by the "Conservatore" (1857), and by the "Tione" (1878). A similar fate befall the "Occupatore Lombardo" of Brescia (1862–63). The "Difensore" of Modena was similarly treated and suppressed in 1848, and the year following Mgr Balun founded the "Diritto Rosminiano," still published. In Florence the "Contemporaneo" succeeded to the "Corriere Toscano." In Venice the "Veneto Cattolico" appeared in 1866, and in 1867 assumed the name of "Difesa," which still survives. The "Occupatore Cattolico" was founded at Milan in 1864, and was entrusted to the editorship of Don Albertario. This journal undertook the publication of the Rosminian doctrines, and was a faithful advocate of the papal policy. At this period religious papers were founded in other cities of Italy: the "Libertà," at Locarno (1860); the "Voce Cattolica" (1860); the "Gazzetta del Popolo" (1868); the "Libertà Cattolica" of Naples (1867); the "Sicilia Cattolica" of Palermo (1868); the "Genio Cattolico" of Reggio Emilia (1869).

Meanwhile Pius IX felt the need at Rome of a politico-religious organ for the support of his own programme, for the refutation of pernicious doctrines, and to serve as a medium of official communication to the Catholic States. This was realized by the foundation of the "Corrispondenza di Roma," and the "Acta Sanctorum Seditis" (1865). The chief principles of the "Corrispondenza" were the support of the Holy See and opposition to the Liberal Catholics and Opportunists. In 1870 this paper was moved to Geneva by Mgr Mermillod, where it altered its title to "Corrispondenza di Geneve." It then became an instrument of Blome in his vigorous campaign against Bismarck, especially during the Kulturkampf. This paper supported the insurrectionary party favoured by the pope, though it failed to obtain the sympathy of Cardinal Antonelli. At the death of Pius IX the condition of Catholic journals was very favourable. They were more numerous, superior to the papers of their opponents in form, but were better staffed with the ability of their writers and the vigor and intelligence of their penmen. Among these the "Unità Cattolica" was especially distinguished. The year 1870 beheld a revival of governmental and sectarian opposition to Catholic journals, which, however, increased in number despite the hostility manifested toward them. This was particularly the case with those papers of periodical period. Thus in Rome in this year was founded the "Voce della Verità" (which ceased in 1901); the "Eco del Litorale" at Gorizia; the "Amico del Popolo," at Lucca (1872); the "Discussione," at Naples (1873); the "Verona Federale," at Verona; the "Cittadino," at Genoa (1873); at Turin the "Corriere Nazionale" (1873), which in 1894 was fused with the "Hahn Reife," and was founded after the transfer to Florence of the "Unità Cattolica"; at Venice the "Berico" (1876); at Udine the "Cittadino Italiano" (1878); at Padua the "Pace" (1876); at Treviso the "Vita del Popolo," etc.

Leo XIII also realized the need of a papal journal through which he could communicate with the foreign press, and he consequently created the "Journal de Rome;" this paper did not fulfil his expectations, so it was succeeded by the "Moniteur de Rome" (1881–95). The most prominent developments of Italian journalism of the last few years are the union of the "Osservatore Cattolico" of Milan with the "Loco Lombardia" (founded in 1884), which two papers were fused as the "Unità." Another event in Italian journalism was the foundation of the "Avvenire" at Turin, in the alliance formed by the "Corriere d'Italia" (1900, originally called the "Giornale di Roma") with the "Avvenire d'Italia" of Bologna, and with the "Corriere della Sibilla" (Palermo). The "Corrispondance de Rome," founded in 1907 with the title "Corrispondenza Romana," has a scope similar to the paper of the same name under Pius IX. Like its prototype though not official in character, it is an echo of the Vatican.

Before we consult the actual statistics of the Catholic press of Italy it may be well to survey the history of that class of Catholic periodicals which comprises literature and erudition to the exclusion of politics. Among these periodicals, we may mention first the "Giornale archeologico" of Rome (1819–48), revived in 1883 with the title "Arcadia," and in 1898 resuming its former title. Then there is the "Storia" (1820–28); the "Almanacco" (1834); the "Monitore" (1837), illustrated and treated largely of the biographies of contemporaneous men; the "Rivista" (1834), devoted to the theatre; the "Giornale Ecclesiastico" (1825), a periodical devoted to canon law, which has been issued again as the "Annali delle scienze religiose," directed by Mgr Antonio de Luca and recognized as the organ of the Congregation of the Catholic Religion. In 1853 de Rossi founded the "Bulletino di Archeologia Cristiana," reappearing as the "Nuovo Bulletino." In Modena, to the labours of Veronese already mentioned were added the "Mornorio di Religione," the "Opuscoli religiosi, letterari e morali," the "Storia e Storia" (1856); in 1858 there founded there a collection of "Lettere di vari legati oneste." Under the title of "Lettere Cattoliche" and similar titles, periodicals existed in various cities, Padua, Naples, Genoa, Turin (this last founded by Don Borro), etc.

Among the periodicals of an earlier date we must cite the "Giornale scientifico letterario" and the "Rivista di scienze, lettere e arti," strictly religious periodicals, such as "Settimane Religiose," etc., were printed in many cities, often for the benefit of some sanctuary or in behalf of some pious work. The "Donna e la Famiglia" (Genoa, 1862), which had a fashion support; the "Consagrazione delle Famiglie" (Genoa, 1879); the "Missione della Donna" (Sciaccia, 1875), were published for circuses and parishes. At the present time we should name especially the "Pro Famiglia" (Bergamo, splendidly illustrated). In many cities (Turin, Genoa, Massa Carrara, etc.) papers were published for workmen; others were devoted especially to the peasants. For education and the cause of Christian schools were founded the "Scuola Italiana Moderna" (Milan, 1883) and the "Vivacita del Feltro" (Feltro, 1890). The "Museo delle Missioni Cattoliche" (Turin, 1857); the "Missioni cattoliche" (Milan); the "Missioni francescane in Palesis" (Rome); the "Oriente Serafico" (Assisi, 1889); "Gerusalemme" (Genoa, 1879) and other bulletins of this kind indicate their subject-matter by their titles. With the periodical "La Scienza e la Fede" in Saverneuro, the celebrated philosopher of Naples, assisted by Signorcelli and by d'Amico, carried on a propaganda for the philosophy and theology of St. Thomas.

The periodical "Scienza italiana," founded in 1814 by the Jesuit Corneli, and the physician Venturini, had a similar scope. From the "Lett. Letter. Fett. Patris" various other periodicals of this kind appeared, such as the "Eco di S. Tommaso d'Aquin" (Parma, 1879); "Divus Thomas" (Piacenza, 1880); the "Favilla" (Palermo); finally the "Rivista Neo-atomistica" was founded at Florence (1910). The “Catechista Cattolico” (F arenza, 1877), and the “Rivis gio del catechismo” (Chieri, 1893), the “Predic atore Cattolico” (G iare), the “Polian tea oratoria” (Caltagirone, 1881), the “Crisostomo” (Rome) express their subjects in their titles, as also the “Monitor e Liturgico” (Macerata, 1888), the “Ephemerides liturgicae” (Rome), the “Gazzetta Gregoriana” (Rome), the “Scuola Veneta di Musica Sacra” of T ebaldini, etc. The “Bessarione” (1897) is devoted to Oriental Christian studies. The “Scuola Cattolica”, founded by Cardinal Parocchi (1878), embraces all branches of theology and discipline. For social studies made after the encyclical “Rerum Novarum” in 1891, B r ucci founded “the Rassegna Gregoriana” (Perugia, afterwards Genoa); and in the next year Mgr Talano began the “Rivista internazionale di scienze sociali”; etc. In 1898 Murri founded a period ical of social studies, the “Cultura sociale”, which deviated into forbidden tendencies of thought.

Historical periodicals are: “Rivista storica” of Pavia (now at Sarzane); the “Muratori” (Pubblicazione di testi per la storia d’Italia); the “Rivista storica benedettina”; the “Archivio franciscanum historiemum” (Rome); the “Miscellanea franceseana” of Mgr Faloci Pulignani (Foligno, 1887); the “Miscellanea di Storia Ecclesiastica e studi ausiliarii” (Rome, 1904-07); and the “Rivista storico-critica delle scienze, lettere, filosofia, e filosofia canonica” published by the Holy Office. Among the existing scientif ical and literary reviews, the oldest and most widely-circulated is the “Civiltà Cattolica”, conducted by priests of the Society of Jesus, forming a community by themselves, and directly subject to the general. This was founded in 1850 under the auspices of Pius IX. Among the following reviews B r e s c i a n i, Cattolico (Verona), Taparelli, Cornoldi, Liberatore, etc., won distinction. Mention must be made of “Acta Apostolorum Sedis”, the official bulletin of the Holy See, founded by motu proprio in 1908, in which are published the Bulls, Constitutions, Encyclicals, and other acts of the popes, together with the Decrees of the Roman Congrega tions. Several periodicals of the same kind are and have been published in Rome, such as the “Numini Romanus” (1882-1904), the “Anadele Ecclesiastica” (1893), the “Acta Pontificia”, etc., besides the “Acta S. Sedis” already mentioned. The “Monitor Ecclesiastico”, founded in Conversano by Mgr Gennari, afterwards cardinal, not only gives the more impor tant pontifical news, but treats of moral theology and canon law, and publishes decisions concerning ecclesiastical matters. The “Nuova Rivista delle Ristite” of Macerata gives a digest of important articles appearing in national and foreign periodicals upon matters of interest to the clergy. Finally it is necessary to note sacred and humorous periodicals. Among these the “Vespro” of Florence and the “Frusta” of Rome were well-known for a time, but ceased on account of the frequent actions for damages brought against them. With these may be classed the “Folla” of Naples, the “Mulo” of Bologna, and the “Bastone” of Rome.

The above statistics have been largely gathered from the “Annuario Ecclesiastico” which undertakes to register all Catholic papers published throughout Italy. This registration, however, is neither complete nor exact, some existing periodicals being omitted, whilst others that have stopped publication are still on the list. Moreover the “Annuario Ecclesiastico” does not inform us whether the journal is a daily or a weekly. This being the case, it is well to note that a number of so-called daily journals appear at the most only three times a week. Of such there were three published at Rome and two published at Turin and Genoa. Besides the above mentioned there are 101 political and social journals issued several times a month; 81 religious periodicals appearing once or twice a month; five periodicals of general erudition; and five devoted to philosophical and theological studies, in which class might be included the “Rivista Rosminiana”; and ten reviews consecrated to canon law. This last enumeration comprises a few bulletins of episcopal courts. Apart from the foregoing there are also two reviews devoted to preaching; six to missionary interests; three to education; and one to social studies. Whether dealt with among Catholic ones by the notably Catholic charac ter of their managers: such as the “Rivista di Matte matiche”, etc., founded by Tartellini, then professor in the University of Rome; now edited by Cardinal Maffi. Among the political and social reviews it must be observed that there are not many, containing, once peddled, liberal, and the other absolutely unequal. They dealt with the “Roman Question” as obsolete. It advocated a larger individual liberty and independ ence from the particular views of the Holy See and the episcopate in politics and social matters. The reviews taking this liberal attitude never failed however to profess their allegiance and obedience to authority. On the other hand there existed the papal press, which might be characterized by its perfect submission to and advocacy of the prevailing opinions of the Vati can and the episcopate. To this last class belong: the “Roscissa” of Braganze (Mgr Scalott); the “Unità Cattolica” (T erence); the “Italia Reale” (Turin); the “Rassegna Romana” (Vienna); the “Osservatore Romano” (Rome); the “Libertà” (Naples); the “Correspondance de Rome”, and some other small sheets.

With regard to the geographical distribution of the Catholic press, there is an enormous disproportion between the north and the south. Southern Italy (Naples and Palermo) has only two daily papers. But even in the North there are large cities without a daily Catholic publication, e.g., Padua and Ancona, while Ravenna and Rimini have not even a weekly one. The need of weekly journals is naturally felt still more in Southern Italy.

MEXICO.—Colonial Period.—During the administra tion of the viceroy Baltazar de Zúñiga Guzmán de Sotomayor, Marquéz de Valero, the first newspaper, supervised by J. Ignacio Maria de Castorena y Urría (precentor of the Cathedral of Mexico and afterwards Bishop of Yucatán), was published in Mexico, January, 1722, with the heading “Gazeta de México y Noticias de Nueva España que se imprimirán Cadas meses y comenzan desde primero de Enero de 1722” (Gazette of Mexico and notices of New Spain, which will be published every month, and which will begin the first of January, 1722). It was ceased to “Florilegio Historial de México e1”, and in June of this year the enterprise was abandoned. In the numbers published, the news items were arranged according to the principal cities of the colony. With the second issue brief notices of the books being published in Mexico and Spain were added and also accounts of important events in the principal cities of Europe. In January, 1728, the second publication, the “Compendio de Noticias Mex icanas”, edited by J. Francisco Sahagún de Arévalo Ladrón de Guevara, appeared. This continued in circula tion until November, 1739, when it was succeeded by the “Mercure de México”, edited by the same manager. The Mercure de México was continued in the same form as the “Gaceta” and “Florilegio”. Among its news items were, accounts of religious festi vales, antos de fe, competitions for the university faculties. European events, shipping news at the port of Vera Cruz, and news from the Philippines, China, and even Morocco. When there was an abundance of news a fortnightly issue appeared. The desire to keep readers informed on the most important events connected with the Spanish Monarchy, e. g., the conquest of the City of Nápoles, led M. to Mercurio discontinuation of publication and no paper existed until 1781, when the new Gaceta de México, edited by M. A. Valdés, appeared and continued without interruption until 1809. It was issued bi-monthly, modelled more or less on the gazettes of 1722 and 1728; it included the price of news and extra editors. Mexico became officially and integrally the royal orders. To Ignacio Bartolache and the Rev. José Antonio Alzate (q. v.), well-known Mexican writers of the eighteenth century, is due the honour of having issued the first scientific publications. The former published (1772) the Mercurio Volante, which was short-lived; it was characterized as a newspaper giving curious and important notices upon various matters bearing on physics and medicine (con noticias curiosas e importantes sobre varios asuntos de Física y Medicina). Alzate began (1768) the Diario Literario de México; this was suppressed, but reappeared on 26 October under the title Asuntos Varios Sobre Ciencias y Artes. After several irregularities, it was suppressed, only to reappear (1787) under the title of Observaciones sobre Física, Historia Natural y Artes Utiles, fourteen numbers of which were issued. In January, 1788, the famous Gaceta Literatura appeared and was issued monthly, though with some irregularity, until 1790. This publication was a literary and scientific review, the subjects of which were discussed by the learned priest-editor. Here might be read with benefit articles on medicine, botany, mineralogy, Mexican archaeology, architecture, philosophy, ethnology, jurisprudence, physics, astronomy, topography, etc. The files are a veritable encyclopedia, and the number and variety of the subjects treated, as well as the scholarly manner in which they are handled, are evident proof of Father Alzate's remarkable erudition. On 1 October, 1805, Jacobo Villarrutia established the Diario de México, the first daily paper published in the colony; it was issued every day, including holidays, until 1816. Among its contributors were Navarrete, Zamudio, de Tagle, Burguera, Anastasio Ochoa, and Lazaro Buendia. The last issue of the Gaceta de México, founded in 1810, was the official organ of the viceroyal Government until 1821.

Period of the War of Independence.—The first newspaper devoted to the cause of independence was the El Despertador Mexicano, edited by Francisco Severo Maldonado. It was begun 29 December, 1810, but did not last long. The second newspaper controlled by the insurgents was the Ilustrador Nacional. The editor, Dr. José María Cos, made the type from wood and mixed indigo for the printing ink. When he was able to procure metal type, he continued to publish his newspaper under the title El Ilustrador Americano. It lasted from May 1812 until April 1813. The viceroyal Government and the ecclesiastical authorities rigidly prohibited it. The latter obliged the faithful to give up their copies, and denounced those who retained any. The third newspaper, El Correo Americano del Sur, appeared in February, 1813. The priest, José María Morelos, after conquering Oaxaca and the Sierra de Sta. Ana in strength, undertook the editing the first to J. M. de Herrera, formerly parish priest of Huautlañin, and afterwards to the lawyer, Carlos M. Bustamante. The paper was issued every Thursday until 27 May of the same year. Upon the proclamation of the freedom of the press, two newspapers, El Jugetillo and "El Pensador Mexicano", edited respectively by C. M. Bustamante and Joaquín Fernández de Lázaro, appeared; they fearlessly attacked the abuses of the viceroyal Government. The "Jugetillo" published only six numbers, and both were suppressed by the Viceroy Venegas in December, 1812. Lázaro was imprisoned, but was liberated shortly afterwards, and continued the publication of his paper, eliminating, however, its offensive tone. Bustamante, freed in the following year, published more numbers of the "Jugetillo", the last in 1821. Among other newspapers published during this period may be mentioned: "Clamores de la Fidelidad Americana", published in Yucatán by José Matías Quintana, for which he was imprisoned; the "Boletín Militar", published by General Mina from the printing- office of the army; and the "Obras Póstumas de José de Iturbide" published several sheets, "El Mexicano Independiente", "Ejército Imperial de las Tres Guantias", "Diario Político Militar Mexicano". The "Centinela contra Seductores" was an anti-insurgent paper, issued towards the end of 1810: the "Espe|cicular Patriótico" (1810–11), a weekly dedicated to the Viceroy Venegas. J. M. Benesánchez Sánchez de la Barquera issued several interesting papers, including Seminario económico de noticias curiosas y esas|ticas sobre Agricultura y demás Artes y Oficios (1808–10); "El Correo de los Niños" (1813), the first juvenile paper published in Mexico; and "El Amigo de los Hombres" (1814). The "Noticioso General" (1815–22), a twice weekly newspaper, was published official documents and news of all kinds. At first it was issued every fortnight, but afterwards it appeared on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

After the War of Independence.—When the independence of Mexico was established newspapers were multiplied. Some approved, others condemned, the new régime or denounced it. Among the leading papers of the new Government, Carlos Maria Bustamante published (1821–26) thirty numbers of "La Avispa de Chilpancingo", attacking the Turbide administration. In 1822 were published "El Sol" and "El Correo de la Federación", organs respectively of the Freemasons of the Scottish (centralist), and York (federalist) rite. The Liberals controlled two important publications, El Siglo XIX and "El Monitor Republicano". Gómez Pedraza, Otero, Payno, de la Rosa, Zaro Vigil, and others contributed to the first, and to the second, which was even more radical in its ideas, Florencio Castillo, Valente, Baz, Mateos etc., and Castellar as Spanish correspondent. The Centinela Republicana (1827), the conservative organ of the government of the Viceroy, was published by José M. Roa Barcenac) and "La Cruz" (edited by Ignacio Aguilar y Marcho). The first number of "La Cruz" appeared on 1 Nov., 1855; its heading states "it is an exclusively religious paper, founded ex- |professio to diffuse orthodox doctrines, and to defend and vindicate them against the prevalent errors". In its political sums up the situation of that time, deplores the attacks on the Church, and the sates against the clergy; it urges the faithful to prepare themselves for the struggle in defence of religion. The paper had four divisions; the first explained the teachings of the Church on points which circumstances deemed it most opportune to treat; the second related all errors advanced against this teaching; the third published short essays on religious subjects; the fourth gave accounts of all notable events, in the Republic and in other countries, that had a hearing on the special object of the publication. Unfortunately this weekly lasted only until 29 July, 1858. Its battles against the Liberals were sharp and brilliant, and it contains copious examples of their learning and profound adhesion to the teaching of the Church. During the civil wars the Press in many instances, particularly during the heated discussions that characterized the period prior to the Constitution of 1857, deserted its office of peacemaker and seemed to have for its object the arousing of political parties. And it was not without danger that a journalistic career was followed in those days.

The “Veracruzano” of 7 October, 1856, referring to the overthrow of the Government of Miramón and the capture of the capital of Mexico by Juárez (1 Jan., 1861), announced the assassination of Vicente Segura, editor of “Diaro de Avisos” and political antagonist of the victorious party, declaring that “in this truly significant moment fulfilled the guarantees of the system of Liberalism, freedom of the press”. Notwithstanding the risks involved in the expression of animus in connexion with this crime, several publications endeavoured to stem the torrent of pernicious ideas which had been loosed. The editor of the “Pajarito Verde” had to close his establishment; and the principal contributor to “El Ministro del Pueblo” was imprisoned. A Spaniard, suspected of circulating pamphlets, was, without proof of any sort, thrown into prison. His printing-press was confiscated, and later he was exiled.

During the Empire of Maximilian.—Four papers, the “Diario del imperio”, “L’Ere Nouvelle”, “La Razón”, and “L’Estafette”, supported more or less openly by the Imperial Government, may be mentioned. In their attitude towards religion (favourable or unfavourable, according to the dictates of the members of the imperial cabinet) they lacked the freedom and independence which make a paper the representative of the sentiments of the people. Some important journals of the period issued, and from time to time published articles which called the attention of the Imperial Government to their columns.

The Present Time.—After the fall of the empire and especially since the presidential tenure of office of General Porfirio Diaz, the Catholic Press has enjoyed a large development. With the exception of two or three papers published in the various states, which did not cease to work for the cause (“El Amigo de la Verdad” of Puebla and others), the first newspaper to continue the traditions of the Catholic journalists of other days was “La Voz de Mexico” (1870-1900). It counted many distinguished writers on its staff, and, as a paper which had never been shot but loyal to the cause it had espoused, it earned the respect and good will of everyone. Shortly before it ceased publication, “El País” (now in its twelfth year, and an active defender of Catholic interests) was founded. “El Nacional”, another Catholic paper, published for a number of years, was established for the same cause. On 1 July, 1883, Victoriano Agüeros founded “El Tiempo”, which is undoubtedly the most important of all political daily papers of the republic supporting Catholic interests. In two years its circulation increased from 1000 to 6000 copies. By the vigour with which it attacked the errors of the government of Manuel González, it received great popularity, but this attitude won persecution for the editor and contributors, who were several times imprisoned. In 1887 the editorial office was closed and publication suspended for eleven days. But to-day the paper defends its ideals as unabatedly as before. The literary edition begun in 1887, published every Sunday and to which many notable writers, including Ipanero Arcieo (Arcadian name of the Bishop of S. Luis Potosí), Joaquín García Izazaga, J. María Roa Barcena, José Sebastián Segura, and others contributed, gave prominence to the work of many native authors, which would otherwise have remained unpublished. Its columns have always been open to the discussion of all questions contributing to the progress and aggrandizement of Mexico. An illustrated Sunday edition, “El Tiempo Ilustrado”, has also been added to the publications connected with “El Tiempo”. Among the illustrated monthly reviews may be mentioned “El Mensajero del Corazón de Jesús”, which has received much favourable notice, the principal organ of the Liberal party, “El Libro”, has the largest circulation of any newspaper in the Republic.

Argentina.—In the province of Buenos Aires, the “Gazeta de Buenos Aires”, one of the most important newspapers, published a series of important articles on the “Resolutions of the States General” in 1810, from which several important laws were derived. Other newspapers of the period were: “La Voz del Pueblo”, “El Diario”, “La Ilustración”, and “La Prensa”. The last-mentioned was the organ of the “Liga del Emancipado”, a union of the Liberal press, founded in 1870 to agitate for the union of the provinces of Buenos Aires and Entre Ríos.

Europe.—In Spain, the “Diario de Barcelona” (founded in 1851) and the “Diario de Madrid” (1856), both of them Catholic, have enjoyed a large circulation. Several Catholic newspapers have been established since 1867, when the Catholic press was legally re-established by a reform of the “Ley del Préstamo”. Among those journals may be mentioned “La Correspondencia”, “El Curioso”, “El Español”, “El Universal” (founded in 1869), “La Crónica”, “El Socorrista”, and “El Español”.

Poland.—There was a period of slow development from 1831 to 1861, and a period of progress from 1861 to the present day. During the first period there were published at Warsaw 5 daily papers, 14 weeklies, and 1 monthly periodical; in Galicia, 3 daily papers, 3 semi-weeklies, and 3 weeklies; in the Grand Duchy of Pozen, 1 daily paper; in Austrian Silesia, 1 weekly. Several of these that appeared before 1865 are still published. The Polish Press reflects the political conditions of the countries that have annexed the territory of Poland. In Galicia (Austria) it is entirely free; in Russia it is subject to a severe censorship, which is also the case in Germany.

One of the oldest publications in Galicia is the “Gazeta de Cracovia” (Time), the organ of the Conservative party, and well edited from the literary as well as from the political point of view. Its publication began in 1848. In 1866 there appeared the “Przegląd Polski” (Polish Review), which had from its beginning the collaboration of Count Stanislas Tarnowski and Stanislas Kosinski. It remains the most important historical and literary periodical of Poland. The “Czas” and the “Przegląd Polski” have always maintained a strictly Catholic character. In 1867 Julius Starka and Thaddeus Romanowicz established at Lemberg the “Dziennik Literacki” (Literary Journal), which had a short life; John Dobrzański founded the “Gazeta Narodowa” (National Gazette), to which was united in 1869 the “Dziennik Polski” (Polish Journal). In 1871 Rev. Edward Podolski established the “Przegląd Lwowski” (Lemberg Review), which strenuously defended Catholic interests during its existence. In the same city there appeared the “Gazeta Lwowska” (Lemberg Gazette), the organ of the imperial government in Galicia. In 1873 the Jesuits began at Cracow the publication of the “Przegląd Powszechny” (Universal Review), a periodical still published, and which has rendered important services to the Catholic cause from the scientific and literary points of view. In the same city there was published from 1881 to 1886 the “Przegląd Literacki i Naukowy” (Literary and Scientific Review). In 1891 in the whole of Austria there were published 126 Polish periodicals and daily papers, of which 65 appeared at Lemberg and 29 at Cracow. At Lemberg the daily papers were the “Dziennik Polski”, the “Gazeta Lwowska”, the “Gazeta Narodowa”, the “Gazeta Łucka”, the “Przegląd Lwowski” and the “Gazeta Lwowska”, which are two Catholic weeklies, the “Gazeta katolicka” and the “Tygodnik katolicki”. At the present time the Catholic Press is chiefly represented by the “Gazeta kościołna” (Ecclesiastical Gazette), a small weekly, poor in doctrine and immersed in politics. From the scientific standpoint the most important are the “Tygodnik katolicki” (a monthly historical periodical), which began publication in 1886, and the numbers of which constitute a valuable collection of historical works. No less important are the “Pamiętniki literackie” (Literary Monuments), the “Ateneum pol斯基”, the “Kosmos” (the organ of the society of naturalists of Lemberg), and the “Nasze kraje”. In 1911 there appeared the only philosophical periodical of Galicia, the "Ruch filozoficzny" (Philosophical Movement). Besides the "Czas", there are the "Nowa Reforma" and the "Głos narodu" (Voice of the People), an organ of the clergy and of the militant Catholic party. The Socialists publish there the "Naprzód" (Forward), the official organ of their party, and the monthly periodical "Krytyka". In recent years a has been established the "Szwajczer" (Swiss World), the organ of the Swiss club of Cracow, containing valuable information relating to the Swiss in Poland. The Academy of Sciences of Cracow publishes a "Bulletin international"; monthly; and the "Rozprawy" (Discussions) of mathematics, physics, and biology. Daily papers are published there also in the Galician cities of Tarnów, Rzeszów, Sambor, Stanisław, Jarosław, and Przemyśl.

One of the oldest Polish daily papers existing in Prussia is the "Dziennik poznanski" (Posen Journal), established in 1839. From 1844 to 1865 there appeared the "Przegląd poznanski", an ardent defender of Catholicism, edited by Rev. John Koźman; in 1860 Rev. John Prusinowski published the "Tygodnik katolicki" (Illustrated Week). In 1865 Louis Rzępiecki began the publication of the scientific periodical "Oświata" (Culture), which, however, had only a short life, and was followed by the "Przegląd wielkopolski" (Review of Great Poland), edited by Frederic Dziadek in 1870. In 1871 the "Orgonów" (Advocate), and the "Wielkopolski". The "Przegląd poznanski" resumed its publications under the direction of Władysław Rabki, while other daily papers were published at Danzig, Thorn, Pelphin, and Allenstein. In 1899, under the direction of Władysław Hozakowski, rector of the seminary of Posen, there was published the "Unia", a monthly periodical for the clergy, well edited from the theological standpoint.

In 1841 the publication of the "Biblioteka Warszawska", a monthly periodical especially directed to literature, began in Russian Poland. Its excellence is still maintained. In 1894 there were published in Warsaw and its vicinity, 7, 776 monthly, and weekly periodicals. At the present time there are published in Warsaw the "Dzien" (Day); the "Dziennik powszechnej" (Universal Journal); the "Głos Warszawski" (Voice of Warsaw); "Głos poranny" (Voice of Morning); the "Kurjer polski"; "Kurjer Warszawski"; "Nowa Gazeta"; "Przegląd poranny"; "Widziónka Cośchoś" (Daily News); "Słowo" (Word), a Nationalist paper that has great influence; and the "Warszawska Gazeta". Other daily papers are published at Lublin, Kiefi ("Dziennik kijowski"), at Vilna ("Kurjer litewski" and "Goniec Wilenski"), at Lodz, and at St. Petersburg. Among the periodicals besides the "Biblioteka Warszawska", mention should be made of the "Bieszczada litarca" (Literary Banquet), splendidly illustrated; the "Kultura", hostile to Catholicism; the "Przegląd filozoficzny" (Philosophical Review), a quarterly publication; the "Przegląd historyczny" (Historical Review), scientific, twice monthly; the "Świt" (World), an illustrated weekly; and the "Tygodnik ilustrowane". The Catholic Church, until recently represented by the "Przegląd katolicki", of Warsaw, a publication of very little value theologically, and dedicated more to politics. This paper was the one most read by the clergy. Count Roger Lubieniecki established the "Wiaro" (Faith), a weekly devoted to ecclesiastical news; and these two publications are united into one. A scientifically important periodical, the "Tygodnik teologiczny" (Catholic Review), has appeared for a few years. At the present time, of the daily papers or periodicals for the clergy, or having a strictly Catholic programme, those most read are the "Polak katolik"; the "Mysł katolicka", of Czenstochowa; and the "Athenicum kaptański", of the seminary of Warsaw, a monthly scientific publication.

In Russia, the Lithuanian paper Dvina the "Litwa" (Lithuania) in defence of their nationality; while the Jews publish at Warsaw the "Jrechota", a weekly. The "Przewodnik bibliograficzny" (Bibliographical Guide) of Cracow, a monthly publication, and the "Przegląd bibliograficzny" of Przemysł are bibliographical periodicals which mention all Polish writings that have appeared in Poland, and of the writings that are published in the principal Polish reviews. The number of scientific periodicals devoted to medicine, veterinary surgery, pharmacetics, architecture, the fine arts, heraldry, archaeology, philology, etc., is about 100, which is proof of the intensity and the work of the Poles, who, notwithstanding their difficult political conditions, co-operate with much ardour in modern scientific movements. The Mariavites have a special organ, "Maryjawita"; and their "Wisdomośn" appears twice each week. At Warsaw there is published the tri-monthly periodical "Myśl niepogodą" (Independent Thought), full of vulgar calumnies and accusations against the Catholics of Poland.

In 1864 Polish fugitives established the "Ojczyzna" (Native Land) at Leipzig, the "Przyzło" (The Future) at Paris, and the "Przegląd powszechnej" at Dresden. At Chicago, U. S. A., the chief centre of Polish emigration, are published the "Dziennik wickoński" (Review of Wicko), the "Gazeta katolicka", the "Gazeta polska", the "Nowe Życie" (New Life), the "Sztandar", "Tygodnik naukowo-powieściowy", the "Wira i ojczyzna", "Zgoda", and "Zauro", a musical publication. Other papers are published at Milwaukee, Buffalo, New York, Detroit, Philadelphia, Winona, Cleveland, Toledo, Baltimore, Pittsburg, Stevens Point, Manitowoc, Chicago, and Wilkes-Barre. Brazil also has a Polish publication.

CRIMEA. Zarys najnowszej literatury polskiej (Craw, 1868). 8-233: Nowa, Dziennikom wicke powszechne w Americe i jego dzieje (Polish Periodical Literature in America, and its history for 30 years) (Chicago, 1864). AURELIO PALMIERI.

PORTUGAL.—An ephemeral news-sheet appeared in 1825, and a monthly gazette relating the progress of the War of Independence commenced in 1611, but Portuguese periodical literature really begins with the "Gazeta de Lisboa", founded by José Freire de Montevideo Mascarones, which lasted from 1715 to 1760. Until the end of the eighteenth century any discussions or opinions in matters of faith which might exist were not discussed in print, but notwithstanding the censorship, French ideas began to filter into Portugal, and early in the nineteenth century the press began to be divided between Liberal and Absolutist; the former advocating radical changes in State and Church, the latter defending Absolutism in politics, and Catholic orthodoxy. In 1768 appeared the "Mercurio" to combat the French Revolution, and this was followed by other anti-French journals, among them the "Observador Portugal". On the Liberal side came the "Investigador Portugal" in 1811 and the "Portuguez" in 1811, both published in London, from which the Liberal exiles directed their assault on the Old regime. "Vasco Portugal", was issued in 1798. The Revolution of 1820 gave a great stimulus to journalism, and the "Diario do Governo" began to be issued in that year. At first the Liberal papers were rather anti-Absolutist than anti-Catholic, but the Civil War led to the formation of two political camps, and Liberalism in politics came to mean Liberalism in religion. The activity of Freemasonry and the unprogressive ideas of the Absolutists were the causes. As early as 1823 the "Archivo da Religião Cristã" was founded "to combat error and impiety," but the papers of this period were devoted almost entirely to politics, all being very violent. Among those which argued for the abolition of the "Portuguese," directed by Carvalho, showed the greatest literary skill. The year 1827 saw the issue of an axially anti-clerical print, while the defence of Throne and Altar was carried on by the redoubtable Father José Agustinho de Macedo (q. v.) in the "Besta Esfolada" (Flayed Beast) and many other periodicals. In 1823, the "Defensor dos Jesuítas" (1823-33) was suspended by the principio Seculare, which, in the same year, was transferred to Braga; in 1833 the "Defensor dos Jesuítas" was issued to defend the Society, which fell with the other orders when the Liberals triumphed and Dom Miguel lost his throne.

The constitutional monarchy had an anti-clerical character from the first, and most of the papers took on the same tone. A Catholic Press became an absolute necessity, but as its supporters were mostly Miguelists, it was too political, and never exercised much religious influence over the nation. "The Peninsula," organ of the Miguelist exiles, supported the Catholic Absolutist cause until 1872, and the "Ação," of the same party, still exists. From 1840 to 1892 the chief Radical paper was the "Revolução de Septembro." The Catholic magazine called "Propagação da Fé" (1838); the "Cruz," an Oporto weekly; and the "Atalaia Católica," printed at Braga; but the other Catholic papers had a short life, though the "Bem Publico" (Public Weal) lasted from 1859 to 1877. In 1863 came the "Boletim do Clero e do Professorado," a pedagogic paper, in 1866 the "União Católica," a religious and literary weekly, and in 1871 the "Fé." The "Palavra" of Oporto was founded in 1872, and in 1874 the "Mensageiro do Coração de Jesus," the monthly organ of the Apostleship of Prayer, which in 1881 slightly changed its title. In 1883 was founded the "Instituições Cristãs," a fortnightly religious and scientific review, which, however, ceased in 1893; in 1885 the "Clero Português," a weekly ecclesiastical review; and in 1889 the "Voz do Evangelho," a monthly. While the Catholic papers lacked support, the secular press was expanding rapidly, and developed a more and more irreligious, or at least indifferentist, character. This is even more true of the Catholic Church in Scotland, and it seems to have been a case that even to name the principal secular newspapers, but it is enough to say that they favoured the subjection of Church to State and defended the laws of Agrarian ("Kill-friars") which suppressed the religious orders. This attitude has become more marked since the Revolution, nearly all the Monarchical papers having ceased publication, or passed over to the Republicans, who are mostly anti-Catholic.

The present Catholic Press consists of the following papers: Dalies.—The "Palavra," with a circulation of 12,000 and the "Correio do Norte," with 6,000, both at Oporto. The "Portugal" of Lisbon had a circulation of 20,000, but ceased to exist. The "Despertar" was proclaimed. The circulation of the irreligious "Seculo" and "Mundo" is no doubt greater than that of the three Catholic dailies combined. Weeklies.—The publishing house, "Veritas," at Guarda, prints a paper which appears under distinct titles in various provincial towns. Lisbon has the "Bem Publico," Guimarães the "Restauração," Oporto the "Época," and Vizeu the "Revista Católica." Monthlies.—The "Novo Mensageiro do Coração de Jesus," published by the Jesuits, ceased when the Society was expelled in October, 1910; the "Voz de Santos Antonio," a Franciscan print, had already been suspended by order of the Holy See for its Modernism; and the only existing review of importance is the "Rosário," issued by the Irish Dominicans at Lisbon.

If the Catholic Press limits itself in future to religious and social action, and lays aside the old methods in which it identified religion with the monarchy, it may regain some influence over those who have not altogether lost Christian sentiments. For some years before the Revolution it was too political and fought the enemies of the Church with their own arms.

EDGAR PRESTAGE.

SCOTLAND.—No Catholic periodical of any kind seems to have made its appearance in Scotland until after the Emancipation Act of 1829. Three years subsequent to the passing of that act, namely in April, 1832, James Smith, an Edinburgh solicitor, and father of the Bishop of Edinburgh, published a monthly journal called the "Edinburgh Catholic Magazine," editing it himself. The publication was suspended with the number of November, 1833, but was resumed in February, 1837. In April, 1838, however, Mr. Smith having removed to England, the word "Edinburgh" was dropped from the title of the magazine, which continued to be published in London until the end of 1842. More than fifty years later another monthly magazine, the "Scottish Catholic Monthly," was established and edited by Goldie Wilson. It existed for three years, from October, 1883, until December, 1886. The Benedictines of Fort Augustus founded and conducted a monthly magazine called "The Banner of the Westminster," in 1892, to November, 1903, as a quarterly, and from January, 1904, to December, 1905, as a monthly, after which it was discontinued. The French Premonstratensian Canons, who made a foundation in the Diocese of Galloway in 1889, and remained there for a few years, published for a short time, at irregular intervals, a periodical called the "Liberator," which was something of a literary curiosity, being written in English by French fathers whose acquaintance with that language was very rudimentary. A quarterly magazine, called "Guth ma-Bhidham" (the "Voice of the Year"), was started in 1904 by the Hon. R. Erskine, a convert to Catholicism, who, still (1911) edits it. The articles, which are of Catholic and general interest, are nearly all written in the Gaelic language. A little monthly, called the "Catholic Parish Magazine," is printed in Glasgow, and is localised (with parochial news) for a number of missions in Glasgow and the Clyde Valley. A Catholic daily press has ever been published in Scotland, although the possibility of successfully conducting such a paper, in Glasgow, has been more than once under consideration. Of weekly papers the first issued seems to have been the "Glasgow Free Press," which came into Catholic hands about 1850, and was published, under various editors, for several years. The "Northern Times" was started in opposition to this, but only survived about eighteen months. The "Irish Exile," another weekly, was started in 1884, and ran for about eighteen months. Finally, in 1888, the "Glasgow Observer" came into existence, and is now, with its affiliated papers, printed for circulation in Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and the north of Scotland. It is the only Catholic weekly published in Scotland. The "Glasgow Star," which was started in 1895, and was conducted for some years in the interest of the publicans, in opposition to the temperance policy of the "Observer," was finally (in 1908) acquired by the latter paper, which now issues it mid-weekly.

SPAIN.—The periodical press in Spain began to exist early in the history of that country. The "Enciclopedia Hispano-Americana," in the article "periodismo," mentions news publications as early as the time of Charles V., and the "manifiestos de los periodicos," of 1508-99 (p. 191), gives 1661 as the date when the first periodical appeared in Spain. The publication of this kind of literature continued to develop in succeeding years until it reached a maximum in 1855, when 147,622,800 units were published; the number then diminished until, in 1789, it had sunk to two, increasing once more to fourteen in 1786. The publications of this period treated of politics, commercial, and literary matters, though such a periodical as the "Apologista Universal", believed to have been edited by Fray Pedro de Centeno, did not publish another number.

The Catholic Press as we now have it did not exist until a later period, when the attacks of gallicizing Liberals and Voltaireans upon the Catholic Religion roused Catholics to defend the traditional doctrines.
The liberty of the Press decreed by the Cortes of Cadiz, in 1812, resulted in a remarkable chilblain among the press and in 1814 the number of periodicals amounted to twenty-three, while Father Alvarado, the Dominican, wrote his famous articles, under the title "Cartas de un filósofo rancio" (Letters of a Soured Philosopher), against the new doctrines which the French Revolutionists had planted in Spain, and the nascent Liberal Press were striving to destroy in its time.

Agustín de Castro, the Hierarchy and "La Atalya de la Mancha" (The Watch-Tower of La Mancha). On 25 April, 1815, a decree of Ferdinand VII prohibited the publication of any periodical ex-cpt "La Gaceta" and "El Diario de Madrid". But when the Constitution of 1820 proclaimed the liberty of the Press, the "Estado" of Liberal cir-scription was attained.

Mesonero Romanos, in his "Recollections of a Septuagenarian" (Madrid, 1880, p. 453, speaking of this era in Spanish history, uses the expression:"the indiscreet attempt made by the political press in the periodical constitutional period of 1820-23."
No Catholic periodicals were published at this time, since the same author authored the "Espíritu Absoluto" and maintained a complete silence as the only means of avoiding the attacks of the journalists.

It must be borne in mind that the Catholics of that time were, as a general rule, Absolutists. In 1823 the king was again absolute, and once more he silenced the Press, which declined for a number of years, until the triumph of Liberalism during the remembrances of the Decembrists to a new life.
The number of periodicals reached forty in 1837, and constant increase thereafter.

Among the Catholic periodicals which appeared during the reign of Isabella II, may be mentioned the Carlist publications. "El Católico" and "La Esperanza", the latter founded by Padre de la Hoz, "El Hijo Patrio" and "El Diario de la Mancha" was edited by the famous philosopher Balment, who had begun his career as a journalist with "La Civilización", published at Barcelona, in collaboration with Ferrer y Subirana, before leaving him to found "Societad". Navarro Villalda was the editor of "El Pensamiento Español", and such distinguished writers as Gabino Tejado, Juan Mayordomo, Esteban de la Barca, etc., were its regular contributors. Candido Nocedal founded "La Constancia", a short-lived publication, in which the distinguished Catholic journalist and writer Ramón Nocedal made his first efforts. All these periodicals disappeared during the period of the Revolution.
After the Revolution, and when the Carlist War had been brought to a subordination, Candido Nocedal, having, with other moderate members of the Isabela-list Party, joined the Carlists, founded "El Siglo Futuro" in 1874. Vicente de la Hoz, son of the former editor of "La Esperanza", founded "La Fé", and Suarez Bravo "El Fenix", which lasted only two years. Alejandro Pital revives "El Espíritu Catholic", which had existed before the Revolution. At Seville there are published "El Diario de Sevilla", which will always be associated with the name of that illustrious writer Padre Francisco Mateos Gago. Upon the death of Candido Nocedal, who had been the leader of the Carlist Party since the end of the Civil War, different periodicals were published; the number then diminished until, in 1789, it had sunk to two, increasing once more to fourteen in 1786. The publications of this period treated of

It is difficult to say anything with certainty as to the future of the Catholic Press in Spain, though there is a reasonable ground for a hopeful view. The one thing evident is, that within the last few years, the number of Catholic publications with this country has considerably increased, and that an active propaganda is in progress in favour of the Catholic Press.

Many Catholics, it seems, are awakening from their lethargy and are beginning to realize the necessity of using every possible means to counteract the pernicious effects of the evil press. The "Asociación de la Prensa Cívica de Valencia," with this country has already held two conferences. A Catholic agency has been formed to supply news to Catholic newspapers, and some of the new periodicals, such as "La Gaceta del Norte", give much information and are equipped with excellent typographic facilities.

SWITZERLAND.—The history of Swiss journalism goes back to the beginning of the seventeenth century, the first Swiss newspaper being issued at Basle in 1610. It is significant that the early newspapers of Switzerland, which was at that time only nominally free, hardly discussed political matters excepting those of foreign origin, and remained so until well into the eighteenth century. The censorship exercised at that time was so strict that it did not seem advisable to raise questions concerning home politics. Even in the middle of the eighteenth century, writers of objectionable articles were blantly notified to give up writing for newspapers. The political newspaper did not appear until at the close of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century, when freedom of the Press was gradually allowed. This freedom, however, for a long time existed chiefly in the Protestant cantons. Catholic journalism in the present sense is a recent growth, and does not extend farther back than the third decade of the last century, when the first Catholic newspapers appeared and began to grow up. The reasons for this were partly of a political and partly of an economic character. Switzerland is a federation of twenty-five cantons, each of which up to 1815 was absolutely sovereign and up to 1874 was practically sovereign. Even now the cantons possess many of the rights of sovereignty, though not as many as the States of the American Revolution. Hence the political Press has mainly a cantonal or local character, dealing with the interests of the sub-divisions of a small state.

All the Catholic cantons are relatively small, some of them not having more than 20,000 or 30,000 inhabitants. Moreover, the population is mostly rural. Except Lucerne and Fribourg, they do not contain important cities, and, finally, the Catholic party for many years totally misjudged the importance and influence of the political Press in general, and let itself be outstripped by their opponents. The first strong impulse to the founding of a Catholic Press was given by the civil war of 1847, called the war of "Kulturkampf" in German, and with the defeat of the seven Catholic cantons, which then placed largely at the mercy of a violent Liberalism. This was still more the case in the cantons made up of Catholic and Protestant districts. The Catholic Press grew very rapidly during the sixth decade of the past century and still more so during the Swiss "Kulturkampf" of the seventies. More recently a large emigration of Catholics into Protestant cantons has increased the demand for Catholic newspapers in these cantons. Switzerland has now a Catholic Press in the Catholic cantons, in those where Catholics and Protestants are on a parity, and in the Protestant cantons.

The statistics are as follows: In 1913 Switzerland had 399 political newspapers, of which 64 were Catholic. Of these 64 Catholic papers, 1 daily, 12 weekly, 10 are issued 6 times weekly, 1 is issued 5 times weekly, 3 appear 4 times weekly, 22 appear 3 times, 13 appear twice weekly, and 14 once a week. 50 are published in German, 9 in French, 4 in Italian, and 1 in Rhaeto-Romanic. The number of copies issued at an edition are, taken altogether, as follows: the 4 daily papers, including the Catholic Press of the canton of Lucerne, have a circulation of 52,000 copies; 3 that appear 4 times weekly, 8,000 copies; 22 appearing 3 times weekly, 57,000; 13 appearing twice weekly, 30,000; 1 appearing once a week, 60,000. Thus the 64 Catholic papers have a total circulation of 207,000. The Canton of Aargau has 6; Appenzell Outer Rhodes, none; Appenzell Inner Rhodes, 1; half-canton of Basel-Stadt, 1; half-canton of Basel-Land, none; Berne, 3; Fribourg, 1; St. Gall, 12; Geneva, 1; Glarus, 3; Grisons, 3; Lucerne, 5; Neuchâtel, none; Schaffhausen, 1; Schwyz, 5; Solothurn, 3; Ticino, 3; Thurgau, 1; half-canton of Nidwald, 1; half-canton of Obwald, 1; Uri, 1; Vaud, 2; Valais, 5; Zürich, 1; Aargau, 5; Glarus, 5; Lucerne, 5; Neuchâtel, 5; Schaffhausen, 5; Schwyz, 5; Solothurn, 5; Ticino, 5; Thurgau, 5; Nidwald, 1; Obwald, 1; Uri, 1; Vaud, 2; Valais, 5; Zürich, 5. The cantons have 28 Catholic papers, including 5 dailies, the Protestant cantons, 9, including 4 dailies and 1 appearing 5 times weekly.

Although the Catholic Press of Switzerland has grown enormously in the last thirty years, and need no fear comparison with that of other countries, yet that of entirely Catholic, yet the result is much less satisfactory and even disappointing if we compare the Catholic with the anti-Catholic Press according to the census of 1913 Switzerland has in round numbers 5,700,000 inhabitants. Of these about 1,500,000 are Catholics. From this we should deduce the liberal papers, a fairly large element, and the foreign works, Italian men and women, jornymen-mechanics, servants, etc., that are only temporary residents. Consequently only about 1,200,000 Catholics can be taken into consideration for the present purpose. We shall compare only the dailies. A comparison between the weekly papers would not yield a much better result, as is evident from the fact that there are only 64 Catholic political papers to counterbalance 399 non-Catholic, and for 260 non-Catholic weeklies that appear 1 to 4 times weekly there are only 53 Catholic ones. The daily non-Catholic Press of Switzerland includes 67 newspapers; of these 44 are extreme Liberal, that is, hostile to the Church and in part disposed to renew the "Kulturkampf". 3 of these appear twice a day, total circulation, 214,000; 7 Liberal-Conservative, Protestant in faith, and generally friendly to Catholics, total circulation 46,000; 10 Social-Democratic and belonging to the Democratic party of the Left, partly hostile to Catholics but not inclined to carry on a "Kulturkampf", total circulation 51,000; 7 politically indifferent, total circulation 164,000. Taken altogether, as before said, 67 papers with a total circulation of 508,000, opposed to which are 12 Catholic dailies, one of which appears 5 times weekly, with a total circulation of 52,000. In proportion to the population there should be at least 20 with a circulation of 152,000. The total circulation of all the 64 Catholic Swiss papers is 207,000 copies, not the half of the total circulation of the non-Catholic dailies, and the total circulation of the extreme Liberal dailies alone is much larger than the total circulation of all the Catholic papers taken together. It should be further added that up to now the Catholic Press contains no paper of two daily editions, and that the best non-Catholic newspapers exceed the Catholic ones in copiousness of matter,.et al. is also worthy of notice that the Catholic daily with the largest circulation, the "Vaterland", has about 11,000 subscribers among Catholics, while among the 63,000 subscribers to the politically and ecclesiastically indifferent "Zürcher Tagesanzeiger", there are about 20,000 Catholics. Again, it is not a Catholic weekly that has the largest circulation among Catholics, but it is the rather Liberal inclined "Schweiz, Wochenzeitung" of Zurich. Yet the Catholic party is the second in strength in Switzerland.

But the Liberal and Protestant parties are socially and economically in a far better position, they control the larger part of the cities, while the majority of the Catholic population represent the country and mountain districts, which have less need of a daily paper. On the other hand, the daily Press of the Social Democratic party and of the Democratic party of the Left have a total circulation of 51,000, although they draw their readers almost entirely from the lower classes of the population. However, the Swiss Catholic Press is earnest, courageous, and on the whole is able and effective as a greater force than that case with the greater part of the Liberal Press. The principal Catholic newspapers of Switzerland are: the "Vaterland", founded at Lucerne in 1873; the "Neuen-Zürcher Nachrichten", established at Zurich in 1904; the "Österreichische Tageblatt", in 1874 at St. Gall; the "Basler Volksblatt", in 1875 at Basel; and the "Liberaler" of Fribourg. Among Catholic periodicals the following should be mentioned: "Die Schweiz, Kirchenzeitung", of Lucerne, a theological review that has a high reputation among the German clergy also; the "Schweiz, Rundschau", issued at Stans, a Catholic scientific and literary review; the "Schweiz, sozialpolit., Blätter", or "Social Politics, Magazine" of Einsiedeln, an illustrated Catholic family paper, which has a large circulation also in Germany and Austria; the "Zukunft", of Einsiedeln, a Catholic review for the Swiss associations for young men; various religious Sunday papers for the people; an illustrated supplement for Catholic newspapers; a large number of Catholic calendars, newspapers in the language of particular societies, etc. The five papers for Catholic workmen and working women have been included among the political newspapers.

GEORG BAUMBERGER.

The United States — According to "The Official Catholic Directory" for 1911, there are 321 Catholic periodicals published in the United States. Of these about two-thirds, or 201, are printed in English, 51 in German, 21 in French, 21 in Polish, 7 in Bohemian, 5 in Italian, 2 in Slavonic, 2 in Magyar, 2 in Dutch, 1 in Croatian, 1 in Spanish, 1 in an Indian dialect. These make up 15 dailies, 115 weeklies, 128 monthlies, 29 quarterlies, 2 bi-weeklies, 5 semi-weeklies, 4 set-weeklies, 9 bi-monthlies, and 16 annuals. Of the dailies 7 are French, 4 Polish, 2 German, and 1 Bohemian; none is English. The French Canadians of Maine, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island support seven dailies, eleven weeklies, one semi-weekly, one monthly, and a quarterly, all of which are printed in French. The "Indiana Freeman" (500 copies) is the only German weekly in the United States. The periodicals were started in the United States, but only five of those published during the first half of the nineteenth century survive. Several attempts have been made to establish a news association of Catholic papers, notably at Cincinnati, in May, 1860, but nothing practical came of these efforts. According to data the Catholic publications are divided up as follows: Alabama, 2; Arizona, 1; Arkansas, 1; California, 9; Colorado, 2; Connecticut, 5; Delaware, 4; District of Columbia, 7; Illinois, 30; Indiana, 11; Iowa, 8; Kansas, 4; Kentucky, 5; Louisiana, 2; Maine, 2; Maryland, 10; Massachusetts, 13; Michigan, 11; Minnesota, 7; Missouri, 15; Montana, 1; Nebraska, 2; New Hampshire, 1; New Jersey, 1; New Mexico, 1; New York, 61; North Carolina, 2; Ohio, 23; Oregon, 7; Pennsylvania, 29; Rhode Island, 1; South Carolina, 2; Tennessee, 2; Texas, 6; Utah, 1; Washington, 2; West Virginia, 1; Wisconsin, 21.

Many publications advocating Irish interests are, and have been, edited by Catholics and addressed to a Catholic constituency, but they are secular political enterprises, and are not to be properly enumerated under the head of religious publications (see Irish, THE IN COUNTRIES OTHER THAN IRELAND. — I. THE UNITED STATES.

The "Catholic Review" — The first Catholic newspaper printed in the United States was due to the enterprise of Father Gabriel Richard, of Detroit, Michigan. In 1808 he visited Baltimore, and while there bought a printing press and a font of type which he sent over the mountains to Detroit (then a frontier town) and set up in the house of one Jacques Lasselle, in the suburbs. Mrs. Springwell, in her press, the lever of which is still preserved in the museum of the Historical Society, she printed, on 31 August, 1809, the first issue of "The Michigan Essay, or Impartial Observer", containing sixteen columns and a half in English, and one column and a half in French, on miscellaneous topics. There is no local news included in its contents, and only one editorial, on "The right of man to erect the house of St. Anne's school, Detroit. The imprint states the paper was printed and published by James M. Miller, but under the direction of Father Richard. It was to appear every Thursday: only one issue, however, was made, and of this but five copies are extant. The next journalistic effort was in New York, where Thomas O'Connor, father of the jurist Charles O'Connor (q. v.), began, 10 December, 1810, a weekly called the "Shamrock, or Hibernian Chronicle", which ceased publication 17 August, 1817. It was revived as a monthly called "The Globe" in 1819 and lasted a year. His pen, says his son, "was ever directed in vindicating the fame of Ireland, the honour of our United American country; for the truth; his only end was 'mother the Apostolic Church'." Although these two papers were not distinctlyively religious journals, they were Catholic in tone and teaching, as might be expected from their Catholic direction.

Bishop England of Charleston (see ENGLAND, JOHN) follows, in 1822, with his "United States Catholic Miscellany." The writer would add, says the bishop, in a history of his diocese which he published while on a visit to Dublin, in 1832, "that during upwards of ten years he and his associates have, at a very serious pecuniary loss, not to mention immense labour, published a weekly paper, 'The United States Catholic Miscellany', in which the cause of Ireland at home and Irishmen abroad, and of the Catholic religion through the world, has been defended to the best of their ability. This paper is published every week on a large sheet of eight pages containing twenty-four pages of letter press, in the city of Charleston." Its publication ceased in 1861, as a result of the War of Secession. One of the bishop's most efficient assistants in this enterprise was a woman of fine culture and much mental vigour, who has never received proper credit for all the variety of solid work she did on the paper. With the second quarter of the nineteenth century came the great influx of Catholic immigrants and a consequent development of the Catholic Press. The pioneer journal of this era was The Truth Teller*, the first number of which was published in New York, on 2 April 1825, with the imprint of W. E. Andrews & Co., which was continued on the first six issues of the paper. William Eusebius Andrews (q. v.) was the English publisher who was so active in England, during Bishop Milner's time, and his connexion with the New York venture is now explainable only as he was then printing a “Truth Teller” in New York, on 2 April 1825. William Denman (q. v.) and George Pardoe are given as the proprietors of the New York “Truth Teller”, and so continued until 2 January, 1830, when Pardoe sold his interest to Denman, and the latter remained its sole proprietor until 31 March, 1855, when he disposed of it to the owners of the “Irish American”, who shortly after merged it in that paper.

Denman, in the early days of the “Truth Teller”, had the assistance, as contributors, of the Rev. Dr. John Power, rector of St. Peter's Church, the Rev. Thomas Levins, a former Jesuit and a man of ripe learning and ability, Dr. William James MacNeven (q. v.), the Rev. Joseph A. Schellert, the Rev. Fenix Venable and Thomas O'Connor, but the paper becoming tainted with tractism (see TRUSTEE SYSTEM), and opposing Bishop Dubois, a rival, the “Weekly Register and Catholic Diary” was started on 5 October, 1833, by Fathers Schneller and Levins. It lasted three years, and was succeeded, in 1839, by the “Catholic Journal” (q. v.), in 1840, by the “ Freeman’s Journal”, then a year old. The editors at first were James W. and John E. White, nephews of Gerald Griffin, the Irish novelist. Eugene Casserly (q. v.) and John T. Devereux succeeded them, and in 1842 Bishop Hughes took the paper to keep it alive, and made his assistant, the Rev. James McMaster (q. v.) Bishop Boydwards (Archbishop of Baltimore), its editor. In 1848 the bishop offered to give the paper to Orestes A. Brownson (q. v.), but soon after sold it to James A. McMaster (q. v.), the latter borrowing the money for its purchase from George Hecker, a brother of the Rev. Isaac T. Hecker (q. v.), founder of the Paulists. McMaster continued as its editor and proprietor until his death, 29 Dec., 1856. In 1861, because of its violent State’s Rights editorials, it was suppressed by the Government, and did not resume publication until 19 April, 1862. Maurice Francis Fgin was editor of the paper for two years after McMaster’s death, and in 1864 the Rev. Dr. Louis A. Conwell (q. v.) purchased its proprietorship (q. v.); d. at Pennsylvania, 27 September, 1910) took the position and so continued until his death.

New York City was, during the first half of the nineteenth century, the leader in Catholic journalism. The pioneer papers devoted their space mainly to controversial articles explanatory of the truths of the Faith, and in defence of the teachings of the Church in answer to attack and calumny. The assaults of the Native American and Know-nothing periods also largely engaged their attention. In this they were assisted by a number of journals not strictly religious, but political and social, edited by Catholics, and for a numerous constituency Irish by birth or descent. Of these the oldest, “The Irish American”, founded 12 August, 1849, by Patrick Lynch (b. at Kilkenny, Ireland, 1811; d. in Brooklyn, New York, May, 1857); edited from 1857 until 1906 by his step-son Patrick J. Meehan (b. at Limerick, Ireland, 17 July, 1837; d. at Jersey City, New York, 28 February, 1882), “The Catholic Telegraph” of Cincinnati (founded 1831), “Pilot” of Boston (1837), “Freeman’s Journal” of New York (1840), and “Catholic” of Pittsburgh (1846), alone survive in 1911, of the many Catholic papers in existence in the United States during the first half of the nineteenth century. In October, 1848, Thomas D’Arcy McGee began in New York a paper called “The Nation” which lasted until June, 1850, its end being hastened by McGee’s violent controversy with Bishop Hughes. Another venture of his, “The American Celt”, completed in June, 1857, had a peripatetic existence of four years—in Boston, Buffalo, and New York—when it was purchased by D. & J. Sadlier and made over into a new paper, “The Tablet”, the first number of which appeared on 5 June of that year, with Bernard Doran Kilkan as its editor. Its successors in New York were the papers dug in 1863, included Dr. J. V. Huntington, William Denman, Mrs. M. A. Sadlier, Dr. Henry J. Anderson, O. A. Brownson, Lawrence Kelhoe, and D. P. Conyngham. Archbishop Hughes started, in 1859, as his personal organ, “The Metropolitan Record”, which ceased publication in 1873. During all this time John Mullally was its editor.

In 1872 “The Catholic Review”, a paper combining the ideals of progressive modern journalism under the direction of a man who had had practical newspaper training, was begun by Patrick V. Hickey (b. in Dublin, Ireland, 14 Feb., 1816; d. in Brooklyn, New York, 21 Feb., 1880). For a time it met with success as a high-class weekly, and, to meet the demand for a cheap popular paper, Hickey printed also, in 1888, “The Catholic American” and the “Illustrated Catholic American”. After his death, the Rev. J. Talbot Smith edited “The Review”, which ceased to exist in 1890. Mr. Herman Ridder founded “The Catholic American” in 1888. Bishop Hughes was the first to buy it from him. John Gilmary Shea closed his long and splendid career as its editor, 22 Feb., 1892. The “News” attained a very large and widespread circulation as a medium of entertaining and instructive reading matter for the masses under the business management of Henry Ritter and the editorial direction of Michael J. Madigan.

Several attempts have been made to establish a paper in the Diocese of Brooklyn, notably the “Catholic Examiner”, in 1882, and the “Leader”, in 1884. Both were shortlived. In June, 1908, the “Tablet” was started. In February, 1909, it was made a diocesan organ and purchased by a company made up of diocesan priests. Albany had a “Catholic Pioneer” in 1853, followed by several other ventures with brief existences. The “Catholic Sun” of Syracuse, in 1892, succeeded the “Catholic Reflector” of the early sixties and the equally shortlived “Vindicator” and “Sentinel”. The “Sun” is also celebrated as the “Catholic Chronicle” in Albany, the “Catholic Light” in Utica, and the “Catholic Light” in Saratoga, Penn. The Newark, New Jersey, “Monitor” was begun in September, 1906. Buffalo, New York, also had several experiences, beginning with D’Arcy McGee’s “American Celt”, in 1852, and culminating in the “Catholic Union and Times”, the “Union” starting in 1872, and being combined later with the “Times”, founded in 1877 by the Rev. Louis A. Lambert, at Waterloo. For most of the years of its progress the editor was the Rev. Patrick Cronin (b. in Ireland, 1835; d. at North Tonawanda, New York, 12 Dec., 1006), a forceful and able writer and a recognized leader among the Irish-American element in the United States.

The Catholic papers of Philadelphia start with the Hogan schism (see CONWELL, HENRY), the “Catholic Herald and Weekly Register” being issued 30 Nov., 1822, by E. F. Crozet to support the rebellious priest. To offset its influence and assist Bishop Connell, the “Catholic American” and Irish Catholic Union was started 22 Feb., 1823. In August, 1822, the “Erin”, a national paper, was first issued. These were followed in 1833 by the “Catholic Herald”, which had a stormy existence under the editorial management of a convert, Henry Major, who was a professor in the diocesan seminary. Disappointed in his ambition, Major relapsed to Episcopalianism, though he reported in his last illness. He was a bitter antagonist of Orsести A. Brownstein in the controversies that were carried on during the fifties by the editors of the Catholic publications of that period. Another "Catholic Herald" was issued 22 June, 1872, by Mare F. Valette, and had a brief existence. The "Catholic Standard," started 6 June, 1866, was suspended 20 Feb., 1867, but resumed publication on 22 June of the same year. Its first editor was the Rev. D. James Kogh; others were Mark Wilcox, George D. Wolf, and F. T. Fucy. In 1871 Hardy & Mahony became its publishers, and 7 Dec., 1885, it combined (under the title of "Catholic Standard and Times") with the "Catholic Times", a rival which had the Rev. Louis A. Lambert as editor, and the first number of which appeared 12 May, 1878. But success and correspondence are regarded as authoritative, and frequently quoted by the secular Press. A monthly, the "Irish Catholic Benevolent Union Journal", with Martin I. J. Grifin as editor, began in March, 1873; it had its title changed in March, 1894, to "Griffin's Journal," and suspended in July, 1900.

Bishop Michael O'Conner, of Pittsburg, founded (16 March, 1844) "The Pittsburg Catholic". Its manager and proprietor was J. F. Boylan, with whom was associated a printer named Jacob Porter, a convert. On 30 June, 1847, Porter and Henry McNaghten bought the paper with which Porter retained his connexion until 1889. He died in his eighty-third year, 11 April, 1920. P. Gallagher, president of the Pittsburg seminary, born in County Donegal, Ireland, in 1815, and ordained priest in 1840. In 1852 he went to San Francisco, where he started the "Catholic Standard" the following year. He died there in 1885. The "Catholic Observer" of Pittsburg dates from 1819. The "Emerald Virginian," started in July, 1829, moved to Norfolk, Virginia, in August, 1888, suspended in July, 1889. During the seventies, under Bishop Mullen's patronage the "Lake Shore Visitor" was published at Erie, Pennsylvania, for several years.

Bishop Fenwick, feeling that a journalistic organ was needed in Boston, started "The Jesuit, or Catholic Sentinel", the first number of which was dated 5 September, 1829. "The rapid increase and respectability of Roman Catholics in Boston and throughout the New England States," says the prospectus, "lately calls for the publication of a Newspaper, in which the Doctrine of the Holy Catholic Church, ever the same, from the Apostolic Age down to our time, may be truly expressed and faithfully delivered. Objection having been made that the name "The Jesuit" was prejudicial to the increase of circulation, Bishop Fenwick, after four months, allowed the title to be changed to "The Catholic Intelligencer", but in a short time went back to the original style. This did not improve conditions, and, on 27 December, 1831, another title, "The Catholic Standard", was announced; during 1835, however, the paper was called "The Literary and Catholic Sentinel", and on 2 January, 1836, evolved into "The Boston Pilot", a name subsequently changed to "The Pilot". The first editors were George Pepper and Dr. J. S. Bartlett, and the printers and publishers Patrick Donohoe and Henry L. Devereux. Patrick Donohoe (q. v.), who became connected with "The Pilot", in 1835, by the withdrawal of Devereux, assumed the ownership of the enterprise, which in the course of a few years grew into one of the most important paper of national circulation and influence, advocating Catholic and Irish interests. The editors under whose direction this success was achieved were Thomas D'Arcy McGee, the Rev. J. P. Roddan, the Rev. Joseph M. Finotti (q. v.), John Boyle O'Reilly, James J. Roche, and Katherine E. Conway. Over the pen name of "Laffan", Michael Hennessy, of the editorial staff of the New York daily "Times" (b. at Thomastown, Co.

Kilkenny, Ireland, 8 Sept., 1832; d. in Brooklyn, New York, 23 July, 1892, contributed for years weekly articles on Catholic and Irish historical and genealogical topics that had a very wide popularity. The Rev. John P. Roddan was a Boston priest educated at the Propaganda, Rome, and on his return home made pastor at Quincy, Mass., where, in addition to his pastoral duties, he edited "The Pilot". He was a friend of Orsести A. Brownstein, and wrote his "Review". Boyle O'Reilly's connexion with "The Pilot" began about 1870, and continued till his death in 1890. On the failure of Patrick Donohoe's bank and publishing house in 1876, Archbishop Williams came to his rescue and purchased a three-fourths interest in "The Pilot" for the benefit of the depositors in the bank. O'Reilly's management, which he gave to the business as well as the editorial management. In 1890 the venerable Patrick Donohoe, who had bravely gone to work to rehabilitate his fortunes, was able to buy back "The Pilot" and resumed its management, which he held until his death, 18 March, 1891. In June, 1908, Archbishop O'Connell bought "The Pilot" from the Donohoe family and made it the official diocesan organ of the diocese and a distinctively Catholic journal.

When Orsести A. Brownstein became a Catholic he attended the church in East Boston of which the Rev. Nicholas O'Brien was pastor. Father O'Brien in 1847 persuaded Brownstein to join him in the publication of the "Pro-Catholic" in the Rev. Mr. O'Brien's interest for the management of the paper, which suspended after two years' existence. In 1852 a number of priests organized a corporation which began the publication of "The Sacred Heart Review". Under the direction of Mgr John O'Brien it attained a great reputation for enterprise and literary merit. Another effort was made by the Rev. Fr. Maguire. The "Press" of 1858, "Kilkenny", was started by Patrick Maguire, but more as a political, than a strictly Catholic organ. In Connecticut Bishop Fenwick was even earlier with his journalistic venture than he was in Boston, for the "Catholic Press" was begun in Hartford, on 11 July, 1829. In its office he started the first Sunday school, 19 July, 1829, and there, too, Mass was offered up for the few Catholics composing the pioneer colony. The "Press" did not long survive, and its successor did not arrive until 1876, when the "Connecticut Catholic" was begun. Twelve years later Bishop Tierney purchased this paper and made it, as the "Catholic Transcript", official diocesan property, with the Rev. T. S. Duggan as editor. In 1881 the Island the Providence Visitor dates from 1877.

The "Catholic Mirror" was established at Baltimore in 1849, and, as an expression of Southern opinion and the diocesan organ, had, in its early years, considerable influence. After the War, however, its prestige waned, and, in spite of several efforts to keep it alive, it suspended in 1908. Kentucky's first Catholic paper, the "Catholic Advocate", was founded in 1835 by Ben. J. Webb, then foreman printer of the Louisville "Journal", encouraged in the scheme by the Rev. Dr. Reynolds and the Rev. Dr. Martin J. Spalding. It took the place of the "Minerva", a monthly magazine, founded in 1834, and edited by the faculty of St. Joseph's College, Bardstown. In the old "Advocate" many of the most valuable papers written by Bishop Spalding first appeared. In May, 1858, it was succeeded by the "Catholic Guardian", started in Louisville by the members of the local Particular Council of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, which had a fair success, but which was suspended with the outbreak of the War in July, 1862. The "Catholic Advocate" was revived later as the "Central Catholic Advocate", and in 1896 the "Midland Review" was started to rival it. There was not room for both so the new absorbed the old journal; but, in spite of the fact that the publication was high-class, it died after a checkpered existence of five years. Its editor was a versatile writer of both poetry and prose, Charles J. O'Malley, who edited the "Angelic" magazine and the Louisville paper. When he found that his field there was too limited for any practical success, he took the editorial management of the "Catholic Sun" of Syracuse, N. Y., whence he went to Chicago to take charge of the "New World", in which position he died 29 April, at Germania, Kenosha, February 1857.

In the period before the Civil War the "Advocate" and the Baltimore "Mirror" were important and influential factors in Catholic affairs. The Louisville "Catholic Record", a diocesan organ, dates from 1878.

Other Southern papers are the New Orleans "Morning Star", established in 1867, and of which two for a time, the Rev. Abram J. Ryan and James R. Randall, were at times editors; "The Southern Catholic", begun in 1874 at Memphis, Tenn., suspended, and followed by the "Catholic Journal". In Missouri "The Shepherd of the Valley" started at St. Louis in 1852 with a convert, R. A. Bakewell, as its editor. It suspended in 1858, was revived in 1854, and lasted three years longer. Bakewell, who died in 1897, created much trouble by his editorials, which were used for years as anti-Catholic annihilation by the Native American and Know-nothing politicians. It was the time of O'Connell's Irish agitation for repeal of the union with England, and he tried to raise the same agitation in America, and he also antagonized the Irish-American element. Although the Catholic constituency, to which their publications appealed, was mainly Irish, many of these convert editors went out of their way to offend Irish susceptibilities. Bakewell's denunciation of Thomas Francis Meagher, John Mitchell, the Rev. Dr. Cahill, and other popular Irishmen enraged "my Irish constituents", he tells Brownson, in a letter dated 7 January, 1853. Brownson, in an article in his "Review" of July, 1854, on Native-Americanism raised a storm by the manner in which he referred to the Irish element. After it was printed, Father Hecker, founder of the Paulists, wrote to him: "The Irish prelates and priests have become mighty tender on the point of nationality. Your dose on Native-Americanism has operated on them and operated powerfully, and especially at the West. They felt sore, and let me add also weak from its effects. ... The truth is, I fear, that there may before long come a collision on this point with our Native-Americans increasing steadily in numerical strength, and will in time predominate; and at the present moment, on account of the state of the public mind, has great moral weight, and this in itself must excite unpleasant feelings on the other side." The "Western Watchman" of St. Louis, Missouri, edited and controlled by the Rev. D. S. Phelan, may be called the last of the old style personal organs, and has been running a strenuous course since 1865. In 1846 a predecessor, the "Catholic News Letter", began an existence of three years, and in 1857 a stock company was formed which combined an existing weekly, the "Catholic World", until then published in Illinois, with the "Church Teacher" and "Mirror" as the "Watchman". For several years Conde B. Pallen held the position of editor of the "Progress".

The Cincinnati "Catholic Telegraph", established in 1831, now the oldest surviving Catholic publication of the United States, enjoyed during the early years of its existence the patronage of the society. Its publication in the United States, under the editorial direction of its founder, the Rev. Edmund Purcell, the Rev. S. H. Roser drawn and the Rev. J. F. Callaghan, Bishop Gilmour, of Cleveland, was a strong advocate of the value of a Catholic paper, and, beginning in 1874, spent a considerable amount of money, time, and personal effort in trying to establish the "Catholic University" in his cathedral city. Mention of Tello was the editor during its early years. The "Catholic Columbian" of Columbus started in 1875, and the "Record" of Toledo in 1865.

The first best known widely circulated Western publication is the "Ave Maria", a scholarly literary weekly, founded by Father Sorin of the Congregation of the Holy Cross, at Notre Dame, Indiana, in 1865. For the first issues the editor was Father Gillespie, C.S.C., and his sister, the well known Mother Mary St. Angela Gillespie (see Gillespie, Eliza Maria), was a frequent contributor. In 1874 the Rev. Daniel E. Hudson, C.S.C., took charge. An early venture in Chicago was the "Western Tablet", in 1852, under the editorial direction of a convert, M. L. Linton. Another editor was James A. Mulligan, more famous as the author of the 23rd Illinois volunteers of the Civil War (the 1st Illinois Irish) and was born at Utica, New York, 25 June, 1830, and went to Chicago in 1836. He studied law before becoming an editor. His heroic defence of Lexington, Ky., in September, 1861, where, with 2,800 men, he withstood an army of 22,000, made him a popular hero. He died, 27 June, 1864, from wounds received two days before the battle of Kernstown, Va. The "Western Tablet" did not survive, and it had several ill-starred successors until the "New World" appeared in 1892. Three years later the "Western Catholic" was printed at Quincy, Ill. The "Michigan Catholic" of Detroit dates from 1872. In October, 1868, the "Star of Bethlehem" was established as a monthly at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, by the St. Louis Brothers. Two years later they sold the paper to the "Catholic Visitor", which had been established in November, 1870, at Monroe, Wis., by Dr. D. W. Nolan and the Rev. John Casey. The "Catholic Visitor" and "Star of Bethlehem" were consolidated, and established in Milwaukee, November, 1857. In November, 1857, Edward A. Bray and the Rev. G. L. Willard, having purchased the "Catholic Visitor" from Dr. D. W. Nolan, changed the name to the "Catholic Citizen". In 1880 H. J. Desmond undertook its editorial management.

Other Western papers are the "Catholic Tribune", Dubuque, Iowa (1899); "Intermountain Catholic", Salt Lake City, Utah (1899); the "Catholic Bulletin", St. Paul, Minn. (1911); "True Voice", Omaha, Neb. (1893); "Catholic Register", Kansas City, Mo. (1899); "Catholic Sentinel", Portland, Oregon (1870). In San Francisco, Calif., the "Monitor" is one of the veterans dating back to 1853. Later, in 1869, the "Leader" are the "Leader" of the same city (1892); the "Catholic Herald" of Sacramento (1908); and the "Tidings" of Los Angeles (1895).

Magazines and Periodicals.—The first Catholic magazine was the "Metropolitan", or Catholic Monthly Magazine" issued at Baltimore, Md., January, 1830. It lived a year. Another "Metropolitan" began in February, 1855, but also failed to make a permanent impression. In January, 1812, the "Religious Cabinet", a monthly, edited by Rev. Dr. Charles J. White and Rev. James Dolan, was started in Baltimore. After a year its title was changed to the "United States Catholic Magazine", which Rev. Dr. White and Dr. J. V. Huntington were its most noted editors, and the contributors included Archbishop M. J. Spalding, Bishop Michael O'Connor, the Rev. Dr. C. C. Pease, and B. N. Campbell. In New York the "Catholic Expositor", edited by the Rev. Dr. Charles C. Pease and the Rev. Felix Varela, lasted three years (1854-1857). The first universal impression was made in the publication in New York, by C. H. Gottsberger, of the "Young Catholic's Magazine" in March, 1838; it was suspended in February, 1840. The "National Catholic Register", a monthly, the first issue of which appeared at Philadelphia, in January, 1844, did not last long.

When Father Hecker started the "Catholic World", in 1865, its editor for the first five years was John R. G.
Hassard (q. v.), and the publisher Lawrence Keloe (b. in Co. Wexford, Ireland, 24 July, 1832; d. in Brooklyn, New York, 20 Feb., 1890). To the latter was due much of the early success of the magazine and of the Catholic Publication Society. Under the patronage of the Christian Brothers the "De La Salle Monthly" was begun in 1867. Its name was later changed to the "Manhattan Monthly" and the Irish patriot poet John Savage was for a time its editor. The "Young Crusader" of Boston (1868), "Catholic Record", Philadelphia (1871), "Central Magazine", St. Louis (1874), "Catholic Monthly Magazine", and "Benziger" (1878), follow in the list of failures. The "Rosary Magazine," begun by the Dominicans in New York, in 1891, was transferred to Somerset, Ohio. The "Sisters of Mercy have published, since 1906, at Manchester, New Hampshire, "The Magnificent". In April, 1896, the Rev. B. Sestini, S.J., founded the "Messenger of the Sacred Heart" at Georgetown, D. C.; hence it was moved to Woodstock, Md., next to Philadelphia, and finally to New York, in 1893. Later, in 1907, the "Messenger of the Sacred Heart" was devoted entirely to the interests of the Confraternity of the Sacred Heart, and the "Messenger", a separate magazine of the same character, was discontinued. The latter, in April, 1910, was changed to a weekly review, "America", which, by authority of the General of the Society of Jesus, was made the joint work of the provinces of the Society in North America. It took immediate rank as an exponent of Catholic opinion with a national scope and circulation. The Rev. John J. Wyane, S.J., was its first and first editor-in-chief. The Catholic University, Washington, publishes two magazines, the "Catholic University Bulletin" and the "Catholic Educational Review" (1911), and nearly all the Catholic colleges and the academies have monthlies edited and compiled by the students.

The historical work Philadelphia has two quarterly magazines, "American Catholic Historical Researches" and "Records of the American Catholic Historical Society". New York has one, "Historical Records and Studies", of the United States Catholic Historical Society. When the reading-circle movement began, Warren E. Mosher (b. at Albany, N. Y., 1860, d. at New Rochelle, N. Y., 22 March, 1906), who was one of the founders of the Catholic Summer School, started the "Catholic Reading Circle Review". This title was later changed to "Moshers Magazine", but the periodical did not survive its founder. The "Catholic Fortnightly Review", of Techyn, Ill., edited by Arthur Preuss, and the "St. John's Review", Toronto, were short-lived and without influence. Rev. Dr. J. F. Mullany are personal organs of the editors. The "Benziger's Magazine", New York, 1878, and "Extension", Chicago, 1907, are illustrated monthlies. The "Ecclesiastical Review", Philadelphia (1880), supplies a varied and interesting quantity of professional information for the clergy. An attempt was made to do the same thing in "The Dor- dhof", a similarly important publication for the laity, but it failed to attract the necessary support. Another failure, for a like reason, was made in New York in the "New York Review, a journal of Ancient Faith and Modern Thought", issued bi-monthly from St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, June—May—June, 1908.

The first quarterly review established in the United States was the "American Review of History and Politics", founded by a Catholic, Robert Walsh, at Philadelphia, and of which two volumes were published 1811-12. Walsh was born at Baltimore, Md., in 1788, and educated at Georgetown College. He was a man of great literary ability, and died United States consul at Paris, 7 Feb., 1859. The first and most important Catholic quarterly was "Brownson's Quarterly Review", which Orestes A. Brownson began in January, 1851, at Boston (moved to New York, 1854), after his conversion. He suspended its publication in 1861 "because he was unwilling", he said, "to continue a periodical which had not the full confidence of the Catholic and Anglican community" and finally ceased publication in October, 1875, with the statement: "I discontinue the Review solely on account of my precarious health and the failure of my eyes." The first number of the "American Catholic Quarterly Review" was issued at Philadelphia, in January, 1876, and the Rev. James A. Corcoran, S.J., Prof. George D. Wolf, and Archdeacon Patrick J. Ryan are notable as its editors. The "Catholic Review", of Philadelphia, edited by the erratic William Henry Thorne, had a short career of violent iconoclastic character.

Special Organ.—The fraternal organizations have their special organs—as, for example, the "National Hibernian" (Washington, 1900), of the Ancient Order of Hibernians—which devote their pages to the interests of the social organizations which they represent. The German Catholic Press, led by two influential dailies, has made much more substantial and practical progress than its English contemporaries. Prominent among its organs are the "Nationaleitung", achieved were Dr. Maximilian Oertel (q. v.) and Edward Frederic Reinhold Press (b. at Königsberg, Germany, 10 July, 1853; d. at St. Louis, Missouri, July, 1901). There are sixty-nine Polish papers printed in the United States, twenty odd being thoroughly Catholic, and the others ranging from neutrality to anti-Catholicism. Of the sixty-nine dailies four are distinctly Catholic. The oldest paper is the "Gazeta Katolicka", founded by Father Barzyński. He also founded, in 1880, the "Dziennik Chieskogosi" (Chicago Daily News), the controlling interest in which is owned by the Resurrectionist Fathers. There are eighteen Polish papers printed in Canada, four of which, being eighteen are Catholic. The Bohemians have a number of prosperous periodicals including 1 daily, 1 semi-weekly, 2 weeklies, 1 monthly, and 1 bi-monthly. (See also BOHEMIANS IN THE UNITED STATES; FRENCH CATHOLICS IN THE UNITED STATES; GERMANS IN THE UNITED STATES.—The Press; Belgian American Press; The Belgian American Organizations; Poles in the United States.)

Perjury (Lat. per, through and jurare, to swear) is the crime of taking a false oath (q. v.). To the guilt of the sin of lying it adds an infraction of the virtue of religion. An oath properly taken is an act of worship because it implies that God as witness to the truth is transcendent and infallible. Hence the wickedness of invoking the Divine testimony to confirm an untruth is specially criminal. Presiding from cases of ignorance or insufficient deliberation this sin is reputed to be always mortal. When in doubt one cannot without perjury swear to a thing as certain. When mental reservation is permissible, it is lawful to corroborate an oath by an oath, if there be an adequate excuse. It is obvious, however, that in general it be true that there is need of caution in the use of mental reservations lest they be simply lies, there will be an additional motive for care when they are to be distinguished with the solemnity of an oath. According to the common doctrine as to co-operation in another's sin, it is generally considered as offered to required person to take an oath when we know he is going to perjury himself. This teaching, however, does not apply to cases in which justice or necessity demand that a statement be sworn to. Hence, for instance, a trial judge may insist that evidence he presented under oath even though it be clear that much or all of the testimony is false. Perjury, according to the divisions in vogue in Canon Law, belongs to the category of crimes called mixed. These may fall under the cognizance of either the ecclesiastical or civil court, according as they are reputed to work damage either to the spiritual or civil commonwealth. No canonical penalty is incurred by one hence convicted of such perjury, in most instances. Yet, however, a person has been convicted of it before a competent tribunal and sentence imposed, he is esteemed infamous (infamia iuris) and therefore irremissible.

Pernter, Joseph Maria, scientist, b. at Neumark, Tyrol, 15 March, 1818; d. at Aro, 20 Dec., 1888. He entered the Society of Jesus after graduation from the Gymnasium of the rectory of the village, being appointed as professor of physics at Kalocsa and Kolksburg. In 1877 he was obliged to leave the order, on account of an ailment in his head. He then studied physics at the University of Vienna and received the doctor's degree. After entering the Central Institute as volunteer in October, 1878, Pernter became assistant in 1880, and adjunct in 1884; in 1885 he also began to act as a privatdozent at the university. In 1890 he was called to the University of Innsbruck in the capacity of extraordinary professor, and in 1893 was appointed ordinary professor of cosmic physics. At Innsbruck he began a number of works including papers on the conditions of wind, humidity, radiation, and meteorological optics. In his most important work "Atmosphärische Optik," he collected all published treatises and also supplied original papers necessary to complete certain subjects. Unfortunately he died before he had finished this valuable publication. His German translation of Abercromby's work, "The weather," is also noteworthy.

In 1897 Pernter became professor at the University of Vienna, and director of the Central Meteorological Institute. He reorganized the institute and extended it considerably, increasing the staff from fifteen to thirty-one. He made it possible for the institute to take part in balloon ascents for scientific purposes. A laboratory, a printing office, a reading room, etc., were added, also a bureau for seismic observations. Instruments for recording earth tremors were set up, and the institute supervised the network of stations for the study of earthquakes, its name being changed to "Zentralanstalt für Meteorologie und Geodynamik." He introduced various improvements in practical weather forecasting, such as the free delivery of forecasts in the summer to all telegraph stations. During his directorate were introduced the experiments on so-called "weather-shooting," as a prevention of the dangers due to hail. These experiments created considerable excitement in the agricultural circles of Austria and Italy. Pernter examined the matter carefully and fearlessly, and came to a conclusion that proved to be the deathblow of this practice. He was kind towards his subordinates and interested in their welfare. It will take some time before a full appreciation is had of all that he accomplished for the institute. The most important of his numerous political papers is "Voransetzunglose Forschung, freie Wissenschaft und Katholizismus," published during the Monnassen agitation. In this essay he sought to prove the possibility of combining strict religious faith with exact research. Pernter was also one of the founders of the "Leo-Gesellschaft" in Vienna and of the branch at Innsbruck. These societies have suffered a great loss, because he took an active part as long as he could in all their work and propaganda. During the last years of his life he was a sufferer from heart malady, which greatly affected his heart. He suffered very much through weakness of the heart, difficulty of breathing, and occasional fainting spells. He was also depressed by the sickness and death of his beloved young daughter and of his wife. These numerous blows combined to hasten his end.

Perpetual Adoration, Religious of (Belgium), a congregation with simple vows, founded at Brussels, 1857, by Anna de Mees, daughter of Count Ferdinand de Mees, for whose head a price was offered by the insurgents during the Revolution of 1830. In 1843 Mlle de Mees, then twenty years of age, at the request of her benefactor, visited the sick and dying in the church near their chateau and other churches. Impressed by the miserable state of the vestments and all that pertained to the altar, she found the inspiration of her life's work. Considering the poverty and neglect of Jesus Christ in the Blessed Sacrament and desiring to make reparation to Him, she conceived the idea of an association with the object of reviving faith in the Real Presence by adoration, night and day; persons undertaking to make monthly an hour of adoration, and give yearly an offering for the benefit of poor churches; by working to enhance the dignity of Divine worship by providing the necessities for the becoming celebration of the sacred mysteries. The Association of Perpetual Adoration and Work for Poor Churches was organized in 1848 under the direction of Rev. Jean Baptiste Boone, S.J., "the apostle of Brussels." The necessity was soon felt that a religious body should be its centre and support, one which would be wholly devoted to the propagation of the knowledge, love, and adoration of the Sacred Sacrament.

As no community existed which made this work its special vocation, the project of a new religious institute was formed and realized when Mlle de Mees, directed by Father Boone, founded the Religious of the Perpetual Adoration. The constitutions were definitively approved by Pius IX (March, 1872). The religious must not only be adorers but also missionaries.
of the Blessed Sacrament, devoting themselves to all that, compatible with a life of retirement, can further Its glory: religious instruction, preparation for first Communion, retreats, etc. Their churches with the Blessed Sacrament exposed are always open to the public. By their principal work, the association, they strive to increase love for the Blessed Sacrament, by hours of adoration, grants of vestments to poor churches, the Forty Hours Devotion, etc. The association spread rapidly throughout the world (in America it is frequently called "Tabernacle Society"). In 1833 it was erected an association with power to affiliate others. The decree of Leo XIII transferring it to Rome (February, 1879) declares: "The association is one with the institute in name and in its object, it is subordinate to the institute as to its head, and must be subordinate to it in virtue of the constitutions approved by the Holy See". The association was raised to the rank of prima primae, July, 1895. The institute has many houses in Europe. In August, 1890, it was introduced into England by Cardinal Herbert Vaughan, then Bishop of Manchester. Its first foundation in America was at Washington, D. C., October, 1900.

Perpetual Adoration, Religious of the, a contemplative religious congregation, founded in 1526 by Sister Elizabeth Zwirer (d. 1546), at Einsiedeln, Switzerland, and for many years the Abbey became. At the beginning of the year 1580 they commenced the practice of adoration of the Blessed Sacrament during the day before the closed tabernacle. A lay association was established, the members of which contributed a small sum of money for the expenses of the sanctuary necessitated by perpetual adoration. On 2 May, 1794, during the French invasion the sisters were expelled and their monastery ruined. Five years later, after the Concordat of Napoleon, the community returned. Acting on the advice of their confessor, Father Pierre Perrot, the sisters, on 8 January, 1846, began the practice of adoration by night as well as by day. In 1852 to signify their devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, they decided to wear a figure of an oratory on the breast of their habit. In 1859 Empress Elizabeth of Austria presented the monastery with a magnificent chalice and a reliquary. A new church was opened in 1882, and is adorned with three beautiful paintings, representing the adoration of Christ. The convent at Einsiedeln is the only house of its kind, and in its order the community numbered 46 professed sisters and 5 novices.

Perpetual Adoration, Sisters of the (Quimper, France), an institute of nuns devoted to perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and to the education of orphan children; founded at Quimper (Brittany), by Abbé François-Marie Langrez (b. at Saint Servan, 20 July, 1575; d. at Quimper, 10 August, 1602). In early youth François-Marie had been an apprentice rope-maker, but he began to study the classics at sixteen, and was ordained 19 December, 1612. In December, 1621, he conceived the idea of the work he subsequently founded. Two poor homeless little girls crossed his path. He confided them to Marguerite Le Maître, a domestic servant. Other orphans were found and sheltered. In 1626 Marguerite's home contained an oratory and was provided with a dormitory holding thirty beds. Three years later they received two robed habitants, and on 21 November, 1629, the first chapel of the institute was opened. In 1632, Mère Olympe de Modien, in whose family Marguerite Le Maître had been a servant when she began her charitable work, entered the little society, being made superioress, 10 March, 1635. On 20 January, 1635, Mère Olympe and her companions first put on the religious habit. In September, 1635 a tentative rule of life was drawn up by Mgr. Gravezan, Bishop of Quimper. In 1636 four sisters made their vows. On 27 March, 1637, Sister Marguerite Le Maitre died. Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament which was begun in March, 1636, did not become perpetual, day and night, till 1843, eight days after the death of Mère Olympe, who left after her a great reputation for sanctity. At that time the community numbered 110, and had charge of 70 children. In 1845 their rule was approved by Mgr. Gravezan, Bishop of Quimper. A little later they were recognized by the Government under the title of Sisters of the Perpetual Adoration. On 10 May, 1851, a house was founded at Recoverance, transferred, 25 October, 1856, to Courcy-sur-Loing, near Breteuil, the house at Quimper are the only ones that practise perpetual adoration. In 1882, the institute contained 400 orphan girls and 128 religious. Since its foundation, it has received 1754 orphan girls, of whom 1000 have embraced the religious life in different congregations.

Perpetual Adorers of the Blessed Sacrament (SACRAMENTINES).—Anton Le Quien, b. in Paris, 23 Feb., 1601, the founder of the first order exclusively devoted to the practice of Perpetual Adoration, entered the Dominican Order, and after ordination was transferred to the Benedictine Order, where he remained till the year prior of the convent at Paris. "During the seventeenth century", we read in his works, edited by Pottin, "we find only two religious orders that have Perpetual Adoration. The first is that of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, founded by Père Antoine, O.P.; the second that of the Benedictine Adoratrices, founded first at Paris and afterwards in several other cities, by the celebrated Mother Mechtilde. This religious, supported by powerful protectors, easily accomplished her task. Perpetual Adoration began among her daughters in 1654, while the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament received the privilege of reserving the Blessed Sacrament only in 1659. But Père Antoine had begun the establishment of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament about 1639, while Mère Mechtilde's work appears, according to Hélyot, to date back no further, even in project, than 1651. Père Antoine may, then, be considered as possessing priority, especially as his order was intended solely for the worship of the Holy Eucharist, while that of Mère Mechtilde, although in existence, was the content of "the period progressive". Migne's "Dictionnaire des Ordres religieux" mentions no religious order exclusively destined for the worship of the Blessed Sacrament, except that of Père Antoine, and that of the Adoration Réparatrice, established in France for the first time in 1848.

In 1839 Père Antoine began his work at Marseilles. Sister Anne Negrel was named the first superioress. But the definitive establishment of the religious took place only in 1859-60, when Mgr de Puydet, Bishop of Marseilles, erected them into a congregation under the title of Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament. The formalities for the approval of the order having been concluded in Rome (1860), Innocent XI expedited a brief, which could not be put in execution because of a change of bishop. Innocent XII issued a new brief the same year in which the Apostolic Process was opened for the canonization of its founder. The only foundation of the order in the eighteenth century was made at Bollène (Vaucluse) in 1725. Some years later, at the end of 1749, the order spread to a new province, that of the sisters was opened. In 1832, Mère La Fare, in whose family Marguerite Le Maître had been a servant when she began her charitable work, entered the little society, being made superioress, 10 March, 1835. On 20 January, 1835, Mère Olympe gathered together her community in 1802, and made a foundation at Avignon in 1807. The same year a Sacrament of Marseilles founded a convent at Aix-en-Provence. In 1816 the convent of Marseilles was reopened, and Mère de La Fare made a new foundation at Carpentras. In 1859 six religious of Aix founded a house at Bernay, Normandy, and in 1863 some Sisters from Bollene founded a convent of Perpetual Adoration at Tainton, England, Great Britain. All the houses of this order are autonomous and dependent on the ordinary of the diocese, who is their superior. In consequence of the persecution of religious congregations in France, the Sacramentaries of Marseilles were obliged to abandon their convents in Southern France, being authorized by the Government, though their boarding-school is closed. The Sacramentaries of Bernay at the time of the expulsion, July, 1903, were compelled to close their boarding-school and go into exile. Thirteen of the sisters retired to Belgium, and founded a house at Hal. The rest of the community settled in England at Whiston Court, Newpor, Monmouthshire. Their existence is precarious, for they are not permitted to open a school. Their days are spent in prayer, adoration, and the making of altar-breads, vestments, and church ornaments. In March, 1911, the Sacramentaries were permitted by Archbishop Farley to open a house in Holy Trinity parish, Yonkers, New York, U.S.A.

A. LETELLIER.

Perpetual Succour, Our Lady of.—The picture of Our Lady of Perpetual Succour is painted on wood, with background of gold. It is Byzantine in style and is supposed to have been painted in the thirteenth century. It represents the Mother of God holding the Divine Child while the Archangels Michael and Gabriel present before Him the instruments of His Passion. Over the figures in the picture are some Greek letters which form the abbreviated words Mother of God, Jesus Christ, Archangel Michael, and Archangel Gabriel respectively. It was brought to Rome towards the end of the fifteenth century by a pious merchant, who, dying there, ordered by his will that the picture should be kept in a church as a memorial. It was exposed in the church of San Matteo, Via Merulana, between St. Mary Major and St. John Lateran. Crowds flocked to this church, and for nearly three hundred years many graces were obtained through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin. The picture was then popularly called the Madonna di San Matteo. The church was served for a time by the Hermits of St. Augustine, who had sheltered their Irish brethren in their distress. These Augustinians were still in charge when the French invaded Rome (1812) and destroyed the church. The picture disappeared, it remained hidden and neglected for over forty years, but a series of providential circumstances between 1853 and 1855 led to its discovery in an oratory of the Augustinian Fathers at Santa Maria in Posterula.

The pope, Pius IX, who as a boy had prayed before the picture in San Matteo, became interested in the discovery and in 1866, he directed the General Mauro, C.SS.R., to order that Our Lady of Perpetual Succour should be again publicly venerated in Via Merulana, and this time at the new church of St. Alphonsus. The ruins of San Matteo were in the grounds of the Redemptorist Convent. This was but the first favour of the Holy Father towards the picture. He approved of the solemn translation of the picture (26 April, 1866), and its coronation by the Vatican Chapter (23 June, 1867). He fixed the feast as duplex secunda clausus, on the Sunday before the Feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, and by a decree dated May, 1876, approved of a special office and Mass for the celebration of the feast. This favour later on was also granted to others. Learning that the devotion to Our Lady under this title had spread far and wide, Pius IX raised a confraternity of Our Lady of Perpetual Succour and St. Alphonsus, which had been erected in Rome, to the rank of an arch-confraternity and enriched it with many privileges and indulgences. He was amongst the first to visit the picture in its new home, and his name is the first in the register of the arch-confraternity. Two thousand three hundred faimules of the Holy Picture have been sent from St. Alphonsus's church in Rome to every part of the world. At the present time there are only altars at these places (e.g. in England, Leeds and Middlesborough; in the United States, Savannah) are dedicated to Our Lady of Perpetual Succour. In some places, as in the United States, the title has been translated Our Lady of Perpetual Help.

Perpignus, Saint, eighth Bishop of Tours, d. 1 January, or 8 December, 490, or 8 April, 491. He was a member of an illustrious family which produced St. Eustachius, who had been his predecessor, and also St. Volusianus, who became his successor in the same episcopal see. Appointed about 490, he guided the Church of Tours for thirty years, and it is apparent, from what little information we have, that during his administration Christianity was considerably developed and consolidated in Touraine. Shortly after his elevation, St. Perpetuus presided at a council in which eight bishops who were reunited in Tours on the Feast of St. Martin had participated, and at this assembly an important rule was promulgated relative to ecclesiastical discipline. He maintained a careful surveillance over the conduct of the clergy of his diocese and mention is made of priests who were removed from their office because they had proved unworthy. He built monasteries and various churches, but above all he desired to replace by a beautiful basilica (470) the little chapel that Saint Britius had constructed, to protect the tomb of St. Martin. The will of St. Perpetuus was published for the first time in 1694 by Dom Luc d'Achéry in his "Spielegenum." This curious historical monument belonging to the end of the fifth century gives an excellent idea of the sanctity of its author.

Perpignan. Diocese of (Perpinianum). comprises the Department of Pyrénées Orientales; created by the union of the ancient See of Elne, part of the Diocese of Urgel known as French Cerdagne, three cantons of the former Diocese of Alet, and two villages of the ancient Diocese of Narbonne. This department was united in 1802 to the Diocese of Carcassonne; by the Concordat of 1817 it received a special see. This see, though it continued the aforesaid ancient diocese of Elne, was located at Perpignan, where the bishops of Elne had resided since 601 in virtue of a Bull of Clement VII. Elne was a suffragan of Narbonne until 1511; from 1511 to 1517 it was directly subject to the Holy See; in 1517 it became again a suffragan of Narbonne; a Decree of the Council of Trent made it a suffragan of Tarragona; after 1678 it was again a suffragan of Narbonne. The See of Perpignan as it was re-established in 1817 is suffragan to Albi.

The first known Bishop of Elne is Dominus, mentioned in 571 in the Chronicle of John of Bidelarum. Among others are Cardinal Ascanio Maria Sforza (1491-1495), Cardinal Cesare Borgia (1505-1512); Cardinal François de Loris (1519-1520), CardinalJacques de Serra (1506-12), Cardinal Hieronimo Duria (1520-33); Olympe Gerber (1534-61). The Cathedral of Elne (eleventh century) and the adjoining cloister are rich examples of elaborate medieval ornamentation. In the later Middle Ages, and under the influence of Roman law, Roscellin witnessed certain offensive revivals of ancient slavery; this is proved by numerous purchase deeds of Muslims, and even Christian slaves, dating back to the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The diocese honors especially St. Vincent of Collioure, martyr (end of third century); and St. Eulalia and St. Julia, virgins and martyrs (end of third century). In memory of former ties with the metropolis of Tarragona, the Church of Perpignan honors several Spanish saints: St. Eustachius, Bishop of Tarragona, and his deacons Augustus and Eulogius, martyred at Tarragona in 279; some martyrs of the Diocletian persecution (end of third century); Justa and Rufina of Seville; Felix and Narcissus of Geron; Aesches and Victoria of Cordova; Leocadia, of Toledo; St. Telefonus (607-67). Arch-bishop of Toledo.

The Benedictine Dom Briard (1743-1828), who continued the important series of "Historiens de France," belonged to Perpignan. At Perpignan Benedict XIII (Pedro de Luna) held a council I Nov., 1408, to rally his partisans; they gradually melted away and on 1 Feb., 1409, the eighteen remaining bishops advised

University of Perpignan.—Peter IV of Aragon (1327–87), having conquered (1344) the town of Perpignan and reunited to his estates the Kingdom of Majorca, of which Perpignan was the capital, compensated that city for its loss of power by founding, at the request of the magistrates, 20 March, 1349, the University of Perpignan, for the teaching of canon law, and other arts and sciences. In the charter he praised "the deep learning of the professors of Perpignan." By the Bull of 28 November, 1379, the antipope Clement VII confirmed the foundation and privileges, and the university, in a petition addressed to him in 1393, declared him its founder: "Peter by his bull of 1381 John I, son of Peter IV, granted permission to the city authorities to build the university near the royal castle. The institution spread in Perpignan an atmosphere of learning, the study of law being specially developed. Theology was taught there during the first years of the fourteenth century, but it was not until 24 July, 1447, that the faculty of theology was created by the Bull of Nicholas V and it did not receive its statute until 1459. The university disappeared in 1793.

PERRAUD, GEORGES.

PERRAUD, ADOLPHE, cardinal and academician; b. at Lyons, France, 7 Feb., 1828; d. 18 Feb., 1896. He had a brilliant career at the lycées Henri IV and St. Louis, and entered the École normale, where he was strongly influenced by Gratry. In 1850 he secured the fellowship of history and for two years he taught at the lycée of Angers. In 1852 he abandoned teaching to embrace the sacerdotal state. He returned to Paris where he joined the Oratory which was then being reorganized by Gratry and Abbé Pétetôt, cure of the Oratory. When he was installed at Rome he was appointed professor of history and prefect of religion at the petit séminaire of St. Ló which had just been confined to the Oratory. At the same time he devoted himself to preaching, for which purpose he was recalled to Paris. In 1860 he visited Ireland, after which he wrote "Contemporary Ireland" (1862). In 1863 he defended a theological thesis at the Sorbonne, where in 1866 he became professor of ecclesiastical history and dealt brilliantly with the history of Protestantism. He was appointed (1870) by E. Ollivier a member of the Committee of Higher Education. In 1870 he was a chaplain in MacMahon’s army, and after the war preached at St. Sulpice. In 1873 he was appointed Bishop of Autun in 1874 despite his liberal tendencies, he interested himself especially in working-men. After the catastrophe of Monteau les mines, in which twenty-two miners perished, he preached the funeral sermon; he gave several Lenten courses in his cathedral and preached the celebrated "Crisis of Our Time" at Guibert, Cardinal Lavignere, and MacMahon. He was actively concerned in the improvement of clerical studies in which connexion his sermon (1879) on "the Church and light" caused a great sensation; after the Congress of Brussels (1894) he was named honorary president of the Society for the Encouragement of the Sciences and the Arts. He has an oratory, the University of the French Academy in 1852 to replace Barbir, in 1885 he welcomed Duruy and in 1889 delivered the dis-
nance des cinq espèces des colonnes selon la méthode des anciens" (1683). Perrault's architectural drawings are regarded as excellent pieces of work; before the death of the Louvre, it was there where he had observed them. Besides his drawings for the Vitruvius, two folio volumes containing among other things the designs for the Louvre, which had been published by the master's brother, Charles Perrault.

In his completed buildings, much fault is found, e.g. in the Observatoire, the astronomical observatory of Paris, although in certain parts we find traces of his later mastery. Perrault's design for a triumphal arch on Rue St-Antoine was preferred to the designs of Lebrun and Leveau, but was only partly executed in stone. When the arch was taken down, it was found that the ingenious master had devised a means of so uniting the stones without the use of mortar that it had become of the same mass. In the execution for the colonnade of the Louvre he was successful over all rivals, even Bernini, who had been summoned from Italy expressly for that purpose. This work claimed his attention from 1665 to 1680, and established his reputation. He was required to demonstrate the feasibility of his plans by constructing models. His result is reproduced in his books, and the consideration for the work of his predecessors, and with positively depreciating the same. The whole palace could not be completed at the time, but the colonnade became widely celebrated. The simple character of the ground floor sets off the Corinthian columns, modelled strictly according to Vitruvius, and the plan on which Perrault himself developed. Perrault built the church of St-Bénédicte-le-Bétourné, designed a new church of Ste-Geneviève, and erected an altar in the Church of the Little Fathers, all in Paris.

PERREYVE, Henri. b. at Paris, 11 April, 1831; d. there, 18 June, 1865. His father was professor at the Faculté du Droit. He received his classical education at the Collège Saint-Louis. According to his father's wish he studied law, but having finished his legal course he studied philosophy and theology. He then became a Jesuit, and joined with Charles and Adolphe, later Cardinal Perrault, and this small group was under the direction of Father Gratry, under the guidance of Father Pétetol, began the restoration of the Oratory in France. He was ordained priest in 1855, appointed chaplain to the Lycée Saint-Louis in 1859, and one year later was called to the professorship of ecclesiastical history at the Sorbonne. For some time he was forced by illness to abandon his lectures.

He had been in intimate friendship with the great Catholic leaders of the time in France, including Ozanam, Montalembert, Cochin, and especially La- cordaire. By his kind and affectionate nature Perreyve exercised a great influence on those around him, especially on young men.

Among his works were: "De la critique des Évangiles" (Paris, 1859); "Entretiens sur l'Église catholique" (2 vols., Paris, 1901); "La Journée des malades" (Paris, 1908); "Biographies et panégyriques" (Paris, 1907); "Souvenirs de première communion" (Paris, 1909); "Sermons" (Paris, 1901); "Deux roses et deux saints de Saint-Jean" (Paris, 1907); "Méditations sur les saints orthodox" (Paris, 1901). Some of his letters have also been published in book form.

Giovanni, Jesuit theologian, b. at Chieri, Italy, 11 March, 1791; d. at Rome, 28 Aug., 1876. After studying theology and obtaining the doctorate at Turin, he entered the Society of Jesus on 14 December, 1815. The Society had been re-established by Pius VII only a year before, and Perrone was very favourably received. There were few Jesuits in Italy, and in 1871 he was made professor of dogmatic theology in the Roman College, and held this post till the Roman Republic of 1878 forced him to seek refuge in England. After an exile of three years, Perrone again took the chair of dogma in the Roman College, and, excepting the years of his retirement at Ferrara, taught theology till prevented by old age. He was consultant of various congregations and was active in opposing the errors of George Hermes, as well as in the discussions which ended in the dogmatic definition of the Immaculate Conception (cf. "Annali delle scienze religiose", VII). Of Perrone's many writings, the most important is the "Pretensiones theologicae", which has reached a thirty-fourth edition in nine volumes. The compendium which Perrone made of this work has reached its forty-seventh edition in two volumes. His complete theological lectures were published in French and have run through several editions; portions have been translated into Spanish, Polish, German, Dutch, and other languages. Sommervogel mentions forty-four different works by this great fellow-professor of Passaglia and France in the Roman College.

PERRY, Stephen Josiah b. in London, 26 August, 1833; d. 27 Dec., 1889. He belonged to a well-known Catholic family. His schooling was first at Gifford Hall, and then at the Benedictine College, Douai, whence he proceeded to Rome to study for the priesthood. Having resolved to enter the Society of Jesus, he made his novitiate (1853-5) first at Hoder, and then at Beaumont Lodge, after which he pursued his studies at St-Achul, near Paris. In consequence of his marked bent for mathematics, he was sent to attend the lectures of Professor De Morgan, in London, and those of Bertrand, Lionville, Deleunay, Cauchy, and Serret, in Paris. In the autumn of 1860 he was recalled to Stonyhurst to teach physics and mathematics, likewise taking charge of the observatory.

In 1863 he commenced his theological studies at St. Beuno's, N. Wales, and was ordained in 1866. He resumed his former duties at Stonyhurst, which during the rest of his life were uninterrupted, save by special scientific engagements. In company with Fr. Walter Sidgreaves, he made magnetic surveys, in 1868 of the upper Rhine, and in 1889 of East Africa and Belgium. In 1870 he went in charge of a government expedition to observe a solar eclipse at Cadiz; at Carnacon (West Indies) in 1886; at Moscow in 1887; and at the Salut Islands in 1889, on which journey he lost his life.

In 1874 he headed a party similarly sent to Kerguelen, in the South Indian Ocean, to observe a transit of Venus, when he also took a series of observations to determine the absolute longitude of the place, and others for the magnetic elements, not only at Kerguelen itself, but, on his way to and fro, at the Cape, Bombay, Aden, Port Said, Malta, Palermo, Rome, Naples, Florence, and Moneghetti. He likewise drew up a Blue-book on the climate of "The Isle of Desolation", as Kerguelen was called by Captain Cook.

In 1882 he went again with W. Sidgreaves, to observe a similar transit in Madagascar, and he again took advantage of the occasion for magnetic purposes. In 1874 he became a Fellow of the Royal Society.

At Stonyhurst, while he greatly developed the meteorological work of the observatory, he also in the province of astronomy made frequent observations of Jupiter's satellites, of stellar occultations, of comets, and of meteorites, it was in the department of solar Persecution. — General. — Persecution may be defined in general as the unlawful coercion of another's liberty or his unlawful punishment, for not every kind of punishment can be regarded as persecution. For our purpose it must be still further limited to the sphere of religion, and in that sense persecution means unlawful coercion or punishment for religion's sake. The many kinds of persecution are described on p. 703.

The growth and the continued existence of Christianity have been hindered by cultured paganism and by savage heathenism. And in more recent times agnosticism has harassed the Church in the various states of America and Europe. But most deplorable of all persecutions have been those that Catholicism has suffered from other Christians. With regard to these it has to be considered that the Church herself has appealed to force, and that, not only in her own defence, but also, so it is objected, in unprovoked attack. Thus by means of the Inquisition (q. v.) or religious wars she was herself the aggressor in many instances during the Middle Ages and in the time of the Reformation.

And even if the answer be urged that she was only defending her own existence, the retort seems fairly plausible that pagan and heathen powers were only acting in their own defence when they prohibited the spread of Christianity. The Church would therefore seem to be strangely inconsistent, for while she claims toleration and liberty for herself she has been and is herself the cause of their suppression.

In answer to this objection, we may admit the fact and yet deny the conclusion. The Church claims to carry a message or rather a command from God and to be God's only messenger. In point of fact it is only within recent years, when toleration is supposed to have become a dogma, that the other "champions of Revelation" have abandoned their similar claims. That they should abandon their right to command allegiance is a natural consequence of Protestantism; whereas it is the Church's claim to be the accredited and infallible ambassador of God which justifies her apparent inconsistency. Such intolerance, however, is not the same as persecution, although we understand the unlawful exercise of coercion. Every corporation, lawfully constituted, has the right to coerce its subjects within due limits. And though the Church exercises that right for the most part by spiritual sanctions, she has never relinquished the right to use other means. Before examining this latter right to physical coercion, let us consider the point in question, viz., the time between pagans and Christians. Regularly, force has not been employed against pagan or Jew: "For what have I to do to judge them that are without?" (I Cor., v. 12); see Jews and Judaism: Judaism and Church Legislation.

Instances of compulsory conversions such as have occurred at different periods of the Church's history must be ascribed to the misplaced zeal of autocratic individuals. But the Church does claim the right to coerce her own subjects. Here again, however, a distinction must be made. The non-Catholic Christians of our day are, strictly speaking, her subjects; but in her legislation she treats them as if they were not her subjects. The "Ne temere," e. g., of Pius X (1907), recognizes the marriages of Protestants as valid, though not contracted according to Catholic tradition, and the laws to restrict their own marriage considered to be binding on Protestants. So, with regard to her right to use coercion, the Church only exercises her authority over those whom she considers personally and formally apostates. A modern Protestant is not in the same category with the Albigenses or Wyclifites. These were simply heretics, i.e., Christians who had fled from the Church to heresy; and the Church enforced her authority over them. It is true that in many cases the heretics were rebels against the State also; but the Church's claim to exercise coercion is not confined to such cases of social disorder. And what is more, her purpose was not only to protect the faith of the orthodox, but also to punish the apostates. Formal apostasy was then looked upon as treason against God—a much more heinous crime than treason against a civil ruler, which, until recent times, was punished with great severity. (See Apostasy; Heresy.) It was a poisoning of the life of the soul in others (St. Thomas Aquinas, 11-11, Q. x, articles 3, 4), and there can be no doubt, therefore, that the Church claimed the right to use physical coercion against formal apostates. Not, of course, that she would exercise her authority in the same way to-day, even if there were a Catholic State in which other Christians were personally and formally apostates. She adapts her discipline to the times and circumstances in order that it may fulfill its salutary purposes. Her own children are not punished by fines, imprisonment, or other temporal punishments, but by spiritual pains and penalties, and heretics are treated as she treated pagans: "Fides suadenda est, non imponenda (Faith is a matter of persuasion, not of compulsion)—a sentiment that goes back to St. Basil ("Revue de l'Orient Chrétien"), 2nd series, XIV, 1900, 38) and to St. Ambrose, in the fourth century, the latter applying it even to the treatment of formal apostates. It must also be remembered that when she did use her right to exercise physical coercion over formal apostates, that right was then universally admitted. Churchmen had always the right to decide if their own spiritual penalties should be inflicted. Withal, the Roman Inquisition (q. v.) was very different from that of Spain, and the popes did not approve the harsh proceedings of the latter. Moreover, such ideas of physical coercion in matters spiritual were not peculiar to Catholics (see Toleration). The Reformers were not less, but, if anything, more intolerant (see Inquisition). If the intolerance of Churchmen is blamable, then that of the Reformers is doubly so. From their own standpoint, it was unjustifiable. First, they were in revolt against the established authority of the Church, and secondly they could hardly use force to compel the unwilling to conform to their own principle of private judgment. With this clear demarcation of the Reformer's private judgment from the Catholic's authority, it hardly serves our purpose to estimate the relative exercise of Catholic and Protestant Governments during the times of the Reformation. And yet it is well to remember that the nature of the conflict and the groups engaged in it were far more destructive of life than the religious wars of France and Germany. What is, however, more to our purpose is to notice the outspoken intolerance of the Protestant leaders; for it gave an additional right to the Church to appeal to force. She was punishing her defaulting subjects and at the same time defending herself against their attacks.

Such compulsion, therefore, as is used by legitimate authority cannot be called persecution, nor can its victims be called martyrs. It is not enough that those who suffered for their convictions, opposed to the religious opinion of their neighbors, or even were expelled from the churches for professing their religious opinions. A martyr is a witness to the truth; whereas those who suffered the extreme penalty of the Church were at the most the witnesses to their own sincerity, and therefore unhappily no more than pseudo-martyrs. We need not dwell upon the second objection which pretends that a pagan government might be justified in harassing Christian missionaries in so far as it considered Christianity to be subversive of established authority. The Christian revolution is the supernatural message of the Creator to his creatures, to which there can be no lawful resistance. Its missionaries have the right and the duty to preach it everywhere. They were die in the propaganda of the Gospel; it is not for us to decide whether their religious opinions were right or wrong. As for the truth, suffering persecution for his sake.

Outline of Principal Persecutions.—The brief outline here given of persecutions directed against the Christian Church is far from complete and is scarcely more than a catalogue of the principal formal and public onslaughts against Catholicism. Nor does it take into account other forms of attack, e.g., literary and social persecution, some form of suffering for Christ's sake being a sure note of the True Church (John, xx, 20; II Tim., iii, 12; Matt., x, 23). For purposes of the present chapter, persecution is taken in the sense of attacks previous to the nineteenth century see Leclercq, "Les Martyrs" (5 vols., Paris, 1902-09).

Roman Persecutions (52-313). The persecutions of this period are treated extensively under Martyrs. See also Martyrs, Acts of the, and the articles on individual martyrs or groups of martyrs (Martyrs, Thuc., and Thuc.) for further information. Against the Theban Legion. An exhaustive and reliable work is Allard, "Les Persécutions" (5 vols., Paris, 1885); also his "Ten Lectures on the Martyrs" (New York, 1897); and for an exhaustive literature see Healy, "The Valerianian Persecution" (Boston). Under Julian the Apostate (361-363)—Constantine's edicts of protection and acceleration of the final triumph of Christianity. But the extreme measures passed against the ancient religion of the empire, and especially by Constanst, even though they were not strictly carried out, aroused considerable opposition. And when Julian the Apostate (361-363) came to the throne, he supported the defenders of paganism, though he strove to strengthen the old religion by recommending works of charity and a priesthood of strictly moral lives which, a thing unheard of, should preach and instruct. State protection was withdrawn from Christianity, and no section of the Church favoured more than another, so that the Donatists and Arians were enabled to return.

All the privileges formerly granted to clerics were repealed; civil jurisdiction taken from the bishops, and the subsidies to widows and virgins stopped. Higher education, also, was taken out of the hands of Christians by the prohibition of anyone who was not a pagan from teaching classical literature. And finally, the titles of martyrs were destroyed. The emperor was a victim of persecution to direct persecution, but he fomented the dissensions among the Christians, and he tolerated and even encouraged the persecutions raised by pagan communities and governors, especially in Alexandria, Heliopolis, Minouma, the port of Gaza, Antioch, Arethusa, and Camara in Cappadocia (cf. Gregory of Nazianzus, Orat. IV, 86-95; P. G., XXXV, 613-28). Many, in different places, suffered, even John the Baptist, and eventually of 1,600, of whom Remigius, Bishop of Soissons, and Rhadamanthius, Bishop of Amiens (Sozomen, V, 11). Julian himself seems to have ordered the executions of John and Paul, the steward and secretary respectively of Constantius, daughter of Constantine. However, he reigned only for two years, and his persecution was, in the words of St. Athanasius, "but a passing cloud." In Persia.—When the persecution of Christianity was abandoned by the Roman Government, it was taken up by Rome's traditional enemy, the Persians, though formerly they had been more or less tolerant of the new religion. On the outbreak of war between the two empires, Sapor II, the persecution of the Persian priests, initiated a severe persecution of the Christians in 339 or 340. It comprised the destruction or confiscation of churches and a general massacre, especially of bishops and priests. The number of victims, according to Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., II, 9-14), was no less than 16,000, among them being Isidore, Bishop of Seleucia to the general persecution, but it was resumed and with still greater violence by Bahram V (420-38), who persecuted savagely for one year, and was not prevented from causing numerous individual martyrs by the treaty he made (422) with Theodosius II, guaranteeing liberty of conscience to the Christians. Yazelaed (438-57) was succeeded by a more persecution in 445 or 446, traces of which are found shortly before 450. The persecution of Chosroes I from 541 to 545 was directed chiefly against the bishops and clergy. He also destroyed churches and monasteries and imprisoned Persian noblemen who had become Christians. The last persecution by Persian kings was that of Chosroes II (580-625), who was responsible for the conversion of all Christians alike during 627 and 628. Speaking generally, the dangerous time for the Church in Persia was when the kings were at war with the Roman Empire.

A list of martyrs who suffered under Sapor II was first published by Weiser and reproduced in the Martyrologium Hieronymi, ed. de Rossi and Duchesne in Acta SS., Nov., II, part I, iv (Brussels, 1894); Hoffmann, Auszug aus syrischen Akten perischer episcopi, text, ed. and note (Leipzig, 1883); Lecercq, op. cit., III: Duval, Littérature syrienne (Paris, 1897), 197; Lecercq, Le Christianisme en Orient syrien entre perse et perse, I (Paris, 1904); Duchesne, op. cit., (Paris, 1910), 553-64.

Among the Goths.—Christianity was introduced among the Goths about the middle of the third century, and "Theophilus Episcopus Gothorum" was present at the Council of Nicæa (325). But, owing to the efforts of Bishop Ulfilas (340, d. 383), an Arian, Arianism was professed by the great majority of the Visigoths of Dacia (Transylvania and West Hungary), converts from paganism; and it passed with them into Thrace, Bithynia, and Thrace. Ulfilas was a gauze chieftain, after a cruel persecution, drove Ulfilas and his converts from his lands, probably in 349. And subsequently, when in 376 the Visigoths, pressed by the Huns, crossed the Danube and entered the Roman Empire, Arianism was the religion practised by the Emperor Valens. This fact, along with the national character given to Arianism by Ulysses (q. v.), made it the form of Christianity adopted also by the Ostrogoths, from whom it spread to the Burgundians, Suevi, Vandals, and Lombards. The first persecution we hear of was that directed by the pagan Visigoth King Alaric, begun about 543. It is not, perhaps, six years after his war with Valens. St. Sabas was drowned in 372, others were burnt, sometimes in a body in the tents which were used as churches. When, in the fifth and sixth centuries, the Visigoths invaded Italy, Gaul, and Spain, the churches were plundered, and the Catholic bishops and clergy were often murdered; but the normal attitude was toleration. From (453), the Visigoth King of Toulouse, is especially mentioned by Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. vii, 6) as a hater of Catholicism and a persecutor of the Catholics, though it is not clear that he persecuted to death. In Spain there was persecution at least from time to time during the period 476-502, beginning with the accession of a ruler who occupied Catalonia in 476. We hear of persecution by Agila (519-554) also, and finally by Leovigild (573—86). Bishops were exiled and church goods seized. His son Hermengild, a convert to the Catholic Faith, is described in the seventh century (e. g. by St. Gregory the Great) as a martyr. A contemporary chronicler, Bicharo, who had heard himself speak for the Faith, says that the prince was murdered in prison by an Arian, Sidisbert; but he does not say that Leovigild approved of the murder (see Hermengild; and Hodgkin, "Italy and her In- vaders", V, 255). With the accession of Leovagis, who had become a Catholic, Arianism ceased to be the creed of Spain. As for the Ostrogoths, they seem to have been fairly tolerant, after the first violence of the invasion. A notable exception was the persecution of Theodoric (524—42). It was prompted by the repressive measures which Justin I had issued against the Arians of the Eastern Empire, among whom Goths would of course be included. One of the victims of the persecution was Pope John I, who died in prison.

Among the Lombards.—St. Gregory the Great, in parts of his "Dialogues", describes the sufferings which Catholics had to endure at the time of the Lombard invasion under Autharius in 572. But there were troubles after Autharius's death (590) the Lombards were not troublesome, except perhaps in the Duchies of Benevento and Spoleto. Autharius's queen, Theodelinda, a Catholic princess of Bavaria, was able to use her influence with her second husband, Agilulf, Autharius's successor, so that he, although probably remaining an Arian, was friendly to the Church and allowed his son to be baptized a Catholic (see Lombard).

Among the Vandals.—The Vandals, Arians like the Visigoths and the others, were the most hostile of all towards the Church. During the period of their domination in Spain (422-29) the Church suffered persecution, the details of which are unknown. In 429, under the lead of Gericene, the Goths crossed over to Africa, and by 435 had made themselves masters of Numidia and Africa. In the North, by the whole of the country was driven from their sees into exile. When Carthage was taken in 439 the churches were given over to the Arian clergy, and the bishop Quodvultdeus (a friend of St. Augustine) and the greater part of the Catholic clergy were stripped of what they had, put on board unworthy ships, and carried to Naples. Confiscation of church property and exile of the clergy was the rule throughout the provinces of the North, where all public worship was forbidden to Catholics. In the provinces of the South, however, the persecution was not severe. Some Catholic court officials, who had accompanied Gericene from Spain, were tortured, exiled, and finally put to death because the ruler refused apostatization. No Catholic in fact was allowed to hold any office.

Gericene's son, Hunern, who succeeded in 477, though at first somewhat tolerant, arrested and banished under circumstances of great cruelty nearly five thousand Catholic bishops, including bishops and clergy, and finally by an edict of 25 Feb., 484, abolished the Catholic worship, transferred all their property to the Arians, exiled the bishops and clergy, and deprived of civil rights all those who would not receive Arian baptism. Great numbers suffered savage treatment, many died, others were mutilated or crippled for life. His successor, Gunamund (484-90), did not relax the persecution until 487. But the exiled bishops were recalled, though they had afterwards to endure some persecution from Trasamund (496-523) and complete peace came to the Church at the accession of Gericene's son Hilderic, with whom the Vandal domination ended (see Africa).

In Arabia.—Christianity penetrated into South Arabia (Yemen) in the fourth century. In the sixth century the Christians were brutally persecuted by the Jewish King Dumaan, no less than five thousand, including the prince, Aretas, being said to have suffered execution in 523 after the capture of Naga. The Faith was only saved from utter extinction at this period by the armed intervention of the King of Abyssinia. And it did in fact disappear before the invading forces of Islam.

Under the Mohammedans.—With the spread of Mohammedanism in Syria, Egypt, Persia, and North Africa, there were a few violations of Christian- ity. At the first onset of invasion, in the eighth century, many Christians were butchered for refusing to apostatize; afterwards they were treated as helots, subject to a special tax, and liable to suffer loss of goods or life itself at the caprice of the caliph or the populace.

In Spain the first Mohammedan ruler to institute a violent persecution of the Christians was the viceroy Abd-errahman II (821-32). The persecution was begun in 850, was continued by Mohammed (852-87) and lasted with interruptions till 960, when the Christians were strong enough to intimidate their persecutors. The number of martyrs was small, Eutychius, Archbishop of Toledo (11 March, 859), who has left an account of the persecution, being himself the most famous (see MOHAMMED AND MOLLGEDUMANISM).

Under the Iconoclasts.—The troubles brought on the Church of the East by the Iconoclast emperors cover a period of one hundred and twenty years. Leo III (the Isaurian) published two edicts against images about 726 and 730. The execution of the edicts was strenuously resisted. Popes Gregory II and III protested in vigorous language against the autocratic reformer, and the people resorted to open violence. But Constantine V (Copronymus, 741–75) continued his father's policy, summoning a council at Constantinople in which persecutions were the orthodox party. The monks formed the especial object of his attack. Monasteries were demolished, and the monks themselves shamefully maltreated and put to death. Under Constantine VI (780–97), through the influence of his mother, the regent Irene, the Seventh Ecumenical Council was summoned in 877, and rescinded the decrees of the Councils. But there was a revival of the persecution under Leo V (813–20), the bishops who stood firm, as well as the monks, being the special objects of his attack, while many others were directly done to death or died as a result of cruel treatment in prison. This persecution, which was continued under Michael III (820–29), reached its most frightful height under Constantine V and Leo V (842). Great numbers of monks were put to death by this monarch; but at his decease the persecutions ended (842) (see ICONOCLASTS).

Modern Period.—We have reviewed the persecutions undergone by the Church during the first millennium of its existence. During her second millennium she was to suffer persecution in her mission of spreading the Gospel, and especially in Japan and China (see MARTYRS, JAPANESE; MARTYRS IN CHINA). She has also had to face the attacks of her own children, culminating in the excesses and religious wars of the Reformation.

For an account of the persecutions of Irish, English, and Scotch Catholics, see ENGLAND; IRELAND; SCOT- LAND; PENAL LAWS; and the numerous articles on individual martyrs, e.g. Edmund Campion, Blessed; Plunkett, Oliver, Venerable.

Poland.—Within the last century, Poland has suffered what is perhaps the most notable of recent persecutions. Catholicism had continued to be the established religion of the country until the intervention of Catherine II of Russia (1762–96). By means of political intrigues and open hostility, she first of all secured a position of political suzerainty over the country, and then effected the separation of the Ruthenians from the Holy See, and incorporated them with the Orthodox Church. Russia, Nicholask I (1826–55), and Alexander II (1855–81), resumed her policy of intimidation and forcible suppression. The latter monarch especially showed himself a violent persecutor of the Catholics, the barbarities that were committed in 1863 being so savage as to call forth a joint protest from the Governments of France, Austria, and Great Britain. After his death the Catholics were granted a certain measure of toleration, and in 1905 Nicholas II granted the full liberty of worship (see POLAND; RUSSIA).

In modern times, however, a new element has been added to the forces opposing the Church. There have indeed been occasional recrudescences of the "Reformers", violence dictated by a frenzied fear of Catholic progress. Most of all in the instance the Charleston and Philadelphia disturbances in 1834 and 1834, and the "No Popery" cries against the establishment of the Catholic hierarchy in England and Holland in 1850 and 1853. But this was no more than the spirit of the Reformation. For the attitude of the South American republics during the nineteenth century, see the articles on those countries.

Liberalism.—A new spirit of opposition appears in the so-called "Liberalism" and in Free Thought, whose influence has been felt in Catholic as well as Protestant countries. Its origin is to be traced back to the indelible philosophy of the eighteenth century. At the end of that century it had grown so strong that it could not be repressed by the Church with armed violence. In France six hundred petitions were sent to Constantine V, and the "Beaulette", in 1791, and in the next year three hundred eclesiastics, including an archbishop and two bishops, were brutally massacred in the prisons of Paris. The Reign of Terror ended in 1795. But the spirit of indelibility which triumphed then has ever since sought and found opportunities for persecution. And it has been assisted by the endeavour of even of the Catholic governments to subordinate the Church to the State, or to separate the two powers altogether. In Switzerland the Catholics were so incensed by the attacks of the Liberal party on their religious freedom that they resolved on an appeal to arms. Their "Separate League" (q. v.) or "Separation League" was at first successful in the war of 1813, and in 1814, after the final defeat by the forces of the Diet in 1814 the result has been to secure religious liberty throughout Switzerland. Since that time the excitement caused by the decree on Papal Infallibility found vent in another period of hostile legislation; but the Catholics have been strong enough to maintain and reinforce their position in the country.

In other countries Liberalism has not issued in such direct warfare against the Church; though the defenders of the Church have often been ranged against revolutionaries who were attacking the altar along with the throne. But the history of the nineteenth century reveals a constant opposition to the Church. Her influence has been straitened by adverse legislation, the monastic orders have been expelled and their property confiscated, and, what is perhaps most characteristic of modern persecution, religion has been excluded from the schools and universities. The underlying principle is always the same, though the countries which have adopted the spirit of development are peculiar to the different times and periods. Liberalism in France, Josephinism in Austria, and the May Laws of the German Empire have all the same principle of subordinating the Church to the Government, or separating the two powers by a secularist and unnatural divorce. But the solidarity of Catholics and the energetic protests of the Holy See succeeded often in establishing Concordats to safeguard the independent rights of the Church. The terms of these concessions have not always been observed by Liberal or Absolutist Governments. Still they saved the Church in her time of peril. And the enforced separation of Church from State which followed the renunciation of the Concordats in some Latin countries the dangers of Secularism (q. v.) and how they must defend their rights as members of a Church which transcends the limits of states and nations, and... acknowledges an authority beyond the reach of political legislation. In the Teutonic countries, on the other hand, the Church does notloom so large a target for the missiles of her enemies, than its sister churches of Rome and Antioch. Two causes may have contributed to this: (1) the privileged political and religious status in Egypt of Jews from whom the Government found it difficult to distinguish the Christians; (2) Roman citizenship having never been extended to the Egyptian Jews, the Jews of Egypt were free from the obligations of the Roman state religion and consequently there was no reason for persecution. For it is well known that the only cause of the persecutions in the first and second centuries was the incomparability of the Christian faith with the state religion, which every Roman citizen, the desision of which they could not forsake, and otherwise to follow any other form of religion he chose.

Persecution of Severus (200-11).—But when Septimius Severus by a special edict (about a. d. 200) forbade under severe punishment "to make Jews and Christians", the law applied to all subjects of the Roman Empire whether citizens or not; the Egyptian Church was therefore involved in the persecution in Alexandria, and the fresh impulse given by Demetrius to the diffusion of Christianity throughout the country, seem to have attracted the attention of the emperor, who had just visited Egypt. The school broke up just at that time; and its director, Clement of Alexandria, being obliged to leave Egypt, the youthful Origen attempted to reorganize it. He was soon arrested by the newly-appointed prefect Aquila. Shortly before, under Lattus, his father Leonidas was the first victim of the persecution. Origen had earnestly encouraged him to stand firm in his confession, and was himself now longing for a martyr's death. His desire was frustrated by the excess of the ruler's anger and frieness. But he had not made the distribution of assisting and encouraging a number of his pupils who died for the faith. Plutarch, who had been his first disciple, Serenus (burnt), Heraclides, a catechumen, and Hero, a neophyte (both beheaded); a woman, Herais, a catechumen (burnt), another, Serenus (beheaded), and Basiliades, a soldier attached to the office of Aquila. Potamien, a young Christian woman, had been condemned to be sunk by degrees in a cauldron of boiling pitch and was being led to death by Basiliades, who on the way protected her against the insults of the mob. In return for his kindness the martyr promised him not to forget him with her Lord when she reached her destination. Soon after Pota- mienza's death Basiliades was asked by his fellow-soldier to take a certain oath; on answering that he could not do it, as he was a Christian, at first they thought he was jesting, but seeing he was in earnest they denounced him and he was condemned to be beheaded. While waiting in jail for his sentence to be carried out some Christians (Ofirs, Paris, possibly one of them) visited him and asked him how he happened to be converted; he answered that three days after her death, Potamienza had appeared to him by night and placed a crown on his head as a pledge that the Lord would soon receive him into his glory.
marshy district southwest of Alexandria, "a country..." Dionysius says, "destitute of brethren and exposed to the annoyances of the travelers and incursions of robbers", and assigned them to different villages throughout that desolate region. Dionysius and his companions were stationed at Colliuthon, near the highway, so they could be seized first. This new arrangement, which had caused no small apprehension to Dionysius, turned out much better than the former one. If intercourse with Egypt was more difficult, it was easier with Alexandria; Dionysius had the consolation of seeing his friends more frequently, those who were nearer to his heart, and he could hold partial meetings with them as was customary in the most remote suburbs of the capital (Euseb., "Hist. ecc.," VIII, vii, xi, 8, 10). In 301, while Diocletian was seriously ill, a fourth edict was issued commanding all the people to sacrifice at once in the different cities and offer libations to the idols (Euseb., "Mart. Pal.," III, i). On 1 May, 305, both Diocletian and Maximian Herculius retired officially from the public life and a tetrarchy was organized with Galerius and Constantius as Augusti and Severus and Maximinus Daia as Caesars. A new apportionment of the empire was made, Egypt and Syria with the rest of the Diocese of Orient going to Maximinus. Superstitions in the extreme, surrounded by magicians without whom he did not venture to move even a finger, fercious and dissolve, Maximinus was far more bitter against the Christians than Galerius. (Lib. inv. 4, xi. 3)

To give a fresh impetus to the persecution, he published again (305) in his provinces, in his own name, the fourth edict which had been issued the year before by all the members of the tetrarchy, thus making it clear that no mercy was to be expected from him (Euseb., "Mart. Pal.," IV, viii). In 307, after the death of Constantius, his son Constantine was made second Caesar and Severus promoted to the rank of Augustus. The following year Severus, defeated by Maxentius, was obliged to take his own life and his place and rank was given by Galerius to Licius. Maximinus then assumed the title of Augustus against the wish of Galerius who nevertheless had to recognize the new tetrarchy. The edict of 307 did not have a very bad effect. It was probably on the occasion of this quarrel with Galerius that Maximinus for a short while in the summer of 308 relaxed somewhat his measures against the Christians. "Relief and liberty were granted to those who for Christ's sake were labouring in the mines of the Thebaid" (Mart. Pal., IX, ii.). But suddenly in later years, tyranny, persecution, the new (so-called fifth edict) ordering the shrines of the idols to be speedily rebuilt and all the people, even infants at the breast, to be compelled to sacrifice and taste of the offerings. At the same time he commanded the things for sale in the markets to be sprinkled with the libations from the sacrifices, the entrance to the public baths to be contaminated similarly (Mart. Pal., IX, vi). and when three years later (April 311) Galerius was devoured by a terrible disease and already on the point of death, finally softened toward the Christians and asked them to pray to their God for his recovery, Maximinus significantly kept aloof (Hist. ecc., VIII, xvii). His name does not appear with those of Galerius, Constantius, and Licius, in the heading of the fourth and fifth edicts. This was probably an amalgamation in his provinces. However, probably to pheate his two colleagues on the occasion of a new apportionment of the power as a result of Galerius' death, he told his chief official, Sabina, to instruct the governors and other magistrates to relax the persecution. His orders received wider interpretation than he had intended, and while his provincial, Veturius, in the sixteenth year of Diocletian, forced a number of high rank officers to prove their loyalty by the usual test of sacrificing to the gods of the empire, on penalty of losing their honours and privileges. Many "soldiers of Christ's kingdom" cheerfully gave up the seeming glory of this world and a few received death "in expectation for the glory of Eusebius," (Hist. ecc., VIII, vii; Chron., ed. Schone, II, 186 sq.). On 23 February, 303, the Church of Nicomedia was torn down by order of the emperors. The next day (thus Lact., op. cit., xii., Euseb., says "in March, on the approach of the Passion"), a first edict was published everywhere ordering the churches to be destroyed, the Holy Scriptures to be burnt, and inflicting degradation on those in high rank and slavery on their households. Two other edicts soon followed, one ordering the imprisonment of all church officials, the other commanding them to sacrifice to the gods (Euseb., op. cit., VIII, ii, 1, 5; vi, 8, 10).
holding religious meetings, publicly or privately (Eusebius, op. cit., IX, i. 4; Lactant., op. cit., XXXVII). At the same time everything was done to extirpate the renounced. The Acts of Pilate and of Our Lord, full of every kind of blasphemy against Christ, were sent with the emperor's approval to all the provinces under him, with written commands that they should be posted publicly in every place and that the schismatists should give them to their scholars instead of their customary lessons to be studied and learned by heart (Eusebius, op. cit., IX, v.). Members of the hierarchy and their adherents were also seized on the most trifling pretext and put to death without mercy. In the case of Peter of Alexandria no cause at all was given. He was arrested quite unexpectedly and beheaded without explanation as if by command of Maximinus (ibid., IX, viii. This was in April, 312, if not somewhat earlier. In the autumn of the same year Constantine defeated Maximinus and soon after conjointly with Licinius published the edict of Milan, a copy of which was sent to Maximinus with an invitation to publish it in his own provinces. He met their wishes half way, posting the edict of toleration, but not of liberty, of tolerance, but so full of false, contradictory statements and so reticent on the points at issue, that the Christians did not venture to hold meetings or even appear in public (Eusebius, "Hist. ece!.", IX, ix, 14-21). It was not, however, until the following year, after his defeat at Adrianople (30 April, 313) at the hands of Constantine and Licinius, that he gave the emperor full supremacy over the Eastern empire, that he finally made up his mind to enact a counterfeit of the edict of Milan, and grant full and unconditional liberty to the Christians. He died soon after, consumed by "an invisible and God-sent fire" (Hist. eccl., IX, x. 14).

Lactantius says he took poison at Tarsus, where he had been imprisoned (ibid., viii. 24).

EFFECTS OF THE PERSECUTIONS.—On the effects of the persecutions in Egypt, Alexandria, and the Thebaid in a general way we are well informed by several witnesses, such as Phileas, Bishop of Thinisus, in a letter to his flock which has been preserved by Eusebius (Hist. eecl., VIII, x), who visited Egypt towards the end of the persecution, and seems to have been imprisoned there for the faith. Eusebius speaks of large numbers of men in groups from ten to one hundred, with young children and women put to death in one day, and this not for a few days or a short time, but for a long series of years. He describes the wonderful arduous of the faithful, their eagerness and ardour in judging and condemning themselves Christians, the joy with which they received their sentence, the truly Divine energy with which they endured for hours and days the most excruciating tortures; scraping, raking, scourging, quartering, crucifixion head downwards, not only without complaint, but singing and offering up hymns and Thanksgiving to God till their very last breath. Those who did not die in the midst of their tortures were killed by the sword, fire, or drowning (Eusebius, "Hist. eecl.", VIII, viii. 9). Frequently they were thrown again into prison to die of exhaustion or hunger. If perchance they recovered under the care of friends and were offered their freedom on condition of sacrificing, they cheerfully chose again to face the judge and his executioners (Letter of Phileas, ibid., 10). Not all, however, received their crowns at the end of a few hours or days. Many were condemned to hard labour in the quarries of Porphyry in Assuan, or, especially after a.d. 307, in the still more dreadful mines of Pl二人reop on condition of sacrifice. For some it was a blessing, however, for the emolument received from the Christian bishops. 1898, p. 112), or in those of Cilicia. Lest they should escape, they were previously deprived of the use of their left legs by having the sinews cut or burnt at the knee or at the ankle, and again their right eyes were blinded with the sword and then destroyed to the very roots by fire. In one year (308) we read of 97, and again of as many as 130, Egyptian confessors thus doomed to a fate far more cruel than death, because of the hope of obtaining the pardon and the privilege of the encouraging presence and exhortations of sympathetic bystanders (Mart. Pal., VIII, i, 13).

God in at least two instances related by Eusebius inspired the tyrant to shorten the conflict of those valiant athletes. At his command forty of them, among whom were many Egyptians, were beheaded in one day at Zora, near Phœnix. With them was Silvanus of Gaza, a bishop who had been ministering to their souls. On the same occasion, Bishops Peterus and Nibilus, a presbyter, and a layman, Patermuthus, all from Egypt, were condemned to death by fire immediately at Phœnix. a. d. 309 (Eusebius, "Hist. eecl.", XIII, Carcton, pp. 46-8). Besides Peter of Alexandria, but a few of the many who suffered death illustrate at Alexandria and throughout Egypt and the Thebaid are recorded by Eusebius, viz., Evanus, Dunus, and Ammonius, his companions, all three presbyters of the Church of Alexandria, also Phileas, Bishop of Thimius, and three other Egyptian bishops, Hexamius (perhaps the author of the so-called Hexamian recension, see Hastings, "Dict. of the Bible", IV, 415), Pachymus, and Theodorus (Hist. ece!, VIII, xii, 7); finally Philoromus, "who held a high office under the imperial government at Alexandria and who administered justice every day attended by a military guard to his house, and was praised with the object of his dignity" (ibid., ix, 7). The dates of their confessions, with the exception of that of St. Peter (see above) are not certain.

EGYPTIAN MARTYRS IN SYRIA AND PALESTINE.—Among these, Eusebius mentions Parsus and Alexander, beheaded at Caesarea in 304, with six other young confessors. He also records an occasion on which the public combat of the Christians who had lately been condemned to the wild beasts would take place, they presented themselves, hands bound, to the governor and declared themselves Christians in the hope of being sent to the arena. But they were thrown in prison, tortured, and finally were beheaded (Mart. Pal., IV, 3). Elsewhere we read of five young Egyptians who were cast before different kinds of ferocious beasts, including bulls gored to madness with red-hot irons, but none of which would attack the athletes of Christ who, though unmanned, stood motionless in the arena, their arms stretched out in the form of a cross, fearlessly engaged in prayer. Finally they were also beheaded and cast into the sea (Hist. eecl., VIII, vii). We must also mention with Eusebius a party of Egyptians who had been sent to minister to the confessors in Cilicia. They were seized as they were entering Ascalon. Most of them received the same sentence as those whom they had gone to help, being mutilated in their eyes and feet, and sent to the mines. One, Ares, was condemned to be burnt, and two, Produs (or Primus) and Ellyas, were beheaded. a. d. 306 (Mart. Pal., X, 1). The following year five others who had accompanied the confessors to the mines in Cilicia were returning to their homes when they were arrested as they were passing the gates of Caesarea, and were put to death after being tortured, a. d. 309 (ibid., vi-xiii).

We close this section with the name of Eclesius, a young Lycean and brother of Apphianus (Mart. Pal., IV). He had been condemned to the mines of Palestine. Having somehow been released, he came to Alexandria and there with his companion, while he was trying some Christians. Unable to contain his indignation at the sight of the outrages inflicted by this magistrate on the modesty of some pure women, he went forward with and words and deeds overwhelmed him with shame and disgrace. Forthwith he was committed to the executioners, tortured and cast into the sea (Mart. Pal., V, ii-iii). This glorious page of the history of the Church of Egypt is not of course quite free from some dark spots. Many were overcome by the torments at various stages of their confessions and apostatized more or less explicitly. This is attested by the "Liber de Penitentia" of Peter of Alexandria, dated from Easter, 306; published in Roux, Religieux Sacre, 2nd ed. (IV, 23 supra). (See above.)

PERSECUTION OF DIOCLETIAN IN THE ACTS OF MARTYRS OF THE Coptic CHURCH.—The Acts of Martyrs of Egypt in their present form have been, with few exceptions, written in Coptic, and were current read in the churches and monasteries of Egypt at least from the ninth to the eleventh century. Later the most ancient part of them was translated into Arabic and then into Ethiopic for the use of the Abyssinian Church. The Coptic Acts have often come down to us both in Bohairic and in Sahidic, those in the latter dialect being as a rule fragmentary, as most of its literature. Where we have the same Acts in two or more dialects or languages, it generally happens that the various versions represent more or less different recensions, and this is sometimes the case even between two copies of the same Acts in the same language. The greater part of the extant Bohairic Acts have been published with a French translation by the present writer of this article in "Les Actes des Martyrs de l'Egypte", etc. I (here = B-I), II (here = B-II). Two of the Arabic Acts have appeared in French translation only, and without indication of the MSS. from which they were taken, under the name of A. Amlouche in "Contes et romans", etc. (here = A). For the publication of some of the Ethiopian in French, see R. Ferina in Acta Martyrum, I (here = P).

Unlike the Acts of martyrs of the other churches, those of the Coptic Church, almost without any exception, contain some historical data of a more general character, which are as the background of the narrative proper. Put side by side, the data furnished by the various Acts of martyrs referred to the persecution of Diocletian prove on careful examination to constitute just such an outline of the history of that persecution as could result from a condensed compilation of the writings of Eusebius. Indeed it seems as though each individual writer of those Acts had before his eyes a compilation of that nature and took from it what was expedient for his purposes. The original text is almost literally rendered in Coptic and is still more surprising in Arabic or in Ethiopic, with here and there an occasional distortion owing to the failure on the part of the translator to grasp the right meaning of a difficult obscure passage; sometimes it is paraphrased; frequently it has been amplified or contracted, in the latter case more frequently to find it more or less curtailed. In other cases several passages have been condensed into one, so as to make appear simultaneous facts chronologically distinct. Finally, it not seldom occurs that a paragraph or even a short passage of Eusebius has been transformed into a real historical romance. In the latter case all proper names are fictitious, and the same historical character appears under various names. Antiochia is universally substituted for Nicomedia as the capital of the eastern empire. Naturally also some violence is inflicted on the original at the point where the romance is grafted upon it. A few examples will suffice to illustrate our view and at the same time we hope to make appear the nature of the text.

Bringing together the data furnished by the "Acts of Claudius" (P., 175, and A, 3), and Theodore Stratates (B-II, 157), we can easily reconstruct the primitive Coptic version of the beginning of the persecution as follows: In the twelfth year of Diocletian, as the Christians were preparing to celebrate the Pascha, an edict was issued everywhere, ordering their churches to be destroyed, their Holy Scriptures burnt, and their slaves liberated, while other edicts were promulgated demanding the imprisonment and punishment of the ministers of the Christian Church unless they sacrificed to the gods. This is unmistakably a translation of Eusebius, "Hist. eccl.", VIII, ii, 4-5, and although it shows three omissions, or obclusions, it is an indication of the month; the mention that this was the first edict, and the third provision of the edict, together with the wrong translation of the fourth clause, however, two of the omissions are supplied by the "Acts of Epime" (B-I, 122; comp. Dihyllumus II, 25), in which we find as heading of the general act the following passage:

"This was the first edict [apographf] that was against all the saints. He [the king] got up early on the first day of the month of Phra'muthi (27 March-25 April), as he was to pass into a new year and wrote an edict [diatagma] etc. It needs but a superficial comparison between Eusebius, "Hist. eccl.", VIII, ii, 4-5, and "Mart. Pal.", III, i, to see that the italics in the Coptic version above belong to the former passage, while the rest represent a distorted rendering of the latter. The Coptic has even retained to some extent the difference of style in the two places, having apograph for graph in the first case and diatagma for prostagma in the latter. The other omission, viz., the mention of the fourth clause, the text already extant or yet to be discovered. As for having misunderstood the fourth clause of the edict, the Coptic compiler may well be forgiven his error in view of the divergence of opinion still obtaining among scholars as to the right interpretation of this somewhat obscure passage. (See McGiffert on the passage, note 707c)."

In this case, as the passage of P. 122, the same have departed from McGiffert's translation in supplying "their" before "household", thus making this fourth clause in reality a continuation of the third one.

Here is now another passage in which the text of Eusebius is gradually transformed so as to lose practically everything of its primitive aspect. In the "Acts of Theodore the Eastern" (one of the most legendary compositions in the Coptic Martyrology), we read that Diocletian, having written the edict, handed it to one of the magistrates, Stephen by name, who was standing by him. Stephen took it and tore it up in the presence of the king. Whereupon the latter grasped his sword and cut Stephen in twain, and he wrote a new edict against the Christians over the world (P., 120 sq.). The legend process has begun, to say the least. Yet everybody will recognize in this story a translation, distorted as it may be, of Eusebius, VIII, iv (those in Nicomedia). As in Eusebius it is a man in high rank who tears the edict, only in Eusebius the edict was posted up instead of being handed to the magistrate as above and Stephen did not take place among the two of the emperors were in the same city" not "in the presence of the emperor"; finally, Eusebius does not say with what death the perpetrator of the act met (Lactantius, "De mort. persecur.", XIII, says he was burnt). In the "Acts of Epime", the legend takes another step forward. A young soldier of high rank, seeing the edict (posted up) takes off his sword belt and presents himself to the king. The king asks him who he is. The soldier answers that he is Chris-todore, son of Basilides the Stratates, but that henceforth he shall not serve an impious king, but confess Christ. Then the king takes the sword of one of the soldiers and runs it through the young man (B-II, 122). This is almost the account of the story. Indeed it appears as if the writer of the "Acts of Epime" had taken it from those of Theodore the Eastern, or some other already distorted version of the Eusebian account, and spoiled it still more in his effort to conceal their act of paganism.
We could cite many more passages of the Acts of martyrs of Egypt, thus reproducing more or less exactly, yet unmistakably, the account of the persevering grace in life, since it is of faith that lost grace can be recovered. Between the temporal and imperfect perseverance and the lifelong continuance or most perfect perseverance there is room for final perseverance as commonly understood, i.e., the preservation of grace from the last conversion till death. It may be viewed as a power or as an actual fact. As the power it means the perpetual spiritual means whereby the human will is enabled to persevere unto the end if it duly cooperates. As an actual fact it means the de facto preservation of grace and implies two factors, one internal, i.e., the steadfast use of the various means of salvation, the other external, i.e., the timely coming of death while the soul is at peace with God. Theologians, aptly not or, call the first active and the latter passive perseverance. There may be passive perseverance without active, as when an infant dies immediately after Baptism, but the normal case, which alone is considered here, is that of a good death crowning a greater or lesser duration of perseverance. The case of an active persevering grace in holiness and timeliness of death are brought about by a problem long debated among Christian writers. The Semipelagians of the fifth century, while forsaking the sweeping ethical naturalism of Pelagius and admitting on principle the graces of the will, contended nevertheless, that the final perseverance of the justified took place for them by the free will and not by grace, i.e., by our free will; if sometimes, in order to tally with conciliar definitions, they called it a grace, it was but a misnomer, as that grace could be merited by man's natural exertions. Oppositely, the Reformers of the sixteenth century, partly followed by the Balianists and Jansenist school, so naturalized the native power and moral value of our free will as to make final perseverance depend on God alone, while their pretended fiducial faith and immaniscence of grace led to the conclusion that we, in this world, have absolute certainty of our final perseverance.

The Catholic doctrine, outlined by St. Augustine, chiefly in 'De duplo perseverantia' and 'De correptione et gratia', and the Council of Orange in Southern Gaul, received its full expression in the Council of Trent, sess. VI, c. xiii, cap. 16 and 22: (1) The power of persevering.—Cusanus 22 (Sisquis) disjixit justicetum vel sine speciali auxilio Dei in accepta justitia persecutum esse possit, vel sine posse unius personae, sicut amathetis sitis), by teaching that the justified cannot persever by himself, a special help of God, but with it can persever, not only condemns both the naturalism of the Semipelagians and the false supernaturalism of the Reformers but also clearly implies that the power of perseverance is neither in the human will alone nor in God's grace solely, but in the combination of both, i.e., Divine grace aiding human will, and human will cooperating with Divine grace. The grace in question is called by the Council a "special help of God", apparently to distinguish it both from the concurrence of God in the natural order and habitual grace, neither of which were denied by the Semipelagians. Theologians, with a few exceptions, identify this special help with the sum total of actual graces vouchsafed to man. (2) Actual perseverance.—The Council of Trent, using an expression coined by St. Augustine, calls it (magnus unguis in femine perseverantiae donum) the great gift of final perseverance. "It consists", says Newman, "in an ever watchful and habitual degree of All-Merciful Love, removing temptations which He seeks to be fatal to us, succouring us at those times when we are in particular peril, whether from our negligence or other cause, and ordering the course of our life so that we may die at a time when He sees that we are in the state of grace." The supernatural character of such a gift is clearly asserted by Christ: "Holy Father, keep them in thy name whom thou hast given (John, xvi, 13); by St. Paul: "he, who hath believed on you, will pass it unto the city of Christ Jesus" (Phil. i, 6); and by St. Peter: "But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory in Christ Jesus, after you have suffered a little, will himself perfect you, and confirm you, and establish you" (I Pet. v. 10). The extreme precociousness of our natural gift is not twice beyond our certain knowledge and meriting power.

That we can never in this life be certain of our final perseverance is defined by the Council of Trent, Sess. VI, can. xvi.: "Si quis magnum illud usu in fidelium perseverantia domum secero habitumur, absoluta et infallibil certitudine dixit, nisi ex speciali revelacio divina vel infirmitatem summae veniendi ad certitudoque quodam modo veri adhuc dabitur, in hac vita quaerere non potest. Nullaque alia ratio est quam iudicium aperiri de certitudo quodammodo veri adhuc in hac vita quaerere non potest. But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory in Christ Jesus, after you have suffered a little, will himself perfect you, and confirm you, and establish you" (I Pet. v. 10). The extreme precociousness of our natural gift is not twice beyond our certain knowledge and meriting power.

What we call Persia is not identical with the ancient empire designated by the name. The empire forementioned, from the sixth century B.C. to the seventh of our era, sometimes known as Persia proper, Media, Elam, Chaldea, Babylon, Assyria, the highlands of Armenia and Bactriana, North-Eastern Arabia, and even Egypt. Persia proper is bounded on the north by Transoxana, the Caspian Sea, and Russian Turkestan; on the south by the Hindu-Musulman, or Arabia Felix; to the west by Russian Turkestan, Afghanistan, and Beluchistan, and on the west by Asiatic Turkey and the Persian Gulf; it is over one-fifth as large as the United States (excluding Alaska) and twice as large as Germany, having an area of about 462,000 square miles. The whole country occupies a plateau varying in height from 3000 to 8000 feet, the land being divided by the climate, its northern edge bordering on the Caspian Sea and the plain of Turkestan, its southern and southwestern on the Persian Gulf and the plains of Mesopotamia. The ancient Persians were vigorous and hardy, simple in manners, occupied in raising cattle and horses in the mountainous regions, and agriculture in the valleys and plains. The four great cities were Ecbatana, in the north, Persepolis in the east, Susa in the west, and Seleucia-Ctesiphon in the south-west. The provinces and towns of modern Persia will be given below.

I. History.—Historians generally assign the beginning of the Persian history to the reign of Cyrus the Great (559-529 B.C.). The empire then experienced its full development. It should begin with Darius (521-485 B.C.). Cyrus was certainly of Persian extraction, but when he founded his empire he was Prince of Elam (Anzan), and he merely added Media and Persia to his dominion. He was neither by birth nor religion a true Persian, for both he and Cambyses worshipped the Babylonian gods. Darius, on the other hand, was born in Persia, and religion a Persian, descended, like Cyrus, from the royal Achemenian house of Persia, and a follower of the Zoroastrian faith. The ancestors of Darius had remained in Persia, whilst the branch of the family of which Cyrus was a member had settled in Elam. The history of Persia may be divided into five great periods, each represented by a dynasty: A. The Achemenian Dynasty, beginning with the kingdom of Cyrus the Great and ending with the Macedonian conquest (550-331 B.C.); B. The Greek, or Seleucid, Dynasty (331-250 B.C.); C. The Parthian Dynasty (250 B.C.—A.D. 227); D. The Sassanian Dynasty (A.D. 227-651); and E. The Muhammadan period (A.D. 651 to the present). A. The Achemenian Dynasty (550-331 B.C.).—Towards the middle of the sixth century B.C., and a few years after the death of Nebuchadnezzar (Nabu-chad-nezzer) the Great, King of Babylon (605-552 B.C.), Western Asia was divided into three kingdoms: the Babylonian Empire, Chaldea, and Lydias; and it was only a question of time which of the three would annihilate the other two. Astyages (583-557 B.C.), the successor of Cyaxares (625-585 B.C.), being engaged in an expedition against Babylonia and Mesopotamia, Cyrus, Prince of Anzan, in Elam, profiting by his absence, fomented a rebellion in Media. Astyages, hearing of the revolt, immediately returned, but was defeated and overthrown by Cyrus, who was proclaimed King of Media. Thus, with the overthrow of Astyages and the accession of Cyrus to the throne, the Median Empire passed into the hands of the Persians (530 B.C.). In 549, Cyrus invaded Assyria and Babylonia; in 546 he attacked Carchemish and, defeating the Medes and the remnant of his army to his empire; he then conquered Babylon and, in 539, marched against Assyria. In 538 Babylon surrendered, Nabonidus fled, the Syro-Phoenician provinces submitted, and Cyrus allowed the Hebrews to return to Palestine. But in 529 he was killed in battle, and was succeeded by Cambyses, the heir apparent, who was his brother.
Smerdis to death. In 525 Cambyses, aided by a Phoenician fleet, conquered Egypt and advanced against the Sudan, but was compelled to return to Egypt. He then informed that Gaumata, a Magian, pretending to be the murdered Smerdis, had seized the throne, Cambyses committed suicide (522) and was succeeded, in 531, by Darius Hystaspes, who, with six other princes, succeeded in overthrowing the usurper Gaumata.

With the accession of Darius, the throne passed to the second line of descendants of Cyrus II, and thus the Elamite dynasty came to an end. This was soon followed by a general revolt in all the provinces, including Babylon, where a son of Nebonadus was proclaimed king. Susiana also rose up in arms, and Darius was confronted with the task of reconquering the empire for Cyrus II. In 520 Babylon was conquered, and the other provinces, including Egypt, were pacified and the whole empire reorganized and divided into satrapies with fixed administration and taxes. In 545 the Asiatic Greeks began to rebel, but were crushed by Darius. Thence he marched to the Indus and subjugated the country along its banks. In 499 the Ionians revolted, but were defeated and the city of Mileta destroyed (494 B.C.). In 492 Mardoukonos, one of Darius's generals, set out to reconquer Greece, concentrating all his forces in Cilicia; but the Persians were defeated at Marathon (490 B.C.). In 485 Darius was succeeded by his son, Xerxes I, who immediately set out to reconquer Egypt and Babylon, and renewed the war with Greece. Thermopylae and Artemisium, he was defeated by Themistocles at Salamis near Athens (480). During the years 479–465, Xerxes met with constant reverses; he gradually lost Attica, Ionia, the Archipelago, and Thrace, and at last was assassinated by Artabanes and his son, Arses. The latter becoming king as Arta-xerxes I, in 364 quelled revolts in Babylonia and Egypt in the year 454. In 449, the Persian fleet and army having been again defeated near Salamis, in Cyprus, a treaty of peace was made between Persia and Athens. Artaxerxes died in 424 and was succeeded by his eldest son, Xerxes II, who reigned but forty-five days and was murdered by Ochus, who ascended the throne in 423 as Darius II Nothus (the Bastard).

In 412, Darius II compelled Sparta to recognize Persian suzerainty over the Greek cities of Asia Minor, and reconquered the cities of Ionia and Caria. On his death (411), however, his eldest son, Xerxes II, whom he had placed on the throne as Artaxerxes II, and quelled revolts in Cyprus, Asia Minor, and Egypt. But in the last seven years of his reign, Egypt and Asia Minor became once more independent. He died in 359 and was succeeded by his son Ochus, known as Artaxerxes III. In this same year, the Persians were defeated in Egypt and lost Phoenicia and Cyprus (352); but in 345–340, Artaxerxes succeeded in conquering and crushing Sidon, Cyprus, and Egypt. In 338 he was murdered and was succeeded by his youngest son, Arses, who was in his turn put to death by the eunuch Bagos (333), and was succeeded by Codomannus, great-grandson of Darius II, who assumed the name of Darius III. In 334 Alexander, the son of Philip of Macedon, began his career of conquest by subduing all Asia Minor and Northern Syria. After conquering Tyre, Phoenicia, Judea, and Egypt in 332, he invaded Assyria, and at Arbela, in 331, defeated Darius and his vast army, thus putting an end to the Achaemenian dynasty. Darius III, who succeeded the name of Darius III, in 334 Alexander entered Babylon and Susa, and subdued the provinces of Elam, Persia, and Media. Bessus, the murderer of Darius, who had proclaimed himself King of Persia under the name of Artaxerxes IV, fell into Alexander's hands and was put to death (330 B.C.).

II. The Greek, or Seleucid, Dynasty (331–250 B.C.).—With Alexander's signal victory over Darius III at Arbela (Gugamela), in 331, the Achaemenian Kingdom of Persia for a time was founded more than seventy cities in which he planted Greek and Macedonian colonies. But the great conqueror, greedy for sensual pleasures, plunged into a course of dissipation which ended in his death, 13 June, 323. Dissension and civil wars broke out at once in every quarter of the vast empire, from India to the Nile, and lasted for nearly forty-two years. Perdiccas, the regent of Babylon during the minority of Alexander's son, was soon assassinated, and his power claimed by Pitho, Satrap of Media; but Pitho was displaced by a conspiracy of the other satraps, who, in 316, chose Eumenes to occupy the throne of Alexander. Eumenes was betrayed into the hands of Iugurtes, another great Macedonian general, who, again was obliged, in 312, to yield to Seleucus, one of the Alexandrian generals, founder of the Seleucid dynasty. He built the city of Seleucia on the Tigris, making it the capital of the Persian, or rather Greco-Persian, Empire. The great disturbing element during the Seleucid period was the rivalry between Greeks and Macedonians, as well as between cavalry and infantry. The Greek colonists in Bactria revolted against Macedonian arrogance and were with difficulty pacified by Seleucus Nicator. But the dissatisfaction continued, and, in the reign of Antiochus II, about 210 B.C., Diosotus, Satrap of Bactria, separated and founded the province of Bactria with the heart of Central Asia. This kingdom of Bactria presents one of the most singular episodes in history. A small colony of foreigners, many hundred miles from the sea, entirely isolated, and numbering probably not over thirty-five thousand, not only maintained their independence for about one hundred years and a strange land, but extended their conquests to the Ganges, and included several hundred populous cities in their dominions.

The reign of Seleucus Nicator lasted from 312 to 280 B.C. His first care was to reorganize his empire and satrapies (seventy-two in number), which yielded him an annual revenue equivalent to about twenty million dollars. In 289 he removed the seat of government from Seleucia to Antioch, in Syria. But, as it was impossible to govern properly so extensive an empire from so distant a capital, he found it advisable to make over the upper satrapies to Antiochus, his son, giving him Seleucia as his capital (246 B.C.). In 246 Antiochus was assassinated and was succeeded by his son, Antiochus I (called Soter), whose reign of twenty-one years was devoid of interest. His second son, Antiochus II (called Thesp, succeeded him in 261, a drunken and dissolute prince, who neglected his realm for the society of unworthy favourites. During his reign, north-eastern Persia was lost to the empire, and some Bactrians, emboldened by the weakness and effeminacy of Antiochus, and led by the brothers, Arsaces and Tiridates, moved west into Seleucid territory, near Parthia. Phereclus, the Seleucid satrap, having insulted Tiridates, was slain, and Parthia freed from the Macedonian yoke. Arses, the brother of Tiridates, was proclaimed first King of Parthia in 250 B.C., and the Seleucid dynasty fell into decay.

C. The Arsacid, or Parthian Dynasty (250 B.C.—. A.D. 216).—The founding of the Parthian monarchy marks the opening of a glorious era in the history of Persia. The Parthians, though inferior in habits and customs to the Persians proper, form, nevertheless, a branch of the same stock. They were originally a nomadic tribe, and, like the Persians, followers of Zoroaster. They had their own customs, and were famous for their horsemanship, their armies being entirely composed of cavalry, completely clad in chain armour and riding without saddles. They left few records; indeed, we really know very little of the internal history of the Parthians, and would have known still less but for the frequent wars between them and the Greeks and Romans. Numbers of Parthian coins are still found in northern Persia and have been of great value to the historian who, thousands of years later, has tried to put together the disjointed history of this dynasty. Amid the faint and confused outlines which alone remain to record the career of the mighty Parthian race which for over four hundred years ruled in Persia with a red of iron, and which repeatedly hurled back the veteran legions of Rome, we are able to discern two or three grand figures and some events that will be remembered while the world lasts.

Of these heroes of Parthia the most important was Mithridates the Great, who not only repaired the losses the empire had sustained in its conflicts with the Seleucids, but carried the conquests of Parthia as far as India, one direction, and the banks of the Euphrates in the other. Parthians and Romans met for the first time, not for war, but to arrange a treaty of peace between the two great powers of that age.
Soon after this event Demetrius III, head of the Seleucid dynasty, was forced to surrender, with his cruel army, to Mithridates, and ended his days in captivity. Mithridates also fell and the Parthian dominion was restored for the reign of Mithridates.
The coins of Mithridates are very numerous and clearly cut; the design shows the portrait of that monarch, with a full beard and strongly marked, but pleasing, features. His immediate successors were men of an entirely different stamp, and Tigranes, King of Armenia, was able, not only to recover, but to rob of some of her western provinces. In time Phraates succeeded to the throne of the Arsacids and, by calling for aid from the Romans, caused the overthrow of Tigranes; but the haughty republic of the West granted its assistance with such ill grace that years of warfare resulted. Phraates was murdered by his two sons, Orodes, as the Latins called him (Thuradda, in the Perso-Parthian tongue) ascended the throne; but to avoid dissension it was agreed that his brother, Mithridates, should rule over Media as an independent king. It was not long before civil war broke out between the two, and in the end Mithridates was taken and put to death in the presence of his brother. In his memory the sons of Phraates, Surenas and Cassius, who with Cesar and Pompey, shared the authority in the republic, took command of the Roman armies in Asia. He needed but the merest pretense to invade and attack Parthia; the easy victories of Pompey in Armenia led him to imagine that he had but to reach the borders of the Persian Empire and it would fall helpless into his grasp. He was a brave man, and led sixty thousand of the best troops in the world, but his contempt of the enemy, and the greed of gold for which he was notorious, brought him to a terrible catastrophe. The chief general of Orodes was Surenas, the first nobleman of the empire.
On the other hand, the Romans, under the Parthians met at Carrhae, near the sources of the Euphrates, Surenas conceeded the mass of his army behind the hills, allowing the Romans to see at first only his heavy cavalry. Little suspecting the actual force of the enemy, Publius Crassus, son of the general, charged with the cavalry. The Parthians, following their usual tactics, broke and fled as if in dismay.
When they had drawn the Romans far enough from the main army, the entire army of Surenas re-formed, surrounded them, and cut them to pieces. After this success, the Parthians hovered on the flanks of the Roman infantry, annoying them with missiles. Of the great army which Cesar had led into Asia not twenty thousand were left alive. The end of this disastrous raid was that the emperor was taken captive and settled by Orodes in Margiana. Orodes himself, after a long reign, during which Parthia attained the climax of her power, was strangled in his eightieth year by his son Phraates. He was the first Parthian king to assume the title of "King of Kings".

Phraates, his successor, removed the seat of government from the north of the empire to Tarsus, or, as the Greeks called it, the Ha.

PERSIA

persia, which continued to be the capital until the Mu-hammadan conquest, more than six hundred years later. Hatra, in that vicinity, also acquired importance under the Parthian kings, who caused a splendid palace to be erected there. Phraates was eminently successful in his military operations, although steeped in the use of treachery, and he destroyed numbers of his near relations to be put to death, to ensure his own position on the throne. Phraates soon had another Roman war on his hands. Before the death of Orodes, that monarch had associated with him his son Pacorus, a soldier and statesman, who conquered Syria and ruled both there and in Palestine with a mildness which contrasted favourably with the severity of the Roman governors expelled by him. But Pacorus was finally defeated and killed by the Roman consul, Ventidius, and the territories he had captured on the coast of the Mediterranean were lost to Parthia.
In the year 33 B.C. Mark Antony began a campaign against the Parthians, whom the Romans were now ready for a crushing defeat. His army numbered one hundred thousand men, including no less than fifty thousand cavalry intended to cope with the terrible horsemen of Parthia. To oppose this immense force, Phraates could collect only forty thousand cavalry; but he immediately began operations by surprising the baggage trains of the enemy, and cutting to pieces the escort of seven thousand five hundred men. Antony was at the time engaged in besieging Pharsa, he was obliged to abandon the siege, but the pursuit of the Parthians was so vigorous that the Roman general was hardly able to reach the frontier of Armenia after losing thirty thousand of his best troops. For one hundred years after this, Rome dared not again attack Parthia; and when, in later ages, her legions repeated the attempts to penetrate into the heart of Persia, they invariably failed.

Phraates was dethroned by a conspiracy of his brother Tiridates. He fled to Touran, or Scephinian, of which we hear so often in the legendary history of the Parthian war, where he was assassinated. Tiridates then became king of the Parthian Empire, which, with a population of over four hundred thousand, Cassius sacked and burned Seleucia, completely wiping it out of existence. Parthia never recovered from the effects of this last war with Rome. The dynasty which had founded the greatness of the Parthian empire had become enervated by its successes. In 216 the war with Rome was renewed. The king Artabanus had put down several rivals and reduced the greater part of the Parthians under his power. Mucrinus, the Roman Emperor, suffered two ruinous defeats from Artabanus, and was obliged to purchase peace by paying an indemnity of 50,000,- 000 denarii (about $9,000,000) at the very time when the recovery of Armenia was the most pressing. With the death of Artabanus, A.D. 219, the Parthian dynasty came to an end.
D. The Sassanian Dynasty (A.D. 227-651).—The immediate causes which brought about the overthrow of the Parthian kingdom and the establishment of the dynasty of Sassan in its stead are not known. The new dynasty of the Sassanids was a more genuine representative of the civilized Iranian race than the Parthian Arsacids. Odenathus, a chief of a lesser family, as the father of Ardashir I, was regarded as the founder of the Sassanian dynasty. Ardashir was accepted as a representative of the Persians by the Parthian sovereigns. The Sassanids accepted his sovereignty, but it was in no sense a genuine substitution of one dynasty for another. The chief of the Sassanian dynasty, Ardashir Papakan (Artaxerxes, son of Papak), was born at Persepolis, in central Persia; his family claimed descent from a mythical ancestor, Sassan, and he was therefore of the priestly caste. Buzek, the father of Ardashir, seems to have founded a small kingdom at Persepolis, and to have raised up the fortress of Arsameia, and perhaps other fortresses, thus gradually encroaching on various Parthian provinces. Vologeses V, the last king of the Arsacid dynasty of Parthia, declared war against the rising chief, but was defeated and put to death by Ardashir A.D. 227. Thus the Persian Empire passed into the hands of the Sassanid dynasty. The surviving Arsacids fled to India, and all the provinces accepted Ardashir's rule without resistance. It was in fact the beginning of a new national and religious movement, the new dynasty being looked upon as the true and genuine successor of the old and noble Achemenian dynasty, and of the Zoroastrian religion. Odenathus's son Ardashir, the founder of the new dynasty, sent an embassy to Rome demanding that the western provinces should be ceded to him. Shortly afterwards, in 230, he sought to regain the lost provinces of Mesopotamia by force of arms. The emperor, Alexander Severus, opposed the advance of Ardashir's army, but was only partly successful. Ardashir devoted the remainder of his life to founding new towns, schools, and temples, and to reorganizing the judicial system of the courts and the army. Everywhere there were evidences of a new development of the true Persian spirit; and it was not long before the Persian nation deemed itself sufficiently strong once more to enforce its old claims to the sovereignty of Western Asia. Sapor I, the son of Ardashir, who reigned from 240 to 273, renewed the war with Rome, first against Gordian, then against Valerian. The latter emperor was treacherously seized at a conference in 260, and spent the rest of his life in a Persian prison subject to most barbarous ill-usage. Sapor then conquered Syria and returned victoriously with the body of Odenathus, King of Palmyra. After the death of Odenathus the war was continued by his widow, Zenobia, who was so dazed by her success that she attempted to found an independent Syrian empire under the leadership of Palmyra, but was defeated and taken prisoner by the Persians under Anurien. The third Sassanian king, Hormuzd, reigned only one year; his successor, Bahram I (274-77), continued the war with Zenobia and afterwards with Anurien. But this war terminated, without any result, at the death of Anurien, in 273. During this period, the revival of the Zoroastrian religion became a movement of great importance. Having attained ascendancy in Persia under the early Sassanid kings, it grew very intolerant, persecuting alike heathen and Christian. It first turned against Mani, the founder of Manichæism, and his followers, under Bahram I. Mani himself, at first in favour at the Persian Court, was crucified about the year 273. Under the next king, Bahram II (277-94), Persia suffered severe reverses from the Roman Emperor Carus, the capital city, Ctesiphon, even falling into the hands of the Romans. Bahram III, son of Bahram II, reigned only eight months, and was succeeded by his younger brother, Narsis I, who renewed the war with Rome with disastrous results. He was succeeded (as his son, Hormuzd was to be succeeded) by Bahram II (293-309), and by Sapor II (309-40). It was in the latter reign that the Christians in Persia suffered serious persecution. During the early years of Sapor II the Christian religion received formal recognition from Constantine, and there is no doubt that this identification of the Church with the Roman Empire was the chief cause of its disfavour in Persia. Moreover, there is evidence that Christianity had spread widely in the Persian dominions, and every Christian was suspected of disaffection towards the Persian king and secret attachment to the Roman Empire, the more so as the Persians themselves employed Christians in their service. Probably this feeling of suspicion was increased by the letter which Constantine wrote to Sapor (Theod., "H. E.", I, xxv), asking protection for the Christians resident in Persia. (See C. E. H., below.) In this period began the conversion of the Persian noble, a writer of homilies. When Constantine was dead, and the Magi had attained complete ascendancy over the Persian king, a persecution ensued which was far more severe than any of those of the Roman Emperors.

This attack upon the Christians was but part of Sapor's anti-Western policy. In 350 he openly declared war against Rome, and marched on Syria. The first important action was the siege of Nisibis, where the famous Jacob, founder of the school of Nisibis, was then bishop. The siege lasted seventy days, and then the Persians having built a dam across the River Euphrates to prevent the water from flowing into the town, the siege was unsuccessful, however, and the campaign ended in a truce. Julian, who became emperor in 361, determined to invade the dominions of Sapor. In March, 363, he set out from Antioch to march towards Carra. From the latter point two roads led to Persia: one through Nisibis to the Tigris, the other turning south along the Euphrates and then crossing the lower Tigris. Julian chose the second of these and, passing through Callinicum, Carchemish, and Zathm, reached the Persian capital, Ctesiphon, where he was met with proposals of peace from Sapor, but refused them. After crossing the Tigris, he burned his ships to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy; but the result was something like a panic amongst his followers. Supplies ran short, and the army entered the desert, where it seems to have lost its way. There had been no battle as yet, but almost daily skirmishes with the light-armed Persian cavalry. In one of these skirmishes Julian was slain by a javelin.Whether the death of one of his own followers has never been known. The soldiers at once elected Jovian, one of Julian's generals, and he began his reign by making a thirty years' truce with Persia. The Persians were to supply guides and food for the retreat, while the Romans promised to surrender Nisibis and give up their protection over Armenia and Iberia, which became the Persian provinces. The surrender of Nisibis put an end to the school established there by Jacob, but his disciple Ephraim removed to Edessa, and there re-established the school, so that Edessa became once more the centre of Syriac intellectual life. With this school must be connected the older Syriac martyrologies, and many of the Syriac translations and editions of Greek church manuals, canons, and theological writers. Thus were preserved Syriac versions of many important works, the original Greek of which is lost. In spite of this thirty years' truce, the Persians for a time kept up a petty warfare, the Romans acting on the defensive. But as age rendered Sapor helpless, this warfare died out. Sapor died in 380, at the age of seventy; being a posthumous son, he had spent his whole life on the throne. During the reigns of Sapor III and Bahram IV Persia remained at peace. In 379 the Emperor Theodosius the Great received an embassy from Persia proposing friendship. This was mainly due to the fact that the Persians had difficulties on their northern and eastern frontiers, and wished to have their hands free in the west. Incidentally, it may be noted that the flourishing period of the "middle school", under the leadership of Dorotheus, and the spread of monasticism through Persia and Mesopotamia were contemporary with the disastrous expedition and peace of Jovian. The great bishop, Jacob of Nisibis, forms a connecting link between all three; as bishop he was contemporary with Sapor III; he encouraged Nisibis in its first resistance to the army of Sapor; his school at Nisibis was modelled on that of Diodorus at Antioch, and he was the patron and benefactor of the monastery founded by Awgin on Mount Ida.

In 399 Bahram IV was succeeded by his younger brother Yezdegerd (399-438). Early in his reign Maruthas Bihram, Manuipar, in Mesopotamia, was employed by the Roman Emperor as envoy to the Persian Court. Maruthas quickly gained great influence over the Persian king, to the annoyance of the Zoroastrian magi, and Yezdegerd allowed the free spread of Christianity in Persia and the building of churches.

The Persian Church at this period seems to have received, under Maruthas (q. v.), the more developed organization under which it lived until the time of the Mohammedan conquest. (See III, below.) Later in the reign of Yezdegerd, the Persian bishop, Abdas of Suse, was associated with Maruthas, and, by his influence and personal claims, he made great use of the Persian king and the Christians. Abdas destroyed one of the fire temples of the Zoroastrians; a complaint was made to the king, and the bishop was ordered to restore the building and make good all damage that he had committed. Abdas refused to rebuild a heathen temple at his own expense. The result was that bishops were invited for the consecration of all churches, and these were carried out by the Zoroastrians, who had regarded with great envy the royal favour extended to Maruthas and his co-religious.

Before long the destruction of churches developed into a general persecution, in which Abdas was one of the first martyrs. When Yezdegerd died in 420, and was succeeded by his son Bahram V, the persecution continued, and large numbers of Christians fled across the frontier into Roman territory. A bitter feeling for Persia and Rome grew out of Bahram's demand for the surrender of the Christian fugitives, and war was declared in 422. The conflict commenced with Roman success in Armenia and the capture of a great number of Persian prisoners. Then the Romans then advanced into Persia and ravaged the border province of Azadana, but the seat of war was soon transferred to Mesopotamia, where the Romans besieged Nisibis. The Persians, hard pressed in this siege, called in the Turks to their assistance, and the united armies marched to the relief of the city. The Romans were alarmed at the news of the large numbers of the Persian forces and raised the siege, but soon afterwards, when the Turks had retired, there was a general engagement in which the Romans inflicted a crushing defeat upon their adversaries, and compelled them to sue for peace. Although the latter had gained the beginning of the fifth century was a period of so much destruction in the Persian provinces, which were exposed to the growing ambition of Persia, it was a time of extension of the Christian Church and of literary activity. This literary and ecclesiastic development led to the formation of a Syriac literature in Persia (Syria being the liturgical language of the Persian Church), and ultimately of a Christian Persian literature.

Towards the middle of the fifth century, the Persian Emperor Yezdegerd (412-59) was compelled to turn his attention to the passes of the Caucasus; troops of Huns and Scythians had already broken through into Iran. Peroz (Perzus), his successor, made war on the Caspian regions, and in 437 lost his life in battle with them. Four years later the throne of Persia was occupied by Qubad I, who reigned from 438 to 531. During this reign there developed in Persia a new sect of the Fire-worshippers (the Mazdakans), who were at first favoured by the king, but who subsequently involved the empire in serious complications. The last decade of Qubad's reign was chiefly occupied by wars with the Romans, in which he found a good means for diverting the attention of his people from domestic affairs. During the very last days of his life Qubad was compelled once more to lead an army to the West to maintain Persia's influence over Lasitan in southern Caucasus, the prince of which country had become a convert to Christianity, and consequently an ally of the Byzantine Empire. It was during the same reign that the Nestorians began to enter more fully into Persian life, and under him that they began their missionary expansion eastwards. About the year 496 the patriarchal See of Seleucia-Ctesiphon fell into the hands of the Nestorians, and henceforth the Catholicos of Seleucia became the Patriarch of the Nestorian Church of Persia, Syria, China, and India. After the death of Qubad the usual quarrels as to the succession arose, and finally ended, in 531, with the accession of Chosroes I Amushirwan, whom Qubad had looked upon as the most capable of his sons. Chosroes was a champion of the ancient Iranian spirit, a friend of the Persian people, and a formidable enemy to the Mazada- kites, who had chosen one of his numerous brothers as their candidate for the throne. During his reign the Persian Empire attained the height of its splendour; indeed, the government of Chosroes I, "the Just", was both equitable and vigorous. One of his first acts was to make peace with Byzantium, the greater sharing to the destruction of the Byzantine Empire. In addition to strengthening the Caucasus, Chosroes also sought to fortify the north-eastern frontier of his empire by constructing a great wall, and he asserted his claims to a portion of north-western India by force of arms, but soon turned his attention once more to the West. In 541 he proclaimed a general toleration, in which not only Christians, but also Manicheans and Mazda- kites, were included.

The period 532-39 was spent in the extension and strengthening of the eastern frontiers of Persia. In 539 Chosroes returned to Ctesiphon, and was persuaded by the Bedouin Al Mondar to renew Qubad's former policy of toleration towards the Nestorians. Justinian was aiming at universal dominion, but there is no doubt that the real reason was that Al Mondar remembered the case with which he had once plundered Syrian territory. In 540 the Persians invaded Syria and captured the city of Shurab. The prisoners taken from this city were released at the request of Candidus, bishop of the neighbouring town of Hama, Nusizad, who undertook to pay a ransom of 200 pounds of gold. Then Chosroes took Mabough, which paid a ransom, then Berea, and finally proceeded against Antioch itself, which was captured after a short resistance. From Antioch Chosroes carried off many works of art and a vast number of captives. On his return home in the Eastern provinces, the city of Edessa generally regarded as impregnable, but was taken ill during the siege.

During Chosroes' illness trouble occurred in Persia. He had married a Christian wife, and his son Nushizad was also a Christian. When the king was taken ill, Edessa reported that Persis, what was then the capital, was dead, and at once Nushizad seized the crown. Very soon the rumour was proved false, but Nushizad was persuaded by persons who appear to have been in the pay of Justinian to endeavour to maintain his position. The action of his son was deeply distressing to Chosroes, but it was necessary to take prompt measures, and the commander, Rabah Persis, was sent against the rebels. In the battle which followed Nushizad was mortally wounded and carried off the field.
In his tent he was attended by a Christian bishop, probably Mar Aba, and to this bishop he confessed his sincere repentance for having taken up arms against his father, an act which, he was convinced, could never win the approval of Heaven. Having professed himself a Christian he died, and the rebellion was quickly put down.

Mar Aba had probably the same respect for the Nestorian Catholics from 536 to 552. He was a convert from Zoroastrianism, and had studied Greek at Nisibis and Edessa, making use of his knowledge to prepare and publish a new version of the Old Testament. This appears to have been a total failure, for the Nestorians, unlike the Persians, were against the translators. Persians, on being appointed catholics he established a school at Seleucia, which soon became a great centre of Nestorian scholarship. He wrote commentaries, homilies, and letters, the two former classes of work representing, no doubt, the substance of his teaching in the school which he founded. Hymns are extant which are ascribed to him. Chosroes, after his return from Syria, taunted Mar Aba with professing a type of Christianity unknown to the rest of the world. But Mar Aba did much to remove the more marked peculiarities of the Nestorian schism, especially in the matter of the eucharist amongst the bishops. From time to time he held discussions with Chosroes, until on one occasion Chosroes told him that he was appointed catholics he established a school at Seleucia, which soon became a great centre of Nestorian scholarship. He wrote commentaries, homilies, and letters, the two former classes of work representing, no doubt, the substance of his teaching in the school which he founded. Hymns are extant which are ascribed to him.

Chosroes, after his return from Syria, taunted Mar Aba with professing a type of Christianity unknown to the rest of the world. But Mar Aba did much to remove the more marked peculiarities of the Nestorian schism, especially in the matter of the eucharist amongst the bishops. From time to time he held discussions with Chosroes, until on one occasion Chosroes told him that he was unable to prove that the Nestorian Church, though not to be convinced by the arguments of the sovereign, he was sentenced to banishment. As he disobeyed the decree, he was cast into prison, where he died in 552. In 542 Chosroes claimed from Bishop Candidus the payment of the sum to which he had pledged himself as ransom for the captives taken at Serhaj; but the bishop was unable to prove the money had been delivered, and he had only made the promise in the expectation that the Government would find part of the sum required, and this had not been done. Therefore Candidus was put to death. In the course of the same year Chosroes advanced south and attacked Jerusalem, but was repulsed by Belsharzus.

Mar Aba's foundation of a school at Seleucia seems to have suggested to Chosroes the idea of founding a Zoroastrian school similar to it and to the Christian instructions at Edessa and Nisibis. In pursuance of this plan the king opened a college at Djadmir Shapur, and here many Greek, Syrian, and Indian works were translated and disseminated. The Old Testament was rendered into the vernacular dialect (Pahlavi). Meanwhile the school at Seleucia became a centre of Nestorian life. It was a period during which the Nestorians were returning to a greater conformity to the usages of the rest of Christendom. We have already mentioned Mar Aba's restoration of the eucharist, at least as far as the bishops were concerned. About the same time two distinguished monks, both bearing the name of Abraham of Kashkar, introduced reforms into monastic life which also tended towards conformity with the practices of the Church within the Roman Empire. Probably this tendency to conformity was due to the mass of 30,000 inhabitants, and to the reign of Chosroes, and the contact with the empire due to the invasion of Syria; nevertheless the Nestorians remained a distinct body.

Meanwhile the Catholics Mar Aba had died, and Chosroes appointed his favourite physician, Joseph, as Bishop of Seleucia (552). Many strange stories are related of his cruelty as bishop, after three years he was deposed on a petition of the Christians of Seleucia. He lived twelve years after his deposition, and during that period no papal correspondence.

About the same time the indefatigable Jacob Burdeana consecrated Achadamna as Jacobite bishop in Persia, and made a pretence of sending to the royal family a copy of the E., since it was never permitted to make converts from the state religion. The Jacobites however were of little importance so far east, where Nestorianism was the prevailing type of Christianity. After the death of Joseph in 567, Ezekiel, a disciple of Mar Aba, was appointed Catholicos of Seleucia, under whom lived the period Buhl, the translator into Syriac of the Indian tales known as "Kalilah and Dimnah". It is noteworthy that the Nestorians were beginning to take an interest in Persian literature, and the Nestorians adopted the Persian spelling, and used the language of the Tractate Shapur school.

Chosroes was succeeded by his son Hormaz (579-90). For the first three years of his reign Hormaz was guided by the statesman-philosopher Buzurg, but after his retirement Hormaz gave himself up to every form of self-indulgence and tyranny. In about two years the Persians the power of Persia fell, and the land suffered invasion on the north, east, and west. To check the Byzantines, Bahram, a general who had distinguished himself under Chosroes, was sent to invade Colchis, but he was defeated and recalled in disgrace. Knowing that this was equivalent to sentence of death, Bahram revolted, and succeeded in capturing Hormaz, whom he put to death. Chosroes, the king's son, fled and was well received by Probus, Governor of Circassian, and afterwards by the Emperor Mauritius. With the help of the Romans this younger Chosroes defeated Bahram, and became king as Chosroes II. He was a great and powerful man, and his wife was a Nestorian. But the Nestorianism was devoted to the emperor then reigning at Constantinople. Although not himself a Christian, he paid honour to the Blessed Virgin and to the martyrs Sergius and Bacchus, two saints popular among the Syrians, while his wife was an ardent Jacobite. In 604 the Roman Emperor Mauritius was assassinated, and the Persian king resolved to attack the empire in order to avenge his benefactor. In 609 the Persians again invaded the eastern provinces and took the city of Daras. The invasion of Chosroes II was the severest blow that the Byzantine power in Asia had to endure, previous to the rise of Islam. After five years of war Chosroes II reached Constantinople. It was not a mere plundering expedition, but a serious invasion whose success clearly proved the growing weakness of the Byzantine Empire. Next year (606) the invaders reached Amida; in 607 they were at Edessa; in 608 at Aleppo; and by 611 they had conquest of Police, and established themselves in the A. In 615, Persia revolted, but was cruelly punished, some 17,000 persons being put to death, and about 35,000 led away captive. The fragment of the True Cross, the most precious relic of the city, was carried off. Next year (616) the Persians took Edessa, and in 617 besieged Constantine. Although the imperial city was not taken, Asia Minor remained in the hands of the Persians until 624.

Chosroes II was repelled, not by the Romans, but by a people who were yearly growing more powerful, and who destined ultimately to replace both Rome and Persia in Asia—the Arabs. Chosroes II had a vast army, at least 200,000 men, and he now demanded as wife Hadijah, the daughter of the Christian Arab N'a'man, himself the son of Al Mondir. N'a'man refused to permit his Christian daughter to enter the hareem of a Zoroastrian, and for this refusal he was trampled to death by an elephant, whilst Hadijah took refuge in a convent. The news of this outrage upon an Arab provoked all the Bedouin tribes, and the Arabs revolted. Chosroes II was totally defeated, and fled to the Emperor Heraclius. This victory made a great impression upon the Arab mind, and probably led to the Mohammedan conquests.

The Mohammedan and Modern Periods (a. d. 632-1911).—During the reign of Yezygerd III, the successor of Chosroes II, and the last of the Sassanian kings, the Arab invaders attacked Persia and its Mesopo-potamian territories more and more boldly. In 650 Khusru, one of the Arab generals, assuming the offensive, defeated the Persian troops on the border of the Empire, and the Christian king of this region submitted to him. Then the Arabs invaded the country about the Tigris. In 634 Abu Ubaid of Taif, to whom Khusru assigned the task of annexing Persia, was utterly defeated and slain by the Persians, who, however, were routed in 635-66 by Caliph Omar at Bowaia. Towards the close of the year 636, or in 637, they were again defeated by the Arabs under Sulayman, commanding the victorious Arabs entered Babylonia and took Seleucia after a lengthy siege. Then they crossed the Tigris and fell on Ctesiphon, Yezdegard flying towards the Med-Medebian frontier. Meanwhile another army of Arabs had occupied Lower Iraq and entered Susiana. The decisive and final victory took place in 636-67 at Nahr IT. In the following years the Sassanian dynasty was completely destroyed.

During the reigns of Omar, Othman, and Ali, the first caliphs and successors of Mohammed, as well as under the Umayyads (661-750), Persia was ruled by deputy-governors; but on the accession of the Abbasids, the Umayyads were expelled by Abdullah Khorasan their favourite province, and thus the very heart of the former territory of the Sassanian Empire became the centre of the caliphate. But their rule soon became merely a nominal one, and ambitious governors established independent principalities in various parts of Persia. Many of these dynasties which rose to power during the period were powerful kingdoms. For the next two centuries Persia was subject to the caliphs. But in 868 an adventurer named Saffar, who had been a pewterer and afterwards a bandit, gathered a native force and expelled the viceroys of the caliph, founding a dynasty known as the Saffarides. In the beginning of the tenth century Persia was divided between the dependencies of Samani and Dilmun, the first of which reigned over eastern Persia and Afghanistan, and the second over the rest of the country. Under these dynasties Persia fell beneath the yoke of the Seljuks, and was ruled by Toddul Beg, Alp Arslan, and Malek Shah, all of whom were conquerors greatly celebrated in oriental history. Their dynasty declined and perished in the twelfth century. After a long period of anarchy Persia was overrun and conquered by the Mongols led by Hulaku Khan, grandson of Yenghis (1258), who established the seat of his empire at Maragha in Azerbaijan.

The next important event in the history of Persia was the death of the last Abbasid Caliph, in 1266, followed by Timur Lenk, who ascended the throne in 1370, and was succeeded by his son Tamerlane, whose reign of sixty years was one of the most resplendent in Persia since 1580. This region had been restored to the Mongols, and Tamerlane was the first of the victorious kings of Persia to make a successful attack on the capital of the Empire. The war was commenced in 1390, and the city was taken in 1392. Persia had been invaded by the Mongols, and the Moghuls, and the Chinese, and the Tartars, in succession. of one year. In all large towns there are sub-governors and village masters. The latter are really the tax-collectors. The rate of taxation varies in different parts of the country. The tax on personal property is still lighter, being paid chiefly in kind. Justice is administered partly by the shah and partly by the courts and the imams.

Statistics.—The area of modern Persia is about 635,000 square miles, a large part being desert; the population is about 9,000,000, one-fourth of whom are nomads. The estimated population of the principal cities is: Tehran, 2,000,000; Tabriz, 200,000; Isphahan, 70,000; Meshhed, 60,000; Kirman, 60,000; and Yezd, 45,000. The principal imports, which amount yearly to about 450,000,000 krans (a kran is equivalent to 7 cts. of U. S. A. money), are cotton fabrics, sugar, tea, woollens, petroleum, iron and steel goods, and the precious metals. The principal exports, which amount to about 400,000,000 krans annually, are fruits, carpets, cotton, fish, rice, silk and cocoons, rubber, wool, opium, hides and skins, copper, cereals, and living animals. The modern Persians are Mohammedans. Of these, nearly seven-eighths are Shiah, and only one-eighth Sunnites. Besides, there are about 9000 Persians, the followers of Zoroaster, 10,000 Jews, and 200,000 Christians, 25,000 Nestorians, and 10,000 Chaldians (Catholic). Concerning the religion of the ancient Persians, from the time of the Achaemenian dynasty down to the end of the Sassanian period, covering about twelve centuries (sixth c. B.C.—seventh c. A.D.), see Zoroastrianism; the official religion of the medieval and modern Persians is Mohammedanism (q.v.).

II. PERSIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.—The term Persian, as applied both to the people and their language, has now a wider significance than it originally bore. A more appropriate term would be Iran or Iranian. The early inhabitants of Iran were Aryans, and are believed to have arrived in the country about four thousand years, belong to the so-called Aryan family. Even the Persian language of to-day, notwithstanding the immense influence exercised upon it by Arabic, is still the literal offspring of the language spoken by Cyrus, Darius, and the Sassanian kings. This continuity, however, is broken by two great gaps, occasioned by the Greek and Parthian invasions on the one hand, and by the Mohammedan domination on the other, viz., from 331 B.C.—A.D. 227, and 635 and the following years respectively. The history of the Persian language falls, therefore, into three well-defined periods, as follows: The Achaemenian Period, from 600 B.C. to 331 B.C., consisting of the edicts and proclamations contained in the Persian cuneiform inscriptions, which, though of considerable extent, are similar in character and style and yield a vocabulary of about 300 words. The language represented by these inscriptions, deciphered by Grotefend, Sir H. Rawlinson, Hincks, Oppert, and others towards the middle of the last century, is generally called Old Persian, The Sassanian Period (a.d. 227-651), represented by inscriptions on monuments, medallions, gems, seals, and coins, and by a literature estimated as equal in bulk to the Old Testament. This literature is entirely Zoroastrian and almost entirely theological and liturgical. The language in which it is written is little more than a very archaic form of the present language of Persia devoid of the Arabic element. It is generally known as Pahlavi, or Middle Persian. Properly speaking, the term Pahlavi applies rather to the script than to the language. The Mohammedan Period (from about A.D. 900 until the present day), represented by the Persian language, is the language spoken by the Persians after the Arab conquest, and after the adoption of the Mohammedan religion by the vast majority of the inhabitants of Persia. The difference between Late Pahlavi and the earliest form of Modern Persian was, save for the Arabic element generally contained in the latter, merely a difference of script. This is generally called Modern Persian, or Neo-Persian. Of Modern Persian there are many dialects spoken in different parts of Persia at the present day. The principal ones are those spoken in Mazandaran, Gilan, and Tâbilsh, in the north; the original Iranian speakers are still to be heard in the northeast; Káschán, Qurdrâ and Naín in the centre, with the peculiar Gabri dialect spoken by the Zoroastrians inhabiting Yezd, Kirman, Râsfânjan, etc. Siwand in the south; Luristan, Behbâhán and Kûrdistan in the west; and the Sîstân and Bakhîtiyâr ibans in Fâbâr, etc. The language of Persia is, in the main, Perso-Arabic, but at the present time its connexion with Arabic is only slight. The standard language is that of the capital, Tehran, and is a mixture of the Persian and Arabic dialects. The Mohammedan period marks the beginning of Persic literature. The language of this period is called Modern Persian, and extends from about the tenth century A.D. till our own days, and is by far the most developed. The rise, development, and progress of Modern Persian literature is intimately connected with the rise, development, and progress of Arabic, or Moham- medan, religious life and literature. The beginning of the ninth century may be said to be the starting-point of the modern national Persian independence.

and how successful the early Christian propaganda must have been in these distant regions.

Owing to the influence of the Sassanian Kings, Christianity kept slowly but steadily advancing in various parts of the empire. With the advent of the Sassanian dynasty, however (A. D. 226-611), Christianity was often subjected to very severe trials. Its chief opponents were the Zoroastrian Magi and Parsees, although as well as the numerous Jews scattered through the empire. To the Persian kings in general espoused the cause of Zoroastranism, which under them became once more the official religion; and, though some of this dynasty favoured Christianity, the national feeling always clung to the ancient creed. Many thousands of Persians embraced Christianity, but Persia never surmounted the stronghold of Zoroastrianism, and there were probably far more Zoroastrians than Christians in Persia. Some of the persecutions—notably that under Shapur II—were so terrible that many of those who converted to Christianity were commerce and monasticism. Christian merchants had a share in the wholesale trade of Asia: trade with India opened the way for the early introduction of Christianity there, and the hold which Christianity acquired on the shores of the Persian Gulf was probably due to the Indian and Persian traders. The strong rule of the early Abbasid caliph, Al-Mansur, gave opportunity for the development of commerce. The position of the Christians at the capital as bankers and merchants would give them a share in this trade. Christian artisans, including goldsmiths and jewellers, would find employment in the large cities, and the account of the Nestorian monks, Thomas of Marga relates that the Patriarch Timothy sent his missionary with a company of merchants who were journeying together to Mungan (the plain of Mungan?) on the River Aras (Araxes).

Monasticism was imported into Mesopotamia in the fourth century by monks from Egypt. The earliest account of Mar Awgin, or St. Eugenius, relates that his monastery near Nisibis consisted of three hundred and fifty monks, while seventy-two of his disciples established each a monastery. The number of monasteries increased rapidly in the fourth and fifth centuries. In the sixth century there was a movement in the Nestorian Church against the enforced celibacy of the higher clergy and against celibate monks, but celibacy won the day, and monasticism was firmly established. The monks must have been numbered by hundreds, if not thousands, for, in addition to the numerous monasteries in Mesopotamia and the region north of the Tigris, there were scattered monastic houses in Persia, and it is not difficult to believe that there were numerous monastics living in large communities, and in caves or rude huts. These were influential enough among the Qatrayi, on the Persian Gulf, to call for a separate letter from the Patriarch Ishayaq I. Some of these monks must have been full of real missionary zeal, although of course the prevailing and distinctive spirit of their institute was contemplative rather than missionary. Yet, in spite of all, Christianity failed, and Islam succeeded in gaining the Iranian race. This failure of Christianity was not wholly due to the success of Islam: internal dissensions, ambition, dishonesty, and corruption among the clergy greatly contributed to the gradual dissolution of this wonderful Church. Under the Arabs, the Christians of Persia were not in wholly unfavourable circumstances. Indeed, the first two centuries of Mohammedan domination, especially under the Abbasids, were the most glorious period in the history of the Persian Church. It is true that at times the Church was subjected to excessive exactions and persecutions, but they were recognized as the People of the Book; and the Nestorians were especially privileged, and held many offices of trust. The missionary work was carried on and extended. It could not take much root in Persian soil after the Persians became Moslems, but it gained more and more influence in Tatar and China, beyond the limits of Mohammedan conquest. This was a period of comparative peace in those regions, and of the greatest missionary enterprise on the part of the Nestorians, who planted churches in Transoxiana as far as Kashgar, in the regions of Mongolia, and throughout Northern China. To attest this fact there are extensive Christian graveyards containing memorials of the Turkish race on the borders of China, and the monument of St. Angai, in Shensi, giving the history of the Nestorian Mission in China for 145 years (v. 636-781). Timour, a patrician of the Church for forty years, was zealously devoted to missionary work, and many monks traversed Asia. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries there were large Christianized communities. A Mogul prince, Behk Khan, gave the name to the celebrated Prester John, and his successors were the nominal Christian titulars thrown by Jenghis Khan. The names of twenty-five metropolitan sees, from Cyprus in the west to Pekin in the east, are recorded, and their schools were spread far and wide through Western and parts of Central Asia.

B. From Jenghis Khan to the Present Time.—The last of the race of Christian kings—probably Christian only in name—was Jenghis Khan about 1200: Jenghis had a Christian wife, the daughter of this king, and he was tolerant towards the Christian faith. In fact the Mogul conquerors were without much religion, and friendly towards all creeds. The wave of carnage and conquest swept westward, covered Persia, and overwhelmed the Caliph of Baghdad in 1258. This change was for a time favourable to Christianity, as the rulers openly declared themselves Christians or were partial to Christianity. The patriarch of the Nestorians was chosen from people of the same language and race as the conquerors; he was a native of Western China; he ruled the Church through a stormy period of seven reigns of Mogul kings. The Christian historian Kepler (1561-1630), who lived during the time of the Mogul rule, says that the Nestorians in Persia, being not so reduced, their immunity from persecution, and the toleration of their rulers, caused a great increase of their numbers, and the growth of their settlements, where they lived all together, and the building of churches, and the planting of monasteries. The Nestorians were not so reduced in Persia, being not so persecuted, and the toleration of their rulers, caused a great increase of their numbers, and the growth of their settlements, where they lived all together, and the building of churches, and the planting of monasteries.

During the last five centuries Christianity has been simply a tolerated but oppressed and despised faith in Persia. From the invasions of Timur-Leng until the accession of Abbas the Great (1572), a period of two hundred years, its history is almost a blank. In 1603 some Armenian chiefs appealed to Shah Abbas for protection against the Turks: he invaded Armenia, and in the midst of the war decided to devastate it, that the Turks might be without provisions. From 102 To 1572 the Armenians were driven from there, and took refuge in the deserts of Persia.

Metropolitan of Tarsus and Cyprus, renowned Nestorian, and in 1553 the patriarch John Sulako visited Rome and submitted to Pope Julius III his profession of faith, as a result of which several thousand Nestorians of Persia became Catholics. His successors in that capacity were promulgated by Pius V at Rome, and assisted at the last (twenty-fifth) session of the Council of Trent. In 1582 Simeon Denha was elected patriarch of the converted Nestorians, henceforth called simply Chaldeans, and, owing to Turkish persecution, he transferred the patriarchate to Erumiah in Persia. Shortly afterwards, he received the pallium from Gregory XIII through Laurent Abel, Bishop of Sidon, who was commissioned by the pope to investigate the condition of the various churches of the East. Mar Denha's successors, Simeon VIII, IX, X, XI, and XII, all remained faithful to Rome, and fixed their patriarchal see at Erumiah and Khorisrown; Simeon IX, in fact, in a letter to Pope Innocent X, informs him that the Nestorian Uniates, or Chaldeans, under his patriarchal jurisdiction numbered some 200,000 souls. Simeon X sent his profession of faith to Alexander VII (elected 1655); and Simeon XII, to Clement X (1670). From 1670 to 1679 the relations between the Nestorian patriarchs and Rome were suspended.

But in 1679 one of the successors of Simeon XII addressed a letter to Pope Clement XIV in which he expresses his intention of resuming once more orthodox and friendly relations with Rome. The successors of this patriarch, however, completely severed their relations with Rome, and transferred their patriarchal residence from Erumiah to Botchacon, in Kurdistan, which became the new sees of the Nestorian patriarchs. Meanwhile, the many thousand Nestorian Uniates, or Chaldeans, who remained faithful to the Catholic Faith selected for themselves an independent Catholic patriarch, who was confirmed with all the patriarchal privileges by Innocent IX (1681). He was sent to Rome, and given the title of "Patriarch of Babylon", i.e., of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, the ancient patriarchal see of the Nestorian Church. In 1695 he resided and went to Rome, where he shortly afterwards died. His successors were Joseph III, IV, V, and VI, all belonging to the same family of Mar Denha. They governed their church in the second half of the eighteenth century, and their patriarchal residence was transferred from Persia to Mesopotamia—to Diarbekir, Mosul, and Amida successively.

Beginning with the early years of this century, several Capuchin (1725) and Dominican (1750) missionaries were sent to Mosul, and through their efforts and zeal all traces of Nestorianism disappeared from the Chaldean Church in Mesopotamia. After the death of Joseph VI the Congregation of Propaganda decreed that henceforth but one Chaldean patriarch should be acknowledged. Leo XIII confirmed the decree, and Pius VIII put it into execution, 5 July, 1830, by creating Mar Hanna of Jerusalem the only legitimate patriarch of the Chaldeans. He transferred his patriarchal see from Diarbekir to Bagdad, where he died in 1838. His successor, Isaiad Yakob, who resided at Khorisrown, near Salaman, in Persia, resided in 1815, and was succeeded, in 1848, by Joseph Ando, who died in 1878, and was succeeded by Elia Abulhoman, who died in 1894, and was succeeded by Eliejesus Khayyat, after whose death at Bagdad, in 1899, the patriarchal dignity was conferred in 1900 upon the present incumbent, Joseph Emanuel. The official title and residence of the Chaldean patriarchs is that of Babylon, but for administrative reasons they reside at Mosul, from which centre they visit the Latin dioceses and 10 deaneries containing 100,000 souls.

The history of European Catholic missions in Persia dates from the time of the Mongol rule, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, when several embassies of Dominicans and Franciscans were sent by the popes to the Mongol rulers both in Central Asia and in Persia; and although their noble efforts brought no permanent results, they paved the way for future and more successful developments. In the early part of the seventeenth century, political aims led the kings of Persia to contract friendly relations with Europe. This gave a new impetus to Catholic missionary enterprise, and Carmelites, Minorites, and Jesuit missionaries were well received by Shah Abbas the Great, who allowed them to establish missionary stations all through his dominions. When, however, the Nestorian church at Isphahan was made the centre, and several thousand Nestorians returned to the Catholic Church. These missionaries were soon followed by Augustinians and Capuchins, who enlarged their missionary field, extending it to Armenians and Mohammedans as well.

The most distinguished of these missionaries was Father de Rhodes of Avignon, the Francis Xavier of Persia, who became the best beloved man in Isphahan. On his death in 1646 the shah himself, with his court and nobles, as well as the largest part of the population of Isphahan, attended his funeral. He was called by them "The Saint". After his death, the city of Isphahan was credited with a special see, the See of Isphahan, which was the Carmelite Chaldean. Under Nadir Shah and Shah Sultan Husain, however, the tide turned again, and persecution followed. The missionaries were forced to flee, and thousands of Christians were compelled either to migrate or to apostatize. This was in the early part of the eighteenth century. A hundred years later missionary work recommenced, and thousands of Nestorians were converted to the Catholic Faith.

The second epoch of Catholic missionary work in Persia was begun in 1840 by the Lazarists, in consequence of the representations of Eugene Beré, a French savant and a fervent Catholic, who in 1818 was sent to Persia in a special mission by the French Academy and the Minister of Public Instruction. He himself founded four schools, two in Tabriz and Isphahan for the Armenians, and two in Urumiah and Salakans for the Chaldeans. Condescending to his advice and instructions, the Congregation of Propaganda confided the establishment of the new mission to the Society of Jesus, commissioned by the French Sisters of Charity. The first Lazarist missionary was Father Fornier, who arrived at Tabriz in 1840 as prefect Apostolic. He was joined in the following year by two other fathers of the same society, Darnis and Cluzei, who took immediate charge of the schools founded by M. Beré and already attended by sixty pupils. Two years later, yielding to the strong opposition on the part of the schismatical Armenian clergy, Darnis left Tabriz and established himself at Urumiah, while Cluzei remained at Isphahan, and Fornier in Tabriz. Cluzei was soon afterwards joined by Darnis in Urumiah, the latter having left his charge of the school at Ispahan (recently returned to the Catholic Church by a Nestorian, a most zealous Armenian Catholic priest who was subsequently elected bishop of that see, but did not live to receive consecration.

On arriving at Urumiah, the first Lazarists found the American Protestant missionaries already well established in that city, but soon outstripped them in influence and zeal, as is shown by the fact that within two years the number of pupils in the Catholic school increased from 200 to over 400, with two churches, one in Urumiah and the other in Ardishai, the most populous village in the vicinity of Urumiah. Here again the Catholic missionaries were persecuted; owing to the intrigues of the Russian counsel and the opposition of the Shah, they were compelled to leave their stations, while a fourth Lazarite, Father Rouge, had meanwhile arrived and established a new mission at Khorisrown. With the establishment, however, of a new French representative at the Persian Court, M. de Sarrieux, the Lazarists were permitted by the Persian Government to continue their work unmolested. Father Chzel having become a great favourite with Mirza Aghasi, the prime minister. In 1853, Father Konge died at Urmiah, and was succeeded by another Chinese priest, Father Dhiboulin, who had joined the Lazarist Order. In 1852, Father Varése was sent to Urmiah, and in 1855 was followed by eight French Sisters of Charity. Meanwhile, Mgr Troche, Apostolic Delegate of Mesopotamia, sent Dom Valenga (afterwards Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem) to Khosrow, where he built a new church, Darans and Chzel soon afterwards established there a seminary to train ingenuous candidates for the priesthood, teaching them Latin, French, Syriac, and Armenian, as well as theology.

Some of the seminarians became secular priests, others joined the Lazarists, among the latter being Dhiboulin, Paul Belian, now residing in Belgium, and famous in the scientific world for his admirable edition of some twenty-five volumes of Syriac texts and literature, and Dilou Solomon. In 1852, Father Terral, a new arrival, took charge of the seminary and a few years later became superior of the mission. Besides the seminary, two orphanages were opened, one at Teheran for girls, and one at Kermanshah for the latter under the care and direction of the newly-arrived Sisters of Charity. To these were soon added one hospital and one orphan asylum, where all—Mohammedans, Nestorians, Armenians, and Catholics—were gratuitously admitted and cared for. This splendid work evoked the admiration of Shah Nassir Al-Din himself, and a contribution of twenty thousand dollars ($100) towards the maintenance of the two institutions. Soon after, two more hospitals were opened, one at Urmiah and one at Khosrowa. In 1858 Father Darnis died at the age of forty-four, and in his place several new missionaries were sent. In 1862 the Lazarists established themselves permanently at Teheran under the able direction of Fathers Varése and Plagnard, who soon built there a church and a mission house around which the European colony of Teheran gathered, and which soon afterwards became the most beautiful residential section of the Persian capital. In 1874 the Sisters of Charity established themselves at Teheran with a house, a hospital, and two orphan asylums.

The crowning event in the history of Catholic missions in Persia, however, took place in 1872, when the Prefecture Apostolic of Persia was raised to the dignity of an Apostolic Delegation, with Mgr Chzel as its first incumbent. In 1874 he was consecrated in Paris, Archbishop of Heredia, and assumed the functions of Apostolic Delegate of Persia, and Administrator of the Diocese of Isphan, thus withdrawing the Persian Mission from the jurisdiction of the Apostolic Delegate of Mesopotamia. On his arrival in Persia, Mgr Chzel was immediately acknowledged by the shah, decorated with the insignia of the Lion and Sun, and officially confirmed, by a special imperial edict, as the representative of the Holy See in the Faithful. During the seven years of his episcopal activity in Persia, the Lazarist mission made wonderful progress with the Chaldeans and Nestorians. A great cathedral was built at Urmiah, and many new schools were opened in the neighbouring villages. Mgr Chzel died in 1882, and was succeeded by Mgr Thimonier, who built a cathedral and seminary of Khosrow and successfully introduced celibacy among the native Catholic Chaldean clergy. His health, however, compelled him to retire, and he was succeeded by Mgr Mentety, who also had to resign for the same reason, and was succeeded, in 1886, by the present delegate Apostolic, Mgr Lesné, titular Archbishop of Philippopolis. Under his able administration, the Catholic mission has made further progress, extending its beneficial work far beyond the limits of Persia proper, into Syria, the Taurus mountains, and the regions of Persian Kurdistan and Armenia.

The latest statistics are as follows: Catholics of the Latin Rite, 350; Catholic Chaldeans, about 8,000, with 52 native priests and 3 dioceses; Nestorians, about 35,000; Catholic Armenians, about 700, with 5 priests; Protestants, about 5,000. — Catholic missions: Lazarist Fathers, 19, with 5 mission stations; churches and chapels, 48; seminaries, 2, with 17 students; schools, 5, with 500 pupils; hospitals, 3; religious houses, 2, 2 for men, with 18 religious, and 1 for women, with 37 sisters.

D. Non-Catholic Missions.—The earliest Protestant missionaries in Persia were Moravians who in 1747 came to evangelize the Guebers, but owing to political disturbances were compelled to withdraw. The next missionary was Henry Martin, a chaplain in the British army in India, who, in 1811, went to Persia, and remained at Shiraz but eleven months, having completed there, in 1812, his Persian translation of the New Testament. After many trials and much opposition, especially from the Mohammedan mullahs, or priests, he was forced to leave the country, and died at Tokat, in Asia Minor, on his way back to England. A few years later, in 1820, the Rev. C. G. Pfander, of the Bash Missionary Society, who visited Persia in 1829; after some years of fruitless labour in Kirmanshah and Georgia he too had to leave the country, and died in 1869 at Constantinople. He is well known for his book "Mizan-ul-Hakk" (The Balance of Truth), in which he points out the superiority of Christianity over Mohammedanism.

In 1833 another German missionary, the Rev. F. Heins, with some colleagues, being forced to leave Russia, entered Persia and for a time made their headquarters at Tabriz; but they also had to leave the country. In 1838, the Rev. W. Glen, a Scottish missionary, entered Persia and spent four years at Tabriz and Teheran, occupied mainly in completing and revising his own Persian translation of the Old Testament. The work of all these missions was principally directed to the conversion of Mohammedans and was therefore, as such attempts have generally proved, a complete failure.

The first organized Protestant missionary attempt among the Persian Christians of Persia took place in 1834, when the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (Congregational) commissioned Justin Perkins and his wife, and Asahel Grant (1835) and his wife to establish a mission among the Persian Nestorians. Between 1834 and 1871 some fifty-two missionaries, we are told, were sent by the American Board of Foreign Missions to Persia. Among these American missionaries were several physicians who, by ministering gratuitously to the poor Nestorians, made some progress.

In 1870 the work of the A. B. C. F. M. was transferred to the Board of Missions of the American Presbyterian Church, and the mission was divided into three districts, Eastern, Western, and Persian. One of the latter, including Tabriz, Hamadan, Resht, Kaskan, and Kirmanshah; the latter, the Province of Azerbaijan (Urmiah, Khosrowa) and parts of Kurdistan, Caucassus, and Armenia. The work has been, and still is, more of a humanitarian and semi-educational character than moral or religious. About $920,000 was expended on this mission between 1844 and 1870, and about one million dollars from 1890 to the present time, i.e., over two million dollars altogether. Yet it is extremely doubtful whether any results commensurate with this vast expenditure have been accomplished. The latest statistics (1900) are as follows: Missionaries, 37 (including 5 police and 3 female physicians); 35 native ministers; 7,000 adher-ents; 3000 communicants; 2692 pupils distributed among 82 schools; 4 hospitals. The Church Missionary Society, established in 1809, has stations in Kirman, Yezd, Shiraz, and at Isphahan. The work is mainly medical and educational. The statistics are: 33 missionaries, including 12 male, 5 female, and 15 female physicians; native clergy, 1; native teachers, 25; Christians, 412; communicants, 189; schools, 8, with 109 scholars; hospitals, 6. The British and Foreign Bible Society also does an extensive work in Southern Persia.

The greatest competitor of the two above-mentioned missionary societies is the Anglican mission known as "The Assyrian Mission", organized in 1839 by Archdeacon Benson of Canterbury with headquarters at Urumiah and Kotehkan, the seat of the Nestorian patriarch, and having for its principal aim the union of the Nestorian with the Anglican Church. It is interesting to read an estimate of the work of this mission from the pen of an American Presbyterian missionary; it reproduces the name Protestant, and has for its avowed object the strength-ing of the Nestorian Church to resist Catholic influences on the one hand and Protestant on the other. It has a strong force of missionaries, who wear the garb of their order, and are under temporary vows of continence. Just present at the mission are: two bishops, 2; schools, 30, with 470 scholars, besides 12 distinctly Nestorian schools in various sections of Kurdistan. This mission originated in 1842, when "Archbishop Howley, with the assistance of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, sent the Rev. G. P. Badger to Mosul, to begin work among the moften Nestorians, and to repair the church of Nestor, of which the shiek, Ber Khan, was raging in the mountains of Kurdistan. The general confusion and disorder were such that Badger had to return in despair to England within a year" (Richter, "History of Protestant Missions in the Near East", 1910). Thirty-four years later, in 1876, Ravicz left the Russian Church and joined this mission. The Swedish-American "Augustana Synode" employs a kasha, who conducts two day-schools. The Evangelical Association for the Advancement of the Nestorian Church, founded at Berlin in 1906, employs a kasha who has had a Lau-terian training in Germany. He cooperates to some dergree with the British and Foreign Bible Society, and has added a fourth to the already existing mission printing establishments at Urumiah. For ten years Dr. Lepsius's German "Orientalmission" maintained outside Urumiah an orphanage for Syrian fugitives from the mountains, but it is to be closed soon. The English Plymouth Brethren employ three or four kashas in the "Assyrian Mission", named after the chief representative of the mission in Persia, Awishahal [Asadollah] Seyyad. There are also small missions connected with the American Dunkards, the Holmes Methodists, the American Southern Baptists and Northern Baptists, and the English Congregationalists.

The most important missionary enterprise in Persia was that of the Russians, in 1809. The aim of this mission is more political than educational or religious, and the extraordinary readiness with which several thousand Nestorians flocked to the Russian pope and the British Government. He obtained British recognition for Catholic rights. He was consecrated bishop on 8 March, 1834, and nominated bishop-auxiliary to Bishop Hartmann; but the next year he was appointed visitor of the Vicariate of Agnano, and afterwards vicar Apostolic of that district. During the Indian Mutiny he was several times in danger of his life. The anxieties of this period told upon his health and in 1860 he was compelled to return to Italy. Sent in 1866 on a mission to the United States, he took part in the Council of Baltimore. On 20 March, 1870, he was nominated Bishop of Savannah; but his health again failing, he resigned in 1873. In 1874 he was sent as Apostolic delegate to Canada; and in 1877 he was commissioned to settle the affairs of the Mahabar schism. On 26 March, 1879, he was appointed Bishop of Aquino in Italy; but in March, 1887, he was promoted to the titular Archbishop of Tamiathia and sent as Apostolic delegate to Ireland to report upon the relations of the clergy with the political movement. He quickly saw that the question must be considered not merely in relation to present policies but also in relation to the past history of Ireland, and he delayed his final report in order to consider the question in a broader aspect. Meanwhile the Holy See issued its condemnation of the Plan of campaign. Persico resigned and returned to Rome. He was at once nominated Vicear of the Vatican Chapter. On 16 January, 1883, he was created cardinal priest of the title of St. Peter in Chains.

FATHER CUTHERBET.

Person.—The Latin word persona was originally used to denote the mask worn by an actor. From this it was applied to the rôle he assumed, and, finally, to any character on the stage of life, to any individual. This article discusses (1) the definition of "person", especially with reference to the doctrine of the Incarnation; and (2) the use of the word persona and its Greek equivalents in connexion with the Trinitarian disputes. For the psychological treatment see PERSONALITY.

(1) Definition.—The classic definition is that given by Boethius in "De persona et duabus naturis", c. v.: "Persona est individuum substantiae (an individual substance of a rational nature)." "Substantia" is used to exclude accidents: "We see that accidents cannot constitute person" (Boethius, op. cit.). Substantia is used in two senses: (a) the concrete substance as existing in the individual, called substantia prima, corresponding to Aristotle's eidos παρατηρηθες; and, (b) abstractions, substance as existing in genus and species, called substantia secunda, Aristotle's eidos συνθετα. It is disputed which of the two the word taken by itself here signifies. It seems probable that of itself it presides from substantia prima and substantia secunda, and is restricted to the former only by the word individuum.

In De divinum in individuum, whether, unlike the higher branches in the tree of Porphyry, genus and species, cannot be further subdivided. Boethius in giving his definition does not seem to attach any further signification to the word. It is merely synonymous with singulares.

Rationalis natura.—Persona is predicated only of intellectual beings. The generic word which includes all individual existing substances is supposition. Thus person is a subdivision of supposition which is applied equally to rational and irrational, living and non-living individuals. A person is therefore sometimes defined as supposition rationabilis. The definition of Boethius as it stands can hardly be satisfactory. The words taken literally can be applied to the rational soul of man, and also to the human nature of Christ. That St. Thomas accepts it is presumably due to the fact that he found it in possession, and recognized as the traditional definition. He explains it in terms that practically constitute a new definition. Individuum substantia signifies, he says, substantia, completa, per se, existentia, existentia ab aliis; portionis naturae. We have a definition comprising the five notes that go to make up a person: (a) substantia—this excludes accident; (b) Complectit—it must form a complete nature, that is, a part, either actually or "aptitudinal"ly, does not satisfy the definition; (c) per se substantia—the person exists in himself and for himself; (d) sustentia—this excludes the universal, substantia secunda, which has no existence apart from the individual; (e) rationalis naturae—excludes all non-intellectual supposita. To a person therefore belongs a threefold incomunicability, expressed in notes (b), (c), and (d). The human soul belongs to the nature as a part of it, and is therefore not a person, even when existing separately. The human nature of Christ does not exist separately; it is not a person in the sense of per se substantia of the Word. It is therefore communicated by assumption and so is not a person. Lastly the Divine Essence, though subsisting per se, is so communicated to the Three Persons that it does not exist apart from them; it is therefore not a person.

Theologians agree that in the Hypostatic Union the immediate reason why the Sacred Humanity, though complete and individual, is not a person is that it is not a substantia, not per se sustentia substantias. They have, however, disputed for centuries as to what may be the ultimate determination of the nature which if present would make it a subsistence and so a person, that is, a person is a positive determination which makes a "mode" of subsistence. It is the function of this mode to make the nature incomunicable, terminated in itself, and capable of receiving its own esse, or existence. Without this mode the human nature of Christ exists only by the uncreated esse of the Word.

Suaquez also makes the ultimate foundation of person incapability exist. In his De hypothesis saeculi he makes no real distinction between nature and esse, it does not prepare the nature to receive its own existence, but is something added to a nature conceived as already existing. Many theologians hold that the very concept of a mode, viz., a determination of a substance really distinct from it but adding no reality, involves a contradiction. Of more recent theories that of Tilkes ("De hypostasi et persona", 1634) has found many adherents. He holds that a substance is a supposition, an intelligent substance a person, from the mere fact of its being a whole, totum in se. This totality, it is contended, is a positive note, but adds no reality, as the whole adds nothing to the parts that compose it. The Hypostasis of the Trinity is made by being assumed, and so ceases to be a whole, being merged in a greater totality. The Word, on the other

Personality. — It is proposed in this article to give an account (1) of the physical constituents of personality in accordance with the scholastic theory; (2) of concepts of personality that conflict with the theory; (3) of abnormalities of consciousness with reference to their bearing on theories of personality.

(1) The Physical Constituents of Personality. — A man's personality is that of which he has consciousness under the concept "I". It is a substance, substantial, permanent, unitary, which is the subject of all the states and acts that constitute his complete life. An appeal to self-consciousness shows us that there is such a subject, of which thought, will, and feeling are modifications. It is substantial, i.e. not one of a group of changing states, but the reality underlying them, for our self-consciousness testifies that, besides perceiving the thought, it has immediate perception in the same act of the subject to whom the thought belongs. Just as no motion can be apprehended without some sort of apprehension of the object moved, so the perception of thought carries with it the perception of the reality that states are recognized as determinations of the "self", and the very concept of a determination involves the presence of something determined, something not itself a determination, i.e. a substance. It is permanent, in that though one may say, "I am completely changed", when referring to a former state, still one knows that the "I" in question is still the same numerically and essentially, though with certain superadded differences.

This permanence is evident from a consideration of our mental processes. Every act of intellectual memory implies a recognition of the fact that I, thinking now, am the same person who had the experience which is being recalled. My past experiences are referred to something which has not passed as they have passed, to my own self or personality. From this permanence springs the consciousness of self as a unitary principle. The one to whom all the variations of state belong is perceived as an entity complete in itself and distinguished from all others. Unity of consciousness does not comprise but manifests unity of being. The physical principle of this permanence and unity is the simple, spiritual, unchanging substance of the rational soul. This does not mean, however, that the soul is identical with the personal self. There are recognized as modifications of the self not merely acts of thought and volition, but also sensations, of which the immediate subject is the animated body. Even in its own peculiar sphere the soul works in conjunction with the body; intellectual reasoning is accompanied and conditioned by sensory images. A man's personality, then, consists physically of soul and body. Of these the body is what is termed in scholastic language the "person", the determinable principle, the soul is the "form", the determining principle. The soul is not merely the seat of the chief functions of man—thought and will; it also determines the nature and functioning of the body. To its permanence is due the abiding unity of the external and visible society which constitutes the Church, and who has not been canonically expelled therefrom. But the expression is rarely used in this sense; customarily it indicates persons whom a special tie connects with the Church, either because they have received ecclesiastical tonsure, minor or major orders, and are a fortiori invested with a power of jurisdiction; or because they have taken vows in a religious order or congregation approved by the Church. This more intimate union with the Church involves particular duties which are not incumbent on the general faithful (see Corpus Juris Ecclesiasticum, 1894: 400-15).
of the whole personality in spite of the constant disintegration and rebuilding of the body. Though not therefore the only constituent of personality, the soul is its formal principle. Finally, for the complete constitution of personality this composition must exist in a certain way of "substance" (see Persons).

(2) NON-SCHOLASTIC THEORIES OF PERSONALITY.

—Many modern schools of philosophy hold that personality is constituted not by any underlying reality which self-consciousness reveals to us, but by the self-consciousness itself or by intellectual operations, Locke held that personality is determined and constituted by identity of consciousness. (Without denying the existence of the soul as the substantial principle underlying the state of consciousness, he denied that this identity of substance had any concern with personal identity.) From what has been said above it is clear that consciousness is a manifestation, not the principle, of that unity of being which constitutes personality. It is a state, and presupposes something of which it is a state. Locke's view and kindred theories are in conflict with the Christian revelation, in that, as in the Incarnate Word there are two intellects and two "operations" there are therefore two consciousnesses. Hence accepting Locke's definition we find in Locke's thought the genuine "self-consciousness.

From Locke's theory it was but a step to the denial of any permanent substance underlying the perceived states. For Hume the only knowable reality consists in the succession of conscious thoughts and feelings. As these are constantly changing it follows that there is no such thing as permanence of the Ego. Consequently, the impression of abiding identity is a mere fiction. So completely has he demolished consciousness, that consciousness as a religious phenomenon of-seems to be derived from it is nowhere to be found. Mill therefore held personality to consist in the series of states "aware of itself as a series". According to James, personality is a thing of the moment, existing in the thought itself, "the passing thought is itself the thinker". But each thought transmits itself and all its content to its immediate successor, which thus knows and includes all that went before. Thus is established the "stream of consciousness" which in his view constitutes the unity of the Ego. Besides the fundamental difficulty in psychology, in that the mind is open to objection peculiar to itself. How can a number of states, i.e. of events ex hypothesi, entitatively distinct from one another, be collectively conscious of themselves as a unity? Similarly, in the theory of James, successive thoughts are distinct entities. As therefore no thought is ever present to the one preceding it, how does it know it without some underlying principle of unity connecting them?

Again, James does not believe in unconscious states of mind. In what sense then does every thought "know" all its predecessors? It is certainly not conscious of doing so. But the objection fundamental to all these theories is that, while pretending to account for the phenomena of self-consciousness, its most important testimony disappeared, that to a person who is not the thought, who owns the thought, and who is immediately perceived in the set of reflection upon the thought, is treated as a mere fiction. Against any such position may be urged all the arguments for the permanent and unitary nature of the self.

The modern school of empirical psychologists shows a certain reaction against materialism, which was personality a foundation in substance. Thus Ribot: "Let us set aside the hypothesis which makes of the Ego 'a bundle of sensations', or states of consciousness, as is frequently repeated after Hume. This is to take effects for their cause." (Diseases of Personality.) For them the unity of the Ego rests merely on the unity of the organism, 'to the organism, and the brain, as its highest representation, constitute the real personality" (op. cit., 151). A system which ignores the existence of the human soul fails to account for the purely intellectual phenomena of consciousness, abstract ideas, judgment, and inference. Theories require a simple, i.e. non-extended, and therefore immaterial principle. The various theories we have been considering make the whole personality consist in what is really some part of it. Its substantial constituents are soul and body, its accidental constituents are all the sensations, emotions, thoughts, volitions, in fact all the experiences, of this composition.

(3) ABNORMALITIES OF CONSCIOUSNESS.—We may here review briefly some forms of what are known as "disintegracons of personality", and consider to what extent they affect the scholastic theory of the constitution of the person. In double or multiple personality there are manifested in the same individual two or more apparently distinct series of conscious states. There is a break not merely of character and habit, but of memory also. Thus in 1857 a certain Ansel Bourne disappeared from his home at Coventry, Rhode Island, and two weeks later set up business as A. J. Browne, a baker, at Norristown, Pennsylvania. This new "personality" had no knowledge of Ansel Bourne's personality, and would sooner have woke up to find himself again Ansel Bourne. The adventures, even the existence, of A. J. Browne were a vanished episode. Subsequently under hypnotic influence the latter "personality" was recalled, and recounted its adventures. The phenomena of double personality may also be recurrent apart from hypnotism. In either case the "personality" is real, and alternately, each having the chain of memories proper to itself. The instance most frequently cited is that of "Felicaid X", observed for many years by Dr. Azam. Two states of consciousness alternated. In state II she retained memory of what happened in state I, but not vice versa. Her character in the two states was widely different. While the character in the first state tends to become more like the character in the original state, appearing finally as a blend of the two, as in the case of Mary Reynolds (cf. "Harper's Magazine", May, 1860).

In "multiple personality" the most extraordinary abnormalities of memory and character occur. In the case of "Miss Beatheamp," a patient before the Psychical Research Society for Psychical Research, "X", one of the two other states manifested two personality. B II, and B III. Of these B III ("Sally") practically developed an independent existence, and continually manifested itself apart from hypnotic suggestion. B I had no memory of B II or B III. B II knew B I, but not B III, while B III knew both others. Eventually in 1890 after a shock they were brought together. "By "personality" B IV, with which they had previously presented a complete blank from the "disappearance" of the original Miss Beatheamp after the first shock till the appearance of B IV after the second, six years later. Her character was, however, very unlike that of the original personality. B III had memory of all that happened to B IV, but did not know her thoughts. In the case of "Miss A.," a double personality which was evidently jealously born of her and of B I, and played sly tricks on them. In connexion with these phenomena, the theory has been proposed that the original personality became "disintegrated" after the first shock, and that B I and B IV are its components, while B II and B III are varying manifestations of the "second personality." Sometimes again the phenomena of "double personality" are manifested in an individual, not in afternating periods, but simultaneously. Thus M. Taine cites the case of a lady who while continuing a conversation would write a whole page of intelligent and connected matter on some quite alien subject. She had no notion of what she had been writing, and was frequently surprised, even alarmed, on reading what she had written.

In dealing with the problems suggested by such phenomena, one must first of all be sure that the facts are well attested and that fraud is excluded. It should also be noted that these are abnormal conditions, whereas the nature of personality must be determined by a study of the normal individual.
Nor is it permissible even in these exceptional cases to infer a “multiple” personality, so long as the phenomena can be explained as symptoms of disease in one and the same personality.

The various groups of phenomena enumerated above would merit the title of different personalities" if it could be shown (a) that personality is constituted by functioning as such, and not by an underlying substantial principle, or (b) that, granted that there be a formal principle of unity, such cases showed the presence in the individual, successively or simultaneously, of two or more such principles, or
(c) that the principle was not simple and spiritual but capable of being reduced to the functioning components. The hypothesis that functioning, as such, constitutes personality has already been shown insufficient to account for the facts of normal consciousness, while the other theories are opposed to the permanence and simplicity of the human soul. Nor are any of these theories necessary to account for the function of the soul in this person. It follows that the “form” of the body, if it serves not forms as in the body which has no share as a cause, still the soul is conditioned in its activity by the state of the physical organism. Now, in the case of non-simultaneous double personality, the essential feature is the break of memory. Some experiences are not referred to the same “self” as other experiences; in fact, the memory of that former self disappears for the time being.
Concerning this one may remark that such failures of memory are exaggerated; there is no complete loss of all that has been acquired in the former state.
Apart from the memory of definite facts about oneself
there remains always much of the ordinary intelllectual possession of the book. "A.J. Browne" was able to keep his accounts and use the language intelligently. That he could do so shows the permanence of the same intellectual and therefore non-composite principle. The disappearance from his memory of most of his experiences merely shows that his physical organism, by the state of which the action of his soul is conditioned, was not working in the normal way.

In other words, while the presence of any form of intellectual memory shows the continuance of a permanent spiritual principle, the loss of memory does not prove the contrary; it is merely absence of evidence either way. The theory that the soul acts as the “form” of the body explains the two partially discovered chains of memory. What sort of change in the nervous organism would be necessary to account for the calling up of two completely different sets of experiences, as occurs in double personality, no psychologists, even those who consider the physical organism the sole principle of unity, pretend to explain satisfactorily. It may be remarked that such manifestations are almost always found in hysterical subjects, whose nervous organization is highly unstable, and that frequently there are indications which point to definite lesion or disease in the brain.

The alleged cases of simultaneous double personality, manifested by speech in the case of one and writing in the case of the other, present special difficulty, in that there is question not of loss of memory of an action performed, but of want of consciousness of the action during its actual performance. There are certainly degrees of consciousness, even of intellectual operation. The doubt therefore always remains as to whether the so-called unconsciousness is real, or if really indicative of mental operation, be literally unconscious or only very faintly conscious.
But there is a further doubt, namely, as to whether the writing of the “secondary personality” is intellectual at all, at the moment. The nervous processes of the brain being set in motion may run their course without any demand arising for the intellectual action of the soul. In the case of such highly nervous subjects, it is at least possible that images impressed on the nervous organism are committed to writing by purely automatic and reflex action.

Finally, there remains a sense in which phenomena of the same nature as those we have been considering may be indicative of the presence of a second personality, e.g. when the body is under the influence of an alien spirit. Possession is something the possibility of which the Church takes for granted. This, however, would not imply a true double personality in one individual. The invading being would not enter into composition with the body to form one person with it, but would be an extrinsic agent communicating local motion to a bodily frame which it did not “inform”. (See Consciousness; Soul.)

L. W. GEDDES.

Persons (also, but less correctly, Parsons). ROB-ERT, Jesuit, b. at Nether Stowey, Somerset, 21 June, 1546; d. in Rome, 13 April, 1619.

I. Early Life.—His parents were of the yeoman class (for the controversy about them, see below “Memoirs”, pp. 46–47), but several of his many brothers rose to good positions.

By favour of the local parson, John Hayward (one time monk at Taunton), Robert was sent to St. Mary’s Hall, Oxford (1562). After-taking his degree with distinction he became fellow and tutor at Balliol
(1568); but 13
Feb., 1574, he was forced to leave Oxford partly because of his strong Cathlolic leanings, partly to avoid college quarrels. Before long, he went abroad, and was recruited, probably, for the English mission
by Father
William Good,
S.J., and after a year spent in travel and study, he became a Jesuit at Rome (3 July, 1573).

II. English Mission, 1573–1584.—At Rome he suggested the English mission for the Society, and when the students of the English College (q. v.)
took up another with his first rector, he exerted himself to maintain peace, and proposed the “oath of

Robert Parsons (Persons)
the missions"}, an idea which was taken up, and is now in vogue throughout the Church. When the college was entrusted to the Jesuits, he was temporarily installed as rector (10 March, 1579). Dr. Allen (q. v.) came to Rome, 10 Oct., 1579, to complete the college arrangements, already so well begun, and at his instigation he joined with other Englishmen (Dec., 1579). The year of mission in England (12 June, 1580), to late August, 1581, was the most useful of Persons's life. Ever at the post of danger, he yet managed to avoid seizure, while he organized means of missionary enterprise not for Jesuits only but for the whole country. Laymen and secular priests carried on the work with scholarly enthusiasm, and deserve unstinted praise for the results that followed. Persons not only preached, confessor, arranged missionary tours, and posts, but he also wrote books and pamphlets, and set up his "magic press" (q. v., Birken, Stephen), which printed and set forth Campion's "Decem Rationes," while several books of his own, answers to onslaughts of Protestants were brought out within a few days of the attack. Considering the losses previously incurred through want of courage and energy, it would be impossible to praise this pioneer work too highly. But later on the missionary methods had to be modified; the presses were transferred abroad, and the challenges to dispute and conversion was entirely thrown upon the English and Irish Persons, who had been subsequently approved by him. (See COUNTER-REFORMATION, VII. England; EDMUND CAMPION, BLESSED.)

111. Politics, 1582-81.—After Campion had been taken (17 July, 1581) and the press captured (8 August), Persons slipped across to France hoping to deliver his own mission with Allen, to set up a mission press, and return. The press was begun again under George Fenton at Rouen, but Persons never saw England again, and found himself in entirely new circumstances, which led to new, and much less desirable results. He was now living under the French Provincial Père Claude Matthieu, an advocate of armed resistance to the Huguenots; and he was necessarily under the influence of the King of Spain and the Duke of Guise, afterwards the leader of "La Sainte Ligue" and the champion of Mary Stuart. A great change too had come over her fortunes. Esme Stuart, Sieur d'Anbazy, created Duke of Lennox, the favourite of the youthful King James, espoused her side (7 March, 1582), and during the three years that Allen and Persons would have remained in power, he would have become the virtual ruler of Scotland, and enjoyed the king's entire confidence. Father William Crichton, S.J., an enthusiastic Scot, who had just gone to Edinburgh as a missioner, was completely carried away by the prospect, and returned at once to lay Lennox's offers before the Duke of Guise. Persons and Allen were summoned for a conference, and a meeting was held in Paris (18-24 May), in which both they and the papal nuncio, and the Archbishop of Glasgow took part. Everyone agreed that the King of Spain and the pope should be called upon to help. If they did not, there was no chance of Lennox maintaining his position for long, with England and the Scottish Kirk allied against him. Campion was decided that Persons should go to Philip, and Crichton to Pope Gregory; and though the two Jesuits demurred, as having other orders from their superiors, the papal nuncio insisted and his authority of course prevailed. Persons now undertook two journeys, to Philip in Spain (June-Oct., 1582) and to Rome (Sept., 1583). Pope Gregory fully approved the plans, but the king always refused to consent, with qualifications, however, which led Allen and Persons to hope on until the beginning of 1581, by which time Lennox had fallen, and the other favourable circumstances had ceased. Looking back we now recognize how great Father Persons's error was; but it is also easy to see that with the approbation of the pope and of Allen and the other leading English Catholics living abroad, he had many excuses. He certainly did not contemplate the subjection of his country, but its liberation from an insufferable burden of persecution (see also ARMADA, THE SPANISH, IV. Catholic Cooperation).

IV. Spain, 1588-97.—Recalled to Rome in 1585, he was permitted to return to Spain with Anseline (7 May, 1587) and to return to Spain at the close of 1588, to committee with Philip, who was offended with Father Acquaviva. Persons was successful, and then made use of the royal favour to found the seminaries of Valladolid, Seville, and Madrid (1589, 1592, 1598) and the residences of Sanlucar, and of Lisbon (which became a college in 1622). Already in 1582 he had founded a school at Eu, the first English Catholic boys' school since the Reformation; and he now succeeded in establishing at St. Omer (1594) a larger institution to which the boys from Eu were transferred, and which, after a long and romantic history, still flourishes at Stonyhurst (q. v.). While in Rome and Spain Persons wrote several still extant State papers, which show that he was still in favour of armed intervention on behalf of the English Catholics, but his main policy was to wait for the next succession, when he expected there would be a variety of claimants, for it was one of Elizabeth's manias to leave the succession an open question. Persons thought that a Catholic successor and by preference a successor to the deceased Infanta, would be the best for Persons, and that the first of the house of Lancaster) would have a fair chance. On this topic there appeared in 1594, under the pseudonym of N. Dolman, the important "Conference on the next succession". The penman was really Richard Verstegan (q. v.; see also, Record Office, "Dom. Eliz., 252, n. 66, and Vatican Archives, "Borghese", 448, ab. f. 339) but both Campion and Allen had helped and approved, while Persons had also revised the MS. and rewritten many passages. The book was a manifesto of his party, and through declining the authorship, he always defended its principle, which was the people's right of participation in the settlement of a ruler, as opposed to the Gallican theory of the Divine right of kings. (See ORTHOGONIA, GOVERNMENT; GALICANISM.) But though Persons's theory is praiseworthy, his practical conclusion (mentioned above) was illusory. Owing to the unpopularity of Spain, the book was very badly received, and he could not effectively prevent its popular attrition to its author. Ten English Catholics, who had been in political publication in favour of Mary Queen of Scots, widely known as "Leicester's Commonwealth", had also been popularly ascribed to him; presumably because he very unwisely allowed a Jesuit lay-brother, Ralph Emerson, to take the first consignment of them to England, where they were seized. The real author was probably Charles Arundel.

V. THE APPELLANTS, 1598-1605.—Cardinal Allen died in 1594 and after he had gone, the English Catholics were tried by a series of the most distressing disturbances, which originated in the misery and consequent discontent of the exiles, and which gradually affected the seminaries, the clergy, and even the whole body of Catholics. Allen had weakened the influence; and left no successor. The clergy were without superior or organization. Persons returned to Rome (April, 1597) to quiet the disturbances at the English College, which no one else could calm. He was immediately and remarkably successful; and there was talk of making him a cardinal. But, as the pope never intended to do so, it is unnecessary to discuss what might have happened had he received that dignity. Cardinal Cajetano, the Protector, now ordered him to draw up a scheme of government for the rest of the clergy. His first idea was to establish an archbishop in Flanders, and a bishop in England, but considering the fury of the persecution a hierarchy of priests was preferred. In England an archpriest with assistants was appointed (7 March, 1598); in Flan-Catholics, Spain, and Rome, "Prefects of the Mission," while the noble in Flanders was to be the viceregent of the cardinal-protector, with supreme jurisdiction. In point of fact it was found more convenient to consult directly with the archpriest, George Blackwell, who, albeit a good scholar and an amiable man, had not the skill and experience necessary to calm the disputes then raging, and his endeavours turned the complainants against himself. An appeal was carried against which complaint, but decided in his favour, 6 April, 1599. But Father Persons, who had defended him, misunderstood the nature of the opposition, and treated the appellant evoked by recalcitrant scholars, and Blackwell misused his victory. A second appeal ensued (Nov., 1600), which was backed up by the publication of many books, some of which contained a painful attack on Father Persons, who defended himself in two publications "A briefe Apologie" (St. Omers?, 1601), and the "Manifestation" (1601). The appellants were patronized by the French ambassador, the archpriest by the Spanish, and the debate grew very warm, Father Persons' pen being busily engaged the whole time. He did not respect the corriere's authority, but justified the grounds of the appeal, ordering that six of the appellant party should be admitted among the assistants, cancelled the instruction which commanded the archpriest to seek the advice of the Jesuit superior in matters of greater moment, and forbade all further books on either side. Thus ended the affair of Blackwell and a party supported by France, but hostile to Persons, became influential among the English clergy.

VI. CONCLUSION, 1602-10.— Persons remained till his death rector of the English College, but he nearly lost that post in 1601. Clement VIII had been told that VII in the end maintained the archpriest's authority, but justified the independence of the Jesuits, by sending Father Persons away. Persons, as it happened, was ill, and had to go to Naples (Nov., 1601); whereupon the pope gave orders for him not to return. But the pontiff himself died 3 March, 1605, and his successor, Paul V, reversed his policy, which was unpopular at Rome. Persons returned to his post, and enjoyed full papal favour until his death. Father Persons' greatest work, his "Christian Directory" (originally called "The Book of Christian Exercise", and known as "The Book of Resolution" (Rome, 1602), with innumerable editions and translations), had been connected with his books. The French edition of Sander's "De Schismate Anglicano" (Rome, 1506) had also an immense circulation. His later works, were controversial, written with wonderful vigour, irony, meiisiveness, and an easy grasp of the most complex subjects; but they lack the deep sympathy and human interest of his missionary books. Father Persons was a man of great parts, eloquent, influential, zealous, spiritual, disinterested, fearless. Yet he had some of the defects of his qualities. He was masterful, sometimes a special pleader, and greater as a prince or sectional leader than as "Generalissimo." Though his services in the mission field, and in the education of the clergy were priceless, his participation in politics and in clerical feuds cannot be justified except in certain aspects.

Perth (Scotland). See DUNKELD.

Perth (Perthshire), Diocese of, in Western Australia, suffragan to Adelaide: bounded on the north by parallel 31° 29' S. lat. (the Moore River), east to 120' E. long. and thence by parallel 29' S. lat. to the border of South Australia, its eastern boundary, on the south and west by the Darling. The first Catholics, Irish emigrants, settled about seventy-five years ago near the present city of Perth. As they had no priest, Archbishop Polding of Sydney appointed Rev. John Brady his vicar-general for the western portion of Australia. A native of Cavan, Father Brady had laboured for twelve years in Mauritius, before going to Australia in February, 1828. With Fr. John Jeosten, a former Dutch chaplain in Napoleon's forces, and Patrick O'Reilly, a catechist, he reached Albany, 4 November, 1843, and Perth, 13 December, 1843. Land for a church, presbytery, and school was donated by Governor Hutt, and the foundation stone of the church laid, 27 December, 1843. Shortly afterward Fr. Brady went to Europe to procure aid, and was ordained bishop at Rome, 18 May, 1845. He returned with some missionaries, including six Sisters of Mercy from Carlow, Ireland, under Mother Ursula Frayne, reaching Fremantle in January, 1846. The early days of the mission were days of suffering and poverty. In 1848 the settled Catholic population, which was extremely poor, numbered only 306 of 4600 whites. The bishop soon sent Fr. Confalonieri with two catechists, James Fagan and Nicholas Hogan, to Port Essington to convert the native northern blacks. The catechists were drowned in a shipwreck on the very voyage, and Fr. Brady was forced to labour for two years, till his death by fever at Victoria, Melville Island, when he had converted over 400 blacks. An attempt to found a southern mission failed for want of resources. A central mission was opened to two Spanish Benedictines, Dom Serra and Dom Salvado. In March, 1847, they established a monastery, now New Norcia (q. v.), 81 miles from Perth. The first diocesan synod was held there, 13 March, 1848, attended by the bishop and his three priests. The mission sinking heavily in debt, Dom Salvado was sent to Europe for funds. He returned January, 1849, but his resources were applied to New Norcia alone. Fr. Serra, who had been at Seville, and had meanwhile been made Bishop of Port Victoria, returned by boat and anxiety, Dr. Brady applied for a confidant, and Dom Serra was transferred from Port Victoria to the titular See of Daulia and appointed to administer the temporalities of Perth. He arrived there from Europe with a large contingent of Benedictines in 1851. Discontent broke out between the laity and the Spanish monks, and Dr. Brady, unable to bear the strain, returned to Ireland in 1852; he died in France, 2 December, 1871. While he was in Perth, Dr. R. R. Madden, the historian, was appointed colonial secretary, the first Catholic to hold that office in the colonies. On Corpus Christi Day, 1851, the first two black children received Holy Communion at Perth. In 1859 Fr. Martin Griver was made administrator of the diocese. In 1802 Dom Serra returned to Spain, where he died in 1866. On 10 October, 1869, Fr. Griver was named Bishop of Toa and Administrator Apostolic of Perth. In July, 1872, he was consecrated Bishop by the Bishop of Granollers, in the presence of the French bishops. His consecration was a great and impressive occasion. On 29 January, 1865, the bishops of Perth established an orphanage at Perth. In 1882 the diocese contained 8500 Catholics, with 1500 children in the parochial schools. Bishop Griver died 1 November, 1886. Born at Ganders in Spain, 11.
November, 1810, he studied medicine, but later joined the priesthood and went out with Dom Serra in 1849. He laboured strenuously in building up the diocese, and was a man of wonderful asceticism; after his death a wooden cross twelve inches long was found at his shoulders, fastened to the flesh by five iron spikes. Dr. Matthew Gibney, who had been appointed Bishop of Scythopolis and Conductor of Perth cum jure successorum, was consecrated at Perth, 23 January, 1857. Under his guidance the diocese made rapid progress, as in his earlier days, so during his episcopate, he was an ardent apostle of religious education for children. He introduced all the religious congregations mentioned below, except the Sisters of Mercy and the Sisters of St. Joseph. In 1889, with two Vincentians, he gave a mission throughout the whole of his diocese. In 1890 he set out for Beagle Bay, where he established a successful native mission, under the care of the Trappists, who were later replaced by the Palletine Fathers and the Sisters of St. John of God from Subinaco, Perth. Owing to advanced years, Dr. Gibney resigned his see and has been succeeded by Most Reverend P. J. Clune, CSSR. (1911). Dr. Clune, born in Clare, Ireland, 1863, was ordained for the Diocese of Goulburn (v. c. 21 June, 1886. In 1892 he returned to Ireland, and became a Redemptorist. On the death of Dom Dunsit, Prior of Limerick, he was sent to Wellington, New Zealand, as rector of the Redemptorist monastery; after which he was superior at North Perth till his election as bishop. From the original Diocese of Perth, three additional ecclesiastical districts have been formed: New Norcia (1847); the Vicariate Apostolic of Kimberley (1887); and the Diocese of Geraldton (1868).

Statistics of religious congregations.—Men: Oblates of Mary Immaculate (1891), 2 houses, 11 members; Redemptorists (1894), 1 monastery, 8 members; Irish Christian Brothers (1894), 4 houses, 18 members. Women: Sisters of Mercy (1846), 12 houses, 133 nuns; Sisters of St. Joseph of the Apparition (1876), 6 houses, 46 nuns; Sisters of St. John of God (1883), 3 houses, 43 nuns; Sisters of Notre-Dame des Missions (1887), 4 houses, 22 nuns; Presentation Sisters (1900), 3 houses, 12 nuns; Sisters of St. Joseph of the Sacred Heart (1890), 5 houses, 16 nuns; Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary, or Loreto Nuns (1897), 2 houses, 26 professed sisters. There are 22 high schools (3 schools, 1578 pupils, 162 teachers); 11 primary schools, with 5230 pupils; teachers engaged, 408; 1 boys' orphanage; 1 girls' orphanage; 1 boys' industrial school; 1 girls' reformatory; 1 Magdalene Asylum; 2 hospitals (these charitable institutes contain 413 inmates); 26 ecclesiastical districts; 51 churches; 10 secular and 13 regular priests; 27 brothers; 360 nuns; 54 lay teachers and a Catholic population of 15,000.

PERU

Peru, a republic on the west coast of South America, founded in 1821 after the war of independence, having been a Spanish colony. It is difficult to ascertain the true origin of the word "Peru", as the opinions advanced thereon are vague, numerous, and confusing. The most universal, however, is the name "Pertinax", which impressed the natives; and they put their swords back in the scabbards, when suddenly a Tongrian cavalryman fell upon Pertinax and stabbed him in the breast. This incited the others who fell upon Pertinax; the emperor's head was put on a lance and carried through the streets of the city to the camp. The army put it into the pulpit, and the soldiers, by the pressure of Persia's, under the word of God, had been impressed with these terms "B INA", "Peh", and "Bira", which were, respectively, the names of an Indian tribe, a river, and a region. Prescott asserts that "Peru" was unknown to the Indians, and that the name was given by the Spaniards. Peru's territory lies between 15° 29' N. and 19° 20' S. lat., and 68° 51' 47" and 8° 18' W. long. Bounded by Ecuador on the north, Brazil and Bolivia on the east, Chile on the south, and the Pacific Ocean on the west, its area extends over 679,000 sq. miles. The Andean range runs through Peru from S. E. to X. W., describing a curve parallel to the coast. History.—However true the fact may be that gold was the object uppermost in the minds of the Spanish conquerors of the New World, there is yet a great deal of history that is in that conquest, from the northernmost confines of Mexico to the extreme south of Chile, religion always played a most important part, and the triumphant march of Castile's banner was also the glorious advance of the sign of the Saviour. That religion was the keystone of the American Crusades is evident from the history of their origin; the sanction given them by the Supreme Pontiff; the throng of self-devoted missionaries who followed in the wake of the conquerors to save the souls of the conquered ones; the reiterated instructions of the Crown, the great purpose of which was the conversion of the natives; and from the acts of the soldiers themselves (Prescott, "Conquest of Peru", II, iii). The first news of the existence of the great Empire of the Incas reached the Spaniards in the year 1531, when Vasco Núñez de Balboa, the discoverer of the Pacific Ocean, was engaged in an expedition against some Indian tribes in the interior of Darien. Perhaps the glory of conquering Peru would have fallen upon Balboa had not the jealousy of his chief, Pedro Arús de Avida, Governor of Panama, cut short his brilliant career. The second attempt to reach the coveted domain of the Incas was made in 1532 when Pascual de Andagoya started south from Panama, but he was compelled by ill health to return. Francisco Pizarro, after two unsuccessful expeditions (1524-25 and 1526-27) and a trip to Spain for the purpose of interesting Charles V in the undertaking, finally started the actual work of invading Peru, sailing from Panama in January, 1531. (See Pizarro, Francisco.)

When the persistent commander finally reached the country in 1532, the vast Inca empire is said to have extended over more than one-half of the entire South American continent. He found a people highly civilized, with excellent social and political institutions, who had developed agriculture to a remarkable degree through a splendid system of irrigation. They worshipped the sun as embodying their idea of a supreme being who ruled the universe. This worship was attended by an elaborate system of priesthood, ritual, animal sacrifices, and other solemnities. After the conquest had been consummated (1534), Father Vicente Valverde, one of the five Dominicans who had accompanied the conqueror from Spain, was nominated Bishop of Cuzco and soon afterwards confirmed by Paul III, his jurisdiction extending over the whole territory of the newly-conquered domain. He was assassinated by the Indians of Puna, off Guayaquil, in 1541 when returning to Spain. Upon taking Cuzco, the capital of the empire, Pizarro provided a municipal government for the city, and encouraged its settlement by liberal grants of lands and houses. On 3 Sept., 1538, Bishop Valverde laid the foundations of the cathedral, and later a Dominican monastery was erected on the site of the Inca temple of the sun, a nunnery was established, and several churches and monasteries built. The Dominicans, the Brothers of Mercy, and other missionaries actively engaged in propagating the Faith among the natives. Besides the priests that Pizarro was required to take in his own vessels, the succeeding ships brought additional numbers of missionaries, who devoted themselves earnestly and disinterestedly to the task of spreading the religion of Christ among the Chinese from the country. In marked contrast to that of the conquerors, whose thirst for gold was never satisfied, and who, having ravaged the villages and stripped the temples of their gold and silver ornaments, had enslaved the Indians, forcing them to toil for the mines for their benefit.

At the outset and for several years thereafter the missionaries had to labour under almost unsurmountable obstacles, such as the uprising of the Inca Manco (a brother of Atahualpa, whom Pizarro had placed on the vacant throne) and the first civil wars among the conquistors themselves. These culminated in the execution of Diego de Almagro (1538) by order of Pizarro, and the assassination of the latter by the former's son, and were followed by other no less bloody conflicts between Cristóbal Vaca de Castro (the newly-appointed governor) and Almagro's son (1543), and Gonzalo Pizarro and Blasco Núñez de Vela, the first viceroy (1541-45). The news of this, the most formidable rebellion that had so far been recorded in the history of Spain, caused a great sensation at the Court. Father Pedro de la Gasca was selected for the delicate task of pacifying the colony. Provided with unbounded powers, Gasca reached Peru in July, 1546, and scarcely three years had elapsed when he accomplished the great object of his mission. Having restored peace, his next step was to aneathorize the condition of oppressed natives, in doing which he went farther than was agreeable to the wishes of the colonists. Other reforms were introduced by the far-seeing priest, thus placing the administration upon a sound basis and facilitating a more stable and orderly government by his successors. Upon his return to Spain he was raised to the Bishopric of Palencia, which diocese he administered until 1561, when he was promoted to the vacant See of Sigüenza. He died in 1567 at the age of seventy-one. Unfortunately, the disturbances of the country were renewed on the departure of Gasca. The most serious uprising was that of Francisco Fernandez Girón (1559-54) during the regime of the second viceroy, Antonio de Mendoza. Girón's execution (Dec., 1554) put an end to the last of the civil wars among the conquerors; and through the conciliatory and energetic measures of Andrés Hurtado de Mendoza, the third viceroy, the country was at last pacified, and the authority of Spain firmly established.

The Dominicans were the first ministers of the Gospel to come to Peru, and did splendid and efficient work in Christianizing the natives. They built many churches, monasteries, convents, and colleges, and acquired considerable prominence in ecclesiastical matters during the seventeenth century. Saint Rose of Lima (1583-1617), the patron of the Peruvian capital, was educated in one of the Dominical nunneries, and lived there until her death. The Franciscan fathers were also among the pioneer missionaries of Peru, and were prominent for their unceasing labours in the remotest wilds of South America. One of them, Saint Francis Solanus, made a journey from Peru to the Paraguayan Chaco, preaching to the tribes in their own dialects (1588-89). The Franciscan churches and buildings are among the handsomest in the country. Likewise, the good work of the Order of Saint Augustine stands high in the annals of Peruvian church history. Of the several temples and convents erected by the order during the viceroyalty, the church of Our Lady of Mercy is one of the most attractive in Lima. In 1567, at the earnest request of Philip II, Saint Francis Borgia, then General of the Society of Jesus, went to Lima to request Father Gerónimo Ruiz Portillo, who with his six companions arrived at Callao on 28 March, 1568, and entered Lima on 1 April. As in Paraguay and other parts of South America, the work of the Jesuits in Peru was most effective in propagating the Faith among the Indians as well as in educating them. After establishing a college, a seminary, and a church in Lima, they built temples and schools in almost all the towns. At Juli, on the shores of Titicaca Lake, they founded a training school for missionaries (1577), where the novices were taught the native dialects. At that time the first printing press in South America was introduced by the order. Among their members were introduced of the most famous educators, historians, scientists, geographers, naturalists, and literary men of the period. Their educational institutions soon became renowned, not only in the American colonies, but also in Spain and Europe. The great and redeeming work of the Jesuits was flourishing when the decree of Charles III of 1768, ordering their expulsion from the Spanish dominions, reached Peru and was executed by the Viceroy Manuel de Amat.

The Dominican Gerónimo de Loaiza, first Bishop of Lima (1546–1555), was succeeded by Saint Toribio de Mogrovejo (1583–1600). Nominated to the See of Lima in 1578, he entered that capital on 21 May, 1581. He learned the Quichua language thoroughly in order to be able to find out for himself the real condition and actual wants of the Indians, whose interests he protected and promoted with the greatest zeal and care. Such was his activity that within comparatively few years he held fourteen synods and three councils, through which many beneficial reforms were instituted; and personally visited twice the whole territory of devotion, the greater portion of the South American continent. These tours of inspection he made on foot and accompanied only by two of his secretaries. He had scarcely started on his third journey when death surprised him on 23 March, 1600. Among other works which stand as a lasting monument to his memory are the Seminary for the Indians and the Convent of Santa Clara in Lima. The Holy Office was established in Peru in 1570, during the regime of the viceroy Francisco de Toledo, the tribunal of the Inquisition sitting at Lima and extending its jurisdiction over the Captaincy-General of Chile, the Presidency of Quito, the Viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, and part of the New Granada. It was abolished on 23 Sept., 1713, when the Viceroy Abascal enforced the order to that effect, enacted by the Cortes of Cadiz on 22 Feb. of the same year. But shortly after Ferdinand VII was restored to the throne of Spain, the Inquisition was re-established in Peru (16 Jan., 1815) and operated until its definite abolition in 1820, when Peru declared its independence.

By an express provision, the jurisdiction of the Holy Office never comprised the Indians, who continued under the authority of the bishops and the ordinary courts.

For nearly three centuries, Peru was ruled by thirty-eight viceroys; or, in their stead, the government was temporarily exercised by the Audiencia Real of Lima, founded in 1544. As the representative of the King of Spain, the viceroy was vested with almost absolute powers, and besides his executive functions he discharged those of Vice-Patron of the Church, President of the Audiencia, captain-general of the army, and supernumerary of the Royal Exchequer. The movement for emancipation in Peru began early in the nineteenth century, but the first attempts were repressed with considerable severity, and it was not until 28 July, 1821, that independence was declared. The defeat of the royalists at the battle of Ayacucho (9 Dec., 1824) put an end to the Spanish rule. Under the independent government, the executive assumed the same functions as before, and the viceroy, and the five different constitutions adopted since the establishment of the republic recognized the Roman Catholic religion as the official church of the country with exclusion of any other.

Population.—The last census of Peru was taken in 1876, hence the present population of the republic is known only approximately. According to the enumeration of that year, the number of inhabitants was 2,676,000. Recent estimates have, however, been made (1906) that show the population to have increased to 3,547,929. Of this total fifty per cent. is formed by Indians; fifteen per cent. by whites, mostly the descendants of Spaniards; three per cent. by negroes: one per cent. by Chinese and Japanese; and the remaining thirty-one per cent. by the offspring of intermarriage between the different races. According to the "Annuario Ecclesiastico" of Rome (1909), the Catholic population of Peru is 3,135,830, distributed as follows among the various dioceses: Lima, 608,000; Arequipa, 270,591; Ayacucho, 290,640; Huánuco, 380,850; Huaraz, 350,000; Puno, 260,810; Trujillo, 580,900.

Ecclesiastical Divisions.—The ecclesiastical Province of Peru comprises: one archdiocese, Lima, erected in 1543 and raised to metropolitan rank in 1546; nine suffragan dioceses, formed in order of seniority: Cuzco, 1530; Arequipa, 1609; Ayacucho, 1615; Trujillo, 1616; Chachapoyas, or Maynas, 1843; Huánuco, 1855; Puno, 1865; Huaraz, 1900; and three prefectures Apostolic: San Leon de Amazonas, 1900; San Francisco de Ucayali, 1900; and Santo Domingo del Urubamba, 1900. The cathedral and episcopal residences include the great cathedral of Lima, the six other dioceses, and 66 parish churches. In the Archdiocese of Lima, 85 in Cuzco, 71 in Arequipa, 102 in Trujillo, 87 in Ayacucho, 41 in Chachapoyas, 58 in Huánuco, 52 in Puno, and 45 in Huaraz. The number of additional churches and public chapels is perhaps about three times this number, as each parish has three or four churches besides the parish church. The number of the Convents of Nuns comprises approximately one-fourth of the entire population, when the number of assistant priest, chaplains, and priests without regular appointments are taken into consideration. The religious orders, both male and female, are well represented. In the Archdiocese there are three convents, and the Lazarists, Redemptorists, Fathers of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, Jesuits, Mercedarians, Augustinians, and Fathers of St. Camillus one each. Among the women, the Tertiaries of St. Francis have five convents; the Sisters of St. Joseph of Chiny four; the Dominicans, Carmelites, Conceptionists, Salesians, Religious of the Sacred Heart, and of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary two each; the Poor Clares, Bernardines, Capuchin-esses, and Augustinians one each.

In the various dioceses many religious houses are to be found: Cuzco: Franciscans two, Dominicans, Mercedarians, Poor Clares, Carmelites, Dominican nuns, Sisters of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, Tertiaries of St. Francis one each; Arequipa: Franciscans two, Jesuits, Lazarists, Salesians, Dominicans, Mercedarians, Dominican nuns, Carmelites, Sisters of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary one each; Trujillo: Franciscans two, Lazarists, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Tertiaries of St. Dominie one each; Ayacucho: Redemptorists, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Tertiaries of St. Dominie one each; Huánuco: Franciscans, Tertiaries of St. Francis (women), Conceptionists one each; Huaraz: Franciscans, Sisters of Our Lady of Lourdes, Tertiaries...
ies of St. Francis (women) each one. The Dioceses of Chachapoyas and Puno have no religious houses. The three prefectures Apostolic, in the north, centre, and south of the republic, are under the care of the Augustinian Fathers. The Dioceses and the work principally for the conversion of the infidel native tribes. The Government allows a small subsidy for the maintenance of these missions, but their greatest source of income is derived from the "Propagación de la Fe en el Oriente del Perú." This pious association has spread over the whole republic and collects the contributions of all the faithful, which are, relatively speaking, very abundant. Each diocese has its own diocesan seminary for the education of its priests. The Franciscans are in charge of the seminaries of the dioceses of Cuzco and Ayacucho, the Lazarists of those of Trujillo and Arica, the Fathers of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary of that of Huaraz, and the rest are under the care of the seculars. The Government does not claim supervision over the seminaries, which are under the control of the respective bishops.

Charities.—There are some thirty hospitals in Peru administered by various charitable societies; one old people's home; and several poor houses, old foundations especially dedicated to charitable works, besides a great number of private associations devoted to the work of gratuitous teaching, visiting the sick poor in their homes, legalize illicit unions, etc.

Laws.—Religion.—The constitution, promulgated on 10 Dec., 1869, expressly provides that the nation profess the Roman Catholic religion; that the State protect it and does not permit the public exercise of any other (Art. 4). There is, however, no interference in personal religious beliefs, and there are Protestant churches in the republic. Under the Organic Law of 17 Sept., 1857 (Arts. 49-54), the prefects of departments are given certain supervisory powers over ecclesiastics, and establish a yearly visitation. Article 94 of the Constitution, on the duties of the president of the republic, establishes that the chief magistrate shall: exercise the ecclesiastical patronage according to law; nominate for archbishops and bishops, with the approval of Congress, those who have been chosen according to law; nominate church dignitaries, capacity of all kinds, as well as contract ecclesiastical benefices; concede concordats with the Apostolic See, according to instructions given by Congress; grant or refuse, with the assent of Congress, passage to decrees of councils, or pontifical Bulls, Briefs, and Rescripts; but in case that these affect matters of a spiritual nature, the supreme court of justice of the republic must be previously heard.

Article 1338 of the Civil Code in force, under which the Church and religious orders were prohibited from disposing of their property without the consent of the Government, was repealed, 30 Sept., 1901. Hence the Church in Peru, as a juridical entity, can acquire and possess property in all the ways, as well as contract obligations and exercise civil or criminal action, according to the statutes of the country, the concordat, and the ecclesiastical canons and discipline. Temples and all places of worship are exempt from taxation, but other church property yielding a revenue of $100 or more is subject to the ecclesiastical tax according to the Regulation of 20 Dec., 1888. Arts. 82 to 94 of the Civil Code refer to clergymen and religious, containing a definition of who are such; the qualifications necessary for the profession; their exemption from public services; the recovery of civil rights by religious upon their secularization, etc. The religious orders are governed by the Regulations for Regulars (Reglamento de Regulares), approved by Resolution of 12 Jan., 1872. Although the modern law obliges all citizens to military duty, there has never been a case where it has been applied to priests or seminarians. No special exemption is granted to clerics in regard to trials, they are tried in the public courts, civil or criminal, as the case may be. There is no law enforcing the observance of holy days, although in the capital a particular ordinance exists which requires that stores be closed on Sundays and Holy Days. Provisions and other public observances shall be held without interference from the Government. The administration of the different branches of the Church in Peru, in so far as the national patronage is concerned, is entrusted to the Minister of Justice, Worship, and Public Instruction. The fiscal budget assigns the sum of $100,000 for the support of the Church, including the salaries of prelates, rectors, etc.

Wills and Testaments.—The procedure that obtains in Peru is similar to that in force in Spain, being based upon the Roman law. According to the Civil Code, wills may be either open or closed. An open will (testamento aberto) may be executed in a public instrument, i.e., before a notary public, in a private document, or verbally (Arts. 651-658). There are, besides, special forms of wills, such as the military, the maritime, and others, in which, on account of the unusual circumstances attending upon each particular case, the ordinary formalities of law are dispensed with, and others of a less restrictive nature prescribed (Arts. 659-665). A will (testamento cerrado) must be duly sealed by the testator himself. A foreigner owning property in Peru must testate according to the provisions of the Civil Code (Art. 692); and if he have an estate abroad he may dispose of it by will executed in accordance with the laws of the country wherein such estate may be located, or with those of his native land (Art. 698), provided he have no rightful heir or heirs in Peru (Art. 695). The substantive law governing wills and testaments, succession, etc., is contained in Arts. 651 to 954 of the Civil Code.

Cemeteries are under the authority of charitable associations and the parish priests. Under the Regulations of 20 Nov., 1888 and 19 Jan., 1889, the Municipal Councils of the republic are instructed to establish and maintain laic cemeteries for the burial of persons not belonging to the Catholic Church.

Marriage and Divorce.—The Peruvian Civil Code expressly prescribes that marriages in the republic must be performed in the parishes and churches established by the Council of Trent; but in order to enable non-Catholics to marry in the country a law was enacted on 23 Dec., 1897, empowering the Alcaldes (mayors) of the Provincial Councils to solemnize marriages. Divorce in Peru, as established by Arts. 191 seq. of the Civil Code, is only possible when there is impracticability of the bond of union. Marriage can only be nullified through the regular ecclesiastical procedure, if by reason of canonical disabilities, or through the ordinary courts of justice, if on account of civil impediments. Sec. III of the Civil Code (Arts. 120-217) is devoted to the subject of marriage, including divorce.

Schools.—Education in Peru is a national institution under the Department of Justice, Public Instruction, and Worship, but is also given by private establishments, of which there are several maintained by religious orders. It is divided into primary, secondary, and academic. Primary instruction was until 1903, when the new public education law went into effect, in the hands of the municipalities, but in view of their limited resources the national Government found it necessary to take charge of it. It is free and compulsory and is given in about 2500 public schools, with 31,015 teachers, and an attendance of 102,295 pupils. Academic instruction is furnished by thirty government colleges and several private institutions. Academic instruction is afforded by the universities of the republic. Foremost among them is the University of Saint Mark, founded at Lima in 1574, which has faculties of theology, law, medical, letters, sciences, and political economy. There are also the Universities of Saint Thomas of Aquino, Saint Thomas of Trujillo, and Saint Augustine of Arequipa. Normal, agricultural, and manual training schools are largely attended.

10th Century

...at the end of the century, its façade being yet unfinished; it contains paintings by Barocci, Manzi, and Signorelli; there is a marble sarcophagus in which are the remains of Urban IV and Martin IV; in the chapel del Santo Anello is preserved an onyx ring, which is said to have been the marriage ring of Our Lady, and which was surrendered first at Chiusi, where it was stolen, and then taken to Perugia in the fifteenth century; in the chapter library is preserved a codex of the Gospel of St. Luke, of the sixth century. Other churches are: San Pietro dei Cassinesi, the church of a convent founded by St. Perusina, died 1090; San Ercolano, the high altar of which is made of an ancient sarcophagus; Sant’ Angelo, a round building, dating from the sixth century; the Madonna della Luce, a graceful little temple by Galeazzo Alessio; San Francesco del Prato, now the seat of the “Accademia” of fine arts. The university, founded in 1320, has three faculties and contains a museum of Etruscan, Roman, and Christian antiquities, with many sculptures and inscriptions, among the latter, the “Tabula Perusina,” discovered in 1822. The most notable ancient monuments of the town are the Porta Augusta; the tomb of the Volumnii, which was discovered in 1840 by Vermiglioli; and the Etruscan walls.

Perugia was among the most important cities of the Etruscans, with whom it took part in the wars against Rome in 310 and 295 B.C., as also in the Samnite War. The Perugian War (11 B.C.) is famous; the troops of Antony were shut up here, where they were compelled to surrender. During the Gothic War, Perugia was more than once besieged by the Goths, in 537 and in 552, and by the Goths in 540 and 548. The Lombards at the time of their first incursion had taken possession of the city, but in 592 it came again under the Byzantine power and was made the seat of a dux. In 719 it was besieged by the Lombard King Ræcis, who, however, was persuaded by Pope Zacharias to raise the siege. Pope Pepin gave the city to the Holy See. From the beginning of the eleventh century, Perugia was established as a free commune and was in struggles with the neighbouring cities of Umbria and of Tuscany (Chiusi, 1012; Cortona, 1013; Assisi, 1031; Todi, 1050; Foligno, 1080 and 1085); it was governed by consuls (from 5 to 10), for whom we have records in the annals of the commune; after 1174 there was a podestà, and later a capitano del podestà.

Perugia friendly to Florence and faithful to the Holy See, was essentially a Guelph city, and in the thirteenth century the popes established their residence here for a long time; fourteen of them were elected here (Honorio III, Bonifacio IV, Celestino V, Honorio IV, Celestino II, and Celestino IV). On the other hand, continuing its wars with neighbouring cities (Spoleto, from 1231, was besieged for two years), Perugia extended its sovereignty over the greater portion of Umbria, and over a part of Tuscany. In 1375 it was among the first cities that received against Gregory IX at the instance of the Florentines. Meanwhile, there had been formed two parties; the Raspanti (the popular party) and the Becariani (the party of the nobles), and between them they had made it possible for Biondo Michele to become lord of the city in 1390; he, however, was killed in 1393, and then Gian Galeazzo Visconti took possession of the town; but in 1403 it became subject to Boniface IX. Afterwards it fell into the power of Ladislas of Naples; in 1416 the city was taken by Braccio da Montone, who was recognized as lord of Perugia by Martin V. At his death in 1421 the nobles came into power, but contention soon developed among them, and eventually the Baglioni made way with the Oddi family. Finally, Gian Paolo Baglioni became a tyrant of the city, making himself detested by his cruelty and dissolute habits. He was reduced to order in 1506 by Julius II; but fresh cruelties against his own relations led to his decapitation by order of Leo X in 1520; Perugia then came once more into immediate dependency upon the Holy See.

In 1534 Rodolfo Baglione set fire to the Apostolic palace, and the vilefaced was slain; and no sooner had order been established after these events, than a rebellion broke out on account of the tax on salt, which Paul III had increased in 1540; Perugia declared itself a “city of Christ”; and confined its keys to the care of a crucifix. On 5 July, however, it was conquered by the Perugian Farnese and lost its freedom. Paul III built a fortress to prevent further revolts of the Peruginians, while Julius III restored to them the greater part of their privileges. In the rebellion of 1848, the first act of the Peruginians was to demolish the tower of Paul III. In 1859 there was a provisional Government established, but the Pontifical troops soon took possession of the city, though they did not commit the acts of cruelty which they have been accused. Finally in 1860 General de Sonnaz took possession of the town in the name of the King of Sardinia.

Blessed John of Perugia, one of the first companions of St. Francis, died in 1230. In the martyrologies are found the names of the martyrs Constantius (Constantiniani, whom some believe to have been a bishop), Florentius, and Feliciusius, who died at Perugia. Under Decius one Decentius was bishop, according to the tradition; but the first bishop of whom there is any certain knowledge was St. Hereculanus, killed by King Totila in 546; many admit there were two bishops and another St. Hyacinthus who died in 548. The first is said to have died either in one of the great persecutions or under Julian the Apostate (Cappellotti).

St. Hereculanus was succeeded by Joannes, who consecrated Pope Pelagius I (590); Aventius (591); Laurentius (649); Benenatus (679); St. Asclepiodorus (about 700), whose relics were later taken to Metz; Ambrosius Point (1043), who had various controversies with the abbots of San Pietro; Joannes (1105), who consecrated the monastery of Monte Corona; Vivianus, who was present at the council of 1179; Giovanni (1206), who gave a convenant to St. Francis; Salvio de’ Salvi (1234), a pious and learned prelate, who restored San Stefano, the ancient cathedral; Frascati Ponzio (1310); Filippo degli Alberti (1332); Domenico nuovo; Andrea Bontemp (1339), a cardinal, and legate general of Umbria; Andrea Giovanni Baglione (1341), who filled several convents with reformed religious; Domenico Vannuci (1382), who erected the altar of the chapel of the Sacro Anello; Giovanni Lopez (1492), a cardinal who enjoyed inordinate wealth, and died (1502), was deposed by Alexander VI for having taken up arms against Cesar Borgia and restored to his see by Julius II; Antonio Ferreri (1506), who suspected by Julius II died in the Castle of S. Angelo in 1508; Cardinal Agostino Spinola (1510), under whom the canons of the cathedral, who since the twelfth century had lived according to the Rule of St. Augustine, were exhusted of that rule; Jacopo Sannazottii (1535), a cardinal; Falco Cornes (1530), rector of the diocese and founder of the seminary; Ippolito Cornes (1553), who established a house of reform, and a monastery for poor young men; Giulio Oradini (1562), who founded a college for clerks; Napoleon Comoliti (1591), the founder of other charitable institutions; M. Ant.
Auguste, who took the oath of allegiance to Napoleon; Carlo Fieschi Cittadini (1818), who distinguished himself by his firmness and prudence against the Provisional Government of 1848, and by his activity in the city from pillage at that time; Gioacchino Pecci (1850), who became Leo XIII, and who made Perugia

University of Perugia.—
One of the "free" universities of Italy, was erected into a studium generale on 8 Sept., 1308, by the Bull "Super-secula" of Clement V. A school of arts existed about 1200, in which medicine and law were soon taught. Before 1300 there were several universities scholarium. Jacobus de Belvico, a famous civil jurist, taught here from 1316 to 1321.

By Bull of 1 Aug. 1318, John XXII granted the privilege of conferring degrees in civil and canon law, and on 18 Feb., 1321, in medicine and arts.

On 19 May, 1355, the Emperor Charles IV issued a Bull confirming the papal erection and raising it to the rank of an imperial university. This unusual mark of favour was given to assist Perugia after the terrible plague years 1348-49. In 1362 the Collegium Gregorianum (later called the Sapienza Perugia) was founded by Cardinal Nicola Capocci for the maintenance of forty youths. Gregory XI by Brief of 11 Oct., 1371 gave the privileges of a studium generale to this new faculty of theology. This faculty was suppressed and its property merged in the university in 1811. To this foundation the Sapienza Perugia was transferred in 1829. The latter was founded by Benedetto Guidi, Bishop of Recanati in 1426, with Martin V's approval, as the Collegio di S. Girolamo. It was a free hostel for imcumous strangers who wished to study law and medicine. Suppressed by the French in 1798, it was reopened in 1807 by Pius VII as the Collegio Pio.
In the Constitution of 27 Aug., 1824, Leo XII made this Benedictine college of the abbey of Perugia into the time of Napoleon I the university has occupied the old Olivetan convent of Monte Morello. There was a faculty of mathematics down to 1884. The statutes are modelled upon those of Bologna. The number of students at different dates were: 1339, 142; 1801, 79; 1811, 337. Among its prominent teachers were: the canone Johannes Andreas; Cino da Pistoia (1270-1336), poet and jurist; his pupil Bartolus (1314-27), famous civil jurist; his pupil Baldus: Alberic Guido, founder of the science of international law; and Francesco della Rovere (Sixtus IV). Among its students were: Nicholaus IV, Gregory XI, Innocent II, Martin V, Pius III, Julius II, Julius III, Urban VII, Gregory XIV, Clement VIII, and Paul V.

Studites (1811) — Expenditure, 296,470 lire; rec-receipts, 263,748 lire; expenditure, 20,490 lire; endowment, 22,400 lire for important

Perugino (Pietro Vanuccio), Italian painter, founder of the Umbrian school, b. at Città della Pieve in 1446; d. at Perugino near Perugia in February, 1527. He was called Perugino, although he often signed his name Petrus de Castro Plebiis. He studied art at Perugia, where he began an earlier school, that of Nicolò Alonzo and Boccaccio da Camerino, already remarkable for the pure expression of the senti-

interior life. Perugino adopted this tradition, adding to it the decorative taste of his master, Fiorenzo di Lorenzo, and influenced by the influence of both the Florentine and Roman painters. In 1492 he went to Florence, where he was the companion of Leonardo in Verrochio's studio, the most active centre and laboratory of the methods of the Renaissance.

Perugino acquired knowledge whereby he expressed his ideas in an imperious manner. He learned construction, became a master of perspective, and in style followed a fixed formula, which was much admirable. Unfortunately his early works are lost. His frescos in the Palazzo Pubblico in Perugia (1475) and those in Cerequeto have been destroyed or ruined.
The earliest extant picture is the "Delivery of the Keys to St. Peter" (1582), in the Stucino Chapel at Rome, where there are other frescoes which were made to mark the "Last Judgment" of Michelangelo. Perugino then held a foremost place in the Italian school, and to-day his one remaining fresco shines as a masterpiece among the more brilliant inventions of the Florence school. It engendered numerous works of art; and Raphael, Perugino's great pupil, was mindful of the "Sposalizio", the most exquisite work of his youth.

Within the next fifteen years (1581-90) Perugino attained his greatest success. His work was most in demand for religious pictures, and he went from city to city painting altar-pieces or ecclesiastical frescoes.

In 1491-2, having gone to Rome to put the de-oration (no longer extant) of the palace of the Cardinal's Medici, he executed the delightful picture in the Villa Albani, the "Adoration of the Holy Child" (1491).
Except for some journeys to Perugia, Venice, and Fano, Florence was his centre of operations for that period. To it belong the “Cruel Fixion” and the “Gothiscmany” of the Florenee Accademia; the famous “Picato” of the same museum; the “Taking down from the Cross” of the Pitti (1515); the “Vision of St. Bernard” in the Museum of Munich; but the most wonderful of those works in the great frescoes in the “Cruel Fixion” in Sta. Maddalena de’ Pazzi (1546). The beauty of the faces, the stirring gravity of the scene, the finish of the colouring, and the perfection of the landscape rank this picture first among Perugino’s works in Italy. The triptych of the “Nativity” (1500) at London is a miniature of this fresco almost equal to it in beauty. Perugino shows himself an incomparable landscape painter. The picture in the Vatican is the best perhaps, and was an eminent master of the painting of the atmosphere. He derives his expression from the rarest artistic qualities, from a finished composition, spacing of figures, use of oils, and deep, harmonious colouring, thereby achieving an effect of depth and fullness. In his masterpieces though he transforms the reality to an extent extreme his expression is nevertheless very true to nature. He copies the nude quite as accurately as the most able of the Florentines, as is seen in the wonderful “St. Sebastian” of the Louvre, and he is capable of the most exact and close veracity, for example, the two admirable heads of Carthians at the Florence Accademia, which suffice to place him in the front rank of painters. Perugino is one of the greatest and most popular artists of Italy and his work is distinctive for the creation of the “pious picture”.

The decoration of the Cambio, or Bourse of Perugia (1499), marks the beginning of a period of decline. The effect of this hall decorated with frescoes on the four walls and with arabesques on the ceiling is marred by the treatment of the figures. He used extremely arbitrary and the composition worthless and insignificant. Ancient heroes, prophets, and sibyls all have the same disdainful expression; the whole is neutral, abstract, vague. The artist replaces all semblance of thought, conscience, and effort with an appearance of sentiment which is merely sentimental. Thenceforth Perugino is a deplorable exponent of the art which was subjected to mere handicraft. Unquestionably he had a sublime period in his life, when he first endowed incomparable plastic bodies with an unlooked-for expression of the infinite and the divine, but he soon abused this off-setted formula, the arrangement became purely schematic, the figures seem to be ciphers, the colouring is insignificant and the emotion evaporated. The only part of his genius that persisted to the end was an eye enamoured of the skies and light. This decline was clearly evident in 1504, when Isabella d’Este ordered the artist to paint the “Combat of Love and Chastity”, now in the Louvre. At this time art was achieving its most glorious conquests. The new art, with Leonardo and Michelangelo (1506) at Florence. The works of his last twenty years, frescoes and altarpieces, are scattered through Umbria, at Perugia, Spello, Siena etc. They add nothing to his glory.

The ceiling which he painted for Julius II in 1508 in the Camera dell’ Incluso at the Vatican has at least a high decorative value. In 1521 the old artist worked on frescoes in collaboration with Raphael. The latter had left an unfinished fresco at S. Spirito at Perugia and after his death Perugino was commissioned to finish it. Nothing shows more clearly the moral difference between these two geniuses, the wonderful progress and self-development of Raphael, the immobility and intellectual apathy of his predecessor of seventy-eight years.

Peruzzi, Baldassare, architect and painter, b. at Siena, 7 March, 1518; d. at Rome, 6 Jan., 1557. He derived much benefit from the years of apprenticeship under Bramante, Raphael, and Sangallo during the erection of St. Peter’s. An evidence of his genius for independent work is the Palazzo Massimi alle Colonne, which he began in 1535. Almost all art critics ascribe also to him the Villa Farnesina. In a single arrangement of pilasters, and a beautiful frieze on the exterior of the building, airy halls, and a few splendid rooms are combined in excellent taste. The paintings which adorn the interior are for the most part by Peruzzi. The decoration of the façade, the work of Peruzzi, has almost entirely perished. He decorated this villa on the Tiber a number of second-rate artists were employed, and just as the style of the villa in no wise recalls the old castellated type of country-house, so the paintings in harmony with the pleasure-loving spirits of the time were thoroughly antique and uninspired by Christian ideas. It seems that Raphael designed the composition of the storey of the entrance to the villa and most of the painting which decorates it; and it must be, the entire plan for the decoration of the hall, it is certain that the tapestry-like frescoes on the ceiling are to be ascribed to Peruzzi. Four scenes represent God’s saving omnipotence as shown in the case of Noe, Abraham, Jacob, and Moses. The manifestation of the Lord in the burning bush and the figure of Jehovah commanding Noe to enter the ark were formerly copied by the works of Raphael. But some time before, Peruzzi had produced for the church of S. Croce in Gerusalemme a mosaic ceiling, the beautiful keystone of which represented the Saviour of the world. Other paintings ascribed to him are to be found in S. Omobono and S. Pietro in Mostorio. That Peruzzi improved as time went on is evident in his later works, e. g., the “Madonna with Saints” in S. Maria della Pace at Rome, and the fresco of Augustus and the Triniture Sibyl in Fontignusta at Siena. As our master interested himself in the decorative art also, he exercised a strong influence in this direction, not only by his own decorative paintings but also by furnishing designs for craftsmen of various kinds and crafts.

The city is situated at the mouth of the river Fiume, on the Adriatic, but the whole town includes fisheries, agriculture, the manufacture of majolica, the working of sulphur and lignite, coal mines, bituminous coal, and marble. The cathedral (San Francesco) has a beautiful Gothic portal and a “Coronation of the Madonna”, by Bellini; the church of San Domenico is a work of Fra Paolo Belli; in the latter is a famous painting of the Crucifix. The Palazzo Ducale was begun by Laura in 1465, and was finished by the Genga, father and son.

Pescennius, Emperor of Rome (183–194).

He was a native of central Italy, and during the reigns of Marcus Aurelius and Commodus had kept the Germans from invading Roman territory. In 192 he suppressed an outbreak of the Jews and Saracens.

After the death of Pertinax, the proconsul of Syria proclaimed Didius Julianus emperor; the troops in Britain elected Claudius Albinus; those on the Danube chose Lucius Septimius Severus; and the soldiers in Syria elected the governor of that province, Caius Pescennius Niger Justus. Septimius Severus advanced to Rome with the Pannonian legions. Julianus was killed, and the senate acknowledged Severus. Severus now made Albinus practically a co-emperor. Forthwith he addressed himself against Pescennius Niger. The latter had many adherents at Rome. Moreover, Antioch, where the proclamation of the rival emperor had been issued, aspired to the same position as Rome. Pescennius gained the support of the petty Oriental rulers. In preparation for the advance of Severus he appointed the able proconsul of the Province of Asia, Aurelius Emilianus, as his chief of staff. The ports of Asia were closed; the passes over the Taurus mountains were fortified; and Byzantium was garrisoned.

Severus also had made far-reaching preparations. Troops were sent from Asia, and the second army of the Danube was brought together. The advance guards of the opposing armies met at Perinthus, the capital of Thrace. The soldiers of Severus were repulsed. Severus, however, proceeded with his main army across the Bosporus and by way of Candela near Cyanaus. Here in 194 a battle took place in which Pescennius was slain. Niger himself now hastened to the scene but was defeated near Nicea, with the result that most of the cities of the Province of Asia came into the hands of Severus. Niger fled to reach Antioch. The possession of this city was decided by a battle fought south of Issus in which Pescennius Niger was defeated. While making his escape to the Parthians he was overtaken and killed towards the end of 194. His severed head was exhibited by order of Severus before the besieged city of Byzantium. Severus mercilessly punished Niger's adherents, whether private individuals or cities. Byzantium did not surrender until 196. Severus was also successful against the vassal states of the Parthians, Adiabene and Osrhoene. For the time being the Roman Province of Osrhoene was established.

later arranged in two volumes, "Briefe aus Hamburg" (1889), and "Der Krieg von Wittenberg" (1889), refuting the usual calumnies against the Church. His most popular book was "Das Religiöse Leben", of which thirteen large editions have appeared. During all this period of literary activity, Pesch was tireless as a missioner in Germany. He was often arrested under charge of being a Jesuit. Pesch taught the best in Scholasticism, but appreciated what was good in other systems of philosophy. His Latin writings contain the latest results of natural science applied to the illustration of truth by scholastic methods.

Pescia, Diocese of (Pisciensis), in Tuscany, Italy, on the Rivers Pescia Maggior and Pescia Minore, situated in a fertile plain; its textile industry is considerable. The cathedral is very ancient, but was restored by Ferris in 1662; it contains beautiful paintings by Gabbinii and the mausoleum of Bahkassare Turn. Other churches are S. Michele and S. Stefano, anterior to the twelfth century, and S. Francesca, which dates from 1211. The earliest mention of Pescia is of the eighth century; later it belonged to the Republic of Lucca until the fourteenth century, when it was conquered by the Florentines, who defended it successfully in 1339 against Francesco Sforza. In 1551 Pietro Strozzi, an exile from Florence, became master of Pescia, but he was compelled to surrender to Duke Cosimo de' Medici. Pescia is the home of the Ammannati family, and of the painter Mariano da Pescia. In 1549 Leo X withdrew it from the jurisdiction of Lucca, raising it to the dignity of a prelacy nullius; and in 1726 it was made a diocese, suffragan of Pisa. Its first bishop was Bartolommeo Pucci (1725); among his successors should be mentioned Francesco Vicent (1773-1801), who in 1784 founded the seminary. The diocese has 36 parishes, with 70,501 inhabitants; 5 religious houses of men, and 10 of women; 2 educational institutions for male students, and 8 for girls; and 1 Catholic weekly publication.

Pessimism.—I. A Temper of Mind.—In popular language the term pessimist is applied to persons who habitually take a melancholy view of life, to whom painful experiences appeal with great intensity, and who have little capacity for pleasant impressions. Such a temper is partly due to natural disposition, and partly to individual circumstances. According to Caro (after von Hartmann), it is especially prevalent in periods of transition, in which old ways of thought have lost their hold, while the new order has not yet made itself fully known, or has not secured general acceptance for its principles. In such a state of things men's minds are driven upon themselves; the outward order appears to lack stability and permanence, and life in general tends consequently to be estimated as hollow and unsatisfactory. Metchnikoff attributes the pessimistic temper to a somewhat similar period in the life history of the individual, viz.—that of the transition from the enthusiasm of youth to the calmer and more settled outlook of maturity. It may be admitted that both causes contribute to the low estimate of life which is implied in the common notion of the pessimistic temperament. But this temperament seems to be far from rare at any time, and to depend upon causes too complex and obscure for exhaustively analysis. The poetical and philosophical nature has especially emphasized the painful aspect of life, though it is seldom wholly unresponsive to its pleasurable and desirable side. With Lucretius, howe, life is a failure and wholly undesirable; with Sophocles, and still more with Eschylus, the tragic element in human affairs nearly obscures their more cheerful aspect: "It is best of all never to have been born"; the frank and unreflective joy in living and in the contemplation of nature, which runs through the Homeric poems, and is apparent in the work of Hesiod and that of the Greek lyricists, is but seldom found among those who look below the surface of things. In proportion as human affairs outgrow the naive simplicity of the early period of history, the tendency of emerging spiritual and social questions naturally increased. Byron, Shelley, Baudelaire and Leconte de Lisle, Heine and Leopardi are the poets of satiety, disillusion, and despair, as the genius of Goethe and Browning represents the spirit of cheerfulness and hope.

At the present moment it would seem that the variety of interests which science and education have brought within the reach of most persons, and the wide possibilities opened up for the future, have done much to discourage pessimistic feelings and to bring about the prevalence of a view of life which is on the whole of an opposite character. We must not, indeed, expect that the darker aspect of the world will ever be wholly abolished, or that it will ever cease to impress itself with varying degrees of intensity upon different temperaments. But the tendency of the present day is undoubtedly in the direction of that cheerful though not optimistic view of life which George Eliot called Meliorism, or the belief that through a gradual process of change and improvement there is an indefinitely extended improvement in the conditions of existence may be looked for, and that sufficient satisfaction for human energy and desire may be found in the endeavour to contribute to it.

II. A School of Philosophy.—As a philosophical system, Pessimism may be characterized as one of the many attempts to account for the presence of evil in the world (see Evl). Leibniz held that "metaphysical" evil is necessarily involved in the creation of finite existences, and that the possibility of sin and consequent suffering is inalienable from the existence of free and rational creatures. The principle from which evil arises is thus made to be an integral part of the actual constitution of nature, though its development is regarded as "a consistent but not to be justified," the originator of Pessimism as a system, as with those who have accepted his qualitative estimate of the value of existence, evil in the full sense is not merely, as with Leibniz, a possible development of certain fundamental principles of nature, but is itself the fundamental principle of the life of man. The world is regarded as essentially and essentially evil. The essential nature of will is to desire and strive; and the consciousness of this perpetual unfilled desire is pain. Pleasure is merely an exception in human experience, the rare and brief cessation of the striving of the will, the temporary absence of pain. This theory recalls that of Plato ("Phaedo") who regarded evil as the normal condition of human life. The essential nature of consciousness as essentially painful and undesirable is nearly identical with the Buddhist notion (quoted with approval by Schopenhauer) that conscious existence is fundamentally and necessarily evil. Hence, further, comes the ethical theory of Schopenhauer, which may be summed up as follows: the only moral duty is to live. Peace can be attained only in proportion as man ceases to desire; thus the pain of life can be minimized only by an ascetic renunciation of the search after happiness, and can be abolished only by ceasing to live. On the same principle, the poet Leopard extolled suicide, and Mainlander took his own life.

Schopenhauer's philosophical system of Monism has generally been regarded as in a great degree purely fanciful and self-contradictory. The teleological function attributed to the unconscious will, which produces phenomenal existence through the intermedium of quasi-Phallic ideas, is obviously out of place in a philosophical system which imputes to the conscious will all of our automatic bodily functions and thence also in the external world, creates a confusion between the rational will which we know in ourselves as the cause of action, and mere tendency or instinct, for which the characteristics of will are arbitrarily assumed.

Von Hartmann endeavored to improve upon Schopenhauer by taking the unconscious (Unbewusstes) as the foundation of reality. Will and idea are with him twin functions of the unconscious, which energizes both in them and apart from them. The idea becomes conscious through its opposition to will, and from this opposition arises the pain of evil. In order to induce men to continue to exist, the unconscious leads them on to the pursuit of an unattainable happiness. The dehiscence presents itself in three successive forms, or stages, corresponding to the childhood, youth, and manhood of the race. In the first stage happiness is considered as attainable in the process of an ideal and essential, evil of life. In the second stage happiness is considered as attainable in the process of a transhistorical future beyond the grave, and in the third (the present day) it is looked forward to as the future result of human progress. All are equally delusive; and there occurs, as a necessary consequence, at the end of each stage, and before the discovery of the next, the "voluntary surrender of individual existence" by suicide; and when, in its old age, the race has discovered the futility of its hopes it will desire nothing but unconsciousness and so will cease to will, and therefore to be.

Meanwhile, the moral duty of man is to co-operate in the cosmic process which leads to this end. He is "to make the ends of the Unconscious his own ends," to renounce the hope of individual happiness, and so by the suppression of egotism to be reconciled with life as it is. Von Hartmann claims that he harmonized Optimism and Pessimism, by finding in his own Pessimism the strongest conceivable impulse to effective action. With von Hartmann, life is not, as with Schopenhauer, essentially painful; but pain predominates greatly over pleasure; and the world is the outcome of a systematic evolution, by which the end of the unconscious will eventually be attained in the return of humanity into the peace of unconsciousness. The world is not, as Schopenhauer considered it, the worst possible, but the best, as is shown by the adaptation of means to ends in the evolutionary process. Nevertheless it is altogether bad, and had better not have been.

The unconsciousness of von Hartmann is involved in the same self-contradiction as the will of Schopenhauer. It is difficult to attach any real significance to the conception of consciousness as a function of the unconscious, or to that of purposive action by the unconscious. Considered simply as a reasoned basis for a doctrine of Pessimism, von Hartmann's system has few merits. His form of hazardous quasi-mystical imagery as that of Jacob Boehme, representing the pessimistic aspect of the actual world. From this point of view it may be said that both Schopenhauer and Hartmann rendered some service by emphasizing the perpetual contrast between desire and achievement in human affairs, and by calling attention to the potential functions of suffering in human life. Schopenhauer and von Hartmann stand alone as the originators of metaphysical systems of an essentially pessimistic character. The subject has also, however, been treated from a philosophical standpoint by Bähnsen, Mainlander, Dydell, Freus, and has been discussed from a more or less optimistic point of view by Dühring, Caro, Sully, W. James, and many others. The extravagant speculations of Nietzsche are to a great extent founded on his early sympathy with the point of view of Schopenhauer.

The view to be taken of the contention of Pessimism depends mainly on whether the question can be settled by an estimate—supposing that one can be formed—of the relative amount of pleasure and pain in average human life. It may well be thought that such a calculus is impossible, since it must obviously depend in a great degree on purely subjective and therefore variable considerations. Pleasure and pain vary inordinately both in kind and intensity with persons of differing idiosyncrasies. Life, it is contended, may still be happy, even though its pains may exceed its pleasures; or it may be worthless even if the reverse is the case. The point of view involves a judgment of values, rather than a quantitative estimate of pleasure and pain. The true pessimistic estimate of life would be that it is rather unhappy, because it is worthless, than worthless because it is unhappy. But again, values can be estimated or judged only according to the degree of personal satisfaction they imply; and we are brought back to a merely subjective view of the value of life, unless we can discover some absolute, objective standard, and make the true pessimistic estimate of the importance of its pleasures and pains which is invariable and the same for all. Such a standard of value is to be found in religious belief, and exists in its most complete form in the faith of Catholics. Religion fixes the scale of values by reference not to varying individual sensibilities, but to an eternal law which is always ideal and may be actually the reason of the individual judgment. Moreover, the recognition of such an absolute standard itself provides an absolute standard in what is right and wrong. According to it, which cannot exist in the absence of such recognition, and which is only traversed by Schopenhauer's pseudo-mystical delight in contemplating the "kernel of things", or by von Hartmann's personal adoption of the assumed "ends" of the unconscious.

The Christian law of love, if it gives to action, in itself possibly quite the reverse of pleasureable, a value far outweighing that of the satisfaction arising from any specific pleasure, whether sensuous or intellectual. The inevitable Christian tendency to deprecate satisfaction arising from pleasure against the performance of duty has caused Christianity to be classed as a system of Pessimism. This is, for example, the view taken of it by Schopenhauer, who declares that "Optimism is irreconcilable with Christianity", and that true Christianity has throughout that ascetic fundamental character which his philosophy explains as the denial of the will to live.

Von Hartmann, in like manner, rejecting as mythified the foundation of the Christian Faith and its hope of the hereafter, takes its historical and essentially important content to be the doctrine that "this earthly vale of tears has in itself no value whatever, but that, on the contrary, the earthly life is composed of tribulation and daily torment. It can hardly be disputed that the Christian view of life in itself is scarcely less pessimistic than that of Schopenhauer; and its pains are regarded as essentially characteristic of its present condition, due to the initial misdirection of human free-will. No estimate of the essential painfulness of human life could well exceed that of the "Imitation Christi" (see, e.g., III, xx). But the outlook is profoundly modified by the introduction of the "Christian" view of the world and of man as the special province of Christianity. The unhappiness of the world is counterbalanced by the satisfaction which arises from a peaceful conscience, and a sense of harmony between individual action and eternal law; faith and love contribute an element of joy to life which cannot be destroyed, and may even be enhanced, by temporal suffering; and in some cases, at least, the delights of supernatural mystical contemplation reduce merely natural pain and pleasure to comparative insignificance.

Pessinus (πεσσύνιον), titular see of Galatia Secunda. Pessinus, on the southern slope of Mt. Dindýnum and the left bank of the Sangarius, was an ancient city, having commercial but chiefly religious importance, owing to the cult of Cybele under the title of Agdistis, whose statue, or rather a stone supposed to represent her, was considered to have fallen from heaven. It was colonized by Gallic priests of the temple, flourished under the Assyrians, being called the city of Pergamum, under the Persian kings of Pergamum, one of whom rebuilt the temple; about 278 B.C. it became the capital of the Tolistobog, one of the three Gallic tribes which founded the Kingdom of Galatia. As early as 201 B.C. the Romans sent an embassy to prosecute the statue which they placed in the temple of Victory on the Palatine, but the cult of the goddess continued. In 180 B.C. the Galli sent an embassy to the consul Manlius, encamped on the banks of the Sangarius, and later Julian the Apostate made a pilgrimage to Pessinus. Under the Romans the city declined. After Constantine it was the metropolis of Galatia Secunda or Salutaris. Ten bishops are known: Demetrius, the friend and defender of St. John Chrysostom, who died as a exile; Pius, present at the Council of Ephesus (431); Theodorus, at Chalcedon (451); Constantine (536); George, about 600; John, at Constantinople (692); Gregory, at Nicæa (787); Eustratus, at Constantinople (879); Nicholas, present at the Council of Constantinople (1054), at which Michael Cerularius proclaimed the rupture with Rome. The author of the "Liber iuxta sacramentum" mention the see until the middle of the 12th century (Chalc. 561). The temple of Cybele and of Æsculapius are at Bala Hisar, nine or ten miles from Sivri Hisar, chief town of the caza of the vilayet of Angora. Some Christian inscriptions have been discovered.

S. PETRIDES.

Pestalozzi and Pestalozianism.—Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi, one of the greatest pioneers of modern education, b. at Zurich, Switzerland, 12 January, 1746; d. at Gruyères, 7 March, 1827. He was born from a Calvinist family and destined to become a preacher. Pestalozzi abandoned this project for the study of law. He was greatly influenced by Rousseau's "Social Contract" and "Emile", and tried to carry into practice some of that author's ideas. He first took up farming at Neuhof (New Farm), but failed through lack of practical talent. He then gathered at Neuhof (1774) waifs and castaways, who were to work in his spinning-mill and to receive in turn some industrial and moral training. Unbusinesslike methods led to financial difficulties and the closing of the establishment in 1780. Evil days then followed for Pestalozzi and his heroic wife who had sacrificed all her property for his schemes; sometimes they lacked bread and fuel, and illness added to their suffering. Sympathizing with the poor peasantry, Pestalozzi developed a plan for elevating their condition through education. In 1781 appeared his "Lienhard und Gertrud", a simple story which shows how a village girl, regarded throughout life as a mere domestic servant, an able magistrate, a zealous teacher, and chiefly through the influence of Gertrude, a perfect wife and mother, who becomes the Good Samaritan of the village. This book, eagerly read wherever German was understood, made its author famous. In 1788 Pestalozzi determined to become a schoolmaster himself. The village of Stanz had been burnt by the French soldiers, and many children wandered about destitute, exposed to physical and moral ruin. Pestalozzi was made the head of an institution at Stanz in which the orphans were to be trained. When, in the following year, the French army needed the building for a hospital, the orphans' school came to a sudden end.

Pestalozzi then opened a school in the Castle of Burgdorf, and there laboured zealously from 1790 to 1801, though hampered by jealousies and misunderstandings. With this institution he connected a normal school, the first in the Protestant cantons of Switzerland; the Catholics already possessed one, in the monastery of St. Urban, Canton of Lucerne. At Burgdorf Pestalozzi wrote "Wie Gertrud ihre Kinder lehrt" (How Gertrude teaches her Children), which, better than any other of his books, explains his educational aims and methods. When sent to Paris as one of the Swiss delegates, he tried to interest the First Consul in his educational work, but Napoleon de-clear that he would not be bothered about questions of A B C. In 1804 Pestalozzi, driven out of the Castle of Burgdorf, transferred his school to Munchenbuechse, and thence to Yverdon. Eager students of pedagogy flocked to Yverdon from Prussia, Russia, France, Italy, Spain, England, and other countries, among the rest from Bavaria, Pestalozzi's native land. But Pestalozzi's lack of organizing talent and discussions among his teaching staff led to the decline and finally to the closing of the establishment (1825).

Pestalozzi's career is almost a puzzle. All his undertakings proved failures, and yet he is the most influential of modern educators. There was nothing attractive about Pestalozzi's personal appearance. He carried few books, possessed neither philosophical penetration nor mastery of method, and entirely lacked talent for organization. A keen observer at Yverdon declared that he would not have been able to conduct successfully a small village school. That, in spite of all these drawbacks, he exerted a profound influence on modern education is due chiefly to his self-sacrificing love for children, and his enthusiasm for educational work. This enthusiasm became an inspiration, almost an infection for all those who came in contact with "Father Pestalozzi," as they affectionately called him. He created a new educational spirit, interest in education, a new school system, namely, love for the children. He himself said that he intended to "psychologize instruction," and he may be called the originator of the modern psychological tendency in education. The foundation of instruction he found in Ausehauung, which has been inadequately rendered in English by "sense-impression" or "observation," and is perhaps better expressed by "intuition." The object lesson is the core of the whole system, and exercises are based more on the study of objects than of words. Pestalozzi's system has been severely criticized by some and extravagantly praised by others; his work is overestimated by those who call him the "father of the elementary school," although it must be admitted that he did much to improve it. Some of his principles involved contradictions, not a few of his methods were one-sided and even unsound; but his ideas, stripped of their eccentricities by his disciples, became prominent features in modern education. Herbart and Froebel supplemented his in the development of psychology of education, the latter by originating the kindergarten system. The school systems of Prussia and other European states embodied many of Pestalozzi's ideas; in England a modified Pestalozianism was carried into practice by Dr. Mayo. Pestalozian ideas were transplanted to America by some of Pestalozzi's pupils, the Abolition Joseph Nef (wrongly called a priest, e.g. in Schmid's "Gesch. der Erz.", V, ii, 350), who opened a school in Philadelphia in 1808, and later taught at New Harmony, Indiana. Horace Mann was influenced by Pestalozzian principles; so was the "Oxygeo Movement," which emphasized the use of objects. The two methods of instruction and greatly determined the character of American normal-school training. "For the most part, so far as principle is concerned, American schools are yet upon the Pestalozzian basis, though the special methods of applying these principles have been much improved" (Monroe, "Hist. of Ed.", 602).

One of the weakest points in Pestalozzi's system was his attitude towards religion. Through the influence of the writings of Rousseau he had lost the strict religious views of his Calvinist family, and, while he still believed in a personal God and Divine Providence, this was a rationalistic and merely natural religion. Although he always spoke of the "ideal of Christian" or "ideal of the Bible," he never attained to a clear recognition of the Divinity of Christ, but remained outside dogmatic Christianity. His disciples are divided into two schools—one rationalistic, led by Duesterweg, the other Christian, which follows Pestalozzian methods of instruction without adopting his religious views. To the latter school belong some prominent Catholic educators, as Bishop Sailer of Ratisbon and Bernard Overbeck, the reformer of education in Westphalia. In dealing with Catholics, and in speaking of things religious, Pestalozzi usually showed much consideration; he never forgot that he had received kind treatment from Catholics at Stanz at a time when he was distrusted by some and ridiculed as a visionary by others. "You will hardly believe," he wrote to a friend, "that it was the Capuchin Friars and the nuns of the Convent that showed the greatest sympathy with my work."

The vast bibliography on Pestalozzi is collected in Israel in Monumenta Germaniae Pedagogica, XX, XXI, XXX, XXXI, Pestalozzi Staethischen Werke, ed., Saur, Leipzig, and in many other places. Many separate editions of Leonard u. Gerhardt, and W. Gerhardt, Pétai, Denis (Dionysius Petavius), one of the most distinguished theologians of the seventeenth century, b. at Orleans, 1583; d. at Paris, 11 December, 1652. He studied first at Orleans, then at Paris, where he successfully defended his theses for the degree of Master of Arts, not in Latin, but in Greek. After this he followed the theological lectures at the Sorbonne, and, on the advice of Vansandt, successfully applied for the chair of philosophy at Bourges. At Paris he became very intimate with Isaac Casaubon (see Letters MXIV, MXVII, MXVIII, MXXVII, MXVII), librarian at the Bibliothèque Royale, where he spent his spare time studying the ancient Greek manuscripts. At Orleans he was ordained deacon and presented with a canonry. After spending two years at Bourges he returned to Paris, and entered into relations with Fronton du Duc, the editor of St. John Chrysostom. In 1605 he became a Jesuit, taught rhetoric at Reims (1606), La Fleche (1613), and at Paris after a short interval. During this last period he began a correspondence with the Bishop of Orleans, Gabriel de Laubópezé (Allaspineus), on the first year of the primitive Church. From 1622 he taught positive theology for twenty-two years. During this time he was about to leave France on two occasions, first to teach theology at Madrid at the invitation of Philip IV (1629), secondly to become a cardinal at Rome where Urban VIII wanted him (1639). At sixty years of age he stopped teaching, but retained his office of librarian, in which he had succeeded Fronton du Duc (1623), and consecrated the rest of his life to his great work, "Dogmata Sacræ Religionis," philosophy and polemics, were not inferior to his talent; he was a model of humility and regularity, and, in spite of his feeble health, practised continual and severe mortifications. His ardent zeal for the Church inspired a rare talent to which his numerous works bear evidence; he devoted himself to the study of the classics; Latin poetry (and to other more erudite forms of learning).

The complete list of his works fills twenty-five columns in Sommervogel; he treats of chronology, history, philosophy, polemics, patristics, and history of dogma. The first edition of the works of Synesius appeared in 1612, undertaken ten years earlier at the request of Cardinal Ascanio Piccolomini (1594, "Hist. of the Church", new ed., 1633); in 1613 and 1614 the discourses of Themistius and Julian (new ed., 1630); in 1616 the "Breviarium historiæ Niephorii"; then, after some poetical and oratorical works, an edition of His was published at "Dogma". Though to nature) many ger's St. 1023 Gretser, St. 1644); Zaccaria, Zockler, and Italian, and have been made. About the same time (1636-44) appeared poetical works in Greek and in Latin and dissertations (often of a polemical nature) against Grotius, Saussaye, Arnauld, etc. His paraphrase of the Psalms in Greek verse was dedicated to Urban VIII (in 1657). Finally there appeared in 1653 the first three volumes of "De dogmata theologica" (dated 1644); the fourth and fifth volumes were published in 1650. The work was incomplete at the death of the author, and, despite several attempts, was never continued. Numerous editions of the "Dogmata theologica" have been published, including that by the Calvinist Jean le Clerc (Clericus, alias Thomas Zockler, Zochler) published at Antwerp (Antwerpen) in 1700; the last edition was brought out in eight volumes by J. B. Fournier (Paris, 1866-8). In 1757 F. A. Zaccaria, S. J., republished the work in Venice with notes, dissertations, etc.; in 1857 Passaglia and Schrader undertook a similar work, but they produced only the first volume. His letters, "Epistolae," were published posthumously in 1857. After his death, though far from being complete, they give an idea of his close acquaintance with the most famous men in France, Holland, Italy, etc.; they also furnish valuable information on the composition of his works and his method.

The reputation Pétan enjoyed during his lifetime was especially due to his work on chronology; numerous eulogies were pronounced on him by his contemporaries, such as Huet, Valois, Grotius, Isaac Voss, F. Clericus, Noris, etc. His chronological work has long since been surpassed, and a list of errors—inevitable at the period—could be drawn up even in the case of this man who boasted that he counted no less than eight theories in the "History of Dogma". The great glory, which in the eyes of posterity surrounds the name of Pétan, is due to his patristic works and his importance in the history of dogma. With good reason he may be styled the "Father of the History of Dogma". The success of his work in this sphere was slow to make itself felt—it brought on the author abundant reproaches even from within his order—but it was highly esteemed by his pupils and far-reaching friends (e.g., H. Valois, Huet, etc.).

To form an opinion of Pétan's work it is necessary to go back to the period in which he wrote. It is far from being perfect and his criticism is more than once at fault. But his merit increases in spite of his shortcomings, when it is remembered that he had at hand only very imperfect editions of the Fathers; he is, altogether, inferior to the great masterpieces of the Benedectines; that many of the known texts only existed in translations, or having been poorly studied manuscripts; that his predecessors in this line were few and practically everything had to be created. What he wanted had already been written, and was waiting to be discovered. It is the fault of his historical polemics.

We pass from theory to practice and we find a master at once. The originality of Pétan's work has been questioned; it may have been inspired, it is said, by a similar treatise of Oregius (d. 1655), as Zockler maintains, or by the "Confessio catholica" of John Gerhard (d. 1627), as conjectured by Eckstein. But the "Confessio catholica" has a quite different aim, as is stated on the very first page; whole treatises, as for instance that on Christ, have but scanty quotations from three or four Fathers of the Church, and present nothing similar to the long historical developments of the sixteen books "De Internationale Verbi" of Pétan. The relationship with Cardinal Ang. Crescini, which results solely on the basis of a religion of the Minimus of Dijon related in the "Voyage littéraire de deux Bénédictins" (Paris, 1717, p. 147), has been examined in detail and completely disposed of by F. Oudin, S. J., in the "Mémoires de Trévoux" (July, 1718, pp. 109-33).

The state of religious strife during the days succeeding the long period of peace from 1715 to 1720, and the rapid translation of the primitive ages of the Church concerning which certain ancient documents were discovered, while the excessive subtlety of many Scholastics of the decadence instigated a return towards positive sources. Pétan was no doubt inspired by the same ideas, but the execution of the work is completely his own. His aim and purpose are set forth by his desideratory letter to the General of the Jesuits (Epist., III, liv), and in several parts of his "Prolegomena" (cf. I, i). His method reveals all the resources which the sciences of history and philosophy have furnished to the theologians. He declares his opinion with full liberty as, e.g., concerning the opinion of St. Augustine on the Ascension, P.S. 1718); Godet and Tumele, Revue d'archegographes, XXIV (1902), 161, 372, 449; Chaillou, Le Père Denis Pétan (Paris, 1870); S. Peter, Saint. Prince of the Apostles.—The life of St. Peter may be conveniently considered under the following heads: I. Until the Ascension of Christ; II. St. Peter in Jerusalem and Palestine after the Ascension; III. Missionary Journeys in the East; The Council of the Apostles; IV. Activity and Death in Rome; Burial-place; V. Feasts of St. Peter; VI. Representations of St. Peter.

I. UNTIL THE ASCENSION OF CHRIST.—The life of St. Peter and his original name was Simon (Simeon), sometimes occurring in the form Simeon (Acts, xv, 14, 11; II Pet., 1); he was the son of Jona (Johannes) and was born in Bethsaida (John, i, 42, 44), a town on Lake Genesareth, the position of which cannot be established with certainty, although it is usually sought at the northern end of the lake. The Apostle Andrew was a native of the same town. Simon settled in Capharnaum, where he was living with his mother-in-law in his own house (Matt., viii, 14; Luke, iv, 38) at the beginning of Christ's public ministry (about A.D. 26-28). Simon was thus married, and, according to Clement of...
Alexandria (Stromata, III, vi, ed. Dindorf, II, 276), had children. The same writer relates the tradition that Peter's wife suffered martyrdom (ibid., VII, xi, ed. cit., III, 396). Concerning these facts, adopted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., XXXI) from Irenæus, the ancient Christian literature which has come down to us is silent. Simon pursued in Capharnaum the profitable occupation of fisherman in Lake Genesaræ, possessing his own boat (Luke, v, 3). Like so many of his Jewish contemporaries, he was attracted by the Baptist's preaching of penance and was, with his brother Andrew, and other discsipies associated in Bethanan on the eastern bank of the Jordan. When, after his trial by the High Council he was sent envoys for the second time to the Baptist, the latter pointed to Jesus who was passing saying, "Behold the Lamb of God", Andrew and another disciple followed the Saviour to his residence and remained with Him one day. Later, meeting his brother Simon, Andrew said, "We have found the Messias", and brought him to Jesus, who, looking upon him, said: "Thou art Simon the son of Jona: thou shalt be called Cephas, which is interpreted Peter". Already, at this first meeting, the Saviour foretold the change of Simon's name to Cephas (Kepher, Aramæic Kiphus, rock), which is translated Ἱησοῦς (Hist., Peteri) proposed that Christ had already special views with regard to Simon. Later, probably at the time of his definitive call to the Apostolate with the eleven other Apostles, Jesus actually gave Simon the name of Cephas (Petrus), after which he was usually called Peter, especially by Christ on the solemn occasion after Peter's profession of faith (Matt., xvi, 18; cf. below). The Evangelists often combine the two names, while St. Paul uses the name Cephas. After the first meeting Peter with the other early disciples remained with Jesus for some time, accompanying Him to Galilee (Marriage at Cana), Judea, and Jerusalem, and through Samaria back to Galilee (John, vii-iv). Here Peter resumed his occupation of fisherman for a short time, but soon received the definitive call of the Saviour to become one of His permanent disciples. Peter and Andrew were engaged at their calling when Jesus met and addressed them: "Come ye after me, and I will make you to be fishers of men". On the same occasion the sons of Zebedee were called (Matt., iv, 18-22; Mark, i, 16-20; Luke, v, 1-11; it is here assumed that Luke refers to the same occasion as the other Evangelists). Thenceforth Peter remained always in the immediate neighbourhood of Our Lord. After preaching the Sermon on the Mount and curing the son of the centurion in Capharnaum, Jesus came to His home and cured his wife's mother, who was sick of a fever (Matt., viii, 14-15; Mark, i, 29-31). A little later Christ chose His Twelve Apostles as His constant associates in preaching the Kingdom of God.

Among the Twelve Peter soon became conspicuous. Though of irreligious character, he clings with the greatest fidelity, firmness of faith, and inward love to the Saviour; rash alike in word and act, he is full of zeal and enthusiasm, though momentarily easily accessible to external influences and intimidated by difficulties. The more prominent the Apostles become in the Evangelical narrative, the more conspicuous does Peter appear as the first among them. In the list of the Twelve on the occasion of their solemn call to the Apostolate, not only does Peter stand always at their head, but the surname Petrus given him by Christ is especially emphasized (Matt., x, 2): "Duo- decim autem Apostolorum nomina habe: Primus Simon qui dicitur Petrus ". Mark, i, 11-16: "Et fecit ac sens duodecim cum illo et multis discepulis suos, et legit duodecim ex epistis (quos et Apostolorum nominant): Simonem, quem cognominavit Petrum ... " On various occasions Peter speaks in the name of the other Apostles (Matt., xv, 15; xiv, 27; Luke, xii, 41, etc.). When Christ's words are addressed to all the Apostles, Peter answers in their name (e.g., Matt., xvi, 16). Frequently the Saviour turns specially to Peter (Matt., xxvi, 40; Luke, xxii, 31, etc.).

Very characteristic is the expression of true fidelity to Jesus, which Peter addressed to Him in the name of the other Apostles. Christ, after He had spoken of the mystery of the reception of His Body and Blood (John, vi, 22 sqq.) and many of His disciples had left Him, asked the Twelve if they too should leave Him; Peter's answer comes immediately: "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life. And we have believed and have known, that thou art the Holy One of God" (Vulg. "thou art the Christ, the Son of God"). Christ Himself unmistakably accords Peter a special precedence and the first place among the Apostles, and designates him for such on various occasions. Peter was one of the three Apostles (with James and John) who were with Christ on certain special occasions—the raising of the daughter of Jairus from the dead (Mark, v, 57; Luke, vii, 31); the Transfiguration of Christ (Matt., xviii, 1; Mark, ix, 1; Luke, ix, 29); the Agony in the Garden of Gethsemani (Matt., xxvi, 37; Mark, xiv, 33). On several occasions also Christ favoured him above all the others; He enters Peter's boat on Lake Genesaræ to preach to the multitude on the shore (Luke, v, 3); when He was miraculously walking upon the waters, He called Peter to come to Him across the lake (Matt., xiv, 28 sqq.); He sent him to the lake to catch the fish in whose mouth Peter found the stater to pay as tribute (Matt., xvii, 24 sqq.).

In especially solemn fashion Christ accentuated Peter's precedence among the Apostles, when, after Peter had recognized Him as the Messias, He promised that he would become the leader of His flock. Jesus was then dwelling with His Apostles in the vicinity of Cesarea Philippi, engaged on His work of salvation. As Christ's coming agreed so little in power and glory with the expectations of the Messias, many different views concerning Him were current. While journeying along with His Apostles, Jesus asks them: "Whom do men say that the Son of man is?" The Apostles answered: "Some John the Baptist, and other some Elias, and others Jeremias, or one of the prophets". Jesus said to them: "But whom do you say that I am?" Simon said: "Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God!" And Jesus answering said to him: "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father who is in heaven. And I say to thee: That thou art Peter [Kiphi], a rock; and upon this rock [Kiphi] I will build my church [Cockyria], and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, it shall be bound also in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven". Then he commanded his disciples, that they should tell no one that he was Jesus the Christ (Matt., xvi, 13-20; Mark, xvi, 17-19; Luke, xix, 18-21).

By the word "rock," the Saviour cannot have meant Himself, but only Peter, as is so much more apparent in Aramaic in which the same word (Kiphi) is used for "Peter" and "rock". His statement then admits of but one explanation, namely, that He wishes to make Peter the head of the whole community of those who believed in Him as the true Messias; that through this foundation Peter the Kingdom of Christ would be built upon, and that the sure foundation of the faithful was placed in the hands of Peter, as the special representative of Christ. This meaning becomes so much the clearer when we remember that the words "bind" and "loose" are not metaphorical, but Jewish juridical terms. It is also clear that the position of Peter among the other Apostles and in the Christian community was the basis for the Kingdom of God on earth, that is, the Church of Christ. Peter was personally installed as Head of the Apostles by Christ Himself. This foundation created for the Church by its Founder could not disappear with the person of Peter, but was intended to continue and did continue (as actual history shows) in the primacy of the Roman Church and its bishops. Entirely inconsistent and in itself untenable is the position of Protestants who (like Schnitzer in recent times) assert that the primacy of the Roman bishops cannot be deduced from the prece- dence which Peter held among the Apostles. Just as the essential activity of the Twelve Apostles in building up and extending the Church completely disappeared after their death, so similarly did the Apostolic Primacy of Peter not completely vanish. As intended by Christ, it must have continued its existence and development in a form appropriate to the ecclesiastical organism, just as the office of the Apostles continued in an appropriate form. Objections have been raised against the genuineness of the wording of the passage, but the unanimous testimony of the manuscripts, the parallel passages in the other Gospels, and the fixed belief of pre-Constantine literature furnish the surest proofs of the genuineness and untempered text of the passage of Matthew (cf., "Stimmen aus Marq.-Land", i, 89, 129 sqq., "Theologe und Glaube", i, 1910, 82-92), Mark, and Luke. Mark's irre- lative character, which continued notwithstanding his enthusiastic fidelity to his Master, was clearly revealed in connexion with the Passion of Christ. The Saviour had already told him that Satan had desired him that he might sift him as wheat. But Christ had prayed for him that his faith fail not, and, being once converted he confirms his brethren (Luke, xxii, 31-32).

Peter's assurance that he was ready to accompany his Master to prison and to death, elicits Christ's prediction that Peter should deny Him (Matt., xxvii, 30-35; Mark, xiv, 26-31; Luke, xxii, 31-33; John, xxi, 30-38). When Christ proceeded to wash the feet of His disciples before the Last Supper, and came first to Peter, the latter at first protested, but, on Christ's declaration that, if he did not, he should have no part with him, immediately said: "Lord, not only my feet, but also my hands and my head" (John, xiii, 1-10). In the Garden of Gethsemani Peter had to submit to the Saviour's reproach that he had slept like the others, while his Master suffered deadly anguish (Mark, xiv, 37).

At the escorted going of Jesus, Peter in an outburst of anger wished to defend him against what was forbidden to do. He at first took to flight with the other Apostles (John, xiii, 11-11; Matt., xxvi, 50), then turning he followed his captured Lord to the courtyard of the High Priest, and there denied Christ, asserting explicitly and swearing that he knew Him not (Matt., xxvi, 70-75; Mark, xiv, 69-72; Luke, xxii, 54-62; John, xvii, 15-27). This denial was of course due, not to a lapse of interior faith in Christ, but to exterior fear and cowardice. His sorrow was thus so much the greater, when, after his Master had turned His gaze towards him, he clearly recognized what he had done. In spite of this weakness, his position as head of the Apostles was later confirmed by Jesus and was accepted by all, less conspicuous after the Resurrection than before.

The women, who were the first to find Christ's tomb empty, received from the angel a special message for Peter (Mark, xvi, 7). To him alone of the Apostles did Christ appear on the first day after the Resurrection (Luke, xxiv, 34; Acts, i, 8). But, most important of all, when He appeared at the Lake of Gennesareth, Christ renewed to Peter His special commission to feed and defend His flock, after Peter had thrice affirmed his special love for His Master (John, xxi, 15-17). In conclusion Christ foretold the violent death Peter would have to suffer, and thus invited him to follow Him in a special manner (ibid., 20-22). Thus was Peter called and trained for the Apostleship and clothed with the primacy of the Apostles, which he exercised in a most unequivocal manner after Christ's Ascension into Heaven.

11. ST. PETER IN JERUSALEM AND PALESTINE AFTER THE ASCENSION.—Our information concerning the career of the Apostle, activity, and influence in the provinces of Judae and the districts stretching northwards as far as Syria, is derived mainly from the first portion of the Acts of the Apostles, and is confirmed by parallel statements incidentally in the Epistles of St. Paul. Among the crowd of Apostles and disciples who, after Christ's Ascension into Heaven from Mount Olivet, returned to Jerusalem to await the fulfilment of His promise to send the Holy Ghost, Peter is immediately conspicuous as the leader of all, and is henceforth constantly recognized as the head of the original Christian community in Jerusalem. He takes the initiative in the appointment to the Apostolic College of another witness of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus to take his place in the Twelve Apostles. Acts 1:21-26. With the Holy Ghost on the feast of Pentecost, Peter standing at the head of the Apostles delivers the first public sermon to proclaim the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, and wins a large number of Jews as converts to the Christian community (ibid., ii, 14-41). First of all, the Apostles he worked a public miracle, when with his name and the name of his Master Peter and John raised a paralytic man at the Beautiful Gate. To the people crowding in amazement about the two Apostles, he preaches a long sermon in the Porch of Solomon, and brings new increase to the flock of believers (ibid., iii, 1-4).

In the subsequent examinations of the two Apostles before the Jewish High Council, Peter defends in un- dismayed and impressive fashion the cause of Jesus and the obligation and liberty of the Apostles to preach the Gospel (ibid., iv, 3-21). When Ananias and Sapphira attempt to deceive the Apostles and the people, Peter appears as judge of their action, and God executes the sentence of punishment passed by the Apostle by causing the sudden death of the two guilty parties (ibid., v, 1-11). By numerous miracles God confirms the Apostolic activity of Christ's confessors, and here also there is special mention of Peter, since it is recorded that the inhabitants of Jerusalem and their neighbours were moved by their sick in their beds into the streets so that the shadow of Peter might fall on them and they might be thereby healed (ibid., v, 12-16). The ever-increasing number of the faithful caused the Jewish supreme council to adopt new measures against the Apostles, but "Peter and the Apostles" answer that they "ought to obey God rather than men" (ibid., v, 29 sqq.). Not only in Jerusalem itself did Peter labour in fulfilling the mission entrusted to him by his Master. He also retained connexion with the other Christian communities in Palestine, and preached the Gospel both there and in the lands situated farther north. When Philip the Deacon had won a large number of believers in Samaria, Peter and John were deputed to proceed thither from Jerusalem to organize the community and to invoke the Holy Ghost to descend upon the faithful. Peter appears a second time as judge, in the case of the magician Simon, who had wished to purchase from the Apostles the power that he also could invoke the Holy Ghost (ibid., viii, 14-25). On their way back to Jerusalem, the two Apostles preached the joyous tidings of the Kingdom of God. Subsequently, after Paul's departure from Jerusalem and conversion before Damascus, the Christian communities in Palestine were left at peace by the Jewish council.

Peter now undertook an extensive missionary tour, which brought him to the maritime cities, Lydda, Joppa, and Cesarea. In Lydda he cured the palsied Tabitha (Dorcas) from the dead; and at Cesarea, instructed by a vision which he had in Joppa, he baptized and received into the Church the first non-Jewish Christians, the centurion Cornelius and his kinsmen (ibid., ix, 31-8, 48). On Peter's return to Jerusalem a little later, the strict Jewish Christians, who regarded the complete observance of the Jewish law as binding on all, asked him why he had entered and eaten in the house of the un circumcised. Peter tells of his vision and defends his action, which was ratified by the Apostles and the faithful in Jerusalem (ibid., xi, 1-18).

A confirmation of the position accorded to Peter by Luke, in the Acts, is afforded by the testimony of St. Paul (Gal., i, 18-20). After his conversion and three years' residence in Arabia, Paul came to Jerusalem "to see Peter". Here the Apostle of the Gentiles clearly designates Peter as the authorized head of the Apostles and of the early Christian Church. Peter's long residence in Jerusalem and Palestine soon came to an end. Herod Agrippa I began (A. D. 42-44) a new persecution of the Church in Jerusalem; after the execution of James, the son of Zebedee, this ruler had Peter cast into prison, intending to have him also executed after the Jewish Passover. But ever, was freed in a miraculous manner, and, proceeding to the house of the mother of John Mark, where many of the faithful were assembled for prayer, informed them of his liberation from the hands of Herod, commissioned them to communicate the fact to James and the brethren, and then left Jerusalem to go to "another place" (Acts, xi, 1-18). Concerning St. Peter's subsequent activity we receive no further connected information from the extant sources, although we possess short notices of certain individual episodes of his later life.

III. Missionary Journeys in the East; Council of the Apostles.—St. Luke does not tell us whether Peter went after his liberation from the prison in Jerusalem. From incidental statements we know that he subsequently made extensive missionary tours in the East, although we are given no clue to the chronology of his journeys. We may suppose that he remained for a time at Antioch; he may even have returned thither several times. The Christian community of Antioch was made up of many Christianized Jews who had been driven from Jerusalem by the persecution (ibid., xi, 19 sqq.). Peter's residence among them is proved by the episode concerning the observance of the Jewish ceremonial law even by Christianized pagans, related by St. Paul (Gal., ii, 11-21). The chief Apostles in Jerusalem—the "pillars", Peter, James, and John—had unreservedly approved St. Paul's Apostolate to the Gentiles, while they themselves intended to labour principally among the Jews. While Paul was dwelling in Antioch, the question of the observance of the Jewish ceremonial law could be scandalized thereat, and his influence with the Jewish Christians be imperilled, avoided thenceforth eating with the un circumcised.

His conduct made a great impression on the other Jewish Christians at Antioch, so that even Barnabas, St. Paul's companion, now avoided eating with the Christianized pagans. As this action was entirely opposed to the principles and practice of Paul, and might lead to confusion among the converted pagans, this Apostle addressed a public reproach to St. Peter, because his conduct seemed to indicate a wish to compel the pagan converts to become Jews and accept circumcision and the Jewish law. The whole matter is another proof of the authoritative position of St. Peter in the early Church, since his example and conduct was regarded as decisive. But Paul, who rightly saw the inconsistency in the conduct of Peter and the Jewish Christians, did not hesitate to defend the imminence of converted pagans from the Jewish Law.
Concerning Peter's subsequent attitude on this question St. Paul gives us no explicit information. But it is highly probable that Peter ratified the contention of the Apostles, the Gentiles, and henceforth conducted himself towards the Christianized pagans as at first. As the principal opponents of his views in this connexion, Paul names and combat in all his writings only the extreme Jewish Christians coming "from James" (i.e., from Jerusalem). While the date of this occurrence, whether before or after the Council of the Apostles, cannot be determined, it probably took place after the council (see below). The later tradition, which existed as early as the end of the second century (Origen, "Hom. vi in Lucam"; Eusebius, "Hist. Eccl." III, xxxvi), that Peter founded the Church of Antioch, indicates the fact that he honoured a long period there, and also perhaps that he dwelt there towards the end of his life and then appointed Eusebus, the first of the line of Antiochian bishops, head of the community. This latter view would best explain the tradition referring the foundation of the Church of Antioch to St. Peter.

It is also probable that Peter pursued his Apostolic labours in various districts of Asia Minor, for it can scarcely be believed that the interval between Peter's liberation from prison and the Council of the Apostles was spent uninterruptedly in one city, whether Antioch, Rome, or elsewhere. And, since he subsequently addressed the first of his Epistles to the faithful in the Provinces of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, and Asia, one may reasonably assume that he had laboured personally or at certain events and at these provosts, devoting himself chiefly to the Diaspora. The Epistle, however, is of a general character, and gives little indication of personal relations with the persons to whom it is addressed. The tradition related by Bishop Dionysius of Corinth (in Eusebius, "Hist. Eccl." II, xxxviii) in his letter to the Roman Church under Pope Sixtus II, that Peter had dwelt in Corinth and planted the Church there, cannot be entirely rejected. Even though the tradition should receive no support from the existence of the "party of Cephas", which Paul mentions among the other divisions of the Church of Corinth (I Cor. i, 12; iii, 22), still Peter's sojourn in Corinth (even in connexion with the planting and government of the Church by Paul) is not impossible. That St. Peter undertook various Apostolic journeys (doubtless about this time, especially when he was no longer permanently residing in Jerusalem) is clearly established by the general remark of St. Paul in I Cor., x, 5, concerning the "rest of the apostles, and the brethren (counsels) of the Lord, and were travelling around in the exercise of their apostleship.

Peter returned occasionally to the original Christian Church of Jerusalem, the guidance of which was entrusted to St. James, the relative of Jesus, after the departure of the Prince of the Apostles (A. D. 42-44). The last mention of St. Peter in the Acts (xxv, 1-29, cf. Gal., ii, 13) is in connexion with the summons of Peter and James, after the death of the latter, to the Apostles on the occasion of such a passing visit. In consequence of the trouble caused by extreme Jewish Christians to Paul and Barnabas at Antioch, the Church of this city sent these two Apostles with other ensouls to Jerusalem to secure a definitive decision concerning the obligations of the converted pagans (see Jewish). In addition to James, Peter and John were then (about A. D. 50-51) in Jerusalem. In the discussion and decision of this important question, Peter naturally exercised a decisive influence. When a great divergence of views had manifested itself in the assembly, Peter spoke the deciding word. Long before the appearance of God's testimony, he had announced the necessity of the introduction of Gentiles and his household, why, therefore, attempt to place the Jewish yoke on the necks of converted pagans? After Paul and Barnabas had related how God had wrought among the Gentiles by them, James, the chief representative of the Jewish Christians, adopted Peter's view and in agreement therewith made proposals which were expressed in an encyclical to the Christianized pagans.

The occurrence in Cесarea and Antioch and the debate at the Council of Jerusalem show clearly Peter's attitude towards the converts from paganism. Like the other eleven original Apostles, he regarded himself as called to preach the Faith in Jesus first among the Jews (Acts, x, 12), so that the chosen people of God might share in the salvation in Christ, promised to them primarily and issuing from their midst. The vision at Joppa and the effusion of the Holy Ghost over the converted pagan Cornelius and his kinsmen determined Peter to admit these forthwith into the community of the faithful, without imposing on them the Jewish Law. During his Apostolic journeys outside Palestine, he recognized in practice the equality of Gentile and Jewish converts, as his original conduct at Antioch proves. His aloofness from the Gentile converts, out of consideration for the Jewish Christians from Jerusalem, was by no means an official recognition of the views of the extreme Judaizers, who were so opposed to St. Paul. This is established clearly and unmistakably by his support of Peter in Jerusalem. Between Peter and Paul there was no dogmatic difference in their conception of salvation for Jewish and Gentile Christians. The recognition of Paul as the Apostle of the Gentiles (Gal., ii, 1-9) was entirely sincere, and excludes all question of a fundamental divergence of views. Peter recognized the converts from paganism as Christian brothers on an equal footing; Jewish and Gentile Christians formed a single Kingdom of Christ.

If therefore Peter devoted the preponderating portion of his Apostolic activity to the Jews, this arose chiefly from practical considerations, and from the position of Israel as the people of God. Peter died on the fourth of the currents of "Petrinism" and "Paulinism" in the early Church is absolutely untenable, and is today entirely rejected by Protestants.

IV. ACTIVITY AND DEATH IN ROME; BURIAL PLACE.

—It is an indisputably established historical fact that St. Peter laboured in Rome during the last portion of his life, and there ended his earthly course by martyrdom. As the duration of his Apostolic activity in the Roman capital, the continuity or otherwise of his residence there, the details and success of his labours, and the chronology of his arrival and death, all these questions are uncertain, and can be solved only on hypotheses more or less well-founded. The essential fact is that Peter died as a witness of the historical foundation of the claim of the Bishops of Rome to the Apostolic Primacy of Peter.

St. Peter's residence and death in Rome are established beyond contention as historical facts by a series of distinct testimonies extending from the end of the first to the end of the second centuries, and issued from several ends of his earthly course by martyrdom. As the place of his death, must have been known in widely extended Christian circles at the end of the first century is clear from the remark introduced into the Gospel of St. John concerning Christ's prophecy that Peter would be bound to Him and would be led whither he would not: "And this he said, signifying by what death he should glorify God" (John, xx, 18-19, see above). Such a remark presupposes in the readers of the Fourth Gospel a knowledge of the death of Peter. St. Peter's First Epistle was written almost undoubtedly from Rome, since the salutation at the end reads: "The church that is in Babylon, elected together with you, salute thee; and so doth also Mark your servant, " not be meant, the reference must be to Rome, the only city which is called Babylon elsewhere in ancient Christian literature (Apoc. xvn. 5, xvn. 10; "Oracula Sibyl.", v. verses 143 and 159, ed. Geffcken, Leipzig, 1902, 111).

From Bishop Papias of Hierapolis and Clement of Alexandria, who both appeal to the testimony of the old presbyters (i.e., the disciples of the Apostles), we learn that Mark wrote his Gospel in Rome at the request of the Roman Christians, who desired a written memorial of the doctrine preached to them by St. Peter and his disciples (Eusebius, "Hist. Ecol.", ii. xvi; iii. xli; vi. xiv); this is confirmed by Irenaeus (Adv. her., iii. i). In connexion with this information concerning the Gospel of St. Mark, Eusebius, relying perhaps on an earlier source, says that Peter described Rome figuratively as Babylon in his First Epistle. Another testimony concerning the martyrdom of Peter and Paul is supplied by Clement of Rome in his Epistle to the Corinthians (written about a. d. 95-97), wherein he says (iv): "Through zeal and cunning the greatest and most righteous supports [of the Church] have suffered persecution and been wraped to death. Let us place before our eyes the good Apostles—St. Peter, who in consequence of unjust zeal, suffered not one or two, but numerous miseries, and, having thus given testimony (μαρτυρίας), has entered the merited place of glory". He then mentions Paul and a number of elect, who were assembled with the others and suffered martyrdom "among us" (i.e. ἡμῖν, i.e., among the Romans, the meaning that the expression also bears in chap. iv). He is speaking undoubtedly, as the whole passage proves, of the Neronian persecution, and thus refers the martyrdom of Peter and Paul to that epoch.

In his letter written at the beginning of the second century (before 117), while being brought to Rome for martyrdom, the venerable Bishop Ignatius of Antioch endeavours by every means to restrain the Roman Christians from disposing for his pardon, remarking: "I issue you no commands, like Peter and Paul: they were Apostles, while I am but a captive" (Ad. Rom., iv). The meaning of this remark must be server of Apostolic tradition, as "the greatest and most ancient church, known by all, founded and organized at Rome by the two most glorious Apostles, Peter and Paul" (Adv. her., III. iii; cf. III. ii). He thus makes use of the universally known and recognized fact of the Apostolic activity of Peter and Paul in Rome, to find therein a proof from tradition against the heretics.

In his "Hypotyposes" (Eusebius, "Hist. Ecol.", iv. xiv), Clement of Alexandria, teacher in the catechetical school of that city from about 190, says on the strength of the tradition of the presbyters: "After Peter had announced the Word of God in Rome and preached the Gospel in the spirit of God, the multitude of hearers requested Mark, who had long accompanied Peter on all his journeys, to write down what the Apostles had preached to them" (see above). Like Irenaeus, Tertullian appeals, in his writings against heretics, to the proof afforded by the Apostolic labours of Peter and Paul in Rome of the truth of ecclesiastical tradition. In "De Preseptione", xxxi, he says: "If thou art near Italy, thou hast Rome where authority is ever within reach. How fortunate is this Church for which the Apostles have poured out their whole teaching with their blood, where Peter has emulated the Passion of the Lord, where Paul was crowned with the death of John" (sod. the Baptist). In "Scorpiones", xv, he also speaks of Peter's crucifixion. The leading argument made against Rome, however, concerns Peter: if Peter was gibbled by another, since he was bound to the cross". As an illustration that it was immaterial with what water baptism is administered, he states in his book ("On Baptism", ch. v) that there is "no difference between that with which John baptized in the Jordan and that with which Peter baptized in the Tiber"; and against Rome he appeals to the testimony of the Roman Christians, "to whom Peter and Paul have bequeathed the Gospel sealed with their blood" (Adv. Marc., IV, v).

The Roman, Caius, who lived in Rome, in the time of Pope Zephyrinus (188-217), wrote in his "Dialogue with Tryphon" (in Eusebius, "Hist. Ecc.", II, xxviii), during the Montanist controversy, against the apocryphal legends of the Apostles. If you go to the Vatican or to the road to Ostia, thou shalt find the trophies of those who have founded this Church!". By the trophies (τηροματα) Eusebius understands the graves of the Apostles, but his view is opposed by modern investigators, who believe that the place of execution is in Italy. For one of Pope, see it is material which opinion is correct, as the testimony retains its full value in either case. At any rate the place of execution and burial of both were close together; St. Peter, who was executed on the Vatican, received also his burial there. Eusebius also refers to "the inscription of the names of Peter and Paul, which have been preserved to this present day in the Basilica there" (i.e. at Rome). There thus existed in Rome an ancient epigraphic memorial commemorating the death of the Apostles. The obscure notice in the Muratorian Fragment ("Lucas optime theolize con

In opposition to this distinct and unanimous testimony of early Christendom, some few Protestant historians have attempted in recent times to set aside the residence and death of Peter at Rome as legendary. These attempts have resulted in complete failure. It was asserted that the tradition concerning Peter's residence is the first origin of the Roman Pontificate, and formed part of the Legend of Simon the Magician, in which Paul is opposed by Peter as a false Apostle under Simon; just as this fight was transplanted to Rome, so also sprang up at an early date the legend of Peter's activity in that capital (thus in Baur, "Paulus", 2nd ed., 215 sqq. followed by Hase and extensively by Duchesne, "Histoire du Christ et du Christianisme", Kiel, 1872). But this hypothesis is proved fundamentally untenable by the whole character and purely local importance of Ebonismus, and is directly refuted by the above genuine and entirely independent testimonies, which are at least as ancient. It has moreover been now entirely abandoned by serious Protestant historians (cf. e.g., Harnack's remarks in "Gesch. der altchristl. Literatur", II, i, 214, n. 21).

A more recent attempt was made by Erbes (Zeitschr. f. Kirchengesch., 1901, pp. 1 sqq., 161 sqq.) to demonstrate that St. Peter was martyred at Jerusalem. He appeals to the apocryphal Acts of St. Peter, in which two Romans, Albinus and Agrippa, are mentioned first of all as martyrs, and identify with the Albinus, Procurator of Judea, and successor of Festus, and Agrippa II, Prince of Galilee, and therefrom concludes that Peter was condemned to death and sacrificed by this procurator at Jerusalem. The untenableness of this hypothesis becomes immediately apparent. The most definite testimony concerning Peter's death in Rome far antedates the apocryphal Acts; besides, never throughout the whole range of Christian antiquity has any city other than Rome been designated the place of martyrdom of Sts. Peter and Paul.

Although the fact of St. Peter's activity and death in Rome is so clearly witnessed, we possess no information regarding the details of his Roman sojourn. The narratives contained in the apocryphal literature of the second century concerning the supposed strife between Peter and Simon Magus belong to the domain of legend. From the already mentioned statements regarding the origin of the Gospel of St. Mark, we conclude that Peter died in the second period in Rome. This conclusion is confirmed by the unanimous voice of tradition which, as early as the second half of the second century, designates the Prince of the Apostles the founder of the Roman Church. It is widely held that Peter paid a first visit to Rome after he had been miraculously liberated from the prison in Jerusalem; that, by "another place", Luke meant Rome, but omitted the name for special reasons. It is not impossible that Peter made a missionary journey to Rome about this time (after 42 A. D.), but such a journey cannot be established with certainty. At any rate, we cannot appeal in support of this theory to the chronological notices in Eusebius ("Chronicon of 354") the notice that Peter died in Rome, and it is impossible to extend back to the chronicles of the third century, they are not old traditions, but the result of calculations on the basis of episcopal lists. Into the Roman list of bishops dating from the second century, there was introduced in the third century (as we learn from Eusebius and the "Chronograph of 354") the notice that Peter died in Rome. But we are unable to trace its origin. This entry consequently affords no ground for the hypothesis of a first visit by St. Peter to Rome after his liberation from prison (about 42). We can therefore admit only the possibility of such an early visit to the capital.

The task of determining the year of St. Peter's death is attended with similar difficulties. In the fourth and even later chronicles of the third, we find two different entries. In the "Chronicle" of Eusebius the thirteenth or fourteenth year of Nero is given as that of the death of Peter and Paul (67-68); this date, accepted by Jerome, is that generally held. The year 67 is also supported by the statement, also accepted by Eusebius, that Nero stesso said with the Emperor Claudius (according to Jerome, in 42), and by the above-mentioned tradition of the twenty-five years' episcopate of Peter (cf. Bartoli, "Sopra l'anno 67, se fosse quello del martirio dei gloriosi Apostoli", Rome, 1868). A different statement is furnished by the "Chronograph of 354" (cf. Duchesne, "Liber Pontificalis", I, 1 sqq.). This refers to St. Peter's death in Rome in the year 60, and his death and that of St. Paul to 55.

Duchesne has shown that the dates in the "Chronograph" were inserted in a list of the popes which contains only their names and the duration of their pontificates, and, then, on the chronological supposition that the year of Christ's death was 29, the year 30 was inserted as the beginning of Peter's pontificate, and his death referred to 55, on the basis of the twenty-five years' pontificate (op. cit., introd., vi sqq.). This date has however been recently defended by Kellner ("Jesus von Nazareth u. seine Apostel im Rahmen der Zeitgeschehent", Ratisbon, 1906; "Tradition geschichtl. Denkmateria", Lehmpfennig, "Legen. der Zeitalter", Bonn, 1909).

Other historians have accepted the year 65 (e.g., Bianchini, in his edition of the "Liber Pontificalis" in P. L., CXXVII, 435 sqq.) or 66 (e.g., Foggini, ST. PETER

RIBERA (SPAGNOLETTO), THE PRADO, MADRID
De Romani h. Petri triumce episcopatu", Florence, 1711; also Tillenolz). Harnack endeavored to establish the year 64 (i.e. the beginning of the Neronian persecution) as that of Peter's death ("Gesch. der altchristl. Lit. bis Euzebios", pt. II, "Die Chorelogie", I, 240 sqq.). This date, which had been already supposed by Caucher, du Pin, and Wieseler, has been accepted by Duchesne (Hist. ancienne de l'eglise, I, 64). Erbes refers St. Peter's death to 22 Feb., 63, St. Paul's to 64 ("Texte u. Untersuchungen", new series, IV, i, Leipzig, 1900, "Die Tode-Stapr der Apostel Petrus u. Paulus u. ihre rom. Denkmaler"). The date of Peter's death is thus not yet decided; the year 64 (i.e. outbreak of the Neronian persecution), and the beginning of 68 (on 9 July Nero fled from Rome and committed suicide) must be left open for the date of his death. The day of his martyrdom is also unknown; 29 June, the accepted day of his feast since the fourth century, cannot be proved to be the day of his death (see below).

Concerning the manner of Peter's death, we possess a tradition—attested to by Tertullian at the end of the second century (see above) and by Origen (in Eusebius, "Hist. Ecle.", II, 1)—that he suffered crucifixion. Origen says: "Peter was crucified at Rome with his head downwards, as he himself desired, to show that his place of consecration may be accepted with great probability the Neronian Gardens on the Vatican, since there, according to Tacitus, were enacted in general the gruesome scenes of the Neronian persecution; and in this district, in the vicinity of the Via Cornelia and at the foot of the Vatican Hills, the Prince of the Apostles found his burial-place. Of this grave (since the word ψευδαρχος was, as already remarked, rightly understood of the tomb) Calixtus already speaks in the third century. For a time the remains of Peter lay with those of Paul in a vault on the Appian Way, at the place ad Catacumbas, where the Church of St. Sebastian (which on its dedication in the fourth century was dedicated to the two Apostles) now stands. The remains had probably been brought thither at the beginning of the Valerian persecution in 258, to protect them from the threatened desecration when the Christian burial-places were confiscated. They were later restored to their former resting-place, and Constantine the Great erected over the grave of St. Peter the foot of the Vatican Hill. This basilica was replaced by the present St. Peter's in the sixteenth century. The vault with the altar built above it (confessio) has been since the fourth century the most highly venerated martyr's shrine in the West. In the substructure of the altar, over the vault which contained the sarcophagus with the remains of St. Peter, a cavity was made. This was closed by a small door in front of the altar. By opening this door the pilgrim could enjoy the great privilege of kneeling directly over the sarcophagus of the Apostle. Keys of this door were given as precious souvenirs. Greek was the language of the martyrologists (see above).

The memory of St. Peter is also closely associated with the Catacomb of St. Priscilla on the Via Salaria. According to a tradition, current in later Christian antiquity, St. Peter here instructed the faithful and administered baptism. This tradition seems to have been based on still earlier monumental testimony. The catacomb is situated under the garden of a villa of the ancient Christian and senatorial family, the Aelii Galbronae, and its foundation extends back to the end of the first century; and since Aelius Galbro (q. v.), consul in 91, was condemned to death under Domitian as a Christian, it is quite possible that the Christian faith of the family extended back to that time; and that the ashes of the Apostles had been given hospitable reception in their house during his residence at Rome. The relations between Peter and Paul, whose house stood on the site of the present titular church of Paulus (now Santa Pudenziana) seem to rest rather on a legend.

Concerning the Epistles of St. Peter, see Peter, EPISTLES OF SAINT, concerning the various apocrypha bearing the name of Peter, especially the Apocalypse and the Gospel of St. Peter, see APOCRYPHA. The apocryphal sermon of Peter (σεβαστήριον), dating from the second half of the second century, was probably a collection of supposed sermons by the Apostle; several fragments are preserved by Clement of Alexandria (cf. Dobschütz, "Das Kerygma Petri kritisch untersucht" in "Texte u. Untersuchungen", XI, 3, Leipzig, 1893).

V. FEASTS OF ST. PETER.—As early as the fourth century a feast was celebrated in memory of Sts. Peter and Paul on the same day, although the day was not the same in the East as in Rome. The Syrian Martyrology of the end of the fourth century, which is an excerpt from a Greek catalogue of saints from Asia Minor, gives the following feasts in connexion with Christmas (25 Dec.): 26 Dec., St. Stephen; 27 Dec., Sts. James and John; 28 Dec., Sts. Peter and Paul. In St. Gregory of Nyssa's panegyric on St. Basil we are also informed that these feasts of the Apostles were immediately after St. Stephen. The Armenians celebrated the feast also on 27 Dec.; the Nestorians on the second Friday after the Epiphany. It is evident that 28 (27 Dec. was, like 26 Dec. for St. Stephen) arbitrarily selected, no tradition concerning the date of the saints' death being forthcoming. The chief feast of St. Peter and Paul was kept in Rome on 29 June as early as the third or fourth century. The list of feasts of the martyrs in the Chronograph of Philocalus appends this notice to the date: "III, Kal. Jul. Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostienae Tusco et Basso Coss. (= the year 258). The "Martyrologium Hieronymianum" has, in the Berne MS., the following notice for 29 June: "Rom. via Aurelia natali sanctorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, Petri in Vaticano, Pauli in via Ostiensis, utrumque in catacumbas, passi sub Nerone, Basso et Tusco consulibus" (ed. de Rossi—Duchesne, 84).

The date 258 in the notices shows that from this year the memory of the two Apostles was celebrated on 29 June in the Via Appia ad Catacumbas (near what is known as the basilica of San Sebastiano fuori le mura), because on this date the remains of the Apostles were translated thither (see above). Later, perhaps on the building of the church over the graves on the Vatican and in the Via Ostiensis, the remains were restored to their former resting-place: Peter's to the Vatican, and Paul's to the church on the Via Ostiensis. In the place ad Catacumbas a church was built also as early as the fourth century in honour of the two Apostles. From 258 their principal feast was kept on 29 June, on which date solemn Divine Service was held in the above-mentioned three churches from ancient times (Duchesne, "Origines du culte chrétien", 5th ed., Paris, 1900, 27 sqq.; Urban, "Ein Martyrologium der christl. Gemeinde zu Rom an Anfang des 5. Jahrh.", Leipzig, 1901, 169 sqq.; Kellner, "Heortologie", 3rd ed., Freiburg, 1911, 210 sqq.).

Legend sought to explain the temporary occupation by the Apostles of the grave ad Catacumbas by supposing that, after their death, the Oriental Christians wished to steal their bodies and bring them to the East. This whole story is evidently a product of popular legend. (Concerning the Feast of the Chair of Peter, see CHAIR OF PETER.

A third Roman feast of the Apostles takes place on 1 August: the feast of St. Peter's Chair. This feast was originally the dedication feast of the church of the Apostle, erected on the Esquiline Hill in the fourth century. A titular priest of the church, Philipus, was papal legate at the Council of Ephesus in 431. The church was rebuilt by Sixtus III (432-40) at the expense of the Byzantine imperial family. Either the solemn consecration took place on 1 August, or the day of dedication of the earlier church. Perhaps this day was selected to replace the heathen festivities which took place on 1 August. In this church, which is still standing (S. Pietro in Vincoli), were probably preserved from the fourth century St. Peter’s chains, which were greatly venerated, small filigree chains from the chains being regarded as precious relics. The day of dedication of the early church was called the feast in Vincoli, and the feast of 1 August became the feast of St. Peter’s Chains (Du Lcchesne, op. cit., 285 sqq.; Kellner, loc. cit., 216 sqq.). The memory of both Peter and Paul was later associated also with two places of ancient Rome: the Via Sacra, outside the Forum, where the magician Simon was said to have appeared, and the Church of Peter in Chains, the prison Tullianum, or Carcer Mamertinus, where the Apostles were supposed to have been kept until their execution. At both these places, also, shrines of the Apostles were erected, and that of the Mamertine Prison still remains in almost its original form from the early Roman time. These local commemorations of the Apostles are based on legends, and no special celebrations are held in the two churches. It is, however, not impossible that Peter and Paul were actually confined in the chief prison in Rome at the fort of the Capitol, of which the present Carcer Mamertinus is a remnant.

REPRESENTATIONS OF ST. PETER.—The oldest extant is the bronze medallion with the heads of the Apostles: this dates from the end of the second or the beginning of the third century, and is preserved in the Christian Museum of the Vatican Library. Peter has a strong, roundish head, prominent jaw-bones, a receding forehead, thick, curly hair and beard. (See illustration in Christian Museum.) The features are so individual that it partsakes of the nature of a portrait. This medallion is also found in two representations of St. Peter in a chamber of the Catacomb of Peter and Marcellinus, dating from the second half of the third century (Wilpert, “Die Maleerei der Katakomben Rom”, plates 91 and 91a). In the paintings of the catacombs Sts. Peter and Paul frequently appear as interceders and advocates for the dead in the representations of the Last Judgment (Wilpert, 330 sqq.), and as introducing an Oracle (praying figure representing the dead) into Paradise.

In the numerous representations of Christ in the midst of His Apostles, which occur in the paintings and relief carvings of the catacombs, Peter and Paul always occupy the places of honour on the right and left of the Saviour. In the mosaics of the Roman basilicas, dating from the fourth to the ninth centuries, Christ appears as the central figure, with Sts. Peter and Paul on His right and left, and besides these the saints especially venerated in the particular church. On sarcophagi and other memorials appear scenes from the life of St. Peter: his baptism on Lake Genesareth, when Christ summoned him from the boat; the prophecy of his denial; the washing of his feet; the raising of Tabitha from the dead; the capture of Peter and the conducting of him to the place of execution. On two gilt glasses he is represented as Moses drawing water from the rock with his staff; the name Peter under the scene shows that he is regarded as the guide of the people of God in the New Testament.

Particularly frequent in the period between the fourth and sixth centuries is the scene of the delivery of the Law to Peter, which occurs on various kinds of marbles and mosaic floors of St. Peter’s, on the scroll, on which is often the inscription Lex Domini (Law of the Lord) or Dominus legem dat (The Lord gives the law). In the museum of Constantina at Rome, S. Costanza, in the Via Nomentana) this scene is given as a pendant to the delivery of the Law to Moses. In representations on fifth-century sarcophagi the Lord presents to Peter (instead of the scroll) the keys. In carvings of the fourth century Peter is often shown with a staff, in the fifth century, a cross with a long shaft, carried by the Apostle on his shoulder), as a kind of sceptre indicative of Peter’s office. From the end of the sixth century this is replaced by the keys (usually two, but sometimes three), which henceforth became the attribute of Peter. Even the renowned and greatly venerated bronze pavement in St. Peter’s, one of the best known representations of the Apostle, dates from the last period of Christian antiquity (Grisar, “Analecta Romana”, I, Rome, 1899, 627 sqq.).

of the Apostles, had such close relations with Peter, is called by the author "my son" (v. 13); the author is represented as the immediate disciple of Jesus Christ (1 Pet. 1:11); he exercised from Rome a universal jurisdiction over the whole Church (v. 1). The numerous places in which he would appear to be the immediate witness of the life of Christ (i. 8; ii. 21-24; v. 1), as well as the similarity between his ideas and the teaching of the Gospels, are eloquently Finally, some authors consider that the Epistle and the sermons of St. Peter related in the Acts show an analogy in basis and form which proves a common origin. However, it is probable that certain of the Apostle made use of an interpreter, especially of Sylvania:
St. Jerome says: "The two Epistles attributed to St. Peter differ in style, character, and the construction of the words, which proves that according to the exigencies of the moment St. Peter made use of different interpreters" (Ep. cxx ad Heidib.). Peter himself seems to insinuate this: Δια Συναντομ άμα, ἐστα, ἔγραφα (v. 12), and the final verses (12-14) seem to have been added by the Apostle himself. Without denying that Peter was able to use and speak Greek, some authors consider that the Epistles written by Peter have been almost entirely written in the classic manner of this Epistle. Nevertheless it is impossible to determine exactly the share of Sylvania; it is not improbable that he wrote it according to the directions of the Apostle, inserting the ideas and exhortations suggested by him.

The controversy between the First Epistle of Peter and the Epistles of Paul, especially Romans and Ephesians, does not prove, as has been claimed (Jülicher), that the Epistle was written by a disciple of Paul. This relation, which has been much exaggerated by some critics, does not prove a literary dependence but only the simultaneous inspiration of the two.

Some resemblance is readily explained if we admit that Peter employed Sylvania as interpreter, for the latter had been a companion of Paul, and would consequently have felt the influence of his doctrine and manner of speaking. Moreover, Peter and Sylvania were at Rome, where the letter was written, and they would naturally have become acquainted with the Epistles to the Romans and the Ephesians, written some months before and intended, at least in part, for the same readers. (b) It has been claimed that the Epistle presupposes an official and general persecution in the Roman Empire and betokens a state of things corresponding to the reign of Vespasian, or even that of Nero. But the data it contains are so indefinite that it refers to one of these persecutions rather than to that of Nero; besides, some authors consider that the Epistle does not at all suppose an official persecution, the allusions being readily explained by the countless difficulties and annoyances to which Jews and pagans subjected the Christians.

2. Recipients of the Epistle: Occasion and Object. It was written to the faithful of "Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia" (i. 1). Were these Christians converted Jews, dispersed among the Gentiles (i. 1), as was held by Origens, Didymus of Alexandria, etc., and is still maintained by Weiss and Kühle, or were they in great part of pagan origin? The latter is by far the more common and the better opinion (i. 14; ii. 9-10; iii. 6; iv. 3). The argument based on i. 7, proves nothing, while the words "to the strangers dispersed through Pontus" should not be taken in the literal sense of Jews in exile, but in the metaphorical sense of the people of God, Christians, living in exile on earth, far from their true country. The latter is by far the more common and the better opinion (i. 14; ii. 9-10; iii. 6; iv. 3). The argument based on i. 7, proves nothing, while the words "to the strangers dispersed through Pontus" should not be taken in the literal sense of Jews in exile, but in the metaphorical sense of the people of God, Christians, living in exile on earth, far from their true country. The latter is by far the more common and the better opinion. Many authorities admitting the authenticity are divided with regard to the historical circumstances which occasioned the Epistle, some believing that it was written immediately after Nero's decree proscribing the Christian religion, in which case the difficulties to which

Peter alludes do not consist merely of the calumnies and vexations of the people, but also include the judicial pursuit and condemnation of Christians (iv. 16-18; v. 12; 25; iii. 7); while iv. 12, may be an allusion to the burning of Rachel which was the occasion of Nero's decree. This is the opinion of Hug, Gloor, Buttlifl, Neander, Grimm, Ewald, Allard, Weiss, Callewaert, etc., while others date the Epistle from the eye of that decree (Jacquier, Brassac, Fillion, etc.). The Epistle, they say, having been written from Rome, where the persecution must have raged in all its horror, we naturally look for clear and indisputable indications of it, but the general theme of the Epistle is that the Christians should give no occasion to the charges of the infidels, but that by their exemplary life they should induce them to glorify God (ii. 12, 13; iii. 9, 10; iv. 4); besides, the way of speaking is generally hypothetical (i. 6; iii. 13-14; iv. 11), there being no question of judges, tribunals, prison, tortures, or confiscation. The Christians have to suffer, not from authority, but from the people among whom they lived.

The Apostle Peter wrote to the Christians of Asia to confirm them in the faith, to console them amid their tribulations by exhorting them to a life of conduct to follow in suffering (v. 2). Except for the more dogmatic introduction (i. 3-12) and a few short instructions strewn throughout the letter and intended to support moral exhortations, the Epistle is hortatory and practical. Only an absurd priori argument could deny that Peter, having in mind that it had a dogmatic object and was written by a second-century forger with the intention of attributing to Peter the doctrines of Paul.

C. Place and Date of Composition.—The critics who have denied Peter's sojourn at Rome most necessarily deny that the letter was written from there, but the general weight of opinion is that it was written at Rome itself, designated by the metaphorical name Babylon (v. 13). This interpretation has been accepted from the most remote times, and indeed no other metaphor could so well describe the city of Rome, rich and luxurious as it was, and given over to the worship of false gods and every species of immorality. Both cities had caused trouble to the people of God, Babylon to the Jews, and Rome to the Christians. Moreover this metaphor was in use among the early Christians (cf. Apoc. xiv, 8, iv. 19; xvii. 3, 5, xviii. 2, 10, 21). Finally, tradition has not brought us the faintest memory of any sojourn of Peter at Babylon. This is confirmed by the undoubted unity of the Epistle, the Epistle range from a. d. 50 to a. d. 100 as the date, but as there is not the slightest doubt of its authenticity they have no basis for their argument. Equally diverse opinions are found among the authors who admit the authenticity, ranging from the year a. d. 43 to that accepted as that of the death of Peter. The most probable opinion is that which places it about the end of the year 63 or the beginning of 64; and St. Peter having suffered martyrdom at Rome in 64 (67) the Epistle could not be subsequent to that date; besides, it assumes that the persecution of Nero, which began about the end of 61, had not yet broken out (see above). On the other hand the author frequently alludes to the Epistle to the Ephesians, making use of its very words and expressions; consequently the Epistle could not be prior to 63, since the Epistle to the Ephesians was written at the end of Peter's first captivity at Rome (61-63).

D. Analysis.—The Epistle as a whole but a succession of general ideas without clearly defined topic or theme can be no more than a collection of reflections. It is divided as follows: the introduction contains, besides the address (superscription and sublation, i. 7), thanksgiving to God for the excellence of the salvation and regeneration to which He has deigned to call the Christians (3-12). This part is dogmatic and serves as a basis for all the moral exhortations in the body of the Epistle. The body of the Epistle may be divided into three sections: (a) exhortation to a truly Christian life (i. 13-ii. 10), wherein Peter successively exHORTS his readers to holiness in general (1. 9-21), to fraternal charity in particular (i. 22-ii. 1), to the renewal, and defense of the true doctrine; thus they shall be living stones in the spiritual house of which Christ is the cornerstone, they shall be the royal priesthood and the chosen people of the Lord (2. 9-10). (b) Rules for conduct for Christians living among pagans, especially in time of persecution (i. 11-v. 19). Let their conduct be such that the infidels themselves shall be edified and cease to speak evil of the Christians (11. 12). This general principle is applied in detail in the exhortations relating to obedience to civil rulers (13. 17), the duties of slaves to their masters (18. 25), the mutual duties of husband and wife (iii. 1-7). With regard to those who, not having the same faith, calumniate and persecute the Christians, the latter should return good for evil, according to the example of Christ, who though innocent suffered for us, and who preached the Gospel not only to the living, but also to the spirits that were in prison (5. 22). The Apostle concludes by repeating his exhortation to sanctity in general (v. 1-6), to charity (1. 7-11), to patience and prudence (1. 12-19). Some of the special recommendations follow (v. 11-11): let the ancients be careful to feed the flock entrusted to their keeping (1. 4); let the faithful be subject to their pastor (5a); let all observe humility among themselves (5b); let them be sober and watchful, trusting the Lord (6. 11). In the epilogue the Apostle himself declares that he has written this letter to the readers as a basis to write the Divine grace possessed by his readers is the true grace (12); he addresses them to the salutations of the Church in Rome and those of Mark (13), and gives them his Apostolic blessing.

Second Epistle.—A. Authenticity.—In the present state of our controversy over the authenticity it must be affirmed that it is as solidly probable, though it is more difficult to prove with certainty. (1) External arguments.—(a) In the first two centuries there is not in the Apostolic Fathers and other ecclesiastical writers, if we except Theophilus of Antioch (180), a single quotation properly so called from this Epistle; at most there are some doubtful passages in which, e.g., the First Epistle of St. Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, the "Didache", St. Ignatius, the Epistle of Barnabas, the "Pastor" of Hermas, the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, the Dialogue of St. Justin with Trypho, St. Irenaeus, the Clementine "Recognitions", the "Acts of Peter", etc. The Epistle figured prominently among the "Apocryphal" writings of the second century, but it does not in itself possess any mark of ardent character, such as the New Testament portrays St. Peter, while a comparison with the ideas, words, and expressions of the First Epistle affords a further argument in favour of the identity of the author. Such, at least, is the opinion of several critics. Hence examining the difficulties raised against the authenticity of the Epistle, the following facts should be remembered: (a) This Epistle has been wrongly accused of being imbued with Hellenism, from which it is even further removed than the writings of Luke and the Epistles of Paul. (b) Likewise the false doctrines which it opposes are not the full-blown Gnosticism of the second century, but it does not in itself possess any mark of ardent character, such as the New Testament portrays St. Peter, while a comparison with the ideas, words, and expressions of the First Epistle affords a further argument in favour of the identity of the author. difficulty only to those who do not admit the possibility of a revelation made to Peter on this point. Some authors have also wrongly contested the unity of the Epistle, and some transplanting of the leaves of the codex epistles, the second beginning with ch. iii, others maintaining that the ii, i–iii, 2, has been interpolated. Recently M. Ladeuze (Revue Biblique, 1905) has advanced an hypothesis which seems to end numerous difficulties: by an involuntary error of a copist or by accidental transplanting of the leaves of the codex on which the Epistle was written, one of the parts of the Epistle was transposed, and according to the order of sections the letter should be restored as follows: i–ii, 3a; iii, 1–16; ii, 3b–22; iii, 17–18. The hypothesis seems very probable.

The letters of II Peter with the Epistles of Jude. This hypothesis has so much in common with that of Jude that the author of one must have had the other before him. There is no agreement on the question of priority, but the most credited opinion is that Peter depends on Jude (q. v.).

B. Recipients, Occasion, and Object.—It is believed that this Epistle, like the First, was sent to the Christians of Asia Minor. The majority of whom were Gentiles (iii, 1–2; ii, 11–12; etc.). False teachers (ii, 1), heretics and deceivers (iii, 3), of corrupt morals (ii, 1) and denying the Second Advent of Christ and the end of the world, sought to corrupt the faith and the conduct of the Christians of Asia Minor. Peter exhorts to exert all their practice of virtue and chiefly to turn them away from the errors and bad example of the false teachers.

C. Date and Place of Composition.—While those who reject the authenticity of the Epistle place it about 150, the advocates of its authenticity maintain that it was written after 65–1, the date of the First Epistle, and before 65–3, the date believed to be that of the death of St. Peter (i, 14). Like the First, it was written at Rome.

D. Analysis.—In the exordium the Apostle, after the subscription and salutation (i, 1–2), recalls the magnificent gifts bestowed by Jesus Christ on the faithful; he exhorts them to the practice of virtue and all the more earnestly that he is convinced that his death is approaching (3–15). In the body of the Epistle (i, 16–

Peter, Sarah, philanthropist, b. at Chillicothe, Ohio, U. S. A., 10 May, 1800; d. at Cincinnati, 6 Feb., 1877. Her father, Thomas Worthington, was Governor of Ohio, 1814–18, and also served in the United States Senate. On 15 May, 1816, she married Edward King, son of King Peter, who died 6 Feb., 1836; and in October, 1814, she married William Peter, British consul at Philadelphia, who died 6 Feb., 1853. During her residence at Philadelphia she founded, 2 Dec., 1850, the School of Design for Women. Returning to Cincinnati she spent most of her remaining years as a patron of art, and in works of charity and public charities. The city of Cincinnati has a memorial hall at Rome in March, 1855, being instructed there by Mgr Mermallod. The foundations of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, the Sisters of Mercy, the Little Sisters of the Poor in Cincinnati, and other institutions owed much to her generosity. In 1862 she volun-teeried as a nurse, and went with the sisters who followed Grant's army on the south-west after the battle of Pittsburg Landing.

Peter Baptist and Twenty-five Companions, Saints, d. at Nagasaki, 5 Feb., 1597. In 1593 while negotiations were pending between the Emperor of Spain and the Governor of the Philippine Islands, the father sent Peter Baptist and several Jesuits to those islands as his ambassadors to Japan. They were well received by the emperor, and were able to establish convents, schools, and hospitals, and effect many conversions. When on 20 Oct., 1596, a Spanish vessel of war, the "San Felipe," was stranded on the isle of Tosa, it became, according to Japanese custom, the property of the emperor. The captain was foolish enough to extol the power of his king, and that the missionaries had been sent to prepare for the conquest of the country. The emperor became furious, and on 9 Dec., 1596, ordered the missionaries to be imprisoned. On 5 Feb., 1597, six friars belonging to the First Order of St. Francis (Peter Baptist, a native of France; Francis Blanco, priests; Philip of Jesus, cleric; Consalvo Garzia, Francis of St. Michael, laybrothers); three Japanese Jesuits (Paul Miki, John Goto, James Kisai) and seventeen native Franciscan Tertiaries were crucified. They were beheaded 14 Sept., 1627, at the Urban VIII, and canonized 8 June, 1862, by Pius IX.

Peterborough Abbey, Beneﬁcentine monastery in Northamptonshire, England, known at ﬁrst as Mereshamstede, was founded about 654 by Peada, King of the Mercians, who appointed as ﬁrst abbot, Saxulf. Peada's church and monastery were completely destroyed by the Danes in 870. The circumstantial account of the latter event given in Maunsel’s ‘History of Midlands, but the fact of the abbey's destruction is certain. In 970, in the monastic revival associated with the name of St. Dunstan, the monastery was rebuilt through the efforts of Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, with the aid of King Edgar. Part of the foundations were laid bare in 1887, when the central tower of the present cathedral or cathedral church and its transepts seem to have been about half those of the present building. The abbey suffered both from ﬁre and pilage in the unsettled period preceding the Norman conquest, and in 1146 during the abbacy of Dom John of Suis a great conflagration destroyed the monastic buildings with the little town that had grown up around them. The work of rebuilding, begun by Abbot John, ceased at his death, in 1125. Martin de Bec, successor of Abbot Henry of Anjou, pushed the work forward, and the presbytery of the new church was ﬁnished and entered upon by the monks about 1140. The work of building went on steadily until 1257, when the completed church was consecrated by Bishop Horsley. When the monastery was surrendered to King Henry VIII in 1541 the church was spared from destruction, because it contained the remains of his ﬁrst wife. It then became the cathedral of the new Diocese of Peterborough, and the last abbot, John Chambers, was rewarded for his compliance with the royal demands by becoming bishop. This he was. The new bishopial see was begun during the Norman period, a considerable portion belongs to the thirteenth century. This is true in particular of the glorious west front, which Ferguson and Freeman agree in calling the grandest and most original in Europe. It consists of three huge arches, supported on triangular columns and enriched with a number of delicate shafts, which open into a long marlyt or portico, extending the whole width of the building. The interior has a nave of eleven bays (22 ft.), with transepts and presbytery terminating in a circular apse. The original ambulatory, round the east end, was replaced in the late fifteenth century by a square ambulatory of great delicacy in the Perpendicular style. The total interior length is 126 ft., interior height 78 ft., length of transepts 185 ft. Much controversy has been aroused over the rebuilding of the central tower and the restoration of the west front, but both these works were inevitable and have been carried out with the greatest care for the designs of the original architects.

Peterborough, Diocese of (Peterboroughensis), in the Province of Ontario, Canada, comprises the Counties of Peterborough, Northumberland, Durham, and Victoria, with the Districts of Muskoka and Parry Sound. It was erected by Leo XIII, 11 July, 1882, by detaching the four former counties from the Diocese of Kingston and uniting them with the Vicariate of Northern Canada, which then included the Districts of Parry Sound, Algoma, and Thunder Bay. Rt. Rev. John Francis Jamot, at that time Vicar Apostolic of Northern Canada, was appointed ﬁrst bishop. The new diocese then extended about 1110 miles from south-east to north-west, and its southern limit reached to Lakes Superior and Huron, the Georgian Bay, and a part of Lake Ontario. Bishop Jamot was born in France in 1828, and came to the Diocese of Toronto in 1853. After serving in various parishes for several years he was transferred to St. Michael's Cathedral, Toronto, and appointed chancellor and vicar-general of the diocese. In 1871 he was appointed Bishop of Sorepta and Vicar Apostolic of Northern Canada, where he displayed zeal and energy in seeking out the Catholics of his extensive diocese. When in 1882 the Diocese of Peterborough was formed the total Catholic population was about 30,000, of whom 5000 were Indians, with 47 churches and 25 priests, of whom 11 were Jesuits attending the western part of the diocese and the Indian Missions. After the erection of the Diocese of Peterborough in 1882 Bishop Jamot moved his see from Bracebridge to the city of Peterborough, where he died 4 May, 1886. Rt. Rev. Thomas Joseph Dowling, then Vicar General of the Diocese of Hamilton, succeeded him and was consecrated 1 May, 1887. He continued the many good works of his predecessor and after two years was transferred to the Diocese of Hamilton. The third bishop, Rt. Rev. Richard Alphonse O'Connell, was consecrated 1 May, 1888. He was born at Liscomb, Co. Kerry, Ireland, 15 April, 1839. He came to Canada in 1841 with his parents, and settled at Toronto. He was one of the first students in St. Michael's College, Toronto, and made his theological course in the Grand Seminar, Montreal. On 2 August, 1861, he was ordained priest in St. Michael's Cathedral, Toronto, and, after serving in the Diocese of Hamilton for 18 years as Dean of Barrie, he was appointed Bishop of Peterborough by Leo XIII, 11 Jan., 1889.

During the administration of Bishop O'Connell the western part of the diocese increased rapidly in population, and, that religion might keep pace with the material progress of the country, many churches and schools were built. On account of the large inﬂux of settlers into New Ontario, which embraced the western part of the Diocese of Peterborough, and the development of that district in agriculture, commerce, mining, and manufacturing industries, a brief dated 11 Nov., 1904, of Pius X constituted the new Diocese of Algoma, consisting of the former Diocese of Peterborough the western part of the District of Nipissing, with the Districts of Algoma and Thunder Bay. There was then a population of 27,000 Catholics, with 35 priests and 64 churches, in the new Diocese of Sault Ste Marie; and 24,000 Catholics, with 29 priests and 45 churches, in the portion left to Peterborough. The city of Peterborough has a population of about 50,000, about one-fourth of whom are Catholics, with two churches, one hospital, one House of Providence, an orphanage, and the largest total abstinence society in Canada, numbering over 10,000 men. In the diocese are many Catholic schools, conducted chiefly by the Sisters of St. Joseph, who have a motherhouse and the charge of the hospitals, House of Providence, and orphanage. They also conduct a select academy at Lindsay, besides directing the day school for girls. In Peterborough there are three large schools, with 19 teachers, 17 of whom are Sisters of St. Joseph. At present the Catholic population of the diocese is about 26,000, with 29 secular priests, 3 Jesuit Fathers, 50 churches, 2 hospitals, one House of Providence, and one orphanage.

Peter Canisius (Kannem, Kans, probably also de Hondt), Blessed, b. at Nimvegen in the Netherlands, 8 May, 1521; d. in Trierburg, 21 November, 1597. His father was the wealthy burgomaster, Jacob Caninus; his mother, Agatha van Houweningen, died shortly after Peter’s birth. In 1522, he entered the University of Leuven, where he studied law, civil law, and theology at the university; he spent a part of 1539 at the University of Louvain, and in 1540 received the degree of Master of Arts at Cologne. Nicolaus van Esche was his spiritual advisor, and he was on terms of friendship with such staunch Catholics as Georg of Stolzburg (the expelled Archbishop of Lund), Johann Gropper (minister of the cathedral), Eberhard Billicke (the Carmelite monk), Justus Luspergus, and other Carthusian monks. Although his father desired him to marry a wealthy young woman, on 25 February, 1540 he pledged himself to celibacy. In 1543 he visited Peter Faber and, having gained the Spiritual Exercises under Ignatius of Loyola, was accepted into the Society of Jesus at Mainz, on 8 May. With the help of Leonard Kessel and others, Caninus, labouring under great difficulties, founded at Cologne the first German house of the order; at the same time he preached in the city and vicinity, and taught in the university. In 1546 he was appointed to the preceptorship, and soon afterwards was sent by the clergy and university to obtain assistance from Emperor Charles V, the nuncio, and the clergy of Liège against the apostate Archbishop, Hermann von Wied, who had attempted to pervert the diocese. In 1547, as the theologian of Cardinal Otto of Preussen von Waldeck, Bishop of Augsburg, he participated in the general ecclesiastical council (which sat first at Trent and then at Bologna), and spoke twice in the congregation of the theologians. After this he spent several months under the direction of Ignatius in Rome. In 1548 he taught rhetoric at Messina, Italy, preaching in Italian and Latin. At this time Duke William V of Bavaria requested Paul IV to send some professors from the Society of Jesus for the University of Ingolstadt; Caninus was among those selected.

On 7 September, 1549, he made his solemn profession as Jesuit at Rome, in the presence of the founder of the order. On his journey northward he received, at Bologna, the degree of doctor of theology. On 13 November, accompanied by Fathers Jans and Salmoer, he reached Ingolstadt, where he taught theology, catechized, and preached. In 1550 he was elected rector of the university, and in 1552 saw the new college in Vienna; there he also taught theology in the university, preached at the Cathedral of St. Stephen, and at the court of Ferdinand I, and was confessor at the hospital and prison. During Lent, 1553 he visited many abandoned parishes in Lower Austria, preaching and administering the sacraments. The king’s eldest son (later Maximilian II) had appointed to the office of court preacher, Dr. Colloke, a learned Lutheran, to refute the Lutheran doctrine. Caninus warned Ferdinand I, verbally and in writing, and opposed Plauer in public disputations. Maximilian was obligated to dismiss Plauer and, on this account, the rest of his life he harboured a grudge against Caninus. Ferdinand three times offered him the Bishopric of Vienna, but he refused. In 1557 Julius III appointed him administrator of the bishopric for one year, but Caninus succeeded in making himself of this burden (cf. N. Paulus, Dr. Caninis pro Katholische Theologie, XXVII, 7-12). In 1555 he was present at the Diet of Augsburg with Ferdinand, and in 1555-56 he preached in the cathedral of Prague. After long negotiations and preparations he was able to open Jesuit colleges at Ingolstadt and Prague. In the same year Ignatius appointed him first provincial of Upper Germany (Saxony, Bohemia, Hungary, Lower and Upper Austria). During the winter of 1556-57 he acted as adviser to the King of the Romans at the Diet of Ratisbon and delivered many sermons in the cathedral. By the appointment of the Catholic princes and the order of the pope he took part in the religious discussions at Worms. As champion of the Catholic church he bravely opposed the neo-Lutheran party and the opposition to Melanchthon. The fact that the Protestants disagreed among themselves and were obliged to leave the field was due in a great measure to Caninus. He also preached in the cathedral of Worms.

During Advent and Christmas he visited the Bishop of Strasbourg at Zabern, started negotiations for the building of a Jesuit college there, preached, explained the catechism to the people, and heard their confessions. He also preached in the cathedral of Strasbourg and strengthened the Catholics of Alsace and Fréiburg in their faith. Ferdinand, on his way to Frankfurt to be crowned emperor, met him at Nuremberg and confirmed his troubles to him. Then Duke Albert V of Bavaria secured his services; at Straubing the pastors and preachers had fled, after having persuaded the people to turn from the Catholic faith. Caninus remained in the town for six weeks, preaching three or four times a day, and by his gentleness he made much harm. From Straubing he was called to Rome to be present at the First General Congregation of the Society of Jesus.

In 1559, when the用人 Emperor was summoned to be present at the Diet of Augsburg. There, at the urgent request of the chapter, he became preacher at the cathedral, and held this position until 1566. His manuscripts show the care with which he wrote his sermons. In a series of sermons he treats of the end of man, of the Decalogue, the Mass, the prophecies of Jonas; at the same time he rarely omitted to expound the Gospel of the day; he spoke in keeping with the spirit of the age, explained the justification of man, Christian liberty, the proper way of interpreting the Scriptures, defended the worship of saints, the ceremonies of the Church, religious vows, indulgences, urged obedience to the Church authorities, confession, communion, fasting, and almsgiving. He exposed the faults of the clergy, at times perhaps too sharply, as he felt that they were public and that he must avoid demanding reformation from the laity only. Against the influence of evil spirits he recommended the means of defence which had been in use in the Church during the first centuries—lively faith, prayer, eccle-sianstical benedictions, and acts of penance. From 1561 to 1562 he preached about two hundred and ten sermons, besides giving retreats and teaching catechism. In the cathedral he confessional and the altar at which he said Mass were surrounded by crowds, and alms were placed on the altar. The envy of some of the cathedral clergy was aroused, and Canisius and his companions were accused of usurping the preaching rights. The pope and bishop favoured the Jesuits, but the majority of the chapter opposed them. Canisius was obliged to sign an agreement according to which he retained the pulpit but gave up the right of administering the sacraments in the cathedral.

In 1563 he opened a college at Munich; in 1562 he appeared at Trent as papal theologian. The council was not the only question that should be administered under both forms to those of the laity who asked for it. Lainez, the general of the Society of Jesus, opposed it unconditionally. Canisius held that the cup might be administered to the Bohemians and to some Catholics whose faith was considered suspect. After one month he departed from Trent, but he continued to support the work of the Fathers by urging the bishops to appear at the council, by giving expert opinion regarding the Index and other matters, by reports on the state of public opinion, and on newly-published books. In the spring of 1563 he rendered a specially important service to the Church; the emperor had summoned him to Innsbruck (at least he had summoned seven or eight scholars, including Canisius, as advisers. Some of these men fomented the displeasure of the emperor with the pope and the cardinals who presided over the council. For months Canisius strove to reconcile him with the Curia. He has been blamed unjustly for communicating to his general and to the pope representations of Ferdinand's plans, which otherwise might have ended contrary to the intention of all concerned in the dissolution of the council and in a new national apostasy. The emperor finally granted all the pope's demands and the council was able to proceed and to end peaceably. All Rome praised Canisius, but soon after he lost favour with Ferdinand and was denounced as disloyal; at this time he also changed his views regarding the giving of the cup to the laity (in which the emperor saw a means of relieving all his difficulties), saying that such a concession would only tend to confuse faithful Catholics and to encourage the disobedience of the scholar.

In 1562 the College of Innsbruck was opened by Canisius, and at that time he acted as confessor to the "Queen" Magdalena (declared Venerable in 1906 by Pius X; daughter of Ferdinand I, who lived with her four sisters at Innsbruck), and as spiritual adviser to her sisters. At their request he sent them a confession from the society, and when Magdalena presided over the convent, which she had founded at Hall, he sent her complete directions for attaining Christian perfection. In 1563 he preached at many monasteries in Swabia; in 1564 he sent the first missionaries to Lower Bavaria, and recommended the provincial synod of Salzburg not to allow the cup to the laity, as it had authority to do; his advice, however, was not accepted. In this year Canisius opened a college at Dillingen and assumed, in the name of the order, the administration of the university which had been founded there by Cardinal Truchsess. In 1565 he took part in the Second General Congregation of the order in Ingolstadt; in 1567 he defended the Protestant philologist Joseph Camerarius, at that time a prisoner of the Inquisition, and instructed and consolled him. Pius IV sent him as his secret nuncio to deliver the decrees of the Council of Trent to Germany; the pope also commissioned him to urge their enforcement, to ask the Catholic princes to defend the Church at the coming diet, and to negotiate for the founding of colleges and seminaries. Canisius negotiated more or less successfully with the Electors of Mainz and Trier, with the Bishops of Augsburg, Würzburg, Osnabrück, Münster, and Paderborn, with the Duke of Jülich-Cleves-Berg, and with the City and University of Cologne; he also visited Nimwegen, preaching there and at other places; his mission, however, was not successful. In 1569, the pope, Pius V desired its continuation, but Canisius requested to be relieved; he said that he aroused suspicions of espionage, of arrogance, and of interference in politics (for a detailed account of his mission see "Stimmen aus Maria-Lachen", I, LXXI, 58, 164, 301).

At the Diet of Augsburg (1566), Canisius and other theologians of the council were sent to the cardinal legate Commandoni; with the help of his friends he succeeded, although with great difficulty, in persuading the legate not to issue his protest against the religious peace, and thus prevented a new fractorial war. The Catholic members of the diet accepted the decrees of the council, the designs of the Protestants were frustrated, and from that time a new and vigorous life began for the Catholics in Germany. In the same year Canisius went to Wiesenstein, where he visited and brought back to the Church the Lutheran Count of Heffenstein and his entire entourage, and where he prepared for death two witches who had been condemned by the Lutheran praeses. In 1567 he preached the Lenten sermon in the cathedral of Würzburg, gave instruction in the Franciscan church twice a week to the children and domestics of the town, and discussed the founding of a Jesuit college at Würzburg with the bishop. There followed the diocesan synod of Dillingen (at which Canisius himself was a principal adviser, and the Bishop of Augsburg), journeys to Würzburg, Mainz, Speyer, a visit to the Bishop of Strasburg, whom he advised, though unsuccessfully, to take a confessor. At Dillingen he received the application of Stanislaus Kostka to enter the Society of Jesus, and sent him with hearty recommendations to the general of the order at Rome. At this time he successfully settled a dispute in the philosophical faculty of the University of Ingolstadt. In 1567 and 1568 he went several times to Innsbruck, where, in the name of the general he consulted with the Archduke Ferdinand II and his sisters about the confessors of the archduchesses and about the establishment of a Jesuit house at Hall. In 1569 the general desired to accept Canisius.

During Lent of 1568 Canisius preached at Ellwangen, in Württemberg; from there he went with Cardinal Truchsess to Rome. The Upper German province of the order had elected the provincial as its representative at the meeting of the procurators; this election was illegal, but Canisius was admitted. For a month he collected in the libraries of Rome material for a great work which he was preparing. In 1569 he returned to Augsburg and preached Lenten sermons in the Church of St. Mauritius. Having been a provincial for thirteen years (an unusually long time) he was relieved of the office at his own request, and went to Dillingen, where he wrote, catechized, and heard confessions. His respite, however, was short; in 1570 he was obliged again to go to Augsburg. A year later he was compelled to move to Innsbruck and to accept the office of court preacher to Archduke Ferdinand II. In 1575 Gregory XIII sent him with papal messages to the archduke and to the Duke of Bavaria. When he arrived in Rome to make his report, the Cardinal, General Congregation was beginning, but by special favour, Canisius was invited to be present. From this time he was preacher in the parish church of Innsbruck until the Diet of Ratisbon (1575), which he attended as theologian of the cardinal legate Morone. In the following year he supervised at Ingolstadt the printing of an important work, and induced the students of the university to found a sodality of the Blessed Virgin. During Lent, 1578, he preached at the court of Duke William of Bavaria at Landshut. The nuncio Bonomonti desired to have a college of the society at Fribourg; the order at first refused on account of the lack of men, but the pope intervened and, at the end of 1580, Canisius laid the foundation stone. In 1584 he founded a sodality of the Blessed Virgin among the citizens and, soon afterwards, sodalities for women and students; in 1582 schools were opened, and he preached in the parish church and in other places until 1589.

The church has been uninfluenced by the Protestant movement. Canisius worked indefatigably with the provost Peter Selmeck, the Franciscan Johannes Michel, and others, for the revival of religious sentiments amongst the people; since then Fribourg has remained a stronghold of the Catholic Church. In 1584, while on his way to take part in another meeting of the order at Augsburg, he preached at Lucerne and made a pilgrimage to the miraculous image of the Blessed Virgin at Einsiedeln. According to his own account, it was then that St. Nicholas, the patron saint of Fribourg, made known to him his desire that Canisius should not leave Fribourg again. Many times the superiors of the order planned to transfer him to another place, but either the city council, or the citizens themselves, or the people, would not consent to lose this celebrated and saintly man. The last years of his life he devoted to the instruction of converts, to making spiritual addresses to the brothers of the order, to writing and re-editing books. The city authorities ordered his body to be buried before the high altar of the principal church, the Church of St. Nicholas, from which they were translated in 1625 to that of St. Michael, the church of the Jesuit College.

Canisius held that to defend the Catholic truths with the pen was just as important as to convert the Huguenots. At Rome and Trent he strongly urged the appointment at the council, at the papal court, and in other parts of Italy, of able theologians to write in defence of the Catholic faith. He begged Pius V to send yearly subsidies to the Catholic printers of Germany, and to permit German scholars to edit Roman manuscripts; he induced the city council of Fribourg to establish a presses and he secured special privileges for printers. He also kept in touch with the chief Catholic printers of his time—Platijn of Antwerp, Cholin of Cologne, and Mayer of Dillingen—and had foreign works of importance reprinted in Germany, for example, the works of Andredd, Fontidonio, and Villejaille in defence of the Council of Trent.

Canisius advised the generals of the order to create a college of authors; urged scholars like Bartholomaeus Latomus, Friedrich Staphylus, and Hieronymus Tornensis to publish their works; assisted Onorio Panvinio and the polemic Stephanus Hosius, reading their manuscripts and correcting proofs contributed to the work of his friend Surius on the councils. At his solicitation the "Briefe aus Indien", the first relations of Catholic missionaries, were published (Dillingen, 1563–71); "Canisius", wrote the Protestant preacher, Witz, "by this activity gave an impulse which deserves our undivided recognition, which arouses our admiration" ("Petrus Canisius", Vienna, 1897, p. 12).

The latest bibliography of the Society of Jesus devotes thirty-eight quarto pages to a list of the works published by Canisius and their different editions, and it must be added that this list is incomplete. The most important of his works are described below; as they give an idea of the work bears the name of Canisius neither on the title page nor in the preface. His chief work is his triple "Catechismus", in 1553 King Ferdinand I asked the University of Vienna to write a compendium of Christian doctrine, and Canisius wrote (Vienna, 1555), at first for advanced students, his "Summa doctrine christianae... in usum Christianorum pueriorum", two hundred and eleven questions in five chapters (the first edition appeared without the name of the author, but later all three catechisms bore his name; then it was further divided); "Summa... in usum Christianorum... accommodata..." (Ingolstadt, 1556), was published as an appendix to the "Principia Grammaticae"; his catechism for students of the lower and middle grades, "Parva Catechismus Christianorum..." (later known as "Institutum Christianae pietae" or "Catechismus catholici"), is an extract from the large catechism written in the winter of 1557–58. Of the first Latin edition (Cologne, 1558), no copy is known to exist; the German edition appeared at Dillingen, 1560. The "Summa" only received its definite form in the Cologne edition of 1558; it contains two hundred and twenty-two questions, and two thousand quotations from the Scriptures, and about twelve hundred quotations from the Fathers of the Church are inscribed on the margins; later all these quotations were compiled in the original by Peter Buesens, S.J., and appeared in four quarto volumes under the title "Authoritates Sacrosanctae Patris..." (Cologne, 1557–58, 1570); in 1561 the editions of Fribourg, and of the same work in one large folio volume, entitled "Opus catechumenum", for which Canisius wrote an introduction. The catechism of Canisius is remarkable for its ecclesiastically correct teachings, its clear, positive sentences, its mild and dignified form. It is to-day recognized as a masterpiece even by non-Catholics, e.g., the historians Ranke, Menzel, Philippson, and the theologians Kawerau, Roulet, Zerschitz.

Pius V entrusted Canisius with the confutation of the Centuriae of Magdeburg (q. v.). Canisius undertook to prove the dishonesty of the centuraries by exposing their treatment of the principal persons in the Gospel—John the Baptist, the Mother of God, the Apostle St. Peter—and published (Dillingen, 1571) his next most important work, "Commentarium de Verbi Dei corruptilibus liber primus; quo de Suntessimi Prsecursoris Domini Joannis Baptista Testimonia Evangelica..." Here the confutation of the Centuriae of Protocristo is exegetical and historical rather than scholastic; in 1577 "De Maria Virgine incomparabili, et Dei Genitrici sacro sancta, libri quinque" was published at Ingolstadt. Later he united these two works into one book of two volumes, "Commentarium de Verbi Dei corruptilibus" (Ingolstadt, 1580; Paris and Lyon); the treatise on St. Peter and his primacy was only begun; the work on the Virgin Mary contains some quotations from the Fathers of the Church that had not been printed previously, and treats of the worship of Mary by the Church. A celebrated theologian of the present day called this work a classic defence of the whole Catholic doctrine about the Blessed Virgin (Scheeben, "Dogmatik", III, 478); in 1543 he published (under the name of Petrus Nonomagus) "De erubescere D. Johannes Tauler, von eym waren Evangelischen leben, Gotheliche Predig. Leren" etc., in which several writings of the Dominican mystic appear in print for the first time. This was the first book published by a Jesuit, "Divi Cyrilli archiepiscopi Alexandrini Opera" (Latin translation, 2 fol. vols., Cologne, 1564); "D. Leonis Papae huius nominis primit. Opera" (Cologne, 1546, later reprinted at Venice, Louvain, and Cologne), Leo is brought forward as a witness for the Catholic teachings and the writings for the innovators; "De consolandia.agritus" (Vienna, 1554), exhortations (Latin, German, and Italian) and prayers, with a preface by Canisius; "Lectiones et Prælectiones Ecclesiasticæ" (Ingolstadt, 1559), a prayer-book for students, reprinted more than thirty times under the titles of "Epistola et Evangelia" etc.; "Principes grammatici" (Ingolstadt, 1556; Hamburg hal Codrett's Latin Grammar, adapted for German students by Canisius, reprinted in 1561, 1564 and 1566; "Ordinum de Laticyce von viser lieben Frawen" (Dillingen, 1558), the first known printing of the Litany of Loreto, the second (Marcula, 1570) was most probably arranged by Canisius; "Vom Abludt des Coloszj zu Worms" (s. l. a., 15-

"Ein Christlicher Bericht, was die haglich die Kirche ir... seyr" (Dillingen, 1550), translation and preface by Canisius (cf. N. Paulus in "Historisch-polit. Blatter", CXXXI, 765); "Epistole B. Hieronymi
... sacerer" (Dillingen, 1562), school edition arranged and printed by Canisius and later reprinted about forty times; "Hortulus Anima" (q. v.), a German prayer-book arranged by Canisius (Dillingen, 1563), reprinted later, probably published also in Latin by him. The "Hortuli" were placed later on the Index renovator; Von der Gesellschaft Jesu Durch

a defence of the order against Chemnitz and Zangendorf, the greater part of which was written by Canisius;
"Institutiones, et Exercitamentia Christianae Pic

Canisius combined the catechism for the middle and the "Telectione et Precationes ecclesiastic menditiae" (Ingolstadt, 1567), "Brevi diensbuchlein" (Dillingen, 1567 (?), 1575, 1579, 1582, 1583; Ingolstadt, 1594, etc.); "Christliche... Predig

At the request of Ferdinand II of Tyrol, Canisius supervised the publishing of "Von dem hoch und westlichen Wunderbaren, Ar... Seefeld... zugetragen" (Dillingen, 1550), and wrote a long preface for it; then appeared "Zwey von neunzig Betrachtung von Gebet, dess... Bruders the truth with modesty and dignity and without scolding or ridicule. The names of Luther and Melanchthon were "Catholics". His love for the German people is characteristic; he was the brother of the order to practise German diligently, and he liked the song of the German national hymn sung. At his desire, St. Ignatius decreed that all the members of the order should offer monthly Masses and prayers for the welfare of Germany and the North. Ever the faithful economical at the least expense, he obtained clemency for them in questions of ecclesiastical censures, and permission to give extraordinary absolutions and to dispense from the law of fasting. He also wished the index to be modified that German confessors might be authorized to permit the reading of some books, but in his sermons he warned the faithful to abstain from reading such books without permission. While he was rector of the University of Ingolstadt, a resolution was passed forbidding the use of Protestant textbooks and, at his request, the Duke of Bavaria forbade the importation of books opposed to religion and morals. At Cologne he requested the town council to forbid the printing or sale of books hostile to the Catholic religion, and in the Tyrol, in Archduke Ferdinand I suppress many books. He also advised Bishop Urban of Gurk, the court preacher of Ferdinand I, not to read so many Protestant books, but to study instead the Scriptures and the writings of the Fathers. At Nimwegen he searched the libraries of his country and banned all books. In many parts of all these cases Canisius remained essentially a man of prayer; he was an ardent advocate of the Rosary and its solemnities. He was also one of the predecessors of the modern devotion of the Sacred Heart. During his lifetime his "Catechism" appeared in more than 200 editions and in at least twelve languages. His sermons, in the form of books and pamphlets, were printed by Lonarius Gonzaga to enter the Society of Jesus; it converted, among others, Count Palatine Wolfgang Wilhelm of Neuburg; and as late as the eighteenth century in many places the words "Canisius" and catechism were synonymous. It remained the foundation and pattern for the catechism printed later. His preaching also had a great influence; in 1590 the clergy of the cathedral of Augsburg testified that by his sermons nine hundred persons had been brought back to the Church, and in May, 1592, it was reported the Easter communicants numbered one thousand more than in former years. Canisius induced some of the prominent Protestant rulers to return to the Church, and he renewed the council of Worms. In 1537 the Catholic clergy had been banished from Augsburg by the city council; but after the preaching of Canisius public processions were held, monasteries gained novices, people crowded to the jubilee indulgence, pilgrimages were revived, and frequent Communion again became the rule. After the elections of 1562 there were eighteen Protestants and twenty-seven Catholics on the city council. He received the approbation of Pius IV by a special Brief in 1561. Great services were rendered by Canisius to the Church through the extension of the Society of Jesus; the difficulties were great; lack of novices, insufficient education of some of the younger members, poverty, plague, animosity of the Protestants, jealousy on the part of fellow-Catholics, the interference of princes and city councils. Notwithstanding all this, Canisius introduced the order into Bavaria, Bohemia, Swabia, the Tyrol, and Hungary, and prepared the way in Alsace, the Palatinate, Hesse, and Poland. Even opponents admitted that he was mainly due to the efforts of saving a large part of Germany from religious innovation. In this work Canisius was the leader. In many respects Canisius was the product of an age which believed in strange miracles, but which did not hesitate to force against the adherents of another faith; but notwithstanding all this, Johannes Janssen does not hesitate to declare that Canisius was the most prominent and most influential Catholic reformer of the sixteenth century (Gelegte Dichtungen, p. 106). "Canisius more than any other man" writes A. Chronos, "saved for the Church of Rome the Catholic Germany of to-day" (Deutsche Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaft, new series, 11, p. 106). It has often been declared that Canisius in many ways resembles St. Boniface, and is therefore called the second Apostle of Germany. The Protestant professor of theology, Paul Drews, says: "It must be admitted that, from the standpoint of Rome, he deserves the title of Apostle of Germany" ("Petrus Canisius", Halle, 1892, p. 103).

Soon after his death reports spread of the marvellous help obtained by invoking his name. His tomb was visited by pilgrims. The Society of Jesus decided to urge his beatification. The ecclesiastical investigations of his virtues and miracles were at first conducted by the Bishops of Freiburg, Dillingen, and Freising (1625-90); the apostolic processings began in 1574, but were interrupted by political and religious disorders. In 1626, the Holy See decreed that his cult be suppressed; in 1734, Pius IX on 17 April, 1864, approved of four of the miracles submitted, and on 20 November, 1869, the solemn beatification took place in St. Peter's at Rome. In connection with this, there appeared between 1864-66 more than thirty different biographies. On the occasion of the tercentenary of his death, Leo XIII issued to the hierarchy of Austria and Switzerland his nuncio-dississed "Epistola Encyclica de memoria sancti B. Petri Canisii"; the bishops of Switzerland issued a collective pastoral; in numerous places in Europe and in some places in the United States this tercentenary was celebrated and about 1200 pamphlets and books published. In order to encourage the veneration of Canisius there is published at Freiburg, Switzerland, monthly since 1891, the "Canisius-Stimmen" (in German and French). The innumerable of the College of St. Michael, in which Canisius died, is now a chapel. Vestments and other objects which he used are kept in different houses of the order. The Canisian College at Buffalo possesses precious relics. In the house of Canisius in the Breerstraat at Nimwegen the room is still shown where he was born. Other memorials are: the Canisian statue in one of the public squares of Freiburg, the statue in the cathedral of Augsburg, the Church of the Holy Saviour and the Mother of Sorrows, recently erected in Steinhof in Vienna, and the new Canisian College at Nimwegen. At the twenty-sixth general meeting of German Catholics held at Aachen, 1873, a Canisian society for the religious education of the young was founded. The general prayer, said every Sunday in the churches originated by Canisius, is still in use in the greater part of Germany, and also in many places in Austria and Switzerland. Various portraits of Canisius exist: in the Churches of St. Nicolaus and St. Michael at Freiburg; in the vestry of the Augsburg Cathedral; in the Church of St. Michael at Munich; in the town hall at Nimwegen; in the town hall at Ingolstadt; in the Cistercian monastery at Staatz; and the monument in Pantakor, "Praesopographia", 111 (Basel, 1655), is worthless. Copper-plates were produced by Wierix (1619), Custos (1612), Sadeler (1628), Hainleymans (1653), etc. In the nineteenth century are: Fresa's painting in the Vatican; Jekel's steel engraving; Leo Sambinger's painting; Steulé's engraving (1866). In most of these Canisius is depicted with his catechism and other books, or surrounded by children whom he is instructing. (See Doctrine, Christian; Counter-Reformation; Society of Jesus.)

Peter Cantor, theologian, b. probably at Gisors, near Beauvais, France; d. at Long Pont Abbey, 22 Sept., 1197. He was a member of the Hesdin family; when still young he went to Reims, which may possibly have been a place of his education at the cathedral school. He was a professor for many years in the canon of the cathedral, and would seem to have had also the office of cantor or successor.

Towards 1170, we find Peter as canon and professor of the theology of the cathedral school at Paris, where in 1179 he again entered with the office of cantor, for his presence appears on the documents for the first time in 1180, whilst mention is first made of him in 1181. This is what caused him to be designated Petrus Cantor, Cantor Parisiensis, or simply Cantor; and his name is found on many charters. At the same time, his capabilities led him to be frequently chosen as a judge, e.g., at Troyes in 1188, and also during 1193 at Chartres Cathedral for the marriage case with Livelger. In 1191 the people and clergy of Tournai chose him for their bishop, but his election was annulled by Bishop Guillaume de Champagne of Reims. At the death of Maurice de Sully in 1196, it is said that he was elected Bishop of Paris, but refused the dignity.

He left commentaries or glosses on all the Old Testament Books, except Judith, Esther, Tobia, and Levitations; the best are those on the Psalms. In like manner he also wrote glosses on the whole of the New Testament, following the Harmony of the Four Gospels which, under the name of Ammonius, or Tatian, was much in use during the Middle Ages. His commentaries on the Gospels and on the Apocalypse may be perhaps the most worthy of praise; that on St. Paul may be described as an interlinear gloss; in its scholastic discussions are often introduced a propos of certain subjects as they are suggested by the text. This style of writing commentaries was by no means new to the age in which he lived, and it is more and more developed at this period. None of these works were printed, not even an introduction or treatise which he wrote on the Bible in twenty folio pages variously entitled: "De tropis theologici", "De contrariata scripturae", or "De tropis legendi"; in it he lays great stress on the solution of contradictions that may seem to exist between the different Gospels. Traces of it may be found in Peter's commentaries on the Gospels and annotations on the Bible; the rules of Tironian are sometimes found following on the "De tropis" of Peter.

There are two other unpublished works, namely, the "Summa de sacramentis et animae consiliis", which though lengthy is nevertheless precious for its varied information on the institutions and religious customs of the time; he develops at great length the moral side of the question, especially when criticizing on the Sacrament of Penance. He purposely leaves aside matters already discussed by Peter Lombard, for as he himself says it is his intention to complete them. The "Distinctiones" or "Summa quae dictur Abel" is a theological dictionary arranged in alphabetical order; "Abel" being the initial word, in which is found a short résumé of the ideas and customs of the time; with this as title, he wrote a valuable document which is still to be found in many manuscripts (Paris, Rome, Bruges, etc.). Petri has published portions of it ("Spirillegium Solomense"), III, Paris, 1704; "Amuletta Sacra", II, 6-128, 385-628.

The "Verbium Abbreviatum", his only work that was entirely printed, with the "Contra Monaches propriatorum" which in Migne forms the matter of chapter edit and written before 1187, is not a course of ethics or asceticism, but a book addressed chiefly to the clergy and more in particular to monks, wherein he expounds the practice of virtue; his sources are the Bible, the writings of the fathers, and the authors. What he says about manners, customs, etc., is very instructive for the time in which he wrote. As in the "Summa de Sacramentis", so here are found scholastic discussions side by side with practical remarks on daily life from a religious point of view (1st ed., Mens. 1699; 2nd ed., B., C., CXXV, 10). Some sermons are also ascribed to Peter, but only those which are in the form of detached chapters of the "Verbium abbreviatum" are known.

Peter Collensis (de la Cell), Bishop of Chartres, b. of noble parentage in Chartres; d. at Chartres, 20 February, 1183. He was educated in the monastery of St. Martin-des-Champs at Paris, became a Benedictine, and in 1150 was made Abbot of La Celle near Troyes, whence his surname, Collensis. In 1162 he was appointed Abbot of St. Rémy at Reims, and in 1174 he succeeded John of Salisbury as Bishop of Chartres. He was highly esteemed by the bishops of Salisbury, Thomas d'Becket, Archbishop Esquil, Eugene III, and especially Alexander III. His literary productions were edited by Janvier (Paris, 1671), and reprinted in P. L., CCL, 415-416. They consisted of 177 epistles, 95 sermons, and 4 treatises entitled: (1) "De paucibus ad Ioanun Sarisberiensem"; (2) "Moralia tabernaculi mysticae et moralis expositioni libri duo"; (3) "De conscientia"; (4) "De disciplina clausula ad Henricum I, Campaniae Comitem". His epistles, which are valuable from an historical standpoint, were edited separately by Simond (Paris, 1613). His sermons and treatises are extensively bombastic and allegorical.

Michael Ott.

Peter Chrysologus, Saint, b. at Imola, 106; d. there, 430. His biography, first written by Agnellus (her father's sermons), reaches its High Middle Age, gives but scanty account about him. He was baptized, educated, and ordained deacon by Cornelius, Bishop of Imola, and was elevated to Peter Claver, Saint, the son of a Catalan farmer, was b. at Verdu, in 1581; d. 8 September, 1654. He obtained his first degrees at the University of Barcelona. At the age of twenty he entered the Jesuit novitiate at Tarragona. While he was studying philosophy at Majorca in 1605, Alphonso Rodriguez, the saintly door-keeper of the college, learned from God the future mission of his young associate, and thenceforth never ceased exhorting him to set out to evangelize the Spanish possessions in America. By the influence of his friend, where for forty-four years he was the Apostle of the negro slaves. Early in the seventeenth century the masters of Central and South America afforded the spectacle of one of those social crimes which are centered upon so lightly. They needed laborers to cultivate the soil which they had purchased and to exploit the gold mines. The natives being physically incapable of enduring the labors of the mines, it was determined to replace them with negroes brought from Africa. The coasts of Guinea, the Congo, and Angola became the market for slave dealers, to whom native petty kings sold their subjects by force or threat. During this period, Cartagena became the chief slave-market of the New World. A thousand slaves landed there each month. They were bought for two, and sold for 200 ducats. Though half the cargo might die, the trade remained profitable. Neither the repeated censures of the pope, nor those of Catholic moralists could prevail against this cruelty. The missionaries could not suppress slavery, but only alleviate it, and no one worked more heroically than Peter Claver.

Trained in the school of Père Alfonso de Sandoval, a wonderful missionary, Peter declared himself “the slave of the negroes forever”, and thenceforward his life was one that conforms exactly to it. By his own choice, and lacking in self-confidence, he became a daring and ingenious organizer. Every month when the arrival of the negroes was signaled, Claver went out to meet them on the pilot’s boat, carrying food and delicacies. The negroes, cooped up in the hold, arrived crazed and brutalized by suffering and fear. Claver went to ease, cared for him, and showed him kindness, and made him understand that henceforward he was his defender and father. He thus won their good will. To instruct so many speaking different dialects, Claver assembled at Cartagena a group of interpreters of various nationalities, of whom he made catechists. While the slaves were penned up at Cartagena waiting to be purchased and dispersed, Claver instructed and baptized them in the Faith. On Sundays while Lent he assembled them, inquired concerning their needs, and defended them against their oppressors. This work caused Claver severe trials, and the slave merchants were not his only enemies. The Apostle was accused of insubordinate zeal, and of having profaned the Sacraments by giving them to creatures who scarcely possessed a soul. Fashionable women of Cartagena refused to enter the churches where Father Claver assembled his negroes; the saint’s superiors were often influenced by the many criticisms which reached them. Nevertheless, Claver continued his heroic career, accepting all humiliations and adding rigorous penances to his works of charity. Lacking the support of men, the strength of God was given him. He became the prophet and mirror of the Negroes of all the Americas, the oracle of Cartagena, and all were convinced that often God would not have spared the city save for him. During his life he baptized and instructed in the Faith more than 300,000 negroes. He was beatified 16 July, 1830, by Pius IX, and canonized 15 Jan., 1888, by Leo XIII. His feast is celebrated on the ninth of September. On 7 July, 1896, he was proclaimed the special patron of all the Catholic missions among the negroes. Alphonse Rodriguez was canonized on the same day as Peter Claver.

Peter Comestor, theological writer, b. at Troyes, date unknown; d. at Paris about 1178, or at Rome. He was first a lay brother of the Order of Preachers at Toulouse, and was eventually admitted to the habitually signed himself as “Presbyter Trecensens”. Before 1148 he became dean of the chapter and received a benefice in 1148. About 1160 he formed one of the Chapter of Notre-Dame at Paris, and about the same time he replaced Eudes (Okon) as chancellor. At the same time he had charge of the theological school. It was at Paris that Peter Comestor composed and certainly finished his “Historia Scholastica”; he dedicated it to the Bishop of Sens, Guillaume aux Blancs Mains (1169-76). Alexander III ordered Cardinal Peter of St. Chrysogonus to allow the chancellor Peter to teach a small lecture on instructing the name in his sermons and in the epistle said to be composed by him: “Petrus crassam . . . dictatus comestor, nume comedor.” He afterwards withdrew to the Abbey of St. Victor and one of its ceremonies (1157). He was buried at St. Victor, and the necrology of the canons mentions him as one of themselves (Troyes, 3 Oct). He is included in the list of the Gospels, homilies, interpretations of various nationalities, of whom he made catechists. While the slaves were penned up at Cartagena waiting to be purchased and dispersed, Claver instructed and baptized them in the Faith. On Sundays while Lent he assembled them, inquired concerning their needs, and defended them against their oppressors. This work caused Claver severe trials, and the slave merchants were not his only enemies. The Apostle was accused of insubordinate zeal, and of having profaned the Sacraments by giving them to creatures who scarcely possessed a soul. Peter Comestor, theological writer, b. at Troyes, date unknown; d. at Paris about 1178, or at Rome. He was first a lay brother of the Order of Preachers at Toulouse, and was eventually admitted to the early years, he was at first adopted by an elder brother, who ill-treated and under-fed him while employing him as a swineherd. The child showed signs of great and remarkable intellectual gifts, and after some years of this servitude, he was, who was archpriest at Ravenna, had put his hand and had been away to be educated. This brother was called Damian, and it is generally accepted that St. Peter added this name to his own in grateful recognition of his brother's kindness. He made rapid progress in his studies, first at Ravenna, then at Fano, finally at the University of Parma, and when about twenty-five years of age was already a famous teacher at Parma and Ravenna. But, though even then much given to fasting and to other mortifications, he could not endure the scandals and distractions of university life and decided (about 1635) to retire from the world. While meditating on his resolves, he encountered two hermits of Fonte-Avellana, was charmed with their spirituality and detachment, and desired to join them. Encouraged by them Peter, after a forty days' retreat in a small cell, left his friends secretly and made his way to the hermitage of Fonte-Avellana (q. v.). Here he was received, and, to his surprise, clothed at once with the monastic habit.

Both as novice and as professed religious his fervor was remarkable and led him to such extremes of penance that, for a time, his health was affected. He occupied his convalescence with a thorough study of Holy Scripture and, on his recovery, was appointed to lecture to his fellow-monks. At the request of the Prior of Pomposa and other heads of neighbouring monasteries, for two or three years he lectured to their subjects also, and (about 1042) wrote the life of St. Remond for the monks of Pietrapertosa.

Soon after his return to Fonte-Avellana he was appointed canovast of the house by the prior, who also pointed him out as his successor. This, in fact, he became in 1048, when he was re-elected prior of Fonte-Avellana till his death. His priorate was characterized by a wise moderation of the rule, as well as by the foundation of subject-hermitages at San Severino, Gamigno, Arecura, Murciana, San Salvatore, Sitria, and Ocri. It was remarkable, too, for the introduction of the regular use of the discipline, a penitential exercise which he had received the great abbey of Monte Cassino to imitate. There was no one more zealous of his own circle to this practice, but Peter's persistent advocacy ensured its acceptance to such an extent that he was obliged later to moderate the inordinate zeal of some of his own hermits. Another innovation was that of the daily siesta, to make up for the fatigue of the night watch. During his tenure of the priorate a cloister was built, silver chalices and a silver processed cross were purchased, and many books added to the library. (See Fonte-Avellana.)

Although living in the seclusion of the cloister, Peter Damian watched closely the fortunes of the Church, and like his friend Hildebrand, the future Gregory VII (q. v.), he opposed, if not purification in those deborable times. In 1045 when Hildebrand resigned the supreme pontificate into the hands of the archpriest John Gratian (Gregory VI), Peter hailed the change with joy and wrote to the pope, urging him to deal with the scandals of the Church in Italy, especially with the evil bishops of Pescara, of Città di Castello, and of Fano (see Benedict IX; Gregory VI). He was present in Rome when Clement II crowned Henry III and his wife Agnes, and he also attended a synod held at the Lateran in the first days of 1047, in which decrees were passed against simony. After this he returned to his hermitage of Clement II; Damian's (q. v.), Pope St. Leo IX (q. v.) was canonically enfeoffed and Benezet IX, 1049, to succeed Damian II, and about two years later Peter Damian published his terrible treatise on the vices of the clergy, the "Liber Gomorrhianus," dedicated it to the pope. It caused a great stir and aroused not a little enmity against its author. Even the pope, who had at first praised the work, was persuaded that it was exaggerated and his coolness drew from Damian a vigorous letter of protest. Meanwhile the question arose as to the validity of the confiscated palace of St. Nicholas. The pope and the bishop of Fonte-Avellana was appealed to and wrote (about 1053): a treatise, the "Liber Gratissimus," in favour of their validity, a work which, though much combated at the time, was potent in deciding the question in their favour before the end of the twelfth century. In June, 1056, during the pontificate of Victor II (q. v.), Damian returned to Rome and drew the pope to Florence. The new cardinal was impressed with the great responsibilities of his office and wrote a stirring letter to his brother-cardinals, exhorting them to shine by their example before all. Four months later Pope Stephen died at Florence and the Church was once more distracted by schism. The Cardinal of Ostia was vigorous in his opposition to the antipope Benedict, but force was on the side of the intruder and Damian retired to Fonte-Avellana. (See Niccolò II; Gregory VIII.)

About the end of the year 1059 Peter was sent as legate to Milan by Nicholas II. The Church at Milan was divided, for some time, the party of simony and incontinence. So bad was the state of things, that benefices were openly bought and sold and the clergy publicly "married" the women they lived with. But the faithful of Milan, led by St. Arnold the Deacon and St. Ausenda, Bishop of Lucca, strove hard to remedy these evils. At length the contest between the two parties was so intense that the pope, agreeing with the Holy See to decide the matter, Nicholas II sent Damian and the Bishop of Lucca as his legates. But now the party of the irregular clerics took alarm and raised the cry that Rome had no authority over Milan. At once Peter took action. Boldly confronting the rulers in the cathedral, he proved to them the authority of the Holy See with such effect that all parties submitted to his decision. He exalted first a solemn oath from the archbishop and all his clergy that for the future no pretension should be paid for; then, imposing a penance on all who had been guilty, he re-instituted in their benefices all who under his name had been consecrated; the party of simoniacal clerics, the party of Peter Damian, and all his powers to persuade the antipope Cadalos (q. v.) to withdraw, but to no purpose. Finally Hanno, the Regent of Germany, summoned a council at Augsburg at which a long argument by St. Peter Damian was read and greatly contributed to his success. Alexander II, or Hildebrand, would consent to spare him. In July, 1061, the pope died and once more a schism ensued. Damian used all his powers to persuade the antipope Cadalos (q. v.) to withdraw, but to no purpose. Finally Hanno, the Regent of Germany, summoned a council at Augsburg at which a long argument by St. Peter Damian was read and greatly contributed to his success. Alexander II, or Hildebrand, would consent to spare him. In 1063 the pope held a synod at Rome, at which Damian was appointed as legate to settle the dispute between the Abbey of Cluny and the Bishop of Mâcon. He proceeded to France, summoned a council at Clâponsur-Saône, proved the justice of the contents of Cluny, settled other questions at issue in the Church of France, and returned in the autumn to Fonte-Avellana. While he was in France the antipope Cadalos had again become active in his attempts to gain Rome, and Damian wrote for the papal legate a proof from Alexander and Hildebrand for twice im- prudently appealing to the royal power to judge the case anew. In 1067 the cardinal was sent to Florence to settle the dispute between the bishop and the monks of Vallombrosa, who accused the former of simony. His efforts, however, were not successful, largely because he rashly made the bishop an appeal to his authority on the side of the bishop. The matter was not settled till the following year by the pope in person. In 1069 Damian went as the pope's legate to Germany to prevent King Henry from repudiating his wife Bertha. This task he accomplished at a council at Frankfurt and returned to Fonte-Avellana, where he was left in peace for two years. Early in 1072 he was sent to Ravenna to reconcile its inhabitants to the Holy See, they having been excommunicated for supporting their archbishop in his adhesion to the schism of Cadalos. On his return he was seized with fever near Faenza. He lay in bed for a week at the time of the death of his companion, Angelino, now Santa Maria Vecchia. On the night preceding the feast of the Chair of St. Peter at Antwerp, he ordered the office of that feast to be recited and at the end of Laudes he died. He was at once buried in the monastery church, lest others should claim his relics. Six times has his body been translated, each time to a more splendid resting-place. It now lies in a chapel dedicated to the saint in the cathedral of Faenza in 1908. No formal canonization ever took place, but his cultus has existed since his death at Faenza, at Fonte-Avellana, at Monte Cassino, and at Cluny. In 1825 Leo XII extended his feast (23 Feb.) to the whole Church and pronounced him a Doctor of the Church. The saint is represented in art as a cardinal bearing a diocese in his hand; also sometimes he is depicted as a pilgrim holding a papal Bull, to signify many legations.

Peter de Blosis, statesman and theologian, b. at Blosis about 1130; d. about 1208. He appears to have studied at Tours and, and was, perhaps, the disciple of Jean de Salisbury, who taught in Paris from 1140 to 1150; he studied law in Bologna, and theology in Paris, where he taught the liberal arts. In 1167 Count Stephen de Perche brought him to Sicily (1167). Here he became preceptor of the king, guardian of the royal schools, and one of the queen's principal counsellors. But the favouritism shown the foreigner excited the jealousy of the nobles and he was obliged to leave Sicily (1169). After several years in France, he went to England, where he became one of Henry II's diplomatic agents and was charged with negotiations with the pope and the King of France. In 1176 he became chancellor of the archbishop of Canterbury and Archdeacon of Bath. He became entangled in the disputes between the archbishop and the monks of his diocese and, in this connexion, was sent to Rome in 1177, and to Verona in 1187, on diplomatic missions to the popes. After the death of Henry II (1189), he fell into disgrace, and he speaks in his letters of Richard the Lion Hearted as the "new Pharaoh." He entered the service of Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine, to whom he was secretary (1190-95), and was made Archdeacon of London. But his revenue from this benefice scarcely sufficed for his living and he wrote to Innocent III to this effect in one of the last letters (1198) he has left us. His material status was hardly in keeping with the great authority he exercised in England towards the end of the reign of Henry II, in affairs of the State, or of the Church. Not only was he the king's chief counsellor, but many bishops consulted him and obtained his advice on important matters regarding their dioceses.

He wrote numerous letters, models of his epoch, but full of the bad taste of the twelfth century. He wrote also numerous treatises. He continued the "History of the Monastery of Croyland of Inglis" (901 to 1156). Unfortunately, the "History of Henry II" has been lost (De rebus gestis Henrici II). His other writings are sermons, commentaries on the Scripture, moral and ascetic treatises, in which he attacks with blunt frankness the morals of the English and Aquitanian bishops (treatise entitled, "Quales sunt").

In 1189, after the taking of Jerusalem by Saladin, he composed his famous De Hierosolimitana perpagnitatione and philosopher "Apologia" (CVI). In 1191, wherever he assures the indifferent faith of the princes who deferred the undertaking of the crusade, and threatens them with seeing the mission which they have deserted accomplished by the people. He also composed an "Instruction on the Faith" which Alexander III sent to the Sultan of Inamur. In several of his letters he remains true to the spirit of the crusade. His works were edited by Giles in "Patres Ecclesiae Anglicani," 4 vols. (Oxford, 1840-47), and in P. L., CCVII (4 vols., Paris).

Peter de Honestis, b. at Ravenna about 1049; d. 29 March, 1127. Among his ancestors was the great St. Reginald, founder of the Cistercian Order, and these monks. All his life Peter fasted every Saturday in honour of Our Lady, and strongly recommended this practice to his religious. He styled himself Petrus pecator. He lived for some years in the Holy Land. When returning a great storm arose in the Adriatic and the ship was in imminent danger, Peter made an altar there build a church in honour of Our Lady should be safely reach the harbour. In fulfilment of his promise he build a church and monastery on the family property. Near by there was a small community of clerics, and Peter having joined them, was soon after made their superior, and with them removed to the church and monastery. In 1199, he was associated with the sodality called "The Children of Mary," established in honour of a miraculous picture of Our Lady, now called "Madonna Greca," which tradition says came from Constantinople. The number of his religious increasing, Peter gave them some statutes grounded on the rule of St. Augustine. These were approved by Paschal II, and living afterwards been adopted by many other communities of Canons Regular, the Porten-sis Congregation was formed. By common consent Peter has always been called Blessed. In former times his office and feast day to be celebrated at Ravenna; the process of his beatification is now before the Holy See.

Peter de Vinea (de VINEIS, DELLA VIGNA), b. at Capua about 1190; d. 1249. Peter's legal learning and the elegance of his Latin style in course of time made him the most prominent statesman of public affairs at the court of Frederick II. Frederick's political views, which aimed at absolutism in Church and State, were succeeded in his person, and was the resolution of his own direction. In his capacity as chief judge of the court he took a prominent part in the administration of justice and legislation in Sicily. Perhaps he was also associated with Archbishop James of Capua in drawing up the new code of laws for the Kingdom of Sicily, called the "Constitutions of Malta" and issued in 1212 by order of Frederick as the emperor's ambassador at the Council of Lyons in 1215. Certainly it is in the same year, as the envoy of the emperor, he sought the mediation of St. Louis in the conflict that was developing between Church and State.

About this date he was already, along with Thaddeus of Suessa, the real director of the imperial chancellery. In 1212 he was made imperial provost and legate of the Kingdom of Sicily and thus the sole head of the imperial chancellery. This important position in the State was his ruin. He sought to enrich himself and his family. His embellishments went so far that, as the emperor himself said, they led to a financial disaster which might have become dangerous to the empire. Just at the time that Frederick made this discovery at Cremoja in February, 1249, a physician attempted to give the emperor a poisoned drink. Peter was suspected of being privy to the plot. This report, based on a statement of Matthew of Paris, has been even recently credited by Gerdes, while Hampe rejects it. Dante, however, goes too far when, in the "Divine Comedy," 55 says that he has never broken faith with the emperor. Frederick, on his return to Sicily, ordered his one-time confanatic to be put in chains. Peter was forced to retire to Etruria where Frederic had him imprisoned at San Miniato and had his eyes put out. He is said to have committed suicide here. In 1530, a part of which were printed in the sixteenth century, are of great interest. He was also esteemed as a poet. His poems contain many violent satires on the clergy.

Peter Faber (FAVRE or LE FEVRE), BLESSED, b. 13 April, 1506, at Villaret, Savoy; d. 1 Aug., 1546, in Rome. As a child he tended his father's sheep during the week, and on Sunday he taught catechism to other children. The instinctive knowledge of his vocation as an apostle inspired him with a desire to study. At first he was entrusted to the care of the aged Thoës, and then to a neighbouring school. Although without any definite plans for the future, he resolved to go to Paris. His parents consented to the separation, and in 1525 Peter arrived in Paris. Here he acquired the learning he desired, and found quite unexpected pleasure in the study of philosophy. In 1528 he was admitted as a student in the college of Saint-Barbe, and shared the lodgings of a student from Navarre, Francis Xavier, the future saint, in a tower which still existed in 1550. They became intimately attached to each other, receiving on the same day in 1530 the degree of master of arts. At the university he also met St. Ignatius Loyola and his associates. He was ordained in 1534, and received at Montmartre, on 15 August of the same year, the vows of Ignatius and his five companions. To these first six volunteers, three others were to attach themselves. Ignatius appointed them all to meet at Venice, and charged Faber to conduct them there. Leaving Paris 15 Nov., 1536, Faber and his companions rejoined Ignatius at Venice in Jan., 1537. Ignatius then thought of going to evangelize the Holy Land, but God had destined him for a vaster field of action.

After Ignatius, Faber was the one whom Xavier and his companions esteemed the most eminent. He maintained his profound knowledge, his gentle sanctity, and his influence over souls. Faber now repaired to Rome, and after some months of preaching and teaching, the pope sent him to Parma and Piacenza, where he brought about a revival of Christian piety. Recalled to Rome, Faber was sent to Germany to uphold Catholicism at the Diet of Worms. In reality the diets which the Protestants were enabled to hold through the weakness of Charles accomplished no good. From the Diet of Worms, convoked in 1540, he was called to that of Ratisbon in 1541. Faber was startled by the ruin which Protestantism had caused in Germany, and by the state of decence presented by the people. Their condition seemed to him, as it did not lie in discussions with the heretics, but in the reform of the faithful above all, of the clergy. For ten months, at Speyer, at Ratisbon, and at Mainz, he conducted himself with gentleness and success. It was above all by the Spiritual Exercises that he accomplished most of his conversions. Princes, prelates, and priests regarded their converse to him, and people were astounded by the efficacy of an apostolate accomplished so rapidly. Recalled to Spain by St. Ignatius, Faber tore himself away from the field where he had already gathered such a harvest, and won Savoy, which has never ceased to venerate him as a saint; but he had hardly been in Spain six months when by order of the pope he was again sent to Germany. This time for nineteen months Faber was to work for the reform of Speyer, Mainz, and Cologne. However, he gained the ecclesiastics little by little, changed their hearts, and discovered in the young many vocations. That he decened the vocation of Bl. Peter Canisius is in itself sufficient to justify his being called the Apostle of Germany. The Archbishop of Cologne, Herman of Wiel, was already won over by the heresy which he was later publicly to embrace. He was also at Cologne that Faber especially exercised his zeal. After spending some months at Louvain, in 1543, where he implanted the seeds of numerous vocations among the young, he returned to Cologne, and there it may be said that he expiated all heresy. But he was forced by obedience to leave Germany in August, 1544, going at first to Portugal, later to Spain. At the court of Lisbon and that of Valladolid, Faber was an angel of God. He was called to the principal cities of Spain, and everywhere inculcated fervour and fostered vocations. Let it suffice to mention that of Francis Borgia, which he, more than anyone else, was the means of strengthening. Faber, at forty one was wasted by his incessant labours and his unceasing journeys always made on foot. The pope, however, thought of sending him to the Council of Trent as the theologian of the Holy See; John III wanted him to be made Patriarch of Ethiopia. Called to Rome, Faber, weakened by fever, arrived there 17 July, 1546, to die in the arms of St. Ignatius, the first of the following August. Those who had known him already invoked him as a saint. Saint Francis de Sales, whose character recalled that of Faber’s, never spoke of him except as a saint. He was beatified, 5 September, 1572; his feast is kept on 8 August.

Peter Fourrier, SAINT, KNOWN AS LE BON PERE DE MATTANCOURT, b. at Mirécourt, Lorraine, 30 Nov., 1555; d. at Gray, Haute-Saône, 9 Dec., 1610. At fifteen he was sent to the University of Pont-a-Mousson. His piety and learning led many noble families to ask him to educate their sons. He became a Canon Regular of the Abbey of Cluny and was ordained in 1589. By order of his abbot he returned to the university and became proficient in pastoral theology; he knew the “Suma” of St. Thomas by heart. In 1597 he was made parish priest of Mataneau, a corrupt district threatened with the new heresy. By his prayers, instructions, and good example, religion was soon restored. Fourrier did not neglect the temporal interests of his parishioners; to help those who through ill-fortune had fallen into poverty, he established a kind of mutual help bank. He instituted three sodalities, of St. Sebastian for men, of the Holy Rosary for women, and of the Immaculate Conception for girls, or “Children of Mary”. He composed some dialogues which treated of the virtues opposed to the vices most common among his people. These dialogues the children delivered every Sunday in pub-
Peter Ignatius (Peter Aldobrandini), Blessed, an Italian monk of the Benedictine congregation of the Vallombrosans, and Cardinal-Bishop of Albano; d. c. 1046. The struggle waged against simony in the eleventh century led to violent scenes in several Italian cities. At Florence Bishop Peter Mezzoborgolo, known also as Peter of Pavia, was publicly accused of simoniacal acquisition of the episcopal dignity. As he strenuously denied the charge and had numerous and prominent supporters, the controversy caused intense agitation in Florence. The Valvombrosan monks were his chief accusers and upon the insistence of the people for proof, the judgment of God, or trial by fire, was resorted to. The Abbots John Gualbert designated for the test Peter Aldobrandini, who successfully underwent the ordeal (1068), hence called "Ignatius," or Fire-tried. This triumph of the monks was followed by his canonization on 18 June. He was subsequently canonized, and in 1074 Cardinal-Bishop of Albano. During the pontificate of Gregory VII he was entrusted with important missions. In 1079 he proceeded to Germany as papal legate with the Bishop of Pavia to mediate between the rival Henry IV and Rudolf of Swabia. Upon the renewal of the excommunication, he went to Salerno in 1081, Gregory VII designated him as one of the two envoys sent to France for the promulgation of the sentence.

Peter Lombard, theologian, b. at Novara (or perhaps Lomello), Italy, about 1100; d. about 1160-64. He studied first at Bologna and then entered St. Bernard, who had provided for his wants at Reims, gave him a letter of recommendation to the Abbots of St. Victor, Gilduin (1111-55). To judge from this letter, his stay at Paris was to be short; "per breve tempus usque ad Nativitatem Virginis," there is no evidence of his having gone back to Italy. We learn from John of Salisbury that Peter Lombard studied the works of Abaelard, whose lectures he had probably followed about 1136. His own writings show the influence of his master. In 1148, he was at Reims in company with Robert of Melun, both being called "magistri scholares" by Otto of Freisingen; and he joined Adam du Petit-Pont, Hughes de Angela, and Hubert of St.-Omer against Gilbert de la Porte. About the same time (1145-51) he wrote his "Book of Sentences." He was then professor at the school of Notre Dame. He was acquainted before this date with the works of Gratian the canonist, for he utilizes the "Decretum" in his "Sentences." About the same time he had heard the noted historian Peter John Damascene by Burgundio of Pisa; all these details show the care he had to enlarge the circle of his knowledge. In 1152 Eugene III had a pendencyship conferred on him by the Archbishop of Beauvais (Jaffé-Wattenbach, 5934). In 1158 or 1159 he was appointed Archbishop of Paris; but he held the post only, being succeeded by Pierre de Salie, the builder of the present Cathedral of Notre Dame, in 1160 or 1161. He died some time after, but the exact date is unknown; it could not have been later than 1164; in the years that follow we sometimes meet his name in the cartulary of Notre Dame of Paris; the house he lived in is put up for sale; his original copy of the "Sentences" is purchased by Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the library of Notre Dame. The old legend that makes him the brother of Gratian of Bologna and of Peter Comestor has no foundation whatever.

The works of Peter Lombard include: (1) "Commentaries on the Psalms and St. Paul" which have come down to us in a number of manuscripts. They are chiefly a compilation of patristic and medieval exegesis, after the manner of the professors of Peter Gonzalez, Saint, popularly known as St. Elmo, b. in 1190 at Astorga, Spain; d. 15 April, 1246, at Tuy. He was educated by his uncle, Bishop of Astorga, who gave him when very young a canonicate. Later he entered the Dominican Order and became a renowned preacher; crowds gathered to hear him and numerous conversions were the result of his efforts. He accompanied Ferdinand III of Leon on his expeditions against the Moors, but his ambition was to preach to the poor. He devoted the remainder of his life to the instruction and conversion of the ignorant and of the murderers in Galicia and along the coast of Spain. He lies buried in the cathedral of Palos and was beatified in 1251 by Innocent IV. Elmo's fire is a pale electrical discharge sometimes seen on stormy nights on the tips of spires, about the decks and rigging of ships, in the shape of a ball or brush, singly or in pairs, particularly at the mastsheads and yardsails. The mariners believed them to be the soul of Elmo, reported, whence they are also called corpucelestialis. The ancient called them Helen; fire when seen singly, and Castor and Pollux when in pairs.

the age and of the old “Catena”; (2) “Sermons,” which are also found in quite a number of manuscripts; they are rarely dry, or spurious, and always very methodical in their division; several of them are printed among the works of Hildebert du Mans and others; extracts of others have been published by Proteus (cf. infra); (3) The “Sentences” (“Quattuor libri Sententiarii”). It is this theological work above all that made the name of Peter Lombard famous, and gives him a special place in the history of theology in the Middle Ages. Henceforth he is called the “Magister Sententiarii”, or simply the “Magister”. The work is divided into four books.

In a long series of questions it covers the whole body of theological doctrine and unites it in a systematized whole. Towards the thirteenth century, the various books were divided into distinctiones (an old Latin word that first meant a pause in reading, then a division into chapters), though the author had done nothing more than to have the questions follow one another; in the manuscripts, these questions do not always bear the same title.

The first book treats of God and the Blessed Trinity, of the Incarnation, of Providence, of predestination, and of evil; the second, of the creation, the work of the six days, the angels, the demons, the fall, grace, and sin; the third, of the Incarnation, the Redemption, the virtues, and the Ten Commandments; the fourth, of the sacraments in general, the seven sacraments in particular, and the four last things, death, judgment, heaven and hell. The “Sentences” was written about 1150. In any case it was subsequent to the composition of the “Decretum” of Gratian of Bologna, which dates from about 1140 and contains pages that bear a striking likeness to the “Sentences”. A careful examination of the texts cited in the work of Gratian shows that the “Sentences” and the “Decretum” do not contain the same inaccuracies or the same changes, Peter Lombard’s citation of some “Dicta Gratiani”, and his opposition to some of Gratian’s opinions (e.g. on the question of the essence of marriage)—all these facts prove the priority of the “Decretum” to the “Sentences”; the old view of the canonist Schulte has been abandoned for that of P. Fourrier, who has demonstrated Peter’s dependence on Gratian. A manuscript of the “Sentences” written in 1158 still exists, but there is every reason to believe that the work was finished some eight years earlier.

On the other hand, Gandulph of Bologna, who has been credited with having inspired Peter, is later than the date of the “Sentences”. Peter Lombard, described as parts of the work of the “Magister Sententiarii”. The method and purpose of the book found their explanation in the intellectual movement of the times: arguments from authority laying down the doctrine, and dialectics which reasons about dogma or concludes the “Auctoritates” (as Abelard advised), are the most striking features in its composition. This work may be looked upon as the result of the two tendencies of the period: the one indulging, sometimes too much, in speculation, the other recurring to authority. It must be confessed that Peter Lombard tried to steer a middle course between these opposing tendencies. From Abelard, whose work had hardly lost its fascination in spite of the condemnations of Soissons and Sens, he borrows freely; but he is on guard against Abelard’s errors. He has no desire to make Christian doctrine a matter for controversy after the manner of the “garruli ratiocinatorum” against whom he has to defend himself. But he has no hesitation in reasoning with the different points of doctrine: it is but the method followed with still greater success and depth by St. Thomas. He makes full use of the Bible and the Fathers, but he never goes to the point of refusing reason its due role. It is here that the works of the School of St. Victor are especially serviceable to him:

he borrows considerably from Hugo’s “De Sacramentis”, as well as from the “Summa Sententiarii”, which, though not written by Hugo, is very much indebted to him of Rheims. Peter Lombard’s work must be made of Abelard, Gratian, Ivo of Chartres, and Alger of Liege as the chief sources of the “Liber Sententiarii”.

Among the Fathers of the Church Augustine is quoted about ten or fifteen times as often as Ambrose, Jerome, or Hilary; the Old Testament Fathers, with the exception of John Damascene, who is quoted about twenty-five times, are scarcely represented; the ante-Nicene writers, except Origen, are mentioned on no more than five or six occasions; nevertheless, one may say that the “Sentences”, with Gratian’s work, are the chief sources whence many theologians of the Middle Ages drew their knowledge of the Fathers. Peter’s work is mainly a compilation. Whole “distinctions” have been traced in detail to their sources; scarcely more than ten lines have been found to be original. He makes no secret of this; his plan was to write a kind of Corpus which would save the trouble of looking up many different volumes. But this fact cannot blind us to the merits of the work; he opposed the dialectic of the dialecticians and at the same time found a via media to calm the fears of those who advocated a complete separation of reason and dogma. He arranged traditional doctrines and theories in a system and summarized the controversies of the time and the opinions involved in the different questions. Besides, his attempted solutions often roused the students’ curiosity and led the professors to comment on him. On the whole and in spite of his connexion with Abelard, he is orthodox; a proposition of his on “Christological nihilism” was condemned by Alexander III; other theses were abandoned in the thirteenth century that followed. St. Bonaventure mentions eight of them and the University of Paris later added others. But the success of the book was uncontestable; down to the sixteenth century it was the textbook in the university courses, upon which each future doctor had to lecture during two years.

The want of originality and the refusal of the “Magister” to decide upon many points between two solutions were very favourable to the work of the masters who commented upon him. But the success of Peter Lombard was not immediate. Attacked sometimes during his lifetime, as Maurice of Sully among others relates, after his death he was bitterly inveighed against, especially by Gaetan of Sexty, and even the University of Paris. This opposition even went so far as to try to get his writings condemned. In 1215 at the Lateran Council these attempts were baffled, and the second canon began a profession of faith in these words: “Credimus cum Petro [Lombardio]”. The exegetical work and the “Sentences” of Peter Lombard have been often printed; the commentaries, as upon the Epistles of St. Paul in 1474, etc.; the “Sentences” were printed in 1472 and for the last time in 1892 (Paris). Migne contains these three works (P. L., CXCI, CXCII).

The best edition of the “Sentences” is that which is found in the commentary of St. Bonaventure (Opera S. Bonaventurae, 8 vols., 1885–1907, Fasc. XVII, XCVI, CCXVI, CCXVII, CCXVIII, CCXIX, CCXX, CCXXI). The first commentary is that which is found in the commentary of St. Bonaventure (Opera S. Bonaventurae, 8 vols., 1885–1907, Fasc. XVII, XCVI, CCXVI, CCXVII, CCXVIII, CCXIX, CCXX, CCXXI).

Peter-Louis-Marie Chanel, Blessed, b. at Cuet, Diocese of Belley, France, 1802; d. at Futuna, 28 April, 1841. He was ordained priest in 1827, and engaged in the parishal ministry for a few years; but the reading of letters of missionaries in far-away lands inflamed his heart with zeal, and he resolved to devote his life to the Apostolate. In 1831 he joined the Society of Mary, and in 1836 he embarked for Oceania.
He was assigned by his bishop to the Island of Futana, and landed in Nov., 1857. No Christian missionary had ever set foot there, and the difficulties Peter encountered amidst those savage tribes were almost insurmountable. Through his labors, he was able to bring to the light the results of his efforts, when Niuluki, king and also pontiff of the island, already jealous of the progress of the new religion, was exsorpeted by the conversion of his son and daughter. At his instruction, one of the ministers gathered some of the enemies of Christianity and Peter was cruelly assassinated without uttering a word of complaint. Through his death, the venerable martyr obtained what he had so ardently desired and earnestly worked for, the conversion of Futana. In 1842, two Marist missionaries resumed his work, and nowhere has the preaching of the Gospel produced more wonderful results. Peter was declared Venerable by Pius IX in 1857, and beatified by Leo XIII on 17 November, 1880.

PETER

Peter Mongus (μογος, "stammerer", or "hoarse"), intruded Monophysite patriarchy of Alexandria (d. 490). Under Timothy Ailuros, who was made patriarch by the Egyptian Monophysites after Chalcedon (154-460). Peter Mongus was an ardent adherent of that party. As Timothy's deacon he took part in the persecution of the Melchites. Timothy Ailuros was expelled from the patriarchal throne in 460 and another, Timothy II, was elected by the Synod. Peter Mongus then supported the ceremony against the government instead (460-75). In 475 another revolution recalled Ailuros, who held his place till death (477). His party thereupon elected Peter Mongus to succeed him. The Emperor Zeno (474-91) sentenced Mongus to death; he escaped by flight. Meanwhile, Stilpiakios returned and regained till death (481). The Melchites chose John Talaia to succeed (481-82); see John Talaia. Peter Mongus, always claiming to be patriarch, now comes forward again. John had quarrelled with Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, and refused to sign Zeno's Henoticon (482; see Henoticon); so he was expelled, the emperor changed his attitude, and supported Mongus (482). Talaia led to Rome, Mongus thereupon having been created before the see of Constantinople, and the Pope, according to the notice of the schism, had signed the concessions to Rome, Antioch, and Constantinople. He had signed the Henoticon and was therefore inserted in Acacius' diplomas as Patriarch of Alexandria. But the pope (Felix II or III, 482-92) defended Talaia's rights in two letters to Acacius.

From this time Mongus became the chief champion of all Monophysites. He held a synod to condemn Chalcedon, and desecrated the tombs of Proterios and Stilpiakios, his Melchite predecessors. He was excommunicated repeatedly by the pope. It was communion with Mongus and the acceptance of the Henoticon that caused the Acacian schism of Constantinople (482). When Acacius died his place was succeeded by Flavians (or Fravians). 489-90, Mongus wrote to the new patriarch again condemning Chalcedon and encouraging him in his schism with Rome. He died in 490 and was succeeded by another Monophysite, Anastasius II (490-96). For a long time after his death the name of Peter Mongus was still a party word. To read it in the diplomas (of the Church) was a kind of profession of Monophysitism; the first condition of reunion with Rome and the Catholic world generally was to cease it, with that of Dioscorus and the other great champions of the heresy. In the line of Alexandria patriarchs Mongus is counted as P. XIII. He is said to have written many books, of which four remain. A strong resemblance between him and Acacius (in Coptics) is proved to be spurious by Amedineau in the "Memoires publies par les membres de la mission archéologique française au Caire", IV (Paris, 1888), 196-228.

ADRIAN FORTESCUE.
Peter may be mentioned St. Francis Borgia, Blessed John of Avila, and St. Louis of Granada. In St. Teresa, Peter perceived a soul chosen of God for a great work, and her success in the reform of Carmel was in great measure due to his counsel, encouragement, and defence. (See Carmelites.) It was a letter from St. Peter (14 April, 1562) that encouraged her to found her first monastery at Avila, 24 Aug. 1562. St. Teresa's autobiography is the source of much of our information regarding Peter's life, work, and gifts of miracles and prophecy.

Perhaps the most remarkable of Peter's graces were his gift of contemplation and the virtue of penance. Hardly less remarkable was his love of God, which was to him more ardent than that of Christ. He was a liberal benefactor of the Franciscan friars, of Minor (1558). Peter was sent to the mission in the base of Badajoz. His father, John, was a priest of the Observants, and his mother, Maria, was a nun of the Custody of St. Maria Pietatis in Portugal, subject to the General of the Observants.

Having been elected minister of St. Gabriel's province in 1538, Peter set to work at once. At the chap-

Peter of Alexandria, Saint, became Bishop of Alexandria in 300; martyred Nov. 311. According to Philip of Sophocles, he was at one time head of the famous catechetical school at Alexandria. His theological importance lies in the fact that he marked, very probably initiated, the reaction at Alexandria against extreme Origenism. When during the Diocletian persecution Peter left Alexandria for concealment, the Melitene schism broke out. There are three different accounts of this schism: (1) According to three Latin documents (translations from lost Greek originals) published by Maffei, Melitius (or Melitius), Bishop of Lyceopolis, took advantage of St. Peter's absence to usurp his patriarchal functions, and contravened the canons by consecrating bishops to see not vacant, their occupants being in prison for the Faith. Four of them were consecrated, but Melitius took no heed of them and actually went to Alexandria, where, at the instigation of one Isidore, and Arius the future heresiarch, he set aside those left in charge by Peter and appointed others. Upon this Peter communicated him. (2) St. Athanasius accuses Melitius not only of turbulent and schismatical conduct, but of sacrificing, and de- nominating Peter to the emperor. There is no incompatibility between these statements; but the statement that Melitius sacrificed must be received with caution; it was probably based upon rumour arising out of the immunity which he appeared to enjoy. At all events nothing was heard about the charge at the Council of Nicaea. (3) According to St. Epiphanius (Haer., 67), Melitius was quarrelled out of the consecration of the bp (q. v.), the former inclined to sterner views. Epiphanius probably derived his information from a Melitene source, and his story is full of historical blunders. Thus, to take one example, Peter is made a fellow-prisoner of Melitius and is martyrized in prison. According to Eusebius his martyrdom was not preceded by a term of imprisonment.

There are extant a collection of fourteen canons issued by Peter in the third year of the persecution dealing chiefly with the \textit{lapis}, excepted probably from an Easter Festal Epistle. The fact that they were ratified by the Council of Trullo, and thus became part of the canon law of the Eastern Churches, furnishing the basis for their preservation. Many MSS. contain a fifteenth century taken from writing on the Passover. The cases of different kinds of lapis were decided upon in these canons. The Acts of the martyrdom of St. Peter are too late to have any historical value. In them is the story of Christ appearing to Peter with death and resurrection. The various witnesses of this event, for telling the Arian schism. Three passages from "On the Godhead", apparently written against Origen's substitutionist views, were quoted by St. Cyril at the Council of Ephesus. Two further passages (in Syriac) claiming to be from the same book, were printed by Pitra in "\textit{Anal. Sacra}", IV, 188; their genuineness is doubtful. Leontius of Byzantium quotes a passage affirming the two Natures of Christ from a work on "The Coming of Christ", and two passages from the first book of a treatise against the view that the soul had existed and left it to the body. This treatise must have been written against Origen. Very important are seven fragments printed in Syriac in a work by Pitra, 1857; from another work on the Resurrection, in which the identity of the risen with the earthly body is maintained against Origen. Five Armenian fragments were also published by Pitra (op. cit., IV, 430 sqq.). Two of these correspond with one of the doubtful Syriac fragments. The remaining three are probably of Monophysite forgery (Harnack, "Altchrist. Lit.", 447). A fragment quoted by the Emperor Justinian in his Letter to the Patriarch Menas, purporting to be from a Mystagogia of a St. Peter's, is probably spurious (see Rothf, "Reliq. Sac.", III, 372; Harnack, op. cit., 448). The "Chronicon Paschale" gives a long extract from a surviving letter of Peter of Alexandria, condemned as spurious by a reference to St. Aphthatis (which editors often suppress) unless, indeed, the reference is an interpolation. A fragment first printed by Routh from a Treatise "On Bleasbem" is generally regarded as spurious. A Copite fragment on the keeping of Sunday published by Schmidt (Texte und Untersuchungen, IV) has been ruled spurious by Delachaux, in whose verdict critics seem to acquiesce. Other Copite fragments have been edited with a translation by Crum in the "Journal of Theological Studies" (IV, 267 sqq.). Most of these come from the same manuscript as the fragment edited by Schmidt. Their editor says: "It would be difficult to rank these genuineness of the texts after Delachaux's criticism (Amal. Bolland, XX, 101), though certain of the passages which I have published may indicate interpolation, rather than wholly apocryphal compositions.

Peter of Aquila (\textit{Scortellus}), Friar Minor, theologian and bishop, b. at Aquila in the Abruzzi, Italy, towards the end of the thirteenth century; d. at Trivento, 1361. In 1334 he figures as master of theology and provincial of his order in Tuscany. In 1338 he was appointed confessor of Queen Joan I of Portugal, and shortly afterwards inquisitor of Florence. His servants having been punished by public authority the inquisitor excommunicated the priors and placed the town under interdict.

On 12 February, 1347, Peter was named Bishop of S. Angelo de Lombardi in Calabria, and on 30 May, 1348, was transferred to Trivento. He was an able interpreter of the Scriptures, and was titled "I Nove sufficienti". His chief work was a commentary on the four books of Sentences, which being a compendium of the doctrine of Scotus were called "Scotellum", whence the author's surname "Scotellus". The commentaries have passed through various editions, the first by Peter Drach, at Speier, 1480, and recently by Piolini (Genoa, 1907-08). Peter of Arbus (correctly, \textit{Peter Arribus}), Saint, b. in 1411 (or 1412); d. 17 Sept., 1485. His father, a nobleman, was Antonio Arbus, and his mother's name was Sancia Ruiz. He studied philosophy, probably at Huesca, but later went to Bologna, where the son of St. Clement he was regarded as a model of learning and piety, and was graduated in theology. He was bishop of the see of Jerez, in Spain, from 1447 to 1453, and was appointed a canon regular at Saragossa, where he made his religious profession in 1474. About that time Fernando and Isabella had obtained from Sixtus IV a Bull to establish in their kingdom a tribunal for searching out heretics, and especially Jews who after having received baptism had relapsed openly or secretly into Judaism; and as a result they were expelled from Aragon. Torquemada, in 1484, was appointed great inquisitor over Castile and, being accompanied with the learning and virtue of Peter Arbus, named him inquisitor provincial in the Kingdom of Aragon (1484). Peter performed the duties with zeal and justice. Although the enemies of the Inquisition accuse him of cruelty, it is certain that not a single Jew was executed by him (see VANTORETTO). The Marranos, however, whom he had punished hated and resolved to do away with him. One night while kneeling in prayer before the altar of Our Lady in the metropolitan church, where he used to recite the of his brother canons, they attacked him, and had assassins inflicted several wounds on his head. He was canonized by Pius IX, in 1867. BOLLANOVS, Proprietum Fecundum Hispanicorum; LUCZI, Vita e S. Pietro de Arbus Canonicum Regolare (Rome, 1607).

A. ALLAHAA.

Peter of Auvers, philosopher and theologian; d. after 1310. He was a canon of Paris; some biographers have thought that he was bishop of Clermont (Gathan Christ., II, 253), because a Bull of Boniface VIII of the year 1296 names as canon of Paris, Peter of Croe (Cros), already canon of Clermont (Thomas, in "Mélanges d'arch. et d'hist.", Paris, 1882, II, 117-20); but it is more likely that they are distinct. Peter of Auvers was in Paris in 1301 (Script. Prædict., I, 1262-65), and, according to Thomas, Gathan, in St. Thomas Aquinas' De Infantibus. In 1279, while the various nations of the University of Paris were quarrelling about the rectorship, Simon of Brion, papal legate, appointed Peter of Auvers to that office; in 1296 he was elected to it. His published works are: "Supplementum Commentarium S. Thomae in tertio et quantum librum de rei et mundo" (in "Opera S. Thomae", II, ad Octet, 43); and a commentary on Aristotle's "Metarorum"; "De Juventute et senectute"; "De longitudine et brevitate vitae"; "De motu animabulae". He has been accredited with a supplement to the "Summa" of St. Thomas, but there is no scientific warrant for this. Peter also left numerous treatises which are catalogued in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris: "Sex quodlibetae", long discussions after the manner of St. Thomas; "Sophisma Determinatum"; "Questiones super totam logicam veterem Arist."; "Questions
Peter of Bergamo (Almadera), theologian, date of birth unknown; d. at Piacenza, in 1482. He entered the Dominican Order in his native town, and completed his studies at the University of Bologna, where he was admitted to the Chair of the House of Studies he filled the offices of Master of Students and Bachelor of the Studium. The people of Piacenza venerated him as a saint, and Fr. Leander Alberto states that miracles were wrought through his intercession. His remains were deposited in a crypt under the high altar of the chapel of St. Thomas. All of his writings that have come down to us deal with

Peter of Poitiers, French scholastic theologian, b. at Poitiers or in its neighbourhood about 1130; d. in Paris in 1215. He studied at the University of Paris, where he became professor of theology and finally chief of the Faculties. In 1169 he succeeded Peter Comestor in the chair of scholastic theology. His lectures were so brilliant as to inspire the enmity of Gauthier de St-Victor, one of the bitterest opponents of Scholasticism, who ranked him with Gilbert de la Porree, Abbadard, and Peter Lombard in the pamphlet wherein he tried to throw ridicule on the four doctors, under the title of the "Four Labyrinths of France". In 1179 he published five books of

Peter of Verona, Saint. b. at Verona, 1206; d. near Milan, 6 April, 1252. His parents were adherents of the Manichean heresy, which still survived in northern Italy in the thirteenth century. Sent to a Catholic school, and later to the University of Bologna, he met St. Dominic, and entered the Order of the Friars Preachers. Such were his virtues, severity of life and doctrine, talent for preaching, and zeal for the Faith, that Gregory IX made him general inquisitor, and his superiors desired him to correct the Manichaeans. In that capacity he evangelized nearly the whole of Italy, preaching in Rome, Florence, Bologna, Genoa, and Conmo. Crowds came to meet him and followed him wherever he went; and conversions were numerous. He never failed to denounce the vices and heresies of the time, and as a general he ruled with severity; but in deeds it denied. The Manichaeans did all they could to compel the inquisitor to cease from preaching against their errors and propaganda. Persecutions, calumnies, threats, nothing was left untried. When returning from Conmo to Milan, he met a certain Fimino who with some other Manichaeans had plotted to murder him. The assassin struck him with an axe on the head with such violence, that the holy shows that he was only Chancellor of Paris. His works were published by Dom Mathieu with those of Robert Pulmus (Paris, 1552).

Peter of Sebasto, Saint, bishop, b. about 310; d. 391. He belonged to the richly blest family of Basil and Eumene of Cesarea, in Cappadocia, and also sprang St. Macrina the Younger (q. v.) and the two great Cappadocian doctors, Basil of Cesarea and Gregory of Nyssa. He was the youngest of a large family, and Macrina, his eldest sister, exercised a great influence over his religious training, acting as his instructor in the way of Christian subjection and directing him towards the spiritual and ascetic life. Renouncing the study of the profane sciences, he devoted himself to meditation on Holy Writ and the cultivation of the religious life. Shortly after his brother's elevation to the episcopal See of Cesarea, Peter received from him a priestly ordination, but subsequently, withdrawing from active affairs, resumed the life of a solitary ascetic. He assisted his sister towards the attainment of her life's object, and aided her and her mother in their monastic establishment after his father's death (Gregory of Nyssa, "Vita s. Macrinae"). About 380-81 he was elevated to the See of Sebasto in Armenia and, without displaying any missionary activity, in a manner he himself described, against Basil and Gregory in their fight against the Arian heresy (Theodore, "H. E.", IV, cxviii). In his life and episcopal administration he displayed the same splendid characteristics as Basil. Linked together in the closest manner with his brothers, he followed them in their writings with the greatest interest. At his advice Gregory of Nyssa wrote his great work "Against Eunomius", in defence of Basil's similarly named book answering the polemical work of Eunomius. It was also at his desire that Gregory wrote the "Treatise on the Work of the Six Days", to defend Basil's similar treatise againstfalse interpretations and to complete it. Another work of Gregory's, "On the Endowment of Man", was also written at Peter's suggestion, and sent to the latter with an appropriate preface as an Easter gift in 307. We have no detailed information concerning his activity as a bishop, except that he was present at the Ecumenical Council of Constantinople in 381. After his death in 391 he was venerated as a saint. His feast is 1 January. See bibliography under BASIL THE GREEK and GREGORY OF NYSSA.

Peter's Chains, Feast of. See Peter, Saint.

Peterspence, otherwise known to the Anglo-Saxons as "Rumfoth" or "Romescot," is the name given to an annual tribute or contribution (originally of a penny from each household, holding land of a certain value) paid to the exchequer of the Holy See by various peoples of Christendom. In the Middle Ages this form of contribution seems almost to have been confined to England and to have been the most frequent of such payments, and was unquestionably in England that it took its rise. Neglecting some vague and unrecorded traditions which ascribed the origin of "Romescot" to Ini, King of Wessex, in 727, we are possibly on firmer ground if we identify the beginnings of this contribution with a sum of 355 marces yearly, promised by Offa of Mercia in 796, and confirmed by the pope's legates at the Synod of Chelsea in 787. The promise is mentioned in an extant letter from Pope Leo III to Kenulf, Otto's successor (Hadland and Stubbs, "Concilia," III, 145, 525; cf. ibid., 538). It is stated that the money was to be applied to the relief of the poor and to providing lights for the churches of Rome and, rather strangely, nothing is said of the support of the Anglo-Saxon School ("Schola Saxorum") in the Borgo, which Peppe Alexander II and later chroniclers closely associated with the beginnings of Peterspence. Again it seems certain that Ethelwulf, after his visit to Rome with his son Alfred (c. 853) ordered that three hundred marces be paid yearly to the pope's legates at the Synod of Chelsea (Asker, ed. Stevenson, 15, 211). Whether this was a new grant, or a confirmation of the tribute of Offa, is not clear (cf. Lichermann, "Uber die Leges Eadwardi," 55); neither is it certain whether this sum of 350 marces was to be provided out of the royal exchequer or collected in pennies from the people. We only know that no long afterwards, during the reign of Alfred, the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle speaks of the conveyance to Rome of "the donation of the Wessex folk and their king" (cf. Chron. Æthelwardi, a. d. 888), and that in the code known as the "Dooms of Edward and Guthrum," which no doubt represents the legislation of Alfred's reign, we find for the first time mention of a certain sum being paid in arrears by the people. Under Edmund (941-46), at a great council of the clergy and laity held in London at Easter time, "Rumfoth" was declared to be one of the dues which must be paid by every man under pain of excommunication, and a later ordinance under Edgar speaks of it as the "heart-penny" and enjoins with threats of heavy penalties that it must be paid by St. Peter's Massday, i.e. "Lamasan," the feast of St. Peter's Chains (1 August). That the tax was in fact collected and sent to Rome in coins of small value, archaeological evidence has proved. In 1883 a hoard of 835 coins was discovered in Rome, apparently near the site of one of the old papal palaces. Amongst all these were Anglo-Saxon silver pennies, 217 of them being the imprint of King Edward the Elder, and 293 of Æthelstan, none of them being later than the year 917.

There can be no doubt that this find represents an instalment of Peterspence sent to Rome just as it had been collected, and the conclusion is confirmed by some references to an earlier date.

A remarkable letter of King Cnut, written in Rome in 1027 to his people in England, expresses in solemn terms his devotion to the Holy See and enjoins that Peterspence and some other ecclesiastical taxes should be paid before his return to England. "Cnut," says Dr. Jensen, "undoubtedly renewed and confirmed the donation from England to the papal court on the occasion of this pilgrimage to Rome." The manner of levying the tax is, however, imperfectly understood, for, as Lichermann has shown (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1896, p. 716), M. Fabre is mistaken in supposing that he has found the text of Cnut's agreement in the "Librum Centum." In spite of Cnut's good will, considerable negligence on the part of Peterspence continued under the Anglo-Saxon kings. After the Norman Conquest, St. Gregory VII addressed a formal demand to King William in 1074, "Concerning the Peterspence to be collected in England," he wrote, "we charge you to watch over it as if it were your own revenue. After some delays the tax was formally paid and a written refusal of feudal homage to the papacy, if justified by any precedent, he formally recognized the claim to Peterspence and promised that the arrears should be made up. But though the contribution on the whole was paid, and though various efforts and accommodations were made by the popes and their successors in England, it seems clear that a collection of Peterspence was at hardly any time carried out in a way that was satisfactory to the Holy See. Innocent III on 28 Jan., 1214, wrote indignantly to the English bishops that "certain prelates having collected these pence [parsnarios] in our name, have not been ashamed to retain the greater part for their own use. The payers, on the other hand, were paid for their use for 1000 marks or more" (Pothast, "Regesta," no. 2655). This language, as Dr. Jensen forcibly urges, seems inconsistent with the idea of any formal composition assented to by the Holy See, in virtue of which the popes agreed to farm the whole proceeds of Peterspence for a payment of 300 marks. It was only after the papal See exacted from the payers of 300 (or more strictly 290) marks was the solution practically arrived at, and we even know the proportions in which this amount was levied upon the different dioceses of England.

Another point to be noted is that both before and after the surrender of the kingdom by King John, who made England the first country in which a certain confusion seems sometimes to have existed between Peterspence and the feudal tribute, called in Latin cenusa, which was paid as the price of the papal protection. The two, however, were really quite distinct. In 1317 Edward II acknowledged that the annual feudal tribute of 1000 marks had not been paid for many years, and that as a consequence certain solemn engagements to pay off the arrears by instalments. This promise was never fulfilled. Edward III paid this tribute for a time, but would not accept any responsibility for any outstanding debts. After 1343 no further payments were made, and in 1366 the tribute was formally repudiated, and abolished by Parliament. On the other hand the sum of 300 marks, which was annually due to the pope as Peterspence, can be shown to have been collected and sent at least intermittently down to Henry VIII's breach with Rome. It was abolished in 1531, and though temporarily revived under Mary, it was not found possible at that time to levy it throughout England.

In South Saxony and Lower Bavaria, and in Iceland, countries whose religious traditions can be shown in a number of different ways to have been borrowed from England, it seems clear that a contribution of a Peterssen, Gerlac (Gerlacus Peter), b. at Dover, 1377 or 1378; d. 18 Nov., 1411. He entered the Institution of the Brethren of Common Life, and devoted his time to calligraphy, transcription of manuscripts, education, and prayer. He became connected with many illustrious contemplatives, men e.g. John Ruysbroeck; Florant Radewyn; Henry Kalkar; Gerard Gerlacus; and John of Huyden. John Vos of Huyden. When Radewyn founded a monastery of regular canons at Winchelheim, in 1386, Gerlac followed him, and remained there till 1403 as a simple clerk; he had no other employment than that of a sexton. He has been called another Kempis, and several critics have ascribed to Kempis words or theories which belong to Gerlac. Gerlac left his brethren to come back to his cell, where, as he said, "somebody was waiting for him." It has been maintained that the "Imitation" reproduces several ideas and the general spirit of Gerlac's ascetic works. In fact, Thomas a Kempis inserted into the work, a copy of which he wrote in 1411, the passage of the "Soliloquies" where Gerlac says that he would feel no pain, if necessary for the greater glory of God, to be crucified. This passage is an interpolation, which was soon deleted from the "Imitation." The difference between the ascetic theories of Gerlac and those of the author of the "Imitation" are numerous and deep enough to make any similarities apparent.

Peter the Hermit, b. at Amiens about 1050; d. at the monastery of Neufmoutier (Laigle), in 1115. His life has been embellished by legend, and he has been wrongfully credited with initiating the movement which resulted in the First Crusade. While the contemporary historians mentioned him only as one of the numerous preachers of the crusade, the later historians, especially Albert of Aix, who visited the Holy Land under the patronage of William of Tyre, gave him an all-important role. According to Albert of Aix Peter having led during some years the rigorous life of a hermit undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and suffered much at the hands of the Turks. One day when he was asleep in the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre, Our Lord appeared to him and ordered him to ask for credentials from the Patriarch of Jerusalem and to go to Europe proclaiming the miseries which had befallen the Christians of the Orient. Peter obtained the patriarchal letters and sought Urban II, who, moved by his recital, came to preach the crusade at Clermont ("Hist. Hierosol," I, 2). According to William of Tyre (I, 11), it was of his own accord that Peter went to find the pope. The pilgrimage of Peter is mentioned by Anna Comna (Alexiad, X, 8), who, born in 1083, could know nothing of this history except through tradition; she relates, however, that he could not get as far as Jerusalem, and that, resolved to undertake the journey, he resolved to send a second pilgrimage in order to be able to go to the Holy Sepulchre attended by a goodly company. It is evidently absurd to ascribe the Crusades to such an insignificant cause. Because of the silence of contemporaries and the later contradictory accounts, even the fact of the pilgrimage of Peter is doubtful, while it is impossible to assign to him the role of promoter of the crusade. The merit of this belongs solely to Pope Urban II (see CRESADES). Writers like Albert of Aix wished to deprive the pope of this honour in order to attribute it to the ascetics so popular at that time in Europe. It is absolutely certain that it was only after the Council of Clermont that Peter commenced to preach the crusade.

In March, 1096, he led one of the numerous bands going to the East; his enthusiastic eloquence is described by the chroniclers. He arrived with his army at Constantinople 1 August, 1096. After a toilsome march as far as Nicomedia Peter pitched his camp at Civitot and seeing his army without the slightest sign of submitting to Constantine, turned to the Emperor Alexius. During his absence, the crusaders, commanded by Walter the Penniless, were massacred by the Turks near Nicara (Oct., 1096). Peter assembled the remnants of his band and in May, 1097, joined the army of Godfrey of Bouillon near Nicomedia. After this he had but an unimportant part in.

In Jan., 1098, at the siege of Antioch, he even attempted to desert the army, but was prevented by Tancred. In spite of this cowardice he was one of the envoys sent to Kerboga. On his return to Europe he founded the monastery of Neufmontier. See Crusades.

Peter Ursolus (Orosius, Ambrosius, b. at Rivo Alto, Province of Udine, 927; d. at Cuxa, 10 January 987) is less probable. Sprung from the wealthy and noble Venetian family, the Ursoli, Peter fled from his youth an earnest Christian life. In the service of the republic, he distinguished himself in naval battles against the pirates. In 946 he married a noble Venetian lady, Fellicia, a son of this marriage, who bore the same name as his father, also became the thousand Venice (961-1000). On 11 Aug., 976, the Doge Pietro Candido fell a victim to a conspiracy, whose members, in their anxiety to obtain possession of him, set fire to his palace, thereby destroying not only this building, but also the churches of San Marco, San Teodoro, and Santa Maria di Zobenigo, as well as about a thousand houses. Pietro had himself chosen doge in San Pietro di Castello, but it was only out of regard for his obligations towards his native land that he allowed himself to be prevailed upon to accept the office. The tradition recorded by Peter Damian (Vita s. Romualdi, V, in P. L., CXLIV, 960), that Peter had taken part in the conspiracy which had caused his master's death from the world was due to his desire to expiate therefor, is without foundation. As one might expect from his personal piety, the new doge showed himself a zealous patron of churches and monasteries as well as an able ruler. He had the doge's palace and the church of San Marco rebuilt at his own expense, procuring in Constantinople for the latter the first golden altar-covering (Pala d'oro), and frequently reduced the sums to persons injured by the fire and a similar sum to the poor. He renewed the treaty with Capodistria, and succeeded in averting from the republic the vengeance of Candido's family, especially of his wife Wahlbrada, niece of Empress Adelaide, and his son Vitus. His son was dead. About this time, through the influence of Abbé Guissard and of Pietro Cancio (a Benedictine monastery at the foot of the Pyrenees, in the territory of Roussillon), he decided to enter a monastery, leaving Venice secretly with the abbot and two companions in the night of 1-2 September, 987. As a monk in the abbey of Cuxa, he presented to his spiritual brothers a model of humility, zeal for prayer, and charity. For a period he was under the spiritual guidance of St. Romuald (q. v.). As early as the eleventh century the veneration of Peter Ursolus as a saint was approved by the Bishop of Elne. In 1751 Clement XII ratified this cult, and appointed 14 January as his feast.

Petit-Didier, Matthew, Benedictine theologian and ecclesiastical historian, b. at Saint-Nicolas-du-Port in Lorraine, 18 December, 1657; d. at Senones, 15 July (June?), 1728. After studying at the Jesuit college at Nancy he joined the Benedictine Congregation of St-Vannes, in 1675, at the monastery of St-Mihiel. In 1682 he was appointed professor of philosophy and theology. In 1699 he was canonically elected Abbot of Bourxville, but could not take possession because the Duke of Lorraine had given the abbey in commendam to his own brother. He was elected Abbot of Senones in 1715, but got possession only after a lengthy dispute with another claimant. He became president of his congregation in 1723 and two years later Benedict XIII appointed him Bishop of Tarascon in partibus in reward for his opportune "Traité sur l'Erection de la Couronne de la royale de la pape" (Luxembourg, 1721). The work was forbidden in France and Lorraine by the Parliaments of Paris and Metz; it was translated into Italian (Rome, 1746); and into Latin by Gallus Cartier, O.S.B. (Luxembourg, 1727), it is printed also in Migne, "Cursus theolog," IV, 1141-1416. He acted especially pleasing to the pope, because Petit-Didier was guided by the "Declaration of the French Clergy" in 1682, had formerly been an appellant from the Constitution "Unigenitus." The remaining works of Petit-Didier are: "Remarques sur la Bibliothèque de l'Archéactique M. Dupin" (Paris, 1691-95), in which he points out many errors; "Dissertation historique et théologique dansquelle on examine quel a été le sentiment du Concile de Constance et des principaux Théologiens qui y ont assisté, sur l'autorité du pape et sur son infallibilité" (Luxembourg, 1724), in which the author defends the opinion that the decree of the Council of Constance concerning the superiority of a general council over the pope was only in the time of a schism; "Dissertationes historico-chronologicae in Vetus Testamentum" (Toul, 1699); "Justification de la morale et de la discipline de Rome et de toute l'Italie" (1727), a reply to an anonymous treatise entitled: "La morale des Juïtes et la constitution Unigenitus comparée à la morale des païens.

His brother, Jean-Joseph, a Jesuit theologian and canonist, was born at Saint-Nicolas-du-Port in Lorraine, on 23 October, 1664; and died at Pont-à-Mousson, on 10 August, 1756. Entering the Society of Jesus, 16 May, 1683, he was professor 2 February, 1704, and taught belles-lettres, philosophy, and canon law at St-Sacrement from 1724 to 1729. At Pont-à-Mousson from 1701 to 1708. About 1730 he became the spiritual director of Duchess Elizabeth-Charlotte of Lorraine. A few years later he returned to the Jesuit house at Saint-Nicolas where he spent the remainder of his life. His chief works are: "De justitia, jure et legibus" (Pont-à-Mousson, 1704); "Remarques sur la théologie de Barère, Gérard-Juvenin" (1708), a refutation of the Jansenist errors of Juenin; "Les Saints enlevés et restitués aux Juïtes" (Luxembourg, 1738), concerning Saints Francis Xavier and John Francis Regis; "Traité de la cléture des maisons religieuses de l'an et de l'autre sera" (Nancy, 1726, 1744); "Lettre sur les Vies des Saints du Sieur Balle" (Cologne, 1780); "Les prets par obligation stipulative d'interest usités en Lorraine et Barrois" (Nancy, 1745), a ca-

Petitions to the Holy See.—I. Mode of Petitioning.—Faculties, indults, dispensations, and other favours, the granting of which is reserved to the Holy See, must be asked by means of a petition in writing presented to the sovereign pontiff, regularly through the medium of one of the Sacred Congregations of the Roman Curia. Under the new constitution of the Roman Curia by Pius X, any private person may personally approach and petition the Holy See. But it is always well, and often necessary, to present commendatory letters of the petitioner's ordinary, as in the case of faculties, dispensations, and such like. It is also frequently advisable to make use of an agent in Rome, who can attend to the matter personally. For this reason the letter may be composed or even provided he be acceptable to the Sacred Congregation with which he has to treat. (Cf. Const. "Sacienti Consilio", Normae communes, c. ix.)

II. Form and Contents of the Petition.—The petition should be written on a double sheet of white paper of the foolscap or large quarto size; and the text of the letter written in the second quarter of the sheet, leaving a margin of one inch all around. The official languages of the Curia are still Latin, Italian, and French; but documents in German, English, Spanish, and Portuguese are now authorized (cf. Const. "Sacienti Consilio", Normae communes, c. ix.). It is fitting, however, that petitions sent by episcopal curia and by ecclesiastics in general, and those that have reference to the sacraments, should be written in the Church's official language, Latin. The petition should be addressed to the pope himself, and should therefore begin with the words "Beati Petri of Rome". The petitioner should then give his full name, place of residence, and diocese. (These are omitted in petitions to the Sacred Penitentiary.) Next should follow a clear and concise statement of the favour desired, the reasons for the petition, and all the information necessary to enable the Holy See to arrive at its decision. The omission of material points or the commission of substantial errors in the petition may invalidate the dispensation or indulgenced granted. Thus, petitions for matrimonial dispensations must express: (1) the Christian names and surnames of the petitioners; (2) the diocese of origin or actual domicile; (3) the exact nature of the impediment; (4) the degree of consanguinity, affinity, etc.; (5) the number of the impediments; (6) various circumstances (Instruction of S. Congr. of Propaganda, 9 May, 1877). The petition should not be concluded in the form of a letter, but with the abbreviated formula "Et Deus, etc." or "Quare, etc." At the foot of the petition the address of the person to whom the reply is to be sent (if it is not to be transmitted through an agent) should be written.

III. Destination of Various Petitions.—All petitions in matrimonial cases are dealt with by the Congr. de disciplina Sacramentorum, except those that have to do with the internal forum (i.e., confessional and occult cases), which go to the Sacred Penitentiary, and those into which the marriage might reasonably deviate, which fall under the jurisdiction of the Holy Office. The Congr. de disciplina Sacramentorum has charge, too, of all those connected with the sacraments and the Mass, with the exception of their rites and ceremonies, the regulation of which belongs to the Congregation of Rites. Hence petitions for the solution of liturgical difficulties should be sent to the latter Congregation; petitions, e.g., for a private oratory, reservation of the Blessed Sacrament, non-fasting communion, etc., to the former. The Congregation of the Council deals with petitions proposed by the nations, or for the Church, ecclesiastical discipline, confessional affairs, and the administration of church property. All matters concerning religious, whether individuals or communities, with one or two exceptions, are in the hands of the Congr. de Religionibus. Finally, all the business of these Congregations still remains, and the Congr. of Propaganda, is transmitted through that Congregation, with the exception of the affairs of religions as such.

Petra, titular metropolitan see of Palæstina Tertia. Under the name of Sela (the rock) this region is described in Abulfeda, III, 3 sqq., as an eagle's nest on the mountain top. It is also called Petra (XXXVII, 11), IV Kings (xiv, 7), and II Par. (xxxv, 11). In the two last-mentioned passages it is related that towards the end of the ninth century B.C. Ammasias, King of Jerusalem, vanquished the Edomites, captured Sela, and cast from "the steep of a rock" 10,000 captives, who were dashed to pieces. He then called Sela, Jebel Qelt (Jebel-tehle), of which there is no trace in history. If these Biblical texts really relate to Petra, others in which there is mention of Sela refer to other localities. Petra was not then the capital city of the kingdom of Edom. This rank was held by Bosra, and Petra seems to have been a city of little importance whether in times of danger the chieftains fled with their treasures and dwelt in the caves as in houses.

When the Rock was spoken of in 312 B.C. by Diodorus Siculus (XIX, 94-100), it was no longer inhabited by Edomites, who had been crowded into Southern Palæstine, but by Arabian merchants, the Nabataeans or the Nabatæn, both of the Arabian tribes, 1, 2 of the Arabian, 10, 13, 14, 22, 27-28, 31; Is., ix. 7). It is difficult to determine when they began to occupy the region. When conquered by Aramaic (610 B.C.), the Nabataeans were a powerful North Arabian tribe which had fought its way as far as the countries of Edom, Moab, and Ammon. In the fourth century B.C. the Nabataeans were masters of the country and servants of the intermediate tribes between Arabia and Egypt, and between Arabia and Syria. The wealth secured in Petra attracted the covetousness of Athens, general of Antigonus (312 B.C.), who took it by surprise in the absence of the men, who on their return surprised the Greeks, massacred them, and sent presents to Antigonus that they might be free to continue their commerce. A second attempt, made by Demetrius, son of Antigonus, was equally unsuccessful (Diol. Sic., XIX, 94-100). There was then formed a Nabataean kingdom of which Petra was the capital and which extended from Arabia Felix to Hauran. The first known king was Aretas I (II Mach., v. 8). The following, according to M. Dussaud in the "Journal Asiaticque" (Paris, 1901, pp. 189-385), is the list of known sovereigns: Aretas I (109 B.C.); Aretas II (110-96); Obodas I (about 90); Rabel I (about 87); Aretas III (87-62); Obodas II (about 62-47); Malchus I (about 47-30); Obodas III (30-18); Aretas IV (18-7); Rabel II (75-101); Malchus III (101-166). Aretas IV gave Petra its Graeco-Roman character. From his reign and that of Aretas IV date most of the beautiful buildings still preserved. Petra was definitely annexed to the Roman Empire in A.D. 106 by nonional treatise: "Sancti Patris Ignatii de Loyola exer- citia spiritualia tertio probationis anno per mensas a Patribus Societatis Jesu oecumenica" (Prague, 1755; Paris, 1889).

Michael Ott.
Cornelius Palma, lieutenant of Trajan. From it was formed the Province of Arabia, "redacta in fernam provinciam Arabam", as Trajan's sign-posts read, extending from Bostra in Hasaram to the Red Sea. In 256 the province was divided into Arabia Augusta Libanesis on the north, with Bostra as metropolis, and Arabia on the south, with Petra as metropolis. Twelve years later Southern Arabia was united with the Province of Palestine to be again detached in the second half of the fourth century between 338 and 390, and to constitute thenceforth Palestina Tertia or Palatina Suntaris, with Petra as metropolis. The custom arose of calling it Arabia Petraea, because of the city of Petra, and not with the implication that the region was rocky, for it is rather fertile. After a visit from the Emperor Hadrian Petra took the surname of Hadriana, found on the coins and on some inscriptions.

Christianity was introduced into Petra doubtless at an early date, for in the time of Strabo, who has described the country (N. I. iv. 21 sq.), Greek and Latin inscriptions which he肢her. Amongst its bishops Le Quién (Oriens christ., i. i, 721-8) mentions St. Asterius, whose feast is celebrated on 27 June, one of the defenders of the Council of Nicea and St. Athanasius; his contemporary Germanus, probably an Asian; John (ibid., 536), biographer of St. Theodosius the Cenabite; Athenogenes, a relative of the Emperor Maurice (end of the sixth century). An inscription indicates likewise a bishop by the name of Jason (probably fifth century). The Diocese of Petra in Palestine, mentioned by Le Quién (ibid., i. 663-70), who relied on a faulty text of St. Athanasius, never existed. In the time of John Mechos (seventh century) Petra was a flourishing monastic centre, but the decline of the city was even then far advanced, because the direction of commerce had changed and the prosperity of Palmyra had injured that of Petra. When the Franks took possession of the country in the twelfth century and founded their Trans-Jordanian principality they established somewhat prior to 1116 a stronghold called "Le Vaux Mosée", a translation of the Arabic name Ouadi-Moussa, the ruins of which have been discovered near the village of El-Dji. It was captured by the Arabs, first in 1114 and definitively in 1118. The Latin archiepiscopal, called Petra Deserti, which was established by the crusaders in 1168, must not be confused with our Petra, the former is Charac-Mésa, the ancient capital of the Nabateans, now El Kerak (Le Quién, ibid., i. 1305; Du Cange, Les familles d'Outre-mer, Paris, 1859, p. 755; Eibel, Hierarchia catholica mediæ axi, i. 418).

Petra, now Ouadi-Moussa, is completely ruined. Of the Greco-Roman city there remain, besides the theatre hewn from the rock, only shapeless ruins; but the tombs dug in the sides of the mountain surrounding the city are one of the wonders of the world. There are more than 2000, of different periods. Archaeology, it is true, regards some of them as temples. As the red sandstone from which the tombs are hewn is veined with a variety of colours, and as the light is dazzling, this city of the dead presents the appearance of a veritable fairy-land, the like of which is not to be seen elsewhere in the world. Recently during the building and the site of the altar of sacrifice have been discovered. When the late Archbishop of New York, Michael Augustine Corrigan, was coadjutor to Cardinal McIntosh, his titular see was that of Petra.

Petrarch, Francesco, Italian poet and humanist, b. at Arezzo, 20 July, 1304; d. at Arquà, 19 July, 1374. His father, Petracco or Petracolo (a name which was later adopted as his cognomen, changing it to Petrarca) came of a family belonging originally to the region of the Valdarno, and was already settled for some time at Florence. There Set Petrarca acted as clerk of one of the courts of justice, but with his brother he fled to exile. The Guephs he was banished in 1302, and went to Arezzo. Francesco’s earliest years were spent chiefly at Arezzo, in the ancient district of the Province of Tuscany, on the borders of the principality of Siena, which he afterwards entered as a knight, and where he obtained the protection of the latter. In 1304 he entered the monastery of Strado, and soon afterwards entered the Franciscan Order, and was sent to the university of Paris, where he remained three years, and was successively successively assistant, taught by St. Francis, and at last his chief of his favouite ancient authors. When Set Petrarca died in 1323, Francesco returned to Avignon and took minor orders, which permitted him to enjoy church benefices and only bound him to the daily reading of his Office. He entered rather freely into the gay and fashionable life at Avignon, and there on Good Friday (1327) he saw for the first time Laura, the lady who was to be the inspiration of his most famous work. In spite of what he himself says as to his first encounter with Laura, many persons have doubted her real existence. The majority of critics, however, believe that she was truly a lady in the flesh, and some identify her with a certain Laura, the wife of Hugues de Sale (d. 1324). There would seem to be some foundation for romance in such an attachment, yet the weight of authority is in favour of regarding it as a genuine one productive of true and poignant emotion in Petrarca, however Platonic it may have remained.

About 1330 the poet began a period of restless wandering, and in 1333 he made a journey through northern France and through Germany, recording his observations and experiences in his letters. Back at Avignon for a while, and now invested with a canonical benefice, he set forth for Italy, in 1336, in the company of some members of the Colonna family, with which he had been closely allied for some time past, and in January, 1337, he entered Rome for the first time. By the end of the year he appears to have settled in Vaucluse, and there he found the peace and the inspiration that produced some of his best lyrics. Accepting an invitation to go to Rome on Easter Sunday, 1341, he was publicly crowned as poet and historian in the Capitoli. For a number of years he wandered about from one Italian city to another, seeking the codices that preserved the priceless literary works of antiquity (he certainly discovered works of Cicero and parts of the "Institutiones" of Quintilian), and occasionally occupying clerical posts. He formed a friendship with Cola di Rienzi, and in 1347 saluted him in verse as the restorer of the order of the ancient Roman Republic. A friendship of a greater importance was that which he now contracted with Boccaccio, who, like himself, desired to promote humanistic studies and researches. Refusing an offer to assume the rectorship of the Florentine Studio (or University) just established, he resumed his peripatetic wanderings, spending a good part of the time at Venice, and accompanying there for a while by Boccaccio and by Leo Pilatus, from whom both he and Boccaccio had hoped to gain some direct knowledge of Greek and its literature. The transfer of the pontificated Court back to Rome in 1347 filled him with unbounded joy.

As a scholar, Petrarch possessed encyclopedic knowledge, and much of this he has set down in his Latin works, which constitute the larger part of his production in both prose and verse. They include the "Africa" in hexameters, dealing with the Second Punic war and especially with the adventures of Scipio Africanus, in pseudo-epic fashion and in a way which hardly excites our admiration, although the author deemed it his greatest work; the "Carmina budesia" made up of twelve eclogues; the "Epistola morisque" in three books, hexameters, interesting for the autobiographical matter which they contain; several moral treatises, such as the "De contemptu mundi", which consists of three dialogues between the author and St. Augustine, both of them in the presence of Truth; the "De vita solitaria"; the "De oculo religiosorum", praising monastic life, etc.; some "Psalmi penitentialis" and some prayers; a number of historical and geographical works, among which figure the "Rerum memorabilium libri quattuor" and the "De viris illustribus", treating of illustrious men from Romans down to Titus; some invectives (especially the "Invectiva in Gallum", assailing the French); a few orations; and finally his very many letters, which cover the whole course of his life from 1325 to the end of his days, the interesting of which is the "Epistola ad posterius", written after 1350, and furnishing an autobiography of considerable importance. A Latin comedy, "Philologia", has not yet been discovered.

In spite of the magnitude of Petrarch's composition in Latin and the stress which he put upon it himself, his abiding fame is based upon his Italian verse, and this verse comprises compilations, the "Triomphi" and the "Canzoniere". The "Triomphi", written interposito, and making large use of the vision already put to so good a use by Dante, is allegorical and morbid in nature. In the "Triomphi" we have a triumphal procession in which there take part six leading allegorical figures: Love, Chastity, Death, Fame, Time, and Divinity. Chastity triumphs over its predecessor, and finally Divinity triumphs over them all and remains supreme, as the symbol of peace, eternal life, and the everlasting union of the poet with his beloved Laura. The "Canzoniere", the poet's masterpiece, and one of the imperishable monuments of the world's literature, is first put into shape by the author and made known by him under the title of "Rerum vulgarium fragmenta". It consists of some 2400 (there are the more numerous of canzon, of sestine, of ballate, and of madrigals. The love motive prevails in the majority of these, but dialectical and pathetic feeling regulates some of the most famous of them, and still others are infused with moral and other sentiments. Some lyrics bearing apparent relations to the "Canzoniere", but excluded by the poet from its final make-up, have been published under the title of "Extravaganti". In the strictly anonymous part of the "Canzoniere", Petrarch sings of his lady living and dead, and, reviving in his psychological manner the methods of the earlier da Petrov School, particularly reflects the spirit of Cino da Pistoia. But all is not imitation on the part of his Muse: his inner man is expressed in even greater degree than the literary formalism which he owed to his

The "Canzoniere", the poet's masterpiece, and one of the imperishable monuments of the world's literature, is first put into shape by the author and made known by him under the title of "Rerum vulgarium fragmenta". It consists of some 2400 (there are the more numerous of canzon, of sestine, of ballate, and of madrigals. The love motive prevails in the majority of these, but dialectical and pathetic feeling regulates some of the most famous of them, and still others are infused with moral and other sentiments. Some lyrics bearing apparent relations to the "Canzoniere", but excluded by the poet from its final make-up, have been published under the title of "Extravaganti". In the strictly anonymous part of the "Canzoniere", Petrarch sings of his lady living and dead, and, reviving in his psychological manner the methods of the earlier da Petrov School, particularly reflects the spirit of Cino da Pistoia. But all is not imitation on the part of his Muse: his inner man is expressed in even greater degree than the literary formalism which he owed to his by itself, no serious fault has yet been proved against him. If we cannot yet confidently acquit him of all blame, that is chiefly because first-hand evidence is very deficient; but the nearer we get to first-hand evidence, the more does Petre appear pure. Before James's accession (6 Feb., 1682) he had shown good, but not extraordinary, virtue and ability, and was then vice-provincial of his order. James soon made him clerk of the closet, but without any political power. On 9 Oct. the king wrote to ask the pope to make him a bishop in paribus, and the pope refused (24 Nov., 1685). The first application made little or no stir; it did not even reach the ear of the general of the Jesuits till the pope told him of it, 22 May, 1686. At that time Lord Castlemaine, having arrived in Rome as James's ambassador, had renewed the application, while James urged it forcibly on Mgr. d'Adia, the papal nuncio in London (28 June). But if the pope was rightly immovable, the king was characteristically obstinate.

Next year (1687) Castlemaine renewed the petition with a doggedness that "excited the bile" of the pontiff (March). James backed up the application by letters of 16 June and 24 Sept., and now requested Petre to withdraw their case. Petre had made a cardinal; but the pope (16 Aug. 22 Nov.) steadily refused. So far, however, he was not to be attributed to Petre's ambition, and the general of the order wrote pressingly (22 Nov., 20 Dec., and 10 Jan., 1688) for explanations. James himself now sent letters in Petre's defence to pope and general (22 Dec.), while the provincial and Petre also wr. te, setting forth all they had done to persuade James to drop. All these letters are unfortunately lost, except those from the king. We know, however, that they completely vindicated Petre's character in the eyes of the pope and of the general. A further cause of irritation, however, had been given by the admission of Petre to the rank of privy councillor (11 Nov., 1687), and the oath of allegiance taken on that occasion, exactly the same as that of the Jacobite lords, was much commented upon, and laid before the pope. But a better understanding now prevailed at Rome, and the incident dropped.

In England, on the other hand, after his nomination as privy councillor, the popular charges against him became more insulting than ever, and reached their height in the application from the bishop of London to the prince (James Francis Stuart). Though the worst of these charges stand self-refuted, it is to be regretted that want of documents prevents our defending the father against others, though the presumptions are generally in his favour. If, as it is said, he persuaded James to dismiss the Committee of Dorchester (Mrs. Sedley), he could also be said to have deserved it. At Westminster, the fortunes of his house would probably have ended differently. Like everyone in James's entourage, Petre at first believed in Sunderland, but he was also among the first to de-tect that minister's duplicity, and to break with him. When his policy was nullified witnesses (and it will be remembered that there was a party against him, even among Catholics), and studying those in sympathy with the Jesuit, we seem to perceive in him a steadfast, kind-hearted English priest, devoting himself with energy to the opportunities for spiritual good that opened out before him. With little gift for politics, nor paying much heed to them, he was nevertheless severely blamed when things went wrong. He was also regardless, almost callous, as to what was said about him by friend or foe.

Petrobrusians, heretics of the twelfth century so named from their founder Peter of Bruys. Our information concerning him is derived from the treatise of Peter the Venerable against the Petrobrusians and from a passage in Abelard. Peter was born perhaps at Bruis in south-eastern France. The history of his early life is unknown, but it is certain that he was a priest who had been absolved of his charge. He began his propaganda in the Diocese of Embrun. The first portion of his famous tradition is that he was cầuserated by his burning of crosses, east him into the flames. The bishops of the above-mentioned dioceses suppressed the heresy within their jurisdiction, but it gained such a hold on Narbonne, Toulouse, and in Gascony. Henry of Lusonius, a former Cluniac monk, adopted the Petrobrusians' teaching about 1135 and spread it in a modified form after its author's death. Peter of Bruys admitted the doctrinal authority of the Gospels in their literal interpretation; the other New Testament writings he probably considered valueless. He also rejected the authority of the ancient Church, and the Fourth Testament Epistles he assigned only a subordinate place as not coming from Jesus Christ Himself. He rejected the Old Testament as well as the authority of the Fathers and of the Church. His contempt for the Church extended to the clergy, and physical violence was preached and exercised against priests and monks. In the twelfth century it is indeed a necessary condition for salvation, but it is baptism preceded by personal faith, so that its administration to infants is worthless. The Mass and the Eucharist are rejected because Jesus Christ gave His flesh and blood but once to His disciples, and repetition is impossible. All external forms of worship, ceremonies and chant, are condemned. As the church buildings were destroyed, but in the same way the faithful, church buildings should be destroyed, for we may pray to God in a barn as well as in a church, and be heard, if worthy, in a stable as well as on an altar. No good work of the living can profit the dead. Crosses, as the instrument of the death of Christ, cannot deserve veneration; hence they were for the Petrobrusians objects of desecration and were destroyed in bonfires.

Petronilla, Saint, virgin, probably martyred at Rome at the end of the first century. Almost all the sixth- and seventh-century lists of the tombs of the most highly venerated Roman martyrs mention St. Petronilla's grave as situated in the Via Ardeatina near Sts. Nereus and Achilleus (De Rossi, "Roma sotterranea", I, 180-1). These notices have been completely confirmed by the excavations in the Catacomb of Domitilla. One topography of the graves of the Roman martyrs, "Epitome libri de locis sanctorum martyrum", locates on the Via Ardeatina a church of St. Petronilla, in whose honor a sarcophagus, as well as Petronilla, were buried (De Rossi, loc. cit., 180). This church, built into the above-mentioned catacomb, has been discovered, and the memorials found in it removed all doubt that the tombs of the three saints were once venerated (De Rossi in "Bullettino di archeol. crist.", 1874, 5 sqq.). A particularly interesting is the sarcophagus containing a deceased person (named Veneranda) into heaven, was discovered on the closing stone of a tomb in an underground crypt behind the apse of the basilica (Wilpert, "Die Malereien der Katakomben Rom", Freiburg, 1903, plate 213; De Rossi, ibid., 1875, 5 sqq.). Beside the saint's picture is her name: Petronilla Mart. (yr). That the painting was done shortly after 356 is proved by an inscription found in the tomb. It is thus clearly established that Petronilla was venerated at Rome as a martyr in the fourth century, and her testimony must be accepted as certainly historical, notwithstanding the later legend which recognizes her only as a virgin (see below). Another known, but unfortunately no longer extant, memorial was the marble sarcophagus which contained her remains, under Paul I (q.v.; 757-765) translated to St. Peter's. In the account of this in the "Liber Pontificalis" (ed. Du Bosen, I, 468) the inscription carved on the sarcophagus is given thus:

"Auctor Petroniliae Filiæ Dulestinæ" (of the golden Petronilla, the sweetest daughter). We learn, however, from extant sixteenth-century notices concerning this sarcophagus that the first word was "Aur. (Aureli), so that the martyr's name was Aurelia Petronilla. The second name comes from Petro or Petro Petronius, and, as the name of the great-grandfather of the Christian consul, Flavius Clemens, was Titus Flavius Petro, it is very possible that Petronilla was a relative of the Christian Flavius, who were descended from the senatorial family of the Aurelii. This theory would also explain why Peter, the father of the Flavian Domitilla. Like the latter, Petronilla may have suffered during the persecution of Domitian, perhaps not till later.

In the fourth-century Roman catalogue of martyrs' feasts, which is used in the "Martyrologium Hieronymi" as the name of a martyr seems to have been inserted. It occurs in the latter martyrology (De Rossi, "Roma sotterranea", I, 180), regarding Petronilla as a real daughter of St. Peter. In the Gothic apocryphal Acts of Sts. Nereus and Achilleus, the name is mentioned as the name of a daughter of St. Peter. It seems that in the second century, a daughter of St. Peter is mentioned, although her name is not given (Schmid, "Ein vorrömische gnostisches Originalwerk in koptischer Sprache" in "Sitzungsber. der Berliner Akademie", 1896, 539 sqq.; Lipsius, "Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten u. Apostellegenden", I, 1, Brunswick, 1887, 203 sqq.). The legend being widely propagated by these apocryphal Acts, Petronilla was identified at Rome with this supposed daughter of St. Peter, probably because of her name and the great antiquity of her tomb. As such, but now as a virgin, not as a martyr, she appears in the legendary Acts of the martyrs Sts. Nereus and Achilleus and in the famous "Liber Pontificalis" (loc. cit.). From this legend of St. Nereus and Achilleus a similar notice was admitted into the historical martyrologies of the Middle Ages and thence into the modern Roman Martyrology. In 757 the coffin containing the mortal remains of the saint was transferred to an old circular building (an apse) at the entrance of the basilica, dating from the end of the fourth century near St. Peter's. This building was altered and became the Chapel of St. Petronilla (De Rossi, "Inscriptiones christiane urbis Romae", II, 225). The saint subsequently appears as the special patroness of the treaties concluded between the popes and the Frankish emperors. At the rebuilding of St. Peter's in the sixteenth century, St. Petronilla's remains were translated to an altar (still dedicated to her) in the upper chapel of the side-aisle (near the cupola). Her feast falls on 31 May.

PETRUCI

Petrone, Saint, Bishop of Bologna, date of birth unknown; d. before 450. The only certain historical information we possess concerning him is derived from a letter written by Bishop Eucherius. (530-590) to Valentinian (567-571) and from Gennadius' "De viris illustribus," XLII (ed. Czepa, Munster, 1898, p. 91). Eucherius writes that the holy Bishop, Petronius, was then renowned in Italy for his virtues. From Gennadius we receive more detailed information: Petronius belonged to a noble family whose members occupied high positions at the imperial Court at Milan and in the provincial administrations at the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth centuries. His father (also named Petronius) was probably "præfectus praetorio," since a Petronius filled this office in Gaul in 402-8. Eucherius seems to suggest (P. L., L. 711 sqq.) that the letter was written to the bishop also held an important secular position. Even in his youth Petronius devoted himself to the practices of asceticism, and seems to have visited the Holy Places in Jerusalem, petroniiensis. About 432 he was elected and consecrated Bishop of Bologna, where he erected a church to St. Stephen, the building scheme of which was in imitation of the shrines on Golgotha and over the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem. The buildings belong approximately to the period when Leo I had basilicas erected in Rome and Gallia Placidia in Ravenna. Petronius is believed to have written a work on the life of the Egyptian monks (Vita paschali aegypti monachorum; the author of this work, however, is Petronius of Aquileia). The treatise "De ordinatione episcopi," bearing the name of Petronius as author, is by the elder Petronius, who was a man of eloquence and wide acquaintance with the secular sciences. Morin has published a sermon entitled "In ordinatione vel Natale episcopi" (Revue bénédictine, 1897, 3 sq.), which Gennadius ascribes to Bishop Petronius of Bologna, who was accused by Bishop Petronius of Verona, whom Czepa holds is Petronius of Bologna, but this assignment is not certain. According to Gennadius, Petronius died during the reign of Emperor Theodosius and Valentinian, i.e., before 450. In the twelfth century appeared a legendary life of the saint, whose relics were discovered in 1143. Shortly afterwards a church was erected in his honour at Bologna; a second, planned on a large scale, was begun in 1390, and built as far as the cross-aisle. In 1659 the building was resumed and the glorious Italian-Gothic church completed as it stands to-day. The feast of St. Petronius is celebrated on 4 October.

Petruci, Ottavio del, inventor of movable metal type for printing musical polyphonic music, born at Fossombrone, Italy, 18 June, 1466; d. there, 7 May, 1529. In 1498 he secured from the City Council of Venice a twenty years' patent for the exploitation of his invention. Beginning in 1501, he continued his publications for ten years at Venice, after which he turned his establishment over to Amadeo Scotti and Niccolò da Rafael. He afterwards secured from the papal authorities a fifteen-years' privilege or license for the Papal States. From 1513 to 1523 he operated a music-printing establishment in his native city, Fossombrone. Until 1901 Petruci was considered as the pioneer in the use of the movable metal type for the printing of liturgical books, but Dom Rafael Reetto (Leipzig, 1901, 1, 94), demonstrates that it was Ulric Han, or Hahn, a native of Ingolstadt, residing at Rome, who printed the first Missal in metal type notes in 1476. Petrucci's great advance consisted in the triple process (i.e., first the text and initials, then the lines, and lastly the notes) and the wonderful neatness and perfection with which the printing was done, so that his publications have not only survived but have been unequalled by any of his successors. They were surpassed in distinction by the works of his contemporaries in the eighteenth century. His work was of the greatest importance for the dissemination and preservation of the polyphonic compositions of his time, especially those of the Netherlands masters. In the libraries of Bologna, Treviso, the Paris Conservatoire, Vienna, Berlin, Munich, collections are preserved containing hundreds of his compositions. His first publication was attributed to several contemporary masters, such as Josquin Desprez, Hayne, de Orto, Obrecht, La Rue, Busnois, Compère, Gischelin, Agricola, Isaac, Okeghem, Tinctoris, and a host of others, many of whom would probably have been altogether forgotten but for these remarkable prints, now four hundred years old.

Petrus Alfonsus, converted Jew and controversialist, b. at Huesca, in the former Kingdom of Aragon, 1062; d. 1110. Previous to his conversion he was known as Moses Sephardi (the Spaniard). King Alfonso I of Aragon, whose physician-in-ordinary he became, stood sponsor at his baptism, which he received in his native town on St. Peter's day (29 June). He was raised to the dignity of subdeacon by his sponsor and he chose the name Petrus Alfonsus. His conversion was attributed by his former coreligionists to ignobility or dishonourable motives, he published a justification in a Latin work consisting of twelve dialogues between a Jew and a Christian. These dialogues were first printed at Cologne in 1536, and have since frequently been reprinted.

A second work of Petrus Alfonsus, based on Arabic sources, is entitled "Ecclesiastical Discipline" (Disciplina Clericaul). It has been translated into several languages and is preserved in numerous manuscripts. Labadie, Vicar-General of Avignon, published it at Paris in 1824 with a French translation of the fifteenth century. Another edition by J. W. Stacke appeared at Berlin in 1827. The text of both works of Petrus Alfonsus, preceded by biographical notices, may be found in Migne, CLXXI, 527-706.

Petrus Bernardinus, Florentine heretic, b. at Florence about 1475; d. 1502. His parents were common folk, and he himself lacked all higher education. But he was taught his faith with fanatical zeal by Savonarola, and, by diligent attendance at his sermons and zealous study of his writings, acquired a wide but superficial theological knowledge. Peter preached to the people in the public squares of Florence and, during the lifetime of Savonarola and after his death, he propagated secretly heretic and revolutionary doctrines. According to him, the Church must be renewed with the sword; until this was accomplished, there was no need to confess, since all priests, secular and regular, were unchristian. Accordingly to the Florentine chronicler, Cerretani, about twenty adherents of Savonarola formed a secret society and elected Peter their pope. The latter was named the first bishop of Savona-rola, and, by special ecclesiastical functions and anointed his followers with oil (the alleged anointment of the Holy Ghost). The members attended no Divine Service, but during their meetings prayed in spirit under the leadership of Peter, whom they regarded as a prophet. The association was discovered by the archbishop and at his request the Council of Florence presided over its meetings. In 1502 the members left the town secretly and proceeded to Mirandola, where they offered to the supposed Gian Francesco della Rovere, the crown of Savonarola, gave them a friendly reception. When, a little later, the count was besieged by two of his brothers, who claimed Mirandola, Peter declared it God's will that Gian Francesco should overcome his enemies. However, Mirandola was taken and the count lost his territory in August, 1502. The sectaries falling into Peter and some of his confederates were burned as heretics. Their leader was expelled or dispatched to Florence. The attempts of Protestant historians to stamp Peter as a forerunner of the Reformation cannot be historically justified.

Petrus Diaconus, the name of several men of note in ecclesiastical history and literature.

(1) One of the Scythian monks who appeared in 519 before Pope Hormisdas in connexion with the Theopaschite controversy. He wrote concerning this question his treatise "De incarnazione et generatione", the same time directed against the teaching of Faustus of Riez respecting grace and addressed to St. Fulgentius of Ruspe: in P. L., LXIII, 83-92; Bardenhewer, tr. Shahin, "Patrology", 548, 1908. (St. Louis).

(2) A disciple and friend of Gregory the Great; d. at Rome 12 March, 605 or 606. His question concerning the composition of Gregory's "Dialogues". He is also authority for the statement that the Holy Spirit sometimes hovered in the form of a dove over the great pope's head.

(3) A monk of Monte Cassino known also as Petrus Subsidicoccus; d. c. 900. He was subdeacon of the church of St. Januarius at Naples, and he continued the history of that episcopate (Gesta episcopi Neap.), an anonymous work which had already been added to by John the Deacon. He wrote the lives of several saints, including, according to some critics, that of Athanasius, Bishop of Naples ("Vita et translatio Athanasii ep. Neap.").

(4) Another monk of Monte Cassino, also called "the Librarian" (Librarius), b. c. 1025, d. probably c. 1140. A descendant of the Counts of Tusculum, he was offered in 1115 to the monastery of Monte Cassino. About 1127 he was forced to leave the abbey and retired to the neighbouring Atina, seemingly because he was an adherent of the Abbot Oderius. In 1137 he was allowed to return to Monte Cassino, where some time later he appeared before Emperor Lothair II, then in Italy, on behalf of his monastery. The sovereign was so pleased with him that he appointed him chaplain and secretary, and would probably have attached him permanently to his person had not Abbot Wilahld considered Peter's return necessary to the abbey. At Monte Cassino Peter became librarian and keeper of the archives, of which he compiled a register. Besides continuing the chronicle of Monte Cassino by Leo Marcianus (or Ostiensis) from 1075 to 1138, he wrote several historical works: "De viris illustribus Casimiriisbius"; "De ortu et obturio justorum Caesariusi"; "De locis sacris"; "Disciplina Casimiri"; "Rhythmus de Casimiriis dictis". He was instructed in the arts of painting by Jordan, the Passion of St. Phelps. He is vain and occasionally untruthful, but an entertaining writer. His works are in P. L., CLXXXIII, 763-1144.

He refused offers of professorships at Bologna and Padua, and also an appointment as his court astronomer to King Ladislas of Hungary, but went back to Vienna in 1450 to teach. He lectured on philosophy and classical literature. His scientific teaching was done chiefly in private, his most famous pupil being Johann Müller of Königsberg, later known as Regiomontanus. Peuerbach has been called the father of observational and mathematical astronomy in the West. He began to work up Ptolemy's "Almagest", replacing chords by sines, and calculating tables of sines for every minute of arc for a radius of 600,000 units. This was the first transition from the duodecimal to the decimal system. His observations were made with very simple instruments, an ordinary plumb-line being used for measuring the angles of stars. In 1461 he was invited to Rome to study Ptolemy in the original Greek and not from a faulty Latin translation. He accepted on condition that Müller go with him. On account of the master's death the pupil went alone to complete the work.

Peuerbach is also noted for his great attempt to reconcile the opposing theories of the universe, the so-called homocentric spheres of Ptolemy and Aristotle, with Ptolemy's epicyclic trains. This work, "Theoricae, etc.", had an enormous success and remained the basis of academic instruction in astronomy until years after Copernicus had swept away all these hypotheses. Twenty works are known. Among these the following are the most important: "Theorica novae planetarum, id est septem centum et unum books, mercando non octavi seu firmamentum" (1st ed., Nuremberg, 1460, followed by many others in Milan and Ingolstadt); "Sex prima libri epotomatici Almagesti", compiled by Regiomontanus (Venice, 1496; Basle, 1534; Nuremberg, 1550); "Tabulae eclipyseum super meridianos Viennensia" (2nd ed., Vienna, 1514); "Quadratum geometriculum meridiani" (Nuremberg, 1516); "Nova tabula sinuis de decem minutis in decem per mutas, etc.", compiled by Regiomontanus (Nuremberg, 1541).
suggestion of Maximilian these were published in 1565 under the title 'Romane vetustatissima fragmenta in Augstinae Vindeliciam exdeputo missa (ed. 1560, Mainz). In the "Sermones conviviales de finibus Germaniae contra Gallos", which goes under Peutinger's name, the ancient boundaries of Gaul and Germany are discussed. Peutinger also published many important sources for German history, among them the history of the Goths by Jordanes, that of the English by Walford by Paul Diaconus, and the "Columbia Urspergens" (see Konrad von Lichtenau), all of which appeared in 1515. The famous "Tabula Peutingeriana", a thirteenth-century copy of an old Roman map of the military roads of the empire, is not properly called after Peutinger, to whom it was bequeathed by its discoverer. Peutinger intended to publish it, but died before he could carry out his plan. Peutinger's magnificent collection of MSS., coins, and inscriptions remained in his family until 1714, when the last descendant, Ignace Peutinger, bequeathed it to the Jesuits of Augsburg. After the suppression of the order, part of it went to the town library, and part to Vienna.

Peuto (Petio, Petow), William, cardinal; d. 1558 or 1559. Though his parentage was long unknown, it is now established that he was the son of Edward Peuto of Chesterton, Warwickshire, and Goftaha, daughter of Sir Thomas Throckmorton of Coughton. He was educated by the Grey Friars and took his degree of B. A. at Oxford; but he was incorporated in Cambridge university, 1502-3, and became M. A. there in 1505. He was elected fellow of Queen's College in 1506, and on 14 June, 1510, was incorporated M. A. at Oxford. Entering the Franciscan Order, he became known for his business of life, and was appointed canon to Princess Mary. Later on he was elected Provincial of England and held that office when in 1532 he denounced the divorce of Henry VIII in the king's presence. He was imprisoned till the end of that year, when he went abroad and spent many years at Antwerp and elsewhere in the Low Countries, being absent from England in 1535. His name was included in the Act of Attainder passed against Cardinal Pole and his friends (31 Hen. VIII, c. 5), but he was in Italy at the time and remained there out of the king's reach. On 30 March, 1543, Paul III nominated him Bishop of Salisbury. He could not obtain possession of his diocese, nor did he attempt to do so, on the accession of Queen Mary in 1553, but resigned the see and retired to his old convent at Greenwhich. There he remained till Paul IV, who had known him in Rome and highly esteemed him, decided to create him cardinal and legate in place of Pole. But as Peuto was very old and his powers were failing, he declined both dignities. He was, however, created cardinal of St. Mary Major in 1557, and Queen Mary declared not to allow him to receive the hat, and the appointment was received with public derision. It was a tradition among the Franciscans that he was willed with stones by a London mob, and so injured that he shortly afterwards died (Parker, op. cit. below, p. 254). Other accounts represent him as dying in France. The date from which he was created cardinal (April, 1558) is not definite, nor is the order in which he succeeded, as on 31 October, 1558, Queen Mary wrote to the pope that she had offered to reinstate him in the Bishopric of Salisbury on the death of Bishop Capon, but that he had declined because of age and infirmity.

Pez (1) Bernhard, historian, b. 22 February, 1683, at Ybbs near Melk; d. 27 March, 1735, at Melk, southern Austria. Bernhard studied at Vienna and Krems, and in 1699 entered the Benedictine monastery at Melk. Having devoted himself to the classical languages, he was made professor in the monastery school in 1704, and in the same year went to the University of Vienna, where he devoted himself to the study of history, and in 1713, became librarian at Melk. As a model for his historical works he followed the French Benedictines of St. Maur. He studied the archives of the order at Melk and Vienna, and in 1715-17 he, with his brother whose interest in historical subjects he had excited, searched for manuscripts in the Austrian, Bavarian, and Swabian monasteries. In 1716 he published a plan for a universal Benedictine library, in which all the authors of the order, and their works, should be catalogued and reviewed. He obtained from the monasteries of his order no less than seven hundred and nine titles. He also had friendly literary relations with Johann v. Eckhart, Schonnat, Uffenbach, Schmincke, Mosheim, Linie, etc. In 1728 he accompanied Count Sinzendorf to France, where he made the acquaintance of Montauron, Martene, Durand, Le Texier, Calmet, etc., and enriched his collection from the libraries of the order. His chief works are: "Thesaurus anecdotorum novissimorum" (6 vol., Augsburg, 1721-9), a collection of exegetic, theological, philosophical, ascetic, and historical literary sources; "Bibliotheca ascetica" (12 vols., 1725-40), containing the sources of ascetic literature; "Bibliotheca Benedictina-Mariniana" (1716). In a controversy with the Jesuits he defended his order with the "Epistolae apologeticae pro Ordine S. Benedicti", 1716. In 1725 he published "Thomien des Abtes Gottfried von Admont (1165)", in two vols., and the minor philosophical works of Abbots Engelbert von Admont. His proposed monumental work, "Bibliotheca Benedictina Generalis", was never completed; his material is partly made use of in the "Historia rerum literaria O.S.B." by Ziegelauner-Legipont (1754). His manuscripts are preserved at Melk.

(2) Hieronymus, b. 24 February, 1685, at Ybbs; d. 14 October, 1762, at Melk. In 1703 he entered the novitiate at Melk and was ordained in 1711. He became a valuable assistant to his brother, after whose death he became librarian. His principal works are: "Scriptores rerum Austriacarum" (1721-15), in three volumes, a collection of over one hundred sources, even to-day valuable for Austrian history; "Acta S. Colomanni" (1713); "History of St. Leopold" (1765), Ziegelauner-Legipont, Hist. rei. int. o. B. (Augsburg, 1754), I, 466-30, III, 466-75; Weitzbach, Bes. Pfanner, Franz, abbot, b. at Langen, Vorarlberg, Austria, 1825; d. at Emmaus, South Africa, 24 May, 1900. In 1858 he was ordained a priest, and in 1866 appointed a curacy in his native diocese. Nine years later he was appointed an Austrian army chaplain in the Italian campaign against Napoleon III, but the war was over before he could take up his appointment. After serving as chaplain to the Sisters of Mercy at Agrarn for several years, he went to Rome, and there saw the Trappists for the first time. Whilst waiting for his bishop's permission to join this order, he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. In November, 1501, he was professed at the Trappist monastery of Marienwald in Austria, and was made sub-prior a few weeks later. He again went to Rome in 1506, where he organized the well-known monastery at Tre Fons, near the sanctuary of the Blessed Virgin. In 1510, he went to Turkey. The difficulties seemed insuperable, but in 1520 he was able to open the monastery of Mariann in Bosnia, which was raised to the status of an abbey in 1579. In that year Bishop Richards of the Eastern Vicariate of the Cape of Good Hope was in Europe, seeking Trappists to evangelize the Kafirs and to devote them to work. When all others had declined, the intrepid Abbot Pfister was the first to relinquish his settled abbey and face fresh difficulties in South Africa. At the end of July, 1890, he arrived at Dunbrody, the place purchased by Bishop Richards for the work. But on account of the drought, winds and baboons, he declared the site unsuitable after a trial of several years. With the permission of Bishop Jolivet, O.M.I., of the Natal Vicariate, he then (December, 1892) bought from the Land Colonization Company a part of the farm Zoekogat, near Pinetown. The fine monastery of Mariann in was built here, and it soon became the centre of a great work of civilization. Finding the need of a sisterhood to teach the Kafir girls, with characteristic energy he founded the Kafir Sisters of the Precious Blood, which was consecrated by the Bishop of Durban to the order of the Trappists in 1885. In 1885 Mariann was created an abbey, and Prior Franz Pfanner elected the first mitred abbot. But in 1893 he resigned his prelacy and began life again in the mission station of Emnins, where he remained until his death.

The missionary methods of Abbot Pfister and his successors have won the approval of all those interested in the natives of South Africa. Such various authorities as Mark Twain and the last Prime Minister of the Cape have spoken enthusiastically of the work. It has prospered exceedingly. At the date of Abbot Pfister's death there were 55 priests, 223 lay-brothers and 326 nuns working in 42 mission stations among the natives. Only a few months before Abbot Pfister's death the Holy See, at the petition of the Trappists of Mariann, made a considerable change in their status. The Cistercian Rule in its rigour, for which Abbot Pfanner was most zealous, was found to be an obstacle to missionary development in some particulars. Hence the name of the order was changed to that of Holy Benedictines, and they were given a milder rule on a three years' trial, after which the whole subject will again be submitted to the judgment of the Holy See.

SYDNEY R. WELCH.

Pfefferkorn, Johannes, a baptized Jew, b. probably at Nuremberg, 1460; d. at Cologne, between 1521 and 1524. In 1505, after many years of wandering, he, together with his wife and children, was converted to Christianity at Cologne. He soon became known through his efforts for the conversion of the Jews and his controversy with Reuchlin. In "Der Judenspiegel" (Cologne, 1507), he demanded that the Jews should give up the practice of usury, work for their living, attend Christian sermons, and do away with the books of the Talmud, which caused such hatred against Christianity. On the other hand, he condemned the persecution of the Jews as an obstacle to their conversion, and defended them against the charge of Christian heresy. Pfender was bitterly opposed by the Jews on account of this work, he virulently attacked them in "Wie die blinden Juden ihr Ostern halten" (1508); "Judenheirath" (1509); and "Judenfeind" (1509). Convinced that the principal source of the obduracy of the Jews lay in their books, he tried to have them seized and destroyed. He obtained from several Dominican convents the confessions of some Jews at Kymsgunde, the sister of the Emperor Maximilian, and through her influence to the emperor himself. On 19 August, 1509, Maximilian ordered the Jews to deliver to Pfenderkorn all books opposing Christianity. Pfenderkorn began the work of confiscation at Frankfort-on-the-Main; thence he went to Wurzburg, Mainz, Bamberg, Landshut, Munich, and Deutz. But a new imperial mandate of 10 Nov., 1509, gave the direction of the whole affair to the Elector and Archbishop of Mainz, Urie von Gemmingen, with orders to secure opinions from the Universities of Mainz, Cologne, Erfurt, and Heidelberg, from the inquisitor Jakob Hochstraten of Cologne, from the protest Victoria of Bremen, and from Mark Reuchlin. Pfenderkorn, in order to vindicate his action, procured still further the good will of the emperor, wrote "In Lob und Ehr dem allerdurchreuchtigsten grossmeistigsten Fursten und Herrn Maximilian" (Cologne, 1510). In April he was again at Frankfort, and with the delegate of the Elector of Mainz and Professor Hermann Ortbeid, he undertook a new confiscation.

Hochstraten and the Universities of Mainz and Cologne decided (Oct., 1510) against the Jewish books. Reuchlin declared that only those books obviously offensive (as the "Nizachsen" and "Toldoth Jeschurun") should be destroyed. The elector sent all the answers of the Universities to Reuchlin. He, however, felt that Pfenderkorn was greatly excited, and answered with "Handsriegel" (Mainz, 1511), in which he attacked Reuchlin unmercifully. Reuchlin complained to the Emperor Maximilian, and he answered Pfenderkorn's attack with "Augenspiegel", against which Pfenderkorn raised his protest. In 1513, both parties were silenced by the emperor. Pfenderkorn however published in 1514 a new polemic, "Sturmblock", against both the Jews and Reuchlin. During the controversy between Reuchlin and the theologians of Cologne, Pfenderkorn was assailed in the "Epistole obscurorum virorum" by the young Humanists who exposed Reuchlin's cause. He replied with "Beschirmung", or "Defensio J. Pepericorni contra famosissum et calumniatoriam virorum epistolas" (Cologne, 1516). "Streithieheln" (1517). When in 1520 Reuchlin's case was decided in Rome by the condemnation of "Augenspiegel", Pfenderkorn wrote as an expression of his triumph "Ein mittheilender Klag von der Verstellung zu Mainz und Marienfeld". He was a fanatic and his public and literary life had little of sympathy or grace, but he was certainly an honourable character and the caricature which his opponents have drawn of him is far from true.

Pfister, Anotr, educationist, b. at Hechingen in Hohenzollern, 26 Sept., 1810; d. at Ober-Dachingen in Württemberg, 29 April, 1878. He was educated at the Latin school at Hechingen, at the Lyceum of Rastatt, and later at Sasbach. He then studied theology at the Grand Seminary of Strasbourg, and was ordained to the priesthood, 25 May, 1853 at Freiburg. He served for five months as curate at Sasbach, and for a year as assistant at the cathedral of Freiburg, he returned to Hohenzollern, and, from 1835 to 1838, was curate at Steinhof near Hechingen. In 1858 he obtained civil rights in Württemberg, and as a priest of the Diocese of Rottenburg, he was pastor first in Dotternhausen; 31 Jan., 1839, at Rossrangen; 11 May, 1841, at Riesstien; from 1851 also school inspector in Ehingen. On 12 Aug., 1867, the Catholic theological faculty of Tübingen granted him the degree of Doctor of Theology. In May, 1877, he retired to Ober-Diezheim and Ehingen. In 1857 he founded the "Rottenburger Kirchenblatt", which he published for three years. From 1890 he edited the "Katholische Schulwochenblatt für die Universitäten und Gymnasien", which, together with Hermann Rolfus, he continued as "Süddeutsches Katholische Schulwochenblatt" (1891-67), and 1896 he published a German work, Theological Encyclopedia, as "Magazin für Pädagogik" (1868-72). But his most valuable work was the editing with Rolfus of the "Real-Encyclopädie des Erziehungs- und Unterrichtswesens nach katholischen Principien" (4 vols., Mainz, 1863-66; 2nd ed., 1872-74; a 3rd vol., "Ergänzungsbände", was published by Rolfus alone in 1881 after Pister's death). Among Pister's other writings may be mentioned: "Unterricht über das Werk der Glaubensverbreitung" (Freiburg, 1850); a German translation of Thomas à Kempis, "Vier Bücher von der Nachfolge Christi" (Freiburg, 1860; 4th ed., 1875); and "Kinderleiden" (Freiburg, 1863); also his 'Pflug's Days'.

Pflug, Julius von, last Catholic Bishop of Naumburg-Orlamkeit, b. at Eythra, near Leipzig, 1499; d. at Zeitz, 3 Sept., 1564. He was the son of Cesar von Pflug, who acted as commissary for the Elector of Saxony in the religious disputations at Leipzig in 1519. Julius entered college at Leipzig, when only eleven years of age, continued his studies at Padua, and finished them in 1521 at Bologna, obtaining the degree of Doctor of Laws. At Leipzig he was the pupil of Peter Morosus, and at Padua of Lazzaro Buonamico. He had received baccalaeus at Mainz and Memsg, and on his return was made dean of the cathedral of Meissen and provost at the collegiate church of the cathedral of Meissen.

Though he was a native of a family well known for its influence, he led a life of simplicity, study, and piety from his youth. As a young man he was more than once accused of heresy, but was always acquitted. He was elected dean of the cathedral of Meissen when the Elector of Saxony was introducing Protestantism into this diocese. He served as Bishop of Meissen from 1519 to 1564, when he was succeeded by his son, Peter. Pflug was an able and learned man, and his influence was very wide. He was instrumental in the establishment of a system of public schools and colleges, and was a promoter of the study of literature and the fine arts. He was also a patron of the arts, and his generosity was proverbial. He was a man of great learning and a great statesman, and his influence was felt in all parts of the Empire.

In 1547, Pflug, on the recommendation of the Elector of Saxony, was appointed Bishop of Mainz, and he held this see until 1553. He was a man of great influence, and his administrative ability was much admired. He was a great patron of learning, and he established several universities and colleges in the diocese of Mainz. He was also a great patron of the arts, and he built many fine churches and monasteries. He was a man of great piety, and he was a great advocate of the doctrine of the Reformation. He was a man of great energy, and he was able to carry out his plans with success. He was a man of great eloquence, and he was able to express his views with great force.

In 1753, the monastery was transferred to the province of Meissen, near Alt-Schrotha, near the church of St. Wenceslaus. In 1782, the church was burnt down, and in 1793, it was entirely rebuilt. In 1802, the monastery was dissolved, and the revenues were divided among the present members of the Society of Jesus. In 1815, the church was transferred to the Diocese of Meissen, and in 1879, it was made a parish.

Kings, xxiii, 29 sqq.; II Par., xxxv, 29 sqq.), and Ephepho, or Ephprus, the contemporary of Sedecia (Jer., xlvii, 30), are styled Pharao Necho and Pharao Ephepho, according to the then Egyptian usage.

Unnamed Pharaohs of the Bible. (1) The Pharao of Abraham.—The uncertainties attaching to ancient chronology make it impossible to determine the identity of the king who ruled over Egypt when Abraham arrived in the country. The Massoretic text gives 1125 years between Abraham's migration to Chanaan and the building of the temple, whereas the Septuagint allows 700 (see CHRONOLOGY). As the building is placed about 1090 B.C. by some scholars, and about 950 B.C. by others, the date of Abraham's migration would be 1590 B.C. for the Massoretic text, or 1400 B.C. for the Septuagint. Ancient Egyptian chronology is as uncertain as that of the Bible. If Meyer's dates, adopted in the article EGYPT, are correct, Abraham's journey to Egypt would have to be referred to the reign of one of the Mentuhotep of the eleventh dynasty, or to that of either Isersetep (Sesostris) III, or Amenemhet III of the twelfth. (2) The Pharao of Joseph.—It is generally admitted that Joseph held office under one of the shepherd, or Hyksos, kings, who ruled in Egypt between the twelfth and eighteenth dynasties, and were finally expelled by Ahmose I shortly after 1580 B.C. The length of their rule is unknown, but probably it did not last much over a hundred years. Joseph's tenure of office would accordingly be placed in the seventeenth century B.C. If the Exodus took place at the beginning of the reign of Merenptah, i.e., about 1225, as most scholars now maintain, and the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt lasted 430 years, as stated in the Massoretic text (Ex., xx, 26), the Exodus would be about 1665 B.C. The names of four Hyksos kings are known to us from Egyptian monuments, a Khian and three Apophis. George Syncellus states that in his time (eighth cent. A.D.) there was a general consensus that the Pharao of Joseph was Apophis, probably Apophis II, the most important of the three. This opinion is possibly true, but the history of the period is too obscure to allow a definite statement. (3) The Pharao of the Oppression and of the Exodus. (See ISRAELITES.)

(4) The other Pharaohs.—The Pharao with whom Adad sought refuge in the time of David (III Kings, xi, 17) was a king of the Ammon, or Ammonomopet. Solomon's father-in-law (III Kings, iii, 1) may have been Ammenemopet, Samon, or Pesibkhenu II. The Pharao mentioned in IV Kings, xviii, 21 and Is., xxxvi, 6 is by many thought to be Tharaeas; but if the expedition of Semachrib occurred in 701, as is generally held, there is little doubt that Shabaka, or possibly Shabatok, is the Pharao referred to. Tharaea came to the throne some years later, and the title King of Ethiopia (IV Kings, xix, 9; Is., xxxvii, 9) is given to him by antiquation. The unnamed Pharao of Jer., xxx, 19, is probably Necho, who is certainly meant in xvi, 17, and xvi, 1; elsewhere Ephreth is intended. The latter is also the Pharaoh of Ezechiel. See the literature mentioned under the articles to which reference has been made. F. BECHTEL.

Pharabæus, titular see and suffragan of Leontopolis, in Augustamnia Secunda. This name is merely the transcription, with the Copite article P, of the native name Hobælat or Habbet, a name which was sometimes corrupted to the form Ḥabhēthos in George of Cyprus ("Descriptio orbis romanorum," ed. Gelzer, 706). It is the capital of the nome of this name in Lower Egypt described by Hierobotus (11, 106); Strabo, XVII, 1, 29; Pliny, V, 9, 11. There is a record of Bishop Arbetion at Næmes in 325 (Gelzer, "Patrium nominum nomina," I, X), and Bishop Theodorus in 1086 (Renaudot, "Historia patriarcharum alexandrinorum," 458), but it is possible that the latter was bishop of another Pharaebus situated further to the west, and which according to Vansleb was equally a Copite see. John of Nikiu (Chronicle, CV) relates that under the Emperor Phocas (602-10) the clerics of the province killed the Greek governor Theophilus. Pharaebus is now called Horbænt, north of Zagazig in the Province of Sharqyeh; it has about 520 inhabitants.

Pharisees, a politico-religious sect or faction among the adherents of later Judaism, that came into existence as a class about the third century B.C. After the exile, Israel's monarchial form of government had become a thing of the past; in its place the Jews created a community which was half State, half Church. A growing sense of superiority to the heathen and idolatrous nations among whom their lot was cast came to be one of their main characteristics. They were taught insistently to separate themselves from their heathen neighbours. "And now make confession to the Lord the God of your fathers, and do his pleasure, and separate yourselves from the people of the land, and from your strange wives" (I Esd., x, 34). The new laws of the testament, which forbade and limited the freedom of marriage, were introduced by Ezra, by his followers, and by others. They were followed by the Pharisees, who separated themselves from the heathen, and from the heathenizing forces and tendencies which constantly invaded the precincts of Judaism (I Mach., i, 11; II Mach., iv, 14 sqq.; cf. Josephus Antiq., XII, v, 1).

During these persecutions of Antiochus the Pharisees became the most rigid defenders of the Jewish religion and traditions. In this cause many suffered martyrdom (I Mach., i, 41 sqq.), and so devoted were they to the prescriptions of the Law that on one occasion when attacked by the Syrians on the Sabbath they refused to defend themselves (I Mach., i, 42; ibid., v, 5 sqq.). They considered it an abomination to eat at the same board with the heathens or have any social relations with them whatsoever. Owing to their heroism and devotion their influence over the people became great and far-reaching, and in the course of time they, instead of the priests, became the sources of authority. In the time of Our Lord such was their power and prestige that they sat at the head of Moses' seat. Ditto, in the wider sense, however, and the Pharisees became more and more arrogant and conceited, and led to a perversion in many respects of the conservative ideals of which they had been such staunch supporters. In many passages of the Gospels, Christ is quoted as warning the multitude against them in seething terms. "The scribes and the Pharisees have taken unto them the chair of Moses. All things therefore whatsoever they shall say unto you, observe and do: but according to their works do ye not; for they say and do not. For they bind heavy and insupportable burdens, and lay them on men's shoulders; but with a finger of their own they will not move them. And all their works they do to be seen of men, they make much show of their fastings, and make broad, and enlarge their fringes. And they love the first places at feasts, and the first chairs in the syna-
The great Maccabean wars had defined Pharisaism; another even more terrible conflict gave it a final ascendency. The result of both wars was to create from the second century onward, in the bosom of a tenacious, the type of Judaism known to the western world. A study of the early history of Pharisaism reveals a story of internal decay and external triumph, with a marked tendency of purpose at the service of high, patriotic, and religious ideals. As contrasted with the Sadducees (q.v.), the Pharisees represented the democratic tendency; contrasted with the priesthood, they stood for both the democratic and the spiritualizing tendency. By virtue of the Law itself the priesthood was an excellent precedent, which permitted to exercise a function in the Temple unless he was able to trace his descent from a priestly family. The Pharisees consequently found their main function in teaching and preaching. Their work was chiefly connected with the synagogues, and embraced the schoo1ing of children and missionary efforts among the heathen tribes. Thus, in contrast, Pharisaism helped towards the foundation and preparatory work for Christianity.

It was the Pharisees who made idealized nationalism, based upon the messianism of the prophets, the very essence of Judaism. To them we are indebted for the great apocalypses, Daniel and Enoch, and it was they who made common the belief in the resurrection and future reward. In a word, their pedagogical influence was the most important factor in training the national will and purpose for the introduction of Christianity. This great work, however, was marred by many defects and limitations. Though standing for the spiritualizing tendency, Pharisaism developed a proud and arrogant orthodoxy and an exaggerated formalism, which insisted on ceremonial details at the expense of the more important precepts, was allowed to exercise a function in the Temple unless the person was able to trace his descent from a priestly family. The contributions of the Pharisees to the formation of the New Testament are the main emphasis on character and the religious spirit, and thus they incurred not only the vehement reproaches of the Pre-Pharisees, but also the criticism of Saviour Himself (Matt., xxiii, 23-28). The importance attached to desecration from Abraham (Matt., iii, 9) obscured the deeper spiritual issues and created a narrow, exclusive nationalism incapable of understanding a universal Church destined to include Gentiles as well as Jews. It was only through the revolution perceived on the road to Jerusalem that the Pharisees were enabled to comprehend a church where all are equally the "seed of Abraham," all "one in Christ Jesus" (Gal., iii, 28-29). This exclusivism, together with their overvaluation of external levitical observances, caused the Pharisees to be ranked in opposition to what is known as propheticism, which in both the Old and New Testament, which the main emphasis on character and the religious spirit, and thus they incurred not only the vehement reproaches of the Pre-Pharisees, but also the criticism of Saviour Himself (Matt., xxiii, 23-28). The Pharisees are seen at their best when contrasted with the Zealots on one hand, and with the Herodians on the other. Unlike the Zealots, it was their policy to abstain from the appeal to armed force. It was their belief that the God of the nation controlled all historic destinies, and that in His own good time He would satisfy the long frustrated desires of His chosen people. Meanwhile the duty of all true Israelites consisted in whole-hearted devotion to the study of the Law and of the observances which, their numerous traditions had engraven upon it, joined to a patient waiting for the expected manifestation of the Divine Will. The Zealots on the contrary bitterly represented the Roman domination and would have hastened with the sword the fulfillment of the Messianic hope. It is well known that during the great rebellion and the siege of Jerusalem, which ended in its destruction (A.D. 70), the fanaticism of the Zealots made them terrible opponents not only to the Romans, but also to the other factions among their own countrymen. On the other hand, the extreme faction of the Sadducees, known as the Herodians, was in sympathy with Jewish foreign culture, and even looked forward to a restoration of the national kingdom under one of the descendants of King Herod. Yet we find the Pharisees making common cause with the Herodians in their opposition to the Saviour (Mark, iii, 6; xiii, 13, etc.).

Pharsalos, titular see and suffragan of Larissa in Thessaly. The city is mentioned for the first time after the Persian war. In 415 B.C. it was unsuccessfully besieged by the Athenian Myronides (Thucyd., i, 111), in 395 it was seized by Mithras, tyrant of Larissa (Diodorus Siculus, XIV, 42, 82), and it was finally captured in A.D. 19 by John Hyrcanus (1 Macc., vii, 1, 2); in 191 the consul Seleucus Callinicus made it over to Antiochus, king of Syria. It is specially famous for the victory of 9 August, 48 B.C., won by Caesar from Pompey, after the latter had killed 15,000 men. At the time of Pliny (Hist. Nat., iv, 15) it was a free city. In the sixth century A.D. it was a port of Thessaly ("Dioecesis Samiciana", ed. Burekhardt, 642, 133); in the time of Constantine Porphyrogenetus, it belonged to the theme of Macedonia (op. cit., 50, 6). In 1881 it was ceded by Turkey with Thessaly to Greece. Of the three Greek bishops mentioned by Le Quien (Ortes christians, II, 116), the most notable of the three was Joseph; the lists could easily be completed. At the beginning of the tenth century Pharsoi still remained suffragan of Larissa (Gerzer, "Ungedruckte... Texte der Notitiae Episcopatarum", 555); about 970 (op. cit., 572) it became an autocephalous archiepiscopate; in 1300 it was elevated by Andronicus II to metropolis dignity; at the close of the fifteenth century it was made a suffragan of Larissa. Later it was united to the Diocese of Pharnarion, and was suppressed only to be replaced (1900) by the Sees of Pharos and Thessalonides. Pharsala numbers 2500 inhabitants, of whom nearly half are Turks. The Greeks were defeated there in 1807.

Phaselis, a Doric colony on the Pamphylia Gulf. Situated on an isthmus separating two harbors, it owed to this fortunate location the fact that it became an important centre of commerce between Greece, Asia, Egypt, and Phoenicia, although it did not belong to the confederation of Lycanian cities. The pirates of Cilicia were allied with it, first through business intercourse, then by treaty. After the capture of Olympia P. Sertorius laid siege to it. It was defended by Zenobia, who, being unable to hold it, set fire to the city and plunged into the flames together with his companions. Phaselis recovered from this disaster. However, as early as the Roman period the little harbor had become a swamp exhalating pestilential vapours, and the situation grew worse until the city was in complete decay. There are traces of Phaselis, where the lighthouse of Achilles was exhibited. It was the birthplace of the poet and orator Theocritus. It was also renowned for its roses, from which the essence was extracted. There was invented the bark called phaselo which figures on all the coins of the city. There was a Roman colony at Phaselis about 150 B.C., for the Romans wrote to the inhabitants to send help...
Phasga (A. V. Psgam).—Whether the word in Hebrew is a proper or a common noun is not clear; certainly it is at any rate that it designates a mountain of the Aburan range [Deut., xxxiii, 49], east of the Jordan [Deut., iv, 49], in the land of Moab [Num., xxi, 20], "over against Jericho" [Deut., xxxiv, 1], above Yeshimon [Num., xxi, 20; D. V. "which looketh towards the desert" (Ain Suweimeh)], east of the north end of the Dead Sea [Deut., iv, 49; Jos., xii, 3], in connexion with the "certain plain...the sheaf of the Holy Land" [Deut., xxxix, 1], on the south-east border of which it stood [Deut., iv, 49]. From all these indications it appears that Phasga is no other than Mount Nebi-Isa (Jebel Neba, south-west of Heshban or Hesbon), or, better still, the western peak of the mountain, Ras Sfeiqa. It is the site of the Israelites' camp (Ninova, xxi, 20); in the "field of Sophim" (D. V., "a high place") on the mountain Balaam uttered his second oracle about Israel [Num., xxiii, 11-21]; lastly from the top of Phasga, Moses surveyed the Promised Land.

Phenomenalism (φαινομενισμός) literally means any system of thought that has to do with appearances. The term is, however, usually restricted to the designation of certain theories by which it is interpreted: (1) the knowledge is no other than that of phenomena—denial of the knowledge of substance in the metaphysical sense; or (2) that all knowledge is phenomenal—denial of the thing-in-itself and assertion that all reality is directly or reflectively present to consciousness.

(1) The first form of Phenomenalism reaches its fullest statement in Hume, though its logical development can be traced back through Berkeley and Locke to Descartes. It consists in the theory that substance is merely a relation between ideas; that its existence, as a reality, is incapable of intuitive or demonstrative certainty. The origin of the idea of substance is explained by the imagination (Hume). The transient mental, or world, phenomena are related in the imagination to a supposed substratum a fictitious ground, permanent and inert—which accounts for their appearance. The theory destroys metaphysics and replaces it with epistemology. This is quite in keeping with Hume's Associationism in psychology. The "Treatise on Human Nature" admits ideas and impressions, together with the association of these elements according to the well-known laws (see Association; Psychology); and nothing more than this is given or is necessary to explain whatever is found in consciousness. For substance can be explained adequately as the result of ideas that have been frequently present in conjunction. Hume restricted these views to exact experimental science, and safeguarded the ordinary experience of life by asserting that the concepts of substance, etc., are accompanied by a natural belief, or conviction, of their reality arising from feeling. His doctrine was widely accepted in France, and in Germany became the ideological forerunner of Kant's "Kritik". Though at once labelled Scepticism in England and denied by material natural theology, it is a frankly consistent Empiricism (q. v.) quite in place in the evolution of the school of English thought. Where Locke, criticizing the ideology of Descartes, and admitting the part of empirical experience in the formation of ideas, reduced the notion of material substance and the metaphysical soul, as realities, uncriticized, Berkeley, developing his position further, thought that the supposed existence of the material world was not only indemonstrable, but false. Only spirits, with their ideas and volitions, exist. Essence of the material is perceive: and the regularity of nature is no more than the order of ideas as produced in us by another spirit, namely, God. Hume's position is but a step further than this. Soul, or mind, as substance, is no more real than body. Here the Phenomenalism of Berkeley becomes logically complete.

Quite consistent with this conception is the statement of Huxley, that man is only able to find of his sensations united by certain relations between them (see Huxley, "Hume, a Biography", II, ii, p. 61), that of Taine, the Positivist, that the ego is no more than a luminous sheaf, having no other reality than the lights that compose it (see Taine, De l'Intelligence, I, pref., p. 11). As we shall show, the opposition of Hume to the concept of substance seems to rest upon a misunderstanding: for he admits (Treatise I, part i, sect. 1) "something" that is accountable for impressions and "something" that is impressed (body, mind). Huxley seems but to popularize by his sublime the conception of the Scotch philosopher, that there is no mind, soul or substance (as substance) apart from experience. Huxley compares the soul to a republic in which the members are united by their manifold ties and mutual relations as citizens. This leaves the impressions and ideas substantial and makes of the mind what Scholastics would call an "accidental unity, and of the substance (soul) a "permanent possibility of perceptions". Max Muller has dealt with this notion in his "Science of Thought" (218) where he observes that such terms as possibility express a common quality that is always of something, from which we have abstracted them. To call mind a "possibility" is at the same time to deny that it is a substance and to assert that it is not belonging to substance, which would seem to be contradictory.

The idealistic standpoint of Hume, together with the doctrine of Positivism (q. v.), has had so great an influence upon modern thought that it will be well to show in what the misunderstanding, already referred to, consists. As Cardinal Manning points out ("Ontologie", 1902, p. 263), it is incredible that such thinkers as Hume and Kant, Mill, Spencer, Wundt, Paulsen, Comte, Renanv, Bergson, and others, should have so totally misunderstood the substantiality of things and of the ego as to press a Phenomenalism contradictory to the doctrine of the School. On the other hand, it is no less incredible that philosophers like Aristotle, St. Thomas, and the Schoolmen, should have "been at fault in their interpretation of an elementary truth of common sense". On the face of it, a misunderstanding seems probable. To what was this due? First, to the doubt cast by Hume on the connexion and validity of truth and substance; second, to the observation of Locke, that we are incapable of directly attaining to substance. If thought could immediately conceive the substance of a thing, we ought to be able to deduce all its properties from that conception. Third, to the

The attempt made by Schelling to avoid the contradiction between his doctrine and that of Kant resulted in the doctrine of Phenomenalism. This doctrine was developed further by Novalus and von Schlegel, who practiced it in a neo-Spinazzistic fashion. Hegel's Idealism is a logical, or metaphysical, one, in which the only reality (spirit) "becomes" in a process-form of dialectic. In the thesis, antithesis, and synthesis of Absolute mind, the return to consciousness takes the form of Phenomenalism, and finally, the spirit is that of the self. With Schopenhauer, who begins his "Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung" with these words: "The world is my idea"—this is a truth which holds good for everything that lives and knows...", it would seem that a transition from Idealistic Phenomenalism to modern "scientific" Realism is in progress. Phenomenalism is the most recent form of it, and, as such belongs to the first form of Phenomenalism noticed above; but its psychological attitude, and the subjectivist developments it displays, make it perhaps more fitting to mention it here. For the system as a whole the truth of reality rests upon the subjective feeling of certainty (see Epistemeology). The question of the reality of things-in-themselves is avoided, because of (1) an a priori constitution of mind, of transcendental order and for all individuals; (2) utility, coherence, or vital experience (James, Leroy, Schiller); or (3) an act of the will (Ribot). The first two accounts of the psychological fact of certainty insensibly give place to the third, which is the last word of philosophy, and is, as it were, the extraction. The third, that one is the theory of Solipsism. It will be observed that this line of development is one of an elaboration of a voluntaristic form of Phenomenalism. Where Schiller (Studies in Humanism) writes that the basis of fact accepted by Pragmatism depends upon its "acceptance", "that it (acceptance) is fatal to the existence of something else", we have here the expression of the "will", and James (Pragmatism) "Why may we (our acts) not be the actual... growing-places of the world—why not the workshop of being where we catch fact in the making, so that now here may the world grow any other kind of way than this?" Solipsism goes but one step further in declaring that there is no absolute Ego but absolute non-Ego. There is no more than the individual consciousness (cf. von Schubert Soldner). Admitting the principles, an escape from such a conclusion is difficult. The pure experience of Avenarius, the reine Erfahrung for you and for me, is theoretic and inexact. Indeed Humanism itself, as advanced by Schiller, seems to be nothing but a kind of e contrario of our "will", and we only organize them; but Schiller gives no indication of their origin; indeed he says it is absurd to ask whence the given of thought derives. The whole modern school of Immanence (q. v.) belongs to the development of this form of Phenomenalism.

Philadelphia, titular see in Lydia, suffragan of Sardes. The city was founded by the Philadelphii, King of Pergamon (159–38 B.C.), in the vicinity of Callatebus on the left bank of the Cogamus (Konzun Techi); its location was most favourable for commercial and strategical purposes. In 153 B.C. it became a Roman possession. This city was subject to earthquakes, and at the time of Augustus was almost in ruins; but, quickly restored, was of commercial importance as late as the Byzantine period. Its wines were famous; its coins bore the image of Bacchus or a bacchante. On the coins of the first century the city is called Neocесarea, under Vespasian it received the cognomen of Flavia. During the eleventh and succeeding centuries it was repeatedly captured and retaken from the Turks until it was definitively conquered by Bajazet in 1390.

In the seventeenth century it had 8,000 inhabitants, of whom 2,000 were Christians. To-day it has about 15,000, including 3,500 Greeks. The Turks called it Ale Sheir; it is the capital of the caza of the vilayet of Smyrna, is still, on account of its fertility, an important agricultural and commercial centre; and is a railway station between Smyrna and Dvinar. It possesses numerous ruins, a theatre, stadium, two walls, many Byzantine churches, etc., and has mineral springs.

Christianity was introduced into Philadelphia in Asia Minor by St. Andrew the Apostle, i.e., iii, 7–13. This bishop was highly commended, and while the writer recognizes that the community is small, he tells us that the Jews who tried to disturb it were valiantly resisted by its faithful pastors. St. Ignatius of Antioch later sent to the Christians of Philadelphia an interesting letter warning them against the "disputes and dissensions" (VII, xvi), its first bishop Demetrius must have been appointed by St. John. The apologist St. Irenæus mentions a prophetess Amnia who must have belonged to the primitive Church of Philadelphia (Irenæus, "Hist. Eccl.", V, xvi). One of the seven letters of the Apocalypse is addressed to the Church of Philadelphia (Rev. i, 11; iii, 7–13). The apologist St. Irenæus mentions a prophetess Amnia who was not a prophetess but a prophet; and to the rich, learned, and pious St. Irenæus, the Church of Philadelphia was known as the "Church of the Philadelphians". Tübingen, 1911, pp. 98–102. The ancient "Nottin" place Philadelphia among the most important suffragans of Sardes. Under Andronicus Palaeologus it was raised to metropolitan rank, and has continued thus among the Greeks, its jurisdiction, since the fourteenth century, extending over all Asia Minor, as far as the Turkish conquest. Among its bishops or metropolitan bishops of whom Le Quien (Orients chr., I, 867 sq) gives a very incomplete list, may be mentioned: Hetimnasius, present at the Council of Nicæa (325); Cyricus, at the Council of Phæ白宫 (341); Theodotus, present at the Council of Sceilria (359); Theophanes, present at the Council of Ephesus (431); Paulus (579); Eustathius (518); John, present at the Council of Constantinople (680); Stephanus at Nicæa (787); Michael under Leo the Armenian; Thealeptus at the end of the thirteenth and in the fourteenth century, hymn writer, orator, and master of the famous Barlaam (P. G. CXLI, 381 sq); Macarius, 1352–1365, chosen bishop by the people; ibid., CL, 227 sq; Gabriel Severus (1577) wrote works against the Latins and residually, as did his six successors, at Venice; Gerasimus Blachus (1679), author of numerous works; Melchis Tupalus (1682), deposed for becoming a Catholic.

PHILADELPHIA

PHILADELPHIA

Philadelphia, Archdiocese of (Philadelphia), diocese established in 1808. It originally included all the city and county of Philadelphia, and the counties of Berks, Bucks, Car bon, Chester, Delaware, Lehigh, Montgomery, Northampton, and Schuylkill, an area of 5043 square miles, in the southeastern portion of the State of Pennsylvania. The population of this area, according to the United States Census, in 1910, was 2,712,708, of which number 1,549,008 belonged to the City of Philadelphia, the capital. The area of the city was 1,999 sq. miles, and the population of the city was 1,237,008. Philadelphia was incorporated as a city in 18i.

The population of Philadelphia in 1870 was 500,000, and it is the leading American city in shipbuilding, the manufacture of locomotive engines, street-railway cars, carpets, leather, oilcloth, and several other important industries.

The city is the third in the United States in population; its wealth in manufacturing industries exceeds $500,000,000, and it is the leading American city in shipbuilding, the manufacture of locomotive engines, street-railway cars, carpets, leather, oilcloth, and several other important industries.

Church during the stormy days of the Revolution. Like the majority of their flock, they remained neutral, till the coming of the French allies called for rejection or support. The choice of the Father foray or sorrow, the addresses, however, were mostly delivered by the chaplain to the French ambassador.

At the end of the war Father Molyneux opened the first Catholic parish school. In Oct., 1813, the sacrament of Confirmation was administered for the first time in Philadelphia by the Very Rev. John Carroll, prelate of the Apostolate. On 17 Aug. of the following year, Father Farmer passed to his reward. His funeral was attended by the American Philosophical Society, the professors and trustees of the University of Pennsylvania, and by large numbers of non-Catholics. No one had done so much to make the Catholic religion respected by the residents of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and the Franciscans, who had been hampered to name their own pastors. In 1795 the German church was ready for occupancy, and a Holy Trinity, being, it is said, the last building for public purposes erected in Philadelphia of alternate red and black glazed brick. This church gave great trouble to Bishop Carroll, on account of the pretensions of the German schismatics and the church, but was finally decided on. The three churches now built, St. Joseph's, St. Mary's, and Holy Trinity, were all in the southern part of the city. Provision had to be made for the Catholics living in what was then the extreme northern section. Opportune, the Augustinians were seeking to found a house in the United States, and to name the new congregation the entrusted. In 1796 the Rev. Michael Egan, O.S.A., issued an appeal to the inhabitants of Philadelphia and received a generous response. President Washington figures in the list of subscribers, for $10, Commodore Barry, for $50, and Stephen Girard, for $10. After many vicissitudes, the "largest church in Philadelphia" was dedicated under the invocation of St. Augustine, 7 June, 1801. Within a few years, had his number increased. The Rev. St. Augustine's, the trustees of St. Mary's petitioned the bishop to send them a pastor capable of sustaining the dignity of "the leading church in the United States". The bishop found them the priest they were looking for in the person of the Rev. Michael Egan, a Franciscan stationed at Lancaster. He had come to America in order to establish in this country a house of his order, but found the time premature and became a missionary priest under the jurisdiction of Bishop Carroll. He was ably assisted at St. Mary's by Father Rossiter.

The time having arrived when Philadelphia should be placed into an episcopal see, Pius VII, by Bulls dated 21 March, 1807, issued a brief blessing the "entire two States of Pennsylvania and Delaware, and the western and southern part of the State of New Jersey". An accompanying brief appointed Father Michael Egan (q. v.) to be the first occupant of the see. Owing to the existing political conditions in Europe, the Bulls did not reach Baltimore until 1816, and, during the interval Father Egan remained in Philadelphia as vicar-general to Bishop Carroll. On 10 Nov., 1800, there arrived in Philadelphia the Dominican Father William Vincent Harold, who came from Ireland recommended by the Archbishop of Dublin and other dignitaries. Bishop Egan accepted him with eagerness, and the eloquent preacher soon became a long resident of the city. Father Harold was consecrated at Baltimore, 28 Oct., 1810, made Father Harold his vicar-general and took up his residence at St. Joseph's with him and a uncle of his, the Rev. James Harold, who had arrived from Ireland in March, 1811. Relations between the bishop and the Harold's became strained from causes well explained. Trouble arose between the clergy and the trustees, and the Harolds returned to Europe. After a troubled administration of three years and nine months Bishop Egan died at the age of fifty-three. The trustees of St. Mary's had acquired for themselves such a reputation for insubordination, that it was no easy matter to find any one willing to take up the burden of the episcopate. Fathers Marchal, DeBarth and David declined to accept.

Finally, after an interval of five years, the Holy See selected the vicar-general of Armagh, Ireland, the Very Rev. Henry Connell, seventy-two years old. He was consecrated in London by Bishop Poynter, 24 Sept., 1820, and arrived in Philadelphia on 23 Nov., of that year. A very disagreeable duty was awaiting him in the case of the Rev. William Hogan, a priest of Albany whom the administrator had imprudently admitted to the diocese without sufficient inquiry or credentials. Bishop England states that he was "deficient in the most common branches of an English education, and gave an appearance of being a pretentious, officious man, a born demagogue, and able to presage topics which tickled the ears of men whose religion was a matter of fashion. A clear and impartial narrative of the Hogan Schism is found in Father Kirin's excellent work, "Catholicity in Philadelphia". (See also CONWELL, ILEX.;). It remains a question whether the Catholic schismatics had ever acquired ecclesiastical rights throughout the entire nation, did not do more good than harm. It focussed the attention of Catholics and non-Catholics on the important question of episcopal rights. While some lukewarm Catholics fell away from the Church, the body of the faithful rallied to their pastors with ardour and increased influence. The Catholicity in Philadelphia, the administration of the affairs of the Church was settled for all time in Philadelphia. The repudiation by the Holy See and by the hierarchy of the United States of the compromise of 9 Oct., 1826, in which Bishop Connell surrendered to the already beaten trustees several episcopal rights, ended forever in these States the tyranny of trustees.
beginning of the century had given great edification by his zeal and saintly life. Later in the same year the Rev. John Hughes was elected to the episcopal See of New York. About the same time St. John's building was consecrated in 1839, the parish of St. Francis Xavier was founded for the Irish district, and St. Patrick's church was organized for the Schuylkill suburban. The following year saw the founding of St. Philip's in the extreme south. Its first pastor was the Rev. John P. Dunn. In 1842 the Germans of Kensington were provided for by the building of St. Peter's; and the installation of the Redemptorist Fathers. In 1843 the church of St. Paul was opened in Moyamensing by the Rev. Patrick F. Sheridan. To the north, the church of St. Stephen was built near the spot in Nicetown where the first Masses were celebrated by itinerant missionaries. On 15 Nov., 1846, St. Anne's church at Port Richmond was dedicated by Father Gartland of St. John's, Bishop Hughes of New York preaching the sermon. During the year 1845, St. Joseph's was founded at Frankford by the Rev. Dominic Forrestal. On the Feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, 29 June, 1846, the bishop issued a pastoral letter announcing his determination to build a cathedral. He chose for the site a plot of ground known as the Magnier property, near the Rev. H. M. O'Byrne's Church, on the Union Street. The architect was Napoleon Lebrun. It was the bishop's intention to avoid running into debt, so the cathedral was long in building. In 1848 he founded the church of the Assumption, with the convent, Charles L. H. Carter, for pastor. The ancient suburb of Germantown contained very few Catholics, but the Lankershim and Pinto families were willing to assume the task of building a church in that section, and the church of St. Vincent de Paul was opened for worship on 13 July, 1851, the first pastor being the Rev. M. Domenech, afterwards Bishop of Pittsburg. In 1849 a church was built at Holmesburg and named St. Vincent de Paul. In 1851 the Rev. James C. Shanahan, O.P., was appointed pastor. In 1850 the parish of St. James, in West Philadelphia, was founded by the Rev. J. V. O'Keefe, who took a census and discovered forty Catholic adults in the district. The last evidence in Philadelphia of Bishop Keeney's activity was the church of St. Malachi, the cornerstone of which was laid for him in 1850. In 1851, after his election he was transferred to the metropolitan See of Baltimore. The western portion of Pennsylvania was formed into the Diocese of Pittsburg, Aug. 1853, with the Rt. Rev. M. O'Connor, D.D., for its first bishop. (For the burning of Catholic churches in Pennsylvania, riots of 1841, see REV. OHIO.)

The fourth Bishop of Philadelphia, John Nepomucene Neumann, was consecrated 28 March, 1852. (See NEUMANN, JOHN NEPOMPUCENE, VENERABLE.) Ten churches sprung up during the first year of his episcopate. The constant topic of his exhortations was the necessity of parish schools. Failing to bring the uncontumacious trustees of Holy Trinity to their senses, he unhesitatingly put up the church of St. Alphonsus. On 19 Oct., 1854, he left for Rome to assist at the proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, and he returned in March, 1855. On 26 April, 1857, the Rt. Rev. James Frederick Wood was consecrated in the cathedral of Cincinnati as coadjutor to the Bishop of Philadelphia. Bishop Wood had been acquainted with the episcopal world as thoroughly acquainted with every phase of the banking business, which had been the occupation of his earlier years. At a meeting of the clergy, Bishop Neumann announced that the work of completing the cathedral had been committed to his coadjutor. In October, 1857, he held his last diocesan conference, and on 31 December, 1858, his present age, 42, he had to excuse himself from attendance.

James Frederick Wood, the fifth bishop of the diocese, was born at Philadelphia 27 April, 1813. His father, James Wood, was an English merchant and had his child baptized by a minister of the Unitarian sect. In 1827 James Wood and his family removed to Cincinnati, where the boy obtained a position as clerk in a bank. Eleven years later (7 April, 1838), in his twenty-fifth year, the future bishop was received into the Catholic Church, and two years later he was sent to Rome to prosecute his studies at the College of the Propaganda, where he was ordained to the priesthood by Cardinal Fransoni, 23 March, 1841. After a short term as assistant at the cathedral of Cincinnati, he was appointed pastor of St. Patrick's church. Though the main object of his appointment was to develop the temporal cares of the diocese, yet he by no means confined his efforts to that sphere. He was zealous in preaching the Word of God and gave confirmation in all the churches. On the death of Bishop (Venerable John Nepomucene) Neumann, which took place on 5 January, 1860, the Catholic population of the diocese, which still included Delaware, was estimated at 200,000 souls. There were 157 churches (besides 9 in course of erection) and 7 chapels, attended by 147 priests. The preparatory seminar at Glen Riddle, under the Rev. J. F. Shanahan, and the theological seminar adjoining the cathedral, were also in an improved condition. There were 36 parish schools, attended by 8710 pupils. The diocese was well supplied with colleges, academies, asylums, hospitals, and religious orders of both sexes. In the first year of his administration Bishop Wood established, at the two extreme ends of the city, the parishes of the Annunciation and All Saints, Bridgetown.

The bishop had the erection of the cathedral well in hand, when the outbreak of the Civil War came to retard its completion. Nothing daunted, however, he continued his efforts and on 20 Nov., 1864, had the happiness to sing the first Mass in the immense cathedral, which he had purchased a large tract of land just outside the city limits, as the site of a new seminary. The pastoral letter in which he announced the purchase at Overbrook is dated 8 Dec., 1865; on 16 Sept., 1871, the beautiful building was filled with 528 students from the two old seminaries. During his visit to Rome, in 1867, he promised to assure the erection of the Diocese of Scranton and Harrisburg, and his wish was granted 3 March, 1868. He was prominent at the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, and, indeed, at every assembly of the hierarchy his counsels were reverently listened to. He attended the Council of the Vatican, but being in poor health left Rome, and on his way back he took a great interest in the newly established North American College, wisely insisted that the funds of the college should be kept in America, and was unanimously appointed treasurer of the board.

On 15 Oct., 1873, with all possible pomp, Bishop Wood consecrated the diocese to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. In 1875 he was prostrated by the heartlessness of his journey to the South gave him slight relief; and when the instruments arrived creating him archbishop and making Philadelphia a metropolitan see, it was with evident pain he went through the long ceremony of the conferring of the pallium. He had wonderful recuperative powers, however, and in 1877 went to Rome with $30,000 Peter's Pence to assist at the celebration of the golden jubilee of Pius IX's episcopate. Recovering from another had attack in Rome, he returned home. On 23 May, 1880, he presided over the First Provincial Council of Philadelphia. After this he was for the most part confined to his room, where, however, he continued to transact his diocesan business, and came to 20 June, 1883. The entire City of Philadelphia turned out to show its affection for one whom it regarded as its most distinguished citizen. Archbishop Wood is buried with the other bishops of the diocese in the crypt beneath the cathedral. He had administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to 105,000 persons. In 1868, in the curtailed diocese, there were 76 churches and 21 chapels; at his death there were 127 churches and 53 chapels. He found, in 1883, 33 parish schools in this section; he left 58.

A priest of the Order of St. Francis, Bishop Wood, demanded thought on the part of the Roman authorities, and they took a year to come to a decision. At first they seemed to consider favourably the venerable Bishop O’Hara of Scranton, who, as rector of the seminary and vicar-general of the diocese, had done valuable service in Philadelphia. There is little doubt that he would have been selected, had it not been for his seventy odd years. The deliberations of Propaganda finally concluded with the choice of the coadjutor of St. Louis; the Rt. Rev. Patrick John Ryan, who was in his fiftieth year, had administered an important diocese for ten years, and seemed to lack no qualification demanded by so eminent a metropolis as Philadelphia. (Ryan, Patrick.)

On 20 Aug., 1884, he took formal possession of his archiepiscopal see and received the homage of 250 priests of the diocese. In November of that year he opened the proceedings of the Third Plenary Council, and on 1 January, 1885, was invested with the pallium. After 21 Feb., 1887, he was ably assisted by his auxiliary, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Prendergast. On the death of Archbishop Ryan, which took place on 11 February, 1911, Bishop Prendergast assumed the administration of the diocese.

There is probably no diocese in the world better provided with institutions of religion, education, and charity than Philadelphia. The parish school system is admirably organized. There are 141 schools teaching 63,612 children. There are 149 ecclesiastical students preparing for the priesthood, and there is never a lack of vocations. The Catholic population of the diocese was estimated in 1910 at 850,000, whose spiritual needs are supplied by 582 priests, regular and secular. There are 334 churches, chapels, and stations. The religious institutes established in the diocese are: Redemptorist Fathers (14), Augustinian Fathers (Vilanova and six other establishments, 53 fathers), Congregation of the Holy Ghost (4 houses, 1 novitate, 1 indictional house, 15 fathers), Sisters of St. Joseph (9 houses, 1 seminary, 21 fathers), Society of Jesus (2 houses, 1 college, 22 fathers), Christian Brothers (10 houses, 89 brothers). There are in the diocese (1911) 2565 religious women, novices, and postulants and 11 schools for girls under the care of religious women.

The religious institutions for women are: Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, Sisters of Charity, Sisters of Christian Charity, Felician Sisters, Franciscan Ter- tiaries, Missionary Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis, Sisters of the Good Shepherd, Sisters of the Holy Child Jesus, Sisters of the Most Holy Family of Nazareth, Sisters-Servants of the Immaculate Heart, Daughters of Carmelites, Sisters of St. Joseph, Sisters of Mercy, Daughters of Charity, Sisters of Charity (foundation), School Sisters of Notre Dame, Sisters of Notre Dame (Namur), Little Sisters of the Poor, Religious of the Sacred Heart, Sisters of St. Dominic, Bernardine, Sisters of St. Francis (Polish), Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart, Poor Handmaids of Jesus Christ, Filic Marias.

JAMES F. LOUGHLIN.

Philanthropinism, the system of education evolved from the Ideas of Rousseau and of the German "Enlightenment", and established by Basedow on the basis of "philanthropy". Johann Bernhard Basedow (b. at Hamburg, 11 Sept., 1723; d. at Magdeburg, 25 July, 1790) was a pupil at the school of Hamburg under the free-thinker Hermann Samuel Reimarus, studied theology at Leipzig, became (1749) a tutor in a noble family in Holstein, and (1753) professor at Halle. He was invited for young noblemen to the Island of Zeeland, Denmark. In 1761 he was removed from this position on account of his Rationalistic opinions and appointed professor in a school at Altona. Here he published his "Methodenbuch fur Vater und Muther der Familien und Volker" (Altona and Bremen, 1770; 3rd ed., 1773), in which he represented in detail his ideas about the construction of the school-system. This work and his "Agatho- krator oder von der Erziehunng künftiger Regenten" (Leipzig, 1771) attracted the attention of Prince Leopold Friedrich Franz of Anhalt-Dessau. In 1771 the prince called Basedow to Dessau, where he wrote his "Philanthropinum", a model school at Dessau, the "Philanthropin." The "Philanthropinum" was set up as a model school for philanthropy for teachers and pupils. In contrast to the severe discipline of earlier days, children were to be trained in a friendly and gentle manner, instruction was to be made attractive, study as easy and pleasant as possible. The standard in forming the course of study was to be practical and useful. Languages were to be taught more by practice and speaking than by the learning of grammatical rules, Latin, German, and French being regarded as the most important. Special attention was also given to the more practical studies, as arithmetic, geometry, geography, drawing, and natural science. Basedow and his successors deserve credit for their improvement of methods and educational appliances. Special stress was laid on physical development. The fact that children belonged to a particular nation or religious confession was disregarded; education was to produce cosmopolites. Religious instruction was to be replaced by the teaching of a universal natural morality. Among the teachers who aided Basedow in this school were the brothers of the Congregation of Christian Brothers, the professor of theology, his assistant before this in preparing the "Elementar- werk". Basedow, although a fine pedagogue, lacked the personal qualities necessary for conducting such an institution, and retired in 1776. His place was taken (1776-77) by Joachim Heinrich Campe (1746-1818), who was later a prolific writer on subjects connected with Physical geography, best known by his German version of Robinson Crusoe called "Robinson der Jüngere"; his most important work is "Allgemeine Revision des gesamten Schul- und Erziehungswesens" (16 vols., 1785-91). For a short time after Campe had retired, Basedow, assisted by Wolke, was once more the head of the school. Among others who took part in this institution were Ernst Christian Trapp (1745-1818), who sought to systematize the philanthropinist principles and theories in his "Versuch einer Pädagogik" (Berlin, 1780); Salzmann (see below), and Louis Henry Ferdi- nand Olivier (1739-1815). In 1798 this first "Philanthropinum" ceased to exist.

Basedow and those who held Basedow's pedagogical opinions were called Philanthropen, or Philanthropisten. In imitation of the school at Dessau institutions called Philanthropin were established at various places. The only Philanthropin that prospered and still exists was that founded by Salzmann at Schneepenthal in the Duchy of Gotha. Christian Gottlieb Salzmann (b. at Sommerring near Erfurt, 1 June, 1741; d. at Schneep-
Philemon (Gr. φίλιμων), a citizen of Colosse (q.v.), to whom St. Paul addressed a private letter, unique in the New Testament, which bears his name. As appears from this epistle, Philemon was his dear and intimate friend (verses 1, 13, 17, 22), and had been converted most probably by him (verse 19) during his long residence at Ephesus (Acts, xix. 26; cf. xvii. 19), as St. Paul himself had not visited Colosse (Col., ii. 1). Rich and noble, he possessed slaves; his house was a place of meeting and worship for the Colossian converts (verse 2); he was kind, helpful, and charitable (verses 5-7), providing hospitality for his fellow-Christians (verse 22). St. Paul calls him his fellow-labourer (συμπάθητος, verse 1), so that he must have been earnest in his work for the Gospel, perhaps first at Ephesus and afterwards at Colosse. It is not plain whether he was ordained or not. Tradition represents him as Bishop of Colosse (Const. Apost., VII, 46), and the Menologium of Neustria, an apostle who, in company with Appia, Archippus, and Onesimus, had been martyred at Colosse during the first general persecution in the reign of Nero. In the address of the letter two other Christian converts, Appia and Archippus (Col., iv, 17), are mentioned; it is generally believed that Appia was Philemon's wife and Archippus their son. It is supposed that Archippus was exclusively in his letter with the domestic matter of a fugitive slave, Onesimus, regarded them both as deeply interested. Archippus, according to Col., iv, 17, was a minister in the Lord, and held a sacred office in the Church of Colosse or in the neighbouring Church of Laodicea.

Philemon: Epistle to.—A. Authenticity.—Exterior testimony to the Pauline authorship is considerable and evident, although the brevity and private character of the Epistle did not favour its use and public recognition. The heretic Marcion accepted it in his "Apostolicon" (Tertullian, "Adv. Marcionem," v. xxv. Orig.); a quotation newly discovered or its earlier edition by the Prefaces to their copy of the Epistle, and against some objections which have neither historical nor critical value. The vocabulary (τίτῳς, παράδειγμα τόκος, the phraseology, and the

He was desirous of retaining Onesimus with himself that he might minister to him in his imprisonment, as Philemon himself would gladly have done (verse 13), but he was unwilling to do anything without Philemon's decision, desiring that his kindness should not be as it were "of necessity but voluntary" (verse 14). Perhaps, in the purpose of Providence, he was separated from thee for a time that thou mightest have him for ever longer as a slave but more than a slave, as a better servant and a beloved Christian brother (verse 16). If, therefore, thou regardest me as a partner in faith, receive him as myself (verse 17). If he has wronged thee in any way, or is in thy debt, place to my account (verse 18). I have signed this promise of reconciliation to my own self besides (thy remitting the debt) thou owest me thine own (verse 19). Yea, brother, let me have profit from thee (σε διδάσκω) in the Lord, refresh my heart in the Lord (verse 20). Having confidence in thine obedience, I have written to thee, knowing that thou wilt do more than I say (verse 21). But at the same time, receive me also and prepare a lodging for me: for I hope that through your prayers I shall be given to you (verse 22). (c) The epilogue contains (1) salutations from all persons named in Col., iv, 10-14 (verses 23-24), and (2) a final benediction (verse 25). This short, tender, graceful, and kindly Epistle has often been compared to a beautiful letter of the Roman provincial government. It is a true, solid, and Christian Epistle, to which, as Lightfoot (Colossians and Philemon, 335 sq.) says: "If purity of diction be excepted, there will hardly be any difference of opinion in awarding the palm to the Christian apostle".

E. Attitude of St. Paul towards slavery.—Slavery was universal in all ancient nations and the very economic basis of the old civilization. Slaves were employed not only in all the forms of manual and industrial labour, but also in many functions which required artistic skill, intelligence, and culture; such was especially the case in both the Greek and the Roman society. Their number was much greater than that of the free citizens. In the Greek civilization the slave was in better conditions than in the Roman; but even according to Greek law and usage, the slave was in a complete subjection to the will of his master, possessing no rights, even that of marriage. (See Wallon, "Hist. de l'Esclavage dans l'Antiquité", Paris, 1815, 1879; Slavery.) St. Paul, as a Jew, was a little more generous towards his bondmen; but the influence of the Gospel and the Jewish civilization led him already into a happier and more humane world. The Bible mitigated slavery and enacted a humanitarian legislation respecting the manumission of slaves; but the Christian conscience of the Apostle alone explains his attitude towards Onesimus and slavery. On the one hand, St. Paul accepted slavery as an established fact, a deeply-rooted social institution which he did not attempt to abolish all at once and suddenly; moreover, if the Christian religion should have attempted violently to destroy pagan slavery, the assault would have exposed the Roman empire to a servile insurrection, the Church to the hostility of the imperial power, and the slaves to awful reprisals. On the other hand, if St. Paul does not denounce the abstract and inherent wrong of complete slavery (if that question presented itself to his mind, he did not express it), he knew and appreciated its actual abuses and evil possibilities and he addressed himself to the regulations and the betterment of existing conditions. He used, as far as for him it was possible, the slave and the freedman as fellow-creatures (Eph., vi, 5-9; Col., iii, 22; iv, 1; Philem., 8-12, 15, 17; 1 Tim., vi, 1; Tit., ii, 9). He taught that the Christian slave is the Lord's freedman (1 Cor., vii, 22), and vigorously proclaimed the complete spiritual equality of slave and freeman, the universal, fatherly love of God, and the Christian brotherhood of men: “For you are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized in Christ, have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female. For you are all one in Christ Jesus” (Gal., iii, 20-28; cf. Col., iii, 10-11). These fundamental Christian principles were the foundation on which slowly and steadily spread throughout the whole empire. They curtailed the abuses of slavery and finally destroyed it (Vincent, “Philippians and Philemon”, Cambridge, 1902, 167).

Philibert, Saint. See JERUSALEM, ABBEY OF.

Philip, Saint, Apostle.—Like the brothers, Peter and Andrew, Philip was a native of Bethsaida on Lake Gennesareth (John, i, 44). He also was among those surrounding the Baptist when the latter first pointed out Jesus as the Lamb of God. On the day after Peter’s call, when about to set out for Galilee, Jesus met Philip and called him to the Apostle with the words, “Follow me”. Philip obeyed the call, and at a later hour brought Nathaniel as a new disciple (John, i, 43-45). On the occasion of the selection and sending out of the twelve, Philip is included among the Apostles proper. His name stands in the fifth place in the three lists (Matt., x, 2-4; Mark, iii, 14-19; Luke, vi, 13-16) after the two pairs of brothers, Peter and Andrew, James and John. The Fourth Gospel records three episodes concerning Philip which occurred during the epoch of the public teaching of the Saviour: (1) Before the miraculous feeding of the multitude, Christ turns towards Philip with the question: “Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?” to which the Apostle answers: “Two hundred pence-worth of bread is not sufficient for them; that every one may take a little” (vi, 5-7). (2) When some heathens in Jerusalem came to Philip and expressed their desire to see Jesus, Philip reported the fact to Andrew and then both brought the news to the Saviour (xii, 21-23). (3) When Philip, after Christ had spoken to His Apostles of knowing and seeing the Father, said to Him: “Lord, show us the Father, and it is enough for us”, he received the answer: “He that seeth me, seeth the Father also” (xvi, 8-9). These three episodes furnish a consistent character-sketch of Philip as a naive, somewhat shy, sober-minded man. No additional characteristics are given in the Gospels or the Acts, although he is mentioned in the latter work (i, 13) as belonging to the Apostolic College.

The second-century tradition concerning him is uncertain, inasmuch as a similar tradition is recorded concerning Philip the Deacon and Evangelist—a phenomenon which must be the result of confusion caused by the existence of the two Philip. In his letter to St. Victor, written about 180-198, Bishop Polycarp of Ephesus mentions among the “great lights”, whom the Lord will seek on the “last day”, “Philip, one of the Twelve Apostles, who is buried in Hierapolis with his two daughters, who grew old as virgins”, and a third daughter, who “led a life in the Holy Ghost and rests in Ephesus.” On the other hand, according to the Dialogue of Caunus, directed against a Montanist named Proclus, the latter declared that “there were four prophetesses, the daughters of Philip, at Hierapolis in Asia, where their and their father’s grave is still situated.” The Acts (xxi, 8-9) does indeed mention four prophetesses, the daughters of the deacon and “Evangelist” Philip, as then living in Cesarea with their father, and Eusebius, who gives the above-mentioned excerpts (Hist. eccl., III, xxxii), refers Proclus’ statement to these latter. The statement of Bishop Polycarp carries in itself more authority, but it is extraordinary that three virgin daughters of the Apostle Philip (two buried in Hierapolis) should be mentioned, and that the deacon Philip should also have four daughters, said to have been buried in Hieropolis. Here also perhaps we must suppose a confusion of the two Philip to have taken place, although it is difficult to decide which of the two, the Apostle or the deacon, was buried in Hieropolis. Many modern historians believe that it was the deacon; it is, however, possible that the Apostle was buried there and that the deacon also lived and worked there and was there buried with three of his daughters, and that the latter were afterwards erroneously regarded as the children of the Apostle. The apocryphal “Acts of Philip,” which are, however, purely legendary and a tissue of fables, also refer Philip’s death to Hieropolis. The remains of the Philip who was interred in Hieropolis were later translated (as those of the Apostle) to Constantinople and thence to the church of the Dodici Apostoli in Rome. The feast of the Apostle is celebrated in the Roman Church on 1 May (together with that of James the Younger), and in the Greek Church on 14 November.
